But prosecutors contended that Green's actions injured justice on several levels, from the innocent victims who were harmed by violent arrestees whom Green helped usher out of jail, to the public's tarnished impression of the Jefferson Parish bench.

"Hardly a day goes past when I don't get a call from some litigant" expressing doubts over the "fairness or accuracy" of some judgment rendered by Bodenheimer, Green or other jurists of the 24th Judicial District Court, Magner said. "This has caused the entire public to question the validity of a system that separates this society from chaos."

Letten went a step further, saying misdeeds such as those perpetrated by Green cast a cloud over the entire justice system and on politicians in general. That unfair perception, he said, has been ridiculed by some federal lawmakers and may affect how much money Louisiana receives to recover from Hurricane Katrina.

"This kind of conduct ... undoubtedly has had an affect on how our region is perceived," Letten said.

Green, a Democrat from Marrero, first was elected in 1992 to the 24th Judicial District Court's black-majority district, which was created that year. He was re-elected four years later and in September 2002 won a third term, even though he had been identified publicly two months earlier as a subject of Wrinkled Robe.

He continued to hear cases into the fall of 2004, when he was indicted, along with Bowley, who avoided trial by pleading guilty in June to a lesser crime; Bowley was sentenced last week to 20 months behind bars.

Green resigned from the bench in August, several weeks after his conviction, and DeSalvo said this week Green also has voluntarily relinquished his law license.

With Thursday's sentencing, Green became the fifth Louisiana judge, and the third in Jefferson Parish, to be sent to prison in the past two decades, according to the state Supreme Court. Before Bodenheimer, 1st Parish Court Judge Bruce Naccari of Metairie was sentenced in 1996 to 18 months for wire fraud charges related to his family's defunct insurance company.

DOJ_NMG_0013859

Green was the 14th defendant to be nabbed by Wrinkled Robe and the only one to risk trial rather than ink a plea agreement with prosecutors. The list includes Jefferson Parish Sheriff's deputies, who also admitted accepting bribes from Bail Bonds Unlimited in return for helping the company secure clients, as well as players in Bodenheimer's various schemes.

The government issued another round of grand jury subpoenas in August. Judges on the list were Louisiana 5th Circuit Court of Appeal Judge Susan Chehardy, state Judge Kernan "Skip" Hand, Justice of the Peace Steve Mortillaro of Jefferson's 5th Justice Court and state Judge Steve Windhorst.

But Letten said Thursday that though prosecutors still are hunting any sign of public corruption in Jefferson, the Wrinkled Robe soon may be headed for the judicial closet.

"Much of the investigation has been successfully concluded," he said. •

Andrea Shaw contributed to this report.

Michelle Krupa can be reached at mkrupa@timespicayune.com or (504) 826-3785.

Pressured, Director Of Getty Trust Steps Down (NYT)

By Randy Kennedy And Carol Vogel

The New York Times, February 10, 2006

The president of the J. Paul Getty Trust in Los Angeles, one of the world's richest art institutions, resigned under pressure yesterday amid growing questions about his improper use of the trust's money.

The trust said that the president, Barry Munitz, whose travel and expense spending are under investigation by the California attorney general's office, would be required to repay the trust $250,000 and would not be given a severance package. The money was an estimate of what the trust felt Mr. Munitz owed because of perks, expenses and other costs that should not have been charged to the trust during his eight-year tenure, trust officials said.

"It's more judgment than it is precise mathematics," John H. Biggs, the board's chairman, said of the figure, adding that because the attorney general's investigation was continuing, he could provide few details about Mr. Munitz's departure and could not answer other questions about his practices.

He added, however, that "as far as the Getty Trust is involved, Munitz has resolved these issues" with the payment of $250,000, and that the board did not believe Mr. Munitz did anything improper under the laws that govern nonprofit trusts.

"He's still at risk that the A.G. may see it otherwise," Mr. Biggs added, referring to the state attorney general, "and there's no way that we as trustees can give him any assurance."

Mr. Munitz's departure represents a major reversal for one of the most powerful leaders in the art world, who controlled an institution with an endowment of more than $5 billion. The trust's board of trustees — many of whom are Mr. Munitz's friends and allies — had steadfastly stood by him, even as questions about his leadership and about other troubles at the trust mounted over the last several months.

Citing confidentiality agreements, the trust gave few specifics yesterday about the exact reasons for Mr. Munitz's departure. Mr. Biggs said that Mr. Munitz informed the trust of his decision to leave last weekend at a board meeting. "It was Barry's decision to get on with his life and not to have this hanging over him," he said.

But one former Getty employee with knowledge of the attorney general's inquiry said that investigators were looking into several instances in which Mr. Munitz had authorized grants or uses of the trust's money without obtaining proper approval. In some cases, the former employee said, the money was spent on pet projects of Mr. Munitz's — one involving chess, which he loved — that had very little to do with the Getty's mission. The trust said yesterday that Mr. Munitz would not be available for comment.

For the last several months, the Getty has been under siege on several fronts. Its former antiquities curator, Marion True, is now on trial in Italy on charges of trafficking in looted antiquities. She resigned last October amid questions about possible improprieties involving a real estate deal.

Allegations that Mr. Munitz may have abused his expense account with luxurious travel and perks, first reported in The Los Angeles Times last June, led to the wide-ranging investigation by the attorney general into the trust's finances and also led the Getty to set up its own internal committee to look into questions about the trust's practices.

DOJ_NMG_0013860

In interviews, Mr. Munitz has defended his actions and his spending, saying that his job required him to court powerful collectors and donors around the world. He has also stressed that trust's board had approved all his expenses, including first-class air travel, stays at five-star hotels and a leased Porsche Cayenne.

Both the attorney general and the internal committee are also examining a 2002 real estate deal between the Getty and Eli Broad, a billionaire investor who is a friend of Mr. Munitz's.

In an interview last fall, after the attorney general's investigation was announced, Mr. Biggs said he believed Mr. Munitz had "really done a terrific job," though he added that he had warned Mr. Munitz about travel expenses, including yacht trips with Mr. Broad in Greece and Eastern Europe for which Mr. Munitz was partially reimbursed by the Getty.

Mr. Biggs, a former chief executive of TIAA-CREF, the investment fund, said the trips should have been treated as vacations, not business trips. "Barry and I have had a discussion about that," Mr. Biggs said at the time, adding, "Every time he spends some money we want him to take a hard look at it and ask himself whether he would want that spending published."

The Getty Trust includes the J. Paul Getty Museum in Los Angeles, a research institute, a library, an art conservation program and a grant-making office. The museum instantly became one of the world's wealthiest in 1982, when it received the estate of the oilman J. Paul Getty, giving it six times more money than its next-richest American sibling, the Metropolitan Museum of Art.

Over the next two decades, the Getty grew significantly, spending hundreds of millions of dollars to enlarge its collection. But many critics say it has failed to live up to its early promise, a problem even before Mr. Munitz's arrival.

Mr. Munitz, a former business executive and chancellor of the California State University system who is well-connected in California political circles, has been one of the nation's best-paid executives of a nonprofit institution, with salary, benefits and perks totaling more than $1 million.

Federal Directive Targets Risky Mortgage Practices (WT)

By Patrice Hill

The Washington Times, February 10, 2006

Third of three parts

Federal banking agencies, concerned about the potential for abuses in mortgage lending, are going after the worst practices in the industry.

A directive last month from the Federal Reserve and four other federal agencies targets the proliferation of loans offering interest-only payments for extended periods and adjustable-rate mortgages that offer the option of paying interest only, making a minimum payment each month or adding in principal. That includes about half of all mortgages made last year.

Regulators say they are particularly concerned that some loans not only do not pay down principal, like a traditional mortgage, but they also increase the amount of principal that a consumer must pay by as much as 100 percent through "negative amortization."

The regulators also expressed concern about the growing practice of "layering" risky mortgages on top of already dicey lending practices, such as requiring no down payment or proof of income from borrowers.

The regulators said banks that offer such loans will be held accountable for making full disclosure of the risks to consumers.

But many inside and outside the mortgage industry question how much impact the banking directive will have, because so many mortgage brokers operate outside the banking system. Only those that are subsidiaries of banks would seem to be affected.

"Banking regulators actually have fairly minimal control or even influence over a huge portion of our economy," said Christopher Cruise, a Washington mortgage broker and trainer for the Mortgage Training Institute.

"I'm not saying we're thumbing our nose at the regulators," he said. But "if I'm a street-level originator licensed by the state of Maryland generating 20,000 loans in a year, and I find rich investors to buy them, nothing the [Office of the Comptroller of the Currency] says has any impact on me."

Mortgage companies such as Countrywide, the biggest nonbank lender in the country, appear to be unaffected, he said.

"I think they own a bank, I don't think the bank owns them. They sell their mortgages to Wall Street," he said.

'Empire of debt'

Although mortgage brokers perceive few limits on current practices, many nevertheless are concerned about the massive debts they see borrowers take on to buy houses and maintain affluent lifestyles.

Mortgage brokers in California report that some borrowers in recent years have been making a living by taking advantage of soaring housing prices and "flipping" real-estate investments — buying and selling them in rapid succession — while using equity loans on the properties as "income."

The practice could amount to mortgage fraud if the borrowers disguised the source of their "income" on their loan applications, the brokers said.

Mr. Cruise noted that debt appears to be addictive for some consumers who simply cannot save or go without lavish things. Some will refinance their mortgage at Christmastime, for example, so they can splurge on expensive presents.

"I feel like a drug dealer," he said. "I'm horrified at the empire of debt we're creating."

Mr. Cruise said some of his customers are so intent on getting loans, they won't take "no" for an answer. "We're enablers. We're just middlemen. In a sense, we profit from their foolishness."

Most mortgage brokers follow the disclosure requirements of the Truth In Lending Act, which specifies, among other things, that the full cost of the loan — principal plus interest — must be clearly spelled out to consumers before they sign the mortgage contract.

But Mr. Cruise said many consumers never bother to read the disclosures. With today's complex and sophisticated loan instruments, the old guidelines are inadequate and consumers are not getting the disclosures they need to make well-informed decisions, he said.

The law does not specify, for example, that lenders must disclose how much monthly payments may rise when rates are fully adjusted and principal is added under a worst-case scenario.

Most mortgage brokers today are in their 20s or early 30s and have not lived through a deep recession or other "worst-case scenario" in their adult lives, Mr. Cruise said.

"I'm not sure the loan officers themselves know what could happen" if rates rise precipitously or the economy plunges, he said.

Distant control

The federal banking directive specifies that lenders should disclose the terms of fully indexed loans to borrowers.

But Jack M. Guttentag, a retired professor from University of Pennsylvania's Wharton School of Business who sponsors a mortgage education Web site, mtgprofessor.com, said it's not clear whether the guidelines will change anything.

"What a broker or loan officer tells a borrower is pretty much up to them, so long as they comply with the disclosure laws," which don't prohibit most current practices, he said. "That is part of the market culture, and the regulators would have their hands full trying to change it."

Mortgage brokers also are right to question whether the directive applies to them, because the Federal Reserve has, at best, distant control over what the nonbank subsidiaries of bank-holding companies do, he said.

Deborah Lagomarsino, a Fed spokeswoman, declined to say whether or how the Fed would ensure that its directive is followed by the many mortgage companies not directly regulated by the Fed.

In any case, the guidance is too vague to be of much help to lenders that have established guidelines that detail the credit scores, loan-to-value ratios and other standards that borrowers must meet for loans.

"Sending me a bunch of homilies about how important it is to be careful of this or that will leave me unimpressed," Mr. Guttentag said. "If you really want me to take notice, show me where my guidelines fall short."

Because of the light regulation and demonstrated abuses, Mr. Guttentag has established a program to certify mortgage brokers and lenders in order to separate the unethical ones from "upfront" ones who disclose their fees and essential borrowing information.

"Many potential borrowers are shocked to discover that there is no registry of bad apples — and no system to certify good ones," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0013862

One of the commitments a mortgage lender must make to be certified under Mr. Guttentag's program is to disclose what will happen to monthly payments in worst-case scenarios.

Some financial analysts say the banking directive will have a definite impact on banks as well as on investors who have been using interest-only loans to purchase property.

David Lereah, chief economist with the National Association of Realtors, says he expects the directive particularly to discourage speculators who "flip" properties in transactions that require minimal down payments and liberal loan terms.

"There will be fewer investors in the market this year," he said.

Sources: Gretzky Knew Of Gambling (PHI)

By Jennifer Moroz

The Philadelphia Inquirer, February 10, 2006

TRENTON - State wiretaps recorded hockey legend and NHL coach Wayne Gretzky talking about a sports gambling ring allegedly run by his assistant, former Flyer Rick Tocchet, two New Jersey law enforcement sources confirmed yesterday.

As part of a probe into what state law enforcement officials have described as a nationwide, multimillion-dollar illegal bookmaking operation, investigators are looking into whether Gretzky - coach and part-owner of the Phoenix Coyotes - placed any bets through his wife, Janet Jones, the sources said on condition of anonymity.

Gretzky, who has not been accused of wrongdoing, denied any involvement.

"If I had made one bet, I would have quit the Coyotes," Gretzky told the East Valley (Ariz.) Tribune before last night's game with the Dallas Stars. "I would never embarrass the team or the organization. If I had made one bet, I would have quit Team Canada. I would never embarrass them.

"There's nothing for me to hide from."

This week, sources confirmed that Jones and former Flyers center Jeremy Roenick, now with the Los Angeles Kings, were among several high-profile figures - including at least a half-dozen former and current NHL players - who had placed bets with the five-year-old gambling operation.

New Jersey state officials say that the ring accepted wagers on college and professional sports - mostly football and basketball - and that there was no evidence of any bets on National Hockey League games.

The Star-Ledger of Newark, citing unidentified law enforcement sources, first reported yesterday that state investigators had recorded Gretzky talking about the ring. The newspaper also reported that Jones bet $500,000 during a recent six-week period, including $75,000 on the Super Bowl.

"At no time did I ever place a wager on my husband's behalf, period," Jones said in a statement provided by the Coyotes last night, which did not address her own possible involvement. "Other than the occasional horse race, my husband does not bet on any sports."

After the Coyotes' 5-1 loss last night, Gretzky said he still planned to attend the Turin Olympics as Team Canada's executive director.

"I'm still going to coach the Phoenix Coyotes. I've done nothing wrong," he said. "I'm going to Italy on Sunday. I'm going to be with Team Canada."

State police officials said investigators were interviewing the biggest bettors to determine whether they had engaged in any criminal activity. None has been accused of any wrongdoing.

So far, the only people charged in connection with the operation are Tocchet, who played for the Flyers from 1984 to 1992 and again from 1999 to 2002; his alleged partner, James Harney, a state trooper from Marlton who officials say accepted wagers while on patrol; and James Ulmer of Woolwich, who investigators said helped the pair taking bets.

The three men are scheduled to be arraigned Feb. 21 on charges of promoting gambling, money laundering and conspiracy in state Superior Court in Burlington County.

Attorneys for Harney and Tocchet - who is on indefinite leave from his job as a Coyotes associate coach - have called the charges overblown and irresponsible. Roenick has not commented.

DOJ_NMG_0013863

On Tuesday, the day state officials announced the charges against Tocchet and Jones' name surfaced as a bettor, the Great One said he "wasn't involved."

"The reality is, I'm not involved, I wasn't involved, and I'm not going to be involved," Gretzky said. "Am I concerned for both of them [Jones and Tocchet]? Sure, there's concern from me. I'm more worried about them than me. I'm like you guys, I'm trying to figure it all out."

Elliot Mintz, a spokesman for Jones, said in a statement that she might be called as a witness before a New Jersey grand jury.

Some law enforcement officials quietly predict that federal authorities will step in to investigate numerous possible violations of federal law.

Michael Drewniak, a spokesman for the U.S. Attorney's Office in New Jersey, said the FBI had assisted state police "concerning interstate aspects" of the investigation, but that federal involvement had been minimal so far.

"At this time, this remains very much a state case," he said. He declined further comment.

Gretzky's Wife: 'Great One' Didn't Gamble (USAT)

By Kevin Allen, Usa Today

USA Today, February 10, 2006

Actress Janet Jones said Thursday that she never placed a wager on behalf of her husband, Phoenix Coyotes coach Wayne Gretzky, and Gretzky said he's "done nothing wrong, nothing that has to do with betting."

Addressing a betting scandal that led to the arrest of Coyotes associate Rick Tocchet, she released a statement, saying, "Other than the occasional horse race, my husband does not bet on any sports."

Reached by phone by USA TODAY, Jones said the statement would be her only comment: "I would like to say a thousand things, but I can't."

After the Coyotes' 5-1 loss to the Dallas Stars in Phoenix, Gretzky said he "felt like I've defended myself against something that absolutely didn't happen."

Jones' statement comes as the Associated Press, citing a person with knowledge of the investigation, reported Gretzky had been recorded on a wiretap talking to Tocchet about how Jones could avoid being implicated in the case.

According to that news report, Jones allegedly bet $100,000 on football games over the course of the investigation. The report said there was no evidence Gretzky bet on games.

USA TODAY could not independently confirm Gretzky was recorded on a wiretap.

FBI spokesman Rich Kolko confirmed the bureau was asked Thursday to assist in the case.

According to The Arizona Republic, citing two NHL officials with knowledge of the investigation, Coyotes general manager Mike Barnett, Gretzky's former agent, bet on the Super Bowl with Tocchet.

Barnett said in a statement he cooperated with investigators in New Jersey and "they informed me my conduct in no way violated federal or state laws."

Gretzky said he will travel to Italy to serve as executive director of Canada's Olympic men's hockey team.

David Gourevitch, a former prosecutor who now specializes in defending white collar cases, called the leaks about Gretzky "inappropriate" and "salacious" and does not prove that Gretzky committed a crime.

"They are leaking stuff that they know is inflammable and will garner publicity," says Gourevitch. "But it is not clear what they are leaking violates a law. It's not a crime to know that some else is engaged in a crime," he adds. "There is no snitch obligation and there doesn't seem to be as yet a suggestion that Gretzky was placing bets or personally involved in this."

Team Canada and Coyotes officials say Gretzky plans to travel to Italy to serve as executive director of the Olympic men's hockey team.

The New Jersey attorney general said Thursday that arraignment hearings for the trio charged in "Operation Slapshot" will be Feb. 21.

DOJ_NMG_0013864

Tocchet, James Harney and James A. Ulmer all face charges of money laundering, promotion of gambling and conspiracy, while Harney, a New Jersey state trooper, has the added charge of official misconduct because he allegedly committed these acts while acting as a public servant.

The reaction around the hockey world is that it's shocking even to have Gretzky's name associated with the scandal.

"When I played with and against Gretzky, I viewed him as a player who understood what he meant to the game and always put the game first," said former NHL player Tom Laidlaw, who played with Gretzky in Los Angeles. "He was always concerned about his image, and I mean that in a good way. And Janet struck me as someone who also understood who he was and how important it was to him to have the proper image."

Contributing: Adam Shell, Kevin Johnson

Gretzky Taped Trying To Aid Wife (WT/AP)

By Angela Delli Santi And Geoff Mulvihill

The Washington Times, February 10, 2006

TRENTON, N.J. -- Wayne Gretzky was recorded on a wiretap talking to the man suspected of financing a gambling ring, discussing how the hockey great's wife could avoid being implicated, a person with knowledge of the investigation told the Associated Press yesterday.

Mr. Gretzky, coach and part owner of the Phoenix Coyotes, can be heard on wiretaps made within the past month talking about his wife with assistant coach Rick Tocchet, the person said, speaking on the condition of anonymity because the investigation was ongoing.

Mr. Gretzky's wife, actress Janet Jones, purportedly bet at least $100,000 on football games over the course of the investigation by state authorities, the person said.

There is no evidence that Mr. Gretzky placed any bets, according to the person.

"At no time did I ever place a wager on my husband's behalf, period," Mrs. Jones said in a statement provided by the Coyotes last night. "Other than the occasional horse race, my husband does not bet on any sports."

Authorities say from Dec. 29 through Feb. 5 -- the day of the Super Bowl -- bettors placed $1.7 million in wagers with the ring run by a New Jersey state trooper, Mr. Tocchet and a South Jersey man. All face charges of promoting gambling, money laundering and conspiracy and are scheduled to be arraigned in Superior Court in Mount Holly on Feb. 21, the state Attorney General's office said yesterday.

Mrs. Jones has not been charged.

Elliot Mintz, a spokesman for Mrs. Jones, said in a statement that she may be called as a witness before a grand jury in New Jersey.

"Janet is merely one of a number of witnesses, and there is no allegation whatsoever that Janet has violated any law," he said.

Investigators are looking into whether anyone involved in the five-year-old ring, which authorities say had a connection to organized crime in Philadelphia and southern New Jersey, bet on National Hockey League (NHL) games. Mr. Gretzky is not the main focus of the probe, the person said.

The Star-Ledger of Newark, citing unidentified law-enforcement sources, first reported a wiretap involving Mr. Gretzky in yesterday's newspapers. The newspaper also reported that Mrs. Jones bet $500,000 during the investigation, including $75,000 on the Super Bowl.

Earlier in the week, Mr. Gretzky denied any involvement in the ring. Mr. Gretzky did not attend the Coyotes practice in Phoenix yesterday.

Lawyers involved in the case said details of the three-month investigation should not be made public.

"I have never been involved in a case where the prosecution has engaged in such inappropriate conduct in terms of making investigators available to the press, appearing on nationally syndicated television," said Kevin Marino, a lawyer for Mr. Tocchet, who was granted an indefinite leave from the NHL on Wednesday. "It's improper, it's unwarranted, and I will not tolerate it."

DOJ_NMG_0013865

Attorneys for all three men charged in what authorities have dubbed "Operation Slapshot" said they will fight the charges.

"This case will not be a guilty plea," said Charles A. Peruto Jr., who is representing James Ulmer. Mr. Ulmer and Trooper James Harney are accused of taking wagers and cuts of the bets.

The accusations have sent shock waves through the hockey world.

State investigators said they will interview more hockey players who were thought to have placed bets, in part to determine whether there was any gambling on hockey. So far, authorities say, they do not have evidence that there was.

The NHL has hired Robert Cleary, a former federal prosecutor who handled the Unabomber case, to investigate.

Mr. Cleary said yesterday that he was not sure how long his work might take, in part because he wants to stay out of the way of law-enforcement agents who are continuing to investigate.

Hockey players are prohibited from making NHL wagers, legal or otherwise. There are no rules that forbid them from placing legal bets on other sports.

Task Force Run By FBI Unmasks Identity Thieves (SLT)

By Pamela Manson, The Salt Lake Tribune

Salt Lake Tribune, February 10, 2006

Matthew Rodney Page, of Kaysville, surfed the Internet to find someone with his name and a similar date of birth to help get himself $42,000 in auto loans, two new credit cards and the fee for flying lessons.

Bryan Nelson Hansard, of Bountiful, "washed" stolen checks - removed the ink with chemicals, then rewrote the dollar amount or recipient - and deposited them into his own bank accounts.

These Davis County residents are part of a trend of using the names and financial information of others to steal money and merchandise. As the offense started to become more prevalent, authorities set up the Utah Identity Theft Task Force (ITTF), which operates as part of the FBI's Joint Terrorism Task Force.

Since its inception in November 2004, "the task force has been a resounding success," said Kathy Roberts, inspector in charge of the U.S. Postal Inspection Service's Denver division, which includes Utah.

At a recent news conference in Salt Lake City, Roberts and other officials ticked off Utah ITTF statistics from the past 15 months - 190 investigations launched; 1,366 victims of identity theft identified; about 150 indictments returned with convictions won in 127 of them so far; and more than 25 training sessions held on fraud prevention for law enforcement agencies, community groups and merchants.

Identity thieves use stolen information to obtain credit cards, cash checks made out to others, take out loans, collect tax refunds due to another taxpayer and get a driver license or passport under a false name. In addition to cheating merchants and banks, they cause financial hardship to their victims, who often are left with bad credit ratings that take a long time to correct.

The majority of cases handled by the identity theft task force involve "mailboxing," the stealing of checks, credit cards and other items from mailboxes. Thieves using someone else's personal information to get a credit card is the next biggest category.

Among the ways scam artists find information is by going through customer records at their own jobs or by pretending to be salespeople in telephone calls.

Identity thieves run the gamut from individuals to members of street gangs to white collar criminals, according to Timothy Fuhrman, special agent in charge of the FBI's Salt Lake City office.

Advertisement

Fuhrman and Paul Warner, who recently stepped down as U.S. attorney for Utah to become a federal magistrate, said many thieves are drug addicts trying to support their habit.

Punishment for identity theft-related crimes can be stiff. Aggravated identity fraud carries a minimum mandatory sentence of two years, which must be served after all sentences are served.

Other maximum terms are 30 years for bank fraud; 15 years for identity theft; 10 years for possession of stolen checks; and five years for conspiracy to commit identity fraud and possession of stolen mail.

Page, 40, pleaded guilty and was sentenced Feb. 1 to one month in federal prison for bank fraud and two years for aggravated identity theft.

DOJ_NMG_0013866

Hansard, 35, who admitted committing bank fraud, was sentenced last year in U.S. District Court to 18 months behind bars.

ITTF members include the FBI, U.S. Postal Inspection Service, Secret Service, Utah Attorney General's Office, Department of Corrections, Department of Public Safety, Ogden Police Department, Salt Lake County Sheriff's Office and the U.S. Attorney's Office. Numerous local law enforcement agencies also participate in investigating identity theft crimes.

Protect yourself

Even people who are careful with their personal information can be victimized by identity theft, but these tips from the U.S. Postal Inspection Service can help.

* Review your consumer credit reports annually.
* Shred and destroy unwanted documents that contain personal information.
* Deposit mail in U.S. Postal Service collection boxes.
* Do not leave mail in your mailbox overnight or on weekends.

More suggestions on how to avoid identity fraud are posted at http://www.usps.com/postalinspectors.

Decker Takes 5th Amendment (WINSJ)

By David Rice, JOURNAL RALEIGH BUREAU

Winston-Salem (NC) Journal, February 10, 2006

Former member of House declines to testify before hearing into possible illegal campaign donations

RALEIGH -- Former state Rep. Michael Decker took the Fifth Amendment yesterday, citing his right against self-incrimination as he declined to testify about campaign donations he got from optometrists after he switched parties in 2003 to help optometrist Jim Black remain speaker of the House.

"We have advised Rep. Decker ... to rest upon his Fifth Amendment rights," David Freedman, Decker's attorney, told Larry Leake, the chairman of the State Board of Elections after Leake called on Decker to testify. The elections board is investigating possible illegal donations from optometrists and the video-poker industry to the Black and Decker campaigns. A federal grand jury is also investigating, and several optometrists said they have been interviewed by the FBI and U.S. Treasury agents.

Although Black initially testified yesterday that he couldn't recall handling blank checks provided by his fellow optometrists, he later acknowledged to the elections board that he filled in Decker's campaign as the payee on at least three of the checks.

"I don't remember seeing blank checks - unless they were in an envelope, sealed, with somebody's name on it," Black said at first.

Then Leake handed Black a copy of a $4,000 check made out to Decker's campaign from M. Scott Edwards of Murfreesboro, the treasurer of the N.C. Optometric Society, along with two $100 checks from Gary Roach, an optometrist from Morrisville.

Black acknowledged that it was his handwriting that designated Decker's campaign as the payee. But Black and his attorneys argued that the donations were not illegal under state law.

"The law specifically allows ... for the donor to fill out a check and leave the determination of who it goes to until another time," said Kenneth Bell, one of Black's attorneys. "The law specifically allows for that."

Black acknowledged that he urged optometrists and others to support Decker with campaign donations when Decker, a Republican from Walkertown, switched parties in January 2003, creating a 60-60 tie in the House that allowed Black, a Democrat, to remain speaker.

"I encouraged a lot of people to give to Mr. Decker," Black said. "I knew he was going to be under siege. If he was going to survive politically, he needed to build a war chest."

After returning to the GOP, Decker was soundly defeated in the 2004 Republican primary.

Black gave an impassioned defense of his actions to help raise campaign money for Decker, but he denied giving Decker money in return for his party switch.

"I want to right here, right now, under oath, tell you that I never gave Michael Decker anything to change parties or to vote for me or for any other political purpose," Black said. "There was nothing offered to him, nothing promised to him. He changed parties because I'd always treated him with respect and dignity, and his own party didn't.

DOJ_NMG_0013867

"Now, if Michael Decker's on my team - and he was the newest, very important member of my team - I don't want Michael Decker to get beat in the next election. So I want to help him raise funds, as I do all the people on my team - Democrat and Republican," Black testified.

Leake read a quotation from a 1991 newspaper article in which Black was quoted as saying that he would ask optometrists to form a political-action committee and stop the practice of sending checks with the recipients' names left blank.

"I'm going to make a proposal that we not send a check anywhere that's not filled out," Black was quoted as saying at the time.

But yesterday marked the second day of testimony from optometrists who said they had given the N.C. Optometric Society PAC dozens of checks that they signed but left the "payee" line blank.

Many of the checks found their way to Decker's campaign, and, in some cases, were made out to Decker personally and appeared to have been cashed.

David Freeman, an optometrist in Winston-Salem, said he occasionally got checks from Edwards, the optometric PAC's treasurer, with instructions to pass them along to Decker.

Leake showed J. Michael Burke, another optometrist from Winston-Salem, two $100 checks from Burke that had personally been made out to Decker.

"That was not the intent of the contribution," Burke replied.

"They came in an envelope. I'd just add my own check and forward it on to Mike," Freeman said.

Edwards, too, cited his Fifth Amendment rights and declined to testify yesterday.

Although Black said that personal donations were a way to keep optometrists personally involved, several of the optometrists who provided blank checks that ultimately went to Decker or his campaign said they did not know Decker.

"I've heard maybe three or four say they knew who Michael Decker was. So how are these people involved if their money goes to somebody they don't know from Adam's housecat?" asked Chuck Winfree, a Republican member of the elections board from Greensboro.

Lorraine Shinn, a Republican board member from Greenville, pointed to the $4,000 check from Edwards and the optometrists' PAC on Jan. 15, 2003, that went to Decker's campaign - nine days before he switched parties.

"That, to me, is buying a vote in this situation," she said.

Black said that Decker told him that Black had Decker's vote for speaker in mid-November 2002, two months before he actually switched parties.

Board members grew frustrated with what they considered evasive answers.

When Michael Haines, an optometrist from Four Oaks, asked the difference between "probable" and "possible," Winfree erupted.

"Four years ago we had hearings and we had witnesses in the Meg Scott Phipps matter, and we had witnesses sitting there evading answers, and they are now in the custody of the federal marshals," Winfree said.

"That's a threat," said Press Millen, an attorney for the optometrists. "I think that's a totally inappropriate thing that he said."

The hearing will enter its third day today, and Leake said that it will have to resume later because testimony on the video-poker portion of the investigation has not begun.

The board could take action on the optometrist investigation today, and Leake made it clear that he thinks that the optometrists have run an illegal PAC through their separate "legislative committee."

"I believe that there is a significant likelihood that there were illegalities on the part of certain individuals or parties," he said.

But Leake said that the board decided not to offer Decker immunity from civil penalties in order to get him to testify before the elections board.

"This board has enjoyed what I would call unparalleled cooperation from the U.S. Attorney's Office ... and from the office of the district attorney," he said. "While we have that power, we are being very careful that we do not frustrate any investigation or any activities that they have ongoing."

Convicted Torture Killer Of 19-year-old Girl Executed (FINDLAW/AP)

By Michael Graczyk, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 10, 2006

(AP) - HUNTSVILLE, Texas-A paroled burglar who claimed he wanted to be a serial killer of minorities was executed Wednesday night for the torture-slaying eight years ago of a 19-year-old mentally impaired woman who once worked with him.

Robert Neville Jr., apologizing profusely, addressed his victim's mother by name as she and her two daughters stood close to the glass with their arms around each other. He expressed love to them.

"I hope you can find it in yourselves to forgive me and I hope all this here will kind of settle your pain. And I hope the Lord will give you comfort and peace. I just want you to know I am very sorry for what I have done," he said.

Referring to his victim, Amy Robinson, 19, Neville, said, "If I see Amy on the other side, I will tell her how much you love and miss her. And we will have a lot to talk about."

Neville then turned toward his parents, who watched through an adjacent window.

"I am sorry for putting you through all this pain and stuff," he said. "I love you all and I will see you on the other side."

Seven minutes later at 6:19 p.m. CST, he was pronounced dead.

Neville, 31, was the third prisoner executed this year and the first of three over the next 15 days in the nation's most active capital punishment state.

Neville and a companion, Michael Wayne Hall, were condemned for the fatal shooting of Robinson, who was abducted as she rode her bike to work at a Dallas-area supermarket. She was taken to a remote area of Tarrant County where she was shot repeatedly with a pellet gun, then killed with shots from a .22-caliber rifle as she begged for her life.

Hall, 26, remains on death row. He does not have an execution date.

"I think they just thought of her as you would think of a cat or dog or something," said Alan Levy, the Tarrant County assistant district attorney who prosecuted the pair.

At the time of the Feb. 15, 1998, slaying, Neville had been on parole about eight months after serving two years of a 10-year prison term for burglary.

"He did mention Amy. We're really glad we came," Tina Robinson, the victim's mother, said, flanked by two other daughters. "I feel like this is a victory for Amy. We're really relieved.

"I think he really felt bad for what he did, even though it's not going to bring Amy back."

About an hour before his scheduled execution time, the U.S. Supreme Court rejected his final appeals.

His lawyers had hoped to block the execution with appeals in the federal courts that questioned whether the lethal drugs used in the punishment were humane and that Neville suffered a mental illness brought on by lupus that should disqualify him from the death penalty.

The Supreme Court has ruled mentally retarded people are ineligible for capital punishment but has not extended the blanket prohibition to the mentally ill.

Neville and Hall were arrested about two weeks after Robinson was reported missing. They were stopped at a customs checkpoint near Eagle Pass as they were trying to cross into Mexico. They told authorities they could find Robinson's body in a grassy field in the Trinity River bottoms just north of Arlington.

Robinson suffered from a genetic disorder, Turner's syndrome, a rare chromosome disorder found only in women and characterized by short stature and lack of sexual development at puberty.

She also was described as mentally challenged. Prosecutors said she was "easy prey," which is how Neville and Hall, days after their arrest, characterized their victim as they spoke with reporters and laughed about how Robinson died as she pleaded to live.

The pair had worked with her at an Arlington Kroger store before they were fired and knew the route she took as she rode her bike to work. When they offered her a ride, she accepted.

"We had a bet going to see who could shoot and kill the most people between the two of us," Neville told the Fort Worth Star-Telegram two weeks after his arrest, explaining that he and Hall wanted to become serial killers whose victims were racial minorities. "No matter if it was blacks or Mexicans - anybody as long as they weren't our color."

Robinson was part Native American.

DOJ_NMG_0013869

Neville declined to speak with reporters in the weeks before his scheduled execution.

Next week, another inmate, Clyde Smith, 32, faces injection for the robbery and slaying of a Houston taxi driver in 1992.

Texas Department of Criminal Justice execution schedule: http://www.tdcj.state.tx.us/stat/scheduledexecutions.htm

Supreme Court Puzzles Some With Mixed Answers On Lethal Injection (WP)

By Charles Lane

The Washington Post, February 10, 2006

In the past two weeks, the Supreme Court stopped two executions in Florida and allowed a lower court to halt another in Missouri -- but the justices allowed three other death sentences, in Texas and Indiana, to proceed.

The court's actions are not necessarily contradictory under the law, but they have puzzled many on both sides of the debate over capital punishment because in each case the death-row inmate raised a similar issue: the legality of lethal injection as the means for execution.

In the Texas case, for example, lawyers for Robert Neville Jr. took the wording for their Feb. 8 appeal from a petition that the court had accepted 14 days earlier when it halted the execution of Clarence E. Hill in Florida. But the justices rejected Neville's bid; he was put to death Wednesday.

"We look to the Supreme Court for consistency and a policy everyone can follow, and we're not getting it from this court," said Richard Alley, Neville's lawyer. Florida Gov. Jeb Bush (R) also cited "uncertainty" about the Supreme Court's direction when he declared Feb. 1 that he will not sign any more death warrants until the court issues final rulings on the Florida cases.

"I am sure the court is trying to apply some sort of sensible standard," said Douglas A. Berman, an expert in criminal sentencing law at Ohio State University's Moritz College of Law. "But they need to do a heck of a lot better job explaining why."

The probable explanation for the court's apparent zigzag is that a majority of the court is ready to consider only a relatively narrow issue related to lethal injection. But because the court generally does not reveal more than a bare minimum of information about how and why it chooses to take up any particular matter, lawyers have only been able to arrive at this educated guess after much litigation.

Introduced in Oklahoma in 1977 as an alternative to the electric chair, lethal injection has been adopted as the principal mode of execution by 37 of 38 death-penalty states, including Maryland and Virginia, as well as the federal government and the U.S. military. The District has no death penalty.

Yet anti-death-penalty activists argue that the dosage of anesthetic in the three-drug "protocol" used to kill capital offenders is flawed, and that, if it is administered improperly by untrained personnel, the process of suffocation and cardiac arrest caused by the other two drugs can therefore be as painful as electrocution or the gas chamber.

Their claim was bolstered by a 2005 article in the Lancet, a medical journal, but state law enforcement officials remain skeptical.

"It's sort of a legal 'Hail Mary' pass," said Joshua Marquis, prosecutor in Astoria, Ore., and a vice president of the National District Attorneys Association.

Indeed, the argument had made little headway in court until the night of Jan. 25, when the justices issued a stay of execution to Hill, the convicted killer of a Pensacola, Fla., police officer, as he lay on a gurney waiting for the flow of lethal chemicals.

The court acted without recorded dissent after first rejecting Hill's request to consider the broad issue of whether lethal injection as such is "cruel and unusual punishment."

But it did say it would hear Hill's narrower claim, which had been rejected by a federal appeals court in Atlanta: that he should have an opportunity to argue in the lower courts that Florida's lethal-injection formula, which is similar to that used in other jurisdictions, would cause him excessive pain, thus violating his civil rights.

The next day, the court's unanimity fractured. It denied a stay of execution to Indiana death-row inmate Marvin Bieghler, who was appealing the Indiana Supreme Court's rejection of his broad challenge to the constitutionality of lethal injection.

DOJ_NMG_0013870

Two justices, John Paul Stevens and Ruth Bader Ginsburg dissented, signaling that they thought the court should hear the broader constitutional claim, too.

Bieghler then brought the broad claim to the lower federal courts, winning a stay of execution from the federal appeals court in Chicago. That court based its 2 to 1 decision on the Supreme Court's grant of a stay to Hill. But the majority of the appeals court said it had acted only because it was not "comfortably certain" about the meaning of the court's stay for Hill.

The next day, the Supreme Court overturned that stay -- with dissents by Stevens, Ginsburg and Stephen G. Breyer -- and Bieghler was put to death. That ruling is the clearest indication that the court is, indeed, interested only in the narrow claim raised by Hill -- that there should be a chance to raise a civil rights challenge to the injection formula.

On Jan. 31, the court granted a stay to another Florida inmate, Arthur D. Rutherford, who was in an identical position to Hill.

A day later, on Feb. 1, the court denied a stay to Texas's Jaime Elizalde Jr. -- but refused to vacate a stay for Missouri's Michael A. Taylor that had been imposed by the federal court of appeals in St. Louis. This time, Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas dissented.

Taylor had raised a Hill-like narrow claim early in his appeals process but had been given only a hasty, last-minute hearing on the claim in federal district court, said Thomas C. Goldstein, a Washington lawyer who represents a Tennessee death-row inmate at the Supreme Court. This apparently prompted the appeals court to give him a stay, and a majority of the Supreme Court, including new Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. to let it stand.

The bottom line appears to be, Goldstein said, that while the court will not block executions for those raising only a broad claim that lethal injection is cruel and unusual, it has agreed to decide whether challenges to a lethal-injection formula may be raised as a civil rights lawsuit, and is therefore blocking executions for people who have not yet had a sufficient day in court on that claim.

Meanwhile, however, it is also not stopping executions in which death-row inmates seem to be raising the narrow issue only at the last minute, to take advantage of its decision to hear Hill's case. In a 2004 opinion, the court had expressed opposition to such latecomers.

That would explain why the court denied Texas's Neville a stay of execution -- with no recorded dissents.

With 22 executions scheduled by the states and the federal government before the end of June, when the court's term ends, lower courts remain caught up in the lethal-injection issue.

In California, Angelo Michael Morales is challenging that state's injection formula before a San Jose federal district judge. His execution is set for Feb. 21.

In Maryland, Vernon L. Evans Jr. has received a stay of execution from the Court of Appeals so that it could decide several claims, related both to alleged racial discrimination and to the state's lethal-injection protocol. But his lawsuit is based on alleged violations of state rather than federal law.

CIVIL LAW:

Judge Questions Viability Of NYC's Gun Litigation (LAW)

By Tom Perrotta, New York Law Journal

New York Law Journal, February 10, 2006

Two months after allowing New York City's lawsuit against the gun industry to proceed, a federal judge in Brooklyn suggested Wednesday the suit might be doomed by language in the appropriations bill passed by Congress last year.

In a brief order, Eastern District of New York Judge Jack B. Weinstein ordered the city to explain why its suit should not be dismissed in light of the new legislation, which bars the use of a federal database that tracks firearms as evidence in civil litigation.

The Firearms Trace System database is central to the city's suit, which alleges that gun manufacturers sell excess weapons in cities and states with weak gun laws, knowing that unqualified buyers in New York will obtain the weapons through "straw" purchases.

DOJ_NMG_0013871

The city alleges that gun manufacturers know which dealers are selling weapons that are used in crimes, and it had intended to use the database to help prove its case.

Assistant Corporation Counsel Eric Proshansky, the city's lead attorney on the case, said the new legislation would force the city "to prove this case in a manner that does not require trace data" -- a far more difficult task.

The legislation was signed into law on Nov. 22, before Weinstein issued a 111-page opinion that determined the city's suit was exempt from the Protection of Lawful Commerce in Arms Act, a different law that shields gun manufacturers from civil lawsuits.

Weinstein was unaware of the appropriations legislation when he issued his order in early December. At the time, the judge stayed his ruling, and the 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals later accepted an interlocutory appeal.

Wednesday, however, Weinstein rescinded his stay, saying he still had jurisdiction over matters not involved in the appeal. He scheduled a hearing for March 3.

"Decision by this court on the effect of the new legislation may affect the nature of any appeal now pending," Weinstein wrote in City of New York v. Beretta U.S.A. Corp., 00-cv-3641, a three-page order. "To avoid any unnecessary work by the parties and the Court of Appeals this court withdraws its stay."

An attorney for the National Shooting Sports Foundation, the gun industry's trade association, objected to Weinstein's sua sponte order for a hearing. The attorney, Lawrence G. Keane, said the appropriations bill addressed an evidentiary question separate from issues pending before the circuit, and should not be considered until the appeal is completed, if necessary.

"He has no jurisdiction, and even if he does the issue is not ripe," Keane said. "The trial hasn't started."

Proshansky said it made no difference to the city whether the evidentiary issue was addressed before or after the circuit appeal. He said he was more concerned with the little-noticed language that was inserted into the appropriations bill.

"It basically says you can't use this evidence in court," Proshansky said. "What's most frustrating is to see the federal government interfering with local efforts to protect the public safety."

The city's lawsuit, now more than five years old, has received the strong backing of Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg. It alleges that gun manufacturers -- including Beretta U.S.A. Corp., Smith & Wesson Corp., and Colt's Manufacturing Company -- have created a public nuisance through the sale and marketing of weapons that are later used to commit crimes. The city is not seeking monetary damages, but wants changes to the gun industry's marketing practices. It also is seeking attorney fees.

Last year, the gun manufacturers sought to dismiss the suit after the Protection of Lawful Commerce in Arms Act was signed into law. Weinstein found that the city's claim fit into an exception made for suits that allege a knowing violation of a state or federal statute applicable to the sale or marketing of guns.

Michael L. Rice of Jones Day, which represents Colt's Manufacturing, said the defendants wish to resolve litigation through the pending appeal. "We would like to get the suit resolved on that basis," Rice said. "We think it's clear that the Protection of Lawful Commerce [in Arms] Act is the clean, direct way to end the lawsuit."

Senators Urge Major Changes To Asbestos Bill (REU-Y2)

By Susan Cornwell

Reuters, February 10, 2006

A group of Republican senators on Thursday proposed completely rewriting an asbestos bill to allow lawsuits under strict medical criteria rather than create a $140 billion fund to pay victims of the mineral.

The new approach to resolve years of litigation over lung-scarring diseases and cancer linked to asbestos was offered by Texas Republican John Cornyn, who said he had 14 Republican co-sponsors and hoped to attract Democrats.

Cornyn's proposal is similar to a bill introduced in the House that would allow asbestos lawsuits to go forward only if claimants met certain medical standards. He introduced the plan as an amendment to a bill that would halt asbestos lawsuits and create an industry-financed $140 billion fund to pay claims.

Many critics of the fund are concerned it will run out of money, leaving taxpayers to foot the bill.

"I believe the likelihood is that the trust fund will sooner rather than later, prove unsustainable," Cornyn said.

DOJ_NMG_0013872

Asbestos fibers were widely used for their insulating and fire-retardant capabilities for years. Some 70 U.S. companies, including W.R. Grace and Co. and USG Corp., have been pushed into bankruptcy proceedings by injury claims.

The asbestos fund bill on the Senate floor is sponsored by Pennsylvania Republican Sen. Arlen Specter (news, bio, voting record) -- who immediately spoke against Cornyn's proposal -- and Vermont Democrat Sen. Patrick Leahy (news, bio, voting record). Their bill would require asbestos companies and insurers to finance the fund to end all litigation.

The fund proposal has split the business community as well as senators in both parties and has struggled to gain support.

On Wednesday, Senate Democrats said their analysis of the proposed fund showed that it would run out of money and need a federal bailout to pay injury claims.

Cornyn said his proposed amendment would establish a "national floor" with respect to medical criteria. It would require physical impairment, to which exposure to asbestos was a substantial contributing factor, to bring an asbestos claim to court. Several states have passed similar legislation.

His proposal would also extend the statute of limitations for filing claims, so people who are not yet sick from asbestos can still have their cases heard if they fall ill in the future, Cornyn said. Further, the plan would attempt to limit fraud by medical screeners that vouch for claims.

Specter said medical criteria would not help injured employees of bankrupt firms because they had no one to sue.

Utah Republican Sen. Bob Bennett said support was divided for the bill because some companies, like USG, would have vast asbestos liabilities wiped out if the fund passes. Others, like Foster Wheeler Ltd, would have to pay into the fund many times what their asbestos outlays would otherwise be.

"People have done the numbers. Some say I'm better off in the tort (court) system and others say, 'I'll pay anything to get out," Bennett told the Senate.

The Coalition for Asbestos Reform, a lobbying group representing companies opposed to the trust fund, urged senators to vote for Cornyn's amendment. Its chairman Thomas O'Brien, former counsel to Foster Wheeler, said Cornyn's approach would create "a national standard that would finally bring asbestos litigation abuses under control."

Shares of companies with asbestos liabilities were mixed in afternoon trading.

Foster Wheeler was up 1.21 percent to $48.58 a share on Nasdaq. W.R. Grace was down 1 percent to $10.91 a share and USG was off 1.63 percent to $88.76, both on the New York Stock Exchange.

Asbestos Bill Meets Test, Faces New One (AJC/AP)

By Mary Dalrymple

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, February 10, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Senate rejected an attempt Thursday to keep asbestos cases in the courts, removing one obstacle to the creation of a $140 billion trust fund for paying victims and ending their lawsuits.

Opponents quickly raised another obstacle. Sen. John Ensign, R-Nev., questioned the fund's future costs to taxpayers and asserted that the bill violates budget rules.

The bill would establish a privately funded trust fund, administered through the Labor Department, to compensate asbestos victims.

The fibrous mineral was commonly used until the mid-1970s in insulation and fireproof material. Its tiny fibers can cause cancer and other ailments when inhaled. Disease can take decades to develop.

Sen. John Cornyn, R-Texas, tried to kill the proposed trust fund and create, instead, new medical standards for bringing an asbestos case to court. He said lawmakers could weed out suits brought by people not yet sick from asbestos exposure and thin the mass of cases clogging the judicial system.

"I believe that the likelihood is far greater that the trust fund will sooner, rather than later, prove unsustainable and return us to the same broken tort system, only then leaving thousands of Americans in the wake of a failed government program wondering where to go and why they must now go back to court," he said.

The Senate voted 70-27 to shelve the proposal.

DOJ_NMG_0013873

Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, the Pennsylvania Republican who sponsored the trust fund bill, said changing the standards for bringing a case to court can't help the thousands of people suffering deadly disease who have no one to sue.

Specter and other trust fund supporters say it could compensate veterans and former employees of bankrupt companies. They also argue that smaller companies could avoid bankruptcy by sidestepping lengthy court battles.

The White House gave the bill lukewarm support but expressed serious concerns about some parts of the legislation. Some critics question whether the trust fund, financed by asbestos manufacturers, users and insurers, would be emptied by claims.

Ensign said there remains the possibility that taxpayers will have to pick up the tab in future years if the trust fund runs out of money.

"I don't think that the underlying piece of legislation can be fixed to any great certainty to make sure that the taxpayers in the future aren't ending up holding a huge mess that includes a great deal of debt for future generations," Ensign said.

His objection requires 60 of 100 votes to overcome, with a vote expected next week.

Specter said private companies fill the trust fund, not the government, and that the trust fund's opponents had seized on a technicality.

"This is a convenient maneuver to defeat the bill," he said.

Forward On Asbestos (WP)

The Washington Post, February 10, 2006

IN A TRIUMPH of good sense and bipartisan cooperation, the Senate voted on Tuesday to go forward with a bill that would fix the broken asbestos litigation system. Hundreds of thousands of asbestos injury claims have already landed in the courts, contributing to the bankruptcy of more than 70 companies. Without reform, this process will drag on, triggering the bankruptcy of yet more firms, many of which have only tenuous asbestos connections, because the main firms responsible have already gone under. Meanwhile, many who are ill from asbestos-related diseases won't be able to get timely compensation or, in some cases, any compensation. Unless the bill passes, Navy veterans, for example, will go uncompensated for diseases caused by asbestos on ships. Veterans are not allowed to sue the government, and many of the shipbuilders are long since bankrupt.

The bill will be debated and amended, and it may face a second attempted filibuster before it gets a vote. Some amendment may be reasonable at the margins, but the bill's central idea -- to replace litigation with a $140 billion compensation fund to be financed by defendant companies and their insurers -- must be preserved. Democrats complain that the fund won't have enough money to compensate asbestos victims; Republicans complain that the fund will have too much money, the raising of which will constitute a burden on small and medium-size firms. The fact that the bill is being attacked from both directions suggests that its authors, Sens. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) and Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.), have balanced competing interests in a reasonable manner.

Unfortunately, the bill's critics are not always so reasonable. Sen. Harry M. Reid of Nevada, the Democratic minority leader, has complained, "One would have to search long and hard to find a bill in my opinion as bad as this." He has even described the legislation as the work of lobbyists hired by corporations to limit asbestos exposure. But the truth is that the bill's main opponents are trial lawyers, who profit mightily from asbestos lawsuits and who constitute a powerful lobby in their own right. Mr. Specter and Mr. Leahy are in fact model resisters of special interests who have spent more than two years crafting legislation that serves the public interest. For Mr. Reid to demean this effort in order to fire off campaign sound bites is reprehensible.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Ex-Officer Charged With Making Threats (NSDY/AP)

By Associated Press

Long Island Newsday, February 10, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0013874

HAGERSTOWN, Md. -- The FBI on Thursday charged a former police officer with making racial, bomb and anthrax threats after he was fired by the city.

The threats began four months after Jeffrey S. Shifler was dismissed in November 2003 for falsifying payroll records, court records said.

Shifler, 41, was in custody, authorities said. He was expected to appear Friday in federal court in Baltimore. He faces as many as 10 years in prison if convicted on all counts.

No phone listing was available for him.

Shifler made 14 anonymous phone calls and sent at least nine anonymous letters containing threats, insults or false crime reports, according to a court complaint. The threats targeted police employees and a black city council member, and such institutions as schools and public office buildings.

Many letters were on photocopied Hagerstown Police Department letterhead, the complaint alleges.

Shifler was hired by the nearby town of Boonsboro after being fired in Hagerstown. It was unclear whether he was still working there.

U.S. Files Fewer Discrimination Charges (AP)

AP, February 10, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) - The U.S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission filed fewer charges of discrimination against private employers last year for the third straight year.

Commission chair Cari M. Dominguez said the commission's prevention efforts through outreach and training might be responsible but added that other factors, like the economic slowdown, might also be involved. "We are pleased to see that our proactive prevention efforts may be having an impact," she said.

Commission field offices filed 75,428 charges in the 12 months ended Sept. 30, down from 79,432, 81,293 and 84,442 in fiscal years 2004, 2003 and 2002, respectively. The average complaint took 171 days to process in fiscal 2005.

During 2005, 77,352 discrimination complaints were resolved, 21.5 percent with a favorable outcome for the individual who complained, up from 19.5 percent the previous two years.

The commission obtained $380 million in compensation for those who complained of discrimination, including a record $271.6 million through mediation and other means short of going to court.

The type of complaints remained relatively unchanged from previous years: Allegations of racial discrimination remained the largest group, 26,740 charges accounting for 35.5 percent of all filings.

Sex discrimination accounted for 23,094 charges or 30.6 percent of all complaints; retaliation, 22,278 or 29.5 percent; age, 16,585 or 22 percent; disability, 14,893 or 19.7 percent; national origin, 8,035 or 10.7 percent; religion, 2,340 or 3.1 percent and equal pay, 970 or 1.3 percent. The total exceeds 100 percent because individuals may allege more than one kind of discrimination in a complaint.

In addition, there were 12,679 complaints of sexual harassment, 14 percent filed by men, and 4,449 pregnancy discrimination complaints.

EEOC enforces federal antidiscrimination laws among private employers. The Justice Department enforces those laws among government workers.

Katrina Disaster Seen As Chance To Fix New Orleans Bureaucracy (AP)

By DOUG SIMPSON, The Associated Press

AP, February 9, 2006

BATON ROUGE, La. (AP) — Hurricane Katrina created a chance to slash the city bureaucracy in New Orleans, which has two elected sheriffs, two elected clerks of court and two separate court systems, a legislative panel voted on Thursday.

The city's population has plummeted since the storm, giving critics the chance to streamline a system, stemming from the 19th century, which gives the city numerous elected positions long seen as redundant. Rep. Peppi Bruneau, a key supporter, urged colleagues to support the change, calling New Orleans' bureaucracy outmoded, time-consuming, antiquated and out of step with the rest of the country.

DOJ_NMG_0013875

"It's time to join the rest of the United States of America," said Bruneau, R-New Orleans.

Without objection, a House judicial committee approved a bill that would combine the city's clerks and sheriffs offices, plus consolidate the city civil and criminal court systems. The bill, backed by Gov. Kathleen Blanco and sponsored by House Speaker Joe Salter, D-Florien, now moves to the House floor for debate.

Separate legislation is aimed at consolidating New Orleans' seven elected property tax assessors into one elected assessor post. That measure awaits debate in the House Ways and Means Committee.

Passage of Salter's bill came after Rep. Cedric Richmond, D-New Orleans, head of the Legislative Black Caucus, said race is one reason the state is moving to slash the number of the city's elected officials, most of whom are black. Many of New Orleans black residents remain displaced — living in other states because of hurricane damage — and Richmond questioned why lawmakers and Gov. Kathleen Blanco were pushing the consolidation now, while black voters are elsewhere, unable to voice concerns about the proposed changes.

Race, Richmond said, "is the elephant that's been in this room the whole time. It may be uncomfortable, but let's address it."

Salter later said: "I can assure you that my bringing the bill was not predicated on race."

Richmond noted that the U.S. Justice Department would need to approve the changes, because Louisiana remains restricted under the Voting Rights Act of 1965, imposed on states with a history of election discrimination against blacks.

The court consolidation plans also face opposition from the New Orleans Bar Association, judges and other court officials in New Orleans, who said their courts are still reeling from Katrina's flooding and need to worry first about getting the city's judicial system back in order.

State Supreme Court Justice Bernette Johnson, a former civil district judge in the city, called the bill "half-baked." She urged lawmakers to focus instead on passing measures to ensure that New Orleans levee system is better managed.

"This legislation ... is not going to help New Orleans right now," Johnson said. "This is a distraction."

The city's two sheriffs also oppose the measures: Criminal Sheriff Marlin Gusman, who runs the city jail, and Civil Sheriff Paul Valteau, whose office functions in support of the city's civil district court.

"Downsizing our office right now, when we have over 1,350 inmates ... just doesn't make sense to me," Gusman said.

The criminal sheriff has traditionally been one of the city's most powerful elected positions. The former sheriff, Charles Foti, was elected state attorney general in 2003.

Bruneau said the city already has a police chief, its top law-enforcement officer, and doesn't need an additional two sheriffs.

Richmond said he supported some form of consolidation but added the matter could wait until the regular session set for next month. That way, Richmond said, the Legislature could also deal with other proposed consolidation, including compressing the city's juvenile, municipal and city courts.

Rather than get it all done at once, Bruneau responded that he wanted to get the initial consolidation done during the current special session, then continue in the regular session.

"It's like eating a hamburger — you can eat it in a couple bites or you can shove the whole thing in your mouth at one time," he said.

Richmond tried to amend the measure to remove consolidation of sheriffs, but the committee voted it down with a 6-7 vote.

More Injuries As Race Riots Disrupt Jails In Los Angeles (NYT)

By Randal C. Archibold

The New York Times, February 10, 2006

LOS ANGELES, Feb. 9 — Five days of racial rioting have left one inmate dead and dozens injured at Los Angeles County jails as blacks and Latinos have taken their conflicts from the streets behind bars, the authorities said.

The latest occurred Thursday when 200 inmates at Pitchess Detention Center, a collection of jails in the northern fringes of the county where most of the violence has occurred, clashed briefly until deputies used tear gas to bring them under control. There were no reported injuries.

DOJ_NMG_0013876

On Wednesday night, two dozen inmates were injured in a riot among 300 people that ended after teams of deputies fired rubber pellets. That riot, as well as those that took place Monday and Tuesday, was at the Pitchess center.

Since the worst of the rioting on Saturday, when a 43-year-old inmate was beaten to death, the sheriff's department has locked down all jails, suspending activities and privileges in the system — the nation's largest, with 21,000 inmates.

"We are convinced it is traced back to an age-old gang war in South Los Angeles," said Steve Whitmore, a spokesman for the Sheriff's Department. "It is a small core group of people, and most of the inmates don't want to fight."

Mr. Whitmore declined to elaborate on a motive for the violence, but members of the clergy and community advocates who met Thursday with inmates said they were told that a gang called the Mexican Mafia had ordered retaliation on black gang members who had apparently attacked Latino gang members in Los Angeles in a dispute involving drugs, turf or both.

In a move deployed only in emergencies, deputies have segregated black and Latino inmates and put "shot callers" from the gangs in separate cells, Mr. Whitmore said.

Sheriff Lee Baca has outlined a plan to move some of the most dangerous inmates next month to a more secure but underused jail in downtown Los Angeles.

Mayor Antonio R. Villaraigosa of Los Angeles said in an interview that the persistence of the clashes and their racial nature troubled him and that he would visit the jail complex in the next few days.

"I feel, as someone who has dedicated his life to trying to bridge communities and promote understanding between racial groups, we obviously all should be concerned about the level of violence and racial nature of the conflicts," he said.

Mr. Villaraigosa, who has no authority over the jails, said he would seek to cool tempers in his visit.

Racial violence has flared at the jails since the early 1980's, when hardening street gangs bloodied neighborhoods all over Los Angeles and carried their disputes into jails and prisons.

But some observers said they believed the jail violence pointed to long-held but little-discussed black-Latino tensions that go beyond street gangs.

With substantial support from black voters, Mr. Villaraigosa last year became the city's first Latino mayor in more than 100 years.

But he took office after a spate of fights among black and Latino students at several schools in Southern California, including one in South Los Angeles that endured at least three such brawls.

"What you are seeing in the jails is symptomatic of a much deeper malaise," said Earl Ofari Hutchinson, a radio talk-show host who organizes the weekly Los Angeles Urban Policy Roundtable, a discussion group that recently addressed the conflict among blacks and Latinos.

"Blacks and Latinos have been clashing in schools, on the streets, in the workplace, in hospitals," Mr. Hutchinson said, noting the decline in the black population as the number of Latinos increases. "I don't necessarily mean physically clash, but struggling over turf as neighborhoods change and become predominantly Latino."

Discriminatory Online Ads Targeted In Craigslist Lawsuit (LAW/AP)

By Dave Carpenter, The Associated Press

AP, February 10, 2006

A federal lawsuit accuses the online site Craigslist of violating fair housing laws by publishing discriminatory classified ads, reviving the question of what legal boundaries, if any, should exist for postings on the Internet.

But legal experts say the lawsuit against Craigslist, a fast-growing online network of classified ads and forums, faces an uphill battle because of laws in place to protect online service providers.

The lawsuit, filed by a Chicago fair housing group in U.S. District Court on Feb. 3, contends that Craigslist's Chicago site distributed more than 100 ads that violated the federal Fair Housing Act by excluding prospective buyers or tenants on the basis of race, gender or religion.

Among the housing ads cited as objectionable by the Chicago Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights Under Law Inc. were ones that read "NO MINORITIES," "Requirements: Clean Godly Christian Male," and "Only Muslims apply."

DOJ_NMG_0013877

While it remained unclear Thursday if the suit is the first of its kind, it signifies a burgeoning effort by housing watchdog groups to extend to the Internet the same legal restrictions facing those that publish print classifieds.

"Our goal is to have the Internet places like Craigslist treated no differently than newspapers and other media who have traditionally been posting real estate advertisements," said Stephen Libowsky, a counsel for the housing group. "All of the gains are going to get lost if the same rules don't apply."

The nonprofit group is an affiliate of the National Fair Housing Alliance. Its Louisiana affiliate, the Greater New Orleans Fair Housing Action Center, recently filed a similar complaint against the hurricane relief Web site Katrinahousing.org, alleging it found 68 discriminatory housing ads.

San Francisco-based Craigslist, founded in 1995 as a roundup of local events, now has listings in more than 20 countries and 150 cities and runs 8 million new classified ads a month. Its huge scope means the Chicago case will likely be watched closely by other online sites. EBay Inc. owns 25 percent of Craigslist.

A ruling against it "would have a chilling effect on the Internet and what it was intended to provide, and that is an open forum and free expression," said Melissa Klipp, a Florham Park, N.J.-based attorney who practices Internet law.

The lawsuit seeks, among other things, to require Craigslist to report to the government any individual seeking to post a discriminatory ad and to develop screening software to preclude discriminatory ads from being published on its Web site.

Craigslist, which has 19 employees, maintains that screening its almost-nonstop classified listings would be impossible. Jim Buckmaster, its chief executive officer, said Thursday that the system is automated and that users can flag postings. If enough do, it comes off automatically. The "NO MINORITIES" ad was removed within two hours, he said.

"We admit that one or two postings per 100,000 are discriminatory," Buckmaster said. "But we feel we're in the forefront of promoting fair housing for everyone."

The site last month added a yellow link on each housing ad warning that "Stating a discriminatory preference in a housing post is illegal." When clicked, users get information about the Fair Housing Act and guidance on how to write ads that comply.

Several Internet law experts said the suit seems likely to fail, citing a 1996 federal law that says an online service provider isn't considered a publisher or a speaker when it merely passes along information provided by someone else.

Jennifer Rothman, a law professor at Washington University in St. Louis, called it "a complete nonstarter" despite legitimate concerns about discrimination.

"Congress decided it was more important not to chill speech on the Internet and not to shut down these Internet providers," she said. "If you start holding them responsible, essentially you shut down the business."

"From a moral standpoint, of course, people will expect that if you're going to run a site like that you ought to police it," said Houston-based attorney Jeff Diamant. "But all Craigslist is doing is running a forum for people to communicate."

Air Force Eases Rules On Religion (WP)

By Alan Cooperman

The Washington Post, February 10, 2006

The Air Force, under pressure from evangelical Christian groups and members of Congress, softened its guidelines on religious expression yesterday to emphasize that superior officers may discuss their faith with subordinates and that chaplains will not be required to offer nonsectarian prayers.

"This does affirm every airman's right, even the commanders' right, to free exercise of religion, and that means sharing your faith," said Maj. Gen. Charles C. Baldwin, the Air Force's chief of chaplains.

The guidelines were first issued in late August after allegations that evangelical Christian commanders, coaches and cadets at the Air Force Academy had pressured cadets of other faiths. The original wording sought to tamp down religious fervor and to foster tolerance throughout the Air Force. It discouraged public prayers at routine events and warned superior officers that personal expressions of faith could be misunderstood as official statements.

But evangelical groups, such as the Colorado-based Focus on the Family, saw the guidelines as overly restrictive. They launched a nationwide petition drive, sounded alarms on Christian radio stations, and deluged the White House and Air Force

DOJ_NMG_0013878

Secretary Michael W. Wynne's office with e-mails calling the guidelines an infringement of the Constitution's guarantees of free speech and free exercise of religion.

Seventy-two members of Congress also signed a letter to President Bush criticizing the guidelines and urging him to issue an executive order guaranteeing the right of military chaplains to pray "in Jesus' name" rather than being forced to offer nonsectarian prayers at public ceremonies.

The revised guidelines are considerably shorter than the original, filling one page instead of four. They place more emphasis on the Constitution's free exercise clause, which is mentioned four times, than on its prohibition on any government establishment of religion, which is mentioned twice.

The guidelines still warn superior officers to be "sensitive to the potential" that personal expressions of faith may appear to be official statements. But they say that, "subject to these sensitivities, superiors enjoy the same free exercise rights as all other airmen." They now add that there are no restrictions in situations "where it is reasonably clear that the discussions are personal, not official, and they can be reasonably free of the potential for, or appearance of, coercion."

Baldwin acknowledged in a telephone interview yesterday that the changes reflect the criticism from evangelicals.

"I think that my evangelical friends were concerned that we did limit, and somehow restrict, the chaplains' service, for example, because the guidance said chaplains should be 'as sensitive to those who do not welcome offerings of faith as they are generous in sharing their faith with those who do,' " Baldwin said.

The Rev. Ted Haggard, president of the National Association of Evangelicals and pastor of New Life Church, a congregation near the Air Force Academy, said the revised document restores the proper balance between the free exercise and establishment clauses.

"When I read it, I thought, if I were nonreligious, I would feel protected; if I were a minority religion, I would feel respected; and as a member of the majority religion, I feel the need to be respectful," Haggard said.

Rep. Walter B. Jones Jr. (R-N.C.), a principal author of the congressional letter, said he considers the revised guidelines an improvement but is not wholly satisfied.

He noted that the revisions include a sentence saying: "We will respect the rights of chaplains to adhere to the tenets of their religious faiths and they will not be required to participate in religious activities, including public prayer, inconsistent with their faiths."

But he said the guidelines still call for "nondenominational, inclusive prayer or a moment of silence" at military ceremonies. "There is some progress, but it does not go as far as it needs to go in making sure that Christian chaplains can pray in the name of Jesus and other chaplains can pray according to their faiths," Jones said.

Americans United for Separation of Church and State, a Washington-based group whose investigation of the Air Force Academy helped spark the controversy last year, said the revisions "focus heavily on protecting the rights of chaplains, while ignoring the rights of nonbelievers and minority faiths."

Michael L. "Mikey" Weinstein, an Albuquerque lawyer who is suing the Air Force over its policy on religion, questioned the sentence allowing commanders to share their faith when it is "reasonably clear" that they are speaking personally, not officially.

"Reasonably clear from whose perspective, the superior's or the subordinate's?" asked Weinstein, a 1977 Air Force Academy graduate. "When a senior member of your chain of command wants to speak to you 'reasonably' about religion, saying 'Get out of my face, sir!' is not an option."

Police Kill Carjacker During Gun Battle In Venice (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 10, 2006

A chase and fierce gun battle between a shotgun-wielding carjacker and police ended early this morning when the suspect was cornered and shot dead in Venice.

Santa Monica police Chief James T. Butts said his officers acted "valorously."

"It took a great deal of courage," Butts said. "This person has manifested the intent to kill you, and these officers chased him. That's what you expect of police officers in a free society."

DOJ_NMG_0013879

The incident began in Santa Monica about 5:00 a.m., when a motorist stopped to help what he thought was a driver with car trouble. Instead, the suspect jumped out of a vehicle, pointed a shotgun at the would-be good Samaritan, and commandeered the car. The motorist was not injured.

Butts said officers stopped the car at 7th and California streets, where a gun battle broke out. The man, who has not been identified, fled in the carjacked auto.

About a half-mile later, with police pursuing, the suspect crashed the car in the 1300 block of Electric Avenue in Venice. When he ignored commands to surrender and pointed a shotgun at police, officers opened fire, Butts said.

The suspect was declared dead at the scene. No officers were hurt, Butts said.

Four Presidents And A Funeral (WSJ)

By Peggy Noonan

The Wall Street Journal, February 10, 2006

Listen, I watched the funeral of Coretta Scott King for six hours Tuesday, from the pre-service commentary to the very last speech, and it was wonderful -- spirited and moving, rousing and respectful, pugnacious and loving. The old lions of the great American civil rights movement of the 20th century were there, and standing tall. The old lionesses, too. There was preaching and speechifying and at the end I thought: This is how democracy ought to be, ought to look every day -- full of the joy of argument, and marked by the moral certainty that here you can say what you think.

There was nothing prissy, nothing sissy about it. A former president, a softly gray-haired and chronically dyspeptic gentleman who seems to have judged the world to be just barely deserving of his presence, pointedly insulted a sitting president who was, in fact, sitting right behind him. The Clintons unveiled their 2008 campaign. A rhyming preacher, one of the old lions, a man of warmth and stature, freely used the occasion to verbally bop the sitting president on the head.

So what? This was the authentic sound of a vibrant democracy doing its thing. It was the exact opposite of the frightened and prissy attitude that if you draw a picture I don't like, I'll have to kill you.

It was: We do free speech here.

That funeral honored us, and the world could learn a lot from watching it. The U.S. government should send all six hours of it throughout the World Wide Web and to every country on earth, because it said more about who we are than any number of decorous U.N. speeches and formal diplomatic declarations. * * *

A moment for a distinction that must be made. Some have compared Mrs. King's funeral to the Paul Wellstone memorial. It was not like the Wellstone memorial, and you'd have to be as dim and false as Al Franken to say it was. The Wellstone memorial was marked not by joy but anger. It was at moments sour, even dark. There was famous booing.

The King funeral was nothing like this. It was gracious, full of applause and cheers and amens. It was loving even when it was political. It had spirit, not rage. That's part of why it was beautiful.

It was also beautiful because, as the first speaker, Bishop Eddie L. Long, senior pastor of the New Birth Missionary Baptist Church in Lithonia, Ga., said in almost his first words, "This is a worship. This is a celebration. This is a moment that we give to honor God."

It was a religious service in which no one was afraid to talk about God. "Praise the Lord," and "Lord, we lift your name on high" and "How we love to sing your praises" rang through the room. Scripture was quoted, stories told. Blacks in America are not afraid to love Jesus the way they want to love him, to use the language and symbols they want to use. I want to kiss their hands for this. I also happen to honor the fact that, by and large, older blacks at least have not given way to 20th-century stoicism in their style of mourning. The Kennedys, who had too much experience with funerals, set the stoic style 40 years ago, and while it was elegant and moving in its own way, it left an entire nation thinking it was in rather poor taste to cry aloud and sob.

As for the speakers, no one has ever been or could be better than the Rev. Bernice King, who spoke of her mother's love, her mother's end, and the possible metaphorical meaning of the cancer that killed her.

The Rev. Joseph Lowery gave a beautiful poem about Martin being with Rosa in heaven and then finding out that Coretta was coming, and rushing to greet her at the pearly gates. Strike you as corny? Not me. It was beautiful because it was not only full of unselfconscious faith, it assumed unselfconscious faith on the part of the audience, and so was both an implicit compliment and a declaration of shared assumptions. The audience responded with amens and cheers. When he bopped the president over weapons of mass destruction, what seemed, on CNN, to be half the room stood and applauded.

DOJ_NMG_0013880

When George Bush 41 followed him to the podium, he teased Mr. Lowery in a way that complimented his eloquence. People sometimes marvel at the grace of George H.W. Bush. He is a warm and gracious man, and he's old enough to appreciate the humor in everything. He's old enough to appreciate life. But it is also true that when you attack him or his son from the left he doesn't get mad because in his heart he kinda thinks you're right. Attack him from the right; you won't be overwhelmed by his bonhomie then.

President Bush was fine, his eloquence of the formal kind. He needs to find the place between High Rhetoric and off-the-cuff plainspeak. He always does one or the other. But there's a place in between, a place that's not fancy and not common, that would serve him well if he could find it.

Bill Clinton was, as always, the master. Say what you will, he is the only politician in America with the confidence to call Episcopalians "the frozen chosen" and know everyone will laugh and take no offense. Amid all the happy bombast he was the one who pointed at the casket and said, "There's a woman in there." He talked about Mrs. King in good strong plain terms. Yes, he caused a quarter-second of awkwardness when he said of the beautiful Coretta that even at age 75 she still had the goods, but in moments of exuberance we all forget our own history.

The real news was how the Clintons used the funeral to unveil how they will run in 2008: Together, side by side, with beautiful hairdos. I haven't seen them like this -- both standing at the podium -- since 1992, when they were new. In the years since, after the health-care failure and the Whitewater scandals, the West Wing attitude toward the president's wife was a quiet and respectful "Get that woman off the podium!" Not anymore. All is new again. Mrs. Clinton has clearly been working on her public speaking, and attempted to use her hands as her husband uses his, now in an emphasizing arc, now resting on her chest. But his are large, long and elegant, and hers are puffed and grasping.

Both Clintons spoke in the cadence and with the imagery of the Bible. Mrs. Clinton's first words, in which she referred to Mrs. King's brave decision to continue her husband's work after his murder, were steeped in religiosity. "As we are called, each of us must decide whether to answer that call by saying, 'Send me.'" She ended with, "The work of peace never ends. So we bid her earthly presence farewell. We wish her Godspeed on her homecoming. And we ask ourselves, 'Will we say, when the call comes, "Send me"?'"

Oh I think we will, Ms. Meanieface!

If you don't understand that Mrs. Clinton was rehearsing her 2008 announcement speech, then you are a child and must go home and have a nice cup of cocoa.

This is what is coming: I have had a blessed life. And like so many people I could choose, after all these years, a life of comfort. Watch it from the sidelines, tend to my own concerns, watch the garden grow. But our nation calls out. And if we are to be Americans we must meet the call. "Send me."

With Bill nodding beside her, his hands clasped prayerfully in front of him, nodding and working that jaw muscle he works when he wants you to notice, for just a second, how hard it is sometimes for him to contain his admiration.

God I love them. * * *

Apart from its beauty, dignity and fight, Mrs. King's funeral got me thinking about this: Did she know how much she was loved? It's hard for a person to know that. If only she could have gone to her own funeral, she would have known. I wonder if it wouldn't be good if somewhere along the way, just once in your life, you got to call your own funeral. Pick the church, the speakers, the music, sit in the pew, clap when they talk about how wonderful you were. Then afterwards have a long lunch and toast your memory. Then the next day you go to work as usual, but maybe in a different mood. I don't see why we don't do this. Is this a stupid thing to say? It's allowed. I've got free speech.

Ms. Noonan, a contributing editor of The Wall Street Journal and columnist for OpinionJournal.com1, is the author of "John Paul the Great: Remembering a Spiritual Father," (Penguin, 2005).

Voting Rights Under Siege (NYT)

The New York Times, February 10, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0013881

American laws that strip convicted felons of the right to vote, barring nearly five million from the polls in the last election, are the most punitive and regressive laws of their kind in the democratic world. Several states have recently softened or eliminated the voting bans, and many others are considering laws that could eventually establish voting as a basic American right that should never be curtailed in a way that bars a whole class of people from the polls.

This attitude is gaining traction even in the Deep South, which pioneered voting bans to disenfranchise black Americans in the late 19th and early 20th centuries. But the new trend toward fairness has somehow vaulted over Pennsylvania, where the Republican majority in the State House is pushing to pass one of the most odious felon-voting bans ever seen above the Mason-Dixon line.

Under current Pennsylvania law, people can vote once they leave prison. But a bill pending in the Legislature would disenfranchise those on parole or probation. The bill would go further and bar convicts from voting until the dates when their maximum sentences would expire — even if they had been fully released from the system much earlier.

Pennsylvania, a swing state that will hold some critical elections this fall, is being barraged by legislation, championed by Republican lawmakers, that would raise voting barriers, especially for groups that tend to be Democratic. One measure would institute one of the most restrictive voter-identification laws in the nation, in a state that currently requires only first-time voters to prove their identities. Pennsylvanians — who have been at the forefront of fairness in voting rights issues — should not allow partisanship to erase that legacy.

ANTITRUST:

Microsoft Rivals Gripe To U.S. About Its New Vista Software (WSJ)

By Kevin J. Delaney And Robert A. Guth

The Wall Street Journal, February 10, 2006

The Justice Department said it has received complaints about Microsoft Corp.'s coming Windows Vista operating system, focusing in part on concerns over the introductory "first-boot" screens displayed on new personal computers and other aspects of the software.

The government, in a status report on Microsoft's compliance with an antitrust settlement, said an unidentified company complained about the ability of PC makers to customize the initial process of booting up Vista. Some PC makers use those screens to offer broadband Internet access, antivirus and other PC-related services and software.

The Wall Street Journal Tuesday reported that Hewlett-Packard Co. has tussled with Microsoft over the screens. The PC maker in recent months briefed the Justice Department on those concerns, a person familiar with the matter said. An H-P spokesman declined to comment. The report said that in addition to the first-boot process, "several industry members" had expressed other unspecified concerns regarding Windows Vista, which Microsoft is expected to begin selling later this year. A Microsoft spokesman said it has worked closely with partners "to make sure Windows Vista provides flexibility...while remaining faithful to the goal of putting users first." (See related article.1)

The complaints were disclosed as part of a regular monitoring by the Justice Department of Microsoft's compliance with its 2001 antitrust settlement with the federal government. The status report noted that Microsoft's recent decision to license elements of its server software was a "constructive proposal" in addressing concerns of the plaintiffs in the antitrust settlement. A Justice Department spokeswoman declined to comment further.

Separately, executives at search company Google Inc. asserted in an interview that Microsoft is using its influence over the browser-software market to push its MSN Web-search service to the disadvantage of rivals. Google objects to how Microsoft handles a default search-engine setting in its Internet Explorer 7 Web-browser software, which Microsoft considers part of Vista. A Google spokesman declined to say whether the company had discussed its concerns with the Justice Department.

Google wants Microsoft to ask consumers directly which search service they want as a default when upgrading from older versions of Explorer -- a change Microsoft feels is intrusive. Explorer 7 features a built-in box linking to the user's default search engine, making ownership of that default setting more strategically important to the search companies. Google said Microsoft has put other roadblocks in the way of consumers' changing their default search setting away from MSN. "It's a way in which they're using their dominant position to favor their product," said Sundar Pichai, a Google group-product manager.

DOJ_NMG_0013882

Microsoft has said it has listened to Google's requests and made changes to make it easier for consumers to choose other search engines.

RIM Unveils Plan To Keep US BlackBerrys Alive (REU)

By Susan Taylor

Reuters, February 9, 2006

OTTAWA (Reuters) - Research In Motion <RIM.TO> <RIMM.O> unveiled a plan on Thursday that it says will let its BlackBerry e-mail device work even if it loses a patent fight, and said the workaround will prevent a shutdown of service in the United States.

In an announcement made as the clock ticked toward a February 24 court hearing on U.S. patent holding company NTP Inc.'s request for an injunction to halt U.S. BlackBerry service, RIM also said it was still willing to negotiate a deal.

NTP questioned why RIM simply didn't go ahead and make the software changes for the workaround and argued the BlackBerry maker was trying to bully it. One analyst described the announcement as part of a "high stakes poker game."

The Waterloo, Ontario-based technology company, whose addictive device has been dubbed the "CrackBerry" by many users, said it is willing to "generously compensate" NTP, but called NTP's offer to license disputed technology "untenable."

The legal battle is heating up ahead of a hearing that could be the final step before U.S. District Judge James Spencer decides whether to impose an injunction granting NTP's request -- potentially shutting off more than 3 million U.S. BlackBerry subscribers.

The U.S. Justice Department has argued against a shut-down, saying NTP has not submitted enough evidence to show government users could be exempted "without substantial hardship."

NTP sued RIM for patent infringement in 2002 and won an injunction in 2003 to shut down the U.S. service. That injunction was stayed pending appeals, and the court has issued several rulings since.

RIM shares have been up and down like a yo-yo as a result, adding or subtracting hundreds of millions in market value.

The stock added 97 cents, or 1.4 percent, to end at $69.62 on Nasdaq and were up C$1.07, or 1.4 percent, at C$79.72 on the Toronto Stock Exchange on Thursday.

"It's a very high-stakes poker match," Canaccord Adams analyst Peter Misek said. "I think what's going on here is that NTP was daring RIM to unveil the workaround to let them know whether or not they actually had one."

RIM said it has developed and tested workaround software for all BlackBerry handsets in the United States and will activate the changes if there is an injunction.

It said the workaround alters the way e-mail messages are delivered and queued, but "users will not see any changes in the way they use the BlackBerry device".

"RIM's workaround provides a contingency for our customers and partners and a counterbalance to NTP's threats," said RIM Co-Chief Executive Jim Balsillie. "This will hopefully lead to more reasonable negotiations, since NTP risks losing all future royalties if the workaround is implemented."

NTP co-founder Don Stout said the onus is on RIM to reveal its workaround more fully and then convince the court it does not infringe on any NTP patents.

"To tell the world they have a workaround without sharing what it is, to me suggests they're not comfortable with it," Stout said. "If they've got a workaround, go do it. I mean, quit screwing around with tantalizing the world."

He added: "They're just using the bully pulpit again."

RIM said a patent law and workaround expert believes its designs do not infringe on any of the NTP patent claims remaining in the lawsuit.

"The legal merits of the workaround will be challenged by NTP," American Technology Research analyst Rob Sanderson said in a note. "This could mean the legal battle continues for an extended period, perhaps years."

DOJ_NMG_0013883

RIM said it has filed patent applications for its workaround and will soon begin shipping handsets with the software update in a dormant mode. It will make the free update available at www.blackberry.com/workaround at a later date for customers to download and install.

In a court filing last month, RIM said it stands to lose customers even after rolling out a workaround.

"It is reasonably certain that some of RIM's existing customers will opt for other providers ... rather than go through the trouble of installing the new software," it said.

(Additional reporting by Robert MacMillan in New York)

BlackBerry Maker RIM Develops Software 'Workaround' In Event Of Injunction (LAW/AP)

The Associated Press

AP, February 10, 2006

Research in Motion Ltd., the Canadian maker of the BlackBerry wireless e-mail device, said Thursday it has developed software "workaround" designs for its popular handsets in case a court bars the use of current software in a pending patent dispute.

Although there is currently no injunction in place in the patent litigation with NTP Inc., RIM said it developed the workaround software as a contingency to allow BlackBerry service to continue should the court declare an injunction.

RIM stressed it still believes it has "strong legal and factual arguments opposing an injunction." Jim Balsillie, RIM's chairman and co-chief executive, called the workaround software "a counterbalance" to the NTP lawsuit.

NTP has convinced a federal jury that its patents were infringed by RIM and is asking a federal judge in Richmond, Va., to turn off the network. The judge has indicated he could decide on NTP's request following a hearing scheduled for Feb. 24.

The lawsuit against RIM has drawn objections from the U.S. government and big corporate users who rely on BlackBerry e-mail service.

NTP has said such an injunction would not apply to government BlackBerry users, who may account for up to 200,000 of the company's 4.3 million customers, though RIM has questioned whether it would be possible to separate its service in such a way.

Despite the threat of a BlackBerry blackout, many analysts think an actual shutdown still is unlikely because putting RIM out of business would make it harder for NTP to collect a big settlement.

Union: Mittal Pledges To Honor Agreements (AP)

AP, February 10, 2006

German Industrial Union Says Mittal Steel Pledges to Honor Labor Agreements Made by Arcelor

FRANKFURT, Germany (AP) -- Germany's biggest industrial union said it received assurances Thursday from Mittal Steel Co. that if it acquires rival Arcelor SA, no labor agreements would be affected.

Meanwhile, U.S. antitrust regulators are looking at Mittal's hostile bid for Arcelor, Justice Department spokeswoman Gina Talamona confirmed Thursday.

Mittal Steel Europe Chief Executive Roeland Baan met with union deputy chairman Berthold Huber for several hours to address Mittal's euro18.6 billion (US$22.5 billion) bid for Luxembourg's Arcelor, IG Metall spokeswoman Ingrid Gier said.

Mittal employs approximately 1,600 workers in Germany, while Arcelor employs 14,000.

Gier said the German union considered the talks and Mittal's pledge a "first important step."

It was not the first trip Mittal executives have made to lobby for the unsolicited takeover.

The company's chairman and chief executive, Lakshmi Mittal, has visited Luxembourg, France, Spain and Belgium to explain his bid for Arcelor, which would merge the world's No. 1 and No. 2 steel makers.

The takeover, which would be the biggest steel deal ever, would have repercussions across Europe, but also in North America and Asia, where both companies have plants.

European critics of the deal -- especially in France -- are worried that it would mean job losses or less protection for Arcelor's 94,000 employees.

Mittal has insisted that no jobs would be cut and that Arcelor's existing labor agreements would be respected.

DOJ_NMG_0013884

Realtors Ask Administration To Stop Bankers From Delving Into Real Estate (HILL)

By Elana Schor

The Hill, February 10, 2006

Congress and the Bush administration are again getting caught in the crossfire of a long-standing turf war between the National Association of Realtors, which bills itself as the nation's biggest trade association, and the banking industry over whether banks can engage in real-estate activities.

Federal regulators signed off late last year on several bids for real-estate development from large banking chains, alarming the Realtors and reinvigorating the group's push for a bill, co-sponsored by Reps. Ken Calvert (R-Calif.) and Paul Kanjorski (D-Pa.), prohibiting banks from "directly or indirectly" engaging in real-estate activities. Banking lobbyists dismiss the Realtors' claims that the regulators are gradually dismantling existing law.

"This issue is totally phony. Banks for a long time have been able to own their own real estate," said Ed Yingling, president of the American Bankers Association. "The Realtors would like to think it's something new, but it's not."

The Calvert-Kanjorski bill is hardly new to Capitol Hill, having snagged the support of a majority of the House in each of the past three Congresses. But banking lobbyists pushed back last year with a bill of their own that only needed two co-sponsors — House Financial Services Committee Chairman Mike Oxley (R-Ohio) and his ranking Democrat, Barney Frank (Mass.) — to make a splash.

With their bill stalled in both House and Senate committees, the Realtors now are aiming at the Bush administration in their vigorous lobbying efforts against banks involved in real estate. The group has promoted letters this month to new Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke, Treasury Secretary John Snow and leaders at the Office of the Comptroller of the Currency (OCC), which has jurisdiction over national banks, asking for a definitive exclusion of banks from the real-estate market.

In a unique twist, the Realtors also have chosen to side publicly with bankers in the fight to prevent retail behemoth Wal-Mart from opening an industrial loan corporation to conduct banking activities. Just as the Realtors fear banks encroaching on their business, bankers want Congress to keep commercial corporations off their turf.

"We find it ironic that the banks are using our argument, that banks and commerce should not be mixed, to make arguments that Wal-Mart shouldn't have a bank," said Jerry Giovanello, the Realtors' senior vice president of government affairs.

Rep. Jim Leach (R-Iowa) introduced a bill in September that would block Wal-Mart's banking bid, and Leach picked up the endorsement of Alan Greenspan before he departed the Federal Reserve Board chairmanship last week. A Leach spokesman said the lawmaker has had no negotiations on the bill, whether with Oxley or others, so far this year.

The Realtors have similarly leveraged their congressional clout to block regulators from expanding banks' involvement in real estate. Sympathetic members have quietly inserted a rider into the past three Treasury Department appropriations bills preventing banks from fully entering the real-estate market.

Banking lobbyists are hardly won over by the Realtors' support of their work to clarify the industrial loan corporations.

"Congress has spoken that real-estate activities [that are] financial services are allowed and ought to be regulated," said Steve Bartlett, president of the Financial Services Roundtable. "The Realtors are just wrong."

Oxley has expressed an affinity for the bankers' view — that Congress definitively allowed regulators to draw the line between banking and real estate in 1999's Gramm-Leach-Bliley Act.

Oxley issued a statement after the recent OCC rulings, affirming the regulator's ability to allow banks limited powers in real-estate development.

"The actions that the OCC has taken in its authorization letters are reasonable, well within the law, and within precedent," Oxley said. "The letters do not constitute an expansion of national banks' authority to make the type of equity investments that breach the separation of banking and commerce."

But Giovanello stayed on offense, questioning Oxley and Frank's decision to request two Government Accountability Office (GAO) studies on transparency and competition in real estate while not asking for a similar inquiry into banking.

"We don't know why the House Financial Services Committee keeps asking the GAO to investigate real-estate competition when, over the past four or five years, banks have been consolidating. When are they going to ask for a similar study on banks?" Giovanello said.

DOJ_NMG_0013885

In September, the week after the GAO reported to Oxley and Frank on their most recent real-estate-related inquiry, the Justice Department sued the Realtors, arguing that the group's online listings unfairly obstruct competitors' business.

Oxley's and Frank's offices did not return calls for further comment by press time.

Realtors can count Oxley's Senate counterpart, Banking Committee Chairman Richard Shelby (R-Ala.), as an ally; he is among seven co-sponsors of his chamber's counterpart to the Calvert-Kanjorski bill.

Federal Judge Dismisses Lawsuit Against Team, NFL (AP)

By Terry Kinney

AP, February 10, 2006

CINCINNATI - A judge dismissed Hamilton County's federal antitrust lawsuit against the Cincinnati Bengals and the National Football League on Thursday because the suit was not filed within the four-year statute of limitations.

U.S. District Judge S. Arthur Spiegel threw out the suit without getting to the merits of the county's argument that the Bengals misled taxpayers and officials by contending that they needed a new stadium to be profitable and might move if they didn't get one.

Hamilton County taxpayers approved a one-half-cent sales tax increase in 1996 to finance the $450 million Paul Brown Stadium. Commissioners signed a lease with the Bengals the following year.

The antitrust lawsuit was not filed until 2003, three years after the Bengals began using the stadium.

"To be sure, the lease that Hamilton County enjoys with the Bengals is highly favorable - perhaps egregiously so - to the Bengals," Spiegel wrote.

He said prior members of the board were aware of allegations that league and its teams wielded unlawful antitrust power to obtain favorable leases, but by not filing suit sooner the chance "was lost to the passage of time."

"We are pleased that Judge Spiegel took the time to thoroughly analyze the case and conclude that the facts were on our side," Bengals owner Mike Brown said in a statement released by the team.

Likewise, "We appreciate Judge Spiegel's careful consideration of the issues and believe that his opinion conclusively demonstrates that there was no basis for the county's claims," NFL spokesman Greg Aiello said.

Commissioner Pat DeWine urged the other two board members to let the matter drop. He said the county faces more important local issues, such as developing county property on Cincinnati's riverfront and building a new county jail.

Commissioner Todd Portune said he favored discussing all options with attorneys, including an appeal, filing a lawsuit in state court or seeking to reopen negotiations with the Bengals.

It was Portune who originally sued against the Bengals as an individual taxpayer. When conflict-of-interest questions arose regarding his position as a commissioner, community activist Carrie Davis took his place as lead plaintiff.

Eventually, county commissioners took over the suit.

Portune said Thursday that the Bengals were largely to blame for the county facing a deficit of $191 million.

"There is no doubt that Hamilton County is in an upside-down financial position because of a lease agreement that is unconscionable, has terms that are onerous, has terms that have resulted in the county being in this upside down and burdensome financial position," Portune said.

In February 2004, Spiegel rejected the NFL's motion to dismiss the case, ruling that Davis could pursue her claims that the NFL violated federal antitrust provisions by using its monopoly to "extort" new stadiums and highly favorable lease terms.

In his ruling Thursday, Spiegel explained why he did not rule at that time that the statute of limitations had expired.

He said a new standard was applied when the county commission took over the suit, based not on what an outsider like Davis could know about negotiations but what commissioners knew or should have known.

Spiegel noted that county officials knew all along that the Bengals were profitable, although the lawsuit alleged that the statute of limitations started not in 1997 but in May 2001 when commissioners got a clearer image of profits based on information in a lawsuit between the league and Oakland Raiders owner Al Davis.

South Korean Trade Regulator Questions Intel Employees (AP)

AP, February 10, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0013886

(02-09) 20:12 PST SEOUL, South Korea (AP) --

Investigators from South Korea's antitrust watchdog questioned some employees at Intel Corp.'s local subsidiary this week as part of an inquiry that began last year, a company spokesman said Friday.

The Korean Fair Trade Commission "made an unscheduled visit to our offices on Tuesday during normal business hours," said Chuck Mulloy, legal affairs spokesman for Intel in Santa Clara, California.

"This is part of an ongoing inquiry that we disclosed in June of 2005," Mulloy said, adding it was "not appropriate for us to talk about specifics." Mulloy said the visit to Intel Korea marked the first time regulators had arrived unannounced.

The Fair Trade Commission refused to comment.

Yonhap news agency quoted an unidentified FTC official as saying that the probe was focused on whether Intel a bused its dominant position by pressuring computer makers to avoid using chips made by Intel rivals.

Intel, the world's largest chip maker, is facing numerous legal battles over how it maintains its leading position. Intel has repeatedly denied it has broken any laws.

Japan's Fair Trade Commission said last year that Intel violated fair trade laws — a ruling the company accepted without admitting wrongdoing.

S.Korea Says No Conclusion Yet On Intel Probe (REU)

By Rhee So-eui

Reuters, February 10, 2006

SEOUL, Feb 10 (Reuters) - South Korea's antitrust watchdog said on Friday it had not yet reached a conclusion on whether Intel Corp. broke regulations in marketing its computer chips after raiding the firm's Seoul office this week.

The Fair Trade Commission is also investigating Samsung Electronics Co. Ltd. and LG Electronics Inc. , which make PCs using Intel's microprocessors.

South Korea, which fined Microsoft Corp. for antitrust violations in December, began investigating Intel in the middle of last year, following similar probes launched by Japan and the European Union.

Intel, the world's largest chipmaker, confirmed on Thursday that FTC officials paid an unscheduled visit to the Seoul office.

The officials talked to Intel staff and took away some documents as part of an ongoing probe, a spokeswoman for Intel Korea said.

"It will take a while for us to reach a conclusion," FTC spokesman Kim Joo-hyok said by telephone.

If a company is found to have violated antitrust laws, the FTC can order it to correct business practices and can also impose fines.

Sometimes companies are asked to make public notices acknowledging anti-competitive practices.

The watchdog had received a complaint that Intel was using its dominant position in South Korea to increase microprocessor sales, Kim said. He declined to say who filed the complaint.

Samsung and LG said FTC officials visited them earlier this week for preliminary investigation, but declined to comment further.

Intel is estimated to have more than 80 percent of the South Korean market for microprocessors, the central chips in personal computers. The country accounts for 6 to 7 percent of the global PC market, analysts said.

LEADING POSTION IN KOREA

Analysts said the FTC investigation was unlikely to trigger major changes to Intel's leading position in South Korea.

"There may be fines or orders on business practices, but it won't have an impact on Intel's business in the market," said Michael Min, an analyst at Korea Investment & Securities.

Min said smaller U.S. rival Advanced Micro Devices Inc. could still increase its market share in South Korea given its aggressive marketing recently.

AMD sued Intel in the United States in June, charging it with anti-competitive practices such as offering discounts to computer makers who agreed to curtail use of AMD chips.

DOJ_NMG_0013887

"AMD continues to believe -- as specified in its private U.S. antitrust complaint filed on June 27, 2005 in U.S. federal court in Delaware -- that PC manufacturers worldwide are victims of Intel's monopoly power," AMD said in a statement.

The European Union has been investigating Intel's business practices since 2001, while Japan ordered Intel to eliminate discounts to PC makers in March, 2005.

In the Microsoft case, the U.S. software firm was fined $32 million in South Korea and ordered to separate its instant messaging service from its Windows software.

Shares in Samsung Electronics fell 1.45 percent to 681,000 won by 0440 GMT, versus the wider market's 0.22 percent fall, while LG Electronics feel 0.75 percent to 79,700 won.

Intel Says Employees Questioned By South Korean Regulators (BLOOM)

By Ian King

Bloomberg, February 10, 2006

Feb. 9 (Bloomberg) -- Intel Corp., the world's biggest computer chipmaker, said South Korean regulators questioned some of the company's employees as part of an investigation of its marketing and rebate programs.

Officers from the Korea Fair Trade Commission are following up on an investigation begun in June when the agency requested documents related to local marketing practices, Chuck Mulloy, a spokesman for Santa Clara, California-based Intel, said today.

``They paid a visit earlier this week and asked some questions consistent with previous inquiries," Mulloy said in an interview. ``We cooperated with them then and will continue to cooperate."

Intel is facing a U.S. antitrust lawsuit based on a complaint filed last June by rival Advanced Micro Devices Inc. European regulators investigating antitrust claims have also raided Intel offices, and Japan's Fair Trade Commission last year told the company to remove a clause from its contracts forcing PC makers to exclusively use its chips.

Shares of Intel rose 54 cents to $21.20 at 12:24 p.m. New York time in Nasdaq Stock Market composite trading. The shares had dropped 12 percent in the past 12 months before today.

Advanced Micro, based in Sunnyvale, California, is the world's second-largest maker of personal-computer chips.

South Korea's Antitrust Officials Continue Intel Probe (MERCN)

By Elise Ackerman

The San Jose Mercury News, February 10, 2006

An Intel spokesman confirmed that the South Korean trade officials paid an unscheduled visit to the company's Seoul office on Tuesday morning as part of an ongoing investigation into the tech giant's business practices.

Chuck Mulloy said Korean Fair Trade Commission investigators asked to meet with company officials and requested information. ``They have been asking for information and we have been providing information for many, many months," Mulloy said.

Intel first disclosed the Korean inquiry in a regulatory filing in August, stating that Korean antitrust regulators began looking into its marketing and rebate programs in June.

Also in June, rival chip maker Advanced Micro Devices sued in federal court alleging that Intel provided secret and discriminatory discounts.

Today, AMD said in a statement that the ``dawn raids are part of an investigation into Intel's business dealings with four Korean PC makers."

The statement quoted Thomas M. McCoy, AMD executive vice president: ``The dawn raids in Korea make it abundantly clear that competition authorities worldwide are intensifying their investigative efforts into Intel's anti-competitive business practices because they have good reason to believe evidence of illegal monopoly abuse is there to be found."

Mulloy said the visit was conducted during normal business hours and that investigators ``did not come in with guns drawn."

``It is not unusual for a company as successful as Intel to come under scrutiny," Mulloy said. ``It is also not unusual for us to cooperate."

ENVIRONMENT:

Six People Accused Of Illegally Harvesting Leopard Sharks In California (FINDLAW/AP)

By Dan Goodin, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 10, 2006

(AP) - SAN FRANCISCO-A church pastor, four men in the aquarium industry and a commercial fisherman have been accused of illegally catching and selling hundreds of juvenile leopard sharks.

An indictment Wednesday charged the men with selling 465 leopard sharks that were too small to harvest to pet distributors throughout the United States, and in The Netherlands and the United Kingdom.

California leopard sharks, which can take 13 years to reach maturity and live as long as 30 years, are protected under a state law that prohibits the commercial catching of specimens under 36 inches (90 centimeters) long.

The leopard shark's gray body and black bars make it a "particularly attractive" species, said Christina Slager, a curator at the Monterey Bay Aquarium.

"In general sharks are struggling in the wild, and leopard sharks are no different," Slager said. "If these animals aren't allowed to reach an age or size where they can reproduce before they are removed from the environment, that has drastic implications for future generations."

The six defendants were arrested on Tuesday, when the indictment was unsealed. Two pleaded not guilty. The Associated Press was unable to reach the other four. They face maximum penalties of five years in prison, a $250,000 (â,¬210,000) fine and possible requirement to pay restitution for each count, according to the U.S. Attorney's office.

Seven of the 19 baby leopard sharks confiscated during the two-year investigation died, the U.S. Attorney's office said. Three are on exhibit at the Monterey Bay Aquarium, and nine were returned to the wild in 2004.

Bush Administration Moves To Sell National Forest Land (KRT)

By Seth Borenstein

Knight Ridder, February 10, 2006

WASHINGTON - The Bush administration will unveil a proposal Friday to sell up to 200,000 acres of national forest land in "isolated parcels" ranging from a quarter of an acre to 200 acres, much of it in California.

The sale is part of a National Forest Service plan to raise $800 million over the next five years to pay for rural schools in 41 states, offsetting shrinking revenues from sale of timber from national forests. The Bureau of Land Management also plans to sell federal lands to raise an estimated $182 million over five years.

Environmentalists charge that the short-term gain would be more than offset by the loss of public land. Congress would have to approve the land sales, but it has rejected similar recent proposals.

"I am outraged, and I don't think the public is going to stand for it for one minute," said Wilderness Society policy analyst Mike Anderson. "It's a scheme to raise money at the expense of the national forests, the wildlife, recreation and all the other values that Americans hold dear. It's the ultimate threat to the national forest."

Jerry Taylor of the Cato Institute, a libertarian think tank, said the proposed land sales make sense.

"Private property will end up in the possession of those who value it the most," Taylor said. "That is an iron law of economics."

Details about what plots of land would be put up for sale are expected to be revealed at a noon press conference by Undersecretary of Agriculture Mark Rey, a former timber industry lobbyist. The Forest Service owns 193 million acres of land and plans to sell about 175,000 to 200,000 acres, according to Forest Service spokeswoman Heidi Valetkevitch.

"They could be theoretically from every national forest," Valetkevitch said. "California has a lot on the list, I understand."

The lands in question aren't environmentally sensitive wilderness or protected scenic areas, Valetkevitch said. "It could be something that's in a neighborhood that people don't even know is forest land," she said.

Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., attacked the plan as "crazy," saying: "Here the administration wants to pass more tax cuts for the rich, and to pay the bill, they want to sell off public land - our nation's natural heritage."

DOJ_NMG_0013889

The Forest Service owns 20 percent of California, including much of the Sierra Nevada, Lake Tahoe, Big Sur and dense forests along the Oregon border. The Bureau of Land Management owns 15 percent of the Golden State.

Rural schools get 25 percent of federal forest timber sale proceeds, but those revenues have fallen, so the idea is to sell forest land to make up for that, Valetkevitch said.

Anderson of the Wilderness Society argued that money for rural schools could come from many sources and that the land sales are being proposed "so the budget deficit doesn't get worse." He noted that if forests are sold, future federal timber sales likely would yield even less money for rural schools.

The president's new fiscal 2007 federal budget calls for the bureau to raise $1 million in 2007 land sales, $28 million in 2008, $40 million in 2009, $42 million in 2010 and $71 million in 2011.

Dave Alberswerth, a Wilderness Society senior policy adviser, said that would be "way more than they have been selling in recent years." From 2000 to 2004, the bureau sold 13,160 acres for an average price of $320 an acre, he said. At that rate, the government would have to sell more than half a million acres to garner $182 million.

Oil Giants Fell Behind On Fees (NYT)

By Edmund L. Andrews And Simon Romero

The New York Times, February 10, 2006

WASHINGTON, Feb. 9 — More than three dozen energy companies fell nearly $500 million behind last year on royalty payments the federal government says they owed for oil and gas extracted from public territory, according to Interior Department documents released Thursday.

While most of that money was later turned over after the government demanded payment, almost $60 million remains in dispute.

The companies, which included major producers like Chevron, Shell and ConocoPhillips, had claimed lucrative government incentives for drilling in the Gulf of Mexico even though the incentives were not supposed to be available if market prices climbed above certain "threshold prices."

The Interior Department, in a report sent to lawmakers looking into the energy royalty program, identified 41 companies that incorrectly claimed about $493 million in "royalty relief" during 2004, when prices for both oil and gas climbed to records.

The Interior Department said that 38 of the 41 companies quickly paid $435 million in back royalties after it sent out warning letters in December, months after the money should have been paid.

But three companies — Kerr-McGee, Forest Oil and AGIP — continue to protest $58 million in additional payments.

Indeed, Kerr-McGee officials suggested on Thursday that they planned to challenge the government's legal authority to impose price thresholds in the first place.

"We pride ourselves on operating legally," said John Christiansen, a spokesman for Kerr-McGee, which is based in Oklahoma City. "Now the Interior Department is claiming it has the power to cancel royalty relief granted by Congress."

