"For us, it is not just having a terrorist event happening and then gathering the evidence to put it in a courtroom to convict somebody after we're able to identify him, detain him and extradite him," Mueller said.

Since the Sept. 11 attacks, the FBI chief said, U.S. officials have recognized the importance of using all information to determine "who intends to hurt the United States or the United States' interests around the world."

"We are doing a much better job at integrating that intelligence and acting on that intelligence any place in the world," he said.

The FBI is now working closely with the CIA and exchanging information with the National Security Agency, the Defense Intelligence Agency and counterparts in other countries.

"For us, it's taking the information domestically, integrating it with what we know from the other intelligence agencies in the U.S., and integrating it with intelligence from our counterparts from overseas to get a fuller picture of what the enemy intends, in this case al-Qaida," he said.

Mueller vehemently denied that the United States was giving up the right to privacy in exchange for security.

"In no way, shape, or form do I think we've given up our rights," he said. "But I do think there's an appropriate balance with the threat that we have."

While not mentioning renditions or electronic eavesdropping, the FBI chief said "there are a number of programs _ I'm not going to talk about specific programs _ that have been helpful to securing the United States."

Four leading Democratic senators sent President Bush a letter Wednesday saying the NSA program is an "apparent violation of federal law" _ namely getting a warrant from the surveillance court to eavesdrop domestically.

The letter said that if Bush or his administration believed the law "does not give you enough authority to combat terrorism, you should propose changes in the law to Congress. You may not disregard the law."

The letter was written Sens. Harry Reid of Nevada, Edward Kennedy of Massachusetts, Richard Durbin of Illinois and Russ Feingold of Wisconsin.

Terrorist Nuclear Bids Concern Leaders At Forum (AP)

AP, January 27, 2006

DAVOS, Switzerland (AP) - Terrorist attempts to attain nuclear weapons and a new twist in rock star Bono's campaign to help Africa topped discussions Thursday at the World Economic Forum.

"We know that terrorists are highly sophisticated and are interested in acquiring nuclear weapons," said Mohamed ElBaradei, head of the United Nations' nuclear watchdog agency.

Security experts need to share information and "do our very best to make sure we protect ourselves and protect our people," ElBaradei said.

U.S. Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said his department is inundated with suggestions about combatting terrorist threats and has placed its priority on stopping the worst disasters.

"If you look at things like a nuclear bomb in terms of consequence that's probably at the very top of the scale," Chertoff said.

He said the United States is working with other countries to make sure radioactive material terrorists could use to make weapons never enters the United States.

FBI Director Robert Mueller said in an interview on the sidelines of the forum the United States is doing a much better job of integrating domestic and foreign intelligence and acting on it to fight terrorism around the world than it was before the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks on New York City and Washington.

"We are safer but not totally safe," Mueller said.

Bono, the U2 front man who brought his campaign for Africa to last year's forum, was back this year to announce a new Red brand of products aimed at combatting the spread of HIV and AIDS in Africa. Corporations have designated red-coloured sneakers, T-shirts and a charge card to generate money and provide work for Africans.

Suspicions Iran is trying to develop nuclear weapons were a source of concern. ElBaradei said a Russian offer to move Iran's uranium-enrichment program to Russia could help find a solution to the standoff.

ElBaradei said he was also encouraged all parties were still talking about a diplomatic solution to meet western demands for assurances Iran's nuclear program is entirely peaceful.

Pervez Musharraf, president of Iran's neighbour Pakistan, said he was intent on pursuing a deal with Iran to buy natural gas but he sidestepped the question of whether the threat of UN economic sanctions over Iran's nuclear program would scuttle the deal.

Iran should not be allowed to develop nuclear weapons, he said, "their security is not threatened."

The forum released a joint study by a panel of experts that rated the likelihood as "very high" that five million people would be newly infected this year by tuberculosis and HIV, the virus that causes AIDS.

U.S. trade chief Rob Portman, who is meeting with other trade ministers in Davos, said he was encouraged by new German Chancellor Angela Merkel's willingness to become involved in global trade issues. He said he hoped she could help advance stalled global trade talks by offsetting the protective mind-set of French officials in EU policy.

Sepp Blatter, president of world soccer's governing body FIFA, said he was planning to step up attempts to end racism in the sport.

"It is a shame for football that in the year 2006, you still have racism," Blatter told a news conference at the forum.

Former soccer star Pele said the problem of racism on soccer grounds appears worse than when he was playing because top-class teams contain more non-white players now.

"When I started to play, we didn't see black people in other national teams, only in Brazil," Pele said.

"Today, you have black players all over the world."

'We are nobodies now'

In Davos, Part II (NRO)

National Review Online, January 27, 2006

Welcome to the second installment of these notes from Davos — from the Annual Meeting of the World Economic Forum. The first installment appeared yesterday, and you'll find those notes here.

Every year, the Annual Meeting has a theme or two, and this year the main theme is "The Creative Imperative." I believe that Klaus Schwab is relating these words to the elements of a free economy, and a free society. (Dr. Schwab is the founder and executive chairman of the World Economic Forum.) I'm talking about deregulation, sensible taxation, growth, trade, innovation, flexibility — this is an anti-rigidity theme. It has to do with giving people space to create, to make things happen.

Dr. Schwab hasn't said all this explicitly — that I have heard — but you can sense it. And the poster girl for this anti-rigidity, anti-ossification theme, so far, has been Angela Merkel, the new chancellor of Germany. She gave an absolutely sensational speech yesterday afternoon — but more on that later.

The meeting has sub-themes, too — and two of them are the emergence of China and the emergence of India. The place is crawling with Indians, and there is a healthy Chinese presence (only a PRC presence — would that Taiwanese were here, in part to be living, walking examples). After 9/11, Davos became pronouncedly Arab. You go through the directory, and a great many names begin with "al-." Dr. Schwab pretty much goes where the action is, or has the action come to him. Hence these themes.

There are hundreds of panel sessions, and other sessions, and I'll give you a little taste of them. A quirky one is on "video gaming" — does it "drive social evolution"? Hmm. And then there's "Can Aging Economies Grow?" Hmm again. We have "Quelling Nationalistic Flames" (good luck), and "Towards a Nanny State" (boo, hiss). "Does an Economy Need Morals?" That's a question another panel asks.

And "Should We Despair of Disparities?" I believe this panel'll answer yes. Barney Frank is on it, incidentally. For all I know, he'll be the most conservative person in the room. It's happened before.

One panel is provocatively titled "Could a Nuclear Bomb Go Off in Your City?" On it sit both Mohamed ElBaradei and Peter Sellars (the opera director). That should be a different sort of discussion.

A psychologist gives us "All You Ever Wanted to Know About Relationships but Were Afraid to Ask." I have a feeling there's not much fear of asking — not in my country, certainly.

A panel titled "Islam's Challenge to Eradicate Extremism" includes H.R.H. Prince Turki al-Faisal of Saudi Arabia. Well, I guess someone has to stick up for non-eradication. (I may be misjudging the prince . . . but I doubt it.)

An attractive panel on "Global Risks 2006: What Keeps You Up at Night?" features Michael Chertoff (Homeland Security) and Robert Mueller (FBI), along with ElBaradei. The American presence is more robust than last year. (I should have said, the administration presence is — and that translates into a more conservative coloration.)

"A New Mindset for the U.N." is introduced by Kofi Annan. If you think that's, let us say, paradoxical . . . you're not alone.

I could go on and on in this vein, friends, and I've only given samples through Thursday — the Annual Meeting is four full days, ending Saturday. But you get the idea.

In many ways, the Davos menu is like a college curriculum — there may be two classes you want to take that meet at the same time, and that's a bummer. There may be three classes. I'll give you a Davosian example — has to do with today, Thursday. At 4:15, you have an hour with Jane Goodall, providing "A Doer's Guide to Conservation." Also at 4:15 you have that Islamic-extremism panel I mentioned. (Joe Biden will join Turki, and others.) And at 4:15 you have that "What Keeps You Up at Night?" deal. I wish I could go to all three of them.

I'll go to the one that seems most journalistically useful. I'm not yet sure which one that is.

Ah, wanted to mention the theme of one dinner, a theme that I thought interesting: "Why I Bring My Office to the Beach." It's about workaholism. It's chaired by the editor-in-chief of Wired magazine. I thought that was appropriate: wired.

I attend a lunch, whose theme is sports: This is an Olympic year, and Dr. Schwab and other WEF-ers are fairly sports-minded. When I get to the designated hotel, there's a big hold-up — lots of people waiting to go through security and get in. Why are we not being checked through? Oh, yes, now it comes clear: Because Kofi Annan and his entourage are arriving. It's a quite large entourage, too. Annan sweeps in like an emperor, preceded and trailed by many.

In all my years at Davos, I've never seen this: a big group held up by the arrival or departure of a VIP (I mean, a VVIP — a very, very important person). And lots of heads of state have been around.

This brings up an old theme of mine: Does the secretary general of the U.N. have all too much power, or all too high a profile? I mean, is he not the bureaucratic servant of an international organization — albeit a very large and important international organization? Were secretaries general this big in the past?

Annan has been dubbed "President of the World." It can seem that way, at Davos.

I remember when the bombs went off in London last July. All those Western leaders were up at Gleneagles, in Scotland. Tony Blair made a statement — these heads of state stood behind him (Bush, Chirac, and so on). And there was Kofi Annan.

Why?

Anyway . . .

We all have to stand outside — including David Stern, emperor, or secretary general, of the NBA — so that's okay.

But I will confess something: Being delayed by Kofi Annan makes me slightly annoyed. Would I be as annoyed if the secretary general of the U.N. were a favorite of mine? I like to think so — but I don't know.

I miss the bulk of Annan's speech to the lunch group — because I, along with dozens of others, have been held up by the SecGen's arrival. But I hear some of the speech, as Annan reads in a soft, kind of lulling voice. He says something about how the General Assembly provides a model of a new way of peacemaking. Yeah, whatever.

Next to speak — by this time I'm sitting down, you'll be relieved to know — is Jacques Rogge, president of the International Olympic Committee. (A dream job of mine, by the way.) He issues the usual platitudes about sports — but they're all true. He sounds every single note, including how athletic competition empowers women. He observes that, at the Beijing Olympics in 2008, the ratio will be about even — male athletes to female athletes. It still strikes me as creepy that the Olympic Games will be held in a dictatorship's capital — just like in 1980 and in 1936.

As Rogge is speaking, someone passes around the Olympic torch — I mean, really passes it around. It's a very cool object, and I hold it for a bit. (It's not lit, in case you were wondering.) The torch is surprisingly heavy — must be kind of a mother to run around with over an extended period of time. It's blue, and stylistically attractive. Rogge mentions that it has been designed by an Italian, name of Farina, I believe.

And that, friends, is as close as I'll ever come to really, truly carrying the Olympic torch. Unless they make a new event out of Impromptus-izing or something.

Also speaking at this affair is Joseph Blatter, president of the International Federation of Football, whose (French) acronym is FIFA. He talks about the popularity and importance of soccer — of "football" — all over the world. They play it everywhere! he says. "They play football in Iraq," they play it in this country, they play it in that country. He names a good number of the hot spots. I wish he had said, "They play it in Afghanistan" — because, of course, after the imperial invasion, Afghans could. But not before. Not under the Taliban.

Still another speaker is Adolf Ogi, former head of the Swiss Skiing Federation, now an adviser to Annan on matters sportive. Did I tell you the story of my moderating a sports panel? I'm sure I did. The year was 2003. On the panel were Phil Knight (of Nike) and David Stern and some Olympians and that lovely, brilliant woman who would run the Athens Games (can't remember her name right this second). Prince Albert of Monaco — the bobsledder — was supposed to be there, but didn't show.

I had merely glanced at Ogi's bio, and said to him, "So, you're a skier, I understand." "Yes, I am," he said — and someone else pointed out that he had actually been president of Switzerland.

That reminded me of one of my favorite stories, all-time: Mayor Marion Barry meets Greg Norman — the Great White Shark — at some party in D.C. Barry says to Norman, "So, what do you do?" Norman answers, "I play golf." Barry says, "That's great — I play tennis."

I have always loved, loved that story. So innocent, pure, fun — democratic. It's not required to know who Greg Norman is, or who anyone else is.

You may recall, dear readers, that Sharon Stone was the guest star at one of these lunches last year. Is she here this year? I don't think so. But Angelina Jolie is, again. Several of my friends have asked me whether I've seen her. The answer is . . . no, sorry.

But when I think of her name, I think of that great Louis Prima song. (I'm not sure that Louis wrote it — but he certainly popularized it.) "I eat antipasto twice, just because she is so nice, Angelina. Angelina — the waitress at the pizzeria." (Incidentally, Prima pronounced the first syllable of "pizzeria" "pitz" — "pitzeria." Kind of interesting.)

Also, I had a much-loved family member, Angelina. So I tend to think of those two things when I hear "Angelina" — and Ms. Jolie last, if at all.

I am out of time, guys, so I will save the amazing Angela (not Angelina) Merkel till tomorrow. But before I leave, I need to issue a few corrections from yesterday. I'm a bit behind the times, and I should have known that Silvan Shalom is no longer Israel's foreign minister — it is Tzipi Livni. The Israeli government is necessarily in flux.

Also, as it happens, Michael Leavitt — the U.S. health and human services secretary — is not coming here. But Carlos Gutierrez, the commerce secretary, is.

In listing some names yesterday, I referred to Rick Warren — author of The Purpose-Driven Life — as a "quasi-religious figure." A great many readers wrote to inform me that he is, in fact, a religious leader: the pastor of a major church and so on. Forgive me — I had confused him with someone else. I thought he was more self-helpy than religious. I should have checked before scribbling, but I'm sort of going on the fly, here in Davos. (No excuse, huh, Nordlinger? What kind of journalism is that?) (Scribbly web journalism, that's what kind.)

Last, some readers objected to my calling Bartholomew — just one name, please: Bartholomew — "Ecumenical Patriarch of Turkey." They had other titles for him (and those titles slightly disagreed). All I was doing, folks, was copying the title as given in the Davos directory.

And I'm out of here, for now. Oh, let me tell you one more thing — just a soft item: You haven't lived until you've seen tiny Swiss kids pulled around by their parents on a little sleigh. Enough to melt the frozen Alps around here.

FBI Chief Urges Sharing Of Information To Combat Hackers (FT)

By Peter Thal Larsen In Davos

Financial Times, January 27, 2006

The director of the FBI, Robert Mueller, yesterday urged the world's law enforcement agencies to introduce a rapid system of exchanging information to battle computer security breaches and fraud that are the biggest concern of business.

A survey by Swiss Re, the world's largest reinsurance group, showed that companies across the developed world rank computer-based risks as their main concern, well ahead of other worries such as the rising burden of corporate governance and natural disasters.

The issue of computer fraud has gained increasing prominence in recent years following a series of hacking attacks on large companies and several high-profile security breaches at companies that keep sensitive information about their customers.

However, law enforcement agencies across the world struggle to track down and punish criminals whose use of the internet means they often have a global reach.

Yet card operators are proving increasingly successful at limiting the amount of fraudulent activity. Christopher Rodrigues, chief executive of Visa International, said the amounts lost to fraud on Visa's network had fallen to 7 cents out of every $1,000 spent, down from 14 cents in the past several years. However, the growth in credit card transactions had prompted the absolute level of losses to increase.

Mr Rodrigues said sfraud and identity theft had been exacerbated by the growth of electronic commerce, which meant consumers relied on banks and retailers to keep their information safe.

Most banks have a regulatory obligation to look after data, but these regulations do not extend to retailers.

Mr Rodrigues emphasised the consumers' sense that anybody could be affected. "Card security is about personal relevance. Disasters such as the tsunami are terrible, but people think it isn't going to happen to them."

USA Today, January 27, 2006

BOGOTA, Colombia (AP) — Colombia has dismantled a false passport ring with links to al-Qaeda and Hamas militants, the acting attorney general said Thursday after authorities led dozens of simultaneous raids across five cities in collaboration with U.S. officials.

In Washington, however, Justice and Homeland Security officials were surprised by the announcement of the investigation, which they said involved people posing as members of Colombia's largest rebel army, the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia, or FARC — not al-Qaeda or Hamas.

Colombian officials said the gang allegedly supplied an unknown number of citizens from Pakistan, Jordan, Iraq, Egypt and other countries with false passports and Colombian nationality without them ever setting foot in the country.

An undisclosed number of those arrested are wanted for working with the al-Qaeda terror network and the militant Palestinian group Hamas, said acting Attorney General Jorge Armando Otalora.

The counterfeit Colombian, Spanish, Portugese and German passports were used to enter the United States and Europe, he said.

But Justice Department spokesman Bryan Sierra said an indictment unsealed Wednesday in Miami charges 10 foreign nationals with smuggling "people that they thought were members of FARC into the United States."

"We are not alleging any connections to any terror organization other than the FARC," said Justice Department spokesman Bryan Sierra.

He said the U.S. will seek to extradite the 10 alleged smugglers, of whom eight have been arrested.

"The operation was, in fact, a sting operation led by U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement," he said, adding that Colombian law enforcement were "an active and critical part" of the investigation

The Colombian attorney general's office said 19 people were arrested in Thursday's raids, adding they were carried out in collaboration with U.S. authorities.

Four Jordanian citizens were among those arrested, Manuel Saenz, head of foreign immigration for the DAS secret police, said on Caracol television. Eight people are being sought inside the United States for extradition to Colombia, Otalora said.

Colombian authorities began to covertly trail and film suspects to unveil a criminal network with the help of their U.S. counterparts.

The eight wanted by federal authorities in Florida on charges of abetting illegal immigration rings and collaborating with terrorist groups include a Jordanian national and a DAS detective, Colombian authorities said.

Colombian officials didn't say if they believed any Colombian terrorist groups were involved in the scheme.

U.S. officials have long feared al-Qaeda could take advantage of corrupt government officials and weak institutions to launch an attack from south of the border.

Judge To Remain In Terrorism Trial (NYT)

By Julia Preston

The New York Times, January 27, 2006

A federal appeals court yesterday rejected an attempt by prosecutors to oust a judge from a terrorism case, dismissing the government's argument that the judge, Shira A. Scheindlin, was biased in favor of the defendant.

The ruling came in the case of Osama Awadallah, a Jordanian college student who was charged in October 2001 with lying before a grand jury to conceal his ties with two hijackers in the Sept. 11 attacks.

According to court documents, Mr. Awadallah was arrested in California as a material witness and held in solitary confinement for 20 days before he went before the Manhattan grand jury. His convoluted case has become a test of the government's prolonged detention of people without charges as material witnesses in terrorism cases.

A panel of three judges from the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit found that Judge Scheindlin, of Federal District Court in Manhattan, had not erred in several rulings she made about evidence in the case, and they praised her "intellectual flexibility" in resolving some thorny legal matters. The appeals judges noted that in several cases in which Judge Scheindlin had initially antagonized the prosecutors by questioning their procedures, she ultimately ruled in their favor.

This case is the first since 1973 in which federal prosecutors in Manhattan have sought the ouster of a judge. They were denied in that case as well.

Mr. Awadallah, now 25, has not been accused of any direct role in the 9/11 attacks. A jury was selected, and his trial was set to begin in May, but Judge Scheindlin postponed it because of the prosecutors' appeals.

Rabbi, Priest Back Muslim Cleric In Court (REU)

Reuters, January 27, 2006

LONDON (Reuters) - A rabbi and a Christian priest testified on Thursday in support of a Muslim preacher accused of inciting murder and stirring up racial hatred, telling a court he was friendly and hospitable.

Egyptian-born Abu Hamza, a hate figure for the tabloid press, faces nine counts of soliciting to murder and three of trying to stir up racial hatred, mainly against Jews.

But Rabbi Joseph Goldstein told the Old Bailey Central Criminal Court in London that he had been favourably impressed when he met Hamza at the Finsbury Park mosque in north London to talk about a mixed-faith married couple.

"I met him in the office of the mosque and we spoke on the telephone twice afterwards," Goldstein said.

"He was very pleasant. It was a friendly and cordial relationship. He was very open and very cordial."

Hamza, 47, was raised in Egypt but has British citizenship. The cleric, who has lost both hands and one eye and often wears a hook in place of one hand, is the highest profile figure to go on trial in recent years in Britain on the charges he faces.

Stephen Coles, an Anglican priest also based in north London, told the court he had met Hamza soon after the September 11, 2001 attacks on the United States.

"He was very hospitable. We got on extremely well," Coles said. "Sometimes we agreed about some things, sometimes we disagreed. It wasn't at any point aggressive or angry."

He said he had tried to continue dialogue with Hamza even after the cleric was arrested in 2004.

"After he was imprisoned we had in fact tried to have other meetings but it became very difficult to arrange," he said.

"I didn't want the conversation to come to an end."

Hamza also faces a charge of possessing an item of potential use in terrorism for having an "Encyclopaedia of the Afghan Jihad", which prosecutors call a terrorist handbook.

Hamza's lawyer has acknowledged the cleric gave sermons in support of Jihad, or holy war. But Hamza told the court last week he had never incited followers to kill in England and had urged killings abroad only in the context of battles.

He also denied encouraging people to hate Jews "not as individuals, not as a race, not as a colour."

PATRIOT ACT:

DOJ_NMG_0012343

Could Patriot Act Have Prevented 9/11? (SHNS)

By Deroy Murdock, Scripps Howard News Service

Scripps Howard News Service, January 27, 2006

As the Senate prepares for a showdown vote to reauthorize the Patriot Act, members of the World's Greatest Deliberative Body should deliberate on this: Had it existed, could the Patriot Act have prevented the Sept. 11 massacre?

"I think if the Patriot Act were in place in the summer of 2001 ... connecting the dots would have been so basic and easy and fundamental," says Debra Burlingame, co-founder of 9/11 Families for a Safe and Strong America (911familiesforamerica.org). Her brother, Charles Burlingame, piloted American Airlines Flight 77 until al Qaeda hijackers murdered him, grabbed the controls, and smashed his Boeing 757 into the Pentagon, killing all 58 passengers and six crew members aboard and another 120 people at the Defense Department.

How might the Patriot Act have snared Mohamed Atta and his band of mass murderers?

First, Patriot Act Section 218 would have eliminated "The Wall" that prevented intelligence agents and law-enforcement officials from sharing information. Seemingly fueled by theoretical fears of Big Brother more than the actual dangers of terrorism, President Bill Clinton's Attorney General, Janet Reno, issued restrictions in 1995 that hindered communications between spies and gumshoes. Frustrated New York FBI agents reportedly placed signs on their desks that read, "You may not talk to me."

Indeed, in August 2001, FBI headquarters barred a New York intelligence agent, who sought hijackers Nawaf al-Hazmi and Khalid Al-Mihdhar, from consulting colleagues on the bureau's criminal side. "If al-Midhar is located, the interview must be conducted by an intel agent," FBI brass explained by e-mail. "A criminal agent CANNOT be present at the interview." As former National Security Agency general counsel Stewart Baker noted in a column in the online magazine Slate, the New York agent replied that "some day someone will die - and wall or not - the public will not understand why we were not more effective" against terrorists.

Were the Patriot Act in place, "The Wall" would not have prevented Minneapolis FBI agents from getting permission to examine the laptop and possessions of "20th hijacker" Zacarias Moussaoui. Had they done so, they might have discovered leads to 9/11 conspirator Ramzi Binalshibh and Atta's Hamburg, Germany, terrorist cell that hatched this atrocity.

Second, Patriot Act Section 215, the so-called "library provision," might have led officials to seven of the 19 hijackers who used government libraries for Internet access. Using Section 215, FBI agents might have visited New Jersey's William Patterson University. They might have learned, as the Associated Press' Wayne Parry did last year, that al-Hazmi and al-Mihdhar used that state institution's computers to buy tickets online for the flight they plowed into the Pentagon.

Lies to the contrary notwithstanding, the "library provision" does not let President Bush's "secret police" round up readers of Annie Proulx's short story, "Brokeback Mountain." Section 215 prevents libraries, and other institutions, from becoming safe havens where Muslim fanatics can plot mass murder in peace.

Third, Patriot Act Section 806 might have allowed federal officials to seize the financial assets of Atta and fellow pilot Marwan al-Shehhi if they suspected terrorist intent. According to the 9/11 Commission report, Ali Abdul Aziz Ali, a nephew of al-Qaeda bigwig Khalid Sheik Mohammed, sent Atta and al-Shehhi five wire transfers from Dubai totaling $114,500. The Patriot Act might have defunded the hijackers before they were airborne.

"The Patriot Act would have saved 3,000 lives, and what's scary about that is once they start tinkering with it, it could cost not just 3,000, but tens of thousands of lives," says Debra Burlingame. "September 11 whetted the terrorists' appetites ... There's nothing like success to motivate people."

Whatever the Patriot Act might have achieved before 9/11, it has accomplished plenty since. It has helped prosecutors charge some 401 suspected terrorists, the Justice Department reports, of whom 212 have been convicted or pleaded guilty. Despite this track record, the Patriot Act soon could be consumed in a partisan bonfire.

After successfully spearheading a Dec. 16 anti-reauthorization filibuster, Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid of Nevada bragged, "We killed the Patriot Act." If it prevails, this blindly Bushophobic attitude will return America to the way we were on Sept. 10, 2001: Fat, happy, and naked to whatever morning might bring.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Federal Appeals Court Upholds Airport IDs (AP)

By DAVID KRAVETS, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 27, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO — An appeals court on Thursday dismissed a legal challenge to federal airport regulations requiring passengers to show identification before they board planes.

The 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals rejected claims by Libertarian activist and millionaire John Gilmore that the policy constituted an illegal search and violated his right to travel freely.

After reviewing the government's identification policy in private, a unanimous three-judge panel said the policy was not overly intrusive. The review was done in private for security reasons.

The court said Gilmore could leave the airport if he didn't want to show his ID and had other ways to get around besides air travel. It also rejected assertions that the act of showing identification was an illegal search of Gilmore, who made his millions as a founding employee of Sun Microsystems.

Gilmore's lawyer, William Simpich, said he is weighing whether to appeal.

He said government regulations should be disclosed in writing to the public. While millions of passengers willingly show their IDs at airports, Simpich said there is no way to know whether the regulations call for impermissible searches because the government, and the court, won't make them public.

The court rejected the argument, saying airport signs and airline workers give adequate notice that an ID is required.

The court noted that the secret regulations allow passengers to fly without providing an ID if they submit to searches. The court dismissed assertions that such searches are unreasonable.

News From The San Francisco Bay Area (MERCN)

The San Jose Mercury News, January 27, 2006

OAKLAND, Calif. - Oakland police are on schedule to meet a Feb. 17 deadline to redraft a policy on when force against suspects is warranted, members with the department told the City Council's Public Safety Committee.

The department, which faces sanctions if it does not meet the deadline, is likely to present officers with a "buffet" of options in a tiered system, with levels corresponding to the severity of the situation, Capt. Paul Figueroa said.

The new policy, which must be approved by a federal judge, would also require that a sergeant document any incident and immediately report it to the department's command staff. Investigations into police actions would be required in more cases.

The department was required to revise the policy under a settlement that charged a group officers dubbed the "Riders" with misconduct. U.S. District Court Judge Thelton Henderson must approve the changes and the department would have until May 18 to train 95 percent of officers to follow the guidelines.

The department has yet to complete 45 of the 52 tasks laid out by the agreement, which settled a class-action suit in which 119 people claimed a rogue group of officers beat them and framed them using planted evidence including drugs. Oakland officials earlier had promised Henderson they would be in "substantial" compliance with the agreement by the end of 2005.

Terror Bucks Blown (NYPOST)

By geoff Earle

The New York Post, January 27, 2006

WASHINGTON — Hundreds of thousands of taxpayer dollars sent to protect the nation's heartland have been squandered in Indiana alone, a stunning new audit reveals — more evidence the cash could have been better spent in New York.

A team of investigators examined Indiana's books to see how the state spent $48 million it got in federal homeland-security aid, finding widespread instances of mismanagement, according to the report set for release today, which was obtained by The Post.

New York lawmakers were fuming over the shocking findings of waste at a time when the Big Apple could use more anti-terror dollars.

In one instance, the auditors discovered a county emergency-management official using a special $30,000 government hazardous-materials truck to commute to work.

The truck wasn't even painted or marked as an emergency vehicle.

In another example, the investigators found that the state spent $4.5 million on special counter-terrorism response kits, but "very few" of the kits were assembled or distributed.

"This kind of thing confirms what we all suspected, which is when you throw money at problems, places like Indiana literally can't spend it efficiently, and it winds up becoming just a source of waste," said Rep. Anthony Weiner (D-N.Y.).

The claims of waste are the latest in a string of revelations of how dollars meant to protect the homeland have been squandered.

A series of reports in The Post found that more than $20 million in Small Business Administration funds meant to help business owners hurt by the 9/11 attacks instead went to refurbish more than two dozen Dunkin' Donuts shops across the country.

The Department of Homeland Security has been criticized for sending disproportionate dollars to states like Indiana, where the terrorist threat is considered low, at the expense of high-threat states like New York and California.

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff has called for making more funds threat-based, although powerful members of Congress from small states have beaten back permanent changes.

No Power But Persuasion For The Rebuilding Of Ground Zero (NYT)

By Charles V. Bagli

By making the World Trade Center redevelopment a central focus of his State of the City speech yesterday, Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg was promoting a plan that has been the subject of intense but secret negotiations between the developer Larry A. Silverstein and the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey over the future of the site.

Mr. Bloomberg, who has little actual power over decisions at ground zero, is using his bully pulpit to pressure Mr. Silverstein to accede to the authority's demands that he relinquish control of a major part of the 16-acre parcel in return for a reduction in rent, so that the rebuilding effort can proceed more swiftly.

Under that proposal, Mr. Silverstein would still proceed with building the huge and symbolic Freedom Tower, while the Port Authority, which owns the land and leased it to Mr. Silverstein in July 2001, would construct a second tower on Church Street and occupy part of it. The authority would also build a multistory shopping mall and sell a third site to a developer for a hotel, office space, and, in the mayor's vision, apartments.

The Bloomberg administration and the Port Authority contend that the new arrangement would enable all the projects, in the mayor's words yesterday, "to proceed simultaneously at the same, quick pace." Under the current schedule, the site would not be finished until 2015.

Mr. Bloomberg has been critical of Mr. Silverstein, but in his most barbed comments to date, he called on the developer to "do the right thing" and "push aside individual financial interests and focus on what's best for the city."

The developer disagrees, blaming government for any delays. Janno Lieber, director of the development for the Silverstein Properties, said yesterday that the company would build all the towers "just as soon as the government delivers the physical sites."

Even if Mr. Silverstein's role were diminished, all that construction work could not begin tomorrow. A slurry wall and foundation must be built at the eastern end of the property, which could take a year or more. And it may be impossible to do all the work at once because of environmental restrictions. But the Port Authority proposal would resolve a number of issues that have been roiling beneath the surface for years.

At one time or another, the city, the state, the authority and Mr. Silverstein have been at odds over retail space on the site, the developer's share of infrastructure costs, insurance money, and the pace of construction. In November, the developer disregarded a proposal from Anthony R. Coscia, the chairman of the Port Authority, that he give back a major portion of the site in return for a reduction in rent, which is now more than $120 million a year.

The authority and the city contend that Mr. Silverstein does not have enough money to build all the towers. They say that the Freedom Tower alone will cost more than $2 billion and take five years to build, but that Mr. Silverstein has only $2.85 billion of the insurance proceeds left. About $200 million a year has been spent on rent, architects, lawyers and Mr. Silverstein's development fee.

In December, Gov. George E. Pataki provided the developer with $1.76 billion in tax-free bonds to build the Freedom Tower, and gave him 90 days to work out his differences with the authority.

All parties are prevented from talking publicly about the negotiations. But state officials cheerily say that talks are proceeding apace, while the Silverstein camp says the bargaining has yet to begin in earnest. A senior official at the Port Authority contends that Mr. Silverstein has not only refused to relinquish his hold on the property, but has also offered a counterproposal that is even more onerous than the current arrangement.

Yesterday, Mr. Bloomberg added his explicit support for what is essentially the Port Authority's position, and a note of urgency. "Renegotiations between the Port Authority and Silverstein Properties must not wait," he said.

That does not mean that the city, the state and the Port Authority are in lock step. For one thing, state officials and Mr. Silverstein oppose the mayor's push to build housing on the trade center site. The authority is willing to consider that, but for only a small section of one tower. For another, the governor may be reluctant to alienate Mr. Silverstein and delay the April groundbreaking for the Freedom Tower, which is expected to draw national attention, helping his presidential aspirations.

"We have always been looking for ways to expedite the rebuilding of the remainder of the site," said Joanna Rose, a spokeswoman for the governor, "while simultaneously protecting the business and residential community in Lower Manhattan and ensuring that it remains the financial capital of the world."

President Explains Baker Bill Rejection (BRA)

By gerard shields

Baton Rouge Advocate, January 27, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush said Thursday he rejected a home buyout plan for Louisiana hurricane victims because he doesn't want more bureaucracy and because the federal government already gave $85 billion to the storm-wracked Gulf Coast.

Gov. Kathleen Blanco said she felt "kicked in the teeth" by Bush's remarks, including assertions that Louisiana failed to produce a plan for recovering from hurricanes Katrina and Rita.

Blanco said the state has a plan: U.S. Rep. Richard Baker's 4-month-old bill to create a $30 billion revolving fund to buy out owners of heavily damaged homes, pay off their mortgages and redevelop communities.

State officials say the bill is crucial to get Louisiana recovering and to head off an avalanche of foreclosures against storm victims in the next few months.

"This plan brings us all the way home," the governor said.

Bush aides declared opposition to the bill this week, saying the state should use another pot of cash to help 20,000 households flooded by the storms.

Blanco said Bush is asking Louisiana to abandon the 180,000 other affected households.

"We're all American citizens," Blanco told news reporters in Baton Rouge. "There should be equal treatment here."

Bush personally explained his stance against the Baker bill for the first time at a news conference Thursday in Washington.

"We were concerned about creating additional federal bureaucracies, which might make it harder to get money to the people," Bush said.

A better method to help homeowners is allocating money through Community Development Block Grants, Bush said. On Wednesday, the federal government officially awarded $6.2 billion to Louisiana.

"Monies can actually go directly to the individual families that need help," Bush said.

Blanco said the CDBG money is far less than the state needs to address housing, schools, businesses, infrastructure and other assets damaged by the most expensive natural disaster in U.S. history.

Bush said the federal government has committed $85 billion to Gulf Coast recovery.

"I want to remind the people in that part of the world, $85 billion is a lot," Bush said.

He did not detail the figure, but it would include all kinds of aid, from clearing debris and feeding displaced victims just after the storm to rebuilding levees and other redevelopment projects in all the states affected by the hurricanes.

Bush contended Louisiana has yet to come up with a redevelopment plan.

Baker took exception to that comment.

"I really viewed (the bill) as the plan," Baker said. "We felt like this was the request."

By calling for the state to use the CDBG money to help homeowners with damage outside of flood plains, The White House has restricted redevelopment for houses inside the flood zone that were underinsured, Baker said.

"They have made the decision of where we develop by telling us to focus on the 20,000 homes outside the flood plain," Baker said.

Gov. Blanco challenged Bush to deliver on the promise he made in Jackson Square, shortly after Hurricane Katrina flooded most of New Orleans, to help storm victims rebuild their communities and their lives.

Asked why Bush would reject the Baker plan, the governor said the president is being led astray by his spin doctors.

Baker's bill would create a Louisiana Recovery Corp. that would use up to $30 billion in U.S. Treasury bonds to buy hurricane-damaged homes. The program would be voluntary and would guarantee homeowners receive at least 60 percent of the equity in their homes.

"If they don't like it, they need to tell us what plan they do like," Blanco said.

An alternative would be for Washington to give the state an additional $6 billion to $8 billion in Community Block Development Grants, she said Thursday. That way, Blanco said, the state can implement Baker's plan on its own.

Blanco said the White House didn't even try to work with Baker on a compromise plan despite the state bending over backward to please Bush.

"Much of this was negotiable," she said. "They dismissed it out of hand."

On Thursday, the National Mortgage Bankers Association said it would make changing the White House's stance on the Baker measure its chief priority this year.

Baker said the Louisiana delegation will continue to lobby the president.

"We not running up the white flag yet," Baker said.

Meanwhile, first lady Laura Bush visited one of the first New Orleans public schools to open after Hurricane Katrina hit, then traveled to another school in St. Bernard Parish.

"One thing that will bring people back to their communities is if they know there's a good school for their children to go to and there's safe places for them to play," Laura Bush said.

The AP, January 26, 2006

CHALMETTE, La. (AP) — First Lady Laura Bush visited one of the first New Orleans public schools to open after Hurricane Katrina hit then traveled to another school here in St. Bernard Parish, where devastation was so great that students from 20 different public and private schools are attending classes in one partially repaired building.

In Chalmette, sitting in chairs on bare concrete floors in a classroom with no doors, Bush listened Wednesday as students who talked about the events of the past five months. One talked about being stuck in traffic for 12 hours trying to evacuate the day before Katrina hit on Aug. 29. Another said for three weeks she didn't know where her father was, whether he survived the massive flood.

"You all are very resilient," Bush told the students at Chalmette High School, now known as the St. Bernard Unified School, where students from pre-kindergarten through 12th grade attend. "It's tough and I'm really proud of you."

Bush also posed with workers from the school cafeteria, which reopened Tuesday, and she looked at pictures of damage at the school and other parts of the parish.

The parish served 8,500 students among 14 public schools before Katrina. Now there are just over 1,500 students from throughout the parish attending the one unified school.

Bush and Secretary of Education Margaret Spellings assured school officials that federal aid will be available for them to continue operating and make needed repairs.

Earlier, Bush and Spellings visited Alice Harte Elementary, a public school in the relatively unscathed Algiers neighborhood of New Orleans. It was one of a handful of public schools that opened in December as a charter school, run independently of the troubled New Orleans school board.

From Chalmette, Bush and Spellings headed to Mississippi where they were joined by Brett Favre of the NFL's Green Bay Packers in the dedication of a Kiln, Miss., elementary school playground where Favre played as a child.

"Play is really important for children," Bush said. "One thing that will bring people back to their communities is if they know there's a good school for their children to go to and there's safe places for them to play."

Louisiana Tires Of Its Rogues (LAT)

By Miguel Bustillo

The Los Angeles Times, January 27, 2006

NEW ORLEANS — Joseph Impastato conceded he took the two cashier's checks worth $85,000. The whole thing was captured on tape by the FBI, so it would have been difficult to deny.

But it was no kickback, the councilman from St. Tammany Parish said. It was business.

When he cut a deal to receive half the money from a government contract to haul away hurricane debris, Impastato said, he was acting as a private businessman, not a public official.

Federal prosecutors are not buying it — and neither apparently is the Louisiana public. After a federal grand jury indicted Impastato on felony extortion charges last month, making him the first Louisiana politician accused of Hurricane Katrina corruption, citizens condemned him in newspapers and on talk radio and the Internet as an embarrassment to his home state.

"He's got to be a real lowlife to do something like that at a time like this," Frank White, a 62-year-old retired fire captain from the suburb of Chalmette, said in an interview. "It's the Louisiana way of doing business, I guess. But there is a quiet majority now that's sick and tired of this. People are fed up with these crooks."

In Louisiana, which has a history of political shenanigans so rich and colorful that it has become a part of American folklore, people long have laughed off misbehaving politicians as a fact of life, every bit as inevitable as death and taxes.

But as the state lobbies Washington for more money to rebuild ravaged towns and cities, citizens are realizing that Louisiana's well-earned penchant for dirty politics has exacted a steep price: It has badly damaged the credibility of the recovery effort.

"Frankly, the reputation in Washington is, if we send money down there, it will just get stolen," said political handicapper Charles E. Cook, a Louisiana native who has worked in the nation's capital for more than three decades. "It is a caricature of Louisiana politics that is not entirely undeserved but is grossly exaggerated. No one cared about it much before Katrina. But right now, it's hurting the state enormously."

A major turning point in public attitude came in 2001 when Edwin Edwards, the former four-term Democratic governor, received a 10-year sentence for taking bribes for riverboat gambling licenses. In the last governor's race, both candidates — Democrat Kathleen Babineaux Blanco beat Republican Bobby Jindal — were considered squeaky clean, and promised government reforms. The distaste for dirty government has really picked up momentum since last summer.

"What was tolerated before Katrina is not necessarily tolerated now," said pollster Silas Lee III, a professor at Xavier University here. "Nerves are raw. People have lost their sense of security and direction. They are living a day-to-day existence, and they have little patience for any politician who is perceived as being corrupt."

In addition to Edwards, in the last decade Louisiana has seen an attorney general, a congressman, a state Senate president, a federal judge and countless local officials convicted of corruption. Louisiana's last three state insurance commissioners wound up in prison for offenses that include lying to the FBI, accepting $2 million in illegal campaign contributions and taking bribes — prompting jokes that future candidates should make sure they look good in stripes.

Jim Letten, the U.S. attorney for eastern Louisiana and the lead prosecutor in the Edwards case, sees the convictions as a sign of progress. Wherever he goes, he said, he is greeted by people — black, white, Latino, Asian — who tell him Louisiana needs to clean up its act.

"I am not sure that Louisiana has measurably more corruption than other [regions], but surely we have a reputation for being tolerant of it," said Letten, a member of the Hurricane Katrina Fraud Task Force, a team of federal, state and local law enforcement officials investigating scams and corruption.

Until recently, Louisiana politicians proved that charisma trumped scruples. Their repeated election victories, despite corruption allegations in many instances, showed that Louisiana voters viewed the ethical transgressions of their elected officials as an amusing spectacle.

T. Wayne Parent, a political science professor at Louisiana State University and author of "Inside the Carnival: Unmasking Louisiana Politics," said citizens accepted corrupt politicians because they were effective in providing government services, and the cash they were pocketing was not believed to be taxpayer money.

"Maybe some politician was making a deal with the devil, but that was money from some oil and gas company, or so people thought. By the late 1980s, people realized, maybe it was our money," said Parent, who believes the change in attitude has been slowly building over the last quarter-century.

Huey Long, the Depression-era demagogue who dominated every level of Louisiana government by bullying or buying off anyone who got in his way, joked that "one of these days the people of Louisiana are going to get good government — and they aren't going to like it."

Known as the Kingfish, Long was impeached as governor in 1929 on charges of bribery and gross misconduct but narrowly avoided punishment — reportedly by bribing several state senators. Elected a U.S. senator in 1930, he was assassinated in 1935 in Baton Rouge by the son of a judge who was about to be gerrymandered out of a job.

Earl Long, his eccentric brother, kept the family's Democratic political machine running into the 1960s. He once remarked that Louisiana voters "don't want good government; they want good entertainment."

He served three terms as governor, spending some of the last term in a mental hospital, where his wife had him committed after he took up with Blaze Starr, a stripper.

Edwards, who survived two trials and 22 grand jury investigations in his four terms as governor, boasted that the only way he could lose was if he were "caught in bed with a dead girl or a live boy."

The "crook" handily won. But he was eventually sent to prison for taking bribes after Eddie DeBartolo Jr., former owner of the San Francisco 49ers, testified that he had paid Edwards $400,000 to land a casino license.

Even now, during the state's ultimate hour of need, some Louisiana citizens say they could stomach a crooked politician — as long as he was competent.

"I'll tell you what, I'd take Edwin Edwards in a minute to get us out of this mess," said Gid Brill, 65, a tool salesman from Belle Chasse. "He might skim off $10 million for himself, but he'd know what to do with the rest of the money."

Such attitudes do not go over well in Washington, where some Republican lawmakers speak of Louisiana as if it were a banana republic.

Sen. Larry E. Craig (R-Idaho), who sits on the pivotal appropriations committee which oversees all major spending bills, compared fraud in Louisiana to fraud in Iraq. During town hall meetings in his home state last year, he repeatedly said that Louisiana and New Orleans had "the most corrupt governments in our country."

State lawmakers last year sought $250 billion from Congress for recovery and reconstruction in a proposal criticized as a grab-bag of pork-barrel projects. President Bush said Thursday the federal government had approved $85 billion in aid to the Gulf Coast. Louisiana's congressional delegation has contended that is not nearly enough, and continues to press for more.

Sen. Mary L. Landrieu (D-La.) said that the corruption, while historically accurate, has been magnified by Republicans in Washington who do not want to help Louisiana. "I don't want to discount that the image carries the scars of our past. But we have emphatically turned the corner," Landrieu said.

Citing the corruption scandal in the nation's capital centering on GOP lobbyist Jack Abramoff, Landrieu added, "Republicans in Washington should clean up their own house before using Louisiana's past reputation an excuse for not wanting to rebuild the Gulf Coast."

"It's not fiction — we have had some real corruption issues here in the past, and to some extent we still do today," Vitter said. "My colleagues in Washington want assurances that money is going to be spent wisely, given those issues, and I don't think it's too much to ask."

Government statistics indicate that Louisiana is one of the most corrupt states in the country. From 1995 to 2004, federal prosecutors won 310 corruption convictions involving public servants and citizens in Louisiana, said a report by the Public Integrity Section of the Justice Department. That was far from the highest total: California prosecutors logged 871. But California is a state of 36 million people, nine times the population of Louisiana.

In the last month alone, federal prosecutors have been busy bringing corruption charges against Louisiana public servants. Two sheriffs deputies who worked at a Gretna jail were sentenced last week after confessing to taking bribes — part of an ongoing federal probe dubbed "Operation Wrinkled Robe," which seeks to ferret out jail and courthouse corruption. The investigation already has resulted in the conviction of a former state judge.

Last Friday, a federal grand jury indicted a former New Orleans police officer caught driving a stolen pickup, one of about 200 Cadillacs and Chevys looted from a dealership after Katrina. Witnesses reported seeing officers drive away in the vehicles. A state grand jury is also investigating the case, along with other allegations of looting by law enforcement officers.

Brett Pfeffer, a former aide to Rep. William Jefferson, a New Orleans Democrat, pleaded guilty two weeks ago to bribing an unnamed congressman on behalf of a small telecommunications company. Jefferson has not been charged and has denied wrongdoing.

Impastato's trial is scheduled to begin next month. He pleaded not guilty Jan. 10 to federal charges that he extorted money from a businessman after helping him land a contract to remove debris. If convicted of the charge, as well as related counts of conspiracy and money laundering, he could face up to 20 years in prison.

The indictment said Impastato arranged with Lee Paul Mauberret of the Pontchartrain Chipping Yard to split the $200,000 contract. A relative of Mauberret's balked at paying the kickback, and Mauberret called the FBI, which set up the sting.

Impastato, 33, continues to serve his second term on the council in St. Tammany Parish, next to New Orleans on the north shore of Lake Pontchartrain. He declined to discuss the case when reached at Sal & Judy's, his family's Italian restaurant, where he makes a living running a business selling tomato sauces and olive oil.

His lawyer, Karl Koch, said Impastato did not "use his official capacity in any way" to enrich himself, and witnesses would testify that Impastato did a fair amount of the hurricane cleanup work himself. Impastato's critics said his actions — legal or not — set back the state's efforts to repair its reputation.

"Impastato should have avoided this at all costs. Especially given the current climate and attitude in Washington toward Louisiana," St. Tammany resident Dana Deris wrote on a blog carried on the New Orleans Times-Picayune website. "He IS guilty of furthering the negative image of Louisiana."

Outside a grocery store a few blocks from Sal & Judy's, Robert Keys, 72, shook his head.

"I'd love to be the judge on that one," said Keys, a 41-year resident of St. Tammany Parish. "A snake is going to take advantage of this opportunity right now, because there's a lot of money flying around loose. I guess the question is whether it was a legal shakedown or not. But either way, he's still a snake."

Study Says 80% Of New Orleans Blacks May Not Return (NYT)

By James Dao

WASHINGTON, Jan. 26 — New Orleans could lose as much as 80 percent of its black population if its most damaged neighborhoods are not rebuilt and if there is not significant government assistance to help poor people return, a detailed analysis by Brown University has concluded.

Combining data from the 2000 census with federal damage assessment maps, the study provides a new level of specificity about Hurricane Katrina's effect on the city's worst-flooded areas, which were heavily populated by low-income black people.

Of the 354,000 people who lived in New Orleans neighborhoods where the subsequent damage was moderate to severe, 75 percent were black, 29 percent lived below the poverty line, more than 10 percent were unemployed, and more than half were renters, the study found.

The report's author, John R. Logan, concluded that as much as 80 percent of the city's black population might not return for several reasons: their neighborhoods would not be rebuilt, they would be unable to afford the relocation costs, or they would put down roots in other cities.

For similar reasons, as much as half of the city's white population might not return, Dr. Logan concluded.

"The continuing question about the hurricane is this: Whose city will be rebuilt?" Dr. Logan, a professor of sociology, writes in the report.

If the projections are realized, the New Orleans population will shrink to about 140,000 from its prehurricane level of 484,000, and the city, nearly 70 percent black before the storm, will become majority white.

The study, financed by a grant from the National Science Foundation, was released Thursday, 10 days after the mayor of New Orleans, C. Ray Nagin, who is black, told an audience that "this city will be a majority African-American city; it's the way God wants it to be."

Mr. Nagin's remark was widely viewed as an effort to address criticism of a proposal by his own rebuilding panel, the Bring New Orleans Back Commission, that calls for a four-month building moratorium in heavily damaged areas. He said later that he had not meant to suggest that white people would not be encouraged to return.

"Certainly Mayor Nagin's comments reflected a concern on the ground about the future of the city," Dr. Logan said. "My report shows that there is a basis for that concern."

The study coincides with growing uncertainty about what government assistance will be available for property owners and renters. Louisiana will receive $6.2 billion in federal block grants under an aid package approved by Congress in December, part of which will be used to help homeowners. But that will not be enough money to help all property owners in storm-damaged areas, Louisiana officials say.

Those officials have urged Congress to enact legislation proposed by Representative Richard H. Baker, Republican of Louisiana, creating a corporation that would use bond proceeds to reimburse property owners for part of their mortgages, then redevelop the property. But the Bush administration has said it opposes the bill, out of concerns that it would be too expensive and would create a new government bureaucracy.

Asked Thursday about his opposition to the measure, President Bush told reporters that the $85 billion already allocated for Gulf Coast restoration was "a good start." He added that he was concerned that Louisiana did not have a clear recovery plan in place.

But Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco of Louisiana, a Democrat who has clashed frequently with the White House, said Mr. Baker's bill provided a clear plan.

"Administration officials do not understand the suffering of the people of Louisiana," Ms. Blanco said in a statement.

Demographers are divided over the likelihood of a drastic shift in New Orleans's population. William H. Frey, a demographer at the Brookings Institution who has studied the hurricane's impact on the city, called Dr. Logan's projections "a worst-case scenario that will come about only if these evacuees see that they have no voice in what is going on."

But Dr. Frey also said low-income evacuees might indeed begin to put down roots in cities like Houston or Dallas if they did not see movement toward reconstruction in the next six months.

Elliott B. Stonecipher, a political consultant and demographer from Shreveport, La., said that unless New Orleans built housing in flood-protected areas for low-income residents, and also provided support for poor people to relocate, chances were good that many low-income blacks would not return.

"If they didn't have enough resources to get out before the storm," Mr. Stonecipher said, "how can we expect them to have the wherewithal to return?"

WAR NEWS:

U.S. Military Releases Half Of Iraqi Women In Its Prisons (NYT)

By Sabrina Tavernise

BAGHDAD, Iraq, Jan. 26 — The American military said Thursday that it had released half the Iraqi women held in its prisons, but it said the release had been previously scheduled and was unrelated to demands made by the kidnappers of the American journalist Jill Carroll.

The military freed 5 of the 10 Iraqi women in its custody late Thursday afternoon as part of a regular prisoner release that included more than 400 Iraqis, said Lt. Col. Barry Johnson, a military spokesman.

The release drew attention because advance news of it came after Ms. Carroll's captors made their demands last week, saying in a videotape that they would kill her if the United States did not release all Iraqi women from its jails in 72 hours.

But the military said the review of the Iraqi prisoners' cases came long before the kidnappers set their deadline, which expired last Friday.

"We do not negotiate or bend to demands of terrorists," Colonel Johnson said.

It was not clear Thursday night whether the release of the five women had swayed Ms. Carroll's kidnappers, or whether they were even aware it had happened. Nothing has been heard from them since their videotape was broadcast by the Arabic network Al Jazeera on Jan. 17.

Ms. Carroll, a 28-year-old freelance journalist, was on assignment for The Christian Science Monitor when gunmen seized her on her way to an interview in Baghdad on Jan. 7. Her interpreter was shot dead as he tried to make a phone call.

David Cook, The Monitor's Washington bureau chief, said in an e-mail message that the paper had not had news of Ms. Carroll since the video broadcast.

Scattered violence on Thursday left at least 11 Iraqis dead.

A bomb planted on a road north of Baghdad struck the convoy of the minister of industry and minerals, Osama Abdul Aziz al-Najafi, killing three guards and seriously wounding a fourth. Mr. Najafi was not harmed. The attack was the sixth attempt made on his life, said Hanan Jassim, a spokeswoman for the ministry.

In Baghdad, police officers and insurgents fought a gun battle in the Adel neighborhood, where Ms. Carroll was kidnapped, leaving one police officer dead and six wounded, an Interior Ministry official said.

Two Iraqis were shot to death and a third was wounded when gunmen opened fire on their car in the Saidiya district in southern Baghdad about 1 p.m., the official said.

The authorities found 10 bodies, handcuffed and blindfolded, in water filtration pools in southeastern Baghdad on the road to Madaen, the Interior Ministry official said.

In the northern city of Kirkuk, insurgents killed two city officials in drive-by shootings. Jumaa Haji Rasheed, deputy director of the city's trade department, was gunned down as he was dropping his daughters off at school, said Capt. Farhad Talabani of the

Kirkuk police department. Uthman Muhammad Mahmood, part of the city's anticorruption commission, was shot to death while driving in the Askari neighborhood.

Gunmen also killed an engineer and an off-duty police officer in Kirkuk, said Sarhad Qadir, a police official there.

Insurgents attacked a fuel convoy on the highway from Kirkuk to Baghdad, killing one driver and wounding four, Mr. Qadir said.

Three American service members were killed in combat on Tuesday and Wednesday, the American military said. One died in a bomb blast in Baghdad, one in a rocket attack near the western city of Ramadi, and a third in Karma, just outside Falluja, west of Baghdad.

The military also announced that it had transferred authority to the Iraqi Army in the provinces of Diwaniya and Wasit in southern Iraq. Soldiers and Iraqi commanders from the Eighth Iraqi Army Division took control of the two provinces on Thursday.

U.S. Releases Five Iraqi Women (WP)

By Jonathan Finer

The Washington Post, January 27, 2006

BAGHDAD, Jan. 26 -- The U.S. military freed five female Iraqi detainees Thursday, a move it said was unrelated to demands made by a group that abducted the American journalist Jill Carroll this month.

Carroll, 28, a freelance reporter working for the Christian Science Monitor, was taken on Jan. 7 in western Baghdad. In a video aired on the Arab satellite television network al-Jazeera 10 days later, her captors said she would be killed within 72 hours if U.S. authorities did not release all female Iraqis in their custody.

U.S. forces still hold at least four women, according to Lt. Col. Guy Rudisill, a spokesman for detainee operations. In a separate statement Thursday, the military announced the detention of two more women Wednesday in the northern city of Mosul.

There was no immediate public response from Carroll's kidnappers, who call themselves the Vengeance Brigade. The five women who were released were among 420 prisoners scheduled to be freed Thursday and Friday, the military said.

"They were determined not to be a security threat," Maj. Gen Rick Lynch, a military spokesman, told reporters Thursday. "Those female detainees were released as part of our normal process, and not as a result of demands by terrorists and criminals. We don't negotiate with terrorists and criminals."

A U.S. official in Baghdad, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the situation, said there was no indication that the women's release would lead to Carroll being freed.

"If the people holding her wish to interpret this in some way to do the right thing and let her go, then more power to them," he said. "There is no reason to believe they will and no reason to believe they won't."

Insurgents and criminal gangs have carried out a wave of kidnappings against foreigners in recent months, including two German engineers seized Tuesday. Some of those seized have been killed, others released unharmed. The status of several captives remains unknown, including four members of a U.S.- and Canadian-based Christian aid group.

Also Thursday, the U.S. military announced the death of a soldier whose vehicle came under rocket attack Wednesday near the western city of Ramadi.

Lynch pointed to growing signs of conflict between Iraqi insurgents and foreign fighters from the group al Qaeda in Iraq, which is led by the Jordanian Abu Musab Zarqawi. Iraqi insurgents have killed six senior al Qaeda leaders in recent weeks, Lynch said, referring to the local insurgency as "a colleague in this operation against Zarqawi."

U.S. officials have long said they hoped to separate local insurgents from foreigners and incorporate the Iraqis into the country's political process.

Lynch said the military and diplomats had been "reaching out" to some Iraqi insurgents, but he called negotiations with those known to be conducting attacks on U.S. forces a "red line that we refuse to cross."

"The idea of driving a wedge between the terrorists and foreign fighters and the Iraqis that support them, and the Iraqi population, is taking place," he said. "And the local insurgents have become part of the solution."

Iraqi insurgent leaders, while acknowledging friction with Zarqawi's fighters, rejected the notion that they were working in concert with the Americans.

"There are disagreements over the car bombs that killed Shiites and innocent people in markets. But we cannot cooperate with U.S. forces to fight our brothers in al Qaeda," said Sheik Fadhil Falluji, a leader in the Islamic Army insurgent group in Karmah, east of the city of Fallujah. "They want to create strife among the resistance."

Also Thursday, three assassinations took place in the restive northern city of Kirkuk. In separate incidents, police said, gunmen killed an official with the city's Integrity Commission and the brother of a senior member of the Patriotic Union of Kurdistan. Police also recovered the bullet-riddled body of a butcher who supplied the Iraqi army.

The Christian Science Monitor, January 27, 2006

BAGHDAD - The mother of one of five Iraqi female detainees released Thursday expressed confidence that American journalist Jill Carroll will be released soon.

"She'll be fine and she will come out very soon because she loves Iraq and she loves Iraqis, so God will never forget her," says Siham Faraj, the mother of Hala Khalid Wahid who was detained by US forces in Iraq four months ago.

But she added, "I don't think Jill Carroll's situation has anything to do with the release of my daughter, but we definitely feel her pain....

"And to her mother, I say: I know how painful it is when a daughter is detained. But don't worry, madam. Your daughter is a great woman and she will be fine."

In a video message aired on Arabic satellite channel Al Jazeera last week, Ms. Carroll's captors threatened to kill her within 72 hours unless all female detainees in Iraqi prisons were released.

The US military confirmed last week it was holding nine Iraqi women. On Thursday, however, the military said it had detained two more women and three men for alleged insurgent activities in the northern city of Mosul. Detainees are regularly freed in Iraq following reviews of their cases, a process that can take months. US officials say that Thursday's release of five women and 414 men was part of the routine procedure and not linked to Carroll's case.

Separately, the widow of an Al Jazeera staff correspondent killed in Iraq also called for Carroll's release. "Kidnapping journalists or civilians harms the good image of the [Iraqi] resistance," Dima Tahboub told Al Ghad, a Arab-language newspaper in Amman, Jordan.

Her Jordanian husband, Tareq Ayoub, was killed in April 2003 during a US air raid that struck the generator outside Al Jazeera's Baghdad bureau. She added, "The resistance has to adopt legal methods that spare civilians.... Journalists who play an objective professional role and serve their societies should be spared also."

A group of 37 Jordanian politicians, academics, and journalists also released a statement Thursday calling "the kidnapping of Carroll ... a kidnapping of one of the witnesses of the suffering of the Iraqi people."

In Iraq, two German engineers were kidnapped Tuesday, just two days after arriving in the country. Iraqi police say they were seized by men wearing Iraqi Army uniforms who slipped into the German company's complex.

Germany's Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier said there had been no contact with the kidnappers.

U.S. Rebuilding In Iraq Found To Fall Short (NYT)

By James Glanz

Because of unforeseen security costs, haphazard planning and shifting priorities, the American-financed reconstruction program in Iraq will not complete scores of projects that were promised to help rebuild the country, a federal oversight agency reported yesterday.

Only 49 of the 136 projects that were originally pledged to improve Iraq's water and sanitation will be finished, with about 300 of an initial 425 projects to provide electricity, the report says.

The planners of the rebuilding effort did not take into account hundreds of millions of dollars in administrative costs, and mostly did not realize that the United States would have to spend money to keep things like power plants and sewage treatment plants running once they had been built, the report says. That ultimately forced the United States to pare the list of projects to cover such expenses.

Beyond the huge cost of protecting reconstruction projects, which the report says the planners did not foresee, billions of dollars were shifted from the rebuilding effort to things like training Iraqi police and guarding Iraq's borders. The report, by the office of the Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction, adds that the overall rebuilding plan was also devised without a clear understanding of the decrepit state of Iraq's infrastructure after decades of war, United Nations-imposed penalties and sheer neglect.

The figures are the first quantitative measure of what Stuart W. Bowen Jr., the inspector general in the office that issued the report, has called the "reconstruction gap," the difference between what the United States originally promised to build and what it will actually complete. The inspector general is charged with oversight of the entire $25 billion rebuilding effort in Iraq, although the latest report focuses on projects financed by $18.4 billion appropriated by Congress for the program in 2004.

"We have gone beyond just the concept of the reconstruction gap and identified the specific impacts of how many projects in the electrical sector and the water sector will not be completed and the reasons why," said Jim Mitchell a spokesman for the office. "We point out that the dramatic increase in security spending is a part of this as well," Mr. Mitchell said. "Those who planned the reconstruction did not understand at the time the hostile environment in which reconstruction would be taking place."

Rick Barton, co-director of the post-conflict reconstruction project at the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington, said that the effectiveness of the rebuilding program had previously been obscured by the fog of war in Iraq, and that what appear to be some of the first solid measures of success and failure were bound to carry important lessons.

"We've had such a range of commentary, from pretty much everything going as well as it could to outright disaster," Mr. Barton said. "This brings definition to the whole discussion, and in doing that it highlights many of the poor choices that have been made. It has that potential longer-term therapeutic benefit."

Reconstruction officials and some specialists outside the government have said that the full extent of Iraq's insurgency and lawlessness would have been difficult or impossible to anticipate when much of the planning for the rebuilding effort took place under the Coalition Provisional Authority in 2003.

The report says that the authority planners "envisioned a much more permissive security environment," but does not take a stand on whether the possibility of such problems should have been considered. The security problems that developed increased the cost of projects and materials, causing delays, the report says.

But security costs alone do not account for the drop in the number of projects that the United States will be able to finish.

"Other unforeseen problems, such as initial plans that were hurriedly put together with little knowledge of actual conditions at proposed projects sites," as well as the need to continue financing the projects once they are up and running, also played a role, the report says. As a result, some $425 million was shifted to support the operation of the plants and the Iraqis who were expected to carry them out.

The report adds that planners were also obliged to take $400 million from the reconstruction money to cover unforeseen administrative costs, probably involving the Western staff members who worked on the effort in heavily guarded hotels and in the fortified green zone in the heart of Baghdad. "The use of these funds has reduced the level of funding that can be provided for specific relief and reconstruction activities in Iraq, and altered U.S. plans," the report says.

The biggest change in priorities in the rebuilding program came when John D. Negroponte, then the American ambassador to Iraq, shifted $3.46 billion from the reconstruction fund to support projects involving the training of Iraqi security forces, building democratic institutions and developing the private sector in fall 2004. But the report notes that month after month, new shifts took place, amounting to $2.12 billion in additional spending changes through October 2005.

No fewer than 185 programs endured changes during that period, the report says. And reconstruction teams were also forced to improvise plans constantly because planners had not taken into account the decayed state of Iraq's infrastructure. As examples, the report cites a port rehabilitation project in Umm Qasr, in the south, where dredging operations were held up as workers shored up crumbling piers and berths for the ships.

The report was released only days after a separate audit of American financial practices in Iraq uncovered irregularities including millions of reconstruction dollars stuffed casually into footlockers and filing cabinets, an American soldier in the Philippines who gambled away cash belonging to Iraq, and three Iraqis who plunged to their deaths in a rebuilt hospital elevator that had been improperly certified as safe.

But in contrast to that earlier audit, which focused on rebuilding projects financed by money from Iraqi oil proceeds and assets seized from Saddam Hussein's regime, the latest report covers projects underwritten with American taxpayer money.

Audit Finds Fund Shortage For U.S. Projects In Iraq (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, January 27, 2006

The Bush administration got bad news yesterday about its plans for rebuilding Iraq with U.S. taxpayer money when a special audit showed there are not enough funds for more than half of the water resource improvements and for a quarter of electrical projects.

"Although significant progress has been made in developing Iraq's infrastructure, the United States will not complete all of the projects it originally planned to construct," Stuart Bowen Jr., the special inspector general for Iraq's reconstruction, said in the audit. He called the problem a "reconstruction gap," the difference between projects planned in 2003 and what is now actually possible in 2006.

The assessment is a setback for the Bush administration, which counted on more robust rebuilding across Iraq to help deliver the country from a harsh dictatorship to a prosperous democracy. Officials in Mr. Bowen's office say that if the projects are to be completed, Iraq will have to receive more money from donor nations, which have pledged but not fully delivered $13 billion; from the World Bank; and from oil proceeds. The problem is insurgents repeatedly attack Iraq's oil facilities and pipelines, especially one leading to Turkey, depriving Iraq of huge streams of revenue.

Mr. Bowen blamed five setbacks, or shifts in policy, that have caused some of the $24 billion Congress approved in U.S. reconstruction funds to be diverted elsewhere.

The audit cited "plans made without a clear understanding of actual situational conditions" -- a reference to the fact that the Bush administration did not predict the rise of a large insurgency and foreign terror cells when it planned for Iraq after the ouster of Saddam Hussein.

For example, the State Department diverted $5.6 billion from reconstruction to beef up security in the face of the burgeoning insurgency, which threatened to send Iraq into chaos in 2004.

The audit said that $4.3 billion budgeted for water and sanitation in 2003 was decreased to $2.1 billion in 2005. And $5.5 billion for the electricity budget was slashed to $4.3 billion.

The result: Of 136 projects in water sources and sanitation, only 49 will be completed. Of 425 electrical projects, about 300 will be completed with U.S. funds.

The report said the disbanded Coalition Provisional Authority, which ran Iraq in 2003 and 2004, "had significantly underestimated the damage done to the basic infrastructure from decades of neglect and warfare and, as a result, more time and resources are required to stand up and maintain systems than originally thought. The state of Iraq's infrastructure was further degraded by looting and sabotage following the war."

In 2003, Congress authorized $18.6 billion for reconstruction and also added smaller appropriations to bring the total to $24 billion.

Five Female Detainees In Iraq Set Free (LAT)

By Chris Kraul, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 27, 2006

BAGHDAD — Iraq's minister of industry narrowly escaped an assassination attempt Thursday, and the release of five female prisoners by U.S. authorities raised hopes that kidnapped American reporter Jill Carroll would soon be set free.

Also Thursday, the U.S. military reported the deaths of a soldier and a Marine, and Army Gen. George W. Casey, the top U.S. commander in Iraq, acknowledged in Diwaniya that U.S. forces overall were "stretched," Associated Press reported. He was responding to journalists' questions about an unreleased Pentagon study that found the military was overextended in Iraq and Afghanistan.

The Iraqi minister, Usama Abdulaziz Najafi, was in a convoy on a main highway about 65 miles north of Baghdad when a roadside bomb exploded. The blast engulfed one of the cars in flames, killing three bodyguards and injuring one. The minister was unhurt.

Hopes rose Thursday that Carroll, who was kidnapped Jan. 7 in Baghdad, might be released. On Jan. 17, her captors issued a videotape of the reporter and threatened to kill her unless all female prisoners held by American forces were released by Jan 20. Since then, there has been no word on the 28-year-old freelancer, who was working for the Christian Science Monitor.

The five female detainees freed Thursday were among 424 prisoners released by U.S. authorities. At a news briefing, Army Maj. Gen. Rick Lynch said the move was part of a "normal process and not as a result of demands by terrorists and criminals."

Local media quoted Iraqi officials as saying they were hopeful that the detainees' release might persuade Carroll's abductors to set her free. In a telephone interview, David Cook, the Christian Science Monitor's Washington bureau chief, was guarded in his reaction to the U.S. move.

"We are aware of the release and watching carefully for positive developments," he said.

Gen. Casey spoke to reporters during a trip to witness the hand-over of two provinces in south-central Iraq to the 8th Division of the Iraqi army. He said that although the U.S. military in Iraq was under stress, he thought the mission could be accomplished as staffed. He said he would order withdrawals only as Iraqi forces became capable of taking over operations.

On Wednesday, Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld disputed reports that the U.S. military was stretched thin in Iraq and Afghanistan. "This armed force is enormously capable," he told reporters. "It's battle-hardened."

In other developments in Iraq, Baghdad police sources said the bodies of 10 blindfolded men had been found in water-holding tanks at a sewage treatment facility in a Baghdad suburb. All had been shot to death.

Meanwhile, cameraman Mahmoud Zaal of Baghdad TV was killed Wednesday while filming U.S. troops fighting insurgents in Ramadi. Sources said he initially was detained by American forces and later released, before being killed by gunfire.

At his regular Thursday briefing for reporters, military spokesman Lynch said insurgent attacks and other incidents had risen 26% across the country last week to 433, but that overall, violence was in decline.

As a result of "outreach," he said, coalition forces are getting better cooperation from some Iraqi insurgents who are neither loyalists to former President Saddam Hussein nor linked to Al Qaeda, but are "rejectionists" alienated from the current government.

"By talking with them, explaining the business of being part of the solution and not part of the problem, many of them turn out to be individuals we can rely on to help make progress here in Iraq," Lynch said. "There is indeed dialogue taking place."

There were few details on the two slain U.S. troops, whose identities were being withheld pending notification of their families. The Marine was killed Tuesday by small-arms fire east of Fallouja. He was assigned to the 2nd Marine Division, 2nd Marine Expeditionary Force.

The other was described as a soldier with the Multinational Division Baghdad who was killed Wednesday by a roadside bomb near the capital.

According to an Associated Press tally, at least 2,238 American service members have been killed since the U.S.-led invasion in March 2003.

Planted Articles May Be Violation (LAT)

By Mark Mazzetti

DOJ_NMG_0012358

WASHINGTON — A secret U.S. military program that pays Iraqi newspapers to publish articles favorable to the American mission appears to violate a 2003 Pentagon directive, according to a newly declassified document released Thursday.

The information campaign run by U.S. troops in Baghdad and a Washington-based private contractor is the subject of a high-level military investigation. Last month, the top U.S. general in Iraq said a preliminary investigation into the program had found it did not violate U.S. law or Pentagon regulations.

"We concluded that we were operating within our authorities and the appropriate legal procedures. And so we have not suspended any of the processes up to now," Army Gen. George W. Casey told reporters then.

"Psy-op is restricted by both DoD [Department of Defense] policy and executive order from targeting American audiences, our military personnel and news agencies or outlets," says the directive, dated Oct. 30, 2003, and signed by Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld.

The document, titled "Information Operations Roadmap," was released by the National Security Archive, a research institution based at George Washington University that obtained it under the Freedom of Information Act.

But one senior Pentagon official said that based on the wording in the directive, the operation seemed to violate Pentagon policy.

"It's clearly a violation based on the language used in the Rumsfeld document," said the official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to talk publicly on the issue.

Since early last year, the military's Information Operations Task Force in Baghdad has used private contractor Lincoln Group to plant stories in Iraqi media about U.S. and Iraqi military and rebuilding efforts.

It also has placed reports indicating that anti-insurgent sentiment is rising among Iraqi citizens.

American troops write articles, called storyboards, which are then delivered to the Iraqi staff of Lincoln Group. The staffers then translate the storyboards into Arabic and pay newspaper editors in Baghdad to run the articles.

A military investigation of the operation led by Navy Rear Adm. Scott Van Buskirk should be completed soon, Pentagon officials say.

U.S. law forbids the Pentagon from conducting propaganda efforts that target U.S. audiences. Yet many in the military say that the globalization of media, driven by the Internet and the 24-hour news cycle, makes it likely that information campaigns targeting foreign audiences find their way into U.S. media coverage.

That much is acknowledged in the 78-page document released Thursday, which says that "information for foreign audiences, including public diplomacy and psy-op, increasingly is consumed by our domestic audience."

The directive recommends that boundaries be established to ensure that U.S. military information operations don't target U.S. audiences directly. It does not say what the boundaries should be.

The document was written to set out policy guidelines and establish the Pentagon's reasoning for elevating information operations to a "core" mission for the U.S. military, Pentagon officials say.

"Information, always important in warfare, is now critical to military success and will only become more so in the foreseeable future," the document says.

U.S. Forces Strained But Will Finish Mission, General Says Military Releasing Hundreds Of Detainees From Custody (USAT/AP)

By Nick Wadhams

USA Today, January 27, 2006

DIWANIYAH, Iraq — The top U.S. commander in Iraq acknowledged Thursday that the U.S. Army was stretched, but he insisted forces here were capable of accomplishing their mission.

Gen. George Casey said any recommendation to reduce troops further would be dictated by the situation on the battlefield.

DOJ_NMG_0012359

"The forces are stretched … and I don't think there's any question of that," Casey told reporters. "But the Army has been for the last several years going through a modernization strategy that will produce more units and more ready units."

Casey said he had discussed manpower strains with Gen. Peter Schoomaker and that the Army chief of staff feels he can sustain missions around the world.

"So, yep, folks are stretched here, but they certainly accomplish their mission," Casey said.

In Washington, President Bush brushed aside talk that the United States could not prevail in Iraq.

"If the question is whether or not we can win victory in Iraq, our commanders will have the troops necessary to do that," Bush told reporters at a news conference.

•The military released five Iraqi female detainees, part of a group of about 420 Iraqis to be released Thursday and today. The kidnappers of American reporter Jill Carroll had demanded the release of all female detainees being held by the U.S. military, and some women are still in custody. Iraqi Maj. Gen. Hussein Ali Kamal said intensive efforts were underway to free Carroll, who was on assignment for The Christian Science Monitor.

•U.S. Central Command announced that two more American soldiers died Wednesday — one in a bombing south of Baghdad and a second of wounds suffered in a rocket attack in Ramadi.

•At least 11 Iraqis were killed Thursday in attacks around the country.

Casey spoke after attending a ceremony in which Polish troops transferred leadership of the south-central region of Iraq to Iraqi forces, the first such large-scale hand-over since the conflict began in 2003.

In a study for the Pentagon, Andrew Krepinevich, a retired Army officer, concluded the Army cannot sustain the pace of troop deployments to Iraq long enough to crush the insurgency. He suggested the Pentagon's decision to begin reducing the force in Iraq this year was driven in part by a realization that the Army was overextended. The United States has about 136,000 troops in Iraq.

Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld said Wednesday that talk of an overburdened force was "either out of date or just misdirected."

General Says Force Can Do Its Job (WT/AP)

By Nick Wadhams

The Washington Times, January 27, 2006

DIWANIYAH, Iraq -- The top U.S. commander in Iraq acknowledged yesterday that the U.S. Army was stretched, but he insisted forces were capable of accomplishing their mission and any recommendation to reduce troops further would be dictated by the situation on the battlefield.

U.S. officials said Gen. George Casey was speaking about the Army in general and not specifically about the 136,000-strong force in Iraq.

"The forces are stretched ... and I don't think there's any question of that," Gen. Casey told reporters. "But the Army has been for the last several years going through a modernization strategy that will produce more units and more ready units."

Gen. Casey said he had discussed manpower strains with Gen. Peter J. Schoomaker on Wednesday and that the Army chief of staff thinks he can sustain missions around the world. Gen. Casey insisted the troops in Iraq are getting the job done.

"So, yep, folks are stretched here but they certainly accomplish their mission, and the forces that you've seen on the ground are absolutely magnificent," he added.

In Washington, President Bush brushed aside talk that the United States could not prevail in Iraq.

"If the question is whether or not we can win victory in Iraq, our commanders will have the troops necessary to do that. If the question is: Can we help keep the peace in a place like the Far East? Absolutely," Mr. Bush told reporters.

"And let me use the Far East as an example of what I'm talking about," the president continued. "There were some 30,000 on the South Korean Peninsula. As you might remember, we reduced the amount of manpower and replaced it with technology."

Meanwhile, the U.S. command announced that two more American soldiers died Wednesday -- one in a bombing south of Baghdad and a second of wounds suffered in a rocket attack in Ramadi.

The military yesterday released five female Iraqi detainees, a move demanded by the kidnappers of American reporter Jill Carroll. Officials said the women were part of a group of 420 Iraqis to be released yesterday and today and that their freedom was not connected to efforts to free Miss Carroll, who was seized in Baghdad on Jan. 7.

Gen. Casey spoke after attending a ceremony in which Polish troops transferred leadership of the south-central region of Iraq to Iraqi forces, the first such large-scale transfer since the conflict began in 2003.

The transfer of authority for the sector, which includes about 25 percent of the country, was part of a larger strategy by the U.S.-led coalition to build up Iraqi forces and give them greater role in security.

In a study for the Pentagon, Andrew Krepinevich, a retired Army officer, concluded that the Army cannot sustain the pace of troop deployments to Iraq long enough to crush the insurgency. He also suggested that the Pentagon's decision, announced in December, to begin reducing the force in Iraq this year was driven in part by a realization that the Army was overextended.

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld on Wednesday discounted the report as "either out of date or just misdirected."

Is The US Army Prepared To Fight Another Iraq-style War? (CSM)

By Mark Sappenfield

The Christian Science Monitor, January 27, 2006

WASHINGTON - When two major studies released this week questioned whether the US Army is being stretched too thin, they raised a much- repeated concern: that America does not have enough troops to win the war in Iraq.

At a deeper level, though, they raise the question of whether today's military is prepared for the threats that could lie ahead in the war on terror.

The Pentagon's answer is a categorical "yes," insisting that the military is well suited for whatever the future holds. But with the department's four-year plan for spending and strategy to be presented to Congress next month, critics say that America's experience in Iraq suggests that the US may not be ready for another long, slow Iraq-style war.

"What are the countries we could not afford to walk away from" if they collapsed? asks Andrew Krepinevich, author of one of the studies and an analyst at the Center for Strategic and Budgetary Assessments here. Suggesting that Iran, Pakistan, and Indonesia would be among the candidates, he adds, "Even if you thought the approach in Iraq was the right one, it's very difficult to see how you scale up the Army to deal with [those conflicts]."

The question is purely one of structure, not skill. Reports such as those released this week - one by Mr. Krepinevich; the other by former Defense Secretary William Perry - have suggested that the force is simply not large enough to do what the Defense Department has asked of it. The debate has played out at times publicly - in Congress and the media - and at times privately, as when former Iraq administrator Paul Bremer requested more troops in 2003 and was ignored, he says.

But only rarely has attention left Iraq and focused on what that conflict says about future threats. Now is one of those times. The Pentagon is scheduled to submit the Quadrennial Defense Review (QDR) to Congress Feb. 6. The QDR will set the Pentagon's priorities for the next four years by laying out a vision of what military leaders expect future threats to be, and then aligning the department's budgets and doctrine.

The Army of today is in many ways a reflection of the 2001 QDR. To react to flashpoints around the globe in a post-cold-war world, it suggested, the Army needed to be smaller but quicker - able to deploy to the far corners of the globe at a moment's notice. In Iraq and Afghanistan, a "transforming" Army deployed to devastating effect. But now, an Army designed for lightning strikes is being asked to keep the lid on a country where many neighborhoods are seething with anti-American sentiment.

To Krepinevich, that difficult task serves as a warning about the types of challenges US forces could face in future conflicts. In countries prone to Islamic radicalism - such as Iran, Pakistan, and Indonesia - any military venture would probably involve a lengthy peacekeeping after the war is won. Moreover, since these countries are far larger than Iraq in both size and population, it would take a far larger force to control them.

If a country such as Pakistan collapses, he says, there is the possibility that Muslim radicals could seize a state with nuclear weapons - something the United States would not tolerate. Unless the US could get major help from its allies, it is unprepared for such a scenario, he adds.

The Pentagon disagrees. Defense officials insist that the size of the force in Iraq is what the generals want, and as the Army transforms, the process will free more soldiers to fight - creating the more-agile Brigade Combat Teams, moving troops out of jobs that can be done by civilians, and rebalancing Army and reserve duties.

"Does the force still need more rebalancing? You bet," said Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld in a briefing Wednesday. "You know, an awful lot of things are happening and there are a lot of moving parts." But in the end, he and other officials say, this is the Army they want.

"Out of the QDR, this force structure we think is appropriate to the threat," said Secretary of the Army Francis Harvey in a briefing this month.

Not surprisingly, critics are skeptical. Some who are familiar with drafts of the coming QDR suggest that the lessons learned from Iraq have simply heaped more duties - including peacekeeping - on a force already struggling to meet the ones it has.

"Given how stretched our ground forces are, how can you set that standard without recommending that we substantially grow our ground forces over time?" asks Michèle Flournoy, an analyst at the Center for Strategic and International Studies here. "Many people may want to avoid a war like Iraq in the future, but most wars that we fight are not wars of choice," she adds.

Strategy Targets Terror WMDs (WT)

By Bill Gertz

The Washington Times, January 27, 2006

The Pentagon's latest four-year strategy report calls for setting up a special military task force to prevent weapons of mass destruction from being transferred to terrorist groups, The Washington Times has learned.

The task force will employ special operations forces, other troops and intelligence personnel to prevent states such as North Korea and Iran from supplying nuclear, chemical and biological weapons to terror groups.

The call for the new unit, which would have several hundred troops along with aircraft and other arms, comes as tensions heighten over North Korea's nuclear program and Iran's refusal to abide by international controls on its uranium-enrichment program.

The proposal is contained in the report of the legally mandated Quadrennial Defense Review. The report will be sent to Congress on Feb. 6, but portions of an unclassified summary were made available to The Times.

Pentagon spokesman Larry Di Rita declined to comment on the report, which has not been made public.

"We have over the past few years focused on ways of having a standing and rapidly deployable task force," Mr. Di Rita said. "It's something that can respond quickly to a tough problem."

A section of the report on combating weapons of mass destruction (WMD) said future U.S. military forces will have the capability to interdict and "render safe" weapons of mass destruction before terrorists can use them.

To counter the threat, the Defense Department will "develop new defensive capabilities in anticipation of the continued evolution of WMD threats," the report said.

Evolving WMD threats include electromagnetic pulse weapons, portable nuclear devices, genetically engineered pathogens and new chemical arms, the report said. The report states that the four-star general in charge of the Omaha, Neb.-based U.S. Strategic Command has the lead role in countering WMD threats.

"The United States will have increased efforts to locate, track and tag shipments of WMD," the report said. One key recommendation of the report is that "there shall be a joint task force for the elimination of WMD," the report said.

A core element of the new joint task force will be the Army's 20th Support Command, which will become a rapid deployment unit "to command and control WMD elimination missions by 2007," the report stated.

The report also recommends that general-purpose military forces take over the job of foreign military training that special operations forces have done "so that special operations forces can increase their capacity to perform more demanding and specialized tasks."

"They will possess an expanded ability to locate, tag and track dangerous individuals and other high value targets, globally," the report said.

Special operations forces "will also have greater capacity to detect, locate, and render safe WMD."

The unit will have its own intelligence component and be led by a two-star general or admiral, who defense officials said they hope will be a special operations veteran.

In addition to the WMD military unit, other key recommendations of the report include increasing special operations forces by 15 percent, creating a Marine Corps special operations command, setting up an Air Force unmanned aerial vehicle squadron, boosting the number of Navy SEAL commando teams and increasing Army psychological operations by 33 percent.

For homeland security, the report calls for spending $1.5 billion over the next five years for medical countermeasures against genetically engineered biological warfare agents.

Geographically, the report also contains a section on "countries at strategic crossroads" that examines the threats posed by China and Russia.

The plan called for setting up two standing units of special operations forces, one in Asia and one in Europe, to stop WMD transfers as deals are detected. Defense officials said Mr. Pillsbury has promoted the plan since in speeches to Army officials at Fort Bragg, N.C.

Contradicting conventional notions, most military reservists who left their civilian jobs to fight in Iraq or Afghanistan made more money there than in their regular jobs.

That is the conclusion of a study by Rand Corp.'s National Defense Research Institute, which found that 72 percent of the troops surveyed made more while on war duty in 2002 or 2003 than they did in their civilian jobs in 2001. More than half made at least $10,000 more.

On average, the reservists made $850 more per month while on duty than in their civilian jobs, the report said.

Nevertheless, the study said, a sizable proportion of the reservists -- 28 percent -- lost money, including some who saw their earnings drop by more than 10 percent.

Higher salaries, combat pay supplements, family-separation allowances and tax-free earnings have combined to boost troops' pay on the front lines. But Rand senior economist Jacob Alex Klerman said researchers are working to understand why this study differs dramatically from earlier surveys and anecdotal reports about families struggling to get by when a primary wage earner went to war.

Klerman said the study used earnings data supplied by the Social Security Administration, and therefore is likely to be more accurate than earlier surveys, which often relied on information volunteered by soldiers. Also, he said, those surveys did not reflect the fact that reservists serving in combat zones do not pay federal income taxes on their pay.

"You should not interpret this as saying no one has losses," Klerman said. "We need to think carefully about what is the appropriate response for those people with losses."

Still, he said, since earnings losses are less of a problem than earlier surveys suggested, legislative efforts to supplement reservists' pay may not be as necessary or require as much funding as previously thought.

Klerman said the study does not imply that reserve pay is adequate. Those troops, he emphasized, are still getting shot at, sleeping in tents and spending months away from their families.

Noting that some reservists are in school, and have no jobs or very low-paying jobs, Klerman said the study also looked at the earnings of those who made at least $10,000 or more in their civilian jobs. Even in those cases, he said, reservists made an average of nearly $7,000 more while on duty.

Overall, the study looked at 212,500 reservists and compared their civilian pay in 2001 with the amount they made while on duty in either 2002 or 2003.

To get a good idea of the impact on a full year's pay, it provided statistics for the 51,200 reservists who were at their regular jobs for most if not all of 2001, and then on duty for more than 271 days in either 2002 or 2003. For those reservists, the study found:

· Eighty-three percent made more on duty than at their civilian jobs.

· Sixty-six percent saw their pay increase more than $10,000 while on duty.

· Seven percent lost more than $10,000 while on duty.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Key Enron Trial Nears, But Climate Has Changed (CSM)

By Kris Axtman

The Christian Science Monitor, January 27, 2006

HOUSTON - Enron is America's best-known corporate scandal, the first in a string of high-profile debacles that rocked Wall Street, wiped out the retirement savings of thousands of workers, and sparked the most sweeping changes in business regulation since the Depression.

So when the company's two powerful leaders go on trial here Monday, the proceedings are likely to attract inordinate attention.

But the trial comes at a time when business and industry groups are mounting a campaign to roll back some of the reforms that the Enron scandal inaugurated. Thus, the lessons of the nation's second-biggest bankruptcy remain in flux and may be determined, in part, by the outcome of the legal drama set to begin.

"There are those who are trying to roll back [a key section] of the law less than two years after it took effect," says Jacob Zamansky, a securities fraud lawyer in New York who will attend the trial. "But these rules were put in place to protect us after Enron."

For a scandal that brought the language of bizarre accounting practices into America's living rooms (remember "off balance sheet partnerships?"), courtroom drama may be in short supply.

"I think people are going to be surprised at how boring most parts of the trial will be," says Nancy Rapoport, a bankruptcy expert and dean of the University of Houston law school. "Watching grass grow and paint dry will have more excitement. There will be some good stuff, but the good stuff will be punctuated by a lot of monotonous stuff."

Still, the details of the lives and business practices of the two men on trial - Enron founder Kenneth Lay and former chief executive Jeffrey Skilling - could provide an inside view of how the nation's second-biggest bankruptcy unfolded.

"We are going to be hearing for the first time what was happening at the highest levels of the corporation, what was happening inside the boardrooms, at all those expensive dinners and exotic trips all over the world," says Thomas Ajamie, a Houston securities fraud lawyer who has followed the case. "We are going to be learning how these high rollers lived and what they did with their shareholders' money."

To date, 16 former Enron employees have pleaded guilty and five have been convicted by jury. But Monday's trial is considered the main event - the real test of just how deep the deception went. A four-month trial expected

After the jury is selected by the judge, it is expected to last four months and include many key witnesses, such as Enron's former chief financial officer, Andrew Fastow, its former treasurer, Ben Glisan Jr., and possibly Richard Causey, the former chief accounting officer who pleaded guilty in December. Messrs. Lay and Skilling have also said they will testify.

Both sides have some of the best attorneys in America, court-watchers say. But because the accounting practices were so convoluted and cryptic even to those investigating the company's collapse, explaining it to a jury is going to be a challenge, experts say. The first criminal case of the Enron debacle, involving the suspicious purchase of a Nigerian barge, is a good example.

"The government better go to school and learn how confusing all that was for the jury," says Gerald Treece, assistant dean at the South Texas College of Law in Houston. Although five of the six defendants were ultimately convicted (four of them with Merrill Lynch), the case was widely seen as confusing. And it was child's play compared with the upcoming Enron case, he adds.

"If that was math, this is algebra, and the government is going to lose this case if it doesn't make it simple," he says. "I can assure you that the defense attorneys are going to be creating confusion, arguing that the people at the top didn't know about the misdeeds."

In fact, both defendants will argue that they did nothing wrong and did not know of any illegal activity at the company.

Lay has been charged with seven counts, including securities fraud and wire fraud. Skilling has been charged with 31 counts, including securities fraud, wire fraud, making false statements to auditors, and insider trading. Lay, Skilling go separate ways

As for the way they have handled themselves since the company collapsed, Lay and Skilling have "taken completely opposite approaches," says Philip Hilder, the lawyer who represents Sherron Watkins, Enron's internal whistleblower.

Lay, for instance, invoked the Fifth Amendment in front of Congress during initial hearings, but since his indictment has been very open with the public. Skilling testified defiantly in front of Congress, but has not spoken publicly since that time.

"At the end of the trial, we will see which tack worked - if either," says Mr. Hilder.

As for what has been learned in Enron's wake, there is growing debate. Some groups are saying that Congress went too far when it enacted the Sarbanes-Oxley Act, a major piece of accounting reform that requires CEOs to vouch for corporate earnings.

The US Chamber of Commerce, the largest business lobby group, has been campaigning aggressively for changes in the act's Section 404, which requires company auditors to thoroughly document their procedures. The chamber argues that the section is so cumbersome and costly that it is driving companies offshore.

There's No E In Houston (NYT)

By Simon Romero

HOUSTON, Jan. 26 — A big trial starts in federal court here on Monday, involving some very prominent executives who used to work for a very prominent company. Across the country, people will be following the case with great interest.

But in Houston, many residents prefer to focus on other things, like the resurgent economy, and city leaders wish outsiders would, too. The company, of course, is Enron, and the men who will be on trial are its former top executives, Kenneth L. Lay and Jeffrey K. Skilling, who face various charges in the scandal that led to the company's collapse and tarred this city's reputation four years ago.

"As of today, it's as if Enron had never happened," said Joan Johnson, president of the Hotel and Lodging Association of Greater Houston, echoing the sentiment of many Houstonians. Ms. Johnson said hotel occupancy was high, even though about 3,000 hotel rooms had been added downtown since Enron's collapse.

But as jury selection starts on Monday, residents here will have to relive the Enron debacle, with the possibility that the trial will drag on over several months. Already, hotels near the federal courthouse have been receiving a flow of out-of-town journalists, perhaps adding to the strength of the city's lodging industry.

In preparation for the trial, city officials are trying to accentuate the positive. The Greater Houston Partnership, a business association, raised the idea of coaching bellhops and other hotel workers on how to put Houston's best face forward in the downtown hotels, where many journalists will be staying. It rejected the proposal and instead backed a plan to post media contacts and Internet links in hotel lobbies, with the aim of planting ideas for positive stories.

Have you heard, for example, that Bakersfield, Calif., has unhealthier air quality than Houston, or that Houston has 82 foreign consulates, the nation's third-largest consular corps? The partnership puts those tidbits and more at the disposal of visiting news media.

"It was devastating for Houston to have its image portrayed as a bunch of corporate gunslingers during the first Enron go-around," said John F. Thrash, chief executive of eCorp, a family-owned energy concern, and the husband of Becca Cason Thrash, the hostess of Houston's most extravagant high-society gatherings. "That is something we're striving to overcome."

It isn't just Enron. Some residents get the jitters over even the slightest negative publicity about Houston, its wildcatting business ethic, its no-zoning sprawl or its continuing battles with industrial pollution. This week there was an outcry over an oil-laden, caramel-colored fog that blanketed a poor neighborhood in the shadow of the city's largest refinery.

Of course, Houston has taken numerous additional hits since Enron's collapse in late 2001, when the symbol of outrage became a question at a company meeting from an anonymous Enron employee to Mr. Lay, the company's embattled chairman: "Are you on crack?"

Thousands of well-paid Enron employees lost jobs, and the city's name was associated with schemes to hide losses from investors and destabilize the flow of electricity in California.

Back then, Houston was also criticized for its freewheeling approach to business. That shows few signs of fading. While not experiencing a boom as incandescent as past expansions, Houston's economy is still growing steadily, driven by inexpensive real estate, climbing energy prices and a fast-growing population.

"We're fine now, but the impact at the time was huge," said John Flowers, who owns Kenneally's Irish Pub near the exclusive River Oaks neighborhood. He recalls the Enron executives who used to drop by his smoky establishment for pints of Guinness as "free-spending individuals who made more money than God."

The city's economy has grown for 35 consecutive months, according to a monthly survey of purchasing executives conducted by the National Association of Purchasing Management-Houston. November, the most recent month for which statistics are available, was one of the strongest months in a decade, as demand rose for goods like plastic pipes and refined petroleum products.

Houston's status as an inland transportation hub with a ship channel to the Gulf of Mexico has also provided a buffer against the demise of Enron. Aided in part by the diversion of cargo from New Orleans after Hurricane Katrina, revenue at the Port of Houston increased 13 percent last year and total tonnage grew by 9 percent, said H. Thomas Kornegay, executive director of the Port of Houston Authority.

Furthermore, jobs are being created in the Houston economy. Employers added 42,500 jobs in 2005 and 24,100 in 2004, according to the Texas Workforce Commission. This follows heavy job losses in 2002 and 2003.

Much of the job creation has been fueled by a growing service industry and a robust construction market expected to expand further this year, even as housing in other parts of the country loses steam amid deflation of the real estate bubble.

"If any other city lost the seventh-largest corporation in America, it would have had more impact," said Tilman J. Fertitta, chief executive of Landry's Restaurants, and one of a handful of Houston businessmen who have filled the void left by Mr. Lay's exit from the city's social scene.

"It's just a whole hell of a lot cheaper here than other cities," Mr. Fertitta, one of the largest holders of real estate in Houston and nearby Galveston, said in an interview. "This is still an energy town but our prices have allowed us to become more diverse than in the 80's."

Relatively low home prices, with three-bedroom homes still widely available for less than $200,000, are luring developers to erect entirely new cities on the prairies and rice fields that make up much of Houston's outer fringe. Cheap land pushed housing starts to a record high in 2005, when they climbed 18 percent, to 48,000, according to Metrostudy, a real estate consulting firm.

One new real estate venture, a planned community called Bridgeland that is being developed by General Growth Properties of Chicago, is projected to consist of 21,000 new homes over 10,000 acres, an area larger than Houston's entire existing inner core of skyscrapers, subdivisions and shopping districts.

This project and others are a bet that Houston's population will continue to climb. The Houston-Galveston Area Council, which represents the eight-county Houston area, forecasts an increase to 8.8 million residents by 2035, from 5.3 million today. Much of the growth is driven by immigrants from Latin America, Africa and Asia, who come here legally or illegally and stay for the same reason that 150,000 survivors of Hurricanes Katrina and Rita relocated to Houston last year: a warm welcome.

In contrast to other communities that have experienced successful movements against illegal immigrants, calls by anti-immigrant groups last year to start questioning residents about their citizenship status drew a chilly response from Mayor Bill White and police officials, who perceived such a measure as a diversion from preventing crime.

And in a decision that raised eyebrows throughout Texas, The Dallas Morning News on Jan. 1 named Houston its "2005 Texan of the Year." The city beat out the filmmaker Robert Rodriguez, the cyclist Lance Armstrong and Ronnie Earle, the prosecutor who helped engineer the indictment of Representative Tom DeLay, the Republican who represents Houston's southern suburbs.

In an editorial that seemed a veiled criticism of political divisiveness in its hometown, The Morning News cited Houston's "resilience, resourcefulness and good old Texas neighborliness on a scale that did the whole state proud."

"The mountain came to Mohammed when Dallas tipped its hat at us that way," said Richard W. Murray, an influential pollster and political scientist at the University of Houston. "We've come a long way since the boom 25 years ago, when people were raising cash with projections of $100 oil. No one's doing that now."

Instead, Mr. Murray pointed out, there is a new sobriety and even, perhaps, the beginning of a sense that the benefits from the city's modest economic expansion need to spread out more equitably. For instance, the Service Employees International Union last month unionized 4,700 janitors in Houston, in one of the most successful unionization drives in the South in recent decades.

Not surprisingly, the most vibrant area of Houston's economy these days is energy, which is starting to hire after years of job cuts; oil and gas companies account for roughly 50 percent of economic activity here, down from higher levels as other industry grows more prominent.

So it may be fitting, as Houston tries to put to rest its association with Enron's hard-charging chiefs, that the last of the city's larger-than-life wildcatters are fading away or facing their own legal problems. Red Adair, the oil well firefighter, and Michel T. Halbouty, the geologist who cut his teeth in the east Texas oil fields, both died recently. And federal agents arrested the oilman Oscar S. Wyatt, 81, at his home several weeks ago on charges of paying millions of dollars in kickbacks to Saddam Hussein's regime.

Baggage Check: Next Trial True Test For Enron Task Force (LAW)

By Miriam Rozen, Texas Lawyer

Texas Lawyer, January 27, 2006

When Enron Task Force prosecutors enter U.S. District Judge Sim Lake's courtroom in Houston on Monday for the long-awaited trial of former Enron Corp. Chairman Kenneth Lay and former Chief Executive Officer Jeffrey Skilling, the government lawyers will be toting baggage -- both literal and figurative.

In the literal sense, the big criminal trial is document-intensive. In the figurative sense, the government lawyers have stumbled more than once in their four-year pursuit of Enron employees, and that track record follows them into Lake's courtroom.

Inarguably, the government lawyers have scored some notable successes by persuading 16 former Enron employees, including former Chief Financial Officer Andrew Fastow, to plead guilty to charges related to the downward financial and stock-price spiral that led to Enron's bankruptcy in December 2001. Most recently, on Dec. 28, 2005, Richard Causey, Enron's former chief accounting officer and Skilling's and Lay's co-defendant, pleaded guilty to one count of securities fraud and agreed to cooperate with prosecutors. [See Causey's plea agreement.]

In an earlier success in November 2004, in United States v. Daniel Bayly, et al., the so-called Nigerian Barge trial, prosecutors persuaded a jury to convict four former Merrill Lynch & Co. bankers and one former Enron executive on charges related to conspiracy to commit wire fraud.

But the government lawyers have also faced setbacks in the courtroom. At the Nigerian Barge trial, one former Enron executive, Sheila Kahanek, was acquitted. Six months later, in May 2005, the U.S. Supreme Court overturned the 2002 conviction of Arthur Andersen, Enron's accounting firm, for obstruction of justice, in United States v. Arthur Andersen LLP. In July 2005, in the so-called Enron Broadband trial, a jury deadlocked in the trial of five former Enron executives, and the proceedings ended in a mistrial. Two months later, U.S. District Judge Vanessa Gilmore blamed the government lawyers trying that case, United States v. Joseph Hirko, et al., for confusion at the trial, and she subsequently acquitted some of the defendants of some of the government's charges.

Skilling and Lay have pleaded not guilty.

The task force's success has been a "mixed bag" in the view of Rusty Hardin, who represented Andersen at the 2002 obstruction of justice trial.

"You have to give them, I think, credit for a very thorough and largely successful investigation in terms of the pleas," says Hardin, of Rusty Hardin & Associates of Houston. "One doesn't know whether the results would have been the same if just everybody had chosen to go to trial."

At the same time the task force has endured disappointments in the courtroom, its leadership has changed, and several prosecutors left the task force. In the most recent significant change, Sean Berkowitz became the task force's third leader in four years. He succeeded Andrew Weissmann, who resigned from the task force in July 2005 -- which happened to be a time the defense lawyers in the Lay and Skilling case made it clear they were going to file a motion alleging prosecutorial misconduct.

But this month, when task force prosecutors kick off the trial against Lay and Skilling, they will have an opportunity to make history if they rack up a conviction of the two businessmen who at one time symbolized corporate success in Houston.

"If they are successful at the Lay and Skilling trial, some of that baggage will disappear," says Charles Blau, a white-collar criminal defense lawyer about the task force. "But if they aren't successful, that baggage will be hung around their neck and the whole task force will look like a failure from a historical standpoint." Blau, a former federal prosecutor who now is a partner in Dallas' Meadows, Owens, Collier, Reed, Cousins & Blau, represents a witness in another Enron-related criminal case.

Houston lawyer Dan Cogdell offers an equally equivocal assessment of the task force's success. "You can look at their glass as half full or half empty," he says. Cogdell, a white-collar criminal defense lawyer and member of the Cogdell Law Group in Houston, represented Kahanek, the former Enron accountant and senior director who was acquitted of conspiracy and fraud charges in 2004 in the Nigerian Barge trial.

Bryan Sierra, a spokesman for the U.S. Department of Justice, says Berkowitz is preparing for trial and cannot comment for this article. Rich Kolko, a spokesman for the FBI, says Berkowitz's predecessor, Weissmann, is not available for comment.

But Bill Mateja, who once supervised the Enron Task Force, sees its glass as half full. Mateja, now a partner in the Dallas and Washington, D.C., offices of Fish & Richardson, served as senior counsel to former Deputy Attorneys General Larry Thompson and James Comey at the U.S. Department of Justice in Washington, D.C. During that time, from 2003 to 2004, Mateja was the point person for President George W. Bush's Corporate Fraud Task Force, and he oversaw the DOJ's corporate fraud efforts.

Mateja downplays the effect of the turnover at the top of the task force.

"I haven't seen the changes in the task force leadership as being detrimental to the efforts," he says.

Moreover, Mateja contends that the U.S. Supreme Court's decision to overturn the Andersen conviction reflects a weakness in the applicable statutes that make it a crime to "corruptly persuade" a witness to withhold evidence, a point specifically cited in the high court's unanimous opinion. It does not represent any fault on the prosecutors' part, Mateja says. Common sense dictated that the government would not retry the case against Andersen, which now only exists as a shell of its former self, he says.

Hardin, however, contends that Andersen would not have been indicted if the task force had not rushed to seek an indictment in the weeks after Enron filed for bankruptcy.

Samuel Buell, a prosecutor in Andersen who left the task force in 2004, disputes the notion that the task force is in trouble because of the turnover among prosecutors or because of the reversal in Andersen, a ruling he characterizes as "disappointing."

"The prosecution is institutional, and the lawyers are somewhat fungible," says Buell, who now teaches criminal law and seminars on corporate crime and prosecutorial powers at the University of Texas School of Law in Austin.

Buell notes the Enron Task Force demands grueling hours, and people get tired. He says he left the task force because he ran out of gas, and he suspects that's why Weissmann and his predecessor as director of the task force, Leslie Caldwell, moved on.

But clearly, the outcome of Andersen scarcely ranks as a success for the task force.

The Supreme Court's decision was a big break for David Duncan, the former lead Andersen accountant for Enron who pleaded guilty in 2002 to obstruction of justice and testified for the prosecution at the trial. While Duncan's plea deal was among the task force's first success stories, in December 2005, U.S. District Judge Melinda Harmon of Houston allowed Duncan to withdraw his plea on the ground that he didn't admit to having criminal intent when he entered it. Task force prosecutors have the option to indict him again, although they did not oppose Duncan's motion withdrawing his earlier plea. Under the circumstances, Mateja says, "It wouldn't have been very fair if they had pursued him."

But it's the outcome of the so-called Enron Broadband trial, Hirko, that is perhaps the most prominent setback for the task force. At the July 2005 conclusion of the trial, jurors deadlocked on many of the charges against five former Enron Broadband Services executives, convicting them of none and even acquitting three of them of some charges.

According to a transcript of a conference among the defense and government lawyers before the judge, Gilmore admonished the prosecutors: Throughout the trial I think the government was guilty of only seeing the evidence from the prosecution's point of view, every piece of evidence they saw, no matter what, as inculpatory and never could view any evidence at all as possibly exculpatory information or exculpatory evidence. The defense I think did a good job during the trial of viewing the evidence from both the government's and the defense point of view and not just from the defendants' point of view. . . .

The judge complained that the defense lawyers had filed post-trial motions that also looked at the evidence in a one-sided manner. But at trial Gilmore said the defense had shown more balance than the prosecutors.

Edwin J. Tomko, a partner in Dallas' McManemin & Smith who represented a defendant in the Enron Broadband trial, says the task force's trial record is simply not good.

"They haven't had many trials, and those that they've had have not been too successful. It's mediocre," says Tomko, whose client, Rex Shelby, a former senior vice president of engineering and operations at Enron Broadband Services, was acquitted of four of the 20 charges against him. Gilmore subsequently dismissed some of the charges against Shelby, and he now faces one count of conspiracy, one count of securities fraud and four counts of insider trading in a retrial scheduled for later this year.

SHOOT FOR THE TOP

The jury was out in the Broadband case in July 2005 when Weissmann, head of the task force since 2004, announced he would leave the task force. His announcement came a few months before the hearing where Gilmore scolded the prosecutors and a few days before the jury announced its deadlock in the Enron Broadband case. Weissmann is a former Assistant U.S. Attorney from the Eastern District of New York who had worked on the task force since its inception. His predecessor, Caldwell, now a partner in Morgan Lewis, did not return two telephone calls seeking comment for this article.

But defense lawyer Cogdell, who represented Kahanek and some witnesses in Enron criminal cases who have cooperated with the government, believes the timing of Weissmann's departure is related to the government's mistakes in the Enron Broadband trial and to a motion subsequently filed by Lay and Skilling alleging prosecutorial misconduct.

Before Weissmann announced he was leaving, three defense lawyers say, Weissmann became aware that the defendants in the Lay and Skilling case -- known as United States v. Jeffreys K. Skilling, et al. since Causey's plea -- were going to file a motion and include as an exhibit an e-mail sent by Weissmann to "a critical cooperating witness." In the e-mail, which was included as an exhibit in a Sept. 2, 2005, motion, Weissmann told the witness to bar his attorney from talking to Skilling's lawyer or else "get rid" of the lawyer.

Cogdell finds it curious that Weissmann would leave the task force before the "biggest trial" against Lay and Skilling.

But Buell says Weissmann's departure wasn't related to any allegations of prosecutorial misconduct or that e-mail. He says Weissmann's departure was simply a question of a lawyer wanting to move on and end a grueling Washington-to-Houston commute.

More than one lawyer involved with Lay and Skilling's defense and involved in the Enron Broadband trial has complained about the allegedly intimidating tactics employed by the task force and its assigned FBI agents when Weissmann was in charge.

"In my 30 years in practice I've never had agents be that aggressive," says Blau, who represents a client who testified for the defense in the Enron Broadband trial, despite, he says, numerous telephone calls from the prosecution suggesting it would not be in his client's best interest to do so.

Blau was among the defense attorneys whom Lay, Skilling and Causey -- who had not yet entered his guilty plea -- included by name in the motion they filed in September 2005 seeking to dismiss the charges against them based on prosecutorial misconduct. In that filing, the defendants argued that the case against them should be dismissed because the "actions of the Enron Task Force have deprived them of their constitutional rights both to secure and confront witnesses. ... "

The defendants argued that prosecutors attempted to intimidate witnesses and prevent them from assisting the defendants. Using Weissmann's e-mail as an example, the defendants alleged that the prosecutors employed aggressive tactics to stop witnesses from helping the defense and to induce them into helping the prosecutors.

At a hearing on the motion in December 2005, Lake ruled that he heard no evidence of prosecutorial misconduct in the testimony of two Houston lawyers -- Robert Sussman, a partner in Hinton, Sussman, Bailey & Davidson, and Wendell Odom, a solo practitioner. Lake, however, did not formally rule on the defendants' motion to dismiss. Sussman and Odom each did not return a telephone call seeking comment before press time on Jan. 5.

On Jan. 23, Lake denied Lay and Skilling's last-minute request seeking a change of venue for the trial due to prejudicial pre-trial publicity. In the motion, they alleged that a "staggering" 80 percent of 283 prospective veniremembers who returned juror questionnaires have "strongly biased views" against them. They quoted from questionnaires in which prospective jurors characterize Skilling as "the devil," a "thief," a "cheater" and a "high-class crook" and Lay as a "low down scumbag," "crooked," "a selfish, greedy man" and "the biggest lying crook of all."

Lay and Skilling will go to trial facing the likely prospect that Causey will testify against them. Causey faces a possible sentence of five to seven years in a federal prison.

If the government prevails, perhaps many of the task force's past missteps will be forgotten. As Blau notes, "The emphasis has always been to work up the chain to get the two top guys."

Reps Oxley, Frank Ask Fannie Board For Rudman And His Report (DOWJONES)

Dow Jones, January 26, 2006

WASHINGTON -(Dow Jones)- House Financial Services Chairman Michael Oxley, R- Ohio, and ranking Democrat Barney Frank want former Sen. Warren Rudman to testify before the panel on the results of his 16-month probe of Fannie Mae's (FNM) (FNM) accounting troubles, the lawmakers said in a recent letter released Thursday.

Fannie's board of directors hired Rudman, who is expected to complete his report next month, to help the board with its own internal investigation after the Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight accused executives in September 2004 of manipulating accounting rules to massage Fannie's earnings.

In a letter sent last week, Oxley and Massachusetts Rep. Frank asked Fannie Chairman Stephen Ashley for a copy of the much-anticipated report once it's finished, as well as for Rudman's testimony at a hearing they plan to conduct shortly thereafter.

"The purpose of this hearing will be to fully inform the committee about the findings, conclusions and any recommendations contained in the Rudman report," the letter said.

The Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight, which oversees Fannie and fellow government-sponsored enterprise Freddie Mac (FRE) (FRE), is expected to issue its own report on Fannie's accounting practices by the end of March.

Rudman, who could not be reached for comment Thursday, recently told Dow Jones Newswires that regulators and law enforcement agencies that are also investigating Fannie will likely receive copies of his report before its public release. In addition to OFHEO, the Securities and Exchange Commission, Justice Department and others have launched their own probes into alleged misconduct at Fannie.

Fannie, which hasn't filed its earnings statements since the second quarter of 2004, received a break from the SEC last week, when it approved a controversial rule change that reduces the chances it could soon be delisted by the New York Stock Exchange.

The news of the SEC's decision, which was posted on its Web site Wednesday, drove Fannie's stock 5.27%, or $2.85, higher to close Thursday at $56.95 a share.

Over the objections of the Nasdaq Stock Market, the SEC approved the amendment that was proposed last fall, giving the NYSE the power to hold off delisting companies that, like Fannie Mae (FNM), may fall more than a year behind in filing annual reports.

Under the old rule, companies go on watch if they fail to file an annual report within nine months of the due date and are subject to delisting if the delay stretches past 12 months.

Fannie Mae (FNM) hit the nine-month overdue mark Dec. 16. Under prior NYSE rules, delisting proceedings would have begun three months later. In a Nov. 10 update, Fannie Mae (FNM) said its annual report for the 2004 fiscal year, which will include restated results, isn't likely to be filed before the second half of 2006, so it expects to miss that deadline. A spokesman said Thursday that the timetable hasn't changed but declined further comment.

The rule change provides the NYSE with "appropriately limited flexibility" to allow a company more than a year late in filing with the commission to remain listed, the SEC said in its order.

Though Fannie Mae (FNM) isn't explicitly named in the filing, the giant mortgage finance agency is the only company to which the rule currently applies. In proposing the amendment, the NYSE wanted discretion in "certain unique circumstances" in which a company "may have a position in the market (relating to both the nature of its business and its very large publicly held market capitalization) such that its delisting from the exchange would be significantly contrary to the national interest and the interests of public investors."

The amendment takes effect immediately. The NYSE already has a new explanatory posting on its site on Fannie Mae's (FNM) information page that the company will be reassessed "every three months." Fannie Mae (FNM) is listed in a special section of the site devoted to late filers and has an "LF" attached to its symbol.

A Misguided Exemption (WSJ)

By Arthur Levitt, Jr

The Wall Street Journal, January 27, 2006

I began my Wall Street career more than 40 years ago sharing an 800-square-foot office with 10 other brokers. Since then, I have been involved in a number of small businesses -- from newspapers to high-tech companies -- and no matter the industry, the focus of every one of these has been growth. Unlike in a large company, stagnancy in a small business can lead not only to a diminished paycheck, but to extinction.

Small businesses employ a majority of private-sector workers and create 60% to 80% of net new jobs annually. This economic might, combined with the sector's political muscle, has kept policymakers vigilant in spotting impediments to small-business growth. Currently, the focus of many small-business advocates is the perceived burden placed on them by Section 404 of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act, which requires companies to assess and report the status of their internal controls. They worry that the cost of compliance is onerous, inhibiting their ability to access capital markets and grow.

In response, the Securities and Exchange Commission's advisory committee on smaller public companies has recommended that microcap and smaller public companies be exempted from the main parts of 404. Under their plan, public companies with a market cap of less than $100 million and revenue of no more than $125 million would be exempt completely from 404 requirements. Slightly larger companies -- those with a market cap of less than $700 million and revenues of no more than $250 million -- would not be required to have an independent, outside auditor test their internal controls.

While the advisory committee is well-intentioned, I fear that these proposed changes will harm, not help, small companies. I can appreciate the political pressure the SEC may be facing; the small-business lobby is almost unrivaled in the fear it instills in policymakers. But political pressure often leads people down the path of least resistance and toward superficial, even counterproductive, fixes. Indeed, if these recommendations were implemented, they would make it more difficult for smaller companies to attract capital needed for growth and undermine confidence in the markets. Instead of searching for exemptions to the rule, we need to step back and help small businesses improve financial controls, attract capital, and strengthen the very markets critical to their ability to flourish.

Thankfully, the market downturn of the immediate post-Enron years is behind us. As seen in the significant increases in IPO and mergers-and-acquisitions activity, there is a renewed vigor in our markets. Driving this has been a resurgence in investor confidence, fueled by the implementation of SOX reforms, including those enumerated in Section 404.

Exempting smaller and microcap companies -- 80% of all public companies -- from the requirements of 404 would undermine this renewed trust in our markets. Consider that these companies are the ones most likely to have internal control problems, and least likely to have analysts, institutional investors and the media watching them. In the five years before 2004, nearly three-quarters of financial restatements were reported by companies with annual revenues of less than $500 million. Already, many institutional investors do not invest in smaller companies because of risks associated with them. If one increases that risk by setting a lower bar for internal controls, it will burden these companies with a risk premium that will drive up their cost of capital. Creating a different standard would relegate small businesses to a "second-class" in the marketplace, and hinder their growth as much as any onerous regulation.

The debate until now has centered on who should be exempted, not on how to ensure that companies have the internal controls needed to prepare reliable financial statements. This focus is unproductive since it is clear from a reading of SOX that Congress wanted all public companies to assess internal controls and have an outside auditor test them. Instead of defying Congress and provoking costly litigation, we need to work within the law to find ways to make compliance easier and less expensive for small businesses.

To start, we need to recognize the difficulties in compliance that turned up in the first year of 404-compliance. Many companies were ill-prepared for an audit: Their internal controls either were not in place or not documented, and many lacked accounting and finance staff able to do this work. At the same time, many of the audit firms lacked the tools, expertise and training to assess the internal controls of smaller companies. They were using audit tools created for large multinationals, the financial equivalent of using an MRI to diagnose a cold. Many audit firms failed to integrate their findings from the internal control testing into the financial statement, as required by SOX, and as a result performed two separate audits. As the SEC and Public Company Accounting Oversight Board have noted, auditing firms needlessly repeated management and internal auditors' tests of internal controls, creating more work for themselves and higher bills for small businesses.

• Moving forward, we need, first, to redefine what constitutes a small business. The current debate has been skewed by a definition so broad as to include a vast majority of the market. A company's complexity is not dependent on its market cap. Some very large companies -- such as many of the airlines -- have market caps that pale in comparison to their complexity. Conversely, there are tech companies that have few employees and office sites, but huge market caps based on expected revenues. The current definition of a small business issuer should be updated to include companies with up to $50 million in revenues and fewer than 250 employees. If they have been able to attract more than $100 million in public capital, they should be ineligible for small business filer status.

• Second, the SEC and PCAOB should urge accounting and financial executive trade groups, as well as the software industry, to work together to develop reasonably priced tools tailored specifically for small companies and the small accounting firms who mainly audit them. These should permit a company to document internal controls so that auditors do not need to duplicate the documentation, and include control testing programs integrated with that documentation and the work performed on the year-end balance sheet and income statement. The tools must be made available before 2007 when small companies are required to comply with 404.

• Third, the SEC must reconfigure itself to provide more readily accessible assistance to small companies. In 1997, I reorganized the SEC so that the enforcement function was centralized in Washington. An unintended consequences of this was to close off a local avenue for accounting assistance for small businesses. Many small companies do not have good technical accountants and cannot afford them. If the SEC placed those that review small business filings closer to the businesses and supplemented its staff with a small group of accountants that can answer questions small companies might have, it would help avoid restatements and reduce costs.

• Fourth, while the SEC and PCAOB have issued some helpful guidance on how to streamline the auditing of internal controls, they should go further in easing requirements while stepping up enforcement. If a company has documented monitoring controls, and the monitoring process has not discovered any problems except for isolated cases, then no further internal examination by the company should be required. Re-examining controls when monitoring controls are working has layered on unnecessary work that has driven up costs for businesses. Companies should be given credit for doing the right thing, and not have to pay to recheck what they are doing right. However, if the auditor finds that monitoring controls have not been working and financials need to be restated, then a company should expect a swift SEC enforcement action.

These steps should help small companies update internal controls cost-effectively, without gutting the financial reporting regime that undergirds our capital markets. In light of the importance of small businesses to the economy, the last thing we need is regulation that stifles their entrepreneurship -- or deregulation that makes it more difficult for them to succeed in the public capital markets.

Mr. Levitt, former chairman of the SEC, was the chairman of the first White House Conference on Small Business.

CRIMINAL LAW:

'I Don't Know' Abramoff, Bush Says President Won't Release Photos Of Two Together (USAT)

By Richard Benedetto And David Jackson

USA Today, January 27, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush fended off questions Thursday about White House links to convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff and refused to release photos that show the two men together. "I don't know him," Bush said.

"I had my picture taken with him, evidently," Bush said at a White House news conference. "I've had my picture taken with a lot of people. Having my picture taken with someone doesn't mean that I'm a friend with them or know them very well."

"It's part of the job of the president to shake hands … with people and smile," he said.

Speaking in a wide-ranging, 46-minute news conference, Bush also renewed his defense of a program he approved to eavesdrop without a court order on terrorism suspects' international calls into or out of the USA.

"As I stand here right now, I can tell the American people the program is legal, it's designed to protect civil liberties, and it's necessary," he said.

Bush said he would help Republicans fight to keep control of Congress in elections this year.

He said he's got "one more off-year campaign in me as a sitting president" and that he is looking forward to hitting the trail on behalf of GOP congressional candidates.

"We've got a record and a good one, and that's what I intend to campaign on," Bush said.

Bush acknowledged that photographs of him with Abramoff were taken either at White House parties or political fundraisers, but he said he would not make them public because he feared they would be used for partisan attacks. "We live in a world in which those pictures will be used for pure political purposes, and they're not relevant to the investigation," he said.

Abramoff has pleaded guilty to fraud, tax evasion and conspiracy to bribe public officials and has pledged to cooperate with investigators.

"If they believe something was done inappropriately in the White House, they'll come and look, and they're welcome to do so," Bush said.

Asked if he meets with lobbyists, Bush said, "I try not to." He said that lobbyists sometimes come to the White House, and he has met and thanked them for their help in pushing his agenda.

Some Senate Democrats continued calls Thursday for a special counsel investigation of Abramoff. Sen. Ken Salazar, D-Colo., said there is evidence of "a strong connection between Jack Abramoff and the executive branch of government."

In other news, Bush said:

• "It is not in the world's interest" for Iran to have a nuclear weapon, an outcome he called "unacceptable." He said he would back a plan to have Iran obtain nuclear power plant fuel from Russia for a civilian energy program.

•Any suggestion by human rights groups that U.S. interrogators have tortured terrorist suspects is "wrong." He vowed, "No American will be allowed to torture another human being anywhere in the world."

•Morale, retention and recruitment remain high in the armed services, despite a Pentagon report that U.S. forces are overextended by service in Iraq and Afghanistan.

Bush Refuses To Release Abramoff Pictures (REU-Y2)

By Steve Holland

Reuters, January 27, 2006

President George W. Bush sought to distance himself from disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff on Thursday, saying "I don't know him," and refused to release photographs in which he appeared with Abramoff.

At a news conference, Bush said release of photographs that show him and Abramoff together would be used for "pure political purposes" by Democrats seeking to tie the lobbyist to the White House.

"I, frankly, don't even remember having my picture taken with the guy. I don't know him," Bush said at his first solo news conference since December 19.

Early this month Abramoff pleaded guilty to fraud charges and agreed to help U.S. prosecutors in a corruption probe that has generated calls for reform of the Washington practice of lobbying lawmakers with donations and favors to try to influence legislation.

"This investigation needs to look into all aspects of his influence on Capitol Hill. And if there are some in the White House, I'm sure they're going to come knock on the doors," Bush said.

Abramoff was a major fund-raiser for Bush's re-election campaign in 2004 and the White House has acknowledged that Abramoff participated in a few staff-level meetings at the White House and two Hanukkah receptions.

But whether Abramoff attempted to influence any White House policy has not been made clear.

Democrats seeking to regain control of the U.S. Congress in November mid-term elections are hoping the Abramoff scandal will taint Republicans with a "culture of corruption."

Democratic Sens. Charles Schumer of New York and Ken Salazar of Colorado sent a letter to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales calling on him to appoint a special counsel to investigate the Abramoff case "without favor or fear of reprisal within the administration.

"A special counsel will ensure the public's confidence in the investigation and prosecution and help to restore its faith in our government," they wrote.

A CNN/USA Today/Gallup poll said that Democrats would do a better job of dealing with corruption in government by a 40 to 31 percent margin.

Bush noted reporters have been to holiday receptions as well.

"I can't say I didn't ever meet him, but I meet a lot of people. And, you know, evidently he was, just like you were the other day, at the holiday party: came in, put the grip-and-grin, they clicked the picture and off he goes," he said.

Abramoff and his clients contributed to both Republicans and Democrats but appeared to send more money to Bush's party.

The Bush-Cheney re-election campaign said in the wake of the scandal that it would give to charity $6,000 in contributions made by Abramoff or his clients, but not the tens of thousands of dollars Abramoff helped raise.

Bush said he had never had a discussion with Abramoff and that as a general practice he does not meet with lobbyists.

But he said it was possible that lobbyists might be in a "room full of people" during an event staged to celebrate the success of a policy or passage of legislation such as a foreign-trade agreement.

A former White House procurement official, David Safavian, was indicted last October on charges of lying to investigators looking into a golf trip he took with Abramoff while serving in an earlier job as chief of staff for the General Services Administration.

Bush Opposes Release Of Photos With Abramoff (WP)

By William Branigin

The Washington Post, January 27, 2006

President Bush today dismissed the significance of photographs showing him with disgraced Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff and indicated that the White House would continue to oppose releasing the photos, which he said are irrelevant to a federal investigation.

"I've had my picture taken with him, evidently," Bush said in response to a question at a White House news conference. "I've had my picture taken with a lot of people. Having my picture taken with someone doesn't mean that I'm a friend with him or know him very well." He said that "it's part of the job of the president to shake hands with people and smile."

Bush said the photos, if released, "will be used for pure political purposes, and they're not relevant to the investigation." He referred to a continuing federal probe of illegal lobbying activities directed by Abramoff, who pleaded guilty this month to felony conspiracy and fraud charges. A plea agreement said Abramoff bribed public officials, including a member of Congress.

The president said he has no idea how many photos were taken of him and Abramoff, and he declined to discuss reported meetings that the lobbyist attended with White House staffers. Federal prosecutors are "welcome" to look into those meetings if they believe they involved improprieties, Bush said.

Abramoff "contributed to my campaigns, but he contributed, either directly or through his clients, to a lot of people in Washington," he said.

Asked whether he personally has ever been lobbied by Abramoff or other lobbyists, Bush said: "I, frankly, don't even remember having my picture taken with the guy. I don't know him. . . . But I can't say I didn't ever meet him, but I meet a lot of people. And, you know, evidently he was . . . at the holiday party: Came in, put the grip-and-grin, they clicked the picture and off he goes."

Bush said that "obviously, we went to fund-raisers, but I've never sat down with him and had a discussion with the guy."

As for whether he meets with lobbyists, Bush said, "I try not to." However, he said he could not attest to "never having met with one." He made an exception for meetings in which "people are helping on issues" such as promoting trade or tax relief.

"If you consider that a meeting, the answer is yes, I'm sure I have, in a room full of people, as we either thank people for success in policy or thank people for going out of their way to help get a piece of legislation passed on the Hill," Bush said.

Bush was also questioned at the news conference about a controversial eavesdropping program that he authorized after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks and that critics have charged violates U.S. law. Asked if he would resist efforts in Congress to modify the law or write a new one to specifically allow the program, Bush said he is convinced he is already on firm legal ground.

"As I stand here right now, I can tell the American people the program's legal, it's designed to protect civil liberties, and it's necessary," he said.

"Now, my concern has always been that, in an attempt to try to pass a law on something that's already legal, we'll show the enemy what we're doing," Bush said. The program "is so sensitive and so important that if information gets out to how we run it or how we operate it, it'll help the enemy. And so, of course, we'll listen to ideas. But I want to make sure that people understand that if the attempt to write law . . . is likely to expose the nature of the program, I'll resist it."

Bush denied trying to "circumvent" the nearly 28-year-old Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act (FISA), which requires intelligence agencies to obtain a warrant from a special court to eavesdrop on communications in the United States.

"I am upholding my duty and at the same time doing so under the law and with the Constitution behind me," Bush said. But he added: "The FISA law was written in 1978. We're having the discussion in 2006. It's a different world."

While FISA remains "an important tool," he said, intelligence experts had informed him that it did not fully meet today's requirements.

"I said, 'Look, is it possible to conduct this program under the old law?' And people said it doesn't work in order to be able do the job we expect us to do," Bush said.

Bush was also asked to clarify his stand on the torture of terrorist suspects by delivering some "Texas straight talk" on the subject in view of criticism by human rights groups.

"No American will be allowed to torture another human being anywhere in the world," he said, repeating the statement a reporter asked him to make.

Bush Says He Doesn't Know Abramoff, Remember Photos Being Taken (MERCN)

By William Douglas

The San Jose Mercury News, January 27, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0012375

WASHINGTON - President Bush tried to distance himself Thursday from disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff while refusing to release White House pictures taken of him with Abramoff.

"I, frankly, don't even remember having my picture taken with the guy. I don't know him," Bush said. "But I can't say I didn't ever meet him."

The president's remarks came during a wide-ranging, impromptu White House news conference in which he continued to defend his domestic spying program, embraced a Russian proposal to end the stalemate over Iran's nuclear activities and carefully interpreted a militant Islamic group's stunning victory Wednesday in Palestinian parliamentary elections.

Bush's recollection of Abramoff was fuzzy, but the high-flying lobbyist was well known in political fundraising circles, including the Bush-Cheney campaign, which received a $6,000 contribution from him. The campaign donated the money to the American Heart Association earlier this month after Abramoff pleaded guilty to fraud charges and agreed to help federal prosecutors in their investigation of possible corruption in Congress and the White House.

Since Abramoff's plea, administration officials have acknowledged that he met with some White House staffers but won't say whom or about what. White House Press Secretary Scott McClellan has said Abramoff was in the White House at least twice for Hanukkah parties, where he may have had pictures taken with Bush.

Administration officials want to keep any Bush-Abramoff pictures from becoming public to avoid giving political opponents ammunition that could hurt Republicans in November's congressional elections.

"Having my picture taken with someone doesn't mean that I'm a friend with them or know them very well. I've had my picture taken with you at holiday parties," the president reminded reporters. He estimated that he'd posed for about 9,000 photos at receptions this past holiday season alone.

"I'm also mindful that we live in a world in which those pictures will be used for pure political purposes, and they're not relevant to the investigation," Bush said.

Regarding the spying program, the president reiterated his contention that he was within his constitutional rights to authorize electronic eavesdropping without getting a warrant from a court or specific approval from Congress.

"We're having this discussion in 2006. It's a different world," the president said.

Turning his attention to the Middle East, Bush called Hamas' surprising victory in Palestinian elections a "wake-up call" to Palestinian leaders who followed the late Yasser Arafat. "Obviously, people were not happy with the status quo. The people are demanding honest government. The people want services."

Bush didn't entirely rule out dealing with elected Hamas leaders, but said, "If your platform is the destruction of Israel, it means you're not a partner in peace. And we're interested in peace."

On Iran, the president called a proposal by Russia to enrich Iran's uranium and return it to the Islamic nation for use in fueling nuclear reactors for electricity "a good plan." Iran maintains that it wants nuclear-powered electricity, but the United States and the European Union fear that it's pursuing nuclear weapons.

On other matters:

_Bush said he hadn't seen a Human Rights Watch report this week that says the administration has a strategy of abusing terrorism suspects during interrogations. "No American will be allowed to torture another human being anywhere in the world," he said.

In December he signed into law a measure by Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., that bans torture of detainees in U.S. custody, but he added a qualifying statement that he'd interpret the law in keeping with his expansive view of presidential power.

"One reason why presidents put qualifiers in is to protect the prerogative of the executive branch," Bush said Thursday.

_The president was cool to a homeowner-bailout plan for Hurricane Katrina victims in Louisiana. He said Congress had appropriated $85 billion so far to help rebuild the Gulf Coast.

"I want to remind the people in that part of the world, $85 billion is a lot, and secondly, we were concerned about creating additional federal bureaucracies, which might make it harder to get money to the people," he said.

Bush Says Photos With Abramoff 'Not Relevant' (LAT)

By Edwin Chen

WASHINGTON — President Bush today acknowledged that he met former lobbyist Jack Abramoff, who has pleaded guilty to federal corruption charges, but the president characterized the brief encounter as a "grip and grin" photo session during a holiday party.

"But I've never sat down with him and had a discussion with the guy," Bush said. "I frankly don't even remember having my picture taken with the guy. I don't know him."

Bush also rejected the notion of detailing possible contacts between Abramoff and members of the senior White House staff, saying he preferred to let federal prosecutors conduct their own investigation.

Abramoff pleaded guilty last month to federal fraud and conspiracy charges stemming from his dispersal of gifts, travel and campaign contributions to lawmakers, mostly Republicans. In exchange, the lobbyist has agreed to help prosecutors who are investigating his relationships with an array of members of Congress and perhaps White House aides.

The scandal has rocked Washington and promises to be a key theme in November's elections, when Republican control of the House and Senate will be at stake.

During the wide-ranging 46-minute session, Bush also said the U.S. would not deal with members of Hamas, the radical Islamic movement whose members won a sweeping victory in the Palestinian parliamentary elections, unless they renounce violence and abandon their goal of seeking Israel's destruction.

In addition, the president previewed some themes from the annual State of the Union address that he will deliver Tuesday night and defended his controversial post-9/11 directive allowing the National Security Agency to conduct surveillance on U.S. citizens.

He said he relished campaigning for Republicans in this year's elections but said that next week he would call on members of both parties to "set aside the partisanship that inevitably will come with an election year and get some stuff done."

Bush said his message, both on Tuesday night and in the upcoming election campaign, would strike an optimistic note, focusing on a strong and growing economy, coupled with new initiatives on healthcare, education and energy. He said that the election campaign would be about "peace and prosperity."

The president sounded particularly defensive when reporters pressed him about his contacts with Abramoff. Both Time and Washingtonian magazines this week reported the existence of White House photographs of Bush with Abramoff.

The president said he would not release them because he was "mindful that we live in a world in which those pictures will be used for pure political purposes, and they are not relevant to the investigation."

He added: "I've had my picture taken with a lot of people. Having my picture taken with someone doesn't mean that I'm a friend with him or know him very well."

He said some 9,000 holiday guests had come to the White House and had their photographs taken with him, adding: "It's part of the job of the president to shake hands with people and smile. And I do."

But Bush said the Abramoff scandal needed to be "cleared up, so the people have confidence in the system."

On the NSA domestic spying controversy, he reiterated his contention that he had acted within the law and bristled when a reporter asked why he felt a need to "circumvent" the law.

"Circumventing is a loaded word. And I refuse to accept it because I believe what I'm doing is legally right," the president said. "I am upholding my duty and at the same time doing so under the law and with the Constitution behind me."

On another matter, Bush restated his opposition to making senior staff available to lawmakers at hearings examining the administration's faltering response to Hurricane Katrina. He said the White House already has sent to investigators 600,000 pages of internal documents. To go any further, he said, would create "a chilling effect on future [presidential] advisors."

Bush also dismissed suggestions that the 5-year-old global war on terrorism was overextending U.S. troops.

"The things I look for are the following: morale, retention and recruitment. And retention's high, recruitment is meeting goals, and people are feeling strong about the mission," he said.

Photos With Lobbyist Are 'Not Relevant,' Bush Says (NYT)

By David Stout

WASHINGTON, Jan. 26 — President Bush deflected questions today about photographs of him with Jack Abramoff, the disgraced Republican lobbyist, saying the photos are irrelevant.

"I mean, there's thousands of people that come through and get their pictures taken," Mr. Bush said. "I'm also mindful that we live in a world in which those pictures will be used for pure political purposes, and they're not relevant to the investigation."

The president, speaking at a hastily called news conference, responded somewhat indirectly when asked if he was afraid to release the pictures of himself and the once-powerful Mr. Abramoff, who has pleaded guilty to conspiracy, fraud and tax evasion and who prosecutors say tried to influence lawmakers and their aides with campaign contributions, lavish trips and meals.

"Having my picture taken with someone doesn't mean that, you know, I'm a friend with them or know them very well," Mr. Bush said. "I've had my picture taken with you at holiday parties." In fact, presidents are often photographed with people whom they know only casually, or hardly at all, including reporters at White House Christmas parties.

Mr. Bush also used the news conference, which appeared to have been called to react to the victory of Hamas in the Palestinian elections, as an opportunity to defend his policies and lay out his goals in advance of his State of the Union address on Tuesday. He insisted again that the National Security Agency's eavesdropping program was legal and necessary and did not trample on civil rights, that Congress should renew the Patriot Act that expanded government surveillance powers, and that Congress should make permanent the "temporary" tax cuts enacted during his White House tenure.

Meanwhile, Democrats sought to deepen Republican embarrassment and to deflate the effect of Mr. Bush's State of the Union address in advance. "Republicans are doing the bidding of special-interest lobbyists who have purchased access to the legislative process," Representative Nancy Pelosi of California, the House minority leader, said in an appearance at the National Press Club.

White House officials have said that Mr. Abramoff also attended some "staff level" meetings at the White House, as well as White House Hanukkah receptions in 2001 and 2002. Perhaps, one questioner suggested today, the White House should disclose the details of those sessions and prevent any hint of "guilt by association."

"There is a serious investigation going on by federal prosecutors," Mr. Bush replied with a chuckle. "That's their job."

He added, "If they believe something was done inappropriately in the White House, they'll come and look, and they're welcome to do so."

At one point, Mr. Bush seemed to imply that Mr. Abramoff had been bipartisan in contributing to political campaigns. "He contributed either directly or through his clients to a lot of people in Washington," he said. "This needs to be cleared up, so the people have confidence in the system."

So far, most of those embarrassed by the still-unfolding scandal have been Republicans, like Representative Tom DeLay of Texas, the former House majority leader, who were befriended by Mr. Abramoff. But Mr. Bush said he did not even know Mr. Abramoff, despite his appearance with him in photographs. "I've never sat down with him and had a discussion with the guy," Mr. Bush said.

As for the National Security Agency's surveillance program, which many Democrats have said was of dubious constitutionality and legality at best, Mr. Bush said it had been vetted by lawyers and was essential. "And so as I stand here right now," he said, "I can tell the American people the program's legal, it's designed to protect civil liberties, and it's necessary."

The president dismissed any suggestion that the N.S.A. program is part of a broader effort to expand presidential power, as some Congressional Democrats have asserted. "I would say that there has been a historical debate between the executive branch and the legislative branch as to who's got the power," he said. "And I don't view it as a contest with the legislative branch. Maybe they view it as a contest with the executive. I just don't."

Representative Pelosi and Senator Richard J. Durbin of Illinois, the Senate Democratic whip, assailed the Bush administration in an attempt to diminish the luster of the president's State of the Union appearance before Congress and the American people. Ms. Pelosi said the president's proposed budget would damage vital programs while "heaping mountains of debt on our children." "Why, the American people ask us, are we considering a budget that is so out of step with our values and our priorities?" Ms. Pelosi asked. "The answer is, the Republican culture of corruption that has permeated the White House and the Capitol." That culture, she went on, spawns legislation "loaded up with special interest earmarks and bridges to nowhere that increase the deficit."

Mr. Durbin scoffed at Mr. Bush's assertion that his policies had made the nation more secure. "On national security, Osama bin Laden sadly is still at large, and his deadly franchise is moving across the world," Mr. Durbin said. "There was no Iraq-Al Qaeda connection before our invasion. Sadly, there is one now. Iraq has become a training ground for a new generation of terrorists."

Hatch vs. Leahy

Although the much-anticipated Supreme Court nomination fight over Judge Samuel A. Alito Jr. has turned out to be something of a dud, there have been a few feisty exchanges. Among the snippiest was the floor spat Wednesday between Sen. Patrick J. Leahy, Vermont Democrat, and Sen. Orrin G. Hatch, Utah Republican.

Mr. Hatch had dismissed Mr. Leahy's hyperbole about the threat to American liberties posed by Judge Alito. Speaking later, Mr. Leahy angrily chided Mr. Hatch.

"On several occasions, both publicly and privately, I've asked the distinguished senior senator from Utah if he purports to quote me to try to at least get within the ballpark of accuracy," Mr. Leahy said. At this, Mr. Hatch asked to respond, but Mr. Leahy refused to surrender the microphone.

"I would like to find the quote where I said Judge Alito all by himself would do away with the liberties of Americans," Mr. Leahy said.

Well, by the next morning, Mr. Hatch found the following prepared statement from Mr. Leahy: "This is a nomination that I fear threatens the fundamental rights and liberties of all Americans now and in generations to come."

Mr. Hatch said: "I was not only in the ballpark, I was standing on home plate."

A confident Romney

Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, edging ever closer to a presidential run, says he isn't afraid that evangelical and born-again Christian voters will stiff-arm him in the 2008 GOP primaries just because he's a Mormon.

The Republican also told reporters yesterday that his views on abortion have changed, because of research into stem cells, and as a result, he now thinks "life begins at conception."

"I am firmly pro-life. Each state should able to adopt its own policies with regard to abortion and choice," Mr. Romney said at a press luncheon at the Capital Hilton.

He said most voters in his state are Catholics, but they could not care less about his religion.

Mr. Romney had a busy day in Washington, speaking first to a Medicaid reform commission, then a Christian Science Monitor luncheon for the press and finally at the Heritage Foundation, reports Ralph Z. Hallow of The Washington Times.

Senatorial request

Two Senate Democrats called yesterday for the appointment of a special counsel to take over the investigation of the corruption scandal spawned by former lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

The switch "would ensure that the investigation and prosecution will proceed without fear or favor and provide the public with full confidence that no one in this country is above the law," Sens. Charles E. Schumer of New York and Ken Salazar of Colorado wrote Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales.

The two Democrats said that so far, the public-integrity section of the Justice Department, which is in charge of the probe, has "pursued this case appropriately."

Mr. Schumer and Mr. Salazar sent their letter several days after Democrats pressed the White House for information on contacts between the president, or other top officials, and Abramoff.

Foot in mouth

A Pennsylvania gubernatorial candidate challenging Pro Football Hall of Fame member Lynn Swann in the Republican primary fired his campaign manager after the man told a televised call-in show: "The rich white guy in this campaign is Lynn Swann."

Bill Scranton, a former lieutenant governor who is white and comes from a wealthy family, also issued an apology to Mr. Swann, who is black, after his campaign manager's comments Wednesday, the Associated Press reports.

The remarks by James Seif "in no way whatsoever reflect my views or those of my campaign," Mr. Scranton said. "I want to apologize to Lynn Swann, his family, supporters and PCN [Pennsylvania Cable Network] viewers for the offensive and disturbing comments made on my behalf."

Thanks, Ralph

The expected confirmation of Judge Samuel A. Alito Jr. to the Supreme Court, after the confirmation of Judge John G. Roberts Jr. as chief justice, "represents a notable, and greatly satisfying, rebuke for the legal left and its 'borking' strategy," the Wall Street Journal says.

"Sen. Chuck Schumer declared in 2001 that he wanted to turn judicial confirmations into battles over 'ideology.' The New York Democrat succeeded in doing so, but he ended up losing in a self-knockout. One reason Democrats couldn't defeat Chief Justice Roberts or Judge Alito, despite near party-line opposition, is that their filibuster strategy had made judges a top-line election issue in both 2002 and 2004.

"The battle over their unprecedented filibuster of 10 appeals-court nominees helped to sweep Democrats out of the Senate in Bush-leaning states and give Republicans a larger majority. The Democrats who remain in red states — five of whom are up for re-election in November — saw all this and had no appetite for a repeat in 2006. The liberal interest groups that devised the filibuster strategy and wrote the anti-Alito talking points for Sens. Ted Kennedy and Patrick Leahy thus contributed as much as anyone to Judge Alito's confirmation. Congratulations, Ralph Neas. It's your finest hour."

Edward Cox, a son-in-law of the late President Richard Nixon, said yesterday he will not resume his campaign for the Republican nomination to challenge Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton's re-election bid this year, the Associated Press reports.

The Manhattan lawyer suspended his campaign in October after Republican Gov. George E. Pataki endorsed then-Westchester County District Attorney Jeanine Pirro's bid for the Senate nomination. Mrs. Pirro's campaign subsequently collapsed, and Mrs. Pirro heeded the call of state GOP leaders to run instead for state attorney general.

Worse now

The head of the FBI's counterintelligence division, retiring after 33 years at the agency, warns that "the counterintelligence threat is worse now than it was in the Cold War."

David Szady, assistant director for counterintelligence, said the threat is "broader, it's more expansive, it's huge."

In an interview with Bill Gertz of The Washington Times yesterday, a day before retiring to join the private sector, Mr. Szady said: "We really think we've come a long way, but more needs to be done."

Mr. Szady also said that FBI counterintelligence training is increasing and that more agents are choosing to become counterspies.

Since 2002, the bureau has set up squads of counterspies in all its 56 field offices and has begun better training and private-sector outreach programs, he said.

"If nothing else, you can be proud of the FBI because almost every other free-world intelligence service has not been able to do in counterintelligence what we've done. We've sustained it, and we've increased it," Mr. Szady said.

Sens. Want Independent Corruption Probe (AP)

By David Espo

AP, January 27, 2006

WASHINGTON - Two Senate Democrats called Thursday for the appointment of a special counsel to take over investigation of the corruption scandal spawned by lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

The switch "would ensure that the investigation and prosecution will proceed without fear or favor and provide the public with full confidence that no one in this country is above the law," Sens. Chuck Schumer of New York and Ken Salazar of Colorado wrote Attorney General Alberto Gonzales.

The two Democrats said that so far, the public integrity section of the Justice Department, which is in charge of the probe, has "pursued this case appropriately."

Officials have said numerous former congressional aides remain under scrutiny, as does Rep. Bob Ney, R-Ohio, who recently stepped down temporarily as chairman of a House committee.

Politicians of both parties moved quickly to shed campaign donations from Abramoff or his former clients.

The scandal also has thrust congressional reform toward the top of the legislative and political agenda in the opening days of an election-year Congress.

Schumer and Salazar sent their letter several days after Democrats pressed the White House for information on contacts between the president or other top officials and Abramoff. So far, the White House has refused to release any photographs of the president and the lobbyist together.

Asked about the issue at a news conference Thursday, Bush said, "There's thousands of people that come through and get their pictures taken.

In their letter, Schumer and Salazar cited news reports that said that in addition to the presidential photographs, Abramoff organized at least one meeting with White House aides for his clients.

"These meetings with the president and the White House staff occurred while you were serving as White House counsel," they wrote Gonzales, who became attorney general a year ago. "Given the possible ties between Mr. Abramoff and senior government officials, we believe the appointment of a special counsel is not only justified, but necessary."

Salazar: Abramoff Prosecutor Needed (DENP)

Washington - Colorado Sen. Ken Salazar on Thursday joined New York Democrat Sen. Charles E. Schumer in calling for a special counsel to investigate political corruption involving lobbyist Jack Ambramoff.

Ambramoff has pleaded guilty to bribery and fraud and is cooperating with prosecutors looking in to his dealings with Congress.

Salazar, a Democrat, and Schumer sent a letter to U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales asking for the special counsel.

If such an investigation were granted, it would be similar to that conducted by special counsel Patrick Fitzgerald, who probed the leak of a covert CIA operative's name.

The senators said an independent investigation is necessary because a special counsel could act without either favor from or fear of reprisal from the White House.

"As a former (state) attorney general, I believe in upholding the law and rooting out corruption," Salazar said in a statement. "The American people deserve an open, unbiased investigation into this matter. Appointing a special counsel will begin the process of restoring America's faith in government."

Added Schumer: "With public trust in government at very low levels, it is crucial that we remove any appearance of impropriety from the investigation of the Abramoff scandal by appointing a special counsel who is independent of the Bush Administration and the current Justice Department."

Ethics In Congress (NYT)

To the Editor:

Re "If You Give a Congressman a Cookie," by Norman Ornstein and Thomas E. Mann (Op-Ed, Jan. 19):

I am surprised that these Congressional scholars would assert that House roll-call votes are "frequently" stretched beyond an hour. This happens, on average, less than once per two-year Congressional session.

They say that Speaker J. Dennis Hastert "fired" the chairman of the House ethics committee last year. Under House rules, there was a term limit for all members, including the chairman. Speaker Hastert followed the regular order that these writers claim to cherish in naming a new chairman.

They also assert that I and a colleague, who had donated to Representative Tom DeLay's defense fund, were named to the ethics committee "when the main matter pending before the committee involved" Mr. DeLay. In fact, the committee had publicly announced, in keeping with its normal practice, that it was deferring its one pending DeLay-related matter until the conclusion of the Texas criminal investigation, which continues to this day.

Moreover, my colleague and I long ago announced that we will recuse ourselves from any matter related to Mr. DeLay.

Prosecutor Will Step Down From Lobbyist Case (NYT)

By Philip Shenon And Elisabeth Bumiller

WASHINGTON, Jan. 26 — The investigation of Jack Abramoff, the disgraced Republican lobbyist, took a surprising new turn on Thursday when the Justice Department said the chief prosecutor in the inquiry would step down next week because he had been nominated to a federal judgeship by President Bush.

The prosecutor, Noel L. Hillman, is chief of the department's public integrity division, and the move ends his involvement in an inquiry that has reached into the administration as well as the top ranks of the Republican leadership on Capitol Hill.

The administration said that the appointment was routine and that it would not affect the investigation, but Democrats swiftly questioned the timing of the move and called for a special prosecutor.

The announcement came as Mr. Bush faced a barrage of questions about why he would not make public "grip-and-grin" photographs of him with Mr. Abramoff. The photographs apparently show Mr. Bush and Mr. Abramoff smiling at White House Hanukkah parties and Republican fund-raising receptions.

Mr. Bush's position, which he offered at a news conference on Thursday morning that was peppered with questions about Mr. Abramoff, was that the photographs were so common as to be almost meaningless and that it was part of his job "to shake hands with people and smile." He said he could not remember posing for the pictures, or, for that matter, even meeting Mr. Abramoff.

"I had my picture taken with him, evidently," Mr. Bush said. "I've had my picture taken with a lot of people. Having my picture taken with someone doesn't mean that I'm a friend with them or know them very well."

He said, "I'm also mindful that we live in a world in which those pictures will be used for pure political purposes, and they're not relevant to the investigation."

The White House, which announced Mr. Bush's selection of Mr. Hillman for the court in a routine e-mail message on Wednesday that included 15 other nominations to judgeships and federal jobs, dismissed the calls for a special prosecutor.

"It's nothing but pure politics," said Scott McClellan, the White House press secretary. "The Justice Department is holding Mr. Abramoff to account, and the career Justice prosecutors are continuing to fully investigate the matter."

A special prosecutor would not be especially welcome at the White House. Patrick J. Fitzgerald, the special counsel in the C.I.A. leak case, is more than two years into an investigation that has resulted in the indictment of a top vice-presidential aide, I. Lewis Libby Jr., and has left Karl Rove, the president's chief political adviser, under investigation.

Mr. Hillman's departure from the Justice Department creates a vacancy at the top of the Abramoff inquiry only three weeks after Mr. Abramoff, once one of the city's most powerful Republican lobbyists and a major fund-raiser for Mr. Bush, announced his guilty plea and agreed to testify against others, possibly including members of Congress.

A former senior White House budget official, David H. Safavian, has been indicted in the case on charges of lying about his contacts with Mr. Abramoff, a former lobbying partner. The Justice Department's plea agreement with Mr. Abramoff makes clear that prosecutors are investigating several members of Congress and other public officials who are suspected of having accepted gifts from the lobbyist in exchange for official acts.

Colleagues at the Justice Department say Mr. Hillman has been involved in day-to-day management of the Abramoff investigation since it began almost two year ago. The inquiry, which initially focused on accusations that Mr. Abramoff defrauded Indian tribes out of tens of millions of dollars in lobbying fees, is being described within the department as the most important federal corruption investigation in a generation.

Mr. Hillman's nomination for a judgeship was among the factors cited Thursday by four Democratic lawmakers, two senators and two representatives, in calling on Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales to name a special prosecutor to oversee the corruption investigation.

The timing of Mr. Hillman's nomination "jaundices this whole process," Senator Charles E. Schumer, Democrat of New York, said in an interview. "They have to appoint a special counsel. I think there will be broad support for one."

Representative George Miller, Democrat of California, called the timing "startling" and said, "You have one of the chief prosecutors removed from a case that has tentacles throughout the Republican leadership of Congress, throughout the various agencies and into the White House."

White House officials have said that Mr. Abramoff had no improper dealings with the White House. They have said he attended "staff level" meetings at the White House, but have declined to say with whom. One of his chief connections to the White House was through Susan Ralston, an assistant who worked for him before she worked for Mr. Rove. Ms. Ralston continues to work for Mr. Rove as a top aide.

A Justice Department spokesman, Bryan Sierra, said he had no comment on the Democratic request for a special prosecutor because the department had not received their letter making the request.

Mr. Sierra said in an interview that there was nothing unusual about the timing of Mr. Hillman's nomination and that it would not affect the Abramoff inquiry. "The team that Noel put together is going to remain together," he said. "The investigation should not be impacted." He said Mr. Hillman would be temporarily succeeded as head of the public integrity office by Andrew Lourie, a career prosecutor in Florida.

The White House had been poised to nominate Mr. Hillman for the bench last year. Mr. Sierra said he did not know why the nomination had been delayed until this week, but he said he believed it had nothing to do with the Abramoff investigation.

In a letter sent to the attorney general on Thursday asking for an independent counsel, Senator Schumer and Senator Ken Salazar, Democrat of Colorado, praised Mr. Hillman's office for the investigation that led to the guilty plea by Mr. Abramoff and his former lobbying partner, Michael Scanlon, a former press secretary to Representative Tom DeLay.

"We applaud its pursuit of Mr. Abramoff and his colleagues," they said. "We have no doubt that if the investigation is left to the career prosecutors in that section, the case would reach its appropriate conclusion. Unfortunately, the highly political context of the allegations and charges may lead some to surmise that political influence may compromise the investigation."

By David Johnston

WASHINGTON, Jan 26 — Lawyers for Vice President Dick Cheney's former chief of staff asked a federal judge on Thursday to order the prosecutor in the C.I.A. leak case to turn over all documents in his possession related to what journalists knew from any source about the intelligence officer at the heart of the case.

The lawyers for the former chief of staff, I. Lewis Libby Jr., said in their motion that the prosecutor, Patrick J. Fitzgerald, had refused to turn over to the defense documents that would shed light on whether any reporter knew about the C.I.A. officer, Valerie Wilson, before her name was first disclosed in a newspaper column on July 14, 2003.

Mr. Libby's lawyers said in their motion that "the prosecution invoked an extraordinarily narrow conception of its disclosure obligations." The prosecutor turned over, the defense said, only documents related to Mr. Libby's contacts with reporters, refusing to turn over documents about what these and other reporters had learned about Ms. Wilson from other sources.

The defense team said that such documents were highly relevant as Mr. Libby's lawyers sought to find out "the identity of all reporters who knew that Ms. Wilson worked for the C.I.A., and to discover when they learned such information, from whom they learned it and whether they disclosed it further after learning it."

Mr. Libby was charged in a five-count perjury and obstruction of justice indictment last October with misleading investigators about how he had learned of Ms. Wilson. The indictment said he had concealed that he had learned about her from other government officials, telling investigators that his information had come from journalists. Mr. Libby has pleaded not guilty to the charges. No trial date has been set.

The defense request strongly suggested that Mr. Libby's defense could turn on the testimony of reporters, who are expected to be called as witnesses in the trial, including those who testified during the grand jury investigation about their conversations with confidential sources and perhaps others who have not yet been identified.

Some reporters who are likely to be caught in the dispute over evidence are known. Mr. Libby's conversations with some journalists, like Tim Russert of NBC News, were cited in the indictment. Another reporter, Matthew Cooper of Time magazine, said after he testified in the investigation that he had learned about Ms. Wilson, although not her name, from Karl Rove, the senior White House adviser. Mr. Cooper said Mr. Libby was a confirming source of information about her.

In addition, Bob Woodward, the Washington Post reporter, has said he told Mr. Fitzgerald in a deposition that he learned about Ms. Wilson from a government official other than Mr. Libby in June 2003, several weeks before her name became public. Mr. Woodward's source has not been identified.

Other journalists have also appeared as witnesses before the grand jury in the case, including Judith Miller, then a reporter for The New York Times.

The prosecutor has not yet responded to Thursday's request, but Mr. Libby's lawyers said Mr. Fitzgerald had used a "narrow and overly restrictive" standard in interpreting rules that require prosecutors to supply defense lawyers with materials gathered in an investigation that could help the defense.

Libby Defense Demands News Media Materials (AP)

By Pete Yost

AP, January 27, 2006

Lawyers for a former top White House aide charged in the CIA leak investigation said Thursday the prosecutor should surrender a wide range of information about news organizations and their reporters, including The Washington Post's Bob Woodward.

Special Counsel Patrick Fitzgerald has failed to disclose information that would enable the vice president's former chief of staff, I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, to properly defend himself, his attorneys argued in papers filed with U.S. District Judge Reggie Walton.

Libby is charged with five counts of obstruction, perjury and lying to the FBI about disclosing the identity of covert CIA officer Valerie Plame, who is married to former U.S. Ambassador Joseph Wilson, a Bush administration critic.

A federal grand jury accused Libby of lying when he said he learned about Ms. Wilson's identity from reporters. The indictment contends Libby found out about her identity from the CIA, the State Department and his boss, Vice President Dick Cheney.

"The government should not be allowed to charge Mr. Libby with lying about statements concerning what reporters knew about Ms. Wilson's identity, and at the same time deny him information that may establish one of these possible defenses," Libby's lawyers argued in a 23-page brief.

"The government has refused to produce information in its possession about what reporters learned from sources other than Mr. Libby about Ms. Wilson's employment status," Libby's legal team argued.

The prosecutor has asserted that "such documents are not relevant to a perjury and obstruction case."

After Libby's Oct. 28 indictment, Woodward disclosed that he had learned of Ms. Wilson's identity in mid-June 2003, some three weeks before her name was first published by conservative columnist Robert Novak.

The indictment says Libby lied when he told investigators he learned of Ms. Wilson's identity from NBC correspondent Tim Russert; when he told Time magazine reporter Matt Cooper that reporters were telling the Bush administration that Ms. Wilson worked for the CIA; and when Libby told investigators he did not discuss Wilson's wife with New York Times reporter Judith Miller.

Libby would have the right to produce testimony that tended to show many reporters knew about Ms. Wilson's CIA employment and that Russert did make the statement Libby allegedly attributed to him, but that Russert had forgotten about it, the court filing stated.

The defense says it also has a right to show whether other reporters knew about Ms. Wilson's CIA employment and were discussing that fact with government officials, "some of whom in turn may have shared such information with Mr. Libby," his lawyers said.

Libby Wants What Reporters Knew In CIA Leak Case (REU-Y2)

By James Vicini

Reuters, January 27, 2006

Attorneys for a former top aide to Vice President Dick Cheney sought on Thursday to force federal prosecutors to turn over information about what journalists knew before the leak of a CIA operative's name.

Lewis "Scooter" Libby's lawyers filed a motion asking the federal judge presiding over the case to require that they be given documents on what the reporters knew about CIA operative Valerie Plame before her name was disclosed.

Libby, Cheney's former chief of staff, has pleaded not guilty to five counts of obstructing justice, perjury and lying in the two-year investigation by prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald into the leak to the news media of Plame's identity.

Her identity was disclosed by conservative columnist Robert Novak on July 14, 2003, after her diplomat husband, Joseph Wilson, accused the Bush administration of twisting intelligence on weapons of mass destruction to justify the war in Iraq.

The attorneys said the motion concerned their request for documents and information on three important issues: "What did the press know prior to July 14, 2003, about whether Valerie Plame Wilson worked at the CIA, from whom did they learn it and with whom did they discuss it."

They said turning over the information would enable them to decide the necessity and scope of pretrial subpoenas for journalists and news organizations.

The motion made clear that what the reporters knew will be an important part of the defense strategy.

"It is necessary for the defense to determine and investigate which individuals served as sources for journalists who learned about Ms. Wilson's employment status prior to July 14, 2003," they said.

"Once we learn the names of the reporters' sources, we will attempt to interview them, investigate whether they discussed information about Ms. Wilson with anyone else and evaluate whether to subpoena them for testimony at trial," they said.

Libby's lawyers also sought copies of subpoenas issued to reporters and news organizations during the prosecutor's grand jury investigation into the leak, and any agreements to limit the scope of information provided by the reporters.

The defense lawyers said prosecutors have refused to produce information about what reporters learned from sources other than Libby about Wilson's employment at the CIA because it was not relevant to the perjury and obstruction of justice charges.

Reporters' Information Sought (WP)

By Carol D. Leonnig

Attorneys for Vice President Cheney's former top aide urged a court yesterday to force prosecutors to turn over all the information they obtained from reporters about their confidential conversations with Bush administration sources in the course of a two-year CIA leak investigation.

Attorneys for I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby said they must cast a wide net to learn about any conversations regarding CIA operative Valerie Plame, and that the information could be crucial to Libby's defense against perjury and obstruction charges. In court papers, the lawyers said they will probably subpoena reporters and officials later to thoroughly investigate how widely Plame's identity was known before her name appeared in the news media in July 2003.

Libby was indicted by Special Counsel Patrick J. Fitzgerald on five felony counts of lying to the FBI and a grand jury. The indictment asserted that Libby leaked information about Plame's CIA role to two reporters but pretended he had learned the information from Tim Russert, the Washington bureau chief of NBC News, and that he passed it along as unverified reporter chatter.

The defense's goal is to show that Libby was not intentionally lying when he testified that many journalists had known about Plame during the spring and summer of 2003, and that he believed he had learned about her from Russert. "There can be no information more material to the defense of a perjury case than information tending to show that the alleged false statements are, in fact, true or that they could be the result of mistake or confusion," the lawyers argued in their filing. "Libby is entitled to know what the government knows."

Fitzgerald began investigating in early 2004 whether administration officials broke the law and leaked information about Plame as retaliation. Her name and CIA role appeared in a July 2003 syndicated column by Robert D. Novak -- eight days after Plame's husband, former ambassador Joseph C. Wilson IV, publicly criticized the Bush administration's justification for waging war with Iraq.

The defense effort to delve deeper into Fitzgerald's investigation, if successful, could divulge the identities of some anonymous, high-level government sources whom reporters and news organizations have spent years and millions of dollars in legal fees protecting from public view. The defense strategy is expected to pull several high-profile Washington journalists into a legal battle over the First Amendment, many of them for a second time.

The court papers specifically asked U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton to have Fitzgerald turn over all documents showing knowledge by other reporters of Plame's CIA role or her husband's mission to investigate claims that Iraq was trying to obtain from Niger materials for a nuclear program, and any subpoenas or agreements with other reporters who provided information to the investigation. Fitzgerald has asserted that Libby is not entitled to information about all the reporters questioned in the investigation if the government does not expect to use their information or call them as witnesses in Libby's trial, the filings said.

But the court papers filed by Libby's team highlighted Bob Woodward, a Washington Post reporter and assistant managing editor, as a crucial witness who could provide exculpatory information that might help Libby avoid a conviction. Woodward revealed in November, a few weeks after Libby was indicted, that another administration source -- not Libby -- had told him in a "casual" and "offhand" way about Plame's CIA role. Woodward testified that this conversation took place before Libby is believed to have first provided information about Plame to Judith Miller, then a New York Times reporter.

Woodward, who has repeatedly said he has not been released to identify his source, declined to comment yesterday. Washington Post attorney Mary Ann Werner said the newspaper continues to consider its promises of anonymity to sources sacred -- and vital to some kinds of newsgathering.

"Protecting our confidential sources has been our highest priority throughout this investigation, and it remains our highest priority today," Werner said.

The court papers also mentioned an interest in questioning NBC News reporter Andrea Mitchell, who suggested in an October 2003 news program that it was "common knowledge" among some intelligence reporters that Plame worked at the CIA, and Washington Post reporter Walter Pincus, who allegedly learned about Plame from another unidentified source in 2003.

Charles Tobin, a media lawyer in Washington, said the move by Libby's defense was expected and is the result of Fitzgerald's aggressive insistence on deposing journalists and forcing them under threat of jail to reveal confidential sources.

"I think we could have expected that, when the prosecutor went on a fishing expedition, that the fish he caught would want to look back in the pail," Tobin said. "The more this case develops, the further we seem to be getting from the core issues of the indictment -- and more into the business of journalism and how news gets put out in this town."

Libby Defense Requests Media Data In Leak Case (WSJ)

By Anne Marie Squeo

WASHINGTON -- Attorneys for I. Lewis Libby, the vice president's former chief of staff, asked a federal judge to compel prosecutors to turn over all information obtained from journalists and news organizations about former Central Intelligence Agency operative Valerie Plame.

While the Justice Department has agreed to turn over information related to reporters' contacts with Mr. Libby, Special Counsel Patrick Fitzgerald has refused to provide material about what reporters might have learned from other sources about Ms. Plame's employment at the CIA, the court filing says. Included in the request is information that may have been shared among reporters or with government officials.

The fight is expected to be bruising for the news media. In their indictment, prosecutors cited the testimony of three reporters to discredit Mr. Libby's statements. Media advocates have feared the defense would seek to put the reporters on trial, and yesterday's filings underscored those concerns by suggesting statements made by Time magazine reporter Matthew Cooper, among those cited in the indictment, could indicate he is "biased against Mr. Libby." Mr. Cooper couldn't be reached. "The nightmare we predicted appears to be coming true," said Lucy Dalglish, executive director of the Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press.

In October, Mr. Libby was indicted for lying to federal investigators and a grand jury, as well as obstructing justice, in a federal investigation into whether a Bush administration official blew the cover of Ms. Plame in retaliation for her husband's public criticism of the war in Iraq. The investigation continues, though no one besides Mr. Libby has been indicted.

"There can be no information more material to the defense of a perjury case than information tending to show that the alleged false statements are, in fact, true or that they could be the result of mistake or confusion," the filing said. A spokesman for Mr. Fitzgerald declined to comment.

Attorneys for Mr. Libby signaled earlier this month that they would seek this information. As yesterday's filing notes, seeking additional information from news organizations may be "unavoidable" since the government may not have all of what the defense requests. A federal judge likely will take up the matter at a hearing scheduled for Feb. 3.

Mr. Libby's defense team is seeking documents and other information prior to July 14, 2003 -- the date Ms. Plame's CIA identity was revealed in a newspaper column -- reflecting knowledge of Ms. Plame's job by a reporter or an employee of a news organization, communications between reporters and government officials, colleagues or anyone else discussing Ms. Plame, and copies of the subpoenas issued to reporters and news organizations by the grand jury as well as agreements by Mr. Fitzgerald to limit the scope of questioning.

Agence France-Presse, January 27, 2006

WASHINGTON (AFP) - Pakistan's former Prime Minister Benazir Bhutto has shrugged off Interpol notices for her arrest and said she is prepared to return to her country to face any charges if compelled by a court.

Interpol had issued the international notices following a request by the Pakistan government for the arrest of Bhutto and her husband on corruption charges, according to officials in Islamabad.

The police body said the so-called "red notices" were not arrest warrants and that member countries could decide whether to take any action.

"As far as the red notices are concerned, I learned it from the press, and my lawyers have written to the (Pakistan) Ministry of Interior as well as to Interpol, asking them to confirm whether the news is accurate and if so, on what grounds," Bhutto told a news conference in Washington.

"As far as I am concerned, if any court wants me in Pakistan, I am prepared to catch the next plane to Pakistan," said Bhutto, 53, who led the country twice in the 1980s and 1990s as its first female premier.

Bhutto, who has lived in self-imposed exile in Dubai and London for the past seven years, said the allegations were politically motivated and intended to divert the attention of the Pakistan media from current government problems.

The US Justice Department refused to comment specifically on Bhutto's case but said it generally considered Interpol requests on a case-by-case basis.

"I wouldn't comment on the specifics of Ms Bhutto's case but generally, the government handles requests from other governments on a case-by-case basis and we make our decisions based on the unique circumstance on any case," department spokesman Bryan Sierra told AFP.

"We don't necessarily automatically have to act on them," he said.

Pakistani Interior Minister Aftab Sherpao said the country's corruption watchdog had asked his ministry to send the request to Interpol.

"It is not an issue of my evading presence in a court but no court in Pakistan to my knowledge has asked for me to be present and I believe that the Interpol has not been given the correct facts by the military regime in Pakistan," Bhutto said.

Her second term in office ended in 1996 amid a string of corruption claims and six court cases are still pending against her. Last year she pledged to return to Pakistan to face the charges.

In 2004 Swiss authorities also charged Bhutto with alleged money-laundering of 11.7 million dollars in purported bribes paid by companies seeking customs inspection contracts.

"Yes, my husband and I have faced these scurrilous, baseless and malicious and politically motivated charges for the last nine years and by the grace of God, there is not a single conviction against either my husband or myself for fraud or for corruption," she said.

Bhutto said the charges levelled against her were part of Musharraf's campaign to divert the attention of the Pakistani media from local problems, especially recent US missile strikes targeted at terrorists in a remote tribal area bordering Afghanistan but which left civilians dead.

"Lot of questions are being asked (by the public)," she said. "To divert the attention of domestic press over the strikes, they (called for) the red notices."

"(Musharraf's) regime does not like me to speak about democracy and it does not like me to expose their policies about ambiguity," she said.

9th Circuit Panel: Overseas Sex With Minor Subject To Regulation (LAW)

By Justin Scheck, The Recorder

California Recorder, January 27, 2006

Applying the Constitution's commerce clause to international trade can be a difficult task, 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals Judge Margaret McKeown wrote in an opinion Wednesday.

So in deciding that a 2003 law prohibiting U.S. citizens from paying minors for sex while overseas is constitutional, McKeown wrote that the court was taking a big-picture look.

"Instead of slavishly marching down the path of grafting the interstate commerce framework onto foreign commerce, we step back and take a global, commonsense approach," she wrote.

The conclusion? Sex with a minor "might be immoral and criminal, but it is also commercial" -- and therefore subject to regulation.

McKeown's opinion -- which was joined by 9th Circuit Senior Judge Procter Hug -- didn't sit well with Senior Judge Warren Ferguson.

He said the majority upheld the 2003 law known by the convenient acronym PROTECT (Prosecutorial Remedies and Other Tools to End the Exploitation of Children Today) with logic that could give the U.S. government jurisdiction over your croque monsieur.

"Under the interpretation of the majority," he wrote, "the purchase of a lunch in France by an American citizen who traveled there by airplane would constitute a constitutional act of engaging in foreign commerce."

Under that scenario, nearly anything a U.S. citizen did in a foreign country could be subject to U.S. regulation, Ferguson continued. "This observation may seem slightly absurd, but so is the task of trying to show how sexual abuse of a minor overseas by a U.S. citizen constitutes an act of 'commerce with foreign nations,'" he said.

Rory Little, a professor at Hastings College of the Law, said the question isn't quite so simple.

"It's a very substantial opinion on both sides," he said, referring to the majority decision and the dissent. "It's hard to say that one side is right."

That's because the commerce clause is a notoriously difficult piece of the Constitution, with controls over interstate and foreign commerce that are constantly being reinterpreted by the courts.

The majority opinion is based on last year's Supreme Court opinion Gonzales v. Raich, 125 S.Ct. 2195, which said the commerce clause allows the federal government to prohibit marijuana use in states that have legalized it for medical use.

That seems like a solid foundation for a more generous view of foreign commerce, Little said. Yet, he added, Ferguson has a good point in arguing that paying a minor for sex doesn't clearly constitute foreign trade.

The case originated when Michael Clark, an elderly U.S. citizen who lived in Cambodia from 1998 to 2003, was arrested by Cambodian police for having sex with young boys.

The Cambodian authorities turned Clark over to U.S. agents, and he eventually admitted to paying minors for sex, pleading guilty after returning to the United States. His case was the first successful prosecution under the PROTECT law, and is the first to make it to the appeals courts.

Clark's lawyer, Seattle Assistant Federal Public Defender Michael Filipovic, was predictably unhappy with the 9th Circuit's opinion. "We're disappointed in the result, and we will be seeking rehearing en banc," he said.

U.S. jurisdiction over its citizens who are abroad "is an issue upon which there's very little law that's right on point," Filipovic said.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Helen Brunner, a Seattle-based appeals specialist who argued the case for the government, agreed, though she felt better about the result.

"It's a complex issue," she said. "It certainly was an interesting issue, and I think the majority's opinion certainly is a significant victory, and we can rely on it for the pending cases." Those include another case handled by Filipovic in which the 9th Circuit has already heard arguments.

Whether the 9th Circuit takes up the case en banc -- or whether it ends up before the Supreme Court -- is probably a decision that will cross ideological lines, Little said, since liberal and conservative judges often rule unpredictably on issues of personal freedom and increased prosecutorial powers.

"This doesn't have a political tilt," Little said. "Nobody's in favor of sex with minors."

AP, January 27, 2006

(AP) - CONROE, Texas-A man who spent 18 years in prison for sexual assault was freed Thursday after DNA evidence exonerated him, and his brother admitted responsibility for the attack.

DNA testing was not available at Arthur Mumphrey's 1986 trial for the rape of a 13-year-old girl, but recent tests requested by his attorney showed Mumphrey's blood and saliva samples did not match stains on the victim and her clothes.

"Because of technology we have now, justice was not done 20 years ago," State District Judge Kathleen Hamilton said.

Mumphrey, 42, had been sentenced to 35 years in prison.

Prosecutor Marc Brumberger apologized to Mumphrey. "We feel terrible about what happened to you," he said.

Mumphrey's brother, Charles, confessed to the rape this week while serving time in jail for unauthorized use of a motor vehicle.

He is unlikely to face charges in the sexual assault because the statute of limitations has expired, but the information could be used against him in sentencing if he is convicted of another crime and if DNA results support the confession.

Ex-Prosecutors In Trenton Respond To U.S. Scolding (NYT)

By David Kocieniewski

TRENTON, Jan. 26 — Two former New Jersey attorneys general on Thursday defended their office's investigation into the political dealings of George E. Norcross III, the Democratic power broker, and said they were bewildered that federal prosecutors had accused them of botching the case.

In a scathing letter dated Tuesday, Christopher J. Christie, the United States attorney for New Jersey, wrote that his office would be unable to bring charges against Mr. Norcross because lawyers for the state attorney general had mishandled their investigation under two administrations before turning it over to his office in 2004.

Mr. Christie's pointed critique startled many in the legal community because prosecutors rarely publicly criticize other law enforcement officials or explain their decisions not to prosecute.

While Mr. Christie did not release the letter to the press, his office did give it to two witnesses whose complaints against Mr. Norcross led to the investigation, and who have been aggressive in seeking news coverage about the case.

In his six-page letter, Mr. Christie chastised state officials for failing to use rudimentary investigative techniques like wiretaps and telephone records to corroborate their suspicions that Mr. Norcross and his political allies were engaged in a plot to deprive two political rivals of jobs and government contracts.

His letter also harshly criticized state prosecutors for deciding not to secretly tape conversations at a Camden County Democratic fund-raiser in 2001, where Mr. Norcross and his associates were expected to discuss a wide variety of political deals. Mr. Christie said that that decision was so inexplicable that it raised the possibility that state investigators were trying to shield political figures.

But John J. Farmer Jr., who was attorney general in 2001, called that suggestion "utter nonsense." Mr. Farmer said he was not personally involved in the tactical decisions, but asserted that the two assistant attorneys general who led the case were "professional and 100 percent nonpolitical."

"I totally reject any suggestion that any political figure was being protected by anyone in my office," said Mr. Farmer, a political independent who worked for Govs. Christine Todd Whitman and Donald T. DiFrancesco, both Republicans.

Mr. Christie also said that former Attorney General Peter C. Harvey erred in 2003 when he agreed to allow two figures in the investigation to plead guilty to tax evasion charges, a deal Mr. Christie said was too lenient to yield meaningful cooperation.

But Mr. Harvey said the agreements were fair and helpful. "These plea agreements were negotiated by experienced former federal prosecutors and helped lead to other convictions in this case," he said.

The investigation and secret recordings of Mr. Norcross, a bank executive whose prowess as a fund-raiser has given him vast statewide influence, has offered a rare view of the inner workings of New Jersey's tough, money-driven politics.

The case began in 2000, when John Gural, now the mayor of Palmyra but then a councilman, told the authorities that he had been pressured to fire the town solicitor, Ted Rosenberg, who had opposed one of Mr. Norcross's allies in a local political race.

Investigators from the state attorney general's office asked Mr. Gural to wear a concealed recording device. He ended up taping more than 330 hours of conversations, many of them with local officials allied with Mr. Norcross. In some of those conversations, they threatened to withhold government contracts from Mr. Gural's employer, a local engineering firm, unless he acquiesced.

Mr. Norcross was also caught on tape boasting about his influence with then-Gov. James E. McGreevey and then United States Senator Jon S. Corzine.

Mr. Norcross's lawyer dismissed his client's taped comments as idle boasts, and said that Mr. Christie's letter was proof that no crime had been committed.

Mr. Rosenberg said on Thursday that Mr. Christie, who has been mentioned as a candidate for governor himself, might have released the letter to protect his image as an ardent corruption buster.

"Chris Christie is first and foremost a political animal," Mr. Rosenberg said. "He gave us the letter and didn't say anything about keeping it private, so of course we gave it to the media. The way he handled this he was freed of any responsibility for letting George Norcross get off of the hook."

But in an interview on Thursday, Mr. Christie said he was proud of his record. Since being appointed United States attorney in 2002, he said he had brought public corruption charges against nearly 100 people. He said he felt that the attorney general's office deserved a detailed explanation of why he was not pursing charges, since Mr. Harvey publicly referred the case to him in 2003.

Barry Unable To Identify 2 As Robbers (WP)

By Del Quentin Wilber

Police investigating the armed robbery of D.C. Council member Marion Barry recently showed him photographs of two potential suspects, but he was unable to identify the men as his assailants, law enforcement officials said.

Last week, detectives showed Barry (D-Ward 8) collections that included photographs of two people they viewed as suspects in the Jan. 2 robbery, officials said. The arrays also included pictures of other people who are similar in appearance but not connected to the crime, the officials said.

Barry did not select anyone in the pictures. The two potential suspects were believed to have committed other robberies in the area and resembled the description that Barry provided of his attackers, the officials said.

Investigators are looking for others who might be responsible for the holdup, police officials said. The officials, who spoke on condition of anonymity because they are not permitted to discuss active investigations, said Barry has been cooperating.

Barry, 69, has told police that he was held up in his kitchen about 9:30 p.m. Jan. 2. He has said that two young men -- one whose name he believed was Marcus -- helped him carry groceries into his apartment in Southeast Washington and that he paid them several dollars. Several minutes later, they returned with a gun and stole his wallet and $600, Barry said. The billfold was found the next day on the street, police said.

Barry had said he believed that Marcus lived across the street. Police declined to say whether any of their suspects are named Marcus.

The former mayor, who became a council member last year, declined this week to discuss specifics of the investigation, based on the advice of his attorney and requests by police. But he addressed speculation that there could be more to the story than he is letting on.

"The thing that [makes me angry] is that some people say that this was a drug deal gone bad," Barry said in an interview at his council office Wednesday. "Why would I report that? That is just crazy. If it is a drug deal gone bad, you don't call the cops."

Barry is awaiting sentencing Feb. 8 after pleading guilty in the fall to misdemeanor tax charges in U.S. District Court. Soon after the guilty plea, he tested positive for cocaine use in a court-ordered drug test. Barry has battled drug addiction for years and spent six months in federal prison after he was convicted of a misdemeanor drug charge in 1990.

Echoing comments he made during a news conference a day after the robbery, Barry said he hoped his attackers turn themselves in. But, he said, he still does not want to see them prosecuted.

"Robbers and drug dealers are in trouble," Barry said. "Families and the institutions failed them. They need help. I want them helped."

Prosecutors and police -- not Barry -- will decide whether to bring charges. D.C. Police Chief Charles H. Ramsey said that he could not address Barry's case but that getting the cooperation of victims is critical to law enforcement.

"People who commit crimes should be prosecuted," Ramsey said. "If victims don't cooperate, there won't be trials. . . . If that is the case, these guys will do harm to other people."

Last year, police were unable to solve another crime reported by Barry. He told authorities that a woman had taken his wallet off his dresser early Jan. 2, 2005, police reports show. His automated teller machine card was used to withdraw $300 from an ATM, police said.

It was the third time that the ATM card was used without Barry's permission the previous year, bank officials told investigators, police said.

Police said detectives obtained a photograph from an ATM surveillance camera that showed a woman using the card. But they were unable to identify her and suspended the investigation.

By Mike Robinson

AP, January 27, 2006

CHICAGO - Chicago's city clerk and four other men were charged Thursday in an eight-count corruption indictment as federal prosecutors pushed ahead with their investigation of payoffs and patronage hiring fraud in the city's government.

Those indicted included city Clerk James J. Laski, his political aide, Sam Gammicchia, and John Briatta, a former water department employee who is a brother-in-law of Cook County Commissioner John Daley. John Daley is Mayor Richard M. Daley's brother.

The inclusion of a Daley relative in the indictment brought the scandal deeper into the heart of the political organization that has dominated city government in Chicago for years - the inheritors of the once mighty Chicago Democratic Machine.

Laski and Gammicchia were charged last week in a complaint filed by federal prosecutors in U.S. District Court. Such a complaint is the usual forerunner of an indictment.

The indictment added the names of Briatta, 46, Randy Aderman, 50, another former water department employee, and Michael Jones, 48, an employee of the city clerk's office who helped in running Get Plowed Inc., a company that got six years of payments from the Hired Truck Program.

The program has been described as designed to save taxpayer dollars by outsourcing city hauling work to private truckers. At its peak, it cost $38 million a year.

The program has been awash in corruption. Truckers have admitted paying city officials and contributing to the campaigns of their favored candidates to get work through the program.

Some of the firms that participated in the program have ties to organized crime.

In recent months, the investigation has expanded to include allegations that city officials defied a court order and fraudulently hired employees based on clout instead of merit.

The mayor's former patronage chief is among those under indictment. He is a member of a Democratic organization based on the 11th Ward southwest of downtown, the historic base of the Daley family, where John Daley remains the committeeman.

Neither John Daley nor the mayor has been accused of wrongdoing in the investigation.

Gammicchia attorney Alexander Salerno did not immediately return messages seeking comment.

DOJ_NMG_0012392

Through his office, Aderman attorney Ronald Belmonte declined to comment. Briatta attorney Theodore Poulos said he would have no comment. Jones attorney Michael Ettinger sent word through law partner Mark Besbekos that he would have no immediate comment.

Laski attorney Anthony Pinelli said when the complaint was filed last week that Laski denies asking for or taking payoffs.

According to the indictment, Jones paid bribes to Laski and Jones and Aderman paid bribes to Briatta. It said Laski and Briatta accepted bribes to influence the awarding of Hired Truck Program business to Get Plowed Inc. It also said Laski and Gammicchia obstructed justice by seeking to influence a witness to testify falsely and mislead a federal grand jury.

The indictment said Laski solicited and accepted bribes from Jones in 2001, 2002 and 2003 and that in each of those years Get Plowed Inc. received more than $100,000 in city business.

The mayor fired the city's water commissioner and nine water department employees including Briatta last June when it was discovered that they had been recorded as being on duty at the city's Jardine Water Filitration Plant when they were not there.

The new indictment brings to 42 the number of those charged in the investigation thus far.

City Clerk, 4 Others Indicted For Corruption (CHIT)

By Todd Lighty And Matt O'connor, Tribune Staff Reporters

Chicago Tribune, January 27, 2006

City Clerk James Laski was formally charged Thursday along with a brother-in-law of Cook County Commissioner John Daley and two other city employees in the latest corruption indictment involving the city's Hired Truck Program.

Laski, who was first charged in a criminal complaint unsealed two weeks ago, solicited $50,000 in bribes for steering city trucking business to a lifelong friend who was charged Thursday for the first time, the indictment alleged.

The friend, Michael "Mick" Jones, and his wife, Traci, who wasn't charged, secretly recorded Laski while cooperating in the federal probe, according to court records. The Joneses both work for Laski in the clerk's office.

John Briatta, Daley's brother-in-law, who held a key dispatching post at the city's Jardine water filtration plant, pocketed $8,000 in bribes in 2003 for obtaining additional city business for Get Plowed Inc., which was once operated by Jones, the charges alleged.

Another former city employee, Randy Aderman, introduced Laski to Donald Tomczak, then the No. 2 official in the city's Water Management Department, who awarded Hired Truck work to Get Plowed at Laski's request, authorities charged.

Tomczak has been convicted in the probe and is cooperating with authorities.

Also named in Thursday's indictment was Salvatore "Sam" Gammicchia, a coordinator of Laski's campaign workers and a foreman of Cook County ironworkers. He had been charged with Laski two weeks ago.

Truck scandal keeps growing

The indictment brings to 42 the number of defendants charged in the probe of the scandal-scarred Hired Truck Program. More than half of them worked for the city.

Laski, 52, who has also been charged with obstruction of justice for influencing Jones' wife to mislead a grand jury, has publicly vowed to remain in office as he fights the charges.

Laski's lawyer, Anthony Pinelli, said Thursday that he planned to meet with Laski to decide what legal avenue to pursue. Laski was considering the indictment's impact on his family and his office, Pinelli said, but he hadn't made a decision about resigning his post, which he has held since 1995.

"He has to decide whether he can deal with this indictment and continue to effectively do his job," Pinelli said.

The indictment seeks the forfeiture of $50,000, the alleged bribery proceeds, from Laski, or his Chicago house if he can't come up with the money.

About three weeks ago, Laski and his wife borrowed $97,035 using their residence as collateral, according to records filed with the Cook County recorder of deeds.

"It was not done for purposes of dealing with these criminal charges but for his own personal finances," Pinelli said.

Attorney Theodore Poulos, who represents Briatta, and Ronald Belmonte, Aderman's lawyer, declined to comment on the indictment. Jones' lawyer, Michael Ettinger, was ill and unavailable for comment.

Gammicchia's lawyer, Alex Salerno, said his client, accused of warning Jones not to cooperate with federal agents, would fight the charges.

"He's a perfectly wonderful guy, and I can't imagine him threatening anyone," Salerno said.

11th Ward is shaken

The federal investigation has shaken the 11th Ward political operation—home base for Mayor Richard Daley—that John Daley has run since he was appointed Democratic committeeman in 1980.

Bribe money from the Hired Truck scandal was directed to John Daley's ward organization, and the owner of a trucking outfit who bought his insurance from him has pleaded guilty in the bribes-for-work scheme.

Mayor Daley was out of town, but Jacquelyn Heard, his press secretary, called the indictment "regrettable at the very least."

"Unfortunately, no one can vouch for someone else's integrity, whether it is a trusted employee or your brother's brother-in-law," she said in a reference to Briatta, an acquaintance of the mayor.

Briatta, a former chief equipment dispatcher at the Department of Water Management's Jardine plant, was fired following an internal city investigation last year that uncovered a payroll scheme in the department. He and eight other workers falsified their pay records by having other people punch in for duty for them when they weren't present, officials alleged.

Secret recordings

Jones sought Laski's help in about 1997 to get trucks into the Hired Truck Program, the charges alleged, and Laski in turn sought assistance for Get Plowed from an undisclosed "influential alderman."

A source close to the investigation said the alderman was Patrick Huels, Mayor Daley's City Council floor leader until he resigned in 1997 after admitting he borrowed $1.25 million from another Daley friend and contractor, Michael Tadin. Huels could not be reached for comment.

Jones allegedly paid Laski $500 in cash a month, later boosted to $1,000. The bribes took place for six years until the federal probe became public, authorities alleged.

In the criminal complaint filed two weeks ago, prosecutors spelled out in greater detail the alleged involvement of Jones, Aderman and Briatta, though none was identified by name at the time.

According to the complaint and sources, Aderman told Jones that he could get even more business for Get Plowed if he would pay $750 a month to Briatta.

Aderman told authorities that he believed Briatta met with Tomczak to get additional trucking business for Jones' company. Jones made inconsistent payments to Aderman, but Aderman told authorities that he regularly paid Briatta, according to the sources and court records.

Aderman also has cooperated in the government's investigation, court records show.

Laski, believing that Traci Jones was going to testify before a federal jury about the bribes, allegedly suggested Oct. 12 that she "might be too ill" to appear before the grand jury, the charges alleged.

John Daley In-law Indicted (CHIST)

By STEVE WARMBIR, TIM NOVAK AND FRAN SPIELMAN, Staff Reporters

Chicago Sun-Times, January 26, 2006

Briatta — a brother-in-law to Cook County Commissioner John Daley — was charged Thursday with taking $8,000 in bribes from a trucking company that got Hired Truck work at the Water Department where Briatta was a top official.

The charge comes eight months after Briatta was fired from his job as chief equipment dispatcher for his alleged involvement in another scam. Briatta, who was paid nearly $100,000 a year, was accused with eight others of falsifying payroll records by swiping each other in and out.

Laski and his political aide Sam Gammicchia were formally indicted Thursday, along with Briatta and two close friends of Laski, Michael Jones and Randy Aderman.

Jones and Jones' wife work for Laski in the clerk's office and both secretly wore recording devices that captured Laski allegedly trying to cover up bribes he took to help Jones' trucking company between 1998 and 2003.

Laski and Gammicchia were charged in a criminal complaint, prosecutors announced earlier this month. The indictment released Thursday provided few new details of their alleged scheme. For the first time, though, prosecutors put a dollar figure on the amount of bribes Laski allegedly pocketed — $50,000 from Jones' company, Get Plowed Inc.

Laski is accused of taking $500 a month for each one of Jones' trucks he got into the Hired Truck Program. At some point, Laski allegedly got $1,000 a month in total.

Laski had no comment Thursday but has said he's innocent.

Jones also allegedly paid Aderman money to get Hired Truck business. Aderman worked in the water department and passed along money to John Briatta.

On Thursday, the mayor was out of town, but his press secretary Jacquelyn Heard said: "Unfortunately, you can't vouch for someone else's integrity. Whether it's a trusted employee or your brother's brother-in-law.

"It's certainly regrettable and hurtful at the very least, as it would be for anyone," Heard said.

John Briatta's attorney, Ted Poulos, had no comment on the case. Neither did Michael Ettinger, the attorney for Jones, or Ronald Belmonte, the lawyer for Aderman, who was first to cooperate in the Laski investigation.

Briatta, 46, lives a few blocks away from his brother-in-law, John Daley, in the Bridgeport neighborhood. Briatta, a resident of the 11th Ward, is politically active and a member of the mayor's controversial Hispanic Democratic Organization.

Briatta has been a city employee for decades, landing the job soon after his sister, Mary Lou, married John Daley in 1975. The wedding sparked controversy because Mayor Richard J. Daley's son was marrying the daughter of Louis Briatta, described in press accounts at the time as a Loop gambling boss for the mob.

CBS 2 Chicago, January 27, 2006

(CBS) CHICAGO A Chicago dentist was in court Thursday fighting accusations that are spicy enough to make your teeth rattle.

There was a minor mob scene at the federal courthouse as Chicago dentist Gary Kimmel and his wife were surrounded by reporters and photographers.

"Why this case has garnered so much publicity is beyond me, but I guess it's an interesting and salacious story and its a juicy allegation," said defense attorney Joe Lopez.

The FBI is accusing Kimmel of providing Marina City condos and a fleet of expensive cars for an interstate prostitution ring.

Prosecutors also say Kimmel used his Streeterville office to provide dental care for prostitutes working for the operation.

In court Thursday, the judge released the dentist on an unsecured $100,000 bond after the dentist pled not guilty to all the charges.

"If it was going on, it was without his knowledge, without his consent and it was behind his back," Lopez said.

Kimmel has not been working at his office since he was charged. A receptionist said was taking time off for conferences and meetings he's attending.

The defense lawyer concedes that secretly recorded FBI audio tapes may be a problem for Kimmel. In one of them, the dentist seems to endorse an alleged pimp's plan to injure one of his hookers.

AP, January 27, 2006

CHICAGO A Chicago dentist accused of supplying luxury cars to an interstate prostitution ring has been allowed to remain free on a 100-thousand dollar unsecured bond.Gary Kimmel appeared briefly today before a U-S magistrate judge, who set the bond.Defense attorney Joseph Lopez told the court that Kimmel was an "outstanding person" who hadn't realized at first he was involved in an interstate prostitution ring.A January 18th indictment charged that Kimmel accepted more than 400-thousand dollars from two pimps to buy, finance, insure and maintain eleven cars.The case was part of a national investigation dubbed "Innocence Lost" by prosecutors that resulted in charges in December against alleged ring members in Michigan and Hawaii.

Ryan Trial On Hold As Witness Takes Personal Leave (CHIT/AP)

By Mike Robinson, The Associated Press

Chicago Tribune, January 27, 2006

George Ryan's racketeering and fraud trial was put on hold Thursday as the prosecution's last major witness took an emergency personal leave.

