CIA Posted Wrong Photo Of Suspected Al Qaeda Terrorist. NBC Nightly News (1/26, story 4, 1:45, Williams) reported, "For a year and a half, the US government has been asking for the public's help in finding a dangerous al Qaeda operative, an expert in poisons and lethal chemicals. But until just recently, government did not know, until they were informed by NBC News, that the photo they were circulating was of the wrong man." NBC (Myers) added, "A US government website lists him as one of the world's most-wanted terrorists, Abu Khabab al Masri, allegedly al Qaeda's top expert on chemicals and poisons." But "the picture bore a striking resemblance to this man, Abu Hamza al Masri, a militant imam now on trial in London." Roger Cressey, NBC News terrorism expert: "It's embarrassing. It reflects a certain level of sloppiness and lack of attention to detail." Steve Emerson, NBC News terrorism analyst: "The CIA is supposed to check these things out. Somebody should be looking at it a second time and a third time before posting it worldwide."

Rabbi, Priest Testify On Al Masri's Behalf. Reuters (1/27) reports, "A rabbi and a Christian priest testified on Thursday in support of…radical Muslim preacher" Abu Hamza al Masri, "telling a court he was friendly and hospitable." Rabbi Joseph Goldstein testified "that he had been favourably impressed when he met Hamza at the Finsbury Park mosque in north London to talk about a mixed-faith married couple," and Anglican priest Stephen Coles "told the court he had met Hamza soon after the September 11, 2001 attacks on the United States. … 'Sometimes we agreed about some things, sometimes we disagreed. It wasn't at any point aggressive or angry.' He said he had tried to continue dialogue with Hamza even after the cleric was arrested in 2004."

PATRIOT ACT:

Columnist Says Patriot Act Could Have Prevented 9/11. In a column distributed by Scripps Howard News Service (1/27) New York commentator Deroy Murdock writes, "As the Senate prepares for a showdown vote to reauthorize the Patriot Act, members of the World's Greatest Deliberative Body should deliberate on this: Had it existed, could the Patriot Act have prevented the Sept. 11 massacre? … First, Patriot Act Section 218 would have eliminated 'The Wall' that prevented intelligence agents and law-enforcement officials from sharing information." Former Attorney General Janet Reno "issued restrictions in 1995 that hindered communications between spies and gumshoes. Frustrated New York FBI agents reportedly placed signs on their desks that read, 'You may not talk to me.' … Were the Patriot Act in place, 'The Wall' would not have prevented Minneapolis FBI agents from getting permission to examine the laptop and possessions of '20th hijacker' Zacarias Moussaoui." Murdock adds, "Second, Patriot Act Section 215, the so-called 'library provision,' might have led officials to seven of the 19 hijackers who used government libraries for Internet access.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

9th Circuit Upholds Airport ID Requirement. The AP (1/27, Kravets) reports, "An appeals court on Thursday dismissed a legal challenge to federal airport regulations requiring passengers to show identification before they board planes." The AP continues, "The 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals rejected claims by Libertarian activist and millionaire John Gilmore that the policy constituted an illegal search and violated his right to travel freely. … After reviewing the government's identification policy in private, a unanimous three-judge panel said the policy was not overly intrusive. The review was done in private for security reasons." The AP adds, "The court said Gilmore could leave the airport if he didn't want to show his ID and had other ways to get around besides air travel. It also rejected assertions that the act of showing identification was an illegal search of Gilmore, who made his millions as a founding employee of Sun Microsystems. … Gilmore's lawyer, William Simpich, said he is weighing whether to appeal."

FBI Investigating Whether California Man Also Mailed New York Anthrax Hoax Letters. The AP (1/27) reports, "A Santa Cruz man indicted for sending three letters that appeared to be laced with anthrax may have sent four similar parcels, which were responsible for the partial evacuations of several buildings in New York, authorities said. Four letters delivered to New York addresses on Monday and Tuesday have 'obvious similarities' to three letters Paul Charles Steeves is under indictment for, said Christine Monaco, an FBI agent in New York. … The New York letters -- received at a United Nations family planning agency, a federal credit union, an Army recruitment center and an Army Corps of Engineers facility -- caused partial evacuations, Monaco said. Agents are looking into whether Steeves sent the letters received in New York, said FBI spokeswoman LaRae Quy."

Audit Finds States Squandered Much Anti-Terror Funding. The New York Post (1/27, Earle, 624K) reports on a "stunning audit" which reveals that hundreds of thousands of dollars "sent to protect the nation's heartland have been squandered in Indiana alone." The Post calls the audit "more evidence the cash could have been better spent in New York. A team of investigators examined Indiana's books to see how the state spent $48 million it got in federal homeland-security aid, finding widespread instances of mismanagement, according to the report set for release today, which was obtained by The Post. New York lawmakers were fuming over the shocking findings of waste at a time when the Big Apple could use more anti-terror dollars."

Bloomberg Presses WTC Developer To Accept Port Authority Deal. The New York Times (1/27, Bagli, 1.19M) reports that while New York City Mayor Michael Bloomberg "has little actual power over decisions at ground zero," he is "using his bully pulpit to pressure [developer Larry A.] Silverstein to accede to the authority's demands that he relinquish control of a major part of the 16-acre parcel in return for a reduction in rent, so that the rebuilding effort can proceed more swiftly." The Times reports that this proposal would include the "huge and symbolic Freedom Tower while the Port Authority … would construct a second tower on Church Street and occupy part of it. The authority would also build a multistory shopping mall and sell a third site to a developer for a hotel, office space, and, in the mayor's vision, apartments."

Bush Addresses Concerns About Federal Commitment To New Orleans. NBC Nightly News (1/26, story 3, 1:30, Williams) reported, "The topic of New Orleans came up at that news conference today because of the decision by the White House to say no to a proposed $30 billion bailout package for Louisiana. That news hit hard in New Orleans and it prompted this exchange between the President and our own David Gregory. He asked the President about the people who are possibly left out." Bush replied: "The Congress has appropriated $85 billion to help rebuild the Gulf Coast. And that's a good start. It's a strong start. It's a significant commitment to the people whose lives were turned upside down by that -- by that hurricane." Williams: "Now in their defense, aides to the President say they want the billions already approved by Congress to be spent first. They contend that money may well be enough and if not, they say they'll reassess in the Gulf."

First Lady Assures New Orleans Schools Aid Will Be Available. The Baton Rouge Advocate (1/17, Shields, Millhollon) notes that "first lady Laura Bush visited one of the first New Orleans public schools to open after Hurricane Katrina hit, then traveled to another school in St. Bernard Parish." Laura Bush said, "One thing that will bring people back to their communities is if they know there's a good school for their children to go to and there's safe places for them to play."

The AP (1/27) adds that she "listened Wednesday as students who talked about the events of the past five months. One talked about being stuck in traffic for 12 hours trying to evacuate the day before Katrina hit on Aug. 29. Another said for three weeks she didn't know where her father was, whether he survived the massive flood." The AP notes, "Bush and Secretary of Education Margaret Spellings assured school officials that federal aid will be available for them to continue operating and make needed repairs."

History Of Corruption Seen As Hurting Louisiana Recovery Effort. The Los Angeles Times (1/27, Bustillo, 958K) reports, "In Louisiana, which has a history of political shenanigans so rich and colorful that it has become a part of American folklore, people long have laughed off misbehaving politicians as a fact of life, every bit as inevitable as death and taxes. But as the state lobbies Washington for more money to rebuild ravaged towns and cities, citizens are realizing that Louisiana's well-earned penchant for dirty politics has exacted a steep price: It has badly damaged the credibility of the recovery effort." However, "Sen. Mary L. Landrieu (D-La.) said that the corruption, while historically accurate, has been magnified by Republicans in Washington who do not want to help Louisiana. … Citing the corruption scandal in the nation's capital centering on GOP lobbyist Jack Abramoff, Landrieu added, 'Republicans in Washington should clean up their own house before using Louisiana's past reputation an excuse for not wanting to rebuild the Gulf Coast.'"

Study Finds 80% Of Black New Orleans Residents May Not Return. The New York Times (1/27, Dao, 1.19M) reports, "New Orleans could lose as much as 80 percent of its black population if its most damaged neighborhoods are not rebuilt and if there is not significant government assistance to help poor people return, a detailed analysis by Brown University has concluded. … Of the 354,000 people who lived in New Orleans neighborhoods where the subsequent damage was moderate to severe, 75 percent were black, 29 percent lived below the poverty line, more than 10 percent were unemployed, and more than half were renters, the study found." If report author John R. Logan's "projections are realized, the New Orleans population will shrink to about 140,000 from its prehurricane level of 484,000, and the city, nearly 70 percent black before the storm, will become majority white."

WAR NEWS:

US Releases Some Iraqi Women Detainees. The CBS Evening News (1/26, story 3, 3:30, Schieffer) reported, "Now to Iraq where two more American soldiers were reported killed in action and hundreds of Iraqi prisoners were released by the US military today. Five women were among those freed, but US officials insist that is not a response to demands made by the kidnappers of the American reporter Jill Carroll." CBS (Palmer) added a "speech by Brigadier General Lynch emphasized the women were in no way bargaining chips." Brigadier General Lynch: "Those female detainees were released as part of our normal process and not as a result of demands by terrorists and criminals." Palmer: "Today, al Jazeera and the other Arab networks covered the news of the women prisoners being freed. But no word from Jill's captors, it's impossible to know whether they'll focus on the five women who were released today or the fact that there are several more remaining in US custody."

NBC Nightly News (1/26, story 3, :45, Williams) reported, "In Iraq, the US military has released five Iraqi women prisoners, among about 400 prisoners being released today and tomorrow. Some believe this release of female prisoners specifically could help secure the freedom of American hostage Jill Carroll, the reporter for the 'Christian Science Monitor' who was kidnapped in Baghdad. For the record, administration officials deny this prisoner release has anything to do with the demands of Carroll's kidnappers."

The New York Times (1/27, Tavernise, 1.19M) adds, "The American military said…the release had been previously scheduled and was unrelated to demands made by the kidnappers of the American journalist Jill Carroll" and that "the review of the Iraqi prisoners' cases came long before the kidnappers set their deadline." There has been no communications by the kidnappers "since their videotape was broadcast by the Arabic network Al Jazeera on Jan. 17."

The Washington Post (1/27, A14, Finer, 744K) adds, "A U.S. official in Baghdad, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the situation, said there was no indication that the women's release would lead to Carroll being freed."

Carroll's Mother Confident Of Imminent Release. The Christian Science Monitor (1/27, 61K) reports, "The mother of one of five Iraqi female detainees released Thursday expressed confidence that American journalist Jill Carroll will be released soon." Siham Faraj, the mother of Hala Khalid Wahid, also said, "I don't think Jill Carroll's situation has anything to do with the release of my daughter, but we definitely feel her pain."

Audit Finds Funds Won't Cover Cost Of Rebuilding Projects In Iraq. The New York Times (1/27, Glanz, 1.19M) reports that the office of the Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction reported that "because of unforeseen security costs, haphazard planning and shifting priorities, the American-financed reconstruction program in Iraq will not complete scores of projects that were promised to help rebuild the country." Of "the 136 projects that were originally pledged to improve Iraq's water and sanitation," just "49…will be finished, with about 300 of an initial 425 projects to provide electricity." The reports concludes "that the overall rebuilding plan was...devised without a clear understanding of the decrepit state of Iraq's infrastructure after decades of war, United Nations-imposed penalties and sheer neglect," and adds that unexpected

"security costs alone do not account for the drop in the number of projects that the United States will be able to finish."

The Washington Times (1/27, Scarborough, 90K) adds, "The assessment is a setback for the Bush administration, which counted on more robust rebuilding across Iraq to help deliver the country from a harsh dictatorship to a prosperous democracy."

Iraqi Minister Of Industry Attacked. The Los Angles Times (1/27, Kraul) "Iraq's minister of industry narrowly escaped an assassination attempt Thursday." Usama Abdulaziz Najafi "was in a convoy on a main highway about 65 miles north of Baghdad when a roadside bomb exploded. The blast engulfed one of the cars in flames, killing three bodyguards and injuring one. The minister was unhurt. The Iraq insurgency has targeted officials at all levels in its attempt to weaken Iraq's emerging democratic government."

Declassified Directive Appears To Prohibit Military From Paying For News Stories. The Los Angles Times (1/27, Mazzetti) reports, "A secret U.S. military program that pays Iraqi newspapers to publish articles favorable to the American mission appears to violate a 2003 Pentagon directive, according to a newly declassified document released Thursday." The top U.S. general in Iraq said "a preliminary investigation into the program," the subject of a high-level military investigation, "had found it did not violate U.S. law or Pentagon regulations." However, "a secret directive on the Pentagon's information operations policy released Thursday…appears to prohibit U.S. troops from conducting psychological operations, or psy-ops, targeting the media."

Top General In Iraq Says US Forces Are Strained But Can Accomplish Mission. USA Today/AP (1/27, Wadhams) reports that Gen. George Casey, the top U.S. commander in Iraq, "acknowledged Thursday that the U.S. Army was stretched, but he insisted forces here were capable of accomplishing their mission." He added that "he had discussed manpower strains with Gen. Peter Schoomaker and that the Army chief of staff feels he can sustain missions around the world." President Bush has "brushed aside talk that the United States could not prevail in Iraq."

The Washington Times/AP (1/27, Wadhams) also ran the AP story.

Reports Suggest Army Unprepared To Fight Another Iraq-Type War. The Christian Science Monitor (1/27, Sappenfield, 61K) reports, "When two major studies released this week questioned whether the US Army is being stretched too thin, they raised a much- repeated concern: that America does not have enough troops to win the war in Iraq. At a deeper level, though, they raise the question of whether today's military is prepared for the threats that could lie ahead in the war on terror." The reports "released this week - one by Mr. Krepinevich; the other by former Defense Secretary William Perry - have suggested that the force is simply not large enough to do what the Defense Department has asked of it," and "some who are familiar with drafts of the coming" Quadrennial Defense Review "suggest that the lessons learned from Iraq have simply heaped more duties - including peacekeeping - on a force already struggling to meet the ones it has."

QDR To Call For Special WMD Task Force. The Washington Times (1/27, Gertz, 90K) reports that part of the Pentagon's Quarterly Defense Review will call for "a special military task force to prevent weapons of mass destruction from being transferred to terrorist groups." According to the Times, "The task force will employ special operations forces, other troops and intelligence personnel to prevent states such as North Korea and Iran from supplying nuclear, chemical and biological weapons to terror groups. The call for the new unit, which would have several hundred troops along with aircraft and other arms, comes as tensions heighten over North Korea's nuclear program and Iran's refusal to abide by international controls on its uranium-enrichment program." The report also cites "evolving" WMD threats, including "electromagnetic pulse weapons, portable nuclear devices, genetically engineered pathogens and new chemical arms." The review is not yet public, the Times says. Additionally, the review advocates "that general-purpose military forces take over the job of foreign military training." Meanwhile, "other key recommendations of the report include increasing special operations forces by 15 percent, creating a Marine Corps special operations command, setting up an Air Force unmanned aerial vehicle squadron, boosting the number of Navy SEAL commando teams and increasing Army psychological operations by 33 percent."

Rand Study Says Most Reservists' Incomes Rose Upon Going To War. The Washington Post (1/27, A21, 744K) reports that a study by Rand Corp.'s National Defense Research Institute "found that 72 percent of the troops surveyed made more while on war duty in 2002 or 2003 than they did in their civilian jobs in 2001. More than half made at least $10,000 more." While "contradicting conventional notions," it also concluded that "a sizable proportion of the reservists -- 28 percent -- lost money, including some who saw their earnings drop by more than 10 percent." Some reasons for the results are "higher salaries, combat pay supplements, family-separation allowances and tax-free earnings." Still, "researchers are working to understand why this study differs dramatically from earlier surveys and anecdotal reports about families struggling to get by when a primary wage earner went to war."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Enron Trial To Begin Monday. The Christian Science Monitor (1/27, Axtman, 61K) reports that the trial of Enron's top two leaders will begin next week as "business and industry groups are mounting a campaign to roll back some of the reforms that the Enron scandal inaugurated. Thus, the lessons of the nation's second-biggest bankruptcy remain in flux and may be determined, in part, by the outcome of the legal drama set to begin." The "details of the lives and business practices of the two men on trial - Enron founder Kenneth Lay and former chief executive Jeffrey Skilling - could provide an inside view of how the nation's second-biggest bankruptcy unfolded."

The New York Times (1/27, Romero, 1.19M) adds that in Houston, "many residents prefer to focus on other things, like the resurgent economy, and city leaders wish outsiders would, too. … But as jury selection starts on Monday, residents here will have to relive the Enron debacle, with the possibility that the trial will drag on over several months." The Times adds, "In preparation for the trial, city officials are trying to accentuate the positive. … The city's economy has grown for 35 consecutive months, according to a monthly survey of purchasing executives conducted by the National Association of Purchasing Management-Houston. November, the most recent month for which statistics are available, was one of the strongest months in a decade, as demand rose for goods like plastic pipes and refined petroleum products."

Enron Task Force Faces Test In Skilling Trial. Texas Lawyer (1/27, Rozen) reports, "When Enron Task Force prosecutors enter U.S. District Judge Sim Lake's courtroom in Houston on Monday for the long-awaited trial of former Enron Corp. Chairman Kenneth Lay and former Chief Executive Officer Jeffrey Skilling, the government lawyers will be toting baggage -- both literal and figurative." Texas Lawyer continues, "In the literal sense, the big criminal trial is document-intensive. In the figurative sense, the government lawyers have stumbled more than once in their four-year pursuit of Enron employees, and that track record follows them into Lake's courtroom." Texas Lawyer adds, "Inarguably, the government lawyers have scored some notable successes by persuading 16 former Enron employees, including former Chief Financial Officer Andrew Fastow, to plead guilty to charges related to the downward financial and stock-price spiral that led to Enron's bankruptcy in December 2001. Most recently, on Dec. 28, 2005, Richard Causey, Enron's former chief accounting officer and Skilling's and Lay's co-defendant, pleaded guilty to one count of securities fraud and agreed to cooperate with prosecutors. [See Causey's plea agreement.] … In an earlier success in November 2004, in United States v. Daniel Bayly, et al., the so-called Nigerian Barge trial, prosecutors persuaded a jury to convict four former Merrill Lynch & Co. bankers and one former Enron executive on charges related to conspiracy to commit wire fraud. … But the government lawyers have also faced setbacks in the courtroom. At the Nigerian Barge trial, one former Enron executive, Sheila Kahanek, was acquitted. Six months later, in May 2005, the U.S. Supreme Court overturned the 2002 conviction of Arthur Andersen, Enron's accounting firm, for obstruction of justice, in United States v. Arthur Andersen LLP. In July 2005, in the so-called Enron Broadband trial, a jury deadlocked in the trial of five former Enron executives, and the proceedings ended in a mistrial. Two months later, U.S. District Judge Vanessa Gilmore blamed the government lawyers trying that case, United States v. Joseph Hirko, et al., for confusion at the trial, and she subsequently acquitted some of the defendants of some of the government's charges."

Oxley, Frank Ask Fannie Mae Board For Rudman Testimony, Report. Dow Jones (1/26) reports, "House Financial Services Chairman Michael Oxley, R- Ohio, and ranking Democrat Barney Frank want former Sen. Warren Rudman to testify before the panel on the results of his 16-month probe of Fannie Mae's accounting troubles, the lawmakers said in a recent letter released Thursday." Dow Jones continues, "Fannie's board of directors hired Rudman, who is expected to complete his report next month, to help the board with its own internal investigation after the Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight accused executives in September 2004 of manipulating accounting rules to massage Fannie's earnings." Dow Jones adds, "In a letter sent last week, Oxley and Massachusetts Rep. Frank asked Fannie Chairman Stephen Ashley for a copy of the much-anticipated report once it's finished, as well as for Rudman's testimony at a hearing they plan to conduct shortly thereafter. … 'The purpose of this hearing will be to fully inform the committee about the findings, conclusions and any recommendations contained in the Rudman report,' the letter said. … The Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight, which oversees Fannie and fellow government-sponsored enterprise Freddie Mac, is expected to issue its own report on Fannie's accounting practices by the end of March." Dow Jones notes, "Rudman, who could not be reached for comment Thursday, recently told Dow Jones Newswires that regulators and law enforcement agencies that are also investigating Fannie will likely receive copies of his report before its public release. In addition to OFHEO, the Securities and Exchange Commission, Justice Department and others have launched their own probes into alleged misconduct at Fannie."

Levitt Says Sarbanes-Oxley Exemption Will Harm Small Companies. Former SEC Chairman Arthur Levitt, who was the chairman of the first White House Conference on Small Business, writes in the Wall Street Journal (1/27, 2.11M), "Currently, the focus of many small-business advocates is the perceived burden placed on them by Section 404 of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act, which requires companies to assess and report the status of their internal controls. They worry that the cost of compliance is onerous, inhibiting their ability to access capital markets and grow. In response, the Securities and Exchange Commission's advisory committee on smaller public companies has recommended that microcap and smaller public companies be exempted from the main parts of 404. … While the advisory committee is well-intentioned, I fear that these proposed changes will harm, not help, small companies."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Bush Says He Does Not Know Abramoff, Won't Release Photos. President Bush fended off reporters' questions yesterday about his ties to Jack Abramoff, saying he does not know the lobbyist. ABC's World News Tonight (1/26, story 4, 1:50, Vargas) reported that Bush was "not so anxious to talk about the scandal surrounding lobbyist Jack Abramoff. And the White House is refusing to make public photos of the now-convicted felon with the President." ABC's chief Washington correspondent George Stephanopoulos: "They are hanging tough. Several news organizations have reported that the photos exist. The President says he'll answer any questions prosecutors ask. But he's not just going to hand over the photos or any other information to reporters."

NBC Nightly News (1/26, story 2, 2:00, Fletcher) also noted, "Mr. Bush was also pressed about why the White House has refused to release photographs showing the President and disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff together." President Bush: "Having my picture taken with someone doesn't mean that I'm a friend with them or know them very well. I've had my picture taken with you…at holiday parties."

USA Today (1/27, Benedetto, Jackson, 2.31M) reports that during a White House news conference, Bush said, "I had my picture taken with him, evidently," adding, "I've had my picture taken with a lot of people. Having my picture taken with someone doesn't mean that I'm a friend with them or know them very well. It's part of the job of the president to shake hands…with people and smile." Bush "acknowledged that photographs of him with Abramoff were taken either at White House parties or political fundraisers, but he said he would not make them public because he feared they would be used for partisan attacks."

Reuters (1/26, Holland) added that Bush said "release of photographs that show him and Abramoff together would be used for 'pure political purposes' by Democrats seeking to tie the lobbyist to the White House. … 'This investigation needs to look into all aspects of his influence on Capitol Hill. And if there are some in the White House, I'm sure they're going to come knock on the doors,' Bush said."

The Washington Post (1/26, Branigin, 744K) reported on its web site that Bush "dismissed the significance" of the photos and "indicated that the White House would continue to oppose releasing the photos, which he said are irrelevant to a federal investigation." Bush "said he has no idea how many photos were taken of him and Abramoff, and he declined to discuss reported meetings that the lobbyist attended with White House staffers. Federal prosecutors are 'welcome' to look into those meetings if they believe they involved improprieties, Bush said."

Knight Ridder (1/27, Douglas) adds, "Administration officials want to keep any Bush-Abramoff pictures from becoming public to avoid giving political opponents ammunition that could hurt Republicans in November's congressional elections. 'Having my picture taken with someone doesn't mean that I'm a friend with them or know them very well. I've had my picture taken with you at holiday parties,' the president reminded reporters. He estimated that he'd posed for about 9,000 photos at receptions this past holiday season alone. 'I'm also mindful that we live in a world in which those pictures will be used for pure political purposes, and they're not relevant to the investigation,' Bush said."

The Los Angeles Times (1/26, Chen, 958K) reported on its web sits, "Bush also rejected the notion of detailing possible contacts between Abramoff and members of the senior White House staff, saying he preferred to let federal prosecutors conduct their own investigation." Bush comments Thursday were "his most extensive remarks to date on the Abramoff scandal." The Times notes that Bush "sounded particularly defensive when reporters pressed him about his contacts with Abramoff."

The New York Times (1/27, Stout, 1.19M) adds that Bush "responded somewhat indirectly when asked if he was afraid to release the pictures of himself and the once-powerful Mr. Abramoff, who has pleaded guilty to conspiracy, fraud and tax evasion and who prosecutors say tried to influence lawmakers and their aides with campaign contributions, lavish trips and meals. 'Having my picture taken with someone doesn't mean that, you know, I'm a friend with them or know them very well,' Mr. Bush said. 'I've had my picture taken with you at holiday parties.' In fact, presidents are often photographed with people whom they know only casually, or hardly at all, including reporters at White House Christmas parties."

Senators Call For Special Counsel In Abramoff Probe. The Washington Times (1/27, Pierce, 90K) reports in its "Inside Politics" column that Sens. Chuck Schumer and Ken Salazar wrote to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to call for the appointment of a special counsel to take over the investigation of the corruption scandal spawned by former lobbyist Jack Abramoff. The switch 'would ensure that the investigation and prosecution will proceed without fear or favor and provide the public with full confidence that no one in this country is above the law,'" they wrote.

The AP (1/27, Espo) reports, "Two Senate Democrats called Thursday for the appointment of a special counsel to take over investigation of the corruption scandal spawned by lobbyist Jack Abramoff. .. The switch 'would ensure that the investigation and prosecution will proceed without fear or favor and provide the public with full confidence that no one in this country is above the law,' Sens. Chuck Schumer of New York and Ken Salazar of Colorado wrote Attorney General Alberto Gonzales." The AP continues, "The two Democrats said that so far, the public integrity section of the Justice Department, which is in charge of the probe, has 'pursued this case appropriately.' … A Justice Department spokesman declined immediate comment." The AP adds, "Schumer and Salazar sent their letter several days after Democrats pressed the White House for information on contacts between the president or other top officials and Abramoff. So far, the White House has refused to release any photographs of the president and the lobbyist together. … In their letter, Schumer and Salazar cited news reports that said that in addition to the presidential photographs, Abramoff organized at least one meeting with White House aides for his clients. … 'These meetings with the president and the White House staff occurred while you were serving as White House counsel,' they wrote Gonzales, who became attorney general a year ago. 'Given the possible ties between Mr. Abramoff and senior government officials, we believe the appointment of a special counsel is not only justified, but necessary.'"

The Denver Post (1/27, Mulkern) reports, "The senators said an independent investigation is necessary because a special counsel could act without either favor from or fear of reprisal from the White House. … 'As a former (state) attorney general, I believe in upholding the law and rooting out corruption,' Salazar said in a statement. 'The American people deserve an open, unbiased investigation into this matter. Appointing a special counsel will begin the process of restoring America's faith in government.' … Added Schumer: 'With public trust in government at very low levels, it is crucial that we remove any appearance of impropriety from the investigation of the Abramoff scandal by appointing a special counsel who is independent of the Bush Administration and the current Justice Department.'"

Smith Disputes Assertions In NYTimes Op-Ed. In a letter to the New York Times (1/27, 1.19M), Rep. Lamar Smith writes, "Re 'If You Give a Congressman a Cookie,' by Norman Ornstein and Thomas E. Mann (Op-Ed, Jan. 19): I am surprised that these Congressional scholars would assert that House roll-call votes are 'frequently' stretched beyond an hour. This happens, on average, less than once per two-year Congressional session. They say that Speaker J. Dennis Hastert 'fired' the chairman of the House ethics committee last year. Under House rules, there was a term limit for all members, including the chairman. Speaker Hastert followed the regular order that these writers claim to cherish in naming a new chairman. They also assert that I and a colleague, who had donated to Representative Tom DeLay's defense fund, were named to the ethics committee 'when the main matter pending before the committee involved' Mr. DeLay. In fact, the committee had publicly announced, in keeping with its normal practice, that it was deferring its one pending DeLay-related matter until the conclusion of the Texas criminal investigation, which continues to this day. Moreover, my colleague and I long ago announced that we will recuse ourselves from any matter related to Mr. DeLay."

Prosecutor In Abramoff Case To Step Down. The New York Times (1/27, Shenon, Bumiller, 1.19M) reports that the Justice Department has announced that Noel L. Hillman, the prosecutor in the Abramoff case, will step down next week because he has been nominated to a federal judgeship by President Bush." The Bush Administration "said that the appointment was routine and that it would not affect the investigation, but Democrats swiftly questioned the timing of the move and called for a special prosecutor."

Libby Lawyers Seek Media Data From Prosecutors. Lawyers for Vice President Dick Cheney's former Chief of Staff Lewis Libby have asked a federal judge to order prosecutors in Libby's case to turn over all documents in his possession related too what journalists knew from any source about intelligence officer Valerie Plame. The New York Times (1/27, Johnston, 1.19M) reports that Libby's lawyers "said in their motion that the prosecutor, Patrick J. Fitzgerald, had refused to turn over to the defense documents that would shed light on whether any reporter knew about" Plame "before her name was first disclosed in a newspaper column on July 14, 2003."

The AP (1/27, Yost) reports that in their 23-page brief, Libby's lawyers argued, "The government should not be allowed to charge Mr. Libby with lying about statements concerning what reporters knew about Ms. Wilson's identity, and at the same time deny him information that may establish one of these possible defenses," adding, "The government has refused to produce information in its possession about what reporters learned from sources other than Mr. Libby about Ms. Wilson's employment status."

Reuters (1/26, Vicini) reported, "The attorneys said the motion concerned their request for documents and information on three important issues: 'What did the press know prior to July 14, 2003, about whether Valerie Plame Wilson worked at the CIA, from whom did they learn it and with whom did they discuss it.' They said turning over the information would enable them to decide the necessity and scope of pretrial subpoenas for journalists and news organizations. The motion made clear that what the reporters knew will be an important part of the defense strategy."

The Washington Post (1/27, A4, Leonnig, 744K) adds, "The defense's goal is to show that Libby was not intentionally lying when he testified that many journalists had known about Plame during the spring and summer of 2003, and that he believed he had learned about her from [Tim] Russert. 'There can be no information more material to the defense of a perjury case than information tending to show that the alleged false statements are, in fact, true or that they could be the result of mistake or confusion,' the lawyers argued in their filing. 'Libby is entitled to know what the government knows.'"

The Wall Street Journal (1/27, Squeo, 2.11M) adds, "While the Justice Department has agreed to turn over information related to reporters' contacts with Mr. Libby, Special Counsel Patrick Fitzgerald has refused to provide material about what reporters might have learned from other sources about Ms. Plame's employment at the CIA, the court filing says. Included in the request is information that may have been shared among reporters or with government officials."

Bhutto Says Arrests Notices Are Politically Motivated. Agence France-Presse (1/27) reports, "Pakistan's former Prime Minister Benazir Bhutto has shrugged off Interpol notices for her arrest and said she is prepared to return to her country to face any charges if compelled by a court." AFP continues, "Interpol had issued the international notices following a request by the Pakistan government for the arrest of Bhutto and her husband on corruption charges, according to officials in Islamabad. … The police body said the so-called 'red notices' were not arrest warrants and that member countries could decide whether to take any action. … 'As far as the red notices are concerned, I learned it from the press, and my lawyers have written to the (Pakistan) Ministry of Interior as well as to Interpol, asking them to confirm whether the news is accurate and if so, on what grounds,' Bhutto told a news conference in Washington. … 'As far as I am concerned, if any court wants me in Pakistan, I am prepared to catch the next plane to Pakistan,' said Bhutto, 53, who led the country twice in the 1980s and 1990s as its first female premier." AFP adds, "Bhutto, who has lived in self-imposed exile in Dubai and London for the past seven years, said the allegations were politically motivated and intended to divert the attention of the Pakistan media from current government problems. … The US Justice Department refused to comment specifically on Bhutto's case but said it generally considered Interpol requests on a case-by-case basis. … 'I wouldn't comment on the specifics of Ms Bhutto's case but generally, the government handles requests from other governments on a case-by-case basis and we make our decisions based on the unique circumstance on any case,' department spokesman Bryan Sierra told AFP. … 'We don't necessarily automatically have to act on them,' he said."

9th Circuit Panel Rules Overseas Sex With Minor Subject To US Regulation. The California Recorder (1/27, Scheck) reports, "Applying the Constitution's commerce clause to international trade can be a difficult task, 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals Judge Margaret McKeown wrote in an opinion Wednesday." The Recorder continues, "So in deciding that a 2003 law prohibiting U.S. citizens from paying minors for sex while overseas is constitutional, McKeown wrote that the court was taking a big-picture look. … 'Instead of slavishly marching down the path of grafting the interstate commerce framework onto foreign commerce, we step back and take a global, commonsense approach,' she wrote." The Recorder adds, "The conclusion? Sex with a minor 'might be immoral and criminal, but it is also commercial' -- and therefore subject to regulation. … McKeown's opinion -- which was joined by 9th Circuit Senior Judge Procter Hug -- didn't sit well with Senior Judge Warren Ferguson. … He said the majority upheld the 2003 law known by the convenient acronym PROTECT (Prosecutorial Remedies and Other Tools to End the Exploitation of Children Today) with logic that could give the U.S. government jurisdiction over your croque monsieur. … 'Under the interpretation of the majority,' he wrote, 'the purchase of a lunch in France by an American citizen who traveled there by airplane would constitute a constitutional act of engaging in foreign commerce.' … Under that scenario, nearly anything a U.S. citizen did in a foreign country could be subject to U.S. regulation, Ferguson continued. 'This observation may seem slightly absurd, but so is the task of trying to show how sexual abuse of a minor overseas by a U.S. citizen constitutes an act of "commerce with foreign nations,"' he said." … The majority opinion is based on last year's Supreme Court opinion Gonzales v. Raich, 125 S.Ct. 2195, which said the commerce clause allows the federal government to prohibit marijuana use in states that have legalized it for medical use."

Convicted Texas Rapist Freed After DNA Exoneration. The AP (1/27) reports, "A man who spent 18 years in prison for sexual assault was freed Thursday after DNA evidence exonerated him, and his brother admitted responsibility for the attack." The AP continues, "DNA testing was not available at Arthur Mumphrey's 1986 trial for the rape of a 13-year-old girl, but recent tests requested by his attorney showed Mumphrey's blood and saliva samples did not match stains on the victim and her clothes. … 'Because of technology we have now, justice was not done 20 years ago,' State District Judge Kathleen Hamilton said." The AP adds, "Mumphrey, 42, had been sentenced to 35 years in prison. … Prosecutor Marc Brumberger apologized to Mumphrey. 'We feel terrible about what happened to you,' he said. … Mumphrey's brother, Charles, confessed to the rape this week while serving time in jail for unauthorized use of a motor vehicle."

Ex-New Jersey AGs Reject Criticism Related To Norcross Probe. The New York Times (1/27, Kocieniewski) reports, "Two former New Jersey attorneys general on Thursday defended their office's investigation into the political dealings of George E. Norcross III, the Democratic power broker. … In a scathing letter dated Tuesday, Christopher J. Christie, the United States attorney for New Jersey, wrote that his office would be unable to bring charges against Mr. Norcross because lawyers for the state attorney general had mishandled their investigation under two administrations before turning it over to his office in 2004." Christie "criticized state prosecutors for deciding not to secretly tape conversations at a Camden County Democratic fund-raiser in 2001, where Mr. Norcross and his associates were expected to discuss a wide variety of political deals. Mr. Christie said that that decision was so inexplicable that it raised the possibility that state investigators were trying to shield political figures. But John J. Farmer Jr., who was attorney general in 2001, called that suggestion 'utter nonsense,'" asserting "that the two assistant attorneys general who led the case were 'professional and 100 percent nonpolitical.'" Christie "also said that former Attorney General Peter C. Harvey erred in 2003 when he agreed to allow two figures in the investigation to plead guilty to tax evasion charges, a deal Mr. Christie said was too lenient to yield meaningful cooperation." But Harvey "said the agreements were fair and helpful. 'These plea agreements were negotiated by experienced former federal prosecutors and helped lead to other convictions in this case,' he said."

Police Say Barry Unable To ID Robbers From Group Of Photographs. The Washington Post (1/27, B8, Wilber) reports, " Police investigating the armed robbery of D.C. Council member Marion Barry recently showed him photographs of two potential suspects, but he was unable to identify the men as his assailants, law enforcement officials said. Last week, detectives showed Barry (D-Ward 8) collections that included photographs of two people they viewed as suspects in the Jan. 2 robbery, officials said. The arrays also included pictures of other people who are similar in appearance but not connected to the crime, the officials said. Barry did not select anyone in the pictures. The two potential suspects were believed to have committed other robberies in the area and resembled the description that Barry provided of his attackers, the officials said." Barry "declined this week to discuss specifics of the investigation, based on the advice of his attorney and requests by police. But he addressed speculation that there could be more to the story than he is letting on. 'The thing that [makes me angry] is that some people say that this was a drug deal gone bad,' Barry said in an interview at his council office Wednesday. 'Why would I report that? That is just crazy. If it is a drug deal gone bad, you don't call the cops.'"

Chicago City Clerk, Three Others Indicted In Hired Truck Probe. The AP (1/27, Robinson) reports, "Chicago's city clerk and four other men were charged Thursday in an eight-count corruption indictment as federal prosecutors pushed ahead with their investigation of payoffs and patronage hiring fraud in the city's government. Those indicted included city Clerk James J. Laski, his political aide, Sam Gammicchia, and John Briatta, a former water department employee who is a brother-in-law of Cook County Commissioner John Daley. John Daley is Mayor Richard M. Daley's brother. The inclusion of a Daley relative in the indictment brought the scandal deeper into the heart of the political organization that has dominated city government in Chicago for years." The Chicago Tribune (1/27, Lighty, O'Connor, 643K) adds that Laski "solicited $50,000 in bribes for steering city trucking business to a lifelong friend who was charged Thursday for the first time, the indictment alleged. The friend, Michael 'Mick' Jones, and his wife, Traci, who wasn't charged," are Laski employees. "Jones recorded several conversations with Laski in 2005 while wearing an FBI wire during a meeting in the basement of Laski's home and during a late summer car trip to a Wisconsin resort the two took at Jones' suggestion, a source close to Laski said." The Chicago Sun-Times (1/27, Warmbir, Novak, Spielman) notes, "Aderman and Jones have been cooperating for months with investigators. Briatta is not."

Chicago Dentist Pleads Not Guilty To Prostitution Ring Charges, Released On Bond. WBBM-TV Chicago (1/26, Parker) reports on its Web site from a story broadcast Thursday, Chicago dentist Dr. Gary Kimmel "was in court Thursday fighting accusations that are spicy enough to make your teeth rattle. … 'Why this case has garnered so much publicity is beyond me, but I guess it's an interesting and salacious story and its a juicy allegation,' said defense attorney Joe Lopez. The FBI is accusing Kimmel of providing Marina City condos and a fleet of expensive cars for an interstate prostitution ring. … In court Thursday, the judge released the dentist on an unsecured $100,000 bond after the dentist pled not guilty to all the charges." WBBM adds, "The defense lawyer concedes that secretly recorded FBI audio tapes may be a problem for Kimmel. In one of them, the dentist seems to endorse an alleged pimp's plan to injure one of his hookers." The AP (1/27) notes, "The case was part of a national investigation dubbed 'Innocence Lost' by prosecutors that resulted in charges in December against alleged ring members in Michigan and Hawaii."

Family Matter Delays FBI Agent's Testimony At Ryan Trial. The AP (1/27, Robinson) reports "George Ryan's racketeering and fraud trial was put on hold Thursday as the prosecution's last major witness," FBI Special Agent Raymond Ruebenson, "who has long been at the heart of the government's seven-year Operation Safe Road," took "personal leave Thursday over a family matter."

Defense Hammers Key Prosecution Witness At Campbell Trial. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (1/27, Suggs, Torpy, 430K) reports, "Former Atlanta Mayor Bill Campbell's defense team warned it would be 'loaded for bear' in cross-examining key prosecution witnesses, and the assault began Thursday. Michael Sullivan, called by prosecutors as a member of Campbell's 'inner circle,' was the first target." Sullivan "testified that a contractor friend of Campbell's indicated to him that he had 'bought' the former mayor. Sullivan was later pounded relentlessly by defense attorney Jerry Froelich, who suggested federal authorities had 'bought' Sullivan's testimony in exchange for not prosecuting him. Unlike when he was questioned by the prosecution, Sullivan at time seemed stricken by amnesia. He did not remember when he got married, divorced or how much he made when employed by the city. Such memory lapses drew snickers from the packed courtroom."

WXIA-TV Atlanta (1/26, Carnes, Christensen) reports on its Web site from a story broadcast Thursday, "During a combative morning…Campbell's defense team contended the evidence being used by the prosecution is flawed and fought to keep it from the jury. … Lawyers on each side argued over the validity of Sullivan's testimony that questioned the legality of Campbell's relationship with former city contractor Rickey Rowe. Rowe died during the federal investigation. Campbell's lawyers said that all testimony about Rowe should be kept out of court because Rowe isn't here to verify conversations that he may or may not have had. In the end, U.S. District Judge Richard Story ruled that the testimony would be allowed."

Convictions Changing Louisianans' Attitudes About Public Corruption. The Los Angeles Times (1/27, Bustillo, 958K) reports, "Joseph Impastato conceded he took the two cashier's checks worth $85,000. The whole thing was captured on tape by the FBI, so it would have been difficult to deny. But it was no kickback, the councilman from St. Tammany Parish said. It was business. … Federal prosecutors are not buying it — and neither apparently is the Louisiana public." The Times adds that "as the state lobbies Washington for more money to rebuild ravaged towns and cities, citizens are realizing that Louisiana's well-earned penchant for dirty politics has exacted a steep price: It has badly damaged the credibility of the recovery effort." The bribery conviction of former Gov. Edwin Edwards was "a major turning point in public attitude." Additionally, "in the last decade Louisiana has seen an attorney general, a congressman, a state Senate president, a federal judge and countless local officials convicted of corruption. Louisiana's last three state insurance commissioners wound up in prison for offenses that include lying to the FBI, accepting $2 million in illegal campaign contributions and taking bribes." US Attorney Jim Letten "sees the convictions as a sign of progress. Wherever he goes, he said, he is greeted by people — black, white, Latino, Asian — who tell him Louisiana needs to clean up its act."

Owner Of Stolen Pollack Painting Gives FBI Name Of Suspect. The AP (1/27, Rubinkam) reports, "The owner of a Jackson Pollock painting stolen from Scranton's Everhart Museum two months ago said he has forwarded the name of his No. 1 suspect to the FBI, and that the person has a connection to the museum. … Everhart spokesman Joe Palumbo said Thursday that museum officials don't believe the theft was perpetrated by anyone affiliated with the museum. … The owner declined to say why he suspects the person whose name he gave the FBI, but said his information is based on official accounts of what happened and his knowledge of the museum's security. An FBI spokeswoman confirmed the agency is investigating but declined to provide details." The AP notes that the museum did not establish the provenance of "Winter in Springs," but "the FBI is going on the assumption that the painting is genuine, FBI spokeswoman Jerri Williams said. … 'We are pursuing it and attempting to identify who is responsible and, if possible, recover the artwork,' Williams said."

Former Mississippi Beef Plant Operator Pleads Guilty To Fraud. The AP (1/27) reports, "Former beef plant operator Richard Hall has agreed to plead guilty to charges of mail fraud and money laundering related to the failure of the state-backed facility in north Mississippi. The FBI and the U.S. attorney's office announced the agreement on Thursday. In federal court in Oxford and state court in Yalobusha County, where the plant was located, Hall pleaded guilty Wednesday to federal and state charges of mail and wire fraud as well as money laundering. No sentencing date has been announced." Hall "admitted to converting $751,000 in public and corporate funds for private use. … Prosecutors said Hall also agreed to cooperate in the continuing investigation of the beef plant."

Former Georgia Library Director Sentenced To Four Years For Embezzlement. The Macon Telegraph (1/27, Crenshaw, 67K) reports, "The former director of the Ocmulgee Regional Library System was sentenced to four years in federal prison Thursday on charges that he stole library funds. David C. Wilson must also pay $264,298 in restitution to the library system and a $75,000 fine, U.S. District Court Judge Dudley Bowen ruled at the end of a half-day hearing. Wilson was library system director from 1982 until 1994, when the FBI and GBI began investigating suspicious expenses. He was convicted in October of five counts of theft and one count of witness tampering."

Massachusetts Investment Adviser Sentenced To 17 Years For Fraud. The Boston Globe (1/25, Kerber, 484K) reports, "A Newton investment adviser was sentenced to 17 years in prison after pleading guilty to fraud charges, federal prosecutors said." T. Gene Gilman "also was sentenced to two years of supervised release and ordered to pay unspecified restitution. According to the Justice Department, Gilman illegally diverted about $12 million of clients' money between 1998 and 2003 to two ventures he operated that eventually failed: a specialty eyewear marketer and a software design firm. Prosecutors said he sent false monthly statements to roughly 55 investors that misrepresented their money was in domestic securities."

Indiana Man Sentenced To 100 Years In Prison For Child Porn Production. The Indianapolis Star (1/20, Penner, 267K) reports, "A Bloomington man who used two girls to create pornography that he sold on the Internet has been sentenced to 100 years in prison." David Andrew Turner "also collected at least 5,000 sexual photos and videos of other children. Susan W. Brooks, U.S. attorney for the Southern District…said prosecutors wanted to ensure that Turner would never be free to prey upon children again. … The sentence was the longest ever meted out for such a crime in the Southern District. Turner must serve at least 85 years of that sentence under federal guidelines." The Star notes, "The investigation was started by the Bloomington Police Department, which collaborated with the FBI because Turner posted -- and sold -- pornographic images via the Internet. Investigators quit counting when they found 5,000 images. They believe Turner had several thousand more."

Getty Museum Director To Meet With Italian Officials About Looted Antiquities. Bloomberg (1/27, Silver) reports, "The J. Paul Getty Museum's new director, Michael Brand, will hold talks in Rome" today "with Italian Culture Ministry officials who are demanding the world's richest art institution return 42 allegedly looted antiquities in its collection, ministry lawyer Maurizio Fiorilli said. … The museum's former antiquities curator, Marion True…is on trial in Rome on charges she acquired illegally excavated ancient art for the Getty. Brand, who was named to the post last year as the Getty began an internal review of its antiquities-acquisition practices, will lead a delegation at the meeting, said Fiorilli, who said there is no room for compromise. 'They should return all the objects,' he said, including 2,500-year-old vases and marble statues. 'The new director is taking a good initiative.'" The AP (1/27, Rogers) notes Band said in a statement yesterday, "The Getty's objective is to develop a fuller sense of all the evidence available regarding the objects in question. We want to be in a better position to continue our dialogue with the Italian government." But Getty spokesman Ron Hartwig "said it was too early to speculate about what, if any, treasures the Getty might return."

US Drops Two Murder Charges Against Alleged Mafia Cops. The New York Daily News (1/26, Marzulli) reports, "The feds have quietly dropped two murder charges against reputed Mafia cops Louis Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa, the Daily News has learned. Sources familiar with the government's strategy insist the evidence against the ex-NYPD detectives in those gangland killings is solid. But a decision was made to streamline the indictment after Brooklyn Federal Judge Jack Weinstein warned prosecutors last June that he would not allow them to call 100 witnesses to testify as they had planned." Newsday (1/27, DeStefano) notes, "A new indictment unsealed Thursday showed that prosecutors, seeking to simplify the trial, have decided to weed out the 1990 murder of union official James Bishop and the 1991 killing of one-time John Gotti crony Bartolomeo 'Bobby' Boriello." Bishop "was killed because he was believed by the mob to have been an informant, said prosecutors. Investigators said Boriello was killed after Eppolito and Caracappa provided information to" Luchese boss Anthony 'Gaspipe' Casso "that the Gambino soldier had threatened him."

Aided By Activists, Inmate Blogs From Death Row. The Washington Post (1/27, B1, Rich) reports, "Vernon Lee Evans Jr. -- amateur advice columnist and convicted murderer -- is scheduled to die next month by lethal injection. He is one of the very few death row inmates to have a blog and, activists say, perhaps the only condemned man worldwide to use a blog to take questions from readers. Activist Ginny Simmons started the blog in March and relayed the questions to Evans, who does not have Internet access. … Though defense attorneys in capital cases have long strived to remind judges and juries that their clients are human beings with lives beyond the crimes they are accused of, Evans's blog is the leading edge of a strategy by death penalty opponents to use new technologies to make the same point to the wider public."

Carjackers Leave Behind Man's Granddaughter. The Washington Post (1/27, B4, Klein) reports that a carjacking victim is "grateful" that carjackers let his granddaughter go. Timothy Anderson left his granddaughter in his car, in the garage "then realized that the door inside the garage of his Clinton home was not secured. As he pulled the house door closed, he heard the engine in his Expedition rev. Then he saw a set of thieves making off with the vehicle, with granddaughter Sydney in the back seat." Anderson "sprinted" after the truck. The Post reports, "The truck then stopped, the back door opened and Sydney hopped out. She ran toward her panicked grandfather. The whole episode took less than 30 seconds." According to the Post report, "Prince George's County police say they believe a set of brazen thieves is targeting people who leave their cars running, a habit that police say is a serious problem in the county."

8-Year-Old Demanded Money Before Girl's Shooting. The Washington Post (1/27, B8, Londoño) reports, "Moments before an 8-year-old boy shot another child at their day-care center this week, he told her to "give me your money," a prosecutor said yesterday. Montgomery County Assistant State's Attorney Karyn McAuliffe provided that account of Tuesday's day-care center shooting in Germantown during an afternoon bond hearing for the boy's father. Prosecutors said the account was based on the police investigation, but they would not elaborate." The boy's father, Hall, "was charged with five weapons offenses," while the boy, "has been charged as a juvenile with assault, assault while in possession of a firearm and reckless endangerment, among other counts." According to the article, "The boy shot the Taurus revolver while it was still in his backpack. One of the five bullets in the gun tore through the backpack and penetrated the girl's arm. The victim, who has not been identified by police, was released Wednesday night from Children's Hospital in the District. Prosecutors said they do not believe that the girl, a second-grader at S. Christa McAuliffe Elementary School, was targeted. They said it remains unclear to what extent the shooting was accidental."

Judge Increases Child Molester's Sentence From 60 Days To 3-10 Years. The Washington Times (1/27) reports, "A judge vilified as soft on crime by Web loggers, TV commentators and politicians for giving a child molester just 60 days in jail increased the sentence yesterday to three to 10 years behind bars. Vermont District Judge Edward Cashman said he decided to impose the longer sentence because state officials reversed course and agreed to provide sex-offender treatment to Mark Hulett in prison. When the judge imposed the original sentence on Jan. 4, Hulett had been ruled ineligible for treatment until he got out of prison. Judge Cashman said the lighter sentence was the only way to ensure that Hulett got prompt treatment. Hulett, 34, pleaded guilty to charges that he had sexual contact with a girl during a four-year period, beginning when she was 6."

Guard Wounded in Hospitalized Inmate's Attempted Escape. The Washington Times/AP (1/27, Dishneau) reports, "A hospitalized state prison inmate shot and critically wounded the correctional officer guarding his room yesterday, then used the officer's gun to force a cabbie to drive him on a chase that ended with the inmate's arrest, state police and prison officials said. The 44-year-old officer was in critical condition at Washington County hospital, where the attack occurred at about 5 a.m., authorities said. They said he was shot in the face but gave no other information about his injuries. … Corrections Commissioner Frank C. Sizer Jr. identified the inmate as Brandon Morris, 20, who was serving an eight-year sentence at the nearby, medium-security Roxbury Correctional Institution for assault, robbery and handgun violations in Baltimore."

CIVIL LAW:

FTC Settles With ChoicePoint. Several media outlets report on ChoicePoint's settlement with the Federal Trade Commission over security breaches that exposed data to possible identity theft following its announcement of the breach in February.

ABC's World News Tonight (1/26, story 7, 0:10, Vargas) reported, "The US Government today reached a settlement with the data gathering company Choicepoint after thieves broke into its data bank. Choicepoint agreed to pay $15 million and put checks in place to prevent future breaches. Last year, thieves gained access to a data bank with the records of 160,000 consumers. The government says the identities of 800 people were stolen."

NBC Nightly News (1/26, story 5, :45, Williams) reported, "There's news on the continuing problem of identity theft in this country. The Federal Trade Commission announced the biggest fine ever against Choicepoint. That's the company that maintains the huge database of personal financial information and had a big security breach last year. They'll pay a $10 million fine plus $5 million in reparations to the 163,000 people whose personal information was compromised."

Several newspapers report that ChoicePoint will pay a $10 million federal fine and $5 million into a fund to compensate people who suffered damage because of the security breaches, in addition to setting up new procedures to prevent data theft. All also note that ChoicePoint did not admit any wrongdoing in the settlement. All articles quote privacy advocates, who generally approve of the settlement. All articles also touch on the larger issue of data privacy and data theft.

The Wall Street Journal (1/27, Conkey, Carrns) reports, "ChoicePoint, based in Alpharetta, Ga., also must revamp the way it screens customers, implement new information-handling procedures and obtain independent security audits every other year until 2026. FTC Chairman Deborah Platt Majoras said the agreement provides 'an opportunity for ChoicePoint to get data security right.' She also said that to reduce fraudulent access to its vast database, company representatives will visit most subscribers to check who is using its services."

USA Today (1/27, Swartz) reports, "The FTC says about 800 people have been victimized by identity theft stemming from the breach, but more would be eligible for compensation as cases arise. The FTC says it is establishing a fund and will develop a plan to get compensation to victims. ChoicePoint, citing the Los Angeles County district attorney, says there have been only 16 known instances of ID theft. The hefty fine sends a strong message to companies that handle the data of millions of Americans, privacy experts say." USA Today also offers background on the identity theft issue, saying, "At least 130 reported breaches exposed more than 55 million Americans to ID theft last year, sparking consumer advocates' calls for federal oversight of loosely regulated data-brokers."

Under the headline "Record Find For Data Breach," the Washington Post (1/27, D1, Mohammed) reports, "The Federal Trade Commission, which said the fine was the largest civil penalty it had ever imposed, said ChoicePoint violated consumers' privacy and breaking federal laws by mishandling the information and misleading people about its privacy policy. … The ChoicePoint case has galvanized public concerns both about the ease with which personal information can be bought and sold and about the lax security procedures at data brokers that last year alone led to security breaches affecting tens of millions of people." The Washington Post also says, "ChoicePoint told about 145,000 people in February that their personal information was obtained from the company by suspected criminals who masqueraded as legitimate businesspeople. Later in the year, it told another 17,000 people that information such as their names, addresses, dates of birth, Social Security numbers and summary credit information had been compromised. The FTC said the incidents led to at least 800 cases of identity theft, which has been the top type of consumer complaint logged by the agency for the past six years."

The New York Times (1/27, Zeller) carries reactions from players on several sides of the debate. Lydia Barnes, director of the FTC's Bureau of Consumer Protection, says, "The No. 1 point of this case is that companies that maintain sensitive personal information must employ reasonable safeguards. … That should be fundamental in this day and age.'" The Times also quotes Chris Jay Hoofnagle of the Electronic Privacy Information Center, who says it's an "important settlement" that "makes it clear that companies have to take information security more seriously." Meanwhile, James Lee, ChoicePoint's chief marketing officer, says, "We certainly support the settlement, and we believe its provisions are the right things to do and in the spirit of the changes we've already been making over the last year." The Times also reports that "Senator Charles E. Schumer, a Democrat from New York, who, along with Senator Bill Nelson, a Democrat from Florida, introduced one of the most comprehensive data security bills last year, thought the settlement was not punitive enough."

ChoicePoint Ignored "Obvious Red Flags.". The New York Times (1/27, Zeller) includes some background on the FTC's complaint against ChoicePoint. The Times reports, "In its complaint against ChoicePoint, the F.T.C. claimed that the company did not have 'reasonable procedures' in place to screen would-be subscribers to its databases and that in this case, the applications for access made by the fake businesses should have raised 'obvious red flags,'" such as "when an apartment number or a commercial mail drop was given as a business address, or when cellphone numbers were provided as a 'business's sole telephone number,' according to the agency's complaint" This "sloppiness" ultimately allowed credit histories "to fall into the hands of the fraudulent businesses," violating the Fair Credit Reporting Act, the New York Times says.

ChoicePoint Income, Stock Price Take Hits. The Wall Street Journal (1/27, Conkey, Carrns) reports, "ChoicePoint yesterday said fourth-quarter net income fell 29% to $27.7 million, or 30 cents a share, from $39.2 million, or 43 cents a share, a year earlier. The company took an $8 million pretax charge for the FTC settlement and another $5.3 million in charges for other costs, including legal expenses related to the breach, which overall crimped profit by 14 cents a share. For the full year, ChoicePoint said net income fell 4.9% to $140.7 million, or $1.53 a share, from $148 million, or $1.62 a share, the prior year. In 4 p.m. New York Stock Exchange composite trading yesterday, ChoicePoint shares sagged $3.35, or 7.2%, to $42.95."

ChoicePoint Still Faces SEC Inquiry. The Wall Street Journal (1/27, Conkey, Carrns) says, "[T]he company still faces an investigation by the Securities and Exchange Commission into trading in ChoicePoint stock by Mr. Curling and Chief Executive Derek Smith prior to the company's disclosure of the breach. The two realized a combined profit of $16.6 million from selling company shares in the months after it learned of the breach. The company has said the sales were proper and part of a pre-approved plan. A ChoicePoint spokesman said that neither Mr. Smith nor Mr. Curling was available late yesterday to comment on the SEC inquiry. The spokesman noted that Mr. Smith has said he expects the outcome of the inquiry to be 'favorable' to himself and ChoicePoint." USA Today (1/27, Swartz) and the Washington Post (1/27, D1, Mohammed) also mentioned the SEC inquiry.

Southern Illinois U Mulls Changes To Fellowships. The Chicago Tribune (1/26, Cohen, Report) reports, "Facing pressure from the U.S. Justice Department, Southern Illinois University officials are considering changes to three minority and female fellowships that the government has charged discriminate against white and male graduate students." The Tribune continues, "University administrators discussed the possible changes, proposed by the government last week, with student and faculty leaders at closed-door meetings Wednesday. … Though negotiations are continuing, a university Web site already says that the fellowships have been 'extensively revised' and are open to a broader group of students. University officials said the Web site changes weren't authorized. … The board of trustees will likely decide whether to accept the government's proposals within the next few weeks, a move that would delay a threatened lawsuit."

The Chicago Sun-Times (1/26, Newbart) reports, "Officials at Southern Illinois University presented a proposed consent decree to faculty and student leaders Wednesday, seeking to ward off a proposed federal lawsuit that would charge the school with discriminating against whites and others. … Officials would not say just what was being proposed in the consent decree, which came after two months of negotiations with the U.S. Justice Department. The department had threatened to sue the school on grounds that three of its minority fellowship programs discriminated against whites, males and non-preferred minorities. … However, changes in the descriptions of those fellowships had been removed from the school's Web site Wednesday."

Two Charged With Hate Crime With Mercury In Ohio. The AP (1/27) reports, "Two men accused of putting poisonous mercury on an interracial couple's porch have been charged with a hate crime, according to a media report." The AP continues, "Joseph Kuzlik, 56, and David Fredericy, 49, were each charged with conspiracy to violate civil rights, making false statements and criminal interference with housing rights. Both men pleaded innocent Wednesday in U.S. District Court in Cleveland, The Plain Dealer newspaper reported. … 'Allegations of hate crime strike at the heart of our community and cannot be tolerated,' Greg White, the U.S. attorney in Cleveland, said, according to the report." The AP adds, "Kuzlik is accused of acting as a lookout in February while Fredericy put an undisclosed amount of mercury on and around the porch of the unidentified couple's home in Cleveland's Slavic Village neighborhood, where the men also live. … The men are accused of lying when they told Environmental Protection Agency employees who cleaned up the mercury that they did not know how the mercury got on their neighbors' porch."

Student Claims Gender Bias In Complaint Against Massachusetts School. The Washington Times (1/27, Wetzstein) reports, "Female high school students are treated more leniently and are less likely to be punished than their male peers, a 17-year-old Massachusetts senior says in a federal complaint about gender bias at his school. 'The system is designed to the disadvantage of males,' Doug Anglin, a student at Milton High School in Milton, Mass., told the Boston Globe this week. 'From the elementary level, they establish a philosophy that if you sit down, follow orders and listen to what they say, you'll do well and get good grades. Men naturally rebel against this.' … The complaint cites 'statistical anomalies' in males' grades and standardized testing performance, as well as 'a generalized perception' that male and female students are treated differently by the mostly white, female teaching staff, Gerald Anglin said yesterday. … A Department of Education spokesman said the agency received the complaint but had no further comment." The Times also cited its own earlier report on "the issue of male 'academic underachievers.'" According to the Times, "Studies show that boys receive most of the "D" and "F" grades, create 80 percent of classroom discipline problems, account for 80 percent of high school dropouts and make up less than 44 percent of the college population. Suggested solutions include making classrooms smaller and more action-oriented, and teaching boys and girls separately."

Court-Martial Of Naval Academy Teacher Delayed. The Washington Times (1/27, Gertz, Scarborough, 90K) reports in its "Inside the Ring" column, "The U.S. Navy-Marine Corps Court of Criminal Appeals has ordered a delay in the court-martial of a Naval Academy teacher who used salty language in front of a female midshipman. The trial at the Washington Navy Yard had been scheduled to begin next week for Lt. Bryan D. Black. But his attorney, Charles Gittins, filed an appeal after the trial judge rejected his argument that the school's superintendent, Vice Adm. Rodney P. Rempt, should be removed as the officer overseeing the case. Adm. Rempt, who is in the midst of a 'no tolerance' campaign against sexual harassment at the Annapolis campus, ordered Lt. Black's court-martial, overruling an investigative officer who recommended counseling, not criminal charges. Mr. Gittins says Adm. Rempt has too much of a stake in seeing Lt. Black punished. He says a new admiral should be named as the convening authority. The appeals court will entertain written arguments from the defense and prosecution, and then likely hand down a ruling next month."

Alabama, Georgia Democrats Push Bible Classes In Public Schools. Democratic lawmakers in Georgia and Alabama are promoting Bible classes in the public schools, an idea usually pushed by conservative Republicans. The New York Times (1/27, Kirkpatrick, 1.19M) reports, 'Their Republican opponents are in turn denouncing them as 'pharisees,' a favorite term of liberals for politicians who exploit religion. Democrats in both states have introduced bills authorizing school districts to teach courses modeled after a new textbook, 'The Bible and Its Influence.' It was produced by the nonpartisan, ecumenical Bible Literacy Project and provides an assessment of the Bible's impact on history, literature and art that is academic and detached, if largely laudatory. The Democrats who introduced the bills said they hoped to compete with Republicans for conservative Christian voters." The Times adds, "Democrats in other states are moving in the same direction, jumping into a conversation about religion and values that some party leaders began after the 2004 election, when President Bush and the Republicans rode those themes to victory."

AMC Closes Deal To Purchase Loews Cineplex. The AP (1/27, Twiddy) reports, "AMC Entertainment Inc. on Thursday said it had completed its purchase of Loews Cineplex Entertainment Corp., strengthening its position as the nation's second-largest theater operator." The AP continues, "The Kansas City-based company now will operate 415 theaters with 5,672 screens in 29 states and the District of Columbia and 11 foreign countries. Annual revenues for the privately held company are expected to be around $2.4 billion. … Financial terms for the deal were not released." The AP adds, "AMC and Loews agreed last year to sell 10 theaters with 120 screens to resolve consolidation concerns by the Justice Department and attorneys general in California, Illinois, Massachusetts, New York, Washington state and the District of Columbia. The theaters are in Chicago, New York City, Boston, San Francisco, Seattle, Dallas and Washington, D.C. … Before the acquisition, AMC operated 226 theaters with 3,522 screens, while Loews, based in New York City, operated 198 theaters with 2,235 screens."

EU Official Says Microsoft May Face Fine Despite Access Offer. The AP (1/27, Ames) reports, "Microsoft Corp.'s new offer to let competitors examine some of the blueprints to its Windows operating system may not end the threat of daily $2.36 million fines in the European Union's antitrust case, an EU spokesman said Thursday. … 'It would be premature to conclude that offering access to source codes would necessarily resolve the problem of compliance,' said EU antitrust spokesman Jonathan Todd." The AP continues, "Todd said EU antitrust officials await details from Microsoft before making a decision. … 'So far all we have received is the press release,' he said." The AP adds, "Responding to a 2004 EU antitrust ruling, Microsoft in December offered rivals thousands of pages of documentation and free technical support to help competitors make their software compatible with Windows-based servers, which power Web sites and other Internet services. … But an independent monitor called the documents 'totally unfit.' The European Commission then threatened to fine Microsoft up to $2.36 million a day, retroactive to Dec. 15, saying the software giant was proving intransigent about sharing data with competitors."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Three Alleged ELF Activists Plead Not Guilty To Ecoterror Charges. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (1/27, Thompson) reports alleged ELF activists Eric McDavid, Zachary Jensen and Lauren Weiner "pleaded not guilty Thursday to conspiring to attack government targets…and bail was set" at $1.2 million for Weiner. "Prosecutors said all three should be held as flight risks and dangers to the community. U.S. Magistrate Judge Gregory

Hollows ordered McDavid and Jensen held in Sacramento County Jail without bond." The AP adds, "Hollows noted that the government has audio and video surveillance, notes, an anarchists' cookbook seized from the suspects, and the account of a paid FBI informant who lived with the group in a cabin rented and wired by the FBI. … But Hollows found little evidence supporting prosecutors' contention that the three were affiliated with either ELF or the similarly shadowy Animal Liberation Front, though he said they may have shared the same goals." The Sacramento Bee (1/27, Walsh, 301K) notes, "While it is not in the indictment, other court papers filed by the government say the trio planned to publicly proclaim after the arson campaign that it was carried out in the name of the Earth Liberation Front, a movement advocating violent criminal acts against what its followers believe are symbols of the destruction and exploitation of the environment."

BP Could Face Criminal Charges In Fatal Texas Refinery Explosion. Reuters (1/27, Baltimore) reports, "The U.S. government is pursuing charges against BP related to an explosion last year that killed 15 workers at its giant Texas refinery, sources familiar with the matter said on Thursday." Reuters continues, "The case could result in civil or criminal charges against BP, and the company could face millions of dollars in fines, one source said. … The Environmental Protection Agency and Justice Department are pressing an enforcement case against BP related to the March 23 blast at the Texas City, Texas refinery, said the sources, who spoke on condition of anonymity." Reuters adds, "The blast at the 460,000 barrel per day facility also injured 170 people and rattled buildings as far as five miles away. … An EPA spokeswoman referred queries to the Justice Department, where a spokeswoman declined to comment. … Last year the U.S. Department of Labour said it had asked the Justice Department to consider bringing criminal charges against BP."

West Virginia Governor Signs New Mine Safety Regulations. The AP (1/26) reported that West Virginia Gov. Joe Manchin has signed new mine safety regulations into law. The new regulations require better communications, underground oxygen supplies and faster emergency responses and Manchin says they will "help prevent tragedies like the two that killed 14 miners this month." The AP added, "The state's new mine safety law mandates that miners be provided with emergency communicators and tracking devices. It also requires mine operators to store extra air supplies underground, and sets up a new Mine and Industrial Accident Rapid Response System and statewide all-hours hot line to trigger rescue efforts more quickly."

Administration Offers Rules For Data Collected From Pesticide Tests On Humans. The Washington Post (1/27, A12, Eilperin, 744K) reports, "The Bush Administration issued yesterday the first-ever federal rules governing the use of information collected in tests that expose human subjects to toxic pesticides. The new regulations -- which drew praise from pesticide manufacturers and criticism from environmentalists and congressional Democrats -- would prohibit the intentional dosing of pregnant women and children with such poisons, and would establish an independent board to screen proposed studies."

Alaskans Push For Pipeline Construction. A front page story in the Wall Street Journal (1/27, Gold, 2.11M) reports, "In many parts of the U.S., community leaders and local politicians are fighting to halt energy projects or at least put them in someone else's neighborhood. What's occurring in Alaska is the polar opposite. The majority of Alaskans are great enthusiasts of energy development. The federal government estimates there may be 100 trillion cubic feet of gas in the North Slope, where Alaska meets the Beaufort Sea nearly 300 miles north of the Arctic Circle. … But no gas is leaving the North Slope, even though natural gas prices in the last year have been higher than ever. Exxon Mobil Corp., BP PLC and ConocoPhillips, which have leased drilling rights in Alaska for decades, haven't been in a hurry to get that gas to market. They're currently negotiating to build a pipeline through Canada to the American Midwest but construction on that massive project isn't likely to start for years. Meanwhile, Alaskans are running out of natural gas. … Faced with a vigorous campaign to jump-start the pipeline, the oil companies are in the unusual position of counseling patience. Moving too quickly on their preferred $25 billion pipeline through Canada, one of the largest construction projects in the history of North America, would be disastrous, they say."

Congress Urged To Take Action Against Exporting Electronics Waste. Author Elizabeth Royte in an op-ed in the New York Times (1/27, 1.19M) writes, "Electronic waste is now considered the fastest-growing segment of the municipal waste stream in the United States. … As awareness of the hazards of e-waste rises, more states will ban it from landfills. But keeping toxic trash from our dumps won't mean a thing if we don't forbid the export of hazardous material to countries without enforceable environmental regulations." Royte concludes, "To halt this environmental injustice…the federal government needs to restrict the use of hazardous materials in computers, require manufacturers to put in place recycling programs (it will be a lot cheaper and safer to recycle this stuff once the toxics are out) and ban hazardous waste exports."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Tunnel, Two Tons Of Marijuana Found In California; Cartel Suspected. There was widespread media coverage of the cross-border tunnel and marijuana found near the Tijuana, Mexico, airport. More than 300 news items related to the story turned up in various Internet searches. Prominent examples follow: The AP (1/27, Press) reports, "Authorities said they discovered more than two tons of marijuana in a cross-border tunnel that began near the Tijuana airport and ended inside a warehouse on the U.S. side. The 2,400-foot long passageway is longer than most of the 21 cross-border tunnels that have been discovered since authorities began keeping track after the Sept. 11 attacks, U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement officials said. … John Fernandes, special agent in charge of the Drug Enforcement Administration's San Diego office, said he suspected the tunnel was the work of Tijuana's Arellano-Felix drug smuggling syndicate or another well-known drug cartel. He said tougher enforcement aboveground had forced smugglers to dig below. … The tunnel exited into a large, two-story white cinderblock warehouse in an industrial San Diego neighborhood near the border." The AP story was widely posted on Web sites and/or published in newspapers of media outlets that include Forbes, the San Francisco Chronicle, San Luis Obispo Tribune, Arizona Daily Star, Kansas City Star, and the UK's Guardian.

Reuters (1/27) reports, "The U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA) found 200 pounds (90 kg) of marijuana on the U.S. side, while Mexican authorities said they discovered 2 tons of the drug on that side of the border. Because of the sophistication of the tunnel, the DEA is investigating major drug cartels. 'We know it's been used for drug traffic but this really illustrates the dangers and risks of security to Americans,' said John Fernandez, special agent at the DEA in San Diego."

The San Diego Union-Tribune (1/26, Soto, Berestein) reports, "Authorities said the elaborate tunnel bore the hallmarks of Mexican drug cartels, which have spent millions of dollars in the last 15 years to find a way to move contraband across the border. … 'We have a tunnel and it's massive,' said Lauren Mack, a spokeswoman with U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, which was investigating the tunnel with agents from the Border Patrol and the Drug Enforcement Administration."

The New York Times (1/27, Archibold) reports, "Drug smugglers have dug one of the longest, most sophisticated tunnels discovered in recent years along the Mexican border, and the American and Mexican authorities have hauled nearly two tons of marijuana out of it since they entered it on Wednesday, officials said." Stretching from "a warehouse near the international airport in Tijuana, Mexico, to a vacant industrial building in Otay Mesa, Calif.," the tunnel's sophistication has "surprised officials, who found it outfitted with a concrete floor, electricity, lights and ventilation and groundwater pumping systems. … 'The tunnel is absolutely amazing,' said Michael Unzueta, special agent in charge for the federal Immigration and Customs Enforcement agency's San Diego office."

The Los Angeles Times (1/26, Marosi) writes, "Four tunnels have been discovered in the San Diego area this month. Also Wednesday, a crudely built, unfinished tunnel was discovered when a border patrol agent ran over a sinkhole near the San Ysidro Port of Entry."

AFP (1/27) reports, "The secret route is cut 26 metres below ground, directly under a heavily protected sector of the frontier and is much larger than the 21 others detected under the border since the September 11, 2001 terror attacks on US soil, US officials said."

CNN (1/26) reports on its Web site, "DEA and U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement agents discovered the tunnel Wednesday night. It runs from Tijuana, Mexico, to Otay Mesa, California. … Made of concrete, the passageway had lighting, electricity, ventilation and a pump to remove water, said Lauren Mack, a spokeswoman for Immigration and Customs Enforcement. … More than 20 cross-border tunnels have been uncovered in California and Arizona since 9/11, she added. 'We've now got a dedicated tunnel task force, which works with the DEA and border patrol to proactively look for tunnels,' Mack said."

UPI (1/27) cites the CNN story on the discovery of the tunnel and marijuana.

Proliferation Of Tunnels Seen As Result Of Increased Border Security. The Washington Post (1/27, A3, Pomfret) reports "experts said the passageway bore all the hallmarks of an operation by a major drug cartel." Unzueta said, "Whether they are designed to smuggle drugs, people, weapons or other contraband, these tunnels pose a threat to our nation's security." The Post continues, "Federal agents have concluded that drug traffickers and smugglers of illegal immigrants have been heading underground to escape tighter enforcement along the border. Customs officials announced this week that drug seizures at California border crossings rose 24 percent in the past fiscal year. More than 127 tons of drugs were seized, the vast majority of that marijuana, in the year ending Sept. 30." The Post also reports that Michael Unzueta, special agent in charge for U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement in San Diego "said most of the tunnels have been located in the San Diego area because the composite soil of that region is ideal for such work. From 1990 to 2001, 15 tunnels were unearthed. Unzueta said that a year ago, agents from his agency, the Drug Enforcement Administration and U.S. Customs and Border Protection's Border Patrol unit formed the San Diego Tunnel Task Force, with the aim of unearthing the networks."

The Washington Times (1/27, Seper) reports, "Since the September 11 attacks, federal authorities have discovered more than 20 cross-border tunnels along the US-Mexico border in California and Arizona. Authorities said they were unsure how long the tunnel had been in operation. They also said they did not know what drug organization might have used it. … In July 2003, members of the Tijuana-based Arellano-Felix Organization were indicted for conducting an illegal enterprise through a pattern of racketeering activity, conspiracy to import and distribute cocaine and marijuana, and money laundering. After a request by the DEA, the State Department issued rewards totaling $16 million for information leading to the arrest of five leaders of the organization who remain at large: Javier Arellano-Felix, Eduardo Arellano-Felix, Manuel Aguirre-Galindo, Gustavo Rivera-Martinez and Gilberto Higuera-Guerrero."

Network TV Coverage. ABC World News Tonight (1/26, story 6, 1:50, Vargas) reported, "In California, a secret tunnel used to smuggle drugs and people under the border has been uncovered. It's just one of many found in recent years. Officials say criminals are increasingly digging tunnels to bypass border patrols and move their contraband into the US." ABC (Thomas): "The DEA says it was a major gateway for illegal immigrants and drugs coming from Mexico." DEA Chief of Operations Michael Braun: "These tunnels are absolutely critical to these major drug-trafficking organizations and alien smuggling groups. Arms smuggling groups." Thomas: "US officials say the border has become ground zero for an explosion in illegal activity. Washington is now leaning heavily on Mexico to help put a stop to it." US Border Patrol Chief David Aguilar: "We have gotten a commitment to work with us on this. We have gotten a commitment to find out and get to the bottom of this." Thomas: "Before tons more illegal drugs find their way across the border."

CBS Evening News (1/26, 6:30, Schieffer) reported, "Imagine their amazement when U.S. agents discovered a tunnel almost a mile long and 60 feet deep below the U.S.-Mexico border. And that was not the only surprise -- inside the tunnel, more than two tons of marijuana. The tunnel stretches from near the Tijuana airport to a California warehouse, and it has a cement floor, lights, pulleys and a ventilation system."

NBC Nightly News (1/26, story9, :45, Williams) reported, "Out of California a big discovery to report a drug tunnel that authorities say runs the length of 12 football fields from Mexico into California, it's a tunnel so big the federal government says you can drive a car through it. The tunnel begins in a warehouse in Tijuana, ends in the San Diego area, it's used apparently for smuggling people and/or drugs. US officials say they found more than two tons of marijuana inside."

Cable TV Coverage. CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (1/26, Dobbs) reported, 'Tonight, homeland security officials say they have shut down the largest border tunnel ever discovered on the US-Mexican border. … Police were first tipped off to it…two years ago. They finally found it."

MSNBC's Abrams Report (1/26, 6:00 p.m.) reported, "A half-mile long tunnel under Mexico's border with California [was found]. [Authorities] found more than two tons of marijuana inside that tunnel."

Local TV Coverage. Local TV stations around the country devoted significant coverage to the tunnel. Most of the coverage provided details about what was found in the tunnel. Some examples: WRDW-TV Augusta, Georgia (1/26, 11:18 p.m.) showed John Fernandez of the DEA saying, "When we find these tunnels, we are very concerned about national security." The station continued, "Forensic experts are now combing the entire passageway to try to determine if humans and weapons were also transported through the shaft." The station then showed Fernandez saying. "It's the organization that we want to dismantle, to gut their infrastructure." The station added, "Investigators say they have a tough job ahead of them because the sophistication of the tunnel likely indicates how sophisticated the organization is that had it built."

KESQ-TV Palm Springs (1/26, 5:05 p.m.) reported that authorities don't know how long the tunnel has "been in operation, but [they] say it appears to be the work of the Mexican drug cartels." This station also showed John Fernandez of the DEA discussing the tunnel. Fernandez said, "The sophistication of the tunnel indicates the sophistication of the organization. So we can attribute it to the Arellano-Felix Organization and the other infamous usual suspects." The station added, "21 tunnels have been discovered in California and Arizona since September 11th."

KCNC-TV Denver (1/26, 4:33 p.m.) reported, "The Drug Enforcement Agency and Customs agents unearthed a tunnel" with drugs inside it that ran "almost a mile long."

WTVF-TV Nashville (1/26, 5:17 p.m.) reported, "The Drug Enforcement Agency Says the tunnel was discovered last night in Mexico."

KSTP-TV Minneapolis (1/26, 10:14 p.m.) said "drug enforcement agents uncovered an elaborate tunnel where two tons of marijuana was discovered. It stretches more than 2,400 feet between Mexico and the United States."

WAGA-TV Atlanta (1/26, 6:45 p.m.) reported, "More than two tons of marijuana were found inside a tunnel connecting the US and Mexico. Customs agents say the tunnel is concrete, about five feet wide and tall enough for an adult to stand in. They say smugglers use the tunnel to transport drugs and perhaps even people."

KCAL-TV Los Angeles (1/26, 8:08 p.m.) said, "The tunnel has lights, ventilation, and a pumping system to get ground water out. Inside, Mexican investigators found two tons of marijuana worth millions on the street."

KCBS-TV Los Angeles (1/26, 6:01 p.m.) reported, "US law enforcement says it's the largest [tunnel] ever found on the border." The "Border Patrol spotted the tunnel and called Mexican police."

KGTV-TV San Diego (1/26, 6:32 p.m.) said, "You can see this building is still guarded by Border Patrol agents and members of the Drug Enforcement Agency."

KUSA-TV Denver (1/26, 10:09 p.m.) said the entrance to the tunnel "was found near the Tijuana airport, the exit in San Diego in an industrial neighborhood. … The tunnel has electricity, a pulley system and is wide enough to accommodate a small car."

KDFW-TV Dallas (1/269:24 p.m.) reported, "This is the fourth tunnel uncovered in that area this month and the longest one found so far."

KOMO-TV Seattle (1/26, 11:18 a.m.) added that no arrests have been made after the discovery of the tunnel.

KTVU-TV San Francisco (1/26, 6:06 p.m.) reported, "The discovery prompted the US Attorney's Office and San Diego to launch a criminal investigation."

Eight More "Lively Green" To Plead Guilty To Drug Trafficking Charges. The AP (1/27) reports, "Five more members of the U.S. military and three other suspects have agreed to plead guilty in a drug smuggling sting case targeting military members who believed they were smuggling cocaine through Arizona. The pleas bring the total number of people admitting guilt in the case to 44, most of whom were members of the regular Army or Air Force or the Arizona National Guard. The U.S. Attorney's Office said the five, four Army National guard soldiers and one airman, pleaded guilty to conspiracy to accept cash bribes from people they believed to be narcotics traffickers. In addition, two civilians and an officer with the Arizona Department of Corrections. In fact, the traffickers were FBI agents working a sting operation called 'Lively Green.'" KOLD-TV Tucson (1/26) also reports the plea agreements, noting, "The FBI investigated the operation for two years."

Mexican Official Suggests Border Incursion Was Lively Green-Style Operation. The AP (1/27, Stevenson) reports, "Mexico's foreign secretary suggested Thursday that uniformed men using a military-style Humvee to help drug traffickers on the border could have been U.S. soldiers or criminals disguised as Mexican troops." Luis Ernesto Derbez said that U.S. Ambassador Tony Garza's "strongly worded statement asking the Mexican government to 'fully investigate'" the incident were "out of line." Derbez referred "to an FBI drug sting dubbed Operation Lively Green, in which more than a dozen U.S. military and civilian government workers were arrested in southern Arizona. … 'Members of the U.S. Army have helped protect people who were processing and transporting drugs,' Derbez told a news conference. 'And just as that has happened ... it is very probable that something like that could have happened, that in reality they (the uniformed men at the border) were members of some of their groups disguised as Mexican soldiers with Humvees.'"

Reporting Continues On Plot To Kill DEA Agent. The Washington Times (1/27, Seper) reports, "Federal authorities have arrested two Louisiana men, including an inmate in the Tangipahoa Parish Prison near New Orleans, in a $15,000 assassination plot to kill a U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration agent. Johnnie Sims was arrested Wednesday night as he attempted to hire a hit man to kill DEA Agent Chad Scott, said William J. Renton Jr., special agent in charge of the DEA's New Orleans field office. Chris Walker, 30, also was charged but already was in custody from his Oct. 13 arrest for possession with the intent to distribute crack cocaine. 'This arrest and the swift federal response to the vicious plot to murder a career DEA special agent should serve as compelling evidence of our absolute commitment to take any steps necessary to protect the lives of law-enforcement officers and citizens alike from those dangerous criminals who prey upon society with no regard for human life,' said U.S. Attorney Jim Letten. According to a criminal complaint filed in U.S. District Court, federal agents learned of the purported assassination plot from cooperating inmates who said Mr. Walker was seeking to hire someone to kill Mr. Scott."

The New Orleans Times-Picayune (1/26, Perlstein) writes, "William Renton, the DEA's top agent for the New Orleans area, said the scheme unraveled when Walker, 30, started asking fellow inmates at Tangipahoa Parish Prison for the names of potential hit men. Two inmates took the information straight to DEA Agent Chad Scott, who had busted Walker on Oct. 18 and booked him with possessing more than a kilo of cocaine, equipment used in making crack and a gun with an obliterated serial number, according to Renton and court records. The informants told the agent that Walker had asked Sims, 25, to line up an assassin to murder Scott, according to criminal affidavit filed in the case. The DEA wasted no time launching a sting operation using an undercover New Orleans police officer to pose as a drug-dealing hit man, the affidavit states."

California County May Join Others In Medical Marijuana Lawsuit. Southern California's Press-Enterprise (1/27) reports, "Riverside County will consider joining San Bernardino and San Diego counties in a federal lawsuit seeking to overturn California's medical-marijuana law. Supervisor Jeff Stone, a pharmacist, said he intends to ask his colleagues in closed session Tuesday to add the county to the short list of challengers to the state's Compassionate Use Act approved by Californians in 1996. The law allows patients with a physician's recommendation to transport and use marijuana to treat the symptoms of illnesses such as cancer, glaucoma, chronic pain and AIDS."

US-Mexico Quarrels Over Border Said To Indicate "Deteriorating Relationship." The New York Times (1/27, McKinley) reports, "The United States and Mexico exchanged diplomatic broadsides on Thursday over border security and drug-related violence in another sign of their deteriorating relationship. The American ambassador, Antonio O. Garza Jr., sent a formal note to the Mexican government demanding an investigation of" Monday's smuggling incident in Texas. Garza "took the unusual step of not only announcing the note, but promising to send a second one to express concern about a rise in drug-related violence in border towns and recent attacks on American Border Patrol agents. … Hours later the Mexican foreign minister, Luis Ernesto Derbez, suggested that it was Mr. Garza who appeared to be playing to a crowd for political reasons."

Mexican Official Says American Soldiers May Have Aided Smugglers. The AP (1/26) reported Mexican Foreign Secretary Luis Ernesto Derbez "suggested Thursday that American soldiers disguised as Mexican troops may have been in the military-style Humvee filmed earlier this week protecting a marijuana shipment on the border." Derbez said at "a news conference that US soldiers had helped drug smugglers before. However, he offered no evidence." Derbez said, "And just as that has happened ... it is very probable that something like that could have happened, that in reality they were members of some of their groups disguised as Mexican soldiers with Humvees." He added that "there was no proof that the men seen in the incident were Mexicans. Derbez also said his country will send a diplomatic note to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice demanding that US officials tone down their comments on Mexico's security and immigration problems."

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff's statements last week that reports of Mexican military incursions were overblown have been criticized frequently by the primetime cable news hosts. Senator Kay Bailey Hutchison appeared on Fox News' The Big Story (1/26) where she discussed the issue of Mexican military incursions. Host John Gibson: "Senator, you wrote a letter to the Secretary of the Department of Homeland Security, Michael Chertoff. He does not seem to be taking this very seriously. He calls these routine, accidental incursions. Texas authorities think they're much more serious than that. Have you been able to persuade the secretary to regard this as a serious matter and do something about it?" Hutchison: "Well, certainly we are encouraging the secretary to take action, to ask for an investigation, which the Mexican government has said they'll do."

On CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (1/26) host Lou Dobbs said, "The question has to be, why is the White House silent on this issue? Why is the man in charge of our homeland security, that is Homeland Security Department Secretary Michael Chertoff, so timid and so unconcerned or interested?"

Current Border Situation Compared To 1916. The Washington Times (1/27, Mccain) reports in a front page article that "the White House is speaking of its 'concern about the reports' of Monday's border crossing, which a spokesman described as 'an incident that is under investigation.' Yet in 1916, when Pancho Villa's bandits raided Columbus, NM, a Democratic president didn't hesitate. President Woodrow Wilson sent Gen. John 'Black Jack' Pershing to lead an expedition into Mexico. A $5,000 bounty was offered for Villa's capture, and Army posters invoked 'The Flag, Old Glory' in calling for 25,000 recruits: 'Come on, boys, be ready to shoulder the trusty Springfield.'" However, "the historic situation during Villa's day was much different, said James Carafano, a senior fellow at the Heritage Foundation. 'Mexico back then didn't have a strong central government,' said Mr. Carafano, who specializes in defense and homeland-security issues. 'There was no rule of law. I don't think you can compare that to Mexico today."

Ohio Man Pleads Guilty To Firearms, Meth Charges. The Chattanooga (TN) Chattanoogan (1/27) reports, "A Cleveland, Tn., man who authorities say kept machine guns buried in his yard pleaded guilty Thursday to firearms and meth charges." The Chattanoogan continues, "Donald Pippenger, 50, appeared before Judge Allan Edgar. … Prosecutor Gary Humble said Bradley County Sheriff officers on Aug. 9, 2004, found working components of a meth lab at Pippenger's home. He said they went back on March 10, 2005, and found he again was outfitted to cook meth. … Pippenger sold a sub-machine gun to an undercover officer on May 11, 2005, the prosecutor said." The Chattanoogan adds, "He is facing up to 20 years in prison and a fine up to $1 million on the meth cases and up to 10 years and a fine up to $250,000 in the firearms case. … ATF Agt. Carl Maskew said an informant told him he learned Pippenger was trying to sell guns. The informant went to the Pippenger home at 105 Hughes Road and Pippenger offered to sell him a semi-automatic Uzi. He said Pippenger said he should consider buying a fully automatic Uzi instead. He said Pippenger told him he had several automatic Uzis and an automatic AK-47 that he would sell."

Alabama Couple Indicted For Alleged Fraudulent Antique Firearms Valuations. The AP (1/27, Lovan) reports, "An Alabama man who headed a Louisville historical weapons museum has been charged with bilking the museum's founder out of millions by lying about the cost of some antique firearms." Michael K. Salisbury "inflated the prices of weapons bought by the museum's founder and primary financial backer, Owsley Brown Frazier, prosecutors said. He was indicted on two counts of money laundering, three counts of wire fraud and four counts of tax evasion. Salisbury's wife, Karen Cruse Salisbury…faces money laundering and wire fraud charges. The couple, of Huntsville, Ala., were taken into custody Thursday morning in Louisville," pleaded not guilty and were released on bond. The AP notes, "The indictments alleged Salisbury misrepresented the prices on a Colt revolver that was believed to have belonged to former FBI director J. Edgar Hoover; a Winchester rifle owned by William F. 'Buffalo Bill' Cody; and a bow, quiver and six arrows believed to have belonged to the Apache Indian Geronimo."

Arizona Man, Mexican Officer Indicted For Gun Smuggling. The Yuma (AZ) Sun (1/26, Gautreaux) reports, "A Mexican police officer and a Yuma man have been federally indicted for allegedly attempting to cross the border with three weapons purchased at a Yuma gun show." The Sun continues, "Omar Ignacio Alvarez, 20, of Yuma assisted Pedro Rios-Perez, 41, an officer for the Baja California State Police, in buying two handguns and an assault rifle Jan. 7 at a gun show at the Yuma County Fairgrounds, according to the indictment and a criminal complaint filed in U.S. District Court in Phoenix. The two allegedly attempted to drive the guns into Mexico in a police vehicle." The Sun adds, "The arrests are part of an overall increase in enforcement by the federal government in cooperation with local agencies to curb weapons trafficking in this area, according to Tom Mangan, special agent for the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives (ATF). … 'We recognize Yuma as being a firearms source for guns going to Mexico,' Mangan said. 'Arizona is a source state for firearms to Mexico.' … With strict firearms laws in Mexico, buying weapons in the United States and smuggling them south has been a longtime practice. Mangan said people from Mexico involved in narcotics and other crime have been coming to Yuma retailers to purchase weapons or having them bought for them through straw purchases."

Virginia Delegate Accidentally Discharges Handgun In His Office. A front page story in the Washington Post (1/27, Jenkins, Helderman, 744K) reports that Virginia Del. John S. "Jack" Reid accidentally discharged the small semiautomatic .380 handgun he carries for protection in his office Thursday. While no one was injured, the incident "prompted an unexpected debate about gun control and also something uncommon in Virginia political circles: contrition from a state legislator. Reid, a Henrico County Republican, rose from his seat on the floor of the House of Delegates, asked to be heard, explained what had happened and said: 'I want to apologize to the members of this body and to the greater body. . . . I'm just thankful that nobody was hurt.'" Reid "was at a loss to explain how an experienced gun owner found himself discharging a firearm during one of the busiest parts of the business day at the state Capitol complex."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Byrd, Johnson To Back Alito Confirmation. USA Today (1/27, Kiely, 2.31M) reports, "Two more Democratic senators, Robert Byrd of West Virginia and Tim Johnson of South Dakota, said Thursday that they will vote in favor of Supreme Court nominee Samuel Alito." Byrd and Johnson join Sen. Ben Nelson "as Alito's only announced Democratic supporters. All three are from states won by President Bush in 2004." Byrd said yesterday, "Like most of my constituents, I prefer conservative judges."

ABC's World News Tonight (1/26, story 5, :10, Vargas) in a brief story reported Byrd "broke party ranks to support" Alito. Byrd" called him 'an honorable man, who loves his country, lovers his constitution, and will give it his best.' He blasted the hearings calling them overly partisan saying his constituents called them an outrage and a disgrace."

Meanwhile, the Hartford Courant (1/27, Lightman, 206K) reports, "Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman, D-Conn., saying he was 'left with just too many doubts,' announced today he will vote against confirming Judge Samuel A. Alito Jr. to the U.S. Supreme Court."

Reuters (1/27) reports Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist "moved to force a confirmation vote on Tuesday. A test vote on ending debate is set for Monday, and a number of Democrats conceded they probably cannot stop Frist from mustering the needed 60 votes to do so. There are 44 Senate Democrats." Fox News' Special Report (1/26, Wilson) added "a final vote up or down on Alito is expected at 11:00 a.m. Tuesday morning and it does appear that by probably around noon he'll be sworn into the Supreme Court."

White House Says It Has 60 Firm Commitments In Favor Of Alito. CNN's The Situation Room (1/26, Bash) reported that a senior Bush Administration official "said that they think that this makes the Democrats, from their perspective, look worse than they think they did during the hearings, the Alito hearings." The official "said that they actually feel that they have 60 firm commitments, 60 firm commitments to vote in favor of Judge Alito. And that would block a filibuster."

Kerry, In Switzerland, Tries To Mount Last-Minute Filibuster. The CBS Evening News (1/26, story 4, :30, Schieffer) also noted, "As…Alito appears headed for confirmation by the Senate, some of his liberal Democratic opponents today threatened a last-ditch filibuster to try to prevent or at least delay a final vote. It does appear, however, that Alito has enough support to stop any filibuster and win confirmation." The Washington Times (1/27, Hurt, 90K) adds Sen. John Kerry "phoned in for a filibuster from the Swiss Alps." Kerry "made calls yesterday while attending the World Economic Forum in Davos, Switzerland, urging colleagues to join a last-ditch effort to thwart Judge Alito's confirmation." Sen. Edward M. Kennedy "joined in Mr. Kerry's call for a filibuster."

The New York Times (1/27, Kirkpatrick, 1.19M) reports on Kerry's "quixotic, last-minute effort for a filibuster." Democrats "cringed and Republicans jeered at the awkwardness of his gesture, which almost no one in the Senate expects to succeed. 'God bless John Kerry,' said Don Stewart, a spokesman for Senator John Cornyn, a Texas Republican on the Judiciary Committee. 'He just cinched this whole nomination. With Senator Kerry, it is Christmas every day.'" Steve Schmidt, a White House spokesman "working on the nomination," said Kerry's move "says a lot less about Alito than it does about the Iowa primary in 2008," suggesting "that Mr. Kerry, who lost the presidential race in 2004, was playing to his party's liberal base in a bid to recapture its nomination." Senator Harry Reid "sounded almost apologetic about Mr. Kerry's statements. 'No one can complain on this matter that there hasn't been sufficient time to talk about Judge Alito, pro and con,' Mr. Reid said on the Senate floor. ;'I hope that this matter will be resolved without too much more talking.'"

The AP (1/27, Holland) also says Reid "offered no support for Kennedy…and others who are trying to block the vote with a filibuster in a last stand against Alito's confirmation. 'There's been adequate time for people to debate,' Reid said."

CNN's The Situation Room (1/26, Henry) reported, "There could be a backlash against Kerry. There are some Democrats like Mary Landrieu, moderates like Landrieu, who have said that may vote against Alito, but they would be against the filibuster, that they want an up or down vote as…Bush has called for." Other "very senior Democrats here in Washington are saying this is a bad idea."

Under the headline "Democrats Split Over Filibuster On Alito," the Washington Post (1/27, A1, Babington, 744K) reports Kerry and Kennedy "acknowledged that the bid is likely to fail and that Alito is virtually certain to be confirmed Tuesday." But "they said extended debate may draw more Americans' attention to Alito's conservative stands on abortion, civil rights, presidential powers and other matters."

In an editorial titled "Bring It On," the Wall Street Journal (1/27, 2.11M) says, "Imagine the political gain for Republicans after a Supreme Court filibuster -- with all of its 24/7 publicity -- by blue-state liberals against a modest Italian-American with impeccable legal credentials and stainless ethics." Kerry "really seems to believe that the country will rise up in fury when it discovers that Judge Alito believes that the Constitution gives a President wide powers to defend America." Kerry "may not care much about the Senate because his real goal is winning the Democratic nomination for President again in 2008. Republicans should be so lucky."

Bush To Promote "Competitiveness" Agenda In State Of The Union. The Financial Times (1/27, Daniel, Alden) reports President Bush plans to "embrace a 'competitiveness' agenda advocated by big US technology companies in his State of the Union address next week." Bush is expected to "highlight the need for measures to improve US industry's competitiveness" as concerns grow that the US "is lagging behind in cutting-edge research and has fallen behind China and India in training science and technology graduates." At his Thursday press conference, Bush said, "We live in a competitive world, and so policies must be put in place to recognize the competition of the global economy and prepare our people to be able to continue to compete so America can continue to lead."

Budget Constraints Will Limit Initiatives. The Wall Street Journal (1/27, Harwood, 2.11M) reports in its "Washington Wire" column, "Bush plans emphasis on broad themes as red ink thins policy options. Advisers say budget squeeze will curb initiatives in Tuesday's State of the Union. Bush's track record suggests little polling benefit; his ratings dropped after two of four earlier addresses."

Site For Anti-Bush State Of The Union Protest Approved. The Washington Post (1/27, B2, Barker, 744K) reports that organizers of the "World Can't Wait -- Drive Out the Bush Regime" protest scheduled for Tuesday "reached an agreement yesterday with law enforcement officials and will now be allowed to use the area around the U.S. Capitol Reflecting Pool for their demonstration." They had "initially been offered the Reflecting Pool area on the west side of the Capitol as a protest site but then were told that the site had been reclassified as part of the security perimeter for the day of Bush's speech."

Villaraigosa Does Not Want To Be "Too Negative" In SOTU Response. The Los Angeles Times (1/27, McGreevy, 958K) reports Los Angeles Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa and Democratic congressional leaders "huddled" yesterday "to discuss his Spanish-language response to the president's State of the Union address next week, and there were signs of some disagreement over how to present their case." Villaraigosa came out of a meeting with Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid and House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi "saying that he did not want to be too negative about the president, on whom his city depends for federal financial help."

Friedman Says Energy Independence Should Be Centerpiece Of State Of The Union. In his New York Times (1/27, 1.19M) column, Thomas Friedman writes, "The direction in which America needs to go is obvious: toward energy independence." If President Bush "steps up to that challenge" in his State of the Union, "this speech could be a new beginning for his presidency. If he doesn't, you can stick a fork in this administration. It will be done -- because it will have abdicated leadership on the biggest issue of our day." Friedman says Bush should call on President Kennedy's "extraordinary State of the Union address in which he called on the nation to marshal all of its resources to put a man on the Moon," and then say, "President Kennedy was worried about the threat that communism posed to our way of life. I am here to tell you that if we don't move away from our dependence on oil and shift to renewable fuels, it will change our way of life for the worse -- and soon -- much, much more than communism ever could have. Making this transition is the calling of our era."

Bush To Offer Market-Based Health Care Initiatives In State Of The Union. The Christian Science Monitor (1/27, Marks, 61K) reports that in his State of the Union speech, President Bush is expected to propose a series of health care initiatives that aim to "encourage a market-oriented, consumer-driven system. Key components of his plan include the expansion of health savings accounts, additional tax breaks for individuals who buy insurance on their own, and provisions that would improve public access to information on healthcare pricing." Supporters say the proposals "are crucial to making American more of an 'ownership' society," but critics "warn they'll shift more risk onto individuals and undermine the nation's already strained health-insurance system."

Financial Service Providers Rush Into Health Savings Account Market. The New York Times (1/27, Dash, 1.19M) reports, "Banks, credit unions and money management firms are now quietly positioning themselves to become central players in the business of health care, offering 401(k)-type accounts to cover future medical expenses." Many are rushing to get in the market for health savings accounts, "which have been around since 2003 but are moving to the fore of the national agenda." Right now, only about three million Americans "have signed up for the high-deductible insurance policy required for such accounts, up from slightly more than one million last March." But according to one estimate, that number will surpass 15 million by 2010. The Los Angeles Times (1/27, Havemann, 958K) reports that the tripling of the number of HSA members over the last 10 months is a "very significant success story," according to America's Health Insurance Plans President/CEO Karen Ignagni. But Employee Benefit Research Institute health economist Paul Fronstin said, "Is it a success story? Yes and no. Three years ago, the market didn't exist. But it still amounts to only a fraction of Americans who have private insurance."

CBS Poll Highlights Public's Concern About US Health Care. The CBS Evening News (1/26, story 7, :45, Schieffer) reported, "Americans overwhelmingly believe the health care system in this country is broken. Ninety percent told us the system needs a major change or a complete overhaul, but few think it is likely to get one. Only nine percent believe that health care will be better by the end of the President's second term; 40% say it will be worse."

Concerns Raised About Rising Senior Health Care Costs. NBC Nightly News (1/26, story 7, 2:00, Mullen) ran a story on the predicament baby boomers face in caring for both their elderly parents and children. American Geriatric Society President Dr. David Reuben: "This is going to be the Hurricane Katrina of 2020. The cost of caring for these older people is going to be enormous." Mullen: "Many med schools are pushing government to offer students financial incentives to pursue geriatrics. They say they're hoping policymakers grow wiser as the population grows older."

Democrats Want Bush To Discuss Medicare Drug Benefit Fix. Reuters (1/27, Kenen) reports Democrats in Congress are calling on President Bush to "outline in his State of the Union speech how he will fix what they consider a disastrous start to the Medicare drug benefit." Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid said, "The President needs to come clean and join Democrats in offering a real solution to this disastrous program."

Drug Makers Plan To Cut Back On Discount Medication Programs. Meanwhile, the Washington Post (1/27, A2, Connolly, 744K) reports that "several of the nation's largest drug manufacturers say they will no longer provide free or discounted medications to low-income elderly and disabled patients because they should be covered by the new Medicare drug benefit." For "about 1 million Americans with serious illnesses such as AIDS and cancer -- patients who last year relied on the pharmaceutical industry's giveaways -- that means Medicare coverage could cost them more than $3,600 this year."

Medicare Drug Program Denies Home IV Supplies. The Los Angeles Times (1/27, Alonso-Zaldivar, 958K) reports, "The new Medicare drug program is denying supplies that seriously ill patients need to administer intravenous antibiotics and other medications at home. As a result, some patients are being referred to nursing homes, and others have had to go into hospitals." While "no national estimates are available, the number of patients affected -- including some with life-threatening diseases such as cancer and multiple sclerosis -- could run into the thousands." Medicare officials "say they are aggressively addressing the problem, which they attribute to restrictions in the law that created the prescription benefit and to difficulty communicating with states, pharmacies and medical providers."

Bush Budget To Include Funding For Nuclear Fuel Reprocessing. The AP (1/26) reports President Bush's budget request will include $250 million for reviving nuclear fuel reprocessing, "including a long-term proposal to provide reactor fuel to foreign countries if they return it to the United States to be recycled." The request will be "a first step toward reversing a decades long U.S. policy against nuclear reprocessing." The proposal will call for "stepped up research into a 'more proliferation resistant' type of reprocessing that proponents say will reduce dramatically the likelihood of theft or diversion."

Majority See Bush Presidency As "A Failure" In Gallup Poll. Under the headline "State Of The Union? Not So Good, Most Say," USA Today (1/27, Page, 2.31M) reports that according to a new USA Today/CNN/Gallup poll, most Americans are "pessimistic about the economy, divided on the war and doubtful" that President Bush "has the best plan to address the issues that matter most to them -- among them health care and corruption." And by "more than 2-to-1, those surveyed say things have gotten worse in the United States over the past five years," with even self-described conservatives divided "47%-44% on whether things have gotten better or worse." Bloomberg (1/27, Johnston) reports that the same poll found 52% of adults saying "Bush's administration since 2001 has been a failure, down from 55 percent in October. Fifty- eight percent described his second term as a failure. At the same point in former President Bill Clinton's presidency, 70 percent of those surveyed by Gallup said they considered it a success and 20 percent a failure. In a poll conducted in January of 2002, after Bush was president for one year, 83 percent of those surveyed said his presidency was a success."

Bush Vows Tougher Stance On Congressional Spending. Reuters (1/27, Bohan) reports, "President George W. Bush, who has faced heat from conservative Republicans over high budget deficits, pledged on Thursday to take a tougher stance toward Congress over spending, including vetoing bills if necessary." He also "backed changes to the appropriations process to curb 'earmarks,' or targeted spending that lawmakers often use for pet projects in their districts." During a press conference, Bush said, "That's going to be an interesting discussion on Capitol Hill -- this business about earmarks and people making a special deal in the budget. … And there needs to be earmark reform." Bush also "said he would call for fiscal restraint in his State of the Union address on Tuesday, when he will also unveil initiatives on healthcare, energy and education. Bush cited a deficit-cutting package aimed at finding $39.7 billion in savings from social welfare programs over five years as a sign Congress was making progress on curbing spending."

CBO Says Deficit Would Turn Into Surplus If Bush Tax Cuts Allowed To Expire. USA Today (1/27, Wolf, 2.31M) reports, "Making…Bush's tax cuts permanent will prolong big budget deficits into the next decade, the Congressional Budget Office projected Thursday." But "if those tax cuts are allowed to expire after 2010 -- effectively a tax increase Bush has sworn to oppose -- the budget would begin showing a surplus in 2012, the CBO's budget projections showed. Bush wants Congress to make the tax cuts permanent before he leaves office in 2009." The Wall Street Journal (1/27, Calmes, 2.11M) adds CBO "projects that war and hurricane-relief costs will widen the annual deficit to about $360 billion after it had narrowed last year." But "a decade out, the nonpartisan office sees either a small surplus or a nearly $400 billion deficit in 2016 if President Bush's tax cuts are extended."

The AP (1/27, Taylor) reports, "The latest Congressional Budget Office data also suggest President Bush is unlikely to be able to keep his promise to cut the federal deficit in half by the end of his term," while Reuters (1/27, Cowan) says "congressional Democrats said the CBO report challenges Bush administration claims that it is making progress in cutting the deficit, which began in fiscal 2001 with a $128 billion shortfall on the heels of a $236 billion surplus in fiscal 2000, the year before…Bush took office."

Bush "Full Of Quips" During Yesterday's Press Conference. The AP (1/27, Pickler) reports, "President Bush's first news conference of the year was just a camera strap away from becoming hazardous to reporters. As the president began his opening statement, a camera that the news service AFP had hung from the ceiling dropped and nearly fell on the heads below. It was caught by its strap, and Bush stopped and looked at it dangling precariously. 'Are you wearing your helmets?' he joked to reporters sitting in the White House briefing room." Bush "was full of quips during the 45-minute news conference, poking fun at the media and deflecting some of the heat when questioning got intense."

more common in Washington: Lobbyists are serving as principal fund-raisers for lawmakers they're trying to sway. … The Justice Department public-corruption and bribery case against lobbyist Jack Abramoff and a half-dozen members of Congress has refocused attention on the financial ties between lawmakers and lobbyists. While Mr. Abramoff's lobbying activities crossed the line into illegality, the practice of lobbyists raising large amounts of money for lawmakers is both legal and commonplace in Washington today." The Journal notes that Gregg Hartley, who left his job as a top aide to Republican Rep. Roy Blunt of Missouri to become a lobbyist, is helping Blunt ""was helping his old Capitol Hill boss raise campaign money and offering him political advice," and is now "assisting Mr. Blunt in his bid to succeed Rep. Tom DeLay as House majority leader." Bruce Gates, "the top political strategist for Mr. Blunt's main rival to become Majority Leader, Rep. John Boehner of Ohio, also is a lobbyist for private clients."

Poll Suggests Public More Suspicious Of GOP Lawmakers' Ethics. The CBS Evening News (1/26, story 6, 3:00, Schieffer) led its story on ethics reform loopholes noting, "If lobbyists have been bribing members of Congress, it would not surprise most Americans, it turns out. In that CBS News 'New York Times' poll we mentioned earlier 77% said that is just the way things work in Congress. And when asked who in Congress is more likely to take a bribe, a Republican or a Democrat, twice as many Americans pointed to the Republicans, 36% said the chances are about equal."

McCain Seeks To Close Loophole Allowing Lobbyists To Contribute To Lawmaker Charities. The CBS Evening News (1/26, story 6, 3:00, Schieffer) reported, "Republicans and Democrats alike are talking about all kinds of lobbying reform, but they do not want to change everything." CBS (Borger) noted that ethics reform "is all the rage on the campaign trail." But "there's a little-noticed loophole that's been conveniently left off the table because it's too good to give up. Members' personal charities. They're tax-exempt foundations created by members of Congress. Their donors? Lobbyists." For example, "the Tom DeLay Foundation for Kids which built a home for foster children in Texas. When DeLay was the powerful majority leader, lobbyists lined up to contribute to his foundation, raising millions." Although "Senator John McCain points out that not all charitable travel is bad, he wants to screen the charity outings paid for by lobbyists to curb the boondoggles." Sen. John McCain: "Part of the screening process would be exactly what takes place and how the money is spent." Borger: "Top lobbyists say donations to members' charities are a key lobbying strategy and will remain so as long as the charity loophole stays as wide open as a fairway."

Senators Threaten To Force Votes On Every Pork Barrel Spending Project. Sens. John McCain and Tom Coburn say they will force a vote on the Senate floor on each pork barrel spending project this year. The Washington Times (1/27, Dinan, 90K) reports that the Senators "sent a letter Wednesday night to their colleagues announcing they will use Senate rules to force members to vote on each project. 'American taxpayers are entitled to a more thorough debate and disclosure about how their money is being spent,' the senators wrote."

Lobbyist-Lawmaker Relationships Have Coincided With Growth Of Earmarks. The Washington Post (1/27, A1, Weisman, Babcock, 744K) reports, "The link between special interests and members of Congress has grown so tight that nearly a dozen House and Senate members who control federal spending have retained lobbying veterans to raise campaign funds for them, and those lobbyists have secured lucrative favors in spending bills. These relationships have coincided with the rapid growth in the volume of home-state pork-barrel projects, commonly called earmarks, that have swelled appropriations bills in recent years, according to congressional experts and watchdog groups." The Post adds, "The hunt for earmarks on Capitol Hill and on K Street has opened up new avenues for lobbyists and lawmakers to come together. Seven members of the House Appropriations Committee -- Chairman Jerry Lewis (R-Calif.), Ernest J. Istook Jr. (R-Okla.), Kay Granger (R-Tex.), Dennis Rehberg (R-Mont.), John E. Sweeney (R-N.Y.), Rosa L. DeLauro (D-Conn.) and Ed Pastor (D-Ariz.) -- have political action committees headed by registered lobbyists or former registered lobbyists with business before the committee, according to the Center for Public Integrity and campaign records."

Growing Watchdog Movement Mobilizing Against Pork. A separate story in the Washington Post (1/27, A21, Murray, 744K) says "an increasingly prolific government watchdog movement is turning 'pork' into a four-letter word. These scrappy outfits are run by small corps of veteran staffers whose offices look more like dorm rooms than the posh K Street suites occupied by their archnemeses: lobbyists. Taxpayers for Common Sense elevated an obscure Alaska highway project into the now-infamous 'Bridge to Nowhere.' Citizens Against Government Waste started battling runaway Hurricane Katrina spending three days after the storm hit the Gulf Coast. The two groups joined forces this month with the National Taxpayers Union, a conservative, low-tax organization, to combat the rising cost of the new D.C. baseball stadium. Other watchdog targets include indicted former representative Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Calif.), the Pentagon and the U.S. Postal Service."

Henninger Says 1974 Reforms Should Be Reversed. Daniel Henninger writes in the Wall Street Journal (1/27,

2.11M) that Beltway Democrats are trying to build the Abramoff scandal "into a bonfire that will burn down Republican control of Congress. … Poll after poll says the public thinks both parties are equally corrupt. It depends, of course, on what the meaning of corruption is. If by corrupt you mean lobbyist sleaze, quid pro quo, the pork barrel, earmarks to nowhere and grossing out even the public's generally low expectations, then yes, both parties are equally corrupt. … Fixes are possible. Put simply, reverse the 'reforms' of 1974. Abolish the individual limits on campaign contributions but require public disclosure on the Web. Democrats James Carville and Paul Begala recently proposed making this the basis of creating a new campaign-finance system. But beyond this lies the question of whether Democrats and Republicans want to fix Washington. Are they really separate parties, or just one entity -- the Beltway Party? … I wish President Bush would put this issue of what Washington has become into his State of the Union speech Tuesday. My guess is he won't, recalling what happened when Richard Nixon tried to fight both a major war and the party that controls Congress, which for the foreseeable future looks like it will be the Beltway Spend-and-Collect Party."

Blunt Facing Pressure To Appear With Leadership Rivals. The Wall Street Journal (1/27, Rogers, 2.11M) reports that Rep. Roy Blunt s facing increasing pressure to appear with his two rivals for House Majority Leader before the GOP caucus to answer questions on where he wants to take the party in the wake of recent scandals. The Journal says that while Blunt is widely seen as the frontrunner, he has "seemed insecure, refusing to give up his whip's position and avoiding any joint television appearances where he can be questioned with the two other candidates, Reps. John Boehner of Ohio and John Shadegg of Arizona."

Majority Whip Race Seen As Sign Of GOP Conference's Conservatism. The Washington Times (1/27, Dinan, 90K) says the race for House Majority Whip is "an indication of just how conservative the House Republican Conference has become. Two 1994 Republican revolutionaries and two fast-rising Republican stars face off in a contest they all say is about making the party refocus on basic conservative principles.' Rep. Mike Rogers is running against Rep. Eric Cantor of Virginia, Rep. Todd Tiahrt of Kansas and Rep. Zach Wamp of Tennessee. Mr. Tiahrt and Mr. Wamp were part of the Class of 1994, while Mr. Rogers and Mr. Cantor were elected in 2000. All four rank among the most conservative members of the House." Currently it is "not clear the position will even be open. The current whip, Rep. Roy Blunt of Missouri, is running for majority leader but has not relinquished his seat. For that reason the whip's race has been far less public."

Administration Pushing Back Against Senate Oversight Questions. Knight Ridder (1/27, Kuhnhenn) reports, "After years of deferring to the Bush White House, the Republican-controlled Senate has begun pushing back, holding oversight hearings on topics ranging from President Bush's response to Hurricane Katrina to his administration's mine-safety record and the president's secret domestic-surveillance program. Administration officials are fighting back. … White House officials and their allies maintain that their stance protects inherent executive power. Critics say the administration's reaction to the Senate's inquiries is an assault on Congress' constitutional role as a coequal branch of government that checks and balances the executive." Knight Ridder notes, "The Bush administration has never been shy about testing the limits of its executive power. Vice President Dick Cheney refused to divulge the identities of energy executives who advised him on energy policy. The administration wouldn't give Congress up-to-date cost estimates of its prescription-drug legislation. The Pentagon is often stingy about data related to the war in Iraq."

Bill Would Allow Binding Arbitration For FAA Labor Disputes. The Washington Post (1/27, B2, Barr, 744K) reports in its "Federal Diary" column, "The union representing air traffic controllers is looking to Capitol Hill for help in contentious contract negotiations with the Federal Aviation Administration. Four Democratic senators introduced a bill yesterday that would permit labor disputes at the FAA to be settled through binding arbitration, John S. Carr , president of the National Air Traffic Controllers Association, announced." Sen. Barack Obama "said he and colleagues proposed arbitration 'to help defuse the growing management-labor tension at the FAA.' Under the Obama bill, if the FAA and one of its unions failed to reach a voluntary agreement, the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service would be called on to try again for a settlement. If mediation failed, Congress could impose the FAA's last, best offer on employees by approving it in legislation. If Congress did not act, the impasse would go to binding arbitration. Joining Obama in introducing the bill were Sens. Daniel K. Inouye (D-Hawaii), Patty Murray (D-Wash.) and Frank Lautenberg (D-N.J.)."

NYTimes Says "Inappropriate Perks" For Federal Judges Should Be Banned. An editorial in the New York Times (1/27, 1.19M) says Supreme Court Justice Antonin Scalia "has poor judgment when it comes to vacations." Apparently "unchastened by the criticism of his 2004 duck-hunting excursion with Vice President Dick Cheney, one of that term's most prominent Supreme Court litigants," Scalia "skipped the swearing-in of Chief Justice John Roberts Jr. because of another ethically dubious trip, this time to the posh Ritz-Carlton at the Beaver Creek ski resort in Colorado." The Times adds, "Justice Scalia's travel is part of a broader affliction on the federal bench. … The judicial lobbying problem is more serious in one respect than the scandal enveloping Congress. Lawmakers operate in an overtly political environment, but the decision-making process of judges is supposed to be impermeable to clever efforts by special interests to buy access and favor." The Times also notes that three Democratic senators "are readying provisions to ban junkets and other compromising gifts for judges, which they hope to make part of their party's lobbying reform proposal. For Congress to pass a lobbying reform bill that curbs inappropriate perks for lawmakers but not for federal judges would be a scandal in itself."

Bush Urges Hamas To Renounce Violence. The Christian Science Monitor (1/27, Prusher, 61K) reports that according to results of the Palestinian election based on 95 percent of the vote, "Hamas won 76 seats to Fatah's 43 seats. Smaller and independent parties took the remaining 13 seats." The Washington Times (1/27, Martin, Pisik, 90K) adds Hamas leader Mahmoud Zahar "has proposed a dramatic shift of Palestinian policy -- ending security cooperation with Israel, cutting most trade links with the Jewish state and refusing to engage with the 'Christian-Zionist' US administration." Zahar told the Washington Times "just days before" the election, "We have to go away from Israel and move toward all possible linkages with our Arab and Islamic brothers. … Cooperation [with Israel] on the security and economic fields was a disaster for the Palestinians."

President Bush issued a two-pronged message to Palestinians after Hamas' election victory, warning Hamas against continuing violence against Israel and expressing support for the democratic process. Reflecting a common theme in the coverage, ABC World News Tonight (1/26, story 3, 2:20, Woodruff) reported "the White House response has been surprisingly measured." Bush, added ABC (Raddatz), "had to walk a very fine line. To the newly-elected members of Hamas, President Bush had a strong warning." Bush was shown saying, "If your platform is the destruction of Israel, it means you're not a partner in peace." Raddatz: "But to the more than 500,000 Palestinian voters who supported Hamas, the President struck an entirely different tone." Bush: "When you give people the vote, you give people a chance to express themselves at the polls, and if they are unhappy with the status quo, they'll let you know. That's the great thing about democracy."

NBC Nightly News (1/26, story 2, 2:00, Fletcher) said the President "put on a brave face," while The CBS Evening News (1/26, story 2, 3:30, Roberts) added Bush "did try to find some ray of light today, declaring the exercise of democracy, at least, a positive step." Bush: "It's a wakeup call to the leadership. Obviously people were not happy with the status quo." Fox News' Special Report (1/26, Cameron) also reported, "Acknowledging that its success is unwelcome news for peace, Mr. Bush nonetheless said the old guard Palestinian leadership should view it as a wake-up call."

CNN's The Situation Room (1/26, Bash) reported, "Spreading democracy is a key Bush goal, so he tried to put the best face on unwelcome results, deeming them 'a wake-up call to the Palestinian leadership.'"

The Washington Post (1/27, A15, Kessler, 744K) headlines its story "Bush Is Conciliatory In Accepting Victory Of Hamas," and reports Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice also "put on a brave face, saying 'we still have every reason for hope and for optimism' because voter turnout was high and free from violence." The "upbeat rhetoric belied the fact that the election outcome was the opposite of what the administration had hoped would happen. Behind the scenes, US officials scrambled to survey the wreckage of their Middle East policy."

Reuters (1/27, Hudson) reports Bush also "urged President Mahmoud Abbas, whose Cabinet resigned after his Fatah party lost to the Islamist group, to stay in office so the United States could keep open a diplomatic channel with the Palestinian government." The New York Times (1/27, Erlanger, 1.19M) adds that "in a televised speech on Thursday night, the Palestinian president, Mahmoud Abbas, said he remained committed to negotiations with Israel." Abbas, "whose official status was not affected by the vote, suggested that future talks would be conducted through the Palestine Liberation Organization, which could bypass a Hamas-led government."

Meanwhile, the New York Times (1/27, Weisman, 1.19M) reports Hamas' "sweeping victory…threw President Bush and his aides on the defensive…complicating the administration's policy of trying to promote democracy as an antidote to the spread of terrorism." The Times adds, "Reacting uneasily to the Hamas triumph, Mr. Bush said the results spoke to the failures of…Abbas and the 'old guard.'" USA Today (1/27, Gutman, 2.31M) says "Hamas' victory in Palestinian elections seemed less an endorsement of terrorism than a vote for an organization that supporters hope will improve government, according to some voters and election analysts." Hamas supporters "say they were fed up with the ruling Fatah Party, which many accused of corruption and general incompetence."

The Los Angeles Times (1/27, Chen, 958K) says Hamas' win "put Bush in a difficult spot because he has made his campaign to spread democracy around the world a cornerstone of his presidency. Now, in the face of a victory by a group whose policies he abhors, Bush is having to impose conditions before fully accepting the results of that show of democracy."

MSNBC's Hardball (1/26, Mitchell) reported that US officials "are in a state of shock. Now one official tonight was telling me that they're thinking that Hamas is also in a state of shock, because Hamas has worked best as an outsider. And that they thought they would get a major role in the new government, perhaps control some of the domestic social service cabinet ministries, but not have to run a government itself. So they're positing that perhaps today Hamas is in the position that Robert Redford was in The Candidate, 1972 movie where he said, Now what do we do?"

European allies echoed Bush's theme. The New York Times (1/27, Cowell, 1.19M) reports European countries are "major financial donors to the Palestinian Authority." Yesterday they "registered disquiet verging on hostility toward the Hamas triumph in the Palestinian elections." Yet, "confronted with a Middle East that seems once again to have redrawn its political contours, they held back from publicly threatening to cut off the hundreds of millions of dollars they provide each year to Palestinian institutions." Furthermore, "none of them criticized the Palestinian democracy that appeared to yield the opposite of the moderation they had sought to nurture."

All three networks led with stories on Hamas' election victory, describing it as historic but reflecting concerns about its impact on Mideast peace. ABC World News Tonight (1/26, lead story, 2:55, Woodruff) reported, "A sea change in the Middle East. Hamas, the militant Islamic group, that calls for the destruction of Israel, has won the Palestinian parliamentary elections in a landslide." The CBS Evening News (1/26, lead story, 3:00, Schieffer) said Hamas' success "will radically change the whole Middle East equation and the prospects for peace, and it puts the United States in an extremely awkward position."

CNN's The Situation Room (1/26, Koppel) reported that "some are saying this is classic case of be careful what you wish for." Hamas' "landslide victory was a stinging defeat the US and Israel." The US "has made spreading democracy the centerpiece of its foreign policy. The challenge now, how to treat the democratically-elected Hamas, radical Islamists behind so many suicide bombings against Israel, a group the U.S. considers terrorists." In "the short-term, the U.S. is threatening to cut off about $270 million in must-needed financial assistance to the Palestinians, and is looking to Europe, a much bigger donor, to do the same. The goal of this is try to force Hamas to moderate its views and to try to treat Israel and deal with Israel as a partner in peace." Meanwhile, the Christian Science Monitor (1/27, LaFranchi, 61K) asks in its headline "Is Democracy Empowering Islamists?"

The New York Times (1/27, Fattah, 1.19M) adds Hamas's "overwhelming victory…was met with a mixture of jubilation and consternation in much of the Arab world. For some, it raised the concern that, in winning, the Islamic group will almost certainly have to lose something."

Highlighting concerns over the continuation of Hamas attacks against Israel, ABC's World News Tonight (1/26, story 2, 1:45, Woodruff) reported, "Hamas in the past has used suicide bombings to devastating effect. And one of its most-celebrated figures is a mother, who sent her sons to their deaths. Tonight, she is an elected official." ABC (Dinnick): "Palestinians voted for Miriam Farahat because she's made astonishing sacrifices in her quest to destroy Israel. Farahat has sent three of her six sons on suicide missions." Now that she "has been elected to Palestinian parliament, the question is, will she end her violent campaign against Israel, a fight she has made so personal today she vowed to do whatever Hamas asked of her. 'I am ready to serve,' she says. And if that means sacrificing her three remaining sons, Um Nidal says she's willing."

The Washington Times (1/27, Sammon, 90K) headlines its story "US Won't Deal With Hamas," while USA Today (1/27, Gutman, 2.31M) says the election results "put the future of the Middle East peace process in question." Similar stories appear in today's Wall Street Journal (1/27, Leggett, King, 2.11M), which titles its front-page report "Hamas Victory Roils Middle East Peace Process," Baltimore Sun (1/27, Murphy, 296K), Washington Post (1/27, A1, Wilson, 744K), and Financial Times (1/27, Devi, Morris).

Fatah Declines Hamas Offer To Form Coalition Government. NBC Nightly News (1/26, lead story, 2:00, Fletcher) reported Even Hamas was stunned by its landslide victory. The Islamic militants won 76 out of 132 seats. It can form a majority government all on its own. But Hamas leaders quickly offered to share power with the defeated Fatah party. Fatah leaders said no. After 40 years of dominating Palestinian life, the party of Yasser Arafat is out." Saeb Erekat, Palestinian peace negotiator: "We will not be part of any national unity government." Fletcher: "And the future of President Mahmoud Abbas is in doubt." Meanwhile, says the Washington Times (1/27, Mitnick, 90K), Palestinian Prime Minister Ahmed Qureia "tendered his resignation."

Under the headline "Hamas Is Stunned By Its Success," the Los Angeles Times (1/27, King, 958K) reports, "Of all those shocked by Hamas' landslide win in Palestinian elections, few were more stunned than the militant Islamist group itself. In taking the reins of power after participating in its first parliamentary vote, Hamas leaders face a predicament: If they attempt to please their most radical adherents by continuing to call for Israel's destruction, they jeopardize hard-won international support for a Palestinian state. But if they moderate their stance and reject their founding principle, they risk alienating their militant base."

Hamas Win Could Affect Israeli Election. The Washington Times (1/27, Ward, 90K) reports, "Hamas' shocking election victory is likely to radically alter the course of Israel's own election at the end of March, as an outraged right wing flexes its muscles and the centrist government plots its response. As Palestinian officials announced the results, acting Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert convened top-level talks with senior political and defense officials to formulate how to manage the crisis. … Any perceived leniency toward Hamas could play directly into the hands of Benjamin Netanyahu, the hawkish leader of the right-wing Likud Party, who last year warned that Israel's pullout from Gaza was a prize for Hamas violence." But "intransigence toward a Hamas-led government would likely bring about international pressure on Israel to comply with earlier commitments reached with the Palestinian Authority.

The Washington Post (1/27, A18, Wilson, 744K) reports that already yesterday, "opposition politicians criticized the government for failing to stop the radical Islamic movement from rising to prominence within the Palestinian Authority." Olmert "faced criticism in the wake of the Hamas defeat of the governing Fatah party, Israel's main partner in past peace agreements."

The New York Times (1/27, Myre, 1.19M) reports, "The Hamas landslide in Palestinian elections has stunned Israelis, but it may also have brought them a rare moment of clarity: with peace talks off the table, Israel will most likely pursue unilateral actions, drawing its own borders and separating itself from the Palestinians." Olmert "made it clear after an emergency cabinet meeting that talks with Hamas, a Palestinian party sworn to Israel's destruction, were out of the question, while experts said Israel was now freer to establish its future on its own." They "said Israel…was likely to focus on speeding up construction of the separation barrier, which runs along and through parts of the West Bank."

Netanyahu Raises Alarm. ABC's World News Tonight (1/26, lead story, 2:55, Woodruff) noted, "The Israeli government said today it would not negotiate with Hamas. Hard liner Benjamin Netanyahu who is running for prime minister again, seized the political moment to sound this alarm – 'in front of our eyes is being created Hamas-stan,' he said. 'Worse than Iran and in the image of the Taliban.'"

Netanyahu said on CNN's The Situation Room (1/26) that Hamas' election victory is "a great setback for peace," adding that Hamas "is committed to the destruction of Israel, and the pursuit of terror and it's effectively a subordinate regime of Iran. So I think that's a great blow to peace. I think we have to understand that in the face of the rise of the forces of terror, we have to change the policies that Israel has had of unilaterally withdrawing in the face of terror because all that does is put people like Hamas in power. It makes them the winners. They use terror, Israel retreats, and therefore they get all the credit in the Palestinian streets and in the Palestinian elections. For peace to be restored, we have to resume and restore the policy of standing up to terror, not fleeing from it."

Renewed Tensions Between Israelis, Palestinians Could Have Negative Effect On Iraq. ABC's World News Tonight (1/26, story 3, 2:20, Raddatz) reported, "And how might this affect the rest of the region? A document obtained by ABC News today and put together by US analysts says that if tensions mount, and there is a renewed confrontation between the Israelis and Palestinians, the result will ripple throughout the Muslim world. The document goes on to say that it would have a particularly negative impact in Iraq."

Destruction Of West Bank Houses Could Signal Israeli Shift Toward Accommodation. The Wall Street Journal (1/27, Leggett, 2.11M) reports that the fate of nine newly-built homes in the Jewish community of Amona on the West Bank "may soon provide clues to one of the Middle East's most pressing questions: Is Israel preparing to withdraw from parts of the occupied West Bank? The answer increasingly appears to be yes. Following extended legal wrangling, the Israeli government is completing a plan to demolish Amona's nine concrete homes -- all uninhabited -- because they were constructed illegally on privately owned Palestinian land. With the militant Hamas party winning control of the Palestinian Parliament on Wednesday, it is possible Israel would delay the demolition, but several thousand Israeli security personnel are scheduled to carry out the order as early as next week, police and military officials say." The Amona operation "could have far-reaching implications. Coming on the heels of Israel's withdrawal from the Gaza Strip in August, it would signal a further rollback of a decades-long policy of encouraging Jewish settlement in Palestinian areas, particularly the West Bank, which is now home to some 250,000 Israeli citizens." The move "likely would resonate positively among Palestinians," and could "mark the beginning of a gradual regional shift away from armed confrontation and toward accommodation based on territorial compromise."

More Commentary. Under the headline "In The Mideast, A Giant Step Back," the New York Times (1/27, 1.19M) editorializes, "Bush was absolutely right when he urged Mr. Abbas to remain in office as a sign of stability and set Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice the task of seeing whether the shards of the peace process could be reassembled." But "he was also absolutely right when he said, 'A political party that articulates the destruction of Israel as part of its platform is a party with which we will not deal.'"

The Wall Street Journal (1/27, 2.11M) editorializes, "The White House will have to resist the temptation, no doubt encouraged by Europe, to pressure Israel to deal with Hamas as it once was pressed to deal with Arafat." But "given Hamas's history and declared goals, the onus is on its leaders to show that they have an agenda beyond terror. If Hamas begins to use Gaza as a base to import weapons and attack Israel, the Jewish state will have every right to strike back in self-defense. And the US should support it in doing so."

The Washington Post (1/27, A22, 744K) writes in an editorial that Hamas' win "creates fresh opportunities as well as dangers in the Middle East. The Islamic fundamentalist movement will now come under extraordinary pressure to cease all acts of terrorism, help restore order in the turbulent Gaza Strip and moderate its rejection of Israel. The pressure will come not only from Western governments and aid donors but from its own constituents. … Many Palestinians who voted for Hamas don't support the Islamists' fundamentalist agenda."

The Los Angeles Times (1/27, 958K) editorializes that the "election results complicate a situation that desperately needed stability, and they will make it more difficult for the Palestinians to achieve a state of their own anytime soon."

E.J. Dionne writes in the Washington Post (1/27, A23, 744K), "Bush, a man who prides himself on clarity and disdains nuance, was, if I may coin a word, nuancing all over the place. … You don't have to agree with Bush's decisions to believe that an important goal of American foreign policy should be to expand the number of nations that live under democratic rule." But "since the invasion of Iraq, administration spokesmen and supporters have offered a utopian and decidedly unconservative view of how American power could be used to change the world -- and quickly. It was said that the way to peace in Jerusalem passed through Baghdad. It was said that by ridding Iraq of Saddam Hussein's wretched regime, the United States would unleash a democratic revolution in the Arab world. Go back and look at the broad claims Bush's defenders made for his policy after the election in Iraq just a year ago. Everything, it was said, was falling into place." But "the world is a complicated place. Of course free elections in Iraq are hugely better than dictatorship. But when free elections become more a census to count members of warring ethnic and religious factions than a way of settling underlying disputes, they do not necessarily pave the way for enduring democracy. They do not provide voters with ways of test-driving the various alternatives."

Columnist Jim Hoagland writes in the Washington Post (1/27, A23, 744K) that "it is pointless to bemoan this setback or try to minimize its significance, as President Bush seemed to do yesterday in a White House news conference. Israel, the United States and Europe should instead adjust their policies to recognize and influence the volatile situation created by the unexpected and distinctly unwelcome Hamas victory." They "can best do that by not launching immediate efforts to cajole, bribe or intimidate a new Hamas-led government into adopting more peaceful-sounding rhetoric to clear the way for reviving negotiations with Israel. And there should be no attempt to paper over the crushing defeat inflicted on Mahmoud Abbas and the Palestinian Authority he headed."

Fotini Christia, a fellow at the Olin Institute for Strategic Studies at Harvard, and Sreemati Mitte, who works for the Palestinian Initiative for the Promotion of Global Dialogue and Democracy in Ramallah, West Bank, write in the New York Times (1/27, 1.19M), "The United States and the European Union must finally recognize Hamas's ascendance as a fait accompli. Until now, these key third parties have equivocated: they pressed Israel to allow Hamas to participate in the elections but threatened to cut aid and ties to a Hamas-dominated Palestinian Authority. The practical reality, however, is that Hamas is a pivotal player in Palestinian politics, and no peace process can succeed without at least the tacit acceptance of its leaders." The United States and Europe "cannot trumpet democratic ideals abroad and then ignore the popular will of Palestinian voters."

Reports On Factory Orders, Jobs Continue Positive Trend. The Wall Street Journal (1/27, Bater, 2.11M) reports, "Orders to the nation's factories for big-ticket goods finished 2005 strongly, while jobless claims rose last week but remained at a level indicating healthy job growth. Durable-goods orders climbed 1.3% in December to a seasonally adjusted $228.14 billion, the third straight increase, the Commerce Department said. Demand was higher for airplanes, machinery, cars and capital goods." Separately, the Labor Department "reported that the number of workers filing new claims for unemployment benefits climbed by 11,000 to a seasonally adjusted 283,000 in the week ended Jan. 21. The four-week moving average of initial jobless claims fell 10,750 to 288,750 from 299,500 the previous week. The moving average is at its lowest level since an identical average in the week ended July 1, 2000."

GM Losses Larger Than Expected. NBC Nightly News (1/26, story 6, :45, Williams) reported, "The bad news keeps on coming from the US auto industry. It hardly gets any worse than this. General Motors reported today it lost $4.8 billion in just the fourth quarter of last year and $8.6 billion in all of 2005. Those results were far worse than Wall Street expected, GM's slumping stock price dropped another 3 1/2% just today."

Stocks Up. NBC Nightly News (1/26, story 6, :45, Williams) noted, "The rest of Wall Street shook off GM's problems and closed higher. The Dow was up just under 100 points [to 10809.47] and NASDAQ gained more than 22 points [to 2283.00]." The New York Times (1/27, 1.19M) adds the S.& P. 500 "rallied 9.15 points, or 0.7 percent, to 1,273.83 for its biggest advance since Jan. 6 and third gain in the last four days." The Wall Street Journal (1/27, Browning, 2.11M) also reports the stock numbers.

Greenspan Leaves "Remarkable" Political Legacy. The Washington Post (1/27, D1, Henderson, 744K) reports that retiring Federal Chairman Alan Greenspan "leaves a remarkable political legacy, say Republican and Democratic policymakers who have worked with him in Washington over nearly four decades.' Greenspan "has helped candidates, presidents and lawmakers devise and sell policies on countless social and economic issues. An avowed 'free-enterpriser,' Greenspan consistently pushed for less government regulation, smaller federal budget deficits and freer trade, these observers said."

Democrats Say Up To 50 House Seats Are Up For Grabs. The Wall Street Journal (1/27, Harwood, 2.11M) reports in its "Washington Wire" column, "Parties battle to define 2006 playing field. With most partisan outcomes predictable due to election district gerrymandering, Democratic hopes of regaining House majority depend on expanding number of competitive seats. House Democrats, who need net gain of 15, say outcome remains in doubt in as many as 50 districts."

Reuters (1/27, Whitesides) reports, "Democrats are riding a wave of momentum into November's high-stakes battle for the U.S. Congress, with high hopes for significant gains that could threaten" GOP control of Congress. But "despite the favorable political mood for Democrats, analysts say the party faces major hurdles to gaining the six Senate and 15 House seats needed to reclaim control of Congress. To win majorities, Democrats need to capture most of a small pool of competitive seats in the House while bumping off at least five Republican Senate incumbents -- tough tasks in any political climate, but not impossible. 'It looks like the Democrats will gain seats in the House and Senate, but the question is how many?'" said Larry Sabato, a political analyst at the University of Virginia, adding, "It is going to be hard for Democrats, but if the situation continues to deteriorate for Republicans this year anything is possible." Reuters adds, "The best chance for a Democratic breakthrough could be the Senate, where 33 of 100 seats are on the ballot. Republicans hold 15 of those seats and Democrats 18, but five of the most endangered incumbents at this stage are Republicans. … 'The Democrats have to sweep the competitive Republican races to take power, while holding all of their own. That's tough,' said Jennifer Duffy, an analyst for the nonpartisan Cook Political Report."

Romney Says High Court Should Return Power Over Abortion To States. Knight Ridder (1/27, Thomma) reports that Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney (R), "a possible candidate for the 2008 Republican presidential nomination, said Thursday that his Mormon faith would not matter to the vast majority of voters, including the evangelical Christians who influence his party's politics greatly. 'Americans want people of faith to lead their country,'" he said, adding, "Republicans aren't going to be putting a litmus test against people of my faith." Romney "also said that his views on abortion have evolved since he refused to take either a pro-choice or pro-life label during his 1994 campaign against Sen. Edward Kennedy, R-Mass." He "said personal research about embryonic stem cells convinced him that life begins at conception. He said the Supreme Court should send the power over abortion back to the states by overturning the 1973 Roe v. Wade decision that legalized it nationwide. Still, he said, he would support legalized abortion in his state if his state so chose."

Romney Sees Clinton As Likely To Be '08 Democratic Nominee. The AP (1/27, Miga) reports that Romney "says he expects New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton to be the 2008 Democratic presidential nominee. 'I think the most likely to get the nomination, of course, is Hillary Clinton,' he said during a Christian Science Monitor-sponsored luncheon with reporters on Thursday." Romney also "predicted the Jack Abramoff corruption scandal would not cripple Republicans as they try to keep control of the House and Senate in next fall's midterm elections. 'The idea that money has influence in politics is not a headline story in major parts of the country,' he said."

Romney Offers Some Criticism Of Bush On Iraq, Drug Benefit. The Christian Science Monitor (1/27, Cook, 61K) reports that Romney "appeared at a Monitor-sponsored lunch Thursday and opened some distance between himself and the Bush administration on the war in Iraq and the Medicare prescription drug benefit. … 'There are plenty of places where I would separate from the administration…where I might have chosen another course…certainly with regard to the war in Iraq or the front in Iraq -- were there mistakes made there? Absolutely. Would I have done it differently? Of course. Would the president have done it differently based on what he knows today? Of course, in some measure.' For example, Romney said he would not have rested the whole case for the war in Iraq on finding weapons of mass destruction." Romney "was also critical of the process by which the Republican-controlled Congress and President Bush produced a prescription drug benefit under Medicare. … 'The final product on Medicare Part D, that final bill was sort of sausage squared, the idea you don't want to see how sausage is made,' Romney said." Romney "noted that President Bush 'wanted to bring prescription coverage to seniors. He got that done, that's huge. … It has with it a financial burden which is very large. I don't imagine that that was what he was aiming for when he thought about this during his campaign.'"

The Washington Post (1/27, A4, Balz, Cillizza, 744K) reports that Romney "put some distance yesterday between himself and the Bush administration on the issue of health care, criticizing the White House for failing to demand significant reforms in Medicare and Medicaid when Congress enacted a prescription drug benefit for senior citizens." Romney also discussed "his evolution on the issue of abortion (from once eschewing labels to now calling himself "pro-life"), whether his Mormon religion will hurt him if he runs for president (only with a tiny percentage of the electorate, he said), his management style (heavy on analysis) and health care for all citizens, which is a top priority of his back home." The Post adds, "Toward the end he was asked about 2008, Iraq, and the possibility that he and Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) might end up as rivals. 'Do you fantasize about that?' he was asked. 'Not about that, no,' he replied to laughter."

Romney Doubts His Religion Will Hurt Him With Evangelicals. The Washington Times (1/27, Pierce, 90K) reports in its "Inside Politics" column that Romney "says he isn't afraid that evangelical and born-again Christian voters will stiff-arm him in the 2008 GOP primaries just because he's a Mormon. … He said most voters in his state are Catholics, but they could not care less about his religion."

Scranton Fires Campaign Manager After Swann Comments. The Washington Post (1/27, ,A4, Balz, Cillizza, 744K) reports that former Pennsylvania lieutenant governor Bill Scranton fired his campaign manager Wednesday "after the man accused former Pittsburgh Steeler Lynn Swann (R), who is black, of being the 'rich white guy'" in the Pennsylvania GOP gubernatorial primary race. Scranton "said the remarks by James Seif 'in no way whatsoever reflect my views or those of my campaign.' Both Scranton and Seif are white."

Cox Decides Against Reentering New York Senate Contest. The AP (1/27, Humbert) reports that Manhattan lawyer Edward Cox (R), a son-in-law of the late President Richard Nixon, "said Thursday he would not resume his campaign for the Republican nomination to challenge Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton's re-election bid this year." Cox "suspended his campaign in October after Republican Gov. George Pataki endorsed then-Westchester County District Attorney Jeanine Pirro's bid for the Senate nomination. Her campaign subsequently collapsed and Pirro heeded the call of state GOP leaders to run instead for state attorney general. That left former Yonkers Mayor John Spencer, little-known statewide, as the leading contender for the GOP nomination. Some GOP leaders pressed Cox to consider getting back in the race. However, Cox said in a statement issued Thursday that 'after careful consideration of the circumstances and conditions as they exist surrounding the race, including the now shortened time frame available to run an aggressive and effective campaign, I will not seek my party's nomination.'"

The New York Times (1/27, Medina, 1.19M) relates that Cox's "exit is yet another blow to Republican efforts to mount a credible challenge to Mrs. Clinton, whom many expect to run for president in 2008." Democrats "were quick to poke fun at the opposition on Thursday. In a press release, they called Mr. Spencer the 'eighth choice' and listed several other Republicans who had been pressed to run for office. … 'Note to the New York State Republican Party: Don't despair, you may not have to settle for John Spencer just yet,' said the statement by Blake Zeff, the state Democratic Party spokesman. 'There are still about a dozen registered Republicans left in New York who you haven't asked yet.'"

Episcopalians Weigh Sainthood For Thurgood Marshall. Delegates to the annual convention of the Episcopal diocese of Washington will vote today on a proposal that would designate the late Supreme Court Justice Thurgood Marshall as a saint. The Washington Post (1/27, B9, Murphy, 744K) reports, "If Marshall is added to the church's roster of saints, May 17 -- the date of the 1954 Supreme Court ruling that segregated schools are unconstitutional -- would be observed as Marshall Feast Day. Church officials say they expect the 300 or so delegates to approve the resolution, which was drawn up by members of St. Augustine's Church in Southwest Washington, where Marshall worshiped."

Administration Supports Russian Plan To Address Iran Nuclear Concerns. While President Bush praised the Russian plan to allow Iran to operate civilian nuclear plants with oversight by Russian and international observers, the Administration was seen as remaining split on pursuing action with the UN Security Council. The CBS Evening News (1/26, story 2, 3:30, Roberts) was the only network news program to note, "The President got what looked like a sliver of good news on the Iranian nuclear crisis today after initially rejecting a proposal to move its uranium enrichment program to Russia, officials in Tehran today said it's worth talking about." President Bush: "I think that's a good plan. The Russians came up with the idea and I support it. It is not in the world's interest that they have a weapon." Roberts: "But State Department officials tell CBS News tonight they don't see much reason to get excited, pointing out that Iran has misled Russia before and was likely to do so again." And the Administration is "going to keep up the pressure to get that referral from the atomic energy agency to get Iran hauled before the UN Security Council. But there is where there's a split in the Administration. Some diplomats think maybe the security council can put enough pressure on Iran that it would back down. Other diplomats told me today they don't think it would go anywhere at the Security Council because they'd never get a unified front against Iran."

The New York Times (1/27, Sanger, Sciolino, 1.19M) reports, "Bush's explicit public endorsement puts all of the major powers on record supporting the proposal, even as most acknowledge that it is a significant concession to Iran and runs the risk that the country will drag out the negotiations while continuing to produce nuclear material. Yet officials say they believe it is the best face-saving strategy to pursue a negotiated settlement with Iran." The President "did not discuss the details of the Russian offer. But American, European and Russian officials…said the offer would allow Iran to continue operations at the plant that turns yellowcake, a concentrated form of uranium ore, into uranium hexafluoride, a toxic material that centrifuges spin into fuel for reactors or bombs.

Reuters (1/27) adds that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "showed little patience with Iran's belated interest in" the Russian plan, saying it "shows the Iranians are feeling the heat."

The New York Times (1/27, Sanger, Sciolino, 1.19M) also reports that at the press conference Bush said, "The Iranians have said, 'We want a weapon.'" But, "Iran has denied that it is pursuing a weapon, and in the afternoon, the White House spokesman, Scott McClellan, acknowledged that Mr. Bush had misspoken." McClellan said, "He was referring to their behavior. … Our concern is their intention is to develop a nuclear weapon under the guise of a civilian program." But "Bush's slip may cement the perception among some members of the board of the International Atomic Energy Agency that he has decided, at least in his own mind, that Iran is intent on building a weapon as fast as it can, a situation he has said repeatedly that he will not tolerate. Mr. Bush gave no hint on Thursday that he was thinking of military action, instead saying that 'we are working hard to continue the diplomacy necessary to send a focused message to the Iranian government, and that is: "Your desires for a weapon are unacceptable."'"

The Washington Post (1/27, A14, Cody, 744K) reports China's endorsement of the Russian proposal "suggested that the idea of having Iran send uranium to Russia for enrichment might become the common denominator of an agreement on preventing the Iranian government from developing nuclear weapons, rather than the sanctions envisioned by the Bush administration." The Post notes, "Deputy Secretary of State Robert B. Zoellick had urged the Chinese leadership on Tuesday to join the United States and other nations in taking urgent steps to make sure Iran does not expand its nuclear research program into weapons production. China agrees that Iran should not have nuclear weapons, he said afterward, but differs with Washington over how to prevent it and how fast a solution has to be found." Chinese experts "predicted that China would likely abstain in a vote on sanctions, seeking to maintain its good relations with Washington.

The New York Times (1/27, Sanger, Sciolino, 1.19M) also notes, "While China favored the Russian proposal, it also firmly opposed the use of sanctions. That comes as a disappointment to Washington, which this week sent a top official to persuade China's leaders that they should do far more."

Poll Shows Majority Supports Military Action If Iran Pursues Nuclear Course. The Los Angeles Times (1/27, Miller, 958K) reports, "Despite persistent disillusionment with the war in Iraq, a majority of Americans supports taking military action against Iran if that country continues to produce material that can be used to develop nuclear weapons," a Los Angeles Times/Bloomberg poll of 1,555 adults conducted Sunday Jan. 22 through Wednesday Jan. 25 (+/-3%) shows The survey shows "that 57% of Americans favor military intervention if Iran's Islamic government pursues a program that could enable it to build nuclear arms." It suggests "that the difficulties the United States has encountered in Iraq have not turned the public against the possibility of military actions elsewhere in the Middle East."

ElBaradei Hopes Russian Proposal Will End Stand Off. The AP (1/27, Lederer) reports, "U.N. nuclear chief Mohamed ElBaradei said Thursday he was hopeful that a Russian proposal could help break the standoff over Iran's nuclear research and enrichment plans." He "said he was happy that earlier in the day Iran's top nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani, said Russia's proposal to move Iran's enrichment program to Russian territory was 'a positive one.'"

US Backs Iranian Move On Gay Rights Organizations. The Washington Post (1/27, A21, Kamen, 744K) reports in its "In the Loop" column that Bush Administration officials "scrambled yesterday to come to grips with the radical Hamas's stunning election victory in Palestinian elections. President Bush rejected dealing with a party that has an armed wing and vows the destruction of Israel. But there's precedent for a more optimistic view in the long run. Take, for example, U.S. relations with Iran's President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad . He advocates nuking Israel and is allegedly developing his own bombs." The Post adds, "Even so, Washington has discovered there are always ways to work together, to find common ground. For example, human rights groups Monday condemned a U.S. move 'back[ing] an Iranian initiative to deny United Nations consultative status' in the Economic and Social Council to gay rights organizations."

Mexican Official Suggests Border Incursion Was Undercover US Drug Operation. The AP (1/26) reported Mexican Foreign Secretary Luis Ernesto Derbez "suggested Thursday that American soldiers disguised as Mexican troops may have been in the military-style Humvee filmed earlier this week protecting a marijuana shipment on the border." Derbez said at "a news conference that US soldiers had helped drug smugglers before. However, he offered no evidence." Derbez said, "And just as that has happened ... it is very probable that something like that could have happened, that in reality they were members of some of their groups disguised as Mexican soldiers with Humvees." He added that "there was no proof that the men seen in the incident were Mexicans. Derbez also said his country will send a diplomatic note to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice demanding that US officials tone down their comments on Mexico's security and immigration problems."

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff's statements last week that reports of Mexican military incursions were overblown have been criticized frequently by the primetime cable news hosts. Senator Kay Bailey Hutchison appeared on Fox News' The Big Story (1/26) where she discussed the issue of Mexican military incursions. Host John Gibson: "Senator, you wrote a letter to the Secretary of the Department of Homeland Security, Michael Chertoff. He does not seem to be taking this very seriously. He calls these routine, accidental incursions. Texas authorities think they're much more serious than that. Have you been able to persuade the secretary to regard this as a serious matter and do something about it?" Hutchison: "Well, certainly we are encouraging the secretary to take action, to ask for an investigation, which the Mexican government has said they'll do."

On CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (1/26) host Lou Dobbs said, "The question has to be, why is the White House silent on this issue? Why is the man in charge of our homeland security, that is Homeland Security Department Secretary Michael Chertoff, so timid and so unconcerned or interested?"

US-Mexico Quarrels Over Border Said To Show "Deteriorating Relationship." The New York Times (1/27, McKinley, 1.19M) reports, "The United States and Mexico exchanged diplomatic broadsides on Thursday over border security and drug-related violence in another sign of their deteriorating relationship. The American ambassador, Antonio O. Garza Jr., sent a formal note to the Mexican government demanding an investigation of" Monday's smuggling incident in Texas. Garza "took the unusual step of not only announcing the note, but promising to send a second one to express concern about a rise in drug-related violence in border towns and recent attacks on American Border Patrol agents. … Hours later the Mexican foreign minister, Luis Ernesto Derbez, suggested that it was Mr. Garza who appeared to be playing to a crowd for political reasons."

Current Border Situation Compared To 1916. The Washington Times (1/27, McCain, 90K) reports in a front page article that "the White House is speaking of its 'concern about the reports' of Monday's border crossing, which a spokesman described as 'an incident that is under investigation.' Yet in 1916, when Pancho Villa's bandits raided Columbus, NM, a Democratic president didn't hesitate. President Woodrow Wilson sent Gen. John 'Black Jack' Pershing to lead an expedition into Mexico. A $5,000 bounty was offered for Villa's capture, and Army posters invoked 'The Flag, Old Glory' in calling for 25,000 recruits: 'Come on, boys, be ready to shoulder the trusty Springfield.'" However, "the historic situation during Villa's day was much different, said James Carafano, a senior fellow at the Heritage Foundation. 'Mexico back then didn't have a strong central government,' said Mr. Carafano, who specializes in defense and homeland-security issues. 'There was no rule of law. I don't think you can compare that to Mexico today."

DEA Finds Smuggling Tunnel Under Mexican Border Containing Nearly Two Tons Of Marijuana. ABC World News Tonight (1/26, story 6, 1:50, Vargas) reported, "In California, a secret tunnel used to smuggle drugs and people under the border has been uncovered. It's just one of many found in recent years. Officials say criminals are increasingly digging tunnels to bypass border patrols and move their contraband into the US." ABC (Thomas): "The DEA says it was a major gateway for illegal immigrants and drugs coming from Mexico." DEA Chief of Operations Michael Braun: "These tunnels are absolutely critical to these major drug-trafficking organizations and alien smuggling groups. Arms smuggling groups." Thomas: "US officials say the border has become ground zero for an explosion in illegal activity. Washington is now leaning heavily on Mexico to help put a stop to it." US Border Patrol Chief David Aguilar: "We have gotten a commitment to work with us on this. We have gotten a commitment to find out and get to the bottom of this." Thomas: "Before tons more illegal drugs find their way across the border."

NBC Nightly News (1/26, story9, :45, Williams) reported, "Out of California a big discovery to report a drug tunnel that authorities say runs the length of 12 football fields from Mexico into California, it's a tunnel so big the federal government says you can drive a car through it. The tunnel begins in a warehouse in Tijuana, ends in the San Diego area, it's used apparently for smuggling people and/or drugs. US officials say they found more than two tons of marijuana inside."

The New York Times (1/27, Archibold, 1.19M) reports, "Drug smugglers have dug one of the longest, most sophisticated tunnels discovered in recent years along the Mexican border, and the American and Mexican authorities have hauled nearly two tons of marijuana out of it since they entered it on Wednesday, officials said." Stretching from "a warehouse near the international airport in Tijuana, Mexico, to a vacant industrial building in Otay Mesa, Calif.," the tunnel's sophistication has "surprised officials, who found it outfitted with a concrete floor, electricity, lights and ventilation and groundwater pumping systems. … 'The tunnel is absolutely amazing,' said Michael Unzueta, special agent in charge for the federal Immigration and Customs Enforcement agency's San Diego office." CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (1/26, Dobbs) reported, 'Tonight, homeland security officials say they have shut down the largest border tunnel ever discovered on the US-Mexican border. … Police were first tipped off to it…two years ago. They finally found it."

Proliferation Of Tunnels Seen As Result Of Increased Border Security. The Washington Post (1/27, A3, Pomfret, 744K) reports "experts said the passageway bore all the hallmarks of an operation by a major drug cartel." Unzueta said, "Whether they are designed to smuggle drugs, people, weapons or other contraband, these tunnels pose a threat to our nation's security." The Post continues, "Federal agents have concluded that drug traffickers and smugglers of illegal immigrants have been heading underground to escape tighter enforcement along the border. Customs officials announced this week that drug seizures at California border crossings rose 24 percent in the past fiscal year. More than 127 tons of drugs were seized, the vast majority of that marijuana, in the year ending Sept. 30." The Washington Times (1/27, Seper, 90K) reports, "Since the September 11 attacks, federal authorities have discovered more than 20 cross-border tunnels along the US-Mexico border in California and Arizona. Authorities said they were unsure how long the tunnel had been in operation. They also said they did not know what drug organization might have used it."

Mexican Human Rights Commission Cancels Plan To Distribute Border Maps. Though the Mexican government has sought to distance itself from a human rights commission's plan to distribute maps of the Arizona desert, the plan has generally been depicted in print and on TV as a Mexican initiative. Under the headline "Mexico Nixes Border Maps For Migrants," The Washington Times (1/27, Seper, 90K) reports in a front page article that following an announcement Tuesday that it would distribute 70,000 border maps with safety instructions and tips to migrants aiming to cross illegally into the United States, The National Human Rights Commission (NHRC) in Mexico City canceled its plans yesterday, while maintaining that the decision was not "a reaction to criticism by Bush-administration officials." The commission "said it 'rethought' the decision after human rights organizations in several border states said the maps would show anti-immigration groups -- and watchdogs such as the Minutemen volunteers -- where the migrants were likely to travel. … The NHRC cited the Minutemen as a sign that anti-immigrant extremism was on the rise in the United States." Meanwhile, "Minuteman co-founder Chris Simcox said the NHRC's decision demonstrated the effectiveness of the 'peaceful, law-abiding actions by Minuteman volunteers' to secure the nation's borders."

In a discussion about the NHRC's cancelled plans on Fox News' O'Reilly Factor (1/26, O'Reilly), host Bill O'Reilly suggested to Rep. Tom Tancredo that "somebody got to Vicente Fox on this." Tancredo said, "I think so, Bill. I think that they could not spin it anymore. They tried their best to spin it as something they were just doing to make sure that people were being safe, that it was not encouraging illegal immigration. But it was so blatantly encouraging illegal immigration that they couldn't spin it anymore, so they backed away from it." Later, discussing the issue of Mexican military incursions, Tancredo was asked whether he thought Monday's incident involve the Mexican military protecting "dope dealers." Tancredo said, "I absolutely believe that." O'Reilly: "It's not hard to believe. We know that's been going down. But the Mexican government flat out denies it." Tancredo: "Absolutely. And they're embarrassed by it. And we won't pursue it because we're embarrassed by it, I suppose. We're embarrassed by the fact that we won't protect our own borders."

US, China Remain Divided Over Piracy. The Wall Street Journal (1/27, Hiebert, 2.11M) reports, "China and the U.S. traded barbs over Beijing's failure to respond to Washington's request for details about Chinese efforts to combat piracy, in a development that could exacerbate already testy bilateral trade relations." The Journal notes, "U.S. trade officials said China missed a Jan. 23 deadline set by Washington to get information on how Beijing has sought to rein in rampant piracy, including any penalties it has imposed on violators. Chinese authorities, for their part, have challenged Washington's right to make such a request under World Trade Organization rules." The dispute "could prompt the U.S. Congress to press the administration of President George W. Bush to take its case against China to the global trade body, and it cast a cloud over the planned visit to America by Chinese President Hu Jintao in April, U.S. businessmen in Beijing said.

Bush, Rice Call On North Korea To Stop Counterfeiting US Currency. Reuters (1/27) reports, "President George W. Bush vowed on Thursday to uphold U.S. law and continue a crackdown on North Korea for counterfeiting American dollar bills." At a press conference Bush said, "There is no compromise ... We are going to uphold the law and protect the currency of the American people." North Korea "has said it would be unthinkable to return to six-country nuclear talks…when Washington is trying to bring down its rulers with 'financial sanctions.'" Although "Bush showed no give on the crackdown on the North's suspected illicit activities, he reaffirmed that 'we want the six party talks to continue ... I think the framework is a framework that can eventually yield to a political settlement of the issue.'"

Reuters (1/26, Pleming) reported Secretary Rice said the US "is ready to resume six-party nuclear talks with North Korea 'immediately' as long as Pyongyang does not impose any conditions." Reuters said Pyongyang has said "it would be unthinkable to return to talks" while counterfeiting-related penalties are in place. Rice said the situation could be resolved when North Korea begins "living up to the law." According to Reuters, Rice "said the United States chief negotiator in the talks had made it very clear during meetings in Beijing this month that Washington wanted the six-party talks to continue. 'No conditions. We will do it immediately,' Rice said."

North Korea Leading Source Of Counterfeit Cigarettes. The Wall Street Journal (1/27, Fairclough, 2.11M) reports that North Korea "has become a leading source of counterfeit cigarettes -- with the capacity to churn out more than two billion packs a year, tobacco companies say. Philip Morris, a unit of New York-based Altria Group Inc., says over the past several years it has discovered North Korean-made knockoffs of its Marlboro brand in more than 1,300 places." U.S. officials "seized more than a billion fake smokes, many allegedly from North Korea, in California last year as part of an undercover operation targeting Asian smugglers. Millions more packs of bogus Marlboros, Mild Sevens and other cigarettes made in North Korea have been confiscated in Taiwan, the Philippines, Vietnam and Belize." And a senior Administration official said, "Much more dangerous things than cigarettes can flow along these same routes."

Rice Says India Has "Difficult Choices" In Nuclear Deal. Reuters (1/27) reports Secretary Rice said "India has 'difficult choices' to make on a controversial civil nuclear cooperation agreement with the United States before the deal can be completed." Senior-level talks have "failed to close the gap on major issues, including which Indian facilities would be designated as civilian and military." The latter "would still be off-limits to U.N. monitors."

US Embassy Corrects Report Of Ambassador's Comments. The New York Times (1/27, Sanger, Sciolino, 1.19M) at the end of an article on the Russian proposal to solve the nuclear dispute with Iran also notes, "India responded testily yesterday to American suggestions of a quid pro quo in its blossoming relations with the United States, with the Indian foreign secretary calling in the United States ambassador over his reported remarks about how India should vote next week on whether to refer the case of Iran's nuclear ambitions to the United Nations Security Council." US ambassador to India David Mulford "had been quoted by the Press Trust of India news agency as saying that if India did not vote to refer Iran to the Security Council, it would be 'devastating' to its chances of securing the nuclear deal with the United States." The US embassy "later said that the comments had been taken 'out of context' and released a full transcript. In it, Mr. Mulford first said that India would be expected to vote 'based on India's judgment of its own national interest.'"

US Seeks Overhaul Of UN Human Rights Commission. The Washington Times (1/27, Sands, 90K) reports, "A major overhaul of the United Nations' discredited human rights agency is 'quite likely' this year, the State Department's lead negotiator said yesterday, but he also said the United States would insist on real reforms before agreeing to a deal." Deputy assistant secretary of state for international organization affairs Mark Lagon said, "I think it is quite likely we can get a new human rights council, although it is not certain."

Former Pakistani Leader Dismisses Interpol Notices. The Washington Times (1/27, Li, 90K) reports, "Former Pakistani Prime Minister Benazir Bhutto said yesterday that 'red notices' issued by Interpol for her and her husband, Asif Ali Zardari, are groundless and politically motivated." She "said her attorney is contacting Interpol to confirm the warrants, and if they exist, to ask on what grounds they were issued." She said the notices were issued because "the government of President Pervez Musharraf wants to 'divert the attention' of the Pakistani people from the recent U.S. missile strike in a region bordering Afghanistan that killed at least 13 civilians."

New Canadian Leader Challenges US Over Control Of Arctic Waters. The New York Times (1/27, Krauss, 1.19M) reports, "Stephen Harper, Canada's prime minister-designate, reproached the American ambassador on Thursday over an old difference of opinion about the control of Arctic waters claimed by Canada." He "is widely expected to usher in warmer relations with the Bush administration," yet "the honeymoon took at least a temporary break when Mr. Harper reacted to a news report about comments made by the United States ambassador, David H. Wilkins, taking issue with Canada's assertion of sovereignty in northern Arctic water passages." US diplomats "said that Mr. Wilkins had stated nothing more than an old policy in answering a student's question. They said he did not criticize a plan Mr. Harper announced during the campaign to build and deploy three new armed heavy icebreaking ships and construct a deep-water port in the Arctic territorial capital, Iqaluit."

The Washington Post (1/27, A19, Struck, 744K) adds, "The Liberal government Harper will replace has made similar claims and proposals. But it was unexpected that Harper would launch a sharp verbal attack against the United States on this subject so quickly, and he extended a press conference announcing his Feb. 6 inauguration to bring it up."

Return Of Oil Companies To Libya May Prompt Reform. The Christian Science Monitor (1/27, Martelli, 61K) reports that "the companies that helped create Libya's oil industry in the 1970s are returning as Qaddafi rebuilds bridges to the West that he burned long ago, and this may help to precipitate political, as well as economic, change." Yet "Qaddafi remains an autocratic leader, and genuine economic and political reform is nowhere on the horizon, according to many Libyans." And "endemic corruption and high unemployment persist, and the lack of real economic incentives is driving skilled professionals out of the country, says Ezzedin Dibashi, an oil consultant based in London who used to work at NOC. 'Doctors, engineers, and economists are going elsewhere, rather than subsist on 600 Libyan dinars ($450) per month.'"

Georgia Experiences Blackouts After Energy Sources Disrupted. The New York Times (1/27, Chivers, 1.19M) reports, "Energy shortages struck Georgia anew on Thursday as a wind storm toppled a major power transmission line and Russia's gas monopoly failed to restore the flow of natural gas to the country after pipelines were sabotaged last weekend, energy officials said." The country "has been without its Russian gas, and with limited electricity, for five days. Officials in both countries initially hoped that the supplies could be swiftly restored. But after a respite from the shortages on Monday, the problems have worsened, bringing fresh hardships to Georgia and further tarnishing Russia's image as an energy supplier."

Prospects For Resolution Of Doha Trade Talks Dim. The Wall Street Journal (1/27, Miller, Champion, Switzerland, 2.11M) reports, "Major trading nations are hardening their positions as they head into the first round of trade talks since the recent Hong Kong sessions faltered, renewing the possibility of a watered-down result of four years of negotiations." During the World Economic Summit in Davos EU trade commissioner Peter Mandelson "said Europe stood to lose 'next to nothing' if talks failed and repeated strongly that he would make no further offers unless other countries make concessions. Earlier this week, he told the European Parliament that Europe could settle for 'a minimalist outcome, if that is what the rest of the world wants.'" Meanwhile, "U.S. Trade Representative Rob Portman said Thursday that he needs an ambitious round to sell a trade package to Congress. U.S. legislators, he said, won't approve a deal to cut politically important farm subsidies unless they can show their constituents that U.S. farmers will benefit from lower global farm tariffs and greater opportunities to sell industrial goods and services."

Meanwhile, the Financial Times (1/27, Beattie) reports under the headline "US Signals New Approach To Doha Round Of Trade Talks," Portman said Thursday that the Doha round of trade talks "had to move forward on all fronts, as the European Union said it would lose 'next to nothing' if the talks failed." According to the Times, the "shift of emphasis in the US's position ahead of a meeting of trade ministers on Saturday came amid accusations that the tough negotiating tactics of big farm exporters like Brazil were holding up progress." For his part, EU trade commissioner Peter Mandelson "raised the stakes" by saying that the EU would lose "next to nothing" if the talks failed. "The alliance between the US and Brazil has led to stalemate in these talks," he said. "It has now become self-defeating," he continued.

Portman Says Germany's Merkel Can Help Advance Talks. The AP (1/27) reports, "New German Chancellor Angela Merkel could help advance stalled global trade talks by offsetting the protective mindset of French officials in EU policy," US trade chief Rob Portman said Thursday. Noting that a "key issue holding up talks has been access to European Union farm markets," Portman "said Germany could act as a counterweight to France, which has been particularly defensive in wanting to protect its agriculture markets." Portman said, "I'm hopeful that she [Merkel] can help us to come together with an agreement this year."

Call For Boycott Of Israel Causes Stir At World Economic Forum. The New York Times (1/27, Landler, Markoff, 1.19M) reports, "A magazine article calling on nations to boycott Israel because of its treatment of Palestinians has provoked a tempest at the World Economic Forum's annual meeting here, prompting the organizers to pull the magazines from the forum's shelves here and issue an apology." The timing, following the Hamas election victory, "was not lost on people here. The future of Israeli and Palestinian relations was high on the agenda on Thursday at this meeting of about 2,300 political figures, private groups and corporate executives." Meanwhile, "Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice spoke via satellite during a panel here, reaffirming the position of the United States that Hamas must renounce violence and recognize Israel's right to exist."

Washington Post (1/27, A23, 744K) writes, "Davos has come to symbolize the dominant force of our time -- the wealth-creating, job-destroying whirlwind of the global economy. Each year I come here I marvel at the reach and leveling power of this economic hurricane. There are more Chinese, Indians and Arabs every year, and less of an American presence. … The one thing they seem to have in common is that nearly all were educated in the United States." Ignatius concludes, "Business today is the leading agent of social change. That's really the message of Davos. It can be a pitiless process, and its seamless efficiency is in frightening contrast to the incompetence and mismanagement of the public sector. Globalization can be tamed, but it can't be stopped -- nor should it be. I just wish other things in the world worked as well."

Growing Populism May Challenge Globalization. In contrast to Ignatius, Floyd Norris in his column in the New York Times (1/27, 1.19M) writes, "Among the business and political leaders who gather here each year for the World Economic Forum, there has long been broad agreement that globalization is good." Yet "this year there is a growing doubt -- not in the validity of the message, but in whether it is losing believers among the broad populace of the world." One example is the election of Bolivian president Evo Morales which "continued a recent leftist trend in Latin America." Norris notes, "Perhaps those who resent globalization will remain powerless. But their ranks could swell if the world economy weakens." Harvard University president Lawrence Summers "asserts that globalization will not be derailed." And "people could just accept a world in which some are very wealthy and others provide services to them. Elaine L. Chao, the United States labor secretary, said the job outlook in the United States was bright for plumbers and electricians."

Businessman Downplays Importance Of World Economic Forum. Former Vanguard Group CEO John Bogle, author of "The Battle for the Soul of Capitalism" in an op-ed in the Wall Street Journal (1/27, 2.11M) writes, "I already knew, as I suspect everyone there knew, that 'China, India [are] Key to the Future,' CNN's headline about Chancellor Merkel's speech. And I didn't need to fly to Davos to learn that 'plumbers, construction workers, and electricians' will still be needed in the global economy of the future. With 226 sessions, I would have had to miss at least 200 anyway." Yet "I may just be jealous. Perhaps if I call President Clinton I can hitch a ride on his jet, arriving late tomorrow afternoon for a closing panel with Forum founder Klaus Schwab. Then I'd have avoided all the foolish, self-righteous show-biz baloney, but be able to assure my pals: 'Yes, I was at Davos, 2006.'"

EU Issues Deadline For France To End Protectionism. The Financial Times (1/27, Buck) reports, "France has been given a one-month deadline to justify its contentious decree protecting a large number of domestic firms from foreign takeovers or face legal action from Brussels." EU internal market commissioner Charlie McCreevy "has rounded on the French government's action, dismissing key provisions of the decree – issued on December 31 – as 'discriminatory' and 'protectionist'." The "intervention underlines the Commission's deep concerns about the rise of protectionist measures in the 25 EU member states."

Former Kosovo Leader Mourned. The New York Times (1/27, Wood, 1.19M) reports, "Kosovo's Albanian majority gathered by the tens of thousands on Thursday to bid farewell to their" former president Ibrahim Rugova "in a proud and somber funeral ceremony that seemed to underscore their aspirations for independence." He "was given every honor the region could muster."

Columnist Warns Bolivian Poor Will Suffer Under Morales Rule. Mary Anastasia O'Grady in her "the Americas" column in the Wall Street Journal (1/27, 2.11M) writes, "In just a few short days," new Bolivian president Evo Morales "has built a cabinet of radical and Marxist militants, purged the Bolivian military and signed a pile of 'agreements' with his Venezuelan mentor Hugo Chávez. There are reports that Cuban security agents are already working for the new president much as they do for Chávez." O'Grady continues, "The most tragic aspect of Evo's decision to let Cuba and Venezuela annex his country is where this all leads for the majority Indian population in one of the region's poorest countries. … They no doubt think that Evo…will care for his own in ways that the white, upper-class leadership never did. But Fidel long ago destroyed underclass hopes for a better life and Hugo is doing the same."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Bush Defends Domestic Wiretapping Program.

President Bush yesterday defended the NSA's domestic surveillance program during a wide-ranging press conference. While Bush's reaction to the Palestinian election grabbed most headlines, his comments on the NSA issue were covered by all three network news programs, and are receiving some attention from most major newspapers this morning. The CBS Evening News (1/26, story 2, 3:30, Roberts) noted, "The President insisted again today he's on solid legal ground and was skeptical about increasing talk in Congress to write new laws covering the program." The New York Times (1/27, Bumiller, 1.19M) adds the President "said that efforts in Congress to write legislation expressly giving him authority for such a program were unnecessary and dangerous." Bush's "46-minute news conference, announced less than an hour and a half ahead of time, was an effort by the White House to frame the debate on an array of foreign and domestic issues only five days before his State of the Union address." Bush "appeared relaxed in the briefing room, which his aides say he prefers for news conferences instead of the more formal East Room. He appeared apprehensive at first, but loosened up when he saw a camera dangling precariously from a cord in the ceiling, threatening to crash down on the heads of reporters."

The Washington Post (1/27, A6, VandeHei, 744K) headlines its story "Bush Reasserts Presidential Prerogatives," and says that comments by Bush on hurricane Katrina, the Abramoff scandal and the NSA program show "he is determined to assert presidential prerogatives." Bush "said he is concerned about Congress writing a new spying law because it could force the government to provide details and clues about a top-secret program used to hunt down terrorists." Bush is quoted saying of the program, "There's no doubt in my mind it is legal."

In a similar story, the Washington Times (1/27, Curl, 90K) reports Bush "yesterday said he has exclusive authority over a broad range of issues -- including forbidding White House officials to testify before Congress about the government's Hurricane Katrina response and ordering warrantless electronic surveillance within the United States." Said Bush, "Conducting war is a responsibility in the executive branch, not the legislative branch." The AP (1/27, Hunt) quotes Bush saying, "The program's legal, it's designed to protect civil liberties, and it's necessary."

ABC's World News Tonight (1/26, story 4, 1:50, Vargas) reported that at the White House "they think" the issue "is a political winner." Bush "he didn't seem to get too rattled when one reporter compared him to Richard Nixon." The Washington Post (1/27, A7, Milbank, 744K) reports that "the Los Angeles Times's James Gerstenzang offered an observation on Bush's surveillance policy: 'This seems to sound like something President Nixon once said, which was: "When the president does it, then that means that it's not illegal." Whispered 'oohs' could be heard in the room." Bush "gave a look indicating he wished the dangling camera had fallen on Gerstenzang." Answered Bush, "Most presidents believe that during a time of war that we can use our authorities under the Constitution to make decisions necessary to protect us."

NBC Nightly News (1/26, story 2, 2:00, Fletcher) reported that in addition to dismissing the need for lawmakers to change the NSA terrorist monitoring program, Bush also "provided new ammunition for his critics by calling the 1978 Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, FISA, the law Congress passed to restrict domestic spying, outdated." Bush: "The FISA law was written in 1978. We're having this discussion in 2006. It's a different world. I said, look, is it possible to conduct this program under the old law? And people said, it doesn't work in order to be able to do the job we expect us to do."

Fox News' Special Report (1/26, Angle) reported, "The President explained once again that the communications intercepts done without warrants are always aimed at suspected terrorists overseas. … The President insists they do not tap calls made entirely within the US. Everyone agrees eavesdropping on purely domestic communications would require warrants. So when one reporter suggested the President is circumventing FISA, the President strenuously objected."

Under the headline "Bush To Resist Wiretap Legislation," the Wall Street Journal (1/27, Cooper, 2.11M) reports Bush "suggested he will resist any congressional attempts to modify the administration's practice of conducting warrantless wiretaps, saying the program is already legal and would lose effectiveness if subjected to a protracted public debate." The President "said yesterday that while he will consider congressional suggestions to modify the program," but "he won't support public debate that divulges how it works -- even if lawmakers' intent is to preserve the program." Reuters (1/27, Zakaria) also says Bush "said he would resist changing laws governing such action if it meant revealing secrets to an enemy."

Administration Has Given At Least Two Rationales For Domestic Surveillance. The Washington Post (1/27, A5, Eggen, Pincus, 744K) reports that President Bush's claim that he did not seek congressional approval for the warranteless domestic eavesdropping program because he did not need it is "one of several explanations on the topic from Bush and his aides, who have provided at least two separate rationales for why they did not ask for statutory authority for the program. Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales said the administration had considered seeking legislation but determined it would be impossible to get, adding later in the same news conference that authorities did not want to expose the program's existence. White House spokesman Scott McClellan has echoed the latter point, saying the administration feared that details of the classified program would be exposed publicly." The Post adds, "The subject is one of several elements in the NSA spying debate that have been clouded by apparent contradictions and mixed messages from the government since the program was revealed last month. … Before the program's existence was revealed, several administration officials also emphasized in testimony and public statements that the NSA was prohibited from engaging in domestic surveillance -- even as the agency was clearly doing so under the authority of Bush's secret order that established the program."

Poll Shows Support For NSA Surveillance Program. The CBS Evening News (1/26, story 2, 3:30, Roberts) noted, "On the NSA spying program, President Bush went into today's press conference with a boost. A new CBS news 'New York Times' poll found 61% of Americans believe the eavesdropping is meant to fight terror and the majority support that." CBS anchor Bob Schieffer later noted, "It looks to me as if the President has decided to make this a political issue to show that he is strong in the fight against terrorism and perhaps the Democrats are weak. And I must say looking al that poll, he may be succeeding." Roberts: "A political issue and a national security issue which history would show President does very well on. You take a look at that poll, the majority of Americans think if it's directed at terrorism it's the right thing to do."

The New York Times (1/27, Nagourney, Elder, 1.19M), however, headlines its story "New Poll Finds Mixed Support For Wiretaps," and says Americans "are concerned that the aggressive antiterrorism programs championed by the Bush administration are encroaching on civil liberties, according to the latest New York Times/CBS News poll." The Times adds, "In a sign that public opinion about the trade-offs between national security and individual rights is nuanced and remains highly unresolved, responses to questions about the administration's eavesdropping program varied significantly depending on how the questions were worded, underlining the importance of the effort by the White House this week to define the issue on its terms. … In one striking finding, respondents overwhelmingly supported e-mail and telephone monitoring directed at 'Americans that the government is suspicious of;' they overwhelmingly opposed the same kind of surveillance if it was aimed at 'ordinary Americans.'"

FBI Begins Interviews In NSA Surveillance Program Leak Probe. Fox News' Special Report (1/26, Angle) reported, "Law enforcement sources tell Fox News that in the past few weeks, FBI agents have begun their investigation into who leaked details of the highly classified program to The New York Times. Agents began close to home, interviewing officials from the Justice Department and the FBI at the outset of their investigation."

Rove Comments Blasted. Under the headline "A Discredit To The GOP," the Washington Post (1/27, A22, 744K) editorializes, "The Bush administration's distortion, for political purposes, of the Democratic position on warrantless surveillance is loathsome. Despite the best efforts of Karl Rove, the White House deputy chief of staff, and Ken Mehlman, the Republican National Committee chairman, to make it seem otherwise, Democrats are not opposed to vigorous, effective surveillance that could uncover terrorist activity. Nor are the concerns that they are expressing unique to their party. Republican Sens. John McCain (Ariz.), Arlen Specter (Pa.), Chuck Hagel (Neb.), Lindsey O. Graham (S.C.) and Sam Brownback (Kan.) have expressed legal doubts about the surveillance program." The Post adds, "Maybe, as a matter of crass political calculation, Mr. Rove and Mr. Mehlman are correct that Democrats criticizing warrantless wiretaps will pay a price in the November elections. We don't pretend to know. What we do know is that the country is in the midst of an important debate about the reach of presidential power and the scope of civil liberties in wartime. For Rove & Co. to try to turn this into just another partisan political skewer discredits their administration and their party."