Mr. Christiansen said Kerr-McGee would fight the case if the government did not back down. "We'll take this issue to the federal court system if necessary," he said.

Royalty payments for oil and gas extracted from federal territory have drawn increased attention from Congress since The New York Times reported last month that payments had not climbed in line with the huge increase in market prices.

Last year, the government received about $5.15 billion in royalties on natural gas and about $3.5 billion in royalties on oil. While royalties have climbed sharply since 2003, they are still barely even with amounts collected in 2001, when market prices were much lower.

One apparent reason for the shortfall is that the government has had trouble auditing the flow of money.

Under the government's royalty relief program, companies that drill in deep waters off the Gulf of Mexico do not have to pay the standard royalty of 12 percent on large quantities of the oil or gas they produce.

But federal regulations also call for that special incentive to be suspended if market prices rise above certain threshold levels. Market prices for both oil and natural gas have been higher than those levels since the end of 2002.

DOJ_NMG_0013890

Administration officials said Thursday that they sent out letters to 41 companies in December, almost a full year after the end of 2004, reminding the companies that they had not been entitled to the incentives and needed to pay up.

The list included many of the biggest producers in the Gulf of Mexico: Anadarko, Amerada Hess, British Petroleum, Chevron, ConocoPhillips, Kerr-McGee, Shell and more than two dozen others.

But several major producers, like Exxon Mobil, the sixth-largest producer of natural gas in the Gulf of Mexico, were not on the list. Exxon officials said that their company stopped claiming royalty relief long ago, because market prices had exceeded the price thresholds.

Lawyers for some of the companies said that they should never have been included on the list released by the Interior Department, because the companies had actually paid the proper royalties or had not disputed the demand for additional royalties.

"We think it was inappropriate for Chevron and Unocal to have been included on the list," said Donald Campbell, a spokesman for Chevron, which acquired Unocal last year.

"Chevron's policy is to pay royalties when deepwater lease price thresholds are exceeded," Mr. Campbell said. "Based on our review to date, Chevron has consistently followed that policy and has paid royalties for the calendar years when lease price thresholds have been exceeded."

Mining Fines Among Smallest Laws Limit Size, Allow Reduction (USAT)

By Thomas Frank

USA Today, February 10, 2006

Coal companies pay some of the smallest fines of any industry for federal violations even as the nation tries to curb one of the deadliest periods in recent coal-mining history, a USA TODAY analysis found.

The federal government levied a larger fine — $550,000 — for the 2004 Super Bowl showing of Janet Jackson's breast than it did for the 2001 deaths of 13 Alabama miners in one of the deadliest mine disasters in a quarter-century. And the $435,000 fine against mine operator Jim Walter Resources was cut by a judge to $3,000.

USA TODAY's review of safety laws and corporate records found:

•Federal law limits fines to $60,000 for each violation of a mine health and safety standard. The Environmental Protection Agency, the Federal Communications Commission and the Securities and Exchange Commission can levy fines of $1 million or more for a single violation.

•Labor Department rules require mining fines to be cut by 30% if violations are quickly abated.

“That doesn't make any sense,” says Steve Webber, who oversaw mining penalties for the federal government from 1999 to 2003, when he retired. “You're rewarding (mine) operators for correcting conditions that should not have existed in the first place.”

The Bush administration has said that higher fines are not as effective as forcing companies to close unsafe areas until they are fixed.

Tim Biddle, an attorney for coal companies, said higher penalties won't improve safety. “I really don't think any responsible mine operator makes any decision about safety based on civil penalties,” he said.

•Mining fines are set by a complicated formula that often results in small penalties for negligence. A mine operator could be fined just a few hundred dollars for “high negligence” of worker safety.

The Occupational Safety and Health Administration, which inspects most workplaces, sets a $5,000 minimum fine on firms that knowingly endanger workers.

Mining fines have taken on added importance as federal and state officials investigate fatal accidents that have killed 19 miners this year. The Sago Mine disaster Jan. 2 in West Virginia accounted for 12 deaths.

West Virginia's federal lawmakers recently proposed setting a $10,000 minimum fine for mine-safety violations for “negligence or reckless disregard.”

Mining fines are particularly small compared with recent record profits in the coal industry. The 10 largest publicly held coal companies reported combined profits of $2.4 billion last year on $24 billion in sales.

DOJ_NMG_0013891

"The price of coal has increased dramatically and the price of penalties has not," Davitt McAteer, mine-safety chief in the Clinton administration, told a Senate panel recently. Increasing fines "needs to be done and it needs to be done immediately."

Panel Backs U.S. Plan To Transport Nuclear Waste (WSJ)

By John J. Fialka

The Wall Street Journal, February 10, 2006

WASHINGTON -- A panel of scientists, engineers and other experts endorsed the Energy Department's plans to ship tens of thousands of tons of nuclear waste for disposal in Nevada, saying they pose "no fundamental technical barriers" and relatively low and manageable risks.

A review by the panel, organized by the National Research Council, an arm of the National Academy of Sciences, was the first major outside study of the government's plans for waste removal, which will take two decades and involve transportation routes through or near many population centers.

The panel's report gives a boost to administration proposals to spur nuclear power by moving spent nuclear-power-plant fuel from 70 sites in 31 states and to minimize waste-storage needs by reprocessing some elements from spent fuel. The Yucca Mountain disposal site, located 90 miles from Las Vegas, would also receive high-level nuclear-weapons waste from four government sites.

The panel called for the federal government to give states and communities advance knowledge of the travel routes of the waste, which would be shipped primarily by rail. It also called for federal aid to help them train teams of firefighters and others to deal with accidents involving trains or trucks carrying waste.

While the experts found the risks of radiation and other health-related damage from accidents were "generally low," they also found that public acceptance of the shipments will be complicated by a "fear factor" that might be reduced if people understood, in general, how the waste would be moved and the nature of the risks involved.

Activists from antinuclear groups and the state of Nevada, which is opposed to burying the waste there, have claimed that the waste shipments could result in massive nuclear accidents -- claims the panel rejected. But it warned that governments had to be prepared to manage "increased anxiety" that could lower property values and reduce tourism along some routes.

Neal F. Lane, a physicist at Rice University, who was chairman of the panel, said experts on the 16-member panel agreed that the timing or exact routes of particular shipments should remain secret. The Energy Department estimates that there would be 9,600 rail shipments, most of them by dedicated and guarded waste-carrying trains, and 1,100 truck shipments. Overall, some 70,000 tons of radioactive waste may be dumped at Yucca Mountain, should the government complete development of the facility.

The possibility of hazards caused by collisions, derailments or other accidents, or theft by terrorists, the panel concluded, will be minimized by putting the spent fuel and other waste in specially designed steel and concrete canisters, some weighing as much as two tons, that are designed to withstand most fires and the shock of accidents.

When the waste will begin to move is still unknown because the U.S. Nuclear Regulatory Commission must first issue a license to Yucca Mountain, a process that could extend beyond 2010. The opening of the facility will be crucial to the plans of the nuclear-power industry, which is running out of temporary storage space and will need to show regulators that new power plants won't encounter waste-storage problems.

Frankensense (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 10, 2006

Frankenstein is finally dead, or at least his political imitators are. That good news comes from the World Trade Organization, which struck a blow for science over scare-mongers by ruling this week against Europe's attempt to ban genetically modified food.

The written decision in the case brought by Argentina, Canada and the U.S. against the European Union won't be released for months, but the press leaks give a good picture of the ruling. All one needs to know is that Friends of the Earth and Greenpeace are howling that an "undemocratic" body is trying to "force-feed markets with GMOs." Expanding consumer choice and free trade equals force-feeding? Sounds like the good guys won.

DOJ_NMG_0013892

The EU can accurately say its review process for new GMOs, which is stricter and slower than that used in the U.S., wasn't struck down. However, the panel said a clear review process has to be in place, and one not based on junk science. That means no more moratoriums on approving new GMOs such as that imposed by Brussels from 1998 to 2003.

The absence of proper and timely regulatory approvals led to the complaint in the first place. So did the fact that at least six EU member states have ignored regulator decisions to approve some new genetically modified products. The WTO also rejected this practice. American and Canadian producers currently lose an estimated $500 million of business a year thanks to European barriers on GM foods.

The emphasis on using good science is especially welcome. GMOs are typically vilified with disinformation campaigns, nowhere more so than on the Continent. Agriterrorists such as France's José Bové destroy fields of GM crops ("Frankenfood" to the looters) to the cheers of radicals and much of the media. The propaganda has had its intended effect. Opinion polls show a majority of Europeans look askance at biotech products.

In reality, farmers have been genetically modifying crops for millennia through hybridization. Early cultivators favored the seeds of plants that were sturdiest and produced the largest yields. Gene splicing is no different, except that it is quicker and more versatile and offers permanent, reproducible crop varieties. Humans have consumed "new" GM foods for a decade now with no discernible ill effects.

Of course, this dispute was never really about science and health. Politicians trip over themselves to oppose goods "unsafe" in the public imagination. But they also know that Europe's farmers will find it harder to compete in a world market full of cheaper, healthier GM products.

More sinister is the effect European GMO policies have on the world's poorest farmers. African countries receive preferential access to European farm markets and have been reluctant to introduce GM crops at home. The concern is cross-pollination because the EU has zero tolerance for GM traces in non-GM imports. As a result, gene-altered seed stocks that better resist disease and severe climate conditions -- which would provide more food and export income for the people who need them most -- remain out of reach in many developing countries.

Certain European leaders have already vowed to defy this week's ruling to "protect" their people. The Continent has no monopoly on protectionists. But the WTO has just exposed the sham science and populist politics behind the EU's biotech regime and made it harder to stop better farm products from making it to market. The world's poor will be the biggest beneficiaries.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Handprint Could Be Key To Church Fire Probe (CNN)

By Rusty Dornin

CNN.com, February 10, 2006

ALICEVILLE, Alabama (CNN) -- Investigators looking into the fires at nine Baptist churches in Alabama over the past week are hoping a handprint left on one church's front door may help catch a perpetrator.

The Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives would not indicate whether its agents were able to lift a readable fingerprint from the inside part of the front door at Dancy First Baptist Church, south of Aliceville in Pickens County.

Arsonists entered the church by kicking in a back door, then set a fire near the pulpit before trying to escape through the front door, authorities said. (Watch how the church blazes have become an ATF priority -- 2:04)

However, the front door had a dead-bolt lock, and the arsonists had to exit through the back door, where police said they found a footprint that might have come from someone kicking the door.

The fire consumed the pulpit, communion table and part of the ceiling. Churchgoers were allowed to take a look at the damaged church Thursday, and the Rev. Walter Hawkins said they hope to have it rebuilt by May.

"They are material things that can be replaced," Hawkins said. "The church is in our heart. That's what we live on." Hawkins added that he hopes the arsonists "have a repentance of heart."

"Forgive them, they know not what they do," a sign in front of the church reads.

DOJ_NMG_0013893

Authorities have been investigating the fires to determine if they're connected and, if so, who is behind them.

Nine churches -- five with predominantly African-American congregations and four with predominantly white ones -- have been set ablaze in the past week in central and western Alabama. Nobody has been injured. (Map)

James Posey, a preacher at the fire-damaged Morning Star Baptist Church, speculated that the perpetrators could have been hatemongers, devil worshippers or thrill seekers.

"I would like to ask them: What did you get from this? Why did you do it?" Posey said.

N.G. Berrill, a forensic psychologist, said arsonists "love the power" and "the theater associated with fire."

Investigators are going "to look for any communications that might be left specifically, consciously or inadvertently at the scenes of the crime," Berrill said.

More than 100 ATF personnel, including special agents and forensic experts, are investigating the fires. A criminal and geographical profiler also has been called in. (Full story)

The ATF has said witnesses have reported seeing a dark-colored SUV near some of the fires. But it is not clear if the vehicle is linked to the blazes.

Fears And Precautions Spread After Alabama Church Fires (NYT)

By Rick Lyman

The New York Times, February 10, 2006

ASHBY, Ala., Feb. 9 — Larry Crocker leaned on his cane in the hard clay beside the ruins of Ashby Baptist Church, listening for the distant rumble of the truck that was to bring the mobile sanctuary that would be the church's temporary new home.

"I just hope that I don't know whoever's doing this," Mr. Crocker, a member of a nearby congregation, said of the rash of church fires in the area . "I'd hate to think I'd know a person who could do something like this."

But as investigators sift the rubble after nine church fires across rural Alabama in the last week, all suspected arsons, the evidence they are finding and the pattern of the attacks suggest that those behind the arsons were either locals or, at the very least, frequent-enough visitors to cherry-pick the most vulnerable and remote churches and drive the region's coal-dark roads at night with brazen efficiency.

"Everybody's fairly nervous out there now," said Jim Parker, pastor of the Ashby church. "People are taking some sort of precaution at almost every church."

Five churches, including Ashby Baptist, were set on fire just before dawn last Friday in rural Bibb County, about an hour south of Birmingham. They were all Baptist churches, four with predominantly white congregations and one with a black congregation.

Then, early Tuesday, four more churches — all Baptist and, this time, all black congregations — were hit on a long stretch of country highways in more rural counties along Alabama's western edge.

Although investigators say they have reached no firm conclusions about who might be behind the arsons, they point to strong similarities between the two strings of attacks. In both cases, the churches tended to be the most secluded; indeed, in Bibb County, the arsonists passed by several churches beside the highway to seek out those tucked deep into the pine woods.

The doors of many of the churches were kicked down. And witnesses in both areas said they had seen a dark-colored S.U.V., perhaps a Nissan Pathfinder, near some of the blazes.

At Six Mile Baptist Church, which has not been damaged, church members have carved up the night, taking shifts to drive by their sanctuary. The same is happening at several other churches across central Alabama.

"Different ones of us are going out at random times, just to be sure everything is O.K.," said Jimmy Jones, a retired elementary school principal and a member of the Six Mile Baptist congregation, in Bibb County. "We've bought some new lights that we can leave on at the church at night."

David Hand, pastor of Old Union Baptist Church, which was damaged last week, said everyone was keeping an extra watchful eye.

"We're doing what we can," Mr. Hand said. "Our neighbors are watching out for us, and the sheriff has extra patrols. We have some dogs out at the nearby houses. Hopefully, they'll give us some warning if anyone comes back around."

DOJ_NMG_0013894

At Antioch Baptist Church, about 15 miles from Ashby's charred sanctuary, H. L. Morrison sat in the front pew and watched a clean-up team from a company called Restoration Xpress wipe the soot from the sanctuary's white wood ceiling and assess the fire damage on the table before the pulpit.

"This church was full of smoke, but it didn't burn," Mr. Morrison, a member of the congregation, said.

Indeed, Antioch Baptist was lucky. Pleasant Sabine Baptist Church, around the corner on a dirt road, burned to its foundation.

But the effort to gut Antioch Baptist fizzled. A three-foot floral arrangement on the table in front of the pulpit was set ablaze, but the flames died before they could ignite the surrounding wood.

The heat from the fire cracked the glass top on the table into a star-shaped pattern, and there was a burn mark on the carpet in the shape of a teardrop. But neither the pulpit nor the small plastic models of churches just beside the fire were as much as scorched, and a plastic bucket of money for the poor still rested, untouched, on the floor beside the table.

"About eight dollars in there," Mr. Morrison said. "They weren't thieves, whoever they were."

After the attack, the pastor placed a new message on the board outside the church: "The Lord is my helper. I will not fear what man shall do unto me."

Jim Cavanaugh, a special agent with the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, said it was too early for investigators to know why only Baptist churches were singled out. It could simply be that so many of the churches in rural Alabama are Baptist.

One line of speculation is that people who hunt at night are responsible, because they are among the few familiar with navigating Alabama's country lanes in the dead of night.

"In the past, of course, when we had these kind of church burnings in Alabama, they seemed to be racially motivated," said Jerry Wilkins, director of the Bibb County Baptist Association. "At least here, that doesn't seem to be the case, which is something."

City Man Sentenced In Drug Fraud Case (BSUN)

By A Sun Reporter

The Baltimore Sun, February 10, 2006

Hudson, co-defendant convicted in scheme to sell pill prescriptions

A 49-year-old Baltimore man was sentenced to 30 years in prison for distributing Oxycontin and engaging in health-care fraud, the U.S. attorney's office said today.

Oliver Clifton Hudson and his co-defendant, Gregory Wayne Banks, 53, of Severna Park, were convicted in federal court Nov. 7. Both claimed to not be subject to the jurisdiction of the court and were removed from the courtroom after they refused to participate in the trial, according to court documents. Hudson returned to the courtroom today when U.S. District Judge J. Frederick Motz handed down his sentence. Banks is scheduled to be sentenced tomorrow.

"Criminal defendants are entitled to raise any valid legal claims and required to treat the court with respect," U.S. Attorney Rod J. Rosenstein said in a statement. "Instead, Oliver Hudson and his co-defendants made frivolous claims that judges cannot control their 'flesh and blood.' Defendants do not benefit when they disrupt criminal proceedings."

According to evidence presented at their trial, Hudson and Banks fraudulently obtained Oxycontin and other oxycodone drugs from pharmacies in Baltimore City and Baltimore, Anne Arundel, Howard, Montgomery and Harford counties. The drugs were obtained using prescriptions created with computers and photocopiers, officials said.

The defendants sent "runners" to various pharmacies with the prescriptions and made themselves available by telephone -- posing as health clinic officials -- to answer questions from pharmacy employees seeking verification for the prescriptions, officials said.

Furthermore, the defendants fraudulently obtained health insurance cards by paying people to "rent" their insurance for the purchases, officials said. The pharmacies would then unwittingly charge health insurance companies for the cost of the fake prescriptions, leaving only a co-payment for the defendants to pay.

DOJ_NMG_0013895

Once obtained, the oxycodone prescriptions were ultimately resold on the street. Officials said the defendants sold more than 41,000 oxycodone pills using this scheme.

News Briefs From San Diego County (AP)

The Associated Press, February 9, 2006

SAN DIEGO (AP) - City officials have launching an investigation into illegal activity by city employees after two workers from the Park and Recreation Department were arrested on suspicion of drug possession and sales.

The employees, who are brothers, were arrested Jan. 25 as part of a broader Drug Enforcement Administration Investigation, authorities said. They are accused of dealing marijuana out of a Park and Recreation vehicle and had been under surveillance.

Fred Sainz, spokesman for Mayor Jerry Sanders, said the mayor was very disturbed by the arrests and ordered the probe.

"We have started our own investigation to see if other city assets or offices are involved," Sainz said.

Girls Try Drugs, Alcohol At Higher Rates (WP/AP)

By Karen Matthews, Associated Press

The Washington Post, February 10, 2006

NEW YORK -- In a reversal of past trends, teenage girls are trying marijuana, alcohol and cigarettes at higher rates than boys, the White House drug czar said Thursday.

The findings from a new government analysis come even as teen drug use is declining overall.

The National Survey on Drug Use and Health, released by John Walters, the national drug policy director, indicates 1.5 million girls ages 12 to 17 started drinking alcohol in 2004, the most recent year for which data is available. That compares with 1.28 million boys.

Among the same age group, 730,000 girls started smoking cigarettes in 2004, compared with 565,000 boys, and 675,000 girls starting using marijuana, compared with 577,000 boys, the survey found.

The nationwide survey, based on interviews with 70,000 families, also found that girls surpassed boys in abusing prescription drugs. Of the youths surveyed in 2004, 14.4 percent of girls and 12.5 percent of boys reported misusing prescription drugs.

"This is the first time that we've recorded this kind of relationship between boys' and girls' drug use," said Walters. "In the past, boys have had higher rates of use _ and significantly higher rates of use at certain times in the past."

Overall illicit drug use among youths 12 to 17 has declined 19 percent since 2001, according to the survey.

"In order to drive it down further, we have to deal with today's substance abuse reality, and today's reality is, girls have been using at higher rates than boys in critical areas," Walters said.

Experts who joined Walters at a news conference in a Manhattan hotel said girls' use of drugs, alcohol and cigarettes is particularly alarming because girls are more vulnerable to their effects.

"Boys and girls react to drugs differently," said Dr. Warren Seigel, past president of the New York State chapter of the American Academy of Pediatrics.

Seigel said research has shown that girls may become addicted to nicotine faster than boys and even moderate drinking can disrupt their growth and the development of their reproductive systems.

"It's imperative that parents understand that these differences exist, and understand the differences between girls and boys, because it requires some different parenting skills," he said.

Dr. Ralph Lopez, an associate professor at Cornell University's Weill Medical College and the author of "The Teen Health Book: A Parents' Guide to Adolescent Health and Well-Being," said teenage girls are at risk for drug and alcohol use because they feel pressure to succeed academically and also to look perfect.

"They have to be skinny and gorgeous," he said. "We don't do that to the boys."

Lopez said many parents are afraid to confront their children about drugs.

"I'm afraid that our parents have dropped the ball in many cases," he said. "I have a line in my practice that if you are popular with your kids, you're doing something wrong."

DOJ_NMG_0013896

___

On the Net:

http://www.whitehousedrugpolicy.gov/

More Girls Than Boy Trying Drugs For First Time-US (REU)

Reuters, February 9, 2006

WASHINGTON (Reuters) - More girls than boys are becoming first-time users of alcohol, cigarettes and marijuana, reversing previous trends, the U.S. drug czar said in a report released on Thursday.

"Girls have become users at rates that exceed boys or equal boys now, which never used to be the case," John Walters, director of the White House Office of National Drug Control Policy, said in a telephone interview.

The report found 1.5 million U.S. girls 18 or under started using alcohol in 2004, compared with 1.2 million boys. It found that 730,000 girls started smoking cigarettes, compared with 565,000 boys, and 675,000 girls started using marijuana, compared with 577,000 boys.

The report was published on the Internet at http://www.mediacampaign.org/pdf/girls_and_drugs.pdf.

Walters said there were several reasons why girls might turn more to drugs and alcohol than boys.

"They are more likely to be influenced by peer pressure, even when they have been told and accepted that these behaviors are risky for them," Walters said.

"They are twice as likely to be victims of depression. They report that when they use, that they do that to improve their moods."

The report, based on government surveys, found that 1.6 million girls reported having at least one major depressive episode in 2004. "That's more than twice as many as boys," the report reads.

Walters said girls often used drugs and cigarettes to try to stay slim.

He said parents should talk to children before they were at risk of drug use.

"It is not going to be a stranger or some sinister person who offers it," Walters said. "It is going to be your best friend. We have to be sure to prepare them for how they are going to say no to their best friend."

Girls Matching Boys In Substance Abuse (WT)

By Cheryl Wetzstein

The Washington Times, February 10, 2006

Young men and women are abusing tobacco, alcohol and drugs at the same rate, according a report released yesterday that urged parents to get more involved in the lives of their teenage children.

"The gender gap has closed. Girls are smoking, drinking and using drugs equal to boys," said Susan Foster, vice president of the National Center on Addiction and Substance Abuse (CASA) at Columbia University and lead author of a new book on women and substance abuse.

CASA's book, released yesterday during an event on Capitol Hill, documents how women differ from men in their vulnerabilities to substance abuse. It also makes recommendations on how parents, policy-makers, educators and treatment professionals can improve their responses to substance abuse by girls and women.

A separate report released yesterday in New York City by the White House Office of National Drug Control Policy (ONDCP) and Seventeen magazine said teenage girls now match teenage boys in illicit drug and alcohol use, surpass them in cigarette and prescription drug use, and are more likely than boys to start using illicit substances.

"Girls are telling us that they understand the risks associated with drugs, alcohol and cigarettes. But that doesn't appear to be stopping them from using," White House drug czar John P. Walters said yesterday.

Susan Molinari, chairwoman of the Century Council, an educational group funded by the distilled-spirits industry, said that, overall, underage drinking has dropped since 1992 among both girls and boys.

However, almost half of mothers think it's OK for their teen daughters to drink, the council found in a recent survey of nearly 900 mothers and daughters. Moreover, 30 percent of girls ages 16 to 18 said they drank with friends -- but only 9 percent of their mothers said they knew about it.

DOJ_NMG_0013897

"These data illustrate a disturbing misperception among moms about the seriousness of problems associated with alcohol consumption by their teenage daughters," said Mrs. Molinari, whose group offers a program called "Girl Talk" to discourage underage drinking.

Parental disapproval of tobacco, alcohol and drugs is a strong influence on teens, as is parental monitoring of teens and their friends, said the ONDCP, which offers parents and community leaders a wealth of anti-drug materials.

At the Capitol Hill event, Joseph A. Califano Jr., CASA chairman and president, said he hoped the group's new book, "Women Under the Influence," will stimulate new public attitudes about women and substance abuse.

There is no doubt women can become addicted faster -- even with less exposure to substances -- and suffer the consequences more quickly, he said.

"If young women knew that, they might be quicker to say, 'No, I'm not going to have that second beer,' " said Rep. Nancy L. Johnson, Connecticut Republican.

Teen Girls Turn To Drugs, Cigarettes (UPI)

United Press International, February 10, 2006

WASHINGTON, Feb. 10 (UPI) -- The latest U.S. national survey on alcohol and drug use finds that teenage girls are more likely than boys to smoke and abuse prescription drugs.

They had already equaled boys in drinking and illegal drug abuse, The Washington Post reports.

The National Survey on Drug Use and Health has been conducted every year since 1971. The figures on teenage girls are based on the 2004 study, which interviewed 70,000 households.

Experts say that teenage girls are more likely than boys to use drugs and alcohol to escape from family problems and other pressures in their lives. They also may take up smoking to help keep their weight down.

More Girls Than Boys Turning To Drugs (ABC)

ABC News, February 9, 2006

Feb. 9, 2006 — For the past year, first lady Laura Bush has spearheaded an initiative to steer boys away from gangs, crime and drugs. She felt the program was needed because, she said, because we have "shifted our gaze away from boys for the last several decades." A White House report released today on drug use among youths suggests that we need to keep a closer eye on girls as well.

The report reveals that in 2004, the most recent year studied, 1.5 million girls started using alcohol — 173,000 more than the number of boys who started drinking.

During his State of the Union address, President Bush said that drug use among youth was down 19 percent since 2001. But this latest report has raised concerns about whether the message about the dangers of drugs, alcohol and smoking is reaching girls as well as it is boys.

"The reason we're pointing to this alarming trend is because if we're going to get girls to continue to decline in drug use effectively, we're going to have to deal with those causes, which are different," drug czar John Walters said.

As with alcohol use, first time tobacco and marijuana use was also higher among girls than boys. In 2004, 729,000 girls — 164,000 more than boys — started smoking cigarettes, and 675,000 girls — 98,000 more than boys — started using marijuana. Since 2002, more girls than boys have started using marijuana. The study found that for girls, marijuana was used more than cocaine, heroin, Ecstasy, and all other illicit drugs combined.

That's because girls are under a lot of stress because of their changing roles in society, said Dr. Keith Ablow, child psychologist and author. They are abusing drugs and alcohol to self-medicate.

"I think we're deluging young girls with certain expectations," he said. "They're watching dramas on television that ask them to have relationships where girls are deciding between two boys at such an early age. Fashion is designed for adults but in little sizes."

"We're going to have to focus on the particular, unique circumstances we're faced with girls, which is different today than it's ever been before, which has obstacles we've not faced before, but obstacles we can overcome if we do the right thing," Walters said.

DOJ_NMG_0013898

On the home front, Ablow said that parents should behave like detectives and assume there might be a problem, especially if a girl is exhibiting low self-esteem.

"We want to believe our families are perfect," he said. "That's understandable, but better would be to say, let's think what might be wrong. Let's make sure we don't get into denial and become very sensitive to what might be going on in the lives of our daughters."

Ablow, who has a 7-year-old daughter, said to pay attention if a girl's grades began to slip or if she lost interest in activities that she once enjoyed.

"Drug use and abuse is a symptom, almost always — I'd say always — of an underlying, other deeper problem," he said. "In this case, we're looking at depression, attention-deficit problems, potentially eating disorders."

US Girls Match Boys In Alcohol, Drugs, Cigarette Use (AFP)

AFP, February 9, 2006

WASHINGTON (AFP) - American girls are puffing more cigarettes and popping more prescription pills than boys, and using as much alcohol and illicit drugs, the White House drugs control czar said.

The warning was based on an analysis of recent studies which showed girls typically use drugs and alcohol to boost dented self-esteem and self-confidence, as they face the hard choices and questions of early adolescence.

"The trends of substance use among our adolescent girls are alarming," said John Walters, director of the White House office of National Drug Control Policy.

Though overall drug use among youths in the United States had dipped in recent years, statistics for girls were causing concern, he said, and debunked conventional wisdom that boys were more at risk from illegal drugs.

"Girls are telling us that they understand the risks associated with drugs, alcohol and cigarettes," Walters said in a statement, issued in New York.

"But that doesn't appear to be stopping them from using (them)," Walters said, urging parents to talk to their daughters about the importance of staying drugs-free.

Atoosa Rubenstein, editor in chief of Seventeen magazine, which cooperated with the White House initiative, said young girls were becoming more independent and starting to make decisions about their future."

"Combine this new responsibility with all the stress and pressures in their lives and the result, unfortunately, can be substance abuse," she said.

Girls Equal, Exceed Boys In Substance Abuse (LIVESCI)

By Corey Binns

LiveScience.com, February 9, 2006

Adolescent girls abuse drugs and alcohol just as much if not more than boys, a new study indicates.

Contrary to popular belief, more girls are new substance abusers. In 2004, 1.5 million girls started using alcohol, 730,000 girls started smoking, and 675,000 started using marijuana, according to the 2004 National Survey on Drug Use and Health.

The Office of National Drug Control Policy (ONDCP) reported the findings today.

"Over the last few years, we have seen overall drug use decrease among teens—boys and girls. But the trends of substance use among our adolescent girls are alarming," said ONDCP Director John P. Walters.

Conversely, a 2003 Centers for Disease Control survey of high school students found male students more likely to report methamphetamine use than their female classmates.

Marijuana is the drug of choice for girls; they prefer it over cocaine, heroin, Ecstasy, and all other illicit drugs combined, according to ONDCP.

Girls smoke cigarettes and abuse prescription drugs more than boys. And since 2003, girls have caught up with boys in abuse of illicit drugs and alcohol.

Girls abuse for different reasons that boys. Drug and alcohol use has a more profound impact on teen girls, both physically and psychologically.

DOJ_NMG_0013899

They tend to use substances to help their mood, boost their confidence, and cope with problems. Yet smoking marijuana can increase the risk of depression by five times in teen girls, and double the risk of depression for teens of both genders, research shows.

A desire to lose weight also contributes to drug abuse; girls pop diet pills four times more than boys.

Substance abuse can lead to physical, mental, and social consequences for girls, especially when their bodies and brains are still developing.

"Girls are telling us that they understand the risks associated with drugs, alcohol, and cigarettes," Walters said. "But that doesn't appear to be stopping them from using."

Drug Use Often Masks Self-worth Issues (MINNST)

By Jenna Ross

Minneapolis Star Tribune, February 10, 2006

Andrea Raines downed Ecstasy and alcohol, did methamphetamine and morphine, smoked marijuana and snorted cocaine

But that wasn't enough, she said. Throughout three years of chemical abuse, she would make herself throw up.

Raines, now 16, was like many adolescent girls who use drugs. She was insecure. "I didn't like my body," Raines said. "I wanted to be skinnier. I wanted to be like the women you see on TV."

A report by the White House Office of National Drug Control Policy released Thursday notes that young females across the country tend to use alcohol or drugs to lose weight, improve their mood, increase their confidence, cope with problems and lose their inhibitions.

The report also said more girls than boys are starting to drink and smoke cigarettes and marijuana.

And, according to the report, the girls who drink alcohol or take drugs are more likely to have sex.

Raines' drug use began with marijuana at age 12. When she started hanging with a group of older guys, she began using harder drugs. By the time she was 14, she had lost weight, close friends and her virginity.

Now, Raines lives at Minnesota Teen Challenge in Minneapolis, where she attends therapy and goes to school with 12 high school girls with similar histories. It's the fourth drug treatment she's tried in less than a year and a half.

This time, it's working. She has regained her "self-worth," put on 48 pounds and hopes to graduate from high school a year early.

Raines, who grew up in Coon Rapids, has a great deal of advice she would give young girls getting high. She'd tell them to listen to their parents and carefully consider their friends. Then she'd tell them this:

"Don't try to be so much like the world," she said. "The world is evil."

Lund Pleads Case For Olympic Eligibility (AP-Y2)

By Tom Withers, AP Sports Writer

AP2, February 10, 2006

U.S. skeleton racer Zach Lund's hopes of competing in the Olympics now rest in the hands of a special arbitration court.

The Court of Arbitration for Sport is expected to rule Friday on whether Lund should be allowed to race in the Turin Games after testing positive for finasteride — an ingredient in a hair-restoration product that also can be used as a steroid-masking agent. Lund insists he tested positive because he was taking an baldness-fighting drug.

Lund spent more than three hours Thursday at a hearing with the CAS. The men's skeleton competition scheduled to begin next week.

Lund was publicly warned but not suspended by the U.S. Anti-Doping Agency on Jan. 23 after the positive test. But last week, the World Anti-Doping Agency filed an appeal with the CAS over Lund's Olympic eligibility.

The World Anti-Doping Code recommends a two-year suspension for a first serious doping violation, and it has the right to appeal any decision it feels to be too lenient or incorrect.

Lund attended Thursday's hearing at a Turin hotel with his attorney, Howard Jacobs, who declined to comment to The Associated Press afterward. WADA participated in the hearing via a conference call.

Lund, 26, was the overall World Cup leader before he was sanctioned, a ruling that compounded other pre-Olympic problems for the U.S. Bobsled and Skeleton Federation.

At the time, the USBSF was dealing with accusations of sexual harassment against U.S. coach Tim Nardiello, who was suspended, reinstated and ultimately fired after ignoring orders to stay away from the American team during its final Olympic preparations.

Finasteride has been on the banned list since 2005. Two athletes, Argentine tennis player Mariano Hood and German soccer player Nemanja Vucicevic, were banned for taking the same drug last year.

On Thursday, the Montreal Canadiens said goalie Jose Theodore tested positive for a banned substance in pre-Olympic screening because he was using a hair-growth drug that can be used as a masking agent.

Theodore was not picked for Canada's Olympic team, but was on the preliminary 81-player eligibility list. No punishment was handed down because he is appealing the result to an arbitrator.

Duke Strengthens Drug - Testing Policies (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, February 9, 2006

DURHAM, N.C. (AP) -- Student athletes at Duke who test positive for steroids will have to sit out of competition for a year, while a second offense will result in lost eligibility, the school announced Thursday.

The changes come after allegations last spring of steroid use by former baseball players. Bill Hillier, who compiled a 121-214 record in six years, resigned as coach a month after two former Duke players told the university newspaper that used steroids while playing for the school.

Those players and others have said Hillier suggested that they use steroids. Hillier has denied the allegations.

The new policy goes into place immediately. Evidence of blood doping or masking agents and refusal to take or attempts to manipulate a test are treated as positive tests, the school said.

The new rules also call for treatment and counseling for athletes who test positive for illegal drugs or any other substance banned by the NCAA. Athletes who flunk a second test for such drugs would be suspended for at least half of a season, while a third offense would result in a permanent ban from competition.

The previous policy did not distinguish between steroids and other drugs, said James E. Coleman Jr., a Duke law professor who headed the committee that recommended the changes.

The policy also allows for unannounced drug testing for players in all of Duke's 26 varsity programs.

Duke Tightens Athletes' Drug Rules (DURHS)

By BRYAN STRICKLAND, The Herald-Sun

Durham (NC) Herald Sun, February 10, 2006

DURHAM -- Duke University's athletics program became the latest to crack down on the use of performance-enhancing drugs Thursday, less than a year after allegations surfaced regarding steroid use in the baseball program.

The school's new drug policy differentiates between performance-enhancing drugs and other substances banned by the NCAA -- so-called "street drugs" -- by imposing harsher penalties for student-athletes who test positive for steroids and the like.

The previous policy treated all banned substances the same, calling for counseling, treatment and further evaluation for a first offense, a suspension for at least half the season for a second offense and a permanent ban from competition for a third offense.

That remains the penalty schedule for street drugs. But performance-enhancing drugs now carry a minimum one-year ban for a first offense and a permanent ban for a second offense.

"There's only one reason in the world to use steroids, and that's to gain an advantage and to cheat," said Brad Berndt, assistant director of athletics. "An educational institution should uphold all the ideals of what's best about integrity and honesty. There's no other reason to take a steroid other than to gain an advantage over your opponent. Besides, they're illegal."

DOJ_NMG_0013901

Berndt, who has overseen the NCAA's drug-testing program on the Duke campus for the last eight years, was one of six members of a committee appointed last year by Duke President Richard Brodhead to review and rework the athletics department's drug policy.

Berndt said the committee sought comments from all of the school's head and assistant coaches and the Student-Athlete Advisory group during its research phase.

Berndt said a review was due but was surely sped up by the events of last April, when former Duke baseball players Aaron Kempster and Gavin Stanley told Duke's student newspaper, The Chronicle, that they had used steroids in the summer of 2002. They also claimed they did so at the suggestion of their coach, Bill Hillier.

Hillier turned in his resignation a month later at the end of the season, a decision that he and the school said came as a result of his 121-214 record over six seasons rather than the former players' claims.

"Honestly, we were ready to review our policy. We probably reviewed it a little bit faster than we would have had that not come up," Berndt said. "The two folks that went to the media were two folks that were disenchanted with the baseball program first of all, and used that as a vehicle to bring some bad publicity to the program.

"I think it was very, very isolated, and it was three or four years after the fact. I think if they had been really concerned, they would have come to us as administrators and would have said, 'Hey, we've got a problem,' and we would have dealt with it. And they would have done so earlier."

Chris Kennedy, senior associate athletics director, also downplayed the claims. But he did say some good had come out of them, both in terms of the new policy and in terms of making sure coaches are delivering the anti-drug message loudly and clearly.

"The important conclusion that we came to out of that, by talking to bunches of past and current baseball players, is that as in every other team that we sponsor, coaches want people to get bigger and stronger because otherwise you're going to get beat," said Kennedy, who has been involved with the school's drug policy since its infancy in the early 1980s. "But there was none of this winking and, 'You know what to do,' stuff like that. If they interpreted it that way, they grossly misinterpret what was being said.

"What we want our coaches to say is, 'You need to get bigger and stronger; here's how you do it. We're going to fit you in with our nutritionist and she's going to talk to you about protein, and you'll get with the weight coach and work out a program for you. Do not take performance-enhancing drugs. Do not take steroids. Do not take supplements.' "

Steroids have been big news at the highest level of sports over the last year or so, as evidenced by congressional hearings involving commissioners from Major League Baseball, the NBA and the NHL last spring.

The changing landscape has led to changes at other area schools as well.

In October, UNC adopted a new policy with much stiffer penalties for "anabolic agents" than other drugs: termination for eligibility for a first positive test for steroids, versus at a minimum a probationary period for a first offense involving a street drug, followed by loss of half a season for a second offense and termination of eligibility for a third offense.

N.C. State updated its policy in July 2004, before steroids became such a hot-button issue. It doesn't differentiate between steroids and street drugs in terms of its minimum penalties.

Duke's policy falls somewhere in the middle.

"We want it to be a stiff penalty, but we're also in the business of education, so we want to make sure we educate the student and give them another chance," Berndt said. "It is pretty strong, and it's very consistent with the NCAA policy. That was one of the things that was kind of leading this committee all along: What does the NCAA do? Not only what's best for Duke, but what does the NCAA do?"

Like Duke's new policy, the NCAA suspends athletes for one year for a first offense of its steroid policy and for lifetime for a second offense.

But the NCAA's drug-testing procedures alone reach a tiny percentage of the total athletes. Berndt said the NCAA was on campus last Thursday to conduct the year-round phase of its drug testing, which typically involves one trip to each campus over the course of a school year to test 18 football players and eight athletes from one other team for performance-enhancing drugs only. The NCAA also randomly tests during its postseason tournaments for both street drugs and steroids.

DOJ_NMG_0013902

"Our rule is, 'If we don't give it to you, don't put it in your body,' " Duke football coach Ted Roof said. "We believe that the only way to get an edge is to work hard. There are no shortcuts to success."

Berndt said Duke started its own testing about 10 years ago. The school was randomly testing 30 athletes on five or six occasions during the course of a school year in the past but is in the process of increasing that number to nine or 10 times a year. The increased testing will now include summer school and will reach more of the school's Olympic sports.

Duke has 26 teams. But Berndt said four have received much of the focus of testing in the past -- football, men's and women's basketball, and baseball. School officials hope that wider testing and stiffer penalties will keep their athletes on the straight and narrow.

"Obviously, we hope it will deter drug use, partly by giving our kids a reason to say, 'I can't do that,' " Kennedy said. "They're in the dorm at 2 a.m. on a Saturday or Sunday morning and everybody else is doing something and it's like, 'Oh, come on.'

"But the kid might say, 'Listen, I could be tested Tuesday. I can't do that.' "

Duke senior basketball player Shelden Williams, who said he had been tested a couple of times during his career and during his participation over the summer with USA Basketball, said the increased testing and penalties don't bother him.

"It's only annoying if you have something to hide," Williams said. "It's no problem for me. I don't have anything to hide. Being tested is I guess a walk in the park."

1:21 Pm | Duke Toughens Steroids Policy (CO)

By Ken Tysiac

The Charlotte Observer, February 10, 2006

Duke University has toughened its policy on steroids, mandating a one-year suspension for any athlete who tests positive for anabolic steroids, blood doping or masking agents, the school announced Thursday.

A second positive test will result in termination of athletics eligibility.

Duke's policy for athletes who test positive for street drugs or NCAA-banned substances other than steroids is basically unchanged. Those athletes will receive evaluation, treatment and counseling, with at least a half-season suspension for the second offense and a permanent ban for a third offense.

Steroids were treated the same as street drugs under Duke's previous policy. A committee commissioned by university president Richard Brodhead created the new policy.

Stories last year about alleged steroid use by former members of Duke's baseball team were one reason the university decided to review its policy, committee member Tallman Trask III said in a statement.

"While we fully checked out these allegations and were satisfied that this was not a widespread problem, we nonetheless felt it was important to take this pro-active step in strengthening our drug policy," said Trask, Duke's executive vice president. "We also felt Duke could, and should, take a leadership role in this area, and that it is in the best interest of our student-athletes' health and well-being that we do so."

The University of North Carolina strengthened its steroid policy in October, requiring permanent dismissal for athletes testing positive for anabolic steroids.

Duke's policy provides a second chance for steroid offenders.

"We are an educational institution," said Duke law professor James E. Coleman Jr., who chaired Duke's committee. "We felt it was appropriate to give a student who tested positive for a steroid a second chance to learn from and recover from the error, if possible."

-- Ken Tysiac: ktysiac@charlotteobserver.com

-- Read tomorrow's Charlotte Observer for more details on this developing story.

Feds Raid Moonshine Still (CLAYTRIB)

By Blake Spurney, Editor

Clayton (GA) Tribune, February 9, 2006

Federal agents from the U.S. Forest Service and the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms raided a moonshine still Feb. 2 off Muscadine Lane in eastern Rabun County.

DOJ_NMG_0013903

The still, on Forest Service land in the Pool Creek community, had been under surveillance for nearly two months. No arrests have been made, though Rabun County sheriff's deputies and Georgia Department of Revenue agents helped execute warrants at three local residences.

Authorities released few details about the still's operation, including the names of potential suspects. The investigation is ongoing.

"Suffice it to say, the suspects have been under surveillance with our operation," said ATF spokesman Marc Jackson.

"It was estimated that up until our enforcement action on it, that this suspected still was suspected of producing 45-70 gallons per cycle," Jackson added. The still had yielded about seven cycles since Dec. 8.

The still was estimated to hold 750 gallons of mash. It was tucked away off Forest Service Road 517. Liquor was transported from the site in a 55-gallon barrel to another location where it was transferred to jars. Its operators had built a makeshift road through the woods, apparently on an old logging roadbed. The liquor was distilled through an old radiator.

Jackson said samples taken of the finished product detected "an enough amount of lead to cause a concern for public safety."

The Forest Service brought in a bulldozer Friday morning to finish cutting the still. Some parts of it had been dismantled the previous evening.

The ATF got involved in the investigation upon getting a referral from the Forest Service.

"That's what makes it unique was that it was found on Forest Service land," Jackson said.

State revenue agents merely assisted the federal investigation.

"It was a federal warrant executed on federal land," said Revenue Department spokesman Charles Willey, declining further comment.

Because the raid stemmed from a federal investigation, no suspect was immediately arrested. Jackson said no affidavits had been filed and that arrests typically came after a federal grand jury indictment.

U.S. Attorney's Office spokesman Pat Crosby said he could neither confirm nor deny an ongoing investigation. Therefore, it's likely no decision has been made as to whether the case will prosecuted in federal court.

A federal conviction for transporting, selling or manufacturing nontaxed liquor carries a possible sentence of up to five years in prison and a maximum fine of $10,000.

The residences that were searched as part of the investigation are located on Pool Creek Road, Earl's Ford Road and Screamer Street. Two vehicles suspected of hauling liquor were seized, as was an unspecified quantity of liquor found at two of the residences.

A woman who answered the phone at the suspect's residence on Pool Creek Road said, "There's no comment."

Man Sentenced In Arson-for-hire Case (BUCKSCCT)

By HARRY YANOSHAK, Bucks County Courier Times

Bucks County (PA) Courier-Times, February 9, 2006

PHILADELPHIA - A New Jersey man was sentenced to five years in federal prison Wednesday for hiring two men to torch the Morrisville restaurant across the street from what used to be his pizzeria.

From his own family to the man whose deli-restaurant was damaged by Molotov cocktails, many in U.S. District Court posed the same question to Alessandro "Alex" Tramo: "What were you thinking?"

Tramo's answer: He wasn't.

The abuse of prescription drugs had clouded his judgment, he told U.S. District Court Judge Anita Brody, whose sentence of five years was the mandatory minimum.

"I forever regret having anything to do with this incident," he told the court as his wife, Lisa, sat in the audience and wiped away tears.

Tramo pleaded guilty to hiring the men to burn Ben's Deli and Restaurant on Dec. 2, 2000. The 3:45 a.m. fire was brought under control in about 20 minutes and seriously damaged the landmark cafeteria-style eatery.

DOJ_NMG_0013904

An investigation by Morrisville and Bucks County fire marshals and the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms resulted in an indictment against Tramo, 34, of Bordentown; Bruce Armstrong, 35, of Trenton; and William Anderson, 39, of Morrisville.

Tramo, who then owned Anthony's 4 Pizza, hired the two to eliminate Ben's as a competitor, the investigators determined.

Armstrong and Anderson pleaded guilty and agreed to testify against Tramo. After that, Tramo pleaded guilty to arson and criminal conspiracy to commit arson.

Armstrong was sentenced to 40 months in federal prison. Anderson will be sentenced March 8.

The government said Tramo paid Anderson $3,000 to torch Ben's, and Anderson then gave Molotov cocktails and $2,000 to Armstrong.

The cocktail was a mixture of castor oil and nitromethane, a highly explosive liquid gas used to power remote-controlled model cars. The fuel was packed in glass root beer bottles.

After owners Joe Koebert and Nickolas Blasy rebuilt Ben's, Tramo tried to hire Armstrong in summer 2003 to again to torch the restaurant, according to the government case against him. Armstrong was cooperating with authorities at the time and his phone calls to Tramo were recorded, Assistant U.S. Attorney Robert E. Goldman said.

In court Wednesday, Tramo said he was upset that his poor decision-making skills cost him precious time with his wife and their girls, 3 and 6.

"Please don't keep me from my precious children," the defendant told the judge.

Brody, who acknowledged the support of Tramo's wife and other family members, said the minimum sentence was appropriate, given the seriousness of the crime.

Tramo's criminal history in Bucks County includes convictions for stalking and harassment, forgery and making terroristic threats. He was sentenced to county probation for those crimes, records showed.

"There's just no question about it," Brody said. "When you take all the factors into consideration, this sentence is very appropriate. You destroyed a business, you put firefighters' lives in jeopardy, and you even contemplated burning down this business a second time."

A dozen of Tramo's family members, including relatives who had flown in from Italy, attended the sentencing. His wife declined to comment. She asked the judge to send her husband to a federal prison nearby.

Defense lawyer Marc Neff said he was satisfied that Tramo received only the mandatory minimum sentence. "In a moment of lapsed judgment, he did something stupid," the lawyer said.

Called to testify, Koebert said that he had suspicions about Tramo early on, but he couldn't believe that he could do such a thing.

"What were you thinking?" Koebert asked.

After Tramo was led away, apologizing to his family in Italian, Koebert shook hands with Tramo's wife, mother and relatives.

"We were friends. We were friends," he told them.

Then he said, "Look at how he's devastated his family."

Cousin Ben Tramo said the family is hurting.

"Hopefully, when this is all over, we'll all try to put this behind us. He has a wife and two beautiful kids waiting for him," he said.

Referring to the question asked by Koebert, Ben Tramo said, "For the past months that's what we were all saying: 'What were you thinking?' "

Harry Yanoshak can be reached at 215-949-4203 or hyanoshak@phillyBurbs.com.

IMMIGRATION:

Border Violence Alarms Chertoff (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, February 10, 2006

Department of Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, concerned about rising border violence, said yesterday nearly $1 billion in next year's proposed $42.7 billion department budget will be used for new U.S. Border Patrol agents, upgraded electronic security measures, and more fences, roads, and detention beds.

"There has been an over-100 percent increase in the last fiscal year in border violence aimed at our Border Patrol agents, and that ranges from gunshots fired across the border to rocks being thrown, sometimes flaming rocks, and let me tell you, rockings are serious," Mr. Chertoff said at a press conference in Washington.

"We are not going to tolerate this kind of behavior ... if they think they're going to back us down or chase us away, the answer to that is no. Our Border Patrol is properly trained. They have rules of engagement. They are entitled to defend themselves. They will defend themselves. We will support them in applying these rules of engagement," he said.

Border Patrol Chief David V. Aguilar noted there had already been 192 assaults on his agents since the start of the new fiscal year in October.

Mr. Chertoff said much of the border violence has been the result of increased enforcement efforts by the U.S. government, but that the department was committed to securing the nation's borders as part of the strategy that "involves not only apprehensions at the border, but detention, removal and more vigorous work site enforcement."

The new budget calls for $458.9 million for 1,500 new Border Patrol agents, doubling the number of agents added to 3,000 since 2005. This represents a 42 percent increase in the agent work force since the September 11 attacks.

The budget also calls for:

•$100 million for technology that will enhance electronic surveillance and operational response capability along the border. Mr. Chertoff said the money will provide significant procurement investments needed to begin an aggressive deployment plan that began in fiscal 2005.

•$30 million to complete construction of the San Diego border infrastructure project that includes multiple fences and patrol roads to enable quick enforcement response.

•$410.2 million for an additional 6,700 detention bed spaces -- to eliminate an existing "catch and release" program in which apprehended illegal aliens are released because of a lack of bed space.

Mr. Chertoff said rising violence along the U.S.-Mexico border represented not only a threat to law-enforcement personnel but to everyone.

"This is dangerous to our country; it's dangerous to Mexico; it's dangerous to the human beings who are being smuggled into the country and then left to die in the desert, or subject to being victims of assaults by the coyotes [alien smugglers] themselves," he said.

"So, from a humanitarian and a national security standpoint, we have to have a very strong commitment to ending this activity by illegal trafficking organizations," he said.

Senator Calls Immigration A National-security Concern (WT)

By Robert Stacy Mccain

The Washington Times, February 10, 2006

Immigration should be treated as a national security issue, Sen. John Cornyn yesterday told a gathering of conservative activists.

"The federal government needs to obtain operational security of our borders," the Texas Republican said in a speech to the 33rd annual Conservative Political Action Conference (CPAC) at the Omni Shoreham Hotel in Washington.

"We are proud to be a nation of immigrants ... but we are also a nation of laws," said Mr. Cornyn, warning that other nations, including Mexico, must "have respect for this country's laws and our nation's sovereignty."

He said human traffickers, drug smugglers and criminal gangs from Brazil, China and other countries are "using Mexico as a point of entry into the United States."

Mr. Cornyn, whose appearance capped a morning of speeches and panel discussions devoted to border issues, drew applause when he said he would push for a Senate bill to provide "a comprehensive solution" to U.S. immigration problems "that does not include amnesty."

DOJ_NMG_0013906

Earlier CPAC discussions highlighted what Mark Krikorian of the Center for Immigration Studies called the "gap between elite and public opinion" on the issue.

"That divide ... really is what drives the debate," said Mr. Krikorian, who sparked laughter with his remarks on proposals by President Bush and others for an immigrant guest-worker program.

"It's the Nigerian e-mail scam of immigration. It's obviously false, but people keep falling for it over and over," Mr. Krikorian said, noting that in other countries with such programs, most "guest workers" become permanent residents.

Veteran conservative activist Phyllis Schlafly suggested that guest-worker proposals would create a separate caste for foreign laborers.

"We don't want a servant or serf or peasant class," the Eagle Forum president said.

Rep. J.D. Hayworth, Arizona Republican, opened one morning panel by emphasizing the issue of border enforcement.

"In the spirit of Ronald Reagan, who said his grand strategy for the Cold War was this, 'We win, they lose,' let me propose this simple notion ...: Let's enforce existing laws, and then move to close loopholes that exist that others game and take advantage of," Mr. Hayworth said. " 'Enforcement first' should be our call to action."

Colin A. Hanna, president of Let Freedom Ring, a public-policy organization that advocates enhanced border security, noted that the U.S.-Mexico border is one "between two allies," but said that "recently, the Mexican government has not acted like much of an ally in addressing illegal immigration."

CPAC attendees signaled their mood with loud cheers for Chris Simcox, president of the Minuteman Civil Defense Corps, a group that has made headlines with its civilian border vigils.

"I'm tired of hearing sheriffs from Texas ... begging and pleading for military support because they're outmanned and outgunned on the borders," said Mr. Simcox, who called the inflow of illegal aliens and drugs "terrorism that's affecting the lives of people who live along the border."

Temporary Manager Visas Used To Circumvent Limits (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, February 10, 2006

One of the country's temporary work visa programs, used particularly by foreign technology workers, is being abused by companies looking to get around protections for American workers, according to a new government report.

The L visa, which is intended for foreign companies who want to transfer managerial employees or workers with "specialized knowledge" temporarily to the United States, has been abused to get around limits on other types of visas, according to the Department of Homeland Security's inspector general.

Congress has capped the number of workers who can come under the H-1B visa category each year at 65,000, but has not placed limits on the L-1 visa, which applies to workers with specialized knowledge. Also, the L visa does not require that workers are paid the "prevailing wage" so that American workers are not displaced.

"Software companies appear to be using the L visa to get around H quotas," one consular post in Southeast Asia told investigators. State Department officials often are called upon to double-check information abroad.

L visas have proven attractive for technology companies -- and particularly firms that outsource labor to India. Nearly 50 percent of the petitions received under the "specialized knowledge" category in fiscal 2005 were for people born in India.

The inspector general found that it is difficult for adjudicators at U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services (USCIS) to determine what constitutes a manager, particularly because companies vary in size and organization. Adjudicators also have to rely on a company's claims about its own operations, a worker's status at the time of the petition and how a worker will be used in the United States.

In some cases, adjudicators said, applications were prepared by lawyers and "were either too vague, or conversely too technical, for the adjudicator to make appropriate decisions."

Sen. Charles E. Grassley, the Iowa Republican who inserted a provision into a bill to require the study, said it showed "extensive and well-known fraud and abuse in the L visa program."

DOJ_NMG_0013907

"When our own consular officers agree that there are problems with the L visa program, something has to be done," he said. "We can't have companies bypass the H-1B visas just to get around protections intended to help American workers."

The inspector general concluded that although the claims about displacing U.S. workers "may have merit," it is not a significant national trend.

Angelica Alfonso, a spokeswoman for USCIS, said the report is accurate in saying L-1 visas are difficult to adjudicate and have "the potential of being exploited to fraud and abuse."

"USCIS has provided additional guidance to minimize such vulnerabilities. In addition, in 2006, USCIS plans to conduct a benefit fraud assessment to determine the nature and extent of fraud in the L-1A non-immigrant classification," she said.

The L-1A category applies to managers and executives.

The inspector general called for USCIS to come up with new ways to make sure overseas checks are made and has given the agency 90 days to respond.

Bipolar Border Budgeting (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 10, 2006

THROWING MONEY AT A PROBLEM doesn't solve it. Knee-jerk reactions don't help, either. When it comes to illegal immigration, the Bush administration, apparently unable to decide which approach it prefers, has opted for both. But spending more on border enforcement will do little to curb illegal immigration and may even distract attention from better solutions to the problem.

In his State of the Union address, President Bush reaffirmed his call for immigration reform, noting a need for both stronger border enforcement and for "a rational, humane guest-worker program." In this week's budget proposal, however, the president lost his good sense and succumbed to hysteria, shifting emphasis to Border Patrol spending. Over the last 10 years, such spending has increased by many times, yet illegal immigration continues to climb.

A more sensible step would be a guest-worker program that makes temporary workers legal and reduces people smuggling, along with the risks and related crimes that go with it. In Bush's budget there is a small nod in this direction, with $247 million to support such a program. But most of the $22.2 billion allotted for border and transportation security, up 10% over last year, is directed at enforcement: hiring 1,500 Border Patrol agents, buying high-tech detection gadgets and expanding fences along our southern border.

The other disappointment in the president's budget is that he continued his annual practice of ignoring states' requests for reimbursement for jailing illegal immigrants. California will spend $662 million this year to imprison illegal immigrants convicted of crimes, but it will receive only $107 million from the federal government to help pay for it.

Meanwhile, federal immigration jails are so overcrowded that many suspects caught by border agents are released with nothing more than a promise to show up later in immigration court. Michael Chertoff, the secretary of Homeland Security, asserted at a news conference on Thursday that this practice would end. The "catch and release" program has been an embarrassment for years, as a shortage of bed space in detention centers allowed many immigrants to be released into the United States. If Chertoff gets his way, detention space will be expanded and "catch and return" will become watchwords as migrants are returned to their home countries.

There is no quick fix to the problem of illegal immigration. A massive migration from Central America into the United States, mostly in pursuit of better wages, will not be stemmed by increased spending on bigger fences or more officers.

Many politicians fall for the temptation of promising better enforcement. And Americans want their country to better police its borders. But the solution is to balance enforcement with better control and regulation of the flow of labor into the United States. Unless administration policies address the whole problem, it's not going to go away.

TAX:

KPMG Tax-Shelter Settlement May Be Revised Amid Opt-Outs (WSJ)

By Nathan Koppel

DOJ_NMG_0013908

The Wall Street Journal, February 10, 2006

A federal judge postponed a proposed $225 million class-action settlement with accounting firm KPMG LLP and law firm Sidley Austin Brown & Wood LLP in a tax-shelter lawsuit.

The order, issued yesterday, came in response to a motion by KPMG in federal court in Newark, N.J., to revise the settlement because potential members opted out of the deal. The postponement was reported in the New York Times.

"This settlement could be in jeopardy," said attorney Edmundo Ramirez, whose client was one of 284 potential members of the KPMG class. Mr. Ramirez said his client rejected the original settlement, considering it "a sweetheart deal for KPMG."

In an interview, attorney Melvyn Weiss, a partner at Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman LLP and the lead lawyer for the plaintiffs in the case, said the parties may reduce the original settlement amount, but he believed an accord could still be reached in about a month. Milberg Weiss filed the suit last year, claiming KPMG sold fraudulent tax shelters. KPMG has admitted wrongdoing and agreed to pay the U.S. $456 million in restitution.

As originally proposed, the settlement would have awarded $195 million to purchasers of allegedly fraudulent tax shelters sold by KPMG. Milberg Weiss and other class counsel stood to earn $30 million from the settlement. If the plaintiffs' recovery is reduced in a new settlement, the plaintiffs' lawyers would also earn less, Mr. Weiss said.

According to a previous court filing, 61 of the 284 potential class members opted out of the original settlement, a high rate of rejection. The opt-outs lowered the settlement's value to KPMG, according to lawyers, because the plaintiffs who rejected the settlement are now free to file individual suits against the accounting firm. Indeed, many of the plaintiffs have sued KPMG in state and federal courts across the country. "KPMG wants to lower the class settlement because of the high number of plaintiffs who have opted out," Mr. Ramirez said.

A KPMG spokesman said, "These continuing discussions are consistent with our goals for a fair settlement." An attorney representing Sidley Austin didn't return a call for comment.

High Court To Hear Challenge To Company Tax Breaks (NLJ)

By Marcia Coyle, The National Law Journal

National Law Journal, February 10, 2006

In North Carolina this spring, a state court will take up a constitutional challenge to $242 million in state tax breaks given by state officials to Dell Inc. to build a plant in Winston-Salem. In Minnesota, another suit is pending attacking the validity of two multimillion-dollar tax-incentive programs to attract and keep businesses in special zones in that state.

The North Carolina and Minnesota suits are among a number percolating around the country that have been inspired largely by a federal appellate decision in 2004 that struck down Ohio's investment tax credit -- a sacred tool of state economic competition.

The Ohio case, which involved a $280 million tax incentive plan for DaimlerChrysler Corp.'s expansion in that state, is now before the U.S. Supreme Court, which is scheduled to hear arguments on March 1. DaimlerChrysler Corp. v. Cuno, No. 04-1704; Wilkins v. Cuno, No. 04-1724.

The case has raised to a high profile a long-running debate over the constitutionality of state tax incentives under the so-called dormant or negative commerce clause, which prohibits states from acting in a way that interferes with interstate commerce, as well as a debate over the effectiveness of tax incentives as an economic-development tool.

Business and government officials predict "dire ramifications" if states lose the ability to offer these incentives and businesses lose the ability to use them.

They note that one study reported last year that more than 330 statutory income or franchise tax credits and incentives are offered by 46 states.

But of all the many state and local provisions designed to attract and encourage business development, the most common form of tax incentive in America is the investment tax credit, according to Walter Hellerstein of the University of Georgia School of Law, who is considered the leading academic authority on state and local taxation.

DOJ_NMG_0013909

Since the Ohio credit's inception in 1995, corporations have used it in investing more than $30 billion in Ohio plants and equipment, according to the state. In 2002, more than 2,100 corporate taxpayers took Ohio ITC credits, totaling more than $73 million.

"The Constitution is not an economic suicide pact among the States," said Ohio State Solicitor Douglas R. Cole in his high court brief. "The Court should not turn it into one here."

BALKANIZATION?

But neither is the Constitution a facilitator of the economic balkanization of the states, said retired North Carolina Supreme Court Justice Robert F. Orr, head of the North Carolina Institute for Constitutional Law, which filed the Dell lawsuit.

"What we're seeing nationally is large corporations able to play one state off another," he said. "States, in desperate search for jobs, are forced to hand out huge tax breaks that shift the burden to small businesses and individuals and deprives local governments of revenue.

"This is the modern-day version of the trade wars that the framers put the commerce clause into the Constitution in the first place to prevent."

What the two sides can agree on now is that uncertainty permeates the legal and business landscapes following the Ohio decision by the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals.

"There are a fair number of jurisdictions -- upwards of 40 -- that have similar incentive programs. Is this a precursor for further overturning?" asked Eli J. Dicker, chief tax counsel at Tax Executives Institute, a non-profit association of corporate and other business tax executives.

"If a businessperson is trying to plan where to build a factory, whether it be a vehicle or high-tech assembly line, with a lot of jobs in play, I would strongly suspect there is a hesitancy now, especially when the economics may be uncertain."

OHIO PRECURSOR?

The Ohio story began in the mid-1990s, when DaimlerChrysler decided to expand its capacity to build Jeeps. Faced with a choice of expanding an existing facility in Toledo or crossing the border into Michigan, the company approached Ohio officials about tax incentives to remain in Ohio.

One of the decisive incentives for DaimlerChrysler was the investment tax credit, which provides a one-time credit against Ohio's corporate franchise tax to any company that makes a qualifying investment in the state.

The suit challenging the tax incentives was brought by a Toledo resident, a small business owner whose property was taken, and some citizens of Michigan. They claimed that the incentive package discriminated against interstate commerce by "providing preferential treatment to in-state economic activity."

The 6th Circuit agreed, striking down the investment tax credit, but upholding a property tax exemption. On the investment tax credit, the court said that corporations would be treated unequally based on their investment decisions.

For example, a business paying Ohio taxes would receive a credit against those taxes in exchange for investing in Ohio, but a business paying Ohio taxes choosing to invest in Michigan would not.

The Supreme Court's jurisprudence in this area is "at best uncertain and at worst indecipherable to those of us who spend our life working in this area," said Georgia's Hellerstein.

From a practical perspective, Hellerstein said, "There's an overwhelming need" for clarification. "You have both taxpayers and states that really have no clue as to whether a particular tax incentive is going to be sustained," he said.

"One thing we know is that states are free to enact legislation that encourages economic development. Even in the course of striking down legislation that it has found violative of the commerce clause, the court has made clear states are not hamstrung in those efforts," Hellerstein said.

DRAWING THE LINE

But where is the line between what is discriminatory and what isn't, asked Chris Atkins, senior attorney with the Tax Foundation.

"We want the Court to say this type of investment credit is OK or draw a reasonable line saying, it's not OK but lowering tax rates or building new roads is OK," said Atkins.

DOJ_NMG_0013910

"The 6th Circuit didn't draw that line. Saying the credit discriminated because it encouraged investment in Ohio is very broad. There's a whole range of spending policies that encourage investment in the state, from infrastructure improvements to building schools."

The Ohio case differs from prior high court challenges in this area. The Commerce Clause historically has been enforced by one business suing to take away a benefit given to another. But the Ohio case is brought by nonbusiness taxpayers, raising a potential standing problem on which the justices have ordered briefing, and which could prevent a ruling on the merits.

"The usual plaintiffs who typically would bring challenges are choosing not to because if they're being discriminated against by Ohio, they may be, by the same token, getting the benefit of the same provision in Alabama or Minnesota," said Peter Enrich of Northeastern University School of Law, who is counsel to the Ohio plaintiffs.

"The way these tax incentives have grown like topsy has created a situation where it's not in the interests of business taxpayers to bring these suits."

Although Enrich argues that his clients do have standing, his high court opponent, Theodore B. Olson of Los Angeles-based Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher, who is counsel to DaimlerChrysler, contends that their standing is "even weaker than usual" because they do not complain that the state has imposed a discriminatory tax on them, but that a credit against that tax -- which most of them do not pay -- "somehow reduces the state's overall tax receipts" to which they contribute. That is not the "concrete and particularized injury" that standing demands, according to Olson.

DIRE IMPACT?

If the high court gets beyond the standing issue and reaches the merits of the case, the impact of any decision, of course, will depend on how it is written.

The U.S. Chamber of Commerce and other business groups contend that the 6th Circuit's approach would result in a loss of economic investment and activity to various foreign countries, as well as a decrease in investment by foreign manufacturers in the United States.

They also predict that there would be "significant financial statement impacts" on those companies that included the incentives in their calculations of profitability.

Philadelphia firm Blank Rome, in a tax bulletin on the Ohio decision, warned that "the magnitude of the credits that may be 'clawed back' or voided in the future could cause many publicly traded companies to restate their earnings."

Tax counsel Walter Nagel, of the Washington office of Boston's Sullivan & Worcester, predicted that the most likely impact of a decision against Ohio would be some action by Congress to overturn the Supreme Court ruling.

Ohio senators already have introduced bills to overturn the 6th Circuit ruling, he noted. However, he and others agreed, Congress appears to be waiting to see what the high court does.

But, Nagel asked, "What happens to everybody up until Congress overrides it? Then there's real potential for chaos in terms of who gets taxes back, which benefits go away. One ramification is that only the immediate taxpayer loses the benefit, but another ramification is everybody else -- taxpayers indirectly injured by paying higher taxes -- could well enjoy a modest reduction because it's a large base."

Nagel said that there is no consistent rule regarding what happens when a tax or economic incentive is found to be unconstitutional. A decade of litigation over the appropriate remedy, he said, has followed key Supreme Court decisions finding taxes unconstitutional.

States are infinitely creative in finding ways to attract business, said a number of tax scholars and practitioners, and will continue to be creative if Ohio loses in the high court.

Georgia's Hellerstein thinks Ohio will win, given the Court's current composition. But, he added, "One easy way for states to encourage business is simply to subsidize them. They can provide in-kind benefits in the form of subsidies."

The high court has indicated that subsidies from the general treasury do not create the same constitutional problems as using the state taxing power.

But the Tax Foundation's Atkins countered, "I think businesses might feel more comfortable keeping more of their own money taking that credit off their liability than essentially becoming beholden to the appropriations process. Some may see it as a bit more entanglement than they are willing to endure."

DOJ_NMG_0013911

And direct cash subsidies could invite litigation, said Enrich. "The pressures on states to find ways to advantage in-state economic activity are immense. I think states would continue to look for new ways to do that. Some won't pose constitutional problems."

Regardless of what the high court decides, North Carolina's Orr said, his foundation is organizing a national, bipartisan coalition to generate debate about these tax policies.

"We now see more and more local companies threatening to move unless they get incentives to stay," said Orr. "We're not taking this lying down."

No Thanks (WSJ)

By John Harwood

The Wall Street Journal, February 10, 2006

TAX OVERHAUL'S DEMISE leaves unhappy Bush panel.

Former Sen. Mack, "disappointed" that presidential advisory group he headed isn't producing action, cautions the issue will become "more difficult" to push as president's term continues. Absence of tax overhaul in Bush's State of the Union address is seen as sign of Treasury Secretary Snow's lack of clout.

Some senior Republicans want to put off overhaul debates until Washington tackles baby-boom retirement, the subject of commission Bush has called for. The liberal Center for American Progress wants Democrats to step in, placing tax overhaul atop its "15 new ideas," with plan to cut employee payroll-tax contributions on earnings below $90,000.

Ex-Sen. Breaux, Mack's co-chair, got note from Snow but "no saying 'thank you' " from Bush for panel's work.

REPUBLICANS speak up to House leaders about election-year needs.

Format for this weekend's retreat in Maryland is "unstructured," says Ohio Rep. Pryce, who chairs Republican conference. Newly elected Majority Leader Boehner calls these "times of renewal."

House Democrats press Boehner to open legislative process while banning lobbyists' gifts. But House reform timetable slips, while McCain presses Senate effort to change spending "earmarks." Answering attacks on Santorum's lobbying ties, Senate Republican campaign committee hits challenger Casey's donations from a former Abramoff colleague.

CONTRACEPTION FIGHT spreads in the states.

After FDA delays bid to sell "Plan B" pills without a prescription, backers of morning-after contraceptive push bills legalizing such distribution in Colorado, New Jersey, Kentucky and Illinois. It is already available without a prescription in eight states.

Maker Barr Pharmaceuticals Inc., which has seen Plan B prescriptions double to 1.2 million since 2003, quietly encourages the move.

Priscilla Smith of Center for Reproductive Rights says emergency contraception can "reduce abortions dramatically."

Social conservatives, saying such drugs starve new life, weigh bills to let pharmacists refuse to dispense them.

BERNANKE FACES pressure to answer deficit questions in next week's congressional testimony. "He ultimately will have to speak out on serious things that affect the economy," says Senate Banking Chairman Shelby. "If he doesn't, there will be a void." With Fed nominees Kroszner and Warsh headed for confirmation, open market committee should be back to full strength at March 27-28 meeting for first time in a year.

NGA CHAIR HUCKABEE hits Congress for trimming deficit "on the backs of the states" with proposals to increase state cost-sharing on Medicaid. Arkansas' Republican governor, a 2008 White House hopeful, says states instead need more flexibility to experiment with approaches to reining in Medicaid costs.

HOUSE DEMOCRATS CRITICIZE Bush budget proposal cutting Social Security survivors' benefits. "Continues the Bush administration's raid on the middle class," says Washington House candidate Darcy Burner, one of many challengers joining coordinated campaign offensive. Republicans leaders have signaled they won't pursue the proposal, which would cut $255 lump-sum death benefit for survivors.

MY VALENTINE? Veterans History Project sponsors a lecture at Library of Congress on "The American Soldier and 'Mademoiselle': Love and Marriage After WWI and WWII." With military-family breakups sharply up since 2000, nevadadivorce.net offers quick splits for $1,000 but cautions "7-day stay in Guam required."

DOJ_NMG_0013912

CHANGES LOOM for Pentagon weapons purchasing.

New acquisition chief Ken Krieg wants war fighters in places like Iraq and Afghanistan to play bigger role in deciding what military needs. His goal is more rapidly identifying current needs in hopes of shortening lead time on development of new weapons systems, which now sometimes runs 20 years.

"We need to institutionalize the combatant commanders in the process," he says. Most big decisions on new hardware are currently dominated by service bureaucracies in the Pentagon.

National Guard Association unveils bust of "First Lt. George W. Bush" before president's speech yesterday.

MINOR MEMOS: Randolph-Macon College physicists say dollar bills in Bush's $2.77 trillion budget, laid end to end, would reach to the sun and back. ... Budget also represents $87,800 in federal spending every second for a year. * * *

Thursday, Feb. 9

Dueling data: An American Bar Association poll shows 52% of Americans believe the president alone can't suspend constitutional freedoms, and 25% more say he must get permission from a court or Congress. That, the ABA, concludes, demonstrates that 77% of Americans have "deep reservations" about President Bush's warrantless surveillance program. Only 18% of the respondents to the poll conducted last weekend said the president can shelve constitutional freedoms "anytime the president thinks it is necessary to protect the country." ABA President Michael S. Greco said the poll, conducted for the ABA by Harris Interactive, found that "While everyone agrees on the need for aggressive deterrence of terrorism, the disclosure of unchecked domestic spying by the president is deeply troubling to many Americans."

Meantime, an Associated Press-Ipsos poll released Thursday showed that Bush is making some headway in defending the National Security Agency's secret eavesdropping program. It found that 48% support the administration, up from 42% a month ago. Half of the respondents said the administration should get a court warrant, down from 56% last month.

Greco offered an idea most could embrace: "It is a time when we should be having conversations about our constitutional freedoms as well as our security." --Mary Lu Carnevale

* * *

Katrina's wake: White House Homeland Security Adviser Fran Townsend plans to brief state emergency managers in Alexandria, Va., Saturday morning about some of the findings of the White House inquiry into Hurricane Katrina. The report is expected to be critical of the Department of Homeland Security and its policies that stripped the Federal Emergency Management Agency of funds and authority. --Bobby Block * * *

Health-care providers are starting to gin up opposition to President Bush's plan to cut billions from projected Medicare and Medicaid payments.

The American Hospital Association and five other hospital organizations are running advertisements saying that $25 billion in proposed hospital cuts over five years "will threaten people's ability to get the care they need." The ads have appeared the last two days in such publications as the Washington Times, The Hill and Roll Call. Meanwhile, the American Clinical Laboratory Association, which represents local, regional and national labs across the U.S., is complaining about a budget proposal to expand competitive bidding for lab services in Medicare. The lab group argues that competitive bidding would hurt quality by putting too much emphasis on price.

Earlier this week, Health and Human Services Secretary Michael Leavitt told Congress that expanded competitive bidding for lab and other services would "ensure more appropriate Medicare payments." --Laurie McGinley * * *

Bernanke the Inflation Fighter: Economists have some advice for Ben Bernanke as he takes over at the Federal Reserve: establish your credibility as an inflation fighter.

But, at the same time, they have concern that he could take that effort too far. When asked in the latest WSJ.com forecasting survey1 which mistake Mr. Bernanke is more likely to make -- raising rates too much or not enough -- three-quarters of economists said he is more likely to lift rates too high.

The new Fed chief faces the same puzzle that always confronts the Fed: how to check inflation without lifting rates so high that economic growth is snuffed out. But the challenge is especially acute now. Soaring energy prices have nudged up inflation pressures at the same time the Fed has been steadily lifting rates. Now, Mr. Bernanke must pick the right time to stop the increases. The matter could be further complicated because some have questioned Mr. Bernanke's resolve on price stability. Four years ago, he made comments about using loose money to fend off a very different threat: deflation. --Tim Annett

DOJ_NMG_0013913

• Read the full article2, and see a video report3 of the Journal's David Wessel discussing economists' expectations for the first quarter. Plus, download forecasts for GDP, inflation, productivity, employment and interest rates4.

* * *

Wednesday, Feb. 8

Apparently stung by criticism of his budget policies, President Bush pushed back against opponents like Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid, who termed the president's plan "immoral" for reining in Medicaid and other social-services programs.

"People talked about how the decision to reform Medicaid was immoral," Mr. Bush said Wednesday in a speech to the Business and Industry Association of New Hampshire. "Well, it's not immoral to make sure that prescription drug pharmacists don't overcharge the system. You're a taxpayer, you expect the Medicaid person we're helping to be able to buy drugs at a reasonable cost. But it turns out that there was inflated markups for people who had government help to buy drugs. That doesn't make any sense, so we reformed that."

He also defended reforms preventing parents from transferring assets to children in order to qualify for Medicaid long-term care. And he responded to concerns about cuts in the student-loan program raised by a student at an appearance last month. "I said, well, I didn't think we were -- as a matter of fact, I thought we were helping you get student loans.... Let me tell you what those reforms were. There were too many subsidies to folks who were providing loans to the students. And so we decided to reform those subsidies to make it more rational for the taxpayers, and at the same time, to help the students. By reducing the cost of lending, we saved the taxpayers $22 billion, of which $10 billion will be used to increase student loans. So here is an example of staying focused on the mission, providing money for loans, and at the same time, providing relief for the taxpayer." --John D. McKinnnon * * *

Teacher's Pet? House Minority Leader John Boehner's choice for the new chairman of the House Education and the Workforce Committee, California's Rep. Howard "Buck" McKeon, is likely to cause higher-education groups to groan.

McKeon has led committee efforts to hold down college-tuition increases, including proposing federal sanctions against colleges that raised their tuition well above the inflation rate. McKeon backed down two years ago when his proposal to cut student loans on campuses with fast-rising tuition didn't attract cosponsors -- and even Republican colleagues pointed out that it would hurt students more than their universities. But Boehner supported other McKeon efforts to hold down tuition increases, including requiring colleges to report big price jumps.

McKeon and Boehner complain that their efforts to raise Pell Grants have been counteracted by subsequent tuition increases, leaving students no better off. The Higher Education Act, which defines the government's relationship with colleges and universities, is up for renewal this year. --June Kronholz * * *

The Treasury and the World Bank are sparring over the Group of Eight's plan to cancel $37 billion in loans to 42 poor countries.

The debts are supposed to be forgiven in July, but Treasury officials worry that the World Bank will miss the deadline. "We strongly urge the bank to move as quickly as possible to get this done," a senior Treasury official said. But some World Bank member nations see the U.S. as the holdup; they don't trust the U.S. to refill its share of the World Bank's kitty as loan forgiveness drains it over the next 40 years.

Treasury Secretary Snow promised the G8 last year that he would support a bill promising future payments, but the administration's support has been lukewarm. "In the American system, current Congresses cannot obligate the appropriations decisions of future Congresses," said Treasury spokesman Tony Fratto. --Michael M. Phillips * * *

A Push for Education: Chief executives of several Business Roundtable companies, in Washington Wednesday, lauded President Bush's focus on increased funding for physical science research, on encouraging immigration of math and science whizzes from abroad and -- especially -- on improving K-12 math and science education. The executives warned, though, that the U.S. shouldn't count on continuing to rely on immigrant scientists to compensate for what they see as shortcomings of American school systems. U.S.-trained Chinese and Indian scientists increasingly have promising opportunities in their home countries.

DOJ_NMG_0013914

"It's not a problem for our businesses. It's our job not to let it be a problem" by hiring overseas when talent is in short supply in the U.S., said William D. Green, chief executive of Accenture, a consulting company. Pfizer CEO Hank McKinnell added, at a small press briefing: "We want to make sure our kids and grandkids -- and yours -- have jobs." --David Wessel * * *

The scandal surrounding disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff has shaken up Capitol Hill. But it still poses significant problems for the Bush White House.

A court hearing scheduled later this month may bring fresh attention to the case of former White House aide David Safavian, who is charged with lying in connection with a golf trip Mr. Abramoff arranged. Justice Department officials haven't closed their review of actions by former Interior Department official J. Steven Griles, who disputes claims that he favored Abramoff clients, such as Native American tribes involved in casinos. Calls for the White House to release photos of Mr. Abramoff with the president -- and details of his contacts with presidential aides including Karl Rove -- haven't abated. --Jeanne Cummings

• Read more in today's Journal article5.

* * *

Tuesday, Feb. 7

A coalition of business and academic leaders is launching a lobbying and media campaign to build support for President Bush's new plan to boost the competitiveness of American business.

The campaign opens Thursday with ad buys in national print publications, and will be followed up with ad buys in other media and direct advocacy on Capitol Hill.

The goal is "to try to increase the awareness in Washington and Congress," said Craig Barrett, chairman of Intel Corp. Barrett co-chairs the National Innovation Initiative Leadership Council, which is leading the campaign, with William Brody, president of Johns Hopkins University.

In his State of the Union address, Bush promised to seek increases in spending for scientific research and development and for math and science education. Among other things, the Bush plan would boost next year's spending by 9.3% for the National Science Foundation, the Department of Energy's Office of Science and the Commerce Department's National Institute of Standards and Technology, a step toward doubling their budgets over the next decade. Companion bills have been introduced by several members of Congress. But even so, the Bush initiative is expected to face a tough road toward passage this year, amid the broader concerns on Capitol Hill about the budget deficit.

"The question will now be, as the legislative process works, exactly what stays in and what gets consolidated and what the final bottom line is," Barrett said. "We're just trying to show there is a lot of latent interest and enthusiasm." --Greg Hitt

• Read excerpts6 and full text7 of Bush's State of the Union address. Compare text8 of his past speeches.

* * *

Steel Deal: The Justice Department is planning to investigate whether Mittal Steel Co.'s $24 billion hostile bid for chief rival Arcelor SA complies with antitrust law, a department official said. A tough U.S. investigation could delay the deal or force changes to eliminate overlapping product lines.

The proposed merger of the world's largest steelmakers would lengthen Mittal's wide lead in producing steel for the U.S. auto industry and other big manufacturers. European antitrust officials have already said they would review the deal. Mittal is based in the Netherlands but is run from London. Arcelor is based in Luxembourg but is run from Paris. Mittal has an enormous market presence in the U.S., giving the Justice Department authority to review the deal if it proceeds. "It's obviously something we'd look at," the Justice official said.

U.S. antitrust enforcers investigated Mittal's last acquisition but cleared it in December 2004 after a product-by-product review. The latest deal would give Mittal 11% of world crude-steel production, with much higher shares in some markets, analysts have said. --John R. Wilke * * *

Voting Block: Nearly half of U.S. states aren't yet in compliance with standards required under the 2002 Help America Vote Act and some are unlikely to meet all requirements in time for this year's mid-term elections, according to a report by

DOJ_NMG_0013915

Electionline.org9. The law, passed in the wake of voting problems during the 2000 presidential election, provided funds to help states upgrade voting machines, create statewide voter databases and improve voter identification.

But states have had trouble meeting the law's January 2006 deadline, Electionline says. New York has struggled to replace lever voting machines with electronic systems and construct a statewide voter database. It faces potential Justice Department action. California has had problems certifying voting machines purchased by some of its cities. And partisan squabbling has complicated efforts in Wisconsin and Ohio to impose voter ID rules. So far, the report says, changes are "not as comprehensive as HAVA's authors had envisioned four years earlier." --Deborah Solomon * * *

Cupid's Calculations: When the Census Bureau combed its files10 for Valentine's Day facts, it found there are 120 single men (never married, widowed or divorced) in their 20s for every 100 single women in their 20s. For those 65 years of age and older, the numbers are even more lopsided: 33 single men for every 100 single women.

Each year, some 2.2 million marriages take place in the U.S. In 2004, 145,800 were performed in Nevada, ranking it the No. 4 state for marriages even though it ranks only 35 for population. The median age for first marriages was 25.8 for women and 27.4 for men in 2004, and the oldest first-time brides and grooms were in the Northeast. (In Massachusetts, the median age for women was 27.4 years and for men, 29.1.)

Census counted some 4.7 million opposite-sex cohabitating couples in 2004. That's 4.2% of all households.

Continuing the counting, the bureau found 1,271 establishments producing chocolate and cocoa products in 2003. California (146) and Pennsylvania (120) topped the list. Shipments of chocolate and cocoa products totaled $13.5 billion. Americans' per capita consumption of candy declined to 24.7 pounds in 2004, down from 27 pounds in 1997. Census tallied 22,022 florists, employing 113,270 people in 2003. And it pinpointed 28,527 jewelry stores, with sales of $2.4 billion (unadjusted) in February 2005.

Citing Hallmark, the Census Bureau figures some 180 million cards are exchanged for Valentine's Day, excluding all those packages of cards kids give their classmates. * * *

Oh Brother! "The president's brother's on board -- Bill Clinton," Scott McClellan said when he dropped by the press pen aboard Air Force One shortly before takeoff to attend the funeral of Coretta Scott King.

Mr. McClellan's joke alluded to the close relationship between Clinton and President Bush's father, who have worked together on aid programs for victims of the tsunami and Hurricane Katrina. Indeed, Clinton was onboard, along with his wife, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton. Four presidents attended the service for King at the New Birth Missionary Baptist Church in Lithonia, Ga.: President Bush, George H.W. Bush, Jimmy Carter and Clinton.

Rhode Island Revelation (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 10, 2006

Let's hope James Carville, Robert Rubin, Nancy Pelosi and other national Democrats are all sitting down for this one: The Rhode Island legislature is considering a flat tax, and the proposal comes from its majority Democrats.

That's right, last week Ocean State Democratic leaders proposed an optional flat rate income tax of 5.5% as an alternative to the current "progressive" tax schedule, which imposes rates ranging from 3.75% to 9.9% for the highest earners. The flat tax is part of a more comprehensive reform plan that would also include a sales tax holiday weekend in August and a full week of relief on "energy efficient" items in March 2007 from the state's 7% sales tax.

And listen to how House Speaker William Murphy pitched the idea at a news conference: "The ultimate goal is to put more money directly into people's pockets both by giving relief to those who need it and by making Rhode Island a more attractive place for business that will provide high-paying jobs for more Rhode Islanders." What's going on here? Have the state's liberals all taken Art Laffer happy pills?

The answer is tax competition, and the discovery that Rhode Island's high tax burden is damaging its economy. Just as the countries of the former Soviet bloc have passed flat taxes to make themselves more competitive, Rhode Island politicians are hoping the idea can help them stop their most talented workers and growth industries from going elsewhere.

DOJ_NMG_0013916

In a recent survey by the Boston-based Beacon Hill Institute -- which measured the economic competitiveness of states based on their ability to generate income and growth -- Rhode Island ranked 37th, or well behind Massachusetts, Vermont, New Hampshire and Connecticut, which were all in the top 20. Only two years ago, Rhode Island ranked 22nd in the same survey.

The Democrats noted in their press release that Rhode Island's current top marginal income tax rate of 9.9% is among the highest of the 41 states with broad-based income taxes. They also cited a study that showed this high marginal rate "might be having an effect on the retention of wealth in Rhode Island by causing retirees and companies to move to states with lower taxes, and causing large companies with multiple locations to put their highest earners somewhere other than Rhode Island."

That "somewhere" else is often just up the road in Massachusetts, which has a 5.3% flat tax. One reason the Bay State, once known as Taxachusetts, cut its tax rate was to be able to compete with nearby New Hampshire, which still has no income tax at all. Bay Staters were moving to southern New Hampshire in droves, taking their tax dollars and high-tech know-how with them.

Rhode Island currently piggybacks the already complicated federal tax system -- residents pay the state 25% of their federal tax liability -- which further increases complexity and costs on businesses and individual filers. By contrast, the proposed flat tax would be levied on adjusted gross income (AGI) with no deductions, exemptions or credits. The fairest taxes are not only simple but are levied on the broadest base possible. And working off AGI is both.

All of this ought to be especially instructive to national Democrats, who typically confront tax cuts with garlic and crosses. It's especially useful to have liberals underscoring that marginal income tax rates matter to incentives, and can drive both investment and workers into lower-tax venues. California and New York liberals still haven't figured that out.

Rhode Island Republicans, including Governor Don Carcieri, were also caught off guard by the Democrats' proposal and now sound like Beltway Democrats in raising objections. House Minority Leader Robert Watson has said he'd like to know how the Democrats "plan on paying for these tax cuts." A spokesman for the Governor had a similar cart-before-the-horse mentality, telling the Providence Journal that "the governor hopes to work with the General Assembly to make the spending cuts necessary to enact real tax relief."

But opposing good policies out of partisanship isn't going to make Rhode Island a more attractive place to work and invest. Tax cuts will. Republicans might try congratulating Democrats for their supply-side revelation, and then join them in doing right by taxpayers.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Sends Congress A Familiar Budget Hit List (WSJ)

By Jackie Calmes

The Wall Street Journal, February 10, 2006

WASHINGTON -- President Bush sent Congress his list of 141 programs to be killed or reduced to achieve almost $15 billion in savings, and almost half are three-time losers -- cuts he proposed for fiscal years 2004, 2005 and 2006, only to be ignored by Congress each time. The total savings are less than 4% of the current year's projected deficit.

If the third time wasn't a charm, the fourth probably won't be either, congressional staffers say. "We look at it," is all one Republican aide would say of the hit list disclosed by the Office of Management and Budget.

Of 91 programs targeted for elimination, 40 are making their fourth annual appearance on the list. Of 50 to be reduced, 20 are perennials. Among those that would get a death sentence -- but for Congress's equally persistent protection -- are the $79 million Advanced Technology Program, $49 million Emergency Steel Guarantee Loan Program and $64 million Oil and Gas Research and Development Program. Each benefits industries that are flourishing right now, administration officials argue.

Also recycled are a raft of education programs -- among them the $99 million Even Start for helping parents and students with literacy, and others for school counseling, alcohol-abuse and drop-out prevention, arts and migrant-education. A $22 million National Writing Project -- to teach teachers how to teach writing -- keeps making the list because it is redundant, OMB said, and because the money goes to a single nonprofit firm that is friendly with an appropriations committee member in Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0013917

Well-placed friends also are certain to help another target -- the $9 million Exchanges with Historic Whaling and Trading Partners program -- escape the president's net. Supporters of the noncompetitive grants, for educational activities for Alaskan, Hawaiian and Massachusetts children on their states' once-vibrant whaling industries, include: former Senate Appropriations Committee Chairman Ted Stevens of Alaska, its senior Democrat, Daniel Inouye of Hawaii, senior Democratic Sen. Ted Kennedy of Massachusetts and -- with Congress's recent decision to add benefits for an Indian tribe in Mississippi -- the new chairman of Senate Appropriations, Thad Cochran of Mississippi.

The single biggest item on Mr. Bush's list, nearly $1.2 billion for grants to states for vocational education, is on it for just the second time. Among the smallest is $1 million for Close Up Fellowships, which long have brought low-income students not long in the country to observe the federal government at work. This is Close Up's fourth straight mention.

Separately yesterday, the liberal Center on Budget and Policy Priorities called into question some of the budget increases Mr. Bush boasts of in the budget he proposed this week for the fiscal year 2007 that starts Oct. 1. Using unreleased data from OMB, the center's analysts found that in the years 2008 to 2011, the Bush administration would make deep cuts in such areas as veterans' health care, health research and student loans.

In a break from past practice, the administration didn't include a five-year breakdown of proposed spending beyond 2007. OMB spokesman Scott Milburn said such out-year projections are speculative at best.

Most Of The Programs On Bush's Budgetary Hit List Are Retreads (USAT)

By Richard Wolf

USA Today, February 10, 2006

WASHINGTON — Most of the 141 programs President Bush wants to cut or eliminate in his 2007 budget are survivors of past Bush hit lists, a list released Thursday by the White House showed.

Of 91 programs proposed for termination, all but 13 have been on the chopping block before. The 13 new programs would save the government $581 million — about 0.02% of the $2.77 trillion budget.

Including the other 50 programs that would be cut but allowed to continue, Bush wants to save $14.7 billion overall, about 0.5% of the budget. Last year, he tried to trim $15.8 billion from 154 programs; Congress agreed to cut $6.5 billion.

All of those numbers are small compared with the big ones in the budget: the skyrocketing costs of Medicare, Medicaid and Social Security, Bush's effort to boost spending on defense and homeland security, and the cost of making his tax cuts permanent.

The White House says the effort to cut or kill relatively small programs is important. Among the new targets is a food program for low-income women, children and seniors and an Internet-based listing of job openings.

"We've got to get away from the idea that it's OK to waste just a little money," says Scott Milburn, spokesman for the White House budget office. "When you've got a $2.77 trillion budget, a lot of little problems add up to big money."

Milburn says the White House is making headway, even if Congress doesn't go along completely. He points out that of the 78 programs Bush has again asked Congress to kill, lawmakers reduced funding last year in 33.

Budget watchdog groups want Bush to cut more. Keith Ashdown of Taxpayers for Common Sense says the president is focused only on domestic programs.

"They're leaving war-on-terrorism and defense spending off the table," Ashdown says. "They're basically trying to cut from around 13% to 15% of the budget. It leaves you with fewer oxes to gore."

Bush is being criticized by conservatives as too cautious in his cuts and by liberals as too brazen:

•"There is no shortage of candidates for elimination," says Brian Riedl of the conservative Heritage Foundation. "There is only the shortage of political will to make the difficult decisions."

•"Every year they propose the same drastic cuts," says Kirstin Brost, spokeswoman for Rep. David Obey, D-Wis., top Democrat on the House Appropriations Committee. "They've cut programs that help average Americans to the bone to pay for supersized tax cuts for millionaires."

Bush Calls For Eliminating Program For Needy Seniors (AP)

By frederic frommer

DOJ_NMG_0013918

The Associated Press, February 10, 2006

President Bush wants to eliminate a program that provides poor seniors with vegetables, peanut butter and other nutritious foods, proposing that recipients be moved to food stamps.

But critics argue that the change, part of the President's budget plan, will leave the seniors worse off than they are now.

The Commodity Supplemental Food Program, targeted for the chopping block, provides nutritionally balanced boxes of food to about a half-million poor people monthly, including nearly 14,000 in Minnesota. The majority of beneficiaries are elderly, although some women and children also participate.

The Department of Agriculture, which administers the CSFP program, proposes moving recipients to food stamps starting in the fiscal year that begins Oct. 1. But CSFP advocates say that many seniors are reluctant to sign up for food stamps and that, in any event, the CSFP often provides a more generous package.

The proposal could face an uphill battle on Capitol Hill. Wisconsin Sen. Herb Kohl, the ranking Democrat on the Senate Appropriations agriculture subcommittee, said he would oppose it.

"I call it misplaced priorities. How do you justify doing something like this, while at the same time giving people like Herb Kohl huge tax cuts?" said Kohl, a multimillionaire.

"It really does come under the category, in the most extreme way, of balancing the budget on the backs of those who are most needy. And in this case we're not even balancing the budget."

Congress funded about $111 million for the program in the current fiscal year, including a $4 million supplement for victims of Hurricane Katrina.

The CSFP program, which dates back to 1968, operates in 32 states and the District of Columbia. Its lack of national reach is one reason the administration wants to eliminate it, according to USDA officials.

Kate Coler, the USDA's deputy under secretary for Food, Nutrition and Consumer Services, said the department believes it can serve people more efficiently through food stamps and the Women, Infants and Children program, which are both nationwide.

"It's really a duplicative program," she said of CSFP.

Recipients of CSFP boxes receive powdered milk, vegetables, cereal, juice, meat, fruit, protein (peanut butter or beans), starch (such as dehydrated potatoes, rice or pasta) and cheese.

"When I heard about this, my first thought was, 'What are they thinking?'" said R. Jane Brown, Executive Director of the Second Harvest Heartland in Maplewood, Minn. Brown's hunger relief organization administers the CSFP program for the Twin Cities and central and western Minnesota.

"It's a program that everyone who has benefited from has nothing but good stories to tell about it."

Sarah Mayek, 75, of Milwaukee, receives both the CSFP box and $10 a month for food stamps.

"You try to stretch your budget a little bit," Mayek said. Without CSFP, she said, "I would have to adjust. But I raised 11 children. I know how to cut corners."

Tim Robertson, president of the National CSFP Association, which represents state and local organizations that administer the program, challenged the USDA's premise that people will switch over to food stamps.

"Seniors have repeatedly said they don't want to be on that program," Robertson said, because of the perceived stigma of using food stamps and the paperwork hassles.

The USDA's own statistics show that just 28 percent of seniors eligible for food stamps participate in the program.

Jean Daniel, a spokeswoman for the USDA's Food and Nutrition Service, said her agency is working to remove the perceived stigma. For example, she said, the agency is getting the word out that food stamp payments are now made by an electronic transfer card, not actual stamps.

"We try to make the point that this is not a welfare program, this is a nutritional assistance program," she said.

Lawmakers Slam Bush Cut In Weatherization Funds (REU)

By Tom Doggett

Reuters, February 10, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0013919

Democratic lawmakers on Thursday slammed the Bush administration's proposal to cut funds for a government program that helps poor people weatherize their homes, even though the White House's energy task force recommended increasing money for the program.

The administration wants to gut 32 percent of the money in the Energy Department's budget for weatherization assistance grants, which help low-income families buy storm windows and insulation for their homes to make them more energy-efficient. The program's funding would fall to $164.2 million.

Sen. Jeff Bingaman, the top Democrat on the Senate Energy Committee, said slashing the program's funds did not make much sense "at a time when home energy bills are at historically high levels."

Bingaman, speaking at committee hearing on the Energy Department budget, pointed out President George W. Bush pledged during this 2000 campaign to nearly double funding for the program and the White House energy task force headed by Vice President Dick Cheney called for more weatherization funds.

The administration's request of $164.2 million for the weatherization program is not only a cut, but is also short of the $600 million Congress authorized for the program in a sweeping energy bill that Bush signed into law last August.

Energy Secretary Sam Bodman defended what he described as a "painful" cut in the program's budget, saying the department had a limited amount of money and it was targeted to programs that have the most promising results.

"I personally made this decision (to reduce the weatherization funds) as it came across my desk, and it was strictly knowing how much money I had to spend and where I had to put the funds," he said.

Bodman said the lower budget for the program would still pay for weatherizing 64,000 homes in the 2007 spending year. But that's down from 97,000 homes at current funding levels.

Democratic Sen. Robert Menendez of New Jersey said cutting the program would hurt the neediest Americans who require help to save on their high energy costs.

"The recipients of this (program) are the people who are on lowest levels of economic opportunity in our society," he said. "They are the elderly. They are poor families with children. They are the disabled. They are the least capable of meeting their energy needs and they will be coldest, if we don't have the type of robust weatherization program that we should have."

Environmental and consumer groups have also come out against reducing the budget for the weatherization program, which has proven to save energy at the same time Bush calls for the United States to reduce its foreign energy imports.

"The only way to ease the pain of record energy prices for consumers and businesses alike, and to address critical energy-related security and environmental issues, is to back up the rhetoric with the reality of adequate federal funding for key energy-efficiency programs," said Kateri Callahan, president of the Alliance to Save Energy.

Sen. Pete Domenici (news, bio, voting record), who chairs the Senate's energy committee, told reporters that lawmakers would likely restore some of weatherization funds the administration wants to cut.

White House Seeks To Make Case For Programs Cuts (REU-Y2)

By Caren Bohan

Reuters, February 10, 2006

The White House defended reductions in programs from veterans healthcare to housing on Thursday as it sought to persuade a reluctant Congress to enact its proposals for 141 domestic spending cuts.

President George W. Bush, who unveiled a $2.77 trillion budget for fiscal 2007 on Monday, said the government could save nearly $15 billion from the cuts.

The proposals include requiring that higher-income veterans pay more for their medical care, eliminating a writing program in public schools and the consolidation of housing programs.

The White House says the cuts target programs that were either not performing well or not fulfilling important functions.

But the proposals have gotten a wary reception in Congress, with Democrats lashing out at Bush for pushing tax cuts for the rich while reducing programs for the poor and middle class.

Even prominent members of Bush's Republican party criticized his budget.

DOJ_NMG_0013920

House Appropriations Committee Chairman Jerry Lewis complained about "fees and gimmicks," which he said the White House knows Congress will again reject, but give Bush leeway to propose spending increases in favored areas such as defense.

"These proposals make a difficult appropriations season even harder," said the California Republican, who must steer a series of spending bills through Congress this summer that uphold a budget blueprint Republicans hope to pass.

Of the savings proposals, 22 of the 141 are new. The rest revive reductions that Congress either rejected or adopted only in part last year.

ARRAY OF CUTS

Following are details on some of them:

* A monthly food package to help poor women, children and the elderly would be eliminated. The White House said part of its mission overlaps with the more effective nutrition program for Women, Infants and Children. It said the elderly could receive temporary benefits and be shifted to food stamps.

* Nineteen small education plans such as a writing program and one for economic education would be terminated. The White House said states can support the activities through federal grants giving them the discretion on how to spend the money.

* A program to provide block grants to states to improve juvenile justice system would be eliminated. The administration said the program has not been effective and is not needed with crime at historic lows.

* The White House would cut $30 million from an Internal Revenue Service modernization program that will encourage more electronic filing and use of the Internet for tax services. The White House said the program has had some success but is moving ahead more slowly than expected.

* A program for public-housing modernization and renovation would be reduced by 11 percent, with the savings redirected toward programs such as housing block grants for states and rental assistance.

* A program of revolving loans for clean water programs for states would be pared back. The administration said that over the past three years Congress has given the program more money than requested and therefore it needs less funding in 2007.

* The White House would require higher-income veterans with no disabilities to pay a $250 annual enrollment fee for medical care and raise co-pays for their drug purchases to $15 from $8. The administration said the change would allow the veterans' health program to focus on its core mission of helping poor veterans and those with special needs or disabilities.

Congress Fixes Error In $39 Bln Spending-cut Law (REU-Y2)

Reuters, February 10, 2006

The Senate and House have passed legislation aimed at ending confusion over a $39-billion spending-cut bill signed into law by President Bush on Wednesday, which varied slightly from the final version passed by the House.

The two chambers passed the fix late on Wednesday, hours after the technical problem was discovered and the bill was enacted into law with Bush's signature.

The problem stemmed from a typographical error written into the contentious bill as it bounced back and forth from the House and Senate since December.

The clerical error involved Medicare payments for the rental of medical equipment such as oxygen tanks. The version signed by Bush contained the payment schedule intended by both chambers, but not contained in the final House-passed bill.

The legislative fix stated that the version signed by the president reflected "the intent of the Congress in enacting the bill into law."

The spending-cut bill cuts domestic programs, including health care for the poor and elderly, raises some student loan costs and cuts federal enforcement of child support payments. Democrats and some moderate Republicans boycotted the measure and it only passed the Senate in December after Vice President Dick Cheney cast a rare tie-breaking vote.

Democrats on the House and Senate budget committees were not available for comment on whether they would challenge the propriety of Bush signing a bill that technically was not passed in identical form by both chambers.

The Vanishing Future (NYT)

By Paul Krugman

The New York Times, February 10, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0013921

At this point we've had six years to grow accustomed to Bush budget chicanery. (Yes, six years: George W. Bush's special mix of blatant dishonesty and gross irresponsibility was fully visible during the 2000 presidential campaign.) What still amazes me, however, is the sheer childishness of the administration's denials and deceptions.

Consider the case of the vanishing future.

The story begins in 2001, when President Bush was pushing his first tax cut through Congress. At the time, the administration insisted that its tax-cut plans wouldn't endanger the budget surplus bequeathed to Mr. Bush by Bill Clinton. But even some Republican senators were skeptical. So the Senate demanded a cap on the tax cut: it should not reduce revenue over the period from 2001 to 2011 by more than $1.35 trillion.

The administration met this requirement, but not by scaling back its tax-cutting ambitions. Instead, it created fictitious savings by "sunsetting" the tax cut, making the whole thing expire at the end of 2010.

This was obviously silly. For example, under the law as written there will be no federal tax on the estates of wealthy people who die in 2010. But the estate tax will return in 2011 with a maximum rate of 55 percent, creating some interesting incentives.

I suggested, back in 2001, that the legislation be renamed the Throw Momma From the Train Act.

It was also obvious that the administration had no intention of abiding by its concession to fiscal prudence, that it would try to eliminate the sunset clause and make the tax cuts permanent.

But it quickly became clear that the budget forecasts the administration used to justify the 2001 tax cut were wildly overoptimistic. The federal government faced a future of deficits, not surpluses, as far as the eye could see. Making the tax cut permanent would greatly worsen those future deficits. What were budget officials to do?

You almost have to admire their brazenness: they made the future disappear.

Clinton-era budgets offered 10-year projections of spending and revenues. But the Bush administration slashed the budget horizon to five years. This artificial shortsightedness greatly aided the campaign to make the 2001 tax cut permanent because it hid the costs: since budget analyses no longer covered the years after 2010, the revenue losses from extending the tax cut became invisible.

But now it's 2006, and even a five-year projection covers the period from 2007 to 2011, which means including a year in which making the Bush tax cuts permanent will cost a lot of revenue — $119.7 billion, but who's counting? Has the administration finally run out of ways to avoid budget reality?