Jurors were told to take a four-day weekend and be ready for the former governor's trial to resume Monday, but prosecutors said it was unclear whether that could happen.

One major government witness remains to go on the stand -- FBI agent Raymond Ruebenson, the case agent who has long been at the heart of the government's seven-year Operation Safe Road.

Operation Safe Road began as an inquiry into bribes paid for drivers licenses and expanded into a full-scale investigation of political corruption in state government under Ryan.

Prosecutors say Ryan steered big-money state leases and contracts to Warner and other friends and got free vacations and gifts in return. Ryan and Warner deny any wrongdoing.

Ruebenson, who has been at the marathon trail almost every day for the last 17 weeks, took personal leave Thursday over a family matter.

Federal prosecutors had hoped to rest their case last Thursday. But that objective has been pushed back daily and now the government is hoping to rest next week if there are no more snags.

One or two more prosecution witnesses besides Ruebenson might have to be called for such technical purposes as identifying canceled checks being placed in evidence, prosecutors said.

With the jurors away, both sides bickered good naturedly Thursday over whether to admit into evidence a batch of canceled checks from Warner-owned companies and whether to show jurors a chart pinpointing times when Warner withdrew money from his accounts.

Ryan and Warner didn't attend, not much was decided and the hearing recessed for the weekend well before the noon hour.

By Ernie Suggs , Bill Torpy, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, January 27, 2006

Former Atlanta Mayor Bill Campbell's defense team warned it would be "loaded for bear" in cross-examining key prosecution witnesses, and the assault began Thursday.

Sullivan, a former contract compliance director, testified that a contractor friend of Campbell's indicated to him that he had "bought" the former mayor.

Sullivan was later pounded relentlessly by defense attorney Jerry Froelich, who suggested federal authorities had "bought" Sullivan's testimony in exchange for not prosecuting him.

Unlike when he was questioned by the prosecution, Sullivan at time seemed stricken by amnesia. He did not remember when he got married, divorced or how much he made when employed by the city.

Campbell, 52, is charged with seven criminal counts, including racketeering, bribery and income tax evasion. He has pleaded not guilty.

The prosecution is trying to use Sullivan's testimony to show Campbell frequently was involved in awarding of contracts in exchange for favors.

"[Rowe] used the term when he referred to the mayor as 'That's my ho,' Sullivan said. When prosecutor Russell Vineyard asked what Rowe meant, Sullivan responded, "I took it that he meant he had bought the mayor — he owned the mayor."

Sullivan, fired by Campbell in 1996 because of sexual harassment accusations, said Rowe, who died in 2004, told him he often gave the mayor cash while on gambling trips.

Under cross-examination, Froelich reminded Sullivan that during a 1998 interview with the FBI, Sullivan said the "ho" reference meant Rowe had access to Campbell — not to having bought him off.

Froelich used much of the afternoon to assail Sullivan's character, indicating that after he left the city he was on "the fix" in procuring certain contracts. He earned $7,500 as a "consultant" in helping a third party earn a $20,000 city contract.

Sullivan also became a consultant to United Water, a firm that in 1998 garnered a $21 million annual contract to run the city's water system.

He earned about $75,000 for a yearlong contract but said he had to give 35 percent to a female friend of Kevin Ross, who ran Campbell's mayoral campaigns. He said Ross, who testified earlier in the week, referred the company to him.

Sometimes, Sullivan testified, he funneled some of his cash payments to Herbert McCall, Campbell's former commissioner of the administrative services. "It wasn't the best judgment," Sullivan said. "In hindsight, I realized that." McCall was found guilty in 2003 of perjury and obstruction of justice.

Campbell Lawyers Fight Witness (WXIA-TV)

By Jerry Carnes

WXIA-TV, January 27, 2006

During a combative morning at the federal courthouse in Downtown Atlanta, Campbell's defense team contended the evidence being used by the prosecution is flawed and fought to keep it from the jury. At issue was the testimony of former city employee Michael Sullivan, who worked as the city's contract compliance director.

Lawyers on each side argued over the validity of Sullivan's testimony that questioned the legality of Campbell's relationship with former city contractor Rickey Rowe. Rowe died during the federal investigation. Campbell's lawyers said that all testimony about Rowe should be kept out of court because Rowe isn't here to verify conversations that he may or may not have had.

On the witness stand, Sullivan testified that Rowe once bragged that he had financed gambling trips for Campbell, Atlanta's mayor from 1994 to 2002.

"He told me that he'd give the mayor cash on those gambling trips," Sullivan testified. Sullivan claimed Rowe even referred to the mayor as "my whore." Sullivan said, "I took it to mean that he owns the mayor." Other city employees said they felt pressured by Campbell to give city contracts to Rowe.

Campbell's defense attorneys hammered away at Sullivan's credibility, saying that he changed his story many times. They also pointed to Sullivan's own admission that he accepted money from a city contractor for himself.

Louisiana Tires Of Its Rogues (LAT)

By Miguel Bustillo, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 27, 2006

NEW ORLEANS — Joseph Impastato conceded he took the two cashier's checks worth $85,000. The whole thing was captured on tape by the FBI, so it would have been difficult to deny.

But it was no kickback, the councilman from St. Tammany Parish said. It was business.

When he cut a deal to receive half the money from a government contract to haul away hurricane debris, Impastato said, he was acting as a private businessman, not a public official.

Federal prosecutors are not buying it — and neither apparently is the Louisiana public. After a federal grand jury indicted Impastato on felony extortion charges last month, making him the first Louisiana politician accused of Hurricane Katrina corruption, citizens condemned him in newspapers and on talk radio and the Internet as an embarrassment to his home state.

"He's got to be a real lowlife to do something like that at a time like this," Frank White, a 62-year-old retired fire captain from the suburb of Chalmette, said in an interview. "It's the Louisiana way of doing business, I guess. But there is a quiet majority now that's sick and tired of this. People are fed up with these crooks."

In Louisiana, which has a history of political shenanigans so rich and colorful that it has become a part of American folklore, people long have laughed off misbehaving politicians as a fact of life, every bit as inevitable as death and taxes.

But as the state lobbies Washington for more money to rebuild ravaged towns and cities, citizens are realizing that Louisiana's well-earned penchant for dirty politics has exacted a steep price: It has badly damaged the credibility of the recovery effort.

"Frankly, the reputation in Washington is, if we send money down there, it will just get stolen," said political handicapper Charles E. Cook, a Louisiana native who has worked in the nation's capital for more than three decades. "It is a caricature of Louisiana politics that is not entirely undeserved but is grossly exaggerated. No one cared about it much before Katrina. But right now, it's hurting the state enormously."

A major turning point in public attitude came in 2001 when Edwin Edwards, the former four-term Democratic governor, received a 10-year sentence for taking bribes for riverboat gambling licenses. In the last governor's race, both candidates — Democrat Kathleen Babineaux Blanco beat Republican Bobby Jindal — were considered squeaky clean, and promised government reforms. The distaste for dirty government has really picked up momentum since last summer.

"What was tolerated before Katrina is not necessarily tolerated now," said pollster Silas Lee III, a professor at Xavier University here. "Nerves are raw. People have lost their sense of security and direction. They are living a day-to-day existence, and they have little patience for any politician who is perceived as being corrupt."

In addition to Edwards, in the last decade Louisiana has seen an attorney general, a congressman, a state Senate president, a federal judge and countless local officials convicted of corruption. Louisiana's last three state insurance commissioners wound up in prison for offenses that include lying to the FBI, accepting $2 million in illegal campaign contributions and taking bribes — prompting jokes that future candidates should make sure they look good in stripes.

Jim Letten, the U.S. attorney for eastern Louisiana and the lead prosecutor in the Edwards case, sees the convictions as a sign of progress. Wherever he goes, he said, he is greeted by people — black, white, Latino, Asian — who tell him Louisiana needs to clean up its act.

"I am not sure that Louisiana has measurably more corruption than other [regions], but surely we have a reputation for being tolerant of it," said Letten, a member of the Hurricane Katrina Fraud Task Force, a team of federal, state and local law enforcement officials investigating scams and corruption.

Until recently, Louisiana politicians proved that charisma trumped scruples. Their repeated election victories, despite corruption allegations in many instances, showed that Louisiana voters viewed the ethical transgressions of their elected officials as an amusing spectacle.

T. Wayne Parent, a political science professor at Louisiana State University and author of "Inside the Carnival: Unmasking Louisiana Politics," said citizens accepted corrupt politicians because they were effective in providing government services, and the cash they were pocketing was not believed to be taxpayer money.

"Maybe some politician was making a deal with the devil, but that was money from some oil and gas company, or so people thought. By the late 1980s, people realized, maybe it was our money," said Parent, who believes the change in attitude has been slowly building over the last quarter-century.

Huey Long, the Depression-era demagogue who dominated every level of Louisiana government by bullying or buying off anyone who got in his way, joked that "one of these days the people of Louisiana are going to get good government — and they aren't going to like it."

Known as the Kingfish, Long was impeached as governor in 1929 on charges of bribery and gross misconduct but narrowly avoided punishment — reportedly by bribing several state senators. Elected a U.S. senator in 1930, he was assassinated in 1935 in Baton Rouge by the son of a judge who was about to be gerrymandered out of a job.

Earl Long, his eccentric brother, kept the family's Democratic political machine running into the 1960s. He once remarked that Louisiana voters "don't want good government; they want good entertainment."

He served three terms as governor, spending some of the last term in a mental hospital, where his wife had him committed after he took up with Blaze Starr, a stripper.

Edwards, who survived two trials and 22 grand jury investigations in his four terms as governor, boasted that the only way he could lose was if he were "caught in bed with a dead girl or a live boy."

The "crook" handily won. But he was eventually sent to prison for taking bribes after Eddie DeBartolo Jr., former owner of the San Francisco 49ers, testified that he had paid Edwards $400,000 to land a casino license.

Even now, during the state's ultimate hour of need, some Louisiana citizens say they could stomach a crooked politician — as long as he was competent.

"I'll tell you what, I'd take Edwin Edwards in a minute to get us out of this mess," said Gid Brill, 65, a tool salesman from Belle Chasse. "He might skim off $10 million for himself, but he'd know what to do with the rest of the money."

Such attitudes do not go over well in Washington, where some Republican lawmakers speak of Louisiana as if it were a banana republic.

Sen. Larry E. Craig (R-Idaho), who sits on the pivotal appropriations committee which oversees all major spending bills, compared fraud in Louisiana to fraud in Iraq. During town hall meetings in his home state last year, he repeatedly said that Louisiana and New Orleans had "the most corrupt governments in our country."

State lawmakers last year sought $250 billion from Congress for recovery and reconstruction in a proposal criticized as a grab-bag of pork-barrel projects. President Bush said Thursday the federal government had approved $85 billion in aid to the Gulf Coast. Louisiana's congressional delegation has contended that is not nearly enough, and continues to press for more.

Sen. Mary L. Landrieu (D-La.) said that the corruption, while historically accurate, has been magnified by Republicans in Washington who do not want to help Louisiana. "I don't want to discount that the image carries the scars of our past. But we have emphatically turned the corner," Landrieu said.

Citing the corruption scandal in the nation's capital centering on GOP lobbyist Jack Abramoff, Landrieu added, "Republicans in Washington should clean up their own house before using Louisiana's past reputation an excuse for not wanting to rebuild the Gulf Coast."

"It's not fiction — we have had some real corruption issues here in the past, and to some extent we still do today," Vitter said. "My colleagues in Washington want assurances that money is going to be spent wisely, given those issues, and I don't think it's too much to ask."

Government statistics indicate that Louisiana is one of the most corrupt states in the country. From 1995 to 2004, federal prosecutors won 310 corruption convictions involving public servants and citizens in Louisiana, said a report by the Public

Integrity Section of the Justice Department. That was far from the highest total: California prosecutors logged 871. But California is a state of 36 million people, nine times the population of Louisiana.

In the last month alone, federal prosecutors have been busy bringing corruption charges against Louisiana public servants. Two sheriffs deputies who worked at a Gretna jail were sentenced last week after confessing to taking bribes — part of an ongoing federal probe dubbed "Operation Wrinkled Robe," which seeks to ferret out jail and courthouse corruption. The investigation already has resulted in the conviction of a former state judge.

Last Friday, a federal grand jury indicted a former New Orleans police officer caught driving a stolen pickup, one of about 200 Cadillacs and Chevys looted from a dealership after Katrina. Witnesses reported seeing officers drive away in the vehicles. A state grand jury is also investigating the case, along with other allegations of looting by law enforcement officers.

Brett Pfeffer, a former aide to Rep. William Jefferson, a New Orleans Democrat, pleaded guilty two weeks ago to bribing an unnamed congressman on behalf of a small telecommunications company. Jefferson has not been charged and has denied wrongdoing.

Impastato's trial is scheduled to begin next month. He pleaded not guilty Jan. 10 to federal charges that he extorted money from a businessman after helping him land a contract to remove debris. If convicted of the charge, as well as related counts of conspiracy and money laundering, he could face up to 20 years in prison.

The indictment said Impastato arranged with Lee Paul Mauberret of the Pontchartrain Chipping Yard to split the $200,000 contract. A relative of Mauberret's balked at paying the kickback, and Mauberret called the FBI, which set up the sting.

Impastato, 33, continues to serve his second term on the council in St. Tammany Parish, next to New Orleans on the north shore of Lake Pontchartrain. He declined to discuss the case when reached at Sal & Judy's, his family's Italian restaurant, where he makes a living running a business selling tomato sauces and olive oil.

His lawyer, Karl Koch, said Impastato did not "use his official capacity in any way" to enrich himself, and witnesses would testify that Impastato did a fair amount of the hurricane cleanup work himself. Impastato's critics said his actions — legal or not — set back the state's efforts to repair its reputation.

"Impastato should have avoided this at all costs. Especially given the current climate and attitude in Washington toward Louisiana," St. Tammany resident Dana Deris wrote on a blog carried on the New Orleans Times-Picayune website. "He IS guilty of furthering the negative image of Louisiana."

"I'd love to be the judge on that one," said Keys, a 41-year resident of St. Tammany Parish. "A snake is going to take advantage of this opportunity right now, because there's a lot of money flying around loose. I guess the question is whether it was a legal shakedown or not. But either way, he's still a snake."

By Michael Rubinkam

The Philadelphia Inquirer, January 27, 2006

ALLENTOWN, Pa. - The owner of a Jackson Pollock painting stolen from Scranton's Everhart Museum two months ago said he has forwarded the name of his No. 1 suspect to the FBI, and that the person has a connection to the museum.

The Pollock's owner is an artist formerly from northeastern Pennsylvania, whose paintings are featured in museums and private collections around the country. He spoke on condition of anonymity because he does not want to draw attention to himself, or to his own art collection.

The thief or thieves who broke into the Everhart on Nov. 18 swiped two artworks: an oil by Pollock that could be worth millions of dollars and a less valuable silkscreen by Andy Warhol.

Everhart spokesman Joe Palumbo said Thursday that museum officials don't believe the theft was perpetrated by anyone affiliated with the museum. "But then, to clarify that, they have no idea" who did it, he said.

The owner declined to say why he suspects the person whose name he gave the FBI, but said his information is based on official accounts of what happened and his knowledge of the museum's security.

An FBI spokeswoman confirmed the agency is investigating but declined to provide details.

The painting's owner said Thursday that he purchased the painting, created in 1949, from Pollock himself for about $1,000. The painting remained part of his personal collection for decades before he decided to lend it to the Everhart Museum more than two years ago.

Authorities have previously referred to the painting as "Springs Winter," but the owner said the correct name is "Winter in Springs."

"Winter in Springs" is not included in the catalogue of Pollock's known work, but Helen Harrison, director of the Pollock-Krasner House & Study Center, said that previously unheard-of works by the famed abstract expressionist have occasionally come to light.

The painting's owner said that for security reasons, he would never reveal the existence of a painting until he was ready to sell it or lend it. He said he owns other works by Pollock.

Although the 40-inch-by-32-inch painting has never changed hands, a similar work by Pollock sold at auction for $11.6 million in May 2004. Experts have said the Warhol, a 1984 silkscreen called "Le Grande Passion," is worth $10,000 to $15,000. The Warhol was part of the Everhart's permanent collection.

"Winter in Springs" wasn't insured, according to the owner and the museum. The owner said insurance on art is prohibitively expensive and that he doesn't know a private collector who has it.

Authorities have said that the thieves shattered a glass door at the rear of the Everhart to gain entry. They tripped motion sensors, but were gone by the time police arrived.

Surveillance cameras were not working. Even if they had been, the cameras are not set up to record images, Palumbo said.

The owner said he was recently summoned to testify at a grand jury session that was subsequently canceled. Palumbo said that to his knowledge, a grand jury has not been convened to investigate the theft. Grand jury proceedings are secret in Pennsylvania.

The Everhart never established the Pollock's provenance when it accepted the painting from its owner, but the FBI is going on the assumption that the painting is genuine, FBI spokeswoman Jerri Williams said. The FBI investigates stolen art only when it is worth $100,000 or more, or if it is at least 100 years old and worth $5,000 or more.

"We are pursuing it and attempting to identify who is responsible and, if possible, recover the artwork," Williams said.

Pollock, who created his abstract art by dripping and pouring paint on large canvasses spread on the floor, died in a drunken-driving crash in 1956 at the age of 44.

The Everhart, which specializes in natural history, science and fine arts, was founded nearly 100 years ago. It draws 15,000 to 20,000 visitors annually.

AP, January 27, 2006

OXFORD, Miss. -- Former beef plant operator Richard Hall has agreed to plead guilty to charges of mail fraud and money laundering related to the failure of the state-backed facility in north Mississippi.

The FBI and the U.S. attorney's office announced the agreement on Thursday.

In federal court in Oxford and state court in Yalobusha County, where the plant was located, Hall pleaded guilty Wednesday to federal and state charges of mail and wire fraud as well as money laundering. No sentencing date has been announced.

Prosecutors said a plea agreement would bring Hall two concurrent eight-year prison terms.

Hall is the former operator of the Mississippi Beef Processors plant in Oakland. He admitted to converting $751,000 in public and corporate funds for private use.

The $43.5 million processing plant opened in August 2004 with 400 workers but closed three months later because of equipment failure.

Prosecutors said Hall also agreed to cooperate in the continuing investigation of the beef plant.

Hall's was the only indictment announced on Thursday by prosecutors.

Former Library Director Sentenced For Stealing Funds (MACT)

By Wayne Crenshaw

The Macon Telegraph, January 27, 2006

DUBLIN - The former director of the Ocmulgee Regional Library System was sentenced to four years in federal prison Thursday on charges that he stole library funds.

David C. Wilson must also pay $264,298 in restitution to the library system and a $75,000 fine, U.S. District Court Judge Dudley Bowen ruled at the end of a half-day hearing.

Wilson was library system director from 1982 until 1994, when the FBI and GBI began investigating suspicious expenses. He was convicted in October of five counts of theft and one count of witness tampering.

He routinely wrote checks of $250 and higher to himself for travel without anything to substantiate the payments, according to testimony in the trial. He also wrote salary supplements to himself into the budget without notifying the individual library boards.

Wilson was allowed to remain free on bond until notified of the date he is to report to prison, Bowen said.

In May 2004, the GBI executed search warrants on Wilson's home, the Eastman branch of the library and a farm Wilson owned in Dodge County. The investigation stemmed from a request by the Cochran Police Department.

Newton Man Sentenced To Prison In Fraud Case (BOS)

The Boston Globe, January 27, 2006

A Newton investment adviser was sentenced to 17 years in prison after pleading guilty to fraud charges, federal prosecutors said. T. Gene Gilman, 63, also was sentenced to two years of supervised release and ordered to pay unspecified restitution. According to the Justice Department, Gilman illegally diverted about $12 million of clients' money between 1998 and 2003 to two ventures he operated that eventually failed: a specialty eyewear marketer and a software design firm. Prosecutors said he sent false monthly statements to roughly 55 investors that misrepresented their money was in domestic securities. A Justice Department spokeswoman said a court proceeding will be held within 30 days to determine what assets of Gilman's might be available to compensate victims. (Ross Kerber)

By Diana Penner

The Indianapolis Star, January 27, 2006

A Bloomington man who used two girls to create pornography that he sold on the Internet has been sentenced to 100 years in prison.

Susan W. Brooks, U.S. attorney for the Southern District, which includes two-thirds of the state, said prosecutors wanted to ensure that Turner would never be free to prey upon children again.

The sentence was the longest ever meted out for such a crime in the Southern District. Turner must serve at least 85 years of that sentence under federal guidelines.

The two assistant U.S. attorneys who prepared the case, Gayle L. Helart and Steven D. DeBrota, have prosecuted about 125 child exploitation cases. Turner was sentenced Tuesday after a 2½-hour hearing in Indianapolis. He is being held at the Marion County Jail until the federal Bureau of Prisons determines where he will serve his sentence.

Turner pleaded guilty in August, but only after both victims had testified at his trial. The girls, identified only as Jane Doe and Mary Doe in court documents, were 12 to 15 years old during the three years Turner used them to create pornography -- from September 2001 to November 2004.

In sentencing Turner, prosecutors said U.S. District Judge David F. Hamilton considered that the defendant had put his victims through the ordeal of testifying before pleading guilty.

One of the girls is a close relative of Turner's, Brooks said, and the other was essentially homeless and viewed Turner as a father figure.

"He got them drunk. He got them high," Brooks said. On some occasions, the girls were so affected by drugs and alcohol when Turner photographed or videotaped them, DeBrota said, that they had no recollection of the events.

The investigation was started by the Bloomington Police Department, which collaborated with the FBI because Turner posted -- and sold -- pornographic images via the Internet. Investigators quit counting when they found 5,000 images. They believe Turner had several thousand more.

Brooks said the investigation showed that Turner, who was unemployed, was receiving about $1,000 a month from people who paid to get pornography from him.

In addition, local authorities are continuing to investigate a man photographed having sexual contact with the two girls. He is identified only as "John Doe, a friend and drinking buddy," in court documents. Brooks declined to elaborate on that investigation.

In court documents asking for the maximum penalty for Turner, prosecutors said one of the girls "has suffered from substantial drug and alcohol dependency problems" and "has been robbed of the right to grow up free from the malicious interference of adults in her adolescent development."

However, Brooks said, both girls now are in safe environments and doing better.

There's no question about the message the sentence sends, Brooks said.

"People who possess this type of trash," she said, "ought to think about spending the rest of their lives behind bars."

Getty Museum To Hold Talks In Rome On Disputed Art, Lawyer Says (BLOOM)

By Vernon Silver

Bloomberg, January 27, 2006

(The opinions expressed do not necessarily reflect those of Bloomberg.)

By Vernon Silver

Jan. 26 (Bloomberg) -- The J. Paul Getty Museum's new director, Michael Brand, will hold talks in Rome tomorrow with Italian Culture Ministry officials who are demanding the world's richest art institution return 42 allegedly looted antiquities in its collection, ministry lawyer Maurizio Fiorilli said.

The meeting will take place the day before the Getty reopens its Roman-style villa in Malibu, California, after a nine-year, $275 million renovation. The museum's former antiquities curator, Marion True, 57, is on trial in Rome on charges she acquired illegally excavated ancient art for the Getty.

Brand, who was named to the post last year as the Getty began an internal review of its antiquities-acquisition practices, will lead a delegation at the meeting, said Fiorilli, who said there is no room for compromise.

True, who denies the charges against her, says she acquired the objects in good faith. True obtained many of the disputed objects for the Getty in 1996 in a combined sale and gift by New York collectors Barbara Fleischman and her late husband, Lawrence.

Barbara Fleischman resigned from the Getty board yesterday, the Associated Press and Los Angeles Times reported today. Fleischman, who joined the board in 2000, didn't respond to earlier requests for comment on her collection and the Getty.

Neither the museum nor Fleischman is charged with any wrongdoing. Getty officials couldn't immediately be reached for comment on the Rome meeting.

Aphrodite, Hercules

True resigned in October after the museum determined she violated Getty policy by failing to disclose that an art dealer who supplied the museum helped her get a loan to buy a house in Greece. The Fleischmans also lent True money, the Los Angeles Times reported.

The Getty Villa was inspired by the Villa dei Papiri, an aristocratic Roman country house in Herculaneum destroyed in 79 A.D. by the same volcano that buried Pompeii. The villa was closed in 1997, shortly before the debut of the $2 billion Getty Center designed by Richard Meier in nearby Brentwood, which now houses the Getty's flagship museum as well as art-conservation and scholarly institutes.

The villa was revamped to show ancient art only, and enlarged with a series of new buildings. The museum's parent, the J. Paul Getty Trust, has an endowment of more than $7 billion.

By John Rogers

The San Jose Mercury News, January 27, 2006

LOS ANGELES - The director of the J. Paul Getty museum was scheduled to meet Friday in Rome with Italian officials who have demanded the California museum return dozens of treasures Italian officials believe were stolen from their country.

Getty spokesman Ron Hartwig said Thursday the museum's director, Michael Brand, was leading a team of experts that would meet with "high-ranking officials from the Italian Ministry of Culture."

The Italian government has demanded the return of 42 items it believes were stolen, including a statue of Aphrodite that the Getty bought for $18 million in 1988.

"The Getty's objective is to develop a fuller sense of all the evidence available regarding the objects in question," Brand said in a statement released by Getty officials. "We want to be in a better position to continue our dialogue with the Italian government."

Hartwig said it was too early to speculate about what, if any, treasures the Getty might return.

"We're looking forward to working cooperatively with the Italian government to find solutions that satisfy both sides," he said.

He said the meeting was arranged through an exchange of letters with Italy's minister of culture that Brand began in mid-December, soon after he was appointed the museum's director.

The Getty Trust operates two museums, the Getty Center in Los Angeles and the Getty Villa in Malibu. The latter houses the 44,000 pieces that make up the museum's heralded antiquities collection. It is scheduled to reopen Saturday after eight years of renovations.

It has come under fire on the eve of its reopening amid allegations that dozens of its holdings may have been stolen. The museum's former antiquities director, Marion True, is on trial in Rome on charges of trafficking in looted artifacts.

Brand said during a pre-opening tour of the villa on Tuesday that the museum would hand over any objects determined to be the rightful property of someone else.

"Like any other museum, we've always returned works of art when they've come into question," he said.

2 Charges Tossed For 'Mafia Cops' (NYDN)

By JOHN MARZULLI

New York Daily News, January 26, 2006

The feds have quietly dropped two murder charges against reputed Mafia cops Louis Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa, the Daily News has learned.

Sources familiar with the government's strategy insist the evidence against the ex-NYPD detectives in those gangland killings is solid.

But a decision was made to streamline the indictment after Brooklyn Federal Judge Jack Weinstein warned prosecutors last June that he would not allow them to call 100 witnesses to testify as they had planned.

"Obviously a decision had to be made," one source said.

Deleted from the racketeering indictment is the May 1990 slaying of James Bishop, the former leader of Painters Union Local 37, whose cooperation with the Manhattan district attorney's office allegedly was leaked to the mob by Eppolito and Caracappa. He was found riddled with bullets in his car in Queens.

Also dropped from the case is the 1991 slaying of the late John Gotti's former bodyguard, Bartolomeo (Bobby) Borriello, who was gunned down in front of his Brooklyn home. His address allegedly was given to the mob by the cops.

Sources said prosecutors will still ask the judge to allow evidence of the Bishop and Borriello murders into the case as uncharged crimes.

The feds contend Eppolito, 57, and Caracappa, 64, were kept on a monthly retainer for years by Luchese gangster Anthony (Gaspipe) Casso.

They are charged with leaking confidential information to the Mafia and participating in murders, as well.

With jury selection in their trial set to begin next month, Eppolito now stands charged with eight murders and Caracappa seven.

Eppolito's defense lawyer, Bruce Cutler, could not be reached for comment.

Attorney Edward Hayes, who is defending Caracappa said: "It doesn't make any real difference. Steve Caracappa's position is he didn't kill anyone."

'Mafia Cops' Prosecutors Drop Two Murders (NYNSDY)

By Anthony M. Destefano, Staff Writer

New York Newsday, January 27, 2006

With less than a month before trial, Brooklyn federal prosecutors slimmed down the indictment against the "Mafia Cops" by dropping two murders that were part of the racketeering conspiracy charged against the ex-cops.

A new indictment unsealed Thursday showed that prosecutors, seeking to simplify the trial, have decided to weed out the 1990 murder of union official James Bishop and the 1991 killing of one-time John Gotti crony Bartolomeo "Bobby" Boriello.

Former NYPD detectives Louis Eppolito, 57, and Stephen Caracappa, 64, have been charged with playing roles in as many as 10 homicides, including some while they were police officers, for members of the Luchese crime family. Some of the murders were believed to have been part of a scheme by former Luchese boss Anthony "Gaspipe" Casso to avenge a foiled assassination plot against him.

Bishop, an official of Painters Union Local 37, was killed because he was believed by the mob to have been an informant, said prosecutors. Investigators said Boriello was killed after Eppolito and Caracappa provided information to Casso that the Gambino soldier had threatened him.

Eppolito and Caracappa, who have denied the charges against them, are slated to go to trial Feb. 21 before Judge Jack B. Weinstein in Brooklyn federal district court.

The Bishop and Boriello homicides were dropped from the case to streamline the prosecution witness list. Last year Weinstein expressed doubts that he would allow prosecutors Mitra Hormozi and Robert Henoch to call as many as 100 witnesses.

As many as 10 potential witnesses now don't have to be called, said the source, who added that prosecutors will try to introduce evidence of the two killings as uncharged crimes if Weinstein allows it.

"Our defense is that Steve Caracappa is a hero, not a criminal," defense attorney Edward Hayes said Thursday.

Bruce Cutler, who is defending Eppolito, couldn't be reached for comment.

A Death Row Blogger's Advice For Life (WP)

By Eric Rich

The Washington Post, January 27, 2006

As Vernon Evans sat in his cell on Maryland's death row last spring, he had more to ponder than his own execution.

There was the lonely Brazilian who needed his advice, and a fellow from the District whose question deserved a reply, and a global audience tuned in to the wisdom of a man whose life was on the wane.

Evans was blogging from behind bars.

Vernon Lee Evans Jr. -- amateur advice columnist and convicted murderer -- is scheduled to die next month by lethal injection. He is one of the very few death row inmates to have a blog and, activists say, perhaps the only condemned man worldwide to use a blog to take questions from readers.

Activist Ginny Simmons started the blog in March and relayed the questions to Evans, who does not have Internet access. She stopped posting exchanges on the site in June out of concern that the exchanges could inadvertently harm his legal prospects. With his execution fast approaching, Simmons forwarded a backlog of questions to him last week and plans to post the fresh exchanges once she receives his replies.

Though defense attorneys in capital cases have long strived to remind judges and juries that their clients are human beings with lives beyond the crimes they are accused of, Evans's blog is the leading edge of a strategy by death penalty opponents to use new technologies to make the same point to the wider public.

A coalition of activists in Canada maintains Web pages for about 500 death row inmates. Another group, Campaign to End the Death Penalty, began holding events in 1998 in which condemned inmates are patched through by speaker phone. The blogs are the latest experiment, and the activists say Evans's blog is the most novel and daring because readers can post questions.

"Part of the reason the death penalty is allowed to exist is that people don't acknowledge the fact that the people on death row are human beings," Simmons said.

Evans, 56, of Baltimore, was first sentenced to death more than two decades ago for the contract killings of potential witnesses in a federal drug case. He was convicted in the murders of David Scott Piechowicz, 27, and that man's sister-in-law, Susan Kennedy, 19, in 1983 at a hotel that Piechowicz managed in Pikesville.

Though she did not see the shooting, Evans's girlfriend testified at his trial that she saw him carry the gun into the lobby and saw it again -- still smoking -- when he came out. At a resentencing in 1992, Evans said, "It's not hard for me to say I am truly sorry for having been that type of individual that would take two innocent lives."

"His guilt is crystal clear, and I can't think of a more appropriate case for the death penalty," John Cox, one of the Baltimore County prosecutors handling the case, said in an interview.

On the blog, at http://www.meetvernon.blogspot.com , Evans in April assured Laura from Washington state that he was not the gunman, that he did not get a fair trial and that a lawyer told him before his resentencing in 1992 that his only shot at getting off death row was to show remorse. "Laura, I did not kill these people," Evans wrote.

In an exchange with Jay from New Hampshire, Evans reflected on prison life. "A man must find even in the worst things something good or positive to focus on," he wrote. "Sometimes if the forces are with you, blessing will come your way."

To the despairing Brazilian, a musician who had moved to Canada, Evans responded: "Listen to me, I am not always right, but listen to me anyway, and you might get something out of what I have to say. . . . You are young, and you should not have such fear when you are a talented young man."

Confronted with a question from Robert Trouts, who asked that he take his punishment "like a man," Evans wrote that "I have an education on how meaningful life is" and then seemed to strike a note of anger.

"Society dresses up and hires the justice system to kill for its revenge," he wrote in a portion of the response that was removed from the site yesterday. "I bet you are one of those people who would have been for slavery too."

A death warrant signed two weeks ago orders that Evans be executed during the five-day period beginning Feb. 6. Barring intervention by the courts or Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R), Evans will be put to death almost exactly two months after Maryland's last execution.

Some supporters of the death penalty say they find little of value in Evans's blog or in the larger effort to focus on the humanity of the condemned. "People can exchange notes with him if they want, but I don't think it really adds anything," said Kent Scheidegger, legal director at the Criminal Justice Legal Foundation, a group that supports legal execution. "The question is whether he deserves the punishment he was sentenced to, and I don't find much enlightening in these discussions."

In a world awash in personal narratives, where millions tune in to watch ordinary people do ordinary things on reality shows, the blogosphere has deemed an exchange with a man sentenced to die to be of limited interest. Fewer than 7,000 people have visited the site.

One of Evans's lawyers, Julie Dietrich, relayed this information to Evans by telephone yesterday. According to Dietrich, he responded: "I don't want to be judgmental about why people do things. In America, people have a comfort zone and try not to deal with anything that's too stressful."

Grandfather Grateful Carjackers Freed Girl (WP)

By Allison Klein

Timothy Anderson carefully placed his granddaughter's lunchbox in the back seat of his Ford Expedition yesterday and buckled in the 3-year-old for their early morning trip to day care. He turned on the ignition, then realized that the door inside the garage of his Clinton home was not secured.

As he pulled the house door closed, he heard the engine in his Expedition rev. Then he saw a set of thieves making off with the vehicle, with granddaughter Sydney in the back seat.

He sprinted after the truck as it raced out of the garage and driveway of his house in the 6300 block of Danner Drive and kept going about 150 yards east on Brandywine Road.

The truck then stopped, the back door opened and Sydney hopped out. She ran toward her panicked grandfather.

The whole episode took less than 30 seconds.

"I don't think she realized she was in any danger; she wasn't crying," Anderson said yesterday afternoon. "She was wondering what I was so upset about."

Anderson's truck was one of four vehicles stolen between 6 and 7 a.m. yesterday in the Clinton-Brandywine area. His car was stolen at 6:30 a.m.

Prince George's County police say they believe a set of brazen thieves is targeting people who leave their cars running, a habit that police say is a serious problem in the county.

More cars are stolen in Prince George's than in any other jurisdiction in the state. Last year, police dedicated more officers to tackling the problem and educating the public. In 2005, about 14,300 cars were stolen, a drop of 8.3 percent from the previous year.

Now, if police see a car running with nobody in it, they will issue a $60 ticket.

The three other cars stolen early yesterday in the Clinton area had been left running and unattended as their owners warmed them up. Police spokeswoman Diane Richardson said that was not the case with Anderson.

"We don't believe the man with the child was being careless at all," Richardson said. "He was in his garage and went to pull the door shut. All he did was walk away from the car for a second."

The thieves left the Chevy Malibu on Morano Drive when they stole the Honda Pilot, Richardson said, a sign that they probably were stealing the vehicles for joy riding.

Anderson's charcoal-gray Expedition, with Virginia plates JGS-9685, has not been found, and the thieves have not been apprehended, Richardson said. Anderson said he did not get a good look at the people who stole his truck.

Anderson and his wife recently moved to Prince George's from Dumfries. He said he moved because it was easier for him to get to his job as a technician for Lockheed Martin at the Pentagon.

He was feeling lucky yesterday afternoon that he had Sydney back. He and his wife were babysitting for her and her 2-month-old brother while their parents were out of town on business. He immediately called and told them what had happened.

"They were happy to hear their baby is okay," Anderson said.

He said the near miss will have an effect on him for a long time.

"It could have been prevented," Anderson said.

"I'll do things a lot differently. I will not leave my granddaughter unattended for a split second."

Scene Set In Day-Care Shooting (WP)

By Ernesto Londoño

The Washington Post, January 27, 2006

Moments before an 8-year-old boy shot another child at their day-care center this week, he told her to "give me your money," a prosecutor said yesterday.

"What do you want? Nickels, dimes or pennies? I'm broke," the 7-year-old girl responded, according to the prosecutor. Then a bullet from a .38-caliber revolver pierced her upper right arm.

Montgomery County Assistant State's Attorney Karyn McAuliffe provided that account of Tuesday's day-care center shooting in Germantown during an afternoon bond hearing for the boy's father. Prosecutors said the account was based on the police investigation, but they would not elaborate.

The father, John Linwood Hall, 56, insisted in court that he did not teach his son how to use the revolver. "That is not true. That it not true. That is not true. That is not true," Hall blurted out during the hearing in Rockville as McAuliffe argued that the boy has been "dangerously influenced" by his father.

Hall, 56, a maintenance worker at the National Institutes of Health, was charged with five weapons offenses after his son shot the girl shortly before 7 a.m. in a room where they and four other children were watching a movie on television. The incident occurred at the For Kids We Care day-care center at the Northlake apartments in the 12600 block of Grey Eagle Court.

The boy, a third-grader at Cedar Grove Elementary, has been charged as a juvenile with assault, assault while in possession of a firearm and reckless endangerment, among other counts.

The boy shot the Taurus revolver while it was still in his backpack. One of the five bullets in the gun tore through the backpack and penetrated the girl's arm. The victim, who has not been identified by police, was released Wednesday night from Children's Hospital in the District.

Prosecutors said they do not believe that the girl, a second-grader at S. Christa McAuliffe Elementary School, was targeted. They said it remains unclear to what extent the shooting was accidental.

Law enforcement sources said the boy told classmates last Friday after a fight that he had easy access to guns. But they said they are not sure what he planned to do with the gun that day. The two children involved in the shooting were dropped off at the day-care center before the start of school.

Based on the police investigation, McAuliffe said the boy has made profane and threatening statements in the past.

"[Expletive] the police," McAuliffe quoted the boy as saying. "What the [expletive] can they do to a kid, anyway? I'll shoot 'em."

According to McAuliffe, the boy said another time: "Phase 1: Get weapons. Phase 2: Kill the hillbilly."

McAuliffe did provide more context for those statements. She argued that Hall, a felon with a lengthy criminal history, was aware of his son's violent nature and should not have left a revolver at his disposal in the bedroom they shared. Hall denied that the weapon was kept there.

The prosecutor also said investigators found photographs of guns in the apartment and learned that the boy had access to "very violent video games." According to a police source, two of those video games are "50 Cent Bulletproof" and "187: Ride or Die." The Washington Post agreed not to identify the source because the case remains open.

"Bulletproof," released last fall, depicts rapper 50 Cent in a bloody New York underworld overrun with gangs and crime syndicates. Survival in the game requires shooting nearly anyone who gets in his way. The game costs about $50. "Ride and Die," an older game with a similar premise, is based in Los Angeles.

Darlene Hall, the boy's aunt, said her brother has been a positive influence on the boy, who she described as deeply troubled. She said the boy denied that his father taught him how to use guns.

"He beat on the desk and said: 'No, my father didn't do that. I learned it from 50 Cent,' " Darlene Hall said, describing how the child acted during a hearing on Wednesday that was closed to the public. She was present at the hearing.

"I need a personal bond so I won't lose my child," he told the judge. "I need my child."

Harrington set bond at $50,000 for the two charges before the court yesterday. Hall is also being held on $75,000 bond for three other weapons charges police filed this week.

Harrington barred Hall from having contact with his son as part of the terms of his release if he managed to post bond.

Hall told Harrington that he would show up for court. He has been employed for almost 15 years and has not been convicted of a crime in about 17 years.

"So, when do you pay your debt to society?" Hall asked rhetorically. "I've served my time."

Abuse Sentence Raised (WT)

The Washington Times, January 27, 2006

BURLINGTON, Vt. (AP) -- A judge vilified as soft on crime by Web loggers, TV commentators and politicians for giving a child molester just 60 days in jail increased the sentence yesterday to three to 10 years behind bars.

Vermont District Judge Edward Cashman said he decided to impose the longer sentence because state officials reversed course and agreed to provide sex-offender treatment to Mark Hulett in prison.

When the judge imposed the original sentence on Jan. 4, Hulett had been ruled ineligible for treatment until he got out of prison. Judge Cashman said the lighter sentence was the only way to ensure that Hulett got prompt treatment.

Hulett, 34, pleaded guilty to charges that he had sexual contact with a girl during a four-year period, beginning when she was 6.

After handing out the original sentence, Judge Cashman was attacked by commentators on TV and the Internet. On Fox News, Bill O'Reilly told viewers as video of Judge Cashman rolled, "You may be looking at the worst judge in the USA."

A Zogby International poll taken after the first sentence was imposed showed that 92 percent of American voters opposed it.

In his latest order, Judge Cashman remained firm in his belief that sentences must be concerned with more than just punishment.

"The court agrees a punitive response -- punishment -- is a valuable and necessary component of society's response to criminal conduct," he said. "It is a tool that the court has routinely used for the past 24 years on the trial bench. As stated during the sentencing hearing, however, punishment is not enough of a response in some cases."

The governor said he considered the new sentence still too lenient.

"It's 18 times 60 days, so it's certainly an improvement," Mr. Douglas said. "Personally I think it's inadequate for a crime of that magnitude, but it is certainly better than the first decision."

Attorney General William Sorrell said he had wished for more than three years "as a message to other would-be offenders." But he praised the judge for being "big enough to change course."

Hulett will have to serve at least three years behind bars. Once he gets out, he will spend the rest of his life on probation or parole.

"I think it is fair," said his lawyer, Mark Kaplan. "I think it makes sense under the circumstances."

State Rep. Peg Flory, the House Republican leader, said it is too early to say whether Republicans will drop their resolution calling on the judge to resign.

"I want to read what the decision is before I say," she said.

The Corrections Department initially decided not to offer Hulett treatment behind bars because it concluded that he was unlikely to commit another sex offense. After the furor, however, Vermont's human services secretary ordered the department to change its policy to allow low-risk sex offenders to receive treatment in prison.

Inmate Wounds Guard In Hospital (WT/AP)

By David Dishneau

DOJ_NMG_0012409

The Washington Times, January 27, 2006

HAGERSTOWN, Md. -- A hospitalized state prison inmate shot and critically wounded the correctional officer guarding his room yesterday, then used the officer's gun to force a cabbie to drive him on a chase that ended with the inmate's arrest, state police and prison officials said.

The 44-year-old officer was in critical condition at Washington County hospital, where the attack occurred at about 5 a.m., authorities said. They said he was shot in the face but gave no other information about his injuries.

"He's fighting for his life," Maj. Priscilla Doggett, a state Division of Correction spokeswoman, said.

Prison officials said the officer is from Martinsburg, W.Va., but they declined to name him, citing his family's request for privacy. He is a four-year veteran of the Maryland prison system, married with four children and a stepson, prison officials said.

Corrections Commissioner Frank C. Sizer Jr. identified the inmate as Brandon Morris, 20, who was serving an eight-year sentence at the nearby, medium-security Roxbury Correctional Institution for assault, robbery and handgun violations in Baltimore.

Morris was being moved yesterday afternoon from the state police barrack in Hagerstown to a prison and has not yet been charged in the attack, Maryland State Police Sgt. Thornnie Rouse said.

Mr. Sizer said Morris was admitted to the hospital Wednesday for an undisclosed medical condition.

Department policy in such situations requires that an inmate wear either handcuffs or leg restraints and be secured to the bed, Maj. Doggett said. She said she thinks the policy was being followed in Morris' case.

"The normal procedure is that he is attached to the hospital bed with the restraint device," Mr. Sizer said.

He said he didn't know how Morris got free from the bed and obtained the officer's gun.

The officer was working the 11 p.m. to 7 a.m. shift, Mr. Sizer said.

The officer had reported at the start of his shift and again at 2:55 a.m. that everything was in order. The shooting was reported by a hospital employee, Mr. Sizer said.

Sgt. Rouse said police were alerted by a 911 call at about 5:15 a.m. They learned that the inmate had carjacked a taxi cab outside the hospital emergency room after failing to get car keys from a woman visiting another patient.

Police pursued the cab at about 40 mph on U.S. 11 to State Line, Pa., about 5 miles north of Hagerstown, where the vehicle crashed and Morris fled on foot back into Maryland, Sgt. Rouse said.

Police arrested Morris in an industrial park north of Hagerstown, he said.

"We credit the taxi cab driver with maintaining an open mike, if you will, and allowed officers to hear the chase route," Sgt. Rouse said.

The cabdriver wasn't hurt in the crash, Sgt. Rouse said.

The attack came three weeks after 17 inmates assaulted three officers with chairs and the guards' pepper spray at the maximum-security North Branch Correctional Institution near Cumberland.

The Roxbury Correctional Institution is a 721-bed medium-security prison for men that opened in 1983. It is near two other state prisons in Hagerstown, the Maryland Correctional Institution-Hagerstown and the Maryland Correctional Training Center.

CIVIL LAW:

ChoicePoint To Pay $15 Million To Settle Consumer-Privacy Case (WSJ)

By Christopher Conkey And Ann Carrns

The Wall Street Journal, January 27, 2006

Commercial data broker ChoicePoint Inc. agreed to pay $15 million to settle charges it violated consumer privacy rights, resolving one of two federal probes stemming from the company's disclosure last year that it inadvertently sold sensitive personal information on 163,000 people to criminals.

Under terms of its settlement with the Federal Trade Commission, ChoicePoint will pay a $10 million penalty to the government and $5 million to compensate roughly 800 individuals who the FTC says became identity-theft victims as a result of the lapse. The $10 million fine is the highest ever levied by the FTC.

ChoicePoint, based in Alpharetta, Ga., also must revamp the way it screens customers, implement new information-handling procedures and obtain independent security audits every other year until 2026. FTC Chairman Deborah Platt Majoras said the agreement provides "an opportunity for ChoicePoint to get data security right." She also said that to reduce fraudulent access to its vast database, company representatives will visit most subscribers to check who is using its services.

ChoicePoint didn't admit to any wrongdoing in the FTC investigation, but said it reached agreement because it wanted to avoid prolonged litigation and move forward. "I'm confident the settlement is the right thing to do," said ChoicePoint President Douglas Curling.

The settlement and fallout from the security breach hurt the company's bottom line. ChoicePoint yesterday said fourth-quarter net income fell 29% to $27.7 million, or 30 cents a share, from $39.2 million, or 43 cents a share, a year earlier. The company took an $8 million pretax charge for the FTC settlement and another $5.3 million in charges for other costs, including legal expenses related to the breach, which overall crimped profit by 14 cents a share. For the full year, ChoicePoint said net income fell 4.9% to $140.7 million, or $1.53 a share, from $148 million, or $1.62 a share, the prior year.

In 4 p.m. New York Stock Exchange composite trading yesterday, ChoicePoint shares sagged $3.35, or 7.2%, to $42.95.

The probe stemmed from a September 2004 incident in which the company failed to verify the identity of a client it provided with personal information, which the FTC says included credit histories, on roughly 163,000 individuals. The client provided fake company names, phone numbers and mailing addresses in California, and was in fact a Nigerian national involved in an extensive fraud ring. When the security breach was discovered, the company notified authorities as required by law, but didn't inform affected consumers until February 2005.

The announcement, which was quickly followed by breach notices from fellow data broker LexisNexis and Bank of America Corp., prompted an outcry for stronger consumer protections. About 25 states have passed laws forcing companies to disclose breaches to consumers, while 12 allow certain consumers to freeze access to their credit reports, and Congress is weighing a variety of federal remedies.

Despite ChoicePoint's desire to put the breach behind it, the FTC settlement doesn't remove all the clouds hanging over it. Aside from legal costs, the company still faces an investigation by the Securities and Exchange Commission into trading in ChoicePoint stock by Mr. Curling and Chief Executive Derek Smith prior to the company's disclosure of the breach. The two realized a combined profit of $16.6 million from selling company shares in the months after it learned of the breach. The company has said the sales were proper and part of a pre-approved plan. A ChoicePoint spokesman said that neither Mr. Smith nor Mr. Curling was available late yesterday to comment on the SEC inquiry. The spokesman noted that Mr. Smith has said he expects the outcome of the inquiry to be "favorable" to himself and ChoicePoint.

ChoicePoint To Pay $15 Million To Settle Charges Fine Stems From Consumer Identification Data Breach (USAT)

By Jon Swartz

SAN FRANCISCO — In the largest civil fine levied by the Federal Trade Commission, data broker ChoicePoint has agreed to pay $15 million to settle charges it did not properly protect consumers' personal financial information, the FTC said Thursday.

The FTC fined the company $10 million and said ChoicePoint would pay an additional $5 million to compensate consumers. The FTC says about 800 people have been victimized by identity theft stemming from the breach, but more would be eligible for compensation as cases arise. The FTC says it is establishing a fund and will develop a plan to get compensation to victims. ChoicePoint, citing the Los Angeles County district attorney, says there have been only 16 known instances of ID theft.

The hefty fine sends a strong message to companies that handle the data of millions of Americans, privacy experts say. In the first of several high-profile data breaches disclosed last year, ChoicePoint — which stores about 19 billion records for insurance companies, financial institutions and others — acknowledged that more than 163,000 personal records had been compromised.

At least 130 reported breaches exposed more than 55 million Americans to ID theft last year, sparking consumer advocates' calls for federal oversight of loosely regulated data-brokers.

The settlement requires ChoicePoint to install new procedures so consumer reports are used only by legitimate businesses for lawful purposes. It also must create an information-security program, to be audited by an independent security professional every other year until 2026.

ChoicePoint revealed in February that its massive database of consumer information was accessed by thieves posing as small-business customers. ChoicePoint collects such data as Social Security numbers, birth dates and addresses.

“It wasn't the largest breach, but it showed a stunningly sloppy business model,” consumer advocate Ed Mierzwinski says.

The company, also the subject of a pending Securities and Exchange Commission probe, did not admit to wrongdoing in the FTC investigation. It says it is has hired an independent privacy officer and taken other steps.

The SEC is examining stock trades by ChoicePoint CEO Derek Smith and Doug Curling, chief operating officer, that netted them $16.6 million after the company learned of the breach but before it was made public. ChoicePoint says it was asked by law enforcement to delay its announcement while the matter was investigated. It says the trades were prearranged and approved by its board, and it is cooperating with the SEC.

Record Fine For Data Breach (WP)

By Arshad Mohammed

Data broker ChoicePoint Inc. yesterday agreed to pay a $10 million federal fine over security breaches that exposed more than 160,000 people to possible identity theft. Privacy experts praised the settlement as a warning to companies to get more serious about protecting sensitive information.

The Alpharetta, Ga.-based company, one of the nation's largest buyers and sellers of personal information such as Social Security numbers, birth dates and addresses, also agreed to pay $5 million into a fund to compensate people who suffered as a result of the breaches.

The Federal Trade Commission, which said the fine was the largest civil penalty it had ever imposed, said ChoicePoint violated consumers' privacy and breaking federal laws by mishandling the information and misleading people about its privacy policy.

ChoicePoint said it did not admit to any of the FTC's charges but was happy to have resolved the matter.

The ChoicePoint case has galvanized public concerns both about the ease with which personal information can be bought and sold and about the lax security procedures at data brokers that last year alone led to security breaches affecting tens of millions of people.

ChoicePoint told about 145,000 people in February that their personal information was obtained from the company by suspected criminals who masqueraded as legitimate businesspeople. Later in the year, it told another 17,000 people that information such as their names, addresses, dates of birth, Social Security numbers and summary credit information had been compromised.

The FTC said the incidents led to at least 800 cases of identity theft, which has been the top type of consumer complaint logged by the agency for the past six years.

Privacy experts said the FTC settlement, which required ChoicePoint to tighten its security procedures and to submit to outside security audits for the next 20 years, was designed to remind companies in the growing business of selling personal information that they must do more to protect consumers.

"It sends a big signal," said Peter Swire, a law professor at Ohio State University who was the Office of Management and Budget's chief counselor for privacy during the Clinton administration. "All major companies that handle personal information will see that the bar is being raised."

Consumer advocates say the prevalence of identity theft in part reflects the failure of many information brokers, retailers and credit issuers to adequately protect records or to do enough to stop criminals who seek them by verifying their identities.

As a part of the settlement, ChoicePoint agreed to take steps to ensure that it provides consumer reports only to legitimate businesses, and it will create an "information security program" to protect the personal information it collects on people.

"The message to ChoicePoint and others should be clear: consumers' private data must be protected from thieves," FTC Chairman Deborah Platt Majoras said in a statement.

"I am gratified we were able to work with the FTC and reach an agreement that protects all parties and am even more pleased that we can now put this chapter behind us," ChoicePoint chief executive Derek V. Smith said in a statement, adding that the company had already begun carrying out nearly all the policy changes demanded by the FTC.

The settlement was announced as ChoicePoint released its fourth-quarter profit, which fell to $27.7 million (30 cents a share), from $39.2 million (43 cents) a year earlier. Revenue rose to $257.9 million from $232.5 million. The company took a charge of about $8.8 million in the quarter because of the settlement with the FTC.

U.S. Settles With Company On Leak Of Consumers' Data (NYT)

The Federal Trade Commission announced yesterday that it had reached a $15 million settlement with ChoicePoint Inc., the commercial data broker that disclosed last February that thieves had duped the company into turning over private data on more than 145,000 people.

That revelation touched off a year of national debate over data privacy and security and generated a raft of tough new state laws on data security as well as several bills in Congress.

The settlement includes $10 million in fines — the largest civil penalty ever imposed by the agency — as well as $5 million in consumer compensation, stemming from accusations that its handling of consumer data and its inadequate security procedures amounted to violations of consumer privacy rights and federal law.

The company, based in Alpharetta, Ga., will also be required to overhaul its security program — something already well under way, the company said yesterday — and submit to independent audits of its procedures every two years for the next 20 years.

The settlement does not constitute an admission of wrongdoing.

"We think this is an important settlement," said Lydia B. Parnes, director of the Bureau of Consumer Protection at the F.T.C.

"The No. 1 point of this case is that companies that maintain sensitive personal information must employ reasonable safeguards," Ms. Parnes said. "That should be fundamental in this day and age."

Chris Jay Hoofnagle, senior counsel with the Electronic Privacy Information Center, a Washington-based digital rights group, who has testified before Congress on the issue of data security, was more optimistic. "Certainly, from our view we think it's an important settlement, and it makes it clear that companies have to take information security more seriously," Mr. Hoofnagle said, "but the commercial data broker problem isn't solved."

The F.T.C. ultimately said that records of more than 160,000 consumers were compromised in 2004 when con artists masquerading as legitimate businesses were granted access to ChoicePoint's vast troves of consumer information — including names, Social Security numbers, address histories and dates of birth.

The company's revelation generated what seemed an avalanche of subsequent disclosures at companies, universities, hospitals and other institutions that handle personal data.

It also shed a spotlight on a data-broker industry that until recently had gone largely unnoticed and unregulated.

In its complaint against ChoicePoint, the F.T.C. claimed that the company did not have "reasonable procedures" in place to screen would-be subscribers to its databases and that in this case, the applications for access made by the fake businesses should have raised "obvious red flags."

The company did not, for instance, raise questions when an apartment number or a commercial mail drop was given as a business address, or when cellphone numbers were provided as a "business's sole telephone number," according to the agency's complaint. Multiple applications from nominally different businesses arriving from the same commercial fax number also did not prevent the applications from the fake companies from being approved, the commission charged.

The sloppiness ultimately allowed the most highly regulated data that ChoicePoint holds — credit histories — to fall into the hands of the fraudulent businesses. That put the company in violation of the Fair Credit Reporting Act, which more typically governs the financial and consumer credit reporting industries, and opened it up to record-setting penalties.

"We certainly support the settlement, and we believe its provisions are the right things to do and in the spirit of the changes we've already been making over the last year," said James Lee, the chief marketing officer of ChoicePoint. "We also believe it's in the best interests of everyone to put this behind us."

The company has already drastically scaled back the roster of clients to whom the most highly confidential data are marketed and it has bolstered its scrutiny of prospective subscribers seeking access to personal consumer information. That includes sending ChoicePoint representatives to visit any new business subscriber wanting access above a certain level, Mr. Lee said, to verify that the "business" is not simply a fax machine at Kinko's.

"If it's going to involve any kind of sensitive personal information, you're going to get a site visit," Mr. Lee said.

Mr. Lee added that ChoicePoint has "a different view of the facts and the conclusions" arrived at by the Federal Trade Commission. "But at the end of the day that doesn't really matter," he said.

Asked where the company and the agency differed, he offered as an example the F.T.C.'s assertion in its announcement that at least 800 consumers had become victims of identity theft as a direct result of the ChoicePoint data breach. Mr. Lee said he was aware of only 16 confirmed cases.

Ms. Parnes of the commission said the $5 million for consumer compensation would be held in an account and distributed to people who can demonstrate real damages suffered as a result of the ChoicePoint breach.

She expected that more than 16 would qualify.

Senator Charles E. Schumer, a Democrat from New York, who, along with Senator Bill Nelson, a Democrat from Florida, introduced one of the most comprehensive data security bills last year, thought the settlement was not punitive enough.

"While ChoicePoint has made efforts to atone for its wrongdoing, a light penalty like this says to other wrongdoers that acts like this are just the cost of doing business," Mr. Schumer said, "and we can't tolerate that kind of attitude."

SIU Fellowships May Be Changed (CHIT)

By Jodi S. Cohen, Tribune Higher Education Reporter. Tribune Staff Reporter Rudolph Bush Contributed To This Report

Chicago Tribune, January 27, 2006

Facing pressure from the U.S. Justice Department, Southern Illinois University officials are considering changes to three minority and female fellowships that the government has charged discriminate against white and male graduate students.

University administrators discussed the possible changes, proposed by the government last week, with student and faculty leaders at closed-door meetings Wednesday.

Though negotiations are continuing, a university Web site already says that the fellowships have been "extensively revised" and are open to a broader group of students. University officials said the Web site changes weren't authorized.

The board of trustees will likely decide whether to accept the government's proposals within the next few weeks, a move that would delay a threatened lawsuit.

"The board will soon be arriving at a decision based on these meetings and feedback as well as advice and direction from the general counsel," said David Gross, SIU's executive assistant for government, media and external affairs.

The possible changes would not affect students already in the programs but could make all students eligible for the fellowships, which have historically been offered only to racial minorities and women.

In a Nov. 4 letter to the university, the Justice Department threatened to sue the university if the programs weren't changed within a week. A lawsuit has not been filed, and the two sides instead have been negotiating a settlement.

DOJ_NMG_0012414

The government has charged that the three graduate student fellowships, which include stipends to work in academic departments, violate Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. The act bars employment discrimination based on race, religion, sex or national origin.

"The department is currently in settlement negotiations with the university, and we hope to resolve our differences without resorting to contested litigation," said Justice Department spokesman Eric Holland.

The lawsuit threat came more than two years after the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that universities can consider race in college admissions, but only among other factors. The court didn't specifically address whether race could be considered in scholarships and fellowships, many college officials around the country decided to remove restrictions on programs previously reserved for African-American, Latino and other minority students.

At SIU, the three contested fellowships are being challenged under federal employment law because they include money for graduate students to work in academic departments.

One of the programs, the Bridge to the Doctorate Fellowship, funded by the National Science Foundation, rotates among universities and will not be offered at SIU next year, Gross said.

The Proactive Recruitment of Minority Professionals for Tomorrow fellowship, or PROMPT, had been intended to "increase the number of minorities receiving advanced degrees" in areas of study they haven't historically pursued, according to a description of the program. The Graduate Dean's Fellowship has traditionally been for women and other underrepresented students.

Since 2000, 78 PROMPT fellowships and 27 Graduate Dean's fellowships have been awarded, Gross said. No white men have participated, according to the Justice Department.

But a university Web site about the fellowships, revised in recent days, said that they "are now open to individuals whose personal or family background, life, cultural, and/or ethnic experiences could contribute to a more reflective responsive environment."

The Web site also said the application deadline had been extended to Feb. 17 to "allow interested students to apply under the new guidelines."

"The Web site change was not authorized. We believe an administrator may have made an assumption," Gross said. "The language on the Web site does not reflect the proposal from the Justice Department."

Several people who attended Wednesday's meetings said they were told not to talk about the possible changes.

"It is disappointing to me that I am not allowed to talk about something that is so important," said professor Robert Benford, the Faculty Senate president. "It is ironic to invite heads of constituencies and tell them they can't talk about it with anybody."

SIU Shows Minority Fellowship Plan To Faculty (CHIST)

By DAVE NEWBART, Staff Reporter

Chicago Sun-Times, January 26, 2006

Officials at Southern Illinois University presented a proposed consent decree to faculty and student leaders Wednesday, seeking to ward off a proposed federal lawsuit that would charge the school with discriminating against whites and others.

Officials would not say just what was being proposed in the consent decree, which came after two months of negotiations with the U.S. Justice Department. The department had threatened to sue the school on grounds that three of its minority fellowship programs discriminated against whites, males and non-preferred minorities.

However, changes in the descriptions of those fellowships had been removed from the school's Web site Wednesday.

The changes omitted any reference to "minorities" in describing who could apply for the fellowships. The site noted that applications to two of the fellowships "have been extensively revised."

But Wednesday, the Web site reverted back to the original language describing the programs.

SIU spokesman David Gross said the school's lawyers recommended the site be changed back until negotiations had concluded.

The school's meetings Wednesday with faculty and student leaders were "positive and informative," Gross said.

"The general consensus is a negotiated settlement would be in the best interest of the university," Gross said.

A 'reasonable compromise'

Robert Benford, president of the faculty senate and a fellowship supporter, met with the administration Wednesday but said he could not discuss them because they were confidential. Earlier, Benford had said the new descriptions were a "reasonable compromise."

Professor Jonathan Bean, a critic of the programs, also liked the language that was temporarily online. "That is the type of language that I and others recommended two and a half years ago," he said.

AP, January 27, 2006

(AP) - CLEVELAND-Two men accused of putting poisonous mercury on an interracial couple's porch have been charged with a hate crime, according to a media report.

Joseph Kuzlik, 56, and David Fredericy, 49, were each charged with conspiracy to violate civil rights, making false statements and criminal interference with housing rights. Both men pleaded innocent Wednesday in U.S. District Court in Cleveland, The Plain Dealer newspaper reported.

"Allegations of hate crime strike at the heart of our community and cannot be tolerated," Greg White, the U.S. attorney in Cleveland, said, according to the report.

Lawyers for Kuzlik and Fredericy, who are white, declined comment, the paper said.

Kuzlik is accused of acting as a lookout in February while Fredericy put an undisclosed amount of mercury on and around the porch of the unidentified couple's home in Cleveland's Slavic Village neighborhood, where the men also live.

The men are accused of lying when they told Environmental Protection Agency employees who cleaned up the mercury that they did not know how the mercury got on their neighbors' porch.

Mercury can damage the nervous system if swallowed or inhaled in large doses.

Male Student Sees Gender Bias In School (WT)

By Cheryl Wetzstein

Female high school students are treated more leniently and are less likely to be punished than their male peers, a 17-year-old Massachusetts senior says in a federal complaint about gender bias at his school.

"The system is designed to the disadvantage of males," Doug Anglin, a student at Milton High School in Milton, Mass., told the Boston Globe this week. "From the elementary level, they establish a philosophy that if you sit down, follow orders and listen to what they say, you'll do well and get good grades. Men naturally rebel against this."

Gerald Anglin, Doug's father and a Boston lawyer, helped write the complaint, which was filed last month with the Department of Education's Office for Civil Rights.

The complaint cites "statistical anomalies" in males' grades and standardized testing performance, as well as "a generalized perception" that male and female students are treated differently by the mostly white, female teaching staff, Gerald Anglin said yesterday.

"There's been a request that the Department of Education use its expertise to suggest some remedies ... to correct the situation," he said.

The complaint recommends "altering the work force," "injecting flexibility" into course selections, using "pass-fail" grading and correcting negative impressions of male students.

Milton school officials disputed claims that girls are treated more leniently than boys but said they would revisit the issue and reinstitute a mentoring program for lagging students.

A Department of Education spokesman said the agency received the complaint but had no further comment.

This month, The Washington Times examined the issue of male "academic underachievers."

"Boys are suffering," Harvard Medical School psychologist and author William Pollack told The Times. "They are sitting in classrooms where they can't perform at the same level as girls and so cannot compete with girls," he said. "The bottom line is that they are suffering both academically and emotionally."

Studies show that boys receive most of the "D" and "F" grades, create 80 percent of classroom discipline problems, account for 80 percent of high school dropouts and make up less than 44 percent of the college population.

Suggested solutions include making classrooms smaller and more action-oriented, and teaching boys and girls separately.

About 200 public schools already offer single-sex classrooms and this week, officials at an Arkansas high school said they will start teaching ninth-grade core subjects in single-sex classrooms this fall.

If boys and girls are taught in separate rooms, a lot of the distractions are eliminated, Renee Parker, assistant principal of Hope High School, told a Little Rock television station.

Sniper punished

The Army has cleared a sniper in Iraq of violating operational security rules in helping to educate a judge advocate general (military lawyer) about the legality of open-tip bullets used by snipers to shoot insurgents who are killing American and allied troops.

However, the sniper, Sgt. Arthur J. Hushen, is continuing to face retaliation for blowing the whistle on an improper order for snipers to stop using the highly-effective M118LR ammunition in Iraq because it was thought to be an illegal hollow-point bullet. He was recently forced to move to a tent for "outcasts," said his wife, Sherry.

Sgt. Hushen recounted in a statement how he challenged the 4th Infantry Division lawyer, a woman identified only as "Maj. Card," after he obtained information from an Internet sniper forum showing that the bullets had been judged legal for use for years.

"Maj. Card stated that the hollow-point ammo was illegal," Sgt. Hushen wrote. "I informed her that there was a memo put out ... several years ago stating that hollow-tip had been deemed legal."

Maj. Card replied that she had never heard of the memo, but after documentation was presented to her, she reversed course.

"Maj. Card informed me that I was not a lawyer and she did not work for me," Sgt. Hushen said, noting that the lawyer then agreed that in her legal opinion the M118LR was legal and said she would send out an e-mail to the executive officers.

It was after the exchange that Sgt. Hushen was accused of violating security rules for identifying his 4th Infantry Division unit on the Internet. However, he was cleared of that accusation after his statement.

But he is continuing to be punished by senior enlisted and officers for raising the legal issues, we are told.

"I needed the ammo to accomplish my sniper missions," he said. "I didn't quit when I was told the ammo was illegal because I knew it was not."

Sgt. Hushen said he was punished by his platoon leader by being relieved from his sniper duties and removed as a team leader.

"I no longer have anyone to lead and train. I believe that this is the worst punishment that could have happened," he said.

Forced out

What to do with the pathfinding Office of Force Transformation within the office of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld? Defense officials have several ideas. A few want to abolish it. Others propose taking away its stand-alone status and making it an arm of the undersecretary of defense for acquisition or for policy.

The reason: A culture of transformation has taken hold in the Pentagon since the office's birth in October 2001. And, a merged office would free up some of its 18 employees to work elsewhere. "We have a billet cap at the Pentagon," said a senior official. "We are always looking for more billets."

The office has issued a number of futuristic reports on how the military can adjust to new threats. Retired Vice Adm. Arthur K. Cebrowski, the founding director of Force Transformation, died in November of cancer. The acting director is Terry J. Pudas.

Back in vogue

Army Gen. George Casey, the top U.S. commander in Iraq, stopped using the word "substantial" to describe future troop withdrawals. He had used it last year but quit this fall, he said, after he had doubts that Sunnis would join the new government in the right numbers.

Well, the word is back in vogue, principally because the Sunni Muslims won 51 assembly seats in the Dec. 15 elections. As a community, the Sunnis seem more willing to try democracy. Army Gen. John Abizaid, the top commander in the region, told radio host Laura Ingraham on Wednesday that "substantial" troop reduction could occur later this year if the military and political winds blow the right way.

Dirty language

The U.S. Navy-Marine Corps Court of Criminal Appeals has ordered a delay in the court-martial of a Naval Academy teacher who used salty language in front of a female midshipman.

The trial at the Washington Navy Yard had been scheduled to begin next week for Lt. Bryan D. Black. But his attorney, Charles Gittins, filed an appeal after the trial judge rejected his argument that the school's superintendent, Vice Adm. Rodney P. Rempt, should be removed as the officer overseeing the case.

Mr. Gittins says Adm. Rempt has too much of a stake in seeing Lt. Black punished. He says a new admiral should be named as the convening authority.

The appeals court will entertain written arguments from the defense and prosecution, and then likely hand down a ruling next month.

Lt. Black acknowledges making a crude remark about how a battleship sexually arouses him, during an oceanographic cruise in the Chesapeake Bay in August. He later apologized to the female student present. She did not file a complaint or request an investigation. But a female lieutenant commander onboard did her own investigation and reported the incident to the school's administration, which ordered a one-person investigation.

Democrats In 2 Southern States Push Bills On Bible Study (NYT)

By David D. Kirkpatrick

WASHINGTON, Jan. 26 — Democrats in Georgia and Alabama, borrowing an idea usually advanced by conservative Republicans, are promoting Bible classes in the public schools. Their Republican opponents are in turn denouncing them as "pharisees," a favorite term of liberals for politicians who exploit religion.

Democrats in both states have introduced bills authorizing school districts to teach courses modeled after a new textbook, "The Bible and Its Influence." It was produced by the nonpartisan, ecumenical Bible Literacy Project and provides an assessment of the Bible's impact on history, literature and art that is academic and detached, if largely laudatory.

The Democrats who introduced the bills said they hoped to compete with Republicans for conservative Christian voters. "Rather than sitting back on our heels and then being knocked in our face, we are going to respond in a thoughtful way," said Kasim Reed, a Georgia state senator from Atlanta and one of the sponsors of the bill. "We are not going to give away the South anymore because we are unwilling to talk about our faith."

In Georgia, the proposal marked a new course for the Democratic Party. The state's Democrats, including some sponsors of the bill, opposed a Republican proposal a few years ago to authorize the teaching of a different Bible course, which used a translation of the Scriptures as its text, calling it an inappropriate endorsement of religion. The sponsors say they are introducing their Bible measure now partly to pre-empt a potential Republican proposal seeking to display the Ten Commandments in schools.

In Alabama, a deeply religious state where Democrats support prayer in the schools and a Democratic candidate for governor recently introduced her campaign with the hymn "Give Me That Old Time Religion," the Bible class bills reflect Democrats' efforts to distance themselves from the national party.

"We have always had to somewhat defend ourselves from the national Democratic Party's secular image, and this is part of that," said Ken Guin, a representative from Carbon Hill, leader of the Democratic majority in the State House and a sponsor of the measure.

Democrats in other states are moving in the same direction, jumping into a conversation about religion and values that some party leaders began after the 2004 election, when President Bush and the Republicans rode those themes to victory.

In Indiana, Democratic legislators are among the leaders of a bipartisan effort to preserve the recitation of specifically Christian prayers in the Statehouse. In Virginia, Gov. Timothy M. Kaine relied heavily on religious themes and advertised on evangelical radio stations to win election last fall; Democratic Party leaders have called his campaign a national model.

In an interview, Howard Dean, chairman of the Democratic National Committee, promised that Democrats would do a better job talking about values to religious voters. "We have done it in a secular way, and we don't have to," he said, adding, "I think teaching the Bible as literature is a good thing."

Christian conservatives, however, say they have been pushing public schools to offer courses on the Bible for decades, and Republicans in both Alabama and Georgia say some schools already offer such electives.

"Their proposal makes them modern-day pharisees," State Senator Eric Johnson of Georgia, the Republican leader from Savannah, said in a statement. "This is election-year pandering using voters' deepest beliefs as a tool."

Saying he found "a little irony" in the fact that the Democratic sponsors had voted against a Republican proposal for a Bible course six years ago, Mr. Johnson added, "It should also be noted that the so-called Bible bill doesn't use the Bible as the textbook, and would allow teachers with no belief at all in the Bible to teach the course."

Betty Peters, a Republican on the Alabama school board who opposed the initiative in that state, also dismissed the initiative as "pandering." Democrats, she argued, had adopted a new strategy: "Let's just wrap ourselves in Jesus."

For the last dozen years, most efforts to promote teaching the Bible in public schools have come from the National Council on Bible Curriculum in Public Schools, a conservative Christian group based in Greensboro, N.C., that advocates using the Bible as the primary textbook. The group says about 320 school districts in 37 states offer its curriculum.

But its curriculum often draws attacks from civil liberties groups. Democratic sponsors of the Bible class bills say their efforts would help shield local school districts from First Amendment lawsuits, in part by recommending a more neutral approach.

The textbook they endorse was the brainchild of Chuck Stetson, a New York investment manager and theologically conservative Episcopalian who says he was concerned about public ignorance of the Bible.

Mr. Stetson helped produce "The Bible and Its Influence" as the centerpiece of a course that seeks to teach about the Bible and its legacy without endorsing or offending any specific faith.

The textbook came to the attention of Democratic legislators in Alabama and Georgia through the advocacy of R. Randolph Brinson, a Republican and founder of the evangelical voter-registration group Redeem the Vote.

Mr. Brinson, who said he was working with legislators in other states as well, described his pitch to Democrats as, "Introducing this bill will show the evangelical world that they are not hostile to faith."

Some liberals are unhappy, however. Barry W. Lynn, executive director of Americans United for Separation of Church and State, argued that "The Bible and Its Influence" was "problematic" because it omitted "the bad and the ugly uses of the Bible," like the invocation of Scripture to justify racial segregation.

Conservative Christian groups have been skeptical, too. "This appears to be a calculated effort by the Democrats to try to out-conservative the conservatives," said Stephen M. Crampton, a lawyer for the American Family Association, a conservative Christian group that supports the National Council on Bible Curriculum in Public Schools.

"To mention any curriculum by name is suggestive of some back-room deal cut with the publishers," Mr. Crampton said.

For his part, Mr. Stetson, founder of the group that produced the textbook, said a political fight was not what he wanted. "We are the first English-speaking generation to have lost the biblical story," he said, lamenting that studying the Bible had become "a political football."

ANTITRUST:

AMC Closes Acquisition Of Loews Cineplex (AP)

By David Twiddy, AP Business Writer

AP, January 27, 2006

KANSAS CITY, Mo. (AP) -- AMC Entertainment Inc. on Thursday said it had completed its purchase of Loews Cineplex Entertainment Corp., strengthening its position as the nation's second-largest theater operator.

The Kansas City-based company now will operate 415 theaters with 5,672 screens in 29 states and the District of Columbia and 11 foreign countries. Annual revenues for the privately held company are expected to be around $2.4 billion.

Financial terms for the deal were not released.

"What I'm most excited about is the potential to continue the innovation and lead our industry the way both of these companies have been doing," said Peter Brown, AMC's chairman and chief executive officer, who will remain head of the company. "I think the innovation potential and the growth potential are enormous."

Travis Reid, Loews' president and CEO, will serve as a board member for AMC's parent company, Marquee Holdings Inc.

In an interview, Brown said he didn't foresee the company changing the overall number of theaters, although he said it will continue to replace older theaters with newer, stadium-style ones. He also didn't predict any changes to its worldwide work force of 24,000.

AMC and Loews agreed last year to sell 10 theaters with 120 screens to resolve consolidation concerns by the Justice Department and attorneys general in California, Illinois, Massachusetts, New York, Washington state and the District of Columbia. The theaters are in Chicago, New York City, Boston, San Francisco, Seattle, Dallas and Washington, D.C.

Combined, they still remain behind Knoxville, Tenn.-based Regal Entertainment Group, which controls 6,605 screens at 579 theaters in 40 states.

Bear Stearns analyst Glen Reid said he doubted the combination will have much of an impact on the industry, as most consumers go to the theaters closest to them and aren't loyal to a brand.

"It gives those two companies the opportunity for overhead synergies," Reid said. "It remains to be seen whether greater concentration of theaters leads to more bargaining power with the studios, such as better rental terms for films."

The combination follows a year in which U.S. ticket sales were at the lowest level since 1997, a problem the industry blamed on bad films as well as stiff competition for consumers' entertainment dollars.

It also comes a day before the debut of "Bubble," a film by award-winning director Steven Soderbergh, that has many in Hollywood predicting it could change the marketing and distribution of movies. "Bubble" is being released on the same day both in a limited number of theaters and on pay-per-view television. The DVD is being released Tuesday.

AMC is among the major theater circuits not carrying the film, and Brown said moviegoers should be concerned if other movies follow suit.

"I think at the end of the day what would happen with that economic model is that the quality would be lowered when we're living with each picture being a direct-to-video picture," he said. "We just don't think that's a good thing to happen at all."

Media companies, however, have defended the so-called "day and date" release strategy as a way to serve consumers becoming more accustomed to getting content immediately, as shown by the popularity of iTunes and cell phone companies selling snippets of television shows for portable devices.

AMC and Loews discussed merger plans in the past, calling off discussions in January 2004, just before a group of private investors purchased the publicly traded AMC for about $2 billion. Bain Capital, Carlyle Group and Spectrum Equity Investors also acquired Loews Cineplex from Onex Corp. and Oaktree Capital Management for $1.5 billion in 2004.

EU: Microsoft May Still Face Fine Threat (AP)

By Paul Ames, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 27, 2006

BRUSSELS, Belgium (AP) -- Microsoft Corp.'s new offer to let competitors examine some of the blueprints to its Windows operating system may not end the threat of daily $2.36 million fines in the European Union's antitrust case, an EU spokesman said Thursday.

"It would be premature to conclude that offering access to source codes would necessarily resolve the problem of compliance," said EU antitrust spokesman Jonathan Todd.

"So far all we have received is the press release," he said.

Responding to a 2004 EU antitrust ruling, Microsoft in December offered rivals thousands of pages of documentation and free technical support to help competitors make their software compatible with Windows-based servers, which power Web sites and other Internet services.

But an independent monitor called the documents "totally unfit." The European Commission then threatened to fine Microsoft up to $2.36 million a day, retroactive to Dec. 15, saying the software giant was proving intransigent about sharing data with competitors.

Microsoft, which has until Feb. 15 to make a formal response, insisted Wednesday it was in compliance but said it was licensing the Windows source code as well to remove any lingering doubts. The company likened the move to now offering the cake rather than simply the recipe for it.

Microsoft said Thursday it was pleased that the EU Commission will consider the new offer.

"We have made every change the Commission has asked us to make to the technical documentation, and we are prepared to do more if they request it," Horacio Gutierrez, associate general counsel, Microsoft Europe, said in a statement. "Yesterday's announcement underscores Microsoft's commitment to meeting the Commission's demands."

Nonetheless, Todd said the source code alone may not do the trick.

"It's the quality and not the quantity that counts," Todd said in a phone interview. "You can give half-a-million pages, but if it's not the right information for competitors to be able to make compatible work group server products then it doesn't resolve the compliance issue."

In March 2004, the EU levied a record $613 million fine against Microsoft. It also ordered the company to share code with rivals and offer a version of Windows without the Media Player software for what the court saw as an abuse of the company's dominant position in the industry.

Microsoft is appealing the ruling and the case will be heard in late April by the European Court of First Instance, the EU's second-highest court.

Microsoft already has launched a number of efforts to give governments and certain private groups access to some source code. Wednesday's announcement extends this for the first time to more than 20 companies who currently license Microsoft software protocols under an EU program.

Microsoft will now share what it says is a "pretty significant" chunk of its Windows workgroup server operating system and desktop software code governing communications between servers. Smith said there were no plans to publish every line of the entire Windows source code.

By Don Thompson, ASSOCIATED PRESS

AP, January 27, 2006

SACRAMENTO – Three environmental activists pleaded not guilty Thursday to conspiring to attack government targets on behalf of an extremist group, and bail was set for one of the suspects.

Eric McDavid, 28, of Foresthill, Calif., Zachary Jensen, 20, of Monroe, Wash., and Lauren Weiner, 20, of Philadelphia, were indicted Wednesday by a federal grand jury. They face five to 20 years in federal prison if they are convicted of conspiring to use fire or explosives to damage property.

Prosecutors say they scouted targets and were buying materials to build homemade plastic explosives when they were arrested Jan. 13 outside a Kmart in Auburn, east of Sacramento.

On behalf of the shadowy Earth Liberation Front they allegedly planned to attack the Nimbus Dam and nearby fish hatchery on the American River near Sacramento, and the U.S. Forest Service's Institute of Forest Genetics in Placerville, in the foothills east of Sacramento.

All three denied the allegations at their arraignment Thursday. A status hearing was scheduled for Feb. 14 before U.S. District Judge Morrison C. England.

Prosecutors said all three should be held as flight risks and dangers to the community. U.S. Magistrate Judge Gregory Hollows ordered McDavid and Jensen held in Sacramento County Jail without bond.

But he ruled that Weiner can be released on $1.2 million bail, secured mostly by property her parents own in New York state.

Hollows noted that the government has audio and video surveillance, notes, an anarchists' cookbook seized from the suspects, and the account of a paid FBI informant who lived with the group in a cabin rented and wired by the FBI.

"While this group of defendants may not have possessed a polished expertise in explosives and their use in blowing up targets, there is no doubt from the evidence presented thus far that defendants were deadly serious in their intent to wreak destruction on some type of target which they believed would make a statement in favor of their anti-government, anti-corporate, allegedly pro-environment cause," Hollows wrote in his 12-page order.

But Hollows found little evidence supporting prosecutors' contention that the three were affiliated with either ELF or the similarly shadowy Animal Liberation Front, though he said they may have shared the same goals.

U.S. Attorney McGregor Scott on Wednesday said there is no known connection between the trio and 11 alleged ecoterrorists indicted in Oregon last week. The FBI says groups like ALF and ELF have claimed 1,200 criminal acts causing more than $100 million in damage in the last 15 years.

The three were visited in jail by members of a "support group" perhaps loosely affiliated with ELF, Hollows wrote, though he said there is no evidence the group would help the three flee if they were released.

Weiner was attending college in Philadelphia and had a clean record and close ties to her parents before she set off cross-country to join the other suspects in California after the Christmas holiday, Hollows said. He ruled she could live with her mother in Pound Ridge, N.Y., but restricted her movements and ordered her to attend school or perform community service while she awaits trial.

Eco-terrorist Suspects Plead Not Guilty (SACBEE)

By Denny Walsh, Bee Staff Writer

The Sacramento Bee, January 27, 2006

Three people alleged to be part of an eco-terrorism movement pleaded not guilty Thursday in Sacramento federal court to a charge of conspiring to damage and destroy property by fire and an explosive.

Eric Taylor McDavid, 28; Zachary O. Jenson, 20; and Lauren Weiner, 20, are accused in a one-count grand jury indictment of plotting to blow up a U. S. Forest Service genetics lab in Placerville, the Nimbus Dam and nearby fish hatchery in Rancho Cordova, and cellular telephone towers and electric power stations in unspecified locations.

While it is not in the indictment, other court papers filed by the government say the trio planned to publicly proclaim after the arson campaign that it was carried out in the name of the Earth Liberation Front, a movement advocating violent criminal acts against what its followers believe are symbols of the destruction and exploitation of the environment.

Also Thursday, U. S. Magistrate Judge Gregory G. Hollows ordered McDavid and Jenson held without bail. On the other hand, Hollows indicated a willingness to release Weiner on $1.2 million bail pending a decision by prosecutors on whether to appeal Weiner's release to U. S. District Judge Morrison C. England Jr.

By Chris Baltimore

Reuters, January 27, 2006

WASHINGTON (Reuters) - The U.S. government is pursuing charges against BP <BP.L> related to an explosion last year that killed 15 workers at its giant Texas refinery, sources familiar with the matter said on Thursday.

The case could result in civil or criminal charges against BP, and the company could face millions of dollars in fines, one source said.

The Environmental Protection Agency and Justice Department are pressing an enforcement case against BP related to the March 23 blast at the Texas City, Texas refinery, said the sources, who spoke on condition of anonymity.

The blast at the 460,000 barrel per day facility also injured 170 people and rattled buildings as far as five miles away.

An EPA spokeswoman referred queries to the Justice Department, where a spokeswoman declined to comment.

Ronnie Chappell, spokesman for London-based BP, declined to comment on any possible investigations.

"From the very beginning we have promised government agencies charged with investigating the tragedy at Texas City our full cooperation," Chappell said. "We are meeting that commitment and we will continue to deliver on it."

BP has said it will spend $1 billion (562 million pounds) over the next five years to improve and maintain the Texas City refinery, and it set aside $700 million to settle lawsuits related to the explosion.

An internal report released by BP late last year found that no one intentionally put workers at risk, but that some policies and procedures were not followed.

According to a BP report, the explosion was caused when a hydrocarbon vapour cloud released by an octane-enhancing unit being restarted at the refinery was ignited, possibly by an idling pick-up truck.

Last year the U.S. Department of Labour said it had asked the Justice Department to consider bringing criminal charges against BP.

A spokesman for the Labour Department, Alan Belsky, said the department did not know if the Justice Department was pursuing its request.

The Labour Department referral was the result of a U.S. Occupational Health and Safety Administration investigation into the explosion, which found more than 300 wilful violations of health and safety standards at the refinery.

Wilful violations are defined as those committed with an intentional disregard or indifference to OSHA regulations.

BP last year agreed to pay a fine of $21.3 million to OSHA.

West Virginia Governor Signs Mine Safety Bill (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

Filed at 5:31 p.m. ET

CHARLESTON, W.Va. (AP) -- Gov. Joe Manchin signed new mine safety rules into law Thursday, saying the requirements for better communications, underground oxygen supplies and faster emergency responses would help prevent tragedies like the two that killed 14 miners this month.

"We want to be the benchmark everyone looks to when they mine," Manchin said during the signing ceremony, attended by some of the miners' relatives. "The sacrifice you all have made will change mining in this country."

State lawmakers passed the legislation unanimously just days after a Jan. 19 mine fire killed two men, and about three weeks after an explosion at the Sago Mine across the state resulted in the deaths of 12 miners.

The only survivor among the trapped Sago miners, Randal McCloy Jr., 26, emerged from a light coma Wednesday but still cannot speak.

The state's new mine safety law mandates that miners be provided with emergency communicators and tracking devices. It also requires mine operators to store extra air supplies underground, and sets up a new Mine and Industrial Accident Rapid Response System and statewide all-hours hot line to trigger rescue efforts more quickly.

"It eases our hearts and our pain knowing that maybe this will help save other miners some day," said Delorice Bragg, whose husband died in the mine fire last week.

Federal and state investigators were expected to finally get into the Sago Mine late Thursday to start determining what sparked the explosion that led to the 12 deaths, most of them from carbon monoxide poisoning.

The investigation had been held up, first by the dangerous gases and then over a dispute between the United Mine Workers and the mine's owner involving the union's demand to accompany investigators. The company challenged the union's right to enter the non-union mine after the UMW would not disclose the names of the two miners it is representing. A federal judge ruled Thursday that the UMW could participate.

The Sago disaster and Manchin's calls for reform have spurred several coal mining states to re-examine their mine safety laws.

Kentucky legislators started drafting similar legislation to strengthen coal mine safety laws and expect to file them in the House and Senate by early next week.

In Tennessee, Gov. Phil Bredesen called for a review of state mining laws to see if changes are needed in that state's nine underground coal mines, saying: "Let's learn from these things, and not wait until they happen to us."

A bill pending in the Virginia General Assembly would require underground mines to have wireless communications available so miners could call for help in an emergency.

The new West Virginia law also addresses communications, requiring companies to install wireless systems to connect miners to the surface through a series of transponders and requiring tracking devices for miners. Most U.S. mines still rely on hard-wired communication systems. At Sago, rescuers were unable to communicate with the trapped miners because the system was damaged.

Industry officials have raised questions about the reliability of the technology, but they have said they will support the changes.

In addition to better communication, the new law requires extra air supplies are inside mines, and says miners would be directed to them by strobe lights, reflective signs and guide ropes. Some companies already provide extra air supplies, but in most cases, miners only carry canisters that provide up to an hour's worth of oxygen.

The law also threatens coal companies that fail to report an emergency within 15 minutes with $100,000 fines. At Sago, company officials placed the first calls to state and federal safety officials more than an hour after the explosion.

State mine officials must now write the rules necessary to carry out the new law. A deadline for coal companies to comply with its provisions has not yet been announced.

West Virginia's congressional delegation is also pushing for tougher federal mine safety regulations and demanding more aggressive enforcement.

New Rules Govern Use Of Data From Testing Pesticides On People (WP)

By Juliet Eilperin

The Washington Post, January 27, 2006

The Bush administration issued yesterday the first-ever federal rules governing the use of information collected in tests that expose human subjects to toxic pesticides.

The new regulations -- which drew praise from pesticide manufacturers and criticism from environmentalists and congressional Democrats -- would prohibit the intentional dosing of pregnant women and children with such poisons, and would establish an independent board to screen proposed studies.

"This rule provides far-reaching protections for all Americans and bans pesticide testing on pregnant women and children," said Susan B. Hazen, acting assistant administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency's Office of Prevention, Pesticides and Toxic Substances.

Officials have been struggling for close to a decade with how best to deal with data from tests that deliberately expose people to toxic chemicals.

Until President Bill Clinton imposed a moratorium in 1998, federal officials allowed manufacturers to conduct pesticide experiments on human beings on the grounds that such tests provided a clearer picture than animal experiments could of how pesticides might affect the environment and public health.

President Bush initially backed the moratorium, but his administration abandoned it in 2003 after a court ruling in favor of pesticide makers. The firms had argued that the government had not fully involved the public before banning the use of the information.

Erik D. Olson, a senior attorney at the advocacy group Natural Resources Defense Council, said the new rules may lead to more pesticide testing on people because they will allow manufacturers to conduct "observational tests" that monitor individuals' everyday exposure to toxic chemicals.

"We're going to have weaker public health protections, more pesticides on people's foods, and a huge increase in the number of unethical and unscientific studies using human beings as guinea pigs," Olson said.

But Jay Vroom, who represents major pesticide manufacturers as president of CropLife America, said the administration has ensured that "these studies, while limited in number, can be conducted safely at the highest ethical standards."

Nearly 50,000 Americans commented on the proposal over the past three months, most as part of an organized campaign opposing it.

In A Nimby World, Alaskans Woo Project To Their Backyard (WSJ)

By Russell Gold

The Wall Street Journal, January 27, 2006

ANCHORAGE, Alaska -- Jeff Lowenfels has dispensed weekly advice about gardening in Alaska on the radio and in a newspaper column he has written for 30 years. When asked what he can grow in the frigid soil, he always answers: "Iceberg lettuce, snow peas and snowball cauliflower."

For much of this time, he has also worked to put something else in the state's soil: a natural-gas pipeline.

The 56-year-old former energy lawyer is a behind-the-scenes guru to an increasingly committed crop of activists and politicians who are ticked off by the endless delays in Big Oil's plans for a multibillion-dollar pipeline. In recent weeks, Mr. Lowenfels's disciples have launched a ballot initiative, an antitrust lawsuit and television commercials -- all designed to push the oil companies and Gov. Frank Murkowski to speed up development of the North Slope's gigantic natural-gas reserves.

In many parts of the U.S., community leaders and local politicians are fighting to halt energy projects or at least put them in someone else's neighborhood. What's occurring in Alaska is the polar opposite. The majority of Alaskans are great enthusiasts of energy development.

The federal government estimates there may be 100 trillion cubic feet of gas in the North Slope, where Alaska meets the Beaufort Sea nearly 300 miles north of the Arctic Circle. That is enough to keep the U.S. in natural gas for nearly five years. But no gas is leaving the North Slope, even though natural gas prices in the last year have been higher than ever. Exxon Mobil Corp., BP PLC and ConocoPhillips, which have leased drilling rights in Alaska for decades, haven't been in a hurry to get that gas to market. They're currently negotiating to build a pipeline through Canada to the American Midwest but construction on that massive project isn't likely to start for years.

Meanwhile, Alaskans are running out of natural gas. Home-heating bills are rising and gas-intensive industry is shutting down. Instead of the longer pipeline being pondered by the giant oil companies, Mr. Lowenfels and others are pushing for the immediate construction of an 800-mile natural-gas pipeline to the Alaskan port of Valdez. A small portion of the gas would stay in Alaska and the rest would be liquefied and exported to either Asia or the West Coast.

Faced with a vigorous campaign to jump-start the pipeline, the oil companies are in the unusual position of counseling patience. Moving too quickly on their preferred $25 billion pipeline through Canada, one of the largest construction projects in the history of North America, would be disastrous, they say. Steve Marshall, president of BP's Alaska operations, says he is worried that if they act too quickly, the project will be poorly conceived, be prone to cost overruns and not deliver much economic benefit.

The pipeline spat has national implications. Prudhoe Bay and other nearby North Slope fields are collectively the largest deposit of oil and natural gas ever discovered in the U.S. Since 1977, crude oil from the field has flowed through an 800-mile pipeline to Valdez, where it is loaded onto tankers and delivered to West Coast refineries.

Prudhoe Bay's gas has a different fate. Since it can't be sent through the oil pipeline, the gas extracted along with oil is muscled back underground. In the middle of the Arctic tundra, about 8.4 billion cubic feet of natural gas a day passes through an eight-story building where jet engines jam it back into the reservoir through 32 wells. BP, the facility operator, says putting the gas back has yielded dividends: The reinjected gas has helped maintain reservoir pressure and allowed an additional three billion barrels of crude to be pulled from the field.

Mr. Lowenfels got bit by the gas bug soon after moving to Anchorage from Boston in 1975. He took a job as an assistant attorney general representing several state agencies involved in energy development. In 1981, he started working for the Yukon Pacific Corp. -- a company set up to build a gas pipeline to Valdez that has come to be such a big part of his professional life.

Over several years, with the backing of its parent company, CSX Corp., Yukon Pacific acquired most of the required permits for the pipeline. But Mr. Lowenfels says the energy companies refused to enter into a long-term contract to supply gas. That prompted Mr. Lowenfels to study why the companies wouldn't sell. His conclusion: They were delaying the Alaska pipeline to avoid competing with their own projects in Indonesia, Australia and the Middle East that were developing gas to send to the U.S. Unlike Alaska, where it can sit on the gas, Big Oil often has to extract gas expeditiously overseas or it loses its extraction rights.

The companies vigorously deny that they are warehousing the gas to keep overseas projects profitable. They say the pipeline into Canada is the only economically viable option for getting the gas out of Alaska and point out they have spent $ 125 million studying the route.

Mr. Lowenfels began holding "guerrilla sessions" beginning in the early 1990s in his downtown Anchorage office to spread the message that the oil companies were dragging their feet. Around a conference table piled high with permits and other documents, Mr. Lowenfels pitched Yukon Pacific's vision for a pipeline to Valdez. Eventually, the guest would ask some variant of the question: If it's such a good idea, why aren't the oil companies pursuing it? In a dramatic flourish, repeated hundreds of times, Mr. Lowenfels would pull back a curtain to reveal a map of the world with corporate logos marking where Exxon and BP have competing gas projects.

"We are sick and tired of having the oil companies control our destiny," he says.

Many of the Alaskans pressuring the state government and oil companies to build a gas pipeline through Alaska are graduates of these sessions. The two-hour session "changed my life," says William M. Walker, a former mayor of Valdez. Mr. Walker helped create the Alaska Gasline Port Authority. Last month, the authority filed an antitrust lawsuit in federal court in Fairbanks against Exxon and BP for conspiring to withhold gas from U.S. markets and effectively warehousing Alaska's vast gas reserves. The oil companies call the suit without merit, saying they plan to contest it vigorously.

Lori Backes, a former Republican political aide, also says her outlook changed after attending one of Mr. Lowenfels's sessions. "When you see you are in competition with the very people who are supposed to be on your side...you begin to look at things very differently," she says. Now Ms. Backes heads an advocacy group of labor and environmental groups favoring an "all-Alaska" pipeline. Her group is running TV ads mocking Big Oil's proposed pipeline as something good for beer-swilling Canadians, but not for Alaskans.

Eric Croft, another Lowenfels convert, is leading a ballot initiative, widely expected to pass in November , to tax the oil companies $1 billion a year until they develop the gas deposits.

Meanwhile, the oil companies say they are proceeding with plans for the Canadian route. ConocoPhillips reached an agreement on financial terms with the state of Alaska on such a pipeline in October, but BP and Exxon are still negotiating. A state spokesman said he is hopeful talks will be concluded in the spring, but several key issues remain unresolved.

Even if a contract is signed, lawsuits and fighting over the financial terms of the deal as well as the Canadian portion of the pipeline could continue for years, keeping Mr. Lowenfels and his seminar graduates busy. Until then, Mr. Lowenfels, a convert to organic gardening, plans to spend some time tending to his two-story greenhouse at his home overlooking the Cook Inlet near Anchorage. He is planting artichokes this week.

E-Waste@Large (NYT)

By Elizabeth Royte

The New York Times, January 27, 2006

LAST week, Maine became the first state to require manufacturers of computer monitors and televisions to pay for their recycling and disposal. Washington, with a pending bill, may be next. That's progress, right?

Computer recycling sounds like an unmitigated good: it keeps hazardous components out of incinerators and landfills, which researchers at Carnegie Mellon University estimate already hold more than 60 million computers. And by reusing glass, plastic, aluminum and heavy metals (like lead, copper and mercury), recycling averts the energy use and pollution linked with mining and drilling for new materials.

But because recycling in the United States is expensive, hazardous and encumbered with environmental and safety regulations, many companies that collect e-waste simply ship it to underdeveloped nations. According to the Silicon Valley Toxics Coalition and the Basel Action Network, up to 80 percent of the material dropped off by well-meaning Americans at community recycling events ends up bundled for export.

Most of the stuff that goes overseas can't or won't be fixed and sold. Computer dealers in Lagos, Nigeria, for example, complain that up to 75 percent of the 400,000 units they receive each month from recyclers are junk. A 2002 documentary showed Chinese workers, including children, using hammers and chisels to pry copper and aluminum from computers, burning PVC-coated wires to get at copper and swirling acids in buckets to extract gold.

After stripping what they can, workers dump the computer carcasses and waste sludge in nearby fields or streams. Soil and water tests in the e-waste processing town of Guiyu, China, for instance, revealed levels of chromium, tin and barium hundreds of times higher than allowable in the United States.

It's easy to find American companies that call themselves computer recyclers, but it's hard to trace what they actually do. The government doesn't regulate these businesses, and the Environmental Protection Agency has no certification process for recyclers. There are dozens of e-waste bills being considered across the country, including one in New York City. Five states and 15 counties ban computer and television monitors from landfills. California, Maine, Maryland and Massachusetts have e-waste recycling programs in place, all financed by different mechanisms.

Even the electronics industry doesn't like this patchwork approach, but so far, no one has come up with anything better. Four e-waste bills are floating around the House and Senate: the biggest difference between them is whether consumers or manufacturers would pay for the programs. A strong argument holds that when producers must manage their own discards, they have a strong incentive to design equipment that's nontoxic and easy to recycle.

The sooner Congress gets it together, the better. Electronic waste is now considered the fastest-growing segment of the municipal waste stream in the United States. The National Safety Council estimated in 2004 that by 2009, 250 million computers will have become obsolete. As awareness of the hazards of e-waste rises, more states will ban it from landfills. But keeping toxic trash from our dumps won't mean a thing if we don't forbid the export of hazardous material to countries without enforceable environmental regulations.

To halt this environmental injustice, in which we're all complicit, the federal government needs to restrict the use of hazardous materials in computers, require manufacturers to put in place recycling programs (it will be a lot cheaper and safer to recycle this stuff once the toxics are out) and ban hazardous waste exports. That may sound like a tall order, but that's no reason not to proceed: the European Union has already passed every one of these laws.

Two Tons Of Pot Found In Border Tunnel (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

SAN DIEGO (AP) -- Authorities said they discovered more than two tons of marijuana in a cross-border tunnel that began near the Tijuana airport and ended inside a warehouse on the U.S. side.

The 2,400-foot long passageway is longer than most of the 21 cross-border tunnels that have been discovered since authorities began keeping track after the Sept. 11 attacks, U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement officials said.

"It was like being in a cavern or a cave," said Michael Unzueta, customs special agent in charge in San Diego.

John Fernandes, special agent in charge of the Drug Enforcement Administration's San Diego office, said he suspected the tunnel was the work of Tijuana's Arellano-Felix drug smuggling syndicate or another well-known drug cartel. He said tougher enforcement aboveground had forced smugglers to dig below.

The tunnel's discovery prompted the U.S. Attorney's office in San Diego to open a criminal investigation, said Lauren Mack, a spokeswoman for U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement.

The tunnel exited into a large, two-story white cinderblock warehouse in an industrial San Diego neighborhood near the border.

A green sign over the door said V&F Distributors LLC. County records listed the building's owner as Helen Park of Long Beach. The phone rang unanswered Thursday at her home.

Mexican authorities found the entrance about 100 yards south of the border on Tuesday, and officers on the U.S. side found the exit Wednesday. Mexican officials allowed reporters and photographers, including an Associated Press photographer, into the tunnel late Wednesday.

The tunnel was about five feet wide and high enough for an adult to stand inside, had a cement floor, and lights mounted on one of the hard soil walls. It was equipped with a pulley system on the Mexican side.

Four tunnels have been discovered this month in the Tijuana-San Diego area, including more primitive tunnel that was also found Wednesday when a U.S. Border Patrol vehicle struck a sinkhole.

Agents Studying Massive US - Mexico Tunnel (NYT/REU)

By Reuters

The New York Times, January 26, 2006

LOS ANGELES (Reuters) - Federal authorities were trying to determine on Thursday what was smuggled through a sophisticated tunnel into the United States from Mexico they call one of the longest ever found.

``Whether the tunnel was used for smuggling aliens, smuggling narcotics or a worst case scenario, some sort of weapon, we don't know," Michael Unzueta, special agent in charge of Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) in San Diego, said at a news conference.

Federal authorities, who uncovered the 2,400-foot (731 meter) tunnel on Wednesday, brought in a forensic team to look for fingerprints and DNA, and to sample the air and walls, so they can determine how long the tunnel has been in use and what it was used for, Unzueta said.

The tunnel has cement walls and supporting planks, is no less than five feet (1.2 meter) tall and wide, and runs as far as 60 feet underground, Unzueta said. It has lighting and ventilation, and a pumping system to drain groundwater.

The U.S. entrance has a cement ramp with a washboard pattern for better footing. ``We believe this tunnel is, in fact, the largest tunnel ever found on the Southwest border," he said.

The passageway links a warehouse in Otay Mesa, California, with a warehouse near Tijuana international airport in Mexico, officials said.

The U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA) found 200 pounds (90 kg) of marijuana on the U.S. side, while Mexican authorities said they discovered 2 tons of the drug on that side of the border.

Because of the sophistication of the tunnel, the DEA is investigating major drug cartels.

``We know it's been used for drug traffic but this really illustrates the dangers and risks of security to Americans," said John Fernandez, special agent at the DEA in San Diego.

The tunnel was the forth underground passage found between Tijuana and the San Diego region in two weeks, but far surpasses the other three, and most of the tunnels ever found, in size, Unzueta said. Most tunnels are little more than crawl spaces.

Two Tons Of Pot Found Inside Mexico-U.S. Border Tunnel (SDUT)

By Onell R. Soto And Leslie Berestein

The San Diego Union-Tribune, January 26, 2006

Investigators discovered a sophisticated cross-border tunnel yesterday extending about a half-mile and found about 2 tons of marijuana on the Mexican end.

The tunnel begins about 85 feet below a small warehouse about 175 yards south of the U.S. border. The other end is in an apparently vacant industrial building in Otay Mesa.

Late last night, authorities were still pulling marijuana out of the tunnel, which is outfitted with electricity and a ventilation system. The building is in an industrial neighborhood near Tijuana's airport.

The concrete-lined shaft is 6 feet by 12 feet with a metal ladder that leads to the packed-earth tunnel, which is tall enough for a person to stand in.

A gurney hanging from a pulley system attached to one of the building's beams allowed items to be moved into and out of the tunnel. Two trucks and a van were parked inside the warehouse.

Authorities said the elaborate tunnel bore the hallmarks of Mexican drug cartels, which have spent millions of dollars in the last 15 years to find a way to move contraband across the border.

When Mexican officials allowed the media into the small warehouse shortly before 9 p.m., reporters saw about 300 bundles of marijuana stacked more than 5 feet high.

In the United States, the warehouse where the tunnel ended – north of Siempre Viva Road – was surrounded by law enforcement agents last night.

Authorities did not estimate how long the tunnel might have been in use or provide information about who might own the properties where the tunnel's entrance and exit were found.

In Tijuana, after spending most of yesterday waiting for a search warrant from Mexico City, dozens of Mexican police and federal agents swarmed around the metal building and surrounding truck yard late in the afternoon.

While Mexican agents awaited approval for a thorough search of the shaft, their U.S. counterparts resumed digging with heavy equipment in an area between two border fences.

That digging stopped about 4:15 p.m. when word came back that Mexican agents had found the tunnel at the bottom of the shaft.

"We have a tunnel and it's massive," said Lauren Mack, a spokeswoman with U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, which was investigating the tunnel with agents from the Border Patrol and the Drug Enforcement Administration.

The U.S. Attorney's Office in San Diego and Mexican federal, state and local officials are also part of the investigation.

Based on tips, U.S. officials began investigating the possibility of a tunnel in the area in 2004.

The investigation included searches using high-tech equipment capable of providing rough images of objects underground.

California National Guard troops who work with the Border Patrol began digging Tuesday morning with a bulldozer and a backhoe.

In Tijuana, Mexican military trucks rolled in and out of the yard yesterday.

At a billboard-making business next door, worker José Javier Ramirez Velasquez, 24, said the large shed "appeared abandoned."

DOJ_NMG_0012429

Since moving from Guadalajara two months ago, he has been staying on a trailer nearby and said he had heard no noise or any digging.

"It caught me by surprise learning there was a narcotunnel here," he said. Meanwhile, several miles away yesterday morning, a U.S. Border Patrol agent found another tunnel a short distance west of the San Ysidro border crossing.

This tunnel, far from sophisticated, is the kind that agents call a "gopher hole." It was dug in an area just south of the fence in Mexico and extended about 30 feet in the United States, officials from Immigration and Customs Enforcement and the Border Patrol said.

The tunnel, just 2 feet underground and about 2 feet square, was discovered after an agent investigating some people standing near the fence north of the border found an area where it had caved in, Border Patrol spokesman Richard Kite said.

"It was not a complete tunnel and was of no use to any criminal enterprise," he said. "There were several people who were coming north of the fence. One of them was able to make it back across to Mexico."

That tunnel was about 50 yards west of where a similar tunnel was found Jan. 9.

A fourth tunnel under construction, with electric lights but with its entrance covered by a board, was discovered near the Otay Mesa border crossing Friday.

This month's discoveries bring to 21 the number of tunnels found in Arizona and California since Sept. 11, 2001, when inspections at the border crossings were beefed up. Between 1990 and 2001, 15 tunnels were found.

The increased number of tunnels is a good sign, said John Fernandes, the special agent in charge of the DEA's San Diego office.

"It is an indication, as far as I'm concerned, about their frustration with our success," he said.

Drug seizures at California border crossings were up 24 percent last fiscal year over the year before, customs officials announced this week. In the year ending Sept. 30, more than 127 tons of drugs were seized, the vast majority of that marijuana.

Tunnels provide a way to avoid inspectors altogether, and that's why drug cartels will spend millions of dollars building them, said lawyer John Kirby, who specialized in drug prosecutions before leaving the U.S. Attorney's Office last year.

"You don't have to play Russian roulette with the border," he said.

The Arellano-Felix cartel was behind a 1,000-foot tunnel between a Mexican ranch house east of Tecate and a house in East County.

It has been battling rival cartels headed by accused drug traffickers Ismael "El Mayo" Zambada and Joaquín "El Chapo" Guzman.

Guzman has tried underground routes before, prosecutors said.

In 1993, people working for him tried to dig a tunnel 1,450 feet north from an industrial building in Tijuana to a factory building under construction in Otay Mesa. They came up in a field about 120 feet short of their target.

That tunnel was discovered after officials found a map in a Tijuana safe house while investigating the killings of Cardinal Juan José Posadas Ocampo and six others in Guadalajara.

Guzman was caught, but escaped from a Mexican jail in 2001. He was indicted in San Diego on drug-trafficking charges. U.S. authorities have offered a $5 million reward for information relating to his arrest.

"Chapo was known," Kirby said. "He could get drugs over quickly."

Officials Find Drug Tunnel With Surprising Amenities (NYT)

By Randal C. Archibold

LOS ANGELES, Jan. 26 — Drug smugglers have dug one of the longest, most sophisticated tunnels discovered in recent years along the Mexican border, and the American and Mexican authorities have hauled nearly two tons of marijuana out of it since they entered it on Wednesday, officials said.

The tunnel is 60 feet below ground at some points, five feet high, and nearly half a mile long, extending from a warehouse near the international airport in Tijuana, Mexico, to a vacant industrial building in Otay Mesa, Calif., about 20 miles southeast of downtown San Diego. The sophistication of the tunnel surprised officials, who found it outfitted with a concrete floor, electricity, lights and ventilation and groundwater pumping systems.

The authorities said a tip led to the discovery.

"The tunnel is absolutely amazing," said Michael Unzueta, special agent in charge for the federal Immigration and Customs Enforcement agency's San Diego office. "It is probably the biggest tunnel on the southern border so far."

On the American side, agents found about 200 pounds of marijuana in the building in Otay Mesa, which had several bays for tractor-trailers. On the Mexican side, drug agents found a pulley system at the entrance to the shaft and several thousand pounds of marijuana and hauled it out for several hours Wednesday. Mexican authorities also found seven cellphones, two trucks, a van and various documents in the warehouse, according to a statement from the Mexican attorney general's office.

The customs enforcement agency, the Drug Enforcement Administration and the Border Patrol are sending a forensics team from Los Angeles to determine how long the tunnel has been in use.

The tunnel is one of the latest to be found along the border. Most are attributed to Mexican drug cartels searching for ways to move contraband into the United States, but some appear to be the work of smugglers of illegal immigrants.

Since Sept. 11, 2001, when border security was tightened, agents have uncovered 21 tunnels of varying degrees of length and sophistication, from "gopher holes" to engineered marvels like Wednesday's discovery, Mr. Unzueta said.

The builders, he said, "had to have access to money and somebody with a strong construction and engineering background."

"Our quick assumption is it's the drug cartels," he said.

Wednesday's discovery was the result of a tip investigated by a task force of federal agents devoted to tunnels. On Monday, they narrowed their search to the area in Otay Mesa and notified Mexican agents about what they suspected was the opening of the tunnel near the airport.

Both sides began digging. Mexican agents discovered a concrete-lined, 85-foot-deep shaft in a warehouse, descended, walked through the tunnel and popped up on the American side, Mr. Unzueta said. Officials on each side are searching records to determine who owns the buildings.

Also on Wednesday, several miles west of the big tunnel, the authorities found a smaller one — about two feet underground and extending 30 feet across the border near a storm drain — after a United States Border Patrol vehicle hit a sinkhole.

By Richard Marosi

The Los Angeles Times, January 26, 2006

SAN DIEGO — Federal authorities have launched a criminal investigation after finding a long, cross-border tunnel that began in a warehouse in Tijuana, Mexico, and was apparently used for smuggling drugs or people, authorities said Wednesday.

Federal agents discovered the U.S. exit to the tunnel Wednesday in an undisclosed location near the Otay Mesa Port of Entry, said Lauren Mack, a spokeswoman for Immigration and Customs Enforcement.

Mack could not disclose more details, but said the tunnel appears to be longer than most of the 21 cross-border tunnels found in Arizona and California since Sept. 11, 2001.

"We've located a massive, spectacular tunnel," she said.

Four tunnels have been discovered in the San Diego area this month. Also Wednesday, a crudely built, unfinished tunnel was discovered when a border patrol agent ran over a sinkhole near the San Ysidro Port of Entry.

"It was a gopher hole tunnel … very primitive," Mack said.

Another unfinished tunnel was discovered last week a few miles east. That tunnel extended about 30 yards into the United States and appeared to be headed to a storm drain system.

Smugglers in recent years have tapped into storm drain systems in San Diego to bring migrants into the country.

AFP, January 27, 2006

United States authorities say they have discovered the largest and most sophisticated tunnel detected under their border with Mexico, one that was used by drug trafficking gangs.

The tunnel, lined with concrete and equipped with ventilation and lights, is one kilometre long, according to Mexican officials, but their US counterparts say it was only about 727 metres.

The secret route is cut 26 metres below ground, directly under a heavily protected sector of the frontier and is much larger than the 21 others detected under the border since the September 11, 2001 terror attacks on US soil, US officials said.

"We believe this tunnel is, in fact, the largest tunnel ever found on the south-west border," said Michael Unzueta, special agent in charge for US Immigration and Customs Enforcement in San Diego.

The tunnel, discovered late on Wednesday by US Border Patrol agents who tipped off Mexican authorities, begins beneath a warehouse in the Mexican border town of Tijuana and stretches to Otay, near the California city of San Diego.

The length and well-built structure of the tunnel, which was 1.5 metres wide, make it unusual.

Authorities found more than two tons of marijuana in the tunnel that US officials fear could also be used by people smugglers and even terrorists trying to circumvent the porous border.

"We're very concerned," said Mr Unzueta. "When we find these tunnels, we see that as a vulnerability to our national security."Sophisticated operation

Mexican police raided the warehouse in Tijuana and discovered a 1.8- by 3.6-metre concrete-lined shaft equipped with a ladder that drops down to the tunnel below.

A gurney hanging from a pulley system attached to one of the warehouse's beams allowed items to be moved into and out of the tunnel.

Portions of the tunnel are 15-18 metres deep, Mr Unzueta said.

The tunnel has a lighting, ventilation and pumping system to keep seeping water out.

John Fernandes of the US Drug Enforcement Administration in San Diego said the sheer scale and construction of the tunnel indicated that it was likely built by Mexico's drug trafficking cartels.

"It's a vast and sophisticated tunnel. We know it's used for drug trafficking, obviously, but ... this tunnel truly illustrates the dangers, the risks of the security and safety concerns of the American public."

The Mexican drug cartels have spent millions of dollars in the last 15 years to find ways of moving contraband across the border into the lucrative US market.

A number of tunnels have been detected under the border in recent months by a special ICE tunnel task force, including four in the San Diego area this month alone.

Feds Smoke Out Largest Drug Tunnel Yet (CNN)

By Kevin Bohn

CNN.com, January 26, 2006

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- Authorities have found what they call the largest and most sophisticated tunnel running into the United States along the Mexican border.

The tunnel contained 2 tons of marijuana, stacked in bales, according to a statement issued by the Justice Department.

DEA and U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement agents discovered the tunnel Wednesday night. It runs from Tijuana, Mexico, to Otay Mesa, California. (Watch scenes from the Tijuana pot tunnel -- 1:40)

Officials said the tunnel is about seven-tenths of a mile (1,148 meters) or more than 1,200 yards long. Initial reports said it is 5 feet high and 3.5 feet wide.

Authorities said they believe the passageway originates under a warehouse about 150 yards south of the border and surfaces about a half-mile north of the border in another warehouse.

Made of concrete, the passageway had lighting, electricity, ventilation and a pump to remove water, said Lauren Mack, a spokeswoman for Immigration and Customs Enforcement.

Most of the marijuana was uncovered on the Mexican side, but some of it was in the United States, Mack said.

"It's definitely expected to be related to a major drug cartel in Mexico," she said. No arrests have been made.

An investigation is under way to determine who built the passageway.

Mack said human intelligence led to the discovery of the underground structure. Agents then used ground-penetrating radar technology from the military to find anomalies in the soil, she said.

Earlier this month, U.S. border patrol agents investigating a caved-in road discovered another tunnel between Mexico and the United States, west of the San Ysidro, California, port of entry.

It was the third such tunnel found in three years near the San Ysidro port, Mack said. Others were discovered in 2003 and 2004, she said.

"We found trash and other evidence indicating people had been inside recently," Mack said in a phone interview January 11, describing the passage as "primitive." (Full story)

Tightened border security since the September 11, 2001, attacks is the likely cause for the increase in the tunneling, Mack said.

More than 20 cross-border tunnels have been uncovered in California and Arizona since 9/11, she added.

"We've now got a dedicated tunnel task force, which works with the DEA and border patrol to proactively look for tunnels," Mack said.

UPI, January 26, 2006

SAN DIEGO, Jan. 26 (UPI) -- Federal agents report finding 2 tons of marijuana inside a tunnel that runs for nearly three-quarters of a mile between Mexico and California.

The tunnel is the largest of the 15 discovered under the border in California and Arizona since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, CNN reported. The Customs Service and Drug Enforcement Administration agents found it Wednesday night.

Agents described the tunnel as 1,200 yards long or about 0.7 of a mile, connecting Tijuana, Mexico, with Otay Mesa, Calif. It is reportedly 5 feet high and 3.5 feet wide with lighting and concrete walls and floor.

Lauren Mack, a spokeswoman for the Customs Service, told CNN tunneling under the border appears to be a reaction to the increase in security that followed the terrorist attacks. Earlier this month, the collapse of a road surface led agents to a tunnel west of the port of San Ysidro in California.

Tunnel Found On Mexican Border (WP)

By John Pomfret

LOS ANGELES, Jan. 26 -- U.S. and Mexican authorities have discovered an elaborate tunnel that stretches the length of eight football fields connecting Mexico and the United States and was apparently used for drug trafficking, authorities said Thursday.

The tunnel, unearthed Wednesday, runs from a warehouse in Tijuana and surfaces in the United States under an abandoned warehouse west of the Otay Mesa port of entry. Mexican authorities announced that they had seized about two tons of marijuana on the Mexican end, and experts said the passageway bore all the hallmarks of an operation by a major drug cartel.

"This is a very, very sophisticated tunnel," Michael Unzueta, special agent in charge for U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement in San Diego, said in a telephone interview. "Whether they are designed to smuggle drugs, people, weapons or other contraband, these tunnels pose a threat to our nation's security."

Unzueta said investigators were tipped off to the existence of the tunnel on the Mexican side and passed the information to Mexican law enforcement, which obtained a search warrant for the warehouse in Tijuana on Wednesday. Mexican authorities allowed reporters into the warehouse that night; they reported that they saw about 300 bundles of marijuana stacked more than five feet high.

Unzueta described the shaft as technically advanced, with electricity, a ventilation system, pumps to remove groundwater, cement flooring for traction in steep areas, and wood roofing to bolster the walls and ceiling. It had a clearance, he said, of nearly six feet and was about five feet wide.

At 2,400 feet, the tunnel is the longest and most sophisticated of the 21 underground passageways linking the United States and Mexico that have been discovered since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, when investigations and enforcement were beefed up in the region. Unzueta said most of the tunnels have been located in the San Diego area because the composite soil of that region is ideal for such work. From 1990 to 2001, 15 tunnels were unearthed.

Unzueta said that a year ago, agents from his agency, the Drug Enforcement Administration and U.S. Customs and Border Protection's Border Patrol unit formed the San Diego Tunnel Task Force, with the aim of unearthing the networks.

Federal agents have concluded that drug traffickers and smugglers of illegal immigrants have been heading underground to escape tighter enforcement along the border. Customs officials announced this week that drug seizures at California border crossings rose 24 percent in the past fiscal year. More than 127 tons of drugs were seized, the vast majority of that marijuana, in the year ending Sept. 30.

Since Jan. 9, authorities in the region have uncovered three other tunnels. Those were far from sophisticated -- the kind that agents call "gopher holes," being essentially shallow tubes connecting Mexico and the United States. In one discovery of a 30-foot-long tunnel with an opening of two feet square, federal agents found prospective illegal immigrants were still inside, although they succeeded in turning around and inching back into Mexico.

Law enforcement cooperation between the United States and Mexico has not always been good. Earlier this week, Texas state police were stopped along the border from seizing three sport-utility vehicles by men in military-style uniforms, who were armed with automatic weapons and driving a Humvee. The SUVs were apparently carrying marijuana.

Texas law enforcement officials speculated that the men were Mexican soldiers. On Wednesday, U.S. Ambassador Tony Garza issued a statement asking the Mexican government to "fully investigate" the border incident. Mexico's top diplomat, Foreign Secretary Luis Ernesto Derbez, countered Thursday that the men could just as easily have been U.S. troops.

Agents Find Pot-filled Mexico-U.S. Tunnel (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, January 27, 2006

Federal agents have located a 2,400-foot tunnel, filled with marijuana, that connects warehouses in Tijuana, Mexico, to San Diego -- the largest and most sophisticated illegal cross-border underpass authorities said they've ever found.

Equipped with a pulley and ventilation system, the tunnel is six feet wide and 8 to 12 feet high. It has a cement floor and lights on its walls, said U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA) spokesman Garrison K. Courtney.

"Whether they are designed to smuggle drugs, people, weapons or other contraband, these tunnels pose a threat to our nation's security," said Michael Unzueta, special agent in charge of U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) investigations in San Diego.

The tunnel's discovery Wednesday prompted the U.S. Attorney's office in San Diego to open a criminal investigation, said Lauren Mack, an ICE spokeswoman. ICE is a member of the San Diego Tunnel Task Force with the DEA and U.S. Customs and Border Protection (CBP).

Since the September 11 attacks, federal authorities have discovered more than 20 cross-border tunnels along the U.S.-Mexico border in California and Arizona. Authorities said they were unsure how long the tunnel had been in operation. They also said they did not know what drug organization might have used it.

Mr. Courtney said the tunnel originates 85 feet under a warehouse about 150 yards south of the border in Mexico, near the Tijuana airport, and surfaces about a half-mile north of the border in an abandoned warehouse in Otay Mesa.

Otay Mesa, a community within the City of San Diego that was developed as an industrial area in 1985 as a result of the creation of the Otay Mesa port of entry, has become California's largest commercial land border port and is one of the busiest commercial land border crossings in the United States.

Based on leads provided by the task force, Mr. Courtney said federal police in Mexico found the tunnel after obtaining a warrant Wednesday night to search the Tijuana warehouse. Mexican authorities said the two tons of marijuana were stacked in nearly 300 bales.

Mexican authorities said a metal ladder was used to gain entry to the packed-earth tunnel.

In July 2003, members of the Tijuana-based Arellano-Felix Organization were indicted for conducting an illegal enterprise through a pattern of racketeering activity, conspiracy to import and distribute cocaine and marijuana, and money laundering.

After a request by the DEA, the State Department issued rewards totaling $16 million for information leading to the arrest of five leaders of the organization who remain at large: Javier Arellano-Felix, Eduardo Arellano-Felix, Manuel Aguirre-Galindo, Gustavo Rivera-Martinez and Gilberto Higuera-Guerrero.

In May 1993, a 1,450-foot tunnel was located in the same area of Otay Mesa, although authorities said at the time that it was unfinished.

The tunnel task force uses an array of high-tech equipment and intelligence information to pinpoint the locations of underground passageways along the border.

AP, January 27, 2006

Five more members of the U.S. military and three other suspects have agreed to plead guilty in a drug smuggling sting case targeting military members who believed they were smuggling cocaine through Arizona.

The pleas bring the total number of people admitting guilt in the case to 44, most of whom were members of the regular Army or Air Force or the Arizona National Guard.

The U.S. Attorney's Office said the five, four Army National guard soldiers and one airman, pleaded guilty to conspiracy to accept cash bribes from people they believed to be narcotics traffickers. In addition, two civilians and an officer with the Arizona Department of Corrections.

In fact, the traffickers were FBI agents working a sting operation called "Lively Green." The defendants face up to five years in federal prison and $250,000 fines.

All eight defendants escorted at least one shipment of cocaine from locations in southern Arizona to Phoenix or Las Vegas, federal officials said. In one instance, a convoy of U.S. military Humvees met a small private plane at a clandestine airstrip near Benson and the soldiers helped the undercover-agent pilots unload 60 pounds of cocaine. They then drove it to Phoenix, where another agent paid them off in cash.

KOLD-TV, January 27, 2006

Eight more people are pleading guilty in the Operation Lively Green case.

Six are current or former soldiers, and law enforcement officers.

Two are civilians.

This brings to 48 the number of defendants who have pleaded guilty to taking bribes from drug traffickers.

By Mark Stevenson, ASSOCIATED PRESS

AP, January 27, 2006

MEXICO CITY – Mexico's foreign secretary suggested Thursday that uniformed men using a military-style Humvee to help drug traffickers on the border could have been U.S. soldiers or criminals disguised as Mexican troops.

Derbez called Garza's comments out of line and said his office is sending a diplomatic note asking the ambassador to tone down his rhetoric.

The U.S. Embassy in Mexico made no immediate comment.

Derbez also said that men photographed by Texas law enforcement officers as they helped marijuana traffickers flee to Mexico on Monday could have been Americans, but he offered no evidence.

He did refer, however, to an FBI drug sting dubbed Operation Lively Green, in which more than a dozen U.S. military and civilian government workers were arrested in southern Arizona. Some pled guilty to transporting drugs in official vehciles, including Humvees.

"Members of the U.S. Army have helped protect people who were processing and transporting drugs," Derbez told a news conference. "And just as that has happened ... it is very probable that something like that could have happened, that in reality they (the uniformed men at the border) were members of some of their groups disguised as Mexican soldiers with Humvees."

Texas law enforcement officials originally said Mexican soldiers were involved in Monday's incident.

Mexican officials earlier have said the uniformed men were drug traffickers disguised as Mexican soldiers. Derbez said Thursday there was no proof that they were even Mexicans.

"There is a supposition here that this involved Mexican citizens, and that is absolutely incorrect," Derbez said. "There would have to have been racial descriptions, and that would imply a certain element of racial discrimination on the part of the American sheriffs."

Derbez said his diplomatic note to U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice would demand that U.S. officials tone down their comments on Mexico's security and immigration problems, and would request quick results of an investigation into the December shooting of a Mexican migrant.

He complained that Garza should have made his complaints through diplomatic channels.

"We should not convert this, as (Garza) apparently did by publishing his article, into a public relations issue," Derbez said, adding that Garza's comments were "not only wrong, but also don't correspond to reality."

A series of earlier spats have raised tensions between the two nations that largely disagree on the best way to thwart illegal immigration and drug smuggling along the 2,000-mile (3,200-kilometer) border.

Derbez said Mexico's official position on immigration is now to push not just for legalization and temporary work permits for Mexicans, but for migrants from Central America and other countries as well.

"In any immigration reform, there should be a clause that allows the regularization of all citizens ... not just Mexicans, but other nationalities," Derbez said.

The U.S. Congress has refused to approve any amnesty. Instead it is considering the possibility of extending walls along the border – an idea that Mexico bitterly opposes.

Monday's confrontation began 50 miles (80 kilometers) east of El Paso, Texas, when state police tried to stop three sport utility vehicles on Interstate 10. The vehicles made a quick U-turn and headed south toward the border, a few miles away.

Crossing the border, one SUV got stuck in the river, and the men with the Humvee tried in vain to tow it out. Then a group of men in civilian clothes began unloading what appeared to be bundles of marijuana, and set the SUV on fire before fleeing.

Federal Officials Arrest 2 In Plot To Kill DEA Agent (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, January 27, 2006

Federal authorities have arrested two Louisiana men, including an inmate in the Tangipahoa Parish Prison near New Orleans, in a $15,000 assassination plot to kill a U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration agent.

Johnnie Sims was arrested Wednesday night as he attempted to hire a hit man to kill DEA Agent Chad Scott, said William J. Renton Jr., special agent in charge of the DEA's New Orleans field office. Chris Walker, 30, also was charged but already was in custody from his Oct. 13 arrest for possession with the intent to distribute crack cocaine.

"This arrest and the swift federal response to the vicious plot to murder a career DEA special agent should serve as compelling evidence of our absolute commitment to take any steps necessary to protect the lives of law-enforcement officers and citizens alike from those dangerous criminals who prey upon society with no regard for human life," said U.S. Attorney Jim Letten.

According to a criminal complaint filed in U.S. District Court, federal agents learned of the purported assassination plot from cooperating inmates who said Mr. Walker was seeking to hire someone to kill Mr. Scott.

Mr. Renton said federal agents set up a sting operation, during which the cooperating witnesses provided to Mr. Walker the telephone number of an undercover agent who was posing as the killer. He said Mr. Walker then contacted Mr. Sims, a cousin and drug trafficking associate, to pay the undercover agent to kill Mr. Scott.

Mr. Sims, 25, contacted the undercover agent and, according to Mr. Renton, had two meetings with him concerning the desire of Mr. Walker to kill the agent. He said Mr. Sims agreed to pay the undercover agent $15,000 for the murder.

During the second meeting, Mr. Renton said Mr. Sims identified a picture of Mr. Scott, stating he wanted him killed as soon as possible. He also paid the undercover agent $1,000 as a down payment for the killing. Shortly after the meeting, agents arrested Mr. Sims at a shopping center in Metairie, La.

Mr. Renton said Mr. Sims was in possession of a semiautomatic pistol at the time of his arrest.

Mr. Sims has since agreed to cooperate with authorities and confessed to his role in the plot to kill the agent, Mr. Renton said. Mr. Walker remains in jail on the federal drug trafficking charges and has been detained without bond pending trial.

The investigation is ongoing and, Mr. Renton said, additional suspects are expected to be arrested.

"As we move forward in rebuilding our ravaged region, the people we serve should take comfort in the knowledge that the men and women of federal law enforcement will employ every weapon in our arsenal to hunt down and bring to justice anyone who poses a threat to the lives and safety of our law-enforcement professionals or to those brave citizens who come forward as witnesses."

Inmate Accused Of Seeking Hit Man (NOTP)

By Michael Perlstein

New Orleans Times-Picayune, January 26, 2006

It started as Southeast Louisiana's first federal drug case since Hurricane Katrina. It evolved into a murder-for-hire plot targeting the Drug Enforcement Administration agent who made the bust, federal authorities announced Wednesday.

As a result, a Tangipahoa Parish Prison inmate, and a go-between who allegedly tried to hire a hit man on the inmate's behalf, face possible life sentences if convicted of conspiring to kill a federal officer. The case against federal drug defendant Chris Walker and Johnnie Sims, Walker's cousin and an alleged drug-trafficking underling, will be presented to a grand jury in the coming weeks, U.S. Attorney Jim Letten said.

William Renton, the DEA's top agent for the New Orleans area, said the scheme unraveled when Walker, 30, started asking fellow inmates at Tangipahoa Parish Prison for the names of potential hit men.

Two inmates took the information straight to DEA Agent Chad Scott, who had busted Walker on Oct. 18 and booked him with possessing more than a kilo of cocaine, equipment used in making crack and a gun with an obliterated serial number, according to Renton and court records.

The informants told the agent that Walker had asked Sims, 25, to line up an assassin to murder Scott, according to criminal affidavit filed in the case. The DEA wasted no time launching a sting operation using an undercover New Orleans police officer to pose as a drug-dealing hit man, the affidavit states.

"I was angry," Renton said. "I was personally offended that somebody would target a federal agent simply for doing his job and serving the citizens of the United States. We decided we'd leave no stone unturned in pursuing this investigation."

Agents used the informants to give the undercover officer's telephone number to Walker in prison, who promptly passed the number to Sims. After a few preliminary phone conversations, Sims met with the undercover officer Monday at Lakeside Shopping Center in Metairie, the affidavit states.

At the meeting, the two men arrived at a price of $15,000 for "knocking off" Scott. The pair met again at Lakeside on Tuesday, when Sims allegedly gave the undercover officer, Ricky Jackson, a $1,000 down payment.

"Walker's thinking that if Chad Scott dies, he's got no more problems. Once we heard about this, we put on a full-court press," Renton said.

With the exchange of money, agents pounced on Sims and arrested him. A search of his vehicle netted a loaded .40-caliber handgun and small amounts of cocaine and marijuana, authorities said. After his arrest, Sims began spilling his guts about the plot, revealing that Walker also wanted to kill the confidential informants who he believed landed him behind bars in the first place, the affidavit states.

Renton and Letten said the case was helped by cooperation among several police agencies, including the DEA, New Orleans Police Department, Hammond Police Department, Louisiana State Police and the Tangipahoa and Jefferson Parish sheriff's offices.

"I'm extremely proud of the swift and efficient actions of the DEA agents and everyone else involved," Letten said. "We will always do everything in our power to protect those people who dedicate their lives to protecting citizens. It's plots like this that galvanize our resolve to more aggressively go after these corrupt individuals."

While it is rare for a defendant in such cases to receive the maximum life sentence, Walker and Sims face lengthy prison terms based on prior and pending cases against them. At the time of his arrest, Sims was on probation for two felony cocaine convictions. Walker, in addition to the pending federal cocaine case, also has two prior drug convictions, court records show.

County May Join Medical Pot Suit (PR-ENT)

By Duane W. Gang And Kimberly Trone

Press-Enterprise (CA), January 27, 2006

Riverside County will consider joining San Bernardino and San Diego counties in a federal lawsuit seeking to overturn California's medical-marijuana law, a Riverside County supervisor said Thursday.

Supervisor Jeff Stone, a pharmacist, said he intends to ask his colleagues in closed session Tuesday to add the county to the short list of challengers to the state's Compassionate Use Act approved by Californians in 1996.

The law allows patients with a physician's recommendation to transport and use marijuana to treat the symptoms of illnesses such as cancer, glaucoma, chronic pain and AIDS.

State law also requires counties to issue optional identification cards to medical-marijuana users. So far, 15 counties -- including Riverside -- have issued almost 800 cards, which help users avoid arrest.

San Bernardino County, which was set to begin issuing the cards this month, will not issue them until the legal dispute is resolved. Riverside County began issuing the cards in December.

Stone, along with his counterparts in San Bernardino County, said the state law conflicts with federal drug provisions, leaving law enforcement in a bind over which measures to enforce.

In addition, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled last year that those in states with compassionate-use laws still could face arrest on federal drug charges.

"It is clear through pharmacy law that whatever law is stricter -- federal or state law -- that is the law we have to uphold," Stone said. "The more counties that sign on to the suit, the more clout we are going to have."

Counties need clarification from the courts on the conflicting laws, Stone said.

San Bernardino County supervisors voted unanimously in closed session this week to join San Diego County in its federal lawsuit against the state.

Ruth Stringer, an assistant San Bernardino County counsel, said the county has not filed its lawsuit yet but hopes to do so soon. Once filed, it is expected to be combined with San Diego County's lawsuit, officials said.

Chris Laue, 55, of Twentynine Palms, meets monthly with people in San Bernardino County who rely on medical marijuana to ease chronic pain. He said the group likely will go before the supervisors to protest their actions.

"They swear to uphold the constitution of the state of California," said Laue, whose wife uses medical marijuana.

San Diego County contends that the U.S. Constitution's supremacy clause preempts California medical-marijuana laws because they conflict with federal drug law and an international narcotics treaty the United States signed in 1961.

"Under federal law, we can't go along with what the state wants us to do," San Bernardino County Sheriff Gary Penrod said Thursday.

Penrod wrote a December memo to the San Bernardino County supervisors encouraging them to join with San Diego County.

DOJ_NMG_0012438

In the memo, he said that while voters statewide approved the 1996 ballot initiative, San Bernardino County voters rejected it.

He urged the county to "resist engaging in a program that issues cards that sanction participation in a federal crime."

Penrod said he expects to be a named plaintiff in San Bernardino County's lawsuit and hopes that adds weight to the counties' case. He said he wants to go before a judge and explain the problem that medical marijuana poses to law enforcement agencies.

But the counties could be facing an uphill legal battle, even if Riverside County joins the lawsuit, said David B. Cruz, a constitutional law expert at the University of Southern California Law School.

It is pretty clear a county cannot sue its state for an alleged constitutional violation, Cruz said.

"There also is precedent that physicians recommending marijuana, which is what these ID cards are all about, does not amount to a violation of federal law," Cruz said.

It is unclear whether Stone will gain support from his fellow supervisors to add Riverside County's name to the suit. Supervisors Marion Ashley, Bob Buster and Roy Wilson said this week that as long as there is a state law allowing the use of medical marijuana, they intend to uphold it.

"I would hope we would move forward in making sure the law is followed," Wilson said.

Riverside County Supervisor John Tavaglione said Thursday he was not prepared to weigh in on whether the county should join the lawsuit, but he said he wants a ban on medical-marijuana dispensaries.

Riverside County planners are preparing to roll out a proposal this spring detailing where and how medical-marijuana dispensaries may operate.

Stone said joining the lawsuit would not mean Riverside County would stop issuing medical-marijuana cards.

"We are going to continue to do what the state tells us until a judge tells us the measure is unconstitutional or not legally viable," Stone said.

U.S. And Mexico Trade Complaints Over Border Security Issues (NYT)

By James C. McKinley Jr.

The New York Times, January 27, 2006

MEXICO CITY, Jan. 26 — The United States and Mexico exchanged diplomatic broadsides on Thursday over border security and drug-related violence in another sign of their deteriorating relationship.

The American ambassador, Antonio O. Garza Jr., sent a formal note to the Mexican government demanding an investigation of an episode on Monday in which men dressed as Mexican soldiers helped drug smugglers escape American law enforcement officers near El Paso.

The ambassador took the unusual step of not only announcing the note, but promising to send a second one to express concern about a rise in drug-related violence in border towns and recent attacks on American Border Patrol agents.

"I am urging the Mexican government to take this elevated violence seriously," said Mr. Garza, a Texas Republican. "In the past there has been a tendency to focus on public relations instead of public security."

Hours later the Mexican foreign minister, Luis Ernesto Derbez, suggested that it was Mr. Garza who appeared to be playing to a crowd for political reasons. "What he says is that one should not feed this discourse in the media, but find a real solution," Mr. Derbez said. "I would hope that he would apply his own recommendation." Not to be outdone, Mr. Derbez announced that Mexico would send its own diplomatic note responding to Mr. Garza's criticisms. He also said Mexico would demand an explanation for the lack of progress in an investigation of the fatal shooting of a Mexican immigrant, Guillermo Martínez, by a Border Patrol agent on Dec. 30 near San Diego.

Mr. Derbez went on to suggest that the uniformed men in the incident on Monday, who used a military Humvee with a mounted machine gun to help drug traffickers cross the Rio Grande, might have been American soldiers in disguise.

The diplomatic quarrel comes amid strained relations between the two countries. Mexican officials are furious about a bill before the United States Senate that would make it a felony to enter the country illegally and would order construction of 700 miles of fence along the border.

The bill is coming up for a vote as efforts to establish a guest worker program that would legalize the status of millions of Mexicans in the United States have stalled.

For their part, law enforcement officials in Texas and Arizona are up in arms about what they say are intrusions into their states by Mexican police and military units, sometimes in league with drug dealers. This week, Senator Jon Kyl, an Arizona Republican, sent a letter to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice demanding an investigation into the alleged incursions, of which he said there had been more than 200 since 1996. American officials were also angered this week when the Mexican government announced that it would distribute maps of the Arizona desert to migrants, showing where water stations and other aid could be found.

The homeland security secretary, Michael Chertoff, strongly condemned the idea, saying it was "a bad idea to encourage migrants to undertake this highly dangerous and ultimately futile effort."

The Mexican National Human Rights Commission said Thursday that it had suspended the program, whose purpose was to reduce deaths from thirst and exhaustion. A record 464 immigrants died crossing the 2,000-mile border last year.

Mexico Suggests Gls Aided Pot Smugglers (AJC)

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, January 27, 2006

MEXICO CITY — Mexico's top diplomat suggested Thursday that American soldiers disguised as Mexican troops may have been in the military-style Humvee filmed earlier this week protecting a marijuana shipment on the border.

Foreign Secretary Luis Ernesto Derbez also told a news conference that U.S. soldiers had helped drug smugglers before. However, he offered no evidence.

The U.S. Embassy in Mexico made no immediate comment on Derbez's claims.

Monday's armed standoff began 50 miles east of El Paso, Texas, when Texas state police tried to stop three sport utility vehicles on Interstate 10. The vehicles made a quick U-turn and headed south toward the border, a few miles away.

Crossing the border, one SUV got stuck in the Rio Grande River, and men in a Humvee tried in vain to tow it out. Then a group of men in civilian clothes began unloading what appeared to be bundles of marijuana and torched the SUV before fleeing.

Mexico insisted Wednesday that the men in military-style uniforms were drug smugglers, not soldiers. In Mexico, kidnappers and drug smugglers regularly wear police gear, which is sold at street stands.

Derbez said Thursday that the men photographed by Texas law enforcement could have been Americans.

"Members of the U.S. Army have helped protect people who were processing and transporting drugs," Derbez said. "And just as that has happened ... it is very probable that something like that could have happened, that in reality they were members of some of their groups disguised as Mexican soldiers with Humvees."

Three U.S. soldiers have pleaded guilty to running a cocaine smuggling ring from a U.S. base in Colombia, and a fourth is being tried in Texas this week.

Derbez said there was no proof that the men seen in the incident were Mexicans.

Derbez also said his country will send a diplomatic note to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice demanding that U.S. officials tone down their comments on Mexico's security and immigration problems.

Mexican Border Incursions Redux: In 1916, Wilson Sent In The Army (WT)

By Robert Stacy Mccain

The Washington Times, January 27, 2006

Reports of armed Mexican outlaws crossing the border to clash with U.S. forces led to demands that the president send troops to protect American lives.

So far, the White House is speaking of its "concern about the reports" of Monday's border crossing, which a spokesman described as "an incident that is under investigation." Yet in 1916, when Pancho Villa's bandits raided Columbus, N.M., a Democratic president didn't hesitate.

President Woodrow Wilson sent Gen. John "Black Jack" Pershing to lead an expedition into Mexico. A $5,000 bounty was offered for Villa's capture, and Army posters invoked "The Flag, Old Glory" in calling for 25,000 recruits: "Come on, boys, be ready to shoulder the trusty Springfield."

There are important differences between the border situation that Wilson faced in 1916 and the situation facing President Bush this year, said Philip E. Koerper, professor of history at Jacksonville State University in Alabama.

"Pancho Villa -- it was in the midst of a revolution," he said. "This is just plain old smuggling."

Though he sees no comparison to the 1916 Villa raid, Mr. Koerper said, that doesn't mean the current border situation is not a threat to U.S. security.

"As long as you can have smugglers and refugees both crossing your border illegally, anybody could cross illegally, including al Qaeda," he said.

Concerns about terrorists' crossing the border indicate one parallel between this year and 1916 when, during World War I, many Americans suspected Mexico of harboring German agents and saboteurs. Indeed, an intercepted German message, the infamous "Zimmerman telegram," proposing a German-Mexican alliance helped prompt Wilson to take the United States into war in 1917 -- with its Army commanded by the general who had led the pursuit of Villa.

Yet the historic situation during Villa's day was much different, said James Carafano, a senior fellow at the Heritage Foundation.

"Mexico back then didn't have a strong central government," said Mr. Carafano, who specializes in defense and homeland-security issues. "There was no rule of law. I don't think you can compare that to Mexico today.

"There are security issues on the border ... and there's transnational criminal issues, whether you're talking about drugs or guns or people. But I don't think it's analogous to" 1916.

A brilliant militia commander, Villa played a key role in the 1911 overthrow of the dictatorship of Porfirio Diaz. But in 1915, Wilson sided with Villa's rival Venustiano Carranza -- infuriating Villa, who retaliated against U.S. citizens in Mexico. Sixteen American mining engineers were slain in the Santa Isabel Massacre of January 1916.

Shortly before dawn on March 9, 1916, about 600 of Villa's men swept down on Columbus. They soon were met by about 350 troops of the U.S. 13th Cavalry. Driven back by U.S. machine-gun fire, Villa lost more than 75 men in the raid, which left 17 Americans dead.

As in the current year -- when reports of this week's clash near El Paso focused press attention on a problem that long had concerned border residents -- the press in 1916 reacted sharply to news of the Columbus raid.

The reaction was especially swift in the Los Angeles Times, historian Clayton E. Cramer has noted. Before Villa's New Mexico incursion, the newspaper had described Villa as a "rebel leader." After the Columbus raid, an editorial denounced him as an "outlawed Mexican bandit" and "the vilest kind of ruffian."

The Wilson administration also acted swiftly. Thousands of U.S. troops poured into Columbus, and Gen. Pershing arrived from Fort Bliss, Texas, to take command.

The Mexican government at first was favorable to the U.S. attack on its enemy, Villa, but Carranza came to resent the U.S. presence, and soon Pershing's troops were fighting both Villa's rebels and regular Mexican troops.

The expedition "was a fiasco," said Old West historian Roger McGrath.

Mexico offered "perfect defensive positions for Pancho Villa -- he knew the country like the back of his hand," Mr. McGrath said. The American campaign "was a logistical nightmare -- no roads, no maps, no water."

Villa eluded capture, and in early 1917 -- as war loomed between the United States and Germany -- Wilson recalled the Army.

Mr. Carafano, the Heritage analyst, said the outcome of Pershing's 11-month expedition points to the problem of deploying the military to deal with the border issue -- as many have called on Mr. Bush to do.

Chattanooga (TN) Chattanoogan, January 27, 2006

A Cleveland, Tn., man who authorities say kept machine guns buried in his yard pleaded guilty Thursday to firearms and meth charges.

Prosecutor Gary Humble said Bradley County Sheriff officers on Aug. 9, 2004, found working components of a meth lab at Pippenger's home. He said they went back on March 10, 2005, and found he again was outfitted to cook meth.

Pippenger sold a sub-machine gun to an undercover officer on May 11, 2005, the prosecutor said.

He is facing up to 20 years in prison and a fine up to $1 million on the meth cases and up to 10 years and a fine up to $250,000 in the firearms case.

Sentencing is April 19 at 1 p.m.

ATF Agt. Carl Maskew said an informant told him he learned Pippenger was trying to sell guns. The informant went to the Pippenger home at 105 Hughes Road and Pippenger offered to sell him a semi-automatic Uzi. He said Pippenger said he should consider buying a fully automatic Uzi instead. He said Pippenger told him he had several automatic Uzis and an automatic AK-47 that he would sell.

The informant said Pippenger told him he keeps the assault weapons buried because "the law was after him."

He said Pippenger told him about being arrested for meth and said he "was not going to jail and that he was going to sit outside the courthouse, take some poison and while it was taking effect he was going to kill everyone with a bade that he saw, including judges and lawyers."

The informant said Pippenger told him "that if the law came to his house, he was going to barricade himself in his home and shoot as many cops as he could and then poison himself."

The informant said he "became concerned for the safety of the officers and judges and felt that he needed to tell law enforcement about the threats."

Agt. Maskew said on May 11, 2005, that an undercover ATF agent bought three firearms from Pippenger. He said Pippenger said he had to go to another location on Hughes Road and dig up two of the guns at a prior residence. He said Pippenger returned with two machine guns that "were caked with dirt, indicating that they had been buried."

The agent said a check of the guns showed that at least two of them would fire fully automatic and the third "would probably fire two rounds with one pull of the trigger."

Pippenger advised that he had "a truckload" of weapons he could sale.

Federal Grand Jury Indicts Couple On Charges Of Defrauding Museum (AP)

By DYLAN T. LOVAN

AP, January 27, 2006

LOUISVILLE, Ky. - An Alabama man who headed a Louisville historical weapons museum has been charged with bilking the museum's founder out of millions by lying about the cost of some antique firearms.

Michael K. Salisbury, 50, inflated the prices of weapons bought by the museum's founder and primary financial backer, Owsley Brown Frazier, prosecutors said. He was indicted on two counts of money laundering, three counts of wire fraud and four counts of tax evasion.

Salisbury's wife, Karen Cruse Salisbury, 46, faces money laundering and wire fraud charges. The couple, of Huntsville, Ala., were taken into custody Thursday morning in Louisville, Assistant U.S. Attorney Eric Long said.

The Salisburys pleaded not guilty and were each released on $25,000 bonds, Long said. They were ordered to surrender their passports.

Federal prosecutors estimate that the Salisburys turned a profit of at least $1.75 million from 1997 to 2002 by giving false appraisals of antique weapons to Frazier, a well-known local philanthropist. Some of the markups were twice the value of the original purchase price, prosecutors said.

The indictments, issued on Wednesday, said Frazier started a business deal with Michael Salisbury in which Salisbury would locate and buy antique firearms, report the price to Frazier and then Frazier would pay the purchase price for the item.

Frazier did not respond to a request for an interview on Thursday. He spent millions from his own pocket to found the museum, which opened in 2004.

The indictment alleged that in one instance in 1999, Salisbury bought a pair of Colt Model 1861 revolvers believed to have belonged to Gen. George Custer for $235,000, but told Frazier that the guns were worth $300,000.

Salisbury was named president of the museum's foundation in April 2001 and put in charge of an annual $2.5 million budget, the indictment said. He resigned in September 2002.

Long said Karen Salisbury controlled an account where the fraudulent proceeds were deposited.

The indictments alleged that the Salisburys concealed the profits and failed to report them on their federal taxes.

Michael Salisbury faces a maximum of 95 years in prison and a $2.5 million fine, and Karen Salisbury faces 35 years and a $1 million fine if they are found guilty of all the charges, prosecutors said.

Frazier, a retired vice chairman of liquor giant Brown-Forman Corp., sued the couple along with two antique firearms dealers and a California man in April 2004, making similar allegations of fraud.

The suit said that Frazier met the Salisburys in 1997 and eventually "grew to view them as close personal friends." It was not until 2002 that Frazier and the museum's foundation "began to comprehend the wrongdoing by Salisbury." The suit also named John and Belinda Jones, antique dealers from Virginia and Robert L. Wilson, a San Francisco author.

The indictments alleged Salisbury misrepresented the prices on a Colt revolver that was believed to have belonged to former FBI director J. Edgar Hoover; a Winchester rifle owned by William F. "Buffalo Bill" Cody; and a bow, quiver and six arrows believed to have belonged to the Apache Indian Geronimo.

The 100,000 square-foot museum in downtown Louisville houses several ancient artifacts that detail the history of human conflict. It also houses a collection from the Royal Armouries, Britain's national repository for arms and armor. The Royal Armouries chose the Frazier museum for its first permanent U.S. location to showcase about 300 artifacts that date from 1066 to the early 1900s.

Yuman, Mexican Cop Indicted In Gun Smuggling (YUMAS)

By Jeffrey Gautreaux

Yuma (AZ) Sun, January 26, 2006

Jan. 26--A Mexican police officer and a Yuma man have been federally indicted for allegedly attempting to cross the border with three weapons purchased at a Yuma gun show.

Omar Ignacio Alvarez, 20, of Yuma assisted Pedro Rios-Perez, 41, an officer for the Baja California State Police, in buying two handguns and an assault rifle Jan. 7 at a gun show at the Yuma County Fairgrounds, according to the indictment and a criminal complaint filed in U.S. District Court in Phoenix. The two allegedly attempted to drive the guns into Mexico in a police vehicle.

The arrests are part of an overall increase in enforcement by the federal government in cooperation with local agencies to curb weapons trafficking in this area, according to Tom Mangan, special agent for the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives (ATF).

"We recognize Yuma as being a firearms source for guns going to Mexico," Mangan said. "Arizona is a source state for firearms to Mexico."

With strict firearms laws in Mexico, buying weapons in the United States and smuggling them south has been a longtime practice. Mangan said people from Mexico involved in narcotics and other crime have been coming to Yuma retailers to purchase weapons or having them bought for them through straw purchases.

During Murphy's Gun Show in Yuma, agents from ATF and Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) were conducting surveillance and saw Rios-Perez and Alvarez purchase the weapons, according to the complaint. Alvarez worked as a translator and, in one instance, a buyer, the complaint said.

The two were followed to the Andrade Port of Entry where they were detained and interviewed. Both were later arrested. The complaint charges each with alien in possession of firearms and exportation of munitions without a license.

Alvarez has since been released on a personal recognizance bond, but Rios-Perez remains in jail. Each could face up to five years in prison, according to Mangan.

"As a police officer, (Rios-Perez) should be well aware of firearms laws," Mangan said.

According to Mangan, Rios-Perez told investigators that the weapons were bought for his personal use and he was simply bringing them home. Mangan did not comment on whether Rios-Perez may have been making the purchases to funnel them to people in Mexico.

"We're looking into that," he said.

According to the complaint and indictment, federal agents observed the two men leave the gun show carrying a small backpack and an AR-15 assault rifle. They got into a red truck with Mexican license plates and a Mexican Police logo on the side.

The two were observed placing a cover over the police logo to obscure it from view. Agents followed the truck to Sprague's Sports, where the two purchased leg irons. They then drove to a fast food restaurant and then to a home in Yuma, according to the complaint.

While the vehicle was parked near the house, the hood of the truck was opened and activity could be seen occurring near the front of the vehicle, the complaint said.

After closing the hood, the men got into the vehicle and left the residence. The truck was followed to the U.S. Port of Entry at Andrade where it was stopped. Rios-Perez identified himself as a Mexican national and a police officer.

A search revealed the two Smith and Wesson 9mm handguns and the assault rifle. "The ammunition and handguns were hidden in the truck's air filter and the rifle was hidden behind the truck's front seat," the indictment said. The complaint said the two spent about $1,700 making the purchases.

The Mexican law enforcement decals on the vehicle were covered up because officials on the Mexican side would want to know why a police vehicle from Baja California was crossing at that location, according to the complaint.

Mangan, who is based in Phoenix, did not comment on how Alvarez and Rios-Perez may have become connected with each other.

Gun-Toting Delegate Misfires In Richmond (WP)

By Chris L. Jenkins And Rosalind S. Helderman

RICHMOND, Jan. 26 -- Del. John S. "Jack" Reid had gone through this morning routine dozens of times. He'd reach into his pocket, pull out his small semiautomatic .380 handgun, release the clip and store the weapon safely in the desk drawer of his office on the seventh floor of the Virginia General Assembly Building.

But something went wrong Thursday. Reid's pistol, which he said he carries for protection, fired as he popped the clip from the handle, sending a single bullet into the cushion of a bulletproof vest that was hanging from the back of his closed office door.

No one was injured, although Reid said he suffered a laceration on his hand from the friction of the gun's slide snapping back.

The incident prompted an unexpected debate about gun control and also something uncommon in Virginia political circles: contrition from a state legislator. Reid, a Henrico County Republican, rose from his seat on the floor of the House of Delegates, asked to be heard, explained what had happened and said: "I want to apologize to the members of this body and to the greater body. . . . I'm just thankful that nobody was hurt."

Even a few hours after the incident, Reid -- a 16-year veteran and one of the House of Delegates' most popular and free-spirited members -- was at a loss to explain how an experienced gun owner found himself discharging a firearm during one of the busiest parts of the business day at the state Capitol complex.

"If you asked me if I ever put a finger on a trigger when I wasn't at the shooting range, I'd say no," Reid said at a news conference after his apology. "Whether that's what happened, I can't tell you. I really don't know."

The incident immediately reopened the debate among lawmakers and lobbyists about whether firearms should be allowed at the Capitol, a discussion that has been held for several years. Although Maryland law generally prohibits the carrying of unconcealed or concealed firearms in government buildings, including the State House, anyone in Virginia until recently could carry firearms openly into the legislators' office building and the nearby Capitol.

Then, last year, a committee of delegates and senators passed a rule requiring residents to have a concealed weapon permit to bring a firearm into the complex, even if the gun is carried openly. Some senators proposed barring guns from the buildings altogether. But many gun rights groups opposed the move.

Several lawmakers said they were stunned to find out that Reid carried a gun and even more surprised to hear that it had gone off in the busy building.

"He had no business bringing it into the General Assembly," said Senate Minority Leader Richard L. Saslaw (D-Fairfax), a supporter of gun control laws. "I think guns should be banned for all these government buildings."

But others said the freedom to carry a firearm responsibly was a necessity.

"Richmond is a dangerous place," said Del. Charles W. Carrico Sr. (R-Grayson), a former state trooper who spent a year as an undercover police officer in Richmond and carries his gun in the lawmakers' office building. "I carry to protect myself and my family."

Reid, a school administrator in Chesterfield County, said he has a valid permit to carry a concealed weapon and regularly brings his gun to the legislative session to protect himself. He is the sponsor of several controversial bills this year, including efforts to crack down on illegal immigration. But he said he usually ejects the cartridge and carries the bullets in his pocket.

"All of us occasionally get some phone calls that concern us, so during the session I have been carrying it," Reid said. He has had a permit to carry a concealed weapon for two years and has one other gun.

The Henrico County sheriff gave him the bulletproof vest several years ago "as a joke," he said.

Word of the incident spread quickly through the gossipy galaxy of Richmond lawmakers, lobbyists, advocates and reporters. According to one lobbyist, a list was going around with key words that should not be said in front of the General Laws Committee, which Reid chairs. Example: Take your best shot.

Others, including Gov. Timothy M. Kaine (D), couldn't help but rib Reid by marveling at what appeared to be the freak coincidence of the single round striking Reid's bulletproof vest.

"It was good if he was shooting at that coat rack and that it was wearing a bulletproof vest," Kaine said.

But Reid, who is known for a biting sense of humor, appeared humbled by the experience.

"It's at least causing me to evaluate myself," said Reid, 63. "I'm just thankful this turned out as it did."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

2 More Democrats Say They'll Back Alito (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely

USA Today, January 27, 2006

WASHINGTON — Two more Democratic senators, Robert Byrd of West Virginia and Tim Johnson of South Dakota, said Thursday that they will vote in favor of Supreme Court nominee Samuel Alito.

Byrd and Johnson join Sen. Ben Nelson of Nebraska as Alito's only announced Democratic supporters. All three are from states won by President Bush in 2004. “Like most of my constituents, I prefer conservative judges,” Byrd said.

The Senate is likely to confirm Alito on Tuesday by a narrower margin than Bush's first Supreme Court pick, John Roberts, who was confirmed, 78-22, as chief justice. All but four of the Senate's 55 Republicans have said they will vote for Alito, a federal appeals court judge. Republicans Olympia Snowe and Susan Collins of Maine, Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island and Ted Stevens of Alaska have not announced how they will vote.

Massachusetts Democrats Edward Kennedy and John Kerry called for a filibuster, a parliamentary tactic to block a vote that requires support from at least 40 senators. But Sen. Dick Durbin of Illinois, the deputy Democratic leader, said opponents of Alito's confirmation would not succeed in a filibuster. Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., told a group of constituents that some Democrats who oppose Alito would also oppose a filibuster. "There are a number of Democratic senators who believe it's one thing to vote no but it's another thing to prevent the vote from coming up," he said.

Democrats Blanche Lincoln of Arkansas, Daniel Inouye of Hawaii and Joe Lieberman of Connecticut, who were previously undecided, said Thursday that they will vote against Alito.

Lieberman Against Alito Confirmation (HARTC)

By david lightman

The Hartford Courant, January 27, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman, D-Conn., saying he was "left with just too many doubts," announced today he will vote against confirming Judge Samuel A. Alito Jr. to the U.S. Supreme Court.

Lieberman became the 29th Democrat to announce his opposition to President Bush's nominee. But because 52 Republicans and three Democrats, including Nebraska Sen. Ben Nelson, West Virginia Sen. Robert Byrd and South Dakota Sen. Tim Johnson, have said they will back Alito, his confirmation is assured.

Lieberman, who joins the state's senior senator, Sen. Christopher J. Dodd, D-Conn., in opposition, said in a Senate floor speech that he was disturbed by Alito's record on privacy and civil rights issues.

"When asked at confirmation hearings about questions of personal privacy, Judge Alito accepted the 1965 decision in the [Griswold v. Connecticut] case as settled law," Lieberman said. That Supreme Court case overturned a state law barring married couples from using contraception, and was important for focusing on the right of married couples' privacy. Privacy became crucial in later cases, notably the 1973 Roe v. Wade case, which established a woman's right to an abortion.

But, Lieberman said today, "When asked over and over again" about Roe, Alito refused during his hearing to call that case settled law.

"I personally believe Roe achieved a … balance of rights and reflected a societal consensus that has continued and deepened in our country for more than three decades," Lieberman said. "I was left with serious concerns that Judge Alito would not uphold the basic tenets of Roe, and that is a very troubling conclusion."

Lieberman explained that Alito met three of the four tests he applies before judging a nominee. Alilto has "shown he is a person of considerable intellect and ability," the senator said, and had an impressive legal background. And Lieberman had no doubts about his character -- "I thought he emerged with his honesty and integrity intact," he said.

"This is not about a single issue," the senator said, "but an accumulation of his opinions that leads me to a preponderance of doubts."

On civil rights, for instance, Lieberman was concerned that Alito too often barred legal remedies for people who thought they had been hurt by discriminatory practices. He looked at the hundreds of opinions Alito has written as a federal judge, and "together these opinions leave me with profound doubts about whether Judge Alito would protect and advance the special role" that the nation's founders gave it -- to judge issues "freed forever from political passions."

Senate Showdown Vote On Alito Set For Next Week (REU)

Reuters, January 27, 2006

WASHINGTON (Reuters) - Two more Senate Democrats broke ranks on Thursday and said they would vote to confirm Samuel Alito to the U.S. Supreme Court -- while two others made an all-but-certain futile bid to stop President George W. Bush's conservative nominee with a filibuster.

Alito, 55, a federal appeals court judge since 1990, appears headed for confirmation by the full Republican-led 100-member Senate early next week on a mostly party-line vote.

If approved, Alito would replace retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, a moderate conservative, and could move the nine-member court to the right on abortion, civil rights and other social issues.

Near the close of a second day of debate, Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, a Tennessee Republican, moved to force a confirmation vote on Tuesday. A test vote on ending debate is set for Monday, and a number of Democrats conceded they probably cannot stop Frist from mustering the needed 60 votes to do so. There are 44 Senate Democrats.

Sen. Edward Kennedy said he and fellow Democrat John Kerry, both of Massachusetts, were taking the lead in pushing for a filibuster, a procedural roadblock that permits for unlimited debate to stop a nominee.

However about a half-dozen moderate Democrats, including some opposed to Alito, have said they would not support a filibuster. And assistant Senate Democratic leader Dick Durbin of Illinois said: "I've come to the conclusion that it is highly unlikely that a filibuster would succeed."

Earlier on Thursday, Democratic Sens. Robert Byrd of West Virginia and Tim Johnson of South Dakota declared their support of Alito. They joined Democrat Ben Nelson of Nebraska, who had announced last week that he would vote for him.

Byrd, Johnson and Nelson represent states that voted for Bush, who promised in his campaign to nominate conservatives to the nation's highest court.

Democratic critics have argued that Alito poses a threat on such fronts as civil rights and abortion, and would not be an effective check on presidential powers.

Byrd said that no one could know exactly what kind of justice Alito would prove to be.

"But my considered judgment from his record, from his answers to my questions, and from his obvious intelligence and sincerity, leads me to believe him to be an honorable man, who loves his country, loves his Constitution and will give of his best," Byrd said. "Can we really ask for more?"

NOT A RADICAL

Johnson said while he had concerns about Alito's "narrow interpretation" of certain civil rights laws, "I cannot accept an argument that his views are so radical that the Senate is justified in denying his confirmation."

At a White House news conference, Bush urged the Senate to wrap up its debate as soon as possible and confirm Alito.

"He understands that the role of a judge is to interpret the law," Bush said. "He understands the role of a judge is not to advance a personal or political agenda."

Kennedy said, "This is a vote of a generation and a test of conscience. Judge Alito does not share the values of equality and justice that make this country strong. He does not deserve a place on the highest court of the land."

The Senate confirmation vote on Alito is expected to be far closer than the 78-22 for John Roberts, Bush's first nomination to the high court.

Alito Supported By Two More Democrats (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, January 27, 2006

Federal Judge Samuel A. Alito Jr. picked up two more Democratic endorsements yesterday, guaranteeing that he will be confirmed as the 110th associate justice of the U.S. Supreme Court next week.

Democratic Sens. Robert C. Byrd of West Virginia and Tim Johnson of South Dakota said they will support the nomination, even as Sen. John Kerry of Massachusetts phoned in for a filibuster from the Swiss Alps.

Mr. Kerry made calls yesterday while attending the World Economic Forum in Davos, Switzerland, urging colleagues to join a last-ditch effort to thwart Judge Alito's confirmation. Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat, joined in Mr. Kerry's call for a filibuster.

Republicans -- eager to relive the days during the 2004 presidential campaign when they called Mr. Kerry "an international man of mystery" -- delighted in his choice of venue.

"He shouldn't be wasting taxpayers' hard-earned money on long-distance phone charges calling for such obstruction," said Sen. George Allen, Virginia Republican.

"I hope it doesn't interrupt his snowboarding plans," added Joseph Cella, president of the conservative Catholic group Fidelis. He noted that American voters support Judge Alito's confirmation by a nearly 2-to-1 margin.

"While I'm sure Senator Kerry feels right at home at the plush resort, he has only further marginalized himself as a very liberal senator who is completely out of touch with middle American values," Mr. Cella said.

The effort comes after the New York Times yesterday called for a filibuster in an editorial titled "Senators in Need of a Spine." It also came shortly after the National Abortion Federation called for a filibuster.

Mr. Kennedy said he thinks Minority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada, Minority Whip Richard J. Durbin of Illinois and Sen. Debbie Stabenow of Michigan will join the filibuster effort. That vote will take place Monday. If Republicans round up 60 votes -- which many Democrats concede will happen -- it will be followed by a final vote on confirmation on Tuesday.

Mr. Reid said earlier on the Senate floor, however, that more debate time -- the primary reason for filibusters -- would not be needed.

"No one can complain on this matter that there hasn't been sufficient time to talk about Judge Alito, pro or con," he said.

No matter how Mr. Reid votes, there won't be enough Democrats to block the nomination. The 55 Senate Republicans already had at least five Democrats joining them in opposition to a filibuster, and got three more yesterday.

Mr. Johnson was joined by Sens. Ken Salazar of Colorado and Mary L. Landrieu of Louisiana in opposing a filibuster, though Mr. Salazar and Mrs. Landrieu said they will vote against Judge Alito's confirmation.

Mr. Byrd, who drew a Republican challenger this week in his Republican-leaning state, delivered a stinging rebuke of his colleagues for the treatment of Judge Alito during the hearing.

"Was it really necessary to subject Mrs. Alito to the harsh glare of television klieg lights as she fled the hearing room in tears, fighting to maintain her dignity in response to others with precious little of their own?" he asked on the Senate floor.

Mr. Johnson, whose state President Bush won with 60 percent of the vote in 2004, said Judge Alito would not have been his pick for the Supreme Court.

"Nonetheless, I must conclude that Judge Alito possesses a high level of legal skill, is a man of solid personal integrity, and that his views fall within the mainstream of contemporary conservative jurisprudential thinking," he said.

Kerry Urges Alito Filibuster, But His Reception Is Cool (NYT)

By David D. Kirkpatrick

WASHINGTON, Jan 26 — Senator John Kerry of Massachusetts could not attend the Senate debate on the Supreme Court nomination of Judge Samuel A. Alito Jr. on Thursday. He was in Davos, Switzerland, mingling with international business and political leaders at the World Economic Forum.

But late Thursday afternoon, Mr. Kerry began calling fellow Democratic senators in a quixotic, last-minute effort for a filibuster to stop the nomination.

"God bless John Kerry," said Don Stewart, a spokesman for Senator John Cornyn, a Texas Republican on the Judiciary Committee. "He just cinched this whole nomination. With Senator Kerry, it is Christmas every day."

Steve Schmidt, a White House spokesman working on the nomination, said Mr. Kerry's move "says a lot less about Alito than it does about the Iowa primary in 2008," suggesting that Mr. Kerry, who lost the presidential race in 2004, was playing to his party's liberal base in a bid to recapture its nomination.

"No one can complain on this matter that there hasn't been sufficient time to talk about Judge Alito, pro and con," Mr. Reid said on the Senate floor. "I hope that this matter will be resolved without too much more talking."

Mr. Kerry's call for a filibuster, an effort to stop confirmation by refusing to close debate and hold a vote, was joined by his fellow Democratic senator from Massachusetts, Edward M. Kennedy.

Under Senate procedures, their objections blocked the Senate Democratic and Republican leaders from setting Tuesday as the date for a vote on confirmation.

Instead, the Senate will vote Monday on whether to close debate. Sixty votes are required for a full Senate vote on Judge Alito. More than 60 senators have already pledged to support him, and the leaders of both parties said they expected to hold the full vote on Tuesday.

Mr. Kerry offered an explanation for his position in a post on a liberal blog, the Daily Kos.

"People can say all they want that 'elections have consequences,' " he wrote. "Trust me, more than anyone I understand that. But that seems like an awfully convoluted rationale for me to stay silent about Judge Alito's nomination."

Mr. Kerry was celebrated by leaders of the coalition of liberal groups opposing Judge Alito's nomination.

"Senator John Kerry has called for a filibuster of the Alito nomination, heeding your calls to do everything possible to defeat it," People for the American Way cheered in an e-mail message to its supporters.

Mr. Kennedy said a filibuster might help focus attention on the nomination and give its opponents a last chance to sway the public and the Senate.

He acknowledged some "divisions in the caucus" over the advisability of a filibuster, but he said the effort had the support of a few others, including Senator Richard J. Durbin of Illinois, the Democratic whip.

A spokesman for Mr. Durbin confirmed that he would vote against closing debate.

"It is an uphill climb at this point," Mr. Kennedy said of a filibuster. "But it is achievable."

Asked if Mr. Kerry's absence from the Senate would hinder their efforts, Mr. Kennedy said, "We'll do the best we can and make a good fight of it."

And when the Democratic caucus met Wednesday to discuss the nomination, he gave an impassioned plea that the party should try to stage a filibuster even if it failed, people present said, speaking only if granted anonymity because the meeting was private. Some senators at the meeting said an unsuccessful filibuster would leave the party weakened for future battles.

Some said a messy and unsuccessful filibuster fight would distract from the Democratic focus on other issues like corruption in government and wiretapping by the Bush administration.

In the end the party leaders were not persuaded by Mr. Kerry's appeal.

Judge Alito's confirmation was looking increasingly certain Thursday. Two more Democrats, Senator Tim Johnson of South Dakota and Senator Robert C. Byrd of West Virginia, said they would break party ranks to vote for confirmation.

Mr. Byrd said his constituents had told him they were "appalled" by the harsh questioning Judge Alito received from the Senate Judiciary Committee at his confirmation hearings, calling them "an outrage and a disgrace."

With Senator Ben Nelson of Nebraska, Mr. Johnson and Mr. Byrd bring the number of Democrats pledging support for Judge Alito to three. The vote on confirmation is expected to hew closely to party lines. No Republicans have said they will vote against him.

Two Republican supporters of abortion rights, Senators Olympia J. Snowe of Maine and Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island, have not declared how they will vote.

Shortly after 7 p.m., Mr. Kerry issued a statement saying, "Judge Alito's confirmation would be an ideological coup on the Supreme Court."

"The president has every right to nominate Samuel Alito to the Supreme Court," Mr. Kerry said. "It's our right and our responsibility to oppose him vigorously."

A few moments later, April Boyd, a spokeswoman for Mr. Kerry, sent a postscript saying that "as things played out over the course of the day today" he had decided to fly home. "Kerry will be back in Washington tomorrow," Ms. Boyd said.

Senate GOP Seeks To Force Vote On Alito (KCS)

By Jesse J. Holland

The Kansas City Star, January 27, 2006

WASHINGTON - Die-hard Democratic critics of Supreme Court nominee Samuel Alito threatened on Thursday to block a vote on his confirmation, and Republicans countered with a move designed to force his approval by early next week.

"It is time to establish an end point" in the debate over President Bush's selection to replace Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, said Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., said he and other Democrats had refused to agree to a timetable for ending debate. "There's some division in our caucus," he conceded.

"There's been adequate time for people to debate," Reid said.

Alito, 55 and a 15-year veteran of the federal appeals court, has well over 50 votes for confirmation. He gained the support of Democrats Tim Johnson of South Dakota and Robert C. Byrd of West Virginia during the day, and has the backing of at least 52 of the Senate's 55 Republicans.

The Senate will vote Monday on cutting off debate. If Alito's supporters get 60 votes in the 100-member body, the confirmation vote will follow on Tuesday.

"The president has every right to nominate Samuel Alito to the Supreme Court," Kerry said. "Its our right and our responsibility to oppose him vigorously and to fight against this radical upending of the Supreme Court."

White House spokesman Stephen Schmidt predicted the Republicans would easily win. "More than 60 senators have signaled their intentions to vote against the filibuster and give Judge Alito the up-or-down vote that he deserves," he said.

Frist said he had been unable to win a commitment from all senators on a time for a final vote. Instead, he set the stage for cutting off debate Monday with what is known as a cloture vote.

Democrats' concern over Alito's nomination has been heightened because he would replace O'Connor, who has been the swing vote on 5-4 rulings that maintained abortion rights, preserved affirmative action and limited the application of the death penalty.

Conservatives agree that Alito could push the court to the right, but they welcome the prospect.

Kennedy said, "The nominee is deficient in his commitment ... to individual rights, individual liberties, women's rights and racial equality."

The senator conceded he faced an "uphill climb" in the effort to block confirmation but said it was possible.

Asked to name other Democrats siding with him, he cited Dick Durbin of Illinois, the second-ranking Senate Democrat, as well as Paul Sarbanes of Maryland and Debbie Stabenow of Michigan.

Patrick Leahy of Vermont, the senior Democrat on the Judiciary Committee, opposes Alito's confirmation but has not yet decided whether to support the filibuster, an aide said.

Alito "understands the role of a judge is not to advance a personal and political agenda," Bush said at the White House. "He is a decent man."

Democrats contended anew that Alito's confirmation would put individual rights and liberties in danger. Dianne Feinstein of California, the only woman on the Senate Judiciary Committee, said he would join justices Clarence Thomas and Antonin Scalia in the court's conservative wing and apply "originalist" interpretations to court decisions.

"If an originalist analysis was applied to the Fourteenth Amendment, women would not be provided equal protection under the Constitution, interracial marriages could be outlawed, schools could still be segregated and the principle of one man, one vote would not govern the way we elect our representatives," Feinstein said.

Nelson, Byrd and Johnson are the only Democrats to express support for Alito so far.

Democrats Split Over Filibuster On Alito (WP)

By Charles Babington

Several prominent Democratic senators called for a filibuster of Samuel A. Alito Jr.'s Supreme Court nomination yesterday, exposing a deep divide in the party even as they delighted the party's liberal base.

The filibuster's supporters -- including Sens. John F. Kerry and Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts -- acknowledged that the bid is likely to fail and that Alito is virtually certain to be confirmed Tuesday. But they said extended debate may draw more Americans' attention to Alito's conservative stands on abortion, civil rights, presidential powers and other matters.

"Judge Alito will take America backward, especially when it comes to civil rights and discrimination laws," Kerry said in a statement issued by his office. He added: "It's our right and our responsibility to oppose him vigorously and to fight against this radical upending of the Supreme Court."

Kennedy said that Alito, 55, "does not share the values of equality and justice that make this country strong," adding: "He does not deserve a place on the highest court of the land."

Liberal groups such as People for the American Way have implored Democratic senators to filibuster Alito's nomination, even if it means nothing more than staking their principles and showing that Democrats will fight against a party that controls the House, Senate and White House. But many Republicans have relished the idea of a Democratic-led filibuster, saying it helps them portray the minority party as obstructionist and beholden to left-leaning groups.

"Continuing to threaten a filibuster, even after it is crystal clear that Democrats don't have the necessary votes to sustain their obstruction, is needless, strange and at odds with many of their fellow Democrats," Sen. John Cornyn (R-Tex.) said in a statement. Some Republicans poked fun at Kerry -- the 2004 Democratic presidential nominee, who may make another White House bid -- for allowing others to announce the filibuster plan earlier in the day while he was attending an economic conference in Davos, Switzerland.

A filibuster involves endless debate intended to keep a measure -- such as a judicial nomination -- from reaching a vote. Sixty votes in the 100-member Senate are needed to end a filibuster. Republicans hold 55 seats, and enough Democratic senators will join them to end debate and hold a vote next week with votes to spare, Alito supporters said. If Alito supporters failed to get the 60 votes, a filibuster officially would begin and debate would continue.

Bitter disputes over judicial filibusters nearly brought the Senate to a standstill last year. After Democrats used the stalling tactic to block several of President Bush's appellate court nominees, Republicans threatened to change Senate rules to ban judicial filibusters. A bipartisan accord, which excluded both parties' leaders, averted the showdown and made a successful filibuster effort considerably more difficult. GOP leaders say they will revive their "nuclear option" threat if a Democratic filibuster endangers confirmation of a Bush nominee.

Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) said the Senate will vote Monday afternoon to end debate and vote Tuesday morning on whether to confirm Alito to succeed retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. At least three Democratic senators -- Ben Nelson (Neb.), Robert C. Byrd Jr. (W.Va.) and Tim Johnson (S.D.) -- have said they will vote for Alito. Others have said they would not support a filibuster, regardless how they vote on confirmation.

Senate Democratic Leader Harry M. Reid (Nev.) repeatedly told colleagues this week that he wanted to avoid a filibuster, party members said. He looked frustrated in the Senate chamber yesterday as he told Frist he could not avert the parliamentary tactic. Shrugging his shoulders, Reid said he hoped "this matter will be resolved without too much more talking, but . . . everyone has the right to talk."

Party sources said Reid and others worry that a filibuster, while likely to fail, will nonetheless detract voters' attention from issues that Democratic leaders consider more promising. They include Bush's controversial domestic surveillance program, the indictments of a top White House official and a congressional leader, and the unfolding scandal centered on former lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

Party leaders especially worry about forcing a filibuster decision on Democrats seeking reelection this fall in GOP-leaning states, including Nelson and Kent Conrad (N.D.).

While Reid hoped to avoid a filibuster, Democratic Whip Richard J. Durbin (Ill.) supports it. But at a midday session with reporters, Durbin acknowledged the likely futility.

"Having made a count," he said, "I have come to the conclusion it is highly unlikely that a filibuster would succeed."

Bring It On (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 27, 2006

According to CNN, Senator John Kerry announced yesterday that he will attempt to rally his fellow Democrats to stage a filibuster to stop the confirmation of Samuel Alito to the Supreme Court. Apparently, this is not a parody.

Mr. Kerry made this dramatic political intervention from the World Economic Forum in Davos, Switzerland, where he was communing with his political base. He wants his Democratic colleagues to revisit the filibuster strategy that they used to such brilliant effect during President Bush's first term. Republicans assailed Democrats for this obstructionism in 2002 and 2004, and the issue helped them win a mere seven or eight seats in red states.

And this was after filibusters on obscure appellate nominees. Imagine the political gain for Republicans after a Supreme Court filibuster -- with all of its 24/7 publicity -- by blue-state liberals against a modest Italian-American with impeccable legal credentials and stainless ethics. Mr. Kerry really seems to believe that the country will rise up in fury when it discovers that Judge Alito believes that the Constitution gives a President wide powers to defend America.

Back on planet Earth, at least three red-state Democrats have now said they'll vote for Judge Alito. Two of them -- Robert Byrd of West Virginia and Ben Nelson of Nebraska -- happen to be up for re-election this year. Mr. Kerry may not care much about the Senate because his real goal is winning the Democratic nomination for President again in 2008. Republicans should be so lucky.

Bush To Embrace A 'competitiveness' Agenda (FT)

By Caroline Daniel And Edward Alden In Washington

Financial Times, January 27, 2006

George W. Bush, US president, is to embrace a "competitiveness" agenda advocated by big US technology companies in his State of the Union address next week.

Amid growing concerns that the US is lagging behind in cutting-edge research and has fallen behind China and India in training science and technology graduates, he is expected to highlight the need for measures to improve US industry's competitiveness.

In a press conference in Washington on Thursday, Mr Bush said: "We live in a competitive world, and so policies must be put in place to recognise the competition of the global economy and prepare our people to be able to continue to compete so America can continue to lead."

Business groups have been urging the administration to support higher spending on research and development, expanded education in science and engineering and liberalised immigration laws to bring more foreign scientists and engineers to the US.

The issue is one on which the White House could benefit from bipartisan co-operation.

Three Democrats and one Republican senator introduced bills on Wednesday to implement the recommendations of a National Academy of Sciences report last year.

It warned that America's competitive edge was eroding, and the bills call for $9bn (€7.4bn) in new spending, including a doubling of the funding available for basic research, scholarships for future mathematics and science teachers and reform of US visa laws that deter foreign students.

Bruce Josten, executive vice-president at the US Chamber of Commerce, said he expected the president to address the competitiveness issue in Tuesday's state of the union address, and played down the impact on the budget at a time when the White House wants to rein in domestic spending. "When you are talking about a budget for 2007 of $2,400bn, I don't want to sound crass, but $9bn is a rounding error."

Top US executives – including Ed Zander at Motorola and Jeffrey Immelt, chief executive of General Electric – have focused on the issue of US competitiveness in recent speeches.

Last week, Mr Immelt told the Economic Club of Washington, “If you want good manufacturing jobs, one thing you could do is graduate more engineers. We had more sports exercise majors graduate than electrical engineering graduates last year. If you want to be the massage capital of the world, you’re well on your way.”

At the instigation of US technology and manufacturing companies, the commerce department hosted a national summit on competitiveness last month, attended not just by business and university leaders but also by four cabinet secretaries as well as business and university leaders.

In the closing statement, summit participants warned: “If trends in US research and education continue, our nation will squander its economic leadership, and the result will be a lower standard of living for the American people.”

Tight Budget Limits Bush's Options (WSJ)

By John Harwood

The Wall Street Journal, January 27, 2006

BUSH PLANS emphasis on broad themes as red ink thins policy options.

Advisers say budget squeeze will curb initiatives in Tuesday's State of the Union. Bush's track record suggests little polling benefit; his ratings dropped after two of four earlier addresses.

Historians shrug; a ranking of top 100 American speeches in 20th century includes just one State of the Union, Franklin Roosevelt's Four Freedoms speech. Many tune in to see guests sitting with first lady, says University of Wisconsin professor Stephen Lucas.

White House and Republican leaders hope to reassemble narrow 2005 majority for budget bill; Senate Democrats used procedural maneuver to force repeat vote. House Republicans also plan to pass one-month Patriot Act extension before turning to election of DeLay's successor.

Senate Leader Frist wants confirmations by Wednesday of Alito to Supreme Court and Bernanke to Federal Reserve. Senate also will begin resolving tax-cut difference with House. Though strategist Rove rips Democrats on national security, Bush says in Wall Street Journal interview he'll be "calling upon the better nature of those of us in Washington" toward bipartisan compromises.

PARTIES BATTLE TO define 2006 playing field.

With most partisan outcomes predictable due to election district gerrymandering, Democratic hopes of regaining House majority depend on expanding number of competitive seats. House Democrats, who need net gain of 15, say outcome remains in doubt in as many as 50 districts.

"Maybe 30 at most," responds Carl Forti of House Republicans' campaign committee. Nonpartisan analyst Stu Rothenberg says 42 seats, three-fourths held by Republicans, are "in play." In paper for National Bureau of Economic Research, Yale's Ebonya Washington finds African-American Democratic nominees boost general election turnout by two to three percentage points among blacks and whites alike.

OPEN SPIGOT: Money pours into both parties despite scandal headlines. By outraising Democrats $102 million to $51 million last year, Republican National Committee regains traditional edge lost during 2004 campaign. Dean dents DNC's bottom line by paying for new staffers hired by state parties. ImpeachPAC, backing Democrats committed to forcing Bush from office, raises $47,000 in first two months.

COLD WAR RESTRICTIONS will fall if Bush administration persuades Congress to clear the way for Russia's entry into World Trade Organization. But some conservatives, questioning Putin's commitment to democracy and free-market forces, still resist. Trade Representative Portman also seeks election-year WTO membership for Ukraine, Vietnam and Kazakhstan.

PRIORITY SHIFT: Hamas victory in Palestinian elections alters Rice's coming London talks with foreign ministers of Russia, France, Britain, China and Germany. The secretary of state wants allies in Europe -- major donors of aid to Palestinians -- to join in demanding that Hamas renounce terror tactics.

Democratic Sen. Schumer asks Judiciary Chairman Specter to call former Justice Department official James Comey to testify on warrantless surveillance. Comey, now general counsel of Lockheed Martin, had forced changes in the program as deputy attorney general in spring 2004.

But the White House, which earlier chided Comey as too much of a stickler, turned to him as liaison with New York Times in trying to head off disclosure of the program in 2004 and 2005. Bush has said the leak "damages our national security," but declined in the interview to say how.

"A relevant question," Bush said, but "I'm not going to answer it."

MINOR MEMOS: President cites audience comment at Kansas State forum as evidence of continued interest in Social Security overhaul, then adds, "It's a random sample of one, admittedly." ... Not waiting for interviewers, Bush says, "I can ask my own questions -- 'What about Iran, Mr. President?' "

Speech Protesters Granted Spot (WP)

By Karlyn Barker

Organizers of a planned protest during President Bush's State of the Union address next week reached an agreement yesterday with law enforcement officials and will now be allowed to use the area around the U.S. Capitol Reflecting Pool for their demonstration.

The demonstrators had initially been offered the Reflecting Pool area on the west side of the Capitol as a protest site but then were told that the site had been reclassified as part of the security perimeter for the day of Bush's speech.

Organizers of the Tuesday protest, called "World Can't Wait -- Drive Out the Bush Regime," filed a federal lawsuit Wednesday seeking a court order to let them hold the gathering at the Reflecting Pool. They met yesterday with police and government representatives to resolve the issue.

"The Capitol Police reassessed its security concerns regarding the area around the Capitol Reflecting Pool and withdrew its request to the U.S. Park Service to close that area during President Bush's State of the Union address," said Channing Phillips, a spokesman for the U.S. attorney's office, which participated in discussions to settle the dispute.

Phillips said the nearby grassy areas on the Capitol grounds are fenced off because of turf renovation. But he said the amended permit, which will be issued by the National Park Service, will be sufficient for the group's needs.

James R. Klimaski, an attorney for the demonstrators, said the lawsuit will be withdrawn as soon as the group receives the amended permit. A hearing was held before U.S. District Judge Ricardo M. Urbina yesterday to tell him that the matter had been resolved.

The protest group said it was told Jan. 10 that it could use the area around the Capitol Reflecting Pool for a demonstration timed to coincide with Bush's 9 p.m. address to Congress. But on Jan. 19, organizers were told that the U.S. Capitol Police had expanded the security area to include the Reflecting Pool and that they would have to confine the demonstration to the gravel walkways between Third and Fourth streets on the Mall. The other option was to gather at Seventh Street, about a mile from the Capitol.

"A protest not seen and a protest not heard is not a protest," said Travis Morales, one of the organizers of the demonstration, who accused the Bush administration of trying to keep demonstrators far from the Capitol. He said yesterday that the Reflecting Pool area "will hold thousands more people" than the gravel walkways.

Sgt. Kimberly Schneider, a spokeswoman for the U.S. Capitol Police, gave no explanation yesterday for the change of position. The department, she said, "constantly re-evaluates security requirements leading up to large events."

L.A. Mayor, Key Democrats Discuss Reply To Bush's Address (LAT)

By Patrick Mcgreevy

WASHINGTON — Los Angeles Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa huddled Thursday with Democratic leaders from Congress to discuss his Spanish-language response to the president's State of the Union address next week, and there were signs of some disagreement over how to present their case.

Villaraigosa, in Washington this week to attend a meeting of the United States Conference of Mayors, also made the rounds of national media outlets, appearing on C-SPAN, National Public Radio and MSNBC to talk about the task of rebutting President Bush and the mayor's new role as chairman of a poverty task force for the mayors' group.

On C-SPAN's live show "Washington Journal," the mayor complained about federal cuts in anti-poverty money, but without naming Bush.

"The federal government cannot afford to cut the safety net as they have for so many years," Villaraigosa said.

He planned meetings with mayors from Atlanta and other cities late into the night and planned to take a 6 a.m. flight back to L.A. today.

At times on Thursday, his energy seemed to flag, despite standing out in the crowd in his pressed, dark suit.

Between broadcast interviews, Villaraigosa met with Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid, Senate Minority Whip Richard J. Durbin and House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi to discuss the party's response to the State of the Union speech.

The mayor emerged from a meeting with Durbin and Pelosi saying that he did not want to be too negative about the president, on whom his city depends for federal financial help.

"My remarks depend, in part, on what the president has to say, but I think my focus will be more an alternative vision, as opposed to one that spends a lot of time criticizing the administration," Villaraigosa told The Times.

"It will be one that focuses on opportunity and hope."

The mayor's comments were in contrast to speeches by Pelosi and Durbin at a luncheon attended by Villaraigosa at the National Press Club on Thursday. Pelosi said that on key issues the policies we have seen from Republicans in power do not match the priorities of the American people."

Asked if his speech in Spanish would be different from the Democratic rebuttal in English, to be delivered by Gov. Tim Kaine of Virginia, Villaraigosa said he agreed to speak to the nation only if he could retain editorial control.

He repeated that the key words of his speech will be "hope" and "opportunity."

The mayor, who was national co-chairman of John Kerry's presidential campaign, said the Republicans have in recent years "been able to speak to America's heart … better than Democrats have. We are good at speaking to her head. They speak to her heart. They speak to America's values in a way that I think has resonated in the last two elections. That's clear to me."

The mayor's office is a nonpartisan post, and Villaraigosa said issues such as poverty are not owned by any party.

"It's an American tragedy," he said. "We have to speak to America's heart, to her values."

The mayor got a firsthand look at the different values held by some Americans as he was peppered with questions about immigration from callers on C-SPAN's "Washington Journal."

After saying that Los Angeles is not going to follow the lead of Costa Mesa and involve police officers more in identifying illegal immigrants, a caller from Arkansas said not enough was being done to counter illegal immigration.

The woman declared: "It's only after the influx of illegals that you were elected, sir. How is this possible?"

Clearly stunned, Villaraigosa responded, "Are you kidding?" After a long silence, he added, "I was born in the United States."

State Of The Union (NYT)

By Thomas L. Friedman

DOJ_NMG_0012455

The New York Times, January 27, 2006

On Tuesday President Bush will deliver his State of the Union address and map out priorities for his last three years. The direction in which America needs to go is obvious: toward energy independence. If Mr. Bush steps up to that challenge, this speech could be a new beginning for his presidency. If he doesn't, you can stick a fork in this administration. It will be done — because it will have abdicated leadership on the biggest issue of our day. Here's the speech I'll be listening for:

My fellow Americans, on May 25, 1961, President Kennedy gave an extraordinary State of the Union address in which he called on the nation to marshal all of its resources to put a man on the Moon. By setting that lofty goal, Kennedy was trying to summon all of our industrial and scientific talent, and a willingness to sacrifice financially, to catch up with the Soviet Union, which had overtaken America in the field of large rocket engines.

"While we cannot guarantee that we shall one day be first," Kennedy said, "we can guarantee that any failure to make this effort will make us last."