Columnist Eugene Robinson writes in the Washington Post (1/27, A23, 744K), "Once upon a time we had a great wartime president who told Americans they had nothing to fear but fear itself. Now we have…Bush, who uses fear as a tool of executive power and as a political weapon against his opponents. … To cultivate fear for partisan gain is never a political tactic to be proud of, but Rove's prescription of naked fearmongering is just plain reprehensible when the nation faces a shifting array of genuine, serious threats. This is a moment for ethical politicians -- and, yes, these days that seems like an oxymoron -- to speak honestly about what dangers have receded, what new dangers have emerged, and how the imperatives of liberty and security can be balanced. From the likes of Rove, I guess, we shouldn't expect anything more noble than win-at-all-costs." But "we do have the right to expect more from the president of the United States, and while Bush gives off none of Rove's Sith-lord menace, he has made the cultivation of fear a hallmark of his governance."

More Commentary. The Eugene (OR) Register-Guard (1/26) editorializes, "Based on a powder-keg footnote in a recent memo by U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, the United States may be nearing a tipping point on civil liberties in its amorphous, open-ended 'war against terror.' … Gonzales' 42-page memo argues unconvincingly that Congress gave President Bush the power to investigate terror suspects using any tactics he chooses when it authorized him to use 'all necessary and appropriate force' against al-Qaeda one week after the terrorist attacks on Sept. 11, 2001. … The memo, and Gonzales' underlying contention that the president has nearly unlimited powers in wartime, are affronts to America's system of checks and balances and the Constitution that protects the privacy of its citizens. The memo also runs starkly counter to the recent findings of the nonpartisan Congressional Research Service, which cast serious doubt on the legality of the president's decision to order the domestic eavesdropping program. … Since 9/11, lawmakers have cowered in the face of an overbearing and overreaching executive branch. Now, Congress must exercise its constitutionally mandated oversight role, and protect the checks and balances and civil liberties that make us a free and democratic nation. If it fails to do so, the tipping point may be at hand."

The Seattle Post-Intelligencer (1/27) editorializes, "President Bush, Karl Rove and Attorney General Alberto Gonzales have tackled a big job. They are trying to scare people into believing the administration has the authority to spy on Americans' telecommunications. … This is one of the administration's patented media blitzes. The repetition of themes of terror, fear and security may once again swing opinion. … The administration argues that a congressional authorization to use force against terrorists means it's OK to conduct warrantless wiretaps. Court precedents suggest the vague authorization can't be stretched to overwrite existing law. Just saying the White House respects the Constitution's limits on searches doesn't mean the Fourth Amendment is actually being upheld. But maybe Rove can whip up gratitude for the president's defiance of accepted notions of law, privacy and a constitutionally limited executive. That's scary."

Mueller Says US Utilizing Global Intelligence In Terror War, But Preserving Privacy Rights. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (1/27, Lederer) reports, "FBI director Robert Mueller said Thursday the United States now acts on intelligence from any place in the world to fight terrorism but has not sacrificed individuals' rights to privacy in that effort. However, during an interview with The Associated Press, Mueller would not discuss renditions," nor would he "elaborate on the National Security Agency's listening without a warrant to telephone calls in the United States that Bush administration officials believe involve al-Qaida terrorists. … But Mueller said the goal of gathering intelligence in the war against terrorism was to prevent attacks and not just prosecute cases. 'For us, it is not just having a terrorist event happening and then gathering the evidence to put it in a courtroom to convict somebody after we're able to identify him, detain him and extradite him,' Mueller said." Mueller added that since 9/11, "U.S. officials have recognized the importance of using all information to determine 'who intends to hurt the United States or the United States' interests around the world.' 'We are doing a much better job at integrating that intelligence and acting on that intelligence any place in the world,' he said." The AP adds, "Mueller vehemently denied that the United States was giving up the right to privacy in exchange for security. 'In no way, shape, or form do I think we've given up our rights,' he said. 'But I do think there's an appropriate balance with the threat that we have.'"

Terrorist Pursuit Of Nuclear Weapons Dominates WEF Discussions. In a separate story about today's discussions at Davos, the AP (1/27) reports, "Terrorist attempts to attain nuclear weapons and a new twist in rock star Bono's campaign to help Africa topped discussions Thursday at the World Economic Forum. IAEA chief Mohamed ElBaradei said, "We know that terrorists are highly sophisticated and are interested in acquiring nuclear weapons. We are running in a race against time." DHS Secretary Michael Chertoff said that the department "has placed its priority on stopping the worst disasters. … He said the United States is working with other countries to make sure radioactive material terrorists could use to make weapons never enters the United States. FBI Director Robert Mueller said in an interview on the sidelines of the forum the United States is doing a much better job of integrating domestic and foreign intelligence and acting on it to fight terrorism around the world than it was before the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks on New York City and Washington. But the U.S. law-enforcement official cautioned: 'Nothing is perfect and nothing is certain.' 'We are safer but not totally safe,' Mueller said."

In his National Review Online (1/26) column, Jay Nordlinger notes, "An attractive panel on 'Global Risks 2006: What Keeps You Up at Night?' features Michael Chertoff (Homeland Security) and Robert Mueller (FBI), along with ElBaradei. The American presence is more robust than last year. (I should have said, the administration presence is -- and that translates into a more conservative coloration.)"

Mueller Calls For International Rapid Response System To Computer Hackers. The Financial Times (1/27, Larsen) reports FBI Director Robert Mueller "yesterday urged the world's law enforcement agencies to introduce a rapid system of exchanging information to battle computer security breaches and fraud that are the biggest concern of business. … The issue of computer fraud has gained increasing prominence in recent years following a series of hacking attacks on large companies and several high-profile security breaches at companies that keep sensitive information about their customers."

DOJ Disputes Colombian Claim Busted Passport Ring Aided Terrorists. The AP (1/27) reports, "Colombia has dismantled a false passport ring with links to al-Qaeda and Hamas militants, the acting attorney general said Thursday after authorities led dozens of simultaneous raids across five cities in collaboration with U.S. officials. In Washington, however, Justice and Homeland Security officials were surprised by the announcement of the investigation, which they said involved people posing as members" of FARC, "not al-Qaeda or Hamas." Acting Colombian Attorney General Jorge Armando Otalora said that "the counterfeit Colombian, Spanish, Portugese and German passports were used to enter the United States and Europe," but DOJ spokesman Bryan Sierra "said an indictment unsealed Wednesday in Miami charges 10 foreign nationals with smuggling 'people that they thought were members of FARC into the United States.' 'We are not alleging any connections to any terror organization other than the FARC,' said Justice Department spokesman Bryan Sierra. He said the U.S. will seek to extradite the 10 alleged smugglers, of whom eight have been arrested."

2nd Circuit Panel Rejects US Motion To Remove Judge From Terrorism Case. The New York Times (1/27, Preston, 1.19M) reports a three-judge panel of the 2nd US Circuit "yesterday rejected an attempt by prosecutors to oust a judge from a terrorism case, dismissing the government's argument that the judge, Shira A. Scheindlin, was biased in favor of the defendant. The ruling came in the case of Osama Awadallah, a Jordanian college student who was charged in October 2001 with lying before a grand jury to conceal his ties with two hijackers in the Sept. 11 attacks. … His convoluted case has become a test of the government's prolonged detention of people without charges as material witnesses in terrorism cases." The Times adds, "The appeals judges noted that in several cases in which Judge Scheindlin had initially antagonized the prosecutors by questioning their procedures, she ultimately ruled in their favor."

CIA Posted Wrong Photo Of Suspected Al Qaeda Terrorist. NBC Nightly News (1/26, story 4, 1:45, Williams) reported, "For a year and a half, the US government has been asking for the public's help in finding a dangerous al Qaeda operative, an expert in poisons and lethal chemicals. But until just recently, government did not know, until they were informed by NBC News, that the photo they were circulating was of the wrong man." NBC (Myers) added, "A US government website lists him as one of the world's most-wanted terrorists, Abu Khabab al Masri, allegedly al Qaeda's top expert on chemicals and poisons." But "the picture bore a striking resemblance to this man, Abu Hamza al Masri, a militant imam now on trial in London." Roger Cressey, NBC News terrorism expert: "It's embarrassing. It reflects a certain level of sloppiness and lack of attention to detail." Steve Emerson, NBC News terrorism analyst: "The CIA is supposed to check these things out. Somebody should be looking at it a second time and a third time before posting it worldwide."

Rabbi, Priest Testify On Al Masri's Behalf. Reuters (1/27) reports, "A rabbi and a Christian priest testified on Thursday in support of…radical Muslim preacher" Abu Hamza al Masri, "telling a court he was friendly and hospitable." Rabbi Joseph Goldstein testified "that he had been favourably impressed when he met Hamza at the Finsbury Park mosque in north London to talk about a mixed-faith married couple," and Anglican priest Stephen Coles "told the court he had met Hamza soon after the September 11, 2001 attacks on the United States. … 'Sometimes we agreed about some things, sometimes we disagreed. It wasn't at any point aggressive or angry.' He said he had tried to continue dialogue with Hamza even after the cleric was arrested in 2004."

PATRIOT ACT:

Columnist Says Patriot Act Could Have Prevented 9/11. In a column distributed by Scripps Howard News Service (1/27) New York commentator Deroy Murdock writes, "As the Senate prepares for a showdown vote to reauthorize the Patriot Act, members of the World's Greatest Deliberative Body should deliberate on this: Had it existed, could the Patriot Act have prevented the Sept. 11 massacre? … First, Patriot Act Section 218 would have eliminated 'The Wall' that prevented intelligence agents and law-enforcement officials from sharing information." Former Attorney General Janet Reno "issued restrictions in 1995 that hindered communications between spies and gumshoes. Frustrated New York FBI agents reportedly placed signs on their desks that read, 'You may not talk to me.' … Were the Patriot Act in place, 'The Wall' would not have prevented Minneapolis FBI agents from getting permission to examine the laptop and possessions of '20th hijacker' Zacarias Moussaoui." Murdock adds, "Second, Patriot Act Section 215, the so-called 'library provision,' might have led officials to seven of the 19 hijackers who used government libraries for Internet access.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

9th Circuit Upholds Airport ID Requirement. The AP (1/27, Kravets) reports, "An appeals court on Thursday dismissed a legal challenge to federal airport regulations requiring passengers to show identification before they board planes." The AP continues, "The 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals rejected claims by Libertarian activist and millionaire John Gilmore that the policy constituted an illegal search and violated his right to travel freely. … After reviewing the government's identification policy in private, a unanimous three-judge panel said the policy was not overly intrusive. The review was done in private for security reasons." The AP adds, "The court said Gilmore could leave the airport if he didn't want to show his ID and had other ways to get around besides air travel. It also rejected assertions that the act of showing identification was an illegal search of Gilmore, who made his millions as a founding employee of Sun Microsystems. … Gilmore's lawyer, William Simpich, said he is weighing whether to appeal."

FBI Investigating Whether California Man Also Mailed New York Anthrax Hoax Letters. The AP (1/27) reports, "A Santa Cruz man indicted for sending three letters that appeared to be laced with anthrax may have sent four similar parcels, which were responsible for the partial evacuations of several buildings in New York, authorities said. Four letters delivered to New York addresses on Monday and Tuesday have 'obvious similarities' to three letters Paul Charles Steeves is under indictment for, said Christine Monaco, an FBI agent in New York. … The New York letters -- received at a United Nations family planning agency, a federal credit union, an Army recruitment center and an Army Corps of Engineers facility -- caused partial evacuations, Monaco said. Agents are looking into whether Steeves sent the letters received in New York, said FBI spokeswoman LaRae Quy."

Audit Finds States Squandered Much Anti-Terror Funding. The New York Post (1/27, Earle, 624K) reports on a "stunning audit" which reveals that hundreds of thousands of dollars "sent to protect the nation's heartland have been squandered in Indiana alone." The Post calls the audit "more evidence the cash could have been better spent in New York. A team of investigators examined Indiana's books to see how the state spent $48 million it got in federal homeland-security aid, finding widespread instances of mismanagement, according to the report set for release today, which was obtained by The Post. New York lawmakers were fuming over the shocking findings of waste at a time when the Big Apple could use more anti-terror dollars."

Bloomberg Presses WTC Developer To Accept Port Authority Deal. The New York Times (1/27, Bagli, 1.19M) reports that while New York City Mayor Michael Bloomberg "has little actual power over decisions at ground zero," he is "using his bully pulpit to pressure [developer Larry A.] Silverstein to accede to the authority's demands that he relinquish control of a major part of the 16-acre parcel in return for a reduction in rent, so that the rebuilding effort can proceed more swiftly." The Times reports that this proposal would include the "huge and symbolic Freedom Tower while the Port Authority … would construct a second tower on Church Street and occupy part of it. The authority would also build a multistory shopping mall and sell a third site to a developer for a hotel, office space, and, in the mayor's vision, apartments."

Bush Addresses Concerns About Federal Commitment To New Orleans. NBC Nightly News (1/26, story 3, 1:30, Williams) reported, "The topic of New Orleans came up at that news conference today because of the decision by the White House to say no to a proposed $30 billion bailout package for Louisiana. That news hit hard in New Orleans and it prompted this exchange between the President and our own David Gregory. He asked the President about the people who are possibly left out." Bush replied: "The Congress has appropriated $85 billion to help rebuild the Gulf Coast. And that's a good start. It's a strong start. It's a significant commitment to the people whose lives were turned upside down by that -- by that hurricane." Williams: "Now in their defense, aides to the President say they want the billions already approved by Congress to be spent first. They contend that money may well be enough and if not, they say they'll reassess in the Gulf."

First Lady Assures New Orleans Schools Aid Will Be Available. The Baton Rouge Advocate (1/17, Shields, Millhollon) notes that "first lady Laura Bush visited one of the first New Orleans public schools to open after Hurricane Katrina hit, then traveled to another school in St. Bernard Parish." Laura Bush said, "One thing that will bring people back to their communities is if they know there's a good school for their children to go to and there's safe places for them to play."

The AP (1/27) adds that she "listened Wednesday as students who talked about the events of the past five months. One talked about being stuck in traffic for 12 hours trying to evacuate the day before Katrina hit on Aug. 29. Another said for three weeks she didn't know where her father was, whether he survived the massive flood." The AP notes, "Bush and Secretary of Education Margaret Spellings assured school officials that federal aid will be available for them to continue operating and make needed repairs."

History Of Corruption Seen As Hurting Louisiana Recovery Effort. The Los Angeles Times (1/27, Bustillo, 958K) reports, "In Louisiana, which has a history of political shenanigans so rich and colorful that it has become a part of American folklore, people long have laughed off misbehaving politicians as a fact of life, every bit as inevitable as death and taxes. But as the state lobbies Washington for more money to rebuild ravaged towns and cities, citizens are realizing that Louisiana's well-earned penchant for dirty politics has exacted a steep price: It has badly damaged the credibility of the recovery effort." However, "Sen. Mary L. Landrieu (D-La.) said that the corruption, while historically accurate, has been magnified by Republicans in Washington who do not want to help Louisiana. … Citing the corruption scandal in the nation's capital centering on GOP lobbyist Jack Abramoff, Landrieu added, 'Republicans in Washington should clean up their own house before using Louisiana's past reputation an excuse for not wanting to rebuild the Gulf Coast.'"

Study Finds 80% Of Black New Orleans Residents May Not Return. The New York Times (1/27, Dao, 1.19M) reports, "New Orleans could lose as much as 80 percent of its black population if its most damaged neighborhoods are not rebuilt and if there is not significant government assistance to help poor people return, a detailed analysis by Brown University has concluded. … Of the 354,000 people who lived in New Orleans neighborhoods where the subsequent damage was moderate to severe, 75 percent were black, 29 percent lived below the poverty line, more than 10 percent were unemployed, and more than half were renters, the study found." If report author John R. Logan's "projections are realized, the New Orleans population will shrink to about 140,000 from its prehurricane level of 484,000, and the city, nearly 70 percent black before the storm, will become majority white."

WAR NEWS:

US Releases Some Iraqi Women Detainees. The CBS Evening News (1/26, story 3, 3:30, Schieffer) reported, "Now to Iraq where two more American soldiers were reported killed in action and hundreds of Iraqi prisoners were released by the US military today. Five women were among those freed, but US officials insist that is not a response to demands made by the kidnappers of the American reporter Jill Carroll." CBS (Palmer) added a "speech by Brigadier General Lynch emphasized the women were in no way bargaining chips." Brigadier General Lynch: "Those female detainees were released as part of our normal process and not as a result of demands by terrorists and criminals." Palmer: "Today, al Jazeera and the other Arab networks covered the news of the women prisoners being freed. But no word from Jill's captors, it's impossible to know whether they'll focus on the five women who were released today or the fact that there are several more remaining in US custody."

NBC Nightly News (1/26, story 3, :45, Williams) reported, "In Iraq, the US military has released five Iraqi women prisoners, among about 400 prisoners being released today and tomorrow. Some believe this release of female prisoners specifically could help secure the freedom of American hostage Jill Carroll, the reporter for the 'Christian Science Monitor' who was kidnapped in Baghdad. For the record, administration officials deny this prisoner release has anything to do with the demands of Carroll's kidnappers."

The New York Times (1/27, Tavernise, 1.19M) adds, "The American military said…the release had been previously scheduled and was unrelated to demands made by the kidnappers of the American journalist Jill Carroll" and that "the review of the Iraqi prisoners' cases came long before the kidnappers set their deadline." There has been no communications by the kidnappers "since their videotape was broadcast by the Arabic network Al Jazeera on Jan. 17."

The Washington Post (1/27, A14, Finer, 744K) adds, "A U.S. official in Baghdad, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the situation, said there was no indication that the women's release would lead to Carroll being freed."

Carroll's Mother Confident Of Imminent Release. The Christian Science Monitor (1/27, 61K) reports, "The mother of one of five Iraqi female detainees released Thursday expressed confidence that American journalist Jill Carroll will be released soon." Siham Faraj, the mother of Hala Khalid Wahid, also said, "I don't think Jill Carroll's situation has anything to do with the release of my daughter, but we definitely feel her pain."

Audit Finds Funds Won't Cover Cost Of Rebuilding Projects In Iraq. The New York Times (1/27, Glanz, 1.19M) reports that the office of the Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction reported that "because of unforeseen security costs, haphazard planning and shifting priorities, the American-financed reconstruction program in Iraq will not complete scores of projects that were promised to help rebuild the country." Of "the 136 projects that were originally pledged to improve Iraq's water and sanitation," just "49…will be finished, with about 300 of an initial 425 projects to provide electricity." The reports concludes "that the overall rebuilding plan was...devised without a clear understanding of the decrepit state of Iraq's infrastructure after decades of war, United Nations-imposed penalties and sheer neglect," and adds that unexpected "security costs alone do not account for the drop in the number of projects that the United States will be able to finish."

The Washington Times (1/27, Scarborough, 90K) adds, "The assessment is a setback for the Bush administration, which counted on more robust rebuilding across Iraq to help deliver the country from a harsh dictatorship to a prosperous democracy."

Iraqi Minister Of Industry Attacked. The Los Angles Times (1/27, Kraul) "Iraq's minister of industry narrowly escaped an assassination attempt Thursday." Usama Abdulaziz Najafi "was in a convoy on a main highway about 65 miles north of Baghdad when a roadside bomb exploded. The blast engulfed one of the cars in flames, killing three bodyguards and injuring one. The minister was unhurt. The Iraq insurgency has targeted officials at all levels in its attempt to weaken Iraq's emerging democratic government."

Declassified Directive Appears To Prohibit Military From Paying For News Stories. The Los Angles Times (1/27, Mazzetti) reports, "A secret U.S. military program that pays Iraqi newspapers to publish articles favorable to the American mission appears to violate a 2003 Pentagon directive, according to a newly declassified document released Thursday." The top U.S. general in Iraq said "a preliminary investigation into the program," the subject of a high-level military investigation, "had found it did not violate U.S. law or Pentagon regulations." However, "a secret directive on the Pentagon's information operations policy released Thursday…appears to prohibit U.S. troops from conducting psychological operations, or psy-ops, targeting the media."

Top General In Iraq Says US Forces Are Strained But Can Accomplish Mission. USA Today/AP (1/27, Wadhams) reports that Gen. George Casey, the top U.S. commander in Iraq, "acknowledged Thursday that the U.S. Army was stretched, but he insisted forces here were capable of accomplishing their mission." He added that "he had discussed manpower strains with Gen. Peter Schoomaker and that the Army chief of staff feels he can sustain missions around the world." President Bush has "brushed aside talk that the United States could not prevail in Iraq."

The Washington Times/AP (1/27, Wadhams) also ran the AP story.

Reports Suggest Army Unprepared To Fight Another Iraq-Type War. The Christian Science Monitor (1/27, Sappenfield, 61K) reports, "When two major studies released this week questioned whether the US Army is being stretched too thin, they raised a much- repeated concern: that America does not have enough troops to win the war in Iraq. At a deeper level, though, they raise the question of whether today's military is prepared for the threats that could lie ahead in the war on terror." The reports "released this week - one by Mr. Krepinevich; the other by former Defense Secretary William Perry - have suggested that the force is simply not large enough to do what the Defense Department has asked of it," and "some who are familiar with drafts of the coming" Quadrennial Defense Review "suggest that the lessons learned from Iraq have simply heaped more duties - including peacekeeping - on a force already struggling to meet the ones it has."

QDR To Call For Special WMD Task Force. The Washington Times (1/27, Gertz, 90K) reports that part of the Pentagon's Quarterly Defense Review will call for "a special military task force to prevent weapons of mass destruction from being transferred to terrorist groups." According to the Times, "The task force will employ special operations forces, other troops and intelligence personnel to prevent states such as North Korea and Iran from supplying nuclear, chemical and biological weapons to terror groups. The call for the new unit, which would have several hundred troops along with aircraft and other arms, comes as tensions heighten over North Korea's nuclear program and Iran's refusal to abide by international controls on its uranium-enrichment program." The report also cites "evolving" WMD threats, including "electromagnetic pulse weapons, portable nuclear devices, genetically engineered pathogens and new chemical arms." The review is not yet public, the Times says. Additionally, the review advocates "that general-purpose military forces take over the job of foreign military training." Meanwhile, "other key recommendations of the report include increasing special operations forces by 15 percent, creating a Marine Corps special operations command, setting up an Air Force unmanned aerial vehicle squadron, boosting the number of Navy SEAL commando teams and increasing Army psychological operations by 33 percent."

Rand Study Says Most Reservists' Incomes Rose Upon Going To War. The Washington Post (1/27, A21, 744K) reports that a study by Rand Corp.'s National Defense Research Institute "found that 72 percent of the troops surveyed made more while on war duty in 2002 or 2003 than they did in their civilian jobs in 2001. More than half made at least $10,000 more." While "contradicting conventional notions," it also concluded that "a sizable proportion of the reservists -- 28 percent -- lost money, including some who saw their earnings drop by more than 10 percent." Some reasons for the results are "higher salaries, combat pay supplements, family-separation allowances and tax-free earnings." Still, "researchers are working to understand why this study differs dramatically from earlier surveys and anecdotal reports about families struggling to get by when a primary wage earner went to war."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Enron Trial To Begin Monday. The Christian Science Monitor (1/27, Axtman, 61K) reports that the trial of Enron's top two leaders will begin next week as "business and industry groups are mounting a campaign to roll back some of the reforms that the Enron scandal inaugurated. Thus, the lessons of the nation's second-biggest bankruptcy remain in flux and may be determined, in part, by the outcome of the legal drama set to begin." The "details of the lives and business practices of the two men on trial - Enron founder Kenneth Lay and former chief executive Jeffrey Skilling - could provide an inside view of how the nation's second-biggest bankruptcy unfolded."

The New York Times (1/27, Romero, 1.19M) adds that in Houston, "many residents prefer to focus on other things, like the resurgent economy, and city leaders wish outsiders would, too. … But as jury selection starts on Monday, residents here will have to relive the Enron debacle, with the possibility that the trial will drag on over several months." The Times adds, "In preparation for the trial, city officials are trying to accentuate the positive. … The city's economy has grown for 35 consecutive months, according to a monthly survey of purchasing executives conducted by the National Association of Purchasing Management-Houston. November, the most recent month for which statistics are available, was one of the strongest months in a decade, as demand rose for goods like plastic pipes and refined petroleum products."

Enron Task Force Faces Test In Skilling Trial. Texas Lawyer (1/27, Rozen) reports, "When Enron Task Force prosecutors enter U.S. District Judge Sim Lake's courtroom in Houston on Monday for the long-awaited trial of former Enron Corp. Chairman Kenneth Lay and former Chief Executive Officer Jeffrey Skilling, the government lawyers will be toting baggage -- both literal and figurative." Texas Lawyer continues, "In the literal sense, the big criminal trial is document-intensive. In the figurative sense, the government lawyers have stumbled more than once in their four-year pursuit of Enron employees, and that track record follows them into Lake's courtroom." Texas Lawyer adds, "Inarguably, the government lawyers have scored some notable successes by persuading 16 former Enron employees, including former Chief Financial Officer Andrew Fastow, to plead guilty to charges related to the downward financial and stock-price spiral that led to Enron's bankruptcy in December 2001. Most recently, on Dec. 28, 2005, Richard Causey, Enron's former chief accounting officer and Skilling's and Lay's co-defendant, pleaded guilty to one count of securities fraud and agreed to cooperate with prosecutors. [See Causey's plea agreement.] … In an earlier success in November 2004, in United States v. Daniel Bayly, et al., the so-called Nigerian Barge trial, prosecutors persuaded a jury to convict four former Merrill Lynch & Co. bankers and one former Enron executive on charges related to conspiracy to commit wire fraud. … But the government lawyers have also faced setbacks in the courtroom. At the Nigerian Barge trial, one former Enron executive, Sheila Kahanek, was acquitted. Six months later, in May 2005, the U.S. Supreme Court overturned the 2002 conviction of Arthur Andersen, Enron's accounting firm, for obstruction of justice, in United States v. Arthur Andersen LLP. In July 2005, in the so-called Enron Broadband trial, a jury deadlocked in the trial of five former Enron executives, and the proceedings ended in a mistrial. Two months later, U.S. District Judge Vanessa Gilmore blamed the government lawyers trying that case, United States v. Joseph Hirko, et al., for confusion at the trial, and she subsequently acquitted some of the defendants of some of the government's charges."

Oxley, Frank Ask Fannie Mae Board For Rudman Testimony, Report. Dow Jones (1/26) reports, "House Financial Services Chairman Michael Oxley, R- Ohio, and ranking Democrat Barney Frank want former Sen. Warren Rudman to testify before the panel on the results of his 16-month probe of Fannie Mae's accounting troubles, the lawmakers said in a recent letter released Thursday." Dow Jones continues, "Fannie's board of directors hired Rudman, who is expected to complete his report next month, to help the board with its own internal investigation after the Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight accused executives in September 2004 of manipulating accounting rules to massage Fannie's earnings." Dow Jones adds, "In a letter sent last week, Oxley and Massachusetts Rep. Frank asked Fannie Chairman Stephen Ashley for a copy of the much-anticipated report once it's finished, as well as for Rudman's testimony at a hearing they plan to conduct shortly thereafter. … 'The purpose of this hearing will be to fully inform the committee about the findings, conclusions and any recommendations contained in the Rudman report,' the letter said. … The Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight, which oversees Fannie and fellow government-sponsored enterprise Freddie Mac, is expected to issue its own report on Fannie's accounting practices by the end of March." Dow Jones notes, "Rudman, who could not be reached for comment Thursday, recently told Dow Jones Newswires that regulators and law enforcement agencies that are also investigating Fannie will likely receive copies of his report before its public release. In addition to OFHEO, the Securities and Exchange Commission, Justice Department and others have launched their own probes into alleged misconduct at Fannie."

Levitt Says Sarbanes-Oxley Exemption Will Harm Small Companies. Former SEC Chairman Arthur Levitt, who was the chairman of the first White House Conference on Small Business, writes in the Wall Street Journal (1/27, 2.11M), "Currently, the focus of many small-business advocates is the perceived burden placed on them by Section 404 of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act, which requires companies to assess and report the status of their internal controls. They worry that the cost of compliance is onerous, inhibiting their ability to access capital markets and grow. In response, the Securities and Exchange Commission's advisory committee on smaller public companies has recommended that microcap and smaller public companies be exempted from the main parts of 404. … While the advisory committee is well-intentioned, I fear that these proposed changes will harm, not help, small companies."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Bush Says He Does Not Know Abramoff, Won't Release Photos. President Bush fended off reporters' questions yesterday about his ties to Jack Abramoff, saying he does not know the lobbyist. ABC's World News Tonight (1/26, story 4, 1:50, Vargas) reported that Bush was "not so anxious to talk about the scandal surrounding lobbyist Jack Abramoff. And the White House is refusing to make public photos of the now-convicted felon with the President." ABC's chief Washington correspondent George Stephanopoulos: "They are hanging tough. Several news organizations have reported that the photos exist. The President says he'll answer any questions prosecutors ask. But he's not just going to hand over the photos or any other information to reporters."

NBC Nightly News (1/26, story 2, 2:00, Fletcher) also noted, "Mr. Bush was also pressed about why the White House has refused to release photographs showing the President and disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff together." President Bush: "Having my picture taken with someone doesn't mean that I'm a friend with them or know them very well. I've had my picture taken with you…at holiday parties."

USA Today (1/27, Benedetto, Jackson, 2.31M) reports that during a White House news conference, Bush said, "I had my picture taken with him, evidently," adding, "I've had my picture taken with a lot of people. Having my picture taken with someone doesn't mean that I'm a friend with them or know them very well. It's part of the job of the president to shake hands…with people and smile." Bush "acknowledged that photographs of him with Abramoff were taken either at White House parties or political fundraisers, but he said he would not make them public because he feared they would be used for partisan attacks."

Reuters (1/26, Holland) added that Bush said "release of photographs that show him and Abramoff together would be used for 'pure political purposes' by Democrats seeking to tie the lobbyist to the White House. … 'This investigation needs to look into all aspects of his influence on Capitol Hill. And if there are some in the White House, I'm sure they're going to come knock on the doors,' Bush said."

The Washington Post (1/26, Branigin, 744K) reported on its web site that Bush "dismissed the significance" of the photos and "indicated that the White House would continue to oppose releasing the photos, which he said are irrelevant to a federal investigation." Bush "said he has no idea how many photos were taken of him and Abramoff, and he declined to discuss reported meetings that the lobbyist attended with White House staffers. Federal prosecutors are 'welcome' to look into those meetings if they believe they involved improprieties, Bush said."

Knight Ridder (1/27, Douglas) adds, "Administration officials want to keep any Bush-Abramoff pictures from becoming public to avoid giving political opponents ammunition that could hurt Republicans in November's congressional elections. 'Having my picture taken with someone doesn't mean that I'm a friend with them or know them very well. I've had my picture taken with you at holiday parties,' the president reminded reporters. He estimated that he'd posed for about 9,000 photos at receptions this past holiday season alone. 'I'm also mindful that we live in a world in which those pictures will be used for pure political purposes, and they're not relevant to the investigation,' Bush said."

The Los Angeles Times (1/26, Chen, 958K) reported on its web sits, "Bush also rejected the notion of detailing possible contacts between Abramoff and members of the senior White House staff, saying he preferred to let federal prosecutors conduct their own investigation." Bush comments Thursday were "his most extensive remarks to date on the Abramoff scandal." The Times notes that Bush "sounded particularly defensive when reporters pressed him about his contacts with Abramoff."

The New York Times (1/27, Stout, 1.19M) adds that Bush "responded somewhat indirectly when asked if he was afraid to release the pictures of himself and the once-powerful Mr. Abramoff, who has pleaded guilty to conspiracy, fraud and tax evasion and who prosecutors say tried to influence lawmakers and their aides with campaign contributions, lavish trips and meals. 'Having my picture taken with someone doesn't mean that, you know, I'm a friend with them or know them very well,' Mr. Bush said. 'I've had my picture taken with you at holiday parties.' In fact, presidents are often photographed with people whom they know only casually, or hardly at all, including reporters at White House Christmas parties."

Senators Call For Special Counsel In Abramoff Probe. The Washington Times (1/27, Pierce, 90K) reports in its "Inside Politics" column that Sens. Chuck Schumer and Ken Salazar wrote to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to call for the appointment of a special counsel to take over the investigation of the corruption scandal spawned by former lobbyist Jack Abramoff. The switch 'would ensure that the investigation and prosecution will proceed without fear or favor and provide the public with full confidence that no one in this country is above the law,'" they wrote.

The AP (1/27, Espo) reports, "Two Senate Democrats called Thursday for the appointment of a special counsel to take over investigation of the corruption scandal spawned by lobbyist Jack Abramoff. .. The switch 'would ensure that the investigation and prosecution will proceed without fear or favor and provide the public with full confidence that no one in this country is above the law,' Sens. Chuck Schumer of New York and Ken Salazar of Colorado wrote Attorney General Alberto Gonzales." The AP continues, "The two Democrats said that so far, the public integrity section of the Justice Department, which is in charge of the probe, has 'pursued this case appropriately.' … A Justice Department spokesman declined immediate comment." The AP adds, "Schumer and Salazar sent their letter several days after Democrats pressed the White House for information on contacts between the president or other top officials and Abramoff. So far, the White House has refused to release any photographs of the president and the lobbyist together. … In their letter, Schumer and Salazar cited news reports that said that in addition to the presidential photographs, Abramoff organized at least one meeting with White House aides for his clients. … 'These meetings with the president and the White House staff occurred while you were serving as White House counsel,' they wrote Gonzales, who became attorney general a year ago. 'Given the possible ties between Mr. Abramoff and senior government officials, we believe the appointment of a special counsel is not only justified, but necessary.'"

The Denver Post (1/27, Mulkern) reports, "The senators said an independent investigation is necessary because a special counsel could act without either favor from or fear of reprisal from the White House. … 'As a former (state) attorney general, I believe in upholding the law and rooting out corruption,' Salazar said in a statement. 'The American people deserve an open, unbiased investigation into this matter. Appointing a special counsel will begin the process of restoring America's faith in government.' … Added Schumer: 'With public trust in government at very low levels, it is crucial that we remove any appearance of impropriety from the investigation of the Abramoff scandal by appointing a special counsel who is independent of the Bush Administration and the current Justice Department.'"

Smith Disputes Assertions In NYTimes Op-Ed. In a letter to the New York Times (1/27, 1.19M), Rep. Lamar Smith writes, "Re 'If You Give a Congressman a Cookie,' by Norman Ornstein and Thomas E. Mann (Op-Ed, Jan. 19): I am surprised that these Congressional scholars would assert that House roll-call votes are 'frequently' stretched beyond an hour. This happens, on average, less than once per two-year Congressional session. They say that Speaker J. Dennis Hastert 'fired' the chairman of the House ethics committee last year. Under House rules, there was a term limit for all members, including the chairman. Speaker Hastert followed the regular order that these writers claim to cherish in naming a new chairman. They also assert that I and a colleague, who had donated to Representative Tom DeLay's defense fund, were named to the ethics committee 'when the main matter pending before the committee involved' Mr. DeLay. In fact, the committee had publicly announced, in keeping with its normal practice, that it was deferring its one pending DeLay-related matter until the conclusion of the Texas criminal investigation, which continues to this day. Moreover, my colleague and I long ago announced that we will recuse ourselves from any matter related to Mr. DeLay."

Prosecutor In Abramoff Case To Step Down. The New York Times (1/27, Shenon, Bumiller, 1.19M) reports that the Justice Department has announced that Noel L. Hillman, the prosecutor in the Abramoff case, will step down next week because he has been nominated to a federal judgeship by President Bush." The Bush Administration "said that the appointment was routine and that it would not affect the investigation, but Democrats swiftly questioned the timing of the move and called for a special prosecutor."

Libby Lawyers Seek Media Data From Prosecutors. Lawyers for Vice President Dick Cheney's former Chief of Staff Lewis Libby have asked a federal judge to order prosecutors in Libby's case to turn over all documents in his possession related too what journalists knew from any source about intelligence officer Valerie Plame. The New York Times (1/27, Johnston, 1.19M) reports that Libby's lawyers "said in their motion that the prosecutor, Patrick J. Fitzgerald, had refused to turn over to the defense documents that would shed light on whether any reporter knew about" Plame "before her name was first disclosed in a newspaper column on July 14, 2003."

The AP (1/27, Yost) reports that in their 23-page brief, Libby's lawyers argued, "The government should not be allowed to charge Mr. Libby with lying about statements concerning what reporters knew about Ms. Wilson's identity, and at the same time deny him information that may establish one of these possible defenses," adding, "The government has refused to produce information in its possession about what reporters learned from sources other than Mr. Libby about Ms. Wilson's employment status."

Reuters (1/26, Vicini) reported, "The attorneys said the motion concerned their request for documents and information on three important issues: 'What did the press know prior to July 14, 2003, about whether Valerie Plame Wilson worked at the CIA, from whom did they learn it and with whom did they discuss it.' They said turning over the information would enable them to decide the necessity and scope of pretrial subpoenas for journalists and news organizations. The motion made clear that what the reporters knew will be an important part of the defense strategy."

The Washington Post (1/27, A4, Leonnig, 744K) adds, "The defense's goal is to show that Libby was not intentionally lying when he testified that many journalists had known about Plame during the spring and summer of 2003, and that he believed he had learned about her from [Tim] Russert. 'There can be no information more material to the defense of a perjury case than information tending to show that the alleged false statements are, in fact, true or that they could be the result of mistake or confusion,' the lawyers argued in their filing. 'Libby is entitled to know what the government knows.'"

The Wall Street Journal (1/27, Squeo, 2.11M) adds, "While the Justice Department has agreed to turn over information related to reporters' contacts with Mr. Libby, Special Counsel Patrick Fitzgerald has refused to provide material about what reporters might have learned from other sources about Ms. Plame's employment at the CIA, the court filing says. Included in the request is information that may have been shared among reporters or with government officials."

Bhutto Says Arrests Notices Are Politically Motivated. Agence France-Presse (1/27) reports, "Pakistan's former Prime Minister Benazir Bhutto has shrugged off Interpol notices for her arrest and said she is prepared to return to her country to face any charges if compelled by a court." AFP continues, "Interpol had issued the international notices following a request by the Pakistan government for the arrest of Bhutto and her husband on corruption charges, according to officials in Islamabad. … The police body said the so-called 'red notices' were not arrest warrants and that member countries could decide whether to take any action. … 'As far as the red notices are concerned, I learned it from the press, and my lawyers have written to the (Pakistan) Ministry of Interior as well as to Interpol, asking them to confirm whether the news is accurate and if so, on what grounds,' Bhutto told a news conference in Washington. … 'As far as I am concerned, if any court wants me in Pakistan, I am prepared to catch the next plane to Pakistan,' said Bhutto, 53, who led the country twice in the 1980s and 1990s as its first female premier." AFP adds, "Bhutto, who has lived in self-imposed exile in Dubai and London for the past seven years, said the allegations were politically motivated and intended to divert the attention of the Pakistan media from current government problems. … The US Justice Department refused to comment specifically on Bhutto's case but said it generally considered Interpol requests on a case-by-case basis. … 'I wouldn't comment on the specifics of Ms Bhutto's case but generally, the government handles requests from other governments on a case-by-case basis and we make our decisions based on the unique circumstance on any case,' department spokesman Bryan Sierra told AFP. … 'We don't necessarily automatically have to act on them,' he said."

9th Circuit Panel Rules Overseas Sex With Minor Subject To US Regulation. The California Recorder (1/27, Scheck) reports, "Applying the Constitution's commerce clause to international trade can be a difficult task, 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals Judge Margaret McKeown wrote in an opinion Wednesday." The Recorder continues, "So in deciding that a 2003 law prohibiting U.S. citizens from paying minors for sex while overseas is constitutional, McKeown wrote that the court was taking a big-picture look. … 'Instead of slavishly marching down the path of grafting the interstate commerce framework onto foreign commerce, we step back and take a global, commonsense approach,' she wrote." The Recorder adds, "The conclusion? Sex with a minor 'might be immoral and criminal, but it is also commercial' -- and therefore subject to regulation. … McKeown's opinion -- which was joined by 9th Circuit Senior Judge Procter Hug -- didn't sit well with Senior Judge Warren Ferguson. … He said the majority upheld the 2003 law known by the convenient acronym PROTECT (Prosecutorial Remedies and Other Tools to End the Exploitation of Children Today) with logic that could give the U.S. government jurisdiction over your croque monsieur. … 'Under the interpretation of the majority,' he wrote, 'the purchase of a lunch in France by an American citizen who traveled there by airplane would constitute a constitutional act of engaging in foreign commerce.' … Under that scenario, nearly anything a U.S. citizen did in a foreign country could be subject to U.S. regulation, Ferguson continued. 'This observation may seem slightly absurd, but so is the task of trying to show how sexual abuse of a minor overseas by a U.S. citizen constitutes an act of "commerce with foreign nations,"' he said." … The majority opinion is based on last year's Supreme Court opinion Gonzales v. Raich, 125 S.Ct. 2195, which said the commerce clause allows the federal government to prohibit marijuana use in states that have legalized it for medical use."

Convicted Texas Rapist Freed After DNA Exoneration. The AP (1/27) reports, "A man who spent 18 years in prison for sexual assault was freed Thursday after DNA evidence exonerated him, and his brother admitted responsibility for the attack." The AP continues, "DNA testing was not available at Arthur Mumphrey's 1986 trial for the rape of a 13-year-old girl, but recent tests requested by his attorney showed Mumphrey's blood and saliva samples did not match stains on the victim and her clothes. … 'Because of technology we have now, justice was not done 20 years ago,' State District Judge Kathleen Hamilton said." The AP adds, "Mumphrey, 42, had been sentenced to 35 years in prison. … Prosecutor Marc Brumberger apologized to Mumphrey. 'We feel terrible about what happened to you,' he said. … Mumphrey's brother, Charles, confessed to the rape this week while serving time in jail for unauthorized use of a motor vehicle."

Ex-New Jersey AGs Reject Criticism Related To Norcross Probe. The New York Times (1/27, Kocieniewski) reports, "Two former New Jersey attorneys general on Thursday defended their office's investigation into the political dealings of George E. Norcross III, the Democratic power broker. … In a scathing letter dated Tuesday, Christopher J. Christie, the United States attorney for New Jersey, wrote that his office would be unable to bring charges against Mr. Norcross because lawyers for the state attorney general had mishandled their investigation under two administrations before turning it over to his office in 2004." Christie "criticized state prosecutors for deciding not to secretly tape conversations at a Camden County Democratic fund-raiser in 2001, where Mr. Norcross and his associates were expected to discuss a wide variety of political deals. Mr. Christie said that that decision was so inexplicable that it raised the possibility that state investigators were trying to shield political figures. But John J. Farmer Jr., who was attorney general in 2001, called that suggestion 'utter nonsense,'" asserting "that the two assistant attorneys general who led the case were 'professional and 100 percent nonpolitical.'" Christie "also said that former Attorney General Peter C. Harvey erred in 2003 when he agreed to allow two figures in the investigation to plead guilty to tax evasion charges, a deal Mr. Christie said was too lenient to yield meaningful cooperation." But Harvey "said the agreements were fair and helpful. 'These plea agreements were negotiated by experienced former federal prosecutors and helped lead to other convictions in this case,' he said."

Police Say Barry Unable To ID Robbers From Group Of Photographs. The Washington Post (1/27, B8, Wilber) reports, " Police investigating the armed robbery of D.C. Council member Marion Barry recently showed him photographs of two potential suspects, but he was unable to identify the men as his assailants, law enforcement officials said. Last week, detectives showed Barry (D-Ward 8) collections that included photographs of two people they viewed as suspects in the Jan. 2 robbery, officials said. The arrays also included pictures of other people who are similar in appearance but not connected to the crime, the officials said. Barry did not select anyone in the pictures. The two potential suspects were believed to have committed other robberies in the area and resembled the description that Barry provided of his attackers, the officials said." Barry "declined this week to discuss specifics of the investigation, based on the advice of his attorney and requests by police. But he addressed speculation that there could be more to the story than he is letting on. 'The thing that [makes me angry] is that some people say that this was a drug deal gone bad,' Barry said in an interview at his council office Wednesday. 'Why would I report that? That is just crazy. If it is a drug deal gone bad, you don't call the cops.'"

Chicago City Clerk, Three Others Indicted In Hired Truck Probe. The AP (1/27, Robinson) reports, "Chicago's city clerk and four other men were charged Thursday in an eight-count corruption indictment as federal prosecutors pushed ahead with their investigation of payoffs and patronage hiring fraud in the city's government. Those indicted included city Clerk James J. Laski, his political aide, Sam Gammicchia, and John Briatta, a former water department employee who is a brother-in-law of Cook County Commissioner John Daley. John Daley is Mayor Richard M. Daley's brother. The inclusion of a Daley relative in the indictment brought the scandal deeper into the heart of the political organization that has dominated city government in Chicago for years." The Chicago Tribune (1/27, Lighty, O'Connor, 643K) adds that Laski "solicited $50,000 in bribes for steering city trucking business to a lifelong friend who was charged Thursday for the first time, the indictment alleged. The friend, Michael 'Mick' Jones, and his wife, Traci, who wasn't charged," are Laski employees. "Jones recorded several conversations with Laski in 2005 while wearing an FBI wire during a meeting in the basement of Laski's home and during a late summer car trip to a Wisconsin resort the two took at Jones' suggestion, a source close to Laski said." The Chicago Sun-Times (1/27, Warmbir, Novak, Spielman) notes, "Aderman and Jones have been cooperating for months with investigators. Briatta is not."

Chicago Dentist Pleads Not Guilty To Prostitution Ring Charges, Released On Bond. WBBM-TV Chicago (1/26, Parker) reports on its Web site from a story broadcast Thursday, Chicago dentist Dr. Gary Kimmel "was in court Thursday fighting accusations that are spicy enough to make your teeth rattle. … 'Why this case has garnered so much publicity is beyond me, but I guess it's an interesting and salacious story and its a juicy allegation,' said defense attorney Joe Lopez. The FBI is accusing Kimmel of providing Marina City condos and a fleet of expensive cars for an interstate prostitution ring. … In court Thursday, the judge released the dentist on an unsecured $100,000 bond after the dentist pled not guilty to all the charges." WBBM adds, "The defense lawyer concedes that secretly recorded FBI audio tapes may be a problem for Kimmel. In one of them, the dentist seems to endorse an alleged pimp's plan to injure one of his hookers." The AP (1/27) notes, "The case was part of a national investigation dubbed 'Innocence Lost' by prosecutors that resulted in charges in December against alleged ring members in Michigan and Hawaii."

Family Matter Delays FBI Agent's Testimony At Ryan Trial. The AP (1/27, Robinson) reports "George Ryan's racketeering and fraud trial was put on hold Thursday as the prosecution's last major witness," FBI Special Agent Raymond Ruebenson, "who has long been at the heart of the government's seven-year Operation Safe Road," took "personal leave Thursday over a family matter."

Defense Hammers Key Prosecution Witness At Campbell Trial. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (1/27, Suggs, Torpy, 430K) reports, "Former Atlanta Mayor Bill Campbell's defense team warned it would be 'loaded for bear' in cross-examining key prosecution witnesses, and the assault began Thursday. Michael Sullivan, called by prosecutors as a member of Campbell's 'inner circle,' was the first target." Sullivan "testified that a contractor friend of Campbell's indicated to him that he had 'bought' the former mayor. Sullivan was later pounded relentlessly by defense attorney Jerry Froelich, who suggested federal authorities had 'bought' Sullivan's testimony in exchange for not prosecuting him. Unlike when he was questioned by the prosecution, Sullivan at time seemed stricken by amnesia. He did not remember when he got married, divorced or how much he made when employed by the city. Such memory lapses drew snickers from the packed courtroom."

WXIA-TV Atlanta (1/26, Carnes, Christensen) reports on its Web site from a story broadcast Thursday, "During a combative morning…Campbell's defense team contended the evidence being used by the prosecution is flawed and fought to keep it from the jury. … Lawyers on each side argued over the validity of Sullivan's testimony that questioned the legality of Campbell's relationship with former city contractor Rickey Rowe. Rowe died during the federal investigation. Campbell's lawyers said that all testimony about Rowe should be kept out of court because Rowe isn't here to verify conversations that he may or may not have had. In the end, U.S. District Judge Richard Story ruled that the testimony would be allowed."

Convictions Changing Louisianans' Attitudes About Public Corruption. The Los Angeles Times (1/27, Bustillo, 958K) reports, "Joseph Impastato conceded he took the two cashier's checks worth $85,000. The whole thing was captured on tape by the FBI, so it would have been difficult to deny. But it was no kickback, the councilman from St. Tammany Parish said. It was business. … Federal prosecutors are not buying it — and neither apparently is the Louisiana public." The Times adds that "as the state lobbies Washington for more money to rebuild ravaged towns and cities, citizens are realizing that Louisiana's well-earned penchant for dirty politics has exacted a steep price: It has badly damaged the credibility of the recovery effort." The bribery conviction of former Gov. Edwin Edwards was "a major turning point in public attitude." Additionally, "in the last decade Louisiana has seen an attorney general, a congressman, a state Senate president, a federal judge and countless local officials convicted of corruption. Louisiana's last three state insurance commissioners wound up in prison for offenses that include lying to the FBI, accepting $2 million in illegal campaign contributions and taking bribes." US Attorney Jim Letten "sees the convictions as a sign of progress. Wherever he goes, he said, he is greeted by people — black, white, Latino, Asian — who tell him Louisiana needs to clean up its act."

Owner Of Stolen Pollack Painting Gives FBI Name Of Suspect. The AP (1/27, Rubinkam) reports, "The owner of a Jackson Pollock painting stolen from Scranton's Everhart Museum two months ago said he has forwarded the name of his No. 1 suspect to the FBI, and that the person has a connection to the museum. … Everhart spokesman Joe Palumbo said Thursday that museum officials don't believe the theft was perpetrated by anyone affiliated with the museum. … The owner declined to say why he suspects the person whose name he gave the FBI, but said his information is based on official accounts of what happened and his knowledge of the museum's security. An FBI spokeswoman confirmed the agency is investigating but declined to provide details." The AP notes that the museum did not establish the provenance of "Winter in Springs," but "the FBI is going on the assumption that the painting is genuine, FBI spokeswoman Jerri Williams said. … 'We are pursuing it and attempting to identify who is responsible and, if possible, recover the artwork,' Williams said."

Former Mississippi Beef Plant Operator Pleads Guilty To Fraud. The AP (1/27) reports, "Former beef plant operator Richard Hall has agreed to plead guilty to charges of mail fraud and money laundering related to the failure of the state-backed facility in north Mississippi. The FBI and the U.S. attorney's office announced the agreement on Thursday. In federal court in Oxford and state court in Yalobusha County, where the plant was located, Hall pleaded guilty Wednesday to federal and state charges of mail and wire fraud as well as money laundering. No sentencing date has been announced." Hall "admitted to converting $751,000 in public and corporate funds for private use. … Prosecutors said Hall also agreed to cooperate in the continuing investigation of the beef plant."

Former Georgia Library Director Sentenced To Four Years For Embezzlement. The Macon Telegraph (1/27, Crenshaw, 67K) reports, "The former director of the Ocmulgee Regional Library System was sentenced to four years in federal prison Thursday on charges that he stole library funds. David C. Wilson must also pay $264,298 in restitution to the library system and a $75,000 fine, U.S. District Court Judge Dudley Bowen ruled at the end of a half-day hearing. Wilson was library system director from 1982 until 1994, when the FBI and GBI began investigating suspicious expenses. He was convicted in October of five counts of theft and one count of witness tampering."

Massachusetts Investment Adviser Sentenced To 17 Years For Fraud. The Boston Globe (1/25, Kerber, 484K) reports, "A Newton investment adviser was sentenced to 17 years in prison after pleading guilty to fraud charges, federal prosecutors said." T. Gene Gilman "also was sentenced to two years of supervised release and ordered to pay unspecified restitution. According to the Justice Department, Gilman illegally diverted about $12 million of clients' money between 1998 and 2003 to two ventures he operated that eventually failed: a specialty eyewear marketer and a software design firm. Prosecutors said he sent false monthly statements to roughly 55 investors that misrepresented their money was in domestic securities."

Indiana Man Sentenced To 100 Years In Prison For Child Porn Production. The Indianapolis Star (1/20, Penner, 267K) reports, "A Bloomington man who used two girls to create pornography that he sold on the Internet has been sentenced to 100 years in prison." David Andrew Turner "also collected at least 5,000 sexual photos and videos of other children. Susan W. Brooks, U.S. attorney for the Southern District…said prosecutors wanted to ensure that Turner would never be free to prey upon children again. … The sentence was the longest ever meted out for such a crime in the Southern District. Turner must serve at least 85 years of that sentence under federal guidelines." The Star notes, "The investigation was started by the Bloomington Police Department, which collaborated with the FBI because Turner posted -- and sold -- pornographic images via the Internet. Investigators quit counting when they found 5,000 images. They believe Turner had several thousand more."

Getty Museum Director To Meet With Italian Officials About Looted Antiquities. Bloomberg (1/27, Silver) reports, "The J. Paul Getty Museum's new director, Michael Brand, will hold talks in Rome" today "with Italian Culture Ministry officials who are demanding the world's richest art institution return 42 allegedly looted antiquities in its collection, ministry lawyer Maurizio Fiorilli said. … The museum's former antiquities curator, Marion True…is on trial in Rome on charges she acquired illegally excavated ancient art for the Getty. Brand, who was named to the post last year as the Getty began an internal review of its antiquities-acquisition practices, will lead a delegation at the meeting, said Fiorilli, who said there is no room for compromise. 'They should return all the objects,' he said, including 2,500-year-old vases and marble statues. 'The new director is taking a good initiative.'" The AP (1/27, Rogers) notes Band said in a statement yesterday, "The Getty's objective is to develop a fuller sense of all the evidence available regarding the objects in question. We want to be in a better position to continue our dialogue with the Italian government." But Getty spokesman Ron Hartwig "said it was too early to speculate about what, if any, treasures the Getty might return."

US Drops Two Murder Charges Against Alleged Mafia Cops. The New York Daily News (1/26, Marzulli) reports, "The feds have quietly dropped two murder charges against reputed Mafia cops Louis Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa, the Daily News has learned. Sources familiar with the government's strategy insist the evidence against the ex-NYPD detectives in those gangland killings is solid. But a decision was made to streamline the indictment after Brooklyn Federal Judge Jack Weinstein warned prosecutors last June that he would not allow them to call 100 witnesses to testify as they had planned." Newsday (1/27, DeStefano) notes, "A new indictment unsealed Thursday showed that prosecutors, seeking to simplify the trial, have decided to weed out the 1990 murder of union official James Bishop and the 1991 killing of one-time John Gotti crony Bartolomeo 'Bobby' Boriello." Bishop "was killed because he was believed by the mob to have been an informant, said prosecutors. Investigators said Boriello was killed after Eppolito and Caracappa provided information to" Luchese boss Anthony 'Gaspipe' Casso "that the Gambino soldier had threatened him."

Aided By Activists, Inmate Blogs From Death Row. The Washington Post (1/27, B1, Rich) reports, "Vernon Lee Evans Jr. -- amateur advice columnist and convicted murderer -- is scheduled to die next month by lethal injection. He is one of the very few death row inmates to have a blog and, activists say, perhaps the only condemned man worldwide to use a blog to take questions from readers. Activist Ginny Simmons started the blog in March and relayed the questions to Evans, who does not have Internet access. … Though defense attorneys in capital cases have long strived to remind judges and juries that their clients are human beings with lives beyond the crimes they are accused of, Evans's blog is the leading edge of a strategy by death penalty opponents to use new technologies to make the same point to the wider public."

Carjackers Leave Behind Man's Granddaughter. The Washington Post (1/27, B4, Klein) reports that a carjacking victim is "grateful" that carjackers let his granddaughter go. Timothy Anderson left his granddaughter in his car, in the garage "then realized that the door inside the garage of his Clinton home was not secured. As he pulled the house door closed, he heard the engine in his Expedition rev. Then he saw a set of thieves making off with the vehicle, with granddaughter Sydney in the back seat." Anderson "sprinted" after the truck. The Post reports, "The truck then stopped, the back door opened and Sydney hopped out. She ran toward her panicked grandfather. The whole episode took less than 30 seconds." According to the Post report, "Prince George's County police say they believe a set of brazen thieves is targeting people who leave their cars running, a habit that police say is a serious problem in the county."

8-Year-Old Demanded Money Before Girl's Shooting. The Washington Post (1/27, B8, Londoño) reports, "Moments before an 8-year-old boy shot another child at their day-care center this week, he told her to "give me your money," a prosecutor said yesterday. Montgomery County Assistant State's Attorney Karyn McAuliffe provided that account of Tuesday's day-care center shooting in Germantown during an afternoon bond hearing for the boy's father. Prosecutors said the account was based on the police investigation, but they would not elaborate." The boy's father, Hall, "was charged with five weapons offenses," while the boy, "has been charged as a juvenile with assault, assault while in possession of a firearm and reckless endangerment, among other counts." According to the article, "The boy shot the Taurus revolver while it was still in his backpack. One of the five bullets in the gun tore through the backpack and penetrated the girl's arm. The victim, who has not been identified by police, was released Wednesday night from Children's Hospital in the District. Prosecutors said they do not believe that the girl, a second-grader at S. Christa McAuliffe Elementary School, was targeted. They said it remains unclear to what extent the shooting was accidental."

Judge Increases Child Molester's Sentence From 60 Days To 3-10 Years. The Washington Times (1/27) reports, "A judge vilified as soft on crime by Web loggers, TV commentators and politicians for giving a child molester just 60 days in jail increased the sentence yesterday to three to 10 years behind bars. Vermont District Judge Edward Cashman said he decided to impose the longer sentence because state officials reversed course and agreed to provide sex-offender treatment to Mark Hulett in prison. When the judge imposed the original sentence on Jan. 4, Hulett had been ruled ineligible for treatment until he got out of prison. Judge Cashman said the lighter sentence was the only way to ensure that Hulett got prompt treatment. Hulett, 34, pleaded guilty to charges that he had sexual contact with a girl during a four-year period, beginning when she was 6."

Guard Wounded in Hospitalized Inmate's Attempted Escape. The Washington Times/AP (1/27, Dishneau) reports, "A hospitalized state prison inmate shot and critically wounded the correctional officer guarding his room yesterday, then used the officer's gun to force a cabbie to drive him on a chase that ended with the inmate's arrest, state police and prison officials said. The 44-year-old officer was in critical condition at Washington County hospital, where the attack occurred at about 5 a.m., authorities said. They said he was shot in the face but gave no other information about his injuries. … Corrections Commissioner Frank C. Sizer Jr. identified the inmate as Brandon Morris, 20, who was serving an eight-year sentence at the nearby, medium-security Roxbury Correctional Institution for assault, robbery and handgun violations in Baltimore."

CIVIL LAW:

FTC Settles With ChoicePoint. Several media outlets report on ChoicePoint's settlement with the Federal Trade Commission over security breaches that exposed data to possible identity theft following its announcement of the breach in February.

ABC's World News Tonight (1/26, story 7, 0:10, Vargas) reported, "The US Government today reached a settlement with the data gathering company Choicepoint after thieves broke into its data bank. Choicepoint agreed to pay $15 million and put checks in place to prevent future breaches. Last year, thieves gained access to a data bank with the records of 160,000 consumers. The government says the identities of 800 people were stolen."

NBC Nightly News (1/26, story 5, :45, Williams) reported, "There's news on the continuing problem of identity theft in this country. The Federal Trade Commission announced the biggest fine ever against Choicepoint. That's the company that maintains the huge database of personal financial information and had a big security breach last year. They'll pay a $10 million fine plus $5 million in reparations to the 163,000 people whose personal information was compromised."

security breaches, in addition to setting up new procedures to prevent data theft. All also note that ChoicePoint did not admit any wrongdoing in the settlement. All articles quote privacy advocates, who generally approve of the settlement. All articles also touch on the larger issue of data privacy and data theft.

The Wall Street Journal (1/27, Conkey, Carrns) reports, "ChoicePoint, based in Alpharetta, Ga., also must revamp the way it screens customers, implement new information-handling procedures and obtain independent security audits every other year until 2026. FTC Chairman Deborah Platt Majoras said the agreement provides 'an opportunity for ChoicePoint to get data security right.' She also said that to reduce fraudulent access to its vast database, company representatives will visit most subscribers to check who is using its services."

USA Today (1/27, Swartz) reports, "The FTC says about 800 people have been victimized by identity theft stemming from the breach, but more would be eligible for compensation as cases arise. The FTC says it is establishing a fund and will develop a plan to get compensation to victims. ChoicePoint, citing the Los Angeles County district attorney, says there have been only 16 known instances of ID theft. The hefty fine sends a strong message to companies that handle the data of millions of Americans, privacy experts say." USA Today also offers background on the identity theft issue, saying, "At least 130 reported breaches exposed more than 55 million Americans to ID theft last year, sparking consumer advocates' calls for federal oversight of loosely regulated data-brokers."

Under the headline "Record Find For Data Breach," the Washington Post (1/27, D1, Mohammed) reports, "The Federal Trade Commission, which said the fine was the largest civil penalty it had ever imposed, said ChoicePoint violated consumers' privacy and breaking federal laws by mishandling the information and misleading people about its privacy policy. … The ChoicePoint case has galvanized public concerns both about the ease with which personal information can be bought and sold and about the lax security procedures at data brokers that last year alone led to security breaches affecting tens of millions of people." The Washington Post also says, "ChoicePoint told about 145,000 people in February that their personal information was obtained from the company by suspected criminals who masqueraded as legitimate businesspeople. Later in the year, it told another 17,000 people that information such as their names, addresses, dates of birth, Social Security numbers and summary credit information had been compromised. The FTC said the incidents led to at least 800 cases of identity theft, which has been the top type of consumer complaint logged by the agency for the past six years."

The New York Times (1/27, Zeller) carries reactions from players on several sides of the debate. Lydia Barnes, director of the FTC's Bureau of Consumer Protection, says, "The No. 1 point of this case is that companies that maintain sensitive personal information must employ reasonable safeguards. … That should be fundamental in this day and age.'" The Times also quotes Chris Jay Hoofnagle of the Electronic Privacy Information Center, who says it's an "important settlement" that "makes it clear that companies have to take information security more seriously." Meanwhile, James Lee, ChoicePoint's chief marketing officer, says, "We certainly support the settlement, and we believe its provisions are the right things to do and in the spirit of the changes we've already been making over the last year." The Times also reports that "Senator Charles E. Schumer, a Democrat from New York, who, along with Senator Bill Nelson, a Democrat from Florida, introduced one of the most comprehensive data security bills last year, thought the settlement was not punitive enough."

ChoicePoint Ignored "Obvious Red Flags.". The New York Times (1/27, Zeller) includes some background on the FTC's complaint against ChoicePoint. The Times reports, "In its complaint against ChoicePoint, the F.T.C. claimed that the company did not have 'reasonable procedures' in place to screen would-be subscribers to its databases and that in this case, the applications for access made by the fake businesses should have raised 'obvious red flags,'" such as "when an apartment number or a commercial mail drop was given as a business address, or when cellphone numbers were provided as a 'business's sole telephone number,' according to the agency's complaint" This "sloppiness" ultimately allowed credit histories "to fall into the hands of the fraudulent businesses," violating the Fair Credit Reporting Act, the New York Times says.

ChoicePoint Income, Stock Price Take Hits. The Wall Street Journal (1/27, Conkey, Carrns) reports, "ChoicePoint yesterday said fourth-quarter net income fell 29% to $27.7 million, or 30 cents a share, from $39.2 million, or 43 cents a share, a year earlier. The company took an $8 million pretax charge for the FTC settlement and another $5.3 million in charges for other costs, including legal expenses related to the breach, which overall crimped profit by 14 cents a share. For the full year, ChoicePoint said net income fell 4.9% to $140.7 million, or $1.53 a share, from $148 million, or $1.62 a share, the prior year. In 4 p.m. New York Stock Exchange composite trading yesterday, ChoicePoint shares sagged $3.35, or 7.2%, to $42.95."

ChoicePoint Still Faces SEC Inquiry. The Wall Street Journal (1/27, Conkey, Carrns) says, "[T]he company still faces an investigation by the Securities and Exchange Commission into trading in ChoicePoint stock by Mr. Curling and Chief Executive Derek Smith prior to the company's disclosure of the breach. The two realized a combined profit of $16.6 million from selling company shares in the months after it learned of the breach. The company has said the sales were proper and part of a pre-approved plan. A ChoicePoint spokesman said that neither Mr. Smith nor Mr. Curling was available late yesterday to comment on the SEC inquiry. The spokesman noted that Mr. Smith has said he expects the outcome of the inquiry to be 'favorable' to himself and ChoicePoint." USA Today (1/27, Swartz) and the Washington Post (1/27, D1, Mohammed) also mentioned the SEC inquiry.

Southern Illinois U Mulls Changes To Fellowships. The Chicago Tribune (1/26, Cohen, Report) reports, "Facing pressure from the U.S. Justice Department, Southern Illinois University officials are considering changes to three minority and female fellowships that the government has charged discriminate against white and male graduate students." The Tribune continues, "University administrators discussed the possible changes, proposed by the government last week, with student and faculty leaders at closed-door meetings Wednesday. … Though negotiations are continuing, a university Web site already says that the fellowships have been 'extensively revised' and are open to a broader group of students. University officials said the Web site changes weren't authorized. … The board of trustees will likely decide whether to accept the government's proposals within the next few weeks, a move that would delay a threatened lawsuit."

The Chicago Sun-Times (1/26, Newbart) reports, "Officials at Southern Illinois University presented a proposed consent decree to faculty and student leaders Wednesday, seeking to ward off a proposed federal lawsuit that would charge the school with discriminating against whites and others. … Officials would not say just what was being proposed in the consent decree, which came after two months of negotiations with the U.S. Justice Department. The department had threatened to sue the school on grounds that three of its minority fellowship programs discriminated against whites, males and non-preferred minorities. … However, changes in the descriptions of those fellowships had been removed from the school's Web site Wednesday."

Two Charged With Hate Crime With Mercury In Ohio. The AP (1/27) reports, "Two men accused of putting poisonous mercury on an interracial couple's porch have been charged with a hate crime, according to a media report." The AP continues, "Joseph Kuzlik, 56, and David Fredericy, 49, were each charged with conspiracy to violate civil rights, making false statements and criminal interference with housing rights. Both men pleaded innocent Wednesday in U.S. District Court in Cleveland, The Plain Dealer newspaper reported. … 'Allegations of hate crime strike at the heart of our community and cannot be tolerated,' Greg White, the U.S. attorney in Cleveland, said, according to the report." The AP adds, "Kuzlik is accused of acting as a lookout in February while Fredericy put an undisclosed amount of mercury on and around the porch of the unidentified couple's home in Cleveland's Slavic Village neighborhood, where the men also live. … The men are accused of lying when they told Environmental Protection Agency employees who cleaned up the mercury that they did not know how the mercury got on their neighbors' porch."

Student Claims Gender Bias In Complaint Against Massachusetts School. The Washington Times (1/27, Wetzstein) reports, "Female high school students are treated more leniently and are less likely to be punished than their male peers, a 17-year-old Massachusetts senior says in a federal complaint about gender bias at his school. 'The system is designed to the disadvantage of males,' Doug Anglin, a student at Milton High School in Milton, Mass., told the Boston Globe this week. 'From the elementary level, they establish a philosophy that if you sit down, follow orders and listen to what they say, you'll do well and get good grades. Men naturally rebel against this.' … The complaint cites 'statistical anomalies' in males' grades and standardized testing performance, as well as 'a generalized perception' that male and female students are treated differently by the mostly white, female teaching staff, Gerald Anglin said yesterday. … A Department of Education spokesman said the agency received the complaint but had no further comment." The Times also cited its own earlier report on "the issue of male 'academic underachievers.'" According to the Times, "Studies show that boys receive most of the "D" and "F" grades, create 80 percent of classroom discipline problems, account for 80 percent of high school dropouts and make up less than 44 percent of the college population. Suggested solutions include making classrooms smaller and more action-oriented, and teaching boys and girls separately."

Court-Martial Of Naval Academy Teacher Delayed. The Washington Times (1/27, Gertz, Scarborough, 90K) reports in its "Inside the Ring" column, "The U.S. Navy-Marine Corps Court of Criminal Appeals has ordered a delay in the court-martial of a Naval Academy teacher who used salty language in front of a female midshipman. The trial at the Washington Navy Yard had been scheduled to begin next week for Lt. Bryan D. Black. But his attorney, Charles Gittins, filed an appeal after the trial judge rejected his argument that the school's superintendent, Vice Adm. Rodney P. Rempt, should be removed as the officer overseeing the case. Adm. Rempt, who is in the midst of a 'no tolerance' campaign against sexual harassment at the Annapolis campus, ordered Lt. Black's court-martial, overruling an investigative officer who recommended counseling, not criminal charges. Mr. Gittins says Adm. Rempt has too much of a stake in seeing Lt. Black punished. He says a new admiral should be named as the convening authority. The appeals court will entertain written arguments from the defense and prosecution, and then likely hand down a ruling next month."

Alabama, Georgia Democrats Push Bible Classes In Public Schools. Democratic lawmakers in Georgia and Alabama are promoting Bible classes in the public schools, an idea usually pushed by conservative Republicans. The New York Times (1/27, Kirkpatrick, 1.19M) reports, 'Their Republican opponents are in turn denouncing them as 'pharisees,' a favorite term of liberals for politicians who exploit religion. Democrats in both states have introduced bills authorizing school districts to teach courses modeled after a new textbook, 'The Bible and Its Influence.' It was produced by the nonpartisan, ecumenical Bible Literacy Project and provides an assessment of the Bible's impact on history, literature and art that is academic and detached, if largely laudatory. The Democrats who introduced the bills said they hoped to compete with Republicans for conservative Christian voters." The Times adds, "Democrats in other states are moving in the same direction, jumping into a conversation about religion and values that some party leaders began after the 2004 election, when President Bush and the Republicans rode those themes to victory."

AMC Closes Deal To Purchase Loews Cineplex. The AP (1/27, Twiddy) reports, "AMC Entertainment Inc. on Thursday said it had completed its purchase of Loews Cineplex Entertainment Corp., strengthening its position as the nation's second-largest theater operator." The AP continues, "The Kansas City-based company now will operate 415 theaters with 5,672 screens in 29 states and the District of Columbia and 11 foreign countries. Annual revenues for the privately held company are expected to be around $2.4 billion. … Financial terms for the deal were not released." The AP adds, "AMC and Loews agreed last year to sell 10 theaters with 120 screens to resolve consolidation concerns by the Justice Department and attorneys general in California, Illinois, Massachusetts, New York, Washington state and the District of Columbia. The theaters are in Chicago, New York City, Boston, San Francisco, Seattle, Dallas and Washington, D.C. … Before the acquisition, AMC operated 226 theaters with 3,522 screens, while Loews, based in New York City, operated 198 theaters with 2,235 screens."

EU Official Says Microsoft May Face Fine Despite Access Offer. The AP (1/27, Ames) reports, "Microsoft Corp.'s new offer to let competitors examine some of the blueprints to its Windows operating system may not end the threat of daily $2.36 million fines in the European Union's antitrust case, an EU spokesman said Thursday. … 'It would be premature to conclude that offering access to source codes would necessarily resolve the problem of compliance,' said EU antitrust spokesman Jonathan Todd." The AP continues, "Todd said EU antitrust officials await details from Microsoft before making a decision. … 'So far all we have received is the press release,' he said." The AP adds, "Responding to a 2004 EU antitrust ruling, Microsoft in December offered rivals thousands of pages of documentation and free technical support to help competitors make their software compatible with Windows-based servers, which power Web sites and other Internet services. … But an independent monitor called the documents 'totally unfit.' The European Commission then threatened to fine Microsoft up to $2.36 million a day, retroactive to Dec. 15, saying the software giant was proving intransigent about sharing data with competitors."

Three Alleged ELF Activists Plead Not Guilty To Ecoterror Charges. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (1/27, Thompson) reports alleged ELF activists Eric McDavid, Zachary Jensen and Lauren Weiner "pleaded not guilty Thursday to conspiring to attack government targets…and bail was set" at $1.2 million for Weiner. "Prosecutors said all three should be held as flight risks and dangers to the community. U.S. Magistrate Judge Gregory Hollows ordered McDavid and Jensen held in Sacramento County Jail without bond." The AP adds, "Hollows noted that the government has audio and video surveillance, notes, an anarchists' cookbook seized from the suspects, and the account of a paid FBI informant who lived with the group in a cabin rented and wired by the FBI. … But Hollows found little evidence supporting prosecutors' contention that the three were affiliated with either ELF or the similarly shadowy Animal Liberation Front, though he said they may have shared the same goals." The Sacramento Bee (1/27, Walsh, 301K) notes, "While it is not in the indictment, other court papers filed by the government say the trio planned to publicly proclaim after the arson campaign that it was carried out in the name of the Earth Liberation Front, a movement advocating violent criminal acts against what its followers believe are symbols of the destruction and exploitation of the environment."

BP Could Face Criminal Charges In Fatal Texas Refinery Explosion. Reuters (1/27, Baltimore) reports, "The U.S. government is pursuing charges against BP related to an explosion last year that killed 15 workers at its giant Texas refinery, sources familiar with the matter said on Thursday." Reuters continues, "The case could result in civil or criminal charges against BP, and the company could face millions of dollars in fines, one source said. … The Environmental Protection Agency and Justice Department are pressing an enforcement case against BP related to the March 23 blast at the Texas City, Texas refinery, said the sources, who spoke on condition of anonymity." Reuters adds, "The blast at the 460,000 barrel per day facility also injured 170 people and rattled buildings as far as five miles away. … An EPA spokeswoman referred queries to the Justice Department, where a spokeswoman declined to comment. … Last year the U.S. Department of Labour said it had asked the Justice Department to consider bringing criminal charges against BP."

West Virginia Governor Signs New Mine Safety Regulations. The AP (1/26) reported that West Virginia Gov. Joe Manchin has signed new mine safety regulations into law. The new regulations require better communications, underground oxygen supplies and faster emergency responses and Manchin says they will "help prevent tragedies like the two that killed 14 miners this month." The AP added, "The state's new mine safety law mandates that miners be provided with emergency communicators and tracking devices. It also requires mine operators to store extra air supplies underground, and sets up a new Mine and Industrial Accident Rapid Response System and statewide all-hours hot line to trigger rescue efforts more quickly."

Administration Offers Rules For Data Collected From Pesticide Tests On Humans. The Washington Post (1/27, A12, Eilperin, 744K) reports, "The Bush Administration issued yesterday the first-ever federal rules governing the use of information collected in tests that expose human subjects to toxic pesticides. The new regulations -- which drew praise from pesticide manufacturers and criticism from environmentalists and congressional Democrats -- would prohibit the intentional dosing of pregnant women and children with such poisons, and would establish an independent board to screen proposed studies."

Alaskans Push For Pipeline Construction. A front page story in the Wall Street Journal (1/27, Gold, 2.11M) reports, "In many parts of the U.S., community leaders and local politicians are fighting to halt energy projects or at least put them in someone else's neighborhood. What's occurring in Alaska is the polar opposite. The majority of Alaskans are great enthusiasts of energy development. The federal government estimates there may be 100 trillion cubic feet of gas in the North Slope, where Alaska meets the Beaufort Sea nearly 300 miles north of the Arctic Circle. … But no gas is leaving the North Slope, even though natural gas prices in the last year have been higher than ever. Exxon Mobil Corp., BP PLC and ConocoPhillips, which have leased drilling rights in Alaska for decades, haven't been in a hurry to get that gas to market. They're currently negotiating to build a pipeline through Canada to the American Midwest but construction on that massive project isn't likely to start for years. Meanwhile, Alaskans are running out of natural gas. … Faced with a vigorous campaign to jump-start the pipeline, the oil companies are in the unusual position of counseling patience. Moving too quickly on their preferred $25 billion pipeline through Canada, one of the largest construction projects in the history of North America, would be disastrous, they say."

Congress Urged To Take Action Against Exporting Electronics Waste. Author Elizabeth Royte in an op-ed in the New York Times (1/27, 1.19M) writes, "Electronic waste is now considered the fastest-growing segment of the municipal waste stream in the United States. … As awareness of the hazards of e-waste rises, more states will ban it from landfills. But keeping toxic trash from our dumps won't mean a thing if we don't forbid the export of hazardous material to countries without enforceable environmental regulations." Royte concludes, "To halt this environmental injustice…the federal government needs to restrict the use of hazardous materials in computers, require manufacturers to put in place recycling programs (it will be a lot cheaper and safer to recycle this stuff once the toxics are out) and ban hazardous waste exports."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Tunnel, Two Tons Of Marijuana Found In California; Cartel Suspected. There was widespread media coverage of the cross-border tunnel and marijuana found near the Tijuana, Mexico, airport. More than 300 news items related to the story turned up in various Internet searches. Prominent examples follow: The AP (1/27, Press) reports, "Authorities said they discovered more than two tons of marijuana in a cross-border tunnel that began near the Tijuana airport and ended inside a warehouse on the U.S. side. The 2,400-foot long passageway is longer than most of the 21 cross-border tunnels that have been discovered since authorities began keeping track after the Sept. 11 attacks, U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement officials said. … John Fernandes, special agent in charge of the Drug Enforcement Administration's San Diego office, said he suspected the tunnel was the work of Tijuana's Arellano-Felix drug smuggling syndicate or another well-known drug cartel. He said tougher enforcement aboveground had forced smugglers to dig below. … The tunnel exited into a large, two-story white cinderblock warehouse in an industrial San Diego neighborhood near the border." The AP story was widely posted on Web sites and/or published in newspapers of media outlets that include Forbes, the San Francisco Chronicle, San Luis Obispo Tribune, Arizona Daily Star, Kansas City Star, and the UK's Guardian.

Reuters (1/27) reports, "The U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA) found 200 pounds (90 kg) of marijuana on the U.S. side, while Mexican authorities said they discovered 2 tons of the drug on that side of the border. Because of the sophistication of the tunnel, the DEA is investigating major drug cartels. 'We know it's been used for drug traffic but this really illustrates the dangers and risks of security to Americans,' said John Fernandez, special agent at the DEA in San Diego."

The San Diego Union-Tribune (1/26, Soto, Berestein) reports, "Authorities said the elaborate tunnel bore the hallmarks of Mexican drug cartels, which have spent millions of dollars in the last 15 years to find a way to move contraband across the border. … 'We have a tunnel and it's massive,' said Lauren Mack, a spokeswoman with U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, which was investigating the tunnel with agents from the Border Patrol and the Drug Enforcement Administration."

The New York Times (1/27, Archibold) reports, "Drug smugglers have dug one of the longest, most sophisticated tunnels discovered in recent years along the Mexican border, and the American and Mexican authorities have hauled nearly two tons of marijuana out of it since they entered it on Wednesday, officials said." Stretching from "a warehouse near the international airport in Tijuana, Mexico, to a vacant industrial building in Otay Mesa, Calif.," the tunnel's sophistication has "surprised officials, who found it outfitted with a concrete floor, electricity, lights and ventilation and groundwater pumping systems. … 'The tunnel is absolutely amazing,' said Michael Unzueta, special agent in charge for the federal Immigration and Customs Enforcement agency's San Diego office."

The Los Angeles Times (1/26, Marosi) writes, "Four tunnels have been discovered in the San Diego area this month. Also Wednesday, a crudely built, unfinished tunnel was discovered when a border patrol agent ran over a sinkhole near the San Ysidro Port of Entry."

AFP (1/27) reports, "The secret route is cut 26 metres below ground, directly under a heavily protected sector of the frontier and is much larger than the 21 others detected under the border since the September 11, 2001 terror attacks on US soil, US officials said."

CNN (1/26) reports on its Web site, "DEA and U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement agents discovered the tunnel Wednesday night. It runs from Tijuana, Mexico, to Otay Mesa, California. … Made of concrete, the passageway had lighting, electricity, ventilation and a pump to remove water, said Lauren Mack, a spokeswoman for Immigration and Customs Enforcement. … More than 20 cross-border tunnels have been uncovered in California and Arizona since 9/11, she added. 'We've now got a dedicated tunnel task force, which works with the DEA and border patrol to proactively look for tunnels,' Mack said."

UPI (1/27) cites the CNN story on the discovery of the tunnel and marijuana.

Proliferation Of Tunnels Seen As Result Of Increased Border Security. The Washington Post (1/27, A3, Pomfret) reports "experts said the passageway bore all the hallmarks of an operation by a major drug cartel." Unzueta said, "Whether they are designed to smuggle drugs, people, weapons or other contraband, these tunnels pose a threat to our nation's security." The Post continues, "Federal agents have concluded that drug traffickers and smugglers of illegal immigrants have been heading underground to escape tighter enforcement along the border. Customs officials announced this week that drug seizures at California border crossings rose 24 percent in the past fiscal year. More than 127 tons of drugs were seized, the vast majority of that marijuana, in the year ending Sept. 30." The Post also reports that Michael Unzueta, special agent in charge for U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement in San Diego "said most of the tunnels have been located in the San Diego area because the composite soil of that region is ideal for such work. From 1990 to 2001, 15 tunnels were unearthed. Unzueta said that a year ago, agents from his agency, the Drug Enforcement Administration and U.S. Customs and Border Protection's Border Patrol unit formed the San Diego Tunnel Task Force, with the aim of unearthing the networks."

The Washington Times (1/27, Seper) reports, "Since the September 11 attacks, federal authorities have discovered more than 20 cross-border tunnels along the US-Mexico border in California and Arizona. Authorities said they were unsure how long the tunnel had been in operation. They also said they did not know what drug organization might have used it. … In July 2003, members of the Tijuana-based Arellano-Felix Organization were indicted for conducting an illegal enterprise through a pattern of racketeering activity, conspiracy to import and distribute cocaine and marijuana, and money laundering. After a request by the DEA, the State Department issued rewards totaling $16 million for information leading to the arrest of five leaders of the organization who remain at large: Javier Arellano-Felix, Eduardo Arellano-Felix, Manuel Aguirre-Galindo, Gustavo Rivera-Martinez and Gilberto Higuera-Guerrero."

Network TV Coverage. ABC World News Tonight (1/26, story 6, 1:50, Vargas) reported, "In California, a secret tunnel used to smuggle drugs and people under the border has been uncovered. It's just one of many found in recent years. Officials say criminals are increasingly digging tunnels to bypass border patrols and move their contraband into the US." ABC (Thomas): "The DEA says it was a major gateway for illegal immigrants and drugs coming from Mexico." DEA Chief of Operations Michael Braun: "These tunnels are absolutely critical to these major drug-trafficking organizations and alien smuggling groups. Arms smuggling groups." Thomas: "US officials say the border has become ground zero for an explosion in illegal activity. Washington is now leaning heavily on Mexico to help put a stop to it." US Border Patrol Chief David Aguilar: "We have gotten a commitment to work with us on this. We have gotten a commitment to find out and get to the bottom of this." Thomas: "Before tons more illegal drugs find their way across the border."

CBS Evening News (1/26, 6:30, Schieffer) reported, "Imagine their amazement when U.S. agents discovered a tunnel almost a mile long and 60 feet deep below the U.S.-Mexico border. And that was not the only surprise -- inside the tunnel, more than two tons of marijuana. The tunnel stretches from near the Tijuana airport to a California warehouse, and it has a cement floor, lights, pulleys and a ventilation system."

NBC Nightly News (1/26, story9, :45, Williams) reported, "Out of California a big discovery to report a drug tunnel that authorities say runs the length of 12 football fields from Mexico into California, it's a tunnel so big the federal government says you can drive a car through it. The tunnel begins in a warehouse in Tijuana, ends in the San Diego area, it's used apparently for smuggling people and/or drugs. US officials say they found more than two tons of marijuana inside."

Cable TV Coverage. CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (1/26, Dobbs) reported, 'Tonight, homeland security officials say they have shut down the largest border tunnel ever discovered on the US-Mexican border. … Police were first tipped off to it…two years ago. They finally found it."

MSNBC's Abrams Report (1/26, 6:00 p.m.) reported, "A half-mile long tunnel under Mexico's border with California [was found]. [Authorities] found more than two tons of marijuana inside that tunnel."

Local TV Coverage. Local TV stations around the country devoted significant coverage to the tunnel. Most of the coverage provided details about what was found in the tunnel. Some examples: WRDW-TV Augusta, Georgia (1/26, 11:18 p.m.) showed John Fernandez of the DEA saying, "When we find these tunnels, we are very concerned about national security." The station continued, "Forensic experts are now combing the entire passageway to try to determine if humans and weapons were also transported through the shaft." The station then showed Fernandez saying. "It's the organization that we want to dismantle, to gut their infrastructure." The station added, "Investigators say they have a tough job ahead of them because the sophistication of the tunnel likely indicates how sophisticated the organization is that had it built."

KESQ-TV Palm Springs (1/26, 5:05 p.m.) reported that authorities don't know how long the tunnel has "been in operation, but [they] say it appears to be the work of the Mexican drug cartels." This station also showed John Fernandez of the DEA discussing the tunnel. Fernandez said, "The sophistication of the tunnel indicates the sophistication of the organization. So we can attribute it to the Arellano-Felix Organization and the other infamous usual suspects." The station added, "21 tunnels have been discovered in California and Arizona since September 11th."

KCNC-TV Denver (1/26, 4:33 p.m.) reported, "The Drug Enforcement Agency and Customs agents unearthed a tunnel" with drugs inside it that ran "almost a mile long."

WTVF-TV Nashville (1/26, 5:17 p.m.) reported, "The Drug Enforcement Agency Says the tunnel was discovered last night in Mexico."

KSTP-TV Minneapolis (1/26, 10:14 p.m.) said "drug enforcement agents uncovered an elaborate tunnel where two tons of marijuana was discovered. It stretches more than 2,400 feet between Mexico and the United States."

WAGA-TV Atlanta (1/26, 6:45 p.m.) reported, "More than two tons of marijuana were found inside a tunnel connecting the US and Mexico. Customs agents say the tunnel is concrete, about five feet wide and tall enough for an adult to stand in. They say smugglers use the tunnel to transport drugs and perhaps even people."

KCAL-TV Los Angeles (1/26, 8:08 p.m.) said, "The tunnel has lights, ventilation, and a pumping system to get ground water out. Inside, Mexican investigators found two tons of marijuana worth millions on the street."

KCBS-TV Los Angeles (1/26, 6:01 p.m.) reported, "US law enforcement says it's the largest [tunnel] ever found on the border." The "Border Patrol spotted the tunnel and called Mexican police."

KGTV-TV San Diego (1/26, 6:32 p.m.) said, "You can see this building is still guarded by Border Patrol agents and members of the Drug Enforcement Agency."

KUSA-TV Denver (1/26, 10:09 p.m.) said the entrance to the tunnel "was found near the Tijuana airport, the exit in San Diego in an industrial neighborhood. … The tunnel has electricity, a pulley system and is wide enough to accommodate a small car."

KDFW-TV Dallas (1/269:24 p.m.) reported, "This is the fourth tunnel uncovered in that area this month and the longest one found so far."

KOMO-TV Seattle (1/26, 11:18 a.m.) added that no arrests have been made after the discovery of the tunnel.

KTVU-TV San Francisco (1/26, 6:06 p.m.) reported, "The discovery prompted the US Attorney's Office and San Diego to launch a criminal investigation."

Eight More "Lively Green" To Plead Guilty To Drug Trafficking Charges. The AP (1/27) reports, "Five more members of the U.S. military and three other suspects have agreed to plead guilty in a drug smuggling sting case targeting military members who believed they were smuggling cocaine through Arizona. The pleas bring the total number of people admitting guilt in the case to 44, most of whom were members of the regular Army or Air Force or the Arizona National Guard. The U.S. Attorney's Office said the five, four Army National guard soldiers and one airman, pleaded guilty to conspiracy to accept cash bribes from people they believed to be narcotics traffickers. In addition, two civilians and an officer with the Arizona Department of Corrections. In fact, the traffickers were FBI agents working a sting operation called 'Lively Green.'" KOLD-TV Tucson (1/26) also reports the plea agreements, noting, "The FBI investigated the operation for two years."

Mexican Official Suggests Border Incursion Was Lively Green-Style Operation. The AP (1/27, Stevenson) reports, "Mexico's foreign secretary suggested Thursday that uniformed men using a military-style Humvee to help drug traffickers on the border could have been U.S. soldiers or criminals disguised as Mexican troops." Luis Ernesto Derbez said that U.S. Ambassador Tony Garza's "strongly worded statement asking the Mexican government to 'fully investigate'" the incident were "out of line." Derbez referred "to an FBI drug sting dubbed Operation Lively Green, in which more than a dozen U.S. military and civilian government workers were arrested in southern Arizona. … 'Members of the U.S. Army have helped protect people who were processing and transporting drugs,' Derbez told a news conference. 'And just as that has happened ... it is very probable that something like that could have happened, that in reality they (the uniformed men at the border) were members of some of their groups disguised as Mexican soldiers with Humvees.'"

Reporting Continues On Plot To Kill DEA Agent. The Washington Times (1/27, Seper) reports, "Federal authorities have arrested two Louisiana men, including an inmate in the Tangipahoa Parish Prison near New Orleans, in a $15,000 assassination plot to kill a U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration agent. Johnnie Sims was arrested Wednesday night as he attempted to hire a hit man to kill DEA Agent Chad Scott, said William J. Renton Jr., special agent in charge of the DEA's New Orleans field office. Chris Walker, 30, also was charged but already was in custody from his Oct. 13 arrest for possession with the intent to distribute crack cocaine. 'This arrest and the swift federal response to the vicious plot to murder a career DEA special agent should serve as compelling evidence of our absolute commitment to take any steps necessary to protect the lives of law-enforcement officers and citizens alike from those dangerous criminals who prey upon society with no regard for human life,' said U.S. Attorney Jim Letten. According to a criminal complaint filed in U.S. District Court, federal agents learned of the purported assassination plot from cooperating inmates who said Mr. Walker was seeking to hire someone to kill Mr. Scott."

The New Orleans Times-Picayune (1/26, Perlstein) writes, "William Renton, the DEA's top agent for the New Orleans area, said the scheme unraveled when Walker, 30, started asking fellow inmates at Tangipahoa Parish Prison for the names of potential hit men. Two inmates took the information straight to DEA Agent Chad Scott, who had busted Walker on Oct. 18 and booked him with possessing more than a kilo of cocaine, equipment used in making crack and a gun with an obliterated serial number, according to Renton and court records. The informants told the agent that Walker had asked Sims, 25, to line up an assassin to murder Scott, according to criminal affidavit filed in the case. The DEA wasted no time launching a sting operation using an undercover New Orleans police officer to pose as a drug-dealing hit man, the affidavit states."

California County May Join Others In Medical Marijuana Lawsuit. Southern California's Press-Enterprise (1/27) reports, "Riverside County will consider joining San Bernardino and San Diego counties in a federal lawsuit seeking to overturn California's medical-marijuana law. Supervisor Jeff Stone, a pharmacist, said he intends to ask his colleagues in closed session Tuesday to add the county to the short list of challengers to the state's Compassionate Use Act approved by Californians in 1996. The law allows patients with a physician's recommendation to transport and use marijuana to treat the symptoms of illnesses such as cancer, glaucoma, chronic pain and AIDS."

US-Mexico Quarrels Over Border Said To Indicate "Deteriorating Relationship." The New York Times (1/27, McKinley) reports, "The United States and Mexico exchanged diplomatic broadsides on Thursday over border security and drug-related violence in another sign of their deteriorating relationship. The American ambassador, Antonio O. Garza Jr., sent a formal note to the Mexican government demanding an investigation of" Monday's smuggling incident in Texas. Garza "took the unusual step of not only announcing the note, but promising to send a second one to express concern about a rise in drug-related violence in border towns and recent attacks on American Border Patrol agents. … Hours later the Mexican foreign minister, Luis Ernesto Derbez, suggested that it was Mr. Garza who appeared to be playing to a crowd for political reasons."

Mexican Official Says American Soldiers May Have Aided Smugglers. The AP (1/26) reported Mexican Foreign Secretary Luis Ernesto Derbez "suggested Thursday that American soldiers disguised as Mexican troops may have been in the military-style Humvee filmed earlier this week protecting a marijuana shipment on the border." Derbez said at "a news conference that US soldiers had helped drug smugglers before. However, he offered no evidence." Derbez said, "And just as that has happened ... it is very probable that something like that could have happened, that in reality they were members of some of their groups disguised as Mexican soldiers with Humvees." He added that "there was no proof that the men seen in the incident were Mexicans. Derbez also said his country will send a diplomatic note to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice demanding that US officials tone down their comments on Mexico's security and immigration problems."

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff's statements last week that reports of Mexican military incursions were overblown have been criticized frequently by the primetime cable news hosts. Senator Kay Bailey Hutchison appeared on Fox News' The Big Story (1/26) where she discussed the issue of Mexican military incursions. Host John Gibson: "Senator, you wrote a letter to the Secretary of the Department of Homeland Security, Michael Chertoff. He does not seem to be taking this very seriously. He calls these routine, accidental incursions. Texas authorities think they're much more serious than that. Have you been able to persuade the secretary to regard this as a serious matter and do something about it?" Hutchison: "Well, certainly we are encouraging the secretary to take action, to ask for an investigation, which the Mexican government has said they'll do."

On CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (1/26) host Lou Dobbs said, "The question has to be, why is the White House silent on this issue? Why is the man in charge of our homeland security, that is Homeland Security Department Secretary Michael Chertoff, so timid and so unconcerned or interested?"

Current Border Situation Compared To 1916. The Washington Times (1/27, Mccain) reports in a front page article that "the White House is speaking of its 'concern about the reports' of Monday's border crossing, which a spokesman described as 'an incident that is under investigation.' Yet in 1916, when Pancho Villa's bandits raided Columbus, NM, a Democratic president didn't hesitate. President Woodrow Wilson sent Gen. John 'Black Jack' Pershing to lead an expedition into Mexico. A $5,000 bounty was offered for Villa's capture, and Army posters invoked 'The Flag, Old Glory' in calling for 25,000 recruits: 'Come on, boys, be ready to shoulder the trusty Springfield.'" However, "the historic situation during Villa's day was much different, said James Carafano, a senior fellow at the Heritage Foundation. 'Mexico back then didn't have a strong central government,' said Mr. Carafano, who specializes in defense and homeland-security issues. 'There was no rule of law. I don't think you can compare that to Mexico today."

Ohio Man Pleads Guilty To Firearms, Meth Charges. The Chattanooga (TN) Chattanoogan (1/27) reports, "A Cleveland, Tn., man who authorities say kept machine guns buried in his yard pleaded guilty Thursday to firearms and meth charges." The Chattanoogan continues, "Donald Pippenger, 50, appeared before Judge Allan Edgar. … Prosecutor Gary Humble said Bradley County Sheriff officers on Aug. 9, 2004, found working components of a meth lab at Pippenger's home. He said they went back on March 10, 2005, and found he again was outfitted to cook meth. … Pippenger sold a sub-machine gun to an undercover officer on May 11, 2005, the prosecutor said." The Chattanoogan adds, "He is facing up to 20 years in prison and a fine up to $1 million on the meth cases and up to 10 years and a fine up to $250,000 in the firearms case. … ATF Agt. Carl Maskew said an informant told him he learned Pippenger was trying to sell guns. The informant went to the Pippenger home at 105 Hughes Road and Pippenger offered to sell him a semi-automatic Uzi. He said Pippenger said he should consider buying a fully automatic Uzi instead. He said Pippenger told him he had several automatic Uzis and an automatic AK-47 that he would sell."

Alabama Couple Indicted For Alleged Fraudulent Antique Firearms Valuations. The AP (1/27, Lovan) reports, "An Alabama man who headed a Louisville historical weapons museum has been charged with bilking the museum's founder out of millions by lying about the cost of some antique firearms." Michael K. Salisbury "inflated the prices of weapons bought by the museum's founder and primary financial backer, Owsley Brown Frazier, prosecutors said. He was indicted on two counts of money laundering, three counts of wire fraud and four counts of tax evasion. Salisbury's wife, Karen Cruse Salisbury…faces money laundering and wire fraud charges. The couple, of Huntsville, Ala., were taken into custody Thursday morning in Louisville," pleaded not guilty and were released on bond. The AP notes, "The indictments alleged Salisbury misrepresented the prices on a Colt revolver that was believed to have belonged to former FBI director J. Edgar Hoover; a Winchester rifle owned by William F. 'Buffalo Bill' Cody; and a bow, quiver and six arrows believed to have belonged to the Apache Indian Geronimo."

Arizona Man, Mexican Officer Indicted For Gun Smuggling. The Yuma (AZ) Sun (1/26, Gautreaux)

reports, "A Mexican police officer and a Yuma man have been federally indicted for allegedly attempting to cross the border with three weapons purchased at a Yuma gun show." The Sun continues, "Omar Ignacio Alvarez, 20, of Yuma assisted Pedro Rios-Perez, 41, an officer for the Baja California State Police, in buying two handguns and an assault rifle Jan. 7 at a gun show at the Yuma County Fairgrounds, according to the indictment and a criminal complaint filed in U.S. District Court in Phoenix. The two allegedly attempted to drive the guns into Mexico in a police vehicle." The Sun adds, "The arrests are part of an overall increase in enforcement by the federal government in cooperation with local agencies to curb weapons trafficking in this area, according to Tom Mangan, special agent for the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives (ATF). … 'We recognize Yuma as being a firearms source for guns going to Mexico,' Mangan said. 'Arizona is a source state for firearms to Mexico.' … With strict firearms laws in Mexico, buying weapons in the United States and smuggling them south has been a longtime practice. Mangan said people from Mexico involved in narcotics and other crime have been coming to Yuma retailers to purchase weapons or having them bought for them through straw purchases."

Virginia Delegate Accidentally Discharges Handgun In His Office. A front page story in the Washington Post (1/27, Jenkins, Helderman, 744K) reports that Virginia Del. John S. "Jack" Reid accidentally discharged the small semiautomatic .380 handgun he carries for protection in his office Thursday. While no one was injured, the incident "prompted an unexpected debate about gun control and also something uncommon in Virginia political circles: contrition from a state legislator. Reid, a Henrico County Republican, rose from his seat on the floor of the House of Delegates, asked to be heard, explained what had happened and said: 'I want to apologize to the members of this body and to the greater body. . . . I'm just thankful that nobody was hurt.'" Reid "was at a loss to explain how an experienced gun owner found himself discharging a firearm during one of the busiest parts of the business day at the state Capitol complex."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Byrd, Johnson To Back Alito Confirmation. USA Today (1/27, Kiely, 2.31M) reports, "Two more Democratic senators, Robert Byrd of West Virginia and Tim Johnson of South Dakota, said Thursday that they will vote in favor of Supreme Court nominee Samuel Alito." Byrd and Johnson join Sen. Ben Nelson "as Alito's only announced Democratic supporters. All three are from states won by President Bush in 2004." Byrd said yesterday, "Like most of my constituents, I prefer conservative judges."

ABC's World News Tonight (1/26, story 5, :10, Vargas) in a brief story reported Byrd "broke party ranks to support" Alito. Byrd" called him 'an honorable man, who loves his country, lovers his constitution, and will give it his best.' He blasted the hearings calling them overly partisan saying his constituents called them an outrage and a disgrace."

Meanwhile, the Hartford Courant (1/27, Lightman, 206K) reports, "Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman, D-Conn., saying he was 'left with just too many doubts,' announced today he will vote against confirming Judge Samuel A. Alito Jr. to the U.S. Supreme Court."

Reuters (1/27) reports Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist "moved to force a confirmation vote on Tuesday. A test vote on ending debate is set for Monday, and a number of Democrats conceded they probably cannot stop Frist from mustering the needed 60 votes to do so. There are 44 Senate Democrats." Fox News' Special Report (1/26, Wilson) added "a final vote up or down on Alito is expected at 11:00 a.m. Tuesday morning and it does appear that by probably around noon he'll be sworn into the Supreme Court."

White House Says It Has 60 Firm Commitments In Favor Of Alito. CNN's The Situation Room (1/26, Bash) reported that a senior Bush Administration official "said that they think that this makes the Democrats, from their perspective, look worse than they think they did during the hearings, the Alito hearings." The official "said that they actually feel that they have 60 firm commitments, 60 firm commitments to vote in favor of Judge Alito. And that would block a filibuster."

Kerry, In Switzerland, Tries To Mount Last-Minute Filibuster. The CBS Evening News (1/26, story 4, :30, Schieffer) also noted, "As…Alito appears headed for confirmation by the Senate, some of his liberal Democratic opponents today threatened a last-ditch filibuster to try to prevent or at least delay a final vote. It does appear, however, that Alito has enough support to stop any filibuster and win confirmation." The Washington Times (1/27, Hurt, 90K) adds Sen. John Kerry "phoned in for a filibuster from the Swiss Alps." Kerry "made calls yesterday while attending the World Economic Forum in Davos, Switzerland, urging colleagues to join a last-ditch effort to thwart Judge Alito's confirmation." Sen. Edward M. Kennedy "joined in Mr. Kerry's call for a filibuster."

The New York Times (1/27, Kirkpatrick, 1.19M) reports on Kerry's "quixotic, last-minute effort for a filibuster." Democrats "cringed and Republicans jeered at the awkwardness of his gesture, which almost no one in the Senate expects to succeed. 'God bless John Kerry,' said Don Stewart, a spokesman for Senator John Cornyn, a Texas Republican on the Judiciary Committee. 'He just cinched this whole nomination. With Senator Kerry, it is Christmas every day.'" Steve Schmidt, a White House spokesman "working on the nomination," said Kerry's move "says a lot less about Alito than it does about the Iowa primary in 2008," suggesting "that Mr. Kerry, who lost the presidential race in 2004, was playing to his party's liberal base in a bid to recapture its nomination." Senator Harry Reid "sounded almost apologetic about Mr. Kerry's statements. 'No one can complain on this matter that there hasn't been sufficient time to talk about Judge Alito, pro and con,' Mr. Reid said on the Senate floor. ;'I hope that this matter will be resolved without too much more talking.'"

The AP (1/27, Holland) also says Reid "offered no support for Kennedy…and others who are trying to block the vote with a filibuster in a last stand against Alito's confirmation. 'There's been adequate time for people to debate,' Reid said."

CNN's The Situation Room (1/26, Henry) reported, "There could be a backlash against Kerry. There are some Democrats like Mary Landrieu, moderates like Landrieu, who have said that may vote against Alito, but they would be against the filibuster, that they want an up or down vote as…Bush has called for." Other "very senior Democrats here in Washington are saying this is a bad idea."

Under the headline "Democrats Split Over Filibuster On Alito," the Washington Post (1/27, A1, Babington, 744K) reports Kerry and Kennedy "acknowledged that the bid is likely to fail and that Alito is virtually certain to be confirmed Tuesday." But "they said extended debate may draw more Americans' attention to Alito's conservative stands on abortion, civil rights, presidential powers and other matters."

In an editorial titled "Bring It On," the Wall Street Journal (1/27, 2.11M) says, "Imagine the political gain for Republicans after a Supreme Court filibuster -- with all of its 24/7 publicity -- by blue-state liberals against a modest Italian-American with impeccable legal credentials and stainless ethics." Kerry "really seems to believe that the country will rise up in fury when it discovers that Judge Alito believes that the Constitution gives a President wide powers to defend America." Kerry "may not care much about the Senate because his real goal is winning the Democratic nomination for President again in 2008. Republicans should be so lucky."

Bush To Promote "Competitiveness" Agenda In State Of The Union. The Financial Times (1/27, Daniel, Alden) reports President Bush plans to "embrace a 'competitiveness' agenda advocated by big US technology companies in his State of the Union address next week." Bush is expected to "highlight the need for measures to improve US industry's competitiveness" as concerns grow that the US "is lagging behind in cutting-edge research and has fallen behind China and India in training science and technology graduates." At his Thursday press conference, Bush said, "We live in a competitive world, and so policies must be put in place to recognize the competition of the global economy and prepare our people to be able to continue to compete so America can continue to lead."

Budget Constraints Will Limit Initiatives. The Wall Street Journal (1/27, Harwood, 2.11M) reports in its "Washington Wire" column, "Bush plans emphasis on broad themes as red ink thins policy options. Advisers say budget squeeze will curb initiatives in Tuesday's State of the Union. Bush's track record suggests little polling benefit; his ratings dropped after two of four earlier addresses."

Site For Anti-Bush State Of The Union Protest Approved. The Washington Post (1/27, B2, Barker, 744K) reports that organizers of the "World Can't Wait -- Drive Out the Bush Regime" protest scheduled for Tuesday "reached an agreement yesterday with law enforcement officials and will now be allowed to use the area around the U.S. Capitol Reflecting Pool for their demonstration." They had "initially been offered the Reflecting Pool area on the west side of the Capitol as a protest site but then were told that the site had been reclassified as part of the security perimeter for the day of Bush's speech."

Villaraigosa Does Not Want To Be "Too Negative" In SOTU Response. The Los Angeles Times (1/27, McGreevy, 958K) reports Los Angeles Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa and Democratic congressional leaders "huddled" yesterday "to discuss his Spanish-language response to the president's State of the Union address next week, and there were signs of some disagreement over how to present their case." Villaraigosa came out of a meeting with Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid and House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi "saying that he did not want to be too negative about the president, on whom his city depends for federal financial help."

Friedman Says Energy Independence Should Be Centerpiece Of State Of The Union. In his New York Times (1/27, 1.19M) column, Thomas Friedman writes, "The direction in which America needs to go is obvious: toward energy independence." If President Bush "steps up to that challenge" in his State of the Union, "this speech could be a new beginning for his presidency. If he doesn't, you can stick a fork in this administration. It will be done -- because it will have abdicated leadership on the biggest issue of our day." Friedman says Bush should call on President Kennedy's "extraordinary State of the Union address in which he called on the nation to marshal all of its resources to put a man on the Moon," and then say, "President Kennedy was worried about the threat that communism posed to our way of life. I am here to tell you that if we don't move away from our dependence on oil and shift to renewable fuels, it will change our way of life for the worse -- and soon -- much, much more than communism ever could have. Making this transition is the calling of our era."

Bush To Offer Market-Based Health Care Initiatives In State Of The Union. The Christian Science Monitor (1/27, Marks, 61K) reports that in his State of the Union speech, President Bush is expected to propose a series of health care initiatives that aim to "encourage a market-oriented, consumer-driven system. Key components of his plan include the expansion of health savings accounts, additional tax breaks for individuals who buy insurance on their own, and provisions that would improve public access to information on healthcare pricing." Supporters say the proposals "are crucial to making American more of an 'ownership' society," but critics "warn they'll shift more risk onto individuals and undermine the nation's already strained health-insurance system."

Financial Service Providers Rush Into Health Savings Account Market. The New York Times (1/27, Dash, 1.19M) reports, "Banks, credit unions and money management firms are now quietly positioning themselves to become central players in the business of health care, offering 401(k)-type accounts to cover future medical expenses." Many are rushing to get in the market for health savings accounts, "which have been around since 2003 but are moving to the fore of the national agenda." Right now, only about three million Americans "have signed up for the high-deductible insurance policy required for such accounts, up from slightly more than one million last March." But according to one estimate, that number will surpass 15 million by 2010. The Los Angeles Times (1/27, Havemann, 958K) reports that the tripling of the number of HSA members over the last 10 months is a "very significant success story," according to America's Health Insurance Plans President/CEO Karen Ignagni. But Employee Benefit Research Institute health economist Paul Fronstin said, "Is it a success story? Yes and no. Three years ago, the market didn't exist. But it still amounts to only a fraction of Americans who have private insurance."

CBS Poll Highlights Public's Concern About US Health Care. The CBS Evening News (1/26, story 7, :45, Schieffer) reported, "Americans overwhelmingly believe the health care system in this country is broken. Ninety percent told us the system needs a major change or a complete overhaul, but few think it is likely to get one. Only nine percent believe that health care will be better by the end of the President's second term; 40% say it will be worse."

Concerns Raised About Rising Senior Health Care Costs. NBC Nightly News (1/26, story 7, 2:00, Mullen) ran a story on the predicament baby boomers face in caring for both their elderly parents and children. American Geriatric Society President Dr. David Reuben: "This is going to be the Hurricane Katrina of 2020. The cost of caring for these older people is going to be enormous." Mullen: "Many med schools are pushing government to offer students financial incentives to pursue geriatrics. They say they're hoping policymakers grow wiser as the population grows older."

Democrats Want Bush To Discuss Medicare Drug Benefit Fix. Reuters (1/27, Kenen) reports Democrats in Congress are calling on President Bush to "outline in his State of the Union speech how he will fix what they consider a disastrous start to the Medicare drug benefit." Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid said, "The President needs to come clean and join Democrats in offering a real solution to this disastrous program."

Drug Makers Plan To Cut Back On Discount Medication Programs. Meanwhile, the Washington Post (1/27, A2, Connolly, 744K) reports that "several of the nation's largest drug manufacturers say they will no longer provide free or discounted medications to low-income elderly and disabled patients because they should be covered by the new Medicare drug benefit." For "about 1 million Americans with serious illnesses such as AIDS and cancer -- patients who last year relied on the pharmaceutical industry's giveaways -- that means Medicare coverage could cost them more than $3,600 this year."

Medicare Drug Program Denies Home IV Supplies. The Los Angeles Times (1/27, Alonso-Zaldivar, 958K) reports, "The new Medicare drug program is denying supplies that seriously ill patients need to administer intravenous antibiotics and other medications at home. As a result, some patients are being referred to nursing homes, and others have had to go into hospitals." While "no national estimates are available, the number of patients affected -- including some with life-threatening diseases such as cancer and multiple sclerosis -- could run into the thousands." Medicare officials "say they are aggressively addressing the problem, which they attribute to restrictions in the law that created the prescription benefit and to difficulty communicating with states, pharmacies and medical providers."

Bush Budget To Include Funding For Nuclear Fuel Reprocessing. The AP (1/26) reports President Bush's budget request will include $250 million for reviving nuclear fuel reprocessing, "including a long-term proposal to provide reactor fuel to foreign countries if they return it to the United States to be recycled." The request will be "a first step toward reversing a decades long U.S. policy against nuclear reprocessing." The proposal will call for "stepped up research into a 'more proliferation resistant' type of reprocessing that proponents say will reduce dramatically the likelihood of theft or diversion."

Majority See Bush Presidency As "A Failure" In Gallup Poll. Under the headline "State Of The Union? Not

So Good, Most Say," USA Today (1/27, Page, 2.31M) reports that according to a new USA Today/CNN/Gallup poll, most Americans are "pessimistic about the economy, divided on the war and doubtful" that President Bush "has the best plan to address the issues that matter most to them -- among them health care and corruption." And by "more than 2-to-1, those surveyed say things have gotten worse in the United States over the past five years," with even self-described conservatives divided "47%-44% on whether things have gotten better or worse." Bloomberg (1/27, Johnston) reports that the same poll found 52% of adults saying "Bush's administration since 2001 has been a failure, down from 55 percent in October. Fifty- eight percent described his second term as a failure. At the same point in former President Bill Clinton's presidency, 70 percent of those surveyed by Gallup said they considered it a success and 20 percent a failure. In a poll conducted in January of 2002, after Bush was president for one year, 83 percent of those surveyed said his presidency was a success."

Bush Vows Tougher Stance On Congressional Spending. Reuters (1/27, Bohan) reports, "President George W. Bush, who has faced heat from conservative Republicans over high budget deficits, pledged on Thursday to take a tougher stance toward Congress over spending, including vetoing bills if necessary." He also "backed changes to the appropriations process to curb 'earmarks,' or targeted spending that lawmakers often use for pet projects in their districts." During a press conference, Bush said, "That's going to be an interesting discussion on Capitol Hill -- this business about earmarks and people making a special deal in the budget. … And there needs to be earmark reform." Bush also "said he would call for fiscal restraint in his State of the Union address on Tuesday, when he will also unveil initiatives on healthcare, energy and education. Bush cited a deficit-cutting package aimed at finding $39.7 billion in savings from social welfare programs over five years as a sign Congress was making progress on curbing spending."

CBO Says Deficit Would Turn Into Surplus If Bush Tax Cuts Allowed To Expire. USA Today (1/27, Wolf, 2.31M) reports, "Making…Bush's tax cuts permanent will prolong big budget deficits into the next decade, the Congressional Budget Office projected Thursday." But "if those tax cuts are allowed to expire after 2010 -- effectively a tax increase Bush has sworn to oppose -- the budget would begin showing a surplus in 2012, the CBO's budget projections showed. Bush wants Congress to make the tax cuts permanent before he leaves office in 2009." The Wall Street Journal (1/27, Calmes, 2.11M) adds CBO "projects that war and hurricane-relief costs will widen the annual deficit to about $360 billion after it had narrowed last year." But "a decade out, the nonpartisan office sees either a small surplus or a nearly $400 billion deficit in 2016 if President Bush's tax cuts are extended."

The AP (1/27, Taylor) reports, "The latest Congressional Budget Office data also suggest President Bush is unlikely to be able to keep his promise to cut the federal deficit in half by the end of his term," while Reuters (1/27, Cowan) says "congressional Democrats said the CBO report challenges Bush administration claims that it is making progress in cutting the deficit, which began in fiscal 2001 with a $128 billion shortfall on the heels of a $236 billion surplus in fiscal 2000, the year before…Bush took office."

Bush "Full Of Quips" During Yesterday's Press Conference. The AP (1/27, Pickler) reports, "President Bush's first news conference of the year was just a camera strap away from becoming hazardous to reporters. As the president began his opening statement, a camera that the news service AFP had hung from the ceiling dropped and nearly fell on the heads below. It was caught by its strap, and Bush stopped and looked at it dangling precariously. 'Are you wearing your helmets?' he joked to reporters sitting in the White House briefing room." Bush "was full of quips during the 45-minute news conference, poking fun at the media and deflecting some of the heat when questioning got intense."

Lobbyists Serve Dual Role As Fundraisers For Lawmakers. A front page story in the Wall Street Journal (1/27, Mullins, 2.11M) reports on a practice that is "becoming more common in Washington: Lobbyists are serving as principal fund-raisers for lawmakers they're trying to sway. … The Justice Department public-corruption and bribery case against lobbyist Jack Abramoff and a half-dozen members of Congress has refocused attention on the financial ties between lawmakers and lobbyists. While Mr. Abramoff's lobbying activities crossed the line into illegality, the practice of lobbyists raising large amounts of money for lawmakers is both legal and commonplace in Washington today." The Journal notes that Gregg Hartley, who left his job as a top aide to Republican Rep. Roy Blunt of Missouri to become a lobbyist, is helping Blunt ""was helping his old Capitol Hill boss raise campaign money and offering him political advice," and is now "assisting Mr. Blunt in his bid to succeed Rep. Tom DeLay as House majority leader." Bruce Gates, "the top political strategist for Mr. Blunt's main rival to become Majority Leader, Rep. John Boehner of Ohio, also is a lobbyist for private clients."

Poll Suggests Public More Suspicious Of GOP Lawmakers' Ethics. The CBS Evening News (1/26, story 6, 3:00, Schieffer) led its story on ethics reform loopholes noting, "If lobbyists have been bribing members of Congress, it would not surprise most Americans, it turns out. In that CBS News 'New York Times' poll we mentioned earlier 77% said that is just the way things work in Congress. And when asked who in Congress is more likely to take a bribe, a Republican or a Democrat, twice as many Americans pointed to the Republicans, 36% said the chances are about equal."

McCain Seeks To Close Loophole Allowing Lobbyists To Contribute To Lawmaker Charities. The CBS Evening News (1/26, story 6, 3:00, Schieffer) reported, "Republicans and Democrats alike are talking about all kinds of lobbying reform, but they do not want to change everything." CBS (Borger) noted that ethics reform "is all the rage on the campaign trail." But "there's a little-noticed loophole that's been conveniently left off the table because it's too good to give up. Members' personal charities. They're tax-exempt foundations created by members of Congress. Their donors? Lobbyists." For example, "the Tom DeLay Foundation for Kids which built a home for foster children in Texas. When DeLay was the powerful majority leader, lobbyists lined up to contribute to his foundation, raising millions." Although "Senator John McCain points out that not all charitable travel is bad, he wants to screen the charity outings paid for by lobbyists to curb the boondoggles." Sen. John McCain: "Part of the screening process would be exactly what takes place and how the money is spent." Borger: "Top lobbyists say donations to members' charities are a key lobbying strategy and will remain so as long as the charity loophole stays as wide open as a fairway."

Senators Threaten To Force Votes On Every Pork Barrel Spending Project. Sens. John McCain and Tom Coburn say they will force a vote on the Senate floor on each pork barrel spending project this year. The Washington Times (1/27, Dinan, 90K) reports that the Senators "sent a letter Wednesday night to their colleagues announcing they will use Senate rules to force members to vote on each project. 'American taxpayers are entitled to a more thorough debate and disclosure about how their money is being spent,' the senators wrote."

Lobbyist-Lawmaker Relationships Have Coincided With Growth Of Earmarks. The Washington Post (1/27, A1, Weisman, Babcock, 744K) reports, "The link between special interests and members of Congress has grown so tight that nearly a dozen House and Senate members who control federal spending have retained lobbying veterans to raise campaign funds for them, and those lobbyists have secured lucrative favors in spending bills. These relationships have coincided with the rapid growth in the volume of home-state pork-barrel projects, commonly called earmarks, that have swelled appropriations bills in recent years, according to congressional experts and watchdog groups." The Post adds, "The hunt for earmarks on Capitol Hill and on K Street has opened up new avenues for lobbyists and lawmakers to come together. Seven members of the House Appropriations Committee -- Chairman Jerry Lewis (R-Calif.), Ernest J. Istook Jr. (R-Okla.), Kay Granger (R-Tex.), Dennis Rehberg (R-Mont.), John E. Sweeney (R-N.Y.), Rosa L. DeLauro (D-Conn.) and Ed Pastor (D-Ariz.) -- have political action committees headed by registered lobbyists or former registered lobbyists with business before the committee, according to the Center for Public Integrity and campaign records."

Growing Watchdog Movement Mobilizing Against Pork. A separate story in the Washington Post (1/27, A21, Murray, 744K) says "an increasingly prolific government watchdog movement is turning 'pork' into a four-letter word. These scrappy outfits are run by small corps of veteran staffers whose offices look more like dorm rooms than the posh K Street suites occupied by their archnemeses: lobbyists. Taxpayers for Common Sense elevated an obscure Alaska highway project into the now-infamous 'Bridge to Nowhere.' Citizens Against Government Waste started battling runaway Hurricane Katrina spending three days after the storm hit the Gulf Coast. The two groups joined forces this month with the National Taxpayers Union, a conservative, low-tax organization, to combat the rising cost of the new D.C. baseball stadium. Other watchdog targets include indicted former representative Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Calif.), the Pentagon and the U.S. Postal Service."

Henninger Says 1974 Reforms Should Be Reversed. Daniel Henninger writes in the Wall Street Journal (1/27, 2.11M) that Beltway Democrats are trying to build the Abramoff scandal "into a bonfire that will burn down Republican control of Congress. … Poll after poll says the public thinks both parties are equally corrupt. It depends, of course, on what the meaning of corruption is. If by corrupt you mean lobbyist sleaze, quid pro quo, the pork barrel, earmarks to nowhere and grossing out even the public's generally low expectations, then yes, both parties are equally corrupt. … Fixes are possible. Put simply, reverse the 'reforms' of 1974. Abolish the individual limits on campaign contributions but require public disclosure on the Web. Democrats James Carville and Paul Begala recently proposed making this the basis of creating a new campaign-finance system. But beyond this lies the question of whether Democrats and Republicans want to fix Washington. Are they really separate parties, or just one entity -- the Beltway Party? … I wish President Bush would put this issue of what Washington has become into his State of the Union speech Tuesday. My guess is he won't, recalling what happened when Richard Nixon tried to fight both a major war and the party that controls Congress, which for the foreseeable future looks like it will be the Beltway Spend-and-Collect Party."

increasing pressure to appear with his two rivals for House Majority Leader before the GOP caucus to answer questions on where he wants to take the party in the wake of recent scandals. The Journal says that while Blunt is widely seen as the frontrunner, he has "seemed insecure, refusing to give up his whip's position and avoiding any joint television appearances where he can be questioned with the two other candidates, Reps. John Boehner of Ohio and John Shadegg of Arizona."

Majority Whip Race Seen As Sign Of GOP Conference's Conservatism. The Washington Times (1/27, Dinan, 90K) says the race for House Majority Whip is "an indication of just how conservative the House Republican Conference has become. Two 1994 Republican revolutionaries and two fast-rising Republican stars face off in a contest they all say is about making the party refocus on basic conservative principles.' Rep. Mike Rogers is running against Rep. Eric Cantor of Virginia, Rep. Todd Tiahrt of Kansas and Rep. Zach Wamp of Tennessee. Mr. Tiahrt and Mr. Wamp were part of the Class of 1994, while Mr. Rogers and Mr. Cantor were elected in 2000. All four rank among the most conservative members of the House." Currently it is "not clear the position will even be open. The current whip, Rep. Roy Blunt of Missouri, is running for majority leader but has not relinquished his seat. For that reason the whip's race has been far less public."

Administration Pushing Back Against Senate Oversight Questions. Knight Ridder (1/27, Kuhnhenn) reports, "After years of deferring to the Bush White House, the Republican-controlled Senate has begun pushing back, holding oversight hearings on topics ranging from President Bush's response to Hurricane Katrina to his administration's mine-safety record and the president's secret domestic-surveillance program. Administration officials are fighting back. … White House officials and their allies maintain that their stance protects inherent executive power. Critics say the administration's reaction to the Senate's inquiries is an assault on Congress' constitutional role as a coequal branch of government that checks and balances the executive." Knight Ridder notes, "The Bush administration has never been shy about testing the limits of its executive power. Vice President Dick Cheney refused to divulge the identities of energy executives who advised him on energy policy. The administration wouldn't give Congress up-to-date cost estimates of its prescription-drug legislation. The Pentagon is often stingy about data related to the war in Iraq."

Bill Would Allow Binding Arbitration For FAA Labor Disputes. The Washington Post (1/27, B2, Barr, 744K) reports in its "Federal Diary" column, "The union representing air traffic controllers is looking to Capitol Hill for help in contentious contract negotiations with the Federal Aviation Administration. Four Democratic senators introduced a bill yesterday that would permit labor disputes at the FAA to be settled through binding arbitration, John S. Carr , president of the National Air Traffic Controllers Association, announced." Sen. Barack Obama "said he and colleagues proposed arbitration 'to help defuse the growing management-labor tension at the FAA.' Under the Obama bill, if the FAA and one of its unions failed to reach a voluntary agreement, the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service would be called on to try again for a settlement. If mediation failed, Congress could impose the FAA's last, best offer on employees by approving it in legislation. If Congress did not act, the impasse would go to binding arbitration. Joining Obama in introducing the bill were Sens. Daniel K. Inouye (D-Hawaii), Patty Murray (D-Wash.) and Frank Lautenberg (D-N.J.)."

NYTimes Says "Inappropriate Perks" For Federal Judges Should Be Banned. An editorial in the New York Times (1/27, 1.19M) says Supreme Court Justice Antonin Scalia "has poor judgment when it comes to vacations." Apparently "unchastened by the criticism of his 2004 duck-hunting excursion with Vice President Dick Cheney, one of that term's most prominent Supreme Court litigants," Scalia "skipped the swearing-in of Chief Justice John Roberts Jr. because of another ethically dubious trip, this time to the posh Ritz-Carlton at the Beaver Creek ski resort in Colorado." The Times adds, "Justice Scalia's travel is part of a broader affliction on the federal bench. … The judicial lobbying problem is more serious in one respect than the scandal enveloping Congress. Lawmakers operate in an overtly political environment, but the decision-making process of judges is supposed to be impermeable to clever efforts by special interests to buy access and favor." The Times also notes that three Democratic senators "are readying provisions to ban junkets and other compromising gifts for judges, which they hope to make part of their party's lobbying reform proposal. For Congress to pass a lobbying reform bill that curbs inappropriate perks for lawmakers but not for federal judges would be a scandal in itself."

OTHER NEWS:

Bush Urges Hamas To Renounce Violence. The Christian Science Monitor (1/27, Prusher, 61K) reports that according to results of the Palestinian election based on 95 percent of the vote, "Hamas won 76 seats to Fatah's 43 seats. Smaller and independent parties took the remaining 13 seats." The Washington Times (1/27, Martin, Pisik, 90K) adds Hamas leader Mahmoud Zahar "has proposed a dramatic shift of Palestinian policy -- ending security cooperation with Israel, cutting most trade links with the Jewish state and refusing to engage with the 'Christian-Zionist' US administration." Zahar told the Washington Times "just days before" the election, "We have to go away from Israel and move toward all possible linkages with our Arab and Islamic brothers. … Cooperation [with Israel] on the security and economic fields was a disaster for the Palestinians."

President Bush issued a two-pronged message to Palestinians after Hamas' election victory, warning Hamas against continuing violence against Israel and expressing support for the democratic process. Reflecting a common theme in the coverage, ABC World News Tonight (1/26, story 3, 2:20, Woodruff) reported "the White House response has been surprisingly measured." Bush, added ABC (Raddatz), "had to walk a very fine line. To the newly-elected members of Hamas, President Bush had a strong warning." Bush was shown saying, "If your platform is the destruction of Israel, it means you're not a partner in peace." Raddatz: "But to the more than 500,000 Palestinian voters who supported Hamas, the President struck an entirely different tone." Bush: "When you give people the vote, you give people a chance to express themselves at the polls, and if they are unhappy with the status quo, they'll let you know. That's the great thing about democracy."

NBC Nightly News (1/26, story 2, 2:00, Fletcher) said the President "put on a brave face," while The CBS Evening News (1/26, story 2, 3:30, Roberts) added Bush "did try to find some ray of light today, declaring the exercise of democracy, at least, a positive step." Bush: "It's a wakeup call to the leadership. Obviously people were not happy with the status quo." Fox News' Special Report (1/26, Cameron) also reported, "Acknowledging that its success is unwelcome news for peace, Mr. Bush nonetheless said the old guard Palestinian leadership should view it as a wake-up call."

CNN's The Situation Room (1/26, Bash) reported, "Spreading democracy is a key Bush goal, so he tried to put the best face on unwelcome results, deeming them 'a wake-up call to the Palestinian leadership.'"

The Washington Post (1/27, A15, Kessler, 744K) headlines its story "Bush Is Conciliatory In Accepting Victory Of Hamas," and reports Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice also "put on a brave face, saying 'we still have every reason for hope and for optimism' because voter turnout was high and free from violence." The "upbeat rhetoric belied the fact that the election outcome was the opposite of what the administration had hoped would happen. Behind the scenes, US officials scrambled to survey the wreckage of their Middle East policy."

Reuters (1/27, Hudson) reports Bush also "urged President Mahmoud Abbas, whose Cabinet resigned after his Fatah party lost to the Islamist group, to stay in office so the United States could keep open a diplomatic channel with the Palestinian government." The New York Times (1/27, Erlanger, 1.19M) adds that "in a televised speech on Thursday night, the Palestinian president, Mahmoud Abbas, said he remained committed to negotiations with Israel." Abbas, "whose official status was not affected by the vote, suggested that future talks would be conducted through the Palestine Liberation Organization, which could bypass a Hamas-led government."

Meanwhile, the New York Times (1/27, Weisman, 1.19M) reports Hamas' "sweeping victory…threw President Bush and his aides on the defensive…complicating the administration's policy of trying to promote democracy as an antidote to the spread of terrorism." The Times adds, "Reacting uneasily to the Hamas triumph, Mr. Bush said the results spoke to the failures of…Abbas and the 'old guard.'" USA Today (1/27, Gutman, 2.31M) says "Hamas' victory in Palestinian elections seemed less an endorsement of terrorism than a vote for an organization that supporters hope will improve government, according to some voters and election analysts." Hamas supporters "say they were fed up with the ruling Fatah Party, which many accused of corruption and general incompetence."

The Los Angeles Times (1/27, Chen, 958K) says Hamas' win "put Bush in a difficult spot because he has made his campaign to spread democracy around the world a cornerstone of his presidency. Now, in the face of a victory by a group whose policies he abhors, Bush is having to impose conditions before fully accepting the results of that show of democracy."

MSNBC's Hardball (1/26, Mitchell) reported that US officials "are in a state of shock. Now one official tonight was telling me that they're thinking that Hamas is also in a state of shock, because Hamas has worked best as an outsider. And that they thought they would get a major role in the new government, perhaps control some of the domestic social service cabinet ministries, but not have to run a government itself. So they're positing that perhaps today Hamas is in the position that Robert Redford was in The Candidate, 1972 movie where he said, Now what do we do?"

European allies echoed Bush's theme. The New York Times (1/27, Cowell, 1.19M) reports European countries are "major financial donors to the Palestinian Authority." Yesterday they "registered disquiet verging on hostility toward the Hamas triumph in the Palestinian elections." Yet, "confronted with a Middle East that seems once again to have redrawn its political contours, they held back from publicly threatening to cut off the hundreds of millions of dollars they provide each year to Palestinian institutions." Furthermore, "none of them criticized the Palestinian democracy that appeared to yield the opposite of the moderation they had sought to nurture."

All three networks led with stories on Hamas' election victory, describing it as historic but reflecting concerns about its impact on Mideast peace. ABC World News Tonight (1/26, lead story, 2:55, Woodruff) reported, "A sea change in the Middle East. Hamas, the militant Islamic group, that calls for the destruction of Israel, has won the Palestinian parliamentary elections in a landslide." The CBS Evening News (1/26, lead story, 3:00, Schieffer) said Hamas' success "will radically change the whole Middle East equation and the prospects for peace, and it puts the United States in an extremely awkward position."

CNN's The Situation Room (1/26, Koppel) reported that "some are saying this is classic case of be careful what you wish for." Hamas' "landslide victory was a stinging defeat the US and Israel." The US "has made spreading democracy the centerpiece of its foreign policy. The challenge now, how to treat the democratically-elected Hamas, radical Islamists behind so many suicide bombings against Israel, a group the U.S. considers terrorists." In "the short-term, the U.S. is threatening to cut off about $270 million in must-needed financial assistance to the Palestinians, and is looking to Europe, a much bigger donor, to do the same. The goal of this is try to force Hamas to moderate its views and to try to treat Israel and deal with Israel as a partner in peace." Meanwhile, the Christian Science Monitor (1/27, LaFranchi, 61K) asks in its headline "Is Democracy Empowering Islamists?"

The New York Times (1/27, Fattah, 1.19M) adds Hamas's "overwhelming victory…was met with a mixture of jubilation and consternation in much of the Arab world. For some, it raised the concern that, in winning, the Islamic group will almost certainly have to lose something."

Highlighting concerns over the continuation of Hamas attacks against Israel, ABC's World News Tonight (1/26, story 2, 1:45, Woodruff) reported, "Hamas in the past has used suicide bombings to devastating effect. And one of its most-celebrated figures is a mother, who sent her sons to their deaths. Tonight, she is an elected official." ABC (Dinnick): "Palestinians voted for Miriam Farahat because she's made astonishing sacrifices in her quest to destroy Israel. Farahat has sent three of her six sons on suicide missions." Now that she "has been elected to Palestinian parliament, the question is, will she end her violent campaign against Israel, a fight she has made so personal today she vowed to do whatever Hamas asked of her. 'I am ready to serve,' she says. And if that means sacrificing her three remaining sons, Um Nidal says she's willing."

The Washington Times (1/27, Sammon, 90K) headlines its story "US Won't Deal With Hamas," while USA Today (1/27, Gutman, 2.31M) says the election results "put the future of the Middle East peace process in question." Similar stories appear in today's Wall Street Journal (1/27, Leggett, King, 2.11M), which titles its front-page report "Hamas Victory Roils Middle East Peace Process," Baltimore Sun (1/27, Murphy, 296K), Washington Post (1/27, A1, Wilson, 744K), and Financial Times (1/27, Devi, Morris).

Fatah Declines Hamas Offer To Form Coalition Government. NBC Nightly News (1/26, lead story, 2:00, Fletcher) reported Even Hamas was stunned by its landslide victory. The Islamic militants won 76 out of 132 seats. It can form a majority government all on its own. But Hamas leaders quickly offered to share power with the defeated Fatah party. Fatah leaders said no. After 40 years of dominating Palestinian life, the party of Yasser Arafat is out." Saeb Erekat, Palestinian peace negotiator: "We will not be part of any national unity government." Fletcher: "And the future of President Mahmoud Abbas is in doubt." Meanwhile, says the Washington Times (1/27, Mitnick, 90K), Palestinian Prime Minister Ahmed Qureia "tendered his resignation."

Under the headline "Hamas Is Stunned By Its Success," the Los Angeles Times (1/27, King, 958K) reports, "Of all those shocked by Hamas' landslide win in Palestinian elections, few were more stunned than the militant Islamist group itself. In taking the reins of power after participating in its first parliamentary vote, Hamas leaders face a predicament: If they attempt to please their most radical adherents by continuing to call for Israel's destruction, they jeopardize hard-won international support for a Palestinian state. But if they moderate their stance and reject their founding principle, they risk alienating their militant base."

Hamas Win Could Affect Israeli Election. The Washington Times (1/27, Ward, 90K) reports, "Hamas' shocking election victory is likely to radically alter the course of Israel's own election at the end of March, as an outraged right wing flexes its muscles and the centrist government plots its response. As Palestinian officials announced the results, acting Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert convened top-level talks with senior political and defense officials to formulate how to manage the crisis. … Any perceived leniency toward Hamas could play directly into the hands of Benjamin Netanyahu, the hawkish leader of the right-wing Likud Party, who last year warned that Israel's pullout from Gaza was a prize for Hamas violence." But "intransigence toward a Hamas-led government would likely bring about international pressure on Israel to comply with earlier commitments reached with the Palestinian Authority.

The Washington Post (1/27, A18, Wilson, 744K) reports that already yesterday, "opposition politicians criticized the government for failing to stop the radical Islamic movement from rising to prominence within the Palestinian Authority." Olmert "faced criticism in the wake of the Hamas defeat of the governing Fatah party, Israel's main partner in past peace agreements."

The New York Times (1/27, Myre, 1.19M) reports, "The Hamas landslide in Palestinian elections has stunned Israelis, but it may also have brought them a rare moment of clarity:

with peace talks off the table, Israel will most likely pursue unilateral actions, drawing its own borders and separating itself from the Palestinians." Olmert "made it clear after an emergency cabinet meeting that talks with Hamas, a Palestinian party sworn to Israel's destruction, were out of the question, while experts said Israel was now freer to establish its future on its own." They "said Israel…was likely to focus on speeding up construction of the separation barrier, which runs along and through parts of the West Bank."

Netanyahu Raises Alarm. ABC's World News Tonight (1/26, lead story, 2:55, Woodruff) noted, "The Israeli government said today it would not negotiate with Hamas. Hard liner Benjamin Netanyahu who is running for prime minister again, seized the political moment to sound this alarm – 'in front of our eyes is being created Hamas-stan,' he said. 'Worse than Iran and in the image of the Taliban.'"

Netanyahu said on CNN's The Situation Room (1/26) that Hamas' election victory is "a great setback for peace," adding that Hamas "is committed to the destruction of Israel, and the pursuit of terror and it's effectively a subordinate regime of Iran. So I think that's a great blow to peace. I think we have to understand that in the face of the rise of the forces of terror, we have to change the policies that Israel has had of unilaterally withdrawing in the face of terror because all that does is put people like Hamas in power. It makes them the winners. They use terror, Israel retreats, and therefore they get all the credit in the Palestinian streets and in the Palestinian elections. For peace to be restored, we have to resume and restore the policy of standing up to terror, not fleeing from it."

Renewed Tensions Between Israelis, Palestinians Could Have Negative Effect On Iraq. ABC's World News Tonight (1/26, story 3, 2:20, Raddatz) reported, "And how might this affect the rest of the region? A document obtained by ABC News today and put together by US analysts says that if tensions mount, and there is a renewed confrontation between the Israelis and Palestinians, the result will ripple throughout the Muslim world. The document goes on to say that it would have a particularly negative impact in Iraq."

Destruction Of West Bank Houses Could Signal Israeli Shift Toward Accommodation. The Wall Street Journal (1/27, Leggett, 2.11M) reports that the fate of nine newly-built homes in the Jewish community of Amona on the West Bank "may soon provide clues to one of the Middle East's most pressing questions: Is Israel preparing to withdraw from parts of the occupied West Bank? The answer increasingly appears to be yes. Following extended legal wrangling, the Israeli government is completing a plan to demolish Amona's nine concrete homes -- all uninhabited -- because they were constructed illegally on privately owned Palestinian land. With the militant Hamas party winning control of the Palestinian Parliament on Wednesday, it is possible Israel would delay the demolition, but several thousand Israeli security personnel are scheduled to carry out the order as early as next week, police and military officials say." The Amona operation "could have far-reaching implications. Coming on the heels of Israel's withdrawal from the Gaza Strip in August, it would signal a further rollback of a decades-long policy of encouraging Jewish settlement in Palestinian areas, particularly the West Bank, which is now home to some 250,000 Israeli citizens." The move "likely would resonate positively among Palestinians," and could "mark the beginning of a gradual regional shift away from armed confrontation and toward accommodation based on territorial compromise."

More Commentary. Under the headline "In The Mideast, A Giant Step Back," the New York Times (1/27, 1.19M) editorializes, "Bush was absolutely right when he urged Mr. Abbas to remain in office as a sign of stability and set Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice the task of seeing whether the shards of the peace process could be reassembled." But "he was also absolutely right when he said, 'A political party that articulates the destruction of Israel as part of its platform is a party with which we will not deal.'"

The Wall Street Journal (1/27, 2.11M) editorializes, "The White House will have to resist the temptation, no doubt encouraged by Europe, to pressure Israel to deal with Hamas as it once was pressed to deal with Arafat." But "given Hamas's history and declared goals, the onus is on its leaders to show that they have an agenda beyond terror. If Hamas begins to use Gaza as a base to import weapons and attack Israel, the Jewish state will have every right to strike back in self-defense. And the US should support it in doing so."

The Washington Post (1/27, A22, 744K) writes in an editorial that Hamas' win "creates fresh opportunities as well as dangers in the Middle East. The Islamic fundamentalist movement will now come under extraordinary pressure to cease all acts of terrorism, help restore order in the turbulent Gaza Strip and moderate its rejection of Israel. The pressure will come not only from Western governments and aid donors but from its own constituents. … Many Palestinians who voted for Hamas don't support the Islamists' fundamentalist agenda."

The Los Angeles Times (1/27, 958K) editorializes that the "election results complicate a situation that desperately needed stability, and they will make it more difficult for the Palestinians to achieve a state of their own anytime soon."

E.J. Dionne writes in the Washington Post (1/27, A23, 744K), "Bush, a man who prides himself on clarity and disdains nuance, was, if I may coin a word, nuancing all over the place. … You don't have to agree with Bush's decisions to believe that an important goal of American foreign policy should be to expand the number of nations that live under democratic rule." But "since the invasion of Iraq, administration spokesmen and supporters have offered a utopian and decidedly unconservative view of how American power could be used to change the world -- and quickly. It was said that the way to peace in Jerusalem passed through Baghdad. It was said that by ridding Iraq of Saddam Hussein's wretched regime, the United States would unleash a democratic revolution in the Arab world. Go back and look at the broad claims Bush's defenders made for his policy after the election in Iraq just a year ago. Everything, it was said, was falling into place." But "the world is a complicated place. Of course free elections in Iraq are hugely better than dictatorship. But when free elections become more a census to count members of warring ethnic and religious factions than a way of settling underlying disputes, they do not necessarily pave the way for enduring democracy. They do not provide voters with ways of test-driving the various alternatives."

Columnist Jim Hoagland writes in the Washington Post (1/27, A23, 744K) that "it is pointless to bemoan this setback or try to minimize its significance, as President Bush seemed to do yesterday in a White House news conference. Israel, the United States and Europe should instead adjust their policies to recognize and influence the volatile situation created by the unexpected and distinctly unwelcome Hamas victory." They "can best do that by not launching immediate efforts to cajole, bribe or intimidate a new Hamas-led government into adopting more peaceful-sounding rhetoric to clear the way for reviving negotiations with Israel. And there should be no attempt to paper over the crushing defeat inflicted on Mahmoud Abbas and the Palestinian Authority he headed."

Fotini Christia, a fellow at the Olin Institute for Strategic Studies at Harvard, and Sreemati Mitte, who works for the Palestinian Initiative for the Promotion of Global Dialogue and Democracy in Ramallah, West Bank, write in the New York Times (1/27, 1.19M), "The United States and the European Union must finally recognize Hamas's ascendance as a fait accompli. Until now, these key third parties have equivocated: they pressed Israel to allow Hamas to participate in the elections but threatened to cut aid and ties to a Hamas-dominated Palestinian Authority. The practical reality, however, is that Hamas is a pivotal player in Palestinian politics, and no peace process can succeed without at least the tacit acceptance of its leaders." The United States and Europe "cannot trumpet democratic ideals abroad and then ignore the popular will of Palestinian voters."

Reports On Factory Orders, Jobs Continue Positive Trend. The Wall Street Journal (1/27, Bater, 2.11M) reports, "Orders to the nation's factories for big-ticket goods finished 2005 strongly, while jobless claims rose last week but remained at a level indicating healthy job growth. Durable-goods orders climbed 1.3% in December to a seasonally adjusted $228.14 billion, the third straight increase, the Commerce Department said. Demand was higher for airplanes, machinery, cars and capital goods." Separately, the Labor Department "reported that the number of workers filing new claims for unemployment benefits climbed by 11,000 to a seasonally adjusted 283,000 in the week ended Jan. 21. The four-week moving average of initial jobless claims fell 10,750 to 288,750 from 299,500 the previous week. The moving average is at its lowest level since an identical average in the week ended July 1, 2000."

GM Losses Larger Than Expected. NBC Nightly News (1/26, story 6, :45, Williams) reported, "The bad news keeps on coming from the US auto industry. It hardly gets any worse than this. General Motors reported today it lost $4.8 billion in just the fourth quarter of last year and $8.6 billion in all of 2005. Those results were far worse than Wall Street expected, GM's slumping stock price dropped another 3 1/2% just today."

Stocks Up. NBC Nightly News (1/26, story 6, :45, Williams) noted, "The rest of Wall Street shook off GM's problems and closed higher. The Dow was up just under 100 points [to 10809.47] and NASDAQ gained more than 22 points [to 2283.00]." The New York Times (1/27, 1.19M) adds the S.& P. 500 "rallied 9.15 points, or 0.7 percent, to 1,273.83 for its biggest advance since Jan. 6 and third gain in the last four days." The Wall Street Journal (1/27, Browning, 2.11M) also reports the stock numbers.

Greenspan Leaves "Remarkable" Political Legacy. The Washington Post (1/27, D1, Henderson, 744K) reports that retiring Federal Chairman Alan Greenspan "leaves a remarkable political legacy, say Republican and Democratic policymakers who have worked with him in Washington over nearly four decades.' Greenspan "has helped candidates, presidents and lawmakers devise and sell policies on countless social and economic issues. An avowed 'free-enterpriser,' Greenspan consistently pushed for less government regulation, smaller federal budget deficits and freer trade, these observers said."

Democrats Say Up To 50 House Seats Are Up For Grabs. The Wall Street Journal (1/27, Harwood, 2.11M) reports in its "Washington Wire" column, "Parties battle to define 2006 playing field. With most partisan outcomes predictable due to election district gerrymandering, Democratic hopes of regaining House majority depend on expanding number of competitive seats. House Democrats, who need net gain of 15, say outcome remains in doubt in as many as 50 districts."

Reuters (1/27, Whitesides) reports, "Democrats are riding a wave of momentum into November's high-stakes battle for the U.S. Congress, with high hopes for significant gains that could threaten" GOP control of Congress. But "despite the favorable political mood for Democrats, analysts say the party faces major hurdles to gaining the six Senate and 15 House seats needed to reclaim control of Congress. To win majorities, Democrats need to capture most of a small pool of competitive seats in the House while bumping off at least five Republican Senate incumbents -- tough tasks in any political climate, but not impossible. 'It looks like the Democrats will gain seats in the House and Senate, but the question is how many?'" said Larry Sabato, a political analyst at the University of Virginia, adding, "It is going to be hard for Democrats, but if the situation continues to deteriorate for Republicans this year anything is possible." Reuters adds, "The best chance for a Democratic breakthrough could be the Senate, where 33 of 100 seats are on the ballot. Republicans hold 15 of those seats and Democrats 18, but five of the most endangered incumbents at this stage are Republicans. … 'The Democrats have to sweep the competitive Republican races to take power, while holding all of their own. That's tough,' said Jennifer Duffy, an analyst for the nonpartisan Cook Political Report."

Romney Says High Court Should Return Power Over Abortion To States. Knight Ridder (1/27, Thomma) reports that Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney (R), "a possible candidate for the 2008 Republican presidential nomination, said Thursday that his Mormon faith would not matter to the vast majority of voters, including the evangelical Christians who influence his party's politics greatly. 'Americans want people of faith to lead their country,'" he said, adding, "Republicans aren't going to be putting a litmus test against people of my faith." Romney "also said that his views on abortion have evolved since he refused to take either a pro-choice or pro-life label during his 1994 campaign against Sen. Edward Kennedy, R-Mass." He "said personal research about embryonic stem cells convinced him that life begins at conception. He said the Supreme Court should send the power over abortion back to the states by overturning the 1973 Roe v. Wade decision that legalized it nationwide. Still, he said, he would support legalized abortion in his state if his state so chose."

Romney Sees Clinton As Likely To Be '08 Democratic Nominee. The AP (1/27, Miga) reports that Romney "says he expects New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton to be the 2008 Democratic presidential nominee. 'I think the most likely to get the nomination, of course, is Hillary Clinton,' he said during a Christian Science Monitor-sponsored luncheon with reporters on Thursday." Romney also "predicted the Jack Abramoff corruption scandal would not cripple Republicans as they try to keep control of the House and Senate in next fall's midterm elections. 'The idea that money has influence in politics is not a headline story in major parts of the country,' he said."

Romney Offers Some Criticism Of Bush On Iraq, Drug Benefit. The Christian Science Monitor (1/27, Cook, 61K) reports that Romney "appeared at a Monitor-sponsored lunch Thursday and opened some distance between himself and the Bush administration on the war in Iraq and the Medicare prescription drug benefit. … 'There are plenty of places where I would separate from the administration…where I might have chosen another course…certainly with regard to the war in Iraq or the front in Iraq -- were there mistakes made there? Absolutely. Would I have done it differently? Of course. Would the president have done it differently based on what he knows today? Of course, in some measure.' For example, Romney said he would not have rested the whole case for the war in Iraq on finding weapons of mass destruction." Romney "was also critical of the process by which the Republican-controlled Congress and President Bush produced a prescription drug benefit under Medicare. … 'The final product on Medicare Part D, that final bill was sort of sausage squared, the idea you don't want to see how sausage is made,' Romney said." Romney "noted that President Bush 'wanted to bring prescription coverage to seniors. He got that done, that's huge. … It has with it a financial burden which is very large. I don't imagine that that was what he was aiming for when he thought about this during his campaign.'"

The Washington Post (1/27, A4, Balz, Cillizza, 744K) reports that Romney "put some distance yesterday between himself and the Bush administration on the issue of health care, criticizing the White House for failing to demand significant reforms in Medicare and Medicaid when Congress enacted a prescription drug benefit for senior citizens." Romney also discussed "his evolution on the issue of abortion (from once eschewing labels to now calling himself "pro-life"), whether his Mormon religion will hurt him if he runs for president (only with a tiny percentage of the electorate, he said), his management style (heavy on analysis) and health care for all citizens, which is a top priority of his back home." The Post adds, "Toward the end he was asked about 2008, Iraq, and the possibility that he and Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) might end up as rivals. 'Do you fantasize about that?' he was asked. 'Not about that, no,' he replied to laughter."

Romney Doubts His Religion Will Hurt Him With Evangelicals. The Washington Times (1/27, Pierce, 90K) reports in its "Inside Politics" column that Romney "says he isn't afraid that evangelical and born-again Christian voters will stiff-arm him in the 2008 GOP primaries just because he's a Mormon. … He said most voters in his state are Catholics, but they could not care less about his religion."

Scranton Fires Campaign Manager After Swann Comments. The Washington Post (1/27, ,A4, Balz, Cillizza, 744K) reports that former Pennsylvania lieutenant governor Bill Scranton fired his campaign manager Wednesday "after the man accused former Pittsburgh Steeler Lynn Swann (R), who is black, of being the 'rich white guy'" in the Pennsylvania GOP gubernatorial primary race. Scranton "said the remarks by James Seif 'in no way whatsoever reflect my views or those of my campaign.' Both Scranton and Seif are white."

Cox Decides Against Reentering New York Senate Contest. The AP (1/27, Humbert) reports that Manhattan lawyer Edward Cox (R), a son-in-law of the late President Richard Nixon, "said Thursday he would not resume his campaign for the Republican nomination to challenge Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton's re-election bid this year." Cox "suspended his campaign in October after Republican Gov. George Pataki endorsed then-Westchester County District Attorney Jeanine Pirro's bid for the Senate nomination. Her campaign subsequently collapsed and Pirro heeded the call of state GOP leaders to run instead for state attorney general. That left former Yonkers Mayor John Spencer, little-known statewide, as the leading contender for the GOP nomination. Some GOP leaders pressed Cox to consider getting back in the race. However, Cox said in a statement issued Thursday that 'after careful consideration of the circumstances and conditions as they exist surrounding the race, including the now shortened time frame available to run an aggressive and effective campaign, I will not seek my party's nomination.'"

The New York Times (1/27, Medina, 1.19M) relates that Cox's "exit is yet another blow to Republican efforts to mount a credible challenge to Mrs. Clinton, whom many expect to run for president in 2008." Democrats "were quick to poke fun at the opposition on Thursday. In a press release, they called Mr. Spencer the 'eighth choice' and listed several other Republicans who had been pressed to run for office. … 'Note to the New York State Republican Party: Don't despair, you may not have to settle for John Spencer just yet,' said the statement by Blake Zeff, the state Democratic Party spokesman. 'There are still about a dozen registered Republicans left in New York who you haven't asked yet.'"

Episcopalians Weigh Sainthood For Thurgood Marshall. Delegates to the annual convention of the Episcopal diocese of Washington will vote today on a proposal that would designate the late Supreme Court Justice Thurgood Marshall as a saint. The Washington Post (1/27, B9, Murphy, 744K) reports, "If Marshall is added to the church's roster of saints, May 17 -- the date of the 1954 Supreme Court ruling that segregated schools are unconstitutional -- would be observed as Marshall Feast Day. Church officials say they expect the 300 or so delegates to approve the resolution, which was drawn up by members of St. Augustine's Church in Southwest Washington, where Marshall worshiped."

Administration Supports Russian Plan To Address Iran Nuclear Concerns. While President Bush praised the Russian plan to allow Iran to operate civilian nuclear plants with oversight by Russian and international observers, the Administration was seen as remaining split on pursuing action with the UN Security Council. The CBS Evening News (1/26, story 2, 3:30, Roberts) was the only network news program to note, "The President got what looked like a sliver of good news on the Iranian nuclear crisis today after initially rejecting a proposal to move its uranium enrichment program to Russia, officials in Tehran today said it's worth talking about." President Bush: "I think that's a good plan. The Russians came up with the idea and I support it. It is not in the world's interest that they have a weapon." Roberts: "But State Department officials tell CBS News tonight they don't see much reason to get excited, pointing out that Iran has misled Russia before and was likely to do so again." And the Administration is "going to keep up the pressure to get that referral from the atomic energy agency to get Iran hauled before the UN Security Council. But there is where there's a split in the Administration. Some diplomats think maybe the security council can put enough pressure on Iran that it would back down. Other diplomats told me today they don't think it would go anywhere at the Security Council because they'd never get a unified front against Iran."

The New York Times (1/27, Sanger, Sciolino, 1.19M) reports, "Bush's explicit public endorsement puts all of the major powers on record supporting the proposal, even as most acknowledge that it is a significant concession to Iran and runs the risk that the country will drag out the negotiations while continuing to produce nuclear material. Yet officials say they believe it is the best face-saving strategy to pursue a negotiated settlement with Iran." The President "did not discuss the details of the Russian offer. But American, European and Russian officials…said the offer would allow Iran to continue operations at the plant that turns yellowcake, a concentrated form of uranium ore, into uranium hexafluoride, a toxic material that centrifuges spin into fuel for reactors or bombs.

Reuters (1/27) adds that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "showed little patience with Iran's belated interest in" the Russian plan, saying it "shows the Iranians are feeling the heat."

The New York Times (1/27, Sanger, Sciolino, 1.19M) also reports that at the press conference Bush said, "The Iranians have said, 'We want a weapon.'" But, "Iran has denied that it is pursuing a weapon, and in the afternoon, the White House spokesman, Scott McClellan, acknowledged that Mr. Bush had misspoken." McClellan said, "He was referring to their behavior. … Our concern is their intention is to develop a nuclear weapon under the guise of a civilian program." But "Bush's slip may cement the perception among some members of the board of the International Atomic Energy Agency that he has decided, at least in his own mind, that Iran is intent on building a weapon as fast as it can, a situation he has said repeatedly that he will not tolerate. Mr. Bush gave no hint on Thursday that he was thinking of military action, instead saying that 'we are working hard to continue the diplomacy necessary to send a focused message to the Iranian government, and that is: "Your desires for a weapon are unacceptable."'"

The Washington Post (1/27, A14, Cody, 744K) reports China's endorsement of the Russian proposal "suggested that the idea of having Iran send uranium to Russia for enrichment might become the common denominator of an agreement on preventing the Iranian government from developing nuclear weapons, rather than the sanctions envisioned by the Bush administration." The Post notes, "Deputy Secretary of State Robert B. Zoellick had urged the Chinese leadership on Tuesday to join the United States and other nations in taking urgent steps to make sure Iran does not expand its nuclear research program into weapons production. China agrees that Iran should not have nuclear weapons, he said afterward, but differs with Washington over how to prevent it and how fast a solution has to be found." Chinese experts "predicted that China would likely abstain in a vote on sanctions, seeking to maintain its good relations with Washington.

The New York Times (1/27, Sanger, Sciolino, 1.19M) also notes, "While China favored the Russian proposal, it also firmly opposed the use of sanctions. That comes as a disappointment to Washington, which this week sent a top official to persuade China's leaders that they should do far more."

Poll Shows Majority Supports Military Action If Iran Pursues Nuclear Course. The Los Angeles Times (1/27, Miller, 958K) reports, "Despite persistent disillusionment with the war in Iraq, a majority of Americans supports taking military action against Iran if that country continues to produce material that can be used to develop nuclear weapons," a Los Angeles Times/Bloomberg poll of 1,555 adults conducted Sunday Jan. 22 through Wednesday Jan. 25 (+/-3%) shows The survey shows "that 57% of Americans favor military intervention if Iran's Islamic government pursues a program that could enable it to build nuclear arms." It suggests "that the difficulties the United States has encountered in Iraq have not turned the public against the possibility of military actions elsewhere in the Middle East."

ElBaradei Hopes Russian Proposal Will End Stand Off. The AP (1/27, Lederer) reports, "U.N. nuclear chief Mohamed ElBaradei said Thursday he was hopeful that a Russian proposal could help break the standoff over Iran's nuclear research and enrichment plans." He "said he was happy that earlier in the day Iran's top nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani, said Russia's proposal to move Iran's enrichment program to Russian territory was 'a positive one.'"

US Backs Iranian Move On Gay Rights Organizations. The Washington Post (1/27, A21, Kamen, 744K) reports in its "In the Loop" column that Bush Administration officials "scrambled yesterday to come to grips with the radical Hamas's stunning election victory in Palestinian elections. President Bush rejected dealing with a party that has an armed wing and vows the destruction of Israel. But there's precedent for a more optimistic view in the long run. Take, for example, U.S. relations with Iran's President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad . He advocates nuking Israel and is allegedly developing his own bombs." The Post adds, "Even so, Washington has discovered there are always ways to work together, to find common ground. For example, human rights groups Monday condemned a U.S. move 'back[ing] an Iranian initiative to deny United Nations consultative status' in the Economic and Social Council to gay rights organizations."

Mexican Official Suggests Border Incursion Was Undercover US Drug Operation. The AP (1/26) reported Mexican Foreign Secretary Luis Ernesto Derbez "suggested Thursday that American soldiers disguised as Mexican troops may have been in the military-style Humvee filmed earlier this week protecting a marijuana shipment on the border." Derbez said at "a news conference that US soldiers had helped drug smugglers before. However, he offered no evidence." Derbez said, "And just as that has happened ... it is very probable that something like that could have happened, that in reality they were members of some of their groups disguised as Mexican soldiers with Humvees." He added that "there was no proof that the men seen in the incident were Mexicans. Derbez also said his country will send a diplomatic note to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice demanding that US officials tone down their comments on Mexico's security and immigration problems."

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff's statements last week that reports of Mexican military incursions were overblown have been criticized frequently by the primetime cable news hosts. Senator Kay Bailey Hutchison appeared on Fox News' The Big Story (1/26) where she discussed the issue of Mexican military incursions. Host John Gibson: "Senator, you wrote a letter to the Secretary of the Department of Homeland Security, Michael Chertoff. He does not seem to be taking this very seriously. He calls these routine, accidental incursions. Texas authorities think they're much more serious than that. Have you been able to persuade the secretary to regard this as a serious matter and do something about it?" Hutchison: "Well, certainly we are encouraging the secretary to take action, to ask for an investigation, which the Mexican government has said they'll do."

On CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (1/26) host Lou Dobbs said, "The question has to be, why is the White House silent on this issue? Why is the man in charge of our homeland security, that is Homeland Security Department Secretary Michael Chertoff, so timid and so unconcerned or interested?"

US-Mexico Quarrels Over Border Said To Show "Deteriorating Relationship." The New York Times (1/27, McKinley, 1.19M) reports, "The United States and Mexico exchanged diplomatic broadsides on Thursday over border security and drug-related violence in another sign of their deteriorating relationship. The American ambassador, Antonio O. Garza Jr., sent a formal note to the Mexican government demanding an investigation of" Monday's smuggling incident in Texas. Garza "took the unusual step of not only announcing the note, but promising to send a second one to express concern about a rise in drug-related violence in border towns and recent attacks on American Border Patrol agents. … Hours later the Mexican foreign minister, Luis Ernesto Derbez, suggested that it was Mr. Garza who appeared to be playing to a crowd for political reasons."

Current Border Situation Compared To 1916. The Washington Times (1/27, McCain, 90K) reports in a front page article that "the White House is speaking of its 'concern about the reports' of Monday's border crossing, which a spokesman described as 'an incident that is under investigation.' Yet in 1916, when Pancho Villa's bandits raided Columbus, NM, a Democratic president didn't hesitate. President Woodrow Wilson sent Gen. John 'Black Jack' Pershing to lead an expedition into Mexico. A $5,000 bounty was offered for Villa's capture, and Army posters invoked 'The Flag, Old Glory' in calling for 25,000 recruits: 'Come on, boys, be ready to shoulder the trusty Springfield.'" However, "the historic situation during Villa's day was much different, said James Carafano, a senior fellow at the Heritage Foundation. 'Mexico back then didn't have a strong central government,' said Mr. Carafano, who specializes in defense and homeland-security issues. 'There was no rule of law. I don't think you can compare that to Mexico today."

DEA Finds Smuggling Tunnel Under Mexican Border Containing Nearly Two Tons Of Marijuana. ABC World News Tonight (1/26, story 6, 1:50, Vargas) reported, "In California, a secret tunnel used to smuggle drugs and people under the border has been uncovered. It's just one of many found in recent years. Officials say criminals are increasingly digging tunnels to bypass border patrols and move their contraband into the US." ABC (Thomas): "The DEA says it was a major gateway for illegal immigrants and drugs coming from Mexico." DEA Chief of Operations Michael Braun: "These tunnels are absolutely critical to these major drug-trafficking organizations and alien smuggling groups. Arms smuggling groups." Thomas: "US officials say the border has become ground zero for an explosion in illegal activity. Washington is now leaning heavily on Mexico to help put a stop to it." US Border Patrol Chief David Aguilar: "We have gotten a commitment to work with us on this. We have gotten a commitment to find out and get to the bottom of this." Thomas: "Before tons more illegal drugs find their way across the border."

NBC Nightly News (1/26, story9, :45, Williams) reported, "Out of California a big discovery to report a drug tunnel that authorities say runs the length of 12 football fields from Mexico into California, it's a tunnel so big the federal government says you can drive a car through it. The tunnel begins in a warehouse in Tijuana, ends in the San Diego area, it's used apparently for smuggling people and/or drugs. US officials say they found more than two tons of marijuana inside."

The New York Times (1/27, Archibold, 1.19M) reports, "Drug smugglers have dug one of the longest, most sophisticated tunnels discovered in recent years along the Mexican border, and the American and Mexican authorities have hauled nearly two tons of marijuana out of it since they entered it on Wednesday, officials said." Stretching from "a warehouse near the international airport in Tijuana, Mexico, to a vacant industrial building in Otay Mesa, Calif.," the tunnel's sophistication has "surprised officials, who found it outfitted with a concrete floor, electricity, lights and ventilation and groundwater pumping systems. … 'The tunnel is absolutely amazing,' said Michael Unzueta, special agent in charge for the federal Immigration and Customs Enforcement agency's San Diego office." CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (1/26, Dobbs) reported, 'Tonight, homeland security officials say they have shut down the largest border tunnel ever discovered on the US-Mexican border. … Police were first tipped off to it…two years ago. They finally found it."

Proliferation Of Tunnels Seen As Result Of Increased Border Security. The Washington Post (1/27, A3, Pomfret, 744K) reports "experts said the passageway bore all the hallmarks of an operation by a major drug cartel." Unzueta said, "Whether they are designed to smuggle drugs, people, weapons or other contraband, these tunnels pose a threat to our nation's security." The Post continues, "Federal agents have concluded that drug traffickers and smugglers of illegal immigrants have been heading underground to escape tighter enforcement along the border. Customs officials announced this week that drug seizures at California border crossings rose 24 percent in the past fiscal year. More than 127 tons of drugs were seized, the vast majority of that marijuana, in the year ending Sept. 30." The Washington Times (1/27, Seper, 90K) reports, "Since the September 11 attacks, federal authorities have discovered more than 20 cross-border tunnels along the US-Mexico border in California and Arizona. Authorities said they were unsure how long the tunnel had been in operation. They also said they did not know what drug organization might have used it."

Mexican Human Rights Commission Cancels Plan To Distribute Border Maps. Though the Mexican government has sought to distance itself from a human rights commission's plan to distribute maps of the Arizona desert, the plan has generally been depicted in print and on TV as a Mexican initiative. Under the headline "Mexico Nixes Border Maps For Migrants," The Washington Times (1/27, Seper, 90K) reports in a front page article that following an announcement Tuesday that it would distribute 70,000 border maps with safety instructions and tips to migrants aiming to cross illegally into the United States, The National Human Rights Commission (NHRC) in Mexico City canceled its plans yesterday, while maintaining that the decision was not "a reaction to criticism by Bush-administration officials." The commission "said it 'rethought' the decision after human rights organizations in several border states said the maps would show anti-immigration groups -- and watchdogs such as the Minutemen volunteers -- where the migrants were likely to travel. … The NHRC cited the Minutemen as a sign that anti-immigrant extremism was on the rise in the United States." Meanwhile, "Minuteman co-founder Chris Simcox said the NHRC's decision demonstrated the effectiveness of the 'peaceful, law-abiding actions by Minuteman volunteers' to secure the nation's borders."

In a discussion about the NHRC's cancelled plans on Fox News' O'Reilly Factor (1/26, O'Reilly), host Bill O'Reilly suggested to Rep. Tom Tancredo that "somebody got to Vicente Fox on this." Tancredo said, "I think so, Bill. I think that they could not spin it anymore. They tried their best to spin it as something they were just doing to make sure that people were being safe, that it was not encouraging illegal immigration. But it was so blatantly encouraging illegal immigration that they couldn't spin it anymore, so they backed away from it." Later, discussing the issue of Mexican military incursions, Tancredo was asked whether he thought Monday's incident involve the Mexican military protecting "dope dealers." Tancredo said, "I absolutely believe that." O'Reilly: "It's not hard to believe. We know that's been going down. But the Mexican government flat out denies it." Tancredo: "Absolutely. And they're embarrassed by it. And we won't pursue it because we're embarrassed by it, I suppose. We're embarrassed by the fact that we won't protect our own borders."

US, China Remain Divided Over Piracy. The Wall Street Journal (1/27, Hiebert, 2.11M) reports, "China and the U.S. traded barbs over Beijing's failure to respond to Washington's request for details about Chinese efforts to combat piracy, in a development that could exacerbate already testy bilateral trade relations." The Journal notes, "U.S. trade officials said China missed a Jan. 23 deadline set by Washington to get information on how Beijing has sought to rein in rampant piracy, including any penalties it has imposed on violators. Chinese authorities, for their part, have challenged Washington's right to make such a request under World Trade Organization rules." The dispute "could prompt the U.S. Congress to press the administration of President George W. Bush to take its case against China to the global trade body, and it cast a cloud over the planned visit to America by Chinese President Hu Jintao in April, U.S. businessmen in Beijing said.

Bush, Rice Call On North Korea To Stop Counterfeiting US Currency. Reuters (1/27) reports, "President George W. Bush vowed on Thursday to uphold U.S. law and continue a crackdown on North Korea for counterfeiting American dollar bills." At a press conference Bush said, "There is no compromise ... We are going to uphold the law and protect the currency of the American people." North Korea "has said it would be unthinkable to return to six-country nuclear talks…when Washington is trying to bring down its rulers with 'financial sanctions.'" Although "Bush showed no give on the crackdown on the North's suspected illicit activities, he reaffirmed that 'we want the six party talks to continue ... I think the framework is a framework that can eventually yield to a political settlement of the issue.'"

Reuters (1/26, Pleming) reported Secretary Rice said the US "is ready to resume six-party nuclear talks with North Korea 'immediately' as long as Pyongyang does not impose any conditions." Reuters said Pyongyang has said "it would be unthinkable to return to talks" while counterfeiting-related penalties are in place. Rice said the situation could be resolved when North Korea begins "living up to the law." According to Reuters, Rice "said the United States chief negotiator in the talks had made it very clear during meetings in Beijing this month that Washington wanted the six-party talks to continue. 'No conditions. We will do it immediately,' Rice said."

North Korea Leading Source Of Counterfeit Cigarettes. The Wall Street Journal (1/27, Fairclough, 2.11M) reports that North Korea "has become a leading source of counterfeit cigarettes -- with the capacity to churn out more than two billion packs a year, tobacco companies say. Philip Morris, a unit of New York-based Altria Group Inc., says over the past several years it has discovered North Korean-made knockoffs of its Marlboro brand in more than 1,300 places." U.S. officials "seized more than a billion fake smokes, many allegedly from North Korea, in California last year as part of an undercover operation targeting Asian smugglers. Millions more packs of bogus Marlboros, Mild Sevens and other cigarettes made in North Korea have been confiscated in Taiwan, the Philippines, Vietnam and Belize." And a senior Administration official said, "Much more dangerous things than cigarettes can flow along these same routes."

Rice Says India Has "Difficult Choices" In Nuclear Deal. Reuters (1/27) reports Secretary Rice said "India has 'difficult choices' to make on a controversial civil nuclear cooperation agreement with the United States before the deal can be completed." Senior-level talks have "failed to close the gap on major issues, including which Indian facilities would be designated as civilian and military." The latter "would still be off-limits to U.N. monitors."

US Embassy Corrects Report Of Ambassador's Comments. The New York Times (1/27, Sanger, Sciolino, 1.19M) at the end of an article on the Russian proposal to solve the nuclear dispute with Iran also notes, "India responded testily yesterday to American suggestions of a quid pro quo in its blossoming relations with the United States, with the Indian foreign secretary calling in the United States ambassador over his reported remarks about how India should vote next week on whether to refer the case of Iran's nuclear ambitions to the United Nations Security Council." US ambassador to India David Mulford "had been quoted by the Press Trust of India news agency as saying that if India did not vote to refer Iran to the Security Council, it would be 'devastating' to its chances of securing the nuclear deal with the United States." The US embassy "later said that the comments had been taken 'out of context' and released a full transcript. In it, Mr. Mulford first said that India would be expected to vote 'based on India's judgment of its own national interest.'"

US Seeks Overhaul Of UN Human Rights Commission. The Washington Times (1/27, Sands, 90K) reports, "A major overhaul of the United Nations' discredited human rights agency is 'quite likely' this year, the State Department's lead negotiator said yesterday, but he also said the United States would insist on real reforms before agreeing to a deal." Deputy assistant secretary of state for international organization affairs Mark Lagon said, "I think it is quite likely we can get a new human rights council, although it is not certain."

Former Pakistani Leader Dismisses Interpol Notices. The Washington Times (1/27, Li, 90K) reports, "Former Pakistani Prime Minister Benazir Bhutto said yesterday that 'red notices' issued by Interpol for her and her husband, Asif Ali Zardari, are groundless and politically motivated." She "said her attorney is contacting Interpol to confirm the warrants, and if they exist, to ask on what grounds they were issued." She said the notices were issued because "the government of President Pervez Musharraf wants to 'divert the attention' of the Pakistani people from the recent U.S. missile strike in a region bordering Afghanistan that killed at least 13 civilians."

New Canadian Leader Challenges US Over Control Of Arctic Waters. The New York Times (1/27, Krauss, 1.19M) reports, "Stephen Harper, Canada's prime minister-designate, reproached the American ambassador on Thursday over an old difference of opinion about the control of Arctic waters claimed by Canada." He "is widely expected to usher in warmer relations with the Bush administration," yet "the honeymoon took at least a temporary break when Mr. Harper reacted to a news report about comments made by the United States ambassador, David H. Wilkins, taking issue with Canada's assertion of sovereignty in northern Arctic water passages." US diplomats "said that Mr. Wilkins had stated nothing more than an old policy in answering a student's question. They said he did not criticize a plan Mr. Harper announced during the campaign to build and deploy three new armed heavy icebreaking ships and construct a deep-water port in the Arctic territorial capital, Iqaluit."

The Washington Post (1/27, A19, Struck, 744K) adds, "The Liberal government Harper will replace has made similar claims and proposals. But it was unexpected that Harper would launch a sharp verbal attack against the United States on this subject so quickly, and he extended a press conference announcing his Feb. 6 inauguration to bring it up."

Return Of Oil Companies To Libya May Prompt Reform. The Christian Science Monitor (1/27, Martelli, 61K) reports that "the companies that helped create Libya's oil industry in the 1970s are returning as Qaddafi rebuilds bridges to the West that he burned long ago, and this may help to precipitate political, as well as economic, change." Yet "Qaddafi remains an autocratic leader, and genuine economic and political reform is nowhere on the horizon, according to many Libyans." And "endemic corruption and high unemployment persist, and the lack of real economic incentives is driving skilled professionals out of the country, says Ezzedin Dibashi, an oil consultant based in London who used to work at NOC. 'Doctors, engineers, and economists are going elsewhere, rather than subsist on 600 Libyan dinars ($450) per month.'"

Georgia Experiences Blackouts After Energy Sources Disrupted. The New York Times (1/27, Chivers, 1.19M) reports, "Energy shortages struck Georgia anew on Thursday as a wind storm toppled a major power transmission line and Russia's gas monopoly failed to restore the flow of natural gas to the country after pipelines were sabotaged last weekend, energy officials said." The country "has been without its Russian gas, and with limited electricity, for five days. Officials in both countries initially hoped that the supplies could be swiftly restored. But after a respite from the shortages on Monday, the problems have worsened, bringing fresh hardships to Georgia and further tarnishing Russia's image as an energy supplier."

Prospects For Resolution Of Doha Trade Talks Dim. The Wall Street Journal (1/27, Miller, Champion, Switzerland, 2.11M) reports, "Major trading nations are hardening their positions as they head into the first round of trade talks since the recent Hong Kong sessions faltered, renewing the possibility of a watered-down result of four years of negotiations." During the World Economic Summit in Davos EU trade commissioner Peter Mandelson "said Europe stood to lose 'next to nothing' if talks failed and repeated strongly that he would make no further offers unless other countries make concessions. Earlier this week, he told the European Parliament that Europe could settle for 'a minimalist outcome, if that is what the rest of the world wants.'" Meanwhile, "U.S. Trade Representative Rob Portman said Thursday that he needs an ambitious round to sell a trade package to Congress. U.S. legislators, he said, won't approve a deal to cut politically important farm subsidies unless they can show their constituents that U.S. farmers will benefit from lower global farm tariffs and greater opportunities to sell industrial goods and services."

Meanwhile, the Financial Times (1/27, Beattie) reports under the headline "US Signals New Approach To Doha Round Of Trade Talks," Portman said Thursday that the Doha round of trade talks "had to move forward on all fronts, as the European Union said it would lose 'next to nothing' if the talks failed." According to the Times, the "shift of emphasis in the US's position ahead of a meeting of trade ministers on Saturday came amid accusations that the tough negotiating tactics of big farm exporters like Brazil were holding up progress." For his part, EU trade commissioner Peter Mandelson "raised the stakes" by saying that the EU would lose "next to nothing" if the talks failed. "The alliance between the US and Brazil has led to stalemate in these talks," he said. "It has now become self-defeating," he continued.

Portman Says Germany's Merkel Can Help Advance Talks. The AP (1/27) reports, "New German Chancellor Angela Merkel could help advance stalled global trade talks by offsetting the protective mindset of French officials in EU policy," US trade chief Rob Portman said Thursday. Noting that a "key issue holding up talks has been access to European Union farm markets," Portman "said Germany could act as a counterweight to France, which has been particularly defensive in wanting to protect its agriculture markets." Portman said, "I'm hopeful that she [Merkel] can help us to come together with an agreement this year."

Call For Boycott Of Israel Causes Stir At World Economic Forum. The New York Times (1/27, Landler, Markoff, 1.19M) reports, "A magazine article calling on nations to boycott Israel because of its treatment of Palestinians has provoked a tempest at the World Economic Forum's annual meeting here, prompting the organizers to pull the magazines from the forum's shelves here and issue an apology." The timing, following the Hamas election victory, "was not lost on people here. The future of Israeli and Palestinian relations was high on the agenda on Thursday at this meeting of about 2,300 political figures, private groups and corporate executives." Meanwhile, "Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice spoke via satellite during a panel here, reaffirming the position of the United States that Hamas must renounce violence and recognize Israel's right to exist."

Globalization Seen As Leading Agent Of International Reform. David Ignatius in his column in the Washington Post (1/27, A23, 744K) writes, "Davos has come to symbolize the dominant force of our time -- the wealth-creating, job-destroying whirlwind of the global economy. Each year I come here I marvel at the reach and leveling power of this economic hurricane. There are more Chinese, Indians and Arabs every year, and less of an American presence. … The one thing they seem to have in common is that nearly all were educated in the United States." Ignatius concludes, "Business today is the leading agent of social change. That's really the message of Davos. It can be a pitiless process, and its seamless efficiency is in frightening contrast to the incompetence and mismanagement of the public sector. Globalization can be tamed, but it can't be stopped -- nor should it be. I just wish other things in the world worked as well."

Growing Populism May Challenge Globalization. In contrast to Ignatius, Floyd Norris in his column in the New York Times (1/27, 1.19M) writes, "Among the business and political leaders who gather here each year for the World Economic Forum, there has long been broad agreement that globalization is good." Yet "this year there is a growing doubt -- not in the validity of the message, but in whether it is losing believers among the broad populace of the world." One example is the election of Bolivian president Evo Morales which "continued a recent leftist trend in Latin America." Norris notes, "Perhaps those who resent globalization will remain powerless. But their ranks could swell if the world economy weakens." Harvard University president Lawrence Summers "asserts that globalization will not be derailed." And "people could just accept a world in which some are very wealthy and others provide services to them. Elaine L. Chao, the United States labor secretary, said the job outlook in the United States was bright for plumbers and electricians."

Businessman Downplays Importance Of World Economic Forum. Former Vanguard Group CEO John Bogle, author of "The Battle for the Soul of Capitalism" in an op-ed in the Wall Street Journal (1/27, 2.11M) writes, "I already knew, as I suspect everyone there knew, that 'China, India [are] Key to the Future,' CNN's headline about Chancellor Merkel's speech. And I didn't need to fly to Davos to learn that 'plumbers, construction workers, and electricians' will still be needed in the global economy of the future. With 226 sessions, I would have had to miss at least 200 anyway." Yet "I may just be jealous. Perhaps if I call President Clinton I can hitch a ride on his jet, arriving late tomorrow afternoon for a closing panel with Forum founder Klaus Schwab. Then I'd have avoided all the foolish, self-righteous show-biz baloney, but be able to assure my pals: 'Yes, I was at Davos, 2006.'"

EU Issues Deadline For France To End Protectionism. The Financial Times (1/27, Buck) reports, "France has been given a one-month deadline to justify its contentious decree protecting a large number of domestic firms from foreign takeovers or face legal action from Brussels." EU internal market commissioner Charlie McCreevy "has rounded on the French government's action, dismissing key provisions of the decree – issued on December 31 – as 'discriminatory' and 'protectionist'." The "intervention underlines the Commission's deep concerns about the rise of protectionist measures in the 25 EU member states."

Former Kosovo Leader Mourned. The New York Times (1/27, Wood, 1.19M) reports, "Kosovo's Albanian majority gathered by the tens of thousands on Thursday to bid farewell to their" former president Ibrahim Rugova "in a proud and somber funeral ceremony that seemed to underscore their aspirations for independence." He "was given every honor the region could muster."