Not quite. As the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities points out, until this year budget documents contained a standard table titled "Impact of Budget Policy," which summarized the effects of the administration's tax and spending proposals on future outlays and revenues. But this year, that table is missing. So you have to do some detective work to figure out what's really going on.

Now, the administration has proposed spending cuts that are both cruel and implausible. For example, administration computer printouts obtained by the center show that the budget calls for a 13 percent cut in spending on veterans' health care, adjusted for inflation, over the next five years.

Yet even these cuts would fall far short of making up for the revenue losses from making the tax cuts permanent. The administration's own estimate, which can be deduced from its budget tables, is that extending the tax cuts would cost an average of $235 billion in each year from 2012 through 2016.

In other words, the administration has no idea how to make its tax cuts feasible in the long run. Yet it has never, as far as I can tell, allowed unfavorable facts to affect its determination to make the tax cuts permanent. Instead, it has devoted all its efforts to hiding those awkward facts from public view. (Any resemblance to, say, its Iraq strategy is no coincidence.)

At this point the administration's budget strategy seems to be simply to ignore reality. The 2007 budget makes it clear, once and for all, that the tax cuts can't be offset with spending cuts. But Bush officials have decided to ignore that unpleasant fact, and let some future administration deal with the mess they have created.

Iraq, Not Homeland, Bush Budget Buster (USAT)

USA Today, February 10, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0013922

President Bush submitted a budget to Congress this week that is so big, most of us just shrug it off without thinking about what it means to us individually. Think about this:

• The $2.77 trillion budget for the fiscal year starting in October breaks down to an average of $9,293.62 for everyone in the USA.

• The latest budget request for Iraq of about $96 billion brings the cost of that war to $322 billion, an average of $1,080.34 per person.

If you think big business or somebody else will pay the bill, think again. About 45% of the federal government's revenue comes from individual income taxes.

The income tax is the fairest tax we have. Paying more for education, health care, Social Security, real "homeland security" and the most modern military equipment and decent pay for servicemen and women doesn't bother me. But ...

Bush simply can't convince me on continuing the cost in Iraq — in dollars and, more important, in precious lives -for a war that he never should have started.

The $20 billion-plus for Afghanistan in the new budget is another matter. That's where several of the terrorists came from who hit us on 9/11. That's where we should have concentrated and continued the hunt for Osama bin Laden and his gang.

Instead, Bush got sidetracked to Iraq. Paraphrasing poet Robert Frost: Two roads diverged in the woods and I ... I took the one I shouldn't have traveled by.

"Staying the course" on that wrong road will not bankrupt us financially. But it is busting our budget, continuing to cost countless innocent lives, and making us look morally bankrupt in the eyes of much of the rest of the world.

Pentagon Budget 'A Great Surprise' (WP)

By Renae Merle

The Washington Post, February 10, 2006

Richard Bernstein, like many other defense contractors, was anxious as the Pentagon spending blueprint for fiscal 2007 was being developed in recent months. "There were a lot of rumors that the defense budget would get cut back, and there was some concern," recalled Bernstein, president of BAI Aerosystems Inc, a small dronemaker in Maryland.

When that Defense Department budget was unveiled Monday, however, Bernstein and most other defense executives were relieved. The $439 billion proposal would increase spending on weapons to $84.2 billion, $8 billion more than this year, and includes $1.7 billion for unmanned aerial vehicles, an increase of about 3 percent, to begin buying 322 of the pilotless planes over the next five years. "It was a great surprise," said Bernstein, who read the budget proposal on the Internet from Australia, where he was attending an industry trade show.

The proposed 7 percent increase in the budget for weapons procurement and research and development is twice that expected by Troy Lahr, a defense analyst at investment bank Stifel, Nicolaus & Co. "And we were among the more bullish," said Lahr, noting that most of his counterparts were expecting the budget to remain flat or increase 1 percent to 2 percent.

The Pentagon probably reasoned that members of Congress would be reluctant to make significant cuts that could cost jobs in their districts with midterm elections near, analysts said. Last year, Congress rejected cuts to retire an aircraft carrier and scale back production of the C-130J cargo jet.

"It might be easier to close bases in Germany than tackle the U.S. industrial complex," said Michael E. O'Hanlon, a senior fellow at the Brookings Institution.

One negative surprise was slower growth than expected in the Pentagon's information technology budget. It would increase less than 1 percent, to $30.54 billion, in the fiscal year starting Oct. 1. Overall, government information technology spending would increase 2.8 percent, to $64.29 billion. That is significantly slower than the 5 percent to 6 percent increases the IT industry has been used to receiving since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

Dendy Young, chairman and chief executive of Chantilly-based GTSI Corp., which develops and maintains computer systems for the government, said, "I am concerned that the priority for IT investment seems to be declining."

To be sure, the budget proposal includes some cuts. Despite the objections of British Prime Minister Tony Blair, it would cancel an engine being developed by London-based Rolls-Royce PLC and General Electric Co. of Connecticut for the F-35

DOJ_NMG_0013923

Joint Strike Fighter. "We were surprised that the DoD has decided they no longer need the engine," said Mike Ryan, Rolls-Royce's executive vice president of government business. Ryan estimates that the government spent $1.2 billion through 2005 on the engine.

And the Air Force would limit to 180 the total number of Boeing C-17 cargo jets being built, despite lobbying by officials from Long Beach, Calif., where the plane is made, to keep the production line open. "We're a little disappointed," said Robert M. Swayze, economic development bureau manager for the city. City officials will probably join companies that supply parts for the plane in a District rally being planned by Boeing to oppose the decision, he said.

The overall defense-funding proposal is a relief for Wall Street. After being sluggish for months, for example, shares of Lockheed Martin Corp. closed at $70.62 yesterday, compared with $68.92 last Friday and a 52-week low of $58.28.

But many industry experts remain convinced that defense spending will inevitably fall because of the budget deficit and the cost of fighting the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan. In a conference call with analysts last week, Boeing Chairman Jim McNerney warned that the company expected "defense growth to moderate due to a tightening budget environment." The 2007 budget proposal does not change that outlook, said company spokesman Todd Blecher.

The administration spending plan just postpones the inevitable, some industry analysts said, noting the mismatch between the projected budget level over the next few years and the costs of the programs. Manufacturers have defended spending on Cold War-era legacy programs by modifying them. The F-22 fighter, designed to shoot down Soviet MiGs, is now the F/A-22, adding a ground support role. Four giant Ohio-class submarines, built to carry nuclear missiles targeted at the Soviet Union, are being converted to carry shorter-range cruise missiles and Navy SEALs and other special operations troops.

As the Pentagon spends more on initiatives to transform the military to combat insurgents and other nontraditional threats, supporting expensive traditional weapons will become more difficult, some analysts predict.

"Here is the problem: People like me have been talking about the coming train wreck for so long now that people are tired of hearing it," said Christopher Hellman, director of the project on military spending oversight at the Center for Arms Control and Non-Proliferation. "But the truth of the matter is that it will happen; we're not making it up."

Still Shortchanging The Troops (NYT)

The New York Times, February 10, 2006

It's amazing how Donald Rumsfeld's Defense Department can produce a $439 billion spending plan and still skimp on the one thing the American military desperately needs: expanded ground forces so the weakened and cannibalized Army can meet the requirements of Iraq without hurting its ability to respond to other threats.

While the Pentagon intends to increase pay and recruitment bonuses, no part of its nearly 7 percent budget increase is aimed at raising overall troop strength. Instead, a large chunk of this nearly $30 billion bonanza goes to buying more new weapons and postponing overdue cuts in wasteful Air Force and Navy projects unrelated to fighting terrorism.

The prospects for Iraq might be very different today if Mr. Rumsfeld had listened to some of his own senior generals and occupation officials and authorized significantly larger ground forces from the beginning. The early looting might have been contained before it shattered political confidence and vital infrastructure. The insurgency might never have gotten such a head start. The incineration tactics of Falluja and the Abu Ghraib nightmare might have been avoided. And the Army's downward spiral of readiness, recruitment and morale might never have begun. But the obstinate ideologues in Mr. Rumsfeld's Pentagon have never accepted the fact that the reality of Iraq did not fit their assumptions. The budget and the four-year plan released with it read almost as if the current conflict had never happened and could never happen again.

Instead of reallocating resources toward the real threats America faces, the military services continue to pour their money into fighting fictive superpowers in the wild blue yonder and on and below the seven seas. Pentagon budgeters showed themselves so pathetically unable to restrain spending on expensive ships and planes that they actually cut back, rather than increased, the overall size of the Army over the next few years to pay for it.

It would cost about $4 billion to $5 billion a year to give the Army 30,000 more troops, the minimum it needs to check its alarming slide. Instead the Pentagon chose to begin the construction of two unneeded new stealth destroyers, which will end up costing $2 billion to $3 billion each.

DOJ_NMG_0013924

It also decided to splurge on a new nuclear attack submarine for $2.6 billion and to shell out $5.5 billion for separate Navy and Air Force versions of new stealth fighter jets, plus another $5.5 billion for yet a third version that either can use. In all, the Pentagon is asking for $84 billion to buy weapons systems (twice what it got in 1996) and $73 billion more for research and development.

This budget would be wasteful even under a worst-case assumption that had a second superpower arising within the lifespan of these weapons, turning hostile to America and arming itself to the teeth with the most advanced weapons. There's still unnecessary spending that could be used to repair the Army, which has been ground down at least as much by Pentagon miserliness as by Iraqi insurgents.

The military contractors are doing just fine. It's the troops in Iraq who need help from Washington.

Bush's Domestic Policy Adviser Resigns (NSDY/AP)

By Associated Press

Long Island Newsday, February 10, 2006

WASHINGTON -- President Bush's domestic policy adviser, Claude Allen, has resigned to spend more time with his family, the White House said Thursday.

Allen has been working for the administration since Bush's first year in office -- first as the No. 2 official at the Health and Human Services Department, and for the last year as domestic policy adviser in the White House.

In a statement, Bush said Allen has helped develop policies that have strengthened the country's families, schools and communities. Bush thanked Allen for "his many years of principled and dedicated service to our country."

Allen, a father of four and former attorney, did not respond to inquiries asking about his departure or future job plans. His office referred calls to the White House press office, which said he will be taking some time off to spend more time with his family.

Press secretary Scott McClellan said Allen had been considering his resignation for several weeks, but decided to stay on through last week's State of the Union address.

In his resignation letter, Allen thanked the president for the opportunity to serve and said he treasured his time working for the administration. "Although this is a difficult decision, it is the best decision for my family," the letter said.

Bush Wins Praise For Competitiveness Plan (MBSN)

By Martin Crutsinger

Myrtle Beach (SC) Sun News, February 10, 2006

WASHINGTON - President Bush's plan to boost the competitiveness of U.S. industry through innovation won support from members of Congress Thursday, although Democrats criticized the initiative for slashing some education programs to pay for more spending on math and science.

Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez won widespread support from members of the House Government Reform Committee for Bush's "American Competitiveness Initiative," one of the biggest new programs in the budget Bush sent to Congress on Monday.

The initiative, which the president highlighted in his State of the Union address, would double government funding for basic research in the physical sciences, train thousands of new science and math teachers and extend a popular tax credit businesses can receive for investing in research and development. The total pricetag over 10 years would be $136 billion.

Gutierrez said country had a choice on how it would respond to increased global competition from countries such as China and India.

"Some want to respond by retreating into isolationism," Gutierrez said. He said the alternative offered by the president through the competitiveness initiative was "maintaining our leadership by competing with confidence."

Committee Chairman Tom Davis, R-Va., said he believed there was a need to boost math and science teaching in high schools to reverse a slide in which the country's colleges are graduating fewer engineers today than 20 years ago.

But Rep. Chris Van Hollen, D-Md., said he was concerned because while Bush's budget called for increasing areas of the Education Department budget to train 70,000 new math and science teachers and to attract 30,000 math and science professionals to tutor in the schools, the money was taken from other education programs.

DOJ_NMG_0013925

For the second straight year, Bush's new budget would cut overall discretionary spending for education programs. He also asked Congress to eliminate 42 education programs he deemed unnecessary or inefficient, covering such areas as providing money for the arts, parent-resource centers and drug-free schools.

Van Hollen said he was also concerned that Bush was scrimping on the necessary support for the National Institutes of Health, including his proposal to trim spending for 18 of the 19 medical research institutes, calling cutbacks in these areas a mistake given the need to maintain the country's lead in medical research.

Gutierrez, however, said that the president's budget was seeking to find the right priorities for spending while at the same time pursuing Bush's goal of cutting the deficit in half by 2009.

Gutierrez urged individual members of Congress to refrain from inserting money into budget bills for pet projects, a process known as "earmarking."

"The most successful research is based on careful planning and merit-based peer review," Gutierrez said. "So to maximize the impact of (American Competitiveness Initiative) research, we encourage Congress to resist earmarking scientific research funding."

Can Bush Make America More Competitive In Math And Science? (CSM)

By Linda Feldmann, Staff Writer Of The Christian Science Monitor

The Christian Science Monitor, February 10, 2006

WASHINGTON - Americans have heard the warnings for decades: The nation is in danger of falling behind other technological powerhouses in the world, posing a threat to its way of life. In the 1950s, it was the Soviet Union; in the 1980s, Japan. Now the big competitors are India and China.

President Bush's competitiveness initiative, outlined in his federal budget, would focus $136 billion over 10 years on boosting research and education. Much of that cost would come in the form of tax incentives for research and development; the rest represents new funding, including a doubling of the budgets of three federal agencies focused on science and technology.

The education piece of Mr. Bush's plan seems relatively small - $380 million in fiscal 2007 - but it is getting most of the attention. From that, $90 million would go to boost the ranks of students taking Advanced Placement and International Baccalaureate classes in math, science, and foreign languages by training 70,000 additional teachers in those subject areas in high-poverty high schools.

Overall, Bush's AP Incentive Program aims to boost the number of students taking AP math and science exams from 380,000 today to 1.5 million in 2012.

In a nation that seems to have a cultural aversion to tackling "hard" subjects like math and science, can those numbers be achieved? And without the stark image of Sputnik - the Soviet satellite whose launch in 1957 caught the US by surprise - to spur a fear of national decline, will the nation rally to the "competitiveness" cause and push Congress to fund the plan?

After all, in earlier waves of national concern about competitiveness, education reform fell short and yet the US still leads the world in economic might and innovation, says Michael Petrilli, vice president of the Fordham Foundation, a school-reform think tank.

"But I think, as Tom Friedman argued in his bestselling book, the economy is fundamentally different today," Mr. Petrilli says. "If our kids are going to have an opportunity to have good-paying jobs and enjoy the lifestyle they're used to, they're going to have to be able to use their brains. By any measure, our students are falling behind the rest of the world, especially in math and science."

The recent growth in participation in the College Board's Advanced Placement Program provides cause for hope. On Tuesday, the program reported an increase in success by high school students in all 50 states and the District of Columbia in AP courses over the past five years. The proportion of high school students passing AP exams - earning at least a 3 on a 5-point scale - has jumped from 10 percent to 14 percent since 2000.

Minority students remain underrepresented. Though African-Americans make up 13 percent of the high school population, they are 6 percent of AP test-takers. Native Americans make up 1 percent of students, but 0.5 percent of the AP population. The news is better for Latinos, who represent 13 percent of the student population and 13 percent of AP test-takers.

DOJ_NMG_0013926

One constituency supportive of the president's education initiative is the business community, which fears that a future of unqualified American students will harm the bottom line. But some education analysts worry that - among the issues on business's plate, including tax cuts - education funding won't be high on the agenda when it comes time to lobby Congress.

"We are very willing to go to the mat on this," says Susan Traiman of the Education and Workforce Policy at the Business Roundtable. In the National Academy of Sciences report from last fall, which served as a blueprint for Bush's competitiveness initiative, the first recommendation centered on education, she notes.

"With the coming retirement of baby boomers who are in the science and engineering workforce, we need to make sure we have young people coming up behind them ready to enter those careers," Ms. Traiman says.

Education experts are also wondering whether Bush's first-term education initiative - No Child Left Behind (NCLB), which aims to improve the achievement of low performers - will work at cross-purposes with the American Competitiveness Initiative. The FY 2007 budget for the Department of Education took a big hit - a 5.5 percent reduction. Education Secretary Margaret Spellings maintains that the department can do both: raise the bottom and enhance achievement at the top. The budget would boost funding for NCLB by 4.6 percent.

Given the other education programs slated for abolition, many of them aimed at inner-city students, skepticism remains.

"I doubt whether most of this competitiveness stuff will be funded," says John Jennings of the nonprofit Center on Education Policy. "He's asking for so much less for education, and asking to eliminate so many popular ... programs. I find it hard to believe Congress will eliminate these programs and create new programs."

bush advisor to visit (RNO)

Raleigh News & Observer, February 10, 2006

North Carolina likes to think of itself as a hotbed of innovation.

Apparently, the Bush administration is keying in on that reputation.

For the second time in a week, a senior Bush adviser will visit the state to discuss the president's "American Competitiveness Initiative." Commerce Secretary Carlos M. Gutierrez, right, this morning will meet with business and education leaders at IBM's Research Triangle Park campus to promote the stronger focus on technological and scientific innovation.

Bush's initiative is meant to increase competitiveness with other nations. Treasury Secretary John W. Snow touted the effort in Kannapolis last week.

TRADE GAP REPORT TO BE RELEASED

The Commerce Department releases its monthly trade report today, and some economists predict that the U.S. trade deficit -- aggravated by energy costs and Chinese imports -- widened in December and set an all-time high for the year.

The increase in the deficit last year has prompted U.S. lawmakers to increase criticism of China, which they claim keeps the value of its currency artificially low, making its exports less expensive to U.S. consumers.

The projected December shortfall of $64.9 billion would be the third-largest ever, and follows a $64.2 billion November gap. It would bring the 2005 trade deficit to $727 billion.

Ethics Scandal Looms Over Republicans' Retreat (REU-Y2)

By Thomas Ferraro

Reuters, February 10, 2006

Republicans in the U.S. House of Representatives, rocked by an ethics scandal, gathered at a secluded Maryland town on Thursday for a retreat, hoping to regroup under new leadership and position themselves to retain power in November's elections.

A week after electing Rep. John Boehner (news, bio, voting record) of Ohio as majority leader in place of the indicted Texan Tom DeLay, the Republicans were to hold three days of meetings at a hotel in Cambridge, Maryland, a two-hour bus ride from Washington.

Lobbying scandals and Justice Department investigations involving Republican lawmakers and former aides threaten the party's control of the House, which it has held since 1995.

Boehner said the retreat would allow a "period of renewal," but gave no hint whether he could quickly unite his 231-member caucus on lobbying reform. House Speaker Dennis Hastert, an Illinois Republican, has said this is his top priority.

DOJ_NMG_0013927

In the wake of a scandal involving Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff, Boehner has called for more public disclosure of the relationships between lawmakers and lobbyists rather than a fundamental overhaul of the way Congress does business.

Unlike some of his colleagues, he is also opposed to abolishing so-called "earmark" spending for pet projects, urging instead more transparency.

President George W. Bush who, along with fellow Republicans in Congress has been battered by slumping poll numbers, was to speak to the group on Friday.

"I think you have some nervous Republicans who are looking at a political environment that is very dangerous for their party," said Amy Walter of the nonpartisan Cook Political Report.

A number of senior Republicans have been drawn into the investigation into Abramoff, who pleaded guilty last month to fraud charges and agreed to help prosecutors in their corruption probe.

Ethan Siegal of the Washington Exchange, a private group that tracks legislation and politics for institutional investors, said, "House Republicans need to focus on an agenda that plays to their (conservative) base and demonstrates to the voting public at large that they are competent and deserve to remain in power."

There was also concern about Bush's proposed $2.77 trillion budget submitted this week that would boost defense spending, slow the growth of Medicare and cut a host of domestic programs in an effort to soothe Republican worries over high deficits.

Boehner was the upset winner of a House Republican leadership election last week, defeating Roy Blunt of Missouri. Blunt was seen by some as too close to DeLay, who was forced to step down as majority leader last year after being indicted in Texas on campaign-related felony charges.

Other likely topics for the meeting included energy prices, health care, national security, the Iraq war, immigration and education.

GOP Gets Quick Course In Ethics (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, February 10, 2006

CAMBRIDGE, Md. -- House Republicans will get a refresher course on ethics tomorrow as part of their three-day retreat to discuss lobby and ethics reforms and try to clarify a vision for 2006.

Rep. Doc Hastings of Washington, chairman of the ethics committee, will review the code of conduct for the 180 Republicans who have gathered at a conference center on Maryland's Eastern Shore.

They will hear a pep talk from President Bush today.

Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman told the lawmakers yesterday that Democrats are failing to capitalize on Republican ethics questions ahead of difficult midterm congressional elections in November.

Mr. Mehlman said politics is supposed to be a zero-sum situation: If one party is doing poorly, the other does well. But Republicans' travails have not helped Democrats, he said.

"The law of political physics is being defied by Nancy Pelosi, Howard Dean and Harry Reid," he said, referring to the top Democrats in the House, the national party and the Senate.

Mr. Mehlman said more of the electorate is voting based on ideology, providing a cushion for the president's lower approval numbers and a general feeling that the country is moving in the wrong direction.

Rep. David Dreier of California, chairman of the Rules Committee, rejected calls by Democrats and some Republicans to alter the way the House debates and votes, including lag time to read legislation and a time limit on floor votes.

The current rules set a minimum but not a maximum time limit.

The Republican leadership has been accused of abusing the rule, most notably in the 2003 vote on the Medicare prescription-drug legislation.

That three-hour vote included heavy persuasion, and the ethics committee admonished Rep. Tom DeLay, Texas Republican, for the appearance of trying to strong-arm a Republican colleague.

DOJ_NMG_0013928

Top House Democrats wrote a letter calling for fewer "closed rules" that prevent amendments and a requirement that measures be available for 24 hours before they are brought up for a floor vote.

Mr. Dreier told reporters that Republicans already allow Democrats to have a substitute on most bills, and said more Democratic amendments were allowed last year than Republican amendments.

Although Republicans want reforms to be bipartisan, he said, their priority is "moving the Republican agenda."

"There's no reason in the world we should be tying hands," Mr. Dreier said.

Sen. McCain Leads Effort To Cut Earmarks (AP-Y2)

By Jim Abrams

AP2, February 10, 2006

Ten senators led by Sen. John McCain (news, bio, voting record) took on the Senate's much maligned practice of inserting individual members' special projects, often without the knowledge of their colleagues, into larger spending bills.

The "Pork-Barrel Reduction Act," introduced Thursday by eight Republicans and two Democrats, is the latest in a rash of proposals promoting ways to restore integrity to the political process in the wake of lobbying and ethics scandals.

McCain's bill would allow senators to raise points of order against special projects, or earmarks, that are attached to spending bills without having been approved by the relevant committee. Under the procedure, which also applies to policy changes embedded in spending bills, 60 votes would be needed to override the point of order and keep the provision in the bill.

The measure also would require that earmarks be described in detail and the sponsor identified. House-Senate compromise bills would have to be made public at least 48 hours before the Senate considers them.

Critics of earmarks complain they are often put in bills only after the bills have passed the House or Senate, and that lawmakers are forced to vote on massive spending bills put together by House-Senate negotiators without knowing what's in them.

According to a Congressional Research Service study, the number of earmarks in spending, or appropriations, bills went from 4,126 in 1994 to 15,877 in 2005. The value of those earmarks doubled to $47.4 billion in the same period.

"It's a relatively recent phenomenon that members of Congress have begun to believe that their political support is only or largely determined by a number," Sen. John Sununu (news, bio, voting record), R-N.H., said of the desire of lawmakers to secure projects they can brag about back home.

The bill introduced by McCain, R-Ariz., is one of several to tackle the earmarks issue. Senate Rules Committee Chairman Trent Lott, R-Miss., and Sen. Dianne Feinstein (news, bio, voting record), D-Calif., have a similar bill, and Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., also has a plan.

In the House, Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi on Thursday wrote new Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, Thursday urging him to move on both lobbying and House procedural reform, including putting an end to secret earmarks and earmarks that fund activities in which the author has a financial interest.

"If we want to stay the majority as a party," said Sen. Lindsey Graham (news, bio, voting record), R-S.C., a cosponsor of the McCain bill, "we will reform the way we've been doing business the last few years or we will lose."

McCain said the Jack Abramoff lobbying scandal, which has exposed the sometimes unsavory ties between lobbyists and members of Congress, has set the stage for passing legislation that can both make congressional procedures more open and deal with such issues as limiting gifts and travel arranged by lobbyists. "The Abramoff thing is a long way from over," he said.

Also on Thursday, Sens. John Kerry, D-Mass., and Ken Salazar, D-Colo., introduced a bill that would deny federal pension benefits to members of Congress convicted of bribery, conspiracy or other serious ethics offenses.

Just Say No To Earmarks (WSJ)

By Tom Coburn

The Wall Street Journal, February 10, 2006

John McCain and I recently delivered a letter to our colleagues announcing our intention to challenge every individual earmark on the floor of the Senate. Many senators, staff and reporters have asked if we are serious. The answer is yes.

DOJ_NMG_0013929

I am convinced that forcing hundreds or, if necessary, thousands of votes to strike individual earmarks is the only way to produce meaningful results for American taxpayers. Bringing the Senate to a standstill for as long as it takes would be a small price to pay for shutting down what Jack Abramoff described as Congress's "earmark favor factory." The battle against pork is crucial. Pork is the root cause of the unholy relationship between some members of Congress, lobbyists and donors. Inside Congress, the pork process is effectively a black market economy: Thousands of instances exist where appropriations are leveraged for fundraising dollars or political capital. It is delusional to claim Congress can redeem its relationship with K Street without eliminating earmarks. The problem is not lobbyists. The problem is us.

Those who argue that fighting pork distracts members from the more costly challenge of entitlement reform don't understand human nature. Earmarks are a gateway drug on the road to the spending addiction. One day an otherwise frugal member votes for pork, the next day he or she votes for a bloated spending bill or entitlement expansion: A "no" vote might cut off their access to earmarks.

The most vocal opponents to a zero-tolerance approach toward pork are, sadly, the bipartisan leaders of the House and Senate. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, to his credit, has issued only a mild defense of earmarking by stating we should "mend, not end" the practice. Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid and House Speaker Denny Hastert, on the other hand, have been enthusiastic in their defense of pork. Sen. Reid offered a fictional account of American history when he said the pork process "has been going on since we were a country." He and other pork apologists ignore the reality that pork as we know it today didn't exist 20 years ago. In 1987, President Reagan vetoed a spending bill because it contained 121 earmarks. The number of earmarks has skyrocketed over the past decade, from 4,126 in 1994 to 15,268 in 2005, according to the Congressional Research Service.

Nowhere in our founding documents is a justification for today's out-of-control earmarking. In fact, Madison and the other framers were clear that the general welfare clause of the Constitution should never be construed as a blank check for Congress. Pork is a modern indulgence, not an ancient or noble tradition.

Speaker Hastert, for his part, has said pork is "what members do" and that members are best positioned to know where to put a "red light in their district." This vision of an imperial Congress, where urban planners in state and local governments can be usurped by individual congressman and their 20-something staffers, is unsettling. And every hour members spend on parochial obsessions is an hour they can't devote to oversight, balancing the budget or serious national security issues.

The American people are demanding real reform, not cosmetic measures that will clean the outside of the cup but leave the inside filthy. As Congress confronts its culture of corruption and our enormous fiscal challenges, it's time to "just say no" to earmarks.

Mr. Coburn is a Republican senator from Oklahoma.

Official Resigns Public TV Post (NYT)

By Stephen Labaton And Elizabeth Jensen

The New York Times, February 10, 2006

WASHINGTON, Feb. 9 — The top television executive at the Corporation for Public Broadcasting announced on Thursday that he would be stepping down. This is the latest in a string of departures of officials and consultants who played central roles in an effort by conservatives to bring what they viewed as more balance to public television and radio.

The executive, Michael Pack, controlled a $70 million production budget and was described by the official who hired him as a conservative Republican. He chose to resign after Patricia S. Harrison, the corporation's new president, forced him to decide between renewing his employment contract and exercising a soon-to-expire option that gives him $500,000 to produce a documentary.

Ms. Harrison said the departures of Mr. Pack and a senior consultant, James Denton, were business decisions and were not part of any purge of ideologically driven officials. "You are connecting dots when there is no connection," she said in an interview. "I have not fired a single person since I came on board here."

But other officials in public broadcasting saw political overtones to the moves. Since being named president of the corporation last June, Ms. Harrison, a former co-chairwoman of the Republican National Committee, has attempted to tamp down a debate over balance in programming that has threatened to undermine financial support for public broadcasting from both Congress and private sources. Public broadcasting officials who had been at odds with the corporation said the personnel changes could shore up support among Republican moderates and Democrats, important traditional allies in budget fights.

DOJ_NMG_0013930

"Pat Harrison appears to be trying to ratchet down some of the ideological orientation of the organization," said John Lawson, president of the Association of Public Television Stations.

"The best thing that C.P.B. can do now is stay out of the spotlight," Mr. Lawson added. "If changes in management at C.P.B. signal to Democrats and Republicans alike that C.P.B. will be nonpartisan and programming decisions will be made on a nonideological basis, that's a very positive development as we go about seeking support from Congress."

The White House this week proposed a cut of more than $100 million, or more than 25 percent, in the corporation's budget.

The corporation has faced tumult since last spring, when it was disclosed that Kenneth Y. Tomlinson, who was then its chairman, was pressing public broadcasters to correct what he and other conservatives saw as liberal bias. Mr. Tomlinson was forced to resign in November, after the corporation's inspector general found evidence that he had repeatedly broken federal law and the organization's own regulations. He remains the head of a separate agency, the Broadcasting Board of Governors, which oversees most government broadcasting operations abroad. Mr. Pack's departure followed the recent decision by Ms. Harrison not to renew the contract of Mr. Denton, who oversaw one of the corporation's largest projects: a $20 million documentary series called "America at a Crossroads" examining the nation's role in a post-9/11 world. (The New York Times has received financing for one program, "Indonesia: Battleground for the Soul of Islam," as part of that series.)

Mr. Denton, the son of Jeremiah Denton, a conservative Alabama Republican who served in the Senate in the 1980's, was seen by some documentary makers as advancing a conservative political agenda. In an interview, he disputed the complaints that he had sought to bring a conservative bent to programming, calling them "absurd."

Mr. Denton provoked a controversy last year when, at a forum on one of the corporation's largest initiatives, creating projects designed to teach history and civics to teenagers, he suggested to producers that they tell corporate partners the programs could be a "Trojan horse" to get their technology into the schools.

A third official involved in the effort to change the political direction of public broadcasting, William Schulz, submitted his resignation last month. Mr. Schulz, a conservative who once worked with Mr. Tomlinson at Reader's Digest, was one of the two men hired last year to serve as the corporation's ombudsmen, responsible for monitoring the balance of programs. He said in an interview that he had resigned because he had other projects that were interfering with his obligations to the corporation.

In an interview on Thursday afternoon, Ms. Harrison said the personnel moves had "nothing to do with politics or ideology."

"These are business decisions," she said. "It was not in the best interests of the corporation to extend or enhance Michael Pack's option to produce a program."

"In the case of Jim Denton, he did a great job," she added. "His contract was over in December."

Other broadcasting executives said that Ms. Harrison had heard complaints from producers that the "America at a Crossroads" and history and civics projects have moved too slowly and been disorganized.

Among other programming moves, he helped bring to public television a show featuring The Wall Street Journal's conservative editorial board and another whose host was Tucker Carlson, the conservative commentator.

Mr. Pack called "America at a Crossroads" "a good example of the way to bring diversity of views to public broadcasting across the political spectrum." With new voices and a mix of cultural and political topics, he said, "I hope it will be a model for how to bring a true diversity of opinion and in some ways get out of the left-right box."

Ex-Press Aide For NASA Offers Defense (NYT)

By Andrew C. Revkin

The New York Times, February 10, 2006

George C. Deutsch, the young NASA press aide who resigned on Tuesday amid claims that he had tried to keep the agency's top climate scientist from speaking publicly about global warming, defended himself publicly yesterday.

DOJ_NMG_0013931

Speaking to a Texas radio station and then to The New York Times, Mr. Deutsch said the scientist, James E. Hansen, exaggerated the threat of warming and tried to cast the Bush administration's response to it as inadequate.

Mr. Deutsch also denied lying about having a college degree and trying to inject religion into some NASA Web presentations.

"I have never been told to censor science, to squelch anything or to insert religion into any issue," he told the radio reporter, Brian Cain.

Parts of that interview were posted on the Web site of WTAW-AM, in College Station (wtaw.com), where Mr. Deutsch attended Texas A&M University until he joined President Bush's campaign in 2004.

After seeing a transcript of some of the criticisms, Dr. Hansen said, "This is so wacky that it deserves little response."

In the radio interview, Mr. Deutsch also criticized others within NASA who supported Dr. Hansen's view that he was being suppressed. Leslie McCarthy, a public affairs officer who told The Times of several conversations in which Mr. Deutsch said his job was to "make the president look good," said she would not comment on his assertions.

"The House Science Committee is conducting an investigation because they were concerned and I'm just not prepared to stoop to his level," Ms. McCarthy said in a telephone interview last night.

Starting in late January with several interviews in The New York Times, Dr. Hansen, the director of NASA's Goddard Institute for Space Studies in Manhattan, and several career NASA public affairs officials and scientists complained about what they said were intensifying efforts by political appointees in NASA, including Mr. Deutsch, to control more closely his lectures and Web presentations.

Last Friday, after more NASA scientists and public affairs officers told The Times of other instances in which political appointees altered news releases or Web presentations in ways the workers said were tinged by politics, Michael D. Griffin, the NASA administrator, issued a "statement of scientific openness" to all NASA employees saying, "we have identified a number of areas in which clarification and improvements to the standard operating procedures of the Office of Public Affairs can and will be made."

Dr. Griffin also said "it is not the job of public affairs officers to alter, filter or adjust engineering or scientific material produced by NASA's technical staff."

The Times reported on Wednesday that contrary to his résumé on file with NASA, Mr. Deutsch, who is 24, never graduated from Texas A&M. Yesterday, in an interview with The Times, Mr. Deutsch said he had written the résumé in anticipation of graduating.

"When I left college," he said, "I did not properly update my résumé. As a result, it may appear misleading to some. However, I was up front with NASA about my undergraduate status when they hired me."

In an e-mail message, Mr. Deutsch said that remarks about religious views on the creation of the universe sent last October to a Web designer working on a presentation on Albert Einstein were "personal observations" and never were reflected in the material that was posted online.

"We are both Christians, and I was sharing with him my personal opinions on the Big Bang theory versus intelligent design," Mr. Deutsch wrote to The Times. "What I said about intelligent design did not affect the presentation of the Big Bang theory in the subsequent Einstein Web story. This is a very important point, because I have been accused of trying to insert religion into this story, which I was not trying to do."

Former NASA Spokesman Speaks Out (WTAW)

WTAW-AM, February 10, 2006

(posted 2/9/06) A controversy involving allegations of censorship at NASA has apparently led to the resignation of a public affairs officer at the agency. ...

George Deutsch Interview, Part 2

Click icon to hear part two of WTAW's exclusive interview with former NASA public affairs officer George Deutsch. ...

George Deutsch Interview, Part 3

Man Who Left NASA Says He's Under Attack (AP)

AP, February 10, 2006

COLLEGE STATION, Texas -- A staffer who resigned from NASA after he was accused of restricting access to a noted climate scientist said Thursday he was targeted because of his political ties.

George C. Deutsch, 24, resigned from the agency's public relations department earlier this week.

"What you do have is hearsay coming from a handful of people who have clear partisan ties and they are really coming after me as a Bush appointee," he told radio station WTAW. "I was an easy target. I was low-hanging fruit."

The New York Times reported Wednesday that Deutsch attempted to limit reporters' access to Jim Hansen, a noted NASA climate scientist, and insisted that a Web designer insert the word "theory" before any mention of the Big Bang.

Deutsch denied the allegations.

"I have never been told to censor science, to squelch anything or to insert religion into any issue, absolutely not," said the former Bush campaign worker.

'Culture War' At NASA? (HC)

By Mark Carreau

Houston Chronicle, February 10, 2006

The young public affairs officer who resigned from NASA this week amidst controversy over his handling of communications on global warming charged on Thursday he's the victim of a politically motivated smear campaign.

George Deutsch, 24, a former Texas A&M University student who left the school to work on President Bush's 2004 re-election campaign, lashed back at those who accused him of scientific censorship.

He directed much of his wrath at James Hansen, a prominent NASA climatologist who complained in media reports that Deutsch was relying on Republican dogma to restrain scientifically motivated concerns about global warming.

'A very partisan agenda'"What is going on at NASA and throughout the federal government is a culture war," Deutsch said in a statement from his Washington-area home. "I quickly learned one thing: Dr. Hansen and his supporters have a very partisan agenda and ties reaching to the top of the Democratic Party."

In a telephone interview, Deutsch accused the space agency of too often showcasing Hansen as its expert on global warming, passing over other scientists whose views were not as alarming.

"If you don't have an idea that is in line with his agenda of global warming, if you don't have this sky-is-falling mentality, then you are considered the wacko," he charged.

Deutsch said he was especially appalled at what he characterized as an alliance between Hansen and Al Gore, the former Democratic presidential nominee who writes and speaks often on environmental issues.

Deutsch resigned from NASA late Tuesday after one year as a junior member of the agency's Washington public affairs staff. His departure came after a little-known Web site operated by a Texas A&M biochemistry graduate disclosed Deutsch's résumé falsely claimed an undergraduate degree from the school.

Hansen, NASA fire backOn Thursday, both Hansen, who directs climate research from the Goddard Institute for Space Studies in New York City, and NASA challenged the allegations by Deutsch.

"I have no idea where he got that idea. It would be the opposite of our credo about presenting all sides of a problem," Hansen wrote in an e-mail in response to the charge he tried to suppress opposing views.

Hansen also characterized himself as a moderately conservative independent who favors the positions of U.S. Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., on campaign finance reform and climate change.

Hansen's views on global warming were not favored over others, said Dean Acosta, chief spokesman for NASA administrator Michael Griffin. "I can tell you categorically that is not happening," said Acosta.

Deutsch acknowledged he'd erred in claiming an A&M degree on his résumé. He claimed he informed NASA that he lacked the math class he needed to complete the degree.

Politics Vs. Climate Reality (USAT)

USA Today, February 10, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0013933

Would that the rise and fall of George C. Deutsch, 24, a NASA political appointee, could become a metaphor — one taken all the way to its logical conclusion — for the Bush administration's policies on global warming. Deutsch has for months embodied the White House's earth-is-flat take on why the earth is warming, with consequences from melting glaciers to freak weather.

Working in NASA's public relations, he tried to muzzle a renowned climate scientist who — like serious scientists the world over — warns that global warming is a threat requiring government intervention to curb emissions from cars, factories and more.

This furthered the business-friendly Bush administration's increasingly lonely mantra that the science isn't solid enough for more than voluntary measures. But scientific consensus long ago moved on. The issue now is not whether global warming is happening, but how severe the effects will be.

This week, evangelical Christians, normally among President Bush's most loyal supporters, broke with him on the issue and urged action: 86 prominent figures released a statement warning that “millions of people could die” because of global warming.

One casualty of all this was Deutsch, who resigned when it was discovered his résumé was longer on political loyalty — work on Bush's re-election campaign — than on education. Texas A&M University said he never received the journalism degree he claimed.

But that merely removed the symptom, not the underlying problem.

That a low-level bureaucrat could overrule a prestigious scientist says worlds about how the administration balances politics against science. Further evidence can be found at the Food and Drug Administration, which has stifled overwhelming evidence that the “morning-after pill” is safe and effective. It blocked over-the-counter sales — a transparent payoff to abortion opponents.

Global warming is a good place to beginaltering that facts-be-damned approach. The administration has a ready-made environmental bandwagon to jump back onto. The world agreed in 1992 to prevent dangerous climate change. Countries have since worked on mandatory emissions curbs in what is known as the Kyoto Protocol, but Bush, as soon as he took office, turned his back on it.

Ignoring the impact of climate change is getting difficult: Federal officials are considering declaring the polar bear a threatened species because rising Arctic temperatures are melting the ice pack that's their home.

Now that scientific fact has spoken louder than ideology at NASA, perhaps the same can happen at the White House.

Backlash Brewing (WP)

By Al Kamen

The Washington Post, February 10, 2006

Deutsch's Potshot at Jayson Blair

Speaking of kids, it isn't that George C. Deutsch , 24, the NASA press aide who quit after it turned out he lied about being a Texas A&M University graduate, didn't have any press experience.

Deutsch earned his bit of fame last week when he was criticized for preventing reporters from talking to James E. Hansen , NASA's leading climate scientist, because, as the New York Times reported, Deutsch told colleagues his job was to "make the president look good." The non-college graduate also opined about the big-bang theory and said NASA should not discount "intelligent design by a creator."

Deutsch did attend the Texas university and did some writing for the Battalion, the student paper. In an opinion piece in 2003 when New York Times reporter Jayson Blair was unmasked as a fabricator, Deutsch wrote: "Blair's decisions and actions lacked ethics and integrity. As a reporter, he cared only about himself and furthering his career at the expense of the truth ."

Unclear if Deutsch plans to re-enroll to finish his degree.

And Another Thing . . . (SSR)

Spokane (WA) Spokesman-Review, February 10, 2006

Don't they get it?

DOJ_NMG_0013934

Outward appearances play such a role in politics that you'd expect the professionals in the field to show themselves in the best light at all times. If not every moment, at least when they're on center stage.

The U.S. House of Representatives moved conspicuously onto center stage for an ethical melodrama after former Majority Floor Leader Tom DeLay was indicted on federal conspiracy charges and super-lobbyist Jack Abramoff pleaded guilty to conspiracy, fraud and tax evasion. With more developments to come in both cases, there has been considerable talk about reform efforts to reduce the influence money and favors have over the lawmaking process – but little more than talk. The closest facsimile of action has been the election by House Republicans last week of Ohio Congressman John Boehner to replace DeLay.

No sooner had the outcome been announced, however, than it was remembered that in 1995, when Congress was considering elimination of tobacco subsidies, Boehner was going about on the House floor distributing tobacco lobbyists' campaign checks to select colleagues. Boehner, who's enjoyed his own share of lobbyists' hospitality, has called himself a reformer.

That was the case again this week after it was revealed that he rents a $1,600-a-month Capitol Hill basement apartment from longtime friend and lobbyist John D. Milne. And that some of Milne's clients have a direct interest in legislation Boehner has sponsored or managed through the legislative process.

It's important, of course, that Boehner's actions are legal and free of conflicts of interest, which he insists that they are. It's equally important, though, that the public have confidence in government, an attitude that's hard to sustain when questionable appearances keep raising suspicions.

Earth to NASA

Political operatives are boldly going where they've never gone before. The National Aeronautics and Space Administration is the latest battleground in the war between science and politics.

First, the agency's public information office was accused of censoring its scientists' findings on global warming. Then it imposed itself on the origins-of-the-universe debate.

George Deutsch, a young intern from the Bush-Cheney campaign, landed a job at NASA after the election and kept right on campaigning. Instead of helping scientists communicate their findings, he decided to politicize them. Some scientists say their reports on global warming were watered down. Scientist James Hansen said the administration didn't want him giving speeches on the topic.

Deutsch also ordered that all mentions of "Big Bang" carry the word "theory" on the NASA Web site. That's not so bad, but his rationale was: "It is not NASA's place, nor should it be, to make a declaration such as this about the existence of the universe that discounts intelligent design by a creator – the other half of the argument."

We're guessing Deutsch was motivated by more than just science, but that's just a theory. Deutsch was dumped on Tuesday for lying on his resume. We hope NASA administrators can see that there was a bigger problem.

Academy To Referee Climate-Change Fight (WSJ)

By Antonio Regalado

The Wall Street Journal, February 10, 2006

Seeking to resolve a scientific dispute that has taken on a rancorous political edge, the National Academy of Sciences said it had agreed to a request from Congress to assess how well researchers understand the history of temperatures on earth.

The study by the academy, an independent advisory body based in Washington, will focus on the "hockey stick," a chart of past temperatures that critics say is inaccurate. The graph gets its name because of the sudden, blade-like rise of recent temperatures compared with past epochs.

The controversy took a sharp political turn in July when Rep. Joe Barton (R., Texas), head of the House Energy and Commerce Committee, launched a probe into the work of three climate specialists who generated the graph, including Michael Mann, now a professor at Pennsylvania State University.

Mr. Barton's inquiry drew a rebuke from several scientific societies as well as fellow Republican Sherwood Boehlert of New York, chairman of the House Committee on Science, who called it a blatant effort to intimidate global-warming researchers.

DOJ_NMG_0013935

After Mr. Barton didn't respond to an offer to jointly bring the issue to the National Academy, Mr. Boehlert independently asked for a review in November, science committee chief of staff David Goldston said. "It appeared that the issue was not going to go away by itself. We thought this was an appropriate way to get an assessment of the science," Mr. Goldston said in an interview.

Larry Neal, deputy staff director for Mr. Barton's committee, said in a statement that because "combating climate change is a breathtakingly expensive prospect," it deserved closer study, and that the academy was "unlikely" to address all of Mr. Barton's concerns.

Mr. Barton has already sought a separate analysis of the hockey stick led by statistician Edward Wegman of George Mason University, people familiar with the matter said. Dr. Wegman couldn't be reached yesterday.

Using records stored in ice, tree rings, and coral reefs, scientists including Dr. Mann have estimated that current air temperatures exceed any in the past 1,000 years. Such findings are not only evidence for man-made global warming, but also underlie predictions of future temperature rises.

An 11-member academy panel will now study the accuracy and importance of such research, in particular the work of Dr. Mann, whose hockey-stick graph was included in a report issued by the United Nations in 2001. An academy spokesman said the report would be completed in about four months.

Dr. Mann's critics, including two amateur Canadian climate researchers, say his work contains serious inaccuracies. Dr. Mann has denied that, but the debate has prompted several climate researchers to take a fresh look at temperature reconstructions.

While some recent publications have found fault with the hockey stick and similar studies, others have sought to rebut critics.

The debate comes as many scientists express growing alarm over the warming trend. The planet has warmed more than one degree over the past century, and recent heating is widely blamed on greenhouse gases emitted by the burning of coal, oil and natural gas.

More than 150 countries have ratified the Kyoto Protocol, an international agreement to slash gas emissions by 2012. The U.S. hasn't signed the treaty, which the Bush administration has said is ineffective and would slow economic growth.

Write to Antonio Regalado at antonio.regalado@wsj.com1

More Vets Get Health Care, But 'Priority 8' Is Like Priority Zero (WP)

By Christopher Lee

The Washington Post, February 10, 2006

Three years ago, then-Secretary Anthony J. Principi announced that the Department of Veterans Affairs was suspending health care enrollment for some higher-income veterans who did not have injuries or illnesses related to their military service.

The move to exclude "Priority 8" veterans was unpopular, but Principi said it was necessary to prevent the VA medical system from being swamped by the rising number of veterans who were eligible for care. At the time, about 6.8 million veterans were enrolled in the VA health system. Now more than 7.5 million are -- including 5.4 million who received treatment last year.

Others could not get in the door, however. More than a quarter-million "Priority 8" veterans who tried to sign up for VA health care coverage between January 2003 and October 2005 were turned away because of the new effort to rein in costs. The 263,257 veterans who were not allowed enroll included 5,459 veterans in Virginia, 3,051 in Maryland and 164 in the District of Columbia, according to figures the VA recently released.

There are 24.4 million veterans in the United States, and 16.9 million are not enrolled in the VA health care system. As many of 10 million of those not enrolled are Priority 8 veterans, the VA says. The annual household income cutoff for Priority 8 veterans varies by region. It was $57,500 for a veteran with three dependents who lived in Arlington or Fairfax counties, or in Montgomery or Prince George's counties.

Rep. Lane Evans (Ill.), ranking Democrat on the House Veterans Affairs Committee, called on the administration to increase the VA budget.

DOJ_NMG_0013936

"There is no reason for the VA to give the cold shoulder to veterans who have served our country honorably," Evans said in a written statement.

Lisette Mondello, a VA spokeswoman, said the affected veterans could not enroll because they were not eligible. "We want to be clear that absolutely nobody is being cut from VA health care rolls and no veteran will be dis-enrolled from VA health care unless they specifically request it," Mondello wrote news organizations.

VERBATIM (WP)

The Washington Post, February 10, 2006

That Was Then

" During my stewardship here, I'm going to put everybody under oath when we have testimony, as we do on confirmation hearings."

Judiciary Committee Chairman

Arlen Specter, April 5, 2005

This Is Now

"It is my judgment that it is unnecessary to swear the witness."

Specter, declining to put Attorney General

Alberto R. Gonzales under oath, Feb. 6, 2006

GOP Senator Says Withhold Congress' Pay (AP-Y2)

By Andrew Taylor

AP2, February 10, 2006

A potential GOP presidential candidate has come up with a familiar way to cater to conservative core voters — bashing Congress.

Virginia Sen. George Allen (news, bio, voting record), a darling of conservatives, says lawmakers' paychecks should be withheld if they don't pass spending bills on time. He says that would solve the problem of larding spending into end-of-session bills that sometimes pass without anybody reading them.

Allen was to unveil the plan Thursday night before the CPAC convention, a gathering of conservative activists in Washington.

The senator said his so-called pay check penalty "provides powerful incentives for senators and congressmen to perform their jobs on time, with discipline."

Congress is supposed to pass spending bills by the Oct. 1 start of the budget year, but invariably fails to do so. Allen voted for every appropriations bill last year and the most recent "omnibus" appropriations bill in November 2004.

Keeping The Faith At The White House (CHIT)

Chicago Tribune, February 10, 2006

For all the hoopla surrounding cuts in Medicare and Medicaid spending, a quieter revolution is taking place in Washington: The advancement of “faith-based’’ social services.

As President Bush signed a significant budget-cutting bill today with an audience of congressional leaders in the East Room of the White House, he signed into law protections for religious groups that spend federal money on the social services that they deliver.

Legal protection for many federally financed private groups to hire people of their choosing already had been provided by the Welfare Reform Act of 1996 signed by President Clinton. In the reauthorization of that act, Congress has extended that authority for programs operating under the $17-billion Temporary Assistance to Needy Families through 2010 and also has extended this “Charitable Choice’’ authority to his new Marriage and Fatherhood Program.

Bush signed all of this into law today as he approved a Deficit Reduction Act that will rein in the growth of Medicare and Medicaid. The choice provisions were added to the bill.

DOJ_NMG_0013937

The act is expected to cut $6 billion from Medicare over five years, requiring wealthier recipients to pay higher premiums. In addition, Bush is asking Congress to trim $36 billion more from Medicare over the next five years in the 2007 budget that he is proposing, slowing the program's annual growth from 8.1 to 7.7 percent.

"One of the reasons for the success of welfare reform is a policy called charitable choice, which allows faith-based groups that provide social services to receive federal funding without changing the way they hire,'' Bush said. "Ten years ago, Congress made welfare the first federal program to include charitable choice. The bill I sign today will extend charitable choice for another five years, and expand it to the new healthy marriage and responsible fatherhood programs.

In the 2007 budget that Bush proposed this week - which calls for spending cuts throughout many federal agencies - the president is asking Congress to boost spending for his "faith-based initiatives.''

Bush is asking Congress for $323 million for programs such as a "Compassion Capital Fund'' of $100 million - with half of the fund earmarked for a program aimed at steering youth away from gang involvement, an initiative that First Lady Laura Bush is leading. Other programs include mentoring for children of prisoners ($40 million) and a "re-entry'' program for 600,000 convicts returning to society this year ($60 million) as well as help for recovering drug addicts that 14 states and one Indian tribe are offering ($98 million).

That $323 million request represents a 36 percent increase in what is going to the president's faith-based initiatives this year, $236 million.

In addition, five federal agencies including the Department of Education and Health and Human Services increased their own grants to faith-based groups to $1.334 billion in 2004 - up 14 percent from the year before. Combined with grants from the U.S. Agency for International Development and Department of Agriculture, the overall 2004 spending was closer to $2 billion.

The White House is collecting data on all those agencies' grants in 2005 and plans to announce how they fared on March 9. Watch for another reported increase in spending.

Bush maintains the government can pay for these increases - as well as a much more costly 7 percent boost in defense spending ($18.5 billion) - while cutting spending elsewhere and preserving the tax cuts that the president won during his first few years in office.

"You will hear the argument during the budget debates -- you know -- all the noise coming out of Washington, that you need to raise taxes in order to balance the budget,'' Bush said earlier today in Manchester, N.H., making his first public pitch for his new budget. "I've been there long enough to tell you, that's not the way Washington works. They're going to raise your taxes and they're going to find new ways to spend your money.''

With the way the White House is spending money on social services offered by faith-based groups, religious leaders have been concerned that federal money carries federal strings. They have sought protection in matters such as hiring for the private groups collecting federal money - groups that may restrict hiring to members of their own church, for instance.

A federal court recently ruled in favor of the faith-based groups' right to hire as they choose. The White House failed to win broad legislation for Charitable Choice in 2001 so has been working on the issue case by case. The act signed today represents the first chance Bush has had to sign choice into law for one of his programs, the marriage and fatherhood program.

"This represents a major development in the president's efforts to advance his faith-based initiative… For five years, this initiative has been blocked in Congress,'' said Jim Towey, director of the White Office of Community and Faith-Based Initiatives. "The story line that had been written - that the faith-based initiative has been blocked throughout his presidency - that story line has given way to a signature today.''

Senate Confirms Ameriquest Founder As Ambassador (LAT)

By Jonathan Peterson, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, February 10, 2006

WASHINGTON — Roland E. Arnall is heading for Amsterdam.

The Southern California mortgage-lending magnate was confirmed late Wednesday as U.S. ambassador to the Netherlands, 16 days after his Ameriquest Mortgage Co. agreed to pay $325 million to settle allegations of unfair lending practices by regulators in 49 states and the District of Columbia.

DOJ_NMG_0013938

The uncontested Senate voice vote brought a peaceful end to a divisive, three-month confirmation process, in which Democrats led by Sen. Paul S. Sarbanes (D-Md.) had insisted that Ameriquest resolve the allegations against it before they would confirm Arnall.

"With Ameriquest's recent settlement with the attorneys general over its mortgage lending practices, Sen. Sarbanes did not object to moving forward on this nomination," said Jesse Jacobs, a spokesman for Sarbanes.

Arnall's loyalists were ebullient at the vote, which came as an anticlimactic finale to a process in which the media-shy billionaire had been subjected to a public grilling. Supporters, including business associates and some civil rights activists, had said throughout the debate that he would be an effective diplomat.

"We are pleased that Mr. Arnall's nomination to be the ambassador to the Netherlands has been confirmed by the United States Senate," Adam J. Bass, Ameriquest's vice chairman and a nephew of Arnall, said in a statement Thursday. "We take great pride in knowing that our company's founder will be representing our country abroad and know he will serve with honor and distinction."

Some of Arnall's critics, however, decried his appointment: "I find it unbelievable that the reward for settling this case is not jail avoidance but being named ambassador to another country by the United States," said Ira Rheingold, general counsel of the National Assn. of Consumer Advocates.

Arnall was not available for comment.

The 66-year-old Holmby Hills resident emerged in recent years as a major Republican financier, directly or indirectly helping raise more than $12 million for President Bush and Republican activities.

Arnall turned Orange-based Ameriquest into a major national lender by tailoring home loans to people with weak credit histories and other problems that limit their options in traditional credit markets. In October, he resigned his positions with the firm to comply with State Department ethics requirements for ambassadors. His wife, Dawn, retained her posts with Ameriquest and its related companies.

While Ameriquest's fortunes soared under Arnall's leadership, complaints that some of its employees engaged in unfair lending practices — pressuring borrowers to refinance loans with costly terms, for example, or surprising borrowers with unexpected fees at closing — drew the attention of state regulators.

Under the Jan. 23 settlement, Ameriquest promised to take steps to safeguard consumers.

That deal cleared most of the roadblocks to Arnall's confirmation. Republicans brought the matter up Wednesday night, and with no objection and no debate, Arnall became an ambassador.

Special correspondent Mike Hudson contributed to this report.

OTHER NEWS:

Jobless Claims Fall To 6-Year Low (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 10, 2006

WASHINGTON -- A closely watched barometer of joblessness fell to its lowest reading in nearly six years, offering further proof that so far this year the labor market is improving along with the economy.

The Labor Department said the number of workers filing initial unemployment claims last week was 277,000, a figure that pushed the more telling four-week moving average of jobless claims down to 276,500, its lowest level since April 2000.

The claims data provide the latest bit of evidence that strong economic activity is improving conditions for workers. Last week, the Labor Department released figures showing that the economy added 687,000 jobs over the past three months, pushing the unemployment rate down to 4.7%, its lowest mark since July 2001. Moreover, hourly wages rose 3.3% over the past year, the fastest growth rate in nearly three years.

Many analysts are convinced that readily improving labor conditions, in tandem with other robust economic indicators, will lead the Federal Reserve to raise the federal-funds rate by another quarter point to 4.75% next month in an effort to tamp down inflationary pressures on prices and wages.

DOJ_NMG_0013939

"They're going to view the tightening labor market as a sign of inflation worries to come," said Gina Martin, an economist at Wachovia Corp. in Charlotte, N.C. "We think they're going to go up to 5% in May and then stop there for the rest of the year."

Separately, U.S. wholesale inventories climbed during December at twice the pace expected, even as sales rebounded and increased at the same rate as stocks.

Wholesale inventories rose by 1.0% to a seasonally adjusted $362.48 billion, the Commerce Department said Thursday. November inventories increased by 0.5%, revised from a 0.4% climb. Wholesale sales rose by 1.0% to a seasonally adjusted $314.91 billion. That followed a 0.7% decrease in November, which was unrevised. The inventory-to-sales ratio held steady at 1.15. The ratio measures how many months it would take for a company to deplete its current inventory.

Overall inventories held by U.S. businesses -- wholesalers, manufacturers and retailers -- increased in the final quarter of 2005 after six months of liquidation. The latest government report on gross domestic product said companies elevated stockpiles by $25.7 billion in the fourth quarter, after decreases of $13.3 billion in the third quarter and $1.7 billion in the second.

Year over year, wholesale inventories were up by 6.7% in December, while sales were 8.3% higher than the level in December 2004.

Inventories of durable goods -- meant to last three or more years -- rose 0.6% in December, after increasing 0.8% in November. Durable goods sales went up 1.3%, after falling by 0.2% in November. The 0.6% increase in durable goods inventories was led by growth in stocks of autos, up 1.2%. Driving up sales of durables were the auto sector, up 1.8%, and professional equipment, 2.5% higher.

Inventories of non-durable goods rose 1.6% in December, after inching up 0.1%. The increase in non-durables was the biggest since a climb at an equal rate in April 2001. Non-durable sales increased by 0.7% after declining 1.3%. Petroleum sales rose 4.4% in December.

Dow Rises On Jobs, Earnings Reports (USAT)

USA Today, February 10, 2006

NEW YORK — Stocks were mostly higher Thursday as a six-year low in unemployment claims and strong corporate earnings encouraged investors. However, the momentum sagged in late-afternoon trading as uncertainty about the economy resurfaced.

While weekly first-time jobless claims rose slightly, Wall Street was encouraged that the Labor Department said the four-week moving average fell to its lowest since April 2000.

Positive earnings news from Best Buy, Aetna and Marriott International also encouraged buyers. However, with longer-term questions remaining about the housing market, the economy, interest rates, oil prices and geopolitics, analysts question whether the trend higher could continue.

“Right now, it's like an absence of bad news is being treated as good news,” says Hans Olsen, managing director and chief investment officer at Bingham Legg Advisers.

The Dow Jones industrial average rose 24.73 points to 10,883.35 after gaining 108.86 points Wednesday. The Standard & Poor's 500 index fell 1.87 points to 1263.78, and the Nasdaq composite dropped 11.11 points to 2255.87.

Best Buy gained $4.13 to $52.96. The electronics retailer raised its forecast for fourth-quarter earnings. Aetna climbed $3.15 to $99.27. The insurer reported fourth-quarter net income up 41% to $423 million and boosted its 2006 outlook. Marriott added $1.53 to $67.64 after it said fourth-quarter earnings rose 25% to $237 million and increased its 2006 forecast.

•Whole Foods Market fell $6.78 to $65.27. The top U.S. natural and organic foods retailer posted a quarterly profit just shy of Wall Street expectations.

•Martin Marietta Materials climbed $4.92 to $94.07. The company posted a strong fourth-quarter profit and issued an earnings forecast well beyond Wall Street expectations.

•Brinks slid $5.03 to $48.80. The security company said its fourth-quarter profits, which missed analysts' forecasts, were “disappointing.”

DOJ_NMG_0013940

•NightHawk Radiology closed at $20.65, up 29% from the $16 at which the company sold 6.3 million shares in an initial public offering. NightHawk employs radiologists in Switzerland and Australia to read X-rays in the off-hours of U.S. health care providers.

•EResearch Technology tumbled $3.26, or 18%, to $14.50. The health care technology company's profit forecasts were lower than expected.

Dow Industrials Build On Rally (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 10, 2006

A stock rally lost steam in the final hours Thursday, tripping up the Dow Jones Industrial Average as it made another push toward 11000, though the industrials still finished up for the day.

The market started to pull back just after the Dow industrials crossed 10950, which has proven to be a tough obstacle for stocks, said Todd Leone, head of listed trading at SG Cowen. "Every time we get near there, we fade," he said.

Remarks from Michael Moskow, president of the Federal Reserve's Chicago branch, also took the air out of stocks. Mr. Moskow said inflation is currently at "the upper end" of his comfort zone, and that monetary policy may have to be tightened further if inflation expectations keep rising.

The Fed official's speech before the Risk Management Association in Chicago, which didn't say anything remarkably surprising about interest rates, put "a bit of fright into the market," said Larry Peruzzi, senior equity trader at Boston Company Asset Management.

While stocks had a good run Wednesday, when the industrials rose more than 100 points, the market has been dour this month. The lackluster action could be a sign that stocks are on a downward trend that could last months, said Steven Shobin, chief investment strategist at AmeriCap Advisers. One sign of a market top, he said, is weakness in former leaders, such as the energy sector.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average, up as much as 94 points earlier, gained just 24.73 points to 10883.35. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index fell 1.89 to 1263.76 and the Nasdaq Composite Index slid by 11.11 to 2255.87.

Stocks rallied early, extending Wednesday's triple-digit Dow gain thanks to a strong earnings report from Aetna and Marriott International, as well as upbeat guidance from Best Buy.

An auction of $14 billion in 30-year Treasury bonds -- the first "long bond" sale in five years -- was met with robust demand. A little more than half of the bids were at the highest price. Indirect bidders snapped up 65% of the total, indicating there was a strong appetite for U.S. debt from foreign buyers.

Longer-dated bonds rose after the results of the auction were released at about 1 p.m. Eastern. The current 30-year bond, auctioned in February 2001, gained 16/32 point, or $5 for each $1,000 invested, to yield 4.645%. The new long bond, which begins trading tomorrow, will yield 4.5%. The benchmark 10-year note finished slightly higher, yielding 4.54%.

American International Group gained 1.1% as investors expressed relief that the company's skirmish with regulators is behind it. AIG agreed to a $1.64 billion settlement7 with the Securities and Exchange Commission and New York authorities over alleged accounting improprieties. The insurance provider said the deal should result in a $1.15 billion after-tax charge for the fourth quarter.

Light, sweet crude rose seven cents to $62.62 a barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange. Comex gold futures for April, which fell nearly $20 an ounce Tuesday, jumped $14.30 to $568.10.

In major market action:

Stocks were mixed8. On the New York Stock Exchange, where 1.8 billion shares traded, 1,728 stocks rose and 1,615 fell. On the Nasdaq Stock Market, where 2.3 billion shares traded, 1,378 rose and 1,642 declined.

Bonds advanced9. The benchmark 10-year Treasury note gained 1/32, or 31 cents per $1,000 invested, to yield 4.541%. The 30-year bond rose 1/32 to yield 4.675%. Yields move inversely to prices.

The dollar slipped.10 It traded at 118.50 yen, down from 118.53 yen late Wednesday, while the euro rose to $1.1959 from $1.1951.

Bernanke The Inflation Fighter (WSJ)

DOJ_NMG_0013941

By Tim Annett

The Wall Street Journal, February 10, 2006

Economists have some advice for Ben Bernanke as he takes over at the Federal Reserve: establish your credibility as an inflation fighter.

But, at the same time, they have concern that he could take that effort too far. When asked in the latest WSJ.com forecasting survey which mistake Mr. Bernanke is more likely to make -- raising rates too much or not enough -- three-quarters of economists said he is more likely to lift rates too high.

The new Fed chief faces the same puzzle that always confronts the Fed: how to check inflation without lifting rates so high that economic growth is snuffed out. But the challenge is especially acute now. Soaring energy prices have nudged up inflation pressures at the same time the Fed has been steadily lifting rates. Now, Mr. Bernanke must pick the right time to stop the increases.

The matter could be further complicated because some have questioned Mr. Bernanke's resolve on price stability. Four years ago, he made comments about using loose money to fend off a very different threat: deflation.

Today, there is pressure on Mr. Bernanke to keep tightening. Sixty-one percent of the economists said it's more important for Mr. Bernanke to establish his anti-inflation credentials than it is to avoid overshooting on rates.

"It's hard to put the inflation genie back in the bottle," said Michael P. Niemira, chief economist for the International Council of Shopping Centers. "If you raise rates a little too much, it's much easier to go back."

On average, the economists expect the federal-funds rate, charged on overnight loans between banks, to be 4.75% by June and to remain at that level through year-end. That suggests the Bernanke Fed would raise the funds rate from its current 4.5% and then halt the string of increases embarked upon in June 2004, when the funds rate sat at a 46-year low of 1%.

Some economists think the central bank will be more aggressive than the average forecast suggests: 22 predict the funds rate will be 5% by June. But only four see the Fed moving beyond 5% this year, and 10 expect policy makers to reverse course and trim rates in the second half. David Rosenberg of Merrill Lynch thinks the Fed is done tightening and that it will cut rates by a full point, to 3.5%, by December.

Eyes on Prices

Inflation as measured by the Labor Department's consumer-price index is forecast to diminish this year: the economists predict the CPI will increase 3% in annual terms in May but only 2.4% in November. The CPI was up 3.4%, year over year, in December 2005, the last month for which data are available.

Just over half of the economists surveyed said energy prices will be the most important factor in determining the inflation rate this year. But while economists lifted their forecasts for oil prices from the levels they predicted in a survey conducted in December, the economists said they don't expect oil to reach a level that would stoke significant increases in overall inflation.

ABOUT THE SURVEY

The Wall Street Journal surveys a group of more than 50 economists throughout the year. Broad surveys on more than 10 major economic indicators are conducted semiannually, at midyear and at year-end. Between each semiannual survey, four monthly updates are conducted for the most closely watched forecasts. This is the monthly survey for February. For prior installments of the semiannual and monthly surveys, see: WSJ.com/Economist3.

Although oil prices have soared over the past year, businesses generally haven't passed their higher energy costs on to their customers in the form of higher prices. The economists predicted that crude oil would need to be sustained at around $80 a barrel in order for businesses to be compelled to do so and for that to cause a significant increase in inflation pressures across the economy.

Economists predicted crude-oil futures prices would stand at around $62 a barrel in June, compared with the $56.29 they forecast in a survey conducted in December. Today, crude oil for delivery next month stands at around $63.

Oil's price is less significant than how the Fed responds to it, according to Neal Soss of Credit Suisse First Boston. "The monetary policy response to a rise in the oil price is the relevant factor that would help determine the extent of pass-through by businesses and any subsequent inflation pressure across the economy," he said.

First-Quarter Bounce

DOJ_NMG_0013942

The Commerce Department said last month that gross domestic product, the broadest measure of U.S. economic output, grew at an annual rate of 1.1% during the final quarter of 2005. That was substantially slower than the 4.1% rate of growth that was reported for the third quarter.

But the weak reading hasn't rattled the economists. Fifty-six percent said the report doesn't worry them because they believe that any weakness has since passed. Thirteen percent believe the data will be revised to show a stronger rate of growth (the government will issue two more readings on fourth-quarter GDP). Only four economists say the report heralds a weakening expansion.

The economists foresee growth rebounding sharply during the first three months of 2006, clocking in at a 4.3% annual rate, up from the 3.6% rate of growth that they forecast in the last survey and the highest average forecast since economists were first asked for first-quarter predictions in May.

Mr. Niemira said the first quarter should be a "reactive quarter" where many of the categories that were weak at the end of 2005, such as consumer spending and the trade balance, rebound. But he worries the consumer is facing strains, such as mild job growth, that could pinch spending, and thus the economy, down the road.

The economists expect growth to taper somewhat as the year wears on, to a 3.3% rate in the second quarter, a 3.1% rate in the third quarter, and a 3% rate in the fourth quarter. They see only a 15% chance of a recession over the next 12 months.

Risks to Growth

When asked about their biggest worry for the U.S. outlook this year, 38% said they were most concerned about a weakening housing market. A slowdown in consumer spending ranked as the top concern for 23% of the economists, while three said they were wary of a possible slowdown in business outlays.

On a broader scale, 48% said that an energy-price shock posed the most danger for the global economy in 2006, while 23% view terrorism as the greatest potential threat to global growth.

Among other findings in the survey:

• The economists expect the spread between short- and long-term interest rates to remain tight. They predict the yield on the three-month Treasury bill will be 4.71% in June and 4.67% in December, while they expect the yield on the 10-year note to be 4.79% in June and 4.88% in December.

• Nonfarm business productivity is expected to grow 2.4% in 2006, on average. Productivity, or output per hours worked, rose 2.7% during 2005, though it fell 0.6% during the fourth quarter.

Life After Fed Proves Tricky For Greenspan (FT)

By Richard Beales And Jennifer Hughes In New York And Andrew Balls In Washington

Financial Times, February 10, 2006

Barely a week after leaving the US Federal Reserve, Alan Greenspan has been reminded how tricky life can be in the private sector for a man revered as the world's greatest former central banker.

His comments at a Wall Street dinner on Tuesday rippled through currency and bond market trading rooms on Thursday, drawing comment not just on what he did - or maybe didn't - say but whether he should have said anything at all.

The remarks, during a talk for bankers and top hedge fund clients of Lehman Brothers, were interpreted as relatively hawkish on the US interest rate outlook, and contributed to a modest rise in the dollar and a decline in Treasury prices. Earlier on Tuesday Mr Greenpan spoke by video link to a Tokyo conference organised by CLSA, the Asian investment banking unit of Credit Agricole.

According to one person who was present at the dinner, Mr Greenspan made upbeat comments on the short-term outlook for the US economy, while noting the uncertainty over the slowdown in the housing market and how its impact on consumer spending would not be known for six months.

"By 7.30am, two people [from Lehman] had called us," said Anthony Karydakis, chief fixed income strategist at JPMorgan Asset Management. "Greenspan qualified his remarks in a number of ways, but people tried to keep only the soundbites," said Mr Karydakis, who did not attend the dinner.

DOJ_NMG_0013943

Mr Greenspan, according to the person present, also said there was plenty of liquidity in global financial markets that was supporting activity, and that the low level of long-term interest rates, as a result of global economic forces, may have muted the impact of the Fed's interest rate increases since June 2004 to some degree. He also talked about the dangers posed to the US and global economies by a rise in protectionism.

While these are familiar themes that Mr Greenspan discussed in public before leaving the Fed, some observers suggested he would have done better to defer his appearances at least until next week when Ben Bernanke, the new chairman, is due to present the central bank's twice-yearly monetary policy report to the US Congress for the first time. "I'm surprised he encroached on the blackout," said one trader.

Others questioned Mr Greenspan's willingness to speak to a small audience of hedge fund luminaries such as Stanley Druckenmiller of Soros Fund Managment. "I thought it was somewhat innopportune on Greenspan's part to go to a forum that he knew could cause ripples," said Mr Karydakis. "It was inevitable, and Greenspan should have known that. If he didn't, he could be accused of naivete."

An associate of Mr Greenspan declined to comment on his appearance at the dinner or the content of his remarks. The Fed also declined to comment, saying the central bank no longer spoke on behalf of its former chairman. "Board members who complete their term may meet with and speak to groups without restriction provided they reveal no confidential information," a spokesman said.

Will Lawyers Get Hung Up In Quest For Cell Phone Records? (LAW)

By Tresa Baldas, The National Law Journal

National Law Journal, February 10, 2006

The sale of cell phone records over the Internet -- a hot topic that recently spurred litigation, legislation and a federal investigation -- has more than a few lawyers nervous.

Attorneys are among the top customers of the controversial Web sites, according to private investigators, privacy advocates and Web site operators who sell the phone records.

"Let's put it this way, the legal profession is keeping it alive," said Rob Douglas, a former private eye turned security consultant who has helped the Federal Trade Commission investigate and prosecute online operators that sell phone records.

"I've investigated them with the federal government and in private lawsuits ... and in every single case, the overwhelming majority of users of these companies are attorneys," Douglas said.

These attorneys include divorce lawyers, who want to know who feuding spouses are talking to; business lawyers, who want to know who their clients' competitors are talking to; and employment lawyers, who want to know if employees are selling any trade secrets.

The online data industry has come under intense scrutiny in recent months, triggering private lawsuits and federal and state investigations.

In the last two weeks, four wireless carriers -- Cingular, Verizon, Sprint Nextel and T-Mobile -- have filed lawsuits against Web site operators for allegedly using trickery to obtain customers' phone records. State attorneys general in Illinois and Missouri filed similar lawsuits against rogue Internet operators in January, while Texas said it was investigating such Web sites. Illinois v. First Information Specialist, No. 2006CH29 (Sangamon Co., Ill., Cir. Ct.).

The FTC is investigating 40 Web sites that were named defendants in a complaint filed by the Electronic Privacy Information Center, a Washington nonprofit privacy advocacy group. And on Capitol Hill, three lawmakers in recent weeks introduced bills to outlaw the sale of phone lists. The U.S. House Energy and Commerce Committee held a hearing last week to determine how widespread the problem of cell phone data theft is, and whether or not the cell phone industry is doing enough to protect customers' records from data burglars.

Given all the controversy surrounding the sale of cell phone records, attorneys were reluctant to comment on the subject. Of the more than a dozen divorce, business and criminal defense attorneys contacted for this story, none said they used the tactic. Most wouldn't even talk about the subject. One lawyer said, "Good luck finding anyone to admit to it."

DOJ_NMG_0013944

Attorney Paul Murphy, a business litigator with Murphy Rosen & Cohen in Santa Monica, Calif., said he has sometimes used people-finder Web sites for as little as $10 a search to help locate potential witnesses involved in business disputes. But he never tried to get cell phone records, he said, adding that he was unaware that such Web sites even existed until about a month ago.

"The interesting thing now is that other lawyers are being made aware of this," Murphy said, noting that some attorneys might now be tempted to try it. "It can be a very valuable tool to try to get information to see who's calling people ... but it does concern me that this could violate people's privacy."

Jay Patel, manager of www.abika.com, one of the 40 Web sites named in the FTC complaint, defended the sale of cell phone records over the Internet, calling it a legitimate business tool for the legal profession and law enforcement. "Many of the searches are used by lawyers, private investigators, bail bond agents, law enforcement and even some government agencies use the searches. Many people who have been victim[s] of fraud use the searches," Patel said. "There have been many cases where searches have helped people prove they're innocent or save themselves from harm."

Patel, however, recently stopped selling cell phone records, saying "after the media coverage there was such a huge demand for these searches that anybody and everybody started requesting it. This made it hard to vet the ones with a legitimate need or not ... To tell you the truth, many people started practically begging for it."

Another Web site named in the FTC complaint, www.locatecell.com, also recently stopped providing cell phone searches, but only on customers of Cingular Wireless, T-Mobile and Verizon, which, along with the states of Illinois and Missouri, are suing the site's owners over the sale of phone records.

A lawyer representing the operators of locatecell.com, Philip L. Schwartz of the Law Offices of P.L. Schwartz in Boca Raton, Fla., did not return calls seeking comment.

Meanwhile, several lawyers and privacy experts argue that the law is gray in the area of cell phone privacy, noting that there is no statute on the books that criminalizes getting or selling phone records.

"Are cell phone records private? We probably all assumed that they were, but the answer is probably to the contrary. We probably have some privacy interest but it's not protected by common law or statute," said Harold J. Krent, dean of the Chicago-Kent College of Law. Krent noted that given the vagueness of the law, attorneys who obtain cell phone records via the Internet are not doing anything illegal or unethical.

Washington attorney Frank Morris, with Epstein Becker & Green, who advises companies on privacy matters, noted that the "problem right now is that there are no rules." Morris said he has never tried to get cell phone records via the Internet, but has heard of other lawyers doing it. "There does seem to be a lot of smoke around it."

Conservatives Unsettled About Movement's Future (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney And David D. Kirkpatrick

The New York Times, February 10, 2006

WASHINGTON, Feb. 9 — Despite the triumph of placing two conservatives on the Supreme Court within four months, leaders of the conservative movement these days seem less celebratory than divided.

Heading into a midterm Congressional election in which the enthusiasm of conservative advocates could play a vital role in determining how Republicans fare, conservative leaders face internal rifts over polarizing issues and are dogged by a sense that a Republican-led Congress and a Republican president are not taking the nation in the proper direction on some critical matters, party leaders said.

The fissures were evident as members gathered here on Thursday for the first day of the annual Conservative Political Action Conference. The first session was marked by disagreement over whether to support a White House plan to allow some illegal immigrants to work legally within the United States and challenges to the legality of the Bush administration's program of eavesdropping without warrants on communications between Americans in the United States and people abroad who might have links to terrorism.

DOJ_NMG_0013945

In interviews, conservative leaders emphasized their admiration for President Bush, and said they were heartened by the placement of Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. on the Supreme Court. But they made it clear that that was not enough.

The leaders expressed concern about the loyalty of elected Republicans in Washington to the conservative agenda, complained about the growth of spending in Mr. Bush's latest budget and said they were uncertain, at a time when Congressional Republicans are squirming under the glare of a corruption inquiry, of the future of the movement.

"The degree to which the conservative movement is dissatisfied is very real," said Newt Gingrich, the former House speaker, who will give the closing speech at the conference on Saturday. "Conservatism is at its biggest crossroads since Reagan was nominated in 1980."

Senator Sam Brownback, a conservative Republican from Kansas, said, "They are feeling good as far as the judiciary is concerned. There is a strong feeling that one of the things that we campaigned on is coming through. But people are concerned about spending. And there is a strong feeling that immigration needs to be gotten under control."

David Keene, the chairman of the American Conservative Union, said, "There is some frustration, and some belief that both the president and folks in Congress have forgotten what it is we want done, what it is that gets us behind them."

The sentiments — coming on the 25th anniversary of the inauguration of President Ronald Reagan — reflect the strains that this diverse and powerful political coalition faces while Mr. Bush struggles to regain his political clout and House Republicans try to settle down after the departure of Representative Tom DeLay of Texas as majority leader. It was also evidence, coming after the Supreme Court victories, of what even some conservatives said was the difficulty of sating their segment of the electorate.

Paul Weyrich, chairman of the Free Congress Foundation and a founder of the modern conservative movement, said he was fielding a host of messages from conservatives complaining about White House policies on immigration, spending and the war in Iraq.

"If I just went by what I am getting on a daily basis," Mr. Weyrich said, "I would say that Republican nervousness is justified."

Some conservatives scoffed at the dissatisfaction, saying that the Supreme Court accomplishment alone established a conservative legacy for Mr. Bush that would reshape the country.

"The last 12 months have been a very good year," said Grover G. Norquist, a conservative with close ties to the White House. "For all the talk about DeLay, Katrina, government spending too much, dah-dah, dah-dah, dah-dah — excuse me: Roberts. Alito. So as much as people want to say, 'I didn't get X, Y and Z,' I say, 'Roberts and Alito.' "

Republicans in Congress said they were aware of conservative disappointment with them, particularly regarding spending and the continued growth in the size of government.

"Spending is our Achilles heel," said Senator Lindsey Graham, Republican of South Carolina. "The one issue that I find we are the weakest on is we have been in change of this government 10 years and it is growing too much. If we don't show spending control, it is a bust."

Senator Tom Coburn, Republican of Oklahoma and a conservative champion when elected in 2004, said Mr. Bush's 2007 budget, while a start, was "not good enough."

"I believe he should have made a request for the American people to sacrifice," Mr. Coburn said. "There are plenty of things to trim, and the president needs to lead on that."

Some conservatives were scornful of White House efforts to allow at least some illegal immigrants to work legally in this country, and some challenged the legality of Mr. Bush's surveillance program, saying that it was an abuse of presidential power and that Mr. Bush should come to the Congress and ask for authority to allow it.

"Think hard down the road to a future administration not occupied by the people we have now," said Bob Barr, a former congressman from Georgia. "We have to keep that precedent in mind: That gauntlet, if we throw it down, will be taken up by someone in the future that we really don't like and be used against us."

Mr. Graham said many conservatives like himself were troubled by the administration's arguments for its program to eavesdrop on communications. "The inherent power argument, if you take it to the natural conclusion, there is no role for Congress in a time of war," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0013946

Vice President Dick Cheney drew restrained applause Thursday night when he offered a defense of the surveillance program at a dinner of conservative leaders, reflecting the ambivalent feeling among many conservatives toward the program.

America At A Crossroads (WT)

By Newt Gingrich

The Washington Times, February 10, 2006

For over three decades now, American history has been written on the right. The crossroads confronted by conservatives have been America's crossroads, and the path forward charted by conservatives has consistently been the path of the nation. Today, America, and therefore conservatives too -- stand at another crossroads, with another set of historic choices that will determine whether we leave our children and grandchildren a country as safe, prosperous and free as the country our parents and grandparents fought and worked to give us.

Throughout the 1970s, Ronald Reagan argued that the choice faced by Americans was not between left and right but between up and down -- down toward "the totalitarianism of the ant heap" or up toward "that shining city on a hill."

In the 1990s, conservatives again spoke to the hopes of a broad majority of Americans. The choice then, as we framed it, was between the arrogance and stagnation bred of 40 years of one-party congressional government or restoring the bonds of trust between the people and their elected representatives.

Today, the world has been freed of Soviet totalitarianism but faces a more committed fascist-like threat from the irreconcilable wing of Islam. At home, welfare reform has proved that even the poorest Americans can make their own futures, but other government programs continue to make people worse off the longer they stay in them. For example, children covered by Medicaid are nearly six times more likely to be treated for severe obesity than are children with private insurance.

As before, our choices aren't necessarily easy, but they are simple. One path leads backward to decline and defeat. It is the path of government dependence at home and American surrender abroad. It is the path led by the rich and powerful who stood and applauded the president's State of the Union admission that Congress failed to pass a plan to save Social Security. It is the path of those who put party politics above controlling our borders; who embrace the easy illusion of protectionism over the hard work of competition. The path of those who would surrender self-government to the rule of judges and exchange property rights for government confiscation, religious freedom for sterile secularism, and freedom of speech for supposed campaign finance reform.

The other path is the way forward, toward winning the future. What does it mean to "win the future"? It means to chart a course, as Ronald Reagan once said, that "will preserve for our children this, the last best hope of man on earth." It is the path of limited, effective government at home and an unapologetic defense of American values abroad.

The way forward will be led by those who understand that the problem in Washington isn't merely Jack Abramoff; it's a government so powerful and bloated that a special-interest group would decide it is worth their while to spend $80 million to hire Jack Abramoff. It is the path of those who believe a balanced budget is not only a financial imperative, but is a moral imperative because massive government is inherently corrupting. And the way forward is the path of those who know that true compassion lies in not sacrificing the well-being of the poor for the well-being of the bureaucracy; of those who understand that there is something profoundly wrong when the federal government's largest single health program makes poor children less, not more, healthy.

All of Western civilization joins America at this crossroads. Abroad, the path of defeat and decline is followed by those who would censor our civilization on behalf of the fascist tyrants of the irreconcilable wing of Islam. It is seen in the pathetic weakness of governments that accept lectures on tolerance from theocrats who oppress women and outlaw all religions but their own. It is the path of those who would prop up Hamas with financial contributions while Hamas remains committed to terrorism and the destruction of Israel; those who ignore Iran's genocidal intentions, despite the clarity of its leader's rhetoric; and those who would abandon the people of Iraq to butchers, bombers and beheaders.

There is a better way -- a way forward toward a future that defends American values and preserves American civilization. The path toward winning America's future abroad begins with a few simple but resolute steps. Formally protest the lack of freedom of religion in Saudi Arabia. Isolate Hamas until it renounces terrorism and the destruction of Israel. Demand complete onsite inspections of nuclear facilities in Iran. Support Iranian democrats. Force the Syrians to stop aiding terrorists in Iraq. Withdraw American troops from Iraq as victory permits, not as advocates of appeasement demand.

DOJ_NMG_0013947

Twice before we've stood at the crossroads, and twice before conservatives have led the way forward to greater safety, prosperity and freedom for all Americans. Today, the stakes are higher than ever before. Our fellow Americans are once again looking to conservatives and asking this question: What are you doing to win the future?

Former House Speaker Newt Gingrich is a senior fellow at the American Enterprise Institute and author of "Winning the Future: A 21st Century Contract with America."

Anti-war Mom Sheehan Will Not Run For Senate (REU-Y2)

Reuters, February 10, 2006

Cindy Sheehan, the anti-Iraq war activist whose son was killed in the conflict there, put an end to speculation on Thursday that she would launch a long-shot bid to become a U.S. senator from California.

Sheehan, speaking in front of San Francisco City Hall, said she would not run for the office.

"If I thought that running for Senate would bring our young people home more quickly I would do it in a minute, but I am not convinced that that would do so," Sheehan said.

A campaign would have pitted her against California's senior senator, Dianne Feinstein, a Democrat who is one of the state's most popular politicians.

Although experts and polls suggest Feinstein, in office since 1992, will win reelection easily, a campaign by Sheehan would have provided her with a platform for her anti-war message.

Sheehan, 48, became a central figure in the U.S. anti-war movement last summer after she camped out outside President George W. Bush's Texas ranch to call for a withdrawal of U.S. forces. Her soldier son Casey was killed in Iraq in 2004.

Sheehan has continued to stay in the news. Last week, police arrested her at the House of Representatives shortly before Bush gave his annual State of the Union address because she was wearing a T-shirt with an anti-war slogan.

On January 29 she met Venezuela's left-wing president, Hugo Chavez, who also criticized Bush.

No Senate Run For Activist Cindy Sheehan (AP-Y2)

AP2, February 10, 2006

Peace activist Cindy Sheehan said Thursday she will not run against U.S. Sen. Dianne Feinstein (news, bio, voting record) in the Democratic primary.

Sheehan, who camped outside President Bush's ranch in Texas to protest the Iraq war, said she won't challenge the state's senior senator even though she thinks Feinstein hasn't done enough to oppose the war. Sheehan's 24-year-old son was killed in Iraq in 2004.

"I think I'm more effective on the outside than on the inside," Sheehan said.

During a trip to Venezuela last month, Sheehan said supporters had encouraged her to take on Feinstein in the June primary.

Sheehan, 48, was arrested last week before Bush's State of the Union address and ejected from the House gallery on a charge of unlawful conduct for wearing a T-shirt with an anti-war message. Capitol Police later dropped the charge, but Sheehan said Thursday she plans to sue over the incident.

Sheehan also said she plans to pitch her tent outside the president's ranch in April.

Steele's Words At Meeting Faulted (BSUN)

By Jennifer Skalka

The Baltimore Sun, February 10, 2006

Discussing his position on embryonic stem cell research with Baltimore Jewish leaders yesterday, Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele said he is "concerned about the destruction of human life" and made a comparison between the controversial science and experiments done on Jews during the Holocaust.

DOJ_NMG_0013948

"You of all folks know what happens when people decide they want to experiment on human beings, when they want to take your life and use it as a tool," said Steele, a Republican candidate for U.S. Senate, to a crowd of about 40 at a Baltimore Jewish Council board meeting. "I know that as well in my community, out of our experience with slavery, and so I'm very cautious when people say this is the best new thing, this is going to save lives."

Steele's remarks, which followed a well-received speech about his trip to Israel in November, came in response to a board member's question about Steele's stance on embryonic stem cell research. His answer stunned many in the audience.

"If the lieutenant governor was drawing a comparison between stem cell research and human medical experimentation during the Holocaust, he must understand the pain this kind of analogy would inflict on survivors and their families," Art Abramson, executive director of the Baltimore Jewish Council, said in a statement to The Sun. "We absolutely reject any comparisons between ethical and lifesaving medical research, and the horrors committed by the Nazis in their evil drive to create a master race. We welcome any clarification Lt. Gov. Steele can offer about his remarks."

Steele later issued a statement expanding on his comment.

"When I was asked the question about stem cell research, I had just finished speaking at length about my first trip to Israel and the powerful memories I had of my visit to the Holocaust museum there," Steele said. "Those memories have had a lasting impression on me, but in no way did I intend to equate the two or trivialize the pain and suffering of more than six million Jews."

Jewish Council board member Michele Lax said after the lunch that Steele's comments revealed a "total lack of sensitivity."

"I was just really shocked and outraged," said Lax, a retired attorney from Owings Mills. "I can't believe that he could make a comparison to the Nazis with embryonic stem cell research, which saves lives. It just shows you what his true colors are and how far right wing he is."

Sam Penn, a retired businessman and the board member who questioned Steele, said he thought the lieutenant governor's answer was "ludicrous."

"The Holocaust, they were killing people," Penn said. "Stem cell research, we want to help people."

Abba Poliakoff, a Baltimore attorney and board member, said that while he disagrees with Steele's position on embryonic stem cell research, he was not offended by his remarks.

"If a person has a strong moral and ethical belief, and he takes his guidance and he takes his lesson from what happened in the Holocaust, how could I fault the person?" said Poliakoff, who attended the lunch.

Myrna Cardin, wife of Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin, a Baltimore Democrat also running in the race for Senate, attended the luncheon in her role as past board president. Through a Cardin campaign spokesman, she declined to comment, but the congressman issued a statement.

"Michael Steele's comments were offensive to both millions of Americans who stand to benefit from this research and to Holocaust survivors and their families," the congressman said. "Michael Steele has it backward. This is not about experimenting on humans. It is about saving lives. "

A Catholic and former seminarian who often speaks about his faith, Steele espouses strong moral views and is opposed to the death penalty and abortion. The Catholic Church teaches that life begins at conception and opposes the use of embryos in scientific research, saying a human being is destroyed in the process.

In answering Penn's question about embryonic stem cell research, Steele said that "the governor and I have pretty squarely laid out where we are on that."

"I'm very concerned when we start tinkering around with life," Steele said during the council event, adding, "I'm very concerned about the destruction of life."

A spokesman for Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. did not return a call for comment.

Steele expressed support for research using adult stem cells but said embryonic stem cell research could be "a very slippery slope."

The Maryland General Assembly is debating state funding for stem cell research, with Democratic lawmakers proposing $25 million a year for five years for a plan that emphasizes embryonic research. Their legislation outlaws human cloning and commits to using only those embryos that would otherwise be discarded from fertility clinics.

DOJ_NMG_0013949

Ehrlich has proposed $20 million for stem cell research, saying that science should determine what types of research are funded. The Maryland Technology Development Corp., a quasi-public agency that falls within the state Department of Business and Economic Development, would administer the grants under the governor's plan. Ehrlich has also promised $13.5 million for a new center for regenerative medicine in Baltimore.

Scientists believe stem cell research could produce cures for a range of debilitating illnesses such as Parkinson's and Alzheimer's diseases. But many conservatives, as well as leaders of the Catholic Church, echo what Steele said - that adult stem cell research shows promise, while embryonic, which uses cells harvested from human embryos, is unethical.

Curt I. Civin, a cancer research expert at the Johns Hopkins University, expressed disappointment with Steele, saying that it doesn't sound like he stands with the governor, who has indicated an openness to embryonic research.

"I certainly would reject any comparison between what stem cell researchers want to do and the Holocaust," Civin said. "What stem cell researchers want to do is learn about diseases. ... This is so unlike the medical horrors that were done during the Holocaust that I can't even begin to compare them. We're trying to save lives by doing this."

Douglas Greenberg, executive director of the University of Southern California Shoah Foundation Institute, a group that was founded by director Steven Spielberg and has recorded the testimony of 52,000 Holocaust survivors, said he believes that politicians should never use the Holocaust to make a contemporary political point. He said he was pleased that Steele revised his remarks.

"What he originally said, whether he intended it to be or not, is an insult to those men and women who are still alive who survived these awful experiments," Greenberg said. "And also to the memory of 6 million murdered men and women and children."

In Nazi Germany, aides to Hitler conducted experiments on humans in hopes of producing a pure Aryan race, and killed millions of Jews, Gypsies and other minorities in ethnic-cleansing executions.

Bradley Wine, a member of Steele's Senate campaign finance committee and the Greater Washington chairman of the Republican Jewish Coalition, said that he knows the lieutenant governor well and that they have often discussed the shared experiences of Jews, Catholics and African-Americans. Wine also said he and Steele have discussed the "profound impact" his trip to Israel, an outreach effort to explore business opportunities with the state, had on him.

"I know that he would never utilize a reference to the Holocaust lightly or in a way designed to be political," Wine said.

No Joke: Maryland Democrats Will Honor Steele (WT)

By S.a. Miller

The Washington Times, February 10, 2006

ANNAPOLIS -- The Maryland Democratic Party has been relentless in criticizing Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele in his run for U.S. Senate, but party officials say that won't stop them from paying homage to the conservative Republican during Black History Month.

"Michael Steele is an important figure in African-American history in Maryland. There is no question about it," said Derek Walker, executive director of the state Democratic Party.

"We should be proud of the achievements of African-Americans, regardless of what party they are from or what their background is," he said.

Mr. Steele, the first black elected to statewide office in Maryland, will be celebrated Monday as part of the state Democratic Party's campaign to honor a black Marylander each day this month, Mr. Walker said.

The party distributes a daily e-mail spotlighting the day's honoree.

When told of the party's plans, Mr. Steele said it sounded like a joke -- but added that he would be appreciative if the Democrats truly mean to honor him.

"I appreciate the honor, and I thank them for it," the lieutenant governor said.

In recent days, Democrats have scolded Mr. Steele for not taking a public stance on the nomination of U.S. Supreme Court Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr., for opposing the $1 increase to Maryland's minimum wage, for not criticizing President Bush's budget proposal and for being allied with congressional Republicans who received low civil-rights scores from the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

DOJ_NMG_0013950

"We'll see what the next e-mail they send out looks like," Mr. Steele said.

Some black Democratic lawmakers said it is about time their party credited Mr. Steele for raising the profile of black Marylanders in state politics.

"I think it is a great idea," said Delegate Emmett C. Burns Jr., Baltimore County Democrat. "Michael Steele is an honorable man."

The party also plans to honor Kweisi Mfume, a Democrat and former NAACP leader who has been at odds with his party over its lackluster support for his Senate run.

Mfume campaign spokesman Dan Walter said it is "appropriate" that the party would honor Mr. Mfume and Mr. Steele.

Racial issues have overshadowed Maryland's Senate race -- one of the most closely watched contests in the nation -- as the Democratic Party struggles to shore up black votes lost to Mr. Steele and the Republican Party that backed him in 2002.

Black Democratic lawmakers said racially tinged attacks against Mr. Steele are fair because he is a conservative Republican, and key Democratic leaders -- such as gubernatorial candidates Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley and Montgomery County Executive Douglas M. Duncan, both white -- declined to repudiate their comments.

In addition, black Democrats have blamed Mr. Mfume's fundraising woes on their leaders' push to give the Senate nomination to Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin, a white Democrat and 10-term congressman.

Mr. Walker has said the party is "militantly neutral" about Democratic contenders seeking to replace retiring Sen. Paul S. Sarbanes.

Still, Democratic endorsements for Mr. Cardin and Mr. Mfume have divided closely along racial lines.

Largess Preceded Md. Vote On Wal-Mart (WP)

By John Wagner And Ann E. Marimow

The Washington Post, February 10, 2006

Two labor unions pushing for legislation that could expand Wal-Mart's health benefits made campaign contributions to 48 members of the Maryland General Assembly in the month before the high-profile vote.

The contributions, totaling more than $36,000 in the run-up to the January vote, came to more than a quarter of the state's legislators from affiliates of the Service Employees International Union and the United Food and Commercial Workers International Union, according to analysis of campaign finance reports filed last month.

"They were obviously trying to get somebody's attention," Bobbie Walton, executive director of the watchdog group Common Cause Maryland, said of the two unions, which were pitted against the retailing giant on the issue.

The House and Senate decided last month, with just a few votes to spare, to override Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr.'s veto of the bill setting a threshold for benefits provided by large employers.

Wal-Mart retained as many as a dozen Annapolis lobbyists for the fight, which drew national attention, and tried to sway public opinion through radio and newspaper ads. This week, a retailing association aligned with the company filed suit in an attempt to block the law.

But in the weeks before the override vote, Wal-Mart made only seven direct political contributions to lawmakers, one of which was returned, according to Maryland State Board of Elections records.

The final weeks before the legislature convenes are typically feverish ones for fundraising because Maryland law bans contributions during the 90-day sessions.

But donations from SEIU and UFCW, collectively, were more than seven times what the unions had given previously in the month before sessions started, dating back to 1999, the first year that contributions are recorded in a database maintained by the elections board.

Moreover, about a third of the lawmakers who received money in the weeks just before the session had not received any contributions from these union chapters before Ehrlich's veto of the bill last spring. All told, SEIU affiliates contributed $20,570 in the month before the vote, and UFCW affiliates contributed $16,050.

DOJ_NMG_0013951

Combined, the contributions exceeded what the two unions gave lawmakers in the final months of the 2002 campaign, the last time state lawmakers stood for election.

"Our members have given in greater amount to our political action funds because they understand the importance of the upcoming election year, due in no small part to what they viewed as a list of unpopular vetoes made by the current governor," said Robert L. Moore, president of the SEIU chapter that serves Maryland and the District.

Aides to Ehrlich (R) suggested that the money was more evidence of the unions' role in muscling through the legislation, which requires employers with 10,000 or more workers to spend at least 8 percent of their payroll on health benefits -- or make a contribution to Medicaid, the state's health program for the poor. Wal-Mart is the only known Maryland employer that does not meet that obligation.

"There's no question. If you had eyes, you could see the sea of purple here," said Alan Friedman, Ehrlich's director of legislative relations, referring to the purple T-shirts worn by SEIU members present during debate over the bill, which was also championed by health care advocates.

The union efforts extended beyond campaign contributions. Days before the veto-override vote, the state chapter of the AFL-CIO announced that it would not endorse any lawmaker who did not support the override.

Other groups active in the debate included Wake-Up Wal-Mart and Wal-Mart Watch, two national organizations that monitor the company's business practices. Wake-Up Wal-Mart is funded by the UCFW, and Wal-Mart Watch receives money from the SEIU.

Among the lawmakers who received union contributions in the month before the session began was Del. Norman H. Conway (D-Wicomico), who said he sided with the unions last spring because of concerns about the state's rising Medicaid costs. But, he said, he was open to hearing Wal-Mart's case.

The day before the House voted to override the bill, he received a call from a Wal-Mart vice president in Arkansas. Conway wanted a guarantee that the company would build a proposed distribution plant with the potential to create hundreds of jobs in the county next to his rural district.

Conway said that he did not get the commitment and that he decided to stick with his original position.

Conway attributed the $1,500 in donations from two SEIU chapters more to his status as chairman of the Appropriations Committee than to his vote on the "Wal-Mart bill."

"Money doesn't influence me," he said. "I look at the issue and try to understand the impacts. I'm going to do what I ultimately think is the right thing."

Just before the session began Jan. 11, Del. Murray D. Levy (D-Charles), who voted against the bill last spring, received $100 apiece from SEIU and UFCW chapters.

Levy said he was bombarded with phone calls and e-mails from both sides of the debate. Despite the pressure, Levy did not change his mind, because he said that going after one company was not a solution to the massive problem of health care.

Wal-Mart delivered just a handful of contributions, totaling $1,650, leading up to the session. And, in one case, the company's check was returned.

Del. Joseph J. Minnick (D-Baltimore County), who did not vote in April, said he was receptive to Wal-Mart's case that "government should not be in business's business."

He ultimately voted to override the veto, however, because he said companies should help pick up the cost of health care. When he realized that Wal-Mart had written him a check for a fundraiser just before the session began, he decided to give it back.

"If I don't support their issue, I shouldn't be accepting a contribution, plain and simple -- not only Wal-Mart, but anyone else."

An Old Way To Fight AIDS (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 10, 2006

PRESIDENT BUSH HAS BEEN a reliable ally in the global fight against AIDS, proposing to increase federal funding to about $4 billion next year. With so much at stake, efficiency is vital, and according to a growing body of research, one procedure that is relatively inexpensive and can drastically reduce the transmission of AIDS is male circumcision.

DOJ_NMG_0013952

Last fall, the first rigorous trial on the subject conducted in South Africa found that circumcised men are 60% less likely to contract HIV. Researchers, who halted the study early because the results were so convincing, suspect that the foreskin contains a concentration of cells that are easily infected by the virus. Similar studies in Uganda and Kenya are expected to release their preliminary findings this summer. If they're similar, as many predict, health officials and donor countries such as the U.S. should help increase access to a safe and affordable procedure that has gone out of favor in most of the world.

Globally, only a quarter of men are circumcised, and rates are exceptionally low in many areas where HIV is dangerously prevalent, including India, Asia and southern Africa. Even with the increased availability of antiretroviral drugs, AIDS is getting worse in many parts of the world. In 2005, there were 5 million new cases worldwide (including 700,000 children), and 3 million people died of the disease.

Since the South African study was released late last year, health officials in countries such as Botswana and Swaziland have begun phasing in adult and infant circumcision programs, and waiting lists for the procedure at clinics are growing. If public clinics are overrun, people may turn to rural doctors, in which case dangerous and even deadly infections could occur. There also is concern that newly circumcised men may increase risky behavior, so any circumcision program should be accompanied by a strong message reinforcing the need for safe sex.

To a lesser degree, the issue has relevance in the United States. Overall circumcision rates have fallen to just half of all men in recent years, and 16 states — including California — have cut funding for the surgery because of an incorrect belief that it has no medical benefit. Although HIV rates are considerably lower in the United States than in other countries, they are highest among minorities and the poor. HIV rates in those populations could climb once their children become sexually active.

The United States is to be commended for increasing its funding for HIV prevention in recent years. And the Group of 8 industrialized nations has promised to provide universal access to AIDS treatments by 2010. Properly planned circumcision programs should be part of both efforts.

Putin Considers Inviting Hamas Leaders To Moscow (NYT)

By Renwick McLean And Greg Myre

The New York Times, February 10, 2006

MADRID, Feb. 9 — Pulling away from an agreed American and European policy, President Vladimir V. Putin of Russia said Thursday that he was considering inviting the newly victorious leaders of the radical Palestinian Islamic group Hamas to Moscow to discuss solutions to the conflict in the Middle East.

He spoke during a day of chaos and violence in the Gaza Strip, where three armed Palestinians were killed as they attacked Israeli forces and Palestinian gunmen kidnapped an Egyptian diplomat. The kidnapping was the most serious attack against diplomats in Gaza since a United States diplomatic convoy was hit by a roadside bomb in October 2003, killing three security guards.

Speaking at a joint news conference in Madrid with Prime Minister José Luis Rodríguez Zapatero, Mr. Putin rejected suggestions that Russia join with the European Union and the United States in declaring Hamas, which won the Palestinian parliamentary elections on Jan. 25, a terrorist organization.

"I am profoundly convinced that burning bridges in politics is the easiest thing to do, but it has no perspective, it has no future," he said. "Preserving our contacts with Hamas, we are willing in the near future to invite the authorities of Hamas to Moscow to carry out talks."

Hamas responded favorably on Thursday. "If we receive an official invitation to visit Russia, we will visit Russia," said Ismail Haniya, a senior Hamas leader, according to a Reuters report from Gaza City.

But Israeli officials said Mr. Putin's remarks conflicted with the ground rules for negotiations that Russia signed on to in London last month at a meeting of the so-called quartet on the Middle East, which also includes the United States, the European Union and the United Nations. They called on Hamas to renounce violence, disarm militias, recognize Israel and respect previous agreements with it, and implied that international aid would be cut off if changes were not made.

In New York, the Israeli foreign minister, Tzipi Livni, warned that any weakness in dealing with Hamas would "legitimize terror," according to the Israeli ambassador to the United Nations, Dan Gillerman.

DOJ_NMG_0013953

At a lunch meeting with Secretary General Kofi Annan and the ambassadors of all five Security Council permanent members, Ms. Livni said, "Any show of weakness or hesitation on the part of any country and especially a member of the Security Council would only act to legitimize terror and give Hamas a feeling that maybe the international community was weakening," Mr. Gillerman reported.