I come to you this evening with a similar challenge. President Kennedy was worried about the threat that communism posed to our way of life. I am here to tell you that if we don't move away from our dependence on oil and shift to renewable fuels, it will change our way of life for the worse — and soon — much, much more than communism ever could have. Making this transition is the calling of our era.

Why? First, we are in a war with a violent strain of Middle East Islam that is indirectly financed by our consumption of oil. Second, with millions of Indians and Chinese buying cars and homes as they join the great global middle class, we must quickly move away from burning fossil fuels or we're going to create enough global warming to melt the North Pole. Because of that, green cars, homes, offices, appliances, designs and renewable energies will be the biggest growth industry of the 21st century. If we don't dominate that industry, China, India, Japan or Europe surely will.

But to lead, we must impose the highest energy-efficiency standards on our own automakers and other industries so we force them to be the most innovative. I want to inspire girls and boys across America to study math, science and engineering to help our nation achieve green energy independence. President Kennedy said, Let's put a man on the Moon. I say, Let's make oil obsolete.

Finally, my call for spreading democracy will never be achieved if some of the worst regimes on the planet — Iran, Sudan, Venezuela — have so much oil money they can misbehave and ignore the world, and if the rest of us — Europe, America, China and India — are forever coddling them to get access to their crude.

With all of this in mind, I am sending Congress the Bush Energy Freedom Act. It is based on ideas first offered by the energy expert Philip Verleger and it argues the following:

Transportation accounts for most of our oil consumption. And many Americans have purchased big cars and S.U.V.'s, expecting gasoline to remain cheap. That is no longer the case. Therefore, I propose creating a government agency that will buy up any gas-guzzling car or truck in America at the original new or used price, and crush it. This national buy-back program will be financed by a $2-a-gallon gasoline tax that will be phased in by 10 cents a month beginning in 2008 — so people know what is coming and start buying fuel-efficient cars right now.

By removing so many gas guzzlers, we will quickly reduce our oil consumption and create a huge demand for new energy-efficient cars from Detroit, which will rescue our auto industry. We have to do something drastic. The Harley-Davidson motorcycle company is worth more today than General Motors! But by sharply raising the gasoline tax, we'll also make sure that Detroit shifts its fleet to energy-saving plug-in hybrids and hydrogen- and ethanol-fueled vehicles, which will force Detroit to out-innovate Toyota. And by generating so much income from a gasoline tax, we will be able to give gas-tax rebates to lower-income folks and have plenty left over to pay for new investment in education and scientific research.

Impossible? Read my lips: Nothing is impossible when Americans put their hearts and minds to it.

One last thing: I have accepted the resignation of Vice President Dick Cheney, who felt he could not be a salesman for the Energy Freedom Act. I am nominating Jeffrey Immelt — the C.E.O. of General Electric, who has focused G.E.'s innovation around "eco-imagination" — as Mr. Cheney's replacement.

Good night, and God bless America.

How Bush Would Tame Healthcare Costs (CSM)

By Alexandra Marks

The Christian Science Monitor, January 27, 2006

NEW YORK - President Bush is moving to put healthcare at the top of America's political agenda. In his State of the Union speech next Tuesday, he is expected to propose a series of initiatives that are designed to rein in the spiraling cost of healthcare and increase the number of Americans with insurance. To do this, he is hoping to encourage a market-oriented, consumer-driven system. Key components of his plan include the expansion of health savings accounts, additional tax breaks for individuals who buy insurance on their own, and provisions that would improve public access to information on healthcare pricing.

Supporters contend the proposals are crucial to making American more of an "ownership" society, allowing individuals to have more control over their healthcare choices. Critics warn they'll shift more risk onto individuals and undermine the nation's already strained health-insurance system.

Health savings accounts are tax-free accounts that individuals or businesses can set up at banks or credit unions, in conjunction with the purchase of high-deductible, so-called catastrophic health insurance. Individuals can now contribute as much as $2,600, and families as much as $5,150 each year. Bush is expected to propose increasing these limits. The accounts are to be used for routine medical expenses, such as checkups and pharmaceutical costs. The insurance is there as a backup in case of a health emergency.

In the past year, the number of individuals with such policies tripled to 3 million, according to America's Health Insurance Plans (AHIP), a medical lobbying group in Washington. That accounts for about 1 percent of the insured population.

Pros

• Is designed to give consumers more choice of providers and services.

• May encourage medical-services shoppers to be more cost-conscious because they will be spending their own money.

• Makes insurance more affordable to some of the working uninsured, since the premiums for catastrophic insurance are lower than traditional premiums.

"About one-third of the individuals who were purchasing [the catastrophic insurance in conjunction with setting up an HSA] didn't have health insurance prior to the offering of these policies," says Karen Ignani, president and CEO of AHIP. "Clearly these policies are reaching out to a segment of the population that heretofore found coverage too expensive."

Cons

• Because of very high deductibles, could discourage the purchase of preventive or other care that is deemed necessary, which could lead to higher overall medical costs.

• Does not address the real drivers of healthcare inflation: advances in expensive medical technology and the growing cases of chronic illness. (Eighty percent of healthcare spending in the US is for individuals diagnosed with chronic problems, like diabetes.)

• Will be attractive to healthier, wealthier people, draining them from the insurance risk pool and leaving only higher-risk people with traditional insurance, which would drive up the cost.

"It takes us back to the equity question of whether we want to be spreading the costs out through society so that people who get sick don't bear the full cost of their own illness," says Mark Schlesinger, a health policy expert at Yale University. "This is basically saying once you're sick, you can plan to spend more for the rest of your life as opposed to saying we'll help share that burden with you." Tax breaks for those buying their own insurance

When businesses buy employees' health insurance, they receive a tax break, which is essentially a taxpayer subsidy worth about $120 billion annually. Individuals who buy health insurance on their own currently receive no tax break. They must spend more than 7.5 percent of their income on medical expenses before qualifying for an income-tax deduction. Of the 45 million uninsured, 80 percent are estimated to be working at low-wage jobs, many of which don't include health insurance.

Bush is expected to call for individuals to be able to take deductions similar to those taken by businesses.

Pros

• Could create incentives for more uninsured individuals to buy insurance.

DOJ_NMG_0012457

• Levels the playing field between businesses and individuals.

"We're throwing a tremendous amount of dollars at people like me. I have a nice job and a nice salary," says Joseph Antos, a healthcare expert with the American Enterprise Institute. "I'm appreciative, but in truth I don't need it nearly as much as someone who is working at the minimum wage who isn't getting that tax break."

Cons

• Might encourage some businesses to cut back on the health insurance they provide.

• Is estimated to cost in the tens of millions of dollars, and with increasing deficits, Congress may balk.

• May not help the working poor, unless the tax advantage is given as a credit.

"Only a refundable tax credit will help people [with little income] who have little or no tax liability," says Mr. Antos. More transparency in pricing

Currently, no national standard exists by which consumers can judge the quality and cost of varying healthcare services. By creating such a set of standards - which an alliance of healthcare providers is currently attempting to do - and encouraging hospitals and doctors to comply, consumers would have the tools to shop for the best care at the best bargain. Even the staunchest advocates of HSAs agree that without such data, consumer-driven healthcare won't work as advertised.

Pros

• Helps consumers make more informed choices.

• Helps improve quality of care.

"You will get a lot more pressure to understand the comparative effectiveness of technologies and medical procedures," says Gail Wilensky, a health policy expert at Project Hope in Washington. "That can help payers, providers, and even the patient community to understand if there is either not much known or a lot of dispute about how effective a new technology or procedure may be. For some people in some circumstances it can make all of the difference in the world."

Cons

• Is expensive to implement because of the database technology required.

• Could take years to accomplish because medical culture is slow to change.

• Is based on cost, when some consumers don't make medical decisions on that basis.

• Could be difficult for consumers to understand.

"It's right now such a complex pricing mechanism that even experts on the inside have trouble deciphering it. How in the world is an individual consumer going to?" says Dr. Henry Simmons, president of the National Coalition on Health Care in Washington.

Savings Accounts For Health Costs Attract Wall St. (NYT)

By Eric Dash

The New York Times, January 27, 2006

When it comes to medical benefits, millions of Americans already have a health insurer. Soon, many will also have a debit card and a bank tied to their medical plan.

Banks, credit unions and money management firms are now quietly positioning themselves to become central players in the business of health care, offering 401(k)-type accounts to cover future medical expenses.

Bank of America, J. P. Morgan Chase, Fidelity Investments and hundreds of others are hoping to capitalize on the latest wrinkle in medical care paid by consumers: health savings accounts, which have been around since 2003 but are moving to the fore of the national agenda in anticipation of the State of the Union address on Tuesday.

These supercharged checking accounts, which must be linked to a high-deductible health insurance plan, allow consumers to invest their own money for current and future medical expenses and have it grow tax-free.

They are the centerpiece of President Bush's plans on health care, just as private accounts were offered as a Social Security fix.

Currently, only about three million Americans have signed up for the high-deductible insurance policy required for such accounts, up from slightly more than one million last March, according to findings released yesterday by America's Health Insurance Plans, an industry group. It is not clear how many of those people have actually opened a linked account. Still, the number is expected to rise sharply over the next five years.

By 2010, more than 15 million Americans, or about 10 percent of all those insured, will have a health savings account, according to an estimate by DiamondCluster International, a management consulting firm.

The average individual's account balance, it projects, will grow from $1,500 today to about $3,500 in 2010. Even if people pull out some or all of their money to pay their medical bills, the ballooning balances may mean that $75 billion or so in new money to manage will soon be at stake.

Banks and others are drawn by the promise of lucrative fees they can generate by offering consumers mutual funds and other investment vehicles as their account balances grow. Most also charge $50 to $75 to set up a health savings account, and they collect perhaps $40 or more each year in maintenance charges and service fees.

Not since the creation of the individual retirement account in the mid-1970's has such a potentially huge mountain of money landed in the lap of the financial services industry.

"Billions of dollars that used to be written in the form of checks with insurance companies' names on them would instead go to credit unions, banks, and long-term investment houses," said Dan Perrin, the publisher of H.S.A. Insider and executive director of the H.S.A. Coalition, a lobbying group backed by 70 small-business and medical industry groups as well as the American Bankers Association. "You know America: you see a financial opportunity and it sets off a gold rush."

Two years ago, not a single major bank offered a health savings account. Only seven small banks had any sort of plan. Today, more than 300 financial services companies, including big banks, are taking deposits or will be soon. About 150 more are on the way. Some of the country's biggest health insurance providers have started their own banks.

To be sure, health savings accounts will make up only a small fraction of earnings at a financial giant like Citigroup. But at a time when deposit growth has slowed and higher interest rates have hurt profits, they represent a steady stream of new income that is increasingly hard to find. Banks are betting that what the administration calls consumer-directed health care catches on.

Supporters say that the discipline and marketing might of financial services giants could spur the adoption of consumer-directed care. Critics argue that the banking industry's involvement only bolsters their case: the accounts are more about wealth than health.

"We already have a large number of retirement savings vehicles in the United States," said Jonathan Gruber, an economist and Treasury Department official in the Clinton administration. "It is not clear why we need yet another tax break for savings for rich guys."

Corporations, of course, want relief from soaring health care costs, and have been steadily shifting more of the burden to their employees. Small businesses were among the first to offer health savings accounts to their employees. But over the last year or so, a number of big companies — from Guidant to Wal-Mart Stores — have started signing up.

Health savings accounts are akin to the private accounts that were proposed to help overhaul Social Security. Much of Wall Street liked private retirement accounts, but their support was guarded because they feared a potential negative reaction.

Banking lobbyists have met with White House officials at least three times over the last year to discuss the rules governing health savings vehicles. But until recently, most have been shy about their interest in such plans. Now, they have established a lobbying group, the H.S.A. Council, and are spending millions of dollars to roll the plans out.

The idea behind the accounts is simple: forced to pay out of pocket for medical care, Americans workers will spend health care dollars more wisely. The way it works is more complex. Americans under the age of 65 with a high-deductible health care plan can contribute tax-free to the new 401(k)-like account as much as $2,700 this year for individuals and $5,450 for families, or the amount of their deductible if it is less. Unlike health reimbursement plans, which were controlled by the employer, health savings accounts belong to employees even if they change jobs.

The money can be used to pay for medical, dental and vision expenses as well as a portion of qualified premiums for long-term-care insurance.

The rest can be invested in stocks, bonds and mutual funds — and grow tax-free. That money would be available to pay for a broad range of health care expenses in the future, and would remain untaxed as long as it was spent on health care. At any time after age 65, money can be withdrawn for any reason without penalty, but the entire amount taken out would be taxed.

For wealthier people, the tax break could provide a generous incentive to build a nest egg for future health care; poorer people with smaller annual contributions could wind up spending all the money they put away during the year.

Geoff Dougall's accounting firm in Beaverton, Ore., is among the thousands of employers that have switched from a conventional health insurance plan to offering health savings account.

"We are very much talking about it as a savings vehicle," said Mr. Dougall, who is giving each of his employees $2,500 this year to cover the deductibles of their health insurance policies.

The savings accounts, in effect, give financial institutions a vital, but behind-the-scenes role in shaping the nation's health care system.

Banks hope to use their close ties with their customers to enter the health insurance market. For now, they collaborate with insurance providers as much as they compete. Health savings accounts must be opened in conjunction with a high-deductible health insurance plan. After choosing an insurance policy, the consumer must pick a bank.

Even though the health plan and savings account are separate products, big banks and insurance companies pitch them together as an "integrated solution" and split the fees. Health insurers keep the premiums; banks retain the investment management fees and the debit card transaction fees. The two split the money earned for opening and maintaining the accounts.

Health insurers, said David Josephs, J. P. Morgan's vice president for health care business development, "are good at explaining benefits."

"They are good at eligibility. They are good at enrollment. Managing risk. Contracting with doctors and hospitals. Banks are good at managing transactions. Managing deposits. Making investments."

"As you look at consumer-directed health care," he added, "it really requires both of those skill sets."

Even without the lucrative investment management fees, bank executives like Daniel Kelly, manager of H.S.A. services at U.S. Bancorp, say health savings accounts are attractive. Banks make money each time a customer swipes his debit card at a doctor's office. Payment processing alone could generate some $2.3 billion over the next five years, the DiamondCluster study estimates.

Some big medical plans have already entered the health saving account arena by starting their own bank.

Four years ago, United Healthcare started Exante Financial Services, a Utah-based bank that allowed it to become the first company to offer its customers the high-deductible health insurance policies as well as savings accounts. In December, the Blue Cross Blue Shield Association said it was planning to charter a similar institution, Blue Healthcare Bank, an online bank.

Executives at both companies say they are not being lured into the banking business by the prospects of wealth management; nor do they plan to offer traditional banking services and loans.

Instead, they say having both products under one roof will allow them to provide better customer service, like more smoothly processing transactions at doctors' offices or quickly resolving billing disputes.

"This has nothing to do with an assets-under-management play," said John M. Prince, chief executive of Exante Financial Services. "There will be huge falloff in people who are trying to play that role. Eighty percent of the money are assets that go right in and go right out."

Just a few years ago, the idea that the titans of health care and banking would be battling for business would have been nearly impossible to imagine.

Even after the Bush administration began pushing for the creation of health savings accounts with the Medicare Modernization Act of 2003, the banking industry mainly stayed on the sidelines. The American Banking Association lent its name to the H.S.A. Coalition lobbying group but did not contribute any money.

Industry lobbyists viewed the idea as a health care issue; they raised questions about its prospects of passing as the 2004 presidential race heated up. Banking executives did not see the profit potential after an experiment with Medical Savings Accounts, aimed at small businesses, failed.

"Put it this way, the impact of this law did not really become clear to them until after it passed," said Mr. Perrin, the H.S.A. Coalition director. Once they understood how the accounts worked, however, the big banks realized the next I.R.A. had landed at their feet.

Now, some financial institutions are urging the Bush administration and Congress to raise the tax-deductible contribution limit to encourage consumers to put more money in their accounts — a proposal that President Bush is expected to endorse in his State of the Union speech.

Banks are already champing at the bit. "We happen to be in the camp that the H.S.A. is a second retirement account to be used for medical expenses," said Nancy Todor, an executive who will oversee health savings accounts when Citigroup introduces them this year.

Enrollment Triples In Plans Offering Health Savings Accounts (LAT)

By Joel Havemann

The Los Angeles Times, January 27, 2006

WASHINGTON — Enrollment in high-deductible insurance plans that qualify for contributions to tax-sheltered health savings accounts — the Bush administration's way of adding market forces to the health business — tripled to 3 million people in the last 10 months, the health insurance industry reported Thursday.

"This is a very significant success story," said Karen Ignagni, president and chief executive of America's Health Insurance Plans, the trade association for companies that underwrite virtually all such plans.

But the 3 million enrollees in plans that qualify for the accounts represent a small percentage of the 198 million Americans who, as of 2004, were covered by private insurance — or even of the 46 million who have no insurance at all.

"Is it a success story? Yes and no," said Paul Fronstin, a health economist with the Employee Benefit Research Institute. "Three years ago, the market didn't exist. But it still amounts to only a fraction of Americans who have private insurance."

President Bush has signaled that in his State of the Union address Tuesday, he will ask Congress to expand health savings accounts, which are designed to shift responsibility for buying health insurance from employers to individuals.

Bush has said that those with comprehensive health insurance would benefit from the accounts because they would make more cost-effective healthcare choices if they knew that they would be responsible for much of the expenses. For those who are uninsured, the accounts could make insurance affordable because they are linked to low-cost policies with high deductibles.

Most Democrats have a different perspective. Sen. Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts wrote that health savings accounts worked only for the healthy and put at risk the health and resources of the poor.

Contributions to health savings accounts, which were authorized by the 2003 law that added a prescription drug benefit to Medicare, are tax-deductible, and withdrawals used for medical expenses are tax-free. Balances at year's end can be rolled over into the next year.

Individuals qualify to establish health savings accounts only if they are covered by insurance with annual deductibles of at least $1,050 for individuals or $2,100 for families. The cost of such insurance is typically far less than the price of traditional comprehensive coverage; the administration's thinking is that the difference would be contributed to the accounts.

Those contributions are limited to the amount of the deductible, with maximums of $2,700 for individuals and $5,450 for families. Ignagni said the high-deductible policies would become more attractive if the tax breaks for the accounts were expanded.

Grace-Marie Turner, president of the Galen Institute, a health and tax policy center in Alexandria, Va., found the incidence of high-deductible insurance policies impressive. "They're new," said Turner, whose organization backs increased use of the accounts. "It takes people a while to get used to them."

Although Ignagni could not say how many of the 3 million had opened and contributed to the tax-favored accounts, other research suggests that it is a small percentage.

An October survey of insured people by the Employee Benefit Research Institute and the Commonwealth Fund found that 1 in 10 people with private insurance had high-deductible plans; of them, 1 in 10 had set up either health savings accounts or health reimbursement accounts, to which only employers may contribute.

The survey also found that those with high-deductible plans were less satisfied with their insurance than those with comprehensive plans and were more likely to delay or avoid healthcare because of costs. But it found that enrollees in high-deductible plans were more aware of healthcare costs than those with comprehensive coverage.

Democrats: Bush Should Outline Medicare Fix (REU-Y2)

By Joanne Kenen

Reuters, January 27, 2006

Congressional Democrats on Thursday challenged President George W. Bush to outline in his State of the Union speech how he will fix what they consider a disastrous start to the Medicare drug benefit.

"In his State of the Union next week, the president needs to come clean and join Democrats in offering a real solution to this disastrous program," Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid of Nevada told reporters.

Medicare provides health insurance for all Americans from age 65 and some disabled people. Congress in 2003 added a prescription drug benefit which became available this month.

In his annual address to the nation next week, Bush is expected to discuss health care costs and coverage, but White House officials have not said whether he will address any of the problems the new drug benefit has encountered.

Many senior citizens have said they are confused by the program, and many of the poorest older Americans ended up without any coverage or unable to get their usual drugs amid a flawed transition from state-based Medicaid to the new Medicare plan.

Democrats have long criticized the Medicare law but have stepped up their attacks in a congressional election year amid widespread reports of problems.

Democrats also tried to link the Medicare law to lobbying scandals, saying the Republicans wrote legislation that helped drug companies and insurers more than older Americans.

"The American people paid the price of corruption," House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi of California said.

Administration officials and congressional Republicans have acknowledged flaws, but say they are working to fix them. They also say they delivered on a promise to provide a drug benefit to millions of Americans who have not had any help in paying for their prescriptions in the past.

"I'm not trying to make excuses. Some of our nation's frailest, neediest beneficiaries have had difficulties in getting their drugs. That clearly can't go on, and we're not letting it go on," Senate Finance Committee Chairman Charles Grassley of Iowa said in a statement Thursday.

"But to suggest that neither the president nor the Republican majority recognizes that there are issues with the implementation is absolutely ludicrous," added Grassley, who said that administrative solutions would be faster than legislation the Democrats have sought.

Democrats have called for both short-term fixes to the program, such as helping the poor or extending enrollment deadlines, and long-term changes to the plan's overall structure. Reid and Max Baucus of Montana, the top Democrat on Grassley's Finance Committee, wrote to Bush with a list of specific legislative suggestions on Thursday.

Some moderate Republicans hearing complaints from constituents and state officials have endorsed some of the short-term solutions, but there is less enthusiasm for revisiting the overall program.

Drugmakers To Cut Off Some Free Prescriptions (WP)

By Ceci Connolly

Several of the nation's largest drug manufacturers say they will no longer provide free or discounted medications to low-income elderly and disabled patients because they should be covered by the new Medicare drug benefit.

But for about 1 million Americans with serious illnesses such as AIDS and cancer -- patients who last year relied on the pharmaceutical industry's giveaways -- that means Medicare coverage could cost them more than $3,600 this year.

Hardest hit will be patients such as James Hayes. Suffering from AIDS, the 45-year-old North Carolina man takes an average of 10 drugs each month at a cost of $3,700. In recent years, he has relied on several drug company patient assistance programs for his lifesaving medications. Because he is on disability, receiving $1,900 a month, Hayes qualifies for the new Medicare drug benefit.

But in the past few weeks, drugmakers such as GlaxoSmithKline have sent Hayes and others letters saying that as of Jan. 1, anyone eligible for Medicare would be dropped from its program. The cheapest Medicare drug plan he can find is expected to cost him $6,000 out of pocket.

"I can't afford that. I am struggling to make ends meet right now without going into bankruptcy," he said yesterday. "I'm scared I'm going to have to go off of my drugs."

Less than four weeks after the drug benefit went into effect, some of the neediest seniors have found themselves worse off. Although the new program, projected to cost $700 billion in the first 10 years, was intended to shield retirees from burdensome drug costs, several quirks in the law have had the opposite effect for some.

"These are individuals who did have something before; they had patient assistance programs," said John Coburn, senior policy analyst for the Chicago-based Health & Disability Advocates. "We are seeing the unintended consequences of this law."

Drugmakers blamed the Bush administration for issuing a legal opinion that suggests companies could run afoul of anti-kickback laws if they provide free drugs to Medicare beneficiaries. That guidance, from the Health and Human Services Inspector General's office, warned that providing free medicine to someone enrolled in a Medicare plan could be viewed as an effort to keep the patient on that particular product, rather than a generic or cheaper version sold by a competitor.

Administration officials, already racing to fix other glitches in the new drug program, yesterday pointed the finger back at drugmakers, saying there are a variety of legal ways to assist low-income patients. If a drug company's patient assistance program ends, "that's the manufacturer's decision," said Mark McClellan, administrator of the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services. He said drugmakers could continue their patient assistance programs as long as they remain separate from Medicare or contribute money to charities that help poor patients.

However, that would mean those free medications would not count toward a patient's spending total. The total is especially important for an individual taking numerous expensive medications because once that person has used $5,100 worth of drugs (or about $3,200 out of pocket) the Medicare plan's catastrophic coverage kicks in, paying all but 10 percent of the remaining drug costs.

"That much money could well be a quarter of someone's income," said Robert Hayes, president of the nonprofit Medicare Rights Center, which assists seniors. Even after the person reaches that threshold, the 10 percent co-payments could be unaffordable, he added.

For decades, drugmakers have offered discounted or free medications to uninsured Americans or people who could not afford critical therapies. In 2004, the 37 companies in the industry donated 22 million prescriptions worth $4.1 billion, said Ken Johnson, senior vice president for the Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America.

"The current manufacturer's patient assistance programs work very well," he said. "They are already helping patients without any middlemen or additional overhead. It seems a lot more efficient to allow these programs to continue to help Medicare beneficiaries."

Only one company, Merck, said it will continue its program, stressing that the company will evaluate applications from Medicare beneficiaries on a case-by-case basis. "Like anyone with insurance, they can come to Merck at any time," said Ian Spatz, Merck's vice president for public policy.

Administration officials said this week that the early glitches in the drug benefit are being resolved, but states continued to report difficulties.

More than two dozen governors, noting that former Medicaid clients have been incorrectly denied coverage or overcharged at the pharmacy, have declared public health emergencies and announced they would cover the cost for any senior caught in the mix-ups.

Yesterday, Florida Gov. Jeb Bush (R) joined that list, while California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger (R) extended his state's program. So far, California has spent $9.2 million filling 110,000 prescriptions that should have been covered by Medicare plans, officials said.

Medicare Drug Plan Leaves Out Supplies (LAT)

By Ricardo Alonso-zaldivar

The Los Angeles Times, January 27, 2006

WASHINGTON — The new Medicare drug program is denying supplies that seriously ill patients need to administer intravenous antibiotics and other medications at home. As a result, some patients are being referred to nursing homes, and others have had to go into hospitals.

Although no national estimates are available, the number of patients affected — including some with life-threatening diseases such as cancer and multiple sclerosis — could run into the thousands. One Anaheim pharmacy says 200 of its patients are having trouble.

Medicare officials say they are aggressively addressing the problem, which they attribute to restrictions in the law that created the prescription benefit and to difficulty communicating with states, pharmacies and medical providers.

Essentially, the prescription program allows coverage of the drugs but does not pay for the medical supplies and nursing help needed for the home infusion treatments to be safe and effective — a policy that effectively shuts down such treatment for some patients, even though it is substantially cheaper than the alternatives. Two GOP senators warned the Medicare agency last fall that the gap in coverage "may limit access to home infusion therapy."

Home infusion pharmacies say they are overwhelmed trying to help patients deal with the problem. "It's like I'm doing triage in a MASH unit," said pharmacist Michael Rigas, vice president for clinical affairs with Crescent Healthcare in Anaheim.

For Kathleen Senna, 68, a retired cannery worker living in West Sacramento, the policy has meant she can't get intravenous medications at home to fight a lung infection. Instead, Senna said, she is taking Cipro, an oral antibiotic that was ineffective for her in the past. Hospital doctors recommended she go into a nursing home for treatment, but Senna said she was afraid.

"You feel like they are putting you in there because they expect you to die," she said. "Me going to a convalescent hospital is going to cost a lot more than bringing antibiotics to my house."

Paulette Bryson of Escondido said she had to take her daughter, Kimberly Tyler, back to the hospital after Tyler was unable to get intravenous medications to treat a blood and spinal infection.

Disabled with severe osteoporosis, Tyler, 32, had been released from the hospital last week after extensive back surgery. Her mother said she returned to the hospital after two days because she could not get the IV medications, which are considered more effective than pills.

"I truly feel that if the president, the governor and all the legislators had to stand in line and wait for their prescriptions and find out they weren't covered, they would make some major changes," Bryson said. "Unfortunately, it's the small person who does not have pull, and they have to beg for their medicine."

Senna and Tyler previously were covered for intravenous medications at home under Medi-Cal, the California healthcare program for low-income seniors and disabled people. But despite emergency help ordered by Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger for Medi-Cal patients whose prescription coverage was switched to Medicare on Jan. 1, Senna and Tyler were not able to get their medications.

The problem mainly appears to be affecting the poor. But pharmacists say many middle-class Medicare beneficiaries also could run into trouble, because they would have to pay to cover support services for their medications or find other insurance. On average, the medicines represent a little less than half the cost of treatment, which can run thousands of dollars a month, according to a pharmacy industry group.

Republican Sens. Arlen Specter and Rick Santorum, both of Pennsylvania, wrote to the Medicare agency in October, saying it "has opted to define the coverage of home infusion therapy in a manner that does not include financial coverage for … professional services, supplies and equipment that are required for the safe and effective provision of therapy."

In a response dated Dec. 27, Mark McClellan, administrator for the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, said the agency lacked specific legal authority to broaden the coverage policy, in effect, handing the problem back to Congress.

"If we could pay for it, we would," said Dr. Jeff Kelman, chief medical officer for the division of Medicare that handles the drug benefit. "Read the act yourself …. It's a drug benefit, not a medical benefit."

Kelman suggested that states could pay for the support services for low-income seniors and disabled people. However, it is unclear how many states would do that.

Pharmacists say other seniors may be able to get coverage by joining a managed care plan, such as a health maintenance organization. Additionally, a small number of IV medications are covered through Medicare's Part B benefit.

Most private insurers take a comprehensive approach to covering home infusion drugs, so Medicare's policy is hard to fathom, said Dr. Edward Ratner, a professor at the University of Minnesota medical school.

"The proof that it isn't sensible is that commercial insurance companies and health maintenance organizations don't do it this way," said Ratner, who is also the medical director for a private company that provides support services for patients receiving intravenous treatments at home.

Until the mid-1980s, intravenous medications normally were given only in hospitals and nursing homes. But technological advances enabled the treatments to be administered safely at home, albeit with some supervision. Concern over rising healthcare costs accelerated the trend.

Most at-home patients are being treated with antibiotics for serious infections, according to industry statistics. Others are receiving painkillers, and some are undergoing chemotherapy for cancer.

Saving money by making hospitalization unnecessary was part of the rationale for creating the Medicare prescription benefit, which has an estimated price tag of $700 billion over 10 years. But the most far-reaching Medicare change in a generation failed to adequately provide for this kind of at-home drug therapy, critics say.

Specialized pharmacies that handle home infusion will not provide the service unless they are paid.

Some patients discovered their Medicare drug plans did not cover the specific medications they were getting and had to switch insurers. But even when the drugs were covered, things didn't always go smoothly.

Rigas, the Anaheim pharmacist, said one patient called and told him a substance had been delivered to the patient's house. "I've got the powder on my doorstep, now what do I do with it?" Rigas recalled the patient asking.

"They had no bags, no tubing … but this is what they've been stuck with," Rigas said. "It's really bothersome to me, what patients are suffering. The carpet that they were standing on has been ripped out from under them."

Some say an obvious solution would be for Congress to step in and craft a comprehensive benefit.

But congressional leaders are loath to make any legislative changes to the drug benefit, fearing that political support for the plan could unravel.

That leaves patients in limbo.

"I'm worried about it," said Senna, the West Sacramento patient with chronic lung disease, saying that an oral antibiotic may not be effective in treating her periodic infections.

"I'm not going to let them put me in a convalescent hospital as long as I can take care of it at home," she said. "If I start running a temperature, they can take me back to the regular hospital, although that's not great."

WASHINGTON -- The Bush administration is making plans to revive nuclear fuel reprocessing, including a long-term proposal to provide reactor fuel to foreign countries if they return it to the United States to be recycled.

President Bush will include a request for $250 million in his budget to be released next week as a first step toward reversing a decades long U.S. policy against nuclear reprocessing, congressional and administration officials said Thursday.

The plan is part of an effort to take a fresh look at how to deal with the thousands of tons of used reactor fuel piling up at U.S. commercial power plants, while also gaining control over future nuclear materials in developing countries where the demand for nuclear energy is expected to grow.

The United States halted all reprocessing in the late 1970s because it produces pure plutonium that could be used in a nuclear weapon if obtained by terrorists or rogue states.

The Bush plan, expected to be unveiled as part of the Energy Department's budget, calls for stepped up research into a "more proliferation resistant" type of reprocessing that proponents say will reduce dramatically the likelihood of theft or diversion.

The process would not produce pure plutonium, but a mixture of plutonium and neptunium that would make the separated elements more difficult to handle and, therefore, more secure.

But nonproliferation advocates contend the new process represents little more than - as one described it - a "fig leaf" over the reprocessing the U.S. has rejected since 1979 when President Carter banned reprocessing because of proliferation worries.

"The tweaking of this process would only provide a minor additional deterrent," said Edwin Lyman, a nuclear specialist at the Union of Concerned Scientists. It would not prevent a suicidal terrorist from handling the material, he said.

The Bush proposal, called the Global Nuclear Energy Partnership, envisions that U.S. companies eventually will sell reactors and fuel to developing countries with the stipulation that the fuel would be returned to the United States for reprocessing.

Nuclear scientists who have been working on the reprocessing technology for the Energy Department say that up to 90 percent of spent fuel can be recycled for reuse, reducing dramatically the need for geological disposal.

The initial $250 million is expected to go to stepped up research and initial work on a reprocessing facility, probably at the Savannah River nuclear complex in South Carolina, according to private and government sources familiar with the discussions.

The sources spoke on condition of anonymity because the plan has yet to be announced.

President Bush has been briefed on the plan, and Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman hinted at the broad outline of the reprocessing initiative and its potential global aspects in a November speech at the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace.

Countries around the world will demand use of nuclear energy in the coming decades, Bodman said, and "the challenge that confronts us" is providing nuclear fuel and addressing reactor waste globally without increasing proliferation risks.

He said the U.S. might be one of the countries that could offer "cradle to grave fuel cycle services, leasing fuel for power reactors and then taking it back for reprocessing and disposition."

Bodman said the administration remained committed to completing the Yucca Mountain nuclear waste site in Nevada. But experts say it will not be able to hold all of the country's reactor waste if nuclear energy expands with new reactors.

"Reprocessing could help avoid or delay the need for a second repository," Marvin Fertel, a senior vice president of the Nuclear Energy Institute, the industry's lobbying group, told a congressional hearing last March.

But Fertel emphasized that the nuclear industry views fuel reprocessing as a technology that is still decades away from being economical - and won't be as long as fresh uranium is plentiful and relatively cheap.

State Of The Union? Not So Good, Most Say (USAT)

A USA TODAY/CNN/Gallup Poll taken last weekend and interviews across the country this week found most Americans pessimistic about the economy, divided on the war and doubtful that Bush has the best plan to address the issues that matter most to them — among them health care and corruption. (Related: Poll results)

By more than 2-to-1, those surveyed say things have gotten worse in the United States over the past five years. "I love my country, but we're going the wrong way for sure," says Faye Sherer, 59, of Salinas, Calif., who helps run a family produce company and was among those polled. "I don't see the point in Iraq, when there were other countries going through worse atrocities and we did nothing to help them."

Bush has strong defenders, to be sure, and views of the country's course divide on partisan lines. Chris DeCaro, 20, of Farmington, Mich., praises the president, particularly for his handling of terrorism. "He runs this country not as a politician but as a businessman who does things that need to be done," DeCaro says. He says public opinion has been swayed by a "liberal media" that are "defeatist" on the war and antagonist toward Bush.

Still, even conservatives divide 47%-44% on whether things have gotten better or worse.

The country's downbeat mood poses a challenge for the president as he tries to command support for the legislative agenda he'll unveil for his sixth year in office. With a 43% approval rating, he is in "a weakened position trying to convince Congress to do whatever it is in the State of the Union that he wants them to do," says Charles Franklin of the University of Wisconsin.

Bush doesn't seem to be getting much credit for positive economic reports on unemployment and inflation. "This is a presidency whose ratings are less influenced by the economy" than his modern predecessors, says Richard Eichenberg of Tufts University. "The war in Iraq has defined his presidency."

Those surveyed:

• Said the country has gotten off track. By 62%-35%, they were dissatisfied with the way things are going in the USA. That's the most pessimistic view at the start of a year since Bush took office.

• Rated the economy as faltering. Six in 10 said the current economy was only fair or poor, and 54% said economic conditions were getting worse. Views differed by party: 68% of Republicans but just 16% of Democrats called the economy excellent or good.

• Questioned Bush's leadership. By 64%-34%, they said Bush didn't have a clear plan for solving the country's problems. The president received his strongest approval rating, 52%, on fighting terrorism. But on health care — ranked as an issue equal to the economy — congressional Democrats were more trusted, 54%-35%.

The poll of 1,006 adults Jan. 20-22 has a margin of error of +/-3 percentage points.

"I'm too old to be worrying about much," said Bernice Tabor, 76, of Cleveland. But she frets about casualties in Iraq and layoffs at Ford Motor Co. "We're going backward instead of forward."

Majority In U.S. Say Bush Presidency Is A Failure, Poll Finds (BLOOM)

By Nicholas Johnston

Bloomberg, January 27, 2006

Jan. 26 (Bloomberg) -- A majority of Americans said the presidency of George W. Bush has been a failure and that they would be more likely to vote for congressional candidates who oppose him, according to a CNN/USA Today/Gallup poll.

Fifty-two percent of adults said Bush's administration since 2001 has been a failure, down from 55 percent in October. Fifty-eight percent described his second term as a failure. At the same point in former President Bill Clinton's presidency, 70 percent of those surveyed by Gallup said they considered it a success and 20 percent a failure.

In a poll conducted in January of 2002, after Bush was president for one year, 83 percent of those surveyed said his presidency was a success.

In the new poll, conducted Jan. 20-22, fifty-one percent of those surveyed said they would be more likely to vote for congressional candidates who do not support Bush's policies.

The percentage of Americans who called Bush ``honest and trustworthy'' fell 7 percentage points in the last year to 49 percent, the poll found.

The new poll also found that 62 percent of Americans said they are ``dissatisfied'' with ``the way things are going'' in the U.S., unchanged from a December survey. The percentage of ``dissatisfied'' Americans reached its peak in October of 2005 when 68 percent of those surveyed agreed.

The survey interviewed 1,006 U.S. adults and has a margin of error of 4.5 percentage points. For the questions about whether Bush's presidency is a success, about 500 U.S. adults were surveyed and the margin for error is plus or minus 5 percentage points.

Bush Vows To Be Tough On Spending, Using Veto (REU-Y2)

By Caren Bohan

Reuters, January 27, 2006

President George W. Bush, who has faced heat from conservative Republicans over high budget deficits, pledged on Thursday to take a tougher stance toward Congress over spending, including vetoing bills if necessary.

He also backed changes to the appropriations process to curb "earmarks," or targeted spending that lawmakers often use for pet projects in their districts. Earmarks are frequently added in secret to spending bills and their use has soared under the Republican-led Congress, although Democratic lawmakers use them as well.

"That's going to be an interesting discussion on Capitol Hill -- this business about earmarks and people making a special deal in the budget," Bush told a news conference. "And there needs to be earmark reform."

Pressed on whether lawmakers were doing enough to cut the budget, Bush said they are meeting "targets" but added that he is ready, if needed, to wield his veto pen -- something he has never done in five years as president.

"I'm fully prepared to use the veto if they overspend," he said.

Congressional Budget Office figures released on Thursday pegged the budget deficit for fiscal year 2006 at $337 billion. That was below the deficit of more than $400 billion forecast by the White House.

SHIFT TO DEFICITS

Democrats blame Bush's tax cuts for the dramatic shift on his watch from record surpluses to record deficits.

Some fiscal conservatives worry the red ink may jeopardize Bush's drive to make his tax cuts permanent, and have voiced frustration that he has not done enough to contain spending.

Conservatives view a huge transportation bill passed last year that Bush initially threatened to veto but eventually signed, as an egregious example of earmarked spending.

Calls within Congress for limiting earmarks have gained traction as the Jack Abramoff lobbying scandal has spurred calls for congressional reform.

Oklahoma Sen. Tom Coburn, a vocal Republican critic of deficits, is among several lawmakers who have urged the abolition of earmarks. But some in Congress would permit them with limits, more disclosure and accountability.

In an opinion piece in Roll Call, a Capitol Hill newspaper, California Republican Rep. Jerry Lewis (news, bio, voting record) said getting rid of all earmarks would cede too much power to the executive branch.

"The president's budget contains numerous earmarks inserted by nameless, faceless bureaucrats within each government agency," Lewis said.

But Lewis, chairman of the House Appropriations Committee, said lawmakers should be required to submit requests for spending on special projects in writing, and all such requests should be audited.

Bush said he would call for fiscal restraint in his State of the Union address on Tuesday, when he will also unveil initiatives on healthcare, energy and education.

Bush cited a deficit-cutting package aimed at finding $39.7 billion in savings from social welfare programs over five years as a sign Congress was making progress on curbing spending. The Senate has passed the bill and the House of Representatives appears poised to approve it as well.

House Democratic Whip Steny Hoyer of Maryland said calls by Bush and the Republicans for fiscal discipline amounted to little more than rhetoric.

"There is only one person in the entire United States government who can stop federal spending in its tracks, and that person is the president of the United States," Hoyer said. "Yet, during his five years in office, President Bush has refused to exercise the power of the veto once -- not once."

Report: Budget Deficit Will Turn To Surplus If Bush's Tax Cuts Expire (USAT)

WASHINGTON — Making President Bush's tax cuts permanent will prolong big budget deficits into the next decade, the Congressional Budget Office projected Thursday.

But if those tax cuts are allowed to expire after 2010 — effectively a tax increase Bush has sworn to oppose — the budget would begin showing a surplus in 2012, the CBO's budget projections showed. Bush wants Congress to make the tax cuts permanent before he leaves office in 2009.

In its annual budget and economic report, the agency estimated that this year's deficit will be $337 billion, up $19 billion from 2005. It said the deficit will be about $360 billion if extra anticipated costs for Iraq, Afghanistan and the hurricane-ravaged Gulf Coast are added.

The White House has pegged this year's projected deficit at more than $400 billion, citing the costs of the war in Iraq and Hurricane Katrina. The White House budget office has overestimated the size of the deficit in the past two years by using what it says are “cautious” economic and revenue projections.

The CBO projected that this year's deficit will be about 2.8% of the economy, using a measure that allows comparisons over time by factoring out the effect of inflation. That exceeds the 2.3% average since 1965 but is below the 6% record set in 1983.

The long-term budget forecast is gloomier, particularly if Bush and Congress agree to extend the tax cuts. In 2016, the deficit would be nearly $400 billion. Beyond that, the costs of Medicare, Medicaid and Social Security are projected to rise to a level that "economic growth alone is unlikely to alleviate," the report says. "A substantial reduction in the growth of spending, and perhaps a sizable increase in taxes as a share of the economy, will be necessary for fiscal stability to be at all likely in the coming decades."

The non-partisan budget office also said the new Medicare prescription-drug benefit could cost $979 billion in the 10 years from 2007 through 2016. Last year, the administration put the figure at $720 billion for the years 2006 to 2015. The increase is mostly due to projections that more people will use the subsidized program.

CBO Sees Wider Deficit This Year And In 2016 If Tax Cuts Don't End (WSJ)

By Jackie Calmes

The Wall Street Journal, January 27, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Congressional Budget Office projects that war and hurricane-relief costs will widen the annual deficit to about $360 billion after it had narrowed last year.

But a decade out, the nonpartisan office sees either a small surplus or a nearly $400 billion deficit in 2016 if President Bush's tax cuts are extended.

In its annual 10-year Budget and Economic Outlook released yesterday, the CBO calculates that if the numerous tax cuts of Mr. Bush's first term don't expire as they are scheduled to in coming years, federal revenue would be sliced more than $2.6 trillion. While the administration argues that tax cuts bring economic growth and, in turn, increased revenue, the budget office said that on balance any such "macroeconomic feedbacks would be too small to have a substantial effect on the estimates." The analysts' finding is sure to stoke the debate this year -- and probably for the rest of Mr. Bush's presidency -- over extending those tax cuts.

"This president and this Congress have been the most fiscally irresponsible in our nation's history," said North Dakota Sen. Kent Conrad, the senior Democrat on the Senate Budget Committee, and "at the worst possible time -- just before the baby boomers retire," and costs for Medicare, Medicaid and Social Security start exploding.

DEFICIT GROWTH

His Republican counterpart, Senate Budget Committee Chairman Judd Gregg of New Hampshire, focused on the growth of entitlement programs in his reaction to the CBO report. He warned in a written statement of an impending "financial crisis because the federal government has made commitments to America's retirees that threaten to overwhelm our economy."

In an interview, Mr. Gregg indicated he will use his budget-writing post to press Congress to reduce the benefit programs' costs. But the political difficulty is illustrated by the fact that the House and Senate still haven't finished a deficit-reduction bill left over from last year amid disagreements on cutting spending $5 billion this year and a total $40 billion over five years. A final vote is set for next week.

The CBO projected that the deficit for this year, which ends Sept. 30, will be about $360 billion, or the equivalent of 2.8% of gross domestic product. That compares to last year's $318 billion deficit, or 2.6% of GDP, which marked the first decline in the deficit since Mr. Bush took office. This year's deficit would be $181 billion greater -- or about $540 billion -- if the Social Security surplus isn't counted.

The budget office sees declining deficits through fiscal 2011 and then small surpluses annually through 2016. But that is only if Mr. Bush's tax cuts expire, and it is based on spending-growth projections for defense and domestic programs that are lower than what is likely to be spent. Moreover, as a separate CBO report last year demonstrated, after 2016 annual deficits would take off again as Social Security's annual surpluses turn to deficits and entitlement programs' costs balloon further.

The CBO said the annual growth rate for Medicare is projected to reach 8.9% in 2016, from 7.4% in 2008. Medicaid's growth is forecast to average 8.3% annually over the decade, and Social Security's annual increase will rise to 6.5% in 2016 from 4.8% in 2008.

Beyond 2016, the office reported, the three programs "will exert pressures on the budget that economic growth alone is unlikely to alleviate.

Congressional Panel Expects $337B Deficit (BRAH)

By Andrew Taylor

The Bradenton Herald, January 27, 2006

WASHINGTON - The budget deficit will rise to at least $337 billion this year and may well approach or exceed $400 billion because of tax cuts and new spending for hurricane relief and the war in Iraq, congressional budget analysts said Thursday.

The latest Congressional Budget Office data also suggest President Bush is unlikely to be able to keep his promise to cut the federal deficit in half by the end of his term.

Even assuming a phasing down of the war in Iraq and the costs of hurricane relief, implementing tax cuts sought by Bush and Congress would produce deficits exceeding $300 billion through the end of the decade, the nonpartisan CBO says.

The report and Bush's annual budget submission kick off a predictably partisan election-year debate over the budget, which will play out against the backdrop of rising deficits, record spending and renewed concern about lawmakers' penchant for homestate pet projects.

Bush promised in 2004 to close the deficit from a then-estimate of $521 billion to $260 billion by 2009, and he promised again Thursday to meet that goal when he sends an austere fiscal 2007 budget to Congress on Feb. 6.

"We can cut our deficit in half by 2009 and make sure the American people still get their tax relief," Bush told reporters.

Bush critics say he routinely plays games with the budget by leaving out the long-term costs of the war in Iraq and redrawing the tax code so more and more middle-class taxpayers won't get hit by the alternative minimum tax. Congress typically rejects most of his proposals for benefit cuts and new fees.

Even though CBO must follow rules that mean its official estimate is flawed - by reflecting current law even when future changes to the budget are virtually certain to be passed - its data are respected for impartiality.

CBO's official baseline shows the deficit dropping to $241 billion by 2009 and $114 billion by 2011. But those estimates assume Bush's tax cuts expire and the alternative minimum tax is left alone. That tax, designed to stop the wealthy from avoiding all taxation, threatens more middle class taxpayers every year because of inflation.

Under a more realistic scenario, extending tax relief, drawing down troop levels in Iraq, and phasing out hurricane relief, CBO predicts a $332 billion deficit for 2009, the last fiscal year for which Bush is responsible.

For its part, the White House reiterated Thursday that it thinks the 2006 deficit would actually top $400 billion because of the costs of tax cuts, the war in Iraq and new hurricane relief.

"This administration is driving us over the cliff into deeper and deeper debt," said Kent Conrad of North Dakota, the Senate Budget Committee's top Democrat.

According to the CBO report, the expiration of Bush's tax cuts would return the budget to a surplus of $38 billion by 2012. Keeping his tax cuts in place would put the government into a $289 billion deficit that year, but Bush rejected any talk of letting his tax cuts lapse at the end of the decade as currently scheduled.

"We don't need to be running up the taxes right now," Bush said Thursday. "You know, people say, 'Well, let's raise the taxes and balance the budget' - that's not how it works; they're going to raise your taxes, and they're going to continue to expand the government."

The government recorded a $319 billion deficit for 2005. The record deficit in dollar terms of $413 billion was registered in fiscal 2004.

Economists say the more significant measure is against the size of the economy. In those terms, CBO's 2006 deficit prediction would equal 2.6 percent of gross domestic product and would be significantly better than deficits witnessed in the mid-1980s and early 1990s. Then, deficits of 4 percent to 6 percent of GDP were common.

On the economy, CBO predicts continued robust growth of 3.6 percent this year and 3.4 percent next year, slowing to an average of 3.1 percent over 2009-2011.

With near-term deficit predictions going up, Republicans in Congress are feeling political heat from their core supporters, who say the party's record of fiscal discipline is slipping.

Republicans are particularly upset about the proliferation of lawmakers' pet projects under GOP control of Congress. For instance, total spending on such "earmarks" hit $17 billion in the latest round of congressional appropriations bills, House Appropriations Committee tally says.

When Bush took office in 2001, both White House and congressional forecasters projected cumulative surpluses of $5.6 trillion over the subsequent decade.

But a revenue bubble burst, a recession and the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist assaults adversely affected the books. Several rounds of tax cuts, including Bush's signature $1.35 trillion 2001 tax cut, also contributed to the return to deficits in 2002 after four years of budget surpluses.

Congress Agency Sees $337 Bln 2006 Budget Gap (REU-Y2)

By Richard Cowan

Reuters, January 27, 2006

A congressional report released on Thursday said the U.S. budget deficit will hit $337 billion this year, a figure that is up $23 billion from an August estimate and excludes additional funds needed for the Iraq and Afghanistan wars.

The Congressional Budget Office, Congress' nonpartisan fiscal watchdog, said the deficit in fiscal 2006 is more likely to reach $360 billion once additional war costs and some Hurricane Katrina-related expenses are counted.

The Bush administration has been more pessimistic, saying this year's budget deficit will top $400 billion.

For the fiscal year starting October 1, CBO estimated the deficit would drop to $270 billion.

But CBO estimates do not include some big-ticket items not yet enacted by Congress, such as upcoming war costs and tax policy changes, which would significantly add to the flow of red ink.

Capital Economics, a London-based research firm, estimated a $351 billion U.S. budget deficit next year when taking into account the probable extension of some tax breaks and reforming other tax policies, as well as war costs.

The conservative Cato Institute praised the performance of a humming American economy and low taxes. But Stephen Slivinski, Cato's director of budget studies, said rapidly-growing government spending demonstrated that "there has yet to be any sign that Republicans are willing to really do what it takes to get the budget under control."

"MOUNTAIN OF DEBT"

Congressional Democrats said the CBO report challenges Bush administration claims that it is making progress in cutting the deficit, which began in fiscal 2001 with a $128 billion shortfall on the heels of a $236 billion surplus in fiscal 2000, the year before President George W. Bush took office.

Largely because of six consecutive years of budget deficits, Bush has had to ask Congress to increase U.S. borrowing authority by about $3 trillion.

"The Bush administration is accumulating a mountain of debt," said Rep. John Spratt (news, bio, voting record) of South Carolina, the senior Democrat on the House Budget Committee.

House Budget Committee Chairman Jim Nussle, an Iowa Republican, said the CBO report underscored the strength of the U.S. economy, but "also reminds us that controlling the budget is a long-term, step-by-step commitment."

Congress is bracing for a new White House request for Iraq and Afghanistan war funds, which is likely to be in the range of $80 billion to $100 billion. But only about $20 billion of that will be spent in this fiscal year, experts estimated.

The administration also noted that congressional plans to extend a tax provision keeping millions of middle-class families from paying the alternative minimum tax will add billions of dollars to the deficit.

Seeing continued strong U.S. economic growth, the CBO forecast real GDP growth of 3.6 percent this year and 3.4 percent in fiscal 2007. In 2008-2011, GDP will grow at an average rate of 3.1 percent, it estimated.

Despite the revenue rush generated by economic growth, the new budget deficit estimate for this year is up from CBO's August forecast of $314 billion and up from the actual fiscal 2005 deficit of $318.62 billion.

Over five years, 2006 to 2010, CBO sees a cumulative budget deficit totaling $1.329 trillion, according to the report.

Further darkening the fiscal picture, CBO said, is the likely explosion of government outlays in coming years as the baby boom generation begins to reach retirement age and draws government benefits. Congress is looking at ways to control the growth of these programs.

Bush Uses Humor To Deflect The Heat (AP-Y2)

By Nedra Pickler

AP2, January 27, 2006

President Bush's first news conference of the year was just a camera strap away from becoming hazardous to reporters.

As the president began his opening statement, a camera that the news service AFP had hung from the ceiling dropped and nearly fell on the heads below. It was caught by its strap, and Bush stopped and looked at it dangling precariously.

"Are you wearing your helmets?" he joked to reporters sitting in the White House briefing room.

Yes, Bush acknowledged, he had his picture taken with admitted criminal Jack Abramoff.

"Having my picture taken with someone doesn't mean that I'm a friend with him or know him very well," he said. "I've had my picture taken with you at holiday parties."

Another reporter pointed out that allegations of Abramoff's influence went beyond the photographs to questions of why he met with the president's top aides. The White House has refused to disclose just how often or why Abramoff was there, and Bush wasn't about to, either. He returned to jokes about the pictures.

"I mean, people, it's part of the job of the president to shake hands with people and smile," he said. He said he'd turn over records about Abramoff's meetings at the White House only to federal prosecutors if they suspected something inappropriate.

When a radio reporter asked the president again to never mind the photographs, just talk about lobbyists' influence on the White House, Bush interrupted: "Easy for a radio guy to say."

Financial Aid Growing Role For Lobbyists: Raising Funds For Lawmakers (WSJ)

WASHINGTON -- Nearly three years ago, Gregg Hartley left his job as a top aide to Republican Rep. Roy Blunt of Missouri to become a lobbyist. Mr. Hartley began helping companies like BellSouth Corp., Wal-Mart Stores Inc. and Viacom Inc. get audiences with Mr. Blunt and other top House Republicans and win some important legislative battles.

At the same time, Mr. Hartley was helping his old Capitol Hill boss raise campaign money and offering him political advice. Mr. Hartley is now assisting Mr. Blunt in his bid to succeed Rep. Tom DeLay as House majority leader. For the last three weeks, the lobbyist has offered strategic advice during regular visits to Mr. Blunt's office in the U.S. Capitol, according to people familiar with the meetings.

Mr. Hartley's dual roles highlight a practice that is becoming more common in Washington: Lobbyists are serving as principal fund-raisers for lawmakers they're trying to sway. Bruce Gates, the top political strategist for Mr. Blunt's main rival to become Majority Leader, Rep. John Boehner of Ohio, also is a lobbyist for private clients. William Oldaker, a lobbyist with numerous health-care clients, oversees fund raising for two dozen Democratic lawmakers, including Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada and Sen. Ted Kennedy of Massachusetts.

The Justice Department public-corruption and bribery case against lobbyist Jack Abramoff and a half-dozen members of Congress has refocused attention on the financial ties between lawmakers and lobbyists. While Mr. Abramoff's lobbying activities crossed the line into illegality, the practice of lobbyists raising large amounts of money for lawmakers is both legal and commonplace in Washington today.

Federal Election Commission records show that 71 lawmakers now list lobbyists as treasurers of their re-election or political action committees. In 1998, the number was just 15, according to a review of FEC reports by the Center for Public Integrity. Lawmakers attribute the change to the sharply rising costs of running campaigns.

In the long-running debate about whether lobbying money corrupts politics, Mr. Hartley's relationship with Mr. Blunt shows how deeply the financial ties run between Capitol Hill and the lobbyists on K Street. Advocates of change argue that lawmakers who rely on lobbyists become unduly beholden to them, and thus more willing to help their clients.

"By putting a lobbyist in charge of your political operations, you are conflicted from the start," argues Alex Knott of the nonpartisan Center for Public Integrity, which favors reducing the role of money in politics.

A spokeswoman for Mr. Blunt says there's nothing wrong with the congressman's close relationship with the lobbyist. In the leadership race, says his spokeswoman, Jessica Boulanger, the only involvement of Mr. Hartley "has been in the capacity of an old friend." Mr. Hartley hasn't called other members of Congress on Mr. Blunt's behalf, she notes. Mr. Blunt declines to comment. Mr. Hartley declines to discuss his fund-raising activities.

In the wake of the current lobbying scandal, lawmakers from both parties have been scrambling to introduce bills to reform the lobbying industry. But none of the leading proposals would ban lobbyists from continuing their fund-raising activities for members of Congress. House Speaker Dennis Hastert wants to ban lawmakers from accepting privately financed trips. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist would prohibit lawmakers' spouses and children from lobbying.

"We are carping on trifles here," said Sen. Richard J. Durbin, a Democrat from Illinois, during a Senate hearing on lobbying reform Wednesday. "Why is it that we warm up to all these lobbyists? It isn't for a meal.... We know when it comes time to finance our campaigns, we're going to be knocking on those same doors."

The lobbying reform legislation proposed by Sen. John McCain, the Arizona Republican, wouldn't ban lobbyists from raising money for members of Congress. But it would require them to disclose when they host fund-raisers for politicians. Rick Davis, the Republican lobbyist who helps run Mr. McCain's political operations, notes: "You would be hard pressed to find a single important lobbyist who is not involved in fund raising."

Lobbyists say they aren't violating any rules by moonlighting as fund-raisers. "I'm not a rule maker, I'm a game player," says David Girard-diCarlo, a managing partner at Philadelphia-based law firm Blank Rome who serves as national finance director for Republican Sen. Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania. Blank Rome has numerous lobbying clients. Mr. Girard-diCarlo oversees a group of more than 40 Washington lobbyists who hope to raise $4 million for Mr. Santorum's re-election bid. "The senator is most appreciative" of such fund-raising help, says Mr. Santorum's spokesman, Robert Traynham.

In addition to providing help with direct fund raising, Mr. Hartley is one of many lobbyists also helping members of Congress to raise money for specialized funding organizations called leadership PACs. Mr. Blunt and hundreds of other lawmakers in both parties have formed such PACs in order to help fellow party members facing close re-election races. Under federal election rules, lawmakers cannot donate more than $4,200 per election cycle from their own re-election coffers to the campaign of any colleague. But they can funnel as much as $10,000 per election cycle from leadership PACs to another campaign.

Reciprocal Support

In practice, such financial support from politically secure lawmakers for the re-election efforts of vulnerable colleagues often translates to reciprocal support down the road. Lawmakers draw on such support when angling for leadership positions within Congress.

"Leadership PACs originated as a way for one member to garner support from other members when seeking a leadership position in the House or Senate," Mr. Blunt wrote to the FEC in 2003. "More recently, leadership PACs have enabled the Republican party to maintain its majority in the House of Representatives."

When Republicans took over Congress in 1994, about 90 lawmakers operated such leadership PACs, which together raised a total of $28 million, according to the FEC. In the last election cycle, more than 300 leadership PACs took in $127 million.

Corporations represented by Mr. Hartley have donated more than $150,000 to Mr. Blunt's leadership PAC, the Rely On Your Beliefs Fund, known as the ROYB. Fund. Mr. Gates, the lobbyist with ties to Mr. Boehner, is treasurer of Mr. Boehner's leadership PAC, The Freedom Project. Mr. Boehner is Mr. Blunt's main rival for the majority leader post.

Both lawmakers are now recruiting congressional supporters for their majority-leader campaigns. Of the roughly 150 House Republicans who have announced who they will vote for, most have endorsed the candidate who has given them the most campaign money. Of Mr. Blunt's 91 publicly announced supporters, 68 have received money totalling $690,000 from Mr. Blunt's PAC, according to the Campaign for a Cleaner Congress, a congressional watchdog group.

Mr. Hartley, a 52-year-old fan of muscle cars and rock 'n' roll, was running a legal aid organization in his native Missouri when he met Mr. Blunt, who then worked as a country clerk. In 1992, Mr. Hartley raised money for Mr. Blunt's unsuccessful campaign for governor.

Four years later, Mr. Hartley helped Mr. Blunt, who is now 56, win a seat in Congress. Mr. Blunt, an ideological conservative, rose fast on Capitol Hill, winning the respect of moderate Republicans for his nonconfrontational approach. In 1999, when Rep. Dennis Hastert of Illinois was named speaker of the House, Rep. Tom DeLay tapped Mr. Blunt to replace Mr. Hastert as chief deputy whip.

Several years after arriving in Washington, Mr. Blunt married Abigail Pearlman, a lobbyist for the tobacco and food giant Altria Group Inc. Mr. Blunt's son, Andrew, is a lobbyist in Missouri whose clients include Altria, United Parcel Service Inc. and the former SBC Communications. Another son, Matt, is the current governor of Missouri.

When Mr. DeLay became majority leader in 2003, Mr. Blunt rose to Republican whip, the party's top House vote-counter. A few months later, Mr. Hartley left Capitol Hill to become a lobbyist with Cassidy & Associates, one of Washington's oldest and most successful lobbying firms.

Mr. Hartley's first clients were companies that had contributed money to Mr. Blunt and received legislative support from him. For example, Mr. Blunt had backed the Baby Bell phone companies in their battles with long-distance carriers and cable TV operators, and the Baby Bells had backed him with donations. They became Mr. Hartley's clients.

In July 2003, Mr. Hartley was hired by a coalition of major television networks -- General Electric Co.'s NBC, Viacom Inc.'s CBS, News Corp.'s FOX and Walt Disney Co.'s ABC. The networks were seeking to loosen rules governing their ownership of local TV stations.

Fierce Opposition

The Federal Communications Commission had proposed allowing the networks to own local stations covering 45% of U.S. households, up from the previous limit of 35%. By the time Mr. Hartley was hired, local broadcasters had mounted fierce opposition to the change, and more than two-thirds of Congress had announced their opposition to the move.

Mr. Blunt, however, joined other House Republican leaders in blocking the measure from reaching a floor vote. The standoff ended with a compromise: the network ownership limit was lifted to 39%. Mr. Hartley's network clients considered it a victory.

During this lobbying battle, Mr. Hartley was helping Mr. Blunt raise campaign money. Cassidy & Associates made available its skybox at Washington's MCI Center for a fund-raiser at a Simon and Garfunkel concert. Mr. Blunt reimbursed Cassidy for the cost of the seats. Last fall, Mr. Blunt rented the skybox again for a fund-raiser during a U2 concert.

At Cassidy, Mr. Hartley hired two former aides of Mr. Blunt and the husband of a third. After Mr. Blunt launched his campaign to replace Mr. DeLay as majority leader three weeks ago, Mr. Hartley began advising Mr. Blunt and his staff on the race, according to Republican aides involved in the matter.

"Roy has the trust and confidence in him that he had when Gregg was his chief of staff," says Drew Maloney, a lobbyist and former aide of Mr. DeLay who backs Mr. Blunt's campaign for majority leader. Dan Mattoon, a close adviser to House Speaker Dennis Hastert, calls Mr. Hartley "a very important part of Roy's outside operation."

Mr. Hartley joined a small group of lobbyists who have helped plot strategy and raise money for other Republican leaders, such as Messrs. DeLay and Hastert. In January 2004, Mr. Hartley attended a dinner meeting hosted by Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff at Signatures, Mr. Abramoff's now-defunct Pennsylvania Avenue restaurant, to discuss ways to persuade Republican lobbyists and their clients to give more campaign contributions to Republicans.

During the 2003-04 election cycle, Mr. Hartley himself donated $74,500 to Mr. Hastert, Mr. DeLay and other congressional Republicans. He is on pace to match that level of giving once again in the 2006 election season.

McCain, Coburn To Force Votes On Pork Spending (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, January 27, 2006

Two Republican senators say they will force their colleagues to vote on the Senate floor on each so-called pork-barrel spending project this year, and President Bush also called for reforms to rein in the projects.

The battle over earmarks -- the line-item projects that members of Congress insert into spending bills to benefit their districts -- has ballooned as Republicans debate congressional reforms and budget deficits.

Republican Sens. John McCain of Arizona and Tom Coburn of Oklahoma sent a letter Wednesday night to their colleagues announcing they will use Senate rules to force members to vote on each project.

"American taxpayers are entitled to a more thorough debate and disclosure about how their money is being spent," the senators wrote.

The spending debate has risen to the top of the House Republican leadership contest, and is exposing a split in the party, as many conservatives say Republican congressional leaders and the White House have not taken a hard enough line on deficits.

Mr. Bush said at his press conference yesterday he is "fully prepared to use the veto" if Congress overspends, but he said that hasn't been necessary because Congress has actually met his spending targets.

The Congressional Budget Office yesterday said its fiscal 2006 deficit estimate is $337 billion, a figure that war costs could raise to about $360 billion. Fiscal 2005 ended on Sept. 30 with a $318 billion deficit.

The long-term outlook showed the deficit gone by 2012, but that assumes Mr. Bush's tax cuts expire in 2011. If the tax cuts are extended, the deficit would be more than $500 billion.

"Simply put, the Bush administration's deficit figures are a disgrace," said Rep. Charles B. Rangel of New York, the top Democrat on the Ways and Means Committee.

Meanwhile House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat, said the deficit is big in part because of "special-interest earmarks."

Mr. Bush yesterday weighed in on that debate, saying Congress will have to address earmarks and "special deals in the budget."

White House press secretary Scott McClellan said Mr. Bush wants budget reforms such as a line-item veto, which would allow him to strike earmarks, and a sunset commission to review federal programs.

Some members have proposed a ban on earmarks, but top Republican leaders such as House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert of Illinois have defended the practice.

"Who knows best where to put a bridge or a highway or a red light in their district," he said in a radio interview with Michael Reagan this week. "We need to change how we do earmarks, we need to do it in the light of day and not the last minute type of situation, but I think we can do some reform on that and still serve what's in the best interest of the American people."

In a column yesterday in Roll Call, a newspaper covering Capitol Hill, House Appropriations Committee Chairman Jerry Lewis, California Republican, said giving up earmarks would end the congressional power of the purse.

He has proposed putting a cap on the number of earmarks allowed per member, and requiring that the requester submit a letter that would be printed in the Congressional Record.

But earmark opponents like Rep. Jeff Flake, Arizona Republican, said capping the total number of earmarks would just mean lawmakers ask for bigger-ticket items.

The Congressional Research Service said earmarks have grown from 4,126 in 1994, the year before Republicans gained control of Congress, to 15,268 in 2005.

Some lawmakers say earmarks are a red herring in the fight to cut the deficit, but Mr. Coburn argues it's a mind-set and if Congress takes care of the small items, it will also take care of the big items.

Mr. Coburn had a mixed record with the spending floor votes he did force last year.

He was unable to cut funding for the Defense Travel System and he lost, 82-15, a vote to strike money for the so-called "bridge to nowhere" in Alaska. But the public fight over the bridge led Republican leaders to drop the earmark a few weeks later.

K Street's New Ways Spawn More Pork (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman And Charles R. Babcock

The Washington Post, January 27, 2006

An explosion of special interest funding engineered in part by lawmakers with close ties to lobbyists is drawing increased scrutiny as Congress moves to address concern about corruption that already has led to the conviction of a Republican House member and former GOP lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

At issue is a symbiotic relationship between lawmakers well positioned to slip special-interest projects into legislation, and wealthy lobbying groups that raise large sums of campaign funds or provide trips and other benefits to those lawmakers.

In the latest example of these backstage dealings, Rep. John T. Doolittle (R-Calif.) told The Washington Post that he helped steer defense funding, totaling $37 million, to a California company, whose officials and lobbyists helped raise at least $85,000 for Doolittle and his leadership political action committee from 2002 to 2005.

Brent Wilkes, a director of the company, PerfectWave Technologies LLC, and a major contributor to House Republican leaders, was identified as "Coconspirator No. 1" in criminal charges brought against Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Calif.) late last year. Cunningham pleaded guilty in November and resigned from Congress after admitting he conspired to take $2.4 million in bribes in return for using his office to help Wilkes and another defense contractor, in part by placing earmarks in defense appropriations bills.

Doolittle said in a statement this week that as one of three California Republicans on the House Appropriations Committee, he frequently supports "well deserving projects throughout the state." The statement added that his support of PerfectWave Technology "was no exception and based completely on the project's merits and the written support of the military."

The link between special interests and members of Congress has grown so tight that nearly a dozen House and Senate members who control federal spending have retained lobbying veterans to raise campaign funds for them, and those lobbyists have secured lucrative favors in spending bills.

These relationships have coincided with the rapid growth in the volume of home-state pork-barrel projects, commonly called earmarks, that have swelled appropriations bills in recent years, according to congressional experts and watchdog groups.

Since the Republicans took control of Congress in 1994, the number of home-district earmarks jumped from 4,155 valued at about $29 billion in 1994 to 14,211 worth nearly $53 billion 10 years later, according to the Congressional Research Service.

Once a backwater for boutique lobbying shops, the House and Senate Appropriations committees are fueling a lobbying boom in Washington. The hunt for earmarks has become so consuming that lawmakers are neglecting other duties, said Scott Lilly, who recently retired as chief Democratic aide on the House Appropriations Committee. Last year, the committee received 10,000 requests for home-district projects on one spending bill alone -- 25.4 projects per lawmaker, said committee spokesman John Scofield.

"It has become an obsession of the Congress," Lilly said. "That's all they do."

Traditionally, Congress has provided large pots of money to federal, state and local agencies, such as housing authorities and transportation departments, which then funded specific programs based on merit and local need. The Appropriations committees funded specific projects only when they had been vetted and approved by authorizing committees, such as the Armed Services Committee.

But increasingly, lawmakers have gone around authorizers and agency officials to finance pet projects in their home districts. House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) secured $207 million for the "Prairie Parkway" through Kane and Kendall counties in Illinois in last year's major highway law, although the Illinois Department of Transportation is only two years into a five-year study of the project and has not yet determined whether a highway is needed or whether improvements to existing roads would suffice.

The hunt for earmarks on Capitol Hill and on K Street has opened up new avenues for lobbyists and lawmakers to come together. Seven members of the House Appropriations Committee -- Chairman Jerry Lewis (R-Calif.), Ernest J. Istook Jr. (R-Okla.), Kay Granger (R-Tex.), Dennis Rehberg (R-Mont.), John E. Sweeney (R-N.Y.), Rosa L. DeLauro (D-Conn.) and Ed Pastor (D-Ariz.) -- have political action committees headed by registered lobbyists or former registered lobbyists with business before the committee, according to the Center for Public Integrity and campaign records.

David A. Metzner, treasurer of Sweeney's Freshmen PAC, has represented the Association of American Railroads; it is a frequent petitioner of the House Appropriations subcommittee for the departments of Transportation, the Treasury, and Housing and Urban Development, on which the New York Republican sits. Leon G. Billings, DeLauro's treasurer and longtime friend, has represented groups such as the American Lung Association and the Lincoln Pulp and Paper Co. His lobbying registration for the Industry Urban Development Agency targets the Appropriations energy and water development subcommittee's bill.

In the Senate, Appropriations Committee members Larry E. Craig (R-Idaho), Byron L. Dorgan (D-N.D.), Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) and Ted Stevens (R-Alaska) have retained PAC treasurers who have served as Appropriations lobbyists. Richard B. Ladd, treasurer of Stevens's Northern Lights PAC, has lobbied the Appropriations defense subcommittee on the behalf of defense contractors. William C. Oldaker, who heads the PACs of Reid and Dorgan, has lobbied multiple Appropriations subcommittees for the universities, science centers and municipal water districts he has represented, according to Senate lobbying records.

"It's completely out of control, and we are not going to reform a system, as far as lobbying is concerned, if we have a process that lends itself to one influential lobbyist with a relationship with one member," Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) told reporters this month.

Chairman Lewis strongly defended his committee, saying that after years of unchecked growth, the value of home-district earmarks retreated in the spending bills for this fiscal year by nearly $3 billion. One bill, funding labor, health and education programs, was voted down by the House the first time it went to the floor, in part because Lewis stripped it of every earmark. The problem, Lewis said, is with the campaign finance system. Lobbyists, such as his friend Bill Lowery, are helping to raise money to keep Republicans in the majority, and Lewis would not apologize for that.

"If you're going to impact public policy, you have to be in the majority," he said. "I don't back off that responsibility at all. Mr. Lowery is only one piece of that, and frankly a relatively small piece of it."

In a series of articles last month, Copley News Service laid out the relationship between the two that included Lowery raising campaign funds for Lewis, the exchange of longtime staff members and the channeling of millions of dollars to Lowery's California clients.

Lowery, the partners at his firm -- Copeland, Lowery, Jacquez, Denton & White -- and their clients have donated more than a third of the $1.3 million that Lewis's political action committee has raised in the past six years. One longtime member of Lewis's staff, Jeff S. Shockey, left Capitol Hill to join Lowery's firm, then returned recently as the House Appropriations Committee's deputy staff director. Letitia H. White, a Lewis staffer for 21 years, began lobbying for Lowery in 2003.

Wilkes, the California businessman linked to the Cunningham corruption case, began tapping federal spending sources in the mid-1990s, after Cunningham helped him win at least $80 million in Pentagon earmarks for a company he ran that converted paper documents to digital images.

In mid-2002, Wilkes became involved with a new company, PerfectWave Technologies LLC. He then retained the Alexander Strategy Group, a high-powered firm operated by former aides to then-House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Tex.), to lobby for defense appropriations. Wilkes was seeking funding for the development of an "automated speech recognition technology."

Shortly thereafter, individuals related to Wilkes and PerfectWave made large campaign donations to members of the GOP leadership, Doolittle and Lewis, who was then chairman of the Appropriations defense subcommittee. PerfectWave is housed in Wilkes's office building in Poway, Calif.

Doolittle and his leadership PAC received at least $85,000 from 2002 to 2005 from Wilkes, PerfectWave associates and their wives, and from Alexander Strategy lobbyists Edwin A. Buckham and Tony C. Rudy and their wives.

Wilkes was successful. Congress approved the first earmark for PerfectWave as part of the fiscal 2003 defense bill, which was passed in October 2002. That $1 million earmark was followed by an installment of $18 million in 2003 and another $18 million in 2004. Doolittle, whose district is in Northern California, was a guest at a fundraising dinner at Wilkes's office in San Diego in the fall of 2003.

Doolittle's office released a letter from a Marine Corps official dated last Feb. 25 that praised the PerfectWave technology. A spokesman for the House Appropriations Committee said there are no additional funds for the project in the fiscal 2006 budget because the Marines have not spent all the money that was earmarked.

Capital's New Four-Letter Word (WP)

By Shailagh Murray

These are dark days for earmarks.

Packing bills with special provisions has long been an honored tradition in Congress, but now a pall has fallen over the practice. Bolstered by a budget crisis and a series of scandals involving legislative favors, an increasingly prolific government watchdog movement is turning "pork" into a four-letter word.

These scrappy outfits are run by small corps of veteran staffers whose offices look more like dorm rooms than the posh K Street suites occupied by their archnemeses: lobbyists. Taxpayers for Common Sense elevated an obscure Alaska highway project into the now-infamous "Bridge to Nowhere." Citizens Against Government Waste started battling runaway Hurricane Katrina spending three days after the storm hit the Gulf Coast.

The two groups joined forces this month with the National Taxpayers Union, a conservative, low-tax organization, to combat the rising cost of the new D.C. baseball stadium. Other watchdog targets include indicted former representative Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Calif.), the Pentagon and the U.S. Postal Service.

The watchdogs work closely with friendly lawmakers, such as Sen. Tom Coburn (R-Okla.), who tried to redirect funding for the "Bridge to Nowhere" to a New Orleans bridge ruined by Hurricane Katrina. The informal investigative alliance also includes Internet bloggers, including a "porkbusters" campaign on the site truthlaidbear.com, an online effort to mobilize against wasteful federal spending.

"It's a $2.4 trillion budget," said Steve Ellis, vice president of Taxpayers for Common Sense. "There's work for everybody."

Congress is embarrassed enough by the Cunningham and Jack Abramoff scandals, both involving huge sums of cash for legislative favors, that lawmakers are considering ways to crack down on earmarks, which typically show up in bills at the last minute, after little or no scrutiny. The watchdog groups are wary that Congress will wind up focusing on lobbying-related activities, rather than cleaning up the legislative process.

"We hope that there's a recognition that it's not just lobbying," said Thomas A. Schatz, president of Citizens Against Government Waste. "It's more a matter of how the whole process works."

Although Republicans claim to be the party of small government and fiscal restraint, Schatz's group found that total earmarks rose to 13,997 in 2005, a huge increase from the 1995 total of 1,349. The process appears to have slowed with the fiscal 2006 appropriations bills, with the exception of the defense measure, which preliminary analysis by the groups suggests is the usual earmark treasure trove.

Coburn, one of the Senate's toughest earmark critics, attributed the watchdog movement's growing influence to a decline in congressional oversight. What he calls "an army of citizen investigators" is "filling an oversight gap created by Congress's refusal to perform one of its core responsibilities," Coburn said.

Appropriations Chairman Thad Cochran (R-Miss.) noted that Senate rules already allow senators to attempt to strike provisions from bills -- as Coburn tried with his "Bridge to Nowhere" amendment. And while there may be earmarking excesses, Cochran added, the practice is entwined with one of the most sacrosanct of Congress's duties: deciding how federal money is spent.

"It serves a useful purpose for people to point out things," said Cochran, referring to the watchdog groups. But he added, "I think senators would be reluctant to approve a law that says you can't have any specific project appropriated in a bill."

The movement's ideological roots range from liberal to libertarian. Taxpayers for Common Sense, created 10 years ago, regards the late former senator William Proxmire (D-Wis.) as its spiritual leader and has taken over his Golden Fleece Award, created in 1975 to highlight wasteful projects. Proxmire gave the National Science Foundation the first Golden Fleece, for spending $84,000 to study why people fall in love.

Citizens Against Government Waste was founded in 1984 by the industrialist J. Peter Grace and the syndicated columnist Jack Anderson, now both deceased. It is also the legacy of President Ronald Reagan's "Private Sector Survey on Cost Control," directed in 1982 to "work like tireless bloodhounds to root out government inefficiency and waste of tax dollars." Other groups include the National Taxpayers Union, founded in 1969, which has already set its sights on the farm bill that expires in 2007.

The groups' bread and butter are the vast databases they compile that break down earmarks by state or individual lawmaker. They also rely on tips.

About five years ago, an Alaska environmentalist contacted Keith Ashdown at Taxpayers for Common Sense about a proposal for a massive bridge that would have linked the town of Ketchikan to the more sparsely populated Gravina Island. The group spent more than a year examining the project and awarded it a Golden Fleece on June 12, 2003.

Even Ashdown was surprised when the final highway authorization bill emerged last summer with a whopping $223 million for the Ketchikan bridge. At most, he had expected a few million dollars.

The bridge attracted a blizzard of adverse publicity, and later last year, Congress redirected the money to allow Alaska to spend it on other transportation projects. Ashdown, meanwhile, has moved on to a new project.

He heard about this one from a Gulf Coast resident. According to the e-mail he received, Mississippi wants to spend more than $200 million to repair the U.S. 90 Biloxi Bay Bridge, which was damaged last summer by Hurricane Katrina.

But the bridge could be obsolete before it is finished, the tipster warned, pending the outcome of a debate over relocating the highway. Ashdown is looking into the project and already has a name for it: the "Bridge Over Troubled Waters."

Spend-and-Collect Beltway Party Really Knows Jack (WSJ)

By Daniel Henninger

Jack Abramoff. Jack Abramoff. Jack Abramoff. Once the hunt's on, some names sound to the scandal born. Tongsun Park, Charles Keating, Elizabeth Ray, Fannie Fox, Susan McDougal. Now comes Jack, the central figure in what Beltway Democrats are trying to build into a bonfire that will burn down Republican control of Congress. Every time someone tells Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid that he, too, took money from Jack's clients, he starts jumping up and down like Rumpelstiltskin yelling, "This is a Republican scandal!" Harry Reid, Harry Reid. One could get used to that.

Poll after poll says the public thinks both parties are equally corrupt. It depends, of course, on what the meaning of corruption is. If by corrupt you mean lobbyist sleaze, quid pro quo, the pork barrel, earmarks to nowhere and grossing out even the public's generally low expectations, then yes, both parties are equally corrupt.

But it gets worse. Congress legislated the system that now exists. Congress planted the seeds back in the '70s for what is revolting you now with two enactments -- the Budget and Impoundment Control Act of 1974 and the 1974 amendments to the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971. Both were marketed as reforms.

The first law turned political Washington into a trillion-dollar industry camouflaged as the federal budget. The second ensured that sitting members of Congress and K Street lobbyists would become the entrenched management of that industry. Compared to this, Enron is a kindergarten game.

This is a history worth knowing and retelling. It all came to life amid another famous scandal, Watergate, and the most famous such name of all, Richard Nixon.

Nixon's impeachment is wholly linked in history to the Watergate scandal. But, in fact, his battles with the Democratically controlled Congress over spending authority also greased his fall. As had Presidents Truman, Kennedy and Johnson, Nixon tried to control Congress's spending by "impounding" -- refusing to spend -- specific appropriations.

Congress itself had tried various gimmicks to stanch the Great Society's costs, such as "spending ceilings." None worked, as indeed no gaggle of legislators will discipline themselves. Nixon resorted to the blunt club of impoundments. Congress went bananas. This battle, fought inside the partisan cauldron of the Vietnam War, led to the oddly named 1974 Budget Control Act, which purposely eviscerated presidential control over individual spending items, such as an earmark. To kill a "bridge to nowhere," a president has to veto the entire highway bill. Ditto defense pork and so on.

The 1974 Act did give the president "rescission" authority -- a request not to spend money on a project. But the law also said that if Congress never took a vote to affirm the rescission, the money went out the door. Absurd, but that's current law. Congressional Quarterly, in a 1982 study of the struggle over spending control, quoted a budget official then predicting the future: "What we're talking about here is congressional government -- and chaos."

But they weren't done. In 1974 -- the start the Long Era of Chaos in our politics -- Congress claimed it was curing the abuses of Watergate by mandating that no individual could contribute more than $1,000 to a candidate per election. So of course candidates were going to need a lot of "individual" contributions to finance a modern campaign. Thus was born the current co-dependency between members of Congress who hold the power to confer federal spending and Washington lobbyists who have the power to bundle campaign contributions in PACs and such for incumbent earmarkers.

A friend who was part of this world back then described it for me recently: "If you lived in Washington in those years, the change was dramatic. We moved to California in 1973. Returning to visit in 1976, the evening landscape had changed completely. There were fundraisers everywhere. Friends who were Congressmen were stopping at two or three cocktail parties an evening, touching base with single-subject organizations who had established PACs in reply to the 1974 reforms. We knew a caterer; her life had changed." Her business today is probably a publicly traded company, so vast has the industry of Beltway spending and campaign-contribution collecting become. Washington today is enervated by it. * * *

Abolish the individual limits on campaign contributions but require public disclosure on the Web. Democrats James Carville and Paul Begala recently proposed making this the basis of creating a new campaign-finance system. But beyond this lies the question of whether Democrats and Republicans want to fix Washington. Are they really separate parties, or just one entity -- the Beltway Party?

I don't see how the Democrats have any practical or ideological incentive to stop the federal government's inexorable 70-year-long growth. This is what they want -- more. For them, the Abramoffs of the world are reindeer pulling Santa's sleigh. By contrast, the Blunt-Boehner-Shadegg fight for the House leadership is an ideological argument over what Republicans should be amid a federal establishment that metastasized after the 1974 changes.

The failed 1974 Budget Act, which released the earmark and spending ghouls, makes clear that some workable form of presidential spending control has to be in the game. Presidential line-item veto power would require a constitutional amendment. Real rescission authority would help, but that has to pass through Congress and maybe a court challenge. Oh gosh, I almost forgot. Unlike from 1960 to 1994, the Republicans control Congress, and arguably all three branches of government. Does that matter? We'll find out this November and in 2008, when Republicans will either vote or sit.

I wish President Bush would put this issue of what Washington has become into his State of the Union speech Tuesday. My guess is he won't, recalling what happened when Richard Nixon tried to fight both a major war and the party that controls Congress, which for the foreseeable future looks like it will be the Beltway Spend-and-Collect Party.

For Blunt, Pressure Grows For Q&A With Rivals (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, January 27, 2006

WASHINGTON -- As the House Republican leader's race goes into its final week, Majority Whip Roy Blunt faces growing pressure to appear with his two rivals before the caucus and answer questions on where he wants to take the party after the spate of recent scandals.

Mr. Blunt is widely seen as the frontrunner for the post vacated by Texas Rep. Tom DeLay. But the Missourian also has seemed insecure, refusing to give up his whip's position and avoiding any joint television appearances where he can be questioned with the two other candidates, Reps. John Boehner of Ohio and John Shadegg of Arizona.

The latest episode surrounds a closed-door party meeting Wednesday, before the Feb. 2 leadership vote. Aides to Rep. Deborah Pryce (R., Ohio), who chairs the House Republican Conference, had discussed a proposed format that allowed each candidate to speak for two minutes, after which there would be 10 minutes for questions.

A spokeswoman for Mr. Blunt said that he would "be more than willing absolutely" to agree to a question-and-answer session "if that's what Ms. Pryce decided." But behind the scenes, Republicans said there was resistance from the Blunt camp, which felt caught by surprise by the suggested format. And in a letter announcing the meeting, Ms. Pryce doesn't mention questions, writing only that "Any potential candidate will be given an opportunity to speak briefly to the Conference."

Sean Spicer, communications director for the Conference, dismissed inquiries about the matter, saying ideas were floated by staff but were of no consequence if not in Ms. Pryce's letter. But he was among those who had promoted the 10-minute Q&A format within Ms. Pryce's operation, and spokesmen for both Reps. Boehner and Shadegg said they hoped it would be restored.

The absence of more open debate is striking given the context of the leadership contest. Mr. DeLay agreed to vacate the leadership post after being indicted in Texas in October on alleged campaign finance violations and then watching his ally, Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff, plead guilty to three felonies in federal court this month. Heading into November's elections, the contest is particularly important, and both Reps. Boehner and Blunt have an eye to positioning themselves to become speaker after Speaker Dennis Hastert (R., Ill.) steps down in 2008.

"This race is very different" Mr. Shadegg said. "The conference is under a magnifying glass as a result of the climate we're in and I think a lot of people are looking at what we do."

Mr. Blunt claims he has already more than the 116 votes needed to win, but only about 92 of his supporters have been willing to make their names public. Meanwhile, Reps. Boehner and Shadegg are fighting to get past one another into a second ballot face-off with the frontrunner.

"We're working very hard to get to the second ballot and we think our numbers are very close," Mr. Shadegg said. Rep. Ray LaHood (R., Ill.), a Boehner backer predicts the Ohio lawmaker, who chairs the House Education and Workforce Committee, will survive and then pick up enough of the Shadegg camp to prevail over Mr. Blunt. "I think it would be decided by five votes or fewer," he said.

House Whip Race Indicates Trend To Conservatism (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, January 27, 2006

The House majority whip's race is an indication of just how conservative the House Republican Conference has become.

Two 1994 Republican revolutionaries and two fast-rising Republican stars face off in a contest they all say is about making the party refocus on basic conservative principles.

"Sometimes old institutions tend to drift away from their original intention. I thought I could be that breath of fresh air and just provide some direction of why we do what we do," said Rep. Mike Rogers, Michigan Republican and one of the candidates.

He is running against Rep. Eric Cantor of Virginia, Rep. Todd Tiahrt of Kansas and Rep. Zach Wamp of Tennessee. Mr. Tiahrt and Mr. Wamp were part of the Class of 1994, while Mr. Rogers and Mr. Cantor were elected in 2000.

All four rank among the most conservative members of the House: They earned "A" or "A+" grades from the National Rifle Association, had strong marks from the National Taxpayers Union and have lifetime ratings of 90 percent or better from the American Conservative Union.

The whip, the No. 3 position in the Republican hierarchy, is supposed to assess where House Republicans are on issues and build support for Republican priorities.

As of now, it's not clear the position will even be open. The current whip, Rep. Roy Blunt of Missouri, is running for majority leader but has not relinquished his seat.

For that reason the whip's race has been far less public. Mr. Rogers has been the most active publicly, giving a series of speeches this week on issues such as intelligence and economic competitiveness.

The former FBI agent says he has experience winning close races -- he won his congressional seat by 111 votes in 2000 and, before that, won a Michigan Senate leadership election by one vote -- that will serve him well as whip.

He said Republicans are right on the issues, but they need to do a better job of communicating them.

"If we are going to be relevant for Americans, we have to be able to sit around any kitchen table in this country with our principles, our conservative principles about smaller, efficient government, about a helping hand, not a handout," he said.

Unlike the majority leader's race, those in the whip's race are not releasing lists of publicly committed members.

Mr. Wamp is positioning himself as the person willing to challenge the conference.

"This is a real challenge for us to hold our majority and who's willing to push the reforms that are needed," he said.

He said he's the only one of the four who is not part of the current whip's team, and therefore the only one outside of the political team Rep. Tom DeLay of Texas built.

Mr. Tiahrt said being on the whip's team is a key benefit. "I've got the most experience of people in this race."

He has taken a major role in pushing American economic competitiveness and said as whip he would push for the House to do more by doing less.

He said they often step on their own toes, passing good bills but drowning out that message by doing too much.

"It's important that we have a firm, focused voice on our leadership team that brings us back to a smarter schedule that brings legislation to the floor that reflects who we are and why we're in Washington," he said.

Mr. Cantor said reform means more than just the scandals -- it means returning to balanced budgets, changing the spending process and reforming the tax system.

"My goal is 10 months from now when we have an election, not for voters to be going to the polls with the choice of how do we clean up Congress," he said.

On spending reforms, Mr. Cantor said he will lead by example and reduce the number of earmarks he submits.

"At the end of the day we will be well-led, and it will be a conservative. There probably isn't a hair's-breadth difference between Cantor, Rogers, Wamp and Tiahrt in voting [records]," Mr. Rogers said.

Senate Questioning Bush Policies, But Administration Fighting Back (KRT)

By James Kuhnhenn

Knight Ridder, January 27, 2006

WASHINGTON - After years of deferring to the Bush White House, the Republican-controlled Senate has begun pushing back, holding oversight hearings on topics ranging from President Bush's response to Hurricane Katrina to his administration's mine-safety record and the president's secret domestic-surveillance program.

Administration officials are fighting back.

An administration mine-safety official walked out of a Senate hearing this week, angering its powerful Republican chairman. The White House refused to give another Senate committee documents it sought about Katrina. The administration is trying to dismiss critics of its eavesdropping program as clueless partisans, though many of them are Republicans.

White House officials and their allies maintain that their stance protects inherent executive power. Critics say the administration's reaction to the Senate's inquiries is an assault on Congress' constitutional role as a coequal branch of government that checks and balances the executive.

"There is always a tension between Congress and the executive on information-sharing," said Sen. Joseph Lieberman of Connecticut, a Democrat who's generally friendly to Bush but has accused the White House of stonewalling over Katrina information.

"This administration, certainly among the three that I've served under," he said, "is the most restrictive and protective about sharing information."

The Bush administration has never been shy about testing the limits of its executive power. Vice President Dick Cheney refused to divulge the identities of energy executives who advised him on energy policy. The administration wouldn't give Congress up-to-date cost estimates of its prescription-drug legislation. The Pentagon is often stingy about data related to the war in Iraq.

-A Senate Appropriations subcommittee had sharp words Monday for federal mining safety officials, blaming improper enforcement of regulations for the recent deaths of 14 miners in West Virginia. Two hours into the hearing, the acting head of the Mine Safety and Health Administration, David Dye, left despite requests from subcommittee Chairman Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., that he stay and answer further questions.

-Federal agencies have refused to turn over documents about their communications with the White House related to Hurricane Katrina to two congressional committees that are investigating the federal response to the disaster.

-Specter has scheduled hearings for Feb. 6 on whether the president was legally permitted to authorize wiretaps in the United States without court warrants. The administration has mounted an effort to portray those who question the legitimacy of the program as out of touch with the realities of post-Sept. 11 counterterrorism.

Such challenging examinations of the administration were virtually unheard-of during Bush's first term, when Congress wanted to cooperate with the president in the aftermath of the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks and he was highly popular with the public.

Since then, Bush's standing has plummeted. His response to Katrina, the continuing bad news from Iraq and other controversies have eroded his popularity.

In addition, with congressional elections in November, Republicans aren't as concerned about advancing the president's agenda as they are in advancing themselves. Both Republicans and Democrats have decided to resist Bush's expansion of presidential authority.

Congress watchers say hearings into Katrina, mine safety and wiretaps represent the least of what a muscular Congress should be doing to fulfill its oversight responsibilities.

"Congress is showing some tendons; it hasn't reached the level of a muscle yet," Specter said.

"Oversight is an ongoing process by which Congress keeps an eye on the executive branch agencies," said Gary Bass, the executive director of OMB-Watch, a nonpartisan group that keeps tabs on federal policy-making. "That is not what I see happening."

Norman Ornstein, a veteran congressional scholar at the American Enterprise Institute, a conservative research center, said today's rare display of oversight broke a five-year pattern of almost undeviating loyalty to the president.

He said House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., and Senate Republican leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., "don't see themselves as heads of an independent branch.

"They see themselves as field generals in the army of the president."

But some, such as Specter and Sen. Susan Collins, R-Maine, now are leading inquiries into administration actions. Collins, who's chairing the Katrina investigation, has objected to the White House's refusal to turn over some documents and its instructions to agency officials not to reveal their communications with the White House about the hurricane.

"There are legitimate privileges that the president can cite," she said. "But what is unacceptable for me is for the White House to tell officials in other agencies that they can't even tell us who they called in the White House. That is a real stretch, and that is not a legitimate privilege that the White House has a right to exercise."

Specter simply raises an eyebrow at Bush's claims that those who seek to investigate his spying program are partisans living in a "pre-9/11 world."

"There are lots of fellows with `R' (Republican) after their name who are pretty sensible people who think this ought to be done," he said.

Article One of the Constitution gives Congress its powers. Among the powers that permit the Senate to check and balance the executive branch are:

-The power, shared with the House of Representatives, to enact laws.

-The power to try all impeachment cases brought by the House.

-The power to advise and consent to executive and judicial nominations or to reject them.

-The power, shared with the House, to declare war.

-The power, shared with the House, to determine federal taxes, spending and borrowing.

-The power, shared with the House, to override presidential vetoes.

Air Traffic Controllers Make Alliance With Senators In Dispute With FAA (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, January 27, 2006

The union representing air traffic controllers is looking to Capitol Hill for help in contentious contract negotiations with the Federal Aviation Administration.

Four Democratic senators introduced a bill yesterday that would permit labor disputes at the FAA to be settled through binding arbitration, John S. Carr , president of the National Air Traffic Controllers Association, announced.

The unusual move by NATCA -- to seek congressional support for changes in FAA labor procedures while at the bargaining table -- came a day after FAA officials held a news conference to say they had regained control of a New York radar center and brought an end to abusive overtime, sick leave and workers' compensation practices by controllers there.

In recent weeks, both sides have accused the other of making false claims, engaging in publicity stunts and twisting numbers on controller compensation in an effort to shape public perceptions about the negotiations. The FAA is one of the rare places in government where unions can bargain over pay.

Contract talks are scheduled to run through the first full week of March, and union officials contend that the FAA does not intend to bargain in good faith and will run out the clock on the talks. The agency denies the charge, arguing that a voluntary settlement is best for both parties.

If contract talks break down, the FAA might send its last offer to Congress for a 60-day review. If Congress takes no action, the FAA may impose its version of the contract on the union.

Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) said he and colleagues proposed arbitration "to help defuse the growing management-labor tension at the FAA."

Under the Obama bill, if the FAA and one of its unions failed to reach a voluntary agreement, the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service would be called on to try again for a settlement. If mediation failed, Congress could impose the FAA's last, best offer on employees by approving it in legislation. If Congress did not act, the impasse would go to binding arbitration.

Joining Obama in introducing the bill were Sens. Daniel K. Inouye (D-Hawaii), Patty Murray (D-Wash.) and Frank Lautenberg (D-N.J.).

Carr called the bill "a matter of fundamental fairness" and said the union would seek to win Republican support. Although it seems unlikely that Republican leaders will move the bill fast enough to affect current contract talks, Carr expressed optimism, saying, "I really believe it has got legs."

The head of the FAA, Marion C. Blakey , ruled out "changing the rules of the game during halftime" in a letter to Carr this month.

She said the labor rules are "part of a carefully balanced approach" that gives the union the right to bargain over pay and benefits and gives Congress "the final say in any pay dispute." Turning impasses over to an arbitrator would take away authority that belongs to the president and Congress, Blakey said.

She added that the current approach has allowed NATCA "to enjoy unprecedented wage gains" that have made air traffic controllers among the highest paid federal employees.Postal Blitz, Day 2

Postal officials continued their efforts to kill a Senate bill that would overhaul operations at the U.S. Postal Service, holding a news conference to list objections and to note that they have the support of the American Postal Workers Union.

Richard Strasser , the Postal Service's chief financial officer, said the bill, in combination with White House policy requirements, "will cause us to get into an immediate rate case that will be larger than it has ever been" and drive up stamp prices by 18 to 20 percent.

Sens. Susan Collins (R-Maine) and Thomas R. Carper (D-Del.), the bill's sponsors, said postal officials were "distorting our position and blatantly misleading our colleagues and the public." In a statement, they said, "The Postal Service appears to have sunk to a new low."

Justice And Junkets (NYT)

Justice Antonin Scalia certainly has poor judgment when it comes to vacations.

Justice Scalia was apparently unchastened by the criticism of his 2004 duck-hunting excursion with Vice President Dick Cheney, one of that term's most prominent Supreme Court litigants. Last September, he skipped the swearing-in of Chief Justice John Roberts Jr. because of another ethically dubious trip, this time to the posh Ritz-Carlton at the Beaver Creek ski resort in Colorado.

He was there to teach a 10-hour seminar over a couple of days for a conservative group, the Federalist Society. "Nightline" recently reported that the gig had left Justice Scalia plenty of time for tennis, fly-fishing and socializing with seminar participants, some of whom may have business before the Supreme Court. One Federalist Society cocktail reception was sponsored in part by the lobbying and law firm that used to employ Jack Abramoff, Tom DeLay's convicted pal and benefactor for golf trips.

Justice Scalia's travel is part of a broader affliction on the federal bench. The Los Angeles Times reported in 2004, for example, that Justice Clarence Thomas had accepted thousands of dollars in gifts in recent years, including an $800 leather jacket, a $1,200 set of tires from Nascar and an extravagant vacation from a conservative activist. Federal judges below the Supreme Court level accept dozens of free vacations each year from well-heeled special interests under the guise of "judicial education."

The judicial lobbying problem is more serious in one respect than the scandal enveloping Congress. Lawmakers operate in an overtly political environment, but the decision-making process of judges is supposed to be impermeable to clever efforts by special interests to buy access and favor.

Three Democratic senators with a longstanding concern about this problem — Patrick Leahy of Vermont, Russell Feingold of Wisconsin and John Kerry of Massachusetts — are readying provisions to ban junkets and other compromising gifts for judges, which they hope to make part of their party's lobbying reform proposal. For Congress to pass a lobbying reform bill that curbs inappropriate perks for lawmakers but not for federal judges would be a scandal in itself.

Hamas Win Shatters Status Quo (CSM)

By Ilene R. Prusher

The Christian Science Monitor, January 27, 2006

JERUSALEM - The Islamic group Hamas staged a stunning upset of the ruling Fatah faction in Palestinian parliamentary polls Wednesday, winning a solid outright majority of the total 132 seats and making the strongest ever showing of an Islamist movement in the Arab world.

With such a decisive win, Hamas is unlikely to need a coalition partner, sidelining the Palestine Liberation Organization's Fatah Party and promising to redefine the troubled Middle East peace process.

Hamas, which rejected the 1993 Oslo Accords that founded the Palestinian Authority (PA), was ebullient over its mandate, but said it would not change its fundamental stance: It will not disarm its military wing and will not revise its charter calling for Israel's destruction.

The surprise victory of Hamas presents a radical about-face for Palestinian relations with Israel, has reverberations for Muslim countries through the Middle East, and raises questions for the international community at large.

According to results released Thursday based on 95 percent of the vote, Hamas won 76 seats to Fatah's 43 seats. Smaller and independent parties took the remaining 13 seats.

Both the US and the European Union have stated that they would not deal with Hamas because they deem it a terrorist organization. But the PA, badly in need of financial aid and actively seeking intervention from world powers in its conflict with Israel, will now be led by an organization that came into the world's consciousness through suicide bombings in Israel.

But what Hamas has lacked in international legitimacy, it clearly has secured in domestic esteem. "Hamas's key was to position itself not in terms of ideology, but as the address of choice for those seeking to cast a protest vote," says Mouin Rabbani, a Middle East analyst with the International Crisis Group and an expert on the Israeli-Arab conflict, and a contributing editor of Middle East Report.

"Unlike Fatah, the next government will enjoy a lot of popular support and legitimacy," he says. "I don't think even Hamas was expecting anything like this result, and this means they are faced with strategic issues that they didn't mean to deal with as of yet."

Indeed, the questions that have suddenly been thrust upon Palestinians and Israelis are intricate and endless. In a Hamas-run PA, what happens to crucial cooperation that goes on with Israel? Even in the worst of times, Israeli and Palestinian officials cooperate on security issues, border crossings, information sharing, commercial relations, and basic utilities.

But Benjamin Netanyahu, the Likud party candidate in the Israeli elections scheduled for March, compared the Hamas win to putting the equivalent of Iran or the Taliban within 1,000 meters of the Israeli capital.

On the streets of Gaza, where the organization was founded in 1987, the mood was triumphant. At the home of Said Siam, a Hamas leader who won a seat, supporters crowded his courtyard to offer congratulations. Mr. Siam says Hamas wants to find common ground with all the Palestinian factions to form an inclusive government. He left open the possibility of negotiating with Israel and continuing violent resistance.

"When Fatah was in power, they had resistance groups and negotiations at the same time," Siam says. "As of now, it is not on Hamas's agenda to negotiate with Israel. "Israel is an occupying state. When Israel agrees to give the Palestinians full rights, after that Hamas will decide" whether to negotiate.

Whether Hamas wants to place one of its officials as prime minister, and whether its militant Qassam Brigade disarms or merges with the PA security forces, were all matters up for discussion, he says.

Meanwhile, Fatah supporters lamented their stunning defeat. "It's so sad, we don't know what the future of our country will be," says taxi driver Kamal Abu Foz. "The international community and Israel won't deal with Hamas, and Hamas can't deliver us a state."

In Jerusalem, former President Jimmy Carter, head of an multinational observer mission for the Palestinian vote, urged the US and Europe not to abandon the PA's financial needs. He said that according to the World Bank's most current figures, the Palestinian government will run out of funds by the end of February, and already faces a $900 million shortfall.

"There are some legal loopholes that can be utilized to help the Palestinians that don't have to go through the Palestinian Authority," Mr. Carter said, in response to questions over whether his call for international assistance - including from Washington - contradicts longstanding US policy about not working with any group it deems a terrorist organization.

In the West Bank city of Ramallah, many expect that Islamic Hamas will soften its positions. Much of Ramallah's cosmopolitan population won't accept passage of Islamic sharia law.

At Almonds pub, one of many Ramallah restaurants that give the city its reputation as the center of Palestinian nightlife, a TV glowed with images of children wearing Hamas headbands. Owner Bishara Kaoud says he expected the bar to be especially full Thursday night with regulars anxious about the possibility of Hamas planning to impose Islamic law, which forbids consumption of alcohol. "I have a lot of people coming in tonight just in case tomorrow there won't be any booze in this place."

Leader Likely To Cut Ties To Israel (WT)

By Paul Martin And Betsy Pisik

The Washington Times, January 27, 2006

GAZA CITY, Gaza Strip -- Hamas leader Mahmoud Zahar has proposed a dramatic shift of Palestinian policy -- ending security cooperation with Israel, cutting most trade links with the Jewish state and refusing to engage with the "Christian-Zionist" U.S. administration.

"We have to go away from Israel and move toward all possible linkages with our Arab and Islamic brothers," he told The Washington Times just days before his militant movement's stunning election victory.

"Cooperation [with Israel] on the security and economic fields was a disaster for the Palestinians," he said

Although he promised last night to invite Fatah and independent candidates to participate in a broad-based government, Mr. Zahar -- the highest-ranking Hamas official in the Palestinian territories -- gave no indication that the electoral success had softened his views.

"Resistance is a legitimate right of the Palestinian people, and we will not abandon it. There is no contraction between resistance and entering the legislative council," he told reporters at his party's Gaza City headquarters.

Mr. Zahar said Hamas would extend its year-old truce if Israel reciprocates.

"If not, then I think we will have no option but to protect our people and our land," he said.

Another Hamas official, speaking to The Washington Times on the third floor of the group's eerily unfinished offices in central Gaza City last night, warned that the group's year-old cease-fire with Israel would not last forever.

"We have declared a cease-fire, but the occupation didn't appreciate it," he said. "A one-sided cease-fire is not useful."

During the earlier interview, Mr. Zahar -- who was nearly killed when an Israeli bombing raid destroyed his home two years ago -- spoke in firm, quiet tones in strongly accented but clear English.

Noting Israel's plan to "disengage" from the Palestinians, he proposed his own form of disengagement in which the Gaza Strip and "any part of Palestine that can be liberated" would seek to link themselves economically with their Arab and Islamic neighbors.

He said the 1993 Oslo accords and the 1994 Paris agreement that followed had given Israel economic advantages at the Palestinians' expense.

"Our economic status was destroyed by the linkage of our economy with Israel," he said.

He charged that Palestinian agricultural exports had been restricted while oil and electricity purchased through Israel cost many times more than they would if purchased from Egypt.

"In 2004, we paid $186 million for electricity, and if we had taken it from Egypt, it would have been $20 million," he said, apparently assuming the oil and electricity could be purchased at the highly subsidized rates provided to Egyptian consumers.

"We are not speaking about a fanatical process, not saying we are going to kill the Jews -- we are talking about how to address the destruction of our economy," he said.

Mr. Zahar seemed unconcerned about the prospect of a cutoff in foreign aid, saying a Hamas government would not renounce the right to armed resistance to keep the money flowing from Europe and the United States.

"How could we justify taking the money?" he asked.

Mr. Zahar said he thinks European countries would soon "change their mind" and continue to do business with the new Palestinian Authority, but he said he could foresee no relationship with the Bush administration, which he accused of supporting Christian sectarianism in Egypt and interfering in the affairs of Lebanon, Syria and Saudi Arabia.

"President Bush is introducing hysteria into the region," he said. "He used the term 'a new Crusade' and clearly is pushing the Christian-Zionist agenda -- which is why we cannot deal with him."

Mr. Zahar said that a continuing security understanding with Israel was "not impossible" while the Palestinians build new institutions.

But, within the next five decades, "I'm sure Israel will disappear as the Crusaders and other empires disappeared," he said.

"All of Palestine will become part of the Arab and Islamic land -- as the Koran promised."

Bush Is Conciliatory In Accepting Victory Of Hamas (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0012487

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, January 27, 2006

President Bush accepted the stunning election results in the Palestinian territories yesterday with a conciliatory tone, saying the landslide victory of the militant Islamic group Hamas was rejection of the "status quo" and a repudiation of the "old guard" that had failed to provide honest government and services.

"There's something healthy about a system that does that," Bush said at a news conference. He reiterated that he will not work with Hamas, formally known at the Islamic Resistance Movement, as a "partner of peace" until it renounces its goal of destroying Israel and disarms its militias. But he left unsaid what a Hamas-led government will mean for the distribution of U.S. financial assistance and for American involvement in trying to reach a peace deal.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice also put on a brave face, saying "we still have every reason for hope and for optimism" because voter turnout was high and free from violence. She said the Palestinian people were "expressing their desire for change," because they "have endured governance that was, by all accounts, not meeting their needs."

The upbeat rhetoric belied the fact that the election outcome was the opposite of what the administration had hoped would happen. Behind the scenes, U.S. officials scrambled to survey the wreckage of their Middle East policy.

The Bush administration has spent nearly $500 million in the past year to bolster the Palestinian Authority and the ruling Fatah party, which was nonetheless crushed by Hamas at the polls. Against the advice of Israeli officials, the administration had pushed Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas to hold the elections without delay, believing that the voting would strengthen his hand in disarming militia groups. Instead, the plan backfired, and an organization that has claimed credit for dozens of suicide bombings -- some resulting in the deaths of Americans -- is poised to take power.

Officials had no easy answers about their next step. Rice spoke with other sponsors of a U.S.-backed peace plan -- the European Union, the United Nations and Russia -- and will meet with her counterparts in the group the Quartet next week in London. In a statement, the group noted that the Palestinians "voted for change" but have not given up "their aspirations for peace and statehood." The Quartet reiterated that "there is a fundamental contradiction between armed group and militia activities and the building of a democratic state."

Rice also spoke to Abbas and urged him to remain as president. Abbas, who was elected last year after the death of longtime Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat, said last night that he will continue to pursue peace negotiations with Israel. But Abbas has resigned from other positions when his authority was challenged. Edward G. Abington Jr., a consultant to the Palestinian Authority, said many in the Fatah inner circle question whether he will do so in the coming months.

U.S. officials went to bed Wednesday night thinking that Fatah had edged out a narrow victory, which might have increased pressure on the Palestinian cabinet to include some Hamas members. That in turn might have split the United States from some European allies, who have wondered if a Hamas political wing could, perhaps, be separated from the militia.

But, under one emerging theory, the clear victory by Hamas is a bracing event, or as one U.S. official put it, there is a "certain benefit of clarity in the results." European officials yesterday had little choice but to express surprise and consternation at the outcome.

Hamas, by most accounts, had expected to serve as the opposition, without the responsibility of power. Now, Hamas will face an "existential moment," forced to decide whether it will be a peaceful force for change, the U.S. official said, speaking on the condition of anonymity to comment more candidly.

Terje Roed-Larsen, a former U.N. envoy for the Middle East who is president of the International Peace Academy, agreed that Hamas now faces a "political moment of truth" that provides an opportunity for creative diplomacy. He said that unless Hamas reforms itself and renounces terrorism, the flow of donor money from Europe and the United States will stop. As the government, Hamas will be responsible for the political, social and security collapse if Western governments refuse to continue to aid the Palestinians, he said.

Hamas "cannot postpone making a choice," Larsen said. The United States and its allies need "to point out the dilemma, step back and see how they handle it."

Martin S. Indyk, a Clinton administration official and the director of the Saban Center for Middle East Policy at the Brookings Institution, agreed that Hamas will find that it can no longer be an obstacle, but said he does not foresee an immediate change in its platform. He said the result might be an "ironic situation in which it is in their interest to maintain peace, but not make peace with Israel."

Indyk cautioned that any sudden moves from the United States and Europe to reduce aid -- or a decision by Israel to withhold the tax revenue it shares with the Palestinian Authority -- could drive Hamas to seek funding from Iran, long one of its chief sponsors. Iran has tried to increase its influence in the Palestinian territories.

One complicating factor will be the mood in Congress, which has been reluctant to allow direct aid to the Palestinian Authority unless the money went to pay the utility bills owed to Israel. Many key lawmakers yesterday issued statements denouncing the Hamas victory.

Abington said the Bush administration shares responsibility for the outcome because U.S. officials did little to help Abbas or to push the Israeli government to end settlement expansion, limit roadblocks, release prisoners or stop other activities that undermined his authority in the eyes of the Palestinian people. He said the result is a "huge blow to Bush's advocacy of democracy in the Middle East" because Arab leaders fearful of Islamic victories in their countries will "push back very hard."

David Makovsky, director of a project on the Middle East peace process at the Washington Institute for Near East Policy, said "there was a lot of blame to go around here," with the primary onus falling on Fatah. But he said U.S. involvement could have been more robust after the death of Arafat and the election of Abbas.

"There needs to be some soul-searching in Washington on this," Makovsky said. "Late in the game, the United States was pressing for an election, while the work in creating liberal institutions had not materialized."

Bush Rules Out Contacts Unless Hamas Backs Peace (REU-Y2)

By Saul Hudson

Reuters, January 27, 2006

U.S. President George W. Bush refused on Thursday to deal with Hamas unless it backs peace with Israel, a decision that could sideline Washington from brokering a settlement after the militant group's Palestinian election win.

Bush also urged President Mahmoud Abbas, whose Cabinet resigned after his Fatah party lost to the Islamist group, to stay in office so the United States could keep open a diplomatic channel with the Palestinian government.

"I have made it very clear, however, that a political party that articulates the destruction of Israel as part of a platform is a party with which we will not deal," Bush told a White House news conference, referring to the group Washington considers a terrorist organization.

Bush, who has made promoting democracy in the Middle East a priority for his second term, had pressed Abbas to hold Wednesday's parliamentary election despite polls showing Hamas would do well.

Hamas had not been expected to win. Its victory could bury any hope of reviving peace talks with Israel soon and stop Bush from achieving his goal of brokering a settlement that creates two states within the next few years.

"Peace is never dead, because people want peace," Bush said.

Bush stepped up U.S. involvement in brokering Palestinian-Israeli accords after Abbas became president last year and sought peace talks with Israel.

With Hamas in power, Bush could revert to the hands-off style that marked his first term, when he believed then-Palestinian President Yasser Arafat was an obstacle to peace.

UNITED FRONT

The United States is perceived by many in the Arab world as pro-Israel and has often been at odds with its Western allies for taking a tougher line toward Palestinian militant groups.

But major mediating powers delivered a unified message to Hamas that it should choose peace with Israel.

"We reaffirmed the view that ... you can't have one foot in terror and the other in politics," U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice told Reuters after a telephone call between top diplomats from the so-called Quartet -- Russia, the United Nations, the European Union and the United States.

In a statement, the mediators demanded Hamas, which has launched suicide bombings against Israel, renounce violence, accept the Jewish state's right to exist, and disarm.

The major powers did not back up their demands with any threats, such as cutting back aid.

But Rice warned that Hamas will receive no assistance from a Bush administration that has given directly to the Palestinian Authority since Arafat's death.

Hamas is unlikely to overturn its anti-Israel ideology quickly. But it could soften its stance if Western countries cut aid to a government that needs foreign funds to provide basic services for its electorate, political analysts said.

"Everybody understands that the Palestinian people have humanitarian needs. It's a very poor population," Rice said, suggesting U.S. such aid would be funneled through non-governmental organizations.

"We are obviously not going to give aid to a terrorist organization," she added.

David Makovsky of the Washington Institute for Near East Policy said that although Bush pushed for elections, he had failed to bolster democratic institutions that could have helped Abbas' standing.

He doubted the Palestinian leader, who is expected to ask Hamas to form a government, could stay in power long.

Hamas Routs Ruling Faction, Casting Pall On Peace Process (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger

RAMALLAH, West Bank, Jan. 26 — The radical Islamic party Hamas scored an overwhelming victory in Wednesday's Palestinian legislative elections, taking 76 out of 132 seats, deposing the former governing Fatah party, which won only 43 seats.

The results, announced Thursday night, which give Hamas the right to form the next government, were likened by Palestinians to an earthquake or a tsunami. They ended more than 40 years of domination by Fatah, the political faction built by Yasir Arafat, which along with the Palestinian Authority was widely viewed by Palestinians as corrupt and ineffective.

The shocking outcome put Hamas, considered a terrorist group by Israel, the United States and the European Union, in charge of the Palestinian political future, and put at least a temporary halt to efforts to restart peace talks. The balloting also made a mockery of the voter surveys released Wednesday night that indicated that Fatah would have the most seats and could retain control of the legislature and the cabinet.

In a televised speech on Thursday night, the Palestinian president, Mahmoud Abbas, said he remained committed to negotiations with Israel. Mr. Abbas, who heads Fatah, but whose official status was not affected by the vote, suggested that future talks would be conducted through the Palestine Liberation Organization, which could bypass a Hamas-led government.

"I am committed to implementing the program on which you elected me a year ago," he said. "It is a program based on negotiations and peaceful settlement with Israel."

But Ehud Olmert, the acting prime minister of Israel, issued a statement saying that talks were not possible now. "The state of Israel will not negotiate with a Palestinian administration if even part of it is an armed terrorist organization calling for the destruction of the state of Israel," he said after an evening cabinet discussion of the election results.

Even before the results were announced, the Fatah prime minister, Ahmed Qurei, who had warned Mr. Abbas against holding these elections, resigned, and cheering Hamas supporters raised their green flag over the parliament building. They celebrated throughout Gaza and the West Bank, holding victory marches in major cities. In Nablus, they hung enormous green banners on public buildings, while members of the group's military arm, the Qassam brigades, marched in uniforms with weapons, but did not wear their customary masks.

In Ramallah, Ali Abu Shusha, 31, with a bright green Hamas banner on his taxi, exulted in the victory. "Hamas was created by the people and belongs to the people," he said. "I want Hamas to run the government — it has clean hands, puts the poor before the rich and will resist the occupier."

In Gaza City, however, Kamilia Barghouti, 26, a waitress, said she was in shock. "I'm worried about the way this victory will affect how I can dress in public, and even if it will affect where I can work," she said.

The victory of Hamas represents an enormous test for the Palestinians, for the Western nations who pressed for this election and who provide millions of dollars in aid to the Palestinians and for the Arab world, which is likely to be shaken by the victory of a militant Islamic party in the symbolic heart of the Muslim world.

But the results, seen more as a repudiation of Fatah than a declaration of war against Israel, will be a test for Hamas, which had seemed to want a more gradual entry into politics. The leader of Hamas, Mahmoud Zahar, said proudly in Gaza, "We are going to change every aspect, as regards the economy, industry, agriculture, as regards social aid, health, administration, education." But it will not be an easy transformation, and it will provoke political resistance from a largely secular society.

While Hamas politicians said they would invite other parties, including Fatah, to join them in a government of national unity, key Fatah members like Jibril Rajoub and Mahmoud Dahlan made it clear that Fatah should not take part in a government dominated by Hamas. They argued that doing so would help Hamas by providing cover for the group as it struggles with the reality of governing. Fatah, they suggested, should go into opposition and let Hamas make its own mistakes and deal as best it can with the facts of Palestinian life and the Israeli occupation. The Fatah Central Committee voted Thursday night not to join a Hamas-led government.

But it is also possible that some Fatah members with good relations with Hamas, like the Gazan legislator Ziad Abu Amr, who ran as an independent with Hamas support, and a former minister of national economy, Mazen Sinokrot, will agree to join Hamas in a cabinet that probably will be led by a non-Hamas prime minister.

"My advice to Abu Mazen and to Hamas is to think of serious power-sharing," Mr. Amr said, referring to Mr. Abbas. "A partnership between Fatah and Hamas is necessary," he said. "Hamas is going to be put to the test of being a practitioner and not simply an opposition. Politics will have to be taken into account at the expense of ideology."

While Mr. Abbas won praise for pressing ahead with these elections, the result is not what he wanted and is bound to weaken his position. He gambled, but with a smashing Hamas victory he is perceived to have lost and to bear some responsibility for failing to reform Fatah and the Palestinian Authority. Mr. Abbas has said that if he cannot carry out his policies, which include negotiations with Israel, he will quit.

Israelis warned the world not to give in to wishful thinking and presume that Hamas will suddenly alter its goals. Israel and the world did not negotiate with Mr. Arafat and the Palestine Liberation Organization until it agreed to recognize the state of Israel in the late 1980's and disavow terrorism. Israeli politicians suggested that the process would have to begin all over again with Hamas.

"For Israelis, this is the definitive end of the illusion of a comprehensive peace," said Yossi Klein Halevi, a senior fellow at the Shalem Center, a policy research organization in Jerusalem. "There is no more credible hope of Palestinian moderation. For Israelis, it will only confirm what the last five years of terror have taught them: that the war is not about settlements, but about Israel's right to exist."

The Palestinian Authority as a serious negotiating partner no longer exists for Israel, Mr. Halevi said. "Now the era of the pretend peace process is also over," he said, and Israel will continue to act unilaterally to set its own borders, build the separation barrier between itself and the Palestinians and, in time, continue the process of unilateral withdrawal from more West Bank settlements — so long as it can ensure that a Hamas-dominated Palestinian Authority will not use that territory to launch rocket or other attacks on Israel.

"There is now a broad consensus, that Israel will go ahead and build our borders to preserve Israel as a democratic Jewish state," said Ami Ayalon, a former director of Shin Bet now running for a seat with the Labor Party.

The Hamas victory brings the group's support for armed attacks on Israel to the fore. Hamas said it entered politics "to protect the resistance" to Israeli occupation of Muslim land, so it is unlikely to heed Western appeals to disarm and recognize Israel, which Hamas in its charter promised to destroy.

The most that successful Hamas candidates like Ahmad Mubarak would say Thursday is that if Israel pulled back to its 1967 boundaries, Hamas would consider "a long-term truce."

Fadel Saleh, a Hamas politician from Ramallah, said that Hamas would concentrate "on restoring our Palestinian home and rebuilding Palestinian society," leaving international relations to Mr. Abbas and the Palestine Liberation Organization, which does not include Hamas. But, he said, "we want to remake the P.L.O. too based on this vote," he said. "Hamas wants cooperation with all Palestinian parties and a national agreement on policy."

The death of Mr. Arafat took the lid off seething resentments of Fatah and the men Mr. Arafat brought back to the Palestinian territories from exile after the 1993 Oslo accords with Israel. Those accords set up the Palestinian Authority, and in the 10 years since the last legislative elections, in which Hamas refused to participate, one-party rule proved to be as corrupting among Palestinians as anywhere else.

"Corrupt authorities who have been in power for a long time are usually thrown out in free elections," said Daoud Kuttab, a Palestinian analyst who teaches at Jerusalem's Al Quds University. "After 40 years, it's almost natural. I hoped Fatah would get away with it, but didn't. That the opposition came from a radical Islamic group is unfortunate, but there was no other serious opposition."

Mr. Kuttab said that those who had preached democracy, from the Bush administration to the Israeli right, would have to decide if their values trumped their interests. "If Hamas respects the rules of the democratic game, we have to let the winners win," he said. "But now Hamas will have to face reality, and part of reality means dealing with Israel."

But even this process could take many months or years, he said, and the potential pitfalls were underscored Thursday when Palestinian security officials said a 9-year-old Palestinian girl was killed by Israeli gunfire near the southern Gaza town of Khan Yunis, Agence France-Presse reported. The Israeli military said soldiers fired at a "suspicious figure" who was near Gaza's perimeter fence in the area. The military said it had no information that a young girl was hit, but were checking the report.

Hamas is not likely to move against the security forces, at least for now. They are made up almost entirely of Fatah loyalists, and voted overwhelmingly for Fatah. Any Hamas effort to try to take over the security forces would almost certainly lead to clashes.

Hisham Ahmed, a political scientist at Birzeit University who has written books about Hamas, called the vote "an historic moment in every sense," but he emphasized that "these results don't reflect the real size of Fatah and Hamas in the society," because they are distorted by anger at Fatah, preoccupation with internal issues and a complicated voting system.

If Mr. Abbas and the world handle the situation intelligently, Mr. Ahmed said, "it could mark the beginning of the end of Hamas as an ideologically pure force and a beginning of a reformed Fatah." But if it is handled badly, he said, "the radicalization of Palestinian society will continue."

According to the results, the Hamas list won 30 of 66 seats at the national level and 46 of 66 seats in constituencies. It did especially well in Gaza, but polled well throughout the West Bank, too. Fatah won 27 seats on the national level and only 16 in the constituencies. The leftist Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine won three seats while another leftist list, Badil, won two seats. The Independent Palestine list, led by the presidential election runner-up, Mustafa Barghouti, won two seats, as did the Third Way list of the departing finance minister, Salam Fayyad and Hanan Ashrawi. Four other independents won in constituencies, including Mr. Amr. Among the Fatah casualties was Mr. Rajoub.

Bush Defends His Goal Of Spreading Democracy To The Mideast (NYT)

By Steven R. Weisman

WASHINGTON, Jan. 26 — The sweeping victory of Hamas in the Palestinian elections threw President Bush and his aides on the defensive on Thursday, complicating the administration's policy of trying to promote democracy as an antidote to the spread of terrorism.

Reacting uneasily to the Hamas triumph, Mr. Bush said the results spoke to the failures of President Mahmoud Abbas and the "old guard" of his Fatah faction to root out corruption and mismanagement, not to any flaws in the administration's policy of advocating democracy.

"There was a peaceful process as people went to the polls, and that's positive," Mr. Bush said. "But what's also positive is that it's a wake-up call to the leadership. Obviously people were not happy with the status quo. The people are demanding honest government. The people want services."

But without criticizing the Palestinian people for choosing leaders who advocate the destruction of Israel, a tenet at the very core of Hamas's creed, he said that the United States would never tolerate such a policy. In the same fashion, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice noted that Palestinians want a negotiated peace settlement with Israel, according to opinion polls, but she repeated that this goal remained possible only if Hamas renounced its violent ways.

Mr. Bush joined a chorus of world leaders — including the so-called quartet of principal parties in the moribund peace process — in calling on Hamas to renounce terrorism, disarm its militias and recognize the legitimacy of Israel now that it has won the elections. But his tone was less confrontational than invitational — in effect, inviting Hamas to embrace reconciliation.

For now, Mr. Bush called on President Abbas to stay in office and steer the Palestinian government on a moderate course.

The Hamas victory was the fifth case recently of militants' winning significant gains through elections. They included the Muslim Brotherhood in Egypt, Hezbollah in Lebanon, a radical president in Iran, and Shiites backed by militias in Iraq.

As these elections unfolded, there has been increasing criticism in some quarters — notably among the self-described "realists" in foreign policy, many of them veterans of past Republican administrations — that President Bush has naively pushed for democracy in countries without the civil society components to support it.

"The Hamas victory is a disillusioning result showing that democracy and American interests don't always coincide," said Nikolas K. Gvosdev, a Russia expert who is editor of The National Interest, a publication that echoes with debate about this subject.

"Given the weakness of Palestinian society, people should not have been surprised that this was the outcome," Mr. Gvosdev added.

Other critics, too, including some Arab leaders, say that the United States failed to do its part to shore up Mr. Abbas by wringing more concessions from Israel and doing more to revitalize the economy in the West Bank and Gaza.

A senior State Department official said recently that the Bush administration, five years ago, inherited what he called the old model: that economic growth, the development of a middle class and the spread of education needed to come before democracy could take hold in troubled countries.

"But that's a story that we can no longer accept," he said, speaking on condition of anonymity because of rules prohibiting him from publicly explaining administration policy. "First of all you're not getting economic growth in a lot of places. We now understand that getting greater political openness and democracy in the Arab world is essential to our security."

The problem faced by the administration on Thursday was how to coax Hamas into the mainstream.

The West has more tools than mere diplomatic pressure to influence Hamas and the Palestinian Authority. The authority, described by many as nearly bankrupt, has begun tapping its trust funds to pay daily expenses and is running a deficit that Israel calculates at more than $700 million a year.

Europe and the United States provide most of the $1 billion in foreign assistance that goes to the Palestinians. But some of this money has already been cut back in protest of the Palestinian leadership's raising salaries and welfare benefits, which make up a major part of the Palestinian economy.

American and European officials said they could not imagine outside aid continuing if there is a Hamas-led government that has not renounced violence or Hamas's commitment to destroying Israel.

"What Hamas faces is not only a political but an existential dilemma," said Terje Roed-Larsen, the former United Nations envoy in the Middle East, in an interview. "They have built their identity on opposing elections and the institutions of the Palestinian Authority. Now they're the masters of the institutions they have been against."

Diplomats involved in the Middle East peace process known as the road map, the document that calls for reciprocal steps between Israelis and Palestinians toward creation of a Palestinian state, say that any immediate chances of reviving the Israeli-Palestinian dialogue are daunting if not impossible.

The immediate question before the administration is not whether negotiations can be revived but whether Israel can be encouraged to carry out more unilateral withdrawals from the West Bank.

As for dealing with Hamas, the Europeans are considered likely to see the problem differently, many diplomats say. Regarding both Hamas and Hezbollah, the Europeans have called for the West to use the template of Sinn Fein, the political wing of the Irish Republican Army, when dealing with them.

In other words, they say, talking to Hamas may help coax it toward eventual partnership in a peace negotiation. The problem, many diplomats and experts say, is that no one even pretends that there are truly separate wings of Hamas. Its armed forces and its political leaders are married to each other inextricably.

Hamas Voters Fed Up With Fatah Election More About Corruption Than Terrorism, Some Indicate (USAT)

By Matthew Gutman

RAMALLAH, West Bank — The U.S. government views Hamas as a terrorist organization. Fatem Nimr, a 58-year old Palestinian homemaker, sees it as a symbol of hope.

"Hamas will educate our children," she said as she stopped by a sweet shop Thursday, a day after Hamas' sweeping victory in Palestinian elections. "They will bring us religion. They will feed the poor."

Hamas' victory in Palestinian elections seemed less an endorsement of terrorism than a vote for an organization that supporters hope will improve government, according to some voters and election analysts. Hamas supporters say they were fed up with the ruling Fatah Party, which many accused of corruption and general incompetence.

Palestinian gross domestic product declined by 35% between 2000 and 2005, during the Palestinian uprising known as the intifada, according to the World Bank.

"Fatah has done nothing but make us poor," Nimr said.

With 95% of the vote counted, Hamas won 76 seats to Fatah's 43 in the 132-member parliament, according to Hanna Nasser, a Palestinian election official.

"Voters wanted to punish Fatah for its dismal performance," said Khalil Shikaki, director of the Center for Policy and Survey Research in Ramallah. "People were fed up with its corruption and incompetence."

In Ramallah, the seat of Palestinian government and one of the most secular West Bank towns, there was little celebration Thursday. A few Hamas activists muscled battered sedans through traffic, blasting Hamas jingles on their car stereos. In the town's bustling vegetable market, several vendors planted Hamas' green flag with the "God is Great" insignia among mounds of tangerines and pomegranates.

Hamas' religious overtones appealed to some voters who believe Hamas leaders will be less susceptible to corruption.

"You can't have a monopoly of power forever," said Hamza Awadallah, 22. He said the time had come for "unbelievers" to leave government. "Hamas officials pray, they fast, they give alms," he said. "Finally, Palestinians got smart, and voted for religious, the true, law."

Awadallah said he condemned suicide bombings.

"I think negotiation is a better way to get back our land," he said.

Even so, Hamas' militancy is credited with pushing Israel to withdraw settlers and troops from Gaza and parts of the West Bank in September. "People … got the impression that violence pays while diplomacy doesn't," Shikaki said.

Israel says Hamas is responsible for launching 425 terrorist attacks since Sept. 2000, killing 377 Israelis and injuring more than 2,000.

Founded in 1987 in Gaza, Hamas — the Arabic acronym for Islamic Resistance Movement — focused on two main tasks: eliminating the state of Israel and filling the social and educational needs of impoverished Palestinians.

In 1989, Hamas took up arms, killing several Israelis in shooting attacks. Israel responded by banning the group. By 1994, the group had graduated to bombing attacks.

The conflict escalated after the start of the Palestinian uprising in September 2000. Hamas' founder, Sheik Ahmed Yassin, was assassinated by Israel in March 2004.

Hamas made its first foray into Palestinian politics when it competed for a handful of offices in the December 2004 municipal elections.

DOJ_NMG_0012494

In Thursday's vote, Hamas capitalized on the reputation it earned for incorruptibility and good governance in the towns and cities it controlled after winning municipal elections last year. Hamas has also run a network of hospitals and social servic es for Palestinians.

Even some Fatah supporters admit their party governed poorly in recent years.

"We all knew Hamas is going to win," said Taha Morar, 24, who wore a checkered scarf made famous by Fatah's founder Yasser Arafat. "They do things for the people and lately Fatah didn't."

Omar Fattah, 55, who owns a downtown sporting goods store said, "I don't support Hamas, but we have to respect our own democracy."

Bush Says Hamas Must Renounce Violence (LAT)

By Edwin Chen

The Los Angeles Times, January 27, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush said today that the radical movement Hamas, whose members won a sweeping victory in this week's Palestinian parliamentary elections, must renounce violence it they are to become partners in the Middle East peace process.

In a further admonition directed at Hamas, the president declared that the United States will not deal with Palestinian leaders who continue to seek the destruction of Israel.

Bush made his remarks at a surprise morning press conference at the White House that lasted three-quarters of an hour, during which he again defended the post-9/11 domestic spying program and his refusal to disclose details of any contacts between senior White house staff and discredited lobbyist Jack Abramoff, who pleaded guilty to corruption charges this month.

The strong showing by Hamas promises to significantly transform Palestinian politics by giving the militant Islamic movement a formal place in the government structural since the Palestinian authority was formed in 1994.

That election victory, however, put Bush in a difficult spot because he has made his campaign to spread democracy around the world a cornerstone of his presidency. Now, in the face of a victory by a group whose policies he abhors, Bush is having to impose conditions before fully accepting the results of that show of democracy.

"Peace is never dead," he said when asked about Hamas' "big victory."

"On the other hand, I don't see how you can be a partner in peace if you advocate the destruction of a country as a part of your platform," Bush added. "And I know you can't be a partner in peace if you have a , if your party has got an armed wing." The president was able to buy some time, however, since the election has just taken place and now a new government must be formed.

"We will watch very carefully about the formation of the government," Bush said. "But the government hasn't formed yet. They're beginning to talk about how to form the government." In the meantime, the president urged Palestinian Leader Mahmoud Abbas to remain in office.

"We'd like him to stay in power. I mean, we'd like him to stay in office. He is in power' we'd like him to stay in office," Bush said.

"And so it was an interesting day yesterday...as we're watching liberty begin to spread across the Middle East."

Europeans Insist Hamas Must Disavow Terrorism (NYT)

By Alan Cowell

LONDON, Jan. 26 — European leaders, whose countries are major financial donors to the Palestinian Authority, on Thursday registered disquiet verging on hostility toward the Hamas triumph in the Palestinian elections.

Yet, confronted with a Middle East that seems once again to have redrawn its political contours, they held back from publicly threatening to cut off the hundreds of millions of dollars they provide each year to Palestinian institutions.

Furthermore, none of them criticized the Palestinian democracy that appeared to yield the opposite of the moderation they had sought to nurture.

"It is obvious that the European Union would never countenance funding a regime that continued an armed fight against Israel," said Ignasi Guardans, a Spanish member of the European Parliament. "But we cannot push for democracy and then deny the result of free and fair elections."

Like the United States, the European Union regards Hamas as a terrorist organization and insists that it cannot work with an institution that supports the violent overthrow of Israel. Such a stance would contradict Europe's commitment to a two-state solution, with Israel and a Palestinian state living side by side.

Unless Hamas changes its position, European leaders said Thursday, they see no prospect of reviving the stalled peace efforts for which Europe has been a sponsor.

"It is a very, very, very bad result," said Prime Minister Silvio Berlusconi of Italy, adding that peace efforts had "been put back until who knows when."

Equally, though, European leaders shied away from threatening punitive action that would leave them with no influence among Palestinians and might undermine Mahmoud Abbas, the moderate president of the Palestinian Authority, whose party, Fatah apparently lost the legislative elections on Wednesday.

The first practical test for European diplomacy is expected within the next few days.

Chancellor Angela Merkel of Germany is to visit Palestinian areas on Monday to meet Mr. Abbas, and a spokesman for her government said she had no plan to change her trip. European foreign ministers are to meet the same day to weigh their response to the outcome of the vote.

The German foreign minister, Frank-Walter Steinmeier, said his country should have no immediate contact with Hamas. "Those taking part in government must foreswear violence" and recognize Israel's right to exist, he told Bavarian Radio. "This appears to be still a long way off for Hamas."

Both Prime Minister Tony Blair and Foreign Secretary Jack Straw said Britain would not deal with those who supported or practiced terrorism.

The conditions for negotiating with any Palestinian government, he said, are: "First, the renunciation of violence, to accept to move forward according to the peace goals that have been set. Secondly, the recognition of the state of Israel and the recognition of international accords, notably the Oslo accords."

The European Union's foreign policy chief, Javier Solana, said the elections "may confront us with an entirely new situation," which foreign ministers would discuss on Monday. Last weekend Mr. Solana said it would be "very difficult" for the union to continue financial support to the Palestinian Authority if Hamas won.

European aid to Palestinian institutions totaled around $330 million last year, not counting contributions from individual European countries. From 1994 to the end of 2002, according to European Union figures, the union contributed $1.2 billion in grants and loans, in addition to about $600 million donated to the United Nations agency that supports Palestinian refugees.

Kofi Annan, the secretary general of the United Nations, said Thursday in Davos, Switzerland, that any group wishing to take part in a democracy should lay down its weapons.

Is Democracy Empowering Islamists? (CSM)

By Howard Lafranchi

The Christian Science Monitor, January 27, 2006

WASHINGTON - Palestinian voters availed themselves of the time- honored democratic right to "throw the bums out" in their first legislative elections in a decade Wednesday - exactly the kind of action implicit in President Bush's push for democracy in the Middle East.

But by snubbing the Fatah Party of US-supported Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas in favor of the radical Islamist group Hamas, Palestinians also put the Bush administration in a difficult spot.

The US might now seem hypocritical to many Arabs - encouraging democracy in the Middle East, while rejecting the choices that result from its exercise. At the same time, questions mount over whether Mr. Bush's campaign for democracy is encouraging the empowerment of Islamist militants across the region.

"This [election result] is really going to scare ... other governments in the region, and the Egyptians in particular are going to tell the US, 'We told you so,' " says Arthur Hughes, a former deputy assistant secretary of State for Near East affairs. "They'll see this as more evidence of what comes from our pressure to open up their societies, but they won't acknowledge that their hard-line tactics are what are leading to the growth" of Islamic extremism.

The Palestinian results, which give an organization on the US list of terrorist groups a majority in the 132-seat Legislative Council, are part of a trend across Muslim countries, experts say.

"The victory of Hamas cannot be seen in isolation from the major accomplishments of Islamists across Muslim lands," says Fawaz Gerges, a Middle East expert at Sarah Lawrence College in Bronxville, N.Y. "There's a pattern here of Arab and Muslim electorates fed up with the secular governments that have failed to deliver the goods, both in economic terms and protecting the security of the homeland."

The "irony," Mr. Gerges adds, is that the Bush administration's championing of the Middle East's democratization has allowed the radical Islamists to "flex their political muscle" - from Egypt and Saudi Arabia to Lebanon and Iraq.

Some historians argue that radical groups' entry into mainstream politics has led them to moderate their stances: The Irish Republican Army or former guerrilla groups in Central America are often cited as examples.

Others, though, say this moderating process, if undertaken at all, takes time - and does not happen in a vacuum. The US, they add, is going to have to decide how to deal with the Palestinians and the Middle East peace process in a period of deep uncertainty for the region.

Bush reiterated this week that the US will not work with Hamas unless it dramatically modifies its behavior and removes from its platform a call for the destruction of the state of Israel. At a news conference Thursday, he said a political force like Hamas, one with an armed wing that advocates violence against Israel, "is a party with which we will not deal."

Soon after the election results became known, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice called Palestinian President Abbas and, according to Palestinian sources, praised Palestinian democracy and pledged US support for Mr. Abbas and his policies.

Few analysts expect the Bush administration to make bold moves with so much on the ground in flux. Not only are the Palestinians embarking on the hard task of forming a government from outside the president's political circle, but Israel - still digesting the departure of Ariel Sharon from the leadership scene - is heading for elections on March 18.

The US could simply suspend contact with - and financial assistance to - the Palestinian Authority over the rise of Hamas to the government. But "the stakes are too high on the ground to simply walk away," says Haim Malka, a Middle East expert at the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington. The alternative, he says, is for the US to work exclusively with the office of the president - provided Abbas remains in office.

Bush "left the window open" for the US to work with Hamas - provided Hamas renounces violence and reverses its stance toward Israel, Mr. Malka notes. But that kind of fundamental shift takes time, he says - and events are not apt to wait.

Some analysts worry that turmoil among Palestinians - and a radical government at the helm - will prompt Israel to shift toward more radical policies itself. A unilateral decision to include blocks of West Bank settlements inside its final borders is the kind of action Israel might take in response to Hamas's rise but which would inflame the situation, experts say. Certain actions "would virtually rule out ... arriving at a two-state solution, and if that disappears you just have conflict without end," says Mr. Hughes, now a scholar at the Middle East Institute here.

At Thursday's press conference, Bush said the election is a "wake-up call" to the old guard Palestinian leadership. Others say it also blew a whistle in Washington. "We're seeing that, for now, the only alternative to secular regimes in the Middle East are the Islamists," says Malka. "They're the only ones who have legitimacy among the people."

Joyful Arabs Voice Concern At How Hamas Will Swim In The Mainstream (NYT)

By Hassan M. Fattah

The New York Times, January 27, 2006

DUBAI, United Arab Emirates, Jan. 26 — Hamas's overwhelming victory in the Palestinian elections on Thursday was met with a mixture of jubilation and consternation in much of the Arab world. For some, it raised the concern that, in winning, the Islamic group will almost certainly have to lose something.

DOJ_NMG_0012497

The mixed reaction was evident at the Husseini refugee camp in Amman, Jordan, a stronghold of support for Hamas. News of the early returns sparked instant celebrations, but it also brought expressions of concern that in governing, Hamas may be forced to make concessions in its drive to fight Israel.

Eyad al-Dibeiy, 18, who sells shoes in a small stall in the camp, was clearly elated by the result.

"A Hamas victory gives the government wider representation," he said. "Hamas is an Islamic movement, and it is only natural for Islamists to gain strength. Their victory will give them more leverage, power and freedom."

Elsewhere in the camp, the Islamic Action Front hailed Hamas's victory as "a major breakthrough and swing towards achieving the Palestinian rights."

"We have to differentiate between a march to peace and the capitulation that began with the Oslo Accords in 1993," said Sheik Hamzah Mansour, secretary general of the front. "The results support the argument for resistance and forces of resistance in the Arab world that stands against capitulation."

Yet many at the camp sought to temper expectations, warning that the hard work was still ahead.

"Having Hamas in power and assuming such a position is bad," said Ayesh Hussein, 35, as he discussed the results with the store's owners. "We're accustomed to Hamas being fighters, a party that pressures Israel. But now it will join politics and will become politicized."

Muhammad Abdul Ghani, an employee at a dry cleaning shop nodded in agreement. "This is only the beginning of concessions on the part of the Palestinians," he said in dismay. Still, he said, there was some promise in the Hamas victory of cleaning up the endemic corruption in Palestinian institutions.

Arab and Muslim leaders attending the World Economic Summit in Davos, Switzerland, issued a statement urging other nations to respect the Hamas victory and give the group time to prove whether it is ready to work for peace.

"It is an example of when people are frustrated and have no hope for the future they tend to go for the extreme end of the spectrum," Queen Rania of Jordan said in the statement. Although the result was a vote for Hamas, she said, it was also a vote against the conditions in which Palestinians have been forced to live under Israeli occupation.

In Lebanon, where Hezbollah has gone through many of the same changes Hamas is likely to face, many saw the result as a direct challenge to the United States as well as to Israel.

"Because Hamas and Hezbollah are going through such similar experiences, as armed groups that are democratizing, if the U.S. wants to pressure Hamas further to disarm, it's going to make their democracy agenda look very weak and lacking credibility," Amal Saad-Ghorayeb, a political science professor at the Lebanese American University, said by telephone. "These people voted overwhelmingly for Hamas, and did so partly as a referendum for resistance, saying that resistance will pay greater dividends than negotiation."

She said that the group's biggest backers, Iran and Syria, may also stand to win some political capital simply by having backed the winners.

For some, the win raised the possibility that a new age of Islamist politics could be dawning, especially if Western governments eventually engage Hamas.

"Many in the Arab world were expecting something like this, but nobody expected it to this degree," said Hussein Shobok, a columnist with the Arabic-language daily Sharq al-Awsat. "This is certainly going to encourage other Islamists elsewhere to do the same."

Mohammad al-Ameer, the political editor at the Saudi Arabian daily Al Riyadh, said, "Islamists are present in our societies because they are conservative, but more importantly because they are tired of the nationalism and the military men who have ruled for so long."

"Arab societies have become weary of the nationalism and the sloganeering and are therefore embracing the Islamist platform as a response," he said. "The West must therefore see the Islamists as people they can deal with in order to deal with our societies."

U.S. Won't Deal With Hamas (WT)

By Bill Sammon

DOJ_NMG_0012498

The Washington Times, January 27, 2006

President Bush yesterday said the U.S. will not deal with Hamas, the terrorist group that won Wednesday's Palestinian elections, unless it renounces its goal of destroying Israel.

"A political party that articulates the destruction of Israel as part of its platform is a party with which we will not deal," the president said in a press conference. "People must renounce that part of their platform."

He added, "You can't be a partner in peace if your party has got an armed wing."

The stunning victory by Hamas prompted the resignation of Palestinian Prime Minister Ahmed Qureia, a member of the Fatah party. Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, also a Fatah member, was asked by Mr. Bush to remain in office.

"We would hope he would stay in office and work to move the process forward," the president told reporters in the James S. Brady press briefing room.

Mr. Abbas said he would not be deterred from implementing a U.S.-sponsored peace plan, known as the "road map," which entails negotiations with Israel.

"I remain committed to implement the platform on which you voted for me one year ago," he told Palestinians in a televised address. "The basis of this platform is negotiations and a peace settlement with Israel."

The victory by Hamas, which won 76 of 132 seats in the parliament, was a setback to Mr. Bush's stated goal of brokering a comprehensive peace agreement between Palestinians and Israelis in his second term. Nonetheless, the president was philosophical about the election results, suggesting that voters were more interested in getting rid of the existing corruption than embracing terrorism.

"It's a wake-up call to the leadership," Mr. Bush said. "People were not happy with the status quo. The people are demanding honest government. The people want services. They want to be able to raise their children in an environment in which they can get a decent education and they can find health care."

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice issued a stern warning to Hamas, which has carried out scores of suicide bombings against Israelis.

"You cannot have one foot in politics and another in terror," Miss Rice said at the World Economic Forum in Davos, Switzerland. "Our position on Hamas has therefore not changed."

She added, "Palestinian people have apparently voted for change, but we believe their aspirations for peace and a peaceful life remain unchanged."

Last year, Miss Rice told The Washington Times in an interview that participation in the political process could force terrorist groups like Hamas to moderate their policies.

"When people start getting elected and have to start worrying about constituencies and ... not about whether their fire-breathing rhetoric against Israel is being heard, but about whether or not that person's child down the street is able to go to a good school or that road has been fixed ... then things start to change," she said.

Yesterday, Mr. Bush sounded similarly optimistic.

"Peace is never dead, because people want peace," he said. "The best hope for peace in the Middle East is two democracies living side by side."

The Hamas win led Rep. Vito J. Fossella, New York Republican, to say he will introduce legislation to end all U.S. aid to a Palestinian Authority led by Hamas. Last year, the U.S. sent $275 million to Gaza and the West Bank, including $50 million directly to the Palestinian Authority.

"Not one dollar of taxpayer money should go to this terrorist organization," Mr. Fossella said of Hamas. "The Palestinian people have every right to elect a terrorist organization to control their government -- and the United States has every right to eliminate any financial assistance for it."

Ehud Olmert, Israel's acting prime minister, vowed not to work with Hamas.

"Should a government be established in the Palestinian Authority with Hamas leading or participating, the Palestinian Authority will become a sponsor of terror," he said in an emergency meeting of the security Cabinet in Jerusalem.

"The world and Israel will ignore it, and it will become irrelevant," he said.

Palestinians Choose Avowed Enemy Of Israel (USAT)

By Matthew Gutman

USA Today, January 27, 2006

RAMALLAH, West Bank — Hamas, the militant Islamic group that the U.S. State Department has designated a terrorist organization, won an overwhelming majority in Palestinian parliamentary elections. The election results announced Thursday put the future of the Middle East peace process in question.

The election shocker ended a 40-year political reign by Fatah, the party of the late Yasser Arafat. It also heightens the danger of civil war between Palestinian factions, and such violence could spread to Israel, said Edward Abington, a former U.S. diplomat in the region who now advises the Palestinian Authority.

"This is not a good result for Israel, and it's a huge setback for the United States," Abington said.

Hanna Nasser, a Palestinian elections official, said Thursday that with 95% of the vote counted, Hamas had won 76 seats in the 132-member parliament, compared with 43 for Fatah.

President Bush and other world leaders called for Hamas to renounce violence and its long-held rejection of Israel's existence.

"If your platform is the destruction of Israel, it means you're not a partner in peace, and we're interested in peace," Bush said. He reiterated his view that the United States will not deal with Palestinian leaders who do not recognize Israel's right to exist.

Members of Congress signaled that U.S. financial aid for Palestinians — about $350 million per year — might cease. "If Hamas is now the ruling power, I do not foresee any U.S. funds going to the Palestinian territories," said Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen, R-Fla., chairwoman of a House subcommittee on the Middle East.

Mahmoud Zahar, a top Hamas official, said the group would extend a year-old truce if Israel reciprocates. He said that if Israel doesn't agree, "I think we will have no option but to protect our people and our land."

Israeli leaders said there could be no relations with a group that has killed hundreds of Israelis in terrorist attacks and that seeks the destruction of Israel.

"Israel will continue to fight terrorism with a heavy hand, everywhere," said a statement from acting Prime Minister Ehud Olmert.

Some likened Hamas' election victory to the former domination of Afghanistan by the Islamic Taliban regime and al-Qaeda. "Today, Hamastan was formed," said Benjamin Netanyahu, leader of Israel's opposition Likud Party.

Hamas' win comes amid political uncertainty in Israel. Prime Minister Ariel Sharon had a stroke this month and is in a coma. Olmert has assumed Sharon's powers until elections March 28.

Hamas has an extensive network of charities and social services. Its candidates swept to wins in West Bank municipal elections last month.

Hamas' parliamentary campaign focused on ridding the Palestinian Authority of Fatah corruption and boosting living standards. Its platform made no mention of suicide bombers or the destruction of Israel, but the group's charter calls for Israel to be made an Islamic state for Palestinians.

On Thursday, Palestinian Authority Prime Minister Ahmed Qureia and his Cabinet resigned before final results were released. Hamas leader Khaled Mashal, based in Syria, asked Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas, Arafat's successor, to join a Hamas-led government. Under Palestinian law, the biggest party can shape the Cabinet.

Abbas, elected separately a year ago, remains president. He said Thursday that he is committed to peace talks but sidestepped questions about how closely he would work with Hamas.

In the West Bank, the Hamas victory prompted celebrations. Mazen Abdel Hadi, 29, a construction worker, showed off his green Hamas cap at a Ramallah sandwich shop.

"We finally elected a party that cares more for us than (for) the Israelis," he said. "Let America sever relations with us. We haven't benefited anyway."

Others were less joyful. "I am worried," said Ali Barakat, 28. "They want Islam," he said, referring to those who voted for Hamas, "but we need the outside world."

Hamas Victory Roils Middle East Peace Process (WSJ)

By Karby Leggett And Neil King Jr.

The Wall Street Journal, January 27, 2006

The surprisingly strong victory of militant group Hamas in Palestinian legislative elections leaves the Palestinian Authority in the hands of a radical Islamist leadership deemed terrorists by Israel, the U.S. and Europe, further complicating the already tortuous Middle East peace process.

How Hamas chooses to lead the Palestinians could reshape the Middle East political landscape in ways not seen since Israel began its occupation of the West Bank and Gaza in 1967. Hamas officials said they are committed to pursuing the government and economic reforms promised during the campaign -- pledges that helped secure their victory over the long-ruling Fatah movement, widely viewed as corrupt and inept. Other than confirming their refusal to acknowledge Israel's right to exist, they have yet to indicate the approach their government will take in foreign policy.

Yet, in an early sign of pragmatism, Mahmoud Zahar, a top Hamas official, said the group would extend its year-old truce -- agreed before Israel's withdrawal from Gaza -- if Israel reciprocates. "Don't be afraid," added another senior Hamas official, Ismail Hanyyeh, in an interview with the British Broadcasting Corp.

Israel, the U.S. and the European Union will have to decide how much support, if any, to offer a Palestinian government that has come to depend heavily on Western aid, but that will be led by a group they have always shunned. The early signs suggested a hard line.

Acting Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert yesterday convened his top security officials to discuss the results. Late in the day, his office issued a statement saying: "The State of Israel will not negotiate with a Palestinian administration if its members include an armed terrorist organization that calls for the destruction of the State of Israel. In any case, Israel will continue to fight terrorism with a heavy hand, everywhere."

The Hamas victory carries a particularly ironic sting for President Bush, who made Palestinian elections a cornerstone of plans to encourage democracy in the Middle East. In an interview with The Wall Street Journal the day of the elections, Mr. Bush reiterated that he wouldn't deal with Hamas as long as it espouses the destruction of Israel. Yet, while Mr. Bush and European leaders yesterday urged Hamas to renounce violence, they stopped short of withdrawing support for a Hamas-led government.

British Foreign Secretary Jack Straw said of the victory: "Hamas has a clear responsibility to understand that with democracy goes a rejection of violence."

Pressure on Hamas to embrace diplomacy came from Arab leaders, too. Ahmed Nazif, Egypt's prime minister, said Hamas would have to respect "the reality of what the world has set as the framework for peace in the Middle East." That framework encompasses prospective negotiations aimed at Palestinian recognition of Israel and the creation of a Palestinian state.

Acceptance of those goals would mark a profound change for a group formed in the 1980s with the stated aim of destroying Israel and replacing it with an Islamic state. Once a fringe organization, Hamas's popularity soared in the past decade as dissatisfaction with President Yasser Arafat and corrupt Fatah officials deepened. When Mr. Arafat died in November 2004, his successor, Mahmoud Abbas, called new elections. Hamas saw a chance to test its popularity -- and gain real political power.

It was a good bet. Hamas's election victory underscored the extent of dissatisfaction with Fatah -- a theme President Bush and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice emphasized in comments yesterday. "It's a wakeup call to the leadership," Mr. Bush said, referring to the Palestinian Authority. "Obviously people were not happy with the status quo." (See related article10.)

Despite exit polls Wednesday suggesting that Fatah would retain its majority, Hamas ended up with a strong legislative majority, securing 76 seats out of 132. Fatah finished second with 43 seats. The rest were taken by a handful of independent parties. About one million voters cast ballots, or nearly 78% of those eligible. Some isolated cases of violence and illegal campaign activity were reported, but voting was deemed free and fair by local and international observers, including former U.S. President Jimmy Carter.

News of Hamas's victory sparked frenzied celebrations among supporters in the West Bank and Gaza. Many took to the streets waving the green flags of Hamas and chanting slogans of support. In one instance, Hamas supporters tried to raise their flag over the legislative building in Ramallah. A Fatah supporter pulled it down, and it was trampled.

11 BUSH TRANSCRIPT

Read an edited transcript12 of the interview with President Bush.

Hamas leaders had expected a strong showing, but before the election, they tended to speak of assuming an opposition role in the new government. Allowing Fatah officials to retain overall control, they said, would allow Hamas to deliver on its pledge to reduce corruption and improve government services while not endangering the nearly $1 billion in annual aid the Palestinian Authority receives from foreign governments.

Without that money, the Palestinian Authority would be unable to pay its estimated 140,000 civil servants and would likely cease functioning within months. Nearly half of those civil servants are in the security forces, most of them with ties to Fatah and access to weapons -- a potentially explosive mix if relations between the two groups should sour.

"Hamas from the beginning feared winning too big," said Shalom Harari, an Israeli analyst and former intelligence official. "They made it clear that they wanted to use Fatah as their outside cover."

As the ruling party, the group still may choose to move cautiously, some observers said, tapping independent cabinet ministers with experience dealing effectively with Israel and the international community, according to observers. And Mr. Abbas, a Fatah member, will remain as president, the highest-profile position in the Palestinian government.

According to some Hamas members and other people familiar with the political situation, Hamas may consider appointing Salam Fayyad as prime minister. A former International Monetary Fund executive, Mr. Fayyad won a seat in the vote as a member of the Third Way party and until recently was finance minister. He earned a doctorate in the U.S. and is well-liked by Western leaders for his aggressive efforts to reform the government's opaque financial system.

As prime minister, Mr. Fayyad might also oversee the finance portfolio. Hamas could also strike a deal with Mohammad Dahlan, another veteran Fatah official once trained by the U.S. Central Intelligence Agency, to take the job of interior minister. That position is especially sensitive for Israel and the West because it handles all security issues for the Palestinian government -- including dealing with militants.

But regardless of who ends up in the Hamas-formed government, the U.S. and Europe, as well as Israel, will have problems working with a Hamas-led Palestinian Authority. The Bush administration has sketched out how Hamas must change to be seen as legitimate: renounce terror, accept Israel's right to exist, endorse an eventual two-state solution, and lay down its arms.

The EU, along with Russia and the United Nations, endorsed a similar list of demands last year. As sponsors of the now dormant "road map" peace plan, the so-called Quartet, which also includes the U.S., also stipulated that any future Palestinian cabinet not include any members of organizations that refuse to recognize Israel or renounce violence.

Hamas Victory Ushers In New Era (BSUN)

By John Murphy

The Baltimore Sun, January 27, 2006

RAMALLAH, West Bank -- The overwhelming victory in Palestinian elections by the radical Islamic group Hamas ushered in an era of uncertainty and anxiety Thursday, as Palestinians and Israelis wondered what kind of government to expect from an organization best known for suicide attacks, not its politics.

Hamas won 76 seats in the Palestinians' 132-seat parliament, an outright majority, ending decades of dominance by Fatah, which won 43 seats, according to preliminary results released Thursday night.

For many Palestinians, Hamas' landslide win in Wednesday's election promises an end to an era of Fatah corruption and inefficiency. But the party's victory also reduced hopes of restarting the peace process. Israel, along with the United States and European Union, considers Hamas a terrorist organization. The Hamas charter calls for the destruction of Israel.

Hamas leaders issued mixed messages Thursday about their intentions. One senior official, Mushir al-Masri of Gaza, said recognizing and negotiating with Israel are "not on our agenda."

Mahmoud Zahar, another senior official, said Hamas is willing to extend its year-old truce if Israel does not attack its members.

"If not, then I think we will have no option but to protect our people and our land," Zahar told Associated Press Television News.

Israel's acting prime minister, Ehud Olmert, said Israel will not negotiate with a Palestinian government that includes Hamas.

"Israel will not negotiate with a Palestinian administration if even part of it is an armed terrorist organization calling for the destruction of the state of Israel," he said in a statement after a three-hour emergency Cabinet meeting.

Defense Minister Shaul Mofaz said Israel would insist that Palestinian leader Mahmoud Abbas abide by his commitment to disarm militants.

"Israel needs to act judiciously and responsibly," Mofaz said.

Negotiations backed

Abbas reiterated his commitment to negotiations with Israel.

"I am committed to implementing the program on which you elected me a year ago," Abbas said in a televised speech. "It is a program based on negotiations and peaceful settlement with Israel."

Abbas proposed that negotiations with Israel be conducted by the Palestine Liberation Organization, a possible way for Israel to avoid direct contact with a Hamas-controlled government.

Another prominent Fatah member, Saeb Erekat, said his party has decided not to join a Hamas government.

"We will be a loyal opposition and rebuild the party," Erekat said.

Palestinians were stunned by the news of Hamas' victory. Exit polls released Wednesday night had indicated that Fatah had a narrow lead.

By midmorning Thursday, the Palestinian prime minister, Ahmed Qureia of Fatah, had announced that he and his Cabinet ministers had resigned, making way for a Hamas-led government.

There was a brief clash between Fatah loyalists and supporters of Hamas. The two sides began throwing stones at each other after Hamas members raised a green flag above the parliament building in the West Bank city.

Hamas will inherit a poorly managed government that is deeply in debt and facing a possible cutoff of financial aid from the United States and European Union.

Unease about change

"People wanted a change, and Hamas offered a change," Palestinian Hadil Budeiri said as she watched Hamas members parade in Ramallah. Like many Palestinians, she expressed unease about the kind of change that Hamas might bring.

"Things are unknown," she said, "It worries all of us."

Some Palestinians are concerned that Hamas might try to remake society according to a strict interpretation of Islam.

"We don't want the Palestinian people and cause to be isolated. We don't want a theocracy," independent lawmaker Hanan Ashrawi told wire services. "Hamas promises reform. Sure, they will do that. I would like to see reform. But what worries me is things like legislation on education, culture, social welfare, the ramifications for peace in the future."

Many voters said Hamas' victory was fueled more by anger with Fatah than by enthusiastic support for Hamas and Islam.

Whatever the reason, the victory marked a turning point in the organization's 30-year history and might prompt it to abandon its campaign of suicide bombings in favor of order and stability, some analysts said.

"Nobody will tolerate a situation where the Palestinian Authority becomes 'Hamastan,'" said Mordechai Kedar, an analyst at Bar-Ilan University's Begin-Sadat Center for Strategic Studies. "Although they would like to cover all the girls and close all the pubs, nobody will let them be the state during the day and terrorists at night."

Hamas has long advocated creating an Islamic state from the Jordan River to the Mediterranean in place of Israel. Some secular Palestinians have been concerned that Hamas' growing influence might lead to clashes with secular members of society.

But secular Palestinians who have worked with Hamas often admire the group's professionalism and dedication.

Hamas receives high marks from Janet Michael, a Christian who is the new mayor of Ramallah and who formed an alliance between the independent members of the city council and Hamas in December. They have cooperated without problems, she said.

"Working with Hamas is not bad," she said. "They are normal people. They are disciplined. They are hard workers and well organized."

"Most of the world is still thinking about Hamas like the Taliban," said Mahmoud Abdullah, Ramallah's deputy mayor. Its members may be fundamentalist Muslims, he said, but they are pragmatic and willing to compromise and allow for other points of view. "Hamas is more liberal than you think."

For many Israelis, Hamas' emergence as the dominant Palestinian political force confirmed their worst fears about Palestinian society and about the prospects for peaceful co-existence.

"Today, 'Hamastan' was formed," said Benjamin Netanyahu, leader of Israel's opposition Likud Party.

Gershon Baskin, co-director of the Israel-Palestine Center for Research and Information, said Hamas would not be worried if the United States cut off financial aid.

"The Hamas government of the Palestinian Authority will not be intimidated by U.S. and EU threats to stop financial support," he wrote in a report released Thursday. "Iran's millions of barrels of oil every day being pumped and sold all over the world will provide the Palestinian Authority with the ability to withstand any international boycott."

Hamas Sweeps Palestinian Elections, Complicating Peace Efforts In Mideast (WP)

By Scott Wilson

RAMALLAH, West Bank, Jan. 26 -- The radical Islamic movement Hamas won a large majority in the new Palestinian parliament, according to official election results announced Thursday, trouncing the governing Fatah party in a contest that could dramatically reshape the Palestinians' relations with Israel and the rest of the world.

Fatah, which has dominated the legislature since the previous elections a decade ago and the Palestinian cause for far longer, won 43 seats. A collection of nationalist, leftist and independent parties claimed the rest.

Prime Minister Ahmed Qureia, another Fatah leader, resigned his post along with his cabinet early Thursday, as reports of Hamas's victory began to circulate. Although the cabinet would have been required to step aside even if Fatah had retained its majority, Qureia acknowledged in submitting his resignation that Hamas had earned the right to form the next cabinet.

"This is the choice of the people," Qureia, a member of the party's discredited old guard who did not run for reelection, told reporters here. "It should be respected."

Abbas, on the other hand, will continue to serve the four-year presidential term he won in an election a year ago, shortly after the death of his predecessor, Yasser Arafat, the founder of Fatah. Abbas will maintain the broad power to create national policy and control the security services, though he needs parliamentary approval for his budget and legislative proposals. He will also shape peace policy with Israel as head of the Palestine Liberation Organization, which does not include Hamas.

The arrival of Hamas, formally known as the Islamic Resistance Movement, in the Palestinian Authority as a nearly equal partner will severely complicate Abbas's efforts to begin negotiations with Israel under the U.S.-backed peace plan known as the "road map." Hamas, which emerged in 1987 during the first Palestinian uprising as an offshoot of Egypt's Muslim Brotherhood, favors the creation of a Palestinian nation on land that now includes Israel rather than the road map's two-state solution.

The election results stunned U.S. and Israeli officials, who have repeatedly stated that they would not work with a Palestinian Authority that included Hamas, which both countries and the European Union have designated as a terrorist organization. In Washington, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said that a party could not "have one foot in politics and the other in terror. Our position on Hamas has therefore not changed."

Javier Solana, the European Union's foreign policy chief, said in a statement that the Palestinian people had "voted democratically and peacefully." But, he added, "these results may confront us with an entirely new situation which will need to be analyzed" at a meeting of European foreign ministers next week.

Jubilant Hamas leaders reiterated Thursday that they had no plans to pursue peace talks or disarm the party's armed wing, a condition Israel has set for beginning negotiations under the road map. The plan, which calls for the creation of an independent Palestinian state by the end of 2005, has been frozen during recent years of violence.

Here in Ramallah, a Fatah stronghold where Hamas won every parliamentary seat except the one reserved for a Christian, dozens of activists from both parties clashed in front of the Palestinian Legislative Council, as the parliament is formally known.

The dispute started when a Hamas supporter hung the party's emerald-green banner above the entrance in place of the national flag. Fatah activists arrived and tore down the banner, which bears the Islamic axiom, "There is no God but God, and Muhammad is his prophet." The fight that ensued was broken up by police officers, who fired warning shots into the air.

"What they did offended not only Hamas but the Islamic nation," said Saleh Mikdad, 40, a print shop employee from the Amari refugee camp here. "But now we are all brothers."

In the past, the Fatah-dominated parliament approved the initiatives of Abbas and Arafat without much debate. But that could change with Hamas controlling the legislature, which will have the power to bring down cabinets if it does not agree with policy and would likely have to approve the terms of a final peace agreement with Israel.

In proceeding with elections despite Hamas's strong showing in last year's municipal races, Abbas gambled that it would be easier to disarm the group and modulate its policies, which include adopting Islamic law in the territories, with its members inside the Palestinian Authority. But Hamas's showing was far stronger than predicted by anyone in Fatah -- or by Palestinian pollsters who severely underestimated the movement's performance in its first national elections.

Hamas leaders must now decide how to form a cabinet whose ministers will run a Palestinian Authority bureaucracy dominated by Fatah supporters. Several Fatah officials said the party would probably decline any invitation to join the next cabinet so that Hamas, its sharpest critic for years, would get a sense of the difficulties involved in governing an angry electorate living under military occupation.

"They want to see how Hamas will act once it's responsible for running the government," said Bassem Barhum, a spokesman for the Palestinian Legislative Council. "They want to show the public that this is what they got. This is Hamas."

Barhum said rules required Abbas, who has threatened to resign if Hamas blocks his political program, to invite the largest party in parliament to form the next cabinet. Although it has the votes in parliament to name any cabinet it chooses, Hamas could be hampered by its lack of experience if it chooses to govern without a partner.

Party leaders chose candidates with backgrounds in medicine, education, computer sciences and other fields so that Hamas would have the expertise to run the various ministries. But Mahmoud Zahar, a victorious Hamas candidate from Gaza, said before the vote that the party favored a coalition government if it won.

One possibility is that Hamas will choose the leader of a third party to be prime minister while its own members grow accustomed to their new roles. One likely candidate for the job is Salam Fayyad, a former finance minister who won a parliamentary seat as the head of the anti-corruption Third Way party.

"My hunch is that they do not want to form a government on their own and would prefer a coalition with Fatah," said Ali Jarbawi, a political science professor at Bir Zeit University in the West Bank. "If this is not possible, I think they'll support a government of technocrats."

The Fatah Central Committee convened Thursday evening to begin discussing whether to join a Hamas-led cabinet, if invited to do so. Abbas Zaki, a committee member, said the decision would "depend on the program."

"If it is only Hamas, then it will be very hard to join," Zaki said. "And it is also necessary for us to understand what happened. We need to study this so we can make a recovery."

Some angry Fatah activists called for Abbas, who is commonly known as Abu Mazen, to step down.

"Abu Mazen led us to this catastrophe," said Shukri Radaideh, a Fatah leader in the Bethlehem district. "He must now resign."

Abbas postponed these parliamentary elections last July to secure a new election law beneficial to Fatah's prospects. One of the law's chief provisions allowed more members of parliament to be elected from parties' national candidate lists rather than from the district level, where Hamas's organization is strongest.

DOJ_NMG_0012505

The results announced Thursday, however, showed Hamas winning three more seats from the national list than Fatah and nearly three times as many in district races. In addition to its sweep here in Ramallah, Hamas won all seats except those reserved for Christian candidates in such traditional Fatah territory as Bethlehem and Jerusalem, where the Israeli cabinet had prohibited Hamas candidates from campaigning.

Hamas Victory Met With Alarm In The West (FT)

By Sharmila Devi And Harvey Morris

Financial Times, January 27, 2006

Hamas raised its Islamic green banner on the roof of the Palestinian parliament in Ramallah, celebrating a stunning election victory that has cast a new shadow over the quest for Middle East peace.

Hamas's victory was met with alarm in the west. But for Islamist groups across the Middle East, its defeat of the mainstream Fatah movement represents the first real opportunity to assert the power of political Islam.

The result heralds an uncertain era for the region as the militant movement – listed by both the US and European Union as a terrorist organisation – looked set to form a majority government. Prominent Hamas leaders including Ismail Haniya were celebrating even before officials announced the final results of Wednesday's legislative election.

The verdict of just over a million Palestinian voters will shake the region's mostly autocratic rulers and threaten hopes of a resumption of Palestinian-Israeli peace talks.

In preliminary results last night from the Palestinian Elections Commission, Hamas had won 76 seats in the 132-seat legislature against 43 for Fatah.

President George W. Bush said the US would not deal with Palestinian leaders who do not recognise Israel's right to exist, and urged Mahmoud Abbas, Palestinian president, to stay in office.

European politicians also called on Hamas to recognise Israel's right to exist. Officials said the EU was preparing to continue its annual aid of €500m to the Palestinian Authority if Hamas observed its ceasefire.

Saeb Erikat, the PA's chief negotiator, said Fatah would serve as a loyal opposition.

"Many people expected an earthquake, but not this tsunami," said a Palestinian official.

Israel and the US have always ruled out contacts with Hamas, which is responsible for dozens of suicide bombings, unless it disarmed.

Ehud Olmert, Israeli acting prime minister, told his officials to refrain from comment on the Hamas victory while the government assessed its effect.

With Fatah apparently unwilling to agree to Hamas overtures to join a unity government, the Islamists looked set to govern alone, with the possible inclusion in the administration of sympathetic independents more acceptable to Israel. But forming a government could take weeks.

Mr Qurei, whose ministers will remain in office as a temporary caretaker administration, said: "This is the choice of the people. It should be respected. Commenting before official results were through, he said: "If it's true, then the president should ask Hamas to form a new government."

The PA government is charged with implementing parliamentary legislation and administering financial and other policies. Foreign affairs and security are greyer areas, subject – in the era of the late Yassir Arafat, the former Fatah leader – to presidential control. Khaled Meshal, the top Hamas leader in exile in Damascus, said the group was open to political partnerships and would extend a truce if Israel reciprocated.

In an election universally judged to be democratic and fair, voters rejected Fatah and its associations with corruption and failure to achieve tangible improvements for the Palestinian people. Almost 78 per cent of 1.3m eligible voters turned out in a poll international observers said was well-run.

Prime Minister Resigns After Hamas' Victory (WT)

By Joshua Mitnick

The Washington Times, January 27, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0012506

RAMALLAH, West Bank -- Palestinian Prime Minister Ahmed Qureia tendered his resignation yesterday after Hamas scored a landslide victory over his Fatah party in parliamentary elections, marking a historic shift in the Middle East that empowers an Islamist party branded a terrorist organization by Israel, the United States, and Europe.

Hamas won 76 of 132 seats in the parliament, compared with 43 seats for Fatah, a stunning electoral performance that flew in the face of every pre-election survey as well exit polls Wednesday that forecast a slim advantage for the ruling Fatah party.

With Islamic militant politicians in a position to form a government without any partners, a crisis in relations with Israel and the international community seemed almost certain. The dramatic upheaval left governments in Israel and the United States scrambling to formulate a coherent response.

"Recognition of Israel and negotiations isn't on the agenda of Hamas," said Mushir al-Masri, a newly elected Hamas parliamentarian. Hamas leaders said they would not comply with international demands to disarm after the elections.

The vote means a split government for the Palestinians, whose system of government divides power between the parliament and the president, as in France.

Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, who was not up for re-election, remains in charge of foreign and national security policy as head of state, responsible for peace talks with Israel.

But with a Cabinet of Hamas ministers likely to take charge of the Palestinian executive branch, the electoral mandate Mr. Abbas earned a year ago seems to have dissipated.

In a televised address following the publication of the results, Mr. Abbas, also known as Abu Mazen, reiterated his commitment to the U.S.-sponsored road map and to negotiations with Israel.

"I remain committed to implement the platform on which you voted for me one year ago," he said. "The basis of this platform is negotiations and a peace settlement with Israel."

After huddling with his security aides, Israeli acting Prime Minister Ehud Olmert released a statement that threatened to boycott peace talks if Hamas joins the government without annulling its call for the destruction of Israel and its support of terrorism.

"There is no doubt that -- from Israel's point of view -- a new situation has been created," the statement said.

The new situation could not have come at a worse time for Israel, with the dominant hand of Ariel Sharon removed by illness, the Likud party marginalized and new elections awaited in March.

Israel reminded Mr. Abbas of the Palestinian Authority's commitment to disarming Hamas' military wing as part of the party's joining the political system.

"We demand that the PA and its chairman honor this commitment in the shortest time frame," the statement said.

"Israel will demand that the entire international community compel the PA and its chairman to implement the commitment to eliminate Hamas as a terrorist organization that calls for Israel's destruction."

Hamas invited Fatah to join the Islamists in a unity coalition, but the party, which dominated Palestinian politics under Yasser Arafat, turned down the offer.

"We won't join them," said peace negotiator Saeb Erekat. "We'll be a faithful opposition and we'll resuscitate the party."

The Hamas victory was seen as more of a protest vote against corruption and mismanagement by the ruling Fatah party than a vote against accommodation with Israel. Many Hamas supporters said they expect Hamas to engage Israel in talks eventually and to refrain from instituting Islamic law.

In central Ramallah's el-Manara Square, hundreds of elated Hamas supporters paraded with the militant movement's green banners to celebratory Middle East drums and chanting, "To the parliament Hamas!" A scuffle broke out at the parliament building when Hamas supporters hung up a party flag.

"I expected more than 50 percent, but not this many" members of parliament, said Rabiyeh Hussein, a Hamas supporter as he hugged the party's campaign manager. "It's a coup d'etat. It's a new era."

Even though peace talks have been on hiatus for years, the two governments interact on a daily basis, coordinating security, customs payments and humanitarian issues -- making a total break in ties nearly impossible.

Hamas Is Stunned By Its Success (LAT)

By Laura King

The Los Angeles Times, January 27, 2006

GAZA CITY, Gaza Strip -- Of all those shocked by Hamas' landslide win in Palestinian elections, few were more stunned than the militant Islamist group itself.

In taking the reins of power after participating in its first parliamentary vote, Hamas leaders face a predicament: If they attempt to please their most radical adherents by continuing to call for Israel's destruction, they jeopardize hard-won international support for a Palestinian state.But if they moderate their stance and reject their founding principle, they risk alienating their militant base.

The group had wrestled with the question of whether it should even participate in the parliament, because such a step implied acceptance of the 1993 interim peace accords with Israel under which the ruling Palestinian Authority was created.

Having won a majority of seats in the new parliament, Hamas has the responsibility of forming a new government to work alongside Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas. Elected a year ago, Abbas will remain in office unless he carries through on threats to resign if he cannot pursue his goal of peace with Israel.

A key question hanging over Wednesday's election results is which Hamas people voted for -- the radical group that professes eagerness to continue the armed struggle against Israel, or the Hamas that toned down its rhetoric during the political campaign and emphasized its social service programs. The latter symbolizes, for many Palestinians, the hope for a less corrupt government and a better life after years of conflict.

With trademark discipline, Hamas' senior figures quickly closed ranks Thursday, proclaiming readiness to take on the daunting task at hand. "We will put the Palestinian house in order," said Ismail Haniyeh, a self-possessed former university dean who was the top candidate on the Hamas slate.

But Hamas in many ways appears ill-equipped to meet this challenge. Its political experience is strictly local -- running the cities and towns where it won municipal elections over the last year. Much of its senior leadership is dead, assassinated by Israel in response to the group's campaign of suicide bombings, in hiatus for the past year.

Complicating matters, international donors are poised to shun a Hamas-led government. And its military wing, the Izzedine al-Qassam Brigades, shows no inclination to disarm.

In other respects, however, Hamas may be better suited to govern than the Palestinian Authority, which was riddled with graft and largely ineffectual under the long reign of the late Yasser Arafat.

Hamas has for years administered a large, efficient network of charities, schools and health clinics, winning a reputation for fiscal integrity along the way. Many of the candidates it fielded are well-educated professionals, and not all are ardently religious. Also, Hamas' military wing is thought to be much more accountable to the group's overall leadership than are the roving gangs of gunmen who claim allegiance to Fatah.

Hamas, as it is prone to do, sent mixed signals Thursday about its intentions.

"The Israeli occupiers should recognize Palestinian rights first," Haniyeh said when asked whether the group would be willing to talk to Israel.

But almost in the same breath, he seemed eager to convey a message of conciliation. Asked what he would say to the United States and other nations that have expressed alarm at the group's ascent to power, he said: "Don't be afraid ... Hamas is an open movement" -- suggesting, apparently, that its stance on matters including Israel could change.

Hamas, by dint of its formidable organizational skills, was probably the first to recognize the political earthquake that had occurred with Wednesday's vote. After the polls closed, it posted observers at each locale where votes were being counted.

The tallying was slow and painstaking, carried out in some cases by candlelight due to power outages, not unusual in Gaza. But by 3 a.m., Haniyeh, huddling with aides, receiving reports from the field, talking nonstop on his mobile phone, was beginning to put out the shocking word: We won.

Amid the rejoicing, there was a distinct air of nervousness, even outright apprehension, in Hamas-dominated districts of Gaza. A few people wondered aloud: had Hamas bitten off more than it could chew?

"You know, I was very happy when I went to sleep, when I thought we did well, but not win," said Gaza City resident Ashraf Kholi. Like many Palestinians, he tuned into late-night exit polls that gave Hamas perhaps one-third of the vote.

"Then I woke up," continued Kholi, who runs a shop in the city's Zeitun district, home to many Hamas leaders. "And I realized everything had changed."

To avoid governing alone, and the direct contacts with Israel and the United States that could entail, the group's leaders are trying to woo Fatah into some kind of alliance -- an offer that has thus far been spurned.

"It is better to be in the opposition," said senior Fatah leader Jibril Rajoub, a former security chief. As to the prospect of Hamas presiding over the sprawling and notoriously inefficient Palestinian Authority bureaucracy, he snorted: "Let them try."

Outcome Likely To Alter Vote In Israel (WT)

By Hazel Ward

The Washington Times, January 27, 2006

JERUSALEM -- Hamas' shocking election victory is likely to radically alter the course of Israel's own election at the end of March, as an outraged right wing flexes its muscles and the centrist government plots its response.

As Palestinian officials announced the results, acting Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert convened top-level talks with senior political and defense officials to formulate how to manage the crisis.

Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni, among those at the emergency powwow, earlier urged the European Union, the Palestinians' biggest aid donor, to speak out against the creation of a Palestinian "government of terror."

"It is up to the European Union to speak out clearly and unequivocally and clarify that there will not be any European understanding shown towards a process which would mean the establishment of a government of terror," he said.

Mr. Olmert, who heads the newly formed centrist Kadima party, is eager to define the permanent borders of the State of Israel and even make further territorial concessions in the West Bank. He faces a critical challenge, which could have a dramatic effect on his party's hitherto positive ratings in the polls.

Any perceived leniency toward Hamas could play directly into the hands of Benjamin Netanyahu, the hawkish leader of the right-wing Likud Party, who last year warned that Israel's pullout from Gaza was a prize for Hamas violence.

But intransigence toward a Hamas-led government would likely bring about international pressure on Israel to comply with earlier commitments reached with the Palestinian Authority.

Hamas' victory prompted a flurry of negative reactions from across the political spectrum in Israel, with the right wing heaping scorn on the government for failing to prevent the Islamists from contesting the polls.

The vote has created "the State of Hamasistan just 1,000 meters away from the citizens of Israel," army radio quoted Mr. Netanyahu as saying.

Yuval Steinitz, Likud member of parliament and head of the parliamentary committee on foreign affairs and defense, likened the Hamas victory to "an earthquake" and a "tragic defeat for Israel in the war against terrorism."

Ultranationalist lawmaker Efi Eitam called on Israel's domestic spy agency Shin Bet to kill each and every Hamas lawmaker.

"We must turn Hamas' parliamentary list into a hit list for the Shin Bet," he told army radio.

Israeli forces have assassinated dozens of Hamas leaders in recent years.

Even on the left, Labor Chairman Amir Peretz insisted he had "no intention" of conducting negotiations with Hamas as long as it was dedicated to Israel's destruction, despite his running an election campaign urging peace efforts.

"The Palestinians have given their support to extremist elements and it is up to the government to take the necessary action to ensure [Israel's] security," he said.

Elder statesman Shimon Peres, Mr. Olmert's No. 2 in Kadima, cast doubt over Hamas' ability to govern effectively given its international pariah status.

"Hamas will not be able to control the Palestinian Authority and pay the salaries [of more than 100,000 civil servants] without international aid, which will apparently cease," he told army radio.

The Palestinian elections of 1996, which were not contested by Hamas, were calm on the ground as on Wednesday.

But immediately afterward, Hamas began a series of devastating attacks, drastically weakening the Labor-led government of Mr. Peres, who was prime minister, and paving the way for Mr. Netanyahu's election.

Hamas Victory Now A Major Issue In Israeli Election Campaign (WP)

By Scott Wilson

The Washington Post, January 27, 2006

JERUSALEM, Jan. 26 -- The Hamas parliamentary election victory became a focal point of Israel's election campaign Thursday as opposition politicians criticized the government for failing to stop the radical Islamic movement from rising to prominence within the Palestinian Authority.

With Prime Minister Ariel Sharon unconscious from a stroke this month, Ehud Olmert, his deputy and now the acting prime minister, faced criticism in the wake of the Hamas defeat of the governing Fatah party, Israel's main partner in past peace agreements.

Olmert recently reversed Sharon's decision barring Palestinians in East Jerusalem from voting in the election. He said at the time that he did not want to give the Palestinian leader, Mahmoud Abbas, an excuse to cancel the first parliamentary elections in a decade.

"We are talking about an earthquake that has sent us back 50 years and will lead the entire region into chaos," said Silvan Shalom, a member of Israel's parliament from the hawkish Likud Party, who recently resigned as foreign minister in anticipation of the March 28 elections.

Public opinion polls have shown Likud suffering a significant drop in popularity since Sharon and Olmert left last year to form Kadima, which polls now show to be the prohibitive favorite in the coming elections.

"I warned Olmert in our first meeting after he took office" that Hamas must not be allowed to participate in the voting, Shalom said in his comments to the Ynet news Web site. "Now we have no one to blame but ourselves."

Olmert ordered his ministers Thursday not to comment on the Palestinian returns. He told visiting Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.) Wednesday evening that he would not "negotiate with a government that does not meet its most basic obligations -- to fight terrorism."

Israel, the United States and the European Union classify Hamas as a terrorist organization. The group, known formally as the Islamic Resistance Movement, calls for the creation of a Palestinian state on land that now includes Israel.

The leader of the dovish Labor Party, Amir Peretz, said at a special meeting of party leaders that "we have no intention to allow negotiations to take place with an organization that declares its intention to destroy Israel."

"Hamas," he said, "is not a partner."

But Dan Schueftan, a senior fellow at the Shalem Center in Jerusalem, said, "We are assigning much too much significance to these elections."

He said Israel already faced a fading partner in Abbas, whose leadership has been undermined by party militias, internal corruption and the popularity of Hamas. Palestinians say he has also been hurt by Israel's reluctance to reduce checkpoints and military operations in the West Bank.

The Hamas victory, Schueftan said, could allow the Israeli government to proceed with another unilateral withdrawal from land in the West Bank, which Palestinians envision as part of their future state. Last year, Sharon ordered the withdrawal of all Israeli settlers and troops from the Gaza Strip, the other part of a prospective Palestinian state. Schueftan said a withdrawal from parts of the West Bank was already "the tacit platform of Kadima."

"The choices were between terrorists, impotents and hooligans," said Schueftan, who is also deputy director of the National Security Studies Center at the University of Haifa. "From an Israeli point of view, will this make things worse? No. Will this make things better? No. Would a different result have made a difference? No."

Gabriel Sheffer, a political science professor at Hebrew University of Jerusalem, said: "We should wait and see what happens inside the Palestinian government. But in any event, Olmert, his advisers and his followers face a big dilemma."

"The questions begin with: Do you talk to Hamas and, if so, what do you talk to them about?" Sheffer said. "I think Olmert will try to restrain the military, and try to find ways, probably not directly, to talk to Hamas."

Yossi Klein Halevi, another senior fellow at the Shalem Center, which holds mostly hawkish views on security matters, said, "Israel will now hold political Hamas directly responsible for the actions of military Hamas."

"There will now be one address at the Palestinian Authority where Israel can respond," Halevi said.

Dore Gold, president of the Jerusalem Center for Public Affairs, who advised Sharon, said Israel would now have to maintain control of the Jordan Valley in any final peace agreement to ensure that Hamas does not allow other groups Israel considers terrorist organizations to arrive from Jordan or Iraq.

"Hamas cannot be seen as just another Palestinian political party with an Islamic orientation," Gold said. "It must be linked to the larger sources of terror that threaten Israel and the West."

After Hamas Victory, Israel's Likely Course (NYT)

By Greg Myre

The New York Times, January 27, 2006

JERUSALEM, Jan. 26 — The Hamas landslide in Palestinian elections has stunned Israelis, but it may also have brought them a rare moment of clarity: with peace talks off the table, Israel will most likely pursue unilateral actions, drawing its own borders and separating itself from the Palestinians.

Ehud Olmert, the acting prime minister, made it clear after an emergency cabinet meeting that talks with Hamas, a Palestinian party sworn to Israel's destruction, were out of the question, while experts said Israel was now freer to establish its future on its own.

They said Israel — whose own elections in two months could be heavily influenced by the Palestinian results — was likely to focus on speeding up construction of the separation barrier, which runs along and through parts of the West Bank. After more than three years of building, it remains less than half finished, but Israeli officials say it has contributed enormously to the reduction of suicide bombings and other attacks. Palestinians, on the other hand, say the barrier takes land they want for a future state.

"The differences between the sides are now much deeper, and the chances for negotiations are much more remote," said Shlomo Avineri, a liberal political scientist at Hebrew University. "The only realistic steps may be Israeli unilateral steps."

Unilateralism was the approach taken by Ariel Sharon, the prime minister for the last five years, who now lies in a coma. He withdrew Israeli settlers and soldiers from Gaza last summer without negotiating the move with the Palestinians, and left open the possibility of more such moves in the West Bank.

Since on-and-off peace talks began more than a decade ago, Israelis have been deeply divided over what sorts of concessions to make, how much territory to keep and whether the talks would lead to an end to the decades-old conflict. On Thursday, it seemed there were few such doubts.

From Israeli hawks who oppose concessions to doves who constantly pressed for renewed peace talks, Israelis said there could be no negotiations with Hamas.

Ami Ayalon, the former head of Israel's Shin Bet security service and now a parliamentary candidate for the left-leaning Labor Party, said the absence of a negotiating partner should not halt Israeli actions aimed at separating from the Palestinians.

Israel, he said, should seek "to create a situation where Israel disengages from the Palestinians and preserves the character of Israel as a Jewish democracy." Israel should continue, he said, "to move fast and independently to our goal."

Mr. Olmert hopes to become prime minister in elections on March 28 as head of the centrist Kadima Party started by Mr. Sharon.

But Benjamin Netanyahu, leader of the right-wing Likud Party, made clear that the Palestinian results offered an opportunity for his more hawkish message to be heard. He said the Hamas victory was a result of the unilateral withdrawal from Gaza and proved that no more withdrawals should occur.

Yuval Steinitz, a member of Parliament from Likud, said Israel should have prevented or canceled the Palestinian elections. He cited the 1993 Oslo accords, an interim peace agreement that bars the participation of armed groups and those that do not recognize Israel.

Mr. Steinitz noted that Palestinian terror attacks against Israel had gone down in recent years, but that Hamas's popularity had gone up. "This is a major loss in our war against terror despite all our tactical successes," he said.

Since the Oslo accords, the Israeli and Palestinian leaderships have maintained a dialogue at some level.

But Israel and Hamas have never had contact with each other, aside from exchanging bullets and bombs. Their relationship is similar to the one that existed in the 1980's and earlier between Israel and the Palestine Liberation Organization, with their refusal to recognize each other.

Hamas's electoral triumph comes at a time when Israel is going through its own political upheavals, and the government is unlikely to make any major moves until after the Israeli election.

"Election time means time out," Mr. Avineri said. "There is a strong argument for refraining from doing dramatic things right now."

The campaign may also mean that Mr. Olmert and his party will have to take a tougher tone to ensure that they are not outflanked on the security issue by Likud.

Israelis are beginning to debate whether the reality of being in power will tame or moderate Hamas. Mr. Avineri suggested a Hamas-led government might not be as threatening as some Israelis feared. He cited the Lebanese guerrilla group Hezbollah, which battled Israeli troops for years in southern Lebanon and now takes part in Lebanese politics.

"Hamas may behave like Hezbollah," Mr. Avineri said. "The rhetoric will be harsh, and they will still be armed, but they will be part of the political system, and their actions may be more restrained."

Others, like Mr. Steinitz, argue that Hamas wants Jews pushed into the sea, and did not enter politics to change its goals but to advance them.

Still, the Hamas victory injects uncertainty into the Israeli election. In previous Israeli campaigns, Hamas and other Palestinian factions have staged deadly attacks that pushed the Israeli electorate to the right.

In 1996, the Labor Party, led by the dovish Shimon Peres, seemed headed for victory after the assassination of Yitzhak Rabin by an ultranationalist Israeli. But after a series of Palestinian suicide bombings during the Israeli campaign, Mr. Netanyahu, of Likud, won a narrow victory.

The Palestinians started an uprising in September 2000, and in a February 2001 election for prime minister, Mr. Sharon trounced Ehud Barak, the Labor Party leader, who had tried but failed to reach a comprehensive accord with the Palestinians.

A Shift Of Biblical Proportion? (WSJ)

By Karby Leggett

The Wall Street Journal, January 27, 2006

AMONA, West Bank -- The fate of nine newly built concrete homes at the edge of this Jewish community may soon provide clues to one of the Middle East's most pressing questions: Is Israel preparing to withdraw from parts of the occupied West Bank?

The answer increasingly appears to be yes. Following extended legal wrangling, the Israeli government is completing a plan to demolish Amona's nine concrete homes -- all uninhabited -- because they were constructed illegally on privately owned Palestinian land. With the militant Hamas party winning control1 of the Palestinian Parliament on Wednesday, it is possible Israel would delay the demolition, but several thousand Israeli security personnel are scheduled to carry out the order as early as next week, police and military officials say. The large force reflects concern that pro-settlement activists will resist.