Columnist Warns Bolivian Poor Will Suffer Under Morales Rule. Mary Anastasia O'Grady in her "the Americas" column in the Wall Street Journal (1/27, 2.11M) writes, "In just a few short days," new Bolivian president Evo Morales "has built a cabinet of radical and Marxist militants, purged the Bolivian military and signed a pile of 'agreements' with his Venezuelan mentor Hugo Chávez. There are reports that Cuban security agents are already working for the new president much as they do for Chávez." O'Grady continues, "The most tragic aspect of Evo's decision to let Cuba and Venezuela annex his country is where this all leads for the majority Indian population in one of the region's poorest countries. … They no doubt think that Evo…will care for his own in ways that the white, upper-class leadership never did. But Fidel long ago destroyed underclass hopes for a better life and Hugo is doing the same."

From Today's Morning Headlines

At Press Conference, President Bush Reaffirms The Necessity Of The NSA Terrorist Surveillance Program. "President Bush again defended his program of warrantless surveillance Thursday, saying 'there's no doubt in my mind it is legal.' He suggested that he might resist congressional efforts to change or expressly endorse it. 'The program's legal, it's designed to protect civil liberties, and it's necessary,' <http://news.yahoo.com/s/ap/20060127/ap_on_go_pr_wh/bush;_ylt=AgopKVTtVKSvcJGs5_Y5KwNI2ocA;_ylu=X3oDMTBiMW04NW9mBHNlYwMlJVRPUCUl> Bush told a White House news conference. ... It was the president's first full-scale news conference of the new year, and the 10th since he was re-elected in 2004." (Terence Hunt, "Bush Calls Warrantless Wiretaps Legal," The Associated Press, 1/27/06)

FBI Director Robert Mueller Discusses The Importance of Intelligence In Winning The War On Terror. "FBI director Robert Mueller said Thursday the United States now acts on intelligence from any place in the world to fight terrorism but has not sacrificed individuals' rights to privacy in that effort. ... 'For us, it is not just having a terrorist event happening and then gathering the evidence to put it in a courtroom to convict somebody after we're able to identify him, detain him and extradite him,' Mueller said. Since the Sept. 11 attacks, the FBI chief said, U.S. officials have recognized the importance of using all information to determine 'who intends to hurt the United States or the United States' interests around the world.' 'We are doing a much better job at integrating that intelligence and acting on that intelligence any place in the world,' <http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2006/01/26/AR20060

12601325.html> he said." (Edith M. Lederer, "FBI Chief Cites Worldwide Intel," The Associated Press, 1/26/06)

Iraqi And American Forces Launch Operation In Baghdad. "Iraqi special forces backed by U.S. troops raided houses in Baghdad on Friday and detained at least 35 suspected insurgents, police said. The operation began at about 6 a.m. and was being conducted in several southwestern Baghdad neighborhoods, <http://news.yahoo.com/s/ap/20060127/ap_on_re_mi_ea/iraq_arrests_1;_ylt=AnY01IpUkcjOyRJ3dfbsnfxX6GMA;_ylu=X3oDMTBiMW04NW9mBHNlYwMlJVRPUCUl> with security forces searching homes, stopping cars at checkpoints and frisking people, said Maj. Falah al-Mohammedawi. There have been many ambushes and drive-by killings in this sector of Baghdad during the past week." ("35 Detained In Joint Iraqi-U.S. Operations," The Associated Press, 1/27/06)

Britain Expands Commitment To Afghanistan. "Britain will send at least another 4,000 troops - four times its current deployment <http://news.yahoo.com/s/ap/20060126/ap_on_re_mi_ea/britain_afghanistan_
2;_ylt=ApymDy4dZR6Rc7P4XZq1E53OVooA;_ylu=X3oDMTBiMW04NW9mBHNlYwMlJVRPUCU
l> - to Afghanistan in coming months as a NATO mission expands into a dangerous region rife with Taliban and al-Qaida insurgents, the government said Thursday. Britain now has about 1,000 troops in Afghanistan. That would peak at about 5,700 but drop to less than 4,700 after engineers complete building a base for troops by July, Defense Secretary John Reid said. ... The Afghanistan deployment comes as NATO expands its peacekeeping mission there from 9,000 to about 16,000 troops. The alliance will be responsible for security in about three-quarters of the country, while the separate U.S.-led combat force hunts down Taliban insurgents." (Ed Johnson, "Britain Boosting Afghan Troop Levels," The Associated Press, 1/26/06)

Mrs. Bush Discusses The Importance Of Education In The Recovery Of The Gulf Coast. "First Lady Laura Bush visited one of the first New Orleans public schools to open after Hurricane Katrina hit then traveled to another school here in St. Bernard Parish, where devastation was so great that students from 20 different public and private schools are attending classes in one partially repaired building. Later, she visited a Kiln, Miss., playground with Green Bay Packers quarterback Brett Favre. ... 'Play is really important for children,' Bush said.
'One thing that will bring people back to their communities is if they know there's a good school for their children to go to and there's safe places for them to play.' <http://www.clarionledger.com/apps/pbcs.dll/article?AID=/20060127/NEWS01

Enrollment In Plans Offering Health Savings Accounts Triple To 3 Million. "Enrollment in high-deductible insurance plans that qualify for contributions to tax-sheltered health savings accounts - the Bush administration's way of adding market forces to the health business - tripled to 3 million people in the last 10 months, the health insurance industry reported Thursday. 'This is a very significant success story,' <http://www.latimes.com/news/printedition/asection/la-na-health27jan27,0

,4838490.story?coll=la-news-a_section> said Karen Ignagni, president and chief executive of America's Health Insurance Plans, the trade association for companies that underwrite virtually all such plans." (Joel Havemann, "Enrollment Triples In Plans Offering Health Savings Accounts," Los Angeles Times, 1/27/06)

Durable Goods Orders Increase For Third Straight Month. "Orders to the nation's factories for big-ticket goods finished 2005 strongly, while jobless claims rose last week but remained at a level indicating healthy job growth. Durable-goods orders climbed 1.3% in December to a seasonally adjusted $228.14 billion, the third straight increase, the Commerce Department said. Demand was higher for airplanes, machinery, cars and capital goods. 'The durable-goods report for December was extremely strong,' <http://online.wsj.com/article/SB113828093298857015.html?mod=todays_us_p age_one> said Stephen Stanley, an economist at RBS Greenwich Capital Markets. 'The headline rise of 1.3% was decent, but some of the underlying statistics were even more impressive.'" (Jeff Bater, "Growth Is Shown In Durable Goods; Jobs Look Positive," Dow Jones Newswires, 1/27/06)

Secretary Chao Addresses The Administration's Commitment To Helping Americans Get Training Needed To Access Good Paying Jobs. SEC. CHAO:
"And the United States in relation to the major industrialized nations actually has done a much, much better job of creating new jobs. ... What we are seeing in our country is a skills gap. We have workers looking for work. We also have employers looking for workers. And so the skills gap is what we've got to address. Now for workers who are out of work because of some termination by one particular company's business decisions or business problems, we're very concerned about that. We're concerned about every single worker who has lost their job. And we have a great deal of assistance available. We want people to know that there are training programs available, assistance programs. There are SWAT teams that will be on site to help workers figure out what to do about, you know, their pensions and how to find new jobs and more importantly, how to get the training that they need to access the good paying jobs that are being created." (Bloomberg's "Morning Call," 1/25/06)

More Democrats Announce Their Support For Judge Alito. "Two more Democratic senators, Robert Byrd of West Virginia and Tim Johnson of South Dakota, said Thursday that they will vote in favor of Supreme Court nominee Samuel Alito.
<http://www.usatoday.com/printedition/news/20060127/a_alito27.art.htm>
Byrd and Johnson join Sen. Ben Nelson of Nebraska as Alito's only announced Democratic supporters. All three are from states won by President Bush in 2004. 'Like most of my constituents, I prefer conservative judges,' Byrd said." (Kathy Kiely, "2 More Democrats Say They'll Back Alito," USA Today, 1/27/06)

THE NSA PROGRAM TO DETECT AND PREVENT TERRORIST ATTACKS
MYTH V. REALITY
January 27, 2006

Myth: The NSA program is illegal.

Reality: The President's authority to authorize the terrorist surveillance program is firmly based both in his constitutional authority as Commander-in-Chief, and in the Authorization for Use of Military Force (AUMF) passed by Congress after the September 11 attacks.

- As Commander-in-Chief and Chief Executive, the President has legal authority under the Constitution to authorize the NSA terrorist surveillance program.
  - The Constitution makes protecting our Nation from foreign attack the President's most solemn duty and provides him with the legal authority to keep America safe.
  - It has long been recognized that the President has inherent authority to conduct warrantless surveillance to gather foreign intelligence even in peacetime. Every federal appellate court to rule on the question has concluded that the President has this authority and that it is consistent with the Constitution.
  - Since the Civil War, wiretaps aimed at collecting foreign intelligence have been authorized by Presidents, and the authority to conduct warrantless surveillance for foreign intelligence purposes has been consistently cited and used when necessary.
- Congress confirmed and supplemented the President's constitutional authority to authorize this program when it passed the AUMF.
  - The AUMF authorized the President to use "all necessary and appropriate military force against those nations, organizations, or persons he determines planned, authorized, committed, or aided in the terrorist attacks that occurred on September 11, 2001."
  - In its Hamdi decision, the Supreme Court ruled that the AUMF also authorizes the "fundamental incident[s] of waging war." The history of warfare makes clear that electronic surveillance of the enemy is a fundamental incident to the use of military force.
- A crucial responsibility of the President—charged by the AUMF and the Constitution—is to identify enemies who attacked us, especially if they are in the United States ready to strike against our Nation.

- We are at war, and al Qaeda is not a conventional enemy. Since the September 11 attacks, it has promised again and again to deliver another, even more devastating attack on America. In the meantime, it has killed hundreds of innocent people around the world through large-scale attacks in Indonesia, Madrid, and London.

- Al Qaeda's plans include infiltrating our cities and communities and plotting with affiliates abroad to kill innocent Americans.

- The United States must use every tool available, consistent with the Constitution, to prevent and deter another al Qaeda attack, and the President has indicated his intent to do just that.

Myth: The NSA program is a domestic eavesdropping program used to spy on innocent Americans.

Reality: The NSA program is narrowly focused, aimed only at international calls and targeted at al Qaeda and related groups. Safeguards are in place to protect the civil liberties of ordinary Americans.

- The program only applies to communications where one party is located outside of the United States.
- The NSA terrorist surveillance program described by the President is only focused on members of Al Qaeda and affiliated groups. Communications are only intercepted if there is a reasonable basis to believe that one party to the communication is a member of al Qaeda, affiliated with al Qaeda, or a member of an organization affiliated with al Qaeda.

- The program is designed to target a key tactic of al Qaeda: infiltrating foreign agents into the United States and controlling their movements through electronic communications, just as it did leading up to the September 11 attacks.

- The NSA activities are reviewed and reauthorized approximately every 45 days. In addition, the General Counsel and Inspector General of the NSA monitor the program to ensure that it is operating properly and that civil liberties are protected, and the intelligence agents involved receive extensive training.

Myth: The NSA activities violate the Fourth Amendment.

Reality: The NSA program is consistent with the Constitution's protections of civil liberties, including the protections of the Fourth Amendment.

- The Supreme Court has long held that the Fourth Amendment allows warrantless searches where "special needs, beyond the normal need for law enforcement," exist. Foreign intelligence collection, especially in a time of war when catastrophic attacks have already been launched inside the United States, falls within the special needs context.

- As the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court of Review has observed, the nature of the "emergency" posed by al Qaeda "takes the matter out of the realm of ordinary crime control."

- The program easily meets the Court's reasonableness test for whether a warrant is required. The NSA activities described by the President are narrow in scope and aim, and the government has an overwhelming interest in detecting and preventing further catastrophic attacks on American soil.

Myth: The NSA program violates the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act (FISA).

Reality: The NSA activities described by the President are consistent with FISA.

- FISA expressly envisions a need for the President to conduct electronic surveillance outside of its provisions when a later statute authorizes that surveillance. The AUMF is such a statute.

- The NSA activities come from the very center of the Commander-in-Chief power, and it would raise serious constitutional issues if FISA were read to allow Congress to interfere with the President's well-recognized, inherent constitutional authority. FISA can and should be read to avoid this.

Myth: The Administration could have used FISA but simply chose not to.

Reality: In the war on terrorism, it is sometimes imperative to detect—reliably, immediately, and without delay—whether an al Qaeda member or affiliate is in contact with someone in the United States. FISA is an extremely valuable tool in the war on terrorism, but it was passed in 1978 and there have been tremendous advances in technology since then.

- The NSA program is an "early warning system" with only one purpose: to detect and prevent the next attack on the United States from foreign agents hiding in our midst. It is a program with a military nature that requires speed and agility.

- The FISA process, by design, moves more slowly. It requires numerous lawyers, the preparation of legal briefs, approval from a Cabinet-level officer, certification from the National Security Advisor or another Senate-confirmed officer, and finally, the approval of an Article III judge. This is a good process for traditional domestic foreign intelligence monitoring, but when even 24 hours can make the difference between success and failure in preventing a terrorist attack, a faster process is needed.

Myth: FISA has "emergency authorizations" to allow 72-hour surveillance without a court order that the Administration could easily utilize.

Reality: There is a serious misconception about so-called "emergency authorizations" under FISA, which allow 72 hours of surveillance without a court order. FISA requires the Attorney General to determine in advance that a FISA application for that particular intercept will be fully supported and will be approved by the court before an emergency authorization can be granted, and the review process itself can and does take precious time.

- The Justice Department does not approve emergency authorizations without knowing it will receive court approval within 72 hours.

- To initiate surveillance under a FISA emergency authorization, it is not enough to rely on the best judgment of our intelligence officers alone. Those intelligence officers would have to get the sign-off of lawyers at the NSA that all provisions of FISA have been satisfied, then lawyers in the Department of Justice would have to be similarly satisfied, and finally, the Attorney General would have to be satisfied that the search meets the requirements of FISA. The government would have to be prepared to follow up with a full FISA application within 72 hours.

- A typical FISA application involves a substantial process in its own right: The work of several lawyers; the preparation of a legal brief and supporting declarations; the approval of a Cabinet-level officer; a certification from the National Security Advisor, the Director of the FBI, or another designated Senate-confirmed officer; and, finally the approval of an Article III judge.

- The FISA process makes perfect sense in almost all cases of foreign-intelligence monitoring in the United States. Although technology has changed dramatically since FISA was enacted, FISA remains a vital tool in the war on terrorism -- one that we are using to its fullest and will continue to use against al Qaeda and other foreign threats.

- But the terrorist surveillance program operated by the NSA requires maximum speed and agility to achieve early warning, and even a very brief delay may make the difference between success and failure in detecting and preventing the next attack.

Throughout this document, the "terrorist surveillance program" and "the NSA program" refer to the NSA activities described by the President.

I am very sorry if I didn't forward this sooner. I thought I had done so, but with Lu gone and Robert out I admit things are a little less than optimal in our office at the moment. Happily, the process sounds like a simple one but if your folks encounter any problems just let me know. Thanks for all your excellent work on this and the housing issues. We are getting very close! I now have a CD from Omar Vargas that I assume contains the report you're referencing. As for the photo, I'm told that you will need to get sign off from the WH Photo Office, but that shouldn't be a problem.
Please have someone involved in the production call the Photo Office (456-6709) and put in the request. The office can also email over a high resolution version (or whatever you need) of a certain photo.

Rena Comisac hopefully will have transferred the report to you sometime today. Would appreciate your input on its substance and, somewhat pressingly but less importantly, whether we have the green light to use a POTUS photo. Document will have to be sent to the printer's next week and for some reason photos need to be set in place even before the text is finalized! Many thanks. NMG

You did forward it. My reading of the email below is that Allyson was acknowledging her receipt of the disk containing the report, but not that she had reviewed and approved it. Kimani has followed up on the photo, but I want to make sure that we have WH approval before we send the report to JMD for layout, then on to the printer. Should I contact Allyson to get some clarification?

Thanks -- I too think we are making progress, and I always appreciate constructive feedback. Have a great weekend.

Justice Department subpoenas attorney for Guidant documents

By ASHLEY M. HEHER

AP Business Writer

INDIANAPOLIS_The Justice\l "l" Department\l "l" has ordered an attorney to turn over documents indicating Guidant Corp. continued selling some of its heart defibrillator models after knowing the devices could malfunction.

The subpoena, part of the federal government's investigation into the Indianapolis-based company, requires Texas attorney Bob Hilliard to turn over handwritten notes and PowerPoint slides. He obtained them from the company during preparations for a product liability case in Texas state court.

The 10 pages include notes from Fred McCoy, president of Guidant's cardiac rhythm management division, that show a decision was made to sell inventory the executive described as having sporadic "life-threatening" defects.

"It's consistent, bad decisions based on profit, not patient health," Hilliard told The Associated Press. "The documents I received from Guidant showed they were basically making the equivalent of the Ford Pinto."

Guidant spokesman Steve Tragash declined to comment.

Assistant U.S\l "l". Attorney\l "l" Robert Lewis did not return a phone call seeking comment on the subpoena, which was issued Tuesday.

Hilliard represents about 70 patients who are suing Guidant for providing them with faulty heart devices. The jury trial, scheduled to begin Feb. 20 in Corpus Christi, Texas, involves two patients with faulty defibrillators. It is the first of what could be several trials stemming from Guidant recalls over the last seven months.

Since June, Guidant has recalled or issued safety advisories for about 88,000 defibrillators and more than 200,000 pacemakers. At least seven deaths have been linked to the faulty devices.

The company faces regulatory investigations as well as multiple lawsuits from the recalls.

Analysts have predicted Guidant's liability from all the actions could reach as high as $2 billion.

Hilliard obtained the documents _ part of 600,000 pages of Guidant records _ during trial preparations.

Government officials also asked Hilliard to keep all the records from Guidant, including those not covered in the subpoena.

Guidant agreed Wednesday to a $27.2 billion acquisition by Natick, Mass.-based Boston Scientific Corp., ending a two-month-long bidding war with health products giant Johnson & Johnson. The takeover must still be approved by shareholders and regulators in the U.S. and Europe.

The company announced Friday that net income fell to $78.9 million, or 23 cents per share, for the three months ended Dec. 31 from $104.5 million, or 32 cents per share, a year ago, as sales declined and product recalls and merger expenses continued.

Drug Maker's Efforts to Compete in Lucrative Insulin Market Are Under Scrutiny

By GARDINER HARRIS and ROBERT PEAR

WASHINGTON — For years, Novo Nordisk, a Danish company and one of the earliest makers of insulin, has raced behind Eli Lilly to capture the lucrative insulin market in the United States.

When in 1996 Lilly started selling Humalog, a synthetic insulin with speedier blood-sugar control, Novo needed four more years to get approval to market a similar product.

When Lilly's huge sales force put Novo at a disadvantage, Novo fought back. The company hired hundreds of sales representatives. When Lilly struck a marketing deal with the Eckerd pharmacy chain, Novo responded with a partnership with Rite Aid.

But in its race, several former Novo sales representatives say, Novo may have crossed the line. Sales representatives paid at least one Rite Aid pharmacist to encourage switches from Lilly products or Novo's own lower-priced versions to higher-priced ones, according to documents and former and present company officials. Novo also paid doctors' assistants when prescriptions were switched, according to two former sales representatives.

Several former sales representatives said they were told by pharmacists and doctors' assistants that some patients first became aware of the switches when they picked up the new medicines at a pharmacy.

Officials from Novo and Rite Aid said that their activities were intended primarily to educate patients or improve care and that similar programs were common in the industry.

Karen A. Rugen, a spokeswoman for Rite Aid, said, "Our alliance with Novo Nordisk is standard industry practice." Ms. Rugen said, however, that Novo had paid one of Rite Aid's pharmacists directly, although she said that top Rite Aid executives had been unaware of the practice.

Susan Jackson, a spokeswoman for Novo Nordisk, said that the overall agreement between Novo Nordisk and Rite Aid "has benefited many people with diabetes."

Ms. Jackson would not address questions about payments made to doctors' assistants or a Rite Aid pharmacist, nor would she say how much Novo paid Rite Aid. But she said the partnership "is not unlike other agreements common in the industry that provide 'preferred status' for branded drugs."

But prosecutors are now investigating possible criminal violations. On Dec. 20, Novo said it had received a subpoena from the United States attorney for the Eastern District of New York for documents relating to its marketing practices.

The company said that it "believes that the investigation is limited to its insulin products." The subpoena indicated that "the documents are necessary for the investigation of potential criminal offenses," the company said.

Drug companies may pay for consulting or educational services, but federal anti-kickback statutes prohibit them from offering financial incentives to doctors or pharmacists to encourage or reward the prescribing of particular drugs, according to a 2003 guidance from the Department of Health and Human Services.

"In short, practices that may be common or longstanding in other businesses are not necessarily acceptable or lawful" in health care, the guidance states.

A Marketing Battle

The rivalry between Novo and Lilly illustrates the efforts companies will undertake to become No. 1 in a drug market, especially for chronic diseases like diabetes, which in the United States is a $3.3 billion market annually, according to IMS Health, a pharmaceutical information and consulting company.

From a business perspective, Novo's efforts were a great success. From December 2001 through November 2005, Novo's insulin sales rose 364 percent to $963 million while Lilly's insulin sales rose only 13 percent to $1.43 billion, according to figures provided by IMS Health.

The marketing programs were detailed in dozens of internal Novo and Rite Aid documents obtained by The New York Times. Three former Novo sales representatives described the programs. These people, some of whom spoke to The Times separately from one another, do not wish their names to be used because all still work in the industry and fear retribution. Parts of the programs were also confirmed by company officials and another sales representative who allowed their names to be used. The former sales representatives would not comment on whether they had filed whistle-blower lawsuits against Novo.

In its marketing battle with Lilly, Novo's sales representatives undertook a variety of efforts to persuade doctors to prescribe Novo's insulin products, one of which was known as the "anchor in the office" program.

Under this program, Novo sales representatives established contacts in some medical offices that served many diabetics, three former sales representatives said. The contacts were generally nurses or medical assistants responsible for monitoring diabetic patients. Officially, Novo paid these "anchors" to educate patients about Novo's products.

But two of the three former sales representatives who participated in the program said that Novo paid anchors as much as $25 for each prescription they helped switch to higher-priced insulin products.

Vikki Tolbert, a Novo district sales manager, said in an interview that "people are up in arms for no reason."

"Novo, like other companies, used to have a program to reimburse nurses and medical assistants," Ms. Tolbert said. "The purpose was not to switch patients, but to educate them and train them on insulin and insulin devices."

The formal program and the payments ended several years ago, Ms. Tolbert said, but some sales representatives still wanted to have trainers, or "anchors in the office."

"We would never tell a sales rep to pay anyone," Ms. Tolbert said. "That's crazy. But some reps do things of their own volition. They are out in the field by themselves every day. Managers are not with them. A pharmaceutical company cannot know what each individual sales rep is doing."

Deals Becoming Routine

A number of drug companies are running afoul of the anti-kickback law. In October, Serono Laboratories pleaded guilty to two counts of conspiracy and agreed to pay $704 million to settle criminal charges that it engaged in an elaborate kickback scheme to encourage sales of its AIDS drug, Serostim. In 2004, prosecutors accused Pfizer of paying doctors to prescribe its epilepsy drug Neurontin, and the company pleaded guilty to two criminal charges and paid $430 million.

State and federal prosecutors are investigating scores of other criminal and civil cases of marketing abuse, all of which are under seal. The possible health consequences for patients are rarely emphasized, however. For instance, physicians say aggressive marketing of insulin products can hurt patients.

Dr. David M. Nathan, director of the diabetes center at Massachusetts General Hospital and professor at Harvard Medical School, said that switching insulin prescriptions without providing thorough counseling to patients can be dangerous.

Newer, more expensive rapid-acting insulins begin working within five minutes. Older, cheaper insulins take 30 to 40 minutes to lower blood-sugar levels. Patients who are switched from older to newer insulins without their knowledge may wait too long to eat, Dr. Nathan said.

"If their blood-sugar levels drop too low, they can become confused, lose coordination, lose consciousness and have seizures," Dr. Nathan said. "This can result in accidents and even death."

Drug makers routinely provide financial incentives to managed-care firms for greater sales, but providing similar incentives to pharmacy chains can raise legal and ethical questions in part because pharmacists' advice to patients, like that of doctors', is supposed to be based on the best interests of patients, not pharmacists.

Still, deals between drug makers and pharmacy chains are now routine. As part of these deals, drug companies pay pharmacy chains for drug promotions that can range from simple refill reminders to efforts to switch patients to higher-priced drugs. If sales then rise, payments can increase, said Jeffrey Krinsk, a lawyer in San Diego who specializes in suing over the deals.

The companies say that these arrangements benefit patients, but some pharmacy regulators disagree, saying the partnerships may result in prescriptions being switched inappropriately, hurting patients.

David R. Work, executive director of the North Carolina Board of Pharmacy, said that his board had tried unsuccessfully to restrict such deals, one of the few boards to make such an effort. The practice of pharmacy, like that of medicine, is regulated by state boards.

"These switches have nothing to do with patient interest, they're all about money," Mr. Work said.

Novo's marketing campaigns also highlight the conflicting loyalties of many health care professionals. Doctors and their staff often consult for or receive gifts from drug makers, which may affect prescribing decisions. Pharmacists sometimes suggest one drug over another to patients for financial, not medical, reasons, pharmacy regulators say.

In April 2004, Novo Nordisk sent information to its field managers and sales representatives about marketing guidelines issued by the federal government and by a trade association for the pharmaceutical industry.

After reviewing the guidelines, a Novo sales representative sent an e-mail message to Ms. Tolbert, the Novo district manager, asking, "Are we allowed to do the anchors in the office then?" Ms. Tolbert replied, "As far as I know, and in discussing it with other managers, we are allowed to compensate for patient education."

In March 2004, Ms. Tolbert sent an e-mail message to sales representatives describing the purpose of Novo's marketing efforts.

"Our goal is 50 or more scripts per week for each territory," Ms. Tolbert wrote, according to a copy of the message provided to The Times. "If you are not achieving this goal, ask yourself if those doctors that you have such great relationships with are being fair to you. Hold them accountable for all of the time, samples, lunches, dinners, programs and past preceptorships that you have provided or paid for and get the business!! You can do it!!""

Preceptorships are consulting arrangements with doctors.

After Novo announced its partnership with Rite Aid in March 2002, Ms. Jackson, the Novo spokeswoman, was quoted in Diabetes Health magazine explaining that Rite Aid pharmacists "will actively intervene to introduce Novo Nordisk products."

Novo Nordisk produces a variety of insulin products, including preloaded syringes and synthetic versions. These products are often more convenient to use but are also more expensive than standard insulin. Since diabetes is a difficult disease to manage, convenience is important. But some doctors question whether the convenience of the new products is worth the premium prices.

One Pharmacist's Role

Lawrence M. Schultz, a Rite Aid pharmacist in Maryland, was paid by Novo to identify diabetics from databases in Rite Aid pharmacies, according to the three former Novo sales representatives.

Mr. Schultz or a pharmacy technician then contacted doctors to persuade them to switch their patients to higher-priced insulin products, according to the three former sales representatives. It is not known why doctors agreed to the changes, but the sales representatives say that they may have assumed the switch was required under the patient's insurance policy.

Two former sales representatives who contracted with Mr. Schultz and hired "anchors" say that Mr. Schultz, doctors' assistants and others told them that patients often only became aware that their prescriptions had been switched to a different insulin when they arrived at the pharmacy to pick up their medicines. The sales representatives said they knew of no patients who were directly harmed by these surprise switches.

Ms. Rugen of Rite Aid acknowledged that Rite Aid has a partnership with Novo but says that "no official at Rite Aid knew that Larry Schultz," the Rite Aid pharmacist, "was being paid by Novo Nordisk."

Mr. Schultz confirmed that he had "pushed Novo Nordisk" products. He refused to give details, but said: "Everything I did was done completely ethically. The one thing I would never do is put my job, or Rite Aid, in jeopardy."

Three Novo sales representatives who described Mr. Schultz's efforts on their behalf said they knew of no other Rite Aid pharmacist who received payments directly from Novo. But internal documents from Rite Aid provided to The Times show that Rite Aid executives urged pharmacists throughout the chain to dispense Novo products.

Rite Aid encouraged pharmacists to run computerized "drug utilization reports" to identify patients who could be switched, documents show.

Rite Aid had powerful financial incentives, documents show. In a letter to Rite Aid pharmacists in February 2005, top Rite Aid executives said, "Each Novo Nordisk product we dispense brings us 20 to 40 percent better profit margin." Moreover, they said, such sales add millions of dollars to Rite Aid's "bottom line."

Ms. Jackson, the Novo spokeswoman, said the company was "pursuing this matter with great urgency" and intended "to take remedial action in the event we find violations of our policies."

Carmen Catizone, executive director of the National Association of Boards of Pharmacy, said marketing deals between drug companies and pharmacy chains had often misled doctors and hurt patients. .

"We are opposed to plans where the financial interest of the manufacturer takes precedence over the patient's health," Mr. Catizone said. "To call a physician and say that we're changing a patient's medication and make it seem as if it's on behalf of the patient when it's actually part of this marketing deal is not right."

Ulster pilot off us no-fly suspect list; Lisburn man was grounded by Homeland Security

By Sean O'Driscoll in New Yorknewsdesk@belfasttelegraph.co.uk

A NORTHERN Ireland pilot who was banned from flying or sitting as a passenger on US planes has had his name lifted from the Department of Homeland Security's terrorist no-fly list.

Robert Gray (34) from Lisburn, had been unable to travel back to Northern Ireland to visit his seriously ill mother, Valerie, despite having previously piloted planes that carried Senator Ted Kennedy, Congressman William Delahunt and other US politicians.

Mr Gray was expected to start flying again this week after completing a medical exam.

The Police Service of Northern Ireland accept that he has never had links to paramilitary groups and he previously passed a US airline background check.

Mr Gray, a pilot with Massachusetts airline Cape Air went to court last July to fight his exclusion. The American Council for Civil Liberties took up the case, arguing that Gray was a victim of mistaken identity and that his constitutional rights were being violated.

His Boston-based ACLU\l "I" lawyer, Sarah Wunsch, said yesterday that the case had not been officially settled but it was a "very good sign" that he was being allowed to work again.

"They told his employers before they told us, but if he's allowed to fly I think that's a good indication that he is not a threat to national security," Ms Wunsch added.

Mr Gray's legal nightmare began in January of last year when he applied for a licence to fly a larger plane.

However, the Department of Homeland Security's Transport Security Authority replied in writing that it believed his was "a threat to aviation or national security."

Mr Gray had wanted to return to Northern Ireland to visit his mother, Valerie, who is in very poor health.

He has lived in the US since 1993 and has permanent legal resident status.

A heavily edited copy of his Transport Security Administration files lists his ethnicity as Hispanic, which the ACLU\l "I" said was a clear indication that the Government has confused Gray with a terror suspect.

When he launched his legal suit\l "I" in September, his fiancee, Joy Valante, cried as she told reporters at the courtroom that the couple were planning to get married but Mr Gray was not allowed to fly to their honeymoon in Tuscany, Italy.

Mr Gray said at the time that the case was "like something from the McCarthy era", referring to the anti-communist witch hunt by Senator Joe McCarthy in America in the 1950s.

Ironically, Mr Gray's former passenger, Senator Ted Kennedy, has also complained that he spent months on the no-fly suspect list after his name was confused with an Irish republican who travelled under a similar name.

While Senator Kennedy faced long delays while his name was on the list, Mr Gray was unable to work or fly as a passenger.

In an affidavit filed at the Federal District Court in Boston, he said that he would not have been able to return to Belfast before his mother died.

Mr Gray had sued both the Transportation Security Administration and the Department of Homeland Security, claiming that his constitutional rights had been violated.

Mr Gray's legal case was backed by the American Council for Civil Liberties.

Date set for hearing on Google data-sharing

Mercury News Wire Services

A federal judge in San Jose has scheduled a Feb. 27 hearing to examine Google's decision to withhold online search records from the U.S. Justice Department.

The hearing, to be held in U.S. District Court, will be the first in the high-profile case. The Justice Department is seeking to force the Mountain View company to comply with a subpoena seeking 1 million Web site addresses reached from Google and one week of search queries.

In an interview this week with Bloomberg News, Google co-founder Sergey Brin said the Mountain View Internet company will fight the U.S. government for as long as it takes to avoid handing over information on user searches.

"It's our obligation to use the law to the farthest possible means to protect our users' privacy," Brin said Thursday at the World Economic Forum in Davos, Switzerland. "It's just a legal and ethical principle."

The Justice Department is seeking to use the information to defend the federal Child Online Protection Act, designed to keep children from sexually explicit material on the Internet. The law has been challenged by the American Civil Liberties Union as a violation of free-speech rights in the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution.

Yahoo, Microsoft and America Online have already turned over information sought by the government, at least in part.

"I don't think we like the precedent of it, and so we're fighting it," Brin said. "I think we're right."

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said Jan. 20 that the government will continue to press Google to turn over the information. He said the request isn't an invasion of privacy and will help fight Internet pornography.

"We're not asking for any personal information," said Charles\l "l" Miller\l "l", a Justice\l "l" Department\l "l" spokesman, adding that the department is pressing ahead with its case.

In the Bloomberg interview, Brin also said Google's decision to release a censored search engine in China came after years of consideration.

"This was a decision we reached after a number of years speaking to the human rights groups, and specifically people who really cared about China on human rights," Brin said. "I understand why other people might have other views."

Google this week said it planned to release a version of its Internet search engine in China that excludes some sites restricted by the Chinese government.

Is a BlackBerry blackout likely? Most experts say no; patent fight over e-mail device is at key phase here next month

BY JEFFREY KELLEY

TIMES-DISPATCH STAFF WRITER

Inside the stone walls of the federal courthouse in downtown Richmond rests the threat, though perhaps a small one, of a blackout on the BlackBerry wireless e-mail gadgets.

The East Main Street building has taken the national spotlight with a patent-infringement case that could affect the fate of the popular hand-held device.

"Our initial reaction was there was some concern about service going down because we are dependent on [the BlackBerry] at this point," said David Fratkin, president of Richmond-based Dominion Payroll Services LLC. But he said he is not worried.

Nor is Todd Whitlock, principal at the small Richmond IT support firm The HelpDesk Co., who uses the BlackBerry to keep in touch with clients. Or Craig Robinson, a Chesterfield County resident who uses the device to keep in touch with friends and family.

Research In Motion Ltd., the Canadian-based maker of BlackBerry, has said it has a workaround should the company be forced to shut down its U.S. service. Still, U.S. corporations, governments and regular users of the BlackBerry are watching the case closely.

The duel between RIM and NTP Inc., a patent-holding firm based in Arlington County, could come to a head next month. A Feb. 24 hearing before U.S. District Judge James R. Spencer, who is overseeing the case, could influence BlackBerry's destiny -- or at least the way the fight will be settled.

Though the judge could decide to cut off service to about 3 million U.S. BlackBerry users, experts do not think that will happen.

"The likelihood of the BlackBerry getting shut down is very slim, certainly less than a 10 percent chance," said Todd Kort, principal analyst at research firm Gartner Inc.

"Hopefully it won't come to that, but maybe [BlackBerry users] should be mildly concerned," said Carl Tobias, a University of Richmond law professor specializing in patent litigation.

He said a decision won't necessarily be made on Feb. 24, and the judge has some time to consider the case before writing an opinion. Spencer also could ask the two sides to continue trying to find a solution.

RIM and NTP have been battling since 2001. The Virginia company says the BlackBerry maker infringed on several patents related to wireless messaging. In late 2002, a federal jury in Richmond agreed with NTP, and the companies have been tied up in appeals since.

RIM tried to get its case heard by the U.S. Supreme Court, which this month denied its petition. The Waterloo, Ontario-based company wanted a review to determine whether U.S. patent laws extend beyond national borders.

The BlackBerry was introduced in early 1999 as a way to access e-mail and keep the day's tasks in line while on the go. The palm-size device has been a hit not only with New York's Wall Street types but Richmond's James Center ones. And don't count out the folks who hang around Capitol Square.

"The BlackBerry better organizes me, better prepares me for my day-to-day work," said Judith G. Napier, Virginia's assistant secretary of technology, who has used the device for nearly four years. Before then, "I was just sort of [an] office paper person."

There are roughly 1,000 BlackBerrys being used across the Virginia government's executive branch and by key officials within the state higher education system, said Lemuel C. Stewart Jr., the state's chief information officer and head of the Virginia Information Technologies Agency.

He handles about 250 e-mails a day and attempts to monitor his use "because your thumbs get a little numbish" typing on the tiny keyboard.

In court filings, NTP has said an injunction would not apply to members of federal, state and local governments or emergency workers.

But RIM has said it has no way of creating a "white list" to ensure that BlackBerry service for the roughly 1 million government officials and first-responders in the United States would continue. It said NTP's theory that an exception can be made for the group "is both unsupported and contrary to reality," according to court documents.

NTP has said it would ask the court to give BlackBerry users 30 days to find alternatives.

But they are by far the most popular of the wireless e-mail devices, holding more than half the U.S. market and still growing, Gartner's Kort said. Behind BlackBerry is chief rival Palm Inc.'s Treo.

Many other RIM competitors have been touting their products and services as worthy alternatives in the event of a blackout.

The Richmond suit is playing out against the backdrop of a case before the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office, which is re-examining the disputed patents and could rule in favor of the BlackBerry maker, according to court documents and published reports.

But a conclusion from the patent office could come around the end of the year, and Spencer is unlikely to wait for a response from the patent office, Kort said.

Royalty payments are the likely outcome of the dispute between RIM and NTP, said Don Murtaugh, senior business consultant at Richmond-based Core Consulting.

"If the patent office does not overturn the patents, then Research In Motion will pay royalties as a percentage of U.S.-based revenues, and users will be unaffected for the most part," Murtaugh said as a likely outcome. "It will be the shareholders in Research In Motion who will see the drop in earnings."

But he did note that payments could push service fees higher for BlackBerry users.

Sam Young, chief operating officer at Richmond tech consultancy Astyra Corp., notes that the BlackBerry case should serve as a lesson for firms to keep contingency plans in place for essential business tech gear.

"Companies should be prepared to educate [BlackBerry] users on alternative methods to get their e-mail, or even have other devices available to the users in the event that there's some sort of shutdown of service," he said.

Victories for prosecutors; A former official at a key maker of submarine valves is sent to prison for his role in the fraud.

BY PETER DUJARDIN

A former high-ranking official at a supplier of valves for nuclear-powered Navy submarines has been sentenced to two years in prison for falsifying quality-control documents about the valves'

January 28, 2006 Larry Kelly, once the vice president at Hunt Valve, of Salem, Ohio, was also ordered to three additional years of supervised release and ordered to pay $4.2 million, the Justice Department said.

Kelly, 52, who now lives in Arlington, Tenn., had pleaded guilty in April as part of an agreement with the government: He admitted to one count of conspiring to defraud the government and obtaining money illegally by providing false certifications on the valves.

Hunt Valve has supplied thousands of critical valves over the years for submarines built at Northrop Grumman Newport News, including Los Angeles-class and Virginia-class submarines. It also supplies some valves for aircraft carriers.

The charge against Kelly pertained to a wide-ranging fraud conspiracy. One accuses him of participating in a scheme in which Hunt workers scanned documents into a computer and altered them - to make it look as if steel components were heat-tested even though they never were.

"The falsified certificate was printed out and inserted into Hunt Valve's certification package for that valve, which was delivered to the Navy," a grand jury indictment had said.

A press release issued by the U.S. Attorney's Office for the Northern District of Ohio adds that on some tests some of the fraudulent certificates were "faxed from one fax machine to another in the same building to make the document appear fuzzy in an attempt to conceal the falsification."

Kelly did not return a phone call seeking comment.

In a plea agreement, Kelly agreed to cooperate in the continuing case in exchange for a recommendation for a lesser sentence, said Richard H. Blake, the U.S. Attorney handing the case.

"Had he gone to trial and been convicted, he would have likely faced four to five years under the (sentencing) guidelines," Blake said. "Kelly has agreed to cooperate with the government's ongoing investigation and will testify if need be."

Blake said the Justice Department's case is continuing to build against other officials.

In another plea agreement in June, Wayne Aldrich, a former quality assurance manager at Hunt Valve, was sentenced to 33 months in prison.

Like Kelly, he was also ordered to pay $4.2 million, the cost of the government's investigation into the case.

Though Kelly and Aldrich will likely never pay close to those amounts, they will likely have to pay at least 10 percent of their income to the government for many years. The criminal investigation began in early 2001, when a whistleblower complained about practices at Hunt, and a government investigation ensued.

The case is related to a separate civil lawsuit that was brought against Hunt Valve, General Dynamics Electric Boat and Northrop Grumman Newport News, among others.

Electric Boat, Newport News shipyard and the other defendants agreed in October to a $13.2 million settlement of a lawsuit brought by the whistleblower, brought under the False Claims Act.

The suit had accused the two shipyards of failing in their duty to uncover - and stop - obvious quality and fraud problems at Hunt. Under the terms of the deal, Electric Boat paid $7.7 million and forgave $630,000 in expected bills to the government. The Newport News shipyard paid $3 million and gave up on $1.2 million it once planned to charge the government for work investigating complaints into the valves.

Idaho Downwinders Hold Vigil On Statehouse Steps

By Sarah Dallof

Boise -A vigil was held Friday night on the steps of the Idaho Statehouse to mark the 55th anniversary of the first nuclear test conducted at the Nevada Test Site.

About 30 members of the group Idaho Downwinders and their supporters attended the vigil. They carried signs and photographs of loved ones who have passed away from illnesses they say were caused by nuclear fallout from the tests

Since the testing, four Idaho counties have reported unusually high cases of thyroid cancer. However, the area doesn't fall within guidelines for the Radiation Exposure Compensation Act.

Emmett native Dave Vahlberg who fought testicular cancer several years ago says time is running out for his loved ones and it's time to change RECA guidelines.

"The tragedy is terrible to behold, terrible to watch," he tells Local 2 News. "There are so many people that need assistance, health clinics, something to help.We need help."

Idaho senators Mike Crapo and Larry Craig and a Montana Senator began pushing legislation in May to make downwinders in both states eligible for compensation. The bill is waiting for a first reading by the judiciary committee.

Black Farmers Urged To Join Suit

The executive director of the Black Farmers and Agriculturalists Association is urging Arkansas farmers to sign on as participants in a discrimination lawsuit.

The suit was discussed Saturday at Pine Bluff during a meeting sponsored by the group's Arkansas chapter. Executive Director Fernando Burkett provided information about the Pigford versus Johanns lawsuit.

Thousands of black farmers claimed in the class-action lawsuit that they were routinely denied loans because of their race. As part of a settlement, the U.S. Department of Agriculture agreed to allow farmers to obtain a $50,000 settlement in cases where the government determined discrimination has occurred.

Burkett said many people were not aware of the 1999 lawsuit or were unable to participate. He asked those at the meeting to complete forms that would provide Burkett with information he needs to continue working on the suit.

Commentary: The Supreme Court's Surprisingly Unanimous Abortion Decision: A Parting Gift for Justice O'Connor?

By MICHAEL C. DORF

In what will likely be the last opinion she authors for the Supreme Court, Justice Sandra Day O'Connor recently announced a surprisingly unanimous decision in an abortion case. In Ayotte v. Planned Parenthood of Northern New England, the Court invalidated a New Hampshire law requiring minors seeking abortions to notify their parents. The law was deemed unconstitutional because it failed to include an exception for circumstances in which a serious but non-life-threatening medical emergency requires an immediate abortion.

Ayotte is the first unanimous abortion decision since the 1973 ruling in Roe v. Wade, which itself was 7-2. Some of the Court's most important abortion rulings, including the 2000 decision striking down Nebraska's "partial-birth" abortion ban in Stenberg v. Carhart, were decided by a 5-4 margin.

So what accounts for the Court's unanimity in Ayotte? And what, if anything, does the case portend for future abortion rulings?

A Decision to Fight Another Day?

Justice O'Connor's Ayotte opinion begins with a declaration that not much is at stake in the case: "We do not revisit our abortion precedents today," she explains. Perhaps therein lies the reason for the Court's agreement. The case did not present the opportunity to revisit the foundational question of whether the state can restrict abortion.

But this explanation raises further questions. If the Justices who have dissented from prior abortion rulings--most notably, Justices Scalia and Thomas--were accepting the authority of Roe and other precedents only because the parties in Ayotte had not pressed an argument for overruling those other precedents, why didn't they say so?

In other areas of the law, Justice Thomas in particular has frequently written separate opinions explaining that he was accepting a line of precedent in a particular case because neither party had challenged that precedent, but that he would be sympathetic to overruling the underlying precedents in a future case, if the Court were asked to do so.

Furthermore, Justice Scalia has consistently argued that the Court's abortion precedents are not merely wrong, but wholly illegitimate--exceeding the Court's proper role in our constitutional system. So why did he and Justice Thomas keep silent in Ayotte?

One possibility is that they were doing a favor to Chief Justice Roberts by permitting him to avoid having to take a stand on Roe so early in his tenure. Suppose Justice Scalia or Thomas had written either a dissent or a concurring opinion explaining that he disagreed with Roe but was going along with the majority in this case. In that event, Chief Justice Roberts would have faced a difficult choice: On the one hand, if he joined the separate Scalia/Thomas opinion, he would be signaling a willingness to overturn Roe. On the other hand, if he did not join such a separate statement, he would be signaling a willingness to join the majority in preserving Roe. By remaining silent, Justices Scalia and Thomas spared Chief Justice Roberts the obligation to "out" himself, one way or the other, on abortion--thereby allowing him to send no signal at all.

Column continues below ↓

Here's another possible explanation for the silence of Justice Scalia and Thomas: Perhaps they were making a gesture of goodwill to their retiring colleague. As a matter of tradition, a new Justice's first opinion for the Court is typically a unanimous ruling (a tradition carried out recently when Chief Justice Roberts handed down his first opinion). Perhaps Justice O'Connor's colleagues decided to extend the tradition to a final opinion as well.

Of course, such traditions do not require any Justice to vote against his or her conscience. But they do suggest ways for the Chief Justice to assign writing duties, as among the Justices. And they also suggest that, if an opinion has the potential to be unanimous, Justices may want to refrain from sowing divisions.

Accordingly, there is nothing intellectually dishonest about suppressing disagreement on tangential issues for the sake of unanimity on the main issue. After all, no one familiar with the prior writings of Justices Scalia and Thomas could reasonably think that by silently signing on to Justice O'Connor's Ayotte ruling, they were somehow saying that they had changed their minds about Roe v. Wade. That issue, everyone well knew, would remain open for future cases.

The Puzzling Votes of the "Persistent Dissenters"

The notion that the unanimity of Ayotte was a housewarming gift for Chief Justice Roberts or a parting gift to Justice O'Connor is implausible, however, because it doesn't explain the votes of Justices Scalia and Thomas. By contrast with other issues as to which Justice Thomas has signaled a willingness to re-examine a past precedent, on abortion, he and Justice Scalia have been persistent dissenters.

On most issues, a Justice who dissents from an initial ruling eventually comes to accept that ruling as more or less settled, and applies it. The originally dissenting Justice may apply the precedent narrowly, in an effort to avoid expanding it. She may even be willing to overturn the ruling from which she originally dissented when the Court's personnel change, or when one or more colleagues has a change of heart. But in the meantime, in the ordinary course, the Justice applies the precedent, notwithstanding her prior dissent.

In some circumstances, however, Justices persistently dissent. They refuse to accept a line of cases because they believe it to be not merely wrong, but profoundly wrong, illegitimate, and/or immoral.

Most famously, the late Justices Brennan and Marshall persistently dissented from the Court's decisions upholding the death penalty. They believed that capital punishment is cruel and unusual in all circumstances, and they refused to go along with the rulings that said it wasn't. Their persistent dissents even extended to decisions denying petitions for Supreme Court review, which are typically announced summarily, without any written opinion. In case after case, Justices Brennan and Marshall voted to stay executions, and reiterated their dissent in the pages of the U.S. Reports.

Similarly, Justices Scalia and Thomas have been persistent dissenters in abortion cases. Nothing whatsoever in anything either of them has written since taking a seat on the high court suggests a willingness to apply, rather than to overrule, the Court's abortion doctrine.

Yet in voting as they did in Ayotte, Justices Scalia and Thomas applied Roe and subsequent precedents. The decision holds that a parental notification law is invalid if it does not contain a health emergency exception. That is a fairly straightforward application of Roe, so why did Justices Scalia and Thomas go along?

Did Scalia and Thomas Simply Agree on the Merits?

The best explanation for their votes may be that they thought the New Hampshire law actually was unconstitutional, though on much narrower grounds than Justice O'Connor and others thought. For Justices Scalia and Thomas, Ayotte may not have been a case about abortion at all, but a case about health more broadly.

Remember, the case was about a particularly rigid statute that forced a young girl to continue a pregnancy until her parents could be notified or a court convened, even in a medical emergency, as long as a doctor predicted she would barely survive. One need not be a supporter of abortion rights to find such a plight unacceptable. A hypothetical case will illustrate what I have in mind.

Suppose that a state has a law requiring that before performing any surgery on a minor, a doctor must ensure that the minor has notified her parents of her plan. Suppose further that, just like New Hampshire's abortion law, the surgery notification law contains an exception for surgery that is necessary to save the minor's life, but contains no exception for non-life-threatening health emergencies. Finally, suppose a minor breaks her leg while skiing in a remote mountain village and that the attending physician cannot reach either the minor's parents or a judge (who, as in the actual New Hampshire abortion law, could legally authorize the doctor to go forward under the surgery notification law). If the doctor's best medical judgment were that surgery needed to be performed immediately or else the minor's leg would need to be amputated, does the Constitution permit the doctor to be prosecuted for taking this limb-saving measure?

I have little doubt that a majority of the Supreme Court would say that enforcing the surgery notification law under these circumstances would be unconstitutional. The law is generally valid. In general, the state is entitled to say that parents should be consulted about surgery for their minor children. But where immediate surgery is necessary to avert a serious threat to health, it is patently unreasonable for the law to insist on parental notification. The girl has a constitutional right to be free of state regulation that effectively subjects her to a serious risk of losing a limb.

Whether Justices Scalia and Thomas would agree with this line of analysis is unclear. They have sometimes suggested that the legal doctrine that I have tacitly employed here--what constitutional lawyers call "substantive due process"--is wholly illegitimate. But I suspect that nonetheless they would find a way to avoid the monstrous result that a state can require a minor to forfeit a limb for no good reason.

Justice Scalia once described himself as a "faint-hearted originalist," by which he meant that in cases in which enforcing the original understanding of the Constitution would lead to truly sickening results, he would abandon the original understanding. Perhaps he and Justice Thomas are likewise faint-hearted critics of substantive due process--both in my hypothetical case, and in the actual New Hampshire abortion case.

A Portent of a Messy Post-Roe Future

In his dissent from the 1992 ruling in Planned Parenthood v. Casey--in which a 5-4 Court reaffirmed what it called the "central holding" of Roe--Justice Scalia concluded his denunciation of the Court's abortion jurisprudence with a declaration that he and his fellow Justices "should get out of this area, where we have no right to be, and where we do neither ourselves nor the country any good by remaining." Yet, my analysis of Ayotte suggests that "getting out" is an impossibility. Even if the Court were to allow most regulations of abortion, hard questions would arise.

Suppose, for example, that a state abortion prohibition contained no exception for non-life-threatening health risks to an adult woman, rather than a minor. Would that law be invalid under the reasoning I have suggested was at work in Ayotte?

If not, what if an abortion prohibition contained no exception for life-threatening health risks? Could a state require a woman to obtain certification of a life-threatening condition from two doctors? From a state-appointed doctor?

What level of risk to life could a state insist that a woman accept before she would be permitted to obtain an abortion? One percent? Ten percent? Fifty percent?

And what about an exception for pregnancies that result from rape? In a post-Roe world, could a state simply prohibit these abortions? Could it make abortion available in such circumstances only upon a preliminary adjudication that a rape occurred? Only upon the filing of criminal charges by the woman?

It is simply naïve to think that the Court can "get out" of the abortion area by overruling Roe v. Wade, for thankfully--as Ayotte seems to demonstrate--even those Justices who believe that case was wrongly decided, are not completely devoid of sympathy for the people who would find themselves imperiled by the most extreme anti-abortion legislation.

It is likewise naïve to think that such legislation would not be enacted, were Roe to be overruled. The New Hampshire legislature that adopted the parental notification law struck down in Ayotte expressly considered and expressly rejected an exception for non-life-threatening health emergencies. They did so because they worried that a health exception would effectively undermine the prohibition, because of inherent ambiguities in the term "health."

That worry is not wholly without reason. In France, for example, abortion is nominally forbidden, but a woman may obtain an abortion during the first ten weeks of pregnancy by telling her doctor she is in "distress" (and complying with some procedural formalities). The distress exception means that early abortion is, in practice, widely available in France.

If Roe were overruled, it is likely that pro-life states would have even greater reason to worry that a health exception could swallow an abortion prohibition, and thus we could expect a string of cases challenging variously worded health exceptions.

A Procedural Compromise

Of course, we do not currently live in a post-Roe world. The Ayotte decision is meant to function in the here and now, and it treated the requirement of an exception for non-life-threatening health emergencies as a mere starting point. As I explained in a column following the oral argument in Ayotte, the rather technical issue in the case was what remedy, if any, the federal courts were empowered to grant.

The state argued that Planned Parenthood's challenge should be dismissed because the New Hampshire law was constitutional in nearly all of its applications--that is, in those cases in which the minor seeking an abortion did not face a health-but-not-life-threatening emergency necessitating an immediate abortion. Planned Parenthood argued that the failure of the legislature to include the health emergency exemption rendered the entire minor notification provision invalid.

The Court split the difference between these two polar views--the views that the statute should be upheld as is, and that it should be junked entirely. It sent the case back to the lower federal courts to address the "severability: issue--the question of how much of the statute, if any, can be salvaged in light of this unconstitutional aspect.

In reaching unanimity on a procedural ground for decision in Ayotte, the Justices forestalled but did not avoid a fight. With a decision on the validity of the partial-birth abortion ban looming for a Court that will almost certainly include Justice Alito in place of Justice O'Connor, the issue of abortion will not go away--regardless of Roe's ultimate fate.

Press Release: Holocaust Survivors to Receive Assistance from 'Hungarian Gold Train Funds Distributed by Claims Conference

NEW YORK, Jan. 30 NEW YORK, Jan. 30 /PRNewswire/ -- The first funds from a $25 million class-action settlement between Hungarian Holocaust survivors and the U.S. government have been distributed to social service agencies for the benefit of Hungarian survivors. The Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany (Claims Conference) allocated $4.2 million to 27 agencies in seven countries.

A list of agencies and guidance on obtaining assistance can be found at http://www.hungariangoldtrain.org and http://www.claimscon.org.

Each agency will have a Holocaust survivor advisory committee to assist in the distribution of the funds. This model has been used effectively by the Claims Conferences in the other social service programs for survivors that it funds.

The Settlement was approved in September 2005 by U.S. District Judge Patricia Seitz, concluding the lawsuit over the handling of property on the "Hungarian Gold\l "I" Train\l "I"." The Claims Conference allocated the funds in accordance with the court-approved plan it developed.

A total of approximately $21 million will be distributed to social service agencies over five years. Class Members (survivors included in the Settlement) who are eligible for social service assistance are Jews who were born before May 8, 1945 who lived in the 1944 borders of Greater Hungary some time between 1939 and 1945, and who are in need of financial assistance. The Settlement does not provide for direct payments to Class Members as compensation for property lost on the Hungarian Gold\l "I" Train\l "I".

The Hungarian Gold\l "I" Train\l "I" consisted of approximately 24 freight cars that contained personal property stolen or otherwise taken from Hungarian Jews during World War II by the Nazi regime and its collaborationist Hungarian government. The train came into the custody of the U.S. military in Austria at the conclusion of the war. The lawsuit alleged that the United States mishandled the contents of the train, but the United States denies any legal liability in the handling of the Hungarian Gold\l "I" Train\l "I" property.

The case, known as Rosner v. United States, was originally filed in May 2001 in the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of Florida.

The U.S. government will pay another $500,000 to create an archive of documents and materials relating to the Hungarian Gold\l "I" Train\l "I" and the looting of the Hungarian Jewish community. The archives will be available for scholarly research, educational purposes, class members' use, and for the benefit of future generations. In addition, the U.S. government represented that, to the best of its knowledge, all documents relating to the Gold\l "I" Train\l "I" have been declassified. If the government finds that there are documents that have not been declassified, it will review them to determine if they can be declassified.

Additional information about the Settlement is located at the website of the Hungarian Gold\l "I" Train\l "I" Settlement, http://www.HungarianGoldTrain.org, in several languages.

Class Members included in the Settlement and the heirs of Hungarian Jewish Nazi victims.

Judge Seitz approved the Settlement after a Fairness Hearing on September 26, at which class members were able to formally object. Class members were given notice in May 2005 about how to object to or exclude themselves from the Settlement.

Agencies Receiving Allocations from the Hungarian Gold\l "l" Train\l "l" Settlement Funds were distributed to social service institutions providing services to Jewish victims of Nazism

The Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany (Claims Conference) represents world Jewry in negotiating for compensation and restitution for victims of Nazi persecution and their heirs. The Claims Conference administers compensation funds, recovers unclaimed Jewish property, and allocates funds to institutions that provide social welfare services to Holocaust survivors and preserve the memory and lessons of the Shoah.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Feingold Claims Gonzales Misled Senate About Warrantless Wiretaps. The Washington Post (1/31, A7, Leonnig) reports, "Sen. Russell Feingold (D-Wis.) charged yesterday that Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales misled the Senate during his confirmation hearing a year ago when he appeared to try to avoid answering a question about whether the president could authorize warrantless wiretapping of U.S. citizens." The Post continues, "In a letter to the attorney general yesterday, Feingold demanded to know why Gonzales dismissed the senator's question about warrantless eavesdropping as a 'hypothetical situation' during a Senate Judiciary Committee hearing in January 2005. At the hearing, Feingold asked Gonzales where the president's authority ends and whether Gonzales believed the president could, for example, act in contravention of existing criminal laws and spy on U.S. citizens without a warrant. … Gonzales said that it was impossible to answer such a hypothetical question but that it was 'not the policy or the agenda of this president' to authorize actions that conflict with existing law. He added that he would hope to alert Congress if the president ever chose to authorize warrantless surveillance, according to a transcript of the hearing." The Post notes, "In fact, the president did secretly authorize the National Security Agency to begin warrantless monitoring of calls and e-mails between the United States and other nations soon after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. The program, publicly revealed in media reports last month, was unknown to Feingold and his staff at the time Feingold questioned Gonzales, according to a staff member. Feingold's aides developed the 2005 questions based on privacy advocates' concerns about broad interpretations of executive power."

NSA Surveillance Hearings Could Spur Action On Patriot Act Renewal. The Hill (1/31, Mikhail) reports, "If the White House and the GOP-led Congress do not strike a deal soon on reauthorizing the USA Patriot Act, President Bush's influence on the controversial bill could diminish after the Senate Judiciary Committee holds hearings on the nation's domestic surveillance program," which begin Monday. "The hearings are providing additional motivation for congressional Republicans to renew the Patriot Act by Feb. 3." The Hill notes, "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, who is scheduled to testify Monday, has stated that the president's constitutional powers and the congressional vote authorizing the use of force after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks validated the surveillance program." AEI resident scholar Norm Ornstein "said that the pressure on both the White House and Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist…to minimize the political damage stemming from the surveillance program could ensure renewal of the Patriot Act before Friday's deadline."

Pentagon Finding "Irregularities" In Suspicious Activity Database. The Washington Post (1/31, A6, Pincus, 744K) reports, "Pentagon officials say their newest intelligence agency, the Counterintelligence Field Activity, is finding 'irregularities' in about one of every 100 reports of suspicious activity that were entered into its database of possible terrorist threats to Defense Department personnel or facilities. … The Pentagon considers 'irregularities' to be reports involving people or groups that have remained in the database too long -- more than 90 days -- without being verified as representing real threats. In some cases, the review has shown they should not have been included in the first place. Defense officials declined to say how many Talon reports have been placed in the CIFA database, known as Cornerstone, or the number of improperly kept reports identified so far in the ongoing review." CIFA Director David A. Burtt II "said his staff members now review every Talon report that comes in. Those concerning demonstrators 'are out altogether...and we are double-checking all the others,' he said during a recent interview at his Crystal City office."

Newly-Released Zawahiri Tape Taunts Bush, Warns Of New Attack. The CBS Evening News (1/30, lead story, 3:00, Schieffer) reported, "It was a chilling moment and a day of chilling moments in the war on terror. Al Qaeda's number-two man Ayman al-Zawahiri showed up in one of the videotapes and on the eve of the President's State of the Union message called the President a butcher. And he reminded one and all that his leader Osama bin Laden is planning an attack on the United States. The very existence of this tape carried with it another message that al-Zawahiri is still alive and that when US forces attacked that village in Pakistan they did not get him." CBS (Stewart) added, "The voice was taunting, angry, and unmistakable. Within minutes of its release, US intelligence officials confirmed it was Ayman al-Zawahiri and it required no interpreter to tell he was hurling personal insults at the President of the United States."

ABC's World News Tonight (1/30, story 5, :45, Ross) reported, "The tape is authentic, featuring a feisty, and at times angry Zawahiri. In a straight tone, Zawahiri said God would determine when he died, not President Bush. 'If my time has not come,' he said, 'then you and all the forces on earth, all human beings cannot advance my fate by one second.' Zawahiri referred extensively to the January 13th US airstrike in Pakistan that was meant for him, but killed at least a dozen civilians and four of his closest deputies. 'My first message is to the butcher of Washington, Bush,' he said. 'Not only are you defeated, you're a liar and a failure,' he says. In a direct taunt to President Bush, Zawahiri says, 'Bush, do you know where I am? I am amidst the Muslim masses, enjoying their support, their care, their generosity, their protection.'"

NBC Nightly News (1/30, story 3, 2:00, Mitchell) reported, "Intelligence officials tell NBC News there is no obvious signal in the message to launch an attack. Instead, they see it as a propaganda campaign aimed at the American people and al Qaeda followers. Tonight, the White House said Zawahiri appears frustrated and angry. But many of the President's own terror experts disagree, telling NBC News it shows an al Qaeda leader more confident than ever."

Reuters (1/31) notes "the video mentioned a call for a truce issued by al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden in an audio tape Al Jazeera said was recorded in January." CNN's The Situation Room (1/30, Ensor) said that after the attempt to kill Zawahiri, al Qaeda wants to show "that they're still there, they're still capable of putting out pronouncements, they are still defiant of the United States and the international community. So in that sense, there's a propaganda victory for al Qaeda."

Knight Ridder (1/31, Allam) reports, "The message, part rallying cry for the Islamic world and part warning to the West, was the third al-Qaida message broadcast within a month. Intelligence analysts have said that the flurry of tapes could signal an impending attack but also could be a new propaganda campaign aimed not only at Muslim audiences, but also at Americans." The Los Angeles Times (1/31, Chen, 958K), New York Times (1/31, Fattah, 1.19M), Washington Post (1/31, A1, Whitlock, Pincus, 744K), Washington Times/AP (1/31, El-Majd) and AFP (1/31) run similar reports.

Al Arian Prosecutors To Seek Jurors Able To Process Complicated Evidence. The Tampa Tribune (1/31, Silvestrini) reports, "If Sami Al-Arian receives another trial, prosecutors want to make sure the jury is smart. After the government's failure to obtain convictions against Al-Arian and three co-defendants, critics theorized that the prosecution had put forth a case that was too long and complicated for jurors to understand. … Prosecutors on Monday submitted proposed changes to the questionnaire used to pick the first jury. Among changes suggested was a proposal to question potential jurors about whether they can process complicated evidence." The Tribune adds, "There has been speculation that a new team of prosecutors would be assembled for another trial. Monday's filing seems to indicate the same prosecutors…would continue with the case."

Israeli Woman Angry She Was Not Called To Testify About Daughter's Murder By PIJ. The St. Petersburg Times (1/30, Martin, Laughlin) reports, "Last summer, Miriam Ben-Ishai planned to testify at the trial of Sami Al-Arian" about "how she felt four years ago when she heard that an Islamic Jihad gunman had killed her 16-year-old daughter Shoshana." But "she got a call saying she would not be needed as a witness. Al-Arian had admitted his guilt, the Ben-Ishais say they were told. Not until Jan. 22…did Miriam Ben-Ishai learn that almost the opposite was true." The Ben-Ishais "are angry. They are convinced the jury might have decided differently if it had been allowed to hear about the family's grief. And they wonder how the U.S. government could have lost such an important case." The Tribune notes, "A few months after Shoshana's death, Isaac Ben-Ishai said, FBI agents interviewed him and his wife," and "agents visited the couple again in early 2003, about the time Ashcroft announced Al-Arian's indictment. Last February, Tampa's FBI office notified them by mail they were among potential witnesses in the trial due to start last spring. … Then someone…told them Al-Arian 'admitted being guilty' and Miriam would not have to testify. The confusion could have been due to the Ben-Ishais' unfamiliarity with legal terms. Soon after the trial began, lawyers for Al-Arian and three co-defendants agreed to a 'stipulation of fact:' Shoshana was killed by 'a person associated with the Palestinian Islamic Jihad.'" reports on its Web site, "The judge in the trial of alleged race hate cleric Abu Hamza al-Masri has dismissed conspiracy theories after he was burgled over the weekend. Mr Justice Hughes told the jury at the Old Bailey trial to forget newspaper reports about the incident," during which a laptop computer was stolen from his home. BBC adds, "In its closing speech, the defence said the prosecution had not proved that the cleric had incited anyone to murder. Defence counsel Edward Fitzgerald QC told the jury that the defendant's speeches may appear deeply offensive at times - but offensiveness did not make them a crime. … 'There was a wide gap between what he talked about as theoretically justified in principle and what he was actually asking his audience to do,'" Fitzgerald said.

Al Masri Trial Judge Downplays Burglary; Defense Makes Closing Statement. BBC (1/30)

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Flight Attendants Protest Lifting Of TSA Ban On Scissors. The Washington Times (1/31, Glanz, 90K) reports, "Flight attendants yesterday began a campaign to urge lawmakers to restore a ban that kept passengers from taking scissors and screwdrivers on airplanes." Members of the Association of Flight Attendants "were at Ronald Reagan Washington National Airport and 22 other US airports handing out leaflets to passengers outlining objections to the Transportation Security Administration's decision last month allowing scissors with blades up to 4 inches long on planes. … The TSA changed the list of prohibited items because the agency wants to spend more time searching for bombs." The Times adds, "The TSA has received support from airlines. The Air Transport Association, a trade group representing major carriers, said screeners should focus on weapons capable of causing the greatest damage." David Castelveter, a spokesman for the group, said, "We certainly respect the flight attendants' perspective on cabin safety, but it's not scissors that are bringing down airplanes today."

Bush To Nominate Basham To Head CBP. The Washington Times (1/31, Seper, 90K) reports, "President Bush will nominate two veteran federal law-enforcement officials to head US Customs and Border Protection (CBP) and the US Secret Service, key offices within the Department of Homeland Security. Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said W. Ralph Basham, the director and 29-year Secret Service veteran, will be named to serve as CBP commissioner, and Mark Sullivan, a 23-year Secret Service veteran, has been picked to head that agency." Chertoff said, "Both men are vastly experienced and highly decorated members of the federal law-enforcement community, who have each made significant contributions to our nation's security." I like that I messaged you from four feet away and James walked across the whole office.

The New York Times (1/31, Lipton, 1.19M) reports, "In the post, Mr. Basham would oversee more than 41,000 employees who patrol the nation's borders, inspect imported cargo and screen foreigners arriving at the nation's airports, seaports and land border posts. The agency also has more than 250 aircraft, the largest law enforcement air force in the world."

Expedited Removal Expanded To Northern Border. The Washington Times (1/31, 90K) reports, "The Department of Homeland Security yesterday announced the implementation of its 'expedited removal' program to include illegal aliens apprehended along the US-Canadian border and all US coastal areas. 'With the Secure Border Initiative, we made a commitment to implement new tactics throughout the US in order to gain control of our borders,' said Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff. 'We have seen success in deterring illegal border crossers since 'expedited removal' was implemented throughout the Southwest.'" Chertoff added, "Implementing this process along all borders will provide ... agents and officers with an additional tool to protect our nation's boundaries and quickly remove those who entered our country illegally."

Ohio Sheriff Bills DHS For Jailing Illegal Aliens. The Washington Times (1/31, Seper, 90K) reports Butler County, Ohio Sheriff Richard K. Jones "has billed the Department of Homeland Security $125,000 for the cost of jailing illegal aliens arrested on criminal charges in his county, saying he's angry that the federal government has failed in its responsibility to keep them out of the United States." He said yesterday "that although the government may not be legally obligated to pay the three bills he has sent since November, he intends to send similar ones every month until the federal government gains control of the border." Meanwhile, "US Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) spokesman Dean Boyd said the agency 'repeatedly reached out to the Butler County Sheriff's Department' and, on multiple occasions, offered ICE enforcement resources to the sheriff in addressing the illegal alien population in Butler County."

Experimental Ricin Vaccine Appears To Be Safe, Effective. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (1/31, Schmid) reports, "Initial tests indicate an experimental vaccine for ricin works and is safe, raising the possibility it might one day offer protection from a poison that authorities fear could be a weapon for terrorists." Ricin "has a long history of use in espionage. The FBI is investigating a pair of incidents involving the poison in 2003." The AP notes, "Researchers led by Dr. Ellen Vitetta of the University of Texas Southwestern Medical Center in Dallas found a way to modify the toxic sections of the ricin molecule to disrupt its poisonous effect. … Five volunteers given a high dose of the vaccine all developed antibodies to ricin, four of the five given a moderate dose developed antibodies, as did one of the five given a low dose."

Illinois Man Indicted On Charges Of Lying To FBI About Hoax Terror Attack. The Chicago Tribune (1/27, Bush, 643K) reported, "A man with a string of burglary convictions was indicted Thursday on charges of informing FBI agents about a planned terrorism attack that turned out to be a hoax." Gilbert Romero "was paroled from state prison in February. In June, he spun an elaborate and false story to the FBI about a planned terrorism attack on the headquarters of a U.S. company, according to the indictment. Romero told agents the attack was to be carried out by an individual who was recruiting other terrorists for a strike on U.S. soil, the indictment states." The Tribune added, "The hoax that Romero allegedly sketched out involved enormous violence. In addition to destroying the company with a fertilizer and fuel bomb, Romero told agents the terrorists would gun down any police officers who intervened, the indictment alleges." The Chicago Sun-Times (1/27, Pallasch) noted, "The threat came to light while Romero was an inmate at Cook County Jail, where he was sent after being picked up for burglary while on parole, authorities said. The FBI was notified that Romero claimed to have information on a plan to blow up a building, so agents came in to interview him, said Assistant U.S. Attorney Edward Siskel." The AP (1/27) also reported on the indictment.

FBI, DHS Find No Terror Connection To Smoke Plume Reported By Airliner. The AP (1/31, Marquez) reports, "Federal investigators have found no evidence of a terrorist connection to an American Airlines pilot's report of a plume of smoke…near Los Angeles International Airport last fall, the FBI and Homeland Security Department reported Monday. The Nov. 26 Los Angeles-to-Chicago flight was climbing at about 13,000 feet over the Pacific Ocean when the pilot spotted the plume…American Airlines spokesman John Hotard said." Hotard added, "At no time did he feel his flight was targeted." The AP notes, "After landing in Chicago, the pilot and a passenger were interviewed by FBI agents," and "FBI Special Agent Richard Kolko said the bureau found nothing to substantiate any threats from terrorists or others, though its inquiry remains open. Working theories speculate that the plume might have been a model rocket, a flare or something similarly innocuous, the FBI has said."

After Katrina, Interior Department Offered FEMA Emergency Relief Help. Numerous reports yesterday cited a recently released document in which the Interior Department claimed that its offers of aid to FEMA in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina were not taken advantage of. NBC Nightly News (1/30, story 7, 1:00, Williams) followed by offering "one more note on the aftermath of Katrina. … At Senate hearings today, there were more examples of the poor planning and communication that resulted in the chaotic response at all levels of government. One example: the Department of Interior had offered FEMA hundreds of boats, trucks and law enforcement personnel for search and rescue, but today a key FEMA official told the panel he was unaware of the offer until the Senate staffers showed him the relevant documents."

CNN's The Situation Room (1/30, Blitzer) reported, "Senators are reviewing new evidence that the Federal Emergency Management Agency or FEMA never accepted a critical and early offer of help. Documents obtained by CNN show the Interior Department offered resources to FEMA right after Katrina hit, including boats, water rescue personnel and helicopters. But the Interior Department says it wasn't called upon to help FEMA until late in September."

FEMA Official Says He Was Unaware Of Interior Department Offers. The AP (1/30, Jordan) reported, "At a hearing Monday , the chief of response operations at the Federal Emergency Management Agency told senators he was unaware that the Interior Department offered to send boats, planes, trucks and personnel to rescue Katrina's victims immediately after Katrina hit. 'Communications and coordination was lacking, preplanning was lacking,' FEMA official William Lokey testified."

Louisiana Pre-Katrina Emergency Preparedness Criticized. The Washington Post (1/31, A7, Hsu, 744K) reports, "Louisiana officials did virtually nothing to prepare to evacuate poor, sick or elderly people as required under a state emergency plan adopted months before Hurricane Katrina hit, according to newly released documents. State Transportation and Development Secretary Johnny B. Bradberry told Senate investigators that he was assigned the task in April, months before the Aug. 29 storm. But his department had no buses or drivers to execute the mission. 'We have done nothing to fulfill this responsibility,' Bradberry said, according to a transcript of a Dec. 21 deposition obtained by The Washington Post."

FEMA To House New Orleans Katrina Homeless In Apartments. USA Today (1/31, Konigsmark, 2.31M) reports, "The federal government, criticized for taking too long to provide trailers to those made homeless by Hurricane Katrina, will give some New Orleanians rent-free apartments instead. The Federal Emergency Management Agency plans this week to start housing displaced people in 325 apartments left empty when Katrina triggered a massive evacuation of the city. If the pilot program works, FEMA may house as many as 20,000 individuals and families in apartments. The apartments would be free for at least 18 months. … All of the apartments were storm-damaged but have or will be repaired before FEMA assigns them to people."

"Women Of The Storm" Call On Congress To Provide More For New Orleans. USA Today (1/31, Hall, 2.31M) reports, "Carrying umbrellas the same bright blue as the tarps that cover thousands of Katrina-ravaged homes, 140 women from the New Orleans area went to Capitol Hill on Monday and invited members of Congress to visit their ruined city. The 'Women of the Storm' said they wanted to pressure politicians to see the storm's devastation in person and send more recovery money south."

Katrina Donations Being Put To Use, But Progress Hard To See. NBC Nightly News (1/30, story 6, 2:00, Williams) reported on "the money trail after Katrina. Last week in the Ninth Ward neighborhood of New Orleans, so many people there told us it was as if it was the day after Katrina, because so little has been done. Many of the same Americans who gave so much money to charities after Katrina -- a record $3 billion -- are right about now wondering where it all went, and why more hasn't been done?" NBC (Myers) added, "Today in New Orleans, the Red Cross delivers food to devastated neighborhoods. Volunteers still are serving 14,000 meals a day. In Biloxi, Mississippi, today, storm victims stop by a Salvation Army center for free supplies, ranging from infant formula to clothing. So far, the Red Cross and five other charities have received the largest amount of donations, have spent 71% of the money collected. The largest single expense, financial aid for 1.3 million families, who received about $1,000 each. … The Bush-Clinton Katrina Fund says its money will go to the colleges and universities devastated by the storm, faith-based groups, and foundations dedicated to rebuilding the three states. But so far, little money from that fund has actually been dispersed because officials say they're waiting for requests. With all the devastation and so little visible progress, some argue that Americans who gave so generously should have gotten more for their money by now. Still, the reality is that the amount of money private charities have to spend on rebuilding at best a few hundred million dollars is a drop in the ocean. The federal government has designated $85 billion, and many believe even that won't be enough."

WAR NEWS:

Rice Pledges US Will Not Neglect Afghanistan. AFP (1/31) reports, "The United States vowed to avoid its past mistake of neglecting Afghanistan. … 'We made the mistake once before of leaving (neglecting) Afghanistan,' US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said during a press conference with Afghan President Hamid Karzai. Not only did Afghans pay the price of such a policy but also Americans who were attacked by the Afghanistan-based al-Qaeda terror network on September 11, 2001, she said. 'We're not going to make that mistake again' said Rice, standing beside Karzai."

New Compact Provides Framework For International Aid To Afghanistan. The New York Times (1/31, Gall, 1.19M) reports Afghanistan "is expected to sign an agreement for an ambitious five-year plan for social, economic and political change with more than 60 donor countries at a two-day donors' conference in London that begins Tuesday. Eager to secure an international commitment to Afghanistan's future…Karzai and his government have sought long-term strategic and economic agreements with the United States and the European Union. The plan, called the Afghan Compact, pledges development and changes to turn the country into a functioning democracy and an economically viable state. It would replace the United Nations-sponsored Bonn accords, which laid out the first political goals for a post-Taliban Afghanistan." Rice "is expected to announce a new pledge from the United States as Afghanistan's major donor at the conference in London, which is being led jointly by Prime Minister Tony Blair and Mr. Karzai."

The Washington Post (1/31, A12, Witte, 744K) reports Afghan officials "are expected to point to the progress that has begun to remake Afghanistan: new highways, disarmed militias, an elected president and parliament, and schools open to both boys and girls. But they will also need to respond to criticism from people…whose perception of a wide gap between promises and results is shared by many Afghans. Although billions of dollars have been spent, sentiment is growing that much of the aid has benefited officials and a small, wealthy elite, leaving scraps for the millions who remain in dire poverty. More than a third of rural families lack enough food for at least part of the year. Life expectancy is only 45; infant and maternal mortality are as high as in the poorest African countries. And the female literacy rate -- below 20 percent nationwide, less than 1 percent in some provinces -- remains the world's lowest."

US Looking For Increased Military Support From NATO In Afghanistan. The Christian Science Monitor (1/31, Winter, 61K) reports, "The United States, which is providing the bulk of the foreign aid and military muscle to Afghanistan, is hoping that more of the mission can be shouldered by the international community - particularly NATO members. It is the military component that may prove to be the most frustrating and troublesome for the US because at least one NATO ally is showing signs of reneging on its promise. … Canada is sending 1,250 troops to Kandahar Province next month. On Thursday the British government committed to sending 3,300 paratroopers to take over Helmand, a Taliban stronghold and the top poppy-producing province. However, Holland is rethinking its promise to replace US troops in Uruzgan. The Netherlands, a NATO signatory, has been slated to send up to 1,100 of its soldiers to Uruzgan, the home of Taliban leader Mullah Omar and one of the country's most dangerous provinces. Many Dutch parliamentarians are having second thoughts after watching Afghanistan experience a sharp rise in insurgent violence, that has claimed 1,600 lives - making last year the deadliest since the Taliban's ouster in 2001."

Iraqi National Security Advisor Predicts Most US Troops Will Be Gone In Two Years. The New York Times (1/31, Filkins, 1.19M) reports Mowaffak al-Rubaie, Iraq's national security adviser and the chairman of a joint Iraqi-American committee planning the transfer from American to Iraqi troops, "said the number of American and other foreign soldiers here would probably fall to below 100,000 by year's end and that an overwhelming majority could be out in two years. The statements…give the strongest indication yet that the Bush administration is preparing to carry out significant reductions in American forces over the current year. There are now about 160,000 foreign troops in Iraq, about 140,000 of them American." The Times continues, "In interviews, several State and Defense Department officials said the assessment by the Iraq and Afghanistan Joint Transition Planning Group was focused not on the timing of troop withdrawals but on the mechanics of making the switch from a large military presence to a more traditional relationship run by American Embassies, and how to do that while maintaining Washington's political leverage but at far less cost. Mr. Rubaie said that while there were plans for withdrawal, the timing of the reductions is contingent on conditions on the ground. … Adding, 'By the end of 2007, the overwhelming majority of the multinational forces will have left the country.'"

Iraq Reconstruction IG Blames Insurgency For Depressing Progress. The Wall Street Journal (1/31, Dreazen, 2.11M) reports, "Poor oversight and security woes are keeping Iraq's electricity, water and oil production far below prewar levels despite the infusion of billions of dollars in American money, according to a new audit by the Bush administration's Iraq rebuilding watchdog. The report by Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction Stuart Bowen raised questions about what shape Iraq will be in when the administration winds down its rebuilding effort later this year. According to the report, shortcomings were acute in the oil sector, the mainstay of Iraq's economy. Exports haven't come close to preinvasion predictions, the report said. … The report attributed many shortcomings to mismanagement, corruption and policy shifts that moved billions of dollars from rebuilding to tasks such as training Iraqi security forces. Those factors have created a 'reconstruction gap' between the number of projects originally planned and the number that will be carried out, with just 36% of the 136 water-related projects and 70% of the 425 electricity-related projects targeted for completion."

Asked on PBS' NewsHour (1/30, Ifill) to comment on the "reconstruction gap" he cites in his report, Bowen said, "The reason for the reconstruction gap. which is an observation of a reality, not an alarm bell, is the fact that we are confronting an insurgency that we didn't anticipate, at least the level of lethality. This is…a reconstruction program performed virtually under fire. And that's required reprogramming of money that was initially intended for reconstruction, for bricks and mortar, to security -- a reprogramming that I fully support. … The money that we've allocated for reconstruction is going to get the Iraqi system off to a good start towards rehabilitation."

Bowen Seeks Increased Infrastructure Spending. The Washington Post (1/31, A13, Finer, 744K) reports Bowen "has called for money beyond $18.4 billion originally earmarked, saying postwar funds will be exhausted by the end of 2006 with many projects likely to be unfinished. … 'The need for more funding has reached a critical point,' Bowen wrote. 'There is a compelling basis to increase support for sustainability.' The report, and an audit released separately by Bowen's office Monday, concluded that the uncertainty of funding that would allow projects to be continued and infrastructure maintained could disrupt a smooth transition if the United States hands off reconstruction responsibilities to the Iraqi government this year, as projected." The Post notes, "while foreign donors, along with the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank pledged more than $13 billion toward that effort during an October 2003 conference in Madrid on aid to Iraq, much of the money remains undelivered."

Bowen Challenges Reports Of "Pervasive Fraud." Asked if there is "an end in sight for the U.S. role in reconstruction," Bowen replied, "2006 will be a year of transition. Politically we've already seen that. Economically it's coming. We've announced an audit to look carefully at the transition planning by U.S. authorities in Iraq. … I believe that if pervasive fraud was present in Iraq, we would have identified it and brought it to light. But what we have in a chaotic environment, cash-heavy environment, a few bad actors that have sought to take advantage of a difficult situation."

Audit Finds US Contracting Procedures Proved Impractical In Iraq. The New York Times (1/31, Glanz, 1.19M) reports, "A sweeping examination of thousands of contracts that the United States underwrote with Iraqi money has provided the most comprehensive look yet at the confusion, waste and lack of accountability in rebuilding and training programs during the first years of the American-led occupation, say the Iraqi finance minister and a retired American officer who led an investigative arm of the audit. The effort, which is being undertaken by a contracting office in Baghdad that reports to the United States Army and which has not previously been disclosed, began in March 2005 and is close to completion. … The audit of about 9,000 contracts worth at least $5.8 billion in Iraqi oil money and assets seized from Saddam Hussein's government was undertaken to determine how much of the money originally set aside for the work should ultimately be paid." The examination "exposed a system riddled with problems, like projects that were assigned but never carried out and Iraqi subcontractors who did not know they had been awarded jobs, the American officer, Scott Meehan, a retired Army major, said yesterday." Ali Allawi, the Iraqi finance minister, "said the American administration brought with it a contracting procedure that may have worked in the orderly environment of the United States. 'Once you brought it in the context of Iraq,' Mr. Allawi said, 'it fell flat on its face.'"

Administration Expected To Request Additional $2 Billion For Reconstruction. The Washington Times (1/31, Scarborough, 90K) reports, "The Bush administration is considering asking Congress later this year for at least $2 billion in new reconstruction money, primarily for maintaining completed Iraqi facilities. Administration officials say the additional funding is needed to prevent completed projects in Iraq from falling into disrepair while the new government tries to establish a steady flow of revenue from oil and other sources to sustain the nation's infrastructure. … Congress already has approved $24 billion for Iraq reconstruction, and some speculated that the White House would not ask for more. But in recent weeks, it has become evident that Iraq does not have the financial ability to sustain all its new properties, said officials familiar with the internal discussions.

Poll Finds 47% Of Iraqis Approve Of Attacks On US Soldiers. Knight Ridder (1/31, Brown) reports, "A new poll found that nearly half of Iraqis approve of attacks on U.S.-led forces, and most favor setting a timetable for American troops to leave. … 47 percent of Iraqis approve of attacks on American forces, but there were large differences among ethnic and religious groups. Among Sunni Muslims, 88 percent said they approved of the attacks. That approval was found among 41 percent of Shiite Muslims and 16 percent of Kurds. Ninety-three percent of Iraqis oppose violence against Iraqi security forces, and 99 percent oppose attacks on Iraqi civilians." Knight Ridder adds the poll "also found that 80 percent of Iraqis think the United States plans to maintain permanent bases in the country even if the newly elected Iraqi government asks American forces to leave. Researchers found a link between support for attacks and the belief among Iraqis that the United States intends to keep a permanent military presence in the country. … Only 39 percent of Iraqis surveyed thought that Iraqi police and army forces were strong enough to deal with the security challenges on their own, while 59 percent thought Iraq still needed the help of military forces from other countries. Seventy percent of Iraqis favor setting a timetable for U.S. forces to withdraw, with half of those favoring a withdrawal within six months and the other half favoring a withdrawal over two years." The poll "was to be published Tuesday by WorldPublicOpinion.org, a Web site that reports on public opinion from around the globe. The survey was conducted Jan. 2-5, with a nationwide sample of 1,150 Iraqis from country's main religious and ethnic sects."

Anti-IED Efforts Have Become To Priority For US Military. ABC's World News Tonight (1/30, story 3, 2:00, Vargas) reported IEDs are the "single-greatest cause of death of soldiers inside Iraq. Last year, insurgents fired off 10,000 of these. Ending roadside bombings is now a primary mission of the American military. … The Pentagon has created a $3.5 billion IED task force. … Insurgents have grown increasingly creative in hiding the IEDs, hiding them in garbage, potholes, and fake concrete blocks. They can use cell phones, children's toys and walkie-talkies to set them off. The military has developed high-tech tools, from small robots to a massive, new mine sweeper called the 'Buffalo' to try to clear away IEDS. But the task force's most important work is forensic investigation, piecing together bomb fragments, searching for clues about who is making them."

The Christian Science Monitor (1/31, Sappenfield, 61K) reports, "One of the most dangerous places for US troops in Iraq is in their own trucks. … IEDs account for more than half of all American injuries or deaths in combat. The weapon is so primitive that military bomb-squad schools once saw them as little more than the work of kids and miscreants. Now, troops bolt extra armor to their Humvees, and new arrivals receive IED awareness training. Last week, the Pentagon even announced that its IED task force would become permanent, one of several recent moves that suggests the issue is becoming a greater priority."

New Polytrauma Centers Treat Wounded US Soldiers. The New York Times (1/31, Eckholm, 1.19M) reports, "Thousands of miles from the battlefield, intricate medical choices have become routine here, at one of four special rehabilitation centers the government created last year to treat the war's most catastrophically wounded troops. … With their concentrated batteries of specialists and therapists, these centers are developing a new model of advanced care, a response to the distinctive medical conundrum of the Iraq war. With better battlefield care and protective gear, the military is saving more of the wounded, yet the insurgents' heavy reliance on car bombs and buried explosives means the survivors are more damaged — and damaged in more different ways — than ever before. To describe the maimed survivors of this ugly new war, a graceless new word, polytrauma, has entered the medical lexicon. Each soldier arriving at Tampa's Polytrauma Rehabilitation Center, inside the giant veterans hospital, brings a whole world of injury. The typical patient…has head injuries, vision and hearing loss, nerve damage, multiple bone fractures, unhealed body wounds, infections and emotional or behavioral problems. Some have severed limbs or spinal cords."

ABC's Woodruff, Vogt Show Signs Of Improvement. ABC and NBC opened their nightly news broadcasts with updates on the condition of ABC anchor Bob Woodruff and cameraman Doug Vogt. ABC's World News Tonight (1/30, lead story, 3:20, Vargas) reported, "They are showing signs of improvement after suffering serious head injuries during a roadside bombing. Bob and Doug were evacuated by helicopter, reaching a hospital in the Green Zone 37 minutes after the blast. They were whisked by helicopter again, to the US military hospital, where they underwent surgery. Then, they were flown to the American military hospital in Landstuhl, Germany." ABC (Shud) added, "There were positive signs today. Bob responded to stimuli in his hands and feet, and briefly opened his eyes. I was able to meet and speak with Doug. He was awake, and alert, and joking. That gave us a chance to smile today."

The CBS Evening News (1/30, story 3, 2:00, Schieffer) reported, "According to sources inside ABC News and the military, Woodruff's brain is badly bruised in two places. Military physicians removed part of his skull to relieve the swelling. The explosion broke his collar bone, shoulder and at least a few ribs. Vogt suffered a fathered skull, pieces of shrapnel lodged in his head. … For journalists, Iraq has become the deadliest war ever: at least 61 killed in just under four years, compared to 66 killed in the 20 years of Vietnam."

NBC Nightly News (1/30, lead story, 2:30, Maceda) reported, "Landstuhl Hospital outside Frankfurt, one of the US's largest. Inside, Bob Woodruff and Doug Vogt are under heavy sedation in the intensive care unit, in stable but serious condition. … Woodruff and Vogt were wearing protective armor, and helmets. Doctors here say it probably saved their lives."

The New York Times (1/31, Landler, 1.19M) reports, "The explosion occurred as Mr. Woodruff and Mr. Vogt were riding in the Iraqi vehicle near Taji, a tense area northwest of Baghdad. They had been part of a news team accompanying units of the Fourth Infantry Division and had initially traveled in a United States Army armored Humvee. Before the attack, they switched to the more lightly armored Iraqi vehicle, the network reported."

The Los Angeles Times (1/31, Gold, Moore, 958K) reports Lt. Col. Barry Johnson, a U.S. military spokesman, "said he knew of no other casualties in the attack."

The USA Today (1/31, Johnson, 2.31M) reports ABC News says the weekend attack…will not derail any of its game plans for World News Tonight, including sending its anchors to hot spots to cover the news."

Military Field Hospital Played Vital Role. ABC and NBC both followed with reports on field hospitals in Iraq. ABC's World News Tonight (1/30, story 2, 2:00, Vargas) reported, "The US military hospital in Balad played a major role in keeping Bob alive. It is one of the most sophisticated battlefield hospitals ever created."

NBC Nightly News (1/30, story 2, 2:00, Miklaszewski) reported, "Military officials say it really is the best field hospital of its kind, performing brain surgery on an almost daily basis, with an overall survival rate of 96%."

ABC Upset By NYTimes Coverage Of Incident. The Washington Post's Howard Kurtz (1/31) writes, "ABC executives and journalists were angry about what they viewed as an insensitive front-page sub-headline in yesterday's New York Times that said, 'Field Reports Were a Ratings Strategy.' … Times Executive Editor Bill Keller said yesterday that 'the subhead was a poor choice of words, and I called David Westin today to express our regrets.'"

Al Jazeera Airs Tape Of Tearful Carroll Calling For Release Of Female Prisoners.

Network news broadcasts juxtaposed al Jazeera's airing of a tape from Al Qaeda's Ayman al-Zawahiri with the release of a tape of freelance journalist Jill Carroll from captivity in Iraq; ABC linked the Carroll story to the story on the condition of its own injured journalists.

ABC's World News Tonight (1/30, story 4, :45, Vargas) reported, "There is news tonight about another journalist in Iraq," Jill Carroll. It is "difficult to hear what she is saying. But she is clearly crying." Al Jazeera "reported that she appealed for the release of all Iraqi women being held by US and Iraqi authorities."

The CBS Evening News (1/30, story 2, 2:00, Schieffer) reported, "It was a day for terrible tapes. The kidnappers of American reporter Jill Carroll released another videotape of her today." CBS (Palmer) added, "This second video from Carroll's captors broadcast on al Jazeera is dated January 28. In it, a tearful Carroll, wearing an Islamic head scarf, pleads for the release of all women prisoners in Iraq. This time she asks not only for those in US custody but those held by Iraq's Interior Ministry too. … It's believed there are seven women left in US custody, but it's not known how many may be in Iraqi jails. The Christian Science Monitor released a statement tonight saying that anyone with a heart would be distressed to see a young, innocent woman like Jill Carroll treated the way she was in that video and called on her captors to release her immediately into the protection of her family."

NBC Nightly News (1/30, story 3, 2:00, Williams) reported, "This was busy day on the Arab language cable television network al Jazeera. They aired two new videotapes of interest to Americans." NBC (Mitchell) added, "A weeping Jill Carroll, her head covered, appeared on al Jazeera and according to the network, pleaded for the release of all Iraqi women prisoners. Her voice can be heard only briefly under the voice of Al Jazeera saying 'hope for the families.' Why did the kidnappers release the tape?" John Brennan, former national counterterrorism center director: "It may be an attempt to show how powerful they are, but it does the exact opposite. What they've done is to prey upon an innocent American female journalist and to put her in front of a camera and to try to intimidate the administration and the American public."

The New York Times (1/31, Worth, 1.19M) reports Al Jazeera "The American military freed five Iraqi women from detention last week, but military officials said the decision had no relation to the kidnappers' demands."

The Washington Post (1/31, A12, Finer, 744K) notes, "Since her abduction, Iraqi politicians, representatives of news media and Islamic organizations, and members of her family have pleaded for her release."

Defense Lawyer Says Saddam Will Refuse To Appear In Court Tomorrow. The CBS Evening News (1/30, story 4, :45, Schieffer) was the only network news broadcast to report that "in Iraq today, Saddam Hussein's top defense lawyer said Saddam will refuse to appear in court on Wednesday when his trial is supposed to start up again. This follows an in-court shouting match yesterday between Saddam and the trial's new chief judge, who eventually ordered Saddam, another defendant, and a defense lawyer out of the room."

Australian PM Tied To Oil-For-Food-Scandal. The Financial Times (1/31, Tucker) reports, "The official investigation into whether Australia's monopoly wheat exporter paid A$300m ($225m) in bribes to Saddam Hussein's regime has unearthed evidence drawing John Howard, prime minister, into the alleged scandal for the first time. The Commission of Inquiry, which is probing allegations that AWB paid kickbacks to Iraq under the discredited United Nations oil-for-food programme, released a letter written by Mr Howard in which he sought to work 'closely' with the wheat exporter, just weeks before the company's chief executive visited Baghdad to negotiate illicit payments to the Saddam regime." Howard "wrote to Andrew Lindberg, AWB chief executive, in July 2002, as Iraq was threatening to cut imports of wheat from Australia. The letter ended: 'In view of the importance of the matter, I suggest the government and AWB remain in close contact in order that we can jointly attempt to achieve a satisfactory outcome in the longer term.' Soon after, Mr Lindberg went to Iraq accompanied by officials from Australia's Department of Foreign Affairs and Trade. According to evidence presented to the inquiry, it was during this visit that Mr Lindberg agreed to pay $2m to the Iraqi regime that was to be disguised in an inflated wheat contract."

Bird Flu Death In Iraq's Kurdish Region Confirmed. The New York Times (1/31, Rosenthal, 1.19M) reports, "A 15-year-old Iraqi girl has died of bird flu, Iraqi and international health officials said yesterday, indicating the arrival of the disease in another country — one that, in its war-torn state, may be ill prepared to control its spread. … The girl, Shengeen Abdul Qadr, died this month in Sulaimaniya, in the Kurdish region of northern Iraq, three days after touching a dead bird infected with the virus, the Iraqi health minister said yesterday. Her uncle, who died last week, is presumed to have succumbed to the disease as well, although test results are pending. A serious bird flu outbreak has killed four people and hundreds of thousands of birds in the Kurdish part of neighboring Turkey during the past six weeks. With trade routes for trucks and mules crisscrossing national borders in a large Kurdish area, health officials have been warning that it was only a matter of time before the virus spread."

Clinton Administration Defended Use Of Force Against Iraq. In its "History Lessons" column, the Washington Times (1/31, 90K) excerpts a February 16, 1999 Defense Department briefing during which Assistant Defense Secretary Kenneth Bacon was asked if the Clinton Administration planned to ask Congress for war powers permission. Bacon said, "Since 1991, we have flown tens of tens of thousands of sorties over Iraq to police the no-fly zone. In the overwhelming number of cases [the Iraqis] have not resisted or shown any signs of attacking coalition aircraft. Since the end of [Operation] Desert Fox in late December they have aggressively attacked U.S. aircraft. They have violated the no-fly zone. … They have turned on their radars; they have fired anti-aircraft batteries and also fired missiles at our planes over the last month and a half. We have responded properly against these attacks, and we will continue to respond properly against these attacks."

National Guard Reports Sharp Improvement In Recruiting. The New York Times/AP (1/31, Press) reports, "National Guard officials said Monday that recruiting had accelerated so much in recent months that they expected to expand the Guard even as the Bush administration proposes to shrink it. The National Guard Bureau, the Pentagon office that administers the Guard, issued a statement outlining a turnaround in recruiting and predicting that it would continue to rise this year. In the last quarter of 2005, the Guard signed up 13,466 recruits, above its goal of 12,605. It was the first time since 1993 that the Guard exceeded its goal in that period." The AP adds, "In his 2007 budget, to be sent to Congress on Feb. 6, President Bush would pay for a Guard of 333,000 soldiers; its Congressionally authorized limit is 350,000. Administration officials say that is not a cut, because the Guard now has 333,000 soldiers. On Monday, the Guard said it was 'aggressively working' to reach 350,000 troops by the end of the current budget year on Sept. 30."

Pentagon Wants To Cultivate New Breed Of Troops To Combat Terrorists. The Washington Times (1/31, Scarborough, 90K) reports, "The Pentagon wants the services to create a 'new breed of warrior' who can perform his own skill sets and take on the abilities of a special operation commando in fighting terrorists. A draft of the Defense Department's 2005 Quadrennial Defense Review (QDR) says these warriors will be 'able to move more easily between disparate mission sets while preserving their depth of skill in primary specialties. Future warriors will be as proficient in irregular operations, including counterinsurgency and stabilization operations, as they are today in high-intensity combat.' The move is an example of how the war to find and eliminate Islamic terrorists is permeating nearly every aspect of the Pentagon's long-range planning."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Jury Selected In Trial Of Ex-Enron Executives Lay, Skilling. Midway through their newscasts, all three networks reported on jury selection in the trial of ex-Enron executives Kenneth Lay and Jeffrey Skilling. ABC's World News Tonight (1/30, story 6, 2:00, Vargas) reported, "In Houston today, a jury was picked to try the men charged in one of the biggest corporate crime plots in history." Lay and Skilling "face 38 counts, including conspiracy and stock fraud." ABC (VonFremd) added, "Both the founder and former CEO of Enron walked the gauntlet of cameras today, accused of conspiracy in the biggest corporate scandal in American history. Is this a chance to clear your name?" Skilling: "It certainly is."

The CBS Evening News (1/30, story 6, 2:00, Cowan) added, "The tarnished brass once on top of Enron arrived looking nervous this morning, worried about finding 16 people in their hometown who don't hate them to the core. … Lay and Skilling are perhaps the most notorious men in Houston. Nearly 5,000 people lost their jobs when the energy giant collapsed. … Tomorrow, opening arguments begin. They are suspected to be just as fast as the jury selection, just six hours total."

NBC Nightly News (1/30, story 9, 2:00, Williams) reported, "Tonight in Houston, Texas, a jury has been seated" for the trial of "the two men who used to run Enron, and whose names may forever be synonymous with massive corporate fraud in which the victims were numerous small investors whose savings got wiped out." NBC (Thompson) asked, "Four years later, where are we in the fight against corporate crime? Stephen Cutler led the Security and Exchange Commission's enforcement division until last April, winning some $6 billion in penalties and return of ill-gotten gains as federal prosecutors racked up a string of high-profile convictions -- Worldcom CEO Bernie Ebbers, Adelphia founder John Rigas, and Martha Stewart. But Cutler, now in private practice, says the fight isn't over." Cutler "I think the vigilance that's required is akin to the sunscreen that you need to put on when you go to the beach, or the dental floss that you've got to use every day. You can't do it just once."

The Chicago Tribune (1/31, Lazaroff) reports, "For sheer emotion and spectacle, it should rank among the most gripping business-related trials in memory." The Tribune continues, "Opening arguments are scheduled to begin Tuesday in the prosecution of former Enron Corp. executives Kenneth Lay and Jeffrey Skilling, a day after a jury was seated." The Tribune adds, "Lay and Skilling, who were once celebrated in Houston and praised on Wall Street, are seeking to have their names cleared from the bankruptcy of an energy trading company that came to symbolize the greed and alleged dishonesty of an economic boom gone awry. … Enron investors and many of its 31,000 former employees are seeking retribution for money and pensions lost when the company's stock crashed in the fall of 2001 amid accusations of disguised loans, hidden debts and phony profits. … 'Enron is the last of the great scandals to go to trial,' said Charles M. Elson , director of the John L. Weinberg Center for Corporate Governance at the University of Delaware. 'It's basically the final chapter of the story of corporate scandals from the boom of the late-1990s.'" The Tribune notes, "In a process that took much of the day at Bob Casey U.S. Court House in downtown Houston, a jury of eight women and four men was selected to hear a trial that U.S. District Judge Sim Lake said should take less than four months. Lake emphasized to potential juror that the trial was a legal proceeding and not an opportunity to redress the losses suffered by former Enron employees. At the same time, he disregarded arguments by the defendants' lawyers that there had been too much pre-trial publicity to guarantee a fair hearing."

The AP (1/31, Hays, McClam) reports, "A court clerk swore in the 12 jurors and four alternates, and U.S. District Judge Sim Lake instructed them not to talk about the case during their service. He also ordered them not to read, listen to or watch news reports about the trial. … 'You have been through a rigorous selection process. You will be the judges of the facts of this case,' Lake said." The AP adds, "Further details about the jurors' backgrounds were not immediately available because their jury questionnaires, filled out weeks ago, have not been made public, and the judge conducted individual questioning of potential jurors on Monday at the bench. … Earlier in the day, the judge had told a pool of almost 100 potential jurors: 'I can assure you this will be one of the most interesting and important cases ever tried.'"

Reuters (1/31, Daily) reports, "The no-nonsense Lake, who questioned each of the 100 potential jurors individually to ferret out possible bias, told the panel he did not want people on the panel who were there to 'right a wrong or provide a remedy for those who suffered,' but who could fairly weigh the evidence in the case. … Thousands of Houston residents were thrown out of work and billions of dollars in retirement accounts were wiped out in Enron's downfall, and the company's name has since become synonymous with corporate greed."

The Los Angeles Times (1/31, Mulligan, Sanchez, 958K) reports, "Recent court filings indicate that the government plans to focus more on the defendants' allegedly false statements than on potentially complicated accounting details." The Financial Times (1/31, McNulty), USA Today (1/31, Farrell, 2.31M), Washington Post (1/31, D1, Johnson, 744K), Wall Street Journal (1/31, Emshwiller, McWilliams, 2.11M) and New York Times (1/31, Barrionuevo, 1.19M) run similar reports.

2nd Circuit Questions Federal Prosecutor Over Ebbers Conviction, Sentencing. The AP (1/31, Neumeister) reports, "Federal appeals court judges Monday questioned the fairness of the conviction and 25-year sentence of WorldCom Corp. chief Bernard Ebbers in an $11 billion fraud." The AP continues, "As the 64-year-old Ebbers watched from a front-row seat, the 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Manhattan put a federal prosecutor on the defensive for the conviction last March of Ebbers on fraud and conspiracy charges. … 'There are many violent criminals who don't get 25 years in prison. Twenty years does seem an awfully long time,' Judge Jose Cabranes said." The AP adds, "Assistant U.S. Attorney William Johnson said Ebbers hurt millions of investors in an unprecedented accounting fraud that drove WorldCom into bankruptcy in 2002. It re-emerged under the name MCI Inc. Verizon bought MCI in a deal that closed earlier this month. … Reid Weingarten, a lawyer for Ebbers, asked the three-judge panel to order a new trial for his client on the grounds that he was not permitted to call key witnesses to refute government evidence. … The trial judge, Barbara Jones, refused to grant immunity to the witnesses because of the pending investigation."

The New York Law Journal (1/31, Hamblett) reports, "Weingarten told the 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals that the witnesses, all former WorldCom executives, 'were designated as targets' of the massive criminal WorldCom fraud investigation 'to keep them off the witness stand for us.'" The Journal adds, "The Ebbers defense team, fighting to win a new trial before Southern District Judge Barbara Jones, claimed the three witnesses, all former executives at the company, were in a unique position to provide 'powerful circumstantial evidence' that Ebbers' version of events about the largest accounting fraud in U.S. history was true -- and he was not aware of the fraud. … Jones refused to grant the trio immunity, making them reluctant to testify at all for the Ebbers defense, Weingarten said. … The government's claim that the three former executives were 'targets' or 'subjects' of the investigation, he said, amounted to the government 'manipulating' their absence from the trial." The Journal notes, "Weingarten's argument drew some intense questions for Assistant U.S. Attorney William Johnson from a panel that consisted of Judges Jose Cabranes, Barrington D. Parker, and by conference call, Ralph Winter. … 'I'm trying to understand where the government is on this,' Parker asked Johnson. 'For example, if we get eight to 10 years down the line and there are no charges, we'd be scratching our heads even more.' … The judges continually pressed Johnson to tell them whether the investigation was ongoing. … 'We are not out there actively continuing to find evidence to charge those witnesses,' Johnson said. … 'So they are not under investigation?' Parker asked. … The dialogue continued with Johnson saying the investigation was still open, but that no 'active' steps are being taken at this time."

also appeared skeptical. It was "curious," he said, that the investigation of Beaumont and the others 'fell into some black hole. That approach could really eviscerate the case law on unavailability [of witnesses], and the ability to manipulate could become problematic.'" The Post notes, "Federal prosecutors declined to comment after the brief hearing, and Ebbers, 64, said he was under strict orders from his lawyers not to talk about the case. Weingarten, though, was upbeat. 'Somewhere along the line, justice is going to be done in this case, and I hope it's here,' he said. 'We're optimistic and we have great issues.'"

CRIMINAL LAW:

Florida Man Pleads Guilty To Fraudulently Soliciting Katrina Donations. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (1/31) reports, "A man accused of collecting almost $40,000 in donations by falsely claiming he was flying Hurricane Katrina relief flights pleaded guilty Monday to fraud." Gary S. Kraser of Miami "created a Web site on which he told of evacuating people needing immediate medical attention. He provided vivid details, such as witnessing the electrocutions of dogs by downed power lines and saving the life of a 7-month-old baby who needed transplant surgery. He said he even 'tipped wings' with Air Force One during one flight. None of it was true, prosecutors said." The AP notes, "Most of the money was refunded after the FBI began investigating the scam." The Miami Herald (1/31, Weaver, 323K) adds, "Last October, FBI agents arrested the 50-year-old computer con man in what authorities were calling the country's first Internet charity fraud case involving the exploitation of Katrina victims." He "is scheduled for sentencing on April 13."

FEMA Managers Will Remain Jailed Until Bonds Posted. The AP (1/31) reports two FEMA managers "accused of taking kickbacks from a food services contractor will stay in custody until they post property bonds, a federal prosecutor said Monday." Assistant US Attorney Jan Mann "said Loyd Hollman's bond was set at $170,000, and Andrew Rose's at 'substantially more.' They will not have to put up cash, but must put up any property they own as collateral before being released, she said." The Rocky Mountain News (1/31, Montero) notes Mann "said plans to present an indictment to the grand jury could happen as early as this week."

Ryan Prosecutors Expect To Rest After FBI Agent's Testimony Wednesday. The AP (1/31, Robinson) reports, "George Ryan's trial remained on hold Monday but prosecutors said they expected to rest their case Wednesday after jurors hear testimony from an FBI agent and see a group of video clips showing the former governor talking with reporters." The AP notes that the trial "went on hold Thursday when FBI agent Raymond Ruebenson took a leave for a family matter. … Ruebenson has spent years as the FBI case agent working on the government's Operation Safe Road investigation, which began by focusing on bribes paid in exchange for drivers licenses and expanded to encompass a wide array of political corruption in state government in the Ryan era." The Chicago Tribune (1/31, O'Connor, 643K) adds that the hospitalization of Lawrence Warner's lead attorney, Edward Genson, also has delayed the trial. "Even though Genson remained in the hospital Monday, U.S. District Judge Rebecca Pallmeyer expressed confidence the trial would resume Wednesday. … If Genson is healthy and testimony resumes Wednesday, the prosecution expects to rest its case by midday that day, said Assistant U.S. Atty. Patrick Collins. Testimony by the prosecution has taken four months."

Former Aide Testifies About Passing Contractor Funds To Campbell. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (1/31, Scott, Warren, 430K) reports, "A trusted aide who lived in Bill Campbell's basement apartment testified Monday that he funneled money to the former Atlanta mayor to be used for gambling and taking girlfriends on trips. Dewey Clark sobbed repeatedly as he described his relationship with Campbell and how he bonded with the ex-mayor's family. He was the first witness in the federal corruption trial against Campbell to say that he saw a contractor pass money to him. … Clark testified that he funneled money from city contractor George Greene and strip club owner Michael Childs." The Journal-Constitution adds, "Clark also testified that Fred Prewitt, Campbell's friend and chairman of the city's Civil Service Board, passed cash to the former mayor. Prewitt 'told me he was going to put a roll [of cash] in the mayor's hand big enough to choke a goat.'"

mayor. … Pascarella testified that he often used his personal credit card to pay for the trips made by Campbell, which Campbell often made with women other than his wife. Pascarella said Campbell usually reimbursed him with cash and that the former mayor would also use cash to play high-stakes poker game."

Judge Rules Only Prosecutors, Defense Will Know Identities Of "Mafia Cops" Jurors. The New York Post (1/31, Haberman, 624K) reports, "A Brooklyn judge yesterday said the names of jurors deciding the fate of the two reputed mob cops will not be kept a secret and that they have nothing to fear by being part of a Mafia trial. But, federal Judge Jack Weinstein also ruled that only prosecutors and lawyers for ex-NYPD detectives Louis Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa will know their identities." The Post notes, "The Brooklyn U.S. Attorney's Office asked for the anonymous jury because of the intense media coverage the case has received and, more importantly, because the duo is charged with using their position within the NYPD to divulge confidential information to the Luchese crime family."

Federal Officials Say 39 People Knew Of Minnesota School Shooting Plot. Knight Ridder (1/31, Ragsdale) reports, "Facts intended to heal may have instead reopened the wounds of those suffering from the Red Lake school shooting. Parents of those who died, as well as a survivor of the shooting, heard federal officials say on Monday that 39 people had some knowledge of Jeff Weise's plan to assault Red Lake High School before he carried it out last March 21. … And they were told that none of those people could be charged, because it is not against the law to know that a crime might be committed and do nothing about it." KRT notes, "About 40 people attended, including Steven Cobenais, recovering from severe facial wounds, and his family. Most appeared distressed and left quickly. … According to several family members, the federal officials, who included representatives from the FBI and the Bureau of Indian Affairs, reported that 39 people had some information that Weise was considering or planning the attack."

Federal Agents Raid Philadelphia Electrical Company. The Philadelphia Inquirer (1/31, Shiffman, 423K) reports, "Agents from the FBI, the IRS and the Department of Labor raided a South Philadelphia electrical company Saturday, officials said yesterday. Agents executed a search warrant at the offices of Dougherty Electric Inc., which is owned by Donald Dougherty, said FBI spokeswoman Jerri Williams. Williams declined further comment." The Inquirer notes, "Dougherty is a friend but no relation to John Dougherty, the business manager of Local 98 of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers who is considering a campaign for mayor of Philadelphia."

Gambino Associate Sentenced To Prison For Porn Site Scam. The New York Post (1/31, Haberman, 624K) reports, "The apple of John Gotti's eye is rotten to the core, said a Brooklyn judge who sentenced one of the Gambino crime family's top earners to nine years in prison yesterday for his role in a porn scam." Richard Martino "pleaded guilty last February to racketeering and mail and wire fraud for bilking $650 million from porn perusers in what Assistant Brooklyn U.S. Attorney Eric Komitee described as the 'most sophisticated Internet fraud' he has ever seen. Martino has admitted to luring visitors onto porn Web sites by promising the steamed-up surfers 'free tours.' Internet users would then be billed up to $90 when they gave their credit-card number. The racket netted him $230 million between 1996 and 2002."

Prosecutors, Lawmakers Embrace DNA Technology. The Christian Science Monitor (1/31, Richey) reports that legal analysts say "prosecutors and lawmakers who were once suspicious of the DNA challenges are now increasingly embracing the new technology as a backstop in the criminal justice system. … Of the 33 states that have passed laws establishing procedures for DNA testing, 12 have sunset provisions, which offer only limited time for DNA tests in cases where inmates have no more options for appeal. Such provisions were enacted in part out of concern five years ago that state courts might be flooded with appeals calling for expensive tests. But the flood hasn't happened, analysts say. In the meantime, the steady flow of exonerations has resulted in widespread public and political support for DNA testing. Opponents of sunset provisions say states should never enact a deadline that would prevent innocent people from proving their innocence. Innocence Project lawyers say it often takes months or years to locate evidence, investigate a past crime, and prepare the necessary legal arguments needed to convince a judge that a DNA test should be administered."

Harton Murder Case Goes Forward. The Washington Post (1/31, B5, Paley) reports, "Opening arguments are scheduled to begin as soon as today" in the trial of Melissa Burch Harton, accused of killing Natasha A. Bacchus. Harton has been charged with first-degree murder. Post says, "The killing took place during their 2005 spring break from Loyola College, where the two married women had met three years earlier when they began a doctoral program together in clinical psychology. Bacchus, of Stewartstown, Pa., had driven to Harton's home in Columbia to celebrate their completion of a major project." Bacchus was killed after an argument between her and Harton, the article says. The article also notes that the argument possibly involved allegations of romantic feelings on either Harton's or Bacchus's part for the other person.

Two Shootings In DC. The Washington Post (1/31, B2, Dvorak) reports, "Two teenagers were killed and three others were wounded in two shootings in the District early yesterday afternoon, police said. The first incident happened about 12:10 p.m. in the 500 block of Lamont Street NW. Delonte McCray Freeman, 19, died despite the efforts of a neighbor who tried to keep him alive. Two other teenagers were wounded. … The second shooting took place about 1 p.m. in the 4300 block of Fourth Street SE, when a group of people walking across the parking lot of St. Thomas More Catholic Church was approached by two gunmen, said Sgt. Joe Gentile, D.C. police spokesman. One youth, believed to be 16, was killed, and an 18-year-old was wounded, police said. Authorities, who did not release the name of the youth who died, said they were continuing to investigate the case."

Federal Court Denies Appeal Of Florida Death Row Inmate. The AP (1/31, Kaczor) reports, "A convicted murderer lost a federal appeal Monday, one day before his scheduled execution, but he had another pending, one of his lawyers said." The AP continues, "If that fails, Arthur D. Rutherford will appeal to the U.S. Supreme Court, which last week stayed the execution of another Florida death row inmate on an issue Rutherford also has raised, that the U.S. state's lethal injection procedure is cruel and unusual punishment. … 'We're just waiting to see what happens,' attorney Linda McDermott said." The AP adds, "The 56-year-old carpenter was convicted of killing and robbing Stella Salamon in 1985 at her home in Milton, Florida, where he had done repair work for her. She had been strangled or asphyxiated and her body was found in a bathtub. … The U.S. Supreme Court granted a last-minute stay of execution to Clarence Hill last week so the justices can determine whether the 11th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Atlanta erred by denying him a chance to appeal the lethal injection claim."

USG Offers Trust To Pay Asbestos Claims. The Wall Street Journal (1/31, Brat) reports, USG Corp., a building-materials maker and asbestos defendant, said it "would create and fund a trust for personal-injury claims with $900 million in cash and a contingent note for an additional $3.05 billion." However, the article said, congressional legislation could pre-empt this settlement, canceling the contingent note. That legislation, "the Fairness in Asbestos Injury Resolution Act of 2005, would create a $140 billion trust fund to pay asbestos victims," the article said. Also, "The legislation would require insurance and reinsurance companies to contribute $46 billion to the fund, while companies facing asbestos liability would cover the bulk of the fund's cost." Also as part of the settlement, "USG said it will fully repay debtholders and trade suppliers with interest. Shareholders will receive rights to acquire one additional share for $40 for each share held. In 4 p.m. composite trading on the New York Stock Exchange, USG shares rose $15.93 to $95.78, setting a 52-week high." The article said shareholders are "pleased," while consumer group Public Citizen called the federal legislation "a backdoor attempt to erase billions of dollars in corporate liability for asbestos exposure."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

DOJ To Decide On Freedom For Former Officer In Louima Case. The AP (1/31) reports, "The Justice Department should decide whether a former police officer serving a five-year prison term in the jailhouse torture case of a Haitian immigrant can qualify for early release, a federal judge said Monday." The AP continues, "Lawyers for Charles Schwarz, 39, had argued their client was owed early release under a sentencing deal struck with prosecutors in 2002. … The former officer was convicted of lying to authorities about the Abner Louima case but avoided conviction on charges of violating Louima's civil rights. After Louima's arrest in a 1997 nightclub brawl, prosecutors say, Schwarz held Louima down while Officer Justin Volpe sodomized him with a broken broomstick. Schwarz maintains he wasn't there." The AP adds, "Prosecutors had agreed in 2002 to seek a 13-month reduction in Schwarz's sentence if he and his attorneys did not discuss the case. In March, prosecutors contacted the Bureau of Prisons and recommended reducing Schwarz's sentence to 47 months. Prison officials refused, saying the law allowed them to grant early freedom only to terminally ill prisoners. … Defense attorneys had asked the judge to honor the arrangement by voiding her original sentence and re-sentencing Schwarz to 47 months."

DOJ Asked To Probe Richmond Police Shooting. The Richmond (VA) Times-Dispatch (1/31) reports, "Community leaders today called for an open investigation into the circumstances surrounding the shooting by Richmond police of a man outside his North Side home early Sunday." The Times-Dispatch continues, "King Salim Khalfani, executive director of the NAACP Virginia State Conference, called on Police Chief Rodney Monroe to include both community activists and other law enforcement agencies in the investigation into the shooting. … 'The Justice Department is here now investigating the past five years of this nonsense,' Khalfani said of past police shootings. 'This will just add another case for them to look into.'" The Times-Dispatch adds, "Billy Thigpen III, 28, was shot once in the torso outside his home in the 3100 block of Napoleon Street about 3 a.m. Sunday after leading police on a short car and foot chase. … Richmond police said the officer, Everett Woolums, has been placed on administrative leave, as is department policy in any police shooting, while the mater is under investigation. … In a written statement yesterday, the department said that after the car and foot chase 'a struggle ensued and a round was discharged from the officer's service weapon striking the suspect in the chest area.'"

Kansas Police Chief Asks FBI To Take Over Excessive Force Probe. WIBW-TV Topeka (1/30) reports on its Web site, "The police chief in Kansas City, Kansas, is asking the FBI to take over the investigation into a racial discrimination complaint against his officers. Chief Ron Miller says the departments own investigation has been stymied because witnesses have stopped cooperating. The complaint involves actions taken by about 20 officers and six deputies who broke up a party in November. Officers allegedly used force, chemical spray, and racial and sexual slurs in breaking up the party. … The FBI has opened a preliminary investigation and will send the results to the U.S. Department of Justice to determine whether further investigation is warranted." The Kansas City Star (1/28, Cronkleton, 286K) noted, "The family denied that outside sources had influenced them, said Vickey Everidge, one of those who filed the complaint. The family had been cooperating with police and the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, she said. … Jeff Lanza, an FBI spokesman, said the agency was aware of the alleged discrimination and had received a complaint from one of the victims. The agency, however, was waiting to determine whether to open an investigation until an outcome had been reached by Kansas City, Kan., police. … Lanza said he was not able to predict how long the preliminary investigation would take."

LAPD Chief Says Officer Who Fatally Shot 13-Year-Old Acted Within Rules. The Los Angeles Times (1/31, Winton) reports, "Los Angeles Police Chief William J. Bratton has concluded that the officer who shot 13-year-old Devin Brown last year acted appropriately — a decision that sets up a potential high-profile conflict with the city's civilian Police Commission, which plans to debate the matter today." The Times continues, "Bratton found that the shooting was a tragic but proper use of force by an officer who was protecting his life, according to department sources who spoke on condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to discuss the chief's decision before its release. … But the Los Angeles Police Commission will have the final word on whether the shooting by Officer Steve Garcia complied with department rules." The Times adds, "Commission President John Mack, who was sharply critical of the shooting before he took office, told The Times recently that the Brown shooting was the most important the panel has considered in years. For many longtime critics of the department, how the commission rules will be seen as a defining test of Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa's professed desire to have a tougher panel that is more independent of the chief than in the past. … Brown was shot and killed early Feb. 6 after leading officers on a brief car chase in South Los Angeles. … Garcia said he fired at Brown's car after the teenager accelerated in reverse toward the officer, making him fear for his life. A department probe backed Garcia's account, and prosecutors decided in December not to file charges against him."

US Fines Japan's Elpida For Chip Price-Fixing. The AP (1/31, Goodin) reports, "Japanese computer chip maker Elpida Memory Inc. agreed to pay an $84 million fine and plead guilty to taking part in an international conspiracy that led to higher prices for personal computers, the Justice Department said Monday." The AP continues, "Elpida is the fourth manufacturer of dynamic random access memory, or DRAM, to admit its role in fixing the price of chips used in personal computers and other electronic devices. … 'We are gratified to bring to justice another member of the DRAM cartel, which is one of the largest cartels ever discovered,' said Thomas Barnett, the Justice Department's acting antitrust chief." The AP adds, "The four-year federal investigation, carried out by Justice officials in San Francisco, has so far netted $730 million in fines."

Reuters (1/31) reports, "According to the two-count felony charge filed in the U.S. District Court in San Francisco, Elpida conspired from April 1, 1999 to June 15, 2002 with unnamed manufacturers to fix the prices of dynamic random access memory, or DRAM, sold to certain computer and server manufacturers. … The customers directly affected by the price-fixing conspiracy were Dell Inc., Compaq Computer Corp., Hewlett-Packard Co., Apple Computer Inc., International Business Machines Corp. and Gateway Inc., the Justice Department said on Monday. … Elpida also conspired with an unnamed DRAM manufacturer to rig a bid for a lot sold to Sun Microsystems Inc. in March 2002, the Justice Department said."

The Red Herring (1/30) reports, "The Japanese memory chip maker became the fourth large company to admit its guilt in the ongoing probe by the U.S. Department of Justice. … Thomas Barnett, acting assistant attorney general, said the charge reflects a U.S. commitment to 'prosecute and deter cartels' that harm American consumers." The Red Herring adds, "In mid-October, Samsung Electronics, the largest producer of the chips, admitted its role in the conspiracy and agreed to pay a $300-million fine, the second-largest criminal antitrust fine in U.S. history. … Hynix Semiconductor of South Korea also pleaded guilty and paid $185 million, while Infineon Technologies of Germany paid $160 million. Four Infineon executives also pleaded guilty and were sentenced to four to six months in prison and paid $250,000 each."

Bloomberg (1/31, Alpeyev) also reports this story.

Microsoft Renews Efforts To Rebut EU Antitrust Concerns. The Financial Times (1/31, Buck) reports, "Microsoft is renewing its efforts to persuade the European Union's top antitrust regulator the company is ready to share sensitive information about its flagship Windows operating system with rivals." The Times continues, "A senior Microsoft legal representative tried on Monday to allay fears the group would take legal action against rivals that used its source code on licence." The Times adds, "This licensing is supposed to ensure other developers can design server software to work smoothly with Windows, and it is part of the European Commission's March 2004 antitrust ruling against Microsoft. But last month, the regulator formally charged the group for failing to comply with the order, and threatened to impose daily fines on it unless Microsoft changed tack. … In response, Microsoft offered to license parts of the Windows source code – the basic programming instructions at the heart of all software – and on Monday it said it was ready to go even further. … However, the Commission – as well as several Microsoft rivals – treated last week's offer to disclose source code with scepticism."

Minnesota Schools Get Windfall From Microsoft Settlement. The AP (1/31, Bakst) reports, "Minnesota schools will share $55 million they can use to buy new computers and software, thanks to a court settlement with Microsoft Corp." The AP continues, "While schools have known since 2004 that they had some money coming their way, the final amount was up in the air until recently. Gov. Tim Pawlenty said Monday that the technology vouchers have just started going out. … 'With the fast-paced changes in the field of technology, it is often difficult for schools to keep pace,' he said. 'This money will allow them to update, and in many cases, expand their technology, which in turn will help students learn and achieve at higher levels.'" The AP adds, "The amount each school gets depends on the concentration of poverty in their school districts. Some will receive only a few thousand dollars, while others, like Minneapolis and St. Paul, are in line for more than $6 million each. Districts have until 2012 to use up the vouchers. … The money is left over from a settlement to a class-action lawsuit in which Minnesota customers and businesses claimed the company was violating antitrust laws by overcharging for its Windows operating system and its Excel and Word programs. The company had denied overcharging, saying the prices on its products had dropped. … At the elementary school where Pawlenty detailed the payout, Principal Patricia Steingruebl was ecstatic to learn her school would be getting $55,000. She said the school now spends about $2,000 a year on new technology."

Fairmont Acquisition Another Deal In Lodging Industry. The Wall Street Journal (1/31, Sanders) reports, "The proposed $3.3 billion acquisition of luxury-hotel operator Fairmont Hotels & Resorts Inc. is the latest in a string of multibillion-dollar deals that began last year in the red-hot lodging industry, furthering the consolidation of key players in the lucrative luxury category. Toronto-based Fairmont yesterday confirmed it has agreed to a proposed all-cash deal with Los Angeles investment firm Colony Capital LLC and Saudi Prince Alwaleed bin Talal's Kingdom Hotels International. Colony and Kingdom will pay $45 a share and assume roughly $500 million in debt. The company will then be taken private. Investor reaction was muted. Fairmont shares were up 45 cents to $44.27 in 4 p.m. New York Stock Exchange composite trading." The Journal says, "Upon completion of a deal, the buyers intend to combine the nearly 100-year-old Fairmont brand with Singapore-based Raffles, which Colony acquired in July."

Arcelor Chief Says Mittal Lacks "European Cultural Values." The Wall Street Journal (1/31, Fleming, Glader) reports, "In an effort to rally European political support against Mittal Steel Co.'s unsolicited $24 billion bid, Arcelor SA chief executive painted his rival as a ruthless corporate raider lacking 'European cultural values' that also has a poor safety record and no credible long-term industrial strategy. … Arcelor CEO Guy Dolle declined to discuss specifics of how the company plans to fight off Mittal. It is too early to tell if another bidder could come forward to join with Arcelor as a white knight. In an interview yesterday, Mr. Dolle said some kind of cross-share holding or other financial maneuvers could happen with a steel maker such as Nippon Steel Corp., China's Shanghai Baosteel Group or South Korea's Posco. 'We have several possible actions,' he said. He added that Arcelor has not started discussions with other steel makers."

AIG Wins Temporary Restraining Order. The Wall Street Journal (1/31, Davies) reports, "A state Supreme Court judge in New York issued a temporary restraining order preventing private insurance agencies run by American International Group Inc.'s former chief executive, Maurice R. 'Hank' Greenberg, from trying to lure business away from the insurance giant he once led. Judge Herman Cahn's temporary order is in place until Thursday, when another hearing is scheduled. AIG sued the private insurance agencies Friday, alleging 'misconduct' in efforts to siphon business away from AIG. The agencies are subsidiaries of C.V. Starr & Co., a closely held firm that had ties to AIG for years. Mr. Greenberg was forced out of AIG last March in the midst of an accounting probe."

Commission Evaluating Potential Changes To Antitrust Laws. Inman News (1/30, Roberts) reports, "While the largest national real estate trade group mounts its defense against an antitrust lawsuit brought by the U.S. Department of Justice, a commission created by Congress is evaluating whether federal antitrust laws require remodeling." Inman continues, "The Antitrust Modernization Commission, formed in April 2004, is tasked to study 'whether the need exists to modernize U.S. federal antitrust laws,' and to seek input and prepare a report to Congress and the president that includes findings, conclusions and 'recommendations for legislative or administrative action.'" Inman adds, "The real estate industry is no stranger to antitrust complaints, and some industry participants have watched the Antitrust Modernization Commission's progress. The commission's focus is not industry-specific, though some topics that the commission is considering have relevance to the real estate industry. … For example, the commission has hosted discussions on the topic of the 'state action doctrine' provision of federal law, which extends some immunity to states for federal antitrust law violations. Such discussions are potentially relevant to measures that numerous state legislatures and real estate regulators have passed requiring real estate professionals to provide a minimum level of service to consumers while effectively banning some forms of real estate business models that do not provide these services. … These so-called minimum-service measures, backed by Realtor trade groups, have in several cases led the U.S. Justice Department and Federal Trade Commission to send out advocacy letters urging state officials not to pass the measures as they potentially could limit consumer choice and harm competition in the real estate industry. … Federal officials have opposed Realtor-backed minimum-service measures in Alabama, Missouri, Oklahoma and Texas, charging that the legislation was anticompetitive and anti-consumer, though legislators and governors in all four states passed the measures last year despite these objections, and other states are considering similar measures."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Schlumberger To Pay $11.8 Million For PCB Damage In South Carolina. Dow Jones (1/30) reports, "A unit of Schlumberger Ltd. will pay $11.8 million to federal and state agencies to compensate for the contamination of a creek, a lake and surrounding areas in South Carolina, the Justice Department said on Monday." Dow Jones continues, "The money will be used to clean up water in the vicinity of Lake Hartwell so that people have a better chance of catching uncontaminated fish and for other purposes, the government said. Schlumberger Technology Corp., based in Texas, will also pay another $8 million to $10 million to buy and remove two hydroelectric dams on Twelvemile Creek and to conduct stream restoration activities, the government said. … 'Schlumberger's payment to fund restoration by the federal and state trustees will be used for projects designed to compensate the public for the injury to the fishery and to the habitat from PCB contamination,' said Sue Ellen Wooldridge, an assistant attorney general at the Justice Department, in a statement. 'The company's agreement to purchase and remove the dams will directly improve the Twelvemile Creek ecosystem and provide significant environmental benefits for the affected communities.'"

The AP (1/31) reports, "The plant was identified as a federal Superfund site after it released PCBs into the creek - a tributary of the Twelve Mile River and Lake Hartwell - from 1955 until 1977 while owned by Sangamo-Weston. The current owner is Schlumberger Technology Corp., which assumed the liabilities of Sangamo-Weston. … The company will spend an additional $8 million to $10 million to purchase and remove two hydroelectric dams on the creek and conduct steam restoration activities, the release said."

Federal Regulators Consider Previously-Rejected Mine Safety Rules. The Washington Post (1/31, A3, Warrick, 744K) reports, "After one of the deadliest months for coal mining in years, federal mine regulators last week began formally considering safety improvements to help miners survive underground fires and explosions. Among the proposals: mandatory caches of oxygen tanks and breathing masks inside every coal mine. The idea may have struck some miners as familiar, because it was. A similar proposal was put forward by the same regulators six years ago, only to be scrapped by the Bush administration shortly after it took office. And the oxygen caches were not the only proposed safety improvement to be withdrawn." According to the Post, the Bush administration "abandoned or delayed implementation of 18 proposed safety rules that were in the federal Mine Safety and Health Administration's regulatory pipeline in early 2001, a review of agency records shows. At least two of the dropped proposals have now been resurrected in the aftermath of deadly accidents at the Sago and Alma mines in West Virginia."

Boehlert Blasts NASA Over Alleged Attempt To Silence Global Warming Scientist. The New York Times (1/31, Revkin, 1.19M) reports Rep. Sherwood Boehlert, chairman of the House Science Committee, "sharply criticized NASA yesterday after the agency's top climate scientist and several public affairs officers complained of political pressure intended to prevent public discussions of global warming." In a letter to NASA's administrator Michael D. Griffin, Boehlert wrote, "Good science cannot long persist in an atmosphere of intimidation." The Times notes that it "first reported the complaints on Saturday. The climate scientist, James E. Hansen, director of NASA's Goddard Institute for Space Studies in Manhattan, and several other National Aeronautics and Space Administration employees said Bush administration appointees at headquarters had demanded to review his lectures and publications in advance. Moreover, senior agency officials were to have had the right to stand in for him in interviews with reporters. 'NASA is clearly doing something wrong, given the sense of intimidation felt by Dr. Hansen and others who work with him,' Mr. Boehlert said in his letter."

EPA Agrees To Exempt Farms From Clean Air Laws. The New York Times/AP (1/31) reports the Bush administration "will exempt thousands of farms that raise poultry, cattle and hogs from heavy fines for fouling the air and water with animal excrement in exchange for data to help curb future pollution. The Environmental Protection Agency has signed agreements with 2,681 animal feeding operations in the egg, chicken, turkey, dairy and hog industries. They would be exempt from having to pay potential fines of up to $27,500 a day for violations either in the past or over the next four years." The EPA's Environmental Appeals Board "determined that the agreements were consistent with the Clean Air Act. Agency officials said the approvals set the stage for the remaining agreements to gain approval quickly. Jon Scholl, agriculture adviser to Stephen L. Johnson, the E.P.A. administrator, said the agreements were the most efficient way of obtaining the data needed to determine whether the animal-feeding operations were complying with federal air emission laws."

EPA Advisers Find Teflon Chemical "Likely" Carcinogen. The Wall Street Journal (1/31, Muñoz, 2.11M) reports, "The Environmental Protection Agency is pressuring eight companies to reduce the presence of a group of chemicals that are used in the manufacture of such things as nonstick cookware, microwave popcorn bags, fast-food containers, carpeting, nail polish and stain-resistant clothing. Yesterday, an EPA advisory group issued a statement, saying the majority of its members agree that the main chemical under review -- perfluorooctanoic acid, or PFOA -- is a 'likely' cancer-causing agent. However the group, made up of outside experts, failed to agree unanimously on this likelihood and recommended further study. The findings come after a lengthy review of EPA data on the chemical, including studies linking it to cancer in rats, and indicating that PFOA is found in many people's blood."

Dockworkers Call For Reductions In Toxic Emissions At Ports. The New York Times (1/31, Archibold, 1.19M) reports, "The effort to reduce smog stemming from seaports, among the biggest polluters in the nation, gained an ally on Monday when the union representing thousands of West Coast dockworkers promised to help significantly reduce toxic emissions. The union, the International Longshore and Warehouse Union, representing 60,000 dockworkers from San Diego to Seattle, called for a one-fifth reduction in emissions by 2010 and said it would push carriers to adopt less-polluting technology on their ships."

9th Circuit Searches For Punitive Remedy In Exxon Case. The California Recorder (1/31, Scheck) reports, "The dozens of Alaska fishermen sardined into a 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals courtroom Friday seemed to only reluctantly accept Judge Andrew Kleinfeld's statement that the court views 'torturing and killing large numbers of people' as 'more reprehensible than putting a drunk in charge of a supertanker.' … Brian O'Neill, the lawyer for more than 30,000 people economically affected by the 1989 Exxon Valdez oil spill, didn't want to minimize the gas company's mistake. … 'Putting a drunk in front of a supertanker is still reprehensible,' he said." The Recorder continues, "Figuring out a way to translate that reprehensibility into dollars under ever-changing Supreme Court guidance is once again the problem for the 9th Circuit. … So, for the third time since an Alaska jury hit Exxon with $5 billion in punitive damages in 1994, the 9th Circuit panel is facing the question of whether that award is appropriate." The Recorder adds, "The judges have been uncomfortable with the $5 billion award in the past, but they didn't reveal much Friday; Kleinfeld was skeptical that a large punitive award was appropriate in light of Exxon's pretrial cleanup efforts, while Chief Judge Mary Schroeder seemed somewhat more inclined toward the plaintiffs. Senior Judge James Browning was silent through the arguments. … The class action brought by those who suffered economic damage from the spill has bounced repeatedly between the 9th Circuit and the Alaska courtroom of Judge H. Russel Holland, a result of Holland's reluctance to significantly lower the award. It's also due to the changing Supreme Court guidelines over how to award punitive damages. … Most recently, the Supreme Court said in 2003 that punitive damages should not exceed compensatory damages by more than a 9:1 ratio, and that compensatory damages may stand in for punitives as a deterrent in many cases."

Measure Would Close Loophole Allowing Tribes To Make Large Donations. USA Today (1/31, Drinkard, 2.31M) reports that House Republicans plan to propose closing a loophole that has allowed Indian tribes with casinos to give substantial donations lawmakers' campaigns. The change "is part of a bill being drafted by Rules Committee Chairman David Dreier, R-Calif., to restrict lobbyist influence in the wake of the Jack Abramoff lobbying scandal." USA adds, "The growth in tribal political giving has been helped by the status tribes enjoy under federal campaign-finance law. Tribes are 'persons' under the law, a category that also includes partnerships, corporations and associations. But tribes can give unlimited total amounts because they are not 'individuals,' whose legal definition excludes organized groups. … Dreier's proposal, developed at the behest of Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., would apply the individual limit on total giving to tribes."

In a separate story, USA Today (1/31, Drinkard, 2.31M) reports,, "Indian tribes defending their right to give unlimited political campaign contributions say they are treated differently for legitimate reasons dating back to George Washington. … Tribes' special status is based in part on the limited sovereignty they hold through treaties negotiated with the federal government as long ago as the 1700s. Like states or localities, they have a government-to-government relationship with Washington. But unlike local governments, they make political giving a lobbying tactic."

McCain Accelerates Timetable For Review Of Indian Gaming Act. Sen. John McCain has accelerated his timetable to review change to the 1988 Indian Gaming Regulatory Act and the way the FEC counts tribal donations. Roll Call (1/31, Bresnahan) reports, "McCain introduced new legislation in November (S. 2078) that would broaden the authority of the National Indian Gaming Commission to regulate Class III casinos, which offer activities such as slot machines, blackjack, craps and roulette. The agency's internal review procedures would also be overhauled. McCain wants to change how land is taken into trusts for the tribes, with an eye toward limiting the explosive growth in Indian casinos. … The Arizona Republican reportedly also wants to look at the way Indian tribes donate to federal lawmakers, according to lobbyists retained by tribal interests." McCain "has scheduled hearings for this week and next, and another hearing on Feb. 28, on these issues."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Man Arrested In US-Mexico Border Tunnel Investigation. The AP (1/31) reports, "A Mexican citizen was arrested on drug charges in the investigation into the longest tunnel ever found underneath the U.S.-Mexico border. The suspect was taken into custody Saturday by U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement agents. He appeared in federal court Monday on charges of conspiracy to import more than a ton of marijuana, which carries a mandatory minimum of 10 years in prison. The 2,400-foot tunnel runs from a warehouse near the airport in Tijuana to a warehouse in San Diego. It was unclear how long it had been in operation, but more than two tons of marijuana were found inside. … The man under arrest, Carlos Cardenas Calvillo, worked at the U.S. warehouse, which had been leased for the stated purpose of distributing produce, authorities said. … The Drug Enforcement Administration has said it suspects Tijuana's ruthless Arellano-Felix drug syndicate or another well-known cartel was involved."

In a separate story the AP (1/31) reports, "Investigators said Cardenas Calvillo is connected to the San Diego side of the operation. Real estate documents show a company incorporated last year paid $2 million to lease the warehouse, supposedly for produce." More than 100 news outlets published in newspapers and/or posted on their Web sites the AP story, including ABC News, CNN, MSNBC, the New York Times, New York Post, Washington Post, Houston Chronicle, California's San Jose Mercury News, San Luis Obispo Tribune, and Contra Costa Times, along with the Fort Worth Texas Star Telegram, Myrtle Beach Sun News, Kansas City Star, and the UK's Guardian.

Reuters (1/31) writes, "Cardenas did not enter a plea during his appearance in San Diego federal court and was held without bail pending a midweek hearing. No other arrests have yet been announced."

The San Diego Union-Tribune (1/30, Soto) reports Cardenas Calvillo "pleaded not guilty Monday afternoon to conspiracy to smuggle drugs in connection with an elaborate cross-border tunnel that stretched half a mile from Tijuana to Otay Mesa. … Prosecutors asked Judge Leo S. Papas to order that Cardenas be held without bail. The judge said he will consider the request at a hearing Wednesday. Prosecutors told the judge the 44-year-old Cardenas is a risk to flee the country."

The Washington Times (1/31, Seper) writes, "Investigators said the charges stem from Mr. Cardenas-Calvillo's ties to the Otay Mesa warehouse that concealed the U.S. access point for the highly sophisticated, 2,400-foot- long passageway. The tunnel was described by authorities as the largest and most advanced illegal cross-border underpass ever found. The ongoing investigation is being carried out by the San Diego Tunnel Task Force made up of ICE, Drug Enforcement Administration and U.S. Border Patrol agents. … The arrest came less than 24 hours after ICE issued an alert, tersely warning that information indicated those who had been in the tunnel, or were responsible for its design or construction, could be in imminent danger. ICE urged those persons to come forward and contact the agency at any port of entry along the Mexican border."

The Los Angeles Times (1/30, Marosi) reported that on Saturday, authorities "arrested a Mexican man in connection with" the tunnel's operation. Authorities "said the man is allegedly tied to the Otay Mesa warehouse that concealed the tunnel's access on the US side."

Voice of America (1/30) reports on its Web site, "The U.S. Drug Enforcement Agency says the tunnel was a major gateway for illegal immigrants and drugs coming from Mexico into the U.S."

Tunnel Had A Secret Door. The San Diego Union-Tribune (1/30, Manolatos) reports the tunnel had a secret door that could be opened only from below. "It's this passageway that federal authorities said was the exit point for drug smugglers who built a massive underground tunnel to bring tons of marijuana into the United States from Tijuana. … Investigators called out-of-state miners to help them determine how the tunnel was built and how long it took. The miners are expected to arrive later this week. Authorities started receiving tips about the tunnel two years ago. When they discovered it last week, they found 2 tons of marijuana on the Mexican side and 200 pounds on the U.S. end. Once the marijuana was in the United States, it probably was loaded onto vehicles disguised as produce trucks," investigators said.

Human Intelligence Most Effective For Finding Tunnels. The AP (1/31) reports, "A U.S. government effort to find drug-smuggling tunnels underneath the Mexican border with ground-penetrating radar and other high-tech gear has had little success. Human intelligence has proven to be the most effective method of finding the passageways. A case in point: The longest tunnel ever found along the border was discovered last week after a tip. … 'The problem is the technology picks up some kind of anomaly or variation of soil,' said Lauren Mack, a spokeswoman for U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement. 'We go in with big backhoes and bulldozers, we spend all day doing it, and all we hit is rock or water tables.' That was what happened earlier this month when high-tech gear alerted authorities to a possible tunnel near…a hamlet about 60 miles east of San Diego along the Mexican border. A full day of digging turned up nothing."

US, Mexican Media Given Tour Of Tunnel. Los Angeles Times (1/31, Marosi) reports, "Federal officials gave US and Mexican media a rare look at a smuggling tunnel Monday as they announced the arrest of a man with alleged ties to a Mexican drug cartel that authorities suspect built the 2,400-foot-long passage." Frank Marwood, acting deputy special agent in charge for Immigration and Customs Enforcement, said, "The amount of time, money and technology it would take to make a tunnel like this is overwhelming. It's a complete engineering feat. … The half-hour tour covered an estimated 250 feet, about one-tenth of the tunnel's length."

Network TV Coverage. ABC's World News Tonight (1/30, story 8, 2:00, Vargas) reported, "In San Diego, today, US Officials charged a Mexican man with drug smuggling through the longest tunnel ever found along the U.S. - Mexican border. It is a remarkable facility." ABC added, "The tunnel surfaces in a nondescript office about a half-mile into the U.S. A secret door, a trap door, allowed an all-access pass to and from Mexico. The piping you see was used to ventilate the tunnel. Electric lighting, powered from the Mexico side, runs the entire length. And a system that used to keep water out has stopped working. So the tunnel has flooded. The walls have been chiseled by hand, for eight football fields in length. Officials say the tunnel was in operation since last November and they believe it took a drug cartel about two years to dig it, by hand, through hardened clay and sandstone. Two tons of marijuana were found in the tunnel. And one man has been arrested. Court documents reveal he was a worker in the warehouse run by a company called v & f distributors, which is under investigation." Homeland Security Agent: "Whenever we find a tunnel for department of homeland security, that's a vulnerability in terms of narcotics, in terms of people, in terms of weapons, that could be brought into the country. Once the investigation is complete, officials say, the enormous tunnel will be filled with concrete."

Cable TV Coverage. CNN Live From (1/30, 3:00 p.m.) reported, "An arrest in the case of the largest and most sophisticated tunnel ever found across the U.S.-Mexican border. A Mexican man was arraigned on charges of conspiracy to import substances. The tunnel runs from San Diego to Tijuana. Two tons of marijuana was found inside."

CNN's Anderson Cooper 360 (1/30, 10:00 p.m.) reported, "We are on the U.S.-Mexican border. Actually in sort of a no man's land. This is a U.S. Territory between two fences. … We're actually in the Otay Messa district of San Diego. We're north of Tijuana. Just a few feet beneath was a tunnel. It runs 2400 feet. It's the length of eight football fields. It goes from a warehouse in Otay Messa, crossing the border inside another warehouse in Tijuana. It is the longest tunnel U.S. authorities here, Immigration and Customs Enforcement agents have ever found underneath this border. They found more than two tons of marijuana in this tunnel. Who knows how many drugs were gone through. Since the attacks on 9/11 agents have uncovered 20 other tunnels. Twenty that we know of. But nothing, they say, nothing like this one. Take a look. ICE agents also [say] this is one of the most sophisticated tunnels underneath the Mexican border. It took years to build. You can see the pick marks used. It would take a long time to do. It's also got electricity. They wired the entire tunnel with these cables that have light bulbs on them. There's even a pipe that brings in fresh oxygen pumped in from Mexico."

Virginia Psychiatrist Pleads Guilty To Illegal Hydrocodone Distribution. The Norfolk Virginian-Pilot (1/31) reports, "A former Virginia Beach psychiatrist pleaded guilty in federal court Monday to charges of health care fraud and illegally dispensing narcotics. Dr. Jeremy A. Stowell, who surrendered his medical license in the middle of the federal investigation last year, admitted illegally prescribing hydrocodone and improperly billing insurance programs. The Drug Enforcement Administration has been investigating Stowell after reports by the state Board of Medicine that he had been prescribing narcotics to patients with drug addictions and some who admitted sharing their drugs with friends. During the DEA investigation, an undercover officer obtained narcotics from Stowell with only a cursory examination and an informant obtained drugs despite admitting having abused cocaine and other drugs, according to court papers filed by the government Monday."

Afghanistan Opium Production Called A Serious International Threat. UPI (1/30) reports, "Afghan Foreign Minister Abdullah Abdullah urged the international community Monday to endorse the Afghanistan Compact, a five-year blueprint for efforts to stabilize and reconstruct the country. … Habibullah Qaderi, the Afghan minister for counter-narcotics, said the country's opium production represented a 'serious threat' to the international community. Some 70 to 80 percent of the heroin on Britain's streets originated in Afghanistan, he noted. … A criminal justice task force was being trained and a special tribunal being set up to prosecute those in possession of over two kilos of opium, he said. Questioned about reports of high-level government complicity in the drugs trade, Qaderi said that where there was evidence against officials, they would also be prosecuted. Pressed on the issue by United Press International at a later briefing, Afghan Justice Minister Sarwar Danish acknowledged there were cases of complicity by some government officials. Counter-narcotics initiatives would be discussed at the conference, from which would hopefully emerge a clearer plan to tackle the problem, he said."

IMMIGRATION:

Concern About Overcrowded Housing Emerges As Part Of Immigration Debate. USA Today (1/31, Jones, 2.31M) reports, "Overcrowded housing is emerging as a battleground in the national debate over immigration as towns and counties crack down on landlords who permit many unrelated people to occupy single-family homes. Local officials in New York, Virginia, Massachusetts and Georgia have evicted residents, threatened landlords with fines or jail time or legally narrowed the definition of family to combat a problem they say disrupts neighborhoods. … Some activists say measures limiting the number of unrelated people or extended family members in a home target immigrants, particularly Hispanics, who often need to share a home to afford the rent."

Intel Chairman Says US Should Increase Visas For Highly Educated Foreigners. Intel Chairman Craig Barrett writes in the Financial Times (1/30), "America is experiencing a profound immigration crisis but it is not about the 11m illegal immigrants currently exciting the press and politicians in Washington. The real crisis is that the US is closing its doors to immigrants with degrees in science, maths and engineering – the 'best and brightest' from around the world who flock to the country for its educational and employment opportunities. These foreign-born knowledge workers are critically important to maintaining America's technological competitiveness." Barrett adds, "At a minimum the US should vastly increase the number of permanent visas for highly educated foreigners, streamline the process for those already working here and allow foreign students in the hard sciences and engineering to move directly to permanent resident status."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Alito Confirmation All But Certain After Filibuster Attempt Fails. The CBS Evening News (1/30, story 7, :45, Schieffer) reported, "The way is clear for Samuel Alito to become the next Associate Justice of the Supreme Court. After a last- minute filibuster attempt by Democratic opponents, the Senate voted 72-25 today to cut off any further debate. Alito is expected to be confirmed tomorrow morning, giving President Bush a victory just hours before he delivers his State of the Union address." NBC Nightly News (1/30, story 4, 3:00, Williams) reported that "liberal Democrats led by Massachusetts Sens. John Kerry and Ted Kennedy went ahead today with a filibuster attempt, trying to block or at least slow down the nomination, but their effort didn't come close."

CNN's The Situation Room (1/30, Henry) reported that Republicans needed 60 votes to break the Democratic filibuster of Supreme Court nominee Samuel Alito's confirmation. They "got a lot more. They got 72 in the end. The final tally, 72-25. That means only 23 lawmakers, 23 Democrats, joined John Kerry and Ted Kennedy in supporting the filibuster, supporting continued debate."

CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (1/30, Dobbs) called the vote "a major defeat for Democrats" and "a political victory for President Bush." CNN added, "The Senate's decision is a severe blow to Democrats, such as Senators John Kerry, Ted Kennedy, and Hillary Clinton. A final confirmation vote for Judge Alito is expected tomorrow, just hours before President Bush delivers his State of the Union address."

The Los Angeles Times (1/31, Reynolds, 958K) adds that "several Democrats who supported the filibuster, notably Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) and Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.), did so with a noticeable lack of enthusiasm." Favoring the filibuster were "several Democrats believed to be considering a presidential run in 2008: Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, Evan Bayh of Indiana and Kerry, the party's 2004 nominee." The Times adds, "Despite the split over the filibuster, Democrats are largely united in their opposition to Alito's confirmation. Only four Democrats -- Byrd, Nelson of Nebraska, Tim Johnson of South Dakota and Kent Conrad of North Dakota -- have announced their support for him." The Grand Forks Herald (1/31, Jalonick, 32K) reports Sen. Kent Conrad said Monday "he will vote to confirm Judge Samuel Alito to the Supreme Court. 'He has given me his word on important matters,' Conrad said."

The Washington Times (1/31, Hurt, 90K) reports, "Among those voting to filibuster the nomination were Democrat Sens. Frank R. Lautenberg and Robert Menendez, who represent Judge Alito's home state of New Jersey." USA Today (1/31, Kiely, 2.31M) reports Alito's "home-state senators" also "said they would vote against him. They fear that Alito, a judge on the Philadelphia-based 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, will make the court more conservative. 'Home-state pride is not a sufficient reason for supporting a nominee,' Menendez said."

The Washington Post (1/31, A1, Babington, 744K) headlines its story "Senate To Vote On Alito Today," while the AP (1/31, Holland says the Senate "all but guaranteed Samuel Alito's confirmation." The New York Times (1/31, Stout, 1.19M) adds that "since only a simple majority is required for confirmation, Samuel Alito could be a member of the Supreme Court by Tuesday afternoon. … Three Democrats have come out in support of the nominee: Robert C. Byrd of West Virginia, Tim Johnson of South Dakota and Ben Nelson of Nebraska. Other Democrats are believed to be considering a vote in favor of the nominee." Reuters (1/31, Ferraro), Chicago Tribune (1/31, Zeleny, 643K) and Bloomberg (1/31, Rowley), among other sources, run similar stories this morning.

The Hill (1/31, Allen) says, "Bush and his Republican allies are on the verge of fulfilling campaign promises to stock the court with conservatives."

Chafee's Decision To Oppose Alito Could Hurt Him In Primary. The Washington Times (1/31, Fagan, Hurt, 90K) reports, "Republican Sen. Lincoln Chafee's decision to oppose Judge Samuel A. Alito Jr.'s nomination to the Supreme Court will hurt him in his primary campaign, party members say, and could kill the GOP's chance of holding a seat in liberal Rhode Island." Chafee "is the only Republican senator to come out publicly against the Alito nomination, a decision likely to fuel further criticism from both his political flanks. For example, Cranston Mayor Steve Laffey, a likely conservative Republican primary opponent, called Mr. Chafee's actions ineffectual and a disservice to the state. … Meanwhile, the anti-tax Club for Growth is running commercials blasting Mr. Chafee for not taking a harder line against big government and high taxes." Chafee "is being criticized just as much from the left. Rhode Island Secretary of State Matt Brown, one of the Democrats running against Mr. Chafee, said the senator made a wishy-washy decision on Judge Alito."

In an editorial titled "Party Of Lincoln?," the Wall Street Journal (1/31, 2.11M) says, "Chafee tried to split the difference. He announced yesterday that he would oppose Judge Alito's confirmation." But "he also voted against John Kerry's futile attempt to block a vote via filibuster -- which he was obliged to do as part of the 'gang of 14' whose compromise last May preserved the possibility of the filibuster but tried to downplay its use." The Journal adds, "Opposing the filibuster attempt may not prove sufficient to win over Republican primary voters."

White House, Democratic Strategic Assumptions Before Hearings Explored. The New York Times (1/31, Kirkpatrick, 1.19M) reports, "The week before his Supreme Court confirmation hearings," Alito "e-mailed the text of his opening statement to the White House. It included very little about his legal thinking, dwelled at length on his family and opened with a tired and rambling joke about courtroom banter between a lawyer and a judge. The response from the White House: 'Perfect, don't change a word,' according to an administration official who was granted anonymity because Judge Alito's preparation sessions were confidential." The Times adds, "As the last obstacles to confirmation faded away Monday, Democratic aides said their party had initially expected Judge Alito to live up to his reputation as 'Scalito,' suggesting a conservative firebrand in the mold of Justice Antonin Scalia. Failing to adjust to his meekness, Democratic aides admit they searched too hard for scandal in Judge Alito's past." The White House, meanwhile, "sought to take advantage of Judge Alito's low-key, almost shy demeanor to build sympathy for him. They say they succeeded beyond all expectations when Judge Alito's wife, Martha-Ann, walked out in tears from his confirmation hearings."

Fox News' Special Report (1/30, Wilson) reported that Democrats "simply could not find a formula to derail the Supreme Court nomination of Judge Samuel Alito. Any hope that they might drag out the debate with a filibuster evaporated shortly after a meeting of the so-called Gang of 14 moderate senators." Republicans "by and large spent the day complaining about what they felt was a nasty debate aimed at a well-qualified nominee."

Ford At Odds With Black Leaders Over Filibuster. The Hill (1/31, Savodnik) reports, "Rep. Harold Ford's opposition to filibustering Judge Samuel Alito's Supreme Court nomination is exacerbating tensions between the Tennessee Democrat and black political leaders, underscoring the fine line that the Senate hopeful must walk." Ford, running for the seat being vacated by Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, "said Friday that Alito should get an up-or-down vote, which would more or less assure the nominee's approval." Ford's comments "came the same day that the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) announced its support for the filibuster spearheaded by Sens. Edward Kennedy and John Kerry, both Massachusetts Democrats." The comments also "follow attempts by the Congressional Black Caucus (CBC) to derail the nomination of Alito."

Alito's Confirmation May Usher In "Kennedy Court." The Washington Post (1/31, A4, Lane, 744K) says Alito's confirmation "will mark the beginning of a new Supreme Court era -- and, perhaps more important, the end of an old, familiar one. For much of the past 24 years, Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, whom Alito would replace, has wielded the swing vote on a split court, usually casting her lot with the court's four other conservative justices, but siding with liberals on such crucial issues as abortion, affirmative action and campaign finance reform." Alito's arrival, however, "may turn the O'Connor Court into the Kennedy Court. If, as many expect, Alito forms a four-vote conservative bloc with Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas, that would leave Justice Anthony M. Kennedy -- a conservative who has occasionally voted with liberals on gay rights, the death penalty and abortion -- as the court's least predictable member."

Alito, Roberts Confirmations Seen As Culmination Of Reagan Revolution. The Los Angeles Times (1/31, Savage, 958K) reports, "Twenty-five years ago, President Reagan came to Washington with bold plans to move the Supreme Court to the right. He and his lawyers wanted a high court that would uphold state laws that impose the death penalty, restrict abortion and allow a greater role for religion in public life. They favored property rights over environmental regulation, states' rights over broad federal authority and executive power over Congress and the federal courts." The Times adds, "Now, with the Senate about to confirm Judge Samuel A. Alito Jr., a second generation of Reagan disciples stands ready to fulfill the former president's vision for the court." Alito, like Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr., "was drawn to the conservative ethos of the Reagan administration in the 1980s. Both men worked in Reagan's Justice Department and as advocates for the administration before the Supreme Court."

Pickering Preparing Second Book On Judicial Confirmation Process. Roll Call (1/31, Hocking) reports Judge Charles Pickering "set out to write a book about the problems with the current judicial confirmation process and his own experience. … Pickering and his publisher rushed 'Supreme Chaos: The Politics of Judicial Confirmation and the Culture War,' released this month, to the printer — thus providing him with a platform to discuss Alito's confirmation process." According to Roll Call, "The juicy bits will come later, in a second book due out 'either this fall or the first part of next year'…Pickering says."

Bush Nominates Five To Federal Bench. The New Jersey Law Journal (1/31, Booth) reports, "President Bush last Wednesday acted to fill four vacancies on the U.S. District Court and one on the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals." The Journal continues, "Assistant U.S. Attorney Renee Bumb was named for a seat in Camden, N.J., while U.S. Magistrate Judge Susan Wigenton, U.S. Department of Justice official Noel Hillman and Peter Sheridan, the former executive director of the Republican State Committee, were nominated for three district court seats in Newark, N.J. … For the 3rd Circuit, Bush nominated former federal prosecutor Michael Chagares, now with Hackensack, N.J.'s Cole, Schotz, Meisel, Forman & Leonard." The Journal adds, "The nominees must be considered by the Senate Judiciary Committee, which has not yet scheduled hearings, and voted on by the full Senate."

Bush To Deliver State Of The Union Amid Lagging Poll Numbers. President Bush will deliver his State of the Union speech tonight. The AP (1/30, Loven) reports that the "unspoken agenda underpinning the address" is the "rescue of his presidency from arguably its worst year. His poll numbers fell to the lowest point of his presidency under the weight of missteps following Hurricane Katrina, soaring energy costs, the withdrawal of a Supreme Court nominee, the failure of his high-profile effort to drive a Social Security overhaul, and increasing scrutiny from the public and Congress of the unpopular Iraq war. While Bush's approval rating has recovered slightly, it remains in the still-anemic low 40s. It is a matter of concern for Republicans as they worry about maintaining control of Congress in this fall's midterm elections."

CNN's The Situation Room (1/30, Bash) reported that Bush is "going to go before Congress and the American people at a time where more than six in 10 Americans do not think the country is heading in the right direction and actually think it has gotten worse since Mr. Bush has been in office. And that is a very, very dire thing for this president in terms of shaping his legacy and more immediately, for his party in this year's election." Bush is "going to try to be optimistic. The President himself said there in the Cabinet Room, he's going to try to be upbeat. But he does have one major new theme that Bush aides are telling us about, that is to talk about the idea of being competitive, still being a leader in the world economically and in terms of foreign policy."

Roll Call (1/31, Pierce) reports, "Rather than unveiling sweeping policy changes to Social Security or announcing future trips to Mars, it appears President Bush will largely be offering some old reruns a better time slot in tonight's State of the Union address. It's an agenda that should receive a lot of enthusiastic applause from the right side of the House chamber, considering most of the Congressional Republican agenda mirrors the items on Bush's 2006 to-do list." The Dallas Morning News (1/31) reports Bush "will try to turn the page and refocus the nation's attention on a handful of more narrowly drawn domestic issues that his strategists hope will be winning planks for his fellow Republicans in this fall's mid-term elections." Knight Ridder (1/31, Lambrecht) reports Republicans say they "hope that both in substance and tone, the president's State of the Union address can begin to shift the focus away from war, scandal and suspicion that failure has replaced the once-rosy promise of GOP control of Washington. Many in his party hope the president steers clear of the partisanship that has come to define Washington."

The Philadelphia Inquirer (1/31, Hutcheson, 423K) reports Bush "has been pushing big, bold ideas since he took office, but don't expect more of the same when he goes before Congress tonight for this year's State of the Union address. With plenty on his plate already, Bush is not looking to add much more. Instead of promoting new ideas for sweeping change, the President is expected to focus on relatively small, achievable goals. He will also spend a good bit of time trying to shore up support for work in progress, especially the Iraq war."

Knight Ridder (1/31, Thomma) reports Bush "faces one of the most daunting political challenges of his career Tuesday night when he kicks off a pivotal midterm-election year" with his speech. Bush "must frame the year's coming debate in a way that will lead Americans to stay the course with his Republican Party running the government, at a time when polls show that voters are in a sour mood and restless for change." Knight Ridder writes that Bush is "weaker than any sixth-year president since Richard Nixon in 1974, when the Watergate scandal forced him to resign, led to big Republican losses in Congress and set the stage for the party's loss of the White House two years later. Bush's standing rivals that of Democrat Harry Truman in 1950, when Democrats lost seats in Congress and went on to lose the presidency two years later."

USA Today (1/31, Benedetto, 2.31M) writes, "In a city renowned for its many speeches -- long and short, lofty and mundane, partisan and profound -- the State of the Union is The Big One. It is a chance for the president to try to rally citizens in times of internal strife or external peril, and to reassure them when times are good. It is also the president's best chance to lay out his agenda and shape the political debate for the next 12 months. It is an opportunity, as it will be for President Bush when he speaks at 9:01 ET tonight, for presidents to regain public confidence that has been lost or seems to be slipping. Bush's job approval in a USA TODAY/CNN/Gallup Poll on Jan. 20-22 is 43% and has not been above 50% for the past 10 months."

Reporting on a new NBC News/Wall Street Journal (1/31, Harwood) poll, the Journal writes, "A politically weakened President Bush addresses the nation tonight facing two clear demands from the American public: solve problems in the health-care system and bring U.S. troops home from Iraq." NBC Nightly News (1/30, story 4, 3:00, Williams) said, "We should start at the very beginning and that all-important approval number." NBC's Tim Russert: "The President hopes he had made some progress, but that's not the case. We only had 39% approval, and 54% disapproval. … These are the top priorities for the American people. First, Iraq, not surprising -- bringing the troops home, 35%. Health care, 20%. Stimulate the economy, 17%. The prescription drug program, 11%. Fix it. Cut the deficit, 8%. Cut taxes, 7%. And Iraq -- now two out of three Americans say it is their view that the troops should come home. … Only one in four Americans, 25%, say the President should set the policy. Congress, 49% of Americans say it should be them, and both equally, 16%. … Here's lobbying. Which party is more influenced by special interests? 22% of Americans say the Democrats, 36% say no, it's the Republicans. And 33%, one-third of Americans, say both parties equally. We talk about eavesdropping, it's very important. This is the President's position in effect: Should there be wiretaps without court order? 51% approve, 46% disapprove. That's the President's position in favor, but what about concerns? 56% say they have concerns about wiretaps without warrants, and 43% say they're not concerned." On MSNBC's Hardball (1/30), Russert said the President's approval numbers are "frozen in place."

The Christian Science Monitor (1/31, Feldmann, 61K) writes, "The question for President Bush is, will 'wooable' Americans be watching? And what can he say that will grab them and force a second look? In recent weeks, the White House has telegraphed the major elements of this year's speech: an initiative to make healthcare more affordable, ideas to reduce US dependence on foreign energy, a call to extend tax cuts. The defining issues of Mr. Bush's presidency -- the Iraq war and larger war on terror -- will also occupy center stage. But according to the Pew Research Center, the public has modest expectations for this year's address: Only 30 percent of Americans say it will be more important than past State of the Union messages, down from recent years."

Optimism, Ongoing War On Terror Among Likely Themes. USA Today (1/31, Raasch, 2.31M) outlines "broad themes" likely to appear in the address: "We are in the midst of a long, hard war against fundamentalist terrorism, but this president doesn't give up and neither should Americans"; Bush "will portray himself as 'optimist in chief' and, by implication, his political foes as pessimists and defeatists"; "Mistakes have been made, but they were not purposeful and Bush was not alone in making them"; "This is war and when it comes to your safety, the buck stops with the president."

Alternative Fuel, Nuclear Power To Figure In Speech. The New York Times (1/31, Bumiller, Sanger, 1.19M) reports Bush "will renew a call for the development of alternative fuel for automobiles and promote the construction of new nuclear power plants" in his speech. After "years of partisan arguments over the administration's efforts to open new parts of the country for oil and gas drilling, Mr. Bush will cast his discussion of nonoil sources of energy as an economic imperative for the United States and a national security necessity to reduce dependence on Middle Eastern oil." The Times says the "issues have been part of Mr. Bush's agenda for years, but never a top priority."

initiatives in tonight's State of the Union speech, credit (or blame) goes to Nora Maccoby. At the end of the year, Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld was seen at a holiday party in Georgetown genially locking horns" with the screenwriter. After a "half-hour of Maccoby lecturing Rummy that energy independence through renewable clean sources should be the heart of a national security strategy, a grinning Rumsfeld bleated to those nearby, 'I can't believe this -- this girl's kicking my ass, and she's right.' Then to Maccoby, 'Call the Secretary of Energy. You can use my name.'"

Bush Said To Have Mixed Track Record On Fulfilling SOTU Plans. The Wall Street Journal (1/31, 2.11M) examines Bush's track record on State of the Union promises. Last year, Bush "declared: 'We'll start on Social Security now.' But after a year of hard campaigning, the president has acknowledged that reform plans are dead for now, in what amounts to his biggest domestic defeat to date." In the Middle East, "the Bush administration has made strides, though some hot zones remain to be defused." On immigration, legislation "has been slow-moving, but as the topic is sure to be a hot-button issue in the 2006 congressional elections, the president has moved it up on his agenda." The Journal also traces the mixed results of Bush's State of the Union vows back to 2001.

Anti-Bush Protestors To Gather At Capitol Reflecting Pool Tonight. The Washington Times (1/31, Mansfield, 90K) reports, "Liberal activists -- among them graying leftovers from the Vietnam-era antiwar movement -- plan to gather near the Capitol tonight, banging pots and pans to drown out President Bush's State of the Union address." On Monday, "opponents of the Iraq war kicked off their latest round of demonstrations with an 'Impeachment Forum' held downtown in a private dining room at Busboys and Poets. Featured speakers were 78-year-old former U.S. Attorney General Ramsey Clark; longtime war protester Marcus Raskin, 71, who is head of the Institute for Policy Studies; and Cindy Sheehan, mother of an American soldier killed in Iraq. Sheehan "plans to speak tonight to protesters at the Capitol Reflecting Pool. Last week, the group 'World Can't Wait -- Drive Out the Bush Regime' was denied a permit to gather on the Mall for security reasons. The group won a federal lawsuit and has been given permission to bang away while Mr. Bush speaks to a joint session of Congress at 9 p.m." The Washington Post (1/31, A2, Milbank, 744K) writes that at the "Impeachment Forum" event, Sheehan, "just back from Caracas, where she praised Venezuela's anti-American president, Hugo Chavez, and called Bush a 'terrorist,' said she expects Democrats will 'seriously screw up' the midterm elections in November."

Utah Town's Support For Bush "Nearly Unanimous." The Washington Post (1/31, A1, Finkel, 744K) profiles the town of Randolph, Utah, a town of about 480 people "where Bush received 95.6 percent of the vote" in 2004 "and support for him continues to be nearly unanimous. … There have been no funerals here from Bush's war on terrorism. There are no unemployment lines, no homeless people sleeping in doorways, no sick people being turned away from a hospital because of a lack of insurance, no crime to speak of, no security fence needed around the reservoir, no metal detectors at the schools."

NYTimes, WPost Say Bush Should Not Take Too Much Credit For Economy. The New York Times (1/31, 1.19M) editorializes, "When President Bush gives his State of the Union address tonight, expect to hear a renewed call for setting the administration's first-term tax cuts in concrete, combined with warnings that letting the cuts expire would retard economic growth. Nothing could be further from the truth. As proof of tax cuts' ability to spur the economy, Mr. Bush generally cites productivity growth, job creation and the rise in personal income. Productivity has indeed been stellar, and supply-siders claim that is because tax cuts have led to investment, which led to higher productivity. But business investment has been flat for five years. Meanwhile, the benefits of productivity growth have been concentrated among the wealthy. … Tonight is Mr. Bush's night to speak. But it's the job of all of us to be critical listeners."

The Washington Post (1/31, A16, 744K) editorializes, "Bush will be tempted to take credit for the strength of the economy. The recovery that began four years ago has been robust, with gross domestic product growing 4.2 percent in 2004 and 3.5 percent in 2005 despite a slowdown in the last quarter. Productivity -- that is, the value of goods produced for each hour of labor -- has increased even faster than during the boom of the late 1990s and roughly twice as fast as during the previous two decades. But Mr. Bush should not crow too much. For one thing, U.S. prosperity is built on an alarming trade deficit, which symbolizes a broader fragility in the global economy. For another, economic progress is not showing up in higher wages for the typical worker. … On the trade deficit, the best response is to boost national saving, and the surest way for government to do that is to cut the federal deficit. On wage stagnation, it would be a mistake to intervene directly in labor markets, but growing inequality reaffirms the case for a progressive tax structure. Mr. Bush could show he understands that by rethinking his enthusiasm for tax cuts. If only."

USA Today Says Congress Should Assert Itself With Bush. USA Today (1/31, 2.31M) editorializes, "When President Bush goes to the Capitol tonight for his State of the Union address, he will undoubtedly receive a standing ovation from the assembled members of Congress. They might as well be on their knees with their foreheads bowed to the floor, prostrating themselves as a gesture of their fecklessness in exercising their constitutional role as a separate and equal branch of government. Among the recent examples of the administration's airy disregard of Congress: It dismissed questions about the legality of its warrantless spying; It stonewalled an inquiry into the response to Hurricane Katrina; Mine-safety officials walked out of a hearing on coal-mine tragedies; Bush opened his news conference last week by saying Congress 'must' reauthorize the USA Patriot Act and the Senate 'needs' to vote quickly on his nomination of Samuel Alito to the U.S. Supreme Court. That's not exactly what the Founders had in mind."

More Commentary On State Of The Union Address. In a Wall Street Journal (1/31, 2.11M) op-ed, Fred Barnes of the Weekly Standard writes, "When running for re-election in 2004, and again last year as he campaigned for Social Security reform, President Bush repeatedly advocated an 'ownership society.' It was a bold concept aimed at producing an historic shift in power from Washington bureaucrats to individual Americans. But 'ownership society' is not a phrase you're likely to hear from him tonight in his State of the Union address. … At best, there will be faint echoes. Injecting free-market incentives into the health-care system is a major part of the ownership society idea. And the president plans to propose new tax breaks to reduce out-of-pocket medical expenses, especially to help the uninsured. Expanding health savings accounts (HSAs), which allow individuals to decide on routine medical expenses, is a Bush priority. So is reducing the impact of the alternative minimum tax, a modest stab at tax reform. He also intends to note that Social Security is still headed toward bankruptcy. That's it -- all fairly tame stuff compared to the vast reach of his ownership society scheme."

In his Washington Post (1/31, A17, 744K) column, George Will writes, "The success of the terrorist organization Hamas in the Palestinian elections is but the latest proof of what happens when the forms of democracy are severed from what the president, with a cosmopolitan shrug, dismissively called 'our own Western standards of progress.' Now comes wishful thinking, and then cynicism. … Tonight, on the 1,050th day of the Iraq war (the 912th day of American participation in World War II was D-Day), the nation needs an adult hour, including a measured meditation on overreaching, from the Middle East to Medicare's prescription drug entitlement. But in State of the Union addresses, rarely is heard a discouraging word."

In his Wall Street Journal (1/31, 2.11M) column, George Melloan writes, "The president will say that the state of the union is good and cite supporting evidence. Unemployment is less than 5% of the work force. The economy grew well last year, despite a surprising fourth-quarter slowdown, and is expected to do so again this year. That America's ownership society is thriving can be seen in the burgeoning holdings of assets such as houses and securities. The president can claim, if he so wishes, that his first-term tax cuts fostered this expansion and broadening of national wealth. … The president has been thwarted on two major efforts to grant Americans greater choice in how they manage their personal affairs. A sensible idea for switching from the pay-as-you-go Social Security retirement system to private accounts that would build up during a working lifetime has been blocked by those rugged individualists he will address tonight. Tax reform and simplification is stalled as well. As will be evident even to a casual viewer, the men and women attending tonight's party enjoy their power. Dragging it out of their hands by granting Americans greater economic freedom is always a formidable task."

In a Financial Times (1/31) column, Caroline Daniel writes, "Bush likes to say that his job is to confront big problems, not leave them to those who follow. As he prepares to deliver the State of the Union address he has been forced to tackle the issues bequeathed him by the man who has occupied the White House for the past five years: himself. The sixth year of a two-term presidency is a critical time. It offers a last chance to shape the domestic political agenda and exploit the bully pulpit of moral leadership before attention is diverted to the succession battle." For Bush, "the chief constraints are managing the fall-out from his signature first-term policies."

In his Washington Post (1/31, A17, 744K) column, Eugene Robinson writes, "If there were justice in the world, George W. Bush would have to give his State of the Union address from Oprah's couch. Not when she's being the New Age, touchy-feely Oprah, though. Bush should have to face the wrathful, Old Testament Oprah who subjected author James Frey to that awful public smiting the other day. She could open with the same line she used on Frey, whose best-selling memoir, which Oprah had touted on her show, turned out to be a tissue of lies. 'I have to say it is -- it is difficult for me to talk to you, because I really feel duped. I feel duped,' Oprah could tell the president."

In his New York Times (1/31, 1.19M) column, Nicholas Kristof writes, "President Bush is slated to discuss health care in his State of the Union address tonight. It's about time: it's scandalous that babies born in the United States are less likely to survive their first year than babies born in Slovenia. But the solutions to the health crisis lie less in reorganizing medical treatment than in improving public health -- such as steering kids away from French fries. … Granted, a War on Sloth isn't as dramatic for the Bush administration as a War on Terrorism. And for Democrats, attacking junk food isn't as attention-grabbing as denouncing corruption in Congress. But there is perhaps no area of public policy where it would be easier to save the lives of countless Americans than in promoting public health."

In a Roll Call (1/31) column, David Winston of the Republican polling firm the Winston Group writes, "Tonight, the president gives his State of the Union address amid political uncertainty. … With the 2006 Congressional elections 10 months away, this one has more riding on it than any other SOTU since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks -- in part because Republicans are facing a more difficult political environment. Nonetheless, despite of a handful tough races and poll numbers, Republicans would probably hold both the Senate and the House if the elections were held today. A few seats could shift to the Democrats, but this outlook is certainly an improvement over last September's prospects, when the Republican majority seemed vulnerable."

In a Washington Post (1/31, A17, 744K) op-ed, writer David Atkins writes in the voice of the President, "While State of the Union speeches belong to the genre of nonfiction, they are inevitably a personal, subjective recounting by the president. … Some errors appear to be innocent mistakes in copy-editing. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales has alerted me that the line, 'No person is above the law' should instead be 'One person is above the law.' My comment that 'we have carefully listened to critics of our domestic surveillance program' should have read 'listened in on…' … In the spirit of bipartisanship, I included the Clinton period in calculating the '24 million jobs we have created through the end of 2005.' … The statement that 'our administration has always respected the importance of checks and balances' is not, as has been implied, a reference to disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff. I have no recollection of ever meeting Abramoff…nor his lovely and charming wife, Pamela, and their cute and rambunctious twins."

In a New York Times (1/31, 1.19M) op-ed, Ted Widmer, a "speechwriter and senior adviser to President Clinton," writes about the use of the phrase, "The state of our union is strong!" in many such addresses, writing that while "the Constitution does not technically require that these seven words be spoken by the president," like a "clogged artery, the sentence has hardened into oratorical tradition. … Let's face it, no president wants to admit that things aren't going well. Over the years, our leaders have evaded frank discussion of their records through a variety of maneuvers, including obfuscation through statistics, the introduction of audience members and ringing references to the founders."

In a New York Times (1/31, 1.19M) op-ed, communications consultant Francis Wilkinson writes, "If there is a bandwagon in the works to eliminate the president's State of the Union address, I'm jumping aboard. There has always been something uncomfortably imperious about the speech. … Bill Clinton's final State of the Union expired after 9,000 words and more kitchen sinks than you'll find at Home Depot. The Gettysburg Address, by comparison, was 266 words. It's perhaps not too early to predict which of the two speeches the world will little note nor long remember. President Bush has been less fortunate. Not one but two of his addresses have produced entries for the books. The first was the over-greased 'axis of evil' in 2002 -- alluring alliteration made memorable by inadvertent inanity. The second, in 2003, consisted of those 16 words about Saddam Hussein's uranium safari -- and yes, even the 'has' and 'of' turned out to be false."

Bush To Visit Tennessee, Minnesota To Promote State Of The Union Initiatives. The Tennessean (1/31, De La Cruz) reports President Bush "will share his 2006 agenda with Republican activists from Middle Tennessee, as well as business and community leaders, in a Nashville speech tomorrow -- his first following tonight's State of the Union address. Hundreds of tickets were distributed to GOP officeholders, the state Republican Party and organizations to distribute. … The speech is scheduled for 11:50 a.m. at the Grand Ole Opry House."