A senior State Department official said that the administration was surprised and irritated by Mr. Putin's remarks, but that Russia had assured the United States that there would not be any senior-level contacts with Hamas. Asked about Mr. Putin's statement, the official said, "Frankly, it doesn't help."

A spokesman for the Russian Foreign Ministry, Mikhail Kamynin, said Russia would adhere to the approach agreed upon in London. Later Thursday, Russia's special Middle East envoy, Aleksandr Kalugin, said Moscow hoped to bring Hamas "up to international requirements" and draw it into dialogue with Israel, The Moscow Times reported.

While Mr. Putin seemed to catch the Bush administration and some others by surprise, it was not the first time he had voiced such an opinion. In a news conference late last month, after the Palestinian elections, he said Russia had "never regarded Hamas as a terrorist organization," and did not rule out financial aid for a Hamas-led government.

In Gaza, the Egyptian diplomat, Hussam el-Musli, was driving through Gaza City when two masked gunmen shot the tires of his vehicle, pulled him from his car and then drove away with him, according to witness accounts. No group claimed responsibility, and the motive was not clear.

Hamas condemned the kidnapping. But a spokesman, Sami Abu Zuhri, called the attacks along the Israeli border in which three Palestinians were killed "a natural response to the Israeli crimes," a reference to recent Israeli airstrikes that have killed Palestinian militants in Gaza.

The Palestinian leader, Mahmoud Abbas, also denounced the kidnapping, saying in a statement that it was "foreign to the traditions of the Palestinian people."

But Palestinian gunmen in Gaza have repeatedly seized Western journalists and aid workers in recent years, though all have been released unharmed, usually within a few hours. The kidnappers often say their motive is to get jobs in the Palestinian Authority security forces or to secure the release of jailed relatives and fellow militants.

The kidnappers are rarely, if ever, prosecuted by the Palestinian Authority. In some instances, the authority has released prisoners as demanded by the kidnappers. Still, Thursday's kidnapping was highly unusual because the target was from Egypt, a close ally of the Palestinians that often acts as a mediator between Israel and the authority.

Before dawn on Thursday, Israeli soldiers killed two armed Palestinians who attacked the Erez crossing on the Gaza-Israel border, the military said. Israel has been permitting 5,000 Palestinian workers to commute to Israel each day through the crossing, and virtually all pass through Erez during a hectic rush hour well before dawn.

About half of the workers had gone through Erez by 4 a.m. when the flood of laborers suddenly stopped, Israeli officials said. Israel security officers called their Palestinian counterparts, but did not receive a coherent explanation, they said. Then at 4:30 a.m., the two Palestinians attacked an Israeli military position with grenades and gunfire, the military said.

Responsibility for the attack was jointly claimed by Al Aksa Martyrs Brigades, which is part of Mr. Abbas's Fatah movement, and the Popular Resistance Committees, which includes militants from various groups.

Israel closed the crossing after the attack.

A few hours later and a short distance away, Israeli troops shot and killed one of two Palestinians who were planting a bomb along the border fence, according to the Israeli military.

In a separate development, nearly all the 137,000 Palestinian government employees received their overdue January paychecks on Thursday, Palestinian officials said. The Palestinian Authority needs more than $100 million to meet its monthly payroll, and pay is sometimes late.

The authority could face even greater difficulties if Hamas takes over the government as expected in the next few weeks. Israel this week agreed to hand over $54 million in tax and customs revenues that it collected on behalf of the Palestinians, but said it would not continue the monthly transfer if Hamas came to power.

DOJ_NMG_0013954

In another development on Thursday, Israeli radio reported that the Palestinian Authority had released dozens of members of the Islamic Jihad faction who were jailed in the West Bank town of Jericho. The authority has imprisoned some militants wanted by Israel, but Israel complains that they are routinely released after relatively short periods.

Putin To Issue Invite To Hamas Leaders (WP)

By Scott Wilson

The Washington Post, February 10, 2006

JERUSALEM, Feb. 9 -- Russian President Vladimir Putin indicated Thursday that he would soon invite the leaders of Hamas to visit Moscow, signaling the first crack in diplomatic efforts to isolate the radical Islamic group as it prepares to form the next Palestinian cabinet.

"Russia is maintaining contacts with the Hamas organization and intends in the near future to invite the leadership of this organization to Moscow," Putin said at a news conference during a visit to Madrid.

Putin's announcement drew a sharp rebuke from Israeli officials, who said it marked a break from the position held by the group known as the quartet -- Russia, the United States, the European Union and the United Nations -- since Hamas's victory in parliamentary elections last month.

"Israel supports the quartet position -- Russia being a full and active member of the quartet -- as expressed by [U.N. Secretary General] Kofi Annan in the days following the elections, that said Hamas is not a partner for a political dialogue unless, one, it recognizes Israel, two, it abandons terrorism, and three, it accepts the legitimacy of signed agreements," said Mark Regev, the Israeli Foreign Ministry spokesman.

In Washington, U.S. officials were caught off guard by Putin's comments and sought clarification from Russian officials. Like Regev, C. David Welch, the U.S. assistant secretary of state for Near Eastern affairs, noted to reporters that Russia was a member of the quartet and had agreed to the group's stance toward Hamas.

"These are the principles that were clearly articulated now several times by the quartet and again with Russian participation and agreement," Welch said. "We would expect that any meeting that occurs with any Palestinian representative, including Hamas, would emphasize these principles."

Hamas leaders, now touring Arab countries to outline their political program and seek financial support for the nearly bankrupt Palestinian Authority, indicated that they would accept Putin's invitation.

The Palestinian Authority's president, Mahmoud Abbas, is expected to ask Hamas, known formally as the Islamic Resistance Movement, to form the next cabinet when the legislature convenes next week. The movement won 74 of 132 parliamentary seats, imperiling the Palestinian Authority's lifeblood of foreign aid because the United States, Israel and other nations consider Hamas a terrorist organization for carrying out scores of attacks targeting Israeli civilians.

Israel has urged foreign governments to isolate a Palestinian Authority that includes Hamas until the movement recognizes the Jewish state's right to exist. But Hamas leaders have said they have no intention of doing so and would only consider a long-term truce with Israel if it withdraws from all territory it occupied in the 1967 Middle East war.

The Bush administration and European diplomats have publicly endorsed the Israeli position, but Putin's invitation opens a schism in that once-unified front. The quartet is the sponsor of the now-dormant peace plan known as the "road map," which envisions a two-state solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. Hamas does not support that outcome.

In another development, the Palestinian Authority's attorney general, Ahmed Moghani, confirmed that he has frozen more than two dozen bank accounts of former government officials who have been implicated in a widening corruption investigation that dates back nearly a decade. Although the inquiry mostly covers the period when Yasser Arafat ran the Palestinian Authority, the preliminary results have been disclosed in recent days for political reasons.

Moghani has announced that at least $700 million and perhaps far more has been stolen from the Palestinian Authority since 1997. So far he has arrested at least 25 officials of the Fatah movement -- founded by Arafat and now led by Abbas -- which lost its monopoly on power in the Jan. 25 parliamentary elections. The inquiry has found that front companies, construction-contract kickbacks, phantom payrolls and other methods were used to steal perhaps more than $1 billion from the Palestinian Authority, most of it donated by foreign governments.

DOJ_NMG_0013955

Abbas, commonly known as Abu Mazen, authorized the attorney general to announce the preliminary findings before Hamas, which campaigned on an anti-corruption platform, entered parliament. A technical team from the World Bank is also meeting with Palestinian officials to determine whether to release $300 million in emergency funds that the bank withheld from the Palestinian Authority last year after it failed to carry out specified reforms.

"I think by doing this Abu Mazen would like to improve the reputation of Fatah, which is now almost totally destroyed," said Bassem Eid, director of the Palestinian Human Rights Monitoring Group. "In addition, he doesn't want the coming government of Hamas to look into this. Then he would be in trouble."

Also on Thursday, masked gunmen kidnapped the Egyptian military attache in the Gaza Strip a few hundred yards from his office. None of the various Palestinian armed groups asserted responsibility for the abduction. Egypt has played an important role in Gaza, serving as a broker between the various parties whose rivalry has sharpened since the elections.

Earlier in the day, Israeli soldiers killed three Palestinian gunmen in two separate attacks on the Erez crossing into Israel in northern Gaza. Israeli military officials said the men were armed with rifles and hand grenades.

Staff writer Glenn Kessler in Washington contributed to this report.

Putin Invites Hamas To Talks (WT/REU)

By Adrian Croft

The Washington Times, February 10, 2006

MADRID -- Russian President Vladimir Putin yesterday invited Hamas leaders to Moscow, saying his country -- unlike most of the West -- does not consider the winner in the Palestinian elections a terrorist organization.

"Maintaining our contacts with Hamas, we are ready in the near future to invite the Hamas authorities to Moscow to hold talks," Mr. Putin told a press conference in the Spanish capital, Madrid, where he was on a visit.

Ismail Haniyeh, a senior Hamas official, said in Gaza that leaders of the group, whose charter calls for Israel's destruction, "would be delighted" to visit Russia if Mr. Putin tendered a formal invitation.

Hamas, which won a crushing victory over the long-dominant Fatah party in an election on Jan. 25, is considered a terrorist organization by Washington.

Mr. Putin disagreed yesterday.

"We haven't considered Hamas a terrorist organization. Today, we must recognize that Hamas has reached power in Palestine as a result of legitimate elections and we must respect the choice of the Palestinian people," he said.

An Israeli government source voiced surprise at Mr. Putin's comments, calling them a departure from a position taken by a Quartet of international negotiators on Middle East peace, to which Russia belongs along with the United States, European Union and the United Nations.

Israeli Foreign Ministry spokesman Mark Regev said in Jerusalem that no talks should be held with Hamas until it recognized the Jewish state's right to exist and "renounced terror."

State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said in Washington that the Bush administration has "contacted the Russian government about what their intentions are."

"If there are any contacts between the Russian government and Hamas, we would expect that they would send that very clear message, both in public and private, that is contained in the Quartet statement," he said.

At a meeting in London on Jan. 30, Quartet representatives said the Palestinians risked losing international aid if Hamas did not renounce violence and recognize Israel. Hamas has rejected the demand.

A State Department official said Russia had not revealed Mr. Putin's plan to invite Hamas leaders at the Quartet meeting.

Russia's Foreign Ministry said the talks with Hamas will build on the group's agreement last month and will send Hamas a clear signal that it must make "responsible decisions."

"It needs to be stressed that our dialogue with Hamas will run along with contacts which leading regional parties, including Egypt, already have with this organization," the ministry said.

Russia's special Middle East envoy, Alexander Kalugin, was quoted by Itar-Tass news agency as saying Russia hoped to bring Hamas "up to international requirements" and draw it into dialogue with Israel.

DOJ_NMG_0013956

In Gaza yesterday, Palestinian gunmen abducted an Egyptian military attache, the first kidnapping of a diplomat in the turbulent territory where militants hold sway.

The motive for the abduction of Egyptian diplomat Hussam el-Musli was not clear, and no one had taken responsibility.

Gaza has seen a rash of kidnappings since Israel's pullout in September, but foreigners seized by militants with grudges against the Palestinian Authority have been released quickly.

Death Penalty Asked For Beslan Raider, Reviving A Debate (NYT)

By Steven Lee Myers

The New York Times, February 10, 2006

MOSCOW, Feb. 9 — A senior prosecutor on Thursday asked a court in southern Russia to sentence to death the only attacker known to have survived the siege of Middle School No. 1 in Beslan in September 2004. The request rekindles a contentious debate in Russia over capital punishment.

The deputy prosecutor general, Nikolai I. Shepel, made the request as he summed up the case against the defendant, Nurpashi Kulayev, after an emotionally wrought trial. Mr. Shepel said the gravity of the terrorist siege, which ended with the deaths of 331 hostages, warranted a penalty of death, despite a government moratorium on executions that has been in place since 1996.

His appeal came only two days after President Vladimir V. Putin reiterated his personal opposition to the death penalty but said he would move cautiously in seeking its final abolition by the Parliament — years after Russia committed to doing so.

"The court's decision should have a sobering effect on those who want to go down the path of terrorism, so that they know their only future is an unmarked grave," Mr. Shepel said in his remarks, shown on television.

The bloody siege in Beslan by Chechen militants, along with other terrorist attacks, has prompted some officials here to call for the restoration of capital punishment, at least for crimes as serious as terrorism. But such a step would contradict not only Russia's international commitments but also a Constitutional Court ruling in 1999 that declared the death penalty unconstitutional as long as jury trials were not universal.

Since that ruling, jury trials have been established in most regions, but they are used inconsistently. Mr. Kulayev is being tried before a panel of judges, for example.

Mr. Kulayev had admitted taking part in the attack on Beslan, in which the attackers rounded up more than 1,000 hostages at the school. But he denied responsibility for any of the deaths, most of which occurred when the siege ended on the third day in a convulsion of explosions and gunfire.

His trial, which began last summer, has provoked anger and grief among survivors and relatives of the Beslan victims, who wanted the trial to address broader issues.

On Thursday, with the prosecution wrapping up its case against Mr. Kulayev, several relatives announced a hunger strike, protesting that the trial was neither objective nor thorough. "The true culprits have not been named," said one, Ella Kesayeva, according to Interfax.

A verdict could be announced within days.

Russia's moratorium on capital punishment stems from an agreement President Boris N. Yeltsin made in 1996 as a condition for joining the Council of Europe, an organization of 46 nations that oversees legal, political and human rights issues. Government executions have reportedly not been carried out since then, and in 1999, Mr. Yeltsin commuted the death sentences of 716 prisoners.

But Russia did not submit legislation erasing the death penalty from its criminal code by 1999, as it had promised, and it is the only member of the European group that still has the death penalty on the books.

In an interview with Spanish journalists on Tuesday, Mr. Putin said he would defer to Parliament on the issue, but spoke against capital punishment, as he had before. "Any punishment has several goals," he said. "They include correction and retribution. There is no correction in the case of the death penalty, only retribution."

DOJ_NMG_0013957

Even so, polls suggest that a majority of Russians favor the death penalty, as do some legislators, and that has stalled its abolition in Parliament. The Communist leader, Gennadi A. Zyuganov, said Thursday that the Beslan attack underscored the need for capital punishment.

Ella A. Pamfilova, Mr. Putin's human rights adviser, said government leaders needed to defy popular opinion on certain issues. "As for the death penalty," she told Interfax, "our society is already cruel enough."

Tensions Over Russia Set Tone At G-8 Meeting (WT)

By Michael Mainville

The Washington Times, February 10, 2006

MOSCOW -- A meeting of the Group of Eight finance ministers beginning today threatens to be overshadowed by tensions over President Vladimir Putin's record on democracy and Russia's reliability as an energy supplier.

The two-day session, attended by Treasury Secretary John W. Snow, is the first important meeting to be hosted by Russia in its role as this year's president of the powerful G-8 major industrial nations.

Energy security, education, efforts to fight infectious diseases and debt relief for poor countries are all on the agenda. But the tone has been set by Washington's public questioning of Russia's fitness to lead the group and Moscow's prickly response.

Despite its relatively small economy -- about the size of Portugal's -- Russia was added to the G-7 club of Britain, Canada, France, Germany, Italy, Japan and the United States in 1998.

But the West's relationship with Russia has become strained since Mr. Putin moved in recent years to concentrate more power in the Kremlin. And despite some cooperation on containing Iran's nuclear ambitions, Mr. Putin's foreign policy has often been at odds with the West, especially with Russian support for autocratic regimes in Belarus and Uzbekistan.

On Sunday, Sen. John McCain called on G-8 leaders to boycott the group's July summit in St. Petersburg, Russia, saying the country "is neither a democracy nor one of the world's leading economies." He accused the Kremlin of being "in pursuit of autocracy at home and abroad."

Concerns about Russia's commitment to G-8 principles peaked after gas supplies to Ukraine were cut off on Jan. 1 in a price dispute between Moscow and a former ally that has taken a pro-Western stance. The move disrupted gas supplies to Europe, which buys about half its natural gas from Russia.

Moscow insisted it was simply asking Ukraine to pay fair market prices. But senior U.S. officials told The Washington Times this week they believe Russia is using its control of Soviet-era pipelines to hold down purchase prices in Central Asia while skimming huge profits through corrupt middlemen.

Repeated calls seeking comment from the Russian Embassy in Washington yesterday were not returned.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice publicly criticized Russia's actions in the Ukraine gas dispute last month, saying there was a "distance between Russian behavior" and "what would be expected of a responsible member of the G-8."

At a subsequent press conference with French Foreign Minister Philippe Douste-Blazy, Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov complained that a reporter had asked Mr. Douste-Blazy "if [he] wanted to join the criticism of Russia, and did not ask me if I wanted to join the criticism of the United States."

"It hasn't been a very successful start" to Moscow's tenure as G-8 chairman, said Lilia Shevtsova, a political analyst with the Moscow Carnegie Center.

"The dispute with Ukraine created a lot of concerns over Russia's role as an energy superpower at the same time as this unfortunate new law on [nongovernmental organizations] was passed."

Also in January, Mr. Putin signed a law imposing strict curbs on NGOs -- one of the few areas of public life outside state dominance after a Kremlin drive to consolidate control over parliament and regional governments, the media and strategic business sectors.

The London-based Foreign Policy Center, a prominent British think tank with links to Prime Minister Tony Blair, released a report last week saying Russia's presidency of the G-8 was "a PR disaster."

DOJ_NMG_0013958

The center released what it called a "G-8 scorecard" -- assessing Russia according to 12 criteria tied to the G-8's founding declaration, including openness and freedom of speech, rule of law, and economic weight in the world. In no category did Russia score better than "sporadic compliance with G-8 norms" and in many instances it received the worst possible score.

"Russia's faltering chairmanship of the G-8 raises fundamental questions about whether Russia should be a member at all," the center's director, Stephen Twigg, said with the release of the report.

What! No Vodka? Pause In Production Has Russians Uneasy (WSJ)

By Guy Chazan

The Wall Street Journal, February 10, 2006

MOSCOW -- There was an eerie silence last week at ZAO Veda's vodka distillery, one of Russia's biggest. For the first time in its 10-year history, the plant stopped production. Bored workers kept busy by scrubbing down machinery with Ajax.

It was the same picture in towns and cities across Russia. The country's entire vodka industry ground to a halt, thanks to a Siberia-size bureaucratic snafu over a new tax on alcohol.

"This is unprecedented," said Yuri Lobanov, Veda's exasperated technical director, as he walked past empty conveyor belts. "We're losing a ton of money."

For the liquor industry, it has been a catastrophe. Rarely in its history has Russia stopped making vodka. Even during World War II, the Soviets churned out industrial quantities of the stuff.

So far, the disruption has had little effect on big cities like Moscow, where distributors, sensing trouble ahead, amassed huge stocks late last year. In remote regions, popular brands of vodka have vanished from store shelves.

"Our selection has shrunk, and we've had to raise prices," says Svetlana Matakayeva of the Alkon liquor store in Cherkessk, southern Russia. "Customers are beginning to complain."

In Moscow, drinkers shrug off the threat of shortages. "As long as they're still selling 95-proof antiseptic at the drugstore for 30 cents a bottle, we'll survive," says Mikhail Vasiliev, an accountant shopping for spirits at a Moscow supermarket.

Vodka is a national staple, as quintessentially Russian as caviar and the Bolshoi ballet. Each year, Russians knock back 9.1 liters of spirits a person, most of it vodka, according to beverage research company Canadean. Americans, in contrast, drink 4.9.

The crisis began with a law passed last year to tighten state control of the alcohol industry and make life harder for the thousands of producers of counterfeit vodka that by some estimates still account for a third of the Russian market.

The law introduced a new excise stamp, the sticker that goes on all strong alcoholic beverages in Russia to prove tax has been paid on it. Tax authorities were supposed to start handing them out to distilleries Jan. 1, but regulations setting out how the new system works weren't drafted in time.

Desperate efforts by the liquor lobby to delay implementation came to nothing. The new, high-security stickers were printed and stockpiled, but the distillers couldn't get at them. Without them, they couldn't sell their alcohol.

Wineries have been affected, too. "It's absolutely absurd," says Vladimir Yegorov, deputy chief executive of a champagne factory in Nizhny Novgorod that also has been forced to stop work. "They've managed to shut down an entire sector, and it's not because of a power blackout or force majeure, but incompetent bureaucrats."

Mr. Yegorov's company has taken the unprecedented step of suing the government for "illegal conduct." He admits its chances of victory are slim. "It's more of a cry of desperation really," he says.

Though the law was part of a crackdown on fake vodka, it is the illegal producers who have benefited most from the crisis. Bootleg vodka with fake stamps now is filling the void left by legal distillers. That could spell trouble for Russia's public health system: According to official statistics, around 40,000 people die in Russia every year from poor-quality counterfeit vodka.

Russia's finance ministry, which has borne the brunt of the liquor barons' anger, says it isn't to blame. It says the original law was so badly written it needed major changes that weren't passed until December. Officials couldn't draft their instructions before then.

"For more than a week now, federal excise stamps have been given out to anyone who wants them," the ministry said in a statement late last month.

DOJ_NMG_0013959

That is no consolation to importers. The new stamps for imported liquor haven't even been printed yet. That has led to massive disruptions in shipments of whiskey, rum and cognac to Russia -- one of the world's fastest-growing markets for premium spirits.

"The importers are out of business," says Alexander Romanov of the Alcoholic Beverages Committee of the Association of European Business. "There will definitely be a period of shortage."

Vodka -- which means "little water" in Russian -- has been part of the national fabric since it was invented here in the 14th century. Served straight and chilled, it is an essential attribute of any meal. Soviet soldiers were given shots to drink before they went into combat in World War II. Russian men often swig it at breakfast.

Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev earned the wrath of millions in the mid-1980s with his antialcohol drive, when liquor production and sales were drastically curbed. Industrial output rose, divorce rates fell and there were fewer accidents. Hardened alcoholics simply switched to toxic surrogates like bug spray and eau de Cologne.

The antibooze drive was finally ditched in the late 1980s, and as market reforms spawned new private-sector distilleries, the trickle of vodka became a torrent. Liquor production has nearly doubled in the past 10 years, to 1.32 billion liters last year from 706 million in 1996.

The current stoppage has been a disaster for the sector. Even huge state-owned giants like Kristall, Russia's biggest distillery, still are shuttered. Industry officials say Russia's treasury sacrificed $70 million in unpaid excise tax while producers sustained losses of $35 million. Exports have been largely unaffected: Russia's leading export brand, Stolichnaya, is bottled in neighboring Latvia.

Veda's distillery stood idle for four weeks as managers scrambled to get the new stamps. The plant lies in Kingisepp, a town of 54,000 a short drive from the Estonian border that is full of dreary Khrushchev-era apartment blocks and men playing at outdoor Internet casinos. Veda, Russia's second biggest vodka producer, set up the plant in 1996 in an old state-owned bakery, and it now is one of the town's biggest employers.

All of last month, the company produced nothing but still had to pay salaries and rent, as well as heating and lighting bills. It says it posted a loss of $2.5 million in the shutdown. "We're not oil men," says Zhanna Bulavchik, the company's commercial director, in her St. Petersburg office. "We can't sustain those kind of losses."

Veda got its new stamps and restarted production last Saturday. But ambitious plans to increase output 35% this year from 75 million liters in 2005 are in disarray.

Meanwhile, about half of Russia's distilleries still aren't working. "I've been in the business nine years and I've never seen anything like it," Ms. Bulavchik says.

U.S. To Shift Envoys To China, India (WP)

By Bradley Graham And Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, February 10, 2006

Russia, Germany to Lose Diplomatic Posts in Early Restructuring

China and India have emerged as the big winners -- and Russia and Germany as the top losers -- in the first round of a broad restructuring of U.S. diplomatic posts ordered by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice.

Rice announced plans last month to shift hundreds of Foreign Service positions from Europe and other developed countries to more challenging assignments in Asia, the Middle East and elsewhere as part of an increased U.S. focus on battling terrorism and bolstering security in threatened regions. But the secretary and her aides released few details at the time.

Two State Department lists obtained by The Washington Post this week -- one showing which diplomatic positions will be eliminated, the other specifying which embassies and consulates are due to expand -- provide a clearer picture of the impact of the moves.

Of 61 positions slated for elimination in the initial batch, 10 will fall in Russia and seven in Germany. U.S. embassies in several other countries -- Belgium, Poland, Italy, Spain, Ukraine, Japan and Brazil -- will lose two or three posts. All told, 38 of the cuts will come in European nations.

DOJ_NMG_0013960

On the plus side, of 74 new U.S. diplomatic positions, China will get 15, including a dozen at the U.S. Embassy in Beijing. India ranks second with 12 new posts, seven of them in New Delhi. And Indonesia is third with five new slots in Jakarta. Other countries that are to receive at least three more U.S. diplomatic slots include Nigeria, Israel, Lebanon, Vietnam, Tajikistan, Bolivia, Ecuador, Venezuela and Nicaragua.

The lists of closures and add-ons constitute just the beginning of a major rearrangement that State Department officials say will affect a substantial portion of the 6,400 Foreign Service positions. A senior State Department official involved in the planning said the first round grew out of assessments by regional bureaus of jobs they could "safely give up" and of "places where there was a crying, urgent need to have additional representation."

"This is a down payment for a shift that will probably take place over several years," the official said.

Rice has portrayed the restructuring as an essential feature of her larger "transformational diplomacy" campaign, which envisions a more active role for U.S. diplomats in fostering the growth of democratic states worldwide. Although the shifting of posts has been welcomed generally by the American Foreign Service Association representing U.S. diplomats, the potential scale of the change has unsettled some State Department employees.

"We're waiting to see just how far the secretary plans to go with this," said one Foreign Service officer who has discussed the plan with senior department officials.

One particular concern, the officer said, involves future levels of security and support for the expanded embassies and consulates. The new jobs listed so far have been confined to political, economic and public diplomacy positions. No mention has been made of additional security personnel to enhance protection, office management specialists to handle heavier administrative loads or technology experts to deal with computer problems and other technical issues.

Asked about this aspect, the senior State Department official said parallel plans are being drawn to provide extra support staff.

Some of the overseas posts on the initial cut list had been due to receive fresh replacement officers, who already had begun foreign language training or taken other steps to prepare for the positions. State Department officials say that fewer than 30 such "broken handshake" cases exist and that the affected officers are being helped to secure alternate assignments.

To find volunteers for the newly created positions, the State Department issued a memo last month advising Foreign Service personnel not to wait for the formal bidding process normally used to decide assignments. Instead, willing officers were encouraged to make their interest known to the relevant regional bureaus.

"Bureaus will be authorized to extend handshakes even before the positions appear" on the bid list, the memo said.

Dane Sees Greed And Politics In The Crisis (NYT)

By John Vinocur And Dan Bilefsky

The New York Times, February 10, 2006

COPENHAGEN, Feb. 9 — Prime Minister Anders Fogh Rasmussen said Thursday that attempts by European companies in the Middle East to disassociate themselves from Denmark or Danish products were "disgraceful."

At the same time, Mr. Rasmussen tried to shield the Bush administration and some of Denmark's partners in NATO from accusations that they had been tardy and overcautious in coming to Denmark's defense in the crisis, which he attributed more to attempts by Iran and Syria to cause diversions in the Middle East than to a few satirical cartoons depicting the Prophet Muhammad in a Danish newspaper.

Looking tired after what he acknowledged had been a difficult week, Mr. Rasmussen said in an interview that attempts to gain commercial advantage at Denmark's expense had struck at the hearts of all Danes.

Mr. Rasmussen did not refer to a particular business organization or country. But his response came in reply to a question referring to attempts in the Arab world by companies associated with Nestlé, the Swiss food giant, and Carrefour, the French retailer, to distance themselves from Denmark. Danish industry estimates it has lost more than $55 million in sales in the Middle East since the furor began a week ago.

DOJ_NMG_0013961

But the prime minister declined to criticize the Bush administration about its cautious defense of an ally. President Bush referred to his solidarity with Denmark for the first time on Wednesday, after five days of rioting in the Middle East against Danish interests.

"I have never doubted that Bush would stand up for Denmark," Mr. Rasmussen said. "He values faithfulness and loyalty. I was not surprised he decided to call me and express support."

Mr. Rasmussen reiterated that there would be no Danish apology for the cartoons. He brushed aside any suggestion that Denmark's policies requiring immigrants to accommodate themselves to Danish tradition were at fault, and asserted, "We are on the right track." More broadly, he said, "I see a very clear tendency that other European countries will go in our direction."

In light of statements here that Denmark had been abandoned in the early phase of the crisis, Mr. Rasmussen was asked if Parliament would maintain troops in Iraq and Afghanistan if it were asked to vote on the issue now. "The situation would be the same; we haven't changed," he said.

Mr. Rasmussen argued that the cartoon crisis had been hijacked by Middle Eastern interests using the caricatures for domestic ends.

He said Iran, isolated over its nuclear program, was using the cartoons to generate support in the Muslim world, while Syria, under investigation for the assassination of the former Lebanese prime minister, Rafik Hariri, was trying to cause a distraction. The Palestinian Authority, divided over the recent election of Hamas, was exploiting the cartoon crisis to unite its disparate elements, he said.

"We have religious extremists who exploit the situation and fuel the flames to pursue their own agenda," he said. "Religious extremists aim at destabilizing the situation in the whole region."

The issue will be discussed this week at a meeting of NATO defense ministers in Sicily, he said.

Mr. Rasmussen said he believed that Islam was compatible with democracy but argued that it was incumbent on Muslim immigrants in Denmark and Europe in general to embrace the liberal values of their adopted countries.

"Denmark is a liberal country," he said. "We do believe in individual liberty and freedom. People can live according to their own customs. However, I think we have to insist on respecting our core values, including freedom of expression, gender equality for women and men, and a clear distinction between politics and religion."

Mr. Rasmussen said the perception of Denmark in the Muslim world had been distorted by falsehoods spread by cellphone and Internet messages across the Middle East.

In particular, he said the government was re-evaluating relations with local Muslim leaders who traveled to the Middle East in December, stoking tensions by showing the cartoons to religious leaders.

Asked if he would have done anything differently in retrospect, Mr. Rasmussen said he had no regrets. "I don't think we could have done something in another way," he said. "We are witnessing events with deep sadness and disbelief. We are not used to it in Denmark."

Danish Premier Faults Iran, Syria (WP)

By Kevin Sullivan

The Washington Post, February 10, 2006

Governments Using Cartoon Controversy as 'Distraction' From Their Own Crises, He Says

COPENHAGEN, Feb. 9 -- Prime Minister Anders Fogh Rasmussen of Denmark said Thursday that the governments of Iran and Syria had intentionally inflamed Muslim protests against a Danish newspaper's publication of cartoons depicting the prophet Muhammad to distract attention from their own diplomatic crises.

"Syria and Iran have taken advantage of the situation because both countries are under international pressure," Rasmussen said in an interview that echoed statements Wednesday by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice. Rasmussen also said he would "not exclude the possibility" that Syria had also been involved in violent protests in Beirut, the Lebanese capital.

"I think they have taken this opportunity to use this case and a small country like Denmark as a distraction," Rasmussen said. He alleged that Iran was trying to divert attention from international pressure over its nuclear program and Syria from allegations that it was behind the assassination of former Lebanese prime minister Rafiq Hariri.

DOJ_NMG_0013962

"It is obvious that these events have now gone beyond the cartoons," he said, responding to a question about Rice's statements. "We are now facing an international crisis which has its roots in tensions in the Muslim world."

Rasmussen said he held "the two governments responsible" for mobs that attacked and burned Danish embassies in Tehran and Damascus. He said Denmark had lodged formal protests with the two governments and was considering further "diplomatic steps," which he declined to specify.

Rasmussen, a right-of-center former economic affairs minister who was elected in November 2001, said he has watched the events of the past week in "disbelief and sadness." Protesters in countries in the Middle East and Asia have burned Danish flags, attacked Danish embassies and called for Danes to be beheaded and massacred for cartoons seen in the Muslim world as a grave insult to the most revered figure in Islam.

"We are seeing ourselves portrayed as an intolerant nation, as a nation hostile to Islam," Rasmussen said in his spacious corner office at the parliamentary palace. "And it's a false picture. I think it's fair to say that Denmark is one of the most open and tolerant countries in the world. We have a real freedom of religion and we do respect all religions."

Rasmussen, who received a phone call of support from President Bush on Tuesday, said he was pleased with Bush's recent statements condemning violence against Danish diplomatic missions.

"We consider ourselves a faithful and loyal ally of the United States and we appreciate very much to see this reciprocated in the support from the United States," Rasmussen said.

The Bush administration's statements on the situation have shifted. Initially, the administration condemned the cartoons as offensive, but now Bush and other officials are stressing their opposition to the widespread violence. Rasmussen said the administration's initial stance on the cartoons "caused some public debate in Denmark, whether it could be considered a support or not. . . . We do realize that this is also a balance for the United States."

Muslims have staged violent demonstrations against Denmark in Iraq and Afghanistan, where several people have died in protests. But Rasmussen said Denmark had no plans to withdraw or reduce its 530 troops in Iraq or 390 troops in Afghanistan because of that violence.

Throughout the crisis, Rasmussen has publicly said he was sorry that the cartoons had offended Muslims. But he has steadfastly refused to apologize for their publication, because, he said in the interview, "neither the government nor the Danish people can be held responsible for what is published in an independent newspaper."

During the growing global debate about freedom of expression -- and whether the Jyllands-Posten newspaper was wrong to publish the dozen cartoons -- Rasmussen has emerged as its unapologetic champion. "I think freedom of expression is the safeguard of all other freedoms," he said. "I consider freedom of expression the most important freedom of all."

Rasmussen said he supported free speech even when it was directed harshly at him. As Muslim anger has been channeled through the Internet, he has been the subject of unflattering cartoons and altered photos.

"I don't feel offended -- that's part of the game," Rasmussen said, laughing. "As a politician, I am used to caricatures. I think it's a question of culture and tradition and maybe one of the reasons why most Danes don't understand why cartoons can cause all this."

Rasmussen said he would not support an idea, suggested by a top official of the European Union this week, that the E.U. consider adopting a voluntary code of conduct for the press.

But Rasmussen said he did believe the government had a responsibility to limit some expression -- that which would incite violence or terrorism. Following his election, two months after the Sept. 11 attacks on New York and the Pentagon, one of his government's first acts was to pass an anti-terrorism law that prohibits instigating terrorism or offering advice to terrorists. That law was widely seen as one of Europe's toughest responses in a post-Sept. 11 debate over how far to restrict civil liberties in the name of fighting extremist violence.

"If the freedom of expression is oppressed or suppressed because of violence or the threat of violence, then freedom of expression is dead," he said. "Therefore, you must have certain limitations. It must be prohibited to incite violence or terrorism."

Many countries in Europe have laws banning racist hate speech that stem from their experiences with Nazi Germany and the Holocaust.

DOJ_NMG_0013963

Rasmussen said Denmark has laws outlawing racist or blasphemous expressions. A group of 11 Muslim organizations used that law to sue the Jyllands-Posten newspaper after the cartoons were published in late September, but last month the prosecutor declined to go forward with the case, saying the cartoons did not violate those laws. The Muslim groups have appealed to Denmark's top prosecutor.

Freedom Of Speech Carries Responsibility, Annan Says (LAT)

By Maggie Farley, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, February 10, 2006

His words are directed at publishers of cartoons of Islam's prophet that have sparked protests.

UNITED NATIONS — Secretary-General Kofi Annan chastised newspapers Thursday that continue to publish cartoons depicting the prophet Muhammad in the face of the religious controversy the drawings have ignited.

"Honestly, I do not understand why any newspaper will publish the cartoons today," he told reporters at the United Nations. "It is insensitive, it is offensive, it is provocative, and they should see what has happened around the world.

"This does not mean that I am against freedom of speech, or freedom of the press," he added. "But as I have indicated in the past, freedom of speech is not a license. It does entail exercising responsibility and judgment."

Caricatures of Muhammad first appeared in the Danish right-leaning newspaper Jyllands-Posten last fall and have been reprinted in recent weeks elsewhere in Europe. Their appearance has triggered often-violent protests among Muslims.

The protests continued Thursday, with about 2,000 Muslims rallying in Dhaka, the capital of Bangladesh, Associated Press reported. Elsewhere, Malaysia's government indefinitely shut down a local newspaper for reprinting a cartoon of Muhammad, and Indonesia canceled badminton games against Denmark because of safety concerns, the news service reported.

When asked about claims this week by U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice that Syria and Iran had inflamed the controversy and incited protests, Annan told reporters that he had "no evidence to that effect."

He also condemned the violent response by demonstrators.

"They should not attack innocent civilians," he said. "They should not attack people who are not responsible for the publication of the cartoons."

At the United Nations, a group of Islamic nations Thursday introduced anti-defamation language into a founding document for a new U.N. Human Rights Council, which is being formed to replace the widely criticized U.N. Human Rights Commission based in Geneva.

The proposed text would "prevent instances of intolerance, discrimination, incitement of hatred and violence arising from any actions against religions, prophets and beliefs which threaten the enjoyment of human rights and fundamental freedoms."

The text also says that "defamation of religions and prophets is inconsistent with the right to freedom of expression" and urges states, organizations and the media to exercise "responsibility in promoting tolerance and respect for religious and cultural values."

Hamas Joins Call For Calm In Cartoon Row (AFP-Y2)

AFP, February 10, 2006

The radical Palestinian group Hamas joined voices for calm in the international furore sparked by cartoons of the Prophet Mohammed, as a Taliban commander in Afghanistan said 100 suicide bombers had volunteered.

Hamas "is prepared to play a role in calming the situation between the Islamic world and Western countries on condition that these countries commit themselves to putting an end to attacks against the feelings of Muslims," the organisation's leader Khaled Meshaal told a news conference.

His conciliatory tone came a day after he warned the Western press was "playing with fire" by publishing the cartoons which have led to riots around the world.

As Muslim protests over the cartoons subsided on Thursday, a Taliban commander in Afghanistan warned that 100 militants had enlisted as suicide bombers and Denmark said it feared for the safety of its troops in Iraq.

Mullah Dadullah, one of the Taliban's most senior military commanders, said his Islamic extremist group had also offered a reward of 100 kilograms (220 pounds) of gold to anyone who killed people responsible for the drawings.

DOJ_NMG_0013964

Meanwhile Afghan authorities arrested more than 40 Pakistani workers for inciting violence Wednesday during a protest against the cartoons in which four people were killed.

The deaths in Qalat raised the death toll to 11 in five days of protests in Afghanistan against the cartoons. Two people have also died in protests in Somalia and Lebanon.

The cartoons, including one showing the Prophet Mohammed with a bomb in his turban, were first published in the Danish daily Jyllands-Posten in September, but have since been widely reprinted.

The newspaper's chief editor, Carsten Juste, said Thursday the culture editor who had decided to publish the cartoons, Flemming Rose, had been sent on holiday for an indefinite period "because nobody can bear the weight that is on his shoulders," according to the online edition of the Danish daily Politiken.

Danish military officials said the country's troops deployed in Iraq were keeping a low profile Thursday to avoid any clashes with Shiites during their holy mourning festival of Ashura.

Calls for calm came from many quarters Thursday after days of violent protests.

A senior figure at Al-Azhar, the highest authority in Sunni Islam, said it was time to move on from high emotion to constructive dialogue.

"Quiet debate and dialogue, without passion" is the way forward, Ali al-Samman, who heads an interconfessional dialogue committee at the prestigious seat of learning in the Egyptian capital, said.

UN chief Kofi Annan again slammed the violence. "It is unfortunate that we all need to take steps to calm the situation and whatever the anger of those concerned, violence is not the answer," the secretary general told reporters.

Annan, asked whether he thought some governments were behind the violence, replied: "It's difficult for me to say. I have no evidence to that effect."

Russian President Vladimir Putin also called for cool: "The situation should be brought under control as soon as possible."

In Brussels, European Union justice commissioner Franco Frattini called for an urgent "relaunch of dialogue" with the Islamic world in response to the wave of protests.

Nearly 3,000 Danes by Thursday afternoon had signed an open letter calling for "peace with the Muslim world".

In Paris, close to 100 Arab and European academics, political and religious figures also issued a joint appeal for "moderation and wisdom" in the row.

However in Lebanon, the head of the country's Shiite movement Hezbollah insisted on an apology for the cartoons, as hundreds of thousands of Shiites gathered in southern Beirut to mark the Ashura festival.

"There will be no compromise before we receive an apology," Hassan Nasrallah told the crowds at the Shiite gathering.

Up to 15,000 South African Muslims also took to the streets in Cape Town, and handed over a petition to the Danish consulate.

The protestors sang Arabic songs and carried banners stating "Cartooning our prophet will earn you no profit" and "We will sacrifice our lives for our prophet."

The United States warned of potential violence during protests planned this week in Kenya's capital.

Kenyan Muslims have called for demonstrations, including a possible march on the Danish embassy in Nairobi.

The White House, meanwhile, insisted US President George W. Bush would go ahead with his planned trip to Pakistan in March despite widespread outrage over the cartoons there. Protesters burned his effigy Wednesday.

Egyptian writer and Nobel literature prize laureate Naguib Mahfouz said a boycott of Danish products was "the only option" for Muslims to retaliate.

"The world only understands the language of force," he told the English-language Al-Ahram Weekly.

Liberal Dutch politician Ayaan Hirsi Ali said the European press had been right to publish contentious cartoons of the Prophet Mohammed.

Ali, a close friend of Dutch filmmaker Theo van Gogh, who was killed by a Muslim extremist in 2004, said media who "lacked the courage to show their readers the caricatures" should be ashamed.

DOJ_NMG_0013965

Somali-born Ali, who describes herself as "a dissident of Islam", told journalists in Berlin: "I am of the opinion that it was correct to publish the cartoons of Mohammed in Jyllands Posten and it was right to re-publish them in other papers across Europe.

"Shame on those politicians who stated that publishing and re-publishing the drawings was 'unnecessary', 'insensitive', 'disrespectful' and 'wrong'," she added, echoing the words of British Foreign Secretary Jack Straw.

Ali said it was wrong to expect people from other cultures to abide by the Muslim ban on depicting their prophet.

"Demanding that people who do not accept Mohammed's teachings should refrain from drawing him is not a request for respect but a demand for submission."

She listed numerous teachings of Mohammed which she rejected and said she believed there was a need to be critical of him to educate people.

"The prophet did and said good things. But I wish to defend the position that he was also disrespectful and insensitive to those who disagreed with him.

"I think it is right to make critical drawings and films of Mohammed."

Pope Meets Laura Bush, Says Worried About Terror (REU-Y2)

By Steve Holland

Reuters, February 10, 2006

Pope Benedict received U.S. First Lady Laura Bush on Thursday and told her that he was worried about terrorism around the world and violence sparked by the publication of cartoons of the Prophet Mohammad.

"He talked to me about the worries of terrorism, the worries right now about the violence in Beirut, Damascus and other cities," she told reporters after the meeting the Pope.

"His hope and certainly our hope (is) for peace and tolerance for each of us, to treat everyone else with respect," she said.

Angry Muslims have demonstrated around the world over the cartoons, first published in Denmark, then Norway and several other countries in Europe and elsewhere.

The caricatures, including one showing the Prophet Mohammad wearing a bomb-shaped turban, have unleashed fury among many Muslims who consider any portrayal of their prophet as blasphemous, let alone one showing him as a terrorist.

The Vatican has already condemned the cartoons.

"I know that Muslims are offended with these cartoons. I understand their offence (but) on the other hand I don't think violence is the answer. I think everyone around the world needs to speak out and say 'lets stop the violence,'" she said.

The Pope told Mrs Bush that he hoped her stay in Italy for the start of the winter Olympics would be peaceful.

"We hope you will have a peaceful time," the Pope told Mrs Bush and her daughter Barbara when he welcomed them into his private study in the Vatican's Apostolic Palace.

Mrs Bush and Barbara, 24, are in Italy as head of the official U.S. delegation to the Turin games, which start on Friday.

The First Lady, Barbara and Francis Rooney, the U.S. ambassador to the Vatican, spoke privately for about 15 minutes in the Pope's study.

At the picture taking session afterwards Mrs Bush gave the Pope a silver bowl and he gave his visitors rosary beads and medals of his pontificate.

Mrs Bush is due to have lunch with Italian Prime Minister Silvio Berlusconi and visit a Rome hospital before heading to Turin for the start of the games.

She will also visit U.S. military personnel stationed at the Aviano air base in the north before returning to the United States.

First Lady Discusses Terrorism With Pope (AP)

By Nicole Winfield

AP, February 10, 2006

Laura Bush said Pope Benedict XVI expressed concern over violence linked to the prophet drawings in their meeting Thursday, with the pontiff calling for peace and tolerance.

DOJ_NMG_0013966

"He talked to me about the worries of terrorism, the worries right now of the violence in Beirut and Damascus and other cities," Mrs. Bush said after the 20-minute audience in the pope's private library.

The pontiff, she said, also expressed his hope "and certainly our hope, for peace and for tolerance, for each of us to treat everyone else with respect."

Benedict also wished Mrs. Bush "a peaceful time" in Turin, where she is heading the official U.S. delegation to the Olympics.

"We're looking forward to the games," Mrs. Bush told the pope as she arrived for the meeting along with her daughter Barbara and the U.S. ambassador to the Holy See, Francis Rooney.

Mrs. Bush told reporters after the meeting that she understood the offense Muslims around the world feel about the publication in European newspapers of the caricatures of the Prophet Muhammad.

"On the other hand, I don't think violence is the answer. I think that everyone around the world needs to speak out and say 'Let's stop the violence.' It's really not necessary to get the point across that they were offended by those cartoons."

She said she and the pope discussed the violence briefly, although spoke at greater length about religion and the separation of church and state in the United States.

During the audience, Mrs. Bush gave Benedict a small silver bowl engraved with the U.S. presidential seal and the signatures of the president and first lady; the pope in turn gave the first lady and Barbara rosaries and Rooney a Vatican medal.

As she left, the first lady told the pope that the president "sends his best wishes." She said she would also relay the pope's good wishes back to him.

She wore a black suit and black lace mantilla, or head covering; Barbara, 24, wore a black skirt and top and high-heeled black boots.

The audience kicked off a visit that will take Mrs. Bush to Turin, where she is heading a U.S. Olympic delegation that includes former Olympians Dorothy Hamill, Kerri Strug, Eric Heiden, Debi Thomas and Herschel Walker. The games begin Friday and last through Feb. 26.

After the meeting at the Vatican, Mrs. Bush lunched with Italian Premier Silvio Berlusconi and visited a Rome hospital where she participated in a panel discussion on breast cancer. The event was organized by the Italian chapter of the Susan G. Komen Breast Cancer Foundation, founded by a friend of the first lady.

"Early detection is the only cure," Mrs. Bush told the crowd.

Swifter, Higher, Stronger, Safer? (WP)

By Daniel Williams

The Washington Post, February 10, 2006

TURIN, Italy, Feb. 9 -- The worldwide Muslim protests against caricatures of Muhammad that appeared in a Danish newspaper last year have compounded Italy's security headaches for the Winter Olympics, which already suffer from possible disruption by local anti-globalization groups, opponents of a high-speed railway line and striking tram drivers.

Signs of concern are all over this town near Italy's northwest frontier. About 10,000 police from all over the country are patrolling boulevards and back alleys. Bomb-sniffing dogs stand guard at the airport, train station, stadiums and street corners. About 300 specially trained troops will patrol the nearby mountain sites on snowmobiles and skis. Airspace over Turin will be closed to anything with mechanical wings except for F-16s from the Italian air force that will zoom about during Friday's Opening Ceremonies and two surveillance planes supplied by NATO that will monitor wayward flights.

Missiles have been mounted around the city.

All that was in the works before the Muhammad cartoon unrest overwhelmed the local news. Because of the uproar, Interior Minister Giuseppe Pisanu, Italy's top official for civilian police and the intelligence corps, called an emergency meeting of security officials Monday regarding possible new threats. Pisanu said the riots and protests in the Middle East, Central Asia and Far East countries have been "carried out coldly with political ends. We mustn't forget that Islamic extremism is an essentially political movement that cynically uses religious values."

DOJ_NMG_0013967

At least two Italian newspapers reprinted the Muhammad caricatures that included one showing the prophet of Islam wearing a turban shaped like a bomb.

Nonetheless, Pisanu said, homegrown violence is the most likely problem for the Olympics. "For the Olympics I fear the rising aggressiveness of anti-globalization protesters, anarchists and all the domestic subversion movements that are pursuing the Olympic spotlight. Unfortunately, these people have already done very serious damage to the image of our country," Pisanu said.

He was referring to the bumpy ride of the Olympic flame to Turin. Protesters blocked its passage in several Italian cities. In Genoa a few weeks ago, it had to travel by sea to arrive in town. The group of demonstrators include residents of towns near Turin who oppose construction of a railway tunnel through the Alps as part of a cross-European, high-speed train network. Assorted masked anti-globalization militants are protesting corporate sponsorship of the Olympics.

On a clear, sunny Thursday, the flame arrived in Turin and guest runners carried it along streets lined with cheering people. But the flame had to compete with unemployed laborers who held up self-described "fake torches" to protest layoffs at the local Fiat auto plant. Police surrounded anti-globalization demonstrators who tried to approach the route. Plenty of gesticulating broke out, but no violence.

More protests are planned for Friday, when the flame will once again navigate Turin.

On Tuesday, the country's president, Carlo Azeglio Ciampi, urged Italians to show a "sense of responsibility" and keep the Olympics incident-free. "For two weeks, Turin will be the capital of Italy," he said. "I am confident that everyone will work together for the Olympics."

Italian politicians took the message as an opportunity to point fingers at each other for trouble that had yet to break out. Italy is in the middle of heated campaigns for parliamentary elections scheduled for April. Pier Ferdinando Casini, who is a leader in Prime Minister Silvio Berlusconi's government, said it was up to the opposition, some of whom back the groups opposing the high-speed rail network, to head off any trouble. He called the opposition "irresponsible."

Romano Prodi, who is running against Berlusconi for prime minister, countered that he did not endorse disruption, but understood that the government "had done little" to resolve the problems of the tunnel with local residents.

Italian officials have long predicted that, with elections on the horizon, Italy would be the focus of a terrorist attack. Berlusconi supported the U.S.-led occupation of Iraq by dispatching about 3,000 soldiers to the southern Iraqi town of Nasiriyah. The Italians have begun a withdrawal, but it will not be complete until later this year.

In recent months, Italian authorities have deported about 30 Islamic militants they said were inciting violence, including an imam preaching in Turin. The Italians rely on wiretapping to keep tabs on terrorist suspects and their supporters. Officials say they have 2,000 people under close watch.

Turin is not the only possible target. Italy has several crowded tourist sites and Italy has intensified security at hundreds of them at a cost of more than $100 million.

Italy has significant experience in dealing with high-profile events. Officials cite the trouble-free funeral of Pope John Paul II last year as a prime example. On the other hand, violence broke out at a summit of the Group of Eight industrialized nations held in Genoa in 2001, which was marred by mob violence and vicious police counterattacks.

Pisanu described the Islamic threat as less to do with al Qaeda than with independent North African origin "Islamic-European" militant groups.

The security nerve center in Turin is called the National Center for Olympic Information. Spread around the city and Olympic sites are 21 operation rooms all linked together by sophisticated communications. Officials at the center said that athletes from any country involved in the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan are at risk. In all, there are 2,500 athletes in Turin scheduled to perform in front of a million spectators during the Games, which end Feb. 26.

Ciampi made a broader appeal on Thursday, calling for a worldwide "Olympic truce" during which no one would make war on anyone else, but instead "brotherhood prevails in the world."

The Ayatollah Joke Book (WP)

By Michael Kinsley

DOJ_NMG_0013968

The Washington Post, February 10, 2006

Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, the noted wit, expert on freedom and unelected religious leader -- the leader who counts -- of Iran, observed the other day that in the West, "casting doubt or negating the genocide of the Jews is banned but insulting the beliefs of 1.5 billion Muslims is allowed." He apparently thought that this was a devastating point. Touche, Ayatollah Khamenei.

The worldwide fuss over 12 cartoon images of the prophet Muhammad (some mocking, some benign) that ran in a Danish newspaper has already killed a number of people. Many self-styled voices of Islam have made the bizarre comparison between showing pictures of Muhammad and expressing doubt about the Holocaust. A government-controlled Tehran newspaper announced a contest for cartoons about the Holocaust, asking "whether freedom of expression" applies to "the crimes committed by the United States and Israel." In a spirit of "see how you like it," a European Muslim group posted on the Web a cartoon of Anne Frank in bed with Hitler.

Muslim complaints about a Western double standard would be more telling if the factual premise were accurate. But it is not. In fact, it is nearly the opposite of the truth. Nothing is easier and more common in the West, including the United States, than criticizing the United States -- except for criticizing Israel. A few Western countries have stupid laws, erratically enforced, against denying the Holocaust, but that hasn't stopped Holocaust denial from becoming a literary industry and cultural phenomenon. Nevertheless, there has been no rioting about the historical reality of the Holocaust. No one has died over it.

Meanwhile, whatever point these European Muslims were making with their cartoon of Hitler and Anne Frank is more or less disproved by their very exercise. No one tried to stop them from putting the cartoon on the Web. The notion that jokes about Frank are beyond the pale is provably false. There's a play running in New York right now called "25 Questions for a Jewish Mother." It's a monologue written and acted by stand-up comic Judy Gold, who says on stage every night that her mother used to read to her from a pop-up version of Anne Frank's diary, and would say, "Pull the tab, Judith. Alive. Pull it again. Dead." Maybe you had to be there. But the New York Times reviewer called the play "fiercely funny, honest and moving" and did not demand that the author be executed or even admonished.

By contrast, in a spectacular exercise of self-censorship, almost every major newspaper in this country is refraining from publishing the controversial Danish cartoons, even though they are at the center of a major news story that these papers cover at length every day. An editorial in the Times on Wednesday said that not publishing the cartoons was "a reasonable choice" because they would offend many people and "are so easy to describe in words." As I write I am looking at a front-page photo in today's Times of Mariah Carey singing into a microphone. Words do it justice, I think.

Of course it is not Western values that are trampling freedom of expression, it is the ayatollah's own values, combined with the threat of violence. The other problem with his little joke about double standards, and with the whole, supposedly mordant, comparison between denying the Holocaust and portraying the prophet is that the offended Muslims do not want a world where people are free to do both. They don't even want a world where people are not free to do either, which would at least be consistent. They want a world where you may not portray Muhammad (even flatteringly, slaying infidels or whatnot), but you may deny the Holocaust all day long.

The bewildered prime minister of Denmark, trying to calm the whirlwind that has descended on his innocent, unsuspecting country, gets it spectacularly wrong when he reassures disgruntled Muslims that Denmark supports "freedom of religion" and is "one of the world's most tolerant and open societies." Tolerance, openness and freedom of religion are not what they have in mind.

A lively debate is going on about whether Islam really does forbid any portrayal of the prophet, however benign, or whether that is a recent innovation of some subset of the faithful with possible ulterior motives. This debate misses the point. Some Christians believe they are required to wear particular sorts of clothing. Some Jews and Muslims don't eat pork. They don't claim that their religion requires other people to wear special clothing or avoid eating pork. Tolerance and ecumenism can do only so much. They have nothing to offer a Muslim in Afghanistan who is personally insulted and enraged about an image that appears in a newspaper in Denmark.

The shameful American position on all this is boilerplate endorsement of free expression combined with denunciation of the cartoons as an "unacceptable" insult. When three protesters died this week in a confrontation at a U.S. military base in Afghanistan, an American spokesman there said that Afghans "should judge us on what we're doing here, not on what some cartoonist is doing somewhere else." But the limits of free expression cannot be set by the sensitivities of people who don't believe in it. How can President Bush continue to ask young Americans to sacrifice their lives for freedom in the Muslim world, if he won't even defend freedom verbally when forces from that world are suppressing it in our own?

DOJ_NMG_0013969

Curse Of The Moderates (WP)

By Charles Krauthammer

The Washington Post, February 10, 2006

As much of the Islamic world erupts in a studied frenzy over the Danish Muhammad cartoons, there are voices of reason being heard on both sides. Some Islamic leaders and organizations, while endorsing the demonstrators' sense of grievance and sharing their outrage, speak out against using violence as a vehicle of expression. Their Western counterparts -- intellectuals, including most of the major newspapers in the United States -- are similarly balanced: While, of course, endorsing the principle of free expression, they criticize the Danish newspaper for abusing that right by publishing offensive cartoons, and they declare themselves opposed, in the name of religious sensitivity, to doing the same.

God save us from the voices of reason.

What passes for moderation in the Islamic community -- "I share your rage but don't torch that embassy" -- is nothing of the sort. It is simply a cynical way to endorse the goals of the mob without endorsing its means. It is fraudulent because, while pretending to uphold the principle of religious sensitivity, it is interested only in this instance of religious insensitivity.

Have any of these "moderates" ever protested the grotesque caricatures of Christians and, most especially, Jews that are broadcast throughout the Middle East on a daily basis? The sermons on Palestinian TV that refer to Jews as the sons of pigs and monkeys? The Syrian prime-time TV series that shows rabbis slaughtering a gentile boy to ritually consume his blood? The 41-part (!) series on Egyptian TV based on that anti-Semitic czarist forgery (and inspiration of the Nazis), "The Protocols of the Elders of Zion," showing the Jews to be engaged in a century-old conspiracy to control the world?

A true Muslim moderate is one who protests desecrations of all faiths. Those who don't are not moderates but hypocrites, opportunists and agents for the rioters, merely using different means to advance the same goal: to impose upon the West, with its traditions of freedom of speech, a set of taboos that is exclusive to the Islamic faith. These are not defenders of religion but Muslim supremacists trying to force their dictates upon the liberal West.

And these "moderates" are aided and abetted by Western "moderates" who publish pictures of the Virgin Mary covered with elephant dung and celebrate the "Piss Christ" (a crucifix sitting in a jar of urine) as art deserving public subsidy, but who are seized with a sudden religious sensitivity when the subject is Muhammad.

Had they not been so hypocritical, one might defend their refusal to republish these cartoons on the grounds that news value can sometimes be trumped by good taste and sensitivity. After all, on grounds of basic decency, American newspapers generally -- and correctly -- do not publish pictures of dead bodies, whatever their news value.

There is a "sensitivity" argument for not having published the cartoons in the first place, back in September when they first appeared in that Danish newspaper. But it is not September. It is February. The cartoons have been published, and the newspaper, the publishers and Denmark itself have come under savage attack. After multiple arsons, devastating boycotts, and threats to cut off hands and heads, the issue is no longer news value, i.e., whether a newspaper needs to publish them to inform the audience about what is going on. The issue now is solidarity.

The mob is trying to dictate to Western newspapers, indeed Western governments, what is a legitimate subject for discussion and caricature. The cartoons do not begin to approach the artistic level of Salman Rushdie's prose, but that's not the point. The point is who decides what can be said and what can be drawn within the precincts of what we quaintly think of as the free world.

The mob has turned this into a test case for freedom of speech in the West. The German, French and Italian newspapers that republished these cartoons did so not to inform but to defy -- to declare that they will not be intimidated by the mob.

What is at issue is fear. The unspoken reason many newspapers do not want to republish is not sensitivity but simple fear. They know what happened to Theo van Gogh, who made a film about the Islamic treatment of women and got a knife through the chest with an Islamist manifesto attached.

DOJ_NMG_0013970

The worldwide riots and burnings are instruments of intimidation, reminders of van Gogh's fate. The Islamic "moderates" are the mob's agents and interpreters, warning us not to do this again. And the Western "moderates" are their terrified collaborators who say: Don't worry, we won't. It's those Danes. We're clean. Spare us. Please.

letters@charleskrauthammer.com

Hope Beyond The Rage? (WP)

By David Ignatius

The Washington Post, February 10, 2006

Looking at the cartoons, a non-Muslim wonders how they could possibly have given such offense. How could a few juvenile, satirical drawings of the prophet Muhammad have created a global crisis? It seems inexplicable, until you think about American reactions to a word we hesitate even to write for fear of giving offense, calling it instead the "n-word."

The African American experience reminds us that there is a rage so deep and abiding that it can be triggered by a small comment, an unintended slight, a remark perhaps meant as a joke but heard as a grievous insult. The legacy of slavery left behind that residue of anger. It created taboos that protect what Sigmund Freud described as the sacred totems of cultural identity. It established boundaries where outsiders -- in this case, white people -- are not allowed to venture. That's why the n-word is so powerful -- it is the symbol of the suffering that a people experienced at the hands of others.

By drawing this comparison, I don't mean to condone what Muslims are doing in their violent, deadly overreaction to a provocation by a foolish newspaper editor in Denmark. And I think the Muslim world could learn something about tolerance from African Americans. The United States still abounds with racist images, but blacks are no longer rioting in the streets or burning down buildings. With time, people have learned to deal with their anger in less self-destructive ways -- even, sometimes, to laugh about it.

This week, the African American cartoonist Aaron McGruder is running a series in his taboo-busting strip "The Boondocks" making fun of civil rights leader Al Sharpton's protests about racism. In Monday's strip, Huey Freeman muses to his friend: "Give me news of hope, Caesar. Tell me of the leaders who dare to stand against the grave dangers faced by this world. I crave inspiration." His pal Caesar looks up from his newspaper: "Says here Al Sharpton is protesting a cartoon for using the n-word." To which Huey responds: "I'm going back to bed."

Maybe the Muslim world will someday be able to laugh off slurs against the prophet Muhammad, but not now. The wounds are too raw; the sense of victimization is too immediate. I travel often to Muslim countries, and I am sometimes astonished at how hundreds of years of history can seem condensed into the present, so that every current injustice is magnified by the weight of every past one. I don't understand it, but then, I have to remind myself, I'm not a Muslim. I haven't lived it.

Hoping to understand this blood-knot of rage and intolerance, I called Randall Kennedy, a prominent African American professor of law at Harvard University. He is the author of a 2002 book that explores the intense emotions aroused by the n-word, which he actually dares to spell out in the book's title. He says he's not surprised that a cartoon, like a taboo word, can become a focus for rage. For African Americans, he explains, "there are all sorts of indignities and insults, but they're momentary and ambiguous." But when white people say the hateful word, "it crystallizes something that's often hard to discern."

"When people feel they're being disrespected, they respond in all sorts of ways, including very self-destructive ways," Kennedy observes. That said, he finds the Muslim reaction to the Danish cartoons unacceptable -- just as he thinks people overreact to the n-word. "Are we going to bleep out Richard Pryor's album? Are we going to scratch out every reference to the word in 'Huckleberry Finn'? I would say with respect that's what is happening here with the reaction to the cartoons."

Whenever I'm feeling really pessimistic about the world, I remind myself of the American civil rights movement. In the space of my lifetime, America has gone from a country of brutal racism and outright segregation to a place where black folks and white folks pretty much get along. We haven't abolished racism, but by working honestly at the problem, we've made real progress. Along the way, we experienced rage and violence: Our cities burned; our nation sometimes felt at war with itself. But we passed through that dark period into a brighter one.

I want to believe that Muslims and the West are in that kind of transition. We're in the rage phase -- the part of the story where black folks are torching cities, white governors are sending in the National Guard and the problems seem insoluble. But if people keep their heads, we will eventually pass from this crazy moment into a different one where a genuine reconciliation is possible. Let's face it: We are living the clash of civilizations, and it's likely that things won't get much better until they get a bit worse.

DOJ_NMG_0013971

davidignatius@washpost.com

A Global View On Cartoons Debate (USAT)

USA Today, February 10, 2006

Ruth Wishart,

columnist, in The Herald, Glasgow, Scotland: "How on earth did we get here from there? From a batch of indifferently executed cartoons published over four months ago in a Danish newspaper to worldwide riots, death threats and the destruction of embassies? ... If we are to believe the editor of the small Danish newspaper who put a match to this now global conflagration, the motivation was merely to question whether or not people had become too scared of controversy and retaliation to speak and publish freely and frankly. Ironically, he has created not a new honesty but wholesale paranoia."

Arman-e Melli,

Kabul, Afghanistan, in an editorial: "The Muslim and Mojahed people of Afghanistan have the right to demonstrate and make the Western press realize that freedom of speech does not mean insulting the sacred beliefs of other religions. Looking at developments in the country, it is clear that the enemies of our people have exploited the religious beliefs of our people. They have changed the peaceful process of demonstrations into a violent one."

ABC,

newspaper, Madrid, in an editorial: "The problem is that the argument about 'freedom of expression' — or, in the end, any other freedom — is incomprehensible for those living in states where human rights, or basically the law, are in dire straits because of the autocratic nature of their leaders."

The People,

Nairobi, Kenya, in an editorial: "It is an issue of civil rights. In any society, there is an understanding that free speech should be used wisely so as not to provoke hostilities."

Fintan O'Toole,

columnist, for The Irish Times, Dublin: "Offense has to be taken as well as given. ... Money, success and power thicken the skin, and ours has been so hardened by our newly confident self-image that sticks and stones feel like tickles. Offense is subjective, not objective. Mass outbreaks of high dudgeon depend on the presence of two factors. One is a group with an agenda, looking for insults to exploit. The other is a wider group of people who feel so vulnerable to denigration that their feelings are available for exploitation. The Irish had those two factors 20 years ago. The Muslims have them now. The current conflict is not about religion, still less about a supposed clash of civilizations. It is about power and politics."

Politiken,

Copenhagen, Denmark, in an editorial: "The acts of violence arise from the internal tensions in Muslim societies; they show the desperation of people who see the world's cultural and economic development passing them by. The escalation of the crisis does not therefore have anything to do with Danish newspaper cartoons, and there is nothing that Denmark could have done to halt this development."

Can Dundar,

commentary in Milliyet newspaper, in Turkey: "Attacking values which people consider divine cannot be excused with the pretext of 'freedom of expression' ... The crisis seems to be getting bigger because of Europe's attitude."

Cape Argus,

Cape Town, South Africa, in an editorial: "The position of this newspaper was not to publish the offending cartoons because they would be an affront to our Muslim readers and are, quite simply, racist in their stereotyping of Arabs as people with hooked noses and as terrorists. But we also reject the notion that ... any group could, on a presumption, interdict our newspapers from publishing content."

The Nation,

DOJ_NMG_0013972

Bangkok, in an editorial: "Instead of expending energy on defending freedom of expression or calling for deadly revenge, perhaps all parties should focus instead on our common decency, which is a prerequisite for rational debate. Surely for Western and Islamic civilizations, which have long been trying to come to terms with much worse atrocities over the centuries, offensive cartoons should not be all that difficult to let go of."

In Iranian Eyes, The 'Cross-Eyed British' Are To Blame (NYT)

By Michael Slackman

The New York Times, February 10, 2006

TEHRAN, Feb. 7 — The Embassy of Denmark was attacked and pelted with gasoline bombs two days in a row because of the caricatures of the Prophet Muhammad published in a Danish newspaper. The Austrian Embassy was stoned and all its windows were smashed for the same reason. The United States has been dubbed the World Oppressor, and Israel has always been at the top of the enemies list.

But to understand whom Iranians distrust most of all, you need only visit Bobby Sands Street. Named after the Irish republican who died of a hunger strike in 1981, the street runs right past the British Embassy in a busy neighborhood of Tehran.

A not-too-subtle finger in the eye.

"We have not seen anything other than bad things from the British since they stepped foot here 200 years ago," said Seyed Razi Abbassian, 72, a dealer in stamps and coins at a shop across from the street from the British Embassy. "We have no good memories of the British."

In an often bitterly divided country, Mr. Abbassian's outlook is one that unites Iranians of many social, economic and political classes.

The idea that Britain is behind much of what goes wrong in Iran is not just a conspiracy theory but also a prism through which to view events. Indeed, America — the Great Satan itself — is often portrayed as merely a hapless, muscle-bound child manipulated by smarter, craftier, more deceitful forces in London.

One European diplomat said he once received a gift from an Iranian child: a drawing of America as a marionette with Britain pulling the strings.

"For 200 years we have had a political relationship with the British," said Mansoureh Ettehadie, a history professor and writer. "They have never been innocent. There is a feeling in Iran that is widespread, that the British have not been blameless."

As Ms. Ettehadie intimated, there are sound historical reasons for the Iranians to suspect the British. Early in the 20th century, she said, Britain tussled with France and Russia over control of the country, and Britain's success in the south, and in dominating the rich oil fields, left a bad taste. She said, for example, that for many years, Iran did not even have its own central bank, but had to rely on the Imperial Bank to issue currency.

And as every Iranian schoolchild knows, it was the British who engineered the coup that brought to power the dictatorial Reza Shah Pahlavi, who founded the hated dynasty that lasted until the Shiite revolution in 1979.

Distrust of Britain is so ingrained in the public psyche — especially among the older generation — that it has been joked about, written about and even dismissed as paranoia, but never done away with. One of the most popular novels in Iran, "My Uncle Napoleon," is a comic love story spoofing how Iranians see a British hand in all dark deeds.

The book popularized the phrase, "This is the job of the cross-eyed British," which is often used here with a smile, and a wink. It can be said when bombs go off, or when there is really bad traffic.

While many Iranians are adept at poking fun at their Brit-fixation, the prevailing view also serves to complicate already tense relations between London and Tehran over such matters as the Iranian nuclear program. One Western diplomat, who asked not to be identified so as not to inflame his host country, said Iranians often raised the specter of "historical inequities" with Britain in diplomatic meetings.

Recently, as the United States and Britain and other European partners pressed for Iran to be referred to the United Nations Security Council for its nuclear activities, Iranian officials accused the British of some recent bombings and deadly plane crashes in Iran.

DOJ_NMG_0013973

In each case, government officials said that Britain was not working alone, but in tandem with Israel and the United States. Nevertheless, Britain was the ringmaster.

If there is an event that still angers many, it is the coup in 1953 that ousted the prime minister, Mohammed Mossadegh, and reinstalled Shah Mohammed Reza Pahlavi, who had fled the country. Although the Central Intelligence Agency was involved in ousting Mr. Mossadegh, sentiment here holds that British intelligence pulled the strings.

"The British were responsible for ending Mossadegh's rule," said Mustafa Jahangard, 26, who runs a fruit and vegetable store in central Tehran. Asked who is disliked more in Iran, the United States or Britain, Mr. Jahangard first drew a distinction between the American people, who "are good," and the American government, which "is bad." No such distinction was made for the British.

"The British win in this competition," he said. "England is even worse. They are sneaky."

The anger and suspicions are widespread, and widely discussed. On Jan. 31, Resalat, an Iranian daily, ran an article about the bombings in Ahvaz beneath the headline: "England's Hand in Measures Against Our National Security."

"Britain, the old colonizer, has a hand in all of these criminal measures," the article said. "Another trick of the government of the old colonizer, England, is that whenever its secret intentions — in conspiring against others — are somehow revealed, it takes totally friendly positions, that are against America's positions, regarding Iran; and when everything is back to normal, it follows up its previous hostile positions."

The British Embassy occupies a large compound in Tehran and is tucked back inside, behind a tall brick wall. Reza Razavi said he had run his pen store on a corner, on the other side of the wall, for 12 years, and had never, to his knowledge, had a British customer from the embassy. He said it was easy to believe that the British were up to no good because of recent charges made public by Russia about a British diplomat caught working as a spy — and of course the Mossadegh affair.

As for all the negative deeds Iranians attribute to the Americans, he said, "If you think about it, America was under the British as well."

For Americans, It Can Pay To Play In Iran's Court (WP)

By Karl Vick

The Washington Post, February 10, 2006

Imports Pump Up Basketball's Popularity

TEHRAN -- Making himself as inconspicuous as a 7-foot-2 black man can be in Iran, Garth Joseph sidled up to the store counter. His air was at once playful and furtive. "Give me that good stuff," he whispered.

The clerk, a bespectacled woman dressed in a black head scarf, reached under the counter and brought forth a slab of pork: It was black-market bacon, absolutely illegal in the Islamic Republic of Iran and priced like the contraband it was.

"Fifteen dollars for bacon!" Joseph squawked, reaching into his sweats for his wad of green Iranian currency. "It's so much money, but I love bacon. I eat about two pounds of bacon a day in America."

But in America, Joseph warmed the bench during his only season in the National Basketball Association, hobbled by injuries and struggling for a place in a league moving away from the big man. And in Iran, he is huge in every way, the object of stares and delight not only for his gargantuan size, but also as the most conspicuous and highest-paid of the basketball players who left the United States to play the pivot along the "axis of evil," a grouping in which President Bush included the country where they have found their fortunes.

About 20 Americans play hoops for a living in Iran. They nurture pro careers that might not exist in the States, navigate a culture that offers precious few diversions in public -- though a lot more behind closed doors -- and, as much as possible, avoid politics. Iran is at the center of international concern for its nuclear ambitions and has remained notorious to the United States since 1979, when student radicals took over the U.S. Embassy in a siege that lasted 444 days. But for offshore ballplayers working for a paycheck, Iran is just another stop on an international circuit that quietly counterbalances the NBA's burgeoning import of players from Croatia, Congo and China, to name just the C's.

DOJ_NMG_0013974

"One of my friends -- he's really like a cave man -- he says, 'Are they walking around with AKs?' " said Andre Pitts, a Texas native who plays point guard on the same team with Joseph, Saba Battery. "I said, 'If you came here, you wouldn't ever want to go back, the way they treat you.' "

Black-market bacon is the least of it. American players are paid from $60,000 to $200,000 a year to elevate a sport that in Iran ranks in public popularity behind soccer, volleyball and wrestling, in that order. The Americans are considered so special they are not even required to cover their tattoos with bandages, as their Iranian teammates do on game days. They are paid in dollars, which they must wire home through third countries because U.S. banks are prohibited by sanctions from doing business with Iran.

The Americans "cover up the weaknesses of the team and help basketball in the whole country," said Mustafa Hashemi, coach of Petrochimi, sponsored by the Petroleum Ministry in the southern city of Mahram, a city so devoid of acceptable restaurants that the Americans eat in a company cafeteria.

"It's like being at a camp," said Eddie Elisma, a New York native drafted in 1997 by the Seattle SuperSonics and now a Petrochimi team leader. "It's not as bad as you think."

In fact, inside a private home, life in Iran can be exactly the opposite of the public image. In Joseph's six months in Tehran, his most striking discovery has been the nation's double life. He first noticed it during Ramadan, the month when observant Muslims fast during daylight hours.

"They eat," Joseph declared. "They don't eat in public, but they eat.

"It's like I found out: A lot of things aren't done in public here. They're done, though."

On the streets of Tehran, for instance, many women glide along under the enveloping black chador that covers all but their faces. "Little ninjas walking around," Joseph said. "You can't look at them -- you're afraid they'll smack you."

About two weeks after arriving, he was invited inside an apartment in the prosperous, generally liberal north of Tehran. He watched as female guests arrived and peeled off their cloaks.

"Nice miniskirts," Joseph said, smiling at the memory. "You know, I'm married. But I'm lookin'."

And behind closed doors, the liquor flowed freely -- both the homemade vodka that has been produced in Iran since the 1979 revolution and the bottles of Smirnoff that have become readily available in recent years through discreet dealers.

"Do you like my liquor collection?" Pitts said, gesturing to the well-stocked alcove in his own apartment, sleekly decorated in blacks and whites.

For Americans playing offshore, any hardships are relative. Before arriving in Tehran last season, Pitts played in Turkey, Cyprus, Lebanon, Hong Kong and Syria, where he was a star. Joseph, whose brief time in the NBA was split between Toronto and Denver, arrived here after four seasons in China, where he once played an outdoor game at minus-20-degree temperatures on a dirt court.

"The Middle East -- based on what they read in The Post or see on CNN -- will scare most travelers off," said Jerald Wrightsil, who built a business representing U.S. players offshore after his own overseas career in the 1990s, when Eastern Europe was the new frontier. "But players chasing a paycheck, they're willing to take that chance."

There have been perils. Stones sometimes rain down from the stands, said Pitts, adding that a fragment injured an eye of one teammate.

But players say the primary risk in Iran is being bored to death. The conservative Muslim clerics who prohibit the public sale of pork, proscribed by the Koran, do the same for alcohol. Women are required to cover their hair, and public mixing of the sexes is officially discouraged.

For the professional athlete, such strictness has its upside.

"It prolongs my career," said Pitts, recalling the night spots of secular Syria, where women sometimes danced on the bar. "I'm getting good rest."

But it's not for everyone. Joseph, a jocular extrovert, was flummoxed to find health clubs populated by only men.

"How do you live here without looking at women?" he asked. "What do you go to the weight room for?" Worse was learning that, in Iran, even beaches are segregated by sex.

DOJ_NMG_0013975

He shook his head, just inches from the ceiling in his bleak, two-bedroom apartment overlooking the Sadr Expressway, its traffic roaring through the gray of Tehran in winter. The bed was in the living room, to be closer to the satellite television that players describe as their life-support system. "I never watch Iranian TV," Joseph said. "Always some military guy on."

On the coffee table: old issues of People and a basketball magazine. "Oh, I got to keep my place a little Americanized," he said. The one book in the room was The Essential Atlas of the World.

Joseph was saying that China at least had TGIFridays and Outback Steakhouses. Iran is simply more foreign. Boxes of tissues take the place of napkins, and bathroom light switches are outside the door. Clothes dryers are novelties. The lemon that restaurants put on the food makes everything taste the same. And cutlery?

"I ordered a steak and they bought me a spoon," Joseph said.

The Americans not only have adjusted to Iran's duality, they also abet it. Officially, Saba Battery -- a Tehran-based team that belongs to the Defense Ministry -- refuses to employ Americans. The pretense was imposed by its owner, an arm of a government that has no diplomatic relations with Washington and regularly renews the paint on the "Death to America" slogans still scattered around the capital.

Joseph's connection to the Great Satan is at least ambiguous. Though he lives outside Albany, N.Y., he remains a citizen of Dominica, the Caribbean island where he was born and raised.

But Pitts, born and raised in Seguin, Tex., is officially listed on the team roster as a citizen of Senegal. He even has a Senegalese passport, though he's not sure how he came by it.

"My agent got it for me," he said. "Basically, I'm here for the money."

Would Iranians Rally 'Round The Flag? (LAT)

By Edward N. Luttwak, Edward N. Luttwak Is A Senior Fellow At The Center For Strategic And International Studies In Washin

The Los Angeles Times, February 10, 2006

Various ethnic and religious factions might see little to gain in supporting Tehran if the country's nuclear facilities were bombed.

THERE MAY BE good reasons to oppose an air attack on Iran's nuclear installations at this time, but one of the arguments that is advanced most often is seriously flawed.

The argument is based on a familiar axiom that ruling regimes, even unpopular ones, are strengthened by such attacks because the bombarded nation rallies around its rulers. But this does not apply to Iran. It's true that when Germans, Japanese and Serbs, among others, were bombed, they did indeed support their leaders all the more because the attacks increased their sense of national solidarity.

Iran, however, is not a nation-state but rather a multinational empire dominated by Persians, much as the Soviet Union was once dominated by Russians. Except that in this case, the Persians only account for just over half the population of Iran (making them a smaller proportion than the Russians were even in the final days of the Soviet Union).

No scholar who studies Iran would dispute that there is a very strong Persian identity and pride of ownership in ruling Iran among the Persians, but only a very weak sense of Iranian participation among non-Persians. Iran is not like Lebanon, where the different communities often fight each other. Instead, Iran's minorities each resist the Persian-dominated central government. Just in the last month, guerrillas of Baluch nationality kidnapped soldiers in southeast Iran. Arabs of Khuzistan province next to Iraq detonated bombs in Ahwaz, and Kurds clashed with the rural police.

To the extent that the different nationalities each have their own identities and oppose the essentially Persian regime, they are likely to applaud external attacks on the nuclear installations rather than rally to the defense of their rulers.

So how does factional solidarity in Iran break down?

The Kurds, who account for about 9% of the population, have been encouraged by the example of virtual Kurdish independence in Iraq next door. Their demands for autonomy are becoming more forceful, and something of an insurgency seems to have started. Very few Kurds are likely to rally around their Persian overlords.

DOJ_NMG_0013976

Smaller nationalities that are known to be disaffected because of recent examples of violent resistance include the Arabs at 3% of Iran's population and the Baluch at 2%. Little is known of the intensity of the national sentiments of the Turkmen and Lurs (2% each), and still less of the Gilaki and Mazandarani (8% in all), who may be politically more assimilated simply because they speak Persian dialects.

Along with the Kurds, all the smaller nationalities amount to only a quarter of Iran's population; but Turkic-speaking Azeris add another 24% all by themselves. Many Azeri families in Tehran especially are believed to be thoroughly assimilated, but the more numerous Azeris farther north are not, and national revival and separatist groups have become increasingly active among them. Since Azerbaijan just across the border gained its independence from the Soviet Union, the Azeris have a national home of their own, and it is not Iran.

The religious extremism of Iran's regime has further fractured the nation's solidarity by discriminating not only against the non-Muslim Bahais, Christians, Jews and Zoroastrians who amount to only 2% of the total population, and are of yet smaller political significance, but also against the 9% or more who are Sunnis (who are not even allowed to have their own mosque in Tehran, where 1 million of them live).

So, all in all, at least half the population is unlikely to be motivated by feelings of solidarity with their rulers. Only among the Persians are many likely to react to an attack as the axiom prescribes; others might welcome the humiliation of their oppressors. The bombing of Iran's nuclear installations may still be a bad idea for other reasons, but not because it would strengthen the hold of its rulers. One may hope that Iran's rulers are not misled by their own propaganda and will therefore accept a diplomatic solution rather than gamble all on an irrelevant axiom.

For Venezuela, U.S., A (Very) Little Civility (WP)

By Pamela Constable

The Washington Post, February 10, 2006

After an especially ugly week in the hostile relationship between the Bush administration and the government of Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez, Venezuela's envoy here tried yesterday to salvage some civility, saying his country sought "mature and rational relations" with Washington and would remain a "reliable" source of energy to all foreign customers, including the United States.

The State Department responded in kind, with its spokesman saying Washington was "open to a good relationship with Venezuela" and hoped for a "positive one." The spokesman, Sean McCormack, said that the two countries were cooperating in the fight against drugs and that the administration was prepared to work with governments across the political spectrum, including those with "left-of-center" views.

But the exchange did little to dispel a growing sense among officials and analysts that the current political breach between Caracas and Washington -- still major oil trading partners and former longtime democratic allies -- is becoming potentially irreparable.

In the past week, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld has compared Chavez to Adolf Hitler, and the administration's top intelligence official, John D. Negroponte, has condemned his ties with Iran and North Korea. Venezuela has expelled a U.S. naval attache on charges of spying, and Washington has expelled a senior Venezuelan diplomat in return.

Meanwhile, rumors have circulated in both capitals that the United States may put Venezuela on a list of states that sponsor terrorism, a designation that would make it ineligible for most U.S. aid and programs. A State Department spokesman yesterday declined to say whether such a move was being considered.

There were other signs that the antagonism was hardening between the United States and Chavez, a self-styled revolutionary leader and protege of Cuba's Fidel Castro. First elected president in 1998 and reelected in 2000, he survived a coup attempt two years later and has since repeatedly accused the United States of seeking to overthrow him. He has vowed to thwart a U.S.-backed hemispheric free-trade pact and forge an alternative economic pact within Latin America.

In an interview Wednesday, the senior State Department official for Latin America, Thomas A. Shannon Jr., described the U.S. differences with Chavez as "a battle of ideas . . . a battle that we shouldn't be afraid of." He depicted Chavez as a defiant but comic figure, "standing there and desperately taking swings at us. We must go around him and engage the rest of the region in our common positive agenda," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0013977

Shannon, a scholarly diplomat, is viewed among Latin America experts here as less ideologically allergic to Chavez than his recent predecessors, and he said he hoped the two governments could find common ground on a number of issues. But yesterday, Venezuelan Ambassador Bernardo Alvarez complained that he had not been able to see Shannon, although he said he has traveled to several states to promote Venezuela's project to assist poor families through home heating oil subsidies.

"We are not against the United States. We are against certain policies of the United States, but we have a lot of important things in common," Alvarez told journalists. "We are not a threat to the national interests of the United States or anyone else. Why are they trying to portray us as anti-American?"

Several experts on U.S.-Latin American relations in Washington said both governments were to blame for the increasingly hostile rhetoric and plummeting relations. They suggested that provocative comments such as those made by Rumsfeld could play into Chavez's hands as he seeks to rally domestic support against a foreign enemy.

"The State Department is clearly attempting to set a different tone, but there are other voices in the administration that reflect knee-jerk Cold War thinking," said Julia Sweig, an associate scholar at the Council on Foreign Relations. "Chavez has figured out how to play those cards really well, but it would be a mistake to ascribe to individuals like Chavez and Castro the deep social cleavages in the region."

Otto Reich, a former senior State Department official who is now a private consultant, said that the Bush administration had largely refrained from verbal mud-slinging and that Chavez was responsible for provoking U.S. hostility. "We didn't start this," he said. "If there is going to be change, it has to come from the other side."

Reich said that there was little chance other Latin American leaders, even those with left-of-center views, would follow Chavez's leadership, but that Chavez could do serious regional harm. Those leaders should be "concerned that he is giving all of Latin America a bad name," Reich said. "The region badly needs foreign investment, and it doesn't help to have him running around with a red beret and incendiary rhetoric."

'New Populists' Vs. The West (CSM)

By Howard Lafranchi

The Christian Science Monitor, February 10, 2006

WASHINGTON - Some might call it the axle of anti-American populism.

With linchpins in Tehran on one end and Caracas on the other, a new brand of international populism is rising by fanning flames of division between Western powers and the "powerless" of the developing world.

Leaders, from Iran's President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad to Venezuela's President Hugo Chávez, are winning points at home by striking a nationalist and anti-American pose. Their method: Use the international stage to rail against what they see as a disconnect between the values espoused by the world's sole superpower and its actions.

• Mr. Ahmadinejad consolidates his domestic political power and wins support among several countries caught in America's cross hairs by pointing out that Washington accepts the nuclear status of Pakistan - which it needs on its side in the war on terror - while opposing Iran's program, which Iran insists is for power-generation only.

• Mr. Chávez, espousing a philosophy of "democratic socialism" in any international forum that will listen, accuses the United States of trying to overthrow his own democratically elected government. He fires up sympathetic crowds by branding "US imperialism [as] our real enemy."

Yet for all their heated rhetoric, the two leaders have a vision for the world, one that seeks to end the "sole superpower" reality. Beyond simply opposing America's robust exercise of power - a sentiment increasingly found in the developing world, especially - their aim is to join political forces to provide a significant counterweight in the international arena.

"There is no great level of love between Venezuela and Iran, but they both are seeking a multipolar world, and that's where the two of them find a point of intersection," says Miguel Tinker-Salas, a Latin America and US foreign-policy expert at Pomona College in Claremont, Calif.

DOJ_NMG_0013978

The two leaders, though, are impelled by different motives. Chávez is motivated by an antiglobalization stance that vilifies Washington as the epicenter of market- oriented economics, says Thomas Carothers, an expert on democracy and rule of law at Carnegie Endowment for International Peace. Ahmadinejad's wrath, he says, is more focused on the Bush administration's agenda for secular democracy in the Middle East.

Russia's Vladimir Putin also belongs on the list, says Mr. Carothers, for his challenge to the West over its promotion of democracy in Russia and in the former Soviet neighboring countries.

"We're seeing on different fronts different leaders who are pushing back," he says, "with the idea of resisting the West." It is "no coincidence" that all three countries are "flush with oil money" that allows their leaders the luxury of promoting their causes, he adds. A risk of overreaction by the West

The West's response to the populists' challenge need not - indeed, should not - be uniform, some analysts say. Each presents a different challenge.

"The Latin American populists like Chávez have a very limited capacity to do anything that threatens substantial harm to our interests, so it's key in those cases not to overreact," says Andrew Bacevich, director of the Center for International Relations at Boston University.

Iran, on the other hand, is different because of the "nuclear question" and "the importance we assign to stability in that region," he says. Iran plays a key role in events in both Iraq and Afghanistan.

In some current international controversies, it's the West, not simply America, that is in the line of fire - as with the Muslim world's fury over cartoons depicting the prophet Muhammad. But Chávez and Ahmadinejad, in particular, "are finding it pays politically to focus on the US," adds Mr. Tinker-Salas.

Iran lost no time this week announcing an end to cooperation on its nuclear program with the International Atomic Energy Agency, after the IAEA on Saturday approved a US-supported resolution that reports Iran to the United Nations Security Council.

Landing Iran in the Security Council was a goal of the Bush administration for at least two years. But the vote also revealed cracks in the international community and support for Iran - albeit from some at the top of Washington's blacklist. Syria, Venezuela, and Cuba all voted "no" on the IAEA resolution.

Iran's foreign minister will travel to Cuba and Venezuela this month in a bid to further cement support for Iran's battle against the "world oppressor" - the US. Ahmadinejad has established contact, too, with Evo Morales, the recently elected populist president of Bolivia. Rumsfeld takes a jab

The US is also caught in what State Department officials describe as a "tit-for-tat" imbroglio with Chávez. After Caracas expelled a military attaché assigned to the US Embassy on charges of spying, the US responded last Friday by expelling a Venezuelan diplomat.

The US action followed comments by Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld in which he likened Chávez to Adolf Hitler, saying both were "elected legally." The election of "populist" leaders like Chávez and Bolivia's new president, he added, "are worrisome."

Some experts caution against such riffs, saying they only play into the hands of the new populists, coming at a time when US standing in the world is low and more people seem to sympathize with challenges to American power.

"People see a certain hypocrisy in US actions, and what we're seeing from people like Chávez and Iran's president are attempts to exploit that," says Tinker-Salas.

"The US has a pretty good record of falling into this trap," adds Mr. Bacevich of Boston University. "The Bush administration has so overused the Hitler analogy that it's almost demeaning to history."

Iran's depiction of an "arrogant West" has "some echo" in parts of the developing world, he adds, but that doesn't mean Damascus, Havana, and Caracas are poised to lead a new anti-West movement.

Still, anti-Western sentiment shows signs of spreading, fed by economics, nationalism, or culture, says Carothers. That should give the US pause from "sparring" with the new populists, he says, "as tempting as that might be."

The current circumstances should also encourage the US to reduce its use of all foreign oil, he adds.

"It takes ready cash to fiddle with politics outside your borders," he says, "and thanks to oil prices that's something that all of these leaders have."

DOJ_NMG_0013979

Candidate Of Haiti's Poor Leads In Early Tally With 61% Of Vote (NYT)

By Ginger Thompson

The New York Times, February 10, 2006

PORT-AU-PRINCE, Haiti, Feb. 9 — Unofficial electoral results that had been carried in by mules, trucks and helicopters from polling centers across the country appeared Thursday to give an early lead to René Préval, a former president considered a champion of the poor masses and a thorn in the side of the elite.

The Provisional Electoral Council announced Thursday night that Mr. Préval had won 61 percent of the 15 percent of the votes tabulated from the election Tuesday, including 67 percent of the votes counted so far in the department that includes Port-au-Prince.

While several of his opponents quietly began to move toward conceding, others cautioned that it was still too early to declare a winner, and the political hostilities that have kept this country near the brink of anarchy lingered in the air.

Heavily armed gang members who control some of the slums that are Mr. Préval's political strongholds have threatened violence if he is not declared the winner with more than 50 percent of the votes, thereby avoiding a runoff election. It was also from the slums that Mr. Préval's mentor, the former president, Jean-Bertrand Aristide, drew his political strength.

A spokesman for Charles-Henry Baker, a wealthy factory owner considered the candidate of the tiny elite, said his campaign had begun preparing charges of fraud to try to stop Mr. Préval from winning power.

As Haiti, a country of 8.5 million people, braced for final results, which are not expected until this weekend, it was not easy to tell whether the nation was on the verge of its first real steps out of anarchy, or set to plunge into another cycle of political upheaval.

Ending the political fighting between the rich and the poor must be the first of a long list of priorities for its next president. And the question looming over Mr. Préval is whether a man whose previous term as president was overshadowed by Mr. Aristide, a polarizing political leader, is up to the task.

"Préval has to turn history upside down in Haiti," said Mark Schneider, of the International Crisis Group, a nonpartisan organization focusing on conflict resolution. "For decades, if not centuries, Haitian politics have been ruled by a take-no-prisoners mentality. The determination of the Haitian people to use the ballot to change their history became evident after the record turnout Tuesday. And if the early reports of a first round win turn out to be accurate, I would hope that René Préval knows that he cannot govern alone."

In an interview last month at his sister's house in Port-au-Prince, and then another this week in Marmelade, his father's hometown, Mr. Préval, a former bakery owner, said his priority would be to provide relief to the two-thirds of the population living in extreme poverty. His plans include what he described as a "universal public school program," and at least one free meal a day for poor children.

Mr. Préval also said he would investigate the cases of hundreds of prisoners who claim they are being held for political purposes, and would negotiate with gangs, rather than using only force against them, to end violence and lawlessness in slums like Cité Soleil.

"What do you prefer?" he asked. "An amnesty, or for people to keep dying?"

Mr. Préval said he that would recruit Haitian professionals overseas to help rebuild the government, and hinted that he had offered a job in his administration to a former presidential candidate, Dumarsais Siméus, a Haitian-born business magnate who was forced out of the race because he is an American citizen.

A chief objective of Mr. Préval's government, one of his advisers said, would be to attract more investment from the United States. In the last decade, the adviser said, United States investment in Haiti was less than $10 million, the amount invested in a single year in the neighboring Dominican Republic.

But Mr. Préval also suggested that he would reach out to his opponents among the middle and upper classes. He said that much of his campaign had been financed by the elite, and that he would appoint a prime minister from the political party that wins control of the parliament, which is highly unlikely to be his own.

"People know that I don't like to speak of myself," said Mr. Préval, 63. "But I think the first thing that people appreciate about me is that Préval has not stolen. Préval is not an assassin. Préval respects freedom. Préval is frank and honest.

DOJ_NMG_0013980

"He says what he can and cannot do, and he doesn't make promises he cannot keep."

After graduating from college in Belgium, he lived in New York. "I always told my father I worked on Wall Street," Mr. Préval said of those years. "But I never told him I was a messenger. I used to think how my father would kill me if he saw me sweeping floors and making coffee."

By 1990, Mr. Préval had returned to Haiti and had opened a bakery that supplied bread to an orphanage run by Mr. Aristide, who was then a priest. When Mr. Aristide rose to power as Haiti's first elected president, he appointed Mr. Préval prime minister.

Haitians called the men the Twins. In voodoo, twins are believed to have an eternal bond and magical powers. And after Mr. Aristide was overthrown by a military coup, Mr. Préval went with him into exile.

When Mr. Aristide was restored to power in 1994, Mr. Préval returned with him. And with Mr. Aristide's blessing a year later, Mr. Préval was elected president a year later.

He was credited with supporting important human rights investigations that led to trials and convictions against high-ranking police and military officers involved in political assassinations.

But his government was crippled by a Parliament dominated by his opponents and meddling by his old ally, Mr. Aristide. And critics said his greatest single achievement was becoming the only president, in a country roiled by a long history of military coups, to finish a full term in office and peacefully turn over power.

Political observers said Mr. Préval, who served as president from 1996 to 2000, was not able to keep many promises during his last term in office.

A slight, unassuming, plain-talking agronomist, Mr. Préval had never been a high achiever before he stumbled into political power in the shadows of the extremely charismatic Mr. Aristide. And until now he had essentially stayed there.

His successor was Mr. Aristide. But by then, aides to Mr. Préval said, relations between the two had been severely strained, and Mr. Préval retired to his father's hometown, near the north coast.

Then two years ago, another armed uprising, along with pressure by the United States, forced Mr. Aristide from power and pushed Haiti, the hemisphere's poorest country, close to collapse.

Political observers have said Mr. Préval was sought out by the United States and governments leading the United Nations Stabilization Mission struggling to restore order.

"I think Préval wants to show he's his own man, that he can leave his own legacy, and solve some of this country's worst problems," said Mr. Schneider, of the International Crisis Group. "Hopefully his opposition will recognize they don't have an option, for the sake of the country, but to cooperate."

Haitians Patiently Await Final Election Results (CSM)

By Danna Harman

The Christian Science Monitor, February 10, 2006

PORT-AU-PRINCE, HAITI - The streets remained empty Thursday, with shops closed, businesses boarded up, and schools locked: Haiti, as if holding its breath, waited patiently as the ballots continued to trickle in.

Final results from Tuesday's presidential election are expected over the weekend. At press time Thursday, partial returns show that René Préval had a comfortable lead over his 33 opponents - a finding that at least one of his rivals said was not acceptable.

With 9,000 UN troops and 5,000 Haitian police out in full force to maintain security, National Police Chief Mario Andersol warned of the possibility of violence, should candidates feel the vote wasn't going their way. Election day itself, despite massive disorganization, was generally peaceful - giving hope to many here that the entire exercise would be a success.

"We have gotten this far. Let's continue to be calm," begged Rosemond Pradel, secretary general of the Provisional Electoral Council (CEP).

The reason it has taken so long for the votes to be counted, explained Mr. Pradel, was that the ballots were still being ferried - by plane, truck, and even mule - from around the country to the vote tabulation center in Port-au-Prince, often over difficult terrain. Logistical and technical problems have beset Haiti's election, the first since President Jean-Bertrand Aristide was ousted two years ago.

DOJ_NMG_0013981

Polling stations across Port-au-Prince - from the Cité Soleil slum to the upscale Petionville suburb - began posting results late Wednesday, most showing Préval with between 60 and 92 percent of the vote. Though Préval's support outside the capital is not as strong, his political adviser Bob Manuel told reporters he felt confident his candidate would win more than 50 percent of the votes nationwide, thus avoiding a run-off and becoming Haiti's next president.

Préval, an ally of Mr. Aristide, has remained secluded all week in his rural hometown of Marmelade and refused to comment on developments.

But candidate Charles Henri Baker, a wealthy businessman who, according to pre-election polling, is Préval's closest opponent, called the elections "a mess" Thursday and saidhis party was collecting evidence of fraud. "Even if you got ink on your finger, it was the kind that washed off on your pants when wet," he said. Pradel dismissed those claims, saying it was the same sort of ink used in all past Haitian elections.

"We have eyewitnesses to voters casting ballots up to eight times by going to different stations," Baker also charged in a phone interview. "This has to be looked into."

International election monitoring groups have said, however, that, despite minor irregularities, there was no credible evidence of widespread fraud. "Having been on the ground in Haiti observing the preparations and the elections, I would say it was a reasonably fair election," Knowlson Gift, Trinidad's Foreign Minister, told The Associated Press.

UN Secretary-General Kofi Annan, meanwhile, congratulated the Haitian people in a statement Wednesday in New York, saying he was pleased that, "compared to previous elections, [this one] ... was remarkably free from violence." The secretary-general appealed to all to respect the official results to be announced by the CEP and said it was "essential that all political and social actors come together in a spirit of national reconciliation and dialogue."

Baker, however, stressed there was "no way" he would consider partaking in a future Préval government. "[Préval's] morality and mine don't mix together. I am an honest person. I believe in the law. So I don't think we will be working together," said Baker, adding: "We will be in bad shape if he becomes president."

Even as the process of counting the votes and evaluating the election stretched on, and fears of future violence weighed down on Haiti, many here tried to begin discussing the next steps for the country.

"We have spent so long talking about ballots and IDs and polling stations - but what about the issues?" asked Maryse Kedar, a former minister under Préval, pointing at what many here have called a "substance-lite" election. "What are the new ideas that have come from this process? How are we going to fix Haiti?"

"We remain very divided," said Jean-Junior Joseph, a spokesman for interim Prime Minister Gérard Latortue, who stressed that he hopes the elections do not end up adding to that divide. "This country really needs reconciliation and dialogue. That should be our first priority."

Europe's Energy Musketeers Must Stand Together (FT)

By Kazimierz Marcinkiewicz

Financial Times, February 10, 2006

In the past few weeks, European governments have faced growing pressure to fulfil one of their most basic functions as public authorities, namely to secure natural gas supplies for their national markets. Not only the countries of central and eastern Europe but also those in the Mediterranean basin, such as Italy, have been forced increasingly to limit natural gas consumption by their industries. Political ambitions, terrorism and even climatic conditions are now threatening the energy security outlook for most European Union member states as well as other countries.

On January 1, Gazprom, the Russian company, reduced the amount of natural gas transmitted to EU member states via Ukraine's transmission system. Basically, a dispute between third countries directly touched a number of EU members. More recently – due this time perhaps to climate conditions – natural gas supplies again have been limited.

The shortages provided tangible evidence of institutional weakness in European energy security structures. The citizens of affected countries expect effective responses from the EU. But up to now, the relevant governments have been unable to respond adequately because Europe lacks the necessary treaty provisions.

DOJ_NMG_0013982

It must be underlined at this point that energy security is a fundamental matter: a cut to energy supplies leads to economic disequilibrium and causes losses across a range of sectors. The governments concerned must protect their citizens and industries against such a scenario. At the same time, we are fully aware that security comes at a price and that it brings its own value.

We cannot remain defenceless nor isolated amid this increasingly threatening situation. The long-term strategic interests of EU member states demand a new initiative. In Europe, there is a widespread feeling that EU countries should act in solidarity: after all, the Union is a vehicle for deeper economic co-operation. Yet, the field of energy security is not within the scope of the EU's competencies. This is a paradox. In 1950, it was precisely in the then-strategically important sector of coal energy that the great process of European integration began, resulting eventually in the European Coal and Steel Community. A few years later, Euratom, the European Atomic Energy Community, was created. The problems of energy security were thus at the very heart of the European integration process. We should remember this heritage.

Up to now, EU activity on the fringes of the energy security problem – for example in the security of natural gas supplies – has been market-related and has served mainly to achieve a single market for natural gas. This was intended to make it more secure. Yet, a difficulty here is in finding bridging solutions aimed at liberalisation of the market, a goal the European Commission rightly promotes, while emphasising the necessity of effective provision of energy security that rests upon EU member governments.

It is the right time, in my view, to suggest a common effort to face not only current but also future challenges. That is why I want to propose to our partners from the EU and the Nato alliance a treaty on energy security. It would be an expression of solidarity for all parties, uniting them in the face of any energy threat provoked by either a cut or a diminution of supply sources that may occur because of natural disasters, disruption of wide distribution and supply systems or political decisions by suppliers.

Such an energy security treaty could follow formulas contained in the 1949 Washington Treaty, an agreement that allowed for effective transatlantic co-operation, or provisions of the modified Treaty of Brussels that established the Western European Union in 1948.

A European energy security treaty along these lines could become a real tool that would give us some badly needed certainty, as well as security in crisis situations. That is why it is essential that the treaty contains a clearly and firmly stated guarantee clause based on the "musketeer principle": "All for one – one for all".

Our president is raising this issue today in Washington and I will shortly present an initiative that expands on this idea. It seems clear that Europe will continue to depend on external energy supplies. I am convinced that the latest – unprecedented – curtailment of natural gas supplies to the EU, in one of the harshest winters of recent years, created a sufficient predicament to encourage bold and firm action. An energy security treaty would give us ways and means to provide stability and security that we all wish for.

The writer is prime minister of Poland

Driving Toward Middle East Nukes In Our S.U.V.'s (NYT)

By Thomas L. Friedman

The New York Times, February 10, 2006

LONDON

The world stands today at a very dangerous dividing line. It is the dividing line between the post-cold-war world, which we have known since 1989 — one of expanding democracy and free markets — and a post-post-cold-war world, which is unknown but almost certain to be a much less stable, prosperous and benign place.

I believe the questions that will determine whether we enter the post-post-cold-war world will come down to two: how India, China and Russia deal with Iran's nuclear ambitions, and how the West, particularly America, deals with $60-a-barrel oil.

Let me explain: if Iran develops a nuclear bomb, Saudi Arabia, Egypt and possibly other Sunni Arab states are bound to follow. The Sunni Arabs can overlook Israel's bomb, but they will never stand for the Persian Shiites having a bomb and them not. That's about brothers with a centuries-old rivalry. And if the Arab world starts to go nuclear, then you will see the crumbling of the whole global nuclear nonproliferation regime.

DOJ_NMG_0013983

A world with so many nuclear powers, particularly in its primary oil-producing region, could only be a more dangerous and unstable place, compared with the post-cold-war world. Imagine Iran with $60-a-barrel oil to make all the mischief it wants, and a nuclear weapon to shield it from any retaliation. Indeed, if you want to know what the post-post-cold-war world would sound like, listen to Iran's poisonous president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad. He was quoted in The Guardian of London the other day as saying: "Our enemies cannot do a damn thing. We do not need you at all. But you are in need of the Iranian nation."

I'm convinced that the only countries capable of getting Iran to back down — through diplomacy — are China, India and Russia. Europe is too weak, and America has already used every economic sanction it can on Iran. China, India and Russia have been great beneficiaries of the post-cold-war order, and the trade, economic development and exports it has made possible. That order was largely shaped and safeguarded by the United States, with China, India and Russia often getting a free ride.

But that order will continue only if China, India and Russia get over their reluctance to get too close to America and become real stakeholders in maintaining this post-cold-war world.