Though small in scale, the Amona operation could have far-reaching implications. Coming on the heels of Israel's withdrawal from the Gaza Strip in August, it would signal a further rollback of a decades-long policy of encouraging Jewish settlement in Palestinian areas, particularly the West Bank, which is now home to some 250,000 Israeli citizens. The move likely would resonate positively among Palestinians as they reorganize their own government through popular elections. More broadly, it could mark the beginning of a gradual regional shift away from armed confrontation and toward accommodation based on territorial compromise.

Amona is one of more than 100 illegal Jewish communities, known as outposts, that have sprouted across the West Bank over the past decade. Unlike the 120-odd official West Bank settlements, which were established with government blessing and financial backing and in many cases have grown into sprawling neighborhoods, the outposts never received official approval and consist largely of decrepit mobile homes and other makeshift structures. Many were built without legal ownership of the land they sit on, according to a report on the outposts commissioned by the government last year.

Amona's case was first detailed in a page-one story of The Wall Street Journal in July. It is unique in that the government's decision to demolish the nine homes is the result of a lawsuit brought by Peace Now. After focusing for years on the politics of the settlement enterprise, the left-wing organization last year initiated legal proceedings aimed at compelling the government to enforce laws it had long ignored. The case ended up in the Supreme Court, which sided with Peace Now in declaring the homes illegal.

The precedent could reverberate for years -- and deepen a chasm between Israel's secular majority, which sees the settlements as a security and financial burden, and the religious-nationalist minority committed to expanding them. Dror Etkes, a Peace Now employee who spearheaded the legal effort against Amona, says he is preparing similar cases over other outposts and even a handful of authorized settlements located on Palestinian-owned land. About 30 illegal outposts are now building homes similar to those in Amona.

"Our success is not in knocking down nine houses in Amona but in the crisis we have created between the government and settlers," Mr. Etkes says.

That sense of foreboding is now on display in Amona, where residents -- now living in mobile homes -- have begun filling in dirt access roads and erecting barriers to thwart the arrival of military and police forces. On the day of the operation, they plan to bring up to 10,000 pro-settlement activists here to protest the action. Orit Caspi, Amona's manager, says resistance will be "stronger" than in Gaza this summer. Complicating the mission for all parties is a plan by Israeli forces to dismantle another outpost in Hebron around the same time.

Set in the heart of the West Bank, Amona was founded in 1995, as peace talks between the Israelis and Palestinians were unfolding. Amona residents are deeply religious and say they are entitled to live in the West Bank, whatever laws the modern state of Israel, because it is part of the biblical Land of Israel.

The government decision to tear down the nine houses marks a reversal of policy that until recently had actively accommodated outposts. Although Amona is illegal, it enjoys full access to the state electricity and water grids. Residents are guarded by the Israeli military. In a sign of change, however, Acting Prime Minister Ehud Olmert recently instructed security forces to deal harshly with Jewish settlers who break Israeli laws.

Residents of Amona say they fear they could be the first in a long line of West Bank demolitions and evacuations. Yair Frank, Amona's rabbi, says residents plan stiff resistance not only to save their homes, but to show the government the response to a wider withdrawal.

"This land was given to us by God," he says. "It is our land today and will be our land forever."

In The Mideast, A Giant Step Back (NYT)

For 20 years Ariel Sharon and other Israeli hard-liners have claimed that they had no negotiating partner interested in or capable of securing peace between Israelis and Palestinians. That always seemed a debatable point, until now.

There are many reasons to explain why Palestinians voted to hand over their government to Hamas, an organization that revels in terrorism and is sworn to destroy Israel. The inability of President Mahmoud Abbas's party, Fatah, to run its affairs is first on the list, if pre-election polls of Palestinians were accurate. Fatah has been corrupt and inept, and it represented the status quo, not a happy position given the lawlessness in Gaza, the unemployment rate in Nablus and the despair among young people in Jericho. Mr. Abbas didn't help matters much, proving weak and incapable of imposing control over the battered Palestinian Authority.

Israeli hard-liners can blame themselves as well. Even though most reasonable people have recognized Mr. Abbas as a far more pragmatic negotiating partner than Yasir Arafat was, Prime Minister Sharon failed to give Mr. Abbas any concession that he could point to as an achievement. Instead, Israel has busied itself with carrying out Mr. Sharon's doctrine of unilateral separation from the Palestinians, a doctrine that is sure to gain more favor now that the Palestinians have chosen Hamas.

But all of this is peripheral to two central facts. Hamas grew out of a terrorist organization that has undermined every small step toward peace with mass murder. And on Wednesday, Palestinians voted almost two to one to put Hamas in charge of running their government. For there to be any hope of getting out of the impasse in the Middle East, one of those two things must change.

It would be nice to believe that Hamas, now that it is assuming the reins of power and the burden of actually having to govern, will renounce its call for the destruction of a sovereign state, disarm its private army, get into the business of making life better for Palestinians and try to negotiate the creation of a real Palestinian state. While we're not hopeful, we are reminded that the Palestine Liberation Organization of the late Mr. Arafat, of which Mr. Abbas was once second in command, was born in terrorism. For many years Mr. Arafat and his gunmen were hunted by Israel, much as Hamas has been in recent years.

President Bush was absolutely right when he urged Mr. Abbas to remain in office as a sign of stability and set Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice the task of seeing whether the shards of the peace process could be reassembled. But he was also absolutely right when he said, "A political party that articulates the destruction of Israel as part of its platform is a party with which we will not deal."

Hamas has a choice between governing and terror. Is the party more interested in making sure that the electricity and water stay on, that Palestinian boys and girls make it to school, and that these battered people finally get a state of their own? Or is it more interested in continuing its campaign to destroy Israel? If Hamas chooses the latter, it's more than likely that it will not be around for long, and rightly so.

Hamas Rules (WSJ)

The sweeping victory of the Islamist Hamas party in Wednesday's Palestinian legislative elections can hardly be considered good news. But neither is it surprising, and it may even have the long-run benefit of educating Palestinians about the terrible cost of their political choices.

The ruling Fatah faction of Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas governed corruptly, ineffectually, and until the death in 2004 of founder Yasser Arafat, dictatorially. So it is understandable that Palestinians wanted an alternative. That they went for the only other major choice on offer is not necessarily an indication that they share Hamas's goal of destroying Israel and all its citizens. The vote might even turn out to be clarifying -- in the sense of showing the world that no Israeli-Palestinian peace is possible until the Palestinians have leaders who really want to live in peace with Israel.

Of course, there's no sugar-coating what this vote for the party of suicide bombers and social welfare says about the state of Palestinian politics. Partly this is the fault of the losing Fatah faction itself. Ever since its return to the Palestinian territories in the mid-1990s following the Oslo "Peace" Accords, Fatah has fed Palestinians on a diet of extremist, anti-Semitic propaganda. Its military wing assassinated "moderate" Palestinians, while allowing Hamas to flourish as a terror weapon -- both to kill Israelis, and to scare Fatah's American and European patrons about the possible alternatives to its rule.

It should never be forgotten that in 2002 -- under Arafat's iron fist -- Palestinian terrorists were allowed to murder 452 Israelis. That figure later dropped not because of any change of heart on Fatah's part but because Israel and the United States finally gave up on Arafat as a credible peace partner and turned to a strategy of unilateral separation (the infamous "wall") and military strikes.

Partly, too, Israel and the West must own up to their culpability for Wednesday's outcome. Foreign policy critics of the so-called "realist" school will no doubt be tempted to trumpet the vote as a setback for President Bush's strategy of democratizing the Middle East. But it's more accurate to say that Hamas's win only highlights the damage done by decades of realist support for "strongmen" and "stability."

The calculation at the heart of Oslo was that Arafat and Fatah would impose a dictatorial order on Palestinians that outsiders never could. The late Yitzhak Rabin put it most clearly when he said the point of recognizing Arafat in 1993 was not to give the Palestinians their freedom. It was because Arafat could deal with Hamas and other troublemakers without interference from "the Supreme Court and [the human rights organization] B'Tselem."

Rabin was right that Arafat would have scant regard for the rights of Palestinians. But he was wrong that Arafat would crack down on Hamas. Like every other strongman, Arafat didn't crack down on extremists but used them to his advantage where he could. Palestinians could see that the U.S. was coddling a man who oppressed them, breeding cynicism about U.S. motives and making it hard for democratic movements to flourish. The Bush Administration is working hard to change those perceptions and build a Palestinian civil society, but this will take years.

So far the White House -- which pushed the Palestinian Authority to hold these elections -- has struck the right notes in response to the Hamas victory. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice praised the vote for being peaceful and "by all accounts fair." At the same time she stated that "you cannot have one foot in politics and another in terror." President Bush rightly said Hamas should expect no relations with the United States until it stops calling for Israel's destruction.

The White House will have to resist the temptation, no doubt encouraged by Europe, to pressure Israel to deal with Hamas as it once was pressed to deal with Arafat. But given Hamas's history and declared goals, the onus is on its leaders to show that they have an agenda beyond terror. If Hamas begins to use Gaza as a base to import weapons and attack Israel, the Jewish state will have every right to strike back in self-defense. And the U.S. should support it in doing so.

It's always possible that the burden of responsibility will over time make Hamas a less radical movement. If it remains rejectionist and bent only on war with Israel, then the Palestinians will sour on its rule in any case. Perhaps then average Palestinians will conclude they have no choice but to co-exist with Israel if they want a better life. The obligation of the U.S. is to make it clear to Hamas, and to all Palestinians, that there is no future in terror.

Hamas's Choice (WP)

THE VICTORY of Hamas in the Palestinian elections creates fresh opportunities as well as dangers in the Middle East. The Islamic fundamentalist movement will now come under extraordinary pressure to cease all acts of terrorism, help restore order in the turbulent Gaza Strip and moderate its rejection of Israel. The pressure will come not only from Western governments and aid donors but from its own constituents. Hamas's leaders had hoped to use a minority position in the Palestinian legislature to exercise a veto over peace talks with Israel while avoiding disarmament and wider responsibility. As leader of the cabinet that will be formed under President Mahmoud Abbas, the Islamists will find their straddle of democracy and terrorism far more difficult to maintain.

Many Palestinians who voted for Hamas don't support the Islamists' fundamentalist agenda: Polls show that large majorities want an end to violence and a resumption of peace talks with Israel. Wednesday's vote was not an embrace of extremism, but -- as President Bush suggested yesterday -- a rejection of the corrupt and incompetent clique of leaders left behind by Yasser Arafat. Since Arafat's death more than a year ago, his Fatah movement had been unable to reform itself or control its violent elements, despite the good intentions of Mr. Abbas. Now, perhaps, a new generation of secular leaders will be able to purge Fatah and prepare to offer Palestinians a better alternative, while crooks and armed thugs are cut from the government's payroll. Mr. Abbas himself should remain in office, as Mr. Bush urged yesterday, and will retain considerable power to check a Hamas-led government.

Israel, which has its own elections March 28, will have to guard against any upsurge in violence, including acts by Palestinian groups unhappy with the election results. But Hamas's victory will simply reinforce the policy of the current Israeli government, which is based on unilateralist measures such as last summer's withdrawal from Gaza and the ongoing construction of a borderlike system of fences and walls in the West Bank. If it avoids provocations, such as the assassination of Hamas leaders, Israel may benefit from the pressure that others will bring to bear on the Islamic movement. In the short term, too, Israel is likely to escape any further prodding from Washington to make concessions it has resisted, such as the relaxation of security checkpoints in the West Bank or the release of prisoners.

Hamas's eagerness to avoid hard choices was evident in the swiftness with which its leaders proposed yesterday to form a "unity" government with Fatah despite the Islamists' control of 76 of the 132 seats in the legislature. The two parties will have to forge some agreement on security, since each effectively controls its own armed forces, with those of Fatah now funded by the government; war between the two is a danger. The Islamists no doubt will seek to construct a coalition that could continue to attract international aid -- without which the Palestinian Authority would collapse -- while evading compromises on Hamas's militia or ideology.

Even if Fatah consents to this strategy, Western governments should not. Instead, they should stick to the principle already articulated by the so-called Quartet of peace process sponsors, which includes the European Union, the United Nations and Russia, as well as the Bush administration: that "a future Palestinian Authority cabinet should include no member who has not committed to the principles of Israel's right to exist in peace and security and an unequivocal end to violence and terrorism." If Hamas will not meet that condition, then it should be condemned to governing Gaza and the West Bank in diplomatic isolation, without European, U.S. or World Bank aid. The Islamists must be forced to choose between democracy and terrorism; between their ideology and the yearning of Palestinians for security, good government and a state of their own.

Mideast Uncertainty, Again (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, January 27, 2006

THE OUTCOME OF WEDNESDAY'S Palestinian parliamentary election surprised even its victors. No one expected Hamas, which is dedicated to the destruction of Israel, to win an outright majority, but it took 76 of 132 seats in parliament. Its victory will set back an already stumbling peace process in the Middle East unless Hamas renounces violence and recognizes the Jewish state's right to exist.

Although the United States, Israel and the European Union brand Hamas a terrorist organization, Palestinians admire it for the schools and hospitals it runs. And the organization that once routinely dispatched suicide bombers into Israel has mostly refrained from such attacks for about the last year.

Yet even after gaining a clear majority in parliament, its leaders have refused to heed renewed calls from Washington and from European capitals to disarm and renounce violence. May the Hamas officials who want a government that will focus on bread-and-butter issues such as healthcare, education and agriculture prevail over the preachers of hate.

If the new government builds classrooms and feeds the hungry, it will give Israel breathing room before its own election in two months. Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas, leader of the defeated Fatah party, is the man designated to discuss with Israel the outlines of a future state no matter who has the parliamentary majority. Before the vote, Abbas threatened to resign if Hamas did well, but President Bush struck the right notes Thursday in urging Abbas to stay — while ruling out direct contacts with Hamas until it renounces violence.

Hamas may find that the obligations of governing leave no room for violence. Or it may not. What it will quickly learn, however, is that any Palestinian government needs the hundreds of millions of dollars annually from the United States, Europe and Japan to function and mitigate the desperate poverty in the fetid slums of Gaza and the occupied West Bank. Maintaining a truce might prevent a shut-off of the money. Recognizing Israel's right to exist, of course, would bring in still more.

The elections for the Legislative Council were the first in a decade, and Hamas boycotted those; former Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat never bothered to hold another round before he died more than a year ago. When Abbas succeeded him, he gambled that bringing Hamas into the political sphere would put it on the path to a renunciation of terrorism and recognition of the goal of the independent states of Palestine and Israel living side by side in peace.

It is not clear Hamas will do so, but that should be the pressure point for other nations. Most Palestinians, like most Israelis, want peace. Israeli leaders and Abbas recognize that desire; Hamas needs to heed it as well. The Bush administration rightly has promoted democracy in the Middle East, but now the United States has to deal with the results of a free vote. So does Israel, closer and in greater danger. Islamists also have racked up successes at the polls in Iraq, Egypt and Lebanon, again proving the double-edged sword of a free ballot.

The sky isn't yet falling in the Middle East. But Wednesday's election results complicate a situation that desperately needed stability, and they will make it more difficult for the Palestinians to achieve a state of their own anytime soon.

Two Elections And A Lesson (WP)

By E. J. Dionne Jr.

The Washington Post, January 27, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0012516

In two elections this week, voters tossed incumbents out of power. One election made barely a ripple internationally. The other broke like a tsunami over the entire world. The response to each vote should teach us the danger of pretending that elections alone can make democracy happen.

In Canada's quiet election, Stephen Harper ended more than a decade of Liberal Party rule. It was a significant achievement for the Conservative Party. The Canadian right had, until recently, been badly split. Harper reunited the right, moderated its program and took advantage of public impatience with Liberal scandals.

But Canadians, devoted as always to subtlety and prudence, refused to give Harper a majority. Diane Ablonczy, a Conservative parliamentarian from Alberta, offered a perceptive take on the voters' verdict. She said they "want to test-drive the Conservative Party" before allowing it to govern without help. In stable democracies, voters can take test-drives.

In the elections for the Palestinian Authority, the voters also rose up against the incumbents. But in the process, they gave a majority to Hamas, a party that has embraced terrorism and would obliterate Israel.

In responding yesterday to Hamas's victory, President Bush, a man who prides himself on clarity and disdains nuance, was, if I may coin a word, nuancing all over the place.

On the one hand, he praised democratic elections for letting voters send a message. "If they're unhappy with the status quo," Bush said at a news conference, "they'll let you know." Indeed.

But he also seemed to rule out dealing with Hamas if the militant group didn't change itself radically -- particularly its attitude toward Israel and terrorism. "I know you can't be a partner in peace . . . if your party has got an armed wing," he said. That's a good point about Hamas, though it raises interesting questions about Iraqi political parties that have links to armed militias.

From this tale of two elections, it's possible to take the wrong lesson, which would be to walk away from America's long if inconsistent quest to promote free elections and human rights. You don't have to agree with Bush's decisions to believe that an important goal of American foreign policy should be to expand the number of nations that live under democratic rule.

But since the invasion of Iraq, administration spokesmen and supporters have offered a utopian and decidedly unconservative view of how American power could be used to change the world -- and quickly.

It was said that the way to peace in Jerusalem passed through Baghdad. It was said that by ridding Iraq of Saddam Hussein's wretched regime, the United States would unleash a democratic revolution in the Arab world. Go back and look at the broad claims Bush's defenders made for his policy after the election in Iraq just a year ago. Everything, it was said, was falling into place.

But the world is a complicated place. Of course free elections in Iraq are hugely better than dictatorship. But when free elections become more a census to count members of warring ethnic and religious factions than a way of settling underlying disputes, they do not necessarily pave the way for enduring democracy. They do not provide voters with ways of test-driving the various alternatives.

In the Palestinian case, Hamas's victory was not widely predicted, but its strong showing was predictable. Every serious analyst understood the frustration of the majority of Palestinians with those who have led them. Everyone knew that Hamas had created a new civil society -- a network of health and social service organizations -- within the old Palestinian structure that brought a wide base of grass-roots support.

The polls suggest that Hamas did not win because a majority of Palestinians bought into its terrorist program. Hamas won, precisely as Bush said, because voters were so unhappy with the status quo. But shouldn't Washington ask itself why it didn't take more dramatic steps, over a much longer period, to change the Palestinian status quo? Taking action in Iraq was not going to do the job.

A working democracy north of our border requires a degree of hope for the future now lacking among Palestinians. The Bush administration once thought it could take a holiday from complexity and remake the world through a few bold strokes. But democratization is hard, complicated and frustrating. It requires the patient building of institutions and attention to detail. There are no short cuts. You wonder if the president will come to terms with the flaws in his own status quo.

Living With Hamas's Victory (WP)

By Jim Hoagland

The Washington Post, January 27, 2006

The politics of pain fed the surprisingly lopsided victory by Hamas radicals in this week's Palestinian legislative elections. The antidote to the poisons that run through Hamas may eventually flow from the politics of pain as well.

The Palestinian vote is a spasm of self-inflicted shock therapy that will unsettle the world, because Hamas accords a low-to-nonexistent priority to making peace with Israel.

But it is pointless to bemoan this setback or try to minimize its significance, as President Bush seemed to do yesterday in a White House news conference. Israel, the United States and Europe should instead adjust their policies to recognize and influence the volatile situation created by the unexpected and distinctly unwelcome Hamas victory.

They can best do that by not launching immediate efforts to cajole, bribe or intimidate a new Hamas-led government into adopting more peaceful-sounding rhetoric to clear the way for reviving negotiations with Israel. And there should be no attempt to paper over the crushing defeat inflicted on Mahmoud Abbas and the Palestinian Authority he headed.

Instead, the immediate test for Hamas must be its ability to bring social order and significant calm to the chaotic Gaza Strip and West Bank territories. That is the urgent priority set for the Islamic-based movement by voters upset with the turmoil, corruption and indirection that Abbas's Fatah party allowed to flourish. And that is the priority that Washington and its partners must acknowledge and underline by carefully chosen words and deeds.

In their pain, the Palestinians have lashed out against Fatah and entrusted their fate to a movement that exists in large part to inflict pain on their Israeli and American enemies. The psychic rewards of revenge, which are much esteemed in the Arab world, outweigh, right now, material and other rewards that were supposed to flow to Palestinians from peace accords or Israeli unilateral disengagement.

Washington and other capitals will be tempted to focus exclusively on the international dimensions of this lashing out. It brings setbacks not only for the "road map" outline for Israeli and Palestinian states living in peace but also for international efforts to contain Iran. Having Hamas form or control a Palestinian regime gives the extremist forces of Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad another card to play.

Even after Hamas's victory became clear, Bush urged President Abbas to "stay in office and work to move the process forward." The president seemed to be proposing that Abbas seek a political blessing from Hamas and a power-of-attorney to continue talks that the radicals denounce as worthless.

That is precisely the wrong direction to take. The Bush administration and other governments should do nothing to obscure for the Palestinians the consequences of their actions at the ballot boxes on Wednesday. It would not be effective diplomacy or politics to cushion the Palestinians from those consequences.

The world should not move backward 20 years, to the time when diplomats moved heaven and earth to coax grudging and obscure statements from Yasser Arafat acknowledging Israel's right to exist. That effort led to Israel's 1993 decision to install Fatah in command of the Palestinian territories in return for Arafat's unfulfilled installment-plan promise to make peace.

That history suggests there is little to be gained now from trying to induce Hamas into reasonable-sounding rhetoric or from trying to keep afloat an Abbas administration that has just been repudiated. Clarity counts in this election's aftermath.

The United States, Israel and the European Union should deal with any government that emerges from fair and free elections, including one led by Hamas. Not to do so would, among other things, make a mockery of Bush's campaign to stabilize the Middle East by spreading democracy there.

But those dealings should be carefully circumscribed. They should be conditioned on the ability of foreign powers to channel most of their economic aid to nongovernmental Palestinian organizations that contribute to democratic reform and improved security in Palestinian society. Fatah's going into opposition, rather than joining a faux coalition with Hamas, would facilitate this.

The administration has succeeded in making Iran's actions -- not U.S. policy -- the issue in the conflict over that country's nuclear ambitions. Washington should strive to do the same with Hamas.

The pain of enduring refugee status, of occupation and of betrayal by their own has left many Palestinians believing they have nothing more to lose. Hamas deserves the chance to show them how wrong they could be.

Hamas At The Helm (NYT)

By Fotini Christia And Sreemati Mitter

The New York Times, January 27, 2006

Nablus, West Bank

THE crescent has risen. The militant Islamic group Hamas won an astonishing 76 of 132 seats in the Palestinian legislative elections this week. The United States and the European Union must finally recognize Hamas's ascendance as a fait accompli.

Until now, these key third parties have equivocated: they pressed Israel to allow Hamas to participate in the elections but threatened to cut aid and ties to a Hamas-dominated Palestinian Authority. The practical reality, however, is that Hamas is a pivotal player in Palestinian politics, and no peace process can succeed without at least the tacit acceptance of its leaders. Moreover, Hamas's participation in Palestinian politics is not necessarily a bad thing, and resisting it will very likely do more harm than good.

As a political party, Hamas revealed itself to be disciplined, pragmatic and surprisingly flexible. It fielded well-regarded candidates, including doctors and academics. In some cases, Hamas aligned itself with independents once affiliated with the secular Fatah party. And although the Hamas charter calls for the destruction of Israel and the liberation of Palestine "from the river to the sea," the party's campaign manifesto made no mention of these goals.

Instead, when asked about making peace with Israel, Hamas representatives offered nuanced, if evasive, answers. As Ziad Daiah, a Hamas representative in Ramallah, told us: "We are not interested in the Oslo-type peace process that went on for 10 years and wasted time. But if Israel will start new negotiations, with direct benefits for Palestinians in a useful time frame, we will accept that."

Judging from the thousands of green posters plastered around the West Bank and Gaza, external matters like the peace process were not central to Hamas's electoral agenda. Rather, its campaign focused on popular concerns like fighting corruption, establishing good governance and restoring the rule of law. Hamas's victory speeches have emphasized the need to revamp public services.

To be sure, we should be careful not to read too much into Hamas's electioneering. The Hamas charter retains poisonous language toward Israel, and the group has yet to renounce its views on the place of violence in the Palestinian resistance. And Hamas's Islamist agenda continues to alarm many secular Palestinians, even those who welcome its entry into politics.

Still, Hamas statements indicate that these attitudes are not set in stone. As Mohammed Ghazel, a Hamas leader in Nablus, told the Israeli newspaper Ha'aretz, "The charter is not the Koran." And Hamas has done more than any other armed faction to honor the truce that President Mahmoud Abbas brokered in February. Although Israel continues to arrest its members, Hamas has done little to retaliate. Such restraint might have been an electoral strategy, but it still proves that if the incentives are right, Hamas can hold its fire.

In any case, the United States and Europe cannot trumpet democratic ideals abroad and then ignore the popular will of Palestinian voters, 78 percent of whom turned out for this election. Refusing to engage with Hamas, however skeptical one may be of its intentions, will only further legitimize the party; it could even give rise to violence. Moreover, cutting off aid to the Palestinian Authority, which is already in a fiscal crisis and enormously dependent on foreign aid, could bankrupt it, further destabilizing the region.

Hamas has indisputably become the force to be reckoned with in Palestinian politics. Even Israel seems to have awakened to this reality. A radio reporter recently asked Shimon Peres, the former Israeli prime minister, about negotiating with Hamas. "We are not fighting against a name," he said. "We are fighting against a situation. If the situation changes, then what difference does a name make?"

If the Israelis are contemplating engagement, it's time the Americans and Europeans did, too.

Growth Is Shown In Durable Goods; Jobs Look Positive (WSJ)

By Jeff Bater

The Wall Street Journal, January 27, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Orders to the nation's factories for big-ticket goods finished 2005 strongly, while jobless claims rose last week but remained at a level indicating healthy job growth.

Durable-goods orders climbed 1.3% in December to a seasonally adjusted $228.14 billion, the third straight increase, the Commerce Department said. Demand was higher for airplanes, machinery, cars and capital goods.

"The durable-goods report for December was extremely strong," said Stephen Stanley, an economist at RBS Greenwich Capital Markets. "The headline rise of 1.3% was decent, but some of the underlying statistics were even more impressive."

Orders for nondefense capital goods excluding aircraft, for instance, went up 3.5%. November demand climbed 0.2%; a previous estimate had orders that month falling by 2.1%. The category is an important gauge of business spending.

Read the complete text of Thursday's economic reports and analysis from Briefing.com: • Durable-goods orders -- Commerce Department1; Briefing.com2

• Initial jobless claims -- Labor Department3; Briefing.com4

Transportation orders advanced 1.9%. Machinery demand rose 6.5%. Commercial-plane orders sank 8.1%; however, the mild drop followed a 139% surge in November. December orders for military aircraft jumped 30.8%. Demand for motor vehicles and parts rose 6.6% last month. Orders fell 1.1% for computers and electronics, 2.2% for primary metals, and 2.8% for electrical equipment.

Separately, the Labor Department reported that the number of workers filing new claims for unemployment benefits climbed by 11,000 to a seasonally adjusted 283,000 in the week ended Jan. 21.

The four-week moving average of initial jobless claims fell 10,750 to 288,750 from 299,500 the previous week. The moving average is at its lowest level since an identical average in the week ended July 1, 2000.

With three jobless-claims numbers below 300,000 in the past four weeks, "it is beginning to look as though there has been a real improvement in the labor market at the start of this year, though we still have reservations about the reliability of the seasonal adjustments at this time of year," said Ian Shepherdson, chief U.S. economist at High Frequency Economics in Valhalla, N.Y.

Nonfarm-payroll employment rose by 108,000 jobs last month and 305,000 jobs in November. That is an average of more than 200,000 a month, a pace seen as quite healthy.

Rising Profit Forecasts Send Shares Sharply Higher (NYT)

By Bloomberg News

The New York Times, January 27, 2006

Stocks rose the most in three weeks as Caterpillar, Honeywell International and Lockheed Martin increased profit forecasts.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average and the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index had their biggest gains since fourth-quarter earnings reports began. A government report showing that orders for durable goods rose more than forecast contributed to their advance. Phone companies rallied as sales at AT&T and Verizon Communications beat analysts' estimates.

The S.& P. 500 rallied 9.15 points, or 0.7 percent, to 1,273.83 for its biggest advance since Jan. 6 and third gain in the last four days. The Dow industrials climbed 99.73 points, or 0.9 percent, to 10,809.47, the biggest rise since Jan. 3. The Nasdaq composite index rose 22.35 points, or 1 percent, to 2,283.

Some disappointing earnings reports pressured stocks earlier this month when the reporting period began, but that concern subsided this week as the picture began to brighten with reports from Dow members like United Technologies and McDonald's.

Not all results yesterday were stellar.

Stock in General Motors dropped after the company reported its first annual loss since 1992. Juniper Networks suffered its worst drop in five years after a sales forecast disappointed and analysts downgraded the shares.

Caterpillar and Honeywell were the two biggest gainers in the Dow average. Caterpillar, the world's No. 1 maker of earth-moving equipment, rose $3.10, to $65.17. The company raised its 2006 per-share profit forecast to $4.65 to $5, from an earlier estimate of $4.52 to $4.91.

Shares of Honeywell, the world's largest maker of aircraft cockpit controls, added $1.35, to $37.41, after the company said it expected 2006 per-share earnings of $2.40 to $2.50 on greater demand for commercial aircraft. It had previously forecast profit of $2.35 to $2.50 a share.

Lockheed gained $1.98, to $66.99. The company increased its forecast for 2006 earnings to $4.50 to $4.75 a share, from $4 to $4.25.

The Commerce Department said orders for durable goods, items made to last at least several years, increased 1.3 percent, to $228 billion, in December. Economists expected an increase of 1 percent. The results were led by the biggest increase in business equipment demand since August.

AT&T, reporting its first results since the company was created by the combination of SBC Communications and AT&T, said revenue expanded 25 percent, to $21.6 billion, including its wireless unit. Net income more than doubled.

AT&T added 30 cents, to $25.51, and Verizon climbed 30 cents, to $31.68.

Microsoft said after the close that revenue this quarter would be $10.9 billion to $11.2 billion and per-share earnings would be 32 cents to 33 cents. Shares of Microsoft, which said fiscal second-quarter profit rose 5.5 percent, added as much as 40 cents, to $26.90, in extended trading.

Chipotle surged to $44 from its offering price of $22. Chipotle and McDonald's together sold 7.88 million shares. Chipotle has 489 stores that sell burritos, tacos and salads and was acquired by McDonald's in 1998. McDonald's lost 22 cents, to $34.94.

G.M. fell 80 cents, or 3.4 percent, to $23.05, the worst performance by companies in the Dow industrials. The company had a fourth-quarter loss of $4.78 billion and was unprofitable on an annual basis for the first time in 13 years amid rising health care costs and the lowest market share in the United States since 1925.

Bond prices fell, with the 10-year Treasury bill falling 11/32, to 9927/32, and the yield, which moves in the opposite direction from the price, rising to 4.52 percent, from 4.48 percent late Wednesday.

Dow Surges 99.73 As Strong Reports Push Stock Investors To Think Positive (WSJ)

By E.s. Browning

The Wall Street Journal, January 27, 2006

Stocks resumed their rebound after last week's swoon, as strong profit reports and upbeat economic news spurred hopes for corporate performance this year.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average surged 99.73 points, or 0.93%, to 10809.47. That's up almost 1% for 2006, but the blue-chip average still isn't back to 10880.71, where it stood before last Friday's 213-point decline. Trading activity again was heavy.

"The market really is bouncing around," said Andy Brooks, head of stock trading at Baltimore investment-management firm T. Rowe Price. "This was a day when the market chose to focus on the good news and not worry about some of the negatives -- like the situation in Iran or Nigeria," or how many more times the Federal Reserve will raise interest rates.

Caterpillar and Lockheed Martin turned in strong quarterly profits and raised their forecasts. December orders for durable goods were strong, and last week's new unemployment claims came in lower than expected.

In news that could affect trading today, Microsoft released quarterly results after regular trading hours, including a slightly improved forecast for sales and profits. Microsoft rose 1.9% in after-hours trading.

During regular hours, the economic news helped small stocks and transportation stocks, which are especially susceptible to the economy's health. The Russell 2000 small-stock index surged 1.68% to a record close of 728.48, up 8% this year.

News that China's economy surpassed France and Britain to become the world's fourth-largest encouraged the talk of strong growth.

The gains came despite oil's 41-cent rise to $66.26 a barrel, and a 3% drop in General Motors, which reported a large quarterly loss.

DOJ_NMG_0012521

Treasury-bond prices fell again on worries that the government budget deficit will force the issuance of more bonds, and that the strong economy will induce the Fed to raise rates more than had been expected.

The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index rose 0.72%, or 9.15 points, to 1273.83, up 2.1% for 2006. The Nasdaq Composite Index advanced 0.99%, or 22.35 points, to 2283, up 3.5% this year.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks rose; bonds fell. The 10-year Treasury note fell 10/32, or $3.13 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield up to 4.515%. The 30-year bond was down 20/32 to yield 4.695%.

The dollar strengthened. The currency rose to 116.41 yen from 115.71 yen, while the euro fell against the dollar to $1.2213 from $1.2245.

Chairman Moved A Nation (WP)

By Nell Henderson

The Washington Post, January 27, 2006

Government leaders, Wall Street analysts and academics have heaped accolades on Alan Greenspan as he prepares to step down as Federal Reserve chairman Tuesday, leaving behind a strong economic expansion, tame inflation and low unemployment after more than 18 years of adjusting the nation's interest rates.

But Greenspan, 79, also leaves a remarkable political legacy, say Republican and Democratic policymakers who have worked with him in Washington over nearly four decades.

From his days working on Richard Nixon's 1968 presidential campaign to his congressional testimonies last year, Greenspan has helped candidates, presidents and lawmakers devise and sell policies on countless social and economic issues. An avowed "free-enterpriser," Greenspan consistently pushed for less government regulation, smaller federal budget deficits and freer trade, these observers said. Early on, he helped move the federal government to play a smaller role in the U.S. economy than was commonly accepted in the 1960s and 1970s.

However, as Greenspan has indicated in public and private comments, his years in political life also taught him that compromise is necessary to preserve both capitalism and democracy. Over time, Greenspan helped forge several deals that strengthened the government's hand or extended its reach.

"Alan has had, mostly behind the scenes, a tremendous impact on government policy" over the last 40 years, said former president Gerald R. Ford in a December interview. Ford appointed Greenspan chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers in 1974.

Long before becoming Fed chairman in 1987, Greenspan played key roles in ending the nation's military draft, rescuing New York City from near-bankruptcy and temporarily saving Social Security from insolvency. Since taking the helm of the central bank, he helped persuade Congress to approve President Bill Clinton's 1993 budget and President George W. Bush's 2001 tax cut. He urged Congress last year to create private Social Security accounts, reduce the deficit and resist calls to erect new trade barriers.

"Alan Greenspan has probably been a key player in more Republican presidential campaigns and Republican party platforms and Republican administrations than any other economist in the country," said Martin Anderson, a senior fellow at the Hoover Institution who worked in the Nixon and Reagan administrations. "He's a wonderful politician."

Greenspan thrived in the Republican Party because it housed so many like-minded individuals. But Democrats, including President Jimmy Carter, also embraced deregulation in the 1970s; Clinton, in the 1990s, supported free trade and deficit reduction, declaring the era of big government over.

In the process, "the political impact of [Greenspan's influence] has probably been to push the Democrats more to the center on fiscal policy," said investment banker Felix G. Rohatyn, a Democrat who served as Clinton's ambassador to France.

The Fed chairman declined to comment for this article.

Greenspan took his first steps into politics in 1968 when Anderson asked him to join Nixon's presidential campaign. Greenspan helped coordinate domestic policy research and analyze poll data, writing computer programs to project the electoral vote count.

Greenspan had met Anderson years earlier when both formed part of the intellectual circle of novelist Ayn Rand, a Russian emigre whose writings celebrated laissez-faire capitalism. Three of the essays in Rand's 1967 book "Capitalism: The Unknown Ideal" were authored by Greenspan, then the 41-year-old president of an economic consulting firm in New York City.

"Chronic deficit spending [is] the hallmark of the welfare state," the future Fed chairman wrote. "The welfare state is nothing more than a mechanism by which governments confiscate the wealth of the productive members of a society to support a wide variety of welfare schemes."

For Greenspan, the Nixon campaign offered a chance to influence the candidate's policies. Early on, though, Greenspan could be politically naive as he promoted his libertarian ideals: Nixon ignored his advice to end farm subsidies, for example. But he also scored some successes: Candidate Nixon called for the end of the military draft, as Anderson and Greenspan had recommended.

After Nixon was elected in 1968, Greenspan served on the president's Gates Commission, convened to study the possibility of creating all-volunteer armed forces. Greenspan considered the draft a form of involuntary servitude and voted along with the rest of the panel to end it, contributing to its demise in 1973.

By the summer of 1974, when the Watergate scandal was at full boil, the president needed a new chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers. Greenspan accepted the nomination but had not been confirmed by the Senate when Nixon resigned in August. But President Ford quickly resubmitted the nomination, and Greenspan moved full time to Washington for three years.

From the start, Ford recalled, "Alan was at the forefront" of his administration's efforts to free the economy from government interference by deregulating the airline, trucking and railroad industries and dismantling wage and price controls imposed during the Nixon administration.

Ford said he valued Greenspan's technical expertise but also his "feeling for the country as a human being," which the former president credited to the economist's experience touring the country in his youth as a musician in a swing band.

"That background was invaluable in his judgment on the economy," Ford said. "It wasn't all just academic theory. He understood the practicality of the economy."

When New York City verged on bankruptcy in 1975, Ford's cabinet was divided over the city's request for financial assistance, the former president remembered: Some officials wanted to give the city money and others opposed any government bailout. Ford said Greenspan and Fed Chairman Arthur F. Burns solved the impasse by proposing a compromise -- a package of federal loans that would be fully repaid over time -- that helped stabilize the city's finances.

Greenspan could be politically tone-deaf on occasion when speaking to the public. At a conference in September 1974, the new CEA chairman was jeered when he said Wall Street brokers were being hurt the most by high inflation, in terms of the percentage of income eroded. He later apologized.

But his advice was well received by presidents and other policymakers because they valued his cool analysis, discretion and refusal to candy-coat bad news, said Justin Martin, the author of a Greenspan biography. "He has a gravitas about him . . . that has made people in power very comfortable with him."

Greenspan served as an economic adviser to Ronald Reagan's 1980 presidential campaign. After his election, Reagan asked Greenspan to co-chair a commission to develop proposals for rescuing Social Security. Greenspan's panel hammered out a bipartisan deal to raise payroll taxes and gradually lift the retirement age.

On the commission, Greenspan displayed his instincts for compromise and a canny grasp of politics. In congressional testimony last year, he recalled how closely he worked with Robert M. Ball, a Social Security expert appointed to the commission by the Democratic House Speaker Thomas P. "Tip" O'Neill Jr. As the panel worked on each issue involved, Greenspan would run the various options by Reagan and his Chief of Staff James A. Baker III, while Ball would float them through his own back-channel to O'Neill. In that way, the panel knew, step-by-step, which proposals would be acceptable to both sides.

"What came out was essentially the commission report pre-agreed to by the speaker of the house and . . . President Reagan," Greenspan said during his testimony.

He and Ball also crafted a pact on how to handle the House Ways and Means Committee's hearing on the report. "I said to Ball, 'When the Republicans ask you a question, I will answer it, and I hope you will answer the questions that the Democrats ask me.' And it worked remarkably well."

DOJ_NMG_0012523

It was during the Nixon, Ford and Reagan years that Greenspan worked with the officials who later would elevate him to become Fed chairman in 1987, replacing Paul A. Volcker.

The Fed's main job is to keep inflation and unemployment low by adjusting interest rates -- acting independently of the White House or Congress.

During the administration of President George H.W. Bush, from 1989 through 1992, Greenspan resisted White House pressure to keep interest rates lower than he thought necessary. Bush later blamed Greenspan for his electoral loss to Clinton in 1992.

Greenspan had smoother relations with Bush's Democratic successor. In early 1993, the Fed chairman lent critical support to Clinton's deficit-reduction plan -- even though it included tax increases -- describing it on Capitol Hill as "a very positive force for the American economy." The package passed with no Republican votes, but Greenspan's public backing helped win some dearly needed Democratic ones, recalled Rep. Barney Frank (D-Mass.).

During the mid-1990s, Greenspan worked closely with Clinton's economic team in crafting responses to financial crises in Mexico, Asia, Russia and elsewhere -- even when those efforts occasionally required government influence on the markets -- and drumming up support for them on Capitol Hill and elsewhere.

By early 1995, Greenspan's political influence was so great that House Majority Leader Newt Gingrich asked him to call conservative talk show host Rush Limbaugh to explain the Clinton administration's plan to rescue Mexico, which was close to defaulting on its debts. Gingrich supported the plan, which the Fed chairman had helped design, but congressional Republicans were balking.

"I was looking for ways to get the conservative community to understand. . . . Rush is a leading communicator to 14 to 15 million conservatives," Gingrich recalled in an interview. Greenspan "is the leading economic policy analyst in the U.S. and arguably the world."

The Fed chief reluctantly made the call. Even so, Congress refused to back the plan, forcing the administration to take a different approach that didn't require lawmakers' approval.

Meanwhile, as the economy boomed in the late 1990s, unemployment fell, stock prices soared and the federal budget deficits turned into surpluses.

"The Clinton administration had huge successes carrying out the economic policies essentially fathered by Alan Greenspan and [Clinton Treasury Secretary Robert E.] Rubin, and they see that as an enormous feather in their hat," Rohatyn said.

Greenspan then argued for several years that the White House and Congress should "let the surpluses run" to pay down the government's debt rather than cut taxes or raise spending.

So many Democrats were outraged in January 2001, when Greenspan urged Congress to cut taxes, lending a key political boost to President George W. Bush's tax cut proposal. Critics charged that Greenspan had become too partisan for a Fed chief; others saw him simply reverting to his anti-government ideology.

But Greenspan believed the surpluses would continue and suggested that policymakers design "triggers" to scale back the tax cuts if deficits reemerged. Congress later passed a reduced form of Bush's tax cut without such provisions.

After the budget swung back into deficit in 2001 and more tax cuts followed, Greenspan repeatedly supported making the temporary tax cuts permanent -- one of the Bush administration's top policy goals -- while cutting spending.

Greenspan's influence on Capitol Hill has waned since 2001, as the political parties have grown bitterly divided over economic policy, leaving them less open to compromise. Lawmakers did not follow his advice last year to create Social Security private accounts, or to cut Social Security and Medicare commitments to future retirees -- positions that Democrats adamantly oppose. Nor did they heed him and adopt stricter budget controls -- which the White House and congressional Republicans reject.

But lawmakers of both parties continue to quote his ideas and arguments and seek his support for their positions. And he plans to offer his opinions after he leaves the Fed by giving speeches, writing a book and creating a new Washington-based consulting firm, Greenspan Associates, friends say.

And as Greenspan said in a speech earlier this year, "In the broad sweep of history, it is ideas that matter. Indeed the world is ruled by little else."

Democrats Ride Momentum Into Mid-term Election (WP/REU)

By John Whitesides, Political Correspondent

The Washington Post, January 27, 2006

WASHINGTON (Reuters) - Democrats are riding a wave of momentum into November's high-stakes battle for the U.S. Congress, with high hopes for significant gains that could threaten Republican control of the House and Senate.

Republicans enter the campaign after the toughest stretch of President George W. Bush's presidency, fueled by an unpopular war in Iraq, economic uncertainty, political scandals and Bush's low approval ratings.

But despite the favorable political mood for Democrats, analysts say the party faces major hurdles to gaining the six Senate and 15 House seats needed to reclaim control of Congress.

To win majorities, Democrats need to capture most of a small pool of competitive seats in the House while bumping off at least five Republican Senate incumbents -- tough tasks in any political climate, but not impossible.

"It looks like the Democrats will gain seats in the House and Senate, but the question is how many. Is it going to be a Democratic tide or a Democratic tsunami?" asked Larry Sabato, a political analyst at the University of Virginia.

"It is going to be hard for Democrats, but if the situation continues to deteriorate for Republicans this year anything is possible," he said.

Democratic majorities in Congress would allow them to control the legislative agenda and put the brakes on many of Bush's policy initiatives, while even small gains would increase their clout in Capitol Hill battles over issues like judges, taxes and national security.

The best chance for a Democratic breakthrough could be the Senate, where 33 of 100 seats are on the ballot. Republicans hold 15 of those seats and Democrats 18, but five of the most endangered incumbents at this stage are Republicans.

The open Tennessee seat of retiring Republican Bill Frist is also on the Republican endangered list, while Democrats face a battle defending the open Minnesota seat of retiring Mark Dayton.

Democrats also must defend open seats in Maryland and the Vermont seat of retiring and Democratic-leaning independent Jim Jeffords, along with incumbents Bill Nelson in Florida, Ben Nelson in Nebraska, Maria Cantwell in Washington, Robert Byrd in West Virginia and Debbie Stabenow in Michigan.

"Before they go after our incumbents they are going to have to defend their own. These open seats certainly offer an opportunity," said Sen. Elizabeth Dole of North Carolina, head of the Senate Republican campaign committee.

The toughest and highest-profile race of the year could be in Pennsylvania, where Santorum, the third-ranking Republican in the Senate, badly trails Democratic challenger Bob Casey Jr.

DEMOCRATS NEED SWEEP

"The Democrats have to sweep the competitive Republican races to take power, while holding all of their own. That's tough," said Jennifer Duffy, an analyst for the nonpartisan Cook Political Report.

"That means they have to win the open seat in Tennessee and beat five Republican incumbents. The last time five incumbents lost was 1986," she said.

Burns has become ensnared in the growing corruption investigation involving Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff, which Democrats use as a prime example of the Republican "culture of corruption" in Washington.

Also caught up in the explosion of scandals is former House Republican Leader Tom DeLay of Texas and former House Administration Committee Chairman Bob Ney of Ohio, who both face tough re-election races.

The public so far is not blaming either party for the scandals, polls show, but they crave a change in Washington and favor Democrats on most issues, with the major exception of national security and the war on terrorism.

DOJ_NMG_0012525

"There is an anti-incumbent mood out there and Republicans are the ones who will bear the brunt of it," said Senate Democratic campaign committee spokesman Phil Singer.

On the House side, redistricting after the 2000 census safeguarded incumbents across the country and reduced the number of competitive districts to a few dozen. The Cook Report lists only 28 House districts that are toss-ups or somewhat competitive, with Republicans defending 18 and Democrats 10.

Republicans say that will force Democrats to score a near sweep of competitive districts if they want to reclaim power. They are counting on the races turning on local issues rather than national trends.

"People don't go into a voting booth and pull the Bush lever or the anti-Bush lever or the Republican lever, they vote for a person," said House Republican campaign spokesman Carl Forti.

"So you have to make a case to the constituents of a district why their incumbent needs to be fired, and being from the same party as Tom DeLay or George Bush isn't enough."

Mass. Gov. Mitt Romney Speaks About 2008 Election (LEXHL)

By Steven Thomma

Lexington Herald-Leader (KY), January 27, 2006

WASHINGTON - Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, a possible candidate for the 2008 Republican presidential nomination, said Thursday that his Mormon faith would not matter to the vast majority of voters, including the evangelical Christians who influence his party's politics greatly.

``Americans want people of faith to lead their country,'' he said during a lunch interview with reporters in Washington. ``Republicans aren't going to be putting a litmus test against people of my faith,'' he added.

Romney also said that his views on abortion have evolved since he refused to take either a pro-choice or pro-life label during his 1994 campaign against Sen. Edward Kennedy, R-Mass.

``I'm in a different place today than I was 12 years ago,'' he said.

He said personal research about embryonic stem cells convinced him that life begins at conception. He said the Supreme Court should send the power over abortion back to the states by overturning the 1973 Roe v. Wade decision that legalized it nationwide.

Still, he said, he would support legalized abortion in his state if his state so chose.

Romney, a first-term governor who has announced that he will not seek a second term, refused to say whether he will seek his party's nomination in 2008. But his appearance before the Washington press corps gave him a chance to address some of the potential problems that would face his campaign, the same venue that Bill and Hillary Clinton used in 1991 to introduce themselves to the national political press corps.

Romney appeared before the group years earlier with his father, who died in 1995. Former Michigan Gov. George Romney was a leading contender for the 1968 Republican nomination until he said he had been ``brainwashed'' by the Pentagon into supporting the Vietnam War. Richard Nixon won the nomination and the presidency.

Some excerpts from Romney's interview Thursday:

On how Americans will respond to his Mormon faith:

``First of all is the great majority of Americans and the great majority of people in my own party who frankly couldn't care less what someone's religion is. I mean I'm from a state, Massachusetts, that's what, 50-55 percent Catholic, and frankly couldn't care less what religion I am. And that's the overwhelming majority of people in the country.

``Then there's a small group that, frankly, all things being equal, they'd just as soon not vote for a Mormon. There have been some polls that show that ranges between 11 and 17 percent or some numbers like that. But it's a small slice of people who'd just as soon not vote for a Mormon, all things being equal. .

``All things aren't equal though. People are different. When my dad ran for president in 1968, people looked at him, they looked at his record, they looked at his vision, they looked at his beliefs. Americans want people of faith to lead their country.

DOJ_NMG_0012526

``And they took the whole package and they said, well, all things being equal I wouldn't vote for a Mormon…but all things aren't equal and I like that guy George Romney. And that's why he was so popular and why he led in the polls until he got brainwashed.

On how his faith will be greeted by Evangelical Christians, who have great influence in Republican politics:

``Members of my faith vote Republican more than any other faith in America. Republicans aren't going to be putting a litmus test against people of my faith.''

On his view of abortion since he ran for the Senate in 1994 and refused to say he was either pro-choice or pro-life:

``I'm in a different place today than I was 12 years ago.

``Then came the stem-cell research debate in Massachusetts. And I got more involved in the issue of when human life begins. I'm not talking about from the religious standpoint. I'm talking about from the medical and scientific standpoint. …

``Where do I draw the line? …The line is at conception. Life, a scientific point, begins at conception. I don't know when the soul, if you're religious, when the soul enters the body. My religion doesn't teach that, doesn't have an opinion on it.

``I know when you take a sperm and an egg and put them together…it is alive and it is human. …So it's human life.''

< On the Supreme Court overturning Roe v. Wade:

``My preference would have been and would be today for the court to say each state could be able to adopt its own policy with regards to abortion and choice.

``We would have been better off had each state been able to develop their own policy.

``That way a state like mine, Massachusetts, would be overwhelmingly pro-choice and I as governor would do exactly as I have committed. I'm not going to change the laws. You've chosen pro-choice, it's a democratic society, you've chosen it, I'll keep it in place.

Romney Says Clinton Likely 2008 Nominee (AP-Y2)

By Andrew Miga

AP2, January 27, 2006

Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, a Republican considering a run for the White House, says he expects New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton to be the 2008 Democratic presidential nominee.

"I think the most likely to get the nomination, of course, is Hillary Clinton," he said during a Christian Science Monitor-sponsored luncheon with reporters on Thursday.

As for his own prospects, Romney brushed aside suggestions his Mormon faith could be a handicap if he seeks the GOP nomination.

"The great majority of Americans ... couldn't care less what my religion is," he said. He noted he has won support in Massachusetts, a state with many Catholic voters, and said religion did not hamper his father George Romney's 1968 presidential candidacy.

The governor predicted the Jack Abramoff corruption scandal would not cripple Republicans as they try to keep control of the House and Senate in next fall's midterm elections.

"The idea that money has influence in politics is not a headline story in major parts of the country," he said.

Romney has made recent trips to key presidential caucus and primary states such as Iowa and New Hampshire.

The Christian Science Monitor, January 27, 2006

Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney appeared at a Monitor-sponsored lunch Thursday and opened some distance between himself and the Bush administration on the war in Iraq and the Medicare prescription drug benefit.

Romney announced last month that he is not running for reelection, a move widely analyzed as a preliminary step toward a bid for the 2008 Republican presidential nomination.

"There are plenty of places where I would separate from the administration," Romney told a roomful of reporters, "where I might have chosen another course ... certainly with regard to the war in Iraq or the front in Iraq - were there mistakes made there? Absolutely. Would I have done it differently? Of course. Would the president have done it differently based on what he knows today? Of course, in some measure."

For example, Romney said he would not have rested the whole case for the war in Iraq on finding weapons of mass destruction. He added, " There will certainly be occasions to recognize that no administration is omniscient and that there are places where we will disagree on policy."

Romney was also critical of the process by which the Republican-controlled Congress and President Bush produced a precription drug benefit under Medicare, the so-called Part D of the program. "The final product on Medicare Part D, that final bill was sort of sausage squared, the idea you don't want to see how sausage is made," Romney said.

The issue of Medicare Part D "is a complicated one," Romney said. He noted that President Bush "wanted to bring prescription coverage to seniors. He got that done, that's huge.... It has with it a financial burden which is very large. I don't imagine that that was what he was aiming for when he thought about this during his campaign."

Romney said, "I would have hoped to do it differently, I would have hoped to include within the additional prescription benefits certain reforms to Medicaid, Medicare, and our entire healthcare system to be able to pay for a very helpful prescription drug benefit."

Romney downplayed the impact his Mormon faith would have on evangelical Republican voters. "First of all the great majority of Americans and the great majority of the people in my own party ... frankly couldn't care less what someone's religion is," he said. The Bay State governor said there was "a small group," which he placed at 11 to 17 percent of the voters, "would just as soon not vote for a Mormon" but would if they liked an individual candidate. "Those two groups together are 98 or 99 percent of the electorate and then there is this very small slice, and boy, they will not vote for a Mormon no matter what," he said.

Stuart Rothenberg, editor of the Rothenberg Politcal Report, wrote in the current issue of the newspaper Roll Call that Romney's membership in the Church of Latter-day Saints "is certain to raise questions (and concerns) that will give many Republican caucus attendees and primary voters a reason not to support the governor. That would be a considerable handicap for a politician who begins with other liabilities."

Romney displayed flashes of self-deprecating humor, which is not always politicians' favorite variety. He said he had asked his wife if in her wildest dreams she had thought he would be addressing prominent groups. He said her response was, "Mitt, you were not in my wildest dreams."

Governor Romney's life story is an inspiring riches-to-riches tale. The son of auto executive and Michigan Gov. George Romney, Mitt attended the Cranbrook School in Bloomfield Hills, Mich. He graduated near the top of his class at Brigham Young University, and then picked up diplomas from both Harvard Law and Business Schools.

After Harvard, Romney pursued a business career. He founded Bain Capital, gave Ted Kennedy a scare during the 1994 Senate race, and in 1999 took over as head of the winter Olympic Games in Salt Lake City. Mr. Romney ran for governor of the Bay State in 2002. Last month, he announced he would not be a candidate for reelection, freeing him to learn more about the wonders of ethanol in Iowa and to articulate a passionate defense of New Hampshire's innate right to have the first primary in the nation.

The Washington Post, January 27, 2006

Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney (R) put some distance yesterday between himself and the Bush administration on the issue of health care, criticizing the White House for failing to demand significant reforms in Medicare and Medicaid when Congress enacted a prescription drug benefit for senior citizens.

With an eye on a 2008 presidential campaign, Romney spent an hour over lunch with reporters in Washington talking about his evolution on the issue of abortion (from once eschewing labels to now calling himself "pro-life"), whether his Mormon religion will hurt him if he runs for president (only with a tiny percentage of the electorate, he said), his management style (heavy on analysis) and health care for all citizens, which is a top priority of his back home.

The new prescription drug plan has gotten off to a rocky start, with many states having to step in to pay for drugs for seniors who have been denied coverage because of bureaucratic bungling. Romney said the benefit is well deserved -- but so is the criticism. His complaint is that the administration created a new and costly entitlement program without exacting changes aimed at holding down costs.

"I would have hoped to do it differently," he said at the media gathering, sponsored by the Christian Science Monitor. "I would have hoped to include within the additional prescription benefit certain reforms to Medicaid, Medicare and our entire health care system to be able to pay for a very helpful prescription benefit. . . . It's a new entitlement program, and I would have wanted to finance that entitlement with reforms and changes and adjustments in the overall program."

Romney also dealt with some Washington controversies. On the debate over President Bush's warrantless surveillance program: "I expect the president to live by the law, and I presume he has." On whether the lobbying scandal will damage Republicans in November: "The idea that money has influence on politics is not a headline story in major parts of the country."

Toward the end he was asked about 2008, Iraq, and the possibility that he and Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) might end up as rivals. "Do you fantasize about that?" he was asked.

"Not about that, no," he replied to laughter. Referring to his wife, he said: "I told Ann that I was coming here to speak to you today, and I said 'Sweetheart, in your wildest dreams, did you ever see me coming here and speaking to this group?' and she said 'Mitt, you weren't in my wildest dreams.' " That sounded like a line GOP audiences are likely to hear repeatedly over the next few years.Ney Doesn't Shy From Reelection Bid

If there was any doubt that Rep. Robert W. Ney (R-Ohio) would allow certain inconvenient subjects in the news to force him from a reelection bid, it is over: He made a formal announcement last night in Dover, Ohio. He is expected to make a similar pronouncement today in Chillicothe -- not coincidentally, the home town of his likely Democratic foe in November.

"2006 promises to be a vigorous campaign, and I am ready for the fight," Ney told a local newspaper Wednesday.

He will almost certainly get it, given the barrage of recent disclosures that federal prosecutors are targeting Ney for his suspected role in doing favors for disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff in exchange for lavish trips and campaign contributions.

In Abramoff's plea agreement, Ney was the lone member of Congress mentioned. Ney has repeatedly denied any wrongdoing. He temporarily stepped aside as chairman of the House Administration Committee earlier this month at the urging of House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.). Despite the Republican tilt of Ney's sprawling east-central 18th District, Democrats believe his Abramoff woes have handed them a golden takeover opportunity. Chillicothe Mayor Joseph P. Sulzer and lawyer Zack Space are seeking the Democratic nomination and will face off in May 2 primary.Candidate Fires Staffer for Comment

Foot-in-mouth disease has claimed another victim -- this time in Pennsylvania's Republican gubernatorial primary.

Former lieutenant governor Bill Scranton (R) fired his campaign manager Wednesday after the man accused former Pittsburgh Steeler Lynn Swann (R), who is black, of being the "rich white guy" in the race.

Scranton said the remarks by James Seif "in no way whatsoever reflect my views or those of my campaign." Both Scranton and Seif are white.

Public polling shows Swann, a Hall of Fame wide receiver for the Black and Yellow from 1974 to 1983, with a lead over Scranton in the primary. Swann is also running even or ahead of Gov. Edward G. Rendell (D). If elected, Swann would be the Pennsylvania's first black governor.

Republican Cox Won't Re-enter N.Y. Race (PHI)

By Marc Humbert

The Philadelphia Inquirer, January 27, 2006

ALBANY, N.Y. - Edward Cox, a son-in-law of the late President Richard Nixon, said Thursday he would not resume his campaign for the Republican nomination to challenge Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton's re-election bid this year.

DOJ_NMG_0012529

The Manhattan lawyer suspended his campaign in October after Republican Gov. George Pataki endorsed then-Westchester County District Attorney Jeanine Pirro's bid for the Senate nomination. Her campaign subsequently collapsed and Pirro heeded the call of state GOP leaders to run instead for state attorney general.

However, Cox said in a statement issued Thursday that "after careful consideration of the circumstances and conditions as they exist surrounding the race, including the now shortened time frame available to run an aggressive and effective campaign , I will not seek my party's nomination."

Last week, in an impromptu interview with The Associated Press, Cox said one condition for re-entering the race was a solid endorsement from Pataki. The governor subsequently made it clear no such endorsement would be forthcoming in the near future.

Advisers said the October suspension of the campaign left Cox at a disadvantage for fundraising and becoming well known across the state to credibly take on an opponent of Clinton's celebrity.

Polls have shown the former first lady, a potential candidate for the 2008 Democratic presidential candidate, far ahead of her potential GOP competition in her bid for a second, six-year Senate term.

In addition to Spencer, the GOP Senate nomination is being sought by William Brenner, an even less well-known tax attorney from Sullivan County.

Spencer, calling Cox "a good guy," said Thursday he now expected GOP leaders to rally behind his candidacy, although Spencer also said he had not asked Pataki for his backing and didn't know if he would get it.

"He's not really shown an interest in this race as far as I'm concerned, except when he popped his head up there briefly for Jeanine Pirro and even that wasn't that strong an endorsement," Spencer said. "I would like to have everybody's endorsement, including the governor's, but whether I get it or not doesn't alter my plans."

Meanwhile, Democrats teased Republicans about the situation, noting that a whole host of well-known GOP politicians, including former New York City Mayor Rudolph Giuliani and Pataki, had refused to run against Clinton.

"Note to the New York state Republican Party: Don't despair, you may not have to settle for John Spencer just yet," said a statement issued by Democratic Party spokesman Blake Zeff. "There are still about a dozen registered Republicans left in New York who you haven't asked yet."

Lawyer Says He Won't Run For Clinton's Seat (NYT)

By Jennifer Medina

The New York Times, January 27, 2006

ALBANY, Jan 26 — Edward F. Cox, a Manhattan lawyer and a son-in-law of President Richard M. Nixon, declared Thursday that he would not run for the Senate this year, even though Republicans had been courting him anew to challenge Hillary Rodham Clinton.

The announcement from Mr. Cox ended the prospect of a dynastic clash pitting Mrs. Clinton, a former first lady, against Mr. Cox, who is married to Mr. Nixon's daughter, Tricia.

In a statement, Mr. Cox said that "after careful consideration of the circumstances and conditions as they exist surrounding the race, including the now shortened time frame available to run an aggressive and effective campaign, I will not seek my party's nomination."

Mr. Cox's exit is yet another blow to Republican efforts to mount a credible challenge to Mrs. Clinton, whom many expect to run for president in 2008. His decision seemed to leave John Spencer, a former mayor of Yonkers, as the party's most likely challenger. Mr. Spencer entered the race in the summer, and he has never backed off his bid, despite reports that Republican leaders were looking for other candidates.

Mr. Cox's decision ended a tortured series of deliberations that had him first telling friends early last year that he intended to challenge Mrs. Clinton. In October he pulled out after Gov. George E. Pataki said he would endorse Jeanine F. Pirro's bid to unseat Mrs. Clinton. After Ms. Pirro left the race last month to run for attorney general, some state Republican leaders asked Mr. Cox to reconsider challenging Mrs. Clinton.

The Democrats, perhaps emboldened by Mrs. Clinton's hefty campaign war chest and large lead in the polls, were quick to poke fun at the opposition on Thursday. In a press release, they called Mr. Spencer the "eighth choice" and listed several other Republicans who had been pressed to run for office, including former Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani.

"Note to the New York State Republican Party: Don't despair, you may not have to settle for John Spencer just yet," said the statement by Blake Zeff, the state Democratic Party spokesman. "There are still about a dozen registered Republicans left in New York who you haven't asked yet."

The chairman of the state Republicans, Stephen J. Minarik III, said that the party "had numerous candidates go through the system, and it looks to be that we're headed to John Spencer being the candidate."

Kevin Collins, a campaign manager for Mr. Spencer, characterized the campaign by paraphrasing Gandhi.

"First they ignore you, then they laugh at you, then they fight you, then you beat them," Mr. Collins said. "They won't be underestimating John Spencer for long."

Episcopalians Weigh Sainthood For Marshall (WP)

By Caryle Murphy

When Thurgood Marshall died 13 years ago this week, he left behind a life of historic accomplishments: Intrepid warrior against Jim Crow. Architect of the landmark Brown v. Board of Education desegregation case. First black Supreme Court justice.

Now, some of Marshall's fellow Episcopalians are saying that the spiritual hallmark of his life -- his Christian commitment to racial justice -- qualifies him for special recognition. They think the Episcopal Church should name him a saint.

Delegates to the annual convention of the Episcopal Diocese of Washington will vote today on the proposal, the first step in a long process. If Marshall is added to the church's roster of saints, May 17 -- the date of the 1954 Supreme Court ruling that segregated schools are unconstitutional -- would be observed as Marshall Feast Day.

Church officials say they expect the 300 or so delegates to approve the resolution, which was drawn up by members of St. Augustine's Church in Southwest Washington, where Marshall worshiped.

"I haven't heard anyone say it's a bad idea," said Jim Naughton, spokesman for Bishop John Bryson Chane, who will preside at today's assembly at Washington National Cathedral.

When it comes to sainthood, Episcopalians follow a looser procedure than the Roman Catholic Church, which conducts a rigorous investigation into the life of any saint-to-be and requires proof that he or she performed at least two miracles. Candidates for Episcopal sainthood should be figures who displayed traits such as "heroic faith," "joyousness" and "service to others for Christ's sake," according to church guidelines.

Although Marshall did not speak publicly about his faith, it meant a great deal to him, said his widow, Cecilia Marshall, 78, who plans to be present when the resolution comes up for a vote.

"I believe if it weren't for his faith, he wouldn't have accomplished as much as he has," she said.

Marshall, who died of heart failure on Jan. 24, 1993, at the age of 84, was a lifelong Episcopalian. Born in Baltimore to a Pullman car porter and a schoolteacher, he graduated from Howard University's law school in 1933.

The great-grandson of a slave, he spent 30 years traveling the South, filing lawsuits on behalf of the NAACP's Legal Defense and Educational Fund. On at least three occasions, he was threatened with lynching.

In 1938, Marshall joined St. Philip's Church in Harlem while living in New York. After President Lyndon B. Johnson named him solicitor general in 1965, he and Cecilia moved to the District and joined St. Augustine's.

In written testimonies accompanying the resolution, Episcopalians say Marshall revealed his faith in his work.

"The Spirit working through this man gave him an intuitive sense of justice in which he saw all of life as sacred and all persons equal before God," wrote the Rev. William S. Pregnall, former rector of St. Augustine's.

If the Washington delegates vote to make Marshall a saint, the resolution will need to be approved by two consecutive national conventions. The next national convention will be in June, and the one after that, in 2009.

The names of such saints are entered in a liturgical text called the Book of Lesser Feasts and Fasts -- "lesser" because these are not the primary feast days of the liturgical year, such as those dedicated to the Apostles.

"We're declaring [as saints] people who've given great Christian witness and played a unique role in the life of the church," said the Rev. Bruce Eberhardt, who wrote the resolution with his wife, Janet. "We don't pray to them. . . . It's very different from the Roman Catholic Church."

As far as miracles, Eberhardt added, "we think the miracle of Thurgood was turning this country around, changing the way we are."

One possible obstacle is that the national convention is considering a resolution stating that people should not be considered for sainthood until 50 years after their death.

"We're hoping we can argue that just as Martin Luther King Jr. has been in this book for some time now, Marshall deserves equal ranking," Eberhardt said.

Eberhardt, a retired priest and a member of St. Augustine's, said that a former rector of that parish, the Rev. John Talbott, tried to have Marshall named a saint in 1994, but "people thought it was too early [after his death] to make this move."

Talbott urged Eberhardt to try again, and the vestry at St. Augustine's approved the effort in May.

Cecilia Marshall said she felt "humbled and honored" by the proposal to name her husband a saint. She added that she had no role in the effort, "except to give my approval."

Her husband "never thought of himself as a saint," she said, noting that he declined several times to see the stained-glass window dedicated to him in San Francisco's Grace Cathedral. "He never went to look at it. He felt he just wasn't worthy of it."

She added: "I used to kid my husband. I said, you better go and look at it; that's the closest you'll ever get to heaven."

Bush And China Endorse Russia's Nuclear Plan For Iran (NYT)

By David E. Sanger And Elaine Sciolino

WASHINGTON, Jan. 26 — President Bush and the Chinese government both declared their full support on Thursday for a Russian proposal to allow Iran to operate civilian nuclear facilities as long as Russia and international nuclear inspectors are in full control of the fuel.

Mr. Bush's explicit public endorsement puts all of the major powers on record supporting the proposal, even as most acknowledge that it is a significant concession to Iran and runs the risk that the country will drag out the negotiations while continuing to produce nuclear material. Yet officials say they believe it is the best face-saving strategy to pursue a negotiated settlement with Iran.

European and American officials familiar with the details of the offer that Russia made to Iran say that Iran would continue to be allowed to operate its nuclear plant at Isfahan, which converts raw uranium into a form that is ready to be enriched. That is a step that both Europe and the United States said last year that they could not allow — and that was explicitly barred under the agreement between Iran and Europe in late 2004, because Iran could divert the uranium to secret enrichment facilities. Iran began operating the Isfahan plant again in August.

Mr. Bush did not discuss the details of the Russian offer. But American, European and Russian officials, who like others discussing the issue spoke on the condition of anonymity because they did not want to be seen as interfering in the negotiations, said the offer would allow Iran to continue operations at the plant that turns yellowcake, a concentrated form of uranium ore, into uranium hexafluoride, a toxic material that centrifuges spin into fuel for reactors or bombs.

Critics of that concession say that it could send a signal to Iran that it no longer has to comply with all provisions of its November 2004 agreement with Europe.

"A red line was crossed" when Iran began producing the uranium last fall, said David Albright, president of the Institute for Science and International Security, a nonpartisan research group that follows developments in Iran. "The Iranians got away with reopening the conversion facility, and now people have accepted it's never going to be shut again and have taken it off the table."

Mr. Bush made his statement embracing the Russian idea at a news conference on Thursday. He said, "The Iranians have said, 'We want a weapon.' "

DOJ_NMG_0012532

In fact, Iran has denied that it is pursuing a weapon, and in the afternoon, the White House spokesman, Scott McClellan, acknowledged that Mr. Bush had misspoken.

"He was referring to their behavior," Mr. McClellan said by telephone later. "Our concern is their intention is to develop a nuclear weapon under the guise of a civilian program."

Nonetheless, Mr. Bush's slip may cement the perception among some members of the board of the International Atomic Energy Agency that he has decided, at least in his own mind, that Iran is intent on building a weapon as fast as it can, a situation he has said repeatedly that he will not tolerate. Mr. Bush gave no hint on Thursday that he was thinking of military action, instead saying that "we are working hard to continue the diplomacy necessary to send a focused message to the Iranian government, and that is: 'Your desires for a weapon are unacceptable.' "

Mr. Bush's statement came at a moment of heightened concern in Vienna, home of the agency, that if its board votes next week to send Iran's case to the United Nations Security Council, Iran might make good on its threat to limit cooperation with inspectors and begin full scale enrichment of uranium. North Korea threw out inspectors three years ago, and one senior American official said recently that "the Iranians have looked closely at that model."

The Russian proposal lays out a complicated plan in which Iran would supply the uranium hexafluoride from Isfahan, shipping it to Russia for enrichment. Once enriched, the uranium would be shipped back to Iran's nuclear plant in Bushehr, which is being built by the Russians.

But huge questions remain, including the scale of the program, the degree of involvement of Iranian engineers and program's commercial viability. Moreover, just working out a deal this complex would take months or longer, experts say, at a time the administration fears the Iranians could surge ahead.

In interviews, Russian and European officials said they believed the arrangements, while face-saving, made no economic or technological sense for Iran. Iran would have to pay for the enrichment, but its own scientists would not be allowed to work on the site.

Moreover, there are technical problems. Russian officials, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because they were in the middle of negotiations, said that the uranium gas produced at Isfahan was of inferior quality to what was produced in Russia. As a result, the Russians have no interest, they say, in buying any of its for their own use.

In an interview in Vienna on Wednesday, Gregory L. Schulte, the American ambassador to the atomic agency, said, "There are those who would argue that conversion is not proliferation-significant because it does not produce weapons grade material, but from our perspective, conversion is another step forward to acquire enrichment capability. It has no economic purpose."

While China favored the Russian proposal, it also firmly opposed the use of sanctions. That comes as a disappointment to Washington, which this week sent a top official to persuade China's leaders that they should do far more.

During a visit to Beijing by Ali Larijani, Iran's top nuclear negotiator, Kong Quan, China's Foreign Ministry spokesman, praised Moscow's offer to enrich Iran's uranium in Russia and made clear that China will not support sanctions. "We think the Russian proposal is a good attempt to break this stalemate," Mr. Kong said, adding, "We oppose impulsively using sanctions or threats of sanctions to solve problems."

The Bush administration has not allowed its stated opposition to Iran's uranium conversion at Isfahan to block the Russian offer. "This is dangerous, but it is minimally acceptable as long as they are not enriching," said Mark Fitzpatrick, a senior fellow at the International Institute for Strategic Studies in London. "The Russian proposal is the last best chance of resolving this without an escalation."

U.S. Comments on India Clarified

India responded testily yesterday to American suggestions of a quid pro quo in its blossoming relations with the United States, with the Indian foreign secretary calling in the United States ambassador over his reported remarks about how India should vote next week on whether to refer the case of Iran's nuclear ambitions to the United Nations Security Council.

David C. Mulford, the American ambassador to India, had been quoted by the Press Trust of India news agency as saying that if India did not vote to refer Iran to the Security Council, it would be "devastating" to its chances of securing the nuclear deal with the United States.

The American Embassy later said that the comments had been taken "out of context" and released a full transcript. In it, Mr. Mulford first said that India would be expected to vote "based on India's judgment of its own national interest."

He went on to say, "that if they decide that they don't want to vote for this, our view is that the effect on members of Congress with regard to this civil nuclear initiative will be devastating."

Rice Says Iran Is 'feeling Heat' (REU)

Reuters, January 27, 2006

WASHINGTON (Reuters) -- Iran is "feeling the heat" of international pressure over its nuclear program and Washington will insist the issue be formally referred to the U.N. Security Council, U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said on Thursday.

In an interview with Reuters, Rice showed little patience with Iran's belated interest in a Russian compromise proposal that would keep the case out of the Security Council.

"I think that says something about the role of (international) pressure in this process. It shows the Iranians are feeling the heat," she said.

The Iranians are "doing nothing but trying to throw up chaff so that they are not referred to the Security Council and people shouldn't let them get away with it ... The time (for a formal referral) has come," she added.

Iran and China expressed support on Thursday for a Russian compromise proposal to resolve Tehran's standoff with Western governments which suspect it of secretly planning to build a nuclear bomb (Full story).

Tehran has previously shown little interest in the idea, intended to ensure it does not covertly divert enriched fuel toward a weapons program. It has repeatedly insisted it has no plans to build bombs but has the right to enrich uranium fuel on its territory for nuclear power generation.

Iran's apparent change of heart, coupled with backing from major power China, raised the possibility that a Feb. 2 meeting of the U.N. nuclear watchdog -- the International Atomic Energy Agency -- could once again delay a decision on referral to the Security Council, which could impose sanctions.

Many countries are reluctant to push a confrontation with Iran, a major oil producing state which has threatened to stop cooperating with IAEA inspectors if the referral goes forward.

Separately, the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, John Bolton, said on CNN: "The Iranians have been very effective in using their oil and natural gas to persuade China, India and other countries to their side. We have to correct that."Emergency meeting

The IAEA board of governors is to discuss Iran at an emergency meeting Feb. 2-3 in Vienna.

Aiming to avoid a showdown, Russia has suggested that instead of a formal referral to the Security Council, the IAEA board could just ask the council to discuss the Iran issue and then send it back to the IAEA.

But this informal move carries less legal weight and would mean the council could not consider sanctions.

The IAEA board had previously found Iran in non-compliance with its non-proliferation obligations but delayed sending the issue to the Security Council, while giving more time for European-led negotiations to proceed.

Since then, negotiations collapsed, Iran broke seals on nuclear facilities under IAEA monitoring and declared it would resume sensitive nuclear enrichment activities, which could give it fuel for a bomb.

"The time for talking outside the Security Council is over," Rice said.

She indicated the first step in the Security Council would be a president's statement showing united international support for Iran to resume a freeze on enrichment.

Rice refused to predict how quickly the United Nations might move to sanctions, saying "we'll take this one step at a time."

But she stressed that great care would be taken to avoid sanctions that target the Iranian people, as opposed to government leaders. As an example, she said Iranian soccer players should not be banned from the 2006 World Cup in Germany.

Even officials and experts who support Security Council referral worry that opposition by veto-wielding Russia and China could ultimately thwart any council action, undermining non-proliferation beyond Iran.

But Rice said she was unable to say Russia and China would not ultimately back punitive action against Iran because both consider Iran's nuclear ambitions a "very serious issue."

China Backs Talks In Iranian Standoff (WP)

By Edward Cody

The Washington Post, January 27, 2006

BEIJING, Jan. 26 -- China endorsed a Russian compromise proposal for breaking the stalemate over Iran's nuclear program Thursday and joined Iran's visiting nuclear negotiator in calling for patience and more discussions on the Russian idea.

The Chinese stand, issued during talks with Ali Larijani, secretary of Iran's Supreme National Security Council, suggested that the idea of having Iran send uranium to Russia for enrichment might become the common denominator of an agreement on preventing the Iranian government from developing nuclear weapons, rather than the sanctions envisioned by the Bush administration.

"We oppose impulsively using sanctions or threats of sanctions to solve problems," the Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesman, Kong Quan, told reporters at a regular briefing.

Deputy Secretary of State Robert B. Zoellick had urged the Chinese leadership on Tuesday to join the United States and other nations in taking urgent steps to make sure Iran does not expand its nuclear research program into weapons production. China agrees that Iran should not have nuclear weapons, he said afterward, but differs with Washington over how to prevent it and how fast a solution has to be found.

Without mentioning the United States or its European allies directly, Quan urged other countries to pursue a solution to the crisis through more negotiations, and said China's leaders view the Russian suggestions as a good place to start. Larijani, at a news conference later, said that, in this regard, the views of China and Iran were "very close."

"The Russian idea is fruitful, but it needs to be discussed more, and we are in the process of this negotiation," he said, adding that another round of talks had been scheduled with Russia for mid-February.

"It needs to be considered in a broader package," he added. "There are different aspects around this idea. . . . So we need to be patient."

The United States, France and Britain have said they are running out of patience. They have urged the International Atomic Energy Agency, at an emergency session scheduled Feb. 2, to refer the Iranian nuclear standoff to the U.N. Security Council, which could impose sanctions or some other form of warning.

Since then, however, President Bush has hailed the Russian suggestion as a promising compromise. And on Thursday at the World Economic Forum in Davos, Switzerland, the head of the IAEA, Mohamed ElBaradei, said Moscow's plan could offer "the beginning of a solution," according to the Reuters news agency.

In Washington on Thursday, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said the time for referral had come. "The Iranians are doing nothing but trying to throw up chaff . . . and people shouldn't let them get away with it," she said in an interview with Reuters.

The foreign ministers of the five permanent Security Council members -- the United States, Britain, Russia, China and France -- plan to gather Monday in London, along with Germany, to lay groundwork for the IAEA decision.

The crisis atmosphere swelled this month when Iran removed U.N. seals on equipment that can be used to enrich uranium. The Iranian leadership repeatedly has said it has no intention of making weapons but retains the right under international conventions to enrich uranium for nuclear energy production.

Larijani has said that if the IAEA does refer Iran to the Security Council, Iran will take the next step and begin enriching uranium, in effect moving from research to making what could become weapons material. Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki has warned that such a step would prompt Iran to halt cooperation with the IAEA, including its surprise checks at nuclear research sites.

Against that background, Russia offered its compromise proposal, saying Iran could send its uranium to Russian facilities for enrichment to make sure none is diverted into weapons production.

China, which has veto power in the Security Council, traditionally has shied from the use of sanctions in international disputes. But Chinese analysts predicted that China would likely abstain in a vote on sanctions, seeking to maintain its good relations with Washington.

57% Back A Hit On Iran If Defiance Persists (LAT)

DOJ_NMG_0012535

By Greg Miller

The Los Angeles Times, January 27, 2006

WASHINGTON — Despite persistent disillusionment with the war in Iraq, a majority of Americans supports taking military action against Iran if that country continues to produce material that can be used to develop nuclear weapons, a Los Angeles Times/Bloomberg poll has found.

The poll, conducted Sunday through Wednesday, found that 57% of Americans favor military intervention if Iran's Islamic government pursues a program that could enable it to build nuclear arms.

Support for military action against Tehran has increased over the last year, the poll found, even though public sentiment is running against the war in neighboring Iraq: 53% said they believe the situation there was not worth going to war.

The poll results suggest that the difficulties the United States has encountered in Iraq have not turned the public against the possibility of military actions elsewhere in the Middle East.

Support for a potential military confrontation with Iran was strongest among Republican respondents, among whom 76% endorsed the idea. But even among Democrats, who overwhelmingly oppose the war in Iraq, 49% supported such action.

In follow-up interviews, some respondents said they believed Iran posed a more serious threat than Saddam Hussein's Iraq did.

"I really don't think Saddam had anything to do with terrorism, but Iran, I believe, does," said Edward Wtulich, of Goshen, N.Y. He was among the 1,555 adults who participated in this week's survey, which has a margin of sampling error of plus or minus 3 percentage points. "Iran has been a problem, I think, for years," Wtulich said, "and we've known about it."

Wtulich, a registered Democrat and retired manager for the New York City Housing Authority, said he supported taking a hard line with Iran despite the strain of the Iraq war on the U.S. military.

"It makes me scared," he said, "but we may not have a choice."

Experts said the public's views on Iran appeared to have hardened in part because of the more aggressive anti-Western posture of Iran President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad. Elected last year, he has riled the international community with remarks denying the Holocaust and with declarations that Iran will defy European and U.S. pressure and continue to pursue efforts to enrich uranium.

His comments have fostered an impression of him as "very reckless, a real rogue, as opposed to simply a populist," said political science professor John Mueller of Ohio State University, who is an authority on wartime public opinion.

Mueller said that Americans' rising support for confronting Iran was "impressive," especially considering their misgivings about the war in Iraq, and that their support suggested "concerns about the new president." But he added that poll respondents are often more inclined to voice support for military intervention when the question is framed broadly and the potential for casualties is unclear.

"You always get higher support for things like 'military action,' because that could just mean bombing, as opposed to sending troops or going to war," Mueller said.

Poll respondents expressed a strong preference for the United States working with allies to fight international law violations or global aggression.

Iran has insisted its nuclear program is solely for energy production. But the United States and other Western governments suspect Iran's program is aimed at developing weapons.

European nations that have negotiated with Iran over its program want the matter referred to the United Nations Security Council. Iran has indicated it might be open to a compromise in which Russia would provide enriched uranium to Iran, for use exclusively in energy reactors.

The American public's position on Iran appears to have hardened over the last year, a period marked by an increasing international focus on Iran's nuclear program. When a similar question was asked in a Times poll last January, 50% favored military action against Iran.

Regarding Iraq, the latest poll shows that although most Americans remain disenchanted with the war, opinions have stabilized, at least for now. The percentage saying they believe the situation in Iraq was not worth going to war over dipped slightly, to 53%, compared with 56% in a survey a year earlier.

When asked who was winning the war in Iraq, 33% said the United States, 7% said the insurgents, and 55% said neither side was winning.

Americans remain divided over how long U.S. forces should stay in Iraq: 40% believe the United States should remain in Iraq for "as long as it takes," 36% want U.S. troops withdrawn within a year, and 14% support immediate withdrawal.

Respondents were also divided, largely along party lines, over whether the Iraq war is really part of Washington's war on terrorism; 51% say it is, 46% say it is not. President Bush has repeatedly cast Iraq as the central front in the war on terrorism. But many of his administration's prewar claims about Iraq's ties to Al Qaeda have turned out to have been overstated or based on unreliable intelligence sources.

The poll also found that 32% of Americans believed that terrorism around the world had increased because of the Iraq situation, 17% believed it had decreased, and 47% believed the problem was about the same.

U.N. Official Hopeful For Iran Nuke Plan (AP)

By Edith M. Lederer

The Associated Press, January 27, 2006

DAVOS, Switzerland — U.N. nuclear chief Mohamed ElBaradei said Thursday he was hopeful that a Russian proposal could help break the standoff over Iran's nuclear research and enrichment plans.

Speaking at the World Economic Forum's annual meeting, ElBaradei said he was happy that earlier in the day Iran's top nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani, said Russia's proposal to move Iran's enrichment program to Russian territory was "a positive one."

ElBaradei said he also was encouraged that all parties still were discussing a diplomatic solution. His comments came amid quickening diplomatic negotiations ahead of a crucial Feb. 2 meeting of his International Atomic Energy Agency, which could refer the issue to the Security Council.

Britain, France and Germany have been leading efforts to get Iran to abandon uranium conversion and enrichment activities, which it refuses to do. The three countries declared that negotiations had reached a dead end two days after Iran broke U.N. seals at a uranium enrichment plant Jan. 10 and said it was resuming nuclear research after a two-year freeze.

"We need Iran to use maximum transparency because there are a lot of question marks about its program," ElBaradei said. "They need to be assured that they can use nuclear power for electricity, but the international community needs to be assured that the Iran program is exclusively for peaceful purposes."

Pakistan President Gen. Pervez Musharraf said at the forum Thursday that Iran should not be allowed develop nuclear weapons, but he did not say if the country should face economic sanctions.

"Their security is not threatened," Musharraf said of Iran during a discussion on Islam. He said his own country had nuclear weapons because it maintained a balance of power with neighboring India.

"When a nuclear threat was posed to us we had to set the balance right again," he said. "Every country has a right to defend its security if its security is threatened."

As for Iran developing nuclear weapons, he said that if the country felt its security was threatened, "they would have the right to go nuclear."

The European Union on Thursday urged Iran to accept the Russian offer as a way to defuse the standoff with the international community.

"The Russians have made a very reasonable suggestion," Austrian Chancellor Wolfgang Schuessel said at a joint press conference with French Prime Minister Dominique de Villepin.

Because of concerns about Iran's nuclear intentions, ElBaradei said Thursday, "Iran probably needs to go through a rehabilitation period by which it will accept that it will not engage in enrichment on Iran territory while at the same time make sure that they get what they need for their own peaceful purpose."

"And that's why the Russian proposal is a very attractive proposal," he said.

At the moment, many people are trying to use "the maximum of diplomacy," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0012537

The question being debated right now is whether to go to the Security Council at the beginning or end of February or this month, he said.

But even the Europeans and Americans, who want Iran referred to the council now, want the Security Council "to do a new phase of diplomacy," he said.

"Everybody's still talking about diplomacy and I'm very hopeful that as long as we talk about diplomacy, as long as we're not talking about enforcement measures, sanctions, et cetera, we are on the right track. But we need to accelerate the process," ElBaradei said.

Iran alleged Thursday it had information that the United States, Britain and Israel had a role in two deadly military plane crashes in the last two months.

It was the latest accusation by Tehran against the West in their sharpening confrontation. A day earlier, Iran blamed the United States and Britain for two bombings this week that killed at least nine people in southwestern Iran.

Interior Minister Mostafa Pourmohammadi said the crashes of a C-130 and a Falcon plane were "done by their design, or maybe electronic interference."

Pourmohammadi did not elaborate and did not offer any evidence.

Not Exactly 20/20 (WP)

By Al Kamen

The Washington Post, January 27, 2006

"We've taken our lumps over the last year," he began, according to his House Web site. "Morale is low within our Conference and among our strongest supporters," he said. "It's time to bounce back," Boehner exhorted them, saying, "We need to identify a vision."

"That vision doesn't have to be achievable in the foreseeable future," he explained. But if it's "powerful enough and the commitment to it great enough, it might even come true."

For example, Boehner says, " President Reagan left the White House with America much as he hoped it would be in that first inaugural address. The Nazis were defeated. And in August 1989, Poland became free."

Boehner's eloquent appeal echoes Bluto Blutarski 's historic 1978 speech rallying his disconsolate frat brothers in "Animal House." John Belushi , playing the legendary Blutarski, urged the Deltas to stand up against rich preppie tyranny:

"Over? Did you say 'over'?" Belushi shouts. "Nothing is over until we decide it is! Was it over when the Germans bombed Pearl Harbor? Hell, no!"U.S., Iran Not Poles Apart

Administration officials scrambled yesterday to come to grips with the radical Hamas's stunning election victory in Palestinian elections. President Bush rejected dealing with a party that has an armed wing and vows the destruction of Israel .

But there's precedent for a more optimistic view in the long run. Take, for example, U.S. relations with Iran's President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad . He advocates nuking Israel and is allegedly developing his own bombs.

Even so, Washington has discovered there are always ways to work together, to find common ground. For example, human rights groups Monday condemned a U.S. move "back[ing] an Iranian initiative to deny United Nations consultative status" in the Economic and Social Council to gay rights organizations.

Well, gotta start somewhere.Afta NAFTA

News yesterday was that Washington and Seoul were on the verge of closing a free trade agreement and, if they could do so, the South Korean trade minister would come here Sunday to make plans for an official ceremony Thursday. If it happened, we were told, it would be the biggest free trade deal since NAFTA.

But why the "ifs"? We thought this was all locked up. After all, a noon announcement on Wednesday from Brown Lloyd James, the Korean PR folks in New York, said, "U.S.-Korea Free Trade Agreement Reached."

Four hours later, a "correction statement" came by: "The information sent regarding the . . . agreement was written in preparation and sent in error. It was NOT authorized by the Korean Embassy, and any discussion at this stage about the U.S.-Korea Free Trade Agreement is premature."

We really mean it, they said in a follow-up "correction statement" about an hour later. "The information . . . was not correct."

Fugghedaboudit. Don't even think about it. Not only is "discussion unwarranted," the new release said, but "any speculation . . . is premature."Warrantless Redactors

Government censors are deeply worried about ensuring that they black out "sensitive" information from official documents. This is information that could harm national security or, much worse, could embarrass administration officials by showing preposterous stupidity or mis-, mal- and nonfeasance.

Not to worry. The National Security Agency has put out the equivalent of a "Dummies Guide to Censorship" to make sure voters never find out your boss's misdeeds. It's "Redacting with Confidence: How to Safely Publish Sanitized Reports Converted from Word to PDF."

NSA warns that you've got to be careful about scrubbing data that might be hidden. For example, hidden data in the White House's "Strategy for Victory in Iraq" in December showed it was written by a Duke political science professor who had concluded that people would support the war, despite fairly heavy casualties, as long as they believe it will ultimately succeed.

The NSA report, according to Government Computer News, gives step-by-step instructions to make sure the public never sees such highly classified information.

Mexico Nixes Border Maps For Migrants (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, January 27, 2006

Mexico canceled plans yesterday to distribute 70,000 border maps with safety instructions and tips to migrants aiming to cross illegally into the United States, but denied that the decision was a reaction to criticism by Bush-administration officials.

The National Human Rights Commission (NHRC) in Mexico City said it "rethought" the decision after human rights organizations in several border states said the maps would show anti-immigration groups -- and watchdogs such as the Minutemen volunteers -- where the migrants were likely to travel.

The NHRC maps would have provided details to migrants about the terrain, cell-phone coverage and the location of water stations set up by the U.S. charity Humane Borders.

"This would be practically like telling the Minutemen where the migrants are going to be," said NHRC spokesman Miguel Angel Paredes. "We are going to rethink this, so that we wouldn't almost be handing them over to groups that attack migrants."

Much of the Mexican media have accused the Minutemen of attacking illegal aliens on the border, accusations that have not been substantiated and have been denied by Minutemen organizers. The Mexican government has described the volunteers as vigilantes, as has President Bush.

Mr. Paredes said the commission's decision was not a response to U.S. pressure, adding, "We have not taken that into account."

On Wednesday, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said the department opposed "in the strongest terms" the publications of maps "to aid those who wish to enter the United States illegally. ... It is a bad idea to encourage migrants to undertake this highly dangerous and ultimately futile effort."

State Department spokesman Sean McCormack also said the United States would "take whatever steps it deems necessary to protect its own borders."

The NHRC had planned to distribute 70,000 maps beginning in March, mostly in border towns and villages, as well as bars and restaurants frequented by migrants. The commission said they were intended to save lives by noting the estimated time it would take to walk or drive to nearby cities, places where migrants have died in the past and the location of water stations and emergency beacons.

Hundreds of migrants, mostly Mexican nationals, die every year trying to cross the desert illegally into the United States, mostly through Arizona.

The NHRC cited the Minutemen as a sign that anti-immigrant extremism was on the rise in the United States. The civilian Minutemen group set up observation posts in Arizona in April and from California to Texas in October to report illegal aliens to the U.S. Border Patrol.

Minuteman co-founder Chris Simcox said the NHRC's decision demonstrated the effectiveness of the "peaceful, law-abiding actions by Minuteman volunteers" to secure the nation's borders.

"The Mexican government ought to be ashamed that their policies drive their citizens to risk death in the Arizona desert trying to escape their country," he said. "Rather than giving away maps to help their citizens flee, the government of Mexico should dedicate itself to making Mexico a country their citizens can be proud of and want to live in."

Mr. Simcox denied accusations that Minutemen had attacked anyone, instead pointing to life-saving rescues by the group of nearly 200 aliens abandoned in the desert by human traffickers.

"The maps the Mexican government released will still be used by the Minutemen to determine where we set up our observation posts along the southern U.S. border," he said. "Those maps are not just aids for illegal aliens simply seeking to escape Mexico; they are also road maps for terrorists who seek to enter the United States to murder Americans."

The NHRC was created 17 years ago by the Mexican Interior Ministry as the General Human Rights Department. The name was changed a year later and in 1999, the NHRC became fully independent of the government.

Piracy Fight Strains U.S.-China Ties (WSJ)

By Murray Hiebert

The Wall Street Journal, January 27, 2006

BEIJING, China -- China and the U.S. traded barbs over Beijing's failure to respond to Washington's request for details about Chinese efforts to combat piracy, in a development that could exacerbate already testy bilateral trade relations.

U.S. trade officials said China missed a Jan. 23 deadline set by Washington to get information on how Beijing has sought to rein in rampant piracy, including any penalties it has imposed on violators. Chinese authorities, for their part, have challenged Washington's right to make such a request under World Trade Organization rules.

The tiff could prompt the U.S. Congress to press the administration of President George W. Bush to take its case against China to the global trade body, and it cast a cloud over the planned visit to America by Chinese President Hu Jintao in April, U.S. businessmen in Beijing said.

"It is critical for China to prepare a meaningful response to avoid creating unnecessary tension" with the U.S., said James Zimmerman, vice chairman of the American Chamber of Commerce in Beijing.

China's alleged failure to crack down on widespread counterfeiting and violations of intellectual-property rights by its companies are major irritants in Sino-U.S. trade relations. U.S. industry associations say such practices cost foreign software and movie companies and other copyright holders billions of dollars each year.

The U.S. Trade Representative's Office had requested details about China's crackdown efforts in the autumn under pressure from Congress that it get Beijing to toughen up on its enforcement of what is called IPR. Under WTO rules, a member may ask other members about their IPR policies if the requesting country has reason to believe that the others' policies are affecting its rights under the global body's IPR regulations.

On Tuesday, U.S. officials said in Washington that China responded by challenging Washington's right under WTO rules to demand this information from Beijing. In a Dec. 22 letter from the Chinese ambassador to the WTO that American officials made public, China said it was still willing to cooperate with the U.S. on its WTO commitments. When Beijing joined the WTO in December 2001, it committed to try to stamp out IPR violations.

Reuters quoted one U.S. official as saying that if Washington doesn't get "a substantive response [from China] in short order," it was "running out of options, short of WTO litigation."

Chinese Commerce Ministry officials Thursday declined to comment on the dispute. Mei Xinyu, a researcher at the Academy of International Trade and Economic Cooperation, a ministry think tank, said WTO regulations "only allow a member country to request such information, but there is no legal obligation on other countries [to answer], not to mention [to respond by] a deadline."

DOJ_NMG_0012540

Courts in China have recently made several high-profile rulings against IPR violators. Last month, a judge in Shanghai ruled against a Chinese company that had adopted the Chinese name of U.S. coffee chain Starbucks and a similar logo. This month, another court ruled against a Chinese company selling candies resembling Ferrero Rocher's gold foil-wrapped chocolates.

Still, Chinese authorities admit they have a long way to go in winning the war against piracy. Pirated DVDs as well as luxury-brand clothing and accessories are widely on sale from street vendors and in shopping centers in Beijing.

Chinese officials say one problem is that many state agencies are responsible for overseeing intellectual-property laws, complicating enforcement efforts. In addition, local governments often resist efforts to shut factories making counterfeit goods in their jurisdiction because of the jobs those generate.

Reuters, January 27, 2006

President George W. Bush vowed on Thursday to uphold U.S. law and continue a crackdown on North Korea for counterfeiting American dollar bills.

"There is no compromise ... We are going to uphold the law and protect the currency of the American people," he told a White House news conference.

The United States in recent months has cracked down on several firms and a Macau-based bank suspected of involvement in counterfeiting, money laundering and drug trafficking by North Korea.

Pyongyang is believed to earn as much as $1 billion annually from these activities, which U.S. officials say benefit the elite at the expense of an impoverished population.

The communist state has said it would be unthinkable to return to six-country nuclear talks, led by China and stalled since November, when Washington is trying to bring down its rulers with "financial sanctions."

While Bush showed no give on the crackdown on the North's suspected illicit activities, he reaffirmed that "we want the six party talks to continue ... I think the framework is a framework that can eventually yield to a political settlement of the issue."

Rice Says US Ready To Resume Six-party Talks (REU)

By Sue Pleming

Reuters, January 27, 2006

In an interview with Reuters, Rice said North Korea must address U.S. concerns over illicit financial dealings and that this issue must not be tied to the resumption of talks, which have been stalled since last November.

North Korea has said it would be unthinkable to return to talks aimed at getting Pyongyang to drop its nuclear programs while Washington imposed what amounted to "financial sanctions."

Asked if there was a way to resolve this impasse, Rice said the North Koreans should start "living up to the law."

The suspected illegal activities by the North Koreans, including the counterfeiting of American $100 bills, had to be addressed by the United States, she said. "He (SEARCH

News | News Photos | Images | Web" /> President George W. Bush) has to defend the currency," Rice said.

In a news conference on Thursday, Bush vowed to continue a crackdown on North Korea for counterfeiting American currency. "There is no compromise," he said.

The United States has in recent months acted against several firms and a Macau-based bank suspected of involvement in counterfeiting, money laundering and drug trafficking by North Korea.

Pyongyang is believed to earn as much as $1 billion a year from these activities, which U.S. officials say benefit the elite at the expense of North Korea's poor.

CLEAR TALK

Rice said the United States chief negotiator in the talks had made it very clear during meetings in Beijing this month that Washington wanted the six-party talks to continue.

"No conditions. We will do it immediately," Rice said.

Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill returned from Beijing last week where he met his North Korean counterpart and Chinese officials in an effort to restart stalled talks. The six-party talks also involve Japan, SEARCH

"These talks can get back on track but the North Koreans have got to make a choice that they are ready to come back and they have to come back unconditionally," Rice added.

Hill told Reuters in an interview on Wednesday that North Korea had hinted it might observe international standards on money laundering but he declined to provide any details.

North Korea agreed in principle in September to end its nuclear arms in exchange for aid and security guarantees, but there has been no progress since then. A date has not been set for the resumption of the discussions.

Rice said the goal was to get back to the statement of principles agreed in September as soon possible.

Kim Sung-han, head of North America studies at the Institute of Foreign Affairs and National Security in Seoul, said some policymakers in Seoul would see Rice's comments as meaning a compromise solution was not in the cards now.

"It is going to be somewhat hard to expect the six-party talks will resume early next month, as some had hoped for," Kim said by telephone.

Asked whether she thought increased Chinese and Japanese assistance to North Korea during the U.S. crackdown was interfering with the bid to get Pyongyang back to talks, Rice said both of these countries had been very professional in their handling of North Korea.

"They have been successful in getting the North Koreans to engage in the talks," she said.

Tobacco Firms Trace Fakes To North Korea (WSJ)

By Gordon Fairclough

The Wall Street Journal, January 27, 2006

In Philip Morris USA's ongoing war against counterfeiters, it was a fairly simple operation: Buy a pack of Marlboros from a corner bodega on Manhattan's Upper East Side to follow up on a tip about contraband cigarettes.

But it took until 2005, the year after the pack was purchased, company officials say, before they could trace the artfully counterfeited smokes to one of the world's most isolated countries, North Korea.

The communist nation has become a leading source of counterfeit cigarettes -- with the capacity to churn out more than two billion packs a year, tobacco companies say. Philip Morris, a unit of New York-based Altria Group Inc., says over the past several years it has discovered North Korean-made knockoffs of its Marlboro brand in more than 1,300 places, from New York to Oklahoma City, Seattle and Los Angeles.

Big cigarette companies, facing billions of dollars in lost revenue, have hired former intelligence and law-enforcement officials, recruited informants inside Asian crime syndicates and even sent agents into North Korea in an effort to stem what they say is a flood of illicit exports.

Andre Reiman, a senior vice president of Philip Morris International whose oversees antismuggling programs, said his company is "very concerned to find organized counterfeiting of our products in the Democratic People's Republic of Korea."

The scale of the distribution network -- believed to include fleets of ships owned by global organized-crime groups -- has the U.S. government taking a more active role after years of industry pleas to crack down on counterfeit cigarettes.

U.S. authorities seized more than a billion fake smokes, many allegedly from North Korea, in California last year as part of an undercover operation targeting Asian smugglers. Millions more packs of bogus Marlboros, Mild Sevens and other cigarettes made in North Korea have been confiscated in Taiwan, the Philippines, Vietnam and Belize.

In a little-publicized 2004 case, three Asian men pleaded guilty to conspiring to smuggle counterfeit goods and currency, in connection with a scheme to send fake cigarettes, forged $100 bills and knockoff Cialis, an erectile-dysfunction drug made by Lilly ICOS LLC, into the U.S. The cigarettes, a U.S. official says, were made in North Korea.

The case started when an undercover investigator working for Philip Morris posed as a buyer looking for counterfeit cigarettes, according to papers filed by the government in federal court in Washington last year. The men took the investigator to a cigarette-making plant on the east coast of North Korea. They also offered to sell the investigator forged U.S. currency, prompting Philip Morris to alert the U.S. Secret Service. In all, the men accepted payments of more than $400,000 for counterfeit cigarettes and currency, prosecutors say.

Supplying counterfeit cigarettes has cemented North Korea's ties to crime organizations, giving the country access to a vast smuggling network that could allow it to move almost anything -- from forged U.S. banknotes to weapons -- in or out of the country, U.S. officials say.

"Much more dangerous things than cigarettes can flow along these same routes," warns a senior Bush administration official. "The North Koreans could import technology and export strategic goods and weapons. It's a big deal."

North Korea has long been accused of counterfeiting U.S. currency. In a press conference yesterday, President Bush said the U.S. was moving aggressively to halt Pyongyang's forgers. "When somebody's counterfeiting our money, we want to stop them from doing that," Mr. Bush said.

Washington's efforts, however, have drawn criticism from other capitals, which worry that U.S. moves will keep North Korea from rejoining multilateral talks aimed at ending its nuclear-weapons programs.

North Korea denies it engages in counterfeiting or other illicit acts. Its official news agency said last month that "such illegal activities are unimaginable in the DPRK."

In a report prepared by a consortium of tobacco companies that includes Altria, Japan Tobacco Inc. and

British American Tobacco

PLC, and presented to U.S. authorities last year, investigators said that the North Korean regime could be earning $80 million to $160 million in annual payoffs from smugglers alone.

Those estimates are equal to roughly 8% to 16% of the total value of annual exports of legitimate goods from North Korea, whose economy collapsed after the fall of the Soviet Union. Profits from suspected state-run counterfeiting operations would likely push that number even higher, say tobacco-company executives.

"Counterfeit cigarettes are probably becoming one of their biggest sources of illicit income," says Raphael Perl, an expert on North Korean finances at the Congressional Research Service.

Two developments have helped North Korea establish itself in the fake-smokes business. First, major cigarette manufacturers, sued by the European Union and others for allegedly supplying smugglers with cigarettes in an effort to circumvent taxes, have moved to keep their products out of criminals' hands.

Second, China has moved aggressively to clamp down on cigarette counterfeiting. Rather than engage in a high-stakes game of cat-and-mouse with the Chinese authorities, makers of high-end counterfeits have instead sought refuge in North Korea.

"North Korea is the perfect place," says one tobacco executive. "There's very little scrutiny from outside, and there's no risk of law-enforcement action because it's all sanctioned by the state."

One of the main hubs of counterfeiting activity, the tobacco companies say, is Rajin, a run-down port city on North Korea's east coast. More than a decade ago, Pyongyang decided to turn the area into a free-trade zone as part of a United Nations-backed effort to spur economic development in the impoverished communist country and its neighbors.

Many of the cigarette factories in Rajin, which use tobacco from China and Vietnam, are owned or financed by Taiwanese and Chinese criminal groups, which smuggle the cigarettes they produce into countries around Asia as well as into the U.S. and Europe, say tobacco executives.

North Korean state-owned enterprises, mostly located in or near Pyongyang, the country's capital, also make knockoff cigarettes, the tobacco companies say. The companies say one of these factories is controlled by the internal security service; another is owned by a group with close links to the Communist Party leadership.

Some of the smuggling organizations that move the North Korean cigarettes use their own fleets of freighters, tankers and fishing vessels, tobacco-company executives say. Cargos are often shifted to other vessels at sea, in international waters, to mask their origin. In other cases, cigarettes move via a series of small ports.

The look of the counterfeits and their packages is also very good, say tobacco executives. Packs of Marlboro seized in Miami even included forged pamphlets urging smokers to visit a Web site to find information about the health dangers of cigarettes and the admonition "Don't Litter" on the side of the box.

Executives say packaging is the key to determining which cigarettes are fakes and where they come from. They compare suspect cigarettes to examples from prior raids that have been conclusively tied to a particular source. For example, counterfeiters often don't change the tracking numbers on counterfeit packages. Sometimes, printing flaws give them away.

India Has Hard Choices On US Nuclear Deal: Rice (REU-Y2)

Reuters, January 27, 2006

India has "difficult choices" to make on a controversial civil nuclear cooperation agreement with the United States before the deal can be completed, U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said on Thursday.

The landmark accord, agreed in principle in July but still to be negotiated in detail, would grant New Delhi access to civil nuclear technology it has been denied for three decades, provided it puts its civilian facilities under international inspections.

Senior-level talks in New Delhi last week failed to close the gap on major issues, including which Indian facilities would be designated as civilian and military. The military plants would still be off-limits to U.N. monitors.

"In order to move on to a new phase in which civil nuclear power would be available to India, India has to make some difficult choices," Rice told Reuters in an interview.

She refused to provide any details but insisted, "I think we're making progress."

Although announced with great fanfare, the deal has run into criticism from nuclear experts and some members of the U.S. Congress who say it undermines global nonproliferation goals.

A related issue is whether India will side with the United States when the International Atomic Energy Agency board of governors debates Iran's nuclear program at a February 2 meeting.

Washington and major European powers say Iran is developing a bomb and wants the case referred to the U.N. Security Council for possible sanctions. Tehran denies the charge and is fighting referral.

The U.S. ambassador to India said on Wednesday if India did not back the U.S. position, the nuclear agreement could be in trouble.

Rice did not speak directly of the Iran vote in the IAEA.

She said the nuclear agreement presented "a difficult set of issues."

"But it's very important to understand that in order to satisfy the concerns of the American Congress and our laws and the concerns of the (44-nation) Nuclear Suppliers Group, that there will have to be some steps taken to make sure that the proliferation risks are not enhanced by this deal," she said.

Both the U.S. Congress and the Nuclear Suppliers Group, which sets rules for nuclear-related commerce, must approve the agreement.

For 30 years, the United States led the effort to deny India nuclear technology because it tested and developed nuclear weapons in contravention of international norms. Both India and its neighbor and nuclear-armed rival Pakistan have refused to sign the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty.

Bush now views India, a rising democratic and economic power on China's border, as an evolving U.S. ally and the new nuclear deal -- allowing India to purchase nuclear reactors and fuel -- is central to that vision.

Restructuring Of U.N. Agency 'Likely' This Year (WT)

By David R. Sands

The Washington Times, January 27, 2006

A major overhaul of the United Nations' discredited human rights agency is "quite likely" this year, the State Department's lead negotiator said yesterday, but he also said the United States would insist on real reforms before agreeing to a deal.

The United States backs a plan to scrap the current 53-member U.N. Human Rights Commission, which critics say has been co-opted by some of the world's worst human rights abusers, including Sudan, Zimbabwe and China.

"I think it is quite likely we can get a new human rights council, although it is not certain," Mark Lagon, deputy assistant secretary of state for international organization affairs, said at a Washington roundtable on U.N. reform.

U.N. officials have pushed for the overhaul to be completed before the old human rights panel's scheduled March meeting in Geneva, but Mr. Lagon said it was more important to do things right than to do them quickly.

"The U.S. is not hung up on artificial deadlines," he said. "We feel it is important that any replacement body must be definitely better."

The debate over the human rights agency has become a flash point in the larger debate over reforming the world body itself, which has been rocked by scandals such as the Iraq oil-for-food program.

Critics say the current commission essentially has been taken over by the worst abusers, with countries such as China and Sudan seeking seats on the panel specifically to block scrutiny of their human rights records.

The United States and other leading democracies want to end the automatic rotation of members on the commission, setting up a leaner Human Rights Council that blackballs countries with poor records and has real powers to investigate and spotlight abuses.

At a summit of world leaders in New York in September, U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan endorsed the reform effort and called for a doubling of the budget of the office of the U.N. High Commissioner for Human Rights.

A small group of states -- including Zimbabwe, Belarus and Cuba -- has opposed the more-stringent membership idea. Negotiations on the shape of the new council began Jan. 11, and some private human rights activists say the U.S. government has been slow to press its case.

Mr. Lagon said the United States wants the bulk of the new council's workload to be helping fledgling democratic states move toward greater political freedom, civil liberties and the rule of law.

The emphasis, he said, "should be on operations in the field. We don't want to have just another think tank in Geneva."

With its new credibility, it "can then speak more effectively in the face of horrendous violations," he said.

Mr. Lagon said the new council should not mean the end of special expert missions approved by the current commission. U.N. "rapporteurs" have won praise from human rights groups in recent months with missions critical of abuses in countries such as Belarus, Iran and Uzbekistan.

Bhutto Dismisses Interpol Notices (WT)

By Xin Li

The Washington Times, January 27, 2006

Former Pakistani Prime Minister Benazir Bhutto said yesterday that "red notices" issued by Interpol for her and her husband, Asif Ali Zardari, are groundless and politically motivated.

"I can catch the next airplane and return to Pakistan if necessary," Mrs. Bhutto said at a press conference organized by the Voice of America in Washington. "Interpol might not be given the right information."

The notices are not arrest warrants, Interpol officials told Agence France-Presse yesterday. They are notifications that "bona fide" arrest warrants exist in one of the International Criminal Police Organization's 184 member states. The decision to act upon them is up to member countries, they said.

Akram Shaheedi, a spokesman for the Pakistani Embassy in Washington, said Islamabad has not asked the State Department for any action regarding the notices.

Mrs. Bhutto said her attorney is contacting Interpol to confirm the warrants, and if they exist, to ask on what grounds they were issued.

Mrs. Bhutto was elected as the prime minister of Pakistan in 1988 and 1993. She and her husband are charged with corruption during her regime, including one case in Switzerland in which she is accused of taking commissions from a Swiss firm. She is under self-imposed exile and lives in Britain and Dubai in the United Arab Emirates.

"For nine years, I've been under state-sponsored prosecution, but there hasn't been a single conviction" on the corruption charges, Mrs. Bhutto said.

She was convicted in one case and sentenced to three years in absentia, but Mrs. Bhutto said she is appealing that ruling.

DOJ_NMG_0012545

The reason for the Interpol notices, Mrs. Bhutto said, was that the government of President Pervez Musharraf wants to "divert the attention" of the Pakistani people from the recent U.S. missile strike in a region bordering Afghanistan that killed at least 13 civilians.

The raid, which is thought to have killed some al Qaeda terror leaders, triggered protests from Islamist political parties.

Mrs. Bhutto said the Musharraf government cooperates with the United States only because the "military needs the war of terror in Pakistan to justify its position in the office."

She said it is in the interest of the international community to build a pluralistic, democratic and secular Pakistan.

Meanwhile, it was announced yesterday that former Pakistani Prime Minister Nawaz Sharif was to end five years of exile in Saudi Arabia by traveling to Britain on Sunday.

Pakistani Information Minister Shaikh Rashid Ahmad announced in November that Mr. Sharif would be issued a passport so he can travel to London with his sick son.

Mr. Sharif was ousted by Gen. Musharraf in a bloodless coup in October 1999. Mr. Sharif was sentenced to life in prison on tax evasion and treason charges. Pakistani officials say he will not be allowed to return home.

Canada's Next Leader Clashes With U.S. Over Arctic Waterways (NYT)

By Clifford Krauss

The New York Times, January 27, 2006

TORONTO, Jan. 26 — Stephen Harper, Canada's prime minister-designate, reproached the American ambassador on Thursday over an old difference of opinion about the control of Arctic waters claimed by Canada.

Mr. Harper, the leader of the Conservative Party, which won a narrow victory in Monday's elections, is widely expected to usher in warmer relations with the Bush administration after years of squabbles between Canada and the United States over trade and the war in Iraq.

But the honeymoon took at least a temporary break when Mr. Harper reacted to a news report about comments made by the United States ambassador, David H. Wilkins, taking issue with Canada's assertion of sovereignty in northern Arctic water passages.

"It is the Canadian people we get our mandate from, not the ambassador of the United States," Mr. Harper said. "The United States defends its sovereignty, and the Canadian government will defend our sovereignty."

The United States for decades has opposed Canada's claims to Arctic passageways near the North Pole, as have the European Union and other countries. Canadian military scholars say that the United States, Russia, Britain and France sent submarines under the Arctic ice in waters claimed by Canada during the cold war without Canada's permission, and may still be doing so.

Canada does not currently have the naval ability to stop such intrusions into those areas, which it claims as internal waters, although it is now modernizing satellite surveillance and upgrading its Arctic land and water patrols.

"There's no reason to create a problem that doesn't exist," Mr. Wilkins was quoted as saying at a forum on American-Canadian relations on Wednesday at the University of Western Ontario, according to the CBC News Web site. "We don't recognize Canada's claims to those waters."

Mr. Wilkins seemed to be trying not to kindle a dispute, though. "We have agreed to disagree," he said.

But on Thursday, in his first news conference since the election, Mr. Harper took issue with Mr. Wilkins, perhaps in part to show Canadians that he would not veer far from Canada's traditional foreign policy of pointed independence from the United States.

American diplomats said that Mr. Wilkins had stated nothing more than an old policy in answering a student's question. They said he did not criticize a plan Mr. Harper announced during the campaign to build and deploy three new armed heavy icebreaking ships and construct a deep-water port in the Arctic territorial capital, Iqaluit.

Differences between Canada and the United States over the Arctic have rarely surfaced in a public dispute, and leaders of both countries have preferred to cooperate on Arctic research and defense.

But recently, the Arctic has become increasingly important because of climate change. With Arctic ice rapidly thinning, commercial navigation and tourism boats are making northern passages with increasing frequency. That has obliged Canada to begin planning security measures to protect waterways from smugglers and to prepare for the possibility of accidents and oil spills.

The United States and Canada also have conflicting claims in the Beaufort Sea, in an area that is thought to have oil and natural gas reserves. Denmark and Canada have conflicting claims over another site, Hans Island, off Greenland's coast, in an area with a rich fishery.

Harper Tells U.S. To Drop Arctic Claim (WP)

By Doug Struck

The Washington Post, January 27, 2006

TORONTO, Jan. 26 -- Stephen Harper, elected Monday as prime minister, warned the United States on Thursday to back off from its challenge of Canadian sovereignty in Arctic waters that are fast thawing from global warming.

In the first news conference since his election, Harper upbraided the U.S. ambassador for asserting that the icy polar regions, including the legendary Northwest Passage, are international waters.

Canada claims that its archipelago of some 16,000 islands makes that region Canadian territory.

"The United States defends its sovereignty. The Canadian government will defend our sovereignty," Harper said. "It's the Canadian people we get our mandate from, not the ambassador of the United States."

The two countries -- as well as Russia -- have had conflicting claims in the Arctic for at least three decades. Harper's Conservative Party has proposed expanding Canada's military presence, building new icebreakers and creating an early warning system to detect other ships, all to enforce its claim of sovereignty.

The Liberal government Harper will replace has made similar claims and proposals. But it was unexpected that Harper would launch a sharp verbal attack against the United States on this subject so quickly, and he extended a press conference announcing his Feb. 6 inauguration to bring it up.

"The changing ice conditions are driving this issue to the top of the political agenda," said Michael Byers, an international law expert at the University of British Columbia.

"We've essentially been able to avoid problems over this in the past because the ice has been too thick and too hard to make it a commercially viable route," Byers said. "But, of course, the ice is melting."

He said that "within the next decade or two, there will be a major international shipping route around the northern side of North America." That will shorten the route for Europe-Asia shippers by 4,000 miles, Byers said, adding that it also presents security concerns as a "backdoor to North America that is wide open."

David Wilkins, the U.S. ambassador to Canada, was quoted Wednesday at a discussion in Ontario as saying, "We don't recognize Canada's claims to those waters."

Firms Beat Path To ... Libya (CSM)

By Simon Martelli

The Christian Science Monitor, January 27, 2006

TRIPOLI, LIBYA - It's not unusual for the five-star Corinthia Bab Africa Hotel which towers above this city's waterfront to be completely booked, many of its 299 rooms filled with foreign oil tycoons eager to tap into the country's untold reserves.

After more than 20 years as a global pariah, Libya is coming out of isolation. Most international sanctions have been lifted since its enigmatic leader, Col. Muammar Qaddafi, abandoned his weapons program, renounced terrorism, and accepted responsibility for the 1988 bombing of Pan Am Flight 103, compensating the victims' families.

"With the end of the Lockerbie issue, relations returned to normal and there were many delegations of Congress who visited Libya. I think all efforts are heading towards ending animosity," Colonel Qaddafi said in an interview with the United States-funded Arabic TV channel Al-Hurra last week.

Now, the companies that helped create Libya's oil industry in the 1970s are returning as Qaddafi rebuilds bridges to the West that he burned long ago, and this may help to precipitate political, as well as economic, change.

In a major step, ExxonMobil, the world's largest publicly traded oil company, signed an exploration and production deal with Libya last month. Marathon, Amerada Hess, and ConocoPhilips who together form the Oasis group also negotiated their return at the end of December since being forced out by sanctions in the mid-1980s, while Occidental returned in August last year. The Oasis group was producing 400,000 barrels of oil per day before it pulled out.

Indeed, the country suffered severely from the economic sanctions that were imposed by the US in 1986 after Libya was blamed for the bombing of a Berlin disco that killed two American servicemen. The consequence included a sharp decline in oil production, which fell to around 1.4 million barrels per day in the 1990s, from peak production of 3.3 million barrels per day in 1979. Output at the country's dilapidated liquefied natural gas plant, built by ExxonMobil in the late 1960s, has fallen to just 15 percent of capacity. Unemployment rose to about 30 percent.

In Tripoli's commercial center, a short walk from the shiny new Corinthia Hotel, which houses existing foreign oil firms, signs on the office doors clearly directed at locals in search of work state in both English and Arabic that there are no vacancies.

While Libya remains on the US State Department's list of states that support terrorism, and certain limited sanctions have yet to be lifted, it is pursuing a return to full normal relations with the US. Tarek Hassan-Beck of Libya's National Oil Company (NOC) told Reuters Wednesday that he expected the newly returned Oasis group "to put the right message across to the US government" to remove Libya from the hit list. Qaddafi has made this possible by publicly condemning 9/11 and agreeing to a three-phase disarmament program, as well as paying compensation to the families of the 270 victims killed on Pan Am Flight 103 over Lockerbie, Scotland.

But Qaddafi remains an autocratic leader, and genuine economic and political reform is nowhere on the horizon, according to many Libyans. "Whatever he says, the people must do it without question," says Ibrahim, a young Libyan who runs a small tour group in Tripoli.

Meanwhile, endemic corruption and high unemployment persist, and the lack of real economic incentives is driving skilled professionals out of the country, says Ezzedin Dibashi, an oil consultant based in London who used to work at NOC. "Doctors, engineers, and economists are going elsewhere, rather than subsist on 600 Libyan dinars ($450) per month."

Other issues seriously obstructing Libya's political and economic development include the state ownership of banks, a government controlled media and the ban on political opposition parties.

"This is a country that has responded to international criticism," says the Chairman of business consultancy group MEC International and former British Ambassador to Libya Oliver Miles. "But how and how far is where it gets difficult."

With oil prices on the rise, none of these difficulties are deterring foreign oil companies from aggressively competing to win exploration rights and investment opportunities in Libya.

"It has become a very attractive place for oil firms to do business," says Mr. Miles. "There are opportunities in Libya that do not exist in other Middle Eastern countries."

One encouraging sign of change recently was the agreement by British ministers in October to send terror suspects back to Libya on the condition of 'no torture, no death penalty.'

But foreign energy companies are not the only ones enjoying newfound access to Libya. Nongovernmental organizations like Amnesty International, which was allowed access for the first time in 15 years in 2004, have expressed serious reservations about the Qaddafi regime's human rights record. Torture and suspicious prison deaths, said an Amnesty International report, continue in Libya.

Despite Libya's recent prisoner releases, judicial reforms and efforts to overhaul its image, some NGOs are asking Western governments to proceed with human rights standards in mind.

"[Qaddafi] and his inner circle appear unwilling to implement genuine reform," says a Human Rights Watch report released this week, "especially in the areas of free expression and association, which might weaken their three-decade grip on power."

Georgia, Short Of Gas, Is Hit With A Blackout (NYT)

By C. J. Chivers

The New York Times, January 27, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0012548

MOSCOW, Jan. 26 — Energy shortages struck Georgia anew on Thursday as a wind storm toppled a major power transmission line and Russia's gas monopoly failed to restore the flow of natural gas to the country after pipelines were sabotaged last weekend, energy officials said.

The latest problem appeared about 1 a.m., when high winds severed a high-voltage transmission line that carries electricity between east and west Georgia, plunging the snow-covered capital, Tbilisi, into darkness. The blackout occurred as temperatures in the normally balmy nation fell below 20 degrees, and most of the population remained without natural gas for heat. Weather forecasts predicted unusually cold weather into next week.

Georgia has been without its Russian gas, and with limited electricity, for five days. Officials in both countries initially hoped that the supplies could be swiftly restored. But after a respite from the shortages on Monday, the problems have worsened, bringing fresh hardships to Georgia and further tarnishing Russia's image as an energy supplier.

Mikheil Saakashvili, Georgia's president, cut short a visit to Davos, Switzerland, to return to Tbilisi as the crisis intensified. Nika Gelauri, Georgia's energy minister, said in a telephone interview that technicians were examining the damaged power wire and tower, but it was too soon to know how long repairs would take.

In Russia, where on Sunday saboteurs destroyed two gas pipelines that had provided Georgia with all of its gas, energy officials said work crews were laboring nonstop to repair the damaged sections of pipe.

Gazprom, Russia's gas monopoly, told Georgia that the work, behind schedule, could be completed by Friday night, Mr. Gelauri said. Russian officials had said that the pipe could be repaired by Tuesday, but the efforts have been hampered by delays. Georgian energy officials have said that even if gas flow were restored, it could take a week for the gas to be switched back on to all customers. Georgia has been receiving a supply of gas, roughly half its normal needs, in shipments through a recently repaired pipeline that connects the Georgian network to Azerbaijan.

But Azerbaijan, which also relies on Russia for its gas, has not been receiving an increased flow from Russia to pass on to Georgia, said Aydylbek Amonov, a supervisor in the Azerbaijan gas network's control center. Russia says a struggling compressor station near the Azerbaijan border is unable to provide increased pressure.

Mr. Gelauri said he was suspicious of Russia's chain of problems: first sabotage, then repair delays, then a compressor problem. "If we had this additional gas from Gazprom through Azerbaijan it would solve all the problems," he said.

Georgian officials have said they do not believe Russian explanations for either the sabotage or the technical difficulties that have followed, and claim that Russia is withholding its energy during a cold spell to punish Georgia for its pro-Western policies. There has been no public evidence to support that claim, and Russia has characterized Georgia's position as irrational and immature.

EU's Hard Line Going Into Trade Talks Draws Fire (WSJ)

By Scott Miller In Brussels And Marc Champion In Davos, Switzerland

The Wall Street Journal, January 27, 2006

Major trading nations are hardening their positions as they head into the first round of trade talks since the recent Hong Kong sessions faltered, renewing the possibility of a watered-down result of four years of negotiations.

As top trade negotiators from about two dozen countries prepared to meet in Davos, Switzerland, on Friday, the European Union's trade commissioner, Peter Mandelson, said Europe stood to lose "next to nothing" if talks failed and repeated strongly that he would make no further offers unless other countries make concessions. Earlier this week, he told the European Parliament that Europe could settle for "a minimalist outcome, if that is what the rest of the world wants."

That position has been drawing fire from other countries who blame the EU for doing the most to cause the standstill. Brazil, refusing to make fresh concessions, has said it fears the EU is trying to wiggle out of the commitments it already made to lower farm tariffs. Indian Trade Minister Kamil Nath rejected the idea of lowering ambitions as Mr. Mandelson has suggested. "There is no common ambition, and I am not willing to lower my ambitions," he said in an interview in Davos. "Europe has decided the best defense is to go on the offensive, but they should be more substantive and try and correct structural flaws."

Trade negotiators are meeting to try to lay out a road map for what they hope will be the rough draft of a deal by the end of April, after their plan to achieve that in Hong Kong last month failed.

Many diplomats and trade experts say the current round of talks, known as the Doha Development Round, is fundamentally an all-or-nothing proposition that requires dramatic cuts in trade barriers in all sectors and regions to get done at all, because of the need to provide some victories for all the 149 countries involved in the negotiations.

U.S. Trade Representative Rob Portman said Thursday that he needs an ambitious round to sell a trade package to Congress. U.S. legislators, he said, won't approve a deal to cut politically important farm subsidies unless they can show their constituents that U.S. farmers will benefit from lower global farm tariffs and greater opportunities to sell industrial goods and services. "From a U.S. perspective, Doha light doesn't work," said Mr. Portman, talking to reporters in Davos. "We need enough reduction in tariffs to demonstrate that there will be new trade flows."

Still, the idea of rolling back Doha's aims is an attractive fallback position for those who fear a full collapse of the talks. That in turn could lead countries to forsake such long-running, world-wide trade negotiations for individual deals among smaller groups of countries.

"When the time comes in a few weeks, we might accept a lower-ambition agreement. If the choice is between failure and a lesser agreement, I'll take the lower ambition," said Rachid M. Rachid, Egypt's trade minister and head of the African group of countries at the WTO talks. A minimalist agreement would retain commitment and momentum, whereas failure could put trade liberalization efforts back five years, he said.

World Trade Organization Director-General Pascal Lamy has called the Doha talks, named after the city in Qatar where they started in 2002, just 60% complete, with little progress lately. Trade negotiators are nearly unanimous in their belief that the talks must end, one way or the other, by the end of this year, before a U.S. law runs out that prevents Congress from essentially renegotiating the agreement point by point.

But some trade diplomats note privately that the outlines of a lower-ambition round are already on the table and with a little improvement might not even look that bad compared with previous trade rounds.

Mr. Lamy, while not advocating rolling back Doha's objectives, notes that, for example, negotiators have already agreed on a 20% cut in farm subsidies that encourage overproduction. That is far less than the U.S. proposal, but similar to the level of cuts achieved for agriculture supports overall in the previous round, which began in Uruguay and ended in 1994. The U.S. has proposed that developed countries cut farm tariffs by up to 90%, and that for farm subsidies that encourage overproduction, the U.S. cut back by 52% and the EU by 75%.

Proposed cuts to industrial tariffs so far are harder to quantify under Doha, but Mr. Lamy notes a large number of WTO members have embraced the idea of cutting the highest tariffs the most. That is important, he says, because so-called peak tariffs are often used to protect markets like shoes and textiles that developing countries most want to access.

Dan Ikenson of the Cato Institute in Washington says the U.S. and Europe may have to cut farm supports no matter what the outcome of Doha, because of domestic budget problems and fear of WTO legal challenges. That could make them more willing to accept a watered-down Doha if collapse was the alternative -- to get something in return for their cuts.

A big part of the problem, a growing number of trade analysts are concluding, is that Doha lacked a clear set of goals, in contrast to other trade rounds aimed at particular sectors. Naotaka Matsukata, a former U.S. trade negotiator now with law firm Hunton & Williams in Washington, says when Doha was launched two months after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks on the U.S., the main idea was to use trade to help developing countries, which might breed future terrorists.

But WTO members never agreed specifically on how that was to be done. Industry groups didn't play their usual role as the driving force. "There was never a consensus on what the round was supposed to be," Mr. Matsukata said. "People are asking themselves what we are doing the round for."

US Signals New Approach To Doha Round Of Trade Talks (FT)

By Alan Beattie

Financial Times, January 27, 2006

Rob Portman, the US trade representative, said on Thursday that the Doha round of trade talks had to move forward on all fronts, as the European Union said it would lose “next to nothing” if the talks failed.

DOJ_NMG_0012550

The shift of emphasis in the US's position ahead of a meeting of trade ministers pm Saturday came amid accusations that the tough negotiating tactics of big farm exporters like Brazil were holding up progress.

While continuing to argue that the EU should improve its initial offer to cut farm tariffs, a position it shares with Brazil, Mr Portman also stressed that "in an ideal world", big developing countries would simultaneously open their goods markets.

"That would be a lot to ask because it involves a lot of risks on the part of all the parties but I think that's what's needed now," he said.

Peter Mandelson, the EU trade commissioner, raised the stakes by saying that the EU would lose "next to nothing" if the talks failed. "The alliance between the US and Brazil has led to stalemate in these talks," he said. "It has now become self-defeating."

Brazil, one of the world's most efficient agricultural exporters, leads the Group of 20 developing countries that negotiates on agriculture. EU officials have accused Brazil of negotiating in its own interests by prioritising lower farm tariffs. Other members, such as India, have many small-scale farmers who will lose from reduced agricultural tariffs across the world.

Kamal Nath, the Indian trade minister, told the FT: "The question is not who is more or less of a delinquent. We have to look at all parts of the negotiation."

He added that the US could not expect lower tariffs without cutting subsidies. "The US keeps looking for market access with distorted prices," he said.

Rachid Mohammed Rachid, the Egyptian trade minister who chairs the Africa Group of nations in the trade talks and is also in the G20, told the FT: "The US and the G20 are expecting the EU to come forward with more agricultural market access. I think we need to come forward with offers on . . . [industrial goods] and services. The idea that everyone has to wait for the EU is not Egypt's view and it is not the Africa Group's view."

But Celso Amorim, the Brazilian foreign minister, denied the suggestion that Brazil was merely following its own interests, saying that he was in complete agreement with India.

"The G20 is a microcosm of the developing world," Mr Amorim said. He added that the grouping had formed a common position with the wider G90 group of developing countries during last month's World Trade Organisation ministerial meeting in Hong Kong.

"Two years ago people said the G20 wouldn't last three months, and now they say that the new entente with the G90 won't last three months," he said. "Wait and see."

Saturday's meeting of trade ministers will focus on setting a timetable for negotiations in coming months rather than making any decisions, ministers said.

Merkel Can Help Advance Talks (AP)

The Associated Press, January 27, 2006

New German Chancellor Angela Merkel could help advance stalled global trade talks by offsetting the protective mindset of French officials in EU policy, U.S. trade chief Rob Portman said Thursday.

A key issue holding up talks has been access to European Union farm markets, with Brussels refusing to give more ground until other countries cut import tariffs on industrial goods and services.

Portman, speaking while attending the World Economic Forum annual meeting, said Germany could act as a counterweight to France, which has been particularly defensive in wanting to protect its agriculture markets.

"I was very impressed with her willingness to engage," Portman said of Merkel. "I'm hopeful that she can help us to come together with an agreement this year."

But EU trade chief Peter Mandelson insisted later Thursday that Europe is "united" and that Brussels would not make any more concessions on agriculture until its trading partners first offer to cut trade barriers in industrial goods and services.

"We can't be expected to make a further offer in agriculture in order to pay to keep others at the negotiating table," Mandelson said. "Europe is willing to give more than it has offered, but it is not prepared to ask for nothing in return."

Mandelson suggested that the EU is prepared to risk the round of trade talks breaking down.

"If the talks stopped, we would lose next to nothing," Mandelson said.

DOJ_NMG_0012551

The United States, as well as key developing countries such as Brazil and India, are demanding easier access to EU farm markets as part of the Doha round of trade talks.

With just more than three months left before a self-imposed deadline for setting precise formulas for cutting trade barriers, major players at the 149-member WTO appear as far apart as ever on the vexing subject of farm trade, as well as market access for industrial goods and liberalizing service industries.

Little seems to have changed since before December's meeting in Hong Kong, where members failed to agree on those formulas and only agreed on a new, April 30 deadline for reaching that point. That leaves little time before a year-end deadline for concluding the Doha negotiations.

Brazil's Foreign Minister Celso Amorim said he "was not impressed" with Mandelson restating that the EU was unable to make any more concessions on farm trade.

"Reopening the battles that we had prior to Hong Kong certainly is not a constructive way to start," Amorim said.

Portman, though, held out hope that Merkel could be "a positive force" in bringing the opposing sides together.

Trade negotiations usually take place at ministerial level rather than heads of state, yet Merkel is "engaging directly," Portman said.

"The German position is obviously going to be part of an overall EU position, in that they negotiate through the commission and not the member states, but it will take into account their own economic interests and Germany is the second largest exporter of manufactured products in the world," Portman explained.

Germany has "a strong interest in a successful outcome" to the Doha round, he said, adding: "Global economic growth, for all the major economies, is extremely important."

Boycott Call Creates Fracas At Davos Forum (NYT)

By Mark Landler And John Markoff

DAVOS, Switzerland, Jan. 26 — A magazine article calling on nations to boycott Israel because of its treatment of Palestinians has provoked a tempest at the World Economic Forum's annual meeting here, prompting the organizers to pull the magazines from the forum's shelves here and issue an apology.

The article, which appeared in Global Agenda, a magazine published by the forum and distributed to participants, carried the headline "Boycott Israel." The author, Mazin Qumsiyeh, equated Israel's policies toward Palestinians with apartheid and said that countries should withdraw their investments and boycott Israel.

After a member raised questions about the article, the organizers removed the magazines from shelves at the conference center in this Alpine resort. The forum's executive director, Klaus Schwab, said the article should not have been published and had slipped through the editing process.

"There was an unacceptable failure in the editorial process, specifically an insufficiently short period for review of content, for which there is no excuse," Mr. Schwab said in a statement. "The article is totally in contradiction to my own, and the forum's, mission and values."

The timing of the contretemps — on the day that Hamas won a landslide victory in Palestinian elections — was not lost on people here. The future of Israeli and Palestinian relations was high on the agenda on Thursday at this meeting of about 2,300 political figures, private groups and corporate executives.

The article on Israel had drawn no response until Wednesday, when an American technology executive raised questions about its tone.

"I was shocked," said Rabbi Awraham S. Soetendorp, of the Jewish Institute for Human Values in the Netherlands, who was attending the forum. "The issue that Zionism was equated with racism was so outrageous."

The publication of the article was a keen embarrassment for Mr. Schwab, who prides himself on fostering dialogue in troubled parts of the world.

DOJ_NMG_0012552

Mr. Schwab had hoped to organize a panel discussion this year between Israeli and Palestinian leaders. But the acting prime minister of Israel, Ehud Olmert, and the Palestinian president, Mahmoud Abbas, declined invitations to come to Davos because of events at home.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice spoke via satellite during a panel here, reaffirming the position of the United States that Hamas must renounce violence and recognize Israel's right to exist.

Mr. Qumsiyeh, the author of the article, is an American citizen of Palestinian descent who frequently writes in support of Palestinian causes. In a telephone interview from New Jersey, he said he had been asked to submit the article by a staff writer at the magazine.

"Why is free speech not allowed?" said Mr. Qumsiyeh, a geneticist. He said his article called for a nonviolent response to Israeli policy.

Economics And The Inevitable (WP)

By David Ignatius

DAVOS, Switzerland -- As the throngs of ebullient Indian and Chinese executives make their way through the salons of the World Economic Forum this week, it's hard for an American not to reflect ruefully on what life must feel like for autoworkers in Detroit -- stuck in the slow lane of the global economy.

The global titans would doubtless give autoworkers in Michigan the same advice they would offer to workers in an outmoded Chinese steel mill or an unprofitable European textile plant: Get over it. Learn new skills and find new jobs in more productive sectors. The flat world, as my colleague Tom Friedman likes to call it, is ruthlessly fair in that respect. Everybody must live on the knife edge of the global marketplace.

If it were my job at Ford being cut, I would find such bromides infuriating. They sound like a 21st-century version of utilitarianism: an insistence that the free market produces the greatest good for the greatest number, which does you no good at all if you're among the unlucky lesser number. But the fact that the Davos ethic is galling doesn't mean it's wrong.

Davos has come to symbolize the dominant force of our time -- the wealth-creating, job-destroying whirlwind of the global economy. Each year I come here I marvel at the reach and leveling power of this economic hurricane. There are more Chinese, Indians and Arabs every year, and less of an American presence. U.S. investment banks, technologists and venture capitalists may have spawned the globalization movement, but it has now floated free. The dealmakers come from all over the world. The one thing they seem to have in common is that nearly all were educated in the United States. That may not be much comfort if you work at an assembly plant in Dearborn, but at least America still does one thing well: running universities.

My superstars at Davos this year are the university presidents. Larry Summers at Harvard, Rick Levin at Yale, Lee Bollinger at Columbia and a half-dozen more are transforming their universities into global institutions -- seeking the best students from around the world and sending them to far-flung places to learn the skills that will secure them places among the global elite.

"We want the brilliant mathematician whose mother is a chambermaid in Romania," says Summers. That's the most attractive face of globalization -- the idea that the great universities are creating a colorblind meritocracy that doesn't care where you're from as long as you did well on the SAT. But in this global empire of knowledge, there is an echo of Dickens's parody of utilitarian thinking, Mr. Gradgrind, who in the novel "Hard Times" famously admonished his students: "Facts alone are wanted in life. Plant nothing else, and root out everything else." Mr. Gradgrind's students were productive, but quite miserable.

The impresario of Davos, Klaus Schwab, has tried hard over the years to humanize the free market his forum celebrates. I spent time yesterday meeting with some of his "social entrepreneurs," people who are building pay toilets in Nigeria, teaching sustainable agriculture in Paraguay, training rape victims in Cambodia how to run a catering business. Inspiring stories, and there is something marvelous, too, about a conference attended by people who are so eager to invest in the booming, free-market economies of India and China.

The change machine is relentless, as I discovered at a session here for technologists and venture capitalists. The group selected hot technologies for the next few years -- sensors that can operate without batteries, stem cells for cardiac patients that can regrow heart tissue; solar technology that can produce energy at half the cost; microbial factories that can make molecules for drugs in the laboratory, for a tenth of the cost of finding them in nature. It was a dazzling discussion -- not least because these life-giving technologies will make the people in the room even richer.

"I'm a technology optimist," a prominent venture capitalist named Vinod Khosla explained. He argues that innovative, bottom-up methods will solve problems that seem intractable, from energy to poverty to disease. "Every problem is an opportunity to a technology pioneer," he said.

Business today is the leading agent of social change. That's really the message of Davos. It can be a pitiless process, and its seamless efficiency is in frightening contrast to the incompetence and mismanagement of the public sector. Globalization can be tamed, but it can't be stopped -- nor should it be. I just wish other things in the world worked as well.

Win-Win? Tell It To The Losers (NYT)

By Floyd Norris

The New York Times, January 27, 2006

DAVOS, Switzerland

AMONG the business and political leaders who gather here each year for the World Economic Forum, there has long been broad agreement that globalization is good.

But this year there is a growing doubt — not in the validity of the message, but in whether it is losing believers among the broad populace of the world.

The organizers of the conference focused a large part of it on China and India, but in the corridors a much smaller country kept coming up. That was Bolivia, whose new president, Evo Morales, promised to "end the colonial and neoliberal model." His election continued a recent leftist trend in Latin America.

"Populism is sexy in many countries," said Ghassan Salamé, a Lebanese political scientist who teaches at the Institut d'Études Politiques de Paris. "It somehow gives credibility back to politics, saying that politicians can change things. Otherwise, globalization is ruling the world."

Backers of globalization have long argued that it was "win-win," with developed and developing economies both gaining from the process, even if there were some local losers whose jobs vanished.

They still think that. But they worry that there are more losers than expected. "On a microbasis, it is very difficult to feel the win-win," said Ben Verwaayen, the chief executive of BT, the former British Telecom, at a session on jobs.

"There is a reason why polls show declining trust in politicians, journalists and business leaders. They are the opinion leaders who have lost credibility," Mr. Verwaayen continued. "Society feels very intuitively that something has changed, and we do not have the answer to it."

In a way, it is remarkable that these resentments are growing now, when world economic growth is strong. The growth of China, India and other Asian economies has not kept the United States from growing at a good rate.

But the growth is uneven, and many who felt successful in developed countries now feel threatened as pension plans are cut back and companies demand reductions in pay or benefits to avoid layoffs.

"Those who cannot participate in the economic wealth have fears," the German chancellor, Angela Merkel, said in a speech here. She warned of troubles ahead if a framework could not be found to allow all to profit.

A set of polls released by the forum showed that nearly two-thirds of Davos attendees believe that the next generation will live in a more prosperous world, while fewer than half of the people interviewed around the world share that opinion. The general public was, however, more optimistic than the Davos crowd that the world would become safer.

Perhaps those who resent globalization will remain powerless. But their ranks could swell if the world economy weakens.

Lawrence H. Summers, the president of Harvard University and a co-chairman of the World Economic Forum, asserts that globalization will not be derailed.

"The tide of history continues to move toward more market organization," he told me. But, he added, "For this to work out well, there must be more attention to local disintegration even as we work toward global integration."

Or people could just accept a world in which some are very wealthy and others provide services to them. Elaine L. Chao, the United States labor secretary, said the job outlook in the United States was bright for plumbers and electricians.

DOJ_NMG_0012554

And, speaking at the same section on jobs, David Arkless, a senior vice president of Manpower Inc., said that one profession likely to offer high pay in coming years is that of personal trainer.

Don't Look For Me At Davos . . . (WSJ)

By John C. Bogle

The Wall Street Journal, January 27, 2006

This year I've decided not to call the pilot, pop on to Vanguard's G-4 and jet to Davos. Partly because we don't "do" corporate airplanes. Partly because I've never been important enough to receive an invitation to the perennial World Economic Conference. But mostly because what was once truly a global economic conference has become a "happening," a magnet for the rich and famous -- including business stars and Hollywood starlets -- to see and be seen, sort of like walking on that red carpet to the Oscars.

I confess I looked at this year's program before I made my decision. I'm only truly sorry to miss Morgan Stanley's Steve Roach, whose persistent gloomy warnings about the global economy have yet to come home to roost. And I'm kinda sorry to miss the apparently impassioned defense of speculating in today's financial markets ("Beyond Short-Termism: Not on My Watch"), which I hope -- but doubt -- is an attack on my attack on the folly of short-term speculation in my new book. To say nothing of "Hedge Fund Fairy Tales," although that can hardly be covered adequately in the allotted hour. The sessions "Happiness is . . . ," "The Trust Deficit," and "Transforming Neurotic Corporations" may also have been interesting.

Confession being good for the soul, the session I'll really be sorry to miss is "All You Ever Wanted to Know about Relationships -- But Were Afraid to Ask," a rare three-hour session that vastly exceeds the customary one hour-limit. Here, psychologist Dagmar O'Connor will tell what I'm certain will be a capacity audience why "relationships and sexuality may be the only truly universal part of human life," and give us "tools to overcome old problems and keep desire flowing." We can all learn, can't we? (Even though I'll soon be 77, I'll celebrate my 10th anniversary as a heart-transplant recipient on Feb. 21. The heart is actually now 35.)

Speaking of CEOs, the Forum exults that among its select horde of 2,340 participants are a record 735 chief executives, chairmen and CFOs, "the highest figure of corporate leaders ever." With all due respect, I won't miss glad-handing most of them. They get paid as if they're solely responsible for their firms' success, and even if they fail, they get handsome rewards. In 2004, their compensation rose another 39% to 475 times that of the average worker -- the guys and gals who get out of bed every morning and do their jobs, with never a ride on the corporate jet whose cost is paid 60% by shareholders and 40% by taxpayers. Truth be told, most CEOs I've met are greatly overrated. But I don't complain; I may have been the most overrated of all.

So sorry, Bono, I can't be with you for lunch. Sorry, other Michael Jordan, that I won't hear the latest on EDS. Sorry, David Stern, that I can't shoot some hoops with you. Sorry, Jacques Rogge, that I won't learn more about "the impact of sports in the world." And sorry, Jean Claude and Christo, but please know that I took my whole family to "The Gates" and loved it.

But I already knew, as I suspect everyone there knew, that "China, India [are] Key to the Future," CNN's headline about Chancellor Merkel's speech. And I didn't need to fly to Davos to learn that "plumbers, construction workers, and electricians" will still be needed in the global economy of the future. With 226 sessions, I would have had to miss at least 200 anyway.

Deep down, however, I may just be jealous. Perhaps if I call President Clinton I can hitch a ride on his jet, arriving late tomorrow afternoon for a closing panel with Forum founder Klaus Schwab. Then I'd have avoided all the foolish, self-righteous show-biz baloney, but be able to assure my pals: "Yes, I was at Davos, 2006."

Mr. Bogle, founder and former CEO of the Vanguard Group, is the author of "The Battle for the Soul of Capitalism" (Yale, 2005).

French 'protectionism' Draws EU Ire (FT)

By Tobias Buck In Brussels

Financial Times, January 27, 2006

France has been given a one-month deadline to justify its contentious decree protecting a large number of domestic firms from foreign takeovers or face legal action from Brussels.

DOJ_NMG_0012555

Charlie McCreevy, the European Union internal market commissioner, has rounded on the French government's action, dismissing key provisions of the decree – issued on December 31 – as "discriminatory" and "protectionist".

The commissioner's criticism of the takeover decree is detailed in a four-page letter sent to the French government and signed by Mr McCreevy's top civil servant. "The Commission services have examined the law and have raised a number of concerns with the French authorities," a spokesman for Mr McCreevy said on Thursday.

Brussels' intervention underlines the Commission's deep concerns about the rise of protectionist measures in the 25 EU member states. Mr McCreevy is already embroiled in a battle with the Polish government over its attempt to block a banking merger involving UniCredit, the Italian financial services group. He has also taken action against Italy for an attempt by the country's central bank to block two foreign banking takeovers.

A confrontation with France would, however, be more serious, because the Commission is questioning measures which are designed to protect entire sectors from foreign takeovers – and not just individual companies.

Under the decree, the French government has the right to veto or impose conditions on foreign takeovers in as many as 11 sensitive sectors. Paris said the decree had been drafted in close collaboration with the Commission, but Brussels insists it never gave its approval to the text.

Mr McCreevy's spokesman said the Commission's concerns referred, among other things, to "the fact that the authorisation procedure applies only to foreign firms and not to French firms", adding that the requirement "appears discriminatory and could be viewed as protectionist". The Commission was also questioning a provision that requires government approval for buyers wanting to take over only parts of a French firm – a measure that "seems to be disproportionate", the spokesman added. Other potential problems identified in the Commission letter relate to "unclear criteria in the law for defining national interest".

France had hoped to avoid Commission criticism of the decree by distinguishing between foreign firms from inside and outside the EU. As a result, potential bidders from other EU countries face much lighter requirements than companies from, say, the US or China.

Kosovo Albanians Mourn Pro-Independence Leader (NYT)

By Nicholas Wood

PRISTINA, Kosovo, Jan. 26 — Kosovo's Albanian majority gathered by the tens of thousands on Thursday to bid farewell to their president in a proud and somber funeral ceremony that seemed to underscore their aspirations for independence.

After 16 years as the ethnic Albanian leader in the province, Ibrahim Rugova — a veteran pacifist who struggled to gain independence for this disputed region but died of lung cancer last Saturday — was given every honor the region could muster.

For six hours this city, the regional capital, was brought to a halt for a ceremony attended by four presidents and representatives from more than 40 countries. Stores and schools were closed, and the regional government announced a holiday.

Kosovo is still officially part of Serbia but has been administered by the United Nations since June 1999, when Serbian security forces, accused of committing atrocities against the Albanians, were forced to leave the province. Mr. Rugova died just as talks on the province's future status were about to begin.

But for many here on Thursday, there was little in the ceremony to suggest that it was taking place in a disputed province. There were few signs of the 17,000 or so peacekeepers who usually patrol the region. Instead, Kosovo's Protection Corps, defined by the United Nations as a civil disaster response unit but widely viewed by Albanians as the province's fledgling defense force, led the cortege. The armed guards, recruited from the ranks of Kosovo's now dispersed guerrilla army that fought the Serbian security forces during the conflict here from 1997 to 1999, walked slowly alongside the president's coffin as it was borne on a gun carriage, draped in flags.

"He was the president of our state," said Zymer Kastrati, 80, who traveled by bus with 10 members of his family from Pec in eastern Kosovo. Mr. Rugova twice won the presidency of Kosovo's regional government, elected by the provincial legislature in 2002 and 2004.

While the United Nations has final authority here, the regional government has substantial say in areas like the economy, health, education and other social affairs.

Many Albanians traveled across Kosovo in freezing temperatures to attend the ceremony after four and half days of official mourning. Many were members of the Democratic League of Kosovo, the movement Mr. Rugova helped to form in the late 1980's as a counterweight to the rise of Serbian nationalism. Members of Kosovo's extensive exile communities flew in from as far as way as Australia and the United States.

Some said they came out of duty to the man they described as the father of their nation.

"He was a very patient and peaceful man — ideal qualities, since we Kosovars are a hot-blooded people," said Gresa Rexhepi, 16, a Pristina high school student. "I'm sure his goal will be achieved very soon."

Dignitaries paid tribute to the president before he was laid to rest at a memorial site for former members of the Kosovo Liberation Army. The head of the United Nations mission in the province, Soren JessenPetersen, said President Rugova had "remained dedicated exclusively to peaceful means."

"His death is a great loss," Javier Solana, the European Union's foreign policy chief, said at the ceremony. "It is one of the cruel ironies of history that he left at the moment he was most needed, the very moment he expected to provide leadership in helping to settle the future status of Kosovo."

Mr. Jessen-Petersen suggested that Mr. Rugova's desire for independence might yet become a reality, a suggestion echoed by diplomats who say negotiations are likely to lead to some kind of independent state.

"President Rugova has left a void behind him, but he has also left a vision to guide Kosovo forward," Mr. Jessen-Petersen said. "It is a vision whose fulfillment he did not live to see, but whose realization will be achieved through the unity and commitment of those who follow him."

But while the ceremony appeared to suggest that this region is on the verge of statehood, the underlying divisions were thinly disguised. Members of Kosovo's Serbian population were notably absent, as were representatives of the Serbian government.

A request by Serbia's president, Boris Tadic, to attend the funeral was rejected by Mr. Rugova's office because it reasserted Serbia's claim to the province.

President Tadic asked to be able to go to "Kosovo, which is a part of Serbia's territorial integrity," and pay his respects. Subsequently, all but one of Kosovo's Serbian representatives declined to join the ceremony.

There were also reminders of the deep divisions running though Kosovo's Albanian population. Some war veterans, long critical of Mr. Rugova's advocacy of nonviolence during repression at the hands of Serbian security forces in Kosovo in the 1990's, condemned the government's decision to bury him at the Kosovo Liberation Army memorial site.

Axis Of Evo (WSJ)

By Mary Anastasia O'grady

The Wall Street Journal, January 27, 2006

There was a time when Evo Morales deserved a chance to show his democratic bonafides as Bolivia's new head of state. But 96 hours into the presidency, time's up. Anyone still wondering what Evo has in mind for his country qualifies for permanent disability -- or a job at the Organization of American States -- on grounds of terminal naiveté.

In just a few short days, the great Aymara hope has built a cabinet of radical and Marxist militants, purged the Bolivian military and signed a pile of "agreements" with his Venezuelan mentor Hugo Chávez. There are reports that Cuban security agents are already working for the new president much as they do for Chávez. If imitation is the sincerest form of flattery, Evo is buttering Hugo up big time.

The most tragic aspect of Evo's decision to let Cuba and Venezuela annex his country is where this all leads for the majority Indian population in one of the region's poorest countries. Their hopes soared on Sunday as they watched one of their own, from humble beginnings, sworn into the highest office in the land. They no doubt think that Evo -- who rose to power by leading coca growers against crop eradication pushed by U.S. drug warriors -- will care for his own in ways that the white, upper-class leadership never did. But Fidel long ago destroyed underclass hopes for a better life and Hugo is doing the same.

After six years of Chávez, Venezuelans, once ecstatic about their Bolivarian Revolution, are sinking deeper into poverty. Fidel's largely Afro-Cuban population is destitute after almost 50 years of El Máximo Lider.

Most of the world has greeted the Morales presidency with romantic optimism. His lack of experience and formal education, his fiery rhetoric laced with old fashion Latin populism, his violent background and his hard-line friends abroad -- all have been played down in favor of a "give-him-a-chance" attitude. A Miami Herald editorial Wednesday noted a few of Mr. Morales' more moderate statements as "a sign of political maturity."

It's hard to find anyone not hoping that an Evo-led Bolivia, built on equality under the law, property rights and healthy competition will emerge. Sadly, though, white guilt is not likely to get off so easily. The reality is that the Cuban model of totalitarian "equality" is now the dominant force shaping the Morales government.

One reason this has been slow to dawn is that observers have been assigning far too much importance to the question of whether foreign investors will be allowed into Bolivia's rich natural gas industry, or if, instead, Bolivia will go forward with full blown nationalization. The answer is probably the former, but so what? As both Venezuela and Cuba illustrate, such a policy does nothing to ensure development and reveals very little about whether democracy and liberty will survive.

Spain's socialist prime minister, José Luis Rodríguez Zapatero, is already trying to elbow his way into Mr. Morales's Bolivia on behalf of Spanish energy interests, as is Brazil's Luiz Inácio "Lula" da Silva on behalf of Petrobras. Yet the presence of foreign business interests in a dictatorship does little for the locals. Both Castro and Chávez host foreign investors, recognizing them as perfect business partners because they are politically indifferent as long as they get their cut. The key to a dictator's control is ensuring that local interests do not have economic power to challenge the political status quo.

Mr. Morales has been riding an anti-foreigner wave of populism but is suddenly warming up to the old Bolivian nemesis, Chile. Undoubtedly, someone has explained to him that as long as Bolivia relies exclusively on Brazil and Argentina as markets for its natural gas, it has weak pricing power. It would not be surprising to see the angry Bolivian nationalist make a deal with Chile so he could reach the coast and tap into the rich market for liquefied natural gas up north.

If that happens it should not be understood as moderation. It would merely be a calculation about how to secure power. It explains the first-ever attendance of a Chilean president at a Bolivian inauguration and Evo's plans to travel to Chile for its inauguration of Michelle Bachelet.

Better relations between Chile and Bolivia are much to be desired. But as Venezuela and Iran have made clear, energy income in the hands of the state does not make citizens better off. We'd be more encouraged if Evo said something about changing Bolivian property laws to permit Indians to sell their rural land or if he promised to change the country's "capitalization" structure of privatized companies so that shares held in trust for Bolivians by the state would be distributed to the people.

The other facet of Bolivian reality that some observers expected as a counterbalance to a presidential power grab is the opposition. Yet, with a majority in the lower house and solid support in the senate, Evo may be able to consolidate power "legally" à la Chávez. A constituent assembly later this year will rewrite the constitution and if Venezuela is any guide, the concept of limited government will not be included in the document.

Finally, there is the matter of the military, an institution near and dear to the heart of an "elected" president who has no intention of leaving office when his term is up. Again, Chávez's Venezuela provides the template. To this day, a number of Venezuelan experts believe that the so-called "coup" of April 11, 2002 was a staged event, designed expressly for the purpose of identifying high-ranking Chávez opponents in uniform so they could be relieved of duty and replaced by less-qualified, loyal soldiers.

On Tuesday, Evo fired 28 Bolivian generals -- essentially the entire high command -- on charges of treason for allowing the U.S. to destroy some two dozen Chinese missiles held by the Bolivian military. He didn't mention that the missiles were obsolete and that both parties acted within OAS conventions. He then reportedly passed over the next generation of officers to replace the generals with a young group of soldiers. There can be little doubt that these new generals understand well that the president deserves credit for their accelerated career success.

There are of course differences between Bolivia and Venezuela, the biggest one being that Evo doesn't have the resources to purchase influence the way Hugo has done. But that may also explain why he's moving much faster to neutralize the military and protect his power against future challengers.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Bush Sees No Need For Law To Approve Eavesdropping (NYT)

By Elisabeth Bumiller

The New York Times, January 27, 2006

WASHINGTON, Jan. 26 — President Bush declared again on Thursday that his administration's program for eavesdropping without warrants was well within existing law, and said that efforts in Congress to write legislation expressly giving him authority for such a program were unnecessary and dangerous.

"My concern has always been that in an attempt to try to pass a law on something that's already legal, we'll show the enemy what we're doing," Mr. Bush said in a wide-ranging morning news conference in the White House press briefing room. The president added that if the effort to write a new law "is likely to expose the nature of the program, I'll resist it."

Mr. Bush's 46-minute news conference, announced less than an hour and a half ahead of time, was an effort by the White House to frame the debate on an array of foreign and domestic issues only five days before his State of the Union address. The topics included the Hamas landslide in the Palestinian elections; photographs of Mr. Bush with Jack Abramoff, the disgraced Republican lobbyist; and the Congressional investigation into the administration's response to Hurricane Katrina.

Mr. Bush appeared relaxed in the briefing room, which his aides say he prefers for news conferences instead of the more formal East Room. He appeared apprehensive at first, but loosened up when he saw a camera dangling precariously from a cord in the ceiling, threatening to crash down on the heads of reporters. "Are you wearing your helmets?" Mr. Bush asked.

He said he welcomed traveling for the 2006 midterm elections in November. "I've got one more off-year campaign in me as a sitting president, and I'm looking forward to it," he said. "As you know, I like to get out and tell people what's on my mind."

The eavesdropping program dominated the domestic policy questions at the news conference, which Mr. Bush used as another volley in his weeklong campaign to push back against both Democrats and Republicans who question the program's legality. Senate Judiciary Committee hearings into the program are to begin next month.

"There's no doubt in my mind it is legal," Mr. Bush said.

He reiterated that the program, which intercepts international phone calls and e-mail messages of people in the United States suspected by the government of having links to Al Qaeda, was crucial to national security, and declared that he had the constitutional authority in wartime to order it. He said that after the Sept. 11 attacks he had asked people like Lt. Gen. Michael V. Hayden, then the director of the National Security Agency and now the principal deputy director of national intelligence, to come up with plans to protect against terrorist attacks.

"And so he came forward with this program," Mr. Bush said. "In other words, it wasn't designed in the White House; it was designed where you expect it to be designed, in the N.S.A."

Mr. Bush took issue with a questioner who asked why he felt the need to circumvent the 1978 Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, which requires court warrants for wiretaps.

"Wait a minute," Mr. Bush said. "That's a — there's something — it's like saying, you know, 'You're breaking the law.' I'm not." He said that the surveillance act "was written in 1978" and that now "it's a different world."

Mr. Bush sidestepped a question on whether the eavesdropping program was part of an effort by the White House to reassert executive power.

"I would say that there has been a historical debate between the executive branch and the legislative branch as to who's got what power," he said. "And I don't view it as a contest with the legislative branch. Maybe they view it as a contest with the executive. I just don't."

Bush Reasserts Presidential Prerogatives (WP)

By Jim Vandehei

DOJ_NMG_0012563

The Washington Post, January 27, 2006

President Bush set limits yesterday on White House cooperation in three political disputes, saying he is determined to assert presidential prerogatives on such matters as domestic eavesdropping and congressional inquiries into Hurricane Katrina.

In a mid-morning news conference, Bush told reporters he is skeptical of a proposed law imposing new oversights on his use of the National Security Agency to listen in on electronic communications. He also said that he will block White House aides from testifying about the slow federal response to Hurricane Katrina, and that he will not release official White House photos of himself with former Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

Facing repeated questions, Bush distanced himself from Abramoff, who is at the center of the biggest political corruption and bribery scandal in a generation. Bush said he does not recall having his picture taken with Abramoff or ever meeting him. Abramoff was a member of the exclusive club of Bush's $100,000 fundraisers known as Pioneers.

"Having my picture taken with someone doesn't mean that I'm a friend with him or know him very well," Bush told reporters.

According to three people who reviewed half a dozen photos of the men, Bush is pictured at official gatherings and fundraisers with Abramoff and his children. He also attended a White House meeting with some of Abramoff's clients, including tribal leaders and the then-speaker of the House for the Northern Mariana Islands, the sources said. Abramoff has pictures from the event, they said.

If prosecutors "believe something was done inappropriately in the White House, they'll come and look and they're welcome to do so," Bush said. The White House has also refused to detail meetings between Abramoff and top White House aides.

The president was similarly adamant about not allowing top aides to testify about Hurricane Katrina. Bush, who has moved on several fronts over the past five years to strengthen the power of the presidency, said it would be damaging to him and future presidents if aides feared providing candid advice.

Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (D-Conn.), a staunch supporter of Bush on foreign policy, has accused the White House of undermining the probe by refusing to detail the role of White House officials. "If people give me advice and they're forced to disclose that advice, it means the next time an issue comes up I might not be able to get unvarnished advice from my advisers," Bush said. "And that's just the way it works."

On the issue of NSA eavesdropping on overseas communications to or from U.S. citizens, Bush said he is concerned about Congress writing a new spying law because it could force the government to provide details and clues about a top-secret program used to hunt down terrorists.

"There's no doubt in my mind it is legal," Bush said. Democrats have accused Bush of breaking the law by authorizing the spying program without approval from Congress or the courts. The debate is expected to dominate hearings, scheduled to begin Feb. 6, on the highly classified NSA program.

"But it's important for people to understand that this program is so sensitive and so important that if information gets out to how we run it or how we operate it, it'll help the enemy," he said. "Why tell the enemy what we're doing?"

In his 10th news conference since winning reelection, Bush talked at length about presidential power but also previewed next week's State of the Union speech and weighed in on several foreign policy issues, including the Hamas victory in the Palestinian elections.

The performance was quintessential Bush: He joked and sparred with reporters, and betrayed no sense of second-guessing his decisions. When pressed about the election victory of Hamas, which the United States and other countries have called a terrorist group, Bush initially portrayed the vote as a triumph of the democratic process and a wake-up call to the current Palestinian leadership. Later, he conceded the results could set back the Middle East peace process, a top Bush priority.

Bush was often blunt, at one point taking a reporter's challenge to declare with "Texas straight talk" that the United States will never torture prisoners. "No American will be allowed to torture another human being anywhere in the world," Bush shot back. He said that is why the White House supported the law sponsored by Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) that outlawed cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment of detainees. A statement released by the White House when Bush signed the law, however, left vague whether the administration is asserting that a loophole exists.

Bush endorsed a plan to allow Russia to help produce nuclear energy for Iran as a way to keep the anti-American regime from building nuclear weapons. But he mischaracterized Iran's public position by saying, "The Iranians have said, 'We want a weapon.' " Publicly, the Iranian government has insisted the opposite is true, though Tehran is widely believed to be actively seeking nuclear weapons.

Although he has not vetoed a spending bill since taking office, Bush warned he is "fully prepared to use the veto" if lawmakers overspend. The government is more than 25 percent larger today in total spending than it was the day Bush took office, and conservatives are calling on the president and Congress to reduce the size of the federal budget.

Bush is expected to talk about new spending restraint during his State of the Union address Tuesday night. The speech will be the official start of a legislative year that will be confined by high budget deficits and a tight legislative schedule. As Bush was speaking, the Congressional Budget Office estimated the 2006 deficit at $337 billion, up from 2005.

Bush will forgo expensive new programs in his speech, aides said, though he will call for new tax breaks to mitigate the cost of health insurance, which has skyrocketed in recent years. With the House and Senate up for grabs in November, politics, not policy, will likely drive much of the congressional agenda.

Bush said he is excited to be campaigning for GOP candidates in the midterm elections, which he predicted will be about "peace and prosperity."

At hearings on the NSA spying, Democrats plan to press administration officials to explain why Bush did not consult Congress more broadly about the program, why he does not believe Congress should write a new law governing eavesdropping programs such as the NSA operation, and why he believes the super-secret Federal Intelligence Surveillance Act courts should not be consulted before eavesdropping on communications to and from the United States. In his news conference, Bush emphasized that FISA was enacted in 1978 -- "a different world," he said.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) said Bush's explanation that the Constitution and the war resolution passed after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks provide the president with extraordinary wartime power is wrong. "Congress can't roll over in the face of these outrageous claims," Kennedy said. "No president is above the law."

Bush Claims Authority On War, Eavesdropping (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, January 27, 2006

President Bush yesterday said he has exclusive authority over a broad range of issues -- including forbidding White House officials to testify before Congress about the government's Hurricane Katrina response and ordering warrantless electronic surveillance within the United States.

"Conducting war is a responsibility in the executive branch, not the legislative branch," the president said at a 46-minute press conference. "Most presidents believe that during a time of war that we can use our authorities under the Constitution to make decisions necessary to protect us."

Democrats have accused the president of breaking the law by ordering the National Security Agency in 2002 to eavesdrop on international communications between suspected terrorists and people in the United States. Senate hearings on the once-secret program are scheduled for Feb. 6.

Mr. Bush acknowledged that "there will be a legal debate about whether or not I have the authority to do this," but added, "I'm absolutely convinced I do. And I'm going to continue using my authority."

In response to a question from The Washington Times, Mr. Bush said: "We're going to do what is necessary, within the Constitution and within the law, and at the same time guaranteeing people's civil liberties, to protect the people."

Asked whether he would support efforts in Congress to spell out his authority to continue the eavesdropping program, Mr. Bush cited what he said was the extreme secrecy of the operation, first revealed by the New York Times last month.

"It's important for people to understand that this program is so sensitive and so important that if information gets out to how we run it or how we operate it, it'll help the enemy," he said.

Asked why his administration has refused to allow senior staff, including his former FEMA director, Michael Brown, "to testify, to interview or talk with congressional leaders" about the federal government's response to Hurricane Katrina, Mr. Bush cited his executive authority.

"If people give me advice and they're forced to disclose that advice, it means the next time an issue comes up I might not be able to get unvarnished advice from my advisers," he said. "It will have a chilling effect on future advisers if the precedent is such that when they give me advice that it's going to be subject to scrutiny."

The president opened with a preview of his State of the Union address, which he will deliver Tuesday to a joint session of Congress. He said he believes Democrats and Republicans can accomplish something together even though this is a congressional election year. Responding to a question later, he said he was eager to get out and help Republicans win in November.

"I've got one more off-year campaign in me as a sitting president, and I'm looking forward to it," he said.

Bush Calls Warrantless Wiretaps Legal (AP-Y2)

By Terence Hunt

AP2, January 27, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0012565

President Bush again defended his program of warrantless surveillance Thursday, saying "there's no doubt in my mind it is legal." He suggested that he might resist congressional efforts to change or expressly endorse it.

"The program's legal, it's designed to protect civil liberties, and it's necessary," Bush told a White House news conference.

Democrats have accused the president of breaking the law in allowing eavesdropping on overseas communications to and from U.S. residents, and even some members of his own party have questioned the practice.

It was the president's first full-scale news conference of the new year, and the 10th since he was re-elected in 2004. He previewed his upcoming State of the Union address and fielded questions on former lobbyist Jack Abramoff, the stunning victory of the radical group Hamas in Palestinian elections and the administration's cooperation with Congress on its investigation of Hurricane Katrina.

Asked if he would support efforts in Congress to spell out his authority to continue the eavesdropping program, Bush cited what he said was the extreme delicacy of the operation.

"But it's important for people to understand that this program is so sensitive and so important that if information gets out to how we run it or how we operate it, it'll help the enemy," he said. "Why tell the enemy what we're doing?"

"We'll listen to ideas. But I want to make sure that people understand that if the attempt to write law makes this program -- is likely to expose the nature of the program, I'll resist it," he said.

On the Middle East, Bush expressed concern that Palestinian elections had given a majority to the radical party Hamas, which has called for the elimination of Israel, although he noted that democratic elections sometimes produce unwelcome results.

He made it clear that any organization that has an armed wing and which advocates violence against Israel "is a party with which we will not deal."

Bush called the election results a "wake-up call" to the old guard Palestinian leadership, many of whom are holdovers from the days of the late PLO ChairmanYasser Arafat.

Questioned about a controversy swirling about disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff, Bush said he would cooperate with federal prosecutors investigating Abramoff and his alleged influence peddling activities, if necessary. Otherwise, the president said he saw no reason to release pictures that he acknowledged were taken of him and Abramoff.

"There is a serious investigation going on by federal prosecutors — that's their job," the president said. "If they believe something was done inappropriately in the White House, they'll come and look and they're welcome to do so."

Otherwise, Bush said, "I've had my picture taken with a lot of people. Having my picture taken with someone doesn't mean that I'm a friend with him or know him very well. "

"I've had my picture taken with you," Bush said to the reporter who asked the question.

Pressed further on his relationship with Abramoff, who has pleaded guilty to federal charges stemming from his lobbying practices and has pledged to cooperate with investigators, Bush said, "I frankly don't even remember having my picture taken with the guy. I don't know him."

He said that federal investigators should pursue all leads and "look into all aspects of his influence on Capitol Hill," and that if the path also leads to the White House, he was sure they would "come knock on the door."

He was asked if he meets with lobbyists. "I try not to," Bush replied.

Asked about assertions by some Democrats that they will take back control of Congress in this year's midterm elections, Bush said he wasn't surprised they were talking that way, but shrugged it off.

He said he was ready to hit the campaign trail one more time, not for himself, but to stump for Republican congressional candidates this year. "We've got a record and a good one, and that's what I intend to campaign on," Bush said.

The president defended his administration's level of cooperation with congressional investigations into the government's slow response to the Hurricane Katrina devastation, citing the thousands of documents the White House has provided.

Questioned on congressional complaints that more could be done, Bush said that it would have a "chilling effect" on the ability of presidential advisers to speak freely.

Bush also said that his nominee for Supreme Court, Samuel Alito, deserves to be confirmed in the Senate, where he clearly has the votes but where minority-party Democrats were speaking out against him at length.

"The Senate needs to give him an up or down vote as soon as possible," Bush said in opening remarks that also previewed the themes of his State of the Union address next Tuesday.

Bush shrugged off a recent Pentagon-contracted report which concluded the Army was overextended and the United States cannot sustain the pace of troop deployments to Iraq long enough to break the back of the insurgency there.

The president predicted victory in Iraq and said, "Our commanders will have the troops necessary to do that."

He said the military was focused on transforming itself to ensure the armed forces could meet its goals in the 21st century.

DOJ_NMG_0012566

"After five years of war, there is a need to make sure that our troops are balanced properly, that threats are met with capability. And that's why we're transforming our military," Bush said.

Trying To Maintain Control Of The State, In A State Of Confusion (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, January 27, 2006

The best-laid plans for President Bush's news conference went awry just 30 seconds into the event. An Associated Press camera and tripod broke free from their bracket on the ceiling and, in view of the TV cameras, dangled menacingly over reporters from Bloomberg News and the New York Daily News.

"First, I recognize . . ." Bush said, looking up and noticing the twirling piece of metal. "We live in a momentous time . . ." he tried again, then looked back at the unmoored object, which was blocking the MSNBC camera's shot of him. "For those of you watching, we seem to have a mechanical flaw," he felt obliged to explain.

The most powerful man in the world spent the next couple of minutes laboring through his opening statement yesterday in the White House briefing room while a large, bald technician walked into the picture and attempted, in a series of acrobatic gestures, to unscrew the tripod.

For the president, it was a timely reminder that events are not always within his control -- as if he needed another reminder. Earlier in the morning, the world learned that Palestinian voters had just handed their government to the terrorist group Hamas. Bush, trying to explain this reversal, suggested the defeated (U.S.-backed) leadership was crooked.

"If there is corruption, I'm not surprised that people say, 'Let's get rid of corruption,' " he reasoned -- inviting an unwelcome comparison to Jack Abramoff and the 2006 elections.

In all, Bush uttered nearly 7,000 words in his 45-minute Q&A. But his message could be summed up with a brief phrase in his least-favorite language: L'Etat c'est moi (I am the state).

His approval of a program to eavesdrop without warrants: "As I stand here right now, I can tell the American people the program is legal," he certified.

His refusal to provide Congress with testimony about the federal response to Hurricane Katrina: "That's just the way it works."

Midway through this Bourbonic performance, the Los Angeles Times's James Gerstenzang offered an observation on Bush's surveillance policy: "This seems to sound like something President Nixon once said, which was: 'When the president does it, then that means that it's not illegal.' " Whispered "oohs" could be heard in the room. Bush gave a look indicating he wished the dangling camera had fallen on Gerstenzang.

"Most presidents believe that during a time of war that we can use our authorities under the Constitution to make decisions necessary to protect us," he answered, then offered his reading of legislation passed after the 2001 terrorist attacks: "Go ahead and conduct the war. We're not going to tell you how to do it."

Bush seemed distracted even before the camera dislodged. "I do want to give you some thoughts about what I'm thinking about," he began.

The Hamas news may have been weighing on his mind. But he spoke as though the terrorist group's landslide had been a balloting triumph. "So the Palestinians had an election yesterday, the results of which remind me about the power of democracy," he said, later adding: "I like the competition of ideas."

When CBS's John Roberts steered questioning toward the National Security Agency's surveillance, Bush dismissed the notion of a law that legitimized it. "My concern has always been that, in an attempt to try to pass a law on something that's already legal, we'll show the enemy what we're doing," he said. "If the attempt to write a law is likely to expose the nature of the program, I'll resist it."

Even the Washington Times pressed Bush to answer charges that he has abused his power. But the president declined to be drawn into constitutional nuance. "I'm going to leave that to the lawyers," he said. "I believe I've been hired by the people to do my job, and that's to protect the people."

Another questioner wondered what it was about the 1978 law governing domestic wiretapping "that you feel you have to circumvent it."

The president's lip curled upward. He held up his hand, then leaned on the lectern and pointed his finger. "It's like saying, 'You know, you're breaking the law.' I'm not," he protested. Still, Bush explained why he disregarded the 1978 law. "I said, 'Look, is it possible to conduct this program under the old law?' And people said, 'It doesn't work.' "

DOJ_NMG_0012567

The questions about the Abramoff photos heightened Bush's irritation. "Having my picture taken with someone doesn't mean that I'm a friend with him or know him very well," he replied to one questioner. "I've had my picture taken with you."

A few questions later, Bush made the distance between Abramoff and himself even longer. "I, frankly, don't even remember having my picture taken with the guy," he declared. "I don't know him."

Still, the president seemed to realize the questions about the photos were not going away. CBS Radio's Mark Knoller tried another approach. "Never mind about the photographs, but can you say whether . . . "

Bush cut him off. "Easy," he noted, "for a radio guy to say."

Bush To Resist Wiretap Legislation (WSJ)

By Christopher Cooper

The Wall Street Journal, January 27, 2006

WASHINGTON -- President Bush suggested he will resist any congressional attempts to modify the administration's practice of conducting warrantless wiretaps, saying the program is already legal and would lose effectiveness if subjected to a protracted public debate.

In his first news conference of the year, Mr. Bush said yesterday that while he will consider congressional suggestions to modify the program, he won't support public debate that divulges how it works -- even if lawmakers' intent is to preserve the program.

Asking, "why tell the enemy what we're doing if the program is necessary to protect us from the enemy?" Mr. Bush said if congressional debate should expose "the nature of the program, I'll resist it."

Critics, including some Republicans, say the program, which is conducted by the National Security Agency under authorization by the president, tramples the Constitution and represents an overreach of executive authority. The Bush administration says the program is legal and that some lawmakers have been briefed regularly on it since it was initiated shortly after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

It is uncertain how far the administration will go to cut off debate on the issue, even if there is a drive to give the White House authority to continue the practice. Congress has scheduled a Feb. 6 hearing on the program.

President Bush holds a press conference2 to answer questions about the Hamas Islamist party, the economy and the domestic-surveillance program, among other topics. · Read the transcript of the news briefing3.

What Mr. Bush hasn't resisted are opportunities to discuss the program himself, which he has been doing since its existence was revealed last month. In an interview with The Wall Street Journal on Wednesday, Mr. Bush said that while he was "sorry" the program was revealed, he now believed it necessary to explain its importance to the public. "We have to be able to describe to the people the principles of the program without giving to the enemy what's happening," Mr. Bush said.

Mr. Bush's news conference included a variety of subjects but concentrated on the NSA program, the White House's contacts with disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff and the surprise sweep of the extremist Hamas organization in Wednesday's parliamentary elections in the Palestinian territories.

Mr. Abramoff, who pleaded guilty earlier this year to federal charges related to his lobbying activities, had visited the White House and contributed to Mr. Bush's campaign. Recently a handful of pictures surfaced showing Mr. Bush and Mr. Abramoff at various events.

Reporters have pressed the White House to release the photographs of the president and Mr. Abramoff but have been rebuffed. The administration also has refused to say whether Mr. Abramoff ever met with Mr. Bush's senior staff. Yesterday, Mr. Bush declined to disclose whether Mr. Abramoff had ever met with his senior advisers, saying the matter remained under federal investigation and that he would cooperate with that probe if asked. He also declined to release the photographs, saying they were "grip and grin" shots that would be used for "pure political purposes" if made public.

"I've had my picture taken with a lot of people," Mr. Bush said, adding that he had no relationship with Mr. Abramoff. "I don't know him," Mr. Bush said.

The president reiterated his vow not to deal with Hamas. Mr. Bush urged the current Palestinian president, Mahmoud Abbas, to stay on so Washington can maintain a diplomatic channel with the territorial government. The landslide for Hamas, which refuses to recognize Israel's right to exist, is all but certain to bog down the U.S.-backed peace process in the region. But Mr. Bush said he remains optimistic. "Peace is never dead, because people want peace," he said.

Bush Resists Changing Law On Spying (REU-Y2)

By Tabassum Zakaria

Reuters, January 27, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0012568

President George W. Bush on Thursday insisted his decision to allow spying on Americans' international telephone calls was legal and said he would resist changing laws governing such action if it meant revealing secrets to an enemy.

Democrats and some Republicans question the legality of Bush's decision, taken after the September 11 attacks, to authorize eavesdropping without court approval if one of the parties on the call was suspected of links to terrorism.

Former Vice President Al Gore, the Democrat who lost the 2000 presidential election to Bush, has called for a special counsel to investigate whether the president broke the law, and Congress is to hold hearings on the issue.

The 1978 Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act makes it illegal to spy on U.S. citizens inside the United States without approval from the special FISA court.

Bush said he acted to allow the National Security Agency to move more quickly in monitoring suspect communications to head off possible further attacks.

He said a measure passed by Congress after the September 11 attacks gave him authority to use whatever force was necessary against the enemy in his declared "war against terrorism."

Bush dismissed critics who say he should have worked with Congress to change the 1978 law, passed to halt intrusive domestic spying under President Richard Nixon.

"My concern has always been that, in an attempt to try to pass a law on something that's already legal, we'll show the enemy what we're doing," Bush said at a press conference.

He said the spying program was "so sensitive and so important" that if information was revealed about how it operated, it would help the enemy.

SECRET PROGRAM

"And so, of course, we'll listen to ideas. But I want to make sure that people understand that if the attempt to write law makes this program -- is likely to expose the nature of the program, I'll resist it," Bush said.

Sen. Dianne Feinstein (news, bio, voting record), a California Democrat, said: "I have been deeply troubled by the fact that the administration, if it believed it needed additional authorities related to domestic electronic surveillance, did not seek legislation granting them that authority."

The White House has been on a public campaign to reassure Americans that this is a limited program and the government is not engaged in a mass spying operation.

In that effort, the White House says the program should not be referred to as "domestic spying" because one end of the link being monitored is overseas. The White House is calling it "the terrorist surveillance program."

Bush said Gen. Michael Hayden, the former director of the National Security Agency, came forward with the program as a tool for fighting terrorism after the September 11 attack.

"It wasn't designed in the White House. It was designed where you expect it to be designed, in the NSA," Bush said.

Government lawyers looked at the program before it was implemented and there were safeguards to make sure it focused on calls in which someone suspected of links to al Qaeda was involved, Bush said.

"And so, as I stand here right now, I can tell the American people the program's legal, it's designed to protect civil liberties and it's necessary," he said.

Bush, who visited the NSA on Wednesday, said he takes the threats from al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden seriously. In an audiotape aired last week bin Laden said al Qaeda was preparing attacks inside the United States.

Varied Rationales Muddle Issue Of NSA Eavesdropping (WP)

By Dan Eggen And Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, January 27, 2006

President Bush said yesterday that he didn't seek congressional approval for a warrantless domestic eavesdropping program for one simple reason: He didn't need it.

"We believe there's a constitutional power granted to presidents as well as, this case, a statutory power," Bush said. "And I'm intending to use that power."

It is one of several explanations on the topic from Bush and his aides, who have provided at least two separate rationales for why they did not ask for statutory authority for the program. Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales said the administration had considered seeking legislation but determined it would be impossible to get, adding later in the same news conference that authorities did not want to expose the program's existence. White House spokesman Scott McClellan has echoed the latter point, saying the administration feared that details of the classified program would be exposed publicly.

The subject is one of several elements in the NSA spying debate that have been clouded by apparent contradictions and mixed messages from the government since the program was revealed last month. The confusion has cleared up little in recent days, as the White House has embarked on a multi-pronged campaign to defend the legality of the controversial program.

Gonzales and other officials, for example, have repeatedly said that the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act (FISA), which governs secret surveillance in the United States, is too cumbersome to be applied to the NSA eavesdropping program. Yet the Justice Department raised concerns about a 2002 bill to loosen FISA requirements.

Before the program's existence was revealed, several administration officials also emphasized in testimony and public statements that the NSA was prohibited from engaging in domestic surveillance -- even as the agency was clearly doing so under the authority of Bush's secret order that established the program.

Many Democratic lawmakers and legal experts have seized on these and other issues in recent days to argue that the Bush administration has been misleading in its explanations of the NSA program.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) said that the "after-the-fact spin we're hearing now is worthless." Senate Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) issued a statement yesterday criticizing the administration for claiming that Congress had been fully briefed on the NSA program and for opposing the 2002 measure to loosen FISA standards.

The latter issue attracted particular criticism yesterday, as lawmakers and national security experts opposed to the program cast doubts on the administration's current legal rationale.

An amendment to FISA proposed by Sen. Mike DeWine (R-Ohio) would have lowered the standard to be met for authorizing surveillance of non-U.S. citizens, from "probable cause" to "reasonable suspicion" that the target was an agent of a terrorist group. The Justice Department did not offer support for DeWine's amendment because of "significant legal and practical issues," according to department statements.

Confusion over the issue deepened further yesterday after officials discovered two versions of a Justice statement on the legislation. One, which was posted on the Federation of American Scientists Web site and quoted in media reports, noted possible constitutional concerns. The other, held by the Senate intelligence committee, did not include that issue. Officials could not explain the disparity.

A Justice spokeswoman said this week that the previous opinion did not conflict with current legal justifications for the NSA spying because "probable cause" required under FISA is "essentially the same" as the standard used in the NSA program: "a reasonable basis to believe" that a target is linked to al Qaeda or an affiliate.

But Timothy H. Edgar, a national security lawyer at the American Civil Liberties Union, also said the NSA program clearly operates under a lower legal standard allowed only in limited circumstances, such as when police to frisk suspicious people on the street.

"That's never been considered acceptable for searching someone or listening to their telephone," Edgar said.

Bush and his top aides have repeatedly stressed that "Congress" had been briefed on the program over the past four years, but have often neglected to mention that the briefings were limited to the "Gang of Eight": the speaker and minority leader of the House; the majority and minority leaders of the Senate; and the chairmen and ranking Democrats on the two intelligence committees. And they were barred from taking notes or discussing what they heard with other lawmakers or their staffs.

Sen. John D. "Jay" Rockefeller IV (D-W.Va.), who as vice chairman of the Senate intelligence panel was briefed in 2003, took the unusual step of sending Vice President Cheney a classified letter voicing his concerns about the program and the lack of oversight on how it was being carried out. Several other prominent Democrats have also questioned the program's legality since it was made public, including Reid, House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) and Rep. Jane Harman (D-Calif.), ranking minority member of the House intelligence committee.

Yet Dan Bartlett, counselor to Bush and White House communications director, said Monday that the lawmakers who had been briefed "believed we are doing the right thing" and that Democratic leaders "briefed on these programs would be screaming from the mountaintops" if they thought the program was illegally eavesdropping on Americans.

Some critics, including a group of relatives of victims of the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, have also focused on previous statements by Gen. Michael V. Hayden -- the deputy intelligence director who formerly headed the NSA -- that now appear to be, at best, incomplete.

For example, Hayden and other NSA staff members told the House-Senate inquiry into the attacks that "they do not want to be perceived as focusing NSA capabilities against U.S. persons in the United States," said the panel's report. "The Director and his staff were unanimous that lessons NSA learned as a result of Congressional investigations during the 1970's should not be forgotten."

Hayden suggested similar limitations in an appearance before the House intelligence committee in October 2002, telling Porter J. Goss, then the committee chairman, that the NSA "would have no authorities" to pursue Osama bin Laden if he entered the United States. The NSA program was at least a year old by that time, and Goss -- now the CIA director -- was one of the few members of Congress briefed on it. Experts also say Hayden was wrong to suggest that bin Laden would enjoy the same legal protections as U.S. citizens or residents.

Staff writers Carol D. Leonnig and Dafna Linzer and researcher Julie Tate contributed to this report.

New Poll Finds Mixed Support For Wiretaps (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney And Janet Elder

The New York Times, January 27, 2006

Americans are willing to tolerate eavesdropping without warrants to fight terrorism, but are concerned that the aggressive antiterrorism programs championed by the Bush administration are encroaching on civil liberties, according to the latest New York Times/CBS News poll.

In a sign that public opinion about the trade-offs between national security and individual rights is nuanced and remains highly unresolved, responses to questions about the administration's eavesdropping program varied significantly depending on how the questions were worded, underlining the importance of the effort by the White House this week to define the issue on its terms.

The poll, conducted as President Bush defended his surveillance program in the face of criticism from Democrats and some Republicans that it is illegal, found that Americans were willing to give the administration some latitude for its surveillance program if they believed it was intended to protect them. Fifty-three percent of the respondents said they supported eavesdropping without warrants "in order to reduce the threat of terrorism."

The results suggest that Americans' view of the program depends in large part on whether they perceive it as a bulwark in the fight against terrorism, as Mr. Bush has sought to cast it, or as an unnecessary and unwarranted infringement on civil liberties, as critics have said.

In one striking finding, respondents overwhelmingly supported e-mail and telephone monitoring directed at "Americans that the government is suspicious of;" they overwhelmingly opposed the same kind of surveillance if it was aimed at "ordinary Americans."

Mr. Bush, at a White House press conference yesterday, twice used the phrase "terrorist surveillance program" to describe an operation in which the administration has eavesdropped on telephone calls and other communications like e-mail that it says could involve operatives of Al Qaeda overseas talking to Americans. Critics say the administration could conduct such surveillance while still getting prior court approval, as spelled out in a 1978 law intended to guard against governmental abuses.

The findings came in a poll conducted as Mr. Bush prepares to deliver his fifth State of the Union address on Tuesday. It found that Mr. Bush will face a nation that has grown sour on Washington and skeptical that he will be able to achieve significant progress in health care, the economy, the Iraq war and the cost of prescription drugs for older patients before he leaves office in three years.

The poll also signaled concern for Republicans as they prepare to defend their control of the House and the Senate in midterm elections this November. Investigations into Congressional corruption are taking a toll as the elections approach: 61 percent of Americans now hold an unfavorable view of Congress, the highest in 10 years.

This finding holds particular peril for Republicans as the party that has been in charge. More than half of the respondents said they believed that most members of Congress would exchange votes for money or favors.

Republicans were seen as more likely to be unduly influenced by lobbyists. And the Republican Party is now viewed unfavorably by 51 percent of the nation, its worst rating since Mr. Bush took office. By contrast, 53 percent said they held a favorable view of Democrats.

The telephone poll was conducted with 1,229 adults, starting Friday and ending Wednesday. Its margin of sampling error was plus or minus three percentage points.

The poll found that Americans were to a large extent perplexed as they weighed conflicting forces: the need presented by Mr. Bush to take extraordinary action to fight terrorism, and a historical aversion to an overly intrusive government.

The poll found that 53 percent of Americans approved of Mr. Bush's authorizing eavesdropping without prior court approval "in order to reduce the threat of terrorism"; 46 percent disapproved. When the question was asked stripped of any mention of terrorism, 46 percent of those respondents approved, and 50 percent said they disapproved.

At the same time, 64 percent said they were very or somewhat concerned about losing civil liberties as a result of antiterrorism measures put in place by Mr. Bush since the attacks of Sept. 11. And respondents were more likely to be concerned that the government would enact strong antiterrorism laws that excessively restrict civil liberties than they were that the government would fail to enact antiterrorism laws.

The poll was conducted just as the White House commenced an elaborate campaign to defend the surveillance program, and thus may have been too early to offer a full measure of that campaign's effectiveness. There were no measurable changes in the poll findings from one day to the next.

The findings, and follow-up interviews with some participants, clearly suggest that Mr. Bush has an opportunity to make the dispute over the program play to his political advantage. He has been pointing to the threat of another terrorist attack to justify the eavesdropping program and is trying, for the third election in a row, to suggest that he and his party are more aggressive about protecting the nation than are Democrats.

"Say they're targeting someone in Al Qaeda outside the country, and that person then calls someone in the United States about a plot or something really bad: I don't have a problem with that phone being monitored," Debbie Viebranz, 51, a Republican from Ohio, said in a follow-up interview. "But I don't think they should do it for no reason."

Donnis Wells, 69, a Republican from Florence, Miss., said: "I don't think civil liberties are the more important thing we need to handle right now. I think we need to protect our people."

Still, interviews reflected clear apprehension about the program. "If there is a warrant and done by the courts, I would agree," said Robert Ray, 54, an independent from Kentucky. "But they're trying to do it without using the courts. I just don't trust them."

In the poll, 70 percent of respondents said they would not be willing to support governmental monitoring of the communications of "ordinary Americans"; 68 percent said they would be willing to support such monitoring of "Americans the government is suspicious of."

Beyond surveillance, the poll found that Americans hold unfavorable views of the president and the Republican-controlled Congress as Mr. Bush prepares to give his State of the Union speech. Americans, while declaring themselves generally optimistic about the next three years under Mr. Bush, do not expect him to accomplish very much in that time.

When Mr. Bush leaves office, respondents said, the deficit will be larger than it is today, the elderly will be being paying more for prescription drugs, and the economy and the health care system will be the same as today, or worse.

Mr. Bush is viewed favorably by 42 percent of the respondents, statistically the same as in the last Times/CBS News poll, in early December, a lackluster rating that could hamper his ability to rally public opinion behind his agenda and push legislation through a divided Congress. Beyond that, nearly two-thirds of the country thinks the nation is on the wrong track, a level that has historically proved to be a matter of concern for a party in power.