The St. Paul Pioneer-Press (1/31, 200K) reports Bush will visit Maplewood, Minnesota, Thursday to "tout some of the initiatives he will outline" in his speech. White House spokesman Allen Abney said the appearance "will be 'part of him going out across the country to follow up on initiatives that he discusses' in his nationally televised speech." The visit "comes as Bush is slumping in public opinion polls in Minnesota. The most recent poll, conducted Jan. 13-15 by SurveyUSA, showed 56 percent of Minnesota disapproved of the president's job performance while 39 percent approved."

Kaine Plans To Speak Against Partisanship, Negativity In Politics. The AP (1/30, Fournier) reports Virginia Gov. Timothy Kaine, "tapped to deliver the State of the Union response for Democrats, has sharp words for both parties in Washington: Stop being so partisan, negative and irrelevant. 'There's a better way,' he said Monday." In an interview, Kaine said, "I want to contrast what I consider to be an administration that is super partisan and not really able to deliver results with a different model, a better way, which is what we've been doing in Virginia and other states." But he also "said Democrats in Washington also could learn from the success achieved by him and 11 other Democratic governors who run states that Bush carried in 2004."

The Boston Globe (1/31, Klein, 484K) reports the Democrats' selection of Kaine is part of the party's "intensifying efforts to reach out to Catholic voters." Kaine, "a devout Catholic who spoke openly about his faith during his election campaign last year, will speak about his work as a Jesuit missionary in Honduras, said Delacey Skinner, a Kaine spokeswoman. Kaine said that experience during his time as a Harvard Law School student inspired him to enter public service."

Democratic Leaders Will Not Bring Special Guests To State Of The Union. The Washington Times (1/31, Pierce, 90K) reports in its "Inside Politics" column, "Special folks -- usually connected to major news events or issues -- are always featured guests of President Bush for his State of the Union address, but Democrats are free to do the same to highlight their own priorities or make their own points. So far, neither Democratic leader plans to bring special, high-profile guests to the House chamber for the speech tonight. Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada will not bring any newsmakers with him, an aide said, and House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi of California will stick with family and friends for the big speech, an aide said."

Blanco To Attend State Of The Union. The AP (1/30) reports Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Blanco will attend the State of the Union speech. Blanco "has been at odds with the White House over government response to Hurricane Katrina, but was invited to sit in the gallery for Bush's speech on Tuesday night, Blanco's office said."

Two New Yorkers Bring 9/11 Messages To SOTU. The New York Daily News (1/31, McAuliff, 729K) reports, "President Bush won't be the only one making political points about 9/11 at tonight's State of the Union speech. At least two New Yorkers invited to the address by state lawmakers will be there to illustrate their own, very different points. 'Let's see if we get some truth,' said Monica Gabrielle, who lost her husband on Sept. 11, 2001, and will listen to Bush with Sen. Hillary Clinton (D-N.Y.)." And "Marvin Bethea, a paramedic sickened by his 9/11 exposure who is coming with Rep. Carolyn Maloney (D-Manhattan), has a message for Bush and the rest of the federal government." Bethea said, "I want every member of Congress to look at me and remember me when they go to bed at night."

Hinchey, Other Democrats Advise Bush To Be Accurate. The Binghamton (NY) Press & Sun Bulletin (1/31, Farmer) reports on Democratic Rep. Maurice Hinchey's advice to President Bush on his fifth State of the Union address, which echoed nine other Democrats who sent a letter to the President urging he "pay attention to the accuracy of the information in his speech." Such "attention to detail is crucial, given Bush has delivered incorrect information in past State of the Union addresses, Hinchey said. The most notable example, Hinchey said, came when the president said in his 2003 address, 'The British government has learned that Saddam Hussein recently sought significant quantities of uranium from Africa.' … 'He has never 'fessed up to that situation,' Hinchey said."

Congress To Begin Hearings On Medicare Drug Benefit Program. The Washington Post (1/31, A15, Murray, Babington, 744K) writes, "Is the Medicare drug benefit suffering from start-up pains, or is there something more serious going on? Lawmakers got an earful from seniors about the new program while they were home for the winter recess. Now that Congress is back in session, lawmakers will begin weighing whether to make legislative adjustments or wait and see whether the glitches work themselves out." Medicare officials will go before a Senate committee on Thursday to testify "about how the various problems are being addressed," and next week, the Senate Finance Committee will also take up the matter. While the benefit "took effect just a month ago," Democrats "are pressing Republicans to streamline the benefit, to make it easier for seniors to navigate, and to provide emergency relief for people who are having trouble getting their prescriptions filled."

Drug Industry Lobbyists Active In Every State. The New York Times (1/31, Saul, 1.19M) reports on the drug industry's lobbying efforts, noting that while it is best known for having the richest lobbying force in Washington, the industry "also protects its flanks — all 50 of them. Drug lobbyists are active all around the country at the state level, because even with bright political lines dividing the nation into red and blue, the industry knows that controlling drug costs is a subject with nearly universal popular appeal." The Times adds, "Many drug industry issues are on legislative agendas again this year. And this Friday in New York, an association of lawmakers from New York, West Virginia, eight other states and the District of Columbia plan to meet to discuss their plans for pursuing industry regulation."

Budget Bill Includes New Welfare Work Requirements. The Los Angeles Times (1/31, Havemann, 958K) reports that the bill "includes provisions toughening welfare regulations, including work requirements on two-parent welfare families that experts say is almost impossible to meet." The measure "would hold adults in two-parent families to a higher work standard than those in single-parent families. States that failed to meet the standard would lose some of their federal welfare money unless they chose to exclude two-parent families from assistance. .. The bill before the House provides that the adults in 90% of the two-parent welfare families must, between them, put in 35 hours a week either working, training for work, or participating in other job-related activities. States would face an easier work requirement for their single-parent families. Half of all parents would have to work 20 hours a week if they have a child under 6, or 30 hours if their children are older."

Dionne Says No One Who Supports GOP Budget Is A "Reformer." E.J. Dionne writes in the Washington Post (1/31, A17, 744K) that there is "an uncomfortable bit of business left over from the Republican disaster year of 2005 that will test the seriousness of the party's supposed commitment to change. The cut-the-poor, help-the-big-interests federal budget passed last year needs final ratification in the House. The vote could take place as soon as tomorrow. Let's be clear: Anyone who votes for this fiscal mess will be standing for the bad old ways of doing business in Washington. Those who do so will have no claim to being 'reformers.'"

House GOP Promises Stricter Oversight Of Executive Branch Spending. House Republicans said yesterday that President Bush should expect stricter congressional oversight on spending and executive branch agencies this year. The Washington Times (1/31, Dinan, 90K) reports that Majority Whip Roy Blunt "said House Republicans have not done well at oversight in the past 11 years, initially because they were learning how to be a majority party and then because they didn't know how to approach oversight of a Republican administration. He said they will have to 'get significantly better than we have been.'" Republican Study Committee Chairman Rep. Mike Pence "said spending is the top issue for House conservatives, followed by the sanctity of marriage and ethics reforms."

Congressional Club Asks Donors For $50,000 For Lunch With First Lady. The Congressional Club, an organization of lawmakers' spouses, is asking donors for $50,000 apiece for lunch, a reception with First Lady Laura Bush and a private reception with lawmakers and their spouses. The Hill (1/31, Kaplan) reports, "The blunt language of the fundraising letter and the fact that the sum sought is double what it was in previous years are drawing criticism that suggests the fallout from the scandal surrounding Jack Abramoff and former Rep. Randy 'Duke' Cunningham (R-Calif.) is tainting even the quaintest and most bipartisan of Washington social organizations. … In the club's Jan. 19 letter, which several sources read to The Hill, organizers tell potential donors that $50,000 buys 12 tickets to the lunch and admittance to the receptions with Bush and the lawmakers. 'The language and the amount of money they're asking for shows very poor judgment,' a source familiar with the letter said. 'In this day and age, the amount of money they're asking for is inappropriate.'" superintendent who's better known as Mayor Bloomberg's girlfriend — will not be tapped to head the Federal Deposit Insurance Corp. it was reported yesterday. The stunning news came after months of speculation that Taylor had been all but assured the job, even having already sailed through an FBI background check." The Post adds, "Last night, a source with close ties to the administration was asked if he had heard the latest news. 'I knew it weeks ago — she's going to get it,' the source said. When told that she was no longer in the running, the source responded with a stunned, 'What?!'"

Bush Appoints New Chair Of Council Of Economic Advisers. The Washington Post (1/31, A7, Henderson, 744K) reports, "President Bush plans to nominate Stanford University business professor Edward P. Lazear, a specialist in workplace issues, to become chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers, the White House announced yesterday." Lazear, 'if confirmed by the Senate, would become one of the administration's top officials responsible for advising, crafting and marketing the president's economic policies." The Wall Street Journal (1/31, 2.11M) says Lazear "was a member of Mr. Bush's advisory Tax Reform Panel, which submitted proposals for overhauling the tax code to the Treasury Department last year." He also is "a senior fellow at the Hoover Institution, Stanford's public-policy research center." The Journal adds, "The founder of a field known as personnel economics, Mr. Lazear has focused his research on employee incentives, promotions, compensation and productivity in companies. His expertise might help the White House better understand a troubling political phenomenon: why many workers give the administration relatively low marks on the economy, amid strong growth and low unemployment."

House Majority Leader Hopefuls Make Pitches To GOP Study Committee. Reps. Roy Blunt, John Boehner and John Shaddeg, the three candidates for House Majority Leader, pitched their candidacies at the annual retreat of the Republican Study Committee in Baltimore yesterday. The New York Times (1/31, Hulse, 1.19M) reports that the overture to the influential group of House conservatives, "along with a similar session set for Tuesday with House moderates, was part of the concentrated lawmaker-to-lawmaker campaigning typical of party elections, with members of the exclusive electorate trying to gauge how a candidate might do the job and, perhaps more important, calculate what might be in it for them. In recent weeks, there have been rumors of secret deals cut in exchange for votes: a chairmanship here, help with a jurisdictional dispute there. But each of the candidates denies any explicit offer of a quid pro quo, and lawmakers being wooed support that account."

Roll Call (1/31, Pershing) adds that "the dominant theme of Monday's session was the impending race for Majority Leader between GOP Reps. Roy Blunt (Mo.), John Boehner (Ohio) and John Shadegg (Ariz.) and how the conservatives who made the trip to Baltimore -- many of whom are publicly committed to one of the three candidates -- could force a second ballot Thursday and potentially decide the race."

Blunt Says He Has Majority Of Votes. The Washington Times (1/31, Dinan, 90K) notes, "Unlike recent coronations, this year's election is turning into a real race. Mr. Blunt yesterday said he continues to have a majority, but the list of those who are publicly supporting the Missourian is at least 20 votes short of the 117 votes needed to win a majority of the 232 members of the House Republican Conference. 'It's pretty clear Mr. Blunt does not have the votes to win it on a first ballot,' Mr. Shadegg said. 'There's a very vigorous debate going on about reform and about whether we can simply remain with the status quo.'"

The Hill (1/31, O'Connor) adds, "Boehner and Shadegg are trying to force a second ballot and to beat each other on the first. Supporters for both suggested an erosion of support, or 'buyer's remorse,' for Blunt." The Hill adds, "Without offering specific examples, Boehner suggested that Blunt had made explicit promises to members during the elections, but Blunt dismissed that suggestion outright."

Tomorrow's Budget Vote Seen As Critical For Blunt. The House's consideration of a $39 billion package of spending cuts tomorrow is seen as a critical moment for Blunt. The Hill (1/31, Allen) reports that the vote comes one day before GOP members will vote in the race for Majority Leader and a strong victory on the budget vote "would boost Blunt's campaign." A "loss, a delayed vote or any extension of the typical 15-minute vote, however, could be devastating. And the current political climate isn't helping Blunt's vote-gathering efforts."

White House May Disclose Abramoff's White House Meetings After State Of The Union. In its "Washington Wire" column on its web site, the Wall Street

Journal (1/30, 2.11M) reported, "With ethics questions swirling and pressure building from Republican allies on Capitol Hill, some within the White House are pressing for full disclosure of disgraced Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff's meetings with White House staff. One factor in the delay has been concern about diverting attention from Bush's message in Tuesday night's speech, according to a Republican close to the administration. A post-speech release appears increasingly likely, although no final decision has been made."

Reid Defends Efforts On Behalf Of Abramoff Clients. Fox News' Special Report (1/30, Garrett) reported, "In an exclusive interview with Fox Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid defended his efforts to help Native American clients of disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff. … Reid also dodged Democratic Party Chairman Howard Dean's criticism on Fox News Sunday of any Democrat who helped an Abramoff tribal client." Reid "wrote a letter on March 5th, 2002 to Interior Secretary Gail Norton on behalf of a Louisiana Indian tribe, the Coushattas, who were trying to block federal approval of a casino sought by a rival tribe. The next day, a Reed political fund, the Searchlight Leadership Fund, received a $5,000 from the Coushattas, an Abramoff client."

Numerous Scandals Continue To Embroil Washington. The CBS Evening News (1/30, story 8, 2:00, Borger) surveyed the various scandals embroiling "official Washington" on the "eve of the President's State of the Union speech. … Start with this man, Jack Abramoff. Once a well connected Republican lobbyist, now singing to federal prosecutors in a congressional bribery scandal. His friend, former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, forced to give up his leadership post after being indicted in Texas for money laundering. Ohio Republican Bob Ney, forced to give up his committee chairmanship after prosecutors tied him to Abramoff. And while Democrats haven't received any money from Abramoff's own checkbook, they did receive $1.5 million he directed to them through his clients. So when 100 members rushed to return Abramoff-tainted money to charity, it was a bipartisan stampede. Even the President joined in, sending $6,000 in Abramoff donations to charity. What the President won't reveal: the pictures taken of him with the lobbyist at White House functions. And although Abramoff was a top Bush money man, the President says he doesn't know him. … Don't forget that other Washington scandal that still haunts the White House, the CIA leak investigation. Federal prosecutors want to know who if anyone inside the White House knowingly leaked the identity of an undercover CIA agent to Washington journalists. That's a crime. And lying about it is a crime too. That's what Scooter Libby, Vice President Cheney's chief of staff, has been charged with. … Will Dick Cheney testify? Expect this case to drag on. Top presidential advisor Karl Rove is still under investigation for his role in the leaks. … And there's more: Republican Duke Cunningham resigned after admitting he took bribes. Democrat Bill Jefferson was the target in an FBI sting in which cash was found in his freezer. … The President is likely to support lobbying reform in his State of the Union speech. No doubt, everyone will applaud."

Democrats Try To Tie Sweeney To "Culture Of Corruption" In Washington. New York Democrats are questioning Rep. John Sweeney's ties to lobbyists in the hope of ousting from his upstate New York congressional seat. The New York Times (1/31, Hernandez, 1.19M) reports that Democrats are seizing on reports that Sweeney "recently organized a $2,000-a-person 'Skiing with Sweeney' weekend getaway attended by lobbyists at a ski resort in Park City, Utah, as well as a dinner at the home of Jeffrey Kimbell, a pharmaceutical industry lobbyist. The Democrats who have attacked Mr. Sweeney in newspaper interviews, news releases and a satirical Internet advertisement are arguing that Mr. Sweeney's actions reflect a larger culture of corruption that has enveloped Washington under Republican rule. The attacks notwithstanding, he has not been implicated in any of the troubles that have touched other Republicans. … The attacks on Mr. Sweeney come as New York Democrats say they plan to use the fallout over the lobbying scandal in Washington as an issue to mount vigorous challenges against Mr. Sweeney and other Republicans they say are too close to Republican leaders on the Hill."

Obey Says Leadership Has Repeatedly Bent, Broken House Rules. Rep. David Obey, ranking member of the House Appropriations Committee, writes in Roll Call (1/31), "I believe that the way the Republican-led Congress has handled Congressional earmarks has gotten way out of hand. The use of earmarks to reward Members who vote for questionable legislation has expanded hugely since Republicans took control. … There is no question that earmarking needs to be restrained. … But having said that, let's keep our eye on the real problem. The real problem with the appropriations process is not the occasional inappropriate earmark that slips through, as embarrassing as that might be. The real problem is that the rules of the House of Representatives — rules based on procedures recommended by Thomas Jefferson that have developed and matured through precedents established over the past 200 years — have been bent and broken by the House leadership in order to ram through legislation in an arbitrary and often anonymous fashion." The House "must recommit itself to fair and open House procedures."

Republicans Consider Adding 527 Limits To Lobbying Reform Bill. House Republicans are "leaning heavily' toward using the lobbying reform bill to put limits on donations to 527 political groups according to the Wall Street Journal (1/31, Rogers, Mullins, 2.11M). The Journal adds, "Melding the lobbying and campaign-finance issues could make it harder then to win Democratic support in the House. But combining the two issues could give Republicans greater leverage in persuading their members to accept new restrictions on travel and entertainment perks now arranged by lobbyists."

Meehan Warns Against Attaching 527 Crackdown To Lobbying Reform. However, Rep. Marty Meehan is warning against attaching his crack down on 527 groups to lobbying reform bills. The Hill (1/31, Schor) reports that Meehan said, "I don't want to see a poison pill that ends up being an excuse for members to vote against lobbying reform, because we need comprehensive lobbying reform," adding, "Adding 527s complicates passage…creates confusion, creates excuses." The Hill adds, "Even if the 527 language in tomorrow's GOP lobbying and ethics packages is identical to his, Meehan expects the debate to split lawmakers otherwise committed to reining in lobbying abuses."

Congress Seeks To Provide Workers With Advice On 401(k)s. The Wall Street Journal (1/31, Levitz, 2.11M) reports, "Congress wants to make it easier for financial professionals to advise employees on their investment choices in 401(k) plans -- but can't yet agree on how. With employers moving away from fixed-benefit pensions that give employees no investment choices toward fixed-contribution 401(k)s that sometimes give them dozens of choices -- usually mutual funds -- the fund industry has long argued that employees need help to make sound decisions. But federal labor laws designed to protect workers ban firms whose funds are among the employees' investment choices from also telling plan members which funds to choose. … Under the Pension Protection Act, which was passed by the House of Representatives in December, the conflict law would be overridden, permitting funds to give advice." Opponents "including AARP," "say the provision is a lousy idea, akin to a fox guarding the henhouse. The Senate, meanwhile, has approved a measure that would continue the ban on direct advice from fund firms, but would encourage companies to hire neutral third-party advisers to tell employees where they should put their money."

Administration Hopes To Abolish General Schedule Pay System. The Washington Post (1/31, B2, Barr, 744K) reports in its "Federal Diary" column, "The Bush administration hopes to garner congressional support this year for a proposal to abolish the decades-old General Schedule pay and job classification system by 2010 and move federal employees into pay systems that could vary by agency. … Prospects are uncertain for the administration's plan to replace the General Schedule with performance-based pay systems. Lawmakers face a number of difficult issues -- the conflict in Iraq, the rebuilding of New Orleans, possible growth in budgetary red ink -- and the Senate, in particular, does not seem inclined to take up such civil service changes. But the president's pay advisers have said they are encouraged by the debate over their plan."

Ensign Suffers Minor Injuries In Car Crash. The AP (1/31) reports Sen. John Ensign "was treated at a hospital Monday after his car was hit head-on by a driver who fell asleep at the wheel, police said. The Nevada Republican and an aide, who was driving, were taken to Sunrise Hospital with minor to moderate injuries, police said."

OTHER NEWS:

Greenspan To Retire Today, Bernanke To Take Over As Fed Chairman. The CBS Evening News (1/30, story 9, 2:00, Schieffer) offered a farewell to Alan Greenspan, for whom Tuesday is his "last day as Chairman of the Federal Reserve. For nearly two decades now he has defined US monetary policy and in the process become one of the most powerful and influential officials in Washington in recent memory." CBS (Mason) added, "The job had never been high-profile, but Greenspan has become an economic icon, serving four presidents as Fed Chairman. … Many are wondering if his successor will have the Greenspan touch. Behind the Fed's imposing columns, Alan Greenspan himself has become a Washington monument."

The New York Times (1/31, Stolberg, 1.19M) reports, "The important presidential nominee who is scheduled for a vote in the Senate on Tuesday is widely regarded as brilliant, has ties to Princeton University and, if confirmed as expected, will influence the lives of ordinary Americans for years to come. Judge Samuel A. Alito Jr. for the Supreme Court? No, this is the other important nominee -- Ben S. Bernanke for chairman of the Federal Reserve. … While lawmakers and the public have been focused on the nomination of Judge Alito, who is also scheduled for a vote on Tuesday, Mr. Bernanke has become a rarity in modern Washington: the noncontroversial nominee."

The Washington Post (1/31, D1, Henderson, 744K) reports "Fed officials and senior staffers, both in Washington and at the 12 regional Fed banks, will be a critical resource for the new chairman." Bernanke "steps into the job with academic expertise and experience in monetary policy." But "he has no experience in the business world or as a crisis manager, leaving analysts unsure how he would respond to financial shocks such as a stock market crash, dollar collapse, hedge-fund meltdown or another terrorist attack." He "was unavailable for comment."

USA Today (1/31, Hagenbaugh, 2.31M) reports, "When Alan Greenspan retires from the Federal Reserve today, the onetime jazz band musician will be going out on a high note." Greenspan "shepherded the economy through one of the most prosperous periods in US history. In the more than 18 years Greenspan held the reins of the Fed, the economy enjoyed a 10-year economic expansion, the longest in history, and had just two brief recessions that were the mildest since World War II."

The Wall Street Journal (1/31, lp, 2.11M) says Greenspan's "economic legacy seems secure: Inflation and unemployment are lower than when he took office, and during his tenure, the U.S. experienced just two mild recessions and its longest expansion on record." But "the intellectual foundation of that legacy is harder to pinpoint. If there is a single idea informing the success of his nearly two decades at the helm of the Fed, it is that single ideas are to be avoided. There isn't an identifiable Greenspanism or a Greenspan rule because the essence of Mr. Greenspan is his distrust of any 'ism' or rule."

Greenspan's retirement is triggering commentary in this morning's newspapers. In an editorial titled "The Chairman's Mystique," the Wall Street Journal (1/31, 2.11M) says, "The paradox of Alan Greenspan's achievement as he leaves office today after 18 years as Chairman of the Federal Reserve is that nearly everyone is praising his performance but no one seems to know exactly how he did it." He "bequeaths to successor Ben Bernanke a record but not a method -- which means we all have to see if the new guy has the same juggling skills."

USA Today (1/31, 2.31M) editorializes that "to the degree" Greenspan "deserves criticism, it's for supporting President Bush's 2001 tax cuts, which have dried up the federal budget surplus and helped produce record deficits. All in all, however, Greenspan makes an impressive case for himself -- even if no one can understand what he is saying."

Meanwhile, GOP Sen. Jim Bunning, a member of the banking and budget committees, writes in USA Today (1/31, 2.31M), "Greenspan has done an admirable job. However, he has always erred on the side of raising rates. I am not alone in this opinion. History is showing that he made mistakes in raising rates for too long. Aside from being addicted to rate increases, another one of my qualms with Chairman Greenspan was that he talked about everything under the sun — from trade deficits to budget deficits, tax policy to fiscal policy, and even the nation's oil patch. For dinner conversation, these would be fine topics to discuss." But "the Fed's jurisdiction is supposed to be purely monetary policy. Hopefully, his successor, Ben Bernanke, will be a different kind of chairman in these respects. He should stick to monetary policy and not interfere with fiscal issues, which rattle markets and get the bulls and bears into a tizzy."

Milton Friedman, the 1976 Nobel laureate in economics, writes in the Wall Street Journal (1/31, 2.11M), "Greenspan and I have generally found ourselves in accord on monetary theory and policy, with one major exception. I have long favored the use of strict rules to control the amount of money created. Alan says I am wrong and that discretion is preferable, indeed essential. Now that his 18-year stint as chairman of the Fed is finished, I must confess that his performance has persuaded me that he is right -- in his own case." His performance "has indeed been remarkable. There is no other period of comparable length in which the Federal Reserve System has performed so well."

Consumer Spending Up As Savings Rate Hits Post-Depression Low. The Wall Street Journal (1/31, Preciphs, 2.11M) reports, "Consumers ended the year on a free-spending note, driving up car sales and other major purchases while sending the personal-savings rate to a 73-year low." Consumer spending, inflation adjusted, "rose 0.9% to $80.2 billion in December, after a revised 0.5% in November, the Commerce Department said. Increased spending on durable goods -- merchandise that lasts three years or longer and includes autos, appliances, computers and aircraft -- and services contributed to the boost."

Meanwhile, NBC Nightly News (1/30, story 8, 1:00, Williams) reported, "There is ominous news on the economy to report tonight. The Commerce Department reports that Americans' personal savings was negative last year. Clocking in at -0.5%. That means people not only spent all of their income for the year, but dipped into savings or went into debt for it. The last time the national savings rate was this low was 1933, after the bottom of the Great Depression." USA Today (1/31, Kirchhoff, Hagenbaugh, 2.31M) also runs a story headlined "Savings Enter Negative Territory First Time Since The Depression."

Gas Heating Costs Down, But Still Above 2004 Levels. USA Today (1/31, Chu, Hagenbaugh, 2.31M) reports, "Consumers are about to get a bit of relief from steep energy prices. Many utilities are lowering the cost of natural gas as a milder-than-expected winter has led to lower consumption and, thus, lower prices for energy. A majority of U.S. homes are heated with natural gas. For the average consumer, the lowered rates will translate into savings of $10 to $80 on a monthly heating bill, utilities estimate. Many customers will begin to see the lower gas prices in February." USA Today adds, "Don't rejoice too much, though. Gas prices are still sharply higher than they were a year ago." The Energy Department "has estimated that the average household heating bill for natural gas users will still come in 35% higher than last season, totaling $1,000 for October through March. (That estimate could be scaled back, though, if the winter continues to be mild.)"

OPEC Will Keep Production Unchanged. The Wall Street Journal (1/31, Bahree, 2.11M) reports, "With oil prices near record-high levels and the global economy sucking up almost all the crude that can be produced, OPEC's oil ministers have agreed to keep production unchanged for the time being, the cartel's de facto leader said." Saudi Arabia's "influential oil minister, Ali Naimi," told reporters yesterday that members of the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries "were 'in agreement' about keeping output steady at today's levels."

Kraft To Cut 8,000 Jobs, Close Up To 20 Plants. NBC Nightly News (1/30, story 5, 1:00, Williams) reported ExxonMobil "is reporting some jaw-dropping profits tonight," but "Kraft, America's largest food manufacturer, says it will cut 8,000 more jobs, and close up to 20 plants in an expansion of a restructuring plan that is already underway at the company."

ExxonMobil Reports Biggest Corporate Profit In US History. ABC's World News Tonight (1/30, story 7, 2:00, Vargas) reported, "There were more head-turning numbers from the oil industry today. ExxonMobil said it earned more than $10 billion in the last quarter of 2005, a record for any US company. For the year, profits hit $36 billion, another record." The CBS Evening News (1/30, story 5, :30, Schieffer) reported, "The world's largest publicly traded oil company put out some staggering numbers today," racking up "the biggest corporate profit in US history."

Stocks Mixed. The Wall Street Journal (1/31, Patterson, 2.11M) reports, "The Dow Jones Industrial Average fell 7.29 points to 10899.92 on light volume on the New York Stock Exchange." The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index gained 1.48 to 1285.20 and the Nasdaq Composite Index added 2.55 points to 2306.78.

Class-Action Suit Takes On Kansas Attorney General's Broad Teen-Sex Opinion. The New York Times (1/31, Rudoren) reports on a federal trial in Kansas over "whether a Kansas law prohibiting virtually all sexual activity by people under age 16 means health care professionals and educators must report such behavior to state authorities, which some say would stop many teenagers from seeking contraception or treatment for sexually transmitted diseases." According to the Times, the suit is fighting an opinion from Kansas Attorney General Phill Kline (R), whose "interpretation of the law … included a broad mandate for reporting whenever 'compelling evidence of sexual interaction is present.' Bonnie Scott Jones, a lawyer for the Center for Reproductive Rights in New York, which is representing the plaintiffs, said in her opening statement that Mr. Kline's 'dragnet approach' to amassing information on under-age sex violated minors' privacy rights and the Constitution's equal protection clause, and that it 'seriously endangers the health and well-being of adolescents.'" The Times adds, "Kansas is one of 12 states where sex under a certain age — 16, 17 or 18 — is illegal regardless of the age difference between partners, according to a 2004 report prepared by the Lewin Group, a consulting firm, for the federal Department of Health and Human Services."

Lobbying Business Said To Be Booming. The Hill (1/31, Snyder) reports, "As Congress looks to restrict lobbying activities in the wake of the Jack Abramoff scandal, there are seemingly few entities that wouldn't be affected by changes to the industry. Estimates vary widely on the number of registered lobbyists who make their living in Washington, from 30,000 to just more than 11,000. But one thing seems certain: K Street is booming. … Everyone from pornographers to court reporters to cell-phone tower erectors — in addition to legions of Fortune 500 companies that dominate K Street — have a presence in Washington." The Hill adds, "Experts point to a number of factors to explain the industry's rise, from an increase in federal appropriations earmarks to an increasingly complex tax code. But, broadly speaking, the growth on K Street and within corporate offices seems to be related to a general recognition in the value of having Washington representation, both to defend against the imposition of harmful policies and to seek out favorable earmarks or alterations in regulations, experts say."

Professor Says Richest, Best-Connected Lobbyists Dominate Policy. Ross K. Baker, a political science professor at Rutgers University, writes in USA Today (1/31, 2.31M), "The flaw in the Founding Fathers' benign view of interest groups is that while no single interest group dominates all areas of policies, the wealthiest groups and the lobbyists with the best inside connections or representing organizations with mass memberships do monopolize individual areas of national policy. This does not, by itself, promote illegal activity of the sort ascribed to Abramoff. Certainly, there are not many like him among Washington lobbyists. But it is the Abramoffs who are more likely to get the ear of lawmakers than are ordinary citizens who lack the means to buy tickets to their fundraisers."

Lobbyists Suggest Reforms. Al Swift and Bob Hines, lobbyists with the firm Colling Murphy Swift Hynes, write in Roll Call (1/31), "Members of Congress and their staffs are here for only one purpose -- to do the public's business. Therefore reforms should be based on that. Here are a few suggestions: Ban Entertainment, Gifts. … Travel Must Be Authorized. … Lift all rules pertaining to meals paid for by someone else. … But, in its place, demand transparency." Swift and Hines add, "Reforms will be passed. This time, why not do something simple, straightforward and effective? These suggestions can be a good place to start."

Anaheim, Angels Spar In Lawsuit Over Team Name. The USA Today (1/31, Kasindorf) reports, "Wounded pride in a community overshadowed by Los Angeles is at the center of a legal rhubarb at the courthouse here over whether the Anaheim Angels baseball team had the right to rename itself the Los Angeles Angels of Anaheim. … The city sued the owner, alleging that it's losing tax revenue from tourism because Anaheim is no longer publicized in box scores and sportscasts." USA Today notes that "a key issue" for Anaheim and Orange County baseball fans is "their thwarted dream of shaking the outmoded image of being Los Angeles suburbanites. USA Today reports that "Angels owner Arte Moreno … says that appealing to local chauvinism is "almost 100%" of Anaheim's strategy with the jury." The story also notes, "Beyond local pride, big money is at stake for Anaheim. The city is asking for more than $100 million in damages in addition to squelching a name it calls 'silly.'"

Growing Evangelical Movement Said To Look Beyond Abortion, Gay Marriage. The Los Angeles Times (1/31, Simon, 958K) reports on "a small but growing movement of evangelical Christians who no longer want to be defined by gay marriage and abortion. Plumbing the Bible for God's priorities, they are talking instead about global warming and affordable housing, about fewer tax cuts for the rich and more food stamps for the poor. … The National Assn. of Evangelicals, based in Colorado Springs, Colo., is urging its 30 million members to pursue a 'biblically balanced agenda' -- by fighting poverty as well as pornography, protecting the environment as well as embryos, promoting good government as well as the Gospel." The Times adds, "A decade ago, white evangelicals were fairly evenly divided between Democrats and Republicans. Today, the group leans heavily Republican. White evangelicals make up 23% of the electorate; in the last election, 78% backed Bush, according to the Pew Research Center for the People and the Press."

Clinton Seen As Trying To Salvage His Legacy By Making Peace With Bushes. Reuters (1/30, Wulfhorst) reports, "Former President Bill Clinton has been buddying up to both presidents Bush in what strategists right and left view as a bid to salvage his political legacy and boost the ambitions of his senator wife. … While making peace with rivals is a post-presidential tradition along with good deeds, Clinton stands to help himself and his wife, New York Sen. Hillary Clinton, say experts on both sides of the political aisle."

China, Russia Will Seek UN Referral For Iran.

The New York Times (1/31, Weisman, 1.19M) reports, "The United States and Europe, after hours of negotiations on Iran, won support from Russia and China early Tuesday to refer Iran's nuclear activities to the United Nations Security Council this week, but with a promise that the Council would not act on the question for at least a month." The Washington Post (1/31, Sullivan, Linzer, 744K) adds that the decision, "reached in London through a compromise with Russia and China, was a victory for the United States and its European allies, who had pressed for the matter to be sent to the council. But Russia and China were able to soften the agreement by stipulating that the Security Council not take up the matter until March." The Post continues, "A senior US official said the announcement reflected 'growing frustration' among all the parties over Iran's defiance of the International Atomic Energy Agency, the UN watchdog. 'I think Iran's on the defensive. Iran did not expect this,' said the official, speaking on the condition of anonymity.

USA Today (1/31, 2.31M) notes the IAEA has "already found Iran violated obligations under the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty," while the Washington Times (1/31, Kralev, 90K) quotes "Senior State Department official" saying, "This is a significant step forward. … It means that Iran cannot depend on Russia and China to divide us any longer."

The Los Angeles Times (1/31, Daniszewski, Murphy, Magnier, 958K) says "the agreement appears to resolve, for now, a standoff in which Russia and China opposed any such action by the board of the International Atomic Energy Agency, a UN watchdog, which will meet Thursday. A vote to send Iran before the council appears all but certain, though there is some doubt whether it will be unanimous." The delay "provides a window for the Iranian government to reconsider its decision this month to reopen its nuclear facility at Natanz and resume research into enriching and reprocessing uranium. Iran says its program is for civilian nuclear power, but the U.S. and European Union believe the country is taking steps to develop material for nuclear weapons." The "compromise was hammered out at a four-hour dinner of foreign ministers here, hosted by Britain's Jack Straw ahead of a special meeting of the IAEA in Vienna."

The Financial Times (1/31, Hoyos, Dombey) adds "the agreement came hours after the Europeans and Iranian diplomats met at the request the Iranian government, in which Iran offered to slow down its controversial nuclear programme in a last-ditch attempt to avoid being reported to the Security Council. But European diplomats dismissed its proposal as containing nothing new." Javad Vaeedi," one of Iran's top nuclear negotiators, suggested to diplomats from France, the UK and Germany that Tehran could impose a moratorium on enriching uranium on an industrial scale - a process that can create weapons grade material."

Rice Stresses Diplomatic Option, Asking For "Robust" Talks With Iran. The AP (1/30, Stringer) reported Secretary Rice "said Monday that 'robust' negotiations with Iran are needed to deal with its resumed nuclear program, as European ministers' talks aimed at breaking the diplomatic deadlock appeared to fail." The AP quotes Rice saying, "We believe that there is a lot of life left in the diplomacy. ... After all, going to the Security Council is not the end of diplomacy. It's just diplomacy in a different, more robust context.'" AFP (1/30) also reported similar comments by President Bush: "The message is: Give up your nuclear weapons ambitions. ... We're united in our goal to keep the Iranians from having a weapon, and we're working on the tactics necessary to continue putting a united front out."

Poll Finds Most Favor Sanctions. The Washington Post (1/31, Deane, 744K) reports, "Seven in 10 Americans would support international economic sanctions as a way to prevent Iran from developing nuclear weapons, but there is considerable wariness about taking military action against Tehran, according to the latest Washington Post-ABC News poll." The Post continues, "A large majority of the public says Iran is a threat to the United States, albeit not an immediate one, according to a recent Gallup poll. And a Fox News survey suggests the public views Iran's official pronouncements on the nuclear research program with great skepticism: Eight in 10 voters believe the country plans to use uranium enrichment for military rather than for peaceful purposes."

Iranian "Crisis" To Test Nuclear Espionage Technology. The New York Times (1/31, Sanger, Broad, 1.19M) reports, "In March 2004, the science and technology directorate of the Central Intelligence Agency called a secret meeting of hundreds of the government's top experts in nuclear intelligence to address a problem that had bedeviled Washington for decades: how to know, with precision, when a country is about to cross the line and gain the ability to build an atomic bomb. The aim of the two-day conference was to reinvigorate the nation's atomic espionage efforts, not with spies on the ground or satellites in space but with a new generation of advanced technologies meant to detect the faintest clues of nuclear activity." The Times adds, "Nearly two years later, federal officials and scientists say that meeting and other secret actions have accelerated the government's efforts to develop new atomic espionage technologies. The research focuses on better detection of four basic, but inconspicuous, signatures that covert nuclear facilities and materials can emit: distinctive chemicals, sounds, electromagnetic waves and isotopes, or forms of the same element that have different numbers of neutrons, a subatomic building block." The Iranian crisis "could pose a big test of how far that technology has come. … At a minimum, the crisis is putting more pressure on intelligence agencies to find out if Iran harbors secret nuclear sites. And after Iraq, there is huge pressure to get it right."

Firms Sever Iran Links. In a related story, the Wall Street Journal (1/31, Simpson, Wilke, 2.11M) reports, "Some of the world's largest finance and energy companies are severing ties with Iran, amid US probes into their compliance with American sanctions and as the possibility of UN action grows closer. Banks UBS AG of Switzerland and ABN Amro Holding NV of the Netherlands disclosed in recent weeks that they have broken off work with Iran, following the lead of Houston energy-services company Halliburton Co. a year ago. All three are subjects of US Justice Department inquiries into whether they violated sanctions laws, lawyers and others familiar with the inquiries say. Also under investigation but still doing business with Iran are HSBC Holdings PLC, Standard Chartered PLC and BNP Paribas, those people say. Also pulling out of Iranian business in recent months, though not being investigated regarding compliance with sanctions, are Swiss bank Credit Suisse Group, energy firms Baker Hughes Inc., ConocoPhillips of Houston and BP PLC of London, Chicago insurance broker AON Corp. and industrial conglomerate General Electric Co. of Fairfield, Conn."

Bush, Rice Say Hamas Must Renounce Violence, Accept Israel. In separate stories, the AP echoes comments Monday by both President Bush and Secretary Rice that the US would oppose a Hamas-led government in the Palestinian territories. The AP (1/31, Pickler) quotes Bush as saying: "The Hamas party has made it clear that they do not support the right of Israel. ... And I have made it clear that so long as that's their policy, that we will not support a Palestinian government made up of Hamas." In a separate story, the AP (1/31, Gearan) cites comments Rice made in London: "Everybody is saying exactly the same thing. ... There has got to be a peaceful road ahead. ... You cannot be on one hand dedicated to peace and on the other dedicated to violence. Those two things are irreconcilable." The Washington Times (1/31, Sammon, 90K) quotes Bush saying, "We will not support a Palestinian government made up of Hamas."

In a related story, Bloomberg (1/31, Zacharia) reports, "The US, European Union, United Nations and Russia said Hamas officials must form a Palestinian government that accepts Israel's existence or risk a cutoff of international aid. The diplomatic group, known as the Quartet, threatened late yesterday in London to review all aid should Hamas maintain its violent opposition and refusal to endorse peace efforts." The Washington Post (1/31, A14, Sullivan, 744K) reports US "officials said they viewed the statement by the quartet as a clear international warning to Hamas a day before President Bush gives his State of the Union address. The statement also appeared to represent a compromise between U.S. officials and their European counterparts, who had been publicly skeptical of the hard-line approach advocated recently by Rice and Bush."

The Financial Times (1/31, Dombey, Morris, Khalaf) reports, "Monday night's declaration was the first attempt to present a united international front after Hamas's victory but there are likely to be differences between the US and the EU over funding and contacts with the new administration. European diplomats believe that, despite having set out basic principles for Hamas to meet, they can still find mechanisms for delivering funding, while the US maintains a tougher line." The Times adds, "Privately, EU officials said their freedom of manoeuvre was limited by the PA's deep financial problems and the risk that greater isolation would only further radicalise the militant group."

USA Today (1/31, Stinson, 2.31M) runs a similar report under the headline "Hamas Warned: Cash Could Be Cut Off," while the Wall Street Journal (1/31, King, 2.11M) headlines its story "Group Sets Conditions On Aid To Palestinians."

Meanwhile, the Washington Times (1/31, Martin, 90K) reports, "Hamas will not alter its charter calling for Israel's destruction despite US, European and UN demands." Hamas, "fresh from a dominating win in last week's Palestinian parliamentary vote, also said moves by Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas to seize authority over all four security services are illegal and will be tackled once a new government is formed."

The Christian Science Monitor (1/31, Prusher, 61K) runs a story titled "After Victory, Hamas Faces Money Crunch," saying Hamas "now faces a far more challenging campaign: a fight to keep the international donor community, which has kept the Palestinian Authority (PA) functioning since 1994, from cutting off funding." The Wall Street Journal (1/31, Leggett, 2.11M) also says that "for nearly a decade, the Palestinian Authority has leaned heavily on donations from Western governments to stay afloat." But "with that lifeline threatened by Hamas's electoral victory, it remains to be seen where its quasigovernment will get the money to survive."

PBS' NewsHour (1/30, Lehrer) reported Hamas "urged the world today not to cut off aid to the Palestinian Authority. … If by Wednesday the quartet hasn't paid $69 million, Palestinian civil servants won't be paid this month." PBS' Margaret Warner went on to report, "There is one point on which the rival players in Gaza and here in the West Bank seem to agree: The Palestinians' dependence on foreign aid does give the West a big stick against Hamas, but it would be counterproductive for the West to use it yet. The stick is large because of the intense economic crisis in the Palestinian territories, with debris-filled beaches and trash-filled empty lots, and legions of jobless men. The deficit-ridden Palestinian government desperately needs an injection of cash just to pay this month's salaries to 135,000 government workers and security forces. … Remarkably, even Israeli officials, as alarmed as they are by the election of a terrorist organization next door, are advising their global partners to go slow on aid cuts for now." Tzahi Hanegbi Israel's minister for strategic affairs, was shown saying, "We're talking about people. They need medicines, they need food; they need their ordinary life. So I would say that in order to emphasize the resolve of the international community, it has to be at the beginning with diplomatic issues, and not right away with financial sanctions."

Abbas Asks International Community Not To Cut Funds. In a related story, AFP (1/31) reports, "Palestinian leader Mahmud Abbas and Hamas both urged the international community not to cut off funding as part of efforts to force change on the Islamists after their election win. As European foreign ministers and the key players in the Middle East peace process insisted Hamas renounce violence, the moderate Palestinian Authority president and the hardliners of Hamas said a cessation of funding would only hurt the impoverished people of Gaza and the West Bank." The New York Times (1/31, Myre, 1.19M) adds Abbas "denied reports that he was considering resigning and said he remained committed to peace talks with Israel." But "it is not clear how he will pursue them when Hamas, which has always rejected talks, will control the government." The Washington Times (1/31, Kralev, 90K) also reports the story.

Fatah Resists Coalition Sought By Hamas, Israel. PBS' NewsHour (1/30, Warner) reported that Fatah's Saeb Erekat, the Palestinians' chief negotiator with Israel, "sounds eager to go into opposition to Hamas if it sticks with its vow to destroy Israel and create an Islamic state." Erekat said, "We will not be part of this government. We will be in opposition. And each week, we will demand from Hamas jobs, electricity, water, services, to expose corruption and the rule of law. We will have a demonstration each week to demand better services for our people." Tzahi Hanegbi, Israel's minister for strategic affairs, was shown saying, "Mahmoud Abbas cannot have relevancy if his government is going to be a Hamas government. This is the tragedy of the election results. Mahmoud Abbas was elected in another campaign as a president. And he has his authorities. But if the legislative council would elect a Hamas government, it would be the end of our dialogue with the Palestinian Authority." PBS added, "Hamas leaders are floating one idea to get unstuck. They suggest that the Palestinian Authority they're about to join concentrate on domestic matters, and return negotiations with Israel to the Palestine Liberation Organization, or PLO, an umbrella group to which Hamas does not belong."

Meanwhile, the Washington Times (1/31, Li, 90K) reports, "A leading Palestinian pollster says Hamas' victory in Palestinian elections last week had less to do with the militant group's hard-line posture toward Israel than with voter anger against the long-ruling Fatah party founded by Yasser Arafat. Voters 'didn't just want to hurt Fatah. They wanted to defeat it,' said Khalil Shikaki, director of the Palestinian Center for Policy and Survey Research." The pollster added, "The only group that can defeat Fatah is Hamas. So they voted for Hamas."

writes in the Washington Post (1/31, A17, 744K), "A new era in the struggle for Palestinian liberation is upon us. Through historic fair and free elections, the Palestinian people have spoken. Accordingly, America's long-standing tradition of supporting the oppressed's rights to self-determination should not waver." The United States, the European Union "and the rest of the world should welcome the unfolding of the democratic process, and the commitment to aid should not falter. Last week's victory of the Change and Reform Party in the Palestinian legislative elections signals a new hope for an occupied people. The results of these elections reflect a need for change from the corruption and intransigence of the past government." Marzook adds, "We appeal to the American people's sense of fairness to judge this conflict in light of the great thoughts, principles and ideals you hold dear in the Declaration of Independence, the Constitution and the democracy you have built. … Meaningful democracy cannot flourish as long as an external force maintains the balance of power. It is the right of all people to pursue their own destiny."

Israeli Army Prepares To Evict Squatters In Hebron. The New York Times (1/31, Kraft, 1.19M) reports nine Jewish families "have been squatting illegally in a Palestinian fruit and vegetable market here [Hebron], embarrassing the government. So Acting Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, who has expressed impatience with the settlers, decided to try to put an end to the affair. In what was apparently a deal with the government and the army, according to Israeli news media, the families have agreed to leave voluntarily on Tuesday morning, in exchange for a promise by Israel to speed up legal proceedings that might allow the state to expropriate the market from the city of Hebron and its owners and then rent it to other Israeli settlers. But the army is preparing for the deal to fall apart and for violence, Gen. Yair Naveh said. His troops are scheduled to demolish nine houses in an illegal outpost, Amona, later this week, following a court ruling."

Arabs Boycott Danish Products In Response To Cartoons Of Mohammad. The New York Times (1/31, Fattah, 1.19M) reports, "A long-running controversy over the publication of caricatures of the Muslim prophet Muhammad by a Danish newspaper boiled over in the past few days as a boycott brought sales of some Danish products to a halt in Arab countries across the Middle East, while Danish interests came under attack. … In recent days, Saudi Arabia and Libya have recalled their ambassadors to Denmark, protests have been staged in places like Dubai, where they are virtually unheard of, and Arab and multinational companies have placed ads in Middle Eastern newspapers to deny any connection to Danish companies. On Monday, Denmark called for its citizens in the Middle East to exercise extra vigilance. The Danish manufacturer, Arla Foods, which normally sells $1.5 million worth of dairy products a day in the region, announced that its sales there had come to a halt. And two of its employees in Saudi Arabia were beaten by angry customers."

EU Office In Gaza Stormed By Gunmen. The Washington Times/AP (1/31, Abu-Nasr) reports, "Protests over Danish caricatures of the prophet Muhammad escalated yesterday as gunmen seized an EU office in Gaza and Muslims appealed for a trade boycott of Danish products. Denmark called for its citizens in the Middle East to exercise vigilance."

New Director Expected To Reinvigorate Millennium Challenge Program. The Washington Post (1/31, A15, Fletcher, Blustein, 744K) reports, "After getting off to a painfully slow start, President Bush's signature foreign aid program is poised to begin ramping up the amount of money it spends on development projects in poor countries, according to its new chief executive -- who vows that the impact will be 'transformative.' John J. Danilovich, the former ambassador whom Bush installed as head of the Millennium Challenge Corp. in November, said the agency is adopting a new strategy to fulfill its mission of providing aid to well-governed nations. It will winnow recipients to a short list but intends to give them significantly bigger grants than those bestowed in previous programs." According to the Post, "the program has fallen well short of Bush's stated ambition. He envisioned spending $1.7 billion in 2004, $3.3 billion in 2005 and $5 billion per year thereafter. But the administration took two years just to set up the corporation, and even then problems impeded its progress."

Canadian Politicians Avoided US Consultants. In its "Players" column, Roll Call (1/31, Duran) reports, "Republicans may be thrilled that a Conservative is set to become prime minister of Canada but you will not find any GOP operatives bragging that they helped make it happen. While big-name American consultants such as James Carville or Ed Rollins trot the globe in search of new campaign adventures, they are not working in Canada these days. In fact, it's as if Canada has hung a 'no Americans need apply' sign out when it comes to federal elections, consultants north of the border say. … Michael Scroccaro of Sterling Communication in Toronto, Canada said the explanation for the shut-out of American consultants this election goes beyond a dislike of all things American. 'It was more the case of having an embarrassment of local talent,' said Scroccaro, who worked for the Tories. 'We recently had two parties merge — one of which has a long history of winning — and some of the most talented people in the game were suddenly available and on our team.' Scroccaro said the Canadian electorate does not respond as well to American-styled campaigns either."

Blair's Son To Begin Congressional Internship Today. The Washington Times (1/31, Pierce, 90K) reports in its "Inside Politics" column, "Euan Blair, eldest son of British Prime Minister Tony Blair, is scheduled to start a six-month stint today as an intern in the U.S. Congress. Young Mr. Blair, 22, will begin as an unpaid intern for Rep. David Dreier, California Republican and chairman of the House Rules Committee, and three months later he will join the staff of Rep. Jane Harman, California Democrat and ranking member on the House Intelligence Committee."

Violence, Detentions Precede Nepalese Elections. The New York Times (1/31, Sengupta, 1.19M) reports Nepalese King Gyanendra, "the man who sacked the government a year ago, calls for elections but jails political party leaders. The main political parties demand the restoration of democratic rights, but call on voters to boycott the polls. At least one mayoral candidate has been assassinated by suspected Maoist guerrillas. … So goes the prelude to municipal elections in this ancient Himalayan kingdom on the violent cusp of change. The elections, scheduled for Feb. 8, will be held a year after Gyanendra, the world's sole Hindu monarch, seized power in what he described as an effort to defeat the Maoists."

Georgian Leader Criticizes Russian Use Of Military Force. Nino Burdjanadze, Speaker of the Georgian Parliament, writes in a letter to the editor of the Wall Street Journal (1/31, 2.11M), "The world has noticed Russia's use of energy as a political weapon to pressure neighboring Western-oriented states. Now it appears that Russia does not intend to confine itself to energy to tame 'intractable' neighbors but contemplates a far more conventional and well-tried weapon -- the use of military force." The letter alleges that Russia supports "illegitimate separatist puppet regimes of Abkhazia and South Ossetia. Under the guise of 'peacekeeping' and 'mediation,' Russia has de facto annexed the territories." The letter says Georgia is committed to a peaceful resolution of the Abkhazia and South Ossetia situations and paints a "different Russia" that "reserves a right to use military force against neighbors to prevent geopolitical changes, uses energy to blackmail its democratic neighbors, and provides aid and comfort to illegal separatists outside its borders."

WPost Sees Russian Repression With "Cold War Overtones." The Washington Post (1/31, 744K) editorializes, "A grainy video purporting to show the activities of British spies; ominous talk of foreigners undermining the state; protests from the Moscow Helsinki Group -- can this really be Russia in 2006?" The Post notes that Russia's current campaign against human-rights groups has "distinct Cold War overtones." The Post says Russia has passed a law restricting NGOs' activities and that Russian media have accused other groups of links to alleged British spies. The Post compares this to charges leveled in 1975 and 1985, and concludes, "It seems history really does repeat itself, and while the second time may have the feel of farce, Moscow's repression may end no less tragically for its victims.""

Sudan's Transformation "Harder" Than Imagined. The New York Times (1/31, Lacey, 1.19M) reports that the recent African Union meeting "was supposed to have been Sudan's chance to shine. Shut off from the rest of the world for so long, Sudan's leaders are eager to attract outside investors and shed their pariah image. But the transformation has proved harder than anyone here imagined.." The Times analogizes Sudan's plight to the recently purchased, luxurious presidential yacht, which was delivered too late for the summit meeting and has been derided in the Sudanese media for its excessive price.

Bacon Calls For US To Press Darfur Issue In Security Council. In an op-ed in The New York Times (1/31, 1.19M), Kenneth Bacon, president of Refugees International, writes that when it assumes the presidency of the Security Council, the United States "could start by devoting itself to ending the violence in the Darfur region of western Sudan. … The last time the United States assumed the rotating presidency of the 15-member Security Council, … John C. Danforth, then the ambassador to the United Nations, brought the entire Security Council to Kenya to pressure the government in Khartoum and the insurgents in the south to end their 21-year civil war. The tactic worked." Bacon calls on US Ambassador John Bolton to "demand the release of an unpublished United Nations study listing those countries that ship weapons to rebels and Khartoum-backed militias. Then the Council should use this information to punish sanctions scofflaws." Bacon concludes that while the United States "has a vexing and inconsistent record on Sudan," the UN Security Council presidency offers "a chance to show the world that we can do more than just talk about genocide."

CAIR Protests Skit Making Light Of Hajj Tragedy. The Los Angeles Times (1/31, Muskal, 958K) reports, "A local radio personality and a group that says it is fighting to empower American Muslims have squared off over a provocative skit that featured a make-believe traffic reporter covering the hajj, where hundreds of pilgrims were crushed to death." Bill Handel, a morning radio host, "set off the furor when he broadcast the skit about a traffic reporter in a helicopter hovering over the hajj, the Muslim pilgrimage to Mecca, Saudi Arabia, that attracts about 3 million faithful each year. On Jan. 12, 363 pilgrims were killed in an accident that Saudi authorities blamed on the dynamics of the crowd. Last week, the Southern California office of the Council on American-Islamic Relations called on Handel and the station to apologize for the skit, which the group said poked fun at Muslims."

Career FSOs Seen As Likely To Stymie Rice's Repositioning Initiative. In a Washington Times (1/31, 90K) op-ed titled "Change at Foggy Bottom," Fred Gedrich, a foreign policy and national security analyst who served in the State Department from 1988 to 1997, and Ret. US Army Maj. Gen. Paul E. Vallely write that Secretary Rice's global personnel repositioning initiative "will surely stir the hornet's nest. Career Foreign Service Officers…have a notorious record in resisting change and the legitimacy of presidential and congressional control and direction. Some have been accused of purposely undermining President George W. Bush's global war on terror and national-security strategy." The authors say the Department "must play a vital role in confronting the enormous diplomatic and national-security challenges facing America" and "is the perfect instrument to carry out the president's vision of making the world more secure, free and prosperous for the benefit of Americans and the international community." However, Rice's "plans will likely encounter difficulty. Presidents and secretaries of state since [FDR] have learned that FSOs and the American Foreign Service Association, the sole bargaining agent for the 23,000 active and retired FSOs, are more apt to reject, rather than embrace, reform plans and the legitimacy of foreign-policy direction received from elected and appointed officials." Rice will meet resistance to her plan, the authors predict, "because FSOs thrive under the current system and firmly control the department's foreign policy apparatus and personnel systems. Career diplomats currently occupy powerful slots including undersecretary for political affairs and director general of the Foreign Service. … It's apparent to many outsiders that the department must make fundamental changes to the institution and culture and implement new strategies to effectively cope with daunting 21st-century national-security and foreign-policy challenges. It's about time the folks at Foggy Bottom realized it too."

WSJournal Says Wide Majority Of Chinese Favor Capitalism. The Wall Street Journal (1/31, 2.11M) editorializes, "In a poll conducted for the University of Maryland's Program on International Policy Attitudes between June and August last year, fully 74% of Chinese citizens said they agreed with the statement 'the free enterprise system and free market economy is the best system on which to base the future of the world.' … Remarkable, isn't it, that residents of the Middle Kingdom have maintained their appreciation of the benefits of free enterprise through six decades of oppression and economic backwardness imposed by their Communist cadres? … Mao would probably turn over in his glass case if he realized that the Chinese have rejected his teachings. But the harsh consequences those teachings imposed on his countrymen have been an education like no other. Nothing creates eager young capitalists quite like living under Communism."

NYTimes Encourages EU, US To Support Turkish Reform Efforts. The New York Times (1/31, 1.19M) editorializes, "The judge in the free-speech trial of the Turkish author Orhan Pamuk dismissed all charges last week, sparing Turkey further international scorn. But the case was thrown out on a technicality. Turkey still needs to change the repressive law under which Mr. Pamuk was arrested and drop similar cases against dozens of other lesser-known Turks. The most powerful motivation for making such changes has always been Turkey's desire to join the European Union. But public support for joining is now waning, down from a high of 85 percent to 65 percent recently. In part, that reflects a lingering bitterness over 11th-hour issues that tainted the start of Turkey's membership talks. … Turkey's prime minister, Recep Tayyip Erdogan, must convince his people not to give up on the reforms that precede union membership. And Washington and Brussels need to help him make the case."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Feingold Claims Gonzales Misled Senate About Warrantless Wiretaps. The Washington Post (1/31, A7, Leonnig) reports, "Sen. Russell Feingold (D-Wis.) charged yesterday that Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales misled the Senate during his confirmation hearing a year ago when he appeared to try to avoid answering a question about whether the president could authorize warrantless wiretapping of U.S. citizens." The Post continues, "In a letter to the attorney general yesterday, Feingold demanded to know why Gonzales dismissed the senator's question about warrantless eavesdropping as a 'hypothetical situation' during a Senate Judiciary Committee hearing in January 2005. At the hearing, Feingold asked Gonzales where the president's authority ends and whether Gonzales believed the president could, for example, act in contravention of existing criminal laws and spy on U.S. citizens without a warrant. … Gonzales said that it was impossible to answer such a hypothetical question but that it was 'not the policy or the agenda of this president' to authorize actions that conflict with existing law. He added that he would hope to alert Congress if the president ever chose to authorize warrantless surveillance, according to a transcript of the hearing." The Post notes, "In fact, the president did secretly authorize the National Security Agency to begin warrantless monitoring of calls and e-mails between the United States and other nations soon after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. The program, publicly revealed in media reports last month, was unknown to Feingold and his staff at the time Feingold questioned Gonzales, according to a staff member. Feingold's aides developed the 2005 questions based on privacy advocates' concerns about broad interpretations of executive power."

NSA Surveillance Hearings Could Spur Action On Patriot Act Renewal. The Hill (1/31, Mikhail) reports, "If the White House and the GOP-led Congress do not strike a deal soon on reauthorizing the USA Patriot Act, President Bush's influence on the controversial bill could diminish after the Senate Judiciary Committee holds hearings on the nation's domestic surveillance program," which begin Monday. "The hearings are providing additional motivation for congressional Republicans to renew the Patriot Act by Feb. 3." The Hill notes, "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, who is scheduled to testify Monday, has stated that the president's constitutional powers and the congressional vote authorizing the use of force after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks validated the surveillance program." AEI resident scholar Norm Ornstein "said that the pressure on both the White House and Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist…to minimize the political damage stemming from the surveillance program could ensure renewal of the Patriot Act before Friday's deadline."

Pentagon Finding "Irregularities" In Suspicious Activity Database. The Washington Post (1/31, A6, Pincus, 744K) reports, "Pentagon officials say their newest intelligence agency, the Counterintelligence Field Activity, is finding 'irregularities' in about one of every 100 reports of suspicious activity that were entered into its database of possible terrorist threats to Defense Department personnel or facilities. … The Pentagon considers 'irregularities' to be reports involving people or groups that have remained in the database too long -- more than 90 days -- without being verified as representing real threats. In some cases, the review has shown they should not have been included in the first place. Defense officials declined to say how many Talon reports have been placed in the CIFA database, known as Cornerstone, or the number of improperly kept reports identified so far in the ongoing review." CIFA Director David A. Burtt II "said his staff members now review every Talon report that comes in. Those concerning demonstrators 'are out altogether...and we are double-checking all the others,' he said during a recent interview at his Crystal City office."

Newly-Released Zawahiri Tape Taunts Bush, Warns Of New Attack. The CBS Evening News (1/30, lead story, 3:00, Schieffer) reported, "It was a chilling moment and a day of chilling moments in the war on terror. Al Qaeda's number-two man Ayman al-Zawahiri showed up in one of the videotapes and on the eve of the President's State of the Union message called the President a butcher. And he reminded one and all that his leader Osama bin Laden is planning an attack on the United States. The very existence of this tape carried with it another message that al-Zawahiri is still alive and that when US forces attacked that village in Pakistan they did not get him." CBS (Stewart) added, "The voice was taunting, angry, and unmistakable. Within minutes of its release, US intelligence officials confirmed it was Ayman al-Zawahiri and it required no interpreter to tell he was hurling personal insults at the President of the United States."

ABC's World News Tonight (1/30, story 5, :45, Ross) reported, "The tape is authentic, featuring a feisty, and at times angry Zawahiri. In a straight tone, Zawahiri said God would determine when he died, not President Bush. 'If my time has not come,' he said, 'then you and all the forces on earth, all human beings cannot advance my fate by one second.' Zawahiri referred extensively to the January 13th US airstrike in Pakistan that was meant for him, but killed at least a dozen civilians and four of his closest deputies. 'My first message is to the butcher of Washington, Bush,' he said.

'Not only are you defeated, you're a liar and a failure,' he says. In a direct taunt to President Bush, Zawahiri says, 'Bush, do you know where I am? I am amidst the Muslim masses, enjoying their support, their care, their generosity, their protection.'"

NBC Nightly News (1/30, story 3, 2:00, Mitchell) reported, "Intelligence officials tell NBC News there is no obvious signal in the message to launch an attack. Instead, they see it as a propaganda campaign aimed at the American people and al Qaeda followers. Tonight, the White House said Zawahiri appears frustrated and angry. But many of the President's own terror experts disagree, telling NBC News it shows an al Qaeda leader more confident than ever."

Reuters (1/31) notes "the video mentioned a call for a truce issued by al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden in an audio tape Al Jazeera said was recorded in January." CNN's The Situation Room (1/30, Ensor) said that after the attempt to kill Zawahiri, al Qaeda wants to show "that they're still there, they're still capable of putting out pronouncements, they are still defiant of the United States and the international community. So in that sense, there's a propaganda victory for al Qaeda."

Knight Ridder (1/31, Allam) reports, "The message, part rallying cry for the Islamic world and part warning to the West, was the third al-Qaida message broadcast within a month. Intelligence analysts have said that the flurry of tapes could signal an impending attack but also could be a new propaganda campaign aimed not only at Muslim audiences, but also at Americans." The Los Angeles Times (1/31, Chen, 958K), New York Times (1/31, Fattah, 1.19M), Washington Post (1/31, A1, Whitlock, Pincus, 744K), Washington Times/AP (1/31, El-Majd) and AFP (1/31) run similar reports.

Al Arian Prosecutors To Seek Jurors Able To Process Complicated Evidence. The Tampa Tribune (1/31, Silvestrini) reports, "If Sami Al-Arian receives another trial, prosecutors want to make sure the jury is smart. After the government's failure to obtain convictions against Al-Arian and three co-defendants, critics theorized that the prosecution had put forth a case that was too long and complicated for jurors to understand. … Prosecutors on Monday submitted proposed changes to the questionnaire used to pick the first jury. Among changes suggested was a proposal to question potential jurors about whether they can process complicated evidence." The Tribune adds, "There has been speculation that a new team of prosecutors would be assembled for another trial. Monday's filing seems to indicate the same prosecutors…would continue with the case."

Israeli Woman Angry She Was Not Called To Testify About Daughter's Murder By PIJ. The St. Petersburg Times (1/30, Martin, Laughlin) reports, "Last summer, Miriam Ben-Ishai planned to testify at the trial of Sami Al-Arian" about "how she felt four years ago when she heard that an Islamic Jihad gunman had killed her 16-year-old daughter Shoshana." But "she got a call saying she would not be needed as a witness. Al-Arian had admitted his guilt, the Ben-Ishais say they were told. Not until Jan. 22…did Miriam Ben-Ishai learn that almost the opposite was true." The Ben-Ishais "are angry. They are convinced the jury might have decided differently if it had been allowed to hear about the family's grief. And they wonder how the U.S. government could have lost such an important case." The Tribune notes, "A few months after Shoshana's death, Isaac Ben-Ishai said, FBI agents interviewed him and his wife," and "agents visited the couple again in early 2003, about the time Ashcroft announced Al-Arian's indictment. Last February, Tampa's FBI office notified them by mail they were among potential witnesses in the trial due to start last spring. … Then someone…told them Al-Arian 'admitted being guilty' and Miriam would not have to testify. The confusion could have been due to the Ben-Ishais' unfamiliarity with legal terms. Soon after the trial began, lawyers for Al-Arian and three co-defendants agreed to a 'stipulation of fact:' Shoshana was killed by 'a person associated with the Palestinian Islamic Jihad.'"

Al Masri Trial Judge Downplays Burglary; Defense Makes Closing Statement. BBC (1/30) reports on its Web site, "The judge in the trial of alleged race hate cleric Abu Hamza al-Masri has dismissed conspiracy theories after he was burgled over the weekend. Mr Justice Hughes told the jury at the Old Bailey trial to forget newspaper reports about the incident," during which a laptop computer was stolen from his home. BBC adds, "In its closing speech, the defence said the prosecution had not proved that the cleric had incited anyone to murder. Defence counsel Edward Fitzgerald QC told the jury that the defendant's speeches may appear deeply offensive at times - but offensiveness did not make them a crime. … 'There was a wide gap between what he talked about as theoretically justified in principle and what he was actually asking his audience to do,'" Fitzgerald said.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Flight Attendants Protest Lifting Of TSA Ban On Scissors. The Washington Times (1/31, Glanz, 90K) reports, "Flight attendants yesterday began a campaign to urge lawmakers to restore a ban that kept passengers from taking scissors and screwdrivers on airplanes." Members of the Association of Flight Attendants "were at Ronald Reagan Washington National Airport and 22 other US airports handing out leaflets to passengers outlining objections to the Transportation Security Administration's decision last month allowing scissors with blades up to 4 inches long on planes. … The TSA changed the list of prohibited items because the agency wants to spend more time searching for bombs." The Times adds, "The TSA has received support from airlines. The Air Transport Association, a trade group representing major carriers, said screeners should focus on weapons capable of causing the greatest damage." David Castelveter, a spokesman for the group, said, "We certainly respect the flight attendants' perspective on cabin safety, but it's not scissors that are bringing down airplanes today."

Bush To Nominate Basham To Head CBP. The Washington Times (1/31, Seper, 90K) reports, "President Bush will nominate two veteran federal law-enforcement officials to head US Customs and Border Protection (CBP) and the US Secret Service, key offices within the Department of Homeland Security. Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said W. Ralph Basham, the director and 29-year Secret Service veteran, will be named to serve as CBP commissioner, and Mark Sullivan, a 23-year Secret Service veteran, has been picked to head that agency." Chertoff said, "Both men are vastly experienced and highly decorated members of the federal law-enforcement community, who have each made significant contributions to our nation's security." I like that I messaged you from four feet away and James walked across the whole office.

The New York Times (1/31, Lipton, 1.19M) reports, "In the post, Mr. Basham would oversee more than 41,000 employees who patrol the nation's borders, inspect imported cargo and screen foreigners arriving at the nation's airports, seaports and land border posts. The agency also has more than 250 aircraft, the largest law enforcement air force in the world."

Expedited Removal Expanded To Northern Border. The Washington Times (1/31, 90K) reports, "The Department of Homeland Security yesterday announced the implementation of its 'expedited removal' program to include illegal aliens apprehended along the US-Canadian border and all US coastal areas. 'With the Secure Border Initiative, we made a commitment to implement new tactics throughout the US in order to gain control of our borders,' said Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff. 'We have seen success in deterring illegal border crossers since 'expedited removal' was implemented throughout the Southwest.'" Chertoff added, "Implementing this process along all borders will provide ... agents and officers with an additional tool to protect our nation's boundaries and quickly remove those who entered our country illegally."

Ohio Sheriff Bills DHS For Jailing Illegal Aliens. The Washington Times (1/31, Seper, 90K) reports Butler County, Ohio Sheriff Richard K. Jones "has billed the Department of Homeland Security $125,000 for the cost of jailing illegal aliens arrested on criminal charges in his county, saying he's angry that the federal government has failed in its responsibility to keep them out of the United States." He said yesterday "that although the government may not be legally obligated to pay the three bills he has sent since November, he intends to send similar ones every month until the federal government gains control of the border." Meanwhile, "US Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) spokesman Dean Boyd said the agency 'repeatedly reached out to the Butler County Sheriff's Department' and, on multiple occasions, offered ICE enforcement resources to the sheriff in addressing the illegal alien population in Butler County."

Experimental Ricin Vaccine Appears To Be Safe, Effective. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (1/31, Schmid) reports, "Initial tests indicate an experimental vaccine for ricin works and is safe, raising the possibility it might one day offer protection from a poison that authorities fear could be a weapon for terrorists." Ricin "has a long history of use in espionage. The FBI is investigating a pair of incidents involving the poison in 2003." The AP notes, "Researchers led by Dr. Ellen Vitetta of the University of Texas Southwestern Medical Center in Dallas found a way to modify the toxic sections of the ricin molecule to disrupt its poisonous effect. … Five volunteers given a high dose of the vaccine all developed antibodies to ricin, four of the five given a moderate dose developed antibodies, as did one of the five given a low dose."

Illinois Man Indicted On Charges Of Lying To FBI About Hoax Terror Attack. The Chicago Tribune (1/27, Bush, 643K) reported, "A man with a string of burglary convictions was indicted Thursday on charges of informing FBI agents about a planned terrorism attack that turned out to be a hoax." Gilbert Romero "was paroled from state prison in February. In June, he spun an elaborate and false story to the FBI about a planned terrorism attack on the headquarters of a U.S. company, according to the indictment. Romero told agents the attack was to be carried out by an individual who was recruiting other terrorists for a strike on U.S. soil, the indictment states." The Tribune added, "The hoax that Romero allegedly sketched out involved enormous violence. In addition to destroying the company with a fertilizer and fuel bomb, Romero told agents the terrorists would gun down any police officers who intervened, the indictment alleges." The Chicago Sun-Times (1/27, Pallasch) noted, "The threat came to light while Romero was an inmate at Cook County Jail, where he was sent after being picked up for burglary while on parole, authorities said. The FBI was notified that Romero claimed to have information on a plan to blow up a building, so agents came in to interview him, said Assistant U.S.

Attorney Edward Siskel." The AP (1/27) also reported on the indictment.

FBI, DHS Find No Terror Connection To Smoke Plume Reported By Airliner. The AP (1/31, Marquez) reports, "Federal investigators have found no evidence of a terrorist connection to an American Airlines pilot's report of a plume of smoke…near Los Angeles International Airport last fall, the FBI and Homeland Security Department reported Monday. The Nov. 26 Los Angeles-to-Chicago flight was climbing at about 13,000 feet over the Pacific Ocean when the pilot spotted the plume…American Airlines spokesman John Hotard said." Hotard added, "At no time did he feel his flight was targeted." The AP notes, "After landing in Chicago, the pilot and a passenger were interviewed by FBI agents," and "FBI Special Agent Richard Kolko said the bureau found nothing to substantiate any threats from terrorists or others, though its inquiry remains open. Working theories speculate that the plume might have been a model rocket, a flare or something similarly innocuous, the FBI has said."

After Katrina, Interior Department Offered FEMA Emergency Relief Help. Numerous reports yesterday cited a recently released document in which the Interior Department claimed that its offers of aid to FEMA in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina were not taken advantage of. NBC Nightly News (1/30, story 7, 1:00, Williams) followed by offering "one more note on the aftermath of Katrina. … At Senate hearings today, there were more examples of the poor planning and communication that resulted in the chaotic response at all levels of government. One example: the Department of Interior had offered FEMA hundreds of boats, trucks and law enforcement personnel for search and rescue, but today a key FEMA official told the panel he was unaware of the offer until the Senate staffers showed him the relevant documents."

CNN's The Situation Room (1/30, Blitzer) reported, "Senators are reviewing new evidence that the Federal Emergency Management Agency or FEMA never accepted a critical and early offer of help. Documents obtained by CNN show the Interior Department offered resources to FEMA right after Katrina hit, including boats, water rescue personnel and helicopters. But the Interior Department says it wasn't called upon to help FEMA until late in September."

FEMA Official Says He Was Unaware Of Interior Department Offers. The AP (1/30, Jordan) reported, "At a hearing Monday , the chief of response operations at the Federal Emergency Management Agency told senators he was unaware that the Interior Department offered to send boats, planes, trucks and personnel to rescue Katrina's victims immediately after Katrina hit. 'Communications and coordination was lacking, preplanning was lacking,' FEMA official William Lokey testified."

Louisiana Pre-Katrina Emergency Preparedness Criticized. The Washington Post (1/31, A7, Hsu, 744K) reports, "Louisiana officials did virtually nothing to prepare to evacuate poor, sick or elderly people as required under a state emergency plan adopted months before Hurricane Katrina hit, according to newly released documents. State Transportation and Development Secretary Johnny B. Bradberry told Senate investigators that he was assigned the task in April, months before the Aug. 29 storm. But his department had no buses or drivers to execute the mission. 'We have done nothing to fulfill this responsibility,' Bradberry said, according to a transcript of a Dec. 21 deposition obtained by The Washington Post."

FEMA To House New Orleans Katrina Homeless In Apartments. USA Today (1/31, Konigsmark, 2.31M) reports, "The federal government, criticized for taking too long to provide trailers to those made homeless by Hurricane Katrina, will give some New Orleanians rent-free apartments instead. The Federal Emergency Management Agency plans this week to start housing displaced people in 325 apartments left empty when Katrina triggered a massive evacuation of the city. If the pilot program works, FEMA may house as many as 20,000 individuals and families in apartments. The apartments would be free for at least 18 months. … All of the apartments were storm-damaged but have or will be repaired before FEMA assigns them to people."

"Women Of The Storm" Call On Congress To Provide More For New Orleans. USA Today (1/31, Hall, 2.31M) reports, "Carrying umbrellas the same bright blue as the tarps that cover thousands of Katrina-ravaged homes, 140 women from the New Orleans area went to Capitol Hill on Monday and invited members of Congress to visit their ruined city. The 'Women of the Storm' said they wanted to pressure politicians to see the storm's devastation in person and send more recovery money south."

Katrina Donations Being Put To Use, But Progress Hard To See. NBC Nightly News (1/30, story 6, 2:00, Williams) reported on "the money trail after Katrina. Last week in the Ninth Ward neighborhood of New Orleans, so many people there told us it was as if it was the day after Katrina, because so little has been done. Many of the same Americans who gave so much money to charities after Katrina -- a record $3 billion -- are right about now wondering where it all went, and why more hasn't been done?" NBC (Myers) added, "Today in New Orleans, the Red Cross delivers food to devastated neighborhoods. Volunteers still are serving 14,000 meals a day. In Biloxi, Mississippi, today, storm victims stop by a Salvation Army center for free supplies, ranging from infant formula to clothing. So far, the Red Cross and five other charities have received the largest amount of donations, have spent 71% of the money collected. The largest single expense, financial aid for 1.3 million families, who received about $1,000 each. … The Bush-Clinton Katrina Fund says its money will go to the colleges and universities devastated by the storm, faith-based groups, and foundations dedicated to rebuilding the three states. But so far, little money from that fund has actually been dispersed because officials say they're waiting for requests. With all the devastation and so little visible progress, some argue that Americans who gave so generously should have gotten more for their money by now. Still, the reality is that the amount of money private charities have to spend on rebuilding at best a few hundred million dollars is a drop in the ocean. The federal government has designated $85 billion, and many believe even that won't be enough."

WAR NEWS:

Rice Pledges US Will Not Neglect Afghanistan. AFP (1/31) reports, "The United States vowed to avoid its past mistake of neglecting Afghanistan. … 'We made the mistake once before of leaving (neglecting) Afghanistan,' US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said during a press conference with Afghan President Hamid Karzai. Not only did Afghans pay the price of such a policy but also Americans who were attacked by the Afghanistan-based al-Qaeda terror network on September 11, 2001, she said. 'We're not going to make that mistake again' said Rice, standing beside Karzai."

New Compact Provides Framework For International Aid To Afghanistan. The New York Times (1/31, Gall, 1.19M) reports Afghanistan "is expected to sign an agreement for an ambitious five-year plan for social, economic and political change with more than 60 donor countries at a two-day donors' conference in London that begins Tuesday. Eager to secure an international commitment to Afghanistan's future…Karzai and his government have sought long-term strategic and economic agreements with the United States and the European Union. The plan, called the Afghan Compact, pledges development and changes to turn the country into a functioning democracy and an economically viable state. It would replace the United Nations-sponsored Bonn accords, which laid out the first political goals for a post-Taliban Afghanistan." Rice "is expected to announce a new pledge from the United States as Afghanistan's major donor at the conference in London, which is being led jointly by Prime Minister Tony Blair and Mr. Karzai."

The Washington Post (1/31, A12, Witte, 744K) reports Afghan officials "are expected to point to the progress that has begun to remake Afghanistan: new highways, disarmed militias, an elected president and parliament, and schools open to both boys and girls. But they will also need to respond to criticism from people…whose perception of a wide gap between promises and results is shared by many Afghans. Although billions of dollars have been spent, sentiment is growing that much of the aid has benefited officials and a small, wealthy elite, leaving scraps for the millions who remain in dire poverty. More than a third of rural families lack enough food for at least part of the year. Life expectancy is only 45; infant and maternal mortality are as high as in the poorest African countries. And the female literacy rate -- below 20 percent nationwide, less than 1 percent in some provinces -- remains the world's lowest."

US Looking For Increased Military Support From NATO In Afghanistan. The Christian Science Monitor (1/31, Winter, 61K) reports, "The United States, which is providing the bulk of the foreign aid and military muscle to Afghanistan, is hoping that more of the mission can be shouldered by the international community - particularly NATO members. It is the military component that may prove to be the most frustrating and troublesome for the US because at least one NATO ally is showing signs of reneging on its promise. … Canada is sending 1,250 troops to Kandahar Province next month. On Thursday the British government committed to sending 3,300 paratroopers to take over Helmand, a Taliban stronghold and the top poppy-producing province. However, Holland is rethinking its promise to replace US troops in Uruzgan. The Netherlands, a NATO signatory, has been slated to send up to 1,100 of its soldiers to Uruzgan, the home of Taliban leader Mullah Omar and one of the country's most dangerous provinces. Many Dutch parliamentarians are having second thoughts after watching Afghanistan experience a sharp rise in insurgent violence, that has claimed 1,600 lives - making last year the deadliest since the Taliban's ouster in 2001."

Iraqi National Security Advisor Predicts Most US Troops Will Be Gone In Two Years. The New York Times (1/31, Filkins, 1.19M) reports Mowaffak al-Rubaie, Iraq's national security adviser and the chairman of a joint Iraqi-American committee planning the transfer from American to Iraqi troops, "said the number of American and other foreign soldiers here would probably fall to below 100,000 by year's end and that an overwhelming majority could be out in two years. The statements…give the strongest indication yet that the Bush administration is preparing to carry out significant reductions in American forces over the current year. There are now about 160,000 foreign troops in Iraq, about 140,000 of them American." The Times continues, "In interviews, several State and Defense Department officials said the assessment by the Iraq and Afghanistan Joint Transition Planning Group was focused not on the timing of troop withdrawals but on the mechanics of making the switch from a large military presence to a more traditional relationship run by American Embassies, and how to do that while maintaining Washington's political leverage but at far less cost. Mr. Rubaie said that while there were plans for withdrawal, the timing of the reductions is contingent on conditions on the ground. … Adding, 'By the end of 2007, the overwhelming majority of the multinational forces will have left the country.'"

Iraq Reconstruction IG Blames Insurgency For Depressing Progress. The Wall Street Journal (1/31, Dreazen, 2.11M) reports, "Poor oversight and security woes are keeping Iraq's electricity, water and oil production far below prewar levels despite the infusion of billions of dollars in American money, according to a new audit by the Bush administration's Iraq rebuilding watchdog. The report by Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction Stuart Bowen raised questions about what shape Iraq will be in when the administration winds down its rebuilding effort later this year. According to the report, shortcomings were acute in the oil sector, the mainstay of Iraq's economy. Exports haven't come close to preinvasion predictions, the report said. … The report attributed many shortcomings to mismanagement, corruption and policy shifts that moved billions of dollars from rebuilding to tasks such as training Iraqi security forces. Those factors have created a 'reconstruction gap' between the number of projects originally planned and the number that will be carried out, with just 36% of the 136 water-related projects and 70% of the 425 electricity-related projects targeted for completion."

Asked on PBS' NewsHour (1/30, Ifill) to comment on the "reconstruction gap" he cites in his report, Bowen said, "The reason for the reconstruction gap. which is an observation of a reality, not an alarm bell, is the fact that we are confronting an insurgency that we didn't anticipate, at least the level of lethality. This is…a reconstruction program performed virtually under fire. And that's required reprogramming of money that was initially intended for reconstruction, for bricks and mortar, to security -- a reprogramming that I fully support. … The money that we've allocated for reconstruction is going to get the Iraqi system off to a good start towards rehabilitation."

Bowen Seeks Increased Infrastructure Spending. The Washington Post (1/31, A13, Finer, 744K) reports Bowen "has called for money beyond $18.4 billion originally earmarked, saying postwar funds will be exhausted by the end of 2006 with many projects likely to be unfinished. … 'The need for more funding has reached a critical point,' Bowen wrote. 'There is a compelling basis to increase support for sustainability.' The report, and an audit released separately by Bowen's office Monday, concluded that the uncertainty of funding that would allow projects to be continued and infrastructure maintained could disrupt a smooth transition if the United States hands off reconstruction responsibilities to the Iraqi government this year, as projected." The Post notes, "while foreign donors, along with the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank pledged more than $13 billion toward that effort during an October 2003 conference in Madrid on aid to Iraq, much of the money remains undelivered."

Bowen Challenges Reports Of "Pervasive Fraud." Asked if there is "an end in sight for the U.S. role in reconstruction," Bowen replied, "2006 will be a year of transition. Politically we've already seen that. Economically it's coming. We've announced an audit to look carefully at the transition planning by U.S. authorities in Iraq. … I believe that if pervasive fraud was present in Iraq, we would have identified it and brought it to light. But what we have in a chaotic environment, cash-heavy environment, a few bad actors that have sought to take advantage of a difficult situation."

Audit Finds US Contracting Procedures Proved Impractical In Iraq. The New York Times (1/31, Glanz, 1.19M) reports, "A sweeping examination of thousands of contracts that the United States underwrote with Iraqi money has provided the most comprehensive look yet at the confusion, waste and lack of accountability in rebuilding and training programs during the first years of the American-led occupation, say the Iraqi finance minister and a retired American officer who led an investigative arm of the audit. The effort, which is being undertaken by a contracting office in Baghdad that reports to the United States Army and which has not previously been disclosed, began in March 2005 and is close to completion. … The audit of about 9,000 contracts worth at least $5.8 billion in Iraqi oil money and assets seized from Saddam Hussein's government was undertaken to determine how much of the money originally set aside for the work should ultimately be paid." The examination "exposed a system riddled with problems, like projects that were assigned but never carried out and Iraqi subcontractors who did not know they had been awarded jobs, the American officer, Scott Meehan, a retired Army major, said yesterday." Ali Allawi, the Iraqi finance minister, "said the American administration brought with it a contracting procedure that may have worked in the orderly environment of the United States. 'Once you brought it in the context of Iraq,' Mr. Allawi said, 'it fell flat on its face.'"

Administration Expected To Request Additional $2 Billion For Reconstruction. The Washington Times (1/31, Scarborough, 90K) reports, "The Bush administration is considering asking Congress later this year for at least $2 billion in new reconstruction money, primarily for maintaining completed Iraqi facilities. Administration officials say the additional funding is needed to prevent completed projects in Iraq from falling into disrepair while the new government tries to establish a steady flow of revenue from oil and other sources to sustain the nation's infrastructure. … Congress already has approved $24 billion for Iraq reconstruction, and some speculated that the White House would not ask for more. But in recent weeks, it has become evident that Iraq does not have the financial ability to sustain all its new properties, said officials familiar with the internal discussions.

Poll Finds 47% Of Iraqis Approve Of Attacks On US Soldiers. Knight Ridder (1/31, Brown) reports, "A new poll found that nearly half of Iraqis approve of attacks on U.S.-led forces, and most favor setting a timetable for American troops to leave. … 47 percent of Iraqis approve of attacks on American forces, but there were large differences among ethnic and religious groups. Among Sunni Muslims, 88 percent said they approved of the attacks. That approval was found among 41 percent of Shiite Muslims and 16 percent of Kurds. Ninety-three percent of Iraqis oppose violence against Iraqi security forces, and 99 percent oppose attacks on Iraqi civilians." Knight Ridder adds the poll "also found that 80 percent of Iraqis think the United States plans to maintain permanent bases in the country even if the newly elected Iraqi government asks American forces to leave. Researchers found a link between support for attacks and the belief among Iraqis that the United States intends to keep a permanent military presence in the country. … Only 39 percent of Iraqis surveyed thought that Iraqi police and army forces were strong enough to deal with the security challenges on their own, while 59 percent thought Iraq still needed the help of military forces from other countries. Seventy percent of Iraqis favor setting a timetable for U.S. forces to withdraw, with half of those favoring a withdrawal within six months and the other half favoring a withdrawal over two years." The poll "was to be published Tuesday by WorldPublicOpinion.org, a Web site that reports on public opinion from around the globe. The survey was conducted Jan. 2-5, with a nationwide sample of 1,150 Iraqis from country's main religious and ethnic sects."

Anti-IED Efforts Have Become To Priority For US Military. ABC's World News Tonight (1/30, story 3, 2:00, Vargas) reported IEDs are the "single-greatest cause of death of soldiers inside Iraq. Last year, insurgents fired off 10,000 of these. Ending roadside bombings is now a primary mission of the American military. … The Pentagon has created a $3.5 billion IED task force. … Insurgents have grown increasingly creative in hiding the IEDs, hiding them in garbage, potholes, and fake concrete blocks. They can use cell phones, children's toys and walkie-talkies to set them off. The military has developed high-tech tools, from small robots to a massive, new mine sweeper called the 'Buffalo' to try to clear away IEDS. But the task force's most important work is forensic investigation, piecing together bomb fragments, searching for clues about who is making them."

The Christian Science Monitor (1/31, Sappenfield, 61K) reports, "One of the most dangerous places for US troops in Iraq is in their own trucks. … IEDs account for more than half of all American injuries or deaths in combat. The weapon is so primitive that military bomb-squad schools once saw them as little more than the work of kids and miscreants. Now, troops bolt extra armor to their Humvees, and new arrivals receive IED awareness training. Last week, the Pentagon even announced that its IED task force would become permanent, one of several recent moves that suggests the issue is becoming a greater priority."

New Polytrauma Centers Treat Wounded US Soldiers. The New York Times (1/31, Eckholm, 1.19M) reports, "Thousands of miles from the battlefield, intricate medical choices have become routine here, at one of four special rehabilitation centers the government created last year to treat the war's most catastrophically wounded troops. … With their concentrated batteries of specialists and therapists, these centers are developing a new model of advanced care, a response to the distinctive medical conundrum of the Iraq war. With better battlefield care and protective gear, the military is saving more of the wounded, yet the insurgents' heavy reliance on car bombs and buried explosives means the survivors are more damaged — and damaged in more different ways — than ever before. To describe the maimed survivors of this ugly new war, a graceless new word, polytrauma, has entered the medical lexicon. Each soldier arriving at Tampa's Polytrauma Rehabilitation Center, inside the giant veterans hospital, brings a whole world of injury. The typical patient…has head injuries, vision and hearing loss, nerve damage, multiple bone fractures, unhealed body wounds, infections and emotional or behavioral problems. Some have severed limbs or spinal cords."

ABC's Woodruff, Vogt Show Signs Of Improvement. ABC and NBC opened their nightly news broadcasts with updates on the condition of ABC anchor Bob Woodruff and cameraman Doug Vogt. ABC's World News Tonight (1/30, lead story, 3:20, Vargas) reported, "They are showing signs of improvement after suffering serious head injuries during a roadside bombing. Bob and Doug were evacuated by helicopter, reaching a hospital in the Green Zone 37 minutes after the blast. They were whisked by helicopter again, to the US military hospital, where they underwent surgery. Then, they were flown to the American military hospital in Landstuhl, Germany." ABC (Shud) added, "There were positive signs today. Bob responded to stimuli in his hands and feet, and briefly opened his eyes. I was able to meet and speak with Doug. He was awake, and alert, and joking. That gave us a chance to smile today."

The CBS Evening News (1/30, story 3, 2:00, Schieffer) reported, "According to sources inside ABC News and the military, Woodruff's brain is badly bruised in two places. Military physicians removed part of his skull to relieve the swelling. The explosion broke his collar bone, shoulder and at least a few ribs. Vogt suffered a fathered skull, pieces of shrapnel lodged in his head. … For journalists, Iraq has become the deadliest war ever: at least 61 killed in just under four years, compared to 66 killed in the 20 years of Vietnam."

NBC Nightly News (1/30, lead story, 2:30, Maceda) reported, "Landstuhl Hospital outside Frankfurt, one of the US's largest. Inside, Bob Woodruff and Doug Vogt are under heavy sedation in the intensive care unit, in stable but serious condition. … Woodruff and Vogt were wearing protective armor, and helmets. Doctors here say it probably saved their lives."

The New York Times (1/31, Landler, 1.19M) reports, "The explosion occurred as Mr. Woodruff and Mr. Vogt were riding in the Iraqi vehicle near Taji, a tense area northwest of Baghdad. They had been part of a news team accompanying units of the Fourth Infantry Division and had initially traveled in a United States Army armored Humvee. Before the attack, they switched to the more lightly armored Iraqi vehicle, the network reported."

The Los Angeles Times (1/31, Gold, Moore, 958K) reports Lt. Col. Barry Johnson, a U.S. military spokesman, "said he knew of no other casualties in the attack."

The USA Today (1/31, Johnson, 2.31M) reports ABC News says the weekend attack…will not derail any of its game plans for World News Tonight, including sending its anchors to hot spots to cover the news."

Military Field Hospital Played Vital Role. ABC and NBC both followed with reports on field hospitals in Iraq. ABC's World News Tonight (1/30, story 2, 2:00, Vargas) reported, "The US military hospital in Balad played a major role in keeping Bob alive. It is one of the most sophisticated battlefield hospitals ever created."

NBC Nightly News (1/30, story 2, 2:00, Miklaszewski) reported, "Military officials say it really is the best field hospital of its kind, performing brain surgery on an almost daily basis, with an overall survival rate of 96%."

ABC Upset By NYTimes Coverage Of Incident. The Washington Post's Howard Kurtz (1/31) writes, "ABC executives and journalists were angry about what they viewed as an insensitive front-page sub-headline in yesterday's New York Times that said, 'Field Reports Were a Ratings Strategy.' … Times Executive Editor Bill Keller said yesterday that 'the subhead was a poor choice of words, and I called David Westin today to express our regrets.'"

Al Jazeera Airs Tape Of Tearful Carroll Calling For Release Of Female Prisoners. Network news broadcasts juxtaposed al Jazeera's airing of a tape from Al Qaeda's Ayman al-Zawahiri with the release of a tape of freelance journalist Jill Carroll from captivity in Iraq; ABC linked the Carroll story to the story on the condition of its own injured journalists.

ABC's World News Tonight (1/30, story 4, :45, Vargas) reported, "There is news tonight about another journalist in Iraq," Jill Carroll. It is "difficult to hear what she is saying. But she is clearly crying." Al Jazeera "reported that she appealed for the release of all Iraqi women being held by US and Iraqi authorities."

The CBS Evening News (1/30, story 2, 2:00, Schieffer) reported, "It was a day for terrible tapes. The kidnappers of American reporter Jill Carroll released another videotape of her today." CBS (Palmer) added, "This second video from Carroll's captors broadcast on al Jazeera is dated January 28. In it, a tearful Carroll, wearing an Islamic head scarf, pleads for the release of all women prisoners in Iraq. This time she asks not only for those in US custody but those held by Iraq's Interior Ministry too. … It's believed there are seven women left in US custody, but it's not known how many may be in Iraqi jails. The Christian Science Monitor released a statement tonight saying that anyone with a heart would be distressed to see a young, innocent woman like Jill Carroll treated the way she was in that video and called on her captors to release her immediately into the protection of her family."

NBC Nightly News (1/30, story 3, 2:00, Williams) reported, "This was busy day on the Arab language cable television network al Jazeera. They aired two new videotapes of interest to Americans." NBC (Mitchell) added, "A weeping Jill Carroll, her head covered, appeared on al Jazeera and according to the network, pleaded for the release of all Iraqi women prisoners. Her voice can be heard only briefly under the voice of Al Jazeera saying 'hope for the families.' Why did the kidnappers release the tape?" John Brennan, former national counterterrorism center director: "It may be an attempt to show how powerful they are, but it does the exact opposite. What they've done is to prey upon an innocent American female journalist and to put her in front of a camera and to try to intimidate the administration and the American public."

The New York Times (1/31, Worth, 1.19M) reports Al Jazeera "The American military freed five Iraqi women from detention last week, but military officials said the decision had no relation to the kidnappers' demands."

The Washington Post (1/31, A12, Finer, 744K) notes, "Since her abduction, Iraqi politicians, representatives of news media and Islamic organizations, and members of her family have pleaded for her release."

Defense Lawyer Says Saddam Will Refuse To Appear In Court Tomorrow. The CBS Evening News (1/30, story 4, :45, Schieffer) was the only network news broadcast to report that "in Iraq today, Saddam Hussein's top defense lawyer said Saddam will refuse to appear in court on Wednesday when his trial is supposed to start up again. This follows an in-court shouting match yesterday between Saddam and the trial's new chief judge, who eventually ordered Saddam, another defendant, and a defense lawyer out of the room."

Australian PM Tied To Oil-For-Food-Scandal. The Financial Times (1/31, Tucker) reports, "The official investigation into whether Australia's monopoly wheat exporter paid A$300m ($225m) in bribes to Saddam Hussein's regime has unearthed evidence drawing John Howard, prime minister, into the alleged scandal for the first time. The Commission of Inquiry, which is probing allegations that AWB paid kickbacks to Iraq under the discredited United Nations oil-for-food programme, released a letter written by Mr Howard in which he sought to work 'closely' with the wheat exporter, just weeks before the company's chief executive visited Baghdad to negotiate illicit payments to the Saddam regime." Howard "wrote to Andrew Lindberg, AWB chief executive, in July 2002, as Iraq was threatening to cut imports of wheat from Australia. The letter ended: 'In view of the importance of the matter, I suggest the government and AWB remain in close contact in order that we can jointly attempt to achieve a satisfactory outcome in the longer term.' Soon after, Mr Lindberg went to Iraq accompanied by officials from Australia's Department of Foreign Affairs and Trade. According to evidence presented to the inquiry, it was during this visit that Mr Lindberg agreed to pay $2m to the Iraqi regime that was to be disguised in an inflated wheat contract."

Bird Flu Death In Iraq's Kurdish Region Confirmed. The New York Times (1/31, Rosenthal, 1.19M) reports, "A 15-year-old Iraqi girl has died of bird flu, Iraqi and international health officials said yesterday, indicating the arrival of the disease in another country — one that, in its war-torn state, may be ill prepared to control its spread. … The girl, Shengeen Abdul Qadr, died this month in Sulaimaniya, in the Kurdish region of northern Iraq, three days after touching a dead bird infected with the virus, the Iraqi health minister said yesterday. Her uncle, who died last week, is presumed to have succumbed to the disease as well, although test results are pending. A serious bird flu outbreak has killed four people and hundreds of thousands of birds in the Kurdish part of neighboring Turkey during the past six weeks. With trade routes for trucks and mules crisscrossing national borders in a large Kurdish area, health officials have been warning that it was only a matter of time before the virus spread."

Clinton Administration Defended Use Of Force Against Iraq. In its "History Lessons" column, the Washington Times (1/31, 90K) excerpts a February 16, 1999 Defense Department briefing during which Assistant Defense Secretary Kenneth Bacon was asked if the Clinton Administration planned to ask Congress for war powers permission. Bacon said, "Since 1991, we have flown tens of tens of thousands of sorties over Iraq to police the no-fly zone. In the overwhelming number of cases [the Iraqis] have not resisted or shown any signs of attacking coalition aircraft. Since the end of [Operation] Desert Fox in late December they have aggressively attacked U.S. aircraft. They have violated the no-fly zone. … They have turned on their radars; they have fired anti-aircraft batteries and also fired missiles at our planes over the last month and a half. We have responded properly against these attacks, and we will continue to respond properly against these attacks."

National Guard Reports Sharp Improvement In Recruiting. The New York Times/AP (1/31, Press) reports, "National Guard officials said Monday that recruiting had accelerated so much in recent months that they expected to expand the Guard even as the Bush administration proposes to shrink it. The National Guard Bureau, the Pentagon office that administers the Guard, issued a statement outlining a turnaround in recruiting and predicting that it would continue to rise this year. In the last quarter of 2005, the Guard signed up 13,466 recruits, above its goal of 12,605. It was the first time since 1993 that the Guard exceeded its goal in that period." The AP adds, "In his 2007 budget, to be sent to Congress on Feb. 6, President Bush would pay for a Guard of 333,000 soldiers; its Congressionally authorized limit is 350,000. Administration officials say that is not a cut, because the Guard now has 333,000 soldiers. On Monday, the Guard said it was 'aggressively working' to reach 350,000 troops by the end of the current budget year on Sept. 30."

Pentagon Wants To Cultivate New Breed Of Troops To Combat Terrorists. The Washington Times (1/31, Scarborough, 90K) reports, "The Pentagon wants the services to create a 'new breed of warrior' who can perform his own skill sets and take on the abilities of a special operation commando in fighting terrorists. A draft of the Defense Department's 2005 Quadrennial Defense Review (QDR) says these warriors will be 'able to move more easily between disparate mission sets while preserving their depth of skill in primary specialties. Future warriors will be as proficient in irregular operations, including counterinsurgency and stabilization operations, as they are today in high-intensity combat.' The move is an example of how the war to find and eliminate Islamic terrorists is permeating nearly every aspect of the Pentagon's long-range planning."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Jury Selected In Trial Of Ex-Enron Executives Lay, Skilling. Midway through their newscasts, all three networks reported on jury selection in the trial of ex-Enron executives Kenneth Lay and Jeffrey Skilling. ABC's World News Tonight (1/30, story 6, 2:00, Vargas) reported, "In Houston today, a jury was picked to try the men charged in one of the biggest corporate crime plots in history." Lay and Skilling "face 38 counts, including conspiracy and stock fraud." ABC (VonFremd) added, "Both the founder and former CEO of Enron walked the gauntlet of cameras today, accused of conspiracy in the biggest corporate scandal in American history. Is this a chance to clear your name?" Skilling: "It certainly is."

The CBS Evening News (1/30, story 6, 2:00, Cowan) added, "The tarnished brass once on top of Enron arrived looking nervous this morning, worried about finding 16 people in their hometown who don't hate them to the core. … Lay and Skilling are perhaps the most notorious men in Houston. Nearly 5,000 people lost their jobs when the energy giant collapsed. … Tomorrow, opening arguments begin. They are suspected to be just as fast as the jury selection, just six hours total."

NBC Nightly News (1/30, story 9, 2:00, Williams) reported, "Tonight in Houston, Texas, a jury has been seated" for the trial of "the two men who used to run Enron, and whose names may forever be synonymous with massive corporate fraud in which the victims were numerous small investors whose savings got wiped out." NBC (Thompson) asked, "Four years later, where are we in the fight against corporate crime? Stephen Cutler led the Security and Exchange Commission's enforcement division until last April, winning some $6 billion in penalties and return of ill-gotten gains as federal prosecutors racked up a string of high-profile convictions -- Worldcom CEO Bernie Ebbers, Adelphia founder John Rigas, and Martha Stewart. But Cutler, now in private practice, says the fight isn't over." Cutler "I think the vigilance that's required is akin to the sunscreen that you need to put on when you go to the beach, or the dental floss that you've got to use every day. You can't do it just once."

The Chicago Tribune (1/31, Lazaroff) reports, "For sheer emotion and spectacle, it should rank among the most gripping business-related trials in memory." The Tribune continues, "Opening arguments are scheduled to begin Tuesday in the prosecution of former Enron Corp. executives Kenneth Lay and Jeffrey Skilling, a day after a jury was seated." The Tribune adds, "Lay and Skilling, who were once celebrated in Houston and praised on Wall Street, are seeking to have their names cleared from the bankruptcy of an energy trading company that came to symbolize the greed and alleged dishonesty of an economic boom gone awry. … Enron investors and many of its 31,000 former employees are seeking retribution for money and pensions lost when the company's stock crashed in the fall of 2001 amid accusations of disguised loans, hidden debts and phony profits. … 'Enron is the last of the great scandals to go to trial,' said Charles M. Elson , director of the John L. Weinberg Center for Corporate Governance at the University of Delaware. 'It's basically the final chapter of the story of corporate scandals from the boom of the late-1990s.'" The Tribune notes, "In a process that took much of the day at Bob Casey U.S. Court House in downtown Houston, a jury of eight women and four men was selected to hear a trial that U.S. District Judge Sim Lake said should take less than four months. Lake emphasized to potential juror that the trial was a legal proceeding and not an opportunity to redress the losses suffered by former Enron employees. At the same time, he disregarded arguments by the defendants' lawyers that there had been too much pre-trial publicity to guarantee a fair hearing."

The AP (1/31, Hays, McClam) reports, "A court clerk swore in the 12 jurors and four alternates, and U.S. District Judge Sim Lake instructed them not to talk about the case during their service. He also ordered them not to read, listen to or watch news reports about the trial. … 'You have been through a rigorous selection process. You will be the judges of the facts of this case,' Lake said." The AP adds, "Further details about the jurors' backgrounds were not immediately available because their jury questionnaires, filled out weeks ago, have not been made public, and the judge conducted individual questioning of potential jurors on Monday at the bench. … Earlier in the day, the judge had told a pool of almost 100 potential jurors: 'I can assure you this will be one of the most interesting and important cases ever tried.'"

Reuters (1/31, Daily) reports, "The no-nonsense Lake, who questioned each of the 100 potential jurors individually to ferret out possible bias, told the panel he did not want people on the panel who were there to 'right a wrong or provide a remedy for those who suffered,' but who could fairly weigh the evidence in the case. … Thousands of Houston residents were thrown out of work and billions of dollars in retirement accounts were wiped out in Enron's downfall, and the company's name has since become synonymous with corporate greed."

The Los Angeles Times (1/31, Mulligan, Sanchez, 958K) reports, "Recent court filings indicate that the government plans to focus more on the defendants' allegedly false statements than on potentially complicated accounting details." The Financial Times (1/31, McNulty), USA Today (1/31, Farrell, 2.31M), Washington Post (1/31, D1, Johnson, 744K), Wall Street Journal (1/31, Emshwiller, McWilliams, 2.11M) and New York Times (1/31, Barrionuevo, 1.19M) run similar reports.

2nd Circuit Questions Federal Prosecutor Over Ebbers Conviction, Sentencing. The AP (1/31, Neumeister) reports, "Federal appeals court judges Monday questioned the fairness of the conviction and 25-year sentence of WorldCom Corp. chief Bernard Ebbers in an $11 billion fraud." The AP continues, "As the 64-year-old Ebbers watched from a front-row seat, the 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Manhattan put a federal prosecutor on the defensive for the conviction last March of Ebbers on fraud and conspiracy charges. … 'There are many violent criminals who don't get 25 years in prison. Twenty years does seem an awfully long time,' Judge Jose Cabranes said." The AP adds, "Assistant U.S. Attorney William Johnson said Ebbers hurt millions of investors in an unprecedented accounting fraud that drove WorldCom into bankruptcy in 2002. It re-emerged under the name MCI Inc. Verizon bought MCI in a deal that closed earlier this month. … Reid Weingarten, a lawyer for Ebbers, asked the three-judge panel to order a new trial for his client on the grounds that he was not permitted to call key witnesses to refute government evidence. … The trial judge, Barbara Jones, refused to grant immunity to the witnesses because of the pending investigation."

The New York Law Journal (1/31, Hamblett) reports, "Weingarten told the 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals that the witnesses, all former WorldCom executives, 'were designated as targets' of the massive criminal WorldCom fraud investigation 'to keep them off the witness stand for us.'" The Journal adds, "The Ebbers defense team, fighting to win a new trial before Southern District Judge Barbara Jones, claimed the three witnesses, all former executives at the company, were in a unique position to provide 'powerful circumstantial evidence' that Ebbers' version of events about the largest accounting fraud in U.S. history was true -- and he was not aware of the fraud. … Jones refused to grant the trio immunity, making them reluctant to testify at all for the Ebbers defense, Weingarten said. … The government's claim that the three former executives were 'targets' or 'subjects' of the investigation, he said, amounted to the government 'manipulating' their absence from the trial." The Journal notes, "Weingarten's argument drew some intense questions for Assistant U.S. Attorney William Johnson from a panel that consisted of Judges Jose Cabranes, Barrington D. Parker, and by conference call, Ralph Winter. … 'I'm trying to understand where the government is on this,' Parker asked Johnson. 'For example, if we get eight to 10 years down the line and there are no charges, we'd be scratching our heads even more.' … The judges continually pressed Johnson to tell them whether the investigation was ongoing. … 'We are not out there actively continuing to find evidence to charge those witnesses,' Johnson said. … 'So they are not under investigation?' Parker asked. … The dialogue continued with Johnson saying the investigation was still open, but that no 'active' steps are being taken at this time."

The Washington Post (1/31, Masters) reports, "Another member of the three-judge panel, Barrington D. Parker Jr., also appeared skeptical. It was "curious," he said, that the investigation of Beaumont and the others 'fell into some black hole. That approach could really eviscerate the case law on unavailability [of witnesses], and the ability to manipulate could become problematic.'" The Post notes, "Federal prosecutors declined to comment after the brief hearing, and Ebbers, 64, said he was under strict orders from his lawyers not to talk about the case. Weingarten, though, was upbeat. 'Somewhere along the line, justice is going to be done in this case, and I hope it's here,' he said. 'We're optimistic and we have great issues.'"

CRIMINAL LAW:

Florida Man Pleads Guilty To Fraudulently Soliciting Katrina Donations. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (1/31) reports, "A man accused of collecting almost $40,000 in donations by falsely claiming he was flying Hurricane Katrina relief flights pleaded guilty Monday to fraud." Gary S. Kraser of Miami "created a Web site on which he told of evacuating people needing immediate medical attention. He provided vivid details, such as witnessing the electrocutions of dogs by downed power lines and saving the life of a 7-month-old baby who needed transplant surgery. He said he even 'tipped wings' with Air Force One during one flight. None of it was true, prosecutors said." The AP notes, "Most of the money was refunded after the FBI began investigating the scam." The Miami Herald (1/31, Weaver, 323K) adds, "Last October, FBI agents arrested the 50-year-old computer con man in what authorities were calling the country's first Internet charity fraud case involving the exploitation of Katrina victims." He "is scheduled for sentencing on April 13."

FEMA Managers Will Remain Jailed Until Bonds Posted. The AP (1/31) reports two FEMA managers "accused of taking kickbacks from a food services contractor will stay in custody until they post property bonds, a federal prosecutor said Monday." Assistant US Attorney Jan Mann "said Loyd Hollman's bond was set at $170,000, and Andrew Rose's at 'substantially more.' They will not have to put up cash, but must put up any property they own as collateral before being released, she said." The Rocky Mountain News (1/31, Montero) notes Mann "said plans to present an indictment to the grand jury could happen as early as this week."

Ryan Prosecutors Expect To Rest After FBI Agent's Testimony Wednesday. The AP (1/31, Robinson) reports, "George Ryan's trial remained on hold Monday but prosecutors said they expected to rest their case Wednesday after jurors hear testimony from an FBI agent and see a group of video clips showing the former governor talking with reporters." The AP notes that the trial "went on hold Thursday when FBI agent Raymond Ruebenson took a leave for a family matter. … Ruebenson has spent years as the FBI case agent working on the government's Operation Safe Road investigation, which began by focusing on bribes paid in exchange for drivers licenses and expanded to encompass a wide array of political corruption in state government in the Ryan era." The Chicago Tribune (1/31, O'Connor, 643K) adds that the hospitalization of Lawrence Warner's lead attorney, Edward Genson, also has delayed the trial. "Even though Genson remained in the hospital Monday, U.S. District Judge Rebecca Pallmeyer expressed confidence the trial would resume Wednesday. … If Genson is healthy and testimony resumes Wednesday, the prosecution expects to rest its case by midday that day, said Assistant U.S. Atty. Patrick Collins. Testimony by the prosecution has taken four months."

Former Aide Testifies About Passing Contractor Funds To Campbell. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (1/31, Scott, Warren, 430K) reports, "A trusted aide who lived in Bill Campbell's basement apartment testified Monday that he funneled money to the former Atlanta mayor to be used for gambling and taking girlfriends on trips. Dewey Clark sobbed repeatedly as he described his relationship with Campbell and how he bonded with the ex-mayor's family. He was the first witness in the federal corruption trial against Campbell to say that he saw a contractor pass money to him. … Clark testified that he funneled money from city contractor George Greene and strip club owner Michael Childs." The Journal-Constitution adds, "Clark also testified that Fred Prewitt, Campbell's friend and chairman of the city's Civil Service Board, passed cash to the former mayor. Prewitt 'told me he was going to put a roll [of cash] in the mayor's hand big enough to choke a goat.'"

Campbell Friend Testifies About Gambling Trips. WXIA-TV Atlanta (1/30, Carnes, Christensen) reports on its Web site from a story broadcast Monday, "Gabe Pascarella, a close friend of Campbell's, testified on behalf of the government about gambling trips he took with the former mayor. … Pascarella testified that he often used his personal credit card to pay for the trips made by Campbell, which Campbell often made with women other than his wife. Pascarella said Campbell usually reimbursed him with cash and that the former mayor would also use cash to play high-stakes poker game."

Judge Rules Only Prosecutors, Defense Will Know Identities Of "Mafia Cops" Jurors. The New York Post (1/31, Haberman, 624K) reports, "A Brooklyn judge yesterday said the names of jurors deciding the fate of the two reputed mob cops will not be kept a secret and that they have nothing to fear by being part of a Mafia trial. But, federal Judge Jack Weinstein also ruled that only prosecutors and lawyers for ex-NYPD detectives Louis Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa will know their identities." The Post notes, "The Brooklyn U.S. Attorney's Office asked for the anonymous jury because of the intense media coverage the case has received and, more importantly, because the duo is charged with using their position within the NYPD to divulge confidential information to the Luchese crime family."

Federal Officials Say 39 People Knew Of Minnesota School Shooting Plot. Knight Ridder (1/31, Ragsdale) reports, "Facts intended to heal may have instead reopened the wounds of those suffering from the Red Lake school shooting. Parents of those who died, as well as a survivor of the shooting, heard federal officials say on Monday that 39 people had some knowledge of Jeff Weise's plan to assault Red Lake High School before he carried it out last March 21. … And they were told that none of those people could be charged, because it is not against the law to know that a crime might be committed and do nothing about it." KRT notes, "About 40 people attended, including Steven Cobenais, recovering from severe facial wounds, and his family. Most appeared distressed and left quickly. … According to several family members, the federal officials, who included representatives from the FBI and the Bureau of Indian Affairs, reported that 39 people had some information that Weise was considering or planning the attack."

Federal Agents Raid Philadelphia Electrical Company. The Philadelphia Inquirer (1/31, Shiffman, 423K) reports, "Agents from the FBI, the IRS and the Department of Labor raided a South Philadelphia electrical company Saturday, officials said yesterday. Agents executed a search warrant at the offices of Dougherty Electric Inc., which is owned by Donald Dougherty, said FBI spokeswoman Jerri Williams. Williams declined further comment." The Inquirer notes, "Dougherty is a friend but no relation to John Dougherty, the business manager of Local 98 of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers who is considering a campaign for mayor of Philadelphia."

Gambino Associate Sentenced To Prison For Porn Site Scam. The New York Post (1/31, Haberman, 624K) reports, "The apple of John Gotti's eye is rotten to the core, said a Brooklyn judge who sentenced one of the Gambino crime family's top earners to nine years in prison yesterday for his role in a porn scam." Richard Martino "pleaded guilty last February to racketeering and mail and wire fraud for bilking $650 million from porn perusers in what Assistant Brooklyn U.S. Attorney Eric Komitee described as the 'most sophisticated Internet fraud' he has ever seen. Martino has admitted to luring visitors onto porn Web sites by promising the steamed-up surfers 'free tours.' Internet users would then be billed up to $90 when they gave their credit-card number. The racket netted him $230 million between 1996 and 2002."

Prosecutors, Lawmakers Embrace DNA Technology. The Christian Science Monitor (1/31, Richey) reports that legal analysts say "prosecutors and lawmakers who were once suspicious of the DNA challenges are now increasingly embracing the new technology as a backstop in the criminal justice system. … Of the 33 states that have passed laws establishing procedures for DNA testing, 12 have sunset provisions, which offer only limited time for DNA tests in cases where inmates have no more options for appeal. Such provisions were enacted in part out of concern five years ago that state courts might be flooded with appeals calling for expensive tests. But the flood hasn't happened, analysts say. In the meantime, the steady flow of exonerations has resulted in widespread public and political support for DNA testing. Opponents of sunset provisions say states should never enact a deadline that would prevent innocent people from proving their innocence. Innocence Project lawyers say it often takes months or years to locate evidence, investigate a past crime, and prepare the necessary legal arguments needed to convince a judge that a DNA test should be administered."

Harton Murder Case Goes Forward. The Washington Post (1/31, B5, Paley) reports, "Opening arguments are scheduled to begin as soon as today" in the trial of Melissa Burch Harton, accused of killing Natasha A. Bacchus. Harton has been charged with first-degree murder. Post says, "The killing took place during their 2005 spring break from Loyola College, where the two married women had met three years earlier when they began a doctoral program together in clinical psychology. Bacchus, of Stewartstown, Pa., had driven to Harton's home in Columbia to celebrate their completion of a major project." Bacchus was killed after an argument between her and Harton, the article says. The article also notes that the argument possibly involved allegations of romantic feelings on either Harton's or Bacchus's part for the other person.

Two Shootings In DC. The Washington Post (1/31, B2, Dvorak) reports, "Two teenagers were killed and three others were wounded in two shootings in the District early yesterday afternoon, police said. The first incident happened about 12:10 p.m. in the 500 block of Lamont Street NW. Delonte McCray Freeman, 19, died despite the efforts of a neighbor who tried to keep him alive. Two other teenagers were wounded. … The second shooting took place about 1 p.m. in the 4300 block of Fourth Street SE, when a group of people walking across the parking lot of St. Thomas More Catholic Church was approached by two gunmen, said Sgt. Joe Gentile, D.C. police spokesman. One youth, believed to be 16, was killed, and an 18-year-old was wounded, police said. Authorities, who did not release the name of the youth who died, said they were continuing to investigate the case."

Federal Court Denies Appeal Of Florida Death Row Inmate. The AP (1/31, Kaczor) reports, "A convicted murderer lost a federal appeal Monday, one day before his scheduled execution, but he had another pending, one of his lawyers said." The AP continues, "If that fails, Arthur D. Rutherford will appeal to the U.S. Supreme Court, which last week stayed the execution of another Florida death row inmate on an issue Rutherford also has raised, that the U.S. state's lethal injection procedure is cruel and unusual punishment. … 'We're just waiting to see what happens,' attorney Linda McDermott said." The AP adds, "The 56-year-old carpenter was convicted of killing and robbing Stella Salamon in 1985 at her home in Milton, Florida, where he had done repair work for her. She had been strangled or asphyxiated and her body was found in a bathtub. … The U.S. Supreme Court granted a last-minute stay of execution to Clarence Hill last week so the justices can determine whether the 11th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Atlanta erred by denying him a chance to appeal the lethal injection claim."

CIVIL LAW:

USG Offers Trust To Pay Asbestos Claims. The Wall Street Journal (1/31, Brat) reports, USG Corp., a building-materials maker and asbestos defendant, said it "would create and fund a trust for personal-injury claims with $900 million in cash and a contingent note for an additional $3.05 billion." However, the article said, congressional legislation could pre-empt this settlement, canceling the contingent note. That legislation, "the Fairness in Asbestos Injury Resolution Act of 2005, would create a $140 billion trust fund to pay asbestos victims," the article said. Also, "The legislation would require insurance and reinsurance companies to contribute $46 billion to the fund, while companies facing asbestos liability would cover the bulk of the fund's cost." Also as part of the settlement, "USG said it will fully repay debtholders and trade suppliers with interest. Shareholders will receive rights to acquire one additional share for $40 for each share held. In 4 p.m. composite trading on the New York Stock Exchange, USG shares rose $15.93 to $95.78, setting a 52-week high." The article said shareholders are "pleased," while consumer group Public Citizen called the federal legislation "a backdoor attempt to erase billions of dollars in corporate liability for asbestos exposure."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

DOJ To Decide On Freedom For Former Officer In Louima Case. The AP (1/31) reports, "The Justice Department should decide whether a former police officer serving a five-year prison term in the jailhouse torture case of a Haitian immigrant can qualify for early release, a federal judge said Monday." The AP continues, "Lawyers for Charles Schwarz, 39, had argued their client was owed early release under a sentencing deal struck with prosecutors in 2002. … The former officer was convicted of lying to authorities about the Abner Louima case but avoided conviction on charges of violating Louima's civil rights. After Louima's arrest in a 1997 nightclub brawl, prosecutors say, Schwarz held Louima down while Officer Justin Volpe sodomized him with a broken broomstick. Schwarz maintains he wasn't there." The AP adds, "Prosecutors had agreed in 2002 to seek a 13-month reduction in Schwarz's sentence if he and his attorneys did not discuss the case. In March, prosecutors contacted the Bureau of Prisons and recommended reducing Schwarz's sentence to 47 months. Prison officials refused, saying the law allowed them to grant early freedom only to terminally ill prisoners. … Defense attorneys had asked the judge to honor the arrangement by voiding her original sentence and re-sentencing Schwarz to 47 months."

DOJ Asked To Probe Richmond Police Shooting. The Richmond (VA) Times-Dispatch (1/31) reports, "Community leaders today called for an open investigation into the circumstances surrounding the shooting by Richmond police of a man outside his North Side home early Sunday." The Times-Dispatch continues, "King Salim Khalfani, executive director of the NAACP Virginia State Conference, called on Police Chief Rodney Monroe to include both community activists and other law enforcement agencies in the investigation into the shooting. … 'The Justice Department is here now investigating the past five years of this nonsense,' Khalfani said of past police shootings. 'This will just add another case for them to look into.'" The Times-Dispatch adds, "Billy Thigpen III, 28, was shot once in the torso outside his home in the 3100 block of Napoleon Street about 3 a.m. Sunday after leading police on a short car and foot chase. … Richmond police said the officer, Everett Woolums, has been placed on administrative leave, as is department policy in any police shooting, while the mater is under investigation. … In a written statement yesterday, the department said that after the car and foot chase 'a struggle ensued and a round was discharged from the officer's service weapon striking the suspect in the chest area.'"

Kansas Police Chief Asks FBI To Take Over Excessive Force Probe. WIBW-TV Topeka (1/30) reports on its Web site, "The police chief in Kansas City, Kansas, is asking the FBI to take over the investigation into a racial discrimination complaint against his officers. Chief Ron Miller says the departments own investigation has been stymied because witnesses have stopped cooperating. The complaint involves actions taken by about 20 officers and six deputies who broke up a party in November. Officers allegedly used force, chemical spray, and racial and sexual slurs in breaking up the party. … The FBI has opened a preliminary investigation and will send the results to the U.S. Department of Justice to determine whether further investigation is warranted." The Kansas City Star (1/28, Cronkleton, 286K) noted, "The family denied that outside sources had influenced them, said Vickey Everidge, one of those who filed the complaint. The family had been cooperating with police and the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, she said. … Jeff Lanza, an FBI spokesman, said the agency was aware of the alleged discrimination and had received a complaint from one of the victims. The agency, however, was waiting to determine whether to open an investigation until an outcome had been reached by Kansas City, Kan., police. … Lanza said he was not able to predict how long the preliminary investigation would take."

LAPD Chief Says Officer Who Fatally Shot 13-Year-Old Acted Within Rules. The Los Angeles Times (1/31, Winton) reports, "Los Angeles Police Chief William J. Bratton has concluded that the officer who shot 13-year-old Devin Brown last year acted appropriately — a decision that sets up a potential high-profile conflict with the city's civilian Police Commission, which plans to debate the matter today." The Times continues, "Bratton found that the shooting was a tragic but proper use of force by an officer who was protecting his life, according to department sources who spoke on condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to discuss the chief's decision before its release. … But the Los Angeles Police Commission will have the final word on whether the shooting by Officer Steve Garcia complied with department rules." The Times adds, "Commission President John Mack, who was sharply critical of the shooting before he took office, told The Times recently that the Brown shooting was the most important the panel has considered in years. For many longtime critics of the department, how the commission rules will be seen as a defining test of Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa's professed desire to have a tougher panel that is more independent of the chief than in the past. … Brown was shot and killed early Feb. 6 after leading officers on a brief car chase in South Los Angeles. … Garcia said he fired at Brown's car after the teenager accelerated in reverse toward the officer, making him fear for his life. A department probe backed Garcia's account, and prosecutors decided in December not to file charges against him."

US Fines Japan's Elpida For Chip Price-Fixing. The AP (1/31, Goodin) reports, "Japanese computer chip maker Elpida Memory Inc. agreed to pay an $84 million fine and plead guilty to taking part in an international conspiracy that led to higher prices for personal computers, the Justice Department said Monday." The AP continues, "Elpida is the fourth manufacturer of dynamic random access memory, or DRAM, to admit its role in fixing the price of chips used in personal computers and other electronic devices. … 'We are gratified to bring to justice another member of the DRAM cartel, which is one of the largest cartels ever discovered,' said Thomas Barnett, the Justice Department's acting antitrust chief." The AP adds, "The four-year federal investigation, carried out by Justice officials in San Francisco, has so far netted $730 million in fines."

Reuters (1/31) reports, "According to the two-count felony charge filed in the U.S. District Court in San Francisco, Elpida conspired from April 1, 1999 to June 15, 2002 with unnamed manufacturers to fix the prices of dynamic random access memory, or DRAM, sold to certain computer and server manufacturers. … The customers directly affected by the price-fixing conspiracy were Dell Inc., Compaq Computer Corp., Hewlett-Packard Co., Apple Computer Inc., International Business Machines Corp. and Gateway Inc., the Justice Department said on Monday. … Elpida also conspired with an unnamed DRAM manufacturer to rig a bid for a lot sold to Sun Microsystems Inc. in March 2002, the Justice Department said."

The Red Herring (1/30) reports, "The Japanese memory chip maker became the fourth large company to admit its guilt in the ongoing probe by the U.S. Department of Justice. … Thomas Barnett, acting assistant attorney general, said the charge reflects a U.S. commitment to 'prosecute and deter cartels' that harm American consumers." The Red Herring adds, "In mid-October, Samsung Electronics, the largest producer of the chips, admitted its role in the conspiracy and agreed to pay a $300-million fine, the second-largest criminal antitrust fine in U.S. history. … Hynix Semiconductor of South Korea also pleaded guilty and paid $185 million, while Infineon Technologies of Germany paid $160 million. Four Infineon executives also pleaded guilty and were sentenced to four to six months in prison and paid $250,000 each."

Bloomberg (1/31, Alpeyev) also reports this story.

Microsoft Renews Efforts To Rebut EU Antitrust Concerns. The Financial Times (1/31, Buck) reports, "Microsoft is renewing its efforts to persuade the European Union's top antitrust regulator the company is ready to share sensitive information about its flagship Windows operating system with rivals." The Times continues, "A senior Microsoft legal representative tried on Monday to allay fears the group would take legal action against rivals that used its source code on licence." The Times adds, "This licensing is supposed to ensure other developers can design server software to work smoothly with Windows, and it is part of the European Commission's March 2004 antitrust ruling against Microsoft. But last month, the regulator formally charged the group for failing to comply with the order, and threatened to impose daily fines on it unless Microsoft changed tack. … In response, Microsoft offered to license parts of the Windows source code – the basic programming instructions at the heart of all software – and on Monday it said it was ready to go even further. … However, the Commission – as well as several Microsoft rivals – treated last week's offer to disclose source code with scepticism."

Minnesota Schools Get Windfall From Microsoft Settlement. The AP (1/31, Bakst) reports, "Minnesota schools will share $55 million they can use to buy new computers and software, thanks to a court settlement with Microsoft Corp." The AP continues, "While schools have known since 2004 that they had some money coming their way, the final amount was up in the air until recently. Gov. Tim Pawlenty said Monday that the technology vouchers have just started going out. … 'With the fast-paced changes in the field of technology, it is often difficult for schools to keep pace,' he said. 'This money will allow them to update, and in many cases, expand their technology, which in turn will help students learn and achieve at higher levels.'" The AP adds, "The amount each school gets depends on the concentration of poverty in their school districts. Some will receive only a few thousand dollars, while others, like Minneapolis and St. Paul, are in line for more than $6 million each. Districts have until 2012 to use up the vouchers. … The money is left over from a settlement to a class-action lawsuit in which Minnesota customers and businesses claimed the company was violating antitrust laws by overcharging for its Windows operating system and its Excel and Word programs. The company had denied overcharging, saying the prices on its products had dropped. … At the elementary school where Pawlenty detailed the payout, Principal Patricia Steingruebl was ecstatic to learn her school would be getting $55,000.

Fairmont Acquisition Another Deal In Lodging Industry. The Wall Street Journal (1/31, Sanders) reports, "The proposed $3.3 billion acquisition of luxury-hotel operator Fairmont Hotels & Resorts Inc. is the latest in a string of multibillion-dollar deals that began last year in the red-hot lodging industry, furthering the consolidation of key players in the lucrative luxury category. Toronto-based Fairmont yesterday confirmed it has agreed to a proposed all-cash deal with Los Angeles investment firm Colony Capital LLC and Saudi Prince Alwaleed bin Talal's Kingdom Hotels International. Colony and Kingdom will pay $45 a share and assume roughly $500 million in debt. The company will then be taken private. Investor reaction was muted. Fairmont shares were up 45 cents to $44.27 in 4 p.m. New York Stock Exchange composite trading." The Journal says, "Upon completion of a deal, the buyers intend to combine the nearly 100-year-old Fairmont brand with Singapore-based Raffles, which Colony acquired in July."

Arcelor Chief Says Mittal Lacks "European Cultural Values." The Wall Street Journal (1/31, Fleming, Glader) reports, "In an effort to rally European political support against Mittal Steel Co.'s unsolicited $24 billion bid, Arcelor SA chief executive painted his rival as a ruthless corporate raider lacking 'European cultural values' that also has a poor safety record and no credible long-term industrial strategy. … Arcelor CEO Guy Dolle declined to discuss specifics of how the company plans to fight off Mittal. It is too early to tell if another bidder could come forward to join with Arcelor as a white knight. In an interview yesterday, Mr. Dolle said some kind of cross-share holding or other financial maneuvers could happen with a steel maker such as Nippon Steel Corp., China's Shanghai Baosteel Group or South Korea's Posco. 'We have several possible actions,' he said. He added that Arcelor has not started discussions with other steel makers."

AIG Wins Temporary Restraining Order. The Wall Street Journal (1/31, Davies) reports, "A state Supreme Court judge in New York issued a temporary restraining order preventing private insurance agencies run by American International Group Inc.'s former chief executive, Maurice R. 'Hank' Greenberg, from trying to lure business away from the insurance giant he once led. Judge Herman Cahn's temporary order is in place until Thursday, when another hearing is scheduled. AIG sued the private insurance agencies Friday, alleging 'misconduct' in efforts to siphon business away from AIG. The agencies are subsidiaries of C.V. Starr & Co., a closely held firm that had ties to AIG for years. Mr. Greenberg was forced out of AIG last March in the midst of an accounting probe."

Commission Evaluating Potential Changes To Antitrust Laws. Inman News (1/30, Roberts) reports, "While the largest national real estate trade group mounts its defense against an antitrust lawsuit brought by the U.S. Department of Justice, a commission created by Congress is evaluating whether federal antitrust laws require remodeling." Inman continues, "The Antitrust Modernization Commission, formed in April 2004, is tasked to study 'whether the need exists to modernize U.S. federal antitrust laws,' and to seek input and prepare a report to Congress and the president that includes findings, conclusions and 'recommendations for legislative or administrative action.'" Inman adds, "The real estate industry is no stranger to antitrust complaints, and some industry participants have watched the Antitrust Modernization Commission's progress. The commission's focus is not industry-specific, though some topics that the commission is considering have relevance to the real estate industry. … For example, the commission has hosted discussions on the topic of the 'state action doctrine' provision of federal law, which extends some immunity to states for federal antitrust law violations. Such discussions are potentially relevant to measures that numerous state legislatures and real estate regulators have passed requiring real estate professionals to provide a minimum level of service to consumers while effectively banning some forms of real estate business models that do not provide these services. … These so-called minimum-service measures, backed by Realtor trade groups, have in several cases led the U.S. Justice Department and Federal Trade Commission to send out advocacy letters urging state officials not to pass the measures as they potentially could limit consumer choice and harm competition in the real estate industry. … Federal officials have opposed Realtor-backed minimum-service measures in Alabama, Missouri, Oklahoma and Texas, charging that the legislation was anticompetitive and anti-consumer, though legislators and governors in all four states passed the measures last year despite these objections, and other states are considering similar measures."

Schlumberger To Pay $11.8 Million For PCB Damage In South Carolina. Dow Jones (1/30) reports, "A unit of Schlumberger Ltd. will pay $11.8 million to federal and state agencies to compensate for the contamination of a creek, a lake and surrounding areas in South Carolina, the Justice Department said on Monday." Dow Jones continues, "The money will be used to clean up water in the vicinity of Lake Hartwell so that people have a better chance of catching uncontaminated fish and for other purposes, the government said. Schlumberger Technology Corp., based in Texas, will also pay another $8 million to $10 million to buy and remove two hydroelectric dams on Twelvemile Creek and to conduct stream restoration activities, the government said. … 'Schlumberger's payment to fund restoration by the federal and state trustees will be used for projects designed to compensate the public for the injury to the fishery and to the habitat from PCB contamination,' said Sue Ellen Wooldridge, an assistant attorney general at the Justice Department, in a statement. 'The company's agreement to purchase and remove the dams will directly improve the Twelvemile Creek ecosystem and provide significant environmental benefits for the affected communities.'"

The AP (1/31) reports, "The plant was identified as a federal Superfund site after it released PCBs into the creek - a tributary of the Twelve Mile River and Lake Hartwell - from 1955 until 1977 while owned by Sangamo-Weston. The current owner is Schlumberger Technology Corp., which assumed the liabilities of Sangamo-Weston. … The company will spend an additional $8 million to $10 million to purchase and remove two hydroelectric dams on the creek and conduct steam restoration activities, the release said."

Federal Regulators Consider Previously-Rejected Mine Safety Rules. The Washington Post (1/31, A3, Warrick, 744K) reports, "After one of the deadliest months for coal mining in years, federal mine regulators last week began formally considering safety improvements to help miners survive underground fires and explosions. Among the proposals: mandatory caches of oxygen tanks and breathing masks inside every coal mine. The idea may have struck some miners as familiar, because it was. A similar proposal was put forward by the same regulators six years ago, only to be scrapped by the Bush administration shortly after it took office. And the oxygen caches were not the only proposed safety improvement to be withdrawn." According to the Post, the Bush administration "abandoned or delayed implementation of 18 proposed safety rules that were in the federal Mine Safety and Health Administration's regulatory pipeline in early 2001, a review of agency records shows. At least two of the dropped proposals have now been resurrected in the aftermath of deadly accidents at the Sago and Alma mines in West Virginia."

Boehlert Blasts NASA Over Alleged Attempt To Silence Global Warming Scientist. The New York Times (1/31, Revkin, 1.19M) reports Rep. Sherwood Boehlert, chairman of the House Science Committee, "sharply criticized NASA yesterday after the agency's top climate scientist and several public affairs officers complained of political pressure intended to prevent public discussions of global warming." In a letter to NASA's administrator Michael D. Griffin, Boehlert wrote, "Good science cannot long persist in an atmosphere of intimidation." The Times notes that it "first reported the complaints on Saturday. The climate scientist, James E. Hansen, director of NASA's Goddard Institute for Space Studies in Manhattan, and several other National Aeronautics and Space Administration employees said Bush administration appointees at headquarters had demanded to review his lectures and publications in advance. Moreover, senior agency officials were to have had the right to stand in for him in interviews with reporters. 'NASA is clearly doing something wrong, given the sense of intimidation felt by Dr. Hansen and others who work with him,' Mr. Boehlert said in his letter."

EPA Agrees To Exempt Farms From Clean Air Laws. The New York Times/AP (1/31) reports the Bush administration "will exempt thousands of farms that raise poultry, cattle and hogs from heavy fines for fouling the air and water with animal excrement in exchange for data to help curb future pollution. The Environmental Protection Agency has signed agreements with 2,681 animal feeding operations in the egg, chicken, turkey, dairy and hog industries. They would be exempt from having to pay potential fines of up to $27,500 a day for violations either in the past or over the next four years." The EPA's Environmental Appeals Board "determined that the agreements were consistent with the Clean Air Act. Agency officials said the approvals set the stage for the remaining agreements to gain approval quickly. Jon Scholl, agriculture adviser to Stephen L. Johnson, the E.P.A. administrator, said the agreements were the most efficient way of obtaining the data needed to determine whether the animal-feeding operations were complying with federal air emission laws."

EPA Advisers Find Teflon Chemical "Likely" Carcinogen. The Wall Street Journal (1/31, Muñoz, 2.11M) reports, "The Environmental Protection Agency is pressuring eight companies to reduce the presence of a group of chemicals that are used in the manufacture of such things as nonstick cookware, microwave popcorn bags, fast-food containers, carpeting, nail polish and stain-resistant clothing. Yesterday, an EPA advisory group issued a statement, saying the majority of its members agree that the main chemical under review -- perfluorooctanoic acid, or PFOA -- is a 'likely' cancer-causing agent. However the group, made up of outside experts, failed to agree unanimously on this likelihood and recommended further study. The findings come after a lengthy review of EPA data on the chemical, including studies linking it to cancer in rats, and indicating that PFOA is found in many people's blood."

Dockworkers Call For Reductions In Toxic Emissions At Ports. The New York Times (1/31, Archibold, 1.19M) reports, "The effort to reduce smog stemming from seaports, among the biggest polluters in the nation, gained an ally on Monday when the union representing thousands of West Coast dockworkers promised to help significantly reduce toxic emissions. The union, the International Longshore and Warehouse Union, representing 60,000 dockworkers from San Diego to Seattle, called for a one-fifth reduction in emissions by 2010 and said it would push carriers to adopt less-polluting technology on their ships."

9th Circuit Searches For Punitive Remedy In Exxon Case. The California Recorder (1/31, Scheck) reports, "The dozens of Alaska fishermen sardined into a 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals courtroom Friday seemed to only reluctantly accept Judge Andrew Kleinfeld's statement that the court views 'torturing and killing large numbers of people' as 'more reprehensible than putting a drunk in charge of a supertanker.' … Brian O'Neill, the lawyer for more than 30,000 people economically affected by the 1989 Exxon Valdez oil spill, didn't want to minimize the gas company's mistake. … 'Putting a drunk in front of a supertanker is still reprehensible,' he said." The Recorder continues, "Figuring out a way to translate that reprehensibility into dollars under ever-changing Supreme Court guidance is once again the problem for the 9th Circuit. … So, for the third time since an Alaska jury hit Exxon with $5 billion in punitive damages in 1994, the 9th Circuit panel is facing the question of whether that award is appropriate." The Recorder adds, "The judges have been uncomfortable with the $5 billion award in the past, but they didn't reveal much Friday; Kleinfeld was skeptical that a large punitive award was appropriate in light of Exxon's pretrial cleanup efforts, while Chief Judge Mary Schroeder seemed somewhat more inclined toward the plaintiffs. Senior Judge James Browning was silent through the arguments. … The class action brought by those who suffered economic damage from the spill has bounced repeatedly between the 9th Circuit and the Alaska courtroom of Judge H. Russel Holland, a result of Holland's reluctance to significantly lower the award. It's also due to the changing Supreme Court guidelines over how to award punitive damages. … Most recently, the Supreme Court said in 2003 that punitive damages should not exceed compensatory damages by more than a 9:1 ratio, and that compensatory damages may stand in for punitives as a deterrent in many cases."

Measure Would Close Loophole Allowing Tribes To Make Large Donations. USA Today (1/31, Drinkard, 2.31M) reports that House Republicans plan to propose closing a loophole that has allowed Indian tribes with casinos to give substantial donations lawmakers' campaigns. The change "is part of a bill being drafted by Rules Committee Chairman David Dreier, R-Calif., to restrict lobbyist influence in the wake of the Jack Abramoff lobbying scandal." USA adds, "The growth in tribal political giving has been helped by the status tribes enjoy under federal campaign-finance law. Tribes are 'persons' under the law, a category that also includes partnerships, corporations and associations. But tribes can give unlimited total amounts because they are not 'individuals,' whose legal definition excludes organized groups. … Dreier's proposal, developed at the behest of Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., would apply the individual limit on total giving to tribes."

In a separate story, USA Today (1/31, Drinkard, 2.31M) reports,, "Indian tribes defending their right to give unlimited political campaign contributions say they are treated differently for legitimate reasons dating back to George Washington. … Tribes' special status is based in part on the limited sovereignty they hold through treaties negotiated with the federal government as long ago as the 1700s. Like states or localities, they have a government-to-government relationship with Washington. But unlike local governments, they make political giving a lobbying tactic."

McCain Accelerates Timetable For Review Of Indian Gaming Act. Sen. John McCain has accelerated his timetable to review change to the 1988 Indian Gaming Regulatory Act and the way the FEC counts tribal donations. Roll Call (1/31, Bresnahan) reports, "McCain introduced new legislation in November (S. 2078) that would broaden the authority of the National Indian Gaming Commission to regulate Class III casinos, which offer activities such as slot machines, blackjack, craps and roulette. The agency's internal review procedures would also be overhauled. McCain wants to change how land is taken into trusts for the tribes, with an eye toward limiting the explosive growth in Indian casinos. … The Arizona Republican reportedly also wants to look at the way Indian tribes donate to federal lawmakers, according to lobbyists retained by tribal interests." McCain "has scheduled hearings for this week and next, and another hearing on Feb. 28, on these issues."

Man Arrested In US-Mexico Border Tunnel Investigation. The AP (1/31) reports, "A Mexican citizen was arrested on drug charges in the investigation into the longest tunnel ever found underneath the U.S.-Mexico border. The suspect was taken into custody Saturday by U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement agents. He appeared in federal court Monday on charges of conspiracy to import more than a ton of marijuana, which carries a mandatory minimum of 10 years in prison. The 2,400-foot tunnel runs from a warehouse near the airport in Tijuana to a warehouse in San Diego. It was unclear how long it had been in operation, but more than two tons of marijuana were found inside. … The man under arrest, Carlos Cardenas Calvillo, worked at the U.S. warehouse, which had been leased for the stated purpose of distributing produce, authorities said. … The Drug Enforcement Administration has said it suspects Tijuana's ruthless Arellano-Felix drug syndicate or another well-known cartel was involved."

In a separate story the AP (1/31) reports, "Investigators said Cardenas Calvillo is connected to the San Diego side of the operation. Real estate documents show a company incorporated last year paid $2 million to lease the warehouse, supposedly for produce." More than 100 news outlets published in newspapers and/or posted on their Web sites the AP story, including ABC News, CNN, MSNBC, the New York Times, New York Post, Washington Post, Houston Chronicle, California's San Jose Mercury News, San Luis Obispo Tribune, and Contra Costa Times, along with the Fort Worth Texas Star Telegram, Myrtle Beach Sun News, Kansas City Star, and the UK's Guardian.

Reuters (1/31) writes, "Cardenas did not enter a plea during his appearance in San Diego federal court and was held without bail pending a midweek hearing. No other arrests have yet been announced."

The San Diego Union-Tribune (1/30, Soto) reports Cardenas Calvillo "pleaded not guilty Monday afternoon to conspiracy to smuggle drugs in connection with an elaborate cross-border tunnel that stretched half a mile from Tijuana to Otay Mesa. … Prosecutors asked Judge Leo S. Papas to order that Cardenas be held without bail. The judge said he will consider the request at a hearing Wednesday. Prosecutors told the judge the 44-year-old Cardenas is a risk to flee the country."

The Washington Times (1/31, Seper) writes, "Investigators said the charges stem from Mr. Cardenas-Calvillo's ties to the Otay Mesa warehouse that concealed the U.S. access point for the highly sophisticated, 2,400-foot-long passageway. The tunnel was described by authorities as the largest and most advanced illegal cross-border underpass ever found. The ongoing investigation is being carried out by the San Diego Tunnel Task Force made up of ICE, Drug Enforcement Administration and U.S. Border Patrol agents. … The arrest came less than 24 hours after ICE issued an alert, tersely warning that information indicated those who had been in the tunnel, or were responsible for its design or construction, could be in imminent danger. ICE urged those persons to come forward and contact the agency at any port of entry along the Mexican border."

The Los Angeles Times (1/30, Marosi) reported that on Saturday, authorities "arrested a Mexican man in connection with" the tunnel's operation. Authorities "said the man is allegedly tied to the Otay Mesa warehouse that concealed the tunnel's access on the US side."

Voice of America (1/30) reports on its Web site, "The U.S. Drug Enforcement Agency says the tunnel was a major gateway for illegal immigrants and drugs coming from Mexico into the U.S."

Tunnel Had A Secret Door. The San Diego Union-Tribune (1/30, Manolatos) reports the tunnel had a secret door that could be opened only from below. "It's this passageway that federal authorities said was the exit point for drug smugglers who built a massive underground tunnel to bring tons of marijuana into the United States from Tijuana. … Investigators called out-of-state miners to help them determine how the tunnel was built and how long it took. The miners are expected to arrive later this week. Authorities started receiving tips about the tunnel two years ago. When they discovered it last week, they found 2 tons of marijuana on the Mexican side and 200 pounds on the U.S. end. Once the marijuana was in the United States, it probably was loaded onto vehicles disguised as produce trucks," investigators said.

Human Intelligence Most Effective For Finding Tunnels. The AP (1/31) reports, "A U.S. government effort to find drug-smuggling tunnels underneath the Mexican border with ground-penetrating radar and other high-tech gear has had little success. Human intelligence has proven to be the most effective method of finding the passageways. A case in point: The longest tunnel ever found along the border was discovered last week after a tip. … 'The problem is the technology picks up some kind of anomaly or variation of soil,' said Lauren Mack, a spokeswoman for U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement. 'We go in with big backhoes and bulldozers, we spend all day doing it, and all we hit is rock or water tables.' That was what happened earlier this month when high-tech gear alerted authorities to a possible tunnel near…a hamlet about 60 miles east of San Diego along the Mexican border. A full day of digging turned up nothing."

US, Mexican Media Given Tour Of Tunnel. Los Angeles Times (1/31, Marosi) reports, "Federal officials gave US and Mexican media a rare look at a smuggling tunnel Monday as they announced the arrest of a man with alleged ties to a Mexican drug cartel that authorities suspect built the 2,400-foot-long passage." Frank Marwood, acting deputy special agent in charge for Immigration and Customs Enforcement, said, "The amount of time, money and technology it would take to make a tunnel like this is overwhelming. It's a complete engineering feat. … The half-hour tour covered an estimated 250 feet, about one-tenth of the tunnel's length."

Network TV Coverage. ABC's World News Tonight (1/30, story 8, 2:00, Vargas) reported, "In San Diego, today, US Officials charged a Mexican man with drug smuggling through the longest tunnel ever found along the U.S. -

Mexican border. It is a remarkable facility." ABC added, "The tunnel surfaces in a nondescript office about a half-mile into the U.S. A secret door, a trap door, allowed an all-access pass to and from Mexico. The piping you see was used to ventilate the tunnel. Electric lighting, powered from the Mexico side, runs the entire length. And a system that used to keep water out has stopped working. So the tunnel has flooded. The walls have been chiseled by hand, for eight football fields in length. Officials say the tunnel was in operation since last November and they believe it took a drug cartel about two years to dig it, by hand, through hardened clay and sandstone. Two tons of marijuana were found in the tunnel. And one man has been arrested. Court documents reveal he was a worker in the warehouse run by a company called v & f distributors, which is under investigation." Homeland Security Agent: "Whenever we find a tunnel for department of homeland security, that's a vulnerability in terms of narcotics, in terms of people, in terms of weapons, that could be brought into the country. Once the investigation is complete, officials say, the enormous tunnel will be filled with concrete."

Cable TV Coverage. CNN Live From (1/30, 3:00 p.m.) reported, "An arrest in the case of the largest and most sophisticated tunnel ever found across the U.S.-Mexican border. A Mexican man was arraigned on charges of conspiracy to import substances. The tunnel runs from San Diego to Tijuana. Two tons of marijuana was found inside."

CNN's Anderson Cooper 360 (1/30, 10:00 p.m.) reported, "We are on the U.S.-Mexican border. Actually in sort of a no man's land. This is a U.S. Territory between two fences. … We're actually in the Otay Messa district of San Diego. We're north of Tijuana. Just a few feet beneath was a tunnel. It runs 2400 feet. It's the length of eight football fields. It goes from a warehouse in Otay Messa, crossing the border inside another warehouse in Tijuana. It is the longest tunnel U.S. authorities here, Immigration and Customs Enforcement agents have ever found underneath this border. They found more than two tons of marijuana in this tunnel. Who knows how many drugs were gone through. Since the attacks on 9/11 agents have uncovered 20 other tunnels. Twenty that we know of. But nothing, they say, nothing like this one. Take a look. ICE agents also [say] this is one of the most sophisticated tunnels underneath the Mexican border. It took years to build. You can see the pick marks used. It would take a long time to do. It's also got electricity. They wired the entire tunnel with these cables that have light bulbs on them. There's even a pipe that brings in fresh oxygen pumped in from Mexico."

Virginia Psychiatrist Pleads Guilty To Illegal Hydrocodone Distribution. The Norfolk Virginian-Pilot (1/31) reports, "A former Virginia Beach psychiatrist pleaded guilty in federal court Monday to charges of health care fraud and illegally dispensing narcotics. Dr. Jeremy A. Stowell, who surrendered his medical license in the middle of the federal investigation last year, admitted illegally prescribing hydrocodone and improperly billing insurance programs. The Drug Enforcement Administration has been investigating Stowell after reports by the state Board of Medicine that he had been prescribing narcotics to patients with drug addictions and some who admitted sharing their drugs with friends. During the DEA investigation, an undercover officer obtained narcotics from Stowell with only a cursory examination and an informant obtained drugs despite admitting having abused cocaine and other drugs, according to court papers filed by the government Monday."

Afghanistan Opium Production Called A Serious International Threat. UPI (1/30) reports, "Afghan Foreign Minister Abdullah Abdullah urged the international community Monday to endorse the Afghanistan Compact, a five-year blueprint for efforts to stabilize and reconstruct the country. … Habibullah Qaderi, the Afghan minister for counter-narcotics, said the country's opium production represented a 'serious threat' to the international community. Some 70 to 80 percent of the heroin on Britain's streets originated in Afghanistan, he noted. … A criminal justice task force was being trained and a special tribunal being set up to prosecute those in possession of over two kilos of opium, he said. Questioned about reports of high-level government complicity in the drugs trade, Qaderi said that where there was evidence against officials, they would also be prosecuted. Pressed on the issue by United Press International at a later briefing, Afghan Justice Minister Sarwar Danish acknowledged there were cases of complicity by some government officials. Counter-narcotics initiatives would be discussed at the conference, from which would hopefully emerge a clearer plan to tackle the problem, he said."

IMMIGRATION:

Concern About Overcrowded Housing Emerges As Part Of Immigration Debate. USA Today (1/31, Jones, 2.31M) reports, "Overcrowded housing is emerging as a battleground in the national debate over immigration as towns and counties crack down on landlords who permit many unrelated people to occupy single-family homes. Local officials in New York, Virginia, Massachusetts and Georgia have evicted residents, threatened landlords with fines or jail time or legally narrowed the definition of family to combat a problem they say disrupts neighborhoods. … Some activists say measures limiting the number of unrelated people or extended family members in a home target immigrants, particularly Hispanics, who often need to share a home to afford the rent."

Intel Chairman Says US Should Increase Visas For Highly Educated Foreigners. Intel Chairman Craig Barrett writes in the Financial Times (1/30), "America is experiencing a profound immigration crisis but it is not about the 11m illegal immigrants currently exciting the press and politicians in Washington. The real crisis is that the US is closing its doors to immigrants with degrees in science, maths and engineering – the 'best and brightest' from around the world who flock to the country for its educational and employment opportunities. These foreign-born knowledge workers are critically important to maintaining America's technological competitiveness." Barrett adds, "At a minimum the US should vastly increase the number of permanent visas for highly educated foreigners, streamline the process for those already working here and allow foreign students in the hard sciences and engineering to move directly to permanent resident status."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Alito Confirmation All But Certain After Filibuster Attempt Fails. The CBS Evening News (1/30, story 7, :45, Schieffer) reported, "The way is clear for Samuel Alito to become the next Associate Justice of the Supreme Court. After a last- minute filibuster attempt by Democratic opponents, the Senate voted 72-25 today to cut off any further debate. Alito is expected to be confirmed tomorrow morning, giving President Bush a victory just hours before he delivers his State of the Union address." NBC Nightly News (1/30, story 4, 3:00, Williams) reported that "liberal Democrats led by Massachusetts Sens. John Kerry and Ted Kennedy went ahead today with a filibuster attempt, trying to block or at least slow down the nomination, but their effort didn't come close."

CNN's The Situation Room (1/30, Henry) reported that Republicans needed 60 votes to break the Democratic filibuster of Supreme Court nominee Samuel Alito's confirmation. They "got a lot more. They got 72 in the end. The final tally, 72-25. That means only 23 lawmakers, 23 Democrats, joined John Kerry and Ted Kennedy in supporting the filibuster, supporting continued debate."

CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (1/30, Dobbs) called the vote "a major defeat for Democrats" and "a political victory for President Bush." CNN added, "The Senate's decision is a severe blow to Democrats, such as Senators John Kerry, Ted Kennedy, and Hillary Clinton. A final confirmation vote for Judge Alito is expected tomorrow, just hours before President Bush delivers his State of the Union address."

The Los Angeles Times (1/31, Reynolds, 958K) adds that "several Democrats who supported the filibuster, notably Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) and Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.), did so with a noticeable lack of enthusiasm." Favoring the filibuster were "several Democrats believed to be considering a presidential run in 2008: Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, Evan Bayh of Indiana and Kerry, the party's 2004 nominee." The Times adds, "Despite the split over the filibuster, Democrats are largely united in their opposition to Alito's confirmation. Only four Democrats -- Byrd, Nelson of Nebraska, Tim Johnson of South Dakota and Kent Conrad of North Dakota -- have announced their support for him." The Grand Forks Herald (1/31, Jalonick, 32K) reports Sen. Kent Conrad said Monday "he will vote to confirm Judge Samuel Alito to the Supreme Court. 'He has given me his word on important matters,' Conrad said."

The Washington Times (1/31, Hurt, 90K) reports, "Among those voting to filibuster the nomination were Democrat Sens. Frank R. Lautenberg and Robert Menendez, who represent Judge Alito's home state of New Jersey." USA Today (1/31, Kiely, 2.31M) reports Alito's "home-state senators" also "said they would vote against him. They fear that Alito, a judge on the Philadelphia-based 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, will make the court more conservative. 'Home-state pride is not a sufficient reason for supporting a nominee,' Menendez said."

The Washington Post (1/31, A1, Babington, 744K) headlines its story "Senate To Vote On Alito Today," while the AP (1/31, Holland says the Senate "all but guaranteed Samuel Alito's confirmation." The New York Times (1/31, Stout, 1.19M) adds that "since only a simple majority is required for confirmation, Samuel Alito could be a member of the Supreme Court by Tuesday afternoon. … Three Democrats have come out in support of the nominee: Robert C. Byrd of West Virginia, Tim Johnson of South Dakota and Ben Nelson of Nebraska. Other Democrats are believed to be considering a vote in favor of the nominee." Reuters (1/31, Ferraro), Chicago Tribune (1/31, Zeleny, 643K) and Bloomberg (1/31, Rowley), among other sources, run similar stories this morning.

The Hill (1/31, Allen) says, "Bush and his Republican allies are on the verge of fulfilling campaign promises to stock the court with conservatives."

Chafee's Decision To Oppose Alito Could Hurt Him In Primary. The Washington Times (1/31, Fagan, Hurt, 90K) reports, "Republican Sen. Lincoln Chafee's decision to oppose Judge Samuel A. Alito Jr.'s nomination to the Supreme Court will hurt him in his primary campaign, party members say, and could kill the GOP's chance of holding a seat in liberal Rhode Island." Chafee "is the only Republican senator to come out publicly against the Alito nomination, a decision likely to fuel further criticism from both his political flanks. For example, Cranston Mayor Steve Laffey, a likely conservative Republican primary opponent, called Mr. Chafee's actions ineffectual and a disservice to the state. … Meanwhile, the anti-tax Club for Growth is running commercials blasting Mr. Chafee for not taking a harder line against big government and high taxes." Chafee "is being criticized just as much from the left. Rhode Island Secretary of State Matt Brown, one of the Democrats running against Mr. Chafee, said the senator made a wishy-washy decision on Judge Alito."

In an editorial titled "Party Of Lincoln?," the Wall Street Journal (1/31, 2.11M) says, "Chafee tried to split the difference. He announced yesterday that he would oppose Judge Alito's confirmation." But "he also voted against John Kerry's futile attempt to block a vote via filibuster -- which he was obliged to do as part of the 'gang of 14' whose compromise last May preserved the possibility of the filibuster but tried to downplay its use." The Journal adds, "Opposing the filibuster attempt may not prove sufficient to win over Republican primary voters."

White House, Democratic Strategic Assumptions Before Hearings Explored. The New York Times (1/31, Kirkpatrick, 1.19M) reports, "The week before his Supreme Court confirmation hearings," Alito "e-mailed the text of his opening statement to the White House. It included very little about his legal thinking, dwelled at length on his family and opened with a tired and rambling joke about courtroom banter between a lawyer and a judge. The response from the White House: 'Perfect, don't change a word,' according to an administration official who was granted anonymity because Judge Alito's preparation sessions were confidential." The Times adds, "As the last obstacles to confirmation faded away Monday, Democratic aides said their party had initially expected Judge Alito to live up to his reputation as 'Scalito,' suggesting a conservative firebrand in the mold of Justice Antonin Scalia. Failing to adjust to his meekness, Democratic aides admit they searched too hard for scandal in Judge Alito's past." The White House, meanwhile, "sought to take advantage of Judge Alito's low-key, almost shy demeanor to build sympathy for him. They say they succeeded beyond all expectations when Judge Alito's wife, Martha-Ann, walked out in tears from his confirmation hearings."

Fox News' Special Report (1/30, Wilson) reported that Democrats "simply could not find a formula to derail the Supreme Court nomination of Judge Samuel Alito. Any hope that they might drag out the debate with a filibuster evaporated shortly after a meeting of the so-called Gang of 14 moderate senators." Republicans "by and large spent the day complaining about what they felt was a nasty debate aimed at a well-qualified nominee."

Ford At Odds With Black Leaders Over Filibuster. The Hill (1/31, Savodnik) reports, "Rep. Harold Ford's opposition to filibustering Judge Samuel Alito's Supreme Court nomination is exacerbating tensions between the Tennessee Democrat and black political leaders, underscoring the fine line that the Senate hopeful must walk." Ford, running for the seat being vacated by Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, "said Friday that Alito should get an up-or-down vote, which would more or less assure the nominee's approval." Ford's comments "came the same day that the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) announced its support for the filibuster spearheaded by Sens. Edward Kennedy and John Kerry, both Massachusetts Democrats." The comments also "follow attempts by the Congressional Black Caucus (CBC) to derail the nomination of Alito."

Alito's Confirmation May Usher In "Kennedy Court." The Washington Post (1/31, A4, Lane, 744K) says Alito's confirmation "will mark the beginning of a new Supreme Court era -- and, perhaps more important, the end of an old, familiar one. For much of the past 24 years, Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, whom Alito would replace, has wielded the swing vote on a split court, usually casting her lot with the court's four other conservative justices, but siding with liberals on such crucial issues as abortion, affirmative action and campaign finance reform." Alito's arrival, however, "may turn the O'Connor Court into the Kennedy Court. If, as many expect, Alito forms a four-vote conservative bloc with Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas, that would leave Justice Anthony M. Kennedy -- a conservative who has occasionally voted with liberals on gay rights, the death penalty and abortion -- as the court's least predictable member."

Alito, Roberts Confirmations Seen As Culmination Of Reagan Revolution. The Los Angeles Times (1/31, Savage, 958K) reports, "Twenty-five years ago, President Reagan came to Washington with bold plans to move the Supreme Court to the right. He and his lawyers wanted a high court that would uphold state laws that impose the death penalty, restrict abortion and allow a greater role for religion in public life. They favored property rights over environmental regulation, states' rights over broad federal authority and executive power over Congress and the federal courts." The Times adds, "Now, with the Senate about to confirm Judge Samuel A. Alito Jr., a second generation of Reagan disciples stands ready to fulfill the former president's vision for the court." Alito, like Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr., "was drawn to the conservative ethos of the Reagan administration in the 1980s. Both men worked in Reagan's Justice Department and as advocates for the administration before the Supreme Court."

Pickering Preparing Second Book On Judicial Confirmation Process. Roll Call (1/31, Hocking) reports Judge Charles Pickering "set out to write a book about the problems with the current judicial confirmation process and his own experience. … Pickering and his publisher rushed

'Supreme Chaos: The Politics of Judicial Confirmation and the Culture War,' released this month, to the printer — thus providing him with a platform to discuss Alito's confirmation process." According to Roll Call, "The juicy bits will come later, in a second book due out 'either this fall or the first part of next year'…Pickering says."

Bush Nominates Five To Federal Bench. The New Jersey Law Journal (1/31, Booth) reports, "President Bush last Wednesday acted to fill four vacancies on the U.S. District Court and one on the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals." The Journal continues, "Assistant U.S. Attorney Renee Bumb was named for a seat in Camden, N.J., while U.S. Magistrate Judge Susan Wigenton, U.S. Department of Justice official Noel Hillman and Peter Sheridan, the former executive director of the Republican State Committee, were nominated for three district court seats in Newark, N.J. … For the 3rd Circuit, Bush nominated former federal prosecutor Michael Chagares, now with Hackensack, N.J.'s Cole, Schotz, Meisel, Forman & Leonard." The Journal adds, "The nominees must be considered by the Senate Judiciary Committee, which has not yet scheduled hearings, and voted on by the full Senate."

Bush To Deliver State Of The Union Amid Lagging Poll Numbers. President Bush will deliver his State of the Union speech tonight. The AP (1/30, Loven) reports that the "unspoken agenda underpinning the address" is the "rescue of his presidency from arguably its worst year. His poll numbers fell to the lowest point of his presidency under the weight of missteps following Hurricane Katrina, soaring energy costs, the withdrawal of a Supreme Court nominee, the failure of his high-profile effort to drive a Social Security overhaul, and increasing scrutiny from the public and Congress of the unpopular Iraq war. While Bush's approval rating has recovered slightly, it remains in the still-anemic low 40s. It is a matter of concern for Republicans as they worry about maintaining control of Congress in this fall's midterm elections."

CNN's The Situation Room (1/30, Bash) reported that Bush is "going to go before Congress and the American people at a time where more than six in 10 Americans do not think the country is heading in the right direction and actually think it has gotten worse since Mr. Bush has been in office. And that is a very, very dire thing for this president in terms of shaping his legacy and more immediately, for his party in this year's election." Bush is "going to try to be optimistic. The President himself said there in the Cabinet Room, he's going to try to be upbeat. But he does have one major new theme that Bush aides are telling us about, that is to talk about the idea of being competitive, still being a leader in the world economically and in terms of foreign policy."

Roll Call (1/31, Pierce) reports, "Rather than unveiling sweeping policy changes to Social Security or announcing future trips to Mars, it appears President Bush will largely be offering some old reruns a better time slot in tonight's State of the Union address. It's an agenda that should receive a lot of enthusiastic applause from the right side of the House chamber, considering most of the Congressional Republican agenda mirrors the items on Bush's 2006 to-do list." The Dallas Morning News (1/31) reports Bush "will try to turn the page and refocus the nation's attention on a handful of more narrowly drawn domestic issues that his strategists hope will be winning planks for his fellow Republicans in this fall's mid-term elections." Knight Ridder (1/31, Lambrecht) reports Republicans say they "hope that both in substance and tone, the president's State of the Union address can begin to shift the focus away from war, scandal and suspicion that failure has replaced the once-rosy promise of GOP control of Washington. Many in his party hope the president steers clear of the partisanship that has come to define Washington."

The Philadelphia Inquirer (1/31, Hutcheson, 423K) reports Bush "has been pushing big, bold ideas since he took office, but don't expect more of the same when he goes before Congress tonight for this year's State of the Union address. With plenty on his plate already, Bush is not looking to add much more. Instead of promoting new ideas for sweeping change, the President is expected to focus on relatively small, achievable goals. He will also spend a good bit of time trying to shore up support for work in progress, especially the Iraq war."

Knight Ridder (1/31, Thomma) reports Bush "faces one of the most daunting political challenges of his career Tuesday night when he kicks off a pivotal midterm-election year" with his speech. Bush "must frame the year's coming debate in a way that will lead Americans to stay the course with his Republican Party running the government, at a time when polls show that voters are in a sour mood and restless for change." Knight Ridder writes that Bush is "weaker than any sixth-year president since Richard Nixon in 1974, when the Watergate scandal forced him to resign, led to big Republican losses in Congress and set the stage for the party's loss of the White House two years later. Bush's standing rivals that of Democrat Harry Truman in 1950, when Democrats lost seats in Congress and went on to lose the presidency two years later."

USA Today (1/31, Benedetto, 2.31M) writes, "In a city renowned for its many speeches -- long and short, lofty and mundane, partisan and profound -- the State of the Union is The Big One. It is a chance for the president to try to rally citizens in times of internal strife or external peril, and to reassure them when times are good. It is also the president's best chance to lay out his agenda and shape the political debate for the next 12 months. It is an opportunity, as it will be for President Bush when he speaks at 9:01 ET tonight, for presidents to regain public confidence that has been lost or seems to be slipping. Bush's job approval in a USA TODAY/CNN/Gallup Poll on Jan. 20-22 is 43% and has not been above 50% for the past 10 months."

Reporting on a new NBC News/Wall Street Journal (1/31, Harwood) poll, the Journal writes, "A politically weakened President Bush addresses the nation tonight facing two clear demands from the American public: solve problems in the health-care system and bring U.S. troops home from Iraq." NBC Nightly News (1/30, story 4, 3:00, Williams) said, "We should start at the very beginning and that all-important approval number." NBC's Tim Russert: "The President hopes he had made some progress, but that's not the case. We only had 39% approval, and 54% disapproval. … These are the top priorities for the American people. First, Iraq, not surprising -- bringing the troops home, 35%. Health care, 20%. Stimulate the economy, 17%. The prescription drug program, 11%. Fix it. Cut the deficit, 8%. Cut taxes, 7%. And Iraq -- now two out of three Americans say it is their view that the troops should come home. … Only one in four Americans, 25%, say the President should set the policy. Congress, 49% of Americans say it should be them, and both equally, 16%. … Here's lobbying. Which party is more influenced by special interests? 22% of Americans say the Democrats, 36% say no, it's the Republicans. And 33%, one-third of Americans, say both parties equally. We talk about eavesdropping, it's very important. This is the President's position in effect: Should there be wiretaps without court order? 51% approve, 46% disapprove. That's the President's position in favor, but what about concerns? 56% say they have concerns about wiretaps without warrants, and 43% say they're not concerned." On MSNBC's Hardball (1/30), Russert said the President's approval numbers are "frozen in place."

The Christian Science Monitor (1/31, Feldmann, 61K) writes, "The question for President Bush is, will 'wooable' Americans be watching? And what can he say that will grab them and force a second look? In recent weeks, the White House has telegraphed the major elements of this year's speech: an initiative to make healthcare more affordable, ideas to reduce US dependence on foreign energy, a call to extend tax cuts. The defining issues of Mr. Bush's presidency -- the Iraq war and larger war on terror -- will also occupy center stage. But according to the Pew Research Center, the public has modest expectations for this year's address: Only 30 percent of Americans say it will be more important than past State of the Union messages, down from recent years."

Optimism, Ongoing War On Terror Among Likely Themes. USA Today (1/31, Raasch, 2.31M) outlines "broad themes" likely to appear in the address: "We are in the midst of a long, hard war against fundamentalist terrorism, but this president doesn't give up and neither should Americans"; Bush "will portray himself as 'optimist in chief' and, by implication, his political foes as pessimists and defeatists"; "Mistakes have been made, but they were not purposeful and Bush was not alone in making them"; "This is war and when it comes to your safety, the buck stops with the president."

Alternative Fuel, Nuclear Power To Figure In Speech. The New York Times (1/31, Bumiller, Sanger, 1.19M) reports Bush "will renew a call for the development of alternative fuel for automobiles and promote the construction of new nuclear power plants" in his speech. After "years of partisan arguments over the administration's efforts to open new parts of the country for oil and gas drilling, Mr. Bush will cast his discussion of nonoil sources of energy as an economic imperative for the United States and a national security necessity to reduce dependence on Middle Eastern oil." The Times says the "issues have been part of Mr. Bush's agenda for years, but never a top priority."

The New York Post (1/31, Johnson, 624K) writes, "If President Bush unveils strong environmentally conscious initiatives in tonight's State of the Union speech, credit (or blame) goes to Nora Maccoby. At the end of the year, Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld was seen at a holiday party in Georgetown genially locking horns" with the screenwriter. After a "half-hour of Maccoby lecturing Rummy that energy independence through renewable clean sources should be the heart of a national security strategy, a grinning Rumsfeld bleated to those nearby, 'I can't believe this -- this girl's kicking my ass, and she's right.' Then to Maccoby, 'Call the Secretary of Energy. You can use my name.'"

Bush Said To Have Mixed Track Record On Fulfilling SOTU Plans. The Wall Street Journal (1/31, 2.11M) examines Bush's track record on State of the Union promises. Last year, Bush "declared: 'We'll start on Social Security now.' But after a year of hard campaigning, the president has acknowledged that reform plans are dead for now, in what amounts to his biggest domestic defeat to date." In the Middle East, "the Bush administration has made strides, though some hot zones remain to be defused." On immigration, legislation "has been slow-moving, but as the topic is sure to be a hot-button issue in the 2006 congressional elections, the president has moved it up on his agenda." The Journal also traces the mixed results of Bush's State of the Union vows back to 2001.

Anti-Bush Protestors To Gather At Capitol Reflecting Pool Tonight. The Washington Times (1/31, Mansfield, 90K) reports, "Liberal activists -- among them graying leftovers from the Vietnam-era antiwar movement -- plan to gather near the Capitol tonight, banging pots and pans to drown out President Bush's State of the Union address." On Monday, "opponents of the Iraq war kicked off their latest round of demonstrations with an 'Impeachment Forum' held downtown in a private dining room at Busboys and Poets. Featured speakers were 78-year-old former U.S. Attorney General Ramsey Clark; longtime war protester Marcus Raskin, 71, who is head of the Institute for Policy Studies; and Cindy Sheehan, mother of an American soldier killed in Iraq. Sheehan "plans to speak tonight to protesters at the Capitol Reflecting Pool. Last week, the group 'World Can't Wait -- Drive Out the Bush Regime' was denied a permit to gather on the Mall for security reasons. The group won a federal lawsuit and has been given permission to bang away while Mr. Bush speaks to a joint session of Congress at 9 p.m." The Washington Post (1/31, A2, Milbank, 744K) writes that at the "Impeachment Forum" event, Sheehan, "just back from Caracas, where she praised Venezuela's anti-American president, Hugo Chavez, and called Bush a 'terrorist,' said she expects Democrats will 'seriously screw up' the midterm elections in November."

Utah Town's Support For Bush "Nearly Unanimous." The Washington Post (1/31, A1, Finkel, 744K) profiles the town of Randolph, Utah, a town of about 480 people "where Bush received 95.6 percent of the vote" in 2004 "and support for him continues to be nearly unanimous. … There have been no funerals here from Bush's war on terrorism. There are no unemployment lines, no homeless people sleeping in doorways, no sick people being turned away from a hospital because of a lack of insurance, no crime to speak of, no security fence needed around the reservoir, no metal detectors at the schools."

NYTimes, WPost Say Bush Should Not Take Too Much Credit For Economy. The New York Times (1/31, 1.19M) editorializes, "When President Bush gives his State of the Union address tonight, expect to hear a renewed call for setting the administration's first-term tax cuts in concrete, combined with warnings that letting the cuts expire would retard economic growth. Nothing could be further from the truth. As proof of tax cuts' ability to spur the economy, Mr. Bush generally cites productivity growth, job creation and the rise in personal income. Productivity has indeed been stellar, and supply-siders claim that is because tax cuts have led to investment, which led to higher productivity. But business investment has been flat for five years. Meanwhile, the benefits of productivity growth have been concentrated among the wealthy. … Tonight is Mr. Bush's night to speak. But it's the job of all of us to be critical listeners."

The Washington Post (1/31, A16, 744K) editorializes, "Bush will be tempted to take credit for the strength of the economy. The recovery that began four years ago has been robust, with gross domestic product growing 4.2 percent in 2004 and 3.5 percent in 2005 despite a slowdown in the last quarter. Productivity -- that is, the value of goods produced for each hour of labor -- has increased even faster than during the boom of the late 1990s and roughly twice as fast as during the previous two decades. But Mr. Bush should not crow too much. For one thing, U.S. prosperity is built on an alarming trade deficit, which symbolizes a broader fragility in the global economy. For another, economic progress is not showing up in higher wages for the typical worker. … On the trade deficit, the best response is to boost national saving, and the surest way for government to do that is to cut the federal deficit. On wage stagnation, it would be a mistake to intervene directly in labor markets, but growing inequality reaffirms the case for a progressive tax structure. Mr. Bush could show he understands that by rethinking his enthusiasm for tax cuts. If only."

USA Today Says Congress Should Assert Itself With Bush. USA Today (1/31, 2.31M) editorializes, "When President Bush goes to the Capitol tonight for his State of the Union address, he will undoubtedly receive a standing ovation from the assembled members of Congress. They might as well be on their knees with their foreheads bowed to the floor, prostrating themselves as a gesture of their fecklessness in exercising their constitutional role as a separate and equal branch of government. Among the recent examples of the administration's airy disregard of Congress: It dismissed questions about the legality of its warrantless spying; It stonewalled an inquiry into the response to Hurricane Katrina; Mine-safety officials walked out of a hearing on coal-mine tragedies; Bush opened his news conference last week by saying Congress 'must' reauthorize the USA Patriot Act and the Senate 'needs' to vote quickly on his nomination of Samuel Alito to the U.S. Supreme Court. That's not exactly what the Founders had in mind."

More Commentary On State Of The Union Address. In a Wall Street Journal (1/31, 2.11M) op-ed, Fred Barnes of the Weekly Standard writes, "When running for re-election in 2004, and again last year as he campaigned for Social Security reform, President Bush repeatedly advocated an 'ownership society.' It was a bold concept aimed at producing an historic shift in power from Washington bureaucrats to individual Americans. But 'ownership society' is not a phrase you're likely to hear from him tonight in his State of the Union address. … At best, there will be faint echoes. Injecting free-market incentives into the health-care system is a major part of the ownership society idea. And the president plans to propose new tax breaks to reduce out-of-pocket medical expenses, especially to help the uninsured. Expanding health savings accounts (HSAs), which allow individuals to decide on routine medical expenses, is a Bush priority. So is reducing the impact of the alternative minimum tax, a modest stab at tax reform. He also intends to note that Social Security is still headed toward bankruptcy. That's it -- all fairly tame stuff compared to the vast reach of his ownership society scheme."

In his Washington Post (1/31, A17, 744K) column, George Will writes, "The success of the terrorist organization Hamas in the Palestinian elections is but the latest proof of what happens when the forms of democracy are severed from what the president, with a cosmopolitan shrug, dismissively called 'our own Western standards of progress.' Now comes wishful thinking, and then cynicism. … Tonight, on the 1,050th day of the Iraq war (the 912th day of American participation in World War II was D-Day), the nation needs an adult hour, including a measured meditation on overreaching, from the Middle East to Medicare's prescription drug entitlement. But in State of the Union addresses, rarely is heard a discouraging word."

In his Wall Street Journal (1/31, 2.11M) column, George Melloan writes, "The president will say that the state of the union is good and cite supporting evidence. Unemployment is less than 5% of the work force. The economy grew well last year, despite a surprising fourth-quarter slowdown, and is expected to do so again this year. That America's ownership society is thriving can be seen in the burgeoning holdings of assets such as houses and securities. The president can claim, if he so wishes, that his first-term tax cuts fostered this expansion and broadening of national wealth. … The president has been thwarted on two major efforts to grant Americans greater choice in how they manage their personal affairs. A sensible idea for switching from the pay-as-you-go Social Security retirement system to private accounts that would build up during a working lifetime has been blocked by those rugged individualists he will address tonight. Tax reform and simplification is stalled as well. As will be evident even to a casual viewer, the men and women attending tonight's party enjoy their power. Dragging it out of their hands by granting Americans greater economic freedom is always a formidable task."

In a Financial Times (1/31) column, Caroline Daniel writes, "Bush likes to say that his job is to confront big problems, not leave them to those who follow. As he prepares to deliver the State of the Union address he has been forced to tackle the issues bequeathed him by the man who has occupied the White House for the past five years: himself. The sixth year of a two-term presidency is a critical time. It offers a last chance to shape the domestic political agenda and exploit the bully pulpit of moral leadership before attention is diverted to the succession battle." For Bush, "the chief constraints are managing the fall-out from his signature first-term policies."

In his Washington Post (1/31, A17, 744K) column, Eugene Robinson writes, "If there were justice in the world, George W. Bush would have to give his State of the Union address from Oprah's couch. Not when she's being the New Age, touchy-feely Oprah, though. Bush should have to face the wrathful, Old Testament Oprah who subjected author James Frey to that awful public smiting the other day. She could open with the same line she used on Frey, whose best-selling memoir, which Oprah had touted on her show, turned out to be a tissue of lies. 'I have to say it is -- it is difficult for me to talk to you, because I really feel duped. I feel duped,' Oprah could tell the president."

In his New York Times (1/31, 1.19M) column, Nicholas Kristof writes, "President Bush is slated to discuss health care in his State of the Union address tonight. It's about time: it's scandalous that babies born in the United States are less likely to survive their first year than babies born in Slovenia. But the solutions to the health crisis lie less in reorganizing medical treatment than in improving public health -- such as steering kids away from French fries. … Granted, a War on Sloth isn't as dramatic for the Bush administration as a War on Terrorism. And for Democrats, attacking junk food isn't as attention-grabbing as denouncing corruption in Congress. But there is perhaps no area of public policy where it would be easier to save the lives of countless Americans than in promoting public health."

In a Roll Call (1/31) column, David Winston of the Republican polling firm the Winston Group writes, "Tonight, the president gives his State of the Union address amid political uncertainty. … With the 2006 Congressional elections 10 months away, this one has more riding on it than any other SOTU since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks -- in part because Republicans are facing a more difficult political environment. Nonetheless, despite of a handful tough races and poll numbers, Republicans would probably hold both the Senate and the House if the elections were held today. A few seats could shift to the Democrats, but this outlook is certainly an improvement over last September's prospects, when the Republican majority seemed vulnerable."

In a Washington Post (1/31, A17, 744K) op-ed, writer David Atkins writes in the voice of the President, "While State of the Union speeches belong to the genre of nonfiction, they are inevitably a personal, subjective recounting by the president. … Some errors appear to be innocent mistakes in copy-editing. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales has alerted me that the line, 'No person is above the law' should instead be 'One person is above the law.' My comment that 'we have carefully listened to critics of our domestic surveillance program' should have read 'listened in on…' … In the spirit of bipartisanship, I included the Clinton period in calculating the '24 million jobs we have created through the end of 2005.' … The statement that 'our administration has always respected the importance of checks and balances' is not, as has been implied, a reference to disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff. I have no recollection of ever meeting Abramoff…nor his lovely and charming wife, Pamela, and their cute and rambunctious twins."

In a New York Times (1/31, 1.19M) op-ed, Ted Widmer, a "speechwriter and senior adviser to President Clinton," writes about the use of the phrase, "The state of our union is strong!" in many such addresses, writing that while "the Constitution does not technically require that these seven words be spoken by the president," like a "clogged artery, the sentence has hardened into oratorical tradition. … Let's face it, no president wants to admit that things aren't going well. Over the years, our leaders have evaded frank discussion of their records through a variety of maneuvers, including obfuscation through statistics, the introduction of audience members and ringing references to the founders."

In a New York Times (1/31, 1.19M) op-ed, communications consultant Francis Wilkinson writes, "If there is a bandwagon in the works to eliminate the president's State of the Union address, I'm jumping aboard. There has always been something uncomfortably imperious about the speech. … Bill Clinton's final State of the Union expired after 9,000 words and more kitchen sinks than you'll find at Home Depot. The Gettysburg Address, by comparison, was 266 words. It's perhaps not too early to predict which of the two speeches the world will little note nor long remember. President Bush has been less fortunate. Not one but two of his addresses have produced entries for the books. The first was the over-greased 'axis of evil' in 2002 -- alluring alliteration made memorable by inadvertent inanity. The second, in 2003, consisted of those 16 words about Saddam Hussein's uranium safari -- and yes, even the 'has' and 'of' turned out to be false."