I want to share power and responsibility with them — starting with the three of them, which represent half of humanity, looking Iran in the eye and telling its leadership that they will join in any and all U.N. sanctions if Iran tries to build an A-bomb. That would get Tehran's attention.

As for America, its leadership task has shifted. If the Bush team continues to let Dick Cheney set its oil policy — one that will keep America dependent on crude oil — the post-cold-war democracy movement that was unleashed by the fall of the Berlin Wall will be either aborted, diluted or reversed. If regimes like those in Iran, Venezuela, Syria, Burma, Sudan and Nigeria have the benefit of 10 years of $60-a-barrel oil, whatever democratic tide President Bush thinks he is unleashing will be stymied. The worst regimes in the world will have the most power to support the most regressive political and religious trends.

I don't approve of the Danish newspaper cartoons mocking the Prophet Muhammad. Yes, you can see much worse in the Arab-Muslim press on any day. But why should the West get into that gutter? What I approve of even less are the blatant efforts to intimidate the world media that have printed these cartoons — an intimidation effort cynically fueled by Iran, Syria and its theocratic allies. What do you think will happen after a few more years of $60-a-barrel oil? You will see a radical arc from Iran to Syria to Hezbollah to Hamas — all financed by Iran — intimidating every moderate in the Muslim world.

A British official recalled for me that in 1946, the British foreign secretary, Ernest Bevin, remarked, "Give me 100,000 tons of coal and I will give you a foreign policy." What he meant was, Give me the energy source to heat the homes and run the businesses of Europe, and I will give you a rebuilt Europe.

Well, I say, Give me even $30-a-barrel oil and I will give you an Iranian regime that is a lot less smug — an Iran that will need to be tied into the world much more in order to create real jobs for its exploding population.

That's why we need an urgent national effort, starting with a gasoline tax, to move the U.S. economy onto a path of more fuel-efficient cars and renewable energy. If we do it, everyone will follow.

If we don't, then say hello to the post-post-cold-war world and say goodbye to the post-cold-war world. It was fun while it lasted.

Planned Economy As China's Trade Clout Grows, So Do Price-Fixing Accusations (WSJ)

By John R. Wilke And Kathy Chen

The Wall Street Journal, February 10, 2006

Ten years ago, China's pharmaceutical firms had a sliver of the world's market for vitamin C. Today, China is the OPEC of vitamin C.

Chinese manufacturers currently supply more than 85% of the vitamin C used in the U.S. Just like the oil cartel, they can heavily influence world prices. After a 2001 agreement among China's four largest producers, spot prices for vitamin C rose to as high as $9 a kilogram from lows of less than $3.

Cooperation among competitors is illegal in the U.S. when it leads to higher prices for consumers. So far, about half a dozen civil antitrust suits have been filed against Chinese vitamin C manufacturers in various U.S. courts. Federal prosecutors in Texas are reviewing similar allegations, though the Justice Department hasn't yet decided whether or not to pursue criminal charges, people close to the inquiry say.

DOJ_NMG_0013984

As China becomes ever more dominant in manufacturing, its ability to dictate the prices of industrial and consumer products is steadily rising. As a result, Chinese manufacturers are increasingly running afoul of Western antitrust law in products from vitamin C to a mineral used in steel production. These legal struggles could become another point of tension in the U.S.-China relationship, which has been tested by disagreements over matters from textile tariffs to the trade deficit.

Chinese companies deny breaking U.S. law and have hired U.S. law firms to mount a defense. The companies are expected to argue they are acting as agents of the Chinese government and therefore aren't subject to antitrust law. A Chinese industry executive says the companies raised prices to stave off accusations they were "dumping," or illegally selling products abroad at below cost to win market share.

There are signs the vitamin C model is migrating to other Chinese exports. In a meeting of Chinese makers of the pain reliever acetaminophen, the companies "fervently indicated their wish to use the example of vitamin C industry self-regulation," according to minutes posted on the group's Web site. Prices subsequently jumped 20%. Chinese makers of saccharin, rayon and magnesite -- a mineral used in steel production -- recently formed similar alliances. Magnesite producers also are being sued in the U.S.

In the case of saccharin, Chinese producers had been accused by the U.S. Commerce Department of dumping. Then in March 2003, five companies formed a "Saccharin Sub-committee" of the China Chamber of Commerce, a quasigovernment body. They declared that low prices no longer made sense now that they had overtaken their U.S. and South Korean rivals.

"Due to disorderly internal competition...various enterprises lost huge profits" and had to pay antidumping duties levied by the U.S., according to minutes of the meeting posted on the group's Web site. The companies agreed to raise export prices and said "self-regulation should continue into 2004 to prevent the mutual slaughtering of aggressive competition."

William Isaacson, a Washington lawyer who filed the first of the civil lawsuits against Chinese producers of vitamin C and magnesite, says these aren't isolated instances. "Once Chinese companies can control a market, this becomes their business model," he contends. His vitamin C case is pending in federal court in Brooklyn, N.Y. The magnesite case was filed in U.S. District Court in Newark, N.J.

American courts have been increasingly willing to claim jurisdiction across international borders in antitrust cases if harm can be shown to U.S. consumers. U.S. companies that use vitamin C include makers of dietary supplements, soft drinks and animal feed.

Monopolies remain active in parts of China's economy, even though price-fixing was formally outlawed in 1998. A sweeping new antimonopoly law is being drafted in Beijing. Its adoption has been slowed by squabbling among Chinese government agencies forced to give up the ability to set prices. It isn't clear if the new law would bar price collusion in the vitamin market.

China's state-run pharmaceutical companies began making vitamin C in 1958 catering to domestic demand. In the late 1970s, Chinese government researchers found a way to speed up the basic production process, which is done by fermenting ascorbic acid. Chinese companies then could make vitamin C in two steps rather than five, as was common in the West.

Looking Abroad

Vitamin C, thus, was among the first Western drugs for which China developed its own intellectual property and a clear cost advantage over foreign rivals. With its new technology, Chinese producers began to look for sales abroad. The promise of export profits attracted new producers. Production lines multiplied and volume soared.

Northeast Pharmaceutical Group Co. was one of the first to begin exporting. Based in the gritty industrial city of Shenyang, 800 miles northeast of Beijing, Northeast is among the biggest Chinese vitamin C producers and boasts that it is one of China's best-known pharmaceutical brands. It employs 8,000 workers making products from antibiotics to the AIDS drug AZT. Vitamin C is its best seller, with more than 15,000 tons a year under production.

China's vitamin makers got a big break in 1997, thanks to an earlier antitrust dispute. After a long investigation, the U.S. Justice Department accused European and Japanese companies of price-fixing in a dozen vitamins, including vitamin C. It became the largest-ever criminal antitrust case, resulting in nearly $1 billion in government fines and several jail terms for executives.

DOJ_NMG_0013985

With the European-Japanese cartel broken, Chinese companies flooded the market with low-price vitamin C, forcing plant closings and consolidation among European and Japanese firms. Chinese companies, who previously had been overshadowed by their bigger rivals, quickly captured much of the world market.

Prices fell sharply from the high of $12 a kilo established by the European and Japanese cartel members in 1996. By late 2001, competition pushed prices down to $2.80 a kilo. (A kilogram equals 2.2 pounds.)

People familiar with the matter say China's vitamin C makers were told at that time by the Chinese government to deal with Western complaints about price dumping. They say the companies took that to mean they should coordinate to raise prices.

Ma Xiaoye, director of independent think tank Shanghai Academy for World Watch and a former Chinese trade official, says the government routinely encourages Chinese companies to "coordinate" to avoid price wars that often spark antidumping charges, a practice he says is legal. He says these requests aren't binding and that the groups don't usually set specific prices.

Mr. Ma says these efforts often don't result in any agreement. "Vitamin C was an exception, because there are only a few companies," Mr. Ma says. "It was easier" for them to agree on an approach.

In November 2001, the four largest Chinese producers formed the Vitamin C Chapter of the China Chamber of Commerce of Medicines & Health Products Importers & Exporters. On its Chinese-language Web site, the chapter announced a "self-discipline agreement...to stabilize and raise export prices."

Soon after, spot prices for vitamin C shot up to as high as $7 a kilo. By 2003, rising demand and supply shortages pushed the price higher.

Guan Ningyun, legal director of the China Chamber of Commerce of Medicines & Health Products Importers & Exporters denies the group sets prices, saying in an interview that "it's the market force that pushes prices up."

The rise enticed a few Chinese producers to grab market share by cutting their prices, according to the U.S. civil suits. U.S. import data show a noticeable price dip in mid-2003.

In November, the Vitamin C trade group held an "emergency meeting" in which members again agreed not to cut prices, according to allegations in the U.S. civil suits. Spot prices rose to as high as $9 a kilo by the end of December. As U.S. lawyers readied lawsuits at the end of 2004, prices again drifted downward. It also is possible that some Chinese producers were backsliding on their promises. In recent months, as antitrust scrutiny increased, U.S. prices have fallen to as low as $3.80 a kilo.

Bulk purchasers of vitamin C in the U.S. were buffeted by the price swings. "We were paying about $4 a kilo, then within a year it was $8," says Bradley Reynolds, a vice president at Animal Science Products Inc., Nacogdoches, Texas, who says the higher costs hurt profits. The family-owned, feed-supplement company blends vitamins for customers from catfish farmers to pet-food makers.

Mr. Reynolds's family firm is a lead plaintiff in one of the civil lawsuits against the Chinese vitamin C makers. It was among the U.S. businesses that won damages in the European vitamin case. Though he won't divulge the amount, Mr. Reynolds says, "it wasn't near as much as they stole."

Livestock feed accounts for about 10% of U.S. vitamin C consumption. About a third goes to food and beverage makers, where it is used as a preservative as well as a nutrient. The rest is used in pharmaceuticals and diet supplements.

The proliferation of private antitrust suits against Chinese companies has brought teams of U.S. lawyers to China seeking to defend them. Attorneys looking to defend Chinese magnesite producers recently took part in a bake-off in Beijing. The first round included 30-minute pitches in an auditorium at the China Chamber of Commerce of Metals, Minerals & Chemicals. In later meetings, held in ornate ceremonial rooms over rounds of steaming chrysanthemum tea, lawyers made individual presentations about their defense strategy.

The Chinese executives rarely spoke, the U.S. participants say, but appeared to understand every word. Their Chinese lawyers quizzed the U.S. attorneys closely about U.S. law and cited the latest cases and law-review articles. A similar competition was held for law firms seeking to represent Chinese vitamin C manufacturers.

Some attorneys maintain that antitrust law still is largely an alien concept for Chinese companies. "China today is where Japan or [South] Korea were a decade ago -- they don't fully appreciate the seriousness of these lawsuits and possible criminal investigations," says Kirby Behre, a Washington, D.C., lawyer with Paul, Hastings Janofsky & Walker LLP, which has numerous clients in China.

DOJ_NMG_0013986

James Serota, an attorney with Greenberg Traurig LLP in New York, who is representing Northeast Pharmaceutical, declines to comment, citing the pending civil cases. Other vitamin C makers who have been sued decline to comment. In the past, many have said they have done nothing wrong. North China Pharmaceutical Group Ltd. called the suits "groundless" in reports carried by Xinhua, the official China news agency, in June. In Xinhua reports, Shijiazhuang Pharmaceutical Group Ltd. said the suits were "deliberately provocative."

One Possible Defense

A recent court filing by Northeast Pharmaceutical in a Massachusetts state court signals one possible defense. The filing says Northeast is "supervised and directed" by the Shenyang municipal government and should be treated by U.S. courts as an "agent or instrumentality" of the People's Republic of China.

Under international law, sovereign nations are immune from antitrust enforcement by another country. That is why lawsuits against the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries are routinely dismissed. Although they have a number of different shareholders, the vitamin C makers are overseen by state officials and a majority of their stock is still held by government groups, according to Northeast's court filing.

It isn't clear how close these ties remain. A high-level official in the local government office that oversees North China Pharmaceutical says the government no longer "interferes" in management. "We don't help set prices, that concept is 20 or 30 years old," says the official. "They do what it takes to earn money."

Plaintiffs' lawyers are expected to challenge the immunity defense on the grounds that it doesn't apply to companies indirectly owned by the state or state-owned companies that engage in purely commercial activity.

China's chambers of commerce could be major figures in the cases. Many of the price agreements were set up under their auspices. These days, the chambers awkwardly combine their old role in China's centrally planned economy, in which they set prices and market standards, with their new one as champion of the country's newly privatized businesses. In some ways, they symbolize the learning process the country is undergoing as it becomes a key player in global trade.

"China's chamber of commerce has two personalities," says Wang Ming, deputy dean of School of Public Policy & Management at Tsinghua University.

U.S. trial lawyers are examining other Chinese industries for evidence of price fixing. Two of the firms that filed cases against Chinese vitamin C makers -- Boies Schiller & Flexner LLP, and Cohen, Milstein Hausfeld & Toll PLLC -- earlier won settlements of $1.2 billion for U.S. businesses overcharged by the European vitamin cartel. They included drug giant Abbott Laboratories and cereal maker General Mills Inc.

The team of prosecutors and FBI agents looking into Chinese vitamin C is the same one responsible for breaking up the European vitamin cartel. But criminal price-fixing cases are extraordinarily difficult to prove. Witnesses and evidence are often beyond the reach of investigators. This case, in particular, would be fraught with political and economic complications.

"These civil suits are probably going to go forward," predicts Mr. Behre, the Paul, Hastings lawyer. "But whether or not the government decides to bring a criminal case becomes a political question."

Mr. Reynolds, the Texas feed-supplement maker, doesn't think it's all that complicated. "If China is going to be a world player, they've got to play by the rules."

DOJ_NMG_0013987

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 10, 2006 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Cheney Says NSA Spying Should Be An Election Issue (WP) 5
Inside Politics (WT) 5
Poll: Surveillance Wins Some More Backers (AP-Y2) 7
Former FBI Agent Ralph Decker Thinks Wiretapping Is Not Only Legal, It's Necessary. (KIMT) 8
If Al Qaeda Phones Tell Them We Can't Take The Call (WSJ) 8
Changing Winds On Surveillance (WP) 9
President Kollar-Kotelly (WSJ) 10
Another Set Of Eyes (WP) 10
Editorial: Stonewalled (SACBEE) 11
Cal Thomas: In A Dither On Security (SACBEE) 11
Loose Lips Sink Spies (NYT) 12
US Sends 3 Guantanamo Prisoners Home To Morocco (REU) . 13

Patriot Act:

Senate Republicans Announce Deal For Renewal Of Patriot Act (LAT) 14
Senators Make Compromises On Patriot Act (USAT) 15
Agreement Reached On Patriot Act Changes (AP-Y2) 16
Key Democratic And G.O.P. Senators Are In Accord On Extending Patriot Act (NYT) 17
Patriot Act Compromise Clears Way For Senate Vote (WP) 18
GOP Reaches Patriot Act Deal (WT) 18
Republicans, Durbin, Bush Reach Accord On Patriot Act (Update3) (BLOOM) 19
Senate Republicans Craft Patriot Act Deal (REU) 20
Patriot Act Gets OK From Sununu (MANUL) 21
Police Blotter: Patriot Act E-mail Spying Approved (CNET) 22

Homeland Response:

Bush Gives New Details Of 2002 Qaeda Plot To Attack Los Angeles (NYT) 23
Bush Signs Deficit Reduction Act (REU) 24
Bush Details 2002 Plot To Attack L.A. Tower (WP) 25
Bush Gives New Details About Old Report Of L.A. Terror Plot (LAT) 26
Bush Provides Details Of 2002 Terrorist Plot Aimed At Los Angeles (MERCN) 27
Bush Details Terror Plot (CSM) 28
Bush Gives Details Of Foiled Plot By Al Qaeda To Attack Los Angeles (WSJ) 29
Bush Details Foiled Terror Plot Targeting L.A. (CHIT) 30
Plot To Hit Los Angeles Tower Foiled, Bush Says (WT) 31
Bush Details Purported Plot To Hit L.A. President: Southeast Asian Men Were To Fly Jet Into City's Tallest Building (USAT) 32
Bush: U.S. Surveillance Helped Stop Attack (AP-Y2) 32
A Distinctive Shape, And An Inviting Target (NYT) 33
Counterintelligence Posts Vacant (WT) 34
TSA Criticized For Delay In New Passenger-screening Program Secure Flight Is 'at Risk Of Failure,' Investigators Say (USAT) 35
Passenger Check May Be Vulnerable (NYT) 36
In Unusual Request, TSA Seeks $10 Million To Address High Turnover (WP) 36
Sensor On Hill First Suggested VX Nerve Agent (WP) 37
White House Knew Of Levee's Failure On Night Of Storm (NYT) 38
A Closer Look At Some Of The Documents (NYT) 41
Ex-FEMA Chief, In Reversal, To Answer Questions On Storm (NYT) 43
Former FEMA Director To Testify About Katrina (WP) 44
Neighborhoods At Stake (USAT) 44
Rebuild Louisiana, But Not By Creating Federal Money Pit (USAT) 45
SBA Seeking More Money From Congress Some Lawmakers Criticize Agency For 'lack Of Leadership' In Handling Katrina Relief Funds (USAT) 45
Has USA Lost Drive To Rebuild After Tragedies? Nation Usually Quick To Rebound, But Confusion Slowing Process In New Orleans, At Ground Zero (USAT) 46

War News:

Ex-CIA Official Faults Use Of Data On Iraq (WP) 48
Two Shiite Alliance Contenders Vie For Prime Minister Job In Iraq (USAT) 50
Iraqis Cope With Life Without Lights (CSM) 50
Danger? Drabness? No Date? Iraqis Find An Outlet Online (NYT) 52
Kidnapped U.S. Journalist Pleads, 'Just Do Whatever They Want' (NYT/AP) 53
Kidnapped U.S. Reporter Appears In New Video (LAT) 53
In New Video, Abducted U.S. Reporter Pleads For Quick Action (WP) 54
A 'Half Full' Afghan Army (CSM) 54

NATO Renews Afghan Commitment After Cartoon Storm (REU-Y2)..... 55
Rumsfeld Backs NATO Taking Over Operations (WT/AP) 56
Sectarian Strife Kills 31 In Pakistan And 6 In Afghanistan (NYT) 57
Shiites Targeted On Deadly Holy Day (WP)..... 58
Peace Prevails In Iraq As Shiites Observe Holy Day (LAT) 59
Odds Of Survival Improve For The U.S. Military's Best Friends (LAT) 60

Corporate Scandals:

DoJ Warns AIG To Comply With Settlement (FT)..... 62
AIG To Pay $1.64 Billion To Settle Charges (AP-Y2)..... 62
AIG Settles Fraud Charges For $1.64 Bln (REU)..... 64
A.I.G. Apologizes And Agrees To $1.64 Billion Settlement (NYT)64
AIG Accord May Lighten Its Wallet, But The Stock May Be Poised To Gain (WSJ) 66
AIG Agrees To Pay $1.64B Fraud Fine Biggest Penalty Ever On A U.S. Company (USAT)..... 67
AIG To Pay $1.64 Billion To End State, Federal Probes (Update2) (BLOOM) 68
The Cleanup Continues (NYT)..... 69
Enron Witness's Plea Bargain Is Questioned By The Defense (NYT/REU)..... 69
Former Enron Investor Relations Chief Defends Guilty Plea (WP)..... 70
Lay's Lawyer Argues That Panic In Market Sank Enron, Not Fraud (WSJ)..... 71
Lay's Attorney Hits Snags In Dealings With Witness (USAT) 71
Enron Judge Stops Lay's Lawyer's Bid To Focus Trial On Fastow (BLOOM)..... 72
Witness: Lay Took On New Duties At Enron (AP)..... 73
A Second Mistrial Is Declared In Fraud Case Against The Former Chairman Of Cendant (NYT) 74
In The Cendant Trial, Ignorance Was An Excuse (NYT)..... 76
Preliminary Approval Given To Bristol-Myers' $185M Shareholder Settlement (LAW/AP)..... 77
Futures Traders Resist Tighter Oversight Plan (WSJ) 78

Criminal Law:

Cheney 'Authorized' Libby To Leak Classified Information (NATJOUR) 79
Libby: White House 'Superiors' Authorized Leaks (AP)..... 82
Ex-Cheney Aide Testified Leak Was Ordered, Prosecutor Says (NYT) 83
Libby Says 'Superiors' Authorized Leaks (LAT)..... 84
Libby Testifies Superiors Approved Secret-Data Leak (WSJ)..... 85
Libby Testified He Was Told To Leak Data About Iraq (WP)..... 86
E-Mail Notes Say Lobbyist Met President Many Times (NYT).... 86
Lobbyist Told Reporter Of Nearly A Dozen Contacts With Bush (WP)..... 87
Abramoff Says He Met Bush "almost A Dozen" Times (REU) 88
Abramoff Team And Reid's Office Had Frequent Contact, Records Show (WP) 89
Editorial: Curious Move In Abramoff Case (BUFFNEWS)..... 90
Head Of Construction Company Is Acquitted Of Bribing Union (NYT) 90
Ryan Defense's Decision Day Nears (CHIT)..... 90
Ryan May Take The Witness Stand Next Week (AP)..... 91
Campbell To Wife: "I'm Sorry" (WXIA-TV)..... 92
Judge Gives 'Clown' Legal Counsel (CHIT)..... 93
Joey The Clown Too Broke To Pay His Lawyers? Feds Are Scoffing (AP)..... 93
New Allegations Filed Against So-Called "Mob Cops" (NY1)..... 94
Man Sentenced For Shooting Cop, Holding Him Hostage (CHIT)94
News Bank Robber Gets Life Plus 132 Years (CHIST) 95
Bank Robber Who Shot Officer Gets Life (CHIST)..... 96
Two Former Officials Plead Guilty In Monmouth Corruption Case (NSDY/AP)..... 96
100's Of Radio Stations Cited In Payola Probe (ABC) 97
Man Charged With Killing Wife, Daughter In Boston (LAT)..... 98
British Man Charged In Deaths Of American Wife, Daughter (WP)..... 99
US Charges Taiwanese Over China Jet, Missile Deal (REU-Y2) 99
Feds Seize Truckload Of Fake Olive Oil (AP) 100
Teen Boys Abducted, Forced To Rob Md. Banks, Police Say (WP)..... 100
Ex-La. Judge Gets Prison In Bond Scheme (FINDLAW/AP) 102
Green Sentenced To 51 Months (NOTP) 102
Pressured, Director Of Getty Trust Steps Down (NYT)..... 104
Federal Directive Targets Risky Mortgage Practices (WT) 105
Sources: Gretzky Knew Of Gambling (PHI) 106
Gretzky's Wife: 'Great One' Didn't Gamble (USAT)..... 107
Gretzky Taped Trying To Aid Wife (WT/AP)..... 108
Task Force Run By FBI Unmasks Identity Thieves (SLT)..... 109
Decker Takes 5th Amendment (WINSJ) 110
Convicted Torture Killer Of 19-year-old Girl Executed (FINDLAW/AP) 111
Supreme Court Puzzles Some With Mixed Answers On Lethal Injection (WP) 112

Civil Law:

Judge Questions Viability Of NYC's Gun Litigation (LAW)..... 114
Senators Urge Major Changes To Asbestos Bill (REU-Y2) 114
Asbestos Bill Meets Test, Faces New One (AJC/AP) 115
Forward On Asbestos (WP)..... 116

Civil Rights:

Ex-Officer Charged With Making Threats (NSDY/AP) 116
U.S. Files Fewer Discrimination Charges (AP)..... 117
Katrina Disaster Seen As Chance To Fix New Orleans Bureaucracy (AP) 117
More Injuries As Race Riots Disrupt Jails In Los Angeles (NYT)118
Discriminatory Online Ads Targeted In Craigslist Lawsuit (LAW/AP)..... 119
Air Force Eases Rules On Religion (WP)..... 120
Police Kill Carjacker During Gun Battle In Venice (LAT)..... 121
Four Presidents And A Funeral (WSJ) 121
Voting Rights Under Siege (NYT)..... 122

Antitrust:

Microsoft Rivals Gripe To U.S. About Its New Vista Software (WSJ)..... 123

DOJ_NMG_0013989

RIM Unveils Plan To Keep US BlackBerrys Alive (REU) 123
BlackBerry Maker RIM Develops Software 'Workaround' In Event Of Injunction (LAW/AP) 124
Union: Mittal Pledges To Honor Agreements (AP) 125
Realtors Ask Administration To Stop Bankers From Delving Into Real Estate (HILL) 125
Federal Judge Dismisses Lawsuit Against Team, NFL (AP)..... 126
South Korean Trade Regulator Questions Intel Employees (AP)127
S.Korea Says No Conclusion Yet On Intel Probe (REU) 127
Intel Says Employees Questioned By South Korean Regulators (BLOOM)..... 128
South Korea's Antitrust Officials Continue Intel Probe (MERCN)128

Environment:

Six People Accused Of Illegally Harvesting Leopard Sharks In California (FINDLAW/AP) 129
Bush Administration Moves To Sell National Forest Land (KRT)129
Oil Giants Fell Behind On Fees (NYT)..... 130
Mining Fines Among Smallest Laws Limit Size, Allow Reduction (USAT) 131
Panel Backs U.S. Plan To Transport Nuclear Waste (WSJ)..... 131
Frankensense (WSJ) 132

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Handprint Could Be Key To Church Fire Probe (CNN) 133
Fears And Precautions Spread After Alabama Church Fires (NYT) 133
City Man Sentenced In Drug Fraud Case (BSUN) 134
News Briefs From San Diego County (AP)..... 135
Girls Try Drugs, Alcohol At Higher Rates (WP/AP) 135
More Girls Than Boy Trying Drugs For First Time-US (REU) ... 136
Girls Matching Boys In Substance Abuse (WT) 136
Teen Girls Turn To Drugs, Cigarettes (UPI) 137
More Girls Than Boys Turning To Drugs (ABC) 137
US Girls Match Boys In Alcohol, Drugs, Cigarette Use (AFP) .. 138
Girls Equal, Exceed Boys In Substance Abuse (LIVESCI) 138
Drug Use Often Masks Self-worth Issues (MINNST) 139
Lund Pleads Case For Olympic Eligibility (AP-Y2) 139
Duke Strengthens Drug - Testing Policies (NYT/AP) 140
Duke Tightens Athletes' Drug Rules (DURHS)..... 140
1:21 Pm | Duke Toughens Steroids Policy (CO) 141
Feds Raid Moonshine Still (CLAYTRIB) 142
Man Sentenced In Arson-for-hire Case (BUCKSCCT)..... 143

Immigration:

Border Violence Alarms Chertoff (WT) 144
Senator Calls Immigration A National-security Concern (WT) .. 144
Temporary Manager Visas Used To Circumvent Limits (WT)... 145
Bipolar Border Budgeting (LAT)..... 146

Tax:

KPMG Tax-Shelter Settlement May Be Revised Amid Opt-Outs (WSJ) 146
High Court To Hear Challenge To Company Tax Breaks (NLJ) 147
No Thanks (WSJ)..... 149
Rhode Island Revelation (WSJ)..... 153

Congress-Administration:

Bush Sends Congress A Familiar Budget Hit List (WSJ) 154
Most Of The Programs On Bush's Budgetary Hit List Are Retreads (USAT) 154
Bush Calls For Eliminating Program For Needy Seniors (AP) .. 155
Lawmakers Slam Bush Cut In Weatherization Funds (REU).... 156
White House Seeks To Make Case For Programs Cuts (REU-Y2)..... 157
Congress Fixes Error In $39 Bln Spending-cut Law (REU-Y2). 157
The Vanishing Future (NYT) 158
Iraq, Not Homeland, Bush Budget Buster (USAT) 158
Pentagon Budget 'A Great Surprise' (WP)..... 159
Still Shortchanging The Troops (NYT) 160
Bush's Domestic Policy Adviser Resigns (NSDY/AP) 160
Bush Wins Praise For Competitiveness Plan (MBSN) 161
Can Bush Make America More Competitive In Math And Science? (CSM)..... 161
bush advisor to visit (RNO) 162
Ethics Scandal Looms Over Republicans' Retreat (REU-Y2) ... 163
GOP Gets Quick Course In Ethics (WT) 163
Sen. McCain Leads Effort To Cut Earmarks (AP-Y2) 164
Just Say No To Earmarks (WSJ)..... 165
Official Resigns Public TV Post (NYT)..... 165
Ex-Press Aide For NASA Offers Defense (NYT)..... 166
Former NASA Spokesman Speaks Out (WTAW) 167
Man Who Left NASA Says He's Under Attack (AP) 167
'Culture War' At NASA? (HC)..... 168
Politics Vs. Climate Reality (USAT) 168
Backlash Brewing (WP) 169
And Another Thing . . . (SSR) 169
Academy To Referee Climate-Change Fight (WSJ) 170
More Vets Get Health Care, But 'Priority 8' Is Like Priority Zero (WP)..... 170
VERBATIM (WP) 171
GOP Senator Says Withhold Congress' Pay (AP-Y2)..... 171
Keeping The Faith At The White House (CHIT) 171
Senate Confirms Ameriquest Founder As Ambassador (LAT) . 172

Other News:

Jobless Claims Fall To 6-Year Low (WSJ) 173
Dow Rises On Jobs, Earnings Reports (USAT) 174
Dow Industrials Build On Rally (WSJ)..... 174
Bernanke The Inflation Fighter (WSJ) 175
Life After Fed Proves Tricky For Greenspan (FT) 177
Will Lawyers Get Hung Up In Quest For Cell Phone Records? (LAW)..... 177
Conservatives Unsettled About Movement's Future (NYT)..... 178
America At A Crossroads (WT) 180
Anti-war Mom Sheehan Will Not Run For Senate (REU-Y2) 181
No Senate Run For Activist Cindy Sheehan (AP-Y2)..... 181
Steele's Words At Meeting Faulted (BSUN) 181
No Joke: Maryland Democrats Will Honor Steele (WT) 183
Largess Preceded Md. Vote On Wal-Mart (WP) 183
An Old Way To Fight AIDS (LAT) 185
Putin Considers Inviting Hamas Leaders To Moscow (NYT) 185

DOJ_NMG_0013990

Putin To Issue Invite To Hamas Leaders (WP) 187
Putin Invites Hamas To Talks (WT/REU) 188
Death Penalty Asked For Beslan Raider, Reviving A Debate (NYT) 188
Tensions Over Russia Set Tone At G-8 Meeting (WT) 189
What! No Vodka? Pause In Production Has Russians Uneasy (WSJ) 190
U.S. To Shift Envoys To China, India (WP) 191
Dane Sees Greed And Politics In The Crisis (NYT) 192
Danish Premier Faults Iran, Syria (WP)..... 193
Freedom Of Speech Carries Responsibility, Annan Says (LAT)194
Hamas Joins Call For Calm In Cartoon Row (AFP-Y2)..... 195
Pope Meets Laura Bush, Says Worried About Terror (REU-Y2)196
First Lady Discusses Terrorism With Pope (AP) 197
Swifter, Higher, Stronger, Safer? (WP)..... 197
The Ayatollah Joke Book (WP)..... 199
Curse Of The Moderates (WP) 200
Hope Beyond The Rage? (WP) 201
A Global View On Cartoons Debate (USAT) 201
In Iranian Eyes, The 'Cross-Eyed British' Are To Blame (NYT) 202
For Americans, It Can Pay To Play In Iran's Court (WP) 203
Would Iranians Rally 'Round The Flag? (LAT) 205
For Venezuela, U.S., A (Very) Little Civility (WP) 206
'New Populists' Vs. The West (CSM)..... 207
Candidate Of Haiti's Poor Leads In Early Tally With 61% Of Vote (NYT) 208
Haitians Patiently Await Final Election Results (CSM) 210
Europe’s Energy Musketeers Must Stand Together (FT)..... 211
Driving Toward Middle East Nukes In Our S.U.V.'s (NYT)..... 211
Planned Economy As China's Trade Clout Grows, So Do Price-Fixing Accusations (WSJ)..... 212

DOJ_NMG_0013991

TERRORISM NEWS:

Cheney Says NSA Spying Should Be An Election Issue (WP)

By Jim Vandehei

The Washington Post, February 10, 2006

Vice President Cheney suggested last night that the debate over spying on overseas communications to or from terrorism suspects should be a political issue in this year's congressional elections.

Speaking to Republicans gathered for the annual CPAC convention, Cheney said the debate over the National Security Agency surveillance program "has clarified where all stand" on an issue that has drawn criticism from congressional Democrats and some Republicans.

"And with an important election coming up, people need to know just how we view the most critical questions of national security, and how we propose to defend the nation that all of us, Republicans and Democrats, love and are privileged to serve," Cheney said.

His comments reflected the emerging GOP plan to make national security and terrorism the centerpiece of House and Senate elections. White House Deputy Chief of Staff Karl Rove telegraphed the strategy last month when he told a Republican audience that "we are dealing with two parties that have fundamentally different views on national security."

Cheney's comments were the closest a top White House official has come to calling for the NSA program to be a political matter.

Democrats have criticized the White House for politicizing national security issues such as the USA Patriot Act and NSA surveillance.

Its unclear whether the GOP strategy will work, however.

In a new Associated Press poll, about half of those surveyed favored the wiretap program. In the same poll last month, 56 percent opposed it. White House officials privately argue that President Bush's greatest political strength is the same one that helped Republicans in the last two elections: fighting terrorism.

In recent weeks, Bush has shifted his public focus away from Iraq and trained it on winning public support for the program. Some Democrats argue that Bush is breaking the law by spying on people in the United States without a warrant and without congressional or judicial oversight. Bush contends that the Constitution and the 2001 congressional war resolution give him the authority to take such steps to track down terrorism suspects.

"Some in Washington are yielding to the temptation to downplay the threat and to back away from the business at hand," Cheney said. "That mind-set may be comforting, but it is dangerous."

Inside Politics (WT)

By Greg Pierce

The Washington Times, February 10, 2006

Dean's latest line

Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean, in criticizing government eavesdropping on domestic phone calls involving terror suspects overseas, likened President Bush to the leader of Iran.

"All we ask is that we not turn into a country like Iran, where the president can do anything he wants," Mr. Dean said yesterday on ABC's "Good Morning America."

The Republican National Committee immediately fired back at Mr. Dean.

"Chairman Dean's outrageous comparison today between the United States and Iran is reckless and wrong," RNC spokeswoman Tracey Schmitt said. "By equating the United States of America to an oppressive regime that promotes anti-Semitism, suppresses women and restricts free speech, Howard Dean continues to lower the bar for political discourse in this country. The question for Democrats is, do they stand beside their party chairman and his latest wild-eyed attack?"

Scandalous behavior

"Mark Antony in his famous funeral oration in Shakespeare's 'Julius Caesar' says that he came not to praise Caesar, but to bury him. This week, at the funeral for the widow of Dr. Martin Luther King, two of the speakers, Jimmy Carter and Rev. Joseph Lowery, might have opened their remarks by saying that they came not to bury Coretta Scott King, but to bash [President] Bush, which is exactly what they proceeded to do," Lee Harris writes at www.tcsdaily.com.

DOJ_NMG_0013992

"They exploited a solemn occasion in order to take cheap pot shots at the president, keenly aware that their remarks would be broadcast around the world, and into many American classrooms," the writer said.

"Of course, both Carter and Lowery were also aware that the target of their attack, George W. Bush, was sitting right behind them. Had he not been present on the occasion, their Bush-bashing would have only been an affront to good taste.

"But because Bush had come there to honor the memory of Coretta Scott King, and not to engage in a debate with his political opponents, the attacks on him crossed the boundaries of mere bad taste, and became low blows. They were deliberately attacking a man who they knew could not, under the circumstances, defend himself against their assault. Their aim was quite obvious — to embarrass and humiliate Bush in the full knowledge that there was not a thing Bush could decently do about it.

"The president, for example, could not do what most people, including myself, would have done. He could not jump up and simply walk out — that would have created a scandal. Therefore, he had no choice but to sit there and take it. He was hopelessly trapped, and was entirely at the mercy of his assailants — and they knew it. He had to behave like the president, even when a former president, Mr. Carter, was behaving like a cad."

Cheney rethinks?

Vice President Dick Cheney, who has issued repeated Shermanesque statements that he will not run for president in 2008, said last night that he may be rethinking his position.

Almost.

After a crowd of hundreds gathered at the Conservative Political Action Conference in Northwest gave him a rousing standing ovation before his speech last night, the vice president was moved.

"Getting a reception like that almost makes me want to run for office again," he said with a wry smile.

As the crowd again erupted in applause, he cut them off — "Almost," he said loudly, drawing laughter.

The vice president gave the Republican rank and file the same message his boss, President Bush, has for the past few months — extend the tax cuts, renew the USA Patriot Act and stay the course in Iraq.

Taking a dig at the more liberal Massachusetts senator, Mr. Cheney said U.S. troops have received "mixed signals out of Washington."

"They have at times been unfairly criticized, as when John Kerry said on national television that American soldiers were, quote, terrorizing Iraqi women and children in their homes." The crowd booed lustily.

But he said that under Mr. Bush's leadership, "We are in this fight to win, and we are winning."

For those in Washington who say the war in Iraq is a distraction, he said: "Which part of the war on terror do they consider worth fighting?"

Surveillance poll

President Bush's campaign to convince Americans that the government's terrorist surveillance program is essential to national security has had an effect: Last month, people disapproved, 56 percent to 42 percent. Now it's basically tied.

In the poll of 1,000 adults taken from Monday to Wednesday, 50 percent said the administration "should be required to get a warrant" before monitoring Americans' communications involving terror suspects. Forty-eight percent said officials "should be allowed to monitor without a warrant." The two-point gap is less than the poll's margin of error of 3.1 percentage points.

Mr. Bush has been particularly successful at making his case to core supporters, including Republicans, white evangelicals and suburban men. Support in each category grew more than 10 percentage points in the past month, the Associated Press reports.

Land of the free

It's all about the freebies for hundreds of activists attending this week's Conservative Political Action Conference (CPAC) at the Omni Shoreham Hotel in Northwest.

Conference attendees get a canvas tote bag full of goodies, including a 2006 calendar from the National Taxpayers Union, mints from TV Watch and a pink toy pig from Americans for Limited Government.

The Young America's Foundation booth was doing brisk business with a "buy one, get one free" deal on posters. Those who bought YAF's eye-catching Ann Coulter poster could have their free pick of a Ronald Reagan poster or a President Bush poster.

Meanwhile, at the booth of Nashville-based publisher Nelson Current, author Joel Miller was giving away T-shirts to promote his new book, which was subtitled, "How Big Government Puts the Squeeze on America's Families, Finances and Freedom."

For some reason, Mr. Miller's T-shirts were especially popular with ladies at CPAC. Maybe it's because the shirts are hot pink. But it also might have something to do with the book title, boldly displayed on the front of the T-shirts: "Size Matters."

DOJ_NMG_0013993

No-go

Anti-war activist Cindy Sheehan said yesterday that she will not run for the U.S. Senate against Sen. Dianne Feinstein, California Democrat, Reuters news agency reports.

Mrs. Sheehan, speaking in front of San Francisco City Hall, said, "If I thought that running for Senate would bring our young people home more quickly, I would do it in a minute, but I am not convinced that that would do so."

Mrs. Sheehan in recent weeks had expressed interest in challenging Mrs. Feinstein, who does not favor an immediate withdrawal of troops from Iraq.

Poll: Surveillance Wins Some More Backers (AP-Y2)

By Katherine Shrader

AP2, February 10, 2006

President Bush's campaign to convince Americans that the government's eavesdropping program is essential to the war on terrorism has made an impact: Last month people disapproved, 56 percent to 42 percent. Now it's basically 50-50.

Bush has been particularly successful at making his case to core supporters, including Republicans, white evangelicals and suburban men. Support in each category grew more than 10 percentage points in the last month.

The AP-Ipsos poll findings came as the White House relented and provided some new details to the House and Senate Intelligence Committees about the program. At Bush's direction, the National Security Agency has been monitoring communications between people overseas and in the U.S. when links to terrorism are suspected.

However, Senate Democrats left their three-hour session Thursday frustrated about the level of information they received from Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Gen. Michael Hayden, the nation's No. 2 intelligence official.

"Where we really wanted hard information that was important to us — to give us the size of the scope and the reach and the depth — they were not forthcoming," said West Virginia Sen. Jay Rockefeller, the intelligence panel's top Democrat. "And what that did was take good people who were willing ... to have an open mind about all of this, and push them the other direction."

The irritation stood in contrast to some Democrats on the House Intelligence Committee. That panel's top Democrat, Rep. Jane Harman (news, bio, voting record) of California, left a separate briefing on Wednesday cautiously saying she saw a thaw after weeks of White House insistence that it would not brief the congressional committees on the program's details. Under the initial plan, the briefing was only supposed to cover legal issues, but members said they also got some operational information.

It was unclear why the White House suddenly was willing to share more information with lawmakers. When asked what changed, Senate Intelligence Committee Chairman Pat Roberts, R-Kan., said: "Meaningful dialogue." He would not elaborate.

The debate over the program has turned intensely political in recent days. A growing cadre of Republicans has joined Democrats in raising fundamental questions about the program. Although the White House has argued the president has all the authority he needs to order the surveillance, calls for legislation have grown.

As part of an upcoming bill, Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., said he wants the secretive Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court to review the program and determine if it is constitutional.

Using a different approach, Sen. Mike DeWine (news, bio, voting record), R-Ohio, said changes in U.S. law are necessary to give the White House the statutory authority it needs to conduct the monitoring — and end the controversy.

Bush's spokesman Scott McClellan said the White House will listen to lawmakers' ideas on legislation, but the president has indicated he would resist any move that would compromise the program. "There is a high bar to overcome on such ideas," McClellan said.

Some lawmakers see Roberts as key to any changes. He said the legislative work should be the jurisdiction of his committee, if "there is any necessity" for a bill. He was noncommittal about whether there would be future briefings on the program, saying, "We'll see."

The intelligence committee's Democrats and at least two Republicans have called for inquiries into the program. Thursday's session "doesn't excuse the need for genuine accountability," said Sen. Ron Wyden (news, bio, voting record), D-Ore., a committee member.

Two senators are looking outside the Bush administration for information. Sens. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., and Russ Feingold, D-Wis., wrote a letter Thursday to the major telecommunications companies — AT&T Inc., Sprint Nextel Corp. and Verizon Communications Inc. — asking if they have cooperated with the government monitoring.

As congressional debate continues, public support for the program has grown with the White House's monthlong campaign of speeches and TV appearances to make its case that the monitoring is necessary. According to the AP-Ipsos poll, some 48 percent of Americans now support the administration's program. That's up from 42 percent last month.

DOJ_NMG_0013994

Half now say the administration should have to get a warrant to conduct eavesdropping, down from 56 percent one month ago. Support for the program grew by 9 percentage points among men, but it dropped 8 points — to 30 percent — in the Northeast.

Some noteworthy trends from Bush's political base:

_Fifty-eight percent of suburban men support the program, up 13 percentage points.

_Fifty-six percent of Southerners support the program, up 12 points.

_Republican support for the program jumped 14 points to 82 percent. Independent support is up 17 points, to 53 percent.

_White evangelical support grew by 11 points, to 71 percent.

Former FBI Agent Ralph Decker Thinks Wiretapping Is Not Only Legal, It's Necessary. (KIMT)

KIMT-TV, February 10, 2006

He says at least 50-attacks have been stopped by the FBI since September 11th.

He thinks the senate's investigation into the matter, could be hurting the spying program.

Ralph Decker tells KIMT NewsChannel Three," I just hope the senate wakes up because I know the trail of blood would lead right back to the senate if something does happen and would they claim it? Probably not knowing them."

But supporters like Ralph will face an uphill battle since opponents of the wiretapping say spying on American citizens without warrants is not just illegal, it's a violation of their constitutional rights.

If Al Qaeda Phones Tell Them We Can't Take The Call (WSJ)

By Daniel Henninger

The Wall Street Journal, February 10, 2006

Let's start with the one thing we know for sure about the Bush administration's program to listen to al Qaeda's phone calls into and out of the United States: It's dead.

After all the publicity of the past two weeks, does anyone think that the boys working on plans for Boston Harbor, the Golden Gate Bridge or Chicago's Loop are still chatting by phone? If the purpose of the public exposure was to pull the plug on the pre-emptive surveillance program, mission accomplished. Be safe, Times Square.

At the least, al Qaeda's operatives in Yemen, Iraq, Pakistan, Hamburg and the U.S. will hold off phoning in the next mass-murder plan until the U.S. Senate finishes deliberating Arlen Specter's proposal to legislatively order up an opinion from the judges on the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act court, est. 1978, as to whether the antiterrorist wiretap program violates the law that created their jobs.

This passage appears on the second page of the 9/11 Commission's 567-page report, On Terrorist Attacks Upon the United States: "We learned that the institutions charged with protecting our borders, civil aviation and national security did not understand how grave this threat could be, and did not adjust their policies, plans and practices to deter or defeat it. . . . We learned of the pervasive problems of managing and sharing information across a large and unwieldy government [my emphasis] that had been built in a different era to confront different dangers."

And those who cannot remember the past are condemned to repeat it. Having watched one passenger-filled airliner fly into a skyscraper on a peaceful morning in lower Manhattan more than four years ago, I'd just as soon not repeat the experience. If the question on the table is whether it is legal for the executive branch to listen without warrants to phone calls between people who repeatedly chant "Death to America," then I guess I'm for declaring it respectful of our laws and getting on with it.

But insofar as the surveillance program has been rendered moot, let's by all means pull over to the side of the road and have a long national conversation about it. (But don't send your thoughts to Sen. Specter via the Postal Service, as his Web site contains the following Important Notice: "Security restrictions now cause considerable delay in processing postal mail sent to Senate offices.")

The issues at the center of this dispute are in fact intellectually interesting, having to do with separation of powers, legal rules versus legal discretion, and competing interpretations of the Fourth Amendment and Article II of the Constitution.

But let us here consider something that tends to fall outside legal considerations -- effective management. On Tuesday, Vice President Cheney said, "You can't take 535 members of Congress and tell them everything and protect the nation's secrets." Mr. Cheney was reflecting the view, which arose at the time of the Founding Fathers, that foreign policy was disorganized under the Articles of Confederation and belonged under a strong executive. A primary reason for calling the Constitutional Convention of 1787 was the mess Congress had made of managing foreign policy.

Then later in the week GOP Rep. Heather Wilson suddenly became famous for presumably dissenting from the White House line and demanding a "complete review" of the surveillance program. Rep. Wilson, who chairs a House intelligence oversight subcommittee, is rightly regarded as one of the House's savvier and more serious members on national security issues. But . . .

DOJ_NMG_0013995

Rep. Wilson is in a neck-and-neck re-election fight back in her New Mexico district with state Attorney General Patricia Madrid. Rep. Wilson is under pressure because her district is heavily Democratic; the opposition's primary line of attack has been that Rep. Wilson isn't sufficiently "independent" of the Bush White House. Right after her highly publicized NSA declaration this week, the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee got out a statement that "Rep. Wilson is now and has always been a rubber stamp for the policies of the Bush-Cheney administration."

What this means is that the local politics of Albuquerque is now setting national security policy. Why them? Why not accord the same overweighted political status to the Third District in North Carolina, which happens to house Camp Lejeune? The primary argument against letting Albuquerque set national security policy through Rep. Wilson's political problems back home is found in that earlier statement from the 9/11 Commission: You simply cannot disperse policy formation in this area across all branches of government in the guise of checks and balances and then expect efficient management in, say, stopping terrorists. Nor can you present the paperwork required to satisfy "probable cause" before a FISA judge prior to every proposed antiterror wiretap and not risk flipping the competition's outcome in favor of the terrorists.

Historically, the proper path for working out these national security disputes hasn't been Sen. Specter's preposterous appeal to let some judge design the nation's antiterror policy but rather through informal political negotiation between the executive branch and Congress. That only works, though, if the presidency has someone who will negotiate in good faith. Who's that? Hillary Clinton, already on the campaign trail in front of the UAW Wednesday, contributed: "You cannot explain to me why we have not captured or killed the tallest man in Afghanistan." Well for starters, he's probably not making phone calls.

At the Judiciary Committee hearings Monday, Sen. Leahy announced: "Mr. Attorney General, in America, our America, nobody is above the law, not even the president of the United States." Got it. But here's the bottom line on the surveillance program. It was going to work, and help lessen the chance of another atrocity in our America, only if it stayed secret. The odds of it staying secret would diminish as its existence spread through the Congress and judicial system. Now it is public, and its utility is about zero. What's left is the legal issue of whether it violated FISA. We can only look forward to the answer.

Changing Winds On Surveillance (WP)

By E. J. Dionne Jr.

The Washington Post, February 10, 2006

This week the Bush administration was finally forced out of its own pre-Sept. 11 worldview -- and, yes, you read that right. It happened because some brave Republicans stared the president down and said: Stop.

Of course, it is the administration that is always accusing its opponents of pre-Sept. 11 thinking. But for the past five years, President Bush, Vice President Cheney and Karl Rove have been willing to put the national unity required to fight terrorism in second place behind their goals of aggrandizing presidential power and winning elections. Can you get more pre-Sept. 11 than that?

Instead of seeking broad agreement on the measures required for our nation's safety, they preferred to pick fights designed to make the Democrats look soft and to claim the president could do pretty much anything he wanted.

That's why the White House made sure that Rove trumpeted the surveillance issue before the Republican National Committee last month. A president who cared more about national security than politics wouldn't send out his top political lieutenant to make sure everyone knew that the GOP planned to use a matter of such grave importance to bash Democrats.

And it's why Cheney, when asked this week by Jim Lehrer if Bush was willing to work with Congress on the issue, barely entertained the question. "We believe, Jim, that we have all the legal authority we need," Cheney replied immediately. Congress could make any suggestions it wanted, but -- I add the italics to underscore the point -- the White House would ignore whatever it chose to ignore. " We'd have to make a decision as an administration whether or not we think it would help and would enhance our capabilities."

Translation -- Cheney to Congress: Buzz off.

But this time some important members of the president's own party -- led by Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter -- decided that enough is enough. As stewards of Congress's constitutional authority, they could not stand by while the president claimed the power to decide for himself what the law said and whether he needed to follow it without any concern for what those meddlesome members of Congress or judges might say.

And it's wonderful to see what a few brave politicians can achieve. Yesterday, the administration agreed to brief the Senate intelligence committee on the program after having offered a similar briefing to the comparable House committee the day before.

It was a small crack in the wall, and Specter and his allies will have to remain vigilant. Still, until this week, the White House had flatly refused to offer such briefings. The winds are changing.

DOJ_NMG_0013996

What's heartening is how broad the Republican dissent from the administration has been -- a sign that many Republicans have calculated that they'll be better off in this fall's elections if they do their jobs, even if this means challenging Bush and Cheney.

Rep. Heather Wilson (R-N.M.), who faces a tough reelection battle and has shown streaks of independence in the past, demanded the briefings for reasons straight out of a good civics textbook. "The checks and balances in our system of government are very important," she said, noting that our "constitutional structure has kept us safe and free and the strongest country in the world for a very long time." Yes, let's wave a flag for this Air Force veteran.

Sen. Mike DeWine (R-Ohio), who also is up for reelection, said that "this country would be stronger and the president would be stronger" if Bush accepted the idea that Congress might actually have a role in lawmaking on the surveillance issue.

And Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.) said the administration was making a "very dangerous" argument in claiming that it got the authority to wiretap without supervision when Congress passed its use-of-force resolution against terrorism. Graham said he never envisioned that he was giving Bush -- or "any other president" -- "carte blanche" on surveillance.

Focus for a moment on Graham's reference to "any other president." It's instructive to imagine what Republicans in Congress (let alone Rush Limbaugh or Bill O'Reilly) would say if a President Hillary Rodham Clinton were to claim the far-reaching authority Bush and Cheney say they have. Is there any doubt that the entire Republican Party would -- to cite a recent comment by Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman -- "have a lot of anger" and denounce Clinton for arrogance, overreaching and power lust?

"The president should have all the tools he needs to fight terrorism," Specter said, "but we also want to maintain our civil liberties." Now there is a perfect expression of patriotic, post-Sept. 11 thinking.

President Kollar-Kotelly (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 10, 2006

We'd like to thank the Washington Post for publishing a story yesterday that so quickly proved our editorial point of the same day about the folly of putting judges in control of national security decisions. That's what we call service.

The front-page story reported that on rare occasion the Bush Administration has used information from the NSA's warrantless foreign-linked wiretaps to seek domestic wiretapping authority from the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court. This was said to have upset chief FISA judge Colleen Kollar-Kotelly, and the tenor of the story is that this is one more example of how the warrantless wiretaps are an abuse of power. But the better question is, Who elected Ms. Kollar-Kotelly?

The story's real news is that Judge Kollar-Kotelly, and her predecessor Judge Royce Lamberth, took it upon themselves to erect a new "wall" concerning how intelligence is to be used to protect America. They decided that pertinent information gleaned from a warrantless wiretap should never be used later to justify a domestic warrant. But why not? If a tip gathered from an email from Pakistan leads to suspicion about an American-based contact, what's wrong with using that news to get a legal warrant to track that suspect in the U.S.? It might even prevent a domestic attack.

In any event, why is an unelected judge such as Ms. Kollar-Kotelly making these decisions? Under the Constitution, those calls ought to be made by the President, who swears to defend the U.S. and can be held accountable by the voters if he fails. Under the current FISA court process, Judge Kollar-Kotelly answers essentially to no one.

GOP Senator Arlen Specter is saying he wants to write legislation putting even more power in the hands of FISA judges. This isn't merely unconstitutional. As the Post story shows, in a world of WMD and fast-moving transnational terrorists, it's dangerous.

Another Set Of Eyes (WP)

The Washington Post, February 10, 2006

THE BUSH administration would like the debate over its warrantless wiretapping program to divide neatly along partisan, and potentially electorally useful, lines. But some Republican legislators aren't with the program. Their responsible pressure has nudged the administration from its customary highhandedness. The resulting congressional briefings are a good first step, but a framework for real oversight of the surveillance program remains necessary.

When Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales appeared before the Senate Judiciary Committee on Monday, Republican senators -- Chairman Arlen Specter (Pa.) and Mike DeWine (Ohio), Sam Brownback (Kan.) and Lindsey O. Graham (S.C.) -- expressed discomfort with the administration's end run around the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act (FISA). Then Rep. Heather A. Wilson

(R-N.M.), who chairs a House intelligence subcommittee that oversees the National Security Agency, called for a full congressional investigation into the eavesdropping. She'd been trying in vain to get information from the administration about the program since it was revealed in December. After her public statement, the administration wisely, if belatedly, agreed to brief

DOJ_NMG_0013997

House and Senate intelligence panels not just with a rehash of its unconvincing legal arguments but with actual details about the surveillance.

This is a promising reversal but not enough. Lawmakers beyond the "Gang of Eight" congressional leaders and intelligence committee chairs need to know what the surveillance program entails. But it is even more important to try to put in place a mechanism -- beyond the executive branch monitoring itself -- to make certain the surveillance stays within constitutional boundaries.

The administration is not exactly embracing the notion of congressional involvement here -- but it is also not slamming the door as firmly as it has in some confrontations. Questioned by PBS's Jim Lehrer on Tuesday, Vice President Cheney said a legislative fix was both unnecessary and potentially counterproductive. "We believe firmly . . . that we have all the legal authority we need," Mr. Cheney said, adding, "I don't think it would necessarily be in the interests of the country" to have new legislation. Still, he said of Congress, "if you've got suggestions, we're happy to listen to them."

Lawmakers don't seem to be deterred by the administration's coolness to a legislative solution -- and they shouldn't be. Mr. Specter is drafting legislation that would call on the court that oversees the administration of FISA to determine the constitutionality of the surveillance program. Ms. Wilson and other lawmakers have raised the possibility of rewriting the FISA statute to accommodate new technological realities.

Mr. Brownback urged the administration to recognize the importance of having "another set of eyes also looking at this surveillance technique." The administration ought to take his advice.

Editorial: Stonewalled (SACBEE)

The Sacramento Bee, February 10, 2006

Bush team keeps Congress in the dark

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales made it clearer than ever this week that the Bush administration is determined not only to continue warrantless electronic eavesdropping, but also to stonewall Congress and the public by saying "trust us" over and over - and not much else.

Testifying Monday before the Senate Judiciary Committee, Gonzales fell back on the argument that the president is responsible for protecting the country, and that the Constitution and Congress, in authorizing the president after 9/11 to use force against terrorist groups and states, give him the authority to do it as he sees fit. Even the most innocuous questions from senators elicited mostly platitudes, obfuscation and refusals to answer. Gonzales even said Congress is a full partner in combating terrorism.

"In the arena of war," he said, "it is not true that the president works ... to the exclusion of Congress. Quite the contrary; our framers intended that, in a time of war, both branches of government have a role to play."

Oh? Presumably that means Congress should be grateful for any scrap of information thrown its way. Key members of Congress - eight in all - have been briefed "fully," according to administration officials. But some of those briefed have said the information provided is sketchy and that security rules bar them from spelling out their objections.

Gonzales, President Bush and others have said the program, run by the National Security Agency, is limited in nature, affecting only a modest number of Americans at the U.S. end of international phone calls and e-mails. But other sources, including unnamed sources involved in the program, have said the Federal Bureau of Investigation has been inundated with information producing no useful leads.

The frustration in Congress is bipartisan. At least four of 10 GOP members of the Judiciary Committee - including Chairman Arlen Specter - have challenged official assertions of unfettered authority. So, now, has Republican Rep. Heather Wilson, who chairs a subcommittee of the House Intelligence Committee. She has called for the full Intelligence Committee to conduct an inquiry. But so far that seems unlikely.

What does seem likely is growing mutual mistrust between the administration and its supporters in Congress and those in both parties who feel, justifiably, that the president has essentially dealt Congress out of the anti-terrorist campaign. Vice President Dick Cheney made that point clearly in an interview this week, saying, "We have all the authority we need" and that a public debate "could alert al-Qaida to tactics used" by U.S. officials.

Nonsense. Closed hearings could do much to reassure Congress, and indirectly the public, that the administration is not exceeding its mandate while wrapping itself in the flag of national security. If it does have all the authority it needs, then why isn't it willing to make its case to the branch of government charged with making the laws, declaring war and providing the funds to pay for it?

Cal Thomas: In A Dither On Security (SACBEE)

By Cal Thomas

DOJ_NMG_0013998

The Sacramento Bee, February 10, 2006

"The critical question before the committee was to determine how the fundamental liberties of the people can be maintained in the course of the government's effort to protect their security. The delicate balance between these basic goals of our system of government is often difficult to strike, but it can, and must, be achieved."

That is not a statement from a member of the Senate Judiciary Committee, which last Monday heard testimony from Attorney General Alberto Gonzales about the Bush administration's efforts to monitor the conversations of terrorist suspects. It is from the introduction to the 1976 "Final Report of the Select Committee to Study Governmental Operations with Respect to Intelligence Activities," sometimes referred to as the Church Committee after its chairman, Sen. Frank Church, D-Idaho.

The New York Times recalled those "glorious" (for the left) days by reprinting a picture of Church talking to reporters during the 1975 hearings into the misuse of intelligence gathering by the Nixon administration. Though Nixon used government agencies to spy on his domestic political enemies, the Times wants its readers to believe that what the Bush administration is doing by monitoring phone calls and other communications between terrorist suspects outside the country, and those inside, is similar behavior.

What the newspaper fails to acknowledge is that the findings of the Church Committee led to the dismantling of many useful intelligence-gathering operations, thus limiting our ability to gather precisely the type of intelligence that would have been useful in stopping 9/11.

Democrats on the Senate Judiciary Committee denied they are trying to write a bill of rights for terrorists. Sen. Patrick Leahy, R-Vt., assured his colleagues and those watching C-SPAN, which carried the hearing live, that he wants to do everything possible to find terrorists before they kill more of us. He just wants to make sure it is done "legally."

Democrats appeared not to accept Gonzales' testimony that the surveillance is being done legally, preferring to make political points rather than capture and defeat the enemy.

The danger in tinkering with intelligence gathering is that the tinkerers sometimes go too far. In its effort to curtail domestic eavesdropping and foreign spying 30 years ago, a Democratic Congress used the Church Committee findings on illegal domestic surveillance in a way that some analysts believe subsequently curtailed our effectiveness to obtain information vital to the nation's security.

The CIA came to rely more on satellites and other technologies and less on human intelligence. The result was fewer people who spoke the languages of the countries in which they operated and the consequence of that has been a reduced ability to gather information that could only be obtained on the ground.

Politicians, egged on by the crusading media (who were feeling especially self-righteous after "bringing down" President Nixon), resembled constitutional fundamentalists. Today's left quotes the text of the Constitution as if it means what it says on searches and seizures, though when it comes to behavior the left wishes to condone, the Constitution morphs into a "living document" in constant need of updating to suit the times.

Which is it? Liberals in the 1970s began suggesting that virtually all American spying is unconstitutional. Soviet and Chinese spies were to be expected, but we shouldn't "be like them." A similar double standard exists today in much of the big media and among certain liberal politicians of both parties. The enemy does what it wants without restraint. We put shackles on ourselves and are shocked when those without any attack us. Then we ask, "What went wrong?"

In his defense of the president's order to monitor limited communications between foreign terrorist suspects and people in the United States, Gonzales listed a number of presidents, Democratic and Republican, dating back to the 19th century, who had used far more invasive and widespread tactics to gather intelligence they believed crucial to defending the nation.

Should the United States be attacked again, the next congressional hearings (assuming Congress survives the attack) will focus on why more wasn't done to protect us. More is now being done and public opinion seems to be fine with it for now, complaints from liberal Democrats (and a few liberal Republicans) notwithstanding.

About the writer:

Cal Thomas writes for Tribune Media Services, 2225 Kenmore Ave., Suite 114, Buffalo, N.Y. 14207. E-mail: tmseditors@tribune.com. His column routinely appears in The Bee Tuesday and occasionally on other days.

Loose Lips Sink Spies (NYT)

By Porter Goss

The New York Times, February 10, 2006

Washington

AT the Central Intelligence Agency, we are more than holding our own in the global war on terrorism, but we are at risk of losing a key battle: the battle to protect our classified information.

DOJ_NMG_0013999

Judge Laurence Silberman, a chairman of President Bush's commission on weapons of mass destruction, said he was "stunned" by the damage done to our critical intelligence assets by leaked information. The commission reported last March that in monetary terms, unauthorized disclosures have cost America hundreds of millions of dollars; in security terms, of course, the cost has been much higher. Part of the problem is that the term "whistleblower" has been misappropriated. The sharp distinction between a whistleblower and someone who breaks the law by willfully compromising classified information has been muddied.

As a member of Congress in 1998, I sponsored the Intelligence Community Whistleblower Protection Act to ensure that current or former employees could petition Congress, after raising concerns within their respective agency, consistent with the need to protect classified information.

Exercising one's rights under this act is an appropriate and responsible way to bring questionable practices to the attention of those in Congress charged with oversight of intelligence agencies. And it works. Government employees have used statutory procedures — including internal channels at their agencies — on countless occasions to correct abuses without risk of retribution and while protecting information critical to our national defense.

On the other hand, those who choose to bypass the law and go straight to the press are not noble, honorable or patriotic. Nor are they whistleblowers. Instead they are committing a criminal act that potentially places American lives at risk. It is unconscionable to compromise national security information and then seek protection as a whistleblower to forestall punishment.

Today America is confronting an enemy intent on brutal murder. Without the capacity to gain intelligence on terrorist organizations through clandestine sources and methods, we and our allies are left vulnerable to the horrors of homicidal fanaticism.

The C.I.A. has put many terrorists out of action since 9/11. In our pursuit of the enemy, we accept the unique responsibility we bear as officers of a clandestine service serving an open, constitutional society. But we also know that unauthorized disclosure of classified intelligence inhibits our ability to carry out our mission and protect the nation.

Revelations of intelligence successes or failures, whether accurate or not, can aid Al Qaeda and its global affiliates in many ways. A leak is invaluable to them, even if it only, say, prematurely confirms whether one of their associates is dead or alive. They can gain much more: these disclosures can tip the terrorists to new technologies we use, our operational tactics, and the identities of brave men and women who risk their lives to assist us.

Such leaks also cause our intelligence partners around the globe to question our professionalism and credibility. Too many of my counterparts from other countries have told me, "You Americans can't keep a secret." And because of the number of recent news reports discussing our relationships with other intelligence services, some of these critical partners have even informed the C.I.A. that they are reconsidering their participation in some of our most important antiterrorism ventures. They fear that exposure of their cooperation could subject their citizens to terrorist retaliation.

Last month, a news article in this newspaper described a "secret meeting" to discuss "highly classified" techniques to detect efforts by other countries to build nuclear weapons. This information was attributed to unnamed intelligence officials who "spoke on the condition of anonymity because of the effort's secrecy." Whether accurate or not, this is a direct acknowledgment that these unnamed officials apparently know the importance of secrecy.

Recently, I noticed renewed debate in the news media over press reports in 1998 that Osama bin Laden's satellite phone was being tracked by United States intelligence officials. In the recent debate, it was taken for granted that the original reports did not hurt our national security efforts, and any suggestions that they did cause damage were dismissed as urban myth. But the reality is that the revelation of the phone tracking was, without question, one of the most egregious examples of an unauthorized criminal disclosure of classified national defense information in recent years. It served no public interest. Ultimately, the bin Laden phone went silent.

I take seriously my agency's responsibility to protect our national security. Unauthorized disclosures undermine our efforts and abuse the trust of the people we are sworn to protect. Since becoming director, I have filed criminal reports with the Department of Justice because of such compromises. That department is committed to working with us to investigate these cases aggressively. In addition, I have instituted measures within the agency to further safeguard the integrity of classified data.

Our enemies cannot match the creativity, expertise, technical genius and tradecraft that the C.I.A. brings to bear in this war. Criminal disclosures of national security information, however, can erase much of that advantage. The terrorists gain an edge when they keep their secrets and we don't keep ours.

US Sends 3 Guantanamo Prisoners Home To Morocco (REU)

Reuters, February 9, 2006

RABAT (Reuters) - The United States has handed three suspected Islamic militants held at its Guantanamo Bay prison over to Morocco, Moroccan state media reported on Thursday.

DOJ_NMG_0014000

The three Moroccan men were being detained in Casablanca, Morocco's financial capital, for further questioning by an investigating judge, the official news agency MAP reported.

MAP gave no further details and Moroccan security officials were not immediately available for comment.

The extradition was announced two days after U.S. Federal Bureau of Investigation head Robert Mueller held talks with King Mohammed on security cooperation between Rabat and Washington.

Mueller, who toured the North Africa region to cement the U.S. anti-terror drive, also met Morocco's top security chiefs.

"We knew very well that Morocco, Algeria, Tunisia and Libya are working together to fight terrorism," Thursday's edition of the Moroccan daily al Maghribia quoted Mueller as saying.

"So we must follow up in building our friendly relations with them and create mechanisms to exchange information quickly to prevent new terrorism attacks," he said.

Morocco, a staunch U.S. ally in the region, has been clamping down on suspected cells of Islamic radicals since 2003, when multiple suicide bombings in Casablanca killed 45 people and shocked the normally peaceful country.

The United States sent five Moroccan detainees home from Guantanamo in 2004, but the five have since been in and out of detention and questioning by police over their suspected links with radical Islamist cells.

Local lawyers and rights groups say more than 20 Moroccans are still held prison by Guanatanamo.

Morocco's main independent human rights group, the Moroccan Human Rights Association (AMDH), urged Moroccans to take to the streets in Rabat on Sunday to protest against expanded security cooperation with the United States.

"The protest will express the Moroccan people's opposition to integrate Morocco in the U.S. military and security plans under the disguise of opposition to terrorism. Such cooperation threatens Morocco's security and independence," the AMDH said in statement.

U.S. military authorities in Afghanistan on Thursday released seven men who had been detained at Guantanamo Bay.

PATRIOT ACT:

Senate Republicans Announce Deal For Renewal Of Patriot Act (LAT)

By Nicole Gaouette, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, February 10, 2006

The compromise focuses on subpoena powers. Democrats are split.

WASHINGTON — Senate Republicans who had been blocking a long-term extension of the Patriot Act announced Thursday that an agreement reached with the White House could allow reauthorization of the anti-terrorism law.

At an afternoon news conference, Sen. John E. Sununu (R-N.H.) said a bipartisan group of lawmakers had worked out changes in three areas where the legislators thought "we could do better to protect civil liberties while providing law enforcement the tools it needs."

White House spokesman Scott McClellan hailed the agreement, saying that the administration was "pleased that this important legislation is moving forward."

Though some Democrats expressed support for the changes, others were critical, raising the prospect that a two-month filibuster of the act could continue.

"The few minor changes that the White House agreed to do not address the major problems with the Patriot Act that a bipartisan coalition has been trying to fix for the past several years," said Sen. Russell D. Feingold (D-Wis). "I will continue to strongly oppose and use every option at my disposal to stop any reauthorization of the Patriot Act that does not protect the rights and freedoms of law-abiding Americans."

Enacted shortly after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, the Patriot Act broke down barriers between intelligence agencies and law enforcement, giving each new powers to collect information. Lawmakers and civil liberties groups objected to provisions that included secret wiretaps and searches, saying they allowed the government to intrude too easily and too far into citizens' lives.

When the Patriot Act expired at the end of 2005, Congress resorted to passing short-term extensions while negotiations over its reauthorization took place.

Sununu made his announcement accompanied by Sens. Larry E. Craig (R-Idaho), Lisa Murkowski (R-Alaska), Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.) and Richard J. Durbin (D-Ill.). Although the lawmakers acknowledged that they did not get everything they wanted, they said the compromise was an improvement over the version that emerged after House and Senate negotiators met in conference in November.

DOJ_NMG_0014001

Those negotiations produced legislation that would have made permanent 14 of the Patriot Act's 16 provisions, prompting opponents to charge that the conference bill failed "to protect innocent people from unnecessary and intrusive government surveillance" and to fight against the act's reauthorization.

The changes announced Thursday focus largely on Section 215 orders, known as National Security Letters, a powerful type of subpoena that comes with a gag order forbidding recipients to say they have received it.

Lawmakers also reached a compromise on the act's so-called "library provision," which requires libraries, businesses or medical offices to hand over individual records to law enforcement officials.

One change, Sununu said, establishes that libraries functioning in their traditional role will no longer be subject to National Security Letters. He said the definition "traditional role" included lending digital books and providing patrons with access to the Internet.

Libraries that act as an Internet service provider, instead of simply giving people access to the Internet, would still be subject to National Security Letters.

Critics pointed out that in other respects, little has changed.

"This deal does not prevent the government from obtaining the library, medical and other sensitive business records of people with no link to suspected terrorists," Feingold said in a statement. "The records just have to be 'relevant' to a terrorist investigation, which is not adequate protection against a fishing expedition."

The negotiated changes also remove a requirement that recipients of a National Security Letter give the FBI the name of any attorney they consult about the subpoena. And, for the first time, recipients of the letters will be allowed to challenge the gag order that accompanies them, though they can only do that after a year has passed.

"We've always said that you ought to allow citizens to appeal that [gag order] before a judge," said Sununu. "We suggested a 90-day waiting period. This has a one-year waiting period, but it's important to have the process and the principle in place."

In order to successfully challenge a gag order, recipients of a National Security Letter would have to prove the government acted in bad faith.

Craig emphasized that the provisions concerning the National Security Letters would expire after four years unless they were renewed. "We've been most concerned about [Section] 215. We don't believe the protections are there the way they need to be," he said.

Craig said that there would be no additional changes, and that he was optimistic that the compromise version could pass.

Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) said she would support the agreement, telling reporters outside the Senate chamber: "I'm going to vote for it. There are three changes, they are substantive changes…. I think it's important to get this done, and there is a four-year sunset, so we'll be able to watch it closely."

President Bush has vigorously defended the Patriot Act and the administration's domestic spying program, declaring during his Jan. 31 State of the Union address that "the enemy has not lost the desire or capability to attack us."

The Senate announcement came a few hours after Bush generally defended the administration's surveillance efforts. In a speech at the National Guard Memorial Building, the president said that his anti-terrorism strategy helped foil a 2002 terrorist plot to attack Los Angeles.

Senators Make Compromises On Patriot Act (USAT)

USA Today, February 10, 2006

A bipartisan group of senators reached agreement Thursday with the White House on disputed provisions of the USA Patriot Act, increasing the chances the anti-terrorism law, held up because of civil liberties concerns, will be renewed.

The compromise allows recipients of “Section 215” subpoenas seeking business or library records related to a terrorism investigation to challenge in court a requirement that they not tell anyone.

The compromise also scraps a provision that required recipients of “national security letters,” which are issued without going before a judge, to provide the FBI with the name of any lawyer they consulted about it. A third element of the deal says traditional libraries may not be subject to FBI requests for information on research done by patrons.

The deal — reached by Republican Sens. Larry Craig of Idaho, John Sununu of New Hampshire and Lisa Murkowski of Alaska with Sen. Dick Durbin, D-Ill. — moves the Senate to within a few votes of overcoming a filibuster that blocked renewal of the bill. Still uncertain, though, is whether the House will accept the compromise. The current version of the Patriot Act expires March 10.

— John Diamond

Senate bill would curbpractice of ‘earmarks'

Ten senators, led by Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., introduced the Pork-Barrel Reduction Act. It's the latest of several proposals aimed at ending “earmarks,” the special-interest projects that members of Congress insert into legislation just before final passage.

The measure would require that earmarks be described in detail and the sponsor identified, and any member could eliminate an earmark unless it is upheld by 60 votes in the 100-member chamber.

Sheehan won't challengeFeinstein in primary

Peace activist Cindy Sheehan said she won't run against Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., in the Democratic primary, even though she thinks Feinstein has not done enough to oppose the war.

“I think I'm more effective on the outside than on the inside,” said Sheehan, whose 24-year-old son, Casey, was killed in Iraq in 2004.

Agreement Reached On Patriot Act Changes (AP-Y2)

By David Espo

AP2, February 10, 2006

A band of Senate Republican holdouts reached agreement Thursday with the White House on changes in the Patriot Act designed to clear the way for passage of anti-terror legislation stalled in a dispute over civil liberties.

Sen. John Sununu (news, bio, voting record), R-N.H. said the changes, quickly endorsed by at least one leading Democrat, would better "protect civil liberties even as we give law enforcement important tools to conduct terrorism investigation."

The White House embraced the deal even before Sununu and several other senators outlined it.

Presidential spokesman Scott McClellan said the agreement would "continue to build upon the civil liberties protections that are in place but do so in a way that doesn't compromise our national security priorities."

"We're pleased that this important legislation is moving forward," he said.

The compromise focused on three areas:

_giving recipients of subpoenas for information in terrorist investigations the right to challenge a requirement that they refrain from telling anyone.

_eliminating a requirement that an individual provide the FBI with the name of a lawyer consulted about a National Security Letter, which is a secret request for records.

_clarifying that most libraries are not subject to demands in those letters for information about suspected terrorists.

While there was no immediate reaction from House Republicans, Sen. Larry Craig (news, bio, voting record), R-Idaho, one of the Senate negotiators, said he had been in close touch with the chairman of the House Judiciary Committee. Rep. James Sensenbrenner, R-Wis.

Reaction from the Democrats was divided.

Sen. Dick Durbin of Illinois, second-ranking in the Democratic leadership, appeared at the GOP news conference. He said the compromise included "significant progress" toward protecting basic liberties and that he planned to support the compromise.

The party's leader, Sen. Harry Reid (news, bio, voting record) of Nevada, said in a statement that the agreement among Republicans "appears to be a step in the right direction."

But Sen. Russell Feingold, D-Wis., threatened a filibuster.

The senior Democrat on the Senate Judiciary committee, Patrick Leahy of Vermont, criticized the White House. At the same time, his office left open the possibility he would support the measure.

The law originally was passed within days of the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, and the administration says it has been an important weapon in the government's arsenal for tracking suspected terrorists.

Renewal of the law was blocked last year when critics said its provisions shortchanged civil liberties, particularly in the cases of individuals who were not suspected of terrorist activities themselves, but might have had innocent dealings with suspects.

Also at issue was concern over the government's ability to demand information from libraries.

As a result of the deadlock, lawmakers decided to extend the old law temporarily, a short-term solution that left the administration and many in Congress unhappy.

The current extension expires March 10.

Republicans said that with the changes, the chance would be remote that any library would have to turn over information.

But Democrats said the same provision made explicit that some libraries could be forced to turn over information, adding that existing law is vague on the subject.

Other than Sununu, the Senate Republicans who had defied the president's wishes on the Patriot Act last December were Craig, Lisa Murkowski of Alaska and Chuck Hagel of Nebraska.

DOJ_NMG_0014003

The changes were worked out over several weeks in discussions that involved the lawmakers and White House counsel Harriet Miers, according to one Republican familiar with the efforts.

Officials who discussed the issue did so on condition of anonymity, saying they did not want to pre-empt a formal announcement.

On Dec. 16, the Senate voted 52-47 to move to a final vote on the legislation, which deals specifically with 16 provisions in the act that Congress wanted reviewed and renewed by the end of last year. That was eight votes short of the 60 needed to end the filibuster.

Key Democratic And G.O.P. Senators Are In Accord On Extending Patriot Act (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, February 10, 2006

WASHINGTON, Feb. 9 — Four recalcitrant Senate Republicans said Thursday that they had reached agreement with the White House on the broad antiterrorism law known as the USA Patriot Act, and two leading Democrats said they would now support the bill. The moves possibly clear the way for passage of the legislation, which has been bottled up in a dispute over civil liberties.

The Republicans, led by Senator John E. Sununu of New Hampshire, joined with Democrats last year in a filibuster that blocked the revised bill. Their deal involved three changes that, they said, would place greater restraints on the government's latitude in obtaining personal information like library records and business transactions.

"This is an accommodation that I think we can be proud of," said another of the four senators, Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, adding that the changes to the bill "makes it relevant, makes it realistic, makes it workable and protects both our rights and our national security interests."

The deal focused on three particular areas. The new measure would give recipients of subpoenas the right to challenge an accompanying judicial order not to discuss the case publicly, though they would have to wait one year. In the meantime, they would have to comply with the subpoena. That would prevent the F.B.I. from demanding the names of lawyers consulted by people who receive secret government requests for information and prevent most libraries from being subject to those requests.

Critics said the changes were cosmetic.

"A few insignificant changes just doesn't cut it," Senator Russell D. Feingold, Democrat of Wisconsin, said in a statement. "I cannot support this deal, and I will do everything I can to stop it."

The administration would still have the power to obtain information about terror suspects who use libraries to gain access to the Internet by seeking that information not directly from libraries, but from their Internet service providers.

"This agreement clarifies crucial national security tools without weakening them and provides additional civil liberties protections," said a spokesman for the Justice Department, Brian Roehrkasse.

With the White House and Senate Republicans in accord, the bill is likely to be approved by the House. The question now is whether enough Democrats will support the compromise to give Republicans, who have 55 seats in the Senate, the 60 votes necessary to put it up for a vote. Two Democrats supported the earlier measure and another two, Richard J. Durbin of Illinois and Dianne E. Feinstein of California, said they would support the latest version. "It is a substantial improvement," Ms. Feinstein said. "There are three basic changes. They are specific. They do improve the bill. I think it's important to get this done."

As the fight over the Patriot Act has played out over the last several months, the original law, passed after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, has been extended to March 10. The bill, which greatly expanded the government's surveillance and investigative powers, has since its passage provoked intense debate about the balance between protecting national security and civil liberties.

The original bill included 16 provisions that were scheduled to expire at the end of 2005. The Senate and House passed differing measures to make those provisions permanent. But when the competing bills were reconciled into a new version, Mr. Sununu, Mr. Hagel and the two other Republicans, Larry E. Craig of Idaho and Lisa Murkowski of Alaska, balked, forcing the temporary extension and prodding Mr. Sununu into negotiations with the White House.

Passage would make several major components of the act permanent.

The compromise does not, however, address one of their chief complaints, that the revised bill would allow the government to obtain private records of Americans with just loose connections to a terrorism investigation. Mr. Sununu and the others had originally insisted that the government prove a direct connection. In its current version, the bill simply says the records have to be relevant to a terrorism investigation, a standard that Ms. Feingold said was "not adequate protection against a fishing expedition."

Mr. Durbin, the lone Democrat to appear with Mr. Sununu and the others at a news conference on the compromise, disagreed, saying, "As Senator Sununu has said, we've made progress here, significant progress, progress that moves us in the right direction, protecting basic civil liberties at a time when we are dealing with a war on terrorism."

DOJ_NMG_0014004

Patriot Act Compromise Clears Way For Senate Vote (WP)

By Charles Babington

The Washington Post, February 10, 2006

Efforts to extend the USA Patriot Act cleared a major hurdle yesterday when the White House and key senators agreed to revisions that are virtually certain to secure Senate passage and likely to win House approval, congressional leaders said.

The law -- passed in the wake of the 2001 terrorist attacks and scheduled to lapse in key areas last year -- makes it easier for federal agents to secretly tap phones, obtain library and bank records, and search the homes of suspected terrorists. Several Democrats said the compromise announced yesterday lacks important civil liberties safeguards, and even the Republican negotiators said they had to yield to the administration on several points.

But with virtually all 55 GOP senators now on board, and Democrats joining them, the plan appears to have enough support to overcome the Senate filibuster that has thwarted a four-year renewal of the statute for months. Senators said they think the White House will be able to coax the Republican-controlled House to agree as well, even though House leaders have complained that senators' demands had weakened the measure.

"It was a bipartisan group of us that really believed we could do better . . . to protect civil liberties even as we gave law enforcement important tools to conduct terrorism investigations," Sen. John E. Sununu (R-N.H.) told reporters. He said that he and his fellow negotiators had to make more concessions to the administration than they wanted to, but that Congress will monitor the law's application over the coming years and perhaps revise it.

Sen. Richard J. Durbin (Ill.), one of several Democrats who agreed to back the compromise yesterday, said "it falls far short" of the bill that was passed by the Senate last year but rejected by the House. "But if you measure it against the original Patriot Act . . . we've made progress" toward "protecting basic civil liberties at a time when we are dealing with the war on terrorism," Durbin said.

Senate Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) called the compromise "a step in the right direction."

The proposal would restrict federal agents' access to library records, one of the Patriot Act's most contentious provisions. A form of secret subpoena known as a National Security Letter could no longer be used to obtain records from libraries that function "in their traditional capacity, including providing basic Internet access," Sununu and others said in a statement. But libraries that are "Internet service providers" would remain subject to the letters, Durbin said.

The Senate proposal would no longer require National Security Letter recipients to tell the FBI the identity of their lawyers.

The compromise bill also addresses "Section 215 subpoenas," which are granted by the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act court. Recipients of such subpoenas originally were forbidden to tell anyone about the action. The proposed Senate measure would allow them to challenge the "gag order" after one year, rather than the 90-day wait in earlier legislation.

Sununu said the administration insisted on the longer waiting period. "You now have a process to challenge the gag order," he said, defending the concession. "That didn't exist before."

Sununu said he and his allies were disappointed that the compromise does not require agents to "show a connection to a suspected terrorist or spy" before obtaining a Section 215 subpoena. Instead, a FISA judge would have to agree that there are reasonable grounds to believe the items being sought are relevant to an investigation into terrorism.

Several liberals condemned the bill. "I am gravely disappointed in this so-called deal," said Sen. Russell Feingold (D-Wis.). "The White House agreed to only a few minor changes" that "do not address the major problems," he said, adding: "We've come too far and fought too hard to agree to reauthorize the Patriot Act without fixing those problems."

But Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said the Senate compromise "maintains the tools necessary to fight terrorism while further strengthening safeguards to protect civil liberties."

"We are hopeful that the Congress will now move forward to renew the Patriot Act," he said.

In a related area yesterday, several Democrats said the administration must do more to explain and justify the domestic surveillance program conducted by the National Security Agency.

"If they came with the idea that this is going to stop an investigation on the part of the Senate intelligence committee, they were wrong," committee Vice Chairman John D. Rockefeller IV (D-W.Va.) told reporters after a closed briefing by two top administration officials. "There were certain kinds of questions which could easily have been answered but weren't. . . . Where we really wanted hard information that was important to us, that gave us the size and the scope and the reach and the depth" of the program," he said, "they were not forthcoming."

Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) said after the briefing: "For the life of me, I don't understand why the administration won't say, 'Sure, you have a right to look at this. We'd like to explain it.' "

GOP Reaches Patriot Act Deal (WT)

DOJ_NMG_0014005

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, February 10, 2006

Four Republican senators reached a deal yesterday to drop their opposition to the renewal of the USA Patriot Act, hailed by the White House as crucial in the war against terrorists.

But the agreement involving White House officials and top congressional leaders doesn't guarantee approval because most Democrats are still on the record opposing the measure.

Republican Sens. John E. Sununu of New Hampshire, Larry E. Craig of Idaho, Lisa Murkowski of Alaska and Chuck Hagel of Nebraska had opposed the reauthorization because they said it lacked the appropriate civil liberties protections.

"America's civil liberty protections are a model to the world," the four Republicans said in a joint statement yesterday. "We should always strive to balance protection of these freedoms with the essential needs of law enforcement. The substantive, and at times, emotional debate concerning Patriot Act reauthorization reflects the importance of enabling law enforcement to investigate terrorists without sacrificing these rights."

Under the deal, civil liberties protections have been added regarding the issuance of secret national security subpoenas and federal searches of library records.

"The changes announced today by Senator Sununu strengthen civil liberties protections without hindering the core anti-terrorism safeguards in the Patriot Act," said Majority Leader Bill Frist, Tennessee Republican. "I expect swift adoption of these changes and the Patriot Act conference report."

Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, Pennsylvania Republican, said the modifications should clear the way for passage.

"It appears -- and I say 'appears' because nothing is ever certain in the United States Senate until the final votes are cast -- that we have come to an agreement, at least within the Senate, on modifications for the Patriot Act so that it can be renewed," he said yesterday.

Once the new provisions are added, the bill must again be approved by both chambers. The new bill is expected to get easy approval from the House, but faces stiff opposition from Senate Democrats.

In December, the four Republicans joined Democrats in filibustering reauthorization of current law, which now expires in March.

With the four Republicans on board, a filibuster would become an all-Democrat move -- a prospect that Republicans relish because polls show that voters don't trust Democrats on national security. As of yesterday, the new bill remained one vote shy of breaking the filibuster.

But the deal gained at least two key Democrat supporters yesterday in Minority Whip Richard J. Durbin of Illinois and Sen. Dianne Feinstein of California, both members of the Judiciary Committee.

"It is a substantial improvement," Mrs. Feinstein said of the new version. "I think it's important to get this done. And there is a four-year sunset, so we will be able to watch it closely."

Minority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat, signaled optimism as well.

"I commend my Republican colleagues for working hard to make the Patriot Act better," he said after the agreement was announced. "Democrats strongly believe we must have all necessary tools to fight terrorism, but we want checks and balances to ensure that these expansive powers are not abused. The deal reached by my Republican colleagues appears to be a step in the right direction."

Praise from Democrats was not unanimous. Sen. Russell D. Feingold, the Wisconsin Democrat who led opposition to the bill, said the alterations are "a few small changes" and he would continue to oppose the bill.

Sen. Patrick J. Leahy, Vermont Democrat and ranking minority member of the Senate Judiciary Committee, was disappointed, too. "A bipartisan coalition in the Senate made a valiant stand to make clear that security and liberty are not mutually exclusive values in America," he said. "We can and we should have both. But White House naysaying and partisanship have obstructed this from becoming the better bill that it should be, and that is deeply regrettable."

Republicans, Durbin, Bush Reach Accord On Patriot Act (Update3) (BLOOM)

By Jeff Bliss

Bloomberg, February 10, 2006

Feb. 9 (Bloomberg) -- Republicans in the U.S. Senate and the Bush administration agreed to changes in the USA Patriot Act that they say will allow its renewal.

The deal was endorsed by Richard Durbin, the No. 2 Democrat in the Senate, and Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid called the accord ``a step in the right direction."

The anti-terrorism law, passed in the wake of the Sept. 11 attacks, expired in December and its renewal has been stalled by concerns among Democrats and some Republicans over the law's effect on civil liberties.

Senate Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania said the compromises reached will enable passage. ``It appears, and I say appears because nothing is ever certain in the United States Senate until the final votes are cast, that we have come to an agreement," he told reporters in Washington today.

The measure would still have to pass the House. House Judiciary Committee Chairman James Sensenbrenner won't comment until he's reviewed details of the accord, said his spokesman, Jeff Lungren.

Senator John Sununu of New Hampshire, who helped negotiate the accord, said compromises were struck on three major issues.

Compromises

Companies will now be able to challenge a gag order against discussing an FBI demand for information a year after the request is made, Sununu said. In addition, those who received so-called National Security Letters from the FBI asking for information won't have to disclose the names of the lawyers they consult, as is required currently, he said.

Finally, records of libraries performing their traditional duties will no longer be subject to search by the Federal Bureau of Investigation, Sununu said.

The Patriot Act expanded the FBI's authority to demand business records, use roving wiretaps and share information with intelligence agents to pursue suspected terrorists. The Bush administration says it's been essential to tracking suspected terrorists. Critics say the law allows abuse of civil liberties.

The law expired Dec. 31 and has twice been extended for one month to give lawmakers time to settle differences.

Specter and Sununu were joined at a press conference announcing the agreement by Republican Senators Larry Craig of Idaho, Lisa Murkowski of Alaska and Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, all of whom had reservations about the Patriot Act.

Durbin's Support

Durbin, a member of the Judiciary Committee, also was there to announce his support. ``I don't speak for my caucus as I stand here," he told reporters. ``I speak for myself" in supporting the agreement.

White House spokesman Scott McClellan announced the Bush administration's support earlier. ``We believe an agreement has been reached that will continue to build on the civil liberties protections that are in place," he said at a news briefing. ``We are pleased it appears this important legislation is moving forward."

Senator Patrick Leahy of Vermont, the senior Democrat on the Judiciary Committee, made clear that he's not satisfied with the accord.

``White House nay-saying and partisanship obstructed this from becoming the better bill that it should be, and that is deeply regrettable," Leahy said in a statement.

Senator Russell Feingold, a Wisconsin Democrat, said he opposes the agreement and would try to block the measure's passage with a filibuster, a parliamentary tactic that allows for unlimited debate.

Sununu said he now counts 58 votes to support the measure - - two short of the number needed to block a filibuster -- and is confident he'll pick up enough additional votes ``on both sides of the aisle" to ``be able to pass the Senate."

Senate Republicans Craft Patriot Act Deal (REU)

By Richard Cowan

Reuters, February 10, 2006

WASHINGTON (Reuters) - Senate Republicans reached a deal with the White House on Thursday that would likely clear the way for renewing the USA Patriot Act, a key element of President Bush's war on terror.

While some Democrats were quick to portray the deal as failing to address civil liberties concerns adequately, several Republicans and Democrats who had earlier balked at renewing the law gave their support now that some revisions had been accepted by the White House.

First enacted after the September 11 attacks, the Patriot Act expanded law enforcement authorities' ability to conduct wiretaps and secret searches and share information.

Sen. Harry Reid of Nevada, the Democratic leader, said the deal appeared to be "a step in the right direction."

The Republican accord would make permanent a number of key provisions of the act that are set to expire March 10.

"It is much less likely that a filibuster would be sustained under these circumstances," said Sen. Richard Durbin of Illinois, who is in the Democratic leadership and intends to vote for the new compromise.

One change to the law accepted by Senate Republicans and the White House would allow individuals to challenge gag orders when they have been subpoenaed to produce sensitive information on library, medical, education or gun-related records.

DOJ_NMG_0014007

Another change would clarify that traditional libraries would not be subjected to special subpoenas, which are not issued by judges, to gain records.

A group of Republican and Democratic senators combined in December to stage a Patriot Act renewal filibuster, a procedural move that blocked a vote on the bill.

Since then, Congress approved short-term extensions of the law.

"White House nay-saying and partisanship have obstructed this from becoming the better bill that it should be and that is deeply regrettable," said Sen. Patrick Leahy of Vermont, the senior Democrat on the Senate Judiciary Committee.

White House spokesman Scott McClellan countered that the agreement that has been reached "will continue to build upon the civil liberties protections that are in place but do so in a way that doesn't compromise our national security priorities within this legislation."

Sen. Russ Feingold, a Wisconsin Democrat who led efforts for revisions, said the Republican proposal had only had "minor changes" that do "not address the major problems with the Patriot Act." He called the Republican-backed version a "one-sided 'deal'" and "unacceptable."

But Feingold had worked closely with Republican Sen. John Sununu of New Hampshire, who on Thursday said he would support the new language.

Sununu on Thursday acknowledged the new compromise had "places where we could do better." He said a bipartisan group of senators would work on such concerns over the long term.

Civil liberties experts have criticized the law for making it too easy for the government to obtain individuals' private records, including medical and library records.

The fight over the Patriot Act comes as Bush is under attack from Democrats for conducting domestic surveillance without warrants.

(Additional reporting by Thomas Ferraro)

Patriot Act Gets OK From Sununu (MANUL)

By JOHN DISTASO, Senior Political Reporter

Manchester (NH) Union Leader, February 10, 2006

Sen. John Sununu was pleased with what he called important improvements in the anti-terrorism USA Patriot Act announced yesterday as a compromise between a key group of senators and the White House.

“I think it’s a good package and a step in the right direction and allows us to maintain a bipartisan consensus,” Sununu told the New Hampshire Union Leader in a telephone interview from Washington.

Sununu announced the deal with the White House on Capitol Hill with Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter and three other senators who had held out for changes they felt would protect the legal rights and attorney-client privacy privilege of individuals and businesses under investigation by law enforcement authorities.

Sununu and the other senators said they hope the agreement will clear the way for final passage of the Patriot Act, which has been stalled since December. Congress has extended the existing provisions twice, most recently until March 10.

Sununu and fellow Republicans Larry Craig of Idaho, Lisa Murkowski of Arkansas and Charles Hagel of Nebraska joined with Democrats last year to block the bill.

The New Hampshire Republican said yesterday he is confident the changes will secure the necessary 60 votes to ensure any future effort to block passage will be overridden.

White House press secretary Scott McClellan said the changes “continue to build upon the civil liberties protections that are in place but do so in a way that doesn’t compromise our national security priorities.”

“We’re pleased that this important legislation is moving forward,” he said.

There was no immediate reaction from House Republicans, although several GOP officials told The Associated Press key lawmakers had been informed of the proposed changes.

Sununu said he and President George W. Bush discussed the issue briefly aboard Air Force One when he accompanied the President to and from New Hampshire on Wednesday for Bush’s Manchester speech.

He said Bush “asked if we were making progress and if I thought we’d be able to agree to something, and I did indicate to him that we were making progress and that I wanted to get bipartisan support.”

Sununu said that since House and Senate leaders initially worked on a conference report, “there were 18 changes and 15 were the work of our coalition.”

Since the Senate voted down the conference report late last year, “we have since negotiated three improvements,” he announced yesterday.

DOJ_NMG_0014008

One section of the bill allows federal agents to issue, with no judicial approval, National Security Letters, which require an individual or business to produce records if the government believes they are relevant to a national security investigation.

Another part of the bill, section 215, allows a special judge acting under the Federal Intelligence Surveillance Act to be asked by law enforcement authorities to issue a subpoena for virtually anything that may be related to an intelligence investigation.

Both "215" subpoena and National Security Letters are now accompanied by "gag orders" that forbid someone who receives either document from telling anyone except his attorney that he has received it.

If the recipient does tell an attorney, he is required to inform the FBI and provide the bureau with the attorney's name. That requirement was stricken from the bill in the compromise, Sununu said.

"That, to me, is a big issue because it carried the risk that we would discourage people from seeking legal counsel," Sununu said.

A change announced yesterday for the first time allows a judge to overturn the "gag order" on 215 subpoenas if the judge finds no reason to believe disclosure would endanger national security or interfere with a criminal or counter-terrorism investigation.

But if top Justice Department officials certify that disclosure would endanger national security or interfere with diplomatic relations, their decision would be final, unless a judge finds their decision was made in bad faith.

The compromise also clarifies that a library acting in its "traditional role" would not be subject to a National Security Letter. But Sununu said a library could still be subject to a 215 subpoena, which would require a court order.

Sununu wanted to heighten the standard for issuing 215 subpoenas to require the government to show a connection to a specific spy or terrorist.

"We did not get improvement on the 215 standard, but I think it's a good package and a step in the right direction," he said.

A GOP agreement would put Senate Democrats in a politically difficult position of deciding whether to renew their filibuster on an issue of national security — an area where polling shows them trailing Bush and the Republicans, The Associated Press reported.

Sen. Russell Feingold, D-Wis., opposed the agreement outright, while Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., opposed it but stopped short of joining in Feingold's threat to renew a filibuster, the AP reported.

The Associated Press contributed to this report.

Police Blotter: Patriot Act E-mail Spying Approved (CNET)

By Declan McCullagh, CNET News.com

CNET News, February 10, 2006

"Police blotter" is a weekly report on the intersection of technology and the law.

What: The Justice Department asks a judge to approve Patriot Act e-mail monitoring without any evidence of criminal behavior.

When: Decided Feb. 2, 2006 by U.S. District Judge Thomas Hogan in Washington, D.C.

Outcome: E-mail surveillance approved.

What happened: As part of a grand jury investigation that's still secret, the Justice Department asked a federal magistrate judge to approve monitoring of an unnamed person's e-mail correspondents.

The request had a twist: Instead of asking to eavesdrop on the contents of the e-mail messages, which would require some evidence of wrongdoing, prosecutors instead requested the identities of the correspondents. Also included in the request was header information like date and time and Internet address--but not subject lines.

The federal magistrate judge balked and asked the Justice Department to submit an additional brief to demonstrate that such a request would be legal.

Instead, prosecutors asked Judge Hogan to step in. He reviewed the portion of federal law dealing with "pen register" and "trap and trace" devices--terms originating in the world of telephone wiretapping--and concluded it "unambiguously" authorizes the e-mail surveillance request.

Though the language may be clumsy, Hogan said, the Patriot Act's amendments authorize that type of easily obtainable surveillance of e-mail. All that's required, he said, is that prosecutors claim the surveillance could conceivably be "relevant" to an investigation.

Excerpt from the court's opinion:

"In 2001, Congress enacted the Uniting and Strengthening America by Providing Appropriate Tools Required to Intercept and Obstruct Terrorism Act of 2001 (the "USA Patriot Act"), Section 216 of which explicitly amended the authorities relating to pen registers and trap and trace devices...by expanding the definitions of these devices to include "processes" to obtain information about "electronic communication."

"Commenting on the very language that was finally enacted in Section 216 of the USA Patriot Act, several members of Congress highlighted the fact that the amendments would bring the state of the law in line with current technology by making pen registers and trap and trace devices applicable to the Internet and--more to the point--e-mail.

"For example, a section-by-section analysis of the bill that Representative John Conyers included in the record before the final House vote, which contains the same language that was finally enacted by Congress, states that Section 216 "extends the pen/trap provisions so they apply not just to telephone communications but also to Internet traffic."

"In addition, Senator Jon Kyl, who is currently Chairman of the United States Senate Judiciary Subcommittee on Terrorism, Technology & Homeland Security, noted that the same language in the Senate version of the bill "would codify current case law that holds that pen/trap orders apply to modern communication technologies such as e-mail and the Internet, in addition to traditional phone lines."

"The Congressional Research Service also published a legal analysis of the USA Patriot Act that states that the Act "permits pen register and trap and trace orders for electronic communications (e.g., e-mail)."

"The plain language of the statute makes clear that pen registers and trap and trace devices may be processes used to obtain information about e-mail communications. The statute's history confirms this interpretation and there is no support for a contrary result."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Bush Gives New Details Of 2002 Qaeda Plot To Attack Los Angeles (NYT)

By Elisabeth Bumiller And David Johnston

The New York Times, February 10, 2006

WASHINGTON, Feb. 9 — President Bush offered new information on Thursday about what he said was a foiled plot by Al Qaeda in 2002 to fly a hijacked airplane into the tallest building west of the Mississippi, the U.S. Bank Tower in Los Angeles, as he sought to make the case for his record on national security.

Although the administration made public the Los Angeles plot in general terms four months ago, Mr. Bush, in a speech to the National Guard Association, disclosed more specific details, including what he said was the planned use of a "shoe bomb" by hijackers to breach the airplane's cockpit door and take over the controls.

In addition, Mr. Bush and one of his counterterrorism advisers said that four extremists were recruited from Southeast Asia to carry out the plan, that their leader received training in shoe bombs and that all four had traveled to an undisclosed place after the Sept. 11 attacks to meet with Osama bin Laden and pledge their loyalty to Al Qaeda.

Mr. Bush and White House officials gave no reason for releasing details of a plot that they first disclosed last October. But Mr. Bush's speech came at a time when Republicans are intent on establishing their record on national security as the pre-eminent issue in the 2006 midterm elections, and when the president is facing questions from members of both parties about a secret eavesdropping program that he describes as pivotal to the war on terrorism.

In his speech, Mr. Bush said the plot had been "derailed in early 2002, when a Southeast Asian nation arrested a key Al Qaeda operative." He added that "subsequent debriefings and other intelligence operations made clear the intended target and how Al Qaeda hoped to execute it."

Mr. Bush and his counterterrorism adviser, Frances Fragos Townsend, made no claim on Thursday that the eavesdropping program, conducted by the National Security Agency, had helped to foil the 2002 plot. But in a conference call with reporters, Ms. Townsend did not rule out the program as a factor in discovering the plan.

"We use all available sources and methods in the intelligence community, but we have to protect them," Ms. Townsend said. "So I'm not going to talk about what ones we did or didn't use in this particular case."

She added that the Los Angeles plot had grown out of the Sept. 11 attacks. As described in the staff report by the independent commission that investigated the Sept. 11 attacks, Khalid Shaikh Mohammed, who is said to be the mastermind behind them, had originally envisioned an elaborate plan with 10 planes that would attack the East and West Coasts simultaneously on Sept. 11, 2001. But Mr. bin Laden rejected the plan, the report said, because of its difficulty.

"It was bin Laden who decided that it should just focus on the East Coast, and the West Coast should be held in abeyance until there was a follow-on attack," Ms. Townsend told reporters. "It's our understanding now that it was too difficult to get enough operatives for both the East and West Coast plots at the same time."

DOJ_NMG_0014010

Weeks after the Sept. 11 attacks, Ms. Townsend said, Mr. Mohammed turned his attention to the West Coast and to recruits from Southeast Asia affiliated with Jemaah Islamiyah, a Qaeda offshoot with roots in Indonesia.

Working with another terror figure, Riduan Isamuddin, better known as Hambali, Mr. Mohammed recruited a cell leader and three other men in October 2001, Ms. Townsend said. Mr. Mohammed trained the leader of the group in building a shoe bomb, similar to the device recovered from Richard Reid, who had tried to set off a bomb in his shoe on an American Airlines flight from Paris to Miami in December 2001.

Significantly, each of the four men, whom Ms. Townsend would not identify, were found to have traveled to Afghanistan to meet with Mr. bin Laden in the months after the Sept. 11 attacks. Each pledged loyalty to him, she said. Such pledges were a significant gesture in the bin Laden network and usually a prerequisite to carrying out an attack.

Ms. Townsend said that American counterterrorism officials, working with four other regional governments, which she would not identify, arrested the cell leader and three others in February 2002. The plot was effectively extinguished.

Several American counterterrorism officials said Thursday that, at the time the plot was broken up in early 2002, the authorities believed that they had disrupted an active terrorist planning effort, but that they possessed only fragmentary evidence and were unsure whether the threat was significant.

Only later did they conclude that the plot was genuine and potentially serious. The outline of the plot became clear, the officials said, primarily through the interrogations of captured Qaeda figures like Mr. Mohammed, who was apprehended in March 2003, and Hambali, captured in August 2003.

In Los Angeles, the office of Mayor Antonio R. Villaraigosa said that the White House on Wednesday had given them a heads up about the president's disclosure but said that the mayor was not personally informed.

"I would have expected a direct call from the White House," the mayor said at an afternoon news conference.

In his remarks, Mr. Bush referred to the West Coast target as "the Liberty Tower," but White House officials said he had meant to say Library Tower, the name of the U.S. Bank Tower in 2002. The building, completed in 1989, is 1,018 feet tall and was "destroyed" by alien invaders in the 1996 movie "Independence Day."

Bush Signs Deficit Reduction Act (REU)

By Tabassum Zakaria

Reuters, February 10, 2006

WASHINGTON (Reuters) - U.S. President George W. Bush disclosed new details on Thursday of a thwarted al Qaeda plot to use shoe bombs to hijack a plane and fly it into a Los Angeles building, as he sought to justify his tactics in fighting terrorism.

With critics questioning the legality of his authorisation of a domestic spying program, Bush used newly declassified details of a previously revealed plot to show that the threat of terrorism has not abated.

"America remains at risk, so we must remain vigilant," Bush said.

He said that in early 2002 the United States and its allies disrupted a plot to use bombs hidden in shoes to breach the cockpit door of an airplane and fly it into the tallest building in Los Angeles.

But he got the name of the building wrong, saying the "intended target was Liberty Tower." He meant Library Tower, now the US Bank Tower, that at 1,017 feet (310 metres) high is the tallest building in the United States west of the Mississippi River.