A majority said they were dissatisfied with the way Mr. Bush was managing the economy and the war in Iraq. Public approval for his handling of the campaign against terrorism, once one of his greatest political strengths, has rebounded somewhat from last fall, but remains well below where it was for the first two years after the Sept. 11 attacks.

Most strikingly, the poll found abundant evidence of public unhappiness with Congress. While it is risky to draw conclusions about Congressional elections from national measurements of discontent — for example, more than half of all Americans said they were satisfied with the job their member of Congress was doing — the findings underscored the tough electoral environment that has led some analysts to predict significant Republican losses this fall.

The corruption investigations appear to account for a lot of the dissatisfaction. Nearly 80 percent of respondents said that the kind of influence-peddling revelations that have emerged in the investigation of the lobbyist Jack Abramoff reflected the "way things work in Congress" and were not isolated incidents. More than 50 percent said most members of Congress "accept bribes or gifts that affect their votes."

"It seems like the integrity of Congress members in the last few years has just gone to pot," said Donald Pertuis, 54, an independent voter from Hot Springs, Ark. Mr. Pertuis added: "In the last 20 years, greed has accelerated. People expect more, I suppose, and want to work less."

A Discredit To The GOP (WP)

THE BUSH administration's distortion, for political purposes, of the Democratic position on warrantless surveillance is loathsome. Despite the best efforts of Karl Rove, the White House deputy chief of staff, and Ken Mehlman, the Republican National Committee chairman, to make it seem otherwise, Democrats are not opposed to vigorous, effective surveillance that could uncover terrorist activity. Nor are the concerns that they are expressing unique to their party. Republican Sens. John McCain (Ariz.), Arlen Specter (Pa.), Chuck Hagel (Neb.), Lindsey O. Graham (S.C.) and Sam Brownback (Kan.) have expressed legal doubts about the surveillance program. Do they, too, have a "pre-9/11 worldview," as Mr. Rove said of the Democrats?

Believing there should be constraints on unchecked executive power is not the same as being weak-kneed about the war against terrorism. Critics are suggesting that President Bush should have gone through normal procedures for conducting such surveillance or asked Congress to provide clear legal authority for the National Security Agency activity. They are not contending that such surveillance shouldn't be conducted at all. No leading Democrat has argued for barring this kind of potentially useful technique.

But you wouldn't know that to listen to the GOP spin. "Let me be as clear as I can be -- President Bush believes if al Qaeda is calling somebody in America, it is in our national security interest to know who they're calling and why," Mr. Rove said at the Republican National Committee winter meeting last week. "Some important Democrats clearly disagree." Mr. Mehlman named names. "Do Nancy Pelosi and Howard Dean really think that when the NSA is listening in on terrorists planning attacks on America, they need to hang up when those terrorists dial their sleeper cells inside the United States?" he asked.

Maybe, as a matter of crass political calculation, Mr. Rove and Mr. Mehlman are correct that Democrats criticizing warrantless wiretaps will pay a price in the November elections. We don't pretend to know. What we do know is that the country is in the midst of an important debate about the reach of presidential power and the scope of civil liberties in wartime. For Rove & Co. to try to turn this into just another partisan political skewer discredits their administration and their party.

Using Our Fear (WP)

By Eugene Robinson

The Washington Post, January 27, 2006

Once upon a time we had a great wartime president who told Americans they had nothing to fear but fear itself. Now we have George W. Bush, who uses fear as a tool of executive power and as a political weapon against his opponents.

Franklin D. Roosevelt tried his best to allay his nation's fears in the midst of an epic struggle against fascism. Bush, as he leads the country in a war whose nature he is constantly redefining, keeps fear alive because it has been so useful. His political grand vizier, Karl Rove, was perfectly transparent the other day when he emerged from wherever he's been hiding the past few months -- consulting omens, reading entrails -- and gave the Republican National Committee its positioning statement for the fall elections: Vote for us or die.

Democrats "have a pre-9/11 worldview" of national security that is "deeply and profoundly and consistently wrong," Rove said. The clear subtext was that Americans would court mortal danger by electing Democrats. Go forth and scare the bejesus out of them, Rove was telling his party, because the more frightened they are, the better our chances.

To cultivate fear for partisan gain is never a political tactic to be proud of, but Rove's prescription of naked fearmongering is just plain reprehensible when the nation faces a shifting array of genuine, serious threats. This is a moment for ethical politicians -- and, yes, these days that seems like an oxymoron -- to speak honestly about what dangers have receded, what new dangers have emerged, and how the imperatives of liberty and security can be balanced.

From the likes of Rove, I guess, we shouldn't expect anything more noble than win-at-all-costs. But we do have the right to expect more from the president of the United States, and while Bush gives off none of Rove's Sith-lord menace, he has made the cultivation of fear a hallmark of his governance.

At his news conference yesterday, Bush was asked again about the domestic surveillance he has ordered the National Security Agency to conduct without seeking warrants -- a program that seems to violate the law. In his meandering answer, the president kept throwing in the phrase "to protect the American people." I suspect that's a line that tests well in focus groups, but it doesn't really say anything. The fact that we expect any president to protect us does not obviate the fact that we expect any president to obey the law.

Bush mentioned the new tape from Osama bin Laden that surfaced the other day, calling it a reminder that we face "an enemy that wants to hit us again." That's certainly true, but the warning would carry more gravitas if Bush and his administration didn't brag so much about how thoroughly al Qaeda has been routed and decimated. Is anybody keeping track of how many "No. 3" or "No. 4" al Qaeda lieutenants U.S. forces claim to have eliminated?

And Americans would be better able to measure the threat from bin Laden if Bush and the rest of his administration didn't argue -- when it gives them an edge -- that Iraq is the "central front in the war on terrorism." If Iraq is the main event, then bin Laden, huddled in some cave in northern Pakistan, must be just a sideshow, right? But of course he's not a sideshow, he's the author of the Sept. 11 attacks, so what does that make Iraq? The answer seems to depend on whether, at any given time, Bush believes that cultivating fear of bin Laden or stoking fear of a terrorist spawning ground in Iraq would better help his administration achieve its ends.

The thing is, fear works. The administration successfully invoked the fear of "mushroom clouds" to win support, or at least acquiescence, for the invasion of Iraq. By the time it was clear there were no weapons of mass destruction, the fear of losing to terrorists on the "central front" had been given primacy. We stopped hearing the name bin Laden so often -- no need to bring attention to the fact that he remained at large -- until reports emerged of secret CIA prisons, torture and domestic spying.

Bin Laden does remain a threat. He would hit the United States again if he could. We do expect the president to protect us. But a great wartime leader rallies his citizens by informing them and inspiring them. He certainly doesn't use threats to our national security for political gain. He doesn't just point at a map and say "Boo."

Beware The Tipping Point (ERG)

Eugene (OR) Register-Guard, January 26, 2006

A tipping point is defined as the critical point in an evolving situation that leads to a new and irreversible development.

DOJ_NMG_0012573

Based on a powder-keg footnote in a recent memo by U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, the United States may be nearing a tipping point on civil liberties in its amorphous, open-ended "war against terror."

Gonzales' 42-page memo argues unconvincingly that Congress gave President Bush the power to investigate terror suspects using any tactics he chooses when it authorized him to use "all necessary and appropriate force" against al-Qaeda one week after the terrorist attacks on Sept. 11, 2001.

The memo, and Gonzales' underlying contention that the president has nearly unlimited powers in wartime, are affronts to America's system of checks and balances and the Constitution that protects the privacy of its citizens. The memo also runs starkly counter to the recent findings of the nonpartisan Congressional Research Service, which cast serious doubt on the legality of the president's decision to order the domestic eavesdropping program.

As Congress prepares to open hearings on the program next month, lawmakers must not overlook a footnote in Gonzales' memo suggesting that the administration does not need Congress to extend the USA Patriot Act in order to keep using the law's investigative powers against al-Qaeda terror suspects.

Using the same argument that Congress already has given Bush the authority to take whatever steps he deems necessary to pursue terrorists, the footnote suggests that Bush was authorized to employ the Patriot Act's sweeping surveillance powers before the law was even approved for the first time. By extension, this presumptuous logic suggests that Bush now doesn't need Congress to reauthorize the Patriot Act in order to continue wielding the same powers.

Notwithstanding subsequent qualifications by the Justice Department, that footnote, as well as Gonzales' entire memo, should clear the collective sinuses of lawmakers as they prepare to open their investigation into the eavesdropping program.

Perhaps the most remarkable aspect of Gonzales' audacious treatise is the suggestion that wartime presidents are essentially free to ignore laws put in place by Congress.

It's one thing to argue, as have a number of Bush's predecessors, that the Constitution authorizes presidents to order warrantless searches. It's quite another to imply that Bush, as a wartime president, can blithely ignore the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act of 1978, which outlines detailed requirements for domestic surveillance.

Now, the administration seems to be suggesting that it doesn't matter whether Congress reauthorizes the Patriot Act's full array of investigative powers because the president already has authority to wield those powers even if lawmakers let the law expire.

Since 9/11, lawmakers have cowered in the face of an overbearing and overreaching executive branch. Now, Congress must exercise its constitutionally mandated oversight role, and protect the checks and balances and civil liberties that make us a free and democratic nation. If it fails to do so, the tipping point may be at hand.

Presidential Power: Without Warrant (SEAPI)

By SEATTLE POST-INTELLIGENCER EDITORIAL BOARD

Seattle Post-Intelligencer, January 27, 2006

President Bush, Karl Rove and Attorney General Alberto Gonzales have tackled a big job. They are trying to scare people into believing the administration has the authority to spy on Americans' telecommunications.

This is one of the administration's patented media blitzes. The repetition of themes of terror, fear and security may once again swing opinion.

Throughout its handling of the National Security Agency's programs since Sept. 11, 2001, the administration has had options. It could ask a special court for permission to intercept communications involving Americans. It could invoke its powers to act first and then seek court approval. As Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., said on Fox News over the weekend, the administration could and should go to Congress to change the 1978 law if it thinks the law is too confining.

Even now, the administration has offered no explanation of why it can't or won't make use of the options already available. It's hard to imagine a more flexible law than the 1978 Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act.

The administration argues that a congressional authorization to use force against terrorists means it's OK to conduct warrantless wiretaps. Court precedents suggest the vague authorization can't be stretched to overwrite existing law. Just saying the White House respects the Constitution's limits on searches doesn't mean the Fourth Amendment is actually being upheld. But maybe Rove can whip up gratitude for the president's defiance of accepted notions of law, privacy and a constitutionally limited executive. That's scary.

FBI Chief Cites Worldwide Intel (WP)

By Edith M. Lederer

The Washington Post, January 27, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0012574

DAVOS, Switzerland -- FBI director Robert Mueller said Thursday the United States now acts on intelligence from any place in the world to fight terrorism but has not sacrificed individuals' rights to privacy in that effort.

However, during an interview with The Associated Press, Mueller would not discuss renditions, the practice of covertly moving imprisoned terrorist suspects between countries outside normal legal processes.

He also would not elaborate on the National Security Agency's listening without a warrant to telephone calls in the United States that Bush administration officials believe involve al-Qaida terrorists.

Lawmakers from both parties have questioned whether it is legal for the government to listen to conversations in the United States without a warrant that the administration could get through the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court.

But Mueller said the goal of gathering intelligence in the war against terrorism was to prevent attacks and not just prosecute cases.

"For us, it is not just having a terrorist event happening and then gathering the evidence to put it in a courtroom to convict somebody after we're able to identify him, detain him and extradite him," Mueller said.

Since the Sept. 11 attacks, the FBI chief said, U.S. officials have recognized the importance of using all information to determine "who intends to hurt the United States or the United States' interests around the world."

"We are doing a much better job at integrating that intelligence and acting on that intelligence any place in the world," he said.

The FBI is now working closely with the CIA and exchanging information with the National Security Agency, the Defense Intelligence Agency and counterparts in other countries.

"For us, it's taking the information domestically, integrating it with what we know from the other intelligence agencies in the U.S., and integrating it with intelligence from our counterparts from overseas to get a fuller picture of what the enemy intends, in this case al-Qaida," he said.

Mueller vehemently denied that the United States was giving up the right to privacy in exchange for security.

"In no way, shape, or form do I think we've given up our rights," he said. "But I do think there's an appropriate balance with the threat that we have."

While not mentioning renditions or electronic eavesdropping, the FBI chief said "there are a number of programs _ I'm not going to talk about specific programs _ that have been helpful to securing the United States."

Four leading Democratic senators sent President Bush a letter Wednesday saying the NSA program is an "apparent violation of federal law" _ namely getting a warrant from the surveillance court to eavesdrop domestically.

The letter said that if Bush or his administration believed the law "does not give you enough authority to combat terrorism, you should propose changes in the law to Congress. You may not disregard the law."

The letter was written Sens. Harry Reid of Nevada, Edward Kennedy of Massachusetts, Richard Durbin of Illinois and Russ Feingold of Wisconsin.

Terrorist Nuclear Bids Concern Leaders At Forum (AP)

AP, January 27, 2006

DAVOS, Switzerland (AP) - Terrorist attempts to attain nuclear weapons and a new twist in rock star Bono's campaign to help Africa topped discussions Thursday at the World Economic Forum.

"We know that terrorists are highly sophisticated and are interested in acquiring nuclear weapons," said Mohamed ElBaradei, head of the United Nations' nuclear watchdog agency.

Security experts need to share information and "do our very best to make sure we protect ourselves and protect our people," ElBaradei said.

U.S. Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said his department is inundated with suggestions about combatting terrorist threats and has placed its priority on stopping the worst disasters.

"If you look at things like a nuclear bomb in terms of consequence that's probably at the very top of the scale," Chertoff said.

He said the United States is working with other countries to make sure radioactive material terrorists could use to make weapons never enters the United States.

FBI Director Robert Mueller said in an interview on the sidelines of the forum the United States is doing a much better job of integrating domestic and foreign intelligence and acting on it to fight terrorism around the world than it was before the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks on New York City and Washington.

"We are safer but not totally safe," Mueller said.

Bono, the U2 front man who brought his campaign for Africa to last year's forum, was back this year to announce a new Red brand of products aimed at combatting the spread of HIV and AIDS in Africa. Corporations have designated red-coloured sneakers, T-shirts and a charge card to generate money and provide work for Africans.

Suspicions Iran is trying to develop nuclear weapons were a source of concern. ElBaradei said a Russian offer to move Iran's uranium-enrichment program to Russia could help find a solution to the standoff.

ElBaradei said he was also encouraged all parties were still talking about a diplomatic solution to meet western demands for assurances Iran's nuclear program is entirely peaceful.

Pervez Musharraf, president of Iran's neighbour Pakistan, said he was intent on pursuing a deal with Iran to buy natural gas but he sidestepped the question of whether the threat of UN economic sanctions over Iran's nuclear program would scuttle the deal.

Iran should not be allowed to develop nuclear weapons, he said, "their security is not threatened."

The forum released a joint study by a panel of experts that rated the likelihood as "very high" that five million people would be newly infected this year by tuberculosis and HIV, the virus that causes AIDS.

U.S. trade chief Rob Portman, who is meeting with other trade ministers in Davos, said he was encouraged by new German Chancellor Angela Merkel's willingness to become involved in global trade issues. He said he hoped she could help advance stalled global trade talks by offsetting the protective mind-set of French officials in EU policy.

Sepp Blatter, president of world soccer's governing body FIFA, said he was planning to step up attempts to end racism in the sport.

"It is a shame for football that in the year 2006, you still have racism," Blatter told a news conference at the forum.

Former soccer star Pele said the problem of racism on soccer grounds appears worse than when he was playing because top-class teams contain more non-white players now.

"When I started to play, we didn't see black people in other national teams, only in Brazil," Pele said.

"Today, you have black players all over the world."

'We are nobodies now'

In Davos, Part II (NRO)

National Review Online, January 27, 2006

Welcome to the second installment of these notes from Davos — from the Annual Meeting of the World Economic Forum. The first installment appeared yesterday, and you'll find those notes here.

Every year, the Annual Meeting has a theme or two, and this year the main theme is "The Creative Imperative." I believe that Klaus Schwab is relating these words to the elements of a free economy, and a free society. (Dr. Schwab is the founder and executive chairman of the World Economic Forum.) I'm talking about deregulation, sensible taxation, growth, trade, innovation, flexibility — this is an anti-rigidity theme. It has to do with giving people space to create, to make things happen.

Dr. Schwab hasn't said all this explicitly — that I have heard — but you can sense it. And the poster girl for this anti-rigidity, anti-ossification theme, so far, has been Angela Merkel, the new chancellor of Germany. She gave an absolutely sensational speech yesterday afternoon — but more on that later.

The meeting has sub-themes, too — and two of them are the emergence of China and the emergence of India. The place is crawling with Indians, and there is a healthy Chinese presence (only a PRC presence — would that Taiwanese were here, in part to be living, walking examples). After 9/11, Davos became pronouncedly Arab. You go through the directory, and a great many names begin with "al-." Dr. Schwab pretty much goes where the action is, or has the action come to him. Hence these themes.

There are hundreds of panel sessions, and other sessions, and I'll give you a little taste of them. A quirky one is on "video gaming" — does it "drive social evolution"? Hmm. And then there's "Can Aging Economies Grow?" Hmm again. We have "Quelling Nationalistic Flames" (good luck), and "Towards a Nanny State" (boo, hiss). "Does an Economy Need Morals?" That's a question another panel asks.

And "Should We Despair of Disparities?" I believe this panel'll answer yes. Barney Frank is on it, incidentally. For all I know, he'll be the most conservative person in the room. It's happened before.

One panel is provocatively titled "Could a Nuclear Bomb Go Off in Your City?" On it sit both Mohamed ElBaradei and Peter Sellars (the opera director). That should be a different sort of discussion.

A psychologist gives us "All You Ever Wanted to Know About Relationships but Were Afraid to Ask." I have a feeling there's not much fear of asking — not in my country, certainly.

A panel titled "Islam's Challenge to Eradicate Extremism" includes H.R.H. Prince Turki al-Faisal of Saudi Arabia. Well, I guess someone has to stick up for non-eradication. (I may be misjudging the prince . . . but I doubt it.)

DOJ_NMG_0012576

An attractive panel on "Global Risks 2006: What Keeps You Up at Night?" features Michael Chertoff (Homeland Security) and Robert Mueller (FBI), along with ElBaradei. The American presence is more robust than last year. (I should have said, the administration presence is — and that translates into a more conservative coloration.)

"A New Mindset for the U.N." is introduced by Kofi Annan. If you think that's, let us say, paradoxical . . . you're not alone.

I could go on and on in this vein, friends, and I've only given samples through Thursday — the Annual Meeting is four full days, ending Saturday. But you get the idea.

In many ways, the Davos menu is like a college curriculum — there may be two classes you want to take that meet at the same time, and that's a bummer. There may be three classes. I'll give you a Davosian example — has to do with today, Thursday. At 4:15, you have an hour with Jane Goodall, providing "A Doer's Guide to Conservation." Also at 4:15 you have that Islamic-extremism panel I mentioned. (Joe Biden will join Turki, and others.) And at 4:15 you have that "What Keeps You Up at Night?" deal. I wish I could go to all three of them.

I'll go to the one that seems most journalistically useful. I'm not yet sure which one that is.

Ah, wanted to mention the theme of one dinner, a theme that I thought interesting: "Why I Bring My Office to the Beach." It's about workaholism. It's chaired by the editor-in-chief of Wired magazine. I thought that was appropriate: wired.

I attend a lunch, whose theme is sports: This is an Olympic year, and Dr. Schwab and other WEF-ers are fairly sports-minded. When I get to the designated hotel, there's a big hold-up — lots of people waiting to go through security and get in. Why are we not being checked through? Oh, yes, now it comes clear: Because Kofi Annan and his entourage are arriving. It's a quite large entourage, too. Annan sweeps in like an emperor, preceded and trailed by many.

In all my years at Davos, I've never seen this: a big group held up by the arrival or departure of a VIP (I mean, a VVIP — a very, very important person). And lots of heads of state have been around.

This brings up an old theme of mine: Does the secretary general of the U.N. have all too much power, or all too high a profile? I mean, is he not the bureaucratic servant of an international organization — albeit a very large and important international organization? Were secretaries general this big in the past?

Annan has been dubbed "President of the World." It can seem that way, at Davos.

I remember when the bombs went off in London last July. All those Western leaders were up at Gleneagles, in Scotland. Tony Blair made a statement — these heads of state stood behind him (Bush, Chirac, and so on). And there was Kofi Annan.

Why?

Anyway . . .

We all have to stand outside — including David Stern, emperor, or secretary general, of the NBA — so that's okay.

But I will confess something: Being delayed by Kofi Annan makes me slightly annoyed. Would I be as annoyed if the secretary general of the U.N. were a favorite of mine? I like to think so — but I don't know.

I miss the bulk of Annan's speech to the lunch group — because I, along with dozens of others, have been held up by the SecGen's arrival. But I hear some of the speech, as Annan reads in a soft, kind of lulling voice. He says something about how the General Assembly provides a model of a new way of peacemaking. Yeah, whatever.

Next to speak — by this time I'm sitting down, you'll be relieved to know — is Jacques Rogge, president of the International Olympic Committee. (A dream job of mine, by the way.) He issues the usual platitudes about sports — but they're all true. He sounds every single note, including how athletic competition empowers women. He observes that, at the Beijing Olympics in 2008, the ratio will be about even — male athletes to female athletes. It still strikes me as creepy that the Olympic Games will be held in a dictatorship's capital — just like in 1980 and in 1936.

As Rogge is speaking, someone passes around the Olympic torch — I mean, really passes it around. It's a very cool object, and I hold it for a bit. (It's not lit, in case you were wondering.) The torch is surprisingly heavy — must be kind of a mother to run around with over an extended period of time. It's blue, and stylistically attractive. Rogge mentions that it has been designed by an Italian, name of Farina, I believe.

And that, friends, is as close as I'll ever come to really, truly carrying the Olympic torch. Unless they make a new event out of Impromptus-izing or something.

Also speaking at this affair is Joseph Blatter, president of the International Federation of Football, whose (French) acronym is FIFA. He talks about the popularity and importance of soccer — of "football" — all over the world. They play it everywhere! he says. "They play football in Iraq," they play it in this country, they play it in that country. He names a good number of the hot spots. I wish he had said, "They play it in Afghanistan" — because, of course, after the imperial invasion, Afghans could. But not before. Not under the Taliban.

Still another speaker is Adolf Ogi, former head of the Swiss Skiing Federation, now an adviser to Annan on matters sportive. Did I tell you the story of my moderating a sports panel? I'm sure I did. The year was 2003. On the panel were Phil

Knight (of Nike) and David Stern and some Olympians and that lovely, brilliant woman who would run the Athens Games (can't remember her name right this second). Prince Albert of Monaco — the bobsledder — was supposed to be there, but didn't show.

I had merely glanced at Ogi's bio, and said to him, "So, you're a skier, I understand." "Yes, I am," he said — and someone else pointed out that he had actually been president of Switzerland.

That reminded me of one of my favorite stories, all-time: Mayor Marion Barry meets Greg Norman — the Great White Shark — at some party in D.C. Barry says to Norman, "So, what do you do?" Norman answers, "I play golf." Barry says, "That's great — I play tennis."

I have always loved, loved that story. So innocent, pure, fun — democratic. It's not required to know who Greg Norman is, or who anyone else is.

You may recall, dear readers, that Sharon Stone was the guest star at one of these lunches last year. Is she here this year? I don't think so. But Angelina Jolie is, again. Several of my friends have asked me whether I've seen her. The answer is . . . no, sorry.

But when I think of her name, I think of that great Louis Prima song. (I'm not sure that Louis wrote it — but he certainly popularized it.) "I eat antipasto twice, just because she is so nice, Angelina. Angelina — the waitress at the pizzeria." (Incidentally, Prima pronounced the first syllable of "pizzeria" "pitz" — "pitzeria." Kind of interesting.)

Also, I had a much-loved family member, Angelina. So I tend to think of those two things when I hear "Angelina" — and Ms. Jolie last, if at all.

I am out of time, guys, so I will save the amazing Angela (not Angelina) Merkel till tomorrow. But before I leave, I need to issue a few corrections from yesterday. I'm a bit behind the times, and I should have known that Silvan Shalom is no longer Israel's foreign minister — it is Tzipi Livni. The Israeli government is necessarily in flux.

Also, as it happens, Michael Leavitt — the U.S. health and human services secretary — is not coming here. But Carlos Gutierrez, the commerce secretary, is.

In listing some names yesterday, I referred to Rick Warren — author of The Purpose-Driven Life — as a "quasi-religious figure." A great many readers wrote to inform me that he is, in fact, a religious leader: the pastor of a major church and so on. Forgive me — I had confused him with someone else. I thought he was more self-helpy than religious. I should have checked before scribbling, but I'm sort of going on the fly, here in Davos. (No excuse, huh, Nordlinger? What kind of journalism is that?) (Scribbly web journalism, that's what kind.)

Last, some readers objected to my calling Bartholomew — just one name, please: Bartholomew — "Ecumenical Patriarch of Turkey." They had other titles for him (and those titles slightly disagreed). All I was doing, folks, was copying the title as given in the Davos directory.

And I'm out of here, for now. Oh, let me tell you one more thing — just a soft item: You haven't lived until you've seen tiny Swiss kids pulled around by their parents on a little sleigh. Enough to melt the frozen Alps around here.

FBI Chief Urges Sharing Of Information To Combat Hackers (FT)

By Peter Thal Larsen In Davos

Financial Times, January 27, 2006

The director of the FBI, Robert Mueller, yesterday urged the world's law enforcement agencies to introduce a rapid system of exchanging information to battle computer security breaches and fraud that are the biggest concern of business.

A survey by Swiss Re, the world's largest reinsurance group, showed that companies across the developed world rank computer-based risks as their main concern, well ahead of other worries such as the rising burden of corporate governance and natural disasters.

The issue of computer fraud has gained increasing prominence in recent years following a series of hacking attacks on large companies and several high-profile security breaches at companies that keep sensitive information about their customers.

However, law enforcement agencies across the world struggle to track down and punish criminals whose use of the internet means they often have a global reach.

Yet card operators are proving increasingly successful at limiting the amount of fraudulent activity. Christopher Rodrigues, chief executive of Visa International, said the amounts lost to fraud on Visa's network had fallen to 7 cents out of every $1,000 spent, down from 14 cents in the past several years. However, the growth in credit card transactions had prompted the absolute level of losses to increase.

Mr Rodrigues said sfraud and identity theft had been exacerbated by the growth of electronic commerce, which meant consumers relied on banks and retailers to keep their information safe.

Most banks have a regulatory obligation to look after data, but these regulations do not extend to retailers.

DOJ_NMG_0012578

Mr Rodrigues emphasised the consumers' sense that anybody could be affected. "Card security is about personal relevance. Disasters such as the tsunami are terrible, but people think it isn't going to happen to them."

Colombia Busts Fake Passport Ring; U.S. Disputes Terror Link (USAT/AP)

BOGOTA, Colombia (AP) — Colombia has dismantled a false passport ring with links to al-Qaeda and Hamas militants, the acting attorney general said Thursday after authorities led dozens of simultaneous raids across five cities in collaboration with U.S. officials.

In Washington, however, Justice and Homeland Security officials were surprised by the announcement of the investigation, which they said involved people posing as members of Colombia's largest rebel army, the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia, or FARC — not al-Qaeda or Hamas.

Colombian officials said the gang allegedly supplied an unknown number of citizens from Pakistan, Jordan, Iraq, Egypt and other countries with false passports and Colombian nationality without them ever setting foot in the country.

An undisclosed number of those arrested are wanted for working with the al-Qaeda terror network and the militant Palestinian group Hamas, said acting Attorney General Jorge Armando Otalora.

The counterfeit Colombian, Spanish, Portugese and German passports were used to enter the United States and Europe, he said.

But Justice Department spokesman Bryan Sierra said an indictment unsealed Wednesday in Miami charges 10 foreign nationals with smuggling "people that they thought were members of FARC into the United States."

"We are not alleging any connections to any terror organization other than the FARC," said Justice Department spokesman Bryan Sierra.

He said the U.S. will seek to extradite the 10 alleged smugglers, of whom eight have been arrested.

"The operation was, in fact, a sting operation led by U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement," he said, adding that Colombian law enforcement were "an active and critical part" of the investigation

The Colombian attorney general's office said 19 people were arrested in Thursday's raids, adding they were carried out in collaboration with U.S. authorities.

Four Jordanian citizens were among those arrested, Manuel Saenz, head of foreign immigration for the DAS secret police, said on Caracol television. Eight people are being sought inside the United States for extradition to Colombia, Otalora said.

Colombian authorities began to covertly trail and film suspects to unveil a criminal network with the help of their U.S. counterparts.

The eight wanted by federal authorities in Florida on charges of abetting illegal immigration rings and collaborating with terrorist groups include a Jordanian national and a DAS detective, Colombian authorities said.

Colombian officials didn't say if they believed any Colombian terrorist groups were involved in the scheme.

U.S. officials have long feared al-Qaeda could take advantage of corrupt government officials and weak institutions to launch an attack from south of the border.

Judge To Remain In Terrorism Trial (NYT)

By Julia Preston

The New York Times, January 27, 2006

A federal appeals court yesterday rejected an attempt by prosecutors to oust a judge from a terrorism case, dismissing the government's argument that the judge, Shira A. Scheindlin, was biased in favor of the defendant.

The ruling came in the case of Osama Awadallah, a Jordanian college student who was charged in October 2001 with lying before a grand jury to conceal his ties with two hijackers in the Sept. 11 attacks.

According to court documents, Mr. Awadallah was arrested in California as a material witness and held in solitary confinement for 20 days before he went before the Manhattan grand jury. His convoluted case has become a test of the government's prolonged detention of people without charges as material witnesses in terrorism cases.

A panel of three judges from the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit found that Judge Scheindlin, of Federal District Court in Manhattan, had not erred in several rulings she made about evidence in the case, and they praised her "intellectual flexibility" in resolving some thorny legal matters. The appeals judges noted that in several cases in which Judge Scheindlin had initially antagonized the prosecutors by questioning their procedures, she ultimately ruled in their favor.

This case is the first since 1973 in which federal prosecutors in Manhattan have sought the ouster of a judge. They were denied in that case as well.

Mr. Awadallah, now 25, has not been accused of any direct role in the 9/11 attacks. A jury was selected, and his trial was set to begin in May, but Judge Scheindlin postponed it because of the prosecutors' appeals.

Rabbi, Priest Back Muslim Cleric In Court (REU)

Reuters, January 27, 2006

LONDON (Reuters) - A rabbi and a Christian priest testified on Thursday in support of a Muslim preacher accused of inciting murder and stirring up racial hatred, telling a court he was friendly and hospitable.

Egyptian-born Abu Hamza, a hate figure for the tabloid press, faces nine counts of soliciting to murder and three of trying to stir up racial hatred, mainly against Jews.

But Rabbi Joseph Goldstein told the Old Bailey Central Criminal Court in London that he had been favourably impressed when he met Hamza at the Finsbury Park mosque in north London to talk about a mixed-faith married couple.

"I met him in the office of the mosque and we spoke on the telephone twice afterwards," Goldstein said.

"He was very pleasant. It was a friendly and cordial relationship. He was very open and very cordial."

Hamza, 47, was raised in Egypt but has British citizenship. The cleric, who has lost both hands and one eye and often wears a hook in place of one hand, is the highest profile figure to go on trial in recent years in Britain on the charges he faces.

Stephen Coles, an Anglican priest also based in north London, told the court he had met Hamza soon after the September 11, 2001 attacks on the United States.

"He was very hospitable. We got on extremely well," Coles said. "Sometimes we agreed about some things, sometimes we disagreed. It wasn't at any point aggressive or angry."

He said he had tried to continue dialogue with Hamza even after the cleric was arrested in 2004.

"After he was imprisoned we had in fact tried to have other meetings but it became very difficult to arrange," he said.

"I didn't want the conversation to come to an end."

Hamza also faces a charge of possessing an item of potential use in terrorism for having an "Encyclopaedia of the Afghan Jihad", which prosecutors call a terrorist handbook.

Hamza's lawyer has acknowledged the cleric gave sermons in support of Jihad, or holy war. But Hamza told the court last week he had never incited followers to kill in England and had urged killings abroad only in the context of battles.

He also denied encouraging people to hate Jews "not as individuals, not as a race, not as a colour."

PATRIOT ACT:

Could Patriot Act Have Prevented 9/11? (SHNS)

By Deroy Murdock, Scripps Howard News Service

Scripps Howard News Service, January 27, 2006

As the Senate prepares for a showdown vote to reauthorize the Patriot Act, members of the World's Greatest Deliberative Body should deliberate on this: Had it existed, could the Patriot Act have prevented the Sept. 11 massacre?

"I think if the Patriot Act were in place in the summer of 2001 ... connecting the dots would have been so basic and easy and fundamental," says Debra Burlingame, co-founder of 9/11 Families for a Safe and Strong America (911familiesforamerica.org). Her brother, Charles Burlingame, piloted American Airlines Flight 77 until al Qaeda hijackers murdered him, grabbed the controls, and smashed his Boeing 757 into the Pentagon, killing all 58 passengers and six crew members aboard and another 120 people at the Defense Department.

How might the Patriot Act have snared Mohamed Atta and his band of mass murderers?

First, Patriot Act Section 218 would have eliminated "The Wall" that prevented intelligence agents and law-enforcement officials from sharing information. Seemingly fueled by theoretical fears of Big Brother more than the actual dangers of terrorism, President Bill Clinton's Attorney General, Janet Reno, issued restrictions in 1995 that hindered communications between spies and gumshoes. Frustrated New York FBI agents reportedly placed signs on their desks that read, "You may not talk to me."

Indeed, in August 2001, FBI headquarters barred a New York intelligence agent, who sought hijackers Nawaf al-Hazmi and Khalid Al-Mihdhar, from consulting colleagues on the bureau's criminal side. "If al-Midhar is located, the interview must be conducted by an intel agent," FBI brass explained by e-mail. "A criminal agent CANNOT be present at the interview." As former National Security Agency general counsel Stewart Baker noted in a column in the online magazine Slate, the New York agent replied that "some day someone will die - and wall or not - the public will not understand why we were not more effective" against terrorists.

Were the Patriot Act in place, "The Wall" would not have prevented Minneapolis FBI agents from getting permission to examine the laptop and possessions of "20th hijacker" Zacarias Moussaoui. Had they done so, they might have discovered leads to 9/11 conspirator Ramzi Binalshibh and Atta's Hamburg, Germany, terrorist cell that hatched this atrocity.

Second, Patriot Act Section 215, the so-called "library provision," might have led officials to seven of the 19 hijackers who used government libraries for Internet access. Using Section 215, FBI agents might have visited New Jersey's William Patterson University. They might have learned, as the Associated Press' Wayne Parry did last year, that al-Hazmi and al-Mihdhar used that state institution's computers to buy tickets online for the flight they plowed into the Pentagon.

Lies to the contrary notwithstanding, the "library provision" does not let President Bush's "secret police" round up readers of Annie Proulx's short story, "Brokeback Mountain." Section 215 prevents libraries, and other institutions, from becoming safe havens where Muslim fanatics can plot mass murder in peace.

Third, Patriot Act Section 806 might have allowed federal officials to seize the financial assets of Atta and fellow pilot Marwan al-Shehhi if they suspected terrorist intent. According to the 9/11 Commission report, Ali Abdul Aziz Ali, a nephew of al-Qaeda bigwig Khalid Sheik Mohammed, sent Atta and al-Shehhi five wire transfers from Dubai totaling $114,500. The Patriot Act might have defunded the hijackers before they were airborne.

"The Patriot Act would have saved 3,000 lives, and what's scary about that is once they start tinkering with it, it could cost not just 3,000, but tens of thousands of lives," says Debra Burlingame. "September 11 whetted the terrorists' appetites ... There's nothing like success to motivate people."

Whatever the Patriot Act might have achieved before 9/11, it has accomplished plenty since. It has helped prosecutors charge some 401 suspected terrorists, the Justice Department reports, of whom 212 have been convicted or pleaded guilty. Despite this track record, the Patriot Act soon could be consumed in a partisan bonfire.

After successfully spearheading a Dec. 16 anti-reauthorization filibuster, Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid of Nevada bragged, "We killed the Patriot Act." If it prevails, this blindly Bushophobic attitude will return America to the way we were on Sept. 10, 2001: Fat, happy, and naked to whatever morning might bring.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Federal Appeals Court Upholds Airport IDs (AP)

By DAVID KRAVETS, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 27, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO — An appeals court on Thursday dismissed a legal challenge to federal airport regulations requiring passengers to show identification before they board planes.

The 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals rejected claims by Libertarian activist and millionaire John Gilmore that the policy constituted an illegal search and violated his right to travel freely.

After reviewing the government's identification policy in private, a unanimous three-judge panel said the policy was not overly intrusive. The review was done in private for security reasons.

The court said Gilmore could leave the airport if he didn't want to show his ID and had other ways to get around besides air travel. It also rejected assertions that the act of showing identification was an illegal search of Gilmore, who made his millions as a founding employee of Sun Microsystems.

Gilmore's lawyer, William Simpich, said he is weighing whether to appeal.

He said government regulations should be disclosed in writing to the public. While millions of passengers willingly show their IDs at airports, Simpich said there is no way to know whether the regulations call for impermissible searches because the government, and the court, won't make them public.

The court rejected the argument, saying airport signs and airline workers give adequate notice that an ID is required.

The court noted that the secret regulations allow passengers to fly without providing an ID if they submit to searches. The court dismissed assertions that such searches are unreasonable.

Justice Department lawyer Joshua Waldman argued that demanding identification "promotes the right to travel by protecting everyone's safety."

News From The San Francisco Bay Area (MERCN)

The San Jose Mercury News, January 27, 2006

OAKLAND, Calif. - Oakland police are on schedule to meet a Feb. 17 deadline to redraft a policy on when force against suspects is warranted, members with the department told the City Council's Public Safety Committee.

The department, which faces sanctions if it does not meet the deadline, is likely to present officers with a "buffet" of options in a tiered system, with levels corresponding to the severity of the situation, Capt. Paul Figueroa said.

The new policy, which must be approved by a federal judge, would also require that a sergeant document any incident and immediately report it to the department's command staff. Investigations into police actions would be required in more cases.

The department was required to revise the policy under a settlement that charged a group officers dubbed the "Riders" with misconduct. U.S. District Court Judge Thelton Henderson must approve the changes and the department would have until May 18 to train 95 percent of officers to follow the guidelines.

The department has yet to complete 45 of the 52 tasks laid out by the agreement, which settled a class-action suit in which 119 people claimed a rogue group of officers beat them and framed them using planted evidence including drugs. Oakland officials earlier had promised Henderson they would be in "substantial" compliance with the agreement by the end of 2005.

Terror Bucks Blown (NYPOST)

By geoff Earle

The New York Post, January 27, 2006

WASHINGTON — Hundreds of thousands of taxpayer dollars sent to protect the nation's heartland have been squandered in Indiana alone, a stunning new audit reveals — more evidence the cash could have been better spent in New York.

A team of investigators examined Indiana's books to see how the state spent $48 million it got in federal homeland-security aid, finding widespread instances of mismanagement, according to the report set for release today, which was obtained by The Post.

New York lawmakers were fuming over the shocking findings of waste at a time when the Big Apple could use more anti-terror dollars.

In one instance, the auditors discovered a county emergency-management official using a special $30,000 government hazardous-materials truck to commute to work.

The truck wasn't even painted or marked as an emergency vehicle.

In another example, the investigators found that the state spent $4.5 million on special counter-terrorism response kits, but "very few" of the kits were assembled or distributed.

"This kind of thing confirms what we all suspected, which is when you throw money at problems, places like Indiana literally can't spend it efficiently, and it winds up becoming just a source of waste," said Rep. Anthony Weiner (D-N.Y.).

The claims of waste are the latest in a string of revelations of how dollars meant to protect the homeland have been squandered.

A series of reports in The Post found that more than $20 million in Small Business Administration funds meant to help business owners hurt by the 9/11 attacks instead went to refurbish more than two dozen Dunkin' Donuts shops across the country.

The Department of Homeland Security has been criticized for sending disproportionate dollars to states like Indiana, where the terrorist threat is considered low, at the expense of high-threat states like New York and California.

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff has called for making more funds threat-based, although powerful members of Congress from small states have beaten back permanent changes.

No Power But Persuasion For The Rebuilding Of Ground Zero (NYT)

By Charles V. Bagli

By making the World Trade Center redevelopment a central focus of his State of the City speech yesterday, Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg was promoting a plan that has been the subject of intense but secret negotiations between the developer Larry A. Silverstein and the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey over the future of the site.

Mr. Bloomberg, who has little actual power over decisions at ground zero, is using his bully pulpit to pressure Mr. Silverstein to accede to the authority's demands that he relinquish control of a major part of the 16-acre parcel in return for a reduction in rent, so that the rebuilding effort can proceed more swiftly.

Under that proposal, Mr. Silverstein would still proceed with building the huge and symbolic Freedom Tower, while the Port Authority, which owns the land and leased it to Mr. Silverstein in July 2001, would construct a second tower on Church Street and occupy part of it. The authority would also build a multistory shopping mall and sell a third site to a developer for a hotel, office space, and, in the mayor's vision, apartments.

The Bloomberg administration and the Port Authority contend that the new arrangement would enable all the projects, in the mayor's words yesterday, "to proceed simultaneously at the same, quick pace." Under the current schedule, the site would not be finished until 2015.

Mr. Bloomberg has been critical of Mr. Silverstein, but in his most barbed comments to date, he called on the developer to "do the right thing" and "push aside individual financial interests and focus on what's best for the city."

The developer disagrees, blaming government for any delays. Janno Lieber, director of the development for the Silverstein Properties, said yesterday that the company would build all the towers "just as soon as the government delivers the physical sites."

Even if Mr. Silverstein's role were diminished, all that construction work could not begin tomorrow. A slurry wall and foundation must be built at the eastern end of the property, which could take a year or more. And it may be impossible to do all the work at once because of environmental restrictions. But the Port Authority proposal would resolve a number of issues that have been roiling beneath the surface for years.

At one time or another, the city, the state, the authority and Mr. Silverstein have been at odds over retail space on the site, the developer's share of infrastructure costs, insurance money, and the pace of construction. In November, the developer disregarded a proposal from Anthony R. Coscia, the chairman of the Port Authority, that he give back a major portion of the site in return for a reduction in rent, which is now more than $120 million a year.

The authority and the city contend that Mr. Silverstein does not have enough money to build all the towers. They say that the Freedom Tower alone will cost more than $2 billion and take five years to build, but that Mr. Silverstein has only $2.85 billion of the insurance proceeds left. About $200 million a year has been spent on rent, architects, lawyers and Mr. Silverstein's development fee.

In December, Gov. George E. Pataki provided the developer with $1.76 billion in tax-free bonds to build the Freedom Tower, and gave him 90 days to work out his differences with the authority.

All parties are prevented from talking publicly about the negotiations. But state officials cheerily say that talks are proceeding apace, while the Silverstein camp says the bargaining has yet to begin in earnest. A senior official at the Port Authority contends that Mr. Silverstein has not only refused to relinquish his hold on the property, but has also offered a counterproposal that is even more onerous than the current arrangement.

Yesterday, Mr. Bloomberg added his explicit support for what is essentially the Port Authority's position, and a note of urgency. "Renegotiations between the Port Authority and Silverstein Properties must not wait," he said.

That does not mean that the city, the state and the Port Authority are in lock step. For one thing, state officials and Mr. Silverstein oppose the mayor's push to build housing on the trade center site. The authority is willing to consider that, but for only a small section of one tower. For another, the governor may be reluctant to alienate Mr. Silverstein and delay the April groundbreaking for the Freedom Tower, which is expected to draw national attention, helping his presidential aspirations.

"We have always been looking for ways to expedite the rebuilding of the remainder of the site," said Joanna Rose, a spokeswoman for the governor, "while simultaneously protecting the business and residential community in Lower Manhattan and ensuring that it remains the financial capital of the world."

President Explains Baker Bill Rejection (BRA)

By gerard shields

Baton Rouge Advocate, January 27, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush said Thursday he rejected a home buyout plan for Louisiana hurricane victims because he doesn't want more bureaucracy and because the federal government already gave $85 billion to the storm-wracked Gulf Coast.

Gov. Kathleen Blanco said she felt "kicked in the teeth" by Bush's remarks, including assertions that Louisiana failed to produce a plan for recovering from hurricanes Katrina and Rita.

Blanco said the state has a plan: U.S. Rep. Richard Baker's 4-month-old bill to create a $30 billion revolving fund to buy out owners of heavily damaged homes, pay off their mortgages and redevelop communities.

State officials say the bill is crucial to get Louisiana recovering and to head off an avalanche of foreclosures against storm victims in the next few months.

"This plan brings us all the way home," the governor said.

Bush aides declared opposition to the bill this week, saying the state should use another pot of cash to help 20,000 households flooded by the storms.

Blanco said Bush is asking Louisiana to abandon the 180,000 other affected households.

"We're all American citizens," Blanco told news reporters in Baton Rouge. "There should be equal treatment here."

Bush personally explained his stance against the Baker bill for the first time at a news conference Thursday in Washington.

"We were concerned about creating additional federal bureaucracies, which might make it harder to get money to the people," Bush said.

A better method to help homeowners is allocating money through Community Development Block Grants, Bush said. On Wednesday, the federal government officially awarded $6.2 billion to Louisiana.

"Monies can actually go directly to the individual families that need help," Bush said.

Blanco said the CDBG money is far less than the state needs to address housing, schools, businesses, infrastructure and other assets damaged by the most expensive natural disaster in U.S. history.

Bush said the federal government has committed $85 billion to Gulf Coast recovery.

"I want to remind the people in that part of the world, $85 billion is a lot," Bush said.

He did not detail the figure, but it would include all kinds of aid, from clearing debris and feeding displaced victims just after the storm to rebuilding levees and other redevelopment projects in all the states affected by the hurricanes.

Bush contended Louisiana has yet to come up with a redevelopment plan.

Baker took exception to that comment.

"I really viewed (the bill) as the plan," Baker said. "We felt like this was the request."

By calling for the state to use the CDBG money to help homeowners with damage outside of flood plains, The White House has restricted redevelopment for houses inside the flood zone that were underinsured, Baker said.

"They have made the decision of where we develop by telling us to focus on the 20,000 homes outside the flood plain," Baker said.

Gov. Blanco challenged Bush to deliver on the promise he made in Jackson Square, shortly after Hurricane Katrina flooded most of New Orleans, to help storm victims rebuild their communities and their lives.

Asked why Bush would reject the Baker plan, the governor said the president is being led astray by his spin doctors.

Baker's bill would create a Louisiana Recovery Corp. that would use up to $30 billion in U.S. Treasury bonds to buy hurricane-damaged homes. The program would be voluntary and would guarantee homeowners receive at least 60 percent of the equity in their homes.

"If they don't like it, they need to tell us what plan they do like," Blanco said.

An alternative would be for Washington to give the state an additional $6 billion to $8 billion in Community Block Development Grants, she said Thursday. That way, Blanco said, the state can implement Baker's plan on its own.

Blanco said the White House didn't even try to work with Baker on a compromise plan despite the state bending over backward to please Bush.

"Much of this was negotiable," she said. "They dismissed it out of hand."

On Thursday, the National Mortgage Bankers Association said it would make changing the White House's stance on the Baker measure its chief priority this year.

The Sierra Club also expressed disappointment at the president's stance.

Baker said the Louisiana delegation will continue to lobby the president.

"We not running up the white flag yet," Baker said.

Meanwhile, first lady Laura Bush visited one of the first New Orleans public schools to open after Hurricane Katrina hit, then traveled to another school in St. Bernard Parish.

"One thing that will bring people back to their communities is if they know there's a good school for their children to go to and there's safe places for them to play," Laura Bush said.

The AP, January 26, 2006

CHALMETTE, La. (AP) — First Lady Laura Bush visited one of the first New Orleans public schools to open after Hurricane Katrina hit then traveled to another school here in St. Bernard Parish, where devastation was so great that students from 20 different public and private schools are attending classes in one partially repaired building.

DOJ_NMG_0012584

In Chalmette, sitting in chairs on bare concrete floors in a classroom with no doors, Bush listened Wednesday as students who talked about the events of the past five months. One talked about being stuck in traffic for 12 hours trying to evacuate the day before Katrina hit on Aug. 29. Another said for three weeks she didn't know where her father was, whether he survived the massive flood.

"You all are very resilient," Bush told the students at Chalmette High School, now known as the St. Bernard Unified School, where students from pre-kindergarten through 12th grade attend. "It's tough and I'm really proud of you."

Bush also posed with workers from the school cafeteria, which reopened Tuesday, and she looked at pictures of damage at the school and other parts of the parish.

The parish served 8,500 students among 14 public schools before Katrina. Now there are just over 1,500 students from throughout the parish attending the one unified school.

Bush and Secretary of Education Margaret Spellings assured school officials that federal aid will be available for them to continue operating and make needed repairs.

Earlier, Bush and Spellings visited Alice Harte Elementary, a public school in the relatively unscathed Algiers neighborhood of New Orleans. It was one of a handful of public schools that opened in December as a charter school, run independently of the troubled New Orleans school board.

From Chalmette, Bush and Spellings headed to Mississippi where they were joined by Brett Favre of the NFL's Green Bay Packers in the dedication of a Kiln, Miss., elementary school playground where Favre played as a child.

The new playground, built to replace one destroyed by Katrina, was one of 100 a nonprofit group has committed to build on the Gulf Coast.

"Play is really important for children," Bush said. "One thing that will bring people back to their communities is if they know there's a good school for their children to go to and there's safe places for them to play."

Louisiana Tires Of Its Rogues (LAT)

By Miguel Bustillo

The Los Angeles Times, January 27, 2006

NEW ORLEANS — Joseph Impastato conceded he took the two cashier's checks worth $85,000. The whole thing was captured on tape by the FBI, so it would have been difficult to deny.

But it was no kickback, the councilman from St. Tammany Parish said. It was business.

When he cut a deal to receive half the money from a government contract to haul away hurricane debris, Impastato said, he was acting as a private businessman, not a public official.

Federal prosecutors are not buying it — and neither apparently is the Louisiana public. After a federal grand jury indicted Impastato on felony extortion charges last month, making him the first Louisiana politician accused of Hurricane Katrina corruption, citizens condemned him in newspapers and on talk radio and the Internet as an embarrassment to his home state.

"He's got to be a real lowlife to do something like that at a time like this," Frank White, a 62-year-old retired fire captain from the suburb of Chalmette, said in an interview. "It's the Louisiana way of doing business, I guess. But there is a quiet majority now that's sick and tired of this. People are fed up with these crooks."

In Louisiana, which has a history of political shenanigans so rich and colorful that it has become a part of American folklore, people long have laughed off misbehaving politicians as a fact of life, every bit as inevitable as death and taxes.

But as the state lobbies Washington for more money to rebuild ravaged towns and cities, citizens are realizing that Louisiana's well-earned penchant for dirty politics has exacted a steep price: It has badly damaged the credibility of the recovery effort.

"Frankly, the reputation in Washington is, if we send money down there, it will just get stolen," said political handicapper Charles E. Cook, a Louisiana native who has worked in the nation's capital for more than three decades. "It is a caricature of Louisiana politics that is not entirely undeserved but is grossly exaggerated. No one cared about it much before Katrina. But right now, it's hurting the state enormously."

A major turning point in public attitude came in 2001 when Edwin Edwards, the former four-term Democratic governor, received a 10-year sentence for taking bribes for riverboat gambling licenses. In the last governor's race, both candidates — Democrat Kathleen Babineaux Blanco beat Republican Bobby Jindal — were considered squeaky clean, and promised government reforms. The distaste for dirty government has really picked up momentum since last summer.

"What was tolerated before Katrina is not necessarily tolerated now," said pollster Silas Lee III, a professor at Xavier University here. "Nerves are raw. People have lost their sense of security and direction. They are living a day-to-day existence, and they have little patience for any politician who is perceived as being corrupt."

In addition to Edwards, in the last decade Louisiana has seen an attorney general, a congressman, a state Senate president, a federal judge and countless local officials convicted of corruption. Louisiana's last three state insurance commissioners wound up in prison for offenses that include lying to the FBI, accepting $2 million in illegal campaign contributions and taking bribes — prompting jokes that future candidates should make sure they look good in stripes.

Jim Letten, the U.S. attorney for eastern Louisiana and the lead prosecutor in the Edwards case, sees the convictions as a sign of progress. Wherever he goes, he said, he is greeted by people — black, white, Latino, Asian — who tell him Louisiana needs to clean up its act.

"I am not sure that Louisiana has measurably more corruption than other [regions], but surely we have a reputation for being tolerant of it," said Letten, a member of the Hurricane Katrina Fraud Task Force, a team of federal, state and local law enforcement officials investigating scams and corruption.

Until recently, Louisiana politicians proved that charisma trumped scruples. Their repeated election victories, despite corruption allegations in many instances, showed that Louisiana voters viewed the ethical transgressions of their elected officials as an amusing spectacle.

T. Wayne Parent, a political science professor at Louisiana State University and author of "Inside the Carnival: Unmasking Louisiana Politics," said citizens accepted corrupt politicians because they were effective in providing government services, and the cash they were pocketing was not believed to be taxpayer money.

"Maybe some politician was making a deal with the devil, but that was money from some oil and gas company, or so people thought. By the late 1980s, people realized, maybe it was our money," said Parent, who believes the change in attitude has been slowly building over the last quarter-century.

Huey Long, the Depression-era demagogue who dominated every level of Louisiana government by bullying or buying off anyone who got in his way, joked that "one of these days the people of Louisiana are going to get good government — and they aren't going to like it."

Known as the Kingfish, Long was impeached as governor in 1929 on charges of bribery and gross misconduct but narrowly avoided punishment — reportedly by bribing several state senators. Elected a U.S. senator in 1930, he was assassinated in 1935 in Baton Rouge by the son of a judge who was about to be gerrymandered out of a job.

Earl Long, his eccentric brother, kept the family's Democratic political machine running into the 1960s. He once remarked that Louisiana voters "don't want good government; they want good entertainment."

He served three terms as governor, spending some of the last term in a mental hospital, where his wife had him committed after he took up with Blaze Starr, a stripper.

Edwards, who survived two trials and 22 grand jury investigations in his four terms as governor, boasted that the only way he could lose was if he were "caught in bed with a dead girl or a live boy."

The "crook" handily won. But he was eventually sent to prison for taking bribes after Eddie DeBartolo Jr., former owner of the San Francisco 49ers, testified that he had paid Edwards $400,000 to land a casino license.

Even now, during the state's ultimate hour of need, some Louisiana citizens say they could stomach a crooked politician — as long as he was competent.

"I'll tell you what, I'd take Edwin Edwards in a minute to get us out of this mess," said Gid Brill, 65, a tool salesman from Belle Chasse. "He might skim off $10 million for himself, but he'd know what to do with the rest of the money."

Such attitudes do not go over well in Washington, where some Republican lawmakers speak of Louisiana as if it were a banana republic.

Sen. Larry E. Craig (R-Idaho), who sits on the pivotal appropriations committee which oversees all major spending bills, compared fraud in Louisiana to fraud in Iraq. During town hall meetings in his home state last year, he repeatedly said that Louisiana and New Orleans had "the most corrupt governments in our country."

State lawmakers last year sought $250 billion from Congress for recovery and reconstruction in a proposal criticized as a grab-bag of pork-barrel projects. President Bush said Thursday the federal government had approved $85 billion in aid to the Gulf Coast. Louisiana's congressional delegation has contended that is not nearly enough, and continues to press for more.

Sen. Mary L. Landrieu (D-La.) said that the corruption, while historically accurate, has been magnified by Republicans in Washington who do not want to help Louisiana. "I don't want to discount that the image carries the scars of our past. But we have emphatically turned the corner," Landrieu said.

Citing the corruption scandal in the nation's capital centering on GOP lobbyist Jack Abramoff, Landrieu added, "Republicans in Washington should clean up their own house before using Louisiana's past reputation an excuse for not wanting to rebuild the Gulf Coast."

"It's not fiction — we have had some real corruption issues here in the past, and to some extent we still do today," Vitter said. "My colleagues in Washington want assurances that money is going to be spent wisely, given those issues, and I don't think it's too much to ask."

Government statistics indicate that Louisiana is one of the most corrupt states in the country. From 1995 to 2004, federal prosecutors won 310 corruption convictions involving public servants and citizens in Louisiana, said a report by the Public Integrity Section of the Justice Department. That was far from the highest total: California prosecutors logged 871. But California is a state of 36 million people, nine times the population of Louisiana.

In the last month alone, federal prosecutors have been busy bringing corruption charges against Louisiana public servants. Two sheriffs deputies who worked at a Gretna jail were sentenced last week after confessing to taking bribes — part of an ongoing federal probe dubbed "Operation Wrinkled Robe," which seeks to ferret out jail and courthouse corruption. The investigation already has resulted in the conviction of a former state judge.

Last Friday, a federal grand jury indicted a former New Orleans police officer caught driving a stolen pickup, one of about 200 Cadillacs and Chevys looted from a dealership after Katrina. Witnesses reported seeing officers drive away in the vehicles. A state grand jury is also investigating the case, along with other allegations of looting by law enforcement officers.

Brett Pfeffer, a former aide to Rep. William Jefferson, a New Orleans Democrat, pleaded guilty two weeks ago to bribing an unnamed congressman on behalf of a small telecommunications company. Jefferson has not been charged and has denied wrongdoing.

Impastato's trial is scheduled to begin next month. He pleaded not guilty Jan. 10 to federal charges that he extorted money from a businessman after helping him land a contract to remove debris. If convicted of the charge, as well as related counts of conspiracy and money laundering, he could face up to 20 years in prison.

The indictment said Impastato arranged with Lee Paul Mauberret of the Pontchartrain Chipping Yard to split the $200,000 contract. A relative of Mauberret's balked at paying the kickback, and Mauberret called the FBI, which set up the sting.

Impastato, 33, continues to serve his second term on the council in St. Tammany Parish, next to New Orleans on the north shore of Lake Pontchartrain. He declined to discuss the case when reached at Sal & Judy's, his family's Italian restaurant, where he makes a living running a business selling tomato sauces and olive oil.

His lawyer, Karl Koch, said Impastato did not "use his official capacity in any way" to enrich himself, and witnesses would testify that Impastato did a fair amount of the hurricane cleanup work himself. Impastato's critics said his actions — legal or not — set back the state's efforts to repair its reputation.

"Impastato should have avoided this at all costs. Especially given the current climate and attitude in Washington toward Louisiana," St. Tammany resident Dana Deris wrote on a blog carried on the New Orleans Times-Picayune website. "He IS guilty of furthering the negative image of Louisiana."

"I'd love to be the judge on that one," said Keys, a 41-year resident of St. Tammany Parish. "A snake is going to take advantage of this opportunity right now, because there's a lot of money flying around loose. I guess the question is whether it was a legal shakedown or not. But either way, he's still a snake."

Study Says 80% Of New Orleans Blacks May Not Return (NYT)

By James Dao

The New York Times, January 27, 2006

WASHINGTON, Jan. 26 — New Orleans could lose as much as 80 percent of its black population if its most damaged neighborhoods are not rebuilt and if there is not significant government assistance to help poor people return, a detailed analysis by Brown University has concluded.

Combining data from the 2000 census with federal damage assessment maps, the study provides a new level of specificity about Hurricane Katrina's effect on the city's worst-flooded areas, which were heavily populated by low-income black people.

Of the 354,000 people who lived in New Orleans neighborhoods where the subsequent damage was moderate to severe, 75 percent were black, 29 percent lived below the poverty line, more than 10 percent were unemployed, and more than half were renters, the study found.

The report's author, John R. Logan, concluded that as much as 80 percent of the city's black population might not return for several reasons: their neighborhoods would not be rebuilt, they would be unable to afford the relocation costs, or they would put down roots in other cities.

For similar reasons, as much as half of the city's white population might not return, Dr. Logan concluded.

"The continuing question about the hurricane is this: Whose city will be rebuilt?" Dr. Logan, a professor of sociology, writes in the report.

If the projections are realized, the New Orleans population will shrink to about 140,000 from its prehurricane level of 484,000, and the city, nearly 70 percent black before the storm, will become majority white.

The study, financed by a grant from the National Science Foundation, was released Thursday, 10 days after the mayor of New Orleans, C. Ray Nagin, who is black, told an audience that "this city will be a majority African-American city; it's the way God wants it to be."

Mr. Nagin's remark was widely viewed as an effort to address criticism of a proposal by his own rebuilding panel, the Bring New Orleans Back Commission, that calls for a four-month building moratorium in heavily damaged areas. He said later that he had not meant to suggest that white people would not be encouraged to return.

"Certainly Mayor Nagin's comments reflected a concern on the ground about the future of the city," Dr. Logan said. "My report shows that there is a basis for that concern."

The study coincides with growing uncertainty about what government assistance will be available for property owners and renters. Louisiana will receive $6.2 billion in federal block grants under an aid package approved by Congress in December, part of which will be used to help homeowners. But that will not be enough money to help all property owners in storm-damaged areas, Louisiana officials say.

Those officials have urged Congress to enact legislation proposed by Representative Richard H. Baker, Republican of Louisiana, creating a corporation that would use bond proceeds to reimburse property owners for part of their mortgages, then redevelop the property. But the Bush administration has said it opposes the bill, out of concerns that it would be too expensive and would create a new government bureaucracy.

Asked Thursday about his opposition to the measure, President Bush told reporters that the $85 billion already allocated for Gulf Coast restoration was "a good start." He added that he was concerned that Louisiana did not have a clear recovery plan in place.

But Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco of Louisiana, a Democrat who has clashed frequently with the White House, said Mr. Baker's bill provided a clear plan.

"Administration officials do not understand the suffering of the people of Louisiana," Ms. Blanco said in a statement.

Demographers are divided over the likelihood of a drastic shift in New Orleans's population. William H. Frey, a demographer at the Brookings Institution who has studied the hurricane's impact on the city, called Dr. Logan's projections "a worst-case scenario that will come about only if these evacuees see that they have no voice in what is going on."

But Dr. Frey also said low-income evacuees might indeed begin to put down roots in cities like Houston or Dallas if they did not see movement toward reconstruction in the next six months.

Elliott B. Stonecipher, a political consultant and demographer from Shreveport, La., said that unless New Orleans built housing in flood-protected areas for low-income residents, and also provided support for poor people to relocate, chances were good that many low-income blacks would not return.

"If they didn't have enough resources to get out before the storm," Mr. Stonecipher said, "how can we expect them to have the wherewithal to return?"

WAR NEWS:

U.S. Military Releases Half Of Iraqi Women In Its Prisons (NYT)

By Sabrina Tavernise

The New York Times, January 27, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq, Jan. 26 — The American military said Thursday that it had released half the Iraqi women held in its prisons, but it said the release had been previously scheduled and was unrelated to demands made by the kidnappers of the American journalist Jill Carroll.

The military freed 5 of the 10 Iraqi women in its custody late Thursday afternoon as part of a regular prisoner release that included more than 400 Iraqis, said Lt. Col. Barry Johnson, a military spokesman.

The release drew attention because advance news of it came after Ms. Carroll's captors made their demands last week, saying in a videotape that they would kill her if the United States did not release all Iraqi women from its jails in 72 hours.

But the military said the review of the Iraqi prisoners' cases came long before the kidnappers set their deadline, which expired last Friday.

"We do not negotiate or bend to demands of terrorists," Colonel Johnson said.

It was not clear Thursday night whether the release of the five women had swayed Ms. Carroll's kidnappers, or whether they were even aware it had happened. Nothing has been heard from them since their videotape was broadcast by the Arabic network Al Jazeera on Jan. 17.

Ms. Carroll, a 28-year-old freelance journalist, was on assignment for The Christian Science Monitor when gunmen seized her on her way to an interview in Baghdad on Jan. 7. Her interpreter was shot dead as he tried to make a phone call.

David Cook, The Monitor's Washington bureau chief, said in an e-mail message that the paper had not had news of Ms. Carroll since the video broadcast.

Scattered violence on Thursday left at least 11 Iraqis dead.

A bomb planted on a road north of Baghdad struck the convoy of the minister of industry and minerals, Osama Abdul Aziz al-Najafi, killing three guards and seriously wounding a fourth. Mr. Najafi was not harmed. The attack was the sixth attempt made on his life, said Hanan Jassim, a spokeswoman for the ministry.

In Baghdad, police officers and insurgents fought a gun battle in the Adel neighborhood, where Ms. Carroll was kidnapped, leaving one police officer dead and six wounded, an Interior Ministry official said.

Two Iraqis were shot to death and a third was wounded when gunmen opened fire on their car in the Saidiya district in southern Baghdad about 1 p.m., the official said.

The authorities found 10 bodies, handcuffed and blindfolded, in water filtration pools in southeastern Baghdad on the road to Madaen, the Interior Ministry official said.

In the northern city of Kirkuk, insurgents killed two city officials in drive-by shootings. Jumaa Haji Rasheed, deputy director of the city's trade department, was gunned down as he was dropping his daughters off at school, said Capt. Farhad Talabani of the Kirkuk police department. Uthman Muhammad Mahmood, part of the city's anticorruption commission, was shot to death while driving in the Askari neighborhood.

Gunmen also killed an engineer and an off-duty police officer in Kirkuk, said Sarhad Qadir, a police official there.

Insurgents attacked a fuel convoy on the highway from Kirkuk to Baghdad, killing one driver and wounding four, Mr. Qadir said.

Three American service members were killed in combat on Tuesday and Wednesday, the American military said. One died in a bomb blast in Baghdad, one in a rocket attack near the western city of Ramadi, and a third in Karma, just outside Falluja, west of Baghdad.

The military also announced that it had transferred authority to the Iraqi Army in the provinces of Diwaniya and Wasit in southern Iraq. Soldiers and Iraqi commanders from the Eighth Iraqi Army Division took control of the two provinces on Thursday.

U.S. Releases Five Iraqi Women (WP)

By Jonathan Finer

The Washington Post, January 27, 2006

BAGHDAD, Jan. 26 -- The U.S. military freed five female Iraqi detainees Thursday, a move it said was unrelated to demands made by a group that abducted the American journalist Jill Carroll this month.

Carroll, 28, a freelance reporter working for the Christian Science Monitor, was taken on Jan. 7 in western Baghdad. In a video aired on the Arab satellite television network al-Jazeera 10 days later, her captors said she would be killed within 72 hours if U.S. authorities did not release all female Iraqis in their custody.

U.S. forces still hold at least four women, according to Lt. Col. Guy Rudisill, a spokesman for detainee operations. In a separate statement Thursday, the military announced the detention of two more women Wednesday in the northern city of Mosul.

There was no immediate public response from Carroll's kidnappers, who call themselves the Vengeance Brigade. The five women who were released were among 420 prisoners scheduled to be freed Thursday and Friday, the military said.

"They were determined not to be a security threat," Maj. Gen Rick Lynch, a military spokesman, told reporters Thursday. "Those female detainees were released as part of our normal process, and not as a result of demands by terrorists and criminals. We don't negotiate with terrorists and criminals."

A U.S. official in Baghdad, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the situation, said there was no indication that the women's release would lead to Carroll being freed.

"If the people holding her wish to interpret this in some way to do the right thing and let her go, then more power to them," he said. "There is no reason to believe they will and no reason to believe they won't."

Insurgents and criminal gangs have carried out a wave of kidnappings against foreigners in recent months, including two German engineers seized Tuesday. Some of those seized have been killed, others released unharmed. The status of several captives remains unknown, including four members of a U.S.- and Canadian-based Christian aid group.

Also Thursday, the U.S. military announced the death of a soldier whose vehicle came under rocket attack Wednesday near the western city of Ramadi.

Lynch pointed to growing signs of conflict between Iraqi insurgents and foreign fighters from the group al Qaeda in Iraq, which is led by the Jordanian Abu Musab Zarqawi. Iraqi insurgents have killed six senior al Qaeda leaders in recent weeks, Lynch said, referring to the local insurgency as "a colleague in this operation against Zarqawi."

U.S. officials have long said they hoped to separate local insurgents from foreigners and incorporate the Iraqis into the country's political process.

Lynch said the military and diplomats had been "reaching out" to some Iraqi insurgents, but he called negotiations with those known to be conducting attacks on U.S. forces a "red line that we refuse to cross."

"The idea of driving a wedge between the terrorists and foreign fighters and the Iraqis that support them, and the Iraqi population, is taking place," he said. "And the local insurgents have become part of the solution."

Iraqi insurgent leaders, while acknowledging friction with Zarqawi's fighters, rejected the notion that they were working in concert with the Americans.

"There are disagreements over the car bombs that killed Shiites and innocent people in markets. But we cannot cooperate with U.S. forces to fight our brothers in al Qaeda," said Sheik Fadhil Falluji, a leader in the Islamic Army insurgent group in Karmah, east of the city of Fallujah. "They want to create strife among the resistance."

Also Thursday, three assassinations took place in the restive northern city of Kirkuk. In separate incidents, police said, gunmen killed an official with the city's Integrity Commission and the brother of a senior member of the Patriotic Union of Kurdistan. Police also recovered the bullet-riddled body of a butcher who supplied the Iraqi army.

Special correspondents Omar Fekeiki and Bassam Sebti contributed to this report.

The Christian Science Monitor, January 27, 2006

BAGHDAD - The mother of one of five Iraqi female detainees released Thursday expressed confidence that American journalist Jill Carroll will be released soon.

"She'll be fine and she will come out very soon because she loves Iraq and she loves Iraqis, so God will never forget her," says Siham Faraj, the mother of Hala Khalid Wahid who was detained by US forces in Iraq four months ago.

But she added, "I don't think Jill Carroll's situation has anything to do with the release of my daughter, but we definitely feel her pain....

"And to her mother, I say: I know how painful it is when a daughter is detained. But don't worry, madam. Your daughter is a great woman and she will be fine."

In a video message aired on Arabic satellite channel Al Jazeera last week, Ms. Carroll's captors threatened to kill her within 72 hours unless all female detainees in Iraqi prisons were released.

The US military confirmed last week it was holding nine Iraqi women. On Thursday, however, the military said it had detained two more women and three men for alleged insurgent activities in the northern city of Mosul. Detainees are regularly freed in Iraq following reviews of their cases, a process that can take months. US officials say that Thursday's release of five women and 414 men was part of the routine procedure and not linked to Carroll's case.

Separately, the widow of an Al Jazeera staff correspondent killed in Iraq also called for Carroll's release. "Kidnapping journalists or civilians harms the good image of the [Iraqi] resistance," Dima Tahboub told Al Ghad, a Arab-language newspaper in Amman, Jordan.

Her Jordanian husband, Tareq Ayoub, was killed in April 2003 during a US air raid that struck the generator outside Al Jazeera's Baghdad bureau. She added, "The resistance has to adopt legal methods that spare civilians.... Journalists who play an objective professional role and serve their societies should be spared also."

A group of 37 Jordanian politicians, academics, and journalists also released a statement Thursday calling "the kidnapping of Carroll ... a kidnapping of one of the witnesses of the suffering of the Iraqi people."

In Iraq, two German engineers were kidnapped Tuesday, just two days after arriving in the country. Iraqi police say they were seized by men wearing Iraqi Army uniforms who slipped into the German company's complex.

Germany's Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier said there had been no contact with the kidnappers.

DOJ_NMG_0012590

By James Glanz

The New York Times, January 27, 2006

Because of unforeseen security costs, haphazard planning and shifting priorities, the American-financed reconstruction program in Iraq will not complete scores of projects that were promised to help rebuild the country, a federal oversight agency reported yesterday.

Only 49 of the 136 projects that were originally pledged to improve Iraq's water and sanitation will be finished, with about 300 of an initial 425 projects to provide electricity, the report says.

The planners of the rebuilding effort did not take into account hundreds of millions of dollars in administrative costs, and mostly did not realize that the United States would have to spend money to keep things like power plants and sewage treatment plants running once they had been built, the report says. That ultimately forced the United States to pare the list of projects to cover such expenses.

Beyond the huge cost of protecting reconstruction projects, which the report says the planners did not foresee, billions of dollars were shifted from the rebuilding effort to things like training Iraqi police and guarding Iraq's borders. The report, by the office of the Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction, adds that the overall rebuilding plan was also devised without a clear understanding of the decrepit state of Iraq's infrastructure after decades of war, United Nations-imposed penalties and sheer neglect.

The figures are the first quantitative measure of what Stuart W. Bowen Jr., the inspector general in the office that issued the report, has called the "reconstruction gap," the difference between what the United States originally promised to build and what it will actually complete. The inspector general is charged with oversight of the entire $25 billion rebuilding effort in Iraq, although the latest report focuses on projects financed by $18.4 billion appropriated by Congress for the program in 2004.

"We have gone beyond just the concept of the reconstruction gap and identified the specific impacts of how many projects in the electrical sector and the water sector will not be completed and the reasons why," said Jim Mitchell a spokesman for the office. "We point out that the dramatic increase in security spending is a part of this as well," Mr. Mitchell said. "Those who planned the reconstruction did not understand at the time the hostile environment in which reconstruction would be taking place."

Rick Barton, co-director of the post-conflict reconstruction project at the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington, said that the effectiveness of the rebuilding program had previously been obscured by the fog of war in Iraq, and that what appear to be some of the first solid measures of success and failure were bound to carry important lessons.

"We've had such a range of commentary, from pretty much everything going as well as it could to outright disaster," Mr. Barton said. "This brings definition to the whole discussion, and in doing that it highlights many of the poor choices that have been made. It has that potential longer-term therapeutic benefit."

Reconstruction officials and some specialists outside the government have said that the full extent of Iraq's insurgency and lawlessness would have been difficult or impossible to anticipate when much of the planning for the rebuilding effort took place under the Coalition Provisional Authority in 2003.

The report says that the authority planners "envisioned a much more permissive security environment," but does not take a stand on whether the possibility of such problems should have been considered. The security problems that developed increased the cost of projects and materials, causing delays, the report says.

But security costs alone do not account for the drop in the number of projects that the United States will be able to finish.

"Other unforeseen problems, such as initial plans that were hurriedly put together with little knowledge of actual conditions at proposed projects sites," as well as the need to continue financing the projects once they are up and running, also played a role, the report says. As a result, some $425 million was shifted to support the operation of the plants and the Iraqis who were expected to carry them out.

The report adds that planners were also obliged to take $400 million from the reconstruction money to cover unforeseen administrative costs, probably involving the Western staff members who worked on the effort in heavily guarded hotels and in the fortified green zone in the heart of Baghdad. "The use of these funds has reduced the level of funding that can be provided for specific relief and reconstruction activities in Iraq, and altered U.S. plans," the report says.

The biggest change in priorities in the rebuilding program came when John D. Negroponte, then the American ambassador to Iraq, shifted $3.46 billion from the reconstruction fund to support projects involving the training of Iraqi security forces, building democratic institutions and developing the private sector in fall 2004. But the report notes that month after month, new shifts took place, amounting to $2.12 billion in additional spending changes through October 2005.

No fewer than 185 programs endured changes during that period, the report says. And reconstruction teams were also forced to improvise plans constantly because planners had not taken into account the decayed state of Iraq's infrastructure. As examples, the report cites a port rehabilitation project in Umm Qasr, in the south, where dredging operations were held up as workers shored up crumbling piers and berths for the ships.

The report was released only days after a separate audit of American financial practices in Iraq uncovered irregularities including millions of reconstruction dollars stuffed casually into footlockers and filing cabinets, an American soldier in the Philippines who gambled away cash belonging to Iraq, and three Iraqis who plunged to their deaths in a rebuilt hospital elevator that had been improperly certified as safe.

But in contrast to that earlier audit, which focused on rebuilding projects financed by money from Iraqi oil proceeds and assets seized from Saddam Hussein's regime, the latest report covers projects underwritten with American taxpayer money.

Audit Finds Fund Shortage For U.S. Projects In Iraq (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, January 27, 2006

The Bush administration got bad news yesterday about its plans for rebuilding Iraq with U.S. taxpayer money when a special audit showed there are not enough funds for more than half of the water resource improvements and for a quarter of electrical projects.

"Although significant progress has been made in developing Iraq's infrastructure, the United States will not complete all of the projects it originally planned to construct," Stuart Bowen Jr., the special inspector general for Iraq's reconstruction, said in the audit. He called the problem a "reconstruction gap," the difference between projects planned in 2003 and what is now actually possible in 2006.

The assessment is a setback for the Bush administration, which counted on more robust rebuilding across Iraq to help deliver the country from a harsh dictatorship to a prosperous democracy. Officials in Mr. Bowen's office say that if the projects are to be completed, Iraq will have to receive more money from donor nations, which have pledged but not fully delivered $13 billion; from the World Bank; and from oil proceeds. The problem is insurgents repeatedly attack Iraq's oil facilities and pipelines, especially one leading to Turkey, depriving Iraq of huge streams of revenue.

Mr. Bowen blamed five setbacks, or shifts in policy, that have caused some of the $24 billion Congress approved in U.S. reconstruction funds to be diverted elsewhere.

The audit cited "plans made without a clear understanding of actual situational conditions" -- a reference to the fact that the Bush administration did not predict the rise of a large insurgency and foreign terror cells when it planned for Iraq after the ouster of Saddam Hussein.

For example, the State Department diverted $5.6 billion from reconstruction to beef up security in the face of the burgeoning insurgency, which threatened to send Iraq into chaos in 2004.

The audit said that $4.3 billion budgeted for water and sanitation in 2003 was decreased to $2.1 billion in 2005. And $5.5 billion for the electricity budget was slashed to $4.3 billion.

The result: Of 136 projects in water sources and sanitation, only 49 will be completed. Of 425 electrical projects, about 300 will be completed with U.S. funds.

The report said the disbanded Coalition Provisional Authority, which ran Iraq in 2003 and 2004, "had significantly underestimated the damage done to the basic infrastructure from decades of neglect and warfare and, as a result, more time and resources are required to stand up and maintain systems than originally thought. The state of Iraq's infrastructure was further degraded by looting and sabotage following the war."

In 2003, Congress authorized $18.6 billion for reconstruction and also added smaller appropriations to bring the total to $24 billion.

Five Female Detainees In Iraq Set Free (LAT)

By Chris Kraul, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 27, 2006

BAGHDAD — Iraq's minister of industry narrowly escaped an assassination attempt Thursday, and the release of five female prisoners by U.S. authorities raised hopes that kidnapped American reporter Jill Carroll would soon be set free.

Also Thursday, the U.S. military reported the deaths of a soldier and a Marine, and Army Gen. George W. Casey, the top U.S. commander in Iraq, acknowledged in Diwaniya that U.S. forces overall were "stretched," Associated Press reported. He was responding to journalists' questions about an unreleased Pentagon study that found the military was overextended in Iraq and Afghanistan.

The Iraqi minister, Usama Abdulaziz Najafi, was in a convoy on a main highway about 65 miles north of Baghdad when a roadside bomb exploded. The blast engulfed one of the cars in flames, killing three bodyguards and injuring one. The minister was unhurt.

Hopes rose Thursday that Carroll, who was kidnapped Jan. 7 in Baghdad, might be released. On Jan. 17, her captors issued a videotape of the reporter and threatened to kill her unless all female prisoners held by American forces were released by Jan 20. Since then, there has been no word on the 28-year-old freelancer, who was working for the Christian Science Monitor.

The five female detainees freed Thursday were among 424 prisoners released by U.S. authorities. At a news briefing, Army Maj. Gen. Rick Lynch said the move was part of a "normal process and not as a result of demands by terrorists and criminals."

Local media quoted Iraqi officials as saying they were hopeful that the detainees' release might persuade Carroll's abductors to set her free. In a telephone interview, David Cook, the Christian Science Monitor's Washington bureau chief, was guarded in his reaction to the U.S. move.

"We are aware of the release and watching carefully for positive developments," he said.

Gen. Casey spoke to reporters during a trip to witness the hand-over of two provinces in south-central Iraq to the 8th Division of the Iraqi army. He said that although the U.S. military in Iraq was under stress, he thought the mission could be accomplished as staffed. He said he would order withdrawals only as Iraqi forces became capable of taking over operations.

On Wednesday, Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld disputed reports that the U.S. military was stretched thin in Iraq and Afghanistan. "This armed force is enormously capable," he told reporters. "It's battle-hardened."

In other developments in Iraq, Baghdad police sources said the bodies of 10 blindfolded men had been found in water-holding tanks at a sewage treatment facility in a Baghdad suburb. All had been shot to death.

Meanwhile, cameraman Mahmoud Zaal of Baghdad TV was killed Wednesday while filming U.S. troops fighting insurgents in Ramadi. Sources said he initially was detained by American forces and later released, before being killed by gunfire.

At his regular Thursday briefing for reporters, military spokesman Lynch said insurgent attacks and other incidents had risen 26% across the country last week to 433, but that overall, violence was in decline.

As a result of "outreach," he said, coalition forces are getting better cooperation from some Iraqi insurgents who are neither loyalists to former President Saddam Hussein nor linked to Al Qaeda, but are "rejectionists" alienated from the current government.

"By talking with them, explaining the business of being part of the solution and not part of the problem, many of them turn out to be individuals we can rely on to help make progress here in Iraq," Lynch said. "There is indeed dialogue taking place."

There were few details on the two slain U.S. troops, whose identities were being withheld pending notification of their families. The Marine was killed Tuesday by small-arms fire east of Fallouja. He was assigned to the 2nd Marine Division, 2nd Marine Expeditionary Force.

The other was described as a soldier with the Multinational Division Baghdad who was killed Wednesday by a roadside bomb near the capital.

According to an Associated Press tally, at least 2,238 American service members have been killed since the U.S.-led invasion in March 2003.

Planted Articles May Be Violation (LAT)

By Mark Mazzetti

The Los Angeles Times, January 27, 2006

WASHINGTON — A secret U.S. military program that pays Iraqi newspapers to publish articles favorable to the American mission appears to violate a 2003 Pentagon directive, according to a newly declassified document released Thursday.

The information campaign run by U.S. troops in Baghdad and a Washington-based private contractor is the subject of a high-level military investigation. Last month, the top U.S. general in Iraq said a preliminary investigation into the program had found it did not violate U.S. law or Pentagon regulations.

"We concluded that we were operating within our authorities and the appropriate legal procedures. And so we have not suspended any of the processes up to now," Army Gen. George W. Casey told reporters then.

A secret directive on the Pentagon's information operations policy released Thursday, however, appears to prohibit U.S. troops from conducting psychological operations, or psy-ops, targeting the media.

"Psy-op is restricted by both DoD [Department of Defense] policy and executive order from targeting American audiences, our military personnel and news agencies or outlets," says the directive, dated Oct. 30, 2003, and signed by Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld.

The document, titled "Information Operations Roadmap," was released by the National Security Archive, a research institution based at George Washington University that obtained it under the Freedom of Information Act.

But one senior Pentagon official said that based on the wording in the directive, the operation seemed to violate Pentagon policy.

"It's clearly a violation based on the language used in the Rumsfeld document," said the official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to talk publicly on the issue.

Since early last year, the military's Information Operations Task Force in Baghdad has used private contractor Lincoln Group to plant stories in Iraqi media about U.S. and Iraqi military and rebuilding efforts.

It also has placed reports indicating that anti-insurgent sentiment is rising among Iraqi citizens.

American troops write articles, called storyboards, which are then delivered to the Iraqi staff of Lincoln Group. The staffers then translate the storyboards into Arabic and pay newspaper editors in Baghdad to run the articles.

A military investigation of the operation led by Navy Rear Adm. Scott Van Buskirk should be completed soon, Pentagon officials say.

U.S. law forbids the Pentagon from conducting propaganda efforts that target U.S. audiences. Yet many in the military say that the globalization of media, driven by the Internet and the 24-hour news cycle, makes it likely that information campaigns targeting foreign audiences find their way into U.S. media coverage.

That much is acknowledged in the 78-page document released Thursday, which says that "information for foreign audiences, including public diplomacy and psy-op, increasingly is consumed by our domestic audience."

The directive recommends that boundaries be established to ensure that U.S. military information operations don't target U.S. audiences directly. It does not say what the boundaries should be.

The document was written to set out policy guidelines and establish the Pentagon's reasoning for elevating information operations to a "core" mission for the U.S. military, Pentagon officials say.

"Information, always important in warfare, is now critical to military success and will only become more so in the foreseeable future," the document says.

U.S. Forces Strained But Will Finish Mission, General Says Military Releasing Hundreds Of Detainees From Custody (USAT/AP)

By Nick Wadhams

USA Today, January 27, 2006

DIWANIYAH, Iraq — The top U.S. commander in Iraq acknowledged Thursday that the U.S. Army was stretched, but he insisted forces here were capable of accomplishing their mission.

Gen. George Casey said any recommendation to reduce troops further would be dictated by the situation on the battlefield.

“The forces are stretched … and I don't think there's any question of that,” Casey told reporters. “But the Army has been for the last several years going through a modernization strategy that will produce more units and more ready units.”

Casey said he had discussed manpower strains with Gen. Peter Schoomaker and that the Army chief of staff feels he can sustain missions around the world.

“So, yep, folks are stretched here, but they certainly accomplish their mission,” Casey said.

In Washington, President Bush brushed aside talk that the United States could not prevail in Iraq.

“If the question is whether or not we can win victory in Iraq, our commanders will have the troops necessary to do that,” Bush told reporters at a news conference.

Also Thursday:

·The military released five Iraqi female detainees, part of a group of about 420 Iraqis to be released Thursday and today. General Says Force Can Do Its Job (WT/AP)

By Nick Wadhams

The Washington Times, January 27, 2006

DIWANIYAH, Iraq -- The top U.S. commander in Iraq acknowledged yesterday that the U.S. Army was stretched, but he insisted forces were capable of accomplishing their mission and any recommendation to reduce troops further would be dictated by the situation on the battlefield.

U.S. officials said Gen. George Casey was speaking about the Army in general and not specifically about the 136,000-strong force in Iraq.

"The forces are stretched ... and I don't think there's any question of that," Gen. Casey told reporters. "But the Army has been for the last several years going through a modernization strategy that will produce more units and more ready units."

Gen. Casey said he had discussed manpower strains with Gen. Peter J. Schoomaker on Wednesday and that the Army chief of staff thinks he can sustain missions around the world. Gen. Casey insisted the troops in Iraq are getting the job done.

"So, yep, folks are stretched here but they certainly accomplish their mission, and the forces that you've seen on the ground are absolutely magnificent," he added.

In Washington, President Bush brushed aside talk that the United States could not prevail in Iraq.

"If the question is whether or not we can win victory in Iraq, our commanders will have the troops necessary to do that. If the question is: Can we help keep the peace in a place like the Far East? Absolutely," Mr. Bush told reporters.

"And let me use the Far East as an example of what I'm talking about," the president continued. "There were some 30,000 on the South Korean Peninsula. As you might remember, we reduced the amount of manpower and replaced it with technology."

Meanwhile, the U.S. command announced that two more American soldiers died Wednesday -- one in a bombing south of Baghdad and a second of wounds suffered in a rocket attack in Ramadi.

The military yesterday released five female Iraqi detainees, a move demanded by the kidnappers of American reporter Jill Carroll. Officials said the women were part of a group of 420 Iraqis to be released yesterday and today and that their freedom was not connected to efforts to free Miss Carroll, who was seized in Baghdad on Jan. 7.

Gen. Casey spoke after attending a ceremony in which Polish troops transferred leadership of the south-central region of Iraq to Iraqi forces, the first such large-scale transfer since the conflict began in 2003.

The transfer of authority for the sector, which includes about 25 percent of the country, was part of a larger strategy by the U.S.-led coalition to build up Iraqi forces and give them greater role in security.

In a study for the Pentagon, Andrew Krepinevich, a retired Army officer, concluded that the Army cannot sustain the pace of troop deployments to Iraq long enough to crush the insurgency. He also suggested that the Pentagon's decision, announced in December, to begin reducing the force in Iraq this year was driven in part by a realization that the Army was overextended.

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld on Wednesday discounted the report as "either out of date or just misdirected."

Is The US Army Prepared To Fight Another Iraq-style War? (CSM)

By Mark Sappenfield

The Christian Science Monitor, January 27, 2006

WASHINGTON - When two major studies released this week questioned whether the US Army is being stretched too thin, they raised a much- repeated concern: that America does not have enough troops to win the war in Iraq.

At a deeper level, though, they raise the question of whether today's military is prepared for the threats that could lie ahead in the war on terror.

The Pentagon's answer is a categorical "yes," insisting that the military is well suited for whatever the future holds. But with the department's four-year plan for spending and strategy to be presented to Congress next month, critics say that America's experience in Iraq suggests that the US may not be ready for another long, slow Iraq-style war.

"What are the countries we could not afford to walk away from" if they collapsed? asks Andrew Krepinevich, author of one of the studies and an analyst at the Center for Strategic and Budgetary Assessments here. Suggesting that Iran, Pakistan, and Indonesia would be among the candidates, he adds, "Even if you thought the approach in Iraq was the right one, it's very difficult to see how you scale up the Army to deal with [those conflicts]."

The question is purely one of structure, not skill. Reports such as those released this week - one by Mr. Krepinevich; the other by former Defense Secretary William Perry - have suggested that the force is simply not large enough to do what the Defense Department has asked of it. The debate has played out at times publicly - in Congress and the media - and at times privately, as when former Iraq administrator Paul Bremer requested more troops in 2003 and was ignored, he says.

But only rarely has attention left Iraq and focused on what that conflict says about future threats. Now is one of those times. The Pentagon is scheduled to submit the Quadrennial Defense Review (QDR) to Congress Feb. 6. The QDR will set the Pentagon's priorities for the next four years by laying out a vision of what military leaders expect future threats to be, and then aligning the department's budgets and doctrine.

The Army of today is in many ways a reflection of the 2001 QDR. To react to flashpoints around the globe in a post-cold-war world, it suggested, the Army needed to be smaller but quicker - able to deploy to the far corners of the globe at a moment's notice. In Iraq and Afghanistan, a "transforming" Army deployed to devastating effect. But now, an Army designed for lightning strikes is being asked to keep the lid on a country where many neighborhoods are seething with anti-American sentiment.

To Krepinevich, that difficult task serves as a warning about the types of challenges US forces could face in future conflicts. In countries prone to Islamic radicalism - such as Iran, Pakistan, and Indonesia - any military venture would probably involve a lengthy peacekeeping after the war is won. Moreover, since these countries are far larger than Iraq in both size and population, it would take a far larger force to control them.

If a country such as Pakistan collapses, he says, there is the possibility that Muslim radicals could seize a state with nuclear weapons - something the United States would not tolerate. Unless the US could get major help from its allies, it is unprepared for such a scenario, he adds.

The Pentagon disagrees. Defense officials insist that the size of the force in Iraq is what the generals want, and as the Army transforms, the process will free more soldiers to fight - creating the more-agile Brigade Combat Teams, moving troops out of jobs that can be done by civilians, and rebalancing Army and reserve duties.

"Does the force still need more rebalancing? You bet," said Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld in a briefing Wednesday. "You know, an awful lot of things are happening and there are a lot of moving parts." But in the end, he and other officials say, this is the Army they want.

"Out of the QDR, this force structure we think is appropriate to the threat," said Secretary of the Army Francis Harvey in a briefing this month.

Not surprisingly, critics are skeptical. Some who are familiar with drafts of the coming QDR suggest that the lessons learned from Iraq have simply heaped more duties - including peacekeeping - on a force already struggling to meet the ones it has.

"Given how stretched our ground forces are, how can you set that standard without recommending that we substantially grow our ground forces over time?" asks Michèle Flournoy, an analyst at the Center for Strategic and International Studies here. "Many people may want to avoid a war like Iraq in the future, but most wars that we fight are not wars of choice," she adds.

Strategy Targets Terror WMDs (WT)

By Bill Gertz

The Washington Times, January 27, 2006

The Pentagon's latest four-year strategy report calls for setting up a special military task force to prevent weapons of mass destruction from being transferred to terrorist groups, The Washington Times has learned.

The task force will employ special operations forces, other troops and intelligence personnel to prevent states such as North Korea and Iran from supplying nuclear, chemical and biological weapons to terror groups.

The call for the new unit, which would have several hundred troops along with aircraft and other arms, comes as tensions heighten over North Korea's nuclear program and Iran's refusal to abide by international controls on its uranium-enrichment program.

The proposal is contained in the report of the legally mandated Quadrennial Defense Review. The report will be sent to Congress on Feb. 6, but portions of an unclassified summary were made available to The Times.

Pentagon spokesman Larry Di Rita declined to comment on the report, which has not been made public.

"We have over the past few years focused on ways of having a standing and rapidly deployable task force," Mr. Di Rita said. "It's something that can respond quickly to a tough problem."

A section of the report on combating weapons of mass destruction (WMD) said future U.S. military forces will have the capability to interdict and "render safe" weapons of mass destruction before terrorists can use them.

To counter the threat, the Defense Department will "develop new defensive capabilities in anticipation of the continued evolution of WMD threats," the report said.

DOJ_NMG_0012596

Evolving WMD threats include electromagnetic pulse weapons, portable nuclear devices, genetically engineered pathogens and new chemical arms, the report said. The report states that the four-star general in charge of the Omaha, Neb.-based U.S. Strategic Command has the lead role in countering WMD threats.

"The United States will have increased efforts to locate, track and tag shipments of WMD," the report said. One key recommendation of the report is that "there shall be a joint task force for the elimination of WMD," the report said.

A core element of the new joint task force will be the Army's 20th Support Command, which will become a rapid deployment unit "to command and control WMD elimination missions by 2007," the report stated.

The report also recommends that general-purpose military forces take over the job of foreign military training that special operations forces have done "so that special operations forces can increase their capacity to perform more demanding and specialized tasks."

"They will possess an expanded ability to locate, tag and track dangerous individuals and other high value targets, globally," the report said.

Special operations forces "will also have greater capacity to detect, locate, and render safe WMD."

The unit will have its own intelligence component and be led by a two-star general or admiral, who defense officials said they hope will be a special operations veteran.

In addition to the WMD military unit, other key recommendations of the report include increasing special operations forces by 15 percent, creating a Marine Corps special operations command, setting up an Air Force unmanned aerial vehicle squadron, boosting the number of Navy SEAL commando teams and increasing Army psychological operations by 33 percent.

For homeland security, the report calls for spending $1.5 billion over the next five years for medical countermeasures against genetically engineered biological warfare agents.

Geographically, the report also contains a section on "countries at strategic crossroads" that examines the threats posed by China and Russia.

The recommendation for the WMD task force grew out a 2003 memorandum to senior Pentagon leaders by defense consultant Michael Pillsbury.

The plan called for setting up two standing units of special operations forces, one in Asia and one in Europe, to stop WMD transfers as deals are detected. Defense officials said Mr. Pillsbury has promoted the plan since in speeches to Army officials at Fort Bragg, N.C.

Contradicting conventional notions, most military reservists who left their civilian jobs to fight in Iraq or Afghanistan made more money there than in their regular jobs.

That is the conclusion of a study by Rand Corp.'s National Defense Research Institute, which found that 72 percent of the troops surveyed made more while on war duty in 2002 or 2003 than they did in their civilian jobs in 2001. More than half made at least $10,000 more.

On average, the reservists made $850 more per month while on duty than in their civilian jobs, the report said.

Nevertheless, the study said, a sizable proportion of the reservists -- 28 percent -- lost money, including some who saw their earnings drop by more than 10 percent.

Higher salaries, combat pay supplements, family-separation allowances and tax-free earnings have combined to boost troops' pay on the front lines. But Rand senior economist Jacob Alex Klerman said researchers are working to understand why this study differs dramatically from earlier surveys and anecdotal reports about families struggling to get by when a primary wage earner went to war.

Klerman said the study used earnings data supplied by the Social Security Administration, and therefore is likely to be more accurate than earlier surveys, which often relied on information volunteered by soldiers. Also, he said, those surveys did not reflect the fact that reservists serving in combat zones do not pay federal income taxes on their pay.

"You should not interpret this as saying no one has losses," Klerman said. "We need to think carefully about what is the appropriate response for those people with losses."

Still, he said, since earnings losses are less of a problem than earlier surveys suggested, legislative efforts to supplement reservists' pay may not be as necessary or require as much funding as previously thought.

Klerman said the study does not imply that reserve pay is adequate. Those troops, he emphasized, are still getting shot at, sleeping in tents and spending months away from their families.

Noting that some reservists are in school, and have no jobs or very low-paying jobs, Klerman said the study also looked at the earnings of those who made at least $10,000 or more in their civilian jobs. Even in those cases, he said, reservists made an average of nearly $7,000 more while on duty.

Overall, the study looked at 212,500 reservists and compared their civilian pay in 2001 with the amount they made while on duty in either 2002 or 2003.

To get a good idea of the impact on a full year's pay, it provided statistics for the 51,200 reservists who were at their regular jobs for most if not all of 2001, and then on duty for more than 271 days in either 2002 or 2003. For those reservists, the study found:

· Eighty-three percent made more on duty than at their civilian jobs.
· Sixty-six percent saw their pay increase more than $10,000 while on duty.
· Seven percent lost more than $10,000 while on duty.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Key Enron Trial Nears, But Climate Has Changed (CSM)

By Kris Axtman

The Christian Science Monitor, January 27, 2006

HOUSTON - Enron is America's best-known corporate scandal, the first in a string of high-profile debacles that rocked Wall Street, wiped out the retirement savings of thousands of workers, and sparked the most sweeping changes in business regulation since the Depression.

So when the company's two powerful leaders go on trial here Monday, the proceedings are likely to attract inordinate attention.

But the trial comes at a time when business and industry groups are mounting a campaign to roll back some of the reforms that the Enron scandal inaugurated. Thus, the lessons of the nation's second-biggest bankruptcy remain in flux and may be determined, in part, by the outcome of the legal drama set to begin.

"There are those who are trying to roll back [a key section] of the law less than two years after it took effect," says Jacob Zamansky, a securities fraud lawyer in New York who will attend the trial. "But these rules were put in place to protect us after Enron."

For a scandal that brought the language of bizarre accounting practices into America's living rooms (remember "off balance sheet partnerships?"), courtroom drama may be in short supply.

"I think people are going to be surprised at how boring most parts of the trial will be," says Nancy Rapoport, a bankruptcy expert and dean of the University of Houston law school. "Watching grass grow and paint dry will have more excitement. There will be some good stuff, but the good stuff will be punctuated by a lot of monotonous stuff."

Still, the details of the lives and business practices of the two men on trial - Enron founder Kenneth Lay and former chief executive Jeffrey Skilling - could provide an inside view of how the nation's second-biggest bankruptcy unfolded.

"We are going to be hearing for the first time what was happening at the highest levels of the corporation, what was happening inside the boardrooms, at all those expensive dinners and exotic trips all over the world," says Thomas Ajamie, a Houston securities fraud lawyer who has followed the case. "We are going to be learning how these high rollers lived and what they did with their shareholders' money."

To date, 16 former Enron employees have pleaded guilty and five have been convicted by jury. But Monday's trial is considered the main event - the real test of just how deep the deception went. A four-month trial expected

After the jury is selected by the judge, it is expected to last four months and include many key witnesses, such as Enron's former chief financial officer, Andrew Fastow, its former treasurer, Ben Glisan Jr., and possibly Richard Causey, the former chief accounting officer who pleaded guilty in December. Messrs. Lay and Skilling have also said they will testify.

Both sides have some of the best attorneys in America, court-watchers say. But because the accounting practices were so convoluted and cryptic even to those investigating the company's collapse, explaining it to a jury is going to be a challenge, experts say. The first criminal case of the Enron debacle, involving the suspicious purchase of a Nigerian barge, is a good example.

"The government better go to school and learn how confusing all that was for the jury," says Gerald Treece, assistant dean at the South Texas College of Law in Houston. Although five of the six defendants were ultimately convicted (four of them with Merrill Lynch), the case was widely seen as confusing. And it was child's play compared with the upcoming Enron case, he adds.

"If that was math, this is algebra, and the government is going to lose this case if it doesn't make it simple," he says. "I can assure you that the defense attorneys are going to be creating confusion, arguing that the people at the top didn't know about the misdeeds."

In fact, both defendants will argue that they did nothing wrong and did not know of any illegal activity at the company.

Lay has been charged with seven counts, including securities fraud and wire fraud. Skilling has been charged with 31 counts, including securities fraud, wire fraud, making false statements to auditors, and insider trading. Lay, Skilling go separate ways

As for the way they have handled themselves since the company collapsed, Lay and Skilling have "taken completely opposite approaches," says Philip Hilder, the lawyer who represents Sherron Watkins, Enron's internal whistleblower.

Lay, for instance, invoked the Fifth Amendment in front of Congress during initial hearings, but since his indictment has been very open with the public. Skilling testified defiantly in front of Congress, but has not spoken publicly since that time.

"At the end of the trial, we will see which tack worked - if either," says Mr. Hilder.

As for what has been learned in Enron's wake, there is growing debate. Some groups are saying that Congress went too far when it enacted the Sarbanes-Oxley Act, a major piece of accounting reform that requires CEOs to vouch for corporate earnings.

The US Chamber of Commerce, the largest business lobby group, has been campaigning aggressively for changes in the act's Section 404, which requires company auditors to thoroughly document their procedures. The chamber argues that the section is so cumbersome and costly that it is driving companies offshore.

There's No E In Houston (NYT)

By Simon Romero

The New York Times, January 27, 2006

HOUSTON, Jan. 26 — A big trial starts in federal court here on Monday, involving some very prominent executives who used to work for a very prominent company. Across the country, people will be following the case with great interest.

But in Houston, many residents prefer to focus on other things, like the resurgent economy, and city leaders wish outsiders would, too. The company, of course, is Enron, and the men who will be on trial are its former top executives, Kenneth L. Lay and Jeffrey K. Skilling, who face various charges in the scandal that led to the company's collapse and tarred this city's reputation four years ago.

"As of today, it's as if Enron had never happened," said Joan Johnson, president of the Hotel and Lodging Association of Greater Houston, echoing the sentiment of many Houstonians. Ms. Johnson said hotel occupancy was high, even though about 3,000 hotel rooms had been added downtown since Enron's collapse.

But as jury selection starts on Monday, residents here will have to relive the Enron debacle, with the possibility that the trial will drag on over several months. Already, hotels near the federal courthouse have been receiving a flow of out-of-town journalists, perhaps adding to the strength of the city's lodging industry.

In preparation for the trial, city officials are trying to accentuate the positive. The Greater Houston Partnership, a business association, raised the idea of coaching bellhops and other hotel workers on how to put Houston's best face forward in the downtown hotels, where many journalists will be staying. It rejected the proposal and instead backed a plan to post media contacts and Internet links in hotel lobbies, with the aim of planting ideas for positive stories.

Have you heard, for example, that Bakersfield, Calif., has unhealthier air quality than Houston, or that Houston has 82 foreign consulates, the nation's third-largest consular corps? The partnership puts those tidbits and more at the disposal of visiting news media.

"It was devastating for Houston to have its image portrayed as a bunch of corporate gunslingers during the first Enron go-around," said John F. Thrash, chief executive of eCorp, a family-owned energy concern, and the husband of Becca Cason Thrash, the hostess of Houston's most extravagant high-society gatherings. "That is something we're striving to overcome."

It isn't just Enron. Some residents get the jitters over even the slightest negative publicity about Houston, its wildcatting business ethic, its no-zoning sprawl or its continuing battles with industrial pollution. This week there was an outcry over an oil-laden, caramel-colored fog that blanketed a poor neighborhood in the shadow of the city's largest refinery.

Of course, Houston has taken numerous additional hits since Enron's collapse in late 2001, when the symbol of outrage became a question at a company meeting from an anonymous Enron employee to Mr. Lay, the company's embattled chairman: "Are you on crack?"

Thousands of well-paid Enron employees lost jobs, and the city's name was associated with schemes to hide losses from investors and destabilize the flow of electricity in California.

Back then, Houston was also criticized for its freewheeling approach to business. That shows few signs of fading. While not experiencing a boom as incandescent as past expansions, Houston's economy is still growing steadily, driven by inexpensive real estate, climbing energy prices and a fast-growing population.

"We're fine now, but the impact at the time was huge," said John Flowers, who owns Kenneally's Irish Pub near the exclusive River Oaks neighborhood. He recalls the Enron executives who used to drop by his smoky establishment for pints of Guinness as "free-spending individuals who made more money than God."

The city's economy has grown for 35 consecutive months, according to a monthly survey of purchasing executives conducted by the National Association of Purchasing Management-Houston. November, the most recent month for which statistics are available, was one of the strongest months in a decade, as demand rose for goods like plastic pipes and refined petroleum products.

Houston's status as an inland transportation hub with a ship channel to the Gulf of Mexico has also provided a buffer against the demise of Enron. Aided in part by the diversion of cargo from New Orleans after Hurricane Katrina, revenue at the Port of Houston increased 13 percent last year and total tonnage grew by 9 percent, said H. Thomas Kornegay, executive director of the Port of Houston Authority.

Furthermore, jobs are being created in the Houston economy. Employers added 42,500 jobs in 2005 and 24,100 in 2004, according to the Texas Workforce Commission. This follows heavy job losses in 2002 and 2003.

Much of the job creation has been fueled by a growing service industry and a robust construction market expected to expand further this year, even as housing in other parts of the country loses steam amid deflation of the real estate bubble.

"If any other city lost the seventh-largest corporation in America, it would have had more impact," said Tilman J. Fertitta, chief executive of Landry's Restaurants, and one of a handful of Houston businessmen who have filled the void left by Mr. Lay's exit from the city's social scene.

"It's just a whole hell of a lot cheaper here than other cities," Mr. Fertitta, one of the largest holders of real estate in Houston and nearby Galveston, said in an interview. "This is still an energy town but our prices have allowed us to become more diverse than in the 80's."

Relatively low home prices, with three-bedroom homes still widely available for less than $200,000, are luring developers to erect entirely new cities on the prairies and rice fields that make up much of Houston's outer fringe. Cheap land pushed housing starts to a record high in 2005, when they climbed 18 percent, to 48,000, according to Metrostudy, a real estate consulting firm.

One new real estate venture, a planned community called Bridgeland that is being developed by General Growth Properties of Chicago, is projected to consist of 21,000 new homes over 10,000 acres, an area larger than Houston's entire existing inner core of skyscrapers, subdivisions and shopping districts.

This project and others are a bet that Houston's population will continue to climb. The Houston-Galveston Area Council, which represents the eight-county Houston area, forecasts an increase to 8.8 million residents by 2035, from 5.3 million today. Much of the growth is driven by immigrants from Latin America, Africa and Asia, who come here legally or illegally and stay for the same reason that 150,000 survivors of Hurricanes Katrina and Rita relocated to Houston last year: a warm welcome.

In contrast to other communities that have experienced successful movements against illegal immigrants, calls by anti-immigrant groups last year to start questioning residents about their citizenship status drew a chilly response from Mayor Bill White and police officials, who perceived such a measure as a diversion from preventing crime.

And in a decision that raised eyebrows throughout Texas, The Dallas Morning News on Jan. 1 named Houston its "2005 Texan of the Year." The city beat out the filmmaker Robert Rodriguez, the cyclist Lance Armstrong and Ronnie Earle, the prosecutor who helped engineer the indictment of Representative Tom DeLay, the Republican who represents Houston's southern suburbs.

In an editorial that seemed a veiled criticism of political divisiveness in its hometown, The Morning News cited Houston's "resilience, resourcefulness and good old Texas neighborliness on a scale that did the whole state proud."

"The mountain came to Mohammed when Dallas tipped its hat at us that way," said Richard W. Murray, an influential pollster and political scientist at the University of Houston. "We've come a long way since the boom 25 years ago, when people were raising cash with projections of $100 oil. No one's doing that now."

Instead, Mr. Murray pointed out, there is a new sobriety and even, perhaps, the beginning of a sense that the benefits from the city's modest economic expansion need to spread out more equitably. For instance, the Service Employees International Union last month unionized 4,700 janitors in Houston, in one of the most successful unionization drives in the South in recent decades.

Not surprisingly, the most vibrant area of Houston's economy these days is energy, which is starting to hire after years of job cuts; oil and gas companies account for roughly 50 percent of economic activity here, down from higher levels as other industry grows more prominent.

So it may be fitting, as Houston tries to put to rest its association with Enron's hard-charging chiefs, that the last of the city's larger-than-life wildcatters are fading away or facing their own legal problems. Red Adair, the oil well firefighter, and Michel T. Halbouty, the geologist who cut his teeth in the east Texas oil fields, both died recently. And federal agents arrested the oilman Oscar S. Wyatt, 81, at his home several weeks ago on charges of paying millions of dollars in kickbacks to Saddam Hussein's regime.

Baggage Check: Next Trial True Test For Enron Task Force (LAW)

By Miriam Rozen, Texas Lawyer

Texas Lawyer, January 27, 2006

When Enron Task Force prosecutors enter U.S. District Judge Sim Lake's courtroom in Houston on Monday for the long-awaited trial of former Enron Corp. Chairman Kenneth Lay and former Chief Executive Officer Jeffrey Skilling, the government lawyers will be toting baggage -- both literal and figurative.

In the literal sense, the big criminal trial is document-intensive. In the figurative sense, the government lawyers have stumbled more than once in their four-year pursuit of Enron employees, and that track record follows them into Lake's courtroom.

Inarguably, the government lawyers have scored some notable successes by persuading 16 former Enron employees, including former Chief Financial Officer Andrew Fastow, to plead guilty to charges related to the downward financial and stock-price spiral that led to Enron's bankruptcy in December 2001. Most recently, on Dec. 28, 2005, Richard Causey, Enron's former chief accounting officer and Skilling's and Lay's co-defendant, pleaded guilty to one count of securities fraud and agreed to cooperate with prosecutors. [See Causey's plea agreement.]

In an earlier success in November 2004, in United States v. Daniel Bayly, et al., the so-called Nigerian Barge trial, prosecutors persuaded a jury to convict four former Merrill Lynch & Co. bankers and one former Enron executive on charges related to conspiracy to commit wire fraud.

But the government lawyers have also faced setbacks in the courtroom. At the Nigerian Barge trial, one former Enron executive, Sheila Kahanek, was acquitted. Six months later, in May 2005, the U.S. Supreme Court overturned the 2002 conviction of Arthur Andersen, Enron's accounting firm, for obstruction of justice, in United States v. Arthur Andersen LLP. In July 2005, in the so-called Enron Broadband trial, a jury deadlocked in the trial of five former Enron executives, and the proceedings ended in a mistrial. Two months later, U.S. District Judge Vanessa Gilmore blamed the government lawyers trying that case, United States v. Joseph Hirko, et al., for confusion at the trial, and she subsequently acquitted some of the defendants of some of the government's charges.

Skilling and Lay have pleaded not guilty.

"You have to give them, I think, credit for a very thorough and largely successful investigation in terms of the pleas," says Hardin, of Rusty Hardin & Associates of Houston. "One doesn't know whether the results would have been the same if just everybody had chosen to go to trial."

At the same time the task force has endured disappointments in the courtroom, its leadership has changed, and several prosecutors left the task force. In the most recent significant change, Sean Berkowitz became the task force's third leader in four years. He succeeded Andrew Weissmann, who resigned from the task force in July 2005 -- which happened to be a time the defense lawyers in the Lay and Skilling case made it clear they were going to file a motion alleging prosecutorial misconduct.

But this month, when task force prosecutors kick off the trial against Lay and Skilling, they will have an opportunity to make history if they rack up a conviction of the two businessmen who at one time symbolized corporate success in Houston.

"If they are successful at the Lay and Skilling trial, some of that baggage will disappear," says Charles Blau, a white-collar criminal defense lawyer about the task force. "But if they aren't successful, that baggage will be hung around their neck and the whole task force will look like a failure from a historical standpoint." Blau, a former federal prosecutor who now is a partner in Dallas' Meadows, Owens, Collier, Reed, Cousins & Blau, represents a witness in another Enron-related criminal case.

Houston lawyer Dan Cogdell offers an equally equivocal assessment of the task force's success. "You can look at their glass as half full or half empty," he says. Cogdell, a white-collar criminal defense lawyer and member of the Cogdell Law Group in Houston, represented Kahanek, the former Enron accountant and senior director who was acquitted of conspiracy and fraud charges in 2004 in the Nigerian Barge trial.

Bryan Sierra, a spokesman for the U.S. Department of Justice, says Berkowitz is preparing for trial and cannot comment for this article. Rich Kolko, a spokesman for the FBI, says Berkowitz's predecessor, Weissmann, is not available for comment.

But Bill Mateja, who once supervised the Enron Task Force, sees its glass as half full. Mateja, now a partner in the Dallas and Washington, D.C., offices of Fish & Richardson, served as senior counsel to former Deputy Attorneys General Larry Thompson and James Comey at the U.S. Department of Justice in Washington, D.C. During that time, from 2003 to 2004, Mateja was the point person for President George W. Bush's Corporate Fraud Task Force, and he oversaw the DOJ's corporate fraud efforts.

Mateja downplays the effect of the turnover at the top of the task force.

"I haven't seen the changes in the task force leadership as being detrimental to the efforts," he says.

Moreover, Mateja contends that the U.S. Supreme Court's decision to overturn the Andersen conviction reflects a weakness in the applicable statutes that make it a crime to "corruptly persuade" a witness to withhold evidence, a point specifically cited in the high court's unanimous opinion. It does not represent any fault on the prosecutors' part, Mateja says. Common sense dictated that the government would not retry the case against Andersen, which now only exists as a shell of its former self, he says.

Hardin, however, contends that Andersen would not have been indicted if the task force had not rushed to seek an indictment in the weeks after Enron filed for bankruptcy.

Samuel Buell, a prosecutor in Andersen who left the task force in 2004, disputes the notion that the task force is in trouble because of the turnover among prosecutors or because of the reversal in Andersen, a ruling he characterizes as "disappointing."

"The prosecution is institutional, and the lawyers are somewhat fungible," says Buell, who now teaches criminal law and seminars on corporate crime and prosecutorial powers at the University of Texas School of Law in Austin.

Buell notes the Enron Task Force demands grueling hours, and people get tired. He says he left the task force because he ran out of gas, and he suspects that's why Weissmann and his predecessor as director of the task force, Leslie Caldwell, moved on.

But clearly, the outcome of Andersen scarcely ranks as a success for the task force.

The Supreme Court's decision was a big break for David Duncan, the former lead Andersen accountant for Enron who pleaded guilty in 2002 to obstruction of justice and testified for the prosecution at the trial. While Duncan's plea deal was among the task force's first success stories, in December 2005, U.S. District Judge Melinda Harmon of Houston allowed Duncan to withdraw his plea on the ground that he didn't admit to having criminal intent when he entered it. Task force prosecutors have the option to indict him again, although they did not oppose Duncan's motion withdrawing his earlier plea. Under the circumstances, Mateja says, "It wouldn't have been very fair if they had pursued him."

But it's the outcome of the so-called Enron Broadband trial, Hirko, that is perhaps the most prominent setback for the task force. At the July 2005 conclusion of the trial, jurors deadlocked on many of the charges against five former Enron Broadband Services executives, convicting them of none and even acquitting three of them of some charges.

According to a transcript of a conference among the defense and government lawyers before the judge, Gilmore admonished the prosecutors: Throughout the trial I think the government was guilty of only seeing the evidence from the prosecution's point of view, every piece of evidence they saw, no matter what, as inculpatory and never could view any evidence at all as possibly exculpatory information or exculpatory evidence. The defense I think did a good job during the trial of viewing the evidence from both the government's and the defense point of view and not just from the defendants' point of view. . . .

The judge complained that the defense lawyers had filed post-trial motions that also looked at the evidence in a one-sided manner. But at trial Gilmore said the defense had shown more balance than the prosecutors.

Edwin J. Tomko, a partner in Dallas' McManemin & Smith who represented a defendant in the Enron Broadband trial, says the task force's trial record is simply not good.

"They haven't had many trials, and those that they've had have not been too successful. It's mediocre," says Tomko, whose client, Rex Shelby, a former senior vice president of engineering and operations at Enron Broadband Services, was acquitted of four of the 20 charges against him. Gilmore subsequently dismissed some of the charges against Shelby, and he now faces one count of conspiracy, one count of securities fraud and four counts of insider trading in a retrial scheduled for later this year.

SHOOT FOR THE TOP

The jury was out in the Broadband case in July 2005 when Weissmann, head of the task force since 2004, announced he would leave the task force. His announcement came a few months before the hearing where Gilmore scolded the prosecutors and a few days before the jury announced its deadlock in the Enron Broadband case. Weissmann is a former Assistant U.S. Attorney from the Eastern District of New York who had worked on the task force since its inception. His predecessor, Caldwell, now a partner in Morgan Lewis, did not return two telephone calls seeking comment for this article.

But defense lawyer Cogdell, who represented Kahanek and some witnesses in Enron criminal cases who have cooperated with the government, believes the timing of Weissmann's departure is related to the government's mistakes in the Enron Broadband trial and to a motion subsequently filed by Lay and Skilling alleging prosecutorial misconduct.

Before Weissmann announced he was leaving, three defense lawyers say, Weissmann became aware that the defendants in the Lay and Skilling case -- known as United States v. Jeffreys K. Skilling, et al. since Causey's plea -- were going to file a motion and include as an exhibit an e-mail sent by Weissmann to "a critical cooperating witness." In the e-mail, which was included as an exhibit in a Sept. 2, 2005, motion, Weissmann told the witness to bar his attorney from talking to Skilling's lawyer or else "get rid" of the lawyer.

Cogdell finds it curious that Weissmann would leave the task force before the "biggest trial" against Lay and Skilling.

But Buell says Weissmann's departure wasn't related to any allegations of prosecutorial misconduct or that e-mail. He says Weissmann's departure was simply a question of a lawyer wanting to move on and end a grueling Washington-to-Houston commute.

More than one lawyer involved with Lay and Skilling's defense and involved in the Enron Broadband trial has complained about the allegedly intimidating tactics employed by the task force and its assigned FBI agents when Weissmann was in charge.

"In my 30 years in practice I've never had agents be that aggressive," says Blau, who represents a client who testified for the defense in the Enron Broadband trial, despite, he says, numerous telephone calls from the prosecution suggesting it would not be in his client's best interest to do so.

Blau was among the defense attorneys whom Lay, Skilling and Causey -- who had not yet entered his guilty plea -- included by name in the motion they filed in September 2005 seeking to dismiss the charges against them based on prosecutorial misconduct. In that filing, the defendants argued that the case against them should be dismissed because the "actions of the Enron Task Force have deprived them of their constitutional rights both to secure and confront witnesses. ... "

The defendants argued that prosecutors attempted to intimidate witnesses and prevent them from assisting the defendants. Using Weissmann's e-mail as an example, the defendants alleged that the prosecutors employed aggressive tactics to stop witnesses from helping the defense and to induce them into helping the prosecutors.

At a hearing on the motion in December 2005, Lake ruled that he heard no evidence of prosecutorial misconduct in the testimony of two Houston lawyers -- Robert Sussman, a partner in Hinton, Sussman, Bailey & Davidson, and Wendell Odom, a solo practitioner. Lake, however, did not formally rule on the defendants' motion to dismiss. Sussman and Odom each did not return a telephone call seeking comment before press time on Jan. 5.

On Jan. 23, Lake denied Lay and Skilling's last-minute request seeking a change of venue for the trial due to prejudicial pre-trial publicity. In the motion, they alleged that a "staggering" 80 percent of 283 prospective veniremembers who returned juror questionnaires have "strongly biased views" against them. They quoted from questionnaires in which prospective jurors characterize Skilling as "the devil," a "thief," a "cheater" and a "high-class crook" and Lay as a "low down scumbag," "crooked," "a selfish, greedy man" and "the biggest lying crook of all."

Lay and Skilling will go to trial facing the likely prospect that Causey will testify against them. Causey faces a possible sentence of five to seven years in a federal prison.

If the government prevails, perhaps many of the task force's past missteps will be forgotten. As Blau notes, "The emphasis has always been to work up the chain to get the two top guys."

Reps Oxley, Frank Ask Fannie Board For Rudman And His Report (DOWJONES)

Dow Jones, January 26, 2006

WASHINGTON -(Dow Jones)- House Financial Services Chairman Michael Oxley, R- Ohio, and ranking Democrat Barney Frank want former Sen. Warren Rudman to testify before the panel on the results of his 16-month probe of Fannie Mae's (FNM) (FNM) accounting troubles, the lawmakers said in a recent letter released Thursday.

Fannie's board of directors hired Rudman, who is expected to complete his report next month, to help the board with its own internal investigation after the Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight accused executives in September 2004 of manipulating accounting rules to massage Fannie's earnings.

In a letter sent last week, Oxley and Massachusetts Rep. Frank asked Fannie Chairman Stephen Ashley for a copy of the much-anticipated report once it's finished, as well as for Rudman's testimony at a hearing they plan to conduct shortly thereafter.

"The purpose of this hearing will be to fully inform the committee about the findings, conclusions and any recommendations contained in the Rudman report," the letter said.

The Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight, which oversees Fannie and fellow government-sponsored enterprise Freddie Mac (FRE) (FRE), is expected to issue its own report on Fannie's accounting practices by the end of March.

Rudman, who could not be reached for comment Thursday, recently told Dow Jones Newswires that regulators and law enforcement agencies that are also investigating Fannie will likely receive copies of his report before its public release. In addition to OFHEO, the Securities and Exchange Commission, Justice Department and others have launched their own probes into alleged misconduct at Fannie.

Fannie, which hasn't filed its earnings statements since the second quarter of 2004, received a break from the SEC last week, when it approved a controversial rule change that reduces the chances it could soon be delisted by the New York Stock Exchange.

The news of the SEC's decision, which was posted on its Web site Wednesday, drove Fannie's stock 5.27%, or $2.85, higher to close Thursday at $56.95 a share.

Over the objections of the Nasdaq Stock Market, the SEC approved the amendment that was proposed last fall, giving the NYSE the power to hold off delisting companies that, like Fannie Mae (FNM), may fall more than a year behind in filing annual reports.

Under the old rule, companies go on watch if they fail to file an annual report within nine months of the due date and are subject to delisting if the delay stretches past 12 months.

Fannie Mae (FNM) hit the nine-month overdue mark Dec. 16. Under prior NYSE rules, delisting proceedings would have begun three months later. In a Nov. 10 update, Fannie Mae (FNM) said its annual report for the 2004 fiscal year, which will include restated results, isn't likely to be filed before the second half of 2006, so it expects to miss that deadline. A spokesman said Thursday that the timetable hasn't changed but declined further comment.

The rule change provides the NYSE with "appropriately limited flexibility" to allow a company more than a year late in filing with the commission to remain listed, the SEC said in its order.

Though Fannie Mae (FNM) isn't explicitly named in the filing, the giant mortgage finance agency is the only company to which the rule currently applies. In proposing the amendment, the NYSE wanted discretion in "certain unique circumstances" in which a company "may have a position in the market (relating to both the nature of its business and its very large publicly held market capitalization) such that its delisting from the exchange would be significantly contrary to the national interest and the interests of public investors."

The amendment takes effect immediately. The NYSE already has a new explanatory posting on its site on Fannie Mae's (FNM) information page that the company will be reassessed "every three months." Fannie Mae (FNM) is listed in a special section of the site devoted to late filers and has an "LF" attached to its symbol.

A Misguided Exemption (WSJ)

By Arthur Levitt, Jr

The Wall Street Journal, January 27, 2006

I began my Wall Street career more than 40 years ago sharing an 800-square-foot office with 10 other brokers. Since then, I have been involved in a number of small businesses -- from newspapers to high-tech companies -- and no matter the industry, the focus of every one of these has been growth. Unlike in a large company, stagnancy in a small business can lead not only to a diminished paycheck, but to extinction.

Small businesses employ a majority of private-sector workers and create 60% to 80% of net new jobs annually. This economic might, combined with the sector's political muscle, has kept policymakers vigilant in spotting impediments to small-business growth. Currently, the focus of many small-business advocates is the perceived burden placed on them by Section 404 of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act, which requires companies to assess and report the status of their internal controls. They worry that the cost of compliance is onerous, inhibiting their ability to access capital markets and grow.

In response, the Securities and Exchange Commission's advisory committee on smaller public companies has recommended that microcap and smaller public companies be exempted from the main parts of 404. Under their plan, public companies with a market cap of less than $100 million and revenue of no more than $125 million would be exempt completely from 404 requirements. Slightly larger companies -- those with a market cap of less than $700 million and revenues of no more than $250 million -- would not be required to have an independent, outside auditor test their internal controls.

While the advisory committee is well-intentioned, I fear that these proposed changes will harm, not help, small companies. I can appreciate the political pressure the SEC may be facing; the small-business lobby is almost unrivaled in the fear it instills in policymakers. But political pressure often leads people down the path of least resistance and toward superficial, even counterproductive, fixes. Indeed, if these recommendations were implemented, they would make it more difficult for smaller companies to attract capital needed for growth and undermine confidence in the markets. Instead of searching for exemptions to the rule, we need to step back and help small businesses improve financial controls, attract capital, and strengthen the very markets critical to their ability to flourish.

Thankfully, the market downturn of the immediate post-Enron years is behind us. As seen in the significant increases in IPO and mergers-and-acquisitions activity, there is a renewed vigor in our markets. Driving this has been a resurgence in investor confidence, fueled by the implementation of SOX reforms, including those enumerated in Section 404.

Exempting smaller and microcap companies -- 80% of all public companies -- from the requirements of 404 would undermine this renewed trust in our markets. Consider that these companies are the ones most likely to have internal control problems, and least likely to have analysts, institutional investors and the media watching them. In the five years before 2004, nearly three-quarters of financial restatements were reported by companies with annual revenues of less than $500 million. Already, many institutional investors do not invest in smaller companies because of risks associated with them. If one increases that risk by setting a lower bar for internal controls, it will burden these companies with a risk premium that will drive up their cost of capital. Creating a different standard would relegate small businesses to a "second-class" in the marketplace, and hinder their growth as much as any onerous regulation.

The debate until now has centered on who should be exempted, not on how to ensure that companies have the internal controls needed to prepare reliable financial statements. This focus is unproductive since it is clear from a reading of SOX that Congress wanted all public companies to assess internal controls and have an outside auditor test them. Instead of defying Congress and provoking costly litigation, we need to work within the law to find ways to make compliance easier and less expensive for small businesses.

To start, we need to recognize the difficulties in compliance that turned up in the first year of 404-compliance. Many companies were ill-prepared for an audit: Their internal controls either were not in place or not documented, and many lacked accounting and finance staff able to do this work. At the same time, many of the audit firms lacked the tools, expertise and training to assess the internal controls of smaller companies. They were using audit tools created for large multinationals, the financial equivalent of using an MRI to diagnose a cold. Many audit firms failed to integrate their findings from the internal control testing into the financial statement, as required by SOX, and as a result performed two separate audits. As the SEC and Public Company Accounting Oversight Board have noted, auditing firms needlessly repeated management and internal auditors' tests of internal controls, creating more work for themselves and higher bills for small businesses.

· Moving forward, we need, first, to redefine what constitutes a small business. The current debate has been skewed by a definition so broad as to include a vast majority of the market. A company's complexity is not dependent on its market cap. Some very large companies -- such as many of the airlines -- have market caps that pale in comparison to their complexity. Conversely, there are tech companies that have few employees and office sites, but huge market caps based on expected revenues. The current definition of a small business issuer should be updated to include companies with up to $50 million in revenues and fewer than 250 employees. If they have been able to attract more than $100 million in public capital, they should be ineligible for small business filer status.

· Second, the SEC and PCAOB should urge accounting and financial executive trade groups, as well as the software industry, to work together to develop reasonably priced tools tailored specifically for small companies and the small accounting firms who mainly audit them. These should permit a company to document internal controls so that auditors do not need to duplicate the documentation, and include control testing programs integrated with that documentation and the work performed on the year-end balance sheet and income statement. The tools must be made available before 2007 when small companies are required to comply with 404.

· Third, the SEC must reconfigure itself to provide more readily accessible assistance to small companies. In 1997, I reorganized the SEC so that the enforcement function was centralized in Washington. An unintended consequences of this was to close off a local avenue for accounting assistance for small businesses. Many small companies do not have good technical accountants and cannot afford them. If the SEC placed those that review small business filings closer to the businesses and supplemented its staff with a small group of accountants that can answer questions small companies might have, it would help avoid restatements and reduce costs.

· Fourth, while the SEC and PCAOB have issued some helpful guidance on how to streamline the auditing of internal controls, they should go further in easing requirements while stepping up enforcement. If a company has documented monitoring controls, and the monitoring process has not discovered any problems except for isolated cases, then no further internal examination by the company should be required. Re-examining controls when monitoring controls are working has layered on unnecessary work that has driven up costs for businesses. Companies should be given credit for doing the right thing, and not have to pay to recheck what they are doing right. However, if the auditor finds that monitoring controls have not been working and financials need to be restated, then a company should expect a swift SEC enforcement action.

These steps should help small companies update internal controls cost-effectively, without gutting the financial reporting regime that undergirds our capital markets. In light of the importance of small businesses to the economy, the last thing we need is regulation that stifles their entrepreneurship -- or deregulation that makes it more difficult for them to succeed in the public capital markets.

Mr. Levitt, former chairman of the SEC, was the chairman of the first White House Conference on Small Business.

CRIMINAL LAW:

'I Don't Know' Abramoff, Bush Says President Won't Release Photos Of Two Together (USAT)

By Richard Benedetto And David Jackson

USA Today, January 27, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush fended off questions Thursday about White House links to convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff and refused to release photos that show the two men together. "I don't know him," Bush said.

"I had my picture taken with him, evidently," Bush said at a White House news conference. "I've had my picture taken with a lot of people. Having my picture taken with someone doesn't mean that I'm a friend with them or know them very well."

"It's part of the job of the president to shake hands … with people and smile," he said.

Speaking in a wide-ranging, 46-minute news conference, Bush also renewed his defense of a program he approved to eavesdrop without a court order on terrorism suspects' international calls into or out of the USA.

"As I stand here right now, I can tell the American people the program is legal, it's designed to protect civil liberties, and it's necessary," he said.

Bush said he would help Republicans fight to keep control of Congress in elections this year.

He said he's got "one more off-year campaign in me as a sitting president" and that he is looking forward to hitting the trail on behalf of GOP congressional candidates.

"We've got a record and a good one, and that's what I intend to campaign on," Bush said.

Bush acknowledged that photographs of him with Abramoff were taken either at White House parties or political fundraisers, but he said he would not make them public because he feared they would be used for partisan attacks. "We live in a world in which those pictures will be used for pure political purposes, and they're not relevant to the investigation," he said.

Abramoff has pleaded guilty to fraud, tax evasion and conspiracy to bribe public officials and has pledged to cooperate with investigators.

"If they believe something was done inappropriately in the White House, they'll come and look, and they're welcome to do so," Bush said.

Asked if he meets with lobbyists, Bush said, "I try not to." He said that lobbyists sometimes come to the White House, and he has met and thanked them for their help in pushing his agenda.

Some Senate Democrats continued calls Thursday for a special counsel investigation of Abramoff. Sen. Ken Salazar, D-Colo., said there is evidence of "a strong connection between Jack Abramoff and the executive branch of government."

In other news, Bush said:

· "It is not in the world's interest" for Iran to have a nuclear weapon, an outcome he called "unacceptable." He said he would back a plan to have Iran obtain nuclear power plant fuel from Russia for a civilian energy program.

·Any suggestion by human rights groups that U.S. interrogators have tortured terrorist suspects is "wrong." He vowed, "No American will be allowed to torture another human being anywhere in the world."

·Morale, retention and recruitment remain high in the armed services, despite a Pentagon report that U.S. forces are overextended by service in Iraq and Afghanistan.

Bush Refuses To Release Abramoff Pictures (REU-Y2)

By Steve Holland

Reuters, January 27, 2006

President George W. Bush sought to distance himself from disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff on Thursday, saying "I don't know him," and refused to release photographs in which he appeared with Abramoff.

At a news conference, Bush said release of photographs that show him and Abramoff together would be used for "pure political purposes" by Democrats seeking to tie the lobbyist to the White House.

"I, frankly, don't even remember having my picture taken with the guy. I don't know him," Bush said at his first solo news conference since December 19.

DOJ_NMG_0012606

Early this month Abramoff pleaded guilty to fraud charges and agreed to help U.S. prosecutors in a corruption probe that has generated calls for reform of the Washington practice of lobbying lawmakers with donations and favors to try to influence legislation.

"This investigation needs to look into all aspects of his influence on Capitol Hill. And if there are some in the White House, I'm sure they're going to come knock on the doors," Bush said.

Abramoff was a major fund-raiser for Bush's re-election campaign in 2004 and the White House has acknowledged that Abramoff participated in a few staff-level meetings at the White House and two Hanukkah receptions.

But whether Abramoff attempted to influence any White House policy has not been made clear.

Democrats seeking to regain control of the U.S. Congress in November mid-term elections are hoping the Abramoff scandal will taint Republicans with a "culture of corruption."

Democratic Sens. Charles Schumer of New York and Ken Salazar of Colorado sent a letter to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales calling on him to appoint a special counsel to investigate the Abramoff case "without favor or fear of reprisal within the administration.

"A special counsel will ensure the public's confidence in the investigation and prosecution and help to restore its faith in our government," they wrote.

A CNN/USA Today/Gallup poll said that Democrats would do a better job of dealing with corruption in government by a 40 to 31 percent margin.

At the Hanukkah and other receptions, Bush and his wife Laura stand in a receiving line and shake hands and have photographs taken with thousands of guests.

Bush noted reporters have been to holiday receptions as well.

"I can't say I didn't ever meet him, but I meet a lot of people. And, you know, evidently he was, just like you were the other day, at the holiday party: came in, put the grip-and-grin, they clicked the picture and off he goes," he said.

Abramoff and his clients contributed to both Republicans and Democrats but appeared to send more money to Bush's party.

The Bush-Cheney re-election campaign said in the wake of the scandal that it would give to charity $6,000 in contributions made by Abramoff or his clients, but not the tens of thousands of dollars Abramoff helped raise.

Bush said he had never had a discussion with Abramoff and that as a general practice he does not meet with lobbyists.

But he said it was possible that lobbyists might be in a "room full of people" during an event staged to celebrate the success of a policy or passage of legislation such as a foreign-trade agreement.

A former White House procurement official, David Safavian, was indicted last October on charges of lying to investigators looking into a golf trip he took with Abramoff while serving in an earlier job as chief of staff for the General Services Administration.

Bush Opposes Release Of Photos With Abramoff (WP)

By William Branigin

The Washington Post, January 27, 2006

President Bush today dismissed the significance of photographs showing him with disgraced Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff and indicated that the White House would continue to oppose releasing the photos, which he said are irrelevant to a federal investigation.

"I've had my picture taken with him, evidently," Bush said in response to a question at a White House news conference. "I've had my picture taken with a lot of people. Having my picture taken with someone doesn't mean that I'm a friend with him or know him very well." He said that "it's part of the job of the president to shake hands with people and smile."

Bush said the photos, if released, "will be used for pure political purposes, and they're not relevant to the investigation." He referred to a continuing federal probe of illegal lobbying activities directed by Abramoff, who pleaded guilty this month to felony conspiracy and fraud charges. A plea agreement said Abramoff bribed public officials, including a member of Congress.

The president said he has no idea how many photos were taken of him and Abramoff, and he declined to discuss reported meetings that the lobbyist attended with White House staffers. Federal prosecutors are "welcome" to look into those meetings if they believe they involved improprieties, Bush said.

Abramoff "contributed to my campaigns, but he contributed, either directly or through his clients, to a lot of people in Washington," he said.

Asked whether he personally has ever been lobbied by Abramoff or other lobbyists, Bush said: "I, frankly, don't even remember having my picture taken with the guy. I don't know him. . . . But I can't say I didn't ever meet him, but I meet a lot of people. And, you know, evidently he was . . . at the holiday party: Came in, put the grip-and-grin, they clicked the picture and off he goes."

Bush said that "obviously, we went to fund-raisers, but I've never sat down with him and had a discussion with the guy."

As for whether he meets with lobbyists, Bush said, "I try not to." However, he said he could not attest to "never having met with one." He made an exception for meetings in which "people are helping on issues" such as promoting trade or tax relief.

"If you consider that a meeting, the answer is yes, I'm sure I have, in a room full of people, as we either thank people for success in policy or thank people for going out of their way to help get a piece of legislation passed on the Hill," Bush said.

Bush was also questioned at the news conference about a controversial eavesdropping program that he authorized after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks and that critics have charged violates U.S. law. Asked if he would resist efforts in Congress to modify the law or write a new one to specifically allow the program, Bush said he is convinced he is already on firm legal ground.

"As I stand here right now, I can tell the American people the program's legal, it's designed to protect civil liberties, and it's necessary," he said.

"Now, my concern has always been that, in an attempt to try to pass a law on something that's already legal, we'll show the enemy what we're doing," Bush said. The program "is so sensitive and so important that if information gets out to how we run it or how we operate it, it'll help the enemy. And so, of course, we'll listen to ideas. But I want to make sure that people understand that if the attempt to write law . . . is likely to expose the nature of the program, I'll resist it."

Bush denied trying to "circumvent" the nearly 28-year-old Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act (FISA), which requires intelligence agencies to obtain a warrant from a special court to eavesdrop on communications in the United States.

"I am upholding my duty and at the same time doing so under the law and with the Constitution behind me," Bush said. But he added: "The FISA law was written in 1978. We're having the discussion in 2006. It's a different world."

While FISA remains "an important tool," he said, intelligence experts had informed him that it did not fully meet today's requirements.

"I said, 'Look, is it possible to conduct this program under the old law?' And people said it doesn't work in order to be able do the job we expect us to do," Bush said.

Bush was also asked to clarify his stand on the torture of terrorist suspects by delivering some "Texas straight talk" on the subject in view of criticism by human rights groups.

"No American will be allowed to torture another human being anywhere in the world," he said, repeating the statement a reporter asked him to make.

Bush Says He Doesn't Know Abramoff, Remember Photos Being Taken (MERCN)

By William Douglas

The San Jose Mercury News, January 27, 2006

WASHINGTON - President Bush tried to distance himself Thursday from disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff while refusing to release White House pictures taken of him with Abramoff.

"I, frankly, don't even remember having my picture taken with the guy. I don't know him," Bush said. "But I can't say I didn't ever meet him."

The president's remarks came during a wide-ranging, impromptu White House news conference in which he continued to defend his domestic spying program, embraced a Russian proposal to end the stalemate over Iran's nuclear activities and carefully interpreted a militant Islamic group's stunning victory Wednesday in Palestinian parliamentary elections.

Bush's recollection of Abramoff was fuzzy, but the high-flying lobbyist was well known in political fundraising circles, including the Bush-Cheney campaign, which received a $6,000 contribution from him. The campaign donated the money to the American Heart Association earlier this month after Abramoff pleaded guilty to fraud charges and agreed to help federal prosecutors in their investigation of possible corruption in Congress and the White House.

Since Abramoff's plea, administration officials have acknowledged that he met with some White House staffers but won't say whom or about what. White House Press Secretary Scott McClellan has said Abramoff was in the White House at least twice for Hanukkah parties, where he may have had pictures taken with Bush.

Administration officials want to keep any Bush-Abramoff pictures from becoming public to avoid giving political opponents ammunition that could hurt Republicans in November's congressional elections.

"Having my picture taken with someone doesn't mean that I'm a friend with them or know them very well. I've had my picture taken with you at holiday parties," the president reminded reporters. He estimated that he'd posed for about 9,000 photos at receptions this past holiday season alone.

"I'm also mindful that we live in a world in which those pictures will be used for pure political purposes, and they're not relevant to the investigation," Bush said.

Regarding the spying program, the president reiterated his contention that he was within his constitutional rights to authorize electronic eavesdropping without getting a warrant from a court or specific approval from Congress.

"We're having this discussion in 2006. It's a different world," the president said.

Turning his attention to the Middle East, Bush called Hamas' surprising victory in Palestinian elections a "wake-up call" to Palestinian leaders who followed the late Yasser Arafat. "Obviously, people were not happy with the status quo. The people are demanding honest government. The people want services."

Bush didn't entirely rule out dealing with elected Hamas leaders, but said, "If your platform is the destruction of Israel, it means you're not a partner in peace. And we're interested in peace."

On Iran, the president called a proposal by Russia to enrich Iran's uranium and return it to the Islamic nation for use in fueling nuclear reactors for electricity "a good plan." Iran maintains that it wants nuclear-powered electricity, but the United States and the European Union fear that it's pursuing nuclear weapons.

On other matters:

_Bush said he hadn't seen a Human Rights Watch report this week that says the administration has a strategy of abusing terrorism suspects during interrogations. "No American will be allowed to torture another human being anywhere in the world," he said.

In December he signed into law a measure by Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., that bans torture of detainees in U.S. custody, but he added a qualifying statement that he'd interpret the law in keeping with his expansive view of presidential power.

"One reason why presidents put qualifiers in is to protect the prerogative of the executive branch," Bush said Thursday.

_The president was cool to a homeowner-bailout plan for Hurricane Katrina victims in Louisiana. He said Congress had appropriated $85 billion so far to help rebuild the Gulf Coast.

"I want to remind the people in that part of the world, $85 billion is a lot, and secondly, we were concerned about creating additional federal bureaucracies, which might make it harder to get money to the people," he said.

Bush Says Photos With Abramoff 'Not Relevant' (LAT)

By Edwin Chen

The Los Angeles Times, January 27, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush today acknowledged that he met former lobbyist Jack Abramoff, who has pleaded guilty to federal corruption charges, but the president characterized the brief encounter as a "grip and grin" photo session during a holiday party.

"But I've never sat down with him and had a discussion with the guy," Bush said. "I frankly don't even remember having my picture taken with the guy. I don't know him."

Bush also rejected the notion of detailing possible contacts between Abramoff and members of the senior White House staff, saying he preferred to let federal prosecutors conduct their own investigation.

The president made his most extensive remarks to date on the Abramoff scandal during a mid-morning press conference at the White House.

Abramoff pleaded guilty last month to federal fraud and conspiracy charges stemming from his dispersal of gifts, travel and campaign contributions to lawmakers, mostly Republicans. In exchange, the lobbyist has agreed to help prosecutors who are investigating his relationships with an array of members of Congress and perhaps White House aides.

The scandal has rocked Washington and promises to be a key theme in November's elections, when Republican control of the House and Senate will be at stake.

During the wide-ranging 46-minute session, Bush also said the U.S. would not deal with members of Hamas, the radical Islamic movement whose members won a sweeping victory in the Palestinian parliamentary elections, unless they renounce violence and abandon their goal of seeking Israel's destruction.

In addition, the president previewed some themes from the annual State of the Union address that he will deliver Tuesday night and defended his controversial post-9/11 directive allowing the National Security Agency to conduct surveillance on U.S. citizens.

He said he relished campaigning for Republicans in this year's elections but said that next week he would call on members of both parties to "set aside the partisanship that inevitably will come with an election year and get some stuff done."

Bush said his message, both on Tuesday night and in the upcoming election campaign, would strike an optimistic note, focusing on a strong and growing economy, coupled with new initiatives on healthcare, education and energy. He said that the election campaign would be about "peace and prosperity."

The president sounded particularly defensive when reporters pressed him about his contacts with Abramoff. Both Time and Washingtonian magazines this week reported the existence of White House photographs of Bush with Abramoff.

The president said he would not release them because he was "mindful that we live in a world in which those pictures will be used for pure political purposes, and they are not relevant to the investigation."

He added: "I've had my picture taken with a lot of people. Having my picture taken with someone doesn't mean that I'm a friend with him or know him very well."

Gesturing to the roomful of assembled reporters, Bush continued, provoking some laughter: "I've had my picture taken with you at holiday parties. My point is, I mean, there's thousands of people that come through and get their pictures taken."

He said some 9,000 holiday guests had come to the White House and had their photographs taken with him, adding: "It's part of the job of the president to shake hands with people and smile. And I do."

But Bush said the Abramoff scandal needed to be "cleared up, so the people have confidence in the system."

On the NSA domestic spying controversy, he reiterated his contention that he had acted within the law and bristled when a reporter asked why he felt a need to "circumvent" the law.

"Circumventing is a loaded word. And I refuse to accept it because I believe what I'm doing is legally right," the president said. "I am upholding my duty and at the same time doing so under the law and with the Constitution behind me."

On another matter, Bush restated his opposition to making senior staff available to lawmakers at hearings examining the administration's faltering response to Hurricane Katrina. He said the White House already has sent to investigators 600,000 pages of internal documents. To go any further, he said, would create "a chilling effect on future [presidential] advisors."

Bush also dismissed suggestions that the 5-year-old global war on terrorism was overextending U.S. troops.

"The things I look for are the following: morale, retention and recruitment. And retention's high, recruitment is meeting goals, and people are feeling strong about the mission," he said.

Photos With Lobbyist Are 'Not Relevant,' Bush Says (NYT)

By David Stout

The New York Times, January 27, 2006

WASHINGTON, Jan. 26 — President Bush deflected questions today about photographs of him with Jack Abramoff, the disgraced Republican lobbyist, saying the photos are irrelevant.

"I mean, there's thousands of people that come through and get their pictures taken," Mr. Bush said. "I'm also mindful that we live in a world in which those pictures will be used for pure political purposes, and they're not relevant to the investigation."

The president, speaking at a hastily called news conference, responded somewhat indirectly when asked if he was afraid to release the pictures of himself and the once-powerful Mr. Abramoff, who has pleaded guilty to conspiracy, fraud and tax evasion and who prosecutors say tried to influence lawmakers and their aides with campaign contributions, lavish trips and meals.

"Having my picture taken with someone doesn't mean that, you know, I'm a friend with them or know them very well," Mr. Bush said. "I've had my picture taken with you at holiday parties." In fact, presidents are often photographed with people whom they know only casually, or hardly at all, including reporters at White House Christmas parties.

Mr. Bush also used the news conference, which appeared to have been called to react to the victory of Hamas in the Palestinian elections, as an opportunity to defend his policies and lay out his goals in advance of his State of the Union address on Tuesday. He insisted again that the National Security Agency's eavesdropping program was legal and necessary and did not trample on civil rights, that Congress should renew the Patriot Act that expanded government surveillance powers, and that Congress should make permanent the "temporary" tax cuts enacted during his White House tenure.

Meanwhile, Democrats sought to deepen Republican embarrassment and to deflate the effect of Mr. Bush's State of the Union address in advance. "Republicans are doing the bidding of special-interest lobbyists who have purchased access to the legislative process," Representative Nancy Pelosi of California, the House minority leader, said in an appearance at the National Press Club.

White House officials have said that Mr. Abramoff also attended some "staff level" meetings at the White House, as well as White House Hanukkah receptions in 2001 and 2002. Perhaps, one questioner suggested today, the White House should disclose the details of those sessions and prevent any hint of "guilt by association."

"There is a serious investigation going on by federal prosecutors," Mr. Bush replied with a chuckle. "That's their job."

DOJ_NMG_0012610

He added, "If they believe something was done inappropriately in the White House, they'll come and look, and they're welcome to do so."

At one point, Mr. Bush seemed to imply that Mr. Abramoff had been bipartisan in contributing to political campaigns. "He contributed either directly or through his clients to a lot of people in Washington," he said. "This needs to be cleared up, so the people have confidence in the system."

So far, most of those embarrassed by the still-unfolding scandal have been Republicans, like Representative Tom DeLay of Texas, the former House majority leader, who were befriended by Mr. Abramoff. But Mr. Bush said he did not even know Mr. Abramoff, despite his appearance with him in photographs. "I've never sat down with him and had a discussion with the guy," Mr. Bush said.

As for the National Security Agency's surveillance program, which many Democrats have said was of dubious constitutionality and legality at best, Mr. Bush said it had been vetted by lawyers and was essential. "And so as I stand here right now," he said, "I can tell the American people the program's legal, it's designed to protect civil liberties, and it's necessary."

The president dismissed any suggestion that the N.S.A. program is part of a broader effort to expand presidential power, as some Congressional Democrats have asserted. "I would say that there has been a historical debate between the executive branch and the legislative branch as to who's got the power," he said. "And I don't view it as a contest with the legislative branch. Maybe they view it as a contest with the executive. I just don't."

Representative Pelosi and Senator Richard J. Durbin of Illinois, the Senate Democratic whip, assailed the Bush administration in an attempt to diminish the luster of the president's State of the Union appearance before Congress and the American people. Ms. Pelosi said the president's proposed budget would damage vital programs while "heaping mountains of debt on our children." "Why, the American people ask us, are we considering a budget that is so out of step with our values and our priorities?" Ms. Pelosi asked. "The answer is, the Republican culture of corruption that has permeated the White House and the Capitol." That culture, she went on, spawns legislation "loaded up with special interest earmarks and bridges to nowhere that increase the deficit."

Mr. Durbin scoffed at Mr. Bush's assertion that his policies had made the nation more secure. "On national security, Osama bin Laden sadly is still at large, and his deadly franchise is moving across the world," Mr. Durbin said. "There was no Iraq-Al Qaeda connection before our invasion. Sadly, there is one now. Iraq has become a training ground for a new generation of terrorists."

Hatch vs. Leahy

Although the much-anticipated Supreme Court nomination fight over Judge Samuel A. Alito Jr. has turned out to be something of a dud, there have been a few feisty exchanges. Among the snippiest was the floor spat Wednesday between Sen. Patrick J. Leahy, Vermont Democrat, and Sen. Orrin G. Hatch, Utah Republican.

Mr. Hatch had dismissed Mr. Leahy's hyperbole about the threat to American liberties posed by Judge Alito. Speaking later, Mr. Leahy angrily chided Mr. Hatch.

"On several occasions, both publicly and privately, I've asked the distinguished senior senator from Utah if he purports to quote me to try to at least get within the ballpark of accuracy," Mr. Leahy said. At this, Mr. Hatch asked to respond, but Mr. Leahy refused to surrender the microphone.

"I would like to find the quote where I said Judge Alito all by himself would do away with the liberties of Americans," Mr. Leahy said.

Well, by the next morning, Mr. Hatch found the following prepared statement from Mr. Leahy: "This is a nomination that I fear threatens the fundamental rights and liberties of all Americans now and in generations to come."

Mr. Hatch said: "I was not only in the ballpark, I was standing on home plate."

A confident Romney

Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, edging ever closer to a presidential run, says he isn't afraid that evangelical and born-again Christian voters will stiff-arm him in the 2008 GOP primaries just because he's a Mormon.

The Republican also told reporters yesterday that his views on abortion have changed, because of research into stem cells, and as a result, he now thinks "life begins at conception."

"I am firmly pro-life. Each state should able to adopt its own policies with regard to abortion and choice," Mr. Romney said at a press luncheon at the Capital Hilton.

He said most voters in his state are Catholics, but they could not care less about his religion.

Mr. Romney had a busy day in Washington, speaking first to a Medicaid reform commission, then a Christian Science Monitor luncheon for the press and finally at the Heritage Foundation, reports Ralph Z. Hallow of The Washington Times.

Senatorial request

Two Senate Democrats called yesterday for the appointment of a special counsel to take over the investigation of the corruption scandal spawned by former lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

The switch "would ensure that the investigation and prosecution will proceed without fear or favor and provide the public with full confidence that no one in this country is above the law," Sens. Charles E. Schumer of New York and Ken Salazar of Colorado wrote Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales.

The two Democrats said that so far, the public-integrity section of the Justice Department, which is in charge of the probe, has "pursued this case appropriately."

Mr. Schumer and Mr. Salazar sent their letter several days after Democrats pressed the White House for information on contacts between the president, or other top officials, and Abramoff.

Foot in mouth

A Pennsylvania gubernatorial candidate challenging Pro Football Hall of Fame member Lynn Swann in the Republican primary fired his campaign manager after the man told a televised call-in show: "The rich white guy in this campaign is Lynn Swann."

Bill Scranton, a former lieutenant governor who is white and comes from a wealthy family, also issued an apology to Mr. Swann, who is black, after his campaign manager's comments Wednesday, the Associated Press reports.

The remarks by James Seif "in no way whatsoever reflect my views or those of my campaign," Mr. Scranton said. "I want to apologize to Lynn Swann, his family, supporters and PCN [Pennsylvania Cable Network] viewers for the offensive and disturbing comments made on my behalf."

Thanks, Ralph

The expected confirmation of Judge Samuel A. Alito Jr. to the Supreme Court, after the confirmation of Judge John G. Roberts Jr. as chief justice, "represents a notable, and greatly satisfying, rebuke for the legal left and its 'borking' strategy," the Wall Street Journal says.

"Sen. Chuck Schumer declared in 2001 that he wanted to turn judicial confirmations into battles over 'ideology.' The New York Democrat succeeded in doing so, but he ended up losing in a self-knockout. One reason Democrats couldn't defeat Chief Justice Roberts or Judge Alito, despite near party-line opposition, is that their filibuster strategy had made judges a top-line election issue in both 2002 and 2004.

"The battle over their unprecedented filibuster of 10 appeals-court nominees helped to sweep Democrats out of the Senate in Bush-leaning states and give Republicans a larger majority. The Democrats who remain in red states — five of whom are up for re-election in November — saw all this and had no appetite for a repeat in 2006. The liberal interest groups that devised the filibuster strategy and wrote the anti-Alito talking points for Sens. Ted Kennedy and Patrick Leahy thus contributed as much as anyone to Judge Alito's confirmation. Congratulations, Ralph Neas. It's your finest hour."

Still out

Edward Cox, a son-in-law of the late President Richard Nixon, said yesterday he will not resume his campaign for the Republican nomination to challenge Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton's re-election bid this year, the Associated Press reports.

The Manhattan lawyer suspended his campaign in October after Republican Gov. George E. Pataki endorsed then-Westchester County District Attorney Jeanine Pirro's bid for the Senate nomination. Mrs. Pirro's campaign subsequently collapsed, and Mrs. Pirro heeded the call of state GOP leaders to run instead for state attorney general.

Worse now

The head of the FBI's counterintelligence division, retiring after 33 years at the agency, warns that "the counterintelligence threat is worse now than it was in the Cold War."

David Szady, assistant director for counterintelligence, said the threat is "broader, it's more expansive, it's huge."

In an interview with Bill Gertz of The Washington Times yesterday, a day before retiring to join the private sector, Mr. Szady said: "We really think we've come a long way, but more needs to be done."

Mr. Szady also said that FBI counterintelligence training is increasing and that more agents are choosing to become counterspies.

Since 2002, the bureau has set up squads of counterspies in all its 56 field offices and has begun better training and private-sector outreach programs, he said.

"If nothing else, you can be proud of the FBI because almost every other free-world intelligence service has not been able to do in counterintelligence what we've done. We've sustained it, and we've increased it," Mr. Szady said.

Sens. Want Independent Corruption Probe (AP)

By David Espo

AP, January 27, 2006

WASHINGTON - Two Senate Democrats called Thursday for the appointment of a special counsel to take over investigation of the corruption scandal spawned by lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

The switch "would ensure that the investigation and prosecution will proceed without fear or favor and provide the public with full confidence that no one in this country is above the law," Sens. Chuck Schumer of New York and Ken Salazar of Colorado wrote Attorney General Alberto Gonzales.

The two Democrats said that so far, the public integrity section of the Justice Department, which is in charge of the probe, has "pursued this case appropriately."

A Justice Department spokesman declined immediate comment.

Abramoff pleaded guilty earlier this year to several felony charges, some of them involving his dealings with members of Congress and their aides. His one-time business partner, former congressional aide Michael Scanlon, pleaded guilty last year as part of the same investigation.

Officials have said numerous former congressional aides remain under scrutiny, as does Rep. Bob Ney, R-Ohio, who recently stepped down temporarily as chairman of a House committee.

Politicians of both parties moved quickly to shed campaign donations from Abramoff or his former clients.

The scandal also has thrust congressional reform toward the top of the legislative and political agenda in the opening days of an election-year Congress.

Schumer and Salazar sent their letter several days after Democrats pressed the White House for information on contacts between the president or other top officials and Abramoff. So far, the White House has refused to release any photographs of the president and the lobbyist together.

Asked about the issue at a news conference Thursday, Bush said, "There's thousands of people that come through and get their pictures taken.

In their letter, Schumer and Salazar cited news reports that said that in addition to the presidential photographs, Abramoff organized at least one meeting with White House aides for his clients.

"These meetings with the president and the White House staff occurred while you were serving as White House counsel," they wrote Gonzales, who became attorney general a year ago. "Given the possible ties between Mr. Abramoff and senior government officials, we believe the appointment of a special counsel is not only justified, but necessary."

Salazar: Abramoff Prosecutor Needed (DENP)

Washington - Colorado Sen. Ken Salazar on Thursday joined New York Democrat Sen. Charles E. Schumer in calling for a special counsel to investigate political corruption involving lobbyist Jack Ambramoff.

Ambramoff has pleaded guilty to bribery and fraud and is cooperating with prosecutors looking in to his dealings with Congress.

Salazar, a Democrat, and Schumer sent a letter to U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales asking for the special counsel.

If such an investigation were granted, it would be similar to that conducted by special counsel Patrick Fitzgerald, who probed the leak of a covert CIA operative's name.

The senators said an independent investigation is necessary because a special counsel could act without either favor from or fear of reprisal from the White House.

"As a former (state) attorney general, I believe in upholding the law and rooting out corruption," Salazar said in a statement. "The American people deserve an open, unbiased investigation into this matter. Appointing a special counsel will begin the process of restoring America's faith in government."

Added Schumer: "With public trust in government at very low levels, it is crucial that we remove any appearance of impropriety from the investigation of the Abramoff scandal by appointing a special counsel who is independent of the Bush Administration and the current Justice Department."

Ethics In Congress (NYT)

The New York Times, January 27, 2006

To the Editor:

Re "If You Give a Congressman a Cookie," by Norman Ornstein and Thomas E. Mann (Op-Ed, Jan. 19):

I am surprised that these Congressional scholars would assert that House roll-call votes are "frequently" stretched beyond an hour. This happens, on average, less than once per two-year Congressional session.

They say that Speaker J. Dennis Hastert "fired" the chairman of the House ethics committee last year. Under House rules, there was a term limit for all members, including the chairman. Speaker Hastert followed the regular order that these writers claim to cherish in naming a new chairman.

They also assert that I and a colleague, who had donated to Representative Tom DeLay's defense fund, were named to the ethics committee "when the main matter pending before the committee involved" Mr. DeLay. In fact, the committee had publicly announced, in keeping with its normal practice, that it was deferring its one pending DeLay-related matter until the conclusion of the Texas criminal investigation, which continues to this day.

Moreover, my colleague and I long ago announced that we will recuse ourselves from any matter related to Mr. DeLay.

Prosecutor Will Step Down From Lobbyist Case (NYT)

By Philip Shenon And Elisabeth Bumiller

The New York Times, January 27, 2006

WASHINGTON, Jan. 26 — The investigation of Jack Abramoff, the disgraced Republican lobbyist, took a surprising new turn on Thursday when the Justice Department said the chief prosecutor in the inquiry would step down next week because he had been nominated to a federal judgeship by President Bush.

The prosecutor, Noel L. Hillman, is chief of the department's public integrity division, and the move ends his involvement in an inquiry that has reached into the administration as well as the top ranks of the Republican leadership on Capitol Hill.

The administration said that the appointment was routine and that it would not affect the investigation, but Democrats swiftly questioned the timing of the move and called for a special prosecutor.

The announcement came as Mr. Bush faced a barrage of questions about why he would not make public "grip-and-grin" photographs of him with Mr. Abramoff. The photographs apparently show Mr. Bush and Mr. Abramoff smiling at White House Hanukkah parties and Republican fund-raising receptions.

Mr. Bush's position, which he offered at a news conference on Thursday morning that was peppered with questions about Mr. Abramoff, was that the photographs were so common as to be almost meaningless and that it was part of his job "to shake hands with people and smile." He said he could not remember posing for the pictures, or, for that matter, even meeting Mr. Abramoff.

"I had my picture taken with him, evidently," Mr. Bush said. "I've had my picture taken with a lot of people. Having my picture taken with someone doesn't mean that I'm a friend with them or know them very well."

He said, "I'm also mindful that we live in a world in which those pictures will be used for pure political purposes, and they're not relevant to the investigation."

The White House, which announced Mr. Bush's selection of Mr. Hillman for the court in a routine e-mail message on Wednesday that included 15 other nominations to judgeships and federal jobs, dismissed the calls for a special prosecutor.

"It's nothing but pure politics," said Scott McClellan, the White House press secretary. "The Justice Department is holding Mr. Abramoff to account, and the career Justice prosecutors are continuing to fully investigate the matter."

A special prosecutor would not be especially welcome at the White House. Patrick J. Fitzgerald, the special counsel in the C.I.A. leak case, is more than two years into an investigation that has resulted in the indictment of a top vice-presidential aide, I. Lewis Libby Jr., and has left Karl Rove, the president's chief political adviser, under investigation.

Mr. Hillman's departure from the Justice Department creates a vacancy at the top of the Abramoff inquiry only three weeks after Mr. Abramoff, once one of the city's most powerful Republican lobbyists and a major fund-raiser for Mr. Bush, announced his guilty plea and agreed to testify against others, possibly including members of Congress.

A former senior White House budget official, David H. Safavian, has been indicted in the case on charges of lying about his contacts with Mr. Abramoff, a former lobbying partner. The Justice Department's plea agreement with Mr. Abramoff makes clear that prosecutors are investigating several members of Congress and other public officials who are suspected of having accepted gifts from the lobbyist in exchange for official acts.

Colleagues at the Justice Department say Mr. Hillman has been involved in day-to-day management of the Abramoff investigation since it began almost two year ago. The inquiry, which initially focused on accusations that Mr. Abramoff defrauded

Indian tribes out of tens of millions of dollars in lobbying fees, is being described within the department as the most important federal corruption investigation in a generation.

Mr. Hillman's nomination for a judgeship was among the factors cited Thursday by four Democratic lawmakers, two senators and two representatives, in calling on Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales to name a special prosecutor to oversee the corruption investigation.

The timing of Mr. Hillman's nomination "jaundices this whole process," Senator Charles E. Schumer, Democrat of New York, said in an interview. "They have to appoint a special counsel. I think there will be broad support for one."

Representative George Miller, Democrat of California, called the timing "startling" and said, "You have one of the chief prosecutors removed from a case that has tentacles throughout the Republican leadership of Congress, throughout the various agencies and into the White House."

White House officials have said that Mr. Abramoff had no improper dealings with the White House. They have said he attended "staff level" meetings at the White House, but have declined to say with whom. One of his chief connections to the White House was through Susan Ralston, an assistant who worked for him before she worked for Mr. Rove. Ms. Ralston continues to work for Mr. Rove as a top aide.

A Justice Department spokesman, Bryan Sierra, said he had no comment on the Democratic request for a special prosecutor because the department had not received their letter making the request.

Mr. Sierra said in an interview that there was nothing unusual about the timing of Mr. Hillman's nomination and that it would not affect the Abramoff inquiry. "The team that Noel put together is going to remain together," he said. "The investigation should not be impacted." He said Mr. Hillman would be temporarily succeeded as head of the public integrity office by Andrew Lourie, a career prosecutor in Florida.

The White House had been poised to nominate Mr. Hillman for the bench last year. Mr. Sierra said he did not know why the nomination had been delayed until this week, but he said he believed it had nothing to do with the Abramoff investigation.

In a letter sent to the attorney general on Thursday asking for an independent counsel, Senator Schumer and Senator Ken Salazar, Democrat of Colorado, praised Mr. Hillman's office for the investigation that led to the guilty plea by Mr. Abramoff and his former lobbying partner, Michael Scanlon, a former press secretary to Representative Tom DeLay.

"We applaud its pursuit of Mr. Abramoff and his colleagues," they said. "We have no doubt that if the investigation is left to the career prosecutors in that section, the case would reach its appropriate conclusion. Unfortunately, the highly political context of the allegations and charges may lead some to surmise that political influence may compromise the investigation."

By David Johnston

The New York Times, January 27, 2006

WASHINGTON, Jan 26 — Lawyers for Vice President Dick Cheney's former chief of staff asked a federal judge on Thursday to order the prosecutor in the C.I.A. leak case to turn over all documents in his possession related to what journalists knew from any source about the intelligence officer at the heart of the case.

The lawyers for the former chief of staff, I. Lewis Libby Jr., said in their motion that the prosecutor, Patrick J. Fitzgerald, had refused to turn over to the defense documents that would shed light on whether any reporter knew about the C.I.A. officer, Valerie Wilson, before her name was first disclosed in a newspaper column on July 14, 2003.

Mr. Libby's lawyers said in their motion that "the prosecution invoked an extraordinarily narrow conception of its disclosure obligations." The prosecutor turned over, the defense said, only documents related to Mr. Libby's contacts with reporters, refusing to turn over documents about what these and other reporters had learned about Ms. Wilson from other sources.

The defense team said that such documents were highly relevant as Mr. Libby's lawyers sought to find out "the identity of all reporters who knew that Ms. Wilson worked for the C.I.A., and to discover when they learned such information, from whom they learned it and whether they disclosed it further after learning it."

Mr. Libby was charged in a five-count perjury and obstruction of justice indictment last October with misleading investigators about how he had learned of Ms. Wilson. The indictment said he had concealed that he had learned about her from other government officials, telling investigators that his information had come from journalists. Mr. Libby has pleaded not guilty to the charges. No trial date has been set.

The defense request strongly suggested that Mr. Libby's defense could turn on the testimony of reporters, who are expected to be called as witnesses in the trial, including those who testified during the grand jury investigation about their conversations with confidential sources and perhaps others who have not yet been identified.

Some reporters who are likely to be caught in the dispute over evidence are known. Mr. Libby's conversations with some journalists, like Tim Russert of NBC News, were cited in the indictment. Another reporter, Matthew Cooper of Time magazine, said after he testified in the investigation that he had learned about Ms. Wilson, although not her name, from Karl Rove, the senior White House adviser. Mr. Cooper said Mr. Libby was a confirming source of information about her.

In addition, Bob Woodward, the Washington Post reporter, has said he told Mr. Fitzgerald in a deposition that he learned about Ms. Wilson from a government official other than Mr. Libby in June 2003, several weeks before her name became public. Mr. Woodward's source has not been identified.

Other journalists have also appeared as witnesses before the grand jury in the case, including Judith Miller, then a reporter for The New York Times.

The prosecutor has not yet responded to Thursday's request, but Mr. Libby's lawyers said Mr. Fitzgerald had used a "narrow and overly restrictive" standard in interpreting rules that require prosecutors to supply defense lawyers with materials gathered in an investigation that could help the defense.

Libby Defense Demands News Media Materials (AP)

By Pete Yost

AP, January 27, 2006

Lawyers for a former top White House aide charged in the CIA leak investigation said Thursday the prosecutor should surrender a wide range of information about news organizations and their reporters, including The Washington Post's Bob Woodward.

Special Counsel Patrick Fitzgerald has failed to disclose information that would enable the vice president's former chief of staff, I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, to properly defend himself, his attorneys argued in papers filed with U.S. District Judge Reggie Walton.

Libby is charged with five counts of obstruction, perjury and lying to the FBI about disclosing the identity of covert CIA officer Valerie Plame, who is married to former U.S. Ambassador Joseph Wilson, a Bush administration critic.

A federal grand jury accused Libby of lying when he said he learned about Ms. Wilson's identity from reporters. The indictment contends Libby found out about her identity from the CIA, the State Department and his boss, Vice President Dick Cheney.

"The government should not be allowed to charge Mr. Libby with lying about statements concerning what reporters knew about Ms. Wilson's identity, and at the same time deny him information that may establish one of these possible defenses," Libby's lawyers argued in a 23-page brief.

"The government has refused to produce information in its possession about what reporters learned from sources other than Mr. Libby about Ms. Wilson's employment status," Libby's legal team argued.

The prosecutor has asserted that "such documents are not relevant to a perjury and obstruction case."

After Libby's Oct. 28 indictment, Woodward disclosed that he had learned of Ms. Wilson's identity in mid-June 2003, some three weeks before her name was first published by conservative columnist Robert Novak.

The indictment says Libby lied when he told investigators he learned of Ms. Wilson's identity from NBC correspondent Tim Russert; when he told Time magazine reporter Matt Cooper that reporters were telling the Bush administration that Ms. Wilson worked for the CIA; and when Libby told investigators he did not discuss Wilson's wife with New York Times reporter Judith Miller.

Libby would have the right to produce testimony that tended to show many reporters knew about Ms. Wilson's CIA employment and that Russert did make the statement Libby allegedly attributed to him, but that Russert had forgotten about it, the court filing stated.

The defense says it also has a right to show whether other reporters knew about Ms. Wilson's CIA employment and were discussing that fact with government officials, "some of whom in turn may have shared such information with Mr. Libby," his lawyers said.

Libby Wants What Reporters Knew In CIA Leak Case (REU-Y2)

By James Vicini

Reuters, January 27, 2006

Attorneys for a former top aide to Vice President Dick Cheney sought on Thursday to force federal prosecutors to turn over information about what journalists knew before the leak of a CIA operative's name.

Lewis "Scooter" Libby's lawyers filed a motion asking the federal judge presiding over the case to require that they be given documents on what the reporters knew about CIA operative Valerie Plame before her name was disclosed.

Libby, Cheney's former chief of staff, has pleaded not guilty to five counts of obstructing justice, perjury and lying in the two-year investigation by prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald into the leak to the news media of Plame's identity.

DOJ_NMG_0012616

Her identity was disclosed by conservative columnist Robert Novak on July 14, 2003, after her diplomat husband, Joseph Wilson, accused the Bush administration of twisting intelligence on weapons of mass destruction to justify the war in Iraq.

The attorneys said the motion concerned their request for documents and information on three important issues: "What did the press know prior to July 14, 2003, about whether Valerie Plame Wilson worked at the CIA, from whom did they learn it and with whom did they discuss it."

They said turning over the information would enable them to decide the necessity and scope of pretrial subpoenas for journalists and news organizations.

The motion made clear that what the reporters knew will be an important part of the defense strategy.

"It is necessary for the defense to determine and investigate which individuals served as sources for journalists who learned about Ms. Wilson's employment status prior to July 14, 2003," they said.

"Once we learn the names of the reporters' sources, we will attempt to interview them, investigate whether they discussed information about Ms. Wilson with anyone else and evaluate whether to subpoena them for testimony at trial," they said.

Libby's lawyers also sought copies of subpoenas issued to reporters and news organizations during the prosecutor's grand jury investigation into the leak, and any agreements to limit the scope of information provided by the reporters.

The defense lawyers said prosecutors have refused to produce information about what reporters learned from sources other than Libby about Wilson's employment at the CIA because it was not relevant to the perjury and obstruction of justice charges.

Reporters' Information Sought (WP)

By Carol D. Leonnig

The Washington Post, January 27, 2006

Attorneys for Vice President Cheney's former top aide urged a court yesterday to force prosecutors to turn over all the information they obtained from reporters about their confidential conversations with Bush administration sources in the course of a two-year CIA leak investigation.

Attorneys for I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby said they must cast a wide net to learn about any conversations regarding CIA operative Valerie Plame, and that the information could be crucial to Libby's defense against perjury and obstruction charges. In court papers, the lawyers said they will probably subpoena reporters and officials later to thoroughly investigate how widely Plame's identity was known before her name appeared in the news media in July 2003.

Libby was indicted by Special Counsel Patrick J. Fitzgerald on five felony counts of lying to the FBI and a grand jury. The indictment asserted that Libby leaked information about Plame's CIA role to two reporters but pretended he had learned the information from Tim Russert, the Washington bureau chief of NBC News, and that he passed it along as unverified reporter chatter.

The defense's goal is to show that Libby was not intentionally lying when he testified that many journalists had known about Plame during the spring and summer of 2003, and that he believed he had learned about her from Russert. "There can be no information more material to the defense of a perjury case than information tending to show that the alleged false statements are, in fact, true or that they could be the result of mistake or confusion," the lawyers argued in their filing. "Libby is entitled to know what the government knows."

Fitzgerald began investigating in early 2004 whether administration officials broke the law and leaked information about Plame as retaliation. Her name and CIA role appeared in a July 2003 syndicated column by Robert D. Novak -- eight days after Plame's husband, former ambassador Joseph C. Wilson IV, publicly criticized the Bush administration's justification for waging war with Iraq.

The defense effort to delve deeper into Fitzgerald's investigation, if successful, could divulge the identities of some anonymous, high-level government sources whom reporters and news organizations have spent years and millions of dollars in legal fees protecting from public view. The defense strategy is expected to pull several high-profile Washington journalists into a legal battle over the First Amendment, many of them for a second time.

The court papers specifically asked U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton to have Fitzgerald turn over all documents showing knowledge by other reporters of Plame's CIA role or her husband's mission to investigate claims that Iraq was trying to obtain from Niger materials for a nuclear program, and any subpoenas or agreements with other reporters who provided information to the investigation. Fitzgerald has asserted that Libby is not entitled to information about all the reporters questioned in the investigation if the government does not expect to use their information or call them as witnesses in Libby's trial, the filings said.

But the court papers filed by Libby's team highlighted Bob Woodward, a Washington Post reporter and assistant managing editor, as a crucial witness who could provide exculpatory information that might help Libby avoid a conviction. Woodward revealed in November, a few weeks after Libby was indicted, that another administration source -- not Libby -- had told him in a "casual" and "offhand" way about Plame's CIA role. Woodward testified that this conversation took place before Libby is believed to have first provided information about Plame to Judith Miller, then a New York Times reporter.

Woodward, who has repeatedly said he has not been released to identify his source, declined to comment yesterday. Washington Post attorney Mary Ann Werner said the newspaper continues to consider its promises of anonymity to sources sacred -- and vital to some kinds of newsgathering.

"Protecting our confidential sources has been our highest priority throughout this investigation, and it remains our highest priority today," Werner said.

The court papers also mentioned an interest in questioning NBC News reporter Andrea Mitchell, who suggested in an October 2003 news program that it was "common knowledge" among some intelligence reporters that Plame worked at the CIA, and Washington Post reporter Walter Pincus, who allegedly learned about Plame from another unidentified source in 2003.

Charles Tobin, a media lawyer in Washington, said the move by Libby's defense was expected and is the result of Fitzgerald's aggressive insistence on deposing journalists and forcing them under threat of jail to reveal confidential sources.

"I think we could have expected that, when the prosecutor went on a fishing expedition, that the fish he caught would want to look back in the pail," Tobin said. "The more this case develops, the further we seem to be getting from the core issues of the indictment -- and more into the business of journalism and how news gets put out in this town."

Libby Defense Requests Media Data In Leak Case (WSJ)

By Anne Marie Squeo

The Wall Street Journal, January 27, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Attorneys for I. Lewis Libby, the vice president's former chief of staff, asked a federal judge to compel prosecutors to turn over all information obtained from journalists and news organizations about former Central Intelligence Agency operative Valerie Plame.

While the Justice Department has agreed to turn over information related to reporters' contacts with Mr. Libby, Special Counsel Patrick Fitzgerald has refused to provide material about what reporters might have learned from other sources about Ms. Plame's employment at the CIA, the court filing says. Included in the request is information that may have been shared among reporters or with government officials.

The fight is expected to be bruising for the news media. In their indictment, prosecutors cited the testimony of three reporters to discredit Mr. Libby's statements. Media advocates have feared the defense would seek to put the reporters on trial, and yesterday's filings underscored those concerns by suggesting statements made by Time magazine reporter Matthew Cooper, among those cited in the indictment, could indicate he is "biased against Mr. Libby." Mr. Cooper couldn't be reached. "The nightmare we predicted appears to be coming true," said Lucy Dalglish, executive director of the Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press.

In October, Mr. Libby was indicted for lying to federal investigators and a grand jury, as well as obstructing justice, in a federal investigation into whether a Bush administration official blew the cover of Ms. Plame in retaliation for her husband's public criticism of the war in Iraq. The investigation continues, though no one besides Mr. Libby has been indicted.

"There can be no information more material to the defense of a perjury case than information tending to show that the alleged false statements are, in fact, true or that they could be the result of mistake or confusion," the filing said. A spokesman for Mr. Fitzgerald declined to comment.

Attorneys for Mr. Libby signaled earlier this month that they would seek this information. As yesterday's filing notes, seeking additional information from news organizations may be "unavoidable" since the government may not have all of what the defense requests. A federal judge likely will take up the matter at a hearing scheduled for Feb. 3.

Mr. Libby's defense team is seeking documents and other information prior to July 14, 2003 -- the date Ms. Plame's CIA identity was revealed in a newspaper column -- reflecting knowledge of Ms. Plame's job by a reporter or an employee of a news organization, communications between reporters and government officials, colleagues or anyone else discussing Ms. Plame, and copies of the subpoenas issued to reporters and news organizations by the grand jury as well as agreements by Mr. Fitzgerald to limit the scope of questioning.

Agence France-Presse, January 27, 2006

WASHINGTON (AFP) - Pakistan's former Prime Minister Benazir Bhutto has shrugged off Interpol notices for her arrest and said she is prepared to return to her country to face any charges if compelled by a court.

DOJ_NMG_0012618

Interpol had issued the international notices following a request by the Pakistan government for the arrest of Bhutto and her husband on corruption charges, according to officials in Islamabad.

The police body said the so-called "red notices" were not arrest warrants and that member countries could decide whether to take any action.

"As far as the red notices are concerned, I learned it from the press, and my lawyers have written to the (Pakistan) Ministry of Interior as well as to Interpol, asking them to confirm whether the news is accurate and if so, on what grounds," Bhutto told a news conference in Washington.

"As far as I am concerned, if any court wants me in Pakistan, I am prepared to catch the next plane to Pakistan," said Bhutto, 53, who led the country twice in the 1980s and 1990s as its first female premier.

Bhutto, who has lived in self-imposed exile in Dubai and London for the past seven years, said the allegations were politically motivated and intended to divert the attention of the Pakistan media from current government problems.

The US Justice Department refused to comment specifically on Bhutto's case but said it generally considered Interpol requests on a case-by-case basis.

"I wouldn't comment on the specifics of Ms Bhutto's case but generally, the government handles requests from other governments on a case-by-case basis and we make our decisions based on the unique circumstance on any case," department spokesman Bryan Sierra told AFP.

"We don't necessarily automatically have to act on them," he said.

Pakistani Interior Minister Aftab Sherpao said the country's corruption watchdog had asked his ministry to send the request to Interpol.

"It is not an issue of my evading presence in a court but no court in Pakistan to my knowledge has asked for me to be present and I believe that the Interpol has not been given the correct facts by the military regime in Pakistan," Bhutto said.

Her second term in office ended in 1996 amid a string of corruption claims and six court cases are still pending against her. Last year she pledged to return to Pakistan to face the charges.

In 2004 Swiss authorities also charged Bhutto with alleged money-laundering of 11.7 million dollars in purported bribes paid by companies seeking customs inspection contracts.

"Yes, my husband and I have faced these scurrilous, baseless and malicious and politically motivated charges for the last nine years and by the grace of God, there is not a single conviction against either my husband or myself for fraud or for corruption," she said.

Bhutto said the charges levelled against her were part of Musharraf's campaign to divert the attention of the Pakistani media from local problems, especially recent US missile strikes targeted at terrorists in a remote tribal area bordering Afghanistan but which left civilians dead.

"Lot of questions are being asked (by the public)," she said. "To divert the attention of domestic press over the strikes, they (called for) the red notices."

"(Musharraf's) regime does not like me to speak about democracy and it does not like me to expose their policies about ambiguity," she said.

9th Circuit Panel: Overseas Sex With Minor Subject To Regulation (LAW)

By Justin Scheck, The Recorder

California Recorder, January 27, 2006

Applying the Constitution's commerce clause to international trade can be a difficult task, 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals Judge Margaret McKeown wrote in an opinion Wednesday.

So in deciding that a 2003 law prohibiting U.S. citizens from paying minors for sex while overseas is constitutional, McKeown wrote that the court was taking a big-picture look.

"Instead of slavishly marching down the path of grafting the interstate commerce framework onto foreign commerce, we step back and take a global, commonsense approach," she wrote.

The conclusion? Sex with a minor "might be immoral and criminal, but it is also commercial" -- and therefore subject to regulation.

McKeown's opinion -- which was joined by 9th Circuit Senior Judge Procter Hug -- didn't sit well with Senior Judge Warren Ferguson.

He said the majority upheld the 2003 law known by the convenient acronym PROTECT (Prosecutorial Remedies and Other Tools to End the Exploitation of Children Today) with logic that could give the U.S. government jurisdiction over your croque monsieur.

"Under the interpretation of the majority," he wrote, "the purchase of a lunch in France by an American citizen who traveled there by airplane would constitute a constitutional act of engaging in foreign commerce."

Under that scenario, nearly anything a U.S. citizen did in a foreign country could be subject to U.S. regulation, Ferguson continued. "This observation may seem slightly absurd, but so is the task of trying to show how sexual abuse of a minor overseas by a U.S. citizen constitutes an act of 'commerce with foreign nations,'" he said.

Rory Little, a professor at Hastings College of the Law, said the question isn't quite so simple.

"It's a very substantial opinion on both sides," he said, referring to the majority decision and the dissent. "It's hard to say that one side is right."

That's because the commerce clause is a notoriously difficult piece of the Constitution, with controls over interstate and foreign commerce that are constantly being reinterpreted by the courts.

The majority opinion is based on last year's Supreme Court opinion Gonzales v. Raich, 125 S.Ct. 2195, which said the commerce clause allows the federal government to prohibit marijuana use in states that have legalized it for medical use.

With that opinion, McKeown wrote, "the court took a more generous view of Congress's power over interstate commerce."

That seems like a solid foundation for a more generous view of foreign commerce, Little said. Yet, he added, Ferguson has a good point in arguing that paying a minor for sex doesn't clearly constitute foreign trade.

The case originated when Michael Clark, an elderly U.S. citizen who lived in Cambodia from 1998 to 2003, was arrested by Cambodian police for having sex with young boys.

The Cambodian authorities turned Clark over to U.S. agents, and he eventually admitted to paying minors for sex, pleading guilty after returning to the United States. His case was the first successful prosecution under the PROTECT law, and is the first to make it to the appeals courts.

Clark's lawyer, Seattle Assistant Federal Public Defender Michael Filipovic, was predictably unhappy with the 9th Circuit's opinion. "We're disappointed in the result, and we will be seeking rehearing en banc," he said.

U.S. jurisdiction over its citizens who are abroad "is an issue upon which there's very little law that's right on point," Filipovic said.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Helen Brunner, a Seattle-based appeals specialist who argued the case for the government, agreed, though she felt better about the result.

"It's a complex issue," she said. "It certainly was an interesting issue, and I think the majority's opinion certainly is a significant victory, and we can rely on it for the pending cases." Those include another case handled by Filipovic in which the 9th Circuit has already heard arguments.

Whether the 9th Circuit takes up the case en banc -- or whether it ends up before the Supreme Court -- is probably a decision that will cross ideological lines, Little said, since liberal and conservative judges often rule unpredictably on issues of personal freedom and increased prosecutorial powers.

"This doesn't have a political tilt," Little said. "Nobody's in favor of sex with minors."

AP, January 27, 2006

(AP) - CONROE, Texas-A man who spent 18 years in prison for sexual assault was freed Thursday after DNA evidence exonerated him, and his brother admitted responsibility for the attack.

DNA testing was not available at Arthur Mumphrey's 1986 trial for the rape of a 13-year-old girl, but recent tests requested by his attorney showed Mumphrey's blood and saliva samples did not match stains on the victim and her clothes.

"Because of technology we have now, justice was not done 20 years ago," State District Judge Kathleen Hamilton said.

Mumphrey, 42, had been sentenced to 35 years in prison.

Prosecutor Marc Brumberger apologized to Mumphrey. "We feel terrible about what happened to you," he said.

Mumphrey's brother, Charles, confessed to the rape this week while serving time in jail for unauthorized use of a motor vehicle.

He is unlikely to face charges in the sexual assault because the statute of limitations has expired, but the information could be used against him in sentencing if he is convicted of another crime and if DNA results support the confession.

Ex-Prosecutors In Trenton Respond To U.S. Scolding (NYT)

By David Kocieniewski

The New York Times, January 27, 2006

TRENTON, Jan. 26 — Two former New Jersey attorneys general on Thursday defended their office's investigation into the political dealings of George E. Norcross III, the Democratic power broker, and said they were bewildered that federal prosecutors had accused them of botching the case.

In a scathing letter dated Tuesday, Christopher J. Christie, the United States attorney for New Jersey, wrote that his office would be unable to bring charges against Mr. Norcross because lawyers for the state attorney general had mishandled their investigation under two administrations before turning it over to his office in 2004.

Mr. Christie's pointed critique startled many in the legal community because prosecutors rarely publicly criticize other law enforcement officials or explain their decisions not to prosecute.

While Mr. Christie did not release the letter to the press, his office did give it to two witnesses whose complaints against Mr. Norcross led to the investigation, and who have been aggressive in seeking news coverage about the case.

In his six-page letter, Mr. Christie chastised state officials for failing to use rudimentary investigative techniques like wiretaps and telephone records to corroborate their suspicions that Mr. Norcross and his political allies were engaged in a plot to deprive two political rivals of jobs and government contracts.

His letter also harshly criticized state prosecutors for deciding not to secretly tape conversations at a Camden County Democratic fund-raiser in 2001, where Mr. Norcross and his associates were expected to discuss a wide variety of political deals. Mr. Christie said that that decision was so inexplicable that it raised the possibility that state investigators were trying to shield political figures.

But John J. Farmer Jr., who was attorney general in 2001, called that suggestion "utter nonsense." Mr. Farmer said he was not personally involved in the tactical decisions, but asserted that the two assistant attorneys general who led the case were "professional and 100 percent nonpolitical."

"I totally reject any suggestion that any political figure was being protected by anyone in my office," said Mr. Farmer, a political independent who worked for Govs. Christine Todd Whitman and Donald T. DiFrancesco, both Republicans.

Mr. Christie also said that former Attorney General Peter C. Harvey erred in 2003 when he agreed to allow two figures in the investigation to plead guilty to tax evasion charges, a deal Mr. Christie said was too lenient to yield meaningful cooperation.

But Mr. Harvey said the agreements were fair and helpful. "These plea agreements were negotiated by experienced former federal prosecutors and helped lead to other convictions in this case," he said.

The investigation and secret recordings of Mr. Norcross, a bank executive whose prowess as a fund-raiser has given him vast statewide influence, has offered a rare view of the inner workings of New Jersey's tough, money-driven politics.

The case began in 2000, when John Gural, now the mayor of Palmyra but then a councilman, told the authorities that he had been pressured to fire the town solicitor, Ted Rosenberg, who had opposed one of Mr. Norcross's allies in a local political race.

Investigators from the state attorney general's office asked Mr. Gural to wear a concealed recording device. He ended up taping more than 330 hours of conversations, many of them with local officials allied with Mr. Norcross. In some of those conversations, they threatened to withhold government contracts from Mr. Gural's employer, a local engineering firm, unless he acquiesced.

Mr. Norcross was also caught on tape boasting about his influence with then-Gov. James E. McGreevey and then United States Senator Jon S. Corzine.

Mr. Norcross's lawyer dismissed his client's taped comments as idle boasts, and said that Mr. Christie's letter was proof that no crime had been committed.

Mr. Rosenberg said on Thursday that Mr. Christie, who has been mentioned as a candidate for governor himself, might have released the letter to protect his image as an ardent corruption buster.

"Chris Christie is first and foremost a political animal," Mr. Rosenberg said. "He gave us the letter and didn't say anything about keeping it private, so of course we gave it to the media. The way he handled this he was freed of any responsibility for letting George Norcross get off of the hook."

But in an interview on Thursday, Mr. Christie said he was proud of his record. Since being appointed United States attorney in 2002, he said he had brought public corruption charges against nearly 100 people. He said he felt that the attorney general's office deserved a detailed explanation of why he was not pursing charges, since Mr. Harvey publicly referred the case to him in 2003.

Barry Unable To Identify 2 As Robbers (WP)

By Del Quentin Wilber

The Washington Post, January 27, 2006

Police investigating the armed robbery of D.C. Council member Marion Barry recently showed him photographs of two potential suspects, but he was unable to identify the men as his assailants, law enforcement officials said.

Last week, detectives showed Barry (D-Ward 8) collections that included photographs of two people they viewed as suspects in the Jan. 2 robbery, officials said. The arrays also included pictures of other people who are similar in appearance but not connected to the crime, the officials said.

Barry did not select anyone in the pictures. The two potential suspects were believed to have committed other robberies in the area and resembled the description that Barry provided of his attackers, the officials said.

Investigators are looking for others who might be responsible for the holdup, police officials said. The officials, who spoke on condition of anonymity because they are not permitted to discuss active investigations, said Barry has been cooperating.

Barry, 69, has told police that he was held up in his kitchen about 9:30 p.m. Jan. 2. He has said that two young men -- one whose name he believed was Marcus -- helped him carry groceries into his apartment in Southeast Washington and that he paid them several dollars. Several minutes later, they returned with a gun and stole his wallet and $600, Barry said. The billfold was found the next day on the street, police said.

Barry had said he believed that Marcus lived across the street. Police declined to say whether any of their suspects are named Marcus.

The former mayor, who became a council member last year, declined this week to discuss specifics of the investigation, based on the advice of his attorney and requests by police. But he addressed speculation that there could be more to the story than he is letting on.

"The thing that [makes me angry] is that some people say that this was a drug deal gone bad," Barry said in an interview at his council office Wednesday. "Why would I report that? That is just crazy. If it is a drug deal gone bad, you don't call the cops."

Barry is awaiting sentencing Feb. 8 after pleading guilty in the fall to misdemeanor tax charges in U.S. District Court. Soon after the guilty plea, he tested positive for cocaine use in a court-ordered drug test. Barry has battled drug addiction for years and spent six months in federal prison after he was convicted of a misdemeanor drug charge in 1990.

Echoing comments he made during a news conference a day after the robbery, Barry said he hoped his attackers turn themselves in. But, he said, he still does not want to see them prosecuted.

"Robbers and drug dealers are in trouble," Barry said. "Families and the institutions failed them. They need help. I want them helped."

Prosecutors and police -- not Barry -- will decide whether to bring charges. D.C. Police Chief Charles H. Ramsey said that he could not address Barry's case but that getting the cooperation of victims is critical to law enforcement.

"People who commit crimes should be prosecuted," Ramsey said. "If victims don't cooperate, there won't be trials. . . . If that is the case, these guys will do harm to other people."

Last year, police were unable to solve another crime reported by Barry. He told authorities that a woman had taken his wallet off his dresser early Jan. 2, 2005, police reports show. His automated teller machine card was used to withdraw $300 from an ATM, police said.

It was the third time that the ATM card was used without Barry's permission the previous year, bank officials told investigators, police said.

Police said detectives obtained a photograph from an ATM surveillance camera that showed a woman using the card. But they were unable to identify her and suspended the investigation.

Five Indicted In Investigation Of Scandal Over City Trucking Program (AP)

By Mike Robinson

AP, January 27, 2006

CHICAGO - Chicago's city clerk and four other men were charged Thursday in an eight-count corruption indictment as federal prosecutors pushed ahead with their investigation of payoffs and patronage hiring fraud in the city's government.