Bush To Visit Tennessee, Minnesota To Promote State Of The Union Initiatives. The Tennessean (1/31, De La Cruz) reports President Bush "will share his 2006 agenda with Republican activists from Middle Tennessee, as well as business and community leaders, in a Nashville speech tomorrow -- his first following tonight's State of the Union address. Hundreds of tickets were distributed to GOP officeholders, the state Republican Party and organizations to distribute. … The speech is scheduled for 11:50 a.m. at the Grand Ole Opry House."

The St. Paul Pioneer-Press (1/31, 200K) reports Bush will visit Maplewood, Minnesota, Thursday to "tout some of the initiatives he will outline" in his speech. White House spokesman Allen Abney said the appearance "will be 'part of him going out across the country to follow up on initiatives that he discusses' in his nationally televised speech." The visit "comes as Bush is slumping in public opinion polls in Minnesota. The most recent poll, conducted Jan. 13-15 by SurveyUSA, showed 56 percent of Minnesota disapproved of the president's job performance while 39 percent approved."

Kaine Plans To Speak Against Partisanship, Negativity In Politics. The AP (1/30, Fournier) reports Virginia Gov. Timothy Kaine, "tapped to deliver the State of the Union response for Democrats, has sharp words for both parties in Washington: Stop being so partisan, negative and irrelevant. 'There's a better way,' he said Monday." In an interview, Kaine said, "I want to contrast what I consider to be an administration that is super partisan and not really able to deliver results with a different model, a better way, which is what we've been doing in Virginia and other states." But he also "said Democrats in Washington also could learn from the success achieved by him and 11 other Democratic governors who run states that Bush carried in 2004."

The Boston Globe (1/31, Klein, 484K) reports the Democrats' selection of Kaine is part of the party's "intensifying efforts to reach out to Catholic voters." Kaine, "a devout Catholic who spoke openly about his faith during his election campaign last year, will speak about his work as a Jesuit missionary in Honduras, said Delacey Skinner, a Kaine spokeswoman. Kaine said that experience during his time as a Harvard Law School student inspired him to enter public service."

Democratic Leaders Will Not Bring Special Guests To State Of The Union. The Washington Times (1/31, Pierce, 90K) reports in its "Inside Politics" column, "Special folks -- usually connected to major news events or issues -- are always featured guests of President Bush for his State of the Union address, but Democrats are free to do the same to highlight their own priorities or make their own points. So far, neither Democratic leader plans to bring special, high-profile guests to the House chamber for the speech tonight. Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada will not bring any newsmakers with him, an aide said, and House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi of California will stick with family and friends for the big speech, an aide said."

Blanco To Attend State Of The Union. The AP (1/30) reports Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Blanco will attend the State of the Union speech. Blanco "has been at odds with the White House over government response to Hurricane Katrina, but was invited to sit in the gallery for Bush's speech on Tuesday night, Blanco's office said."

Two New Yorkers Bring 9/11 Messages To SOTU. The New York Daily News (1/31, McAuliff, 729K) reports, "President Bush won't be the only one making political points about 9/11 at tonight's State of the Union speech. At least two New Yorkers invited to the address by state lawmakers will be there to illustrate their own, very different points. 'Let's see if we get some truth,' said Monica Gabrielle, who lost her husband on Sept. 11, 2001, and will listen to Bush with Sen. Hillary Clinton (D-N.Y.)." And "Marvin Bethea, a paramedic sickened by his 9/11 exposure who is coming with Rep. Carolyn Maloney (D-Manhattan), has a message for Bush and the rest of the federal government." Bethea said, "I want every member of Congress to look at me and remember me when they go to bed at night."

Hinchey, Other Democrats Advise Bush To Be Accurate. The Binghamton (NY) Press & Sun Bulletin (1/31, Farmer) reports on Democratic Rep. Maurice Hinchey's advice to President Bush on his fifth State of the Union address, which echoed nine other Democrats who sent a letter to the President urging he "pay attention to the accuracy of the information in his speech." Such "attention to detail is crucial, given Bush has delivered incorrect information in past State of the Union addresses, Hinchey said. The most notable example, Hinchey said, came when the president said in his 2003 address, 'The British government has learned that Saddam Hussein recently sought significant quantities of uranium from Africa.' … 'He has never 'fessed up to that situation,' Hinchey said."

Congress To Begin Hearings On Medicare Drug Benefit Program. The Washington Post (1/31, A15, Murray, Babington, 744K) writes, "Is the Medicare drug benefit suffering from start-up pains, or is there something more serious going on? Lawmakers got an earful from seniors about the new program while they were home for the winter recess. Now that Congress is back in session, lawmakers will begin weighing whether to make legislative adjustments or wait and see whether the glitches work themselves out." Medicare officials will go before a Senate committee on Thursday to testify "about how the various problems are being addressed," and next week, the Senate Finance Committee will also take up the matter. While the benefit "took effect just a month ago," Democrats "are pressing Republicans to streamline the benefit, to make it easier for seniors to navigate, and to provide emergency relief for people who are having trouble getting their prescriptions filled."

Drug Industry Lobbyists Active In Every State. The New York Times (1/31, Saul, 1.19M) reports on the drug industry's lobbying efforts, noting that while it is best known for having the richest lobbying force in Washington, the industry "also protects its flanks — all 50 of them. Drug lobbyists are active all around the country at the state level, because even with bright political lines dividing the nation into red and blue, the industry knows that controlling drug costs is a subject with nearly universal popular appeal." The Times adds, "Many drug industry issues are on legislative agendas again this year. And this Friday in New York, an association of lawmakers from New York, West Virginia, eight other states and the District of Columbia plan to meet to discuss their plans for pursuing industry regulation."

Budget Bill Includes New Welfare Work Requirements. The Los Angeles Times (1/31, Havemann, 958K) reports that the bill "includes provisions toughening welfare regulations, including work requirements on two-parent welfare families that experts say is almost impossible to meet." The measure "would hold adults in two-parent families to a higher work standard than those in single-parent families. States that failed to meet the standard would lose some of their federal welfare money unless they chose to exclude two-parent families from assistance. .. The bill before the House provides that the adults in 90% of the two-parent welfare families must, between them, put in 35 hours a week either working, training for work, or participating in other job-related activities. States would face an easier work requirement for their single-parent families. Half of all parents would have to work 20 hours a week if they have a child under 6, or 30 hours if their children are older."

Dionne Says No One Who Supports GOP Budget Is A "Reformer." E.J. Dionne writes in the Washington Post (1/31, A17, 744K) that there is "an uncomfortable bit of business left over from the Republican disaster year of 2005 that will test the seriousness of the party's supposed commitment to change. The cut-the-poor, help-the-big-interests federal budget passed last year needs final ratification in the House. The vote could take place as soon as tomorrow. Let's be clear: Anyone who votes for this fiscal mess will be standing for the bad old ways of doing business in Washington. Those who do so will have no claim to being 'reformers.'"

House GOP Promises Stricter Oversight Of Executive Branch Spending. House Republicans said yesterday that President Bush should expect stricter congressional oversight on spending and executive branch agencies this year. The Washington Times (1/31, Dinan, 90K) reports that Majority Whip Roy Blunt "said House Republicans have not done well at oversight in the past 11 years, initially because they were learning how to be a majority party and then because they didn't know how to approach oversight of a Republican administration. He said they will have to 'get significantly better than we have been.'" Republican Study Committee Chairman Rep. Mike Pence "said spending is the top issue for House conservatives, followed by the sanctity of marriage and ethics reforms."

Congressional Club Asks Donors For $50,000 For Lunch With First Lady. The Congressional Club, an organization of lawmakers' spouses, is asking donors for $50,000 apiece for lunch, a reception with First Lady Laura Bush and a private reception with lawmakers and their spouses. The Hill (1/31, Kaplan) reports, "The blunt language of the fundraising letter and the fact that the sum sought is double what it was in previous years are drawing criticism that suggests the fallout from the scandal surrounding Jack Abramoff and former Rep. Randy 'Duke' Cunningham (R-Calif.) is tainting even the quaintest and most bipartisan of Washington social organizations. … In the club's Jan. 19 letter, which several sources read to The Hill, organizers tell potential donors that $50,000 buys 12 tickets to the lunch and admittance to the receptions with Bush and the lawmakers.

'The language and the amount of money they're asking for shows very poor judgment,' a source familiar with the letter said. 'In this day and age, the amount of money they're asking for is inappropriate.'"

Taylor Out Of Running For FDIC Post. The New York Post (1/31, Seifman, 624K) reports, "In a bombshell development, Diana Taylor — the state banking superintendent who's better known as Mayor Bloomberg's girlfriend — will not be tapped to head the Federal Deposit Insurance Corp. it was reported yesterday. The stunning news came after months of speculation that Taylor had been all but assured the job, even having already sailed through an FBI background check." The Post adds, "Last night, a source with close ties to the administration was asked if he had heard the latest news. 'I knew it weeks ago — she's going to get it,' the source said. When told that she was no longer in the running, the source responded with a stunned, 'What?!'"

Bush Appoints New Chair Of Council Of Economic Advisers. The Washington Post (1/31, A7, Henderson, 744K) reports, "President Bush plans to nominate Stanford University business professor Edward P. Lazear, a specialist in workplace issues, to become chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers, the White House announced yesterday." Lazear, 'if confirmed by the Senate, would become one of the administration's top officials responsible for advising, crafting and marketing the president's economic policies." The Wall Street Journal (1/31, 2.11M) says Lazear "was a member of Mr. Bush's advisory Tax Reform Panel, which submitted proposals for overhauling the tax code to the Treasury Department last year." He also is "a senior fellow at the Hoover Institution, Stanford's public-policy research center." The Journal adds, "The founder of a field known as personnel economics, Mr. Lazear has focused his research on employee incentives, promotions, compensation and productivity in companies. His expertise might help the White House better understand a troubling political phenomenon: why many workers give the administration relatively low marks on the economy, amid strong growth and low unemployment."

House Majority Leader Hopefuls Make Pitches To GOP Study Committee. Reps. Roy Blunt, John Boehner and John Shaddeg, the three candidates for House Majority Leader, pitched their candidacies at the annual retreat of the Republican Study Committee in Baltimore yesterday. The New York Times (1/31, Hulse, 1.19M) reports that the overture to the influential group of House conservatives, "along with a similar session set for Tuesday with House moderates, was part of the concentrated lawmaker-to-lawmaker campaigning typical of party elections, with members of the exclusive electorate trying to gauge how a candidate might do the job and, perhaps more important, calculate what might be in it for them. In recent weeks, there have been rumors of secret deals cut in exchange for votes: a chairmanship here, help with a jurisdictional dispute there. But each of the candidates denies any explicit offer of a quid pro quo, and lawmakers being wooed support that account."

Roll Call (1/31, Pershing) adds that "the dominant theme of Monday's session was the impending race for Majority Leader between GOP Reps. Roy Blunt (Mo.), John Boehner (Ohio) and John Shadegg (Ariz.) and how the conservatives who made the trip to Baltimore -- many of whom are publicly committed to one of the three candidates -- could force a second ballot Thursday and potentially decide the race."

Blunt Says He Has Majority Of Votes. The Washington Times (1/31, Dinan, 90K) notes, "Unlike recent coronations, this year's election is turning into a real race. Mr. Blunt yesterday said he continues to have a majority, but the list of those who are publicly supporting the Missourian is at least 20 votes short of the 117 votes needed to win a majority of the 232 members of the House Republican Conference. 'It's pretty clear Mr. Blunt does not have the votes to win it on a first ballot,' Mr. Shadegg said. 'There's a very vigorous debate going on about reform and about whether we can simply remain with the status quo.'"

The Hill (1/31, O'Connor) adds, "Boehner and Shadegg are trying to force a second ballot and to beat each other on the first. Supporters for both suggested an erosion of support, or 'buyer's remorse,' for Blunt." The Hill adds, "Without offering specific examples, Boehner suggested that Blunt had made explicit promises to members during the elections, but Blunt dismissed that suggestion outright."

Tomorrow's Budget Vote Seen As Critical For Blunt. The House's consideration of a $39 billion package of spending cuts tomorrow is seen as a critical moment for Blunt. The Hill (1/31, Allen) reports that the vote comes one day before GOP members will vote in the race for Majority Leader and a strong victory on the budget vote "would boost Blunt's campaign." A "loss, a delayed vote or any extension of the typical 15-minute vote, however, could be devastating. And the current political climate isn't helping Blunt's vote-gathering efforts."

White House May Disclose Abramoff's White House Meetings After State Of The Union. In its "Washington Wire" column on its web site, the Wall Street Journal (1/30, 2.11M) reported, "With ethics questions swirling and pressure building from Republican allies on Capitol Hill, some within the White House are pressing for full disclosure of disgraced Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff's meetings with White House staff. One factor in the delay has been concern about diverting attention from Bush's message in Tuesday night's speech, according to a Republican close to the administration. A post-speech release appears increasingly likely, although no final decision has been made."

Reid Defends Efforts On Behalf Of Abramoff Clients. Fox News' Special Report (1/30, Garrett) reported, "In an exclusive interview with Fox Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid defended his efforts to help Native American clients of disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff. … Reid also dodged Democratic Party Chairman Howard Dean's criticism on Fox News Sunday of any Democrat who helped an Abramoff tribal client." Reid "wrote a letter on March 5th, 2002 to Interior Secretary Gail Norton on behalf of a Louisiana Indian tribe, the Coushattas, who were trying to block federal approval of a casino sought by a rival tribe. The next day, a Reed political fund, the Searchlight Leadership Fund, received a $5,000 from the Coushattas, an Abramoff client."

Numerous Scandals Continue To Embroil Washington. The CBS Evening News (1/30, story 8, 2:00, Borger) surveyed the various scandals embroiling "official Washington" on the "eve of the President's State of the Union speech. … Start with this man, Jack Abramoff. Once a well connected Republican lobbyist, now singing to federal prosecutors in a congressional bribery scandal. His friend, former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, forced to give up his leadership post after being indicted in Texas for money laundering. Ohio Republican Bob Ney, forced to give up his committee chairmanship after prosecutors tied him to Abramoff. And while Democrats haven't received any money from Abramoff's own checkbook, they did receive $1.5 million he directed to them through his clients. So when 100 members rushed to return Abramoff-tainted money to charity, it was a bipartisan stampede. Even the President joined in, sending $6,000 in Abramoff donations to charity. What the President won't reveal: the pictures taken of him with the lobbyist at White House functions. And although Abramoff was a top Bush money man, the President says he doesn't know him. … Don't forget that other Washington scandal that still haunts the White House, the CIA leak investigation. Federal prosecutors want to know who if anyone inside the White House knowingly leaked the identity of an undercover CIA agent to Washington journalists. That's a crime. And lying about it is a crime too. That's what Scooter Libby, Vice President Cheney's chief of staff, has been charged with. … Will Dick Cheney testify? Expect this case to drag on. Top presidential advisor Karl Rove is still under investigation for his role in the leaks. … And there's more: Republican Duke Cunningham resigned after admitting he took bribes. Democrat Bill Jefferson was the target in an FBI sting in which cash was found in his freezer. … The President is likely to support lobbying reform in his State of the Union speech. No doubt, everyone will applaud."

Democrats Try To Tie Sweeney To "Culture Of Corruption" In Washington. New York Democrats are questioning Rep. John Sweeney's ties to lobbyists in the hope of ousting from his upstate New York congressional seat. The New York Times (1/31, Hernandez, 1.19M) reports that Democrats are seizing on reports that Sweeney "recently organized a $2,000-a-person 'Skiing with Sweeney' weekend getaway attended by lobbyists at a ski resort in Park City, Utah, as well as a dinner at the home of Jeffrey Kimbell, a pharmaceutical industry lobbyist. The Democrats who have attacked Mr. Sweeney in newspaper interviews, news releases and a satirical Internet advertisement are arguing that Mr. Sweeney's actions reflect a larger culture of corruption that has enveloped Washington under Republican rule. The attacks notwithstanding, he has not been implicated in any of the troubles that have touched other Republicans. … The attacks on Mr. Sweeney come as New York Democrats say they plan to use the fallout over the lobbying scandal in Washington as an issue to mount vigorous challenges against Mr. Sweeney and other Republicans they say are too close to Republican leaders on the Hill."

Obey Says Leadership Has Repeatedly Bent, Broken House Rules. Rep. David Obey, ranking member of the House Appropriations Committee, writes in Roll Call (1/31), "I believe that the way the Republican-led Congress has handled Congressional earmarks has gotten way out of hand. The use of earmarks to reward Members who vote for questionable legislation has expanded hugely since Republicans took control. … There is no question that earmarking needs to be restrained. … But having said that, let's keep our eye on the real problem. The real problem with the appropriations process is not the occasional inappropriate earmark that slips through, as embarrassing as that might be. The real problem is that the rules of the House of Representatives — rules based on procedures recommended by Thomas Jefferson that have developed and matured through precedents established over the past 200 years — have been bent and broken by the House leadership in order to ram through legislation in an arbitrary and often anonymous fashion." The House "must recommit itself to fair and open House procedures."

Republicans Consider Adding 527 Limits To Lobbying Reform Bill. House Republicans are "leaning heavily' toward using the lobbying reform bill to put limits on donations to 527 political groups according to the Wall Street Journal (1/31, Rogers, Mullins, 2.11M). The Journal adds, "Melding the lobbying and campaign-finance issues could make it harder then to win Democratic support in the House. But combining the two issues could give Republicans greater leverage in persuading their members to accept new restrictions on travel and entertainment perks now arranged by lobbyists."

Meehan Warns Against Attaching 527 Crackdown To Lobbying Reform. However, Rep. Marty Meehan is warning against attaching his crack down on 527 groups to lobbying reform bills. The Hill (1/31, Schor) reports that Meehan said, "I don't want to see a poison pill that ends up being an excuse for members to vote against lobbying reform, because we need comprehensive lobbying reform," adding, "Adding 527s complicates passage…creates confusion, creates excuses." The Hill adds, "Even if the 527 language in tomorrow's GOP lobbying and ethics packages is identical to his, Meehan expects the debate to split lawmakers otherwise committed to reining in lobbying abuses."

Congress Seeks To Provide Workers With Advice On 401(k)s. The Wall Street Journal (1/31, Levitz, 2.11M) reports, "Congress wants to make it easier for financial professionals to advise employees on their investment choices in 401(k) plans -- but can't yet agree on how. With employers moving away from fixed-benefit pensions that give employees no investment choices toward fixed-contribution 401(k)s that sometimes give them dozens of choices -- usually mutual funds -- the fund industry has long argued that employees need help to make sound decisions. But federal labor laws designed to protect workers ban firms whose funds are among the employees' investment choices from also telling plan members which funds to choose. … Under the Pension Protection Act, which was passed by the House of Representatives in December, the conflict law would be overridden, permitting funds to give advice." Opponents "including AARP," "say the provision is a lousy idea, akin to a fox guarding the henhouse. The Senate, meanwhile, has approved a measure that would continue the ban on direct advice from fund firms, but would encourage companies to hire neutral third-party advisers to tell employees where they should put their money."

Administration Hopes To Abolish General Schedule Pay System. The Washington Post (1/31, B2, Barr, 744K) reports in its "Federal Diary" column, "The Bush administration hopes to garner congressional support this year for a proposal to abolish the decades-old General Schedule pay and job classification system by 2010 and move federal employees into pay systems that could vary by agency. … Prospects are uncertain for the administration's plan to replace the General Schedule with performance-based pay systems. Lawmakers face a number of difficult issues -- the conflict in Iraq, the rebuilding of New Orleans, possible growth in budgetary red ink -- and the Senate, in particular, does not seem inclined to take up such civil service changes. But the president's pay advisers have said they are encouraged by the debate over their plan."

Ensign Suffers Minor Injuries In Car Crash. The AP (1/31) reports Sen. John Ensign "was treated at a hospital Monday after his car was hit head-on by a driver who fell asleep at the wheel, police said. The Nevada Republican and an aide, who was driving, were taken to Sunrise Hospital with minor to moderate injuries, police said."

OTHER NEWS:

Greenspan To Retire Today, Bernanke To Take Over As Fed Chairman. The CBS Evening News (1/30, story 9, 2:00, Schieffer) offered a farewell to Alan Greenspan, for whom Tuesday is his "last day as Chairman of the Federal Reserve. For nearly two decades now he has defined US monetary policy and in the process become one of the most powerful and influential officials in Washington in recent memory." CBS (Mason) added, "The job had never been high-profile, but Greenspan has become an economic icon, serving four presidents as Fed Chairman. … Many are wondering if his successor will have the Greenspan touch. Behind the Fed's imposing columns, Alan Greenspan himself has become a Washington monument."

The New York Times (1/31, Stolberg, 1.19M) reports, "The important presidential nominee who is scheduled for a vote in the Senate on Tuesday is widely regarded as brilliant, has ties to Princeton University and, if confirmed as expected, will influence the lives of ordinary Americans for years to come. Judge Samuel A. Alito Jr. for the Supreme Court? No, this is the other important nominee -- Ben S. Bernanke for chairman of the Federal Reserve. … While lawmakers and the public have been focused on the nomination of Judge Alito, who is also scheduled for a vote on Tuesday, Mr. Bernanke has become a rarity in modern Washington: the noncontroversial nominee."

The Washington Post (1/31, D1, Henderson, 744K) reports "Fed officials and senior staffers, both in Washington and at the 12 regional Fed banks, will be a critical resource for the new chairman." Bernanke "steps into the job with academic expertise and experience in monetary policy." But "he has no experience in the business world or as a crisis manager, leaving analysts unsure how he would respond to financial shocks such as a stock market crash, dollar collapse, hedge-fund meltdown or another terrorist attack." He "was unavailable for comment."

USA Today (1/31, Hagenbaugh, 2.31M) reports, "When Alan Greenspan retires from the Federal Reserve today, the onetime jazz band musician will be going out on a high note." Greenspan "shepherded the economy through one of the most prosperous periods in US history. In the more than 18 years Greenspan held the reins of the Fed, the economy enjoyed a 10-year economic expansion, the longest in history, and had just two brief recessions that were the mildest since World War II."

The Wall Street Journal (1/31, lp, 2.11M) says Greenspan's "economic legacy seems secure: Inflation and unemployment are lower than when he took office, and during his tenure, the U.S. experienced just two mild recessions and its longest expansion on record." But "the intellectual foundation of that legacy is harder to pinpoint. If there is a single idea informing the success of his nearly two decades at the helm of the Fed, it is that single ideas are to be avoided. There isn't an identifiable Greenspanism or a Greenspan rule because the essence of Mr. Greenspan is his distrust of any 'ism' or rule."

Greenspan's retirement is triggering commentary in this morning's newspapers. In an editorial titled "The Chairman's Mystique," the Wall Street Journal (1/31, 2.11M) says, "The paradox of Alan Greenspan's achievement as he leaves office today after 18 years as Chairman of the Federal Reserve is that nearly everyone is praising his performance but no one seems to know exactly how he did it." He "bequeaths to successor Ben Bernanke a record but not a method -- which means we all have to see if the new guy has the same juggling skills."

USA Today (1/31, 2.31M) editorializes that "to the degree" Greenspan "deserves criticism, it's for supporting President Bush's 2001 tax cuts, which have dried up the federal budget surplus and helped produce record deficits. All in all, however, Greenspan makes an impressive case for himself -- even if no one can understand what he is saying."

Meanwhile, GOP Sen. Jim Bunning, a member of the banking and budget committees, writes in USA Today (1/31, 2.31M), "Greenspan has done an admirable job. However, he has always erred on the side of raising rates. I am not alone in this opinion. History is showing that he made mistakes in raising rates for too long. Aside from being addicted to rate increases, another one of my qualms with Chairman Greenspan was that he talked about everything under the sun — from trade deficits to budget deficits, tax policy to fiscal policy, and even the nation's oil patch. For dinner conversation, these would be fine topics to discuss." But "the Fed's jurisdiction is supposed to be purely monetary policy. Hopefully, his successor, Ben Bernanke, will be a different kind of chairman in these respects. He should stick to monetary policy and not interfere with fiscal issues, which rattle markets and get the bulls and bears into a tizzy."

Milton Friedman, the 1976 Nobel laureate in economics, writes in the Wall Street Journal (1/31, 2.11M), "Greenspan and I have generally found ourselves in accord on monetary theory and policy, with one major exception. I have long favored the use of strict rules to control the amount of money created. Alan says I am wrong and that discretion is preferable, indeed essential. Now that his 18-year stint as chairman of the Fed is finished, I must confess that his performance has persuaded me that he is right -- in his own case." His performance "has indeed been remarkable. There is no other period of comparable length in which the Federal Reserve System has performed so well."

Consumer Spending Up As Savings Rate Hits Post-Depression Low. The Wall Street Journal (1/31, Preciphs, 2.11M) reports, "Consumers ended the year on a free-spending note, driving up car sales and other major purchases while sending the personal-savings rate to a 73-year low." Consumer spending, inflation adjusted, "rose 0.9% to $80.2 billion in December, after a revised 0.5% in November, the Commerce Department said. Increased spending on durable goods -- merchandise that lasts three years or longer and includes autos, appliances, computers and aircraft -- and services contributed to the boost."

Meanwhile, NBC Nightly News (1/30, story 8, 1:00, Williams) reported, "There is ominous news on the economy to report tonight. The Commerce Department reports that Americans' personal savings was negative last year. Clocking in at -0.5%. That means people not only spent all of their income for the year, but dipped into savings or went into debt for it. The last time the national savings rate was this low was 1933, after the bottom of the Great Depression." USA Today (1/31, Kirchhoff, Hagenbaugh, 2.31M) also runs a story headlined "Savings Enter Negative Territory First Time Since The Depression."

Gas Heating Costs Down, But Still Above 2004 Levels. USA Today (1/31, Chu, Hagenbaugh, 2.31M) reports, "Consumers are about to get a bit of relief from steep energy prices. Many utilities are lowering the cost of natural gas as a milder-than-expected winter has led to lower consumption and, thus, lower prices for energy. A majority of U.S. homes are heated with natural gas. For the average consumer, the lowered rates will translate into savings of $10 to $80 on a monthly heating bill, utilities estimate. Many customers will begin to see the lower gas prices in February." USA Today adds, "Don't rejoice too much, though. Gas prices are still sharply higher than they were a year ago." The Energy Department "has estimated that the average household heating bill for natural gas users will still come in 35% higher than last season, totaling $1,000 for October through March. (That estimate could be scaled back, though, if the winter continues to be mild.)"

OPEC Will Keep Production Unchanged. The Wall Street Journal (1/31, Bahree, 2.11M) reports, "With oil prices near record-high levels and the global economy sucking up almost all the crude that can be produced, OPEC's oil ministers have agreed to keep production unchanged for the time being, the cartel's de facto leader said." Saudi Arabia's "influential oil minister, Ali Naimi," told reporters yesterday that members of the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries "were 'in agreement' about keeping output steady at today's levels."

Kraft To Cut 8,000 Jobs, Close Up To 20 Plants. NBC Nightly News (1/30, story 5, 1:00, Williams) reported ExxonMobil "is reporting some jaw-dropping profits tonight," but "Kraft, America's largest food manufacturer, says it will cut 8,000 more jobs, and close up to 20 plants in an expansion of a restructuring plan that is already underway at the company."

ExxonMobil Reports Biggest Corporate Profit In US History. ABC's World News Tonight (1/30, story 7, 2:00, Vargas) reported, "There were more head-turning numbers from the oil industry today. ExxonMobil said it earned more than $10 billion in the last quarter of 2005, a record for any US company. For the year, profits hit $36 billion, another record." The CBS Evening News (1/30, story 5, :30, Schieffer) reported, "The world's largest publicly traded oil company put out some staggering numbers today," racking up "the biggest corporate profit in US history."

Stocks Mixed. The Wall Street Journal (1/31, Patterson, 2.11M) reports, "The Dow Jones Industrial Average fell 7.29 points to 10899.92 on light volume on the New York Stock Exchange." The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index gained 1.48 to 1285.20 and the Nasdaq Composite Index added 2.55 points to 2306.78.

Class-Action Suit Takes On Kansas Attorney General's Broad Teen-Sex Opinion. The New York Times (1/31, Rudoren) reports on a federal trial in Kansas over "whether a Kansas law prohibiting virtually all sexual activity by people under age 16 means health care professionals and educators must report such behavior to state authorities, which some say would stop many teenagers from seeking contraception or treatment for sexually transmitted diseases." According to the Times, the suit is fighting an opinion from Kansas Attorney General Phill Kline (R), whose "interpretation of the law … included a broad mandate for reporting whenever 'compelling evidence of sexual interaction is present.' Bonnie Scott Jones, a lawyer for the Center for Reproductive Rights in New York, which is representing the plaintiffs, said in her opening statement that Mr. Kline's 'dragnet approach' to amassing information on under-age sex violated minors' privacy rights and the Constitution's equal protection clause, and that it 'seriously endangers the health and well-being of adolescents.'" The Times adds, "Kansas is one of 12 states where sex under a certain age — 16, 17 or 18 — is illegal regardless of the age difference between partners, according to a 2004 report prepared by the Lewin Group, a consulting firm, for the federal Department of Health and Human Services."

Lobbying Business Said To Be Booming. The Hill (1/31, Snyder) reports, "As Congress looks to restrict lobbying activities in the wake of the Jack Abramoff scandal, there are seemingly few entities that wouldn't be affected by changes to the industry. Estimates vary widely on the number of registered lobbyists who make their living in Washington, from 30,000 to just more than 11,000. But one thing seems certain: K Street is booming. … Everyone from pornographers to court reporters to cell-phone tower erectors — in addition to legions of Fortune 500 companies that dominate K Street — have a presence in Washington." The Hill adds, "Experts point to a number of factors to explain the industry's rise, from an increase in federal appropriations earmarks to an increasingly complex tax code. But, broadly speaking, the growth on K Street and within corporate offices seems to be related to a general recognition in the value of having Washington representation, both to defend against the imposition of harmful policies and to seek out favorable earmarks or alterations in regulations, experts say."

Professor Says Richest, Best-Connected Lobbyists Dominate Policy. Ross K. Baker, a political science professor at Rutgers University, writes in USA Today (1/31, 2.31M), "The flaw in the Founding Fathers' benign view of interest groups is that while no single interest group dominates all areas of policies, the wealthiest groups and the lobbyists with the best inside connections or representing organizations with mass memberships do monopolize individual areas of national policy. This does not, by itself, promote illegal activity of the sort ascribed to Abramoff. Certainly, there are not many like him among Washington lobbyists. But it is the Abramoffs who are more likely to get the ear of lawmakers than are ordinary citizens who lack the means to buy tickets to their fundraisers."

Lobbyists Suggest Reforms. Al Swift and Bob Hines, lobbyists with the firm Colling Murphy Swift Hynes, write in Roll Call (1/31), "Members of Congress and their staffs are here for only one purpose -- to do the public's business. Therefore reforms should be based on that. Here are a few suggestions: Ban Entertainment, Gifts. … Travel Must Be Authorized. … Lift all rules pertaining to meals paid for by someone else. … But, in its place, demand transparency." Swift and Hines add, "Reforms will be passed. This time, why not do something simple, straightforward and effective? These suggestions can be a good place to start."

Anaheim, Angels Spar In Lawsuit Over Team Name. The USA Today (1/31, Kasindorf) reports, "Wounded pride in a community overshadowed by Los Angeles is at the center of a legal rhubarb at the courthouse here over whether the Anaheim Angels baseball team had the right to rename itself the Los Angeles Angels of Anaheim. … The city sued the owner, alleging that it's losing tax revenue from tourism because Anaheim is no longer publicized in box scores and sportscasts." USA Today notes that "a key issue" for Anaheim and Orange County baseball fans is "their thwarted dream of shaking the outmoded image of being Los Angeles suburbanites. USA Today reports that "Angels owner Arte Moreno … says that appealing to local chauvinism is "almost 100%" of Anaheim's strategy with the jury." The story also notes, "Beyond local pride, big money is at stake for Anaheim. The city is asking for more than $100 million in damages in addition to squelching a name it calls 'silly.'"

Growing Evangelical Movement Said To Look Beyond Abortion, Gay Marriage. The Los Angeles Times (1/31, Simon, 958K) reports on "a small but growing movement of evangelical Christians who no longer want to be defined by gay marriage and abortion. Plumbing the Bible for God's priorities, they are talking instead about global warming and affordable housing, about fewer tax cuts for the rich and more food stamps for the poor. … The National Assn. of Evangelicals, based in Colorado Springs, Colo., is urging its 30 million members to pursue a 'biblically balanced agenda' -- by fighting poverty as well as pornography, protecting the environment as well as embryos, promoting good government as well as the Gospel." The Times adds, "A decade ago, white evangelicals were fairly evenly divided between Democrats and Republicans. Today, the group leans heavily Republican. White evangelicals make up 23% of the electorate; in the last election, 78% backed Bush, according to the Pew Research Center for the People and the Press."

Clinton Seen As Trying To Salvage His Legacy By Making Peace With Bushes. Reuters (1/30, Wulfhorst) reports, "Former President Bill Clinton has been buddying up to both presidents Bush in what strategists right and left view as a bid to salvage his political legacy and boost the ambitions of his senator wife. … While making peace with rivals is a post-presidential tradition along with good deeds, Clinton stands to help himself and his wife, New York Sen. Hillary Clinton, say experts on both sides of the political aisle."

China, Russia Will Seek UN Referral For Iran. The New York Times (1/31, Weisman, 1.19M) reports, "The United States and Europe, after hours of negotiations on Iran, won support from Russia and China early Tuesday to refer Iran's nuclear activities to the United Nations Security Council this week, but with a promise that the Council would not act on the question for at least a month." The Washington Post (1/31, Sullivan, Linzer, 744K) adds that the decision, "reached in London through a compromise with Russia and China, was a victory for the United States and its European allies, who had pressed for the matter to be sent to the council. But Russia and China were able to soften the agreement by stipulating that the Security Council not take up the matter until March." The Post continues, "A senior US official said the announcement reflected 'growing frustration' among all the parties over Iran's defiance of the International Atomic Energy Agency, the UN watchdog. 'I think Iran's on the defensive. Iran did not expect this,' said the official, speaking on the condition of anonymity.

USA Today (1/31, 2.31M) notes the IAEA has "already found Iran violated obligations under the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty," while the Washington Times (1/31, Kralev, 90K) quotes "Senior State Department official" saying, "This is a significant step forward. … It means that Iran cannot depend on Russia and China to divide us any longer."

The Los Angeles Times (1/31, Daniszewski, Murphy, Magnier, 958K) says "the agreement appears to resolve, for now, a standoff in which Russia and China opposed any such action by the board of the International Atomic Energy Agency, a UN watchdog, which will meet Thursday. A vote to send Iran before the council appears all but certain, though there is some doubt whether it will be unanimous." The delay "provides a window for the Iranian government to reconsider its decision this month to reopen its nuclear facility at Natanz and resume research into enriching and reprocessing uranium. Iran says its program is for civilian nuclear power, but the U.S. and European Union believe the country is taking steps to develop material for nuclear weapons." The "compromise was hammered out at a four-hour dinner of foreign ministers here, hosted by Britain's Jack Straw ahead of a special meeting of the IAEA in Vienna."

The Financial Times (1/31, Hoyos, Dombey) adds "the agreement came hours after the Europeans and Iranian diplomats met at the request the Iranian government, in which Iran offered to slow down its controversial nuclear programme in a last-ditch attempt to avoid being reported to the Security Council. But European diplomats dismissed its proposal as containing nothing new." Javad Vaeedi," one of Iran's top nuclear negotiators, suggested to diplomats from France, the UK and Germany that Tehran could impose a moratorium on enriching uranium on an industrial scale - a process that can create weapons grade material."

Rice Stresses Diplomatic Option, Asking For "Robust" Talks With Iran. The AP (1/30, Stringer) reported Secretary Rice "said Monday that 'robust' negotiations with Iran are needed to deal with its resumed nuclear program, as European ministers' talks aimed at breaking the diplomatic deadlock appeared to fail." The AP quotes Rice saying, "We believe that there is a lot of life left in the diplomacy. ... After all, going to the Security Council is not the end of diplomacy. It's just diplomacy in a different, more robust context.'" AFP (1/30) also reported similar comments by President Bush: "The message is: Give up your nuclear weapons ambitions.

... We're united in our goal to keep the Iranians from having a weapon, and we're working on the tactics necessary to continue putting a united front out."

Poll Finds Most Favor Sanctions. The Washington Post (1/31, Deane, 744K) reports, "Seven in 10 Americans would support international economic sanctions as a way to prevent Iran from developing nuclear weapons, but there is considerable wariness about taking military action against Tehran, according to the latest Washington Post-ABC News poll." The Post continues, "A large majority of the public says Iran is a threat to the United States, albeit not an immediate one, according to a recent Gallup poll. And a Fox News survey suggests the public views Iran's official pronouncements on the nuclear research program with great skepticism: Eight in 10 voters believe the country plans to use uranium enrichment for military rather than for peaceful purposes."

Iranian "Crisis" To Test Nuclear Espionage Technology. The New York Times (1/31, Sanger, Broad, 1.19M) reports, "In March 2004, the science and technology directorate of the Central Intelligence Agency called a secret meeting of hundreds of the government's top experts in nuclear intelligence to address a problem that had bedeviled Washington for decades: how to know, with precision, when a country is about to cross the line and gain the ability to build an atomic bomb. The aim of the two-day conference was to reinvigorate the nation's atomic espionage efforts, not with spies on the ground or satellites in space but with a new generation of advanced technologies meant to detect the faintest clues of nuclear activity." The Times adds, "Nearly two years later, federal officials and scientists say that meeting and other secret actions have accelerated the government's efforts to develop new atomic espionage technologies. The research focuses on better detection of four basic, but inconspicuous, signatures that covert nuclear facilities and materials can emit: distinctive chemicals, sounds, electromagnetic waves and isotopes, or forms of the same element that have different numbers of neutrons, a subatomic building block." The Iranian crisis "could pose a big test of how far that technology has come. … At a minimum, the crisis is putting more pressure on intelligence agencies to find out if Iran harbors secret nuclear sites. And after Iraq, there is huge pressure to get it right."

Firms Sever Iran Links. In a related story, the Wall Street Journal (1/31, Simpson, Wilke, 2.11M) reports, "Some of the world's largest finance and energy companies are severing ties with Iran, amid US probes into their compliance with American sanctions and as the possibility of UN action grows closer. Banks UBS AG of Switzerland and ABN Amro Holding NV of the Netherlands disclosed in recent weeks that they have broken off work with Iran, following the lead of Houston energy-services company Halliburton Co. a year ago. All three are subjects of US Justice Department inquiries into whether they violated sanctions laws, lawyers and others familiar with the inquiries say. Also under investigation but still doing business with Iran are HSBC Holdings PLC, Standard Chartered PLC and BNP Paribas, those people say. Also pulling out of Iranian business in recent months, though not being investigated regarding compliance with sanctions, are Swiss bank Credit Suisse Group, energy firms Baker Hughes Inc., ConocoPhillips of Houston and BP PLC of London, Chicago insurance broker AON Corp. and industrial conglomerate General Electric Co. of Fairfield, Conn."

Bush, Rice Say Hamas Must Renounce Violence, Accept Israel. In separate stories, the AP echoes comments Monday by both President Bush and Secretary Rice that the US would oppose a Hamas-led government in the Palestinian territories. The AP (1/31, Pickler) quotes Bush as saying: "The Hamas party has made it clear that they do not support the right of Israel. ... And I have made it clear that so long as that's their policy, that we will not support a Palestinian government made up of Hamas." In a separate story, the AP (1/31, Gearan) cites comments Rice made in London: "Everybody is saying exactly the same thing. ... There has got to be a peaceful road ahead. ... You cannot be on one hand dedicated to peace and on the other dedicated to violence. Those two things are irreconcilable." The Washington Times (1/31, Sammon, 90K) quotes Bush saying, "We will not support a Palestinian government made up of Hamas."

In a related story, Bloomberg (1/31, Zacharia) reports, "The US, European Union, United Nations and Russia said Hamas officials must form a Palestinian government that accepts Israel's existence or risk a cutoff of international aid. The diplomatic group, known as the Quartet, threatened late yesterday in London to review all aid should Hamas maintain its violent opposition and refusal to endorse peace efforts." The Washington Post (1/31, A14, Sullivan, 744K) reports US "officials said they viewed the statement by the quartet as a clear international warning to Hamas a day before President Bush gives his State of the Union address. The statement also appeared to represent a compromise between U.S. officials and their European counterparts, who had been publicly skeptical of the hard-line approach advocated recently by Rice and Bush."

The Financial Times (1/31, Dombey, Morris, Khalaf) reports, "Monday night's declaration was the first attempt to present a united international front after Hamas's victory but there are likely to be differences between the US and the EU over funding and contacts with the new administration. European diplomats believe that, despite having set out basic principles for Hamas to meet, they can still find mechanisms for delivering funding, while the US maintains a tougher line." The Times adds, "Privately, EU officials said their freedom of manoeuvre was limited by the PA's deep financial problems and the risk that greater isolation would only further radicalise the militant group."

USA Today (1/31, Stinson, 2.31M) runs a similar report under the headline "Hamas Warned: Cash Could Be Cut Off," while the Wall Street Journal (1/31, King, 2.11M) headlines its story "Group Sets Conditions On Aid To Palestinians."

Meanwhile, the Washington Times (1/31, Martin, 90K) reports, "Hamas will not alter its charter calling for Israel's destruction despite US, European and UN demands." Hamas, "fresh from a dominating win in last week's Palestinian parliamentary vote, also said moves by Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas to seize authority over all four security services are illegal and will be tackled once a new government is formed."

The Christian Science Monitor (1/31, Prusher, 61K) runs a story titled "After Victory, Hamas Faces Money Crunch," saying Hamas "now faces a far more challenging campaign: a fight to keep the international donor community, which has kept the Palestinian Authority (PA) functioning since 1994, from cutting off funding." The Wall Street Journal (1/31, Leggett, 2.11M) also says that "for nearly a decade, the Palestinian Authority has leaned heavily on donations from Western governments to stay afloat." But "with that lifeline threatened by Hamas's electoral victory, it remains to be seen where its quasigovernment will get the money to survive."

PBS' NewsHour (1/30, Lehrer) reported Hamas "urged the world today not to cut off aid to the Palestinian Authority. … If by Wednesday the quartet hasn't paid $69 million, Palestinian civil servants won't be paid this month." PBS' Margaret Warner went on to report, "There is one point on which the rival players in Gaza and here in the West Bank seem to agree: The Palestinians' dependence on foreign aid does give the West a big stick against Hamas, but it would be counterproductive for the West to use it yet. The stick is large because of the intense economic crisis in the Palestinian territories, with debris-filled beaches and trash-filled empty lots, and legions of jobless men. The deficit-ridden Palestinian government desperately needs an injection of cash just to pay this month's salaries to 135,000 government workers and security forces. … Remarkably, even Israeli officials, as alarmed as they are by the election of a terrorist organization next door, are advising their global partners to go slow on aid cuts for now." Tzahi Hanegbi Israel's minister for strategic affairs, was shown saying, "We're talking about people. They need medicines, they need food; they need their ordinary life. So I would say that in order to emphasize the resolve of the international community, it has to be at the beginning with diplomatic issues, and not right away with financial sanctions."

Abbas Asks International Community Not To Cut Funds. In a related story, AFP (1/31) reports, "Palestinian leader Mahmud Abbas and Hamas both urged the international community not to cut off funding as part of efforts to force change on the Islamists after their election win. As European foreign ministers and the key players in the Middle East peace process insisted Hamas renounce violence, the moderate Palestinian Authority president and the hardliners of Hamas said a cessation of funding would only hurt the impoverished people of Gaza and the West Bank." The New York Times (1/31, Myre, 1.19M) adds Abbas "denied reports that he was considering resigning and said he remained committed to peace talks with Israel." But "it is not clear how he will pursue them when Hamas, which has always rejected talks, will control the government." The Washington Times (1/31, Kralev, 90K) also reports the story.

Fatah Resists Coalition Sought By Hamas, Israel. PBS' NewsHour (1/30, Warner) reported that Fatah's Saeb Erekat, the Palestinians' chief negotiator with Israel, "sounds eager to go into opposition to Hamas if it sticks with its vow to destroy Israel and create an Islamic state." Erekat said, "We will not be part of this government. We will be in opposition. And each week, we will demand from Hamas jobs, electricity, water, services, to expose corruption and the rule of law. We will have a demonstration each week to demand better services for our people." Tzahi Hanegbi, Israel's minister for strategic affairs, was shown saying, "Mahmoud Abbas cannot have relevancy if his government is going to be a Hamas government. This is the tragedy of the election results. Mahmoud Abbas was elected in another campaign as a president. And he has his authorities. But if the legislative council would elect a Hamas government, it would be the end of our dialogue with the Palestinian Authority." PBS added, "Hamas leaders are floating one idea to get unstuck. They suggest that the Palestinian Authority they're about to join concentrate on domestic matters, and return negotiations with Israel to the Palestine Liberation Organization, or PLO, an umbrella group to which Hamas does not belong."

Meanwhile, the Washington Times (1/31, Li, 90K) reports, "A leading Palestinian pollster says Hamas' victory in Palestinian elections last week had less to do with the militant group's hard-line posture toward Israel than with voter anger against the long-ruling Fatah party founded by Yasser Arafat. Voters 'didn't just want to hurt Fatah. They wanted to defeat it,' said Khalil Shikaki, director of the Palestinian Center for Policy and Survey Research." The pollster added, "The only group that can defeat Fatah is Hamas. So they voted for Hamas."

Hamas Official Appeals To "American People's Sense Of Fairness." Mousa Abu Marzook, deputy political bureau chief of the Islamic Resistance Movement (Hamas), writes in the Washington Post (1/31, A17, 744K), "A new era in the struggle for Palestinian liberation is upon us. Through historic fair and free elections, the Palestinian people have spoken. Accordingly, America's long-standing tradition of supporting the oppressed's rights to self-determination should not waver." The United States, the European Union "and the rest of the world should welcome the unfolding of the democratic process, and the commitment to aid should not falter. Last week's victory of the Change and Reform Party in the Palestinian legislative elections signals a new hope for an occupied people. The results of these elections reflect a need for change from the corruption and intransigence of the past government." Marzook adds, "We appeal to the American people's sense of fairness to judge this conflict in light of the great thoughts, principles and ideals you hold dear in the Declaration of Independence, the Constitution and the democracy you have built. … Meaningful democracy cannot flourish as long as an external force maintains the balance of power. It is the right of all people to pursue their own destiny."

Israeli Army Prepares To Evict Squatters In Hebron. The New York Times (1/31, Kraft, 1.19M) reports nine Jewish families "have been squatting illegally in a Palestinian fruit and vegetable market here [Hebron], embarrassing the government. So Acting Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, who has expressed impatience with the settlers, decided to try to put an end to the affair. In what was apparently a deal with the government and the army, according to Israeli news media, the families have agreed to leave voluntarily on Tuesday morning, in exchange for a promise by Israel to speed up legal proceedings that might allow the state to expropriate the market from the city of Hebron and its owners and then rent it to other Israeli settlers. But the army is preparing for the deal to fall apart and for violence, Gen. Yair Naveh said. His troops are scheduled to demolish nine houses in an illegal outpost, Amona, later this week, following a court ruling."

Arabs Boycott Danish Products In Response To Cartoons Of Mohammad. The New York Times (1/31, Fattah, 1.19M) reports, "A long-running controversy over the publication of caricatures of the Muslim prophet Muhammad by a Danish newspaper boiled over in the past few days as a boycott brought sales of some Danish products to a halt in Arab countries across the Middle East, while Danish interests came under attack. … In recent days, Saudi Arabia and Libya have recalled their ambassadors to Denmark, protests have been staged in places like Dubai, where they are virtually unheard of, and Arab and multinational companies have placed ads in Middle Eastern newspapers to deny any connection to Danish companies. On Monday, Denmark called for its citizens in the Middle East to exercise extra vigilance. The Danish manufacturer, Arla Foods, which normally sells $1.5 million worth of dairy products a day in the region, announced that its sales there had come to a halt. And two of its employees in Saudi Arabia were beaten by angry customers."

EU Office In Gaza Stormed By Gunmen. The Washington Times/AP (1/31, Abu-Nasr) reports, "Protests over Danish caricatures of the prophet Muhammad escalated yesterday as gunmen seized an EU office in Gaza and Muslims appealed for a trade boycott of Danish products. Denmark called for its citizens in the Middle East to exercise vigilance."

New Director Expected To Reinvigorate Millennium Challenge Program. The Washington Post (1/31, A15, Fletcher, Blustein, 744K) reports, "After getting off to a painfully slow start, President Bush's signature foreign aid program is poised to begin ramping up the amount of money it spends on development projects in poor countries, according to its new chief executive -- who vows that the impact will be 'transformative.' John J. Danilovich, the former ambassador whom Bush installed as head of the Millennium Challenge Corp. in November, said the agency is adopting a new strategy to fulfill its mission of providing aid to well-governed nations. It will winnow recipients to a short list but intends to give them significantly bigger grants than those bestowed in previous programs." According to the Post, "the program has fallen well short of Bush's stated ambition. He envisioned spending $1.7 billion in 2004, $3.3 billion in 2005 and $5 billion per year thereafter. But the administration took two years just to set up the corporation, and even then problems impeded its progress."

Canadian Politicians Avoided US Consultants. In its "Players" column, Roll Call (1/31, Duran) reports, "Republicans may be thrilled that a Conservative is set to become prime minister of Canada but you will not find any GOP operatives bragging that they helped make it happen. While big-name American consultants such as James Carville or Ed Rollins trot the globe in search of new campaign adventures, they are not working in Canada these days. In fact, it's as if Canada has hung a 'no Americans need apply' sign out when it comes to federal elections, consultants north of the border say. … Michael Scroccaro of Sterling Communication in Toronto, Canada said the explanation for the shut-out of American consultants this election goes beyond a dislike of all things American. 'It was more the case of having an embarrassment of local talent,' said Scroccaro, who worked for the Tories. 'We recently had two parties merge — one of which has a long history of winning — and some of the most talented people in the game were suddenly available and on our team.' Scroccaro said the Canadian electorate does not respond as well to American-styled campaigns either."

Blair's Son To Begin Congressional Internship Today. The Washington Times (1/31, Pierce, 90K) reports in its "Inside Politics" column, "Euan Blair, eldest son of British Prime Minister Tony Blair, is scheduled to start a six-month stint today as an intern in the U.S. Congress. Young Mr. Blair, 22, will begin as an unpaid intern for Rep. David Dreier, California Republican and chairman of the House Rules Committee, and three months later he will join the staff of Rep. Jane Harman, California Democrat and ranking member on the House Intelligence Committee."

Violence, Detentions Precede Nepalese Elections. The New York Times (1/31, Sengupta, 1.19M) reports Nepalese King Gyanendra, "the man who sacked the government a year ago, calls for elections but jails political party leaders. The main political parties demand the restoration of democratic rights, but call on voters to boycott the polls. At least one mayoral candidate has been assassinated by suspected Maoist guerrillas. … So goes the prelude to municipal elections in this ancient Himalayan kingdom on the violent cusp of change. The elections, scheduled for Feb. 8, will be held a year after Gyanendra, the world's sole Hindu monarch, seized power in what he described as an effort to defeat the Maoists."

Georgian Leader Criticizes Russian Use Of Military Force. Nino Burdjanadze, Speaker of the Georgian Parliament, writes in a letter to the editor of the Wall Street Journal (1/31, 2.11M), "The world has noticed Russia's use of energy as a political weapon to pressure neighboring Western-oriented states. Now it appears that Russia does not intend to confine itself to energy to tame 'intractable' neighbors but contemplates a far more conventional and well-tried weapon -- the use of military force." The letter alleges that Russia supports "illegitimate separatist puppet regimes of Abkhazia and South Ossetia. Under the guise of 'peacekeeping' and 'mediation,' Russia has de facto annexed the territories." The letter says Georgia is committed to a peaceful resolution of the Abkhazia and South Ossetia situations and paints a "different Russia" that "reserves a right to use military force against neighbors to prevent geopolitical changes, uses energy to blackmail its democratic neighbors, and provides aid and comfort to illegal separatists outside its borders."

WPost Sees Russian Repression With "Cold War Overtones." The Washington Post (1/31, 744K) editorializes, "A grainy video purporting to show the activities of British spies; ominous talk of foreigners undermining the state; protests from the Moscow Helsinki Group -- can this really be Russia in 2006?" The Post notes that Russia's current campaign against human-rights groups has "distinct Cold War overtones." The Post says Russia has passed a law restricting NGOs' activities and that Russian media have accused other groups of links to alleged British spies. The Post compares this to charges leveled in 1975 and 1985, and concludes, "It seems history really does repeat itself, and while the second time may have the feel of farce, Moscow's repression may end no less tragically for its victims.""

Sudan's Transformation "Harder" Than Imagined. The New York Times (1/31, Lacey, 1.19M) reports that the recent African Union meeting "was supposed to have been Sudan's chance to shine. Shut off from the rest of the world for so long, Sudan's leaders are eager to attract outside investors and shed their pariah image. But the transformation has proved harder than anyone here imagined.." The Times analogizes Sudan's plight to the recently purchased, luxurious presidential yacht, which was delivered too late for the summit meeting and has been derided in the Sudanese media for its excessive price.

Bacon Calls For US To Press Darfur Issue In Security Council. In an op-ed in The New York Times (1/31, 1.19M), Kenneth Bacon, president of Refugees International, writes that when it assumes the presidency of the Security Council, the United States "could start by devoting itself to ending the violence in the Darfur region of western Sudan. … The last time the United States assumed the rotating presidency of the 15-member Security Council, … John C. Danforth, then the ambassador to the United Nations, brought the entire Security Council to Kenya to pressure the government in Khartoum and the insurgents in the south to end their 21-year civil war. The tactic worked." Bacon calls on US Ambassador John Bolton to "demand the release of an unpublished United Nations study listing those countries that ship weapons to rebels and Khartoum-backed militias. Then the Council should use this information to punish sanctions scofflaws." Bacon concludes that while the United States "has a vexing and inconsistent record on Sudan," the UN Security Council presidency offers "a chance to show the world that we can do more than just talk about genocide."

CAIR Protests Skit Making Light Of Hajj Tragedy. The Los Angeles Times (1/31, Muskal, 958K) reports, "A local radio personality and a group that says it is fighting to empower American Muslims have squared off over a provocative skit that featured a make-believe traffic reporter covering the hajj, where hundreds of pilgrims were crushed to death." Bill Handel, a morning radio host, "set off the furor when he broadcast the skit about a traffic reporter in a helicopter hovering over the hajj, the Muslim pilgrimage to Mecca, Saudi Arabia, that attracts about 3 million faithful each year. On Jan. 12, 363 pilgrims were killed in an accident that Saudi authorities blamed on the dynamics of the crowd. Last week, the Southern California office of the Council on American-Islamic Relations called on Handel and the station to apologize for the skit, which the group said poked fun at Muslims."

Career FSOs Seen As Likely To Stymie Rice's Repositioning Initiative. In a Washington Times (1/31, 90K) op-ed titled "Change at Foggy Bottom," Fred Gedrich, a foreign policy and national security analyst who served in the State Department from 1988 to 1997, and Ret. US Army Maj. Gen. Paul E. Vallely write that Secretary Rice's global personnel repositioning initiative "will surely stir the hornet's nest. Career Foreign Service Officers…have a notorious record in resisting change and the legitimacy of presidential and congressional control and direction. Some have been accused of purposely undermining President George W. Bush's global war on terror and national-security strategy." The authors say the Department "must play a vital role in confronting the enormous diplomatic and national-security challenges facing America" and "is the perfect instrument to carry out the president's vision of making the world more secure, free and prosperous for the benefit of Americans and the international community." However, Rice's "plans will likely encounter difficulty. Presidents and secretaries of state since [FDR] have learned that FSOs and the American Foreign Service Association, the sole bargaining agent for the 23,000 active and retired FSOs, are more apt to reject, rather than embrace, reform plans and the legitimacy of foreign-policy direction received from elected and appointed officials." Rice will meet resistance to her plan, the authors predict, "because FSOs thrive under the current system and firmly control the department's foreign policy apparatus and personnel systems. Career diplomats currently occupy powerful slots including undersecretary for political affairs and director general of the Foreign Service. … It's apparent to many outsiders that the department must make fundamental changes to the institution and culture and implement new strategies to effectively cope with daunting 21st-century national-security and foreign-policy challenges. It's about time the folks at Foggy Bottom realized it too."

WSJournal Says Wide Majority Of Chinese Favor Capitalism. The Wall Street Journal (1/31, 2.11M) editorializes, "In a poll conducted for the University of Maryland's Program on International Policy Attitudes between June and August last year, fully 74% of Chinese citizens said they agreed with the statement 'the free enterprise system and free market economy is the best system on which to base the future of the world.' … Remarkable, isn't it, that residents of the Middle Kingdom have maintained their appreciation of the benefits of free enterprise through six decades of oppression and economic backwardness imposed by their Communist cadres? … Mao would probably turn over in his glass case if he realized that the Chinese have rejected his teachings. But the harsh consequences those teachings imposed on his countrymen have been an education like no other. Nothing creates eager young capitalists quite like living under Communism."

NYTimes Encourages EU, US To Support Turkish Reform Efforts. The New York Times (1/31, 1.19M) editorializes, "The judge in the free-speech trial of the Turkish author Orhan Pamuk dismissed all charges last week, sparing Turkey further international scorn. But the case was thrown out on a technicality. Turkey still needs to change the repressive law under which Mr. Pamuk was arrested and drop similar cases against dozens of other lesser-known Turks. The most powerful motivation for making such changes has always been Turkey's desire to join the European Union. But public support for joining is now waning, down from a high of 85 percent to 65 percent recently. In part, that reflects a lingering bitterness over 11th-hour issues that tainted the start of Turkey's membership talks. … Turkey's prime minister, Recep Tayyip Erdogan, must convince his people not to give up on the reforms that precede union membership. And Washington and Brussels need to help him make the case."

The Morning Update

Tonight, President Bush will deliver his State of the Union address.
The President will discuss America's leadership in the world and share his vision to lead America forward. To seize opportunities here at home, the President will outline the policies needed for the American people to continue to compete in the global economy and for America to continue to lead.

9:01 pm: THE PRESIDENT delivers the State of the Union Address

EST United States Capitol | Washington, DC

From Today's Morning Headlines

Dan Bartlett Discusses The President's State Of The Union Address.
BARTLETT: "Well Harry, what the State of the Union provides is an opportunity to take a step back from the daily headlines and say what is the direction of our country, both here at home and abroad? No question about it, we're facing some big challenges, whether it be the fact that we're a Nation still at war, with an enemy determined to try to hurt the American people. And the fact that here at home we're dealing with some big issues, such as rising costs of energy and gas prices, as well as the cost of health care. And what President Bush is going to do is to really make a case that America always does best when America leads. And that means continuing taking the type of leadership role that is expected of us in the world that will mean more prosperity, more security for the American people. So, it's an optimistic agenda. No question there are challenges and he will address those challenges.
But, I think the public wants to see in their president is not somebody who looks at the challenges and becomes pessimistic but sees the opportunities and the potential that we have. So, it is an optimistic speech." (CBS' "The Early Show," 1/31/06)

Bipartisan Majority In Senate Reject Democratic-Led Filibuster Attempt.
"Republican senators, aided by 19 Democrats, cleared the path yesterday for Samuel A. Alito Jr. to join the Supreme Court and for President Bush to put his stamp firmly on the nine-member bench. The Senate voted 72 to 25 to end debate on Alito's nomination and to allow a roll call on his confirmation today, shortly before noon. Alito's supporters garnered a dozen more votes than the 60 they needed to choke off a Democratic filibuster effort, which would have allowed debate to continue indefinitely. ... 'I am pleased that a strong, bipartisan majority in the Senate decisively rejected attempts to obstruct and filibuster an up-or-down vote on Judge Sam Alito's nomination,' <http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2006/01/30/AR20060 13001021.html> Bush said in a statement. 'Judge Alito is extraordinarily well-qualified to serve on our nation's highest court.'" (Charles Babington, "Senate To Vote On Alito Today," The Washington Post, 1/31/06)

Consumer Spending And Personal Incomes Rise. "Consumers ended the year on a free-spending note, driving up car sales and other major purchases while sending the personal-savings rate to a 73-year low. Consumer spending, inflation adjusted, rose 0.9% to $80.2 billion in December, after a revised 0.5% in November, the Commerce Department said. ...
Pretax personal income rose 0.4% to $41.1 billion, matching a similar surge in November. <http://online.wsj.com/article/SB113862648695659891.html?mod=economy_lead_story_lsc> Wages and salaries, the largest component of personal income, grew 0.3% last month to $14.6 billion after a similar surge in November. Disposable or aftertax personal income increased 0.4% to $35.5 billion from the previous month's revised 0.4% increase." (Joi Preciphs, "Consumers Spent More In December As Savings Fell," The Wall Street Journal, 1/31/06)

Connecticut N.A.A.C.P. Sides With Bush Administration In Calling For End Of Lawsuit Against No Child Left Behind. "The Connecticut State N.A.A.C.P. wants to intervene in a lawsuit over the No Child Left Behind law on the side of the Bush administration. <http://www.nytimes.com/2006/01/31/nyregion/31schools.html> ... The civil rights organization, along with three students, filed a motion yesterday to intervene in a case that pits the State of Connecticut against the federal Department of Education. The state's lawsuit, filed last August, argues that the federal government has not sent Connecticut enough money to comply with the requirements in the education law. The Connecticut State Conference of N.A.A.C.P. Branches is requesting that the state's lawsuit be dismissed, describing it as a waste of state resources that could be used to reduce Connecticut's achievement gaps between white and minority students and between wealthy and poor students." (Avi Salzman, "N.A.A.C.P. Contests Connecticut Lawsuit," The New York Times, 1/31/06)

New U.S. Commander In Iraq Outlines His Strategy. "With a new general in charge, the U.S. military's plans to fight Iraq's insurgents are expected to emphasize improving Iraqis' quality of life, rather than killing or capturing guerrillas. Army Lt. Gen. Peter W. Chiarelli, who became commander of Multi-National Corps Iraq last week, said he would employ across Iraq many of the strategies he used to quell uprisings in Baghdad when he led the Army's 1st Cavalry Division in 2003 and 2004.
'It was not uncommon for the 1st Cavalry Division to be engaged in intense urban combat in one part of the city, while just a few blocks away we had units replacing damaged infrastructure, helping to foster small business growth, or facilitating the development of local government,' Chiarelli told The Associated Press in an e-mail. The goal, he said, is to 'deprive insurgents and terrorists of their support base' among disaffected Iraqis - part of a strategy that parallels U.S.

political overtures to the Sunni Arabs." (Jim Krane, "New U.S. Commander To Change Iraq Focus," The Associated Press, 1/31/06)

International Community Vows Support For Rebuilding Afghanistan. "Envoys from nearly 70 nations and international bodies vowed Tuesday to maintain the flow of support to Afghanistan, which is still plagued by violence and poverty more than four years after the fall of the Taliban.
Speaking at the start of a conference in London on the future of Afghanistan, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said the Bush administration planned to give the country $1.1 billion in aid in 2007 - a similar figure to what is promised this year. 'The transformation of Afghanistan is remarkable but incomplete,' Rice said. 'And it is essential that we all increase our support for the Afghan people.' British Prime Minister Tony Blair said seeing Afghanistan become a stable democracy 'is in the interests of the whole international community.'

The civil rights organization, along with three students, filed a motion yesterday to intervene in a case that pits the State of Connecticut against the federal Department of Education. The state's lawsuit, filed last August, argues that the federal government has not sent Connecticut enough money

The state's lawsuit, filed last August, argues that the federal government has not sent Connecticut enough money to comply with the requirements in the education law. The Connecticut State Conference of N.A.A.C.P. Branches is requesting that the state's lawsuit be dismissed, describing it as a waste of state resources that could be used to reduce Connecticut's achievement gaps between white and minority students and between wealthy and poor students." New U.S. Commander In Iraq Outlines His Strategy. "With a new general in charge, the U.S. military's plans to fight Iraq's insurgents are expected to emphasize improving Iraqis' quality of life, rather than killing or capturing guerrillas. Army Lt. Gen. Peter W. Chiarelli, who became commander of Multi-National Corps Iraq last week, said he would employ across Iraq many of the strategies he used to quell uprisings in Baghdad when he led the Army's 1st Cavalry Division in 2003 and 2004. 'It was not uncommon for the 1st Cavalry Division to be engaged in intense urban combat in one part of the city, while just a few blocks away we had units replacing damaged infrastructure, helping to foster small business growth, or facilitating the development of local government,' Chiarelli told The Associated Press in an e-mail. The goal, he said, is to 'deprive insurgents and terrorists of their support base' among disaffected Iraqis – part of a strategy that parallels U.S. political overtures to the Sunni Arabs." (Jim Krane, "New U.S. Commander To Change Iraq Focus," The Associated Press, 1/31/06)

International Community Vows Support For Rebuilding Afghanistan. "Envoys from nearly 70 nations and international bodies vowed Tuesday to maintain the flow of support to Afghanistan, which is still plagued by violence and poverty more than four years after the fall of the Taliban. Speaking at the start of a conference in London on the future of Afghanistan, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said the Bush administration planned to give the country $1.1 billion in aid in 2007 – a similar figure to what is promised this year. 'The transformation of Afghanistan is remarkable but incomplete,' Rice said. 'And it is essential that we all increase our support for the Afghan people.' British Prime Minister Tony Blair said seeing Afghanistan become a stable democracy 'is in the interests of the whole international community.' The two-day meeting, also attended by U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan and Afghan President Hamid Karzai, is expected to produce a five-year blueprint for Afghanistan's security, economic development and counter-narcotic efforts." President Congratulates Judge Alito on Senate Confirmation

I am pleased that the Senate has voted to confirm Judge Sam Alito as the 110th Justice of the Supreme Court. Sam Alito is a brilliant and fair-minded judge who strictly interprets the Constitution and laws and does not legislate from the bench. He is a man of deep character and integrity, and he will make all Americans proud as a Justice on our highest court. The son of an Italian immigrant, Judge Alito's appointment to the Supreme Court is the realization of the American dream for this good man and his family. I congratulate Judge Alito, his wife Martha, the Alito children, and Judge Alito's mother Rose on this historic achievement and momentous day in the life of our country.

7-2-515h.html> Judge Alito replaces Justice Sandra Day O'Connor.
Justice O'Connor was the first woman ever to sit on the Supreme Court, and she is one of the most admired Americans of our time, or any time.
Our Nation is grateful to Justice O'Connor for her extraordinary and dedicated public service, and Laura and I wish her and John all the best.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Civil Liberties Group Sues AT&T For Cooperating With NSA Surveillance. The New York Times (2/1, 1.19M) reports, "The Electronic Frontier Foundation, a civil liberties organization, filed a class-action suit against AT&T on Tuesday in federal court…saying the company was violating the law and customers' privacy in cooperating with the National Security Agency on computerized surveillance. … In its suit, the foundation says the company has allowed the agency direct access to phone calls and Internet data moving over its network, as well as access to a vast database of call records." EFF attorney Kevin Bankston "said the group was not at liberty to say how it knew that the company and the spy agency were cooperating, but said it was confident that there was an illegal relationship."

The Los Angeles Times (2/1, Menn, 958K) adds, "The suit cites newspaper articles, including one by the New York Times, for disclosing the eavesdropping program aimed at terrorist communications with sympathizers and others inside the United States. Also cited was a Los Angeles Times report that the National Security Agency had access to an AT&T database tracking calling records."

CNN's The Situation Room (1/31, Tatton) noted that "everyone affected could receive $21,000 or more. … Now, we have seen lawsuits before from organizations like the ACLU, targeting the government on the NSA program. This one specifically looks at…AT&T on behalf of the customers."

Waters Calls For Bush Impeachment Over NSA Program. Fox News' Special Report (1/31, Garrett) reported, "Today eight-term California Democrat Maxine Waters said the President should be impeached for authorizing the warrantless surveillance of Americans."

Feingold Says Gonzales Misled Congress About Warrantless Wiretaps. CNN's The Situation Room (1/31, Arena) reported, "Sen. Russ Feingold is accusing the Attorney General of misleading Congress during his confirmation hearings last year, when he was asked about warrantless wiretaps. … Feingold, who wasn't briefed about the program, says he wants an explanation." Feingold: "The chief law enforcement officer of this country apparently told the committee under oath that something was merely hypothetical, when in fact he knew very well and was involved in it, actually being an ongoing practice.'" CNN added, "Justice Department officials say that there was nothing misleading about Gonzales' statement and that the President is on firm legal ground. Gonzales is scheduled to testify all day Monday."

Senate Seen As Pulling Back On Deference To Bush Over War Powers. The Christian Science Monitor (2/1, Chaddock, 61K) reports, "Since 9/11, the Bush White House has moved aggressively to expand presidential power in wartime, at the expense of Congress. Until recently, the Republican-controlled Congress went along. … But that deference may be ending." With the NSA surveillance program hearings and the Patriot Act renewal, "the Senate, especially, is gearing up to make the case that power between the executive and legislative branches is unbalanced." The Monitor notes, "The issue is looming so large that the White House devoted a full week in the run-up to this week's State of the Union Address to defuse the issue. Instead of 'domestic spying' -- the term used most often in the press -- the White House described the program as 'terrorist surveillance.' Recent communication from" Ayman al-Zawahiri "appeared to reinforce the threat."

Moussaoui's Mother Calls For Fair Sentencing. The AP (2/1, Devailly) reports, "The mother of Zacarias Moussaoui…said Tuesday she wants her son judged for his actions -- not because he is Arab or an Islamist. Aicha El Wafi's lawyer, Patrick Baudouin, appealed to the U.S. justice system not to 'make a martyr'" of Moussaoui. El Wafi "said she plans to go to the United States on March 6, when testimony is to start in the penalty phase of her son's trial." The AP notes, "Prosecutors will try to convince jurors that the FBI would have prevented the Sept. 11 attacks if Moussaoui had told federal agents what he knew about al-Qaida's desire to fly planes into U.S. buildings."

UK Judge Warns Jurors Al Masri Not On Trial For Political Views. BBC (1/31) reports on its Web site, "Alleged race hate cleric Abu Hamza al-Masri is not on trial for his political views, a judge has warned. Starting his summing up, Mr Justice Hughes said Mr Abu Hamza's views were only relevant in deciding if they led him to commit the charges he faced. He told the Old Bailey jury: 'It is not an offence to suggest western societies are corrupt or have no moral basis'. … He also told the jury to 'Keep an eye on the ball' regarding Mr Hamza's views. 'Exercise a similar restraint and caution about his views generally. Confine your inquiries to whether or not he has committed the offences on which he is charged,' he said."

PATRIOT ACT:

Congress Set To Extend Patriot Act Temporarily Until March. The AP (2/1, Kellman) reports, "Congress is poised to extend the USA Patriot Act into March to give the White House and conservative Senate Republicans time to strike a deal that would strengthen civil liberties without weakening the war on terror. When in March was still up in the air late Tuesday. The House is set to vote Wednesday on extending the law until March 14," but "Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist was pushing for a vote earlier in the month." The AP notes, "Objections to the compromise last fall centered on the degree to which people and institutions that receive National Security Letters…can appeal them in court." However, Sens. Larry Craig and John Sununu say that "six weeks might be enough to strike a deal on the matter with the White House." In its "Washington Wire" column on its web site, the Wall Street Journal (1/31, 2.11M) reported, "President Bush again pushes Congress to renew the Patriot Act, but only another short-term extension appears to be in sight."

The San Francisco Chronicle (1/31, A4, Epstein) reports that the controversy of the NSA surveillance program may complicate the Patriot Act renewal and notes, "The wrangling in the latest version has narrowed to disagreement over how to curb the FBI's access to Americans' library, bookstore, business or Internet records for terrorist investigations; what rights the targets of so-called national security letters have in appealing such orders for information; and how long after agents conduct secret searches must they notify their target."

Conference Report Contains Non-Terror Law-And-Order Provisions. Knight Ridder (2/1, Kuhnhenn) reports that "tucked away in the pending renewal of the Patriot Act -- the nation's controversial law to fight terrorism -- is a provision" inserted by Sen. Jon Kyl "that could make it harder for state death-row inmates to appeal their cases in federal court. The provision is one of a handful that neither the House of Representatives nor the Senate has voted on but which Republican lawmakers crafted during closed-door negotiations last year after Democrats had been excluded from the talks. Another obscure addition, never debated in Congress, would broaden existing laws that prohibit disturbances at any event -- such as those involving the president -- at which the Secret Service is providing protection. Civil libertarians say it could restrict free-speech rights in the name of security."

More Commentary. Investor's Business Daily (2/1) editorializes, "With the Feb. 3 deadline for renewing the Patriot Act looming, kicking the can down the road again is not an option. Had it been in place on Sept. 10, 2001, Sept. 11 might not have happened." IBD continues, "If your house were on fire, and firemen had to kick your door down and break a few windows to save you and your family, would you consider that an invasion of your privacy or a violation of your civil liberties? … Yet that is precisely the attitude Senate Democrats take regarding the Patriot Act despite evidence that it has infringed on no one's rights, except perhaps on the freedom of terrorists to plot mass murder undetected and unmolested." IBD adds, "When Sen. Harry Reid successfully led a Dec. 16 filibuster blocking reauthorization, he reportedly bragged: 'We killed the Patriot Act.' If he and his colleagues prevail in blocking its renewal, or succeed in gutting its effective provisions, that may be the epitaph on the tombstones of Americans killed in the next attack."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

New Hampshire Stores Report "Middle Eastern-Looking Men" Seeking Trac Phones. The Portsmouth (NH) Herald (1/31, Dinan) reports Portsmouth police "are investigating two reports about 'Middle Eastern-looking men' buying quantities of 'trac phones' at city stores Saturday." At "unnamed Woodbury Avenue store," 15 of the phones were sold "to the men, according to the city's public police log. The purchase was made by credit card, and the information was forwarded by Portsmouth police to Newington and state police." Two hours later, "local police received information that the Boston office of the Federal Bureau of Investigation received a call from a Wal-Mart customer reporting 'two Middle-Eastern men' who reportedly approached the store manager, asking to buy 500 to 600 trac phones. When they were told the store did not have that many on hand, they left the store, then the area in a car with Massachusetts plates, says the city police log."

GAO Report Offers "Blunt" Criticism Of Federal Response To Katrina. Knight Ridder (2/1, Borenstein) reports, "Despite ample warning of an impending catastrophe, the federal government bungled its response to Hurricane Katrina because of a void of leadership and confusion about who was in charge, an independent investigation ordered by Congress has found. The Government Accountability Office, the investigatory arm of Congress, in a preliminary report to be released Wednesday faulted Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff and his designee, former Federal Emergency Management Agency chief Michael Brown, for not filling a crucial 'leadership role during Hurricane Katrina.'" KRT adds that "the GAO's conclusion is striking for its bluntness. 'No one was designated in advance to lead the overall federal response in anticipation of the event despite clear warnings from the National Hurricane Center,' GAO Comptroller General David M. Walker's prepared remarks read. The speech faults the federal government, saying it 'did not act decisively or quickly enough.'"

Louisiana Officials Acknowledge Failures In Wake Of Katrina. The New York Times (2/1, Lipton, 1.19M) reports, "Government complacency, poor planning and dereliction of duty during Hurricane Katrina contributed to the deaths of dozens of the frail and sick in New Orleans, and to the suffering of many others who were stranded in area hospitals and nursing homes unable to care for them, Senate investigators said Tuesday. In the second day of Senate hearings on the hurricane response, the focus was on what investigators called perhaps the most outrageous chapter of the storm: the mistreatment of nursing home and hospital patients during the disaster." Officials from the State of Louisiana, the City of New Orleans and the state association of nursing homes "acknowledged a long list of failures that meant there was no coordinated or tested plan in place to evacuate the frail, sick or poor, though studies had warned for more than a decade that an estimated 100,000 New Orleans residents without transportation would need such help in a major hurricane."

USA Today (2/1, Hall, 2.31M) reports "Bradberry acknowledged that although the Louisiana Office of Homeland Security required him to develop evacuation plans, he didn't agree with the assignment. Among the reasons he cited for not drawing up plans was a lack of resources the state needed to carry out the evacuations. Senate Homeland Security Committee Chairwoman Susan Collins, R-Maine, called it 'inconceivable' that officials didn't make it a priority to save nursing home and hospital patients. At least 200 died." Sen. Joe Lieberman said, "I don't feel that you've acknowledged enough responsibility here."

The Los Angeles Times (2/1, Neuman, 958K) "In hearings before the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee this week, witnesses offered instances in which good intentions went awry and bureaucratic inertia stymied recovery efforts in the aftermath of the storm." The Times adds, "Throughout the hearings, witnesses underscored the costly consequences of a lack of central command and breakdowns in communication." Meanwhile, "The Bush White House has refused to provide key documents or allow administration officials to testify, asserting executive privilege. Collins has accused the White House of crippling the inquiry."

Independent Investigators Granted Access To Site Of Levee Breach. The New York Times (2/1, Schwartz, 1.19M) reports, "It took a special agent of the Louisiana state attorney general's office and some bureaucratic sparring, but members of an independent team of engineering investigators won access on Tuesday to the site of a major levee breach from the Army Corps of Engineers. It is unusual for engineers to bring law enforcement agents to job sites, but the investigators said they wanted to ensure access to the levee at the 17th Street Canal in the face of what they contend is a pattern of resistance by the engineering corps." The investigators say the corps "has also refused to release information needed to fully understand the levee failures that left so much of New Orleans shattered and soaked." Meanwhile, "Corps officials have suggested that [the] group is eager to jump to conclusions about causes of the levee breaches, and complained that the teams sometimes show up at work sites unannounced."

WAR NEWS:

US Renews Commitment To Afghanistan Aid. The Financial Times (2/1, Morarjee) reports, "The US will lead the world in a renewed commitment to Afghanistan's battle against narcotics and a resurgent Taliban." US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said, "For us, it is a strategic partnership." British Prime Minister Tony Blair "also pledged $800m in aid in the next five years." The New York Times (2/1, Cowell, 1.19M) says the Administration "pledged Tuesday to seek Congressional approval for a further $1.1 billion in aid to help rebuild Afghanistan next year, roughly the same amount sought for 2006." A conference on future aid to Afghanistan "agreed on what it called the Afghanistan Compact, a five-year blueprint to restore the country's security, build a functioning economy and counter the rapidly expanding narcotics trade." It "is intended as a successor to an agreement reached in 2001 after the overthrow of the radical Islamic Taliban government."

The Washington Times (2/1, Kralev, 90K) quotes Rice saying, "In addition to our current commitment of nearly $6 billion, today, I'm proud to announce that President Bush will ask our Congress for $1.1 billion in new assistance to support the Afghan people in the next year."

Karzai Unveils Five-Year Plan To Strengthen Democracy. The Washington Post (2/1, A19, Sullivan, Witte, 744K) reports, "Diplomats from more than 60 countries began pledging aid and investment for Afghanistan at a conference here Tuesday, as President Hamid Karzai outlined a five-year plan," called the Afghan Compact, "to strengthen democratic institutions and combat terrorism and drug-trafficking in his struggling nation." Karzai "listed his country's successes," noting "that the country has a constitution and an elected president and parliament. He said that 6 million children are now attending schools in a system that was totally collapsed and that economic output has grown by 85 percent." Yet "Afghanistan remains a place of staggering illiteracy, with a massive gap between a comfortable elite and millions of poor. A flourishing illegal poppy trade supplies more than 87 percent of the world's opium. Karzai acknowledged that 'we have a long road ahead.'" And for "ordinary Afghans, there was little awareness Tuesday that the conference was taking place."

Dutch Lawmakers Question Military Commitment To Afghanistan. Lousewies van der Laan and Bert Bakker, members of the Democrats 66 party in the Dutch parliament, in an op-ed in the Financial Times (2/1) write, "On Thursday, the Dutch parliament will debate whether the Netherlands should expand its military presence in Afghanistan. The country currently participates in the Nato reconstruction mission in the north of the country with 368 troops and more than 250 Dutch special forces fight in Operation Enduring Freedom in Kandahar in the south. This makes the Netherlands the seventh largest contributor to Nato's International Security Assistance Force, ahead of 19 other Nato members." Yet the "tone of the debate is one of 'you are either with us or against us'. … A substantial debate on command structures, evacuation plans and respect for human rights should replace threats about the loss of credibility and influence. That will require a mature debate about the future of Nato, as well as the world's long-term commitment to Afghanistan. The time for that debate is now."

Afghan Ambassador To US Alleges Bias In DC Against His Compatriots. The Washington Times (2/1, McElhatton, 90K) reports, "Afghanistan's ambassador to the United States wants the Washington Metropolitan Airports Authority to investigate complaints from Washington Flyer cabdrivers about what he called 'racial and Muslim profiling.'" The Times adds, "Some Afghan-American drivers are upset about 'having been discriminated against' in dealings with the Washington Dulles International Airport taxi concessions operator, Ambassador Said Tayeb Jawad wrote in a letter Monday to airport officials"

Rice Says Everything Possible Being Done To Secure Release Of US Hostage In Iraq.

The AP (2/1, Reid) notes, "U.S. officials said they have ruled out meeting the kidnappers' demand to release all Iraqi women in detention." Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said, "Everything is being done to work with those who might have influence, and there are an awful lot of people who are calling for her release."

Kidnappers Threaten To Kill German Hostages In Video. The AP (2/1, Reid) reports that "a new video from kidnappers threatened to kill two German hostages if Germany fails to stop cooperating with the Iraqi government." The AP continues, "Kidnappers threatened to kill Thomas Nitzschke and Rene Braeunlich if Germany does not close its embassy in Iraq, withdraw all the German companies from Iraq and stop cooperating with the Iraqi government within three days."

Reuters (2/1) adds, "A new tape of the hostages showed them next to masked individuals who pointed automatic rifles at them. It was dated January 29."

Eleven Men Found Tortured, Slain In Insurgent Stronghold In Iraq.

The New York Times (2/1, Worth, 1.19M) notes, "The bodies of 11 young men, some of them shot repeatedly and bearing marks of torture, were found in a minibus on Tuesday in western Baghdad, Interior Ministry officials said." They "were found near Ghazaliya, an insurgent stronghold where Iraqi security forces have been accused of detaining, torturing and killing groups of Sunni Arab men in the past. But the 11 bodies were not immediately identified, and no group stepped forward either to take responsibility for or to denounce the killings."

Local Officials Among Victims In Scattered Attacks Across Iraq. The New York Times (2/1, Worth, 1.19M) in its article on the latest violence in Iraq reports that "scattered attacks took place across central and southern Iraq. In the Dawra district of southern Baghdad, gunmen opened fire on a car carrying two members of the Dawra district council, killing them both, the local police and witnesses said." And in "western Baghdad, gunmen shot and killed Malik Razoki Abd, the leader of another district council." Local officials "in Mahmudiya, south of the capital, said an American aircraft fired a missile that damaged three houses and wounded three civilians. But American military officials said they had no report of an airstrike. The Iraqi Interior Ministry reported two different incidents in Mahmudiya: a roadside bombing and a mortar attack on a house. The attacks left four civilians wounded, the officials said."

The AP (2/1, Reid) reports, "On Wednesday, a bomb exploded alongside a group of Iraqi men waiting for work in eastern Baghdad on Wednesday, killing at least eight and wounding more than 50, police said." The AP notes, "Sunni Arab and Shiites extremists have been carrying out reprisal killings that have claimed hundreds of lives and sharpened sectarian tensions as Iraqi politicians try to form a new government after Dec. 15 national elections. The killings come at a time when U.S. officials are pushing the Iraqis to include more Sunni Arabs, who form the backbone of the insurgency."

Poll Shows Sunnis Reject New Government, Support Attacks Against US Soldiers. The Washington Times (2/1, Sands, 90K) reports a poll of 1,150 Iraqis conducted Jan. 2 to Jan. 5 (+/- 3%) shows, "Iraq's restive Sunni Arabs overwhelmingly reject the legitimacy of the new government in Baghdad, approve of attacks on U.S.-led forces and think the country is heading in the wrong direction." The "major new" poll, "conducted in the first week of January after the successful Dec. 15 parliamentary vote, found that Iraq's Shi'ite Arabs and ethnic Kurds remain far more optimistic about the country's future compared with the minority Sunnis, who dominated Iraq under Saddam Hussein." It "offered both good and bad news for the Bush administration. The Dec. 15 vote produced a spike of optimism among Iraqi Shi'ites and Kurds, while Sunnis continue to reject the legitimacy of the new government being formed in Baghdad."

Death Toll For British Soldiers In Iraq Reaches 100. The AP (2/1) reports, "A British soldier was killed in a roadside bombing Tuesday, the second member of the country's armed forces to die in Iraq in as many days and the 100th fatality since the conflict began nearly three years ago, officials said." The New York Times (2/1, Worth, 1.19M) in its article on the latest violence in Iraq notes, "Southern Iraq has generally been much more peaceful than other areas, but in recent months tensions have grown between the British and the Shiite militia members. A rising number of soldiers have been killed and wounded in roadside bombings, and Basra's provincial governor, Muhammad al-Waeli, has twice threatened to cease cooperating with British forces after they detained groups of Iraqis."

Bloomberg (2/1) adds, "A total of 77 members of the U.K. forces have been killed in action and 23 have died from illness, non-combat injuries, accidents or unknown causes, the ministry said on its Web site. About 230 soldiers were injured in combat, the spokesman said."

Foreign Minister Denies Report Japan Would Complete Troop Withdrawal In May. The AP (2/1, Reid) reports, "Japan's Kyodo News agency said Tokyo will begin withdrawing troops from Iraq in March and complete the pullout by May, ending its largest military mission since World War II. Japanese Foreign Minister Taro Aso denied the report, saying no specific timetable had been discussed." The AP adds, "Kyodo said an agreement on the timetable had been reached during a secret meeting among officials from Australia, Britain, Japan and the United States." But a British Ministry of Defense spokesman "said he was unaware of such a meeting but that London speaks to its coalition partners frequently."

Saddam Trial To Resume Despite Absence Of Defense Lawyers. The New York Times (2/1, Worth, 1.19M) in its article on the latest violence in Iraq notes, "Court officials announced Tuesday that the trial of Saddam Hussein would resume Wednesday, though it was not clear who would be in the courtroom. Mr. Hussein's chief lawyer, Khalil al-Dulaimi, said he and the rest of the defense team would not return after they walked out in protest on Sunday." But new chief judge Raouf Abdel-Rahman "may not allow them back in even if they want to return. Judge Abdel-Rahman ejected Mr. Hussein and the other three lead defendants from the courtroom on Sunday, and it will be up to him to bring them back or not."

Kurds Attempt To Block Spread Of Avian Flu. The New York Times (2/1, Oppel, 1.19M) reports, "Urging villagers in the border areas to cull their poultry was one tactic Kurdish authorities adopted to try to prevent bird flu from spreading south from Turkey, after an outbreak was reported there in December." Officials "also outlawed the sale of live chickens in many places and banned the import of poultry raised or processed in Turkey. Vehicles crossing the border are now sprayed with disinfectant in case they have traces of bird feces, while passengers and drivers are checked for symptoms." But "given the close commercial ties to Turkey and the prevalence of chickens in the villages, where eggs are a crucial source of food and income, public health experts had warned it was only a matter of time before the disease spread."

Australia Blocks US Inquiry Into Oil-For-Food Scandal. Bloomberg (2/1, Daley) reports, "Foreign Minister Alexander Downer said Australia opposed a U.S. congressional inquiry into allegations AWB Ltd., the nation's monopoly wheat exporter, paid kickbacks to Saddam Hussein's former Iraqi regime." Downer said, "We were concerned an American congressional or senate inquiry would be an inquiry driven substantially by American commercial interests. … The U.S. is our principal competitor on the international wheat trade."

ABC Reporters Wounded In Iraq Arrive In US For Treatment. The New York Times (2/1, Landler, 1.19M) reports, "The ABC News anchor and cameraman wounded in a roadside bombing in Iraq arrived Tuesday night at the National Naval Medical Center in Bethesda, Md., after a brief stay at a military hospital in Germany." One "doctor who treated both of them in Germany said Tuesday that the men had made 'remarkable' progress since being admitted there Monday. The anchor, Bob Woodruff, has been able to move his fingers and toes, said the doctor, Lt. Col. Guillermo Tellez, the chief of surgery at Landstuhl Regional Medical Center."

Wounded Veterans Face Lifetime Of Recovery. The CBS Evening News (1/31, story 9, 2:45, Schieffer) reported, "With the number of wounded in Iraq and Afghanistan now topping 16,000, we wanted to know how the government is treating these heroes when they return home." CBS (Martin) added, "Walk into the physical therapy room at Walter Reed Army Medical Center and you know this is a nation at war. No matter how many times you come here, there's no getting used to so many young Americans missing so many limbs." And "Whether they're in the VA system or at Walter Reed, the casualties of Iraq will be fighting this war for the rest of their lives."

50,000 US Troops Have Been Retained Under "Stop Loss" Policy. The Christian Science Monitor (2/1, Regan, 61K) reports in its "Terrorism and Security" column, "'Stop-loss,' a policy used by the Army to keep US soldiers and reservists in the military beyond the date when their service was supposed to end, has been used on more than 50,000 members of the armed forces since the war in Iraq began. Currently stop-loss is being used to extend the duty of 12,500 troops. Reuters reports that the measure applies to units about to deploy to Afghanistan or Iraq. Under the policy, soldiers who normally would leave when their commitments expire must remain in the Army, starting 90 days before their unit is scheduled to depart, through the end of their deployment and up to another 90 days after returning to their home base. With yearlong tours in Iraq and Afghanistan, some soldiers can be forced to stay in the Army an extra 18 months. The military argues that it is a necessary step to preserve the cohesive nature of a unit, especially one ready to fight, and courts have backed the military so far in any challenges against the policy. But critics say it is just another illustration of how stretched out the US Army and reserves have become, and that could undercut increased effort to attract new recruits."

Massachusetts National Guard Soldiers File Lawsuit To Recoup Costs. The Christian Science Monitor (2/1, Llana, 61K) reports, "After 9/11, hundreds of thousands of America's part-time soldiers answered the call to serve. Along the way, some have asked whether the costs they bear -- from insufficient body armor to mounting debt for their families at home -- is fair." But Massachusetts National Guard soldiers "have filed a class-action lawsuit claiming they are owed $73 million in food, lodging, and commuting expenses they paid out-of-pocket while activated under state orders to protect sites such as military bases and reservoirs from terrorist attacks." It "is believed to be the first of its kind nationally, and raises new questions about what the government owes its men and women in uniform."

Proposal To Disperse Special Ops Oversight Could Face Congressional Opposition. The Hill (2/1, Tiron) reports, "A Bush administration proposal to fold a civilian office tasked with oversight of the Pentagon's special-operations forces could face stiff resistance in Congress." According to Hill sources, "Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld is considering a proposal to eliminate the office of the assistant secretary of defense for special operations and low-intensity conflict (ASD SO/LIC) and spreading its responsibilities across other Pentagon offices." If Rumsfeld "agrees to the idea, the Pentagon would face an uphill battle in getting the plan endorsed by Congress." The Hill notes, "Sources familiar with the dynamic in the office of the undersecretary for policy said that infighting and tension between" Ryan Henry, the principal deputy undersecretary of defense for policy, "and the assistant secretary's office could have led to the several proposals made so far to change or disenfranchise the office. However, others point out that the office is not without its own faults." One former government official said, "A lot of the SO/LIC problems are self-inflicted. … SO/LIC has missed opportunities to transform the special-operations forces."

In 1999, UN Report Noted Human Rights Abuses In Iraq. In its "History Lessons" column, the Washington Times (2/1, 90K) excerpts a March 31, 199 release from the UN Information Service which said, "Max van der Stoel, Special Rapporteur on the situation of human rights in Iraq, introducing his annual report, said that over the past eight years, he had submitted almost one thousand pages of reporting on this topic, and all the while serious human rights violations had continued without the slightest indication of any change in the Iraqi Government's policy or of any effort or intention to improve the situation. All the while, the Government had simply denied everything. Mr. van der Stoel said he now had the sad duty to tell the Commission [on Human Rights] once again that there were credible allegations of numerous and systematic arbitrary executions in Iraq; interferences with the independent religious practices of the Shi'ite community; continuing internal deportations of ethnic Kurds; violations of the rights to food and health; and violations of the rights of the child."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Defense Attorneys Says Fraud Not Responsible For Enron Collapse. The CBS Evening News (1/31, story 7, :45, Schieffer) reported, "In Houston today, opening statements in the trial of Enron founder Ken Lay and former CEO Jeff Skilling. The prosecution said Skilling and Lay dumped their Enron stock before a massive fraud was exposed and the stock tanked. But defense attorneys said fraud what fraud? They said no books were cooked and Enron's bankruptcy was caused by what they said was a temporary drain on its liquidity."

NBC Nightly News (1/31, story 8, :45, Williams) reported, "Prosecutors say the company was a ticking time bomb in its last months and Lay and Skilling covered it up. Skilling's lawyer said there was no fraud involved in the Enron collapse, saying the company fell victim to an unanticipated cash crisis."

The New York Times (2/1, Barrionuevo) adds, "Daniel Petrocelli, Mr. Skilling's lead lawyer, vowed to attack the government's case by defending the allegedly fraudulent accounting that the government now says it will not focus on," and Michael Ramsey, Mr. Lay's lead lawyer "laid out a case that will blame outsiders, including short-sellers, The Wall Street Journal and Enron's own over-reliance on trading to produce profits, for stoking the crisis of confidence that led to the company's descent to the largest bankruptcy filing in history at the time."

The Washington Post (2/1, A1, Johnson) adds, "Defense lawyers for both men adopted an aggressive, all-or-nothing approach. Either their clients are guilty of every charge or none of them, they said. Both men, their lawyers vowed, would take the witness stand in their own defense."

USA Today (2/1, Farrell) adds that Ramsey's statement was "a burst of bravado that bordered on trash talking," and he concluded "by telling jurors that 'on the major issues in this case, we're going to kill them.'"

The AP (2/1, Hays, McClam) reports, "Former Enron Corp. chiefs are seeking much more than a 'not guilty' in the government's premier criminal trial to emerge from the company's stunning collapse. They want to exonerate Enron, too." The AP continues, "Their lawyers steadfastly asserted Tuesday that the men have committed no crimes, nor did they look the other way while minions cooked the books because Enron was never rife with corruption and greed. … 'This is not a case of hear-no-evil, see-no-evil,' said former CEO Jeffrey Skilling's lead attorney, Daniel Petrocelli, at times punctuating his opening statement by jabbing his finger at jurors. 'This is a case of there was no evil.'"

The Wall Street Journal (2/1, McWilliams, Emshwiller) also reported on this story.

Prosecution Trying To Make Simple Case Based On False Statements. The Financial Times (2/1, McNulty, Ward) adds that "government prosecutors alleged" Enron "'told lie after lie' about its financial condition." Prosecutor John Hueston, "keeping his arguments simple and avoiding unfamiliar business terminology," said, "This is not about accounting. It is about lies and choices."

The New York Times (2/1, Barrionuevo) adds that Hueston "said the government would focus not on the Byzantine accounting that many have attributed to the criminal activity inside Enron, but on the purportedly misleading statements that Mr. Skilling and Mr. Lay gave to investors in 2000 and 2001." He "painted a picture of a company whose stunning rise in profits was accounting 'hocus pocus.'" The opening statements made "clear that Enron's sudden failure — and the reasons behind it — were as much on trial here as Mr. Skilling and Mr. Lay."

USA Today (2/1, Farrell) adds, "In contrast to Ramsey's all-out assault, the government's opening argument Tuesday morning seemed almost understated."

The Wall Street Journal (2/1, McWilliams, Emshwiller) adds, "The two sides did agree on one fundamental issue: Messrs. Lay and Skilling were in charge at Enron and knowledgeable about the company's operations. They disagreed about whether those operations involved illegal activities."

The Chicago Tribune (2/1, Lazaroff) reports, "Lay and Skilling, Enron's top two executives, lied to investors and employees about the company's mounting financial problems as they sold millions of dollars worth of Enron stock, a government prosecutor told a packed federal court Tuesday. .. 'The two men at the helm of this company told lie after lie,' said Asst. U.S. Atty. John Hueston. 'Lies that deceived shareholders and lies that misled the public.'"

Texas Lawyer (2/1, Jeffreys) reports, "During his opening statements, Hueston said several former Enron employees who earlier pleaded guilty to criminal charges will testify at the trial, including Andrew Fastow, who was the chief financial officer; Ben Glisan, former treasurer; Mark Koenig, former head of investor relations; and Ken Rice, former head of Enron Broadband Services. Fastow pleaded guilty to one count of conspiracy to commit wire fraud and one count of conspiracy to commit wire and securities fraud. He awaits sentencing. … Petrocelli, Skilling's defense attorney, told jurors his client will testify. … 'You could not keep him off this witness list. He is going to tell you in his own words,' Petrocelli, a partner in O'Melveny & Myers in Century City, Calif., told jurors on Tuesday."

Bloomberg (2/1, Calkins) reports, "U.S. District Judge Sim Lake is presiding over the trial, whose outcome will be determined by a jury of eight women and four men. Lay is charged with seven counts of fraud and conspiracy, plus four counts of bank fraud that will be tried separately after the first trial. Skilling faces 31 counts of fraud, conspiracy and insider trading. The two men are presenting a joint defense."

Former Citigroup Exec Settles Insider-Trading Charges With SEC. The Wall Street Journal (2/1, Scannell) reports, "The Securities and Exchange Commission charged a former Citigroup Inc. senior vice chairman, Victor Menezes, with insider trading and agreed to settle the allegations for $2.68 million. … According to the SEC complaint, Mr. Menezes sold almost $30 million of Citigroup stock ahead of an earnings shortfall related to those losses. By selling stock before the announcement, the SEC alleges, Mr. Menezes avoided losses of more than $1.5 million. … 'We're very pleased to have reached an agreement with the SEC and to put the matter behind him,' said Elkan Abramowitz, his attorney."

USA Today (2/1, Smith) reports, "SEC enforcement attorney Scott Friestad, who brought the case, said Menezes 'knew significant negative information that the market did not.'" When he sold his share. USA Today also reports, "It is the latest unflattering episode at Citigroup during the final years under Sanford Weill, who stepped down as CEO last year and will relinquish his chairman's title this year. Citigroup amassed unparalleled size and scope in global markets but was implicated in lapses ranging from the Enron fraud to the Wall Street research scandal. Menezes, who quit in December 2004, was the bank's chief liaison to regulators when the SEC notified him of its probe in 2004." The article also notes, "if the SEC had chosen to prosecute Menezes, it faced the burden of proving he knowingly violated federal securities laws because he cleared the sale through Citigroup's legal department."

Documents Highlight Oracle Exec's Debt, Lifestyle. The USA Today (2/1, Swartz) reports, "Software billionaire Larry Ellison, one of the world's most conspicuous consumers, was advised to go on a crash financial diet four years ago as his spending soared on yachts and mansions. It's unclear whether Ellison, 61, heeded the advice from Philip Simon, his personal financial adviser, which surfaced in newly disclosed public documents in a shareholder lawsuit in San Mateo County. They show Simon warning that Ellison faced a possible financial crisis in 2002 if he didn't slash his $1 billion in personal debt, curb hundreds of millions of dollars in spending, and diversify his portfolio by selling some of his Oracle stock. … The documents show that by 2001-02, Ellison had racked up more than $1 billion in debt in loans for which he had pledged Oracle shares as collateral." The article notes, "The lawsuit was settled in San Mateo County Superior Court in November. Without admitting wrongdoing, Ellison agreed to donate $100 million to charity and paid another $22 million to the lawyers who sued him. The settlement is being appealed by a shareholder."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Key Government Witness Against Campbell Stands Firm Under Cross-Examination. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (2/1, Scott, Warren, 430K) reports, "A key government witness who broke down in uncontrollable sobs while testifying for the prosecution against former Atlanta Mayor Bill Campbell didn't crumble Tuesday as defense attorneys fought to shake his story. Dewey Clark, a former mayoral aide who lived for years in Campbell's basement, held his ground during about five hours of grilling by defense attorney Jerry Froelich during Campbell's public corruption trial." The Journal-Constitution notes, "Froelich lacerated prosecution witness Michael Sullivan on the stand last week, but he couldn't shake Clark's story that he took cash from a city contractor, George Greene, and a nightclub owner, Michael Childs, and gave it to Campbell. … Froelich questioned why Clark didn't initially tell the FBI about the alleged bribes from Childs to the mayor when investigators first knocked on his door in 1999. Clark said he only told on his buddy Childs in 2000 after reading in the newspaper that Childs, upset he couldn't get the liquor licenses, was planning to hire a thug to beat up Campbell to send a message to the next mayor."

Libby Defense Lawyers Outline Likely Defense. Lawyers for Vice President Dick Cheney's former chief of staff Lewis Libby outlined his likely defense to charges he lied about his role in exposing the identity of IA operative Valerie Plame Wilson. The New York Times (2/1, Lewis, 1.19M) reports, "In papers filed in federal court, the lawyers strongly suggested they would argue that if Mr. Libby's statements to investigators were untrue, it was a case of innocent confusion or faulty memory because of his preoccupation with weightier national security matters at the time. … The lawyers for Mr. Libby said that the conversations Mr. Libby had with reporters in the summer of 2003 in which he might have discussed Ms. Wilson's association with the Central Intelligence Agency 'occurred in the midst of an unending torrent of meetings, briefings and discussions of far more urgent and sensitive issues, including for example, the detection and prevention of terrorist attacks against the United States,' bringing stability to Iraq and the spread of nuclear weapons in North Korea and Iran."

The Wall Street Journal (2/1, Squeo, 2.11M) adds, "In asking a federal judge to order the special prosecutor in the case to turn over certain documents, Mr. Libby's attorneys suggested they want to demonstrate the breath of 'urgent and sensitive matters' that he handled. The defense team wants copies of Mr. Libby's own notes, which the prosecutor took as part of the investigation, as well as morning intelligence briefings dating from May 2003 through March 2004 -- the time between the leak of former Central Intelligence Agency official Valerie Plame's identity and Mr. Libby's discussions with Federal Bureau of Investigation agents and grand-jury testimony."

The Washington Post (2/1, A5, Leonnig, 744K) adds that Libby's attorneys "also asked that the court require Special Counsel Patrick J. Fitzgerald to turn over any informal assessments conducted by the CIA to determine whether the leak of Plame's identity in July 2003 damaged national security or agency operations. … Defense lawyers argued in court papers that it is crucial to determine whether Plame was not an undercover operative at the time Libby was discussing her with members of the media, and whether little or no damage was done to national security when her identity was publicly disclosed. If either is true, the defense argued, it will 'challenge the prosecution's contention that Mr. Libby has reason to lie to the FBI and the grand jury about his conversations with reporters in July 2003.'"

Suspected Murderer Recaptured After Mistaken Release. The Los Angeles Times (2/1, Blankstein) reports, "A violent ex-convict suspected of slashing a man to death in the first murder in Beverly Hills in years was at large for four days after he was released from the Los Angeles County jail last weekend, apparently by mistake, officials said today. Nathan Hall, 50, was recaptured this morning in the parking lot of the Beverly Hills Police Station, in which his impounded car was being stored, authorities said. Sheriff's deputies, already under criticism over their administration of the county's troubled jail system, said that Hall had been released after an order to hold him for violating parole on previous convictions was lifted, according to a preliminary investigation. The action was taken at the direction of the California Department of Parole, according to the sheriff's department, and Hall was released Saturday morning. Corrections officials could not immediately be reached for comment."

US Indicts Former Bank Of China Officials In $485 Million Theft. CNN.com (2/1) reports, "Two former Chinese bankers and their wives were indicted in Las Vegas in connection with a massive scheme to steal and launder nearly half a billion dollars from the Bank of China, Justice Department officials announced Tuesday." CNN continues, "The former managers of the state-owned Bank of China are alleged to have been engaged in an elaborate plot in which they stole $485 million by running funds through front companies and financial institutions in Hong Kong, Vancouver and Las Vegas, officials said. They allegedly planned to immigrate to the United States with their wives and gain citizenship through schemes involving phony documents and sham marriages." CNN adds, "A federal grand jury in Las Vegas brought the new charges against the defendants, who were first jailed in September 2004 on charges of violating immigration laws for trying to illegally gain U.S. citizenship. … A third Chinese banker involved in the alleged conspiracy has pleaded guilty in Las Vegas and returned to China, where he is being prosecuted for embezzlement and bribery." CNN notes, "In Washington, Assistant Attorney General Alice Fisher issued a statement commending prosecutors for untangling what she called a 'complex scheme of racketeering, money laundering and fraud'. … 'We will continue to work closely with our international partners to make sure that the United States is never seen as a haven for criminals to launder the proceeds of their illegal conduct,' Fisher said."

Reuters (2/1) also reports on the indictments.

Former Wal-Mart Exec Pleads Guilty To Wire Fraud, Tax Evasion. The Wall Street Journal (2/1, Zimmerman) reports, " Former Wal-Mart Stores Inc. Vice Chairman Thomas Coughlin, who left the company amid accusations he misappropriated as much as $500,000, pleaded guilty yesterday to federal wire-fraud and tax-evasion charges. A company icon who had worked closely with founder Sam Walton, Mr. Coughlin, 57 years old, is expected to spend at least two years in prison after a presentencing report is finished in about three months. Federal prosecutors made a sentence recommendation in their plea agreement with Mr. Coughlin. However, U.S. District Judge Robert Dawson sealed the plea agreement, saying he was concerned about pretrial publicity." The article notes that the former No. 2 Wal-Mart executive "took home millions of dollars in compensation," but "secretly had the retailer pay for a range of his personal expenses, including part of a hunting lease, handmade alligator boots and contact lenses."

The AP (2/1, Kabel) reports, "The judge ordered a presentencing report that will take up to four months to prepare. … Wal-Mart lawyers referred Coughlin to federal prosecutors after discovering Coughlin had embezzled money from the company and used expense vouchers to buy products as varied as snakeskin boots, hunting trips and Bloody Mary mix. They estimated losses at up to $500,000. … In federal court, Coughlin spoke only when he was asked questions by U.S. District Judge Robert Dawson. Afterward, defense lawyers issued a statement in which Coughlin accepted responsibility for 'serious personal mistakes in judgment.'"

Five Dead In Postal Facility Shooting. Several papers report on a former postal employee's shooting rampage in California on Monday, where a woman killed five former co-workers and critically wounded another. All of the papers mention that this may be the deadliest workplace shooting carried out by a woman. In addition to offering details of the shooting from witnesses, all include background both on the incident and on the woman's history at the Post Office. Additionally, all of the newspapers recall the spate of postal shootings of the late 1980s and early 1990s, which spawned the phrase "going postal." Of the papers, only the New York Times and USA Today identify the shooter.

The New York Times (2/1, Archibold) reports, "A woman who had left her Postal Service job because of psychological problems shot and killed five former colleagues and critically wounded another at a sorting plant here Monday night before fatally shooting herself, the authorities said Tuesday. The woman, identified as Jennifer Sanmarco, 44, of Grants, N.M., a former employee of the Santa Barbara Processing and Distribution Center, confronted employees with a 9-millimeter handgun, the authorities said. The 80 or so employees in the building fled as she fired, reloading at least once, said Sheriff Jim Anderson, of Santa Barbara County. The authorities had not determined if she was selecting the victims, all women except one, or shooting at random in what was one of the deadliest rampages at a Postal Service building. After working as a sorting clerk for six years, the woman went on medical disability for unspecified mental problems in June 2003 after co-workers reported her acting strangely and called sheriff's deputies, postal authorities said."

Coverage includes step-by-step accounts of the shooting, sourced to the local sheriff's department. For example, the Los Angeles Times (2/1, Chawkins, Muskal) reports, "According to the Sheriff's Department, the woman entered the facility by car, apparently scooting her compact behind another car to get into the parking lot past the barrier. … Once in the parking lot, she shot two women. One died and the other remained in critical condition today with a gunshot to the head, Anderson said. The shooter then went through the parking lot killing another person. She used a key card to enter the building, and another body was recovered just inside the door, authorities said. Farther inside the building she shot two more people before turning the 9-millimeter pistol on herself." The Los Angeles Times also names the victims.

Also typical of coverage is quotes from local officials. All of the papers included comments from Goleta Mayor Jonny Wallis. For example, the Washington Post (2/1, A3, Geis) reports, "Goleta Mayor Jonny Wallis expressed shock and sorrow at a news conference. 'An act of violence is always a shock to the soul, but especially in a small community such as ours, where our neighbors are our friends and where violence of any kind is extremely rare,' she said. 'A day at the office should not result in death.'"

USA Today (2/1, Kasindorf) leads with the shooter's gender. The article says, "The shooting deaths of five people by a former postal worker may have been the worst U.S. workplace murder ever committed by a woman, according to experts in on-the-job violence. … Northeastern University criminologist James Alan Fox said it was highly unusual for such an act to be committed by a woman. The incident was also the first fatal shooting at a postal installation since a letter carrier shot and killed a postal clerk in Dallas in 1998." The article also notes, "Postal installations were the sites of several high-profile shootings during the mid-'80s and early '90s. The Goleta incident was the worst since a 1986 rampage in Edmond, Okla., in which a letter carrier killed 14 people."

Report Recommends Moratorium On Death Penalty In Georgia. The Fulton County Daily Report (2/1, Pollak) reports, "Because Georgia cannot 'ensure fairness and accuracy in every capital case,' it should implement a moratorium on executions and death penalty prosecutions, an American Bar Association study states." The Report continues, "Anne S. Emanuel, a Georgia State University College of Law associate dean who chaired the 21-member ABA team, said the state government should stop working on capital cases until it can address problems with jurors' application of mitigation evidence and the lack of free habeas corpus lawyers for indigent death row inmates. … 'We're not saying a death penalty is never appropriate,' said Emanuel. 'We're saying you should dot the I's and cross the T's.'" The Report adds, "Russ Willard, a spokesman for Georgia Attorney General Thurbert Baker, said the state's top lawyer opposes the moratorium recommended by the ABA report. … 'Our office continues to review the ABA report, but this appears to be a lobbying packet put together in an effort to have the Legislature make changes to the state process,' said Willard." The Report notes, "The ABA report said that one of the 21 members of the team, Harry D. Dixon Jr., a former U.S. Attorney for the Southern District of Georgia, did not agree with the call for a moratorium. … Among the problems cited in the 325-page report are inadequate pattern jury instructions on mitigation. … The study said that Georgia capital jurors often misunderstand the applicable burden of proof for mitigation, as well as the scope of mitigating evidence. Approximately 40 percent of the jurors interviewed for the study did not understand that any evidence could be used in consideration of mitigation. In addition, 62 percent thought the defense had to prove mitigating factors beyond a reasonable doubt. …

The report also criticized Georgia for not appointing counsel for state habeas proceedings, noting that only Georgia and Alabama do not provide indigent death penalty defendants with attorneys in such proceedings."

Relatives Of Red Lake Shooting Victims Frustrated By Meeting With US Attorney. The AP (2/1, Forliti) reports, "After nearly a year of waiting for details on a student's shooting rampage in which 10 people died on the Red Lake Indian Reservation, many victims' relatives said they were frustrated and angry after a private meeting with a federal prosecutor Monday." The AP continues, "Much of the case has been handled in juvenile court, which has kept information about the worst U.S. school shooting since Columbine out of public view, including the victims' families. … The March 21 shootings started at the home of Jeff Weise's grandfather, where Weise killed the older man and his companion. Weise then killed five students, a teacher and a security guard before killing himself at Red Lake High School in northern Minnesota." The AP adds, "U.S. Attorney Tom Heffelfinger refused to disclose details about Monday's meeting. … But he said he told family members about a federal report on school shootings that had several points relevant to the incident at Red Lake High. … 'One of those points is that in most school shooting situations, other people knew about the shooter's plan,' Heffelfinger said." The AP notes, "Those who attended said they learned 39 people knew Weise had planned the shootings and that four or five had more specific knowledge. … Heffelfinger would not confirm that, but said it's not illegal for people to do nothing if they know a crime is going to be committed."

Rowland Testifies Before Federal Grand Jury In Continuing Corruption Probe. The New York Times (2/1) reports, "Former Gov. John G. Rowland of Connecticut appeared yesterday as a witness before a grand jury in Hartford in response to a subpoena from federal prosecutors, who continue to investigate corruption stemming from his time in office, according to Mr. Rowland's lawyers. … 'It was a full-day proceeding,' said R. Bartley Halloran, one member of Mr. Rowland's legal team." The Times continues, "Mr. Rowland, who pleaded guilty just over a year ago to conspiring to betray the public trust by taking improper gratuities, was taken to Hartford on Monday by federal agents from the federal prison in Loretto, Pa., according to his lawyers. He was allowed to change into a suit and tie before testifying, said Ray Levites, Mr. Halloran's co-counsel on the case. Mr. Rowland spoke without using notes, Mr. Halloran said. … 'He has testified and testified truthfully,' Mr. Halloran said yesterday. He declined to specify any of the topics under discussion, given the secrecy rules governing grand jury testimony."

The AP (2/1) reports, "Rowland was expected to be back at the Loretto Federal Correctional Institution Tuesday night and remain there to serve out his corruption sentence until his scheduled release on Feb. 12, said his attorney, R. Bartley Halloran. … 'Former Gov. Rowland appeared today pursuant to a lawfully issued subpoena and responded to questions,' Halloran told The Associated Press as he left the U.S. attorney's office at the federal building in Hartford Tuesday afternoon." The AP adds, "Rowland admitted accepting gifts from friends, employees and state contractors. He pleaded guilty on Dec. 23, 2004, to one count of conspiracy to steal honest services, a combination of mail and tax fraud. The plea stemmed from Rowland's acceptance of more than $100,000 in vacations and chartered trips to Las Vegas. … Last March, the former Republican governor was sentenced to one year and one day in federal prison, followed by four months of home confinement and three years of probation. Because of federal sentencing rules, Rowland is eligible to be released after approximately 10 months served." The AP notes, "Assistant U.S. Attorney Nora Dannehy, who led the Rowland probe, has said the public corruption investigation that ensnared Rowland and several others is not over. One outstanding matter includes millionaire businessman Robert V. Matthews, a longtime Rowland friend who prosecutors said purchased Rowland's Washington, D.C., condominium in 1997 through a straw buyer for twice its value."

Philadelphia FBI, Community Advocates Launch Crime Witness Outreach Program. The Philadelphia Daily News (1/31, DiFilippo) reports that many crime witnesses "are frightened by reports of witnesses who've been harmed, which is why local law-enforcement agencies and community advocates have united to launch an outreach program," Step Up, Speak Up "to encourage people to come forward." The program, announced Monday, "is a partnership involving the FBI-Philadelphia's community-relations unit, Mothers In Charge and Clear Channel Outdoors," and it "calls for town-hall meetings in high-crime areas…where law-enforcement officials will talk about crime-fighting efforts and the role of witnesses in thwarting thugs. … Community activists and cops also plan to hand out T-shirts emblazoned with the campaign's name and slogan: 'Step Up, Speak Up.' Supporters would like to see the…shirts replace the controversial 'Stop Snitchin' T-shirts that spurred the campaign. … 'Things are upside down if we allow that to take root in our community and allow it to be the mainstream,' said Jack Eckenrode, FBI agent in charge in Philadelphia. 'If you don't have a witness, you might as well just give it up. Not every case is built on wiretaps, and even the ones that are need witnesses.'" The News notes "campaign organizers speculate that some witnesses feel intimidated even when no actual danger exists. And they say many people have misconceptions about what cooperation entails. 'People think the FBI records and traces every phone call it receives,' FBI spokeswoman Jerri Williams said. 'We don't.'"

The Philadelphia Inquirer (1/31, Pompilio, 423K) reports, "Desperate to stem the problem of witness intimidation, local law enforcement officials are taking new steps to protect those who come forward, including working with the U.S. Justice Department to provide relocation services for witnesses in non-federal cases at no cost to the city. … The 'Step Up, Speak Up' campaign is more focused on education. … 'Soon, we hope we'll see our T-shirts being worn by the people who once wore the other T-shirts,' said Ron Hosko, assistant special agent in charge of the FBI's Philadelphia Office. Witness intimidation has been a continuing challenge for police and prosecutors nationwide and particularly in Philadelphia, where the widely held belief is, 'snitches get stitches.'"

Philadelphia Daily News Welcomes Program. The Philadelphia Daily News (1/31) editorializes, "Thanks to fear -- real and imagined -- and the mind-set of youths who value its gritty coolness rather than its pathetic message, the 'Stop Snitchin' slogan has resonated here and on T-shirts across the country. … Even by using billboards, brochures with snitching tips, community meetings and, of course, T-shirts, 'Step Up, Speak Up' will be a hard sell. … Nonetheless, we believe a vigorous and sustained campaign can entice reluctant witnesses and crime victims to step out of the shadows. And help make the city safer." The Daily News adds, "'Step Up, Speak Up' may not trigger a wave of cooperation at first, but over time we hope that it overtakes 'Stop Snitching' -- and that ratting out bad guys becomes the gritty, cool thing to do."

Missouri Insurance Executive Sentenced To Prison For Mortgage Fraud. The AP (1/25) reports former St. Louis title insurance executive Thomas Kurzenberger Jr. "was sentenced Tuesday to six years in prison on a fraud conviction involving a $5.7 million mortgage fraud scheme, the U.S. attorney's office said." Kurzenberger "used customers' escrow deposits to support his drug habit and spent roughly $162,000 of customers' escrow funds at an adult night club in Sauget, U.S. Attorney Catherine L. Hanaway said."

US Adds Embezzlement Charges Against New York Money Manager. The New York Post (2/1, Smith, 624K) reports, "The feds have turned up the heat on former philanthropist and money manager Alberto Vilar, hitting him with new charges that add more alleged victims to his criminal case and could force him to cough up nearly $20 million. In the new indictment made public yesterday, Vilar…is accused of skimming money from four victims who'd trusted him with their fortunes — in addition to his friend Lily Cates, the estranged mother of actress Phoebe Cates. An additional securities- fraud charge also dramatically increases the potential financial penalties faced by the once-wealthy opera buff to $19.7 million.

Six Oregon Residents Indicted On Katrina Relief Fraud Charges. The AP (1/28) reports, "Asking for $2,000 in Hurricane Katrina relief assistance could cost six people up to 10 years in prison and $250,000 in fines." Portland residents Chantel Curry, Dominique Andrew, Virger Garland, Jennifer Jones, Trina Wilson and Steven Brown "were indicted by a federal grand jury Wednesday, each accused of a single count of receipt of stolen government property. Investigators said the six made false statements to qualify for $2,000 in relief along with $2,358 for rental assistance from the Federal Emergency Management Agency. … 'Whether we're talking about a few thousand dollars or a few hundred thousand dollars, our message is the same -- the FBI and their partners in law enforcement will be there and we'll find you,' said Dan Nielsen, FBI assistant special agent in charge for Oregon."

Builder Called To Testify Before Grand Jury About Work Done On Kerik Apartment. The New York Times (2/1, Rashbaum) reports, "A builder who helped renovate former Police Commissioner Bernard B. Kerik's Riverdale apartment has been called to testify before a Bronx grand jury about who paid for tens of thousands of dollars in work there, the builder's lawyer said yesterday." New Jersey authorities "said last November that Mr. Kerik had accepted more than $200,000 in work on the apartment from a construction company accused of having ties to organized crime while he helped the company pursue business with New York City." Kerik "was commissioner of the city's Department of Correction when the work was done in 1999 and 2000. … The builder who did the work, Woods Restoration Services, had told New Jersey authorities that he was paid more than $200,000 by" Interstate Industrial Corporation, "a large New Jersey construction company." New Jersey officials "have been trying to revoke the license of the construction company…to work at casinos in Atlantic City."

Washington State Ads On Sex Offender Sentencing Could Start Trend. Roll Call (2/1, Yachnin) reports that a television commercial in Washington state "almost looks like a second-coming of the infamous Willie Horton ads." The ads "warn residents about the state's 20,000 convicted sex offenders…then criticize the Democratic-led Legislature for refusing a vote on a GOP-proposed law on sentencing." When state Legislatures and Congress take up measures to strengthen punishment of sex offenders "in coming months, similar ads are likely to pop up elsewhere, as…will the inevitable game of political one-upmanship between the parties." Even now, "fights are…beginning to break out as lawmakers seek the mantel of 'tough on crime.'" The ad is being run by the Speaker's Roundtable, a political action committee tied to the state House GOP.

CIVIL LAW:

"Partial Birth Abortion" Law Declared Unconstitutional By Two Courts. The AP (2/1, Neumeister) reports, "Two federal appeals courts on opposite sides of the country declared the Partial Birth Abortion Ban Act unconstitutional Tuesday, saying the measure lacks an exception for cases in which a woman's health is at stake." The AP continues, "The first ruling came from a unanimous three-judge panel of the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals. Hours later, a three-judge panel of the 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Manhattan issued a similar decision in a 2-1 ruling."

The New York Times (2/1, Preston, 1.19M) adds, "Since the appeals court for the Eighth Circuit, in St. Louis, reached a similar conclusion last July, the three legal challenges nationwide to the abortion act have now been affirmed on appeal. This month the Supreme Court several times postponed deciding whether to hear the Eighth Circuit case."

Reuters (2/1) says the rulings "were setbacks to abortion foes. The decisions could be appealed to the Supreme Court, which has two new justices recently appointed by President Bush."

The Alameda (CA) Times-Star (2/1, Richman) reports, "The 8th Circuit appeals court in St. Louis issued a similar ruling - also based solely on the lack of a health exception - in July, and the U.S. Supreme Court had been expected to announce soon if it will review that case as the Justice Department has asked. That announcement could be delayed if it seems the government will appeal Tuesday's rulings as well; the Justice Department is reviewing the new rulings, spokesman John Nowacki said."

The San Francisco Chronicle (2/1, Egelko) reports, "Supporters of the law said it would ban only a narrowly defined, rarely performed procedure that is dangerous, causes pain to the fetus and is never necessary to protect a woman's health. Opponents, including doctors who testified at a three-week trial in San Francisco two years ago, said the law was so broad and vague that it could prohibit the most common and safest types of abortions in the second trimester of pregnancy, when 10 percent of all abortions are performed."

Alito Stance On "Partial Birth" Considered. The Los Angeles Times (2/1, Weinstein, 958K) notes, "In 2000, the Supreme Court in the case of Stenberg vs. Carhart struck down a Nebraska law that prohibited the second-trimester abortions because it did not contain any exception when the health of the woman was at issue." New Justice Samuel Alito, "as a judge on the U.S. 3rd Circuit Court of Appeals, joined a majority in striking down a similar New Jersey abortion law. He wrote in a separate concurrence that he was bound by the Stenberg precedent." But "Eve Gartner, the lawyer for Planned Parenthood who successfully argued the case in the 9th Circuit, said today she did not take 'any comfort' from Alito's earlier vote." Gartner said, "As a 3rd Circuit judge, he was obliged to follow the law as the Supreme Court laid it out in Stenberg. … Now, as a Supreme Court justice, it is highly unclear whether he will consider himself bound by that precedent."

Connecticut Challenge To Motion To Dismiss NCLB Case Heard. The AP (2/1, Apuzzo) reports, "Attorneys for the U.S. Department of Education asked a federal judge Tuesday to throw out Connecticut's challenge to the federal No Child Left Behind law, saying the state understood the law when it accepted hundreds of millions of dollars in education funding." Connecticut Attorney General Richard Blumenthal "argued that the law was unconstitutional, an unfunded federal mandate costing more than the state received in federal aid." Connecticut "wants to continue its program for testing every other year, in grades 4, 6, 8 and 10, a request that Education Secretary Margaret Spellings has refused. Officials have estimated that the state will be saddled with a $41.6 million shortfall through 2008 to pay for additional testing and other provisions the bill requires. Justice Department attorneys, who represent the Education Department, countered that Connecticut knew the testing requirements when it accepted the money and is now trying to escape obligations under the law. U.S. District Judge Mark Kravitz did not rule on the motion to dismiss Tuesday." But "he suggested that siding with Connecticut in the case could allow other states to pick and choose which elements of the federal law to follow." Also "federal attorneys argue that Connecticut jumped the gun by suing before its appeals and reviews within the Department of Education were exhausted. Blumenthal countered that the risks of appealing through the Department of Education are too great because Spellings could withhold millions of dollars in education funding while the issue is debated." Kravitz said that "Spellings could avoid the need for the lawsuit by agreeing not to withhold federal education money while Connecticut challenges the law within the agency. He encouraged Justice Department attorney Elizabeth Goitein to bring that request to Spellings."

Reuters (1/31, Szep) reports, "The Bush administration's 'No Child Left Behind' policy will lead to 'dumbing down' tests in public schools because Washington has not fully funded the policy, the state of Connecticut said in a court hearing on Tuesday to try to block the program." Blumenthal said that "federal funding was not enough for the state to test in a way that maintains its high standards." U.S. Justice Department attorney Elizabeth Goitein said that "Connecticut was avoiding its obligations and was aware of the law's demands when the state accepted education funding from Washington."

WTIC-Radio Hartford, Connecticut (1/31) reports Blumenthal "says he hopes the case is resolved quickly."

WTNH-TV Hartford, Connecticut (1/31, Cusato) reported, "The Bush Administration's No Child Left Behind Act is getting some help tonight from a large voice. The NAACP was in court today asking a judge to let them join the federal government in defending the law." Connecticut NAACP President Scot X. Esdaile said, "We want Connecticut to educate the poor and minority children, not go around and create loopholes to get out of it."

WNPR-Radio Hartford, Connecticut (1/31, Orson) reported, "A U.S. District Court judge in New Haven heard oral arguments on the federal government's motion to dismiss the state's lawsuit."

Nickles Says Asbestos Trust Funds Should Be Allowed To Opt Out Of National Fund. Former Sen. Don Nickles, the founder of the Nickles Group, a lobbying firm, and spokesman for the Common Interest Group, which represents the interests of existing asbestos settlement trusts, in an op-ed in The Hill (2/1) writes, "The Senate will soon consider S. 852, a massive piece of legislation designed to compensate victims of asbestos exposure by establishing of a $140 billion national fund. However, there's an enormous problem: The bill, as reported by the Judiciary Committee, violates the Constitution and must be fixed. If it is not, it should be defeated." 1994 Congress allowed the formation of 524(g) settlement trusts which "have provided in excess of $5 billion in compensation, but "S. 852, however, would confiscate these assets. More than $7 billion currently set aside to compensate 524(g) beneficiaries would be taken from the trusts and paid to the national fund created by S. 852." Senators "should amend S. 852 to permit existing asbestos settlement trusts to opt out of the national fund. The trusts that choose to opt out could then continue to compensate their beneficiaries, and the national fund would compensate certain asbestos exposure victims for asbestos injuries that are not covered by those trusts."

Firm Hires D'Amato To Lobby Against Asbestos Trust Fund. The Hill (2/1, Schor) reports, "Simmons

Cooper, among the nation's biggest asbestos-plaintiff law firms and Democratic donors, has made a strange new bedfellow in Alfonse D'Amato, the former GOP senator and trial-bar critic turned superlobbyist. Trial lawyers have been perennial targets for Republicans since D'Amato came to the Senate in 1980, criticized for clogging the judicial system and swarming businesses with needless litigation." D'Amato "is an unlikely ally for Simmons Cooper as its lawyers, 28 of whom belong to the influential American Trial Lawyers Association (ATLA), seek to derail the asbestos trust fund and preserve victims' right to sue in court after exposure to the deadly substance. ATLA backed only three Senate challengers in the 1998 election. One of them, then-Rep. Charles Schumer (D-N.Y.), beat D'Amato and took his job."

FBI Launches Probe Of California Police Shooting. The Los Angeles Times (2/1, Pugmire, Keller) reports, "The FBI today launched an investigation of the shooting of an apparently unarmed man by a San Bernardino County sheriff's deputy which was caught on videotape and broadcast. … 'At our direction, the FBI today is opening an investigation,' said Thom Mrozek, spokesman for U.S. Atty. Debra Wong Yang, the highest ranking federal criminal justice official in Los Angeles. The Justice Department, through the FBI, has investigated some of the most flagrant instances of police misconduct in the last 10 years. … 'All I can say about the investigation is that we are looking into potential civil rights violations. I cannot give any timetable for the investigation,' Mrozek said." The Times adds, "The man who was shot three times was an Air Force security officer who, according to the videotape and neighbors, told the deputy that he was in the military and 'on your side.' … The videotape of the incident, which was shot on a residential Chino street about 10:30 p.m., was of poor quality, showing only a silhouette of the deputy and the face of the man who was shot — illuminated by the deputy's flashlight. … But the tape appears to show the deputy opening fire as the man was trying to comply with the officer's apparent order to stand up."

FBI Investigating Allegations Of Suspect Abuse By Michigan Police. Under the headline "FBI Probes Suspects' Claims Of 'Hooding'," The Detroit News (1/31, Lynch) reports, "The Federal Bureau of Investigation is looking into allegations against local law enforcement agencies that officers used the tactic of hooding -- placing pillow cases over the heads of detained suspects, which critics say amounts to psychological torture. Officials with the Macomb County chapter of the NAACP brought the allegations to the Michigan Department of Civil Rights in December, which has since forwarded the complaints on to the Detroit office of the FBI. NAACP officials said they have received complaints about three separate incidents where one or more people had hoods placed over their heads while in custody." The News adds, "On Monday, FBI Spokeswoman Dawn Clenney said: 'We're looking into it to see if there was a civil rights violation.'" Michigan Department of Civil Rights spokesman Harold Core "said his office forwarded the complaints to the Detroit office of the FBI since the federal agency was the proper authority to conduct the investigation," but Core noted, "That is not a statement as to this office's opinion of their veracity."

Anti-Gay Union Bill Provokes "Fiery Debate" In Maryland Legislature. The Baltimore Sun (2/1, Brewington, 296K) reports, "With a fiery debate that invoked God and civil rights, supporters and opponents of a constitutional amendment banning same-sex unions in Maryland squared off Tuesday in what has become one of the most politicized issues of the General Assembly session," pitting "religious leaders and conservative organizations" that favor the bill against "civil rights advocates, other clergy and constitutional law professors." Each side has "an eye on the November elections." Political experts say that "if a constitutional amendment appears on the fall ballot, conservative voters who tend to favor Republican candidates could be motivated to come to the polls in greater numbers." However, "other observers believe that left-leaning voters could be similarly motivated to protect what they view as civil liberties."

The Washington Post (2/1, B1, Mosk, 744K) adds that "lawmakers on both sides of the debate" said Del. Donald H. Dwyer Jr. (R), "sponsor of the amendment, "undermined his cause by drafting a proposal that would also eliminate rights long afforded to gay men and lesbians" through "local laws in Montgomery County and Baltimore." Also, "a law professor later said Dwyer's proposal was 'so incoherent and sloppy' that it could inadvertently outlaw divorce." The crowd at the hearing "was so boisterous at times that extra troopers from the Maryland State Police were brought in to ensure calm."

Coretta Scott King Remembered. All three network news broadcasts carried stories on the passing of Coretta Scott King and her impact on the civil rights movement in the US. NBC Nightly News (1/31, lead story, 2:30, Williams) reported, We begin tonight with an icon of the past several decades in this country, a woman who became a towering moral force and a symbol of the civil rights movement after the assassination of her husband. Coretta Scott king died today. She was 78 years old. She outlived her husband by 38 years, and in doing so became a major force in her own right."

ABC's World News Tonight (1/31, story 6, 2:50, Vargas) quoted Sen. Hillary Clinton saying, "She would often give you the feeling that we should keep out eyes on the prize. We should be committed to what is really important in our lives, our faith, our families."

The CBS Evening News (1/31, lead story, 2:00, Schieffer) reported, "Coretta Scott King was the matriarch of the civil rights movement, its symbol for many in the decades after Dr. King's death."

WPost Praises King. The Washington Post (2/1, A22, 744K) editorializes, "Mrs. King's death at 78, after a long illness, dims the lights in a movement that drew inspiration from the life's work of both her and her late husband. It would be a mistake to think of Coretta Scott King as mainly a minister's wife living in his shadow." Her "determination…marked her as someone special," and "the murder of her husband…only emboldened her to continue his work."

Brownback Says His "Fruits" Comment Was Misinterpreted. The Washington Post (2/1, C3, Argetsinger, Roberts, 744K) reports in its "The Reliable Source" column, "Several days have passed since we first called the office of Republican Sen. Sam Brownback of Kansas to ask just what he meant when he said in a Rolling Stone interview: 'You look at the social impact of the countries that have engaged in homosexual marriage. … You'll know 'em by their fruits.' Now he has an explanation: He was misinterpreted. The senator released a statement Monday saying he 'was in no way referring to sexual orientation.' His paraphrase of Matthew 7:16 was part of a conversation about faith and deeds, according to the statement, and not an attack on homosexuals."

North Carolina Governor Seeks DOJ Probe Of Gas Company Profits. The AP (2/1) reports, "North Carolina's governor has asked President Bush to formally investigate gas companies' record profits in 2005." The AP continues, "In a letter sent Tuesday, Gov. Mike Easley also asked Bush to authorize Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to investigate gas companies and their record profits. … 'This is a problem that transcends state boundaries and requires action by the federal government,' Easley wrote. 'I am writing to urge you to take decisive action to investigate the sources of these record-breaking profits, punish any wrongdoing that may underlie them, and most important, take immediate steps to reverse this situation and lower the amount consumers pay to the oil companies.'" The AP adds, "Easley specifically mentioned Exxon Mobil's announcement this week that its 2005 profit was $36 billion, the largest profit any company has earned in the history of the United States. … Easley said an investigation should require oil industry executives to testify under oath, unlike in November, when they testified before Congress, but not under oath."

WSJournal Opposes Additionally Taxing Oil Companies Profits. The Wall Street Journal (2/1, 2.11M) editorializes, "Exxon is guilty only of responding to a market need, and its earnings are nothing to apologize for." While some "politicians and many of our friends in the press imply that Big Oil is somehow responsible for higher prices because of 'gouging' or somehow conspiring to withhold supply," each "time the Federal Trade Commission looks into these claims, it finds no evidence to support them." The high energy prices reflect "political uncertainty in some major oil-producing countries," and "the worst way to respond…is by robbing the profits that the companies need to diversify global oil supplies." As it is "an election year, we can expect this sort of political posturing to get worse. It's a special shame, however, that some in the media have decided to join the demagoguery in search of higher TV ratings."

FTC Approves Time Warner-Comcast Purchase Of Adelphia Assets. Dow Jones (2/1, Hughes) reports, "The Federal Trade Commission Tuesday cleared the acquisition of Adelphia Communications Corp. cable assets by Comcast Corp. and Time Warner Cable Inc.,

amid objections that the purchase would raise the cost of sports programming. … 'The evidence obtained during the investigation does not suggest that the proposed transactions are likely to substantially lessen competition in any geographic region in the United States,' said FTC Chairman Deborah Platt Majoras. She and two fellow Republicans approved the purchase over the objections of two colleagues who argued the government should have imposed conditions." Dow Jones continues, "Comcast and Time Warner last April agreed to acquire Adelphia's assets after the company collapsed in an accounting scandal. As part of the transaction, the two cable giants would swap certain cable systems, giving both companies more clout by strengthening their geographic clusters of subscribers." Dow Jones adds, "The transaction still faces approval by the Federal Communications Commission. The two dissenting commissioners, Democrat Jon Leibowitz and Independent Pamela Jones Harbour, raised hope that the FCC may scrutinize the acquisition more carefully. … FTC Chairman Majoras joined Commissioners William Kovacic and J. Thomas Rosch in saying that the FTC would be 'vigilant' and 'take action under the antitrust laws' if evidence emerged that Comcast or Time Warner were engaging in anticompetitive conduct that harmed consumers. They also said that the FTC's investigation didn't show that the purchase of Adelphia's assets would harm competition and that as a result it wasn't 'appropriate' to impose conditions."

EU Antitrust Chief Says Microsoft Must Prove Innovation To Charge Fees. The AP (2/1) reports, "The European Union's antitrust chief says Microsoft cannot charge licensing fees for software blueprints that it is offering to share with competitors unless it can prove the computer code is innovative." The AP continues, "The official, Neelie Kroes, also told European lawmakers on Tuesday that she has not yet received all information on Microsoft's offer to share software code and comply with a 2004 EU antitrust ruling." The AP adds, "Microsoft Corp. has until Feb. 15 to meet European Commission demands from December that it provide complete and accurate information on code that would allow competitors' products to communicate smoothly with servers running Microsoft operating systesms. … EU antitrust regulators have threatened Microsoft with daily fines of 2 million euros ($2.36 million), retroactive to mid-December, if it fails to comply by the deadline."

Kroes Not Opposed To Mittal-Arcelor Merger. The AP (2/1, White) reports, "European Union antitrust chief Neelie Kroes said Tuesday she was not in principle opposed to large steel merger such as Mittal Steel Co.'s bid for Arcelor SA and would meet with steel magnate Lakshmi Mittal this week. … 'I am not shocked by big, little or small mergers,' she told the European Parliament's economic and monetary affairs committee." The AP continues, "The EU's Executive Commission had not yet received a formal request by either company to clear the merger and Kroes said she would look at it carefully in line with EU competition rules. … 'We have not received all the facts and figures. ... We will do the job properly, not with emotion,' she said." The AP adds, "Kroes will meet with Mittal chairman and CEO Lakshmi Mittal on Wednesday to discuss the unsolicited 18.6 billion euros ($22.5 billion) offer he made for Arcelor last week. … Arcelor, meanwhile, warned against its predator's 'irregular' profitability, pledging to consider 'all options' to foil the hostile bid."

Mobile Email Patent Battles Spread To Two More Companies. The USA Today (2/1, Kessler) reports, "Mobile e-mail addicts, already nervous about a lawsuit that threatens to shut down BlackBerry service in the USA, have another reason to fret: BlackBerry's biggest rival was hit with a similar lawsuit Tuesday. Visto, a maker of mobile e-mail systems for cellphone carriers, sued rival Good Technology in U.S. District Court. Visto claims Good has violated several patents dating to 1997. Good sells e-mail products for the Palm Treo, Hewlett-Packard iPaq and other handheld devices." However, according to the article, "Customers shouldn't rush out to replace e-mail gadgets just because they're jittery." The article includes background information on litigation between Research In Motion and NTP over patents involved with the BlackBerry. The article also says, "The lawsuits raise questions about whether U.S. courts make it too easy for companies to threaten to shut down rivals' businesses, says lawyer Jeffrey Berkowitz at Finnegan Henderson Farabow Garrett & Dunner in Washington, D.C."

Luxembourg Rejects Mittal Bid For Arcelor. The Wall Street Journal (2/1, Echikson) reports, "Luxembourg's prime minister said his country rejected Mittal Steel Co.'s €19.43 billion, or about $23.48 billion, hostile bid to acquire rival steelmaker Arcelor SA, citing worries over the fate of 6,000 Arcelor employees based in that country. But Prime Minister Jean-Claude Juncker conceded that his powers to block the deal were limited because Luxembourg owns only 5.6% of Arcelor's shares. Meanwhile, the European Union's antitrust chief said she wasn't in principle opposed to a large steel merger, giving Mittal bid's continued life. … The cash-and-stock bid, announced Friday, would create a new global steel giant. In Paris Tuesday, shares of Arcelor fell 85 European cents, or 2.9%, to €28.90 each. In Amsterdam, Mittal fell 49 European cents, or 1.7%, to €29.20." The article also notes that while French Finance Minister Thierry Breton "disparaged" the Mittal offer, the French government "owns no part of Arcelor and analysts say it will find it dangerous to intervene, and would risk undermining its credibility to block even more sensitive deals it dislikes."

Column Decries Anti-"Biopiracy" Proposals. In an op-ed in the Wall Street Journal (2/1) Alan Oxley raps India, Brazil, and African countries for trying to alter the World Trade Organization's rules on patents. Oxley writes, "Their complaint is that current patent law permits 'biopiracy.' Their scenario is that multinational companies, typically pharmaceutical manufacturers, secure local natural plants or substances in foreign countries for a pittance, convert them into profitable blockbuster drugs, protect them with patents and pile up the profits. The 'traditional owners,' often indigenous peoples, of these 'genetic resources' are allegedly left with little in return. … In the name of fighting biopiracy, India wants governments to have the right to authorize any use of a patented product based on or derived from a genetic resource found in their territory." As an example, Oxley cites India's neem tree, which contains a natural fungicide. Oxley writes, "If the WTO rules were amended as India wants, its approval would be necessary before another country could grant a patent on any product or process involving the neem tree. This clearly would produce a chilling effect on innovation." Oxley says no investor would risk his money under such laws, and advocates market agreements to compensate host governments when companies seek patentable matter while "bioprospecting." Oxley concludes, "Officials in countries that want to lock onto high-growth strategies and foster investment that will bring the latest and most productive technology should be wary about this anti-patent law campaign."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Davis-Besse Plant Worker Indicted For Falsifying Reports. The Milwaukee Journal Sentinel (2/1, Content) reports, "A nuclear power plant employee indicted on suspicion of misleading federal regulators about the condition of a troubled Ohio plant later moved to Wisconsin, where he worked for the past three years at the Kewaunee nuclear plant." The Sentinel continues, "David Geisen of De Pere is scheduled to be arraigned this afternoon in federal court in Toledo, Ohio, on five charges of falsifying reports to the Nuclear Regulatory Commission. He is one of three people who worked for the Davis-Besse nuclear plant who have been indicted on charges of filing reports that concealed problems at the plant outside Toledo." The Sentinel adds, "Geisen was part of a group of Davis-Besse workers who left FirstEnergy in fall 2002 as part of management changes that resulted from an intensive NRC investigation of problems at the plant. … The NRC and federal Justice Department indictment contend that Geisen, then Davis-Besse's engineering manager, and other workers at Davis-Besse gave incomplete, misleading and false information concerning the condition of the vessel head and the nozzles inside it, after NRC inspectors raised concerns that plants such as Davis-Besse might have leaks. … If that information had been disclosed earlier, the plant would have been shut down sooner, officials said."

Northwest Ecoterror Suspect Released On Bond. KMAX-TV Sacramento (1/31) reports on its Web site, "One of the three people accused of plotting to blow up cell phone towers and a power plant in Auburn is set to be released on bail. The parents of Lauren Wiener put up a $1.2 million bond on their home to get their daughter out of jail." Wiener "is the only one of the 3 eco-terror suspects arrested in the case to be allowed bail. The FBI says the arrests were based on evidence that the three were plotting to use explosives to blow up several sites. … Although, the FBI says they do not believe there was any immediate danger to the public."

MSHA Nominee Says Mine Safety Laws Are Adequate. USA Today (2/1, Frank, 2.31M) reports, "President Bush's choice to oversee coal mines said Tuesday that safety laws are 'adequate' and that problems result from mine operators that ignore safety regulations." During a confirmation hearing in the Senate, Richard Stickler said, "A small percentage of operators comply with the law when (inspectors) are at the job site, but that's the only time they try to comply with the law." Facing "sharp questioning from Democrats, Stickler, a former coal miner, declined to endorse new safety measures such as increasing the number of mine-rescue teams." Sen. Edward Kennedy "said that Stickler 'is not someone with an extensive background in safety and health issues' and that he will vote against the nomination." And Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton "voiced frustration when Stickler told her that he'd 'do an in-depth analysis' of safety regulations that had been proposed when her husband was president but were dropped by the Bush administration. 'It's troubling…that once again we're going to be studying what's self-evident: We need improvements.'"

The New York Times (2/1, Urbina, 1.19M) adds that committee chairman Sen. Michael Enzi "endorsed the administration's preference that oversight agencies work in partnership with industry rather than act as taskmaster." Yet "Senator Patty Murray…pressed Mr. Stickler on whether he would be willing to push the agency, which has been criticized as lax in enforcing its own regulations, to play a tougher role. 'Are you going to move forward in an aggressive direction,' Ms. Murray asked, 'or are we going to hear more of the voluntary philosophy of they will do the right thing if we just sit back and let them?'"

Jenkins Says There Isn't Proof Global Warming Is Real. Holman W. Jenkins, Jr. writes in his column in the Wall Street Journal (2/1, 2.11M), "As used by the media, 'global warming' refers to the theory not only that the earth is warming, but doing so because of human industrial activity." However, "measuring average global temperature is not an easy matter," and "how do we know it's manmade?" Scientists have to use "elaborate computer models…before they can plausibly suggest…that the net effect of increased carbon dioxide is the observed increase in temperature." Any "diligent layperson is equipped to doubt any confident assertion that manmade warming is taking place." Therefore, ", inevitably and unfortunately, today's debate over global warming revolves almost exclusively around the status and motives of spokesmen for opposing viewpoints, rather than the science and its limits."

Michigan Tribe Joins DOJ In Asking Court To Dismiss Casino Suit. Indian Country Today (1/31, Toensing) reports, "The Match-E-Be-Nash-She-Wish Band of Pottawatomi Indians joined the Justice Department Jan. 6 in asking a federal court to dismiss a lawsuit that seeks to block the Interior Department from taking land into trust for the tribe's proposed casino in southwestern Michigan." ICT continues, "The lawsuit was filed by MichGo, one of the dozens of anti-casino groups that have sprouted up around the country over the past several years. MichGo, which stands for Michigan Gambling Opposition, filed a lawsuit last year challenging Interior's final approval of the tribe's land-into-trust application." ICT adds, "The 300-member Match-E-Be-Nash-She-Wish Band, known as the Gun Lake Tribe, was federally acknowledged in 1999. The tribe plans to develop a casino and entertainment complex in Wayland Township on 147 acres of trust land. … 'We are very hopeful the court will concur with our position that MichGo's claims have no merit. We appreciate the help from the Department of Justice in defense of the tribe's federal rights. Gun Lake is trying to restore our reservation less than three miles from our homelands in Bradley,' said Tribal Chairman D.K. Sprague. … On the same day Gun Lake filed for a summary dismissal of MichGo's lawsuit, the Pokagon Band of Potawatomi - Gun Lake's cousins and neighbors - learned that the federal Court of Appeals in Washington, D.C., had tossed out an identical lawsuit that sought to delay its efforts to develop Four Winds Casino Resort on 675 acres in New Buffalo Township in southwestern Michigan."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Four Accused In Mail-Order Drugs Case. The Knoxville (TN) News Sentinel (2/1, Satterfield) reports, "Richard Kato Robinson admitted he had shipped a half-ton of marijuana and a quarter-ton of cocaine from California to Knoxville in three years - all by mail. At a hearing in U.S. District Court on Tuesday prosecutors "unveiled an indictment against the man authorities allege not only put all those illegal goodies in Robinson's packages but had even more customers on his mailing list. Vicente Corona was nabbed Jan. 9 in California and is headed back to Knoxville to face charges in connection with a massive mail-order drug business. Also named in the indictment unsealed…Tuesday were two alleged Corona minions - Jermaine 'Pretty Boy' Hughes and Dennis 'Raggs' Richardson. … The case began in earnest nearly a year ago when California authorities found drugs inside packages addressed to a vacant house…in Knoxville. Investigators with the Knoxville Police Department's Organized Crime Unit and agents with the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration wound up delivering the packages to that vacant house and then waited for someone to show up to collect them."

Convicted Arkansas Drug Ring Leader Gets 12-Year Prison Sentence. The Fort Smith (AR) Southwest Times Record (1/31) reports, "A Logan County man who authorities said was the leader of a drug ring that shipped large amounts of marijuana into Arkansas was sentenced Monday to 121/2 years in prison. … Bollinger and 10 other people were indicted in May as a result of an investigation by the federal Drug Enforcement Agency and several other agencies that began in 2001. Authorities said Bollinger was in charge of an operation that shipped marijuana from California to Arkansas and distributed the marijuana primarily in Logan County."

Drug Case Gets First Jury Trial In New Orleans Since Katrina. New Orleans Times-Picayune (2/1) reports, "In the first jury trial in U.S. District Court in New Orleans since Hurricane Katrina, a 40-year-old man was convicted Tuesday of selling crack cocaine to a Drug Enforcement Administration undercover agent at Lakeside Shopping Center in Metairie and in a Wal-Mart parking lot in Boutte in May 2004. The DEA seized more than 100 grams of crack cocaine from Mervin Spencer after the undercover operation, U.S. Attorney Jim Letten said. U.S. District Judge Helen Berrigan scheduled sentencing for April 12. Spencer faces a mandatory life sentence and fines amounting to $12 million, along with other penalties, in connection with Tuesday's guilty verdict."

Santa Cruz Seeks Federal Court's Approval Of Medical Marijuana Plan. The San Jose Mercury News (1/31, Mclaughlin) reports, "The city of Santa Cruz and a local medical marijuana collective on Tuesday asked a federal court in San Jose to approve the city's plan to provide marijuana directly to sick and dying patients. The amended complaint represents a renewed legal fight to force the U.S. government to honor medical marijuana laws passed by California and 11 other states. The American Civil Liberties Union, Drug Policy Alliance, the national law firm of Bingham McCutchen and a handful of private attorneys filed legal documents outlining new constitutional arguments based on an ordinance recently enacted by the Santa Cruz City Council creating the first medical marijuana department in the country. The department is known as the Office of Compassionate Use, but the city has made clear it has no intention of actually distributing marijuana unless it wins the legal battle."

Florida Doctor Convicted Of Patient Deaths From Painkiller Overdoses. The Lakeland (FL) Ledger (1/31) reports, "A federal jury convicted an Apalachicola doctor Monday of causing the deaths of five of his patients through overdoses of highly potent painkillers including morphine and oxycodone. Dr. Thomas G. Merrill was convicted on 98 of 100 counts, including illegally dispensing controlled substances, defrauding health care benefit programs and wire fraud. Merrill's lawyer, Jim Appleman, said he would appeal the conviction." The AP (1/31) notes, "Prosecutor Stephen Kunz told jurors that Merrill's practice became a destination for drug seekers throughout Florida. Kunz said Merrill wrote 33,000 prescriptions from January 2001 to May 2004 and 81 percent of those were for controlled substances."

California County Supervisors Delay Vote On Medical Marijuana Lawsuit. The Desert Sun (1/31) reports, "The Riverside County Board of Supervisors will not vote until next week on whether to join a federal lawsuit opposing California's medical marijuana law. Third District Supervisor Jeff Stone brought the proposal to the board that would have added Riverside County to the suit against the state law filed by San Diego County on Jan. 20. The San Bernardino County Board of Supervisors voted to file a similar suit Jan. 24. In 1996, California voters passed Proposition 215 - the law allows individuals with a doctor's recommendation to use medical marijuana. The law requires counties to issue IDs to qualified medical marijuana users. Riverside County began issuing the cards in December. San Bernardino had planned to start issuing the IDs, but has put the cards on hold until the suit is resolved."

Marijuana Activist Seeks To Use Pot While Serving Sentence. The Sacramento Bee (1/31) reports, "Medical marijuana activist Steve Kubby asked a Placer County judge [Tuesday] to let him use cannabis while he serves a 120-day jail sentence for a drug conviction in 2000. The Placer sheriff's department said it is opposed to the idea. Kubby has contended that he will die in jail if he is not allowed to use cannabis to treat his condition. Undersheriff Steve D'Arcy said his department's policy is that marijuana will not be furnished in any form to an inmate. The 59-year-old Kubby made the request through his attorney during a hearing in Placer Superior Court in which the lawyer also asked that his client be released from jail to serve the sentence at his new home in Marin County. The attorney, Bill McPike, said Kubby could wear an electronic device so that his movements could be monitored by authorities. … Kubby was in court today for arraignment on a charge that he violated probation by moving to Vancouver, Canada, in 2001 to avoid serving the 120-day sentence."

Tour Manager Pleads Guilty In Nightclub Fire. The Washington Post (2/1, A3, Fahrenthold) reports, "The former tour manager for the band Great White has agreed to plead guilty to 100 counts of involuntary manslaughter for his role in the deadly fire that roared through a Rhode Island nightclub in 2003, a judge announced Tuesday. Daniel Biechele, who allegedly started the blaze by setting off a pyrotechnic display near flammable sound insulation, could be sentenced to as many as 10 years in prison. … Biechele had been charged with 200 counts of involuntary manslaughter, two each for every one of the 100 people who died in one of the worst nightclub fires in U.S. history. The charges reflected two different legal strategies that prosecutors said they might use to prove his guilt: one involving 'misdemeanor manslaughter,' the other 'gross negligence.' … Tuesday's agreement points to an end for one of three legal cases associated with the Feb. 20, 2003, fire, which occurred during a Great White concert at the Station nightclub in the town of West Warwick."

Minneapolis Targets Guns With Buy-Back, Gun-Lock Efforts. The Minneapolis Star Tribune (2/1) reports, "Organizers hope to get about 200 handguns off the streets during a two-day buy-back program." The Tribune continues, "Terry Collins, Star TribuneTapping his finger repeatedly on a red X on a map, Shane Price wanted to make sure he had their attention. … Their strategy was for Project Cease Fire, a two-day gun buy-back program sponsored by Hennepin County's African American Men Project, several community organizations and the Minneapolis Police Department. Funding is provided by the Minneapolis Foundation." The Tribune adds, "Participants will get $50 for revolvers and $75 for semiautomatic pistols they turn in. No questions will be asked, no identification is required, and participants will not face prosecution for illegal possession or other gun-related violations. … The event will take place Friday and Saturday. … In another effort to reduce gun violence in Minneapolis, 5,000 cable-style gun locks will be available for free today on a first-come, first-served basis at any Minneapolis police precinct. The program is funded by a grant from the U.S. Justice Department. … The goal of the program is to remind gun owners to store their firearms safely at home so that they don't fall into the hands of a child."

ATF Probing Pennsylvania Arson. The Meadville (PA) Tribune (2/1, Johnson) reports, "Officials investigating the arson fire at Chipsco Mold & Design are confident it won't take long to solve the crime, but caution that it's tough to put a time frame on an arson probe." The Tribune continues, "On Friday, the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives announced the Jan. 23 fire at the 50,000-square-foot warehouse and manufacturing facility on Liberty Street Extension was an arson." The Tribune adds, "Officials have declined to offer details about the material used to start the fire, suspects or other evidence, but the supervisor of the ATF Pittsburgh field office said officials are following several leads. … ATF is the federal law enforcement agency with jurisdiction for investigating arson and explosives incidents. … 'Arsons are sometimes solved in a day and sometimes it takes years,' ATF Pittsburgh office director Jim Tanda said. 'We're confident in this case it's solvable soon. We're going to proceed with that optimism,' he said, adding, 'There's no way to put a time frame on it. … The ATF and state police have conducted a thorough investigation during the first week after the fire. We're not in a position to talk about evidence or suspects at this time. We've said it is arson and we'll be proceeding in the next couple of weeks with the leads we've developed.'"

TAX:

Many Taxpayers Not Using Sales-Tax Deduction. The Wall Street Journal (2/1, Herman) reports, "A recent Treasury Department report says numerous taxpayers who could have benefited from deducting state and local sales taxes didn't do so on their federal income-tax returns for 2004, which were filed last year. The provision allows millions of people to choose to deduct either their state and local income taxes or their sales taxes. This deduction is particularly important for people who live in states with no state income tax, such as Florida, Texas, Washington and Nevada. But it also can benefit many people in other states who pay relatively low state and local income taxes. To be eligible, taxpayers must itemize instead of taking the standard deduction. … When Congress approved it in 2004, it made it effective only for the 2004 and 2005 tax years. But now many lawmakers want to extend it."

Senate Budget Would Extend R&D Tax Credit. The Wall Street Journal (2/1, Rogers, 2.11M) reports, "House Republicans hope to send President Bush a long-delayed $39 billion deficit-reduction bill today, even as their Senate colleagues are preparing to use some of the savings to bulk up tax cuts. The immediate winner would be the high-tech industry, which is expected to get a longer, two-year extension of the research-and-development tax credit through 2007. And the Senate Finance Committee is proposing to stretch out a variety of lesser tax breaks to bring the net value of its tax package close to $70 billion over five years.' The Journal adds, "At one level, all the Senate adjustments are ephemeral and designed with an eye toward negotiations with the House. For example, the longer two-year R&D provision and other extensions proposed for the Senate bill will cost about $18 billion; the capital-gains and dividend extensions, approved by the House, would cost about $20 billion. By taking advantage of the added savings, Sen. Grassley puts himself in a better bargaining position with House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Bill Thomas (R., Calif.). But the maneuvering will reinforce complaints by Democrats that the whole $39 billion deficit-reduction bill is less about the deficit than paying for new tax cuts."

WPost Calls Budget Bill "Misguided." An editorial in the Washington Post (2/1, A22, 744K) says, "Members of the House of Representatives have the chance for a do-over, probably today, on one of its most unfortunate votes of last year: a supposed deficit-reduction measure that would achieve its cuts in ways that hurt the poor and reward the powerful. The House passed this misguided measure 212 to 206 in December; then it squeaked through the Senate, with Vice President Cheney racing back to Washington to cast a tie-breaking vote. But Senate Democrats invoked a procedural maneuver that stripped several minor provisions from the budget agreement, requiring the House to again vote on the measure. Hence, the opportunity for a do-over. The odds, we recognize, are against any change in the outcome. That's unfortunate. … Republican moderates prepared to hold their noses and vote for this stinker again ought to reconsider."

Senate To Take Up Tax Bill Today. In its "Washington Wire" column on its web site, the Wall Street Journal (1/31, 2.11M) reported that the Senate "is turning to a $70 billion, five-year tax bill left from last year. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist of Tennessee announced Tuesday afternoon that the chamber will take up the bill Wednesday. Republican tax-writers say they hope to clear the legislation to extend President Bush's 15% rates of capital gains and dividends by the end of February."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Senate Approves Alito Nomination By 58-42 Margin. USA Today (2/1, Kiely, 2.31M) reports, "Samuel Alito, who once said the Constitution doesn't protect the right to an abortion, won a swing seat Tuesday on the Supreme Court. Alito, 55, was sworn in by Chief Justice John Roberts shortly after the Senate confirmed him on a mostly party-line, 58-42 vote." The Senate vote "reflected deep partisan divisions over President Bush's pick for the second Supreme Court vacancy of his presidency. It was the closest vote for a justice since 1991, when Clarence Thomas was confirmed 52-48." Alito "got less bipartisan support than Thomas, who received 11 Democratic votes. Roberts got 22 Democratic votes last year."

Fox News' Special Report (1/31, Wilson) added, "In the end, every Republican except moderate Rhode Island Senator Lincoln Chafee voted for Samuel Alito. They were joined by Democrats Robert Byrd, Kent Conrad, Tim Johnson of South Dakota, and Ben Nelson of Nebraska." Bush "proclaimed himself pleased that his nominee had been confirmed. A short time later Alito traveled up Pennsylvania Avenue to the Supreme Court where he was sworn in by Chief Justice John Roberts in a private ceremony."

The Washington Post (2/1, A1, Babington, 744K) reports, "Yesterday's Senate vote reflected the challenge that Democratic candidates face in states that are solidly Republican in presidential elections. The pro-Alito votes by Byrd, Conrad, Johnson and Nelson are best explained '"y the absence of liberal activists in the Democratic ranks' in those states, said Bruce E. Cain, a political scientist who directs the University of California's Washington Center." The Post adds, "In most other states -- even Arkansas and Louisiana -- enough hard-core liberals donate money and recruit voters in Democratic primaries to make a pro-Alito vote dangerous to senators such as Blanche Lincoln (Ark.) and Mary Landrieu (La.), Cain said." Chafee, meanwhile, "faces a double dilemma in Rhode Island: a stiff GOP primary challenge by Cranston Mayor Stephen Laffey, and a likely strong Democratic opponent if he survives. Chafee's anti-Alito vote may entice more independent voters to back him in the Republican primary (at which independents can legally vote), which is vital to the senator's reelection hopes, said Brown University political scientist Darrell West." The Chicago Tribune (2/1, Zeleny, 643K) notes the vote "came one day after an attempt to filibuster Alito failed, with only 25 Democrats signing onto the movement led by Sens. Edward Kennedy and John Kerry of Massachusetts."

NBC Nightly News (1/31, lead story, 2:30, Williams) called the vote "a major victory of the President's second term." NBC Nightly News (1/31, story 2, 2:00, P. Williams) reported, "The biggest period of turnover on the Supreme Court in more than a decade is over now but the change in the court's direction is just beginning. The intense debate kept going right up to the last minute." Sen. Richard Durbin, Illinois: "A chill wind blows, a chill wind which will snuff out the dying light of Sandra Day O'Connor's Supreme Court legacy." Sen. Arlen Specter, Pennsylvania: "He does not have an agenda, does not have a predetermined set of values he's going to try to foist upon the country." Williams: "The vote, 58-42, was one of the most deeply partisan ever for a Supreme Court nominee, with just four Democrats voting to confirm. By contrast, Clarence Thomas had 11 Democrats supporting him, even though he was confirmed with fewer votes overall." NBC notes that now "a new era, with a more conservative court, begins" and one of Justice Alito's "first acts will be to vote on whether to hear a case on a law banning partial birth abortions. Three federal court of appeals have found that unconstitutional, two of them acting just today."

The New York Times (2/1, Kirkpatrick, 1.19M) adds "Alito and his wife, Martha-Ann, watched the vote on television in the Roosevelt Room of the White House with President Bush and his wife, Laura, and aides who had worked on the nomination. A cheer went up in the room as the vote count passed 50." For Bush, "the confirmations of Justice Alito, 55, and Chief Justice Roberts, 51, mean that in four months he has named two members of the court who are young enough to influence its rulings for many years." In a statement, Bush "congratulated Justice Alito, the son of an Italian immigrant, saying his 'appointment to the Supreme Court is the realization of the American dream.'" The Los Angeles Times (2/1, Chen, 958K), Washington Times (2/1, Hurt, 90K) and Wall Street Journal (2/1, Cummings, 2.11M) run similar stories.

The New York Times (2/1, Liptak, 1.19M) says Alito "will have only one vote, of course, but it may be the decisive one in several of the marquee cases that will dominate the balance of the Supreme Court's term. By the end of the term in early summer, legal analysts said, the nation will most likely have a good sense of whether Justice Alito will affirm or veer away from the direction set by his predecessor, Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, in cases involving the treatment of terror suspects and campaign finance. … A first taste of how his legal views on abortion, a signature issue for Justice O'Connor, may differ from hers could come before the end of the year. And other issues on which Justice O'Connor was often the swing vote, including affirmative action and religion, are certain to reach the court in coming years." The Wall Street Journal (2/1, Bravin, 2.11M) reports, "In his first four months, the new chief justice, John Roberts, has voted with the court's conservative stalwarts, Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas, except for the single case where the latter two split and the chief justice joined Justice Scalia." Alito," with a solid conservative record as a Reagan Justice Department official and circuit judge, may follow suit."

The Washington Post (2/1, A21, Lane, 744K) runs a story headlined "Shift On The Bench Has Already Begun," in which is says Alito "will shake up one aspect of court business that was unchanged for more than 11 years: the seating chart. As the junior associate justice, Alito will occupy the end of the bench farthest to the courtroom audience's right during oral arguments. Justice Stephen G. Breyer, who has sat there since October 1994, will move across to the audience's extreme left." The Post adds, "The other justices will shift according to seniority as well, except for John Paul Stevens, the senior associate justice, who will remain just to the left of Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. Justice Antonin Scalia will occupy the chair to Roberts's right, where retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor sat."

The Legal Times (2/1, Goldman) reports, "Monday's filibuster attempt was led by Massachusetts' two Democratic senators, John Kerry and Edward Kennedy. It was derided by Republicans as a transparent attempt to placate several influential liberal interest groups, which had spent hundreds of thousands of dollars in their campaign to defeat Alito. … 'The reason the filibuster was a flop, if they had done it and been successful, there would have been a wipeout in 2006,' said South Carolina Republican Sen. Lindsey Graham, reflecting a widely held belief among Republicans that a key factor in the 2004 defeat of former Senate Democratic leader Tom Daschle was his party's frequent use of judicial filibusters against conservative federal circuit court nominees. … 'The only thing that matters [to them] is the people driving the ads,' declared Graham, a member of the Judiciary Committee and the Gang of 14."

Kerry Complains Democrats Didn't Bring Out "The Knives" Against Alito. The Washington Times (2/1, McCaslin, 90K) reports in its "Inside the Beltway" column, "Immediately following one of the most partisan victories ever for a Supreme Court nominee, an obviously irate Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry, the unsuccessful 2004 Democratic presidential nominee, exited the Senate chamber yesterday and spouted that his Democratic colleagues 'didn't bring out the [expletive] knives!' … 'It was distasteful,' says one of three people Mr. Kerry addressed his remark to, among them Wade Henderson, executive director for the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights. 'Here he is supposedly a presidential hopeful, somebody who is supposed to have class and stature. I'm disappointed.'"

Obama Urges Alito To Exercise Job With "Great And Sober Judgment." Sen. Barack Obama in an interview before the State of the Union speech, said on The CBS Evening News (1/31, story 4, 2:00, Schieffer), "I don't think there's any doubt he's going to be more conservative than Sandra Day O'Connor. She was a moderate conservative and I hope Judge Alito recognized that he's got a role that is unique in America with the Supreme Court Justices with lifetime appointments the can change the landscape for this country and are not subject to democratic checks. And so hopefully we'll exercise his job with great and sober judgment."

Alito's "Balancing Act" During State Of The Union Examined. The Washington Post (2/1, A2, Milbank, 744K) reports, "Samuel A. Alito Jr., barely eight hours into his job as a Supreme Court justice, had to make a series of important rulings as he sat in the House chamber for last night's State of the Union address. For instance: How enthusiastically would he applaud for President Bush? (More vigorously than Justice Stephen G. Breyer but less than Justice Clarence Thomas and about the same as the chief, John G. Roberts Jr.) And: How would he react when Bush introduced him to Congress? (He would make a self-conscious grin.)" The Post adds, "For the four robed justices brave enough to attend the largely political event, and Alito in particular, it was a balancing act as challenging as any scales of justice. … If Alito and his peers were being extra cautious, that was understandable. Yesterday's rare overlap of a State of the Union address and a Supreme Court confirmation could have been a celebration of democracy. Instead, the anger from the confirmation process spread through the body politic, leaving a brittle, divided House."

Bush Lays Out Agenda In State Of The Union Address. President Bush outlines his domestic and international agenda last night in his State of the Union speech last night. The Los Angeles Times (2/1, McManus, 958K) reports Bush "warned Tuesday that the United States had become 'addicted to oil,' much of it coming from unstable parts of the world, and called for a 20-year national effort to develop new sources of energy to replace imported fuel." He also "delivered an unapologetic defense of his national security policies, from the continuing war in Iraq to increased electronic surveillance of communications at home." The Financial Times (2/1, Daniel, Alden) adds Bush also "addressed fears about the growing economic clout of China and India with a pledge to spend $50bn on research initiatives to boost US competitiveness over the next decade." The Baltimore Sun (2/1, Davis, 296K) adds Bush "held out hope for additional troop reductions in Iraq this year but rejected calls for a 'sudden withdrawal,' defending the war in a State of the Union message that drew stark contrasts with his opponents." The Sun adds, "While calling for bipartisanship on foreign and domestic issues, Bush portrayed his critics as willing to shrink in the face of difficulties." In addition, says the Washington Post (2/1, A1, Baker, Fletcher, 744K), the President "defended his vision for a robust US role in world affairs," and "appealed directly to the people of Iran just a day after winning an agreement to bring his dispute with the theocratic government's nuclear program to the United Nations."

Media coverage last night and this morning makes much of Bush's calls bipartisanship, and several analysts describe the President as "humble" and even "chastened." Bush's "olive branch" to Democrats was attributed to his "weakened political standing." Typical of the coverage was

ABC correspondent Terry Moran (1/31), who said after the speech, " This is a chastened President Bush," adding that the President "really had a tough year" and "it showed not just in the substance of the speech tonight, which was much more small bore, but also in his tone." John King said on CNN (1/31) that Bush has "trimmed his sails," and "knows he has to play small ball. That's a baseball term. The President knows that's what he has to do because of his weaker political standing."

In an analysis piece, the Los Angeles Times (2/1, Brownstein, 958K) describes Bush as "chastened," "deferential" and "modest," while the New York Times (2/1, Bumiller, Nagourney, 1.19M) says he was "more tempered and less partisan than a year ago, evidence of his diminished political standing." The speech "was notable for what Mr. Bush did not mention. He offered no new ideas for rebuilding New Orleans in the wake of Hurricane Katrina, made no mention of his troubled Medicare prescription drug program and offered no proposal to clamp down on lobbying abuses in Congress that have led to the investigation of Jack Abramoff, a formerly powerful lobbyist and a major fund-raiser for Mr. Bush." Reuters (2/1, Holland) reports Bush was "hoping to lift his political fortunes and those of his Republican allies in an election year with control of Congress up for grabs." He "is coming off one of the toughest stretches of his presidency." The AP (2/1, Hunt, Correspondent) also says Bush "went before the nation as a politically weakened president after the toughest year of his administration." A similar Knight Ridder story (2/1, Hutcheson) reports, "Bowing to budget constraints and political realities, Bush laid out few ambitious goals." The Washington Times (2/1, Mansfield, 90K), meanwhile, describes Bush as "jaunty," "ebullient" and "beaming."

Time (2/1, Allen) says on its website the speech "consisted mostly of modest gestures aimed at major problems," in "a tacit acknowledgment" of the President's "limited political capital and fiscal flexibility." The Washington Post (2/1, A1, Balz, VandeHei, 744K) runs a front-page story titled "Lowered Expectations Reflect Political And Fiscal Realities," in which it says Bush "Bush begins this election year far weaker than he was a year ago." USA Today (2/1, Page, 2.31M) also reports "the substance of the proposals Bush outlined reflected the realities of his sixth year in office: the erosion of his job-approval rating, the constraints of a federal budget deficit that the Congressional Budget Office estimates at $337 billion this year, the limits of the time left in his term and the costs of the war that divides the nation."

The New York Times (2/1, Sanger, 1.19M) also reports, "Only a year after Mr. Bush stood in the House, describing in bold terms how he planned to spend the political capital he had amassed in the 2004 election, the president who addressed the nation on Tuesday evening was far less ambitious, his tone noticeably different." The Times adds, "The Texan who swept onto the national political scene six years ago talking about drilling for new energy supplies and preserving the American way of life vowed on Tuesday night to wean the nation from its reliance on oil. Instead of urging Congress to drill in the Arctic, the president who had waved off the critics who portrayed him and Vice President Dick Cheney as captives of the oil industry asked Congress to finance federal research into alternative fuels and lithium batteries."

ABC (1/31) political analyst George Stephanopoulos said, "When he got to the domestic issues, even though he did rhetorically reach out several times, he did not reach out with any new or big or ambitious policies that the Democrats might be attracted to, and I think that is really for two reasons: Number one, we're broke basically. The deficit is going up and he can't afford it; and two, the President doesn't have the political capital to power something like that through." Likewise, Nina Easton of the Boston Globe said on Fox News (1/31) "I think the speech reflects the reality that some 57% of the public thinks the country is on the wrong track and he is facing a difficult midterm election and has to make inroads to swing voters and so he has to look at bipartisan measures."

The Wall Street Journal (2/1, McKinnon, Cooper, 2.11M) says Bush faced "a public anxious about the Iraq war and the economy," and that "a big goal" for the speech was "reassuring Americans -- particularly lower-income workers who often have seen wage gains eaten up by higher fuel and health-care costs." The Washington Times (2/1, Lambro, 90K) adds, "White House strategists hope assured voters will re-elect a Republican majority in Congress and nudge up Mr. Bush's approval ratings from the mid-40s, offering the president a chance to be more ambitious in his final two years. A loss of either or both chambers of Congress would hasten his lame-duck status."

USA Today (2/1, Jackson, 2.31M) says Bush "spoke at a time when polls have shown Americans deeply worried about the war in Iraq, and discontented with the president, whose approval ratings have hovered below 50% for more than a year." That may explain why "the speech lacked the single ambitious focal point that Bush's proposal to overhaul Social Security gave it a year ago." Similarly, the Washington Times (2/1, Sammon, Curl, 90K) reports the speech "was markedly scaled down from last year's State of the Union." Knight Ridder (2/1) also says Bush is "hamstrung by a budget deficit that could surpass $400 billion this year. For the first time during his presidency, Bush delivered his annual message of the country's health with most Americans disapproving of the job he is doing."

ABC (1/31) anchor Elizabeth Vargas said Bush "reached out with an olive branch on many occasions," but "the question, of course, being whether or not Democrats will be able to embrace and accept the olive branch. It was remarkable how many times he did, in fact, reach out." Tim Russert sounded similar themes on MSNBC (1/31), saying, "I think there will be a lot of different headlines from this speech, through the prism of the viewer, based on their own ideology. The interesting thing for me was the President's acknowledgement that this is, in the words of one of his top advisors, an unsettled country. There's an awful lot of angst and anxiety, and he's aware of that. And he knows the war in Iraq plays a central part of that, as well as a lack of a response to Katrina. And it's put us now in a position where it's very difficult for either party to get their way." The President "suggested he wanted to reach across the aisle and do some things. And then he talked about the domestic eavesdropping program and says by the way, members of Congress, they all knew about this. So it's going to be a give and take, back and forth, and I don't think much is going to happen, other than lobby reform, because both parties need that." The New York Times (2/1, Toner, Schemo, Pear, 1.19M) also says, "With federal spending now tightly constrained, some of the plans Mr. Bush presented on Tuesday could prove difficult to enact despite broad support."

Bill Kristol said on Fox News (1/31), "I think conservatives will not be entirely happy with this speech. There was more attention given to big government energy initiatives than to defending the tax cuts. Only one call for making the tax cuts permanent. I thought the discussion of Iran did not make a commitment to prevent Iran, no matter what, from acquiring nuclear weapons. We are going to lead the rest of the world into dealing with Iran challenge. If you think back to the 2002 State of the Union. We hope the rest of the world will be with us, but we've got to do what we've got to do."

Fred Barnes, also on Fox News (1/31), said, "This was a fairly conventional State of the Union address. I think it's clear that the President's domestic agenda is fairly exhausted. He has gotten most of his things, except for Social Security; Medicare, drug benefit, tax cuts And he has already changed the Supreme Court. … So his proposals on energy and education and health care were fairly small, not in keeping with the big picture ideas that the President likes. The interesting stuff was on foreign policy."

In a story about Bush's energy proposals titled "Call To Cut Foreign Oil Is A Refrain 35 Years Old," the New York Times (2/1, Wald, Andrews, 1.19M) reports, "When President Bush vowed on Tuesday to reduce drastically American dependence on oil from the Middle East, he had plenty of company. President Richard M. Nixon promised in 1971 to make the United States self-sufficient in energy by 1980. President Jimmy Carter promised in 1979 that the nation would 'never again use more foreign oil than we did in 1977.'" And Bush "has called in each of his past four State of the Union addresses for a reduction in the dependence on foreign oil. Despite those promises in the past 35 years, United States dependence on oil imports is at a record level."

USA Today (2/1, Appleby, 2.31M) notes Bush's health care proposals, which it says are "similar to his ideas last year on revamping Social Security" in that they "reflect an effort to foster more individual responsibility for saving for health care." The Washington Times (2/1, Curl, Dinan, 90K), meanwhile, focuses on Bush's comments on immigration in a story headlined "Bush Deems Guest Workers Key For Economy," in which it notes "Rep. Lamar Smith, Texas Republican, said US workers would be hurt by a guest-worker program."

The Miami Herald (2/1, Clark, Rosenberg, 323K), meanwhile reports Bush "singled out a fallen Marine from Pensacola in his State of the Union address Tuesday night, using the words of Staff Sgt. Daniel J. Clay to bolster his case for staying the course in Iraq. Clay, who was killed by a roadside bomb in December, left behind a letter to his family, Bush said, 'but his words could just as well be addressed to every American.'" As Bush spoke, Clay's parents, Clarence and Sara, and his widow, Lisa, "were among First Lady Laura Bush's guests in the gallery, watching Bush deliver the address." Clay "was among 10 Marines killed in an insurgent explosion in the Iraqi city of Fallujah."

McCain Gives Bush Speech An "A." Sen. John McCain said on MSNBC that Bush gave an "excellent speech," giving him a grade of "A." McCain, on CBS (1/31) said, "I thought it was excellent. I thought his pitch for the much-needed oil independence, his statement by Iran I think was important. Of course I was one of those very pleased to hear him express his comments to earmarking. The pork barrel projects which have become an obscenity in Washington and a cause for much of the corruption we see."

Feinstein Gives Bush Speech A "B." Sen. Dianne Feinstein said on MSNBC (1/31) said she would grade Bush's speech a "B" adding, "I thought it got marks because it covered a number of subjects, but it wasn't quite what I had hoped he would say about the war in Iraq. I think it's time for the President to tell us how and when we're going to see some changes in American troop presence and we didn't have that. And there's a lot of speculation about, you know, troop reductions that are going to take place very shortly. And I thought he had an obligation to clear some of that up, and he didn't. I thought on health, you know, the Medicare prescription drug program is a mess. In California' creating all kind of problems. … And he could have, I think, had a big impact there. His proposals for HSAs have a problem, and the problem is we have 42 million uninsured Americans who can't save because they can't afford to save and they don't have health insurance. So how do they get some kind of coverage? This is part of what drives up, I think, the cost of health care."

Thune Says Bush Was "Very Forceful." Sen. John Thune said on Fox News (1/31), "The President was very forceful, had a lot of energy, but I thought that the identifying a couple of key issues that are important not only to the economy, but also to the way that we project ourselves abroad, lessening our dependence on foreign energy. That is something folks in the Midwest are happy to hear. The focus on health care is on big issue. The President wants to move an agenda that addresses the high cost of health care. Those are both issues that are going to strike a real chord." Thune added that Bush "extended an olive branch. He talked about things that Democrats and Republicans can take credit for that have happened in the past few years and things we need to work together going fort. It's hard. It's an election year and everybody knows that. But through the best interest of the country, we have to pull together."

Mehlman Says Bush Gave A Great Speech." RNC Chairman Ken Mehlman said on MSNBC (1/31) that Bush "gave a great speech tonight. I thought he laid out a whole series of initiatives. Whether it's reducing foreign reliance on energy or improving education, all of these are areas where I think Republicans and Democrats can work together. I hope the Democrats will join this president in working together on these things."