The Bush administration last October had cited the plan to attack West Coast targets using hijacked planes as among 10 disrupted al Qaeda plots.

Bush gave a more detailed account on Thursday, saying that in October 2001, Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, the operational mastermind of the September 11 attacks that year, set in motion a plot for another attack inside the United States.

"Rather than use Arab hijackers as he had on September 11, Khalid Sheikh Mohammed sought out young men from Southeast Asia whom he believed would not arouse as much suspicion," he said.

Mohammed worked with a man known as Hambali, the leader of an al Qaeda-affiliated group in Southeast Asia, who recruited a cell of four operatives, the White House said. Mohammed trained the cell leader in the shoe bomb technique and they met al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden in Afghanistan in October 2001, said Frances Townsend, homeland security and counterterrorism adviser to Bush.

The West Coast plot initially was to have been part of the September 11 attack, but bin Laden decided to focus on the East Coast because it was too difficult to get operatives for both, she said.

She said authorities did not know specific details of the planned attack such as its timing or the flight.

"We knew they were going to fly a commercial airliner into the tallest building in California," Townsend said. "And it was an analytic judgement by the intelligence community that that meant the Library Tower."

The plot was disrupted with help from two countries in Southeast Asia and two countries in South Asia, Townsend said.

DOJ_NMG_0014011

Bush has been fighting criticism from Democrats and some Republicans over his decision to authorise the National Security Agency to eavesdrop without court warrants inside the United States on international e-mails and phone calls of people with suspected ties to terrorism.

He has called it a necessary tool for fighting terrorism and preventing another attack on the United States.

Townsend would not comment on whether the eavesdropping program helped in foiling the West Coast plot or capturing the plotters.

The cell leader was arrested in February 2002 and the other three operatives were also caught, but Townsend declined to identify the three or the countries where they were captured.

Mohammed was captured in Pakistan in March 2003, and Hambali was caught in Thailand in August 2003.

Bin Laden and his deputy Ayman al-Zawahri, believed by U.S. officials to be hiding in the border region of Afghanistan and Pakistan, have so far eluded the U.S. manhunt.

Townsend said it was unclear whether the West Coast plot had any connection to "shoebomber" Richard Reid.

Reid failed in an attempt to blow up an American Airlines plane from Paris to Miami in December 2001 after passengers and crew tackled him as he tried to ignite explosives in his shoe. Reid was sentenced to life imprisonment by a U.S. court in January 2003.

"I've never seen anything that indicated whether the second wave was bonafide or not. There's been rumours bandied about that it was, but I don't know," Sen. Dianne Feinstein, a California Democrat on the Senate intelligence committee, said of the hijacked plane plot.

Bush Details 2002 Plot To Attack L.A. Tower (WP)

By Peter Baker And Dan Eggen

The Washington Post, February 10, 2006

Intelligence Officials Play Down Importance of Case, Attribute Remarks to Politics

President Bush, under pressure from Congress, defended his campaign against terrorism yesterday, offering for the first time a vivid account of a foiled al Qaeda plot to strike the United States after Sept. 11, 2001, by crashing a hijacked commercial airliner into a Los Angeles skyscraper.

Bush said four Southeast Asians who met with Osama bin Laden in Afghanistan in October 2001 were taught how to use shoe bombs to blow open a cockpit door and steer a plane into the Library Tower, the tallest building on the West Coast. The four were captured by Asian authorities before they could execute the plan, he said.

Declaring that "America remains at risk," Bush cited the episode as an example of international cooperation against terrorism, and cautioned against complacency. "We cannot let the fact that America hasn't been attacked in four and a half years since September 11, 2001, lull us into the illusion that the threats to our nation have disappeared. They have not."

The reported West Coast plot had been disclosed before but never in as much detail. The president's speech came on the same day as a Senate hearing into the Bush-ordered warrantless surveillance of telephone calls and e-mail by Americans and their contacts overseas, but aides said his comments were not related to the dispute over the program.

White House officials, who were unwilling to publicly disclose details of the alleged plot as recently as last fall, said they decided in the past three weeks to declassify the case so that Bush could have an example to provide the public.

But several U.S. intelligence officials played down the relative importance of the alleged plot and attributed the timing of Bush's speech to politics. The officials, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because they did not want to publicly criticize the White House, said there is deep disagreement within the intelligence community over the seriousness of the Library Tower scheme and whether it was ever much more than talk.

One intelligence official said nothing has changed to precipitate the release of more information on the case. The official attributed the move to the administration's desire to justify its efforts in the face of criticism of the domestic surveillance program, which has no connection to the incident.

Bruce Hoffman, a terrorism specialist who heads the Washington office of Rand Corp., said Bush's account adds some interesting detail to the Library Tower episode. But he said it still leaves key questions about the case unanswered.

"It doesn't really give us any more indication of whether this was a plot that was derailed or preempted, or a plot that was more in the realm of an idle daydream," Hoffman said.

Sen. John D. Rockefeller IV (W.Va.), the ranking Democrat on the Senate intelligence committee, mocked the idea of raising the alleged Library Tower plot. "Maybe they're tired of talking about [the] Brooklyn Bridge and they're trying to find a different edifice of some sort," he said, referring to another alleged terrorist plot that some have said was inflated by the government.

DOJ_NMG_0014012

But Frances Fragos Townsend, the president's chief counterterrorism adviser, told reporters that "there is no question in my mind that this is a disruption. It's not about credit; it's about protecting the American people. And the American people are absolutely safer as a result of these arrests."

Bush first alluded to the incident in a speech in October when he said the United States and its allies had thwarted 10 serious planned al Qaeda attacks since Sept. 11, 2001. A White House list released at the time referred to a plot to fly a hijacked plane into an unspecified West Coast city in 2002. Citing unnamed sources, news organizations reported that the target was the Library Tower, since renamed the U.S. Bank Tower, and that the plot's author was Khalid Sheik Mohammed, the architect of the Sept. 11 attacks who was captured in 2003.

Mohammed's original plan for Sept. 11, as presented to bin Laden in 1998 or 1999, called for hijacking 10 jetliners on both coasts, according to interrogations of Mohammed cited by the commission that investigated the 2001 attacks. U.S. officials concluded that bin Laden had instructed Mohammed to initially focus on the East Coast because it was too difficult to recruit enough operatives to seize 10 planes. After the Twin Towers of the World Trade Center were knocked down, Mohammed set about putting his West Coast plan in motion.

Speaking at the National Guard Memorial Building yesterday, Bush offered a fuller account of what ensued, and the White House later provided a briefing to elaborate. In this account, Mohammed deputized Hambali, head of the affiliated Southeast Asian group Jemaah Islamiya, to set up a West Coast attack, and they put together a four-man cell. Asians were chosen, Bush said, on the theory that they would draw less suspicion.

The four Asians traveled to Afghanistan to meet with bin Laden in October 2001 just as U.S. forces were hunting al Qaeda, officials said. After swearing loyalty to the al Qaeda leader, the four reportedly returned to Asia to train in the use of shoe bombs like those later found on Richard Reid, who was convicted of trying to take down an airliner over the Atlantic in December 2001.

But the cell leader was captured by authorities in a Southeast Asian country in February 2002, and the three others were later detained, as well. The officials said four Asian countries were involved but would not identify them.

Bush mistakenly identified the target as the "Liberty Tower," and aides later corrected him.

"As the West Coast plot shows," Bush said, "in the war on terror, we face a relentless and determined enemy that operates in many nations, so protecting our citizens requires unprecedented cooperation from many nations."

Bush Gives New Details About Old Report Of L.A. Terror Plot (LAT)

By Peter Wallsten And Josh Meyer

The Los Angeles Times, February 10, 2006

WASHINGTON — With pressure mounting on the White House to more fully explain its anti-terrorism strategy, President Bush offered new details Thursday of a reported plot against downtown Los Angeles as evidence of success in foiling attacks.

Federal officials had revealed two years ago that they believed Al Qaeda operatives, in a West Coast follow-up to the Sept. 11 attacks, had planned to hijack an airliner and crash it into what was then called the Library Tower.

But Bush, offering new specifics in a speech designed to boost support for his national security policies, said Thursday that the terrorist operatives planned to use "shoe bombs to breach the cockpit door." He said Sept. 11 mastermind Khalid Shaikh Mohammed had recruited and trained young Asian men to carry out the plot because suspicions of Arabs were running high, but that the plan was derailed when a Southeast Asian nation arrested a key Al Qaeda operative.

Bush did not name the nation or the operative, but his decision to reveal even the most incremental details of the reported plot underscored the effort the White House has undertaken recently to defend its anti-terrorism policies.

The details did little to counter skepticism from Democrats and some law enforcement officials who have questioned whether the reported scheme had ever been put into operation before it was thwarted.

"It didn't go," said one U.S. official familiar with the operational aspects of the war on terrorism. "It didn't happen."

The official said he believed the Library Tower plot was one of many Al Qaeda operations that had not gone much past the conceptual stage. The official spoke on the condition of anonymity, saying that those familiar with the plot feared political retaliation for providing a different characterization of the plan than that of the president.

Bush's chief domestic security advisor, Frances Townsend, said the plotters had described their target only as the tallest building on the West Coast, and that it was the "analytic judgment" of the U.S. intelligence community that they intended to strike the Library Tower.

Bush misspoke when making a similar point: "We believe the intended target was Liberty Tower in Los Angeles," he said. The building was renamed in 2003 and is now known as the U.S. Bank Tower.

Bush first mentioned the Los Angeles plot in a speech in October, when he listed 10 post-Sept. 11 schemes that had been disrupted. At the time, he gave few details.

In his speech Thursday to the National Guard Assn., the president cited the reported plan as evidence of the ongoing danger of terrorism and of the success of his anti-terrorism strategy.

"As the West Coast plot shows, in the war on terror we face a relentless and determined enemy that operates in many nations — so protecting our citizens requires unprecedented cooperation from many nations as well," Bush said. "By working together, we took dangerous terrorists off the streets. By working together, we stopped a catastrophic attack on our homeland."

Bush did not link the foiling of the plot to his controversial program of warrantless wiretaps conducted on certain international communications by the National Security Agency. But his remarks came as ongoing criticism of the spy program from lawmakers, including some Republicans, has appeared to force the administration to reverse course and provide more detailed information about the surveillance to congressional intelligence committees.

Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa said he was stunned that Bush revealed details of the reported terrorist plot without first relaying the information to city officials. Villaraigosa said local authorities had heard some of the new information Wednesday from California domestic security officials, but not the specifics mentioned by Bush in his address, which was carried nationally on cable television.

"I would have expected a direct call from the White House," said Villaraigosa, a Democrat, during a City Hall news conference. "We should have been aware of all the details much before today. We did not know all of the facts."

The mayor sought to reassure residents that Los Angeles was safe. He said the police and fire departments had taken precautions at high-rise buildings, including the one singled out by Bush. Villaraigosa said police had specifically evaluated security and evacuation plans at the U.S. Bank Tower.

"There is no imminent threat to Los Angeles," the mayor said, flanked by police and fire officials.

Critics on Thursday accused Bush of reaching far back into time as part of a public relations ploy to maintain focus on his battle against terrorism, an issue that continued to win him public approval. Bush's chief political strategist, Karl Rove, said last month that Republicans in this year's elections would seek ways to paint Democrats as exhibiting a pre-Sept. 11 mentality, while programs such as the warrantless surveillance showed the president's toughness.

Rep. Brad Sherman (D-Sherman Oaks) described Bush's speech as a political stunt meant to draw attention from the mounting criticisms of the National Security Agency's warrantless wiretapping program and other questions about administration tactics.

"I can't think of a governmental reason to disclose these details at this time to the general public. Clearly, the goal was to create headlines," said Sherman, who monitors security matters as the ranking Democrat on the House subcommittee on international terrorism and nonproliferation.

Sen. John D. Rockefeller IV of West Virginia, the senior Democrat on the Senate Intelligence Committee, said he "didn't find [Bush's comments] very helpful … from a professional point of view."

When news of the reported plot surfaced two years ago, some counter-terrorism officials treated it with skepticism. By contrast, Bush on Thursday cast the foiling of the plot as a significant development that underscored the danger and persistence of Al Qaeda.

Townsend, the White House domestic security advisor, said after Bush's speech that the so-called West Coast plot was initially designed as part of the Sept. 11 attacks.

But she said Osama bin Laden determined that the two-coast plan was too ambitious and scaled it back. Mohammed then began preparations for a "follow-on" attack on the West Coast, Townsend said, reiterating the findings of the Sept. 11 commission.

"It's our understanding now that it was too difficult to get enough operatives for both the East and West Coast plots at the same time," Townsend said.

Townsend said the cell leader of the reported Los Angeles plot and three other operatives went to Afghanistan, where they met with Bin Laden and swore an "oath of loyalty" to him before returning to Asia, where they continued to work for an operative named Hambali, the chief of operations for an Al Qaeda affiliate group in South Asia.

The reported scheme ended in 2002 with four arrests in Southeast Asia, she said. Four U.S. allies in Asia played a role in disrupting the plot, she said, refusing to name the countries.

Mohammed was arrested in Pakistan in March 2003. Hambali was captured in August 2003.

In defending Bush's claim that the plot was foiled, Townsend said: "There is no question in my mind that this is a disruption…. And the American people are absolutely safer as a result of these arrests."

Bush Provides Details Of 2002 Terrorist Plot Aimed At Los Angeles (MERCN)

By Ron Hutcheson

The San Jose Mercury News, February 10, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0014014

WASHINGTON - The plot envisioned a ghastly replay of the attack that brought down the World Trade Center, only this time the terrorists wanted to crash a plane into the tallest building in Los Angeles. The plan unraveled in early 2002 with the arrest of one of the ringleaders, but President Bush provided new details about it Thursday in defending his handling of the war on terrorism.

The timing of his chilling disclosures, four years after the plot was discovered and four months after he first discussed the broad outlines of the scheme, raised suspicion that his remarks were politically motivated. At the very moment that Bush was defending his aggressive approach to terrorism, two of his top advisers were trying to quell a revolt in Congress against his domestic eavesdropping program.

Bowing to bipartisan pressure, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Gen. Michael Hayden, the deputy director of national intelligence, gave a closed-door briefing on the surveillance program to members of the Senate Intelligence Committee. The warrantless surveillance, which the president authorized without congressional or court approval shortly after the attacks on Sept. 11, 2001, targets communications between suspected terrorists overseas and their contacts in the United States.

The session, conducted a day after a similar briefing for members of the House Intelligence Committee, failed to resolve doubts about the program's legality. Committee Democrats and at least one Republican, Sen. Mike DeWine of Ohio, said they wanted more information.

"If they came with the idea that this was going to stop an investigation on the part of the Senate Intelligence Committee, they were wrong," Sen. John "Jay" Rockefeller of West Virginia, the top Democrat on the panel, said after the meeting.

Bush and his advisers said the Los Angeles plot illustrated the need to move swiftly against any suspicious activity.

"It took the combined efforts of several countries to break up this plot," the president told members of the National Guard Association. "By working together, we stopped a catastrophic attack on our homeland."

As described by Bush and Frances Townsend, his top counterterrorism adviser, the plot grew out of early planning for the Sept. 11 attacks, when al-Qaida leaders considered simultaneous assaults on both coasts. They scrapped that idea but quickly began work on an encore attack on the 73-story Library Tower, a gleaming, granite-and-glass edifice now known as the US Bank Tower. (In the 1996 movie "Independence Day," aliens destroy the 1,018-foot-tall building.)

"We now know that in October 2001, Khalid Shaikh Mohammed - the mastermind of the Sept. 11 attacks - had already set in motion a plan to have terrorist operatives hijack an airplane using shoe bombs to breach the cockpit door," Bush said.

According to administration officials, Mohammed, fearing that Arab terrorists would generate suspicion, recruited a four-man terrorist cell through Jemaah Islamiyah, an Islamic terrorist group in Indonesia. The four operatives were sent to Afghanistan, where they pledged their loyalty to al-Qaida chief Osama bin Laden in an oath known as a biat.

Townsend said intelligence officials weren't sure whether the meeting occurred shortly before or sometime after the U.S. invasion of Afghanistan, which sent bin Laden into hiding. Also unclear is how close the plotters were to executing their scheme when the cell leader was arrested in an undisclosed country in February 2002. Townsend refused to discuss whether electronic surveillance played any role.

Townsend said all four cell members were currently in custody, but she declined to identify them, to say where they were arrested or to disclose where they are being held. The plotters didn't include Richard Reid, the would-be shoe bomber who was arrested in December 2001 on a flight from Paris to Miami.

Although Reid had been trained in the same bombing technique that the plotters planned to use, intelligence officials don't know whether Reid had any contact with them, Townsend said.

In a conference call with reporters, Townsend took issue with suggestions that the White House had released new details about the plot to help deal with the controversy over domestic eavesdropping. Bush first mentioned the Los Angeles plot in vague terms in a speech last October as one of the administration's successes in the war on terrorism.

"The problem is you can't share these details when you have operational leads," she said. "It takes time."

Bush Details Terror Plot (CSM)

By Peter Grier

The Christian Science Monitor, February 10, 2006

WASHINGTON - Bush to US: It's still a dangerous world out there, but we're making progress in rounding up the bad guys.

In essence, that may be the message that President Bush and other administration officials are trying to convey this week as they defend White House actions in the war in terror.

Headlines about possibly illegal eavesdropping activity authorized by the president, plus more bombings in Iraq and revelations about the slow pace of Iraqi reconstruction, have put the Bush team on the defensive this week. In revealing details about an alleged Al Qaeda plot to fly an airliner into a Los Angeles skyscraper, plus insisting that terrorists are weakened and on the run, Bush may be attempting to counter bad news.

"The timing of this clearly has to do with politics ... but that doesn't mean the [L.A. plot] isn't true," says Lorenzo Vidino, a terrorism expert at the Fletcher School at Tufts University.

In a speech Thursday at the National Guard Memorial Building in Washington, President Bush said that the US and its allies had thwarted a plot to use shoe bombs to blow open the cockpit door of an airliner, hijack it, and fly it into the tallest building on the US West coast.

Bush called this target the "Liberty Building," but its name in 2001 was the "Library Tower," and it has since been renamed the US Bank Tower.

Khalid Sheik Mohammed, alleged mastermind of the Sept. 11 attacks, was behind the L.A. plot, said Bush. The Al Qaeda operative began planning it in October 2001.

Mr. Mohammed's co-conspirator in this plot was Hambali, also known as Riduan Isamuddin, thought to be the operations chief of Southeast Asia's largest Al Qaeda-related group, Jemaah Islamiyah. Hambali's job was to recruit Asian hijackers, who were likely to attract less attention from law enforcement authorities than Arabs. He recruited four operatives for the cell, whose leader was personally trained by Mohammed in shoebombing, according to a Department of Homeland Security briefing given after the president's speech. The operatives met with Osama bin Laden before going back to Asia.

Bush said that the plan unravelled when a key Southeast Asian nation arrested one of the operatives. He did not say who this operative was, or which nation nabbed him.

"Subsequent debriefings and other intelligence operations made clear the intended target and how Al Qaeda hoped to execute it," said Bush. "This critical intelligence helped other allies capture the ringleaders and other known operatives who'd been recruited for this effort."

Hambali was captured by Indonesian authorities in 2003. Mohammed was captured in Pakistan that same year.

Bush has referred to the Library Tower plot before, but only in vague terms. In an address last October, he said the US and its allies had foiled at least 10 serious Al Qaeda plots, including plans for a Sept. 11-like attack on both coasts.

Thursday's revelations provide a fuller picture and add details, says Mr. Vidino, author of the book "Al Qaeda in Europe."

The plot Bush outlined made sense, considering that Mohammed had long been interested in a second wave of attacks, and had previously cooperated with Southeast Asian Al Qaeda adherents. Two of the Sept. 11 hijackers entered the US on the West Coast, with help from Hambali, says Vidino.

Al Qaeda has also long wanted to attack California, as well as other targets scattered throughout the United States. Khalid Sheik Mohammed "wanted to scare the entire country," says Vidino.

The White House would not say whether the National Security Agency's controversial warrantless eavesdropping program played any role in uncovering the West Coast plot.

Bush's speech came as the chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, Sen. Arlen Specter (R) of Pennsylvania, announced he is writing legislation intended to force the administration to defend the legality of the eavesdropping in court.

Bush Gives Details Of Foiled Plot By Al Qaeda To Attack Los Angeles (WSJ)

By Jay Solomon, John D. McKinnon And David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, February 10, 2006

WASHINGTON -- President Bush, seeking to increase public support for his counterterrorism policies, took the unusual step of detailing what he said was one of his administration's greatest unheralded successes: breaking up a 2002 al Qaeda plot to strike Los Angeles.

The foiled plot, he said, would have sent a hijacked airplane into the tallest building in Los Angeles, the Library Tower.

Mr. Bush's announcement came as both Republican and Democratic lawmakers are seeking better oversight and regulation of intelligence gathering, after concerns were raised about the National Security Agency's domestic-surveillance activities. After weeks of uncertainty, House Republicans are beginning to embrace legislation to update 30-year-old laws on foreign-intelligence eavesdropping, but without challenging the legal underpinnings of Mr. Bush's wiretap program, according to Intelligence Committee Chairman Peter Hoekstra (R., Mich.)

At the same time, the White House agreed to compromises to win the 60 votes required in the Senate to cut off debate on reauthorization of the Patriot Act. "I can't at this point calculate how a filibuster can prevail," said Senate Minority Whip Richard Durbin (D., Ill) who endorsed the changes together with Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D., Cal.) and four Republicans led by Sen. John Sununu (R., N.H.).

In his speech yesterday, President Bush, said the planned attack in Los Angeles involved a four-man Southeast Asian terrorist cell. Acting on the direct order of al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden, the cell was dispatched to use shoe bombs to help hijack a Los Angeles-bound plane. But close cooperation between the U.S. and a number of unnamed overseas partners resulted in their arrests beginning in February 2002, President Bush said.

"As the West Coast plot shows, in the war on terror, we face a relentless and determined enemy," Mr. Bush told a gathering of National Guardsmen in Washington. "It took the combined efforts of several countries to break up this plot."

The president didn't cite the NSA's warrantless wiretap program, but his top aides stressed that sharply criticized counterterrorism techniques, such as domestic surveillance and extensive interrogations of alleged al Qaeda members, are necessary.

Some counterterrorism experts were skeptical, questioning whether the Los Angeles plot was even close to operational in 2002, particularly as U.S. forces were attacking al Qaeda strongholds in Afghanistan. They also said some aspects of the plan to hit the Library Tower were disclosed in a report released by the 9/11 Commission in June 2004.

"I really, really would question the White House's assertion that it thwarted a second 9/11," said Zachary Abuza, an associate professor at Simmons College in Boston who wrote a 2003 book on Jemaah Islamiyah, al Qaeda's Southeast Asia affiliate. "I've never, ever heard that this [plot] was operational."

As for legislation updating the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, House Republicans said they aren't attempting to legitimize the administration's NSA wiretapping program. For the most part, they -- like the White House -- believe the administration has all the legal authority it needs now. Still, they didn't foreclose the possibility that some of the controversial NSA eavesdropping could be done under an updated law.

FISA, the current law, was passed in the 1970s, before the digital revolution that has transformed the telecommunications industry -- and intercept techniques. Bush administration officials complain the FISA process, geared for a different time, is cumbersome.

"There is a legitimate concern that FISA needs to be updated from its current form just because of the changes in technology," Rep. Hoekstra said. "But not as applies to our activities versus al Qaeda."

Last night, House Judiciary Committee Chairman James Sensenbrenner didn't have any comment on the Patriot Act compromises in the Senate, but people close to the Wisconsin Republican said he would be open to the proposals if they prove sufficient to end the almost two-month impasse.

Despite continued grumbling from liberals, that appears all but certain, and Sen. Durbin credited Sen. Sununu with persuading the White House to give some ground. The changes do more to guarantee judicial review of gag rules governing certain subpoenas issued under the Patriot Act to obtain records. In addition, protections are added to shield traditional libraries from surveillance.

It remains a tangled process to enact these provisions alongside the underlying bill, but a test vote in the Senate could come as early as next week.

Write to Jay Solomon at jay.solomon@wsj.com2, John D. McKinnon at john.mckinnon@wsj.com3 and David Rogers at david.rogers@wsj.com4

Bush Details Foiled Terror Plot Targeting L.A. (CHIT)

By Mark Silva

Chicago Tribune, February 10, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Facing challenges to his domestic surveillance program and difficult negotiations over renewal of the Patriot Act, President Bush on Thursday emphasized new details of a previously foiled plot to strike a high-rise in Los Angeles as he defended aggressive tactics to combat terrorism.

In revealing facts about the aborted 2002 plan to slam a hijacked airliner into the tallest building in Los Angeles—in a West Coast sequel to Sept. 11—the White House seemed to underscore both successes in the war on terror and the threat that terrorists still pose.

"We are not yet safe," said Bush, flanked by paintings of colonial-era Minutemen in a speech delivered in a flag-lined hall of the National Guard Memorial Building in Washington.

This is not the first time Bush has cited the West Coast plot. He mentioned it among several other instances of averted attacks when he sought in October to confront growing opposition to the war in Iraq, a point at which his own job-approval ratings were nearing their nadir.

This time the White House released details about four unnamed Asian terrorists recruited by the Al Qaeda mastermind of the Sept. 11 attacks to commandeer an airliner with shoe bombs and attack the U.S. Bank Tower in Los Angeles.

The White House disclosure came at the height of congressional negotiations over renewal of the controversial USA Patriot Act. Republican and Democratic leaders announced Thursday that they have agreed to an extension..

The White House declined to say whether the National Security Agency surveillance that Bush repeatedly has authorized without court orders since Sept. 11 played any role in uncovering the West Coast plot or arresting the leader of the Asian cell in 2002 and thus thwarting it.

But invoking that plot followed a pattern for the president, who has often talked about the possibility of more terror attacks, a message echoed by other administration officials.

Karl Rove, the president's chief political adviser, has told top Republicans that the party's fortunes this year rest on assuring Americans that Republicans are tough on terrorism.

And some Democrats have accused the administration of exploiting fear.

"Two weeks ago, Karl Rove ... was telling the National Republican Committee, 'Here's your game plan, folks, here's how you're going to win—we're going to win by getting everybody scared again,'" Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), told the United Auto Workers this week. "This crowd [says], 'All we've got is fear and we are going to keep playing the fear card.'"

The administration is under growing congressional pressure to more fully explain its rationale for the eavesdropping program.

"If they came with the idea that this is going to stop an investigation on the part of the Senate Intelligence Committee, they were wrong," said Sen. Jay Rockefeller (D-W.Va.), vice chairman of the committee, emerging from a briefing on surveillance Thursday.

The president, and later his homeland security adviser Fran Townsend, offered a more complete narrative of the planned attack on Los Angeles:

Al Qaeda wanted to carry out simultaneous attacks on the East and West Coasts of the U.S. Osama bin Laden, the Al Qaeda leader who has evaded capture to this day, decided to delay the West Coast assault for "a follow-up attack." Khalid Sheik Mohammed, mastermind of the attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon, started planning the Los Angeles attack in October 2001 with Riduan Isamuddin, known as Hambali, chief of a related terrorist group, Jemaah Islamiyah.

To avoid arousing suspicion after the Sept. 11 hijackings carried out by Arab terrorists, Hambali recruited four terrorists from Southeast Asia. Mohammed trained the leader of a four-man cell in the use of shoe bombs for a plot to breach the pilot's door of an airliner.

The four terrorists traveled to Afghanistan in October 2001 to meet with bin Laden. But, with the help of intelligence services in four unnamed South Asian nations, the cell leader was arrested in February 2002, foiling the plot. The other three were also caught. In addition, Mohammed was captured in March 2003, and Hambali was arrested in August 2003.

Asked why Bush is offering more details of a four-year-old event now, Townsend said, "The president is always looking for opportunities to share with the American people the details and the texture of the ongoing war on terror."

Plot To Hit Los Angeles Tower Foiled, Bush Says (WT)

By Bill Sammon

The Washington Times, February 10, 2006

President Bush yesterday revealed newly declassified details of a foiled plot to ram a hijacked airplane into a Los Angeles skyscraper in 2002.

Mr. Bush did not say whether the al Qaeda plan was thwarted with the help of telephone intercepts, which have come under fierce fire by Democrats and which he repeatedly has rebutted in recent days while seeking to shore up support for the war on terrorism.

But Fran Townsend, his homeland security adviser, said later that the U.S. used "all instruments of national power" to foil the plot. Although the president alluded to the episode in October, he did not give a detailed description until yesterday.

"We now know that in October 2001, Khalid Sheikh Muhammad -- the mastermind of the September 11 attacks -- had already set in motion a plan to have terrorist operatives hijack an airplane using shoe bombs to breach the cockpit door, and fly the plane into the tallest building on the West Coast," Mr. Bush said in a speech at the National Guard Building.

He was referring to the Library Tower -- since renamed the U.S. Bank Tower -- a revelation that angered Los Angeles Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa.

"I'm amazed that the president would make this [announcement] on national TV and not inform us of these details through the appropriate channels," the Democrat told the AP. "I don't expect a call from the president -- but somebody."

White House Press Secretary Scott McClellan said the administration was not trying to blindside local authorities.

"My understanding was that we did reach out to officials in California and Los Angeles to let them know -- I think it was yesterday -- that the president would be talking about this," he said. "And the word I heard was there is great appreciation for the notification that we provided."

Other Democrats questioned the timing of yesterday's disclosure about the Los Angeles plot, saying the president was trying to shift attention away from his domestic surveillance program.

Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales and Gen. Michael Hayden, principal deputy director of national intelligence, gave theSenate Select Committee on Intelligence a closed-door briefing on the program yesterday.

White House officials said terrorists initially planned to attack Los Angeles as part of the September 11 offensive, but al Qaeda could not recruit enough terrorists. So, they decided to stage a separate attack while the U.S. still was reeling from the events of September 11.

"Rather than use Arab hijackers as he had on September the 11th, Khalid Sheikh Muhammad sought out young men from Southeast Asia -- whom he believed would not arouse as much suspicion," Mr. Bush said. "To help carry out this plan, he tapped a terrorist named Hambali, one of the leaders of an al Qaeda affiliated group in Southeast Asia called J.I."

Hambali, the reputed operations chief of Indonesia-based Jemaah Islamiyah (JI), trained three other terrorists in Asia before taking them to Afghanistan, where they swore loyalty to al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden. The four-person "cell" then returned to Asia for additional training.

"Their plot was derailed in early 2002, when a Southeast Asian nation arrested a key al Qaeda operative," said Mr. Bush, who did not identify the nation. "Subsequent debriefings and other intelligence operations made clear the intended target and how al Qaeda hoped to execute it.

"This critical intelligence helped other allies capture the ringleaders and other known operatives who had been recruited for this plot," he said. "The West Coast plot had been thwarted."

Mrs. Townsend said "the cell leader was arrested in February of 2002." Authorities arrested Muhammad in March 2003 and Hambali in August 2003.

Neither Mrs. Townsend nor Mr. McClellan would name the arresting Asian country.

Bush Details Purported Plot To Hit L.A. President: Southeast Asian Men Were To Fly Jet Into City's Tallest Building (USAT)

By David Jackson And Richard Benedetto

USA Today, February 10, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush gave new details Thursday of how the government foiled purported plans by al-Qaeda to attack the tallest building on the West Coast in 2002.

The scheme involved specially recruited Southeast Asian hijackers who planned to fly an airliner into the 73-story Library Tower in Los Angeles, Bush said in a speech to the National Guard Association.

“Since Sept. 11, the United States and our coalition partners have disrupted a number of serious al-Qaeda terrorist plots, including plots to attack targets inside the United States,” Bush said.

Frances Townsend, counterterrorism adviser to the president, declined to say whether the investigation involved the National Security Agency surveillance program that has drawn criticism for using wiretaps without court order.

Townsend said Bush discussed the investigation to remind Americans the threat is still there and highlight the level of international cooperation needed to fight terrorism.

“The terrorists are weakened and fractured, yet they're still lethal,” Bush said. “We cannot let the fact that America hasn't been attacked in 4½ years … lull us into the illusion that the threats to our nation have disappeared. They have not.”

Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., said after the speech that Bush still has failed to lay out a comprehensive counterterrorism plan. He cited the Sept. 11 Commission's poor ratings of the administration's homeland security plans.

“This White House has committed a series of national security mistakes that have made America less secure,” Reid said.

Bush said Khalid Shaikh Mohammed, the alleged mastermind of the Sept. 11 attacks captured in 2003, planned to have operatives use shoe bombs to enter the cockpit and hijack a commercial airliner that would be flown into the California building.

Rather than use Arab hijackers as in the 2001 attacks, the plan was to use Southeast Asian men because they “would not arouse as much suspicion,” Bush said.

Bush mentioned the alleged plot last October when he listed 10 planned terrorist attacks that had been thwarted. He did not provide details of those plots, although news organizations later described an attempt on the Library Tower, perhaps best known as one of the targets in the 1996 alien invasion movie Independence Day. Also known as the U.S. Bank Tower, the Library Tower is North America's tallest building west of Chicago.

Townsend would not disclose how many suspects were arrested, which countries they were from, where they are today or which nations helped foil the plot.

Bush's revelation triggered a blast from Los Angeles Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa, who said he was surprised by Bush's announcement because the White House had not fully informed him in advance. White House spokesman Scott McClellan said, “My understanding was that we did reach out to officials in California and Los Angeles to let them know, I think it was yesterday.”

Bush: U.S. Surveillance Helped Stop Attack (AP-Y2)

By Deb Riechmann

DOJ_NMG_0014019

AP2, February 10, 2006

Under fire for eavesdropping on Americans, President Bush said Thursday that spy work stretching from the U.S. to Asia helped thwart terrorists plotting to use shoe bombs to hijack an airliner and crash it into the tallest skyscraper on the West Coast.

"It took the combined efforts of several countries to break up this plot," Bush said. "By working together we stopped a catastrophic attack on our homeland."

Some information about the foiled attack was disclosed last year, but Bush offered more details to highlight international cooperation in fighting terrorists. He did not say whether information about the West Coast plot was collected by his administration's program to monitor — without court warrants — some calls to the U.S. from terror suspects overseas.

The White House said that issue was not the point of the speech, but the president and his advisers have been vigorously defending the legality of the program, which has been questioned by both Democratic and Republican lawmakers.

After weeks of insisting that divulging details of the monitoring program would hinder intelligence gathering, the White House relented Wednesday and began briefing some additional lawmakers.

Meanwhile, the president's monthlong campaign to convince Americans the government's eavesdropping program is essential to the war on terrorism appears to be making an impact.

In a new AP-Ipsos poll, 48 percent now support wiretapping without a warrant in cases of suspected communications with terrorists, up from 42 percent last month. Half say the administration should have to get a warrant, down from 56 percent. Men in particular have come around to Bush's view over the last month, the poll suggested.

On Capitol Hill Thursday, four Senate Republican holdouts reached agreement with the White House on minor changes in the Patriot Act, hoping to clear the way for renewal of anti-terror legislation that Bush says is essential in the fight against terrorists.

In his speech, at the National Guard Memorial Building, Bush said Khalid Shaikh Mohammed, the reputed mastermind of the Sept. 11 attacks, began planning the West Coast operation in October 2001. One of Mohammed's key planners was a man known as Hambali, the alleged operations chief of the terrorist group Jemaah Islamiyah, which is affiliated with al-Qaida.

"Rather than use Arab hijackers as he had on Sept. 11, Khalid Sheik Mohammed sought out young men from Southeast Asia — whom he believed would not arouse as much suspicion," Bush said.

In Los Angeles, Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa complained he first learned of Bush's remarks while watching TV.

"I'm amazed that the president would make this on national TV and not inform us of these details through the appropriate channels," said the mayor, a Democrat.

Bush press secretary Scott McClellan said that the White House did reach out before the speech to officials in California and that there was appreciation for the notification.

As the plot was described, the hijackers were to use shoe bombs to blow open the cockpit door of a commercial jetliner, take control of the plane and crash it into the Library Tower in Los Angeles, a 73-story building since renamed the US Bank Tower. In his remarks, Bush inadvertently referred to the site as "Liberty Tower."

The president said the plot was derailed when a Southeast Asian nation arrested a key al-Qaida operative. Bush did not name the country or the operative.

Frances Fragos Townsend, assistant to the president for homeland security and counterterrorism, said Mohammed, working with Hambali in Asia, recruited four members of the terrorist cell and trained its leader in how to use shoe bombs.

Townsend said it was not clear whether there was any connection between the West Coast plot and shoe bomber Richard Reid, who tried to blow up a trans-Atlantic flight in December 2001. After that, the Transportation Security Administration began asking passengers to take off their shoes for inspection.

The Sept. 11 attacks originally were planned to include both the East and West coasts. "It was bin Laden who decided that it should just focus on the East Coast, and that the West Coast should be held in abeyance ... as a follow-on attack," Townsend said. "It's our understanding now that it was too difficult to get enough operatives for both the East and West Coast plots at the same time."

She said all four of the West Coast planners went to Afghanistan in October 2001 and met with Osama bin Laden.

Townsend said all four members of the cell have been apprehended. She declined to disclose their names or say where they were being held. She also would not identify the two South Asia and two Southeast Asian nations that helped foil the attack.

Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., said Bush's speech failed to lay out a comprehensive strategy to fight terrorists.

"As is too often the case with this president, the rhetoric does not match the reality," Reid said. "The fact is this White House has committed a series of national security mistakes that have made America less secure."

A Distinctive Shape, And An Inviting Target (NYT)

By John M. Broder

The New York Times, February 10, 2006

LOS ANGELES, Feb. 9 — The U.S. Bank Tower here, the city's tallest building, has long been presumed to be an inviting target for terrorists. Rising 1,018 feet from Bunker Hill in downtown Los Angeles, the gleaming I. M. Pei-designed building is the most distinctive shape in the skyline and the tallest office building west of Chicago.

President Bush said on Thursday that the 72-story building, known as the Library Tower until U.S. Bancorp acquired naming rights in 2003, was to have been the target of a follow-up attack by Al Qaeda after the terrorist strikes of Sept. 11, 2001.

Officials have discussed the alleged plot numerous times in recent years as an example of terrorist actions that might have been foiled by government vigilance, but Mr. Bush offered new details.

Mayor Antonio R. Villaraigosa complained at a news conference on Thursday that he had not been called directly by the White House, learning of the new information on the alleged plot only from state officials and staff members.

The White House press secretary, Scott McClellan, said federal officials had passed along the new information to the authorities in Los Angeles and Sacramento, telling them that Mr. Bush would discuss it on Thursday.

Mayor Villaraigosa, a Democrat, said that he had twice written to the White House to request a meeting with the president to discuss security threats to Los Angeles, but that he had received no response.

"I'm mayor of the second largest city in the country," Mr. Villaraigosa said. "I have tried to meet with the president at the White House on a number of occasions every time that I've gone to Washington, D.C., to discuss specifically this issue of homeland security, and to no avail. Let's be clear about that."

He also said that the president's antiterrorism budget had shortchanged a number of potential targets, including Los Angeles.

"Given the known terrorist plots against our city, I firmly believe that Los Angeles deserves a greater share of that funding," the mayor said.

Mr. Bush mistakenly referred to the building in his remarks Thursday as Liberty Tower; the White House later corrected the error.

Chief William J. Bratton of the Los Angeles Police Department said in an interview that he had been aware of threats to the skyscraper since he took over as chief in 2002. He said he had devoted significant counterterrorism resources to the building and to Los Angeles International Airport, another potential target, because Al Qaeda is known to carefully research its targets and to try to strike more than once, as it did at the World Trade Center.

He said he was working with federal and local law enforcement officials on a program, Operation Archangel, to identify critical sites around the country that might be targets for terrorist attack and to design methods to defend them.

Mr. Bratton was in Washington on Thursday with other big-city police chiefs for a brief White House meeting with Mr. Bush that he characterized as "mostly a photo op."

The bank tower opened in 1989 and has nearly 1.4 million square feet of rentable space. It was designed to withstand an 8.3 magnitude earthquake, but not an alien invasion. It was the first building destroyed by space invaders in the 1996 film "Independence Day."

Counterintelligence Posts Vacant (WT)

By Bill Gertz

The Washington Times, February 10, 2006

The top ranks of government counterintelligence agencies are empty due to resignations and retirements amid a dispute over the role of counterspying, U.S. intelligence officials say.

The most senior U.S. government counterintelligence official -- presidential appointee Michelle Van Cleave -- resigned last month after the office of the National Counterintelligence Executive (NCIX), which she headed, was made part of the new Office of the Director of National Intelligence (DNI).

At the FBI, CIA and Pentagon, senior counterintelligence positions are held by acting officials. At the White House, the National Security Council (NSC) counterintelligence staff position has been downgraded. In the past, it was held by an FBI counterspy. Heidi Avery, the current NSC counterintelligence director, is not an FBI agent.

Intelligence officials said the failure to fill the top posts is a sign of bias against counterspying by senior intelligence officials under DNI John Negroponte and at other agencies.

It goes against the recommendations of a presidential commission that called improving efforts to counter foreign spying an urgent priority.

DOJ_NMG_0014021

The Commission on the Intelligence Capabilities of the United States Regarding Weapons of Mass Destruction stated last year that "while our enemies are executing what amounts to a global intelligence war against the United States, we have failed to meet the challenge."

It said counterspying efforts "have remained fractured, myopic, and only marginally effective."

Former FBI Counterintelligence Chief Dave Szady, who left Jan. 27 for a private-sector job, said in a recent interview that the threat from foreign spies "is worse now than it was in the Cold War." An FBI official said FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III has identified spying by China as the most serious foreign intelligence threat.

Mr. Szady has not been replaced. The acting counterspy chief is Tim Bereznay, a veteran special agent.

"At a time of maximum need for counterintelligence, the administration has put out good words, but is showing by deed that counterintelligence is not a priority," said a senior U.S. intelligence official.

The official said those within the intelligence bureaucracy have "resisted counterintelligence reform for a decade."

"The DNI is confident that counterintelligence operations are being very effectively conducted across the intelligence community," DNI spokesman Carl Kropf said. He added that the selection process is active and that "we anticipate that these vacancies will be filled expeditiously."

Miss Van Cleave left as NCIX director last month. She was instrumental in setting a new national counterintelligence strategy approved by President Bush that called for conducting offensive counterintelligence activities and using counterintelligence techniques to go after terrorists.

The leading candidate to replace Miss Van Cleave is Paul J. Redmond, a former CIA counterintelligence chief who helped uncover CIA turncoat Aldrich Ames, a KGB mole in the agency.

Intelligence officials said one problem with beefing up counterintelligence is that senior officials within Mr. Negroponte's office are opposed to giving counterintelligence more clout and independence.

In particular, the current DNI mission manager for collection, Mary Margaret Graham, who left as head of counterintelligence at the CIA last year, regards counterintelligence as a support function.

Counterintelligence "needs to remain a strategic mission rather than a support activity," a second intelligence official said. "We have to stay ahead of foreign intelligence services that are out there going after our secrets."

Counterspies must comprehend and take action against foreign spies who are attacking the government to steal secrets, not simply how they interfere with U.S. spying efforts.

At the Pentagon, Carol A. Haave, deputy undersecretary of defense for counterintelligence and security, left in November, and no replacement has been named, although an acting official is in place.

A CIA spokesman declined to say whether the National Counterintelligence Center director is acting or permanent.

When reached by telephone in California, Miss Van Cleave said she left her NCIX job because she had accomplished many initial reforms.

"I am confident that the contributions that the NCIX team has made will be a solid foundation for Director of National Intelligence to carry forward," she said.

TSA Criticized For Delay In New Passenger-screening Program Secure Flight Is 'at Risk Of Failure,' Investigators Say (USAT)

By Thomas Frank

USA Today, February 10, 2006

The government's long-delayed kickoff of a program to improve background checks of airline passengers is "at risk of failure" and faces an uncertain future, congressional investigators said Thursday.

A report by the Government Accountability Office (GAO), Congress' investigative arm, criticized post-9/11 efforts to implement the computerized program, which aims to check domestic airline passengers' names against terrorist watch lists and other databases.

Transportation Security Administration chief Kip Hawley told a Capitol Hill hearing that his agency is doing its own internal review of the program, called Secure Flight.

He said he didn't want to rush development of the TSA program.

"This is the time to ensure that Secure Flight's security, operational and privacy foundation is solid," Hawley told the Senate Commerce Committee.

"My priority is that we do it right, not just that we do it quickly," he said.

Senators expressed frustration that the TSA has spent nearly three years and $144 million trying to improve on the current system, which has been criticized for mistakenly singling out innocent travelers as suspected terrorists.

DOJ_NMG_0014022

The agency is seeking an additional $40 million next year for Secure Flight.

"Do something," Sen. Trent Lott, R-Miss., told Hawley. "Quit fumbling around with it."

A law enacted in December 2004 requires the TSA to take over background checks currently done by airlines.

The TSA would check passengers' names against comprehensive terrorist databases instead of the incomplete, declassified watch lists given to airlines.

Travelers making plane reservations would be asked for their full names and birth dates to help verify identities.

The agency had hoped to start Secure Flight last April.

The new GAO report says the TSA "has not yet produced an updated schedule" of when Secure Flight will begin.

The report criticized TSA for not following its own plans to develop Secure Flight. That resulted in "ad hoc" and "out of sequence" planning that's left it unclear when the program will begin, how much it will cost and how it will help security, the GAO says.

"Without clarification," the report says, "the program is at risk of failure."

Investigators also warned that the TSA hasn't taken adequate steps to protect "sensitive information" being gathered for Secure Flight from hackers.

Previous audits have criticized the TSA for mishandling passenger data.

A probe in 2004 found that the TSA improperly stored 100 million commercial data records containing personal information on passengers after the agency said no data storage would occur.

Hawley, the TSA chief, said Secure Flight would "be built from a strong privacy foundation as a starting point as opposed to building it and then adding privacy."

He called the GAO report "fair criticism" and said his agency's own internal review found many similar problems, which were being corrected.

Passenger Check May Be Vulnerable (NYT)

By The New York Times

The New York Times, February 10, 2006

WASHINGTON, Feb. 9 — The newest version of the Transportation Security Administration's proposed system to check the names of airline passengers against terrorist watch lists could be vulnerable to hackers, the agency said on Thursday.

The agency's chief, Kip Hawley, told a Senate committee that the long-delayed program, now called Secure Flight, will be delayed again.

The program is supposed to take over from the airlines the job of checking passenger names against a "watch list." The idea is to reduce the number of cases in which people with names similar to those on the watch list are prevented from boarding planes, but civil libertarians say it would violate passengers' privacy.

The agency has been working on the program for about four years and has spent at least $140 million.

At a hearing Thursday before the Senate Commerce Committee, Cathleen A. Berrick, an auditor with the Government Accountability Office, said in testimony that Secure Flight "may not be adequately protected against unauthorized access and use or disruption."

Mr. Hawley said his agency's technology office had identified many of the same problems.

Even before the hearing, there was no target date for turning the system on.

In Unusual Request, TSA Seeks $10 Million To Address High Turnover (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, February 10, 2006

The Transportation Security Administration has been hit by troubling turnover in its screener workforce. One in five full-time security screeners has been leaving the agency, according to the administration's new budget. Half of the part-time screeners have also departed.

TSA is seeking $10 million in fiscal 2007 to address what the budget calls "a high rate of attrition." The money would be used to offer extra pay, bonuses, retention allowances, college credit reimbursements and other incentives, the budget request said.

The turnover, TSA said, has driven up recruitment and training costs as the agency constantly replaces screeners who quit.

Requests for extra money to deal with staff turnover are unusual, but agencies often try to solve the problem with the help of their Cabinet secretary or the Office of Personnel Management before going to Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0014023

TSA, to some extent, is not a typical federal agency. It hired more than 50,000 employees in 2002, when Congress moved to strengthen aviation safety after terrorists hijacked jetliners and slammed them into the Pentagon and World Trade Center. Concerned about the agency's size, Congress moved a year later to cut the TSA workforce.

As TSA coped with budget and management startup pains, many passenger screeners complained that managers did not listen to their suggestions, did not provide adequate training and sometimes put them at risk of injury in handling heavy luggage.

TSA's budget also asks Congress to provide $20 million to fund workers compensation payments owed to the Labor Department.

Darrin Kayser , a TSA spokesman, said the agency is working to reduce injuries. A new case management initiative has reduced the number of lost workdays from 45 per injury to 11 per injury, he said.

TSA also is trying to provide opportunities for screeners to move up in the agency or elsewhere in government, Kayser said. They have been reclassified as law enforcement officers (transportation security officer) and positions are being set aside for entry into the federal air marshal program, he said.

The agency has established an advisory council so that security screeners can provide feedback to senior TSA leaders and help develop ways of improving morale, Kayser said.

"We did have a lot of challenges, and do appreciate the patience of the workforce," he said. "We are working very hard to address issues that still exist."Postal Point Person?

The White House point person on legislation to overhaul the U.S. Postal Service, Claude A. Allen , head of the domestic policy council, resigned Wednesday, leaving the Bush administration to look for a presidential adviser to help broker a compromise bill.

On a voice vote yesterday, the Senate approved a bill sponsored by Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine) and Thomas R. Carper (D-Del.). The House last summer passed similar legislation, backed by Reps. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.) and John M. McHugh (R-N.Y.). The Senate and House will create a joint panel to iron out differences in the two versions.

The Postal Service board of governors opposes the overhaul, saying the bills would impose "numerous burdensome provisions." The White House opposes any bill that would increase the federal deficit.

Postal lobbyists said leading contenders to replace Allen on postal issues were Roger Kodat , a deputy assistant treasury secretary; Dan Blair , deputy director at OPM, and Jess Sharp , a White House domestic policy official.

The White House said Allen had put in long hours over five years in the administration and wanted to spend more time with his family. "We will be working to name a replacement for Claude as soon as possible," said Erin Healy , a White House spokeswoman.

In a statement yesterday, Sen. Daniel K. Akaka (D-Hawaii) said the House and Senate bills would "protect postal employees' right to collective bargaining and employee benefits."Talk Shows

James Bamford , author of two books on the National Security Agency, will be the guest on "FEDtalk" at 11 a.m. today on http://federalnewsradio.com and WFED (1050 AM).

Dave Combs , chief information officer at the Agriculture Department, will be the guest on "The IBM Business of Government Hour" at 9 a.m. Saturday on WJFK radio (106.7 FM).

Sensor On Hill First Suggested VX Nerve Agent (WP)

By Mary Beth Sheridan

The Washington Post, February 10, 2006

The evacuation at the Russell Senate Office Building on Wednesday night marked the biggest nerve-agent scare yet at the Capitol complex, with officials initially fearing that a deadly chemical substance might have been released in the building, authorities said yesterday.

Terrance W. Gainer, chief of the U.S. Capitol Police, said the initial reading from a sensor in the building "bore a striking resemblance to a nerve agent." Further tests, however, were negative. The alarm prompted the evacuation of about 200 people, including at least eight senators, to an underground garage, where they were held for about three hours.

Exposure to an amount of nerve agent as small as a drop can cause death within minutes or hours. Gainer declined to identify the agent that appeared to be indicated by the sensor. But the FBI and other agencies that assisted in the emergency response said they were told it was the VX nerve agent.

Officials still were trying to determine yesterday what prompted the alarm. One possibility, Gainer said, was treated lumber that had been brought into the building recently. It could have contained harmless amounts of chemicals that activated the sensors.

"The experts will be doing a lot more analysis of what the heck it is," Gainer said.

DOJ_NMG_0014024

Legislators who were evacuated to the nearby Senate parking garage applauded Capitol Police officers for their handling of the alarm, saying they were calm and provided frequent information.

"The police were very, very professional," said Sen. Judd Gregg (R-N.H.). "And you've got to admire them. They go into these buildings, and they don't know what's in there."

Gainer said his force was "100 percent more prepared" than it had been for the crisis brought on by the anthrax mailings to the Capitol in 2001, which killed two postal employees in Washington. Still, he said, his officers were studying Wednesday night's incident to see how they could improve. Among the glitches: Five people, including journalists and staff members, were discovered in the building well after police thought it was cleared, Gainer said.

"I'm trying to ascertain whether we failed to get the message to them, or they failed to heed our message," he said.

The five included two members of an ABC News camera crew, said Emily Lenzner, a spokeswoman for the organization. She said they had been storing equipment in the attic.

"These guys didn't hear a thing," she said.

Sensors placed throughout the Capitol complex occasionally have produced false alarms. Experts working with Capitol Police check the chemical "signatures" picked up by the sensors and often find that they match those of such familiar products as cleaning sprays or paint thinner.

What caused the concerns Wednesday night, Gainer said, was that the chemical signature looked very much like that of a nerve agent. "This was a unique one to us," he said.

Shortly after 6:30 p.m., alarms mounted in Senate offices started beeping loudly, as Capitol Police officers announced the evacuation. E-mails issuing the order were sent to staffers' hand-held communicators.

Senators and staffers described the evacuation as orderly.

"There was no running for the door or anything like that," said Coy Knobel, press secretary to Sen. Mike Enzi (R-Wyo.), both of whom were in the building.

Knobel said the alarms in the hallway outside his office did not appear to be working. However, Gainer said he knew of only one hallway where the public-address message was garbled. "Even if they didn't pick up the electronics, our officers went through the old-fashioned way" to ensure that everyone left the building, he said.

Capitol Police officers decided to take the building's occupants to the Senate garage across Delaware Avenue NE in order to isolate them, Gainer said. But it was quickly obvious that no one in the crowd was showing symptoms of significant nerve-agent exposure, which include vomiting, involuntary defecation, paralysis of the respiratory muscles, unconsciousness and seizures.

Still, Capitol Police officers called in assistance from the D.C. fire department, which set up red, yellow and blue decontamination tents outside the Russell building in case they were needed.

White House Knew Of Levee's Failure On Night Of Storm (NYT)

By Eric Lipton

The New York Times, February 10, 2006

WASHINGTON, Feb. 9 — In the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina, Bush administration officials said they had been caught by surprise when they were told on Tuesday, Aug. 30, that a levee had broken, allowing floodwaters to engulf New Orleans.

But Congressional investigators have now learned that an eyewitness account of the flooding from a federal emergency official reached the Homeland Security Department's headquarters starting at 9:27 p.m. the day before, and the White House itself at midnight.

The Federal Emergency Management Agency official, Marty Bahamonde, first heard of a major levee breach Monday morning. By late Monday afternoon, Mr. Bahamonde had hitched a ride on a Coast Guard helicopter over the breach at the 17th Street Canal to confirm the extensive flooding. He then telephoned his report to FEMA headquarters in Washington, which notified the Homeland Security Department.

"FYI from FEMA," said an e-mail message from the agency's public affairs staff describing the helicopter flight, sent Monday night at 9:27 to the chief of staff of Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff and recently unearthed by investigators. Conditions, the message said, "are far more serious than media reports are currently reflecting. Finding extensive flooding and more stranded people than they had thought — also a number of fires."

Michael D. Brown, who was the director of FEMA until he resigned under pressure on Sept. 12, said in a telephone interview Thursday that he personally notified the White House of this news that night, though he declined to identify the official he spoke to.

DOJ_NMG_0014025

White House officials have confirmed to Congressional investigators that the report of the levee break arrived there at midnight, and Trent Duffy, the White House spokesman, acknowledged as much in an interview this week, though he said it was surrounded with conflicting reports.

But the alert did not seem to register. Even the next morning, President Bush, on vacation in Texas, was feeling relieved that New Orleans had "dodged the bullet," he later recalled. Mr. Chertoff, similarly confident, flew Tuesday to Atlanta for a briefing on avian flu. With power out from the high winds and movement limited, even news reporters in New Orleans remained unaware of the full extent of the levee breaches until Tuesday.

The federal government let out a sigh of relief when in fact it should have been sounding an "all hands on deck" alarm, the investigators have found.

This chain of events, along with dozens of other critical flashpoints in the Hurricane Katrina saga, has for the first time been laid out in detail following five months of work by two Congressional committees that have assembled nearly 800,000 pages of documents, testimony and interviews from more than 250 witnesses. Investigators now have the documentation to pinpoint some of the fundamental errors and oversights that combined to produce what is universally agreed to be a flawed government response to the worst natural disaster in modern American history.

On Friday, Mr. Brown, the former FEMA director, is scheduled to testify before the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee. He is expected to confirm that he notified the White House on that Monday, the day the hurricane hit, that the levee had given way, the city was flooding and his crews were overwhelmed.

"There is no question in my mind that at the highest levels of the White House they understood how grave the situation was," Mr. Brown said in the interview.

The problem, he said, was the handicapping of FEMA when it was turned into a division of the Homeland Security Department in 2003.

"The real story is with this new structure," he said. "Why weren't more things done, or what prevented or delayed Mike Brown from being able to do what he would have done and did do in any other disaster?"

Although Mr. Bahamonde said in October that he had notified Mr. Brown that Monday, it was not known until recently what Mr. Brown or the Homeland Security Department did with that information, or when the White House was told.

Missteps at All Levels

It has been known since the earliest days of the storm that all levels of government — from the White House to the Department of Homeland Security to the Louisiana Capitol to New Orleans City Hall — were unprepared, uncommunicative and phlegmatic in protecting Gulf Coast residents from the floodwaters and their aftermath. But an examination of the latest evidence by The New York Times shines a new light on the key players involved in the important turning points: what they said, what they did and what they did not do, all of which will soon be written up in the committees' investigative reports.

Among the findings that emerge in the mass of documents and testimony were these:

¶Federal officials knew long before the storm showed up on the radar that 100,000 people in New Orleans had no way to escape a major hurricane on their own and that the city had finished only 10 percent of a plan for how to evacuate its largely poor, African-American population.

¶Mr. Chertoff failed to name a principal federal official to oversee the response before the hurricane arrived, an omission a top Pentagon official acknowledged to investigators complicated the coordination of the response. His department also did not plan enough to prevent a conflict over which agency should be in charge of law enforcement support. And Mr. Chertoff was either poorly informed about the levee break or did not recognize the significance of the initial report about it, investigators said.

¶The Louisiana transportation secretary, Johnny B. Bradberry, who had legal responsibility for the evacuation of thousands of people in nursing homes and hospitals, admitted bluntly to investigators, "We put no plans in place to do any of this."

¶Mayor C. Ray Nagin of New Orleans at first directed his staff to prepare a mandatory evacuation of his city on Saturday, two days before the storm hit, but he testified that he had not done so that day while he and other city officials struggled to decide if they should exempt hospitals and hotels from the order. The mandatory evacuation occurred on Sunday, and the delay exacerbated the difficulty in moving people away from the storm.

¶The New Orleans Police Department unit assigned to the rescue effort, despite many years' worth of flood warnings and requests for money, had just three small boats and no food, water or fuel to supply its emergency workers.

¶Investigators could find no evidence that food and water supplies were formally ordered for the Convention Center, where more than 10,000 evacuees had assembled, until days after the city had decided to open it as a backup emergency shelter. FEMA had planned to have 360,000 ready-to-eat meals delivered to the city and 15 trucks of water in advance of the storm. But only 40,000 meals and five trucks of water had arrived.

DOJ_NMG_0014026

Representative Thomas M. Davis III, Republican of Virginia, chairman of the special House committee investigating the hurricane response, said the only government agency that performed well was the National Weather Service, which correctly predicted the force of the storm. But no one heeded the message, he said.

"The president is still at his ranch, the vice president is still fly-fishing in Wyoming, the president's chief of staff is in Maine," Mr. Davis said. "In retrospect, don't you think it would have been better to pull together? They should have had better leadership. It is disengagement."

One of the greatest mysteries for both the House and Senate committees has been why it took so long, even after Mr. Bahamonde filed his urgent report on the Monday the storm hit, for federal officials to appreciate that the levee had broken and that New Orleans was flooding.

Eyewitness to Devastation

As his helicopter approached the site, Mr. Bahamonde testified in October, there was no mistaking what had happened: large sections of the levee had fallen over, leaving the section of the city on the collapsed side entirely submerged, but the neighborhood on the other side relatively dry. He snapped a picture of the scene with a small camera.

"The situation is only going to get worse," he said he warned Mr. Brown, then the FEMA director, whom he called about 8 p.m. Monday Eastern time to report on his helicopter tour.

"Thank you," he said Mr. Brown replied. "I am now going to call the White House."

Citing restrictions placed on him by his lawyers, Mr. Brown declined to tell House investigators during testimony if he had actually made that call. White House aides have urged administration officials not to discuss any conversations with the president or his top advisors and declined to release e-mail messages sent among Mr. Bush's senior advisors.

But investigators have found the e-mail message referring to Mr. Bahamonde's helicopter survey that was sent to John F. Wood, chief of staff to Secretary Chertoff at 9:27 p.m. They have also found a summary of Mr. Bahamonde's observations that was issued at 10:30 p.m. and an 11:05 p.m. e-mail message to Michael Jackson, the deputy secretary of homeland security. Each message describes in detail the extensive flooding that was taking place in New Orleans after the levee collapse.

Given this chain of events, investigators have repeatedly questioned why Mr. Bush and Mr. Chertoff stated in the days after the storm that the levee break did not happen until Tuesday, as they made an effort to explain why they initially thought the storm had passed without the catastrophe that some had feared.

"The hurricane started to depart the area on Monday, and then Tuesday morning the levee broke and the water started to flood into New Orleans," Mr. Chertoff said on CBS's "Face the Nation" on Sunday, Sept. 4, the weekend after the hurricane hit.

Mr. Chertoff and White House officials have said that they were referring to official confirmation that the levee had broken, which they say they received Tuesday morning from the Army Corps of Engineers. They also say there were conflicting reports all day Monday about whether a breach had occurred and noted that they were not alone in failing to recognize the growing catastrophe.

Mr. Duffy, the White House spokesman, said it would not have made much difference even if the White House had realized the significance of the midnight report. "Like it or not, you cannot fix a levee overnight, or in an hour, or even six hours," he said.

But Senator Susan Collins, Republican of Maine and chairwoman of the Senate Committee on Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs, said it was obvious to her in retrospect that Mr. Chertoff, perhaps in deference to Mr. Brown's authority, was not paying close enough attention to the events in New Orleans and that the federal response to the disaster may have been slowed as a result.

"Secretary Chertoff was too disengaged from the process," Ms. Collins said in an interview.

Compounding the problem, once Mr. Chertoff learned of the levee break on Tuesday, he could not reach Mr. Brown, his top emergency response official, for an entire day because Mr. Brown was on helicopter tours of the damage.

Senator Joseph I. Lieberman of Connecticut, the ranking Democrat on the homeland security committee, said the government confusion reminded him of the period surrounding the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001.

"Information was in different places, in that case prior to the attack," Mr. Lieberman said, "and it wasn't reaching the key decision makers in a coordinated way for them to take action."

Russ Knocke, a homeland security spokesman, said that although Mr. Chertoff had been "intensely involved in monitoring the storm" he had not actually been told about the report of the levee breach until Tuesday, after he arrived in Atlanta.

"No one is satisfied with the response in the early days," Mr. Knocke said.

But he rejected criticism by Senator Collins and others that Mr. Chertoff was disengaged.

"He was not informed of it," Mr. Knocke said. "It is certainly a breakdown. And through an after-action process, that is something we will address."

The day before the hurricane made landfall, the Homeland Security Department issued a report predicting that it could lead to a levee breach that could submerge New Orleans for months and leave 100,000 people stranded. Yet despite these warnings, state, federal and local officials acknowledged to investigators that there was no coordinated effort before the storm arrived to evacuate nursing homes and hospitals or others in the urban population without cars.

DOJ_NMG_0014027

Focus on Highway Plan

Mr. Bradberry, the state transportation secretary, told an investigator that he had focused on improving the highway evacuation plan for the general public with cars and had not attended to his responsibility to remove people from hospitals and nursing homes. The state even turned down an offer for patient evacuation assistance from the federal government.

In fact, the city was desperately in need of help. And this failure would have deadly consequences. Only 21 of the 60 or so nursing homes were cleared of residents before the storm struck. Dozens of lives were lost in hospitals and nursing homes.

One reason the city was unable to help itself, investigators said, is that it never bought the basic equipment needed to respond to the long-predicted catastrophe. The Fire Department had asked for inflatable boats and generators, as well as an emergency food supply, but none were provided, a department official told investigators.

Timothy P. Bayard, a police narcotics commander assigned to lead a water rescue effort, said that with just three boats, not counting the two it commandeered and almost no working radios, his small team spent much of its time initially just trying to rescue detectives who themselves were trapped by rising water.

The investigators also determined that the federal Department of Transportation was not asked until Wednesday to provide buses to evacuate the Superdome and the convention center, meaning that evacuees sat there for perhaps two more days longer than necessary.

Mr. Brown acknowledged to investigators that he wished, in retrospect, that he had moved much earlier to turn over major aspects of the response effort to the Department of Defense. It was not until the middle of the week, he said, that he asked the military to take over the delivery and distribution of water, food and ice.

"In hindsight I should have done it right then," Mr. Brown told the House, referring to the Sunday before the storm hit.

A Closer Look At Some Of The Documents (NYT)

By eric lipton

The New York Times, February 10, 2006

Investigators now have the documentation to pinpoint some of the fundamental errors and oversights that combined to produce what is universally agreed to be a flawed government response to the worst natural disaster in modern United States history.

Audio: Eric Lipton on the Documents (mp3)

Long before Hurricane Katrina emerged, this document shows that federal official knew that if a major hurricane landed in New Orleans, local authorities would be overwhelmed. Go to Document

But investigators have concluded that the federal government, even when it saw this dire warning from the National Weather Service, did not act as if he knew this most basic reality: local authorities would not be able to fend for themselves. Here is an excerpt of the federal statement of the local incapacity to fend for itself and the weather forecast just before Katrina landed.

Go to Document **********

On Sunday, Aug. 28, at noon, federal and state officials, including President Bush and Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff participated in a teleconference call to discuss the approaching storm. Mr. Max Mayfield, the director of the National Hurricane Center provided some dire warnings. Mr. Chertoff asked FEMA director Michael Brown if there was anything he needed. Mr. Bush prayed for no loss of life. And Mr. Brown asked Col. Jeff Smith, Deputy Director of the Louisiana Department of Homeland Security, if he needed any assistance.

Go to Excerpts From a Transcript of the Call

****

Johnny B. Bradberry, secretary of the Louisiana Department of Transportation signed an agreement in April 2005 committing his department to "mobilize transportation to support emergency evacuation for at-risk populations," meaning the frail, elderly, disabled and others who might not be able to get out of the city on their own. But Mr. Bradberry admitted to investigators that he did not honor this agrreement. Senator Susan Collins, Republican of Maine, observed: "The initial evacuation from New Orleans in advance of the storm went relatively well. Approximately 1 million people left the greater New Orleans area in a much more efficient and orderly manner than in hurricane evacuations of years past. Then, so to speak, the wheels came off. Those without access to transportation out of the region found themselves stranded high and dry, but only in the figurative sense. Among those left behind were thousands of elderly, disabled and disadvantaged residents." Mr. Bradberry was interviewed by a Senate investigator.

Go Document

****

In July 2005, at an emergency planning session sponsored by FEMA, state and local officials discussed evacuation planning for a possible hurricane in the region, which all parties recognized could cause thousands, if not tens of thousands of deaths. At the meeting, there was a consensus that they were far from ready, as only about 10 percent of the planning was finished for how they would evacuate the estimated 100,000 people in the area that did not have cars or other means of getting out of the city.

Go to Excerpts From a Transcript of the Meeting

****

An official from the United States Department of Health and Human Services, which is charged with helping evacuate medical patients from disaster areas, asked a Louisiana state health official two days before Katrina landed if the state needed help moving patients out of harms way. The state official turned down the offer. The e-mails are in reverse chronological order.

Go to Document

****

On Sunday, Aug. 28th, the day before Hurricane Katrina hit, FEMA issued a "situation report" on the storm that had several dire predictions, including that a direct hit by the storm could leave the city submerged by several feet of water and that at least 100,000 people lacked a way to get out of town.

Go to Document

****

Without an organized plan to evacuate nursing homes before Katrina landed, 36 nursing homes failed to heed mandatory evacuation orders. Chaos followed, as once the storm hit and the flood waters rose, they were without electricity and often food and water. Dozens of patients died while they awaited rescue.

Excerpts from the testimony of Joseph A. Donchess Executive Director Louisiana Nursing Home Association to Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee:

Go to Document

****

City hospitals also did not evacuate. But city officials acknowledged during the investigation that they did not realize that many hospitals had their back up generators in areas that could be flooded. That meant that they too were often without electricity after the storm and flood.

Excerpts from testimony on the attempting to evacuate a New Orleans hospital:

Go to Document

****

Reports that there were major breaks in the levees started on Monday morning, the day Katrina hit. But it would be nearly 24 hours before officials in the Bush administration, including President Bush and Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, appeared to recognize the serverity of what had happened. Marty Bahamonde, a public affairs officer with the Federal Emergency Management Agency, heard the early reports on Monday and then told supervisors in Washington. News of his report, and helicopter flights he took to confirm the levee breach, reached the White House and the office of the Homeland Security secretary by Monday evening or late Monday night. Here are excerpts of testimony about the initial reports of the levee break. He is questioned by Sen. Susan Collins, Republican of Maine and Senator Joseph Lieberman, Democrat of Connecticut, who are the two leaders of the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee.

Go to Excerpts From the Testimony

****

Marty Bahamonde, a FEMA public affairs office, took this photograph on Monday Aug. 29, the day Katrina hit, at about 5:15 p.m. central time. In a Coast Guard helicopter, he flew directly to the site that had been described in a report he overheard Monday morning at about 11 a.m. to confirm that the levee had broken. As soon as he saw the spot, he said there was no question in his mind that the levee had collapsed, not just been overtopped, as it was obvious that only one side was flooded and he could see sections of the levee that had fallen over. (Click on the photo to enlarge the image.)

****

At 9:27 p.m., Monday, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff's chief of staff, John Wood, and others in the Secretary's office, received an email from Brian Besanceney, the Assistant Secretary for Public Affairs, reporting that observations by a FEMA employee in New Orleans had found that conditions were "far more serious," than the media was reporting.

Go to E-Mail

****

DOJ_NMG_0014029

At 10:30 p.m. on Monday, Aug. 29, the day Katrina landed in New Orleans, the Department of Homeland Security issued a report detailing observations that had been made of the broken levee by Marty Bahamonde, the sole FEMA representative on the ground in the city that day. He had heard the report at 11 a.m. that morning and then confirmed it with a flyover in a helicopter that evening. This same report made its way to the White House Monday, shortly after midnight.

Go to Document

****

New Orleans Mayor C. Ray Nagin provided the Federal Emergency Management Agency with a detailed list of emergency aid his city desperately needed in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina. Most of the requested supplies and other assistance did not arrive for days, if at all, as FEMA was not prepared to deliver what the city said it needed.

Go to Document

****

In the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina, New Orleans Police Captain Timothy P. Bayard prepared this internal report assessing the role his city's Office of Emergency Preparedness played in the response to Katrina. He introduced the report to investigators by saying: "The New Orleans Office of Emergency Preparedness failed. They did not prepare themselves, nor did they manage the city agencies responsible for conducting emergency response to the disaster. Their function was to coordinate with state, federal and other local agencies, to enlist logistical assistance. We did not coordinate with any state, local or federal agencies. We were not prepared logistically. Most importantly, we relocated evacuees to two locations where there was no food, water or portable restrooms. We did not implement the pre-existing plan. We did not utilize buses that would have allowed us to transport mass quantities of evacuees expeditiously. We did not have food, water or fuel for the emergency workers. We did not have a back up communication system. We had no portable radio towers or repeaters that would have enabled us to communicate. The other mistakes have been mentioned previously." Go to Document **********

The National Guard, which is made up of troops under the command of individual states, ultimately had at least 30,000 troops assigned to Louisiana to help with the response to Hurricane Katrina. But an "after action review" that evaluates the National Guard's own response found that it was hampered by poor coordination, insufficient communications and a lack of so-called situational awareness.

Ex-FEMA Chief, In Reversal, To Answer Questions On Storm (NYT)

By Eric Lipton

The New York Times, February 10, 2006

WASHINGTON, Feb. 9 — For months, Michael D. Brown, former director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, has declined to answer questions from Congress about his conversations during Hurricane Katrina with top Bush administration officials. But in an interview on Thursday, he said that his position had changed.

Now that he is a private citizen, he said, "I feel an obligation to answer any questions they put to me."

Mr. Brown will have that chance on Friday, when he is scheduled to testify to the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, which is nearing the end of a five-month inquiry on the hurricane.

"The public needs to know the entire picture of what was going on," Mr. Brown said.

Mr. Brown's lawyer, in a letter sent Monday to Harriet E. Miers, the White House counsel, wrote that "unless there is specific direction otherwise by the president" that "Mr. Brown will testify, if asked, about particular communications he had" with White House officials and others in the executive branch.

As of Thursday evening, Mr. Brown and his lawyer, Andrew W. Lester, said they had received no calls or letters from the White House urging Mr. Brown to remain silent.

The testimony will make clear, Mr. Brown said, that senior administration officials, including President Bush, recognized the severity of the problem in New Orleans in the immediate aftermath of the storm. But changes in the organization of FEMA and the powers of the director of the agency after it became part of the Homeland Security Department, Mr. Brown said, prevented him from effectively leading the response.

The administration has declined House and Senate investigators' requests to turn over e-mail messages and other correspondence from top White House officials involved in the hurricane response. Mr. Bush, asked last month whether Mr. Brown should testify about his White House discussions, seemed to urge him to not do so.

A White House spokesman, Trent Duffy, said he had nothing to add to that comment.

Mr. Brown, who has a permanent residence in Colorado but continues to live here, has formed a disaster-relief consultancy. He would not name clients but said he had signed up a number of companies, including firms that sell communications equipment and work on rebuilding on the Gulf Coast.

DOJ_NMG_0014030

Former FEMA Director To Testify About Katrina (WP)

By Spencer S. Hsu

The Washington Post, February 10, 2006

Michael D. Brown, the former head of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, was rebuffed in his request for a claim of executive privilege and plans to testify to a Senate panel today about his calls and e-mails to President Bush and top White House aides in the Hurricane Katrina crisis, Brown's lawyer said yesterday.

White House Counsel Harriet Miers declined to offer Brown a legal defense for declining to testify or respond to a Feb. 6 letter advising that without such protection Brown "intends to answer all questions fully, completely and accurately," said Brown's lawyer, Andrew W. Lester.

Lester wrote that Brown will testify if asked about communications with Bush, Vice President Cheney, Chief of Staff Andrew H. Card Jr., Deputy Chief of Staff Karl Rove, Deputy Chief of Staff Joseph Hagin, domestic policy adviser Claude A. Allen and national security adviser Stephen J. Hadley.

As the federal official in charge of the disaster before he resigned, Brown is "between a rock and a hard place," his lawyer said. "On the one hand he desires to answer fully any and all questions the Committee may have," Lester wrote. "On the other hand the President's statements indicate concern that the President be able to 'get unvarnished advice from [his] advisors.' "

House and Senate investigative committees have battled the White House over its refusal to make available top aides and their correspondence from the response to the storm. Instead, the White House has provided 15,000 pages of records and briefings by a deputy White House homeland security adviser.

Bush spokesman Trent Duffy declined to comment on Brown's letter. But Duffy noted a Jan. 26 news conference in which Bush, while declining to cite Brown by name, defended "people who give me advice" from being forced to disclose such conversations, citing a "chilling effect on future advisers."

In testimony to a House committee in September, Brown did not discuss such conversations on the advice of counsel, although he estimated that he communicated with the White House "30 times" during the weekend before Katrina made landfall on Monday, Aug. 29. That included "several" calls to Bush to help speed evacuations by Louisiana and New Orleans leaders.

Yesterday, Lester said that Brown "is planning to testify by answering all questions."

Brown could shed light on the White House's lack of awareness of events on the day of Katrina's landfall. Documents released by the Senate show that although the Homeland Security Operations Center reported at 6 p.m. Aug. 29 that no New Orleans levees had been breached, authorities received no fewer than 16 reports to the contrary before then.

Beginning at 8:30 a.m. Aug. 29, levee breaks were reported by sources including New Orleans and Louisiana homeland security officials, the Transportation Security Administration, the National Weather Service, FEMA officials, White House Homeland Security Council and Homeland Security Department "spot reports," the Army Corps of Engineers, the Coast Guard, and the American Red Cross.

Neighborhoods At Stake (USAT)

By Richard Baker

USA Today, February 10, 2006

Louisiana's in limbo. Months after Hurricanes Katrina and Rita destroyed more than 200,000 homes and businesses, little progress has been made toward rebuilding. Nor will it if these properties languish in ruins for years. Think about that: American ruins.

Thousands face paying mortgages on homes lost or accepting foreclosure and losing still more. The private sector is held back by a broken market: Even individuals with resources to rebuild won't when their neighborhood remains decimated. The only answer: Restoring whole communities.

To help, I have proposed the Louisiana Recovery Corp., which would purchase property from willing sellers, providing them financial stability to move forward and options to come home. By clearing title and reconditioning land, the LRC would open the door for the private sector, following local plans, to finance rebuilding, with proceeds from land sales returned to taxpayers.

At an average payment of 60% of $200,000, covering every property would cost $24 billion, but if only half were recovered through resale, the overall cost would be $12 billion. That's a major investment, but consider: In nearly six months, the Federal Emergency Management Agency has spent more than $8 billion on Gulf Coast "housing," for such things as trailers, motels and cruise ships. While helpful, these "temporary" arrangements aren't solutions. For 50% more over 10 years, the LRC would allow people to make long-term housing plans, while laying a path to rebuild a vast portion of a vital state. Isn't this a better way?

To say assisting Louisiana's floodplain is unwise closes the door on whole parishes and New Orleans itself, and overlooks that many were inadequately insured because they had relied on levees built by the federal government. Stronger levees, building codes and insurance requirements would ensure that government and Louisianans live up to their responsibilities and rebuild responsibly.

DOJ_NMG_0014031

Offering philosophical objections but no workable alternative does nothing to address the reality. If there's a fairer, more effective and fiscally responsible plan, I'd like to hear it. But as it is, the LRC enjoys broad support across ideological lines. A fair hearing and an up-or-down vote is all we ask.

Rep. Richard Baker, R-La., chairs a subcommittee of the House Financial Services Committee.

Rebuild Louisiana, But Not By Creating Federal Money Pit (USAT)

USA Today, February 10, 2006

They call it the "devastation tour," and sadly for New Orleans, it delivers everything the label implies.

The three-hour bus excursion, offered since last month by Gray Line New Orleans, takes visitors through the ruins that once were graceful neighborhoods in one of the nation's fabled cities. Now, nearly six months after Hurricane Katrina struck, the tour shows ghostly shells of homes, upended trees and roof-high water marks — the brownish calling cards left by flooding. Unseen are the smashed lives the waters also leftbehind.

New Orleans and the surrounding area are devastated and need help. Americans want to provide it. But Congress is focused on a scheme that would serve neither the city nor the taxpayers well. Actually, it's less a plan than an exercise in thoughtless political spending — and further proof that Washington can't manage disaster relief.

Rep. Richard Baker, R-La., proposes creating a new federal bureaucracy, the Louisiana Recovery Corp. (LRC), to buy damaged properties, repackage them and sell them for redevelopment. Baker's plan is gaining traction in Congress and plaudits in Louisiana. At first glance, it appears promising. But look deeper, and costly flaws appear:

· Unknown price tag. The plan would allow the new corporation to borrow up to $30 billion from the U.S. Treasury, but there's no limit on how much could ultimately be spent to set up and run this entity. And no hard figures on how much taxpayers might hope to recoup.

· No guarantee. The LRC would buy homes from sellers for at least 60% of their fair market value before Katrina struck — an interesting, if expensive, goal. But the land would be acquired in disconnected chunks. There's no provision for emptying flood-prone areas and scant help for homeowners who want to rebuild safely, not sell.

· Questionable recipients. Baker's plan would reward lenders by paying them as much as 60% of outstanding mortgages. This would apply even to lenders who failed to fulfill federal requirements that homes in designated flood plains be insured as a condition of getting a mortgage. Taxpayers shouldn't be forced to bail out lenders who took such risks. Doing so would encourage cavalier practices in the future.

· Dangerous precedent. Though the New Orleans flood was an unparalleled disaster, this vast new program would lead homeowners to expect similar aid in the next catastrophe. The poorly run National Flood Insurance Program is nearly bankrupt after Katrina; this is no time to create a bureaucracy with an open checkbook.

The Bush administration wisely opposes Baker's plan, but despite the passage of time, it hasn't proposed an alternative.

Katrina's victims merit help to restore their lives, and New Orleans needs help in rebuilding. That requires substantial aid from the federal government, which contributed to the disaster when its levees failed.

Even so, aid programs that lack accountability to taxpayers or a clear plan for rebuilding would make matters worse. Nor should the federal government usurp local responsibility and control. New Orleans needs a sound state and local rebuilding plan. Neither the City Council nor the state has adopted one. That, not an expensive federal bureaucracy, is the first building block toward putting the "devastation tour" out of business.

SBA Seeking More Money From Congress Some Lawmakers Criticize Agency For 'lack Of Leadership' In Handling Katrina Relief Funds (USAT)

By Jim Drinkard

USA Today, February 10, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Small Business Administration, criticized for its slow pace in making disaster loans to victims of Hurricane Katrina, is asking Congress for an additional $1.1 billion in relief money.

Though the agency has approved $4.1 billion in loans, most of them to owners of storm-damaged homes, it has paid out just $326 million of that amount.

The agency received an emergency infusion of $441 million in December for disaster loans and got permission last week to transfer $100 million into the loan program from other accounts.

DOJ_NMG_0014032

"We have concerns about how they got to this reported crisis," said John Scofield, a spokesman for the House Appropriations Committee, which along with its Senate counterpart controls federal spending. "We've given them everything they've asked for. That should get them through it."

Rep. Nydia Velzquez, D-N.Y., the top Democrat on the House Small Business Committee and an agency critic, said the SBA has "been wrong with the numbers. It proves the lack of leadership and mismanagement."

SBA spokesman Raul Cisneros defended the request, noting that Katrina is the most expensive disaster ever to hit the USA and that requests for additional money have been routine in previous disasters. "We just don't know" how much such events will ultimately cost, he said.

The $1.1 billion in requested new money — part of an upcoming $18 billion Bush administration request for Katrina relief — will fund an additional $6.8 billion in disaster loans, Cisneros said. The $1.1 billion represents the federal subsidy involved in making the loans, or the ultimate cost to the government once the loan is repaid.

The SBA projects it ultimately will approve nearly $12.4 billion in loans by Sept. 30, the end of the 2006 fiscal year for Katrina and for Hurricanes Rita and Wilma. The requested $1.1 billion would allow those loans to be fully funded, the agency said.

In the five months since Katrina struck, SBA has received 373,495 disaster loan applications and has approved 59,398 of them. An additional 165,263 remain to be processed. The rest were denied or withdrawn.

The agency has come under harsh criticism from Velzquez and other lawmakers on Capitol Hill, as well as some of its own employees, for its handling of the crisis.

In other news, 28 government entities, from local Louisiana parishes to the White House, reported that New Orleans levees were breached Aug. 29, the day Katrina hit, the Associated Press said Thursday.

A timeline of e-mails, situation updates and weather reports, pieced together by Senate Democrats, indicates the Bush administration knew as early as 8:30 a.m. ET about levee failures that would ultimately lead to massive flooding of the city and its surrounding parishes.

White House spokesman Trent Duffy said President Bush and his top aides were fully aware about the massive flooding — and less concerned whether it was caused by levee breaches, overtopped levees or failed pumps, all three of which were being reported at the time.

"We knew there was flooding, and that's why the No. 1 effort in those early hours was on search and rescue, and saving life and limb," Duffy said.

Has USA Lost Drive To Rebuild After Tragedies? Nation Usually Quick To Rebound, But Confusion Slowing Process In New Orleans, At Ground Zero (USAT)

By Rick Hampson

USA Today, February 10, 2006

Less than 72 hours after fire destroyed a third of Chicago, including his own family's new town house on Michigan Avenue, a civic booster named William Bross boarded a train to New York.

Bross, an owner of the Chicago Tribune, had a message for Wall Street: The fire was not a disaster; it was an investment opportunity. "What she has been in the past, she must become in the future," he said of his home town, "and a hundredfold more."

That was the attitude in Chicago in 1871. And in Galveston, Texas, after the hurricane of 1900; in San Francisco after the earthquake of 1906; at Pearl Harbor after the sneak attack in 1941.

It's the American attitude: We always spring up off the mat, always rebuild bigger and better.

At least until now. In New York City, where terrorists destroyed the World Trade Center, and in New Orleans, where Katrina flooded most of the city, Americans are arguing over how, when and even whether to rebuild.

The qualities we associate with recovery from disaster — urgency, unity, determination, imagination — have been eclipsed by indecision, delay and dissension.

"Rebuilding quickly is part of our self-identity, but we're getting more cynical about what we're capable of," says Christine Rosen, a business school professor at the University of California-Berkeley who has studied urban disasters.

To some, it's a disturbing change. "Great nations rebuild," says Douglas Brinkley, a historian at New Orleans' Tulane University. He blames the dithering in Lower Manhattan and his own city on a failure of political leadership.

"If we had the will in 1947 to rebuild the capitals of Europe, why don't we have the will in 2006 to rebuild the capital city of the Mississippi (River)?" he asks. "Most Americans are oblivious to what's happening, because no one is standing in the bully pulpit to tell them."

DOJ_NMG_0014033

It's been only five months since the hurricane, but Brinkley sees little sign of the comeback spirit that sprang from the ruins of Chicago, San Francisco and Galveston.

At Ground Zero, there's still a gaping hole where the Trade Center stood. More than four years have passed without a consensus as to what should fill it, observes Brent Glass, director of the Smithsonian's National Museum of American History.

He adds: “I don't know if there's an analogy for that in American history.”

These cities rebuilt, each with little federal aid:

·Chicago: After the Great Fire destroyed 18,000 buildings and left 100,000 homeless (one in three residents), rebuilding in the “Burnt District” began almost immediately. Debris was pushed into Lake Michigan as landfill for a bigger city. The size of the central business district doubled, and taller buildings were constructed.

·San Francisco: The earthquake started fires that destroyed about three quarters of the city and left 300,000 homeless — half the population. City leaders began rebuilding immediately, abandoning for the sake of speed a master plan to beautify the city.

·Galveston: The year after the hurricane wrecked much of Galveston Island, a county referendum on a bond issue for a seawall passed by better than 9-to-1. The entire city was raised by more than 15 feet.

Times change.

In New York, the city, the state, the Port Authority, the Trade Center leaseholder, relatives of 9/11 victims, neighborhood residents and business owners are still bickering over what will rise at Ground Zero.

Although a memorial has been designed, little else is settled. Plans for two museums fell apart amid complaints that their exhibits might dishonor the dead. The Freedom Tower, planned to be the world's tallest building, was redesigned because of security concerns and will not be finished until the next decade, if at all.

It's still early to rebuild in New Orleans, but the prospect of recovery is clouded by squabbling over who's responsible for what happened and by confusion over who's responsible for what will happen.

The leading rebuilding proposal, which gives the most flood-prone sections from four months to a year to attract a critical mass of residents or be condemned, has divided the city. It also counts on at least $17 billion more than the federal government has pledged.

Whatever the city's plan, many residents have said they won't return unless Washington promises to improve the levees to withstand a Category 5 hurricane. That might cost more than $32 billion — 10 times what the president has promised for levees.

There's another variable — the new federal flood maps for the city. When issued, the maps may mean that many people who want to return won't be able to because of higher insurance and building costs.

Why does America seem to rebuild and rebound differently today than it has in the past?

·New Orleans and Lower Manhattan were on the decline, not the rise.

Chicago in 1871, Galveston in 1900 and San Francisco in 1906 had something more powerful than fire, flood or earthquake: location. The first was poised between the industrial Northeast and the agricultural Midwest. The second was Texas' major port on the Gulf of Mexico. The third was the economic capital of the West and gateway to the Pacific Ocean.

In contrast, New Orleans' population had dropped from 600,000 in 1960 to 450,000. It had a slew of problems, from high crime to low elevation. “New Orleans was slowly sinking, literally and figuratively, well before Katrina,” says Lawrence Vale, head of MIT's urban planning department.

Similarly, on Sept. 11, 2001, Lower Manhattan was in the commercial doldrums, mostly because it lacked Midtown's parking and commuter rail links. The market for office space was glutted.

Four years later, little has changed. No. 7 World Trade Center — an office tower next to Ground Zero that also was destroyed and has now been rebuilt — is scheduled to open in April, but only 300,000 of its 1.7 million square feet have been leased.

·Rebuilding after natural disasters always has relied on private capital, not federal aid.

Although Eastern money was wary of San Francisco after the quake, Western investors stepped up to rebuild the city.

Now, with Washington still prosecuting a war and facing a $400 billion-a-year deficit, economics trumps politics: “No matter what the government does, who's going to invest?” asks George Friedman, president of Stratfor, a private intelligence and analysis service.

Given tight government finances and investor reluctance, New Orleans “just doesn't have the economic muscle to come back as it was,” says Mary Comerio, a UC-Berkeley expert in disaster recovery.

·Rebuilding then wasn't as smooth as it looks now.

Chicago and San Francisco weren't rebuilt without delays and problems. Chicago started fast, but construction stalled after the financial panic of 1873. San Francisco took about nine years to come all the way back. “There was no ‘golden age' of rebuilding,” says Glass, the museum director. “They had the same controversies then that we have now.”

DOJ_NMG_0014034

·Haste made waste.

After great 19th-century fires devastated cities such as Boston and Baltimore, proposed reforms — wider streets, tighter building codes, better water service — were compromised by the drive to rebuild quickly.

Post-quake San Francisco hurriedly pushed debris into the bay, where it became a weak base for the city's Marina district, which suffered some of the heaviest damage during a 1989 quake. Chicago suffered another devastating fire in 1874, partly because the city did not improve water pressure and install more hydrants.

Today, those kinds of memories help explain the reluctance in New Orleans to rebuild in low-lying areas and the concern in New York that new skyscrapers at Ground Zero might be vulnerable to another attack.

·There's more to rebuild now — at higher cost.

Chicago before the fire had no electricity or phone service, few paved streets and little indoor plumbing. The fire largely spared its rail lines and stockyards.

New Orleans faces a much bigger rebuilding job. Carl Smith, a Northwestern University professor who has studied the Chicago fire, says he's "astonished" by the devastation of Katrina. In 2006 dollars, the fire caused about $3.2 billion in property damage. Katrina caused about $40 billion in insured losses alone.

·We listen to our own rhetoric.

"We will rebuild!" elected officials crowed in unison after 9/11 and Katrina. Many cited heroic precedents such as Chicago and San Francisco. But House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., received criticism when he suggested it might not be prudent to rebuild New Orleans.

The rhetoric "is part of the problem," Berkeley's Comerio says. "It's heresy to say that we don't need all this new office space in Lower Manhattan or that some parts of New Orleans can't be resettled," she says. "It's reality, but in American terms it's defeatist."

As for timing, Friedman, the intelligence analyst, says Americans should give themselves a break: "A major city was destroyed in August. Now it's (February). Americans are prodigious rebuilders, but we're also a nation that demands instant gratification."

WAR NEWS:

Ex-CIA Official Faults Use Of Data On Iraq (WP)

By Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, February 10, 2006

Intelligence 'Misused' to Justify War, He Says

The former CIA official who coordinated U.S. intelligence on the Middle East until last year has accused the Bush administration of "cherry-picking" intelligence on Iraq to justify a decision it had already reached to go to war, and of ignoring warnings that the country could easily fall into violence and chaos after an invasion to overthrow Saddam Hussein.

Paul R. Pillar, who was the national intelligence officer for the Near East and South Asia from 2000 to 2005, acknowledges the U.S. intelligence agencies' mistakes in concluding that Hussein's government possessed weapons of mass destruction. But he said those misjudgments did not drive the administration's decision to invade.

"Official intelligence on Iraqi weapons programs was flawed, but even with its flaws, it was not what led to the war," Pillar wrote in the upcoming issue of the journal Foreign Affairs. Instead, he asserted, the administration "went to war without requesting -- and evidently without being influenced by -- any strategic-level intelligence assessments on any aspect of Iraq."

"It has become clear that official intelligence was not relied on in making even the most significant national security decisions, that intelligence was misused publicly to justify decisions already made, that damaging ill will developed between [Bush] policymakers and intelligence officers, and that the intelligence community's own work was politicized," Pillar wrote.

Pillar's critique is one of the most severe indictments of White House actions by a former Bush official since Richard C. Clarke, a former National Security Council staff member, went public with his criticism of the administration's handling of the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks and its failure to deal with the terrorist threat beforehand.

It is also the first time that such a senior intelligence officer has so directly and publicly condemned the administration's handling of intelligence.

Pillar, retired after 28 years at the CIA, was an influential behind-the-scenes player and was considered the agency's leading counterterrorism analyst. By the end of his career, he was responsible for coordinating assessments on Iraq from all 15 agencies in the intelligence community. He is now a professor in security studies at Georgetown University.

DOJ_NMG_0014035

White House officials did not respond to a request to comment for this article. They have vehemently denied accusations that the administration manipulated intelligence to generate public support for the war.

"Our statements about the threat posed by Saddam Hussein were based on the aggregation of intelligence from a number of sources and represented the collective view of the intelligence community," national security adviser Stephen J. Hadley said in a White House briefing in November. "Those judgments were shared by Republicans and Democrats alike."

Republicans and Democrats in Congress continue to argue over whether, or how, to investigate accusations the administration manipulated prewar intelligence.

Yesterday, the Senate Republican Policy Committee issued a statement to counter what it described as "the continuing Iraq pre-war intelligence myths," including charges that Bush " 'misused' intelligence to justify the war." Writing that it was perfectly reasonable for the president to rely on the intelligence he was given, the paper concluded, "it is actually the critics who are misleading the American people."

In his article, Pillar said he believes that the "politicization" of intelligence on Iraq occurred "subtly" and in many forms, but almost never resulted from a policymaker directly asking an analyst to reshape his or her results. "Such attempts are rare," he writes, "and when they do occur . . . are almost always unsuccessful."

Instead, he describes a process in which the White House helped frame intelligence results by repeatedly posing questions aimed at bolstering its arguments about Iraq.

The Bush administration, Pillar wrote, "repeatedly called on the intelligence community to uncover more material that would contribute to the case for war," including information on the "supposed connection" between Hussein and al Qaeda, which analysts had discounted. "Feeding the administration's voracious appetite for material on the Saddam-al Qaeda link consumed an enormous amount of time and attention."

The result of the requests, and public statements by the president, Vice President Cheney and others, led analysts and managers to conclude the United States was heading for war well before the March 2003 invasion, Pillar asserted.

They thus knew, he wrote, that senior policymakers "would frown on or ignore analysis that called into question a decision to go to war and welcome analysis that supported such a decision. . . . [They] felt a strong wind consistently blowing in one direction. The desire to bend with such a wind is natural and strong, even if unconscious."

Pillar wrote that the prewar intelligence asserted Hussein's "weapons capacities," but he said the "broad view" within the United States and overseas "was that Saddam was being kept 'in his box' " by U.N. sanctions, and that the best way to deal with him was through "an aggressive inspections program to supplement sanctions already in place."

"If the entire body of official intelligence analysis on Iraq had a policy implication," Pillar wrote, "it was to avoid war -- or, if war was going to be launched, to prepare for a messy aftermath."

Pillar describes for the first time that the intelligence community did assessments before the invasion that, he wrote, indicated a postwar Iraq "would not provide fertile ground for democracy" and would need "a Marshall Plan-type effort" to restore its economy despite its oil revenue. It also foresaw Sunnis and Shiites fighting for power.

Pillar wrote that the intelligence community "anticipated that a foreign occupying force would itself be the target of resentment and attacks -- including guerrilla warfare -- unless it established security and put Iraq on the road to prosperity in the first few weeks or months after the fall of Saddam."

In an interview, Pillar said the prewar assessments "were not crystal-balling, but in them we were laying out the challenges that would face us depending on decisions that were made."

Pillar wrote that the first request he received from a Bush policymaker for an assessment of post-invasion Iraq was "not until a year into the war."

That assessment, completed in August 2004, warned that the insurgency in Iraq could evolve into a guerrilla war or civil war. It was leaked to the media in September in the midst of the presidential campaign, and Bush, who had told voters that the mission in Iraq was going well, described the assessment to reporters as "just guessing."

Shortly thereafter, Pillar was identified in a column by Robert D. Novak as having prepared the assessment and having given a speech critical of Bush's Iraq policy at a private dinner in California. The column fed the White House's view that the CIA was in effect working against the Bush administration, and that Pillar was part of that. A columnist in the Washington Times in October 2004 called him "a longstanding intellectual opponent of the policy options chosen by President Bush to fight terrorism."

Leaked information "encouraged some administration supporters to charge intelligence officers (including me) with trying to sabotage the president's policies," Pillar wrote. One effect of that, he said, was to limit challenges to consensus views on matters such as the Iraqi weapons program.

When asked why he did not quit given his concerns, Pillar said in the interview that he was doing "other worthwhile work in the nation's interest" and never thought of resigning over the issue.

DOJ_NMG_0014036

Pillar suggests that the CIA and other intelligence agencies, now under Director of National Intelligence John D. Negroponte, remain within the executive branch but "be given greater independence."

The model he cites is the Federal Reserve, overseen by governors who serve fixed terms. That, he said, would reduce "both the politicization of the intelligence community's own work and the public misuse of intelligence by policymakers."

Two Shiite Alliance Contenders Vie For Prime Minister Job In Iraq (USAT)

By Rick Jervis

USA Today, February 10, 2006

BAGHDAD — Iraq's largest political alliance has narrowed its field of prime minister candidates to two.

The top candidates are Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari and Adel Abdul Mahdi, one of Iraq's two vice presidents, said Basam Ridha, an al-Jaafari adviser.

Al-Jaafari, who belongs to the Dawa Party, a Shiite religious organization that resisted Saddam Hussein's regime, has been criticized as being ineffective during the past nine months as prime minister, said Mahmoud Othman, a leading Kurdish lawmaker. Al-Jaafari was not as assertive as his tough-talking predecessor, Ayad Allawi.

However, al-Jaafari has gained experience in office and has distanced himself from religious Shiite leaders, Othman said. Al-Jaafari lived in England for much of the two decades he lived in exile.

Mahdi, a high-ranking member of the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq, has a stronger personality capable of bringing different sides to the bargaining table, Othman said. However, he is faulted for being too close to Iraq's religious clerics and viewed warily by some because he once lived in Iran, Othman said.

The United Iraqi Alliance, the Shiite coalition that won the largest number of seats in parliamentary elections Dec. 15, will attempt to name its choice by Saturday.

The Independent Electoral Commission is to release officially certified election results today, clearing the way for the parliament to be seated. The legislature will then begin forming a government.

The Shiite alliance won 128 of parliament's 275 seats. Since the alliance fell short of a majority, it will need to form a coalition with other groups to form a government.

The United States encourages an inclusive government as a crucial step in deflating Iraq's insurgency and stabilizing the country. The new prime minister will lead efforts to form a government that includes Shiite and Sunni Arabs, Kurds and Christians.

In a statement in December, Zalmay Khalilzad, U.S. ambassador to Iraq, urged Iraq's different parties to form a unity government. “Iraq's political parties and their leaders must come together to reinforce their commitment to democratic principles and national unity,” he said.

The Sunnis, who once dominated Iraq's government, now are behind much of the insurgency battling U.S. and Iraqi forces. Sunnis are seeking a larger role in the new government.

“The key issue is what kind of government will form,” said Hassan Bazzad, professor of International Relations at Baghdad University. “Forming a real national unity government will have the strongest impact on the situation in Iraq.”

After election results are formally announced, the new parliament will convene and vote on a president and two vice presidents, known as the presidential council. The presidential council will then announce its choice for prime minister, taken from the Shiite alliance, and assign ministers. The serious negotiations are expected to take place behind closed doors, Othman said.

The jobs of heading the Defense and Interior ministries are critical, since those officials control the security forces. Khalilzad has said the security ministries should go to people without ties to sectarian groups or militias.

Othman said the Shiite alliance will try to agree on a prime minister nominee before Saturday. If not, the group will have to vote on it, a step that could divide the tentative alliance of different Shiite groups, he said.

Key to the selection could be Muqtada al-Sadr, the radical Shiite cleric whose followers clashed with U.S. forces twice in 2004.

Al-Sadr supporters won about 30 seats within the alliance bloc. It's not clear which candidate al-Sadr will support, Ridha said.

Iraqis Cope With Life Without Lights (CSM)

By Ilene R. Prusher And Charles Levinson

The Christian Science Monitor, February 10, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0014037

BAGHDAD - Younes Abbas Shamari is a carpenter with an open-air shop on Baghdad's Zawiya Street, which means he depends on electricity for most of what he does: sawing, drilling, sanding. These days, however, he rarely works, as the electricity is off more than it's on.

His workshop sits on a commercial strip in a relatively calm area in the central part of the city. Many small businesses here are in need of electricity to function, but Mr. Shamari estimates he gets just two hours of electricity for every four there is none. And that's twice the Baghdad average, this being one of the capital's more upscale neighborhoods.

Thanks largely to deteriorating security, electricity - along with water, sewage, and oil production - has dropped below prewar levels. Before the invasion, for example, Baghdad was receiving an average of at least 16 hours of power a day. Today, with insurgents targeting power plants and electrical lines on an almost daily basis, the city gets power just four hours each day on average.

"It's not enough to pay for the rent on my shop," says Shamari, whose salary supports an extended family of 13 in Diyala, outside Baghdad. "The rent is almost higher than whatever income I get from my work." He acknowledges that before the war, electricity wasn't nonstop, but it was available when he worked.

Iraq was generating 4,500 megawatts before the US invasion. But by November of last year that generation capacity had dropped to 3,995 megawatts, well below the national demand of 7,000 megawatts, according to a January report by the Office of the Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction. Production has slumped despite the $3 billion - of $18.4 billion authorized for Iraq reconstruction - the US has set aside for electricity projects.

Stuart Bowen, the special inspector general for Iraq reconstruction, testified Wednesday before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee that Iraq would need much more than the $56 billion estimated by the World Bank and UN in 2003 to rebuild Iraq. He didn't give a new figure.

Mr. Bowen told the committee that Iraq's water supply, sewer system, and electrical grid were worse off than once thought.

When fuel was still cheaper than water, before the government cut subsidies in December, Shamari made up for the lack of power with a gas-powered generator. But with the price of fuel now three to five times what it was just three months ago, that's no longer an option.

"How is Iraq supposed to make an economic recovery if businesses don't have basic necessities like electricity?" asks Humam al-Shamaa, an economics professor at Baghdad University. "And the lack of electricity affects security, too, because the streets aren't lighted after sundown and so businesses close earlier than normal."

US officials, though, point out that while power in Baghdad is slumping, supply has increased elsewhere in Iraq. "Now [electricity] is being distributed in a much more egalitarian manner," says Dawn Liberi, head of the Iraq office of the United States Agency for International Development (USAID).

Bowen seconded that claim at Wednesday's hearing. He said the power supply outside Baghdad was the one area of improvement since the war began.

Ms. Liberi does find a silver lining in Baghdad's current electricity situation. Iraqi incomes are on the rise, she says, which is ramping up the consumption of air conditioners, refrigerators, washing machines, and other electricity-hungry consumer goods. "It's very difficult to meet demand, because it's rising much faster than supply," she says.

Liberi also offers another explanation US officials frequently cite when discussing reconstruction shortfalls: Iraqi government disregard for free-market principles and the continuation of state subsidies.

Shamari, for example, pays 4,000 Iraqi dinars a month for electricity, about $2.75. One regular household user says he pays 450 dinars for three months of usage - about 40 cents.

It's a key factor in Iraq's electricity problem, says Liberi. Under Saddam Hussein most people received electricity as a virtual state gift, paying symbolic prices that were out of touch with international rates. After Mr. Hussein, she says, Iraq has yet to adjust, with most people still paying very little. As a result, Iraqis have little incentive to conserve.

US officials have repeatedly argued that the elimination of state subsidies will free up cash for much needed reconstruction projects. Others, however, worry that such belt-tightening measures could lead to social unrest at a time when stability tops the agenda.

But as long as insurgents continue to strike Iraq's power grid, reconstruction remains a perilous endeavor. The insurgency has caused the US to reroute reconstruction money to security. Of the estimated $270 billion spent, $15 billion has gone to nonsecurity items, Liberi says.

And there are few encouraging signs that this trend will change. In fact, a recent report by the US Government Accountability Office, says insurgent attacks are on the increase. There were 2,500 attacks in December 2005, up from just 1,000 the previous March, the report finds.

"We have had increased [electricity] generation, but we have very limited transmission around the country, because the transmission lines keep getting hit," says Liberi.

DOJ_NMG_0014038

Shamari, the carpenter, agrees that the situation is getting worse. Power shortage aside, business is down in general because, as the economy suffers, he says, fewer people are getting married. Newlyweds seeking to furnish their new homes are his main clients. Shamari used to get four major orders a month, he says, and now he gets only one.