Those indicted included city Clerk James J. Laski, his political aide, Sam Gammicchia, and John Briatta, a former water department employee who is a brother-in-law of Cook County Commissioner John Daley. John Daley is Mayor Richard M. Daley's brother.

The inclusion of a Daley relative in the indictment brought the scandal deeper into the heart of the political organization that has dominated city government in Chicago for years - the inheritors of the once mighty Chicago Democratic Machine.

Laski and Gammicchia were charged last week in a complaint filed by federal prosecutors in U.S. District Court. Such a complaint is the usual forerunner of an indictment.

DOJ_NMG_0012622

The indictment added the names of Briatta, 46, Randy Aderman, 50, another former water department employee, and Michael Jones, 48, an employee of the city clerk's office who helped in running Get Plowed Inc., a company that got six years of payments from the Hired Truck Program.

The program has been described as designed to save taxpayer dollars by outsourcing city hauling work to private truckers. At its peak, it cost $38 million a year.

The program has been awash in corruption. Truckers have admitted paying city officials and contributing to the campaigns of their favored candidates to get work through the program.

Some of the firms that participated in the program have ties to organized crime.

In recent months, the investigation has expanded to include allegations that city officials defied a court order and fraudulently hired employees based on clout instead of merit.

The mayor's former patronage chief is among those under indictment. He is a member of a Democratic organization based on the 11th Ward southwest of downtown, the historic base of the Daley family, where John Daley remains the committeeman.

Neither John Daley nor the mayor has been accused of wrongdoing in the investigation.

Gammicchia attorney Alexander Salerno did not immediately return messages seeking comment.

Through his office, Aderman attorney Ronald Belmonte declined to comment. Briatta attorney Theodore Poulos said he would have no comment. Jones attorney Michael Ettinger sent word through law partner Mark Besbekos that he would have no immediate comment.

Laski attorney Anthony Pinelli said when the complaint was filed last week that Laski denies asking for or taking payoffs.

According to the indictment, Jones paid bribes to Laski and Jones and Aderman paid bribes to Briatta. It said Laski and Briatta accepted bribes to influence the awarding of Hired Truck Program business to Get Plowed Inc. It also said Laski and Gammicchia obstructed justice by seeking to influence a witness to testify falsely and mislead a federal grand jury.

The indictment said Laski solicited and accepted bribes from Jones in 2001, 2002 and 2003 and that in each of those years Get Plowed Inc. received more than $100,000 in city business.

The mayor fired the city's water commissioner and nine water department employees including Briatta last June when it was discovered that they had been recorded as being on duty at the city's Jardine Water Filitration Plant when they were not there.

The new indictment brings to 42 the number of those charged in the investigation thus far.

City Clerk, 4 Others Indicted For Corruption (CHIT)

By Todd Lighty And Matt O'connor, Tribune Staff Reporters

Chicago Tribune, January 27, 2006

City Clerk James Laski was formally charged Thursday along with a brother-in-law of Cook County Commissioner John Daley and two other city employees in the latest corruption indictment involving the city's Hired Truck Program.

Laski, who was first charged in a criminal complaint unsealed two weeks ago, solicited $50,000 in bribes for steering city trucking business to a lifelong friend who was charged Thursday for the first time, the indictment alleged.

The friend, Michael "Mick" Jones, and his wife, Traci, who wasn't charged, secretly recorded Laski while cooperating in the federal probe, according to court records. The Joneses both work for Laski in the clerk's office.

John Briatta, Daley's brother-in-law, who held a key dispatching post at the city's Jardine water filtration plant, pocketed $8,000 in bribes in 2003 for obtaining additional city business for Get Plowed Inc., which was once operated by Jones, the charges alleged.

Another former city employee, Randy Aderman, introduced Laski to Donald Tomczak, then the No. 2 official in the city's Water Management Department, who awarded Hired Truck work to Get Plowed at Laski's request, authorities charged.

Tomczak has been convicted in the probe and is cooperating with authorities.

Also named in Thursday's indictment was Salvatore "Sam" Gammicchia, a coordinator of Laski's campaign workers and a foreman of Cook County ironworkers. He had been charged with Laski two weeks ago.

Truck scandal keeps growing

The indictment brings to 42 the number of defendants charged in the probe of the scandal-scarred Hired Truck Program. More than half of them worked for the city.

Laski, 52, who has also been charged with obstruction of justice for influencing Jones' wife to mislead a grand jury, has publicly vowed to remain in office as he fights the charges.

Laski's lawyer, Anthony Pinelli, said Thursday that he planned to meet with Laski to decide what legal avenue to pursue. Laski was considering the indictment's impact on his family and his office, Pinelli said, but he hadn't made a decision about resigning his post, which he has held since 1995.

"He has to decide whether he can deal with this indictment and continue to effectively do his job," Pinelli said.

The indictment seeks the forfeiture of $50,000, the alleged bribery proceeds, from Laski, or his Chicago house if he can't come up with the money.

About three weeks ago, Laski and his wife borrowed $97,035 using their residence as collateral, according to records filed with the Cook County recorder of deeds.

"It was not done for purposes of dealing with these criminal charges but for his own personal finances," Pinelli said.

Attorney Theodore Poulos, who represents Briatta, and Ronald Belmonte, Aderman's lawyer, declined to comment on the indictment. Jones' lawyer, Michael Ettinger, was ill and unavailable for comment.

Gammicchia's lawyer, Alex Salerno, said his client, accused of warning Jones not to cooperate with federal agents, would fight the charges.

"He's a perfectly wonderful guy, and I can't imagine him threatening anyone," Salerno said.

John Daley was unavailable for comment, an aide said.

11th Ward is shaken

The federal investigation has shaken the 11th Ward political operation—home base for Mayor Richard Daley—that John Daley has run since he was appointed Democratic committeeman in 1980.

Bribe money from the Hired Truck scandal was directed to John Daley's ward organization, and the owner of a trucking outfit who bought his insurance from him has pleaded guilty in the bribes-for-work scheme.

Mayor Daley was out of town, but Jacquelyn Heard, his press secretary, called the indictment "regrettable at the very least."

"Unfortunately, no one can vouch for someone else's integrity, whether it is a trusted employee or your brother's brother-in-law," she said in a reference to Briatta, an acquaintance of the mayor.

Briatta, a former chief equipment dispatcher at the Department of Water Management's Jardine plant, was fired following an internal city investigation last year that uncovered a payroll scheme in the department. He and eight other workers falsified their pay records by having other people punch in for duty for them when they weren't present, officials alleged.

Secret recordings

Jones sought Laski's help in about 1997 to get trucks into the Hired Truck Program, the charges alleged, and Laski in turn sought assistance for Get Plowed from an undisclosed "influential alderman."

A source close to the investigation said the alderman was Patrick Huels, Mayor Daley's City Council floor leader until he resigned in 1997 after admitting he borrowed $1.25 million from another Daley friend and contractor, Michael Tadin. Huels could not be reached for comment.

Jones allegedly paid Laski $500 in cash a month, later boosted to $1,000. The bribes took place for six years until the federal probe became public, authorities alleged.

In the criminal complaint filed two weeks ago, prosecutors spelled out in greater detail the alleged involvement of Jones, Aderman and Briatta, though none was identified by name at the time.

According to the complaint and sources, Aderman told Jones that he could get even more business for Get Plowed if he would pay $750 a month to Briatta.

Aderman told authorities that he believed Briatta met with Tomczak to get additional trucking business for Jones' company. Jones made inconsistent payments to Aderman, but Aderman told authorities that he regularly paid Briatta, according to the sources and court records.

Aderman also has cooperated in the government's investigation, court records show.

Laski, believing that Traci Jones was going to testify before a federal jury about the bribes, allegedly suggested Oct. 12 that she "might be too ill" to appear before the grand jury, the charges alleged.

John Daley In-law Indicted (CHIST)

By STEVE WARMBIR, TIM NOVAK AND FRAN SPIELMAN, Staff Reporters

Chicago Sun-Times, January 26, 2006

Briatta — a brother-in-law to Cook County Commissioner John Daley — was charged Thursday with taking $8,000 in bribes from a trucking company that got Hired Truck work at the Water Department where Briatta was a top official.

The charge comes eight months after Briatta was fired from his job as chief equipment dispatcher for his alleged involvement in another scam. Briatta, who was paid nearly $100,000 a year, was accused with eight others of falsifying payroll records by swiping each other in and out.

Laski and his political aide Sam Gammicchia were formally indicted Thursday, along with Briatta and two close friends of Laski, Michael Jones and Randy Aderman.

Aderman and Jones have been cooperating for months with investigators. Briatta is not.

Jones and Jones' wife work for Laski in the clerk's office and both secretly wore recording devices that captured Laski allegedly trying to cover up bribes he took to help Jones' trucking company between 1998 and 2003.

Laski and Gammicchia were charged in a criminal complaint, prosecutors announced earlier this month. The indictment released Thursday provided few new details of their alleged scheme. For the first time, though, prosecutors put a dollar figure on the amount of bribes Laski allegedly pocketed — $50,000 from Jones' company, Get Plowed Inc.

Laski is accused of taking $500 a month for each one of Jones' trucks he got into the Hired Truck Program. At some point, Laski allegedly got $1,000 a month in total.

Laski had no comment Thursday but has said he's innocent.

Jones also allegedly paid Aderman money to get Hired Truck business. Aderman worked in the water department and passed along money to John Briatta.

On Thursday, the mayor was out of town, but his press secretary Jacquelyn Heard said: "Unfortunately, you can't vouch for someone else's integrity. Whether it's a trusted employee or your brother's brother-in-law.

"It's certainly regrettable and hurtful at the very least, as it would be for anyone," Heard said.

John Briatta's attorney, Ted Poulos, had no comment on the case. Neither did Michael Ettinger, the attorney for Jones, or Ronald Belmonte, the lawyer for Aderman, who was first to cooperate in the Laski investigation.

Briatta, 46, lives a few blocks away from his brother-in-law, John Daley, in the Bridgeport neighborhood. Briatta, a resident of the 11th Ward, is politically active and a member of the mayor's controversial Hispanic Democratic Organization.

Briatta has been a city employee for decades, landing the job soon after his sister, Mary Lou, married John Daley in 1975. The wedding sparked controversy because Mayor Richard J. Daley's son was marrying the daughter of Louis Briatta, described in press accounts at the time as a Loop gambling boss for the mob.

Dentist In Court To Face Prostitution Charges (CBS2CHI)

CBS 2 Chicago, January 27, 2006

(CBS) CHICAGO A Chicago dentist was in court Thursday fighting accusations that are spicy enough to make your teeth rattle.

Apparently, Dr. Gary Kimmel is not rattled by federal prosecutors, who charge that he was padding his pockets in a prostitution scheme.

There was a minor mob scene at the federal courthouse as Chicago dentist Gary Kimmel and his wife were surrounded by reporters and photographers.

"Why this case has garnered so much publicity is beyond me, but I guess it's an interesting and salacious story and its a juicy allegation," said defense attorney Joe Lopez.

The FBI is accusing Kimmel of providing Marina City condos and a fleet of expensive cars for an interstate prostitution ring.

Prosecutors also say Kimmel used his Streeterville office to provide dental care for prostitutes working for the operation.

In court Thursday, the judge released the dentist on an unsecured $100,000 bond after the dentist pled not guilty to all the charges.

"If it was going on, it was without his knowledge, without his consent and it was behind his back," Lopez said.

Kimmel has not been working at his office since he was charged. A receptionist said was taking time off for conferences and meetings he's attending.

The defense lawyer concedes that secretly recorded FBI audio tapes may be a problem for Kimmel. In one of them, the dentist seems to endorse an alleged pimp's plan to injure one of his hookers.

AP, January 27, 2006

CHICAGO A Chicago dentist accused of supplying luxury cars to an interstate prostitution ring has been allowed to remain free on a 100-thousand dollar unsecured bond.Gary Kimmel appeared briefly today before a U-S magistrate judge, who set the bond.Defense attorney Joseph Lopez told the court that Kimmel was an "outstanding person" who hadn't realized at first he was involved in an interstate prostitution ring.A January 18th indictment charged that Kimmel accepted more than 400-thousand dollars from two pimps to buy, finance, insure and maintain eleven cars.The case was part of a national investigation dubbed "Innocence Lost" by prosecutors that resulted in charges in December against alleged ring members in Michigan and Hawaii.

Ryan Trial On Hold As Witness Takes Personal Leave (CHIT/AP)

By Mike Robinson, The Associated Press

Chicago Tribune, January 27, 2006

George Ryan's racketeering and fraud trial was put on hold Thursday as the prosecution's last major witness took an emergency personal leave.

Jurors were told to take a four-day weekend and be ready for the former governor's trial to resume Monday, but prosecutors said it was unclear whether that could happen.

One major government witness remains to go on the stand -- FBI agent Raymond Ruebenson, the case agent who has long been at the heart of the government's seven-year Operation Safe Road.

Operation Safe Road began as an inquiry into bribes paid for drivers licenses and expanded into a full-scale investigation of political corruption in state government under Ryan.

Prosecutors say Ryan steered big-money state leases and contracts to Warner and other friends and got free vacations and gifts in return. Ryan and Warner deny any wrongdoing.

Ruebenson, who has been at the marathon trail almost every day for the last 17 weeks, took personal leave Thursday over a family matter.

Federal prosecutors had hoped to rest their case last Thursday. But that objective has been pushed back daily and now the government is hoping to rest next week if there are no more snags.

One or two more prosecution witnesses besides Ruebenson might have to be called for such technical purposes as identifying canceled checks being placed in evidence, prosecutors said.

With the jurors away, both sides bickered good naturedly Thursday over whether to admit into evidence a batch of canceled checks from Warner-owned companies and whether to show jurors a chart pinpointing times when Warner withdrew money from his accounts.

Ryan and Warner didn't attend, not much was decided and the hearing recessed for the weekend well before the noon hour.

Defense Assails U.S. Witness Who Forgets Key Dates (AJC)

By Ernie Suggs , Bill Torpy, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, January 27, 2006

Former Atlanta Mayor Bill Campbell's defense team warned it would be "loaded for bear" in cross-examining key prosecution witnesses, and the assault began Thursday.

Michael Sullivan, called by prosecutors as a member of Campbell's "inner circle," was the first target.

Sullivan, a former contract compliance director, testified that a contractor friend of Campbell's indicated to him that he had "bought" the former mayor.

Sullivan was later pounded relentlessly by defense attorney Jerry Froelich, who suggested federal authorities had "bought" Sullivan's testimony in exchange for not prosecuting him.

Unlike when he was questioned by the prosecution, Sullivan at time seemed stricken by amnesia. He did not remember when he got married, divorced or how much he made when employed by the city.

Such memory lapses drew snickers from the packed courtroom.

Campbell, 52, is charged with seven criminal counts, including racketeering, bribery and income tax evasion. He has pleaded not guilty.

The prosecution is trying to use Sullivan's testimony to show Campbell frequently was involved in awarding of contracts in exchange for favors.

Sullivan earlier testified how contractor Ricky Rowe, a close friend of the mayor, once described his relationship with Campbell.

"[Rowe] used the term when he referred to the mayor as 'That's my ho,' Sullivan said. When prosecutor Russell Vineyard asked what Rowe meant, Sullivan responded, "I took it that he meant he had bought the mayor — he owned the mayor."

DOJ_NMG_0012626

Sullivan, fired by Campbell in 1996 because of sexual harassment accusations, said Rowe, who died in 2004, told him he often gave the mayor cash while on gambling trips.

Under cross-examination, Froelich reminded Sullivan that during a 1998 interview with the FBI, Sullivan said the "ho" reference meant Rowe had access to Campbell — not to having bought him off.

Froelich used much of the afternoon to assail Sullivan's character, indicating that after he left the city he was on "the fix" in procuring certain contracts. He earned $7,500 as a "consultant" in helping a third party earn a $20,000 city contract.

Sullivan also became a consultant to United Water, a firm that in 1998 garnered a $21 million annual contract to run the city's water system.

He earned about $75,000 for a yearlong contract but said he had to give 35 percent to a female friend of Kevin Ross, who ran Campbell's mayoral campaigns. He said Ross, who testified earlier in the week, referred the company to him.

Sometimes, Sullivan testified, he funneled some of his cash payments to Herbert McCall, Campbell's former commissioner of the administrative services. "It wasn't the best judgment," Sullivan said. "In hindsight, I realized that." McCall was found guilty in 2003 of perjury and obstruction of justice.

Campbell Lawyers Fight Witness (WXIA-TV)

By Jerry Carnes

WXIA-TV, January 27, 2006

Government prosecutors in the corruption trial of former Atlanta Mayor Bill Campbell continued their work on Thursday to prove an illegal relationship existed between Campbell and a city contractor.

During a combative morning at the federal courthouse in Downtown Atlanta, Campbell's defense team contended the evidence being used by the prosecution is flawed and fought to keep it from the jury. At issue was the testimony of former city employee Michael Sullivan, who worked as the city's contract compliance director.

Lawyers on each side argued over the validity of Sullivan's testimony that questioned the legality of Campbell's relationship with former city contractor Rickey Rowe. Rowe died during the federal investigation. Campbell's lawyers said that all testimony about Rowe should be kept out of court because Rowe isn't here to verify conversations that he may or may not have had.

On the witness stand, Sullivan testified that Rowe once bragged that he had financed gambling trips for Campbell, Atlanta's mayor from 1994 to 2002.

"He told me that he'd give the mayor cash on those gambling trips," Sullivan testified. Sullivan claimed Rowe even referred to the mayor as "my whore." Sullivan said, "I took it to mean that he owns the mayor." Other city employees said they felt pressured by Campbell to give city contracts to Rowe.

Campbell's defense attorneys hammered away at Sullivan's credibility, saying that he changed his story many times. They also pointed to Sullivan's own admission that he accepted money from a city contractor for himself.

Louisiana Tires Of Its Rogues (LAT)

By Miguel Bustillo, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 27, 2006

NEW ORLEANS — Joseph Impastato conceded he took the two cashier's checks worth $85,000. The whole thing was captured on tape by the FBI, so it would have been difficult to deny.

But it was no kickback, the councilman from St. Tammany Parish said. It was business.

When he cut a deal to receive half the money from a government contract to haul away hurricane debris, Impastato said, he was acting as a private businessman, not a public official.

Federal prosecutors are not buying it — and neither apparently is the Louisiana public. After a federal grand jury indicted Impastato on felony extortion charges last month, making him the first Louisiana politician accused of Hurricane Katrina corruption, citizens condemned him in newspapers and on talk radio and the Internet as an embarrassment to his home state.

"He's got to be a real lowlife to do something like that at a time like this," Frank White, a 62-year-old retired fire captain from the suburb of Chalmette, said in an interview. "It's the Louisiana way of doing business, I guess. But there is a quiet majority now that's sick and tired of this. People are fed up with these crooks."

In Louisiana, which has a history of political shenanigans so rich and colorful that it has become a part of American folklore, people long have laughed off misbehaving politicians as a fact of life, every bit as inevitable as death and taxes.

But as the state lobbies Washington for more money to rebuild ravaged towns and cities, citizens are realizing that Louisiana's well-earned penchant for dirty politics has exacted a steep price: It has badly damaged the credibility of the recovery effort.

"Frankly, the reputation in Washington is, if we send money down there, it will just get stolen," said political handicapper Charles E. Cook, a Louisiana native who has worked in the nation's capital for more than three decades. "It is a caricature of Louisiana politics that is not entirely undeserved but is grossly exaggerated. No one cared about it much before Katrina. But right now, it's hurting the state enormously."

A major turning point in public attitude came in 2001 when Edwin Edwards, the former four-term Democratic governor, received a 10-year sentence for taking bribes for riverboat gambling licenses. In the last governor's race, both candidates — Democrat Kathleen Babineaux Blanco beat Republican Bobby Jindal — were considered squeaky clean, and promised government reforms. The distaste for dirty government has really picked up momentum since last summer.

"What was tolerated before Katrina is not necessarily tolerated now," said pollster Silas Lee III, a professor at Xavier University here. "Nerves are raw. People have lost their sense of security and direction. They are living a day-to-day existence, and they have little patience for any politician who is perceived as being corrupt."

In addition to Edwards, in the last decade Louisiana has seen an attorney general, a congressman, a state Senate president, a federal judge and countless local officials convicted of corruption. Louisiana's last three state insurance commissioners wound up in prison for offenses that include lying to the FBI, accepting $2 million in illegal campaign contributions and taking bribes — prompting jokes that future candidates should make sure they look good in stripes.

Jim Letten, the U.S. attorney for eastern Louisiana and the lead prosecutor in the Edwards case, sees the convictions as a sign of progress. Wherever he goes, he said, he is greeted by people — black, white, Latino, Asian — who tell him Louisiana needs to clean up its act.

"I am not sure that Louisiana has measurably more corruption than other [regions], but surely we have a reputation for being tolerant of it," said Letten, a member of the Hurricane Katrina Fraud Task Force, a team of federal, state and local law enforcement officials investigating scams and corruption.

Until recently, Louisiana politicians proved that charisma trumped scruples. Their repeated election victories, despite corruption allegations in many instances, showed that Louisiana voters viewed the ethical transgressions of their elected officials as an amusing spectacle.

T. Wayne Parent, a political science professor at Louisiana State University and author of "Inside the Carnival: Unmasking Louisiana Politics," said citizens accepted corrupt politicians because they were effective in providing government services, and the cash they were pocketing was not believed to be taxpayer money.

"Maybe some politician was making a deal with the devil, but that was money from some oil and gas company, or so people thought. By the late 1980s, people realized, maybe it was our money," said Parent, who believes the change in attitude has been slowly building over the last quarter-century.

Huey Long, the Depression-era demagogue who dominated every level of Louisiana government by bullying or buying off anyone who got in his way, joked that "one of these days the people of Louisiana are going to get good government — and they aren't going to like it."

Known as the Kingfish, Long was impeached as governor in 1929 on charges of bribery and gross misconduct but narrowly avoided punishment — reportedly by bribing several state senators. Elected a U.S. senator in 1930, he was assassinated in 1935 in Baton Rouge by the son of a judge who was about to be gerrymandered out of a job.

Earl Long, his eccentric brother, kept the family's Democratic political machine running into the 1960s. He once remarked that Louisiana voters "don't want good government; they want good entertainment."

He served three terms as governor, spending some of the last term in a mental hospital, where his wife had him committed after he took up with Blaze Starr, a stripper.

Edwards, who survived two trials and 22 grand jury investigations in his four terms as governor, boasted that the only way he could lose was if he were "caught in bed with a dead girl or a live boy."

When he ran against former Ku Klux Klan leader David Duke, the Republican candidate, in 1991, Edwards supporters printed bumper stickers saying: "Vote for the crook. It's important."

The "crook" handily won. But he was eventually sent to prison for taking bribes after Eddie DeBartolo Jr., former owner of the San Francisco 49ers, testified that he had paid Edwards $400,000 to land a casino license.

Even now, during the state's ultimate hour of need, some Louisiana citizens say they could stomach a crooked politician — as long as he was competent.

"I'll tell you what, I'd take Edwin Edwards in a minute to get us out of this mess," said Gid Brill, 65, a tool salesman from Belle Chasse. "He might skim off $10 million for himself, but he'd know what to do with the rest of the money."

DOJ_NMG_0012628

Such attitudes do not go over well in Washington, where some Republican lawmakers speak of Louisiana as if it were a banana republic.

Sen. Larry E. Craig (R-Idaho), who sits on the pivotal appropriations committee which oversees all major spending bills, compared fraud in Louisiana to fraud in Iraq. During town hall meetings in his home state last year, he repeatedly said that Louisiana and New Orleans had "the most corrupt governments in our country."

State lawmakers last year sought $250 billion from Congress for recovery and reconstruction in a proposal criticized as a grab-bag of pork-barrel projects. President Bush said Thursday the federal government had approved $85 billion in aid to the Gulf Coast. Louisiana's congressional delegation has contended that is not nearly enough, and continues to press for more.

Sen. Mary L. Landrieu (D-La.) said that the corruption, while historically accurate, has been magnified by Republicans in Washington who do not want to help Louisiana. "I don't want to discount that the image carries the scars of our past. But we have emphatically turned the corner," Landrieu said.

Citing the corruption scandal in the nation's capital centering on GOP lobbyist Jack Abramoff, Landrieu added, "Republicans in Washington should clean up their own house before using Louisiana's past reputation an excuse for not wanting to rebuild the Gulf Coast."

"It's not fiction — we have had some real corruption issues here in the past, and to some extent we still do today," Vitter said. "My colleagues in Washington want assurances that money is going to be spent wisely, given those issues, and I don't think it's too much to ask."

Government statistics indicate that Louisiana is one of the most corrupt states in the country. From 1995 to 2004, federal prosecutors won 310 corruption convictions involving public servants and citizens in Louisiana, said a report by the Public Integrity Section of the Justice Department. That was far from the highest total: California prosecutors logged 871. But California is a state of 36 million people, nine times the population of Louisiana.

In the last month alone, federal prosecutors have been busy bringing corruption charges against Louisiana public servants. Two sheriffs deputies who worked at a Gretna jail were sentenced last week after confessing to taking bribes — part of an ongoing federal probe dubbed "Operation Wrinkled Robe," which seeks to ferret out jail and courthouse corruption. The investigation already has resulted in the conviction of a former state judge.

Last Friday, a federal grand jury indicted a former New Orleans police officer caught driving a stolen pickup, one of about 200 Cadillacs and Chevys looted from a dealership after Katrina. Witnesses reported seeing officers drive away in the vehicles. A state grand jury is also investigating the case, along with other allegations of looting by law enforcement officers.

Brett Pfeffer, a former aide to Rep. William Jefferson, a New Orleans Democrat, pleaded guilty two weeks ago to bribing an unnamed congressman on behalf of a small telecommunications company. Jefferson has not been charged and has denied wrongdoing.

Impastato's trial is scheduled to begin next month. He pleaded not guilty Jan. 10 to federal charges that he extorted money from a businessman after helping him land a contract to remove debris. If convicted of the charge, as well as related counts of conspiracy and money laundering, he could face up to 20 years in prison.

The indictment said Impastato arranged with Lee Paul Mauberret of the Pontchartrain Chipping Yard to split the $200,000 contract. A relative of Mauberret's balked at paying the kickback, and Mauberret called the FBI, which set up the sting.

Impastato, 33, continues to serve his second term on the council in St. Tammany Parish, next to New Orleans on the north shore of Lake Pontchartrain. He declined to discuss the case when reached at Sal & Judy's, his family's Italian restaurant, where he makes a living running a business selling tomato sauces and olive oil.

His lawyer, Karl Koch, said Impastato did not "use his official capacity in any way" to enrich himself, and witnesses would testify that Impastato did a fair amount of the hurricane cleanup work himself. Impastato's critics said his actions — legal or not — set back the state's efforts to repair its reputation.

"Impastato should have avoided this at all costs. Especially given the current climate and attitude in Washington toward Louisiana," St. Tammany resident Dana Deris wrote on a blog carried on the New Orleans Times-Picayune website. "He IS guilty of furthering the negative image of Louisiana."

Outside a grocery store a few blocks from Sal & Judy's, Robert Keys, 72, shook his head.

"I'd love to be the judge on that one," said Keys, a 41-year resident of St. Tammany Parish. "A snake is going to take advantage of this opportunity right now, because there's a lot of money flying around loose. I guess the question is whether it was a legal shakedown or not. But either way, he's still a snake."

By Michael Rubinkam

DOJ_NMG_0012629

The Philadelphia Inquirer, January 27, 2006

ALLENTOWN, Pa. - The owner of a Jackson Pollock painting stolen from Scranton's Everhart Museum two months ago said he has forwarded the name of his No. 1 suspect to the FBI, and that the person has a connection to the museum.

The Pollock's owner is an artist formerly from northeastern Pennsylvania, whose paintings are featured in museums and private collections around the country. He spoke on condition of anonymity because he does not want to draw attention to himself, or to his own art collection.

The thief or thieves who broke into the Everhart on Nov. 18 swiped two artworks: an oil by Pollock that could be worth millions of dollars and a less valuable silkscreen by Andy Warhol.

Everhart spokesman Joe Palumbo said Thursday that museum officials don't believe the theft was perpetrated by anyone affiliated with the museum. "But then, to clarify that, they have no idea" who did it, he said.

The owner declined to say why he suspects the person whose name he gave the FBI, but said his information is based on official accounts of what happened and his knowledge of the museum's security.

An FBI spokeswoman confirmed the agency is investigating but declined to provide details.

The painting's owner said Thursday that he purchased the painting, created in 1949, from Pollock himself for about $1,000. The painting remained part of his personal collection for decades before he decided to lend it to the Everhart Museum more than two years ago.

Authorities have previously referred to the painting as "Springs Winter," but the owner said the correct name is "Winter in Springs."

"Winter in Springs" is not included in the catalogue of Pollock's known work, but Helen Harrison, director of the Pollock-Krasner House & Study Center, said that previously unheard-of works by the famed abstract expressionist have occasionally come to light.

The painting's owner said that for security reasons, he would never reveal the existence of a painting until he was ready to sell it or lend it. He said he owns other works by Pollock.

Although the 40-inch-by-32-inch painting has never changed hands, a similar work by Pollock sold at auction for $11.6 million in May 2004. Experts have said the Warhol, a 1984 silkscreen called "Le Grande Passion," is worth $10,000 to $15,000. The Warhol was part of the Everhart's permanent collection.

"Winter in Springs" wasn't insured, according to the owner and the museum. The owner said insurance on art is prohibitively expensive and that he doesn't know a private collector who has it.

Authorities have said that the thieves shattered a glass door at the rear of the Everhart to gain entry. They tripped motion sensors, but were gone by the time police arrived.

Surveillance cameras were not working. Even if they had been, the cameras are not set up to record images, Palumbo said.

The owner said he was recently summoned to testify at a grand jury session that was subsequently canceled. Palumbo said that to his knowledge, a grand jury has not been convened to investigate the theft. Grand jury proceedings are secret in Pennsylvania.

The Everhart never established the Pollock's provenance when it accepted the painting from its owner, but the FBI is going on the assumption that the painting is genuine, FBI spokeswoman Jerri Williams said. The FBI investigates stolen art only when it is worth $100,000 or more, or if it is at least 100 years old and worth $5,000 or more.

"We are pursuing it and attempting to identify who is responsible and, if possible, recover the artwork," Williams said.

Pollock, who created his abstract art by dripping and pouring paint on large canvasses spread on the floor, died in a drunken-driving crash in 1956 at the age of 44.

The Everhart, which specializes in natural history, science and fine arts, was founded nearly 100 years ago. It draws 15,000 to 20,000 visitors annually.

Former Beef Plant Operator Indicted In Federal Investigation (AP)

AP, January 27, 2006

OXFORD, Miss. -- Former beef plant operator Richard Hall has agreed to plead guilty to charges of mail fraud and money laundering related to the failure of the state-backed facility in north Mississippi.

The FBI and the U.S. attorney's office announced the agreement on Thursday.

DOJ_NMG_0012630

In federal court in Oxford and state court in Yalobusha County, where the plant was located, Hall pleaded guilty Wednesday to federal and state charges of mail and wire fraud as well as money laundering. No sentencing date has been announced.

Prosecutors said a plea agreement would bring Hall two concurrent eight-year prison terms.

Hall is the former operator of the Mississippi Beef Processors plant in Oakland. He admitted to converting $751,000 in public and corporate funds for private use.

The $43.5 million processing plant opened in August 2004 with 400 workers but closed three months later because of equipment failure.

Hall defaulted on a $35 million state-guaranteed loan.

Prosecutors said Hall also agreed to cooperate in the continuing investigation of the beef plant.

Hall's was the only indictment announced on Thursday by prosecutors.

Former Library Director Sentenced For Stealing Funds (MACT)

By Wayne Crenshaw

The Macon Telegraph, January 27, 2006

DUBLIN - The former director of the Ocmulgee Regional Library System was sentenced to four years in federal prison Thursday on charges that he stole library funds.

David C. Wilson must also pay $264,298 in restitution to the library system and a $75,000 fine, U.S. District Court Judge Dudley Bowen ruled at the end of a half-day hearing.

Wilson was library system director from 1982 until 1994, when the FBI and GBI began investigating suspicious expenses. He was convicted in October of five counts of theft and one count of witness tampering.

He routinely wrote checks of $250 and higher to himself for travel without anything to substantiate the payments, according to testimony in the trial. He also wrote salary supplements to himself into the budget without notifying the individual library boards.

Wilson was allowed to remain free on bond until notified of the date he is to report to prison, Bowen said.

The Ocmulgee Regional Library includes branches in Eastman, Cochran, Abbeville, Alamo, Hawkinsville and McRae.

In May 2004, the GBI executed search warrants on Wilson's home, the Eastman branch of the library and a farm Wilson owned in Dodge County. The investigation stemmed from a request by the Cochran Police Department.

Newton Man Sentenced To Prison In Fraud Case (BOS)

The Boston Globe, January 27, 2006

A Newton investment adviser was sentenced to 17 years in prison after pleading guilty to fraud charges, federal prosecutors said. T. Gene Gilman, 63, also was sentenced to two years of supervised release and ordered to pay unspecified restitution. According to the Justice Department, Gilman illegally diverted about $12 million of clients' money between 1998 and 2003 to two ventures he operated that eventually failed: a specialty eyewear marketer and a software design firm. Prosecutors said he sent false monthly statements to roughly 55 investors that misrepresented their money was in domestic securities. A Justice Department spokeswoman said a court proceeding will be held within 30 days to determine what assets of Gilman's might be available to compensate victims. (Ross Kerber)

Bloomington Man Gets 100 Years For Child Porn (INDYSTAR)

By Diana Penner

The Indianapolis Star, January 27, 2006

A Bloomington man who used two girls to create pornography that he sold on the Internet has been sentenced to 100 years in prison.

David Andrew Turner, 41, also collected at least 5,000 sexual photos and videos of other children.

Susan W. Brooks, U.S. attorney for the Southern District, which includes two-thirds of the state, said prosecutors wanted to ensure that Turner would never be free to prey upon children again.

"This is one of the most egregious cases that our office has ever seen," she said.

The sentence was the longest ever meted out for such a crime in the Southern District. Turner must serve at least 85 years of that sentence under federal guidelines.

DOJ_NMG_0012631

The two assistant U.S. attorneys who prepared the case, Gayle L. Helart and Steven D. DeBrota, have prosecuted about 125 child exploitation cases. Turner was sentenced Tuesday after a 2½-hour hearing in Indianapolis. He is being held at the Marion County Jail until the federal Bureau of Prisons determines where he will serve his sentence.

Turner pleaded guilty in August, but only after both victims had testified at his trial. The girls, identified only as Jane Doe and Mary Doe in court documents, were 12 to 15 years old during the three years Turner used them to create pornography -- from September 2001 to November 2004.

In sentencing Turner, prosecutors said U.S. District Judge David F. Hamilton considered that the defendant had put his victims through the ordeal of testifying before pleading guilty.

One of the girls is a close relative of Turner's, Brooks said, and the other was essentially homeless and viewed Turner as a father figure.

"He got them drunk. He got them high," Brooks said. On some occasions, the girls were so affected by drugs and alcohol when Turner photographed or videotaped them, DeBrota said, that they had no recollection of the events.

The investigation was started by the Bloomington Police Department, which collaborated with the FBI because Turner posted -- and sold -- pornographic images via the Internet. Investigators quit counting when they found 5,000 images. They believe Turner had several thousand more.

Brooks said the investigation showed that Turner, who was unemployed, was receiving about $1,000 a month from people who paid to get pornography from him.

In addition, local authorities are continuing to investigate a man photographed having sexual contact with the two girls. He is identified only as "John Doe, a friend and drinking buddy," in court documents. Brooks declined to elaborate on that investigation.

In court documents asking for the maximum penalty for Turner, prosecutors said one of the girls "has suffered from substantial drug and alcohol dependency problems" and "has been robbed of the right to grow up free from the malicious interference of adults in her adolescent development."

However, Brooks said, both girls now are in safe environments and doing better.

There's no question about the message the sentence sends, Brooks said.

"People who possess this type of trash," she said, "ought to think about spending the rest of their lives behind bars."

Getty Museum To Hold Talks In Rome On Disputed Art, Lawyer Says (BLOOM)

By Vernon Silver

Bloomberg, January 27, 2006

(The opinions expressed do not necessarily reflect those of Bloomberg.)

By Vernon Silver

Jan. 26 (Bloomberg) -- The J. Paul Getty Museum's new director, Michael Brand, will hold talks in Rome tomorrow with Italian Culture Ministry officials who are demanding the world's richest art institution return 42 allegedly looted antiquities in its collection, ministry lawyer Maurizio Fiorilli said.

The meeting will take place the day before the Getty reopens its Roman-style villa in Malibu, California, after a nine-year, $275 million renovation. The museum's former antiquities curator, Marion True, 57, is on trial in Rome on charges she acquired illegally excavated ancient art for the Getty.

Brand, who was named to the post last year as the Getty began an internal review of its antiquities-acquisition practices, will lead a delegation at the meeting, said Fiorilli, who said there is no room for compromise.

True, who denies the charges against her, says she acquired the objects in good faith. True obtained many of the disputed objects for the Getty in 1996 in a combined sale and gift by New York collectors Barbara Fleischman and her late husband, Lawrence.

Barbara Fleischman resigned from the Getty board yesterday, the Associated Press and Los Angeles Times reported today. Fleischman, who joined the board in 2000, didn't respond to earlier requests for comment on her collection and the Getty.

Neither the museum nor Fleischman is charged with any wrongdoing. Getty officials couldn't immediately be reached for comment on the Rome meeting.

Aphrodite, Hercules

True resigned in October after the museum determined she violated Getty policy by failing to disclose that an art dealer who supplied the museum helped her get a loan to buy a house in Greece. The Fleischmans also lent True money, the Los Angeles Times reported.

DOJ_NMG_0012632

The Getty Villa was inspired by the Villa dei Papiri, an aristocratic Roman country house in Herculaneum destroyed in 79 A.D. by the same volcano that buried Pompeii. The villa was closed in 1997, shortly before the debut of the $2 billion Getty Center designed by Richard Meier in nearby Brentwood, which now houses the Getty's flagship museum as well as art-conservation and scholarly institutes.

The villa was revamped to show ancient art only, and enlarged with a series of new buildings. The museum's parent, the J. Paul Getty Trust, has an endowment of more than $7 billion.

By John Rogers

The San Jose Mercury News, January 27, 2006

LOS ANGELES - The director of the J. Paul Getty museum was scheduled to meet Friday in Rome with Italian officials who have demanded the California museum return dozens of treasures Italian officials believe were stolen from their country.

Getty spokesman Ron Hartwig said Thursday the museum's director, Michael Brand, was leading a team of experts that would meet with "high-ranking officials from the Italian Ministry of Culture."

The Italian government has demanded the return of 42 items it believes were stolen, including a statue of Aphrodite that the Getty bought for $18 million in 1988.

"The Getty's objective is to develop a fuller sense of all the evidence available regarding the objects in question," Brand said in a statement released by Getty officials. "We want to be in a better position to continue our dialogue with the Italian government."

Hartwig said it was too early to speculate about what, if any, treasures the Getty might return.

"We're looking forward to working cooperatively with the Italian government to find solutions that satisfy both sides," he said.

He said the meeting was arranged through an exchange of letters with Italy's minister of culture that Brand began in mid-December, soon after he was appointed the museum's director.

The Getty Trust operates two museums, the Getty Center in Los Angeles and the Getty Villa in Malibu. The latter houses the 44,000 pieces that make up the museum's heralded antiquities collection. It is scheduled to reopen Saturday after eight years of renovations.

It has come under fire on the eve of its reopening amid allegations that dozens of its holdings may have been stolen. The museum's former antiquities director, Marion True, is on trial in Rome on charges of trafficking in looted artifacts.

Brand said during a pre-opening tour of the villa on Tuesday that the museum would hand over any objects determined to be the rightful property of someone else.

"Like any other museum, we've always returned works of art when they've come into question," he said.

2 Charges Tossed For 'Mafia Cops' (NYDN)

By JOHN MARZULLI

New York Daily News, January 26, 2006

The feds have quietly dropped two murder charges against reputed Mafia cops Louis Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa, the Daily News has learned.

Sources familiar with the government's strategy insist the evidence against the ex-NYPD detectives in those gangland killings is solid.

But a decision was made to streamline the indictment after Brooklyn Federal Judge Jack Weinstein warned prosecutors last June that he would not allow them to call 100 witnesses to testify as they had planned.

"Obviously a decision had to be made," one source said.

Deleted from the racketeering indictment is the May 1990 slaying of James Bishop, the former leader of Painters Union Local 37, whose cooperation with the Manhattan district attorney's office allegedly was leaked to the mob by Eppolito and Caracappa. He was found riddled with bullets in his car in Queens.

Also dropped from the case is the 1991 slaying of the late John Gotti's former bodyguard, Bartolomeo (Bobby) Borriello, who was gunned down in front of his Brooklyn home. His address allegedly was given to the mob by the cops.

DOJ_NMG_0012633

Sources said prosecutors will still ask the judge to allow evidence of the Bishop and Borriello murders into the case as uncharged crimes.

The feds contend Eppolito, 57, and Caracappa, 64, were kept on a monthly retainer for years by Luchese gangster Anthony (Gaspipe) Casso.

They are charged with leaking confidential information to the Mafia and participating in murders, as well.

With jury selection in their trial set to begin next month, Eppolito now stands charged with eight murders and Caracappa seven.

Eppolito's defense lawyer, Bruce Cutler, could not be reached for comment.

Attorney Edward Hayes, who is defending Caracappa said: "It doesn't make any real difference. Steve Caracappa's position is he didn't kill anyone."

'Mafia Cops' Prosecutors Drop Two Murders (NYNSDY)

By Anthony M. Destefano, Staff Writer

New York Newsday, January 27, 2006

With less than a month before trial, Brooklyn federal prosecutors slimmed down the indictment against the "Mafia Cops" by dropping two murders that were part of the racketeering conspiracy charged against the ex-cops.

A new indictment unsealed Thursday showed that prosecutors, seeking to simplify the trial, have decided to weed out the 1990 murder of union official James Bishop and the 1991 killing of one-time John Gotti crony Bartolomeo "Bobby" Boriello.

Former NYPD detectives Louis Eppolito, 57, and Stephen Caracappa, 64, have been charged with playing roles in as many as 10 homicides, including some while they were police officers, for members of the Luchese crime family. Some of the murders were believed to have been part of a scheme by former Luchese boss Anthony "Gaspipe" Casso to avenge a foiled assassination plot against him.

Bishop, an official of Painters Union Local 37, was killed because he was believed by the mob to have been an informant, said prosecutors. Investigators said Boriello was killed after Eppolito and Caracappa provided information to Casso that the Gambino soldier had threatened him.

Eppolito and Caracappa, who have denied the charges against them, are slated to go to trial Feb. 21 before Judge Jack B. Weinstein in Brooklyn federal district court.

The Bishop and Boriello homicides were dropped from the case to streamline the prosecution witness list. Last year Weinstein expressed doubts that he would allow prosecutors Mitra Hormozi and Robert Henoch to call as many as 100 witnesses.

As many as 10 potential witnesses now don't have to be called, said the source, who added that prosecutors will try to introduce evidence of the two killings as uncharged crimes if Weinstein allows it.

"Our defense is that Steve Caracappa is a hero, not a criminal," defense attorney Edward Hayes said Thursday.

Bruce Cutler, who is defending Eppolito, couldn't be reached for comment.

A Death Row Blogger's Advice For Life (WP)

By Eric Rich

The Washington Post, January 27, 2006

As Vernon Evans sat in his cell on Maryland's death row last spring, he had more to ponder than his own execution.

There was the lonely Brazilian who needed his advice, and a fellow from the District whose question deserved a reply, and a global audience tuned in to the wisdom of a man whose life was on the wane.

Evans was blogging from behind bars.

Vernon Lee Evans Jr. -- amateur advice columnist and convicted murderer -- is scheduled to die next month by lethal injection. He is one of the very few death row inmates to have a blog and, activists say, perhaps the only condemned man worldwide to use a blog to take questions from readers.

Activist Ginny Simmons started the blog in March and relayed the questions to Evans, who does not have Internet access. She stopped posting exchanges on the site in June out of concern that the exchanges could inadvertently harm his legal prospects. With his execution fast approaching, Simmons forwarded a backlog of questions to him last week and plans to post the fresh exchanges once she receives his replies.

Though defense attorneys in capital cases have long strived to remind judges and juries that their clients are human beings with lives beyond the crimes they are accused of, Evans's blog is the leading edge of a strategy by death penalty opponents to use new technologies to make the same point to the wider public.

DOJ_NMG_0012634

A coalition of activists in Canada maintains Web pages for about 500 death row inmates. Another group, Campaign to End the Death Penalty, began holding events in 1998 in which condemned inmates are patched through by speaker phone. The blogs are the latest experiment, and the activists say Evans's blog is the most novel and daring because readers can post questions.

"Part of the reason the death penalty is allowed to exist is that people don't acknowledge the fact that the people on death row are human beings," Simmons said.

Evans, 56, of Baltimore, was first sentenced to death more than two decades ago for the contract killings of potential witnesses in a federal drug case. He was convicted in the murders of David Scott Piechowicz, 27, and that man's sister-in-law, Susan Kennedy, 19, in 1983 at a hotel that Piechowicz managed in Pikesville.

Though she did not see the shooting, Evans's girlfriend testified at his trial that she saw him carry the gun into the lobby and saw it again -- still smoking -- when he came out. At a resentencing in 1992, Evans said, "It's not hard for me to say I am truly sorry for having been that type of individual that would take two innocent lives."

"His guilt is crystal clear, and I can't think of a more appropriate case for the death penalty," John Cox, one of the Baltimore County prosecutors handling the case, said in an interview.

On the blog, at http://www.meetvernon.blogspot.com , Evans in April assured Laura from Washington state that he was not the gunman, that he did not get a fair trial and that a lawyer told him before his resentencing in 1992 that his only shot at getting off death row was to show remorse. "Laura, I did not kill these people," Evans wrote.

In an exchange with Jay from New Hampshire, Evans reflected on prison life. "A man must find even in the worst things something good or positive to focus on," he wrote. "Sometimes if the forces are with you, blessing will come your way."

To the despairing Brazilian, a musician who had moved to Canada, Evans responded: "Listen to me, I am not always right, but listen to me anyway, and you might get something out of what I have to say. . . . You are young, and you should not have such fear when you are a talented young man."

Confronted with a question from Robert Trouts, who asked that he take his punishment "like a man," Evans wrote that "I have an education on how meaningful life is" and then seemed to strike a note of anger.

"Society dresses up and hires the justice system to kill for its revenge," he wrote in a portion of the response that was removed from the site yesterday. "I bet you are one of those people who would have been for slavery too."

A death warrant signed two weeks ago orders that Evans be executed during the five-day period beginning Feb. 6. Barring intervention by the courts or Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R), Evans will be put to death almost exactly two months after Maryland's last execution.

Some supporters of the death penalty say they find little of value in Evans's blog or in the larger effort to focus on the humanity of the condemned. "People can exchange notes with him if they want, but I don't think it really adds anything," said Kent Scheidegger, legal director at the Criminal Justice Legal Foundation, a group that supports legal execution. "The question is whether he deserves the punishment he was sentenced to, and I don't find much enlightening in these discussions."

In a world awash in personal narratives, where millions tune in to watch ordinary people do ordinary things on reality shows, the blogosphere has deemed an exchange with a man sentenced to die to be of limited interest. Fewer than 7,000 people have visited the site.

One of Evans's lawyers, Julie Dietrich, relayed this information to Evans by telephone yesterday. According to Dietrich, he responded: "I don't want to be judgmental about why people do things. In America, people have a comfort zone and try not to deal with anything that's too stressful."

Grandfather Grateful Carjackers Freed Girl (WP)

By Allison Klein

The Washington Post, January 27, 2006

Timothy Anderson carefully placed his granddaughter's lunchbox in the back seat of his Ford Expedition yesterday and buckled in the 3-year-old for their early morning trip to day care. He turned on the ignition, then realized that the door inside the garage of his Clinton home was not secured.

As he pulled the house door closed, he heard the engine in his Expedition rev. Then he saw a set of thieves making off with the vehicle, with granddaughter Sydney in the back seat.

He sprinted after the truck as it raced out of the garage and driveway of his house in the 6300 block of Danner Drive and kept going about 150 yards east on Brandywine Road.

The truck then stopped, the back door opened and Sydney hopped out. She ran toward her panicked grandfather.

The whole episode took less than 30 seconds.

DOJ_NMG_0012635

"I don't think she realized she was in any danger; she wasn't crying," Anderson said yesterday afternoon. "She was wondering what I was so upset about."

Anderson's truck was one of four vehicles stolen between 6 and 7 a.m. yesterday in the Clinton-Brandywine area. His car was stolen at 6:30 a.m.

Prince George's County police say they believe a set of brazen thieves is targeting people who leave their cars running, a habit that police say is a serious problem in the county.

More cars are stolen in Prince George's than in any other jurisdiction in the state. Last year, police dedicated more officers to tackling the problem and educating the public. In 2005, about 14,300 cars were stolen, a drop of 8.3 percent from the previous year.

Now, if police see a car running with nobody in it, they will issue a $60 ticket.

The three other cars stolen early yesterday in the Clinton area had been left running and unattended as their owners warmed them up. Police spokeswoman Diane Richardson said that was not the case with Anderson.

"We don't believe the man with the child was being careless at all," Richardson said. "He was in his garage and went to pull the door shut. All he did was walk away from the car for a second."

The other cars stolen were a 2000 Chevy Malibu from the 5600 block of Symposium Way, an Oldsmobile from the 11200 block of Brandywine Road and a Honda Pilot from the 12400 block of Morano Drive.

The thieves left the Chevy Malibu on Morano Drive when they stole the Honda Pilot, Richardson said, a sign that they probably were stealing the vehicles for joy riding.

Anderson's charcoal-gray Expedition, with Virginia plates JGS-9685, has not been found, and the thieves have not been apprehended, Richardson said. Anderson said he did not get a good look at the people who stole his truck.

Anderson and his wife recently moved to Prince George's from Dumfries. He said he moved because it was easier for him to get to his job as a technician for Lockheed Martin at the Pentagon.

He was feeling lucky yesterday afternoon that he had Sydney back. He and his wife were babysitting for her and her 2-month-old brother while their parents were out of town on business. He immediately called and told them what had happened.

"They were happy to hear their baby is okay," Anderson said.

He said the near miss will have an effect on him for a long time.

"It could have been prevented," Anderson said.

"I'll do things a lot differently. I will not leave my granddaughter unattended for a split second."

Scene Set In Day-Care Shooting (WP)

By Ernesto Londoño

The Washington Post, January 27, 2006

Moments before an 8-year-old boy shot another child at their day-care center this week, he told her to "give me your money," a prosecutor said yesterday.

"What do you want? Nickels, dimes or pennies? I'm broke," the 7-year-old girl responded, according to the prosecutor. Then a bullet from a .38-caliber revolver pierced her upper right arm.

Montgomery County Assistant State's Attorney Karyn McAuliffe provided that account of Tuesday's day-care center shooting in Germantown during an afternoon bond hearing for the boy's father. Prosecutors said the account was based on the police investigation, but they would not elaborate.

The father, John Linwood Hall, 56, insisted in court that he did not teach his son how to use the revolver. "That is not true. That it not true. That is not true. That is not true," Hall blurted out during the hearing in Rockville as McAuliffe argued that the boy has been "dangerously influenced" by his father.

Hall, 56, a maintenance worker at the National Institutes of Health, was charged with five weapons offenses after his son shot the girl shortly before 7 a.m. in a room where they and four other children were watching a movie on television. The incident occurred at the For Kids We Care day-care center at the Northlake apartments in the 12600 block of Grey Eagle Court.

The boy, a third-grader at Cedar Grove Elementary, has been charged as a juvenile with assault, assault while in possession of a firearm and reckless endangerment, among other counts.

The boy shot the Taurus revolver while it was still in his backpack. One of the five bullets in the gun tore through the backpack and penetrated the girl's arm. The victim, who has not been identified by police, was released Wednesday night from Children's Hospital in the District.

Prosecutors said they do not believe that the girl, a second-grader at S. Christa McAuliffe Elementary School, was targeted. They said it remains unclear to what extent the shooting was accidental.

Law enforcement sources said the boy told classmates last Friday after a fight that he had easy access to guns. But they said they are not sure what he planned to do with the gun that day. The two children involved in the shooting were dropped off at the day-care center before the start of school.

Based on the police investigation, McAuliffe said the boy has made profane and threatening statements in the past.

"[Expletive] the police," McAuliffe quoted the boy as saying. "What the [expletive] can they do to a kid, anyway? I'll shoot 'em."

According to McAuliffe, the boy said another time: "Phase 1: Get weapons. Phase 2: Kill the hillbilly."

McAuliffe did provide more context for those statements. She argued that Hall, a felon with a lengthy criminal history, was aware of his son's violent nature and should not have left a revolver at his disposal in the bedroom they shared. Hall denied that the weapon was kept there.

The prosecutor also said investigators found photographs of guns in the apartment and learned that the boy had access to "very violent video games." According to a police source, two of those video games are "50 Cent Bulletproof" and "187: Ride or Die." The Washington Post agreed not to identify the source because the case remains open.

"Bulletproof," released last fall, depicts rapper 50 Cent in a bloody New York underworld overrun with gangs and crime syndicates. Survival in the game requires shooting nearly anyone who gets in his way. The game costs about $50. "Ride and Die," an older game with a similar premise, is based in Los Angeles.

Darlene Hall, the boy's aunt, said her brother has been a positive influence on the boy, who she described as deeply troubled. She said the boy denied that his father taught him how to use guns.

"He beat on the desk and said: 'No, my father didn't do that. I learned it from 50 Cent,' " Darlene Hall said, describing how the child acted during a hearing on Wednesday that was closed to the public. She was present at the hearing.

John Hall asked Montgomery County District Judge Louis D. Harrington for a personal recognizance bond during yesterday's hearing.

"I need a personal bond so I won't lose my child," he told the judge. "I need my child."

Harrington set bond at $50,000 for the two charges before the court yesterday. Hall is also being held on $75,000 bond for three other weapons charges police filed this week.

Harrington barred Hall from having contact with his son as part of the terms of his release if he managed to post bond.

Hall told Harrington that he would show up for court. He has been employed for almost 15 years and has not been convicted of a crime in about 17 years.

"So, when do you pay your debt to society?" Hall asked rhetorically. "I've served my time."

Abuse Sentence Raised (WT)

The Washington Times, January 27, 2006

BURLINGTON, Vt. (AP) -- A judge vilified as soft on crime by Web loggers, TV commentators and politicians for giving a child molester just 60 days in jail increased the sentence yesterday to three to 10 years behind bars.

Vermont District Judge Edward Cashman said he decided to impose the longer sentence because state officials reversed course and agreed to provide sex-offender treatment to Mark Hulett in prison.

When the judge imposed the original sentence on Jan. 4, Hulett had been ruled ineligible for treatment until he got out of prison. Judge Cashman said the lighter sentence was the only way to ensure that Hulett got prompt treatment.

Hulett, 34, pleaded guilty to charges that he had sexual contact with a girl during a four-year period, beginning when she was 6.

After handing out the original sentence, Judge Cashman was attacked by commentators on TV and the Internet. On Fox News, Bill O'Reilly told viewers as video of Judge Cashman rolled, "You may be looking at the worst judge in the USA."

Vermont Gov. Jim Douglas called on the judge to resign, and several lawmakers demanded his impeachment.

A Zogby International poll taken after the first sentence was imposed showed that 92 percent of American voters opposed it.

In his latest order, Judge Cashman remained firm in his belief that sentences must be concerned with more than just punishment.

"The court agrees a punitive response -- punishment -- is a valuable and necessary component of society's response to criminal conduct," he said. "It is a tool that the court has routinely used for the past 24 years on the trial bench. As stated during the sentencing hearing, however, punishment is not enough of a response in some cases."

The governor said he considered the new sentence still too lenient.

"It's 18 times 60 days, so it's certainly an improvement," Mr. Douglas said. "Personally I think it's inadequate for a crime of that magnitude, but it is certainly better than the first decision."

DOJ_NMG_0012637

Attorney General William Sorrell said he had wished for more than three years "as a message to other would-be offenders." But he praised the judge for being "big enough to change course."

Hulett will have to serve at least three years behind bars. Once he gets out, he will spend the rest of his life on probation or parole.

"I think it is fair," said his lawyer, Mark Kaplan. "I think it makes sense under the circumstances."

The families of Hulett and the victim left the courtroom without comment.

State Rep. Peg Flory, the House Republican leader, said it is too early to say whether Republicans will drop their resolution calling on the judge to resign.

"I want to read what the decision is before I say," she said.

The Corrections Department initially decided not to offer Hulett treatment behind bars because it concluded that he was unlikely to commit another sex offense. After the furor, however, Vermont's human services secretary ordered the department to change its policy to allow low-risk sex offenders to receive treatment in prison.

Inmate Wounds Guard In Hospital (WT/AP)

By David Dishneau

The Washington Times, January 27, 2006

HAGERSTOWN, Md. -- A hospitalized state prison inmate shot and critically wounded the correctional officer guarding his room yesterday, then used the officer's gun to force a cabbie to drive him on a chase that ended with the inmate's arrest, state police and prison officials said.

The 44-year-old officer was in critical condition at Washington County hospital, where the attack occurred at about 5 a.m., authorities said. They said he was shot in the face but gave no other information about his injuries.

"He's fighting for his life," Maj. Priscilla Doggett, a state Division of Correction spokeswoman, said.

Prison officials said the officer is from Martinsburg, W.Va., but they declined to name him, citing his family's request for privacy. He is a four-year veteran of the Maryland prison system, married with four children and a stepson, prison officials said.

Corrections Commissioner Frank C. Sizer Jr. identified the inmate as Brandon Morris, 20, who was serving an eight-year sentence at the nearby, medium-security Roxbury Correctional Institution for assault, robbery and handgun violations in Baltimore.

Morris was being moved yesterday afternoon from the state police barrack in Hagerstown to a prison and has not yet been charged in the attack, Maryland State Police Sgt. Thornnie Rouse said.

Mr. Sizer said Morris was admitted to the hospital Wednesday for an undisclosed medical condition.

Department policy in such situations requires that an inmate wear either handcuffs or leg restraints and be secured to the bed, Maj. Doggett said. She said she thinks the policy was being followed in Morris' case.

"The normal procedure is that he is attached to the hospital bed with the restraint device," Mr. Sizer said.

He said he didn't know how Morris got free from the bed and obtained the officer's gun.

The officer was working the 11 p.m. to 7 a.m. shift, Mr. Sizer said.

The officer had reported at the start of his shift and again at 2:55 a.m. that everything was in order. The shooting was reported by a hospital employee, Mr. Sizer said.

Sgt. Rouse said police were alerted by a 911 call at about 5:15 a.m. They learned that the inmate had carjacked a taxi cab outside the hospital emergency room after failing to get car keys from a woman visiting another patient.

Police pursued the cab at about 40 mph on U.S. 11 to State Line, Pa., about 5 miles north of Hagerstown, where the vehicle crashed and Morris fled on foot back into Maryland, Sgt. Rouse said.

Police arrested Morris in an industrial park north of Hagerstown, he said.

"We credit the taxi cab driver with maintaining an open mike, if you will, and allowed officers to hear the chase route," Sgt. Rouse said.

The cabdriver wasn't hurt in the crash, Sgt. Rouse said.

Hospital spokeswoman Maureen Theriault said patient care wasn't affected by the incident.

The attack came three weeks after 17 inmates assaulted three officers with chairs and the guards' pepper spray at the maximum-security North Branch Correctional Institution near Cumberland.

One of those officers is recovering from a head injury that required surgery and a hospital stay.

The Roxbury Correctional Institution is a 721-bed medium-security prison for men that opened in 1983. It is near two other state prisons in Hagerstown, the Maryland Correctional Institution-Hagerstown and the Maryland Correctional Training Center.

CIVIL LAW:

ChoicePoint To Pay $15 Million To Settle Consumer-Privacy Case (WSJ)

By Christopher Conkey And Ann Carrns

The Wall Street Journal, January 27, 2006

Commercial data broker ChoicePoint Inc. agreed to pay $15 million to settle charges it violated consumer privacy rights, resolving one of two federal probes stemming from the company's disclosure last year that it inadvertently sold sensitive personal information on 163,000 people to criminals.

Under terms of its settlement with the Federal Trade Commission, ChoicePoint will pay a $10 million penalty to the government and $5 million to compensate roughly 800 individuals who the FTC says became identity-theft victims as a result of the lapse. The $10 million fine is the highest ever levied by the FTC.

ChoicePoint, based in Alpharetta, Ga., also must revamp the way it screens customers, implement new information-handling procedures and obtain independent security audits every other year until 2026. FTC Chairman Deborah Platt Majoras said the agreement provides "an opportunity for ChoicePoint to get data security right." She also said that to reduce fraudulent access to its vast database, company representatives will visit most subscribers to check who is using its services.

ChoicePoint didn't admit to any wrongdoing in the FTC investigation, but said it reached agreement because it wanted to avoid prolonged litigation and move forward. "I'm confident the settlement is the right thing to do," said ChoicePoint President Douglas Curling.

The settlement and fallout from the security breach hurt the company's bottom line. ChoicePoint yesterday said fourth-quarter net income fell 29% to $27.7 million, or 30 cents a share, from $39.2 million, or 43 cents a share, a year earlier. The company took an $8 million pretax charge for the FTC settlement and another $5.3 million in charges for other costs, including legal expenses related to the breach, which overall crimped profit by 14 cents a share. For the full year, ChoicePoint said net income fell 4.9% to $140.7 million, or $1.53 a share, from $148 million, or $1.62 a share, the prior year.

In 4 p.m. New York Stock Exchange composite trading yesterday, ChoicePoint shares sagged $3.35, or 7.2%, to $42.95.

The probe stemmed from a September 2004 incident in which the company failed to verify the identity of a client it provided with personal information, which the FTC says included credit histories, on roughly 163,000 individuals. The client provided fake company names, phone numbers and mailing addresses in California, and was in fact a Nigerian national involved in an extensive fraud ring. When the security breach was discovered, the company notified authorities as required by law, but didn't inform affected consumers until February 2005.

The announcement, which was quickly followed by breach notices from fellow data broker LexisNexis and Bank of America Corp., prompted an outcry for stronger consumer protections. About 25 states have passed laws forcing companies to disclose breaches to consumers, while 12 allow certain consumers to freeze access to their credit reports, and Congress is weighing a variety of federal remedies.

Despite ChoicePoint's desire to put the breach behind it, the FTC settlement doesn't remove all the clouds hanging over it. Aside from legal costs, the company still faces an investigation by the Securities and Exchange Commission into trading in ChoicePoint stock by Mr. Curling and Chief Executive Derek Smith prior to the company's disclosure of the breach. The two realized a combined profit of $16.6 million from selling company shares in the months after it learned of the breach. The company has said the sales were proper and part of a pre-approved plan. A ChoicePoint spokesman said that neither Mr. Smith nor Mr. Curling was available late yesterday to comment on the SEC inquiry. The spokesman noted that Mr. Smith has said he expects the outcome of the inquiry to be "favorable" to himself and ChoicePoint.

ChoicePoint To Pay $15 Million To Settle Charges Fine Stems From Consumer Identification Data Breach (USAT)

By Jon Swartz

USA Today, January 27, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO — In the largest civil fine levied by the Federal Trade Commission, data broker ChoicePoint has agreed to pay $15 million to settle charges it did not properly protect consumers' personal financial information, the FTC said Thursday.

The FTC fined the company $10 million and said ChoicePoint would pay an additional $5 million to compensate consumers. The FTC says about 800 people have been victimized by identity theft stemming from the breach, but more would be eligible for compensation as cases arise. The FTC says it is establishing a fund and will develop a plan to get compensation to victims. ChoicePoint, citing the Los Angeles County district attorney, says there have been only 16 known instances of ID theft.

The hefty fine sends a strong message to companies that handle the data of millions of Americans, privacy experts say. In the first of several high-profile data breaches disclosed last year, ChoicePoint — which stores about 19 billion records for insurance companies, financial institutions and others — acknowledged that more than 163,000 personal records had been compromised.

At least 130 reported breaches exposed more than 55 million Americans to ID theft last year, sparking consumer advocates' calls for federal oversight of loosely regulated data-brokers.

The settlement requires ChoicePoint to install new procedures so consumer reports are used only by legitimate businesses for lawful purposes. It also must create an information-security program, to be audited by an independent security professional every other year until 2026.

“Consumers' private data must be protected from thieves,” FTC Chairman Deborah Platt Majoras said.

ChoicePoint revealed in February that its massive database of consumer information was accessed by thieves posing as small-business customers. ChoicePoint collects such data as Social Security numbers, birth dates and addresses.

“It wasn't the largest breach, but it showed a stunningly sloppy business model,” consumer advocate Ed Mierzwinski says.

The company, also the subject of a pending Securities and Exchange Commission probe, did not admit to wrongdoing in the FTC investigation. It says it is has hired an independent privacy officer and taken other steps.

The SEC is examining stock trades by ChoicePoint CEO Derek Smith and Doug Curling, chief operating officer, that netted them $16.6 million after the company learned of the breach but before it was made public. ChoicePoint says it was asked by law enforcement to delay its announcement while the matter was investigated. It says the trades were prearranged and approved by its board, and it is cooperating with the SEC.

Record Fine For Data Breach (WP)

By Arshad Mohammed

The Washington Post, January 27, 2006

Data broker ChoicePoint Inc. yesterday agreed to pay a $10 million federal fine over security breaches that exposed more than 160,000 people to possible identity theft. Privacy experts praised the settlement as a warning to companies to get more serious about protecting sensitive information.

The Alpharetta, Ga.-based company, one of the nation's largest buyers and sellers of personal information such as Social Security numbers, birth dates and addresses, also agreed to pay $5 million into a fund to compensate people who suffered as a result of the breaches.

The Federal Trade Commission, which said the fine was the largest civil penalty it had ever imposed, said ChoicePoint violated consumers' privacy and breaking federal laws by mishandling the information and misleading people about its privacy policy.

ChoicePoint said it did not admit to any of the FTC's charges but was happy to have resolved the matter.

The ChoicePoint case has galvanized public concerns both about the ease with which personal information can be bought and sold and about the lax security procedures at data brokers that last year alone led to security breaches affecting tens of millions of people.

ChoicePoint told about 145,000 people in February that their personal information was obtained from the company by suspected criminals who masqueraded as legitimate businesspeople. Later in the year, it told another 17,000 people that information such as their names, addresses, dates of birth, Social Security numbers and summary credit information had been compromised.

The FTC said the incidents led to at least 800 cases of identity theft, which has been the top type of consumer complaint logged by the agency for the past six years.

Privacy experts said the FTC settlement, which required ChoicePoint to tighten its security procedures and to submit to outside security audits for the next 20 years, was designed to remind companies in the growing business of selling personal information that they must do more to protect consumers.

"It sends a big signal," said Peter Swire, a law professor at Ohio State University who was the Office of Management and Budget's chief counselor for privacy during the Clinton administration. "All major companies that handle personal information will see that the bar is being raised."

Consumer advocates say the prevalence of identity theft in part reflects the failure of many information brokers, retailers and credit issuers to adequately protect records or to do enough to stop criminals who seek them by verifying their identities.

As a part of the settlement, ChoicePoint agreed to take steps to ensure that it provides consumer reports only to legitimate businesses, and it will create an "information security program" to protect the personal information it collects on people.

"The message to ChoicePoint and others should be clear: consumers' private data must be protected from thieves," FTC Chairman Deborah Platt Majoras said in a statement.

"I am gratified we were able to work with the FTC and reach an agreement that protects all parties and am even more pleased that we can now put this chapter behind us," ChoicePoint chief executive Derek V. Smith said in a statement, adding that the company had already begun carrying out nearly all the policy changes demanded by the FTC.

The settlement was announced as ChoicePoint released its fourth-quarter profit, which fell to $27.7 million (30 cents a share), from $39.2 million (43 cents) a year earlier. Revenue rose to $257.9 million from $232.5 million. The company took a charge of about $8.8 million in the quarter because of the settlement with the FTC.

U.S. Settles With Company On Leak Of Consumers' Data (NYT)

By Tom Zeller Jr.

The New York Times, January 27, 2006

The Federal Trade Commission announced yesterday that it had reached a $15 million settlement with ChoicePoint Inc., the commercial data broker that disclosed last February that thieves had duped the company into turning over private data on more than 145,000 people.

That revelation touched off a year of national debate over data privacy and security and generated a raft of tough new state laws on data security as well as several bills in Congress.

The settlement includes $10 million in fines — the largest civil penalty ever imposed by the agency — as well as $5 million in consumer compensation, stemming from accusations that its handling of consumer data and its inadequate security procedures amounted to violations of consumer privacy rights and federal law.

The company, based in Alpharetta, Ga., will also be required to overhaul its security program — something already well under way, the company said yesterday — and submit to independent audits of its procedures every two years for the next 20 years.

The settlement does not constitute an admission of wrongdoing.

"We think this is an important settlement," said Lydia B. Parnes, director of the Bureau of Consumer Protection at the F.T.C.

"The No. 1 point of this case is that companies that maintain sensitive personal information must employ reasonable safeguards," Ms. Parnes said. "That should be fundamental in this day and age."

Chris Jay Hoofnagle, senior counsel with the Electronic Privacy Information Center, a Washington-based digital rights group, who has testified before Congress on the issue of data security, was more optimistic. "Certainly, from our view we think it's an important settlement, and it makes it clear that companies have to take information security more seriously," Mr. Hoofnagle said, "but the commercial data broker problem isn't solved."

The F.T.C. ultimately said that records of more than 160,000 consumers were compromised in 2004 when con artists masquerading as legitimate businesses were granted access to ChoicePoint's vast troves of consumer information — including names, Social Security numbers, address histories and dates of birth.

The company's revelation generated what seemed an avalanche of subsequent disclosures at companies, universities, hospitals and other institutions that handle personal data.

It also shed a spotlight on a data-broker industry that until recently had gone largely unnoticed and unregulated.

In its complaint against ChoicePoint, the F.T.C. claimed that the company did not have "reasonable procedures" in place to screen would-be subscribers to its databases and that in this case, the applications for access made by the fake businesses should have raised "obvious red flags."

The company did not, for instance, raise questions when an apartment number or a commercial mail drop was given as a business address, or when cellphone numbers were provided as a "business's sole telephone number," according to the agency's complaint. Multiple applications from nominally different businesses arriving from the same commercial fax number also did not prevent the applications from the fake companies from being approved, the commission charged.

The sloppiness ultimately allowed the most highly regulated data that ChoicePoint holds — credit histories — to fall into the hands of the fraudulent businesses. That put the company in violation of the Fair Credit Reporting Act, which more typically governs the financial and consumer credit reporting industries, and opened it up to record-setting penalties.

"We certainly support the settlement, and we believe its provisions are the right things to do and in the spirit of the changes we've already been making over the last year," said James Lee, the chief marketing officer of ChoicePoint. "We also believe it's in the best interests of everyone to put this behind us."

The company has already drastically scaled back the roster of clients to whom the most highly confidential data are marketed and it has bolstered its scrutiny of prospective subscribers seeking access to personal consumer information. That includes sending ChoicePoint representatives to visit any new business subscriber wanting access above a certain level, Mr. Lee said, to verify that the "business" is not simply a fax machine at Kinko's.

"If it's going to involve any kind of sensitive personal information, you're going to get a site visit," Mr. Lee said.

Mr. Lee added that ChoicePoint has "a different view of the facts and the conclusions" arrived at by the Federal Trade Commission. "But at the end of the day that doesn't really matter," he said.

Asked where the company and the agency differed, he offered as an example the F.T.C.'s assertion in its announcement that at least 800 consumers had become victims of identity theft as a direct result of the ChoicePoint data breach. Mr. Lee said he was aware of only 16 confirmed cases.

Ms. Parnes of the commission said the $5 million for consumer compensation would be held in an account and distributed to people who can demonstrate real damages suffered as a result of the ChoicePoint breach.

She expected that more than 16 would qualify.

"Maybe the bigger point here is we'll all soon see," she said.

Senator Charles E. Schumer, a Democrat from New York, who, along with Senator Bill Nelson, a Democrat from Florida, introduced one of the most comprehensive data security bills last year, thought the settlement was not punitive enough.

"While ChoicePoint has made efforts to atone for its wrongdoing, a light penalty like this says to other wrongdoers that acts like this are just the cost of doing business," Mr. Schumer said, "and we can't tolerate that kind of attitude."

SIU Fellowships May Be Changed (CHIT)

By Jodi S. Cohen, Tribune Higher Education Reporter. Tribune Staff Reporter Rudolph Bush Contributed To This Report

Chicago Tribune, January 27, 2006

Facing pressure from the U.S. Justice Department, Southern Illinois University officials are considering changes to three minority and female fellowships that the government has charged discriminate against white and male graduate students.

University administrators discussed the possible changes, proposed by the government last week, with student and faculty leaders at closed-door meetings Wednesday.

Though negotiations are continuing, a university Web site already says that the fellowships have been "extensively revised" and are open to a broader group of students. University officials said the Web site changes weren't authorized.

The board of trustees will likely decide whether to accept the government's proposals within the next few weeks, a move that would delay a threatened lawsuit.

"The board will soon be arriving at a decision based on these meetings and feedback as well as advice and direction from the general counsel," said David Gross, SIU's executive assistant for government, media and external affairs.

The possible changes would not affect students already in the programs but could make all students eligible for the fellowships, which have historically been offered only to racial minorities and women.

In a Nov. 4 letter to the university, the Justice Department threatened to sue the university if the programs weren't changed within a week. A lawsuit has not been filed, and the two sides instead have been negotiating a settlement.

The government has charged that the three graduate student fellowships, which include stipends to work in academic departments, violate Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. The act bars employment discrimination based on race, religion, sex or national origin.

"The department is currently in settlement negotiations with the university, and we hope to resolve our differences without resorting to contested litigation," said Justice Department spokesman Eric Holland.

The lawsuit threat came more than two years after the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that universities can consider race in college admissions, but only among other factors. The court didn't specifically address whether race could be considered in scholarships and fellowships, many college officials around the country decided to remove restrictions on programs previously reserved for African-American, Latino and other minority students.

At SIU, the three contested fellowships are being challenged under federal employment law because they include money for graduate students to work in academic departments.

One of the programs, the Bridge to the Doctorate Fellowship, funded by the National Science Foundation, rotates among universities and will not be offered at SIU next year, Gross said.

DOJ_NMG_0012642

The Proactive Recruitment of Minority Professionals for Tomorrow fellowship, or PROMPT, had been intended to "increase the number of minorities receiving advanced degrees" in areas of study they haven't historically pursued, according to a description of the program. The Graduate Dean's Fellowship has traditionally been for women and other underrepresented students.

Since 2000, 78 PROMPT fellowships and 27 Graduate Dean's fellowships have been awarded, Gross said. No white men have participated, according to the Justice Department.

But a university Web site about the fellowships, revised in recent days, said that they "are now open to individuals whose personal or family background, life, cultural, and/or ethnic experiences could contribute to a more reflective responsive environment."

The Web site also said the application deadline had been extended to Feb. 17 to "allow interested students to apply under the new guidelines."

"The Web site change was not authorized. We believe an administrator may have made an assumption," Gross said. "The language on the Web site does not reflect the proposal from the Justice Department."

Several people who attended Wednesday's meetings said they were told not to talk about the possible changes.

"It is disappointing to me that I am not allowed to talk about something that is so important," said professor Robert Benford, the Faculty Senate president. "It is ironic to invite heads of constituencies and tell them they can't talk about it with anybody."

SIU Shows Minority Fellowship Plan To Faculty (CHIST)

By DAVE NEWBART, Staff Reporter

Chicago Sun-Times, January 26, 2006

Officials at Southern Illinois University presented a proposed consent decree to faculty and student leaders Wednesday, seeking to ward off a proposed federal lawsuit that would charge the school with discriminating against whites and others.

Officials would not say just what was being proposed in the consent decree, which came after two months of negotiations with the U.S. Justice Department. The department had threatened to sue the school on grounds that three of its minority fellowship programs discriminated against whites, males and non-preferred minorities.

However, changes in the descriptions of those fellowships had been removed from the school's Web site Wednesday.

The changes omitted any reference to "minorities" in describing who could apply for the fellowships. The site noted that applications to two of the fellowships "have been extensively revised."

But Wednesday, the Web site reverted back to the original language describing the programs.

SIU spokesman David Gross said the school's lawyers recommended the site be changed back until negotiations had concluded.

The school's meetings Wednesday with faculty and student leaders were "positive and informative," Gross said.

"The general consensus is a negotiated settlement would be in the best interest of the university," Gross said.

A 'reasonable compromise'

Robert Benford, president of the faculty senate and a fellowship supporter, met with the administration Wednesday but said he could not discuss them because they were confidential. Earlier, Benford had said the new descriptions were a "reasonable compromise."

Professor Jonathan Bean, a critic of the programs, also liked the language that was temporarily online. "That is the type of language that I and others recommended two and a half years ago," he said.

Men Accused Of Putting Mercury On Interracial Couple's Porch (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, January 27, 2006

(AP) - CLEVELAND-Two men accused of putting poisonous mercury on an interracial couple's porch have been charged with a hate crime, according to a media report.

Joseph Kuzlik, 56, and David Fredericy, 49, were each charged with conspiracy to violate civil rights, making false statements and criminal interference with housing rights. Both men pleaded innocent Wednesday in U.S. District Court in Cleveland, The Plain Dealer newspaper reported.

"Allegations of hate crime strike at the heart of our community and cannot be tolerated," Greg White, the U.S. attorney in Cleveland, said, according to the report.

Lawyers for Kuzlik and Fredericy, who are white, declined comment, the paper said.

DOJ_NMG_0012643

Kuzlik is accused of acting as a lookout in February while Fredericy put an undisclosed amount of mercury on and around the porch of the unidentified couple's home in Cleveland's Slavic Village neighborhood, where the men also live.

The men are accused of lying when they told Environmental Protection Agency employees who cleaned up the mercury that they did not know how the mercury got on their neighbors' porch.

Mercury can damage the nervous system if swallowed or inhaled in large doses.

Male Student Sees Gender Bias In School (WT)

By Cheryl Wetzstein

The Washington Times, January 27, 2006

Female high school students are treated more leniently and are less likely to be punished than their male peers, a 17-year-old Massachusetts senior says in a federal complaint about gender bias at his school.

"The system is designed to the disadvantage of males," Doug Anglin, a student at Milton High School in Milton, Mass., told the Boston Globe this week. "From the elementary level, they establish a philosophy that if you sit down, follow orders and listen to what they say, you'll do well and get good grades. Men naturally rebel against this."

Gerald Anglin, Doug's father and a Boston lawyer, helped write the complaint, which was filed last month with the Department of Education's Office for Civil Rights.

The complaint cites "statistical anomalies" in males' grades and standardized testing performance, as well as "a generalized perception" that male and female students are treated differently by the mostly white, female teaching staff, Gerald Anglin said yesterday.

"There's been a request that the Department of Education use its expertise to suggest some remedies ... to correct the situation," he said.

The complaint recommends "altering the work force," "injecting flexibility" into course selections, using "pass-fail" grading and correcting negative impressions of male students.

Milton school officials disputed claims that girls are treated more leniently than boys but said they would revisit the issue and reinstitute a mentoring program for lagging students.

A Department of Education spokesman said the agency received the complaint but had no further comment.

This month, The Washington Times examined the issue of male "academic underachievers."

"Boys are suffering," Harvard Medical School psychologist and author William Pollack told The Times. "They are sitting in classrooms where they can't perform at the same level as girls and so cannot compete with girls," he said. "The bottom line is that they are suffering both academically and emotionally."

Studies show that boys receive most of the "D" and "F" grades, create 80 percent of classroom discipline problems, account for 80 percent of high school dropouts and make up less than 44 percent of the college population.

Suggested solutions include making classrooms smaller and more action-oriented, and teaching boys and girls separately.

About 200 public schools already offer single-sex classrooms and this week, officials at an Arkansas high school said they will start teaching ninth-grade core subjects in single-sex classrooms this fall.

If boys and girls are taught in separate rooms, a lot of the distractions are eliminated, Renee Parker, assistant principal of Hope High School, told a Little Rock television station.

Sniper punished

The Army has cleared a sniper in Iraq of violating operational security rules in helping to educate a judge advocate general (military lawyer) about the legality of open-tip bullets used by snipers to shoot insurgents who are killing American and allied troops.

However, the sniper, Sgt. Arthur J. Hushen, is continuing to face retaliation for blowing the whistle on an improper order for snipers to stop using the highly-effective M118LR ammunition in Iraq because it was thought to be an illegal hollow-point bullet. He was recently forced to move to a tent for "outcasts," said his wife, Sherry.

Sgt. Hushen recounted in a statement how he challenged the 4th Infantry Division lawyer, a woman identified only as "Maj. Card," after he obtained information from an Internet sniper forum showing that the bullets had been judged legal for use for years.

"Maj. Card stated that the hollow-point ammo was illegal," Sgt. Hushen wrote. "I informed her that there was a memo put out ... several years ago stating that hollow-tip had been deemed legal."

Maj. Card replied that she had never heard of the memo, but after documentation was presented to her, she reversed course.

"Maj. Card informed me that I was not a lawyer and she did not work for me," Sgt. Hushen said, noting that the lawyer then agreed that in her legal opinion the M118LR was legal and said she would send out an e-mail to the executive officers.

It was after the exchange that Sgt. Hushen was accused of violating security rules for identifying his 4th Infantry Division unit on the Internet. However, he was cleared of that accusation after his statement.

But he is continuing to be punished by senior enlisted and officers for raising the legal issues, we are told.

"I needed the ammo to accomplish my sniper missions," he said. "I didn't quit when I was told the ammo was illegal because I knew it was not."

Sgt. Hushen said he was punished by his platoon leader by being relieved from his sniper duties and removed as a team leader.

"I no longer have anyone to lead and train. I believe that this is the worst punishment that could have happened," he said.

Forced out

What to do with the pathfinding Office of Force Transformation within the office of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld? Defense officials have several ideas. A few want to abolish it. Others propose taking away its stand-alone status and making it an arm of the undersecretary of defense for acquisition or for policy.

The reason: A culture of transformation has taken hold in the Pentagon since the office's birth in October 2001. And, a merged office would free up some of its 18 employees to work elsewhere. "We have a billet cap at the Pentagon," said a senior official. "We are always looking for more billets."

The office has issued a number of futuristic reports on how the military can adjust to new threats. Retired Vice Adm. Arthur K. Cebrowski, the founding director of Force Transformation, died in November of cancer. The acting director is Terry J. Pudas.

Back in vogue

Army Gen. George Casey, the top U.S. commander in Iraq, stopped using the word "substantial" to describe future troop withdrawals. He had used it last year but quit this fall, he said, after he had doubts that Sunnis would join the new government in the right numbers.

Well, the word is back in vogue, principally because the Sunni Muslims won 51 assembly seats in the Dec. 15 elections. As a community, the Sunnis seem more willing to try democracy. Army Gen. John Abizaid, the top commander in the region, told radio host Laura Ingraham on Wednesday that "substantial" troop reduction could occur later this year if the military and political winds blow the right way.

Dirty language

The U.S. Navy-Marine Corps Court of Criminal Appeals has ordered a delay in the court-martial of a Naval Academy teacher who used salty language in front of a female midshipman.

The trial at the Washington Navy Yard had been scheduled to begin next week for Lt. Bryan D. Black. But his attorney, Charles Gittins, filed an appeal after the trial judge rejected his argument that the school's superintendent, Vice Adm. Rodney P. Rempt, should be removed as the officer overseeing the case.

Adm. Rempt, who is in the midst of a "no tolerance" campaign against sexual harassment at the Annapolis campus, ordered Lt. Black's court-martial, overruling an investigative officer who recommended counseling, not criminal charges.

Mr. Gittins says Adm. Rempt has too much of a stake in seeing Lt. Black punished. He says a new admiral should be named as the convening authority.

The appeals court will entertain written arguments from the defense and prosecution, and then likely hand down a ruling next month.

Lt. Black acknowledges making a crude remark about how a battleship sexually arouses him, during an oceanographic cruise in the Chesapeake Bay in August. He later apologized to the female student present. She did not file a complaint or request an investigation. But a female lieutenant commander onboard did her own investigation and reported the incident to the school's administration, which ordered a one-person investigation.

Democrats In 2 Southern States Push Bills On Bible Study (NYT)

By David D. Kirkpatrick

The New York Times, January 27, 2006

WASHINGTON, Jan. 26 — Democrats in Georgia and Alabama, borrowing an idea usually advanced by conservative Republicans, are promoting Bible classes in the public schools. Their Republican opponents are in turn denouncing them as "pharisees," a favorite term of liberals for politicians who exploit religion.

DOJ_NMG_0012645

Democrats in both states have introduced bills authorizing school districts to teach courses modeled after a new textbook, "The Bible and Its Influence." It was produced by the nonpartisan, ecumenical Bible Literacy Project and provides an assessment of the Bible's impact on history, literature and art that is academic and detached, if largely laudatory.

The Democrats who introduced the bills said they hoped to compete with Republicans for conservative Christian voters. "Rather than sitting back on our heels and then being knocked in our face, we are going to respond in a thoughtful way," said Kasim Reed, a Georgia state senator from Atlanta and one of the sponsors of the bill. "We are not going to give away the South anymore because we are unwilling to talk about our faith."

In Georgia, the proposal marked a new course for the Democratic Party. The state's Democrats, including some sponsors of the bill, opposed a Republican proposal a few years ago to authorize the teaching of a different Bible course, which used a translation of the Scriptures as its text, calling it an inappropriate endorsement of religion. The sponsors say they are introducing their Bible measure now partly to pre-empt a potential Republican proposal seeking to display the Ten Commandments in schools.

In Alabama, a deeply religious state where Democrats support prayer in the schools and a Democratic candidate for governor recently introduced her campaign with the hymn "Give Me That Old Time Religion," the Bible class bills reflect Democrats' efforts to distance themselves from the national party.

"We have always had to somewhat defend ourselves from the national Democratic Party's secular image, and this is part of that," said Ken Guin, a representative from Carbon Hill, leader of the Democratic majority in the State House and a sponsor of the measure.

Democrats in other states are moving in the same direction, jumping into a conversation about religion and values that some party leaders began after the 2004 election, when President Bush and the Republicans rode those themes to victory.

In Indiana, Democratic legislators are among the leaders of a bipartisan effort to preserve the recitation of specifically Christian prayers in the Statehouse. In Virginia, Gov. Timothy M. Kaine relied heavily on religious themes and advertised on evangelical radio stations to win election last fall; Democratic Party leaders have called his campaign a national model.

In an interview, Howard Dean, chairman of the Democratic National Committee, promised that Democrats would do a better job talking about values to religious voters. "We have done it in a secular way, and we don't have to," he said, adding, "I think teaching the Bible as literature is a good thing."

Christian conservatives, however, say they have been pushing public schools to offer courses on the Bible for decades, and Republicans in both Alabama and Georgia say some schools already offer such electives.

"Their proposal makes them modern-day pharisees," State Senator Eric Johnson of Georgia, the Republican leader from Savannah, said in a statement. "This is election-year pandering using voters' deepest beliefs as a tool."

Saying he found "a little irony" in the fact that the Democratic sponsors had voted against a Republican proposal for a Bible course six years ago, Mr. Johnson added, "It should also be noted that the so-called Bible bill doesn't use the Bible as the textbook, and would allow teachers with no belief at all in the Bible to teach the course."

Betty Peters, a Republican on the Alabama school board who opposed the initiative in that state, also dismissed the initiative as "pandering." Democrats, she argued, had adopted a new strategy: "Let's just wrap ourselves in Jesus."

For the last dozen years, most efforts to promote teaching the Bible in public schools have come from the National Council on Bible Curriculum in Public Schools, a conservative Christian group based in Greensboro, N.C., that advocates using the Bible as the primary textbook. The group says about 320 school districts in 37 states offer its curriculum.

But its curriculum often draws attacks from civil liberties groups. Democratic sponsors of the Bible class bills say their efforts would help shield local school districts from First Amendment lawsuits, in part by recommending a more neutral approach.

The textbook they endorse was the brainchild of Chuck Stetson, a New York investment manager and theologically conservative Episcopalian who says he was concerned about public ignorance of the Bible.

Mr. Stetson helped produce "The Bible and Its Influence" as the centerpiece of a course that seeks to teach about the Bible and its legacy without endorsing or offending any specific faith.

The textbook came to the attention of Democratic legislators in Alabama and Georgia through the advocacy of R. Randolph Brinson, a Republican and founder of the evangelical voter-registration group Redeem the Vote.

Mr. Brinson, who said he was working with legislators in other states as well, described his pitch to Democrats as, "Introducing this bill will show the evangelical world that they are not hostile to faith."

Some liberals are unhappy, however. Barry W. Lynn, executive director of Americans United for Separation of Church and State, argued that "The Bible and Its Influence" was "problematic" because it omitted "the bad and the ugly uses of the Bible," like the invocation of Scripture to justify racial segregation.

DOJ_NMG_0012646

Conservative Christian groups have been skeptical, too. "This appears to be a calculated effort by the Democrats to try to out-conservative the conservatives," said Stephen M. Crampton, a lawyer for the American Family Association, a conservative Christian group that supports the National Council on Bible Curriculum in Public Schools.

"To mention any curriculum by name is suggestive of some back-room deal cut with the publishers," Mr. Crampton said.

For his part, Mr. Stetson, founder of the group that produced the textbook, said a political fight was not what he wanted. "We are the first English-speaking generation to have lost the biblical story," he said, lamenting that studying the Bible had become "a political football."

AMC Closes Acquisition Of Loews Cineplex (AP)

By David Twiddy, AP Business Writer

AP, January 27, 2006

KANSAS CITY, Mo. (AP) -- AMC Entertainment Inc. on Thursday said it had completed its purchase of Loews Cineplex Entertainment Corp., strengthening its position as the nation's second-largest theater operator.

The Kansas City-based company now will operate 415 theaters with 5,672 screens in 29 states and the District of Columbia and 11 foreign countries. Annual revenues for the privately held company are expected to be around $2.4 billion.

Financial terms for the deal were not released.

"What I'm most excited about is the potential to continue the innovation and lead our industry the way both of these companies have been doing," said Peter Brown, AMC's chairman and chief executive officer, who will remain head of the company. "I think the innovation potential and the growth potential are enormous."

Travis Reid, Loews' president and CEO, will serve as a board member for AMC's parent company, Marquee Holdings Inc.

In an interview, Brown said he didn't foresee the company changing the overall number of theaters, although he said it will continue to replace older theaters with newer, stadium-style ones. He also didn't predict any changes to its worldwide work force of 24,000.

AMC and Loews agreed last year to sell 10 theaters with 120 screens to resolve consolidation concerns by the Justice Department and attorneys general in California, Illinois, Massachusetts, New York, Washington state and the District of Columbia. The theaters are in Chicago, New York City, Boston, San Francisco, Seattle, Dallas and Washington, D.C.

Combined, they still remain behind Knoxville, Tenn.-based Regal Entertainment Group, which controls 6,605 screens at 579 theaters in 40 states.

Bear Stearns analyst Glen Reid said he doubted the combination will have much of an impact on the industry, as most consumers go to the theaters closest to them and aren't loyal to a brand.

"It gives those two companies the opportunity for overhead synergies," Reid said. "It remains to be seen whether greater concentration of theaters leads to more bargaining power with the studios, such as better rental terms for films."

The combination follows a year in which U.S. ticket sales were at the lowest level since 1997, a problem the industry blamed on bad films as well as stiff competition for consumers' entertainment dollars.

It also comes a day before the debut of "Bubble," a film by award-winning director Steven Soderbergh, that has many in Hollywood predicting it could change the marketing and distribution of movies. "Bubble" is being released on the same day both in a limited number of theaters and on pay-per-view television. The DVD is being released Tuesday.

AMC is among the major theater circuits not carrying the film, and Brown said moviegoers should be concerned if other movies follow suit.

"I think at the end of the day what would happen with that economic model is that the quality would be lowered when we're living with each picture being a direct-to-video picture," he said. "We just don't think that's a good thing to happen at all."

Media companies, however, have defended the so-called "day and date" release strategy as a way to serve consumers becoming more accustomed to getting content immediately, as shown by the popularity of iTunes and cell phone companies selling snippets of television shows for portable devices.

AMC and Loews discussed merger plans in the past, calling off discussions in January 2004, just before a group of private investors purchased the publicly traded AMC for about $2 billion. Bain Capital, Carlyle Group and Spectrum Equity Investors also acquired Loews Cineplex from Onex Corp. and Oaktree Capital Management for $1.5 billion in 2004.

EU: Microsoft May Still Face Fine Threat (AP)

By Paul Ames, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 27, 2006

BRUSSELS, Belgium (AP) -- Microsoft Corp.'s new offer to let competitors examine some of the blueprints to its Windows operating system may not end the threat of daily $2.36 million fines in the European Union's antitrust case, an EU spokesman said Thursday.

"It would be premature to conclude that offering access to source codes would necessarily resolve the problem of compliance," said EU antitrust spokesman Jonathan Todd.

Todd said EU antitrust officials await details from Microsoft before making a decision.

"So far all we have received is the press release," he said.

Responding to a 2004 EU antitrust ruling, Microsoft in December offered rivals thousands of pages of documentation and free technical support to help competitors make their software compatible with Windows-based servers, which power Web sites and other Internet services.

But an independent monitor called the documents "totally unfit." The European Commission then threatened to fine Microsoft up to $2.36 million a day, retroactive to Dec. 15, saying the software giant was proving intransigent about sharing data with competitors.

Microsoft, which has until Feb. 15 to make a formal response, insisted Wednesday it was in compliance but said it was licensing the Windows source code as well to remove any lingering doubts. The company likened the move to now offering the cake rather than simply the recipe for it.

Microsoft said Thursday it was pleased that the EU Commission will consider the new offer.

"We have made every change the Commission has asked us to make to the technical documentation, and we are prepared to do more if they request it," Horacio Gutierrez, associate general counsel, Microsoft Europe, said in a statement. "Yesterday's announcement underscores Microsoft's commitment to meeting the Commission's demands."

Nonetheless, Todd said the source code alone may not do the trick.

"It's the quality and not the quantity that counts," Todd said in a phone interview. "You can give half-a-million pages, but if it's not the right information for competitors to be able to make compatible work group server products then it doesn't resolve the compliance issue."

In March 2004, the EU levied a record $613 million fine against Microsoft. It also ordered the company to share code with rivals and offer a version of Windows without the Media Player software for what the court saw as an abuse of the company's dominant position in the industry.

Microsoft is appealing the ruling and the case will be heard in late April by the European Court of First Instance, the EU's second-highest court.

Microsoft already has launched a number of efforts to give governments and certain private groups access to some source code. Wednesday's announcement extends this for the first time to more than 20 companies who currently license Microsoft software protocols under an EU program.

Microsoft will now share what it says is a "pretty significant" chunk of its Windows workgroup server operating system and desktop software code governing communications between servers. Smith said there were no plans to publish every line of the entire Windows source code.

Three Deny Charges Of Plotting Against Forest Service Lab (AP)

By Don Thompson, ASSOCIATED PRESS

AP, January 27, 2006

SACRAMENTO – Three environmental activists pleaded not guilty Thursday to conspiring to attack government targets on behalf of an extremist group, and bail was set for one of the suspects.

Eric McDavid, 28, of Foresthill, Calif., Zachary Jensen, 20, of Monroe, Wash., and Lauren Weiner, 20, of Philadelphia, were indicted Wednesday by a federal grand jury. They face five to 20 years in federal prison if they are convicted of conspiring to use fire or explosives to damage property.

Prosecutors say they scouted targets and were buying materials to build homemade plastic explosives when they were arrested Jan. 13 outside a Kmart in Auburn, east of Sacramento.

DOJ_NMG_0012648

On behalf of the shadowy Earth Liberation Front they allegedly planned to attack the Nimbus Dam and nearby fish hatchery on the American River near Sacramento, and the U.S. Forest Service's Institute of Forest Genetics in Placerville, in the foothills east of Sacramento.

All three denied the allegations at their arraignment Thursday. A status hearing was scheduled for Feb. 14 before U.S. District Judge Morrison C. England.

Prosecutors said all three should be held as flight risks and dangers to the community. U.S. Magistrate Judge Gregory Hollows ordered McDavid and Jensen held in Sacramento County Jail without bond.

But he ruled that Weiner can be released on $1.2 million bail, secured mostly by property her parents own in New York state.

Hollows noted that the government has audio and video surveillance, notes, an anarchists' cookbook seized from the suspects, and the account of a paid FBI informant who lived with the group in a cabin rented and wired by the FBI.

"While this group of defendants may not have possessed a polished expertise in explosives and their use in blowing up targets, there is no doubt from the evidence presented thus far that defendants were deadly serious in their intent to wreak destruction on some type of target which they believed would make a statement in favor of their anti-government, anti-corporate, allegedly pro-environment cause," Hollows wrote in his 12-page order.

But Hollows found little evidence supporting prosecutors' contention that the three were affiliated with either ELF or the similarly shadowy Animal Liberation Front, though he said they may have shared the same goals.

U.S. Attorney McGregor Scott on Wednesday said there is no known connection between the trio and 11 alleged ecoterrorists indicted in Oregon last week. The FBI says groups like ALF and ELF have claimed 1,200 criminal acts causing more than $100 million in damage in the last 15 years.

The three were visited in jail by members of a "support group" perhaps loosely affiliated with ELF, Hollows wrote, though he said there is no evidence the group would help the three flee if they were released.

Weiner was attending college in Philadelphia and had a clean record and close ties to her parents before she set off cross-country to join the other suspects in California after the Christmas holiday, Hollows said. He ruled she could live with her mother in Pound Ridge, N.Y., but restricted her movements and ordered her to attend school or perform community service while she awaits trial.

Eco-terrorist Suspects Plead Not Guilty (SACBEE)

By Denny Walsh, Bee Staff Writer

The Sacramento Bee, January 27, 2006

Three people alleged to be part of an eco-terrorism movement pleaded not guilty Thursday in Sacramento federal court to a charge of conspiring to damage and destroy property by fire and an explosive.

Eric Taylor McDavid, 28; Zachary O. Jenson, 20; and Lauren Weiner, 20, are accused in a one-count grand jury indictment of plotting to blow up a U. S. Forest Service genetics lab in Placerville, the Nimbus Dam and nearby fish hatchery in Rancho Cordova, and cellular telephone towers and electric power stations in unspecified locations.

While it is not in the indictment, other court papers filed by the government say the trio planned to publicly proclaim after the arson campaign that it was carried out in the name of the Earth Liberation Front, a movement advocating violent criminal acts against what its followers believe are symbols of the destruction and exploitation of the environment.

Also Thursday, U. S. Magistrate Judge Gregory G. Hollows ordered McDavid and Jenson held without bail. On the other hand, Hollows indicated a willingness to release Weiner on $1.2 million bail pending a decision by prosecutors on whether to appeal Weiner's release to U. S. District Judge Morrison C. England Jr.

BP Faces Charges In Texas Refinery Blast - Sources (REU)

By Chris Baltimore

Reuters, January 27, 2006

WASHINGTON (Reuters) - The U.S. government is pursuing charges against BP <BP.L> related to an explosion last year that killed 15 workers at its giant Texas refinery, sources familiar with the matter said on Thursday.

The case could result in civil or criminal charges against BP, and the company could face millions of dollars in fines, one source said.

The Environmental Protection Agency and Justice Department are pressing an enforcement case against BP related to the March 23 blast at the Texas City, Texas refinery, said the sources, who spoke on condition of anonymity.

The blast at the 460,000 barrel per day facility also injured 170 people and rattled buildings as far as five miles away.

An EPA spokeswoman referred queries to the Justice Department, where a spokeswoman declined to comment.

DOJ_NMG_0012649

Ronnie Chappell, spokesman for London-based BP, declined to comment on any possible investigations.

"From the very beginning we have promised government agencies charged with investigating the tragedy at Texas City our full cooperation," Chappell said. "We are meeting that commitment and we will continue to deliver on it."

BP has said it will spend $1 billion (562 million pounds) over the next five years to improve and maintain the Texas City refinery, and it set aside $700 million to settle lawsuits related to the explosion.

An internal report released by BP late last year found that no one intentionally put workers at risk, but that some policies and procedures were not followed.

According to a BP report, the explosion was caused when a hydrocarbon vapour cloud released by an octane-enhancing unit being restarted at the refinery was ignited, possibly by an idling pick-up truck.

Last year the U.S. Department of Labour said it had asked the Justice Department to consider bringing criminal charges against BP.

A spokesman for the Labour Department, Alan Belsky, said the department did not know if the Justice Department was pursuing its request.

The Labour Department referral was the result of a U.S. Occupational Health and Safety Administration investigation into the explosion, which found more than 300 wilful violations of health and safety standards at the refinery.

Wilful violations are defined as those committed with an intentional disregard or indifference to OSHA regulations.

BP last year agreed to pay a fine of $21.3 million to OSHA.

West Virginia Governor Signs Mine Safety Bill (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, January 27, 2006

Filed at 5:31 p.m. ET

CHARLESTON, W.Va. (AP) -- Gov. Joe Manchin signed new mine safety rules into law Thursday, saying the requirements for better communications, underground oxygen supplies and faster emergency responses would help prevent tragedies like the two that killed 14 miners this month.

"We want to be the benchmark everyone looks to when they mine," Manchin said during the signing ceremony, attended by some of the miners' relatives. "The sacrifice you all have made will change mining in this country."

State lawmakers passed the legislation unanimously just days after a Jan. 19 mine fire killed two men, and about three weeks after an explosion at the Sago Mine across the state resulted in the deaths of 12 miners.

The only survivor among the trapped Sago miners, Randal McCloy Jr., 26, emerged from a light coma Wednesday but still cannot speak.

The state's new mine safety law mandates that miners be provided with emergency communicators and tracking devices. It also requires mine operators to store extra air supplies underground, and sets up a new Mine and Industrial Accident Rapid Response System and statewide all-hours hot line to trigger rescue efforts more quickly.

"It eases our hearts and our pain knowing that maybe this will help save other miners some day," said Delorice Bragg, whose husband died in the mine fire last week.

Federal and state investigators were expected to finally get into the Sago Mine late Thursday to start determining what sparked the explosion that led to the 12 deaths, most of them from carbon monoxide poisoning.

The investigation had been held up, first by the dangerous gases and then over a dispute between the United Mine Workers and the mine's owner involving the union's demand to accompany investigators. The company challenged the union's right to enter the non-union mine after the UMW would not disclose the names of the two miners it is representing. A federal judge ruled Thursday that the UMW could participate.

The Sago disaster and Manchin's calls for reform have spurred several coal mining states to re-examine their mine safety laws.

Kentucky legislators started drafting similar legislation to strengthen coal mine safety laws and expect to file them in the House and Senate by early next week.

In Tennessee, Gov. Phil Bredesen called for a review of state mining laws to see if changes are needed in that state's nine underground coal mines, saying: "Let's learn from these things, and not wait until they happen to us."

A bill pending in the Virginia General Assembly would require underground mines to have wireless communications available so miners could call for help in an emergency.

The new West Virginia law also addresses communications, requiring companies to install wireless systems to connect miners to the surface through a series of transponders and requiring tracking devices for miners. Most U.S. mines still rely on hard-wired communication systems. At Sago, rescuers were unable to communicate with the trapped miners because the system was damaged.

Industry officials have raised questions about the reliability of the technology, but they have said they will support the changes.

In addition to better communication, the new law requires extra air supplies are inside mines, and says miners would be directed to them by strobe lights, reflective signs and guide ropes. Some companies already provide extra air supplies, but in most cases, miners only carry canisters that provide up to an hour's worth of oxygen.

The law also threatens coal companies that fail to report an emergency within 15 minutes with $100,000 fines. At Sago, company officials placed the first calls to state and federal safety officials more than an hour after the explosion.

State mine officials must now write the rules necessary to carry out the new law. A deadline for coal companies to comply with its provisions has not yet been announced.

West Virginia's congressional delegation is also pushing for tougher federal mine safety regulations and demanding more aggressive enforcement.

New Rules Govern Use Of Data From Testing Pesticides On People (WP)

By Juliet Eilperin

The Washington Post, January 27, 2006

The Bush administration issued yesterday the first-ever federal rules governing the use of information collected in tests that expose human subjects to toxic pesticides.

The new regulations -- which drew praise from pesticide manufacturers and criticism from environmentalists and congressional Democrats -- would prohibit the intentional dosing of pregnant women and children with such poisons, and would establish an independent board to screen proposed studies.

"This rule provides far-reaching protections for all Americans and bans pesticide testing on pregnant women and children," said Susan B. Hazen, acting assistant administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency's Office of Prevention, Pesticides and Toxic Substances.

Officials have been struggling for close to a decade with how best to deal with data from tests that deliberately expose people to toxic chemicals.

Until President Bill Clinton imposed a moratorium in 1998, federal officials allowed manufacturers to conduct pesticide experiments on human beings on the grounds that such tests provided a clearer picture than animal experiments could of how pesticides might affect the environment and public health.

President Bush initially backed the moratorium, but his administration abandoned it in 2003 after a court ruling in favor of pesticide makers. The firms had argued that the government had not fully involved the public before banning the use of the information.

Erik D. Olson, a senior attorney at the advocacy group Natural Resources Defense Council, said the new rules may lead to more pesticide testing on people because they will allow manufacturers to conduct "observational tests" that monitor individuals' everyday exposure to toxic chemicals.

"We're going to have weaker public health protections, more pesticides on people's foods, and a huge increase in the number of unethical and unscientific studies using human beings as guinea pigs," Olson said.

But Jay Vroom, who represents major pesticide manufacturers as president of CropLife America, said the administration has ensured that "these studies, while limited in number, can be conducted safely at the highest ethical standards."

Nearly 50,000 Americans commented on the proposal over the past three months, most as part of an organized campaign opposing it.

In A Nimby World, Alaskans Woo Project To Their Backyard (WSJ)

By Russell Gold

The Wall Street Journal, January 27, 2006

ANCHORAGE, Alaska -- Jeff Lowenfels has dispensed weekly advice about gardening in Alaska on the radio and in a newspaper column he has written for 30 years. When asked what he can grow in the frigid soil, he always answers: "Iceberg lettuce, snow peas and snowball cauliflower."

For much of this time, he has also worked to put something else in the state's soil: a natural-gas pipeline.

The 56-year-old former energy lawyer is a behind-the-scenes guru to an increasingly committed crop of activists and politicians who are ticked off by the endless delays in Big Oil's plans for a multibillion-dollar pipeline. In recent weeks, Mr.

Lowenfels's disciples have launched a ballot initiative, an antitrust lawsuit and television commercials -- all designed to push the oil companies and Gov. Frank Murkowski to speed up development of the North Slope's gigantic natural-gas reserves.

In many parts of the U.S., community leaders and local politicians are fighting to halt energy projects or at least put them in someone else's neighborhood. What's occurring in Alaska is the polar opposite. The majority of Alaskans are great enthusiasts of energy development.

The federal government estimates there may be 100 trillion cubic feet of gas in the North Slope, where Alaska meets the Beaufort Sea nearly 300 miles north of the Arctic Circle. That is enough to keep the U.S. in natural gas for nearly five years. But no gas is leaving the North Slope, even though natural gas prices in the last year have been higher than ever. Exxon Mobil Corp., BP PLC and ConocoPhillips, which have leased drilling rights in Alaska for decades, haven't been in a hurry to get that gas to market. They're currently negotiating to build a pipeline through Canada to the American Midwest but construction on that massive project isn't likely to start for years.

Meanwhile, Alaskans are running out of natural gas. Home-heating bills are rising and gas-intensive industry is shutting down. Instead of the longer pipeline being pondered by the giant oil companies, Mr. Lowenfels and others are pushing for the immediate construction of an 800-mile natural-gas pipeline to the Alaskan port of Valdez. A small portion of the gas would stay in Alaska and the rest would be liquefied and exported to either Asia or the West Coast.

Faced with a vigorous campaign to jump-start the pipeline, the oil companies are in the unusual position of counseling patience. Moving too quickly on their preferred $25 billion pipeline through Canada, one of the largest construction projects in the history of North America, would be disastrous, they say. Steve Marshall, president of BP's Alaska operations, says he is worried that if they act too quickly, the project will be poorly conceived, be prone to cost overruns and not deliver much economic benefit.

The pipeline spat has national implications. Prudhoe Bay and other nearby North Slope fields are collectively the largest deposit of oil and natural gas ever discovered in the U.S. Since 1977, crude oil from the field has flowed through an 800-mile pipeline to Valdez, where it is loaded onto tankers and delivered to West Coast refineries.

Prudhoe Bay's gas has a different fate. Since it can't be sent through the oil pipeline, the gas extracted along with oil is muscled back underground. In the middle of the Arctic tundra, about 8.4 billion cubic feet of natural gas a day passes through an eight-story building where jet engines jam it back into the reservoir through 32 wells. BP, the facility operator, says putting the gas back has yielded dividends: The reinjected gas has helped maintain reservoir pressure and allowed an additional three billion barrels of crude to be pulled from the field.

Mr. Lowenfels got bit by the gas bug soon after moving to Anchorage from Boston in 1975. He took a job as an assistant attorney general representing several state agencies involved in energy development. In 1981, he started working for the Yukon Pacific Corp. -- a company set up to build a gas pipeline to Valdez that has come to be such a big part of his professional life.

Over several years, with the backing of its parent company, CSX Corp., Yukon Pacific acquired most of the required permits for the pipeline. But Mr. Lowenfels says the energy companies refused to enter into a long-term contract to supply gas. That prompted Mr. Lowenfels to study why the companies wouldn't sell. His conclusion: They were delaying the Alaska pipeline to avoid competing with their own projects in Indonesia, Australia and the Middle East that were developing gas to send to the U.S. Unlike Alaska, where it can sit on the gas, Big Oil often has to extract gas expeditiously overseas or it loses its extraction rights.

The companies vigorously deny that they are warehousing the gas to keep overseas projects profitable. They say the pipeline into Canada is the only economically viable option for getting the gas out of Alaska and point out they have spent $125 million studying the route.

Mr. Lowenfels began holding "guerrilla sessions" beginning in the early 1990s in his downtown Anchorage office to spread the message that the oil companies were dragging their feet. Around a conference table piled high with permits and other documents, Mr. Lowenfels pitched Yukon Pacific's vision for a pipeline to Valdez. Eventually, the guest would ask some variant of the question: If it's such a good idea, why aren't the oil companies pursuing it? In a dramatic flourish, repeated hundreds of times, Mr. Lowenfels would pull back a curtain to reveal a map of the world with corporate logos marking where Exxon and BP have competing gas projects.

"We are sick and tired of having the oil companies control our destiny," he says.

Many of the Alaskans pressuring the state government and oil companies to build a gas pipeline through Alaska are graduates of these sessions. The two-hour session "changed my life," says William M. Walker, a former mayor of Valdez. Mr. Walker helped create the Alaska Gasline Port Authority. Last month, the authority filed an antitrust lawsuit in federal court in Fairbanks against Exxon and BP for conspiring to withhold gas from U.S. markets and effectively warehousing Alaska's vast gas reserves. The oil companies call the suit without merit, saying they plan to contest it vigorously.

Lori Backes, a former Republican political aide, also says her outlook changed after attending one of Mr. Lowenfels's sessions. "When you see you are in competition with the very people who are supposed to be on your side...you begin to look at things very differently," she says. Now Ms. Backes heads an advocacy group of labor and environmental groups favoring an "all-Alaska" pipeline. Her group is running TV ads mocking Big Oil's proposed pipeline as something good for beer-swilling Canadians, but not for Alaskans.

Eric Croft, another Lowenfels convert, is leading a ballot initiative, widely expected to pass in November , to tax the oil companies $1 billion a year until they develop the gas deposits.

Meanwhile, the oil companies say they are proceeding with plans for the Canadian route. ConocoPhillips reached an agreement on financial terms with the state of Alaska on such a pipeline in October, but BP and Exxon are still negotiating. A state spokesman said he is hopeful talks will be concluded in the spring, but several key issues remain unresolved.

Even if a contract is signed, lawsuits and fighting over the financial terms of the deal as well as the Canadian portion of the pipeline could continue for years, keeping Mr. Lowenfels and his seminar graduates busy. Until then, Mr. Lowenfels, a convert to organic gardening, plans to spend some time tending to his two-story greenhouse at his home overlooking the Cook Inlet near Anchorage. He is planting artichokes this week.

E-Waste@Large (NYT)

By Elizabeth Royte

The New York Times, January 27, 2006

LAST week, Maine became the first state to require manufacturers of computer monitors and televisions to pay for their recycling and disposal. Washington, with a pending bill, may be next. That's progress, right?

Computer recycling sounds like an unmitigated good: it keeps hazardous components out of incinerators and landfills, which researchers at Carnegie Mellon University estimate already hold more than 60 million computers. And by reusing glass, plastic, aluminum and heavy metals (like lead, copper and mercury), recycling averts the energy use and pollution linked with mining and drilling for new materials.

But because recycling in the United States is expensive, hazardous and encumbered with environmental and safety regulations, many companies that collect e-waste simply ship it to underdeveloped nations. According to the Silicon Valley Toxics Coalition and the Basel Action Network, up to 80 percent of the material dropped off by well-meaning Americans at community recycling events ends up bundled for export.

Most of the stuff that goes overseas can't or won't be fixed and sold. Computer dealers in Lagos, Nigeria, for example, complain that up to 75 percent of the 400,000 units they receive each month from recyclers are junk. A 2002 documentary showed Chinese workers, including children, using hammers and chisels to pry copper and aluminum from computers, burning PVC-coated wires to get at copper and swirling acids in buckets to extract gold.

After stripping what they can, workers dump the computer carcasses and waste sludge in nearby fields or streams. Soil and water tests in the e-waste processing town of Guiyu, China, for instance, revealed levels of chromium, tin and barium hundreds of times higher than allowable in the United States.

It's easy to find American companies that call themselves computer recyclers, but it's hard to trace what they actually do. The government doesn't regulate these businesses, and the Environmental Protection Agency has no certification process for recyclers. There are dozens of e-waste bills being considered across the country, including one in New York City. Five states and 15 counties ban computer and television monitors from landfills. California, Maine, Maryland and Massachusetts have e-waste recycling programs in place, all financed by different mechanisms.

Even the electronics industry doesn't like this patchwork approach, but so far, no one has come up with anything better. Four e-waste bills are floating around the House and Senate: the biggest difference between them is whether consumers or manufacturers would pay for the programs. A strong argument holds that when producers must manage their own discards, they have a strong incentive to design equipment that's nontoxic and easy to recycle.

The sooner Congress gets it together, the better. Electronic waste is now considered the fastest-growing segment of the municipal waste stream in the United States. The National Safety Council estimated in 2004 that by 2009, 250 million computers will have become obsolete. As awareness of the hazards of e-waste rises, more states will ban it from landfills. But keeping toxic trash from our dumps won't mean a thing if we don't forbid the export of hazardous material to countries without enforceable environmental regulations.

To halt this environmental injustice, in which we're all complicit, the federal government needs to restrict the use of hazardous materials in computers, require manufacturers to put in place recycling programs (it will be a lot cheaper and safer to recycle this stuff once the toxics are out) and ban hazardous waste exports. That may sound like a tall order, but that's no reason not to proceed: the European Union has already passed every one of these laws.

Two Tons Of Pot Found In Border Tunnel (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, January 27, 2006

SAN DIEGO (AP) -- Authorities said they discovered more than two tons of marijuana in a cross-border tunnel that began near the Tijuana airport and ended inside a warehouse on the U.S. side.

The 2,400-foot long passageway is longer than most of the 21 cross-border tunnels that have been discovered since authorities began keeping track after the Sept. 11 attacks, U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement officials said.

"It was like being in a cavern or a cave," said Michael Unzueta, customs special agent in charge in San Diego.

John Fernandes, special agent in charge of the Drug Enforcement Administration's San Diego office, said he suspected the tunnel was the work of Tijuana's Arellano-Felix drug smuggling syndicate or another well-known drug cartel. He said tougher enforcement aboveground had forced smugglers to dig below.

The tunnel's discovery prompted the U.S. Attorney's office in San Diego to open a criminal investigation, said Lauren Mack, a spokeswoman for U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement.

The tunnel exited into a large, two-story white cinderblock warehouse in an industrial San Diego neighborhood near the border.

A green sign over the door said V&F Distributors LLC. County records listed the building's owner as Helen Park of Long Beach. The phone rang unanswered Thursday at her home.

Mexican authorities found the entrance about 100 yards south of the border on Tuesday, and officers on the U.S. side found the exit Wednesday. Mexican officials allowed reporters and photographers, including an Associated Press photographer, into the tunnel late Wednesday.

The tunnel was about five feet wide and high enough for an adult to stand inside, had a cement floor, and lights mounted on one of the hard soil walls. It was equipped with a pulley system on the Mexican side.

Four tunnels have been discovered this month in the Tijuana-San Diego area, including more primitive tunnel that was also found Wednesday when a U.S. Border Patrol vehicle struck a sinkhole.

Agents Studying Massive US - Mexico Tunnel (NYT/REU)

By Reuters

The New York Times, January 26, 2006

LOS ANGELES (Reuters) - Federal authorities were trying to determine on Thursday what was smuggled through a sophisticated tunnel into the United States from Mexico they call one of the longest ever found.

``Whether the tunnel was used for smuggling aliens, smuggling narcotics or a worst case scenario, some sort of weapon, we don't know," Michael Unzueta, special agent in charge of Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) in San Diego, said at a news conference.

Federal authorities, who uncovered the 2,400-foot (731 meter) tunnel on Wednesday, brought in a forensic team to look for fingerprints and DNA, and to sample the air and walls, so they can determine how long the tunnel has been in use and what it was used for, Unzueta said.

The tunnel has cement walls and supporting planks, is no less than five feet (1.2 meter) tall and wide, and runs as far as 60 feet underground, Unzueta said. It has lighting and ventilation, and a pumping system to drain groundwater.

The U.S. entrance has a cement ramp with a washboard pattern for better footing. ``We believe this tunnel is, in fact, the largest tunnel ever found on the Southwest border," he said.

The passageway links a warehouse in Otay Mesa, California, with a warehouse near Tijuana international airport in Mexico, officials said.

The U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA) found 200 pounds (90 kg) of marijuana on the U.S. side, while Mexican authorities said they discovered 2 tons of the drug on that side of the border.

Because of the sophistication of the tunnel, the DEA is investigating major drug cartels.

``We know it's been used for drug traffic but this really illustrates the dangers and risks of security to Americans," said John Fernandez, special agent at the DEA in San Diego.

The tunnel was the forth underground passage found between Tijuana and the San Diego region in two weeks, but far surpasses the other three, and most of the tunnels ever found, in size, Unzueta said. Most tunnels are little more than crawl spaces.

Two Tons Of Pot Found Inside Mexico-U.S. Border Tunnel (SDUT)

By Onell R. Soto And Leslie Berestein

The San Diego Union-Tribune, January 26, 2006

Investigators discovered a sophisticated cross-border tunnel yesterday extending about a half-mile and found about 2 tons of marijuana on the Mexican end.

The tunnel begins about 85 feet below a small warehouse about 175 yards south of the U.S. border. The other end is in an apparently vacant industrial building in Otay Mesa.

Late last night, authorities were still pulling marijuana out of the tunnel, which is outfitted with electricity and a ventilation system. The building is in an industrial neighborhood near Tijuana's airport.

The concrete-lined shaft is 6 feet by 12 feet with a metal ladder that leads to the packed-earth tunnel, which is tall enough for a person to stand in.

A gurney hanging from a pulley system attached to one of the building's beams allowed items to be moved into and out of the tunnel. Two trucks and a van were parked inside the warehouse.

Authorities said the elaborate tunnel bore the hallmarks of Mexican drug cartels, which have spent millions of dollars in the last 15 years to find a way to move contraband across the border.

When Mexican officials allowed the media into the small warehouse shortly before 9 p.m., reporters saw about 300 bundles of marijuana stacked more than 5 feet high.

In the United States, the warehouse where the tunnel ended – north of Siempre Viva Road – was surrounded by law enforcement agents last night.

Authorities did not estimate how long the tunnel might have been in use or provide information about who might own the properties where the tunnel's entrance and exit were found.

In Tijuana, after spending most of yesterday waiting for a search warrant from Mexico City, dozens of Mexican police and federal agents swarmed around the metal building and surrounding truck yard late in the afternoon.

While Mexican agents awaited approval for a thorough search of the shaft, their U.S. counterparts resumed digging with heavy equipment in an area between two border fences.

That digging stopped about 4:15 p.m. when word came back that Mexican agents had found the tunnel at the bottom of the shaft.

"We have a tunnel and it's massive," said Lauren Mack, a spokeswoman with U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, which was investigating the tunnel with agents from the Border Patrol and the Drug Enforcement Administration.

The U.S. Attorney's Office in San Diego and Mexican federal, state and local officials are also part of the investigation.

Based on tips, U.S. officials began investigating the possibility of a tunnel in the area in 2004.

The investigation included searches using high-tech equipment capable of providing rough images of objects underground.

California National Guard troops who work with the Border Patrol began digging Tuesday morning with a bulldozer and a backhoe.

In Tijuana, Mexican military trucks rolled in and out of the yard yesterday.

At a billboard-making business next door, worker José Javier Ramirez Velasquez, 24, said the large shed "appeared abandoned."

Since moving from Guadalajara two months ago, he has been staying on a trailer nearby and said he had heard no noise or any digging.

"It caught me by surprise learning there was a narcotunnel here," he said. Meanwhile, several miles away yesterday morning, a U.S. Border Patrol agent found another tunnel a short distance west of the San Ysidro border crossing.

This tunnel, far from sophisticated, is the kind that agents call a "gopher hole." It was dug in an area just south of the fence in Mexico and extended about 30 feet in the United States, officials from Immigration and Customs Enforcement and the Border Patrol said.

The tunnel, just 2 feet underground and about 2 feet square, was discovered after an agent investigating some people standing near the fence north of the border found an area where it had caved in, Border Patrol spokesman Richard Kite said.

"It was not a complete tunnel and was of no use to any criminal enterprise," he said. "There were several people who were coming north of the fence. One of them was able to make it back across to Mexico."

That tunnel was about 50 yards west of where a similar tunnel was found Jan. 9.

A fourth tunnel under construction, with electric lights but with its entrance covered by a board, was discovered near the Otay Mesa border crossing Friday.

This month's discoveries bring to 21 the number of tunnels found in Arizona and California since Sept. 11, 2001, when inspections at the border crossings were beefed up. Between 1990 and 2001, 15 tunnels were found.

The increased number of tunnels is a good sign, said John Fernandes, the special agent in charge of the DEA's San Diego office.

"It is an indication, as far as I'm concerned, about their frustration with our success," he said.

Drug seizures at California border crossings were up 24 percent last fiscal year over the year before, customs officials announced this week. In the year ending Sept. 30, more than 127 tons of drugs were seized, the vast majority of that marijuana.

Tunnels provide a way to avoid inspectors altogether, and that's why drug cartels will spend millions of dollars building them, said lawyer John Kirby, who specialized in drug prosecutions before leaving the U.S. Attorney's Office last year.

"You don't have to play Russian roulette with the border," he said.

The Arellano-Felix cartel was behind a 1,000-foot tunnel between a Mexican ranch house east of Tecate and a house in East County.

It has been battling rival cartels headed by accused drug traffickers Ismael "El Mayo" Zambada and Joaquín "El Chapo" Guzman.

Guzman has tried underground routes before, prosecutors said.

In 1993, people working for him tried to dig a tunnel 1,450 feet north from an industrial building in Tijuana to a factory building under construction in Otay Mesa. They came up in a field about 120 feet short of their target.

That tunnel was discovered after officials found a map in a Tijuana safe house while investigating the killings of Cardinal Juan José Posadas Ocampo and six others in Guadalajara.

Guzman was caught, but escaped from a Mexican jail in 2001. He was indicted in San Diego on drug-trafficking charges. U.S. authorities have offered a $5 million reward for information relating to his arrest.

"Chapo was known," Kirby said. "He could get drugs over quickly."

Officials Find Drug Tunnel With Surprising Amenities (NYT)

By Randal C. Archibold

The New York Times, January 27, 2006

LOS ANGELES, Jan. 26 — Drug smugglers have dug one of the longest, most sophisticated tunnels discovered in recent years along the Mexican border, and the American and Mexican authorities have hauled nearly two tons of marijuana out of it since they entered it on Wednesday, officials said.

The tunnel is 60 feet below ground at some points, five feet high, and nearly half a mile long, extending from a warehouse near the international airport in Tijuana, Mexico, to a vacant industrial building in Otay Mesa, Calif., about 20 miles southeast of downtown San Diego. The sophistication of the tunnel surprised officials, who found it outfitted with a concrete floor, electricity, lights and ventilation and groundwater pumping systems.

The authorities said a tip led to the discovery.

"The tunnel is absolutely amazing," said Michael Unzueta, special agent in charge for the federal Immigration and Customs Enforcement agency's San Diego office. "It is probably the biggest tunnel on the southern border so far."

On the American side, agents found about 200 pounds of marijuana in the building in Otay Mesa, which had several bays for tractor-trailers. On the Mexican side, drug agents found a pulley system at the entrance to the shaft and several thousand pounds of marijuana and hauled it out for several hours Wednesday. Mexican authorities also found seven cellphones, two trucks, a van and various documents in the warehouse, according to a statement from the Mexican attorney general's office.

The customs enforcement agency, the Drug Enforcement Administration and the Border Patrol are sending a forensics team from Los Angeles to determine how long the tunnel has been in use.

The tunnel is one of the latest to be found along the border. Most are attributed to Mexican drug cartels searching for ways to move contraband into the United States, but some appear to be the work of smugglers of illegal immigrants.

Since Sept. 11, 2001, when border security was tightened, agents have uncovered 21 tunnels of varying degrees of length and sophistication, from "gopher holes" to engineered marvels like Wednesday's discovery, Mr. Unzueta said.

The builders, he said, "had to have access to money and somebody with a strong construction and engineering background."

"Our quick assumption is it's the drug cartels," he said.

Wednesday's discovery was the result of a tip investigated by a task force of federal agents devoted to tunnels. On Monday, they narrowed their search to the area in Otay Mesa and notified Mexican agents about what they suspected was the opening of the tunnel near the airport.

DOJ_NMG_0012656

Both sides began digging. Mexican agents discovered a concrete-lined, 85-foot-deep shaft in a warehouse, descended, walked through the tunnel and popped up on the American side, Mr. Unzueta said. Officials on each side are searching records to determine who owns the buildings.

Also on Wednesday, several miles west of the big tunnel, the authorities found a smaller one — about two feet underground and extending 30 feet across the border near a storm drain — after a United States Border Patrol vehicle hit a sinkhole.

Probe Underway After Exit To Border Tunnel Is Found (LAT)

By Richard Marosi

The Los Angeles Times, January 26, 2006

SAN DIEGO — Federal authorities have launched a criminal investigation after finding a long, cross-border tunnel that began in a warehouse in Tijuana, Mexico, and was apparently used for smuggling drugs or people, authorities said Wednesday.

Federal agents discovered the U.S. exit to the tunnel Wednesday in an undisclosed location near the Otay Mesa Port of Entry, said Lauren Mack, a spokeswoman for Immigration and Customs Enforcement.

Mack could not disclose more details, but said the tunnel appears to be longer than most of the 21 cross-border tunnels found in Arizona and California since Sept. 11, 2001.

"We've located a massive, spectacular tunnel," she said.

Four tunnels have been discovered in the San Diego area this month. Also Wednesday, a crudely built, unfinished tunnel was discovered when a border patrol agent ran over a sinkhole near the San Ysidro Port of Entry.

"It was a gopher hole tunnel … very primitive," Mack said.

Another unfinished tunnel was discovered last week a few miles east. That tunnel extended about 30 yards into the United States and appeared to be headed to a storm drain system.

Smugglers in recent years have tapped into storm drain systems in San Diego to bring migrants into the country.

Massive Drugs Tunnel Found Under Mexico-US Border (AFP)

AFP, January 27, 2006

United States authorities say they have discovered the largest and most sophisticated tunnel detected under their border with Mexico, one that was used by drug trafficking gangs.

The tunnel, lined with concrete and equipped with ventilation and lights, is one kilometre long, according to Mexican officials, but their US counterparts say it was only about 727 metres.

The secret route is cut 26 metres below ground, directly under a heavily protected sector of the frontier and is much larger than the 21 others detected under the border since the September 11, 2001 terror attacks on US soil, US officials said.

"We believe this tunnel is, in fact, the largest tunnel ever found on the south-west border," said Michael Unzueta, special agent in charge for US Immigration and Customs Enforcement in San Diego.

The tunnel, discovered late on Wednesday by US Border Patrol agents who tipped off Mexican authorities, begins beneath a warehouse in the Mexican border town of Tijuana and stretches to Otay, near the California city of San Diego.

The length and well-built structure of the tunnel, which was 1.5 metres wide, make it unusual.

Authorities found more than two tons of marijuana in the tunnel that US officials fear could also be used by people smugglers and even terrorists trying to circumvent the porous border.

"We're very concerned," said Mr Unzueta. "When we find these tunnels, we see that as a vulnerability to our national security."Sophisticated operation

Mexican police raided the warehouse in Tijuana and discovered a 1.8- by 3.6-metre concrete-lined shaft equipped with a ladder that drops down to the tunnel below.

A gurney hanging from a pulley system attached to one of the warehouse's beams allowed items to be moved into and out of the tunnel.

Portions of the tunnel are 15-18 metres deep, Mr Unzueta said.

The tunnel has a lighting, ventilation and pumping system to keep seeping water out.

John Fernandes of the US Drug Enforcement Administration in San Diego said the sheer scale and construction of the tunnel indicated that it was likely built by Mexico's drug trafficking cartels.

"It's a vast and sophisticated tunnel. We know it's used for drug trafficking, obviously, but ... this tunnel truly illustrates the dangers, the risks of the security and safety concerns of the American public."

The Mexican drug cartels have spent millions of dollars in the last 15 years to find ways of moving contraband across the border into the lucrative US market.

A number of tunnels have been detected under the border in recent months by a special ICE tunnel task force, including four in the San Diego area this month alone.

Feds Smoke Out Largest Drug Tunnel Yet (CNN)

By Kevin Bohn

CNN.com, January 26, 2006

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- Authorities have found what they call the largest and most sophisticated tunnel running into the United States along the Mexican border.

The tunnel contained 2 tons of marijuana, stacked in bales, according to a statement issued by the Justice Department.

DEA and U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement agents discovered the tunnel Wednesday night. It runs from Tijuana, Mexico, to Otay Mesa, California. (Watch scenes from the Tijuana pot tunnel -- 1:40)

Officials said the tunnel is about seven-tenths of a mile (1,148 meters) or more than 1,200 yards long. Initial reports said it is 5 feet high and 3.5 feet wide.

Authorities said they believe the passageway originates under a warehouse about 150 yards south of the border and surfaces about a half-mile north of the border in another warehouse.

Made of concrete, the passageway had lighting, electricity, ventilation and a pump to remove water, said Lauren Mack, a spokeswoman for Immigration and Customs Enforcement.

Most of the marijuana was uncovered on the Mexican side, but some of it was in the United States, Mack said.

"It's definitely expected to be related to a major drug cartel in Mexico," she said. No arrests have been made.

An investigation is under way to determine who built the passageway.

Mack said human intelligence led to the discovery of the underground structure. Agents then used ground-penetrating radar technology from the military to find anomalies in the soil, she said.

Earlier this month, U.S. border patrol agents investigating a caved-in road discovered another tunnel between Mexico and the United States, west of the San Ysidro, California, port of entry.

It was the third such tunnel found in three years near the San Ysidro port, Mack said. Others were discovered in 2003 and 2004, she said.

"We found trash and other evidence indicating people had been inside recently," Mack said in a phone interview January 11, describing the passage as "primitive." (Full story)

Tightened border security since the September 11, 2001, attacks is the likely cause for the increase in the tunneling, Mack said.

More than 20 cross-border tunnels have been uncovered in California and Arizona since 9/11, she added.

"We've now got a dedicated tunnel task force, which works with the DEA and border patrol to proactively look for tunnels," Mack said.

Tunnel Found Under Mexican Border (UPI)

UPI, January 26, 2006

SAN DIEGO, Jan. 26 (UPI) -- Federal agents report finding 2 tons of marijuana inside a tunnel that runs for nearly three-quarters of a mile between Mexico and California.

The tunnel is the largest of the 15 discovered under the border in California and Arizona since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, CNN reported. The Customs Service and Drug Enforcement Administration agents found it Wednesday night.

Agents described the tunnel as 1,200 yards long or about 0.7 of a mile, connecting Tijuana, Mexico, with Otay Mesa, Calif. It is reportedly 5 feet high and 3.5 feet wide with lighting and concrete walls and floor.

Lauren Mack, a spokeswoman for the Customs Service, told CNN tunneling under the border appears to be a reaction to the increase in security that followed the terrorist attacks. Earlier this month, the collapse of a road surface led agents to a tunnel west of the port of San Ysidro in California.

Tunnel Found On Mexican Border (WP)

By John Pomfret

The Washington Post, January 27, 2006

LOS ANGELES, Jan. 26 -- U.S. and Mexican authorities have discovered an elaborate tunnel that stretches the length of eight football fields connecting Mexico and the United States and was apparently used for drug trafficking, authorities said Thursday.

DOJ_NMG_0012658

The tunnel, unearthed Wednesday, runs from a warehouse in Tijuana and surfaces in the United States under an abandoned warehouse west of the Otay Mesa port of entry. Mexican authorities announced that they had seized about two tons of marijuana on the Mexican end, and experts said the passageway bore all the hallmarks of an operation by a major drug cartel.

"This is a very, very sophisticated tunnel," Michael Unzueta, special agent in charge for U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement in San Diego, said in a telephone interview. "Whether they are designed to smuggle drugs, people, weapons or other contraband, these tunnels pose a threat to our nation's security."

Unzueta said investigators were tipped off to the existence of the tunnel on the Mexican side and passed the information to Mexican law enforcement, which obtained a search warrant for the warehouse in Tijuana on Wednesday. Mexican authorities allowed reporters into the warehouse that night; they reported that they saw about 300 bundles of marijuana stacked more than five feet high.

Unzueta described the shaft as technically advanced, with electricity, a ventilation system, pumps to remove groundwater, cement flooring for traction in steep areas, and wood roofing to bolster the walls and ceiling. It had a clearance, he said, of nearly six feet and was about five feet wide.

At 2,400 feet, the tunnel is the longest and most sophisticated of the 21 underground passageways linking the United States and Mexico that have been discovered since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, when investigations and enforcement were beefed up in the region. Unzueta said most of the tunnels have been located in the San Diego area because the composite soil of that region is ideal for such work. From 1990 to 2001, 15 tunnels were unearthed.

Unzueta said that a year ago, agents from his agency, the Drug Enforcement Administration and U.S. Customs and Border Protection's Border Patrol unit formed the San Diego Tunnel Task Force, with the aim of unearthing the networks.

Federal agents have concluded that drug traffickers and smugglers of illegal immigrants have been heading underground to escape tighter enforcement along the border. Customs officials announced this week that drug seizures at California border crossings rose 24 percent in the past fiscal year. More than 127 tons of drugs were seized, the vast majority of that marijuana, in the year ending Sept. 30.

Since Jan. 9, authorities in the region have uncovered three other tunnels. Those were far from sophisticated -- the kind that agents call "gopher holes," being essentially shallow tubes connecting Mexico and the United States. In one discovery of a 30-foot-long tunnel with an opening of two feet square, federal agents found prospective illegal immigrants were still inside, although they succeeded in turning around and inching back into Mexico.

Law enforcement cooperation between the United States and Mexico has not always been good. Earlier this week, Texas state police were stopped along the border from seizing three sport-utility vehicles by men in military-style uniforms, who were armed with automatic weapons and driving a Humvee. The SUVs were apparently carrying marijuana.

Texas law enforcement officials speculated that the men were Mexican soldiers. On Wednesday, U.S. Ambassador Tony Garza issued a statement asking the Mexican government to "fully investigate" the border incident. Mexico's top diplomat, Foreign Secretary Luis Ernesto Derbez, countered Thursday that the men could just as easily have been U.S. troops.

Agents Find Pot-filled Mexico-U.S. Tunnel (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, January 27, 2006

Federal agents have located a 2,400-foot tunnel, filled with marijuana, that connects warehouses in Tijuana, Mexico, to San Diego -- the largest and most sophisticated illegal cross-border underpass authorities said they've ever found.

Equipped with a pulley and ventilation system, the tunnel is six feet wide and 8 to 12 feet high. It has a cement floor and lights on its walls, said U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA) spokesman Garrison K. Courtney.

"Whether they are designed to smuggle drugs, people, weapons or other contraband, these tunnels pose a threat to our nation's security," said Michael Unzueta, special agent in charge of U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) investigations in San Diego.

The tunnel's discovery Wednesday prompted the U.S. Attorney's office in San Diego to open a criminal investigation, said Lauren Mack, an ICE spokeswoman. ICE is a member of the San Diego Tunnel Task Force with the DEA and U.S. Customs and Border Protection (CBP).

Since the September 11 attacks, federal authorities have discovered more than 20 cross-border tunnels along the U.S.-Mexico border in California and Arizona. Authorities said they were unsure how long the tunnel had been in operation. They also said they did not know what drug organization might have used it.

Mr. Courtney said the tunnel originates 85 feet under a warehouse about 150 yards south of the border in Mexico, near the Tijuana airport, and surfaces about a half-mile north of the border in an abandoned warehouse in Otay Mesa.

DOJ_NMG_0012659

Otay Mesa, a community within the City of San Diego that was developed as an industrial area in 1985 as a result of the creation of the Otay Mesa port of entry, has become California's largest commercial land border port and is one of the busiest commercial land border crossings in the United States.

Based on leads provided by the task force, Mr. Courtney said federal police in Mexico found the tunnel after obtaining a warrant Wednesday night to search the Tijuana warehouse. Mexican authorities said the two tons of marijuana were stacked in nearly 300 bales.

Mexican authorities said a metal ladder was used to gain entry to the packed-earth tunnel.

In July 2003, members of the Tijuana-based Arellano-Felix Organization were indicted for conducting an illegal enterprise through a pattern of racketeering activity, conspiracy to import and distribute cocaine and marijuana, and money laundering.

After a request by the DEA, the State Department issued rewards totaling $16 million for information leading to the arrest of five leaders of the organization who remain at large: Javier Arellano-Felix, Eduardo Arellano-Felix, Manuel Aguirre-Galindo, Gustavo Rivera-Martinez and Gilberto Higuera-Guerrero.

In May 1993, a 1,450-foot tunnel was located in the same area of Otay Mesa, although authorities said at the time that it was unfinished.

The tunnel task force uses an array of high-tech equipment and intelligence information to pinpoint the locations of underground passageways along the border.

Five More Soldiers, Three Others Admit To Drug Smuggling (AP)

AP, January 27, 2006

Five more members of the U.S. military and three other suspects have agreed to plead guilty in a drug smuggling sting case targeting military members who believed they were smuggling cocaine through Arizona.

The pleas bring the total number of people admitting guilt in the case to 44, most of whom were members of the regular Army or Air Force or the Arizona National Guard.

The U.S. Attorney's Office said the five, four Army National guard soldiers and one airman, pleaded guilty to conspiracy to accept cash bribes from people they believed to be narcotics traffickers. In addition, two civilians and an officer with the Arizona Department of Corrections.

In fact, the traffickers were FBI agents working a sting operation called "Lively Green." The defendants face up to five years in federal prison and $250,000 fines.

All eight defendants escorted at least one shipment of cocaine from locations in southern Arizona to Phoenix or Las Vegas, federal officials said. In one instance, a convoy of U.S. military Humvees met a small private plane at a clandestine airstrip near Benson and the soldiers helped the undercover-agent pilots unload 60 pounds of cocaine. They then drove it to Phoenix, where another agent paid them off in cash.

KOLD-TV, January 27, 2006

Eight more people are pleading guilty in the Operation Lively Green case.

Six are current or former soldiers, and law enforcement officers.

Two are civilians.

This brings to 48 the number of defendants who have pleaded guilty to taking bribes from drug traffickers.

The FBI investigated the operation for two years.

All of the defendants escorted at least one shipment of cocaine from Nogales and Tucson, to Phoenix and Las Vegas.

By Mark Stevenson, ASSOCIATED PRESS

AP, January 27, 2006

MEXICO CITY – Mexico's foreign secretary suggested Thursday that uniformed men using a military-style Humvee to help drug traffickers on the border could have been U.S. soldiers or criminals disguised as Mexican troops.

The comments by Luis Ernesto Derbez came a day after U.S. Ambassador Tony Garza issued a strongly worded statement asking the Mexican government to "fully investigate" Monday's border incident.

Derbez called Garza's comments out of line and said his office is sending a diplomatic note asking the ambassador to tone down his rhetoric.

The U.S. Embassy in Mexico made no immediate comment.

Derbez also said that men photographed by Texas law enforcement officers as they helped marijuana traffickers flee to Mexico on Monday could have been Americans, but he offered no evidence.

He did refer, however, to an FBI drug sting dubbed Operation Lively Green, in which more than a dozen U.S. military and civilian government workers were arrested in southern Arizona. Some pled guilty to transporting drugs in official vehciles, including Humvees.

"Members of the U.S. Army have helped protect people who were processing and transporting drugs," Derbez told a news conference. "And just as that has happened ... it is very probable that something like that could have happened, that in reality they (the uniformed men at the border) were members of some of their groups disguised as Mexican soldiers with Humvees."

Texas law enforcement officials originally said Mexican soldiers were involved in Monday's incident.

Mexican officials earlier have said the uniformed men were drug traffickers disguised as Mexican soldiers. Derbez said Thursday there was no proof that they were even Mexicans.

"There is a supposition here that this involved Mexican citizens, and that is absolutely incorrect," Derbez said. "There would have to have been racial descriptions, and that would imply a certain element of racial discrimination on the part of the American sheriffs."

Derbez said his diplomatic note to U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice would demand that U.S. officials tone down their comments on Mexico's security and immigration problems, and would request quick results of an investigation into the December shooting of a Mexican migrant.

He complained that Garza should have made his complaints through diplomatic channels.

"We should not convert this, as (Garza) apparently did by publishing his article, into a public relations issue," Derbez said, adding that Garza's comments were "not only wrong, but also don't correspond to reality."

A series of earlier spats have raised tensions between the two nations that largely disagree on the best way to thwart illegal immigration and drug smuggling along the 2,000-mile (3,200-kilometer) border.

Derbez said Mexico's official position on immigration is now to push not just for legalization and temporary work permits for Mexicans, but for migrants from Central America and other countries as well.

"In any immigration reform, there should be a clause that allows the regularization of all citizens ... not just Mexicans, but other nationalities," Derbez said.

The U.S. Congress has refused to approve any amnesty. Instead it is considering the possibility of extending walls along the border – an idea that Mexico bitterly opposes.

Monday's confrontation began 50 miles (80 kilometers) east of El Paso, Texas, when state police tried to stop three sport utility vehicles on Interstate 10. The vehicles made a quick U-turn and headed south toward the border, a few miles away.

Crossing the border, one SUV got stuck in the river, and the men with the Humvee tried in vain to tow it out. Then a group of men in civilian clothes began unloading what appeared to be bundles of marijuana, and set the SUV on fire before fleeing.

Federal Officials Arrest 2 In Plot To Kill DEA Agent (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, January 27, 2006

Federal authorities have arrested two Louisiana men, including an inmate in the Tangipahoa Parish Prison near New Orleans, in a $15,000 assassination plot to kill a U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration agent.

Johnnie Sims was arrested Wednesday night as he attempted to hire a hit man to kill DEA Agent Chad Scott, said William J. Renton Jr., special agent in charge of the DEA's New Orleans field office. Chris Walker, 30, also was charged but already was in custody from his Oct. 13 arrest for possession with the intent to distribute crack cocaine.

"This arrest and the swift federal response to the vicious plot to murder a career DEA special agent should serve as compelling evidence of our absolute commitment to take any steps necessary to protect the lives of law-enforcement officers and citizens alike from those dangerous criminals who prey upon society with no regard for human life," said U.S. Attorney Jim Letten.

According to a criminal complaint filed in U.S. District Court, federal agents learned of the purported assassination plot from cooperating inmates who said Mr. Walker was seeking to hire someone to kill Mr. Scott.

Mr. Renton said federal agents set up a sting operation, during which the cooperating witnesses provided to Mr. Walker the telephone number of an undercover agent who was posing as the killer. He said Mr. Walker then contacted Mr. Sims, a cousin and drug trafficking associate, to pay the undercover agent to kill Mr. Scott.

Mr. Sims, 25, contacted the undercover agent and, according to Mr. Renton, had two meetings with him concerning the desire of Mr. Walker to kill the agent. He said Mr. Sims agreed to pay the undercover agent $15,000 for the murder.

DOJ_NMG_0012661

During the second meeting, Mr. Renton said Mr. Sims identified a picture of Mr. Scott, stating he wanted him killed as soon as possible. He also paid the undercover agent $1,000 as a down payment for the killing. Shortly after the meeting, agents arrested Mr. Sims at a shopping center in Metairie, La.

Mr. Renton said Mr. Sims was in possession of a semiautomatic pistol at the time of his arrest.

Mr. Sims has since agreed to cooperate with authorities and confessed to his role in the plot to kill the agent, Mr. Renton said. Mr. Walker remains in jail on the federal drug trafficking charges and has been detained without bond pending trial.

The investigation is ongoing and, Mr. Renton said, additional suspects are expected to be arrested.

"As we move forward in rebuilding our ravaged region, the people we serve should take comfort in the knowledge that the men and women of federal law enforcement will employ every weapon in our arsenal to hunt down and bring to justice anyone who poses a threat to the lives and safety of our law-enforcement professionals or to those brave citizens who come forward as witnesses."

Inmate Accused Of Seeking Hit Man (NOTP)

By Michael Perlstein

New Orleans Times-Picayune, January 26, 2006

It started as Southeast Louisiana's first federal drug case since Hurricane Katrina. It evolved into a murder-for-hire plot targeting the Drug Enforcement Administration agent who made the bust, federal authorities announced Wednesday.

As a result, a Tangipahoa Parish Prison inmate, and a go-between who allegedly tried to hire a hit man on the inmate's behalf, face possible life sentences if convicted of conspiring to kill a federal officer. The case against federal drug defendant Chris Walker and Johnnie Sims, Walker's cousin and an alleged drug-trafficking underling, will be presented to a grand jury in the coming weeks, U.S. Attorney Jim Letten said.

William Renton, the DEA's top agent for the New Orleans area, said the scheme unraveled when Walker, 30, started asking fellow inmates at Tangipahoa Parish Prison for the names of potential hit men.

Two inmates took the information straight to DEA Agent Chad Scott, who had busted Walker on Oct. 18 and booked him with possessing more than a kilo of cocaine, equipment used in making crack and a gun with an obliterated serial number, according to Renton and court records.

The informants told the agent that Walker had asked Sims, 25, to line up an assassin to murder Scott, according to criminal affidavit filed in the case. The DEA wasted no time launching a sting operation using an undercover New Orleans police officer to pose as a drug-dealing hit man, the affidavit states.

"I was angry," Renton said. "I was personally offended that somebody would target a federal agent simply for doing his job and serving the citizens of the United States. We decided we'd leave no stone unturned in pursuing this investigation."

Agents used the informants to give the undercover officer's telephone number to Walker in prison, who promptly passed the number to Sims. After a few preliminary phone conversations, Sims met with the undercover officer Monday at Lakeside Shopping Center in Metairie, the affidavit states.

At the meeting, the two men arrived at a price of $15,000 for "knocking off" Scott. The pair met again at Lakeside on Tuesday, when Sims allegedly gave the undercover officer, Ricky Jackson, a $1,000 down payment.

"Walker's thinking that if Chad Scott dies, he's got no more problems. Once we heard about this, we put on a full-court press," Renton said.

With the exchange of money, agents pounced on Sims and arrested him. A search of his vehicle netted a loaded .40-caliber handgun and small amounts of cocaine and marijuana, authorities said. After his arrest, Sims began spilling his guts about the plot, revealing that Walker also wanted to kill the confidential informants who he believed landed him behind bars in the first place, the affidavit states.

Renton and Letten said the case was helped by cooperation among several police agencies, including the DEA, New Orleans Police Department, Hammond Police Department, Louisiana State Police and the Tangipahoa and Jefferson Parish sheriff's offices.

"I'm extremely proud of the swift and efficient actions of the DEA agents and everyone else involved," Letten said. "We will always do everything in our power to protect those people who dedicate their lives to protecting citizens. It's plots like this that galvanize our resolve to more aggressively go after these corrupt individuals."

While it is rare for a defendant in such cases to receive the maximum life sentence, Walker and Sims face lengthy prison terms based on prior and pending cases against them. At the time of his arrest, Sims was on probation for two felony cocaine convictions. Walker, in addition to the pending federal cocaine case, also has two prior drug convictions, court records show.

County May Join Medical Pot Suit (PR-ENT)

DOJ_NMG_0012662

By Duane W. Gang And Kimberly Trone

Press-Enterprise (CA), January 27, 2006

Riverside County will consider joining San Bernardino and San Diego counties in a federal lawsuit seeking to overturn California's medical-marijuana law, a Riverside County supervisor said Thursday.

Supervisor Jeff Stone, a pharmacist, said he intends to ask his colleagues in closed session Tuesday to add the county to the short list of challengers to the state's Compassionate Use Act approved by Californians in 1996.

The law allows patients with a physician's recommendation to transport and use marijuana to treat the symptoms of illnesses such as cancer, glaucoma, chronic pain and AIDS.

State law also requires counties to issue optional identification cards to medical-marijuana users. So far, 15 counties -- including Riverside -- have issued almost 800 cards, which help users avoid arrest.

San Bernardino County, which was set to begin issuing the cards this month, will not issue them until the legal dispute is resolved. Riverside County began issuing the cards in December.

Stone, along with his counterparts in San Bernardino County, said the state law conflicts with federal drug provisions, leaving law enforcement in a bind over which measures to enforce.

In addition, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled last year that those in states with compassionate-use laws still could face arrest on federal drug charges.

"It is clear through pharmacy law that whatever law is stricter -- federal or state law -- that is the law we have to uphold," Stone said. "The more counties that sign on to the suit, the more clout we are going to have."

Counties need clarification from the courts on the conflicting laws, Stone said.

San Bernardino County supervisors voted unanimously in closed session this week to join San Diego County in its federal lawsuit against the state.

Ruth Stringer, an assistant San Bernardino County counsel, said the county has not filed its lawsuit yet but hopes to do so soon. Once filed, it is expected to be combined with San Diego County's lawsuit, officials said.

Chris Laue, 55, of Twentynine Palms, meets monthly with people in San Bernardino County who rely on medical marijuana to ease chronic pain. He said the group likely will go before the supervisors to protest their actions.

"They swear to uphold the constitution of the state of California," said Laue, whose wife uses medical marijuana.

San Diego County contends that the U.S. Constitution's supremacy clause preempts California medical-marijuana laws because they conflict with federal drug law and an international narcotics treaty the United States signed in 1961.

"Under federal law, we can't go along with what the state wants us to do," San Bernardino County Sheriff Gary Penrod said Thursday.

Penrod wrote a December memo to the San Bernardino County supervisors encouraging them to join with San Diego County.

In the memo, he said that while voters statewide approved the 1996 ballot initiative, San Bernardino County voters rejected it.

He urged the county to "resist engaging in a program that issues cards that sanction participation in a federal crime."

Penrod said he expects to be a named plaintiff in San Bernardino County's lawsuit and hopes that adds weight to the counties' case. He said he wants to go before a judge and explain the problem that medical marijuana poses to law enforcement agencies.

But the counties could be facing an uphill legal battle, even if Riverside County joins the lawsuit, said David B. Cruz, a constitutional law expert at the University of Southern California Law School.

It is pretty clear a county cannot sue its state for an alleged constitutional violation, Cruz said.

"There also is precedent that physicians recommending marijuana, which is what these ID cards are all about, does not amount to a violation of federal law," Cruz said.

It is unclear whether Stone will gain support from his fellow supervisors to add Riverside County's name to the suit. Supervisors Marion Ashley, Bob Buster and Roy Wilson said this week that as long as there is a state law allowing the use of medical marijuana, they intend to uphold it.

"I would hope we would move forward in making sure the law is followed," Wilson said.

Riverside County Supervisor John Tavaglione said Thursday he was not prepared to weigh in on whether the county should join the lawsuit, but he said he wants a ban on medical-marijuana dispensaries.

Riverside County planners are preparing to roll out a proposal this spring detailing where and how medical-marijuana dispensaries may operate.

Stone said joining the lawsuit would not mean Riverside County would stop issuing medical-marijuana cards.

"We are going to continue to do what the state tells us until a judge tells us the measure is unconstitutional or not legally viable," Stone said.

U.S. And Mexico Trade Complaints Over Border Security Issues (NYT)

By James C. McKinley Jr.

The New York Times, January 27, 2006

MEXICO CITY, Jan. 26 — The United States and Mexico exchanged diplomatic broadsides on Thursday over border security and drug-related violence in another sign of their deteriorating relationship.

The American ambassador, Antonio O. Garza Jr., sent a formal note to the Mexican government demanding an investigation of an episode on Monday in which men dressed as Mexican soldiers helped drug smugglers escape American law enforcement officers near El Paso.

The ambassador took the unusual step of not only announcing the note, but promising to send a second one to express concern about a rise in drug-related violence in border towns and recent attacks on American Border Patrol agents.

"I am urging the Mexican government to take this elevated violence seriously," said Mr. Garza, a Texas Republican. "In the past there has been a tendency to focus on public relations instead of public security."

Hours later the Mexican foreign minister, Luis Ernesto Derbez, suggested that it was Mr. Garza who appeared to be playing to a crowd for political reasons. "What he says is that one should not feed this discourse in the media, but find a real solution," Mr. Derbez said. "I would hope that he would apply his own recommendation." Not to be outdone, Mr. Derbez announced that Mexico would send its own diplomatic note responding to Mr. Garza's criticisms. He also said Mexico would demand an explanation for the lack of progress in an investigation of the fatal shooting of a Mexican immigrant, Guillermo Martínez, by a Border Patrol agent on Dec. 30 near San Diego.

Mr. Derbez went on to suggest that the uniformed men in the incident on Monday, who used a military Humvee with a mounted machine gun to help drug traffickers cross the Rio Grande, might have been American soldiers in disguise.

The diplomatic quarrel comes amid strained relations between the two countries. Mexican officials are furious about a bill before the United States Senate that would make it a felony to enter the country illegally and would order construction of 700 miles of fence along the border.

The bill is coming up for a vote as efforts to establish a guest worker program that would legalize the status of millions of Mexicans in the United States have stalled.

For their part, law enforcement officials in Texas and Arizona are up in arms about what they say are intrusions into their states by Mexican police and military units, sometimes in league with drug dealers. This week, Senator Jon Kyl, an Arizona Republican, sent a letter to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice demanding an investigation into the alleged incursions, of which he said there had been more than 200 since 1996. American officials were also angered this week when the Mexican government announced that it would distribute maps of the Arizona desert to migrants, showing where water stations and other aid could be found.

The homeland security secretary, Michael Chertoff, strongly condemned the idea, saying it was "a bad idea to encourage migrants to undertake this highly dangerous and ultimately futile effort."

The Mexican National Human Rights Commission said Thursday that it had suspended the program, whose purpose was to reduce deaths from thirst and exhaustion. A record 464 immigrants died crossing the 2,000-mile border last year.

Mexico Suggests GIs Aided Pot Smugglers (AJC)

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, January 27, 2006

MEXICO CITY — Mexico's top diplomat suggested Thursday that American soldiers disguised as Mexican troops may have been in the military-style Humvee filmed earlier this week protecting a marijuana shipment on the border.

Foreign Secretary Luis Ernesto Derbez also told a news conference that U.S. soldiers had helped drug smugglers before. However, he offered no evidence.

The U.S. Embassy in Mexico made no immediate comment on Derbez's claims.

Monday's armed standoff began 50 miles east of El Paso, Texas, when Texas state police tried to stop three sport utility vehicles on Interstate 10. The vehicles made a quick U-turn and headed south toward the border, a few miles away.

Crossing the border, one SUV got stuck in the Rio Grande River, and men in a Humvee tried in vain to tow it out. Then a group of men in civilian clothes began unloading what appeared to be bundles of marijuana and torched the SUV before fleeing.

Mexico insisted Wednesday that the men in military-style uniforms were drug smugglers, not soldiers. In Mexico, kidnappers and drug smugglers regularly wear police gear, which is sold at street stands.

Derbez said Thursday that the men photographed by Texas law enforcement could have been Americans.

"Members of the U.S. Army have helped protect people who were processing and transporting drugs," Derbez said. "And just as that has happened ... it is very probable that something like that could have happened, that in reality they were members of some of their groups disguised as Mexican soldiers with Humvees."

Three U.S. soldiers have pleaded guilty to running a cocaine smuggling ring from a U.S. base in Colombia, and a fourth is being tried in Texas this week.

Derbez said there was no proof that the men seen in the incident were Mexicans.

Derbez also said his country will send a diplomatic note to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice demanding that U.S. officials tone down their comments on Mexico's security and immigration problems.

Mexican Border Incursions Redux: In 1916, Wilson Sent In The Army (WT)

By Robert Stacy Mccain

The Washington Times, January 27, 2006

Reports of armed Mexican outlaws crossing the border to clash with U.S. forces led to demands that the president send troops to protect American lives.

It sounds like a story ripped from this week's headlines, when Texas sheriff's deputies pursued marijuana smugglers protected by machine-gun wielding men in Mexican military uniforms.

So far, the White House is speaking of its "concern about the reports" of Monday's border crossing, which a spokesman described as "an incident that is under investigation." Yet in 1916, when Pancho Villa's bandits raided Columbus, N.M., a Democratic president didn't hesitate.

President Woodrow Wilson sent Gen. John "Black Jack" Pershing to lead an expedition into Mexico. A $5,000 bounty was offered for Villa's capture, and Army posters invoked "The Flag, Old Glory" in calling for 25,000 recruits: "Come on, boys, be ready to shoulder the trusty Springfield."

There are important differences between the border situation that Wilson faced in 1916 and the situation facing President Bush this year, said Philip E. Koerper, professor of history at Jacksonville State University in Alabama.

"Pancho Villa -- it was in the midst of a revolution," he said. "This is just plain old smuggling."

Though he sees no comparison to the 1916 Villa raid, Mr. Koerper said, that doesn't mean the current border situation is not a threat to U.S. security.

"As long as you can have smugglers and refugees both crossing your border illegally, anybody could cross illegally, including al Qaeda," he said.

Concerns about terrorists' crossing the border indicate one parallel between this year and 1916 when, during World War I, many Americans suspected Mexico of harboring German agents and saboteurs. Indeed, an intercepted German message, the infamous "Zimmerman telegram," proposing a German-Mexican alliance helped prompt Wilson to take the United States into war in 1917 -- with its Army commanded by the general who had led the pursuit of Villa.

Yet the historic situation during Villa's day was much different, said James Carafano, a senior fellow at the Heritage Foundation.

"Mexico back then didn't have a strong central government," said Mr. Carafano, who specializes in defense and homeland-security issues. "There was no rule of law. I don't think you can compare that to Mexico today.

"There are security issues on the border ... and there's transnational criminal issues, whether you're talking about drugs or guns or people. But I don't think it's analogous to" 1916.

A brilliant militia commander, Villa played a key role in the 1911 overthrow of the dictatorship of Porfirio Diaz. But in 1915, Wilson sided with Villa's rival Venustiano Carranza -- infuriating Villa, who retaliated against U.S. citizens in Mexico. Sixteen American mining engineers were slain in the Santa Isabel Massacre of January 1916.

Shortly before dawn on March 9, 1916, about 600 of Villa's men swept down on Columbus. They soon were met by about 350 troops of the U.S. 13th Cavalry. Driven back by U.S. machine-gun fire, Villa lost more than 75 men in the raid, which left 17 Americans dead.

As in the current year -- when reports of this week's clash near El Paso focused press attention on a problem that long had concerned border residents -- the press in 1916 reacted sharply to news of the Columbus raid.

The reaction was especially swift in the Los Angeles Times, historian Clayton E. Cramer has noted. Before Villa's New Mexico incursion, the newspaper had described Villa as a "rebel leader." After the Columbus raid, an editorial denounced him as an "outlawed Mexican bandit" and "the vilest kind of ruffian."

DOJ_NMG_0012665

The Wilson administration also acted swiftly. Thousands of U.S. troops poured into Columbus, and Gen. Pershing arrived from Fort Bliss, Texas, to take command.

The Mexican government at first was favorable to the U.S. attack on its enemy, Villa, but Carranza came to resent the U.S. presence, and soon Pershing's troops were fighting both Villa's rebels and regular Mexican troops.

The expedition "was a fiasco," said Old West historian Roger McGrath.

Mexico offered "perfect defensive positions for Pancho Villa -- he knew the country like the back of his hand," Mr. McGrath said. The American campaign "was a logistical nightmare -- no roads, no maps, no water."

Villa eluded capture, and in early 1917 -- as war loomed between the United States and Germany -- Wilson recalled the Army.

Mr. Carafano, the Heritage analyst, said the outcome of Pershing's 11-month expedition points to the problem of deploying the military to deal with the border issue -- as many have called on Mr. Bush to do.

"After the Army left the border [in 1917], the problems came back and continued into the 1920s," he said.

Cleveland Man Who Kept Machine Guns Buried Pleads Guilty (CHATT)

Chattanooga (TN) Chattanoogan, January 27, 2006

A Cleveland, Tn., man who authorities say kept machine guns buried in his yard pleaded guilty Thursday to firearms and meth charges.

Donald Pippenger, 50, appeared before Judge Allan Edgar.

Prosecutor Gary Humble said Bradley County Sheriff officers on Aug. 9, 2004, found working components of a meth lab at Pippenger's home. He said they went back on March 10, 2005, and found he again was outfitted to cook meth.

Pippenger sold a sub-machine gun to an undercover officer on May 11, 2005, the prosecutor said.

He is facing up to 20 years in prison and a fine up to $1 million on the meth cases and up to 10 years and a fine up to $250,000 in the firearms case.

Sentencing is April 19 at 1 p.m.

ATF Agt. Carl Maskew said an informant told him he learned Pippenger was trying to sell guns. The informant went to the Pippenger home at 105 Hughes Road and Pippenger offered to sell him a semi-automatic Uzi. He said Pippenger said he should consider buying a fully automatic Uzi instead. He said Pippenger told him he had several automatic Uzis and an automatic AK-47 that he would sell.

The informant said Pippenger told him he keeps the assault weapons buried because "the law was after him."

He said Pippenger told him about being arrested for meth and said he "was not going to jail and that he was going to sit outside the courthouse, take some poison and while it was taking effect he was going to kill everyone with a bade that he saw, including judges and lawyers."

The informant said Pippenger told him "that if the law came to his house, he was going to barricade himself in his home and shoot as many cops as he could and then poison himself."

The informant said he "became concerned for the safety of the officers and judges and felt that he needed to tell law enforcement about the threats."

Agt. Maskew said on May 11, 2005, that an undercover ATF agent bought three firearms from Pippenger. He said Pippenger said he had to go to another location on Hughes Road and dig up two of the guns at a prior residence. He said Pippenger returned with two machine guns that "were caked with dirt, indicating that they had been buried."

The agent said a check of the guns showed that at least two of them would fire fully automatic and the third "would probably fire two rounds with one pull of the trigger."

Pippenger advised that he had "a truckload" of weapons he could sale.

Federal Grand Jury Indicts Couple On Charges Of Defrauding Museum (AP)

By DYLAN T. LOVAN

AP, January 27, 2006

LOUISVILLE, Ky. - An Alabama man who headed a Louisville historical weapons museum has been charged with bilking the museum's founder out of millions by lying about the cost of some antique firearms.

Michael K. Salisbury, 50, inflated the prices of weapons bought by the museum's founder and primary financial backer, Owsley Brown Frazier, prosecutors said. He was indicted on two counts of money laundering, three counts of wire fraud and four counts of tax evasion.

Salisbury's wife, Karen Cruse Salisbury, 46, faces money laundering and wire fraud charges. The couple, of Huntsville, Ala., were taken into custody Thursday morning in Louisville, Assistant U.S. Attorney Eric Long said.

DOJ_NMG_0012666

The Salisburys pleaded not guilty and were each released on $25,000 bonds, Long said. They were ordered to surrender their passports.

Federal prosecutors estimate that the Salisburys turned a profit of at least $1.75 million from 1997 to 2002 by giving false appraisals of antique weapons to Frazier, a well-known local philanthropist. Some of the markups were twice the value of the original purchase price, prosecutors said.

The indictments, issued on Wednesday, said Frazier started a business deal with Michael Salisbury in which Salisbury would locate and buy antique firearms, report the price to Frazier and then Frazier would pay the purchase price for the item.

Frazier did not respond to a request for an interview on Thursday. He spent millions from his own pocket to found the museum, which opened in 2004.

The indictment alleged that in one instance in 1999, Salisbury bought a pair of Colt Model 1861 revolvers believed to have belonged to Gen. George Custer for $235,000, but told Frazier that the guns were worth $300,000.

Salisbury was named president of the museum's foundation in April 2001 and put in charge of an annual $2.5 million budget, the indictment said. He resigned in September 2002.

Long said Karen Salisbury controlled an account where the fraudulent proceeds were deposited.

The indictments alleged that the Salisburys concealed the profits and failed to report them on their federal taxes.

Michael Salisbury faces a maximum of 95 years in prison and a $2.5 million fine, and Karen Salisbury faces 35 years and a $1 million fine if they are found guilty of all the charges, prosecutors said.

Frazier, a retired vice chairman of liquor giant Brown-Forman Corp., sued the couple along with two antique firearms dealers and a California man in April 2004, making similar allegations of fraud.

The suit said that Frazier met the Salisburys in 1997 and eventually "grew to view them as close personal friends." It was not until 2002 that Frazier and the museum's foundation "began to comprehend the wrongdoing by Salisbury." The suit also named John and Belinda Jones, antique dealers from Virginia and Robert L. Wilson, a San Francisco author.

The indictments alleged Salisbury misrepresented the prices on a Colt revolver that was believed to have belonged to former FBI director J. Edgar Hoover; a Winchester rifle owned by William F. "Buffalo Bill" Cody; and a bow, quiver and six arrows believed to have belonged to the Apache Indian Geronimo.

The 100,000 square-foot museum in downtown Louisville houses several ancient artifacts that detail the history of human conflict. It also houses a collection from the Royal Armouries, Britain's national repository for arms and armor. The Royal Armouries chose the Frazier museum for its first permanent U.S. location to showcase about 300 artifacts that date from 1066 to the early 1900s.

Yuman, Mexican Cop Indicted In Gun Smuggling (YUMAS)

By Jeffrey Gautreaux

Yuma (AZ) Sun, January 26, 2006

Jan. 26--A Mexican police officer and a Yuma man have been federally indicted for allegedly attempting to cross the border with three weapons purchased at a Yuma gun show.

Omar Ignacio Alvarez, 20, of Yuma assisted Pedro Rios-Perez, 41, an officer for the Baja California State Police, in buying two handguns and an assault rifle Jan. 7 at a gun show at the Yuma County Fairgrounds, according to the indictment and a criminal complaint filed in U.S. District Court in Phoenix. The two allegedly attempted to drive the guns into Mexico in a police vehicle.

The arrests are part of an overall increase in enforcement by the federal government in cooperation with local agencies to curb weapons trafficking in this area, according to Tom Mangan, special agent for the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives (ATF).

"We recognize Yuma as being a firearms source for guns going to Mexico," Mangan said. "Arizona is a source state for firearms to Mexico."

With strict firearms laws in Mexico, buying weapons in the United States and smuggling them south has been a longtime practice. Mangan said people from Mexico involved in narcotics and other crime have been coming to Yuma retailers to purchase weapons or having them bought for them through straw purchases.

During Murphy's Gun Show in Yuma, agents from ATF and Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) were conducting surveillance and saw Rios-Perez and Alvarez purchase the weapons, according to the complaint. Alvarez worked as a translator and, in one instance, a buyer, the complaint said.

The two were followed to the Andrade Port of Entry where they were detained and interviewed. Both were later arrested. The complaint charges each with alien in possession of firearms and exportation of munitions without a license.

DOJ_NMG_0012667

Alvarez has since been released on a personal recognizance bond, but Rios-Perez remains in jail. Each could face up to five years in prison, according to Mangan.

"As a police officer, (Rios-Perez) should be well aware of firearms laws," Mangan said.

According to Mangan, Rios-Perez told investigators that the weapons were bought for his personal use and he was simply bringing them home. Mangan did not comment on whether Rios-Perez may have been making the purchases to funnel them to people in Mexico.

"We're looking into that," he said.

According to the complaint and indictment, federal agents observed the two men leave the gun show carrying a small backpack and an AR-15 assault rifle. They got into a red truck with Mexican license plates and a Mexican Police logo on the side.

The two were observed placing a cover over the police logo to obscure it from view. Agents followed the truck to Sprague's Sports, where the two purchased leg irons. They then drove to a fast food restaurant and then to a home in Yuma, according to the complaint.

While the vehicle was parked near the house, the hood of the truck was opened and activity could be seen occurring near the front of the vehicle, the complaint said.

After closing the hood, the men got into the vehicle and left the residence. The truck was followed to the U.S. Port of Entry at Andrade where it was stopped. Rios-Perez identified himself as a Mexican national and a police officer.

A search revealed the two Smith and Wesson 9mm handguns and the assault rifle. "The ammunition and handguns were hidden in the truck's air filter and the rifle was hidden behind the truck's front seat," the indictment said. The complaint said the two spent about $1,700 making the purchases.

The Mexican law enforcement decals on the vehicle were covered up because officials on the Mexican side would want to know why a police vehicle from Baja California was crossing at that location, according to the complaint.

Mangan, who is based in Phoenix, did not comment on how Alvarez and Rios-Perez may have become connected with each other.

Gun-Toting Delegate Misfires In Richmond (WP)

By Chris L. Jenkins And Rosalind S. Helderman

The Washington Post, January 27, 2006

RICHMOND, Jan. 26 -- Del. John S. "Jack" Reid had gone through this morning routine dozens of times. He'd reach into his pocket, pull out his small semiautomatic .380 handgun, release the clip and store the weapon safely in the desk drawer of his office on the seventh floor of the Virginia General Assembly Building.

But something went wrong Thursday. Reid's pistol, which he said he carries for protection, fired as he popped the clip from the handle, sending a single bullet into the cushion of a bulletproof vest that was hanging from the back of his closed office door.

No one was injured, although Reid said he suffered a laceration on his hand from the friction of the gun's slide snapping back.

The incident prompted an unexpected debate about gun control and also something uncommon in Virginia political circles: contrition from a state legislator. Reid, a Henrico County Republican, rose from his seat on the floor of the House of Delegates, asked to be heard, explained what had happened and said: "I want to apologize to the members of this body and to the greater body. . . . I'm just thankful that nobody was hurt."

Even a few hours after the incident, Reid -- a 16-year veteran and one of the House of Delegates' most popular and free-spirited members -- was at a loss to explain how an experienced gun owner found himself discharging a firearm during one of the busiest parts of the business day at the state Capitol complex.

"If you asked me if I ever put a finger on a trigger when I wasn't at the shooting range, I'd say no," Reid said at a news conference after his apology. "Whether that's what happened, I can't tell you. I really don't know."

The incident immediately reopened the debate among lawmakers and lobbyists about whether firearms should be allowed at the Capitol, a discussion that has been held for several years. Although Maryland law generally prohibits the carrying of unconcealed or concealed firearms in government buildings, including the State House, anyone in Virginia until recently could carry firearms openly into the legislators' office building and the nearby Capitol.

Then, last year, a committee of delegates and senators passed a rule requiring residents to have a concealed weapon permit to bring a firearm into the complex, even if the gun is carried openly. Some senators proposed barring guns from the buildings altogether. But many gun rights groups opposed the move.

Several lawmakers said they were stunned to find out that Reid carried a gun and even more surprised to hear that it had gone off in the busy building.

"He had no business bringing it into the General Assembly," said Senate Minority Leader Richard L. Saslaw (D-Fairfax), a supporter of gun control laws. "I think guns should be banned for all these government buildings."

But others said the freedom to carry a firearm responsibly was a necessity.

"Richmond is a dangerous place," said Del. Charles W. Carrico Sr. (R-Grayson), a former state trooper who spent a year as an undercover police officer in Richmond and carries his gun in the lawmakers' office building. "I carry to protect myself and my family."

Reid, a school administrator in Chesterfield County, said he has a valid permit to carry a concealed weapon and regularly brings his gun to the legislative session to protect himself. He is the sponsor of several controversial bills this year, including efforts to crack down on illegal immigration. But he said he usually ejects the cartridge and carries the bullets in his pocket.

"All of us occasionally get some phone calls that concern us, so during the session I have been carrying it," Reid said. He has had a permit to carry a concealed weapon for two years and has one other gun.

The Henrico County sheriff gave him the bulletproof vest several years ago "as a joke," he said.

Word of the incident spread quickly through the gossipy galaxy of Richmond lawmakers, lobbyists, advocates and reporters. According to one lobbyist, a list was going around with key words that should not be said in front of the General Laws Committee, which Reid chairs. Example: Take your best shot.

Others, including Gov. Timothy M. Kaine (D), couldn't help but rib Reid by marveling at what appeared to be the freak coincidence of the single round striking Reid's bulletproof vest.

"It was good if he was shooting at that coat rack and that it was wearing a bulletproof vest," Kaine said.

But Reid, who is known for a biting sense of humor, appeared humbled by the experience.

"It's at least causing me to evaluate myself," said Reid, 63. "I'm just thankful this turned out as it did."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

2 More Democrats Say They'll Back Alito (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely

USA Today, January 27, 2006

WASHINGTON — Two more Democratic senators, Robert Byrd of West Virginia and Tim Johnson of South Dakota, said Thursday that they will vote in favor of Supreme Court nominee Samuel Alito.

Byrd and Johnson join Sen. Ben Nelson of Nebraska as Alito's only announced Democratic supporters. All three are from states won by President Bush in 2004. “Like most of my constituents, I prefer conservative judges,” Byrd said.

The Senate is likely to confirm Alito on Tuesday by a narrower margin than Bush's first Supreme Court pick, John Roberts, who was confirmed, 78-22, as chief justice. All but four of the Senate's 55 Republicans have said they will vote for Alito, a federal appeals court judge. Republicans Olympia Snowe and Susan Collins of Maine, Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island and Ted Stevens of Alaska have not announced how they will vote.

Massachusetts Democrats Edward Kennedy and John Kerry called for a filibuster, a parliamentary tactic to block a vote that requires support from at least 40 senators. But Sen. Dick Durbin of Illinois, the deputy Democratic leader, said opponents of Alito's confirmation would not succeed in a filibuster. Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., told a group of constituents that some Democrats who oppose Alito would also oppose a filibuster. “There are a number of Democratic senators who believe it's one thing to vote no but it's another thing to prevent the vote from coming up,” he said.

Democrats Blanche Lincoln of Arkansas, Daniel Inouye of Hawaii and Joe Lieberman of Connecticut, who were previously undecided, said Thursday that they will vote against Alito.

Lieberman Against Alito Confirmation (HARTC)

By david lightman

The Hartford Courant, January 27, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman, D-Conn., saying he was "left with just too many doubts," announced today he will vote against confirming Judge Samuel A. Alito Jr. to the U.S. Supreme Court.

DOJ_NMG_0012669

Lieberman became the 29th Democrat to announce his opposition to President Bush's nominee. But because 52 Republicans and three Democrats, including Nebraska Sen. Ben Nelson, West Virginia Sen. Robert Byrd and South Dakota Sen. Tim Johnson, have said they will back Alito, his confirmation is assured.

Lieberman, who joins the state's senior senator, Sen. Christopher J. Dodd, D-Conn., in opposition, said in a Senate floor speech that he was disturbed by Alito's record on privacy and civil rights issues.

"When asked at confirmation hearings about questions of personal privacy, Judge Alito accepted the 1965 decision in the [Griswold v. Connecticut] case as settled law," Lieberman said. That Supreme Court case overturned a state law barring married couples from using contraception, and was important for focusing on the right of married couples' privacy. Privacy became crucial in later cases, notably the 1973 Roe v. Wade case, which established a woman's right to an abortion.

But, Lieberman said today, "When asked over and over again" about Roe, Alito refused during his hearing to call that case settled law.

"I personally believe Roe achieved a … balance of rights and reflected a societal consensus that has continued and deepened in our country for more than three decades," Lieberman said. "I was left with serious concerns that Judge Alito would not uphold the basic tenets of Roe, and that is a very troubling conclusion."

In September, Lieberman and Dodd both voted for Bush's other Supreme Court choice, Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr.

Lieberman explained that Alito met three of the four tests he applies before judging a nominee. Alilto has "shown he is a person of considerable intellect and ability," the senator said, and had an impressive legal background. And Lieberman had no doubts about his character -- "I thought he emerged with his honesty and integrity intact," he said.

But on the fourth standard, judicial philosophy, Lieberman thought Alito's record raised concerns.

"This is not about a single issue," the senator said, "but an accumulation of his opinions that leads me to a preponderance of doubts."

On civil rights, for instance, Lieberman was concerned that Alito too often barred legal remedies for people who thought they had been hurt by discriminatory practices. He looked at the hundreds of opinions Alito has written as a federal judge, and "together these opinions leave me with profound doubts about whether Judge Alito would protect and advance the special role" that the nation's founders gave it -- to judge issues "freed forever from political passions."

Senate Showdown Vote On Alito Set For Next Week (REU)

Reuters, January 27, 2006

WASHINGTON (Reuters) - Two more Senate Democrats broke ranks on Thursday and said they would vote to confirm Samuel Alito to the U.S. Supreme Court -- while two others made an all-but-certain futile bid to stop President George W. Bush's conservative nominee with a filibuster.

Alito, 55, a federal appeals court judge since 1990, appears headed for confirmation by the full Republican-led 100-member Senate early next week on a mostly party-line vote.

If approved, Alito would replace retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, a moderate conservative, and could move the nine-member court to the right on abortion, civil rights and other social issues.

Near the close of a second day of debate, Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, a Tennessee Republican, moved to force a confirmation vote on Tuesday. A test vote on ending debate is set for Monday, and a number of Democrats conceded they probably cannot stop Frist from mustering the needed 60 votes to do so. There are 44 Senate Democrats.

Sen. Edward Kennedy said he and fellow Democrat John Kerry, both of Massachusetts, were taking the lead in pushing for a filibuster, a procedural roadblock that permits for unlimited debate to stop a nominee.

"It's a battle, but it's achievable," Kennedy told reporters.

However about a half-dozen moderate Democrats, including some opposed to Alito, have said they would not support a filibuster. And assistant Senate Democratic leader Dick Durbin of Illinois said: "I've come to the conclusion that it is highly unlikely that a filibuster would succeed."

Earlier on Thursday, Democratic Sens. Robert Byrd of West Virginia and Tim Johnson of South Dakota declared their support of Alito. They joined Democrat Ben Nelson of Nebraska, who had announced last week that he would vote for him.

Byrd, Johnson and Nelson represent states that voted for Bush, who promised in his campaign to nominate conservatives to the nation's highest court.

Democratic critics have argued that Alito poses a threat on such fronts as civil rights and abortion, and would not be an effective check on presidential powers.

Byrd said that no one could know exactly what kind of justice Alito would prove to be.

DOJ_NMG_0012670

"But my considered judgment from his record, from his answers to my questions, and from his obvious intelligence and sincerity, leads me to believe him to be an honorable man, who loves his country, loves his Constitution and will give of his best," Byrd said. "Can we really ask for more?"

NOT A RADICAL

Johnson said while he had concerns about Alito's "narrow interpretation" of certain civil rights laws, "I cannot accept an argument that his views are so radical that the Senate is justified in denying his confirmation."

At a White House news conference, Bush urged the Senate to wrap up its debate as soon as possible and confirm Alito.

"He understands that the role of a judge is to interpret the law," Bush said. "He understands the role of a judge is not to advance a personal or political agenda."

Kennedy said, "This is a vote of a generation and a test of conscience. Judge Alito does not share the values of equality and justice that make this country strong. He does not deserve a place on the highest court of the land."

The Senate confirmation vote on Alito is expected to be far closer than the 78-22 for John Roberts, Bush's first nomination to the high court.

Alito Supported By Two More Democrats (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, January 27, 2006

Federal Judge Samuel A. Alito Jr. picked up two more Democratic endorsements yesterday, guaranteeing that he will be confirmed as the 110th associate justice of the U.S. Supreme Court next week.

Democratic Sens. Robert C. Byrd of West Virginia and Tim Johnson of South Dakota said they will support the nomination, even as Sen. John Kerry of Massachusetts phoned in for a filibuster from the Swiss Alps.

Mr. Kerry made calls yesterday while attending the World Economic Forum in Davos, Switzerland, urging colleagues to join a last-ditch effort to thwart Judge Alito's confirmation. Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat, joined in Mr. Kerry's call for a filibuster.

Republicans -- eager to relive the days during the 2004 presidential campaign when they called Mr. Kerry "an international man of mystery" -- delighted in his choice of venue.

"He shouldn't be wasting taxpayers' hard-earned money on long-distance phone charges calling for such obstruction," said Sen. George Allen, Virginia Republican.

"I hope it doesn't interrupt his snowboarding plans," added Joseph Cella, president of the conservative Catholic group Fidelis. He noted that American voters support Judge Alito's confirmation by a nearly 2-to-1 margin.

"While I'm sure Senator Kerry feels right at home at the plush resort, he has only further marginalized himself as a very liberal senator who is completely out of touch with middle American values," Mr. Cella said.

The effort comes after the New York Times yesterday called for a filibuster in an editorial titled "Senators in Need of a Spine." It also came shortly after the National Abortion Federation called for a filibuster.

Mr. Kennedy said he thinks Minority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada, Minority Whip Richard J. Durbin of Illinois and Sen. Debbie Stabenow of Michigan will join the filibuster effort. That vote will take place Monday. If Republicans round up 60 votes -- which many Democrats concede will happen -- it will be followed by a final vote on confirmation on Tuesday.

Mr. Reid said earlier on the Senate floor, however, that more debate time -- the primary reason for filibusters -- would not be needed.

"No one can complain on this matter that there hasn't been sufficient time to talk about Judge Alito, pro or con," he said.

No matter how Mr. Reid votes, there won't be enough Democrats to block the nomination. The 55 Senate Republicans already had at least five Democrats joining them in opposition to a filibuster, and got three more yesterday.

Mr. Johnson was joined by Sens. Ken Salazar of Colorado and Mary L. Landrieu of Louisiana in opposing a filibuster, though Mr. Salazar and Mrs. Landrieu said they will vote against Judge Alito's confirmation.

Mr. Byrd, who drew a Republican challenger this week in his Republican-leaning state, delivered a stinging rebuke of his colleagues for the treatment of Judge Alito during the hearing.

"Was it really necessary to subject Mrs. Alito to the harsh glare of television klieg lights as she fled the hearing room in tears, fighting to maintain her dignity in response to others with precious little of their own?" he asked on the Senate floor.

Mr. Johnson, whose state President Bush won with 60 percent of the vote in 2004, said Judge Alito would not have been his pick for the Supreme Court.

"Nonetheless, I must conclude that Judge Alito possesses a high level of legal skill, is a man of solid personal integrity, and that his views fall within the mainstream of contemporary conservative jurisprudential thinking," he said.

Kerry Urges Alito Filibuster, But His Reception Is Cool (NYT)

By David D. Kirkpatrick

The New York Times, January 27, 2006

WASHINGTON, Jan 26 — Senator John Kerry of Massachusetts could not attend the Senate debate on the Supreme Court nomination of Judge Samuel A. Alito Jr. on Thursday. He was in Davos, Switzerland, mingling with international business and political leaders at the World Economic Forum.

But late Thursday afternoon, Mr. Kerry began calling fellow Democratic senators in a quixotic, last-minute effort for a filibuster to stop the nomination.

Democrats cringed and Republicans jeered at the awkwardness of his gesture, which almost no one in the Senate expects to succeed.

"God bless John Kerry," said Don Stewart, a spokesman for Senator John Cornyn, a Texas Republican on the Judiciary Committee. "He just cinched this whole nomination. With Senator Kerry, it is Christmas every day."

Steve Schmidt, a White House spokesman working on the nomination, said Mr. Kerry's move "says a lot less about Alito than it does about the Iowa primary in 2008," suggesting that Mr. Kerry, who lost the presidential race in 2004, was playing to his party's liberal base in a bid to recapture its nomination.

Senator Harry Reid, the Democratic leader, sounded almost apologetic about Mr. Kerry's statements.

"No one can complain on this matter that there hasn't been sufficient time to talk about Judge Alito, pro and con," Mr. Reid said on the Senate floor. "I hope that this matter will be resolved without too much more talking."

Mr. Kerry's call for a filibuster, an effort to stop confirmation by refusing to close debate and hold a vote, was joined by his fellow Democratic senator from Massachusetts, Edward M. Kennedy.

Under Senate procedures, their objections blocked the Senate Democratic and Republican leaders from setting Tuesday as the date for a vote on confirmation.

Instead, the Senate will vote Monday on whether to close debate. Sixty votes are required for a full Senate vote on Judge Alito. More than 60 senators have already pledged to support him, and the leaders of both parties said they expected to hold the full vote on Tuesday.

Mr. Kerry offered an explanation for his position in a post on a liberal blog, the Daily Kos.

"People can say all they want that 'elections have consequences,' " he wrote. "Trust me, more than anyone I understand that. But that seems like an awfully convoluted rationale for me to stay silent about Judge Alito's nomination."

Mr. Kerry was celebrated by leaders of the coalition of liberal groups opposing Judge Alito's nomination.

"Senator John Kerry has called for a filibuster of the Alito nomination, heeding your calls to do everything possible to defeat it," People for the American Way cheered in an e-mail message to its supporters.

Mr. Kennedy said a filibuster might help focus attention on the nomination and give its opponents a last chance to sway the public and the Senate.

He acknowledged some "divisions in the caucus" over the advisability of a filibuster, but he said the effort had the support of a few others, including Senator Richard J. Durbin of Illinois, the Democratic whip.

A spokesman for Mr. Durbin confirmed that he would vote against closing debate.

"It is an uphill climb at this point," Mr. Kennedy said of a filibuster. "But it is achievable."

Asked if Mr. Kerry's absence from the Senate would hinder their efforts, Mr. Kennedy said, "We'll do the best we can and make a good fight of it."

Mr. Kerry has been rallying his supporters against the nomination for weeks in mass e-mail messages and on his Web site.

And when the Democratic caucus met Wednesday to discuss the nomination, he gave an impassioned plea that the party should try to stage a filibuster even if it failed, people present said, speaking only if granted anonymity because the meeting was private. Some senators at the meeting said an unsuccessful filibuster would leave the party weakened for future battles.

Some said a messy and unsuccessful filibuster fight would distract from the Democratic focus on other issues like corruption in government and wiretapping by the Bush administration.

In the end the party leaders were not persuaded by Mr. Kerry's appeal.

Judge Alito's confirmation was looking increasingly certain Thursday. Two more Democrats, Senator Tim Johnson of South Dakota and Senator Robert C. Byrd of West Virginia, said they would break party ranks to vote for confirmation.

Mr. Byrd said his constituents had told him they were "appalled" by the harsh questioning Judge Alito received from the Senate Judiciary Committee at his confirmation hearings, calling them "an outrage and a disgrace."

DOJ_NMG_0012672

With Senator Ben Nelson of Nebraska, Mr. Johnson and Mr. Byrd bring the number of Democrats pledging support for Judge Alito to three. The vote on confirmation is expected to hew closely to party lines. No Republicans have said they will vote against him.

Two Republican supporters of abortion rights, Senators Olympia J. Snowe of Maine and Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island, have not declared how they will vote.

Shortly after 7 p.m., Mr. Kerry issued a statement saying, "Judge Alito's confirmation would be an ideological coup on the Supreme Court."

"The president has every right to nominate Samuel Alito to the Supreme Court," Mr. Kerry said. "It's our right and our responsibility to oppose him vigorously."

A few moments later, April Boyd, a spokeswoman for Mr. Kerry, sent a postscript saying that "as things played out over the course of the day today" he had decided to fly home. "Kerry will be back in Washington tomorrow," Ms. Boyd said.

Senate GOP Seeks To Force Vote On Alito (KCS)

By Jesse J. Holland

The Kansas City Star, January 27, 2006

WASHINGTON - Die-hard Democratic critics of Supreme Court nominee Samuel Alito threatened on Thursday to block a vote on his confirmation, and Republicans countered with a move designed to force his approval by early next week.

"It is time to establish an end point" in the debate over President Bush's selection to replace Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, said Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., said he and other Democrats had refused to agree to a timetable for ending debate. "There's some division in our caucus," he conceded.

"There's been adequate time for people to debate," Reid said.

Alito, 55 and a 15-year veteran of the federal appeals court, has well over 50 votes for confirmation. He gained the support of Democrats Tim Johnson of South Dakota and Robert C. Byrd of West Virginia during the day, and has the backing of at least 52 of the Senate's 55 Republicans.

The Senate will vote Monday on cutting off debate. If Alito's supporters get 60 votes in the 100-member body, the confirmation vote will follow on Tuesday.

"The president has every right to nominate Samuel Alito to the Supreme Court," Kerry said. "Its our right and our responsibility to oppose him vigorously and to fight against this radical upending of the Supreme Court."

White House spokesman Stephen Schmidt predicted the Republicans would easily win. "More than 60 senators have signaled their intentions to vote against the filibuster and give Judge Alito the up-or-down vote that he deserves," he said.

Frist said he had been unable to win a commitment from all senators on a time for a final vote. Instead, he set the stage for cutting off debate Monday with what is known as a cloture vote.

Democrats' concern over Alito's nomination has been heightened because he would replace O'Connor, who has been the swing vote on 5-4 rulings that maintained abortion rights, preserved affirmative action and limited the application of the death penalty.

Conservatives agree that Alito could push the court to the right, but they welcome the prospect.

Kennedy said, "The nominee is deficient in his commitment ... to individual rights, individual liberties, women's rights and racial equality."

The senator conceded he faced an "uphill climb" in the effort to block confirmation but said it was possible.

Asked to name other Democrats siding with him, he cited Dick Durbin of Illinois, the second-ranking Senate Democrat, as well as Paul Sarbanes of Maryland and Debbie Stabenow of Michigan.

Patrick Leahy of Vermont, the senior Democrat on the Judiciary Committee, opposes Alito's confirmation but has not yet decided whether to support the filibuster, an aide said.

Alito "understands the role of a judge is not to advance a personal and political agenda," Bush said at the White House. "He is a decent man."