Instant Poll Shows Support For Bush Proposals, But Low Expectations He Will Reach Goals. CBS (1/31) anchor Bob Schieffer said, "We want to give you some idea how the President's speech went over with people watching at home. CBS News with the help of a company called Knowledge Networks chose at random 700 adults who told us they planned to watch the address tonight. We gave them Web TV so they could get on to the internet and answer our questions about the speech. Now remember, this is not necessarily reflect the feelings of the country because traditionally we found out in recent years more Republicans watch when a Republican makes the speech. More Democrats when a Democrat makes a speech. But here were the questions. Did our viewers tonight approve of President Bush's proposals? 77% approved. 23% did not. We asked them what affect the President's proposals would have on their lives. 59% said they would make their lives better. 9% said worse. 33% said the proposals would have no effect on them. On some issues our survey shows the impact of the speech tonight. 52% say the war in Iraq has been worth the cost. Just last week just 45% of the same group thought so. And finally, here is a disappointment. When asked if President Bush will be able to accomplish his goals, this will be a disappointment to the President, I should say, 32% said yes. And 68% said no. They did not think he would be able to accomplish his goals."

Harris Poll Shows US Support For Bush On Iraq Increasing. The Wall Street Journal (2/1, 2.11M) reports an on-line survey of 2,985 adults shows, "American support for President Bush's handling of Iraq remains low, a new Harris poll shows, but those rating his job as 'excellent' or 'pretty good' increased significantly since December." The number "of U.S. adults giving the president positive marks with regard to Iraq rose to 36% in January, up from 29% in a poll conducted before Iraqi elections in December. At the same time, public confidence in the situation in Iraq, including U.S. involvement, also improved slightly, according to the recent online survey of 2,985 adults." Yet, "61% of U.S. adults rated Mr. Bush's handling of Iraq over the last several months as 'only fair' or 'poor,' but that's fewer than the 68% who felt the same in a previous poll."

Bush Expected To Receive Boost In Polls After Speech. ABC (1/31) correspondent Charles Gibson said, "I was interested to note that polls done in eight of the last 11 years after the state of the union address, at least 75% of the people who responded said they approved of what they heard. So with the President's polls as low as they are, with the President reaching out and trying to find cooperation in Washington, maybe he will get a pretty good sized boost in his polls from this speech." The CBS Evening News (1/31) correspondent Gloria Borger said, "Well, I you're going to see the poll numbers go up for the President, probably a bump."

First Lady Had 24 Guests In Her Box At State Of The Union. The Washington Post (2/1, C3, Argetsinger, Roberts, 744K) reports in its "The Reliable Source" column, "Twenty-four guests joined Laura Bush in her box during last night's State of the Union speech. … Among them: Fawzia Koofi, the 30-year-old second deputy speaker of the Afghan National Assembly, was on the first lady's right; Ja'Detrus Hamilton, a 16-year-old Katrina survivor and volunteer, was on her left. Local props went to Mayor Tony Williams and 2005 National Teacher of the Year Jason Kamras, a math teacher at John Philip Sousa Middle School."

Greenfield Says Discussion Of Warrrantless Wiretaps Was Strongest Part Of Speech. Jeff Greenfield said on CNN (1/31), "The strongest part of the President's speech was defending the controversial warrantless wiretaps where he used the same kind of approach he's used in this field before. I'm going to protect this country. I'm not going to let us sit back to get hit again. We've protected the country from future terrorist attacks. By implications, my critics will not be as strong on this issue. The other thing I'd mention is the other huge applause line from Republicans came when the President's cited the confirmation of Justices Roberts and Alito. That to me more than anything else was the most significant event today, the swearing in of Alito, because it told the conservative base that has been with him from the beginning, I really am your guy, forget Harriet Miers."

Bush Focus On Threat Of Radical Islam Noted. CBS (1/31) correspondent Lara Logan said, "He did two things that he doesn't normally do. He mentioned radical Islam twice. Since the last time when he made a speech saying that this was a crusade and it caused such outrage around the world because of the religious dimension that it evoked, he has stayed away from those kinds of references but speak to go the commanders on the ground they really feel like they are fighting radical Islam that no one has wanted to call it and say this publicly. So I thought that was very interesting. Then also the fact that he is talking about killing and capturing leaders was one throw-away line. Normally he's much more bold when he talks about that."

More Commentary. Media critic Tom Shales, in the Washington Post (2/1, C1, Shales, 744K), says that whether Bush is "at best, the worst president since Herbert Hoover -- as a seemingly sizable number of Americans appear to believe -- he acquitted himself fairly well and came off as basically competent when he delivered his fifth State of the Union speech last night." The speech was "capably presented, well organized and sometimes lofty in tone." But "it was also lackluster, ordinary and, most of all, generic. … 'Bush the Incompetent' was the headline on a lacerating op-ed column last week. If that's who he is, you wouldn't know it from the State of the Union speech he gave last night, but it hardly qualified him for the title of Bush the Brilliant, either."

The Washington Post (2/1, A22, 744K) says in an editorial Bush "sounded more subdued than triumphant, more realistic than grandiose. But if last night's State of the Union speech displayed a more cautious, less assertive President Bush than in previous years, his caution was not merely a contrast to the swashbuckling style of the past but an outgrowth of it. The president's future horizons are constrained by his past choices, budgetary and political."

The Los Angeles Times (2/1, 958K) editorializes, "It is not an unusual experience to listen to…Bush deliver a major speech and find yourself, regardless of your politics, nodding along in vigorous agreement. Tuesday night was no exception. The president hit the right notes, some of them even surprising, throughout his 52-minute State of the Union address," but he "often musters his laudable principles to avoid specifics or deflect unpleasant realities. … Confidence is an asset, but Bush needs to be more forthright about his setbacks." The Times adds, "By far the most cynical part of the address was the president's defense of the National Security Agency's warrantless wiretapping program, now rechristened, in Orwellian fashion, the 'terrorist surveillance program.'"

The New York Times (2/1, 1.19M) editorializes, "President Bush devoted two minutes and 15 seconds of his State of the Union speech to energy independence." The Times adds, "Hardly the bold signal we've been waiting for "last night's remarks were woefully insufficient." American "overdependence on oil has been a disaster for our foreign policy." The Times adds, "Mr. Bush told the people that 'the nations of the world must not permit the Iranian regime to gain nuclear weapons,' but he did not explain how that will happen when those same nations are so dependent on Tehran's oil." And while the UN "may wish to do something about genocide in Darfur or nuclear proliferation, [its] most powerful members are hamstrung by their oil alliances with some of the worst leaders on the planet." The Times adds, "Part of the answer, as Mr. Bush indicated last night, is the continued development of alternative fuels, especially for cars." When it "comes to cars, much of the research has already been done -- Brazil got to energy independence by figuring out how to get its citizens home from work in cars run without much gasoline." Simply "calling for more innovation is painless. The hard part is calling for anything that smacks of sacrifice -- on the part of consumers or special interests, and politicians who depend on their support."

USA Today (2/1, 2.31M) editorializes, "The president likes to characterize himself as a fighter for what he thinks is right. Achieving his goals and rebuilding confidence in his leadership will require him to be more of the uniter he once said he would be, rather than the divider he has too often become."

Thomas Friedman writes in the New York Times (2/1, 1.19M), "So far the democracy wave the Bush team has helped to unleash in the Arab-Muslim world since 9/11 has brought to power hard-line Islamic fundamentalists in Iraq, Palestine and Iran, and paved the way for a record showing by the Muslim Brotherhood in Egypt. If we keep this up, in a few years Muslim clerics will be in power from Morocco to the border of India. God bless America."

In the New York Times (2/1, 1.19M), guest columnist Sarah Wowell writes, "The state of our union is stunned. We democracy spreaders remain shocked, shocked, at the Hamas sweep in the recent Palestinian parliamentary election, never, ever, ever before having experienced a deficit of wisdom on the part of American voters. … For there are American citizens who used to think that there could be no greater blow for representative democracy than a president worming his way into the White House thanks to one Supreme Court vote. That is, until the day said president was actually elected to a second term by an electorate that overlooked the previous four years of galling, irrevocable policies with upbeat, intelligence-insulting slogans – 'Clear Skies,' anyone? -- to say nothing of entering into an ugly war based on lies that has made the world a more dangerous place when it wasn't exactly all Davenport, Iowa, to begin with."

Kaine, Villaraigosa Deliver Democratic Rebuttal. The Los Angeles Times (2/1, Simon, Fiore, 958K) reports, "The governor of a Republican-leaning state and the Latino mayor of Los Angeles delivered the Democratic rebuttal to President Bush's State of the Union speech Tuesday night, sounding themes the party hopes will help it take control of Congress in November's elections." In the official responses to the speech, Gov. Timothy M. Kaine of Virginia and Los Angeles Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa "assailed Bush on a number of fronts — including his handling of the war in Iraq, implementation of the Medicare prescription drug benefit and his failure to bring down energy prices." Kaine "argued repeatedly in his nationally televised remarks that 'there's a better way' to grapple with issues than Bush had chosen. He called for a greater emphasis on public service by Americans." Villaraigosa, who offered the Spanish-language response to Bush's speech, 'criticized the president for offering 'the same defense of the very policies that have divided this country over the last five years.'"

ABC (1/31) anchor Elizabeth Vargas also noted Kaine used "the expression 'a better way' nine times on a variety of issues, referring to the war on terrorism, he simply asked: 'Are the President's policies the best way?' He noted our greatest need is for America to heal its partisan wounds and become one people, echoing President Bush's state of the union address." The Washington Post (2/1, A1, Shear, 744K) says Keine "assailed the administration's performance in Iraq, its response to Hurricane Katrina and its management of the nation's health care system." He also "urged Bush to restore the competence Kaine said is lacking in government administration." Moreover, says the Financial Times (2/1, Yeager), Kaine, "a positive note, criticized what he said was 'too much of partisanship for its own sake.'"

The AP (2/1) reports Villaraigosa, in a nationally televised Spanish-language speech" made in response to President Bush's State of the Union address, "faulted the White House Tuesday for policies he said pushed more Americans into poverty and failed to address a crisis in education." Villaraigosa "was broadly critical of the White House on issues from the national debt to job training, but at the same time he appealed for unity to address those problems." The speech was "carried on the Univision network."

The Washington Times (2/1, Fagan, Dinan, 90K) runs a similar report under the headline "Democrats Decry 'Bad Management,'" while the Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (2/1, Reston, 261K) titles its report "Democrats Find Little To Praise In Bush's Address." The Chicago Tribune (2/1, Zeleny, 643K) adds that "judging by the bursts of applause during much of " Bush's "address Tuesday night, one might never guess the palpable level of animosity at the start of the election year."

Reid Says Whatever Bush Said, "Think Just The Opposite." The New York Times (2/1, Hulse, 1.19M) reports, "In their own comments before the address, Senator Harry Reid of Nevada and Representative Nancy Pelosi of California, the top Democrats in Congress, said the White House and Congressional Republicans had granted special interests too great a role in shaping legislation, including the new Medicare prescription drug plan." Pelosi and Reid also "said they had seen no sign in Mr. Bush's five years in office that he and Republican Congressional leaders were serious about easing the nation's reliance on foreign energy sources. They said energy legislation adopted by Congress last year was heavily influenced by the oil industry, which is earning record profits." Reid said, "This is Bush doublespeak. … Whatever he said, think just the opposite."

Reid Also Says Bush White House "Cradle Of Republican Corruption." The AP (2/1, Sidoti) quotes Reid saying, "There is no more important task in Washington than cleaning up the culture of corruption. Yet the president -- whose White House has become the cradle of Republican corruption -- is not taking responsibility for the costs of that corruption."

Dean Says He Has "Heard The Same Speech Three Or Four Years In A Row." DNC Chairman Howard Dean said on MSNBC (1/31), "I've heard this speech three or four years in a row now. He talked about clean energy, while he's putting toxic in the air. He's making it harder for seniors to get their drug prescriptions."

Obama Says Bush Didn't Offer Bold Domestic Proposals. Sen. Barack Obama on NBC (1/31) said, "Well, you know, two-thirds of the America people think that the country is moving in the wrong direction I think the President identified some of the issues people are concerned about. They don't feel comfortable with the healthcare system that doesn't provide enough coverage and costs too much. They're concerned about energy independence. They're concerned about educating their kids to compete in the 21st century. Unfortunately, although the President had some ideas that I think we can work together on a bipartisan basis, you didn't see the sort of bold approaches that would ask America to meet these challenges together. And so, in that sense, I think a lot of Americans watching are thinking can't we do better than what we heard from the President."

Nelson Says Bush Gave A "Strong Speech." Meanwhile, Sen. Ben Nelson said on Fox News (1/31), "I thought it was a very strong speech. The President touched on at least two of the initiatives that I have already got introduced, one for health care for small businesses to help and make sure that small businesses can continue to support and provide health care for their employees. The second, of course, is on border security, which is so important to homeland security, to make sure that terrorists are not coming across. Stop the inflow of illegal immigration. I have a bill with other senators that will do that."

Sheehan, Invited By Democratic Lawmaker, Arrested Before Speech. The Washington Post (2/1, A16, Williams, Lengel, 744K) reports, "Activist Cindy Sheehan was arrested last night after demonstrating in the spectators gallery of the House of Representatives as part of a larger war protest that was held outside the Capitol. Sheehan, who was apparently given a gallery ticket by a member of Congress, began to attract notice about 30 minutes to an hour before President Bush's State of the Union speech." The Post adds, "Sheehan, whose son was killed in Iraq, opened her jacket to reveal a T-shirt that, according to a supporter, gave the number of U.S. war dead and asked, 'How many more?'" She was also "vocal, said U.S. Capitol Police Chief Terrance W. Gainer, and after she ignored instructions to close her jacket and quiet down, she was led out and arrested." Sheehan's sister Dede Miller "told a reporter that Rep. Lynn C. Woolsey (D-Calif.) had invited Sheehan as her guest. Woolsey could not be reached immediately for comment." Late last night, "about 50 protesters marched to the Capitol Police station to demand Sheehan's release." The Washington Times (2/1, Doolittle, 90K) says Woolsey "gave Mrs. Sheehan a seat in the visitors gallery above the chamber. … 'I'm proud that Cindy is my guest tonight,' Mrs. Woolsey said before the speech. 'She has made a difference in the debate to bring our troops home from Iraq.'"

White House Renews Outreach To Senate Republicans. The Bush Administration is renewing efforts to reach out to Senate Republicans in the hope of better coordinating their messages. According to Roll Call (2/1, Billings), "Key Republican sources say the president has shown a heightened interest in working with Congressional Republicans in recent weeks, and last week Bush invited GOP Senators to the White House to articulate that desire. Senators and aides alike suggested the overtures were welcome as they look to securing, and possibly building, their House and Senate majorities this fall." The effort comes "at a time when House and Senate Democratic leaders are working closely to mount a coordinated campaign against the Republicans on ethics, corruption and mismanagement of the government." Roll Call adds, "Senators and aides alike say they expect to hear Republican Senators and the White House hitting the same themes more prominently in the coming weeks and months, particularly on major 2006 issues such as the war on terrorism, American economic competitiveness and values -- all key themes in the State of the Union address."

Lott Won't Rule Out Bid For Senate Majority Leader. Sen. Trent Lott was asked on Fox News' Your World with Neil Cavuto (1/31) if he would consider seeking the Senate Majority Leader position again. Lott said, "I made a decision to run for re-election. That was a decision that was different from what I had planned to do. But, a couple of cataclismic events that occurred in my life along the way including how much my state and my neighbors along the Mississippi gulf coast need help right now. They have invested 33 years in me and I just felt like I couldn't walk away from them at that moment. That's all that went on. I didn't run with the plans, to you know, get back into leadership. I don't know what will happen in that regard. But if the right opportunity came along, why would I not be willing to consider, at least, pursuing that." Lott said he "wouldn't rule it out. But it will depend on what happens. That's a year from now. Or 11 months from now. It depends on elections and what's happening with other people."

House GOP Voting Today On Whether To Hold Full Leadership Election. House Republicans will vote this morning on whether to put their leadership up for a vote on Thursday. Roll Call (2/1, Pershing) reports that the outcome of today's vote is uncertain, but most lawmakers and aides are "predicting that the move for a full slate of elections will fail." At a meeting this morning GOP lawmakers will "hear speeches from candidates for the two currently vacant posts: Majority Leader and Republican Policy chairman. Republican Reps. John Sweeney (N.Y.) and Dan Lungren (Calif.) plan to make a motion to 'vacate' every other elected leadership post below [House Speaker Dennis] Hastert, a call that requires the approval of 117 lawmakers on a secret ballot. … Lawmakers who oppose the idea say that they do not want to establish a precedent where the Conference starts putting its leaders up for a vote every time Members grow restless."

Uncertainty Of Majority Leader Race Seen As Result Of Push For Reforms. The Christian Science Monitor (2/1, Chaddock, 61K) reports, "The uncertainty about who will win Thursday's vote for House majority leader shows how thoroughly the rally cry for reform has altered leadership politics in the US Congress. Thursday's secret ballot was supposed to be a mere formality for Rep. Roy Blunt," but "after weeks of intense campaigning, it's not clear he has enough votes to secure victory. What's changing the race is a growing debate among Republicans about how far they must go to repair the damage caused by last fall's corruption scandals - and those yet to come. Members who say the party can ride out the ethics storm with current leadership are falling in behind Representative Blunt. Those who feel their party needs a change of face and a more collegial leadership style are supporting Rep. John Boehner of Ohio. And those convinced that the party needs a full-course correction are moving toward Rep. John Shadegg of Arizona."

Boehner Criticizes Hastert Ethics Reform Proposal. The Los Angeles Times (2/1, Curtius, 958K) says Boehner "offered rare public criticism Tuesday of House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), saying he disagreed with key elements of Hastert's plan to overhaul the chamber's ethics rules." Boehner "questioned Hastert's call for a ban on travel by House members and their staffs paid for by private groups, indicating he considered such a proposal 'childish.'" The Times notes, "It is unusual for any House Republican, particularly one fighting to join him in the leadership, to publicly question a move by Hastert. Later in the day, Boehner issued a statement modifying his remarks and saying he supported the travel ban. Still, his initial comments, made to reporters, reflected a sense among some Republicans that their leadership may have overreacted to the scandal surrounding lobbyist Jack Abramoff that has yet to result in the indictment of a single member of Congress."

Majority Leader Hopefuls Profiled. The Hill (2/1, O'Connor) adds that the three candidates have "remarkably varied personalities and résumés, and the winner's success in the post will be less about public rhetoric than how he moves bills, schedules the floor and interacts with members in pushing the Republican agenda." Blunt "is the most known quantity among all three candidates running for the post. … Blunt largely inherited DeLay's whip organization and has built off that success, particularly in creating large coalitions of outside lobbyists to pass controversial bills. Given that fact, Blunt's opponents have painted him as the candidate for the status quo, but that status quo has been hugely successful during the first five years of the Bush presidency." Boehner 'has made his ability to manage the conference a central theme of his campaign to succeed DeLay. … It remains to be seen how Boehner's open management style would jell with the Speaker. Hastert worked well with DeLay in large part because DeLay kept things moving quickly, freeing Hastert and his staff to focus on larger issues of relevance to the president and the party. Even Boehner's supporters suggest he would give members enough space to come up short occasionally." Shadegg "is the unquestioned conservative in this race, but he does not have Blunt's experience winning tough votes on the House floor or Boehner's experience moving bills through committee." Shadegg is "offering himself as a face for the party, something DeLay came to embody — for better or worse."

Boehner Has Largest Number Of Former Aides On K Street. The Hill (2/1, Bolton) reports, "Rep. John Boehner (R-Ohio) has had a significantly greater number of former staffers go on to work with lobbying and public-affairs shops around town than Reps. Roy Blunt (R-Mo.) and John Shadegg (R-Ariz.), according to congressional records reviewed by The Hill. This larger alumni network gives Boehner strong allies in the business community should he become House majority leader but also creates a potential liability because of the Jack Abramoff lobbying scandal, which has prompted critics to attempt to cast lobbyists in a negative light. At least 24 former aides to Boehner, chairman of the House Education and the Workforce Committee, have registered as lobbyists or proceeded to work in corporate public affairs and advocacy since leaving Capitol Hill. At least 11 former staffers to Majority Whip Roy Blunt (R-Mo.) have pursued careers at trade associations, public-affairs companies and law firms since working in the House. At least seven former staffers to Shadegg later registered as lobbyists or landed jobs as corporate advocates."

Budget Vote Seen As "Major Test" For Blunt. The Washington Post (2/1, A11, Weisman, 744K) calls today's House vote on final passage of the budget bill "a final major test" in Blunt's bid for Majority Leader. The Post reports "Supporters and opponents of Blunt say passage of the budget bill may not ensure his victory in the leadership vote on Thursday, but its failure could be a serious blow to his bid to succeed DeLay."

House GOP Lobbying Reform Package Will Be Broken Into Separate Bills. House Republican leaders plan to unveil to rank-and-file members its plan for overhauling lobbying rules. Roll Call (2/1, Newmyer) reports, "Acting House Majority Leader Roy Blunt (R-Mo.) said Tuesday that the package would be broken into separate bills. It was unclear, however, whether lobbying reform measures would be separated for the sake of committee consideration and then folded back into a single bill, or whether they would in fact be sent to the floor separately. The bill was widely expected to be introduced this week. But its architect, Rep. David Dreier (R-Calif.), indicated that the compressed time frame for the Republican Conference to consider the plan, as well as other distractions, may delay the party's effort to address the Jack Abramoff lobbying scandal with a legislative fix." The "pending shakeup" in the House GOP leadership is also delaying the effort. The "outcome of the leadership contest could affect the shape of the reform package."

Lawmakers Imposing Limits On Staff Contact With Lobbyists. Meanwhile, The Hill (2/1, Kaplan, Schor) reports, "A growing number of lawmakers aren't waiting around for new lobbying reforms to be enacted. Instead, they are imposing new limits on staffers' contacts with K Street, seeking to cleanse the sudden stain of scandal from once-routine gifts and lunches." House Energy and Commerce Committee aides "are avoiding not just lunches and dinners with lobbyists but any lobbyist-sponsored reception. The mindfulness came after a decree issued last week by the committee's staff director, Bud Albright. … Albright's underlings are not the only staffers struggling to adapt to the new order on the Hill, where lobbyists and lawmakers alike are stepping lightly and laying low. Reps. Pete Sessions (R-Texas), Loretta Sanchez (D-Calif.), Frank Pallone (D-N.J.), David Wu (D-Ore.) and Jerry Weller (R-Ill.) are among the House members imposing internal restrictions of varying intensity on their aides." The Hill also notes that "other members have not flinched since the lobbying scandal first erupted and are operating as usual, reflecting quiet resentment among those who fear that stricter rules would isolate them from the outside world."

Proposal Would Lift Former Members' Access To House Floor, House Gym. The Washington Times (2/1, Dinan, 90K) says the House "is poised to ban former members of Congress who have become lobbyists from both the House floor and members' gym as the first step in what will be a months-long lobbying and ethics-reform debate. Democrats called the changes nearly inconsequential in the scope of serious corruption charges, and said it was a strange place to start. … The changes, which passed the House Rules Committee by voice vote yesterday and were sent to the full House for a vote today, would prohibit former members who are lobbyists from the House floor. Former members and their spouses who are lobbyists would not be allowed in the gym." House Rules Committee Chairman David Dreier "called the change a 'first step in the process' and said the House would address all concerns that Democrats have raised."

Senators Have Sign-Up Lists For Earmarks On Their Web Sites. The Washington Post (2/1, A21, Kamen, 744K) reports in its "In the Loop" column, "Several senators, we're told, have downloadable sign-up lists" for earmark projects "on their Web sites." On her web site, Sen. Lisa Murkowski "invites constituents to send in requests for projects so all Americans will have the chance to pay for things Alaskans don't want to pay for. 'Every federal fiscal year,' she says, 'Alaskans are welcome to submit requests for programs or projects to be funded by earmarks' in appropriations bills. Alaskans could, of course, submit them to their state and local officials, but since there's no state income tax or sales tax, there's only so much money available from the $1.2 billion state budget surplus. But hurry. 'These funding requests are due no later than March 1 of each calendar year,' she notes. You can download 'Senator Lisa Murkowski's Fiscal Year 2007 Project Request Form' and then e-mail it to her at: Funding_Request@murkowski.sen.gov or fax it in."

Burns Aide Says Birthday Fundraiser Was "Test Of Loyalty and Friendship." Roll Call (2/1, Akers) reports in its "Heard on the Hill" column, "That birthday fundraiser last Wednesday for Sen. Conrad Burns (R-Mont.) made the politically vulnerable 71-year-old Senator feel better about his standing with his colleagues, according to one Capitol Hill GOP aide. Without saying how much money was raised, the aide described the event as a 'test of loyalty and friendship,' a referendum on 'how do people feel? Are they gonna stick by him?' Burns' folks felt pretty good about nine Senators, including three committee chairmen, showing up at the fundraiser at the National Republican Senatorial Committee. They were: Sens. Ted Stevens (Alaska), Lisa Murkowski (Alaska), Kit Bond (Mo.), Mitch McConnell (Ky.), John Warner (Va.), Lamar Alexander (Tenn.), George Voinovich (Ohio), and Arlen Specter (Pa.). Voinovich personally offered to come to Montana and campaign for Burn's re-election effort."

OPM Director Says Government Faces "Retirement Tsunami." The Washington Post (2/1, B2, Barr, 744K) reports in its "Federal Diary" column that OPM Director Linda Springer warned that the government "will likely face a 'retirement tsunami' in the next few years and needs to begin taking steps now to expand employment opportunities for the next generation of public servants." Springer "said that 60 percent of the government's 1.6 million white-collar employees and 90 percent of about 6,000 federal executives will be eligible for retirement over the next 10 years. OPM projects that the high-water years will be 2008 through 2010, as baby boomers and others leave Uncle Sam." Springer said it is "imperative for OPM to come up with strategic plans for the federal workforce and how career patterns may change in the future, Springer said. The government cannot afford to be caught by surprise, assuming that it can easily recruit a new generation of employees interested in a federal career that spans decades, she said."

Tomorrow's Prayer Breakfast Called "Demonstration Of Interfaith Worship." The Washington Times (2/1, Duin, 90K) reports, "Tomorrow's National Prayer Breakfast, traditionally an evangelical Christian event, will be a demonstration of interfaith worship Sen. Norm Coleman, Minnesota Republican, is the first Jewish co-chairman, and Jordan's King Abdullah, a Muslim, will attend the breakfast and give a major luncheon speech a few hours later. Several persons close to the event organizers say the keynote speaker will be the rock star Bono, founder of the Irish band U2. A spokesman for Bono, an outspoken Christian and backer of humanitarian causes, did not return calls yesterday."

Bloomberg's "girlfriend" had been "widely seen as a shoo-in as late as last week to head the Federal Deposit Insurance Corp., which oversees the nation's banks. But the NRA wound up maneuvering behind the scenes to block her nomination at the last minute, to send a message to her billionaire boyfriend, sources told The Post. 'It's obvious the NRA hasn't been pleased with the mayor's campaign against guns,' a Senate aide said." The Post notes, "The apparent revenge attack comes after Bloomberg made a 'war on guns' a top priority for his new term." However, Sen. Larry Craig, "who sits on the NRA board, hinted that there was another reason. … 'I think she has more baggage than a friend who's the mayor of New York [at battle with] the NRA,' he told The Post last night. 'That's what I've been told.'"

OTHER NEWS:

On Greenspan's Last Day, Fed Raises Interest Rate A Quarter Point. On Alan Greenspan's final day as Federal Reserve Chairman the Fed raised its benchmark short term interest rate a quarter point to 4.5%. ABC World News Tonight (1/31, story 5, 2:34, Vargas) called Greenspan's departure the "end of an era." ABC (Stark) added that Greenspan leaves the Fed "as he led it, a figure of mythic proportions. While 60% of Americans rate the national economy negatively, 72% approve of the job Alan Greenspan did managing it." President Bush in November 2005: "The era of Chairman Greenspan will always be known as one of phenomenal economic growth." Stark: "Mr. Greenspan will also be missed as a master in times of crisis and the new Fed chairman will have to prove himself a steady hand. Ironically, Elizabeth, that's just what people said 18 1/2 years ago, when Alan Greenspan, then a mere mortal, first took over." Vargas: "History repeats itself."

NBC Nightly News (1/31, story 9, 2:00, Thompson) quoted former Treasury Secretary Robert Rubin." It's not so much that he and his work, in terms of the job as Chairman of the Federal Reserve board, are one, but he and the substance of what he does and what's involved in and engaged in, I think are really one." Thompson: "His support of President Bush's tax cuts led the Senate's leading Democrat Harry Reid to call Greenspan one of the biggest political hacks in Washington. Sometimes knocked, one time knighted, the face of the Fed, rationally exuberant as he leaves."

The Los Angeles Times (2/1, Sing, 958K) reports that the Fed gave Greenspan's successor Ben Bernanke "some flexibility to wage his own battle against inflation." The central bank said "'some further policy firming may be needed.' But for the first time since it began its tightening program, the central bank dropped the word 'measured' — which had become Fed-speak for predictable quarter-point hikes. Dropping that word from the Fed's policy statement is seen as a step to give Bernanke some flexibility, making future rate decisions less predictable and more dependent on economic data."

USA Today (2/1, Kirchhoff, Hagenbaugh, 2.31M) says the Fed's language "was less emphatic than the prior statement that further rate increases were 'likely' to be necessary. Fed officials also removed reference to 'measured' interest rate increases. … Its omission suggests the Fed is that much closer to being done increasing rates, economists say."

The Financial Times (2/1, Balls) adds, "By changing the language in its statement, Fed policymakers were attempting to avoid the impression of committing Ben Bernanke, the new Fed chairman, to further increases, while signalling that further rate increases remained likely, depending on the economic data."

The Washington Post (2/1, D1, Henderson, 744K) adds, "The statement was the first in more than two years that did not indicate the Fed's likely next move, forcing financial markets to accept more uncertainty. … Major banks followed the Fed's action yesterday by lifting the prime rate on business loans to 7.5 percent from 7.25 percent. Many consumer rates, such as on credit cards and home equity loans linked to the prime rate, may rise as well."

The Wall Street Journal (2/1, Ip, 2.11M) adds, "The wording change suggests that prospects for an increase at the Fed's March 28 meeting and after depend on incoming economic data. The Fed expressed no alarm over a sharp slowdown in economic growth in the fourth quarter of 2005, but it remained wary of inflation. Though economic data have been 'uneven, the expansion in economic activity appears solid,' it said."

The New York Times (2/1, Andrews, 1.19M) says Greenspan "left his successor a wide berth to set his own policy but some major uncertainties about the future." Greenspan's signal that "the current series of rate rises was nearing an end" gave Bernanke "freedom to make his own mark on an economy that performed much better during most of the Greenspan era than many experts thought possible when he took over at the Fed in 1987. But the handoff also meant that Mr. Bernanke would face murkier choices at a time of substantial risks that increase the chances for serious missteps."

Greenspan Says Economy Solid, High Energy Prices May Cause Inflation. ABC World News Tonight (1/31, story 5, 2:34, Stark) reported, "The diagnosis today" from outgoing Fed Chairman Alan Greenspan, "an economy that appears solid but remains at risk for inflation pressures from high energy prices. Low inflation, low interest rates, and record prosperity have been hallmarks of the Greenspan tenure."

Forbes Says Greenspan Operated On "Hunches." Steve Forbes writes in the Wall Street Journal (2/1, 2.11M), "Never in history has a central banker received such a cacophony of hosannas as has Alan Greenspan, who officially stepped down yesterday. … Mr. Greenspan's record? Officially measured rates of inflation are lower today than when the Maestro took office." Forbes adds that Greenspan "has left no institutional legacy that can guide his successors, that can be a lasting model for other central bankers here and around the world. In short, Mr. Greenspan operated by his gut, on hunches. He was similar to a pilot who flies without instruments. His instincts are usually right on, but not always." Forbes continues, "Greenspan leaves his successor with another blunder -- the Fed is re-stoking the fires of inflation. … Alan Greenspan's failure to leave a gold-based legacy means poor Ben Bernanke won't be prepared for what will be hitting him -- the most serious resurgence of inflation in 25 years."

Bernanke To Be Sworn In As Fed Chairman This Morning. USA Today (2/1, Kirchhoff, 2.31M) reports that the Senate confirmed Ben Bernanke to replace Alan Greenspan as Federal Reserve Chairman. Bernanke who is scheduled to be sworn in this morning, "was cleared by the Senate on a voice vote with the sole dissent coming from Sen. Jim Bunning, R-Ky., a longtime Fed critic." USA Today adds, "The transition should continue to run smoothly on many levels. Bernanke inherits an economy that has been expanding since late 2001, with steady job growth and healthy business profits. He has pledged continuity with Greenspan's approach, emphasizing the importance of low and stable inflation, flexibility and greater openness. … Still, turbulence is possible. The transition comes at a pivotal time, with the Fed's Federal Open Market Committee deciding when, and how, to wind up its nearly two-year string of interest rate increases. The record housing market is losing steam, energy prices remain high, and the nation is saddled with huge trade and budget deficits. Bernanke is untested in a crisis and has called for more explicit inflation targets, a change in Fed operations."

The Christian Science Monitor (2/1, Trumbull, 61K) says Bernanke "does not arrive on the job with a long track record as a public figure - either in government or in the corner office. Alan Greenspan came to the Fed as a well-known Wall Street economist who had advised President Nixon. Paul Volcker headed the prestigious Federal Reserve Bank of New York. G. William Miller was CEO of Textron. By contrast, Dr. Bernanke is relatively new to the circles of the world's policymaking elite. His rise from Dillon, S.C. - a quiet town of 6,300 - has run along a largely academic track. That changed in 2002, when President Bush named him to one of seven slots on the Federal Reserve Board. Then, last June, he became chairman of the president's Council of Economic Advisers. But if he has spent little time in the limelight, Bernanke is hardly unprepared for the rigors of his new role. His recent post as a Fed governor has put him at Mr. Greenspan's side for three years, helping to shape the Fed's interest-rate policies."

Consumer Confidence Rose In January. The Conference Board said its consumer confidence index rose to 106.3 in January, the highest level since June 2002. The AP (2/1) attributes the rise in the index to growing optimism about the US job market. The AP adds, "A separate report from the Labor Department on employee compensation said wages and benefits paid to civilian workers rose 3.1 percent last year, the smallest amount in nine years. The department said the slowdown reflected a big drop in benefit costs — items like health insurance and pensions — which rose by 4.5 percent last year after jumping 6.9 percent in 2004."

Survey Finds Manufacturers Optimistic About Economy's Prospects. The Wall Street Journal (2/1, Golden, 2.11M) reports, "US manufacturers expect solid revenue growth, a higher level of new investment, more hiring, and an upturn in mergers and acquisitions activity during 2006, according to a PricewaterhouseCoopers survey. Some 76% of the 62 senior executives interviewed for the accounting and consulting firm's quarterly 'Manufacturing Barometer' survey during the fourth quarter of 2005 said they were optimistic about the U.S. economy's prospects over the next 12 months, up from 45% in the third quarter. Only 2% are pessimistic, according to PricewaterhouseCooper's and 22% have an uncertain outlook. Seventy-one percent are optimistic about the world economy, up from 54% of executives in the previous quarter. Also, 61% of those surveyed plan to increase their workforce over the next 12 months, up from 52% in the third quarter last year and 53% one year ago."

Paychecks Did Not Keep Pace With Inflation Last Year. The Labor Department said that employee paychecks failed to keep pace with inflation last year. The Wall Street Journal (2/1, Preciphs, 2.11M) reports, "Total compensation costs -- wages and benefits -- for civilian workers rose a seasonally adjusted 0.8% in the October-December period, following a similar increase in the third quarter. Benefit costs for the period rose 1.1%, while wages and salaries trailed with a 0.8% increase, the department said. Compensation costs rose 3.1% for all of 2005, down from a 3.7% increase the year before. Last year's increase was the smallest annual increase since 1996. Wages and salaries were up 2.6% for the year, not enough to compensate for inflation, which averaged 3.39%. Meanwhile, the costs of benefits such as health insurance rose 4.5% for the year, a marked slowdown from the 6.9% surge in 2004."

Foreign Auto Companies Creating New Jobs In US. A front page story in the Wall Street Journal (2/1, Shirouzu, 2.11M) say that "massive job cuts by Detroit have overshadowed an important change in U.S. manufacturing. Asian and European auto companies, looking for skilled workers to make complex products, have created nearly enough new jobs in the U.S. to make up the difference. … The new jobs buoying the U.S. manufacturing sector require that workers have a decent education. It is the towns that understand this new math that are winning the work. Employees need skills to operate and maintain complex, computer-controlled machinery. Top-tier automotive suppliers such as Denso, Robert Bosch GmbH and Delphi Corp. use similar equipment and techniques to make competing products. The difference between them, therefore, often comes down to whose workers can produce the most goods at the highest quality. … Denso's top executives say they expect to expand their work force to meet demand from Toyota and other Asian auto makers flocking to southern states. Currently at 380, Denso's work force in Osceola could increase to more than 3,000, company executives say. Denso executives know Osceola still faces big challenges in improving its education but say they were attracted by the town's commitment to tackling its problems.'

Stocks Declined Tuesday. Stocks finished the day down yesterday following a Federal Reserve decision to raise interest rates for 14th time in nearly two years. The AP (2/1, Martinez) says the Fed "failed to give Wall Street a clear signal on when those rate increases would end." The Dow Jones industrials fell 35.06 points to 10,864.86. The Standard & Poor's 500 index lost 5.12 points to 1280.08. The Nasdaq composite slipped 0.96 points to 2305.82. Reuters (2/1) also attributes the indexes' declines to "jitters about the outlook for interest rates."

Chicago Federal Court Opens Help-Desk For Pro Se Suits. The Washington Post (2/1, Lydersen) reports that "the U.S. District Court for the Northern District of Illinois in Chicago has launched a program to provide free legal assistance for people in filing pro se federal lawsuits." The Post continues, "Judges and lawyers here who advocated for the help-desk program -- which was launched early last month as the District Court Self-Help Assistance Desk -- describe it as a win-win situation for all. It serves as a filter, weeding out frivolous cases or cases that do not belong in federal court, while aiding people with legitimate complaints. … 'Lots of times we've had pro se complaints that are literally gibberish,' said District Judge William J. Hibbler, who was involved in founding the help desk. 'Trying to make heads or tails of their complaints was a big effort. There might be a kernel of a case there, but it's so poorly articulated that it gets dismissed. People need technical help to formulate complaints in such a fashion that we can deal with them.'" The Post adds, "The idea came about through conversations last fall between U.S. district judges here and the Chicago Bar Foundation, the charitable arm of the Chicago Bar Association. State and circuit courts and bankruptcy courts around the country have provided similar programs for people without attorneys, but this help desk is thought to be the first of its kind in federal court. … The Chicago Bar Foundation put up more than $100,000 to fund the program and hire the lawyer who staffs the desk full time. The lawyer, who has federal court experience, is employed by the Legal Assistance Foundation."

office found that the leader of the World Jewish Congress, Israel Singer, violated his fiduciary responsibilities and barred him and a former executive from any financial role in the organization, according to a settlement disclosed yesterday." AG Eliot Spitzer's office "also identified shortcomings in the organization's financial controls, record keeping and fund-raising, but said it found no evidence of criminal wrongdoing."

Putin Says Russia Will Not Support Aid Cutoffs To Palestinians. The Washington Post (2/1, A19, Finn, 744K) reports that though Russian President Vladimir Putin described the Hamas victory in the Palestinian elections "as 'a big blow to American efforts in the Middle East, a very serious blow,'" he said Russia "would not support any efforts to cut off financial assistance to the Palestinians." At his "annual news conference in the Kremlin," Putin said, "Our position on Hamas is different from that of the United States and Western Europe. The Russian Foreign Ministry has never regarded Hamas as a terrorist organization. But this does not mean that we totally approve and support everything that Hamas has done." The Washington Times (2/1, Borowiec, 90K) reports that Putin added, "A refusal to help the Palestinian people would be mistaken."

Wolfowitz Also Says World Bank Should Continue Aiding Palestinians. The Financial Times (2/1, Beattie) reports World Bank President Paul Wolfowitz also said the Bank "should continue delivering aid to the West Bank and Gaza in spite of last week's electoral victory" by Hamas. Wolfowitz said the Bank "was operating in Palestinian areas at the request of the 'quartet' of the US, the United Nations, Russia and the European Union. 'What we do now depends on what the quartet asks us to do,' he said. 'I hope they will ask us to stay.'"

Quartet's Urging Of Hamas To Reform Seen As Unrealistic. The New York Times (2/1, Erlanger, 1.19M) reports that the "quartet" nations "have lined up in solidarity with Israel in calling on Hamas…to modify its radical policies." In a Monday statement, the quartet said Hamas "'must be committed to nonviolence, recognize Israel and accept the previous agreements and commitments,' like the Oslo accords that set up the Palestinian Authority and the 'road map' peace plan, which calls for the dismantling of armed groups like Hamas. All that pleased Israel, its diplomats said Tuesday. But it is like asking Hamas to convert to Christianity, they concede."

Palestinians Debate Role Of Religion In Hamas Governance. The New York Times (2/1, Fisher, 1.19M) reports that Palestinians are debating to what extent, "by law or by social pressure, Hamas will "impose its strong religious beliefs." So far, Hamas leaders, "seeking to calm both Palestinians and an anxious outside world, have projected moderation. They say they will not impose on the Palestinians' diverse society any form of Islamic rule." But "given Hamas's roots in the wider Islamic movement, the pledge is not entirely convincing for many in the tiny and dwindling Christian population, or among secularists and observant Muslims who want a more secular state." Meanwhile, the Washington Times (2/1, Mitnick, 90K) profiles the West Bank town of Qalqilya, where Hamas "swept all 15 municipal council seats eight months ago, only to lose the area's two parliamentary seats in the face of voter disappointment."

Political Bureau Chief Says Hamas "Shall Never Recognize" Israel. Hamas Political Bureau leader Khaled Meshaal, in a Los Angeles Times (2/1, 958K) op-ed headlined 'We Shall Never Recognize…A Zionist State On Our Soil,' writes, "The day Hamas won the Palestinian elections, the world's leading democracies failed the test of democracy. Rather than recognize the legitimacy of Hamas as a freely elected representative of the Palestinian people, seize the opportunity created by the result to support the development of good governance in Palestine and search for a means of ending the bloodshed, the U.S. and the EU threatened the Palestinian people with collective punishment. We are being punished simply for resisting oppression and striving for justice. … Our message to the U.S. and EU is this: Your attempt to force us to give up our principles or our struggle is in vain. … Our message to the Israelis is this: We do not fight you because you belong to a certain faith or culture. Jews have lived in the Muslim world for 13 centuries in peace and harmony. … Our conflict with you is not religious but political. … We shall never recognize the legitimacy of a Zionist state created on our soil in order to atone for somebody else's sins or solve somebody else's problem."

Rice Confident Russia, China Will Support Iran Referral To Security Council. Reuters (1/31, Pleming) reports Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said she "was confident of Russia and China's support for sending Iran's nuclear case to the U.N. Security Council, but expected differences over exactly what steps to take." Rice said, "There is a very strong consensus on what the problem is and that the problem has to be dealt with. I expect there will continue to be tactical differences about timing. There may even be tactical differences about precisely what is required but that's the hard work of the diplomacy." Russia and China are "now expected to vote 'yes' on Thursday instead of abstaining, a senior State Department official said." Knight Ridder (1/31, Landay) adds that the two nations, "which have huge financial stakes in Iran, had been resisting the vote. … Their about-face underscored the depths of their frustrations with the hard-line Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's regime and made it likely that a majority of the 35-member IAEA board of governors would vote to haul the Islamic republic before the Security Council."

The Washington Post (2/1, A18, Kessler, Linzer, 744K) writes the IAEA's governing board "will meet in Vienna tomorrow to discuss whether to report the continuing impasse over Iran's nuclear ambitions to the U.N. Security Council. By coincidence, tomorrow is also Groundhog Day. In the four years since President Bush first cited the dangers of Iran's nuclear program in his 2002 State of the Union speech by labeling it part of the 'axis of evil,' the administration has struggled to galvanize other nations to take action against the potential threat of Iran obtaining nuclear weapons. For 2 1/2 years, the administration has pressed the IAEA to go to the Security Council. Yet, at IAEA board meeting after board meeting, a decision to formally report the matter to the Security Council has been put off."

White House "Very Pleased" By IAEA Report On Iranian Nuclear Efforts. The Wall Street Journal (2/1, Champion, Crawford, 2.11M) reports, "An interim report to be delivered by IAEA inspectors at the agency's emergency board meeting tomorrow will detail continuing gaps in Iran's compliance with the IAEA, including the agency's conclusion that a document Iran obtained on the nuclear black market serves no other purpose than to help make an atomic bomb. First mention of the documents was made late last year in a longer IAEA report, but the agency refused at that time to make a judgment on what possible uses such information would have." The CBS Evening News (1/31, story 2, 2:30, Roberts) reported, "On the Iran issue, White House officials…are very pleased with this IAEA report. While they felt they didn't need it and believed that Iran has plans to build all or part of the nuclear bomb, they say this is a reason to haul Iran before the UN Security Council." The New York Times (2/1, Sciolino, Broad, 1.19M) reports, "The four-page report, which officials say was based at least in part on intelligence provided by the United States, refers to a secretive Iranian entity called the Green Salt Project, which worked on uranium processing, high explosives and a missile warhead design."

Iran Refuses To Turn Over Black Market Weapons Document. Knight Ridder (2/1, Landay) reports, "Iran is refusing to turn over to U.N. investigators a copy of a black market document it could use to build nuclear weapons, according to a confidential U.N. report Tuesday. The document, which Iran received from an international nuclear smuggling ring, describes aspects of fabricating the explosive core of a nuclear bomb. The document is one more piece of evidence supporting concerns that Iran is pursuing a nuclear weapons program in the guise of peaceful nuclear power research." The Washington Times (2/1, Jahn, 90K) reports that the IAEA said the document "serves no other purpose than to make an atomic bomb." Agence France Presse (1/31) adds that the IAEA report "indicates several areas where Tehran is suspected of doing atomic work that could be military related."

Belgian Intelligence Chief Quits Over Exports To Iran. The Wall Street Journal (2/1, 2.11M) reports Belgian intelligence chief Koen Dassen "resigned after it emerged that warnings from the U.S. Central Intelligence Agency went unheeded and the country's state security agency failed to stop a Belgian company from exporting nuclear-sensitive equipment to Iran. A Belgian parliamentary committee revealed the Iranian export yesterday," a day after Dassen "quit over accusations the agency failed to inform the government about the CIA's warnings."

Persian Gulf States Increasingly Critical Of Iranian Nuclear Efforts. The New York Times (2/1, Fattah, 1.19M) reports, "After years of hesitating, Persian Gulf states are joining the call for tougher action on Iran's nuclear efforts, increasingly worried that a nuclear Iran could set off a regional arms race. In recent weeks, Saudi officials and other gulf leaders have called for Iran to abandon its nuclear research, without demanding that Israel disarm first. Separating those two demands is a major policy change, and many experts see the shift as a sign that Iran's Arab neighbors may even back United Nations sanctions against Iran."

Ahmadinejad Reaching Out To Latin American Populist Leaders. The Washington Post (2/1, Vick, 744K) reports, "On the afternoon of Jan. 4, Iranian President

Mahmoud Ahmadinejad reached for the phone and got Latin America on the line. In quick succession, he chatted with President Fidel Castro of Cuba, rang up President Hugo Chavez of Venezuela and, sensing yet another kindred spirit, reached out to Evo Morales, the young firebrand who had just been elected president of Bolivia. Person-to-person and peer-to-peer, the transatlantic calls described on Ahmadinejad's presidential Web site linked self-styled populists who glory in defying the West. But for Iran, the exchanges carried significance reaching well beyond Ahmadinejad and the controversy enveloping him personally after questioning the Holocaust and saying Israel should be 'wiped off the map.' In its bid to proceed with a nuclear program opposed by Washington and Western Europe, Iran's leadership appears settled on a revived policy of confrontation with 'global arrogance,' as the country's rulers have referred to the foreign policy of United States for almost three decades. But the contest is now being framed as a David-vs.-Goliath battle, and Iran is seeking to attract relatively poor, disempowered nonaligned nations to its side, not simply the Muslim world it once saw itself as leading, Iranian officials and analysts say."

Nuclear Arms Control Experts Say Russian Deal Would Create New Problems. In a New York Times (2/1, 1.19M) op-ed, Valerie Lincy and Gary Milhollin of the Wisconsin Project on Nuclear Arms Control write, "Although the [IAEA] is now likely to report Iran to the Security Council, America and the Europeans agreed that the United Nations will wait at least a month before deciding on any punishment. There is little doubt what this cooling-off period is intended for: further negotiations on a proposal that would have Iran shift its large-scale, energy-related uranium enrichment work to Russia. … The Russian deal actually poses more problems than it solves. First, even if Russia took over Iran's nuclear energy work, the religious radicals in Tehran would be left with a huge amount of dangerous equipment. … Second, Iran draws a distinction between the energy-related work that would go to Russia and other enrichment activity that it likes to call 'research.' When Iran broke the international seals at three enrichment sites last month and resumed work, its Foreign Ministry said the move was done only for scientific interests and had nothing to do with weapons. Even with a Russian deal, Iran is likely to insist on its right to continue such research. … Last, the proposal, if accepted, would shatter the coalition of states that is finally working together to restrain Iran. Russia would certainly end its tepid support for Security Council action and would agree to let the Iranians continue their 'research.' The United States is equally certain to refuse such a concession."

OPEC Agreement, Iranian Pledge Lower Oil Tensions. The Wall Street Journal (2/1, Bahree, 2.11M) reports, "OPEC yesterday endorsed an agreement to keep pumping nearly all the oil it can." Meanwhile, "Iran's oil minister, Kazem Vaziri Hamaneh, said Tehran wasn't linking its oil exports to the dispute" over its nuclear research. "The Iranian stance provides a measure of reassurance that OPEC can continue to meet rising global oil needs, which have sent prices soaring toward $70 a barrel this year. Still, it isn't clear whether the Iranian oil minister's statement is Tehran's final word on the role the country's oil exports will play in the standoff."

Oil Producers Investing, Diversifying. The New York Times (2/1, Mouawad, Porter, 1.19M) reports, "oil producers…are experiencing a boom," and while "lavish projects are finding financing," the Arabian peninsula's "main oil producers, like Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, Qatar and the United Arab Emirates, have gotten wiser. Since the boom started three years ago, they have paid down their debt, saved more money than ever before and created more jobs in the private sector. And they are trying to diversify their economies away from oil and its increasingly volatile cycles."

As Muslims Boycott Danish Products, Danish PM Defends Journalistic Freedom. The New York Times (2/1, Cowell, 1.19M) reports, "As Islamic protests spread about cartoons of the Prophet Muhammad in a Danish newspaper, Anders Fogh Rasmussen, the Danish prime minister, defended press freedom in his country on Tuesday but distanced himself from the newspaper's decision to publish the drawings. His remarks fell far short of the apology demanded by an array of Islamic groups and countries which have imposed a remarkably successful boycott of Danish products," but "some Islamic leaders in Denmark said they were satisfied by the actions by the Danish newspaper and prime minister."

Mauritania Reaffirms Ties With Israel, Opposition To Terrorism. The Washington Times (2/1, Constantine, 90K) reports, "Mauritania, the sprawling Islamic nation on the northwest coast of Africa, this week reaffirmed its commitment to fight terrorism shoulder to shoulder with its Western allies and to continue its diplomatic relations with Israel." Mauritanian Foreign Minister Ahmed Ould Sid Ahmed "called Mauritania's ties with the United States 'of paramount importance' to the moderate Islamic republic," and added, "We have said no to terrorism and we shall not back away from our diplomatic ties with Israel."

Putin Seeks To Counter Criticism Of Russia. The New York Times (2/1, Myers, 1.19M) reports, "President Vladimir V. Putin on Tuesday defended Russia's handling of natural gas disputes with Ukraine and Georgia, boasted of a new strategic weapon and defended the country's contribution to the Group of 8 in response to suggestions from some critics at home and abroad that his policies have disqualified it from the club of elite democratic nations" with "only a hint of the temper that has flashed in previous public appearances." By "saying Russia had no intention of using gas or oil as an energy weapon," he tried to counter "some of the harshest foreign criticism the Russian government has faced" "also sought to reassure those worried about the state's growing role in the economy through its state-owned companies."

Ukraine Gas Deal Puts Spotlight On RosUkrEnergo. The New York Times (2/1, Kramer, 1.19M) reports, "Four weeks after Ukraine cut a deal to import natural gas through RosUkrEnergo, a shell entity based in Switzerland, the obscure company is facing an uncomfortable amount of attention. After becoming one of Europe's biggest energy traders overnight with the Ukraine deal, the company promised changes to become more open about its operations," but its "secretive nature has driven the Parliaments of both Ukraine and Russia to open investigations." Analysts who follow Gazprom say RosUkrEnergo's "role as a front for the unnamed owners has become an embarrassment for" the company.

Chavez Pressures Spain On Arms Deal. The Washington Times (2/1, Hearn, 90K) reports, "Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez pressed Spain yesterday to declare whether it plans to go ahead with a sale of military planes and patrol boats, despite objections from the United States," which "denied an export license for Spain to sell the transport and maritime surveillance planes, which contain American-made technology. For the same reasons, it has blocked plans by a Brazilian aerospace company to sell Caracas 36 military planes. U.S. leaders want to keep sensitive technologies away from Mr. Chavez," and "both countries have the option of replacing the U.S. parts and proceeding with the sale. But experts say that would require considerable time and money and could risk diplomatic tensions with Washington." Meanwhile, "Chavez is repeating threats to seek military equipment from Russia and China."

Bachelet Begins Chilean Presidency With Change. The Christian Science Monitor (2/1, Ross, 61K) reports that Michelle Bachelet, Chile's first female president," named "a cabinet of 10 female and 10 male ministers," marking "a significant change to the political status quo," which is "expected to be the first of many." However, "some experts question whether she'll sacrifice competence for image," although "the relative lack of public uproar over Bachelet's cabinet - and her very election - seems to reflect a profound socio-cultural change."

Ignatius Says US, French Cooperating Diplomatically. David Ignatius writes in his column in the Washington Post (2/1, A23, 744K), "The Elysee Palace has become one of the White House's most important and effective allies." The White House "is now working hard to conduct its foreign policy in tandem with international allies and, where possible, through the United Nations. America's key intermediary in this search for international consensus has been France," and "in framing policy on Syria and Iran, the French and Americans have consciously played a good cop-bad cop routine." While "Paris and Washington still disagree sharply on the substance of many issues," both "seem to have concluded that they'll get more of what they want if they collaborate rather than bicker. Indeed, the quiet partnership has probably benefited from the fact that the world still thinks France and America are enemies."

Dowd Assails "Ham-Handed Bush Foreign Policy Crew." In her column in the New York Times (2/1, 1.19M), Maureen Dowd says "clearly, the Bush foreign policy team doesn't understand any of the markets where it is barging around ineptly trying to sell America and democracy." Opinion of the US overseas "has been in steady decline. The state of the union is sour but the state of the world is chilling, thanks to a hideously ham-handed Bush foreign policy crew that was once billed as a seasoned 'dream team.'" Dowd goes on to say, "The more the White House tries to force-feed democracy to tempestuous parts of the world, the more it discovers that you may be able to spin and scare voters in the US, but the Middle East is not so easy to manipulate. W. believes in self-determination only if he's doing the determining. Fundamentalists in America like to vote for Mr. Bush, but elsewhere they're violently opposing him. It's stunning that nearly four decades after Vietnam, our government could be even more culturally illiterate and pigheaded. The Bushies are more obsessed with snooping on Americans than fathoming how other cultures think and react."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Civil Liberties Group Sues AT&T For Cooperating With NSA Surveillance. The New York Times (2/1, 1.19M) reports, "The Electronic Frontier Foundation, a civil liberties organization, filed a class-action suit against AT&T on Tuesday in federal court…saying the company was violating the law and customers' privacy in cooperating with the National Security Agency on computerized surveillance. … In its suit, the foundation says the company has allowed the agency direct access to phone calls and Internet data moving over its network, as well as access to a vast database of call records." EFF attorney Kevin Bankston "said the group was not at liberty to say how it knew that the company and the spy agency were cooperating, but said it was confident that there was an illegal relationship."

The Los Angeles Times (2/1, Menn, 958K) adds, "The suit cites newspaper articles, including one by the New York Times, for disclosing the eavesdropping program aimed at terrorist communications with sympathizers and others inside the United States. Also cited was a Los Angeles Times report that the National Security Agency had access to an AT&T database tracking calling records."

CNN's The Situation Room (1/31, Tatton) noted that "everyone affected could receive $21,000 or more. … Now, we have seen lawsuits before from organizations like the ACLU, targeting the government on the NSA program. This one specifically looks at…AT&T on behalf of the customers."

Waters Calls For Bush Impeachment Over NSA Program. Fox News' Special Report (1/31, Garrett) reported, "Today eight-term California Democrat Maxine Waters said the President should be impeached for authorizing the warrantless surveillance of Americans."

Feingold Says Gonzales Misled Congress About Warrantless Wiretaps. CNN's The Situation Room (1/31, Arena) reported, "Sen. Russ Feingold is accusing the Attorney General of misleading Congress during his confirmation hearings last year, when he was asked about warrantless wiretaps. … Feingold, who wasn't briefed about the program, says he wants an explanation." Feingold: "The chief law enforcement officer of this country apparently told the committee under oath that something was merely hypothetical, when in fact he knew very well and was involved in it, actually being an ongoing practice.'" CNN added, "Justice Department officials say that there was nothing misleading about Gonzales' statement and that the President is on firm legal ground. Gonzales is scheduled to testify all day Monday."

Senate Seen As Pulling Back On Deference To Bush Over War Powers. The Christian Science Monitor (2/1, Chaddock, 61K) reports, "Since 9/11, the Bush White House has moved aggressively to expand presidential power in wartime, at the expense of Congress. Until recently, the Republican-controlled Congress went along. … But that deference may be ending." With the NSA surveillance program hearings and the Patriot Act renewal, "the Senate, especially, is gearing up to make the case that power between the executive and legislative branches is unbalanced." The Monitor notes, "The issue is looming so large that the White House devoted a full week in the run-up to this week's State of the Union Address to defuse the issue. Instead of 'domestic spying' -- the term used most often in the press -- the White House described the program as 'terrorist surveillance.' Recent communication from" Ayman al-Zawahiri "appeared to reinforce the threat."

Moussaoui's Mother Calls For Fair Sentencing. The AP (2/1, Devailly) reports, "The mother of Zacarias Moussaoui…said Tuesday she wants her son judged for his actions -- not because he is Arab or an Islamist. Aicha El Wafi's lawyer, Patrick Baudouin, appealed to the U.S. justice system not to 'make a martyr'" of Moussaoui. El Wafi "said she plans to go to the United States on March 6, when testimony is to start in the penalty phase of her son's trial." The AP notes, "Prosecutors will try to convince jurors that the FBI would have prevented the Sept. 11 attacks if Moussaoui had told federal agents what he knew about al-Qaida's desire to fly planes into U.S. buildings."

UK Judge Warns Jurors Al Masri Not On Trial For Political Views. BBC (1/31) reports on its Web site, "Alleged race hate cleric Abu Hamza al-Masri is not on trial for his political views, a judge has warned. Starting his summing up, Mr Justice Hughes said Mr Abu Hamza's views were only relevant in deciding if they led him to commit the charges he faced. He told the Old Bailey jury: 'It is not an offence to suggest western societies are corrupt or have no moral basis'. … He also told the jury to 'Keep an eye on the ball' regarding Mr Hamza's views. 'Exercise a similar restraint and caution about his views generally. Confine your inquiries to whether or not he has committed the offences on which he is charged,' he said."

PATRIOT ACT:

Congress Set To Extend Patriot Act Temporarily Until March. The AP (2/1, Kellman) reports, "Congress is poised to extend the USA Patriot Act into March to give the White House and conservative Senate Republicans time to strike a deal that would strengthen civil liberties without weakening the war on terror. When in March was still up in the air late Tuesday. The House is set to vote Wednesday on extending the law until March 14," but "Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist was pushing for a vote earlier in the month." The AP notes, "Objections to the compromise last fall centered on the degree to which people and institutions that receive National Security Letters…can appeal them in court." However, Sens. Larry Craig and John Sununu say that "six weeks might be enough to strike a deal on the matter with the White House." In its "Washington Wire" column on its web site, the Wall Street Journal (1/31, 2.11M) reported, "President Bush again pushes Congress to renew the Patriot Act, but only another short-term extension appears to be in sight."

The San Francisco Chronicle (1/31, A4, Epstein) reports that the controversy of the NSA surveillance program may complicate the Patriot Act renewal and notes, "The wrangling in the latest version has narrowed to disagreement over how to curb the FBI's access to Americans' library, bookstore, business or Internet records for terrorist investigations; what rights the targets of so-called national security letters have in appealing such orders for information; and how long after agents conduct secret searches must they notify their target."

Conference Report Contains Non-Terror Law-And-Order Provisions. Knight Ridder (2/1, Kuhnhenn) reports that "tucked away in the pending renewal of the Patriot Act -- the nation's controversial law to fight terrorism -- is a provision" inserted by Sen. Jon Kyl "that could make it harder for state death-row inmates to appeal their cases in federal court. The provision is one of a handful that neither the House of Representatives nor the Senate has voted on but which Republican lawmakers crafted during closed-door negotiations last year after Democrats had been excluded from the talks. Another obscure addition, never debated in Congress, would broaden existing laws that prohibit disturbances at any event -- such as those involving the president -- at which the Secret Service is providing protection. Civil libertarians say it could restrict free-speech rights in the name of security."

More Commentary. Investor's Business Daily (2/1) editorializes, "With the Feb. 3 deadline for renewing the Patriot Act looming, kicking the can down the road again is not an option. Had it been in place on Sept. 10, 2001, Sept. 11 might not have happened." IBD continues, "If your house were on fire, and firemen had to kick your door down and break a few windows to save you and your family, would you consider that an invasion of your privacy or a violation of your civil liberties? … Yet that is precisely the attitude Senate Democrats take regarding the Patriot Act despite evidence that it has infringed on no one's rights, except perhaps on the freedom of terrorists to plot mass murder undetected and unmolested." IBD adds, "When Sen. Harry Reid successfully led a Dec. 16 filibuster blocking reauthorization, he reportedly bragged: 'We killed the Patriot Act.' If he and his colleagues prevail in blocking its renewal, or succeed in gutting its effective provisions, that may be the epitaph on the tombstones of Americans killed in the next attack."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

New Hampshire Stores Report "Middle Eastern-Looking Men" Seeking Trac Phones. The Portsmouth (NH) Herald (1/31, Dinan) reports Portsmouth police "are investigating two reports about 'Middle Eastern-looking men' buying quantities of 'trac phones' at city stores Saturday." At "unnamed Woodbury Avenue store," 15 of the phones were sold "to the men, according to the city's public police log. The purchase was made by credit card, and the information was forwarded by Portsmouth police to Newington and state police." Two hours later, "local police received information that the Boston office of the Federal Bureau of Investigation received a call from a Wal-Mart customer reporting 'two Middle-Eastern men' who reportedly approached the store manager, asking to buy 500 to 600 trac phones. When they were told the store did not have that many on hand, they left the store, then the area in a car with Massachusetts plates, says the city police log."

GAO Report Offers "Blunt" Criticism Of Federal Response To Katrina. Knight Ridder (2/1, Borenstein) reports, "Despite ample warning of an impending catastrophe, the federal government bungled its response to Hurricane Katrina because of a void of leadership and confusion about who was in charge, an independent investigation ordered by Congress has found. The Government Accountability Office, the investigatory arm of Congress, in a preliminary report to be released Wednesday faulted Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff and his designee, former Federal Emergency Management Agency chief Michael Brown, for not filling a crucial 'leadership role during Hurricane Katrina.'" KRT adds that "the GAO's conclusion is striking for its bluntness. 'No one was designated in advance to lead the overall federal response in anticipation of the event despite clear warnings from the National Hurricane Center,' GAO Comptroller General David M. Walker's prepared remarks read. The speech faults the federal government, saying it 'did not act decisively or quickly enough.'"

Louisiana Officials Acknowledge Failures In Wake Of Katrina. The New York Times (2/1, Lipton, 1.19M) reports, "Government complacency, poor planning and dereliction of duty during Hurricane Katrina contributed to the deaths of dozens of the frail and sick in New Orleans, and to the suffering of many others who were stranded in area hospitals and nursing homes unable to care for them, Senate investigators said Tuesday. In the second day of Senate hearings on the hurricane response, the focus was on what investigators called perhaps the most outrageous chapter of the storm: the mistreatment of nursing home and hospital patients during the disaster." Officials from the State of Louisiana, the City of New Orleans and the state association of nursing homes "acknowledged a long list of failures that meant there was no coordinated or tested plan in place to evacuate the frail, sick or poor, though studies had warned for more than a decade that an estimated 100,000 New Orleans residents without transportation would need such help in a major hurricane."

USA Today (2/1, Hall, 2.31M) reports "Bradberry acknowledged that although the Louisiana Office of Homeland Security required him to develop evacuation plans, he didn't agree with the assignment. Among the reasons he cited for not drawing up plans was a lack of resources the state needed to carry out the evacuations. Senate Homeland Security Committee Chairwoman Susan Collins, R-Maine, called it 'inconceivable' that officials didn't make it a priority to save nursing home and hospital patients. At least 200 died." Sen. Joe Lieberman said, "I don't feel that you've acknowledged enough responsibility here."

The Los Angeles Times (2/1, Neuman, 958K) "In hearings before the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee this week, witnesses offered instances in which good intentions went awry and bureaucratic inertia stymied recovery efforts in the aftermath of the storm." The Times adds, "Throughout the hearings, witnesses underscored the costly consequences of a lack of central command and breakdowns in communication." Meanwhile, "The Bush White House has refused to provide key documents or allow administration officials to testify, asserting executive privilege. Collins has accused the White House of crippling the inquiry."

Independent Investigators Granted Access To Site Of Levee Breach. The New York Times (2/1, Schwartz, 1.19M) reports, "It took a special agent of the Louisiana state attorney general's office and some bureaucratic sparring, but members of an independent team of engineering investigators won access on Tuesday to the site of a major levee breach from the Army Corps of Engineers. It is unusual for engineers to bring law enforcement agents to job sites, but the investigators said they wanted to ensure access to the levee at the 17th Street Canal in the face of what they contend is a pattern of resistance by the engineering corps." The investigators say the corps "has also refused to release information needed to fully understand the levee failures that left so much of New Orleans shattered and soaked." Meanwhile, "Corps officials have suggested that [the] group is eager to jump to conclusions about causes of the levee breaches, and complained that the teams sometimes show up at work sites unannounced."

WAR NEWS:

US Renews Commitment To Afghanistan Aid.

The Financial Times (2/1, Morarjee) reports, "The US will lead the world in a renewed commitment to Afghanistan's battle against narcotics and a resurgent Taliban." US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said, "For us, it is a strategic partnership." British Prime Minister Tony Blair "also pledged $800m in aid in the next five years." The New York Times (2/1, Cowell, 1.19M) says the Administration "pledged Tuesday to seek Congressional approval for a further $1.1 billion in aid to help rebuild Afghanistan next year, roughly the same amount sought for 2006." A conference on future aid to Afghanistan "agreed on what it called the Afghanistan Compact, a five-year blueprint to restore the country's security, build a functioning economy and counter the rapidly expanding narcotics trade." It "is intended as a successor to an agreement reached in 2001 after the overthrow of the radical Islamic Taliban government."

The Washington Times (2/1, Kralev, 90K) quotes Rice saying, "In addition to our current commitment of nearly $6 billion, today, I'm proud to announce that President Bush will ask our Congress for $1.1 billion in new assistance to support the Afghan people in the next year."

Karzai Unveils Five-Year Plan To Strengthen Democracy. The Washington Post (2/1, A19, Sullivan, Witte, 744K) reports, "Diplomats from more than 60 countries began pledging aid and investment for Afghanistan at a conference here Tuesday, as President Hamid Karzai outlined a five-year plan," called the Afghan Compact, "to strengthen democratic institutions and combat terrorism and drug-trafficking in his struggling nation." Karzai "listed his country's successes," noting "that the country has a constitution and an elected president and parliament. He said that 6 million children are now attending schools in a system that was totally collapsed and that economic output has grown by 85 percent." Yet "Afghanistan remains a place of staggering illiteracy, with a massive gap between a comfortable elite and millions of poor. A flourishing illegal poppy trade supplies more than 87 percent of the world's opium. Karzai acknowledged that 'we have a long road ahead.'" And for "ordinary Afghans, there was little awareness Tuesday that the conference was taking place."

Dutch Lawmakers Question Military Commitment To Afghanistan. Lousewies van der Laan and Bert Bakker, members of the Democrats 66 party in the Dutch parliament, in an op-ed in the Financial Times (2/1) write, "On Thursday, the Dutch parliament will debate whether the Netherlands should expand its military presence in Afghanistan. The country currently participates in the Nato reconstruction mission in the north of the country with 368 troops and more than 250 Dutch special forces fight in Operation Enduring Freedom in Kandahar in the south. This makes the Netherlands the seventh largest contributor to Nato's International Security Assistance Force, ahead of 19 other Nato members." Yet the "tone of the debate is one of 'you are either with us or against us'. … A substantial debate on command structures, evacuation plans and respect for human rights should replace threats about the loss of credibility and influence. That will require a mature debate about the future of Nato, as well as the world's long-term commitment to Afghanistan. The time for that debate is now."

Afghan Ambassador To US Alleges Bias In DC Against His Compatriots. The Washington Times (2/1, McElhatton, 90K) reports, "Afghanistan's ambassador to the United States wants the Washington Metropolitan Airports Authority to investigate complaints from Washington Flyer cabdrivers about what he called 'racial and Muslim profiling.'" The Times adds, "Some Afghan-American drivers are upset about 'having been discriminated against' in dealings with the Washington Dulles International Airport taxi concessions operator, Ambassador Said Tayeb Jawad wrote in a letter Monday to airport officials"

Rice Says Everything Possible Being Done To Secure Release Of US Hostage In Iraq. The AP (2/1, Reid) notes, "U.S. officials said they have ruled out meeting the kidnappers' demand to release all Iraqi women in detention." Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said, "Everything is being done to work with those who might have influence, and there are an awful lot of people who are calling for her release."

Kidnappers Threaten To Kill German Hostages In Video. The AP (2/1, Reid) reports that "a new video from kidnappers threatened to kill two German hostages if Germany fails to stop cooperating with the Iraqi government." The AP continues, "Kidnappers threatened to kill Thomas Nitzschke and Rene Braeunlich if Germany does not close its embassy in Iraq, withdraw all the German companies from Iraq and stop cooperating with the Iraqi government within three days."

Reuters (2/1) adds, "A new tape of the hostages showed them next to masked individuals who pointed automatic rifles at them. It was dated January 29."

Eleven Men Found Tortured, Slain In Insurgent Stronghold In Iraq. The New York Times (2/1, Worth, 1.19M) notes, "The bodies of 11 young men, some of them shot repeatedly and bearing marks of torture, were found in a minibus on Tuesday in western Baghdad, Interior Ministry officials said." They "were found near Ghazaliya, an insurgent stronghold where Iraqi security forces have been accused of detaining, torturing and killing groups of Sunni Arab men in the past. But the 11 bodies were not immediately identified, and no group stepped forward either to take responsibility for or to denounce the killings."

Local Officials Among Victims In Scattered Attacks Across Iraq. The New York Times (2/1, Worth, 1.19M) in its article on the latest violence in Iraq reports that "scattered attacks took place across central and southern Iraq. In the Dawra district of southern Baghdad, gunmen opened fire on a car carrying two members of the Dawra district council, killing them both, the local police and witnesses said." And in "western Baghdad, gunmen shot and killed Malik Razoki Abd, the leader of another district council." Local officials "in Mahmudiya, south of the capital, said an American aircraft fired a missile that damaged three houses and wounded three civilians. But American military officials said they had no report of an airstrike. The Iraqi Interior Ministry reported two different incidents in Mahmudiya: a roadside bombing and a mortar attack on a house. The attacks left four civilians wounded, the officials said."

The AP (2/1, Reid) reports, "On Wednesday, a bomb exploded alongside a group of Iraqi men waiting for work in eastern Baghdad on Wednesday, killing at least eight and wounding more than 50, police said." The AP notes, "Sunni Arab and Shiites extremists have been carrying out reprisal killings that have claimed hundreds of lives and sharpened sectarian tensions as Iraqi politicians try to form a new government after Dec. 15 national elections. The killings come at a time when U.S. officials are pushing the Iraqis to include more Sunni Arabs, who form the backbone of the insurgency."

Poll Shows Sunnis Reject New Government, Support Attacks Against US Soldiers. The Washington Times (2/1, Sands, 90K) reports a poll of 1,150 Iraqis conducted Jan. 2 to Jan. 5 (+/- 3%) shows, "Iraq's restive Sunni Arabs overwhelmingly reject the legitimacy of the new government in Baghdad, approve of attacks on U.S.-led forces and think the country is heading in the wrong direction." The "major new" poll, "conducted in the first week of January after the successful Dec. 15 parliamentary vote, found that Iraq's Shi'ite Arabs and ethnic Kurds remain far more optimistic about the country's future compared with the minority Sunnis, who dominated Iraq under Saddam Hussein." It "offered both good and bad news for the Bush administration. The Dec. 15 vote produced a spike of optimism among Iraqi Shi'ites and Kurds, while Sunnis continue to reject the legitimacy of the new government being formed in Baghdad."

Death Toll For British Soldiers In Iraq Reaches 100. The AP (2/1) reports, "A British soldier was killed in a roadside bombing Tuesday, the second member of the country's armed forces to die in Iraq in as many days and the 100th fatality since the conflict began nearly three years ago, officials said." The New York Times (2/1, Worth, 1.19M) in its article on the latest violence in Iraq notes, "Southern Iraq has generally been much more peaceful than other areas, but in recent months tensions have grown between the British and the Shiite militia members. A rising number of soldiers have been killed and wounded in roadside bombings, and Basra's provincial governor, Muhammad al-Waeli, has twice threatened to cease cooperating with British forces after they detained groups of Iraqis."

Bloomberg (2/1) adds, "A total of 77 members of the U.K. forces have been killed in action and 23 have died from illness, non-combat injuries, accidents or unknown causes, the ministry said on its Web site. About 230 soldiers were injured in combat, the spokesman said."

Foreign Minister Denies Report Japan Would Complete Troop Withdrawal In May. The AP (2/1, Reid) reports, "Japan's Kyodo News agency said Tokyo will begin withdrawing troops from Iraq in March and complete the pullout by May, ending its largest military mission since World War II. Japanese Foreign Minister Taro Aso denied the report, saying no specific timetable had been discussed." The AP adds, "Kyodo said an agreement on the timetable had been reached during a secret meeting among officials from Australia, Britain, Japan and the United States." But a British Ministry of Defense spokesman "said he was unaware of such a meeting but that London speaks to its coalition partners frequently."

Saddam Trial To Resume Despite Absence Of Defense Lawyers. The New York Times (2/1, Worth, 1.19M) in its article on the latest violence in Iraq notes, "Court officials announced Tuesday that the trial of Saddam Hussein would resume Wednesday, though it was not clear who would be in the courtroom. Mr. Hussein's chief lawyer, Khalil al-Dulaimi, said he and the rest of the defense team would not return after they walked out in protest on Sunday." But new chief judge Raouf Abdel-Rahman "may not allow them back in even if they want to return. Judge Abdel-Rahman ejected Mr. Hussein and the other three lead defendants from the courtroom on Sunday, and it will be up to him to bring them back or not."

Kurds Attempt To Block Spread Of Avian Flu. The New York Times (2/1, Oppel, 1.19M) reports, "Urging villagers in the border areas to cull their poultry was one tactic Kurdish authorities adopted to try to prevent bird flu from spreading south from Turkey, after an outbreak was reported there in December." Officials "also outlawed the sale of live chickens in many places and banned the import of poultry raised or processed in Turkey. Vehicles crossing the border are now sprayed with disinfectant in case they have traces of bird feces, while passengers and drivers are checked for symptoms." But "given the close commercial ties to Turkey and the prevalence of chickens in the villages, where eggs are a crucial source of food and income, public health experts had warned it was only a matter of time before the disease spread."

Australia Blocks US Inquiry Into Oil-For-Food Scandal. Bloomberg (2/1, Daley) reports, "Foreign Minister Alexander Downer said Australia opposed a U.S. congressional inquiry into allegations AWB Ltd., the nation's monopoly wheat exporter, paid kickbacks to Saddam Hussein's former Iraqi regime." Downer said, "We were concerned an American congressional or senate inquiry would be an inquiry driven substantially by American commercial interests. … The U.S. is our principal competitor on the international wheat trade."

ABC Reporters Wounded In Iraq Arrive In US For Treatment. The New York Times (2/1, Landler, 1.19M) reports, "The ABC News anchor and cameraman wounded in a roadside bombing in Iraq arrived Tuesday night at the National Naval Medical Center in Bethesda, Md., after a brief stay at a military hospital in Germany." One "doctor who treated both of them in Germany said Tuesday that the men had made 'remarkable' progress since being admitted there Monday. The anchor, Bob Woodruff, has been able to move his fingers and toes, said the doctor, Lt. Col. Guillermo Tellez, the chief of surgery at Landstuhl Regional Medical Center."

Wounded Veterans Face Lifetime Of Recovery. The CBS Evening News (1/31, story 9, 2:45, Schieffer) reported, "With the number of wounded in Iraq and Afghanistan now topping 16,000, we wanted to know how the government is treating these heroes when they return home." CBS (Martin) added, "Walk into the physical therapy room at Walter Reed Army Medical Center and you know this is a nation at war. No matter how many times you come here, there's no getting used to so many young Americans missing so many limbs." And "Whether they're in the VA system or at Walter Reed, the casualties of Iraq will be fighting this war for the rest of their lives."

50,000 US Troops Have Been Retained Under "Stop Loss" Policy. The Christian Science Monitor (2/1, Regan, 61K) reports in its "Terrorism and Security" column, "'Stop-loss,' a policy used by the Army to keep US soldiers and reservists in the military beyond the date when their service was supposed to end, has been used on more than 50,000 members of the armed forces since the war in Iraq began. Currently stop-loss is being used to extend the duty of 12,500 troops. Reuters reports that the measure applies to units about to deploy to Afghanistan or Iraq. Under the policy, soldiers who normally would leave when their commitments expire must remain in the Army, starting 90 days before their unit is scheduled to depart, through the end of their deployment and up to another 90 days after returning to their home base. With yearlong tours in Iraq and Afghanistan, some soldiers can be forced to stay in the Army an extra 18 months. The military argues that it is a necessary step to preserve the cohesive nature of a unit, especially one ready to fight, and courts have backed the military so far in any challenges against the policy. But critics say it is just another illustration of how stretched out the US Army and reserves have become, and that could undercut increased effort to attract new recruits."

Massachusetts National Guard Soldiers File Lawsuit To Recoup Costs. The Christian Science Monitor (2/1, Llana, 61K) reports, "After 9/11, hundreds of thousands of America's part-time soldiers answered the call to serve. Along the way, some have asked whether the costs they bear -- from insufficient body armor to mounting debt for their families at home -- is fair." But Massachusetts National Guard soldiers "have filed a class-action lawsuit claiming they are owed $73 million in food, lodging, and commuting expenses they paid out-of-pocket while activated under state orders to protect sites such as military bases and reservoirs from terrorist attacks." It "is believed to be the first of its kind nationally, and raises new questions about what the government owes its men and women in uniform."

Proposal To Disperse Special Ops Oversight Could Face Congressional Opposition. The Hill (2/1, Tiron) reports, "A Bush administration proposal to fold a civilian office tasked with oversight of the Pentagon's special-operations forces could face stiff resistance in Congress." According to Hill sources, "Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld is considering a proposal to eliminate the office of the assistant secretary of defense for special operations and low-intensity conflict (ASD SO/LIC) and spreading its responsibilities across other Pentagon offices." If Rumsfeld "agrees to the idea, the Pentagon would face an uphill battle in getting the plan endorsed by Congress." The Hill notes, "Sources familiar with the dynamic in the office of the undersecretary for policy said that infighting and tension between" Ryan Henry, the principal deputy undersecretary of defense for policy, "and the assistant secretary's office could have led to the several proposals made so far to change or disenfranchise the office. However, others point out that the office is not without its own faults." One former government official said, "A lot of the SO/LIC problems are self-inflicted. … SO/LIC has missed opportunities to transform the special-operations forces."

In 1999, UN Report Noted Human Rights Abuses In Iraq. In its "History Lessons" column, the Washington Times (2/1, 90K) excerpts a March 31, 199 release from the UN Information Service which said, "Max van der Stoel, Special Rapporteur on the situation of human rights in Iraq, introducing his annual report, said that over the past eight years, he had submitted almost one thousand pages of reporting on this topic, and all the while serious human rights violations had continued without the slightest indication of any change in the Iraqi Government's policy or of any effort or intention to improve the situation. All the while, the Government had simply denied everything. Mr. van der Stoel said he now had the sad duty to tell the Commission [on Human Rights] once again that there were credible allegations of numerous and systematic arbitrary executions in Iraq; interferences with the independent religious practices of the Shi'ite community; continuing internal deportations of ethnic Kurds; violations of the rights to food and health; and violations of the rights of the child."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Defense Attorneys Says Fraud Not Responsible For Enron Collapse. The CBS Evening News (1/31, story 7, :45, Schieffer) reported, "In Houston today, opening statements in the trial of Enron founder Ken Lay and former CEO Jeff Skilling. The prosecution said Skilling and Lay dumped their Enron stock before a massive fraud was exposed and the stock tanked. But defense attorneys said fraud what fraud? They said no books were cooked and Enron's bankruptcy was caused by what they said was a temporary drain on its liquidity."

NBC Nightly News (1/31, story 8, :45, Williams) reported, "Prosecutors say the company was a ticking time bomb in its last months and Lay and Skilling covered it up. Skilling's lawyer said there was no fraud involved in the Enron collapse, saying the company fell victim to an unanticipated cash crisis."

The New York Times (2/1, Barrionuevo) adds, "Daniel Petrocelli, Mr. Skilling's lead lawyer, vowed to attack the government's case by defending the allegedly fraudulent accounting that the government now says it will not focus on," and Michael Ramsey, Mr. Lay's lead lawyer "laid out a case that will blame outsiders, including short-sellers, The Wall Street Journal and Enron's own over-reliance on trading to produce profits, for stoking the crisis of confidence that led to the company's descent to the largest bankruptcy filing in history at the time."

The Washington Post (2/1, A1, Johnson) adds, "Defense lawyers for both men adopted an aggressive, all-or-nothing approach. Either their clients are guilty of every charge or none of them, they said. Both men, their lawyers vowed, would take the witness stand in their own defense."

USA Today (2/1, Farrell) adds that Ramsey's statement was "a burst of bravado that bordered on trash talking," and he concluded "by telling jurors that 'on the major issues in this case, we're going to kill them.'"

The AP (2/1, Hays, McClam) reports, "Former Enron Corp. chiefs are seeking much more than a 'not guilty' in the government's premier criminal trial to emerge from the company's stunning collapse. They want to exonerate Enron, too." The AP continues, "Their lawyers steadfastly asserted Tuesday that the men have committed no crimes, nor did they look the other way while minions cooked the books because Enron was never rife with corruption and greed. … 'This is not a case of hear-no-evil, see-no-evil,' said former CEO Jeffrey Skilling's lead attorney, Daniel Petrocelli, at times punctuating his opening statement by jabbing his finger at jurors. 'This is a case of there was no evil.'"

The Wall Street Journal (2/1, McWilliams, Emshwiller) also reported on this story.

Prosecution Trying To Make Simple Case Based On False Statements. The Financial Times (2/1, McNulty, Ward) adds that "government prosecutors alleged" Enron "'told lie after lie' about its financial condition." Prosecutor John Hueston, "keeping his arguments simple and avoiding unfamiliar business terminology," said, "This is not about accounting. It is about lies and choices."

The New York Times (2/1, Barrionuevo) adds that Hueston "said the government would focus not on the Byzantine accounting that many have attributed to the criminal activity inside Enron, but on the purportedly misleading statements that Mr. Skilling and Mr. Lay gave to investors in 2000 and 2001." He "painted a picture of a company whose stunning rise in profits was accounting 'hocus pocus.'" The opening statements made "clear that Enron's sudden failure — and the reasons behind it — were as much on trial here as Mr. Skilling and Mr. Lay."

USA Today (2/1, Farrell) adds, "In contrast to Ramsey's all-out assault, the government's opening argument Tuesday morning seemed almost understated."

The Wall Street Journal (2/1, McWilliams, Emshwiller) adds, "The two sides did agree on one fundamental issue: Messrs. Lay and Skilling were in charge at Enron and knowledgeable about the company's operations. They disagreed about whether those operations involved illegal activities."

The Chicago Tribune (2/1, Lazaroff) reports, "Lay and Skilling, Enron's top two executives, lied to investors and employees about the company's mounting financial problems as they sold millions of dollars worth of Enron stock, a government prosecutor told a packed federal court Tuesday. .. 'The two men at the helm of this company told lie after lie,' said Asst. U.S. Atty. John Hueston. 'Lies that deceived shareholders and lies that misled the public.'"

Texas Lawyer (2/1, Jeffreys) reports, "During his opening statements, Hueston said several former Enron employees who earlier pleaded guilty to criminal charges will testify at the trial, including Andrew Fastow, who was the chief financial officer; Ben Glisan, former treasurer; Mark Koenig, former head of investor relations; and Ken Rice, former head of Enron Broadband Services. Fastow pleaded guilty to one count of conspiracy to commit wire fraud and one count of conspiracy to commit wire and securities fraud. He awaits sentencing. … Petrocelli, Skilling's defense attorney, told jurors his client will testify. … 'You could not keep him off this witness list. He is going to tell you in his own words,' Petrocelli, a partner in O'Melveny & Myers in Century City, Calif., told jurors on Tuesday."

Bloomberg (2/1, Calkins) reports, "U.S. District Judge Sim Lake is presiding over the trial, whose outcome will be determined by a jury of eight women and four men. Lay is charged with seven counts of fraud and conspiracy, plus four counts of bank fraud that will be tried separately after the first trial. Skilling faces 31 counts of fraud, conspiracy and insider trading. The two men are presenting a joint defense."

Former Citigroup Exec Settles Insider-Trading Charges With SEC. The Wall Street Journal (2/1, Scannell) reports, "The Securities and Exchange Commission charged a former Citigroup Inc. senior vice chairman, Victor Menezes, with insider trading and agreed to settle the allegations for $2.68 million. … According to the SEC complaint, Mr. Menezes sold almost $30 million of Citigroup stock ahead of an earnings shortfall related to those losses. By selling stock before the announcement, the SEC alleges, Mr. Menezes avoided losses of more than $1.5 million. … 'We're very pleased to have reached an agreement with the SEC and to put the matter behind him,' said Elkan Abramowitz, his attorney."

USA Today (2/1, Smith) reports, "SEC enforcement attorney Scott Friestad, who brought the case, said Menezes 'knew significant negative information that the market did not.'" When he sold his share. USA Today also reports, "It is the latest unflattering episode at Citigroup during the final years under Sanford Weill, who stepped down as CEO last year and will relinquish his chairman's title this year. Citigroup amassed unparalleled size and scope in global markets but was implicated in lapses ranging from the Enron fraud to the Wall Street research scandal. Menezes, who quit in December 2004, was the bank's chief liaison to regulators when the SEC notified him of its probe in 2004." The article also notes, "if the SEC had chosen to prosecute Menezes, it faced the burden of proving he knowingly violated federal securities laws because he cleared the sale through Citigroup's legal department."

Documents Highlight Oracle Exec's Debt, Lifestyle. The USA Today (2/1, Swartz) reports, "Software billionaire Larry Ellison, one of the world's most conspicuous consumers, was advised to go on a crash financial diet four years ago as his spending soared on yachts and mansions. It's unclear whether Ellison, 61, heeded the advice from Philip Simon, his personal financial adviser, which surfaced in newly disclosed public documents in a shareholder lawsuit in San Mateo County. They show Simon warning that Ellison faced a possible financial crisis in 2002 if he didn't slash his $1 billion in personal debt, curb hundreds of millions of dollars in spending, and diversify his portfolio by selling some of his Oracle stock. … The documents show that by 2001-02, Ellison had racked up more than $1 billion in debt in loans for which he had pledged Oracle shares as collateral." The article notes, "The lawsuit was settled in San Mateo County Superior Court in November. Without admitting wrongdoing, Ellison agreed to donate $100 million to charity and paid another $22 million to the lawyers who sued him. The settlement is being appealed by a shareholder."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Key Government Witness Against Campbell Stands Firm Under Cross-Examination. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (2/1, Scott, Warren, 430K) reports, "A key government witness who broke down in uncontrollable sobs while testifying for the prosecution against former Atlanta Mayor Bill Campbell didn't crumble Tuesday as defense attorneys fought to shake his story. Dewey Clark, a former mayoral aide who lived for years in Campbell's basement, held his ground during about five hours of grilling by defense attorney Jerry Froelich during Campbell's public corruption trial." The Journal-Constitution notes, "Froelich lacerated prosecution witness Michael Sullivan on the stand last week, but he couldn't shake Clark's story that he took cash from a city contractor, George Greene, and a nightclub owner, Michael Childs, and gave it to Campbell. … Froelich questioned why Clark didn't initially tell the FBI about the alleged bribes from Childs to the mayor when investigators first knocked on his door in 1999. Clark said he only told on his buddy Childs in 2000 after reading in the newspaper that Childs, upset he couldn't get the liquor licenses, was planning to hire a thug to beat up Campbell to send a message to the next mayor."

Libby Defense Lawyers Outline Likely Defense. Lawyers for Vice President Dick Cheney's former chief of staff Lewis Libby outlined his likely defense to charges he lied about his role in exposing the identity of IA operative Valerie Plame Wilson. The New York Times (2/1, Lewis, 1.19M) reports, "In papers filed in federal court, the lawyers strongly suggested they would argue that if Mr. Libby's statements to investigators were untrue, it was a case of innocent confusion or faulty memory because of his preoccupation with weightier national security matters at the time. … The lawyers for Mr. Libby said that the conversations Mr. Libby had with reporters in the summer of 2003 in which he might have discussed Ms. Wilson's association with the Central Intelligence Agency 'occurred in the midst of an unending torrent of meetings, briefings and discussions of far more urgent and sensitive issues, including for example, the detection and prevention of terrorist attacks against the United States,' bringing stability to Iraq and the spread of nuclear weapons in North Korea and Iran."

The Wall Street Journal (2/1, Squeo, 2.11M) adds, "In asking a federal judge to order the special prosecutor in the case to turn over certain documents, Mr. Libby's attorneys suggested they want to demonstrate the breath of 'urgent and sensitive matters' that he handled. The defense team wants copies of Mr. Libby's own notes, which the prosecutor took as part of the investigation, as well as morning intelligence briefings dating from May 2003 through March 2004 -- the time between the leak of former Central Intelligence Agency official Valerie Plame's identity and Mr. Libby's discussions with Federal Bureau of Investigation agents and grand-jury testimony."

The Washington Post (2/1, A5, Leonnig, 744K) adds that Libby's attorneys "also asked that the court require Special Counsel Patrick J. Fitzgerald to turn over any informal assessments conducted by the CIA to determine whether the leak of Plame's identity in July 2003 damaged national security or agency operations. … Defense lawyers argued in court papers that it is crucial to determine whether Plame was not an undercover operative at the time Libby was discussing her with members of the media, and whether little or no damage was done to national security when her identity was publicly disclosed. If either is true, the defense argued, it will 'challenge the prosecution's contention that Mr. Libby has reason to lie to the FBI and the grand jury about his conversations with reporters in July 2003.'"

Suspected Murderer Recaptured After Mistaken Release. The Los Angeles Times (2/1, Blankstein) reports, "A violent ex-convict suspected of slashing a man to death in the first murder in Beverly Hills in years was at large for four days after he was released from the Los Angeles County jail last weekend, apparently by mistake, officials said today.

Nathan Hall, 50, was recaptured this morning in the parking lot of the Beverly Hills Police Station, in which his impounded car was being stored, authorities said. Sheriff's deputies, already under criticism over their administration of the county's troubled jail system, said that Hall had been released after an order to hold him for violating parole on previous convictions was lifted, according to a preliminary investigation. The action was taken at the direction of the California Department of Parole, according to the sheriff's department, and Hall was released Saturday morning. Corrections officials could not immediately be reached for comment."

US Indicts Former Bank Of China Officials In $485 Million Theft. CNN.com (2/1) reports, "Two former Chinese bankers and their wives were indicted in Las Vegas in connection with a massive scheme to steal and launder nearly half a billion dollars from the Bank of China, Justice Department officials announced Tuesday." CNN continues, "The former managers of the state-owned Bank of China are alleged to have been engaged in an elaborate plot in which they stole $485 million by running funds through front companies and financial institutions in Hong Kong, Vancouver and Las Vegas, officials said. They allegedly planned to immigrate to the United States with their wives and gain citizenship through schemes involving phony documents and sham marriages." CNN adds, "A federal grand jury in Las Vegas brought the new charges against the defendants, who were first jailed in September 2004 on charges of violating immigration laws for trying to illegally gain U.S. citizenship. … A third Chinese banker involved in the alleged conspiracy has pleaded guilty in Las Vegas and returned to China, where he is being prosecuted for embezzlement and bribery." CNN notes, "In Washington, Assistant Attorney General Alice Fisher issued a statement commending prosecutors for untangling what she called a 'complex scheme of racketeering, money laundering and fraud'. … 'We will continue to work closely with our international partners to make sure that the United States is never seen as a haven for criminals to launder the proceeds of their illegal conduct,' Fisher said."

Reuters (2/1) also reports on the indictments.

Former Wal-Mart Exec Pleads Guilty To Wire Fraud, Tax Evasion. The Wall Street Journal (2/1, Zimmerman) reports, " Former Wal-Mart Stores Inc. Vice Chairman Thomas Coughlin, who left the company amid accusations he misappropriated as much as $500,000, pleaded guilty yesterday to federal wire-fraud and tax-evasion charges. A company icon who had worked closely with founder Sam Walton, Mr. Coughlin, 57 years old, is expected to spend at least two years in prison after a presentencing report is finished in about three months. Federal prosecutors made a sentence recommendation in their plea agreement with Mr. Coughlin. However, U.S. District Judge Robert Dawson sealed the plea agreement, saying he was concerned about pretrial publicity." The article notes that the former No. 2 Wal-Mart executive "took home millions of dollars in compensation," but "secretly had the retailer pay for a range of his personal expenses, including part of a hunting lease, handmade alligator boots and contact lenses."

The AP (2/1, Kabel) reports, "The judge ordered a presentencing report that will take up to four months to prepare. … Wal-Mart lawyers referred Coughlin to federal prosecutors after discovering Coughlin had embezzled money from the company and used expense vouchers to buy products as varied as snakeskin boots, hunting trips and Bloody Mary mix. They estimated losses at up to $500,000. … In federal court, Coughlin spoke only when he was asked questions by U.S. District Judge Robert Dawson. Afterward, defense lawyers issued a statement in which Coughlin accepted responsibility for 'serious personal mistakes in judgment.'"

Five Dead In Postal Facility Shooting. Several papers report on a former postal employee's shooting rampage in California on Monday, where a woman killed five former co-workers and critically wounded another. All of the papers mention that this may be the deadliest workplace shooting carried out by a woman. In addition to offering details of the shooting from witnesses, all include background both on the incident and on the woman's history at the Post Office. Additionally, all of the newspapers recall the spate of postal shootings of the late 1980s and early 1990s, which spawned the phrase "going postal." Of the papers, only the New York Times and USA Today identify the shooter.

The New York Times (2/1, Archibold) reports, "A woman who had left her Postal Service job because of psychological problems shot and killed five former colleagues and critically wounded another at a sorting plant here Monday night before fatally shooting herself, the authorities said Tuesday. The woman, identified as Jennifer Sanmarco, 44, of Grants, N.M., a former employee of the Santa Barbara Processing and Distribution Center, confronted employees with a 9-millimeter handgun, the authorities said. The 80 or so employees in the building fled as she fired, reloading at least once, said Sheriff Jim Anderson, of Santa Barbara County. The authorities had not determined if she was selecting the victims, all women except one, or shooting at random in what was one of the deadliest rampages at a Postal Service building. After working as a sorting clerk for six years, the woman went on medical disability for unspecified mental problems in June 2003 after co-workers reported her acting strangely and called sheriff's deputies, postal authorities said."

Coverage includes step-by-step accounts of the shooting, sourced to the local sheriff's department. For example, the Los Angeles Times (2/1, Chawkins, Muskal) reports, "According to the Sheriff's Department, the woman entered the facility by car, apparently scooting her compact behind another car to get into the parking lot past the barrier. … Once in the parking lot, she shot two women. One died and the other remained in critical condition today with a gunshot to the head, Anderson said. The shooter then went through the parking lot killing another person. She used a key card to enter the building, and another body was recovered just inside the door, authorities said. Farther inside the building she shot two more people before turning the 9-millimeter pistol on herself." The Los Angeles Times also names the victims.

Also typical of coverage is quotes from local officials. All of the papers included comments from Goleta Mayor Jonny Wallis. For example, the Washington Post (2/1, A3, Geis) reports, "Goleta Mayor Jonny Wallis expressed shock and sorrow at a news conference. 'An act of violence is always a shock to the soul, but especially in a small community such as ours, where our neighbors are our friends and where violence of any kind is extremely rare,' she said. 'A day at the office should not result in death.'"

USA Today (2/1, Kasindorf) leads with the shooter's gender. The article says, "The shooting deaths of five people by a former postal worker may have been the worst U.S. workplace murder ever committed by a woman, according to experts in on-the-job violence. … Northeastern University criminologist James Alan Fox said it was highly unusual for such an act to be committed by a woman. The incident was also the first fatal shooting at a postal installation since a letter carrier shot and killed a postal clerk in Dallas in 1998." The article also notes, "Postal installations were the sites of several high-profile shootings during the mid-'80s and early '90s. The Goleta incident was the worst since a 1986 rampage in Edmond, Okla., in which a letter carrier killed 14 people."

Report Recommends Moratorium On Death Penalty In Georgia. The Fulton County Daily Report (2/1, Pollak) reports, "Because Georgia cannot 'ensure fairness and accuracy in every capital case,' it should implement a moratorium on executions and death penalty prosecutions, an American Bar Association study states." The Report continues, "Anne S. Emanuel, a Georgia State University College of Law associate dean who chaired the 21-member ABA team, said the state government should stop working on capital cases until it can address problems with jurors' application of mitigation evidence and the lack of free habeas corpus lawyers for indigent death row inmates. … 'We're not saying a death penalty is never appropriate,' said Emanuel. 'We're saying you should dot the I's and cross the T's.'" The Report adds, "Russ Willard, a spokesman for Georgia Attorney General Thurbert Baker, said the state's top lawyer opposes the moratorium recommended by the ABA report. … 'Our office continues to review the ABA report, but this appears to be a lobbying packet put together in an effort to have the Legislature make changes to the state process,' said Willard." The Report notes, "The ABA report said that one of the 21 members of the team, Harry D. Dixon Jr., a former U.S. Attorney for the Southern District of Georgia, did not agree with the call for a moratorium. … Among the problems cited in the 325-page report are inadequate pattern jury instructions on mitigation. … The study said that Georgia capital jurors often misunderstand the applicable burden of proof for mitigation, as well as the scope of mitigating evidence. Approximately 40 percent of the jurors interviewed for the study did not understand that any evidence could be used in consideration of mitigation. In addition, 62 percent thought the defense had to prove mitigating factors beyond a reasonable doubt. …

The report also criticized Georgia for not appointing counsel for state habeas proceedings, noting that only Georgia and Alabama do not provide indigent death penalty defendants with attorneys in such proceedings."

Relatives Of Red Lake Shooting Victims Frustrated By Meeting With US Attorney. The AP (2/1, Forliti) reports, "After nearly a year of waiting for details on a student's shooting rampage in which 10 people died on the Red Lake Indian Reservation, many victims' relatives said they were frustrated and angry after a private meeting with a federal prosecutor Monday." The AP continues, "Much of the case has been handled in juvenile court, which has kept information about the worst U.S. school shooting since Columbine out of public view, including the victims' families. … The March 21 shootings started at the home of Jeff Weise's grandfather, where Weise killed the older man and his companion. Weise then killed five students, a teacher and a security guard before killing himself at Red Lake High School in northern Minnesota." The AP adds, "U.S. Attorney Tom Heffelfinger refused to disclose details about Monday's meeting. … But he said he told family members about a federal report on school shootings that had several points relevant to the incident at Red Lake High. … 'One of those points is that in most school shooting situations, other people knew about the shooter's plan,' Heffelfinger said." The AP notes, "Those who attended said they learned 39 people knew Weise had planned the shootings and that four or five had more specific knowledge. … Heffelfinger would not confirm that, but said it's not illegal for people to do nothing if they know a crime is going to be committed."

Rowland Testifies Before Federal Grand Jury In Continuing Corruption Probe. The New York Times (2/1) reports, "Former Gov. John G. Rowland of Connecticut appeared yesterday as a witness before a grand jury in Hartford in response to a subpoena from federal prosecutors, who continue to investigate corruption stemming from his time in office, according to Mr. Rowland's lawyers. … 'It was a full-day proceeding,' said R. Bartley Halloran, one member of Mr. Rowland's legal team." The Times continues, "Mr. Rowland, who pleaded guilty just over a year ago to conspiring to betray the public trust by taking improper gratuities, was taken to Hartford on Monday by federal agents from the federal prison in Loretto, Pa., according to his lawyers. He was allowed to change into a suit and tie before testifying, said Ray Levites, Mr. Halloran's co-counsel on the case. Mr. Rowland spoke without using notes, Mr. Halloran said. … 'He has testified and testified truthfully,' Mr. Halloran said yesterday. He declined to specify any of the topics under discussion, given the secrecy rules governing grand jury testimony."

The AP (2/1) reports, "Rowland was expected to be back at the Loretto Federal Correctional Institution Tuesday night and remain there to serve out his corruption sentence until his scheduled release on Feb. 12, said his attorney, R. Bartley Halloran. … 'Former Gov. Rowland appeared today pursuant to a lawfully issued subpoena and responded to questions,' Halloran told The Associated Press as he left the U.S. attorney's office at the federal building in Hartford Tuesday afternoon." The AP adds, "Rowland admitted accepting gifts from friends, employees and state contractors. He pleaded guilty on Dec. 23, 2004, to one count of conspiracy to steal honest services, a combination of mail and tax fraud. The plea stemmed from Rowland's acceptance of more than $100,000 in vacations and chartered trips to Las Vegas. … Last March, the former Republican governor was sentenced to one year and one day in federal prison, followed by four months of home confinement and three years of probation. Because of federal sentencing rules, Rowland is eligible to be released after approximately 10 months served." The AP notes, "Assistant U.S. Attorney Nora Dannehy, who led the Rowland probe, has said the public corruption investigation that ensnared Rowland and several others is not over. One outstanding matter includes millionaire businessman Robert V. Matthews, a longtime Rowland friend who prosecutors said purchased Rowland's Washington, D.C., condominium in 1997 through a straw buyer for twice its value."

Philadelphia FBI, Community Advocates Launch Crime Witness Outreach Program. The Philadelphia Daily News (1/31, DiFilippo) reports that many crime witnesses "are frightened by reports of witnesses who've been harmed, which is why local law-enforcement agencies and community advocates have united to launch an outreach program," Step Up, Speak Up "to encourage people to come forward." The program, announced Monday, "is a partnership involving the FBI-Philadelphia's community-relations unit, Mothers In Charge and Clear Channel Outdoors," and it "calls for town-hall meetings in high-crime areas…where law-enforcement officials will talk about crime-fighting efforts and the role of witnesses in thwarting thugs. … Community activists and cops also plan to hand out T-shirts emblazoned with the campaign's name and slogan: 'Step Up, Speak Up.' Supporters would like to see the…shirts replace the controversial 'Stop Snitchin' T-shirts that spurred the campaign. … 'Things are upside down if we allow that to take root in our community and allow it to be the mainstream,' said Jack Eckenrode, FBI agent in charge in Philadelphia. 'If you don't have a witness, you might as well just give it up. Not every case is built on wiretaps, and even the ones that are need witnesses.'" The News notes "campaign organizers speculate that some witnesses feel intimidated even when no actual danger exists. And they say many people have misconceptions about what cooperation entails. 'People think the FBI records and traces every phone call it receives,' FBI spokeswoman Jerri Williams said. 'We don't.'"

The Philadelphia Inquirer (1/31, Pompilio, 423K) reports, "Desperate to stem the problem of witness intimidation, local law enforcement officials are taking new steps to protect those who come forward, including working with the U.S. Justice Department to provide relocation services for witnesses in non-federal cases at no cost to the city. … The 'Step Up, Speak Up' campaign is more focused on education. … 'Soon, we hope we'll see our T-shirts being worn by the people who once wore the other T-shirts,' said Ron Hosko, assistant special agent in charge of the FBI's Philadelphia Office. Witness intimidation has been a continuing challenge for police and prosecutors nationwide and particularly in Philadelphia, where the widely held belief is, 'snitches get stitches.'"

Philadelphia Daily News Welcomes Program. The Philadelphia Daily News (1/31) editorializes, "Thanks to fear -- real and imagined -- and the mind-set of youths who value its gritty coolness rather than its pathetic message, the 'Stop Snitchin' slogan has resonated here and on T-shirts across the country. … Even by using billboards, brochures with snitching tips, community meetings and, of course, T-shirts, 'Step Up, Speak Up' will be a hard sell. … Nonetheless, we believe a vigorous and sustained campaign can entice reluctant witnesses and crime victims to step out of the shadows. And help make the city safer." The Daily News adds, "'Step Up, Speak Up' may not trigger a wave of cooperation at first, but over time we hope that it overtakes 'Stop Snitching' -- and that ratting out bad guys becomes the gritty, cool thing to do."

Missouri Insurance Executive Sentenced To Prison For Mortgage Fraud. The AP (1/25) reports former St. Louis title insurance executive Thomas Kurzenberger Jr. "was sentenced Tuesday to six years in prison on a fraud conviction involving a $5.7 million mortgage fraud scheme, the U.S. attorney's office said." Kurzenberger "used customers' escrow deposits to support his drug habit and spent roughly $162,000 of customers' escrow funds at an adult night club in Sauget, U.S. Attorney Catherine L. Hanaway said."

US Adds Embezzlement Charges Against New York Money Manager. The New York Post (2/1, Smith, 624K) reports, "The feds have turned up the heat on former philanthropist and money manager Alberto Vilar, hitting him with new charges that add more alleged victims to his criminal case and could force him to cough up nearly $20 million. In the new indictment made public yesterday, Vilar…is accused of skimming money from four victims who'd trusted him with their fortunes — in addition to his friend Lily Cates, the estranged mother of actress Phoebe Cates. An additional securities- fraud charge also dramatically increases the potential financial penalties faced by the once-wealthy opera buff to $19.7 million.

Six Oregon Residents Indicted On Katrina Relief Fraud Charges. The AP (1/28) reports, "Asking for $2,000 in Hurricane Katrina relief assistance could cost six people up to 10 years in prison and $250,000 in fines." Portland residents Chantel Curry, Dominique Andrew, Virger Garland, Jennifer Jones, Trina Wilson and Steven Brown "were indicted by a federal grand jury Wednesday, each accused of a single count of receipt of stolen government property. Investigators said the six made false statements to qualify for $2,000 in relief along with $2,358 for rental assistance from the Federal Emergency Management Agency. … 'Whether we're talking about a few thousand dollars or a few hundred thousand dollars, our message is the same -- the FBI and their partners in law enforcement will be there and we'll find you,' said Dan Nielsen, FBI assistant special agent in charge for Oregon."

Builder Called To Testify Before Grand Jury About Work Done On Kerik Apartment. The New York Times (2/1, Rashbaum) reports, "A builder who helped renovate former Police Commissioner Bernard B. Kerik's Riverdale apartment has been called to testify before a Bronx grand jury about who paid for tens of thousands of dollars in work there, the builder's lawyer said yesterday." New Jersey authorities "said last November that Mr. Kerik had accepted more than $200,000 in work on the apartment from a construction company accused of having ties to organized crime while he helped the company pursue business with New York City." Kerik "was commissioner of the city's Department of Correction when the work was done in 1999 and 2000. … The builder who did the work, Woods Restoration Services, had told New Jersey authorities that he was paid more than $200,000 by" Interstate Industrial Corporation, "a large New Jersey construction company." New Jersey officials "have been trying to revoke the license of the construction company…to work at casinos in Atlantic City."

Washington State Ads On Sex Offender Sentencing Could Start Trend. Roll Call (2/1, Yachnin) reports that a television commercial in Washington state "almost looks like a second-coming of the infamous Willie Horton ads." The ads "warn residents about the state's 20,000 convicted sex offenders…then criticize the Democratic-led Legislature for refusing a vote on a GOP-proposed law on sentencing." When state Legislatures and Congress take up measures to strengthen punishment of sex offenders "in coming months, similar ads are likely to pop up elsewhere, as…will the inevitable game of political one-upmanship between the parties." Even now, "fights are…beginning to break out as lawmakers seek the mantel of 'tough on crime.'" The ad is being run by the Speaker's Roundtable, a political action committee tied to the state House GOP.

CIVIL LAW:

"Partial Birth Abortion" Law Declared Unconstitutional By Two Courts. The AP (2/1, Neumeister) reports, "Two federal appeals courts on opposite sides of the country declared the Partial Birth Abortion Ban Act unconstitutional Tuesday, saying the measure lacks an exception for cases in which a woman's health is at stake." The AP continues, "The first ruling came from a unanimous three-judge panel of the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals. Hours later, a three-judge panel of the 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Manhattan issued a similar decision in a 2-1 ruling."

The New York Times (2/1, Preston, 1.19M) adds, "Since the appeals court for the Eighth Circuit, in St. Louis, reached a similar conclusion last July, the three legal challenges nationwide to the abortion act have now been affirmed on appeal. This month the Supreme Court several times postponed deciding whether to hear the Eighth Circuit case."

Reuters (2/1) says the rulings "were setbacks to abortion foes. The decisions could be appealed to the Supreme Court, which has two new justices recently appointed by President Bush."

The Alameda (CA) Times-Star (2/1, Richman) reports, "The 8th Circuit appeals court in St. Louis issued a similar ruling - also based solely on the lack of a health exception - in July, and the U.S. Supreme Court had been expected to announce soon if it will review that case as the Justice Department has asked. That announcement could be delayed if it seems the government will appeal Tuesday's rulings as well; the Justice Department is reviewing the new rulings, spokesman John Nowacki said."

The San Francisco Chronicle (2/1, Egelko) reports, "Supporters of the law said it would ban only a narrowly defined, rarely performed procedure that is dangerous, causes pain to the fetus and is never necessary to protect a woman's health. Opponents, including doctors who testified at a three-week trial in San Francisco two years ago, said the law was so broad and vague that it could prohibit the most common and safest types of abortions in the second trimester of pregnancy, when 10 percent of all abortions are performed."

Alito Stance On "Partial Birth" Considered. The Los Angeles Times (2/1, Weinstein, 958K) notes, "In 2000, the Supreme Court in the case of Stenberg vs. Carhart struck down a Nebraska law that prohibited the second-trimester abortions because it did not contain any exception when the health of the woman was at issue." New Justice Samuel Alito, "as a judge on the U.S. 3rd Circuit Court of Appeals, joined a majority in striking down a similar New Jersey abortion law. He wrote in a separate concurrence that he was bound by the Stenberg precedent." But "Eve Gartner, the lawyer for Planned Parenthood who successfully argued the case in the 9th Circuit, said today she did not take 'any comfort' from Alito's earlier vote." Gartner said, "As a 3rd Circuit judge, he was obliged to follow the law as the Supreme Court laid it out in Stenberg. … Now, as a Supreme Court justice, it is highly unclear whether he will consider himself bound by that precedent."

Connecticut Challenge To Motion To Dismiss NCLB Case Heard. The AP (2/1, Apuzzo) reports, "Attorneys for the U.S. Department of Education asked a federal judge Tuesday to throw out Connecticut's challenge to the federal No Child Left Behind law, saying the state understood the law when it accepted hundreds of millions of dollars in education funding." Connecticut Attorney General Richard Blumenthal "argued that the law was unconstitutional, an unfunded federal mandate costing more than the state received in federal aid." Connecticut "wants to continue its program for testing every other year, in grades 4, 6, 8 and 10, a request that Education Secretary Margaret Spellings has refused. Officials have estimated that the state will be saddled with a $41.6 million shortfall through 2008 to pay for additional testing and other provisions the bill requires. Justice Department attorneys, who represent the Education Department, countered that Connecticut knew the testing requirements when it accepted the money and is now trying to escape obligations under the law. U.S. District Judge Mark Kravitz did not rule on the motion to dismiss Tuesday." But "he suggested that siding with Connecticut in the case could allow other states to pick and choose which elements of the federal law to follow." Also "federal attorneys argue that Connecticut jumped the gun by suing before its appeals and reviews within the Department of Education were exhausted. Blumenthal countered that the risks of appealing through the Department of Education are too great because Spellings could withhold millions of dollars in education funding while the issue is debated." Kravitz said that "Spellings could avoid the need for the lawsuit by agreeing not to withhold federal education money while Connecticut challenges the law within the agency. He encouraged Justice Department attorney Elizabeth Goitein to bring that request to Spellings."

Reuters (1/31, Szep) reports, "The Bush administration's 'No Child Left Behind' policy will lead to 'dumbing down' tests in public schools because Washington has not fully funded the policy, the state of Connecticut said in a court hearing on Tuesday to try to block the program." Blumenthal said that "federal funding was not enough for the state to test in a way that maintains its high standards." U.S. Justice Department attorney Elizabeth Goitein said that "Connecticut was avoiding its obligations and was aware of the law's demands when the state accepted education funding from Washington."

WTIC-Radio Hartford, Connecticut (1/31) reports Blumenthal "says he hopes the case is resolved quickly."

WTNH-TV Hartford, Connecticut (1/31, Cusato) reported, "The Bush Administration's No Child Left Behind Act is getting some help tonight from a large voice. The NAACP was in court today asking a judge to let them join the federal government in defending the law." Connecticut NAACP President Scot X. Esdaile said, "We want Connecticut to educate the poor and minority children, not go around and create loopholes to get out of it."

WNPR-Radio Hartford, Connecticut (1/31, Orson) reported, "A U.S. District Court judge in New Haven heard oral arguments on the federal government's motion to dismiss the state's lawsuit."

Nickles Says Asbestos Trust Funds Should Be Allowed To Opt Out Of National Fund. Former Sen. Don Nickles, the founder of the Nickles Group, a lobbying firm, and spokesman for the Common Interest Group, which represents the interests of existing asbestos settlement trusts, in an op-ed in The Hill (2/1) writes, "The Senate will soon consider S. 852, a massive piece of legislation designed to compensate victims of asbestos exposure by establishing of a $140 billion national fund. However, there's an enormous problem: The bill, as reported by the Judiciary Committee, violates the Constitution and must be fixed. If it is not, it should be defeated." 1994 Congress allowed the formation of 524(g) settlement trusts which "have provided in excess of $5 billion in compensation, but "S. 852, however, would confiscate these assets. More than $7 billion currently set aside to compensate 524(g) beneficiaries would be taken from the trusts and paid to the national fund created by S. 852." Senators "should amend S. 852 to permit existing asbestos settlement trusts to opt out of the national fund. The trusts that choose to opt out could then continue to compensate their beneficiaries, and the national fund would compensate certain asbestos exposure victims for asbestos injuries that are not covered by those trusts."

Firm Hires D'Amato To Lobby Against Asbestos Trust Fund. The Hill (2/1, Schor) reports, "Simmons Cooper, among the nation's biggest asbestos-plaintiff law firms and Democratic donors, has made a strange new bedfellow in Alfonse D'Amato, the former GOP senator and trial-bar critic turned superlobbyist. Trial lawyers have been perennial targets for Republicans since D'Amato came to the Senate in 1980, criticized for clogging the judicial system and swarming businesses with needless litigation." D'Amato "is an unlikely ally for Simmons Cooper as its lawyers, 28 of whom belong to the influential American Trial Lawyers Association (ATLA), seek to derail the asbestos trust fund and preserve victims' right to sue in court after exposure to the deadly substance. ATLA backed only three Senate challengers in the 1998 election. One of them, then-Rep. Charles Schumer (D-N.Y.), beat D'Amato and took his job."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

FBI Launches Probe Of California Police Shooting. The Los Angeles Times (2/1, Pugmire, Keller) reports, "The FBI today launched an investigation of the shooting of an apparently unarmed man by a San Bernardino County sheriff's deputy which was caught on videotape and broadcast. … 'At our direction, the FBI today is opening an investigation,' said Thom Mrozek, spokesman for U.S. Atty. Debra Wong Yang, the highest ranking federal criminal justice official in Los Angeles. The Justice Department, through the FBI, has investigated some of the most flagrant instances of police misconduct in the last 10 years. … 'All I can say about the investigation is that we are looking into potential civil rights violations. I cannot give any timetable for the investigation,' Mrozek said." The Times adds, "The man who was shot three times was an Air Force security officer who, according to the videotape and neighbors, told the deputy that he was in the military and 'on your side.' … The videotape of the incident, which was shot on a residential Chino street about 10:30 p.m., was of poor quality, showing only a silhouette of the deputy and the face of the man who was shot — illuminated by the deputy's flashlight. … But the tape appears to show the deputy opening fire as the man was trying to comply with the officer's apparent order to stand up."

FBI Investigating Allegations Of Suspect Abuse By Michigan Police. Under the headline "FBI Probes Suspects' Claims Of 'Hooding'," The Detroit News (1/31, Lynch) reports, "The Federal Bureau of Investigation is looking into allegations against local law enforcement agencies that officers used the tactic of hooding -- placing pillow cases over the heads of detained suspects, which critics say amounts to psychological torture. Officials with the Macomb County chapter of the NAACP brought the allegations to the Michigan Department of Civil Rights in December, which has since forwarded the complaints on to the Detroit office of the FBI. NAACP officials said they have received complaints about three separate incidents where one or more people had hoods placed over their heads while in custody." The News adds, "On Monday, FBI Spokeswoman Dawn Clenney said: 'We're looking into it to see if there was a civil rights violation.'" Michigan Department of Civil Rights spokesman Harold Core "said his office forwarded the complaints to the Detroit office of the FBI since the federal agency was the proper authority to conduct the investigation," but Core noted, "That is not a statement as to this office's opinion of their veracity."

Anti-Gay Union Bill Provokes "Fiery Debate" In Maryland Legislature. The Baltimore Sun (2/1, Brewington, 296K) reports, "With a fiery debate that invoked God and civil rights, supporters and opponents of a constitutional amendment banning same-sex unions in Maryland squared off Tuesday in what has become one of the most politicized issues of the General Assembly session," pitting "religious leaders and conservative organizations" that favor the bill against "civil rights advocates, other clergy and constitutional law professors." Each side has "an eye on the November elections." Political experts say that "if a constitutional amendment appears on the fall ballot, conservative voters who tend to favor Republican candidates could be motivated to come to the polls in greater numbers." However, "other observers believe that left-leaning voters could be similarly motivated to protect what they view as civil liberties."

The Washington Post (2/1, B1, Mosk, 744K) adds that "lawmakers on both sides of the debate" said Del. Donald H. Dwyer Jr. (R), "sponsor of the amendment, "undermined his cause by drafting a proposal that would also eliminate rights long afforded to gay men and lesbians" through "local laws in Montgomery County and Baltimore." Also, "a law professor later said Dwyer's proposal was 'so incoherent and sloppy' that it could inadvertently outlaw divorce." The crowd at the hearing "was so boisterous at times that extra troopers from the Maryland State Police were brought in to ensure calm."

Coretta Scott King Remembered. All three network news broadcasts carried stories on the passing of Coretta Scott King and her impact on the civil rights movement in the US. NBC Nightly News (1/31, lead story, 2:30, Williams) reported, We begin tonight with an icon of the past several decades in this country, a woman who became a towering moral force and a symbol of the civil rights movement after the assassination of her husband. Coretta Scott king died today. She was 78 years old. She outlived her husband by 38 years, and in doing so became a major force in her own right."

ABC's World News Tonight (1/31, story 6, 2:50, Vargas) quoted Sen. Hillary Clinton saying, "She would often give you the feeling that we should keep out eyes on the prize. We should be committed to what is really important in our lives, our faith, our families."

The CBS Evening News (1/31, lead story, 2:00, Schieffer) reported, "Coretta Scott King was the matriarch of the civil rights movement, its symbol for many in the decades after Dr. King's death."

WPost Praises King. The Washington Post (2/1, A22, 744K) editorializes, "Mrs. King's death at 78, after a long illness, dims the lights in a movement that drew inspiration from the life's work of both her and her late husband. It would be a mistake to think of Coretta Scott King as mainly a minister's wife living in his shadow." Her "determination…marked her as someone special," and "the murder of her husband…only emboldened her to continue his work."

Brownback Says His "Fruits" Comment Was Misinterpreted. The Washington Post (2/1, C3, Argetsinger, Roberts, 744K) reports in its "The Reliable Source" column, "Several days have passed since we first called the office of Republican Sen. Sam Brownback of Kansas to ask just what he meant when he said in a Rolling Stone interview: 'You look at the social impact of the countries that have engaged in homosexual marriage. … You'll know 'em by their fruits.' Now he has an explanation: He was misinterpreted. The senator released a statement Monday saying he 'was in no way referring to sexual orientation.' His paraphrase of Matthew 7:16 was part of a conversation about faith and deeds, according to the statement, and not an attack on homosexuals."

North Carolina Governor Seeks DOJ Probe Of Gas Company Profits. The AP (2/1) reports, "North Carolina's governor has asked President Bush to formally investigate gas companies' record profits in 2005." The AP continues, "In a letter sent Tuesday, Gov. Mike Easley also asked Bush to authorize Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to investigate gas companies and their record profits. … 'This is a problem that transcends state boundaries and requires action by the federal government,' Easley wrote. 'I am writing to urge you to take decisive action to investigate the sources of these record-breaking profits, punish any wrongdoing that may underlie them, and most important, take immediate steps to reverse this situation and lower the amount consumers pay to the oil companies.'" The AP adds, "Easley specifically mentioned Exxon Mobil's announcement this week that its 2005 profit was $36 billion, the largest profit any company has earned in the history of the United States. … Easley said an investigation should require oil industry executives to testify under oath, unlike in November, when they testified before Congress, but not under oath."

WSJournal Opposes Additionally Taxing Oil Companies Profits. The Wall Street Journal (2/1, 2.11M) editorializes, "Exxon is guilty only of responding to a market need, and its earnings are nothing to apologize for." While some "politicians and many of our friends in the press imply that Big Oil is somehow responsible for higher prices because of 'gouging' or somehow conspiring to withhold supply," each "time the Federal Trade Commission looks into these claims, it finds no evidence to support them." The high energy prices reflect "political uncertainty in some major oil-producing countries," and "the worst way to respond…is by robbing the profits that the companies need to diversify global oil supplies." As it is "an election year, we can expect this sort of political posturing to get worse. It's a special shame, however, that some in the media have decided to join the demagoguery in search of higher TV ratings."

FTC Approves Time Warner-Comcast Purchase Of Adelphia Assets. Dow Jones (2/1, Hughes) reports, "The Federal Trade Commission Tuesday cleared the acquisition of Adelphia Communications Corp. cable assets by Comcast Corp. and Time Warner Cable Inc., amid objections that the purchase would raise the cost of sports programming. … 'The evidence obtained during the investigation does not suggest that the proposed transactions are likely to substantially lessen competition in any geographic region in the United States,' said FTC Chairman Deborah Platt Majoras. She and two fellow Republicans approved the purchase over the objections of two colleagues who argued the government should have imposed conditions." Dow Jones continues, "Comcast and Time Warner last April agreed to acquire Adelphia's assets after the company collapsed in an accounting scandal. As part of the transaction, the two cable giants would swap certain cable systems, giving both companies more clout by strengthening their geographic clusters of subscribers." Dow Jones adds, "The transaction still faces approval by the Federal Communications Commission. The two dissenting commissioners, Democrat Jon Leibowitz and Independent Pamela Jones Harbour, raised hope that the FCC may scrutinize the acquisition more carefully. … FTC Chairman Majoras joined Commissioners William Kovacic and J. Thomas Rosch in saying that the FTC would be 'vigilant' and 'take action under the antitrust laws' if evidence emerged that Comcast or Time Warner were engaging in anticompetitive conduct that harmed consumers. They also said that the FTC's investigation didn't show that the purchase of Adelphia's assets would harm competition and that as a result it wasn't 'appropriate' to impose conditions."

EU Antitrust Chief Says Microsoft Must Prove Innovation To Charge Fees. The AP (2/1) reports, "The European Union's antitrust chief says Microsoft cannot charge licensing fees for software blueprints that it is offering to share with competitors unless it can prove the computer code is innovative." The AP continues, "The official, Neelie Kroes, also told European lawmakers on Tuesday that she has not yet received all information on Microsoft's offer to share software code and comply with a 2004 EU antitrust ruling." The AP adds, "Microsoft Corp. has until Feb. 15 to meet European Commission demands from December that it provide complete and accurate information on code that would allow competitors' products to communicate smoothly with servers running Microsoft operating systesms. … EU antitrust regulators have threatened Microsoft with daily fines of 2 million euros ($2.36 million), retroactive to mid-December, if it fails to comply by the deadline."

Kroes Not Opposed To Mittal-Arcelor Merger. The AP (2/1, White) reports, "European Union antitrust chief Neelie Kroes said Tuesday she was not in principle opposed to large steel merger such as Mittal Steel Co.'s bid for Arcelor SA and would meet with steel magnate Lakshmi Mittal this week. … 'I am not shocked by big, little or small mergers,' she told the European Parliament's economic and monetary affairs committee." The AP continues, "The EU's Executive Commission had not yet received a formal request by either company to clear the merger and Kroes said she would look at it carefully in line with EU competition rules. … 'We have not received all the facts and figures. ... We will do the job properly, not with emotion,' she said." The AP adds, "Kroes will meet with Mittal chairman and CEO Lakshmi Mittal on Wednesday to discuss the unsolicited 18.6 billion euros ($22.5 billion) offer he made for Arcelor last week. … Arcelor, meanwhile, warned against its predator's 'irregular' profitability, pledging to consider 'all options' to foil the hostile bid."

Mobile Email Patent Battles Spread To Two More Companies. The USA Today (2/1, Kessler) reports, "Mobile e-mail addicts, already nervous about a lawsuit that threatens to shut down BlackBerry service in the USA, have another reason to fret: BlackBerry's biggest rival was hit with a similar lawsuit Tuesday. Visto, a maker of mobile e-mail systems for cellphone carriers, sued rival Good Technology in U.S. District Court. Visto claims Good has violated several patents dating to 1997. Good sells e-mail products for the Palm Treo, Hewlett-Packard iPaq and other handheld devices." However, according to the article, "Customers shouldn't rush out to replace e-mail gadgets just because they're jittery." The article includes background information on litigation between Research In Motion and NTP over patents involved with the BlackBerry. The article also says, "The lawsuits raise questions about whether U.S. courts make it too easy for companies to threaten to shut down rivals' businesses, says lawyer Jeffrey Berkowitz at Finnegan Henderson Farabow Garrett & Dunner in Washington, D.C."

Luxembourg Rejects Mittal Bid For Arcelor. The Wall Street Journal (2/1, Echikson) reports, "Luxembourg's prime minister said his country rejected Mittal Steel Co.'s €19.43 billion, or about $23.48 billion, hostile bid to acquire rival steelmaker Arcelor SA, citing worries over the fate of 6,000 Arcelor employees based in that country. But Prime Minister Jean-Claude Juncker conceded that his powers to block the deal were limited because Luxembourg owns only 5.6% of Arcelor's shares. Meanwhile, the European Union's antitrust chief said she wasn't in principle opposed to a large steel merger, giving Mittal bid's continued life. … The cash-and-stock bid, announced Friday, would create a new global steel giant. In Paris Tuesday, shares of Arcelor fell 85 European cents, or 2.9%, to €28.90 each. In Amsterdam, Mittal fell 49 European cents, or 1.7%, to €29.20." The article also notes that while French Finance Minister Thierry Breton "disparaged" the Mittal offer, the French government "owns no part of Arcelor and analysts say it will find it dangerous to intervene, and would risk undermining its credibility to block even more sensitive deals it dislikes."

Column Decries Anti-"Biopiracy" Proposals. In an op-ed in the Wall Street Journal (2/1) Alan Oxley raps India, Brazil, and African countries for trying to alter the World Trade Organization's rules on patents. Oxley writes, "Their complaint is that current patent law permits 'biopiracy.' Their scenario is that multinational companies, typically pharmaceutical manufacturers, secure local natural plants or substances in foreign countries for a pittance, convert them into profitable blockbuster drugs, protect them with patents and pile up the profits. The 'traditional owners,' often indigenous peoples, of these 'genetic resources' are allegedly left with little in return. … In the name of fighting biopiracy, India wants governments to have the right to authorize any use of a patented product based on or derived from a genetic resource found in their territory." As an example, Oxley cites India's neem tree, which contains a natural fungicide. Oxley writes, "If the WTO rules were amended as India wants, its approval would be necessary before another country could grant a patent on any product or process involving the neem tree. This clearly would produce a chilling effect on innovation." Oxley says no investor would risk his money under such laws, and advocates market agreements to compensate host governments when companies seek patentable matter while "bioprospecting." Oxley concludes, "Officials in countries that want to lock onto high-growth strategies and foster investment that will bring the latest and most productive technology should be wary about this anti-patent law campaign."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Davis-Besse Plant Worker Indicted For Falsifying Reports. The Milwaukee Journal Sentinel (2/1, Content) reports, "A nuclear power plant employee indicted on suspicion of misleading federal regulators about the condition of a troubled Ohio plant later moved to Wisconsin, where he worked for the past three years at the Kewaunee nuclear plant." The Sentinel continues, "David Geisen of De Pere is scheduled to be arraigned this afternoon in federal court in Toledo, Ohio, on five charges of falsifying reports to the Nuclear Regulatory Commission. He is one of three people who worked for the Davis-Besse nuclear plant who have been indicted on charges of filing reports that concealed problems at the plant outside Toledo." The Sentinel adds, "Geisen was part of a group of Davis-Besse workers who left FirstEnergy in fall 2002 as part of management changes that resulted from an intensive NRC investigation of problems at the plant. … The NRC and federal Justice Department indictment contend that Geisen, then Davis-Besse's engineering manager, and other workers at Davis-Besse gave incomplete, misleading and false information concerning the condition of the vessel head and the nozzles inside it, after NRC inspectors raised concerns that plants such as Davis-Besse might have leaks. … If that information had been disclosed earlier, the plant would have been shut down sooner, officials said."

Northwest Ecoterror Suspect Released On Bond. KMAX-TV Sacramento (1/31) reports on its Web site, "One of the three people accused of plotting to blow up cell phone towers and a power plant in Auburn is set to be released on bail. The parents of Lauren Wiener put up a $1.2 million bond on their home to get their daughter out of jail." Wiener "is the only one of the 3 eco-terror suspects arrested in the case to be allowed bail. The FBI says the arrests were based on evidence that the three were plotting to use explosives to blow up several sites. … Although, the FBI says they do not believe there was any immediate danger to the public."

MSHA Nominee Says Mine Safety Laws Are Adequate. USA Today (2/1, Frank, 2.31M) reports, "President Bush's choice to oversee coal mines said Tuesday that safety laws are 'adequate' and that problems result from mine operators that ignore safety regulations." During a confirmation hearing in the Senate, Richard Stickler said, "A small percentage of operators comply with the law when (inspectors) are at the job site, but that's the only time they try to comply with the law." Facing "sharp questioning from Democrats, Stickler, a former coal miner, declined to endorse new safety measures such as increasing the number of mine-rescue teams." Sen. Edward Kennedy "said that Stickler 'is not someone with an extensive background in safety and health issues' and that he will vote against the nomination." And Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton "voiced frustration when Stickler told her that he'd 'do an in-depth analysis' of safety regulations that had been proposed when her husband was president but were dropped by the Bush administration. 'It's troubling…that once again we're going to be studying what's self-evident: We need improvements.'"

The New York Times (2/1, Urbina, 1.19M) adds that committee chairman Sen. Michael Enzi "endorsed the administration's preference that oversight agencies work in partnership with industry rather than act as taskmaster." Yet "Senator Patty Murray…pressed Mr. Stickler on whether he would be willing to push the agency, which has been criticized as lax in enforcing its own regulations, to play a tougher role. 'Are you going to move forward in an aggressive direction,' Ms. Murray asked, 'or are we going to hear more of the voluntary philosophy of they will do the right thing if we just sit back and let them?'"

Jenkins Says There Isn't Proof Global Warming Is Real. Holman W. Jenkins, Jr. writes in his column in the Wall Street Journal (2/1, 2.11M), "As used by the media, 'global warming' refers to the theory not only that the earth is warming, but doing so because of human industrial activity." However, "measuring average global temperature is not an easy matter," and "how do we know it's manmade?"

Scientists have to use "elaborate computer models…before they can plausibly suggest…that the net effect of increased carbon dioxide is the observed increase in temperature." Any "diligent layperson is equipped to doubt any confident assertion that manmade warming is taking place." Therefore, ", inevitably and unfortunately, today's debate over global warming revolves almost exclusively around the status and motives of spokesmen for opposing viewpoints, rather than the science and its limits."

Michigan Tribe Joins DOJ In Asking Court To Dismiss Casino Suit. Indian Country Today (1/31, Toensing) reports, "The Match-E-Be-Nash-She-Wish Band of Pottawatomi Indians joined the Justice Department Jan. 6 in asking a federal court to dismiss a lawsuit that seeks to block the Interior Department from taking land into trust for the tribe's proposed casino in southwestern Michigan." ICT continues, "The lawsuit was filed by MichGo, one of the dozens of anti-casino groups that have sprouted up around the country over the past several years. MichGo, which stands for Michigan Gambling Opposition, filed a lawsuit last year challenging Interior's final approval of the tribe's land-into-trust application." ICT adds, "The 300-member Match-E-Be-Nash-She-Wish Band, known as the Gun Lake Tribe, was federally acknowledged in 1999. The tribe plans to develop a casino and entertainment complex in Wayland Township on 147 acres of trust land. … 'We are very hopeful the court will concur with our position that MichGo's claims have no merit. We appreciate the help from the Department of Justice in defense of the tribe's federal rights. Gun Lake is trying to restore our reservation less than three miles from our homelands in Bradley,' said Tribal Chairman D.K. Sprague. … On the same day Gun Lake filed for a summary dismissal of MichGo's lawsuit, the Pokagon Band of Potawatomi - Gun Lake's cousins and neighbors - learned that the federal Court of Appeals in Washington, D.C., had tossed out an identical lawsuit that sought to delay its efforts to develop Four Winds Casino Resort on 675 acres in New Buffalo Township in southwestern Michigan."

Four Accused In Mail-Order Drugs Case. The Knoxville (TN) News Sentinel (2/1, Satterfield) reports, "Richard Kato Robinson admitted he had shipped a half-ton of marijuana and a quarter-ton of cocaine from California to Knoxville in three years - all by mail. At a hearing in U.S. District Court on Tuesday prosecutors "unveiled an indictment against the man authorities allege not only put all those illegal goodies in Robinson's packages but had even more customers on his mailing list. Vicente Corona was nabbed Jan. 9 in California and is headed back to Knoxville to face charges in connection with a massive mail-order drug business. Also named in the indictment unsealed…Tuesday were two alleged Corona minions - Jermaine 'Pretty Boy' Hughes and Dennis 'Raggs' Richardson. … The case began in earnest nearly a year ago when California authorities found drugs inside packages addressed to a vacant house…in Knoxville. Investigators with the Knoxville Police Department's Organized Crime Unit and agents with the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration wound up delivering the packages to that vacant house and then waited for someone to show up to collect them."

Convicted Arkansas Drug Ring Leader Gets 12-Year Prison Sentence. The Fort Smith (AR) Southwest Times Record (1/31) reports, "A Logan County man who authorities said was the leader of a drug ring that shipped large amounts of marijuana into Arkansas was sentenced Monday to 121/2 years in prison. … Bollinger and 10 other people were indicted in May as a result of an investigation by the federal Drug Enforcement Agency and several other agencies that began in 2001. Authorities said Bollinger was in charge of an operation that shipped marijuana from California to Arkansas and distributed the marijuana primarily in Logan County."

Drug Case Gets First Jury Trial In New Orleans Since Katrina. New Orleans Times-Picayune (2/1) reports, "In the first jury trial in U.S. District Court in New Orleans since Hurricane Katrina, a 40-year-old man was convicted Tuesday of selling crack cocaine to a Drug Enforcement Administration undercover agent at Lakeside Shopping Center in Metairie and in a Wal-Mart parking lot in Boutte in May 2004. The DEA seized more than 100 grams of crack cocaine from Mervin Spencer after the undercover operation, U.S. Attorney Jim Letten said. U.S. District Judge Helen Berrigan scheduled sentencing for April 12. Spencer faces a mandatory life sentence and fines amounting to $12 million, along with other penalties, in connection with Tuesday's guilty verdict."

Santa Cruz Seeks Federal Court's Approval Of Medical Marijuana Plan. The San Jose Mercury News (1/31, Mclaughlin) reports, "The city of Santa Cruz and a local medical marijuana collective on Tuesday asked a federal court in San Jose to approve the city's plan to provide marijuana directly to sick and dying patients. The amended complaint represents a renewed legal fight to force the U.S. government to honor medical marijuana laws passed by California and 11 other states. The American Civil Liberties Union, Drug Policy Alliance, the national law firm of Bingham McCutchen and a handful of private attorneys filed legal documents outlining new constitutional arguments based on an ordinance recently enacted by the Santa Cruz City Council creating the first medical marijuana department in the country. The department is known as the Office of Compassionate Use, but the city has made clear it has no intention of actually distributing marijuana unless it wins the legal battle."

Florida Doctor Convicted Of Patient Deaths From Painkiller Overdoses. The Lakeland (FL) Ledger (1/31) reports, "A federal jury convicted an Apalachicola doctor Monday of causing the deaths of five of his patients through overdoses of highly potent painkillers including morphine and oxycodone. Dr. Thomas G. Merrill was convicted on 98 of 100 counts, including illegally dispensing controlled substances, defrauding health care benefit programs and wire fraud. Merrill's lawyer, Jim Appleman, said he would appeal the conviction." The AP (1/31) notes, "Prosecutor Stephen Kunz told jurors that Merrill's practice became a destination for drug seekers throughout Florida. Kunz said Merrill wrote 33,000 prescriptions from January 2001 to May 2004 and 81 percent of those were for controlled substances."

California County Supervisors Delay Vote On Medical Marijuana Lawsuit. The Desert Sun (1/31) reports, "The Riverside County Board of Supervisors will not vote until next week on whether to join a federal lawsuit opposing California's medical marijuana law. Third District Supervisor Jeff Stone brought the proposal to the board that would have added Riverside County to the suit against the state law filed by San Diego County on Jan. 20. The San Bernardino County Board of Supervisors voted to file a similar suit Jan. 24. In 1996, California voters passed Proposition 215 - the law allows individuals with a doctor's recommendation to use medical marijuana. The law requires counties to issue IDs to qualified medical marijuana users. Riverside County began issuing the cards in December. San Bernardino had planned to start issuing the IDs, but has put the cards on hold until the suit is resolved."

Marijuana Activist Seeks To Use Pot While Serving Sentence. The Sacramento Bee (1/31) reports, "Medical marijuana activist Steve Kubby asked a Placer County judge [Tuesday] to let him use cannabis while he serves a 120-day jail sentence for a drug conviction in 2000. The Placer sheriff's department said it is opposed to the idea. Kubby has contended that he will die in jail if he is not allowed to use cannabis to treat his condition. Undersheriff Steve D'Arcy said his department's policy is that marijuana will not be furnished in any form to an inmate. The 59-year-old Kubby made the request through his attorney during a hearing in Placer Superior Court in which the lawyer also asked that his client be released from jail to serve the sentence at his new home in Marin County. The attorney, Bill McPike, said Kubby could wear an electronic device so that his movements could be monitored by authorities. … Kubby was in court today for arraignment on a charge that he violated probation by moving to Vancouver, Canada, in 2001 to avoid serving the 120-day sentence."

Tour Manager Pleads Guilty In Nightclub Fire. The Washington Post (2/1, A3, Fahrenthold) reports, "The former tour manager for the band Great White has agreed to plead guilty to 100 counts of involuntary manslaughter for his role in the deadly fire that roared through a Rhode Island nightclub in 2003, a judge announced Tuesday. Daniel Biechele, who allegedly started the blaze by setting off a pyrotechnic display near flammable sound insulation, could be sentenced to as many as 10 years in prison. … Biechele had been charged with 200 counts of involuntary manslaughter, two each for every one of the 100 people who died in one of the worst nightclub fires in U.S. history. The charges reflected two different legal strategies that prosecutors said they might use to prove his guilt: one involving 'misdemeanor manslaughter,' the other 'gross negligence.' … Tuesday's agreement points to an end for one of three legal cases associated with the Feb. 20, 2003, fire, which occurred during a Great White concert at the Station nightclub in the town of West Warwick."

Minneapolis Targets Guns With Buy-Back, Gun-Lock Efforts. The Minneapolis Star Tribune (2/1) reports, "Organizers hope to get about 200 handguns off the streets during a two-day buy-back program." The Tribune continues, "Terry Collins, Star TribuneTapping his finger repeatedly on a red X on a map, Shane Price wanted to make sure he had their attention. … Their strategy was for Project Cease Fire, a two-day gun buy-back program sponsored by Hennepin County's African American Men Project, several community organizations and the Minneapolis Police Department. Funding is provided by the Minneapolis Foundation." The Tribune adds, "Participants will get $50 for revolvers and $75 for semiautomatic pistols they turn in. No questions will be asked, no identification is required, and participants will not face prosecution for illegal possession or other gun-related violations. … The event will take place Friday and Saturday. … In another effort to reduce gun violence in Minneapolis, 5,000 cable-style gun locks will be available for free today on a first-come, first-served basis at any Minneapolis police precinct. The program is funded by a grant from the U.S. Justice Department. … The goal of the program is to remind gun owners to store their firearms safely at home so that they don't fall into the hands of a child."

ATF Probing Pennsylvania Arson. The Meadville (PA) Tribune (2/1, Johnson) reports, "Officials investigating the arson fire at Chipsco Mold & Design are confident it won't take long to solve the crime, but caution that it's tough to put a time frame on an arson probe." The Tribune continues, "On Friday, the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives announced the Jan. 23 fire at the 50,000-square-foot warehouse and manufacturing facility on Liberty Street Extension was an arson." The Tribune adds, "Officials have declined to offer details about the material used to start the fire, suspects or other evidence, but the supervisor of the ATF Pittsburgh field office said officials are following several leads. … ATF is the federal law enforcement agency with jurisdiction for investigating arson and explosives incidents. … 'Arsons are sometimes solved in a day and sometimes it takes years,' ATF Pittsburgh office director Jim Tanda said. 'We're confident in this case it's solvable soon. We're going to proceed with that optimism,' he said, adding, 'There's no way to put a time frame on it. … The ATF and state police have conducted a thorough investigation during the first week after the fire. We're not in a position to talk about evidence or suspects at this time. We've said it is arson and we'll be proceeding in the next couple of weeks with the leads we've developed.'"

TAX:

Many Taxpayers Not Using Sales-Tax Deduction. The Wall Street Journal (2/1, Herman) reports, "A recent Treasury Department report says numerous taxpayers who could have benefited from deducting state and local sales taxes didn't do so on their federal income-tax returns for 2004, which were filed last year. The provision allows millions of people to choose to deduct either their state and local income taxes or their sales taxes. This deduction is particularly important for people who live in states with no state income tax, such as Florida, Texas, Washington and Nevada. But it also can benefit many people in other states who pay relatively low state and local income taxes. To be eligible, taxpayers must itemize instead of taking the standard deduction. … When Congress approved it in 2004, it made it effective only for the 2004 and 2005 tax years. But now many lawmakers want to extend it."

Senate Budget Would Extend R&D Tax Credit. The Wall Street Journal (2/1, Rogers, 2.11M) reports, "House Republicans hope to send President Bush a long-delayed $39 billion deficit-reduction bill today, even as their Senate colleagues are preparing to use some of the savings to bulk up tax cuts. The immediate winner would be the high-tech industry, which is expected to get a longer, two-year extension of the research-and-development tax credit through 2007. And the Senate Finance Committee is proposing to stretch out a variety of lesser tax breaks to bring the net value of its tax package close to $70 billion over five years.' The Journal adds, "At one level, all the Senate adjustments are ephemeral and designed with an eye toward negotiations with the House. For example, the longer two-year R&D provision and other extensions proposed for the Senate bill will cost about $18 billion; the capital-gains and dividend extensions, approved by the House, would cost about $20 billion. By taking advantage of the added savings, Sen. Grassley puts himself in a better bargaining position with House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Bill Thomas (R., Calif.). But the maneuvering will reinforce complaints by Democrats that the whole $39 billion deficit-reduction bill is less about the deficit than paying for new tax cuts."

WPost Calls Budget Bill "Misguided." An editorial in the Washington Post (2/1, A22, 744K) says, "Members of the House of Representatives have the chance for a do-over, probably today, on one of its most unfortunate votes of last year: a supposed deficit-reduction measure that would achieve its cuts in ways that hurt the poor and reward the powerful. The House passed this misguided measure 212 to 206 in December; then it squeaked through the Senate, with Vice President Cheney racing back to Washington to cast a tie-breaking vote. But Senate Democrats invoked a procedural maneuver that stripped several minor provisions from the budget agreement, requiring the House to again vote on the measure. Hence, the opportunity for a do-over. The odds, we recognize, are against any change in the outcome. That's unfortunate. … Republican moderates prepared to hold their noses and vote for this stinker again ought to reconsider."

Senate To Take Up Tax Bill Today. In its "Washington Wire" column on its web site, the Wall Street Journal (1/31, 2.11M) reported that the Senate "is turning to a $70 billion, five-year tax bill left from last year. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist of Tennessee announced Tuesday afternoon that the chamber will take up the bill Wednesday. Republican tax-writers say they hope to clear the legislation to extend President Bush's 15% rates of capital gains and dividends by the end of February."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Senate Approves Alito Nomination By 58-42 Margin. USA Today (2/1, Kiely, 2.31M) reports, "Samuel Alito, who once said the Constitution doesn't protect the right to an abortion, won a swing seat Tuesday on the Supreme Court. Alito, 55, was sworn in by Chief Justice John Roberts shortly after the Senate confirmed him on a mostly party-line, 58-42 vote." The Senate vote "reflected deep partisan divisions over President Bush's pick for the second Supreme Court vacancy of his presidency. It was the closest vote for a justice since 1991, when Clarence Thomas was confirmed 52-48." Alito "got less bipartisan support than Thomas, who received 11 Democratic votes. Roberts got 22 Democratic votes last year."

Fox News' Special Report (1/31, Wilson) added, "In the end, every Republican except moderate Rhode Island Senator Lincoln Chafee voted for Samuel Alito. They were joined by Democrats Robert Byrd, Kent Conrad, Tim Johnson of South Dakota, and Ben Nelson of Nebraska." Bush "proclaimed himself pleased that his nominee had been confirmed. A short time later Alito traveled up Pennsylvania Avenue to the Supreme Court where he was sworn in by Chief Justice John Roberts in a private ceremony."

The Washington Post (2/1, A1, Babington, 744K) reports, "Yesterday's Senate vote reflected the challenge that Democratic candidates face in states that are solidly Republican in presidential elections. The pro-Alito votes by Byrd, Conrad, Johnson and Nelson are best explained "'y the absence of liberal activists in the Democratic ranks' in those states, said Bruce E. Cain, a political scientist who directs the University of California's Washington Center." The Post adds, "In most other states -- even Arkansas and Louisiana -- enough hard-core liberals donate money and recruit voters in Democratic primaries to make a pro-Alito vote dangerous to senators such as Blanche Lincoln (Ark.) and Mary Landrieu (La.), Cain said." Chafee, meanwhile, "faces a double dilemma in Rhode Island: a stiff GOP primary challenge by Cranston Mayor Stephen Laffey, and a likely strong Democratic opponent if he survives. Chafee's anti-Alito vote may entice more independent voters to back him in the Republican primary (at which independents can legally vote), which is vital to the senator's reelection hopes, said Brown University political scientist Darrell West." The Chicago Tribune (2/1, Zeleny, 643K) notes the vote "came one day after an attempt to filibuster Alito failed, with only 25 Democrats signing onto the movement led by Sens. Edward Kennedy and John Kerry of Massachusetts."

NBC Nightly News (1/31, lead story, 2:30, Williams) called the vote "a major victory of the President's second term." NBC Nightly News (1/31, story 2, 2:00, P. Williams) reported, "The biggest period of turnover on the Supreme Court in more than a decade is over now but the change in the court's direction is just beginning. The intense debate kept going right up to the last minute." Sen. Richard Durbin, Illinois: "A chill wind blows, a chill wind which will snuff out the dying light of Sandra Day O'Connor's Supreme Court legacy." Sen. Arlen Specter, Pennsylvania: "He does not have an agenda, does not have a predetermined set of values he's going to try to foist upon the country." Williams: "The vote, 58-42, was one of the most deeply partisan ever for a Supreme Court nominee, with just four Democrats voting to confirm. By contrast, Clarence Thomas had 11 Democrats supporting him, even though he was confirmed with fewer votes overall." NBC notes that now "a new era, with a more conservative court, begins" and one of Justice Alito's "first acts will be to vote on whether to hear a case on a law banning partial birth abortions. Three federal court of appeals have found that unconstitutional, two of them acting just today."

The New York Times (2/1, Kirkpatrick, 1.19M) adds "Alito and his wife, Martha-Ann, watched the vote on television in the Roosevelt Room of the White House with President Bush and his wife, Laura, and aides who had worked on the nomination. A cheer went up in the room as the vote count passed 50." For Bush, "the confirmations of Justice Alito, 55, and Chief Justice Roberts, 51, mean that in four months he has named two members of the court who are young enough to influence its rulings for many years." In a statement, Bush "congratulated Justice Alito, the son of an Italian immigrant, saying his 'appointment to the Supreme Court is the realization of the American dream.'" The Los Angeles Times (2/1, Chen, 958K), Washington Times (2/1, Hurt, 90K) and Wall Street Journal (2/1, Cummings, 2.11M) run similar stories.

The New York Times (2/1, Liptak, 1.19M) says Alito "will have only one vote, of course, but it may be the decisive one in several of the marquee cases that will dominate the balance of the Supreme Court's term. By the end of the term in early summer, legal analysts said, the nation will most likely have a good sense of whether Justice Alito will affirm or veer away from the direction set by his predecessor, Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, in cases involving the treatment of terror suspects and campaign finance. … A first taste of how his legal views on abortion, a signature issue for Justice O'Connor, may differ from hers could come before the end of the year. And other issues on which Justice O'Connor was often the swing vote, including affirmative action and religion, are certain to reach the court in coming years." The Wall Street Journal (2/1, Bravin, 2.11M) reports, "In his first four months, the new chief justice, John Roberts, has voted with the court's conservative stalwarts, Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas, except for the single case where the latter two split and the chief justice joined Justice Scalia." Alito," with a solid conservative record as a Reagan Justice Department official and circuit judge, may follow suit."

The Washington Post (2/1, A21, Lane, 744K) runs a story headlined "Shift On The Bench Has Already Begun," in which is says Alito "will shake up one aspect of court business that was unchanged for more than 11 years: the seating chart. As the junior associate justice, Alito will occupy the end of the bench farthest to the courtroom audience's right during oral arguments. Justice Stephen G. Breyer, who has sat there since October 1994, will move across to the audience's extreme left." The Post adds, "The other justices will shift according to seniority as well, except for John Paul Stevens, the senior associate justice, who will remain just to the left of Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. Justice Antonin Scalia will occupy the chair to Roberts's right, where retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor sat."

The Legal Times (2/1, Goldman) reports, "Monday's filibuster attempt was led by Massachusetts' two Democratic senators, John Kerry and Edward Kennedy. It was derided by Republicans as a transparent attempt to placate several influential liberal interest groups, which had spent hundreds of thousands of dollars in their campaign to defeat Alito. … 'The reason the filibuster was a flop, if they had done it and been successful, there would have been a wipeout in 2006,' said South Carolina Republican Sen. Lindsey Graham, reflecting a widely held belief among Republicans that a key factor in the 2004 defeat of former Senate Democratic leader Tom Daschle was his party's frequent use of judicial filibusters against conservative federal circuit court nominees. … 'The only thing that matters [to them] is the people driving the ads,' declared Graham, a member of the Judiciary Committee and the Gang of 14."

Kerry Complains Democrats Didn't Bring Out "The Knives" Against Alito. The Washington Times (2/1, McCaslin, 90K) reports in its "Inside the Beltway" column, "Immediately following one of the most partisan victories ever for a Supreme Court nominee, an obviously irate Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry, the unsuccessful 2004 Democratic presidential nominee, exited the Senate chamber yesterday and spouted that his Democratic colleagues 'didn't bring out the [expletive] knives!' … 'It was distasteful,' says one of three people Mr. Kerry addressed his remark to, among them Wade Henderson, executive director for the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights. 'Here he is supposedly a presidential hopeful, somebody who is supposed to have class and stature. I'm disappointed.'"

Obama Urges Alito To Exercise Job With "Great And Sober Judgment." Sen. Barack Obama in an interview before the State of the Union speech, said on The CBS Evening News (1/31, story 4, 2:00, Schieffer), "I don't think there's any doubt he's going to be more conservative than Sandra Day O'Connor. She was a moderate conservative and I hope Judge Alito recognized that he's got a role that is unique in America with the Supreme Court Justices with lifetime appointments the can change the landscape for this country and are not subject to democratic checks. And so hopefully we'll exercise his job with great and sober judgment."

Alito's "Balancing Act" During State Of The Union Examined. The Washington Post (2/1, A2, Milbank, 744K) reports, "Samuel A. Alito Jr., barely eight hours into his job as a Supreme Court justice, had to make a series of important rulings as he sat in the House chamber for last night's State of the Union address. For instance: How enthusiastically would he applaud for President Bush? (More vigorously than Justice Stephen G. Breyer but less than Justice Clarence Thomas and about the same as the chief, John G. Roberts Jr.) And: How would he react when Bush introduced him to Congress? (He would make a self-conscious grin.)" The Post adds, "For the four robed justices brave enough to attend the largely political event, and Alito in particular, it was a balancing act as challenging as any scales of justice. … If Alito and his peers were being extra cautious, that was understandable. Yesterday's rare overlap of a State of the Union address and a Supreme Court confirmation could have been a celebration of democracy. Instead, the anger from the confirmation process spread through the body politic, leaving a brittle, divided House."

Bush Lays Out Agenda In State Of The Union Address. President Bush outlines his domestic and international agenda last night in his State of the Union speech last night. The Los Angeles Times (2/1, McManus, 958K) reports Bush "warned Tuesday that the United States had become 'addicted to oil,' much of it coming from unstable parts of the world, and called for a 20-year national effort to develop new sources of energy to replace imported fuel." He also "delivered an unapologetic defense of his national security policies, from the continuing war in Iraq to increased electronic surveillance of communications at home." The Financial Times (2/1, Daniel, Alden) adds Bush also "addressed fears about the growing economic clout of China and India with a pledge to spend $50bn on research initiatives to boost US competitiveness over the next decade." The Baltimore Sun (2/1, Davis, 296K) adds Bush "held out hope for additional troop reductions in Iraq this year but rejected calls for a 'sudden withdrawal,' defending the war in a State of the Union message that drew stark contrasts with his opponents." The Sun adds, "While calling for bipartisanship on foreign and domestic issues, Bush portrayed his critics as willing to shrink in the face of difficulties." In addition, says the Washington Post (2/1, A1, Baker, Fletcher, 744K), the President "defended his vision for a robust US role in world affairs," and "appealed directly to the people of Iran just a day after winning an agreement to bring his dispute with the theocratic government's nuclear program to the United Nations."

Media coverage last night and this morning makes much of Bush's calls bipartisanship, and several analysts describe the President as "humble" and even "chastened." Bush's "olive branch" to Democrats was attributed to his "weakened political standing." Typical of the coverage was ABC correspondent Terry Moran (1/31), who said after the speech, " This is a chastened President Bush," adding that the President "really had a tough year" and "it showed not just in the substance of the speech tonight, which was much more small bore, but also in his tone." John King said on CNN (1/31) that Bush has "trimmed his sails," and "knows he has to play small ball. That's a baseball term. The President knows that's what he has to do because of his weaker political standing."

In an analysis piece, the Los Angeles Times (2/1, Brownstein, 958K) describes Bush as "chastened," "deferential" and "modest," while the New York Times (2/1, Bumiller, Nagourney, 1.19M) says he was "more tempered and less partisan than a year ago, evidence of his diminished political standing." The speech "was notable for what Mr. Bush did not mention. He offered no new ideas for rebuilding New Orleans in the wake of Hurricane Katrina, made no mention of his troubled Medicare prescription drug program and offered no proposal to clamp down on lobbying abuses in Congress that have led to the investigation of Jack Abramoff, a formerly powerful lobbyist and a major fund-raiser for Mr. Bush." Reuters (2/1, Holland) reports Bush was "hoping to lift his political fortunes and those of his Republican allies in an election year with control of Congress up for grabs." He "is coming off one of the toughest stretches of his presidency." The AP (2/1, Hunt, Correspondent) also says Bush "went before the nation as a politically weakened president after the toughest year of his administration." A similar Knight Ridder story (2/1, Hutcheson) reports, "Bowing to budget constraints and political realities, Bush laid out few ambitious goals." The Washington Times (2/1, Mansfield, 90K), meanwhile, describes Bush as "jaunty," "ebullient" and "beaming."

Time (2/1, Allen) says on its website the speech "consisted mostly of modest gestures aimed at major problems," in "a tacit acknowledgment" of the President's "limited political capital and fiscal flexibility." The Washington Post (2/1, A1, Balz, VandeHei, 744K) runs a front-page story titled "Lowered Expectations Reflect Political And Fiscal Realities," in which it says Bush "Bush begins this election year far weaker than he was a year ago." USA Today (2/1, Page, 2.31M) also reports "the substance of the proposals Bush outlined reflected the realities of his sixth year in office: the erosion of his job-approval rating, the constraints of a federal budget deficit that the Congressional Budget Office estimates at $337 billion this year, the limits of the time left in his term and the costs of the war that divides the nation."

The New York Times (2/1, Sanger, 1.19M) also reports, "Only a year after Mr. Bush stood in the House, describing in bold terms how he planned to spend the political capital he had amassed in the 2004 election, the president who addressed the nation on Tuesday evening was far less ambitious, his tone noticeably different." The Times adds, "The Texan who swept onto the national political scene six years ago talking about drilling for new energy supplies and preserving the American way of life vowed on Tuesday night to wean the nation from its reliance on oil. Instead of urging Congress to drill in the Arctic, the president who had waved off the critics who portrayed him and Vice President Dick Cheney as captives of the oil industry asked Congress to finance federal research into alternative fuels and lithium batteries."

ABC (1/31) political analyst George Stephanopoulos said, "When he got to the domestic issues, even though he did rhetorically reach out several times, he did not reach out with any new or big or ambitious policies that the Democrats might be attracted to, and I think that is really for two reasons: Number one, we're broke basically. The deficit is going up and he can't afford it; and two, the President doesn't have the political capital to power something like that through." Likewise, Nina Easton of the Boston Globe said on Fox News (1/31) "I think the speech reflects the reality that some 57% of the public thinks the country is on the wrong track and he is facing a difficult midterm election and has to make inroads to swing voters and so he has to look at bipartisan measures."

The Wall Street Journal (2/1, McKinnon, Cooper, 2.11M) says Bush faced "a public anxious about the Iraq war and the economy," and that "a big goal" for the speech was "reassuring Americans -- particularly lower-income workers who often have seen wage gains eaten up by higher fuel and health-care costs." The Washington Times (2/1, Lambro, 90K) adds, "White House strategists hope assured voters will re-elect a Republican majority in Congress and nudge up Mr. Bush's approval ratings from the mid-40s, offering the president a chance to be more ambitious in his final two years. A loss of either or both chambers of Congress would hasten his lame-duck status."

USA Today (2/1, Jackson, 2.31M) says Bush "spoke at a time when polls have shown Americans deeply worried about the war in Iraq, and discontented with the president, whose approval ratings have hovered below 50% for more than a year." That may explain why "the speech lacked the single ambitious focal point that Bush's proposal to overhaul Social Security gave it a year ago." Similarly, the Washington Times (2/1, Sammon, Curl, 90K) reports the speech "was markedly scaled down from last year's State of the Union." Knight Ridder (2/1) also says Bush is "hamstrung by a budget deficit that could surpass $400 billion this year. For the first time during his presidency, Bush delivered his annual message of the country's health with most Americans disapproving of the job he is doing."

ABC (1/31) anchor Elizabeth Vargas said Bush "reached out with an olive branch on many occasions," but "the question, of course, being whether or not Democrats will be able to embrace and accept the olive branch. It was remarkable how many times he did, in fact, reach out." Tim Russert sounded similar themes on MSNBC (1/31), saying, "I think there will be a lot of different headlines from this speech, through the prism of the viewer, based on their own ideology. The interesting thing for me was the President's acknowledgement that this is, in the words of one of his top advisors, an unsettled country. There's an awful lot of angst and anxiety, and he's aware of that. And he knows the war in Iraq plays a central part of that, as well as a lack of a response to Katrina. And it's put us now in a position where it's very difficult for either party to get their way." The President "suggested he wanted to reach across the aisle and do some things. And then he talked about the domestic eavesdropping program and says by the way, members of Congress, they all knew about this. So it's going to be a give and take, back and forth, and I don't think much is going to happen, other than lobby reform, because both parties need that." The New York Times (2/1, Toner, Schemo, Pear, 1.19M) also says, "With federal spending now tightly constrained, some of the plans Mr. Bush presented on Tuesday could prove difficult to enact despite broad support."

Bill Kristol said on Fox News (1/31), "I think conservatives will not be entirely happy with this speech. There was more attention given to big government energy initiatives than to defending the tax cuts. Only one call for making the tax cuts permanent. I thought the discussion of Iran did not make a commitment to prevent Iran, no matter what, from acquiring nuclear weapons. We are going to lead the rest of the world into dealing with Iran challenge. If you think back to the 2002 State of the Union. We hope the rest of the world will be with us, but we've got to do what we've got to do."

Fred Barnes, also on Fox News (1/31), said, "This was a fairly conventional State of the Union address. I think it's clear that the President's domestic agenda is fairly exhausted. He has gotten most of his things, except for Social Security; Medicare, drug benefit, tax cuts And he has already changed the Supreme Court. … So his proposals on energy and education and health care were fairly small, not in keeping with the big picture ideas that the President likes. The interesting stuff was on foreign policy."

In a story about Bush's energy proposals titled "Call To Cut Foreign Oil Is A Refrain 35 Years Old," the New York Times (2/1, Wald, Andrews, 1.19M) reports, "When President Bush vowed on Tuesday to reduce drastically American dependence on oil from the Middle East, he had plenty of company. President Richard M. Nixon promised in 1971 to make the United States self-sufficient in energy by 1980. President Jimmy Carter promised in 1979 that the nation would 'never again use more foreign oil than we did in 1977.'" And Bush "has called in each of his past four State of the Union addresses for a reduction in the dependence on foreign oil. Despite those promises in the past 35 years, United States dependence on oil imports is at a record level."

USA Today (2/1, Appleby, 2.31M) notes Bush's health care proposals, which it says are "similar to his ideas last year on revamping Social Security" in that they "reflect an effort to foster more individual responsibility for saving for health care." The Washington Times (2/1, Curl, Dinan, 90K), meanwhile, focuses on Bush's comments on immigration in a story headlined "Bush Deems Guest Workers Key For Economy," in which it notes "Rep. Lamar Smith, Texas Republican, said US workers would be hurt by a guest-worker program."

The Miami Herald (2/1, Clark, Rosenberg, 323K), meanwhile reports Bush "singled out a fallen Marine from Pensacola in his State of the Union address Tuesday night, using the words of Staff Sgt. Daniel J. Clay to bolster his case for staying the course in Iraq. Clay, who was killed by a roadside bomb in December, left behind a letter to his family, Bush said, 'but his words could just as well be addressed to every American.'" As Bush spoke, Clay's parents, Clarence and Sara, and his widow, Lisa, "were among First Lady Laura Bush's guests in the gallery, watching Bush deliver the address." Clay "was among 10 Marines killed in an insurgent explosion in the Iraqi city of Fallujah."

McCain Gives Bush Speech An "A." Sen. John McCain said on MSNBC that Bush gave an "excellent speech," giving him a grade of "A." McCain, on CBS (1/31) said, "I thought it was excellent. I thought his pitch for the much-needed oil independence, his statement by Iran I think was important. Of course I was one of those very pleased to hear him express his comments to earmarking. The pork barrel projects which have become an obscenity in Washington and a cause for much of the corruption we see."

Feinstein Gives Bush Speech A "B." Sen. Dianne Feinstein said on MSNBC (1/31) said she would grade Bush's speech a "B" adding, "I thought it got marks because it covered a number of subjects, but it wasn't quite what I had hoped he would say about the war in Iraq. I think it's time for the President to tell us how and when we're going to see some changes in American troop presence and we didn't have that. And there's a lot of speculation about, you know, troop reductions that are going to take place very shortly. And I thought he had an obligation to clear some of that up, and he didn't. I thought on health, you know, the Medicare prescription drug program is a mess. In California' creating all kind of problems. … And he could have, I think, had a big impact there. His proposals for HSAs have a problem, and the problem is we have 42 million uninsured Americans who can't save because they can't afford to save and they don't have health insurance. So how do they get some kind of coverage? This is part of what drives up, I think, the cost of health care."

Thune Says Bush Was "Very Forceful." Sen. John Thune said on Fox News (1/31), "The President was very forceful, had a lot of energy, but I thought that the identifying a couple of key issues that are important not only to the economy, but also to the way that we project ourselves abroad, lessening our dependence on foreign energy. That is something folks in the Midwest are happy to hear. The focus on health care is on big issue. The President wants to move an agenda that addresses the high cost of health care. Those are both issues that are going to strike a real chord." Thune added that Bush "extended an olive branch. He talked about things that Democrats and Republicans can take credit for that have happened in the past few years and things we need to work together going fort. It's hard. It's an election year and everybody knows that. But through the best interest of the country, we have to pull together."

Mehlman Says Bush Gave A Great Speech." RNC Chairman Ken Mehlman said on MSNBC (1/31) that Bush "gave a great speech tonight. I thought he laid out a whole series of initiatives. Whether it's reducing foreign reliance on energy or improving education, all of these are areas where I think Republicans and Democrats can work together. I hope the Democrats will join this president in working together on these things."

Instant Poll Shows Support For Bush Proposals, But Low Expectations He Will Reach Goals. CBS (1/31) anchor Bob Schieffer said, "We want to give you some idea how the President's speech went over with people watching at home. CBS News with the help of a company called Knowledge Networks chose at random 700 adults who told us they planned to watch the address tonight. We gave them Web TV so they could get on to the internet and answer our questions about the speech. Now remember, this is not necessarily reflect the feelings of the country because traditionally we found out in recent years more Republicans watch when a Republican makes the speech. More Democrats when a Democrat makes a speech. But here were the questions. Did our viewers tonight approve of President Bush's proposals? 77% approved. 23% did not. We asked them what affect the President's proposals would have on their lives. 59% said they would make their lives better. 9% said worse. 33% said the proposals would have no effect on them. On some issues our survey shows the impact of the speech tonight. 52% say the war in Iraq has been worth the cost. Just last week just 45% of the same group thought so. And finally, here is a disappointment. When asked if President Bush will be able to accomplish his goals, this will be a disappointment to the President, I should say, 32% said yes. And 68% said no. They did not think he would be able to accomplish his goals."

Harris Poll Shows US Support For Bush On Iraq Increasing. The Wall Street Journal (2/1, 2.11M) reports an on-line survey of 2,985 adults shows, "American support for President Bush's handling of Iraq remains low, a new Harris poll shows, but those rating his job as 'excellent' or 'pretty good' increased significantly since December." The number "of U.S. adults giving the president positive marks with regard to Iraq rose to 36% in January, up from 29% in a poll conducted before Iraqi elections in December. At the same time, public confidence in the situation in Iraq, including U.S. involvement, also improved slightly, according to the recent online survey of 2,985 adults." Yet, "61% of U.S. adults rated Mr. Bush's handling of Iraq over the last several months as 'only fair' or 'poor,' but that's fewer than the 68% who felt the same in a previous poll."

Bush Expected To Receive Boost In Polls After Speech. ABC (1/31) correspondent Charles Gibson said, "I was interested to note that polls done in eight of the last 11 years after the state of the union address, at least 75% of the people who responded said they approved of what they heard. So with the President's polls as low as they are, with the President reaching out and trying to find cooperation in Washington, maybe he will get a pretty good sized boost in his polls from this speech." The CBS Evening News (1/31) correspondent Gloria Borger said, "Well, I you're going to see the poll numbers go up for the President, probably a bump."

First Lady Had 24 Guests In Her Box At State Of The Union. The Washington Post (2/1, C3, Argetsinger, Roberts, 744K) reports in its "The Reliable Source" column, "Twenty-four guests joined Laura Bush in her box during last night's State of the Union speech. … Among them: Fawzia Koofi, the 30-year-old second deputy speaker of the Afghan National Assembly, was on the first lady's right; Ja'Detrus Hamilton, a 16-year-old Katrina survivor and volunteer, was on her left. Local props went to Mayor Tony Williams and 2005 National Teacher of the Year Jason Kamras, a math teacher at John Philip Sousa Middle School."

Greenfield Says Discussion Of Warrrantless Wiretaps Was Strongest Part Of Speech. Jeff Greenfield said on CNN (1/31), "The strongest part of the President's speech was defending the controversial warrantless wiretaps where he used the same kind of approach he's used in this field before. I'm going to protect this country. I'm not going to let us sit back to get hit again. We've protected the country from future terrorist attacks. By implications, my critics will not be as strong on this issue. The other thing I'd mention is the other huge applause line from Republicans came when the President's cited the confirmation of Justices Roberts and Alito. That to me more than anything else was the most significant event today, the swearing in of Alito, because it told the conservative base that has been with him from the beginning, I really am your guy, forget Harriet Miers."

Bush Focus On Threat Of Radical Islam Noted. CBS (1/31) correspondent Lara Logan said, "He did two things that he doesn't normally do. He mentioned radical Islam twice. Since the last time when he made a speech saying that this was a crusade and it caused such outrage around the world because of the religious dimension that it evoked, he has stayed away from those kinds of references but speak to go the commanders on the ground they really feel like they are fighting radical Islam that no one has wanted to call it and say this publicly. So I thought that was very interesting. Then also the fact that he is talking about killing and capturing leaders was one throw-away line. Normally he's much more bold when he talks about that."

More Commentary. Media critic Tom Shales, in the Washington Post (2/1, C1, Shales, 744K), says that whether Bush is "at best, the worst president since Herbert Hoover -- as a seemingly sizable number of Americans appear to believe -- he acquitted himself fairly well and came off as basically competent when he delivered his fifth State of the Union speech last night." The speech was "capably presented, well organized and sometimes lofty in tone." But "it was also lackluster, ordinary and, most of all, generic. … 'Bush the Incompetent' was the headline on a lacerating op-ed column last week. If that's who he is, you wouldn't know it from the State of the Union speech he gave last night, but it hardly qualified him for the title of Bush the Brilliant, either."

The Washington Post (2/1, A22, 744K) says in an editorial Bush "sounded more subdued than triumphant, more realistic than grandiose. But if last night's State of the Union speech displayed a more cautious, less assertive President Bush than in previous years, his caution was not merely a contrast to the swashbuckling style of the past but an outgrowth of it. The president's future horizons are constrained by his past choices, budgetary and political."

The Los Angeles Times (2/1, 958K) editorializes, "It is not an unusual experience to listen to…Bush deliver a major speech and find yourself, regardless of your politics, nodding along in vigorous agreement. Tuesday night was no exception. The president hit the right notes, some of them even surprising, throughout his 52-minute State of the Union address," but he "often musters his laudable principles to avoid specifics or deflect unpleasant realities. … Confidence is an asset, but Bush needs to be more forthright about his setbacks." The Times adds, "By far the most cynical part of the address was the president's defense of the National Security Agency's warrantless wiretapping program, now rechristened, in Orwellian fashion, the 'terrorist surveillance program.'"

The New York Times (2/1, 1.19M) editorializes, "President Bush devoted two minutes and 15 seconds of his State of the Union speech to energy independence." The Times adds, "Hardly the bold signal we've been waiting for "last night's remarks were woefully insufficient." American "overdependence on oil has been a disaster for our foreign policy." The Times adds, "Mr. Bush told the people that 'the nations of the world must not permit the Iranian regime to gain nuclear weapons,' but he did not explain how that will happen when those same nations are so dependent on Tehran's oil." And while the UN "may wish to do something about genocide in Darfur or nuclear proliferation, [its] most powerful members are hamstrung by their oil alliances with some of the worst leaders on the planet." The Times adds, "Part of the answer, as Mr. Bush indicated last night, is the continued development of alternative fuels, especially for cars." When it "comes to cars, much of the research has already been done -- Brazil got to energy independence by figuring out how to get its citizens home from work in cars run without much gasoline." Simply "calling for more innovation is painless. The hard part is calling for anything that smacks of sacrifice -- on the part of consumers or special interests, and politicians who depend on their support."

USA Today (2/1, 2.31M) editorializes, "The president likes to characterize himself as a fighter for what he thinks is right. Achieving his goals and rebuilding confidence in his leadership will require him to be more of the uniter he once said he would be, rather than the divider he has too often become."

Thomas Friedman writes in the New York Times (2/1, 1.19M), "So far the democracy wave the Bush team has helped to unleash in the Arab-Muslim world since 9/11 has brought to power hard-line Islamic fundamentalists in Iraq, Palestine and Iran, and paved the way for a record showing by the Muslim Brotherhood in Egypt. If we keep this up, in a few years Muslim clerics will be in power from Morocco to the border of India. God bless America."

In the New York Times (2/1, 1.19M), guest columnist Sarah Wowell writes, "The state of our union is stunned. We democracy spreaders remain shocked, shocked, at the Hamas sweep in the recent Palestinian parliamentary election, never, ever, ever before having experienced a deficit of wisdom on the part of American voters. … For there are American citizens who used to think that there could be no greater blow for representative democracy than a president worming his way into the White House thanks to one Supreme Court vote. That is, until the day said president was actually elected to a second term by an electorate that overlooked the previous four years of galling, irrevocable policies with upbeat, intelligence-insulting slogans – 'Clear Skies,' anyone? -- to say nothing of entering into an ugly war based on lies that has made the world a more dangerous place when it wasn't exactly all Davenport, Iowa, to begin with."

Kaine, Villaraigosa Deliver Democratic Rebuttal. The Los Angeles Times (2/1, Simon, Fiore, 958K) reports, "The governor of a Republican-leaning state and the Latino mayor of Los Angeles delivered the Democratic rebuttal to President Bush's State of the Union speech Tuesday night, sounding themes the party hopes will help it take control of Congress in November's elections." In the official responses to the speech, Gov. Timothy M. Kaine of Virginia and Los Angeles Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa "assailed Bush on a number of fronts — including his handling of the war in Iraq, implementation of the Medicare prescription drug benefit and his failure to bring down energy prices." Kaine "argued repeatedly in his nationally televised remarks that 'there's a better way' to grapple with issues than Bush had chosen. He called for a greater emphasis on public service by Americans." Villaraigosa, who offered the Spanish-language response to Bush's speech, 'criticized the president for offering 'the same defense of the very policies that have divided this country over the last five years.'"

ABC (1/31) anchor Elizabeth Vargas also noted Kaine used "the expression 'a better way' nine times on a variety of issues, referring to the war on terrorism, he simply asked: 'Are the President's policies the best way?' He noted our greatest need is for America to heal its partisan wounds and become one people, echoing President Bush's state of the union address." The Washington Post (2/1, A1, Shear, 744K) says Keine "assailed the administration's performance in Iraq, its response to Hurricane Katrina and its management of the nation's health care system." He also "urged Bush to restore the competence Kaine said is lacking in government administration." Moreover, says the Financial Times (2/1, Yeager), Kaine, "a positive note, criticized what he said was 'too much of partisanship for its own sake.'"

The AP (2/1) reports Villaraigosa, in a nationally televised Spanish-language speech" made in response to President Bush's State of the Union address, "faulted the White House Tuesday for policies he said pushed more Americans into poverty and failed to address a crisis in education." Villaraigosa "was broadly critical of the White House on issues from the national debt to job training, but at the same time he appealed for unity to address those problems." The speech was "carried on the Univision network."

The Washington Times (2/1, Fagan, Dinan, 90K) runs a similar report under the headline "Democrats Decry 'Bad Management,'" while the Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (2/1, Reston, 261K) titles its report "Democrats Find Little To Praise In Bush's Address." The Chicago Tribune (2/1, Zeleny, 643K) adds that "judging by the bursts of applause during much of " Bush's "address Tuesday night, one might never guess the palpable level of animosity at the start of the election year."

Reid Says Whatever Bush Said, "Think Just The Opposite." The New York Times (2/1, Hulse, 1.19M) reports, "In their own comments before the address, Senator Harry Reid of Nevada and Representative Nancy Pelosi of California, the top Democrats in Congress, said the White House and Congressional Republicans had granted special interests too great a role in shaping legislation, including the new Medicare prescription drug plan." Pelosi and Reid also "said they had seen no sign in Mr. Bush's five years in office that he and Republican Congressional leaders were serious about easing the nation's reliance on foreign energy sources. They said energy legislation adopted by Congress last year was heavily influenced by the oil industry, which is earning record profits." Reid said, "This is Bush doublespeak. … Whatever he said, think just the opposite."