He pushes a small power saw through a plank of wood and speaks sadly through the sawdust spray. "I'm thinking of just selling my business."

Danger? Drabness? No Date? Iraqis Find An Outlet Online (NYT)

By Robert F. Worth

The New York Times, February 10, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq, Feb. 9 — On a recent rainy afternoon, Ahmad Nader Ali sat in a booth at the ShreifiNet Cafe, sending instant messages to his brother who lives in Finland on one screen window and his fiancée, Nour, on another. A tiny Web camera sat atop the computer, beaming live images of him to Nour's home screen across Baghdad.

"Because of the situation, I'm not able to go and see her often," said Mr. Ali, a confident 20-year-old with slicked-back hair who runs a men's clothing store. "Everybody does it like this."

Nearby, partially hidden by wood-paneled booths, were a dozen other young men staring intently at their screens, most chatting simultaneously on three or four different e-mail accounts. All of them were paying 1,500 dinars an hour — about a dollar — to escape the gray confines of Baghdad's blasted walls for a while. Two heavyset men sat on a black faux-leather couch by the door, keeping a watchful eye on the street.

Three years ago, the Internet was virtually unknown in Iraq. Today, Baghdad has dozens of Internet cafes like ShreifiNet, which consists of three sparely decorated rooms with a total of 34 computers and a satellite dish on the roof. Most of the cafes also transmit wireless services to home Internet users in the surrounding area for a monthly fee; in parts of central Baghdad there are about 20 overlapping wireless networks.

The universal hunger to get online has made computer and Web services one of the few bright spots in Iraq's stagnant economy. On Sinaa Street, the two-lane thoroughfare in central Baghdad lined with computer and software stores, business is brisk. Companies that install wireless networks and satellite dishes are also thriving, despite the irritation caused by frequent power failures. So are many Internet cafes.

"I have to work to persuade people to come to my clothes shop," Mr. Ali said. "But you don't need to advertise to tempt customers to come in here."

Few people on earth have more incentive to communicate online (and indoors) than Iraqis, who risk their lives every time they go out for a quart of milk. The Internet can also be a way to get around the rising Islamization of everyday life. Young people caught flirting on the street even in Baghdad are sometimes chastised or even beaten by self-proclaimed Islamists, but no one can stop them on the Web. "If you look at the chat rooms, it is mostly young guys and girls," Mr. Ali said.

But Islamists and insurgents have their own uses for the Web. Diatribes against the American presence, along with detailed bomb-making instructions and tributes to the latest suicide bombers, appear regularly on Iraqi chat rooms and Web sites.

The total number of people using the Internet, like most Iraqi statistics, is partly guesswork. There are 215,000 subscribers on the state-owned Internet company, but that does not include the Internet cafe users, who are probably far more numerous, said Eva Wohn, a legal adviser to Iraq's Communications Ministry on telecommunications issues.

After their long isolation, young Iraqis are quickly erasing their technological gap with the West. In some ways they are even further along. Thanks to the absence of piracy laws here, many Iraqis use software that is not yet in common use in the United States. The new Microsoft Vista operating system, for instance, scheduled to be introduced for commercial use in late 2006, is already widely used here.

Large numbers of Iraqis can be found on the dozens of Arabic chat rooms listed on Yahoo Messenger, a popular platform for instant messaging. There are dozens of Iraqi Web logs, ranging from political sites, to forums for young people seeking spouses, to "hashasha" (www.7shasha.com), a comic site whose name means "hashish smokers." Angry sectarian conversations often break out, especially in Arab Chat Room 12, which is popular with Iraqi Shiites (the number signifies the 12 great imams of Shiite Islam).

Like many Internet cafe users, Mr. Ali has no access at home. He lives in Doura, a dangerous area where there are almost no Internet cafes and few wireless networks. He could get service on a land line, but he works long hours and prefers to do all his e-mailing at ShreifiNet, which is not far from his clothing store.

That calculus has been good for Ramzi al-Shreifi, 32, the owner of ShreifiNet. He took over the lease of his two-story building just off Karrada Street from a travel agency in the fall of 2003 and renovated it, painting the two columns out front bright yellow. A Kurdish company installed a satellite dish on the roof, charging him $2,600 a month for his service. He also mounted wireless transmission equipment, and now has 25 home customers, paying $50 each to use his signal. In the past year, his gross income has grown by half, to about $6,000 a month, Mr. Shreifi said, a tidy sum by Iraqi retail standards.

DOJ_NMG_0014039

"It would have been more, but there is competition," he added.

There are about 15 Internet cafes in Inner Karrada, a busy commercial area that is one of Baghdad's safer neighborhoods, Mr. Shreifi said. His cafe is open until 10 p.m., and would stay open all night if not for the curfew imposed by the Iraqi government, he said. He has been luckier than many Baghdad business owners: no robberies, no violence.

Mr. Shreifi has plans to expand. There are hundreds of people in the area who would like to get wireless service. The problem, he said, is that there are no rules governing the Internet: anyone with enough money for a satellite can transmit to whomever he or she like, and some do not require passwords so that many people can log on free. Mr. Shreifi also suspects that his signal is sometimes affected by American military officials in the Green Zone who may be jamming frequencies used by insurgents. Still, by Baghdad standards, it is a good living.

"Most days this place is almost full," Mr. Shreifi said.

Kidnapped U.S. Journalist Pleads, 'Just Do Whatever They Want' (NYT/AP)

The New York Times, February 10, 2006

KUWAIT, Feb. 9 (AP) — The kidnapped American journalist Jill Carroll appeared in a video shown Thursday on a private Kuwaiti television channel, appealing for her supporters to do whatever was necessary to win her release and saying, "There is a very short time."

Ms. Carroll was shown in the black-and-white video wearing an Islamic head scarf and sitting on a chair in front of a wall with a large floral design. She spoke to the camera in a firm voice without weeping, as she had done on a previous video.

"I am here," she said. "I am fine. Please just do whatever they want, give them whatever they want as quickly as possible."

Ms. Carroll said that she was speaking on Feb. 2. "There is a very short time," she said. "Please do it fast. That's all."

The 22-second video was broadcast on Al Rai TV, a private Kuwaiti channel. The video was delivered to Al Rai's Baghdad office and was shown in its entirety, said Hani al-Srougi, an editor at the station. He said it was accompanied by a letter written by Ms. Carroll.

The newscaster said the station would give the letter to authorities but did not specify whether he meant Kuwaiti or American officials.

In Baghdad, Dennis Culkin, a spokesman for the United States Embassy, said American officials did not comment on such tapes before they had been authenticated.

Armed men abducted Ms. Carroll, a 28-year-old freelance journalist, on Jan. 7 in Baghdad. The kidnappers set a deadline of Jan. 20 and threatened to kill Ms. Carroll if their demands were not met.

Kidnapped U.S. Reporter Appears In New Video (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, February 10, 2006

BAGHDAD — Looking healthy and composed, the American reporter kidnapped in Iraq last month appeared on a new videotape aired on an Arab-language television channel today, urging supporters to do whatever necessary to obtain her release.

Jill Carroll, the 28-year-old Christian Science Monitor freelancer captured by an unknown armed group in Baghdad on Jan. 7 as she left the offices of a Sunni Arab politician, asked an unnamed third party to quickly comply with the kidnappers' demands.

"I am here," said Carroll, a Michigan native who first arrived in Iraq shortly after the 2003 U.S.-led invasion and stayed through the insurgency.

"I am fine. Please just do whatever they want, give them whatever they want as quickly as possible."

She punctuated her 22-second message, which she said was recorded on Feb. 2, with a note of urgency. "There is a very short time," she said. "Please do it fast. That's all."

The tape, with references to ongoing negotiations, suggested that Carroll has not fallen into the hands of the most brutal category of kidnappers in Iraq, who have previously beheaded western hostages for political ends.

Still, it remains unclear what the kidnappers still demand in return for Carroll's release. In a tape that aired Jan. 30, Carroll called for the release of all female prisoners being held by U.S. and Iraqi forces.

U.S. Maj. Gen. Rick Lynch told reporters today that American and Iraqi officials plan to release about 450 prisoners from detention centers sometime next week. He said he did not know whether any of them were women.

U.S. military officials say insurgents have turned to kidnapping for ransom to fund operations and have detected a slight rise in the number of kidnappings reported to Iraqi crime hotlines in the past few weeks.

DOJ_NMG_0014040

"We're watching closely trends and we are concerned about the number of kidnappings we're seeing," said Lynch. "A lot of them are conducted by criminal gangs."

Today's video was broadcast on the privately owned Al Rai, a Kuwaiti satellite channel known more for entertainment than news. It showed Carroll wearing a greenish head scarf and sitting or standing before a pink backdrop, with a flower-like design.

In the video, Carroll made reference to an apparent earlier communication between her abductors and negotiators, saying the latest video was made to confirm a letter she had apparently sent to prove she was with the mujahedin, a reference to the Sunni Arab insurgency.

"I sent you a letter written by my hand, but you wanted more evidence," she said in the tape.

Western news agencies quoted officials from Al Rai saying the tape was delivered to the television station earlier today.

In New Video, Abducted U.S. Reporter Pleads For Quick Action (WP)

By Nelson Hernandez

The Washington Post, February 10, 2006

BAGHDAD, Feb. 9 -- In the third video of her to be aired since she was abducted here last month, American journalist Jill Carroll asked that authorities meet her captors' demands "as quickly as possible" because "there is a very short time."

The 22-second video, which appeared on the private Kuwaiti television station al-Rai on Thursday night, showed Carroll wearing a Muslim veil and sitting before a tapestry depicting a large flower. In a composed voice, she said that the video was being filmed on Feb. 2 and that she had sent one letter in her own hand and was sending another "to prove I am with the mujaheddin," Arabic for holy warriors.

"I'm here. I'm fine," she says. "Please just do whatever they want. Give them whatever they want as quickly as possible. There is a very short time. Please do it fast. That is all."

Carroll, 28, a freelance journalist working for the Christian Science Monitor, was kidnapped in Baghdad on Jan. 7 by gunmen who also killed her interpreter, Allan Enwiyah, 32. Ten days later, her captors, who call themselves the Vengeance Brigades, released a video in which they threatened to kill her in three days unless U.S. authorities released all female detainees in Iraq. A second video, aired on Jan. 30, showed Carroll in a head scarf, sobbing.

Both videos showed Carroll speaking, but neither had sound. The video that aired Thursday had sound but did not include the Vengeance Brigades' logo.

The content of the letters Carroll spoke of is unknown. In the broadcast, the newscaster said that one letter Carroll had written would be handed over to authorities. The station said it would not broadcast the letter's contents, according to the Associated Press.

The editor of the Christian Science Monitor, Richard Bergenheim, said in a statement: "It is always difficult to see someone speaking under coercion and under these circumstances. We are seeking more information about the letter that Jill refers to in the video. We remain in constant contact with Jill's family and are still doing everything possible to obtain Jill's release."

Carroll's family said they were "hopeful and grateful to all those working on Jill's behalf."

A 'Half Full' Afghan Army (CSM)

By Scott Baldauf

The Christian Science Monitor, February 10, 2006

KABUL, AFGHANISTAN - Sgt. Mohammad Reza walks silently on a ridge, watching his platoon conduct a reconnaissance patrol in a gully below. His men are all recent recruits. Some are former militia fighters who have seen many battles but little professional training. Others are as green as the helmets on their head.

"They don't know about organized war, they just know about guerrilla warfare," says Sergeant Reza, himself a former militiaman from Bamian Province.

Increasingly, coalition forces are turning over some of the training to Afghan sergeants like Reza. Fresh recruits learn the basics of how to take protective measures and launch counterattacks, skills that will help them hold their positions in a fight.

How well they absorb these lesson will be crucial for Afghanistan's ability to stand on its own two feet. Now half-way toward the goal of a 70,000-man force, the Afghan National Army is reaching a crucial testing period: The US military is preparing to draw down its forces in Afghanistan, NATO forces are moving in, and security conditions along the southern border with Pakistan are worsening.

"Those who are in the military know how difficult it is to make an army self-sufficient, and the Afghan National Army has just been formed, so it will take some work," says Gen. Zaher Azimi, a Ministry of Defense spokesman. "If we are fighting alongside foreign forces, we have the capability to fight against guerrillas, but we can't do it alone."

DOJ_NMG_0014041

That means that the international presence in Afghanistan will remain crucial for the foreseeable future. The growing number of ANA brigades in the volatile south will soon by joined by NATO forces who are rotating in to take over the responsibility for Afghanistan's security after the US military draws down 3,000 of its troops this spring.

US, French, British, Rumanian, and even Mongolian trainers will continue to train ANA troops at the Kabul Military Training Center (KMTC), just outside Kabul, and a growing number of Afghan officers will enter military exchange programs at military bases in the US and other coalition countries.

Yet four years after the Taliban's ouster, there are growing expectations that the ANA will pick up more of the slack in defending the country and providing the sort of security that allows Afghans to trust in their own government and their future.

"The fortunate thing about Afghans is that they have a feeling that our army is able to defend the country at a high level of proficiency," says Gen. Rahmatullah Raufi, the corps commander in Kandahar. "But when we talk of defending our country on our own, I confess, we can't do it ourselves. We are a poor country."

Eighty percent of the soldiers in his corps are illiterate, General Raufi says. Fifty percent of the officers are illiterate. Only 20 percent of his soldiers have a professional knowledge of how to serve in an army; the rest are former militia fighters or young recruits. "No one will tell you this, but even if the president sahib asks me, I will tell him this myself.

While the ANA appears to be on course in reaching its goal of a 70,000-man army by 2009, the army also realizes that it needs to improve the quality of its soldiers rather than merely put warm bodies out into uniform.

"Previously, there was a need to produce large numbers of soldiers, but now we focus on quality instead of quantity," says Brig. Gen. Mohammad Amin Wardak, commander of the training center in Kabul.

At first, ANA soldiers were given a brisk two-month course and then sent out to face Taliban insurgents. But now, the training at KMTC is 15 weeks long, including six weeks of basic training, and the rest in Advanced Infantry Training, where soldiers will be given specialities, from rifleman to artillery to more elite commando duty.

Upon graduation, ANA soldiers earn $70 a month, double the median monthly income nationwide. Officers earn more, depending on their rank.

Sgt. Steve Bromfield, a Canadian military trainer from the 2nd Field Engineer Regiment, is just ending a six month stint guiding the live-fire exercises at KMTC. He says the recruits he trains are eager to learn. In two weeks, he helps break some bad habits from former militia fighters like spraying gunfire instead of making every shot count. "Like everyone, if you give them bullets, they want to shoot," he laughs. "It's the same in the Canadian Army."

Up on a plateau, the first platoon of Afghan soldiers are advancing, team by team toward a target, firing their Kalashnikovs at paper targets. Down below in a dry streambed, a second platoon runs into position, and climbs up a ridge to attack the paper enemy on its flank. Behind, a reserve platoon forms a defensive circle, and prepares to respond to any enemy counterattack.

"This is the most vulnerable time for a platoon," says Sgt. Maj. Rick Dumas, a Canadian trainer, enjoying the moment. "They're getting tired, they are consolidating their forces, preparing for a counterattack."

Behind Sergeant Dumas, some overeager Afghans from the reserve platoon rush through a group of foreign trainers and journalists with their guns at the ready, before being called back by their sergeant.

While the ANA generally enjoys a good local reputation, some Afghans criticize Army leadership for packing the ranks with members of some ethnic groups, and not others.

"I don't want to call this army the Afghan National Army," said Najibullah Kabuli, a parliamentarian during an impassioned outburst in the lower house last week. "I want to call it the Army of National Rivalries. They are asking for exact numbers of Tajiks, exact numbers of Pashtuns."

ANA officials counter that ethnicity is not a criteria for selecting foot soldiers, although there is an attempt to maintain an ethnic balance among officers to reflect the country's ethnic mix.

General Raufi says ethnicity is just one of those issues that will take time to sort out in Afghanistan. "A national army should serve the people, not one ethnic group, not one person, or one province," he says. "Your army is almost 250 years old. Maybe you had those problems in your country's history too."

NATO Renews Afghan Commitment After Cartoon Storm (REU-Y2)

By Mark John And Will Dunham

Reuters, February 10, 2006

NATO defense chiefs pledged on Thursday to expand alliance peacekeeping in Afghanistan despite attacks on their troops triggered by the storm over cartoons depicting the Prophet Mohammad.

Protesters angered by the cartoons tried to storm a NATO base housing Norwegian troops on Tuesday in one of the worst outbreaks of violence prompted by the controversy. Afghan police opened fire, killing four.

DOJ_NMG_0014042

Defense ministers meeting in Italy agreed to check security measures in place for their 9,000-strong International Security Assistance Force (ISAF) mission in Afghanistan, but insisted its expansion to 16,000 troops this year would go ahead as planned.

"There is full commitment to take forward the ISAF expansion to the south this summer. That commitment will not waver," NATO Secretary-General Jaap de Hoop Scheffer told a news briefing after a first day of talks in the Sicilian resort of Taormina.

"The key words today were solidarity ... but also the need for dialogue, respect for others and the need for de-escalation," he added. NATO ministers will meet counterparts from Israel and six Arab countries on Friday for long-scheduled talks on defense reform that will nonetheless touch on the cartoons controversy.

British troops in Afghanistan were rushed to the northwest city of Maymana on Tuesday to secure the airfield after crowds attacked a NATO base of Norwegian troops with guns and grenades.

The Norwegians fired teargas while NATO F-16 jets flew over Maymana in a show of force before the violence died down.

Aside from calling for new checks on whether existing ISAF security measures were sufficient, ministers agreed the events showed the urgent need for well-trained Afghan security forces.

"The force protection worked, but there was a feeling we want to ensure that we are well prepared. There was an emphasis on training the Afghans," said one observer at the talks.

DENMARK STICKS TO MISSION

The upsurge in tension comes as NATO readies to expand ISAF -- already in the north, west and the capital Kabul -- to the more volatile southern Afghanistan and ultimately the east.

NATO would then manage all international peacekeeping in the country, allowing the larger U.S.-led coalition to reduce troop numbers and focus on hunting the Taliban and al Qaeda remnants seen as behind the insurgency.

"That's the plan. And they're en route toward that," U.S. Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld told reporters traveling with him to the meeting.

Rumsfeld gave no fixed timetable for when NATO was expected to take over peacekeeping in the east, saying only that the plan was for it to happen "at some point either this year or next."

U.S. and NATO officials have in the past expressed firm hopes that ISAF would take over all peacekeeping by end-2006.

But the move to the south, which was initially intended for early 2006, is now seen some time in the middle of the year after hesitation among some allies to come forward with troops.

After much debate, Dutch lawmakers finally voted this month in favor of sending up to 1,400 troops to Afghanistan to join the deployment into the south. Britain and Canada are the two other main contributors, taking ISAF strength up to 15,000.

Denmark -- a focus of protests because a Danish newspaper published the cartoons first -- is to contribute some 300 troops to the expansion. De Hoop Scheffer said there had been no discussion in Taormina of it pulling out of the mission.

Asked if he thought the row over the cartoons complicated NATO's plans, British Defense Secretary John Reid replied: "No. Naturally we regret it. We are there to help the Afghan people."

Rumsfeld Backs NATO Taking Over Operations (WT/AP)

By Robert Burns

The Washington Times, February 10, 2006

TAORMINA, Italy -- The United States favors NATO eventually taking full command of the international military effort to stabilize Afghanistan, but that will not include a separate American-led counterterrorism mission against al Qaeda, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld said yesterday.

Mr. Rumsfeld arrived in this Sicilian seaside resort to attend two days of talks with North Atlantic Treaty Organization defense ministers, who are committed to expanding the alliance's military mission in Afghanistan.

NATO is expected to take over the security mission in southern Afghanistan by this summer, and Mr. Rumsfeld said he supported the goal of eventually having NATO in charge of the coalition effort across the country.

"I'm very comfortable with it," he told reporters aboard his plane en route from Washington.

He drew the line, however, at the counterterrorism mission, which is being performed mainly by U.S. special operations forces such as Army Special Forces and Navy SEAL commandos.

They have been searching for al Qaeda fighters since the early days of the U.S. invasion in 2001, when al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden fled into the mountainous Tora Bora area and then possibly into neighboring Pakistan.

NATO has been extending its security forces into northern and western Afghanistan to help provide enough security to enable humanitarian and reconstruction projects to proceed. It also has helped train the Afghan national army, but it has left much of the direct combat action to American forces.

DOJ_NMG_0014043

Some NATO members have chosen to contribute to the peacekeeping mission in Kosovo instead of Afghanistan, where the dangers are greater. Mr. Rumsfeld said that in light of those choices, he would like to see U.S. peacekeepers in Kosovo be withdrawn faster than those of other allied nations.

"We would kind of like to see if it's possible for us to have a somewhat disproportionate reduction when the reductions take place," he said.

The United States has about 1,700 peacekeeping troops in Kosovo.

Mr. Rumsfeld said he would meet separately today with his Russian counterpart, Sergei Ivanov. Russia is not a NATO member but holds regular talks with the alliance through a NATO-Russia Council set up in 2002.

The U.S. government has been critical of Russia's willingness to assist Iran in its nuclear program, and last fall Russia signed a new agreement to sell short-range surface-to-air missiles to Iran.

Mr. Rumsfeld said he expected the issue of Iran's nuclear program to arise during the NATO conference, but that it was primarily a matter for allied diplomats, not defense chiefs.

Sectarian Strife Kills 31 In Pakistan And 6 In Afghanistan (NYT)

By Carlotta Gall And Salman Masood

The New York Times, February 10, 2006

LASHKAR GAH, Afghanistan, Feb. 9 — Violence exploded in Pakistan and Afghanistan on Thursday during processions by Shiite Muslim worshipers observing the holy day of Ashura. A suicide bombing in northwestern Pakistan killed 23 people and wounded dozens more.

After the bombing, in the town of Hangu, angry Shiites rampaged through the streets, setting fire to stores, government buildings and vehicles. By the end of the day the death toll had grown to 31, local officials said.

In western Afghanistan, fighting broke out between Shiite and Sunni Muslims during a procession of Shiite worshipers in Herat, the country's third-largest city. The fighting killed 6 people and wounded 120 others, said a senior military official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to discuss the matter.

Sectarian attacks, including suicide attacks on mosques, have occurred in Pakistan, but such a clash was unexpected in the traditionally tolerant Afghan city of Herat. The violence there was another blow in a country that has been struggling with increasing terrorist attacks, local insurgencies and angry demonstrations in recent days over the publication of satirical cartoons of the Prophet Muhammad.

Pakistani troops moved into Hangu, which is 125 miles southwest of the capital, Islamabad, after the bombing and the rampage.

"There was panic everywhere," The Associated Press quoted a witness, Muhammad Jamil, 25, as saying. "Some people rushed to the injured and dead bodies. Others went to houses and took out weapons and knives and kerosene oil and started setting fire to shops, destroying everything."

There were unconfirmed reports that angry Shiites had fired on a vehicle, killing four people. News accounts reported a thick layer of smoke hanging above the town as the violence intensified.

Leading Shiite and Sunni religious leaders condemned the attack as an attempt to create chaos in Pakistan. No one had claimed responsibility for the attack by Thursday evening, but Sheik Rashid Ahmed, the information minister, confirmed in a telephone interview that a suicide bomber had carried out the attack.

"This was a blast," he said. "It was a suicide bomber." He would not say who he thought was behind the attack. "Such things take time," he said of the investigation.

Riffat Pasha, the police chief of North-West Frontier Province, told local news organizations: "This is an act of terrorism. There were elaborate security arrangements, but it is difficult to prevent such suicide attacks."

Pakistan has been troubled by tensions between the Shiite minority and the Deobandi sect, a puritanical branch of Sunni Islam to which some of the country's jihadist political factions belong. Violence between the two groups has killed more than 1,200 people in the last 15 years. Sunnis make up 77 percent of the country's population of 150 million, and Shiites 20 percent.

In Afghanistan the procession of hundreds of Shiites in Herat commemorating the martyrdom of Imam Hussein, the grandson of the Prophet Muhammad, turned violent, with Sunnis and Shiites fighting with sticks, stones and knives, and then guns and grenades. Dr. Abdul Jalil, who was on duty at the city's main civilian hospital, said the staff had treated wounds from shootings, stabbing and beatings.

By the end of the afternoon the main Shiite mosque in the northern part of the city and nearby shops were on fire, said Muhammad Rafiq Shahir, leader of a group of socially minded professionals called the Experts Council. He said he had seen a Shiite throw a grenade into a crowd, wounding about 15 people.

DOJ_NMG_0014044

Mr. Shahir, a Sunni, blamed the government for setting the stage for violence by appointing a Shiite last year as governor of Herat Province, which has a Sunni majority. Tensions remain between ethnic groups in Afghanistan from years of factional fighting.

The governor, who is known to have close ties to Iran, had aggravated the latent tensions, Mr. Shahir contended, in part by allowing a larger procession for Ashura this year than usual. Mr. Shahir also accused Shiites of provocations, saying some of them entered the main Sunni mosque wearing shoes last year, and he accused Shiites of a knife attack against the son of a Sunni cleric on Wednesday.

Afghan soldiers and police officers were deployed, and by evening the city was calm, said Gen. Zaher Azimi, the Defense Ministry spokesman. The Afghan government sent a delegation from the capital, Kabul, to negotiate, headed by a former governor of Herat, the powerful Tajik commander Ismail Khan, who was ousted from office in 2004.

Shiites Targeted On Deadly Holy Day (WP)

By Griff Witte

The Washington Post, February 10, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan, Feb. 9 -- At least 34 people were killed and more than 130 injured Thursday in Afghanistan and Pakistan in sectarian violence that coincided with a Muslim holy day especially revered among Shiites.

In Iraq, the observance of the Ashura holiday was made remarkable by the absence of violence for the first time since the overthrow of President Saddam Hussein.

The day's deadliest attacks occurred in Pakistan's North-West Frontier province, where hundreds of Shiites in the town of Hangu had turned out to participate in a procession marking Ashura, which commemorates the martyrdom in 680 of Hussein, grandson of the prophet Muhammad. Before sermons by local clerics could begin, at least one suicide bomber, who may have been disguised as a mourner, detonated his explosives, killing at least 27 people and wounding about 30, said an Interior Ministry official, Brig. Javed Cheema.

Later in the day, it was reported that gunmen had opened fire on a bus just outside the town, killing four.

"This was a blatant act of terrorism," Cheema said in a telephone interview from Islamabad. He noted that no group had asserted responsibility but that sectarian tensions have historically been high in the region. In the past few years, Shiites in Pakistan -- who are a minority -- have been the victims of frequent attacks thought to have been perpetrated by Sunni Muslim groups.

In Afghanistan, where about 80 percent of the population is Sunni and instances of sectarian violence are far less common, at least three people were killed and more than 100 injured when a clash erupted between Shiites and Sunnis in the western city of Herat.

Herat's police chief, Mohammed Ayoub Salangi, said the fight began when approximately 300 young Sunni demonstrators entered a Shiite mosque and accused worshipers gathered for Ashura services of burning a piece of cloth emblazoned with the name of Islam's second caliph, Umar, an important figure in the Sunni faith.

A brawl ensued, with both sides using sticks, rocks and guns. Grenades were also reportedly thrown.

Two hundred Afghan troops were deployed, and security forces fired shots into the air in a bid to quell the violence.

Salangi said authorities were investigating how the Sunni demonstrators were able to organize so quickly. "There must be the hands of others behind this," he said.

Samina Ahmed, South Asia project director for the International Crisis Group, blamed the violence in Afghanistan and Pakistan on governments that have not done enough to curb Sunni groups that target their fellow Muslims. "It's not just enough to take action against al Qaeda," Ahmed said in a telephone interview from Pakistan. "It's just as important to take the same kind of action against sectarian terrorists."

Ahmed noted that while there have been more sectarian attacks in Pakistan than in Afghanistan in recent years, the Hazara ethnic group -- which is predominantly Shiite -- has faced persecution in Afghanistan for centuries. "It's nothing new for Afghanistan," she said. "It's always under the surface."

President Hamid Karzai and religious leaders in Afghanistan appealed for calm, and a delegation of clerics was dispatched from Kabul on Thursday night to try to soothe tensions in Herat.

"Our God is the same. Our Koran is the same. And our religion is the same," said Mulwi Enayatullah Balegh, a Sunni leader who delivers sermons at one of Kabul's largest mosques. "There are some minor differences to be discussed with the Shias, but they are not things that can be resolved through this kind of fighting."

The sectarian violence came after three consecutive days of deadly riots in Afghanistan arising from the publication in European newspapers of cartoons of the prophet Muhammad. But the cartoon uproar was not thought to have played a direct role in Thursday's violence in Herat.

DOJ_NMG_0014045

There were no reported demonstrations related to the cartoons in Afghanistan on Thursday, a day after religious leaders called for an end to the protests, saying they were being hijacked by extremists.

However, security in the capital, Kabul, was especially tight, and authorities here were bracing for the possibility of more protests Friday.

By contrast, not a single attack on Shiite worshipers marred the day in Iraq. Ashura was banned in Iraq during Saddam Hussein's reign. Since the observance was resumed in 2004, the holy day has been jolted by bombings that have killed hundreds.

In 2005, suicide bombers killed at least 60 people in the streets and in Shiite mosques. The year before, attacks killed at least 170 people. The only attack reported Thursday was a suicide car bombing in New Ubaydi, in Sunni-dominated western Iraq, which killed three Iraqi civilians and two Iraqi soldiers.

Maj. Gen. Rick Lynch, the spokesman for U.S. military in Iraq, said the relative tranquility was "a tribute to the Iraqi security forces." He said Iraqi soldiers and police had imposed tight security throughout the country, particularly in Karbala, the focal point of the holy day. In a raid this week, Iraqi troops detained 19 suspects who were apparently planning to conduct suicide attacks on Ashura observances, Lynch said.

In Karbala, the provincial governor, Aqeel Khazaly, said that the government had forbidden outside vehicles to enter the city and that the streets were covered by "very strict" security consisting of public order police, special police commandos and Iraqi army soldiers.

"This was a great accomplishment and a triumph over terrorists and terrorism," said Ali Kassim, a fisherman from the southeastern town of Amarah who had made the pilgrimage to Karbala.

Correspondent Nelson Hernandez in Baghdad and special correspondents Saad Sarhan in Karbala and Javed Hamdard in Kabul contributed to this report.

Peace Prevails In Iraq As Shiites Observe Holy Day (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi And Richard Boudreaux, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, February 10, 2006

Unlike in previous years marred by bombings, pilgrims throng shrines across the country in relative calm. U.S. cites improved security.

BAGHDAD — For the first time since the March 2003 U.S.-led invasion, hundreds of thousands of Iraqi Shiites on Thursday marked their most important religious holiday without suffering a terrorist attack.

Waving red, green and yellow flags and some beating themselves with chains, members of Iraq's majority Shiite community gathered around major shrines for Ashura, which commemorates the martyrdom of Imam Hussein, grandson of the prophet Muhammad. As many as 2 million Shiite pilgrims from Iraq and abroad crowded the city of Karbala, where Hussein is buried, security officials reported.

Suicide bombers killed 180 people in 2004, and 50 people last year, despite heightened security. Observation of the holiday was suppressed under Saddam Hussein, a Sunni Muslim.

A U.S. military official attributed the relatively peaceful proceedings to better-trained Iraqi security forces; Sunni Arab leaders said insurgents refrained from attacks for fear of sabotaging negotiations for power-sharing in the new government. Sunni Arabs won a combined 55 parliamentary seats in the Dec. 15 elections, whereas the Shiite-dominated United Iraqi Alliance captured 128 of the 275 seats.

Pilgrims marched carrying gold-domed replicas of the shrines, beating drums and chanting slogans in memory of Hussein. He was killed in the 7th century on the plains near Karbala by the Caliph Yazid in a succession battle that split Muslims into the Sunni and Shiite sects.

"By God, we will never forget you, Hussein!" the pilgrims chanted, as they swarmed the streets surrounding the shrines in Karbala, Najaf and Baghdad.

Pilgrims walked for days to Karbala, eating rice and taking shelter in tents set up along the route by well-wishers. Costumed men on horseback staged elaborate reenactments of Hussein's martyrdom in passion plays called taziyas. Fervent mourners beat themselves, some striking their heads with swords and drawing blood.

"Hussein is a symbol for us," said Mohammed Mehdi Rubayie, 33, a restaurant worker in the northern Baghdad suburb of Kadhimiya, home of an important Shiite shrine. "He fought for our religion, and he fought against oppression."

The Shiite-led government kept electricity on 24 hours a day in Najaf and Karbala for pilgrims, who arrived from Iran, Pakistan and Afghanistan as well as other parts of Iraq. One pilgrim was reported killed Thursday afternoon in a shooting in western Baghdad.

DOJ_NMG_0014046

A suicide bombing last month in Karbala killed dozens, raising sectarian tensions and hurting the bargaining position of the minority Sunni Arabs, who lead the insurgency. A Sunni tribal leader said rebels had agreed to halt attacks during Ashura.

"The activities of the resistance are at a halt now until we have a unity government," Osama Jadan, a leader of a western Iraqi tribe, said. "That's the information we have from the resistance."

U.S. officials said improved Iraqi security forces played a role in diminishing violence. U.S. and Iraqi forces raided a village southeast of Baghdad this week where insurgents were allegedly preparing to attack Ashura pilgrims. A spokesman for the border police in Najaf said his men caught a Turkish national who reportedly confessed that he and other foreigners were trying to sneak into Iraq to stage attacks during Ashura.

In Baghdad, U.S. military spokesman Army Maj. Gen. Rick Lynch said the experiences of 2004 and 2005 had taught Iraqi forces to impose vehicle bans and establish multiple security cordons around shrines in Karbala, Najaf and Kadhimiya.

"You think like the enemy," Lynch told reporters when asked about the relative calm this year. "The Iraqi government did detailed planning and preparation for Ashura." Still, he acknowledged that the number of insurgent attacks nationwide had not declined precipitously.

U.S. officials announced Thursday that a suicide bomber had killed two Iraqi soldiers and three civilians Wednesday at a joint U.S.-Iraqi checkpoint near the village of New Ubaidi.

In the northern city of Kirkuk, tensions rose over the killing Tuesday of several civilians by contract security guards stationed at a U.S. army base. American and Iraqi officials said they were conducting a joint investigation into the deaths.

The guards, working for the State Department, opened fire from two GMC sport utility vehicles, killing two Kurdish men in separate cars and wounding a third at a traffic circle north of Kirkuk, said Maj. Gen. Shirko Shakir, the city's police chief.

The number and nationality of the guards involved and the name of their company were not disclosed. Lt. Col. James Johnson, commander of the 2nd Battalion, 327th Infantry Regiment, said the guards were "under our control" while the investigation proceeded. In a written statement, he called the shooting "regrettable." The regiment is part of the Army's 101st Airborne Division, which is responsible for security in Kirkuk.

Angry relatives buried the two men and demanded that the killers be punished. Several Iraqi politicians demanded abolition of a law that grants immunity from prosecution to American and allied forces and private contractors working for them.

"There was nothing going on at the time of the shooting that could justify it," said Imad Hameed Ibrahim, whose uncle, Nizam Qadir, 25, was killed at the wheel of his taxi. "These foreigners do not care about the lives of Iraqis."

Special correspondents in Najaf and Kirkuk contributed to this report.

Odds Of Survival Improve For The U.S. Military's Best Friends (LAT)

By Chris Kraul, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, February 10, 2006

Bomb-sniffing dogs are now vital to the Iraq war effort, and the Army has improved its medical care for those severely wounded in combat.

BAGHDAD — Lt. Col. Randall Thompson knows his life has gone to the dogs. But that's probably a good thing for the Army, the canine corps and for him.

One of only six clinical veterinary surgeons in the U.S. military, Thompson works to save the lives of some of the military's most valued assets: bombsniffing dogs that have been severely wounded in combat. He arrived here in October to open Iraq's first urgent surgical care ward for canines.

Before Thompson's arrival, injured dogs were shipped to a U.S. base in Germany or to the United States for emergency medical treatment. At best, seriously wounded dogs were out of commission for weeks; at worst, they died during transport to a faraway veterinary facility.

The dogs' talent for sniffing out hidden explosive devices has become crucial to the war effort, so the command changed policy.

"It reached a buildup of dogs here and a concern level that said we had to do something to support these animals the best way possible," said Thompson, 46, a native of Savannah, Ga. Quicker medical care means the dogs return to duty sooner, he said. "Every day that we can keep a dog out on the line working is another day that a soldier or Marine is going to live because the dog was doing its job."

By uncovering tons of explosives that insurgents could otherwise use against coalition soldiers, the dogs have saved countless lives, said Col. Arnaldo Claudio, who as 18th Airborne Corps provost marshal commands all military police and dog handlers in Iraq. He declined to disclose the precise number of war dogs here.

DOJ_NMG_0014047

"The dogs weren't needed as much when [the war] started. But the threat has changed," he said, referring to insurgents' increasing use of hidden, remote-controlled bombs often fashioned from mortar and artillery shells and detonated by cellphones and pagers. The bombs cause the majority of casualties suffered by U.S.-led forces in Iraq.

Claudio said a bomb-sniffing dog probably saved his life in August when it alerted him and a handler to a roadside bomb at a traffic stop in northern Baghdad.

"We got out of there and the bomb exploded a few minutes later," Claudio said.

But the dogs and their handlers sometimes pay a steep price. Four-year-old Flapeur was receiving treatment at Thompson's clinic last month. The Belgian Malinois had taken a piece of shrapnel through the chest in a suicide bombing in the Sunni Triangle city of Ramadi days before. He was on crowd-control duty with two other dogs and their handlers when the bomber struck a line of police recruits.

Flapeur's handler, a Marine whom the military declined to identify, was also seriously wounded, as was a second handler. Both were airlifted to Germany for medical treatment. The third handler, Marine Sgt. Adam Cann, was killed in the bombing.

Flapeur and the other injured dogs were taken by helicopter to Baghdad's combat support hospital, just as severely wounded soldiers or Marines would be.

"We would never fly a dog in front of a human casualty. But when there isn't someone ahead of them, we'll fly them," Thompson said.

He and other vets narrowly saved Flapeur, the most severely wounded of the three canines, from dying of shock, blood loss and a collapsed lung. Had the bombing happened before Thompson's arrival, Flapeur almost certainly would have died.

Although the wound left a nasty-looking hole in his chest, Flapeur was alert and friendly after his treatment. He is expected to be back on duty in three months, as is his handler.

Cann's dog, Bruno, will go through training again with a new handler. The third dog, Kevin, is expected back on duty as soon as his handler recovers.

A professed dog lover, Thompson says caring for man's best friend is one of the military's best jobs. "How many of your other friends listen to you attentively, don't talk back and are always glad to be in your company?" Thompson said. He has owned dogs, mostly German shepherds, since he can remember, he said. He and his wife have a Labrador retriever and a Cairn terrier.

Most of the dogs used in bomb-detection operations are either German shepherds or Belgian Malinois; they have been trained to detect explosives and to chase down and detain suspects, Thompson said. Just the sight of them usually deters unruly crowds, however.

"It's the only weapon system we have that you can change your mind on after squeezing the trigger," Thompson said.

The military dogs here were bought almost exclusively in Europe, where the canines are bred for detection and tracking skills. Then they are sent to Lackland Air Force Base in San Antonio for training. Each dog goes through a six-month course to learn how to sense a dozen or more explosives and weapons.

Dogs that complete the training emerge "more reliable than any chip or software, high-tech machine or robot," Claudio said.

The training leaves the dogs with an uncanny ability to detect bombs whether underground, behind walls and aboard passing vehicles. The Air Force distributes dogs to all five branches of the armed forces and to the Transportation Security Administration.

After the Sept. 11 attacks, demand for dogs skyrocketed. Lackland now trains 300 animals a year, 40% more than before the attacks. But there still aren't enough to go around, said Tim Ori, director of operations at the 341st Training Squadron, the unit at Lackland that oversees dog and handler training.

"It is a challenge to fill the demand," said Air Force Capt. Greg Blaylock, an operations officer with the squadron. Dogs average eight years in active duty, and usually "they retire by being adopted out to former military working dog handlers," he said.

Thompson says he is thrilled to be here, both because of his love for dogs and because he has wanted to be near a combat zone ever since he joined the Army at 23 after getting his veterinary degree at University of Georgia. Later, the Army sent him for a three-year surgical residency at North Carolina State's veterinary school.

He was turned down for duty in Somalia and Operation Desert Storm, partly because his skills were needed elsewhere.

"I was frustrated about not getting proximity to a battlefield," Thompson said. "Now I don't think there is a more important job for a veterinarian anywhere in the Army than they one I have here right now."

DOJ_NMG_0014048

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

DoJ Warns AIG To Comply With Settlement (FT)

By Andrew Parker

Financial Times, February 10, 2006

American International Group, the world's biggest insurance company, broke the law after entering into transactions that wrongly boosted its reserves and hid underwriting losses, US prosecutors said on Thursday.

The Department of Justice said AIG "violated federal criminal law" in connection with misleading financial statements issued by the company.

If AIG or any of its employees fail to abide by settlements announced on Thursday with federal authorities, the Justice department warned it could prosecute the company. AIG agreed to pay $1.64bn to federal and state authorities to resolve allegations of accounting abuses and other impropriety. It represents one of the largest settlements involving a public company.

The Justice department said AIG improperly boosted its reserves by $500m in 2000 and 2001 through "sham transactions" with General Re, the reinsurance subsidiary of Warren Buffett's Berkshire Hathaway group.

Although it did not name the individuals who orchestrated the transactions, the Justice department said "high-level executives" at AIG were involved.

It also said AIG hid $200m of underwriting losses in 2000 by improperly converting them into "investment losses" and transferring them to Capco, an offshore reinsurance company.

Under an agreement between AIG and the Justice department, the company accepted responsibility for the actions of its employees in the General Re and Capco transactions.

The Justice department said given AIG's co-operation with its investigation into alleged wrongdoing, and the company's commitment to a settlement with the Securities and Exchange Commission, it would not prosecute for the transactions with General Re and Capco.

However, the Justice department added: "AIG understands and agrees that if AIG or any of its employees, officers and directors fail to comply with, or violate, any provision of this agreement, the department can prosecute AIG for crimes committed by and through its employees related to the AIG/General Re or Capco transactions."

AIG will pay $25m under its agreement with the Justice department, which last week issued criminal charges against one former executive at the company. AIG will pay $800m to the SEC following its investigation into alleged accounting abuses at the company. AIG neither admitted nor denied the SEC's allegations of wrongdoing.

AIG will pay $819m to state authorities to cover alleged bid rigging and under payment of taxes. Martin Sullivan, AIG's chief executive, said the settlements were "a major step forward".

AIG To Pay $1.64 Billion To Settle Charges (AP-Y2)

By Eileen Alt Powell, Ap Business Writer

AP2, February 10, 2006

American International Group Inc., one of the world's largest insurance companies, has agreed to pay $1.64 billion to resolve allegations that it used deceptive accounting practices to mislead investors and regulatory agencies.

The deal — believed to be the biggest concluded by regulators with a single company — also requires the New York-based firm to adopt changes in its business practices that will ensure proper accounting procedures in the future.

AIG said in a statement that the settlement was approved by its board "in the best interest of the company."

The pact announced Thursday settles a civil lawsuit filed last May by New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer with backing from the New York State Insurance Department and the U.S. Justice Department. The Securities and Exchange Commission, which also worked with Spitzer on the investigation, filed and settled allegations of accounting fraud with the company simultaneously.

The settlement does not cover Maurice "Hank" Greenberg, the company's former chairman and chief executive who was named in the suit but who has pledged to fight it in court.

While acknowledging the civil misconduct and facing a huge fine, AIG at the same time escapes the threat that a criminal case could have been brought.

The Justice Department said that AIG's agreement spares the company criminal prosecution in exchange for its cooperation with the ongoing federal criminal investigation.

Shareholders welcomed the announcement, sending AIG shares up 74 cents, or 1.1 percent, to close at $67.12 Thursday on the New York Stock Exchange.

DOJ_NMG_0014049

AIG said that under the settlement it will pay $800 million for investors who were deceived by AIG's accounting tactics, including a $100 million penalty to the SEC. In addition, it will pay $375 million to AIG policyholders, $344 million to states harmed by AIG's practices from 1986 to 1995 involving state workers' compensation funds, and fines of $100 million to the state of New York and $25 million to the U.S. Justice Department.

AIG said it would take a $1.15 billion after-tax charge in its upcoming fourth-quarter earnings report to cover the settlement. It also announced that it would take a $1.1 billion after-tax charge to increase its reserves to reflect the completion of a recently concluded internal risk study.

AIG said that as part of the deal, it also has agreed "to retain for a period of three years an independent consultant who will conduct a review" of the company's accounting and internal controls.

Donald Light, senior insurance analyst with Celent, a Boston-based research and consulting company, said the settlement "means AIG's board and management is off the hook for anything worse ... such as a criminal case."

He added: "They're paying a lot of money for that, but AIG is huge and this amounts to less than 2 percent of shareholders' equity."

Spitzer told The Associated Press in an interview, "This is a company that didn't have to cheat. But once they began, they found it hard to stop. And like an addict, they grew dependent on financial gamesmanship that could ultimately destroy the company."

He said that the new business practices AIG was adopting would improve the market for property and casualty insurance in the United States by creating "a new level of transparency in the market that all consumers will benefit from.

The SEC's enforcement director, Linda Thomsen, noted that the investigation looked at the entire industry and centered on misuse of specialized insurance vehicles, such as reinsurance.

"While this settlement concludes our investigation of AIG, our investigation continues with respect to others who may have participated in AIG's securities-laws violations," she said.

The settlement with AIG exceeds many of the fines the SEC imposed following a wave of corporate scandals in 2002, including civil fines and restitution of $750 million for WorldCom Inc., $715 million for Adelphia Communications Corp. and $300 million for Time Warner Inc.

It also surpasses the $850 million settlement Spitzer reached last year with New York-based Marsh & McLennan Companies Inc., the nation's largest property and casualty brokerage, over allegations of bid rigging and price fixing as well as hidden commissions.

AIG was among the companies that allegedly participated in the bid-rigging scheme, and four former AIG executives were among 20 insurance executives and officers who have pleaded guilty to charges, Spitzer's office said.

Besides naming AIG, Spitzer's suit alleged that Greenberg and former chief financial officer, Howard I. Smith, orchestrated the scheme.

Greenberg, who resigned from AIG in March, has repeatedly insisted that he followed proper accounting procedures during his 38 years at the helm of AIG. Smith, too, has denied wrongdoing, and neither of the men was involved in the negotiations with the SEC and Spitzer.

In a statement issued late Thursday, Greenberg's spokesman Howard Opinsky said a "white paper" issued by Greenberg's legal team last sumer "debunked many of the allegations" of the regulators. He added: "The suggestion in the attorney general's public comments that Mr. Greenberg may have been involved in any wrongdoing is false. We are confident that when the debate moves from the newspaper to the courts, Mr. Greenberg will be vindicated."

The accounting scandal centered on transactions that AIG under Greenberg concluded with Berkshire Hathaway's General Re. insurance group.

In its filing, the SEC said the $500 million transactions in 2000 and 2001 "were designed to inflate falsely AIG's loss reserves ... in order to quell analyst criticism that AIG's reserves had been declining."

Three former Gen Re executives and one former AIG executive were indicted last week in connection with the deceptive accounting scheme.

Greenberg was replaced as chief executive by Martin Sullivan, who oversaw the restatement of AIG's earnings back to 2000. The revisions knocked some $2 billion off shareholders' equity and nearly $4 billion off its profits.

Sullivan said in a statement Thursday that the settlement marked "a major step forward in resolving the legal and regulatory issues facing AIG." He said the company was "committed to business practices that provide transparency and fairness in the insurance market."

___

AP Writer Michael Gormley in Albany and AP Business Writer Marcy Gordon in Washington, D.C., contributed to this story.

___

On the Net:
http://www.aig.com
http://www.oag.state.ny.us

AIG Settles Fraud Charges For $1.64 Bln (REU)

Reuters, February 10, 2006

NEW YORK (Reuters) - American International Group Inc. <AIG.N>, the world's largest insurer by market value, on Thursday agreed to pay $1.64 billion (941 million pounds) to settle charges of fraud, bid-rigging and improper accounting, the biggest regulatory settlement by a single company in U.S. history.

The settlement with New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer and State Insurance Superintendent Howard Mills, the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission and the Justice Department ends a long-running investigation of the company, and was widely anticipated.

It does not resolve pending cases against former AIG chief executive Maurice "Hank" Greenberg and former chief financial officer Howard Smith, who were forced out last spring. Both have denied any wrongdoing.

"AIG today is a better company for all that we have been through," said Martin Sullivan, who replaced Greenberg as chief executive.

The company will take a $1.15 billion after-tax charge for the fourth quarter of 2005 for the settlement. It also said it "regrets and apologises" for its conduct, and said providing incorrect information to investors and regulators was "wrong."

In settling, Spitzer pointed the finger directly at Greenberg, who built AIG over nearly four decades, and Smith.

"There are some who continue to deny there was any wrongdoing at the company," the attorney general said in an interview in New York City. "I think the facts are overwhelming in establishing that -- from the highest levels of AIG -- there was an intent to misrepresent its financial condition."

A spokesman for Greenberg maintained that any suggestion the former CEO was involved in wrongdoing is false. A lawyer for Smith could not immediately be reached for comment.

SPITZER PRAISES NEW MANAGEMENT

Spitzer said AIG's new management has done a "spectacular" job of cooperating with investigators and instituting reforms.

The settlement tops the $850 million that Marsh & McLennan Cos. <MMC.N>, the insurance broker once run by Greenberg's son Jeffrey, agreed to pay to resolve bid-rigging accusations by Spitzer. It also tops the $750 million penalty that the SEC imposed against WorldCom Inc. for accounting fraud.

"This settlement removes the largest cloud overhanging the company," said Rob Haines, an analyst with CreditSights.

AIG shares rose 74 cents, or 1.1 percent, to close at $67.12. The shares have risen 34 percent from their 52-week low set last April 29, but remain 8 percent below their level about a year ago, before the company disclosed receiving subpoenas from Spitzer and the SEC.

AIG will pay $800 million to a fund for investors deceived by its false financial statements, including a $100 million SEC penalty.

Policyholders harmed by bid-rigging will receive $375 million. Another $344 million will go to states harmed by AIG's understating of workers' compensation premiums. New York fined AIG $100 million, and the Justice Department fined it $25 million.

AIG agreed not to pay contingent commissions for certain types of insurance, and said it will support legislation to end them. Such commissions involve brokers and insurers rewarding each other for steering business.

The penalties, along with a higher reserve for property and casualty losses, will reduce AIG's book value by less than 3 percent, UBS AG insurance analyst Andrew Kligerman said.

AIG also agreed to retain an independent consultant for three years to review internal controls and practices. Sullivan said naming a consultant is a "top priority" for the company.

Separately, AIG said it will take a $1.1 billion fourth-quarter charge to increase its loss reserves, and expects $550 million of charges and insurance losses for catastrophes including Hurricanes Katrina and Wilma.

On the conference call, AIG said it plans to report 2005 results on or before March 16.

A.I.G. Apologizes And Agrees To $1.64 Billion Settlement (NYT)

By Gretchen Morgenson

The New York Times, February 10, 2006

Apologizing for deceptive business practices extending as far back as two decades ago, American International Group, the global insurance giant, reached a $1.64 billion settlement yesterday with federal and state securities and insurance regulators.

DOJ_NMG_0014051

The company also agreed to changes that would soften its historically combative approach to business, a trademark of its ousted chief executive, Maurice R. Greenberg.

Under the settlement, reached with the Justice Department, the Securities and Exchange Commission, the New York attorney general's office and the New York State Insurance Department, A.I.G. acknowledged that it had deceived the investing public and regulators.

The settlement resolved allegations that A.I.G. had participated in bid-rigging schemes and paid insurance brokers to steer business its way, used fraudulent insurance transactions to bolster the quality and quantity of its earnings and underreported to state insurance departments the amounts of workers' compensation premiums it had collected, on which it owed taxes.

In its apology, A.I.G. said: "Providing incorrect information to the investing public and regulators was wrong and is against the values of our current leadership and employees."

The company said it was committed to business practices "that provide transparency and fairness in the insurance markets."

Both the settlement and the apology are a clear repudiation of the company's practices under Mr. Greenberg, its longtime chief executive who ruled A.I.G. with an iron hand and often battled openly with regulators.

Mr. Greenberg, who was removed by A.I.G.'s board last March, remains under investigation by the Securities and Exchange Commission and the Justice Department and faces a lawsuit by the New York attorney general, Eliot Spitzer.

"This settlement is a complete and total vindication of everything we said from Day 1, despite significant pushback from others," Mr. Spitzer said in an interview. "It sends an important message that this kind of gamesmanship won't be tolerated; we don't care who you are or what company you're running."

Under the terms of the settlement, A.I.G. will pay $200 million in fines and penalties and put $1.5 billion into three funds to benefit victims of the company's deceptions.

One fund, totaling $800 million, will be available to investors who lost money in A.I.G. stock after its accounting irregularities were disclosed. Another $375 million fund will repay former customers who may have paid too much to buy A.I.G.'s insurance policies. A third fund, with $343 million, will go to the states that A.I.G. cheated by underpayment of taxes relating to workers' compensation premiums earned in those states.

S.E.C. officials said the settlement was important because it will deliver meaningful monetary relief to those harmed by A.I.G.'s conduct.

"While this settlement concludes our investigation of A.I.G., our investigation continues with respect to others who may have participated in A.I.G.'s securities law violations," said Linda C. Thomsen, director of enforcement at the commission.

A.I.G. is also paying $25 million to the United States government to resolve criminal liability arising from its accounting missteps. The company will also cooperate with the Justice Department in its continuing criminal investigation.

A.I.G. has been cooperating with the federal and state investigators since last March, when Mr. Greenberg left the company. Last year, it restated its financial results for five years beginning in 2000, stating that improper accounting during that period had inflated the company's earnings by more than $3 billion.

"These settlements are a major step forward in resolving the legal and regulatory issues facing A.I.G.," Martin J. Sullivan, the company's chief executive, said in a statement. "We have already implemented a wide range of improvements in our accounting, financial reporting and corporate governance, and will continue to make enhancements in these areas."

After taxes, A.I.G. will pay $1.15 billion under the settlement.

A spokesman for Mr. Greenberg issued this statement: "We have already debunked many of the allegations settled today by A.I.G. in a white paper issued last summer. The suggestion in the attorney general's public comments that Mr. Greenberg may have been involved in any wrongdoing is false. We are confident that when the debate moves from the newspaper to the courts, Mr. Greenberg will be vindicated."

Shares of A.I.G. rose 74 cents yesterday, or 1.1 percent, to $67.12.

Yesterday's settlement grew out of two separate inquiries, one in New York and another in Washington. The bid-rigging practices were turned up by Mr. Spitzer's office in a 2004 investigation into insurance brokers who act as middlemen between the corporations that buy insurance and the companies that sell policies. Guilty pleas by officials at Marsh Inc., a unit of Marsh & McLennan, and other insurance brokers led investigators to A.I.G.

In Washington, the S.E.C. uncovered an insurance product sold by A.I.G., known as finite-loss coverage, which seemed designed to help the companies that bought it hide profit shortfalls. In 2003, A.I.G. paid $10 million to settle a lawsuit filed by the S.E.C. over the insurer's sale of finite insurance to Brightpoint Inc., a cellphone distributor in Indiana.

The insurance, which the S.E.C. said A.I.G. had developed "for the specific purpose of helping issuers to report false financial information to the public," helped Brightpoint conceal $11.9 million in losses in 1998.

DOJ_NMG_0014052

Investigators soon discovered that finite insurance was also central to a manipulation of A.I.G.'s own results. They uncovered insurance deals the company struck with General Re in late 2000 and early 2001 that were intended to add $500 million in phony loss reserves to A.I.G.'s balance sheet.

Insurance analysts had voiced concern over A.I.G.'s declining reserves in the third quarter, putting pressure on the company's stock; to address the analysts' concerns, A.I.G. bolstered its reserves artificially through the General Re deal.

Last week, federal prosecutors in Virginia charged three former officials of General Re and a former A.I.G. executive with fraud and conspiracy related to the fraudulent transactions.

Under the terms of the settlement, A.I.G. agreed to a raft of reforms. It will soon disclose commissions it pays to insurance brokers on its Web site, create companywide standards of conduct regarding those commissions, and train employees in business ethics, professional obligations, conflicts of interest and recordkeeping procedures. A.I.G. also agreed to hire a consultant to examine its internal controls over financial reporting; regulatory, legal and compliance policies; and adequacy of whistle-blower procedures.

The agreement also stated that the consultant hired by A.I.G. will issue a report to the S.E.C., the New York attorney general, the New York State Insurance Department and A.I.G.'s board recommending best practices for the company to adopt. The consultant will remain on the job for three years.

A.I.G. will also provide New York's superintendent of insurance with a report detailing the reinsurance contracts it has struck with other insurers. Such policies must contain risk transfer if the companies buying them are to receive preferred insurance accounting; where such a risk transfer is not evident, A.I.G. must supply appropriate documentation.

The settlement requires A.I.G. to cooperate on all examinations and regulatory requests. A.I.G. will cooperate with the New York attorney general in his continuing investigation into the insurance industry and former A.I.G. employees.

AIG Accord May Lighten Its Wallet, But The Stock May Be Poised To Gain (WSJ)

By Ian Mcdonald And Liam Pleven

The Wall Street Journal, February 10, 2006

American International Group Inc. has to write a $1.64 billion check to U.S. regulators and add even more than that to its reserves. But the mammoth insurer's stock might be a bargain.

To some, that may smack of classic up-is-down Wall Street logic. After all, an investigation of the firm's accounting last spring triggered civil-fraud charges from New York authorities, the ouster of iconic Chief Executive Maurice R. "Hank" Greenberg and a restatement of five years of financial results.

The New York insurer -- the world's largest by market value with a more than $172 billion market capitalization -- closed this chapter with yesterday's deal with U.S. and federal authorities, who mainly alleged that in recent years improper accounting smoothed actual profit, not that the insurer created those gains. The $1.64 billion toll is the biggest paid to regulators by any financial-services company in U.S. history. Additionally, the company said it will take a $1.1 billion after-tax charge to boost its reserves by $1.69 billion following an internal review.

American International Group's size makes the twin hits lighter than they would be for most insurers -- profit neared $11.5 billion in the year ended Sept. 30. In 4 p.m. composite trading yesterday on the New York Stock Exchange, AIG's shares were up 74 cents to $67.12.

Those investors who gobbled up shares yesterday likely got it right. Why? Bulls argue that in coming years, AIG shareholders will likely benefit from rising profit and a share price that trades at a higher multiple of that profit, now that investors know the company's accounting issues are put to bed.

"I think the issues that have dogged them are past and there's a lot of value here," says Jeff Arricale, an analyst at portfolio manager T. Rowe Price in Baltimore, which holds AIG stock in several portfolios. "It's a franchise that should be able to generate consistent, double-digit earnings growth for a long time. Everyone talks about that, but few companies do it."

An insurer makes money by selling policies and investing the premiums that customers pay. If premiums tend to outpace the claims it has to pay out and the company earns decent returns on its investments, profit rises. Sharp underwriting acumen also lowers the insurer's borrowing costs -- a big chunk of its overhead -- which creates a positive cycle.

Thanks to savvy management and enviable, double-digit profit growth, AIG's shares have risen nearly 190% during the past decade, almost lapping the return on the S&P 500-stock index, which is up 99% during the period.

The drivers of that success, aside from Mr. Greenberg, are intact. Earnings have risen steadily over the few quarters under new CEO Martin J. Sullivan. A 51-year-old who has worked at the firm since he was a teenager, Mr. Sullivan took the reins from Mr. Greenberg, 80, in March.

In many ways, Mr. Sullivan is left to implement a growth strategy that Mr. Greenberg and some of his departed lieutenants honed over more than three decades. For years, Mr. Greenberg forged ties in emerging foreign markets such as China and Vietnam. In many of these markets, AIG is way ahead of other U.S. companies, offering consumer lending, asset-management, plane-leasing and other noninsurance services.

Chris Winans, a spokesman for AIG, said that generally the company's life and nonlife-insurance businesses in foreign markets are healthy and expanding, and at a faster rate than in the domestic market.

AIG is in a position to benefit because people are getting wealthier in developing markets, but also from people spending an increasing percentage of their mounting wealth on insurance, which is seen as a safe investment. Investors and analysts have long been bullish on those operations and that feeling didn't exit with Mr. Greenberg, who still has eyes on some of AIG's turf through two private-equity funds he still controls.

"It still looks like it's all systems go for AIG," says Dreyfus Neenan, a stock analyst who covers the company for Chicago researcher Morningstar Inc. Mr. Neenan has AIG valued at $80 a share.

Broadly, analysts have targeted 13% annual earnings growth over the next five years and 18 of the 23 analysts following the stock rate it a "buy" or "outperform," according to Thomson Financial. Despite that forecast, however, AIG's shares look cheap.

Today, the stock trades at about 12 times its projected profit for 2006, about 25% lower than the average stock in the S&P 500. Historically, the stock has traded closer to, and often higher than, a market multiple.

T. Rowe Price's Mr. Arricale notes that if AIG earns roughly $6.20 a share next year, as analysts expect, and trades at just 13.5 times those earnings -- still a 10% discount to the market's historical valuation -- the stock would be fairly valued at more than $80.

Of course, there are worries that could keep that from happening.

Andrew Kligerman, a stock analyst with UBS Securities LLC, sees a range of challenges, including the competitive pressures that come with operating in some mature markets and the need to retain talent. While AIG is a good company, Mr. Kligerman says, whether it will outperform the industry is "the question mark." His target price for the shares is $67. Mr. Kligerman has a "neutral" rating on the stock and AIG has been a UBS client in the past 12 months.

And despite Mr. Sullivan's long tenure with the company, the CEO is still in a "show-me" situation. "Management has handled all this pretty well," says David Dreman, chairman and chief investment officer at Dreman Value Management, a more than $13 billion money manager in Jersey City, N.J.

The firm bought shares roughly a year ago and expects earnings growth of 10% or more. At the same time, Mr. Dreman says, they are waiting to gauge new management's effectiveness this year before adding to the position.

AIG Agrees To Pay $1.64B Fraud Fine Biggest Penalty Ever On A U.S. Company (USAT)

By Elliot Blair Smith

USA Today, February 10, 2006

Insurance giant American International Group settled sweeping state and federal fraud probes Thursday by agreeing to pay $1.64 billion in fines and restitution, twice the highest penalty previously imposed on a U.S. company.

But the cost to AIG's reputation cut deeper. The company said an independent consultant's review had uncovered a $1.7 billion deficiency in its underwriting loss reserves, half related to its previously underestimated exposure to environmental and asbestos claims.

All told, AIG will record nearly $2.3 billion in after-tax charges to its fourth-quarter 2005 earnings. That comes atop a $1.3 billion reduction to its previously reported 2004 earnings last year, amid government investigations and the forced resignation of former chairman and CEO Maurice Greenberg.

New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer, whose inquiry into insurance industry sales and commission practices led to Greenberg and a wide range of alleged abuses, called AIG “a solid company that didn't need to cheat. It finds itself in this position solely because some senior managers thought it was acceptable to deceive the investing public and regulators.”

Mark Schonfeld, director of the Securities and Exchange Commission's Northeast Regional Office, which joined the state's investigation, said, “We have sought to balance AIG's historical misconduct — which was substantial — with its new approach to compliance and cooperation with regulators and law enforcement.”

However, Greenberg spokesman Howard Opinsky said many of the regulators' allegations previously had been “debunked” in a report by the former CEO's legal defense team last year that termed the company's financial restatements “exaggerated and unnecessary” and argued that Greenberg, now 80, had relied on trusted advisers.

Insurance rating company A.M. Best said the latest reversals of fortune compromised the capital levels of AIG's domestic brokerage group, which “were not considered robust before and therefore provided little cushion for the restated earnings and reserve charge.”

DOJ_NMG_0014054

"It's a big amount of money even for a huge company like AIG to have to pay out," said Celent insurance analyst Donald Light.

The settlement dwarfs the $850 million Spitzer's office levied last year against insurance brokerage Marsh & McLennan in connection with the bid-rigging scandal.

Greenberg and former CFO Howard Smith still face civil fraud charges in New York state court. And another former AIG executive, Christian Milton, faces a criminal charge related to the company's past dealings with Berkshire Hathaway subsidiary General Re.

AIG To Pay $1.64 Billion To End State, Federal Probes (Update2) (BLOOM)

Bloomberg, February 10, 2006

Feb. 9 (Bloomberg) -- American International Group Inc., the world's largest insurer, agreed to pay $1.64 billion to resolve allegations it misled investors, faked bids, and cheated workers- compensation programs.

The settlements with New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer, the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission and the Justice Department include fines and restitution to investors, policyholders and state funds, AIG said in a statement today. The company, which didn't admit or deny any wrongdoing, will pay $800 million in its accord with the SEC, a record for the agency.

The agreement concludes probes dating as far back as 2001 and widens the split between New York-based AIG and ousted Chief Executive Maurice ``Hank'' Greenberg, who ran the company for 38 years. AIG's auditors blamed Greenberg for skirting internal controls to alter the company's books, fueling separate accounting fraud allegations against the former CEO.

``The fact that these material misstatements were orchestrated from the very top of the company is clearly demonstrated,'' Spitzer said before speaking at a New York Law School event in Manhattan today. The settlement ``will send AIG off on a better trajectory.''

The company's shares rose 74 cents, or 1.1 percent, to $67.12 in New York Stock Exchange composite trading. Martin Sullivan, the former chief operating officer who replaced Greenberg in March, had promised to settle the probes, helping the company record two-thirds of the $59 billion in market value it lost between February and April.

Reserve Increase

AIG, which restated $3.9 billion of past earnings last year, also today agreed to hire a consultant to monitor its internal controls and financial reporting for three years. Greenberg, 80, has called much of the restatement unnecessary and pledged to fight Spitzer's suit at trial.

AIG separately said it will increase reserves for asbestos and other claims at a cost of $1.1 billion in the fourth quarter. The reserve and settlement costs total $2.25 billion in the quarter, after taxes.

``These settlements are a major step forward in resolving the legal and regulatory issues facing AIG,'' Sullivan, 51, said in the statement. ``We have already implemented a wide range of improvements in our accounting, financial reporting and corporate governance, and will continue to make enhancements.''

AIG will pay $800 million to investors hurt by the alleged misstatements, $375 million to policyholders who may have been cheated by fake insurance bids and $343 million to 50 state workers compensation funds. The company will also pay a $100 million fine to Spitzer and a $25 million penalty to the Justice Department.

Buying Opportunity

The SEC's biggest settlement before today was with WorldCom Inc., which paid $750 million in 2003 to resolve fraud allegations. Spitzer's record with a single company is $850 million to end bid-rigging accusations against Marsh & McLennan Cos., the insurance broker once run by Greenberg's son, Jeffrey.

A $1.6 billion payment equals about 16 percent of what AIG earned in the first nine months of 2005. It costs about 42 cents in per-share earnings and reduces AIG's net worth by about 1.2 percent, Goldman Sachs Group Inc. analyst Thomas Cholnoky said before the agreements were announced. He has an ``outperform'' rating on the stock.

``Eliot Spitzer and his focus on AIG presented investors with a great gift to buy the franchise cheaply,'' said Keith Wirtz, chief investment officer at Fifth Third Asset Management, which holds 1.5 million AIG shares. ``We accumulated the stock in the $40's when this cloud surfaced. Now we think the earnings power of this company suggests to us it may be an $80 stock.''

General Re

AIG, which lowered 2000 to 2004 net income by 10 percent in the restatement, is resolving Spitzer's May 2005 lawsuit and an SEC complaint filed today in conjunction with the agreement. At the core of the SEC's case is a reinsurance transaction with a unit of Warren Buffett's Berkshire Hathaway Inc. that inflated AIG's reported reserves for claims by $500 million.

According to guilty pleas from two former executives of Berkshire's General Re, Greenberg initiated the deal with former General Re CEO Ronald Ferguson in late 2000 because he wanted to appease analysts who were concerned about AIG's reserve levels.

DOJ_NMG_0014055

Ferguson and Christian Milton, AIG's former head of reinsurance, were among four indicted on federal charges of conspiring to distort AIG's finances last week. In today's agreement, AIG pledged to cooperate with the Justice Department's investigation of that deal.

Spitzer's suit also said the company used sham reinsurance contracts with offshore entities to hide underwriting losses. AIG had originally reported $3.73 billion in property and casualty underwriting income during the five-year period. After restating, the company showed a $206 million underwriting loss.

Bid-Rigging

The settlement resolves Spitzer's allegations that the company understated premiums to reduce its payments to state funds that finance a portion of benefits for injured workers.

AIG's accord separately clears a 15-month inquiry into price-fixing with insurance brokers including Marsh & McLennan. At least 17 people, including four AIG employees, have pleaded guilty in connection with the investigation. Spitzer's October 2004 suit against Marsh & McLennan accused it of soliciting fake bids from AIG and other insurers that paid hidden fees.

The SEC's investigation of AIG began in 2001 with a probe of policies that mobile-phone distributor Brightpoint Inc. allegedly used to manipulate earnings. The agency continued to look at income-smoothing insurance and reinsurance after AIG paid $10 million to settle the Brightpoint case. More than a dozen companies have been subpoenaed by state and federal regulators.

The SEC today credited AIG for changing its approach to dealing with regulators and cooperating fully in the agency's most recent investigation.

``Just a year ago, facing its third SEC investigation in as many years, AIG was on a path to disaster," Andrew Calamari, an SEC official in New York, said today. ``We are very encouraged that the company has now chosen a different path."

To contact the reporters on this story: George Stein in New York at ghstein@bloomberg.net; Jesse Westbrook in Washington at jwestbrook1@bloomberg.net. Last Updated: February 9, 2006 16:12 EST

The Cleanup Continues (NYT)

The New York Times, February 10, 2006

It's not about the money. After the settlement yesterday between regulators and the insurance giant American International Group, a lot of attention focused on the dollars: $1.6 billion. It is an impressive figure. But the money should not obscure the higher goal of an honest corporate environment.

Smart investors look at a company's balance sheet, its assets and liabilities, its sales and its profit before deciding whether to sink their savings into its stock. They assume that the corporation is telling the truth and operating within the law before taking a leap of faith by purchasing its shares. A.I.G. employees betrayed that trust in numerous ways, misleading investors and policyholders alike.

According to the Securities and Exchange Commission and the New York attorney general's office, A.I.G. engaged in bid-rigging, fraud and improper accounting. Like many companies in this era of corporate scandals, the fraud was meant to make the company look better than it really was.

A.I.G. engaged in what regulators describe as sham transactions to inflate its reserves by $500 million. Why go to all that trouble? According to the S.E.C., the company did it to "quell analyst criticism."

Rather than focusing on the long-term health of their businesses, too many executives worry about share prices and analysts' reactions. Equity markets are an important concern, but they are fickle, unpredictable and secondary. It's the bottom line, stupid.

In Houston, a jury is hearing testimony about a much bigger sham in the trial of the former bosses of Enron, Kenneth Lay and Jeffrey Skilling. Enron executives showed a similar obsession with financial analysts. The former head of investor relations described for the court how Enron, an energy company, would fudge quarterly results if earnings came in even a single penny short of outside expectations.

These targets are like point spreads for sports gamblers. Whatever they sell, companies should concentrate on business and leave the odds-makers to play their games.

The difference between Enron and A.I.G. is that Enron was a house of cards, but A.I.G. was and still is, as New York's attorney general, Eliot Spitzer, put it, "a solid company that didn't need to cheat." A.I.G. appears to be back on track, with a new management team and approval from regulators for its cooperation. Let's hope they don't call it a day with the fat check and let others, including the company's former chief executive and chairman, Maurice Greenberg, off the hook.

Enron Witness's Plea Bargain Is Questioned By The Defense (NYT/REU)

By Reuters

DOJ_NMG_0014056

The New York Times, February 10, 2006

HOUSTON, Feb. 9 (Reuters) — A lawyer for Jeffrey K. Skilling, a former chief executive of Enron, suggested Thursday that a crucial prosecution witness in the trial of Mr. Skilling and another former chief executive, Kenneth L. Lay, did not commit the crimes he admitted to under a plea deal with prosecutors.

The witness, Mark E. Koenig, Enron's former head of investor relations, is the first of several former Enron employees who are expected to testify against Mr. Skilling and Mr. Lay after striking deals with the government to avoid trials.

Defense lawyers have said that many of the government's witnesses who reached deals were not guilty but buckled under pressure because they lacked the wherewithal to mount a defense at trial and feared they could face lengthy prison sentences if convicted.

Mr. Skilling's lawyer, Daniel Petrocelli, questioned Mr. Koenig about the plea deal, which could send him to prison for up to 10 years for aiding and abetting securities fraud, saying at one point: "Don't you think this is pretty thin stuff?"

A visibly angry Mr. Koenig replied, "I don't think it's thin, or else I wouldn't have pleaded guilty to it."

Mr. Lay and Mr. Skilling are charged with conspiracy and fraud and are accused of trying to hide the company's poor financial state as it plunged toward bankruptcy in December 2001.

Mr. Skilling also faces insider trading charges.

Mr. Koenig, in six days on the witness stand in Federal District Court, has said he and other top executives at Enron misled investors and analysts about revenue and conspired to inflate profits to impress Wall Street.

In his plea agreement, Mr. Koenig admitted to misrepresenting transactions three times on conference calls with financial analysts in 2001, although he later recanted one of those episodes.

Mr. Lay's lawyer, Michael Ramsey, took up the attack where Mr. Petrocelli left off, asking Mr. Koenig whether he had told a friend he was not guilty of any crimes.

"Isn't it true, Mark, you told a very close friend and former co-worker that you were not guilty and did not commit a crime?" Mr. Ramsey asked.

"That's not true," Mr. Koenig replied.

Former Enron Investor Relations Chief Defends Guilty Plea (WP)

By Carrie Johnson

The Washington Post, February 10, 2006

Witnesses Were Intimidated Into Deals, Defense Says

HOUSTON, Feb. 9 -- Defense lawyers attacked the guilty plea of a former Enron Corp. executive Thursday, calling the deal "pretty thin stuff" in an effort to advance their argument that witnesses had been intimidated into cooperating with the government.

But in his sixth day of testimony against former chairman Kenneth L. Lay and chief executive Jeffrey K. Skilling, the company's onetime investor relations chief soundly rejected the idea.

"I don't think it's thin, or I wouldn't have pled guilty to it," Mark E. Koenig said of his August 2004 plea to a single count of aiding and abetting securities fraud.

Without prompting, Koenig then reminded jurors of previous testimony in which he described efforts by the company to meet or exceed Wall Street targets by two pennies in 2000, more than two weeks after the fiscal quarter closed.

"Frankly, I was afraid these things would come back to me for years," Koenig said of misleading statements he made to analysts about the health of one of Enron's units. He faces as much as 10 years in prison when he is sentenced.

The exchanges punctuated another long day in which the eight-woman, four-man jury heard audiotapes and videotapes of stock analyst calls and employee meetings in which Skilling and Lay gave largely optimistic assessments of Enron's finances in the months before its filing for bankruptcy protection.

Both defendants argue that the company collapsed in a "panic" and that the vast majority of 16 former executives who pleaded guilty did so to preserve money for their families and to escape long prison sentences. Skilling and Lay, who say they are not guilty, could spend the rest of their lives in prison if they are convicted on fraud and conspiracy charges.

Michael Ramsey, lead defense lawyer for Lay, urged Koenig to answer only the questions he was asked. Ramsey confronted the witness about statements he allegedly made to a close friend and former Enron employee who Ramsey said indicated that Koenig did not think he had engaged in wrongdoing at Enron. Koenig called the woman, who is not on the defense witness list, a "dear friend" but said the account was wrong. Defense lawyers could later seek to call her to rebut his testimony.

Ramsey spent most of the afternoon seeking to explore "clues relative to the sudden death of Enron." But U.S. District Judge Simeon T. Lake III affirmed most objections by Assistant U.S. Attorney Kathryn H. Ruemmler and headed Ramsey away from that line of questioning.

DOJ_NMG_0014057

"I'm allowing you to question this witness," the judge told Ramsey. "I'm not allowing you to argue your case in the guise of questioning this witness."

Ramsey gained more ground when he attempted to portray Lay as less focused on details and more on leading the company's "public relations, politically oriented, diplomatically oriented" efforts before returning as chief executive upon Skilling's abrupt August 2001 departure. Lay moved in high-level political circles, meeting with Vice President Cheney about energy policy and conversing at least twice with presidential adviser Karl Rove, according to a 2001 analyst call the jury heard Thursday afternoon.

Ramsey said Lay had to "re-immerse himself" in the day-to-day operations at Enron.

Late in the day, the judge pronounced one line of questioning "a waste of time" and urged the defense to move on to other topics. Koenig is expected to return to the witness stand for most of Monday. The trial will last at least four months.

Lay's Lawyer Argues That Panic In Market Sank Enron, Not Fraud (WSJ)

By John R. Emshwiller And Gary Mcwilliams

The Wall Street Journal, February 10, 2006

HOUSTON -- Nearly two weeks into the criminal trial of his client, former Enron Corp. Chairman Kenneth Lay, defense attorney Michael Ramsey began his questioning of the government's first witness with a jab, then turned to pounding home the defense's argument that Enron collapsed because of a market panic rather than fraud.

Mr. Ramsey sharply challenged former Enron investor-relations chief Mark Koenig on whether he actually believed that he was guilty of the Enron-related crime he pleaded guilty to in 2004. Mr. Koenig has a cooperation agreement with the government in hopes of reducing his sentence. He is the first witness in the criminal fraud and conspiracy trial under way here against Mr. Lay and former Enron President Jeffrey Skilling.

Mr. Ramsey asked whether Mr. Koenig had told a friend and former Enron colleague that he had done nothing wrong, or simply made a misstatement during a call with securities analysts. Mr. Koenig firmly denied that he made such comments. Mr. Ramsey hinted that he might call the friend to testify later in the case.

The line of questioning begun yesterday by Mr. Ramsey is part of a broad defense of Enron's business practices being mounted by the legal teams for Messrs. Lay and Skilling. While Enron, in the more than four years since its December 2001 collapse, has become a synonym for corporate malfeasance, the Lay and Skilling defense teams are betting that they can convince the jury that Enron was a great company felled by an array of outside forces. Prosecutors counter that the two defendants led a years-long scheme to hide numerous problems at Enron, which finally collapsed when some of those problems became public.

Although the first government witness, Mr. Koenig, took the stand in the middle of last week, Mr. Ramsey didn't begin questioning him until yesterday afternoon. Prosecutor Kathryn Ruemmler took a little over two days to question Mr. Koenig, who claimed that Messrs. Lay and Skilling took part with him in making false or misleading statements to the public on a variety of matters about Enron.

Following Ms. Ruemmler, Mr. Skilling's lead counsel, Daniel Petrocelli, cross-examined Mr. Koenig for some three days, during which time the attorney repeatedly tried to emphasize the complexity of Enron's operations and the limited knowledge Mr. Koenig had of those activities. Mr. Petrocelli claimed that Mr. Koenig's knowledge was so limited that things he said were improper really weren't.

Mr. Ramsey then turned to matters beginning in August 2001, when Mr. Skilling unexpectedly quit and Mr. Lay assumed his duties. He began questioning Mr. Koenig regarding outside partnerships, known as LJM1 and LJM2, that had done large amounts of business with Enron and had been run by the company's chief financial officer, Andrew Fastow. "LJM was going to turn out to be a real big deal in 2001," Mr. Ramsey said.

In his opening argument last week, Mr. Ramsey argued that articles in The Wall Street Journal in the fall of 2001 raising questions about the LJM operation helped spark the market "panic" that sank Enron. Yesterday, Mr. Ramsey suggested that the Enron-LJM relationship was proper, but that the Journal treated it as "scandalous."

Mr. Ramsey also began going through various problems Enron had in August 2001, including political and business headaches from the California electricity crisis and the impact of a troubled power project in India. Such concerns, Mr. Ramsey said, were "pulling down the price of Enron stock" in the summer of 2001, making the company more vulnerable to the turmoil that later arose.

Cross-examination of Mr. Koenig is scheduled to resume Monday.

Lay's Attorney Hits Snags In Dealings With Witness (USAT)

By Greg Farrell

USA Today, February 10, 2006

HOUSTON — The lawyer representing former Enron CEO Ken Lay finally got a chance to cross-examine the government's first witness Thursday, and whiffed.

Shortly after the lunch break at federal court here, attorney Mike Ramsey attacked the credibility of Mark Koenig. The former Enron investor relations chief has pleaded guilty and is cooperating with the prosecution of Lay and another former Enron CEO, Jeff Skilling, on charges of hiding the true state of Enron's financial health from investors in 2000 and 2001.

"Isn't it true that after you pleaded guilty you told a very close friend and former co-worker that you were not guilty and committed no crime?" he asked. "Haven't you admitted to Joanie Williamson, sir, that you were not guilty?" Koenig denied telling Williamson any such thing. Ramsey then threatened to have Williamson testify. "So if she said that (on the stand), she'd be lying, perjuring herself?" Ramsey asked. "That's right," Koenig stated defiantly.

Ramsey dropped the subject and immediately began quizzing Koenig about several topics that have yet to be fully introduced through testimony. At each point, U.S. District Judge Sim Lake shut him down.

When Ramsey tried to get Koenig to talk about private partnerships formed by former CFO Andrew Fastow, dubbed LJM1 and LJM2, Lake curtailed him. When Ramsey tried to get Koenig to talk about threats made against Lay by the attorney general of California about allegations of price-gouging, Lake again urged him to move on, sustaining a government objection by saying, "Go ahead and ask your next question."

Finally, when Ramsey wanted Koenig to agree with his point that the meltdown of tech stocks in 2001 supported Lay's statements that Enron Broadband was in tough straits, Lake seemed to lose his patience. "This is an undue waste of our time," he said.

Earlier Thursday, Skilling lawyer Dan Petrocelli asked Koenig about his decision to plead guilty to one count of aiding and abetting securities fraud in 2004. Although Koenig admitted in the agreement that he misled investors on numerous occasions, he cited three instances in particular where he made false statements to investors. "Don't you think this is pretty thin stuff?" Petrocelli asked. "I didn't think it was thin, or I wouldn't have pleaded guilty," Koenig said.

In their opening arguments, Petrocelli and Ramsey both declared that there was no criminal conspiracy at Enron, and that many of those who pleaded guilty, such as Koenig, had been forced to do so rather than face worse charges at a criminal trial.

Koenig's cross-examination continues today. If it finishes, prosecutors plan to call Ken Rice, former CEO of Enron Broadband Services, as their next witness.

Enron Judge Stops Lay's Lawyer's Bid To Focus Trial On Fastow (BLOOM)

By Jef Feeley Laurel Brubaker Calkins

Bloomberg, February 10, 2006

Feb. 9 (Bloomberg) -- The federal judge presiding over the fraud trial of former Enron Corp. top executives Kenneth Lay and Jeffrey Skilling stopped a bid by Lay's lawyer to shift the focus of the trial onto the misdeeds of an Enron subordinate.

U.S. District Judge Sim Lake in Houston sustained prosecutors' objections to questions by Michael Ramsey, Lay's lead defense lawyer, about off-book partnerships former finance chief Andrew Fastow created to do Enron-related deals. Fastow has pleaded guilty to a fraud charge stemming from Enron's collapse.

Lake did allow Ramsey to cross-examine Mark Koenig, who ran Enron's investor communication unit, about whether Fastow's LJM partnerships caused concern among shareholders. Koenig is in his sixth day of testimony in the trial of former chairman Lay and former chief executive officer Skilling.

``It was not something our competitors did," Koenig said about the off-book partnerships. ``It was different, so we got questions about it."

Prosecutors contend Lay, 63, and Skilling, 52, used the partnerships to help hide billions in Enron's debt and losses to pump up the company's earnings. The government contends the accounting fraud led to the collapses of what was once the U.S.'s seventh-largest company by sales.

Enron had more than $68 billion in market value before it filed for bankruptcy in December 2001, wiping out thousands of jobs and at least $1 billion in retirement funds almost overnight. Investors suing over the company's collapse claim accounting fraud led to at least $25 billion in losses.

Normal Practices

Skilling's and Lay's defense lawyers argue the two men engaged in normal corporate practices and that neither conspired to mislead investors or Enron workers who sank millions in retirement funds into the company's stock.

Prosecutors told jurors in opening arguments Jan. 31 they'd focus on Skilling's and Lay's lies and deceptions rather than company's complex financial and accounting transactions.

Defense lawyers have sought to frustrate the government's efforts by questioning Koenig extensively about the specifics of sophisticated financing deals and the operations of Fastow's partnerships.

Fastow created the LJM partnerships, named for his wife and sons, in 1999 to buy poorly performing assets from Enron or invest in the company's deals. He's alleged to have reaped at least $25 million in fees from the partnership's Enron-related deals while still serving as the company's CFO.

Fastow E-Mail

Skilling's and Lay's defense team has painted Fastow as a ``crook'' who hid the fees he received from Enron-related deals from his bosses and the company's board. They've also said Fastow's partnerships were blessed by the company's lawyers, accountants and directors, and disclosed in Enron's securities filings.

Ramsey questioned Koenig today about an e-mail he received from Fastow in August 2001 indicating that he was no longer involved in the partnership. That obviated the need to disclose any further deals to investors.

``At the time you got the e-mail, did you have any reason to believe Mr. Fastow was a dishonest person?'' Ramsey asked. ``At the time, no,'' Koenig said.

Lake barred Ramsey from asking Koenig whether he'd learned that Fastow said the partnership's future Enron-related deals didn't have to be disclosed because he'd sold his interest in it. Ramsey said Fastow had sold LJM to former Enron executive Michael Kopper and ``was splitting profits with him.''

Conflicting Interests

Kopper, who'd worked under Fastow in Enron's finance department and took over as LJM2's general manager in July 2001, has also pleaded guilty to an Enron-related fraud charge.

Outside investors who sank more than $387 million into the partnership sued Kopper in state court in Delaware in 2001 to oust him as head of the entity.

They argued he had conflicting interests in connection with Enron-related deals and wrongfully collected $6 million in management fees. A judge removed Kopper in March 2002.

During cross-examination earlier today, Daniel Petrocelli, Skilling's main defense lawyer, noted that Koenig had made a mistake when he detailed his wrongdoing as part of his guilty plea.

Koenig pleaded guilty in August 2004 to a single count of aiding and abetting securities fraud in connection with Enron's collapse. He's facing a maximum sentence of 10 years in prison. Prosecutors could ask a judge to cut his sentence for his cooperation in the Skilling and Lay case.

Wrong Lie

Koenig originally told prosecutors he'd lied to investors about why some Enron's retail energy division's functions were shifted to the company's trading unit.

Prosecutors contend the functions were moved as part of an effort to hide losses in that unit. Koenig said he downplayed the reasons for the move to investment analysts during a July 2001 conference call.

The former Enron executive said while reviewing transcripts of the call years later, he discovered it was actually Skilling who'd told analysts on the call that the functions were moved ``to get some more efficiency.'' He alerted prosecutors to the mistake and they changed the documentation on his plea.

Petrocelli questioned why Koenig would plead guilty to something he didn't do.

``I pled guilty to aiding and abetting securities fraud,'' Koenig said. He added that his wrongdoing included more than one statement on a conference call. ``I don't think it's thin or I wouldn't have pled guilty to it.''

Skilling's and Lay's lawyers are seeking to persuade jurors that prosecutors coerced lower-level executives like Koenig into pleading guilty to crimes they didn't commit with the threat of lengthy prison terms.

Lay is charged with seven counts of fraud and conspiracy, plus four counts of bank fraud that will be tried separately after his first trial. Skilling faces 31 counts of fraud, conspiracy and insider trading.

The case is U.S. v. Skilling, No. 04-cr-25, U.S. District Court, Southern District of Texas (Houston).

Witness: Lay Took On New Duties At Enron (AP)

By KRISTEN HAYS, AP Business Writer

AP, February 10, 2006

HOUSTON -- Enron Corp.'s former investor-relations chief on Thursday acknowledged that founder Kenneth Lay had to jump back into nuts-and-bolts management of his company when he resumed the role of chief executive after Jeffrey Skilling resigned less than four months before Enron collapsed in December 2001.

DOJ_NMG_0014060

"He had to get more involved, yes," Mark Koenig said in response to cross examination by lead Lay lawyer Michael Ramsey in his sixth day on the witness stand. Koenig is the government's first witness in the fraud and conspiracy trial of his former bosses.

"He was involved before, but he took on a whole new duty," Koenig said. Lay remained chairman of Enron throughout 2001, but he ceded the CEO position to Skilling in February that year. Skilling abruptly resigned six months later.

Lay's new duties included a hastily arranged conference call with Wall Street analysts on the day Enron announced Skilling's resignation in mid-August 2001, Koenig said. He said Enron was obligated to make executives available on the call to try to calm any market jitters sparked by the unexpected resignation.

Ramsey's questioning appeared to try to highlight what Lay claimed publicly when he was indicted in July 2004: Lay knew of no skullduggery, and was like a student cramming for an exam when his hand-picked successor as CEO quit.

"We think the company's on solid footing," Lay told analysts on the August 2001 conference call played in court for the jury. On the same call, Skilling tried to reassure analysts that his departure was "purely a personal decision" and he stressed that it had nothing to do with Enron.

Ramsey said he expected to finish questioning Koenig on Monday, when the trial will resume.

At times, U.S. District Judge Sim Lake shut down Ramsey's efforts to delve into issues that weren't covered first when prosecutors questioned Koenig. Court rules limit cross examination to areas touched on in direct examination.

In one instance, Ramsey sought to question Koenig about a comment about Lay by California Attorney General Bill Lockyer to the Wall Street Journal in early 2001, the second year the state suffered through a power crunch that led to rolling blackouts and astronomical utility bills. Neither Lay nor Skilling are charged with manipulating California's power market, but three former Enron traders have pleaded guilty to doing so.

"Do you know of personal threats made against Mr. Lay by the attorney general of California?" Ramsey asked, his voice raised.

When a prosecutor objected, Lake cut Ramsey off. "I don't know of any threats against Mr. Lay that came up on direct," the judge said.

Lockyer told the Journal in May 2000, "I would love to personally escort Lay to an 8 by 10 cell that he could share with a tattooed dude who says, 'Hi my name is Spike, honey.'"

Skilling lawyer Daniel Petrocelli, before he wrapped up three days of cross examination, sought to show how Skilling discussed bad news with analysts in conference calls earlier in 2001. Those discussions included the meltdown of the telecom industry in 2001 as Enron pushed its venture into broadband and bandwidth trading. The downturn siphoned potential bandwidth trading partners, he said.

The broadband unit never earned a profit and filed for bankruptcy protection alongside its parent in December 2001. Prosecutors contend Lay and Skilling hid bad news as they painted a falsely rosy picture of Enron.

"You understand in conference calls, you have to be careful and cautious in how the questions are answered?" Petrocelli asked.

"You want to be accurate, yes," Koenig replied.

Koenig is among 16 ex-Enron executives who have cut plea deals with prosecutors. He pleaded guilty in August 2004 to aiding and abetting securities fraud for lying to investors about Enron's finances. As head of investor relations, he was the company's chief liaison to Wall Street.

He told jurors Thursday he isn't proud of his actions.

"I was frankly afraid these things would come back to me for years," Koenig said.

The defense teams have suggested to jurors that Koenig and other ex-Enron executives pleaded guilty to crimes they didn't commit out of fear of lengthy prison terms or pressure from prosecutors.

Enron, once the nation's seventh-largest company, collapsed amid revelations of billions of dollars hidden debt and inflated profits.

Both face decades in prison if convicted. Both sold millions of dollars in stock before Enron went bankrupt, but only Skilling faces allegations of improper stock sales.

Skilling faces 31 counts of fraud, conspiracy, insider trading and lying to auditors for allegedly conspiring to fool investors into believing Enron was healthy. Lay faces seven counts of fraud and conspiracy for perpetuating the alleged ruse after Skilling quit.

Both say no fraud occurred at Enron other than a few executives skimming money, and they are innocent of any wrongdoing.

A Second Mistrial Is Declared In Fraud Case Against The Former Chairman Of Cendant (NYT)

By Stacey Stowe

The New York Times, February 10, 2006

HARTFORD, Feb. 9 — For the second time, the fraud trial of Walter A. Forbes, the former chairman of the Cendant Corporation, ended in a mistrial after the jury announced on Thursday that it had failed to reach a unanimous verdict in its 27th day of deliberations.

The mistrial occurs as a similar accounting-fraud prosecution involving Enron is under way. In such complex cases, the jury can sift through hours of expert testimony about arcane financial procedures and the responsibilities of executives only to find itself unable to render a verdict.

Last July, another prosecution for accounting fraud ended in a mistrial in the case of five former executives with Enron Broadband Services when jurors found themselves deadlocked on most charges.

"My understanding of your note is that you've reached the point where you believe that further deliberations would not be beneficial," Judge Alvin W. Thompson of Federal District Court in Hartford said Thursday. "Is that correct?"

"It is, your honor," said the jury foreman, Ken Premo.

"Then I declare a mistrial," Judge Thompson said.

Mr. Forbes, who faced more than 20 years in prison if convicted, betrayed no emotion when the decision was announced but kept his eyes locked on the jury. Asked moments later if he had a statement, he replied, "None," and quickly left the courtroom, followed by his wife, Caryn, and other family members. His lawyers also declined to comment.

A spokesman for Christopher J. Christie, the United States attorney for New Jersey, said the government had not yet decided whether it would prosecute Mr. Forbes again.

"We're keeping our options open," said the spokesman, Michael Drewniak. At the end of court on Thursday, Judge Thompson scheduled a conference call on Monday with prosecutors and defense lawyers.

Mr. Forbes, 63, of New Canaan, Conn., was charged with conspiracy and securities fraud and with submitting false reports to the Securities and Exchange Commission. Prosecutors said he inflated income at CUC International, which merged in 1997 with HFS Inc., to form Cendant, a real estate and travel services company. The stock lost almost half of its value in one day when, three months after the merger, Cendant disclosed evidence of accounting irregularities.

The case against Mr. Forbes relied on testimony from former financial executives of CUC who pleaded guilty to fraud charges and testified that their superiors participated in the manipulation. Throughout the 24-day trial, Mr. Forbes's lawyers portrayed him as a visionary who relied on accountants to handle the workaday aspects of business.

The Cendant case also resulted in the largest payment to settle a lawsuit brought by shareholders who lost money in a fraud. Cendant paid $2.85 billion to settle, while its auditor, Ernst & Young, paid $335 million. Before it was eclipsed by WorldCom and Enron, the Cendant case was the largest accounting fraud in America. Company shareholders lost $19 billion after it was disclosed in 1998.

John C. Coffee, a professor at Columbia University School of Law, said a second mistrial in the Cendant case was "an ominous signal for the Enron case" and a cautionary tale about the difficulties of trying cases that involve complex and often befuddling accounting procedures.

"There's a great deal of difficulty about teaching the jury the equivalent of an intermediate college course in accounting," he said, adding that prosecutors would have been better served by focusing on the most vivid examples of criminal behavior.

But at least one juror did not feel the accounting issues were too complex. Mr. Premo, the jury foreman and a maintenance technician who lives in Windsor Locks, Conn., said, "I was able to sort it out." He described the deliberations as "cordial."

Citing a directive from Judge Thompson that jurors provide only their own opinions and not comment on the actions or opinions of fellow jurors at the end of the trial, he said, "I would have convicted."

"I wouldn't say it was clear cut. I really had to look at the facts. My opinion was based more on the actions of a C.E.O. and the lack of actions of a C.E.O."

Although the jury deliberated for 27 days, some of those were half days and many were not consecutive as Judge Thompson accommodated various requests for absences or early departures. On Tuesday, Judge Thompson dismissed a juror after he admitted that he had researched Cendant. By law, jurors can consider only court testimony in their deliberations.

The jury did not meet on Wednesday. On Thursday morning, rather than appoint an alternate, Judge Thompson directed the 11-member jury to continue its work. Less than one hour later, the jury foreman sent a note saying he believed that the jury was unable to reach a unanimous verdict.

Barry Simon, one of Mr. Forbes's defense lawyers, asked for a mistrial but Michael Martinez, one of two prosecutors trying the case, said the note was "somewhat equivocal," and asked Judge Thompson to direct the jurors to continue working despite a possible deadlock.

DOJ_NMG_0014062

Judge Thompson had told the jury once before, on Jan. 5, to continue its work when the jury claimed it could not reach a unanimous decision on the 12th day of deliberations. On Thursday, he declared a mistrial after he confirmed that the jury was indeed deadlocked.

In January 2005, the first attempt to prosecute Mr. Forbes, a 1968 graduate of Harvard Business School, also ended in a mistrial when, after hearing seven months of testimony, the jury deadlocked on all charges against him after 33 days.

A co-defendant in that trial, E. Kirk Shelton, 50, former vice chairman of Cendant, was convicted on all 12 counts of conspiracy, securities fraud, mail fraud and wire fraud. He was sentenced to 10 years in prison but is appealing his conviction.

In The Cendant Trial, Ignorance Was An Excuse (NYT)

By Floyd Norris

The New York Times, February 10, 2006

Walter A. Forbes was paid more than $100 million as chairman and chief executive of the CUC Corporation. To hear him tell it, he did not do very much to earn the money.

Operations of the company, he testified at a trial where he faced charges of masterminding a fraud that cost investors billions, were left to others.

He admitted signing quarterly and annual financial statements that turned out to be fraudulent, but said he neither prepared nor read them.

"We were a public company with thousands of employees, divisions all over the country and all over the world," he testified. "I don't think they would have expected me to be reading 10-Q's."

It was a defense that worked at his first trial, when a jury convicted CUC's No. 2 official but was unable to reach a verdict on Mr. Forbes. And it has worked again. Yesterday, the jury in the second trial was dismissed after it, too, was unable to reach a verdict after 27 days of deliberations. [Page C6.]

The jury foreman, Ken Premo, said afterward that he did not feel the accounting issues in the trial had been too complex and thought that Mr. Forbes was guilty. But, he added, "I wouldn't say it was clear cut."

If he had been convicted, Mr. Forbes would have faced more than 20 years in prison. A spokesman for Christopher J. Christie, the United States attorney for the New Jersey district, said the government had not yet decided whether it would prosecute Mr. Forbes a third time.

The fraud was discovered after CUC merged with another company, HFS, to form the Cendant Corporation, with holdings that included Avis car rental and Century 21 real estate. When the fraud was discovered in 1998, it was called the largest accounting fraud in American history — and investors lost $19 billion when Cendant's stock fell in the wake of the disclosure. But the company subsequently lost the title as Enron and WorldCom collapsed in scandal.

The fact pattern at Cendant would prove to be similar to the later rush of accounting fraud cases. The chief financial officer first denied anything was wrong, then confessed and agreed to testify against his boss. But orders to falsify books, if they were given, were given orally and documents were scarce.

In the WorldCom trial, the jury believed the chief financial officer and convicted Bernard J. Ebbers, the former chief executive. At HealthSouth, the jury chose not to believe a series of financial officers and acquitted Richard M. Scrushy, the former chief executive.

Now, two former Enron chief executives, Kenneth L. Lay and Jeffrey K. Skilling, are on trial in Houston, with Andrew S. Fastow, the former chief financial officer, expected to be a star prosecution witness. The strategy chosen by lawyers for the former Enron bosses is radically different, arguing that there really were no crimes and that the company failed because negative publicity caused a loss of confidence.

In the Forbes trial, Cosmo Corigliano, the former chief financial officer, testified that the books were cooked for years at Mr. Forbes's direction, and that every quarter he and Mr. Forbes discussed how much money would be taken from inflated reserves and used to increase profits to meet targets. Over the three-year period covered in the indictment, $250 million was thus added to profits.

Mr. Forbes denied that the conversations took place, and he also said he had never seen the "cheat sheets" that Mr. Corigliano said were shown to him each quarter, detailing how much the profits were being inflated.

Mr. Forbes, who has an M.B.A. degree from Harvard, as well as bachelor's and master's degrees in journalism from Northwestern University, testified he knew little of accounting and never paid any attention to how the profit figures were compiled.

To some extent, the case came down to a "he said, he said" battle between the men. Brandon Sullivan, Mr. Forbes's lawyer, branded Mr. Corigliano a liar and said there had to be at least a reasonable doubt whether he was telling the truth.

DOJ_NMG_0014063

But the prosecution pointed to other inconsistencies in the testimony. Steven Kernkraut, an analyst from Bear Stearns, testified that he had held discussions with Mr. Forbes regarding how merger reserves were set, and why the reserve for one merger was increased months after it was completed.

Mr. Forbes said that was wrong. "I never had a conversation with him after the deal was announced" regarding the reserves, he testified.

He also denied testimony from Mike Monaco, the HFS chief financial officer, that Mr. Forbes had fought to keep Ernst & Young as the auditor of CUC's books after the merger, even proposing that the company have two auditors.

Mr. Forbes said he never heard of such an idea, although he acknowledged that he was at a meeting whose minutes said the idea was discussed and rejected. Ernst had failed to spot the fraud, and the prosecution claimed Mr. Forbes wanted to keep the firm because he thought it could continue to be fooled.

Although the charges at the trial covered just three years, Mr. Corigliano told the court, when he pleaded guilty in 2000, that the fraud had been going on since the early 1980's, when he joined the company from Ernst & Whinney, a predecessor of Ernst & Young.

An accounting official, who said he followed Mr. Corigliano's orders to cook books, said he had followed similar orders from Mr. Corigliano's predecessor, Stuart Bell, who left the company in 1995. Mr. Bell, who was not charged with any crime, did not testify.

In describing his own role at CUC, Mr. Forbes said he was a visionary who mapped strategy and guided the company into mergers that enabled it to grow. But even there, he said, he avoided the details.

"I knew it was a strategic fit," he said in discussing one large acquisition, "but I never actually visited the company or met the principals."

Mr. Forbes said he was "stunned and shocked" when he first heard there were problems with the books. But he soon agreed to step down as chairman in return for a $47 million severance package that he promised to return to the company if he were convicted of a crime.

He quickly transferred many of his assets to his wife, but said he did not remember a warning from his lawyer that such an action would be viewed by prosecutors as an admission of guilt. At his first trial, he said the lawyer advised him there was nothing wrong with the transfer. At the second trial, the lawyer denied telling him that.

Those contradictions did not bother all the jurors, at least not enough to produce a conviction. Unless the government is willing to force a third trial, Mr. Forbes will have prevailed with his defense of not having any idea what was happening at the company he ran, just as Mr. Scrushy did.

Preliminary Approval Given To Bristol-Myers' $185M Shareholder Settlement (LAW/AP)

By Theresa Agovino, The Associated Press

AP, February 10, 2006

Bristol-Myers Squibb Co. said Thursday that a judge gave preliminary approval for a proposed $185 million settlement to end a class action lawsuit that alleges the drugmaker artificially inflated its stock price by making false and misleading claims about an experimental heart drug.

U.S. District Judge Stanley Chesler entered preliminary approval of a settlement for the case pending in the U.S. District Court in New Jersey, relating to the drug known as Vanlev, the company said. Vanlev was never approved.

Under the proposed settlement, Bristol-Myers Squibb will pay $185 million to create a settlement fund to pay the claims of certain investors who purchased Bristol-Myers Squibb common stock during the period from Oct. 19, 1999 through March 20, 2002.

Last month, Bristol-Myers announced it had reached a settlement with plaintiff lawyers and had established a reserve to settle the case. At that time, Thomas Dubbs, a plaintiffs lawyer in the case, said he hoped the settlement would act as a deterrent to other companies hiding damaging information.

The settlement also includes provisions regarding the company's commitment to the public disclosure of the results of certain clinical trials and the registration of trials on an appropriate publicly accessible database.

The shareholders' lawsuit alleges that company executives praised Vanlev as a potential blockbuster despite knowing it had potentially severe side effects as early as 1996.

But on April 19, 2000, Bristol-Myers announced it was withdrawing its application for approval from the U.S. Food and Drug Administration because of side effects. The stock fell 39 percent, according to the suit.

In July 2000, Bristol-Myers said it would test Vanlev at lower doses, where the problem of side effects didn't seem as severe. The complaint alleges that there were still problems at the lower doses and that Bristol-Myers didn't announce it to the market until March 20, 2002, sending the stock down more than 15 percent.

DOJ_NMG_0014064

The company said it agreed to the settlement without any admission of wrongdoing.

The court has set another hearing in the case for May 11.

Futures Traders Resist Tighter Oversight Plan (WSJ)

By Michael Schroeder

The Wall Street Journal, February 10, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Commodity Futures Trading Commission's reputation as a toothless regulator has been changing. Spurred by complaints that natural-gas prices have driven up the cost of fertilizer and farming, Congress is working on legislation to allow the CFTC to expand its regulation of energy trading in the commodity and over-the-counter market.