Democrats contended anew that Alito's confirmation would put individual rights and liberties in danger. Dianne Feinstein of California, the only woman on the Senate Judiciary Committee, said he would join justices Clarence Thomas and Antonin Scalia in the court's conservative wing and apply "originalist" interpretations to court decisions.

DOJ_NMG_0012673

"If an originalist analysis was applied to the Fourteenth Amendment, women would not be provided equal protection under the Constitution, interracial marriages could be outlawed, schools could still be segregated and the principle of one man, one vote would not govern the way we elect our representatives," Feinstein said.

Nelson, Byrd and Johnson are the only Democrats to express support for Alito so far.

Democrats Split Over Filibuster On Alito (WP)

By Charles Babington

The Washington Post, January 27, 2006

Several prominent Democratic senators called for a filibuster of Samuel A. Alito Jr.'s Supreme Court nomination yesterday, exposing a deep divide in the party even as they delighted the party's liberal base.

The filibuster's supporters -- including Sens. John F. Kerry and Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts -- acknowledged that the bid is likely to fail and that Alito is virtually certain to be confirmed Tuesday. But they said extended debate may draw more Americans' attention to Alito's conservative stands on abortion, civil rights, presidential powers and other matters.

"Judge Alito will take America backward, especially when it comes to civil rights and discrimination laws," Kerry said in a statement issued by his office. He added: "It's our right and our responsibility to oppose him vigorously and to fight against this radical upending of the Supreme Court."

Kennedy said that Alito, 55, "does not share the values of equality and justice that make this country strong," adding: "He does not deserve a place on the highest court of the land."

Liberal groups such as People for the American Way have implored Democratic senators to filibuster Alito's nomination, even if it means nothing more than staking their principles and showing that Democrats will fight against a party that controls the House, Senate and White House. But many Republicans have relished the idea of a Democratic-led filibuster, saying it helps them portray the minority party as obstructionist and beholden to left-leaning groups.

"Continuing to threaten a filibuster, even after it is crystal clear that Democrats don't have the necessary votes to sustain their obstruction, is needless, strange and at odds with many of their fellow Democrats," Sen. John Cornyn (R-Tex.) said in a statement. Some Republicans poked fun at Kerry -- the 2004 Democratic presidential nominee, who may make another White House bid -- for allowing others to announce the filibuster plan earlier in the day while he was attending an economic conference in Davos, Switzerland.

A filibuster involves endless debate intended to keep a measure -- such as a judicial nomination -- from reaching a vote. Sixty votes in the 100-member Senate are needed to end a filibuster. Republicans hold 55 seats, and enough Democratic senators will join them to end debate and hold a vote next week with votes to spare, Alito supporters said. If Alito supporters failed to get the 60 votes, a filibuster officially would begin and debate would continue.

Bitter disputes over judicial filibusters nearly brought the Senate to a standstill last year. After Democrats used the stalling tactic to block several of President Bush's appellate court nominees, Republicans threatened to change Senate rules to ban judicial filibusters. A bipartisan accord, which excluded both parties' leaders, averted the showdown and made a successful filibuster effort considerably more difficult. GOP leaders say they will revive their "nuclear option" threat if a Democratic filibuster endangers confirmation of a Bush nominee.

Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) said the Senate will vote Monday afternoon to end debate and vote Tuesday morning on whether to confirm Alito to succeed retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. At least three Democratic senators -- Ben Nelson (Neb.), Robert C. Byrd Jr. (W.Va.) and Tim Johnson (S.D.) -- have said they will vote for Alito. Others have said they would not support a filibuster, regardless how they vote on confirmation.

Senate Democratic Leader Harry M. Reid (Nev.) repeatedly told colleagues this week that he wanted to avoid a filibuster, party members said. He looked frustrated in the Senate chamber yesterday as he told Frist he could not avert the parliamentary tactic. Shrugging his shoulders, Reid said he hoped "this matter will be resolved without too much more talking, but . . . everyone has the right to talk."

Party sources said Reid and others worry that a filibuster, while likely to fail, will nonetheless detract voters' attention from issues that Democratic leaders consider more promising. They include Bush's controversial domestic surveillance program, the indictments of a top White House official and a congressional leader, and the unfolding scandal centered on former lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

DOJ_NMG_0012674

Party leaders especially worry about forcing a filibuster decision on Democrats seeking reelection this fall in GOP-leaning states, including Nelson and Kent Conrad (N.D.).

While Reid hoped to avoid a filibuster, Democratic Whip Richard J. Durbin (Ill.) supports it. But at a midday session with reporters, Durbin acknowledged the likely futility.

"Having made a count," he said, "I have come to the conclusion it is highly unlikely that a filibuster would succeed."

Bring It On (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 27, 2006

According to CNN, Senator John Kerry announced yesterday that he will attempt to rally his fellow Democrats to stage a filibuster to stop the confirmation of Samuel Alito to the Supreme Court. Apparently, this is not a parody.

Mr. Kerry made this dramatic political intervention from the World Economic Forum in Davos, Switzerland, where he was communing with his political base. He wants his Democratic colleagues to revisit the filibuster strategy that they used to such brilliant effect during President Bush's first term. Republicans assailed Democrats for this obstructionism in 2002 and 2004, and the issue helped them win a mere seven or eight seats in red states.

And this was after filibusters on obscure appellate nominees. Imagine the political gain for Republicans after a Supreme Court filibuster -- with all of its 24/7 publicity -- by blue-state liberals against a modest Italian-American with impeccable legal credentials and stainless ethics. Mr. Kerry really seems to believe that the country will rise up in fury when it discovers that Judge Alito believes that the Constitution gives a President wide powers to defend America.

Back on planet Earth, at least three red-state Democrats have now said they'll vote for Judge Alito. Two of them -- Robert Byrd of West Virginia and Ben Nelson of Nebraska -- happen to be up for re-election this year. Mr. Kerry may not care much about the Senate because his real goal is winning the Democratic nomination for President again in 2008. Republicans should be so lucky.

Bush To Embrace A 'competitiveness' Agenda (FT)

By Caroline Daniel And Edward Alden In Washington

Financial Times, January 27, 2006

George W. Bush, US president, is to embrace a "competitiveness" agenda advocated by big US technology companies in his State of the Union address next week.

Amid growing concerns that the US is lagging behind in cutting-edge research and has fallen behind China and India in training science and technology graduates, he is expected to highlight the need for measures to improve US industry's competitiveness.

In a press conference in Washington on Thursday, Mr Bush said: "We live in a competitive world, and so policies must be put in place to recognise the competition of the global economy and prepare our people to be able to continue to compete so America can continue to lead."

Business groups have been urging the administration to support higher spending on research and development, expanded education in science and engineering and liberalised immigration laws to bring more foreign scientists and engineers to the US.

The issue is one on which the White House could benefit from bipartisan co-operation.

Three Democrats and one Republican senator introduced bills on Wednesday to implement the recommendations of a National Academy of Sciences report last year.

It warned that America's competitive edge was eroding, and the bills call for $9bn (€7.4bn) in new spending, including a doubling of the funding available for basic research, scholarships for future mathematics and science teachers and reform of US visa laws that deter foreign students.

Bruce Josten, executive vice-president at the US Chamber of Commerce, said he expected the president to address the competitiveness issue in Tuesday's state of the union address, and played down the impact on the budget at a time when the White House wants to rein in domestic spending. "When you are talking about a budget for 2007 of $2,400bn, I don't want to sound crass, but $9bn is a rounding error."

Top US executives – including Ed Zander at Motorola and Jeffrey Immelt, chief executive of General Electric – have focused on the issue of US competitiveness in recent speeches.

Last week, Mr Immelt told the Economic Club of Washington, "If you want good manufacturing jobs, one thing you could do is graduate more engineers. We had more sports exercise majors graduate than electrical engineering graduates last year. If you want to be the massage capital of the world, you're well on your way."

DOJ_NMG_0012675

At the instigation of US technology and manufacturing companies, the commerce department hosted a national summit on competitiveness last month, attended not just by business and university leaders but also by four cabinet secretaries as well as business and university leaders.

In the closing statement, summit participants warned: “If trends in US research and education continue, our nation will squander its economic leadership, and the result will be a lower standard of living for the American people.”

Tight Budget Limits Bush's Options (WSJ)

By John Harwood

The Wall Street Journal, January 27, 2006

BUSH PLANS emphasis on broad themes as red ink thins policy options.

Advisers say budget squeeze will curb initiatives in Tuesday's State of the Union. Bush's track record suggests little polling benefit; his ratings dropped after two of four earlier addresses.

Historians shrug; a ranking of top 100 American speeches in 20th century includes just one State of the Union, Franklin Roosevelt's Four Freedoms speech. Many tune in to see guests sitting with first lady, says University of Wisconsin professor Stephen Lucas.

"Like watching the Super Bowl for the advertisements," he notes.

DEFICIT REDUCTION TOPS congressional agenda.

White House and Republican leaders hope to reassemble narrow 2005 majority for budget bill; Senate Democrats used procedural maneuver to force repeat vote. House Republicans also plan to pass one-month Patriot Act extension before turning to election of DeLay's successor.

Senate Leader Frist wants confirmations by Wednesday of Alito to Supreme Court and Bernanke to Federal Reserve. Senate also will begin resolving tax-cut difference with House. Though strategist Rove rips Democrats on national security, Bush says in Wall Street Journal interview he'll be "calling upon the better nature of those of us in Washington" toward bipartisan compromises.

PARTIES BATTLE TO define 2006 playing field.

With most partisan outcomes predictable due to election district gerrymandering, Democratic hopes of regaining House majority depend on expanding number of competitive seats. House Democrats, who need net gain of 15, say outcome remains in doubt in as many as 50 districts.

"Maybe 30 at most," responds Carl Forti of House Republicans' campaign committee. Nonpartisan analyst Stu Rothenberg says 42 seats, three-fourths held by Republicans, are "in play." In paper for National Bureau of Economic Research, Yale's Ebonya Washington finds African-American Democratic nominees boost general election turnout by two to three percentage points among blacks and whites alike.

OPEN SPIGOT: Money pours into both parties despite scandal headlines. By outraising Democrats $102 million to $51 million last year, Republican National Committee regains traditional edge lost during 2004 campaign. Dean dents DNC's bottom line by paying for new staffers hired by state parties. ImpeachPAC, backing Democrats committed to forcing Bush from office, raises $47,000 in first two months.

COLD WAR RESTRICTIONS will fall if Bush administration persuades Congress to clear the way for Russia's entry into World Trade Organization. But some conservatives, questioning Putin's commitment to democracy and free-market forces, still resist. Trade Representative Portman also seeks election-year WTO membership for Ukraine, Vietnam and Kazakhstan.

PRIORITY SHIFT: Hamas victory in Palestinian elections alters Rice's coming London talks with foreign ministers of Russia, France, Britain, China and Germany. The secretary of state wants allies in Europe -- major donors of aid to Palestinians -- to join in demanding that Hamas renounce terror tactics.

But the White House, which earlier chided Comey as too much of a stickler, turned to him as liaison with New York Times in trying to head off disclosure of the program in 2004 and 2005. Bush has said the leak "damages our national security," but declined in the interview to say how.

"A relevant question," Bush said, but "I'm not going to answer it."

Speech Protesters Granted Spot (WP)

By Karlyn Barker

The Washington Post, January 27, 2006

Organizers of a planned protest during President Bush's State of the Union address next week reached an agreement yesterday with law enforcement officials and will now be allowed to use the area around the U.S. Capitol Reflecting Pool for their demonstration.

The demonstrators had initially been offered the Reflecting Pool area on the west side of the Capitol as a protest site but then were told that the site had been reclassified as part of the security perimeter for the day of Bush's speech.

Organizers of the Tuesday protest, called "World Can't Wait -- Drive Out the Bush Regime," filed a federal lawsuit Wednesday seeking a court order to let them hold the gathering at the Reflecting Pool. They met yesterday with police and government representatives to resolve the issue.

"The Capitol Police reassessed its security concerns regarding the area around the Capitol Reflecting Pool and withdrew its request to the U.S. Park Service to close that area during President Bush's State of the Union address," said Channing Phillips, a spokesman for the U.S. attorney's office, which participated in discussions to settle the dispute.

Phillips said the nearby grassy areas on the Capitol grounds are fenced off because of turf renovation. But he said the amended permit, which will be issued by the National Park Service, will be sufficient for the group's needs.

James R. Klimaski, an attorney for the demonstrators, said the lawsuit will be withdrawn as soon as the group receives the amended permit. A hearing was held before U.S. District Judge Ricardo M. Urbina yesterday to tell him that the matter had been resolved.

The protest group said it was told Jan. 10 that it could use the area around the Capitol Reflecting Pool for a demonstration timed to coincide with Bush's 9 p.m. address to Congress. But on Jan. 19, organizers were told that the U.S. Capitol Police had expanded the security area to include the Reflecting Pool and that they would have to confine the demonstration to the gravel walkways between Third and Fourth streets on the Mall. The other option was to gather at Seventh Street, about a mile from the Capitol.

"A protest not seen and a protest not heard is not a protest," said Travis Morales, one of the organizers of the demonstration, who accused the Bush administration of trying to keep demonstrators far from the Capitol. He said yesterday that the Reflecting Pool area "will hold thousands more people" than the gravel walkways.

Sgt. Kimberly Schneider, a spokeswoman for the U.S. Capitol Police, gave no explanation yesterday for the change of position. The department, she said, "constantly re-evaluates security requirements leading up to large events."

L.A. Mayor, Key Democrats Discuss Reply To Bush's Address (LAT)

By Patrick Mcgreevy

The Los Angeles Times, January 27, 2006

WASHINGTON — Los Angeles Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa huddled Thursday with Democratic leaders from Congress to discuss his Spanish-language response to the president's State of the Union address next week, and there were signs of some disagreement over how to present their case.

Villaraigosa, in Washington this week to attend a meeting of the United States Conference of Mayors, also made the rounds of national media outlets, appearing on C-SPAN, National Public Radio and MSNBC to talk about the task of rebutting President Bush and the mayor's new role as chairman of a poverty task force for the mayors' group.

On C-SPAN's live show "Washington Journal," the mayor complained about federal cuts in anti-poverty money, but without naming Bush.

"The federal government cannot afford to cut the safety net as they have for so many years," Villaraigosa said.

He planned meetings with mayors from Atlanta and other cities late into the night and planned to take a 6 a.m. flight back to L.A. today.

At times on Thursday, his energy seemed to flag, despite standing out in the crowd in his pressed, dark suit.

DOJ_NMG_0012677

Between broadcast interviews, Villaraigosa met with Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid, Senate Minority Whip Richard J. Durbin and House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi to discuss the party's response to the State of the Union speech.

The mayor emerged from a meeting with Durbin and Pelosi saying that he did not want to be too negative about the president, on whom his city depends for federal financial help.

"My remarks depend, in part, on what the president has to say, but I think my focus will be more an alternative vision, as opposed to one that spends a lot of time criticizing the administration," Villaraigosa told The Times.

"It will be one that focuses on opportunity and hope."

The mayor's comments were in contrast to speeches by Pelosi and Durbin at a luncheon attended by Villaraigosa at the National Press Club on Thursday. Pelosi said that on key issues the policies we have seen from Republicans in power do not match the priorities of the American people."

Asked if his speech in Spanish would be different from the Democratic rebuttal in English, to be delivered by Gov. Tim Kaine of Virginia, Villaraigosa said he agreed to speak to the nation only if he could retain editorial control.

He repeated that the key words of his speech will be "hope" and "opportunity."

The mayor, who was national co-chairman of John Kerry's presidential campaign, said the Republicans have in recent years "been able to speak to America's heart … better than Democrats have. We are good at speaking to her head. They speak to her heart. They speak to America's values in a way that I think has resonated in the last two elections. That's clear to me."

The mayor's office is a nonpartisan post, and Villaraigosa said issues such as poverty are not owned by any party.

"It's an American tragedy," he said. "We have to speak to America's heart, to her values."

The mayor got a firsthand look at the different values held by some Americans as he was peppered with questions about immigration from callers on C-SPAN's "Washington Journal."

After saying that Los Angeles is not going to follow the lead of Costa Mesa and involve police officers more in identifying illegal immigrants, a caller from Arkansas said not enough was being done to counter illegal immigration.

The woman declared: "It's only after the influx of illegals that you were elected, sir. How is this possible?"

Clearly stunned, Villaraigosa responded, "Are you kidding?" After a long silence, he added, "I was born in the United States."

State Of The Union (NYT)

By Thomas L. Friedman

The New York Times, January 27, 2006

On Tuesday President Bush will deliver his State of the Union address and map out priorities for his last three years. The direction in which America needs to go is obvious: toward energy independence. If Mr. Bush steps up to that challenge, this speech could be a new beginning for his presidency. If he doesn't, you can stick a fork in this administration. It will be done — because it will have abdicated leadership on the biggest issue of our day. Here's the speech I'll be listening for:

My fellow Americans, on May 25, 1961, President Kennedy gave an extraordinary State of the Union address in which he called on the nation to marshal all of its resources to put a man on the Moon. By setting that lofty goal, Kennedy was trying to summon all of our industrial and scientific talent, and a willingness to sacrifice financially, to catch up with the Soviet Union, which had overtaken America in the field of large rocket engines.

"While we cannot guarantee that we shall one day be first," Kennedy said, "we can guarantee that any failure to make this effort will make us last."

I come to you this evening with a similar challenge. President Kennedy was worried about the threat that communism posed to our way of life. I am here to tell you that if we don't move away from our dependence on oil and shift to renewable fuels, it will change our way of life for the worse — and soon — much, much more than communism ever could have. Making this transition is the calling of our era.

Why? First, we are in a war with a violent strain of Middle East Islam that is indirectly financed by our consumption of oil. Second, with millions of Indians and Chinese buying cars and homes as they join the great global middle class, we must quickly move away from burning fossil fuels or we're going to create enough global warming to melt the North Pole. Because of that, green cars, homes, offices, appliances, designs and renewable energies will be the biggest growth industry of the 21st century. If we don't dominate that industry, China, India, Japan or Europe surely will.

But to lead, we must impose the highest energy-efficiency standards on our own automakers and other industries so we force them to be the most innovative. I want to inspire girls and boys across America to study math, science and engineering to help our nation achieve green energy independence. President Kennedy said, Let's put a man on the Moon. I say, Let's make oil obsolete.

Finally, my call for spreading democracy will never be achieved if some of the worst regimes on the planet — Iran, Sudan, Venezuela — have so much oil money they can misbehave and ignore the world, and if the rest of us — Europe, America, China and India — are forever coddling them to get access to their crude.

With all of this in mind, I am sending Congress the Bush Energy Freedom Act. It is based on ideas first offered by the energy expert Philip Verleger and it argues the following:

Transportation accounts for most of our oil consumption. And many Americans have purchased big cars and S.U.V.'s, expecting gasoline to remain cheap. That is no longer the case. Therefore, I propose creating a government agency that will buy up any gas-guzzling car or truck in America at the original new or used price, and crush it. This national buy-back program will be financed by a $2-a-gallon gasoline tax that will be phased in by 10 cents a month beginning in 2008 — so people know what is coming and start buying fuel-efficient cars right now.

By removing so many gas guzzlers, we will quickly reduce our oil consumption and create a huge demand for new energy-efficient cars from Detroit, which will rescue our auto industry. We have to do something drastic. The Harley-Davidson motorcycle company is worth more today than General Motors! But by sharply raising the gasoline tax, we'll also make sure that Detroit shifts its fleet to energy-saving plug-in hybrids and hydrogen- and ethanol-fueled vehicles, which will force Detroit to out-innovate Toyota. And by generating so much income from a gasoline tax, we will be able to give gas-tax rebates to lower-income folks and have plenty left over to pay for new investment in education and scientific research.

Impossible? Read my lips: Nothing is impossible when Americans put their hearts and minds to it.

One last thing: I have accepted the resignation of Vice President Dick Cheney, who felt he could not be a salesman for the Energy Freedom Act. I am nominating Jeffrey Immelt — the C.E.O. of General Electric, who has focused G.E.'s innovation around "eco-imagination" — as Mr. Cheney's replacement.

Good night, and God bless America.

How Bush Would Tame Healthcare Costs (CSM)

By Alexandra Marks

The Christian Science Monitor, January 27, 2006

NEW YORK - President Bush is moving to put healthcare at the top of America's political agenda. In his State of the Union speech next Tuesday, he is expected to propose a series of initiatives that are designed to rein in the spiraling cost of healthcare and increase the number of Americans with insurance. To do this, he is hoping to encourage a market-oriented, consumer-driven system. Key components of his plan include the expansion of health savings accounts, additional tax breaks for individuals who buy insurance on their own, and provisions that would improve public access to information on healthcare pricing.

Supporters contend the proposals are crucial to making American more of an "ownership" society, allowing individuals to have more control over their healthcare choices. Critics warn they'll shift more risk onto individuals and undermine the nation's already strained health-insurance system.

Health savings accounts are tax-free accounts that individuals or businesses can set up at banks or credit unions, in conjunction with the purchase of high-deductible, so-called catastrophic health insurance. Individuals can now contribute as much as $2,600, and families as much as $5,150 each year. Bush is expected to propose increasing these limits. The accounts are to be used for routine medical expenses, such as checkups and pharmaceutical costs. The insurance is there as a backup in case of a health emergency.

In the past year, the number of individuals with such policies tripled to 3 million, according to America's Health Insurance Plans (AHIP), a medical lobbying group in Washington. That accounts for about 1 percent of the insured population.

Pros

· May encourage medical-services shoppers to be more cost-conscious because they will be spending their own money.

· Makes insurance more affordable to some of the working uninsured, since the premiums for catastrophic insurance are lower than traditional premiums.

"About one-third of the individuals who were purchasing [the catastrophic insurance in conjunction with setting up an HSA] didn't have health insurance prior to the offering of these policies," says Karen Ignani, president and CEO of AHIP. "Clearly these policies are reaching out to a segment of the population that heretofore found coverage too expensive."

Cons

DOJ_NMG_0012679

· Because of very high deductibles, could discourage the purchase of preventive or other care that is deemed necessary, which could lead to higher overall medical costs.

· Does not address the real drivers of healthcare inflation: advances in expensive medical technology and the growing cases of chronic illness. (Eighty percent of healthcare spending in the US is for individuals diagnosed with chronic problems, like diabetes.)

· Will be attractive to healthier, wealthier people, draining them from the insurance risk pool and leaving only higher-risk people with traditional insurance, which would drive up the cost.

"It takes us back to the equity question of whether we want to be spreading the costs out through society so that people who get sick don't bear the full cost of their own illness," says Mark Schlesinger, a health policy expert at Yale University. "This is basically saying once you're sick, you can plan to spend more for the rest of your life as opposed to saying we'll help share that burden with you." Tax breaks for those buying their own insurance

When businesses buy employees' health insurance, they receive a tax break, which is essentially a taxpayer subsidy worth about $120 billion annually. Individuals who buy health insurance on their own currently receive no tax break. They must spend more than 7.5 percent of their income on medical expenses before qualifying for an income-tax deduction. Of the 45 million uninsured, 80 percent are estimated to be working at low-wage jobs, many of which don't include health insurance.

Bush is expected to call for individuals to be able to take deductions similar to those taken by businesses.

Pros

· Could create incentives for more uninsured individuals to buy insurance.

· Levels the playing field between businesses and individuals.

"We're throwing a tremendous amount of dollars at people like me. I have a nice job and a nice salary," says Joseph Antos, a healthcare expert with the American Enterprise Institute. "I'm appreciative, but in truth I don't need it nearly as much as someone who is working at the minimum wage who isn't getting that tax break."

Cons

· Might encourage some businesses to cut back on the health insurance they provide.

· Is estimated to cost in the tens of millions of dollars, and with increasing deficits, Congress may balk.

· May not help the working poor, unless the tax advantage is given as a credit.

"Only a refundable tax credit will help people [with little income] who have little or no tax liability," says Mr. Antos. More transparency in pricing

Currently, no national standard exists by which consumers can judge the quality and cost of varying healthcare services. By creating such a set of standards - which an alliance of healthcare providers is currently attempting to do - and encouraging hospitals and doctors to comply, consumers would have the tools to shop for the best care at the best bargain. Even the staunchest advocates of HSAs agree that without such data, consumer-driven healthcare won't work as advertised.

Pros

· Helps consumers make more informed choices.

· Helps improve quality of care.

"You will get a lot more pressure to understand the comparative effectiveness of technologies and medical procedures," says Gail Wilensky, a health policy expert at Project Hope in Washington. "That can help payers, providers, and even the patient community to understand if there is either not much known or a lot of dispute about how effective a new technology or procedure may be. For some people in some circumstances it can make all of the difference in the world."

Cons

· Is expensive to implement because of the database technology required.

· Could take years to accomplish because medical culture is slow to change.

· Is based on cost, when some consumers don't make medical decisions on that basis.

· Could be difficult for consumers to understand.

"It's right now such a complex pricing mechanism that even experts on the inside have trouble deciphering it. How in the world is an individual consumer going to?" says Dr. Henry Simmons, president of the National Coalition on Health Care in Washington.

Savings Accounts For Health Costs Attract Wall St. (NYT)

By Eric Dash

The New York Times, January 27, 2006

When it comes to medical benefits, millions of Americans already have a health insurer. Soon, many will also have a debit card and a bank tied to their medical plan.

DOJ_NMG_0012680

Banks, credit unions and money management firms are now quietly positioning themselves to become central players in the business of health care, offering 401(k)-type accounts to cover future medical expenses.

Bank of America, J. P. Morgan Chase, Fidelity Investments and hundreds of others are hoping to capitalize on the latest wrinkle in medical care paid by consumers: health savings accounts, which have been around since 2003 but are moving to the fore of the national agenda in anticipation of the State of the Union address on Tuesday.

These supercharged checking accounts, which must be linked to a high-deductible health insurance plan, allow consumers to invest their own money for current and future medical expenses and have it grow tax-free.

They are the centerpiece of President Bush's plans on health care, just as private accounts were offered as a Social Security fix.

Currently, only about three million Americans have signed up for the high-deductible insurance policy required for such accounts, up from slightly more than one million last March, according to findings released yesterday by America's Health Insurance Plans, an industry group. It is not clear how many of those people have actually opened a linked account. Still, the number is expected to rise sharply over the next five years.

By 2010, more than 15 million Americans, or about 10 percent of all those insured, will have a health savings account, according to an estimate by DiamondCluster International, a management consulting firm.

The average individual's account balance, it projects, will grow from $1,500 today to about $3,500 in 2010. Even if people pull out some or all of their money to pay their medical bills, the ballooning balances may mean that $75 billion or so in new money to manage will soon be at stake.

Banks and others are drawn by the promise of lucrative fees they can generate by offering consumers mutual funds and other investment vehicles as their account balances grow. Most also charge $50 to $75 to set up a health savings account, and they collect perhaps $40 or more each year in maintenance charges and service fees.

Not since the creation of the individual retirement account in the mid-1970's has such a potentially huge mountain of money landed in the lap of the financial services industry.

"Billions of dollars that used to be written in the form of checks with insurance companies' names on them would instead go to credit unions, banks, and long-term investment houses," said Dan Perrin, the publisher of H.S.A. Insider and executive director of the H.S.A. Coalition, a lobbying group backed by 70 small-business and medical industry groups as well as the American Bankers Association. "You know America: you see a financial opportunity and it sets off a gold rush."

Two years ago, not a single major bank offered a health savings account. Only seven small banks had any sort of plan. Today, more than 300 financial services companies, including big banks, are taking deposits or will be soon. About 150 more are on the way. Some of the country's biggest health insurance providers have started their own banks.

To be sure, health savings accounts will make up only a small fraction of earnings at a financial giant like Citigroup. But at a time when deposit growth has slowed and higher interest rates have hurt profits, they represent a steady stream of new income that is increasingly hard to find. Banks are betting that what the administration calls consumer-directed health care catches on.

Supporters say that the discipline and marketing might of financial services giants could spur the adoption of consumer-directed care. Critics argue that the banking industry's involvement only bolsters their case: the accounts are more about wealth than health.

"We already have a large number of retirement savings vehicles in the United States," said Jonathan Gruber, an economist and Treasury Department official in the Clinton administration. "It is not clear why we need yet another tax break for savings for rich guys."

Corporations, of course, want relief from soaring health care costs, and have been steadily shifting more of the burden to their employees. Small businesses were among the first to offer health savings accounts to their employees. But over the last year or so, a number of big companies — from Guidant to Wal-Mart Stores — have started signing up.

Health savings accounts are akin to the private accounts that were proposed to help overhaul Social Security. Much of Wall Street liked private retirement accounts, but their support was guarded because they feared a potential negative reaction.

Banking lobbyists have met with White House officials at least three times over the last year to discuss the rules governing health savings vehicles. But until recently, most have been shy about their interest in such plans. Now, they have established a lobbying group, the H.S.A. Council, and are spending millions of dollars to roll the plans out.

The idea behind the accounts is simple: forced to pay out of pocket for medical care, Americans workers will spend health care dollars more wisely. The way it works is more complex. Americans under the age of 65 with a high-deductible health care plan can contribute tax-free to the new 401(k)-like account as much as $2,700 this year for individuals and $5,450 for families, or the amount of their deductible if it is less. Unlike health reimbursement plans, which were controlled by the employer, health savings accounts belong to employees even if they change jobs.

The money can be used to pay for medical, dental and vision expenses as well as a portion of qualified premiums for long-term-care insurance.

The rest can be invested in stocks, bonds and mutual funds — and grow tax-free. That money would be available to pay for a broad range of health care expenses in the future, and would remain untaxed as long as it was spent on health care. At any time after age 65, money can be withdrawn for any reason without penalty, but the entire amount taken out would be taxed.

For wealthier people, the tax break could provide a generous incentive to build a nest egg for future health care; poorer people with smaller annual contributions could wind up spending all the money they put away during the year.

Geoff Dougall's accounting firm in Beaverton, Ore., is among the thousands of employers that have switched from a conventional health insurance plan to offering health savings account.

"We are very much talking about it as a savings vehicle," said Mr. Dougall, who is giving each of his employees $2,500 this year to cover the deductibles of their health insurance policies.

The savings accounts, in effect, give financial institutions a vital, but behind-the-scenes role in shaping the nation's health care system.

Banks hope to use their close ties with their customers to enter the health insurance market. For now, they collaborate with insurance providers as much as they compete. Health savings accounts must be opened in conjunction with a high-deductible health insurance plan. After choosing an insurance policy, the consumer must pick a bank.

Even though the health plan and savings account are separate products, big banks and insurance companies pitch them together as an "integrated solution" and split the fees. Health insurers keep the premiums; banks retain the investment management fees and the debit card transaction fees. The two split the money earned for opening and maintaining the accounts.

Health insurers, said David Josephs, J. P. Morgan's vice president for health care business development, "are good at explaining benefits."

"They are good at eligibility. They are good at enrollment. Managing risk. Contracting with doctors and hospitals. Banks are good at managing transactions. Managing deposits. Making investments."

"As you look at consumer-directed health care," he added, "it really requires both of those skill sets."

Even without the lucrative investment management fees, bank executives like Daniel Kelly, manager of H.S.A. services at U.S. Bancorp, say health savings accounts are attractive. Banks make money each time a customer swipes his debit card at a doctor's office. Payment processing alone could generate some $2.3 billion over the next five years, the DiamondCluster study estimates.

Some big medical plans have already entered the health saving account arena by starting their own bank.

Four years ago, United Healthcare started Exante Financial Services, a Utah-based bank that allowed it to become the first company to offer its customers the high-deductible health insurance policies as well as savings accounts. In December, the Blue Cross Blue Shield Association said it was planning to charter a similar institution, Blue Healthcare Bank, an online bank.

Executives at both companies say they are not being lured into the banking business by the prospects of wealth management; nor do they plan to offer traditional banking services and loans.

Instead, they say having both products under one roof will allow them to provide better customer service, like more smoothly processing transactions at doctors' offices or quickly resolving billing disputes.

"This has nothing to do with an assets-under-management play," said John M. Prince, chief executive of Exante Financial Services. "There will be huge falloff in people who are trying to play that role. Eighty percent of the money are assets that go right in and go right out."

Just a few years ago, the idea that the titans of health care and banking would be battling for business would have been nearly impossible to imagine.

Even after the Bush administration began pushing for the creation of health savings accounts with the Medicare Modernization Act of 2003, the banking industry mainly stayed on the sidelines. The American Banking Association lent its name to the H.S.A. Coalition lobbying group but did not contribute any money.

Industry lobbyists viewed the idea as a health care issue; they raised questions about its prospects of passing as the 2004 presidential race heated up. Banking executives did not see the profit potential after an experiment with Medical Savings Accounts, aimed at small businesses, failed.

"Put it this way, the impact of this law did not really become clear to them until after it passed," said Mr. Perrin, the H.S.A. Coalition director. Once they understood how the accounts worked, however, the big banks realized the next I.R.A. had landed at their feet.

Now, some financial institutions are urging the Bush administration and Congress to raise the tax-deductible contribution limit to encourage consumers to put more money in their accounts — a proposal that President Bush is expected to endorse in his State of the Union speech.

DOJ_NMG_0012682

Banks are already champing at the bit. "We happen to be in the camp that the H.S.A. is a second retirement account to be used for medical expenses," said Nancy Todor, an executive who will oversee health savings accounts when Citigroup introduces them this year.

Enrollment Triples In Plans Offering Health Savings Accounts (LAT)

By Joel Havemann

The Los Angeles Times, January 27, 2006

WASHINGTON — Enrollment in high-deductible insurance plans that qualify for contributions to tax-sheltered health savings accounts — the Bush administration's way of adding market forces to the health business — tripled to 3 million people in the last 10 months, the health insurance industry reported Thursday.

"This is a very significant success story," said Karen Ignagni, president and chief executive of America's Health Insurance Plans, the trade association for companies that underwrite virtually all such plans.

But the 3 million enrollees in plans that qualify for the accounts represent a small percentage of the 198 million Americans who, as of 2004, were covered by private insurance — or even of the 46 million who have no insurance at all.

"Is it a success story? Yes and no," said Paul Fronstin, a health economist with the Employee Benefit Research Institute. "Three years ago, the market didn't exist. But it still amounts to only a fraction of Americans who have private insurance."

President Bush has signaled that in his State of the Union address Tuesday, he will ask Congress to expand health savings accounts, which are designed to shift responsibility for buying health insurance from employers to individuals.

Bush has said that those with comprehensive health insurance would benefit from the accounts because they would make more cost-effective healthcare choices if they knew that they would be responsible for much of the expenses. For those who are uninsured, the accounts could make insurance affordable because they are linked to low-cost policies with high deductibles.

Most Democrats have a different perspective. Sen. Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts wrote that health savings accounts worked only for the healthy and put at risk the health and resources of the poor.

Contributions to health savings accounts, which were authorized by the 2003 law that added a prescription drug benefit to Medicare, are tax-deductible, and withdrawals used for medical expenses are tax-free. Balances at year's end can be rolled over into the next year.

Individuals qualify to establish health savings accounts only if they are covered by insurance with annual deductibles of at least $1,050 for individuals or $2,100 for families. The cost of such insurance is typically far less than the price of traditional comprehensive coverage; the administration's thinking is that the difference would be contributed to the accounts.

Those contributions are limited to the amount of the deductible, with maximums of $2,700 for individuals and $5,450 for families. Ignagni said the high-deductible policies would become more attractive if the tax breaks for the accounts were expanded.

Grace-Marie Turner, president of the Galen Institute, a health and tax policy center in Alexandria, Va., found the incidence of high-deductible insurance policies impressive. "They're new," said Turner, whose organization backs increased use of the accounts. "It takes people a while to get used to them."

Although Ignagni could not say how many of the 3 million had opened and contributed to the tax-favored accounts, other research suggests that it is a small percentage.

An October survey of insured people by the Employee Benefit Research Institute and the Commonwealth Fund found that 1 in 10 people with private insurance had high-deductible plans; of them, 1 in 10 had set up either health savings accounts or health reimbursement accounts, to which only employers may contribute.

The survey also found that those with high-deductible plans were less satisfied with their insurance than those with comprehensive plans and were more likely to delay or avoid healthcare because of costs. But it found that enrollees in high-deductible plans were more aware of healthcare costs than those with comprehensive coverage.

Democrats: Bush Should Outline Medicare Fix (REU-Y2)

By Joanne Kenen

Reuters, January 27, 2006

Congressional Democrats on Thursday challenged President George W. Bush to outline in his State of the Union speech how he will fix what they consider a disastrous start to the Medicare drug benefit.

"In his State of the Union next week, the president needs to come clean and join Democrats in offering a real solution to this disastrous program," Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid of Nevada told reporters.

Medicare provides health insurance for all Americans from age 65 and some disabled people. Congress in 2003 added a prescription drug benefit which became available this month.

DOJ_NMG_0012683

In his annual address to the nation next week, Bush is expected to discuss health care costs and coverage, but White House officials have not said whether he will address any of the problems the new drug benefit has encountered.

Many senior citizens have said they are confused by the program, and many of the poorest older Americans ended up without any coverage or unable to get their usual drugs amid a flawed transition from state-based Medicaid to the new Medicare plan.

Democrats have long criticized the Medicare law but have stepped up their attacks in a congressional election year amid widespread reports of problems.

Democrats also tried to link the Medicare law to lobbying scandals, saying the Republicans wrote legislation that helped drug companies and insurers more than older Americans.

"The American people paid the price of corruption," House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi of California said.

Administration officials and congressional Republicans have acknowledged flaws, but say they are working to fix them. They also say they delivered on a promise to provide a drug benefit to millions of Americans who have not had any help in paying for their prescriptions in the past.

"I'm not trying to make excuses. Some of our nation's frailest, neediest beneficiaries have had difficulties in getting their drugs. That clearly can't go on, and we're not letting it go on," Senate Finance Committee Chairman Charles Grassley of Iowa said in a statement Thursday.

"But to suggest that neither the president nor the Republican majority recognizes that there are issues with the implementation is absolutely ludicrous," added Grassley, who said that administrative solutions would be faster than legislation the Democrats have sought.

Democrats have called for both short-term fixes to the program, such as helping the poor or extending enrollment deadlines, and long-term changes to the plan's overall structure. Reid and Max Baucus of Montana, the top Democrat on Grassley's Finance Committee, wrote to Bush with a list of specific legislative suggestions on Thursday.

Some moderate Republicans hearing complaints from constituents and state officials have endorsed some of the short-term solutions, but there is less enthusiasm for revisiting the overall program.

Drugmakers To Cut Off Some Free Prescriptions (WP)

By Ceci Connolly

The Washington Post, January 27, 2006

Several of the nation's largest drug manufacturers say they will no longer provide free or discounted medications to low-income elderly and disabled patients because they should be covered by the new Medicare drug benefit.

But for about 1 million Americans with serious illnesses such as AIDS and cancer -- patients who last year relied on the pharmaceutical industry's giveaways -- that means Medicare coverage could cost them more than $3,600 this year.

Hardest hit will be patients such as James Hayes. Suffering from AIDS, the 45-year-old North Carolina man takes an average of 10 drugs each month at a cost of $3,700. In recent years, he has relied on several drug company patient assistance programs for his lifesaving medications. Because he is on disability, receiving $1,900 a month, Hayes qualifies for the new Medicare drug benefit.

But in the past few weeks, drugmakers such as GlaxoSmithKline have sent Hayes and others letters saying that as of Jan. 1, anyone eligible for Medicare would be dropped from its program. The cheapest Medicare drug plan he can find is expected to cost him $6,000 out of pocket.

"I can't afford that. I am struggling to make ends meet right now without going into bankruptcy," he said yesterday. "I'm scared I'm going to have to go off of my drugs."

Less than four weeks after the drug benefit went into effect, some of the neediest seniors have found themselves worse off. Although the new program, projected to cost $700 billion in the first 10 years, was intended to shield retirees from burdensome drug costs, several quirks in the law have had the opposite effect for some.

"These are individuals who did have something before; they had patient assistance programs," said John Coburn, senior policy analyst for the Chicago-based Health & Disability Advocates. "We are seeing the unintended consequences of this law."

Drugmakers blamed the Bush administration for issuing a legal opinion that suggests companies could run afoul of anti-kickback laws if they provide free drugs to Medicare beneficiaries. That guidance, from the Health and Human Services Inspector General's office, warned that providing free medicine to someone enrolled in a Medicare plan could be viewed as an effort to keep the patient on that particular product, rather than a generic or cheaper version sold by a competitor.

Administration officials, already racing to fix other glitches in the new drug program, yesterday pointed the finger back at drugmakers, saying there are a variety of legal ways to assist low-income patients. If a drug company's patient assistance program ends, "that's the manufacturer's decision," said Mark McClellan, administrator of the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid

Services. He said drugmakers could continue their patient assistance programs as long as they remain separate from Medicare or contribute money to charities that help poor patients.

However, that would mean those free medications would not count toward a patient's spending total. The total is especially important for an individual taking numerous expensive medications because once that person has used $5,100 worth of drugs (or about $3,200 out of pocket) the Medicare plan's catastrophic coverage kicks in, paying all but 10 percent of the remaining drug costs.

"That much money could well be a quarter of someone's income," said Robert Hayes, president of the nonprofit Medicare Rights Center, which assists seniors. Even after the person reaches that threshold, the 10 percent co-payments could be unaffordable, he added.

For decades, drugmakers have offered discounted or free medications to uninsured Americans or people who could not afford critical therapies. In 2004, the 37 companies in the industry donated 22 million prescriptions worth $4.1 billion, said Ken Johnson, senior vice president for the Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America.

"The current manufacturer's patient assistance programs work very well," he said. "They are already helping patients without any middlemen or additional overhead. It seems a lot more efficient to allow these programs to continue to help Medicare beneficiaries."

Only one company, Merck, said it will continue its program, stressing that the company will evaluate applications from Medicare beneficiaries on a case-by-case basis. "Like anyone with insurance, they can come to Merck at any time," said Ian Spatz, Merck's vice president for public policy.

Administration officials said this week that the early glitches in the drug benefit are being resolved, but states continued to report difficulties.

More than two dozen governors, noting that former Medicaid clients have been incorrectly denied coverage or overcharged at the pharmacy, have declared public health emergencies and announced they would cover the cost for any senior caught in the mix-ups.

Yesterday, Florida Gov. Jeb Bush (R) joined that list, while California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger (R) extended his state's program. So far, California has spent $9.2 million filling 110,000 prescriptions that should have been covered by Medicare plans, officials said.

Medicare Drug Plan Leaves Out Supplies (LAT)

By Ricardo Alonso-zaldivar

The Los Angeles Times, January 27, 2006

WASHINGTON — The new Medicare drug program is denying supplies that seriously ill patients need to administer intravenous antibiotics and other medications at home. As a result, some patients are being referred to nursing homes, and others have had to go into hospitals.

Although no national estimates are available, the number of patients affected — including some with life-threatening diseases such as cancer and multiple sclerosis — could run into the thousands. One Anaheim pharmacy says 200 of its patients are having trouble.

Medicare officials say they are aggressively addressing the problem, which they attribute to restrictions in the law that created the prescription benefit and to difficulty communicating with states, pharmacies and medical providers.

Essentially, the prescription program allows coverage of the drugs but does not pay for the medical supplies and nursing help needed for the home infusion treatments to be safe and effective — a policy that effectively shuts down such treatment for some patients, even though it is substantially cheaper than the alternatives. Two GOP senators warned the Medicare agency last fall that the gap in coverage "may limit access to home infusion therapy."

Home infusion pharmacies say they are overwhelmed trying to help patients deal with the problem. "It's like I'm doing triage in a MASH unit," said pharmacist Michael Rigas, vice president for clinical affairs with Crescent Healthcare in Anaheim.

For Kathleen Senna, 68, a retired cannery worker living in West Sacramento, the policy has meant she can't get intravenous medications at home to fight a lung infection. Instead, Senna said, she is taking Cipro, an oral antibiotic that was ineffective for her in the past. Hospital doctors recommended she go into a nursing home for treatment, but Senna said she was afraid.

"You feel like they are putting you in there because they expect you to die," she said. "Me going to a convalescent hospital is going to cost a lot more than bringing antibiotics to my house."

Paulette Bryson of Escondido said she had to take her daughter, Kimberly Tyler, back to the hospital after Tyler was unable to get intravenous medications to treat a blood and spinal infection.

DOJ_NMG_0012685

Disabled with severe osteoporosis, Tyler, 32, had been released from the hospital last week after extensive back surgery. Her mother said she returned to the hospital after two days because she could not get the IV medications, which are considered more effective than pills.

"I truly feel that if the president, the governor and all the legislators had to stand in line and wait for their prescriptions and find out they weren't covered, they would make some major changes," Bryson said. "Unfortunately, it's the small person who does not have pull, and they have to beg for their medicine."

Senna and Tyler previously were covered for intravenous medications at home under Medi-Cal, the California healthcare program for low-income seniors and disabled people. But despite emergency help ordered by Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger for Medi-Cal patients whose prescription coverage was switched to Medicare on Jan. 1, Senna and Tyler were not able to get their medications.

The problem mainly appears to be affecting the poor. But pharmacists say many middle-class Medicare beneficiaries also could run into trouble, because they would have to pay to cover support services for their medications or find other insurance. On average, the medicines represent a little less than half the cost of treatment, which can run thousands of dollars a month, according to a pharmacy industry group.

Republican Sens. Arlen Specter and Rick Santorum, both of Pennsylvania, wrote to the Medicare agency in October, saying it "has opted to define the coverage of home infusion therapy in a manner that does not include financial coverage for … professional services, supplies and equipment that are required for the safe and effective provision of therapy."

In a response dated Dec. 27, Mark McClellan, administrator for the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, said the agency lacked specific legal authority to broaden the coverage policy, in effect, handing the problem back to Congress.

"If we could pay for it, we would," said Dr. Jeff Kelman, chief medical officer for the division of Medicare that handles the drug benefit. "Read the act yourself …. It's a drug benefit, not a medical benefit."

Kelman suggested that states could pay for the support services for low-income seniors and disabled people. However, it is unclear how many states would do that.

Pharmacists say other seniors may be able to get coverage by joining a managed care plan, such as a health maintenance organization. Additionally, a small number of IV medications are covered through Medicare's Part B benefit.

Most private insurers take a comprehensive approach to covering home infusion drugs, so Medicare's policy is hard to fathom, said Dr. Edward Ratner, a professor at the University of Minnesota medical school.

"The proof that it isn't sensible is that commercial insurance companies and health maintenance organizations don't do it this way," said Ratner, who is also the medical director for a private company that provides support services for patients receiving intravenous treatments at home.

Until the mid-1980s, intravenous medications normally were given only in hospitals and nursing homes. But technological advances enabled the treatments to be administered safely at home, albeit with some supervision. Concern over rising healthcare costs accelerated the trend.

Most at-home patients are being treated with antibiotics for serious infections, according to industry statistics. Others are receiving painkillers, and some are undergoing chemotherapy for cancer.

Saving money by making hospitalization unnecessary was part of the rationale for creating the Medicare prescription benefit, which has an estimated price tag of $700 billion over 10 years. But the most far-reaching Medicare change in a generation failed to adequately provide for this kind of at-home drug therapy, critics say.

Specialized pharmacies that handle home infusion will not provide the service unless they are paid.

Some patients discovered their Medicare drug plans did not cover the specific medications they were getting and had to switch insurers. But even when the drugs were covered, things didn't always go smoothly.

Rigas, the Anaheim pharmacist, said one patient called and told him a substance had been delivered to the patient's house. "I've got the powder on my doorstep, now what do I do with it?" Rigas recalled the patient asking.

"They had no bags, no tubing … but this is what they've been stuck with," Rigas said. "It's really bothersome to me, what patients are suffering. The carpet that they were standing on has been ripped out from under them."

Some say an obvious solution would be for Congress to step in and craft a comprehensive benefit.

But congressional leaders are loath to make any legislative changes to the drug benefit, fearing that political support for the plan could unravel.

That leaves patients in limbo.

"I'm worried about it," said Senna, the West Sacramento patient with chronic lung disease, saying that an oral antibiotic may not be effective in treating her periodic infections.

"I'm not going to let them put me in a convalescent hospital as long as I can take care of it at home," she said. "If I start running a temperature, they can take me back to the regular hospital, although that's not great."

AP, January 26, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Bush administration is making plans to revive nuclear fuel reprocessing, including a long-term proposal to provide reactor fuel to foreign countries if they return it to the United States to be recycled.

President Bush will include a request for $250 million in his budget to be released next week as a first step toward reversing a decades long U.S. policy against nuclear reprocessing, congressional and administration officials said Thursday.

The plan is part of an effort to take a fresh look at how to deal with the thousands of tons of used reactor fuel piling up at U.S. commercial power plants, while also gaining control over future nuclear materials in developing countries where the demand for nuclear energy is expected to grow.

The United States halted all reprocessing in the late 1970s because it produces pure plutonium that could be used in a nuclear weapon if obtained by terrorists or rogue states.

The Bush plan, expected to be unveiled as part of the Energy Department's budget, calls for stepped up research into a "more proliferation resistant" type of reprocessing that proponents say will reduce dramatically the likelihood of theft or diversion.

The process would not produce pure plutonium, but a mixture of plutonium and neptunium that would make the separated elements more difficult to handle and, therefore, more secure.

But nonproliferation advocates contend the new process represents little more than - as one described it - a "fig leaf" over the reprocessing the U.S. has rejected since 1979 when President Carter banned reprocessing because of proliferation worries.

"The tweaking of this process would only provide a minor additional deterrent," said Edwin Lyman, a nuclear specialist at the Union of Concerned Scientists. It would not prevent a suicidal terrorist from handling the material, he said.

The Bush proposal, called the Global Nuclear Energy Partnership, envisions that U.S. companies eventually will sell reactors and fuel to developing countries with the stipulation that the fuel would be returned to the United States for reprocessing.

Nuclear scientists who have been working on the reprocessing technology for the Energy Department say that up to 90 percent of spent fuel can be recycled for reuse, reducing dramatically the need for geological disposal.

The initial $250 million is expected to go to stepped up research and initial work on a reprocessing facility, probably at the Savannah River nuclear complex in South Carolina, according to private and government sources familiar with the discussions.

The sources spoke on condition of anonymity because the plan has yet to be announced.

President Bush has been briefed on the plan, and Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman hinted at the broad outline of the reprocessing initiative and its potential global aspects in a November speech at the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace.

Countries around the world will demand use of nuclear energy in the coming decades, Bodman said, and "the challenge that confronts us" is providing nuclear fuel and addressing reactor waste globally without increasing proliferation risks.

He said the U.S. might be one of the countries that could offer "cradle to grave fuel cycle services, leasing fuel for power reactors and then taking it back for reprocessing and disposition."

Bodman said the administration remained committed to completing the Yucca Mountain nuclear waste site in Nevada. But experts say it will not be able to hold all of the country's reactor waste if nuclear energy expands with new reactors.

"Reprocessing could help avoid or delay the need for a second repository," Marvin Fertel, a senior vice president of the Nuclear Energy Institute, the industry's lobbying group, told a congressional hearing last March.

But Fertel emphasized that the nuclear industry views fuel reprocessing as a technology that is still decades away from being economical - and won't be as long as fresh uranium is plentiful and relatively cheap.

State Of The Union? Not So Good, Most Say (USAT)

By Susan Page

USA Today, January 27, 2006

A USA TODAY/CNN/Gallup Poll taken last weekend and interviews across the country this week found most Americans pessimistic about the economy, divided on the war and doubtful that Bush has the best plan to address the issues that matter most to them — among them health care and corruption. (Related: Poll results)

By more than 2-to-1, those surveyed say things have gotten worse in the United States over the past five years. "I love my country, but we're going the wrong way for sure," says Faye Sherer, 59, of Salinas, Calif., who helps run a family produce company and was among those polled. "I don't see the point in Iraq, when there were other countries going through worse atrocities and we did nothing to help them."

Bush has strong defenders, to be sure, and views of the country's course divide on partisan lines. Chris DeCaro, 20, of Farmington, Mich., praises the president, particularly for his handling of terrorism. "He runs this country not as a politician but as a businessman who does things that need to be done," DeCaro says. He says public opinion has been swayed by a "liberal media" that are "defeatist" on the war and antagonist toward Bush.

Still, even conservatives divide 47%-44% on whether things have gotten better or worse.

The country's downbeat mood poses a challenge for the president as he tries to command support for the legislative agenda he'll unveil for his sixth year in office. With a 43% approval rating, he is in "a weakened position trying to convince Congress to do whatever it is in the State of the Union that he wants them to do," says Charles Franklin of the University of Wisconsin.

Bush doesn't seem to be getting much credit for positive economic reports on unemployment and inflation. "This is a presidency whose ratings are less influenced by the economy" than his modern predecessors, says Richard Eichenberg of Tufts University. "The war in Iraq has defined his presidency."

Those surveyed:

· Said the country has gotten off track. By 62%-35%, they were dissatisfied with the way things are going in the USA. That's the most pessimistic view at the start of a year since Bush took office.

· Rated the economy as faltering. Six in 10 said the current economy was only fair or poor, and 54% said economic conditions were getting worse. Views differed by party: 68% of Republicans but just 16% of Democrats called the economy excellent or good.

· Questioned Bush's leadership. By 64%-34%, they said Bush didn't have a clear plan for solving the country's problems. The president received his strongest approval rating, 52%, on fighting terrorism. But on health care — ranked as an issue equal to the economy — congressional Democrats were more trusted, 54%-35%.

The poll of 1,006 adults Jan. 20-22 has a margin of error of +/-3 percentage points.

"I'm too old to be worrying about much," said Bernice Tabor, 76, of Cleveland. But she frets about casualties in Iraq and layoffs at Ford Motor Co. "We're going backward instead of forward."

Majority In U.S. Say Bush Presidency Is A Failure, Poll Finds (BLOOM)

By Nicholas Johnston

Bloomberg, January 27, 2006

Jan. 26 (Bloomberg) -- A majority of Americans said the presidency of George W. Bush has been a failure and that they would be more likely to vote for congressional candidates who oppose him, according to a CNN/USA Today/Gallup poll.

Fifty-two percent of adults said Bush's administration since 2001 has been a failure, down from 55 percent in October. Fifty- eight percent described his second term as a failure. At the same point in former President Bill Clinton's presidency, 70 percent of those surveyed by Gallup said they considered it a success and 20 percent a failure.

In a poll conducted in January of 2002, after Bush was president for one year, 83 percent of those surveyed said his presidency was a success.

In the new poll, conducted Jan. 20-22, fifty-one percent of those surveyed said they would be more likely to vote for congressional candidates who do not support Bush's policies.

The percentage of Americans who called Bush ``honest and trustworthy'' fell 7 percentage points in the last year to 49 percent, the poll found.

The new poll also found that 62 percent of Americans said they are ``dissatisfied'' with ``the way things are going'' in the U.S., unchanged from a December survey. The percentage of ``dissatisfied'' Americans reached its peak in October of 2005 when 68 percent of those surveyed agreed.

The survey interviewed 1,006 U.S. adults and has a margin of error of 4.5 percentage points. For the questions about whether Bush's presidency is a success, about 500 U.S. adults were surveyed and the margin for error is plus or minus 5 percentage points.

Bush Vows To Be Tough On Spending, Using Veto (REU-Y2)

By Caren Bohan

Reuters, January 27, 2006

President George W. Bush, who has faced heat from conservative Republicans over high budget deficits, pledged on Thursday to take a tougher stance toward Congress over spending, including vetoing bills if necessary.

He also backed changes to the appropriations process to curb "earmarks," or targeted spending that lawmakers often use for pet projects in their districts. Earmarks are frequently added in secret to spending bills and their use has soared under the Republican-led Congress, although Democratic lawmakers use them as well.

DOJ_NMG_0012688

"That's going to be an interesting discussion on Capitol Hill -- this business about earmarks and people making a special deal in the budget," Bush told a news conference. "And there needs to be earmark reform."

Pressed on whether lawmakers were doing enough to cut the budget, Bush said they are meeting "targets" but added that he is ready, if needed, to wield his veto pen -- something he has never done in five years as president.

"I'm fully prepared to use the veto if they overspend," he said.

Congressional Budget Office figures released on Thursday pegged the budget deficit for fiscal year 2006 at $337 billion. That was below the deficit of more than $400 billion forecast by the White House.

SHIFT TO DEFICITS

Democrats blame Bush's tax cuts for the dramatic shift on his watch from record surpluses to record deficits.

Some fiscal conservatives worry the red ink may jeopardize Bush's drive to make his tax cuts permanent, and have voiced frustration that he has not done enough to contain spending.

Conservatives view a huge transportation bill passed last year that Bush initially threatened to veto but eventually signed, as an egregious example of earmarked spending.

Calls within Congress for limiting earmarks have gained traction as the Jack Abramoff lobbying scandal has spurred calls for congressional reform.

Oklahoma Sen. Tom Coburn, a vocal Republican critic of deficits, is among several lawmakers who have urged the abolition of earmarks. But some in Congress would permit them with limits, more disclosure and accountability.

In an opinion piece in Roll Call, a Capitol Hill newspaper, California Republican Rep. Jerry Lewis (news, bio, voting record) said getting rid of all earmarks would cede too much power to the executive branch.

"The president's budget contains numerous earmarks inserted by nameless, faceless bureaucrats within each government agency," Lewis said.

But Lewis, chairman of the House Appropriations Committee, said lawmakers should be required to submit requests for spending on special projects in writing, and all such requests should be audited.

Bush said he would call for fiscal restraint in his State of the Union address on Tuesday, when he will also unveil initiatives on healthcare, energy and education.

Bush cited a deficit-cutting package aimed at finding $39.7 billion in savings from social welfare programs over five years as a sign Congress was making progress on curbing spending. The Senate has passed the bill and the House of Representatives appears poised to approve it as well.

House Democratic Whip Steny Hoyer of Maryland said calls by Bush and the Republicans for fiscal discipline amounted to little more than rhetoric.

"There is only one person in the entire United States government who can stop federal spending in its tracks, and that person is the president of the United States," Hoyer said. "Yet, during his five years in office, President Bush has refused to exercise the power of the veto once -- not once."

Report: Budget Deficit Will Turn To Surplus If Bush's Tax Cuts Expire (USAT)

By Richard Wolf

USA Today, January 27, 2006

WASHINGTON — Making President Bush's tax cuts permanent will prolong big budget deficits into the next decade, the Congressional Budget Office projected Thursday.

But if those tax cuts are allowed to expire after 2010 — effectively a tax increase Bush has sworn to oppose — the budget would begin showing a surplus in 2012, the CBO's budget projections showed. Bush wants Congress to make the tax cuts permanent before he leaves office in 2009.

In its annual budget and economic report, the agency estimated that this year's deficit will be $337 billion, up $19 billion from 2005. It said the deficit will be about $360 billion if extra anticipated costs for Iraq, Afghanistan and the hurricane-ravaged Gulf Coast are added.

The White House has pegged this year's projected deficit at more than $400 billion, citing the costs of the war in Iraq and Hurricane Katrina. The White House budget office has overestimated the size of the deficit in the past two years by using what it says are “cautious” economic and revenue projections.

The CBO projected that this year's deficit will be about 2.8% of the economy, using a measure that allows comparisons over time by factoring out the effect of inflation. That exceeds the 2.3% average since 1965 but is below the 6% record set in 1983.

The long-term budget forecast is gloomier, particularly if Bush and Congress agree to extend the tax cuts. In 2016, the deficit would be nearly $400 billion. Beyond that, the costs of Medicare, Medicaid and Social Security are projected to rise to a level that “economic growth alone is unlikely to alleviate,” the report says. “A substantial reduction in the growth of spending, and perhaps a sizable increase in taxes as a share of the economy, will be necessary for fiscal stability to be at all likely in the coming decades.”

The non-partisan budget office also said the new Medicare prescription-drug benefit could cost $979 billion in the 10 years from 2007 through 2016. Last year, the administration put the figure at $720 billion for the years 2006 to 2015. The increase is mostly due to projections that more people will use the subsidized program.

CBO Sees Wider Deficit This Year And In 2016 If Tax Cuts Don't End (WSJ)

By Jackie Calmes

The Wall Street Journal, January 27, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Congressional Budget Office projects that war and hurricane-relief costs will widen the annual deficit to about $360 billion after it had narrowed last year.

But a decade out, the nonpartisan office sees either a small surplus or a nearly $400 billion deficit in 2016 if President Bush's tax cuts are extended.

In its annual 10-year Budget and Economic Outlook released yesterday, the CBO calculates that if the numerous tax cuts of Mr. Bush's first term don't expire as they are scheduled to in coming years, federal revenue would be sliced more than $2.6 trillion. While the administration argues that tax cuts bring economic growth and, in turn, increased revenue, the budget office said that on balance any such "macroeconomic feedbacks would be too small to have a substantial effect on the estimates." The analysts' finding is sure to stoke the debate this year -- and probably for the rest of Mr. Bush's presidency -- over extending those tax cuts.

"This president and this Congress have been the most fiscally irresponsible in our nation's history," said North Dakota Sen. Kent Conrad, the senior Democrat on the Senate Budget Committee, and "at the worst possible time -- just before the baby boomers retire," and costs for Medicare, Medicaid and Social Security start exploding.

DEFICIT GROWTH

His Republican counterpart, Senate Budget Committee Chairman Judd Gregg of New Hampshire, focused on the growth of entitlement programs in his reaction to the CBO report. He warned in a written statement of an impending "financial crisis because the federal government has made commitments to America's retirees that threaten to overwhelm our economy."

In an interview, Mr. Gregg indicated he will use his budget-writing post to press Congress to reduce the benefit programs' costs. But the political difficulty is illustrated by the fact that the House and Senate still haven't finished a deficit-reduction bill left over from last year amid disagreements on cutting spending $5 billion this year and a total $40 billion over five years. A final vote is set for next week.

The CBO projected that the deficit for this year, which ends Sept. 30, will be about $360 billion, or the equivalent of 2.8% of gross domestic product. That compares to last year's $318 billion deficit, or 2.6% of GDP, which marked the first decline in the deficit since Mr. Bush took office. This year's deficit would be $181 billion greater -- or about $540 billion -- if the Social Security surplus isn't counted.

The budget office sees declining deficits through fiscal 2011 and then small surpluses annually through 2016. But that is only if Mr. Bush's tax cuts expire, and it is based on spending-growth projections for defense and domestic programs that are lower than what is likely to be spent. Moreover, as a separate CBO report last year demonstrated, after 2016 annual deficits would take off again as Social Security's annual surpluses turn to deficits and entitlement programs' costs balloon further.

The CBO said the annual growth rate for Medicare is projected to reach 8.9% in 2016, from 7.4% in 2008. Medicaid's growth is forecast to average 8.3% annually over the decade, and Social Security's annual increase will rise to 6.5% in 2016 from 4.8% in 2008.

Beyond 2016, the office reported, the three programs "will exert pressures on the budget that economic growth alone is unlikely to alleviate.

Congressional Panel Expects $337B Deficit (BRAH)

By Andrew Taylor

The Bradenton Herald, January 27, 2006

WASHINGTON - The budget deficit will rise to at least $337 billion this year and may well approach or exceed $400 billion because of tax cuts and new spending for hurricane relief and the war in Iraq, congressional budget analysts said Thursday.

The latest Congressional Budget Office data also suggest President Bush is unlikely to be able to keep his promise to cut the federal deficit in half by the end of his term.

Even assuming a phasing down of the war in Iraq and the costs of hurricane relief, implementing tax cuts sought by Bush and Congress would produce deficits exceeding $300 billion through the end of the decade, the nonpartisan CBO says.

The report and Bush's annual budget submission kick off a predictably partisan election-year debate over the budget, which will play out against the backdrop of rising deficits, record spending and renewed concern about lawmakers' penchant for homestate pet projects.

Bush promised in 2004 to close the deficit from a then-estimate of $521 billion to $260 billion by 2009, and he promised again Thursday to meet that goal when he sends an austere fiscal 2007 budget to Congress on Feb. 6.

"We can cut our deficit in half by 2009 and make sure the American people still get their tax relief," Bush told reporters.

Bush critics say he routinely plays games with the budget by leaving out the long-term costs of the war in Iraq and redrawing the tax code so more and more middle-class taxpayers won't get hit by the alternative minimum tax. Congress typically rejects most of his proposals for benefit cuts and new fees.

Even though CBO must follow rules that mean its official estimate is flawed - by reflecting current law even when future changes to the budget are virtually certain to be passed - its data are respected for impartiality.

CBO's official baseline shows the deficit dropping to $241 billion by 2009 and $114 billion by 2011. But those estimates assume Bush's tax cuts expire and the alternative minimum tax is left alone. That tax, designed to stop the wealthy from avoiding all taxation, threatens more middle class taxpayers every year because of inflation.

Under a more realistic scenario, extending tax relief, drawing down troop levels in Iraq, and phasing out hurricane relief, CBO predicts a $332 billion deficit for 2009, the last fiscal year for which Bush is responsible.

For its part, the White House reiterated Thursday that it thinks the 2006 deficit would actually top $400 billion because of the costs of tax cuts, the war in Iraq and new hurricane relief.

"This administration is driving us over the cliff into deeper and deeper debt," said Kent Conrad of North Dakota, the Senate Budget Committee's top Democrat.

According to the CBO report, the expiration of Bush's tax cuts would return the budget to a surplus of $38 billion by 2012. Keeping his tax cuts in place would put the government into a $289 billion deficit that year, but Bush rejected any talk of letting his tax cuts lapse at the end of the decade as currently scheduled.

"We don't need to be running up the taxes right now," Bush said Thursday. "You know, people say, 'Well, let's raise the taxes and balance the budget' - that's not how it works; they're going to raise your taxes, and they're going to continue to expand the government."

The government recorded a $319 billion deficit for 2005. The record deficit in dollar terms of $413 billion was registered in fiscal 2004.

Economists say the more significant measure is against the size of the economy. In those terms, CBO's 2006 deficit prediction would equal 2.6 percent of gross domestic product and would be significantly better than deficits witnessed in the mid-1980s and early 1990s. Then, deficits of 4 percent to 6 percent of GDP were common.

On the economy, CBO predicts continued robust growth of 3.6 percent this year and 3.4 percent next year, slowing to an average of 3.1 percent over 2009-2011.

With near-term deficit predictions going up, Republicans in Congress are feeling political heat from their core supporters, who say the party's record of fiscal discipline is slipping.

Republicans are particularly upset about the proliferation of lawmakers' pet projects under GOP control of Congress. For instance, total spending on such "earmarks" hit $17 billion in the latest round of congressional appropriations bills, House Appropriations Committee tally says.

When Bush took office in 2001, both White House and congressional forecasters projected cumulative surpluses of $5.6 trillion over the subsequent decade.

But a revenue bubble burst, a recession and the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist assaults adversely affected the books. Several rounds of tax cuts, including Bush's signature $1.35 trillion 2001 tax cut, also contributed to the return to deficits in 2002 after four years of budget surpluses.

Congress Agency Sees $337 Bln 2006 Budget Gap (REU-Y2)

By Richard Cowan

Reuters, January 27, 2006

A congressional report released on Thursday said the U.S. budget deficit will hit $337 billion this year, a figure that is up $23 billion from an August estimate and excludes additional funds needed for the Iraq and Afghanistan wars.

The Congressional Budget Office, Congress' nonpartisan fiscal watchdog, said the deficit in fiscal 2006 is more likely to reach $360 billion once additional war costs and some Hurricane Katrina-related expenses are counted.

DOJ_NMG_0012691

The Bush administration has been more pessimistic, saying this year's budget deficit will top $400 billion.

For the fiscal year starting October 1, CBO estimated the deficit would drop to $270 billion.

But CBO estimates do not include some big-ticket items not yet enacted by Congress, such as upcoming war costs and tax policy changes, which would significantly add to the flow of red ink.

Capital Economics, a London-based research firm, estimated a $351 billion U.S. budget deficit next year when taking into account the probable extension of some tax breaks and reforming other tax policies, as well as war costs.

The new budget deficit numbers prompted criticism from across the political spectrum.

The conservative Cato Institute praised the performance of a humming American economy and low taxes. But Stephen Slivinski, Cato's director of budget studies, said rapidly-growing government spending demonstrated that "there has yet to be any sign that Republicans are willing to really do what it takes to get the budget under control."

"MOUNTAIN OF DEBT"

Congressional Democrats said the CBO report challenges Bush administration claims that it is making progress in cutting the deficit, which began in fiscal 2001 with a $128 billion shortfall on the heels of a $236 billion surplus in fiscal 2000, the year before President George W. Bush took office.

Largely because of six consecutive years of budget deficits, Bush has had to ask Congress to increase U.S. borrowing authority by about $3 trillion.

"The Bush administration is accumulating a mountain of debt," said Rep. John Spratt (news, bio, voting record) of South Carolina, the senior Democrat on the House Budget Committee.

House Budget Committee Chairman Jim Nussle, an Iowa Republican, said the CBO report underscored the strength of the U.S. economy, but "also reminds us that controlling the budget is a long-term, step-by-step commitment."

Congress is bracing for a new White House request for Iraq and Afghanistan war funds, which is likely to be in the range of $80 billion to $100 billion. But only about $20 billion of that will be spent in this fiscal year, experts estimated.

The administration also noted that congressional plans to extend a tax provision keeping millions of middle-class families from paying the alternative minimum tax will add billions of dollars to the deficit.

Seeing continued strong U.S. economic growth, the CBO forecast real GDP growth of 3.6 percent this year and 3.4 percent in fiscal 2007. In 2008-2011, GDP will grow at an average rate of 3.1 percent, it estimated.

Despite the revenue rush generated by economic growth, the new budget deficit estimate for this year is up from CBO's August forecast of $314 billion and up from the actual fiscal 2005 deficit of $318.62 billion.

Over five years, 2006 to 2010, CBO sees a cumulative budget deficit totaling $1.329 trillion, according to the report.

Further darkening the fiscal picture, CBO said, is the likely explosion of government outlays in coming years as the baby boom generation begins to reach retirement age and draws government benefits. Congress is looking at ways to control the growth of these programs.

Bush Uses Humor To Deflect The Heat (AP-Y2)

By Nedra Pickler

AP2, January 27, 2006

President Bush's first news conference of the year was just a camera strap away from becoming hazardous to reporters.

As the president began his opening statement, a camera that the news service AFP had hung from the ceiling dropped and nearly fell on the heads below. It was caught by its strap, and Bush stopped and looked at it dangling precariously.

"Are you wearing your helmets?" he joked to reporters sitting in the White House briefing room.

Yes, Bush acknowledged, he had his picture taken with admitted criminal Jack Abramoff.

"Having my picture taken with someone doesn't mean that I'm a friend with him or know him very well," he said. "I've had my picture taken with you at holiday parties."

Another reporter pointed out that allegations of Abramoff's influence went beyond the photographs to questions of why he met with the president's top aides. The White House has refused to disclose just how often or why Abramoff was there, and Bush wasn't about to, either. He returned to jokes about the pictures.

"I mean, people, it's part of the job of the president to shake hands with people and smile," he said. He said he'd turn over records about Abramoff's meetings at the White House only to federal prosecutors if they suspected something inappropriate.

When a radio reporter asked the president again to never mind the photographs, just talk about lobbyists' influence on the White House, Bush interrupted: "Easy for a radio guy to say."

Financial Aid Growing Role For Lobbyists: Raising Funds For Lawmakers (WSJ)

By Brody Mullins, Staff Reporter Of The Wall Street Journal

The Wall Street Journal, January 27, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Nearly three years ago, Gregg Hartley left his job as a top aide to Republican Rep. Roy Blunt of Missouri to become a lobbyist. Mr. Hartley began helping companies like BellSouth Corp., Wal-Mart Stores Inc. and Viacom Inc. get audiences with Mr. Blunt and other top House Republicans and win some important legislative battles.

At the same time, Mr. Hartley was helping his old Capitol Hill boss raise campaign money and offering him political advice. Mr. Hartley is now assisting Mr. Blunt in his bid to succeed Rep. Tom DeLay as House majority leader. For the last three weeks, the lobbyist has offered strategic advice during regular visits to Mr. Blunt's office in the U.S. Capitol, according to people familiar with the meetings.

Mr. Hartley's dual roles highlight a practice that is becoming more common in Washington: Lobbyists are serving as principal fund-raisers for lawmakers they're trying to sway. Bruce Gates, the top political strategist for Mr. Blunt's main rival to become Majority Leader, Rep. John Boehner of Ohio, also is a lobbyist for private clients. William Oldaker, a lobbyist with numerous health-care clients, oversees fund raising for two dozen Democratic lawmakers, including Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada and Sen. Ted Kennedy of Massachusetts.

The Justice Department public-corruption and bribery case against lobbyist Jack Abramoff and a half-dozen members of Congress has refocused attention on the financial ties between lawmakers and lobbyists. While Mr. Abramoff's lobbying activities crossed the line into illegality, the practice of lobbyists raising large amounts of money for lawmakers is both legal and commonplace in Washington today.

Federal Election Commission records show that 71 lawmakers now list lobbyists as treasurers of their re-election or political action committees. In 1998, the number was just 15, according to a review of FEC reports by the Center for Public Integrity. Lawmakers attribute the change to the sharply rising costs of running campaigns.

In the long-running debate about whether lobbying money corrupts politics, Mr. Hartley's relationship with Mr. Blunt shows how deeply the financial ties run between Capitol Hill and the lobbyists on K Street. Advocates of change argue that lawmakers who rely on lobbyists become unduly beholden to them, and thus more willing to help their clients.

"By putting a lobbyist in charge of your political operations, you are conflicted from the start," argues Alex Knott of the nonpartisan Center for Public Integrity, which favors reducing the role of money in politics.

A spokeswoman for Mr. Blunt says there's nothing wrong with the congressman's close relationship with the lobbyist. In the leadership race, says his spokeswoman, Jessica Boulanger, the only involvement of Mr. Hartley "has been in the capacity of an old friend." Mr. Hartley hasn't called other members of Congress on Mr. Blunt's behalf, she notes. Mr. Blunt declines to comment. Mr. Hartley declines to discuss his fund-raising activities.

In the wake of the current lobbying scandal, lawmakers from both parties have been scrambling to introduce bills to reform the lobbying industry. But none of the leading proposals would ban lobbyists from continuing their fund-raising activities for members of Congress. House Speaker Dennis Hastert wants to ban lawmakers from accepting privately financed trips. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist would prohibit lawmakers' spouses and children from lobbying.

"We are carping on trifles here," said Sen. Richard J. Durbin, a Democrat from Illinois, during a Senate hearing on lobbying reform Wednesday. "Why is it that we warm up to all these lobbyists? It isn't for a meal.... We know when it comes time to finance our campaigns, we're going to be knocking on those same doors."

The lobbying reform legislation proposed by Sen. John McCain, the Arizona Republican, wouldn't ban lobbyists from raising money for members of Congress. But it would require them to disclose when they host fund-raisers for politicians. Rick Davis, the Republican lobbyist who helps run Mr. McCain's political operations, notes: "You would be hard pressed to find a single important lobbyist who is not involved in fund raising."

Lobbyists say they aren't violating any rules by moonlighting as fund-raisers. "I'm not a rule maker, I'm a game player," says David Girard-diCarlo, a managing partner at Philadelphia-based law firm Blank Rome who serves as national finance director for Republican Sen. Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania. Blank Rome has numerous lobbying clients. Mr. Girard-diCarlo oversees a group of more than 40 Washington lobbyists who hope to raise $4 million for Mr. Santorum's re-election bid. "The senator is most appreciative" of such fund-raising help, says Mr. Santorum's spokesman, Robert Traynham.

In addition to providing help with direct fund raising, Mr. Hartley is one of many lobbyists also helping members of Congress to raise money for specialized funding organizations called leadership PACs. Mr. Blunt and hundreds of other lawmakers in both parties have formed such PACs in order to help fellow party members facing close re-election races. Under federal election rules, lawmakers cannot donate more than $4,200 per election cycle from their own re-election coffers to the campaign of any colleague. But they can funnel as much as $10,000 per election cycle from leadership PACs to another campaign.

Reciprocal Support

In practice, such financial support from politically secure lawmakers for the re-election efforts of vulnerable colleagues often translates to reciprocal support down the road. Lawmakers draw on such support when angling for leadership positions within Congress.

"Leadership PACs originated as a way for one member to garner support from other members when seeking a leadership position in the House or Senate," Mr. Blunt wrote to the FEC in 2003. "More recently, leadership PACs have enabled the Republican party to maintain its majority in the House of Representatives."

When Republicans took over Congress in 1994, about 90 lawmakers operated such leadership PACs, which together raised a total of $28 million, according to the FEC. In the last election cycle, more than 300 leadership PACs took in $127 million.

Corporations represented by Mr. Hartley have donated more than $150,000 to Mr. Blunt's leadership PAC, the Rely On Your Beliefs Fund, known as the ROY B. Fund. Mr. Gates, the lobbyist with ties to Mr. Boehner, is treasurer of Mr. Boehner's leadership PAC, The Freedom Project. Mr. Boehner is Mr. Blunt's main rival for the majority leader post.

Both lawmakers are now recruiting congressional supporters for their majority-leader campaigns. Of the roughly 150 House Republicans who have announced who they will vote for, most have endorsed the candidate who has given them the most campaign money. Of Mr. Blunt's 91 publicly announced supporters, 68 have received money totalling $690,000 from Mr. Blunt's PAC, according to the Campaign for a Cleaner Congress, a congressional watchdog group.

Mr. Hartley, a 52-year-old fan of muscle cars and rock 'n' roll, was running a legal aid organization in his native Missouri when he met Mr. Blunt, who then worked as a country clerk. In 1992, Mr. Hartley raised money for Mr. Blunt's unsuccessful campaign for governor.

Four years later, Mr. Hartley helped Mr. Blunt, who is now 56, win a seat in Congress. Mr. Blunt, an ideological conservative, rose fast on Capitol Hill, winning the respect of moderate Republicans for his nonconfrontational approach. In 1999, when Rep. Dennis Hastert of Illinois was named speaker of the House, Rep. Tom DeLay tapped Mr. Blunt to replace Mr. Hastert as chief deputy whip.

Several years after arriving in Washington, Mr. Blunt married Abigail Pearlman, a lobbyist for the tobacco and food giant Altria Group Inc. Mr. Blunt's son, Andrew, is a lobbyist in Missouri whose clients include Altria, United Parcel Service Inc. and the former SBC Communications. Another son, Matt, is the current governor of Missouri.

When Mr. DeLay became majority leader in 2003, Mr. Blunt rose to Republican whip, the party's top House vote-counter. A few months later, Mr. Hartley left Capitol Hill to become a lobbyist with Cassidy & Associates, one of Washington's oldest and most successful lobbying firms.

Mr. Hartley's first clients were companies that had contributed money to Mr. Blunt and received legislative support from him. For example, Mr. Blunt had backed the Baby Bell phone companies in their battles with long-distance carriers and cable TV operators, and the Baby Bells had backed him with donations. They became Mr. Hartley's clients.

In July 2003, Mr. Hartley was hired by a coalition of major television networks -- General Electric Co.'s NBC, Viacom Inc.'s CBS, News Corp.'s FOX and Walt Disney Co.'s ABC. The networks were seeking to loosen rules governing their ownership of local TV stations.

Fierce Opposition

The Federal Communications Commission had proposed allowing the networks to own local stations covering 45% of U.S. households, up from the previous limit of 35%. By the time Mr. Hartley was hired, local broadcasters had mounted fierce opposition to the change, and more than two-thirds of Congress had announced their opposition to the move.

Mr. Blunt, however, joined other House Republican leaders in blocking the measure from reaching a floor vote. The standoff ended with a compromise: the network ownership limit was lifted to 39%. Mr. Hartley's network clients considered it a victory.

During this lobbying battle, Mr. Hartley was helping Mr. Blunt raise campaign money. Cassidy & Associates made available its skybox at Washington's MCI Center for a fund-raiser at a Simon and Garfunkel concert. Mr. Blunt reimbursed Cassidy for the cost of the seats. Last fall, Mr. Blunt rented the skybox again for a fund-raiser during a U2 concert.

At Cassidy, Mr. Hartley hired two former aides of Mr. Blunt and the husband of a third. After Mr. Blunt launched his campaign to replace Mr. DeLay as majority leader three weeks ago, Mr. Hartley began advising Mr. Blunt and his staff on the race, according to Republican aides involved in the matter.

"Roy has the trust and confidence in him that he had when Gregg was his chief of staff," says Drew Maloney, a lobbyist and former aide of Mr. DeLay who backs Mr. Blunt's campaign for majority leader. Dan Mattoon, a close adviser to House Speaker Dennis Hastert, calls Mr. Hartley "a very important part of Roy's outside operation."

DOJ_NMG_0012694

Mr. Hartley joined a small group of lobbyists who have helped plot strategy and raise money for other Republican leaders, such as Messrs. DeLay and Hastert. In January 2004, Mr. Hartley attended a dinner meeting hosted by Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff at Signatures, Mr. Abramoff's now-defunct Pennsylvania Avenue restaurant, to discuss ways to persuade Republican lobbyists and their clients to give more campaign contributions to Republicans.

During the 2003-04 election cycle, Mr. Hartley himself donated $74,500 to Mr. Hastert, Mr. DeLay and other congressional Republicans. He is on pace to match that level of giving once again in the 2006 election season.

McCain, Coburn To Force Votes On Pork Spending (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, January 27, 2006

Two Republican senators say they will force their colleagues to vote on the Senate floor on each so-called pork-barrel spending project this year, and President Bush also called for reforms to rein in the projects.

The battle over earmarks -- the line-item projects that members of Congress insert into spending bills to benefit their districts -- has ballooned as Republicans debate congressional reforms and budget deficits.

Republican Sens. John McCain of Arizona and Tom Coburn of Oklahoma sent a letter Wednesday night to their colleagues announcing they will use Senate rules to force members to vote on each project.

"American taxpayers are entitled to a more thorough debate and disclosure about how their money is being spent," the senators wrote.

The spending debate has risen to the top of the House Republican leadership contest, and is exposing a split in the party, as many conservatives say Republican congressional leaders and the White House have not taken a hard enough line on deficits.

Mr. Bush said at his press conference yesterday he is "fully prepared to use the veto" if Congress overspends, but he said that hasn't been necessary because Congress has actually met his spending targets.

The Congressional Budget Office yesterday said its fiscal 2006 deficit estimate is $337 billion, a figure that war costs could raise to about $360 billion. Fiscal 2005 ended on Sept. 30 with a $318 billion deficit.

The long-term outlook showed the deficit gone by 2012, but that assumes Mr. Bush's tax cuts expire in 2011. If the tax cuts are extended, the deficit would be more than $500 billion.

Democrats laid the blame directly at Mr. Bush's feet.

"Simply put, the Bush administration's deficit figures are a disgrace," said Rep. Charles B. Rangel of New York, the top Democrat on the Ways and Means Committee.

Meanwhile House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat, said the deficit is big in part because of "special-interest earmarks."

Mr. Bush yesterday weighed in on that debate, saying Congress will have to address earmarks and "special deals in the budget."

White House press secretary Scott McClellan said Mr. Bush wants budget reforms such as a line-item veto, which would allow him to strike earmarks, and a sunset commission to review federal programs.

Some members have proposed a ban on earmarks, but top Republican leaders such as House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert of Illinois have defended the practice.

"Who knows best where to put a bridge or a highway or a red light in their district," he said in a radio interview with Michael Reagan this week. "We need to change how we do earmarks, we need to do it in the light of day and not the last minute type of situation, but I think we can do some reform on that and still serve what's in the best interest of the American people."

In a column yesterday in Roll Call, a newspaper covering Capitol Hill, House Appropriations Committee Chairman Jerry Lewis, California Republican, said giving up earmarks would end the congressional power of the purse.

He has proposed putting a cap on the number of earmarks allowed per member, and requiring that the requester submit a letter that would be printed in the Congressional Record.

But earmark opponents like Rep. Jeff Flake, Arizona Republican, said capping the total number of earmarks would just mean lawmakers ask for bigger-ticket items.

The Congressional Research Service said earmarks have grown from 4,126 in 1994, the year before Republicans gained control of Congress, to 15,268 in 2005.

Some lawmakers say earmarks are a red herring in the fight to cut the deficit, but Mr. Coburn argues it's a mind-set and if Congress takes care of the small items, it will also take care of the big items.

Mr. Coburn had a mixed record with the spending floor votes he did force last year.

DOJ_NMG_0012695

He was unable to cut funding for the Defense Travel System and he lost, 82-15, a vote to strike money for the so-called "bridge to nowhere" in Alaska. But the public fight over the bridge led Republican leaders to drop the earmark a few weeks later.

K Street's New Ways Spawn More Pork (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman And Charles R. Babcock

The Washington Post, January 27, 2006

An explosion of special interest funding engineered in part by lawmakers with close ties to lobbyists is drawing increased scrutiny as Congress moves to address concern about corruption that already has led to the conviction of a Republican House member and former GOP lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

At issue is a symbiotic relationship between lawmakers well positioned to slip special-interest projects into legislation, and wealthy lobbying groups that raise large sums of campaign funds or provide trips and other benefits to those lawmakers.

In the latest example of these backstage dealings, Rep. John T. Doolittle (R-Calif.) told The Washington Post that he helped steer defense funding, totaling $37 million, to a California company, whose officials and lobbyists helped raise at least $85,000 for Doolittle and his leadership political action committee from 2002 to 2005.

Brent Wilkes, a director of the company, PerfectWave Technologies LLC, and a major contributor to House Republican leaders, was identified as "Coconspirator No. 1" in criminal charges brought against Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Calif.) late last year. Cunningham pleaded guilty in November and resigned from Congress after admitting he conspired to take $2.4 million in bribes in return for using his office to help Wilkes and another defense contractor, in part by placing earmarks in defense appropriations bills.

Doolittle said in a statement this week that as one of three California Republicans on the House Appropriations Committee, he frequently supports "well deserving projects throughout the state." The statement added that his support of PerfectWave Technology "was no exception and based completely on the project's merits and the written support of the military."

The link between special interests and members of Congress has grown so tight that nearly a dozen House and Senate members who control federal spending have retained lobbying veterans to raise campaign funds for them, and those lobbyists have secured lucrative favors in spending bills.

These relationships have coincided with the rapid growth in the volume of home-state pork-barrel projects, commonly called earmarks, that have swelled appropriations bills in recent years, according to congressional experts and watchdog groups.

Since the Republicans took control of Congress in 1994, the number of home-district earmarks jumped from 4,155 valued at about $29 billion in 1994 to 14,211 worth nearly $53 billion 10 years later, according to the Congressional Research Service.

Once a backwater for boutique lobbying shops, the House and Senate Appropriations committees are fueling a lobbying boom in Washington. The hunt for earmarks has become so consuming that lawmakers are neglecting other duties, said Scott Lilly, who recently retired as chief Democratic aide on the House Appropriations Committee. Last year, the committee received 10,000 requests for home-district projects on one spending bill alone -- 25.4 projects per lawmaker, said committee spokesman John Scofield.

"It has become an obsession of the Congress," Lilly said. "That's all they do."

Traditionally, Congress has provided large pots of money to federal, state and local agencies, such as housing authorities and transportation departments, which then funded specific programs based on merit and local need. The Appropriations committees funded specific projects only when they had been vetted and approved by authorizing committees, such as the Armed Services Committee.

But increasingly, lawmakers have gone around authorizers and agency officials to finance pet projects in their home districts. House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) secured $207 million for the "Prairie Parkway" through Kane and Kendall counties in Illinois in last year's major highway law, although the Illinois Department of Transportation is only two years into a five-year study of the project and has not yet determined whether a highway is needed or whether improvements to existing roads would suffice.

The hunt for earmarks on Capitol Hill and on K Street has opened up new avenues for lobbyists and lawmakers to come together. Seven members of the House Appropriations Committee -- Chairman Jerry Lewis (R-Calif.), Ernest J. Istook Jr. (R-Okla.), Kay Granger (R-Tex.), Dennis Rehberg (R-Mont.), John E. Sweeney (R-N.Y.), Rosa L. DeLauro (D-Conn.) and Ed Pastor (D-Ariz.) -- have political action committees headed by registered lobbyists or former registered lobbyists with business before the committee, according to the Center for Public Integrity and campaign records.

David A. Metzner, treasurer of Sweeney's Freshmen PAC, has represented the Association of American Railroads; it is a frequent petitioner of the House Appropriations subcommittee for the departments of Transportation, the Treasury, and Housing and Urban Development, on which the New York Republican sits. Leon G. Billings, DeLauro's treasurer and longtime friend, has represented groups such as the American Lung Association and the Lincoln Pulp and Paper Co. His lobbying registration for the Industry Urban Development Agency targets the Appropriations energy and water development subcommittee's bill.

In the Senate, Appropriations Committee members Larry E. Craig (R-Idaho), Byron L. Dorgan (D-N.D.), Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) and Ted Stevens (R-Alaska) have retained PAC treasurers who have served as Appropriations lobbyists. Richard B. Ladd, treasurer of Stevens's Northern Lights PAC, has lobbied the Appropriations defense subcommittee on the behalf of defense contractors. William C. Oldaker, who heads the PACs of Reid and Dorgan, has lobbied multiple Appropriations subcommittees for the universities, science centers and municipal water districts he has represented, according to Senate lobbying records.

"It's completely out of control, and we are not going to reform a system, as far as lobbying is concerned, if we have a process that lends itself to one influential lobbyist with a relationship with one member," Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) told reporters this month.

Chairman Lewis strongly defended his committee, saying that after years of unchecked growth, the value of home-district earmarks retreated in the spending bills for this fiscal year by nearly $3 billion. One bill, funding labor, health and education programs, was voted down by the House the first time it went to the floor, in part because Lewis stripped it of every earmark. The problem, Lewis said, is with the campaign finance system. Lobbyists, such as his friend Bill Lowery, are helping to raise money to keep Republicans in the majority, and Lewis would not apologize for that.

"If you're going to impact public policy, you have to be in the majority," he said. "I don't back off that responsibility at all. Mr. Lowery is only one piece of that, and frankly a relatively small piece of it."

In a series of articles last month, Copley News Service laid out the relationship between the two that included Lowery raising campaign funds for Lewis, the exchange of longtime staff members and the channeling of millions of dollars to Lowery's California clients.

Lowery, the partners at his firm -- Copeland, Lowery, Jacquez, Denton & White -- and their clients have donated more than a third of the $1.3 million that Lewis's political action committee has raised in the past six years. One longtime member of Lewis's staff, Jeff S. Shockey, left Capitol Hill to join Lowery's firm, then returned recently as the House Appropriations Committee's deputy staff director. Letitia H. White, a Lewis staffer for 21 years, began lobbying for Lowery in 2003.

Wilkes, the California businessman linked to the Cunningham corruption case, began tapping federal spending sources in the mid-1990s, after Cunningham helped him win at least $80 million in Pentagon earmarks for a company he ran that converted paper documents to digital images.

In mid-2002, Wilkes became involved with a new company, PerfectWave Technologies LLC. He then retained the Alexander Strategy Group, a high-powered firm operated by former aides to then-House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Tex.), to lobby for defense appropriations. Wilkes was seeking funding for the development of an "automated speech recognition technology."

Shortly thereafter, individuals related to Wilkes and PerfectWave made large campaign donations to members of the GOP leadership, Doolittle and Lewis, who was then chairman of the Appropriations defense subcommittee. PerfectWave is housed in Wilkes's office building in Poway, Calif.

Doolittle and his leadership PAC received at least $85,000 from 2002 to 2005 from Wilkes, PerfectWave associates and their wives, and from Alexander Strategy lobbyists Edwin A. Buckham and Tony C. Rudy and their wives.

Wilkes was successful. Congress approved the first earmark for PerfectWave as part of the fiscal 2003 defense bill, which was passed in October 2002. That $1 million earmark was followed by an installment of $18 million in 2003 and another $18 million in 2004. Doolittle, whose district is in Northern California, was a guest at a fundraising dinner at Wilkes's office in San Diego in the fall of 2003.

Doolittle's office released a letter from a Marine Corps official dated last Feb. 25 that praised the PerfectWave technology. A spokesman for the House Appropriations Committee said there are no additional funds for the project in the fiscal 2006 budget because the Marines have not spent all the money that was earmarked.

Capital's New Four-Letter Word (WP)

By Shailagh Murray

The Washington Post, January 27, 2006

These are dark days for earmarks.

Packing bills with special provisions has long been an honored tradition in Congress, but now a pall has fallen over the practice. Bolstered by a budget crisis and a series of scandals involving legislative favors, an increasingly prolific government watchdog movement is turning "pork" into a four-letter word.

These scrappy outfits are run by small corps of veteran staffers whose offices look more like dorm rooms than the posh K Street suites occupied by their archnemeses: lobbyists. Taxpayers for Common Sense elevated an obscure Alaska highway project into the now-infamous "Bridge to Nowhere." Citizens Against Government Waste started battling runaway Hurricane Katrina spending three days after the storm hit the Gulf Coast.

The two groups joined forces this month with the National Taxpayers Union, a conservative, low-tax organization, to combat the rising cost of the new D.C. baseball stadium. Other watchdog targets include indicted former representative Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Calif.), the Pentagon and the U.S. Postal Service.

The watchdogs work closely with friendly lawmakers, such as Sen. Tom Coburn (R-Okla.), who tried to redirect funding for the "Bridge to Nowhere" to a New Orleans bridge ruined by Hurricane Katrina. The informal investigative alliance also includes Internet bloggers, including a "porkbusters" campaign on the site truthlaidbear.com, an online effort to mobilize against wasteful federal spending.

"It's a $2.4 trillion budget," said Steve Ellis, vice president of Taxpayers for Common Sense. "There's work for everybody."

Congress is embarrassed enough by the Cunningham and Jack Abramoff scandals, both involving huge sums of cash for legislative favors, that lawmakers are considering ways to crack down on earmarks, which typically show up in bills at the last minute, after little or no scrutiny. The watchdog groups are wary that Congress will wind up focusing on lobbying-related activities, rather than cleaning up the legislative process.

"We hope that there's a recognition that it's not just lobbying," said Thomas A. Schatz, president of Citizens Against Government Waste. "It's more a matter of how the whole process works."

Although Republicans claim to be the party of small government and fiscal restraint, Schatz's group found that total earmarks rose to 13,997 in 2005, a huge increase from the 1995 total of 1,349. The process appears to have slowed with the fiscal 2006 appropriations bills, with the exception of the defense measure, which preliminary analysis by the groups suggests is the usual earmark treasure trove.

Coburn, one of the Senate's toughest earmark critics, attributed the watchdog movement's growing influence to a decline in congressional oversight. What he calls "an army of citizen investigators" is "filling an oversight gap created by Congress's refusal to perform one of its core responsibilities," Coburn said.

Appropriations Chairman Thad Cochran (R-Miss.) noted that Senate rules already allow senators to attempt to strike provisions from bills -- as Coburn tried with his "Bridge to Nowhere" amendment. And while there may be earmarking excesses, Cochran added, the practice is entwined with one of the most sacrosanct of Congress's duties: deciding how federal money is spent.

"It serves a useful purpose for people to point out things," said Cochran, referring to the watchdog groups. But he added, "I think senators would be reluctant to approve a law that says you can't have any specific project appropriated in a bill."

The movement's ideological roots range from liberal to libertarian. Taxpayers for Common Sense, created 10 years ago, regards the late former senator William Proxmire (D-Wis.) as its spiritual leader and has taken over his Golden Fleece Award, created in 1975 to highlight wasteful projects. Proxmire gave the National Science Foundation the first Golden Fleece, for spending $84,000 to study why people fall in love.

Citizens Against Government Waste was founded in 1984 by the industrialist J. Peter Grace and the syndicated columnist Jack Anderson, now both deceased. It is also the legacy of President Ronald Reagan's "Private Sector Survey on Cost Control," directed in 1982 to "work like tireless bloodhounds to root out government inefficiency and waste of tax dollars." Other groups include the National Taxpayers Union, founded in 1969, which has already set its sights on the farm bill that expires in 2007.

The groups' bread and butter are the vast databases they compile that break down earmarks by state or individual lawmaker. They also rely on tips.

About five years ago, an Alaska environmentalist contacted Keith Ashdown at Taxpayers for Common Sense about a proposal for a massive bridge that would have linked the town of Ketchikan to the more sparsely populated Gravina Island. The group spent more than a year examining the project and awarded it a Golden Fleece on June 12, 2003.

Even Ashdown was surprised when the final highway authorization bill emerged last summer with a whopping $223 million for the Ketchikan bridge. At most, he had expected a few million dollars.

The bridge attracted a blizzard of adverse publicity, and later last year, Congress redirected the money to allow Alaska to spend it on other transportation projects. Ashdown, meanwhile, has moved on to a new project.

He heard about this one from a Gulf Coast resident. According to the e-mail he received, Mississippi wants to spend more than $200 million to repair the U.S. 90 Biloxi Bay Bridge, which was damaged last summer by Hurricane Katrina.

But the bridge could be obsolete before it is finished, the tipster warned, pending the outcome of a debate over relocating the highway. Ashdown is looking into the project and already has a name for it: the "Bridge Over Troubled Waters."

Spend-and-Collect Beltway Party Really Knows Jack (WSJ)

By Daniel Henninger

The Wall Street Journal, January 27, 2006

Jack Abramoff. Jack Abramoff. Jack Abramoff. Once the hunt's on, some names sound to the scandal born. Tongsun Park, Charles Keating, Elizabeth Ray, Fannie Fox, Susan McDougal. Now comes Jack, the central figure in what Beltway Democrats are trying to build into a bonfire that will burn down Republican control of Congress. Every time someone tells Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid that he, too, took money from Jack's clients, he starts jumping up and down like Rumpelstiltskin yelling, "This is a Republican scandal!" Harry Reid, Harry Reid. One could get used to that.

Poll after poll says the public thinks both parties are equally corrupt. It depends, of course, on what the meaning of corruption is. If by corrupt you mean lobbyist sleaze, quid pro quo, the pork barrel, earmarks to nowhere and grossing out even the public's generally low expectations, then yes, both parties are equally corrupt.

But it gets worse. Congress legislated the system that now exists. Congress planted the seeds back in the '70s for what is revolting you now with two enactments -- the Budget and Impoundment Control Act of 1974 and the 1974 amendments to the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971. Both were marketed as reforms.

The first law turned political Washington into a trillion-dollar industry camouflaged as the federal budget. The second ensured that sitting members of Congress and K Street lobbyists would become the entrenched management of that industry. Compared to this, Enron is a kindergarten game.

This is a history worth knowing and retelling. It all came to life amid another famous scandal, Watergate, and the most famous such name of all, Richard Nixon.

Nixon's impeachment is wholly linked in history to the Watergate scandal. But, in fact, his battles with the Democratically controlled Congress over spending authority also greased his fall. As had Presidents Truman, Kennedy and Johnson, Nixon tried to control Congress's spending by "impounding" -- refusing to spend -- specific appropriations.

Congress itself had tried various gimmicks to stanch the Great Society's costs, such as "spending ceilings." None worked, as indeed no gaggle of legislators will discipline themselves. Nixon resorted to the blunt club of impoundments. Congress went bananas. This battle, fought inside the partisan cauldron of the Vietnam War, led to the oddly named 1974 Budget Control Act, which purposely eviscerated presidential control over individual spending items, such as an earmark. To kill a "bridge to nowhere," a president has to veto the entire highway bill. Ditto defense pork and so on.

The 1974 Act did give the president "rescission" authority -- a request not to spend money on a project. But the law also said that if Congress never took a vote to affirm the rescission, the money went out the door. Absurd, but that's current law. Congressional Quarterly, in a 1982 study of the struggle over spending control, quoted a budget official then predicting the future: "What we're talking about here is congressional government -- and chaos."

But they weren't done. In 1974 -- the start the Long Era of Chaos in our politics -- Congress claimed it was curing the abuses of Watergate by mandating that no individual could contribute more than $1,000 to a candidate per election. So of course candidates were going to need a lot of "individual" contributions to finance a modern campaign. Thus was born the current co-dependency between members of Congress who hold the power to confer federal spending and Washington lobbyists who have the power to bundle campaign contributions in PACs and such for incumbent earmarkers.

A friend who was part of this world back then described it for me recently: "If you lived in Washington in those years, the change was dramatic. We moved to California in 1973. Returning to visit in 1976, the evening landscape had changed completely. There were fundraisers everywhere. Friends who were Congressmen were stopping at two or three cocktail parties an evening, touching base with single-subject organizations who had established PACs in reply to the 1974 reforms. We knew a caterer; her life had changed." Her business today is probably a publicly traded company, so vast has the industry of Beltway spending and campaign-contribution collecting become. Washington today is enervated by it. * * *

Abolish the individual limits on campaign contributions but require public disclosure on the Web. Democrats James Carville and Paul Begala recently proposed making this the basis of creating a new campaign-finance system. But beyond this lies the question of whether Democrats and Republicans want to fix Washington. Are they really separate parties, or just one entity -- the Beltway Party?

I don't see how the Democrats have any practical or ideological incentive to stop the federal government's inexorable 70-year-long growth. This is what they want -- more. For them, the Abramoffs of the world are reindeer pulling Santa's sleigh. By contrast, the Blunt-Boehner-Shadegg fight for the House leadership is an ideological argument over what Republicans should be amid a federal establishment that metastasized after the 1974 changes.

The failed 1974 Budget Act, which released the earmark and spending ghouls, makes clear that some workable form of presidential spending control has to be in the game. Presidential line-item veto power would require a constitutional amendment. Real rescission authority would help, but that has to pass through Congress and maybe a court challenge. Oh gosh, I almost forgot. Unlike from 1960 to 1994, the Republicans control Congress, and arguably all three branches of government. Does that matter? We'll find out this November and in 2008, when Republicans will either vote or sit.

I wish President Bush would put this issue of what Washington has become into his State of the Union speech Tuesday. My guess is he won't, recalling what happened when Richard Nixon tried to fight both a major war and the party that controls Congress, which for the foreseeable future looks like it will be the Beltway Spend-and-Collect Party.

For Blunt, Pressure Grows For Q&A With Rivals (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, January 27, 2006

WASHINGTON -- As the House Republican leader's race goes into its final week, Majority Whip Roy Blunt faces growing pressure to appear with his two rivals before the caucus and answer questions on where he wants to take the party after the spate of recent scandals.

Mr. Blunt is widely seen as the frontrunner for the post vacated by Texas Rep. Tom DeLay. But the Missourian also has seemed insecure, refusing to give up his whip's position and avoiding any joint television appearances where he can be questioned with the two other candidates, Reps. John Boehner of Ohio and John Shadegg of Arizona.

The latest episode surrounds a closed-door party meeting Wednesday, before the Feb. 2 leadership vote. Aides to Rep. Deborah Pryce (R., Ohio), who chairs the House Republican Conference, had discussed a proposed format that allowed each candidate to speak for two minutes, after which there would be 10 minutes for questions.

A spokeswoman for Mr. Blunt said that he would "be more than willing absolutely" to agree to a question-and-answer session "if that's what Ms. Pryce decided." But behind the scenes, Republicans said there was resistance from the Blunt camp, which felt caught by surprise by the suggested format. And in a letter announcing the meeting, Ms. Pryce doesn't mention questions, writing only that "Any potential candidate will be given an opportunity to speak briefly to the Conference."

Sean Spicer, communications director for the Conference, dismissed inquiries about the matter, saying ideas were floated by staff but were of no consequence if not in Ms. Pryce's letter. But he was among those who had promoted the 10-minute Q&A format within Ms. Pryce's operation, and spokesmen for both Reps. Boehner and Shadegg said they hoped it would be restored.

The absence of more open debate is striking given the context of the leadership contest. Mr. DeLay agreed to vacate the leadership post after being indicted in Texas in October on alleged campaign finance violations and then watching his ally, Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff, plead guilty to three felonies in federal court this month. Heading into November's elections, the contest is particularly important, and both Reps. Boehner and Blunt have an eye to positioning themselves to become speaker after Speaker Dennis Hastert (R., Ill.) steps down in 2008.

"This race is very different" Mr. Shadegg said. "The conference is under a magnifying glass as a result of the climate we're in and I think a lot of people are looking at what we do."

Mr. Blunt claims he has already more than the 116 votes needed to win, but only about 92 of his supporters have been willing to make their names public. Meanwhile, Reps. Boehner and Shadegg are fighting to get past one another into a second ballot face-off with the frontrunner.

"We're working very hard to get to the second ballot and we think our numbers are very close," Mr. Shadegg said. Rep. Ray LaHood (R., Ill.), a Boehner backer predicts the Ohio lawmaker, who chairs the House Education and Workforce Committee, will survive and then pick up enough of the Shadegg camp to prevail over Mr. Blunt. "I think it would be decided by five votes or fewer," he said.

House Whip Race Indicates Trend To Conservatism (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, January 27, 2006

The House majority whip's race is an indication of just how conservative the House Republican Conference has become.

Two 1994 Republican revolutionaries and two fast-rising Republican stars face off in a contest they all say is about making the party refocus on basic conservative principles.

"Sometimes old institutions tend to drift away from their original intention. I thought I could be that breath of fresh air and just provide some direction of why we do what we do," said Rep. Mike Rogers, Michigan Republican and one of the candidates.

He is running against Rep. Eric Cantor of Virginia, Rep. Todd Tiahrt of Kansas and Rep. Zach Wamp of Tennessee. Mr. Tiahrt and Mr. Wamp were part of the Class of 1994, while Mr. Rogers and Mr. Cantor were elected in 2000.

All four rank among the most conservative members of the House: They earned "A" or "A+" grades from the National Rifle Association, had strong marks from the National Taxpayers Union and have lifetime ratings of 90 percent or better from the American Conservative Union.

DOJ_NMG_0012700

The whip, the No. 3 position in the Republican hierarchy, is supposed to assess where House Republicans are on issues and build support for Republican priorities.

As of now, it's not clear the position will even be open. The current whip, Rep. Roy Blunt of Missouri, is running for majority leader but has not relinquished his seat.

For that reason the whip's race has been far less public. Mr. Rogers has been the most active publicly, giving a series of speeches this week on issues such as intelligence and economic competitiveness.

The former FBI agent says he has experience winning close races -- he won his congressional seat by 111 votes in 2000 and, before that, won a Michigan Senate leadership election by one vote -- that will serve him well as whip.

He said Republicans are right on the issues, but they need to do a better job of communicating them.

"If we are going to be relevant for Americans, we have to be able to sit around any kitchen table in this country with our principles, our conservative principles about smaller, efficient government, about a helping hand, not a handout," he said.

Unlike the majority leader's race, those in the whip's race are not releasing lists of publicly committed members.

Mr. Wamp is positioning himself as the person willing to challenge the conference.

"This is a real challenge for us to hold our majority and who's willing to push the reforms that are needed," he said.

He said he's the only one of the four who is not part of the current whip's team, and therefore the only one outside of the political team Rep. Tom DeLay of Texas built.

Mr. Tiahrt said being on the whip's team is a key benefit. "I've got the most experience of people in this race."

He has taken a major role in pushing American economic competitiveness and said as whip he would push for the House to do more by doing less.

He said they often step on their own toes, passing good bills but drowning out that message by doing too much.

"It's important that we have a firm, focused voice on our leadership team that brings us back to a smarter schedule that brings legislation to the floor that reflects who we are and why we're in Washington," he said.

Mr. Cantor said reform means more than just the scandals -- it means returning to balanced budgets, changing the spending process and reforming the tax system.

"My goal is 10 months from now when we have an election, not for voters to be going to the polls with the choice of how do we clean up Congress," he said.

On spending reforms, Mr. Cantor said he will lead by example and reduce the number of earmarks he submits.

"At the end of the day we will be well-led, and it will be a conservative. There probably isn't a hair's-breadth difference between Cantor, Rogers, Wamp and Tiahrt in voting [records]," Mr. Rogers said.

Senate Questioning Bush Policies, But Administration Fighting Back (KRT)

By James Kuhnhenn

Knight Ridder, January 27, 2006

WASHINGTON - After years of deferring to the Bush White House, the Republican-controlled Senate has begun pushing back, holding oversight hearings on topics ranging from President Bush's response to Hurricane Katrina to his administration's mine-safety record and the president's secret domestic-surveillance program.

Administration officials are fighting back.

An administration mine-safety official walked out of a Senate hearing this week, angering its powerful Republican chairman. The White House refused to give another Senate committee documents it sought about Katrina. The administration is trying to dismiss critics of its eavesdropping program as clueless partisans, though many of them are Republicans.

White House officials and their allies maintain that their stance protects inherent executive power. Critics say the administration's reaction to the Senate's inquiries is an assault on Congress' constitutional role as a coequal branch of government that checks and balances the executive.

"There is always a tension between Congress and the executive on information-sharing," said Sen. Joseph Lieberman of Connecticut, a Democrat who's generally friendly to Bush but has accused the White House of stonewalling over Katrina information.

"This administration, certainly among the three that I've served under," he said, "is the most restrictive and protective about sharing information."

The Bush administration has never been shy about testing the limits of its executive power. Vice President Dick Cheney refused to divulge the identities of energy executives who advised him on energy policy. The administration wouldn't give Congress up-to-date cost estimates of its prescription-drug legislation. The Pentagon is often stingy about data related to the war in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0012701

-A Senate Appropriations subcommittee had sharp words Monday for federal mining safety officials, blaming improper enforcement of regulations for the recent deaths of 14 miners in West Virginia. Two hours into the hearing, the acting head of the Mine Safety and Health Administration, David Dye, left despite requests from subcommittee Chairman Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., that he stay and answer further questions.

-Federal agencies have refused to turn over documents about their communications with the White House related to Hurricane Katrina to two congressional committees that are investigating the federal response to the disaster.

-Specter has scheduled hearings for Feb. 6 on whether the president was legally permitted to authorize wiretaps in the United States without court warrants. The administration has mounted an effort to portray those who question the legitimacy of the program as out of touch with the realities of post-Sept. 11 counterterrorism.

Such challenging examinations of the administration were virtually unheard-of during Bush's first term, when Congress wanted to cooperate with the president in the aftermath of the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks and he was highly popular with the public.

Since then, Bush's standing has plummeted. His response to Katrina, the continuing bad news from Iraq and other controversies have eroded his popularity.

In addition, with congressional elections in November, Republicans aren't as concerned about advancing the president's agenda as they are in advancing themselves. Both Republicans and Democrats have decided to resist Bush's expansion of presidential authority.

Congress watchers say hearings into Katrina, mine safety and wiretaps represent the least of what a muscular Congress should be doing to fulfill its oversight responsibilities.

"Congress is showing some tendons; it hasn't reached the level of a muscle yet," Specter said.

"Oversight is an ongoing process by which Congress keeps an eye on the executive branch agencies," said Gary Bass, the executive director of OMB-Watch, a nonpartisan group that keeps tabs on federal policy-making. "That is not what I see happening."

Norman Ornstein, a veteran congressional scholar at the American Enterprise Institute, a conservative research center, said today's rare display of oversight broke a five-year pattern of almost undeviating loyalty to the president.

He said House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., and Senate Republican leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., "don't see themselves as heads of an independent branch.

"They see themselves as field generals in the army of the president."

But some, such as Specter and Sen. Susan Collins, R-Maine, now are leading inquiries into administration actions. Collins, who's chairing the Katrina investigation, has objected to the White House's refusal to turn over some documents and its instructions to agency officials not to reveal their communications with the White House about the hurricane.

"There are legitimate privileges that the president can cite," she said. "But what is unacceptable for me is for the White House to tell officials in other agencies that they can't even tell us who they called in the White House. That is a real stretch, and that is not a legitimate privilege that the White House has a right to exercise."

Specter simply raises an eyebrow at Bush's claims that those who seek to investigate his spying program are partisans living in a "pre-9/11 world."

"There are lots of fellows with `R' (Republican) after their name who are pretty sensible people who think this ought to be done," he said.

Article One of the Constitution gives Congress its powers. Among the powers that permit the Senate to check and balance the executive branch are:

-The power, shared with the House of Representatives, to enact laws.

-The power to try all impeachment cases brought by the House.

-The power to advise and consent to executive and judicial nominations or to reject them.

-The power, shared with the House, to declare war.

-The power, shared with the House, to determine federal taxes, spending and borrowing.

-The power, shared with the House, to override presidential vetoes.

-The power, shared with the House, to regulate interstate commerce.

Air Traffic Controllers Make Alliance With Senators In Dispute With FAA (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, January 27, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0012702

The union representing air traffic controllers is looking to Capitol Hill for help in contentious contract negotiations with the Federal Aviation Administration.

Four Democratic senators introduced a bill yesterday that would permit labor disputes at the FAA to be settled through binding arbitration, John S. Carr , president of the National Air Traffic Controllers Association, announced.

The unusual move by NATCA -- to seek congressional support for changes in FAA labor procedures while at the bargaining table -- came a day after FAA officials held a news conference to say they had regained control of a New York radar center and brought an end to abusive overtime, sick leave and workers' compensation practices by controllers there.

In recent weeks, both sides have accused the other of making false claims, engaging in publicity stunts and twisting numbers on controller compensation in an effort to shape public perceptions about the negotiations. The FAA is one of the rare places in government where unions can bargain over pay.

Contract talks are scheduled to run through the first full week of March, and union officials contend that the FAA does not intend to bargain in good faith and will run out the clock on the talks. The agency denies the charge, arguing that a voluntary settlement is best for both parties.

If contract talks break down, the FAA might send its last offer to Congress for a 60-day review. If Congress takes no action, the FAA may impose its version of the contract on the union.

Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) said he and colleagues proposed arbitration "to help defuse the growing management-labor tension at the FAA."

Under the Obama bill, if the FAA and one of its unions failed to reach a voluntary agreement, the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service would be called on to try again for a settlement. If mediation failed, Congress could impose the FAA's last, best offer on employees by approving it in legislation. If Congress did not act, the impasse would go to binding arbitration.

Joining Obama in introducing the bill were Sens. Daniel K. Inouye (D-Hawaii), Patty Murray (D-Wash.) and Frank Lautenberg (D-N.J.).

Carr called the bill "a matter of fundamental fairness" and said the union would seek to win Republican support. Although it seems unlikely that Republican leaders will move the bill fast enough to affect current contract talks, Carr expressed optimism, saying, "I really believe it has got legs."

The head of the FAA, Marion C. Blakey , ruled out "changing the rules of the game during halftime" in a letter to Carr this month.

She said the labor rules are "part of a carefully balanced approach" that gives the union the right to bargain over pay and benefits and gives Congress "the final say in any pay dispute." Turning impasses over to an arbitrator would take away authority that belongs to the president and Congress, Blakey said.

She added that the current approach has allowed NATCA "to enjoy unprecedented wage gains" that have made air traffic controllers among the highest paid federal employees.Postal Blitz, Day 2

Postal officials continued their efforts to kill a Senate bill that would overhaul operations at the U.S. Postal Service, holding a news conference to list objections and to note that they have the support of the American Postal Workers Union.

Richard Strasser , the Postal Service's chief financial officer, said the bill, in combination with White House policy requirements, "will cause us to get into an immediate rate case that will be larger than it has ever been" and drive up stamp prices by 18 to 20 percent.

Sens. Susan Collins (R-Maine) and Thomas R. Carper (D-Del.), the bill's sponsors, said postal officials were "distorting our position and blatantly misleading our colleagues and the public." In a statement, they said, "The Postal Service appears to have sunk to a new low."

Leaders of the National Association of Letter Carriers and the National Rural Letter Carriers Association issued a statement in support of the bill.Talk Show

Justice And Junkets (NYT)

The New York Times, January 27, 2006

Justice Antonin Scalia certainly has poor judgment when it comes to vacations.

Justice Scalia was apparently unchastened by the criticism of his 2004 duck-hunting excursion with Vice President Dick Cheney, one of that term's most prominent Supreme Court litigants. Last September, he skipped the swearing-in of Chief Justice John Roberts Jr. because of another ethically dubious trip, this time to the posh Ritz-Carlton at the Beaver Creek ski resort in Colorado.

DOJ_NMG_0012703

He was there to teach a 10-hour seminar over a couple of days for a conservative group, the Federalist Society. "Nightline" recently reported that the gig had left Justice Scalia plenty of time for tennis, fly-fishing and socializing with seminar participants, some of whom may have business before the Supreme Court. One Federalist Society cocktail reception was sponsored in part by the lobbying and law firm that used to employ Jack Abramoff, Tom DeLay's convicted pal and benefactor for golf trips.

Justice Scalia's travel is part of a broader affliction on the federal bench. The Los Angeles Times reported in 2004, for example, that Justice Clarence Thomas had accepted thousands of dollars in gifts in recent years, including an $800 leather jacket, a $1,200 set of tires from Nascar and an extravagant vacation from a conservative activist. Federal judges below the Supreme Court level accept dozens of free vacations each year from well-heeled special interests under the guise of "judicial education."

The judicial lobbying problem is more serious in one respect than the scandal enveloping Congress. Lawmakers operate in an overtly political environment, but the decision-making process of judges is supposed to be impermeable to clever efforts by special interests to buy access and favor.

Three Democratic senators with a longstanding concern about this problem — Patrick Leahy of Vermont, Russell Feingold of Wisconsin and John Kerry of Massachusetts — are readying provisions to ban junkets and other compromising gifts for judges, which they hope to make part of their party's lobbying reform proposal. For Congress to pass a lobbying reform bill that curbs inappropriate perks for lawmakers but not for federal judges would be a scandal in itself.

Hamas Win Shatters Status Quo (CSM)

By Ilene R. Prusher

The Christian Science Monitor, January 27, 2006

JERUSALEM - The Islamic group Hamas staged a stunning upset of the ruling Fatah faction in Palestinian parliamentary polls Wednesday, winning a solid outright majority of the total 132 seats and making the strongest ever showing of an Islamist movement in the Arab world.

With such a decisive win, Hamas is unlikely to need a coalition partner, sidelining the Palestine Liberation Organization's Fatah Party and promising to redefine the troubled Middle East peace process.

Hamas, which rejected the 1993 Oslo Accords that founded the Palestinian Authority (PA), was ebullient over its mandate, but said it would not change its fundamental stance: It will not disarm its military wing and will not revise its charter calling for Israel's destruction.

The surprise victory of Hamas presents a radical about-face for Palestinian relations with Israel, has reverberations for Muslim countries through the Middle East, and raises questions for the international community at large.

According to results released Thursday based on 95 percent of the vote, Hamas won 76 seats to Fatah's 43 seats. Smaller and independent parties took the remaining 13 seats.

Both the US and the European Union have stated that they would not deal with Hamas because they deem it a terrorist organization. But the PA, badly in need of financial aid and actively seeking intervention from world powers in its conflict with Israel, will now be led by an organization that came into the world's consciousness through suicide bombings in Israel.

But what Hamas has lacked in international legitimacy, it clearly has secured in domestic esteem. "Hamas's key was to position itself not in terms of ideology, but as the address of choice for those seeking to cast a protest vote," says Mouin Rabbani, a Middle East analyst with the International Crisis Group and an expert on the Israeli-Arab conflict, and a contributing editor of Middle East Report.

"Unlike Fatah, the next government will enjoy a lot of popular support and legitimacy," he says. "I don't think even Hamas was expecting anything like this result, and this means they are faced with strategic issues that they didn't mean to deal with as of yet."

Indeed, the questions that have suddenly been thrust upon Palestinians and Israelis are intricate and endless. In a Hamas-run PA, what happens to crucial cooperation that goes on with Israel? Even in the worst of times, Israeli and Palestinian officials cooperate on security issues, border crossings, information sharing, commercial relations, and basic utilities.

Shocked Israeli leaders, still struggling for stability amid the power vacuum left by Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's massive stroke have been reticent to react, waiting instead for more definitive results.

But Benjamin Netanyahu, the Likud party candidate in the Israeli elections scheduled for March, compared the Hamas win to putting the equivalent of Iran or the Taliban within 1,000 meters of the Israeli capital.

DOJ_NMG_0012704

On the streets of Gaza, where the organization was founded in 1987, the mood was triumphant. At the home of Said Siam, a Hamas leader who won a seat, supporters crowded his courtyard to offer congratulations. Mr. Siam says Hamas wants to find common ground with all the Palestinian factions to form an inclusive government. He left open the possibility of negotiating with Israel and continuing violent resistance.

"When Fatah was in power, they had resistance groups and negotiations at the same time," Siam says. "As of now, it is not on Hamas's agenda to negotiate with Israel. "Israel is an occupying state. When Israel agrees to give the Palestinians full rights, after that Hamas will decide" whether to negotiate.

Whether Hamas wants to place one of its officials as prime minister, and whether its militant Qassam Brigade disarms or merges with the PA security forces, were all matters up for discussion, he says.

Meanwhile, Fatah supporters lamented their stunning defeat. "It's so sad, we don't know what the future of our country will be," says taxi driver Kamal Abu Foz. "The international community and Israel won't deal with Hamas, and Hamas can't deliver us a state."

In Jerusalem, former President Jimmy Carter, head of an multinational observer mission for the Palestinian vote, urged the US and Europe not to abandon the PA's financial needs. He said that according to the World Bank's most current figures, the Palestinian government will run out of funds by the end of February, and already faces a $900 million shortfall.

"There are some legal loopholes that can be utilized to help the Palestinians that don't have to go through the Palestinian Authority," Mr. Carter said, in response to questions over whether his call for international assistance - including from Washington - contradicts longstanding US policy about not working with any group it deems a terrorist organization.

In the West Bank city of Ramallah, many expect that Islamic Hamas will soften its positions. Much of Ramallah's cosmopolitan population won't accept passage of Islamic sharia law.

At Almonds pub, one of many Ramallah restaurants that give the city its reputation as the center of Palestinian nightlife, a TV glowed with images of children wearing Hamas headbands. Owner Bishara Kaoud says he expected the bar to be especially full Thursday night with regulars anxious about the possibility of Hamas planning to impose Islamic law, which forbids consumption of alcohol. "I have a lot of people coming in tonight just in case tomorrow there won't be any booze in this place."

Leader Likely To Cut Ties To Israel (WT)

By Paul Martin And Betsy Pisik

The Washington Times, January 27, 2006

GAZA CITY, Gaza Strip -- Hamas leader Mahmoud Zahar has proposed a dramatic shift of Palestinian policy -- ending security cooperation with Israel, cutting most trade links with the Jewish state and refusing to engage with the "Christian-Zionist" U.S. administration.

"We have to go away from Israel and move toward all possible linkages with our Arab and Islamic brothers," he told The Washington Times just days before his militant movement's stunning election victory.

"Cooperation [with Israel] on the security and economic fields was a disaster for the Palestinians," he said

Although he promised last night to invite Fatah and independent candidates to participate in a broad-based government, Mr. Zahar -- the highest-ranking Hamas official in the Palestinian territories -- gave no indication that the electoral success had softened his views.

"Resistance is a legitimate right of the Palestinian people, and we will not abandon it. There is no contraction between resistance and entering the legislative council," he told reporters at his party's Gaza City headquarters.

Mr. Zahar said Hamas would extend its year-old truce if Israel reciprocates.

"If not, then I think we will have no option but to protect our people and our land," he said.

Another Hamas official, speaking to The Washington Times on the third floor of the group's eerily unfinished offices in central Gaza City last night, warned that the group's year-old cease-fire with Israel would not last forever.

"We have declared a cease-fire, but the occupation didn't appreciate it," he said. "A one-sided cease-fire is not useful."

During the earlier interview, Mr. Zahar -- who was nearly killed when an Israeli bombing raid destroyed his home two years ago -- spoke in firm, quiet tones in strongly accented but clear English.

Noting Israel's plan to "disengage" from the Palestinians, he proposed his own form of disengagement in which the Gaza Strip and "any part of Palestine that can be liberated" would seek to link themselves economically with their Arab and Islamic neighbors.

He said the 1993 Oslo accords and the 1994 Paris agreement that followed had given Israel economic advantages at the Palestinians' expense.

"Our economic status was destroyed by the linkage of our economy with Israel," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0012705

He charged that Palestinian agricultural exports had been restricted while oil and electricity purchased through Israel cost many times more than they would if purchased from Egypt.

"In 2004, we paid $186 million for electricity, and if we had taken it from Egypt, it would have been $20 million," he said, apparently assuming the oil and electricity could be purchased at the highly subsidized rates provided to Egyptian consumers.

"We are not speaking about a fanatical process, not saying we are going to kill the Jews -- we are talking about how to address the destruction of our economy," he said.

Mr. Zahar seemed unconcerned about the prospect of a cutoff in foreign aid, saying a Hamas government would not renounce the right to armed resistance to keep the money flowing from Europe and the United States.

"How could we justify taking the money?" he asked.

Mr. Zahar said he thinks European countries would soon "change their mind" and continue to do business with the new Palestinian Authority, but he said he could foresee no relationship with the Bush administration, which he accused of supporting Christian sectarianism in Egypt and interfering in the affairs of Lebanon, Syria and Saudi Arabia.

"President Bush is introducing hysteria into the region," he said. "He used the term 'a new Crusade' and clearly is pushing the Christian-Zionist agenda -- which is why we cannot deal with him."

Mr. Zahar said that a continuing security understanding with Israel was "not impossible" while the Palestinians build new institutions.

But, within the next five decades, "I'm sure Israel will disappear as the Crusaders and other empires disappeared," he said.

"All of Palestine will become part of the Arab and Islamic land -- as the Koran promised."

Bush Is Conciliatory In Accepting Victory Of Hamas (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, January 27, 2006

President Bush accepted the stunning election results in the Palestinian territories yesterday with a conciliatory tone, saying the landslide victory of the militant Islamic group Hamas was rejection of the "status quo" and a repudiation of the "old guard" that had failed to provide honest government and services.

"There's something healthy about a system that does that," Bush said at a news conference. He reiterated that he will not work with Hamas, formally known at the Islamic Resistance Movement, as a "partner of peace" until it renounces its goal of destroying Israel and disarms its militias. But he left unsaid what a Hamas-led government will mean for the distribution of U.S. financial assistance and for American involvement in trying to reach a peace deal.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice also put on a brave face, saying "we still have every reason for hope and for optimism" because voter turnout was high and free from violence. She said the Palestinian people were "expressing their desire for change," because they "have endured governance that was, by all accounts, not meeting their needs."

The upbeat rhetoric belied the fact that the election outcome was the opposite of what the administration had hoped would happen. Behind the scenes, U.S. officials scrambled to survey the wreckage of their Middle East policy.

The Bush administration has spent nearly $500 million in the past year to bolster the Palestinian Authority and the ruling Fatah party, which was nonetheless crushed by Hamas at the polls. Against the advice of Israeli officials, the administration had pushed Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas to hold the elections without delay, believing that the voting would strengthen his hand in disarming militia groups. Instead, the plan backfired, and an organization that has claimed credit for dozens of suicide bombings -- some resulting in the deaths of Americans -- is poised to take power.

Officials had no easy answers about their next step. Rice spoke with other sponsors of a U.S.-backed peace plan -- the European Union, the United Nations and Russia -- and will meet with her counterparts in the group the Quartet next week in London. In a statement, the group noted that the Palestinians "voted for change" but have not given up "their aspirations for peace and statehood." The Quartet reiterated that "there is a fundamental contradiction between armed group and militia activities and the building of a democratic state."

Rice also spoke to Abbas and urged him to remain as president. Abbas, who was elected last year after the death of longtime Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat, said last night that he will continue to pursue peace negotiations with Israel. But Abbas has resigned from other positions when his authority was challenged. Edward G. Abington Jr., a consultant to the Palestinian Authority, said many in the Fatah inner circle question whether he will do so in the coming months.

U.S. officials went to bed Wednesday night thinking that Fatah had edged out a narrow victory, which might have increased pressure on the Palestinian cabinet to include some Hamas members. That in turn might have split the United States from some European allies, who have wondered if a Hamas political wing could, perhaps, be separated from the militia.

But, under one emerging theory, the clear victory by Hamas is a bracing event, or as one U.S. official put it, there is a "certain benefit of clarity in the results." European officials yesterday had little choice but to express surprise and consternation at the outcome.

Hamas, by most accounts, had expected to serve as the opposition, without the responsibility of power. Now, Hamas will face an "existential moment," forced to decide whether it will be a peaceful force for change, the U.S. official said, speaking on the condition of anonymity to comment more candidly.

Terje Roed-Larsen, a former U.N. envoy for the Middle East who is president of the International Peace Academy, agreed that Hamas now faces a "political moment of truth" that provides an opportunity for creative diplomacy. He said that unless Hamas reforms itself and renounces terrorism, the flow of donor money from Europe and the United States will stop. As the government, Hamas will be responsible for the political, social and security collapse if Western governments refuse to continue to aid the Palestinians, he said.

Hamas "cannot postpone making a choice," Larsen said. The United States and its allies need "to point out the dilemma, step back and see how they handle it."

Martin S. Indyk, a Clinton administration official and the director of the Saban Center for Middle East Policy at the Brookings Institution, agreed that Hamas will find that it can no longer be an obstacle, but said he does not foresee an immediate change in its platform. He said the result might be an "ironic situation in which it is in their interest to maintain peace, but not make peace with Israel."

Indyk cautioned that any sudden moves from the United States and Europe to reduce aid -- or a decision by Israel to withhold the tax revenue it shares with the Palestinian Authority -- could drive Hamas to seek funding from Iran, long one of its chief sponsors. Iran has tried to increase its influence in the Palestinian territories.

One complicating factor will be the mood in Congress, which has been reluctant to allow direct aid to the Palestinian Authority unless the money went to pay the utility bills owed to Israel. Many key lawmakers yesterday issued statements denouncing the Hamas victory.

Abington said the Bush administration shares responsibility for the outcome because U.S. officials did little to help Abbas or to push the Israeli government to end settlement expansion, limit roadblocks, release prisoners or stop other activities that undermined his authority in the eyes of the Palestinian people. He said the result is a "huge blow to Bush's advocacy of democracy in the Middle East" because Arab leaders fearful of Islamic victories in their countries will "push back very hard."

David Makovsky, director of a project on the Middle East peace process at the Washington Institute for Near East Policy, said "there was a lot of blame to go around here," with the primary onus falling on Fatah. But he said U.S. involvement could have been more robust after the death of Arafat and the election of Abbas.

"There needs to be some soul-searching in Washington on this," Makovsky said. "Late in the game, the United States was pressing for an election, while the work in creating liberal institutions had not materialized."

Bush Rules Out Contacts Unless Hamas Backs Peace (REU-Y2)

By Saul Hudson

Reuters, January 27, 2006

U.S. President George W. Bush refused on Thursday to deal with Hamas unless it backs peace with Israel, a decision that could sideline Washington from brokering a settlement after the militant group's Palestinian election win.

Bush also urged President Mahmoud Abbas, whose Cabinet resigned after his Fatah party lost to the Islamist group, to stay in office so the United States could keep open a diplomatic channel with the Palestinian government.

"I have made it very clear, however, that a political party that articulates the destruction of Israel as part of a platform is a party with which we will not deal," Bush told a White House news conference, referring to the group Washington considers a terrorist organization.

Bush, who has made promoting democracy in the Middle East a priority for his second term, had pressed Abbas to hold Wednesday's parliamentary election despite polls showing Hamas would do well.

Hamas had not been expected to win. Its victory could bury any hope of reviving peace talks with Israel soon and stop Bush from achieving his goal of brokering a settlement that creates two states within the next few years.

"Peace is never dead, because people want peace," Bush said.

Bush stepped up U.S. involvement in brokering Palestinian-Israeli accords after Abbas became president last year and sought peace talks with Israel.

With Hamas in power, Bush could revert to the hands-off style that marked his first term, when he believed then-Palestinian President Yasser Arafat was an obstacle to peace.

UNITED FRONT

DOJ_NMG_0012707

The United States is perceived by many in the Arab world as pro-Israel and has often been at odds with its Western allies for taking a tougher line toward Palestinian militant groups.

But major mediating powers delivered a unified message to Hamas that it should choose peace with Israel.

"We reaffirmed the view that ... you can't have one foot in terror and the other in politics," U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice told Reuters after a telephone call between top diplomats from the so-called Quartet -- Russia, the United Nations, the European Union and the United States.

In a statement, the mediators demanded Hamas, which has launched suicide bombings against Israel, renounce violence, accept the Jewish state's right to exist, and disarm.

The major powers did not back up their demands with any threats, such as cutting back aid.

But Rice warned that Hamas will receive no assistance from a Bush administration that has given directly to the Palestinian Authority since Arafat's death.

Hamas is unlikely to overturn its anti-Israel ideology quickly. But it could soften its stance if Western countries cut aid to a government that needs foreign funds to provide basic services for its electorate, political analysts said.

"Everybody understands that the Palestinian people have humanitarian needs. It's a very poor population," Rice said, suggesting U.S. such aid would be funneled through non-governmental organizations.

"We are obviously not going to give aid to a terrorist organization," she added.

David Makovsky of the Washington Institute for Near East Policy said that although Bush pushed for elections, he had failed to bolster democratic institutions that could have helped Abbas' standing.

He doubted the Palestinian leader, who is expected to ask Hamas to form a government, could stay in power long.

Hamas Routs Ruling Faction, Casting Pall On Peace Process (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger

The New York Times, January 27, 2006

RAMALLAH, West Bank, Jan. 26 — The radical Islamic party Hamas scored an overwhelming victory in Wednesday's Palestinian legislative elections, taking 76 out of 132 seats, deposing the former governing Fatah party, which won only 43 seats.

The results, announced Thursday night, which give Hamas the right to form the next government, were likened by Palestinians to an earthquake or a tsunami. They ended more than 40 years of domination by Fatah, the political faction built by Yasir Arafat, which along with the Palestinian Authority was widely viewed by Palestinians as corrupt and ineffective.

The shocking outcome put Hamas, considered a terrorist group by Israel, the United States and the European Union, in charge of the Palestinian political future, and put at least a temporary halt to efforts to restart peace talks. The balloting also made a mockery of the voter surveys released Wednesday night that indicated that Fatah would have the most seats and could retain control of the legislature and the cabinet.

In a televised speech on Thursday night, the Palestinian president, Mahmoud Abbas, said he remained committed to negotiations with Israel. Mr. Abbas, who heads Fatah, but whose official status was not affected by the vote, suggested that future talks would be conducted through the Palestine Liberation Organization, which could bypass a Hamas-led government.

"I am committed to implementing the program on which you elected me a year ago," he said. "It is a program based on negotiations and peaceful settlement with Israel."

But Ehud Olmert, the acting prime minister of Israel, issued a statement saying that talks were not possible now. "The state of Israel will not negotiate with a Palestinian administration if even part of it is an armed terrorist organization calling for the destruction of the state of Israel," he said after an evening cabinet discussion of the election results.

Even before the results were announced, the Fatah prime minister, Ahmed Qurei, who had warned Mr. Abbas against holding these elections, resigned, and cheering Hamas supporters raised their green flag over the parliament building. They celebrated throughout Gaza and the West Bank, holding victory marches in major cities. In Nablus, they hung enormous green banners on public buildings, while members of the group's military arm, the Qassam brigades, marched in uniforms with weapons, but did not wear their customary masks.

In Ramallah, Ali Abu Shusha, 31, with a bright green Hamas banner on his taxi, exulted in the victory. "Hamas was created by the people and belongs to the people," he said. "I want Hamas to run the government — it has clean hands, puts the poor before the rich and will resist the occupier."

In Gaza City, however, Kamilia Barghouti, 26, a waitress, said she was in shock. "I'm worried about the way this victory will affect how I can dress in public, and even if it will affect where I can work," she said.

The victory of Hamas represents an enormous test for the Palestinians, for the Western nations who pressed for this election and who provide millions of dollars in aid to the Palestinians and for the Arab world, which is likely to be shaken by the victory of a militant Islamic party in the symbolic heart of the Muslim world.

But the results, seen more as a repudiation of Fatah than a declaration of war against Israel, will be a test for Hamas, which had seemed to want a more gradual entry into politics. The leader of Hamas, Mahmoud Zahar, said proudly in Gaza, "We are going to change every aspect, as regards the economy, industry, agriculture, as regards social aid, health, administration, education." But it will not be an easy transformation, and it will provoke political resistance from a largely secular society.

While Hamas politicians said they would invite other parties, including Fatah, to join them in a government of national unity, key Fatah members like Jibril Rajoub and Mahmoud Dahlan made it clear that Fatah should not take part in a government dominated by Hamas. They argued that doing so would help Hamas by providing cover for the group as it struggles with the reality of governing. Fatah, they suggested, should go into opposition and let Hamas make its own mistakes and deal as best it can with the facts of Palestinian life and the Israeli occupation. The Fatah Central Committee voted Thursday night not to join a Hamas-led government.

But it is also possible that some Fatah members with good relations with Hamas, like the Gazan legislator Ziad Abu Amr, who ran as an independent with Hamas support, and a former minister of national economy, Mazen Sinokrot, will agree to join Hamas in a cabinet that probably will be led by a non-Hamas prime minister.

"My advice to Abu Mazen and to Hamas is to think of serious power-sharing," Mr. Amr said, referring to Mr. Abbas. "A partnership between Fatah and Hamas is necessary," he said. "Hamas is going to be put to the test of being a practitioner and not simply an opposition. Politics will have to be taken into account at the expense of ideology."

While Mr. Abbas won praise for pressing ahead with these elections, the result is not what he wanted and is bound to weaken his position. He gambled, but with a smashing Hamas victory he is perceived to have lost and to bear some responsibility for failing to reform Fatah and the Palestinian Authority. Mr. Abbas has said that if he cannot carry out his policies, which include negotiations with Israel, he will quit.

Israelis warned the world not to give in to wishful thinking and presume that Hamas will suddenly alter its goals. Israel and the world did not negotiate with Mr. Arafat and the Palestine Liberation Organization until it agreed to recognize the state of Israel in the late 1980's and disavow terrorism. Israeli politicians suggested that the process would have to begin all over again with Hamas.

"For Israelis, this is the definitive end of the illusion of a comprehensive peace," said Yossi Klein Halevi, a senior fellow at the Shalem Center, a policy research organization in Jerusalem. "There is no more credible hope of Palestinian moderation. For Israelis, it will only confirm what the last five years of terror have taught them: that the war is not about settlements, but about Israel's right to exist."

The Palestinian Authority as a serious negotiating partner no longer exists for Israel, Mr. Halevi said. "Now the era of the pretend peace process is also over," he said, and Israel will continue to act unilaterally to set its own borders, build the separation barrier between itself and the Palestinians and, in time, continue the process of unilateral withdrawal from more West Bank settlements — so long as it can ensure that a Hamas-dominated Palestinian Authority will not use that territory to launch rocket or other attacks on Israel.

"There is now a broad consensus, that Israel will go ahead and build our borders to preserve Israel as a democratic Jewish state," said Ami Ayalon, a former director of Shin Bet now running for a seat with the Labor Party.

The Hamas victory brings the group's support for armed attacks on Israel to the fore. Hamas said it entered politics "to protect the resistance" to Israeli occupation of Muslim land, so it is unlikely to heed Western appeals to disarm and recognize Israel, which Hamas in its charter promised to destroy.

The most that successful Hamas candidates like Ahmad Mubarak would say Thursday is that if Israel pulled back to its 1967 boundaries, Hamas would consider "a long-term truce."

Fadel Saleh, a Hamas politician from Ramallah, said that Hamas would concentrate "on restoring our Palestinian home and rebuilding Palestinian society," leaving international relations to Mr. Abbas and the Palestine Liberation Organization, which does not include Hamas. But, he said, "we want to remake the P.L.O. too based on this vote," he said. "Hamas wants cooperation with all Palestinian parties and a national agreement on policy."

The death of Mr. Arafat took the lid off seething resentments of Fatah and the men Mr. Arafat brought back to the Palestinian territories from exile after the 1993 Oslo accords with Israel. Those accords set up the Palestinian Authority, and in the 10 years since the last legislative elections, in which Hamas refused to participate, one-party rule proved to be as corrupting among Palestinians as anywhere else.

"Corrupt authorities who have been in power for a long time are usually thrown out in free elections," said Daoud Kuttab, a Palestinian analyst who teaches at Jerusalem's Al Quds University. "After 40 years, it's almost natural. I hoped Fatah would get away with it, but didn't. That the opposition came from a radical Islamic group is unfortunate, but there was no other serious opposition."

Mr. Kuttab said that those who had preached democracy, from the Bush administration to the Israeli right, would have to decide if their values trumped their interests. "If Hamas respects the rules of the democratic game, we have to let the winners win," he said. "But now Hamas will have to face reality, and part of reality means dealing with Israel."

But even this process could take many months or years, he said, and the potential pitfalls were underscored Thursday when Palestinian security officials said a 9-year-old Palestinian girl was killed by Israeli gunfire near the southern Gaza town of Khan Yunis, Agence France-Presse reported. The Israeli military said soldiers fired at a "suspicious figure" who was near Gaza's perimeter fence in the area. The military said it had no information that a young girl was hit, but were checking the report.

Hamas is not likely to move against the security forces, at least for now. They are made up almost entirely of Fatah loyalists, and voted overwhelmingly for Fatah. Any Hamas effort to try to take over the security forces would almost certainly lead to clashes.

Hisham Ahmed, a political scientist at Birzeit University who has written books about Hamas, called the vote "an historic moment in every sense," but he emphasized that "these results don't reflect the real size of Fatah and Hamas in the society," because they are distorted by anger at Fatah, preoccupation with internal issues and a complicated voting system.

If Mr. Abbas and the world handle the situation intelligently, Mr. Ahmed said, "it could mark the beginning of the end of Hamas as an ideologically pure force and a beginning of a reformed Fatah." But if it is handled badly, he said, "the radicalization of Palestinian society will continue."

According to the results, the Hamas list won 30 of 66 seats at the national level and 46 of 66 seats in constituencies. It did especially well in Gaza, but polled well throughout the West Bank, too. Fatah won 27 seats on the national level and only 16 in the constituencies. The leftist Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine won three seats while another leftist list, Badil, won two seats. The Independent Palestine list, led by the presidential election runner-up, Mustafa Barghouti, won two seats, as did the Third Way list of the departing finance minister, Salam Fayyad and Hanan Ashrawi. Four other independents won in constituencies, including Mr. Amr. Among the Fatah casualties was Mr. Rajoub.

Bush Defends His Goal Of Spreading Democracy To The Mideast (NYT)

By Steven R. Weisman

The New York Times, January 27, 2006

WASHINGTON, Jan. 26 — The sweeping victory of Hamas in the Palestinian elections threw President Bush and his aides on the defensive on Thursday, complicating the administration's policy of trying to promote democracy as an antidote to the spread of terrorism.

Reacting uneasily to the Hamas triumph, Mr. Bush said the results spoke to the failures of President Mahmoud Abbas and the "old guard" of his Fatah faction to root out corruption and mismanagement, not to any flaws in the administration's policy of advocating democracy.

"There was a peaceful process as people went to the polls, and that's positive," Mr. Bush said. "But what's also positive is that it's a wake-up call to the leadership. Obviously people were not happy with the status quo. The people are demanding honest government. The people want services."

But without criticizing the Palestinian people for choosing leaders who advocate the destruction of Israel, a tenet at the very core of Hamas's creed, he said that the United States would never tolerate such a policy. In the same fashion, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice noted that Palestinians want a negotiated peace settlement with Israel, according to opinion polls, but she repeated that this goal remained possible only if Hamas renounced its violent ways.

Mr. Bush joined a chorus of world leaders — including the so-called quartet of principal parties in the moribund peace process — in calling on Hamas to renounce terrorism, disarm its militias and recognize the legitimacy of Israel now that it has won the elections. But his tone was less confrontational than invitational — in effect, inviting Hamas to embrace reconciliation.

For now, Mr. Bush called on President Abbas to stay in office and steer the Palestinian government on a moderate course.

The Hamas victory was the fifth case recently of militants' winning significant gains through elections. They included the Muslim Brotherhood in Egypt, Hezbollah in Lebanon, a radical president in Iran, and Shiites backed by militias in Iraq.

As these elections unfolded, there has been increasing criticism in some quarters — notably among the self-described "realists" in foreign policy, many of them veterans of past Republican administrations — that President Bush has naively pushed for democracy in countries without the civil society components to support it.

"The Hamas victory is a disillusioning result showing that democracy and American interests don't always coincide," said Nikolas K. Gvosdev, a Russia expert who is editor of The National Interest, a publication that echoes with debate about this subject.

"Given the weakness of Palestinian society, people should not have been surprised that this was the outcome," Mr. Gvosdev added.

DOJ_NMG_0012710

Other critics, too, including some Arab leaders, say that the United States failed to do its part to shore up Mr. Abbas by wringing more concessions from Israel and doing more to revitalize the economy in the West Bank and Gaza.

A senior State Department official said recently that the Bush administration, five years ago, inherited what he called the old model: that economic growth, the development of a middle class and the spread of education needed to come before democracy could take hold in troubled countries.

"But that's a story that we can no longer accept," he said, speaking on condition of anonymity because of rules prohibiting him from publicly explaining administration policy. "First of all you're not getting economic growth in a lot of places. We now understand that getting greater political openness and democracy in the Arab world is essential to our security."

The problem faced by the administration on Thursday was how to coax Hamas into the mainstream.

The West has more tools than mere diplomatic pressure to influence Hamas and the Palestinian Authority. The authority, described by many as nearly bankrupt, has begun tapping its trust funds to pay daily expenses and is running a deficit that Israel calculates at more than $700 million a year.

Europe and the United States provide most of the $1 billion in foreign assistance that goes to the Palestinians. But some of this money has already been cut back in protest of the Palestinian leadership's raising salaries and welfare benefits, which make up a major part of the Palestinian economy.

American and European officials said they could not imagine outside aid continuing if there is a Hamas-led government that has not renounced violence or Hamas's commitment to destroying Israel.

Many of the reactions from Western diplomats took on dramatic tones, characterizing Hamas as now facing a trial of identity.

"What Hamas faces is not only a political but an existential dilemma," said Terje Roed-Larsen, the former United Nations envoy in the Middle East, in an interview. "They have built their identity on opposing elections and the institutions of the Palestinian Authority. Now they're the masters of the institutions they have been against."

Diplomats involved in the Middle East peace process known as the road map, the document that calls for reciprocal steps between Israelis and Palestinians toward creation of a Palestinian state, say that any immediate chances of reviving the Israeli-Palestinian dialogue are daunting if not impossible.

The immediate question before the administration is not whether negotiations can be revived but whether Israel can be encouraged to carry out more unilateral withdrawals from the West Bank.

As for dealing with Hamas, the Europeans are considered likely to see the problem differently, many diplomats say. Regarding both Hamas and Hezbollah, the Europeans have called for the West to use the template of Sinn Fein, the political wing of the Irish Republican Army, when dealing with them.

In other words, they say, talking to Hamas may help coax it toward eventual partnership in a peace negotiation. The problem, many diplomats and experts say, is that no one even pretends that there are truly separate wings of Hamas. Its armed forces and its political leaders are married to each other inextricably.

By Matthew Gutman

USA Today, January 27, 2006

RAMALLAH, West Bank — The U.S. government views Hamas as a terrorist organization. Fatem Nimr, a 58-year old Palestinian homemaker, sees it as a symbol of hope.

“Hamas will educate our children,” she said as she stopped by a sweet shop Thursday, a day after Hamas' sweeping victory in Palestinian elections. “They will bring us religion. They will feed the poor.”

Hamas' victory in Palestinian elections seemed less an endorsement of terrorism than a vote for an organization that supporters hope will improve government, according to some voters and election analysts. Hamas supporters say they were fed up with the ruling Fatah Party, which many accused of corruption and general incompetence.

Palestinian gross domestic product declined by 35% between 2000 and 2005, during the Palestinian uprising known as the intifada, according to the World Bank.

“Fatah has done nothing but make us poor,” Nimr said.

With 95% of the vote counted, Hamas won 76 seats to Fatah's 43 in the 132-member parliament, according to Hanna Nasser, a Palestinian election official.

“Voters wanted to punish Fatah for its dismal performance,” said Khalil Shikaki, director of the Center for Policy and Survey Research in Ramallah. “People were fed up with its corruption and incompetence.”

DOJ_NMG_0012711

In Ramallah, the seat of Palestinian government and one of the most secular West Bank towns, there was little celebration Thursday. A few Hamas activists muscled battered sedans through traffic, blasting Hamas jingles on their car stereos. In the town's bustling vegetable market, several vendors planted Hamas' green flag with the "God is Great" insignia among mounds of tangerines and pomegranates.

Hamas' religious overtones appealed to some voters who believe Hamas leaders will be less susceptible to corruption.

"You can't have a monopoly of power forever," said Hamza Awadallah, 22. He said the time had come for "unbelievers" to leave government. "Hamas officials pray, they fast, they give alms," he said. "Finally, Palestinians got smart, and voted for religious, the true, law."

Awadallah said he condemned suicide bombings.

"I think negotiation is a better way to get back our land," he said.

Even so, Hamas' militancy is credited with pushing Israel to withdraw settlers and troops from Gaza and parts of the West Bank in September. "People … got the impression that violence pays while diplomacy doesn't," Shikaki said.

Israel says Hamas is responsible for launching 425 terrorist attacks since Sept. 2000, killing 377 Israelis and injuring more than 2,000.

Founded in 1987 in Gaza, Hamas — the Arabic acronym for Islamic Resistance Movement — focused on two main tasks: eliminating the state of Israel and filling the social and educational needs of impoverished Palestinians.

In 1989, Hamas took up arms, killing several Israelis in shooting attacks. Israel responded by banning the group. By 1994, the group had graduated to bombing attacks.

The conflict escalated after the start of the Palestinian uprising in September 2000. Hamas' founder, Sheik Ahmed Yassin, was assassinated by Israel in March 2004.

Hamas made its first foray into Palestinian politics when it competed for a handful of offices in the December 2004 municipal elections.

In Thursday's vote, Hamas capitalized on the reputation it earned for incorruptibility and good governance in the towns and cities it controlled after winning municipal elections last year. Hamas has also run a network of hospitals and social services for Palestinians.

Even some Fatah supporters admit their party governed poorly in recent years.

"We all knew Hamas is going to win," said Taha Morar, 24, who wore a checkered scarf made famous by Fatah's founder Yasser Arafat. "They do things for the people and lately Fatah didn't."

Omar Fattah, 55, who owns a downtown sporting goods store said, "I don't support Hamas, but we have to respect our own democracy."

Bush Says Hamas Must Renounce Violence (LAT)

By Edwin Chen

The Los Angeles Times, January 27, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush said today that the radical movement Hamas, whose members won a sweeping victory in this week's Palestinian parliamentary elections, must renounce violence it they are to become partners in the Middle East peace process.

In a further admonition directed at Hamas, the president declared that the United States will not deal with Palestinian leaders who continue to seek the destruction of Israel.

Bush made his remarks at a surprise morning press conference at the White House that lasted three-quarters of an hour, during which he again defended the post-9/11 domestic spying program and his refusal to disclose details of any contacts between senior White house staff and discredited lobbyist Jack Abramoff, who pleaded guilty to corruption charges this month.

The strong showing by Hamas promises to significantly transform Palestinian politics by giving the militant Islamic movement a formal place in the government structural since the Palestinian authority was formed in 1994.

That election victory, however, put Bush in a difficult spot because he has made his campaign to spread democracy around the world a cornerstone of his presidency. Now, in the face of a victory by a group whose policies he abhors, Bush is having to impose conditions before fully accepting the results of that show of democracy.

"Peace is never dead," he said when asked about Hamas' "big victory."

"On the other hand, I don't see how you can be a partner in peace if you advocate the destruction of a country as a part of your platform," Bush added. "And I know you can't be a partner in peace if you have a , if your party has got an armed wing." The president was able to buy some time, however, since the election has just taken place and now a new government must be formed.

DOJ_NMG_0012712

"We will watch very carefully about the formation of the government," Bush said. "But the government hasn't formed yet. They're beginning to talk about how to form the government." In the meantime, the president urged Palestinian Leader Mahmoud Abbas to remain in office.

"We'd like him to stay in power. I mean, we'd like him to stay in office. He is in power' we'd like him to stay in office," Bush said.

"And so it was an interesting day yesterday...as we're watching liberty begin to spread across the Middle East."

Europeans Insist Hamas Must Disavow Terrorism (NYT)

By Alan Cowell

The New York Times, January 27, 2006

LONDON, Jan. 26 — European leaders, whose countries are major financial donors to the Palestinian Authority, on Thursday registered disquiet verging on hostility toward the Hamas triumph in the Palestinian elections.

Yet, confronted with a Middle East that seems once again to have redrawn its political contours, they held back from publicly threatening to cut off the hundreds of millions of dollars they provide each year to Palestinian institutions.

Furthermore, none of them criticized the Palestinian democracy that appeared to yield the opposite of the moderation they had sought to nurture.

"It is obvious that the European Union would never countenance funding a regime that continued an armed fight against Israel," said Ignasi Guardans, a Spanish member of the European Parliament. "But we cannot push for democracy and then deny the result of free and fair elections."

Like the United States, the European Union regards Hamas as a terrorist organization and insists that it cannot work with an institution that supports the violent overthrow of Israel. Such a stance would contradict Europe's commitment to a two-state solution, with Israel and a Palestinian state living side by side.

Unless Hamas changes its position, European leaders said Thursday, they see no prospect of reviving the stalled peace efforts for which Europe has been a sponsor.

"It is a very, very, very bad result," said Prime Minister Silvio Berlusconi of Italy, adding that peace efforts had "been put back until who knows when."

Equally, though, European leaders shied away from threatening punitive action that would leave them with no influence among Palestinians and might undermine Mahmoud Abbas, the moderate president of the Palestinian Authority, whose party, Fatah apparently lost the legislative elections on Wednesday.

The first practical test for European diplomacy is expected within the next few days.

Chancellor Angela Merkel of Germany is to visit Palestinian areas on Monday to meet Mr. Abbas, and a spokesman for her government said she had no plan to change her trip. European foreign ministers are to meet the same day to weigh their response to the outcome of the vote.

The German foreign minister, Frank-Walter Steinmeier, said his country should have no immediate contact with Hamas. "Those taking part in government must foreswear violence" and recognize Israel's right to exist, he told Bavarian Radio. "This appears to be still a long way off for Hamas."

Both Prime Minister Tony Blair and Foreign Secretary Jack Straw said Britain would not deal with those who supported or practiced terrorism.

With different shadings, a similar view came from Prime Minister Dominique de Villepin of France.

The conditions for negotiating with any Palestinian government, he said, are: "First, the renunciation of violence, to accept to move forward according to the peace goals that have been set. Secondly, the recognition of the state of Israel and the recognition of international accords, notably the Oslo accords."

The European Union's foreign policy chief, Javier Solana, said the elections "may confront us with an entirely new situation," which foreign ministers would discuss on Monday. Last weekend Mr. Solana said it would be "very difficult" for the union to continue financial support to the Palestinian Authority if Hamas won.

European aid to Palestinian institutions totaled around $330 million last year, not counting contributions from individual European countries. From 1994 to the end of 2002, according to European Union figures, the union contributed $1.2 billion in grants and loans, in addition to about $600 million donated to the United Nations agency that supports Palestinian refugees.

Kofi Annan, the secretary general of the United Nations, said Thursday in Davos, Switzerland, that any group wishing to take part in a democracy should lay down its weapons.

Is Democracy Empowering Islamists? (CSM)

By Howard Lafranchi

DOJ_NMG_0012713

The Christian Science Monitor, January 27, 2006

WASHINGTON - Palestinian voters availed themselves of the time- honored democratic right to "throw the bums out" in their first legislative elections in a decade Wednesday - exactly the kind of action implicit in President Bush's push for democracy in the Middle East.

But by snubbing the Fatah Party of US-supported Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas in favor of the radical Islamist group Hamas, Palestinians also put the Bush administration in a difficult spot.

The US might now seem hypocritical to many Arabs - encouraging democracy in the Middle East, while rejecting the choices that result from its exercise. At the same time, questions mount over whether Mr. Bush's campaign for democracy is encouraging the empowerment of Islamist militants across the region.

"This [election result] is really going to scare ... other governments in the region, and the Egyptians in particular are going to tell the US, 'We told you so,' " says Arthur Hughes, a former deputy assistant secretary of State for Near East affairs. "They'll see this as more evidence of what comes from our pressure to open up their societies, but they won't acknowledge that their hard-line tactics are what are leading to the growth" of Islamic extremism.

The Palestinian results, which give an organization on the US list of terrorist groups a majority in the 132-seat Legislative Council, are part of a trend across Muslim countries, experts say.

"The victory of Hamas cannot be seen in isolation from the major accomplishments of Islamists across Muslim lands," says Fawaz Gerges, a Middle East expert at Sarah Lawrence College in Bronxville, N.Y. "There's a pattern here of Arab and Muslim electorates fed up with the secular governments that have failed to deliver the goods, both in economic terms and protecting the security of the homeland."

The "irony," Mr. Gerges adds, is that the Bush administration's championing of the Middle East's democratization has allowed the radical Islamists to "flex their political muscle" - from Egypt and Saudi Arabia to Lebanon and Iraq.

Some historians argue that radical groups' entry into mainstream politics has led them to moderate their stances: The Irish Republican Army or former guerrilla groups in Central America are often cited as examples.

Others, though, say this moderating process, if undertaken at all, takes time - and does not happen in a vacuum. The US, they add, is going to have to decide how to deal with the Palestinians and the Middle East peace process in a period of deep uncertainty for the region.

Bush reiterated this week that the US will not work with Hamas unless it dramatically modifies its behavior and removes from its platform a call for the destruction of the state of Israel. At a news conference Thursday, he said a political force like Hamas, one with an armed wing that advocates violence against Israel, "is a party with which we will not deal."

Soon after the election results became known, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice called Palestinian President Abbas and, according to Palestinian sources, praised Palestinian democracy and pledged US support for Mr. Abbas and his policies.

Few analysts expect the Bush administration to make bold moves with so much on the ground in flux. Not only are the Palestinians embarking on the hard task of forming a government from outside the president's political circle, but Israel - still digesting the departure of Ariel Sharon from the leadership scene - is heading for elections on March 18.

The US could simply suspend contact with - and financial assistance to - the Palestinian Authority over the rise of Hamas to the government. But "the stakes are too high on the ground to simply walk away," says Haim Malka, a Middle East expert at the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington. The alternative, he says, is for the US to work exclusively with the office of the president - provided Abbas remains in office.

Bush "left the window open" for the US to work with Hamas - provided Hamas renounces violence and reverses its stance toward Israel, Mr. Malka notes. But that kind of fundamental shift takes time, he says - and events are not apt to wait.

Some analysts worry that turmoil among Palestinians - and a radical government at the helm - will prompt Israel to shift toward more radical policies itself. A unilateral decision to include blocks of West Bank settlements inside its final borders is the kind of action Israel might take in response to Hamas's rise but which would inflame the situation, experts say. Certain actions "would virtually rule out ... arriving at a two-state solution, and if that disappears you just have conflict without end," says Mr. Hughes, now a scholar at the Middle East Institute here.

At Thursday's press conference, Bush said the election is a "wake-up call" to the old guard Palestinian leadership. Others say it also blew a whistle in Washington. "We're seeing that, for now, the only alternative to secular regimes in the Middle East are the Islamists," says Malka. "They're the only ones who have legitimacy among the people."

By Hassan M. Fattah

The New York Times, January 27, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0012714

DUBAI, United Arab Emirates, Jan. 26 — Hamas's overwhelming victory in the Palestinian elections on Thursday was met with a mixture of jubilation and consternation in much of the Arab world. For some, it raised the concern that, in winning, the Islamic group will almost certainly have to lose something.

The mixed reaction was evident at the Husseini refugee camp in Amman, Jordan, a stronghold of support for Hamas. News of the early returns sparked instant celebrations, but it also brought expressions of concern that in governing, Hamas may be forced to make concessions in its drive to fight Israel.

Eyad al-Dibeiy, 18, who sells shoes in a small stall in the camp, was clearly elated by the result.

"A Hamas victory gives the government wider representation," he said. "Hamas is an Islamic movement, and it is only natural for Islamists to gain strength. Their victory will give them more leverage, power and freedom."

Elsewhere in the camp, the Islamic Action Front hailed Hamas's victory as "a major breakthrough and swing towards achieving the Palestinian rights."

"We have to differentiate between a march to peace and the capitulation that began with the Oslo Accords in 1993," said Sheik Hamzah Mansour, secretary general of the front. "The results support the argument for resistance and forces of resistance in the Arab world that stands against capitulation."

Yet many at the camp sought to temper expectations, warning that the hard work was still ahead.

"Having Hamas in power and assuming such a position is bad," said Ayesh Hussein, 35, as he discussed the results with the store's owners. "We're accustomed to Hamas being fighters, a party that pressures Israel. But now it will join politics and will become politicized."

Muhammad Abdul Ghani, an employee at a dry cleaning shop nodded in agreement. "This is only the beginning of concessions on the part of the Palestinians," he said in dismay. Still, he said, there was some promise in the Hamas victory of cleaning up the endemic corruption in Palestinian institutions.

Arab and Muslim leaders attending the World Economic Summit in Davos, Switzerland, issued a statement urging other nations to respect the Hamas victory and give the group time to prove whether it is ready to work for peace.

"It is an example of when people are frustrated and have no hope for the future they tend to go for the extreme end of the spectrum," Queen Rania of Jordan said in the statement. Although the result was a vote for Hamas, she said, it was also a vote against the conditions in which Palestinians have been forced to live under Israeli occupation.

In Lebanon, where Hezbollah has gone through many of the same changes Hamas is likely to face, many saw the result as a direct challenge to the United States as well as to Israel.

"Because Hamas and Hezbollah are going through such similar experiences, as armed groups that are democratizing, if the U.S. wants to pressure Hamas further to disarm, it's going to make their democracy agenda look very weak and lacking credibility," Amal Saad-Ghorayeb, a political science professor at the Lebanese American University, said by telephone. "These people voted overwhelmingly for Hamas, and did so partly as a referendum for resistance, saying that resistance will pay greater dividends than negotiation."

She said that the group's biggest backers, Iran and Syria, may also stand to win some political capital simply by having backed the winners.

For some, the win raised the possibility that a new age of Islamist politics could be dawning, especially if Western governments eventually engage Hamas.

"Many in the Arab world were expecting something like this, but nobody expected it to this degree," said Hussein Shobok, a columnist with the Arabic-language daily Sharq al-Awsat. "This is certainly going to encourage other Islamists elsewhere to do the same."

Mohammad al-Ameer, the political editor at the Saudi Arabian daily Al Riyadh, said, "Islamists are present in our societies because they are conservative, but more importantly because they are tired of the nationalism and the military men who have ruled for so long."

"Arab societies have become weary of the nationalism and the sloganeering and are therefore embracing the Islamist platform as a response," he said. "The West must therefore see the Islamists as people they can deal with in order to deal with our societies."

U.S. Won't Deal With Hamas (WT)

By Bill Sammon

The Washington Times, January 27, 2006

President Bush yesterday said the U.S. will not deal with Hamas, the terrorist group that won Wednesday's Palestinian elections, unless it renounces its goal of destroying Israel.

DOJ_NMG_0012715

"A political party that articulates the destruction of Israel as part of its platform is a party with which we will not deal," the president said in a press conference. "People must renounce that part of their platform."

He added, "You can't be a partner in peace if your party has got an armed wing."

The stunning victory by Hamas prompted the resignation of Palestinian Prime Minister Ahmed Qureia, a member of the Fatah party. Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, also a Fatah member, was asked by Mr. Bush to remain in office.

"We would hope he would stay in office and work to move the process forward," the president told reporters in the James S. Brady press briefing room.

Mr. Abbas said he would not be deterred from implementing a U.S.-sponsored peace plan, known as the "road map," which entails negotiations with Israel.

"I remain committed to implement the platform on which you voted for me one year ago," he told Palestinians in a televised address. "The basis of this platform is negotiations and a peace settlement with Israel."

The victory by Hamas, which won 76 of 132 seats in the parliament, was a setback to Mr. Bush's stated goal of brokering a comprehensive peace agreement between Palestinians and Israelis in his second term. Nonetheless, the president was philosophical about the election results, suggesting that voters were more interested in getting rid of the existing corruption than embracing terrorism.

"It's a wake-up call to the leadership," Mr. Bush said. "People were not happy with the status quo. The people are demanding honest government. The people want services. They want to be able to raise their children in an environment in which they can get a decent education and they can find health care."

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice issued a stern warning to Hamas, which has carried out scores of suicide bombings against Israelis.

"You cannot have one foot in politics and another in terror," Miss Rice said at the World Economic Forum in Davos, Switzerland. "Our position on Hamas has therefore not changed."

She added, "Palestinian people have apparently voted for change, but we believe their aspirations for peace and a peaceful life remain unchanged."

Last year, Miss Rice told The Washington Times in an interview that participation in the political process could force terrorist groups like Hamas to moderate their policies.

"When people start getting elected and have to start worrying about constituencies and ... not about whether their fire-breathing rhetoric against Israel is being heard, but about whether or not that person's child down the street is able to go to a good school or that road has been fixed ... then things start to change," she said.

Yesterday, Mr. Bush sounded similarly optimistic.

"Peace is never dead, because people want peace," he said. "The best hope for peace in the Middle East is two democracies living side by side."

The Hamas win led Rep. Vito J. Fossella, New York Republican, to say he will introduce legislation to end all U.S. aid to a Palestinian Authority led by Hamas. Last year, the U.S. sent $275 million to Gaza and the West Bank, including $50 million directly to the Palestinian Authority.

"Not one dollar of taxpayer money should go to this terrorist organization," Mr. Fossella said of Hamas. "The Palestinian people have every right to elect a terrorist organization to control their government -- and the United States has every right to eliminate any financial assistance for it."

Ehud Olmert, Israel's acting prime minister, vowed not to work with Hamas.

"Should a government be established in the Palestinian Authority with Hamas leading or participating, the Palestinian Authority will become a sponsor of terror," he said in an emergency meeting of the security Cabinet in Jerusalem.

"The world and Israel will ignore it, and it will become irrelevant," he said.

Palestinians Choose Avowed Enemy Of Israel (USAT)

By Matthew Gutman

USA Today, January 27, 2006

RAMALLAH, West Bank — Hamas, the militant Islamic group that the U.S. State Department has designated a terrorist organization, won an overwhelming majority in Palestinian parliamentary elections. The election results announced Thursday put the future of the Middle East peace process in question.

The election shocker ended a 40-year political reign by Fatah, the party of the late Yasser Arafat. It also heightens the danger of civil war between Palestinian factions, and such violence could spread to Israel, said Edward Abington, a former U.S. diplomat in the region who now advises the Palestinian Authority.

“This is not a good result for Israel, and it's a huge setback for the United States,” Abington said.

DOJ_NMG_0012716

Hanna Nasser, a Palestinian elections official, said Thursday that with 95% of the vote counted, Hamas had won 76 seats in the 132-member parliament, compared with 43 for Fatah.

President Bush and other world leaders called for Hamas to renounce violence and its long-held rejection of Israel's existence.

"If your platform is the destruction of Israel, it means you're not a partner in peace, and we're interested in peace," Bush said. He reiterated his view that the United States will not deal with Palestinian leaders who do not recognize Israel's right to exist.

Members of Congress signaled that U.S. financial aid for Palestinians — about $350 million per year — might cease. "If Hamas is now the ruling power, I do not foresee any U.S. funds going to the Palestinian territories," said Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen, R-Fla., chairwoman of a House subcommittee on the Middle East.

Mahmoud Zahar, a top Hamas official, said the group would extend a year-old truce if Israel reciprocates. He said that if Israel doesn't agree, "I think we will have no option but to protect our people and our land."

Israeli leaders said there could be no relations with a group that has killed hundreds of Israelis in terrorist attacks and that seeks the destruction of Israel.

"Israel will continue to fight terrorism with a heavy hand, everywhere," said a statement from acting Prime Minister Ehud Olmert.

Some likened Hamas' election victory to the former domination of Afghanistan by the Islamic Taliban regime and al-Qaeda. "Today, Hamastan was formed," said Benjamin Netanyahu, leader of Israel's opposition Likud Party.

Hamas' win comes amid political uncertainty in Israel. Prime Minister Ariel Sharon had a stroke this month and is in a coma. Olmert has assumed Sharon's powers until elections March 28.

Hamas has an extensive network of charities and social services. Its candidates swept to wins in West Bank municipal elections last month.

Hamas' parliamentary campaign focused on ridding the Palestinian Authority of Fatah corruption and boosting living standards. Its platform made no mention of suicide bombers or the destruction of Israel, but the group's charter calls for Israel to be made an Islamic state for Palestinians.

On Thursday, Palestinian Authority Prime Minister Ahmed Qureia and his Cabinet resigned before final results were released. Hamas leader Khaled Mashal, based in Syria, asked Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas, Arafat's successor, to join a Hamas-led government. Under Palestinian law, the biggest party can shape the Cabinet.

Abbas, elected separately a year ago, remains president. He said Thursday that he is committed to peace talks but sidestepped questions about how closely he would work with Hamas.

In the West Bank, the Hamas victory prompted celebrations. Mazen Abdel Hadi, 29, a construction worker, showed off his green Hamas cap at a Ramallah sandwich shop.

"We finally elected a party that cares more for us than (for) the Israelis," he said. "Let America sever relations with us. We haven't benefited anyway."

Others were less joyful. "I am worried," said Ali Barakat, 28. "They want Islam," he said, referring to those who voted for Hamas, "but we need the outside world."

Hamas Victory Roils Middle East Peace Process (WSJ)

By Karby Leggett And Neil King Jr.

The Wall Street Journal, January 27, 2006

The surprisingly strong victory of militant group Hamas in Palestinian legislative elections leaves the Palestinian Authority in the hands of a radical Islamist leadership deemed terrorists by Israel, the U.S. and Europe, further complicating the already tortuous Middle East peace process.

How Hamas chooses to lead the Palestinians could reshape the Middle East political landscape in ways not seen since Israel began its occupation of the West Bank and Gaza in 1967. Hamas officials said they are committed to pursuing the government and economic reforms promised during the campaign -- pledges that helped secure their victory over the long-ruling Fatah movement, widely viewed as corrupt and inept. Other than confirming their refusal to acknowledge Israel's right to exist, they have yet to indicate the approach their government will take in foreign policy.

Yet, in an early sign of pragmatism, Mahmoud Zahar, a top Hamas official, said the group would extend its year-old truce -- agreed before Israel's withdrawal from Gaza -- if Israel reciprocates. "Don't be afraid," added another senior Hamas official, Ismail Hanyyeh, in an interview with the British Broadcasting Corp.

Israel, the U.S. and the European Union will have to decide how much support, if any, to offer a Palestinian government that has come to depend heavily on Western aid, but that will be led by a group they have always shunned. The early signs suggested a hard line.

Acting Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert yesterday convened his top security officials to discuss the results. Late in the day, his office issued a statement saying: "The State of Israel will not negotiate with a Palestinian administration if its members include an armed terrorist organization that calls for the destruction of the State of Israel. In any case, Israel will continue to fight terrorism with a heavy hand, everywhere."

The Hamas victory carries a particularly ironic sting for President Bush, who made Palestinian elections a cornerstone of plans to encourage democracy in the Middle East. In an interview with The Wall Street Journal the day of the elections, Mr. Bush reiterated that he wouldn't deal with Hamas as long as it espouses the destruction of Israel. Yet, while Mr. Bush and European leaders yesterday urged Hamas to renounce violence, they stopped short of withdrawing support for a Hamas-led government.

British Foreign Secretary Jack Straw said of the victory: "Hamas has a clear responsibility to understand that with democracy goes a rejection of violence."

Pressure on Hamas to embrace diplomacy came from Arab leaders, too. Ahmed Nazif, Egypt's prime minister, said Hamas would have to respect "the reality of what the world has set as the framework for peace in the Middle East." That framework encompasses prospective negotiations aimed at Palestinian recognition of Israel and the creation of a Palestinian state.

Acceptance of those goals would mark a profound change for a group formed in the 1980s with the stated aim of destroying Israel and replacing it with an Islamic state. Once a fringe organization, Hamas's popularity soared in the past decade as dissatisfaction with President Yasser Arafat and corrupt Fatah officials deepened. When Mr. Arafat died in November 2004, his successor, Mahmoud Abbas, called new elections. Hamas saw a chance to test its popularity -- and gain real political power.

It was a good bet. Hamas's election victory underscored the extent of dissatisfaction with Fatah -- a theme President Bush and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice emphasized in comments yesterday. "It's a wakeup call to the leadership," Mr. Bush said, referring to the Palestinian Authority. "Obviously people were not happy with the status quo." (See related article10.)

Despite exit polls Wednesday suggesting that Fatah would retain its majority, Hamas ended up with a strong legislative majority, securing 76 seats out of 132. Fatah finished second with 43 seats. The rest were taken by a handful of independent parties. About one million voters cast ballots, or nearly 78% of those eligible. Some isolated cases of violence and illegal campaign activity were reported, but voting was deemed free and fair by local and international observers, including former U.S. President Jimmy Carter.

News of Hamas's victory sparked frenzied celebrations among supporters in the West Bank and Gaza. Many took to the streets waving the green flags of Hamas and chanting slogans of support. In one instance, Hamas supporters tried to raise their flag over the legislative building in Ramallah. A Fatah supporter pulled it down, and it was trampled.

11 BUSH TRANSCRIPT

Read an edited transcript12 of the interview with President Bush.

Hamas leaders had expected a strong showing, but before the election, they tended to speak of assuming an opposition role in the new government. Allowing Fatah officials to retain overall control, they said, would allow Hamas to deliver on its pledge to reduce corruption and improve government services while not endangering the nearly $1 billion in annual aid the Palestinian Authority receives from foreign governments.

Without that money, the Palestinian Authority would be unable to pay its estimated 140,000 civil servants and would likely cease functioning within months. Nearly half of those civil servants are in the security forces, most of them with ties to Fatah and access to weapons -- a potentially explosive mix if relations between the two groups should sour.

"Hamas from the beginning feared winning too big," said Shalom Harari, an Israeli analyst and former intelligence official. "They made it clear that they wanted to use Fatah as their outside cover."

As the ruling party, the group still may choose to move cautiously, some observers said, tapping independent cabinet ministers with experience dealing effectively with Israel and the international community, according to observers. And Mr. Abbas, a Fatah member, will remain as president, the highest-profile position in the Palestinian government.

According to some Hamas members and other people familiar with the political situation, Hamas may consider appointing Salam Fayyad as prime minister. A former International Monetary Fund executive, Mr. Fayyad won a seat in the vote as a member of the Third Way party and until recently was finance minister. He earned a doctorate in the U.S. and is well-liked by Western leaders for his aggressive efforts to reform the government's opaque financial system.

As prime minister, Mr. Fayyad might also oversee the finance portfolio. Hamas could also strike a deal with Mohammad Dahlan, another veteran Fatah official once trained by the U.S. Central Intelligence Agency, to take the job of interior minister. That position is especially sensitive for Israel and the West because it handles all security issues for the Palestinian government -- including dealing with militants.

But regardless of who ends up in the Hamas-formed government, the U.S. and Europe, as well as Israel, will have problems working with a Hamas-led Palestinian Authority. The Bush administration has sketched out how Hamas must change to be seen as legitimate: renounce terror, accept Israel's right to exist, endorse an eventual two-state solution, and lay down its arms.

The EU, along with Russia and the United Nations, endorsed a similar list of demands last year. As sponsors of the now dormant "road map" peace plan, the so-called Quartet, which also includes the U.S., also stipulated that any future Palestinian cabinet not include any members of organizations that refuse to recognize Israel or renounce violence.

Hamas Victory Ushers In New Era (BSUN)

By John Murphy

The Baltimore Sun, January 27, 2006

RAMALLAH, West Bank -- The overwhelming victory in Palestinian elections by the radical Islamic group Hamas ushered in an era of uncertainty and anxiety Thursday, as Palestinians and Israelis wondered what kind of government to expect from an organization best known for suicide attacks, not its politics.

Hamas won 76 seats in the Palestinians' 132-seat parliament, an outright majority, ending decades of dominance by Fatah, which won 43 seats, according to preliminary results released Thursday night.

For many Palestinians, Hamas' landslide win in Wednesday's election promises an end to an era of Fatah corruption and inefficiency. But the party's victory also reduced hopes of restarting the peace process. Israel, along with the United States and European Union, considers Hamas a terrorist organization. The Hamas charter calls for the destruction of Israel.

Hamas leaders issued mixed messages Thursday about their intentions. One senior official, Mushir al- Masri of Gaza, said recognizing and negotiating with Israel are "not on our agenda."

Mahmoud Zahar, another senior official, said Hamas is willing to extend its year-old truce if Israel does not attack its members.

"If not, then I think we will have no option but to protect our people and our land," Zahar told Associated Press Television News.

Israel's acting prime minister, Ehud Olmert, said Israel will not negotiate with a Palestinian government that includes Hamas.

"Israel will not negotiate with a Palestinian administration if even part of it is an armed terrorist organization calling for the destruction of the state of Israel," he said in a statement after a three-hour emergency Cabinet meeting.

Defense Minister Shaul Mofaz said Israel would insist that Palestinian leader Mahmoud Abbas abide by his commitment to disarm militants.

"Israel needs to act judiciously and responsibly," Mofaz said.

Negotiations backed

Abbas reiterated his commitment to negotiations with Israel.

"I am committed to implementing the program on which you elected me a year ago," Abbas said in a televised speech. "It is a program based on negotiations and peaceful settlement with Is rael."

Abbas proposed that negotiations with Israel be conducted by the Palestine Liberation Organization, a possible way for Israel to avoid direct contact with a Hamas-controlled government.

Another prominent Fatah member, Saeb Erekat, said his party has decided not to join a Hamas government.

"We will be a loyal opposition and rebuild the party," Erekat said.

Palestinians were stunned by the news of Hamas' victory. Exit polls released Wednesday night had indicated that Fatah had a narrow lead.

By midmorning Thursday, the Palestinian prime minister, Ahmed Qureia of Fatah, had announced that he and his Cabinet ministers had resigned, making way for a Hamas-led government.

Hundreds of Hamas supporters wearing green hats and scarves poured into downtown Ramallah, dancing, singing and waving flags to celebrate their victory.

There was a brief clash between Fatah loyalists and supporters of Hamas. The two sides began throwing stones at each other after Hamas members raised a green flag above the parliament building in the West Bank city.

Hamas will inherit a poorly managed government that is deeply in debt and facing a possible cutoff of financial aid from the United States and European Union.

Unease about change

"People wanted a change, and Hamas offered a change," Palestinian Hadil Budeiri said as she watched Hamas members parade in Ramallah. Like many Palestinians, she expressed unease about the kind of change that Hamas might bring.

DOJ_NMG_0012719

"Things are unknown," she said, "It worries all of us."

Some Palestinians are concerned that Hamas might try to remake society according to a strict interpretation of Islam.

"We don't want the Palestinian people and cause to be isolated. We don't want a theocracy," independent lawmaker Hanan Ashrawi told wire services. "Hamas promises reform. Sure, they will do that. I would like to see reform. But what worries me is things like legislation on education, culture, social welfare, the ramifications for peace in the future."

Many voters said Hamas' victory was fueled more by anger with Fatah than by enthusiastic support for Hamas and Islam.

Whatever the reason, the victory marked a turning point in the organization's 30-year history and might prompt it to abandon its campaign of suicide bombings in favor of order and stability, some analysts said.

"Nobody will tolerate a situation where the Palestinian Authority becomes 'Hamastan,'" said Mordechai Kedar, an analyst at Bar-Ilan University's Begin-Sadat Center for Strategic Studies. "Although they would like to cover all the girls and close all the pubs, nobody will let them be the state during the day and terrorists at night."

Hamas has long advocated creating an Islamic state from the Jordan River to the Mediterranean in place of Israel. Some secular Palestinians have been concerned that Hamas' growing influence might lead to clashes with secular members of society.

But secular Palestinians who have worked with Hamas often admire the group's professionalism and dedication.

Hamas receives high marks from Janet Michael, a Christian who is the new mayor of Ramallah and who formed an alliance between the independent members of the city council and Hamas in December. They have cooperated without problems, she said.

"Working with Hamas is not bad," she said. "They are normal people. They are disciplined. They are hard workers and well organized."

"Most of the world is still thinking about Hamas like the Taliban," said Mahmoud Abdullah, Ramallah's deputy mayor. Its members may be fundamentalist Muslims, he said, but they are pragmatic and willing to compromise and allow for other points of view. "Hamas is more liberal than you think."

For many Israelis, Hamas' emergence as the dominant Palestinian political force confirmed their worst fears about Palestinian society and about the prospects for peaceful co-existence.

"Today, 'Hamastan' was formed," said Benjamin Netanyahu, leader of Israel's opposition Likud Party.

Gershon Baskin, co-director of the Israel-Palestine Center for Research and Information, said Hamas would not be worried if the United States cut off financial aid.

"The Hamas government of the Palestinian Authority will not be intimidated by U.S. and EU threats to stop financial support," he wrote in a report released Thursday. "Iran's millions of barrels of oil every day being pumped and sold all over the world will provide the Palestinian Authority with the ability to withstand any international boycott."

Hamas Sweeps Palestinian Elections, Complicating Peace Efforts In Mideast (WP)

By Scott Wilson

The Washington Post, January 27, 2006

RAMALLAH, West Bank, Jan. 26 -- The radical Islamic movement Hamas won a large majority in the new Palestinian parliament, according to official election results announced Thursday, trouncing the governing Fatah party in a contest that could dramatically reshape the Palestinians' relations with Israel and the rest of the world.

In Wednesday's voting, Hamas claimed 76 of the 132 parliamentary seats, giving the party at war with Israel the right to form the next cabinet under the Palestinian Authority's president, Mahmoud Abbas, the leader of Fatah.

Fatah, which has dominated the legislature since the previous elections a decade ago and the Palestinian cause for far longer, won 43 seats. A collection of nationalist, leftist and independent parties claimed the rest.

Prime Minister Ahmed Qureia, another Fatah leader, resigned his post along with his cabinet early Thursday, as reports of Hamas's victory began to circulate. Although the cabinet would have been required to step aside even if Fatah had retained its majority, Qureia acknowledged in submitting his resignation that Hamas had earned the right to form the next cabinet.

"This is the choice of the people," Qureia, a member of the party's discredited old guard who did not run for reelection, told reporters here. "It should be respected."

Abbas, on the other hand, will continue to serve the four-year presidential term he won in an election a year ago, shortly after the death of his predecessor, Yasser Arafat, the founder of Fatah. Abbas will maintain the broad power to create national policy and control the security services, though he needs parliamentary approval for his budget and legislative proposals. He will also shape peace policy with Israel as head of the Palestine Liberation Organization, which does not include Hamas.

The arrival of Hamas, formally known as the Islamic Resistance Movement, in the Palestinian Authority as a nearly equal partner will severely complicate Abbas's efforts to begin negotiations with Israel under the U.S.-backed peace plan known as the

"road map." Hamas, which emerged in 1987 during the first Palestinian uprising as an offshoot of Egypt's Muslim Brotherhood, favors the creation of a Palestinian nation on land that now includes Israel rather than the road map's two-state solution.

The election results stunned U.S. and Israeli officials, who have repeatedly stated that they would not work with a Palestinian Authority that included Hamas, which both countries and the European Union have designated as a terrorist organization. In Washington, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said that a party could not "have one foot in politics and the other in terror. Our position on Hamas has therefore not changed."

Javier Solana, the European Union's foreign policy chief, said in a statement that the Palestinian people had "voted democratically and peacefully." But, he added, "these results may confront us with an entirely new situation which will need to be analyzed" at a meeting of European foreign ministers next week.

Jubilant Hamas leaders reiterated Thursday that they had no plans to pursue peace talks or disarm the party's armed wing, a condition Israel has set for beginning negotiations under the road map. The plan, which calls for the creation of an independent Palestinian state by the end of 2005, has been frozen during recent years of violence.

Here in Ramallah, a Fatah stronghold where Hamas won every parliamentary seat except the one reserved for a Christian, dozens of activists from both parties clashed in front of the Palestinian Legislative Council, as the parliament is formally known.

The dispute started when a Hamas supporter hung the party's emerald-green banner above the entrance in place of the national flag. Fatah activists arrived and tore down the banner, which bears the Islamic axiom, "There is no God but God, and Muhammad is his prophet." The fight that ensued was broken up by police officers, who fired warning shots into the air.

"What they did offended not only Hamas but the Islamic nation," said Saleh Mikdad, 40, a print shop employee from the Amari refugee camp here. "But now we are all brothers."

In the past, the Fatah-dominated parliament approved the initiatives of Abbas and Arafat without much debate. But that could change with Hamas controlling the legislature, which will have the power to bring down cabinets if it does not agree with policy and would likely have to approve the terms of a final peace agreement with Israel.

In proceeding with elections despite Hamas's strong showing in last year's municipal races, Abbas gambled that it would be easier to disarm the group and modulate its policies, which include adopting Islamic law in the territories, with its members inside the Palestinian Authority. But Hamas's showing was far stronger than predicted by anyone in Fatah -- or by Palestinian pollsters who severely underestimated the movement's performance in its first national elections.

Hamas leaders must now decide how to form a cabinet whose ministers will run a Palestinian Authority bureaucracy dominated by Fatah supporters. Several Fatah officials said the party would probably decline any invitation to join the next cabinet so that Hamas, its sharpest critic for years, would get a sense of the difficulties involved in governing an angry electorate living under military occupation.

"They want to see how Hamas will act once it's responsible for running the government," said Bassem Barhum, a spokesman for the Palestinian Legislative Council. "They want to show the public that this is what they got. This is Hamas."

Barhum said rules required Abbas, who has threatened to resign if Hamas blocks his political program, to invite the largest party in parliament to form the next cabinet. Although it has the votes in parliament to name any cabinet it chooses, Hamas could be hampered by its lack of experience if it chooses to govern without a partner.

Party leaders chose candidates with backgrounds in medicine, education, computer sciences and other fields so that Hamas would have the expertise to run the various ministries. But Mahmoud Zahar, a victorious Hamas candidate from Gaza, said before the vote that the party favored a coalition government if it won.

One possibility is that Hamas will choose the leader of a third party to be prime minister while its own members grow accustomed to their new roles. One likely candidate for the job is Salam Fayyad, a former finance minister who won a parliamentary seat as the head of the anti-corruption Third Way party.

"My hunch is that they do not want to form a government on their own and would prefer a coalition with Fatah," said Ali Jarbawi, a political science professor at Bir Zeit University in the West Bank. "If this is not possible, I think they'll support a government of technocrats."

The Fatah Central Committee convened Thursday evening to begin discussing whether to join a Hamas-led cabinet, if invited to do so. Abbas Zaki, a committee member, said the decision would "depend on the program."

"If it is only Hamas, then it will be very hard to join," Zaki said. "And it is also necessary for us to understand what happened. We need to study this so we can make a recovery."

Some angry Fatah activists called for Abbas, who is commonly known as Abu Mazen, to step down.

"Abu Mazen led us to this catastrophe," said Shukri Radaideh, a Fatah leader in the Bethlehem district. "He must now resign."

DOJ_NMG_0012721

Abbas postponed these parliamentary elections last July to secure a new election law beneficial to Fatah's prospects. One of the law's chief provisions allowed more members of parliament to be elected from parties' national candidate lists rather than from the district level, where Hamas's organization is strongest.

The results announced Thursday, however, showed Hamas winning three more seats from the national list than Fatah and nearly three times as many in district races. In addition to its sweep here in Ramallah, Hamas won all seats except those reserved for Christian candidates in such traditional Fatah territory as Bethlehem and Jerusalem, where the Israeli cabinet had prohibited Hamas candidates from campaigning.

By Sharmila Devi And Harvey Morris

Financial Times, January 27, 2006

Hamas raised its Islamic green banner on the roof of the Palestinian parliament in Ramallah, celebrating a stunning election victory that has cast a new shadow over the quest for Middle East peace.

Hamas's victory was met with alarm in the west. But for Islamist groups across the Middle East, its defeat of the mainstream Fatah movement represents the first real opportunity to assert the power of political Islam.

The result heralds an uncertain era for the region as the militant movement – listed by both the US and European Union as a terrorist organisation – looked set to form a majority government. Prominent Hamas leaders including Ismail Haniya were celebrating even before officials announced the final results of Wednesday's legislative election.

The verdict of just over a million Palestinian voters will shake the region's mostly autocratic rulers and threaten hopes of a resumption of Palestinian-Israeli peace talks.

In preliminary results last night from the Palestinian Elections Commission, Hamas had won 76 seats in the 132-seat legislature against 43 for Fatah.

President George W. Bush said the US would not deal with Palestinian leaders who do not recognise Israel's right to exist, and urged Mahmoud Abbas, Palestinian president, to stay in office.

European politicians also called on Hamas to recognise Israel's right to exist. Officials said the EU was preparing to continue its annual aid of €500m to the Palestinian Authority if Hamas observed its ceasefire.

Saeb Erikat, the PA's chief negotiator, said Fatah would serve as a loyal opposition.

"Many people expected an earthquake, but not this tsunami," said a Palestinian official.

Israel and the US have always ruled out contacts with Hamas, which is responsible for dozens of suicide bombings, unless it disarmed.

Ehud Olmert, Israeli acting prime minister, told his officials to refrain from comment on the Hamas victory while the government assessed its effect.

With Fatah apparently unwilling to agree to Hamas overtures to join a unity government, the Islamists looked set to govern alone, with the possible inclusion in the administration of sympathetic independents more acceptable to Israel. But forming a government could take weeks.

Mr Qurei, whose ministers will remain in office as a temporary caretaker administration, said: "This is the choice of the people. It should be respected. Commenting before official results were through, he said: "If it's true, then the president should ask Hamas to form a new government."

The PA government is charged with implementing parliamentary legislation and administering financial and other policies. Foreign affairs and security are greyer areas, subject – in the era of the late Yassir Arafat, the former Fatah leader – to presidential control. Khaled Meshal, the top Hamas leader in exile in Damascus, said the group was open to political partnerships and would extend a truce if Israel reciprocated.

In an election universally judged to be democratic and fair, voters rejected Fatah and its associations with corruption and failure to achieve tangible improvements for the Palestinian people. Almost 78 per cent of 1.3m eligible voters turned out in a poll international observers said was well-run.

Prime Minister Resigns After Hamas' Victory (WT)

By Joshua Mitnick

The Washington Times, January 27, 2006

RAMALLAH, West Bank -- Palestinian Prime Minister Ahmed Qureia tendered his resignation yesterday after Hamas scored a landslide victory over his Fatah party in parliamentary elections, marking a historic shift in the Middle East that empowers an Islamist party branded a terrorist organization by Israel, the United States, and Europe.

DOJ_NMG_0012722

Hamas won 76 of 132 seats in the parliament, compared with 43 seats for Fatah, a stunning electoral performance that flew in the face of every pre-election survey as well exit polls Wednesday that forecast a slim advantage for the ruling Fatah party.

With Islamic militant politicians in a position to form a government without any partners, a crisis in relations with Israel and the international community seemed almost certain. The dramatic upheaval left governments in Israel and the United States scrambling to formulate a coherent response.

"Recognition of Israel and negotiations isn't on the agenda of Hamas," said Mushir al-Masri, a newly elected Hamas parliamentarian. Hamas leaders said they would not comply with international demands to disarm after the elections.

The vote means a split government for the Palestinians, whose system of government divides power between the parliament and the president, as in France.

Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, who was not up for re-election, remains in charge of foreign and national security policy as head of state, responsible for peace talks with Israel.

But with a Cabinet of Hamas ministers likely to take charge of the Palestinian executive branch, the electoral mandate Mr. Abbas earned a year ago seems to have dissipated.

In a televised address following the publication of the results, Mr. Abbas, also known as Abu Mazen, reiterated his commitment to the U.S.-sponsored road map and to negotiations with Israel.

"I remain committed to implement the platform on which you voted for me one year ago," he said. "The basis of this platform is negotiations and a peace settlement with Israel."

After huddling with his security aides, Israeli acting Prime Minister Ehud Olmert released a statement that threatened to boycott peace talks if Hamas joins the government without annulling its call for the destruction of Israel and its support of terrorism.

"There is no doubt that -- from Israel's point of view -- a new situation has been created," the statement said.

The new situation could not have come at a worse time for Israel, with the dominant hand of Ariel Sharon removed by illness, the Likud party marginalized and new elections awaited in March.

Israel reminded Mr. Abbas of the Palestinian Authority's commitment to disarming Hamas' military wing as part of the party's joining the political system.

"We demand that the PA and its chairman honor this commitment in the shortest time frame," the statement said.

"Israel will demand that the entire international community compel the PA and its chairman to implement the commitment to eliminate Hamas as a terrorist organization that calls for Israel's destruction."

Hamas invited Fatah to join the Islamists in a unity coalition, but the party, which dominated Palestinian politics under Yasser Arafat, turned down the offer.

"We won't join them," said peace negotiator Saeb Erekat. "We'll be a faithful opposition and we'll resuscitate the party."

The Hamas victory was seen as more of a protest vote against corruption and mismanagement by the ruling Fatah party than a vote against accommodation with Israel. Many Hamas supporters said they expect Hamas to engage Israel in talks eventually and to refrain from instituting Islamic law.

In central Ramallah's el-Manara Square, hundreds of elated Hamas supporters paraded with the militant movement's green banners to celebratory Middle East drums and chanting, "To the parliament Hamas!" A scuffle broke out at the parliament building when Hamas supporters hung up a party flag.

"I expected more than 50 percent, but not this many" members of parliament, said Rabiyeh Hussein, a Hamas supporter as he hugged the party's campaign manager. "It's a coup d'etat. It's a new era."

Even though peace talks have been on hiatus for years, the two governments interact on a daily basis, coordinating security, customs payments and humanitarian issues -- making a total break in ties nearly impossible.

Hamas Is Stunned By Its Success (LAT)

By Laura King

The Los Angeles Times, January 27, 2006

GAZA CITY, Gaza Strip -- Of all those shocked by Hamas' landslide win in Palestinian elections, few were more stunned than the militant Islamist group itself.

In taking the reins of power after participating in its first parliamentary vote, Hamas leaders face a predicament: If they attempt to please their most radical adherents by continuing to call for Israel's destruction, they jeopardize hard-won international support for a Palestinian state.But if they moderate their stance and reject their founding principle, they risk alienating their militant base.

DOJ_NMG_0012723

The group had wrestled with the question of whether it should even participate in the parliament, because such a step implied acceptance of the 1993 interim peace accords with Israel under which the ruling Palestinian Authority was created.

Having won a majority of seats in the new parliament, Hamas has the responsibility of forming a new government to work alongside Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas. Elected a year ago, Abbas will remain in office unless he carries through on threats to resign if he cannot pursue his goal of peace with Israel.

A key question hanging over Wednesday's election results is which Hamas people voted for -- the radical group that professes eagerness to continue the armed struggle against Israel, or the Hamas that toned down its rhetoric during the political campaign and emphasized its social service programs. The latter symbolizes, for many Palestinians, the hope for a less corrupt government and a better life after years of conflict.

With trademark discipline, Hamas' senior figures quickly closed ranks Thursday, proclaiming readiness to take on the daunting task at hand. "We will put the Palestinian house in order," said Ismail Haniyeh, a self-possessed former university dean who was the top candidate on the Hamas slate.

But Hamas in many ways appears ill-equipped to meet this challenge. Its political experience is strictly local -- running the cities and towns where it won municipal elections over the last year. Much of its senior leadership is dead, assassinated by Israel in response to the group's campaign of suicide bombings, in hiatus for the past year.

Complicating matters, international donors are poised to shun a Hamas-led government. And its military wing, the Izzedine al-Qassam Brigades, shows no inclination to disarm.

In other respects, however, Hamas may be better suited to govern than the Palestinian Authority, which was riddled with graft and largely ineffectual under the long reign of the late Yasser Arafat.

Hamas has for years administered a large, efficient network of charities, schools and health clinics, winning a reputation for fiscal integrity along the way. Many of the candidates it fielded are well-educated professionals, and not all are ardently religious. Also, Hamas' military wing is thought to be much more accountable to the group's overall leadership than are the roving gangs of gunmen who claim allegiance to Fatah.

Hamas, as it is prone to do, sent mixed signals Thursday about its intentions.

"The Israeli occupiers should recognize Palestinian rights first," Haniyeh said when asked whether the group would be willing to talk to Israel.

But almost in the same breath, he seemed eager to convey a message of conciliation. Asked what he would say to the United States and other nations that have expressed alarm at the group's ascent to power, he said: "Don't be afraid ... Hamas is an open movement" -- suggesting, apparently, that its stance on matters including Israel could change.

Hamas, by dint of its formidable organizational skills, was probably the first to recognize the political earthquake that had occurred with Wednesday's vote. After the polls closed, it posted observers at each locale where votes were being counted.

The tallying was slow and painstaking, carried out in some cases by candlelight due to power outages, not unusual in Gaza. But by 3 a.m., Haniyeh, huddling with aides, receiving reports from the field, talking nonstop on his mobile phone, was beginning to put out the shocking word: We won.

Amid the rejoicing, there was a distinct air of nervousness, even outright apprehension, in Hamas-dominated districts of Gaza. A few people wondered aloud: had Hamas bitten off more than it could chew?

"You know, I was very happy when I went to sleep, when I thought we did well, but not win," said Gaza City resident Ashraf Kholi. Like many Palestinians, he tuned into late-night exit polls that gave Hamas perhaps one-third of the vote.

"Then I woke up," continued Kholi, who runs a shop in the city's Zeitun district, home to many Hamas leaders. "And I realized everything had changed."

To avoid governing alone, and the direct contacts with Israel and the United States that could entail, the group's leaders are trying to woo Fatah into some kind of alliance -- an offer that has thus far been spurned.

"It is better to be in the opposition," said senior Fatah leader Jibril Rajoub, a former security chief. As to the prospect of Hamas presiding over the sprawling and notoriously inefficient Palestinian Authority bureaucracy, he snorted: "Let them try."

Outcome Likely To Alter Vote In Israel (WT)

By Hazel Ward

The Washington Times, January 27, 2006

JERUSALEM -- Hamas' shocking election victory is likely to radically alter the course of Israel's own election at the end of March, as an outraged right wing flexes its muscles and the centrist government plots its response.

As Palestinian officials announced the results, acting Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert convened top-level talks with senior political and defense officials to formulate how to manage the crisis.

DOJ_NMG_0012724

Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni, among those at the emergency powwow, earlier urged the European Union, the Palestinians' biggest aid donor, to speak out against the creation of a Palestinian "government of terror."

"It is up to the European Union to speak out clearly and unequivocally and clarify that there will not be any European understanding shown towards a process which would mean the establishment of a government of terror," he said.

Mr. Olmert, who heads the newly formed centrist Kadima party, is eager to define the permanent borders of the State of Israel and even make further territorial concessions in the West Bank. He faces a critical challenge, which could have a dramatic effect on his party's hitherto positive ratings in the polls.

Any perceived leniency toward Hamas could play directly into the hands of Benjamin Netanyahu, the hawkish leader of the right-wing Likud Party, who last year warned that Israel's pullout from Gaza was a prize for Hamas violence.

But intransigence toward a Hamas-led government would likely bring about international pressure on Israel to comply with earlier commitments reached with the Palestinian Authority.

Hamas' victory prompted a flurry of negative reactions from across the political spectrum in Israel, with the right wing heaping scorn on the government for failing to prevent the Islamists from contesting the polls.

The vote has created "the State of Hamasistan just 1,000 meters away from the citizens of Israel," army radio quoted Mr. Netanyahu as saying.

Yuval Steinitz, Likud member of parliament and head of the parliamentary committee on foreign affairs and defense, likened the Hamas victory to "an earthquake" and a "tragic defeat for Israel in the war against terrorism."

Ultranationalist lawmaker Efi Eitam called on Israel's domestic spy agency Shin Bet to kill each and every Hamas lawmaker.

"We must turn Hamas' parliamentary list into a hit list for the Shin Bet," he told army radio.

Israeli forces have assassinated dozens of Hamas leaders in recent years.

Even on the left, Labor Chairman Amir Peretz insisted he had "no intention" of conducting negotiations with Hamas as long as it was dedicated to Israel's destruction, despite his running an election campaign urging peace efforts.

"The Palestinians have given their support to extremist elements and it is up to the government to take the necessary action to ensure [Israel's] security," he said.

Elder statesman Shimon Peres, Mr. Olmert's No. 2 in Kadima, cast doubt over Hamas' ability to govern effectively given its international pariah status.

"Hamas will not be able to control the Palestinian Authority and pay the salaries [of more than 100,000 civil servants] without international aid, which will apparently cease," he told army radio.

The Palestinian elections of 1996, which were not contested by Hamas, were calm on the ground as on Wednesday.

But immediately afterward, Hamas began a series of devastating attacks, drastically weakening the Labor-led government of Mr. Peres, who was prime minister, and paving the way for Mr. Netanyahu's election.

Hamas Victory Now A Major Issue In Israeli Election Campaign (WP)

By Scott Wilson

The Washington Post, January 27, 2006

JERUSALEM, Jan. 26 -- The Hamas parliamentary election victory became a focal point of Israel's election campaign Thursday as opposition politicians criticized the government for failing to stop the radical Islamic movement from rising to prominence within the Palestinian Authority.

With Prime Minister Ariel Sharon unconscious from a stroke this month, Ehud Olmert, his deputy and now the acting prime minister, faced criticism in the wake of the Hamas defeat of the governing Fatah party, Israel's main partner in past peace agreements.

Olmert recently reversed Sharon's decision barring Palestinians in East Jerusalem from voting in the election. He said at the time that he did not want to give the Palestinian leader, Mahmoud Abbas, an excuse to cancel the first parliamentary elections in a decade.

"We are talking about an earthquake that has sent us back 50 years and will lead the entire region into chaos," said Silvan Shalom, a member of Israel's parliament from the hawkish Likud Party, who recently resigned as foreign minister in anticipation of the March 28 elections.

Public opinion polls have shown Likud suffering a significant drop in popularity since Sharon and Olmert left last year to form Kadima, which polls now show to be the prohibitive favorite in the coming elections.

"I warned Olmert in our first meeting after he took office" that Hamas must not be allowed to participate in the voting, Shalom said in his comments to the Ynet news Web site. "Now we have no one to blame but ourselves."

DOJ_NMG_0012725

Olmert ordered his ministers Thursday not to comment on the Palestinian returns. He told visiting Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.) Wednesday evening that he would not "negotiate with a government that does not meet its most basic obligations -- to fight terrorism."

Israel, the United States and the European Union classify Hamas as a terrorist organization. The group, known formally as the Islamic Resistance Movement, calls for the creation of a Palestinian state on land that now includes Israel.

The leader of the dovish Labor Party, Amir Peretz, said at a special meeting of party leaders that "we have no intention to allow negotiations to take place with an organization that declares its intention to destroy Israel."

"Hamas," he said, "is not a partner."

But Dan Schueftan, a senior fellow at the Shalem Center in Jerusalem, said, "We are assigning much too much significance to these elections."

He said Israel already faced a fading partner in Abbas, whose leadership has been undermined by party militias, internal corruption and the popularity of Hamas. Palestinians say he has also been hurt by Israel's reluctance to reduce checkpoints and military operations in the West Bank.

The Hamas victory, Schueftan said, could allow the Israeli government to proceed with another unilateral withdrawal from land in the West Bank, which Palestinians envision as part of their future state. Last year, Sharon ordered the withdrawal of all Israeli settlers and troops from the Gaza Strip, the other part of a prospective Palestinian state. Schueftan said a withdrawal from parts of the West Bank was already "the tacit platform of Kadima."

"The choices were between terrorists, impotents and hooligans," said Schueftan, who is also deputy director of the National Security Studies Center at the University of Haifa. "From an Israeli point of view, will this make things worse? No. Will this make things better? No. Would a different result have made a difference? No."

Gabriel Sheffer, a political science professor at Hebrew University of Jerusalem, said: "We should wait and see what happens inside the Palestinian government. But in any event, Olmert, his advisers and his followers face a big dilemma."

"The questions begin with: Do you talk to Hamas and, if so, what do you talk to them about?" Sheffer said. "I think Olmert will try to restrain the military, and try to find ways, probably not directly, to talk to Hamas."

Yossi Klein Halevi, another senior fellow at the Shalem Center, which holds mostly hawkish views on security matters, said, "Israel will now hold political Hamas directly responsible for the actions of military Hamas."

"There will now be one address at the Palestinian Authority where Israel can respond," Halevi said.

Dore Gold, president of the Jerusalem Center for Public Affairs, who advised Sharon, said Israel would now have to maintain control of the Jordan Valley in any final peace agreement to ensure that Hamas does not allow other groups Israel considers terrorist organizations to arrive from Jordan or Iraq.

"Hamas cannot be seen as just another Palestinian political party with an Islamic orientation," Gold said. "It must be linked to the larger sources of terror that threaten Israel and the West."

After Hamas Victory, Israel's Likely Course (NYT)

By Greg Myre

The New York Times, January 27, 2006

JERUSALEM, Jan. 26 — The Hamas landslide in Palestinian elections has stunned Israelis, but it may also have brought them a rare moment of clarity: with peace talks off the table, Israel will most likely pursue unilateral actions, drawing its own borders and separating itself from the Palestinians.

Ehud Olmert, the acting prime minister, made it clear after an emergency cabinet meeting that talks with Hamas, a Palestinian party sworn to Israel's destruction, were out of the question, while experts said Israel was now freer to establish its future on its own.

They said Israel — whose own elections in two months could be heavily influenced by the Palestinian results — was likely to focus on speeding up construction of the separation barrier, which runs along and through parts of the West Bank. After more than three years of building, it remains less than half finished, but Israeli officials say it has contributed enormously to the reduction of suicide bombings and other attacks. Palestinians, on the other hand, say the barrier takes land they want for a future state.

"The differences between the sides are now much deeper, and the chances for negotiations are much more remote," said Shlomo Avineri, a liberal political scientist at Hebrew University. "The only realistic steps may be Israeli unilateral steps."

Unilateralism was the approach taken by Ariel Sharon, the prime minister for the last five years, who now lies in a coma. He withdrew Israeli settlers and soldiers from Gaza last summer without negotiating the move with the Palestinians, and left open the possibility of more such moves in the West Bank.

DOJ_NMG_0012726

Since on-and-off peace talks began more than a decade ago, Israelis have been deeply divided over what sorts of concessions to make, how much territory to keep and whether the talks would lead to an end to the decades-old conflict. On Thursday, it seemed there were few such doubts.

From Israeli hawks who oppose concessions to doves who constantly pressed for renewed peace talks, Israelis said there could be no negotiations with Hamas.

Ami Ayalon, the former head of Israel's Shin Bet security service and now a parliamentary candidate for the left-leaning Labor Party, said the absence of a negotiating partner should not halt Israeli actions aimed at separating from the Palestinians.

Israel, he said, should seek "to create a situation where Israel disengages from the Palestinians and preserves the character of Israel as a Jewish democracy." Israel should continue, he said, "to move fast and independently to our goal."

Mr. Olmert hopes to become prime minister in elections on March 28 as head of the centrist Kadima Party started by Mr. Sharon.

But Benjamin Netanyahu, leader of the right-wing Likud Party, made clear that the Palestinian results offered an opportunity for his more hawkish message to be heard. He said the Hamas victory was a result of the unilateral withdrawal from Gaza and proved that no more withdrawals should occur.

Yuval Steinitz, a member of Parliament from Likud, said Israel should have prevented or canceled the Palestinian elections. He cited the 1993 Oslo accords, an interim peace agreement that bars the participation of armed groups and those that do not recognize Israel.

Mr. Steinitz noted that Palestinian terror attacks against Israel had gone down in recent years, but that Hamas's popularity had gone up. "This is a major loss in our war against terror despite all our tactical successes," he said.

Since the Oslo accords, the Israeli and Palestinian leaderships have maintained a dialogue at some level.

But Israel and Hamas have never had contact with each other, aside from exchanging bullets and bombs. Their relationship is similar to the one that existed in the 1980's and earlier between Israel and the Palestine Liberation Organization, with their refusal to recognize each other.

Hamas's electoral triumph comes at a time when Israel is going through its own political upheavals, and the government is unlikely to make any major moves until after the Israeli election.

"Election time means time out," Mr. Avineri said. "There is a strong argument for refraining from doing dramatic things right now."

The campaign may also mean that Mr. Olmert and his party will have to take a tougher tone to ensure that they are not outflanked on the security issue by Likud.

Israelis are beginning to debate whether the reality of being in power will tame or moderate Hamas. Mr. Avineri suggested a Hamas-led government might not be as threatening as some Israelis feared. He cited the Lebanese guerrilla group Hezbollah, which battled Israeli troops for years in southern Lebanon and now takes part in Lebanese politics.

"Hamas may behave like Hezbollah," Mr. Avineri said. "The rhetoric will be harsh, and they will still be armed, but they will be part of the political system, and their actions may be more restrained."

Others, like Mr. Steinitz, argue that Hamas wants Jews pushed into the sea, and did not enter politics to change its goals but to advance them.

Still, the Hamas victory injects uncertainty into the Israeli election. In previous Israeli campaigns, Hamas and other Palestinian factions have staged deadly attacks that pushed the Israeli electorate to the right.

In 1996, the Labor Party, led by the dovish Shimon Peres, seemed headed for victory after the assassination of Yitzhak Rabin by an ultranationalist Israeli. But after a series of Palestinian suicide bombings during the Israeli campaign, Mr. Netanyahu, of Likud, won a narrow victory.

The Palestinians started an uprising in September 2000, and in a February 2001 election for prime minister, Mr. Sharon trounced Ehud Barak, the Labor Party leader, who had tried but failed to reach a comprehensive accord with the Palestinians.

A Shift Of Biblical Proportion? (WSJ)

By Karby Leggett

The Wall Street Journal, January 27, 2006

AMONA, West Bank -- The fate of nine newly built concrete homes at the edge of this Jewish community may soon provide clues to one of the Middle East's most pressing questions: Is Israel preparing to withdraw from parts of the occupied West Bank?

The answer increasingly appears to be yes. Following extended legal wrangling, the Israeli government is completing a plan to demolish Amona's nine concrete homes -- all uninhabited -- because they were constructed illegally on privately owned Palestinian land. With the militant Hamas party winning control1 of the Palestinian Parliament on Wednesday, it is possible Israel would delay the demolition, but several thousand Israeli security personnel are scheduled to carry out the order as early as next week, police and military officials say. The large force reflects concern that pro-settlement activists will resist.

Though small in scale, the Amona operation could have far-reaching implications. Coming on the heels of Israel's withdrawal from the Gaza Strip in August, it would signal a further rollback of a decades-long policy of encouraging Jewish settlement in Palestinian areas, particularly the West Bank, which is now home to some 250,000 Israeli citizens. The move likely would resonate positively among Palestinians as they reorganize their own government through popular elections. More broadly, it could mark the beginning of a gradual regional shift away from armed confrontation and toward accommodation based on territorial compromise.

Amona is one of more than 100 illegal Jewish communities, known as outposts, that have sprouted across the West Bank over the past decade. Unlike the 120-odd official West Bank settlements, which were established with government blessing and financial backing and in many cases have grown into sprawling neighborhoods, the outposts never received official approval and consist largely of decrepit mobile homes and other makeshift structures. Many were built without legal ownership of the land they sit on, according to a report on the outposts commissioned by the government last year.

Amona's case was first detailed in a page-one story of The Wall Street Journal in July. It is unique in that the government's decision to demolish the nine homes is the result of a lawsuit brought by Peace Now. After focusing for years on the politics of the settlement enterprise, the left-wing organization last year initiated legal proceedings aimed at compelling the government to enforce laws it had long ignored. The case ended up in the Supreme Court, which sided with Peace Now in declaring the homes illegal.

The precedent could reverberate for years -- and deepen a chasm between Israel's secular majority, which sees the settlements as a security and financial burden, and the religious-nationalist minority committed to expanding them. Dror Etkes, a Peace Now employee who spearheaded the legal effort against Amona, says he is preparing similar cases over other outposts and even a handful of authorized settlements located on Palestinian-owned land. About 30 illegal outposts are now building homes similar to those in Amona.

"Our success is not in knocking down nine houses in Amona but in the crisis we have created between the government and settlers," Mr. Etkes says.

That sense of foreboding is now on display in Amona, where residents -- now living in mobile homes -- have begun filling in dirt access roads and erecting barriers to thwart the arrival of military and police forces. On the day of the operation, they plan to bring up to 10,000 pro-settlement activists here to protest the action. Orit Caspi, Amona's manager, says resistance will be "stronger" than in Gaza this summer. Complicating the mission for all parties is a plan by Israeli forces to dismantle another outpost in Hebron around the same time.

Set in the heart of the West Bank, Amona was founded in 1995, as peace talks between the Israelis and Palestinians were unfolding. Amona residents are deeply religious and say they are entitled to live in the West Bank, whatever laws the modern state of Israel, because it is part of the biblical Land of Israel.

The government decision to tear down the nine houses marks a reversal of policy that until recently had actively accommodated outposts. Although Amona is illegal, it enjoys full access to the state electricity and water grids. Residents are guarded by the Israeli military. In a sign of change, however, Acting Prime Minister Ehud Olmert recently instructed security forces to deal harshly with Jewish settlers who break Israeli laws.

Residents of Amona say they fear they could be the first in a long line of West Bank demolitions and evacuations. Yair Frank, Amona's rabbi, says residents plan stiff resistance not only to save their homes, but to show the government the response to a wider withdrawal.

"This land was given to us by God," he says. "It is our land today and will be our land forever."

In The Mideast, A Giant Step Back (NYT)

The New York Times, January 27, 2006

For 20 years Ariel Sharon and other Israeli hard-liners have claimed that they had no negotiating partner interested in or capable of securing peace between Israelis and Palestinians. That always seemed a debatable point, until now.

There are many reasons to explain why Palestinians voted to hand over their government to Hamas, an organization that revels in terrorism and is sworn to destroy Israel. The inability of President Mahmoud Abbas's party, Fatah, to run its affairs is first on the list, if pre-election polls of Palestinians were accurate. Fatah has been corrupt and inept, and it represented the status quo, not a happy position given the lawlessness in Gaza, the unemployment rate in Nablus and the despair among young people in Jericho. Mr. Abbas didn't help matters much, proving weak and incapable of imposing control over the battered Palestinian Authority.

Israeli hard-liners can blame themselves as well. Even though most reasonable people have recognized Mr. Abbas as a far more pragmatic negotiating partner than Yasir Arafat was, Prime Minister Sharon failed to give Mr. Abbas any concession that he could point to as an achievement. Instead, Israel has busied itself with carrying out Mr. Sharon's doctrine of unilateral separation from the Palestinians, a doctrine that is sure to gain more favor now that the Palestinians have chosen Hamas.

But all of this is peripheral to two central facts. Hamas grew out of a terrorist organization that has undermined every small step toward peace with mass murder. And on Wednesday, Palestinians voted almost two to one to put Hamas in charge of running their government. For there to be any hope of getting out of the impasse in the Middle East, one of those two things must change.

It would be nice to believe that Hamas, now that it is assuming the reins of power and the burden of actually having to govern, will renounce its call for the destruction of a sovereign state, disarm its private army, get into the business of making life better for Palestinians and try to negotiate the creation of a real Palestinian state. While we're not hopeful, we are reminded that the Palestine Liberation Organization of the late Mr. Arafat, of which Mr. Abbas was once second in command, was born in terrorism. For many years Mr. Arafat and his gunmen were hunted by Israel, much as Hamas has been in recent years.

President Bush was absolutely right when he urged Mr. Abbas to remain in office as a sign of stability and set Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice the task of seeing whether the shards of the peace process could be reassembled. But he was also absolutely right when he said, "A political party that articulates the destruction of Israel as part of its platform is a party with which we will not deal."

Hamas has a choice between governing and terror. Is the party more interested in making sure that the electricity and water stay on, that Palestinian boys and girls make it to school, and that these battered people finally get a state of their own? Or is it more interested in continuing its campaign to destroy Israel? If Hamas chooses the latter, it's more than likely that it will not be around for long, and rightly so.

Hamas Rules (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 27, 2006

The sweeping victory of the Islamist Hamas party in Wednesday's Palestinian legislative elections can hardly be considered good news. But neither is it surprising, and it may even have the long-run benefit of educating Palestinians about the terrible cost of their political choices.

The ruling Fatah faction of Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas governed corruptly, ineffectually, and until the death in 2004 of founder Yasser Arafat, dictatorially. So it is understandable that Palestinians wanted an alternative. That they went for the only other major choice on offer is not necessarily an indication that they share Hamas's goal of destroying Israel and all its citizens. The vote might even turn out to be clarifying -- in the sense of showing the world that no Israeli-Palestinian peace is possible until the Palestinians have leaders who really want to live in peace with Israel.

Of course, there's no sugar-coating what this vote for the party of suicide bombers and social welfare says about the state of Palestinian politics. Partly this is the fault of the losing Fatah faction itself. Ever since its return to the Palestinian territories in the mid-1990s following the Oslo "Peace" Accords, Fatah has fed Palestinians on a diet of extremist, anti-Semitic propaganda. Its military wing assassinated "moderate" Palestinians, while allowing Hamas to flourish as a terror weapon -- both to kill Israelis, and to scare Fatah's American and European patrons about the possible alternatives to its rule.

It should never be forgotten that in 2002 -- under Arafat's iron fist -- Palestinian terrorists were allowed to murder 452 Israelis. That figure later dropped not because of any change of heart on Fatah's part but because Israel and the United States finally gave up on Arafat as a credible peace partner and turned to a strategy of unilateral separation (the infamous "wall") and military strikes.

Partly, too, Israel and the West must own up to their culpability for Wednesday's outcome. Foreign policy critics of the so-called "realist" school will no doubt be tempted to trumpet the vote as a setback for President Bush's strategy of democratizing the Middle East. But it's more accurate to say that Hamas's win only highlights the damage done by decades of realist support for "strongmen" and "stability."

The calculation at the heart of Oslo was that Arafat and Fatah would impose a dictatorial order on Palestinians that outsiders never could. The late Yitzhak Rabin put it most clearly when he said the point of recognizing Arafat in 1993 was not to give the Palestinians their freedom. It was because Arafat could deal with Hamas and other troublemakers without interference from "the Supreme Court and [the human rights organization] B'Tselem."

Rabin was right that Arafat would have scant regard for the rights of Palestinians. But he was wrong that Arafat would crack down on Hamas. Like every other strongman, Arafat didn't crack down on extremists but used them to his advantage where he could. Palestinians could see that the U.S. was coddling a man who oppressed them, breeding cynicism about U.S.

motives and making it hard for democratic movements to flourish. The Bush Administration is working hard to change those perceptions and build a Palestinian civil society, but this will take years.

So far the White House -- which pushed the Palestinian Authority to hold these elections -- has struck the right notes in response to the Hamas victory. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice praised the vote for being peaceful and "by all accounts fair." At the same time she stated that "you cannot have one foot in politics and another in terror." President Bush rightly said Hamas should expect no relations with the United States until it stops calling for Israel's destruction.

The White House will have to resist the temptation, no doubt encouraged by Europe, to pressure Israel to deal with Hamas as it once was pressed to deal with Arafat. But given Hamas's history and declared goals, the onus is on its leaders to show that they have an agenda beyond terror. If Hamas begins to use Gaza as a base to import weapons and attack Israel, the Jewish state will have every right to strike back in self-defense. And the U.S. should support it in doing so.

It's always possible that the burden of responsibility will over time make Hamas a less radical movement. If it remains rejectionist and bent only on war with Israel, then the Palestinians will sour on its rule in any case. Perhaps then average Palestinians will conclude they have no choice but to co-exist with Israel if they want a better life. The obligation of the U.S. is to make it clear to Hamas, and to all Palestinians, that there is no future in terror.

Hamas's Choice (WP)

THE VICTORY of Hamas in the Palestinian elections creates fresh opportunities as well as dangers in the Middle East. The Islamic fundamentalist movement will now come under extraordinary pressure to cease all acts of terrorism, help restore order in the turbulent Gaza Strip and moderate its rejection of Israel. The pressure will come not only from Western governments and aid donors but from its own constituents. Hamas's leaders had hoped to use a minority position in the Palestinian legislature to exercise a veto over peace talks with Israel while avoiding disarmament and wider responsibility. As leader of the cabinet that will be formed under President Mahmoud Abbas, the Islamists will find their straddle of democracy and terrorism far more difficult to maintain.

Many Palestinians who voted for Hamas don't support the Islamists' fundamentalist agenda: Polls show that large majorities want an end to violence and a resumption of peace talks with Israel. Wednesday's vote was not an embrace of extremism, but -- as President Bush suggested yesterday -- a rejection of the corrupt and incompetent clique of leaders left behind by Yasser Arafat. Since Arafat's death more than a year ago, his Fatah movement had been unable to reform itself or control its violent elements, despite the good intentions of Mr. Abbas. Now, perhaps, a new generation of secular leaders will be able to purge Fatah and prepare to offer Palestinians a better alternative, while crooks and armed thugs are cut from the government's payroll. Mr. Abbas himself should remain in office, as Mr. Bush urged yesterday, and will retain considerable power to check a Hamas-led government.

Israel, which has its own elections March 28, will have to guard against any upsurge in violence, including acts by Palestinian groups unhappy with the election results. But Hamas's victory will simply reinforce the policy of the current Israeli government, which is based on unilateralist measures such as last summer's withdrawal from Gaza and the ongoing construction of a borderlike system of fences and walls in the West Bank. If it avoids provocations, such as the assassination of Hamas leaders, Israel may benefit from the pressure that others will bring to bear on the Islamic movement. In the short term, too, Israel is likely to escape any further prodding from Washington to make concessions it has resisted, such as the relaxation of security checkpoints in the West Bank or the release of prisoners.

Hamas's eagerness to avoid hard choices was evident in the swiftness with which its leaders proposed yesterday to form a "unity" government with Fatah despite the Islamists' control of 76 of the 132 seats in the legislature. The two parties will have to forge some agreement on security, since each effectively controls its own armed forces, with those of Fatah now funded by the government; war between the two is a danger. The Islamists no doubt will seek to construct a coalition that could continue to attract international aid -- without which the Palestinian Authority would collapse -- while evading compromises on Hamas's militia or ideology.

Even if Fatah consents to this strategy, Western governments should not. Instead, they should stick to the principle already articulated by the so-called Quartet of peace process sponsors, which includes the European Union, the United Nations and Russia, as well as the Bush administration: that "a future Palestinian Authority cabinet should include no member who has not committed to the principles of Israel's right to exist in peace and security and an unequivocal end to violence and terrorism." If Hamas will not meet that condition, then it should be condemned to governing Gaza and the West Bank in diplomatic isolation, without European, U.S. or World Bank aid. The Islamists must be forced to choose between democracy and terrorism; between their ideology and the yearning of Palestinians for security, good government and a state of their own.

Mideast Uncertainty, Again (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, January 27, 2006

THE OUTCOME OF WEDNESDAY'S Palestinian parliamentary election surprised even its victors. No one expected Hamas, which is dedicated to the destruction of Israel, to win an outright majority, but it took 76 of 132 seats in parliament. Its victory will set back an already stumbling peace process in the Middle East unless Hamas renounces violence and recognizes the Jewish state's right to exist.

Although the United States, Israel and the European Union brand Hamas a terrorist organization, Palestinians admire it for the schools and hospitals it runs. And the organization that once routinely dispatched suicide bombers into Israel has mostly refrained from such attacks for about the last year.

Yet even after gaining a clear majority in parliament, its leaders have refused to heed renewed calls from Washington and from European capitals to disarm and renounce violence. May the Hamas officials who want a government that will focus on bread-and-butter issues such as healthcare, education and agriculture prevail over the preachers of hate.

If the new government builds classrooms and feeds the hungry, it will give Israel breathing room before its own election in two months. Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas, leader of the defeated Fatah party, is the man designated to discuss with Israel the outlines of a future state no matter who has the parliamentary majority. Before the vote, Abbas threatened to resign if Hamas did well, but President Bush struck the right notes Thursday in urging Abbas to stay — while ruling out direct contacts with Hamas until it renounces violence.

Hamas may find that the obligations of governing leave no room for violence. Or it may not. What it will quickly learn, however, is that any Palestinian government needs the hundreds of millions of dollars annually from the United States, Europe and Japan to function and mitigate the desperate poverty in the fetid slums of Gaza and the occupied West Bank. Maintaining a truce might prevent a shut-off of the money. Recognizing Israel's right to exist, of course, would bring in still more.

The elections for the Legislative Council were the first in a decade, and Hamas boycotted those; former Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat never bothered to hold another round before he died more than a year ago. When Abbas succeeded him, he gambled that bringing Hamas into the political sphere would put it on the path to a renunciation of terrorism and recognition of the goal of the independent states of Palestine and Israel living side by side in peace.

It is not clear Hamas will do so, but that should be the pressure point for other nations. Most Palestinians, like most Israelis, want peace. Israeli leaders and Abbas recognize that desire; Hamas needs to heed it as well. The Bush administration rightly has promoted democracy in the Middle East, but now the United States has to deal with the results of a free vote. So does Israel, closer and in greater danger. Islamists also have racked up successes at the polls in Iraq, Egypt and Lebanon, again proving the double-edged sword of a free ballot.

The sky isn't yet falling in the Middle East. But Wednesday's election results complicate a situation that desperately needed stability, and they will make it more difficult for the Palestinians to achieve a state of their own anytime soon.

Two Elections And A Lesson (WP)

By E. J. Dionne Jr.

The Washington Post, January 27, 2006

In two elections this week, voters tossed incumbents out of power. One election made barely a ripple internationally. The other broke like a tsunami over the entire world. The response to each vote should teach us the danger of pretending that elections alone can make democracy happen.

In Canada's quiet election, Stephen Harper ended more than a decade of Liberal Party rule. It was a significant achievement for the Conservative Party. The Canadian right had, until recently, been badly split. Harper reunited the right, moderated its program and took advantage of public impatience with Liberal scandals.

But Canadians, devoted as always to subtlety and prudence, refused to give Harper a majority. Diane Ablonczy, a Conservative parliamentarian from Alberta, offered a perceptive take on the voters' verdict. She said they "want to test-drive the Conservative Party" before allowing it to govern without help. In stable democracies, voters can take test-drives.

In the elections for the Palestinian Authority, the voters also rose up against the incumbents. But in the process, they gave a majority to Hamas, a party that has embraced terrorism and would obliterate Israel.

In responding yesterday to Hamas's victory, President Bush, a man who prides himself on clarity and disdains nuance, was, if I may coin a word, nuancing all over the place.

On the one hand, he praised democratic elections for letting voters send a message. "If they're unhappy with the status quo," Bush said at a news conference, "they'll let you know." Indeed.

DOJ_NMG_0012731

But he also seemed to rule out dealing with Hamas if the militant group didn't change itself radically -- particularly its attitude toward Israel and terrorism. "I know you can't be a partner in peace . . . if your party has got an armed wing," he said. That's a good point about Hamas, though it raises interesting questions about Iraqi political parties that have links to armed militias.

From this tale of two elections, it's possible to take the wrong lesson, which would be to walk away from America's long if inconsistent quest to promote free elections and human rights. You don't have to agree with Bush's decisions to believe that an important goal of American foreign policy should be to expand the number of nations that live under democratic rule.

But since the invasion of Iraq, administration spokesmen and supporters have offered a utopian and decidedly unconservative view of how American power could be used to change the world -- and quickly.

It was said that the way to peace in Jerusalem passed through Baghdad. It was said that by ridding Iraq of Saddam Hussein's wretched regime, the United States would unleash a democratic revolution in the Arab world. Go back and look at the broad claims Bush's defenders made for his policy after the election in Iraq just a year ago. Everything, it was said, was falling into place.

But the world is a complicated place. Of course free elections in Iraq are hugely better than dictatorship. But when free elections become more a census to count members of warring ethnic and religious factions than a way of settling underlying disputes, they do not necessarily pave the way for enduring democracy. They do not provide voters with ways of test-driving the various alternatives.

In the Palestinian case, Hamas's victory was not widely predicted, but its strong showing was predictable. Every serious analyst understood the frustration of the majority of Palestinians with those who have led them. Everyone knew that Hamas had created a new civil society -- a network of health and social service organizations -- within the old Palestinian structure that brought a wide base of grass-roots support.

The polls suggest that Hamas did not win because a majority of Palestinians bought into its terrorist program. Hamas won, precisely as Bush said, because voters were so unhappy with the status quo. But shouldn't Washington ask itself why it didn't take more dramatic steps, over a much longer period, to change the Palestinian status quo? Taking action in Iraq was not going to do the job.

A working democracy north of our border requires a degree of hope for the future now lacking among Palestinians. The Bush administration once thought it could take a holiday from complexity and remake the world through a few bold strokes. But democratization is hard, complicated and frustrating. It requires the patient building of institutions and attention to detail. There are no short cuts. You wonder if the president will come to terms with the flaws in his own status quo.

Living With Hamas's Victory (WP)

By Jim Hoagland

The Washington Post, January 27, 2006

The politics of pain fed the surprisingly lopsided victory by Hamas radicals in this week's Palestinian legislative elections. The antidote to the poisons that run through Hamas may eventually flow from the politics of pain as well.

The Palestinian vote is a spasm of self-inflicted shock therapy that will unsettle the world, because Hamas accords a low-to-nonexistent priority to making peace with Israel.

But it is pointless to bemoan this setback or try to minimize its significance, as President Bush seemed to do yesterday in a White House news conference. Israel, the United States and Europe should instead adjust their policies to recognize and influence the volatile situation created by the unexpected and distinctly unwelcome Hamas victory.

They can best do that by not launching immediate efforts to cajole, bribe or intimidate a new Hamas-led government into adopting more peaceful-sounding rhetoric to clear the way for reviving negotiations with Israel. And there should be no attempt to paper over the crushing defeat inflicted on Mahmoud Abbas and the Palestinian Authority he headed.

Instead, the immediate test for Hamas must be its ability to bring social order and significant calm to the chaotic Gaza Strip and West Bank territories. That is the urgent priority set for the Islamic-based movement by voters upset with the turmoil, corruption and indirection that Abbas's Fatah party allowed to flourish. And that is the priority that Washington and its partners must acknowledge and underline by carefully chosen words and deeds.

In their pain, the Palestinians have lashed out against Fatah and entrusted their fate to a movement that exists in large part to inflict pain on their Israeli and American enemies. The psychic rewards of revenge, which are much esteemed in the Arab world, outweigh, right now, material and other rewards that were supposed to flow to Palestinians from peace accords or Israeli unilateral disengagement.

Washington and other capitals will be tempted to focus exclusively on the international dimensions of this lashing out. It brings setbacks not only for the "road map" outline for Israeli and Palestinian states living in peace but also for international efforts to contain Iran. Having Hamas form or control a Palestinian regime gives the extremist forces of Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad another card to play.

Even after Hamas's victory became clear, Bush urged President Abbas to "stay in office and work to move the process forward." The president seemed to be proposing that Abbas seek a political blessing from Hamas and a power-of-attorney to continue talks that the radicals denounce as worthless.

That is precisely the wrong direction to take. The Bush administration and other governments should do nothing to obscure for the Palestinians the consequences of their actions at the ballot boxes on Wednesday. It would not be effective diplomacy or politics to cushion the Palestinians from those consequences.

The world should not move backward 20 years, to the time when diplomats moved heaven and earth to coax grudging and obscure statements from Yasser Arafat acknowledging Israel's right to exist. That effort led to Israel's 1993 decision to install Fatah in command of the Palestinian territories in return for Arafat's unfulfilled installment-plan promise to make peace.

That history suggests there is little to be gained now from trying to induce Hamas into reasonable-sounding rhetoric or from trying to keep afloat an Abbas administration that has just been repudiated. Clarity counts in this election's aftermath.

The United States, Israel and the European Union should deal with any government that emerges from fair and free elections, including one led by Hamas. Not to do so would, among other things, make a mockery of Bush's campaign to stabilize the Middle East by spreading democracy there.

But those dealings should be carefully circumscribed. They should be conditioned on the ability of foreign powers to channel most of their economic aid to nongovernmental Palestinian organizations that contribute to democratic reform and improved security in Palestinian society. Fatah's going into opposition, rather than joining a faux coalition with Hamas, would facilitate this.

The administration has succeeded in making Iran's actions -- not U.S. policy -- the issue in the conflict over that country's nuclear ambitions. Washington should strive to do the same with Hamas.

The pain of enduring refugee status, of occupation and of betrayal by their own has left many Palestinians believing they have nothing more to lose. Hamas deserves the chance to show them how wrong they could be.

Hamas At The Helm (NYT)

By Fotini Christia And Sreemati Mitter

The New York Times, January 27, 2006

Nablus, West Bank

THE crescent has risen. The militant Islamic group Hamas won an astonishing 76 of 132 seats in the Palestinian legislative elections this week. The United States and the European Union must finally recognize Hamas's ascendance as a fait accompli.

Until now, these key third parties have equivocated: they pressed Israel to allow Hamas to participate in the elections but threatened to cut aid and ties to a Hamas-dominated Palestinian Authority. The practical reality, however, is that Hamas is a pivotal player in Palestinian politics, and no peace process can succeed without at least the tacit acceptance of its leaders. Moreover, Hamas's participation in Palestinian politics is not necessarily a bad thing, and resisting it will very likely do more harm than good.

As a political party, Hamas revealed itself to be disciplined, pragmatic and surprisingly flexible. It fielded well-regarded candidates, including doctors and academics. In some cases, Hamas aligned itself with independents once affiliated with the secular Fatah party. And although the Hamas charter calls for the destruction of Israel and the liberation of Palestine "from the river to the sea," the party's campaign manifesto made no mention of these goals.

Instead, when asked about making peace with Israel, Hamas representatives offered nuanced, if evasive, answers. As Ziad Daiah, a Hamas representative in Ramallah, told us: "We are not interested in the Oslo-type peace process that went on for 10 years and wasted time. But if Israel will start new negotiations, with direct benefits for Palestinians in a useful time frame, we will accept that."

Judging from the thousands of green posters plastered around the West Bank and Gaza, external matters like the peace process were not central to Hamas's electoral agenda. Rather, its campaign focused on popular concerns like fighting corruption, establishing good governance and restoring the rule of law. Hamas's victory speeches have emphasized the need to revamp public services.

To be sure, we should be careful not to read too much into Hamas's electioneering. The Hamas charter retains poisonous language toward Israel, and the group has yet to renounce its views on the place of violence in the Palestinian resistance. And Hamas's Islamist agenda continues to alarm many secular Palestinians, even those who welcome its entry into politics.

Still, Hamas statements indicate that these attitudes are not set in stone. As Mohammed Ghazel, a Hamas leader in Nablus, told the Israeli newspaper Ha'aretz, "The charter is not the Koran." And Hamas has done more than any other armed faction to honor the truce that President Mahmoud Abbas brokered in February. Although Israel continues to arrest its members, Hamas has done little to retaliate. Such restraint might have been an electoral strategy, but it still proves that if the incentives are right, Hamas can hold its fire.

In any case, the United States and Europe cannot trumpet democratic ideals abroad and then ignore the popular will of Palestinian voters, 78 percent of whom turned out for this election. Refusing to engage with Hamas, however skeptical one may be of its intentions, will only further legitimize the party; it could even give rise to violence. Moreover, cutting off aid to the Palestinian Authority, which is already in a fiscal crisis and enormously dependent on foreign aid, could bankrupt it, further destabilizing the region.

Hamas has indisputably become the force to be reckoned with in Palestinian politics. Even Israel seems to have awakened to this reality. A radio reporter recently asked Shimon Peres, the former Israeli prime minister, about negotiating with Hamas. "We are not fighting against a name," he said. "We are fighting against a situation. If the situation changes, then what difference does a name make?"

If the Israelis are contemplating engagement, it's time the Americans and Europeans did, too.

Growth Is Shown In Durable Goods; Jobs Look Positive (WSJ)

By Jeff Bater

The Wall Street Journal, January 27, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Orders to the nation's factories for big-ticket goods finished 2005 strongly, while jobless claims rose last week but remained at a level indicating healthy job growth.

Durable-goods orders climbed 1.3% in December to a seasonally adjusted $228.14 billion, the third straight increase, the Commerce Department said. Demand was higher for airplanes, machinery, cars and capital goods.

"The durable-goods report for December was extremely strong," said Stephen Stanley, an economist at RBS Greenwich Capital Markets. "The headline rise of 1.3% was decent, but some of the underlying statistics were even more impressive."

Orders for nondefense capital goods excluding aircraft, for instance, went up 3.5%. November demand climbed 0.2%; a previous estimate had orders that month falling by 2.1%. The category is an important gauge of business spending.

Read the complete text of Thursday's economic reports and analysis from Briefing.com: · Durable-goods orders -- Commerce Department1; Briefing.com2

· Initial jobless claims -- Labor Department3; Briefing.com4

Transportation orders advanced 1.9%. Machinery demand rose 6.5%. Commercial-plane orders sank 8.1%; however, the mild drop followed a 139% surge in November. December orders for military aircraft jumped 30.8%. Demand for motor vehicles and parts rose 6.6% last month. Orders fell 1.1% for computers and electronics, 2.2% for primary metals, and 2.8% for electrical equipment.

Separately, the Labor Department reported that the number of workers filing new claims for unemployment benefits climbed by 11,000 to a seasonally adjusted 283,000 in the week ended Jan. 21.

The four-week moving average of initial jobless claims fell 10,750 to 288,750 from 299,500 the previous week. The moving average is at its lowest level since an identical average in the week ended July 1, 2000.

With three jobless-claims numbers below 300,000 in the past four weeks, "it is beginning to look as though there has been a real improvement in the labor market at the start of this year, though we still have reservations about the reliability of the seasonal adjustments at this time of year," said Ian Shepherdson, chief U.S. economist at High Frequency Economics in Valhalla, N.Y.

Nonfarm-payroll employment rose by 108,000 jobs last month and 305,000 jobs in November. That is an average of more than 200,000 a month, a pace seen as quite healthy.

Rising Profit Forecasts Send Shares Sharply Higher (NYT)

By Bloomberg News

The New York Times, January 27, 2006

Stocks rose the most in three weeks as Caterpillar, Honeywell International and Lockheed Martin increased profit forecasts.

DOJ_NMG_0012734

The Dow Jones Industrial Average and the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index had their biggest gains since fourth-quarter earnings reports began. A government report showing that orders for durable goods rose more than forecast contributed to their advance. Phone companies rallied as sales at AT&T and Verizon Communications beat analysts' estimates.

The S.& P. 500 rallied 9.15 points, or 0.7 percent, to 1,273.83 for its biggest advance since Jan. 6 and third gain in the last four days. The Dow industrials climbed 99.73 points, or 0.9 percent, to 10,809.47, the biggest rise since Jan. 3. The Nasdaq composite index rose 22.35 points, or 1 percent, to 2,283.

Some disappointing earnings reports pressured stocks earlier this month when the reporting period began, but that concern subsided this week as the picture began to brighten with reports from Dow members like United Technologies and McDonald's.

Not all results yesterday were stellar.

Stock in General Motors dropped after the company reported its first annual loss since 1992. Juniper Networks suffered its worst drop in five years after a sales forecast disappointed and analysts downgraded the shares.

Caterpillar and Honeywell were the two biggest gainers in the Dow average. Caterpillar, the world's No. 1 maker of earth-moving equipment, rose $3.10, to $65.17. The company raised its 2006 per-share profit forecast to $4.65 to $5, from an earlier estimate of $4.52 to $4.91.

Shares of Honeywell, the world's largest maker of aircraft cockpit controls, added $1.35, to $37.41, after the company said it expected 2006 per-share earnings of $2.40 to $2.50 on greater demand for commercial aircraft. It had previously forecast profit of $2.35 to $2.50 a share.

Lockheed gained $1.98, to $66.99. The company increased its forecast for 2006 earnings to $4.50 to $4.75 a share, from $4 to $4.25.

The Commerce Department said orders for durable goods, items made to last at least several years, increased 1.3 percent, to $228 billion, in December. Economists expected an increase of 1 percent. The results were led by the biggest increase in business equipment demand since August.

AT&T, reporting its first results since the company was created by the combination of SBC Communications and AT&T, said revenue expanded 25 percent, to $21.6 billion, including its wireless unit. Net income more than doubled.

AT&T added 30 cents, to $25.51, and Verizon climbed 30 cents, to $31.68.

Microsoft said after the close that revenue this quarter would be $10.9 billion to $11.2 billion and per-share earnings would be 32 cents to 33 cents. Shares of Microsoft, which said fiscal second-quarter profit rose 5.5 percent, added as much as 40 cents, to $26.90, in extended trading.

Chipotle surged to $44 from its offering price of $22. Chipotle and McDonald's together sold 7.88 million shares. Chipotle has 489 stores that sell burritos, tacos and salads and was acquired by McDonald's in 1998. McDonald's lost 22 cents, to $34.94.

G.M. fell 80 cents, or 3.4 percent, to $23.05, the worst performance by companies in the Dow industrials. The company had a fourth-quarter loss of $4.78 billion and was unprofitable on an annual basis for the first time in 13 years amid rising health care costs and the lowest market share in the United States since 1925.

Bond prices fell, with the 10-year Treasury bill falling 11/32, to 9927/32, and the yield, which moves in the opposite direction from the price, rising to 4.52 percent, from 4.48 percent late Wednesday.

Dow Surges 99.73 As Strong Reports Push Stock Investors To Think Positive (WSJ)

By E.s. Browning

The Wall Street Journal, January 27, 2006

Stocks resumed their rebound after last week's swoon, as strong profit reports and upbeat economic news spurred hopes for corporate performance this year.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average surged 99.73 points, or 0.93%, to 10809.47. That's up almost 1% for 2006, but the blue-chip average still isn't back to 10880.71, where it stood before last Friday's 213-point decline. Trading activity again was heavy.

"The market really is bouncing around," said Andy Brooks, head of stock trading at Baltimore investment-management firm T. Rowe Price. "This was a day when the market chose to focus on the good news and not worry about some of the negatives -- like the situation in Iran or Nigeria," or how many more times the Federal Reserve will raise interest rates.

Caterpillar and Lockheed Martin turned in strong quarterly profits and raised their forecasts. December orders for durable goods were strong, and last week's new unemployment claims came in lower than expected.

In news that could affect trading today, Microsoft released quarterly results after regular trading hours, including a slightly improved forecast for sales and profits. Microsoft rose 1.9% in after-hours trading.

DOJ_NMG_0012735

During regular hours, the economic news helped small stocks and transportation stocks, which are especially susceptible to the economy's health. The Russell 2000 small-stock index surged 1.68% to a record close of 728.48, up 8% this year.

News that China's economy surpassed France and Britain to become the world's fourth-largest encouraged the talk of strong growth.

The gains came despite oil's 41-cent rise to $66.26 a barrel, and a 3% drop in General Motors, which reported a large quarterly loss.

Treasury-bond prices fell again on worries that the government budget deficit will force the issuance of more bonds, and that the strong economy will induce the Fed to raise rates more than had been expected.

The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index rose 0.72%, or 9.15 points, to 1273.83, up 2.1% for 2006. The Nasdaq Composite Index advanced 0.99%, or 22.35 points, to 2283, up 3.5% this year.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks rose; bonds fell. The 10-year Treasury note fell 10/32, or $3.13 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield up to 4.515%. The 30-year bond was down 20/32 to yield 4.695%.

The dollar strengthened. The currency rose to 116.41 yen from 115.71 yen, while the euro fell against the dollar to $1.2213 from $1.2245.

Chairman Moved A Nation (WP)

By Nell Henderson

The Washington Post, January 27, 2006

Government leaders, Wall Street analysts and academics have heaped accolades on Alan Greenspan as he prepares to step down as Federal Reserve chairman Tuesday, leaving behind a strong economic expansion, tame inflation and low unemployment after more than 18 years of adjusting the nation's interest rates.

But Greenspan, 79, also leaves a remarkable political legacy, say Republican and Democratic policymakers who have worked with him in Washington over nearly four decades.

From his days working on Richard Nixon's 1968 presidential campaign to his congressional testimonies last year, Greenspan has helped candidates, presidents and lawmakers devise and sell policies on countless social and economic issues. An avowed "free-enterpriser," Greenspan consistently pushed for less government regulation, smaller federal budget deficits and freer trade, these observers said. Early on, he helped move the federal government to play a smaller role in the U.S. economy than was commonly accepted in the 1960s and 1970s.

However, as Greenspan has indicated in public and private comments, his years in political life also taught him that compromise is necessary to preserve both capitalism and democracy. Over time, Greenspan helped forge several deals that strengthened the government's hand or extended its reach.

"Alan has had, mostly behind the scenes, a tremendous impact on government policy" over the last 40 years, said former president Gerald R. Ford in a December interview. Ford appointed Greenspan chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers in 1974.

Long before becoming Fed chairman in 1987, Greenspan played key roles in ending the nation's military draft, rescuing New York City from near-bankruptcy and temporarily saving Social Security from insolvency. Since taking the helm of the central bank, he helped persuade Congress to approve President Bill Clinton's 1993 budget and President George W. Bush's 2001 tax cut. He urged Congress last year to create private Social Security accounts, reduce the deficit and resist calls to erect new trade barriers.

"Alan Greenspan has probably been a key player in more Republican presidential campaigns and Republican party platforms and Republican administrations than any other economist in the country," said Martin Anderson, a senior fellow at the Hoover Institution who worked in the Nixon and Reagan administrations. "He's a wonderful politician."

Greenspan thrived in the Republican Party because it housed so many like-minded individuals. But Democrats, including President Jimmy Carter, also embraced deregulation in the 1970s; Clinton, in the 1990s, supported free trade and deficit reduction, declaring the era of big government over.

In the process, "the political impact of [Greenspan's influence] has probably been to push the Democrats more to the center on fiscal policy," said investment banker Felix G. Rohatyn, a Democrat who served as Clinton's ambassador to France.

The Fed chairman declined to comment for this article.

Greenspan took his first steps into politics in 1968 when Anderson asked him to join Nixon's presidential campaign. Greenspan helped coordinate domestic policy research and analyze poll data, writing computer programs to project the electoral vote count.

DOJ_NMG_0012736

Greenspan had met Anderson years earlier when both formed part of the intellectual circle of novelist Ayn Rand, a Russian emigre whose writings celebrated laissez-faire capitalism. Three of the essays in Rand's 1967 book "Capitalism: The Unknown Ideal" were authored by Greenspan, then the 41-year-old president of an economic consulting firm in New York City.

"Chronic deficit spending [is] the hallmark of the welfare state," the future Fed chairman wrote. "The welfare state is nothing more than a mechanism by which governments confiscate the wealth of the productive members of a society to support a wide variety of welfare schemes."

For Greenspan, the Nixon campaign offered a chance to influence the candidate's policies. Early on, though, Greenspan could be politically naive as he promoted his libertarian ideals: Nixon ignored his advice to end farm subsidies, for example. But he also scored some successes: Candidate Nixon called for the end of the military draft, as Anderson and Greenspan had recommended.

After Nixon was elected in 1968, Greenspan served on the president's Gates Commission, convened to study the possibility of creating all-volunteer armed forces. Greenspan considered the draft a form of involuntary servitude and voted along with the rest of the panel to end it, contributing to its demise in 1973.

By the summer of 1974, when the Watergate scandal was at full boil, the president needed a new chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers. Greenspan accepted the nomination but had not been confirmed by the Senate when Nixon resigned in August. But President Ford quickly resubmitted the nomination, and Greenspan moved full time to Washington for three years.

From the start, Ford recalled, "Alan was at the forefront" of his administration's efforts to free the economy from government interference by deregulating the airline, trucking and railroad industries and dismantling wage and price controls imposed during the Nixon administration.

Ford said he valued Greenspan's technical expertise but also his "feeling for the country as a human being," which the former president credited to the economist's experience touring the country in his youth as a musician in a swing band.

"That background was invaluable in his judgment on the economy," Ford said. "It wasn't all just academic theory. He understood the practicality of the economy."

When New York City verged on bankruptcy in 1975, Ford's cabinet was divided over the city's request for financial assistance, the former president remembered: Some officials wanted to give the city money and others opposed any government bailout. Ford said Greenspan and Fed Chairman Arthur F. Burns solved the impasse by proposing a compromise -- a package of federal loans that would be fully repaid over time -- that helped stabilize the city's finances.

Greenspan could be politically tone-deaf on occasion when speaking to the public. At a conference in September 1974, the new CEA chairman was jeered when he said Wall Street brokers were being hurt the most by high inflation, in terms of the percentage of income eroded. He later apologized.

But his advice was well received by presidents and other policymakers because they valued his cool analysis, discretion and refusal to candy-coat bad news, said Justin Martin, the author of a Greenspan biography. "He has a gravitas about him . . . that has made people in power very comfortable with him."

Greenspan served as an economic adviser to Ronald Reagan's 1980 presidential campaign. After his election, Reagan asked Greenspan to co-chair a commission to develop proposals for rescuing Social Security. Greenspan's panel hammered out a bipartisan deal to raise payroll taxes and gradually lift the retirement age.

On the commission, Greenspan displayed his instincts for compromise and a canny grasp of politics. In congressional testimony last year, he recalled how closely he worked with Robert M. Ball, a Social Security expert appointed to the commission by the Democratic House Speaker Thomas P. "Tip" O'Neill Jr. As the panel worked on each issue involved, Greenspan would run the various options by Reagan and his Chief of Staff James A. Baker III, while Ball would float them through his own back-channel to O'Neill. In that way, the panel knew, step-by-step, which proposals would be acceptable to both sides.

"What came out was essentially the commission report pre-agreed to by the speaker of the house and . . . President Reagan," Greenspan said during his testimony.

He and Ball also crafted a pact on how to handle the House Ways and Means Committee's hearing on the report. "I said to Ball, 'When the Republicans ask you a question, I will answer it, and I hope you will answer the questions that the Democrats ask me.' And it worked remarkably well."

It was during the Nixon, Ford and Reagan years that Greenspan worked with the officials who later would elevate him to become Fed chairman in 1987, replacing Paul A. Volcker.

The Fed's main job is to keep inflation and unemployment low by adjusting interest rates -- acting independently of the White House or Congress.

During the administration of President George H.W. Bush, from 1989 through 1992, Greenspan resisted White House pressure to keep interest rates lower than he thought necessary. Bush later blamed Greenspan for his electoral loss to Clinton in 1992.

DOJ_NMG_0012737

Greenspan had smoother relations with Bush's Democratic successor. In early 1993, the Fed chairman lent critical support to Clinton's deficit-reduction plan -- even though it included tax increases -- describing it on Capitol Hill as "a very positive force for the American economy." The package passed with no Republican votes, but Greenspan's public backing helped win some dearly needed Democratic ones, recalled Rep. Barney Frank (D-Mass.).

During the mid-1990s, Greenspan worked closely with Clinton's economic team in crafting responses to financial crises in Mexico, Asia, Russia and elsewhere -- even when those efforts occasionally required government influence on the markets -- and drumming up support for them on Capitol Hill and elsewhere.

By early 1995, Greenspan's political influence was so great that House Majority Leader Newt Gingrich asked him to call conservative talk show host Rush Limbaugh to explain the Clinton administration's plan to rescue Mexico, which was close to defaulting on its debts. Gingrich supported the plan, which the Fed chairman had helped design, but congressional Republicans were balking.

"I was looking for ways to get the conservative community to understand. . . . Rush is a leading communicator to 14 to 15 million conservatives," Gingrich recalled in an interview. Greenspan "is the leading economic policy analyst in the U.S. and arguably the world."

The Fed chief reluctantly made the call. Even so, Congress refused to back the plan, forcing the administration to take a different approach that didn't require lawmakers' approval.

Meanwhile, as the economy boomed in the late 1990s, unemployment fell, stock prices soared and the federal budget deficits turned into surpluses.

"The Clinton administration had huge successes carrying out the economic policies essentially fathered by Alan Greenspan and [Clinton Treasury Secretary Robert E.] Rubin, and they see that as an enormous feather in their hat," Rohatyn said.

Greenspan then argued for several years that the White House and Congress should "let the surpluses run" to pay down the government's debt rather than cut taxes or raise spending.

So many Democrats were outraged in January 2001, when Greenspan urged Congress to cut taxes, lending a key political boost to President George W. Bush's tax cut proposal. Critics charged that Greenspan had become too partisan for a Fed chief; others saw him simply reverting to his anti-government ideology.

But Greenspan believed the surpluses would continue and suggested that policymakers design "triggers" to scale back the tax cuts if deficits reemerged. Congress later passed a reduced form of Bush's tax cut without such provisions.

After the budget swung back into deficit in 2001 and more tax cuts followed, Greenspan repeatedly supported making the temporary tax cuts permanent -- one of the Bush administration's top policy goals -- while cutting spending.

Greenspan's influence on Capitol Hill has waned since 2001, as the political parties have grown bitterly divided over economic policy, leaving them less open to compromise. Lawmakers did not follow his advice last year to create Social Security private accounts, or to cut Social Security and Medicare commitments to future retirees -- positions that Democrats adamantly oppose. Nor did they heed him and adopt stricter budget controls -- which the White House and congressional Republicans reject.

But lawmakers of both parties continue to quote his ideas and arguments and seek his support for their positions. And he plans to offer his opinions after he leaves the Fed by giving speeches, writing a book and creating a new Washington-based consulting firm, Greenspan Associates, friends say.

And as Greenspan said in a speech earlier this year, "In the broad sweep of history, it is ideas that matter. Indeed the world is ruled by little else."

Democrats Ride Momentum Into Mid-term Election (WP/REU)

By John Whitesides, Political Correspondent

The Washington Post, January 27, 2006

WASHINGTON (Reuters) - Democrats are riding a wave of momentum into November's high-stakes battle for the U.S. Congress, with high hopes for significant gains that could threaten Republican control of the House and Senate.

Republicans enter the campaign after the toughest stretch of President George W. Bush's presidency, fueled by an unpopular war in Iraq, economic uncertainty, political scandals and Bush's low approval ratings.

But despite the favorable political mood for Democrats, analysts say the party faces major hurdles to gaining the six Senate and 15 House seats needed to reclaim control of Congress.

To win majorities, Democrats need to capture most of a small pool of competitive seats in the House while bumping off at least five Republican Senate incumbents -- tough tasks in any political climate, but not impossible.

"It looks like the Democrats will gain seats in the House and Senate, but the question is how many. Is it going to be a Democratic tide or a Democratic tsunami?" asked Larry Sabato, a political analyst at the University of Virginia.

"It is going to be hard for Democrats, but if the situation continues to deteriorate for Republicans this year anything is possible," he said.

Democratic majorities in Congress would allow them to control the legislative agenda and put the brakes on many of Bush's policy initiatives, while even small gains would increase their clout in Capitol Hill battles over issues like judges, taxes and national security.

The best chance for a Democratic breakthrough could be the Senate, where 33 of 100 seats are on the ballot. Republicans hold 15 of those seats and Democrats 18, but five of the most endangered incumbents at this stage are Republicans.

The open Tennessee seat of retiring Republican Bill Frist is also on the Republican endangered list, while Democrats face a battle defending the open Minnesota seat of retiring Mark Dayton.

Democrats also must defend open seats in Maryland and the Vermont seat of retiring and Democratic-leaning independent Jim Jeffords, along with incumbents Bill Nelson in Florida, Ben Nelson in Nebraska, Maria Cantwell in Washington, Robert Byrd in West Virginia and Debbie Stabenow in Michigan.

"Before they go after our incumbents they are going to have to defend their own. These open seats certainly offer an opportunity," said Sen. Elizabeth Dole of North Carolina, head of the Senate Republican campaign committee.

The toughest and highest-profile race of the year could be in Pennsylvania, where Santorum, the third-ranking Republican in the Senate, badly trails Democratic challenger Bob Casey Jr.

DEMOCRATS NEED SWEEP

"The Democrats have to sweep the competitive Republican races to take power, while holding all of their own. That's tough," said Jennifer Duffy, an analyst for the nonpartisan Cook Political Report.

"That means they have to win the open seat in Tennessee and beat five Republican incumbents. The last time five incumbents lost was 1986," she said.

Burns has become ensnared in the growing corruption investigation involving Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff, which Democrats use as a prime example of the Republican "culture of corruption" in Washington.

Also caught up in the explosion of scandals is former House Republican Leader Tom DeLay of Texas and former House Administration Committee Chairman Bob Ney of Ohio, who both face tough re-election races.

The public so far is not blaming either party for the scandals, polls show, but they crave a change in Washington and favor Democrats on most issues, with the major exception of national security and the war on terrorism.

"There is an anti-incumbent mood out there and Republicans are the ones who will bear the brunt of it," said Senate Democratic campaign committee spokesman Phil Singer.

On the House side, redistricting after the 2000 census safeguarded incumbents across the country and reduced the number of competitive districts to a few dozen. The Cook Report lists only 28 House districts that are toss-ups or somewhat competitive, with Republicans defending 18 and Democrats 10.

Republicans say that will force Democrats to score a near sweep of competitive districts if they want to reclaim power. They are counting on the races turning on local issues rather than national trends.

"People don't go into a voting booth and pull the Bush lever or the anti-Bush lever or the Republican lever, they vote for a person," said House Republican campaign spokesman Carl Forti.

"So you have to make a case to the constituents of a district why their incumbent needs to be fired, and being from the same party as Tom DeLay or George Bush isn't enough."

Mass. Gov. Mitt Romney Speaks About 2008 Election (LEXHL)

By Steven Thomma

Lexington Herald-Leader (KY), January 27, 2006

WASHINGTON - Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, a possible candidate for the 2008 Republican presidential nomination, said Thursday that his Mormon faith would not matter to the vast majority of voters, including the evangelical Christians who influence his party's politics greatly.

``Americans want people of faith to lead their country,'' he said during a lunch interview with reporters in Washington. ``Republicans aren't going to be putting a litmus test against people of my faith,'' he added.

Romney also said that his views on abortion have evolved since he refused to take either a pro-choice or pro-life label during his 1994 campaign against Sen. Edward Kennedy, R-Mass.

``I'm in a different place today than I was 12 years ago,'' he said.

DOJ_NMG_0012739

He said personal research about embryonic stem cells convinced him that life begins at conception. He said the Supreme Court should send the power over abortion back to the states by overturning the 1973 Roe v. Wade decision that legalized it nationwide.

Still, he said, he would support legalized abortion in his state if his state so chose.

Romney, a first-term governor who has announced that he will not seek a second term, refused to say whether he will seek his party's nomination in 2008. But his appearance before the Washington press corps gave him a chance to address some of the potential problems that would face his campaign, the same venue that Bill and Hillary Clinton used in 1991 to introduce themselves to the national political press corps.

Romney appeared before the group years earlier with his father, who died in 1995. Former Michigan Gov. George Romney was a leading contender for the 1968 Republican nomination until he said he had been ``brainwashed'' by the Pentagon into supporting the Vietnam War. Richard Nixon won the nomination and the presidency.

Some excerpts from Romney's interview Thursday:

On how Americans will respond to his Mormon faith:

``First of all is the great majority of Americans and the great majority of people in my own party who frankly couldn't care less what someone's religion is. I mean I'm from a state, Massachusetts, that's what, 50-55 percent Catholic, and frankly couldn't care less what religion I am. And that's the overwhelming majority of people in the country.

``Then there's a small group that, frankly, all things being equal, they'd just as soon not vote for a Mormon. There have been some polls that show that ranges between 11 and 17 percent or some numbers like that. But it's a small slice of people who'd just as soon not vote for a Mormon, all things being equal. .

``All things aren't equal though. People are different. When my dad ran for president in 1968, people looked at him, they looked at his record, they looked at his vision, they looked at his beliefs. Americans want people of faith to lead their country.

``And they took the whole package and they said, well, all things being equal I wouldn't vote for a Mormon…but all things aren't equal and I like that guy George Romney. And that's why he was so popular and why he led in the polls until he got brainwashed.

On how his faith will be greeted by Evangelical Christians, who have great influence in Republican politics:

``Members of my faith vote Republican more than any other faith in America. Republicans aren't going to be putting a litmus test against people of my faith.''

On his view of abortion since he ran for the Senate in 1994 and refused to say he was either pro-choice or pro-life:

``I'm in a different place today than I was 12 years ago.

``Then came the stem-cell research debate in Massachusetts. And I got more involved in the issue of when human life begins. I'm not talking about from the religious standpoint. I'm talking about from the medical and scientific standpoint. …

``Where do I draw the line? …The line is at conception. Life, a scientific point, begins at conception. I don't know when the soul, if you're religious, when the soul enters the body. My religion doesn't teach that, doesn't have an opinion on it.

``I know when you take a sperm and an egg and put them together…it is alive and it is human. …So it's human life.''

< On the Supreme Court overturning Roe v. Wade:

``My preference would have been and would be today for the court to say each state could be able to adopt its own policy with regards to abortion and choice.

``We would have been better off had each state been able to develop their own policy.

``That way a state like mine, Massachusetts, would be overwhelmingly pro-choice and I as governor would do exactly as I have committed. I'm not going to change the laws. You've chosen pro-choice, it's a democratic society, you've chosen it, I'll keep it in place.

Romney Says Clinton Likely 2008 Nominee (AP-Y2)

By Andrew Miga

AP2, January 27, 2006

Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, a Republican considering a run for the White House, says he expects New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton to be the 2008 Democratic presidential nominee.

"I think the most likely to get the nomination, of course, is Hillary Clinton," he said during a Christian Science Monitor-sponsored luncheon with reporters on Thursday.

DOJ_NMG_0012740

As for his own prospects, Romney brushed aside suggestions his Mormon faith could be a handicap if he seeks the GOP nomination.

"The great majority of Americans ... couldn't care less what my religion is," he said. He noted he has won support in Massachusetts, a state with many Catholic voters, and said religion did not hamper his father George Romney's 1968 presidential candidacy.

The governor predicted the Jack Abramoff corruption scandal would not cripple Republicans as they try to keep control of the House and Senate in next fall's midterm elections.

"The idea that money has influence in politics is not a headline story in major parts of the country," he said.

Romney has made recent trips to key presidential caucus and primary states such as Iowa and New Hampshire.

Mitt Romney (CSM)

By David T. Cook

The Christian Science Monitor, January 27, 2006

Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney appeared at a Monitor-sponsored lunch Thursday and opened some distance between himself and the Bush administration on the war in Iraq and the Medicare prescription drug benefit.

Romney announced last month that he is not running for reelection, a move widely analyzed as a preliminary step toward a bid for the 2008 Republican presidential nomination.

"There are plenty of places where I would separate from the administration," Romney told a roomful of reporters, "where I might have chosen another course ... certainly with regard to the war in Iraq or the front in Iraq - were there mistakes made there? Absolutely. Would I have done it differently? Of course. Would the president have done it differently based on what he knows today? Of course, in some measure."

For example, Romney said he would not have rested the whole case for the war in Iraq on finding weapons of mass destruction. He added, " There will certainly be occasions to recognize that no administration is omniscient and that there are places where we will disagree on policy."

Romney was also critical of the process by which the Republican-controlled Congress and President Bush produced a precription drug benefit under Medicare, the so-called Part D of the program. "The final product on Medicare Part D, that final bill was sort of sausage squared, the idea you don't want to see how sausage is made," Romney said.

The issue of Medicare Part D "is a complicated one," Romney said. He noted that President Bush "wanted to bring prescription coverage to seniors. He got that done, that's huge.... It has with it a financial burden which is very large. I don't imagine that that was what he was aiming for when he thought about this during his campaign."

Romney said, "I would have hoped to do it differently, I would have hoped to include within the additional prescription benefits certain reforms to Medicaid, Medicare, and our entire healthcare system to be able to pay for a very helpful prescription drug benefit."

Romney downplayed the impact his Mormon faith would have on evangelical Republican voters. "First of all the great majority of Americans and the great majority of the people in my own party ... frankly couldn't care less what someone's religion is," he said. The Bay State governor said there was "a small group," which he placed at 11 to 17 percent of the voters, "would just as soon not vote for a Mormon" but would if they liked an individual candidate. "Those two groups together are 98 or 99 percent of the electorate and then there is this very small slice, and boy, they will not vote for a Mormon no matter what," he said.

Stuart Rothenberg, editor of the Rothenberg Politcal Report, wrote in the current issue of the newspaper Roll Call that Romney's membership in the Church of Latter-day Saints "is certain to raise questions (and concerns) that will give many Republican caucus attendees and primary voters a reason not to support the governor. That would be a considerable handicap for a politician who begins with other liabilities."

Romney displayed flashes of self-deprecating humor, which is not always politicians' favorite variety. He said he had asked his wife if in her wildest dreams she had thought he would be addressing prominent groups. He said her response was, "Mitt, you were not in my wildest dreams."

Governor Romney's life story is an inspiring riches-to-riches tale. The son of auto executive and Michigan Gov. George Romney, Mitt attended the Cranbrook School in Bloomfield Hills, Mich. He graduated near the top of his class at Brigham Young University, and then picked up diplomas from both Harvard Law and Business Schools.

After Harvard, Romney pursued a business career. He founded Bain Capital, gave Ted Kennedy a scare during the 1994 Senate race, and in 1999 took over as head of the winter Olympic Games in Salt Lake City. Mr. Romney ran for governor of the Bay State in 2002. Last month, he announced he would not be a candidate for reelection, freeing him to learn more about the wonders of ethanol in Iowa and to articulate a passionate defense of New Hampshire's innate right to have the first primary in the nation.

A Romney-Kerry Rivalry? Not The Stuff Dreams Are Made Of. (WP)

By Dan Balz And Chris Cillizza

The Washington Post, January 27, 2006

Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney (R) put some distance yesterday between himself and the Bush administration on the issue of health care, criticizing the White House for failing to demand significant reforms in Medicare and Medicaid when Congress enacted a prescription drug benefit for senior citizens.

With an eye on a 2008 presidential campaign, Romney spent an hour over lunch with reporters in Washington talking about his evolution on the issue of abortion (from once eschewing labels to now calling himself "pro-life"), whether his Mormon religion will hurt him if he runs for president (only with a tiny percentage of the electorate, he said), his management style (heavy on analysis) and health care for all citizens, which is a top priority of his back home.

The new prescription drug plan has gotten off to a rocky start, with many states having to step in to pay for drugs for seniors who have been denied coverage because of bureaucratic bungling. Romney said the benefit is well deserved -- but so is the criticism. His complaint is that the administration created a new and costly entitlement program without exacting changes aimed at holding down costs.

"I would have hoped to do it differently," he said at the media gathering, sponsored by the Christian Science Monitor. "I would have hoped to include within the additional prescription benefit certain reforms to Medicaid, Medicare and our entire health care system to be able to pay for a very helpful prescription benefit. . . . It's a new entitlement program, and I would have wanted to finance that entitlement with reforms and changes and adjustments in the overall program."

Romney also dealt with some Washington controversies. On the debate over President Bush's warrantless surveillance program: "I expect the president to live by the law, and I presume he has." On whether the lobbying scandal will damage Republicans in November: "The idea that money has influence on politics is not a headline story in major parts of the country."

Toward the end he was asked about 2008, Iraq, and the possibility that he and Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) might end up as rivals. "Do you fantasize about that?" he was asked.

"Not about that, no," he replied to laughter. Referring to his wife, he said: "I told Ann that I was coming here to speak to you today, and I said 'Sweetheart, in your wildest dreams, did you ever see me coming here and speaking to this group?' and she said 'Mitt, you weren't in my wildest dreams.' " That sounded like a line GOP audiences are likely to hear repeatedly over the next few years.Ney Doesn't Shy From Reelection Bid

If there was any doubt that Rep. Robert W. Ney (R-Ohio) would allow certain inconvenient subjects in the news to force him from a reelection bid, it is over: He made a formal announcement last night in Dover, Ohio. He is expected to make a similar pronouncement today in Chillicothe -- not coincidentally, the home town of his likely Democratic foe in November.

"2006 promises to be a vigorous campaign, and I am ready for the fight," Ney told a local newspaper Wednesday.

He will almost certainly get it, given the barrage of recent disclosures that federal prosecutors are targeting Ney for his suspected role in doing favors for disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff in exchange for lavish trips and campaign contributions.

In Abramoff's plea agreement, Ney was the lone member of Congress mentioned. Ney has repeatedly denied any wrongdoing. He temporarily stepped aside as chairman of the House Administration Committee earlier this month at the urging of House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.). Despite the Republican tilt of Ney's sprawling east-central 18th District, Democrats believe his Abramoff woes have handed them a golden takeover opportunity. Chillicothe Mayor Joseph P. Sulzer and lawyer Zack Space are seeking the Democratic nomination and will face off in May 2 primary.Candidate Fires Staffer for Comment

Foot-in-mouth disease has claimed another victim -- this time in Pennsylvania's Republican gubernatorial primary.

Former lieutenant governor Bill Scranton (R) fired his campaign manager Wednesday after the man accused former Pittsburgh Steeler Lynn Swann (R), who is black, of being the "rich white guy" in the race.

Scranton said the remarks by James Seif "in no way whatsoever reflect my views or those of my campaign." Both Scranton and Seif are white.

Public polling shows Swann, a Hall of Fame wide receiver for the Black and Yellow from 1974 to 1983, with a lead over Scranton in the primary. Swann is also running even or ahead of Gov. Edward G. Rendell (D). If elected, Swann would be the Pennsylvania's first black governor.

Republican Cox Won't Re-enter N.Y. Race (PHI)

By Marc Humbert

The Philadelphia Inquirer, January 27, 2006

ALBANY, N.Y. - Edward Cox, a son-in-law of the late President Richard Nixon, said Thursday he would not resume his campaign for the Republican nomination to challenge Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton's re-election bid this year.

DOJ_NMG_0012742

The Manhattan lawyer suspended his campaign in October after Republican Gov. George Pataki endorsed then-Westchester County District Attorney Jeanine Pirro's bid for the Senate nomination. Her campaign subsequently collapsed and Pirro heeded the call of state GOP leaders to run instead for state attorney general.

However, Cox said in a statement issued Thursday that "after careful consideration of the circumstances and conditions as they exist surrounding the race, including the now shortened time frame available to run an aggressive and effective campaign, I will not seek my party's nomination."

Last week, in an impromptu interview with The Associated Press, Cox said one condition for re-entering the race was a solid endorsement from Pataki. The governor subsequently made it clear no such endorsement would be forthcoming in the near future.

Advisers said the October suspension of the campaign left Cox at a disadvantage for fundraising and becoming well known across the state to credibly take on an opponent of Clinton's celebrity.

Polls have shown the former first lady, a potential candidate for the 2008 Democratic presidential candidate, far ahead of her potential GOP competition in her bid for a second, six-year Senate term.

In addition to Spencer, the GOP Senate nomination is being sought by William Brenner, an even less well-known tax attorney from Sullivan County.

Spencer, calling Cox "a good guy," said Thursday he now expected GOP leaders to rally behind his candidacy, although Spencer also said he had not asked Pataki for his backing and didn't know if he would get it.

"He's not really shown an interest in this race as far as I'm concerned, except when he popped his head up there briefly for Jeanine Pirro and even that wasn't that strong an endorsement," Spencer said. "I would like to have everybody's endorsement, including the governor's, but whether I get it or not doesn't alter my plans."

Meanwhile, Democrats teased Republicans about the situation, noting that a whole host of well-known GOP politicians, including former New York City Mayor Rudolph Giuliani and Pataki, had refused to run against Clinton.

"Note to the New York state Republican Party: Don't despair, you may not have to settle for John Spencer just yet," said a statement issued by Democratic Party spokesman Blake Zeff. "There are still about a dozen registered Republicans left in New York who you haven't asked yet."

Lawyer Says He Won't Run For Clinton's Seat (NYT)

By Jennifer Medina

The New York Times, January 27, 2006

ALBANY, Jan 26 — Edward F. Cox, a Manhattan lawyer and a son-in-law of President Richard M. Nixon, declared Thursday that he would not run for the Senate this year, even though Republicans had been courting him anew to challenge Hillary Rodham Clinton.

The announcement from Mr. Cox ended the prospect of a dynastic clash pitting Mrs. Clinton, a former first lady, against Mr. Cox, who is married to Mr. Nixon's daughter, Tricia.

In a statement, Mr. Cox said that "after careful consideration of the circumstances and conditions as they exist surrounding the race, including the now shortened time frame available to run an aggressive and effective campaign, I will not seek my party's nomination."

Mr. Cox's exit is yet another blow to Republican efforts to mount a credible challenge to Mrs. Clinton, whom many expect to run for president in 2008. His decision seemed to leave John Spencer, a former mayor of Yonkers, as the party's most likely challenger. Mr. Spencer entered the race in the summer, and he has never backed off his bid, despite reports that Republican leaders were looking for other candidates.

Mr. Cox's decision ended a tortured series of deliberations that had him first telling friends early last year that he intended to challenge Mrs. Clinton. In October he pulled out after Gov. George E. Pataki said he would endorse Jeanine F. Pirro's bid to unseat Mrs. Clinton. After Ms. Pirro left the race last month to run for attorney general, some state Republican leaders asked Mr. Cox to reconsider challenging Mrs. Clinton.

The Democrats, perhaps emboldened by Mrs. Clinton's hefty campaign war chest and large lead in the polls, were quick to poke fun at the opposition on Thursday. In a press release, they called Mr. Spencer the "eighth choice" and listed several other Republicans who had been pressed to run for office, including former Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani.

"Note to the New York State Republican Party: Don't despair, you may not have to settle for John Spencer just yet," said the statement by Blake Zeff, the state Democratic Party spokesman. "There are still about a dozen registered Republicans left in New York who you haven't asked yet."

The chairman of the state Republicans, Stephen J. Minarik III, said that the party "had numerous candidates go through the system, and it looks to be that we're headed to John Spencer being the candidate."

Kevin Collins, a campaign manager for Mr. Spencer, characterized the campaign by paraphrasing Gandhi.

"First they ignore you, then they laugh at you, then they fight you, then you beat them," Mr. Collins said. "They won't be underestimating John Spencer for long."

Episcopalians Weigh Sainthood For Marshall (WP)

By Caryle Murphy

The Washington Post, January 27, 2006

When Thurgood Marshall died 13 years ago this week, he left behind a life of historic accomplishments: Intrepid warrior against Jim Crow. Architect of the landmark Brown v. Board of Education desegregation case. First black Supreme Court justice.

Now, some of Marshall's fellow Episcopalians are saying that the spiritual hallmark of his life -- his Christian commitment to racial justice -- qualifies him for special recognition. They think the Episcopal Church should name him a saint.

Delegates to the annual convention of the Episcopal Diocese of Washington will vote today on the proposal, the first step in a long process. If Marshall is added to the church's roster of saints, May 17 -- the date of the 1954 Supreme Court ruling that segregated schools are unconstitutional -- would be observed as Marshall Feast Day.

Church officials say they expect the 300 or so delegates to approve the resolution, which was drawn up by members of St. Augustine's Church in Southwest Washington, where Marshall worshiped.

"I haven't heard anyone say it's a bad idea," said Jim Naughton, spokesman for Bishop John Bryson Chane, who will preside at today's assembly at Washington National Cathedral.

When it comes to sainthood, Episcopalians follow a looser procedure than the Roman Catholic Church, which conducts a rigorous investigation into the life of any saint-to-be and requires proof that he or she performed at least two miracles. Candidates for Episcopal sainthood should be figures who displayed traits such as "heroic faith," "joyousness" and "service to others for Christ's sake," according to church guidelines.

Although Marshall did not speak publicly about his faith, it meant a great deal to him, said his widow, Cecilia Marshall, 78, who plans to be present when the resolution comes up for a vote.

"I believe if it weren't for his faith, he wouldn't have accomplished as much as he has," she said.

Marshall, who died of heart failure on Jan. 24, 1993, at the age of 84, was a lifelong Episcopalian. Born in Baltimore to a Pullman car porter and a schoolteacher, he graduated from Howard University's law school in 1933.

The great-grandson of a slave, he spent 30 years traveling the South, filing lawsuits on behalf of the NAACP's Legal Defense and Educational Fund. On at least three occasions, he was threatened with lynching.

In 1938, Marshall joined St. Philip's Church in Harlem while living in New York. After President Lyndon B. Johnson named him solicitor general in 1965, he and Cecilia moved to the District and joined St. Augustine's.

In written testimonies accompanying the resolution, Episcopalians say Marshall revealed his faith in his work.

"The Spirit working through this man gave him an intuitive sense of justice in which he saw all of life as sacred and all persons equal before God," wrote the Rev. William S. Pregnall, former rector of St. Augustine's.

If the Washington delegates vote to make Marshall a saint, the resolution will need to be approved by two consecutive national conventions. The next national convention will be in June, and the one after that, in 2009.

The names of such saints are entered in a liturgical text called the Book of Lesser Feasts and Fasts -- "lesser" because these are not the primary feast days of the liturgical year, such as those dedicated to the Apostles.

"We're declaring [as saints] people who've given great Christian witness and played a unique role in the life of the church," said the Rev. Bruce Eberhardt, who wrote the resolution with his wife, Janet. "We don't pray to them. . . . It's very different from the Roman Catholic Church."

As far as miracles, Eberhardt added, "we think the miracle of Thurgood was turning this country around, changing the way we are."

One possible obstacle is that the national convention is considering a resolution stating that people should not be considered for sainthood until 50 years after their death.

"We're hoping we can argue that just as Martin Luther King Jr. has been in this book for some time now, Marshall deserves equal ranking," Eberhardt said.

Eberhardt, a retired priest and a member of St. Augustine's, said that a former rector of that parish, the Rev. John Talbott, tried to have Marshall named a saint in 1994, but "people thought it was too early [after his death] to make this move."

Talbott urged Eberhardt to try again, and the vestry at St. Augustine's approved the effort in May.

Cecilia Marshall said she felt "humbled and honored" by the proposal to name her husband a saint. She added that she had no role in the effort, "except to give my approval."

Her husband "never thought of himself as a saint," she said, noting that he declined several times to see the stained-glass window dedicated to him in San Francisco's Grace Cathedral. "He never went to look at it. He felt he just wasn't worthy of it."

She added: "I used to kid my husband. I said, you better go and look at it; that's the closest you'll ever get to heaven."

Bush And China Endorse Russia's Nuclear Plan For Iran (NYT)

By David E. Sanger And Elaine Sciolino

The New York Times, January 27, 2006

WASHINGTON, Jan. 26 — President Bush and the Chinese government both declared their full support on Thursday for a Russian proposal to allow Iran to operate civilian nuclear facilities as long as Russia and international nuclear inspectors are in full control of the fuel.

Mr. Bush's explicit public endorsement puts all of the major powers on record supporting the proposal, even as most acknowledge that it is a significant concession to Iran and runs the risk that the country will drag out the negotiations while continuing to produce nuclear material. Yet officials say they believe it is the best face-saving strategy to pursue a negotiated settlement with Iran.

European and American officials familiar with the details of the offer that Russia made to Iran say that Iran would continue to be allowed to operate its nuclear plant at Isfahan, which converts raw uranium into a form that is ready to be enriched. That is a step that both Europe and the United States said last year that they could not allow — and that was explicitly barred under the agreement between Iran and Europe in late 2004, because Iran could divert the uranium to secret enrichment facilities. Iran began operating the Isfahan plant again in August.

Mr. Bush did not discuss the details of the Russian offer. But American, European and Russian officials, who like others discussing the issue spoke on the condition of anonymity because they did not want to be seen as interfering in the negotiations, said the offer would allow Iran to continue operations at the plant that turns yellowcake, a concentrated form of uranium ore, into uranium hexafluoride, a toxic material that centrifuges spin into fuel for reactors or bombs.

Critics of that concession say that it could send a signal to Iran that it no longer has to comply with all provisions of its November 2004 agreement with Europe.

"A red line was crossed" when Iran began producing the uranium last fall, said David Albright, president of the Institute for Science and International Security, a nonpartisan research group that follows developments in Iran. "The Iranians got away with reopening the conversion facility, and now people have accepted it's never going to be shut again and have taken it off the table."

Mr. Bush made his statement embracing the Russian idea at a news conference on Thursday. He said, "The Iranians have said, 'We want a weapon.' "

In fact, Iran has denied that it is pursuing a weapon, and in the afternoon, the White House spokesman, Scott McClellan, acknowledged that Mr. Bush had misspoken.

"He was referring to their behavior," Mr. McClellan said by telephone later. "Our concern is their intention is to develop a nuclear weapon under the guise of a civilian program."

Nonetheless, Mr. Bush's slip may cement the perception among some members of the board of the International Atomic Energy Agency that he has decided, at least in his own mind, that Iran is intent on building a weapon as fast as it can, a situation he has said repeatedly that he will not tolerate. Mr. Bush gave no hint on Thursday that he was thinking of military action, instead saying that "we are working hard to continue the diplomacy necessary to send a focused message to the Iranian government, and that is: 'Your desires for a weapon are unacceptable.' "

Mr. Bush's statement came at a moment of heightened concern in Vienna, home of the agency, that if its board votes next week to send Iran's case to the United Nations Security Council, Iran might make good on its threat to limit cooperation with inspectors and begin full scale enrichment of uranium. North Korea threw out inspectors three years ago, and one senior American official said recently that "the Iranians have looked closely at that model."

The Russian proposal lays out a complicated plan in which Iran would supply the uranium hexafluoride from Isfahan, shipping it to Russia for enrichment. Once enriched, the uranium would be shipped back to Iran's nuclear plant in Bushehr, which is being built by the Russians.

But huge questions remain, including the scale of the program, the degree of involvement of Iranian engineers and program's commercial viability. Moreover, just working out a deal this complex would take months or longer, experts say, at a time the administration fears the Iranians could surge ahead.

In interviews, Russian and European officials said they believed the arrangements, while face-saving, made no economic or technological sense for Iran. Iran would have to pay for the enrichment, but its own scientists would not be allowed to work on the site.

Moreover, there are technical problems. Russian officials, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because they were in the middle of negotiations, said that the uranium gas produced at Isfahan was of inferior quality to what was produced in Russia. As a result, the Russians have no interest, they say, in buying any of its for their own use.

In an interview in Vienna on Wednesday, Gregory L. Schulte, the American ambassador to the atomic agency, said, "There are those who would argue that conversion is not proliferation-significant because it does not produce weapons grade material, but from our perspective, conversion is another step forward to acquire enrichment capability. It has no economic purpose."

While China favored the Russian proposal, it also firmly opposed the use of sanctions. That comes as a disappointment to Washington, which this week sent a top official to persuade China's leaders that they should do far more.

During a visit to Beijing by Ali Larijani, Iran's top nuclear negotiator, Kong Quan, China's Foreign Ministry spokesman, praised Moscow's offer to enrich Iran's uranium in Russia and made clear that China will not support sanctions. "We think the Russian proposal is a good attempt to break this stalemate," Mr. Kong said, adding, "We oppose impulsively using sanctions or threats of sanctions to solve problems."

The Bush administration has not allowed its stated opposition to Iran's uranium conversion at Isfahan to block the Russian offer. "This is dangerous, but it is minimally acceptable as long as they are not enriching," said Mark Fitzpatrick, a senior fellow at the International Institute for Strategic Studies in London. "The Russian proposal is the last best chance of resolving this without an escalation."

U.S. Comments on India Clarified

India responded testily yesterday to American suggestions of a quid pro quo in its blossoming relations with the United States, with the Indian foreign secretary calling in the United States ambassador over his reported remarks about how India should vote next week on whether to refer the case of Iran's nuclear ambitions to the United Nations Security Council.

David C. Mulford, the American ambassador to India, had been quoted by the Press Trust of India news agency as saying that if India did not vote to refer Iran to the Security Council, it would be "devastating" to its chances of securing the nuclear deal with the United States.

The American Embassy later said that the comments had been taken "out of context" and released a full transcript. In it, Mr. Mulford first said that India would be expected to vote "based on India's judgment of its own national interest."

He went on to say, "that if they decide that they don't want to vote for this, our view is that the effect on members of Congress with regard to this civil nuclear initiative will be devastating."

Rice Says Iran Is 'feeling Heat' (REU)

Reuters, January 27, 2006

WASHINGTON (Reuters) -- Iran is "feeling the heat" of international pressure over its nuclear program and Washington will insist the issue be formally referred to the U.N. Security Council, U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said on Thursday.

In an interview with Reuters, Rice showed little patience with Iran's belated interest in a Russian compromise proposal that would keep the case out of the Security Council.

"I think that says something about the role of (international) pressure in this process. It shows the Iranians are feeling the heat," she said.

The Iranians are "doing nothing but trying to throw up chaff so that they are not referred to the Security Council and people shouldn't let them get away with it ... The time (for a formal referral) has come," she added.

Iran and China expressed support on Thursday for a Russian compromise proposal to resolve Tehran's standoff with Western governments which suspect it of secretly planning to build a nuclear bomb (Full story).

Tehran has previously shown little interest in the idea, intended to ensure it does not covertly divert enriched fuel toward a weapons program. It has repeatedly insisted it has no plans to build bombs but has the right to enrich uranium fuel on its territory for nuclear power generation.

Iran's apparent change of heart, coupled with backing from major power China, raised the possibility that a Feb. 2 meeting of the U.N. nuclear watchdog -- the International Atomic Energy Agency -- could once again delay a decision on referral to the Security Council, which could impose sanctions.

Many countries are reluctant to push a confrontation with Iran, a major oil producing state which has threatened to stop cooperating with IAEA inspectors if the referral goes forward.

DOJ_NMG_0012746

Separately, the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, John Bolton, said on CNN: "The Iranians have been very effective in using their oil and natural gas to persuade China, India and other countries to their side. We have to correct that."Emergency meeting

The IAEA board of governors is to discuss Iran at an emergency meeting Feb. 2-3 in Vienna.

Aiming to avoid a showdown, Russia has suggested that instead of a formal referral to the Security Council, the IAEA board could just ask the council to discuss the Iran issue and then send it back to the IAEA.

But this informal move carries less legal weight and would mean the council could not consider sanctions.

The IAEA board had previously found Iran in non-compliance with its non-proliferation obligations but delayed sending the issue to the Security Council, while giving more time for European-led negotiations to proceed.

Since then, negotiations collapsed, Iran broke seals on nuclear facilities under IAEA monitoring and declared it would resume sensitive nuclear enrichment activities, which could give it fuel for a bomb.

"The time for talking outside the Security Council is over," Rice said.

She indicated the first step in the Security Council would be a president's statement showing united international support for Iran to resume a freeze on enrichment.

Rice refused to predict how quickly the United Nations might move to sanctions, saying "we'll take this one step at a time."

But she stressed that great care would be taken to avoid sanctions that target the Iranian people, as opposed to government leaders. As an example, she said Iranian soccer players should not be banned from the 2006 World Cup in Germany.

Even officials and experts who support Security Council referral worry that opposition by veto-wielding Russia and China could ultimately thwart any council action, undermining non-proliferation beyond Iran.

But Rice said she was unable to say Russia and China would not ultimately back punitive action against Iran because both consider Iran's nuclear ambitions a "very serious issue."

China Backs Talks In Iranian Standoff (WP)

By Edward Cody

The Washington Post, January 27, 2006

BEIJING, Jan. 26 -- China endorsed a Russian compromise proposal for breaking the stalemate over Iran's nuclear program Thursday and joined Iran's visiting nuclear negotiator in calling for patience and more discussions on the Russian idea.

The Chinese stand, issued during talks with Ali Larijani, secretary of Iran's Supreme National Security Council, suggested that the idea of having Iran send uranium to Russia for enrichment might become the common denominator of an agreement on preventing the Iranian government from developing nuclear weapons, rather than the sanctions envisioned by the Bush administration.

"We oppose impulsively using sanctions or threats of sanctions to solve problems," the Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesman, Kong Quan, told reporters at a regular briefing.

Deputy Secretary of State Robert B. Zoellick had urged the Chinese leadership on Tuesday to join the United States and other nations in taking urgent steps to make sure Iran does not expand its nuclear research program into weapons production. China agrees that Iran should not have nuclear weapons, he said afterward, but differs with Washington over how to prevent it and how fast a solution has to be found.

Without mentioning the United States or its European allies directly, Quan urged other countries to pursue a solution to the crisis through more negotiations, and said China's leaders view the Russian suggestions as a good place to start. Larijani, at a news conference later, said that, in this regard, the views of China and Iran were "very close."

"The Russian idea is fruitful, but it needs to be discussed more, and we are in the process of this negotiation," he said, adding that another round of talks had been scheduled with Russia for mid-February.

"It needs to be considered in a broader package," he added. "There are different aspects around this idea. . . . So we need to be patient."

The United States, France and Britain have said they are running out of patience. They have urged the International Atomic Energy Agency, at an emergency session scheduled Feb. 2, to refer the Iranian nuclear standoff to the U.N. Security Council, which could impose sanctions or some other form of warning.

Since then, however, President Bush has hailed the Russian suggestion as a promising compromise. And on Thursday at the World Economic Forum in Davos, Switzerland, the head of the IAEA, Mohamed ElBaradei, said Moscow's plan could offer "the beginning of a solution," according to the Reuters news agency.

In Washington on Thursday, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said the time for referral had come. "The Iranians are doing nothing but trying to throw up chaff . . . and people shouldn't let them get away with it," she said in an interview with Reuters.

The foreign ministers of the five permanent Security Council members -- the United States, Britain, Russia, China and France -- plan to gather Monday in London, along with Germany, to lay groundwork for the IAEA decision.

The crisis atmosphere swelled this month when Iran removed U.N. seals on equipment that can be used to enrich uranium. The Iranian leadership repeatedly has said it has no intention of making weapons but retains the right under international conventions to enrich uranium for nuclear energy production.

Larijani has said that if the IAEA does refer Iran to the Security Council, Iran will take the next step and begin enriching uranium, in effect moving from research to making what could become weapons material. Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki has warned that such a step would prompt Iran to halt cooperation with the IAEA, including its surprise checks at nuclear research sites.

Against that background, Russia offered its compromise proposal, saying Iran could send its uranium to Russian facilities for enrichment to make sure none is diverted into weapons production.

China, which has veto power in the Security Council, traditionally has shied from the use of sanctions in international disputes. But Chinese analysts predicted that China would likely abstain in a vote on sanctions, seeking to maintain its good relations with Washington.

57% Back A Hit On Iran If Defiance Persists (LAT)

By Greg Miller

The Los Angeles Times, January 27, 2006

WASHINGTON — Despite persistent disillusionment with the war in Iraq, a majority of Americans supports taking military action against Iran if that country continues to produce material that can be used to develop nuclear weapons, a Los Angeles Times/Bloomberg poll has found.

The poll, conducted Sunday through Wednesday, found that 57% of Americans favor military intervention if Iran's Islamic government pursues a program that could enable it to build nuclear arms.

Support for military action against Tehran has increased over the last year, the poll found, even though public sentiment is running against the war in neighboring Iraq: 53% said they believe the situation there was not worth going to war.

The poll results suggest that the difficulties the United States has encountered in Iraq have not turned the public against the possibility of military actions elsewhere in the Middle East.

Support for a potential military confrontation with Iran was strongest among Republican respondents, among whom 76% endorsed the idea. But even among Democrats, who overwhelmingly oppose the war in Iraq, 49% supported such action.

In follow-up interviews, some respondents said they believed Iran posed a more serious threat than Saddam Hussein's Iraq did.

"I really don't think Saddam had anything to do with terrorism, but Iran, I believe, does," said Edward Wtulich, of Goshen, N.Y. He was among the 1,555 adults who participated in this week's survey, which has a margin of sampling error of plus or minus 3 percentage points. "Iran has been a problem, I think, for years," Wtulich said, "and we've known about it."

Wtulich, a registered Democrat and retired manager for the New York City Housing Authority, said he supported taking a hard line with Iran despite the strain of the Iraq war on the U.S. military.

"It makes me scared," he said, "but we may not have a choice."

Experts said the public's views on Iran appeared to have hardened in part because of the more aggressive anti-Western posture of Iran President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad. Elected last year, he has riled the international community with remarks denying the Holocaust and with declarations that Iran will defy European and U.S. pressure and continue to pursue efforts to enrich uranium.

His comments have fostered an impression of him as "very reckless, a real rogue, as opposed to simply a populist," said political science professor John Mueller of Ohio State University, who is an authority on wartime public opinion.

Mueller said that Americans' rising support for confronting Iran was "impressive," especially considering their misgivings about the war in Iraq, and that their support suggested "concerns about the new president." But he added that poll respondents are often more inclined to voice support for military intervention when the question is framed broadly and the potential for casualties is unclear.

"You always get higher support for things like 'military action,' because that could just mean bombing, as opposed to sending troops or going to war," Mueller said.

Poll respondents expressed a strong preference for the United States working with allies to fight international law violations or global aggression.

Iran has insisted its nuclear program is solely for energy production. But the United States and other Western governments suspect Iran's program is aimed at developing weapons.

European nations that have negotiated with Iran over its program want the matter referred to the United Nations Security Council. Iran has indicated it might be open to a compromise in which Russia would provide enriched uranium to Iran, for use exclusively in energy reactors.

The American public's position on Iran appears to have hardened over the last year, a period marked by an increasing international focus on Iran's nuclear program. When a similar question was asked in a Times poll last January, 50% favored military action against Iran.

Regarding Iraq, the latest poll shows that although most Americans remain disenchanted with the war, opinions have stabilized, at least for now. The percentage saying they believe the situation in Iraq was not worth going to war over dipped slightly, to 53%, compared with 56% in a survey a year earlier.

When asked who was winning the war in Iraq, 33% said the United States, 7% said the insurgents, and 55% said neither side was winning.

Americans remain divided over how long U.S. forces should stay in Iraq: 40% believe the United States should remain in Iraq for "as long as it takes," 36% want U.S. troops withdrawn within a year, and 14% support immediate withdrawal.

Respondents were also divided, largely along party lines, over whether the Iraq war is really part of Washington's war on terrorism; 51% say it is, 46% say it is not. President Bush has repeatedly cast Iraq as the central front in the war on terrorism. But many of his administration's prewar claims about Iraq's ties to Al Qaeda have turned out to have been overstated or based on unreliable intelligence sources.

The poll also found that 32% of Americans believed that terrorism around the world had increased because of the Iraq situation, 17% believed it had decreased, and 47% believed the problem was about the same.

U.N. Official Hopeful For Iran Nuke Plan (AP)

By Edith M. Lederer

The Associated Press, January 27, 2006

DAVOS, Switzerland — U.N. nuclear chief Mohamed ElBaradei said Thursday he was hopeful that a Russian proposal could help break the standoff over Iran's nuclear research and enrichment plans.

Speaking at the World Economic Forum's annual meeting, ElBaradei said he was happy that earlier in the day Iran's top nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani, said Russia's proposal to move Iran's enrichment program to Russian territory was "a positive one."

ElBaradei said he also was encouraged that all parties still were discussing a diplomatic solution. His comments came amid quickening diplomatic negotiations ahead of a crucial Feb. 2 meeting of his International Atomic Energy Agency, which could refer the issue to the Security Council.

Britain, France and Germany have been leading efforts to get Iran to abandon uranium conversion and enrichment activities, which it refuses to do. The three countries declared that negotiations had reached a dead end two days after Iran broke U.N. seals at a uranium enrichment plant Jan. 10 and said it was resuming nuclear research after a two-year freeze.

"We need Iran to use maximum transparency because there are a lot of question marks about its program," ElBaradei said. "They need to be assured that they can use nuclear power for electricity, but the international community needs to be assured that the Iran program is exclusively for peaceful purposes."

Pakistan President Gen. Pervez Musharraf said at the forum Thursday that Iran should not be allowed develop nuclear weapons, but he did not say if the country should face economic sanctions.

"Their security is not threatened," Musharraf said of Iran during a discussion on Islam. He said his own country had nuclear weapons because it maintained a balance of power with neighboring India.

"When a nuclear threat was posed to us we had to set the balance right again," he said. "Every country has a right to defend its security if its security is threatened."

As for Iran developing nuclear weapons, he said that if the country felt its security was threatened, "they would have the right to go nuclear."

The European Union on Thursday urged Iran to accept the Russian offer as a way to defuse the standoff with the international community.

"The Russians have made a very reasonable suggestion," Austrian Chancellor Wolfgang Schuessel said at a joint press conference with French Prime Minister Dominique de Villepin.

DOJ_NMG_0012749

Because of concerns about Iran's nuclear intentions, ElBaradei said Thursday, "Iran probably needs to go through a rehabilitation period by which it will accept that it will not engage in enrichment on Iran territory while at the same time make sure that they get what they need for their own peaceful purpose."

"And that's why the Russian proposal is a very attractive proposal," he said.

At the moment, many people are trying to use "the maximum of diplomacy," he said.

The question being debated right now is whether to go to the Security Council at the beginning or end of February or this month, he said.

But even the Europeans and Americans, who want Iran referred to the council now, want the Security Council "to do a new phase of diplomacy," he said.

"Everybody's still talking about diplomacy and I'm very hopeful that as long as we talk about diplomacy, as long as we're not talking about enforcement measures, sanctions, et cetera, we are on the right track. But we need to accelerate the process," ElBaradei said.

Iran alleged Thursday it had information that the United States, Britain and Israel had a role in two deadly military plane crashes in the last two months.

It was the latest accusation by Tehran against the West in their sharpening confrontation. A day earlier, Iran blamed the United States and Britain for two bombings this week that killed at least nine people in southwestern Iran.

Interior Minister Mostafa Pourmohammadi said the crashes of a C-130 and a Falcon plane were "done by their design, or maybe electronic interference."

Pourmohammadi did not elaborate and did not offer any evidence.

Not Exactly 20/20 (WP)

By Al Kamen

The Washington Post, January 27, 2006

"We've taken our lumps over the last year," he began, according to his House Web site. "Morale is low within our Conference and among our strongest supporters," he said. "It's time to bounce back," Boehner exhorted them, saying, "We need to identify a vision."

"That vision doesn't have to be achievable in the foreseeable future," he explained. But if it's "powerful enough and the commitment to it great enough, it might even come true."

For example, Boehner says, " President Reagan left the White House with America much as he hoped it would be in that first inaugural address. The Nazis were defeated. And in August 1989, Poland became free."

Boehner's eloquent appeal echoes Bluto Blutarski 's historic 1978 speech rallying his disconsolate frat brothers in "Animal House." John Belushi , playing the legendary Blutarski, urged the Deltas to stand up against rich preppie tyranny:

"Over? Did you say 'over'?" Belushi shouts. "Nothing is over until we decide it is! Was it over when the Germans bombed Pearl Harbor? Hell, no!"U.S., Iran Not Poles Apart

Administration officials scrambled yesterday to come to grips with the radical Hamas's stunning election victory in Palestinian elections. President Bush rejected dealing with a party that has an armed wing and vows the destruction of Israel.

But there's precedent for a more optimistic view in the long run. Take, for example, U.S. relations with Iran's President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad . He advocates nuking Israel and is allegedly developing his own bombs.

Even so, Washington has discovered there are always ways to work together, to find common ground. For example, human rights groups Monday condemned a U.S. move "back[ing] an Iranian initiative to deny United Nations consultative status" in the Economic and Social Council to gay rights organizations.

Well, gotta start somewhere.Afta NAFTA

News yesterday was that Washington and Seoul were on the verge of closing a free trade agreement and, if they could do so, the South Korean trade minister would come here Sunday to make plans for an official ceremony Thursday. If it happened, we were told, it would be the biggest free trade deal since NAFTA.

But why the "ifs"? We thought this was all locked up. After all, a noon announcement on Wednesday from Brown Lloyd James, the Korean PR folks in New York, said, "U.S.-Korea Free Trade Agreement Reached."

Four hours later, a "correction statement" came by: "The information sent regarding the . . . agreement was written in preparation and sent in error. It was NOT authorized by the Korean Embassy, and any discussion at this stage about the U.S.-Korea Free Trade Agreement is premature."

We really mean it, they said in a follow-up "correction statement" about an hour later. "The information . . . was not correct."

DOJ_NMG_0012750

Fugghedaboudit. Don't even think about it. Not only is "discussion unwarranted," the new release said, but "any speculation . . . is premature."Warrantless Redactors

Government censors are deeply worried about ensuring that they black out "sensitive" information from official documents. This is information that could harm national security or, much worse, could embarrass administration officials by showing preposterous stupidity or mis-, mal- and nonfeasance.

Not to worry. The National Security Agency has put out the equivalent of a "Dummies Guide to Censorship" to make sure voters never find out your boss's misdeeds. It's "Redacting with Confidence: How to Safely Publish Sanitized Reports Converted from Word to PDF."

NSA warns that you've got to be careful about scrubbing data that might be hidden. For example, hidden data in the White House's "Strategy for Victory in Iraq" in December showed it was written by a Duke political science professor who had concluded that people would support the war, despite fairly heavy casualties, as long as they believe it will ultimately succeed.

The NSA report, according to Government Computer News, gives step-by-step instructions to make sure the public never sees such highly classified information.

Mexico Nixes Border Maps For Migrants (WT)

Mexico canceled plans yesterday to distribute 70,000 border maps with safety instructions and tips to migrants aiming to cross illegally into the United States, but denied that the decision was a reaction to criticism by Bush-administration officials.

The National Human Rights Commission (NHRC) in Mexico City said it "rethought" the decision after human rights organizations in several border states said the maps would show anti-immigration groups -- and watchdogs such as the Minutemen volunteers -- where the migrants were likely to travel.

The NHRC maps would have provided details to migrants about the terrain, cell-phone coverage and the location of water stations set up by the U.S. charity Humane Borders.

"This would be practically like telling the Minutemen where the migrants are going to be," said NHRC spokesman Miguel Angel Paredes. "We are going to rethink this, so that we wouldn't almost be handing them over to groups that attack migrants."

Much of the Mexican media have accused the Minutemen of attacking illegal aliens on the border, accusations that have not been substantiated and have been denied by Minutemen organizers. The Mexican government has described the volunteers as vigilantes, as has President Bush.

Mr. Paredes said the commission's decision was not a response to U.S. pressure, adding, "We have not taken that into account."

On Wednesday, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said the department opposed "in the strongest terms" the publications of maps "to aid those who wish to enter the United States illegally. ... It is a bad idea to encourage migrants to undertake this highly dangerous and ultimately futile effort."

State Department spokesman Sean McCormack also said the United States would "take whatever steps it deems necessary to protect its own borders."

The NHRC had planned to distribute 70,000 maps beginning in March, mostly in border towns and villages, as well as bars and restaurants frequented by migrants. The commission said they were intended to save lives by noting the estimated time it would take to walk or drive to nearby cities, places where migrants have died in the past and the location of water stations and emergency beacons.

Hundreds of migrants, mostly Mexican nationals, die every year trying to cross the desert illegally into the United States, mostly through Arizona.

The NHRC cited the Minutemen as a sign that anti-immigrant extremism was on the rise in the United States. The civilian Minutemen group set up observation posts in Arizona in April and from California to Texas in October to report illegal aliens to the U.S. Border Patrol.

Minuteman co-founder Chris Simcox said the NHRC's decision demonstrated the effectiveness of the "peaceful, law-abiding actions by Minuteman volunteers" to secure the nation's borders.

"The Mexican government ought to be ashamed that their policies drive their citizens to risk death in the Arizona desert trying to escape their country," he said. "Rather than giving away maps to help their citizens flee, the government of Mexico should dedicate itself to making Mexico a country their citizens can be proud of and want to live in."

Mr. Simcox denied accusations that Minutemen had attacked anyone, instead pointing to life-saving rescues by the group of nearly 200 aliens abandoned in the desert by human traffickers.

DOJ_NMG_0012751

"The maps the Mexican government released will still be used by the Minutemen to determine where we set up our observation posts along the southern U.S. border," he said. "Those maps are not just aids for illegal aliens simply seeking to escape Mexico; they are also road maps for terrorists who seek to enter the United States to murder Americans."

The NHRC was created 17 years ago by the Mexican Interior Ministry as the General Human Rights Department. The name was changed a year later and in 1999, the NHRC became fully independent of the government.

Piracy Fight Strains U.S.-China Ties (WSJ)

By Murray Hiebert

The Wall Street Journal, January 27, 2006

BEIJING, China -- China and the U.S. traded barbs over Beijing's failure to respond to Washington's request for details about Chinese efforts to combat piracy, in a development that could exacerbate already testy bilateral trade relations.

U.S. trade officials said China missed a Jan. 23 deadline set by Washington to get information on how Beijing has sought to rein in rampant piracy, including any penalties it has imposed on violators. Chinese authorities, for their part, have challenged Washington's right to make such a request under World Trade Organization rules.

The tiff could prompt the U.S. Congress to press the administration of President George W. Bush to take its case against China to the global trade body, and it cast a cloud over the planned visit to America by Chinese President Hu Jintao in April, U.S. businessmen in Beijing said.

"It is critical for China to prepare a meaningful response to avoid creating unnecessary tension" with the U.S., said James Zimmerman, vice chairman of the American Chamber of Commerce in Beijing.

China's alleged failure to crack down on widespread counterfeiting and violations of intellectual-property rights by its companies are major irritants in Sino-U.S. trade relations. U.S. industry associations say such practices cost foreign software and movie companies and other copyright holders billions of dollars each year.

The U.S. Trade Representative's Office had requested details about China's crackdown efforts in the autumn under pressure from Congress that it get Beijing to toughen up on its enforcement of what is called IPR. Under WTO rules, a member may ask other members about their IPR policies if the requesting country has reason to believe that the others' policies are affecting its rights under the global body's IPR regulations.

On Tuesday, U.S. officials said in Washington that China responded by challenging Washington's right under WTO rules to demand this information from Beijing. In a Dec. 22 letter from the Chinese ambassador to the WTO that American officials made public, China said it was still willing to cooperate with the U.S. on its WTO commitments. When Beijing joined the WTO in December 2001, it committed to try to stamp out IPR violations.

Reuters quoted one U.S. official as saying that if Washington doesn't get "a substantive response [from China] in short order," it was "running out of options, short of WTO litigation."

Chinese Commerce Ministry officials Thursday declined to comment on the dispute. Mei Xinyu, a researcher at the Academy of International Trade and Economic Cooperation, a ministry think tank, said WTO regulations "only allow a member country to request such information, but there is no legal obligation on other countries [to answer], not to mention [to respond by] a deadline."

Courts in China have recently made several high-profile rulings against IPR violators. Last month, a judge in Shanghai ruled against a Chinese company that had adopted the Chinese name of U.S. coffee chain Starbucks and a similar logo. This month, another court ruled against a Chinese company selling candies resembling Ferrero Rocher's gold foil-wrapped chocolates.

Still, Chinese authorities admit they have a long way to go in winning the war against piracy. Pirated DVDs as well as luxury-brand clothing and accessories are widely on sale from street vendors and in shopping centers in Beijing.

Chinese officials say one problem is that many state agencies are responsible for overseeing intellectual-property laws, complicating enforcement efforts. In addition, local governments often resist efforts to shut factories making counterfeit goods in their jurisdiction because of the jobs those generate.

Reuters, January 27, 2006

President George W. Bush vowed on Thursday to uphold U.S. law and continue a crackdown on North Korea for counterfeiting American dollar bills.

"There is no compromise ... We are going to uphold the law and protect the currency of the American people," he told a White House news conference.

DOJ_NMG_0012752

The United States in recent months has cracked down on several firms and a Macau-based bank suspected of involvement in counterfeiting, money laundering and drug trafficking by North Korea.

Pyongyang is believed to earn as much as $1 billion annually from these activities, which U.S. officials say benefit the elite at the expense of an impoverished population.

The communist state has said it would be unthinkable to return to six-country nuclear talks, led by China and stalled since November, when Washington is trying to bring down its rulers with "financial sanctions."

While Bush showed no give on the crackdown on the North's suspected illicit activities, he reaffirmed that "we want the six party talks to continue ... I think the framework is a framework that can eventually yield to a political settlement of the issue."

Rice Says US Ready To Resume Six-party Talks (REU)

By Sue Pleming

Reuters, January 27, 2006

In an interview with Reuters, Rice said North Korea must address U.S. concerns over illicit financial dealings and that this issue must not be tied to the resumption of talks, which have been stalled since last November.

North Korea has said it would be unthinkable to return to talks aimed at getting Pyongyang to drop its nuclear programs while Washington imposed what amounted to "financial sanctions."

Asked if there was a way to resolve this impasse, Rice said the North Koreans should start "living up to the law."

The suspected illegal activities by the North Koreans, including the counterfeiting of American $100 bills, had to be addressed by the United States, she said. "He (SEARCH

In a news conference on Thursday, Bush vowed to continue a crackdown on North Korea for counterfeiting American currency. "There is no compromise," he said.

The United States has in recent months acted against several firms and a Macau-based bank suspected of involvement in counterfeiting, money laundering and drug trafficking by North Korea.

Pyongyang is believed to earn as much as $1 billion a year from these activities, which U.S. officials say benefit the elite at the expense of North Korea's poor.

CLEAR TALK

Rice said the United States chief negotiator in the talks had made it very clear during meetings in Beijing this month that Washington wanted the six-party talks to continue.

"No conditions. We will do it immediately," Rice said.

Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill returned from Beijing last week where he met his North Korean counterpart and Chinese officials in an effort to restart stalled talks. The six-party talks also involve Japan, SEARCH

"These talks can get back on track but the North Koreans have got to make a choice that they are ready to come back and they have to come back unconditionally," Rice added.

Hill told Reuters in an interview on Wednesday that North Korea had hinted it might observe international standards on money laundering but he declined to provide any details.

North Korea agreed in principle in September to end its nuclear arms in exchange for aid and security guarantees, but there has been no progress since then. A date has not been set for the resumption of the discussions.

Rice said the goal was to get back to the statement of principles agreed in September as soon possible.

Kim Sung-han, head of North America studies at the Institute of Foreign Affairs and National Security in Seoul, said some policymakers in Seoul would see Rice's comments as meaning a compromise solution was not in the cards now.

"It is going to be somewhat hard to expect the six-party talks will resume early next month, as some had hoped for," Kim said by telephone.

Asked whether she thought increased Chinese and Japanese assistance to North Korea during the U.S. crackdown was interfering with the bid to get Pyongyang back to talks, Rice said both of these countries had been very professional in their handling of North Korea.

"They have been successful in getting the North Koreans to engage in the talks," she said.

Tobacco Firms Trace Fakes To North Korea (WSJ)

By Gordon Fairclough

The Wall Street Journal, January 27, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0012753

In Philip Morris USA's ongoing war against counterfeiters, it was a fairly simple operation: Buy a pack of Marlboros from a corner bodega on Manhattan's Upper East Side to follow up on a tip about contraband cigarettes.

But it took until 2005, the year after the pack was purchased, company officials say, before they could trace the artfully counterfeited smokes to one of the world's most isolated countries, North Korea.

The communist nation has become a leading source of counterfeit cigarettes -- with the capacity to churn out more than two billion packs a year, tobacco companies say. Philip Morris, a unit of New York-based Altria Group Inc., says over the past several years it has discovered North Korean-made knockoffs of its Marlboro brand in more than 1,300 places, from New York to Oklahoma City, Seattle and Los Angeles.

Big cigarette companies, facing billions of dollars in lost revenue, have hired former intelligence and law-enforcement officials, recruited informants inside Asian crime syndicates and even sent agents into North Korea in an effort to stem what they say is a flood of illicit exports.

Andre Reiman, a senior vice president of Philip Morris International whose oversees antismuggling programs, said his company is "very concerned to find organized counterfeiting of our products in the Democratic People's Republic of Korea."

The scale of the distribution network -- believed to include fleets of ships owned by global organized-crime groups -- has the U.S. government taking a more active role after years of industry pleas to crack down on counterfeit cigarettes.

U.S. authorities seized more than a billion fake smokes, many allegedly from North Korea, in California last year as part of an undercover operation targeting Asian smugglers. Millions more packs of bogus Marlboros, Mild Sevens and other cigarettes made in North Korea have been confiscated in Taiwan, the Philippines, Vietnam and Belize.

In a little-publicized 2004 case, three Asian men pleaded guilty to conspiring to smuggle counterfeit goods and currency, in connection with a scheme to send fake cigarettes, forged $100 bills and knockoff Cialis, an erectile-dysfunction drug made by Lilly ICOS LLC, into the U.S. The cigarettes, a U.S. official says, were made in North Korea.

The case started when an undercover investigator working for Philip Morris posed as a buyer looking for counterfeit cigarettes, according to papers filed by the government in federal court in Washington last year. The men took the investigator to a cigarette-making plant on the east coast of North Korea. They also offered to sell the investigator forged U.S. currency, prompting Philip Morris to alert the U.S. Secret Service. In all, the men accepted payments of more than $400,000 for counterfeit cigarettes and currency, prosecutors say.

Supplying counterfeit cigarettes has cemented North Korea's ties to crime organizations, giving the country access to a vast smuggling network that could allow it to move almost anything -- from forged U.S. banknotes to weapons -- in or out of the country, U.S. officials say.

"Much more dangerous things than cigarettes can flow along these same routes," warns a senior Bush administration official. "The North Koreans could import technology and export strategic goods and weapons. It's a big deal."

North Korea has long been accused of counterfeiting U.S. currency. In a press conference yesterday, President Bush said the U.S. was moving aggressively to halt Pyongyang's forgers. "When somebody's counterfeiting our money, we want to stop them from doing that," Mr. Bush said.

Washington's efforts, however, have drawn criticism from other capitals, which worry that U.S. moves will keep North Korea from rejoining multilateral talks aimed at ending its nuclear-weapons programs.

North Korea denies it engages in counterfeiting or other illicit acts. Its official news agency said last month that "such illegal activities are unimaginable in the DPRK."

In a report prepared by a consortium of tobacco companies that includes Altria, Japan Tobacco Inc. and

British American Tobacco

PLC, and presented to U.S. authorities last year, investigators said that the North Korean regime could be earning $80 million to $160 million in annual payoffs from smugglers alone.

Those estimates are equal to roughly 8% to 16% of the total value of annual exports of legitimate goods from North Korea, whose economy collapsed after the fall of the Soviet Union. Profits from suspected state-run counterfeiting operations would likely push that number even higher, say tobacco-company executives.

"Counterfeit cigarettes are probably becoming one of their biggest sources of illicit income," says Raphael Perl, an expert on North Korean finances at the Congressional Research Service.

Two developments have helped North Korea establish itself in the fake-smokes business. First, major cigarette manufacturers, sued by the European Union and others for allegedly supplying smugglers with cigarettes in an effort to circumvent taxes, have moved to keep their products out of criminals' hands.

Second, China has moved aggressively to clamp down on cigarette counterfeiting. Rather than engage in a high-stakes game of cat-and-mouse with the Chinese authorities, makers of high-end counterfeits have instead sought refuge in North Korea.

"North Korea is the perfect place," says one tobacco executive. "There's very little scrutiny from outside, and there's no risk of law-enforcement action because it's all sanctioned by the state."

One of the main hubs of counterfeiting activity, the tobacco companies say, is Rajin, a run-down port city on North Korea's east coast. More than a decade ago, Pyongyang decided to turn the area into a free-trade zone as part of a United Nations-backed effort to spur economic development in the impoverished communist country and its neighbors.

Many of the cigarette factories in Rajin, which use tobacco from China and Vietnam, are owned or financed by Taiwanese and Chinese criminal groups, which smuggle the cigarettes they produce into countries around Asia as well as into the U.S. and Europe, say tobacco executives.

North Korean state-owned enterprises, mostly located in or near Pyongyang, the country's capital, also make knockoff cigarettes, the tobacco companies say. The companies say one of these factories is controlled by the internal security service; another is owned by a group with close links to the Communist Party leadership.

Some of the smuggling organizations that move the North Korean cigarettes use their own fleets of freighters, tankers and fishing vessels, tobacco-company executives say. Cargos are often shifted to other vessels at sea, in international waters, to mask their origin. In other cases, cigarettes move via a series of small ports.

The look of the counterfeits and their packages is also very good, say tobacco executives. Packs of Marlboro seized in Miami even included forged pamphlets urging smokers to visit a Web site to find information about the health dangers of cigarettes and the admonition "Don't Litter" on the side of the box.

Executives say packaging is the key to determining which cigarettes are fakes and where they come from. They compare suspect cigarettes to examples from prior raids that have been conclusively tied to a particular source. For example, counterfeiters often don't change the tracking numbers on counterfeit packages. Sometimes, printing flaws give them away.

India Has Hard Choices On US Nuclear Deal: Rice (REU-Y2)

Reuters, January 27, 2006

India has "difficult choices" to make on a controversial civil nuclear cooperation agreement with the United States before the deal can be completed, U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said on Thursday.

The landmark accord, agreed in principle in July but still to be negotiated in detail, would grant New Delhi access to civil nuclear technology it has been denied for three decades, provided it puts its civilian facilities under international inspections.

Senior-level talks in New Delhi last week failed to close the gap on major issues, including which Indian facilities would be designated as civilian and military. The military plants would still be off-limits to U.N. monitors.

"In order to move on to a new phase in which civil nuclear power would be available to India, India has to make some difficult choices," Rice told Reuters in an interview.

She refused to provide any details but insisted, "I think we're making progress."

Although announced with great fanfare, the deal has run into criticism from nuclear experts and some members of the U.S. Congress who say it undermines global nonproliferation goals.

A related issue is whether India will side with the United States when the International Atomic Energy Agency board of governors debates Iran's nuclear program at a February 2 meeting.

Washington and major European powers say Iran is developing a bomb and wants the case referred to the U.N. Security Council for possible sanctions. Tehran denies the charge and is fighting referral.

The U.S. ambassador to India said on Wednesday if India did not back the U.S. position, the nuclear agreement could be in trouble.

Rice did not speak directly of the Iran vote in the IAEA.

She said the nuclear agreement presented "a difficult set of issues."

"But it's very important to understand that in order to satisfy the concerns of the American Congress and our laws and the concerns of the (44-nation) Nuclear Suppliers Group, that there will have to be some steps taken to make sure that the proliferation risks are not enhanced by this deal," she said.

Both the U.S. Congress and the Nuclear Suppliers Group, which sets rules for nuclear-related commerce, must approve the agreement.

For 30 years, the United States led the effort to deny India nuclear technology because it tested and developed nuclear weapons in contravention of international norms. Both India and its neighbor and nuclear-armed rival Pakistan have refused to sign the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty.

Bush now views India, a rising democratic and economic power on China's border, as an evolving U.S. ally and the new nuclear deal -- allowing India to purchase nuclear reactors and fuel -- is central to that vision.

Restructuring Of U.N. Agency 'Likely' This Year (WT)

By David R. Sands

The Washington Times, January 27, 2006

A major overhaul of the United Nations' discredited human rights agency is "quite likely" this year, the State Department's lead negotiator said yesterday, but he also said the United States would insist on real reforms before agreeing to a deal.

The United States backs a plan to scrap the current 53-member U.N. Human Rights Commission, which critics say has been co-opted by some of the world's worst human rights abusers, including Sudan, Zimbabwe and China.

"I think it is quite likely we can get a new human rights council, although it is not certain," Mark Lagon, deputy assistant secretary of state for international organization affairs, said at a Washington roundtable on U.N. reform.

U.N. officials have pushed for the overhaul to be completed before the old human rights panel's scheduled March meeting in Geneva, but Mr. Lagon said it was more important to do things right than to do them quickly.

"The U.S. is not hung up on artificial deadlines," he said. "We feel it is important that any replacement body must be definitely better."

The debate over the human rights agency has become a flash point in the larger debate over reforming the world body itself, which has been rocked by scandals such as the Iraq oil-for-food program.

Critics say the current commission essentially has been taken over by the worst abusers, with countries such as China and Sudan seeking seats on the panel specifically to block scrutiny of their human rights records.

The United States and other leading democracies want to end the automatic rotation of members on the commission, setting up a leaner Human Rights Council that blackballs countries with poor records and has real powers to investigate and spotlight abuses.

At a summit of world leaders in New York in September, U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan endorsed the reform effort and called for a doubling of the budget of the office of the U.N. High Commissioner for Human Rights.

A small group of states -- including Zimbabwe, Belarus and Cuba -- has opposed the more-stringent membership idea. Negotiations on the shape of the new council began Jan. 11, and some private human rights activists say the U.S. government has been slow to press its case.

Mr. Lagon said the United States wants the bulk of the new council's workload to be helping fledgling democratic states move toward greater political freedom, civil liberties and the rule of law.

The emphasis, he said, "should be on operations in the field. We don't want to have just another think tank in Geneva."

With its new credibility, it "can then speak more effectively in the face of horrendous violations," he said.

Mr. Lagon said the new council should not mean the end of special expert missions approved by the current commission. U.N. "rapporteurs" have won praise from human rights groups in recent months with missions critical of abuses in countries such as Belarus, Iran and Uzbekistan.

Bhutto Dismisses Interpol Notices (WT)

By Xin Li

The Washington Times, January 27, 2006

Former Pakistani Prime Minister Benazir Bhutto said yesterday that "red notices" issued by Interpol for her and her husband, Asif Ali Zardari, are groundless and politically motivated.

"I can catch the next airplane and return to Pakistan if necessary," Mrs. Bhutto said at a press conference organized by the Voice of America in Washington. "Interpol might not be given the right information."

The notices are not arrest warrants, Interpol officials told Agence France-Presse yesterday. They are notifications that "bona fide" arrest warrants exist in one of the International Criminal Police Organization's 184 member states. The decision to act upon them is up to member countries, they said.

Akram Shaheedi, a spokesman for the Pakistani Embassy in Washington, said Islamabad has not asked the State Department for any action regarding the notices.

Mrs. Bhutto said her attorney is contacting Interpol to confirm the warrants, and if they exist, to ask on what grounds they were issued.

Mrs. Bhutto was elected as the prime minister of Pakistan in 1988 and 1993. She and her husband are charged with corruption during her regime, including one case in Switzerland in which she is accused of taking commissions from a Swiss firm. She is under self-imposed exile and lives in Britain and Dubai in the United Arab Emirates.

"For nine years, I've been under state-sponsored prosecution, but there hasn't been a single conviction" on the corruption charges, Mrs. Bhutto said.

DOJ_NMG_0012756

She was convicted in one case and sentenced to three years in absentia, but Mrs. Bhutto said she is appealing that ruling.

The reason for the Interpol notices, Mrs. Bhutto said, was that the government of President Pervez Musharraf wants to "divert the attention" of the Pakistani people from the recent U.S. missile strike in a region bordering Afghanistan that killed at least 13 civilians.

The raid, which is thought to have killed some al Qaeda terror leaders, triggered protests from Islamist political parties.

Mrs. Bhutto said the Musharraf government cooperates with the United States only because the "military needs the war of terror in Pakistan to justify its position in the office."

She said it is in the interest of the international community to build a pluralistic, democratic and secular Pakistan.

Meanwhile, it was announced yesterday that former Pakistani Prime Minister Nawaz Sharif was to end five years of exile in Saudi Arabia by traveling to Britain on Sunday.

Pakistani Information Minister Shaikh Rashid Ahmad announced in November that Mr. Sharif would be issued a passport so he can travel to London with his sick son.

Mr. Sharif was ousted by Gen. Musharraf in a bloodless coup in October 1999. Mr. Sharif was sentenced to life in prison on tax evasion and treason charges. Pakistani officials say he will not be allowed to return home.

Canada's Next Leader Clashes With U.S. Over Arctic Waterways (NYT)

By Clifford Krauss

The New York Times, January 27, 2006

TORONTO, Jan. 26 — Stephen Harper, Canada's prime minister-designate, reproached the American ambassador on Thursday over an old difference of opinion about the control of Arctic waters claimed by Canada.

Mr. Harper, the leader of the Conservative Party, which won a narrow victory in Monday's elections, is widely expected to usher in warmer relations with the Bush administration after years of squabbles between Canada and the United States over trade and the war in Iraq.

But the honeymoon took at least a temporary break when Mr. Harper reacted to a news report about comments made by the United States ambassador, David H. Wilkins, taking issue with Canada's assertion of sovereignty in northern Arctic water passages.

"It is the Canadian people we get our mandate from, not the ambassador of the United States," Mr. Harper said. "The United States defends its sovereignty, and the Canadian government will defend our sovereignty."

The United States for decades has opposed Canada's claims to Arctic passageways near the North Pole, as have the European Union and other countries. Canadian military scholars say that the United States, Russia, Britain and France sent submarines under the Arctic ice in waters claimed by Canada during the cold war without Canada's permission, and may still be doing so.

Canada does not currently have the naval ability to stop such intrusions into those areas, which it claims as internal waters, although it is now modernizing satellite surveillance and upgrading its Arctic land and water patrols.

"There's no reason to create a problem that doesn't exist," Mr. Wilkins was quoted as saying at a forum on American-Canadian relations on Wednesday at the University of Western Ontario, according to the CBC News Web site. "We don't recognize Canada's claims to those waters."

Mr. Wilkins seemed to be trying not to kindle a dispute, though. "We have agreed to disagree," he said.

But on Thursday, in his first news conference since the election, Mr. Harper took issue with Mr. Wilkins, perhaps in part to show Canadians that he would not veer far from Canada's traditional foreign policy of pointed independence from the United States.

American diplomats said that Mr. Wilkins had stated nothing more than an old policy in answering a student's question. They said he did not criticize a plan Mr. Harper announced during the campaign to build and deploy three new armed heavy icebreaking ships and construct a deep-water port in the Arctic territorial capital, Iqaluit.

Differences between Canada and the United States over the Arctic have rarely surfaced in a public dispute, and leaders of both countries have preferred to cooperate on Arctic research and defense.

But recently, the Arctic has become increasingly important because of climate change. With Arctic ice rapidly thinning, commercial navigation and tourism boats are making northern passages with increasing frequency. That has obliged Canada to begin planning security measures to protect waterways from smugglers and to prepare for the possibility of accidents and oil spills.

The United States and Canada also have conflicting claims in the Beaufort Sea, in an area that is thought to have oil and natural gas reserves. Denmark and Canada have conflicting claims over another site, Hans Island, off Greenland's coast, in an area with a rich fishery.

Harper Tells U.S. To Drop Arctic Claim (WP)

By Doug Struck

The Washington Post, January 27, 2006

TORONTO, Jan. 26 -- Stephen Harper, elected Monday as prime minister, warned the United States on Thursday to back off from its challenge of Canadian sovereignty in Arctic waters that are fast thawing from global warming.

In the first news conference since his election, Harper upbraided the U.S. ambassador for asserting that the icy polar regions, including the legendary Northwest Passage, are international waters.

Canada claims that its archipelago of some 16,000 islands makes that region Canadian territory.

"The United States defends its sovereignty. The Canadian government will defend our sovereignty," Harper said. "It's the Canadian people we get our mandate from, not the ambassador of the United States."

The two countries -- as well as Russia -- have had conflicting claims in the Arctic for at least three decades. Harper's Conservative Party has proposed expanding Canada's military presence, building new icebreakers and creating an early warning system to detect other ships, all to enforce its claim of sovereignty.

The Liberal government Harper will replace has made similar claims and proposals. But it was unexpected that Harper would launch a sharp verbal attack against the United States on this subject so quickly, and he extended a press conference announcing his Feb. 6 inauguration to bring it up.

"The changing ice conditions are driving this issue to the top of the political agenda," said Michael Byers, an international law expert at the University of British Columbia.

"We've essentially been able to avoid problems over this in the past because the ice has been too thick and too hard to make it a commercially viable route," Byers said. "But, of course, the ice is melting."

He said that "within the next decade or two, there will be a major international shipping route around the northern side of North America." That will shorten the route for Europe-Asia shippers by 4,000 miles, Byers said, adding that it also presents security concerns as a "backdoor to North America that is wide open."

David Wilkins, the U.S. ambassador to Canada, was quoted Wednesday at a discussion in Ontario as saying, "We don't recognize Canada's claims to those waters."

Firms Beat Path To ... Libya (CSM)

By Simon Martelli

The Christian Science Monitor, January 27, 2006

TRIPOLI, LIBYA - It's not unusual for the five-star Corinthia Bab Africa Hotel which towers above this city's waterfront to be completely booked, many of its 299 rooms filled with foreign oil tycoons eager to tap into the country's untold reserves.

After more than 20 years as a global pariah, Libya is coming out of isolation. Most international sanctions have been lifted since its enigmatic leader, Col. Muammar Qaddafi, abandoned his weapons program, renounced terrorism, and accepted responsibility for the 1988 bombing of Pan Am Flight 103, compensating the victims' families.

"With the end of the Lockerbie issue, relations returned to normal and there were many delegations of Congress who visited Libya. I think all efforts are heading towards ending animosity," Colonel Qaddafi said in an interview with the United States-funded Arabic TV channel Al-Hurra last week.

Now, the companies that helped create Libya's oil industry in the 1970s are returning as Qaddafi rebuilds bridges to the West that he burned long ago, and this may help to precipitate political, as well as economic, change.

In a major step, ExxonMobil, the world's largest publicly traded oil company, signed an exploration and production deal with Libya last month. Marathon, Amerada Hess, and ConocoPhilips who together form the Oasis group also negotiated their return at the end of December since being forced out by sanctions in the mid-1980s, while Occidental returned in August last year. The Oasis group was producing 400,000 barrels of oil per day before it pulled out.

Indeed, the country suffered severely from the economic sanctions that were imposed by the US in 1986 after Libya was blamed for the bombing of a Berlin disco that killed two American servicemen. The consequence included a sharp decline in oil production, which fell to around 1.4 million barrels per day in the 1990s, from peak production of 3.3 million barrels per day in 1979. Output at the country's dilapidated liquefied natural gas plant, built by ExxonMobil in the late 1960s, has fallen to just 15 percent of capacity. Unemployment rose to about 30 percent.

In Tripoli's commercial center, a short walk from the shiny new Corinthia Hotel, which houses existing foreign oil firms, signs on the office doors clearly directed at locals in search of work state in both English and Arabic that there are no vacancies.

While Libya remains on the US State Department's list of states that support terrorism, and certain limited sanctions have yet to be lifted, it is pursuing a return to full normal relations with the US. Tarek Hassan-Beck of Libya's National Oil Company

(NOC) told Reuters Wednesday that he expected the newly returned Oasis group "to put the right message across to the US government" to remove Libya from the hit list. Qaddafi has made this possible by publicly condemning 9/11 and agreeing to a three-phase disarmament program, as well as paying compensation to the families of the 270 victims killed on Pan Am Flight 103 over Lockerbie, Scotland.

But Qaddafi remains an autocratic leader, and genuine economic and political reform is nowhere on the horizon, according to many Libyans. "Whatever he says, the people must do it without question," says Ibrahim, a young Libyan who runs a small tour group in Tripoli.

Meanwhile, endemic corruption and high unemployment persist, and the lack of real economic incentives is driving skilled professionals out of the country, says Ezzedin Dibashi, an oil consultant based in London who used to work at NOC. "Doctors, engineers, and economists are going elsewhere, rather than subsist on 600 Libyan dinars ($450) per month."

Other issues seriously obstructing Libya's political and economic development include the state ownership of banks, a government controlled media and the ban on political opposition parties.

"This is a country that has responded to international criticism," says the Chairman of business consultancy group MEC International and former British Ambassador to Libya Oliver Miles. "But how and how far is where it gets difficult."

With oil prices on the rise, none of these difficulties are deterring foreign oil companies from aggressively competing to win exploration rights and investment opportunities in Libya.

"It has become a very attractive place for oil firms to do business," says Mr. Miles. "There are opportunities in Libya that do not exist in other Middle Eastern countries."

One encouraging sign of change recently was the agreement by British ministers in October to send terror suspects back to Libya on the condition of 'no torture, no death penalty.'

But foreign energy companies are not the only ones enjoying newfound access to Libya. Nongovernmental organizations like Amnesty International, which was allowed access for the first time in 15 years in 2004, have expressed serious reservations about the Qaddafi regime's human rights record. Torture and suspicious prison deaths, said an Amnesty International report, continue in Libya.

Despite Libya's recent prisoner releases, judicial reforms and efforts to overhaul its image, some NGOs are asking Western governments to proceed with human rights standards in mind.

"[Qaddafi] and his inner circle appear unwilling to implement genuine reform," says a Human Rights Watch report released this week, "especially in the areas of free expression and association, which might weaken their three-decade grip on power."

Georgia, Short Of Gas, Is Hit With A Blackout (NYT)

By C. J. Chivers

The New York Times, January 27, 2006

MOSCOW, Jan. 26 — Energy shortages struck Georgia anew on Thursday as a wind storm toppled a major power transmission line and Russia's gas monopoly failed to restore the flow of natural gas to the country after pipelines were sabotaged last weekend, energy officials said.

The latest problem appeared about 1 a.m., when high winds severed a high-voltage transmission line that carries electricity between east and west Georgia, plunging the snow-covered capital, Tbilisi, into darkness. The blackout occurred as temperatures in the normally balmy nation fell below 20 degrees, and most of the population remained without natural gas for heat. Weather forecasts predicted unusually cold weather into next week.

Georgia has been without its Russian gas, and with limited electricity, for five days. Officials in both countries initially hoped that the supplies could be swiftly restored. But after a respite from the shortages on Monday, the problems have worsened, bringing fresh hardships to Georgia and further tarnishing Russia's image as an energy supplier.

Mikheil Saakashvili, Georgia's president, cut short a visit to Davos, Switzerland, to return to Tbilisi as the crisis intensified. Nika Gelauri, Georgia's energy minister, said in a telephone interview that technicians were examining the damaged power wire and tower, but it was too soon to know how long repairs would take.

In Russia, where on Sunday saboteurs destroyed two gas pipelines that had provided Georgia with all of its gas, energy officials said work crews were laboring nonstop to repair the damaged sections of pipe.

Gazprom, Russia's gas monopoly, told Georgia that the work, behind schedule, could be completed by Friday night, Mr. Gelauri said. Russian officials had said that the pipe could be repaired by Tuesday, but the efforts have been hampered by delays. Georgian energy officials have said that even if gas flow were restored, it could take a week for the gas to be switched back on to all customers. Georgia has been receiving a supply of gas, roughly half its normal needs, in shipments through a recently repaired pipeline that connects the Georgian network to Azerbaijan.

DOJ_NMG_0012759

But Azerbaijan, which also relies on Russia for its gas, has not been receiving an increased flow from Russia to pass on to Georgia, said Aydylbek Amonov, a supervisor in the Azerbaijan gas network's control center. Russia says a struggling compressor station near the Azerbaijan border is unable to provide increased pressure.

Mr. Gelauri said he was suspicious of Russia's chain of problems: first sabotage, then repair delays, then a compressor problem. "If we had this additional gas from Gazprom through Azerbaijan it would solve all the problems," he said.

Georgian officials have said they do not believe Russian explanations for either the sabotage or the technical difficulties that have followed, and claim that Russia is withholding its energy during a cold spell to punish Georgia for its pro-Western policies. There has been no public evidence to support that claim, and Russia has characterized Georgia's position as irrational and immature.

EU's Hard Line Going Into Trade Talks Draws Fire (WSJ)

By Scott Miller In Brussels And Marc Champion In Davos, Switzerland

The Wall Street Journal, January 27, 2006

Major trading nations are hardening their positions as they head into the first round of trade talks since the recent Hong Kong sessions faltered, renewing the possibility of a watered-down result of four years of negotiations.

As top trade negotiators from about two dozen countries prepared to meet in Davos, Switzerland, on Friday, the European Union's trade commissioner, Peter Mandelson, said Europe stood to lose "next to nothing" if talks failed and repeated strongly that he would make no further offers unless other countries make concessions. Earlier this week, he told the European Parliament that Europe could settle for "a minimalist outcome, if that is what the rest of the world wants."

That position has been drawing fire from other countries who blame the EU for doing the most to cause the standstill. Brazil, refusing to make fresh concessions, has said it fears the EU is trying to wiggle out of the commitments it already made to lower farm tariffs. Indian Trade Minister Kamil Nath rejected the idea of lowering ambitions as Mr. Mandelson has suggested. "There is no common ambition, and I am not willing to lower my ambitions," he said in an interview in Davos. "Europe has decided the best defense is to go on the offensive, but they should be more substantive and try and correct structural flaws."

Trade negotiators are meeting to try to lay out a road map for what they hope will be the rough draft of a deal by the end of April, after their plan to achieve that in Hong Kong last month failed.

Many diplomats and trade experts say the current round of talks, known as the Doha Development Round, is fundamentally an all-or-nothing proposition that requires dramatic cuts in trade barriers in all sectors and regions to get done at all, because of the need to provide some victories for all the 149 countries involved in the negotiations.

U.S. Trade Representative Rob Portman said Thursday that he needs an ambitious round to sell a trade package to Congress. U.S. legislators, he said, won't approve a deal to cut politically important farm subsidies unless they can show their constituents that U.S. farmers will benefit from lower global farm tariffs and greater opportunities to sell industrial goods and services. "From a U.S. perspective, Doha light doesn't work," said Mr. Portman, talking to reporters in Davos. "We need enough reduction in tariffs to demonstrate that there will be new trade flows."

Still, the idea of rolling back Doha's aims is an attractive fallback position for those who fear a full collapse of the talks. That in turn could lead countries to forsake such long-running, world-wide trade negotiations for individual deals among smaller groups of countries.

"When the time comes in a few weeks, we might accept a lower-ambition agreement. If the choice is between failure and a lesser agreement, I'll take the lower ambition," said Rachid M. Rachid, Egypt's trade minister and head of the African group of countries at the WTO talks. A minimalist agreement would retain commitment and momentum, whereas failure could put trade liberalization efforts back five years, he said.

World Trade Organization Director-General Pascal Lamy has called the Doha talks, named after the city in Qatar where they started in 2002, just 60% complete, with little progress lately. Trade negotiators are nearly unanimous in their belief that the talks must end, one way or the other, by the end of this year, before a U.S. law runs out that prevents Congress from essentially renegotiating the agreement point by point.

But some trade diplomats note privately that the outlines of a lower-ambition round are already on the table and with a little improvement might not even look that bad compared with previous trade rounds.

Mr. Lamy, while not advocating rolling back Doha's objectives, notes that, for example, negotiators have already agreed on a 20% cut in farm subsidies that encourage overproduction. That is far less than the U.S. proposal, but similar to the level of cuts achieved for agriculture supports overall in the previous round, which began in Uruguay and ended in 1994. The U.S. has proposed that developed countries cut farm tariffs by up to 90%, and that for farm subsidies that encourage overproduction, the U.S. cut back by 52% and the EU by 75%.

DOJ_NMG_0012760

Proposed cuts to industrial tariffs so far are harder to quantify under Doha, but Mr. Lamy notes a large number of WTO members have embraced the idea of cutting the highest tariffs the most. That is important, he says, because so-called peak tariffs are often used to protect markets like shoes and textiles that developing countries most want to access.

Dan Ikenson of the Cato Institute in Washington says the U.S. and Europe may have to cut farm supports no matter what the outcome of Doha, because of domestic budget problems and fear of WTO legal challenges. That could make them more willing to accept a watered-down Doha if collapse was the alternative -- to get something in return for their cuts.

A big part of the problem, a growing number of trade analysts are concluding, is that Doha lacked a clear set of goals, in contrast to other trade rounds aimed at particular sectors. Naotaka Matsukata, a former U.S. trade negotiator now with law firm Hunton & Williams in Washington, says when Doha was launched two months after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks on the U.S., the main idea was to use trade to help developing countries, which might breed future terrorists.

But WTO members never agreed specifically on how that was to be done. Industry groups didn't play their usual role as the driving force. "There was never a consensus on what the round was supposed to be," Mr. Matsukata said. "People are asking themselves what we are doing the round for."

US Signals New Approach To Doha Round Of Trade Talks (FT)

By Alan Beattie

Financial Times, January 27, 2006

Rob Portman, the US trade representative, said on Thursday that the Doha round of trade talks had to move forward on all fronts, as the European Union said it would lose “next to nothing” if the talks failed.

The shift of emphasis in the US’s position ahead of a meeting of trade ministers pm Saturday came amid accusations that the tough negotiating tactics of big farm exporters like Brazil were holding up progress.

While continuing to argue that the EU should improve its initial offer to cut farm tariffs, a position it shares with Brazil, Mr Portman also stressed that “in an ideal world”, big developing countries would simultaneously open their goods markets.

“That would be a lot to ask because it involves a lot of risks on the part of all the parties but I think that’s what’s needed now,” he said.

Peter Mandelson, the EU trade commissioner, raised the stakes by saying that the EU would lose “next to nothing” if the talks failed. “The alliance between the US and Brazil has led to stalemate in these talks,” he said. “It has now become self-defeating.”

Brazil, one of the world’s most efficient agricultural exporters, leads the Group of 20 developing countries that negotiates on agriculture. EU officials have accused Brazil of negotiating in its own interests by prioritising lower farm tariffs. Other members, such as India, have many small-scale farmers who will lose from reduced agricultural tariffs across the world.

Kamal Nath, the Indian trade minister, told the FT: “The question is not who is more or less of a delinquent. We have to look at all parts of the negotiation.”

He added that the US could not expect lower tariffs without cutting subsidies. “The US keeps looking for market access with distorted prices,” he said.

Rachid Mohammed Rachid, the Egyptian trade minister who chairs the Africa Group of nations in the trade talks and is also in the G20, told the FT: “The US and the G20 are expecting the EU to come forward with more agricultural market access. I think we need to come forward with offers on . . . [industrial goods] and services. The idea that everyone has to wait for the EU is not Egypt’s view and it is not the Africa Group’s view.”

But Celso Amorim, the Brazilian foreign minister, denied the suggestion that Brazil was merely following its own interests, saying that he was in complete agreement with India.

“The G20 is a microcosm of the developing world,” Mr Amorim said. He added that the grouping had formed a common position with the wider G90 group of developing countries during last month’s World Trade Organisation ministerial meeting in Hong Kong.

“Two years ago people said the G20 wouldn’t last three months, and now they say that the new entente with the G90 won’t last three months,” he said. “Wait and see.”

Saturday’s meeting of trade ministers will focus on setting a timetable for negotiations in coming months rather than making any decisions, ministers said.

Merkel Can Help Advance Talks (AP)

The Associated Press, January 27, 2006

New German Chancellor Angela Merkel could help advance stalled global trade talks by offsetting the protective mindset of French officials in EU policy, U.S. trade chief Rob Portman said Thursday.

DOJ_NMG_0012761

A key issue holding up talks has been access to European Union farm markets, with Brussels refusing to give more ground until other countries cut import tariffs on industrial goods and services.

Portman, speaking while attending the World Economic Forum annual meeting, said Germany could act as a counterweight to France, which has been particularly defensive in wanting to protect its agriculture markets.

"I was very impressed with her willingness to engage," Portman said of Merkel. "I'm hopeful that she can help us to come together with an agreement this year."

But EU trade chief Peter Mandelson insisted later Thursday that Europe is "united" and that Brussels would not make any more concessions on agriculture until its trading partners first offer to cut trade barriers in industrial goods and services.

"We can't be expected to make a further offer in agriculture in order to pay to keep others at the negotiating table," Mandelson said. "Europe is willing to give more than it has offered, but it is not prepared to ask for nothing in return."

Mandelson suggested that the EU is prepared to risk the round of trade talks breaking down.

"If the talks stopped, we would lose next to nothing," Mandelson said.

The United States, as well as key developing countries such as Brazil and India, are demanding easier access to EU farm markets as part of the Doha round of trade talks.

With just more than three months left before a self-imposed deadline for setting precise formulas for cutting trade barriers, major players at the 149-member WTO appear as far apart as ever on the vexing subject of farm trade, as well as market access for industrial goods and liberalizing service industries.

Little seems to have changed since before December's meeting in Hong Kong, where members failed to agree on those formulas and only agreed on a new, April 30 deadline for reaching that point. That leaves little time before a year-end deadline for concluding the Doha negotiations.

Brazil's Foreign Minister Celso Amorim said he "was not impressed" with Mandelson restating that the EU was unable to make any more concessions on farm trade.

"Reopening the battles that we had prior to Hong Kong certainly is not a constructive way to start," Amorim said.

Portman, though, held out hope that Merkel could be "a positive force" in bringing the opposing sides together.

Trade negotiations usually take place at ministerial level rather than heads of state, yet Merkel is "engaging directly," Portman said.

"The German position is obviously going to be part of an overall EU position, in that they negotiate through the commission and not the member states, but it will take into account their own economic interests and Germany is the second largest exporter of manufactured products in the world," Portman explained.

Germany has "a strong interest in a successful outcome" to the Doha round, he said, adding: "Global economic growth, for all the major economies, is extremely important."

Boycott Call Creates Fracas At Davos Forum (NYT)

By Mark Landler And John Markoff

The New York Times, January 27, 2006

DAVOS, Switzerland, Jan. 26 — A magazine article calling on nations to boycott Israel because of its treatment of Palestinians has provoked a tempest at the World Economic Forum's annual meeting here, prompting the organizers to pull the magazines from the forum's shelves here and issue an apology.

The article, which appeared in Global Agenda, a magazine published by the forum and distributed to participants, carried the headline "Boycott Israel." The author, Mazin Qumsiyeh, equated Israel's policies toward Palestinians with apartheid and said that countries should withdraw their investments and boycott Israel.

After a member raised questions about the article, the organizers removed the magazines from shelves at the conference center in this Alpine resort. The forum's executive director, Klaus Schwab, said the article should not have been published and had slipped through the editing process.

"There was an unacceptable failure in the editorial process, specifically an insufficiently short period for review of content, for which there is no excuse," Mr. Schwab said in a statement. "The article is totally in contradiction to my own, and the forum's, mission and values."

The timing of the contretemps — on the day that Hamas won a landslide victory in Palestinian elections — was not lost on people here. The future of Israeli and Palestinian relations was high on the agenda on Thursday at this meeting of about 2,300 political figures, private groups and corporate executives.

The article on Israel had drawn no response until Wednesday, when an American technology executive raised questions about its tone.

DOJ_NMG_0012762

"I was shocked," said Rabbi Awraham S. Soetendorp, of the Jewish Institute for Human Values in the Netherlands, who was attending the forum. "The issue that Zionism was equated with racism was so outrageous."

The publication of the article was a keen embarrassment for Mr. Schwab, who prides himself on fostering dialogue in troubled parts of the world.

Mr. Schwab had hoped to organize a panel discussion this year between Israeli and Palestinian leaders. But the acting prime minister of Israel, Ehud Olmert, and the Palestinian president, Mahmoud Abbas, declined invitations to come to Davos because of events at home.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice spoke via satellite during a panel here, reaffirming the position of the United States that Hamas must renounce violence and recognize Israel's right to exist.

Mr. Qumsiyeh, the author of the article, is an American citizen of Palestinian descent who frequently writes in support of Palestinian causes. In a telephone interview from New Jersey, he said he had been asked to submit the article by a staff writer at the magazine.

"Why is free speech not allowed?" said Mr. Qumsiyeh, a geneticist. He said his article called for a nonviolent response to Israeli policy.

Economics And The Inevitable (WP)

By David Ignatius

The Washington Post, January 27, 2006

DAVOS, Switzerland -- As the throngs of ebullient Indian and Chinese executives make their way through the salons of the World Economic Forum this week, it's hard for an American not to reflect ruefully on what life must feel like for autoworkers in Detroit -- stuck in the slow lane of the global economy.

The global titans would doubtless give autoworkers in Michigan the same advice they would offer to workers in an outmoded Chinese steel mill or an unprofitable European textile plant: Get over it. Learn new skills and find new jobs in more productive sectors. The flat world, as my colleague Tom Friedman likes to call it, is ruthlessly fair in that respect. Everybody must live on the knife edge of the global marketplace.

If it were my job at Ford being cut, I would find such bromides infuriating. They sound like a 21st-century version of utilitarianism: an insistence that the free market produces the greatest good for the greatest number, which does you no good at all if you're among the unlucky lesser number. But the fact that the Davos ethic is galling doesn't mean it's wrong.

Davos has come to symbolize the dominant force of our time -- the wealth-creating, job-destroying whirlwind of the global economy. Each year I come here I marvel at the reach and leveling power of this economic hurricane. There are more Chinese, Indians and Arabs every year, and less of an American presence. U.S. investment banks, technologists and venture capitalists may have spawned the globalization movement, but it has now floated free. The dealmakers come from all over the world. The one thing they seem to have in common is that nearly all were educated in the United States. That may not be much comfort if you work at an assembly plant in Dearborn, but at least America still does one thing well: running universities.

My superstars at Davos this year are the university presidents. Larry Summers at Harvard, Rick Levin at Yale, Lee Bollinger at Columbia and a half-dozen more are transforming their universities into global institutions -- seeking the best students from around the world and sending them to far-flung places to learn the skills that will secure them places among the global elite.

"We want the brilliant mathematician whose mother is a chambermaid in Romania," says Summers. That's the most attractive face of globalization -- the idea that the great universities are creating a colorblind meritocracy that doesn't care where you're from as long as you did well on the SAT. But in this global empire of knowledge, there is an echo of Dickens's parody of utilitarian thinking, Mr. Gradgrind, who in the novel "Hard Times" famously admonished his students: "Facts alone are wanted in life. Plant nothing else, and root out everything else." Mr. Gradgrind's students were productive, but quite miserable.

The impresario of Davos, Klaus Schwab, has tried hard over the years to humanize the free market his forum celebrates. I spent time yesterday meeting with some of his "social entrepreneurs," people who are building pay toilets in Nigeria, teaching sustainable agriculture in Paraguay, training rape victims in Cambodia how to run a catering business. Inspiring stories, and there is something marvelous, too, about a conference attended by people who are so eager to invest in the booming, free-market economies of India and China.

The change machine is relentless, as I discovered at a session here for technologists and venture capitalists. The group selected hot technologies for the next few years -- sensors that can operate without batteries, stem cells for cardiac patients that can regrow heart tissue; solar technology that can produce energy at half the cost; microbial factories that can make molecules for drugs in the laboratory, for a tenth of the cost of finding them in nature. It was a dazzling discussion -- not least because these life-giving technologies will make the people in the room even richer.

"I'm a technology optimist," a prominent venture capitalist named Vinod Khosla explained. He argues that innovative, bottom-up methods will solve problems that seem intractable, from energy to poverty to disease. "Every problem is an opportunity to a technology pioneer," he said.

Business today is the leading agent of social change. That's really the message of Davos. It can be a pitiless process, and its seamless efficiency is in frightening contrast to the incompetence and mismanagement of the public sector. Globalization can be tamed, but it can't be stopped -- nor should it be. I just wish other things in the world worked as well.

Win-Win? Tell It To The Losers (NYT)

By Floyd Norris

The New York Times, January 27, 2006

DAVOS, Switzerland

AMONG the business and political leaders who gather here each year for the World Economic Forum, there has long been broad agreement that globalization is good.

But this year there is a growing doubt — not in the validity of the message, but in whether it is losing believers among the broad populace of the world.

The organizers of the conference focused a large part of it on China and India, but in the corridors a much smaller country kept coming up. That was Bolivia, whose new president, Evo Morales, promised to "end the colonial and neoliberal model." His election continued a recent leftist trend in Latin America.

"Populism is sexy in many countries," said Ghassan Salamé, a Lebanese political scientist who teaches at the Institut d'Études Politiques de Paris. "It somehow gives credibility back to politics, saying that politicians can change things. Otherwise, globalization is ruling the world."

Backers of globalization have long argued that it was "win-win," with developed and developing economies both gaining from the process, even if there were some local losers whose jobs vanished.

They still think that. But they worry that there are more losers than expected. "On a microbasis, it is very difficult to feel the win-win," said Ben Verwaayen, the chief executive of BT, the former British Telecom, at a session on jobs.

"There is a reason why polls show declining trust in politicians, journalists and business leaders. They are the opinion leaders who have lost credibility," Mr. Verwaayen continued. "Society feels very intuitively that something has changed, and we do not have the answer to it."

In a way, it is remarkable that these resentments are growing now, when world economic growth is strong. The growth of China, India and other Asian economies has not kept the United States from growing at a good rate.

But the growth is uneven, and many who felt successful in developed countries now feel threatened as pension plans are cut back and companies demand reductions in pay or benefits to avoid layoffs.

"Those who cannot participate in the economic wealth have fears," the German chancellor, Angela Merkel, said in a speech here. She warned of troubles ahead if a framework could not be found to allow all to profit.

A set of polls released by the forum showed that nearly two-thirds of Davos attendees believe that the next generation will live in a more prosperous world, while fewer than half of the people interviewed around the world share that opinion. The general public was, however, more optimistic than the Davos crowd that the world would become safer.

Perhaps those who resent globalization will remain powerless. But their ranks could swell if the world economy weakens.

Lawrence H. Summers, the president of Harvard University and a co-chairman of the World Economic Forum, asserts that globalization will not be derailed.

"The tide of history continues to move toward more market organization," he told me. But, he added, "For this to work out well, there must be more attention to local disintegration even as we work toward global integration."

Or people could just accept a world in which some are very wealthy and others provide services to them. Elaine L. Chao, the United States labor secretary, said the job outlook in the United States was bright for plumbers and electricians.

And, speaking at the same section on jobs, David Arkless, a senior vice president of Manpower Inc., said that one profession likely to offer high pay in coming years is that of personal trainer.

Don't Look For Me At Davos . . . (WSJ)

By John C. Bogle

The Wall Street Journal, January 27, 2006

This year I've decided not to call the pilot, pop on to Vanguard's G-4 and jet to Davos. Partly because we don't "do" corporate airplanes. Partly because I've never been important enough to receive an invitation to the perennial World Economic Conference. But mostly because what was once truly a global economic conference has become a "happening," a magnet for the rich and famous -- including business stars and Hollywood starlets -- to see and be seen, sort of like walking on that red carpet to the Oscars.

I confess I looked at this year's program before I made my decision. I'm only truly sorry to miss Morgan Stanley's Steve Roach, whose persistent gloomy warnings about the global economy have yet to come home to roost. And I'm kinda sorry to miss the apparently impassioned defense of speculating in today's financial markets ("Beyond Short-Termism: Not on My Watch"), which I hope -- but doubt -- is an attack on my attack on the folly of short-term speculation in my new book. To say nothing of "Hedge Fund Fairy Tales," although that can hardly be covered adequately in the allotted hour. The sessions "Happiness is . . . ," "The Trust Deficit," and "Transforming Neurotic Corporations" may also have been interesting.

Confession being good for the soul, the session I'll really be sorry to miss is "All You Ever Wanted to Know about Relationships -- But Were Afraid to Ask," a rare three-hour session that vastly exceeds the customary one hour-limit. Here, psychologist Dagmar O'Connor will tell what I'm certain will be a capacity audience why "relationships and sexuality may be the only truly universal part of human life," and give us "tools to overcome old problems and keep desire flowing." We can all learn, can't we? (Even though I'll soon be 77, I'll celebrate my 10th anniversary as a heart-transplant recipient on Feb. 21. The heart is actually now 35.)

Speaking of CEOs, the Forum exults that among its select horde of 2,340 participants are a record 735 chief executives, chairmen and CFOs, "the highest figure of corporate leaders ever." With all due respect, I won't miss glad-handing most of them. They get paid as if they're solely responsible for their firms' success, and even if they fail, they get handsome rewards. In 2004, their compensation rose another 39% to 475 times that of the average worker -- the guys and gals who get out of bed every morning and do their jobs, with never a ride on the corporate jet whose cost is paid 60% by shareholders and 40% by taxpayers. Truth be told, most CEOs I've met are greatly overrated. But I don't complain; I may have been the most overrated of all.

So sorry, Bono, I can't be with you for lunch. Sorry, other Michael Jordan, that I won't hear the latest on EDS. Sorry, David Stern, that I can't shoot some hoops with you. Sorry, Jacques Rogge, that I won't learn more about "the impact of sports in the world." And sorry, Jean Claude and Christo, but please know that I took my whole family to "The Gates" and loved it.

But I already knew, as I suspect everyone there knew, that "China, India [are] Key to the Future," CNN's headline about Chancellor Merkel's speech. And I didn't need to fly to Davos to learn that "plumbers, construction workers, and electricians" will still be needed in the global economy of the future. With 226 sessions, I would have had to miss at least 200 anyway.

Deep down, however, I may just be jealous. Perhaps if I call President Clinton I can hitch a ride on his jet, arriving late tomorrow afternoon for a closing panel with Forum founder Klaus Schwab. Then I'd have avoided all the foolish, self-righteous show-biz baloney, but be able to assure my pals: "Yes, I was at Davos, 2006."

Mr. Bogle, founder and former CEO of the Vanguard Group, is the author of "The Battle for the Soul of Capitalism" (Yale, 2005).

French 'protectionism' Draws EU Ire (FT)

By Tobias Buck In Brussels

Financial Times, January 27, 2006

France has been given a one-month deadline to justify its contentious decree protecting a large number of domestic firms from foreign takeovers or face legal action from Brussels.

Charlie McCreevy, the European Union internal market commissioner, has rounded on the French government's action, dismissing key provisions of the decree – issued on December 31 – as "discriminatory" and "protectionist".

The commissioner's criticism of the takeover decree is detailed in a four-page letter sent to the French government and signed by Mr McCreevy's top civil servant. "The Commission services have examined the law and have raised a number of concerns with the French authorities," a spokesman for Mr McCreevy said on Thursday.

Brussels' intervention underlines the Commission's deep concerns about the rise of protectionist measures in the 25 EU member states. Mr McCreevy is already embroiled in a battle with the Polish government over its attempt to block a banking merger involving UniCredit, the Italian financial services group. He has also taken action against Italy for an attempt by the country's central bank to block two foreign banking takeovers.

A confrontation with France would, however, be more serious, because the Commission is questioning measures which are designed to protect entire sectors from foreign takeovers – and not just individual companies.

Under the decree, the French government has the right to veto or impose conditions on foreign takeovers in as many as 11 sensitive sectors. Paris said the decree had been drafted in close collaboration with the Commission, but Brussels insists it never gave its approval to the text.

Mr McCreevy's spokesman said the Commission's concerns referred, among other things, to "the fact that the authorisation procedure applies only to foreign firms and not to French firms", adding that the requirement "appears discriminatory and could be viewed as protectionist". The Commission was also questioning a provision that requires government approval for buyers wanting to take over only parts of a French firm – a measure that "seems to be disproportionate", the spokesman added. Other potential problems identified in the Commission letter relate to "unclear criteria in the law for defining national interest".

France had hoped to avoid Commission criticism of the decree by distinguishing between foreign firms from inside and outside the EU. As a result, potential bidders from other EU countries face much lighter requirements than companies from, say, the US or China.

Kosovo Albanians Mourn Pro-Independence Leader (NYT)

By Nicholas Wood

The New York Times, January 27, 2006

PRISTINA, Kosovo, Jan. 26 — Kosovo's Albanian majority gathered by the tens of thousands on Thursday to bid farewell to their president in a proud and somber funeral ceremony that seemed to underscore their aspirations for independence.

After 16 years as the ethnic Albanian leader in the province, Ibrahim Rugova — a veteran pacifist who struggled to gain independence for this disputed region but died of lung cancer last Saturday — was given every honor the region could muster.

For six hours this city, the regional capital, was brought to a halt for a ceremony attended by four presidents and representatives from more than 40 countries. Stores and schools were closed, and the regional government announced a holiday.

Kosovo is still officially part of Serbia but has been administered by the United Nations since June 1999, when Serbian security forces, accused of committing atrocities against the Albanians, were forced to leave the province. Mr. Rugova died just as talks on the province's future status were about to begin.

But for many here on Thursday, there was little in the ceremony to suggest that it was taking place in a disputed province. There were few signs of the 17,000 or so peacekeepers who usually patrol the region. Instead, Kosovo's Protection Corps, defined by the United Nations as a civil disaster response unit but widely viewed by Albanians as the province's fledgling defense force, led the cortege. The armed guards, recruited from the ranks of Kosovo's now dispersed guerrilla army that fought the Serbian security forces during the conflict here from 1997 to 1999, walked slowly alongside the president's coffin as it was borne on a gun carriage, draped in flags.

"He was the president of our state," said Zymer Kastrati, 80, who traveled by bus with 10 members of his family from Pec in eastern Kosovo. Mr. Rugova twice won the presidency of Kosovo's regional government, elected by the provincial legislature in 2002 and 2004.

While the United Nations has final authority here, the regional government has substantial say in areas like the economy, health, education and other social affairs.

Many Albanians traveled across Kosovo in freezing temperatures to attend the ceremony after four and half days of official mourning. Many were members of the Democratic League of Kosovo, the movement Mr. Rugova helped to form in the late 1980's as a counterweight to the rise of Serbian nationalism. Members of Kosovo's extensive exile communities flew in from as far as way as Australia and the United States.

Some said they came out of duty to the man they described as the father of their nation.

"He was a very patient and peaceful man — ideal qualities, since we Kosovars are a hot-blooded people," said Gresa Rexhepi, 16, a Pristina high school student. "I'm sure his goal will be achieved very soon."

Dignitaries paid tribute to the president before he was laid to rest at a memorial site for former members of the Kosovo Liberation Army. The head of the United Nations mission in the province, Soren JessenPetersen, said President Rugova had "remained dedicated exclusively to peaceful means."

"His death is a great loss," Javier Solana, the European Union's foreign policy chief, said at the ceremony. "It is one of the cruel ironies of history that he left at the moment he was most needed, the very moment he expected to provide leadership in helping to settle the future status of Kosovo."

Mr. Jessen-Petersen suggested that Mr. Rugova's desire for independence might yet become a reality, a suggestion echoed by diplomats who say negotiations are likely to lead to some kind of independent state.

"President Rugova has left a void behind him, but he has also left a vision to guide Kosovo forward," Mr. Jessen-Petersen said. "It is a vision whose fulfillment he did not live to see, but whose realization will be achieved through the unity and commitment of those who follow him."

But while the ceremony appeared to suggest that this region is on the verge of statehood, the underlying divisions were thinly disguised. Members of Kosovo's Serbian population were notably absent, as were representatives of the Serbian government.

DOJ_NMG_0012766

A request by Serbia's president, Boris Tadic, to attend the funeral was rejected by Mr. Rugova's office because it reasserted Serbia's claim to the province.

President Tadic asked to be able to go to "Kosovo, which is a part of Serbia's territorial integrity," and pay his respects. Subsequently, all but one of Kosovo's Serbian representatives declined to join the ceremony.

There were also reminders of the deep divisions running though Kosovo's Albanian population. Some war veterans, long critical of Mr. Rugova's advocacy of nonviolence during repression at the hands of Serbian security forces in Kosovo in the 1990's, condemned the government's decision to bury him at the Kosovo Liberation Army memorial site.

Axis Of Evo (WSJ)

By Mary Anastasia O'grady

The Wall Street Journal, January 27, 2006

There was a time when Evo Morales deserved a chance to show his democratic bonafides as Bolivia's new head of state. But 96 hours into the presidency, time's up. Anyone still wondering what Evo has in mind for his country qualifies for permanent disability -- or a job at the Organization of American States -- on grounds of terminal naiveté.

In just a few short days, the great Aymara hope has built a cabinet of radical and Marxist militants, purged the Bolivian military and signed a pile of "agreements" with his Venezuelan mentor Hugo Chávez. There are reports that Cuban security agents are already working for the new president much as they do for Chávez. If imitation is the sincerest form of flattery, Evo is buttering Hugo up big time.

The most tragic aspect of Evo's decision to let Cuba and Venezuela annex his country is where this all leads for the majority Indian population in one of the region's poorest countries. Their hopes soared on Sunday as they watched one of their own, from humble beginnings, sworn into the highest office in the land. They no doubt think that Evo -- who rose to power by leading coca growers against crop eradication pushed by U.S. drug warriors -- will care for his own in ways that the white, upper-class leadership never did. But Fidel long ago destroyed underclass hopes for a better life and Hugo is doing the same.

After six years of Chávez, Venezuelans, once ecstatic about their Bolivarian Revolution, are sinking deeper into poverty. Fidel's largely Afro-Cuban population is destitute after almost 50 years of El Máximo Lider.

Most of the world has greeted the Morales presidency with romantic optimism. His lack of experience and formal education, his fiery rhetoric laced with old fashion Latin populism, his violent background and his hard-line friends abroad -- all have been played down in favor of a "give-him-a-chance" attitude. A Miami Herald editorial Wednesday noted a few of Mr. Morales' more moderate statements as "a sign of political maturity."

It's hard to find anyone not hoping that an Evo-led Bolivia, built on equality under the law, property rights and healthy competition will emerge. Sadly, though, white guilt is not likely to get off so easily. The reality is that the Cuban model of totalitarian "equality" is now the dominant force shaping the Morales government.

One reason this has been slow to dawn is that observers have been assigning far too much importance to the question of whether foreign investors will be allowed into Bolivia's rich natural gas industry, or if, instead, Bolivia will go forward with full blown nationalization. The answer is probably the former, but so what? As both Venezuela and Cuba illustrate, such a policy does nothing to ensure development and reveals very little about whether democracy and liberty will survive.

Spain's socialist prime minister, José Luis Rodríguez Zapatero, is already trying to elbow his way into Mr. Morales's Bolivia on behalf of Spanish energy interests, as is Brazil's Luiz Inácio "Lula" da Silva on behalf of Petrobras. Yet the presence of foreign business interests in a dictatorship does little for the locals. Both Castro and Chávez host foreign investors, recognizing them as perfect business partners because they are politically indifferent as long as they get their cut. The key to a dictator's control is ensuring that local interests do not have economic power to challenge the political status quo.

Mr. Morales has been riding an anti-foreigner wave of populism but is suddenly warming up to the old Bolivian nemesis, Chile. Undoubtedly, someone has explained to him that as long as Bolivia relies exclusively on Brazil and Argentina as markets for its natural gas, it has weak pricing power. It would not be surprising to see the angry Bolivian nationalist make a deal with Chile so he could reach the coast and tap into the rich market for liquefied natural gas up north.

If that happens it should not be understood as moderation. It would merely be a calculation about how to secure power. It explains the first-ever attendance of a Chilean president at a Bolivian inauguration and Evo's plans to travel to Chile for its inauguration of Michelle Bachelet.

Better relations between Chile and Bolivia are much to be desired. But as Venezuela and Iran have made clear, energy income in the hands of the state does not make citizens better off. We'd be more encouraged if Evo said something about changing Bolivian property laws to permit Indians to sell their rural land or if he promised to change the country's "capitalization" structure of privatized companies so that shares held in trust for Bolivians by the state would be distributed to the people.

The other facet of Bolivian reality that some observers expected as a counterbalance to a presidential power grab is the opposition. Yet, with a majority in the lower house and solid support in the senate, Evo may be able to consolidate power "legally" à la Chávez. A constituent assembly later this year will rewrite the constitution and if Venezuela is any guide, the concept of limited government will not be included in the document.

Finally, there is the matter of the military, an institution near and dear to the heart of an "elected" president who has no intention of leaving office when his term is up. Again, Chávez's Venezuela provides the template. To this day, a number of Venezuelan experts believe that the so-called "coup" of April 11, 2002 was a staged event, designed expressly for the purpose of identifying high-ranking Chávez opponents in uniform so they could be relieved of duty and replaced by less-qualified, loyal soldiers.

On Tuesday, Evo fired 28 Bolivian generals -- essentially the entire high command -- on charges of treason for allowing the U.S. to destroy some two dozen Chinese missiles held by the Bolivian military. He didn't mention that the missiles were obsolete and that both parties acted within OAS conventions. He then reportedly passed over the next generation of officers to replace the generals with a young group of soldiers. There can be little doubt that these new generals understand well that the president deserves credit for their accelerated career success.

There are of course differences between Bolivia and Venezuela, the biggest one being that Evo doesn't have the resources to purchase influence the way Hugo has done. But that may also explain why he's moving much faster to neutralize the military and protect his power against future challengers.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Bush Defends Domestic Wiretapping Program.

President Bush yesterday defended the NSA's domestic surveillance program during a wide-ranging press conference. While Bush's reaction to the Palestinian election grabbed most headlines, his comments on the NSA issue were covered by all three network news programs, and are receiving some attention from most major newspapers this morning. The CBS Evening News (1/26, story 2, 3:30, Roberts) noted, "The President insisted again today he's on solid legal ground and was skeptical about increasing talk in Congress to write new laws covering the program." The New York Times (1/27, Bumiller, 1.19M) adds the President "said that efforts in Congress to write legislation expressly giving him authority for such a program were unnecessary and dangerous." Bush's "46-minute news conference, announced less than an hour and a half ahead of time, was an effort by the White House to frame the debate on an array of foreign and domestic issues only five days before his State of the Union address." Bush "appeared relaxed in the briefing room, which his aides say he prefers for news conferences instead of the more formal East Room. He appeared apprehensive at first, but loosened up when he saw a camera dangling precariously from a cord in the ceiling, threatening to crash down on the heads of reporters."

The Washington Post (1/27, A6, VandeHei, 744K) headlines its story "Bush Reasserts Presidential Prerogatives," and says that comments by Bush on hurricane Katrina, the Abramoff scandal and the NSA program show "he is determined to assert presidential prerogatives." Bush "said he is concerned about Congress writing a new spying law because it could force the government to provide details and clues about a top-secret program used to hunt down terrorists." Bush is quoted saying of the program, "There's no doubt in my mind it is legal."

In a similar story, the Washington Times (1/27, Curl, 90K) reports Bush "yesterday said he has exclusive authority over a broad range of issues -- including forbidding White House officials to testify before Congress about the government's Hurricane Katrina response and ordering warrantless electronic surveillance within the United States." Said Bush, "Conducting war is a responsibility in the executive branch, not the legislative branch." The AP (1/27, Hunt) quotes Bush saying, "The program's legal, it's designed to protect civil liberties, and it's necessary."

ABC's World News Tonight (1/26, story 4, 1:50, Vargas) reported that at the White House "they think" the issue "is a political winner." Bush "he didn't seem to get too rattled when one reporter compared him to Richard Nixon." The Washington Post (1/27, A7, Milbank, 744K) reports that "the Los Angeles Times's James Gerstenzang offered an observation on Bush's surveillance policy: 'This seems to sound like something President Nixon once said, which was: "When the president does it, then that means that it's not illegal." Whispered 'oohs' could be heard in the room." Bush "gave a look indicating he wished the dangling camera had fallen on Gerstenzang." Answered Bush, "Most presidents believe that during a time of war that we can use our authorities under the Constitution to make decisions necessary to protect us."

NBC Nightly News (1/26, story 2, 2:00, Fletcher) reported that in addition to dismissing the need for lawmakers to change the NSA terrorist monitoring program, Bush also "provided new ammunition for his critics by calling the 1978 Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, FISA, the law Congress passed to restrict domestic spying, outdated." Bush: "The FISA law was written in 1978. We're having this discussion in 2006. It's a different world. I said, look, is it possible to conduct this program under the old law? And people said, it doesn't work in order to be able to do the job we expect us to do."

Fox News' Special Report (1/26, Angle) reported, "The President explained once again that the communications intercepts done without warrants are always aimed at suspected terrorists overseas. … The President insists they do not tap calls made entirely within the US. Everyone agrees eavesdropping on purely domestic communications would require warrants. So when one reporter suggested the President is circumventing FISA, the President strenuously objected."

Under the headline "Bush To Resist Wiretap Legislation," the Wall Street Journal (1/27, Cooper, 2.11M) reports Bush "suggested he will resist any congressional attempts to modify the administration's practice of conducting warrantless wiretaps, saying the program is already legal and would lose effectiveness if subjected to a protracted public debate." The President "said yesterday that while he will consider congressional suggestions to modify the program," but "he won't support public debate that divulges how it works -- even if lawmakers' intent is to preserve the program." Reuters (1/27, Zakaria) also says Bush "said he would resist changing laws governing such action if it meant revealing secrets to an enemy."

Administration Has Given At Least Two Rationales For Domestic Surveillance. The Washington Post (1/27, A5, Eggen, Pincus, 744K) reports that President Bush's claim that he did not seek congressional approval for the warranteless domestic eavesdropping program because he did not need it is "one of several explanations on the topic from Bush and his aides, who have provided at least two separate rationales for why they did not ask for statutory authority for the program. Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales said the administration had considered seeking legislation but determined it would be impossible to get, adding later in the same news conference that authorities did not want to expose the program's existence. White House spokesman Scott McClellan has echoed the latter point, saying the administration feared that details of the classified program would be exposed publicly." The Post adds, "The subject is one of several elements in the NSA spying debate that have been clouded by apparent contradictions and mixed messages from the government since the program was revealed last month. … Before the program's existence was revealed, several administration officials also emphasized in testimony and public statements that the NSA was prohibited from engaging in domestic surveillance -- even as the agency was clearly doing so under the authority of Bush's secret order that established the program."

Poll Shows Support For NSA Surveillance Program. The CBS Evening News (1/26, story 2, 3:30, Roberts) noted, "On the NSA spying program, President Bush went into today's press conference with a boost. A new CBS news 'New York Times' poll found 61% of Americans believe the eavesdropping is meant to fight terror and the majority support that." CBS anchor Bob Schieffer later noted, "It looks to me as if the President has decided to make this a political issue to show that he is strong in the fight against terrorism and perhaps the Democrats are weak. And I must say looking al that poll, he may be succeeding." Roberts: "A political issue and a national security issue which history would show President does very well on. You take a look at that poll, the majority of Americans think if it's directed at terrorism it's the right thing to do."

The New York Times (1/27, Nagourney, Elder, 1.19M), however, headlines its story "New Poll Finds Mixed Support For Wiretaps," and says Americans "are concerned that the aggressive antiterrorism programs championed by the Bush administration are encroaching on civil liberties, according to the latest New York Times/CBS News poll." The Times adds, "In a sign that public opinion about the trade-offs between national security and individual rights is nuanced and remains highly unresolved, responses to questions about the administration's eavesdropping program varied significantly depending on how the questions were worded, underlining the importance of the effort by the White House this week to define the issue on its terms. … In one striking finding, respondents overwhelmingly supported e-mail and telephone monitoring directed at 'Americans that the government is suspicious of;' they overwhelmingly opposed the same kind of surveillance if it was aimed at 'ordinary Americans.'"

FBI Begins Interviews In NSA Surveillance Program Leak Probe. Fox News' Special Report (1/26, Angle) reported, "Law enforcement sources tell Fox News that in the past few weeks, FBI agents have begun their investigation into who leaked details of the highly classified program to The New York Times. Agents began close to home, interviewing officials from the Justice Department and the FBI at the outset of their investigation."

Rove Comments Blasted. Under the headline "A Discredit To The GOP," the Washington Post (1/27, A22, 744K) editorializes, "The Bush administration's distortion, for political purposes, of the Democratic position on warrantless surveillance is loathsome. Despite the best efforts of Karl Rove, the White House deputy chief of staff, and Ken Mehlman, the Republican National Committee chairman, to make it seem otherwise, Democrats are not opposed to vigorous, effective surveillance that could uncover terrorist activity. Nor are the concerns that they are expressing unique to their party. Republican Sens. John McCain (Ariz.), Arlen Specter (Pa.), Chuck Hagel (Neb.), Lindsey O. Graham (S.C.) and Sam Brownback (Kan.) have expressed legal doubts about the surveillance program." The Post adds, "Maybe, as a matter of crass political calculation, Mr. Rove and Mr. Mehlman are correct that Democrats criticizing warrantless wiretaps will pay a price in the November elections. We don't pretend to know. What we do know is that the country is in the midst of an important debate about the reach of presidential power and the scope of civil liberties in wartime. For Rove & Co. to try to turn this into just another partisan political skewer discredits their administration and their party."

Columnist Eugene Robinson writes in the Washington Post (1/27, A23, 744K), "Once upon a time we had a great wartime president who told Americans they had nothing to fear but fear itself. Now we have…Bush, who uses fear as a tool of executive power and as a political weapon against his opponents. … To cultivate fear for partisan gain is never a political tactic to be proud of, but Rove's prescription of naked fearmongering is just plain reprehensible when the nation faces a shifting array of genuine, serious threats. This is a moment for ethical politicians -- and, yes, these days that seems like an oxymoron -- to speak honestly about what dangers have receded, what new dangers have emerged, and how the imperatives of liberty and security can be balanced. From the likes of Rove, I guess, we shouldn't expect anything more noble than win-at-all-costs." But "we do have the right to expect more from the president of the United States, and while Bush gives off none of Rove's Sith-lord menace, he has made the cultivation of fear a hallmark of his governance."

More Commentary. The Eugene (OR) Register-Guard (1/26) editorializes, "Based on a powder-keg footnote in a recent memo by U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, the United States may be nearing a tipping point on civil liberties in its amorphous, open-ended 'war against terror.' … Gonzales' 42-page memo argues unconvincingly that Congress gave President Bush the power to investigate terror suspects using any tactics he chooses when it authorized him to use 'all necessary and appropriate force' against al-Qaeda one week after the terrorist attacks on Sept. 11, 2001. … The memo, and Gonzales' underlying contention that the president has nearly unlimited powers in wartime, are affronts to America's system of checks and balances and the Constitution that protects the privacy of its citizens. The memo also runs starkly counter to the recent findings of the nonpartisan Congressional Research Service, which cast serious doubt on the legality of the president's decision to order the domestic eavesdropping program. … Since 9/11, lawmakers have cowered in the face of an overbearing and overreaching executive branch. Now, Congress must exercise its constitutionally mandated oversight role, and protect the checks and balances and civil liberties that make us a free and democratic nation. If it fails to do so, the tipping point may be at hand."

The Seattle Post-Intelligencer (1/27) editorializes, "President Bush, Karl Rove and Attorney General Alberto Gonzales have tackled a big job. They are trying to scare people into believing the administration has the authority to spy on Americans' telecommunications. … This is one of the administration's patented media blitzes. The repetition of themes of terror, fear and security may once again swing opinion. … The administration argues that a congressional authorization to use force against terrorists means it's OK to conduct warrantless wiretaps. Court precedents suggest the vague authorization can't be stretched to overwrite existing law. Just saying the White House respects the Constitution's limits on searches doesn't mean the Fourth Amendment is actually being upheld. But maybe Rove can whip up gratitude for the president's defiance of accepted notions of law, privacy and a constitutionally limited executive. That's scary."

Mueller Says US Utilizing Global Intelligence In Terror War, But Preserving Privacy Rights. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (1/27, Lederer) reports, "FBI director Robert Mueller said Thursday the United States now acts on intelligence from any place in the world to fight terrorism but has not sacrificed individuals' rights to privacy in that effort. However, during an interview with The Associated Press, Mueller would not discuss renditions," nor would he "elaborate on the National Security Agency's listening without a warrant to telephone calls in the United States that Bush administration officials believe involve al-Qaida terrorists. … But Mueller said the goal of gathering intelligence in the war against terrorism was to prevent attacks and not just prosecute cases. 'For us, it is not just having a terrorist event happening and then gathering the evidence to put it in a courtroom to convict somebody after we're able to identify him, detain him and extradite him,' Mueller said." Mueller added that since 9/11, "U.S. officials have recognized the importance of using all information to determine 'who intends to hurt the United States or the United States' interests around the world.' 'We are doing a much better job at integrating that intelligence and acting on that intelligence any place in the world,' he said." The AP adds, "Mueller vehemently denied that the United States was giving up the right to privacy in exchange for security. 'In no way, shape, or form do I think we've given up our rights,' he said. 'But I do think there's an appropriate balance with the threat that we have.'"

Terrorist Pursuit Of Nuclear Weapons Dominates WEF Discussions. In a separate story about today's discussions at Davos, the AP (1/27) reports, "Terrorist attempts to attain nuclear weapons and a new twist in rock star Bono's campaign to help Africa topped discussions Thursday at the World Economic Forum. IAEA chief Mohamed ElBaradei said, "We know that terrorists are highly sophisticated and are interested in acquiring nuclear weapons. We are running in a race against time." DHS Secretary Michael Chertoff said that the department "has placed its priority on stopping the worst disasters. … He said the United States is working with other countries to make sure radioactive material terrorists could use to make weapons never enters the United States. FBI Director Robert Mueller said in an interview on the sidelines of the forum the United States is doing a much better job of integrating domestic and foreign intelligence and acting on it to fight terrorism around the world than it was before the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks on New York City and Washington. But the U.S. law-enforcement official cautioned: 'Nothing is perfect and nothing is certain.' 'We are safer but not totally safe,' Mueller said."

In his National Review Online (1/26) column, Jay Nordlinger notes, "An attractive panel on 'Global Risks 2006: What Keeps You Up at Night?' features Michael Chertoff (Homeland Security) and Robert Mueller (FBI), along with ElBaradei. The American presence is more robust than last year. (I should have said, the administration presence is -- and that translates into a more conservative coloration.)"

Mueller Calls For International Rapid Response System To Computer Hackers. The Financial Times (1/27, Larsen) reports FBI Director Robert Mueller "yesterday urged the world's law enforcement agencies to introduce a rapid system of exchanging information to battle computer security breaches and fraud that are the biggest concern of business. … The issue of computer fraud has gained increasing prominence in recent years following a series of hacking attacks on large companies and several high-profile security breaches at companies that keep sensitive information about their customers."

DOJ Disputes Colombian Claim Busted Passport Ring Aided Terrorists. The AP (1/27) reports, "Colombia has dismantled a false passport ring with links to al-Qaeda and Hamas militants, the acting attorney general said Thursday after authorities led dozens of simultaneous raids across five cities in collaboration with U.S. officials. In Washington, however, Justice and Homeland Security officials were surprised by the announcement of the investigation, which they said involved people posing as members" of FARC, "not al-Qaeda or Hamas." Acting Colombian Attorney General Jorge Armando Otalora said that "the counterfeit Colombian, Spanish, Portugese and German passports were used to enter the United States and Europe," but DOJ spokesman Bryan Sierra "said an indictment unsealed Wednesday in Miami charges 10 foreign nationals with smuggling 'people that they thought were members of FARC into the United States.' 'We are not alleging any connections to any terror organization other than the FARC,' said Justice Department spokesman Bryan Sierra. He said the U.S. will seek to extradite the 10 alleged smugglers, of whom eight have been arrested."

2nd Circuit Panel Rejects US Motion To Remove Judge From Terrorism Case. The New York Times (1/27, Preston, 1.19M) reports a three-judge panel of the 2nd US Circuit "yesterday rejected an attempt by prosecutors to oust a judge from a terrorism case, dismissing the government's argument that the judge, Shira A. Scheindlin, was biased in favor of the defendant. The ruling came in the case of Osama Awadallah, a Jordanian college student who was charged in October 2001 with lying before a grand jury to conceal his ties with two hijackers in the Sept. 11 attacks. … His convoluted case has become a test of the government's prolonged detention of people without charges as material witnesses in terrorism cases." The Times adds, "The appeals judges noted that in several cases in which Judge Scheindlin had initially antagonized the prosecutors by questioning their procedures, she ultimately ruled in their favor."