Reid Also Says Bush White House "Cradle Of Republican Corruption." The AP (2/1, Sidoti) quotes Reid saying, "There is no more important task in Washington than cleaning up the culture of corruption. Yet the president -- whose White House has become the cradle of Republican corruption -- is not taking responsibility for the costs of that corruption."

Dean Says He Has "Heard The Same Speech Three Or Four Years In A Row." DNC Chairman Howard Dean said on MSNBC (1/31), "I've heard this speech three or four years in a row now. He talked about clean energy, while he's putting toxic in the air. He's making it harder for seniors to get their drug prescriptions."

Obama Says Bush Didn't Offer Bold Domestic Proposals. Sen. Barack Obama on NBC (1/31) said, "Well, you know, two-thirds of the America people think that the country is moving in the wrong direction I think the President identified some of the issues people are concerned about. They don't feel comfortable with the healthcare system that doesn't provide enough coverage and costs too much. They're concerned about energy independence. They're concerned about educating their kids to compete in the 21st century. Unfortunately, although the President had some ideas that I think we can work together on a bipartisan basis, you didn't see the sort of bold approaches that would ask America to meet these challenges together. And so, in that sense, I think a lot of Americans watching are thinking can't we do better than what we heard from the President."

Nelson Says Bush Gave A "Strong Speech." Meanwhile, Sen. Ben Nelson said on Fox News (1/31), "I thought it was a very strong speech. The President touched on at least two of the initiatives that I have already got introduced, one for health care for small businesses to help and make sure that small businesses can continue to support and provide health care for their employees. The second, of course, is on border security, which is so important to homeland security, to make sure that terrorists are not coming across. Stop the inflow of illegal immigration. I have a bill with other senators that will do that."

Sheehan, Invited By Democratic Lawmaker, Arrested Before Speech. The Washington Post (2/1, A16, Williams, Lengel, 744K) reports, "Activist Cindy Sheehan was arrested last night after demonstrating in the spectators gallery of the House of Representatives as part of a larger war protest that was held outside the Capitol. Sheehan, who was apparently given a gallery ticket by a member of Congress, began to attract notice about 30 minutes to an hour before President Bush's State of the Union speech." The Post adds, "Sheehan, whose son was killed in Iraq, opened her jacket to reveal a T-shirt that, according to a supporter, gave the number of U.S. war dead and asked,

'How many more?'" She was also "vocal, said U.S. Capitol Police Chief Terrance W. Gainer, and after she ignored instructions to close her jacket and quiet down, she was led out and arrested." Sheehan's sister Dede Miller "told a reporter that Rep. Lynn C. Woolsey (D-Calif.) had invited Sheehan as her guest. Woolsey could not be reached immediately for comment." Late last night, "about 50 protesters marched to the Capitol Police station to demand Sheehan's release." The Washington Times (2/1, Doolittle, 90K) says Woolsey "gave Mrs. Sheehan a seat in the visitors gallery above the chamber. … 'I'm proud that Cindy is my guest tonight,' Mrs. Woolsey said before the speech. 'She has made a difference in the debate to bring our troops home from Iraq.'"

White House Renews Outreach To Senate Republicans. The Bush Administration is renewing efforts to reach out to Senate Republicans in the hope of better coordinating their messages. According to Roll Call (2/1, Billings), "Key Republican sources say the president has shown a heightened interest in working with Congressional Republicans in recent weeks, and last week Bush invited GOP Senators to the White House to articulate that desire. Senators and aides alike suggested the overtures were welcome as they look to securing, and possibly building, their House and Senate majorities this fall." The effort comes "at a time when House and Senate Democratic leaders are working closely to mount a coordinated campaign against the Republicans on ethics, corruption and mismanagement of the government." Roll Call adds, "Senators and aides alike say they expect to hear Republican Senators and the White House hitting the same themes more prominently in the coming weeks and months, particularly on major 2006 issues such as the war on terrorism, American economic competitiveness and values -- all key themes in the State of the Union address."

Lott Won't Rule Out Bid For Senate Majority Leader. Sen. Trent Lott was asked on Fox News' Your World with Neil Cavuto (1/31) if he would consider seeking the Senate Majority Leader position again. Lott said, "I made a decision to run for re-election. That was a decision that was different from what I had planned to do. But, a couple of cataclismic events that occurred in my life along the way including how much my state and my neighbors along the Mississippi gulf coast need help right now. They have invested 33 years in me and I just felt like I couldn't walk away from them at that moment. That's all that went on. I didn't run with the plans, to you know, get back into leadership. I don't know what will happen in that regard. But if the right opportunity came along, why would I not be willing to consider, at least, pursuing that." Lott said he "wouldn't rule it out. But it will depend on what happens. That's a year from now. Or 11 months from now. It depends on elections and what's happening with other people."

House GOP Voting Today On Whether To Hold Full Leadership Election. House Republicans will vote this morning on whether to put their leadership up for a vote on Thursday. Roll Call (2/1, Pershing) reports that the outcome of today's vote is uncertain, but most lawmakers and aides are "predicting that the move for a full slate of elections will fail." At a meeting this morning GOP lawmakers will "hear speeches from candidates for the two currently vacant posts: Majority Leader and Republican Policy chairman. Republican Reps. John Sweeney (N.Y.) and Dan Lungren (Calif.) plan to make a motion to 'vacate' every other elected leadership post below [House Speaker Dennis] Hastert, a call that requires the approval of 117 lawmakers on a secret ballot. … Lawmakers who oppose the idea say that they do not want to establish a precedent where the Conference starts putting its leaders up for a vote every time Members grow restless."

Uncertainty Of Majority Leader Race Seen As Result Of Push For Reforms. The Christian Science Monitor (2/1, Chaddock, 61K) reports, "The uncertainty about who will win Thursday's vote for House majority leader shows how thoroughly the rally cry for reform has altered leadership politics in the US Congress. Thursday's secret ballot was supposed to be a mere formality for Rep. Roy Blunt," but "after weeks of intense campaigning, it's not clear he has enough votes to secure victory. What's changing the race is a growing debate among Republicans about how far they must go to repair the damage caused by last fall's corruption scandals - and those yet to come. Members who say the party can ride out the ethics storm with current leadership are falling in behind Representative Blunt. Those who feel their party needs a change of face and a more collegial leadership style are supporting Rep. John Boehner of Ohio. And those convinced that the party needs a full-course correction are moving toward Rep. John Shadegg of Arizona."

Boehner Criticizes Hastert Ethics Reform Proposal. The Los Angeles Times (2/1, Curtius, 958K) says Boehner "offered rare public criticism Tuesday of House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), saying he disagreed with key elements of Hastert's plan to overhaul the chamber's ethics rules." Boehner "questioned Hastert's call for a ban on travel by House members and their staffs paid for by private groups, indicating he considered such a proposal 'childish.'" The Times notes, "It is unusual for any House Republican, particularly one fighting to join him in the leadership, to publicly question a move by Hastert. Later in the day, Boehner issued a statement modifying his remarks and saying he supported the travel ban. Still, his initial comments, made to reporters, reflected a sense among some Republicans that their leadership may have overreacted to the scandal surrounding lobbyist Jack Abramoff that has yet to result in the indictment of a single member of Congress."

Majority Leader Hopefuls Profiled. The Hill (2/1, O'Connor) adds that the three candidates have "remarkably varied personalities and résumés, and the winner's success in the post will be less about public rhetoric than how he moves bills, schedules the floor and interacts with members in pushing the Republican agenda." Blunt "is the most known quantity among all three candidates running for the post. … Blunt largely inherited DeLay's whip organization and has built off that success, particularly in creating large coalitions of outside lobbyists to pass controversial bills. Given that fact, Blunt's opponents have painted him as the candidate for the status quo, but that status quo has been hugely successful during the first five years of the Bush presidency." Boehner 'has made his ability to manage the conference a central theme of his campaign to succeed DeLay. … It remains to be seen how Boehner's open management style would jell with the Speaker. Hastert worked well with DeLay in large part because DeLay kept things moving quickly, freeing Hastert and his staff to focus on larger issues of relevance to the president and the party. Even Boehner's supporters suggest he would give members enough space to come up short occasionally." Shadegg "is the unquestioned conservative in this race, but he does not have Blunt's experience winning tough votes on the House floor or Boehner's experience moving bills through committee." Shadegg is "offering himself as a face for the party, something DeLay came to embody — for better or worse."

Boehner Has Largest Number Of Former Aides On K Street. The Hill (2/1, Bolton) reports, "Rep. John Boehner (R-Ohio) has had a significantly greater number of former staffers go on to work with lobbying and public-affairs shops around town than Reps. Roy Blunt (R-Mo.) and John Shadegg (R-Ariz.), according to congressional records reviewed by The Hill. This larger alumni network gives Boehner strong allies in the business community should he become House majority leader but also creates a potential liability because of the Jack Abramoff lobbying scandal, which has prompted critics to attempt to cast lobbyists in a negative light. At least 24 former aides to Boehner, chairman of the House Education and the Workforce Committee, have registered as lobbyists or proceeded to work in corporate public affairs and advocacy since leaving Capitol Hill. At least 11 former staffers to Majority Whip Roy Blunt (R-Mo.) have pursued careers at trade associations, public-affairs companies and law firms since working in the House. At least seven former staffers to Shadegg later registered as lobbyists or landed jobs as corporate advocates."

Budget Vote Seen As "Major Test" For Blunt. The Washington Post (2/1, A11, Weisman, 744K) calls today's House vote on final passage of the budget bill "a final major test" in Blunt's bid for Majority Leader. The Post reports "Supporters and opponents of Blunt say passage of the budget bill may not ensure his victory in the leadership vote on Thursday, but its failure could be a serious blow to his bid to succeed DeLay."

House GOP Lobbying Reform Package Will Be Broken Into Separate Bills. House Republican leaders plan to unveil to rank-and-file members its plan for overhauling lobbying rules. Roll Call (2/1, Newmyer) reports, "Acting House Majority Leader Roy Blunt (R-Mo.) said Tuesday that the package would be broken into separate bills. It was unclear, however, whether lobbying reform measures would be separated for the sake of committee consideration and then folded back into a single bill, or whether they would in fact be sent to the floor separately. The bill was widely expected to be introduced this week. But its architect, Rep. David Dreier (R-Calif.), indicated that the compressed time frame for the Republican Conference to consider the plan, as well as other distractions, may delay the party's effort to address the Jack Abramoff lobbying scandal with a legislative fix." The "pending shakeup" in the House GOP leadership is also delaying the effort. The "outcome of the leadership contest could affect the shape of the reform package."

Lawmakers Imposing Limits On Staff Contact With Lobbyists. Meanwhile, The Hill (2/1, Kaplan, Schor) reports, "A growing number of lawmakers aren't waiting around for new lobbying reforms to be enacted. Instead, they are imposing new limits on staffers' contacts with K Street, seeking to cleanse the sudden stain of scandal from once-routine gifts and lunches." House Energy and Commerce Committee aides "are avoiding not just lunches and dinners with lobbyists but any lobbyist-sponsored reception. The mindfulness came after a decree issued last week by the committee's staff director, Bud Albright. … Albright's underlings are not the only staffers struggling to adapt to the new order on the Hill, where lobbyists and lawmakers alike are stepping lightly and laying low. Reps. Pete Sessions (R-Texas), Loretta Sanchez (D-Calif.), Frank Pallone (D-N.J.), David Wu (D-Ore.) and Jerry Weller (R-Ill.) are among the House members imposing internal restrictions of varying intensity on their aides." The Hill also notes that "other members have not flinched since the lobbying scandal first erupted and are operating as usual, reflecting quiet resentment among those who fear that stricter rules would isolate them from the outside world."

Proposal Would Lift Former Members' Access To House Floor, House Gym. The Washington Times (2/1, Dinan, 90K) says the House "is poised to ban former members of Congress who have become lobbyists from both the House floor and members' gym as the first step in what will be a months-long lobbying and ethics-reform debate.

Democrats called the changes nearly inconsequential in the scope of serious corruption charges, and said it was a strange place to start. … The changes, which passed the House Rules Committee by voice vote yesterday and were sent to the full House for a vote today, would prohibit former members who are lobbyists from the House floor. Former members and their spouses who are lobbyists would not be allowed in the gym." House Rules Committee Chairman David Dreier "called the change a 'first step in the process' and said the House would address all concerns that Democrats have raised."

Senators Have Sign-Up Lists For Earmarks On Their Web Sites. The Washington Post (2/1, A21, Kamen, 744K) reports in its "In the Loop" column, "Several senators, we're told, have downloadable sign-up lists" for earmark projects "on their Web sites." On her web site, Sen. Lisa Murkowski "invites constituents to send in requests for projects so all Americans will have the chance to pay for things Alaskans don't want to pay for. 'Every federal fiscal year,' she says, 'Alaskans are welcome to submit requests for programs or projects to be funded by earmarks' in appropriations bills. Alaskans could, of course, submit them to their state and local officials, but since there's no state income tax or sales tax, there's only so much money available from the $1.2 billion state budget surplus. But hurry. 'These funding requests are due no later than March 1 of each calendar year,' she notes. You can download 'Senator Lisa Murkowski's Fiscal Year 2007 Project Request Form' and then e-mail it to her at: Funding_Request@murkowski.sen.gov or fax it in."

Burns Aide Says Birthday Fundraiser Was "Test Of Loyalty and Friendship." Roll Call (2/1, Akers) reports in its "Heard on the Hill" column, "That birthday fundraiser last Wednesday for Sen. Conrad Burns (R-Mont.) made the politically vulnerable 71-year-old Senator feel better about his standing with his colleagues, according to one Capitol Hill GOP aide. Without saying how much money was raised, the aide described the event as a 'test of loyalty and friendship,' a referendum on 'how do people feel? Are they gonna stick by him?' Burns' folks felt pretty good about nine Senators, including three committee chairmen, showing up at the fundraiser at the National Republican Senatorial Committee. They were: Sens. Ted Stevens (Alaska), Lisa Murkowski (Alaska), Kit Bond (Mo.), Mitch McConnell (Ky.), John Warner (Va.), Lamar Alexander (Tenn.), George Voinovich (Ohio), and Arlen Specter (Pa.). Voinovich personally offered to come to Montana and campaign for Burn's re-election effort."

OPM Director Says Government Faces "Retirement Tsunami." The Washington Post (2/1, B2, Barr, 744K) reports in its "Federal Diary" column that OPM Director Linda Springer warned that the government "will likely face a 'retirement tsunami' in the next few years and needs to begin taking steps now to expand employment opportunities for the next generation of public servants." Springer "said that 60 percent of the government's 1.6 million white-collar employees and 90 percent of about 6,000 federal executives will be eligible for retirement over the next 10 years. OPM projects that the high-water years will be 2008 through 2010, as baby boomers and others leave Uncle Sam." Springer said it is "imperative for OPM to come up with strategic plans for the federal workforce and how career patterns may change in the future, Springer said. The government cannot afford to be caught by surprise, assuming that it can easily recruit a new generation of employees interested in a federal career that spans decades, she said."

Tomorrow's Prayer Breakfast Called "Demonstration Of Interfaith Worship." The Washington Times (2/1, Duin, 90K) reports, "Tomorrow's National Prayer Breakfast, traditionally an evangelical Christian event, will be a demonstration of interfaith worship Sen. Norm Coleman, Minnesota Republican, is the first Jewish co-chairman, and Jordan's King Abdullah, a Muslim, will attend the breakfast and give a major luncheon speech a few hours later. Several persons close to the event organizers say the keynote speaker will be the rock star Bono, founder of the Irish band U2. A spokesman for Bono, an outspoken Christian and backer of humanitarian causes, did not return calls yesterday."

Taylor's Failure To Get FDIC Post Attributed To NRA Opposition. The New York Post (2/1, Earle), in a front-page article, reports New York state banking commissioner Diana Taylor, who is Mayor Michael Bloomberg's "girlfriend" had been "widely seen as a shoo-in as late as last week to head the Federal Deposit Insurance Corp., which oversees the nation's banks. But the NRA wound up maneuvering behind the scenes to block her nomination at the last minute, to send a message to her billionaire boyfriend, sources told The Post. 'It's obvious the NRA hasn't been pleased with the mayor's campaign against guns,' a Senate aide said." The Post notes, "The apparent revenge attack comes after Bloomberg made a 'war on guns' a top priority for his new term." However, Sen. Larry Craig, "who sits on the NRA board, hinted that there was another reason. … 'I think she has more baggage than a friend who's the mayor of New York [at battle with] the NRA,' he told The Post last night. 'That's what I've been told.'"

OTHER NEWS:

On Greenspan's Last Day, Fed Raises Interest Rate A Quarter Point. On Alan Greenspan's final day as Federal Reserve Chairman the Fed raised its benchmark short term interest rate a quarter point to 4.5%. ABC World News Tonight (1/31, story 5, 2:34, Vargas) called Greenspan's departure the "end of an era." ABC (Stark) added that Greenspan leaves the Fed "as he led it, a figure of mythic proportions. While 60% of Americans rate the national economy negatively, 72% approve of the job Alan Greenspan did managing it." President Bush in November 2005: "The era of Chairman Greenspan will always be known as one of phenomenal economic growth." Stark: "Mr. Greenspan will also be missed as a master in times of crisis and the new Fed chairman will have to prove himself a steady hand. Ironically, Elizabeth, that's just what people said 18 1/2 years ago, when Alan Greenspan, then a mere mortal, first took over." Vargas: "History repeats itself."

NBC Nightly News (1/31, story 9, 2:00, Thompson) quoted former Treasury Secretary Robert Rubin." It's not so much that he and his work, in terms of the job as Chairman of the Federal Reserve board, are one, but he and the substance of what he does and what's involved in and engaged in, I think are really one." Thompson: "His support of President Bush's tax cuts led the Senate's leading Democrat Harry Reid to call Greenspan one of the biggest political hacks in Washington. Sometimes knocked, one time knighted, the face of the Fed, rationally exuberant as he leaves."

The Los Angeles Times (2/1, Sing, 958K) reports that the Fed gave Greenspan's successor Ben Bernanke "some flexibility to wage his own battle against inflation." The central bank said "'some further policy firming may be needed.' But for the first time since it began its tightening program, the central bank dropped the word 'measured' — which had become Fed-speak for predictable quarter-point hikes. Dropping that word from the Fed's policy statement is seen as a step to give Bernanke some flexibility, making future rate decisions less predictable and more dependent on economic data."

USA Today (2/1, Kirchhoff, Hagenbaugh, 2.31M) says the Fed's language "was less emphatic than the prior statement that further rate increases were 'likely' to be necessary. Fed officials also removed reference to 'measured' interest rate increases. … Its omission suggests the Fed is that much closer to being done increasing rates, economists say."

The Financial Times (2/1, Balls) adds, "By changing the language in its statement, Fed policymakers were attempting to avoid the impression of committing Ben Bernanke, the new Fed chairman, to further increases, while signalling that further rate increases remained likely, depending on the economic data."

The Washington Post (2/1, D1, Henderson, 744K) adds, "The statement was the first in more than two years that did not indicate the Fed's likely next move, forcing financial markets to accept more uncertainty. … Major banks followed the Fed's action yesterday by lifting the prime rate on business loans to 7.5 percent from 7.25 percent. Many consumer rates, such as on credit cards and home equity loans linked to the prime rate, may rise as well."

The Wall Street Journal (2/1, Ip, 2.11M) adds, "The wording change suggests that prospects for an increase at the Fed's March 28 meeting and after depend on incoming economic data. The Fed expressed no alarm over a sharp slowdown in economic growth in the fourth quarter of 2005, but it remained wary of inflation. Though economic data have been 'uneven, the expansion in economic activity appears solid,' it said."

The New York Times (2/1, Andrews, 1.19M) says Greenspan "left his successor a wide berth to set his own policy but some major uncertainties about the future." Greenspan's signal that "the current series of rate rises was nearing an end" gave Bernanke "freedom to make his own mark on an economy that performed much better during most of the Greenspan era than many experts thought possible when he took over at the Fed in 1987. But the handoff also meant that Mr. Bernanke would face murkier choices at a time of substantial risks that increase the chances for serious missteps."

Greenspan Says Economy Solid, High Energy Prices May Cause Inflation. ABC World News Tonight (1/31, story 5, 2:34, Stark) reported, "The diagnosis today" from outgoing Fed Chairman Alan Greenspan, "an economy that appears solid but remains at risk for inflation pressures from high energy prices. Low inflation, low interest rates, and record prosperity have been hallmarks of the Greenspan tenure."

Forbes Says Greenspan Operated On "Hunches." Steve Forbes writes in the Wall Street Journal (2/1, 2.11M), "Never in history has a central banker received such a cacophony of hosannas as has Alan Greenspan, who officially stepped down yesterday. … Mr. Greenspan's record? Officially measured rates of inflation are lower today than when the Maestro took office." Forbes adds that Greenspan "has left no institutional legacy that can guide his successors, that can be a lasting model for other central bankers here and around the world. In short, Mr. Greenspan operated by his gut, on hunches. He was similar to a pilot who flies without instruments. His instincts are usually right on, but not always." Forbes continues, "Greenspan leaves his successor with another blunder -- the Fed is re-stoking the fires of inflation. … Alan Greenspan's failure to leave a gold-based legacy means poor Ben Bernanke won't be prepared for what will be hitting him -- the most serious resurgence of inflation in 25 years."

Bernanke To Be Sworn In As Fed Chairman This Morning. USA Today (2/1, Kirchhoff, 2.31M) reports that the Senate confirmed Ben Bernanke to replace Alan Greenspan as Federal Reserve Chairman. Bernanke who is scheduled to be sworn in this morning, "was cleared by the Senate on a voice vote with the sole dissent coming from Sen. Jim Bunning, R-Ky., a longtime Fed critic." USA Today adds, "The transition should continue to run smoothly on many levels. Bernanke inherits an economy that has been expanding since late 2001, with steady job growth and healthy business profits. He has pledged continuity with Greenspan's approach, emphasizing the importance of low and stable inflation, flexibility and greater openness. … Still, turbulence is possible. The transition comes at a pivotal time, with the Fed's Federal Open Market Committee deciding when, and how, to wind up its nearly two-year string of interest rate increases. The record housing market is losing steam, energy prices remain high, and the nation is saddled with huge trade and budget deficits. Bernanke is untested in a crisis and has called for more explicit inflation targets, a change in Fed operations."

The Christian Science Monitor (2/1, Trumbull, 61K) says Bernanke "does not arrive on the job with a long track record as a public figure - either in government or in the corner office. Alan Greenspan came to the Fed as a well-known Wall Street economist who had advised President Nixon. Paul Volcker headed the prestigious Federal Reserve Bank of New York. G. William Miller was CEO of Textron. By contrast, Dr. Bernanke is relatively new to the circles of the world's policymaking elite. His rise from Dillon, S.C. - a quiet town of 6,300 - has run along a largely academic track. That changed in 2002, when President Bush named him to one of seven slots on the Federal Reserve Board. Then, last June, he became chairman of the president's Council of Economic Advisers. But if he has spent little time in the limelight, Bernanke is hardly unprepared for the rigors of his new role. His recent post as a Fed governor has put him at Mr. Greenspan's side for three years, helping to shape the Fed's interest-rate policies."

Consumer Confidence Rose In January. The Conference Board said its consumer confidence index rose to 106.3 in January, the highest level since June 2002. The AP (2/1) attributes the rise in the index to growing optimism about the US job market. The AP adds, "A separate report from the Labor Department on employee compensation said wages and benefits paid to civilian workers rose 3.1 percent last year, the smallest amount in nine years. The department said the slowdown reflected a big drop in benefit costs — items like health insurance and pensions — which rose by 4.5 percent last year after jumping 6.9 percent in 2004."

Survey Finds Manufacturers Optimistic About Economy's Prospects. The Wall Street Journal (2/1, Golden, 2.11M) reports, "US manufacturers expect solid revenue growth, a higher level of new investment, more hiring, and an upturn in mergers and acquisitions activity during 2006, according to a PricewaterhouseCoopers survey. Some 76% of the 62 senior executives interviewed for the accounting and consulting firm's quarterly 'Manufacturing Barometer' survey during the fourth quarter of 2005 said they were optimistic about the U.S. economy's prospects over the next 12 months, up from 45% in the third quarter. Only 2% are pessimistic, according to PricewaterhouseCooper's and 22% have an uncertain outlook. Seventy-one percent are optimistic about the world economy, up from 54% of executives in the previous quarter. Also, 61% of those surveyed plan to increase their workforce over the next 12 months, up from 52% in the third quarter last year and 53% one year ago."

Paychecks Did Not Keep Pace With Inflation Last Year. The Labor Department said that employee paychecks failed to keep pace with inflation last year. The Wall Street Journal (2/1, Preciphs, 2.11M) reports, "Total compensation costs -- wages and benefits -- for civilian workers rose a seasonally adjusted 0.8% in the October-December period, following a similar increase in the third quarter. Benefit costs for the period rose 1.1%, while wages and salaries trailed with a 0.8% increase, the department said. Compensation costs rose 3.1% for all of 2005, down from a 3.7% increase the year before. Last year's increase was the smallest annual increase since 1996. Wages and salaries were up 2.6% for the year, not enough to compensate for inflation, which averaged 3.39%. Meanwhile, the costs of benefits such as health insurance rose 4.5% for the year, a marked slowdown from the 6.9% surge in 2004."

Foreign Auto Companies Creating New Jobs In US. A front page story in the Wall Street Journal (2/1, Shirouzu, 2.11M) say that "massive job cuts by Detroit have overshadowed an important change in U.S. manufacturing. Asian and European auto companies, looking for skilled workers to make complex products, have created nearly enough new jobs in the U.S. to make up the difference. … The new jobs buoying the U.S. manufacturing sector require that workers have a decent education. It is the towns that understand this new math that are winning the work. Employees need skills to operate and maintain complex, computer-controlled machinery. Top-tier automotive suppliers such as Denso, Robert Bosch GmbH and Delphi Corp. use similar equipment and techniques to make competing products. The difference between them, therefore, often comes down to whose workers can produce the most goods at the highest quality. … Denso's top executives say they expect to expand their work force to meet demand from Toyota and other Asian auto makers flocking to southern states. Currently at 380, Denso's work force in Osceola could increase to more than 3,000, company executives say. Denso executives know Osceola still faces big challenges in improving its education but say they were attracted by the town's commitment to tackling its problems.'

Stocks Declined Tuesday. Stocks finished the day down yesterday following a Federal Reserve decision to raise interest rates for 14th time in nearly two years. The AP (2/1, Martinez) says the Fed "failed to give Wall Street a clear signal on when those rate increases would end." The Dow Jones industrials fell 35.06 points to 10,864.86. The Standard & Poor's 500 index lost 5.12 points to 1280.08. The Nasdaq composite slipped 0.96 points to 2305.82. Reuters (2/1) also attributes the indexes' declines to "jitters about the outlook for interest rates."

Chicago Federal Court Opens Help-Desk For Pro Se Suits. The Washington Post (2/1, Lydersen) reports that "the U.S. District Court for the Northern District of Illinois in Chicago has launched a program to provide free legal assistance for people in filing pro se federal lawsuits." The Post continues, "Judges and lawyers here who advocated for the help-desk program -- which was launched early last month as the District Court Self-Help Assistance Desk -- describe it as a win-win situation for all. It serves as a filter, weeding out frivolous cases or cases that do not belong in federal court, while aiding people with legitimate complaints. … 'Lots of times we've had pro se complaints that are literally gibberish,' said District Judge William J. Hibbler, who was involved in founding the help desk. 'Trying to make heads or tails of their complaints was a big effort. There might be a kernel of a case there, but it's so poorly articulated that it gets dismissed. People need technical help to formulate complaints in such a fashion that we can deal with them.'" The Post adds, "The idea came about through conversations last fall between U.S. district judges here and the Chicago Bar Foundation, the charitable arm of the Chicago Bar Association. State and circuit courts and bankruptcy courts around the country have provided similar programs for people without attorneys, but this help desk is thought to be the first of its kind in federal court. … The Chicago Bar Foundation put up more than $100,000 to fund the program and hire the lawyer who staffs the desk full time. The lawyer, who has federal court experience, is employed by the Legal Assistance Foundation."

Spitzer Bars Leader Of Holocaust Fund For Fiscal Mismanagement. The New York Times (2/1, Strom, 1.19M) reports, "The New York attorney general's office found that the leader of the World Jewish Congress, Israel Singer, violated his fiduciary responsibilities and barred him and a former executive from any financial role in the organization, according to a settlement disclosed yesterday." AG Eliot Spitzer's office "also identified shortcomings in the organization's financial controls, record keeping and fund-raising, but said it found no evidence of criminal wrongdoing."

Putin Says Russia Will Not Support Aid Cutoffs To Palestinians. The Washington Post (2/1, A19, Finn, 744K) reports that though Russian President Vladimir Putin described the Hamas victory in the Palestinian elections "as 'a big blow to American efforts in the Middle East, a very serious blow,'" he said Russia "would not support any efforts to cut off financial assistance to the Palestinians." At his "annual news conference in the Kremlin," Putin said, "Our position on Hamas is different from that of the United States and Western Europe. The Russian Foreign Ministry has never regarded Hamas as a terrorist organization. But this does not mean that we totally approve and support everything that Hamas has done." The Washington Times (2/1, Borowiec, 90K) reports that Putin added, "A refusal to help the Palestinian people would be mistaken."

Wolfowitz Also Says World Bank Should Continue Aiding Palestinians. The Financial Times (2/1, Beattie) reports World Bank President Paul Wolfowitz also said the Bank "should continue delivering aid to the West Bank and Gaza in spite of last week's electoral victory" by Hamas. Wolfowitz said the Bank "was operating in Palestinian areas at the request of the 'quartet' of the US, the United Nations, Russia and the European Union. 'What we do now depends on what the quartet asks us to do,' he said. 'I hope they will ask us to stay.'"

Quartet's Urging Of Hamas To Reform Seen As Unrealistic. The New York Times (2/1, Erlanger, 1.19M) reports that the "quartet" nations "have lined up in solidarity with Israel in calling on Hamas…to modify its radical policies." In a Monday statement, the quartet said Hamas "'must be committed to nonviolence, recognize Israel and accept the previous agreements and commitments,' like the Oslo accords that set up the Palestinian Authority and the 'road map' peace plan, which calls for the dismantling of armed groups like Hamas. All that pleased Israel, its diplomats said Tuesday. But it is like asking Hamas to convert to Christianity, they concede."

Palestinians Debate Role Of Religion In Hamas Governance. The New York Times (2/1, Fisher, 1.19M) reports that Palestinians are debating to what extent, "by law or by social pressure, Hamas will "impose its strong religious beliefs." So far, Hamas leaders, "seeking to calm both Palestinians and an anxious outside world, have projected moderation. They say they will not impose on the Palestinians' diverse society any form of Islamic rule." But "given Hamas's roots in the wider Islamic movement, the pledge is not entirely convincing for many in the tiny and dwindling Christian population, or among secularists and observant Muslims who want a more secular state." Meanwhile, the Washington Times (2/1, Mitnick, 90K) profiles the West Bank town of Qalqilya, where Hamas "swept all 15 municipal council seats eight months ago, only to lose the area's two parliamentary seats in the face of voter disappointment."

Political Bureau Chief Says Hamas "Shall Never Recognize" Israel. Hamas Political Bureau leader Khaled Meshaal, in a Los Angeles Times (2/1, 958K) op-ed headlined 'We Shall Never Recognize…A Zionist State On Our Soil,' writes, "The day Hamas won the Palestinian elections, the world's leading democracies failed the test of democracy. Rather than recognize the legitimacy of Hamas as a freely elected representative of the Palestinian people, seize the opportunity created by the result to support the development of good governance in Palestine and search for a means of ending the bloodshed, the U.S. and the EU threatened the Palestinian people with collective punishment. We are being punished simply for resisting oppression and striving for justice. … Our message to the U.S. and EU is this: Your attempt to force us to give up our principles or our struggle is in vain. … Our message to the Israelis is this: We do not fight you because you belong to a certain faith or culture. Jews have lived in the Muslim world for 13 centuries in peace and harmony. … Our conflict with you is not religious but political. … We shall never recognize the legitimacy of a Zionist state created on our soil in order to atone for somebody else's sins or solve somebody else's problem."

Rice Confident Russia, China Will Support Iran Referral To Security Council. Reuters (1/31, Pleming) reports Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said she "was confident of Russia and China's support for sending Iran's nuclear case to the U.N. Security Council, but expected differences over exactly what steps to take." Rice said, "There is a very strong consensus on what the problem is and that the problem has to be dealt with. I expect there will continue to be tactical differences about timing. There may even be tactical differences about precisely what is required but that's the hard work of the diplomacy." Russia and China are "now expected to vote 'yes' on Thursday instead of abstaining, a senior State Department official said." Knight Ridder (1/31, Landay) adds that the two nations, "which have huge financial stakes in Iran, had been resisting the vote. … Their about-face underscored the depths of their frustrations with the hard-line Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's regime and made it likely that a majority of the 35-member IAEA board of governors would vote to haul the Islamic republic before the Security Council."

The Washington Post (2/1, A18, Kessler, Linzer, 744K) writes the IAEA's governing board "will meet in Vienna tomorrow to discuss whether to report the continuing impasse over Iran's nuclear ambitions to the U.N. Security Council. By coincidence, tomorrow is also Groundhog Day. In the four years since President Bush first cited the dangers of Iran's nuclear program in his 2002 State of the Union speech by labeling it part of the 'axis of evil,' the administration has struggled to galvanize other nations to take action against the potential threat of Iran obtaining nuclear weapons. For 2 1/2 years, the administration has pressed the IAEA to go to the Security Council. Yet, at IAEA board meeting after board meeting, a decision to formally report the matter to the Security Council has been put off."

White House "Very Pleased" By IAEA Report On Iranian Nuclear Efforts. The Wall Street Journal (2/1, Champion, Crawford, 2.11M) reports, "An interim report to be delivered by IAEA inspectors at the agency's emergency board meeting tomorrow will detail continuing gaps in Iran's compliance with the IAEA, including the agency's conclusion that a document Iran obtained on the nuclear black market serves no other purpose than to help make an atomic bomb. First mention of the documents was made late last year in a longer IAEA report, but the agency refused at that time to make a judgment on what possible uses such information would have." The CBS Evening News (1/31, story 2, 2:30, Roberts) reported, "On the Iran issue, White House officials…are very pleased with this IAEA report. While they felt they didn't need it and believed that Iran has plans to build all or part of the nuclear bomb, they say this is a reason to haul Iran before the UN Security Council." The New York Times (2/1, Sciolino, Broad, 1.19M) reports, "The four-page report, which officials say was based at least in part on intelligence provided by the United States, refers to a secretive Iranian entity called the Green Salt Project, which worked on uranium processing, high explosives and a missile warhead design."

Iran Refuses To Turn Over Black Market Weapons Document. Knight Ridder (2/1, Landay) reports, "Iran is refusing to turn over to U.N. investigators a copy of a black market document it could use to build nuclear weapons, according to a confidential U.N. report Tuesday. The document, which Iran received from an international nuclear smuggling ring, describes aspects of fabricating the explosive core of a nuclear bomb. The document is one more piece of evidence supporting concerns that Iran is pursuing a nuclear weapons program in the guise of peaceful nuclear power research." The Washington Times (2/1, Jahn, 90K) reports that the IAEA said the document "serves no other purpose than to make an atomic bomb." Agence France Presse (1/31) adds that the IAEA report "indicates several areas where Tehran is suspected of doing atomic work that could be military related."

Belgian Intelligence Chief Quits Over Exports To Iran. The Wall Street Journal (2/1, 2.11M) reports Belgian intelligence chief Koen Dassen "resigned after it emerged that warnings from the U.S. Central Intelligence Agency went unheeded and the country's state security agency failed to stop a Belgian company from exporting nuclear-sensitive equipment to Iran. A Belgian parliamentary committee revealed the Iranian export yesterday," a day after Dassen "quit over accusations the agency failed to inform the government about the CIA's warnings."

Persian Gulf States Increasingly Critical Of Iranian Nuclear Efforts. The New York Times (2/1, Fattah, 1.19M) reports, "After years of hesitating, Persian Gulf states are joining the call for tougher action on Iran's nuclear efforts, increasingly worried that a nuclear Iran could set off a regional arms race. In recent weeks, Saudi officials and other gulf leaders have called for Iran to abandon its nuclear research, without demanding that Israel disarm first. Separating those two demands is a major policy change, and many experts see the shift as a sign that Iran's Arab neighbors may even back United Nations sanctions against Iran."

Ahmadinejad Reaching Out To Latin American Populist Leaders. The Washington Post (2/1, Vick, 744K) reports, "On the afternoon of Jan. 4, Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad reached for the phone and got Latin America on the line. In quick succession, he chatted with President Fidel Castro of Cuba, rang up President Hugo Chavez of Venezuela and, sensing yet another kindred spirit, reached out to Evo Morales, the young firebrand who had just been elected president of Bolivia. Person-to-person and peer-to-peer, the transatlantic calls described on Ahmadinejad's presidential Web site linked self-styled populists who glory in defying the West. But for Iran, the exchanges carried significance reaching well beyond Ahmadinejad and the controversy enveloping him personally after questioning the Holocaust and saying Israel should be 'wiped off the map.' In its bid to proceed with a nuclear program opposed by Washington and Western Europe, Iran's leadership appears settled on a revived policy of confrontation with 'global arrogance,' as the country's rulers have referred to the foreign policy of United States for almost three decades. But the contest is now being framed as a David-vs.-Goliath battle, and Iran is seeking to attract relatively poor, disempowered nonaligned nations to its side, not simply the Muslim world it once saw itself as leading, Iranian officials and analysts say."

Nuclear Arms Control Experts Say Russian Deal Would Create New Problems. In a New York Times (2/1, 1.19M) op-ed, Valerie Lincy and Gary Milhollin of the Wisconsin Project on Nuclear Arms Control write, "Although the [IAEA] is now likely to report Iran to the Security Council, America and the Europeans agreed that the United Nations will wait at least a month before deciding on any punishment. There is little doubt what this cooling-off period is intended for: further negotiations on a proposal that would have Iran shift its large-scale, energy-related uranium enrichment work to Russia. … The Russian deal actually poses more problems than it solves. First, even if Russia took over Iran's nuclear energy work, the religious radicals in Tehran would be left with a huge amount of dangerous equipment. … Second, Iran draws a distinction between the energy-related work that would go to Russia and other enrichment activity that it likes to call 'research.' When Iran broke the international seals at three enrichment sites last month and resumed work, its Foreign Ministry said the move was done only for scientific interests and had nothing to do with weapons. Even with a Russian deal, Iran is likely to insist on its right to continue such research. … Last, the proposal, if accepted, would shatter the coalition of states that is finally working together to restrain Iran. Russia would certainly end its tepid support for Security Council action and would agree to let the Iranians continue their 'research.' The United States is equally certain to refuse such a concession."

OPEC Agreement, Iranian Pledge Lower Oil Tensions. The Wall Street Journal (2/1, Bahree, 2.11M) reports, "OPEC yesterday endorsed an agreement to keep pumping nearly all the oil it can." Meanwhile, "Iran's oil minister, Kazem Vaziri Hamaneh, said Tehran wasn't linking its oil exports to the dispute" over its nuclear research. "The Iranian stance provides a measure of reassurance that OPEC can continue to meet rising global oil needs, which have sent prices soaring toward $70 a barrel this year. Still, it isn't clear whether the Iranian oil minister's statement is Tehran's final word on the role the country's oil exports will play in the standoff."

Oil Producers Investing, Diversifying. The New York Times (2/1, Mouawad, Porter, 1.19M) reports, "oil producers…are experiencing a boom," and while "lavish projects are finding financing," the Arabian peninsula's "main oil producers, like Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, Qatar and the United Arab Emirates, have gotten wiser. Since the boom started three years ago, they have paid down their debt, saved more money than ever before and created more jobs in the private sector. And they are trying to diversify their economies away from oil and its increasingly volatile cycles."

As Muslims Boycott Danish Products, Danish PM Defends Journalistic Freedom. The New York Times (2/1, Cowell, 1.19M) reports, "As Islamic protests spread about cartoons of the Prophet Muhammad in a Danish newspaper, Anders Fogh Rasmussen, the Danish prime minister, defended press freedom in his country on Tuesday but distanced himself from the newspaper's decision to publish the drawings. His remarks fell far short of the apology demanded by an array of Islamic groups and countries which have imposed a remarkably successful boycott of Danish products," but "some Islamic leaders in Denmark said they were satisfied by the actions by the Danish newspaper and prime minister."

Mauritania Reaffirms Ties With Israel, Opposition To Terrorism. The Washington Times (2/1, Constantine, 90K) reports, "Mauritania, the sprawling Islamic nation on the northwest coast of Africa, this week reaffirmed its commitment to fight terrorism shoulder to shoulder with its Western allies and to continue its diplomatic relations with Israel." Mauritanian Foreign Minister Ahmed Ould Sid Ahmed "called Mauritania's ties with the United States 'of paramount importance' to the moderate Islamic republic," and added, "We have said no to terrorism and we shall not back away from our diplomatic ties with Israel."

Putin Seeks To Counter Criticism Of Russia. The New York Times (2/1, Myers, 1.19M) reports, "President Vladimir V. Putin on Tuesday defended Russia's handling of natural gas disputes with Ukraine and Georgia, boasted of a new strategic weapon and defended the country's contribution to the Group of 8 in response to suggestions from some critics at home and abroad that his policies have disqualified it from the club of elite democratic nations" with "only a hint of the temper that has flashed in previous public appearances." By "saying Russia had no intention of using gas or oil as an energy weapon," he tried to counter "some of the harshest foreign criticism the Russian government has faced" "also sought to reassure those worried about the state's growing role in the economy through its state-owned companies."

Ukraine Gas Deal Puts Spotlight On RosUkrEnergo. The New York Times (2/1, Kramer, 1.19M) reports, "Four weeks after Ukraine cut a deal to import natural gas through RosUkrEnergo, a shell entity based in Switzerland, the obscure company is facing an uncomfortable amount of attention. After becoming one of Europe's biggest energy traders overnight with the Ukraine deal, the company promised changes to become more open about its operations," but its "secretive nature has driven the Parliaments of both Ukraine and Russia to open investigations." Analysts who follow Gazprom say RosUkrEnergo's "role as a front for the unnamed owners has become an embarrassment for" the company.

Chavez Pressures Spain On Arms Deal. The Washington Times (2/1, Hearn, 90K) reports, "Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez pressed Spain yesterday to declare whether it plans to go ahead with a sale of military planes and patrol boats, despite objections from the United States," which "denied an export license for Spain to sell the transport and maritime surveillance planes, which contain American-made technology. For the same reasons, it has blocked plans by a Brazilian aerospace company to sell Caracas 36 military planes. U.S. leaders want to keep sensitive technologies away from Mr. Chavez," and "both countries have the option of replacing the U.S. parts and proceeding with the sale. But experts say that would require considerable time and money and could risk diplomatic tensions with Washington." Meanwhile, "Chavez is repeating threats to seek military equipment from Russia and China."

Bachelet Begins Chilean Presidency With Change. The Christian Science Monitor (2/1, Ross, 61K) reports that Michelle Bachelet, Chile's first female president," named "a cabinet of 10 female and 10 male ministers," marking "a significant change to the political status quo," which is "expected to be the first of many." However, "some experts question whether she'll sacrifice competence for image," although "the relative lack of public uproar over Bachelet's cabinet - and her very election - seems to reflect a profound socio-cultural change."

Ignatius Says US, French Cooperating Diplomatically. David Ignatius writes in his column in the Washington Post (2/1, A23, 744K), "The Elysee Palace has become one of the White House's most important and effective allies." The White House "is now working hard to conduct its foreign policy in tandem with international allies and, where possible, through the United Nations. America's key intermediary in this search for international consensus has been France," and "in framing policy on Syria and Iran, the French and Americans have consciously played a good cop-bad cop routine." While "Paris and Washington still disagree sharply on the substance of many issues," both "seem to have concluded that they'll get more of what they want if they collaborate rather than bicker. Indeed, the quiet partnership has probably benefited from the fact that the world still thinks France and America are enemies."

Dowd Assails "Ham-Handed Bush Foreign Policy Crew." In her column in the New York Times (2/1, 1.19M), Maureen Dowd says "clearly, the Bush foreign policy team doesn't understand any of the markets where it is barging around ineptly trying to sell America and democracy." Opinion of the US overseas "has been in steady decline. The state of the union is sour but the state of the world is chilling, thanks to a hideously ham-handed Bush foreign policy crew that was once billed as a seasoned 'dream team.'" Dowd goes on to say, "The more the White House tries to force-feed democracy to tempestuous parts of the world, the more it discovers that you may be able to spin and scare voters in the US, but the Middle East is not so easy to manipulate. W. believes in self-determination only if he's doing the determining. Fundamentalists in America like to vote for Mr. Bush, but elsewhere they're violently opposing him. It's stunning that nearly four decades after Vietnam, our government could be even more culturally illiterate and pigheaded. The Bushies are more obsessed with snooping on Americans than fathoming how other cultures think and react."

The State Of The Union: A Strong America Leading The World

In His State Of The Union Address, President Bush Discussed America's Leadership In The World And Shared His Vision To Lead America Forward. At a time of great consequence, the President laid out an agenda of leadership to act confidently in pursuing the enemies of freedom and to build our prosperity by leading the world economy. The President rejected the roads of isolationism and protectionism and called for cooperation and courage in confronting challenges. America will lead freedom's advance, compete and excel in the global economy, and renew the defining moral commitments of this land, confident of victory.

Leadership Toward Peace In The World

Every Step Toward Freedom In The World Makes Our Country Safer, And So America Will Act Boldly In Freedom's Cause. Today our Nation is committed to an historic, long-term goal: the end of tyranny in our world. On September 11th, 2001, America found that problems originating in a failed and oppressive state seven thousand miles away could bring murder and destruction to our country. Dictatorships shelter terrorists, feed resentment and radicalism, and seek weapons of mass destruction. Democracies replace resentment with hope, respect the rights of their citizens and their neighbors, and join the fight against terror. As we celebrate the spread of freedom in places like Afghanistan and Iraq, we do not forget people living in places like Syria, Burma, Zimbabwe, North Korea, and Iran - because the demands of justice, and the peace of this world, require their freedom as well.

Ø America Will Not Retreat From The World Or Surrender To Evil. In a time of testing, America cannot find security by abandoning commitments and retreating to isolation within our borders. If we were to leave the terrorists alone, they would not leave us alone. They would simply move the battlefield to our own shores. There is no peace or honor in retreat. America rejects the false comfort of isolationism. We accept the call of history to deliver the oppressed and move the world toward peace.

America Is On The Offensive In The War On Terror. America and its allies have killed or captured many of the leaders of the terror networks. For the others, their day will come.

Ø We Remain On The Offensive In Afghanistan. In that country, a fine president and National Assembly are fighting terror while building the institutions of a new democracy.

Ø America Is On The Offensive In Iraq, With A Clear Plan For Victory. First, the Coalition is helping Iraqis build an inclusive government, so that old resentments will be eased and the insurgency will be marginalized. Second, the Coalition is continuing reconstruction efforts and helping the Iraqi government fight corruption and build a modern economy. Third, Coalition forces are striking terrorist targets and training Iraqi forces. In less than three years, Iraq has gone from dictatorship, to liberation, to sovereignty, to a constitution, to national elections.

Ø The Brutality Of The Terrorists Cannot Stop The Dramatic Progress Of A New Democracy. The Coalition has been relentless in shutting off terrorist infiltration, clearing out insurgent strongholds, and turning over territory to Iraqi security forces. As we make progress on the ground, and Iraqi forces increasingly take the lead, we should be able to further decrease our troop levels, but those decisions will be made by our military commanders, not by politicians in Washington, D.C.

Ø Our Strategy For Victory In Iraq Benefits From Responsible Criticism And Counsel. The effort in Iraq has benefited from responsible criticism and counsel offered by Members of Congress of both parties. The President will continue to reach out and seek good advice. Yet there is a difference between responsible criticism that aims for success and defeatism that refuses to acknowledge anything but failure. However individuals feel about the decisions and debates of the past, our Nation has only one option: We must keep our word, defeat our enemies, and stand behind the men and women of America's military in their vital mission.

Progress Will Continue Across The Middle East As America Offers A Hopeful Alternative To Hatred And Fear. America's offensive against terror involves more than military action, and we are delivering a clear message across the broader Middle East. In parts of the Middle East, there have been steps taken toward reform, but there is more progress to be made. Elections are vital - but they are only the beginning. Raising up a democracy requires the rule of law, protection of minorities, and strong, accountable institutions that last longer than a single vote. The Palestinian people have voted in elections - now the leaders of Hamas must recognize Israel, disarm, reject terrorism and work for a lasting peace. Elsewhere in the Middle East, the repressive regime in Iran is defying the world with its nuclear ambitions, and the nations of the world must not permit the Iranian regime to gain nuclear weapons.

Ø As America Encourages The Spread Of Freedom, We Must Also Spread Prosperity. To overcome dangers in our world, America will encourage economic progress, fight disease, and spread hope in hopeless lands. Isolationism would not only tie our hands in fighting enemies, it would keep America from helping our friends in desperate need. America has taken unprecedented action to fight AIDS and malaria, expand the education of girls, and reward developing nations moving forward with economic and political reform. Short-changing these efforts would increase the suffering and chaos of the world, undercut America's long-term security, and dull the conscience of our country.

The Offensive Against Terrorism Must Continue At Home. The enemy has not lost the desire or capability to attack us. America has superb professionals in law enforcement, intelligence, the military, and homeland security who are protecting America. They deserve our thanks - and they deserve the same tools they already use to fight drug trafficking and organized crime, so the President called on Congress to reauthorize the Patriot Act.

Winning The War on Terror Requires Learning The Lessons of September 11th. To prevent another attack - based on authority given to the President by the Constitution and by statute - the President has authorized a terrorist surveillance program to aggressively pursue the international communications of suspected al-Qaida operatives and affiliates to and from America. Previous presidents have used the same constitutional authority the President has - and Federal courts have approved the use of that authority. Appropriate Members of Congress have been kept informed. This terrorist surveillance program has helped prevent terrorist attacks. It remains essential to the security of America. If there are people inside our country who are talking with al-Qaida, we want to know about it - because we will not sit back and wait to be hit again.

Leadership For Prosperity At Home And Abroad

America's Economic Strength Continues To Lead The World. The American economy is healthy and vigorous and growing faster than other major industrialized nations. In the last two and a half years, America has created 4.6 million new jobs - more than Japan and the European Union combined. Even in the face of higher energy prices and natural disasters, the American people have turned in an economic performance that is the envy of the world.

Our Nation Will Compete With Confidence And Extend Our Economic Leadership In The World. In a dynamic world economy, we are seeing new competitors. This creates uncertainty, which makes it easier to feed people's fears. Protectionists want to escape competition, while others want the government to take a larger role in directing the economy. The President set forth a better path that will raise standards of living and generate new jobs. Americans should not fear our economic future, because we intend to shape it.

Congress Needs To Make The Tax Cuts Permanent. Keeping America competitive begins with keeping our economy growing. Our economy grows when Americans have more of their own money to spend, save, and invest. In the last five years, tax relief has left $880 billion in the hands of American workers, investors, small businesses, and families, and they have used it to help produce more than four years of uninterrupted economic growth. Yet the tax relief is set to expire in the next few years. If Congress does not act, American families will face a massive tax increase.

The Growth Of Government Must Be Limited Through Fiscal Discipline. Every year since President Bush took office, the growth of non-security discretionary spending has been reduced, and last year this spending was cut. This year the President's budget will cut it again and will reduce or eliminate more than 140 programs that are performing poorly or not fulfilling essential priorities. By passing these reforms, we will save the American taxpayer another $14 billion next year and stay on track to cut the deficit in half by 2009. Congress must also move forward on earmark reform and pass the line-item veto to limit special interest projects.

Ø The Government Must Confront The Larger Challenge Of Entitlement Spending. The coming retirement of the Baby Boom generation will put unprecedented strains on the Federal government. By 2030, spending for Social Security, Medicare, and Medicaid alone will be almost 60 percent of the entire Federal budget. And that will present future Congresses with impossible choices: staggering tax increases, immense deficits, or deep cuts in every category of spending. The President proposed a bipartisan commission to examine the impact of this problem.

America Must Continue To Open Markets For American Goods. One out of every five factory jobs in America is related to global trade, and we want people everywhere to buy American. With open markets and a level playing field, no one can out-produce or out-compete the American worker.

Immigration Reform Must Be A Priority. America needs an immigration system that upholds our laws, reflects our values, and serves the interests of our economy. Our nation needs orderly and secure borders. To meet this goal, we must have stronger immigration enforcement and border protection. And we must have a rational, humane guest worker program that rejects amnesty, allows temporary jobs for people who seek them legally, and reduces smuggling and crime at the border.

Health Care Must Be Made Affordable And Accessible. Our government has a responsibility to help provide health care for the poor and the elderly, and it will meet that responsibility. For all Americans, we must confront the rising cost of care, strengthen the doctor-patient relationship, and help people afford the insurance coverage they need.

Ø Improved Health Savings Accounts Will Offer Lower Costs And Security Between Jobs. The President proposed strengthening Health Savings Accounts by making sure individuals and small business employees can buy insurance with the same tax advantages that people working for big businesses now get. We will do more to make this coverage portable, so workers can switch jobs without having to worry about losing their health insurance.

Ø Technology Offers The Possibility Of More Effective, Less Expensive Health Care. The President called for wider use of electronic records and other health information technology to help control costs and reduce medical errors.

Ø Medical Liability Reform Will Help Retain Good Doctors. The President called on Congress to pass Medical Liability Reform this year. Lawsuits are driving many good doctors out of practice, leaving women in nearly 1500 American counties without a single OB-GYN.

The Advanced Energy Initiative Will Help Break America's Dependence On Foreign Sources Of Energy. The best way to break America's addiction to oil is through technology. The President set a goal of replacing more than 75 percent of oil imports from the Middle East by 2025. Since 2001, we have spent nearly $10 billion to develop cleaner, cheaper, more reliable alternative energy sources. The Advanced Energy Initiative will deliver a 22 percent increase in clean-energy research to push for breakthroughs in two vital areas:

Ø New Energy Sources For Homes And Businesses. To change how we power our homes and offices, we will invest more in zero-emission coal-fired plants; revolutionary solar and wind technologies; and clean, safe nuclear energy.

Ø New Energy Sources For Transportation. We must also change how we power our automobiles and move beyond a petroleum-based economy. We will increase our research in better batteries for hybrid and electric cars and in pollution-free cars that run on hydrogen. We will also fund additional research in cutting-edge methods of producing ethanol, not just from corn but from wood chips, stalks, or switch grass. The goal is to make this new kind of ethanol practical and competitive within six years.

The President's American Competitiveness Initiative Will Encourage Innovation Throughout The Economy. America must continue to lead the world in human talent and creativity. Our greatest advantage in the world has always been our educated, hard-working, ambitious people, and we are going to keep that edge.

Ø New Federal Funding For Research. The President proposed doubling the Federal commitment to the most critical basic research in the physical sciences over the next ten years. This will support the work of America's most creative minds as they explore promising areas such as nanotechnology, supercomputing, and alternative energy sources.

Ø Provide Tax Certainty For Research And Development. The President proposed making permanent the research and development tax credit to encourage bolder private-sector investment in technology. With more research in both the public and private sectors, we will improve our quality of life and

With more research in both the public and private sectors, we will improve our quality of life and ensure that America will lead the world in opportunity and innovation for decades to come.

Ø Strengthening Education In Math And Science. Building on the success of the No Child Left Behind Act, the President proposed training 70,000 high school teachers to lead advanced-placement courses in math and science; bringing 30,000 math and science professionals to teach in classrooms; and getting early help to students struggling with math so they have a better chance at good, high-wage jobs.

America Is Becoming A More Hopeful Nation. Violent crime rates have fallen to their lowest levels since the 1970s. Welfare cases have dropped by more than half over the past decade. Drug abuse among youth is down 19 percent since 2001. There are fewer abortions in America than at any point in the last three decades, and the number of children born to teenage mothers has been falling for a dozen years in a row. Government has played a role in this quiet transformation, and wise policies such as welfare reform, drug education, and support for abstinence and adoption have made a difference in the character of our country.

America Still Has More To Do To Strengthen Our Culture And Our Institutions. Many Americans, especially parents, still have deep concerns about the direction of our culture and the health of our most basic institutions. They are concerned about unethical conduct by public officials and discouraged by activist courts that try to redefine marriage. And they worry about children in need, fellow citizens still displaced by natural disaster, and suffering caused by treatable disease.

Ø Courts Must Deliver Equal Justice Under Law And Not Legislate From The Bench. The Senate has confirmed two superb new members of the Supreme Court, Chief Justice John Roberts and Justice Samuel Alito. The President will continue to nominate men and women who understand that judges must be servants of the law and not legislate from the bench.

Ø America Must Recognize The Value Of Every Life. The President called on Congress to pass legislation to prohibit the most egregious abuses of medical research: cloning human beings; creating or implanting embryos for experiments; creating human-animal hybrids; and buying, selling, or patenting human embryos. Human life is a gift from our Creator, and that gift should never be discarded, devalued, or put up for sale.

Ø Elected Officials Must Uphold The Public Trust. The President supports the efforts of honorable people in both parties who are working on reforms to strengthen the ethical standards of Washington. Public servants make a pledge to be worthy of public responsibility, and that is a pledge that must never be forgotten, dismissed, or betrayed.

Ø America Must Protect And Encourage Its Children. Through the Helping America's Youth initiative led by First Lady Laura Bush, America is encouraging caring adults to get involved in the life of a child. The President called for additional resources to encourage young people to stay in school so more of America's youth can raise their sights and achieve their dreams.

Ø A Continuing Commitment To Gulf Reconstruction. America will aid our fellow citizens in times of suffering and emergency and stay with them until they are back on their feet. So far the Federal government has committed $85 billion to the people of the Gulf Coast and New Orleans. We are removing debris, repairing highways, building stronger levees, and providing business loans and housing assistance. We must also address deeper challenges that existed before the storm arrived and must provide not only temporary relief, but also schools that teach every child, job skills that bring upward mobility, and more opportunities to own a home and start a business.

Ø Continuing The Fight To Prevent, Treat, And Defeat HIV/AIDS. The President called on Congress to reform and reauthorize the Ryan White Act and to provide new funding to states, so we end the waiting lists for AIDS medicine in America. More than one million Americans live with HIV, and half of all AIDS cases occur among African-Americans. The President called for a nationwide effort, working closely with African-American churches and faith-based groups, to deliver rapid HIV tests to millions, end the stigma of AIDS, and come closer to the day when there are no new infections in America.

The State Of The Union: A Strong America Leading The World

In His State Of The Union Address, President Bush Discussed America's Leadership In The World And Shared His Vision To Lead America Forward. At a time of great consequence, the President laid out an agenda of leadership to act confidently in pursuing the enemies of freedom and to build our prosperity by leading the world economy. The President rejected the roads of isolationism and protectionism and called for cooperation and courage in confronting challenges. America will lead freedom's advance, compete and excel in the global economy, and renew the defining moral commitments of this land, confident of victory.

Leadership Toward Peace In The World

Every Step Toward Freedom In The World Makes Our Country Safer, And So America Will Act Boldly In Freedom's Cause. Today our Nation is committed to an historic, long-term goal: the end of tyranny in our world. On September 11th, 2001, America found that problems originating in a failed and oppressive state seven thousand miles away could bring murder and destruction to our country. Dictatorships shelter terrorists, feed resentment and radicalism, and seek weapons of mass destruction. Democracies replace resentment with hope, respect the rights of their citizens and their neighbors, and join the fight against terror. As we celebrate the spread of freedom in places like Afghanistan and Iraq, we do not forget people living in places like Syria, Burma, Zimbabwe, North Korea, and Iran – because the demands of justice, and the peace of this world, require their freedom as well.

- America Will Not Retreat From The World Or Surrender To Evil. In a time of testing, America cannot find security by abandoning commitments and retreating to isolation within our borders. If we were to leave the terrorists alone, they would not leave us alone. They would simply move the battlefield to our own shores. There is no peace or honor in retreat. America rejects the false comfort of isolationism. We accept the call of history to deliver the oppressed and move the world toward peace.

America Is On The Offensive In The War On Terror. America and its allies have killed or captured many of the leaders of the terror networks. For the others, their day will come.

- We Remain On The Offensive In Afghanistan. In that country, a fine president and National Assembly are fighting terror while building the institutions of a new democracy.

- America Is On The Offensive In Iraq, With A Clear Plan For Victory. First, the Coalition is helping Iraqis build an inclusive government, so that old resentments will be eased and the insurgency will be marginalized. Second, the Coalition is continuing reconstruction efforts and helping the Iraqi government fight corruption and build a modern economy. Third, Coalition forces are striking terrorist targets and training Iraqi forces. In less than three years, Iraq has gone from dictatorship, to liberation, to sovereignty, to a constitution, to national elections.

- The Brutality Of The Terrorists Cannot Stop The Dramatic Progress Of A New Democracy. The Coalition has been relentless in shutting off terrorist infiltration, clearing out insurgent strongholds, and turning over territory to Iraqi security forces. As we make progress on the ground, and Iraqi forces increasingly take the lead, we should be able to further decrease our troop levels, but those decisions will be made by our military commanders, not by politicians in Washington, D.C.

- Our Strategy For Victory In Iraq Benefits From Responsible Criticism And Counsel. The effort in Iraq has benefited from responsible criticism and counsel offered by Members of Congress of both parties. The President will continue to reach out and seek good advice. Yet there is a difference between responsible criticism that aims for success and defeatism that refuses to acknowledge anything but failure. However individuals feel about the decisions and debates of the past, our Nation has only one option: We must keep our word, defeat our enemies, and stand behind the men and women of America's military in their vital mission.

Progress Will Continue Across The Middle East As America Offers A Hopeful Alternative To Hatred And Fear. America's offensive against terror involves more than military action, and we are delivering a clear message across the broader Middle East. In parts of the Middle East, there have been steps taken toward reform, but there is more progress to be made. Elections are vital – but they are only the beginning. Raising up a democracy requires the rule of law, protection of minorities, and strong, accountable institutions that last longer than a single vote. The Palestinian people have voted in elections – now the leaders of Hamas must recognize Israel, disarm, reject terrorism and work for a lasting peace. Elsewhere in the Middle East, the repressive regime in Iran is defying the world with its nuclear ambitions, and the nations of the world must not permit the Iranian regime to gain nuclear weapons.

- As America Encourages The Spread Of Freedom, We Must Also Spread Prosperity. To overcome dangers in our world, America will encourage economic progress, fight disease, and spread hope in hopeless lands. Isolationism would not only tie our hands in fighting enemies, it would keep America from helping our friends in desperate need. America has taken unprecedented action to fight AIDS and malaria, expand the education of girls, and reward developing nations moving forward with economic and political reform. Short-changing these efforts would increase the suffering and chaos of the world, undercut America's long-term security, and dull the conscience of our country.

The Offensive Against Terrorism Must Continue At Home. The enemy has not lost the desire or capability to attack us. America has superb professionals in law enforcement, intelligence, the military, and homeland security who are protecting America. They deserve our thanks – and they deserve the same tools they already use to fight drug trafficking and organized crime, so the President called on Congress to reauthorize the Patriot Act.

Winning The War on Terror Requires Learning The Lessons of September 11th. To prevent another attack – based on authority given to the President by the Constitution and by statute – the President has authorized a terrorist surveillance program to aggressively pursue the international communications of suspected al-Qaida operatives and affiliates to and from America. Previous presidents have used the same constitutional authority the President has – and Federal courts have approved the use of that authority. Appropriate Members of Congress have been kept informed. This terrorist surveillance program has helped prevent terrorist attacks. It remains essential to the security of America. If there are people inside our country who are talking with al-Qaida, we want to know about it – because we will not sit back and wait to be hit again.

Leadership For Prosperity At Home And Abroad

America's Economic Strength Continues To Lead The World. The American economy is healthy and vigorous and growing faster than other major industrialized nations. In the last two and a half years, America has created 4.6 million new jobs – more than Japan and the European Union combined. Even in the face of higher energy prices and natural disasters, the American people have turned in an economic performance that is the envy of the world.

Our Nation Will Compete With Confidence And Extend Our Economic Leadership In The World. In a dynamic world economy, we are seeing new competitors. This creates uncertainty, which makes it easier to feed people's fears. Protectionists want to escape competition, while others want the government to take a larger role in directing the economy. The President set forth a better path that will raise standards of living and generate new jobs. Americans should not fear our economic future, because we intend to shape it.

Congress Needs To Make The Tax Cuts Permanent. Keeping America competitive begins with keeping our economy growing. Our economy grows when Americans have more of their own money to spend, save, and invest. In the last five years, tax relief has left $880 billion in the hands of American workers, investors, small businesses, and families, and they have used it to help produce more than four years of uninterrupted economic growth. Yet the tax relief is set to expire in the next few years. If Congress does not act, American families will face a massive tax increase.

The Growth Of Government Must Be Limited Through Fiscal Discipline. Every year since President Bush took office, the growth of non-security discretionary spending has been reduced, and last year this spending was cut. This year the President's budget will cut it again and will reduce or eliminate more than 140 programs that are performing poorly or not fulfilling essential priorities. By passing these reforms, we will save the American taxpayer another $14 billion next year and stay on track to cut the deficit in half by 2009. Congress must also move forward on earmark reform and pass the line-item veto to limit special interest projects.

- The Government Must Confront The Larger Challenge Of Entitlement Spending. The coming retirement of the Baby Boom generation will put unprecedented strains on the Federal government. By 2030, spending for Social Security, Medicare, and Medicaid alone will be almost 60 percent of the entire Federal budget. And that will present future Congresses with impossible choices: staggering tax increases, immense deficits, or deep cuts in every category of spending. The President proposed a bipartisan commission to examine the impact of this problem.

America Must Continue To Open Markets For American Goods. One out of every five factory jobs in America is related to global trade, and we want people everywhere to buy American. With open markets and a level playing field, no one can out-produce or out-compete the American worker.

Immigration Reform Must Be A Priority. America needs an immigration system that upholds our laws, reflects our values, and serves the interests of our economy. Our nation needs orderly and secure borders. To meet this goal, we must have stronger immigration enforcement and border protection. And we must have a rational, humane guest worker program that rejects amnesty, allows temporary jobs for people who seek them legally, and reduces smuggling and crime at the border.

Health Care Must Be Made Affordable And Accessible. Our government has a responsibility to help provide health care for the poor and the elderly, and it will meet that responsibility. For all Americans, we must confront the rising cost of care, strengthen the doctor-patient relationship, and help people afford the insurance coverage they need.

- Improved Health Savings Accounts Will Offer Lower Costs And Security Between Jobs. The President proposed strengthening Health Savings Accounts by making sure individuals and small business employees can buy insurance with the same tax advantages that people working for big businesses now get. We will do more to make this coverage portable, so workers can switch jobs without having to worry about losing their health insurance.

- Technology Offers The Possibility Of More Effective, Less Expensive Health Care. The President called for wider use of electronic records and other health information technology to help control costs and reduce medical errors.

- Medical Liability Reform Will Help Retain Good Doctors. The President called on Congress to pass Medical Liability Reform this year. Lawsuits are driving many good doctors out of practice, leaving women in nearly 1500 American counties without a single OB-GYN.

The Advanced Energy Initiative Will Help Break America's Dependence On Foreign Sources Of Energy. The best way to break America's addiction to oil is through technology. The President set a goal of replacing more than 75 percent of oil imports from the Middle East by 2025. Since 2001, we have spent nearly $10 billion to develop cleaner, cheaper, more reliable alternative energy sources. The Advanced Energy Initiative will deliver a 22 percent increase in clean-energy research to push for breakthroughs in two vital areas:

- New Energy Sources For Homes And Businesses. To change how we power our homes and offices, we will invest more in zero-emission coal-fired plants; revolutionary solar and wind technologies; and clean, safe nuclear energy.

- New Energy Sources For Transportation. We must also change how we power our automobiles and move beyond a petroleum-based economy. We will increase our research in better batteries for hybrid and electric cars and in pollution-free cars that run on hydrogen. We will also fund additional research in cutting-edge methods of producing ethanol, not just from corn but from wood chips, stalks, or switch grass. The goal is to make this new kind of ethanol practical and competitive within six years.

The President's American Competitiveness Initiative Will Encourage Innovation Throughout The Economy. America must continue to lead the world in human talent and creativity. Our greatest advantage in the world has always been our educated, hard-working, ambitious people, and we are going to keep that edge.

- New Federal Funding For Research. The President proposed doubling the Federal commitment to the most critical basic research in the physical sciences over the next ten years. This will support the work of America's most creative minds as they explore promising areas such as nanotechnology, supercomputing, and alternative energy sources.

- Provide Tax Certainty For Research And Development. The President proposed making permanent the research and development tax credit to encourage bolder private-sector investment in technology. With more research in both the public and private sectors, we will improve our quality of life and ensure that America will lead the world in opportunity and innovation for decades to come.

- Strengthening Education In Math And Science. Building on the success of the No Child Left Behind Act, the President proposed training 70,000 high school teachers to lead advanced-placement courses in math and science; bringing 30,000 math and science professionals to teach in classrooms; and getting early help to students struggling with math so they have a better chance at good, high-wage jobs.

Public servants make a pledge to be worthy of public responsibility, and that is a pledge that must never be forgotten, dismissed, or betrayed.

- America Must Protect And Encourage Its Children. Through the Helping America's Youth initiative led by First Lady Laura Bush, America is encouraging caring adults to get involved in the life of a child. The President called for additional resources to encourage young people to stay in school so more of America's youth can raise their sights and achieve their dreams.

- A Continuing Commitment To Gulf Reconstruction. America will aid our fellow citizens in times of suffering and emergency and stay with them until they are back on their feet. So far the Federal government has committed $85 billion to the people of the Gulf Coast and New Orleans. We are removing debris, repairing highways, building stronger levees, and providing business loans and housing assistance. We must also address deeper challenges that existed before the storm arrived and must provide not only temporary relief, but also schools that teach every child, job skills that bring upward mobility, and more opportunities to own a home and start a business.

- Continuing The Fight To Prevent, Treat, And Defeat HIV/AIDS. The President called on Congress to reform and reauthorize the Ryan White Act and to provide new funding to states, so we end the waiting lists for AIDS medicine in America. More than one million Americans live with HIV, and half of all AIDS cases occur among African-Americans. The President called for a nationwide effort, working closely with African-American churches and faith-based groups, to deliver rapid HIV tests to millions, end the stigma of AIDS, and come closer to the day when there are no new infections in America.

Attached are four documents that contain more specific information on the President's vision to lead America forward-the Advanced Energy Initiative, Affordable and Accessible Health Care, and the American Competitiveness Initiative.

State Of The Union: American Competitiveness Initiative

In His State Of The Union Address, President Bush Announced The American Competitiveness Initiative (ACI) To Encourage American Innovation And Strengthen Our Nation's Ability To Compete In The Global Economy. This ambitious strategy will increase Federal investment in critical research, ensure that the United States continues to lead the world in opportunity and innovation, and provide American children with a strong foundation in math and science. The American Competitiveness Initiative commits $5.9 billion in FY 2007, and more than $136 billion over 10 years, to increase investments in research and development (R&D), strengthen education, and encourage entrepreneurship and innovation.

America's Economic Strength And Global Leadership Depend On Continued Technological Advances. Groundbreaking ideas generated by innovative minds have paid enormous dividends – improving the lives and livelihoods of generations of Americans. With more research in both the public and private sectors, we will improve our quality of life – and ensure that America will lead the world in opportunity and innovation for decades to come. The President's comprehensive strategy to strengthen America's competitiveness includes:

- ✓ Doubling the Federal commitment to the most critical basic research programs in the physical sciences over the next 10 years;
- ✓ Encouraging the expansion of a favorable environment for additional private-sector investment in innovation;
- ✓ Improving the quality of education to provide American children with a strong foundation in math and science;
- ✓ Supporting universities that provide world-class education and research opportunities;
- ✓ Providing job training that affords more workers and manufacturers the opportunity to improve their skills and better compete in the 21st century;
- ✓ Attracting and retaining the best and brightest to enhance entrepreneurship, competitiveness, and job creation in America by supporting comprehensive immigration reform; and
- ✓ Fostering a business environment that encourages entrepreneurship and protects intellectual property.

As The Global Economy Continues To Expand And Other Countries Become More Technologically Advanced, The United States Will Face New Challenges. To ensure our continued economic and technological leadership in the world, the American Competitiveness Initiative builds on the Administration's record of results with new investments, especially in the physical sciences and engineering. Investments in these areas will generate scientific and technological advances for decades to come and will help ensure that future generations have an even brighter future.

Leading The World In Innovation

Federal Investment In R&D Has Proven Critical To Keeping America's Economy Strong By Generating Knowledge And Tools Needed To Develop New Technologies. The centerpiece of the American Competitiveness Initiative is the President's strong commitment to double over 10 years investment in key Federal agencies that support basic research programs in the physical sciences and engineering – the National Science Foundation (NSF), the Department of Energy's Office of Science (DoE SC), and the Department of Commerce's National Institute of Standards and Technology (NIST).

- ➢ With about 5 percent of the world's population, the United States employs nearly one-third of all scientists and engineers and accounts for one-third of global R&D spending. As the global marketplace changes, we must focus on maintaining our leadership role.
- ➢ The President's FY07 Budget includes $137 billion for Federal research and development, an increase of more than 50 percent over 2001.
- ➢ The sum of the budgets of the National Science Foundation, the Department of Energy's Office of Science, and the Department of Commerce's National Institute of Standards and Technology will double over 10 years, a total commitment of $50 billion of new funding.
- ➢ Past Federally funded research has helped to spawn vital technologies such as personal computers, the Internet, medical imaging devices, balloon catheters, hearing aids, laser eye surgery, air bags, global positioning devices, and satellite telecommunications systems.

To Encourage Bolder Private-Sector Investment In Technology, The President Continues To Support Making The Research And Development (R&D) Tax Credit Permanent. A permanent R&D tax credit would enable companies to have certainty in their tax planning and therefore be bold in their R&D investment strategy.

- Making the credit permanent, which is estimated to cost $86 billion over ten years, will eliminate problems and uncertainty associated with its temporary nature.
- As part of the American Competitiveness Initiative, the President is also committed to working with Congress to modernize the credit to make it even more effective and efficient at encouraging private sector innovation.

Education Is The Gateway To Opportunity And The Foundation Of A Knowledge-Based, Innovation-Driven Economy. To prepare our citizens to compete more effectively in the global marketplace, the American Competitiveness Initiative proposes $380 million in new Federal support to improve the quality of math, science, and technological education in our K-12 schools and engage every child in rigorous courses that teach important analytical, technical, and problem-solving skills. Building on the successes of the No Child Left Behind Act, the American Competitiveness Initiative will raise student achievement in math and science through testing and accountability, providing grants for targeted interventions, and developing curricula based on proven methods of instruction. The American Competitiveness Initiative includes a number of new and expanded programs, including:

- The Advanced Placement/International Baccalaureate (AP/IB) Program to expand access of low-income students to AP/IB coursework by training 70,000 additional teachers over five years to lead AP/IB math and science courses.
- An Adjunct Teacher Corps to encourage up to 30,000 math and science professionals over eight years to become adjunct high school teachers.
- Math Now for Elementary School Students and Math Now for Middle School Students to promote promising and research-based practices in math instruction, prepare students for more rigorous math courses, and diagnose and remedy the deficiencies of students who lack math proficiency.

Education, Training, And Retraining Provide The Nation's Workforce With Better Career Options, Opportunities For Advancement, And The Ability To Compete In A Global Economy. As part of the American Competitiveness Initiative, the President's FY07 Budget introduces Career Advancement Accounts (CAA). CAAs will be self-managed accounts of up to $3,000 that workers and people looking for work can use to obtain training and other employment services. The CAA initiative will offer training opportunities to 800,000 workers annually, more than tripling the number trained under the current system, and give America's workers the resources they need to increase their skills and compete for the jobs of the 21st century economy.

Enabling The World's Most Talented Individuals To Put Their Skills To Work For America Will Increase Our Productivity, Improve Our International Competitiveness, And Create Many High-Paying Jobs For Americans. The President supports attracting and retaining the best and the brightest high-skilled workers from around the world by reforming the Nation's immigration system, while maintaining national security priorities. The President's comprehensive plan for immigration reform meets the needs of a growing economy, allows workers to provide for their families while respecting the law, and enhances homeland security by relieving pressure on the borders.

Pro-Growth Economic Policies Work Hand-In-Hand With Investments In Innovation. The American Competitiveness Initiative will help the United States remain a world leader in science and technology. Just as important, we must continue to pursue pro-growth economic policies and foster a culture of entrepreneurship. The President's economic agenda, including reducing taxes and overly burdensome regulations, will help create a business environment where innovators and entrepreneurs are rewarded. The American Competitiveness Initiative also supports an efficient system that leads the world in the protection of intellectual property resulting from public and private sector investments in research.

State Of The Union: The Advanced Energy Initiative

In His State Of The Union Address, President Bush Outlined The Advanced Energy Initiative To Help Break America's Dependence On Foreign Sources Of Energy. The President has set a national goal of replacing more than 75% of our oil imports from the Middle East by 2025. With America on the verge of breakthroughs in advanced energy technologies, the best way to break the addiction to foreign oil is through new technology. Since 2001, we have spent nearly $10 billion to develop cleaner, cheaper, and more reliable alternative energy sources. Tonight, the President announced the Advanced Energy Initiative, which provides for a 22% increase in clean-energy research at the Department of Energy (DOE). The Initiative will accelerate our breakthroughs in two vital areas; how we power our homes and businesses; and how we power our automobiles.

Changing The Way We Power Our Homes And Businesses

The Administration Will Work To Diversify Energy Sources For American Homes And Businesses. Accelerating research in clean coal technologies, clean and safe nuclear energy, and revolutionary solar and wind technologies will reduce overall demand for natural gas and lead to lower energy costs. The President's Advanced Energy Initiative proposes speeding up research in three promising areas:

- The President's Coal Research Initiative. Coal provides more than half of the Nation's electricity supply, and America has enough coal to last more than 200 years. As part of the National Energy Policy, the President committed $2 billion over 10 years to speed up research in the use of clean coal technologies to generate electricity while meeting environmental regulations at low cost. To tap the potential of America's enormous coal reserves, the President's 2007 Budget includes $281 million for development of clean coal technologies, nearly completing the President's commitment 4 years ahead of schedule.

  - The President's 2007 Budget Includes $54 Million For The FutureGen Initiative. The FutureGen initiative is a partnership between government and the private sector to develop innovative technologies for an emissions-free coal plant that captures the carbon dioxide it produces and stores it in deep geologic formations.

- The President's Solar America Initiative. The 2007 Budget will propose a new $148 million Solar America Initiative – an increase of $65 million over FY06 – to accelerate the development of semiconductor materials that convert sunlight directly to electricity. These solar photovoltaic "PV" cells can be used to deliver energy services to rural areas and can be incorporated directly into building materials, so that there can be future "zero energy" homes that produce more energy than they consume.

- Expanding Clean Energy from Wind. The 2007 Budget includes $44 million for wind energy research – a $5 million increase over FY06 levels. This will help improve the efficiency and lower the costs of new wind technologies for use in low-speed wind environments. Combined with ongoing efforts to expand access to Federal lands for wind energy development, this new funding will help dramatically increase the use of wind energy in the United States.

Changing The Way We Power Our Automobiles

We Are On The Verge Of Dramatic Improvements In How We Power Our Automobiles, And The President's Initiative Will Bring Those Improvements To The Forefront. The United States must move beyond a petroleum-based economy and develop new ways to power automobiles. The President wants to accelerate the development of domestic, renewable alternatives to gasoline and diesel fuels. The Administration will accelerate research in cutting-edge methods of producing "cellulosic ethanol" with the goal of making the use of such ethanol practical and competitive within 6 years. The Administration will also step up the Nation's research in better batteries for use in hybrid and electric cars and in pollution-free cars that run on hydrogen.

- The Biorefinery Initiative. To achieve greater use of "homegrown" renewable fuels in the United States, advanced technologies need to be perfected to make fuel ethanol from cellulosic (plant fiber) biomass, which is now discarded as waste. The President's 2007 Budget will include $150 million – a $59 million increase over FY06 – to help develop bio-based transportation fuels from agricultural waste products, such as wood chips, stalks, or switch grass. Research scientists say that accelerating research into "cellulosic ethanol" can make it cost-competitive by 2012, offering the potential to displace up to 30% of the Nation's current fuel use.

- Developing More Efficient Vehicles. Current hybrids on the road run on a battery developed at the DOE. The President's plan would accelerate research in the next generation of battery technology for hybrid vehicles and "plug-in hybrids." Current hybrids can only use the gasoline engine to charge the on-board battery. A "plug-in" hybrid can run either on electricity or on gasoline and can be plugged into the wall at night to recharge its batteries. These vehicles will enable drivers to meet most of their urban commuting needs with virtually no gasoline use. Advanced battery technologies offer the potential to significantly reduce oil consumption in the near-term. The 2007 Budget includes $30 million – a $6.7 million increase over FY06 – to speed up the development of this battery technology and extend the range of these vehicles.

- The Hydrogen Fuel Initiative. In his 2003 State of the Union address, President Bush announced a $1.2 billion Hydrogen Fuel Initiative to develop technology for commercially viable hydrogen-powered fuel cells, which would power cars, trucks, homes, and businesses with no pollution or greenhouse gases. Through private-sector partnerships, the Initiative and related FreedomCAR programs will make it practical and cost-effective for Americans to use clean, hydrogen fuel cell vehicles by 2020. The President's 2007 Budget will provide $289 million – an increase of $53 million over FY06 – to accelerate the development of hydrogen fuel cells and affordable hydrogen-powered cars. Through the President's program, the cost of a hydrogen fuel cell has been cut by more than 50% in just four years.

- America Must Act Now To Reduce Dependence On Foreign Sources Of Energy. There are an estimated 250 million vehicles on America's highways, and Americans will purchase more than 17 million vehicles this year. It will take approximately 15 years to switch America's automobiles over to more fuel efficient technologies. The sooner breakthroughs are achieved, the better for America.

The President's Advanced Energy Initiative Will Build On The Progress Made Since 2001

Since 2001, The Administration Has Worked To Ensure Affordable, Reliable, Secure, And Clean Sources Of Energy. In 2001, the President put forward his National Energy Policy, which included over 100 recommendations to increase domestic energy supplies, encourage efficiency and conservation, invest in energy-related infrastructure, and develop alternative and renewable sources of energy. Over the past four years, the Administration has worked to implement these recommendations and improve the Nation's energy outlook.

Last Summer, The President Signed The First Comprehensive Energy Legislation In Over A Decade. The Energy Policy Act of 2005 is strengthening America's electrical infrastructure, reducing the country's dependence on foreign sources of energy, increasing conservation, and expanding the use of clean renewable energy.

State Of The Union: Affordable And Accessible Health Care

In His State Of The Union Address, President Bush Proposed A Comprehensive Agenda To Make Health Care In America More Affordable, Portable, Transparent, And Efficient. Americans enjoy the best health care facilities and medical professionals in the world, but our citizens are concerned about the cost of health care, losing their health insurance if they change jobs, and a lack of information about price and quality. The President believes that Americans deserve high-quality, reasonably priced, reliable health care, and the security of knowing they will have it when they need it.

- The President's Reform Agenda Can Make The Health Care System More Efficient While Continuing To Lead The World In Cutting Edge Medicine. Americans should be able to choose their health care based on individual needs and preferences and easily obtain understandable information about the price and quality of the care they receive. Insurance should be portable and affordable. The President proposes to improve health care through initiatives to provide increased stability and peace of mind for working families across the country. The President's health care agenda includes:

  - ✓ Expanding Health Savings Accounts (HSAs)
  - ✓ Making Health Insurance More Portable
  - ✓ Improving Information On Price And Quality To Make Health Care More Transparent
  - ✓ Leveling The Playing Field For Individuals And Small Business Employees
  - ✓ Passing Medical Liability Reform
  - ✓ Improving Access To Health Information Technology
  - ✓ Assisting Vulnerable Americans

Expanding Health Savings Accounts

HSAs Are Making Health Care More Affordable And Accessible. Established by the Medicare bill signed into law by President Bush in December 2003, HSAs allow Americans to save tax-free dollars in accounts to pay for their health care expenses. These accounts are accompanied by high-deductible comprehensive insurance policies that cover preventive care and larger medical bills. Since January 2004, more than 3 million Americans have enrolled in HSAs, which are helping make health insurance more affordable for individuals and companies while providing greater choices and flexibility in how workers and employers spend their health care dollars.

The President proposed to build on this success and expand HSAs by:

- Giving Individuals That Purchase HSAs On Their Own The Same Tax Advantages As Those With Employer-Sponsored Insurance. The President proposes making premiums for HSA-compatible insurance policies deductible from income taxes when purchased by individuals outside of work. In addition, an income tax credit would offset payroll taxes paid on premiums paid for their HSA policies. This will level the playing field for those who currently do not have access to employer health care plans, including the self-employed, unemployed, and workers for companies that don't offer health insurance. For Americans who are not working, especially early retirees, premiums for the purchase of non-group HSA plans would now be allowed tax-free from an HSA account.

- Eliminating All Taxes On Out-Of-Pocket Spending Through HSAs. The President proposed allowing Americans with HSAs and their employers to make annual contributions to their accounts to cover all out-of-pocket costs under their HSA policy, not just their deductible as provided under current law. This will allow patients to cover all their out-of-pocket expenses tax-free through their HSA. The new proposal would also provide a credit for payroll taxes paid on HSA contributions made by individuals. The President's HSA proposals are projected to increase the number of Americans with HSAs from the current 14 million to 21 million by 2010, a 50-percent rise.

Making Health Insurance More Portable

Americans Should Be Able To Take Their Health Insurance With Them When They Change Jobs, Move, Become

Self-Employed, Or Leave The Labor Force. Americans should not have to worry about changing doctors, learning a new insurance company bureaucracy, having their premiums go up if a family member is sick, losing their insurance tax advantage when leaving employment-based plans, or being subject to more costly mandates. The lack of portability can lead to "job lock" in which workers are hesitant to leave their job if anyone in the family is in less-than-perfect health.

- Enabling Portable HSA Insurance Policies. Employers would have the ability to offer workers a Portable HSA insurance policy that the employees would own, control, and be able to take wherever they went. Their premiums would be tax-free and would not increase based on their health status at the time that they changed jobs, left the labor force, or moved. Employers could contribute to new employees' Portable HSA insurance policies – no matter where the policy was originally purchased. Employers would have the ability to decide whether or how much to contribute to these plans, but whatever they contributed would be tax-free.

- The President Supports Permitting The Purchase Of Health Insurance Across State Lines. This would allow Americans to buy the best health insurance, based on their own circumstances, instead of being limited to only the policies available in their state. Allowing Americans to purchase health insurance policies issued in other states will provide much-needed choice and competition, while retaining the consumer protections of enforcement and licensing states currently provide.

Improving Information On Price And Quality To Make Health Care More Transparent

Americans Should Be Able To Easily Obtain Understandable Information About The Price And Quality Of Health Care. The President urges medical providers and insurance companies to make information about prices and quality readily available to all Americans prior to the time of service or treatment.

Leveling The Playing Field For Individuals And Small Business Employees

The Administration Will Work To Make It Easier For Small Businesses To Provide Health Care For Their Employees. Small businesses are at a real disadvantage in providing health benefits for workers. Because they buy coverage for only a handful of workers at a time, small businesses pay much higher costs than large employers or labor unions for similar health benefits. In part because costs go up over time and one sick worker can cause a large premium increase, small employers are less than half as likely to offer health benefits to their workers as large employers.

- The President Calls On Congress To Allow Small Businesses To Form Association Health Plans (AHPs). AHPs let small businesses join together to purchase health coverage, giving them the same advantages, administrative efficiencies, and negotiating clout enjoyed by big businesses and labor unions. By purchasing coverage for thousands of employees at a time, association members can pay lower premiums for better coverage.

Passing Medical Liability Reform

The President Calls On Congress To Make The Medical Liability System Fairer And More Predictable While Reducing Wasteful Costs. Frivolous lawsuits and excessive jury awards limit access to health care by driving health care providers out of many communities and increase costs by forcing doctors to practice defensive medicine. Because lawsuits are driving many good doctors out of practice, women in nearly 1,500 American counties are left without a single OB-GYN. Medical liability reforms would secure an injured patient's ability to get quicker compensation for economic losses, while reducing frivolous lawsuits against doctors that raise the cost of health care for all. The President has proposed proven, common-sense reforms that reserve punitive damages for egregious cases where they are justified, limit non-economic damages to reasonable amounts, ensure that old cases cannot be brought to court years after an event, and provide that defendants pay judgments in proportion to their fault.

Improving Health Information Technology (IT)

The Administration Is Working To Expand The Use Of Health IT To Lower Costs, Reduce Medical Errors, And Improve Quality Of Care. In 2004, the President launched an initiative to make electronic health records available to most Americans within the next 10 years. We have already seen the Veterans Health Administration and private-sector health systems use information technology to increase quality, encourage savings, and reduce errors. With electronic health records, information needed to treat patients effectively will be a computer click away, no matter where the patient is receiving care. The Administration has taken steps towards improving health IT, including: establishing the position of the National Coordinator for Health Information Technology and providing $100 million to fund projects harmonizing standards for electronic information exchange; developing certification criteria to ensure health IT investments meet proper standards; addressing privacy and security issues; and developing models for a national Internet-based health information system. Through the American Health Information Community (AHIC), the Administration and the private sector are building a common framework for implementing a nationwide electronic health records system.

- In 2006, The Administration Will Work To Develop Nationwide Health IT Standards To Accelerate Patient Access To Electronic Health Records. This includes a "medical clipboard" that can only be accessed with the patient's consent, electronic medication history and lab results, and ways to utilize health information tools to monitor potential disease outbreaks such as pandemic influenza.

Assistance For Vulnerable Americans

The President Proposes Extending The Benefits Of HSAs To Low-Income Families And Individuals Through Refundable Tax Credits. A family of four making $25,000 or less will be able to get a refundable tax credit of $3,000 from the Federal government to help buy an HSA-compatible policy that covers them for major medical expenses. These families will have the flexibility to put up to $1,000 of the money directly into an HSA to pay for routine medical expenses. What the family does not spend can be saved in the account and carried over to the next year, earning interest tax-free.

The President Proposes Providing $500 Million Per Year To Encourage States To Test Innovative Methods For Covering Chronically Ill Residents. Americans who are chronically ill and are not part of an employer or public pool must pay the full burden of their care through high premiums or, in some cases, go without insurance at all. Some states have established high-risk pools to insure chronically ill patients otherwise denied coverage, but there are also other innovative approaches that could provide better coverage at lower costs. The President proposes grants, awarded by the HHS Secretary, that would help cover chronically ill patients by helping up to 10 states build on their existing high-risk pools or test other innovative approaches such as risk-adjusted subsidies or plans designed to manage chronic illnesses such as diabetes.

The President Supports Allowing Employers To Make Higher Contributions To The HSAs Of Chronically Ill Employees. Under current law, employers must contribute the same amount to each employee's HSA. This prevents employers from providing extra help to their chronically ill employees – employees who are more likely to use their HSAs to pay for their higher-than-average out-of-pocket expenses. Permitting employers to make higher contributions to HSAs of chronically ill employees will help those workers fund their HSAs and pay their out-of-pocket expenses tax-free through their accounts.

The President Proposes Expanding AHPs To Allow Civic, Community, And Religious Groups To Purchase Health Coverage For Their Members. This gives individuals and their families, including the most vulnerable Americans, the ability to pool together to buy health insurance outside of their workplace. Giving people more choices to buy insurance at group rates from organizations they already know and trust will help many Americans purchase quality, affordable, and portable health insurance.

The President Supports Increased Funding For Community Health Centers. It is vital to get care to poor communities, where access is often hardest to come by, and basic primary and preventative services could do an enormous amount to raise living standards and well being. The President has worked to expand the number and reach of Community Health Centers. In 2001, there were 3,317 sites serving some 10.3 million patients. The Administration has funded more than 800 new or expanded centers and will fund approximately 400 more in the next two years. This has allowed Community Health Centers to build the capacity to serve more than 3.5 million additional Americans, with nearly 2 million more to be served in the next two years.

- The President Has Proposed Establishing Community Health Centers In Poor Communities. To make health care available where it is needed most, the Administration has set out to establish a Community Health Center or rural clinic in every high-poverty county in America that can support one. The President's FY 2007 budget proposes to establish 80 such centers or clinics in poor counties not currently served.

The State Of The Union: A Strong America Leading The World

In His State Of The Union Address, President Bush Discussed America's Leadership In The World And Shared His Vision To Lead America Forward. At a time of great consequence, the President laid out an agenda of leadership to act confidently in pursuing the enemies of freedom and to build our prosperity by leading the world economy. The President rejected the roads of isolationism and protectionism and called for cooperation and courage in confronting challenges. America will lead freedom's advance, compete and excel in the global economy, and renew the defining moral commitments of this land, confident of victory.

Leadership Toward Peace In The World

Every Step Toward Freedom In The World Makes Our Country Safer, And So America Will Act Boldly In Freedom's Cause. Today our Nation is committed to an historic, long-term goal: the end of tyranny in our world. On September 11th, 2001, America found that problems originating in a failed and oppressive state seven thousand miles away could bring murder and destruction to our country. Dictatorships shelter terrorists, feed resentment and radicalism, and seek weapons of mass destruction. Democracies replace resentment with hope, respect the rights of their citizens and their neighbors, and join the fight against terror. As we celebrate the spread of freedom in places like Afghanistan and Iraq, we do not forget people living in places like Syria, Burma, Zimbabwe, North Korea, and Iran – because the demands of justice, and the peace of this world, require their freedom as well.

- America Will Not Retreat From The World Or Surrender To Evil. In a time of testing, America cannot find security by abandoning commitments and retreating to isolation within our borders. If we were to leave the terrorists alone, they would not leave us alone. They would simply move the battlefield to our own shores. There is no peace or honor in retreat. America rejects the false comfort of isolationism. We accept the call of history to deliver the oppressed and move the world toward peace.

America Is On The Offensive In The War On Terror. America and its allies have killed or captured many of the leaders of the terror networks. For the others, their day will come.

- We Remain On The Offensive In Afghanistan. In that country, a fine president and National Assembly are fighting terror while building the institutions of a new democracy.

- America Is On The Offensive In Iraq, With A Clear Plan For Victory. First, the Coalition is helping Iraqis build an inclusive government, so that old resentments will be eased and the insurgency will be marginalized. Second, the Coalition is continuing reconstruction efforts and helping the Iraqi government fight corruption and build a modern economy. Third, Coalition forces are striking terrorist targets and training Iraqi forces. In less than three years, Iraq has gone from dictatorship, to liberation, to sovereignty, to a constitution, to national elections.

- The Brutality Of The Terrorists Cannot Stop The Dramatic Progress Of A New Democracy. The Coalition has been relentless in shutting off terrorist infiltration, clearing out insurgent strongholds, and turning over territory to Iraqi security forces. As we make progress on the ground, and Iraqi forces increasingly take the lead, we should be able to further decrease our troop levels, but those decisions will be made by our military commanders, not by politicians in Washington, D.C.

- Our Strategy For Victory In Iraq Benefits From Responsible Criticism And Counsel. The effort in Iraq has benefited from responsible criticism and counsel offered by Members of Congress of both parties. The President will continue to reach out and seek good advice. Yet there is a difference between responsible criticism that aims for success and defeatism that refuses to acknowledge anything but failure. However individuals feel about the decisions and debates of the past, our Nation has only one option: We must keep our word, defeat our enemies, and stand behind the men and women of America's military in their vital mission.

Progress Will Continue Across The Middle East As America Offers A Hopeful Alternative To Hatred And Fear. America's offensive against terror involves more than military action, and we are delivering a clear message across the broader Middle East. In parts of the Middle East, there have been steps taken toward reform, but there is more progress to be made. Elections are vital – but they are only the beginning. Raising up a democracy requires the rule of law, protection of minorities, and strong, accountable institutions that last longer than a single vote. The Palestinian people have voted in elections – now the leaders of Hamas must recognize Israel, disarm, reject terrorism and work for a lasting peace. Elsewhere in the Middle East, the repressive regime in Iran is defying the world with its nuclear ambitions, and the nations of the world must not permit the Iranian regime to gain nuclear weapons.

- As America Encourages The Spread Of Freedom, We Must Also Spread Prosperity. To overcome dangers in our world, America will encourage economic progress, fight disease, and spread hope in hopeless lands. Isolationism would not only tie our hands in fighting enemies, it would keep America from helping our friends in desperate need. America has taken unprecedented action to fight AIDS and malaria, expand the education of girls, and reward developing nations moving forward with economic and political reform. Short-changing these efforts would increase the suffering and chaos of the world, undercut America's long-term security, and dull the conscience of our country.

The Offensive Against Terrorism Must Continue At Home. The enemy has not lost the desire or capability to attack us. America has superb professionals in law enforcement, intelligence, the military, and homeland security who are protecting America. They deserve our thanks – and they deserve the same tools they already use to fight drug trafficking and organized crime, so the President called on Congress to reauthorize the Patriot Act.

Winning The War on Terror Requires Learning The Lessons of September 11th. To prevent another attack – based on authority given to the President by the Constitution and by statute – the President has authorized a terrorist surveillance program to aggressively pursue the international communications of suspected al-Qaida operatives and affiliates to and from America. Previous presidents have used the same constitutional authority the President has – and Federal courts have approved the use of that authority. Appropriate Members of Congress have been kept informed. This terrorist surveillance program has helped prevent terrorist attacks. It remains essential to the security of America. If there are people inside our country who are talking with al-Qaida, we want to know about it – because we will not sit back and wait to be hit again.

Leadership For Prosperity At Home And Abroad

America's Economic Strength Continues To Lead The World. The American economy is healthy and vigorous and growing faster than other major industrialized nations. In the last two and a half years, America has created 4.6 million new jobs – more than Japan and the European Union combined. Even in the face of higher energy prices and natural disasters, the American people have turned in an economic performance that is the envy of the world.

Our Nation Will Compete With Confidence And Extend Our Economic Leadership In The World. In a dynamic world economy, we are seeing new competitors. This creates uncertainty, which makes it easier to feed people's fears. Protectionists want to escape competition, while others want the government to take a larger role in directing the economy. The President set forth a better path that will raise standards of living and generate new jobs. Americans should not fear our economic future, because we intend to shape it.

Congress Needs To Make The Tax Cuts Permanent. Keeping America competitive begins with keeping our economy growing. Our economy grows when Americans have more of their own money to spend, save, and invest. In the last five years, tax relief has left $880 billion in the hands of American workers, investors, small businesses, and families, and they have used it to help produce more than four years of uninterrupted economic growth. Yet the tax relief is set to expire in the next few years. If Congress does not act, American families will face a massive tax increase.

The Growth Of Government Must Be Limited Through Fiscal Discipline. Every year since President Bush took office, the growth of non-security discretionary spending has been reduced, and last year this spending was cut. This year the President's budget will cut it again and will reduce or eliminate more than 140 programs that are performing poorly or not fulfilling essential priorities. By passing these reforms, we will save the American taxpayer another $14 billion next year and stay on track to cut the deficit in half by 2009. Congress must also move forward on earmark reform and pass the line-item veto to limit special interest projects.

- The Government Must Confront The Larger Challenge Of Entitlement Spending. The coming retirement of the Baby Boom generation will put unprecedented strains on the Federal government. By 2030, spending for Social Security, Medicare, and Medicaid alone will be almost 60 percent of the entire Federal budget. And that will present future Congresses with impossible choices: staggering tax increases, immense deficits, or deep cuts in every category of spending. The President proposed a bipartisan commission to examine the impact of this problem.

America Must Continue To Open Markets For American Goods. One out of every five factory jobs in America is related to global trade, and we want people everywhere to buy American. With open markets and a level playing field, no one can out-produce or out-compete the American worker.

Immigration Reform Must Be A Priority. America needs an immigration system that upholds our laws, reflects our values, and serves the interests of our economy. Our nation needs orderly and secure borders. To meet this goal, we must have stronger immigration enforcement and border protection. And we must have a rational, humane guest worker program that rejects amnesty, allows temporary jobs for people who seek them legally, and reduces smuggling and crime at the border.

Health Care Must Be Made Affordable And Accessible. Our government has a responsibility to help provide health care for the poor and the elderly, and it will meet that responsibility. For all Americans, we must confront the rising cost of care, strengthen the doctor-patient relationship, and help people afford the insurance coverage they need.

- Improved Health Savings Accounts Will Offer Lower Costs And Security Between Jobs. The President proposed strengthening Health Savings Accounts by making sure individuals and small business employees can buy insurance with the same tax advantages that people working for big businesses now get. We will do more to make this coverage portable, so workers can switch jobs without having to worry about losing their health insurance.

- Technology Offers The Possibility Of More Effective, Less Expensive Health Care. The President called for wider use of electronic records and other health information technology to help control costs and reduce medical errors.

- Medical Liability Reform Will Help Retain Good Doctors. The President called on Congress to pass Medical Liability Reform this year. Lawsuits are driving many good doctors out of practice, leaving women in nearly 1500 American counties without a single OB-GYN.

The Advanced Energy Initiative Will Help Break America's Dependence On Foreign Sources Of Energy. The best way to break America's addiction to oil is through technology. The President set a goal of replacing more than 75 percent of oil imports from the Middle East by 2025. Since 2001, we have spent nearly $10 billion to develop cleaner, cheaper, more reliable alternative energy sources. The Advanced Energy Initiative will deliver a 22 percent increase in clean-energy research to push for breakthroughs in two vital areas:

- New Energy Sources For Homes And Businesses. To change how we power our homes and offices, we will invest more in zero-emission coal-fired plants; revolutionary solar and wind technologies; and clean, safe nuclear energy.

- New Energy Sources For Transportation. We must also change how we power our automobiles and move beyond a petroleum-based economy. We will increase our research in better batteries for hybrid and electric cars and in pollution-free cars that run on hydrogen. We will also fund additional research in cutting-edge methods of producing ethanol, not just from corn but from wood chips, stalks, or switch grass. The goal is to make this new kind of ethanol practical and competitive within six years.

The President's American Competitiveness Initiative Will Encourage Innovation Throughout The Economy. America must continue to lead the world in human talent and creativity. Our greatest advantage in the world has always been our educated, hard-working, ambitious people, and we are going to keep that edge.

- New Federal Funding For Research. The President proposed doubling the Federal commitment to the most critical basic research in the physical sciences over the next ten years. This will support the work of America's most creative minds as they explore promising areas such as nanotechnology, supercomputing, and alternative energy sources.

- Provide Tax Certainty For Research And Development. The President proposed making permanent the research and development tax credit to encourage bolder private-sector investment in technology. With more research in both the public and private sectors, we will improve our quality of life and ensure that America will lead the world in opportunity and innovation for decades to come.

- Strengthening Education In Math And Science. Building on the success of the No Child Left Behind Act, the President proposed training 70,000 high school teachers to lead advanced-placement courses in math and science; bringing 30,000 math and science professionals to teach in classrooms; and getting early help to students struggling with math so they have a better chance at good, high-wage jobs.

America Is Becoming A More Hopeful Nation. Violent crime rates have fallen to their lowest levels since the 1970s. Welfare cases have dropped by more than half over the past decade. Drug abuse among youth is down 19 percent since 2001. There are fewer abortions in America than at any point in the last three decades, and the number of children born to teenage mothers has been falling for a dozen years in a row. Government has played a role in this quiet transformation, and wise policies such as welfare reform, drug education, and support for abstinence and adoption have made a difference in the character of our country.

America Still Has More To Do To Strengthen Our Culture And Our Institutions. Many Americans, especially parents, still have deep concerns about the direction of our culture and the health of our most basic institutions. They are concerned about unethical conduct by public officials and discouraged by activist courts that try to redefine marriage. And they worry about children in need, fellow citizens still displaced by natural disaster, and suffering caused by treatable disease.

- Courts Must Deliver Equal Justice Under Law And Not Legislate From The Bench. The Senate has confirmed two superb new members of the Supreme Court, Chief Justice John Roberts and Justice Samuel Alito. The President will continue to nominate men and women who understand that judges must be servants of the law and not legislate from the bench.

- America Must Recognize The Value Of Every Life. The President called on Congress to pass legislation to prohibit the most egregious abuses of medical research: cloning human beings; creating or implanting embryos for experiments; creating human-animal hybrids; and buying, selling, or patenting human embryos. Human life is a gift from our Creator, and that gift should never be discarded, devalued, or put up for sale.

- Elected Officials Must Uphold The Public Trust. The President supports the efforts of honorable people in both parties who are working on reforms to strengthen the ethical standards of Washington. Public servants make a pledge to be worthy of public responsibility, and that is a pledge that must never be forgotten, dismissed, or betrayed.

- America Must Protect And Encourage Its Children. Through the Helping America's Youth initiative led by First Lady Laura Bush, America is encouraging caring adults to get involved in the life of a child. The President called for additional resources to encourage young people to stay in school so more of America's youth can raise their sights and achieve their dreams.

- A Continuing Commitment To Gulf Reconstruction. America will aid our fellow citizens in times of suffering and emergency and stay with them until they are back on their feet. So far the Federal government has committed $85 billion to the people of the Gulf Coast and New Orleans. We are removing debris, repairing highways, building stronger levees, and providing business loans and housing assistance. We must also address deeper challenges that existed before the storm arrived and must provide not only temporary relief, but also schools that teach every child, job skills that bring upward mobility, and more opportunities to own a home and start a business.

- Continuing The Fight To Prevent, Treat, And Defeat HIV/AIDS. The President called on Congress to reform and reauthorize the Ryan White Act and to provide new funding to states, so we end the waiting lists for AIDS medicine in America. More than one million Americans live with HIV, and half of all AIDS cases occur among African-Americans. The President called for a nationwide effort, working closely with African-American churches and faith-based groups, to deliver rapid HIV tests to millions, end the stigma of AIDS, and come closer to the day when there are no new infections in America.

Attached are four documents that contain more specific information on the President's vision to lead America forward—the Advanced Energy Initiative, Affordable and Accessible Health Care, and the American Competitiveness Initiative.

Partial Birth Abortion Act Ruled Unconstitutional by U.S. Courts

By JULIA PRESTON

Two federal appeals courts yesterday upheld rulings that the Partial Birth Abortion Act, passed by Congress in 2003 but barred by the courts, is unconstitutional because it does not include an exception when the health of a pregnant woman is at risk.

The rulings, which came on the same day from three-judge panels in the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, in New York, and the Ninth Circuit, in San Francisco, were substantially based on a United States Supreme Court decision in a Nebraska case in 2000. In that case, the Supreme Court found that any abortion ban must include an exception allowing a procedure that involves a partly delivered fetus after the first trimester of pregnancy, known among opponents as partial birth abortion, when alternative methods could endanger the woman's health.

Since the appeals court for the Eighth Circuit, in St. Louis, reached a similar conclusion last July, the three legal challenges nationwide to the abortion act have now been affirmed on appeal. This month the Supreme Court several times postponed deciding whether to hear the Eighth Circuit case.

The Second Circuit upheld the challenge, brought by the National Abortion Federation, on the narrowest of grounds, and did not strike down the act. Instead, the appeals court gave both sides 30 days to offer recommendations on how to remedy the failings in the law.

One of the three judges, Chester J. Straub, dissented. He wrote that he does not believe a woman's right to end her pregnancy under Roe v. Wade in 1973 "extends to the destruction of a child that is substantially outside her body."

The Second Circuit chief judge, John M. Walker Jr., wrote in a concurring opinion that precedent forced him to rule against the act "no matter how personally distasteful the fulfillment of that duty may be." He found that the abortion method in the ban was one that "many Americans, probably most Americans, find exceedingly offensive on moral grounds."

He offered a critique of "the sweeping constitutionalization" of abortion law, writing that past Supreme Court rulings had transformed the federal courts into "a sort of super regulatory agency" and had marginalized "the reasonable policy judgments" of Congress.

Two Courts Say Partial Birth Abortion Ban Is Illegal

(Bloomberg) -- Federal appeals courts in California and New York said today a federal law banning ``partial birth'' abortions is illegal because it doesn't have an exception to protect the health of pregnant women.

The Ninth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in San Francisco and the Second Circuit in New York said the 2003 Partial Birth Abortion Ban Act violates the Constitution. The courts ruled in light of a Jan. 18 U.S. Supreme Court finding that a New Hampshire law requiring parental notification for abortions may be blocked in cases of health emergencies.

``The act lacks the health exception required of all abortion regulations,'' the California court said.

The rulings help set the stage for what may become the first abortion case before the Supreme Court since the swearing-in of Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. The court is deciding whether to hear a Bush administration appeal of a third ruling against the law.

The high court struck down a Nebraska ``partial birth'' law in 2000 on a 5-4 vote, saying it was too broad and lacked an adequate health exception.

Alito's vote might make a difference because he replaces retiring Judge Sandra Day O'Connor, who was in the majority in the 2000 case. Democratic lawmakers tried to block his confirmation, in part because of concern he will vote against abortion rights.

The Law

The partial birth abortion law, which has never taken effect, would be the first nationwide ban of an abortion procedure since the landmark 1973 Roe v. Wade decision legalized abortion nationwide.

The law outlaws procedures in which a fetus is partially removed from the mother before being killed, including a procedure known as intact dilation and evacuation. Doctors who violate the law would be subject to criminal and civil penalties.

John Nowacki, a Justice Department spokesman, said the agency was reviewing today's rulings.

The Ninth Circuit Court ruling was unanimous. The court said it wouldn't defer to Congress' findings that the partial birth abortion procedure is never required to protect a women's health. Because there was disagreement among doctors about whether the procedure is necessary, the court said, a ``health exception'' is required.

The Second Circuit voted 2-1, with the majority saying the law was unconstitutional and stopping short of saying the entire law needed to be struck down. It asked the government and an abortion rights group that sued to file briefs discussing whether the statute might be narrowed to prevent it from violating the constitution.

Procedure Called `Offensive'

Judge John M. Walker Jr. in New York, concurring with the opinion, called the procedure a ``deeply disturbing -- and morally offensive -- destruction of the life of a partially born child.'' He said he nonetheless was bound by the 2000 Supreme Court Decision.

``We are pleased that both courts have recognized that this ban needs an exception to protect women's health,'' Vicki Saporta, president of the National Abortion Federation, said in a statement. ``Doctors and women should be able to make medical decision free from interference by politicians.''

A dissent in the New York case by Judge Chester J. Straub marks the first time that a federal judge has said that the act, signed into law by President George W. Bush in November 2003, is constitutional.

The cases are Planned Parenthood Federation of America Inc. v. Gonzales, 04-16621, Ninth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals (San Francisco) and National Abortion Federation v. Gonzales, 04-5201- cv, Second U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals (New York).

Federal government asks judge to dismiss No Child suit

By MATT APUZZO

Associated Press Writer

NEW HAVEN, Conn_Attorneys for the U.S. Department of Education asked a federal judge Tuesday to throw out Connecticut's challenge to the federal No Child Left Behind law, saying the state understood the law when it accepted hundreds of millions of dollars in education funding.

Connecticut became the first state to try to block the 2002 law when it filed the lawsuit in August. Attorney General Richard Blumenthal argued that the law was unconstitutional, an unfunded federal mandate costing more than the state received in federal aid.

No\l "l" Child\l "l" Left\l "l" Behind\l "l", the cornerstone of President Bush's education platform, requires that students be tested annually in grades 3 through 8. Connecticut\l "l" wants to continue its program for testing every other year, in grades 4, 6, 8 and 10, a request that Education Secretary Margaret Spellings has refused.

Officials have estimated that the state will be saddled with a $41.6 million shortfall through 2008 to pay for additional testing and other provisions the bill requires.

Justice Department attorneys, who represent the Education Department, countered that Connecticut\l "l" knew the testing requirements when it accepted the money and is now trying to escape obligations under the law.

U.S. District Judge Mark Kravitz did not rule on the motion to dismiss Tuesday. On several occasions, he suggested that siding with Connecticut\l "l" in the case could allow other states to pick and choose which elements of the federal law to follow.

Blumenthal compared the law to a hypothetical school lunch program in which Connecticut\l "l" serves filet mignon every other day but the federal government demands daily lunches _ and only spends enough to buy candy bars.

Kravitz, who quizzed attorneys on both sides, seemed skeptical.

"They're saying, 'We'll fund this. If you want to keep your system, you'll have to do it on your own,'" Kravitz said.

State Education Commissioner Betty J. Sternberg said students in every grade will receive the tests this year, as required by federal law. She said the cost, more than $3 million, will be paid for by the state.

Early morning arguments focused on whether Connecticut's\l "l" lawsuit should be permitted. Federal attorneys argue that Connecticut\l "l" jumped the gun by suing before its appeals and reviews within the Department of Education were exhausted.

Blumenthal countered that the risks of appealing through the Department of Education are too great because Spellings could withhold millions of dollars in education funding while the issue is debated.

Blumenthal also said it makes no sense to require Connecticut\l "l" to break the law to find out if it is constitutional. Though they disagree with the testing requirement, Connecticut\l "l" officials plan to test in all grades this year if they lose the lawsuit.

Kravitz said Spellings could avoid the need for the lawsuit by agreeing not to withhold federal education money while Connecticut\l "l" challenges the law within the agency. He encouraged Justice Department attorney Elizabeth Goitein to bring that request to Spellings.

Republican Gov. M. Jodi Rell, who signed a bill authorizing the lawsuit, has called the No\l "l" Child\l "l" Left\l "l" Behind\l "l" Law illegal because it requires testing and programs it does not pay for.

Kravitz asked Blumenthal and the federal government to file more legal documents in the case by the end of March.

N.A.A.C.P. Is Bush Ally In School Suit Versus State

AVI SALZMAN

NEW HAVEN, Jan. 31 N.A.A.C.P. officials said on Tuesday that they were trying to intervene in a lawsuit over the No\l "l" Child\l "l" Left\l "l" Behind\l "l" Law on the side of the Bush administration and against the State of Connecticut\l "l" because of a core principle: that states do not have the right to ignore federal legislation that aims to help minorities.

"The issue goes beyond the specifics of No\l "l" Child\l "l" Left\l "l" Behind\l "l" to potentially affect other federal statutes designed to protect civil rights," said Victor L. Goode, assistant general counsel for the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. "One can't help but remember back in the Dixiecrat period when certain Southern states asserted that they were not required to comply with certain federal civil rights laws designed to protect people's rights."

The Connecticut\l "l" State N.A.A.C.P. filed a motion on Monday to intervene in a lawsuit filed by the State of Connecticut\l "l" against Margaret Spellings, the secretary of education. The state contends that the federal government came up about $50 million short in funding for education and testing required under No\l "l" Child\l "l" Left\l "l" Behind\l "l", and that Connecticut\l "l" should not be asked to spend its own money to comply with the law.

Connecticut\l "l" especially objects to the United States Department of Education's repeated denials of its requests for waivers that would allow it to test students every other grade, instead of each grade, and to give modified tests to special education students and students learning basic English.

Federal officials contend that the state must test every year from third through eighth grade and that state officials were aware of that when they accepted federal money to create those tests.

On Tuesday, Judge Mark R. Kravitz heard arguments in the case in United States District Court in New Haven, and decided to give the state more time to hone its arguments about why its lawsuit should not be dismissed. The judge did not address the N.A.A.C.P.'s motions.

At the same time, N.A.A.C.P. representatives held a news conference outside the courthouse announcing the organization's decision to intervene. Scot X. Esdaile, the president of the Connecticut\l "l" branches of the N.A.A.C.P., said the organization was aligning itself with the Bush administration "on this particular issue and only this particular issue."

Mr. Esdaile said he had received approval to intervene from the N.A.A.C.P.'s national leadership.

Connecticut\l "l" consistently scores near the top on national assessments of student achievement, but it has been plagued for decades by gaps between minority and white students and poor and wealthy students.

Those discrepancies became fodder for a series of bitter exchanges between state and federal officials last year, with Ms. Spellings lashing out at the State of Connecticut\l "l" for its failure to address the gaps.

"And you know, I think it's un-American, I would call it," she said in an interview broadcast on PBS in April, "for us to take the attitude that African-American children in Connecticut\l "l" living in inner cities are not going to be able to compete, are not going to be prepared to compete in this world and are not going to be educated to high levels.

"That's the notion," she said, "the soft bigotry of low expectations, as the president calls it, that No\l "l" Child\l "l" Left\l "l" Behind\l "l" rejects."

The comment drew an angry response from Betty J. Sternberg, the state's education commissioner, who likened the "un-American" remark to a return to the McCarthy era.

At that time, Richard Blumenthal, Connecticut's\l "l" attorney general, began pressing to file suit against the federal government over the rules and the funding for No\l "l" Child\l "l" Left\l "l" Behind\l "l", and in August, he received support from state officials. With the case still in limbo, Connecticut\l "l" will begin testing students in March in every grade from third through eighth using state money to cover shortfalls, Dr. Sternberg said.

The N.A.A.C.P. said in its filing that "Connecticut\l "l" is failing its most disempowered children," and included three minority students in the motion to intervene.

Civil rights lawyers are concerned about the precedent that a Connecticut\l "l" victory would set.

"We would not want states or other entities to not enforce laws like the 1964 Civil Rights Act or the 1968 Civil Rights Act on some notion that they don't have enough money to enforce it," said Mr. Goode, the N.A.A.C.P. lawyer. "We don't want the door to be opened to this sort of thing."

Lawmaker urges review of patent approval and re-examination processes

By Daniel Pulliam

The Patent and Trademark Office failed to move quickly enough or devote adequate resources to addressing the validity of the patents at the heart of a row that is jeopardizing BlackBerry service, the chairman of the House Government Reform Committee said last week.

If patent re-examination requests from the BlackBerry maker -- Canada-based Research In Motion -- had been addressed more expeditiously, the controversy could have been resolved before it threatened a service that is critical to the government, wrote Rep. Tom Davis, R-Va., in a Jan. 27 letter to Jon Dudas, director of PTO.

The Arlington, Va., patent holding company NTP Inc. sued RIM in 2002 for alleged illegal use of patented software, and RIM in 2003 asked the patent office to re-examine NTP's patents. A preliminary ruling from the office rejected the validity of all of NTP's patents, and NTP said it plans to appeal that ruling in federal court.

"If somebody moves onto your front lawn and refuses to pay you, you have no choice but to seek assistance in removing them from your property," said Kevin Anderson, one of NTP's lawyers.

NTP filed a seven-page request with the patent commissioner last week, asking for the re-examination to be dismissed and charging that the agency failed to treat the company as it has other companies in similar situations.

Davis asked in his letter if reforms were necessary to speed up and improve patent processing.

"In today's fast-moving world, America's economy and our ability to compete in a global marketplace are dependent on an efficient and competent system to bring new technological developments to the consumer market," Davis said in a statement. "We consistently challenge the developing world to match our commitment to intellectual property rights. But are there refinements that we need to make, too?"

A PTO spokeswoman did not respond to requests for comment, and a RIM spokeswoman declined to comment for this article.

The agency's patent division has plans to hire about a thousand new employees a year through fiscal 2008 in order to reduce its backlog of patent applications.

Last week, the Supreme Court declined to hear the BlackBerry case after RIM asked the court to determine whether U.S. patent law could apply to devices operating partially outside of the United States, as the BlackBerry network does.

Both companies are expected to file briefs Wednesday with the Virginia Federal District Court presenting their case in anticipation of a Feb. 24 hearing when the companies will argue before U.S. District Judge James Spencer on whether he should issue an injunction shutting down BlackBerry service in the United States.

RIM said that in preparation for a potential injunction, it has prepared a software workaround. But if a shutdown is ordered, it would be impossible to implement an exemption for government users and others deemed essential users, RIM has stated.

According to Eric Stange, president of the Defense and Homeland Security practice at Accenture, a management and information technology consulting company, high-level government executives rely daily on the BlackBerry devices, and a shutdown of the system would cause significant upheaval.

"I've seen a three-star Army general on stage checking his BlackBerry," said Stange, who has worked on homeland security and defense issues for six years. "I can't say for sure if [Homeland Security Department Secretary Michael] Chertoff uses them, but people on his staff use them."

US has misgivings about BlackBerry shutdown plan

By Peter Kaplan

WASHINGTON (Reuters) - The U.S. Justice Department urged a federal judge on Wednesday to refrain from any plans to shut BlackBerry portable e-mail service over patent infringement until the government gets more assurances its users will be exempted.

The department handed BlackBerry maker Research In Motion Ltd., <RIM.TO><RIMM.O> its second legal victory of the day, saying in a court filing that there had not been enough evidence submitted to show that the plan would carve out government users "without substantial hardship."

"We believe that there are still a number of serious questions to be answered as to how an injunction can be implemented so as to continue BlackBerry service for governmental and other excepted groups," the Justice Department said in a legal brief filed in federal court.

Earlier in the day, the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office sided with the company by issuing a non-final rejection of a fifth patent at the center of its legal battle with patent holding company NTP Inc.

RIM is pursuing the patent office challenge as it tries to fend off the 2003 patent infringement ruling that NTP won against the company in federal court in Richmond, Va.

U.S. District Judge James Spencer is due to hear arguments February 24 on whether to grant NTP's request for a shutdown of most U.S. BlackBerry service.

RIM's lawyers have argued that Spencer should refrain from imposing any injunction for a number of reasons, including an "exceptional public interest" in maintaining uninterrupted BlackBerry service for national security officials and other government workers.

The patent office decision means the agency has now issued non-final rejections of all five patents at issue in a BlackBerry patent-infringement case before a federal judge.

But the final outcome of the challenge at the patent office is likely months away, while the potentially decisive court hearing in the infringement case is set for February 24.

RIM shares, which had closed up 9 percent to $73.61 on Nasdaq after the patent decision, added on as much as 1.9 percent to $75 a share on Inet in after-hours trading following the government's court filing.

DOJ Sharpens Objections in Blackberry Case

RICHMOND, Va._The Justice\l "l" Department\l "l" sharpened its objections Wednesday to a threatened shutdown of the BlackBerry e-mail system, saying it would be difficult to close it without affecting government users.

NTP Inc., an Arlington, Va.-based company, has convinced a federal jury that its patents have been infringed by Research In Motion Ltd., the Canadian operator of the BlackBerry network, and is seeking a court ruling to turn off the network.

The judge in the case has indicated he could decide on NTP's request following a scheduled Feb. 24 hearing.

NTP has said such an injunction would not apply to government BlackBerry users, who may account for up to 200,000 of the company's 4.3 million customers.

In a court filing Wednesday, NTP said there were "readily administrable" ways to exclude government and emergency users from a shutdown.

The Justice\l "l" Department\l "l" has previously questioned that assertion, and in Wednesday's court filing said it could not find that NTP's plans "can be realistically implemented."

The government provided a list of 138 agencies and their related contractors that need to be excluded from a shutdown. The list includes the Central Intelligence Agency, the Army and the National Security Agency.

The government left the door open for an injunction that would leave the network in operation but stop sales of new BlackBerries to private users.

For its part, RIM has agreed with the Justice\l "l" Department\l "l" that it would be difficult to separate government from private BlackBerry users. In a filing Wednesday, it also argued that public interest in the network extends beyond government users. For example, it said, the financial services industry relies heavily on the devices.

In its filing, NTP replied that identifying government users is RIM's responsibility, and any difficulties doing so shouldn't prevent an injunction.

Separately, the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office took another step Wednesday toward invalidating a patent that is at the center of the bitter legal feud.

Stephen Maebius, a Washington patent attorney not involved in the case, said the action was not final but does bring the patent office closer to expected final rejections of the patents held by NTP.

On the news, shares RIM rose $6.08, or 9 percent, to close at $73.61 on the Nasdaq Stock Market.

The patent office has already preliminarily rejected all five patents at the heart of the NTP's lawsuit against RIM.

However, the trial judge hearing the case has indicated himself unwilling to await final word from the patent office.

Despite the threat of a BlackBerry blackout, many analysts think an actual shutdown is unlikely because putting RIM out of business would make it harder for NTP to collect a big settlement.

Six states to sue U.S. over Medicare

By Clea Benson

SACRAMENTO - California and as many as six other states will file a lawsuit this month challenging the federal government's plan to take back states' savings from the new Medicare Part D prescription drug plan, Attorney General Bill Lockyer said Wednesday.

Under Medicare Part D, which went into effect Jan. 1, the federal government is now buying prescription drugs for poor elderly and disabled people on Medicare. Those costs previously were covered by states.

But the federal government is requiring states to pay back the money they no longer have to spend on drugs for the needy. Lockyer and other attorneys general say that in the first few years of the plan, the amount the states are being asked to repay exceeds the amount they would have spent if they were still buying drugs for disabled seniors.

In California, under a formula written into the federal Medicare law approved by Congress last year, the state will lose $130 million over the next two years, Lockyer said.

He said in a statement that he and attorneys general in several other states believed the repayment requirement was unconstitutional. He said they would take the matter directly to the U.S. Supreme Court.

Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger also released a statement saying the state was prepared to sue.

Gary Karr, spokesman for the federal Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, said he could not comment specifically on a lawsuit that had not been filed. Any change in the law would have to be approved by Congress, he said.

Karr said the Bush administration believes states will save money under the new plan in the long run, even after paying hundreds of millions of dollars to the federal treasury.

"Not only is the federal government picking up a large amount of expenses, but the plan also includes subsidies for state governments to pay for prescription drug coverage for their retirees," Karr said. "Moreover, costs are going down rather substantially because plans are doing a better job of negotiating good drug prices and overall the plan is turning out to be cheaper than expected."

The controversy over the repayments is unrelated to the problems many poor and disabled seniors are experiencing in getting their prescriptions under the new drug coverage plan.

Because of delays in putting information on beneficiaries into computer databases, many recipients have been turned away at pharmacies or overcharged for co-payments. California and other states are covering prescription costs for those beneficiaries on an emergency basis while the federal government sorts out the problems.

Tom Dresslar, a spokesman for Lockyer, said the repayment requirement "adds insult to injury."

"You've got seniors out there that can't get drugs, and you come to find out that the taxpayers are going to have to pay the federal government for this wonderful program," he said. "We think the constitutional issues are significant enough and the potential fiscal harm to the state is significant enough that action is warranted by the Supreme Court."

Army reservist sues to be released from service

BOSTON_An Army reservist from Norton has sued\l "l" the military and Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld in U.S\l "l". District Court in Boston because he has not been allowed to resign.

Jonathan O'Reilly, 31, said in his suit that although he completed his obligation to the Army in May 2004, his commanders have repeatedly refused to let him resign.

O'Reilly enlisted in the Army Reserve at age 18 for an eight-year commitment in exchange for an ROTC scholarship that paid for most of his tuition at the University of Notre Dame.

"I feel I have done everything I agreed to do for the Army, and I wish they would live up to their agreement with me and let me continue with my life," said O'Reilly, who is currently a captain assigned to a unit based in Providence, R.I.

A spokesman for the Army Reserve said that while he was unable to comment on the specifics of O'Reilly's case, commissioned officers are not automatically allowed to resign, even if they have met their obligations.

The Reserve considers three factors when considering a resignation, said spokesman Steve Strumvall: personal hardship, previous deployments, and whether there's a shortage of people with a specific skill.

"If it was peacetime and we had plenty of people, then you wouldn't need criteria like previous deployment and shortage of specialties," Strumvall said.

O'Reilly, a supply officer for the 2nd Battalion, 385th Regiment, 1st Brigade, 98th Division, said he submitted his first resignation letter in June 2004. It was rejected. Four subsequent resignation letters have also been rejected.

He said he was told at first that he didn't have a compelling enough reason to resign. He was later told that the Army was short of personnel with his skills.

"I'm not sure how critical Jonathan O'Reilly is to the U.S. war effort," said O'Reilly's lawyer, Daniel M. Rich. O'Reilly hasn't been activated and his unit is in the process of being disbanded, Rich said.

The unit is also not under a "stop-loss" order, which allows the Pentagon to suspend the discharge of reservists who have either been deployed or are about to be deployed.

O'Reilly's commander, Col. Steve Ruscito, said he has no problem with O'Reilly's resignation. But he said that commissioned officers serve at the pleasure of the president, and the rules change during wartime.

"When we are at war, certain parts of our contract might be activated that would not be in place during peacetime," Ruscito said.

O'Reilly, a certified public accountant and a member of the Norton School Committee, said all he wants from the lawsuit is an honorable discharge from the Army.

"I never meant it to be a career," he said.

Bush punishes BIA budget to pay for Cobell

The Bush administration has made an across-the-board cut to the Bureau of Indian Affairs budget, blaming the reduction on the Cobell trust fund lawsuit.

In an unprecedented letter to tribal leaders, associate Interior deputy secretary Jim Cason announced a $3 million cut to the BIA budget. He said the administration failed to plan for attorney's fees awarded as part of the Cobell case even though the request for fees was pending for more than a year.

As a result, Cason said the BIA forked over $2 million from an account used to "reimburse tribal attorney's fees" and an additional $1 million came from an across-the-board rescission of tribal programs.

Additionally, the Office of Historical Trust Accounting and the Office of Special Trustee -- whose budgets have exploded since the start of the administration while BIA funding has remained flat -- contributed, Cason said. But their share only amounted to $2.3 million, according to the January 26 letter.

Finally, the Department of Treasury -- a named defendant in the suit whose officials were found in contempt of court and whose actions violated the trust responsibility -- contributed about $1.8 million, leaving the BIA to bear the brunt of the administration's failure to plan for the attorney's fees, which totaled $7.1 million.

"As this interim fee was not a planned expense, the [Interior] Department considered a wide range of options," Cason, a a non-Indian political appointee who has been acting as the head of the BIA for nearly a year, told tribal leaders.

The decision to make the cut and send out the letter drew strong criticism from Keith Harper, a member of the Cherokee Nation and an attorney with the Native American Rights Fund, a non-profit organization that is co-counsel in the case. He accused the administration of employing "divide and conquer" tactics in order to generate backlash in Indian Country against the Cobell plaintiffs.

"This administration -- more than any other -- has shown by their actions in trust reform and their actions on sovereignty issues to be the most hostile administration in Indian affairs since termination," Harper said in an interview yesterday.

Harper said he has spoken to a handful of tribal leaders since the letter was sent out. "They see it as a political, transparent attempt to divide and conquer," he said.

Tribal leaders have repeatedly accused Bush officials of punishing Indian Country by bleeding the BIA budget while boosting funds for OST. "For fiscal years 2005 and 2006, funding cuts to BIA has reduced full time staff for law enforcement, education and other vital programs," said Tim Martin, the executive director of the United South and Eastern Tribes, at a Senate hearing last July.

"The Cobell litigation and DOI's interpretations of requirements to meet court orders has absorbed resources and limited the ability to implement already under-funded programs," he added.

A bill introduced by the leaders of the Senate Indian Affairs Committee and the House Resources Committee would ensure that funds used to settle the Cobell case and pay court and other fees would not come out of the BIA budget. Tribal leaders have endorsed this provision.

"Unquestionably, funds to settle the injustice against individual Indian money account holders cannot come from Indian programs," Jim Gray, the chief of the Osage Nation of Oklahoma and the chairman of the Inter-Tribal Monitoring Association, said in his testimony.

Key members of Congress have agreed with the tribal views. The House Interior Appropriations Committee has repeatedly reduced funding for OST in light of the administration's increasing requests for money.

"The committee does not agree to the large increase requested in historical accounting and has shifted this funding to help offset the reductions proposed in the administration's request to Indian education and health care," the committee said in a report for the 2006 budget.

Previously, Cason warned tribal leaders to expect cuts in the BIA budget due to spending on Hurricane Katrina and Hurricane Rita. At the National Congress of American Indians annual conference last November, he said the agency was "holding back" five percent of its funds in anticipation of an across-the-board cut.

The issues of budget and the resources for the Cobell case will considered in the upcoming weeks. On February 14, the Senate Indian Affairs Committee holds a hearing on President Bush's fiscal year 2007 budget request. On March 1, the Senate Indian Affairs Committee and the House Resources Committee will hold a joint hearing on the settlement of Cobell.

Expenses At Issue In `No Child' Lawsuit

NEW HAVEN -- Is the federal government going back on its promise to pay for the additional student testing required under President Bush's school reform law, or are Connecticut's tests simply more expensive than necessary?

That is a central question facing a federal judge who will decide whether to dismiss Connecticut's lawsuit against the federal No Child Left Behind Act or to let the case proceed.

U.S. District Judge Mark R. Kravitz grilled state officials Tuesday on whether the Connecticut's expansion of its multimillion-dollar annual Mastery Test program does more than the federal law actually requires. That is the federal government's claim in its motion to dismiss the lawsuit.

Kravitz asked state Attorney General Richard Blumenthal to amend the state's complaint to answer whether federal funding is adequate to meet at least minimum standards outlined by U.S. Secretary of Education Margaret Spellings.

Blumenthal filed the lawsuit against Spellings last summer, calling the federal law an unfunded mandate and contending that it will unfairly cost state and local taxpayers hundreds of millions of dollars.

Educators and politicians across the nation are watching the case closely to gauge its impact on the most sweeping federal education law in 30 years. The law calls for a broad expansion of testing and a shake-up of schools that fail to make progress with all students, including low-income children, special education students and members of minority groups.

Kravitz peppered lawyers for both sides with questions during a five-hour hearing Tuesday. He ordered the state to file its amended complaint by Feb. 28; then the federal government has until March 30 to reply.

For 20 years, Connecticut has tested children in grades four, six and eight, but No Child Left Behind also requires testing in grades three, five and seven - an expansion that state Education Commissioner Betty J. Sternberg contends will cost millions of dollars more with little additional benefit.

The federal government, however, says the additional expenses incurred by Connecticut are the result of the state's own decision to reject a less expensive form of testing.

State officials plan to include a section on writing in the new tests, as well as other questions requiring written answers, although the federal government only requires tests of reading and mathematics.

Kravitz asked, for example, whether the state claims it has insufficient federal funding if it were to administer only a simplified exam with multiple-choice answers for grades three, five and seven.

Federal officials say there is enough money to do that, but state education officials contend there is not. Blumenthal told the judge that state officials also believes simplifying the test, as suggested by Spellings, would interfere with school curriculum.

"There's always the option of dumbing down our tests to the point where we believe they would be inadequate, and we're not willing to do that," Blumenthal said.

U.S. Justice Department lawyer Elizabeth Goitein asserted that Connecticut is giving a more expensive test than the law requires, and is using estimates of those expenses to escape its obligations under No Child Left Behind.

Like other states, Connecticut has seen a sharp increase in federal education funding under the Bush administration, but state officials contend the extra money does not cover the full cost of improvements required under No Child Left Behind.

The state will get about $178 million this school year in federal grants related to the law, about 25 percent more than the $142 million it received in 2002, the year the federal law was signed.

Even with that increased funding, a study by the state Department of Education estimates that the additional testing will cost Connecticut taxpayers another $8 million over the next two years.

Editorial: Privacy policy made in China

Google is coming into its own as a verb. The word is rapidly turning into the preferred nomenclature for "to do an Internet search" as much as it refers to the happy little four-color, one-word logo or the multibillion-dollar company its search engine grew into.

But the company may be marking a turning point this month. Founded in Stanford in 1997, Google's stated goal is "to organize the world's information and make it universally accessible and useful."

It seems to be straying from the last two items, however, by agreeing to censor its Chinese service, Google.cn, at the request of that country's repressive government.

That decision is at odds with the company's motto of "don't be evil" and also with its recent decision to fight a subpoena from the U.S. Department of Justice seeking a vast chunk of the information Google acquires.

The Justice Department wants a list of searches done in a given week and a random sample of 1 million Web addresses in the company's search engines, in order to defend the Child Online Protection Act from an ACLU lawsuit.

Google is resisting the Justice fishing expedition, although apparently Microsoft, AOL and Yahoo complied with similar requests. Google's decision may have to do with the company's commitment to open access to knowledge or, as many in the geek community have argued, it may be to protect the company's business practices. The algorithm Google uses to organize information would be worth a fortune, and not a small one, on the open market.

The refusal may also be to ensure Google's users feel comfortable using the search engine without worrying about who is looking over their search records. But the fact that the federal government wants those records, combined with the news that the White House has already been using secret and probably unconstitutional surveillance, is a worrying sign.

The government has also acknowledged that it engages in data mining, which is the process of extracting knowledge from large-scale comparative analyses of raw data. The idea of secret government snoops data mining the confluence of private-sector search engine data and federal records, including "private" information like Social Security numbers and drivers' licenses, should make anybody nervous.

Many people frightened by the possibility of another 9/11-type attack are willing to let the government stoop even to illegal wiretaps, but perhaps a Government Accountability Office report from August will wake them up. The GAO said that of the five federal data mining efforts it reviewed, none were fully in compliance with accepted practices and so none could guarantee the security of private information being analyzed.

The other unsettling implication of Google's split decision in favor of privacy rights is economic. None of the search engines had anything to gain financially by complying with or opposing the Justice Department subpoena.

But Google was the last of the major search engines to cave in to Chinese government pressure to censor the flow of information potentially critical of the Chinese government or of Web sites containing possibly counterrevolutionary thought, like beer ads, or information on AIDS, public health, or any of the other subjects that make Beijing nervous and that Google blocked last week.

Holding out put Google at a significant commercial disadvantage in the Chinese market, which made it inevitable that the company would surrender. As the watchdog organization Reporters Without Borders noted, the company's motto should be "Don't be evil unless the Chinese government asks you to and there's serious money in it."

But it also means that information, including private data, is now trading at the same level as furniture and sneakers: The standards are being set by the lowest bidder.

Google's privacy policies, which are as good as any major site on the Net, say in part that the company will share your personal information to "protect against imminent harm to the rights, property or safety of Google, its users or the public as required or permitted by law." It doesn't say whose laws, however.

fyi:

ROBERTS:

Mr. Director, I asked you to make a very comprehensive statement covering all the threats that you think endanger our country, not only for the committee but for those listening, all the citizens of the United States. You have done that in a very comprehensive report.

ROBERTS:

It is my understanding, under the Geneva Convention, under the heading of "cruel and inhumane punishment for congressional hearings that last for more than two hours," and prior to questioning, that it would be the thing to do to declare a five-minute break, which we will do. And we will resume immediately at the five-minute mark to start our questions.

(RECESS)

ROBERTS:

Each member will be granted five minutes and we will do a second round, if necessary. And we have a closed session at 2:30.

Mr. Director, I asked last year the committee staff to be very proactive in trying to examine the intelligence community's capabilities to collect and analyze against very hard targets -- I'm talking about Iran, North Korea, China -- on the problem of terrorism and also proliferation.

They are very difficult -- I don't have to tell anybody on the panel about that -- and important intelligence targets, none so more than terrorism.

We've been engaged on these problems, but I also think, as the DNI, you are the person most responsible for assessing and improving the I.C.'s intelligence capabilities.

I would like to hear briefly your impressions of our community's intelligence capabilities to target terrorists when you became the director of DNI, what you've done since, more especially those hard targets that are so hard to penetrate.

NEGROPONTE:

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

In brief, the hard targets that you mentioned -- terrorism, proliferation, some of the countries that we were talking about during my testimony, Iran and North Korea -- have the highest collection priority throughout the intelligence community.

NEGROPONTE:

We're embarked on a vigorous plan, directed by the president a year or so ago, to increase our analytical and collection capability at the CIA and in other agencies.

And in addition to that, upon the recommendation of the Robb-Silberman report and the WMD commission, we have created mission managers for the hard-target areas. So we now have a mission manager for North Korea, we have a mission manager for Iran, and so forth. And those intelligence officials are empowered to bring together the entire intelligence community and work in a collaborative basis to give those difficult issues the attention they deserve.

Now, I don't want to leave you with the illusion that this is any easier a problem as a result of these efforts. But I want to reassure you that we are working very, very hard on this question of penetrating the hard targets. And I'm satisfied that we're making progress.

ROBERTS:

Especially in regard to the increase in reference to human intelligence?

NEGROPONTE:

Yes. That is a very important area of emphasis.

And I would say, yes, there's been a substantial effort in that area, both to increase the penetration of the targets and also to increase the base of our capabilities, increase recruitment into our human intelligence services.

ROBERTS:

All right.

Throwing great fear into my staff, and then I'm going to wing you a question as opposed to one that's prepared -- Ms. Rodley, you do a great job over there at INR. INR usually comes up with a little bit different viewpoint. That's healthy.

Mr. Allen, you are a veteran in the intelligence community and certainly have a great degree of expertise. You were over at Homeland Security, the newest of the agencies that has come under a lot of criticism.

My question is to both of you: Do you know what each other of you are doing in regard to an everyday kind of situation?

And I would apply that to General Maples with the DIA and General Hayden in regard to what you're doing, unless other factors shut you down, which I hope is not the case.

And then you have the DNI here with working groups that you're supposed to coordinate that. And Mr. Goss, who will be before the committee very quickly to go over his tenure at the CIA.

And we worry about loss of certain capabilities, as well as I worry about the loss of the capability that the former NSA director had.

And then, Mr. Mueller, if we pass the Patriot Act, if we don't re-erect these walls, I know that you want to basically state, as Ronald Reagan did, you know, "Congress, tear down these walls."

ROBERTS:

So we're going to try to do that.

But my question is, the information access, where all of you share this information, and then it is funneled into the National Counterterrorism Threat Center so we have a better analytical picture, if you will, the jigsaw puzzle or, say, connecting the dots, do you feel in terms of information access that you are making progress?

We hear down at the center that's there's one computer on somebody's desk and then eight others underneath somebody else's desk. Where are we on that?

And I'll ask the director.

NEGROPONTE:

First of all, I do think that, to the extent that they need to know it and to the extent that we're all working against a common enemy here, I believe the effort is more integrated than it was before. And I think they do know what each other are doing in this core area of interest.

As far as the integration of information at the National Counterterrorism Center, I think that's working apace. And one of my significant priorities during the past year has been to build that center up, give it a permanent leadership, grow its staff, which we are doing, so that it can meet the responsibilities that it has to carry out.

We also have now got a senatorially confirmed chief information officer and also a information-sharing executive. And those officials are working together to improve the information-sharing environment across the intelligence community.

But I believe, Senator, that it's better than it was previously. And I think that the dots are being connected.

Can more be done? Yes, to be sure, but we're working on it.

ROBERTS:

So Charlie Allen's left hand knows what Ms. Rodley's right hand is doing.

NEGROPONTE:

Well, when it relates to a problem that they're both commonly concerned with. But I'd be happy to let them answer that.

ROBERTS:

That's terrorism. At any rate, thank you for that answer, and I'm glad we're making progress.

Senator Rockefeller?

ROCKEFELLER:

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Director, in Buffalo, New York, on April 20, 2004, I would say only two years ago, the president of the United States made the following statement.

He said, "Any time you hear the United States government talking about wiretaps it requires" -- then he paused -- "a wiretap requires a court order. Nothing has changed, by the way. When we're talking about chasing down terrorists, we're talking about getting a court order before we do so." That was the end of that phrase.

My question to you, sir: Was that statement factually accurate when the president made it?

NEGROPONTE:

Senator, as the chairman said earlier, there's going to be both a briefing by Judge Gonzales to the Judiciary Committee next week as well as a briefing in closed session by Judge Gonzales and General Hayden to the committee thereafter where I think that this question can be thoroughly discussed.

NEGROPONTE:

But let me say this about the terrorist surveillance program.

This is a program that was ordered by the president of the United States with respect to international telephone calls to or from suspected Al Qaida operatives and their affiliates. It was, therefore, ordered in the interest of protecting our nation against ongoing terrorist threat.

This was not about domestic surveillance. It was about dealing with the international terrorist threat in the most agile and effective way possible.

But I don't think I want to go into the question any further than that in an open hearing.

ROCKEFELLER:

Well, we may have more time to talk this afternoon, then

Well, we may have more time to talk this afternoon, then.

Mr. Director, the vice president has stated that the NSA domestic surveillance program has saved, quote, "thousands of lives." Do you agree with that statement? Are you prepared to explain the basis for this claim? Or if you feel that you cannot talk in public, would you be willing to talk in closed session this afternoon about that?

NEGROPONTE:

Certainly it's been an effective and important program in dealing with the terrorist threat, which, as I mentioned this morning in my testimony is the most important -- the international terrorist threat is the most important threat faced by the United States here in the homeland and to its interests abroad.

If I may, I might, with your permission, Senator, ask General Hayden to elaborate somewhat in reply to the question that you have just directed to me.

ROCKEFELLER:

General?

HAYDEN:

Thank you, Senator.

What I've said before is that the program has been successful; that we have learned information from this program that would not otherwise have been available. This information has helped detect and prevent terrorist attacks in the United States and abroad.

The underlying basis of your question, though, Senator is to put us in a position of proving a negative: proving that, if we hadn't done this, if we hadn't had this knowledge, if these steps hadn't been taken, if these actions had not taken place, that something else would not have happened. That's very difficult to prove in a strict linear sense.

ROCKEFELLER:

General, I don't want to interrupt, but I only have a little short time left.

It was the vice president that I was quoting, not myself.

This is to Director Mueller. And good morning to you, sir.

A January 17 New York Times article quotes former and current FBI officials as saying that the bureau was inundated with leads from the NSA domestic surveillance program that required hundreds of investigators to check out thousands of tips a month.

According to officials quoted in the article, the information from the NSA program had uncovered no active Al Qaida networks inside the United States planning attacks.

Now, the president, General Hayden and others have been very clear in their public statements that the NSA program collects information only against known Al Qaida terrorists and their associates.

Without getting into classified specifics, can you confirm to the committee that the investigative leads forwarded by the NSA to the FBI related only to known Al Qaida terrorists and their associates?

MUELLER:

Let me answer that part of the question I feel I can answer, Senator. And that relates to leads that come from the NSA.

We get a number of leads from the NSA from a number of programs, including the program that's under discussion today.

MUELLER:

And I can say that leads from that program have been valuable in identifying would-be terrorists in the United States, individuals who were providing material support to terrorists.

But we get any number of leads. Most leads that we get, whether it be from NSA or overseas, from the CIA, ultimately turn out not to be valid or worthwhile. But in our view, any lead from any source, any legitimate source, is a lead that has to be pursued, and we pursue each one and every one of them.

ROCKEFELLER:

My time is up, and I thank you.

ROBERTS:

Senator Wyden?

Senator Wyden?

WYDEN:

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Director, you didn't mention Vanuatu, an island nation in the South Pacific, but you seemed to cover everywhere else, and I welcome you.

To me, just because effective intelligence-gathering requires a high degree of secrecy, the Bush administration can't be excused from reasonable standards of accountability. So I have essentially two questions to start with with respect to accountability.

When it has been determined that an American monitored under the NSA eavesdropping program is no longer a threat, what is done with the information collected on that U.S. person, Mr. Director?

NEGROPONTE:

Sir, again, I don't think in this context...

WYDEN:

Are there restrictions on how that information is used?

NEGROPONTE:

Let me give you a general reply which I think goes to your question.

NEGROPONTE:

Whether you're talking about one program or another with respect to NSA, those programs are under the strictest possible oversight. They are reviewed legally with the greatest of care. There are very senior managers involved in their administration.

And as far as American persons or American individuals are concerned, protections are taken, should their names come up in various kinds of intelligence that is collected, to minimize and protect their identities.

This has been a standard procedure of the NSA for the many, many years that it's been in its existence.

General Hayden may want to amplify.

WYDEN:

Mr. Director, that answer isn't good enough for me. That answer is essentially: "Trust us. The Congress and the public just have to trust us."

And Ronald Reagan put it very well. He said, "Trust, but verify."

And we have no way to verify that citizens are being protected the way you have outlined today.

Now maybe, General Hayden, you want to add to that.

HAYDEN:

Sir, I'll just add very quickly: This is lawfully acquired signals intelligence. And the body of regulations under which NSA operates day in and day out, in terms of protecting U.S. privacy, in terms of protecting information to, from or about a U.S. person, apply to the use, retention and destruction of that data.

WYDEN:

General, there are virtually no rules on data-mining. You and I have gone into this. This has been documented by government auditors. We'll talk more about it privately.

Mr. Director, is it correct that when John Poindexter's program, Operation Total Information Awareness, was closed, that several of Mr. Poindexter's projects were moved to various intelligence agencies?

NEGROPONTE:

I don't know the answer to that question.

WYDEN:

Do any of the other panel members know?

The press has reported intelligence officials saying that those programs run by Mr. Poindexter, I and others on this panel led the effort to close it, we want to know if Mr. Poindexter's programs are going on somewhere else. Can anyone answer that?

Mr. Mueller?

Mr. Mueller?

MUELLER:

I have no knowledge of that, sir.

WYDEN:

Any other panel members?

(UNKNOWN)

Senator, I'd like to answer in closed session.

WYDEN:

All right. I will be asking that question in closed session.

The last question I wanted to ask on this round, Mr. Director, deals with Iran: very obviously a serious, serious threat.

Some frame this as a choice between either bombing the Iranians or essentially the kind of pitter-patter that goes on at the U.N. Some have set it up as those are the choices.

I'm wondering about whether there are other options, particularly economic sanctions. And the one that I would be interested in your thoughts on is the idea of freezing new foreign investment in Iran and whether you think freezing new foreign investment in Iran would cut off some of the money that they use for their dangerous weapons capability.

NEGROPONTE:

Sir, my focus is, of course, on -- our focus, the intelligence community, is on evaluating the threat, the military threat, the political threat and so forth.

So as far as recommendations of a particular option with respect to policy, I think you've really moved -- the question really goes more into the area of what policy-makers might wish to do.

NEGROPONTE:

But what I would say is, clearly, Iran is a part of the international community.

It has important economic relationships, whether it's in the oil sector or through imports or through reliance, to a certain degree on foreign investment.

And, to the extent that its behavior might ultimately bring about some curtailment of those economic activities, that, presumably, is one of the factors that Iran has to consider as it goes about deciding its policies.

WYDEN:

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

ROBERTS:

We will now go to Senator Warner with the exception that I would say that perhaps the members could direct their questions to threats faced by our nation other than the threats that some seem to think are posed by the members of the panel.

Senator Warner?

WARNER:

Mr. Chairman, thank you very much.

I would like to commend you, Mr. Negroponte, for your statement. It was very thorough and comprehensive.

And I've had the privilege of sitting here for many, many years listening to statements and I would rank yours at the very top. I think it reflects the conscious effort that you're making to fulfill this brand new challenge, and I hope that it is working to your satisfaction.

Is it likely that you will come before the Congress for any refinements in the existing law in this session?

NEGROPONTE:

I don't believe so, Senator, unless there's some technical amendment of some kind that we might seek.

But, as far as more substantive ones, my view, and I mentioned this to the committee earlier during my confirmation hearings, I think I ought to deal with the law as it has been passed, play the cards that ought to deal with the law as it has been passed, play the cards that we've been dealt, so to speak, and see how it works out.

I haven't run into any significant roadblocks. I think we're working well together. General Hayden has pulled together a program managers council of all the 15 that meets twice a month. I think we're working through the various issues that the Congress directed us to work through.

But, obviously, if we run into issues that might require legislation in the future, I wouldn't hesitate to bring them up.

WARNER:

And I think you've forged a respectful and strong working relationship with the Central Intelligence Agency under its leadership, which we all admire.

NEGROPONTE:

Yes, sir.

WARNER:

Could we put this for the record? I see a lot of smiles and bowing of heads.

ROBERTS:

You can't record smiles on the record.

NEGROPONTE:

We have an excellent relationship, Mr. Chairman, and we meet frequently and speak over the phone even more frequently...

WARNER:

Mr. Goss, I think you should be on the record on that, also.

GOSS:

I'm pleased to be on the record, Senator, to echo exactly those remarks. We have a great working relationship.

WARNER:

Let me turn to General Maples. I've had a great deal of respect for you personally in your distinguished career, and now from the intelligence standpoint. You're primarily responsible for the security situation in Iraq and Afghanistan, and elsewhere in the world.

Just a historical reference: The actions taken by our government, together with coalition forces in Iraq initially were the defeat of Saddam Hussein's military forces, which was successfully done in a very short period. There followed this insurgency, which slowly evolved. And then it became a very, very significant situation that appears now to still be substantial, but contained and being handled by the coalition forces.

A third composition of problems is growing -- and it's of great concern to me -- and that is the combination of the criminal elements, which are growing -- the corruption, the payoffs, the graft. All of this is just, in a sense, overlaying the courageous work of coalition forces, together with the Iraqi forces and the people through their elections. It's almost like it's pushing Iraq down into a morass.

A lot of the activities of the coalition forces, particularly the U.S. forces now, is directly or indirectly dealing with these situations.

I've been told, through my sources, that if you were to quantify it, the criminal corruption problem is now -- equates to the seriousness of the insurgency problem.

WARNER:

Would you have a view on that?

MAPLES:

Thank you, Senator, for your question. I would -- directly responding, I'm not sure that the level of criminal engagement is at the level of the insurgency, but I think it's a very serious problem.

And I see that a great deal of the violence that we are experiencing in Iraq today does have a relation to a criminal element, as opposed to an insurgent element with a political purpose. I think that we see that in numerous attacks, particularly on contracting vehicles within the economy. We see individuals who are being paid very low sums of money to place, for instance, IEDs without a political purpose, but because they receive remuneration for doing that and becoming essentially a part of receive remuneration for doing that and becoming essentially a part of the insurgency. So I do see...

WARNER:

Thank you. I want to get one further question in. You've documented the response.

Mr. Ambassador, you said a key to establishing effective governments and security over the next three to five years is enhanced Sunni Arab political participation and a growing perception among Sunnis that the political process is addressing their interests. In a sense, that's to try and bring about a unit government of the three principal factions, and it is essential to have that foundation in place.

We're now watching the new government begin to take the reins. It's a little early to make any judgments. But this is a critical time. And we have a very capable U.S. ambassador there, functioning in many ways.

What is the leverage we can have over a sovereign nation, like Iraq, to bring about this conclusion that you've put in here, which is essential to the future success of the coalition of nations that have expended so much life and blood and treasure to give the Iraqi people back their nation?

NEGROPONTE:

First, Senator, I think with respect to Sunni participation, I've been encouraged by recent developments. I was particularly encouraged last fall when one million more Sunnis registered to vote in the constitutional referendum than had been registered for the January 30 election last year.

So that to me was a sign of their increased participation; then the fact that they didn't boycott the election; and then, following that in the Al Anbar Province, which is the most predominantly Sunni province in the country, had a very high degree of participation in the elections that took place on December 15.

So I think all of that is a sign that some Sunnis, at least, are moving away from the course of violence to achieve their political aims and are opting for the pursuit of political solutions and outcomes.

So this is to the good. And I think now we have to find ways -- we, that is the Iraqi government and ourselves -- have to find ways of taking advantage of it.

What's the leverage that we got? Well, of course we're a good, supportive friend of the government of Iraq. We have 130,000 troops there. And we have a massive economic reconstruction and assistance program.

So I think that, working in partnership with our Iraqi friends, I think we can dialogue effectively with them about their political process, although we have to recognize that, ultimately, the shape that their political process is going to take depends ultimately on their own decisions.

WARNER:

That's true. And our president, in the State of the Union, was absolutely consistent on message about our determination to see this through. But there has to be limitations. And that government, as it's coming in to being, has to recognize that there are some limitations.

NEGROPONTE:

I agree with that.

WARNER:

That's got to be made clear to them. They cannot sit there and dither away and put into those particular ministries -- homeland security, defense and otherwise -- persons who really don't measure up to the capabilities required for the functioning government that they need.

NEGROPONTE:

I agree, and I think our ambassador and our commander of our forces in Iraq are both very effective at conveying those kinds of messages.

WARNER:

Good.

Mr. Goss, do you have a view on that?

GOSS:

Senator, thank you. I do, and I certainly agree.

I will assure you that as much as I can say in open session -- I

I will assure you that as much as I can say in open session -- I would like to reinforce in closed session on that point -- and it's simply this: I agree with your observation that the security elements of that country are going to be vital to the opportunity for the institutions of democracy and freedom to flourish, and having the good people who can work in a non-politicized or a non-sectarian way is going to be essential. And I think you've put your finger on exactly a critical point.

WARNER:

I thank you.

Mr. Chairman, I believe my time is up.

ROBERTS:

That is correct.

Senator Levin?

LEVIN:

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

General Hayden, you made a lengthy speech at the National Press Club about the program that the president authorized in terms that involved surveillance of communications of American citizens.

And this is what you said -- one of the things you said in your speech, "that there are no communications more important to the safety of this country than those affiliated with Al Qaida, with one end in the United States," and I agree with that statement.

LEVIN:

I don't think there is anything more important than that we know what is in those communications. It's important we know the extent of those communications as well.

Would you agree with that?

Can you give us an estimate as to the number of such communications which were tracked by NSA last year, just an estimate?

ROBERTS (?):

Can't do that.

HAYDEN:

Sorry. I'd be very uncomfortable doing it in open session. And I don't actually know that number.

ROBERTS:

I think that's a question, with all due respect, being the one of two here, Senator, that have been briefed, that would be better answered in a closed session.

LEVIN:

Well, Mr. Chairman, the president has said in very open session the NSA program is one that listens to a few numbers. That's what the president said. Now, we want to check on that.

ROBERTS:

It's highly minimized, I would tell the senator.

LEVIN:

No, excuse me. I would rather use these minutes, if I could, with our witnesses here.

ROBERTS:

I will grant you as much time as possible. I'm just trying to be helpful in terms of a clarification.

LEVIN:

Thank you. I would really prefer that the witnesses try to clarify this.

The president of the United States...

ROBERTS:

ROBERTS:

Well, then, I won't be helpful.

LEVIN:

May I continue, Mr. Chairman?

ROBERTS:

Certainly.

LEVIN:

Secretary Chertoff says, "If you're culling through literally thousands of phone numbers, you wind up with a huge problem managing the amount of paper."

Why is it all right for Secretary Chertoff to talk about thousands of numbers, but you can't give us, or won't give us, in open session an estimate of the number of those communications?

HAYDEN:

Senator, as I said, I'd be uncomfortable of doing it in open session, and I don't know the precise number. Your question was...

LEVIN:

I'm not saying precise number. I asked for an estimate.

HAYDEN:

I cannot give you an estimate of the number of communications intercepted.

LEVIN:

Is it a few or is it thousands?

HAYDEN:

Sir, I would be very uncomfortable talking about it in open session. I can't give you a precise...

LEVIN:

Do you know?

HAYDEN:

No, sir...

LEVIN:

I didn't ask for a precise one, General. You keep saying "precise" and I keep saying "estimate."

General Maples, do you know? Do you have an estimate?

MAPLES:

Sir, I do not.

LEVIN:

Do you know, Ambassador Negroponte? Do you have an estimate of the number of those communications?

NEGROPONTE:

No, sir, I do not.

LEVIN:

All right, now, do you have an estimate as to the number of persons who are members of Al Qaida or agents of Al Qaida or who are members of affiliated organizations to Al Qaida or their agents, because that's the test, whose communications have been intercepted, say, in the last year? Do you have an estimate of the number of persons?

NEGROPONTE:

Yes, sir, I do know that number, but I'm unable to give it in this kind of environment, sir.

LEVIN:

All right. And will you give us that, then, in closed session?

NEGROPONTE:

Sir, that's part of the briefing that I've given to the chairman and the vice chairman in great detail on multiple occasions.

LEVIN:

Will you give us that number in closed session, the rest of us that are on the Intelligence Committee?

NEGROPONTE:

I'm not at liberty to do that, sir.

LEVIN:

All right.

You know, I think the administration truly wants to have this both ways. They want to characterize the program in public -- the president says there are just a few messages that are intercepted; the head of Homeland Security says thousands of messages -- but we're not going to be given even an estimate in public.

These are the most important communications, in your words, General -- and I happen to agree with you. I happen to agree with you that there are no communications more important to the safety of this country than those affiliated with Al Qaida.

And yet the extent of those communications is denied this Congress, except for the four people that you've talked about. The estimate of the number of those communications is denied to the American people.

LEVIN:

I think that is a double standard.

I think this is another example of where the administration wants to characterize some underlying information but doesn't want to be pressed to support those public characterizations.

And I think it is a denial of -- I think basically the administration wants to be unchecked, either by a court or by the Congress.

And that's my statement. And I'm not going to ask for an answer because I got three seconds left.

You gave us the estimate -- the vice president estimated that thousands of lives have been saved by this program. General, I just want to know: Can you estimate the number of lives that have been saved by this program?

HAYDEN:

I cannot personally estimate the number of lives.

Again, Senator, as I said, this is about proving a negative. I think I mentioned in another forum that if somebody had kicked in Mohammad Atta's door in Laurel, Maryland, in July of 2001, it would still be very difficult to estimate the number of lives saved.

LEVIN:

I agree with you, but yet the vice president did that in public, and apparently there's no way to support that estimate that I know of or that you know of.

And my time is up.

ROBERTS:

I think that Senator Bond is next.

I think, as to the number of lives that have been saved, it might have been how many were on the Brooklyn Bridge if it had blown up or, for that matter, other threats that...

LEVIN:

I agree with you.

ROBERTS:

... that, you know, have been thwarted.

I take with great seriousness the questions of the distinguished senator. But basically, certain members of Congress have been informed, including the leadership.

ROBERTS:

And I realize that that does not fit the concern of the senator and others. And we will discuss that at two business meetings and see where we go with that.

The other group that is not informed as to the specific figures are members of Al Qaida.

Senator Bond?

BOND:

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Ambassador Negroponte, it's good to have you here today as the director of national intelligence, along with your key leaders, to tell us about the threats worldwide.

Although I believe that the intelligence reform legislation that created your position in 2004 was weak, at best, I'm committed to working to strengthen your position so that we have one leader in charge of our intelligence community who will be accountable, responsible and have the authority to ensure that we are far less likely to have the unfortunate intelligence efforts that preceded the disaster of September 11.

We need a strong, active intelligence community in view of today's threats, and we need a strong, active leader for that intelligence community. And I have confidence that you will be up to the task.

Secretary Rumsfeld, last week, told a number of us that what he needs most in support for fighting the war on terror is good intelligence. And my colleagues and I are committed to helping you give that to them.

Recently, I traveled to two areas of the world that I consider to be the primary fronts in the war on terror: the Middle East, Southeast Asia and the Philippines, Indonesia, Thailand, Iraq, Afghanistan and Pakistan.

All our intelligence officials to whom I talked relayed to me their grave concerns over some recent and unfortunate developments that have significantly effected their operations.

Specifically, newspaper articles concerning the alleged detention of individuals by intelligence officials, the debate and new legislative restrictions concerning interrogation techniques, and the disclosure of the NSA terrorist surveillance program have caused our leaders in the field to question the support that they believe they once had in Washington to act aggressively to pursue every lead that will defend ourselves against the next terrorist attack.

BOND:

Our leaders in the field relayed to me the difficulty they faced in assuring their intelligence sources that they and their families would be protected, particularly in view of the perception that has arisen that the United States as a nation that has little regard for classified information and leaked secrets with reckless abandon.

It's my belief that the recent developments have significantly degraded our intelligence capabilities and thus made America measurably less safe.

Furthermore, it is abhorrent to me that while we have men and women putting their lives on the line in the field -- and my son is a Marine intelligence officer in Iraq -- that some are content to play politics with our national security.

While some are thinking about scoring political points on matters of intelligence or about trying to make the current administration look bad, I believe we should be focusing on giving the best tools to our people in the field, to people like my son and others, so they can do their jobs and return home safely.

I believe we can ensure humane, effective intelligence operation consistent with our freedom-loving Americans without having to play the blame game and overreacting to isolated, aberrant incidents which should be and are being prosecuted vigorously by the government, instead handcuffing the vast majority of our honorable operators abroad.

I heard a lot of good things from our people in the field. We made tremendous progress, and Americans can be proud of what our intelligence people have done in the field.

Much of what they've done has been classified, so I hope the public will get to know about all of it. But make no mistake, the rampant leaking and uncertainty over detainees and intelligence techniques has shaken the confidence of our intelligence operators in the field.

They're forced to spend more time thinking about their own professional liability insurance and how it comes down to watching their backs rather than how to exploit every possible lead.

So my question to you, Mr. Director, and to Director Goss is: Do you agree with the assessment that I have picked up in the field?

BOND:

And if you do, how can we as members of Congress, and how will you as intelligence leaders in Washington, take necessary, decisive steps to support our people in the field with the confidence that they need to lean forward in their intelligence efforts to face the dangerous threats and not to return to risk aversion that's proven so costly to us in the past?

NEGROPONTE:

Thank you, Senator.

First of all, I agree with you that any time sensitive sources and methods are revealed in the public domain, through press stories or otherwise, that this carries with it the grave danger of prejudicing, adversely affecting our intelligence operations, and in many instances lives can be directly at stake.

And I must say that in the nine months that I've been in this job, one of the greatest disappointments that I personally have had is experiencing the degree to which people are willing to talk about classified matters to the public media. And we've got to bring that kind of activity to a stop.

What are we doing? Of course, where there are violations of security practices that take place, we are seeking to investigate them as vigorously as possible and prosecute them, if necessary.

I'll certainly ask Mr. Goss to elaborate on this.

But I think you're right. It is an issue that affects both our effectiveness and the morale of our people.

In addition to investigating and penalizing those who do carry out these kinds of leaks, I think we also have a challenge to the leadership of the intelligence community as a whole to try and reinstill -- and we're working hard on that -- reinstill a spirit of keeping secret what has to be kept secret in our work in intelligence.

But I defer to Mr. Goss.

GOSS:

Senator, thank you very much for your complimentary remarks about the men and women of the intelligence committee overseas. I will pass those along. And I agree with you, they are fully deserved. I can take great pride in associating with those people.

Secondly, I would simply say that it would be inappropriate for me to comment on motivation of leaks except as to CIA aspects of that. And we, of course, have a vibrant counterintelligence capability, which, with the cooperation of Director Mueller and others, we utilize fully.

But I would say that the consequences of these leaks -- and I'm happy to have your question to respond, and I'm sorry to tell you that the damage has been very severe to our capabilities to carry out our mission.

GOSS:

I use the words "very severe" intentionally. That is my belief and I think the evidence will show that.

When I start talking about the disruption to our plans, things that we have under way that are being disrupted because of releases to the press or public discussion; when I talk about the risk to access, the sources or methods that are no longer viable or usable or less effective by a large degree; when I talk about the erosion of confidence in our working partners overseas, I'm stung to the quick when I get questions from my professional counterparts saying, "Mr. Goss, can't you Americans keep a secret?"

That is not the kind of thing that is helpful to building relationships, to doing some of this very delicate, hard work that we have to do overseas.

As to what we're doing about it, I can assure you we have a strong internal program at the Central Intelligence Agency under way -- has been for some time -- as the director of national intelligence, Ambassador Negroponte, has said, to remind all of our employees that we are the secret agency of the agencies, that we are entrusted with that responsibility uniquely, and that the men and women who come aboard are advised of that.

So we have a program of awareness but we also have an investigation of finding out what leakage, if any, is coming out of that building. And I'm afraid there is some coming out.

I also believe that there has been an erosion of the culture of secrecy. And we're trying to reinstill that.

On the external side, I've called in the FBI, the Department of Justice.

It is my aim, and it is my hope that we will witness a grand jury investigation with reporters present being asked to reveal who is leaking this information. I believe the safety of this nation and the people of this country deserve nothing less.

And I thank you for your question.

BOND:

I thank you, Mr. Director.

ROBERTS:

Senator Feingold?

And welcome to the committee.

FEINGOLD:

Mr. Chairman and Mr. Vice Chairman, again, I'm honored to join the committee.

I sought this position for one overriding reason: We were attacked on September 11, 2001, by terrorists whom we must defeat. And I agree with the ambassador: This fight is our top national priority. And it involves not only our military power, but also our diplomatic, economic and intelligence capabilities.

And I have serious concerns about whether this administration is fighting terrorism in an effective global and comprehensive manner. By focusing so extensively on Iraq, this administration seems to be pursuing a one- or two-country strategy, when Al Qaida is actually operating in some 60 countries around the world.

So I am concerned about the terrorist threat in places like Pakistan, Somalia, and other parts of Africa, Southeast Asia and elsewhere.

And I'm concerned that the president has taken the position that he can spy on Americans without a warrant despite a clear statutory ban.

To just respond a bit to what Senator Bond said, I couldn't have any

To just respond a bit to what Senator Bond said, I couldn't have any higher regard for the need for secrecy. And I agree that it must be dispiriting for our people in the intelligence community and the military to suffer from the possibility of leaks.

But these people who are so dedicated and so brave also have the right to know that there are clear rules, that we're still operating under the rule of law, under the Bill of Rights and the Constitution. And I bet if you asked them, they'd tell you that they care a great deal about that, as well.

Mr. Ambassador, without getting into what the specific programs might be, can you assure us today that there are not other intelligence collection -- and I emphasize "collection" -- programs that you are aware of and that you are keeping from the full Intelligence Committee?

NEGROPONTE:

Senator, I don't know if I can comment on that in an open session.

FEINGOLD:

Well, we'll pursue it later today.

Let me move onto the subject that Senator Wyden brought up and that he and I have worked on together, this issue of data mining.

I sent you a letter on January 23rd requesting information about the NSA's and the intelligence community's possible use of data mining technology to analyze telephone and computer communications inside the United States.

And as I'm sure you know, there have been news reports that part of the NSA's domestic surveillance program has involved large-scale data mining of domestic communications.

I don't expect that you have the detailed answers to that letter with you here today. I just want to ask you if you would commit to me today that you will respond promptly to that letter.

NEGROPONTE:

Yes, I will. And I believe we have a response in preparation, Senator. I was advised of that before I came up to the hearing.

FEINGOLD:

Thank you.

Turning to one of the areas that we were talking about or you were talking about in your statement. In your prepared opening statement, you included a passing reference to Somalia.

The 2004 State Department terrorism report states that Al Qaida operatives there pose a, quote, "serious threat," unquote, to American interests in the region and that a lack of functioning government and protracted state of violent instability contributes to making Somalia a potential launching point for terrorist operations elsewhere.

In your view, have we committed sufficient intelligence resources to fully understanding and addressing this threat as a political solution to Somalia's problems, a necessary component of our counterterrorism strategy in that region? And if so, what are we doing to support such a solution?

NEGROPONTE:

On the first part of your question, Senator, certainly Somalia is on our radar screen, not only in the intelligence community and our diplomatic establishment, but also in Central Command.

I think it's an issue of concern as a place where there are international terrorists and to which international terrorists might gravitate if they were to suffer severe setbacks in a place like Afghanistan or Iraq.

So we're very mindful of that threat. I think we're devoting important resources to it. Although...

FEINGOLD:

Are they sufficient intelligence resources?

NEGROPONTE:

Well, they certainly are significant. You can never quite do enough. But in the order of priorities that we've got, I think we probably have it about right.

On the question of governance and whether they got a government, they've had sort of an absence of governance for the past decade.

Sometimes you see some emerging signs that they might pull together some kind of a central government. But I wouldn't hold my breath some kind of a central government. But I wouldn't hold my breath.

Obviously, if they could make improvements in their state of governance, that might make it easier to deal with the issue of international terrorism.

That, after all, is one of the theses of my testimony, that governance and these transnational threats can be related to each other.

FEINGOLD:

Thank you for your answers.

ROBERTS:

Has the senator concluded?

FEINGOLD:

My time's up. I'd be happy to keep going.

ROBERTS:

Oh, we give members at least 30 seconds.

FEINGOLD:

Great, I'll take another one.

(LAUGHTER)

The national intelligence strategy released by your office last October states -- I think, quite correctly -- that no nation can build a safer, better world alone.

FEINGOLD:

And the strategy involves, then, engaging and invigorating friendly foreign intelligence services. And you refer to that in your comments.

The strategy refers to a strategic plan for our foreign intelligence relationships, so that these relationships help us confront national security threats. I agree this is a critically important task, and it involves a broad range of policy considerations. Is this strategy being coordinated with the State Department? And will you work closely with Congress as you develop this strategy?

NEGROPONTE:

It certainly is being coordinated with the State Department. And we'd be pleased to inform the committee of the steps we've taken thus far and consult with you on the way forward.

Whenever it comes to dealing with foreign countries and institutions in those countries, our intelligence agencies work closely with the United States ambassadors there.

In addition, to assure the best possible coordination and so that we don't have a dispersion, if you will, of our effort, one of my first acts as director of national intelligence was to designate the CIA station chiefs as my representatives in those countries so that we aren't stumbling over each other out there and that we have a focal point for the coordination of intelligence relationships with foreign countries in the CIA stations.

FEINGOLD:

Thank you again.

ROBERTS:

Senator Feinstein, welcome back.

FEINSTEIN:

Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Negroponte, I just want to associate myself with the comments of our ranking member. I serve on both Judiciary as well as Intelligence, and what we have seen in the last few years is a defined and consistent stonewalling to prevent the oversight responsibilities of both committees from being carried out.

And I just want you to know that when the ranking member mentioned that part of the law creating your position also was to hold you above any political influence, I think that that is something that we feel very strongly. And I want personally to make that comment to you.

The National Security Act specifies that the executive branch shall, and I quote, "ensure that the congressional intelligence committees are kept fully and currently informed of the intelligence activities of the kept fully and currently informed of the intelligence activities of the United States, including any significant anticipated intelligence activity."

The only statutory exemption to this is for especially sensitive covert actions, which may be briefed to only eight members of Congress.

FEINSTEIN:

The administration is increasing the use of these limited briefings.

My question to you is: Who determines what information will be briefed to only eight members of Congress?

NEGROPONTE:

Senator, I take very seriously my legal obligations under the National Security Act, which requires me to keep the congressional Intelligence Committees fully and currently informed of intelligence activities to the extent consistent with the protection of sensitive intelligence sources and methods or other exceptionally sensitive matters.

FEINSTEIN:

Respectfully, sir, could you answer my question, which was who makes the decision?

NEGROPONTE:

It's the president and the vice president, Senator.

FEINSTEIN:

Thank you very much. I just wanted to know who made the decision. Thank you.

If I could move on, the intelligence reform legislation that created your position also set up an effort to finally solve some of the information-sharing problems that predated September 11.

I understand that the person appointed by the president to lead this effort, John Russack, resigned last week. I'm very concerned that this resignation will end any momentum on information-sharing that had been built up and that the state and local law enforcement will continue to lack the information that they need to find and stop terrorists.

Will the information-sharing effort meet the statutory timelines? And will Mr. Russack's departure mean a change in direction for the program?

NEGROPONTE:

Senator, I think we are striving, to the best of our ability, to meet the timelines that have been set. An interim report was sent up to the Senate late last year.

We are taking steps to ensure that this information-sharing program continues to have momentum. And you can be certain that we will give it the highest attention at the leadership of the DNI.

General Hayden, my CIO and, eventually, when we get a new program manager on board, will continue to give this issue very, very high priority.

NEGROPONTE:

And I would expect and I would hope that progress on this front will accelerate.

FEINSTEIN:

How soon do you believe you'll have someone on board?

NEGROPONTE:

I've actually identified an individual, but it's the question of clearances and just the processes that we have to go through to be able to formally bring that individual on board.

FEINSTEIN:

And do I understand by your answer that this will mean that the program will be carried out in the same direction in which it was previously?

NEGROPONTE:

I don't think this is going to have any policy implications with respect to the direction in which we've been headed respect to the direction in which we've been headed.

FEINSTEIN:

Thank you.

NEGROPONTE:

You're welcome.

FEINSTEIN:

The president has stated that the NSA warrantless electronic surveillance program has been restricted to cases where one of the members would reasonably be suspected to be an "Al Qaida link or affiliate." Those were the words that have been interchangeably used.

I have two questions on this: What does it mean to be an Al Qaida link or affiliate? How is that connection to Al Qaida defined?

And if I've been called by Osama bin Laden or somebody that we know is attached to him, I presume that NSA would call that a link to Al Qaida. But is anyone I then call linked to Al Qaida automatically, and therefore, electronically surveilled, and anyone they call then linked to Al Qaida and electronically surveilled?

NEGROPONTE:

If I may invite General Hayden...

FEINSTEIN:

Thank you, that would be fine.

General Hayden?

HAYDEN:

Yes, ma'am. Thank you.

The criteria that are used by the analysts -- and it is done by the analysts, those folks who are most knowledgeable about Al Qaida intent, behavior, communications and so on -- is that this analyst, with all the facts available to him or her at the time, OK, as a prudent person, would have reason to believe that this communicant is affiliated with Al Qaida.

That's the standard that we use. And that's the standard that's drilled into the individuals who make those kinds of decisions.

FEINSTEIN:

Thank you.

The attorney general has asserted that the president has virtually unchecked authority to protect Americans, regardless of a clear, statutory record in opposition.

That legal position would allow the president to issue other orders in the name of counterterrorism.

Has any intelligence agency been authorized to or has any agency carried out the search of the home of any American suspected to be linked to Al Qaida without a court warrant?

NEGROPONTE:

I think I'd have to defer to our law enforcement authorities on this, Senator.

FEINSTEIN:

Thank you.

Mr. Mueller?

MUELLER:

Senator, I'm not aware of that happening.

FEINSTEIN:

OK.

Has any intelligence agency arrested, detained, rendered or otherwise held any American suspected to be linked to Al Qaida without a court warrant or sufficient cause for criminal prosecution?

MUELLER:

MUELLER:

I'm sorry, Senator. Can you repeat that question for me?

FEINSTEIN:

Sure.

Has any intelligence agency been authorized to or has any agency carried out an arrest, detention rendering or otherwise held any American suspected to be linked to Al Qaida without a court warrant or sufficient cause for criminal prosecution?

MUELLER:

Well, I mean I'll give a try at first response to that.

It's a very broad question. And looking at all the components, there are occasions where, whether it be in the criminal arena, the counterterrorism arena, we make arrests on probable cause without it going through a magistrate first. Then you file up on a complaint.

And my belief -- in the instances, certainly, that I'm aware of -- we followed the procedures that are appropriate.

FEINSTEIN:

May I ask for the DNI's response, since the question had to do with intelligence agencies?

NEGROPONTE:

Yes, except it has principally -- my concern, Senator, and I've been up here today, my principal concern is with the collection and analysis of national intelligence which is used for the protection of the homeland. And I'm not aware of any such instances, I really am not.

FEINSTEIN:

I'd like to just continue on. Has any intelligence agency been authorized to or carried out the killing of anyone on U.S. soil based on a link to Al Qaida?

NEGROPONTE:

I'm not aware of such a situation, Senator.

FEINSTEIN:

Mr. Mueller?

MUELLER:

If you're looking at me, Senator, I'm certainly not aware of such a situation, speaking for the FBI.

FEINSTEIN:

My time is up.

ROBERTS:

In a word, yes.

FEINSTEIN:

Thank you.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

ROBERTS:

Mr. Wyden?

WYDEN:

Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

In open session, Director Negroponte, I wanted to ask you about oil as it relates to terrorists. Here's my concern: You go to a gas station in the United States. You pay these huge prices. A portion of that eventually finds its way to foreign governments, particularly Saudi Arabia. The Saudis hand it over to charities and the charities back door it to terrorists who want to kill law abiding Americans.

What is being done to try to deal with this, and particularly to stiffen up the Saudi effort to deal with this problem, which I think everybody understand is going on?

We're seeing oil purchases in the United States; they're in effect the terror attacks. I'd like to know what is going on with respect to forcing the Saudis to crack down on how this oil money gets to terrorists who want to kill Americans?

NEGROPONTE:

I think first of all, Senator, since some of the egregious terrorist acts that were carried out in Saudi Arabia in recent years, I think starting with 2003 forward, I think there's a much greater awareness of the international terrorist threat on the part of Saudi authorities.

NEGROPONTE:

And I think I think we've seen a really strengthened effort to deal with that situation on their part.

And so I would say that cooperation has increased. It's getting better. And we have a lot of interchange at all levels, law enforcement, intelligence and so forth.

WYDEN:

You no longer think this is a problem?

NEGROPONTE:

That was going to be my second point.

I believe there are private Saudi citizens who still engage in these kinds of donations. And I think efforts and ways have to be found to discourage that kind of activity.

And I think there are also certain designated charities and organizations where we actually identify those as ones to whom monies should not be given.

So I think it has been a problem. It's getting better. But it continues to need work.

WYDEN:

I'm going to ask you about that in private session.

One other question for you, Mr. Director.

There have been news reports this week -- there was one in Newsweek magazine -- talking about American officials being in face- to-face talks with high-level Iraqi insurgents as part of an effort to look at possible ways to get peace in the region.

My question is: Will you confirm what was in the news reports this week?

And, if you will, I particularly want to know what is being done to address the concerns that I'm sure Shia would have about any such talks.

So, one, will you confirm what it's in Newsweek magazine? And second, if this ongoing -- and I will ask you about this also in closed session as well -- what is being done, at least for the public record, to deal with what are certain to be Shia concerns about any such talks?

NEGROPONTE:

Sir, I simply don't have any comment on that story.

But as far as the question of Sunni and Shia relationships in Iraq, this is a very delicate balance, if you will. I think that any efforts to move the political process forward have got to be based on a desire to take into account all elements, Sunni and Shia included, of the Iraqi body politick.

WYDEN:

Mr. Chairman, colleagues didn't even get one round, and I appreciate you giving me these extra questions.

ROBERTS:

Senator Rockefeller?

ROCKEFELLER:

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Director, last year at this hearing, Porter Goss made the statement -- and I think this is probably the subject which is the most scary in all of this area of intelligence and international security -- that he could not assure the American people that there weren't unaccounted-for nuclear weapons or derivatives thereof that are housed in Russia. Had nuclear weapons or derivatives thereof that are housed in Russia. Had they been stolen? Had they been sold? It wasn't possible, really, to say. And I think this is a catastrophically important matter.

U.S. Department of Energy estimated that only 50 percent of the buildings that house fissile materials in Russia operate under the highest security standards.

And what I really just want to know, from either of you gentlemen, is whether you feel there has been any improvement in that area, and if we are working collaboratively -- not just Nunn-Lugar, but in other ways -- to try and decrease the number of available for purchase by terrorists, perhaps probably, these nuclear weapons or parts thereof.

NEGROPONTE:

If I could invite Director Goss to...

GOSS:

Thank you very much, Mr. Vice Chairman.

That is correct, last year you asked me if I could account for all of the unaccounted for nuclear weapons and be sure, therefore, that the terrorists did not access or could get one or had one. And I could not give you that assurance, and nor can I today.

But what I can tell you today is I'm a bit more comfortable than I was a year ago. I've had a chance to focus in on the efforts that we are making, and others are making, because this is a well- understood threat to the civilized world.

GOSS:

And I would dare say we're getting a good deal more cooperation on this subject than we were before that understanding was clear.

I would also say that this is an item that probably gets the loudest alarm bell any time our many collectors work.

So I am completely satisfied it is attended to. I am not satisfied that we have the answer that you and I both, we'd all like to have, that we are 100 percent sure, because we just aren't.

ROCKEFELLER:

But you think that the efforts not only within our own nation and its national security apparatus, but also other parts of the world, is stronger in effecting results towards diminishing that supply?

GOSS:

I believe that personally. You know, I represent a capabilities organization, but just one of 15.

From my perspective, we have got a proportionate number that is correct focused on that. And I think we are doing better.

I can't speak for the rest of the community, though.

ROCKEFELLER:

It's interesting, to do better makes me feel good, but it is until we get the whole thing solved. And, of course, that's going to take a lot of work and a lot of good faith and a lot of people.

GOSS:

If I could add, Senator, we have created an interagency effort to collect and analyze the whereabouts of fissile materials all over the world. That's ongoing on an urgent basis.

ROCKEFELLER:

And I'm glad to hear that.

Director, my final question will be to you. And that is: Do you agree with the statement that I made in my opening remarks that our committee members and our staff are routinely given access to the details of overseas signals intelligence programs that are carried out by the NSA?

GOSS:

Yes.

ROCKEFELLER:

Yes. And do you believe that it's appropriate for the committee to have a working understanding of these programs?

GOSS:

I do, yes.

ROCKEFELLER:

Why is it that -- you know, if I had to make my guess, and this is none of my business and I have no proof, and so just take it for what it's worth, that the leak which everybody is so properly concerned about probably came out of the executive branch of government. It certainly didn't come out of Chairman Roberts or Jay Rockefeller. And my guess would be somewhere in the Department of Justice. Just take that for what it's worth.

Do you really believe that fully briefing the NSA matters that we're discussing to 40 members of the Intelligence Committees in the Congress represents some kind of an unacceptable security risk?

GOSS:

Sir, we're talking about a decision that was made long before I arrived in this position.

And what I was trying to answer to Senator Feinstein earlier was that there is a history and a tradition of certain -- very small number, very limited number -- of select sensitive programs that the executive branch and president and the vice president over a period of 50 or 60 years have chosen to limit the briefings to a small select group in the Congress, such as the leadership of the Congress and the chairmanship and the vice chairman or ranking members of respective committees. And that is what has been done in this particular instance.

And that was the method that was chosen to deal with this issue. But there were extensive briefings over the lifetime of this program, I think more than 10. So I think that's how best I can answer that question.

ROCKEFELLER:

And I understand that. I'll just close with this thought: The top leadership doesn't usually go to these meetings. So you're really talking about Chairman Roberts and myself and Chairman Hoekstra and Ranking Member Harman.

ROCKEFELLER:

ROCKEFELLER:

And there may be a long history of this. I'm not aware of that. But there is no history that comports in any way to the intensity it what's happened as a result of 9/11.

I just want to make the statement that I think so much could be worked out and so many people would probably agree if we felt we were being talked to as is required by law.

The chairman, when he gave his opening statement, talked about "lawful." And I really think that the executive branch needs to think about the fact that laws are laws and you were specifically placed under a certain law and others are placed under certain laws. And forming the committee of jurisdiction is one of those laws. And it simply isn't being done in an atmosphere where it needs to be done, I think, more than ever.

In which I would disagree with Senator Bond -- this is not fair to paraphrase him -- but to say that, if people are asking questions about this, that somehow they're taking their eye off what is deemed to be the ball.

ROCKEFELLER:

And I think part of the discussion and the history and the future of all of this is going to be that the executive branch and the legislative branch have to have a working relationship that is, in fact, that fits into what the laws require.

I think you have nothing to fear from us. You have nothing to fear from the House. I think it's almost certain that whatever leaks came, came from the executive branch. And that's always going to be a problem.

But I beg you to consider what I say in deep seriousness and deep sincerity.

ROBERTS:

I think that the director of the FBI would like to respond.

MUELLER:

Senator, if I might, being a component of the Department of Justice, I want to not leave that remark. I want it addressed in terms of...

ROCKEFELLER:

I can understand that.

MUELLER:

And I'm not certain you have a basis for pointing a finger. I'm not certain what leak you're talking about. And I don't think it's fair to point a finger as to the responsibility of the leak.

So I did not want to let that go unaddressed.

ROCKEFELLER:

I understand.

ROBERTS:

We have Senator Feingold on a second round.

FEINGOLD:

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Following up on Senator Feinstein's question to Mr. Negroponte...

ROBERTS:

Oh, sir, I beg your pardon.

For some reason, I have not recognized the first round appearance of the sheriff of the always powerful Senate Agriculture Committee, Senator Chambliss.

CHAMBLISS:

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

It used to be powerful before you were chairman in the House, and we haven't recovered. But we're getting there.

(LAUGHTER)

I want to follow up on what Senator Rockefeller just said, ladies and gentlemen. This issue relative to this leak coming out of the executive department or the administration: That's a pretty serious accusation.

CHAMBLISS:

And, in fact, the only known source of any communication from the inside has come from an individual, as I understand it, who used to work in the program and is not part of the executive department.

But I have been very hesitant to talk about the fact -- and I assume I'm directing this to either you, Director Mueller or Director Goss or Director Negroponte.

I've been hesitant to talk publicly about the fact that the position of gathering intelligence and utilizing very classified and sophisticated intelligence has been compromised by not only the leak, wherever it came from, but also by the continuing highlighting of this issue in the press. And that those folks who continue to question this program, those folks who continue to go out front and talk in a negative way about this program may be aiding and abetting the terrorists. And I am extremely concerned about that.

I understand, Director Goss, that you may have addressed this in an earlier response to a question from Senator Bond. And I apologize for not being here. But I would like to ask y'all to comment on that, if you will, as to whether or not our position has been compromised, if we have lost any of our capability relative to this program as a result of the publicity surrounding it.

GOSS:

Thank you, Senator, very much.

It would only be appropriate for me to comment about those areas that I have accountability, responsibility for. And I was referring to leaks that Senator Bond had referred to that went to that area and explained at some length how damaging they have been and the steps we are taking to deal with that. And I hope they'll be successful steps.

NSA is not, obviously, in our area, and so I would prefer to yield to either Director Mueller, who has the domestic side of the argument, or the director of national intelligence, or whoever he would like to appoint to deal with the NSA aspects.

CHAMBLISS:

Sure.

HAYDEN:

Senator, it's hard for me to characterize it in open session.

But I did make the comment earlier in another environment that some people claim that somehow or another our capabilities are immune to this kind of information going out into the public domain. And I can tell you in a broad sense that is certainly not true.

NEGROPONTE:

The bad guys tend to get information that comes out of Congress or out of the American press in real time. Is that a fair statement, General Hayden?

HAYDEN:

We have been impressed with their ability, with various Web sites that are generally available, at how agile they are in responding to events in this country.

CHAMBLISS:

Director Negroponte, the Secure Border Initiative was introduced by the Department of Homeland Security in November 2005. And this is a comprehensive, multiyear plan to secure America's borders and reduce illegal immigration, which includes an increase in the number of Border Patrol agents, as well as upgrading technology used in controlling the border, increasing manned aerial assets, expanded use of UAVs and next-generation detection technology.

CHAMBLISS:

Recent reports suggests that smugglers are either disguising themselves as Mexican soldiers or may actually be members of the Mexican military. How large of a problem is protecting our borders from infiltrators who may be receiving assistance from corrupt Mexican authorities.

What is our intelligence community doing to identify those collaborators?

NEGROPONTE:

With your permission, Senator, perhaps I could invite Mr. Allen from the Department of Homeland Security to respond to that question.

ALLEN:

Thank you, Ambassador Mr. Negroponte.

Senator, on the Strategic Border Initiative, as you know, Secretary Chertoff has a number of multi-functional ways to do this, and a number of actions are under way.

I, from an intelligence perspective, am looking at this on how to strengthen our intelligence collection on all of our borders, wherever they may be.

Getting into specifics relating to any reported incidents on the border, that was something I'd prefer to talk to in a closed session.

But I can say this, that our borders are being strengthened whether by land, sea or air and whether north or south, thanks to the procedures that are being rapidly put in place under the leadership of Secretary Chertoff. I think we can take comfort that we're well on our way to taking the kind of measures that the American public really wants to see.

CHAMBLISS:

Thank you.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

ROBERTS:

It would be the hope of the chair that we could at least allow the witnesses an hour for lunch before we go to the closed session.

With that in mind, on the second round I recognize Senator Feingold.

FEINGOLD:

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I'm pleased I went after my friend Senator Chambliss, because what I'd like to say is the greatest publicizing of this NSA program that I ever heard was when I sat in front of the president of the United States the other night at the State of the Union and heard him discussing it in front of the whole world.

In fact, this is a larger effort to discuss this on a constant basis and to make it a political issue in front of the American people, so I take it his remarks would apply to that sort of conduct as well.

FEINGOLD:

Mr. Negroponte and General Hayden, following up on Senator Feinstein's question, have you defined "Al Qaida affiliate" for the purpose of warrantless NSA surveillance? Is it a term of art? How are the NSA officials guided on this?

HAYDEN:

It's a term of science, Senator. It is a specific list of affiliates. There is a burden of proof that must be met before an organization is deemed to be affiliated with Al Qaida.

And that work is overseen by the entire oversight structure that governs this program within NSA, by the I.G., the general counsel and by the Department of Justice.

FEINGOLD:

Thank you, General.

On Pakistan, Mr. Negroponte, the most recent State Department "Country Reports on Terrorism for 2004" states that Al Qaida continues to hide in Pakistan's federally administrated tribal areas of Pakistan.

Who wields power in these regions? And how has Al Qaida managed to stay there for so long? Is this region basically a terrorist sanctuary?

The report also states that Pakistan has pursued as strategy to win the support of tribes in the FATA, with a combination of negotiations and economic investments. Have the Pakistanis achieved any success in this regard?

MAPLES:

It's a tough area. It's a tough area, Senator. And it's an area that historically has sought to govern itself, if you will. It's not felt itself an integrated part of any country or nation. And a lot of people up there take the law into their own hands.

up there take the law into their own hands.

But I believe the Pakistani government has done a lot in recent times to establish a greater presence there. They've sent their military into the region, who operate with greater frequency and have taken a large number of casualties, substantial casualties, in their efforts to impose the writ of the central government.

So I think the situation there is gradually shifting, but it's proven to be a great challenge for the government of Pakistan.

But I don't doubt their commitment to fighting against international terrorists. And we've seen ample evidence of that over the past months and years.

FEINGOLD:

On Iraq, you state in your opening statement that Iraqi Sunni disaffection is the primary enabler of the insurgency. Can you just say a bit more about the range of motivations that inspire the insurgency and the extent to which it is motivated specifically by anti-coalition sentiment?

NEGROPONTE:

Well, I think the fundamental issue for those Sunnis who are not international terrorists, who are not part of Al Qaida or Zarqawi's group, has been a feeling of having been disempowered as a result of the fall of Saddam Hussein.

So I think that probably is the most significant motivation; the feeling on the part of many Sunnis that they no longer have the position of prominence in the governance of their society, of their country, that they used to have and their desire to recuperate some of that influence.

I think what we're seeing happening in Iraq is these different political forces and political groups finding the right balance between themselves that will permit their society to go forward in a peaceful manner.

And I think the electoral process and the political process that we're witnessing offers that opportunity.

FEINGOLD:

Thank you for all your answers.

And thank you, Mr. Chairman, for the addition time.

ROBERTS:

Yes, sir.

Senator Feinstein?

FEINSTEIN:

Thank you Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Negroponte, we have heard allegations that top officials in one of the technical intelligence agencies explicitly warned contractors not to talk to Congress about ongoing programs or refuse losing future contract competitions. I know this for a fact.

Are you aware of this? And does Congress have the right -- do we, as in my case, an appropriator as well as an authorizer, have the right -- to talk to the contractor of major technical programs?

NEGROPONTE:

Senator, I'm not aware of this particular situation. But if I may, I would like to know the details so that I can have a look at the matter.

FEINSTEIN:

I will be happy to give you the details. Thank you.

Last year, Admiral Loy -- who was present -- and I discussed border security, particularly the increasing problem of penetration of other than Mexicans across our borders, which are growing in numbers.

And I said at that time that I felt it was a major gateway for terrorists to access the United States.

Do you have ongoing intelligence efforts to prevent this from happening? And is there any evidence up to this point that it is, in fact, happening?

NEGROPONTE:

I'm going to invite Mr. Allen to elaborate.

But one thing I would like to say, Senator, is, of course, it's an issue that we're sensitive to.

And, secondly, my impression is that perhaps our border with Canada has, to some degree, been of a bit greater concern than that with Mexico. Although, obviously, we have to watch all of our borders very, very carefully.

But if I could ask Mr. Allen to elaborate.

ALLEN:

Yes, Senator Feinstein, we recognize this issue.

As you know, we have found a lot of individuals other than Mexicans attempting to cross our borders illegally. And under Secretary Chertoff's new policy, which is catch and return, or deport, this is having, I think, a salutary effect.

Now, this Strategic Border Initiative is new and it's only now getting fully under way. And we're very sensitive to the fact that people from other areas, from areas where we might expect to find members of Al Qaida -- we're very sensitive of that. We work extraordinarily hard on this issue.

I think terrorists are facing an increasingly challenging environment to enter our country, certainly, by air and by sea. We now need to secure our borders, and including, as Ambassador Negroponte, we need to work harder with the northern border.

FEINSTEIN:

If I might suggest to you, the numbers in the past two years have tripled. They have gone from FY '03, 49,545, to '05, 155,000. Now, these are other than Mexicans.

ALLEN:

These are other than Mexicans. We're aware of those figures.

FEINSTEIN:

So this indicates to me that whatever we're doing is not working because more are coming through than ever before.

ALLEN:

We believe we'll see a change in that in the coming months, because the catch-and-return policy, I think, will have salutary effects over time.

We really do have to work this issue a lot harder. And as was said earlier, when I answered Senator Chambliss, we're using significant new capabilities, including Border Patrolmen, but significant new advanced technologies to try to detect people entering our country, particularly in Texas and Arizona.

FEINSTEIN:

Well, thank you very much for that.

ALLEN:

Yes, ma'am.

FEINSTEIN:

Mr. Negroponte, recent media reports have spotlighted a number of activities that appear to be related to intelligence- collection or covert action, but that well may be outside of the official intelligence community's channels.

For example, military databases of suspicious activity reports, called Talons, by the counterintelligence field activity, or CIFA; and, secondly, a Pentagon program to secretly pay Iraqi newspapers to run pro-American articles.

Were these activities subject to your approval and oversight?

(UNKNOWN)

Ma'am, I don't believe that either of those activities would fall into Mr. Negroponte's area. They are Department of Defense programs, I believe.

FEINSTEIN:

Now, let me raise this problem then.

FEINSTEIN:

FEINSTEIN:

They should. We appointed you to be the person -- we didn't appoint you, but we created the legislation so that you were the person over all intelligence.

Now, I know how tough it is. But if you didn't know and you didn't give a go-ahead, it indicates to me that, for 85 percent of the budget, which is defense-related, that you're not going to have the controls that you should have.

You want to comment?

NEGROPONTE:

Well, CIFA is within the national intelligence program. But as far as specifically directing those activities, that has not risen to the level of my office and comes under the direction of the undersecretary of defense for intelligence.

My understanding, in light of the issues that have come up in the controversy and the press attention that has been given to CIFA, that Mr. Cambone has ordered a complete review of that program from top down.

FEINSTEIN:

But will you get the results of that review?

NEGROPONTE:

Yes, I will get those results.

FEINSTEIN:

Will you be able to play a decision-making role in that, or does Defense control it?

NEGROPONTE:

Well, to the extent that I have reporting to me a national counterintelligence executive and have a role in counterintelligence, yes.

FEINSTEIN:

Thank you.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

ROBERTS:

Excuse me. Let me just say that our staff has been briefed by the DOD and that I would encourage the senator to check with staff on both sides, and that we have looked at this very carefully. And I think some of the concerns that she has raised -- which, obviously, should be shared by everybody -- have been answered.

Let me just say this in closing.

ROBERTS:

First, I want to thank you for your patience. Second, we are going to welcome you to the closed session. Third, I hope you get to at least eat a sandwich.

Let me make an observation.

Since the enactment of the provision requiring the Intelligence Committees be kept fully and currently informed, that the committees and the presidents -- and I use "the presidents" in plural -- have always managed the delicate process of access to information to claim this situation is somehow different, ignores this committee's history and the text of our laws.

I know this happened under President Carter. I know this happened under President Reagan. I know this happened under President Bush One. I know this happened under President Clinton. And I know this happened under President Bush.

Basically, the law, at least in the way that I have read it, indicates that the executive has the prerogative and also has the responsibility of keeping the Congress informed. The practice, however, has been that there are certain programs that are so highly classified that they are limited to eight, i.e., the leadership of the House and Senate and also the ranking member and in this particular case the co-chair and the chair of the Intelligence Committees.

On some occasions, if it involves the military and some kind of a covert operation, the same thing applies to Armed Services and the Subcommittee on Armed Services in regard to the Subcommittee on Appropriations.

I know there is a great hue and cry that we make more people pregnant with the knowledge, and then, of course, if they're pregnant pregnant with the knowledge, and then, of course, if they're pregnant with the knowledge, they will rock the baby, as opposed to throwing it out with the bath water. But let me say that we did that.

Immediately after 9/11 we felt it was our obligation on the Intelligence Committees -- under different leadership at that particular time -- to have a joint investigation, which we did.

ROBERTS:

We even had an independent staff forcing members to come to the meeting and act is as if they were studying for a chemistry test during a study hall because we never quite knew what to expect.

Now, that's, sort of, telling tales out of school, but I didn't think that was a very helpful operation.

It wasn't any time at all with the joint committees -- and I'm not trying to perjure anybody or the committees or the intent of Congress or the integrity of Congress -- before we had the leak. Now, the leak had nothing to do with 9/11 but, boy, it sure make the headlines.

And the executive made a decision at that particular time: "I'm not going to -- or we are not going to -- to share any information or send anybody down to testify further if we have leaks of this nature."

And so the leadership of that committee, the joint committee investigation on 9/11, made a decision or agreed to the executive that there would be an FBI investigation of the committee.

At the same time, the committee was investigating the FBI's role in 9/11. So here we were in a joint committee investigating the FBI and then the FBI investigating us and asking every member of the Intelligence Committee, both House and Senate, "Would you take a lie detector test?"

I can't think of anything more ridiculous or silly. I will say as chairman of this committee that if somebody asked me to do that, my answer is no.

The result was that -- what we really needed in that group -- and I'm not comparing that particular group because I was a member of it. And then, of course, everybody said it was staff. Members always say that it's staff and I said, "That's a lot of nonsense. What we ought to do is have members, when they walk out of room, put duct tape on and have a requirement that they at least wear the duct tape for 24 hours."

Now, that was the worry that happened under this administration and previous administrations when these briefings got to a larger group.

ROBERTS:

Now, I would agree with Vice Chairman Rockefeller. I don't know of anybody on our committee, I don't know of anybody on the House committee, that would willingly or wittingly repeat any information that would be so classified that it would endanger our country.

Now my question is, however, there's been a lot of comment about the president talking about this, vice president talking about this. It was only after the leak in the New York Times -- which contained a lot of misinformation, as far as I'm concerned, about domestic spying, when we really have a threat warning capability. And that's what we're talking about. It's more of a military mission than it is any kind of a criminal proceeding under FISA.

And FISA, by the way, is outdated in regards to its context with both the threat and the technology.

And were we to do that, we would lose not only minutes, but hours or days, when we have a threat that may happen immediately.

And it would be an amazing thing to me that, if we had another attack, the very people that are doing all the questioning now would be having you all back up and say, "How come you didn't know?"

My question is basically to General Hayden: What happens if you lose this capability, General?

HAYDEN:

It's proven to be a very valuable tool for that which it was intended: to detect and prevent attacks inside the United States, Senator.

And you're right about the firestorm of misinformation that seemed to follow day after day after the original leak was reported in the New York Times.

I've spoken to this committee -- I think it was in this room -- in October of 2002, talking about the line between liberty and security and how that had to be an informed debate by the American people so that we're all comfortable about that line.

And there was so inaccurate information, misinformation and misunderstanding out there that what was appearing in the press wasn't informing a debate; it was horribly misshaping it.

And I don't see how we as a free people can make a decision in that

And I don't see how we as a free people can make a decision in that way.

ROBERTS:

Well, I really regret that situation as happening, and I know that it is understandable both on the majority side and the minority side that we have differences of opinion and unfortunately the climate in the Congress today then is to ascribe politics as the reason for that.

I really think people have strong differences of opinion, but fortunately or unfortunately in regards of the number of people who are briefed, I think it's basically on the lack of information, and the lack of information in regard to exactly what this program is.

I cannot imagine how anybody who would be receiving a call from a terrorist cell, where we have reason to believe that they are going to attack the United States and that person happened to be in the United States, that they would think their civil liberty was being violated if some intelligence or law enforcement person was not monitoring that call. It would be indefensible if we did not.

And in addition, I would only point out that you really don't have any civil liberties if you are dead.

The only other thing that I would say is that I want to thank you again, all of you, for your dedication, your perseverance, for keeping this country safe, as opposed to some who obviously are more worried about you people, apparently, than some people who where we are at war and where we have a threat and where we have plots against the United States, and where with we have sleeper cells in the United States, and it could happen any moment. Thank God we have this capability.

This hearing is concluded.

ROCKEFELLER:

I need to respond, Mr. Chairman.

ROBERTS:

You may respond.

ROCKEFELLER:

Let me just ask a question first to the director.

Is the NSA program a covert action program as defined by the National Security Act?

NEGROPONTE:

I don't believe so, sir, no.

ROCKEFELLER:

That's what we were told yesterday by the Justice -- folks from Justice -- it is not.

Now, as to the horror of people wanting to do things both rigorously, aggressively, using intelligence as in every possible way that we can, it does not subtract, however, from two other concepts which have kept our nation viable for many, many, many years.

ROCKEFELLER:

And that is that we do things under the law. We do them under the law.

Secondly, I would make -- and I've made this point many time to the chairman; we've talked about it -- there is an instinct readily grabbed upon by some, that when we ask questions about the largest NSA program in history, that somehow we are attacking you gentlemen and ladies.

Nothing could be further from the truth because the instructions or whatever come from elsewhere. That's been stipulated.

It is simply important that, in a democracy, that we understand there are three branches of government.

I spend an enormous amount of my time -- the chairman is leaving -- an enormous amount of my time, well over three-quarters, working exclusively on this subject in great depth, with great intensity. I do a lot of traveling and meet the same intelligence folks that Senator Saxby Chambliss was talking about and Kit Bond, I guess it was.

But you cannot equate, and you should not equate, asking questions, where we are meant to be informed by law as Intelligence Committees and we are not, for pursuing that effort. Because to do otherwise is to say that there's no reason for these committees to exist and that we should disband the committees, which I'm not for doing.

But do not kid yourselves, gentlemen and ladies, that the so- called -- as is often said, that the chairman and the ranking member of each of as is often said, that the chairman and the ranking member of each of the committees are fully briefed and therefore everything is fine.

ROCKEFELLER:

That's not the way it works. That's not the way those meetings work. And General Hayden knows that. They don't last long enough, the flip charts are extensive, and everybody is in a hurry. The leadership usually doesn't come. Chairman Roberts and I do come, as well as the House members.

Four people out of 535, therefore, know about the most extensive and aggressive NSA effort in the history of this country.

I am strongly for the goals, but I want it to be done under the law. And so should you. That's what keeps our country together.

Thank you.

NEGROPONTE:

If I may just -- one sentence, Senator.

I know the attorney general will address this next week, but we believe that all these activities are being undertaken in full compliance with our Constitution and with the laws of our country. And that is an oath that each and every one of us at this table have undertaken.

ROBERTS:

Mr. Director, I asked you to make a very comprehensive statement covering all the threats that you think endanger our country, not only for the committee but for those listening, all the citizens of the United States. You have done that in a very comprehensive report.

ROBERTS:

It is my understanding, under the Geneva Convention, under the heading of "cruel and inhumane punishment for congressional hearings that last for more than two hours," and prior to questioning, that it would be the thing to do to declare a five-minute break, which we will do. And we will resume immediately at the five-minute mark to start our questions.

(RECESS)

ROBERTS:

Each member will be granted five minutes and we will do a second round, if necessary. And we have a closed session at 2:30.

Mr. Director, I asked last year the committee staff to be very proactive in trying to examine the intelligence community's capabilities to collect and analyze against very hard targets -- I'm talking about Iran, North Korea, China -- on the problem of terrorism and also proliferation.

They are very difficult -- I don't have to tell anybody on the panel about that -- and important intelligence targets, none so more than terrorism.

We've been engaged on these problems, but I also think, as the DNI, you are the person most responsible for assessing and improving the I.C.'s intelligence capabilities.

I would like to hear briefly your impressions of our community's intelligence capabilities to target terrorists when you became the director of DNI, what you've done since, more especially those hard targets that are so hard to penetrate.

NEGROPONTE:

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

In brief, the hard targets that you mentioned -- terrorism, proliferation, some of the countries that we were talking about during my testimony, Iran and North Korea -- countries that we were talking about during my testimony, Iran and North Korea have the highest collection priority throughout the intelligence community.

NEGROPONTE:

We're embarked on a vigorous plan, directed by the president a year or so ago, to increase our analytical and collection capability at the CIA and in other agencies.

And in addition to that, upon the recommendation of the Robb- Silberman report and the WMD commission, we have created mission managers for the hard-target areas. So we now have a mission manager for North Korea, we have a mission manager for Iran, and so forth. And those intelligence officials are empowered to bring together the entire intelligence community and work in a collaborative basis to give those difficult issues the attention they deserve.

Now, I don't want to leave you with the illusion that this is any easier a problem as a result of these efforts. But I want to reassure you that we are working very, very hard on this question of penetrating the hard targets. And I'm satisfied that we're making progress.

ROBERTS:

Especially in regard to the increase in reference to human intelligence?

NEGROPONTE:

Yes. That is a very important area of emphasis.

And I would say, yes, there's been a substantial effort in that area, both to increase the penetration of the targets and also to increase the base of our capabilities, increase recruitment into our human intelligence services.

ROBERTS:

All right.

Throwing great fear into my staff, and then I'm going to wing you a question as opposed to one that's prepared -- Ms. Rodley, you do a great job over there at INR. INR usually comes up with a little bit different viewpoint. That's healthy.

Mr. Allen, you are a veteran in the intelligence community and certainly have a great degree of expertise. You were over at Homeland Security, the newest of the agencies that has come under a lot of criticism.

My question is to both of you: Do you know what each other of you are doing in regard to an everyday kind of situation?

And I would apply that to General Maples with the DIA and General Hayden in regard to what you're doing, unless other factors shut you down, which I hope is not the case.

And then you have the DNI here with working groups that you're supposed to coordinate that. And Mr. Goss, who will be before the committee very quickly to go over his tenure at the CIA.

And we worry about loss of certain capabilities, as well as I worry about the loss of the capability that the former NSA director had.

And then, Mr. Mueller, if we pass the Patriot Act, if we don't re-erect these walls, I know that you want to basically state, as Ronald Reagan did, you know, "Congress, tear down these walls."

ROBERTS:

So we're going to try to do that.

But my question is, the information access, where all of you share this information, and then it is funneled into the National Counterterrorism Threat Center so we have a better analytical picture, if you will, the jigsaw puzzle or, say, connecting the dots, do you feel in terms of information access that you are making progress?

We hear down at the center that's there's one computer on somebody's desk and then eight others underneath somebody else's desk. Where are we on that?

And I'll ask the director.

NEGROPONTE:

First of all, I do think that, to the extent that they need to know it and to the extent that we're all working against a common enemy here, I believe the effort is more integrated than it was before. And I think they do know what each other are doing in this core area of interest.

As far as the integration of information at the National Counterterrorism Center, I think that's working apace. And one of my significant priorities during the past year has been to build that center up, give it a permanent leadership, grow its staff, which we are doing, so that it can meet the responsibilities that it has to carry out.

We also have now got a senatorially confirmed chief information officer and also a information-sharing executive. And those officials are working together to improve the information-sharing environment across the intelligence community.

But I believe, Senator, that it's better than it was previously. And I think that the dots are being connected.

Can more be done? Yes, to be sure, but we're working on it.

ROBERTS:

So Charlie Allen's left hand knows what Ms. Rodley's right hand is doing.

NEGROPONTE:

Well, when it relates to a problem that they're both commonly concerned with. But I'd be happy to let them answer that.

ROBERTS:

That's terrorism. At any rate, thank you for that answer, and I'm glad we're making progress.

Senator Rockefeller?

ROCKEFELLER:

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Director, in Buffalo, New York, on April 20, 2004, I would say only two years ago, the president of the United States made the following statement.

He said, "Any time you hear the United States government talking about wiretaps it requires" -- then he paused -- "a wiretap requires a court order. Nothing has changed, by the way. When we're talking about chasing down terrorists, we're talking about getting a court order before we do so." That was the end of that phrase.

My question to you, sir: Was that statement factually accurate when the president made it?

NEGROPONTE:

Senator, as the chairman said earlier, there's going to be both a briefing by Judge Gonzales to the Judiciary Committee next week as well as a briefing in closed session by Judge Gonzales and General Hayden to the committee thereafter where I think that this question can be thoroughly discussed.

NEGROPONTE:

But let me say this about the terrorist surveillance program.

This is a program that was ordered by the president of the United States with respect to international telephone calls to or from suspected Al Qaida operatives and their affiliates. It was, therefore, ordered in the interest of protecting our nation against ongoing terrorist threat.

This was not about domestic surveillance. It was about dealing with the international terrorist threat in the most agile and effective way possible.

But I don't think I want to go into the question any further than that in an open hearing.

ROCKEFELLER:

Well, we may have more time to talk this afternoon, then.

Mr. Director, the vice president has stated that the NSA domestic surveillance program has saved, quote, "thousands of lives." Do you agree with that statement? Are you prepared to explain the basis for this claim? Or if you feel that you cannot talk in public, would you be willing to talk in closed session this afternoon about that?

NEGROPONTE:

Certainly it's been an effective and important program in dealing with the terrorist threat, which, as I mentioned this morning in my testimony is the most important -- the international terrorist threat is the most important threat faced by the United States here in the homeland and to its interests abroad.

If I may, I might, with your permission, Senator, ask General Hayden to elaborate somewhat in reply to the question that you have just directed to me.

ROCKEFELLER:

General?

HAYDEN:

Thank you, Senator.

What I've said before is that the program has been successful; that we have learned information from this program that would not otherwise have been available. This information has helped detect and prevent terrorist attacks in the United States and abroad.

The underlying basis of your question, though, Senator is to put us in a position of proving a negative: proving that, if we hadn't done this, if we hadn't had this knowledge, if these steps hadn't been taken, if these actions had not taken place, that something else would not have happened. That's very difficult to prove in a strict linear sense.

ROCKEFELLER:

General, I don't want to interrupt, but I only have a little short time left.

It was the vice president that I was quoting, not myself.

This is to Director Mueller. And good morning to you, sir.

A January 17 New York Times article quotes former and current FBI officials as saying that the bureau was inundated with leads from the NSA domestic surveillance program that required hundreds of investigators to check out thousands of tips a month.

According to officials quoted in the article, the information from the NSA program had uncovered no active Al Qaida networks inside the United States planning attacks.

Now, the president, General Hayden and others have been very clear in their public statements that the NSA program collects information only against known Al Qaida terrorists and their associates.

Without getting into classified specifics, can you confirm to the committee that the investigative leads forwarded by the NSA to the FBI related only to known Al Qaida terrorists and their associates?

MUELLER:

Let me answer that part of the question I feel I can answer, Senator. And that relates to leads that come from the NSA.

We get a number of leads from the NSA from a number of programs, including the program that's under discussion today.

MUELLER:

And I can say that leads from that program have been valuable in identifying would-be terrorists in the United States, individuals who were providing material support to terrorists.

But we get any number of leads. Most leads that we get, whether it be from NSA or overseas, from the CIA, ultimately turn out not to be valid or worthwhile. But in our view, any lead from any source, any legitimate source, is a lead that has to be pursued, and we pursue each one and every one of them.

ROCKEFELLER:

My time is up, and I thank you.

ROBERTS:

Senator Wyden?

WYDEN:

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Director, you didn't mention Vanuatu, an island nation in the South Pacific, but you seemed to cover everywhere else, and I welcome you.

To me, just because effective intelligence-gathering requires a high degree of secrecy, the Bush administration can't be excused from reasonable standards of accountability. So I have essentially two questions to start with with respect to accountability.

When it has been determined that an American monitored under the NSA eavesdropping program is no longer a threat, what is done with the information collected on that U.S. person, Mr. Director?

NEGROPONTE:

Sir, again, I don't think in this context...

WYDEN:

Are there restrictions on how that information is used?

NEGROPONTE:

Let me give you a general reply which I think goes to your question.

NEGROPONTE:

Whether you're talking about one program or another with respect to NSA, those programs are under the strictest possible oversight. They are reviewed legally with the greatest of care. There are very senior managers involved in their administration.

And as far as American persons or American individuals are concerned, protections are taken, should their names come up in various kinds of intelligence that is collected, to minimize and protect their identities.

This has been a standard procedure of the NSA for the many, many years that it's been in its existence.

General Hayden may want to amplify.

WYDEN:

Mr. Director, that answer isn't good enough for me. That answer is essentially: "Trust us. The Congress and the public just have to trust us."

And Ronald Reagan put it very well. He said, "Trust, but verify."

And we have no way to verify that citizens are being protected the way you have outlined today.

Now maybe, General Hayden, you want to add to that.

HAYDEN:

Sir, I'll just add very quickly: This is lawfully acquired signals intelligence. And the body of regulations under which NSA operates day in and day out, in terms of protecting U.S. privacy, in terms of protecting information to, from or about a U.S. person, apply to the use, retention and destruction of that data.

WYDEN:

General, there are virtually no rules on data-mining. You and I have gone into this. This has been documented by government auditors. We'll talk more about it privately.

Mr. Director, is it correct that when John Poindexter's program, Operation Total Information Awareness, was closed, that several of Mr. Poindexter's projects were moved to various intelligence agencies?

NEGROPONTE:

I don't know the answer to that question.

WYDEN:

Do any of the other panel members know?

The press has reported intelligence officials saying that those programs run by Mr. Poindexter, I and others on this panel led the effort to close it, we want to know if Mr. Poindexter's programs are going on somewhere else. Can someone answer that?

Poindexter's programs are going on somewhere else. Can anyone answer that?

Mr. Mueller?

MUELLER:

I have no knowledge of that, sir.

WYDEN:

Any other panel members?

(UNKNOWN)

Senator, I'd like to answer in closed session.

WYDEN:

All right. I will be asking that question in closed session.

The last question I wanted to ask on this round, Mr. Director, deals with Iran: very obviously a serious, serious threat.

Some frame this as a choice between either bombing the Iranians or essentially the kind of pitter-patter that goes on at the U.N. Some have set it up as those are the choices.

I'm wondering about whether there are other options, particularly economic sanctions. And the one that I would be interested in your thoughts on is the idea of freezing new foreign investment in Iran and whether you think freezing new foreign investment in Iran would cut off some of the money that they use for their dangerous weapons capability.

NEGROPONTE:

Sir, my focus is, of course, on -- our focus, the intelligence community, is on evaluating the threat, the military threat, the political threat and so forth.

So as far as recommendations of a particular option with respect to policy, I think you've really moved -- the question really goes more into the area of what policy-makers might wish to do.

NEGROPONTE:

But what I would say is, clearly, Iran is a part of the international community.

It has important economic relationships, whether it's in the oil sector or through imports or through reliance, to a certain degree on foreign investment.

And, to the extent that its behavior might ultimately bring about some curtailment of those economic activities, that, presumably, is one of the factors that Iran has to consider as it goes about deciding its policies.

WYDEN:

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

ROBERTS:

We will now go to Senator Warner with the exception that I would say that perhaps the members could direct their questions to threats faced by our nation other than the threats that some seem to think are posed by the members of the panel.

Senator Warner?

WARNER:

Mr. Chairman, thank you very much.

I would like to commend you, Mr. Negroponte, for your statement. It was very thorough and comprehensive.

And I've had the privilege of sitting here for many, many years listening to statements and I would rank yours at the very top. I think it reflects the conscious effort that you're making to fulfill this brand new challenge, and I hope that it is working to your satisfaction.

Is it likely that you will come before the Congress for any refinements in the existing law in this session?

NEGROPONTE:

I don't believe so, Senator, unless there's some technical amendment of some kind that we might seek.

But, as far as more substantive ones, my view, and I mentioned this to the committee earlier during my confirmation hearings, I think I ought to deal with the law as it has been passed, play the cards that we've been dealt, so to speak, and see how it works out.

I haven't run into any significant roadblocks. I think we're working well together.

I haven't run into any significant roadblocks. I think we're working well together. General Hayden has pulled together a program managers council of all the 15 that meets twice a month. I think we're working through the various issues that the Congress directed us to work through.

But, obviously, if we run into issues that might require legislation in the future, I wouldn't hesitate to bring them up.

WARNER:

And I think you've forged a respectful and strong working relationship with the Central Intelligence Agency under its leadership, which we all admire.

NEGROPONTE:

Yes, sir.

WARNER:

Could we put this for the record? I see a lot of smiles and bowing of heads.

ROBERTS:

You can't record smiles on the record.

NEGROPONTE:

We have an excellent relationship, Mr. Chairman, and we meet frequently and speak over the phone even more frequently...

WARNER:

Mr. Goss, I think you should be on the record on that, also.

GOSS:

I'm pleased to be on the record, Senator, to echo exactly those remarks. We have a great working relationship.

WARNER:

Let me turn to General Maples. I've had a great deal of respect for you personally in your distinguished career, and now from the intelligence standpoint. You're primarily responsible for the security situation in Iraq and Afghanistan, and elsewhere in the world.

Just a historical reference: The actions taken by our government, together with coalition forces in Iraq initially were the defeat of Saddam Hussein's military forces, which was successfully done in a very short period. There followed this insurgency, which slowly evolved. And then it became a very, very significant situation that appears now to still be substantial, but contained and being handled by the coalition forces.

A third composition of problems is growing -- and it's of great concern to me -- and that is the combination of the criminal elements, which are growing -- the corruption, the payoffs, the graft. All of this is just, in a sense, overlaying the courageous work of coalition forces, together with the Iraqi forces and the people through their elections. It's almost like it's pushing Iraq down into a morass.

A lot of the activities of the coalition forces, particularly the U.S. forces now, is directly or indirectly dealing with these situations.

I've been told, through my sources, that if you were to quantify it, the criminal corruption problem is now -- equates to the seriousness of the insurgency problem.

WARNER:

Would you have a view on that?

MAPLES:

Thank you, Senator, for your question. I would -- directly responding, I'm not sure that the level of criminal engagement is at the level of the insurgency, but I think it's a very serious problem.

And I see that a great deal of the violence that we are experiencing in Iraq today does have a relation to a criminal element, as opposed to an insurgent element with a political purpose. I think that we see that in numerous attacks, particularly on contracting vehicles within the economy. We see individuals who are being paid very low sums of money to place, for instance, IEDs without a political purpose, but because they receive remuneration for doing that and becoming essentially a part of the insurgency. So I do see...

WARNER:

Thank you. I want to get one further question in. You've documented the response.

Mr. Ambassador, you said a key to establishing effective governments and security over the next three to five years is enhanced Sunni Arab political participation and a growing perception among Sunnis that the political process is addressing their interests growing perception among Sunnis that the political process is addressing their interests. In a sense, that's to try and bring about a unit government of the three principal factions, and it is essential to have that foundation in place.

We're now watching the new government begin to take the reins. It's a little early to make any judgments. But this is a critical time. And we have a very capable U.S. ambassador there, functioning in many ways.

What is the leverage we can have over a sovereign nation, like Iraq, to bring about this conclusion that you've put in here, which is essential to the future success of the coalition of nations that have expended so much life and blood and treasure to give the Iraqi people back their nation?

NEGROPONTE:

First, Senator, I think with respect to Sunni participation, I've been encouraged by recent developments. I was particularly encouraged last fall when one million more Sunnis registered to vote in the constitutional referendum than had been registered for the January 30 election last year.

So that to me was a sign of their increased participation; then the fact that they didn't boycott the election; and then, following that in the Al Anbar Province, which is the most predominantly Sunni province in the country, had a very high degree of participation in the elections that took place on December 15.

So I think all of that is a sign that some Sunnis, at least, are moving away from the course of violence to achieve their political aims and are opting for the pursuit of political solutions and outcomes.

So this is to the good. And I think now we have to find ways -- we, that is the Iraqi government and ourselves -- have to find ways of taking advantage of it.

What's the leverage that we got? Well, of course we're a good, supportive friend of the government of Iraq. We have 130,000 troops there. And we have a massive economic reconstruction and assistance program.

So I think that, working in partnership with our Iraqi friends, I think we can dialogue effectively with them about their political process, although we have to recognize that, ultimately, the shape that their political process is going to take depends ultimately on their own decisions.

WARNER:

That's true. And our president, in the State of the Union, was absolutely consistent on message about our determination to see this through. But there has to be limitations. And that government, as it's coming in to being, has to recognize that there are some limitations.

NEGROPONTE:

I agree with that.

WARNER:

That's got to be made clear to them. They cannot sit there and dither away and put into those particular ministries -- homeland security, defense and otherwise -- persons who really don't measure up to the capabilities required for the functioning government that they need.

NEGROPONTE:

I agree, and I think our ambassador and our commander of our forces in Iraq are both very effective at conveying those kinds of messages.

WARNER:

Good.

Mr. Goss, do you have a view on that?

GOSS:

Senator, thank you. I do, and I certainly agree.

I will assure you that as much as I can say in open session -- I would like to reinforce in closed session on that point -- and it's simply this: I agree with your observation that the security elements of that country are going to be vital to the opportunity for the institutions of democracy and freedom to flourish, and having the good people who can work in a non-politicized or a non-sectarian way is going to be essential. And I think you've put your finger on exactly a critical point.

WARNER:

I thank you.

Mr. Chairman, I believe my time is up.

ROBERTS:

That is correct.

Senator Levin?

LEVIN:

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

General Hayden, you made a lengthy speech at the National Press Club about the program that the president authorized in terms that involved surveillance of communications of American citizens.

And this is what you said -- one of the things you said in your speech, "that there are no communications more important to the safety of this country than those affiliated with Al Qaida, with one end in the United States," and I agree with that statement.

LEVIN:

I don't think there is anything more important than that we know what is in those communications. It's important we know the extent of those communications as well.

Would you agree with that?

Can you give us an estimate as to the number of such communications which were tracked by NSA last year, just an estimate?

ROBERTS (?):

Can't do that.

HAYDEN:

Sorry. I'd be very uncomfortable doing it in open session. And I don't actually know that number.

ROBERTS:

I think that's a question, with all due respect, being the one of two here, Senator, that have been briefed, that would be better answered in a closed session.

LEVIN:

Well, Mr. Chairman, the president has said in very open session the NSA program is one that listens to a few numbers. That's what the president said. Now, we want to check on that.

ROBERTS:

It's highly minimized, I would tell the senator.

LEVIN:

No, excuse me. I would rather use these minutes, if I could, with our witnesses here.

ROBERTS:

I will grant you as much time as possible. I'm just trying to be helpful in terms of a clarification.

LEVIN:

Thank you. I would really prefer that the witnesses try to clarify this.

The president of the United States...

ROBERTS:

Well, then, I won't be helpful.

LEVIN:

May I continue, Mr. Chairman?

ROBERTS:

Certainly.

LEVIN:

Secretary Chertoff says, "If you're culling through literally thousands of phone numbers, you wind up with a huge problem managing the amount of paper."

Why is it all right for Secretary Chertoff to talk about thousands of numbers, but you can't give us, or won't give us, in open session an estimate of the number of those communications?

HAYDEN:

HAYDEN:

Senator, as I said, I'd be uncomfortable of doing it in open session, and I don't know the precise number. Your question was...

LEVIN:

I'm not saying precise number. I asked for an estimate.

HAYDEN:

I cannot give you an estimate of the number of communications intercepted.

LEVIN:

Is it a few or is it thousands?

HAYDEN:

Sir, I would be very uncomfortable talking about it in open session. I can't give you a precise...

LEVIN:

Do you know?

HAYDEN:

No, sir...

LEVIN:

I didn't ask for a precise one, General. You keep saying "precise" and I keep saying "estimate."

General Maples, do you know? Do you have an estimate?

MAPLES:

Sir, I do not.

LEVIN:

Do you know, Ambassador Negroponte? Do you have an estimate of the number of those communications?

NEGROPONTE:

No, sir, I do not.

LEVIN:

All right, now, do you have an estimate as to the number of persons who are members of Al Qaida or agents of Al Qaida or who are members of affiliated organizations to Al Qaida or their agents, because that's the test, whose communications have been intercepted, say, in the last year? Do you have an estimate of the number of persons?

NEGROPONTE:

Yes, sir, I do know that number, but I'm unable to give it in this kind of environment, sir.

LEVIN:

All right. And will you give us that, then, in closed session?

NEGROPONTE:

Sir, that's part of the briefing that I've given to the chairman and the vice chairman in great detail on multiple occasions.

LEVIN:

Will you give us that number in closed session, the rest of us that are on the Intelligence Committee?

NEGROPONTE:

I'm not at liberty to do that, sir.

LEVIN:

All right

All right.

You know, I think the administration truly wants to have this both ways. They want to characterize the program in public -- the president says there are just a few messages that are intercepted; the head of Homeland Security says thousands of messages -- but we're not going to be given even an estimate in public.

These are the most important communications, in your words, General -- and I happen to agree with you. I happen to agree with you that there are no communications more important to the safety of this country than those affiliated with Al Qaida.

And yet the extent of those communications is denied this Congress, except for the four people that you've talked about. The estimate of the number of those communications is denied to the American people.

LEVIN:

I think that is a double standard.

I think this is another example of where the administration wants to characterize some underlying information but doesn't want to be pressed to support those public characterizations.

And I think it is a denial of -- I think basically the administration wants to be unchecked, either by a court or by the Congress.

And that's my statement. And I'm not going to ask for an answer because I got three seconds left.

You gave us the estimate -- the vice president estimated that thousands of lives have been saved by this program. General, I just want to know: Can you estimate the number of lives that have been saved by this program?

HAYDEN:

I cannot personally estimate the number of lives.

Again, Senator, as I said, this is about proving a negative. I think I mentioned in another forum that if somebody had kicked in Mohammad Atta's door in Laurel, Maryland, in July of 2001, it would still be very difficult to estimate the number of lives saved.

LEVIN:

I agree with you, but yet the vice president did that in public, and apparently there's no way to support that estimate that I know of or that you know of.

And my time is up.

ROBERTS:

I think that Senator Bond is next.

I think, as to the number of lives that have been saved, it might have been how many were on the Brooklyn Bridge if it had blown up or, for that matter, other threats that...

LEVIN:

I agree with you.

ROBERTS:

... that, you know, have been thwarted.

I take with great seriousness the questions of the distinguished senator. But basically, certain members of Congress have been informed, including the leadership.

ROBERTS:

And I realize that that does not fit the concern of the senator and others. And we will discuss that at two business meetings and see where we go with that.

The other group that is not informed as to the specific figures are members of Al Qaida.

Senator Bond?

BOND:

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Ambassador Negroponte, it's good to have you here today as the director of national intelligence, along with your key leaders, to tell us about the threats worldwide.

Although I believe that the intelligence reform legislation that created your position in 2004 was weak, at best, I'm committed to working to strengthen your position so that we have one leader in charge of our intelligence community who will be accountable, responsible and have the authority to ensure that we are far less likely to have the unfortunate intelligence efforts that preceded the disaster of September 11.

We need a strong, active intelligence community in view of today's threats, and we need a strong, active leader for that intelligence community. And I have confidence that need a strong, active leader for that intelligence community. And I have confidence that you will be up to the task.

Secretary Rumsfeld, last week, told a number of us that what he needs most in support for fighting the war on terror is good intelligence. And my colleagues and I are committed to helping you give that to them.

Recently, I traveled to two areas of the world that I consider to be the primary fronts in the war on terror: the Middle East, Southeast Asia and the Philippines, Indonesia, Thailand, Iraq, Afghanistan and Pakistan.

All our intelligence officials to whom I talked relayed to me their grave concerns over some recent and unfortunate developments that have significantly effected their operations.

Specifically, newspaper articles concerning the alleged detention of individuals by intelligence officials, the debate and new legislative restrictions concerning interrogation techniques, and the disclosure of the NSA terrorist surveillance program have caused our leaders in the field to question the support that they believe they once had in Washington to act aggressively to pursue every lead that will defend ourselves against the next terrorist attack.

BOND:

Our leaders in the field relayed to me the difficulty they faced in assuring their intelligence sources that they and their families would be protected, particularly in view of the perception that has arisen that the United States as a nation that has little regard for classified information and leaked secrets with reckless abandon.

It's my belief that the recent developments have significantly degraded our intelligence capabilities and thus made America measurably less safe.

Furthermore, it is abhorrent to me that while we have men and women putting their lives on the line in the field -- and my son is a Marine intelligence officer in Iraq -- that some are content to play politics with our national security.

While some are thinking about scoring political points on matters of intelligence or about trying to make the current administration look bad, I believe we should be focusing on giving the best tools to our people in the field, to people like my son and others, so they can do their jobs and return home safely.

I believe we can ensure humane, effective intelligence operation consistent with our freedom-loving Americans without having to play the blame game and overreacting to isolated, aberrant incidents which should be and are being prosecuted vigorously by the government, instead handcuffing the vast majority of our honorable operators abroad.

I heard a lot of good things from our people in the field. We made tremendous progress, and Americans can be proud of what our intelligence people have done in the field.

Much of what they've done has been classified, so I hope the public will get to know about all of it. But make no mistake, the rampant leaking and uncertainty over detainees and intelligence techniques has shaken the confidence of our intelligence operators in the field.

They're forced to spend more time thinking about their own professional liability insurance and how it comes down to watching their backs rather than how to exploit every possible lead.

So my question to you, Mr. Director, and to Director Goss is: Do you agree with the assessment that I have picked up in the field?

BOND:

And if you do, how can we as members of Congress, and how will you as intelligence leaders in Washington, take necessary, decisive steps to support our people in the field with the confidence that they need to lean forward in their intelligence efforts to face the dangerous threats and not to return to risk aversion that's proven so costly to us in the past?

NEGROPONTE:

Thank you, Senator.

First of all, I agree with you that any time sensitive sources and methods are revealed in the public domain, through press stories or otherwise, that this carries with it the grave danger of prejudicing, adversely affecting our intelligence operations, and in many instances lives can be directly at stake.

And I must say that in the nine months that I've been in this job, one of the greatest disappointments that I personally have had is experiencing the degree to which people are willing to talk about classified matters to the public media. And we've got to bring that kind of activity to a stop.

What are we doing? Of course, where there are violations of security practices that take place, we are seeking to investigate them as vigorously as possible and prosecute them, if necessary.

I'll certainly ask Mr. Goss to elaborate on this.

But I think you're right. It is an issue that affects both our effectiveness and the morale of our people.

In addition to investigating and penalizing those who do carry out these kinds of leaks, I think we also have a challenge to the leadership of the intelligence community as a whole to try and reinstill -- and we're working hard on that -- reinstill a spirit of keeping secret what has to be kept secret in our work in intelligence.

But I defer to Mr. Goss.

GOSS:

Senator, thank you very much for your complimentary remarks about the men and women of the intelligence committee overseas. I will pass those along. And I agree with you, they are fully deserved. I can take great pride in associating with those people.

Secondly, I would simply say that it would be inappropriate for me to comment on motivation of leaks except as to CIA aspects of that. And we, of course, have a vibrant counterintelligence capability, which, with the cooperation of Director Mueller and others, we utilize fully.

But I would say that the consequences of these leaks -- and I'm happy to have your question to respond, and I'm sorry to tell you that the damage has been very severe to our capabilities to carry out our mission.

GOSS:

I use the words "very severe" intentionally. That is my belief and I think the evidence will show that.

When I start talking about the disruption to our plans, things that we have under way that are being disrupted because of releases to the press or public discussion; when I talk about the risk to access, the sources or methods that are no longer viable or usable or less effective by a large degree; when I talk about the erosion of confidence in our working partners overseas, I'm stung to the quick when I get questions from my professional counterparts saying, "Mr. Goss, can't you Americans keep a secret?"

That is not the kind of thing that is helpful to building relationships, to doing some of this very delicate, hard work that we have to do overseas.

As to what we're doing about it, I can assure you we have a strong internal program at the Central Intelligence Agency under way -- has been for some time -- as the director of national intelligence, Ambassador Negroponte, has said, to remind all of our employees that we are the secret agency of the agencies, that we are entrusted with that responsibility uniquely, and that the men and women who come aboard are advised of that.

So we have a program of awareness but we also have an investigation of finding out what leakage, if any, is coming out of that building. And I'm afraid there is some coming out.

I also believe that there has been an erosion of the culture of secrecy. And we're trying to reinstill that.

On the external side, I've called in the FBI, the Department of Justice.

It is my aim, and it is my hope that we will witness a grand jury investigation with reporters present being asked to reveal who is leaking this information. I believe the safety of this nation and the people of this country deserve nothing less.

And I thank you for your question.

BOND:

I thank you, Mr. Director.

ROBERTS:

Senator Feingold?

And welcome to the committee.

FEINGOLD:

Mr. Chairman and Mr. Vice Chairman, again, I'm honored to join the committee.

I sought this position for one overriding reason: We were attacked on September 11, 2001, by terrorists whom we must defeat. And I agree with the ambassador: This fight is our top national priority. And it involves not only our military power, but also our diplomatic, economic and intelligence capabilities.

And I have serious concerns about whether this administration is fighting terrorism in an effective global and comprehensive manner. By focusing so extensively on Iraq, this administration seems to be pursuing a one- or two-country strategy, when Al Qaida is actually operating in some 60 countries around the world.

So I am concerned about the terrorist threat in places like Pakistan, Somalia, and other parts of Africa, Southeast Asia and elsewhere.

And I'm concerned that the president has taken the position that he can spy on Americans without a warrant despite a clear statutory ban.

To just respond a bit to what Senator Bond said, I couldn't have any higher regard for the need for secrecy. And I agree that it must be dispiriting for our people in the intelligence community and the military to suffer from the possibility of leaks.

But these people who are so dedicated and so brave also have the right to know that there are clear rules, that we're still operating under the rule of law, under the Bill of Rights and the Constitution. And I bet if you asked them, they'd tell you that they care a great deal about that, as well.

Mr. Ambassador, without getting into what the specific programs might be, can you assure us today that there are not other intelligence collection -- and I emphasize "collection" -- programs that you are aware of and that you are keeping from the full Intelligence Committee?

NEGROPONTE:

Senator, I don't know if I can comment on that in an open session.

FEINGOLD:

Well, we'll pursue it later today.

Let me move onto the subject that Senator Wyden brought up and that he and I have worked on together, this issue of data mining.

I sent you a letter on January 23rd requesting information about the NSA's and the intelligence community's possible use of data mining technology to analyze telephone and computer communications inside the United States.

And as I'm sure you know, there have been news reports that part of the NSA's domestic surveillance program has involved large-scale data mining of domestic communications.

I don't expect that you have the detailed answers to that letter with you here today. I just want to ask you if you would commit to me today that you will respond promptly to that letter.

NEGROPONTE:

Yes, I will. And I believe we have a response in preparation, Senator. I was advised of that before I came up to the hearing.

FEINGOLD:

Thank you.

Turning to one of the areas that we were talking about or you were talking about in your statement. In your prepared opening statement, you included a passing reference to Somalia.

The 2004 State Department terrorism report states that Al Qaida operatives there pose a, quote, "serious threat," unquote, to American interests in the region and that a lack of functioning government and protracted state of violent instability contributes to making Somalia a potential launching point for terrorist operations elsewhere.

In your view, have we committed sufficient intelligence resources to fully understanding and addressing this threat as a political solution to Somalia's problems, a necessary component of our counterterrorism strategy in that region? And if so, what are we doing to support such a solution?

NEGROPONTE:

On the first part of your question, Senator, certainly Somalia is on our radar screen, not only in the intelligence community and our diplomatic establishment, but also in Central Command.

I think it's an issue of concern as a place where there are international terrorists and to which international terrorists might gravitate if they were to suffer severe setbacks in a place like Afghanistan or Iraq.

So we're very mindful of that threat. I think we're devoting important resources to it. Although...

FEINGOLD:

Are they sufficient intelligence resources?

NEGROPONTE:

Well, they certainly are significant. You can never quite do enough. But in the order of priorities that we've got, I think we probably have it about right.

On the question of governance and whether they got a government, they've had sort of an absence of governance for the past decade.

Sometimes you see some emerging signs that they might pull together some kind of a central government. But I wouldn't hold my breath.

Obviously, if they could make improvements in their state of governance, that might make it easier to deal with the issue of international terrorism.

That, after all, is one of the theses of my testimony, that governance and these transnational threats can be related to each other.

FEINGOLD:

Thank you for your answers.

ROBERTS:

Has the senator concluded?

FEINGOLD:

My time's up. I'd be happy to keep going.

ROBERTS:

Oh, we give members at least 30 seconds.

FEINGOLD:

Great, I'll take another one.

(LAUGHTER)

The national intelligence strategy released by your office last October states -- I think, quite correctly -- that no nation can build a safer, better world alone.

FEINGOLD:

And the strategy involves, then, engaging and invigorating friendly foreign intelligence services. And you refer to that in your comments.

The strategy refers to a strategic plan for our foreign intelligence relationships, so that these relationships help us confront national security threats. I agree this is a critically important task, and it involves a broad range of policy considerations. Is this strategy being coordinated with the State Department? And will you work closely with Congress as you develop this strategy?

NEGROPONTE:

It certainly is being coordinated with the State Department. And we'd be pleased to inform the committee of the steps we've taken thus far and consult with you on the way forward.

Whenever it comes to dealing with foreign countries and institutions in those countries, our intelligence agencies work closely with the United States ambassadors there.

In addition, to assure the best possible coordination and so that we don't have a dispersion, if you will, of our effort, one of my first acts as director of national intelligence was to designate the CIA station chiefs as my representatives in those countries so that we aren't stumbling over each other out there and that we have a focal point for the coordination of intelligence relationships with foreign countries in the CIA point for the coordination of intelligence relationships with foreign countries in the CIA stations.

FEINGOLD:

Thank you again.

ROBERTS:

Senator Feinstein, welcome back.

FEINSTEIN:

Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Negroponte, I just want to associate myself with the comments of our ranking member. I serve on both Judiciary as well as Intelligence, and what we have seen in the last few years is a defined and consistent stonewalling to prevent the oversight responsibilities of both committees from being carried out.

And I just want you to know that when the ranking member mentioned that part of the law creating your position also was to hold you above any political influence, I think that that is something that we feel very strongly. And I want personally to make that comment to you.

The National Security Act specifies that the executive branch shall, and I quote, "ensure that the congressional intelligence committees are kept fully and currently informed of the intelligence activities of the United States, including any significant anticipated intelligence activity."

The only statutory exemption to this is for especially sensitive covert actions, which may be briefed to only eight members of Congress.

FEINSTEIN:

The administration is increasing the use of these limited briefings.

My question to you is: Who determines what information will be briefed to only eight members of Congress?

NEGROPONTE:

Senator, I take very seriously my legal obligations under the National Security Act, which requires me to keep the congressional Intelligence Committees fully and currently informed of intelligence activities to the extent consistent with the protection of sensitive intelligence sources and methods or other exceptionally sensitive matters.

FEINSTEIN:

Respectfully, sir, could you answer my question, which was who makes the decision?

NEGROPONTE:

It's the president and the vice president, Senator.

FEINSTEIN:

Thank you very much. I just wanted to know who made the decision. Thank you.

If I could move on, the intelligence reform legislation that created your position also set up an effort to finally solve some of the information-sharing problems that predated September 11.

I understand that the person appointed by the president to lead this effort, John Russack, resigned last week. I'm very concerned that this resignation will end any momentum on information-sharing that had been built up and that the state and local law enforcement will continue to lack the information that they need to find and stop terrorists.

Will the information-sharing effort meet the statutory timelines? And will Mr. Russack's departure mean a change in direction for the program?

NEGROPONTE:

Senator, I think we are striving, to the best of our ability, to meet the timelines that have been set. An interim report was sent up to the Senate late last year.

We are taking steps to ensure that this information-sharing program continues to have momentum. And you can be certain that we will give it the highest attention at the leadership of the DNI.

General Hayden, my CIO and, eventually, when we get a new program manager on board, will continue to give this issue very, very high priority.

NEGROPONTE:

And I would expect and I would hope that progress on this front will accelerate.

FEINSTEIN:

FEINSTEIN:

How soon do you believe you'll have someone on board?

NEGROPONTE:

I've actually identified an individual, but it's the question of clearances and just the processes that we have to go through to be able to formally bring that individual on board.

FEINSTEIN:

And do I understand by your answer that this will mean that the program will be carried out in the same direction in which it was previously?

NEGROPONTE:

I don't think this is going to have any policy implications with respect to the direction in which we've been headed.

FEINSTEIN:

Thank you.

NEGROPONTE:

You're welcome.

FEINSTEIN:

The president has stated that the NSA warrantless electronic surveillance program has been restricted to cases where one of the members would reasonably be suspected to be an "Al Qaida link or affiliate." Those were the words that have been interchangeably used.

I have two questions on this: What does it mean to be an Al Qaida link or affiliate? How is that connection to Al Qaida defined?

And if I've been called by Osama bin Laden or somebody that we know is attached to him, I presume that NSA would call that a link to Al Qaida. But is anyone I then call linked to Al Qaida automatically, and therefore, electronically surveilled, and anyone they call then linked to Al Qaida and electronically surveilled?

NEGROPONTE:

If I may invite General Hayden...

FEINSTEIN:

Thank you, that would be fine.

General Hayden?

HAYDEN:

Yes, ma'am. Thank you.

The criteria that are used by the analysts -- and it is done by the analysts, those folks who are most knowledgeable about Al Qaida intent, behavior, communications and so on -- is that this analyst, with all the facts available to him or her at the time, OK, as a prudent person, would have reason to believe that this communicant is affiliated with Al Qaida.

That's the standard that we use. And that's the standard that's drilled into the individuals who make those kinds of decisions.

FEINSTEIN:

Thank you.

The attorney general has asserted that the president has virtually unchecked authority to protect Americans, regardless of a clear, statutory record in opposition.

That legal position would allow the president to issue other orders in the name of counterterrorism.

Has any intelligence agency been authorized to or has any agency carried out the search of the home of any American suspected to be linked to Al Qaida without a court warrant?

NEGROPONTE:

I think I'd have to defer to our law enforcement authorities on this, Senator.

FEINSTEIN:

Thank you.

Mr. Mueller?

Mr. Mueller?

MUELLER:

Senator, I'm not aware of that happening.

FEINSTEIN:

OK.

Has any intelligence agency arrested, detained, rendered or otherwise held any American suspected to be linked to Al Qaida without a court warrant or sufficient cause for criminal prosecution?

MUELLER:

I'm sorry, Senator. Can you repeat that question for me?

FEINSTEIN:

Sure.

Has any intelligence agency been authorized to or has any agency carried out an arrest, detention rendering or otherwise held any American suspected to be linked to Al Qaida without a court warrant or sufficient cause for criminal prosecution?

MUELLER:

Well, I mean I'll give a try at first response to that.

It's a very broad question. And looking at all the components, there are occasions where, whether it be in the criminal arena, the counterterrorism arena, we make arrests on probable cause without it going through a magistrate first. Then you file up on a complaint.

And my belief -- in the instances, certainly, that I'm aware of -- we followed the procedures that are appropriate.

FEINSTEIN:

May I ask for the DNI's response, since the question had to do with intelligence agencies?

NEGROPONTE:

Yes, except it has principally -- my concern, Senator, and I've been up here today, my principal concern is with the collection and analysis of national intelligence which is used for the protection of the homeland. And I'm not aware of any such instances, I really am not.

FEINSTEIN:

I'd like to just continue on. Has any intelligence agency been authorized to or carried out the killing of anyone on U.S. soil based on a link to Al Qaida?

NEGROPONTE:

I'm not aware of such a situation, Senator.

FEINSTEIN:

Mr. Mueller?

MUELLER:

If you're looking at me, Senator, I'm certainly not aware of such a situation, speaking for the FBI.

FEINSTEIN:

My time is up.

ROBERTS:

In a word, yes.

FEINSTEIN:

Thank you.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

ROBERTS:

Mr. Wyden?

WYDEN:

Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

In open session, Director Negroponte, I wanted to ask you about oil as it relates to terrorists. Here's my concern: You go to a gas station in the United States. You pay these huge prices. A portion of that eventually finds its way to foreign governments, particularly Saudi Arabia. The Saudis hand it over to charities and the charities back door it to terrorists who want to kill law abiding Americans.

What is being done to try to deal with this, and particularly to stiffen up the Saudi effort to deal with this problem, which I think everybody understand is going on?

We're seeing oil purchases in the United States; they're in effect the terror attacks. I'd like to know what is going on with respect to forcing the Saudis to crack down on how this oil money gets to terrorists who want to kill Americans?

NEGROPONTE:

I think first of all, Senator, since some of the egregious terrorist acts that were carried out in Saudi Arabia in recent years, I think starting with 2003 forward, I think there's a much greater awareness of the international terrorist threat on the part of Saudi authorities.

NEGROPONTE:

And I think I think we've seen a really strengthened effort to deal with that situation on their part.

And so I would say that cooperation has increased. It's getting better. And we have a lot of interchange at all levels, law enforcement, intelligence and so forth.

WYDEN:

You no longer think this is a problem?

NEGROPONTE:

That was going to be my second point.

I believe there are private Saudi citizens who still engage in these kinds of donations. And I think efforts and ways have to be found to discourage that kind of activity.

And I think there are also certain designated charities and organizations where we actually identify those as ones to whom monies should not be given.

So I think it has been a problem. It's getting better. But it continues to need work.

WYDEN:

I'm going to ask you about that in private session.

One other question for you, Mr. Director.

There have been news reports this week -- there was one in Newsweek magazine -- talking about American officials being in face- to-face talks with high-level Iraqi insurgents as part of an effort to look at possible ways to get peace in the region.

My question is: Will you confirm what was in the news reports this week?

And, if you will, I particularly want to know what is being done to address the concerns that I'm sure Shia would have about any such talks.

So, one, will you confirm what it's in Newsweek magazine? And second, if this ongoing -- and I will ask you about this also in closed session as well -- what is being done, at least for the public record, to deal with what are certain to be Shia concerns about any such talks?

NEGROPONTE:

Sir, I simply don't have any comment on that story.

But as far as the question of Sunni and Shia relationships in Iraq, this is a very delicate balance, if you will. I think that any efforts to move the political process forward have got to be based on a desire to take into account all elements, Sunni and Shia included, of the Iraqi body politick.

WYDEN:

Mr. Chairman, colleagues didn't even get one round, and I appreciate you giving me these extra questions.

ROBERTS:

Senator Rockefeller?

ROCKEFELLER:

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Director, last year at this hearing, Porter Goss made the statement -- and I think this is probably the subject which is the most scary in all of this area of intelligence and international security -- that he could not assure the American people that there weren't unaccounted-for nuclear weapons or derivatives thereof that are housed in Russia. Had they been stolen? Had they been sold? It wasn't possible, really, to say. And I think this is a catastrophically important matter.

U.S. Department of Energy estimated that only 50 percent of the buildings that house fissile materials in Russia operate under the highest security standards.

And what I really just want to know, from either of you gentlemen, is whether you feel there has been any improvement in that area, and if we are working collaboratively -- not just Nunn-Lugar, but in other ways -- to try and decrease the number of available for purchase by terrorists, perhaps probably, these nuclear weapons or parts thereof.

NEGROPONTE:

If I could invite Director Goss to...

GOSS:

Thank you very much, Mr. Vice Chairman.

That is correct, last year you asked me if I could account for all of the unaccounted for nuclear weapons and be sure, therefore, that the terrorists did not access or could get one or had one. And I could not give you that assurance, and nor can I today.

But what I can tell you today is I'm a bit more comfortable than I was a year ago. I've had a chance to focus in on the efforts that we are making, and others are making, because this is a well- understood threat to the civilized world.

GOSS:

And I would dare say we're getting a good deal more cooperation on this subject than we were before that understanding was clear.

I would also say that this is an item that probably gets the loudest alarm bell any time our many collectors work.

So I am completely satisfied it is attended to. I am not satisfied that we have the answer that you and I both, we'd all like to have, that we are 100 percent sure, because we just aren't.

ROCKEFELLER:

But you think that the efforts not only within our own nation and its national security apparatus, but also other parts of the world, is stronger in effecting results towards diminishing that supply?

GOSS:

I believe that personally. You know, I represent a capabilities organization, but just one of 15.

From my perspective, we have got a proportionate number that is correct focused on that. And I think we are doing better.

I can't speak for the rest of the community, though.

ROCKEFELLER:

It's interesting, to do better makes me feel good, but it is until we get the whole thing solved. And, of course, that's going to take a lot of work and a lot of good faith and a lot of people.

GOSS:

If I could add, Senator, we have created an interagency effort to collect and analyze the whereabouts of fissile materials all over the world. That's ongoing on an urgent basis.

ROCKEFELLER:

And I'm glad to hear that.

Director, my final question will be to you. And that is: Do you agree with the statement that I made in my opening remarks that our committee members and our staff are routinely given access to the details of overseas signals intelligence programs that are carried out by the NSA?

GOSS:

Yes.

ROCKEFELLER:

Yes. And do you believe that it's appropriate for the committee to have a working understanding of these programs?

GOSS:

I do, yes.

ROCKEFELLER:

Why is it that -- you know, if I had to make my guess, and this is none of my business and I have no proof, and so just take it for what it's worth, that the leak which everybody is so properly concerned about probably came out of the executive branch of government. It certainly didn't come out of Chairman Roberts or Jay Rockefeller. And my guess would be somewhere in the Department of Justice. Just take that for what it's worth.

Do you really believe that fully briefing the NSA matters that we're discussing to 40 members of the Intelligence Committees in the Congress represents some kind of an unacceptable security risk?

GOSS:

Sir, we're talking about a decision that was made long before I arrived in this position.

And what I was trying to answer to Senator Feinstein earlier was that there is a history and a tradition of certain -- very small number, very limited number -- of select sensitive programs that the executive branch and president and the vice president over a period of 50 or 60 years have chosen to limit the briefings to a small select group in the Congress, such as the leadership of the Congress and the chairmanship and the vice chairman or ranking members of respective committees. And that is what has been done in this particular instance.

And that was the method that was chosen to deal with this issue. But there were extensive briefings over the lifetime of this program, I think more than 10. So I think that's how best I can answer that question.

ROCKEFELLER:

And I understand that. I'll just close with this thought: The top leadership doesn't usually go to these meetings. So you're really talking about Chairman Roberts and myself and Chairman Hoekstra and Ranking Member Harman.

ROCKEFELLER:

And there may be a long history of this. I'm not aware of that. But there is no history that comports in any way to the intensity it what's happened as a result of 9/11.

I just want to make the statement that I think so much could be worked out and so many people would probably agree if we felt we were being talked to as is required by law.

The chairman, when he gave his opening statement, talked about "lawful." And I really think that the executive branch needs to think about the fact that laws are laws and you were specifically placed under a certain law and others are placed under certain laws. And forming the committee of jurisdiction is one of those laws. And it simply isn't being done in an atmosphere where it needs to be done, I think, more than ever.

In which I would disagree with Senator Bond -- this is not fair to paraphrase him -- but to say that, if people are asking questions about this, that somehow they're taking their eye off what is deemed to be the ball.

ROCKEFELLER:

And I think part of the discussion and the history and the future of all of this is going to be that the executive branch and the legislative branch have to have a working relationship that is, in fact, that fits into what the laws require.

I think you have nothing to fear from us. You have nothing to fear from the House. I think it's almost certain that whatever leaks came, came from the executive branch. And that's always going to be a problem.

But I beg you to consider what I say in deep seriousness and deep sincerity.

ROBERTS:

I think that the director of the FBI would like to respond.

MUELLER:

Senator, if I might, being a component of the Department of Justice, I want to not leave that remark. I want it addressed in terms of...

ROCKEFELLER:

I can understand that.

MUELLER:

And I'm not certain you have a basis for pointing a finger. I'm not certain what leak

And I'm not certain you have a basis for pointing a finger. I'm not certain what leak you're talking about. And I don't think it's fair to point a finger as to the responsibility of the leak.

So I did not want to let that go unaddressed.

ROCKEFELLER:

I understand.

ROBERTS:

We have Senator Feingold on a second round.

FEINGOLD:

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Following up on Senator Feinstein's question to Mr. Negroponte...

ROBERTS:

Oh, sir, I beg your pardon.

For some reason, I have not recognized the first round appearance of the sheriff of the always powerful Senate Agriculture Committee, Senator Chambliss.

CHAMBLISS:

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

It used to be powerful before you were chairman in the House, and we haven't recovered. But we're getting there.

(LAUGHTER)

I want to follow up on what Senator Rockefeller just said, ladies and gentlemen. This issue relative to this leak coming out of the executive department or the administration: That's a pretty serious accusation.

CHAMBLISS:

And, in fact, the only known source of any communication from the inside has come from an individual, as I understand it, who used to work in the program and is not part of the executive department.

But I have been very hesitant to talk about the fact -- and I assume I'm directing this to either you, Director Mueller or Director Goss or Director Negroponte.

I've been hesitant to talk publicly about the fact that the position of gathering intelligence and utilizing very classified and sophisticated intelligence has been compromised by not only the leak, wherever it came from, but also by the continuing highlighting of this issue in the press. And that those folks who continue to question this program, those folks who continue to go out front and talk in a negative way about this program may be aiding and abetting the terrorists. And I am extremely concerned about that.

I understand, Director Goss, that you may have addressed this in an earlier response to a question from Senator Bond. And I apologize for not being here. But I would like to ask y'all to comment on that, if you will, as to whether or not our position has been compromised, if we have lost any of our capability relative to this program as a result of the publicity surrounding it.

GOSS:

Thank you, Senator, very much.

It would only be appropriate for me to comment about those areas that I have accountability, responsibility for. And I was referring to leaks that Senator Bond had referred to that went to that area and explained at some length how damaging they have been and the steps we are taking to deal with that. And I hope they'll be successful steps.

NSA is not, obviously, in our area, and so I would prefer to yield to either Director Mueller, who has the domestic side of the argument, or the director of national intelligence, or whoever he would like to appoint to deal with the NSA aspects.

CHAMBLISS:

Sure.

HAYDEN:

Senator, it's hard for me to characterize it in open session.

But I did make the comment earlier in another environment that some people claim that somehow or another our capabilities are immune to this kind of information going out into the public domain. And I can tell you in a broad sense that is certainly not true.

NEGROPONTE:

The bad guys tend to get information that comes out of Congress or out of the American press in real time. Is that a fair statement, General Hayden?

HAYDEN:

We have been impressed with their ability, with various Web sites that are generally available, at how agile they are in responding to events in this country.

CHAMBLISS:

Director Negroponte, the Secure Border Initiative was introduced by the Department of Homeland Security in November 2005. And this is a comprehensive, multiyear plan to secure America's borders and reduce illegal immigration, which includes an increase in the number of Border Patrol agents, as well as upgrading technology used in controlling the border, increasing manned aerial assets, expanded use of UAVs and next-generation detection technology.

CHAMBLISS:

Recent reports suggests that smugglers are either disguising themselves as Mexican soldiers or may actually be members of the Mexican military. How large of a problem is protecting our borders from infiltrators who may be receiving assistance from corrupt Mexican authorities.

What is our intelligence community doing to identify those collaborators?

NEGROPONTE:

With your permission, Senator, perhaps I could invite Mr. Allen from the Department of Homeland Security to respond to that question.

ALLEN:

Thank you, Ambassador Mr. Negroponte.

Senator, on the Strategic Border Initiative, as you know, Secretary Chertoff has a number of multi-functional ways to do this, and a number of actions are under way.

I, from an intelligence perspective, am looking at this on how to strengthen our intelligence collection on all of our borders, wherever they may be.

Getting into specifics relating to any reported incidents on the border, that was something I'd prefer to talk to in a closed session.

But I can say this, that our borders are being strengthened whether by land, sea or air and whether north or south, thanks to the procedures that are being rapidly put in place under the leadership of Secretary Chertoff. I think we can take comfort that we're well on our way to taking the kind of measures that the American public really wants to see.

CHAMBLISS:

Thank you.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

ROBERTS:

It would be the hope of the chair that we could at least allow the witnesses an hour for lunch before we go to the closed session.

With that in mind, on the second round I recognize Senator Feingold.

FEINGOLD:

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I'm pleased I went after my friend Senator Chambliss, because what I'd like to say is the greatest publicizing of this NSA program that I ever heard was when I sat in front of the president of the United States the other night at the State of the Union and heard him discussing it in front of the whole world.

In fact, this is a larger effort to discuss this on a constant basis and to make it a political issue in front of the American people, so I take it his remarks would apply to that sort of conduct as well.

FEINGOLD:

Mr. Negroponte and General Hayden, following up on Senator Feinstein's question, have you defined "Al Qaida affiliate" for the purpose of warrantless NSA surveillance? Is it a term of art? How are the NSA officials guided on this?

HAYDEN:

It's a term of science, Senator. It is a specific list of affiliates. There is a burden of proof that must be met before an organization is deemed to be affiliated with Al Qaida.

And that work is overseen by the entire oversight structure that governs this program within NSA, by the I.G., the general counsel and by the Department of Justice.

FEINGOLD:

Thank you, General.

On Pakistan, Mr. Negroponte, the most recent State Department "Country Reports on Terrorism for 2004" states that Al Qaida continues to hide in Pakistan's federally administrated tribal areas of Pakistan.

Who wields power in these regions? And how has Al Qaida managed to stay there for so long? Is this region basically a terrorist sanctuary?

The report also states that Pakistan has pursued as strategy to win the support of tribes in the FATA, with a combination of negotiations and economic investments. Have the Pakistanis achieved any success in this regard?

MAPLES:

It's a tough area. It's a tough area, Senator. And it's an area that historically has sought to govern itself, if you will. It's not felt itself an integrated part of any country or nation. And a lot of people up there take the law into their own hands.

But I believe the Pakistani government has done a lot in recent times to establish a greater presence there. They've sent their military into the region, who operate with greater frequency and have taken a large number of casualties, substantial casualties, in their efforts to impose the writ of the central government.

So I think the situation there is gradually shifting, but it's proven to be a great challenge for the government of Pakistan.

But I don't doubt their commitment to fighting against international terrorists. And we've seen ample evidence of that over the past months and years.

FEINGOLD:

On Iraq, you state in your opening statement that Iraqi Sunni disaffection is the primary enabler of the insurgency. Can you just say a bit more about the range of motivations that inspire the insurgency and the extent to which it is motivated specifically by anti-coalition sentiment?

NEGROPONTE:

Well, I think the fundamental issue for those Sunnis who are not international terrorists, who are not part of Al Qaida or Zarqawi's group, has been a feeling of having been disempowered as a result of the fall of Saddam Hussein.

So I think that probably is the most significant motivation; the feeling on the part of many Sunnis that they no longer have the position of prominence in the governance of their society, of their country, that they used to have and their desire to recuperate some of that influence.

I think what we're seeing happening in Iraq is these different political forces and political groups finding the right balance between themselves that will permit their society to go forward in a peaceful manner.

And I think the electoral process and the political process that we're witnessing offers that opportunity.

FEINGOLD:

Thank you for all your answers.

And thank you, Mr. Chairman, for the addition time.

ROBERTS:

Yes, sir.

Senator Feinstein?

FEINSTEIN:

Thank you Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Negroponte, we have heard allegations that top officials in one of the technical intelligence agencies explicitly warned contractors not to talk to Congress about ongoing programs or refuse losing future contract competitions. I know this for a fact.

Are you aware of this? And does Congress have the right -- do we, as in my case, an appropriator as well as an authorizer, have the right -- to talk to the contractor of major technical programs?

NEGROPONTE:

Senator, I'm not aware of this particular situation. But if I may, I would like to know the details so that I can have a look at the matter.

FEINSTEIN:

I will be happy to give you the details. Thank you.

Last year, Admiral Loy -- who was present -- and I discussed border security.

particularly the increasing problem of penetration of other than Mexicans across our borders, which are growing in numbers.

And I said at that time that I felt it was a major gateway for terrorists to access the United States.

Do you have ongoing intelligence efforts to prevent this from happening? And is there any evidence up to this point that it is, in fact, happening?

NEGROPONTE:

I'm going to invite Mr. Allen to elaborate.

But one thing I would like to say, Senator, is, of course, it's an issue that we're sensitive to.

And, secondly, my impression is that perhaps our border with Canada has, to some degree, been of a bit greater concern than that with Mexico. Although, obviously, we have to watch all of our borders very, very carefully.

But if I could ask Mr. Allen to elaborate.

ALLEN:

Yes, Senator Feinstein, we recognize this issue.

As you know, we have found a lot of individuals other than Mexicans attempting to cross our borders illegally. And under Secretary Chertoff's new policy, which is catch and return, or deport, this is having, I think, a salutary effect.

Now, this Strategic Border Initiative is new and it's only now getting fully under way. And we're very sensitive to the fact that people from other areas, from areas where we might expect to find members of Al Qaida -- we're very sensitive of that. We work extraordinarily hard on this issue.

I think terrorists are facing an increasingly challenging environment to enter our country, certainly, by air and by sea. We now need to secure our borders, and including, as Ambassador Negroponte, we need to work harder with the northern border.

FEINSTEIN:

If I might suggest to you, the numbers in the past two years have tripled. They have gone from FY '03, 49,545, to '05, 155,000. Now, these are other than Mexicans.

ALLEN:

These are other than Mexicans. We're aware of those figures.

FEINSTEIN:

So this indicates to me that whatever we're doing is not working because more are coming through than ever before.

ALLEN:

We believe we'll see a change in that in the coming months, because the catch-and-return policy, I think, will have salutary effects over time.

We really do have to work this issue a lot harder. And as was said earlier, when I answered Senator Chambliss, we're using significant new capabilities, including Border Patrolmen, but significant new advanced technologies to try to detect people entering our country, particularly in Texas and Arizona.

FEINSTEIN:

Well, thank you very much for that.

ALLEN:

Yes, ma'am.

FEINSTEIN:

Mr. Negroponte, recent media reports have spotlighted a number of activities that appear to be related to intelligence- collection or covert action, but that well may be outside of the official intelligence community's channels.

For example, military databases of suspicious activity reports, called Talons, by the counterintelligence field activity, or CIFA; and, secondly, a Pentagon program to secretly pay Iraqi newspapers to run pro-American articles.

Were these activities subject to your approval and oversight?

(UNKNOWN)

Ma'am, I don't believe that either of those activities would fall into Mr. Negroponte's area. They are Department of Defense programs, I believe.

FEINSTEIN:

Now, let me raise this problem then.

FEINSTEIN:

They should. We appointed you to be the person -- we didn't appoint you, but we created the legislation so that you were the person over all intelligence.

Now, I know how tough it is. But if you didn't know and you didn't give a go-ahead, it indicates to me that, for 85 percent of the budget, which is defense-related, that you're not going to have the controls that you should have.

You want to comment?

NEGROPONTE:

Well, CIFA is within the national intelligence program. But as far as specifically directing those activities, that has not risen to the level of my office and comes under the direction of the undersecretary of defense for intelligence.

My understanding, in light of the issues that have come up in the controversy and the press attention that has been given to CIFA, that Mr. Cambone has ordered a complete review of that program from top down.

FEINSTEIN:

But will you get the results of that review?

NEGROPONTE:

Yes, I will get those results.

FEINSTEIN:

Will you be able to play a decision-making role in that, or does Defense control it?

NEGROPONTE:

Well, to the extent that I have reporting to me a national counterintelligence executive and have a role in counterintelligence, yes.

FEINSTEIN:

FEINSTEIN:

Thank you.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

ROBERTS:

Excuse me. Let me just say that our staff has been briefed by the DOD and that I would encourage the senator to check with staff on both sides, and that we have looked at this very carefully. And I think some of the concerns that she has raised -- which, obviously, should be shared by everybody -- have been answered.

Let me just say this in closing.

ROBERTS:

First, I want to thank you for your patience. Second, we are going to welcome you to the closed session. Third, I hope you get to at least eat a sandwich.

Let me make an observation.

Since the enactment of the provision requiring the Intelligence Committees be kept fully and currently informed, that the committees and the presidents -- and I use "the presidents" in plural -- have always managed the delicate process of access to information to claim this situation is somehow different, ignores this committee's history and the text of our laws.

I know this happened under President Carter. I know this happened under President Reagan. I know this happened under President Bush One. I know this happened under President Clinton. And I know this happened under President Bush.

Basically, the law, at least in the way that I have read it, indicates that the executive has the prerogative and also has the responsibility of keeping the Congress informed. The practice, however, has been that there are certain programs that are so highly classified that they are limited to eight, i.e., the leadership of the House and Senate and also the ranking member and in this particular case the co-chair and the chair of the Intelligence Committees.

On some occasions, if it involves the military and some kind of a covert operation, the same thing applies to Armed Services and the Subcommittee on Armed Services in regard to the Subcommittee on Appropriations.

I know there is a great hue and cry that we make more people pregnant with the knowledge, and then, of course, if they're pregnant with the knowledge, they will rock the baby, as opposed to throwing it out with the bath water. But let me say that we did that.

Immediately after 9/11 we felt it was our obligation on the Intelligence Committees -- under different leadership at that particular time -- to have a joint investigation, which we did.

ROBERTS:

We even had an independent staff forcing members to come to the meeting and act is as if they were studying for a chemistry test during a study hall because we never quite knew what to expect.

Now, that's, sort of, telling tales out of school, but I didn't think that was a very helpful operation.

It wasn't any time at all with the joint committees -- and I'm not trying to perjure anybody or the committees or the intent of Congress or the integrity of Congress -- before we had the leak. Now, the leak had nothing to do with 9/11 but, boy, it sure make the headlines.

And the executive made a decision at that particular time: "I'm not going to -- or we are not going to -- to share any information or send anybody down to testify further if we have leaks of this nature."

And so the leadership of that committee, the joint committee investigation on 9/11, made a decision or agreed to the executive that there would be an FBI investigation of the committee.

At the same time, the committee was investigating the FBI's role in 9/11. So here we were in a joint committee investigating the FBI and then the FBI investigating us and asking every member of the Intelligence Committee, both House and Senate, "Would you take a lie detector test?"

I can't think of anything more ridiculous or silly. I will say as chairman of this committee that if somebody asked me to do that, my answer is no.

The result was that -- what we really needed in that group -- and I'm not comparing that particular group because I was a member of it. And then, of course, everybody said it was staff. Members always say that it's staff and I said, "That's a lot of nonsense. What we ought to do is have members, when they walk out of room, put duct tape on and have a requirement that they at least wear the duct tape for 24 hours."

Now, that was the worry that happened under this administration and previous administrations when these briefings got to a larger group.

ROBERTS:

Now, I would agree with Vice Chairman Rockefeller. I don't know of anybody on our committee, I don't know of anybody on the House committee, that would willingly or wittingly repeat any information that would be so classified that it would endanger our country.

Now my question is, however, there's been a lot of comment about the president talking about this, vice president talking about this. It was only after the leak in the New York Times -- which contained a lot of misinformation, as far as I'm concerned, about domestic spying, when we really have a threat warning capability. And that's what we're talking about. It's more of a military mission than it is any kind of a criminal proceeding under FISA.

And FISA, by the way, is outdated in regards to its context with both the threat and the technology.

And were we to do that, we would lose not only minutes, but hours or days, when we have a threat that may happen immediately.

And it would be an amazing thing to me that, if we had another attack, the very people that are doing all the questioning now would be having you all back up and say, "How come you didn't know?"

My question is basically to General Hayden: What happens if you lose this capability, General?

HAYDEN:

It's proven to be a very valuable tool for that which it was intended: to detect and prevent attacks inside the United States, Senator.

And you're right about the firestorm of misinformation that seemed to follow day after day after the original leak was reported in the New York Times.

I've spoken to this committee -- I think it was in this room -- in October of 2002, talking about the line between liberty and security and how that had to be an informed debate by the American people so that we're all comfortable about that line.

And there was so inaccurate information, misinformation and misunderstanding out there that what was appearing in the press wasn't informing a debate; it was horribly misshaping it.

And I don't see how we as a free people can make a decision in that way.

ROBERTS:

Well, I really regret that situation as happening, and I know that it is understandable both on the majority side and the minority side that we have differences of opinion and unfortunately the climate in the Congress today then is to ascribe politics as the reason for that.

I really think people have strong differences of opinion, but fortunately or unfortunately in regards of the number of people who are briefed, I think it's basically on the lack of information, and the lack of information in regard to exactly what this program is.

I cannot imagine how anybody who would be receiving a call from a terrorist cell, where we have reason to believe that they are going to attack the United States and that person happened to be in the United States, that they would think their civil liberty was being violated if some intelligence or law enforcement person was not monitoring that call. It would be indefensible if we did not.

And in addition, I would only point out that you really don't have any civil liberties if you are dead.

The only other thing that I would say is that I want to thank you again, all of you, for your dedication, your perseverance, for keeping this country safe, as opposed to some who obviously are more worried about you people, apparently, than some people who where we are at war and where we have a threat and where we have plots against the United States, and where with we have sleeper cells in the United States, and it could happen any moment. Thank God we have this capability.

This hearing is concluded.

ROCKEFELLER:

I need to respond, Mr. Chairman.

ROBERTS:

You may respond.

ROCKEFELLER:

Let me just ask a question first to the director.

Is the NSA program a covert action program as defined by the National Security Act?

NEGROPONTE:

I don't believe so, sir, no.

ROCKEFELLER:

That's what we were told yesterday by the Justice -- folks from Justice -- it is not

That's what we were told yesterday by the Justice -- folks from Justice -- it is not.

Now, as to the horror of people wanting to do things both rigorously, aggressively, using intelligence as in every possible way that we can, it does not subtract, however, from two other concepts which have kept our nation viable for many, many, many years.

ROCKEFELLER:

And that is that we do things under the law. We do them under the law.

Secondly, I would make -- and I've made this point many time to the chairman; we've talked about it -- there is an instinct readily grabbed upon by some, that when we ask questions about the largest NSA program in history, that somehow we are attacking you gentlemen and ladies.

Nothing could be further from the truth because the instructions or whatever come from elsewhere. That's been stipulated.

It is simply important that, in a democracy, that we understand there are three branches of government.

I spend an enormous amount of my time -- the chairman is leaving -- an enormous amount of my time, well over three-quarters, working exclusively on this subject in great depth, with great intensity. I do a lot of traveling and meet the same intelligence folks that Senator Saxby Chambliss was talking about and Kit Bond, I guess it was.

But you cannot equate, and you should not equate, asking questions, where we are meant to be informed by law as Intelligence Committees and we are not, for pursuing that effort. Because to do otherwise is to say that there's no reason for these committees to exist and that we should disband the committees, which I'm not for doing.

But do not kid yourselves, gentlemen and ladies, that the so- called -- as is often said, that the chairman and the ranking member of each of the committees are fully briefed and therefore everything is fine.

ROCKEFELLER:

That's not the way it works. That's not the way those meetings work. And General Hayden knows that. They don't last long enough, the flip charts are extensive, and everybody is in a hurry. The leadership usually doesn't come. Chairman Roberts and I do come, as well as the House members.

Four people out of 535, therefore, know about the most extensive and aggressive NSA effort in the history of this country.

I am strongly for the goals, but I want it to be done under the law. And so should you. That's what keeps our country together.

Thank you.

NEGROPONTE:

If I may just -- one sentence, Senator.

I know the attorney general will address this next week, but we believe that all these activities are being undertaken in full compliance with our Constitution and with the laws of our country. And that is an oath that each and every one of us at this table have undertaken.

Dear Mr. Mulholland:

I previously wrote to you on January 9, 2006, regarding CRS's work on certain intelligence matters. Specifically, I expressed concern that CRS should not speculate on highly classified intelligence matters on which it could be erroneously viewed by the public as an authoritative source, and that its previous work was not conducted in a thorough and objective fashion. Subsequently, CRS has issued another memorandum with similar problems. I ask for immediate action on your part to ensure that CRS truly provides "comprehensive and reliable" legislative research that is "free of partisan or other bias."

As you know, on January 18, CRS Analyst Alfred Cumming completed a memorandum entitled "Statutory Procedures Under Which Congress Is To Be Informed of U.S. Intelligence Activities, Including Covert Actions." The memorandum subsequently was characterized in media headlines thusly: "Congressional Agency Questions Legality of Wiretaps."[1] The memorandum erroneously contended that certain intelligence reporting practices "would appear to be inconsistent with law, which requires that the 'congressional intelligence committees be kept fully and currently informed of all intelligence activities,' other than those involving covert actions."[2]

[1] Eggen, "Congressional Agency Questions Legality of Wiretaps," Washington Post, January 19, 2006 at A5. (Accessed via internet January 19, 2006). It is important to note that the headline did not accurately convey the substance of the memorandum, which addressed questions relating to reporting requirements applicable to certain intelligence programs rather than the legality of the activities of any specific program itself. Of course, CRS analysts previously were publicly reported to conclude that activities of a specific program "conflicts with existing law and hinges on weak legal arguments." Leonnnig, "Report Rebuts Bush on Spying," Washington Post, January 7, 2006, at A1 (Accessed via internet January 9, 2006). My concerns with the substance and process relating to that report were the subject of my January 9, 2006 letter to you.

Once again, CRS has issued a memorandum on a highly sensitive intelligence issue on which it had no firsthand knowledge of the practices being followed by the Committee and the President and ignored highly relevant legal authorities and considerations.

Although I am not compelled to enter into a debate with CRS with respect to the practices of the Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence, I do want to point out three authorities highly relevant to the subject of the memorandum that were completely ignored by CRS. First, Section 501 of the National Security Act (50 U.S.C. § 413) expressly provides that "The President and the congressional intelligence committees shall establish such procedures as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this title." These procedures apply to the reporting required under Section 502 of the National Security Act, which was improperly read by Mr. Cumming in isolation. As I have publicly indicated on many occasions, I and the Ranking Member were fully briefed on many occasions on the intelligence activities in question in a manner fully consistent with the practices that had been developed between the Committee and the President under the authority provided in Section 501.

Second, CRS completely ignored the most basic principles of statutory interpretation. Those principles clearly establish that terms not specifically included in the text of a statute generally will not be read into it. The plain text of Section 502 nowhere requires individual members of the Committee to be briefed with respect to all intelligence activities. Putting aside the important policy question of whether it is desirable to brief additional members of the Committee, it is clear that such reporting is not mandated by the law.[3]

Third, the Chairman (sometimes along with the Ranking Member) under longstanding practice customarily receives many statutorily mandated reports on behalf of the full Committee. It has never before been seriously argued that this practice is inconsistent with any of the statutes requiring these reports, even absent the type of clear guidance provided in Section 501.

Such a flawed and obviously incomplete analysis, seemingly intended to advocate the erroneous conclusion that the President did not comply with the relevant law, further reinforces my previously expressed concern that CRS's work on these matters has not been "free of partisan or other bias." Media reports have further suggested the possibility of additional circumstances that could lead an objective observer to question whether the memorandum in question was truly nonpartisan.[4]

[2] Cumming, "Statutory Procedures Under Which Congress is to Be Informed of U.S. Intelligence Activities, Including Covert Actions," at 7 (January 18, 2006).

[3] Mr. Cumming also suggested that Committee Rule 14(b), which provides that "[a]ll Members of the Committee shall at all times have access to all classified papers and other material received by the Committee from any source," is relevant. However, this rule clearly applies on its face only to tangible papers and materials. Moreover, the counterpart House Rule (clause 2(e) of Rule XI) "does not necessarily apply to records in the possession of the Executive Branch that members of the committee have been allowed to examine under limited conditions at the discretion of the agency." HOUSE PRACTICE, chapter 11 § 16 (108th Congress, 1st Session).

Once again, I would appreciate your assistance in ensuring that CRS refrain from speculating with respect to highly sensitive national security matters on which it has no authoritative knowledge, as well as ensuring that CRS allows the position of Congress on policy issues relating to intelligence to be determined by elected Members of Congress, Republican and Democrat, rather than by CRS staff.

Sincerely,

Peter Hoekstra

Neil:

Below is a draft of a response to a Feinstein question on this subject, and I've also attached the Specter Q&A responses, which also address this subject. Thanks.

The National Security Act of 1947 contemplates that any such programs would be disclosed to the intelligence committees of both houses, and the Act specifically contemplates even more limited disclosure in the case of sensitive programs. Title 50 of the U.S. Code provides that the Director of National Intelligence and the heads of all departments, agencies, and other entities of the United States Government involved in intelligence activities shall keep the congressional intelligence committees fully and currently informed of intelligence activities "[t]o the extent consistent with due regard for the protection from unauthorized disclosure of classified information relating to sensitive intelligence sources and methods or other exceptionally sensitive matters." 50 U.S.C. §§ 413a(a), 413b(b). It has for decades been the practice of both Democratic and Republican administrations to inform only the Chair and Ranking Members of the intelligence committees about exceptionally sensitive matters. Even the Congressional Research Service has acknowledged that the leaders of the intelligence committees "over time have accepted the executive branch practice of limiting notification of intelligence activities in some cases to either the Gang of Eight, or to the chairmen and ranking members of the intelligence committees." The Administration followed this well-established practice by briefing the leadership of the Intelligence Committees and, at a more general level, the leaders of both houses of Congress about the NSA activities.

RESPONSES TO QUESTIONS FROM CHAIRMAN SPECTER

(1) In interpreting whether Congress intended to amend the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act (FISA) by the September 14, 2001 Resolution (Resolution) would it be relevant on the issue of Congressional intent that the Administration did not specifically ask for an expansion for Executive powers under FISA? Was it because you thought you couldn't get such an expansion as when you said: "That was not something that we could likely get?"

I am pleased to respond to this question because it allows me to address two widespread misconceptions about the Department's position.

First, our position does not turn on whether Congress intended to amend FISA through the Resolution or on whether the Resolution effected such an amendment. Rather, FISA expressly contemplates that in a separate statute Congress may authorize electronic surveillance outside FISA procedures. See 50 U.S.C. § 1809(a)(1) (2000) (FISA § 109, prohibiting any person from intentionally "engag[ing] . . . in electronic surveillance under color of law except as authorized by statute") (emphasis added). That is what Congress did in the Resolution. As Hamdi v. Rumsfeld, 542 U.S. 507 (2004), makes clear, a general authorization to use military force carries with it the authority to employ the traditional and accepted incidents of the use of force. That is so even if Congress did not specifically address each of the incidents of force; thus, a majority of the Court concluded that the Resolution authorized the detention of enemy combatants as a traditional incident of force and Justice O'Connor stated that "it is of no moment that the [Resolution] does not use specific language of detention." Id. at 519 (plurality opinion). As explained at length in our paper of January 19, 2006, signals intelligence is another traditional and accepted incident of the use of military force. Consistent with this traditional practice, other presidents, including Woodrow Wilson and Franklin Roosevelt, have interpreted general force-authorization resolutions to permit warrantless surveillance to intercept suspected enemy communications.

Second, the decision not to seek further legislation was not because I either concluded or was advised that Congress would reject such legislation. Rather, members of Congress advised the Administration that more specific legislation could not be enacted without likely compromising the terrorist surveillance program by disclosing program details and operational limitations and capabilities to our enemies. Some critics of the terrorist surveillance program have misinterpreted or misconstrued a statement that I made on December 19, 2005, that we were advised that specific legislation "would be difficult, if not impossible" to mean that the Administration declined to seek a specific amendment to FISA because we believed we could not get it. As I clarified later in the December 19th briefing and on December 21, 2005, that is not the case. See Remarks by Homeland Security Secretary Chertoff and Attorney General Gonzales on the USA PATRIOT Act, available at http://www.dhs.gov/dhspublic/display?content=5285. Rather, we were advised by members of Congress that it would be difficult, if not impossible to pass such legislation without revealing the nature of the program and the nature of certain intelligence capabilities. That disclosure would likely have harmed our national security, and that was an unacceptable risk we were not prepared to take.

(2) If Congress had intended to amend FISA by the Resolution wouldn't Congress have specifically acted to as Congress did in passing the Patriot Act giving the Executive expanded powers and greater flexibility in using "roving" wiretaps?

Congress could have been more explicit if it had intended to amend FISA. But, as explained above, it is not our position that Congress amended FISA through the Resolution. Nor do we believe that Congress needed to be more specific in the Resolution in order for it to authorize electronic surveillance in an armed conflict. It is understandable why Congress did not attempt to catalog every specific aspect of the use of the forces it was authorizing and every potential preexisting statutory limitation on the Executive Branch. Rather than engage in that difficult and impractical exercise, Congress authorized the President, in general but intentionally broad terms, to use the traditional and fundamental incidents of war and to determine how best to identify and engage the enemy in the current armed conflict. Congress's judgment to proceed in this manner was unassailable, for, as the Supreme Court has recognized, even in normal times involving no major national security crisis, "Congress cannot anticipate and legislate with regard to every possible action the President may find it necessary to take." Dames & Moore v. Regan, 453 U.S. 654, 678 (1981). Indeed, Congress often has enacted authorizations to use military force using general authorizing language that does not purport to catalog in detail the specific powers the President may employ. The need for Congress to speak broadly in recognizing and augmenting the President's core constitutional powers over foreign affairs and military campaigns is of course significantly heightened in times of national emergency. See Zemel v. Rusk, 381 U.S. 1, 17 (1965) ("[B]ecause of the changeable and explosive nature of contemporary international relations . . . . Congress—in giving the Executive authority over matters of foreign affairs—must of necessity paint with a brush broader than that it customarily wields in domestic areas.").

The Supreme Court rejected a similar argument that the Resolution could not be read to have implicitly authorized the detention of enemy combatants as a traditional incident of force because Congress had specifically authorized detention in certain USA PATRIOT Act provisions. Only Justices Souter and Ginsburg subscribed to that position, which was rejected by a majority of Justices. See Hamdi, 542 U.S. at 551 (Souter, J., concurring in part, dissenting in part, and concurring in the judgment).

(3) In interpreting statutory construction on whether Congress intended to amend FISA by the Resolution, what is the impact of the rule of statutory construction that repeals or changes by implication are disfavored?

As I have explained, FISA contemplates that Congress can authorize electronic surveillance outside FISA without specifically amending FISA. Reading the Resolution to authorize the terrorist surveillance program, therefore, does not require any repeal by implication. But even if the text of FISA were clear that nothing other than an amendment to

FISA could authorize additional electronic surveillance, the Resolution would impliedly repeal as much of FISA as would prevent the President from using "all necessary and appropriate force" in order to prevent al Qaeda and its allies from launching another terrorist attack against the United States. To be sure, repeals by implication are disfavored and are generally not found whenever two statutes are "capable of co-existence." Ruckelshaus v. Monsanto Co., 467 U.S. 986, 1018 (1984). Under this standard, however, an implied repeal may be found where one statute would "unduly interfere with" the operation of another. Radzanower v. Touche Ross & Co., 426 U.S. 148, 156 (1976).

In keeping with historical practice, the Resolution, to use Justice O'Connor's language from Hamdi, "clearly and unmistakably" authorizes the President to use fundamental and accepted incidents of the use of military force, including signals intelligence (without prior judicial approval). Interpreting FISA to prohibit what the Resolution "clearly and unmistakably" authorizes would create a clear conflict between the Resolution and FISA. In that case, FISA's restrictions on the use of electronic surveillance would preclude the President from doing what the Resolution "clearly and unmistakably" authorizes him to do: use all "necessary and appropriate force" to prevent al Qaeda from carrying out future attacks against the United States. And in that event, the ordinary restrictions in FISA could not continue to apply if the Resolution is to have its full effect; those constraints would "unduly interfere" with the operation of the Resolution.

Like other canons of statutory construction, the canon against implied repeals is simply a presumption that may be rebutted by other factors, including conflicting canons. Connecticut National Bank v. Germain, 503 U.S. 249, 253 (1992); see also Chickasaw Nation v. United States, 534 U.S. 84, 94 (2001); Circuit City Stores, Inc. v. Adams, 532 U.S. 105, 115 (2001). Indeed, the Supreme Court has declined to apply the ordinary presumption against implied repeals where other canons apply and suggest the opposite result. See Montana v. Blackfeet Tribe of Indians, 471 U.S. 759, 765-66 (1985). Moreover, Blackfeet suggests that where the presumption against implied repeals would conflict with other, more compelling interpretive imperatives, it simply does not apply at all. See 471 U.S. at 766. Here, in light of the constitutional avoidance canon, which imposes the overriding imperative to use the tools of statutory interpretation to avoid constitutional conflicts, the presumption against implied repeals either would not apply at all or would apply with significantly reduced force. We explain this point in more detail in the paper of January 19, 2006. In addition, the Resolution was enacted during an acute national emergency, where the type of deliberation and detail normally required for application of the canon against implied repeals was neither practical nor warranted. In such circumstances, Congress cannot be expected to work through every potential implication of the U.S. Code and to define with particularity each of the traditional incidents of the use of force available to the President.

(4) In interpreting statutory construction on whether Congress intended to amend FISA by the Resolution, what would be the impact of the rule of statutory construction that specific statutory language, like that in FISA, trumps or takes precedence over more general pronouncements like those of the Resolution?

We do not believe that this canon of construction applies here. As the Supreme Court has explained, "[s]tatutory construction is a holistic endeavor." Koons Buick Pontiac GMC, Inc. v. Nigh, 543 U.S. 50, 60 (2004) (quotation marks and citations omitted). And we read the Resolution and FISA together to allow the terrorist surveillance program. In any event, if one were to apply this canon of construction, it is not clear which provision is more specific. Although FISA deals specifically with electronic surveillance, the Resolution deals specifically with our current armed conflict with al Qaeda. In addition, as noted above, other, more compelling canons of construction—including the canon of constitutional avoidance—apply here and support the conclusion that the Resolution authorizes the terrorist surveillance program. Finally, in Hamdi, the Court found that the same general authorization satisfied the specific requirement in 18 U.S.C. § 4001(a) (2000) (prohibiting the detention of U.S. citizens "except pursuant to an Act of Congress").

(5) Why did the Executive not ask for the authority to conduct electronic surveillance when Congress passed the Patriot Act and was predisposed, to the maximum extent likely, to grant the Executive additional powers which the Executive thought necessary?

The Administration has worked quite successfully with Congress in the USA PATRIOT Act and in other legislation to help make FISA more effective. FISA is an essential and invaluable tool, not just in the armed conflict with al Qaeda but also to protect the national security against myriad threats. But the Administration did not seek additional legislation regarding the terrorist surveillance program for two reasons. First, the President's constitutional authority as Commander in Chief, recognized and supplemented by Congress in the Resolution, amply supports the legality of the program. Second, as noted above, the legislative process may have revealed, and hence compromised, the program.

(6) Wasn't President Carter's signature on FISA in 1978, together with his signing statement, an explicit renunciation of any claim to inherent Executive authority under Article II of the Constitution to conduct warrantless domestic surveillance when the Act provided the exclusive procedures for such surveillance?

We believe, and the courts have agreed, that the President has constitutional authority to conduct warrantless foreign intelligence surveillance even in times of peace. See In re Sealed Case, 310 F.3d 717, 742 (Foreign Intel. Surv. Ct. of Rev. 2002) ("[A]ll the other courts to have decided the issue [have] held that the President did have inherent authority to conduct warrantless searches to obtain foreign intelligence information. . . . We take for granted that the President does have that authority and, assuming that is so, FISA could not encroach on the President's constitutional power.") (emphasis added). A President cannot give away that authority or any other authority that the Constitution vests in the office of the President. See New York v. United States, 505 U.S. 144, 182 (1992) ("The constitutional authority of Congress cannot be expanded by the 'consent' of the governmental unit whose domain is thereby narrowed, whether that unit is the Executive Branch or the States.") (collecting authorities). Nor do we believe that President Carter attempted to do so. President Carter's Attorney General testified at a hearing on FISA as follows: "[T]he current bill recognizes no inherent power of the President to conduct electronic surveillance, and I want to interpolate here to say that this does not take away the power of the President under the Constitution. It simply, in my view, is not necessary to state that power, so there is no reason to reiterate or iterate it as the case may be. It is in the Constitution, whatever it is. The President, by offering this legislation, is agreeing to follow the statutory procedure." Foreign Intelligence Surveillance: Hearings Before the Subcomm. on Legislation of the House Permanent Select Comm. on Intelligence, 95th Cong. 15 (Jan. 10, 1978) (emphasis added). Thus, in saying that President Carter agreed to follow the procedures, Attorney General Bell made clear that FISA could not take away the President's Article II authority.

(7) Why didn't the President seek a warrant from the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court authorizing in advance the electronic surveillance in issue? (The FISA Court has the experience and authority to issue such a warrant. The FISA Court has a record establishing its reliability for non-disclosure or leaking contrasted with concerns that disclosures to members of Congress involved a high risk of disclosure or leaking. The FISA Court is at least as reliable, if not more so, than the Executive Branch on avoiding disclosure or leaks.)

Let me stress that the FISA Court has been enormously valuable. And we routinely trust the FISA judges with many of the Nation's most closely held secrets. As I have explained elsewhere, the President authorized the terrorist surveillance program strictly as an early warning system in our armed conflict with al Qaeda. The optimal way to achieve the necessary speed and agility to protect the Nation from another catastrophic al Qaeda attack is to leave the decisions about intercepting particular international communications to the judgment of professional intelligence officers, based on the best available intelligence information. The delay inherent in the FISA process is incompatible with the narrow purpose of this early warning system. As explained in response to the next question, it takes considerable time to begin coverage under FISA, even making full use of FISA's emergency authorization procedures. Let me emphasize, however, that under the terrorist surveillance program, these intelligence officers, who are experts on al Qaeda and its tactics (including its use of communication systems) apply a probable cause standard (specifically, "reasonable grounds to believe") before intercepting any communications. The critical advantage offered by the terrorist surveillance program compared to FISA is who makes the probable cause determination and how many layers of review must occur before surveillance begins. In the narrow context of defending the Nation in this congressionally authorized armed conflict with al Qaeda, we must allow these professionals to use their skills and knowledge to protect us.

(8) Why did the Executive Branch not seek after-the-fact authorization from the FISA Court within the 72 hours as provided by the Act? At a minimum, shouldn't the Executive have sought authorization from the FISA Court for law enforcement individuals to listen to a reduced number of conversations which were selected out from a larger number of conversations from the mechanical surveillance?

Like the first question, this question reflects several prevalent misimpressions regarding FISA and the terrorist surveillance program. Such misconceptions are, perhaps, an expected though unfortunate consequence of media reporting, which is often incorrect and confused and of our need to continue to protect intelligence sources and methods. I welcome this opportunity to clarify some points.

First, contrary to the speculation reflected in some media reporting, the terrorist surveillance program is not a dragnet that sucks in all conversations and uses computer searches to pick out calls of interest. No communications are intercepted unless first it is determined that one end of the call is outside of the country and professional intelligence experts have probable cause (that is, "reasonable grounds to believe") that a party to the communication is a member or agent of al Qaeda or an affiliated terrorist organization.

Second, this is a wartime intelligence activity undertaken in the midst of a congressionally authorized armed conflict; it is not a law enforcement tool. "[L]aw enforcement individuals" do not monitor conversations under the terrorist surveillance program; intelligence professionals with the Department of Defense do.

Third, the emergency authorization provision in FISA, which allows 72 hours of surveillance before obtaining a court order, does not—as many believe—allow the Government to undertake surveillance immediately. Rather, in order to authorize emergency surveillance under FISA, the Attorney General must personally "determine[] that . . . the factual basis for issuance of an order under [FISA] to approve such surveillance exists." 50 U.S.C. § 1805(f)(2) (2000 & Supp. II 2002). FISA requires the Attorney General to determine that this condition is satisfied in advance of authorizing the surveillance to begin. The process needed to make that determination, in turn, takes precious time. By the time I am presented with the application, the information will have passed from intelligence officers at the National Security Agency ("NSA") to NSA attorneys for vetting. Once NSA attorneys are satisfied, they will pass the information along to Department of Justice attorneys. And once these attorneys are satisfied, they will present the information to me. And this same process takes the decision away from the intelligence officers best situated to make it during an armed conflict. We can afford neither of these consequences in this armed conflict with an enemy that has already proven its ability to strike within the United States.

(9) Was consideration given to the dichotomy between conversations by mechanical surveillance from conversations listened to by law enforcement personnel with the contention that the former was non-invasive and only the latter was invasive? Would this distinction have made it practical to obtain Court approval before the conversations were subject to human surveillance or after-the-fact approval within 72 hours?

This question reflects the same misconceptions as question 8. As explained in my answer to that question, the terrorist surveillance program is narrowly targeted at the international communications of persons linked to al Qaeda. Moreover, it is a wartime intelligence activity, not a law enforcement operation. Finally, FISA's emergency authorization provision does not provide the Government with the necessary flexibility. As explained above, FISA requires a time-consuming process before even emergency surveillance can begin.

(10) Would you consider seeking approval from the FISA Court at this time for the ongoing surveillance program at issue?

We use FISA where we can, and we always consider all of our legal options.

(11) How can the Executive justify disclosure to only the so-called "Gang of Eight" instead of the full intelligence committees when Title V of the National Security Act of 1947 provides:

SEC.501.50 U.S.C. 413(1) The President shall ensure that the congressional intelligence committees are kept fully and currently informed of the intelligence activities of the United States, including any significant anticipated intelligence activity as required by this title.
(Emphasis added)

(2)(e) Nothing in this Act shall be construed as authority to withhold information from the congressional intelligence committees on the grounds that providing the information to the congressional intelligence committees would constitute the unauthorized disclosure of classified information or information relating to intelligence sources and methods.
(Emphasis added)

The quoted provisions of the National Security Act must be read together with the two specific notification provisions: 50 U.S.C. § 413a(a) (Supp. II 2002) (notification for intelligence activities other than covert actions) and 50 U.S.C. § 413b(b) (2000 & Supp. II 2002) (notification for covert actions).

> Section 413a(a): To the extent consistent with due regard for the protection from unauthorized disclosure of classified information relating to sensitive intelligence sources and methods or other exceptionally sensitive matters, the Director of National Intelligence and the heads of all departments, agencies, and other entities of the United States Government involved in intelligence activities shall--

> (1) keep the congressional intelligence committees fully and currently informed of all intelligence activities, other than a covert action (as defined in section 413b(e) of this title), which are the responsibility of, are engaged in by, or are carried out for or on behalf of, any department, agency, or entity of the United States Government, including any significant anticipated intelligence activity and any significant intelligence failure; and
> (2) furnish the congressional intelligence committees any information or material concerning intelligence activities, other than covert actions, which is within their custody or control, and which is requested by either of the congressional intelligence committees in order to carry out its authorized responsibilities.

(Emphasis added.)

Section 413b(b): To the extent consistent with due regard for the protection from unauthorized disclosure of classified information relating to sensitive intelligence sources and methods or other exceptionally sensitive matters, the Director of National Intelligence and the heads of all departments, agencies, and entities of the United States Government involved in a covert action--

> (1) shall keep the congressional intelligence committees fully and currently informed of all covert actions which are the responsibility of, are engaged in by, or are carried out for or on behalf of, any department, agency, or entity of the United States Government, including significant failures; and
> (2) shall furnish to the congressional intelligence committees any information or material concerning covert actions which is in the possession, custody, or control of any department, agency, or entity of the United States Government and which is requested by either of the congressional intelligence committees in order to carry out its authorized responsibilities.

(Emphasis added.)

Each of these notification requirements, in turn, requires that the Executive Branch keep the intelligence committees "fully and currently informed of all intelligence activities," but only "to the extent consistent with due regard for the protection from unauthorized disclosure of classified information relating to sensitive intelligence sources and methods or other exceptionally sensitive matters." This express exception gives the Executive Branch flexibility to brief only certain members of the intelligence committees where more widespread briefings would pose an unacceptable risk to the national security. Section 501(a)(1) of the National Security Act, quoted in the question, requires the President to ensure that the relevant intelligence officials comply with the appropriate notification requirements, sections 413a(a) and 413b(b).

Consistent with the statutory language, it has for decades been the practice of both Democratic and Republican administrations to inform only the Chair and Ranking Members of the intelligence committees about certain exceptionally sensitive matters. Even the Congressional Research Service has acknowledged that the leaders of the intelligence committees "over time have accepted the executive branch practice of limiting notification of intelligence activities in some cases to either the Gang of Eight, or to the chairmen and ranking members of the intelligence committees." See Alfred Cumming, Congressional Research Service, Re: Statutory Procedures Under Which Congress in to be Informed of U.S Intelligence Activities, Including Covert Actions 10 (Jan. 18, 2006). The Administration followed this well-established practice by briefing only the leadership of the Intelligence Committees and, at a more general level, the leaders of both houses of Congress about the NSA activities.

(12) To the extent that it can be disclosed in a public hearing (or to be provided in a closed executive session), what are the facts upon which the Executive relies to assert Article II wartime authority over Congress' Article I authority to establish public policy on these issues especially where legislation is approved by the President as contrasted with being enacted over a Presidential veto as was the case with the War Powers Act?

Congress itself expressly recognized in the Resolution that "the President has authority under the Constitution to take action to deter and prevent acts of international terrorism against the United States." The Supreme Court has repeatedly reached the same conclusion. See, e.g., The Prize Cases, 67 U.S. (2 Black) 635, 668-70 (1863). As explained in the Department's paper of January 19, 2006, the Framers of the Constitution intended to place this authority in the President.

Our legal analysis, however, does not require that we assert any Article II authority over Congress's Article I authority. Rather, Congress, in passing the Resolution, exercised its Article I authority consistent with the Executive Branch's authority under Article II to authorize electronic surveillance as an incident of using military force to protect the Nation in an armed conflict. As explained in more detail in the Department's paper of January 19, 2006, the Resolution thus places the President's authority to use military force and the traditional incidents of the use of such force against al Qaeda at its maximum because he is acting with the express authorization of Congress. Under the three-part framework of Justice Jackson's concurring opinion in Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. v. Sawyer, 343 U.S. 579, 635-38 (1952) (Jackson, J., concurring), the President's authority falls within Category I. He is acting "pursuant to an express or implied authorization of Congress," and the President's authority "includes all that he possesses in his own right [under the Constitution] plus all that Congress can" confer on him. Id. at 635.

In any event, it is not at all clear that our conclusions would be contrary to the policy choices made by Congress in 1978. First, as already explained, FISA contemplates that subsequent legislation, such as the Resolution, can authorize electronic surveillance outside FISA procedures. Second, it is notable that FISA defines "electronic surveillance" carefully and precisely. 50 U.S.C. § 1801(f) (2000 & Supp. 2002). And, as confirmed by another provision, 18 U.S.C. § 2511(2)(f) (Supp. II 2002) (carving out from statutory regulation the acquisition of intelligence information from "international or foreign communications" and "foreign intelligence activities . . . involving a foreign electronic communications system" as long as they are accomplished "utilizing a means other than electronic surveillance as defined" by FISA), and by FISA's legislative history, Congress did not intend FISA to regulate certain communications intelligence activities of the NSA, including certain communications involving persons in the United States. See, e.g., S. Rep. No. 95-604, at 64 (1978). Since FISA's enactment in 1978, however, the means of transmitting communications has undergone extensive transformation. In particular, many communications that would have been carried by wire are now transmitted through the air, and many communications that would have been carried by radio signals (including by satellite transmissions) are now transmitted by fiber optic cables. It is such technological advancements that have broadened FISA's reach, not any particularized congressional judgment that the NSA's traditional activities in intercepting such international communications should be subject to FISA's procedures. A full explanation of these technological changes would require a discussion of classified information.

Given the President's constitutional authority to protect the Nation from armed attack, whether and to what extent FISA may interfere with that authority is a difficult and serious constitutional question. The Supreme Court, however, has repeatedly counseled that such questions must be avoided "where an alternative interpretation of the statute is 'fairly possible.'" INS v. St. Cyr, 533 U.S. 289, 299-300 (2001) (citations omitted); Ashwander v. TVA, 297 U.S. 288, 345-48 (1936) (Brandeis, J., concurring). Because FISA can be interpreted, together with the Resolution, to allow the President to authorize this necessary early warning system in the congressionally authorized armed conflict with al Qaeda, and because much of FISA's current reach is a result of technological changes rather than congressional intent, we need not address this constitutional question.

(13) What case law does the Executive rely upon in asserting Article II powers to conduct the electronic surveillance at issue?

The case law is set forth in detail in the Department's paper of January 19, 2006. With respect to the President's constitutional authority to conduct warrantless foreign intelligence surveillance, we rely on cases such as In re Sealed Case, 310 F.3d 717 (Foreign Intel. Surv. Ct. of Rev. 2002), and United States v. Truong Dinh Hung, 629 F.2d 908 (4th Cir. 1980). In re Sealed Case notes that "all the other courts to have decided the issue [have] held that the President did have inherent authority to conduct warrantless searches to obtain foreign intelligence information." 310 F.3d at 742. The court then "t[ook] for granted that the President does have that authority" and explained that "FISA could not encroach on the President's constitutional power." Id.

We also rely on the Supreme Court's interpretation of the Resolution in Hamdi v. Rumsfeld, 542 U.S. 507 (2004), which confirms that Congress in the Resolution gave its express approval to the military conflict against al Qaeda and its allies and thereby to the President's use of all fundamental and accepted incidents of the use of military force in this current military conflict. Because the use of warrantless electronic surveillance aimed at the enemy's communications is, as explained in the paper of January 19th, a fundamental and accepted incident of the use of military force, under the reasoning of Hamdi, the Resolution "clearly and unmistakably authorize[s]" the terrorist surveillance program. Id. at 519 (plurality opinion).

DOJ_NMG_0013284

More basically, a line of cases strongly supports the President's inherent authority to protect the Nation, see, e.g., The Prize Cases, 67 U.S. (2 Black) 635, 668 (1863), and Americans abroad, see Durand v. Hollins, 8 F. Cas. 111, 112 (C.C.S.D.N.Y. 1860) (No. 4186). Other cases, including United States v. Curtiss-Wright Export Corp., 299 U.S. 304, 319 (1936), make clear the President's preeminent role in conducting the Nation's foreign affairs.

(14) What academic or expert opinions does the Executive rely upon in asserting Article II powers to conduct the electronic surveillance at issue?

As explained above, our analysis does not require that we assert any Article II power over Congress's Article I powers. As to whether the President has constitutional authority to conduct foreign intelligence surveillance, we rely primarily upon the uniform case law summarized by the FISA Court of Review. See In re Sealed Case, 310 F.3d at 742. We do not believe that this point, which has generally been conceded even by those academics criticizing the terrorist surveillance program, is controversial. See Letter to the Hon. Bill Frist, Majority Leader, U.S. Senate, from Professor Curtis A. Bradley et al. at 6 (Jan. 9, 2006).

Our analysis of the Resolution is supported by several law review articles, notably one by Curtis Bradley and Jack Goldsmith. See Curtis A. Bradley & Jack L. Goldsmith, Congressional Authorization and the War on Terrorism, 118 Harv. L. Rev. 2047, 2091 (2005) (explaining that "Congress intended to authorize the President to take at least those actions permitted by the laws of war"); see also Michael Stokes Paulsen, Youngstown Goes to War, 19 Const. Comment. 215 (2002).

Most importantly, our analysis is fully supported by those who best know this technical area of the law and who have access to all of the pertinent facts—career attorneys at the NSA and the Department of Justice.

(15) When foreign calls (whether between the caller and the recipient both being on foreign soil or one of the callers or recipients being on foreign soil and the other in the U.S.) were routed through switches which were physically located on U.S. soil, would that constitute a violation of law or regulation restricting NSA from conducting surveillance inside the United States, absent a claim of unconstitutionality on encroaching the powers under Article II?

As explained above, none of the intercepts at issue constitutes a violation of law or regulation. I cannot give a more complete answer here, because I cannot go into operational details.

SEN. SPECTER: (Sounds gavel.) It's 9:30. The Judiciary Committee will now proceed with our hearing on the administration's program administered by the National Security Agency on surveillance. We welcome the attorney general of the United States here today, who will be testifying.

We face as a nation, as we all know, an enormous threat from international terrorism. The terrorists attacked this country on 9/11 and we remain in danger of renewed terrorist attacks. The president of the United States has the fundamental responsibility to protect the country, but even as the Supreme Court has said, the president does not have a blank check. And this hearing is designed to examine the legal underpinnings of the administration's program from the point of view of the statutory interpretation, and also from the point of view of constitutional law.

The Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act was passed in 1978 and has a forceful and blanket prohibition against any electronic surveillance without a court order. That law was signed by President Carter with a signing statement that that was the exclusive way for electronic surveillance.

There is beyond a constitutional issue as to whether the president has inherent powers under Article II of the Constitution to undertake a program of this sort. If the president has constitutional authority, that trumps and supersedes the statute. The Constitution is the fundamental law of the country, and a statute cannot be inconsistent with a constitutional provision.

We will be examining the administration's contention that, notwithstanding the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, there is statutory authority for what the president has done by virtue of the resolution of Congress authorizing the use of force against the terrorists. I have already expressed myself as being skeptical of that interpretation, but I believe the administration is entitled to a full and fair opportunity to advance their legal case on that important issue.

We will be examining with the attorney general the generalized rules of statutory interpretation. One of them is that a repeal by implication is disfavored and that the specific governs the generalizations. And in the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, you have the specific prohibition, contrasted with the generalized authority under the resolution for the authorization for the use of force.

I sent a letter to the attorney general propounding some 15 questions, and I thank the attorney general for his responses. And they will provide to a substantial extent the framework for our discussion here today.

One of the key points on my mind is the role of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court. And one of the questions which I asked of the attorney general was the role of the court in granting permission in advance, the role of the court in granting permission within 72 hours after the president exercised the surveillance authority, and beyond that, the issue as to whether the administration might now considering -- consider having the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court review this entire issue.

The whole question of probable cause is one with very substantial flexibility under our laws, depending upon the circumstances of the case. The Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court has a great reputation for integrity -- no leaks, candidly, unlike the Congress; candidly, unlike the administration; candidly, unlike all of Washington, perhaps all of the world. But when that court has secrets, they keep the secrets, and they also are well-respected in terms of their technical competence.

And one of the questions, the lead question which I will be asking the attorney general, is whether the administration would consider sending this entire program to the court for their evaluation. The scope of this hearing is to examine the law on the subject, and the ground rules are that we will not inquire into the factual underpinnings of what is being undertaken here. That is for another committee and for another day. That is for the Intelligence Committee and that is for a closed session. It may be that some of the questions which we will ask the attorney general on legal issues may, in his mind, require a closed session, and if they do, we will accommodate his request in that regard.

One of the other questions which I will be directing to the attorney general, following up on the letter, is the practice of making disclosures only to the so-called gang of eight, the speaker and the Democratic leader in the House, the majority leader and the Democratic leader in the Senate, and the chairman and vice president of the two intelligence committees; and the adequacy of that in terms of the statute, which calls for disclosure to the committees, and the committees are much broader. And if the administration thinks that the current law is too broad, they have the standing to ask us to change the law, and we would certainly consider that on a showing of necessity to do so.

We have told the attorney general we would require his presence all day. We will have 10-minute rounds, which is double what is the practice of this committee. And as I've announced in advance, we will have multiple rounds.

There has been some question about swearing in the attorney general, and I discussed that with the attorney general, who said he would be willing to be sworn. After reflecting on the matter, I think it is unwarranted because the law provides ample punishment for a false official statement or a false statement to Congress under the provisions of 18 United States Code 1001, and 18 United States Code Section 1505. The penalties are equivalent to those under the perjury laws.

There has been a question raised as to legal memoranda within the department. And at this time and on this showing, it is my judgment that that issue ought to be reserved to another day. I'm sure it will come up in the course of questioning. The attorney general will have an opportunity to amplify on the administration's position. But there is a fairly well-settled doctrine that internal memoranda within the Department of Justice are not subject to disclosure because of the concern that it would have a chilling effect; that if lawyers are concerned that what they write may later be subjected to review by others, they'll be less than candid in their positions. This committee has faced those issues in recent times with requests for internal memoranda of Chief Justice Roberts, and they were not produced, and they were more relevant there than here because of the issue of finding some ideas as to how Chief Justice Roberts would function on the court if confirmed. !

Here we h

One other issue has arisen, and that is the issue of showing a video. And I think that would not be in order. The transcripts of what the president said and the transcripts of what you, Mr. Attorney General, said earlier in a discussion with Senator Feingold are of record. This is not a Sunday morning talk show. And the transcripts contain the full statement as to legal import and legal effect, and I'm sure that those statements by the president and those statements by you will receive considerable attention by this committee.

That's longer than I usually talk, but this is a very big subject.

SEN. RUSSELL D. FEINGOLD (D-WI): Mr. Chairman?

SEN. SPECTER: This is the first of a series of hearings and at least two more because of the very profound and very deep questions which we have here beyond statutory interpretation and the constitutional implications of the president's Article II powers, and this is all in the context of the United States being under a continuing threat from terrorism. But the beauty of our system is the separation of powers, the ability of the Congress to call upon the administration for responses, the response of the attorney general and being willing to come here today, and then the Supreme Court to resolve any conflicts.

I'd like to yield now to our --

SEN. FEINGOLD: Mr. Chairman?

SEN. SPECTER: -- distinguished --

SEN. FEINGOLD: Mr. Chairman? Mr. Chairman, could I just ask a quick clarification?

SEN. SPECTER: Senator Feingold?

SEN. FEINGOLD: I heard your judgment about the -- whether the witness should be sworn. What would be the distinction between this occasion and the confirmation hearing where he was sworn?

SEN. SPECTER: The distinction is that it is the practice to swear nominees for attorney general or nominees for the Supreme Court or nominees for other Cabinet positions. But the attorney's general have appeared here on many occasions in the 25 years that I have been there, and there might be a showing, Senator Feingold, of -- to warrant swearing.

SEN. FEINGOLD: Mr. Chairman, I just say that the reason that anyone would want him sworn has to do with the fact that certain statements were made under oath at the confirmation hearing. So, it seems to me, logical that since we're going to be asking about similar things, that he should be sworn in this occasion as well. SEN. PATRICK J. LEAHY (D-VT): And, Mr. Chairman, if I might on that point, if I might on that point, of course, the attorney general was sworn in on another occasion other than his confirmation, when he and Director Mueller appeared before this committee for oversight. And I had asked the chairman if he knows earlier that he should be sworn in this, and I made that request right after the press had pointed out where an answer to Senator Feingold appeared not to have been truthful. And I thought that that is an issue that's going to be brought up during this hearing, and we should go into it. I also recall the chairman and other Republicans ins!

isting th

I think because -- especially because of the article about the questions of the senator from Wisconsin, Senator Feingold, I believe he should have been sworn. That is obviously the prerogative of the chairman, but I would state again and state strongly for the record what I've told the chairman privately. I think in this instance, similar to what you did in April with Attorney General Gonzales and Director Mueller, both of whom were sworn, and as the chairman did on -- assisted with then-Attorney General Reno, I believe they should be sworn in.

SEN. SPECTER: Well, Senator Leahy and I have not disagreed on very much in more than a year since we've worked together as ranking --

SEN. LEAHY: I know.

SEN. SPECTER: -- and chairman, and I think it's strengthened the committee. And I did receive your request, and I went back and dug out the transcript and reviewed Senator Feingold's vigorous cross- examination of the attorney general at the confirmation hearings, and I know the issues as to torture which Senator Feingold raised and the issues which Senator Feingold raised as to searches without warrants. And I have reviewed the provisions of 18 U.S.C. 1001, and the case involving Admiral Poindexter, who was convicted under that provision. And I've reviewed the provisions of 18 United States Code 1505, where Oliver North was convicted, and there are penalties provided there commensurate with perjury, and it is my judgment that it is unnecessary to swear the witness.

SEN. LEAHY: Well, Mr. Chairman, may I ask if the witness has no objection to being sworn? Why not just do it and not have this question raised here? I realize only the chairman can do the swearing-in. I -- otherwise, I'd offer to give him the oath myself in so far as he said he would supposedly be sworn in. But I -- if he's willing to be, why not just do it?

SEN. JEFF SESSIONS (R-AL): Mr. Chairman --

SEN. SPECTER: The answer to why I'm not going to do it is that I've examined all the facts, and I've examined the law, and I have asked the attorney general whether he would object or mind, and he said he wouldn't, and I have put that on the record. But the reason I'm not going to swear him in -- it's not up to him. Attorney General Gonzales is not the chairman, I am, and I'm going to make the ruling.

SEN. SESSIONS: Mr. Chairman --

SEN. : Mr. Chairman --

SEN. LEAHY: I would point out that he's been here before this committee three times. The other two times he was sworn. It seems unusual not to swear him this time.

SEN. RICHARD DURBIN (D-IL): Mr. Chairman, I move the witness be sworn. SEN. SPECTER: The chairman has ruled. If there is an appeal from the ruling of the chair, I have a pretty good idea how it's going to come out.

SEN. DURBIN (?): Mr. Chairman, I appeal the ruling, too.

SEN. SPECTER: All in favor of the ruling of the chair say, "Aye."

SEN. : Aye.

SEN. : Roll call.

SEN. SPECTER: Opposed?

SEN. LEAHY: Roll call's been requested.

SEN. (DURBIN ?): Mr. Chairman, ask for roll call vote.

SEN. ORRIN G. HATCH (R-UT): What's the ruling? What are we voting on?

SEN. SPECTER: The clerk will call the roll. (Pause.) I'll the call the roll.

SEN. SESSIONS: (Inaudible) -- the question. (Laughter.)

SEN. SPECTER: Senator Hatch?

SEN. HATCH: No.

SEN. SPECTER: Senator Grassley?

SEN. CHARLES E. GRASSLEY (R-IA): No.

SEN. SPECTER: Senator Kyl.

SEN. JON KYL (R-AZ): Mr. Chairman, is the question to uphold or to reject the ruling of the chair?

SEN. SPECTER: The question is to uphold the ruling of the chair, so we're looking for "ayes," Senator. (Laughter.)

SEN. LEAHY: But we're very happy with the "nos" that have started on the Republican side! (Being the better position ?).

SEN. HATCH: I'm glad somebody clarified that! Aye.

SEN. SPECTER: The question is: Should the ruling of the chair be upheld that Attorney General Gonzales not be sworn?

SEN. HATCH: Aye.

SEN. KYL: Aye.

SEN. MIKE DEWINE (R-OH): Aye.

SEN. SESSIONS: Aye.

SEN. LINDSEY GRAHAM (R-SC): Aye.

SEN. JOHN CORNYN (R-TX): Aye.

SEN. SPECTER: By proxy for Senator Brownback, aye.

Senator Coburn?

SEN. TOM COBURN (R-OK): Aye.

SEN. : Proxies?

SEN. : Where are those proxies?

SEN. SPECTER: We've got enough votes already.

Senator Leahy?

SEN. LEAHY: Emphatically no. SEN. TED KENNEDY (D-MA): No.

SEN. JOSEPH BIDEN (D-DE): No.

SEN. HERBERT KOHL (D-WI): No.

SEN. DIANNE FEINSTEIN (D-CA): No.

SEN. RUSSELL FEINGOLD (D-WI): No.

SEN. CHARLES SCHUMER (D-NY): No.

SEN. RICHARD DURBIN (D-IL): No.

SEN. SPECTER: Aye.

The ayes have it.

SEN. FEINGOLD: Mr. Chairman, I request to see the proxies given by the Republican senators.

SEN. : Come on!

SEN. SPECTER: Would you repeat that, Senator Feingold?

SEN. FEINGOLD: I request to see the proxies given by the Republican senators.

SEN. SPECTER: The --

SEN. LEAHY: He has that right.

SEN. SPECTER: The practice is to rely upon the staffers. But without counting that vote -- (pause) -- Well, we can rephrase the question if there's any serious challenge of the proxies. This is really not a very good way to begin this hearing. But I found that patience is a good practice here.

SEN. SESSIONS: Mr. Chairman? Mr. Chairman?

SEN. SPECTER: Senator Sessions.

SEN. SESSIONS: I'm very disappointed that we went through this process. This attorney general, in my view, is a man of integrity. And having read the questions, as you have, as Senator Feingold put forward, in his answers I believe he'll have a perfect answer to those questions when they come at this hearing, and I do not believe they're going to show he perjured himself in any way or was inaccurate in what he said.

And I remember having a conversation with General Myers and Secretary of Defense Rumsfeld, and one of the saddest days in their career was having to come in here and stand before a senate committee and raise their hand as if they are not trustworthy in matters relating to the defense of this country. And I think it's not necessary that a duly confirmed Cabinet member have to routinely stand up and just give an oath when they are, in effect, under oath and subject to prosecution if they don't tell the truth. I think it's just a question of propriety and good taste and due respect from one branch to the other. And that's why I would support the chair.

SEN. LEAHY: Mr. Chairman, I don't --

SEN. SPECTER: Let's -- let's not engage in protracted debate on this subject. We're not going to swear this witness. We have the votes to stop it.

Senator Leahy.

SEN. LEAHY: Mr. Chairman, I've stated my position why I believe he should be sworn in, but I understand that you have the majority of votes.

You know, the question for this hearing goes into the illegality of the government's domestic spying on ordinary Americans without a warrant. The question facing us is not whether the government should have all the tools it needs to protect the American people. Of course it should. Every single member of Congress agrees they should have all the tools necessary to protect the American people.

The terrorist threat to America's security remains very real. We should have the tools to protect America's security. That's why I co- authored the Patriot Act five years ago, and why it passed with such broad, bipartisan support, and I would also remind everybody that's why we amended FISA, the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, five times since 9/11 to give it more flexibility, twice during the time when I was chairman.

We all agree that if you have al Qaeda terrorists calling, we should be wiretapping them. We don't even need authority to do that overseas and certainly going into so far the unsuccessful effort to catch Osama bin Laden in Afghanistan. Congress has given the president authority to monitor al Qaeda messages legally, with checks to guard against abuses when Americans' conversations and e-mails are being monitored. But instead of doing what the president has the authority to do legally, he's decided to do it illegally, without safeguards.

A judge from the special court Congress created to monitor domestic spying would grant any request to monitor an al Qaeda terrorist. Of the approximately 20,000 foreign intelligence warrant applications to these judges over the past 28 years, about a half dozen have been turned down.

I'm glad the chairman's having today's hearing. We have precious little oversight in this Congress, but the chairman and I have a long history of conducting vigorous, bipartisan oversight investigation. And if Congress is going to serve the role it should instead of being a rubber stamp for whoever is in the executive, we have to have these kind of oversights.

The domestic spying programs into e-mails and telephone calls apparently conducted by the National Security Agency was first reported by The New York Times on December 16, 2005. The next day, President Bush publicly admitted that secret, domestic wiretapping has been conducted without warrants since late 2001, and that he's issued secret orders to do this more than 30 times. We've asked for those presidential orders allowing secret eavesdropping on Americans; they have not been provided. We've asked for official legal opinions of the government that the administration say justify this program; they, too, have been withheld from us.

Now the hearing is expressly about the legality of this program. It's not about the operational details. It's about whether we can legally spy on Americans. In order for us to conduct effective oversight, we need the official documents to get those answers. We're an oversight committee of the United States Senate -- the oversight committee with jurisdiction over the Department of Justice and over its enforcement of the laws of the United States. We are the duly elected representatives of the United States. It's our duty to determine whether the laws of the United States have been violated. The president and the Justice Department have a constitutional duty to faithfully execute the laws. They do not write the laws. They do not pass the laws. They do not have unchecked powers to decide what laws to follow, and they certainly don't have the power to decide what laws to ignore. They cannot violate the laws or the rights of ordinary Americans. Mr. Attorney !
General,

There is much that we do not know about the president's secret spying program. I hope we're going to get some more answers, some real answers, not self-serving characterizations.

Let's start with what we do know.

Point one: The president's secret wiretapping program is not authorized by the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act. The law expressly states it provides the exclusive source of authority for wiretapping for intelligence purposes. Wiretapping that's not authorized under this is a federal crime. That is what the law says. It's also what the law means.

This law was enacted to define how domestic surveillance for intelligence purposes can be conducted while protecting the fundamental rights of Americans.

Now, a couple generations of Americans are too young to know why we passed this law. It was enacted after decades of abuses by the executive, including the wiretapping of Dr. Martin Luther King and other political opponents of early government officials, after some of the so-called White House "enemies" in the Nixon White House enemies list. And during that time, another president asserted he did what was legal because he was president and, being president, he could do whatever he wanted to do.

The law has been updated five times since September 11, 2001. It provides broad and flexible authority. In fact, on July 31st, 2002, your Justice Department testified this law is a highly flexible statute that has proven effective. You noted: "When you are trying to prevent terrorist acts, that is really what FISA was intended to do and it was written with that in mind." But now the Bush administration concedes the president knowingly created a program involving thousands of wiretaps of Americans in the United States over the period of the last four or five years without complying with FISA. And legal scholars and former government officials, including many Republicans, have been almost unanimous in stating the obvious: This is against the law.

And point two: The authorization for the use of military force that Democratic and Republican lawmakers joined together to pass in the days immediately after the September 11 attacks did not give the president the authority to go around the FISA law to wiretap Americans illegally. That authorization said to capture or kill Osama bin Laden and to use the American military to do that. It did not authorize domestic surveillance of American citizens.

You know, let me be clear. Some Republican senators say that we're talking about special rights for terrorists. I have no interest in that. Just like every member of this committee and thousands of our staffs and every member of the House of Representatives, I go to work every single day in a building that was targeted for destruction by al Qaeda. Of course I want them captured. I wish the Bush administration had done a better job. I wish that when they had -- almost had Osama bin Laden, they had kept on after him and caught him and destroyed him rather than taking our special forces out of Afghanistan and sending them precipitously into Iraq. But my concern is the laws of America. My concern is when we see peaceful Quakers being spied upon, when we see babies and nuns who can't fly in airplanes because they're on a terrorist watchlist put together by your government.

And point three: The president never came to Congress and never sought additional legal authority to engage in the type of domestic surveillance in which the NSA has been secretly engaged for the last several years.

After September 11, 2001, I led a bipartisan effort to provide legal tools. We passed amendments to FISA. We passed the U.S. Patriot Act, and we ungraded FISA four times since then. In fact, when a Republican senator on this committee proposed a legal change to the standards needed for a FISA warrant, the Bush administration didn't support that effort, but raised questions about it and said it wasn't needed. The administration told the Senate that FISA was working just fine.

You, Mr. Attorney General, said the administration did not ask for legislation authorizing warrantless wiretapping of Americans, did not think such legislation would pass. Who did you ask? You didn't ask me. You didn't ask Senator Specter. Not only did the Bush administration not seek broader legal authority, it kept its very existence of this illegal wiretapping program completely secret from 527 of the 535 members of Congress, including members on this committee and members on the Intelligence Committee.

The administration has not suggested to Congress and the American people that FISA was inadequate, outmoded or irrelevant -- you never did that -- until the press caught you violating the statute with the secret wiretapping of Americans without warrants. In fact, in 2004, two years after he authorized the secret warrantless wiretapping program -- and this is the tape we're told we can't show -- the president said, quote, "Any time you hear the United States government talking about wiretap, a wiretap requires a court order. Nothing has changed. When we're talking about chasing down terrorists, we're talking about getting a court order before we do so."

That was when he was running for reelection. Today we know at the very -- at the very least that statement was misleading.

So let me conclude with this. I have many questions for you, but first, let me give you a message, Mr. Attorney General -- to you, to the president and to the administration. This is a message that should be unanimous from every single member of Congress no matter what their party or their ideology. Under our Constitution, Congress is the co-equal branch of government, and we make the laws. If you believe you need new laws then come and tell us. If Congress agrees, we'll amend the law. If you do not even attempt to persuade Congress to amend the law, then you're required to follow the law as it's written. That is as true of the president just as it's true of me and you and every American. That's a rule of law. That's a rule on which our nation was founded. That's the rule on which it endures and prospers.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

SEN. SPECTER: Thank you, Senator Leahy.

We turn now to the attorney general of the United States, Alberto R. Gonzales. The attorney general has held the office for a little over a year. Before that, he was counsel to the president right after the president's inauguration in 2001. He had served in state government with Governor Bush. He attended the U.S. Air Force Academy from 1975 to 1977, graduated from Rice University for a Bachelor's Degree and from the Harvard Law School, and was a partner in the distinguished firm of Vinson & Elkins in Houston before going into state government.

We have allotted 20 minutes for your opening statement, Mr. Attorney General, because of the depth and complexity and importance of the issues which you and we will be addressing.

You may proceed.

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: Good morning, Chairman Specter, Senator Leahy, and members of the committee. I'm pleased to have this opportunity to speak with you. And let me just add for the record, when Chairman Specter asked me whether I would be willing to go under oath, I did say I would have no objections. I also said that my answers would be the same, whether or not I was under oath or not. Al Qaeda and its affiliates remain deadly dangerous. Osama bin Laden recently warned America that -- quote -- "operations are under preparation, and you will see them in your homes." Bin Laden's deputy, Ayman al-Zawahiri, added just days ago that the American people are -- and again I quote -- "destined for a future colored by blood, the smoke of explosions, and the shadows of terror."

None of us can afford to shrug off warnings like this or forget that we remain a nation at war nor can we forget that this is a war against a radical and unconventional enemy. Al Qaeda has no boundaries, no government, no standing army. Yet they are capable of wreaking death and destruction on our shores. And they have sought to fight us not just with bombs and guns. Our enemies are trained in the most sophisticated communications, counter-intelligence, and counter- surveillance techniques, and their tactics they are constantly changing. They use video feed and worldwide television networks to communicate with their forces; e-mail, the Internet, and cell phone calls to direct their operations; and even our own training academies to learn how to fly aircraft as suicide-driven missiles.

To fight this unconventional war while remaining open and vibrantly engaged with the world, we must search out the terrorists abroad and pinpoint their cells here at home. To succeed, we must deploy not just soldiers and sailors, airmen and marines. We must also depend on intelligence analysts, surveillance experts, and the nimble use of our technological strengths.

Before 9/11, terrorists were clustered throughout the United States preparing their assault. We know from the 9/11 Commission Report that they communicated with their superiors abroad using e- mail, the Internet, and telephones. General Hayden, the principal deputy director of National Intelligence, testified last week before the Senate that the terrorist surveillance program instituted after 9/11 has helped us detect and prevent terror plots in the United States and abroad.

Its continuation is vital to the national defense.

Before going any further, I should make clear what I can discuss today. I am here to explain the department's assessment that the president's terrorist surveillance program is consistent with our laws and Constitution. I am not here to discuss the operational details of that program, or any other classified activity. The president has described the terrorist surveillance program in response to certain leaks, and my discussion in this open forum must be limited to those facts the president has publicly confirmed -- nothing more. Many operational details of our intelligence activities remain classified and unknown to our enemy -- and it is vital that they remain so.

The president is duty bound to do everything he can to protect the American people. He took an oath to preserve, protect and defend the Constitution. In the wake of 9/11, he told the American people that to carry out this solemn responsibility, he would use every lawful means at his disposal to prevent another attack. One of those means is the terrorist surveillance program. It's an early warning system designed for the 21st century. It is the modern equivalent to a scout team sent ahead to do reconnaissance, or a series of radar outposts designed to detect enemy movements. And as with all wartime operations, speed, agility and secrecy are essential to its success.

While the president approved this program to respond to the new threats against us, he also imposed several important safeguards to protect the privacy and civil liberties of all Americans.

First, only international communications are authorized for interception under this program -- that is communications between a foreign country and this country.

Second, the program is triggered only when a career professional at the NSA has reasonable grounds to believe that one of the parties to a communication is a member or agent of al Qaeda or an affiliated terrorist organization. As the president has said, if you're talking with al Qaeda, we want to know what you're saying.

Third, to protect the privacy of Americans still further, the NSA employs safeguards to minimize the unnecessary collection and dissemination of information about U.S. persons.

Fourth, this program is administered by career professionals at NSA. Expert intelligence analysts and their senior supervisors with access to the best available information, they make the decisions to initiate surveillance. The operation of the program is reviewed by NSA lawyers, and rigorous oversight is provided by the NSA inspector general. I have been personally assured that no other foreign intelligence program in the history of NSA has received a more thorough review.

Fifth, the program expires by its own terms approximately every 45 days.

The program may be reauthorized, but only on the recommendation of intelligence professionals, and there must be a determination that al Qaeda continues to pose a continuing threat to America based on the latest intelligence.

Finally, the bipartisan leadership of the House and Senate Intelligence Committees has known about this program for years. The bipartisan leadership of both the House and Senate has also been informed. During the course of these briefings, no members of Congress asked that the program be discontinued.

Mr. Chairman, the terrorist surveillance program is lawful in all respects. As we have thoroughly explained in our written analysis, the president is acting with authority provided both by the Constitution and by statute.

First and foremost, the program is consistent with our Constitution. Under Article II, the president has the duty and the authority to protect America from attack. Article II also makes the president, in the words of the Supreme Court, quote, "The sole organ of government in the field of international relations." These inherent authorities vested in the president by the Constitution include the power to spy on enemies like al Qaeda without prior approval from other branches of government. The courts have uniformly upheld this principle in case after case. Fifty-five years ago, the Supreme Court explained that the president's inherent constitutional authorities expressly include, quote, "The authority to use secretive means to collect intelligence necessary for the conduct of foreign affairs and military campaigns."

More recently, in 2002, the FISA Court of Review explained that, quote, "All the other courts to have decided the issue have held that the president did have inherent authority to conduct warrantless searches to obtain intelligence information." The court went on to add, quote, "We take for granted that the president does have that authority and, assuming that that is so, FISA could not encroach on the president's constitutional powers." Now, it is significant that this statement, stressing the constitutional limits of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, or FISA, came from the very appellate court that Congress established to review the decisions of the FISA Court.

Nor is this just the view of the courts. Presidents throughout our history have authorized the warrantless surveillance of the enemy during wartime. And they have done so in ways far more sweeping than the narrowly targeted terrorist surveillance program authorized by President Bush. General

Washington, for example, instructed his army to intercept letters between British operatives, copy them, and then allow those communications to go on their way. President Lincoln used the warrantless wiretapping of telegraph messages during the Civil War to discern the movements and intentions of opposing troops. President Wilson in World War I authorized the military to intercept each and every cable, telephone and telegraph communication going into or out of the United States.

During World War II, President Roosevelt instructed the government to use listening devices to learn the plans of spies in the United States. He also gave the military the authority to review, without warrant, all telecommunications, quote, "passing between the United States and any foreign country." The far more focused terrorist surveillance program fully satisfies the reasonableness requirement of the Fourth Amendment.

Now, some argue that the passage of FISA diminished the president's inherent authority to intercept enemy communications even in a time of conflict. Others disagree, contesting whether and to what degree the legislative branch may extinguish core constitutional authorities granted to the executive branch.

Mr. Chairman, I think that we can all can agree that both of the elected branches have important roles to play during a time of war. Even if we assume that the terrorist surveillance program qualifies as electronic surveillance under FISA, it complies fully with the law. This is especially so in light of the principle that statutes should be read to avoid serious constitutional questions -- a principle that has no more important application than during wartime.

By its plain terms, FISA prohibits the government from engaging in electronic surveillance, quote, "except as authorized by statute." Those words, "except as authorized by statute," are no mere incident of drafting. Instead, they constitute a far-sighted safety valve. The Congress that passed FISA in 1978 included those words so that future Congresses could address unforeseen challenges. The 1978 Congress afforded future lawmakers the ability to modify or eliminate the need for a FISA application without having to amend or repeal FISA. Congress provided this safety valve because it knew that the only thing certain about foreign threats is that they change in unpredictable ways.

Mr. Chairman, the resolution authorizing the use of military force is exactly the sort of later statutory authorization contemplated by FISA's safety valve. Just as the 1978 Congress anticipated, a new Congress in 2001 found itself facing a radically new reality. In that new environment, Congress did two critical things when it passed the force resolution.

First, Congress recognized the president's inherent constitutional authority to combat al Qaeda. These inherent authorities, as I have explained, include the right to conduct surveillance of foreign enemies operating inside this country.

Second, Congress confirmed and supplemented the president's inherent authority by authorizing him, quote, "to use all necessary and appropriate force" against al Qaeda. This is a very broadly worded authorization. It is also one that must permit electronic surveillance of those associated with al Qaeda. Our enemies operate secretly and they seek to attack us from within. In this new kind of war, it is both necessary and appropriate for us to take all possible steps to locate our enemy and know what they are plotting before they strike.

Now, all agree that it's a necessary and appropriate use of force to fire bullets and missiles at al Qaeda strongholds. Given this common ground, how can anyone conclude that it is not necessary and appropriate to intercept al Qaeda phone calls? The term "necessary and appropriate force" must allow the president to spy on our enemies, not just shoot at them blindly, hoping we might hit the right target.

In fact, other presidents have used statutes like the force resolution as a basis for authorizing far broader intelligence surveillance programs. President Wilson in World War I cited not just his inherent authority as commander in chief to intercept all telecommunications coming into and out of this country; he also relied on a congressional resolution authorizing the use of force against Germany that parallels the Force Resolution against al Qaeda.

A few members of Congress have suggested that they personally did not intend the force resolution to authorize the electronic surveillance of the enemy, al Qaeda. But we are a nation governed by written laws, not the unwritten intentions of individuals. What matters is the plain meaning of the statute passed by Congress and signed by the president. And in this case those plain words could not be clearer.

The words contained in the force resolution do not limit the president to employing certain tactics against al Qaeda; instead, they authorize the use of ALL necessary and appropriate force. Nor does the force resolution require the president to fight al Qaeda only in foreign countries. The preamble to the force resolution acknowledges the continuing threat, quote, "at home and abroad." Congress passed the force resolution in response to a threat that emerged from within our own borders. Plainly, Congress expected the president to address that threat and to do so with all necessary and appropriate force.

Importantly, the Supreme Court has already interpreted the force resolution in the Hamdi case. There, the question was whether the president had the authority to detain an American citizen as an enemy combatant, and to do so despite a specific statute that said no American citizen could be detained except as provided by Congress.

A majority of the justices in Hamdi concluded that the broad language of the force resolution gave the president the authority to employ the traditional incidents of waging war. Justice O'Connor explained that these traditional powers include the right to detain enemy combatants, and to do so even if they happen to be American citizens. If the detention of an American citizen who fought with al Qaeda is authorized by the force resolution as an incident of waging war, how can it be that merely listening to al Qaeda phone calls into and out of the country in order to disrupt their plots is not?

Now, some have asked if the president could have obtained the same intelligence using traditional FISA processes. Let me respond by assuring you that we make robust use of FISA in our war efforts. We constantly search for ways to use FISA more effectively. In this debate, however, I have been concerned that some who have asked, "Why not FISA?", do not understand how that statute really works. To be sure, FISA allows the government to begin electronic surveillance without a court order for up to 72 hours in emergency situations or circumstances, but before that emergency provision can be used, the attorney general must make a determination that all of the requirements of the FISA statute are met in advance. This requirement can be cumbersome and burdensome.

Intelligence officials at NSA first have to assess that they have identified a legitimate target. After that, lawyers at NSA have to review the request to make sure it meets all of the requirements of the statute. And then, lawyers at the Justice Department must also review the request and reach the same judgment or insist on additional information before processing the emergency application. Finally, I, as attorney general, must review the request and make the determination that all of the requirements of FISA are met. But even this is not the end of the story.

Each emergency authorization must be followed by a detailed formal application to the FISA court within three days. The government must prepare legal documents laying out all of the relevant facts and law and obtain the approval of a Cabinet-level officer as well as certification from a senior official with national security responsibility, such as the director of the FBI. Finally, a judge must review, consider and approve the application. All of these steps take time. Al Qaeda, however, does not wait.

While FISA's appropriate for general foreign intelligence collection, the president made the determination that FISA is not always sufficient for providing the sort of nimble early-warning system we need against al Qaeda. Just as we can't demand that our soldiers bring lawyers onto the battlefield, let alone get the permission of the attorney general or a court before taking action, we can't afford to impose layers of lawyers on top of career intelligence officers who are striving valiantly to provide a first line of defense by tracking secretive al Qaeda operatives in real time.

Mr. Chairman, the terrorist surveillance program is necessary, it is lawful, and it respects the civil liberties that we all share -- cherish. It is well within the mainstream of what courts and prior presidents have authorized. It is subject to careful constraints, and congressional leaders have been briefed on the details of its operation. To end the program now would be to afford our enemy dangerous and potentially deadly new room for operation within our own borders.

I have highlighted the legal authority for the terrorist surveillance program, and I look forward to our discussion and know that you appreciate there remain serious constraints on what I can say about operational details. Our enemy is listening, and I cannot help but wonder if they aren't shaking their heads in amazement at the thought that anyone would imperil such a sensitive program by leaking its existence in the first place, and smiling at the prospect that we might now disclose even more or perhaps even unilaterally disarm ourselves of a key tool in the war on terror.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

SEN. SPECTER: Thank you very much, Attorney General Gonzales.

Before proceeding to the 10-minute rounds for each of the senators, let me request that you make your answers as brief as possible. You're an experienced witness. And we will try to make our questions as pointed, as brief as each senator sees it appropriate.

SEN. LEAHY: Mr. Chairman, could I also ask that we have for the record the statement that the attorney general -- well, obviously the statement he just gave now, but the statement that he submitted to the committee under our rules a couple days ago as part of the record.

SEN. SPECTER: Is there a difference between the two statements, Mr. Attorney General?

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: Sir, there is a difference between the written statement and the oral statement, yes, sir.

SEN. SPECTER: The same?

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: There is a difference, sir. They're not the same.

SEN. SPECTER: Well, both will be made a part of the record.

SEN. LEAHY: Thank you.

SEN. SPECTER: All right. Now for the 10-minute rounds.

Mr. Attorney General, starting with the FISA court, well- respected, maintain secrecy, experienced in the field -- and I posed this question to you in my letter -- why not take your entire program to the FISA court within the broad parameters of what is reasonable and constitutional and ask the FISA court to approve it or disapprove it?

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: Senator, I totally agree with you that the FISA court should be commended for its great service. They are working on weekends, they're working at nights --

SEN. SPECTER: Now, on to my question. ATTY GEN. GONZALES: -- they're -- assisting in the war on terror.

In terms of why not go to the FISA court, once the determination was made that neither the Constitution nor FISA prohibited the use of this tool, then the question becomes for the commander in chief which of the tools is appropriate given a particular circumstance. And we studied very carefully the requirements of the Constitution under the Fourth Amendment, we studied very carefully what FISA provides for. As I said in my statement, we believe that FISA does anticipate that another statute could permit electronic surveillance --

SEN. SPECTER: Okay, you think you're right. But there are a lot of people who think you're wrong.

As a matter of public confidence, why not take it to the FISA court? What do you have to lose if you're right?

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: What I can say, Senator, is that we are continually looking at ways that we can work with the FISA court in being more efficient and more effective in fighting the war on terror. Obviously, we would consider and are always considering methods of fighting the war effectively against al Qaeda.

SEN. SPECTER: Well, speaking for myself, I would urge the president to take this matter to the FISA court. They're experts. They'll maintain the secrecy. And let's see what they have to say.

Mr. Attorney General, did Judge Robertson of the FISA court resign in protest because of this program?

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: I do not know why Judge Robertson resigned, sir.

SEN. SPECTER: Has the FISA court declined to consider any information obtained from this program when considering warrants?

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: Sir, what I can say is that the sources of information provided or included in our application are advised or disclosed to the FISA court, because, obviously, one of the things they have to do is judge the reliability --

SEN. SPECTER: So if you have information that you're submitting to the FISA court in support for a warrant, you tell them that it was obtained from this program?

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: Senator, I am -- I am uncomfortable talking about how this -- in great detail about how this information is generally shared. What I can say, as I just -- repeat what I just said, and that is, we as a matter of routine provide to the FISA court information about the sources of the information that form the basis of an application.

SEN. SPECTER: I'm not asking you -- I'm not asking you how you get the information from the program. I'm asking you, do you tell the FISA court that you got it from the program? I want to know if they are declining to issue warrants because they are dissatisfied with the program. ATTY GEN. GONZALES: Senator, I'm not -- I believe that getting into those kind of details is getting into the detail about how the program has operated. Obviously, the members of the court understand that -- the existence of this program. What I can say is we have very open and very candid discussion and relationship with the FISA court. To the extent that we're involved in intelligence activities that relate in any way to the FISA court, and they have questions about that, we have discussions with the FISA court. Our relationship with the court is extremely important, and we do everything that we can do to assure them with respect to our intelligence activities that affect decision!
s that th

SEN. SPECTER: I'm not going to press you further, but I'd ask you to reconsider your answer.

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: Yes, sir.

SEN. SPECTER: In your response to my letter, you said this, quote, "No communications are intercepted unless it is determined that" -- and then I'm leaving some material out -- "a party to the communication is a member or agent of al Qaeda or an affiliated terrorist organization." You're representing to this committee that before there's an interception, there is a determination that one of the parties is a member of al Qaeda, an agent of al Qaeda or an affiliated terrorist organization. Is that true?

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: Sir, I believe General Hayden, the deputy director of Intelligence, yesterday confirmed that before there is any interception there is a determination made -- there is a determination made by a -- an intelligence officer at NSA that in fact we have a reasonable grounds to believe that one party in the communication is a member or agent of al Qaeda or an affiliate terrorist organization.

SEN. SPECTER: Is there any way you can give us assurance of -- that it is true without disclosing the methods and sources of your program? It seems to me that that is a -- a very important statement, and if we were really sure that you're dealing only with the communication where you have a member of al Qaeda, an agent of al Qaeda, or an affiliated -- affiliates of al Qaeda terrorist organization, it would be one thing, because the concern is that there is a broad sweep which includes people who have no connection with al Qaeda.

What assurances can you give to this committee and, beyond this committee, to millions of Americans who are vitally interested in this issue and following these proceedings?

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: Well, I would say, Senator, and to the American people and to this committee, that the program as operated is a very narrowly tailored program. And we do have a great number of checks in place to ensure -- I am told by the operations folks that to a great degree of certainty, a high degree of confidence, that these calls are solely international calls. We have these career professionals at -- out at NSA who are experts in al Qaeda tactics, al Qaeda communications, al Qaeda aims. They are the best at what they do, and they are the ones that make the judgment as to whether or not someone is on a call that is a member of al Qaeda or a member of an affiliate organization.

The inspector general, as I've indicated, has been involved in this program from its early stages. There are --

SEN. SPECTER: Mr. Attorney General, let me interrupt you, because I want to cover a couple more questions, and time is fleeting. I think you've given the substance of the response.

We have contacted former Attorney General Ashcroft about his availability to testify before this committee, and he hasn't said yes and he hasn't said no. He's considering it.

I believe that the testimony of former Attorney General Ashcroft would fall under a little different line than line attorneys within the department who are giving information and the concern about having a chilling effect if they know their views are later to be determined. I think the attorney general is different.

And my question to you is, would you have any objection to former Attorney General Ashcroft's appearance before this committee on this issue?

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: I would not, Senator, although, you know, of course, if it relates to questions regarding the law and the position of the executive branch, that is what I'm doing today, is conveying to this committee what we -- what is the executive branch position on the legal authorities of the president in authorizing the terrorist surveillance program. SEN. SPECTER: That's all we'd ask him about. We would ask him about the operations. I take it, if I heard you correctly, you would not have an objection.

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: Senator, this committee can -- of course can ask who they want to ask to come before the committee --

SEN. SPECTER: No, no, I know we can ask. A totally different question as to what we hear in response -- he hasn't told us that he's going to look to the Department of Justice, but I think he'd feel more comfortable knowing that you had no objection. I thought I heard you say earlier that you didn't have an objection.

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: Senator, I don't think I would have an objection.

SEN. SPECTER: Okay. Two more questions, which I'm going to ask before my red light goes on:

On looking at congressional intent as to whether the resolution authorizing the use of force -- whether Congress intended for that generalized resolution to carry an authorization for this electronic surveillance in distinction to the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, you were quoted as saying, quote, "That was not something that we could likely get." Now that's different from the response you had that it might involve disclosures.

But I'll limit it to just this one question. If this is something you could not likely get, then how can you say Congress intended to give you this authority?

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: Senator --

SEN. SPECTER: Let the record show my light -- red light went on with the conclusion of the statement.

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: Senator, in that same press conference, I clarified that statement. And then in, I think, the next press conference that I was at with Mike Chertoff, I clarified that statement. And that is, the consensus was in a meeting that that legislation could not be obtained without compromising the program -- i.e., discussing the -- disclosing the existence of the program, how it operated -- and thereby effectively killing the program.

SEN. SPECTER: Thank you very much.

Senator Leahy.

SEN. LEAHY: Mr. Chairman -- raised some interesting points, and I -- you know, I'm listening to the attorney general, who's now arguing that the president's wiretapping on Americans without a warrant is legal, it does not violate the controlling law of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act. They've given a fancy name to the president's surveillance, but I'd remind them that the terrorist surveillance program is the FISA law, which we passed. I think you are violating express provisions of that act. So let me ask you a few questions that could be easily answered yes or no. I'm not asking about operational details. I'm trying to understand when the administration came to the conclusion that the congressional resolution authorizing the military force against al Qaeda, where we had hoped that we would actually catch Osama bin Laden, the man who hit us -- but where you came to conclusion that it authorized warrantless wiretapping of Americans inside the United !
States.

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: Senator, the -- what I can say is that the program was initiated subsequent to the authorization to use military force --

SEN. LEAHY: Well, then let me --

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: -- and our legal analysis was completed prior to the authorization of that program.

SEN. LEAHY: So did -- so your answer is, you did not come to that conclusion before the Senate passed the resolution on September 14th, 2001?

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: Sir, I certainly had not come to that conclusion. There may be others in the administration who did.

SEN. LEAHY: Were you aware of anybody in the administration that came to that conclusion before September 14th, 2001?

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: Senator, sitting here right now, I don't have any knowledge of that.

SEN. LEAHY: Were you aware of anybody coming to that conclusion before the president signed the resolution on September 18th, 2001?

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: No, Senator, the only thing I can recall is that we had just been attacked and that we had been attacked by an enemy from within our own borders --

SEN. LEAHY: Mr. Attorney --

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: -- and that we --

SEN. LEAHY: -- Attorney General, I understand. I was here when that attack happened.

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: Right.

SEN. LEAHY: And I joined with Republicans and Democrats and virtually every member of this Congress to try to give you the tools that you said you needed for us to go after al Qaeda, and especially to go after Osama bin Laden, the man that we all understood masterminded the attack, the man who's still at large.

Now, back to my question. Did you come to the conclusion that you had to have this warrantless wiretapping of Americans inside the United States to protect us before the president signed the resolution on September 18th, 2001? You were the White House counsel at the time.

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: What I can say is that we came to a conclusion that the president had the authority to authorize this kind of activity before he actually authorized the activity.

SEN. LEAHY: When was that?

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: It was subsequent to the authorization to use military force.

SEN. LEAHY: When?

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: Sir, it was just a short period of time after the authorization to use military force.

SEN. LEAHY: Was it before or after NSA began its surveillance program?

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: Again, the -- NSA did not commence the activities under the terrorist surveillance program before the president gave his authorization. Before the president gave the authorization, he was advised by lawyers within the administration that he had the legal authority to authorize this kind of surveillance of the enemy.

SEN. LEAHY: So you -- so NSA didn't do this until the president gave them the green light that they could authorize warrantless wiretapping of Americans inside the United States --

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: Well --

SEN. LEAHY: -- under the circumstances you described in your earlier testimony?

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: Of course, Senator, the NSA has other authorities to engage in electronic surveillance --

SEN. LEAHY: No, I understand that.

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: -- and I'm told that they --

SEN. LEAHY: But I'm talking about this specific program.

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: And I'm told they took advantage of those authorities. But I -- it's my understanding, and I believe this to be true, that the NSA did not commence in the kind of electronic surveillance which I am discussing here today prior to the president's authorization.

SEN. LEAHY: Okay. The president has said publicly that he gave about 30 of these authorizations, having held off for a period of time I think when the administration heard The New York Times was looking into it.

But you were White House counsel. Did the president give his first authorization before or after Attorney General Ashcroft met with us and gave us the proposals from the administration, which ultimately went into the USA Patriot Act?

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: Sir, I don't know. I don't know when he gave you those proposals.

SEN. LEAHY: Well, we enacted the USA Patriot Act in October 2001. We used the -- and you were there at the signing ceremony. We used the -- we tried to encompass those things that the administration said they needed. Was the first one of the president's authorizations done before he signed the USA Patriot Act?

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: Sir, I'd have to go back and check. I don't know.

SEN. LEAHY: Well, okay. You're going to be back here this afternoon. Please check, because I'll ask you this question again and you'll have a chance to ask -- I'm looking around the room; you've got an awful lot of staff here. Let's have that answer before.

You were there when he signed the act. Let us know when his first authorization, whether it was before or after he signed that act.

Now --

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: Sir, may I make a statement? We believe the authorization to use military force constituted a statutory grant of authority to engage in this countersurveillance, and therefore --

SEN. LEAHY: Did you --

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: -- it wouldn't be necessary to seek an amendment to FISA through the Patriot Act.

SEN. LEAHY: Well, then -- okay, you -- my question still remains, and I, like Senator Specter, I want -- I'm trying to ask these basically to you, things you could answer yes or no. You talk about the authorization of U.S. -- for use of military force. We have a chart up over there. It says that: The president's authorized to use all necessary and appropriate force against those nations, organizations or persons determined planned, authorized, committed or aided the terrorist attacks that occurred on September 11th, 2001 or harbored such organizations or persons in order to prevent any future acts of international terrorism against the United States by such nations, organizations or persons.

Now, you -- basically what you're saying is that Congress must have understood to have authorized the president to do it, not that we actually did, but that we must have understood it.

Now, this authorization is not a wiretap statute. I was a prosecutor; Senator Specter was a prosecutor, a lot of other prosecutors here. We know what the wiretap statute looks like. This is not it.

So let me ask this, under that logic, is there anything -- any(thing) (to) stop you from wiretapping without a warrant somebody inside the United States that you suspect of having al Qaeda connections?

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: Well, clearly, Senator, the -- that is not what's going on here, first of all. The president has authorized a much more narrow program. We are always, of course, subject to the Fourth Amendment, so the activities of any of kind surveillance within the United States would, of course, be subject to the Fourth Amendment.

SEN. LEAHY: Well, Mr. Attorney General, I -- we're getting the impression that this administration's kind of picking and choosing what they are subject to. Can you show us in the authorization of use of military force what is the specific language you say that's authorizing wiretapping of Americans without a warrant?

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: Sir, there is no specific language, but neither it is specific language to detain American citizens. And the Supreme Court said that the words "all necessary and appropriate force" means all activities fundamentally incident to waging war.

SEN. LEAHY: But -- but there wasn't a law -- they didn't have a law specifically on this.

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: Sure they did, sir.

SEN. LEAHY: Use the Jackson test. They have a law on wiretapping. It's called FISA. It's called FISA. And if you don't like that law, if that law doesn't work, why not just -- why not just ask us?

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: Sir, there was a law at question in Hamdi. It was 18 USC 4,001 (a), and that is, you cannot detain an American citizen except as authorized by Congress. And Hamdi came into the court saying the authorization to use military force isn't such a permission by Congress to detain an American citizen, and the Supreme Court -- Justice O'Connor said -- even though the words were not included in the authorization -- Justice O'Connor said, Congress clearly and unmistakably authorized the president to detain an American citizen. And detention is far more intrusive than electronic surveillance.

SEN. LEAHY: Well then let me ask you this. Under your interpretation of this, can you go in and do mail searches? Can you go into e-mails? Can you open -- can you open mail? Can you do black bag jobs?

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: Sir --

SEN. LEAHY: And under the idea that you don't have much time to go through what you described as a cumbersome procedure -- what most people think is a pretty easy procedure -- to get a FISA warrant, can you go and do that? Of Americans?

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: Sir, I have tried to outline for you and the committee what the president has authorized, and that is all that he has authorized.

SEN. LEAHY: Did it authorize the opening of first class mail of U.S. citizens? Just -- that you can answer yes or no.

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: There is all kinds of wild speculation about what the --

SEN. LEAHY: Did it authorize it?

SEN. SPECTER: Let him finish.

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: There is all kinds of wild speculation out there about what the president has authorized and what we're actually doing. And I'm not going to get into a discussion, Senator, about hypotheticals.

SEN. LEAHY: Mr. Attorney General, you're not answering my question! I'm not asking you what the president authorized. Does this law -- you're the chief law enforcement officer of the country. Does this law authorize the opening of first class mail of U.S. citizens -- yes or no -- under your interpretation?

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: Senator, I think -- I think that, again, that is not what is going on here. We're only focused on communications -- international communications where one part of the communication is al Qaeda. That's what this program is all about.

SEN. LEAHY: You haven't answered my question. Well, Mr. Chairman, I'll come back to this. And the attorney general understands there are some dates he's going to check during the break, and I'll go back to it.

SEN. SPECTER: Thank you, Senator Leahy.

Senator Hatch.

SEN. HATCH: Well, this is a very interesting set of issues because -- and a lot of constitutional issues. For people who are watching this, we've got, in addition to all kinds of constitutional issues about interpreting statutes, you've got the canon of constitutional avoidance here, that is a very important rule in constitutional law. You've got the vesting clause vesting power in the president. You've got inherent executive authority that people seem to just brush aside here. You know, they'll talk in terms of, well, Congress is co-equal with the president, but they don't ever really talk in terms of the president being co-equal with the Congress. Or the past laws, you've got various canons of statutory interpretation. All of these are here and it makes this a very interesting thing.

But let me just ask you some specific questions here. It's my understanding, as I've reviewed this and as I've looked at a lot of the cases, that virtually all of the federal courts of appeal that have addressed this issue -- or the issue, have affirmed the president's inherent constitutional authority to collect foreign intelligence without a warrant. Is that a fair statement?

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: It is a fair statement, Senator, that all of the court of appeals that have reviewed this issue have concluded that the president of the United States has the authority under the Constitution to engage in warrantless searches, consistent with the Fourth Amendment, for purposes of gathering foreign intelligence.