Some Wall Street traders, concerned by a spate of energy-manipulation cases brought by the CFTC, are fighting back. They are working to water down the policing authority of the CFTC, thereby stalling legislation to reauthorize the agency, which has operated without a charter since Sept. 30.

By law, the CFTC must be reauthorized every five years. There isn't much pressure to pass legislation before the charter expires because the agency's operating budget continues to be funded. However, every five years, various interests use the reauthorization legislation to strengthen or weaken the CFTC.

The CFTC was created in 1974 to oversee futures and options trading in agricultural and mineral contracts on commodity exchanges, such as the Chicago Mercantile Exchange. Wall Street regularly has succeeded in limiting its regulatory oversight. In late 1998, after the near-collapse of hedge fund Long-Term Capital Management, the then-chairwoman of the agency suggested that the CFTC should consider some regulation of derivatives contracts. Financial institutions, though, used their lobbying clout to get Congress to pass a bill in 2000 that exempted OTC derivatives -- and specifically energy transactions -- from most regulatory oversight. (The CFTC retained some authority to investigate wrongdoing in the market.)

This time around, energy users complain that shortages of natural gas have created a market dominated by speculators who manipulate prices.

Leading the effort is the American Public Gas Association, which represents gas utilities, and the Industrial Energy Consumers of America, which represents gas-consuming industries such as manufacturers and fertilizer producers.

Late last year, the House passed its version of the CFTC reauthorization bill with a last-minute amendment to help the regulator investigate natural-gas price manipulation on the OTC markets. In these markets, traders at banks, hedge funds and money management firms privately arrange transactions among themselves by phone or computer. Most natural-gas trading occurs over the counter.

The provision, by Rep. Sam Graves (R., Mo.) and Rep. John Barrow (D., Ga.), charges the CFTC with preventing and detecting manipulation of natural-gas markets, outlines more record-keeping requirements and increases the penalties for violations.

Mr. Graves said the measure stemmed from complaints by agriculture groups that natural-gas prices had driven up the costs of fertilizer and farming. Mild winter weather has spared consumers from steeper price increases.

State officials also are getting in the act. Utah Republican Gov. Jon Huntsman has called on federal agencies to probe the gas market and determine if prices are being manipulated. Massachusetts Attorney General Tom Reilly has sought to end what he describes as legal market manipulation of natural-gas prices in the state.

Scrutiny of energy markets rose after electricity traders at Enron Corp. and other companies fleeced California residents of hundreds of millions of dollars in 2002 by contriving power shortages. That triggered an energy-industry probe by the CFTC, which found widespread price manipulation. Nearly $300 million in fines has resulted from its investigation of about 55 energy companies -- with 27 companies and 23 individuals charged with either false-data reporting or attempted market manipulation.

John Damgard, president of the Futures Industry Association, which represents commodity exchanges, futures traders and banks, said the CFTC -- which has fewer than 500 employees and an annual budget of $97 million this year -- has no business investigating commodity scams. Federal prosecutors should be responsible for filing criminal cases against violators, he said.

Financial firms have taken note of the CFTC's pursuit of energy fraud in the OTC market. Energy users point to the slew of cases as evidence that the CFTC must have OTC policing powers.

Gregory Mocek, the CFTC enforcement director, said because trades on exchanges and over the counter are interdependent, each energy-enforcement case brought by the agency included violations that occurred on the OTC market.

Supporters of more oversight fear the financial-services lobby will not only kill the natural-gas provision in the House bill but may go further and try to water down the CFTC's existing enforcement authority.

"We'll do whatever we have to do to make sure (the natural-gas provision) won't pass," said Robert Pickel, executive director of the International Swaps and Derivatives Association.

DOJ_NMG_0014065

The opposition -- led by the futures and derivatives trade groups, the Bond Market Association and the Securities Industry Association -- has focused its lobbying on senators on both sides of the aisle, CFTC commissioners and staff, and Treasury and Federal Reserve officials. They argue that giving the CFTC more oversight authority on the OTC market would cause an exodus of U.S. trading business to less-regulated foreign markets.

"It's a cruel hoax that giving the CFTC more regulatory power will bring down the prices of natural gas and gasoline," Mr. Damgard said.

The dispute has bottled up legislation in the Senate, where the leadership has said it won't schedule a vote until there is enough agreement on a CFTC bill to assure passage.

The final arbiter likely will be a group of presidential advisers that includes the chiefs of the Federal Reserve, Treasury Department, Securities and Exchange Commission and CFTC. In letters to members of Congress, the Fed and Treasury have raised objections to any such regulation of OTC transactions, based on fears that it could cause "legal uncertainty" and breed lawsuits that could disrupt the market.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Cheney 'Authorized' Libby To Leak Classified Information (NATJOUR)

By Murray Waas, National Journal

National Journal, February 9, 2006

Vice President Dick Cheney's former chief of staff, I. Lewis (Scooter) Libby, testified to a federal grand jury that he had been "authorized" by Cheney and other White House "superiors" in the summer of 2003 to disclose classified information to journalists to defend the Bush administration's use of prewar intelligence in making the case to go to war with Iraq, according to attorneys familiar with the matter, and to court records.

According to sources with firsthand knowledge, Cheney authorized Libby to release additional classified information, including details of the NIE, to defend the administration's use of prewar intelligence in making the case for war.

Libby specifically claimed that in one instance he had been authorized to divulge portions of a then-still highly classified National Intelligence Estimate regarding Saddam Hussein's purported efforts to develop nuclear weapons, according to correspondence recently filed in federal court by special prosecutor Patrick J. Fitzgerald.

Beyond what was stated in the court paper, say people with firsthand knowledge of the matter, Libby also indicated what he will offer as a broad defense during his upcoming criminal trial: that Vice President Cheney and other senior Bush administration officials had earlier encouraged and authorized him to share classified information with journalists to build public support for going to war. Later, after the war began in 2003, Cheney authorized Libby to release additional classified information, including details of the NIE, to defend the administration's use of prewar intelligence in making the case for war.

Previous coverage of the CIA leak investigation from Murray Waas

Libby testified to the grand jury that he had been authorized to share parts of the NIE with journalists in the summer of 2003 as part of an effort to rebut charges then being made by former U.S. Ambassador Joseph Wilson that the Bush administration had misrepresented intelligence information to make a public case for war.

Wilson had been sent on a CIA-sponsored mission to investigate allegations that the African nation of Niger had sold uranium to Iraq to develop a nuclear weapon. Despite the fact that Wilson reported back that the information was most likely baseless, it was still used in the President's 2003 State of the Union speech to make the case for war.

But besides sharing details of the NIE with reporters during the effort to rebut Wilson, Libby is also accused of telling journalists that Wilson's wife, Valerie Plame, had worked for the CIA. Libby and other Bush administration officials believed that if Plame played a role in the selection of her husband for the Niger mission, that fact might discredit him.

A federal grand jury indicted Libby on October 28, 2005, on five counts of making false statements, perjury, and obstruction of justice, alleging that he concealed his role in leaking information about Plame to the media. He resigned his positions as chief of staff and national security adviser to Cheney the same day. Libby has never claimed that Cheney encouraged him to disclose information about Plame to the media.

In a January 23 letter, related to discovery issues for Libby's upcoming trial, Fitzgerald wrote to Libby's attorneys: "Mr. Libby testified in the grand jury that he had contact with reporters in which he disclosed the content of the National Intelligence Estimate ("NIE") … in the course of his interaction with reporters in June and July 2003.… We also note that it is our understanding that Mr. Libby testified that he was authorized to disclose information about the NIE to the press by his superiors."

Although it is not known if Cheney had told the special prosecutor that he had authorized Libby to leak classified information to reporters, Dan Richman, a professor of law at Fordham University and a former federal prosecutor for the

DOJ_NMG_0014066

Southern District of New York, said, "One certainly would not expect Libby, as part of his defense, to claim some sort of clear authorization from Cheney where none existed, because that would clearly risk the government's calling Cheney to rebut that claim."

The public correspondence does not mention the identities of the "superiors" who authorized the leaking of the classified information, but people with firsthand knowledge of the matter identified one of them as Cheney. Libby also testified that he worked closely with then-Deputy National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley and White House Deputy Chief of Staff Karl Rove in deciding what information to leak to the press to build public support for the war, and later, postwar, to defend the administration's use of prewar intelligence.

In the correspondence, Fitzgerald also asserted that Libby testified that he had met with then-New York Times reporter Judith Miller on July 8, 2003, with the "purpose" of intending "to transmit information" to her "concerning the NIE."

That particular meeting has been key to Fitzgerald's investigation because the special prosecutor alleges that Libby lied both to the FBI and to his federal grand jury by saying that he had not discussed Plame with Miller on that date, when in fact he did tell her of Plame's work for the CIA.

In an account of her grand jury testimony, Miller has written that Libby discussed the NIE with her: "Mr. Libby also cited a National Intelligence Estimate on Iraq, produced by American intelligence agencies in October 2002 … which he said had firmly concluded that Iraq was seeking uranium." Portions of the NIE were later declassified, but the material in it related to Niger was still classified at the time.

Libby, through a spokesperson, declined to comment, and the vice president, through a spokesperson, also declined to comment for this story.

The new disclosure that Libby has claimed that the vice president and others in the White House had authorized him to release information to make the case to go to war, and later to defend the administration's use of prewar intelligence, is significant for several reasons. First, it significantly adds to a mounting body of information that Cheney played a central and personal role in directing efforts to counter claims by Wilson and other administration critics that the Bush administration had misused intelligence information to go to war with Iraq.

Second, it raises additional questions about Libby's motives in concealing his role in leaking Plame's name to the press, if he was in fact more broadly authorized by Cheney and others to rebut former Ambassador Wilson's charges. The federal grand jury indictment of Libby alleges that he had lied to the FBI and the federal grand jury by claiming that when he provided information to reporters about Plame's CIA employment, he was only passing along what he understood to be unverified gossip that he had heard from other journalists.

Instead, the indictment charges that Libby had in fact learned of Plame's CIA status from at least four government officials, Cheney among them, and from classified documents. Indeed, much of Libby's earliest and most detailed information regarding Plame's CIA employment came directly from the vice president, according to information in Libby's grand jury indictment. "On or about June 12, 2003," the indictment stated, "Libby was advised by the Vice President of the United States that Wilson's wife worked at the Central Intelligence Agency in the Counterproliferation Division."

Libby testified that Cheney told him about Plame "in an off sort of, curiosity sort of, fashion," according to other information recently unsealed in federal court. Not long after that date, Libby, White House Deputy Chief of Staff Karl Rove, and a third administration official began to tell reporters that Plame had worked at the CIA, and that she had been responsible for sending her husband to Niger.

Finally, the new information indicates that Libby is likely to pursue a defense during his trial that he was broadly "authorized" by Cheney and other "superiors" to defend the Bush administration in making the case to go to war. Libby does not, however, appear to be claiming that he was acting specifically on Cheney's behalf in disclosing information about Plame to the press.

Libby's legal strategy in asserting that Cheney and other Bush administration officials authorized activities related to the underlying allegations of criminal conduct leveled against him, without approving of or encouraging him to engage in the specific misconduct, is reminiscent of the defense strategy used by Oliver North, who was a National Security Council official in the Reagan administration.

North, a Marine lieutenant colonel assigned to the National Security Council, implemented the Reagan administration's efforts to covertly send arms to Iran in exchange for the release of American hostages held in the Middle East, and to covertly fund and provide military assistance to the Nicaraguan Contras at a time when federal law prohibited such activities. Later, it was discovered that North and other Reagan administration officials had diverted funds they had received from the Iranian arms sales to covertly fund the Contras.

If Libby's defense adopts strategies used by North, it might be in part because the strategies largely worked for North and in part because Libby's defense team has quietly retained John D. Cline, who was a defense attorney for North. Cline, a San-Francisco partner at the Jones Day law firm, has specialized in the use of classified information in defending clients charged with wrongdoing in national security cases.

DOJ_NMG_0014067

Among his detractors, Cline is what is known as a "graymail" specialist-an attorney who, critics say, purposely makes onerous demands on the federal government to disclose classified information in the course of defending his clients, in an effort to force the government to dismiss the charges. Although Cline declined to be interviewed for this story, he has said that the use of classified information is necessary in assuring that defendants are accorded due process and receive fair trials.

In the Libby case, Cline has frustrated prosecutors by demanding, as part of pretrial discovery, more than 10 months of the President's Daily Brief, or PDBs, the president's morning intelligence briefing. The reports are among the most highly classified documents in government, not only because they often contain sensitive intelligence and methods, but also because they indicate what the president and policy makers consider to be the most pressing national security threats. In the past, the Bush administration has defied bipartisan requests from the Intelligence committees in Congress to turn over PDBs for review.

After Cline demanded the PDBs, Fitzgerald wrote to him on January 9 that the prosecutor's office has only "received a very discrete amount of material relating to PDBs" and "never requested copies of PDBs" themselves, in part because "they are extraordinarily sensitive documents which are usually highly classified." Moreover, Fitzgerald wrote, only a relatively small number of PDB pages included reference to Wilson's trip to Niger.

But Cline has insisted that it is imperative for his client's defense to be able to review the PDBs because part of Libby's defense is that he may have had a faulty memory regarding conversations he had with government officials and reporters regarding Plame, in that he had so many other pressing issues to consider every day as chief of staff and national security adviser to the vice president.

In a January 31 court filing, attorneys for Libby argued: "Mr. Libby will show that, in the constant rush of more pressing matters, any errors he made in FBI interviews or grand jury testimony, months after the conversations, were the result of confusion, mistake, faulty memory, rather than a willful intent to deceive."

In the North case, the Iran-Contra independent counsel, Lawrence Walsh, was forced to dismiss many of the central charges against North, including the most serious ones-that North defrauded taxpayers by diverting proceeds from arms sales to Iran to finance the Nicaraguan Contras-because intelligence agencies and the Reagan administration refused to declassify documents necessary for a trial on those charges.

Walsh and many of his deputies believed that the Reagan Justice Department refused to declassify documents necessary to try North because officials were personally sympathetic to him. A North trial would also have politically embarrassed the Reagan administration, and a North conviction might have led to charges against higher officials.

In court filings, Walsh said that much of what intelligence agencies and the Reagan administration had refused to declassify had long before been published in the media or made public in some other way.

"It was a backdoor way of shutting us down," said one former Iran-Contra prosecutor, who spoke only on the condition that his name not be used, because his current position as a private attorney requires frequent dealings with attorneys who were on the other side of the North case at the time. "It was a cover-up by means of an administrative action, and it was an effective cover-up at that."

The former prosecutor added: "The intelligence agencies do not declassify things on the pretext that they are protecting state secrets, but the truth is that we were investigating and prosecuting their own. The same was true for the Reagan administration. Cline was particularly adept at working the system."

Is it possible that a prosecution of Libby might be impeded or even derailed entirely by the refusal of the Bush White House or its Justice Department to declassify information that might be necessary to try Libby? "Under the current statute, it may well be the attorney general's call-or whomever he designates-to ultimately decide what should be declassified, and what might not be, in the Libby case," said Michael Bromwich, a former associate Iran-Contra independent counsel and a former Justice Department inspector general.

William Treanor, the dean of Fordham University's Law School, and also a former associate Iran-contra special counsel, said that it is less likely that the Bush administration would challenge Fitzgerald as former administrations did with special prosecutors. Walsh, dealing with the Reagan and elder Bush administrations, and Whitewater independent counsel Kenneth Starr, dealing with the Clinton administration, often alleged that political appointees in the Justice Department worked purposely to undermine their investigations.

"Walsh and Starr were not appointed by an attorney general," Treanor said, noting that Walsh, Starr, and earlier special prosecutors had been appointed by a three-judge federal panel instead of by the Justice Department. Currently, he pointed out, special prosecutors are appointed by the attorney general or their designate.

"With Walsh or Starr, the president and his supporters could more easily argue that a prosecutor was overzealous or irresponsible, because there had been a three-judge panel that appointed him," Treanor said. "With Fitzgerald, you have a prosecutor who was appointed by the deputy attorney general [at the direction of the attorney general]. The administration almost has to stand behind him because this is someone they selected themselves. It is harder to criticize someone you yourself put into play."

DOJ_NMG_0014068

There are other reasons why it might prove difficult to undercut Fitzgerald, including outstanding questions about the role that Cheney and others in the Bush administration played in the effort to discredit Wilson, and the fact that Cheney is still the point man in defending the White House's use of prewar intelligence on Iraq.

And the new disclosure, that Libby is alleging that Cheney and other Bush administration officials "authorized" him to disclose classified information as a means to counter charges that the administration misused prewar intelligence, might also make it difficult for this administration to refuse to declassify information for Libby's trial.

But a Libby defense strategy asserting that he released classified information or took other actions as broadly authorized by Cheney might have other advantages, if the North case is any guide. At North's trial, the counts on which the jury acquitted him tended to be those involving actions that appeared to be authorized by superiors. He was found guilty of three felonies on which the evidence indicated that he was acting on his own initiative or for his own financial benefit.

"It was a memorable and powerful moment when North told the jury that he was 'a pawn in a chess game played by giants,'" Treanor said.

The claims by North that his activities had been broadly authorized by higher-ups, including even the president, also worked to his advantage when he was sentenced. Despite the fact that North had been convicted of three felonies and that Iran-Contra prosecutors argued before sentencing that letting North off with "only a slap on the wrist … would send exactly the wrong message … [only] 15 years after Watergate," he was sentenced to only probation, a fine, and community service.

North's trial judge, U.S. District Court Judge Gerhard Gesell, took note that the jury had acquitted North of criminal charges mainly where it appeared that his conduct might have been authorized by higher authorities: "Observing that many others involved in the events were escaping without censure or with prosecutorial promises of leniency or immunities, [the jury] used their common sense. And they gave you the benefit of a reasonable doubt."

Explaining his own leniency in sentencing the former NSC aide, Gesell told North: "I do not believe you were a leader at all, but really a low-ranking subordinate to carry out initiatives of a few cynical superiors. You came to be a point man in a very complex power play developed by higher-ups."

Later, North's convictions were overturned on appeal because of concerns that some of the evidence used against him during his trial might have been derived from his testimony before the House-Senate Iran-Contra investigating committee. North had been given immunity for that testimony.

But most outside legal observers say that Libby, because he was himself such a high-ranking official, will most likely face a much more difficult time than North did in arguing that, in some of his activities, he was just carrying out orders from Cheney or other senior White House officials.

"A defendant can make a claim that he is just a victim of Washington politics or doing the bidding for someone else," said Richman, the former prosecutor, "But there may be limits to a jury's sympathy when that defendant himself was so high-ranking. Given Libby's position in the White House, the jury is less likely to view him as a sacrificial lamb than as a sacrificial ram."

Libby: White House 'Superiors' Authorized Leaks (AP)

The Associated Press, February 10, 2006

WASHINGTON — A former top aide to Vice President Dick Cheney told a federal grand jury that his superiors authorized him to give secret information to reporters as part of the Bush administration's defense of intelligence used to justify invading Iraq, according to court papers.

Special prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald said in documents filed last month that he plans to introduce evidence that I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, Cheney's former chief of staff, disclosed to reporters the contents of a classified National Intelligence Estimate in the summer of 2003.

The NIE is a report prepared by the head of the nation's intelligence operations for high-level government officials, up to and including the president. Portions of NIEs are sometimes declassified and made public. It is unclear whether that happened in this instance.

In a Jan. 23 letter to Libby's lawyers, Fitzgerald said Libby also testified before the grand jury that he caused at least one other government official to discuss an intelligence estimate with reporters in July 2003.

"We also note that it is our understanding that Mr. Libby testified that he was authorized to disclose information about the NIE to the press by his superiors," Fitzgerald wrote.

White House spokesman Scott McClellan refused to comment. "Our policy is that we are not going to discuss this when it's an ongoing legal proceeding," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0014069

William Jeffress, Libby's lawyer, said, "There is no truth at all" to suggestions that Libby would try to shift blame to his superiors as a defense against the charges.

Libby, 55, was indicted late last year on charges that he lied to FBI agents and the grand jury about how he learned CIA operative Valerie Plame's identity and when he subsequently told reporters. He is not charged with leaking classified information from an intelligence estimate report.

Plame's identity was published in July 2003 by columnist Robert Novak after her husband, former U.S. Ambassador Joseph Wilson, accused the administration of twisting intelligence about Iraq's efforts to buy uranium in Niger. The year before, the CIA had sent Wilson to Niger to determine the accuracy of the uranium reports.

Wilson's revelations cast doubt on President Bush's claim in his 2003 State of the Union address that Iraq was trying to develop a nuclear bomb and had sought to buy uranium in Africa as one of the administration's key justifications for going to war in Iraq.

On Thursday, Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., said Cheney should take responsibility if he authorized Libby to share classified information with reporters.

"These charges, if true, represent a new low in the already sordid case of partisan interests being placed above national security," Kennedy said. "The vice president's vindictiveness in defending the misguided war in Iraq is obvious. If he used classified information to defend it, he should be prepared to take full responsibility."

In the summer of 2003, White House officials — including Libby — were frustrated that the media were incorrectly reporting that Cheney had sent Wilson to Niger and had received a report of his findings in Africa before the war in Iraq had begun.

In an effort to counter those reports, Libby and other White House officials sought information from the CIA regarding Wilson and how his trip to Niger came about, according to court records.

Fitzgerald, in his letter to Libby's lawyers, said he plans to use Libby's grand jury testimony to support evidence pertaining to the White House aide's meeting with former New York Times reporter Judith Miller.

During the meeting with Miller on July 8, Libby also discussed Plame, Fitzgerald said. "Our anticipated basis for offering such evidence is that such facts are inextricably intertwined with the narrative of the events of spring 2003, as Libby's testimony itself makes plain," the prosecutor wrote.

Miller spent 85 days in jail for refusing to discuss her source.

Ex-Cheney Aide Testified Leak Was Ordered, Prosecutor Says (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis

The New York Times, February 10, 2006

WASHINGTON, Feb. 9 — I. Lewis Libby Jr., the former chief of staff to Vice President Dick Cheney, told a grand jury that he was authorized by his "superiors" to disclose classified information to reporters about Iraq's weapons capability in June and July 2003, according to a document filed by a federal prosecutor.

The document shows that Mr. Libby, known as Scooter, was actively engaged in the Bush administration's public relations effort to rebut complaints that there was little evidence to support the claim that Saddam Hussein possessed or sought weapons of mass destruction, which was used to justify the invasion of Iraq.

The document is part of the prosecutors' case against Mr. Libby, who has been indicted on charges that he lied about his role in exposing the identity of a C.I.A. operative to journalists.

The prosecutor, Patrick J. Fitzgerald, said in a letter to Mr. Libby's lawyers last month that Mr. Libby had testified before the grand jury that "he had contacts with reporters in which he disclosed the content of the National Intelligence Estimate ('NIE')," that discussed Iraq's nuclear weapons capability. "We also note that it is our understanding that Mr. Libby testified that he was authorized to disclose information about the NIE to the press by his superiors."

Mr. Libby was indicted on five counts of perjury and obstruction of justice last October in what Mr. Fitzgerald has charged was a willful misleading of investigators about his role in exposing Valerie Wilson as an officer of the Central Intelligence Agency. Ms. Wilson is the wife of Joseph C. Wilson IV, a former ambassador who had accused the administration of twisting intelligence about Iraq's efforts to buy uranium from the government of Niger.

Ms. Wilson's identity was first disclosed in a column by Robert D. Novak in July 2003, just after Mr. Wilson wrote an Op-Ed column in The New York Times saying he had investigated the Niger claim and found little evidence to support it. Mr. Wilson charged that destroying his wife's undercover status was a way to discredit him and his assertions.

The prosecutor's note of Jan. 23 does not, however, make any reference to Mr. Libby's involvement in the disclosure of Ms. Wilson's identity. It seems, rather, to be part of an effort by the prosecutor to demonstrate that Mr. Libby was engaged in using secret information to press the administration's case at the same time that Ms. Wilson's identity was leaked to reporters.

DOJ_NMG_0014070

The letter was first reported Thursday by the National Journal, which said its sources had identified that one of the superiors was Mr. Cheney.

The National Intelligence Estimate, which was done in October 2002, said that Iraq "will probably have a nuclear weapon during this decade," but it included some dissenting views. The report was classified.

But amid doubts about the rationale for the invasion of Iraq some of which were attributable to Mr. Wilson's Op-Ed article, the administration declassified the report on July 18.

Mr. Fitzgerald said in his letter that Mr. Libby discussed the contents of the classified report in a July 8 meeting — 10 days before it was declassified — with Judith Miller, then a reporter at The Times. Ms. Miller, who spent 85 days in jail before agreeing to testify in the leak case, has told the grand jury that Mr. Libby told her about Ms. Wilson at the same meeting.

Mr. Fitzgerald said that Mr. Libby's testimony showed how Ms. Wilson's status was disclosed. "Our anticipated basis for offering such evidence is that such facts are inextricably intertwined with the narrative of the events of spring, 2003, as Libby's testimony itself makes plain," he wrote.

Mr. Libby's lawyers have already suggested they will mount a defense in which they will not challenge the charge that he made misstatements about how he learned of Ms. Wilson's identity and whether he shared that information with reporters. They have said that any statements he made to investigators that might have been untrue were the result of his preoccupation with many serious matters of national security at the time.

Libby Says 'Superiors' Authorized Leaks (LAT)

By Richard B. Schmitt

The Los Angeles Times, February 10, 2006

WASHINGTON — Former vice presidential aide I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby has told a federal grand jury that his "superiors" authorized him to leak highly sensitive intelligence to journalists, including a New York Times reporter he allegedly tipped off to the name of an undercover CIA operative.

The revelation is contained in a Jan. 23 letter from Special Prosecutor Patrick J. Fitzgerald to lawyers for Libby, who was indicted in late October in connection with the leak of the operative's name. In the letter, Fitzgerald recounts testimony in which Vice President Dick Cheney's former chief of staff admitted circulating portions of the National Intelligence Estimate to reporters in June and July 2003.

"It is our understanding that Mr. Libby testified that he was authorized to disclose information about the [National Intelligence Estimate] to the press by his superiors," Fitzgerald wrote.

The letter did not identify those superiors. The National Journal reported on its website Thursday that Cheney, who was Libby's direct boss at the time, had authorized the disclosures.

The revelation that leaks were authorized comes as the Bush administration has been quick to condemn others for failing to safeguard secrets since the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks. Cheney has been among the most aggressive in lashing out against what officials have described as unauthorized leaks that have gravely hurt the country.

In a speech Thursday evening at the Conservative Political Action Conference, Cheney made no reference to the report of Libby's testimony.

But he renewed his sharp criticism of the leak that led to December reports in the New York Times that the National Security Agency was monitoring communications, without court warrants, between people in the U.S. and suspected Al Qaeda operatives outside the country.

"The terrorist surveillance program was highly classified, and information about it was improperly given to the news media," the vice president said.

Noting that Atty. Gen. Alberto R. Gonzales had appeared before the Senate Judiciary Committee on Monday, Cheney added: "As the attorney general pointed out this week, it's easy to imagine America's enemies shaking their heads in amazement that anyone would disclose this information, thereby giving notice to those enemies and [endangering] national security, putting our citizens at risk. But that is what happened."

The surveillance program, he said, has helped prevent attacks and "remains essential" to U.S. security.

Lea Anne McBride, Cheney's press secretary, referred questions about the Libby letter to Fitzgerald's office. She declined to discuss whether Cheney had been involved with the leaks, saying only, "We continue to cooperate fully with the investigation." A spokesman for Fitzgerald declined to comment.

In late December, the Justice Department launched an aggressive leak investigation into media reports about the domestic surveillance program. In another case, the CIA is believed to have asked Justice Department officials to probe the sources of a Washington Post report last year that the agency was operating a secret prison system for terrorist suspects in Europe.

DOJ_NMG_0014071

The National Intelligence Estimates are reports that are meant to convey a consensus view in the intelligence community on issues confronting policymakers. Portions of the documents are sometimes made public.

Fitzgerald's letter did not specify which National Intelligence Estimate Libby shared with reporters or whether it was classified, and Fitzgerald has not charged Libby with disclosing classified information. Fitzgerald said in the letter that he intended to introduce the testimony at Libby's trial, set for January 2007, as part of establishing a "narrative of the events" rather than to show that a crime was committed.

Fitzgerald wrote in the correspondence, which was part of a defense motion filed Jan. 31, that Libby had testified that he caused at least one other government official to discuss an intelligence estimate with reporters in July 2003.

One such report, produced in October 2002, was a foundation of the administration's flawed case for going to war in Iraq. It asserted that Saddam Hussein had chemical and biological weapons and was rebuilding his nuclear program. Cheney was among the most ardent administration proponents of that viewpoint, although a report by the Senate Intelligence Committee subsequently found that none of the claims were backed up by evidence.

Libby, 55, was indicted on charges of obstruction of justice, making false statements and perjury. Prosecutors contend that he lied to FBI agents and a federal grand jury about how he learned the identity of CIA operative Valerie Plame.

The unmasking of Plame, in a July 2003 article by columnist Robert Novak, has been linked to the administration's rationale for going to war in Iraq. In 2002, at the request of the CIA, Plame's husband, former Ambassador Joseph C. Wilson IV, traveled to Niger to investigate allegations that Hussein had sought to purchase uranium there. In a New York Times op-ed article published eight days before Novak's column appeared, Wilson accused the administration of twisting intelligence about Iraq's nuclear capabilities.

Wilson's concerns, which had surfaced anonymously earlier that spring, were a source of frustration and irritation for Cheney and other officials.

Libby and Karl Rove, Bush's chief political strategist, have acknowledged speaking with reporters about Plame in the days before Novak's column was published. Libby testified that he first learned of Plame's identity from Tim Russert of NBC News, but Fitzgerald charged that the former aide had lied and that he had learned her identity independently and spread it around. Among the people who told Libby that Wilson's wife worked at the CIA was Cheney, the indictment of Libby alleges.

Fitzgerald said in his Jan. 23 letter that Libby testified that he met with Judith Miller of the New York Times on July 8, 2003, to transmit information about the intelligence estimate. Fitzgerald has separately alleged that at the same interview, Libby advised Miller of his belief that Wilson's wife worked for the CIA.

Miller, who spent 85 days in jail before agreeing to testify about her interviews with Libby, has written that Fitzgerald asked her whether Libby had indicated that Cheney had authorized the conversations or was even aware of them.

"The answer was no," Miller wrote.

Libby Testifies Superiors Approved Secret-Data Leak (WSJ)

By Anne Marie Squeo And John D. Mckinnon

The Wall Street Journal, February 10, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald has informed attorneys for former Vice Presidential Chief of Staff I. Lewis Libby that Mr. Libby said he was authorized "by his superiors" to leak classified information in mid-2003 as part of the Bush administration's defense of the war in Iraq.

In a Jan. 23 letter, released as part of a court filing by Mr. Libby's defense team, Mr. Fitzpatrick discusses Mr. Libby leaking parts of what is known as the National Intelligence Estimate to reporters. It specifically states that Mr. Libby testified to the grand jury that he discussed material in the classified document with reporters. In the letter, Mr. Fitzgerald goes on to say, "it is our understanding that Mr. Libby testified that he was authorized to disclose information about the NIE to the press by his superiors."

Mr. Libby, facing trial for lying to federal investigators and a grand jury in a federal probe into whether administration officials purposely blew the cover of covert Central Intelligence Agency official Valerie Plame, wasn't charged with leaking classified information.

Ms. Plame's husband, former ambassador Joseph Wilson, had publicly and privately rebuked the administration's reasoning for the war in Iraq.

But the disclosure that Mr. Libby told a grand jury that he was authorized by his superiors, possibly including Vice President Dick Cheney, to reveal secret information to the press is embarrassing for the White House. President Bush initially insisted he would fire anyone involved in leaking the CIA operative's name and his administration has prided itself on controlling information. Mr. Bush has called for an investigation into which administration officials leaked information related to the classified warrantless wiretapping program he launched after Sept. 11; the Justice Department is investigating.

DOJ_NMG_0014072

Mr. Libby's legal team quickly shot down any notion that blaming Mr. Cheney would be part of their client's defense. "There is no truth at all to the story that Mr. Libby's lawyers have advised the court or the special counsel that he will raise a defense based on authorization by superiors," said William Jeffress, one of Mr. Libby's attorneys.

White House spokesman Scott McClellan declined to comment on the Fitzgerald letter. Mr. Cheney's spokeswoman referred questions to the special prosecutor's office, as she has done previously, and noted that the vice president's office is cooperating in the probe.

Libby Testified He Was Told To Leak Data About Iraq (WP)

By Carol D. Leonnig

The Washington Post, February 10, 2006

Vice President Cheney's former chief of staff testified that his bosses instructed him to leak information to reporters from a high-level intelligence report that suggested Iraq was trying to obtain weapons of mass destruction, according to court records in the CIA leak case.

Cheney was one of the "superiors" I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby said had authorized him to make the disclosures, according to sources familiar with the investigation into Libby's discussions with reporters about CIA operative Valerie Plame.

But it is unclear whether Cheney instructed his former top aide to release classified information, because parts of the National Intelligence Estimate were previously declassified.

The disclosure in a legal document written by special prosecutor Patrick J. Fitzgerald demonstrates one way in which Cheney was involved in responding to public allegations by Plame's husband, former ambassador Joseph C. Wilson IV, that the administration had exaggerated questionable intelligence to justify war with Iraq.

In a letter written in January and released in court papers filed by Libby's defense Monday, Fitzgerald wrote that Libby testified that his "superiors" authorized him to disclose information from the National Intelligence Estimate to reporters in the summer of 2003.

The National Journal first reported on its Web site yesterday that Cheney had provided the authorization.

The intelligence estimate is a classified report prepared by intelligence officers for high-level government officials, and some parts are regularly declassified in a summary and available to the public.

Cheney spokeswoman Lea Anne McBride declined to comment on Cheney's role in Libby's discussions of the intelligence estimate, referring calls to Fitzgerald's office. Fitzgerald's spokesman has declined to comment on the prosecutor's investigation and filings.

Libby was indicted in October on charges of obstruction of justice, perjury and making false statements in the course of the investigation. Fitzgerald has been trying to determine since January 2004 whether administration officials knowingly disclosed Plame's identity to reporters to discredit Wilson's allegations, a possible violation of law.

Plame's name first appeared in a syndicated column by Robert D. Novak in July 2003, eight days after her husband publicly accused the administration of relying on questionable information about Iraq's weapons program to justify the war.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) said the new information about Libby's testimony exposes a possible hypocrisy within the Bush administration as it seeks to punish those who leak politically embarrassing information about secret CIA prisons and warrantless spying, but encourages leaks that aid the administration's political strategy.

"These charges, if true, represent a new low in the already sordid case of partisan interests being placed above national security," Kennedy said in a statement. "The Vice President's vindictiveness in defending the misguided war in Iraq is obvious."

Larry Johnson, a former intelligence officer and colleague of Plame's who has been critical of the administration's campaign against Wilson, said the Libby testimony helps prove that top executive branch officials were working to discredit an administration critic.

"This was not some rogue operation, but was directed at the highest levels, and specifically by Dick Cheney," Johnson said. "Libby was definitely a man with a mission, but a man who was given a mission."

E-Mail Notes Say Lobbyist Met President Many Times (NYT)

By Philip Shenon

The New York Times, February 10, 2006

WASHINGTON, Feb. 9 — The disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff told a magazine editor in recent days that he had met with President Bush many times and was invited to the president's Texas ranch for a gathering of campaign contributors in 2003, the editor said Thursday.

The journalist, Kim Eisler, national editor of Washingtonian magazine, said in an interview that he had received the information in e-mail messages from Mr. Abramoff, a major Republican fund-raiser who pleaded guilty last month to conspiring to bribe public officials. The messages suggest an effort by Mr. Abramoff to cast doubt on Mr. Bush's insistence that he does not recall the two of them meeting and that whatever contact they might have had was fleeting and for the purposes of a handshake and a picture.

DOJ_NMG_0014073

In one message, Mr. Abramoff is reported as saying that Mr. Bush had "one of the best memories of any politician I have ever met" and that he "saw me in almost a dozen settings and joked with me about a bunch of things, including details of my kids." It added: "Perhaps he has forgotten everything. Who knows."

An Abramoff defense spokesman, Andrew Blum, said he could not comment on the e-mail messages or confirm their authenticity.

Mr. Eisler said he had been in contact with Mr. Abramoff since interviewing him six years ago for research for a book Mr. Eisler was writing about Indian reservation gambling; Mr. Abramoff's most lucrative lobbying clients were Indian casinos.

Parts of the messages became public this week, Mr. Eisler said, after he shared them with a writer for a political Web site, thinkprogress .org, without realizing that the Web site would make them public. The portions of e-mail messages posted on the site do not provide details of any meetings between Mr. Bush and Mr. Abramoff and do not refer to the substance of any conversations between them except for pleasantries about their families.

"I considered them confidential e-mails, and it was a slip on my part to release a portion of them," Mr. Eisler said.

The White House has tried to distance itself from Mr. Abramoff, and at a news conference last month, Mr. Bush said that while he might have had photographs taken with the lobbyist, "I don't know him." He added, "I frankly don't even remember having my picture taken with the guy."

The White House spokesman, Scott McClellan, was asked about Mr. Abramoff's e-mail messages on Thursday and said, "I think what the president says still stands: Mr. Abramoff is someone who was involved in wrongdoing, he has acknowledged that himself."

According to the messages, Mr. Abramoff wrote that he was invited to Mr. Bush's ranch in Crawford, Tex., in 2003 for a gathering of fund-raisers but was unable to attend because he does not travel on the Jewish Sabbath.

"I would have had to travel on Saturday (Shabbos)," he wrote. "Yes, I was invited, during the 2004 campaign. It was Saturday Aug. 9, 2003 at the ranch in Crawford."

Mr. Abramoff wrote that Mr. Bush "has one of the best memories of any politician I have ever met" and that his memory was one of Mr. Bush's "trademarks, though of course he can't recall that he has a great memory!"

Mr. Eisler said that Mr. Abramoff had told him details of the conversations between the lobbyist and his wife and Mr. Bush and Laura Bush, including discussions of the fact that both couples had twins.

Lobbyist Told Reporter Of Nearly A Dozen Contacts With Bush (WP)

By Jim Vandehei

The Washington Post, February 10, 2006

President Bush met lobbyist Jack Abramoff almost a dozen times over the past five years and invited him to Crawford, Tex., in the summer of 2003, according to an e-mail Abramoff wrote to a reporter last month.

Bush "has one of the best memories of any politicians I have ever met," Abramoff wrote to Kim Eisler of Washingtonian magazine. "The guys saw me in almost a dozen settings, and joked with me about a bunch of things, including details of my kids."

In an interview last night, Eisler confirmed the contents of the e-mail and said he recently provided portions of it to the liberal Web log ThinkProgress because he thought he was dealing with a fellow reporter. The blog posted the contents of the Abramoff-Eisler communication.

In the e-mail, Abramoff scoffs at Bush's public statements that he does not recall ever meeting the disgraced lobbyist and former top Bush fundraiser. "Of course he can't recall that he has a great memory!" Abramoff wrote. Eisler, an editor for Washingtonian, said in the interview that the lobbyist was the source of his exclusive report last month that at least five photographs of Bush with Abramoff exist. Abramoff showed him the pictures, Eisler said. Abramoff has told others he will not release them publicly.

Bush has said he does not recall ever meeting Abramoff or posing for pictures with the Republican lobbyist at official events or parties. The White House has refused to release the pictures or detail Abramoff's contacts with top White House officials over the past five years.

White House spokesman Scott McClellan said yesterday that "what the president said still stands."

"Mr. Abramoff is someone who was involved in wrongdoing," McClellan said. "He acknowledged that himself. He is being brought to account." Abramoff would not comment last night.

DOJ_NMG_0014074

Abramoff pleaded guilty last month in a bribery and corruption scandal that has rocked the Republican Party and threatened the political and professional careers of several lawmakers and aides. No evidence has emerged that Bush or his top White House aides did anything improper to aid Abramoff or his clients, according to people familiar with the investigation. Several lower-level administration officials, however, have been caught up in the scandal, including the top procurement official. The federal probe is expected to zero in on Abramoff's dealing with the Interior Department as it unfolds in the coming months.

In mentioning the invitation to Texas in 2003, Abramoff was apparently referring to a private barbecue Bush hosted for his biggest fundraisers at the Broken Spoke Ranch, down the road from the president's rustic compound near Crawford, on Aug. 9 of that year. About 350 Republicans who had raised at least $50,000 each for Bush were invited.

Abramoff was member of the exclusive group of top Bush fundraisers known as Pioneers, each of whom raised $100,000 or more for Bush. So it would not have been unusual for him to be invited to the barbecue. McClellan said that the photographs are no different from thousands Bush takes each year with visitors, supporters and even reporters and that it would not be unusual for the president to not recall meeting Abramoff.

"Perhaps he has forgotten everything," Abramoff wrote in the e-mail. "Who knows?" Eisler said Abramoff did not grant him permission to release the contents of their e-mail and Abramoff is upset that Eisler did. Eisler, who described himself as sympathetic to Abramoff's situation, was trying to show the ThinkProgress reporter that Abramoff was not exaggerating his relationship with Bush.

Eisler said he has known Abramoff for years and considers the level of vilification "out of proportion."

Abramoff Says He Met Bush "almost A Dozen" Times (REU)

By Andy Sullivan

Reuters, February 10, 2006

WASHINGTON (Reuters) - Jack Abramoff said in correspondence made public on Thursday that President Bush met him "almost a dozen" times, disputing White House claims Bush did not know the former lobbyist at the center of a corruption scandal.

"The guy saw me in almost a dozen settings, and joked with me about a bunch of things, including details of my kids. Perhaps he has forgotten everything, who knows," Abramoff wrote in an e-mail to Kim Eisler, national editor for the Washingtonian magazine.

Abramoff added that Bush also once invited him to his Texas ranch.

The messages were made public by the American Progress Action Fund, a liberal activist group. Eisler confirmed their accuracy to Reuters but said he did not intend them to become public.

"They reflect the feeling of frustration he has not just with Bush but with all these guys claiming they didn't know him," said Eisler, who knew Abramoff through a book he wrote about the Pequot Indian tribe.

Abramoff pleaded guilty to fraud charges in early January and is cooperating with prosecutors in a corruption probe that could implicate lawmakers and officials across Washington.

Bush has said he never had a discussion with Abramoff and does not remember having his picture taken with him.

The White House has said Abramoff attended three Hanukkah receptions at the White House.

Eisler said he had seen five photographs of Abramoff with Bush, none taken at Hanukkah parties.

White House spokesman Scott McClellan said on Thursday that the revelations did not prove Bush knew him well.

"I think as the president also indicated, he's taken at least five photos with many people in this room at the annual holiday reception. And so I think you need to put this in context," McClellan said.

Abramoff spokesman Andrew Blum declined to comment.

Abramoff raised more than $100,000 for Bush's 2004 re-election campaign, a feat that won him an invitation to Bush's ranch in August 2003, the National Journal reported at the time.

"I was invited during the 2004 campaign," Abramoff told Eisler.

Abramoff said he did not make the trip because as an Orthodox Jew he cannot travel on Saturdays.

In the wake of Abramoff's indictment, the Bush-Cheney campaign said it would donate to charity $6,000 in contributions made by Abramoff or his clients, but not the money he helped raise.

The White House has acknowledged he participated in a few staff-level meetings at the White House.

Although the Abramoff scandal has mostly focused attention so far on prominent House Republicans, including former Majority Leader Tom DeLay of Texas, at least two Bush administration officials have been implicated.

David Safavian, a former White House budget official, has been charged with lying and obstructing investigations into his 2002 golf outing to Scotland with Abramoff.

DOJ_NMG_0014075

Stephen Griles, the former No. 2 official at the Interior Department, has come under scrutiny after allegations he tried to block a casino at Abramoff's request.

Abramoff Team And Reid's Office Had Frequent Contact, Records Show (WP)

By John Solomon And Sharon Theimer

The Washington Post, February 10, 2006

Senate Minority Leader Harry M. Reid wrote at least four letters helpful to Indian tribes represented by Jack Abramoff, and Reid's staff had frequent contact with the disgraced lobbyist's team about legislation.

The activities -- detailed in previously unreported billing records and correspondence -- occurred over three years as Reid (D-Nev.) collected nearly $68,000 in political donations from Abramoff's firm, lobbying partners and clients.

Reid's office yesterday acknowledged having "routine contacts" with Abramoff's lobbying partners. Reid intervened on government matters in ways that Abramoff's tribal clients might have deemed helpful, once opposing legislation on the Senate floor and four times sending letters pressing the Bush administration on tribal issues. Reid collected donations around the time of each action.

Abramoff's firm also hired one of Reid's top legislative aides as a lobbyist. The aide later helped throw a fundraiser for Reid at Abramoff's firm that raised money from several of Abramoff's lobbying partners.

A Reid spokesman said none of the senator's actions were affected by donations or done for Abramoff. "All the actions that Senator Reid took were consistent with his long-held beliefs, such as not letting tribal casinos expand beyond reservations, and were taken to defend the interests of Nevada constituents," spokesman Jim Manley said.

Abramoff has pleaded guilty to fraud and bribery and is helping prosecutors investigate the conduct of lawmakers, congressional aides and administration officials his team used to lobby.

Abramoff spokesman Andrew Blum declined to comment on the Reid contacts.

Reid has assailed Republicans' ties to Abramoff while refusing to return any of his own donations. He argues there is no need to return the money. "Senator Reid never met Jack Abramoff and never has taken contributions from him, and efforts to drag him into this are going to fail," Manley said.

Although Abramoff never donated personally to Reid, the lobbyist did instruct one tribe, the Louisiana Coushattas, to send $5,000 to Reid's tax-exempt political group, the Searchlight Leadership Fund, in 2002. Reid was Democratic whip at the time.

Abramoff sent a list to the tribe titled "Coushatta Requests" recommending donations to campaigns or groups for 50 lawmakers. Alongside Reid's name, Abramoff wrote, "5,000 (Searchlight Leadership Fund) Senate Majority Whip."

About the same time, Reid sent a letter to the Interior Department helpful to the tribe, records show. His March 5, 2002, letter pressed the agency to reject a casino proposed by a potential rival to the Coushattas, the Jena Band of Choctaw Indians. Sen. John Ensign (R-Nev.) also signed the letter.

Reid also officially opposed new tribal casinos in California and Michigan, where Abramoff had tribal clients with casinos.

Reid and Ensign recently wrote the Senate Ethics Committee to say their letter had nothing to do with Abramoff or the donation and instead reflected their interest in protecting Las Vegas's gambling establishments.

"As senators for the state with the largest nontribal gaming industry in the nation, we have long opposed the growth of off-reservation tribal gaming throughout the United States," Ensign and Reid wrote. Reid authored the law legalizing casinos on reservations, and he has long argued it does not allow tribal gambling off reservations.

Abramoff's group had earlier contacts with Reid's office over the Northern Mariana Islands, a U.S. territory and one of Abramoff's highest paying clients. In 2001, records show, Abramoff's lobbying partners billed for nearly two dozen phone contacts or meetings with Reid's office, mostly to discuss Democratic legislation that would have gradually applied the U.S. minimum wage to the islands. Republicans wanted to keep the islands exempt.

Reid, along with his Senate counsel, Jim Ryan, met with Abramoff deputy Ronald Platt on June 5, 2001, "to discuss timing on minimum wage bill," according to a bill that Greenberg Traurig, Abramoff's firm, sent the Marianas. Three weeks before the meeting, Greenberg Traurig's political action committee donated $1,000 to Reid's Senate reelection committee. Three weeks after the meeting, Platt himself donated $1,000 to Reid.

Manley said Reid's official calendar does not list a meeting on June 5, 2001, with Platt, but he also said he could not say for sure the contact did not occur. Manley confirmed Platt had regular contacts with Reid's office, calling them part of the "routine checking in" by lobbyists who work Capitol Hill.

As for the timing of donations, Manley said, "There is no connection. This is just a typical part of lawful fundraising."

Platt and a fellow lobbyist also reported a contact on May 30, 2001, with Edward P. Ayoob, Reid's legislative counsel. Within a year, Ayoob had left Reid's office to work for Abramoff's firm, registering to lobby for the islands as well as several tribes. Manley confirmed Ayoob had subsequent lobbying contacts with Reid's office.

DOJ_NMG_0014076

Editorial: Curious Move In Abramoff Case (BUFFNEWS)

Buffalo News, February 10, 2006

If you believe in coincidence, then taking prosecutor off investigation makes sense

Jack Abramoff prosecutor Noel Hillman may deserve the White House nomination he recently got for a federal judgeship in New Jersey, but the timing is suspicious and the probe into unethical and illegal activities in Washington will suffer.

Hillman was chief of the Justice Department's Office of Public Integrity until the nomination caused him to step down. He was deeply involved in the federal probe of activities by super-lobbyist Abramoff and his colleagues, and sat in on the negotiations that led to plea deals in return for cooperation that could reveal which congressmen or agency officials took what in return for favors. Two years of experience are lost, just when the investigation zeros in on its most important targets.

Coincidence? Maybe, if you believe in such things. The selection process, according to the Justice Department, started a year ago. Hillman was part of a batch of nominations to judgeships that needed to be filled, and he wants the job. But this probe now is venturing deeply into Congress - and most notably its Republicans, although a few Democrats also received campaign donations from Abramoff clients. It's also looking hard into the Bush administration bureaucracy. Removing an aggressive prosecutor at this point will pass the sniff test only if the Justice Department finds an equally aggressive replacement - or the White House agrees to a special prosecutor.

The current investigation now is tainted, Hillman's experience already lost. The challenge the government faces is to enact meaningful ethics reforms that tighten the rules and end limits on complaints and internal investigations. But it's not enough to hold officials more accountable to their own houses of Congress in future cases. The present probe needs to gain momentum, not lose it - and that means a replacement prosecutor just as independent, aggressive and involved as Hillman, or more so. Otherwise, this nomination stinks.

Head Of Construction Company Is Acquitted Of Bribing Union (NYT)

By Julia Preston

The New York Times, February 10, 2006

The president of a New York construction company, who was accused of doing a "corrupt dance" with greedy union bosses, was acquitted yesterday in New York federal court of paying bribes to union officials.

John Amicucci, 54, the president of DeFoe Corporation, was found not guilty of two counts of illegal labor payments after a two-week trial in Federal District Court in Manhattan. Mr. Amicucci had been charged with making secret cash payments to officials of Local 14 of the International Union of Operating Engineers so they would cut corners and ignore contract violations to help DeFoe increase its profits.

But the main government witnesses in the trial were five officials from the union, including Joseph Rizzuto Sr., a former general manager, and his son Joseph Rizzuto Jr., both of whom have pleaded guilty in the same courthouse to accepting bribes.

Prosecutors did not present wiretap or other evidence to back up the claims of the union officials that they had been handed cash by Mr. Amicucci, and in return allowed him to fill the most expensive union supervisory jobs on his crews with workers who were paid less than union rates and who were lax in enforcing the rules.

In one instance, government evidence showed, Mr. Amicucci gave himself a key supervisory job.

During his closing arguments on Tuesday, Mr. Amicucci's lawyer, Gerald L. Shargel, had the jurors laughing as he ridiculed a cheap tote bag and a watch that the prosecutors had presented to prove that the union officials received gifts from Mr. Amicucci. Mr. Shargel showed that Mr. Amicucci and his company had handed out dozens of the bags and watches as Christmas gifts to employees and friends.

By the end of the trial, it appeared that the union officials had done their best to corrupt Mr. Amicucci, and not the other way around. Local 14 represents workers who drive cranes, backhoes and other heavy equipment on construction sites. Mr. Shargel brought out, under cross-examination, that the two Rizzutos had only mentioned Mr. Amicucci for the first time to F.B.I. agents months after they began cooperating with the government.

Jurors who spoke with Mr. Shargel after the trial said they thought the government's case was too weak for a conviction, the lawyer said.

DeFoe is a familiar name to New York drivers. The company carried out a $240 million contract on the Bruckner Expressway in the Bronx and also did major work on the Gowanus Expressway in Brooklyn.

This was not Mr. Amicucci's first brush with the law. He was convicted of federal tax evasion charges in 1990. In a 1993 case, DeFoe admitted in court that it had made "illegal payments" to a minority construction workers' group that was trying to extort money from the company.

Ryan Defense's Decision Day Nears (CHIT)

DOJ_NMG_0014077

By Matt O'Connor, Tribune Staff Reporter

Chicago Tribune, February 10, 2006

Decision day is nearing for former Gov. George Ryan and his lawyers on whether he takes the stand at his corruption trial.

On Thursday, outside the presence of the jury, Dan Webb, Ryan's lead lawyer, said he expects the defense case to wrap up by late next week unless Ryan or co-defendant Lawrence Warner testifies.

That means Ryan or Warner could begin testifying by Thursday.

Webb has said that Ryan is likely to take the stand, but Thursday he indicated he hasn't made a final decision. Warner's lawyers haven't divulged their strategy.

The marathon trial began in September.

On Thursday, in the defense's fourth full day of testimony, a former high-ranking official at the secretary of state's office while it was headed by Ryan defended a Joliet lease deal in 1995 as in the best interest of the state.

Ryan is charged with steering the lease to Warner, who held a hidden ownership in a building at 605 Maple Rd. in Joliet and collected $387,500 in the 1990s.

Thomas Cuculich, who was chief deputy director of the office's physical services department, testified Thursday he didn't know of Warner's ownership interest "until the Tribune printed it in 1999 or 2000."

Cuculich said Scott Fawell, Ryan's chief of staff, directed him to check out the Maple Road property, but Cuculich said he didn't think the fix was in at the time. Fawell suggested that other properties be looked at in the Joliet area as well, Cuculich said.

Though Cuculich had no experience in real estate, he said, Fawell eventually asked him to call Warner and negotiate a lease on the Joliet building. Cuculich said he thought Warner was a broker in the deal.

Warner asked that a standard clause allowing the state to terminate the contract in 90 days be removed because he could be stuck paying for up-front renovation costs to the building, Cuculich said.

Cuculich said that he found the request "fair" but that it was Fawell who decided to take out the termination clause.

On cross-examination, Assistant U.S. Atty. Patrick Collins brought out that the owners of the Joliet building actually were paid a higher rent than they had initially proposed themselves.

The secretary of state's office also agreed to pay for janitorial service, lawn care and snow removal, expenses usually covered by the landlord. Cuculich said he had objected to that but was overruled by Fawell.

Cuculich conceded that in an appearance before the grand jury, he swore Fawell had never asked him to look at other properties besides the Joliet building.

But on Thursday, he said he believed a memo written after the lease had been signed was accurate when it stated that a thorough market survey had been done.

Collins questioned Cuculich's independence at the time, asking him a couple of times if he had been a loyal member of the Ryan administration then.

Cuculich bristled at the questioning, saying, "I considered myself a good employee and yes, I think I was a team player, but not in any negative connotation at all."

After Ryan's election as governor, Cuculich was appointed to head the Illinois State Toll Highway Authority.

Fawell testified at the trial that Ryan directed him to help Warner secure the Joliet lease deal. Fawell said he feared the news media would uncover Warner's link to the property and questioned Warner to make sure his financial involvement was concealed.

In other testimony Thursday, a vice president of a realty company that owns a Springfield office complex disputed Fawell's claim that he artificially brought the price down on a secretary of state lease at the property by adding unusable space to the total square footage.

Thomas Bernacchi of Towne Realty, which owns Lincoln Towers, testified he included the unusable space in the square footage without consulting with the secretary of state's office.

Ryan is accused of moving the office's securities department to Lincoln Towers in 1995 to benefit longtime friend Ron Swanson, a broker for Towne. Fawell testified that the move took place even though he thought the asking price was too high.

But Bernacchi said that two other state agencies leased space at Lincoln Towers and paid comparable rates.

mo'connor@tribune.com

Ryan May Take The Witness Stand Next Week (AP)

By MIKE ROBINSON, ASSOCIATED PRESS

AP, February 10, 2006

George Ryan may take the witness stand in his own defense as early as next week, the former governor's defense attorney told his racketeering and fraud trial Thursday.

"I will make the decision at the time," defense attorney Dan K. Webb told U.S. District Judge Rebecca R. Pallmeyer, leaving himself the option of keeping Ryan off the witness stand.

Webb also said as the trial headed toward the end of its 19th week that if Ryan and co-defendant Larry Warner take the witness stand, they would be the final defense witnesses.

Pallmeyer told jurors that the long trial is coming to an end and that she would not be drawing up a work schedule for the month of March because one might not be needed.

If Ryan were convicted, he might face a stiffer sentence if prosecutors could prove to Pallmeyer that he lied under oath while on the stand.

Ryan, 71, and Warner, 67, are charged in a 22-count federal indictment with racketeering, fraud and other offenses. They say that nothing they did was illegal.

On Wednesday, Pallmeyer warned defense attorneys not to try to turn the trial into a showcase for his opposition to the death penalty when they call character witnesses next week.

Ryan's lawyers say character witnesses, such as Sister Helen Prejean, head of the Washington-based National Coalition to Abolish the Death Penalty, may be called next week.

Prejean's book about capital punishment, "Dead Man Walking," became a major movie.

Pallmeyer already has ruled that Ryan's campaign against the death penalty is irrelevant to federal charges that as secretary of state and governor he steered state contracts and leases to friends and got free vacations and gifts in exchange.

Pallmeyer on Wednesday made it plain she hasn't changed her mind and that Ryan's character witnesses will not be allowed to turn her courtroom into a capital punishment debate.

"I don't want this to be a back door way of inviting the jurors to speculate on whether Mr. Ryan's position on the death penalty is a good thing," she said.

Before leaving office in January 2003, Ryan commuted the death sentences of 167 inmates to life in prison and pardoned four others, declaring the state's capital justice system "haunted by the demon of error." Three years earlier he halted all executions in Illinois over fears that a flawed system had led to the wrongful convictions of 13 death row inmates.

Ryan's actions have made an improbable hero, at least among capital punishment opponents, of the husky-voiced, white-haired Republican from downstate Kankakee. He also is a former pharmacist known for most of his career as a master of political horse trading in the legislative caucus rooms.

Defense attorneys would like it if that popularity would prove catching to the jurors.

Prosecutors said Wednesday that if Ryan's defense team uses their character witnesses to slip in testimony about the death penalty, the government should be able to tell jurors about the November 1994 Wisconsin expressway disaster that killed six children.

The expressway accident occurred when the family van was struck by a part from a truck driven by an unqualified driver who is believed to have gotten his drivers license through bribery.

Pallmeyer said Wednesday that testimony about the six children of the Rev. Scott and Janet Willis is "so prejudicial and inflammatory that it must not find its way into this case."

Meanwhile, two retired state employees who had recommended awarding a $25.8 million computer contract to IBM testified Wednesday they felt no pressure from lobbyists in reaching their decision.

Defense witnesses John Anderson and Bruce Taylor, who sat on a committee that urged Ryan to pick IBM over rival Honeywell Bull, said they based their decision solely on the merits.

Among other things, the IBM system cost $3 million less, was available a year earlier and was more compatible with the systems used by other state agencies, they said.

Under cross examination, Anderson said he had not known that Warner stood to make $1 million off the IBM contract.

Campbell To Wife: "I'm Sorry" (WXIA-TV)

By Jerry Carnes

WXIA-TV, February 10, 2006

Former Atlanta mayor Bill Campbell apologized to his wife Thursday. The apology comes on the heels of testimony in Campbell's corruption trial in federal court about a trip to Paris with another woman.

Campbell's trip came after United Water won a $21 million contract to run the water system in the city of Atlanta. The company invited Campbell to visit its European headquarters.

United Water executives testified that they spent $4,500 on Campbell's hotel suite, another $4,500 for a limousine. Witnesses told the jury that Campbell missed a scheduled tour of their waste water treatment plant, and during the four-day trip, spent 2½ hours talking business over lunch.

DOJ_NMG_0014079

"We said from the beginning, the mayor was in Paris on business. And as we heard today, he had meetings with the CEO of a multi-billion dollar corporation," Campbell lawyer Billy Taylor said.

The mayor did spend time with a woman other than his wife. Former Atlanta television anchor Marion Brooks testified she was with Campbell in that hotel room, and touring Paris.

"While it's a private matter," Campbell said. "I want to publicly apologize to my wife. She has supported me with grace and dignity for 28 years."

Campbell's lawyers questioned United Water's former president, David Sherman.

"Mayor Campbell never asked for a bribe, did he," asked Campbell's attorney.

Sherman answered, "No."

"He never asked you or your company to do anything illegal, did he," the lawyer asked.

"That's correct," Sherman said.

The government will contend that Campbell should have disclosed the trip to the public, but didn't.

The trial is set to take Friday off, and will resume on Monday.

Judge Gives 'Clown' Legal Counsel (CHIT)

By Rudolph Bush, Tribune Staff Reporter

Chicago Tribune, February 10, 2006

A federal judge ruled Thursday that reputed mob boss Joey "the Clown" Lombardo qualifies for free counsel and appointed two attorneys to represent him.

But U.S. District Judge James Zagel added that he will revisit the decision if prosecutors show Lombardo, 77, is hiding assets and can afford to pay for his own defense.

Zagel approved prosecutors' request to examine the finances of Lombardo's ex-wife and two children to determine if he has access to a 1982 trust he set up for them.

"The government is free to investigate to its heart's content that trust, the trustees and its affairs," Zagel told prosecutors. "I don't believe Mr. Lombardo is in a position to object to any questions you have."

In the meantime, attorneys Rick Halprin and Susan Shatz will represent Lombardo, Zagel ruled.

Halprin, a veteran defense attorney, long has represented Lombardo in criminal matters.

Lombardo and 11 other men are charged with running a racketeering conspiracy that prosecutors say was supported through murder and extortion.

An indictment against the men charges them with involvement in 18 Outfit-related murders. Lombardo is charged only in the 1974 slaying of Bensenville businessman Daniel Seifert.

Before his murder, Seifert was scheduled to testify against Lombardo in a Teamsters pension-fraud trial.

Zagel's ruling comes a day after prosecutors revealed that Lombardo was carrying $3,000 when captured in January.

They also questioned the legitimacy of Lombardo's 1992 divorce from his wife, Marion.

"There's some question whether the dissolution of the marriage is itself a sham," Assistant U.S. Atty. Mitchell Mars said.

Prosecutors contend Lombardo lived with his ex-wife on West Ohio Street until he fled from a racketeering and extortion indictment in April.

They also noted that in 2003, she sold three pieces of property in Florida for more than $4.5 million.

Zagel said that because Lombardo has said he has no access to that money and no claim to the 1982 trust, he cannot object to the government's investigation.

In the meantime, he is entitled to free representation, Zagel said.

"If, as a result of that investigation, you can make a case there's been a bad-faith transfer of assets there, I can remedy that," Zagel said.

rrbush@tribune.com

Joey The Clown Too Broke To Pay His Lawyers? Feds Are Scoffing (AP)

By Mike Robinson

AP, February 10, 2006

CHICAGO - Lawyers for Joseph "Joey the Clown" Lombardo got permission Thursday to collect their fees from the government, while federal prosecutors got the green light to do whatever it takes to prove that the reputed mob boss isn't as broke as he claims to be.

Lombardo, 77, who claims he can't pay his lawyers because he has no money, appeared in court in an orange prison jumpsuit, wore his usual puzzled expression and said nothing.

U.S. District Judge James B. Zagel granted defense attorney Rick Halprin and an associate permission to represent Lombardo at public expense but said he might change his mind if federal prosecutors can prove that there has been "a fraud or a bad-faith exchange of assets."

"The government is free to investigate to its heart's content," Zagel said.

Prosecutors noted that Lombardo was carrying $3,000 in cash the night of Jan. 13 when an FBI organized-crime squad caught him in a suburban Elmwood Park alley after eight months on the run.

Lombardo is among 14 reputed mob figures charged in April 2005 with a racketeering conspiracy that included plotting at least 18 murders as far back as 1970.

When agents went to arrest him on that charge, Lombardo had vanished and immediately became the target of a high-profile manhunt.

Lombardo claims to have had no income since May 2005.

He was convicted and sent to prison along with former International Brotherhood of Teamsters President Roy Lee Williams in a 1982 bribery-conspiracy case.

Prosecutors said in court papers that "the FBI has obtained information that after the completion of his parole status on June 15, 2002, the defendant traveled to France for approximately 10 days, arriving in Paris on July 11, 2002, and continuing on to Nice."

"The defendant flew back to Chicago from France on July 21, 2002," prosecutors said. "The government respectfully submits that these facts including a 10-day trip abroad are not consistent with the need for a court-appointed lawyer."

Prosecutors said that after being indicted in the 1982 case Lombardo transferred "substantial assets" to a trust that benefits his children, Joseph and Joanne, "in an apparent attempt to put funds beyond the reach of the government." His ex-wife, Marion, is the trustee.

Prosecutors said Marion Lombardo appears to have sold three parcels in Florida held by the MJJ Trust for more than $4.5 million in 2003. They said there is a May 1992 dissolution of marriage record but that it appears the Lombardos lived together until the latest indictment.

They said two warranty deeds recording the sale of the Florida property referred to Marion Lombardo as "a married woman."

Halprin scoffed at the government's claims, telling Zagel that the assets had been placed in "an irrevocable trust" for Lombardo's family. He said that if the government thinks Lombardo has money prosecutors should prove it.

He did acknowledge that the trust might revert to Lombardo if his wife, son and daughter all died. But he said that considering his client's age, "That is worth about the same as 5,000 shares of Enron stock."

New Allegations Filed Against So-Called "Mob Cops" (NY1)

NY1, February 10, 2006

The laundry list of accusations against the so-called "mafia cops" is growing ever longer with new charges of armed robbery and drug use.

Former detective Stephen Caracappa and his partner Louis Eppolito already stand accused of eight mob-related murders. Now, the Brooklyn U.S. Attorney's Office says Caracappa admitted using cocaine as an undercover narcotics officer.

The person he allegedly told this to is expected to testify at this month's trial. Another witness will say the two held up delis for cash and that Eppolito asked him for money in order to bribe doctors into falsifying a heart condition. Both Eppolito and Caracappa have pleaded not guilty.

Man Sentenced For Shooting Cop, Holding Him Hostage (CHIT)

By Michael Higgins, Tribune Staff Reporter

Chicago Tribune, February 10, 2006

A former tax preparer who shot a Chicago police officer in the head and held the gravely wounded officer hostage for more than two hours was sentenced Thursday to life in prison plus 132 years.

Daniel Salley, 45, was convicted in October of 15 felony charges, including two counts of attempted murder, after a jury rejected his claim that he was the victim of a government conspiracy.

Detective Joseph Airhart was shot as he rushed into a South Loop apartment in 2001 to arrest Salley on bank robbery charges. The shooting left Airhart, a 19-year police veteran, unable to speak, walk or swallow food, his two sisters and brother said in court Thursday.

DOJ_NMG_0014081

Airhart's sister Denise narrated a videotape that showed her brother lying in bed with a ventilator tube attached to his throat and a feeding tube leading to his stomach.

"Salley, I hope you never see the light of day or set foot outside again," Denise Airhart said as more than 70 spectators, including many law enforcement officers who worked with Airhart, looked on.

"This crime, the shooting of this man, tore the heart out of the Chicago police," said Robert Milan, first assistant to Cook County State's Atty. Dick Devine.

U.S. District Judge Wayne Andersen sentenced Salley to life in prison without the possibility of parole for taking Airhart hostage. The additional 132 years on other charges would not have any practical effect unless the life sentence were overturned, prosecutors said.

Salley, who acted as his own attorney Thursday as he did during his trial, showed little emotion as the wounded police officer's colleagues and family members spoke. He looked down at legal papers, sometimes jotting notes.

When it was his turn to speak, Salley repeated his claims that the government was punishing him for the success of his tax business and that an FBI agent had shot Airhart during the raid.

"There is punishment that's coming for everybody who is working for this government," Salley said.

Members of Airhart's family declined to comment after the hearing, but they hugged one another and Airhart's law enforcement colleagues after the sentence was announced.

Airhart, who was assigned to the FBI's fugitive task force, had volunteered to be part of a team sent to arrest Salley after Salley robbed a Southwest Side bank twice in one week, taking more than $250,000.

After Salley shot Airhart, he forced other officers to back off by threatening to kill Airhart if they approached him. Salley surrendered after police granted his request to talk to a television reporter.

In the videotape, Airhart did not make eye contact with the camera and barely moved, except for flinching his jaw and twitching his arm slightly.

Denise Airhart broke into tears as she described her brother's role in the family. "He always protected me," she said. "He protected all of us."

mjhiggins@tribune.com

News Bank Robber Gets Life Plus 132 Years (CHIST)

By MONIFA THOMAS, Staff Reporter

Chicago Sun-Times, February 10, 2006

A former tax consultant was sentenced Thursday to life in prison -- plus an additional 132 years -- for shooting a Chicago Police detective in the head and then holding the wounded officer hostage for hours.

Daniel E. Salley was convicted last October of shooting Detective Joseph Airhart in a South Side apartment in August 2001. Airhart, who was then 45 years old, was a member of an FBI task force trying to arrest Salley in a series of bank robberies.

Salley refused to allow medical treatment for Airhart, keeping federal and local police at bay for more than two hours before he was taken into custody.

The shooting left Airhart with severe brain injuries, and he is unable to walk, feed himself or breathe without the assistance of a ventilator, his sister testified before U.S. District Judge Wayne Andersen on Thursday.

The courtroom was packed with relatives, members of the Chicago Police Department and other law enforcement agents. They watched as Airhart's younger sister, Denise Airhart, narrated a video taken of the detective last month. It showed Airhart lying on a specially made air mattress, barely moving.

"My family was destroyed, Salley, by the blatant attempt you made to murder my brother," Denise Airhart said, stopping at times to cry while Salley calmly scribbled notes on a pad.

"In an instant, Salley, you took away a promising and productive future."

Claimed FBI agent fired shot

She asked that Salley "never see the light of day nor set foot outside again."

Airhart's two other siblings and his former partner on the police force also spoke to the court, describing the 19-year officer as an adventurous, dependable family man who was robbed of his life.

Salley, who represented himself during trial, maintained his innocence, saying an FBI agent was the one who shot Airhart.

He told the Airharts he understood their grief, but also said, "God knows what happened in that room. I believe that the truth is going to come out."

Salley showed little emotion as Andersen sentenced him to life in prison on the hostage charge plus an additional 132 years on six weapons charges, five of which carry mandatory sentences of 25 years.

DOJ_NMG_0014082

The sentences for eight other felony counts Salley was convicted of, including attempted murder and bank robbery, are to be served concurrently with the life sentence, Andersen ruled.

Salley admitted during his trial to twice robbing the same bank and being armed with an arsenal of weapons when Airhart and others came to arrest him.

He told jurors the government had been spying on him.

Airhart's family declined to speak to reporters. After the hearing, relatives stood in a circle and prayed.

Bank Robber Who Shot Officer Gets Life (CHIST)

By DAVID BRUMMER, ASSOCIATED PRESS

Chicago Sun-Times, February 10, 2006

A bank robber who shot a police detective and then held the wounded officer hostage was sentenced to life in prison Thursday.

Police and prosecutors praised the sentence imposed on Daniel Salley in the August 2001 shooting that left Chicago police detective Joseph Airhart with a crippling brain injury.

"We're very pleased that Mr. Salley won't be allowed to set foot on the streets and commit this sort of crime again," Chicago police Deputy Superintendent Charles L. Williams said.

Patrick Fitzgerald, U.S. attorney for northern Illinois, said his office was "very gratified" by the sentence. "It's an end to a very sad chapter for Joe Airhart," Fitzgerald said.

Four months after a federal jury convicted Salley of all 15 counts he faced, Judge Wayne Anderson gave Salley life in prison for taking Airhart hostage and 132 years on the other charges. The judge also ordered him to pay more than $3 million to cover Airhart's medical costs and lost wages by the family.

Salley, who acted as his own attorney, was convicted of illegally detaining, assaulting and attempting to murder Airhart, as well as assault and attempted murder of an FBI agent. He also was convicted on several firearms charges and two bank robbery charges.

Throughout the trial and sentencing, Salley maintained he did not shoot Airhart. Prosecutors pointed out that he amassed an arsenal of handguns, rifles and knives.

"I'm concerned if you were free, you would feel the need to get weapons and hurt people," Anderson said Thursday.

Minutes before he was sentenced, Salley railed against the government, compared himself to U.S. soldiers in Iraq and Afghanistan and said he was "training to kill."

"I grieve for Mr. Airhart as well," Salley said. "God knows my heart. God knows I didn't mean to hurt him."

Airhart's three siblings and his former partner spoke at the hearing and pleaded for a maximum sentence.

Denise Airhart narrated a month-old video that showed a bedridden brother who's unable to speak. Machines and tubes have helped him breathe and eat since a January 2003 seizure related to the shooting, she said.

"I hope you never see the light of day," a sobbing Denise Airhart told Salley.

After the courtroom cleared, Airhart's family stayed to hold hands in a circle. They declined to speak with reporters.

During the trial, the former tax preparer admitted to twice robbing the same bank in 2001 and being armed when Airhart and others came to his girlfriend's apartment to arrest him.

Prosecutors alleged Salley shot Airhart then held him hostage for more than two hours, refusing to allow him medical treatment.

He told jurors the government had been spying on him and his tax business.

Salley, whom a judge found mentally unfit to stand trial in 2003, was eventually found competent for trial a year later after several psychiatric exams.

Two Former Officials Plead Guilty In Monmouth Corruption Case (NSDY/AP)

Long Island Newsday, February 10, 2006

NEWARK, N.J. (AP) _ Two former officials in Monmouth County pleaded guilty Thursday to extortion charges, part of the Federal Bureau of Investigation's Operation Big Rig investigation.

Richard Iadanza, 50, a former deputy mayor of Neptune Township, admitted that he accepted $3,000 from a contractor in exchange for arranging work in Neptune, according to a statement from U.S. Attorney Christopher Christie.

Joseph McCurnin, 64, an operations manager at the Monmouth County Division of Transportation, admitted he helped facilitate a $1,500 bribe from a demolition contractor to a Neptune Township official.

Extortion carries a maximum penalty of 20 years in prison and a $250,000 fine. No sentencing dates were set for either man.

DOJ_NMG_0014083

The two were among 11 then-sitting or former Monmouth County public officials arrested in the federal sting operation in February 2005. They were charged with extorting cash bribes and free work from a contractor who was cooperating with the FBI.

100's Of Radio Stations Cited In Payola Probe (ABC)

By BRIAN ROSS, RICHARD ESPOSITO & VIC WALTER

ABC News, February 9, 2006

FCC Commissioner Alleges 'Systematic Betrayal of the Responsibility of Broadcasters'

Hundreds of radio stations are under investigation by the Federal Communications Commission in the payola scandal rocking the music industry, ABC has learned.

"The FCC staff is working with voluminous evidence right now. It's a complicated and wide-ranging investigation." FCC Commissioner Jonathan Adelstein told ABC News in an exclusive interview.

"This is potentially the most wide spread and flagrant violation of FCC rules in the history of American broadcasting," Adelstein said. "We've never seen evidence of such a systematic betrayal of the responsibility of broadcasters."

Payola -- or pay-for-play -- is a practice seemingly as old as the recording industry itself. In the past the money went to rogue disc jockeys in exchange for increasing the air play for individual songs and driving those songs to the top of the charts. In the modern version, the money goes to the bottom line of the radio stations and the conglomerates that own them, according to New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer.

"We have people in suits coming in with documents rather than cash payments under the table to a DJ," Spitzer told ABC News Chief Investigative Correspondent Brian Ross.

Several of the largest radio conglomerates in America - the corporate owners of FM radio stations across the nation -- are within the scope of the FCC probe, which was triggered by the two year long pay-for-play investigation by Spitzer and was first reported on by ABC News.

A vigorous investigation by the FCC brings federal regulatory clout, and the specter of criminal prosecution by the Justice Department.

Paid to Play Songs by J.Lo, John Mayer and Possibly Others

In addition to criminal prosecution any broadcaster in clear violation could face severe sanctions, and in the most blatant cases, the loss of their broadcast licenses, officials involved in the investigation have told ABC.

"I can't believe that radio stations are putting their licenses at risk. It seems to me they thought the FCC was asleep and they shot someone in front of the policemen. The policeman is obligated to act when evidence is so clear," Adelstein said.

Spitzer said record company documents obtained in the investigation of Sony BMG and Warner, both of which have settled with the attorney general, revealed payments for songs that became major hits, including Jennifer Lopez's "I'm Real" and John Mayer's "Daughters."

Other artists whose songs are named in the Spitzer documents include Jessica Simpson, Celine Dion, Maroon 5, Good Charlotte, Franz Ferdinand, Switchfoot, Michelle Branch, and R.E.M. The record companies allegedly paid radio stations to increase airplay of those artists' songs.

That money allegedly came in many forms; directly from the record companies, through "Indie" promoters or in promotional considerations that lowered stations' overheads.

Adelstein said that the New York attorney general has shared mountains of information with the FCC and has identified specific documents and e-mails that seem to clearly implicate some of the companies controlling much music radio in the United States.

"The FCC has received an unbelievable amount of evidence from Attorney General Eliot Spitzer that there appears to be widespread and flagrant violation of FCC rules regarding payola, (including) undisclosed promotions by radio broadcasters. And we need to find out who did it, basically prosecute any violations to the fullest extent of the law," Adelstein said.

Adelstein spoke to ABC News after reading ABC's disclosure of the shift of Spitzer's probe from record companies to broadcasters. He has been in regular contact with Spitzer.

"When anything is aired that is paid for without being disclosed to the public it is a clear violation of FCC rules," he said.

"We have a responsibility to get to the bottom of this & It's important that the FCC does its job and not let the states do it for us," Adelstein added.

Spitzer has been critical of the FCC's approach to the issue of payola.

"I would be the first to acknowledge that I would like to see the FCC more directly involved in addressing what is very clearly a payola scandal that has run rife through the industry. They have failed to do so and we have reached out to them,' said Spitzer.

DOJ_NMG_0014084

The FCC originally started a probe into the payola scandal in August 2005, after Spitzer disclosed his investigation of record companies including Warner Music Group, Sony BMG, EMI and Universal. At that time, Adelstein called for the FCC to aggressively investigate. By November 2005 he was calling for the FCC to bring the probe to a swift and satisfactory conclusion. Now he admits the FCC needs to devote more resources to the probe. "We need to devote significant resources [to investigating this aspect] and I'm not sure we are doing that yet," Adelstein added.

"Based on the evidence we have seen some of the radio conglomerates clearly are participating and knowledge of this and orchestration of this came from the very top," Spitzer told ABC.

"Now since it is up to the FCC -- not me -- whether or not to strip them of their licenses. I will leave that decision to the FCC. But certainly the behavior has been unethical, improper illegal and a sanction of some severity should be imposed," said Spitzer.

Adelstein told ABC News that "at this stage in the investigation it's not clear what the appropriate sanctions are because we're still looking into it, seeing if there are violations and, if there are, if they are systemic and go to the corporate offices."

Adelstein did say that the potential sanctions could be severe.

"While it's highly unusual for the FCC to pull licenses on first violation, depending on the severity that is one option that is available to us. These are criminal matters as well."

"If we do find evidence of criminal violations its incumbent on us to refer this to the Department of Justice for criminal prosecutions."

Man Charged With Killing Wife, Daughter In Boston (LAT)

By Michael Muskal

The Los Angeles Times, February 10, 2006

An Englishman wanted in the killing of his wife and baby daughter in their suburban home near Boston was arrested this morning in London, officials said.

Neil Entwistle, 27, was taken into custody without incident in a London subway station and was held pending an extradition hearing, perhaps as soon as Friday, British authorities said.

If extradited, he will face murder and weapons charges in connection with the deaths of his wife, Rachel, 27, and their 9-month-old daughter, Lillian. They were found shot to death Jan. 22, tangled in the bedding in the family home in Hopkinton, Mass.

The dead woman's family was "confident this day would come and the case would be solved," family spokesman Joe Flaherty told reporters today. The family was saddened and shocked by the deaths of their relatives, he said, and the arrest of a person "the family trusted."

The family knew investigators "would unravel what happened here and that somebody would be arrested and brought to justice," Flaherty said.

Because of the nature of the crime, the age of the child and Entwistle's abrupt departure to his native Britain, the case has been getting extensive coverage on cable television news shows.

Middlesex Dist. Atty. Martha Coakley told a televised news conference that officials surmise that Entwistle meant to kill himself after murdering his family, but changed his mind. The motive could have been financial difficulties, she said.

Coakley said Entwistle used his father-in-law's handgun to shoot his wife and daughter on the morning of Jan. 20. The next morning, Entwistle bought a one-way ticket and fled to London. He did not return for the family funerals.

Before he boarded the flight, Entwistle brought the .22-caliber handgun back to his father-in-law's house in Carver, Mass., Coakley said.

"We have forensic information that links it both to him and to Rachel, and we know Rachel had not used that gun," Coakley said.

It was Rachel Entwistle's mother who called authorities when she couldn't contact her daughter. Police went to the Entwistles' home on Jan. 21 but didn't see anything wrong. After a missing person report was filed, police visited the home again, and discovered the bodies amid piles of bedding, Coakley said.

As is common in murder cases, Entwistle was immediately considered a person of interest, a step below suspect. State officials flew to London late last month to interview Entwistle, who was at his family's home in Worksop, England.

Entwistle was an unemployed computer entrepreneur who met Rachel in 1999 at the University of York, where she spent a year studying abroad. They married in 2003 and stayed in England until last year.

The family had rented the home in Hopkinton some two weeks before the murders.

In a statement, London authorities said Entwistle was arrested on a provisional extradition warrant issued by Bow Street Magistrates Court.

DOJ_NMG_0014085

"The warrant alleges that on or before" Jan. 22, Entwistle "murdered Rachel Entwistle … and he murdered Lillian Entwistle. Mr. Entwistle is now in custody at a London police station and will be brought before Bow Street Magistrates Court in due course."

British Man Charged In Deaths Of American Wife, Daughter (WP)

By David A. Fahrenthold

The Washington Post, February 10, 2006

CAMBRIDGE, Mass., Feb. 9 -- A British man whose wife and infant daughter were discovered fatally shot in a Boston suburb last month, a day after he had abruptly left the country, was arrested on murder charges Thursday in London, authorities said.

The charges against Neil Entwistle added a new twist to a case whose lurid elements -- failed Internet schemes, a mother and daughter shot side by side, and a police search that missed two bodies buried under bedclothes -- have generated intense interest on both sides of the Atlantic.

In announcing the arrest, Middlesex County District Attorney Martha Coakley said that Entwistle, mired in debt, may have initially planned to kill himself after shooting his wife and daughter Jan. 20.

"We believe possibly that this was intended to be a murder-suicide," Coakley said at a news conference, adding: "Obviously, the murder was effected, the suicide was not."

Entwistle, 27, has spent much of the past three weeks at his parents' home in Worksop, England, dogged by British and U.S. media. Coakley said Entwistle was visiting friends in London on Thursday when he was arrested by British police at the Royal Oak train station.

He faces extradition proceedings to return him to Massachusetts.

In a statement Thursday, family members of Entwistle's wife, Rachel, said they were saddened by the arrest.

"Neil was a trusted husband and father, and it is incomprehensible how that love and trust was betrayed," the statement said, according to the Associated Press.

Entwistle and his wife met while studying at Britain's University of York in 1999 and were married in 2003, the AP reported. They moved into their rented home in the suburb of Hopkinton, Mass., a few days before the killings.

By that time, Coakley said, Entwistle was facing debt he had accumulated in Britain, plus a series of Internet ventures had produced little income.

Coakley said Entwistle used a .22-caliber handgun he had taken from his father-in-law to shoot his wife, 27, in the head, and then shoot their 9-month-old daughter, Lillian, in the abdomen. At the time of the shootings, Coakley said, both victims were lying on a bed and wearing "sleepwear," but she said it was unclear whether they were awake or asleep.

Later that day, Entwistle surreptitiously returned the gun to his in-laws' home in another Boston suburb, Coakley said.

The next morning, Jan. 21, Coakley said, he used a one-way ticket to fly to London.

The bodies were not discovered until more than 24 hours after Entwistle departed, after Hopkinton police and family friends had done separate walk-throughs in the house and noticed nothing amiss. The bodies were apparently there the whole time, Coakley said, but were concealed by a large pile of bedding. "It just looked like an unmade bed," Coakley said. Police discovered the bodies when they made another search on the evening of Jan. 22.

US Charges Taiwanese Over China Jet, Missile Deal (REU-Y2)

By Michael Christie And Paul Eckert

Reuters, February 10, 2006

A Taiwanese citizen was charged in the United States on Thursday with being a covert agent for Beijing, and accused together with a Frenchman of trying to illegally export an F-16 jet engine, Blackhawk helicopter engines and cruise missiles to China.

U.S. prosecutors in Miami said a federal grand jury had returned a nine-count indictment against Ko-Suen Moo, of Taipei, and Maurice Serge Voros, of Paris.

The indictment alleged that the defendants violated the Arms Export Control Act by trying to export controlled items without a license to China, including the engines, the cruise missiles and air-to-air missiles, the prosecutors said.

The case follows repeated U.S. expressions of concern about Beijing's strategic intentions as China increasingly pours proceeds from its rapidly expanding economy into its military.

Chinese war capabilities are growing at a pace expected to soon upset a delicate military balance between China and rival Taiwan, which relies on U.S. weaponry to defend itself.

DOJ_NMG_0014086

"This case highlights the national security threat posed when agents of a foreign government seek to illegally acquire and export American military weaponry," said U.S. Attorney R. Alexander Acosta.

"We will continue to aggressively investigate and prosecute foreign agents whose motives and actions are, by definition, detrimental do the United States and our national security," he said in a statement released by the Justice Department.

RISING CHINA CONCERNS

A Pentagon spokesman refused to comment specifically on the Miami case, saying it was a Justice Department matter.

But he added: "We are aware that there are continuing efforts on the part of China to obtain U.S. technology," Navy Lt. Cmdr. Greg Hicks told Reuters in Washington.

A spokesman for the Chinese embassy in Washington was not immediately available for comment.

A spokesman for Taiwan, which has an unofficial economic office in the U.S. capital in the absence of formal diplomatic ties with the United States, declined to comment.

Taiwan and China split in 1949 after a civil war brought the communists to power on the mainland. Beijing has vowed to attack if Taiwan formally declares statehood -- a fight that could embroil the United States as Taiwan's traditional backer.

Last week, the Pentagon, in a new long-range strategy blueprint, called China the rising power with the greatest potential to compete militarily with the United States. The strategy calls for new long-range weapons and a greater U.S. naval presence in the Pacific.

Moo was also charged with being a covert agent of the People's Republic of China, and with bribery, obstruction of justice and money laundering for offering $500,000, through an intermediary, to be released.

Moo had been detained but Voros remained at large, prosecutors said. The defendants face up to 20 years in prison if convicted.

According to the indictment, Moo traveled to the United States on two occasions and actually inspected an F-16 aircraft engine. The engine was to be flown to an airstrip in China.

"In the post-9/11 world, keeping sensitive U.S. military components from falling into the wrong hands has never been more important," Jesus Torres, Special Agent in Charge of Immigration and Customs Enforcement in Miami, said in a statement.

(Additional reporting by Deborah Charles and Charles Aldinger)

Feds Seize Truckload Of Fake Olive Oil (AP)

AP, February 9, 2006

NEWARK, N.J. (AP) - More than a discerning palate has determined that thousands of cans of Hermes and San Giovanni brands of extra virgin olive oil weren't quite right.

The U.S. Food and Drug Administration tested the chemical composition of the oil and found it was really less expensive soybean oil, prompting Thursday's seizure.

The U.S. Marshals Service seized 22,700 gallons of oil, imported from Italy, at a trucking company warehouse in Clifton.

"It is a whole lot of faux olive oil," said Mike Drewniak, a spokesman for U.S. Attorney Christopher Christie.

The labels on the 3-liter tins in 4,855 cases said the contents were more expensive extra virgin olive oil or pomace olive oil.

Because olive oil is five to six times more expensive than soybean oil, the potential estimated profit is about $105,600, according to the FDA.

"We will not permit New Jersey consumers to be defrauded," Christie said in a statement.

The tainted oil includes Hermes' brand of extra virgin olive oil and pomace oil and San Giovanni's brand of extra virgin oil. The cans remain at the warehouse in Clifton under a state-ordered embargo.

Teen Boys Abducted, Forced To Rob Md. Banks, Police Say (WP)

By Allison Klein

The Washington Post, February 10, 2006

They are bank robbers who didn't want the cash, police say. The scared 14- and 15-year-olds were not looking for a thrill, either, when they walked into banks in suburban Maryland and handed tellers notes demanding money.

They had been snatched by gunmen, taken to the banks and forced by their captors to commit the crimes, according to Prince George's County police.

After the teenagers came out of the banks with the money, the gunmen made off with the take and left the stunned youths behind.

At least four recent bank robberies were committed by three teenagers who later told police they had robbed the banks against their will. Their stories are "very credible," said an investigator who did not want to be identified because the case is still open.

DOJ_NMG_0014087

The most recent was on Wednesday, when a 14-year-old Landover youth was abducted and then forced to hold up a branch of Chevy Chase Bank in Bethesda, said FBI spokeswoman Michelle Crnkovich.

Police found him walking along Rockville Pike, stained by ink from an exploding dye pack, a device that banks attach to bundles of money to stain bank robbers, making them easier to spot.

The other three incidents occurred in Prince George's, two of them on Jan. 20 and one on Monday.

"These kids were frightened," Crnkovich said. "There are absolute parallels in these cases."

None of the teenagers was physically hurt, police said.

The FBI is working with Prince George's and Montgomery County police on the cases. The agencies have "promising leads," Crnkovich said.

Prince George's police consider the youths to be victims, and they were not arrested, said Cpl. Debbi Carlson, a police spokeswoman. The 14-year-old in the Bethesda bank case was taken into custody by Montgomery police but was not charged with a crime. Instead, he was released to his parents.

"I've been a cop for 17 years, and this is the first time I've heard of a kid that young robbing banks," said Lt. Eric Burnett, spokesman for Montgomery police.

Police did not identify any of the teenagers and would not say who wrote the notes used in the robberies. They did not disclose what the notes said.

Prince George's police Lt. Sean Carney, commander of the department's robbery section, cautioned parents yesterday to always know where their children are. He also said children should walk or travel with friends or relatives.

"People need to take steps to protect themselves," Carney said. "Be aware of your surroundings. Be aware of your children's travel routes. Tell neighbors to keep their eyes out."

The first Prince George's kidnapping and robbery began at 4 p.m. Jan. 20 in the 7400 block of Barlowe Road, two blocks from police headquarters in the Palmer Park neighborhood.

Two men approached a 15-year-old, saying they had a weapon and would hurt him if he did not follow their orders. They took him several blocks to a Wachovia Bank in the 7700 block of Landover Road and forced him to pass a note to the teller demanding money, police said.

They then went to a SunTrust Bank in the 8200 block of Ardwick-Ardmore Road, next to an entrance ramp for Route 50, and forced him to rob that bank, police said.

The men fled, and the teenager ran to a nearby business and called police.

The second abduction occurred at 6 p.m. Monday, when a man with a gun approached a teenager on a Metrobus. Police would not say where the bus was heading or where it was when the incident occurred.

The gunman said he'd hurt the youth if he didn't follow the man's orders, according to police.

He took the youth to a SunTrust bank in the 7700 block of Riverdale Road and told him to pass a note to the teller demanding money, which the youth did. After the teenager handed over the money, the man ran off with it.

Bank employees called police and gave a description of the teenager who had robbed the bank. Patrol officers quickly spotted the youth and stopped him. He explained what had happened, police said.

In the Montgomery case, the teenager robbed a Chevy Chase Bank at 7501 Wisconsin Ave. in Bethesda about 4:20 p.m. He was taken into custody shortly after 5 p.m. when patrol officers who had heard the suspect's description spotted him on Rockville Pike.

Burnett said detectives don't believe he participated in the robberies in Prince George's.

The youth, who was not identified, was released to his parents last night after being questioned by detectives at police headquarters in Rockville.

Police have descriptions of two men possibly involved in the Prince George's cases but do not have surveillance images of them from the recent robberies because they did not enter the banks with the teenagers, Crnkovich said.

But one or both might have been involved in a late December robbery of a Wachovia bank, and there might be surveillance images from that heist, she said.

Employees at the Wachovia, SunTrust and Chevy Chase banks that were robbed declined to comment yesterday. Corporate spokesmen for the banks said only that they were cooperating with law enforcement officials.

One of the men, who might have been involved in both Prince George's cases, is described as 6 feet tall, about 20 years old and of dark complexion. He had a moustache and a light growth of hair on his chin and was wearing a gray sweat jacket, bluejeans and black Jordan tennis shoes.

Another man, who might have been involved in the Jan. 20 incident, is described as 16 years old and about 5 feet 8 inches tall with cornrows. He was wearing a No. 3 Allen Iverson Philadelphia 76ers jersey, police said.

DOJ_NMG_0014088

Carney appealed to the public for information. "No matter how insignificant it may seem, we need to know everything the public knows about this," he said.

Anyone who has information about these cases is asked to call 866-411-TIPS.

Ex-La. Judge Gets Prison In Bond Scheme (FINDLAW/AP)

By Alan Sayre, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 10, 2006

(AP) - NEW ORLEANS-A former state judge who was tried for allegedly accepting bribes from a bail bonding company was sentenced Thursday to more than four years in federal prison for mail fraud.

Alan Green was accused of taking $20,000 in cash, golf trips and meals from the company in return for reducing the bonds of dangerous criminals to levels they could afford. That way, Bail Bonds Unlimited could collect hefty fees for guaranteeing their court appearances.

Green was convicted of a single charge of mail fraud after being tried on charges relating to the bribery allegations. The jury could not agree on the other charges: four more counts of mail fraud, one of mail fraud conspiracy and one of racketeering conspiracy.

Federal Judge Lance Africk told Green his conduct endangered citizens. "Bail Bonds Unlimited saw a for-sale sign on your office," Africk said.

Green apologized for "impugning the integrity of the bench" but denied taking any bribes, saying he was manipulated through a friendship with an accountant for the company.

Green served on the state district court in the New Orleans suburb of Jefferson Parish until his conviction last year. He was the 14th defendant convicted in the FBI's investigation of courthouse corruption in the parish.

Green Sentenced To 51 Months (NOTP)

By Michelle Krupa, West Bank bureau

New Orleans Times-Picayune, February 10, 2006

Defiant to the end of prosecutors' claim that $10,000 in cash payments that he received from Bail Bonds Unlimited were not bribes, former state Judge Alan Green was sentenced to 51 months in prison Thursday in New Orleans' federal court, becoming the second judge to wind up behind bars in the Jefferson Parish courthouse corruption scandal.

Before delivering a scathing rebuke of Green's exploitation of his post as an elected jurist and slapping him with a $50,000 fine, U.S. District Judge Lance Africk gave Green one last chance to admit that two $5,000 payments he got from the Gretna bail bonds firm were not "off-the-books" campaign contributions, as Green testified in his June trial, but part of the web of bribery confirmed by nine defendants who have admitted to crimes in the seven-year probe.

"Do you still contend that the two $5,000 contributions were not bribes?" Africk asked Green.

"They were not bribes, your honor, as far as I was told," Green replied. "At no time did I believe that they were, in fact, bribes."

Africk then took aim at Green, assailing his refusal to realize, even in retrospect that, the cash, gifts and meals that Bail Bonds Unlimited executives Louis and Lori Marcotte and accountant Norman Bowley showered upon him did not trigger his favorable treatment of the bond house, which included reducing or splitting bonds for violent arrestees at the specific request of the Marcottes and Bowley.

"Bail Bonds Unlimited saw a 'For Sale' sign on your office and decided to purchase it in order to maximize its profits," Africk said. "I find this sentencing to be one of the most distasteful things I have ever had to face in more than 15 years on the bench. You had all the promise in the world, and you were a role model in the community. It is beyond sad that it has to come to this."

After Africk handed down the punishment, Green declined comment other than to say that his "faith in God would carry me through." Several of his relatives, including his wife and mother, were present in the courtroom.

U.S. Attorney Jim Letten, who attended the proceeding along with about 75 observers, said after the hearing that he was insulted by Green's lack of willingness to take responsibility for the bribery that was a component of the single count of mail fraud for which jurors found Green guilty. The jury hung on six other charges, including one under the potent Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organization act, or RICO.

"Of course, I'm offended," Letten said. "Anyone with a single brain cell will understand that in the face of ... (wiretapped) conversations that showed the context in which these payments transpired that these cash payments were clearly bribes.

"For Alan Green to stand before God, country and a federal judge and assert that his conduct was not bribery is something that flies in the face of common sense and, as (chief prosecutor) Mike Magner said, made his skin crawl," Letten added.

DOJ_NMG_0014089

Green, who faced a maximum 20 years in prison and a $250,000 fine, apologized during the hearing for "impugning the integrity of the court in Jefferson Parish."

"I unwittingly and unintentionally placed myself in a situation where I was manipulated by the bail bond company," Green said. "Today I stand before you as many people have stood before me. I've always expected them to be accountable to my court, ... and I am prepared to accept whatever sentence you deem is appropriate."

That punishment was elevated beyond the 33 to 41 months recommended by the court's probation office because Africk agreed with prosecutors' argument that Green lied on the witness stand when he maintained his assertion that the cash he took from Bail Bonds Unlimited, plus $800 in cash from Gretna lawyer W.J. LeBlanc, were not bribes but campaign contributions, even though they far surpassed donation limits in state law.

Africk said Green, who spent six years as a prosecutor before becoming a judge in 1992, was "too smart" not to realize the bribery.

Indeed, Green's lead defense attorney, Frank DeSalvo, told Africk that he begged his client after the jury verdict to "just say (the payments) were bribes" in an attempt to earn leniency. But Green refused, saying that admission would have been a boldfaced lie, DeSalvo said.

In suggesting to Africk that Green should go to prison for as long as 87 months based on federal guidelines, Magner implored the court not to consider as "a ceiling" the 46-month sentence of Ronald Bodenheimer, the only other judge to be sent to jail in the ongoing Operation Wrinkled Robe investigation.

Bodenheimer "accepted responsibility for his wrongdoing;" entered a plea deal with prosecutors, avoiding an expensive trial; and provided crucial information during at least 10 debriefing sessions that led directly to the indictment and subsequent plea deals of the Marcottes, who ultimately admitted orchestrating the corruption scheme, Magner said.

But DeSalvo said Bodenheimer only pleaded guilty because he "folded under the pressure" of the government's continuing probe. Bodenheimer also admitted to other crimes, DeSalvo said, including conspiring to plant drugs on a critic of his business and rigging the child custody case of millionaire restaurateur Al Copeland, which was assigned to his court.

"To compare Judge Green to Judge Bodenheimer would be like comparing a sinner to the devil," he said.

But prosecutors contended that Green's actions injured justice on several levels, from the innocent victims who were harmed by violent arrestees whom Green helped usher out of jail, to the public's tarnished impression of the Jefferson Parish bench.

"Hardly a day goes past when I don't get a call from some litigant" expressing doubts over the "fairness or accuracy" of some judgment rendered by Bodenheimer, Green or other jurists of the 24th Judicial District Court, Magner said. "This has caused the entire public to question the validity of a system that separates this society from chaos."

Letten went a step further, saying misdeeds such as those perpetrated by Green cast a cloud over the entire justice system and on politicians in general. That unfair perception, he said, has been ridiculed by some federal lawmakers and may affect how much money Louisiana receives to recover from Hurricane Katrina.

"This kind of conduct ... undoubtedly has had an affect on how our region is perceived," Letten said.

Green, a Democrat from Marrero, first was elected in 1992 to the 24th Judicial District Court's black-majority district, which was created that year. He was re-elected four years later and in September 2002 won a third term, even though he had been identified publicly two months earlier as a subject of Wrinkled Robe.

He continued to hear cases into the fall of 2004, when he was indicted, along with Bowley, who avoided trial by pleading guilty in June to a lesser crime; Bowley was sentenced last week to 20 months behind bars.

Green resigned from the bench in August, several weeks after his conviction, and DeSalvo said this week Green also has voluntarily relinquished his law license.

With Thursday's sentencing, Green became the fifth Louisiana judge, and the third in Jefferson Parish, to be sent to prison in the past two decades, according to the state Supreme Court. Before Bodenheimer, 1st Parish Court Judge Bruce Naccari of Metairie was sentenced in 1996 to 18 months for wire fraud charges related to his family's defunct insurance company.

Green was the 14th defendant to be nabbed by Wrinkled Robe and the only one to risk trial rather than ink a plea agreement with prosecutors. The list includes Jefferson Parish Sheriff's deputies, who also admitted accepting bribes from Bail Bonds Unlimited in return for helping the company secure clients, as well as players in Bodenheimer's various schemes.

The government issued another round of grand jury subpoenas in August. Judges on the list were Louisiana 5th Circuit Court of Appeal Judge Susan Chehardy, state Judge Kernan "Skip" Hand, Justice of the Peace Steve Mortillaro of Jefferson's 5th Justice Court and state Judge Steve Windhorst.

But Letten said Thursday that though prosecutors still are hunting any sign of public corruption in Jefferson, the Wrinkled Robe soon may be headed for the judicial closet.

"Much of the investigation has been successfully concluded," he said.

Andrea Shaw contributed to this report.

Michelle Krupa can be reached at mkrupa@timespicayune.com or (504) 826-3785.

Pressured, Director Of Getty Trust Steps Down (NYT)

By Randy Kennedy And Carol Vogel

The New York Times, February 10, 2006

The president of the J. Paul Getty Trust in Los Angeles, one of the world's richest art institutions, resigned under pressure yesterday amid growing questions about his improper use of the trust's money.

The trust said that the president, Barry Munitz, whose travel and expense spending are under investigation by the California attorney general's office, would be required to repay the trust $250,000 and would not be given a severance package. The money was an estimate of what the trust felt Mr. Munitz owed because of perks, expenses and other costs that should not have been charged to the trust during his eight-year tenure, trust officials said.

"It's more judgment than it is precise mathematics," John H. Biggs, the board's chairman, said of the figure, adding that because the attorney general's investigation was continuing, he could provide few details about Mr. Munitz's departure and could not answer other questions about his practices.

He added, however, that "as far as the Getty Trust is involved, Munitz has resolved these issues" with the payment of $250,000, and that the board did not believe Mr. Munitz did anything improper under the laws that govern nonprofit trusts.

"He's still at risk that the A.G. may see it otherwise," Mr. Biggs added, referring to the state attorney general, "and there's no way that we as trustees can give him any assurance."

Mr. Munitz's departure represents a major reversal for one of the most powerful leaders in the art world, who controlled an institution with an endowment of more than $5 billion. The trust's board of trustees — many of whom are Mr. Munitz's friends and allies — had steadfastly stood by him, even as questions about his leadership and about other troubles at the trust mounted over the last several months.

Citing confidentiality agreements, the trust gave few specifics yesterday about the exact reasons for Mr. Munitz's departure. Mr. Biggs said that Mr. Munitz informed the trust of his decision to leave last weekend at a board meeting. "It was Barry's decision to get on with his life and not to have this hanging over him," he said.

But one former Getty employee with knowledge of the attorney general's inquiry said that investigators were looking into several instances in which Mr. Munitz had authorized grants or uses of the trust's money without obtaining proper approval. In some cases, the former employee said, the money was spent on pet projects of Mr. Munitz's — one involving chess, which he loved — that had very little to do with the Getty's mission. The trust said yesterday that Mr. Munitz would not be available for comment.

For the last several months, the Getty has been under siege on several fronts. Its former antiquities curator, Marion True, is now on trial in Italy on charges of trafficking in looted antiquities. She resigned last October amid questions about possible improprieties involving a real estate deal.

Allegations that Mr. Munitz may have abused his expense account with luxurious travel and perks, first reported in The Los Angeles Times last June, led to the wide-ranging investigation by the attorney general into the trust's finances and also led the Getty to set up its own internal committee to look into questions about the trust's practices.

In interviews, Mr. Munitz has defended his actions and his spending, saying that his job required him to court powerful collectors and donors around the world. He has also stressed that trust's board had approved all his expenses, including first-class air travel, stays at five-star hotels and a leased Porsche Cayenne.

Both the attorney general and the internal committee are also examining a 2002 real estate deal between the Getty and Eli Broad, a billionaire investor who is a friend of Mr. Munitz's.

In an interview last fall, after the attorney general's investigation was announced, Mr. Biggs said he believed Mr. Munitz had "really done a terrific job," though he added that he had warned Mr. Munitz about travel expenses, including yacht trips with Mr. Broad in Greece and Eastern Europe for which Mr. Munitz was partially reimbursed by the Getty.

Mr. Biggs, a former chief executive of TIAA-CREF, the investment fund, said the trips should have been treated as vacations, not business trips. "Barry and I have had a discussion about that," Mr. Biggs said at the time, adding, "Every time he spends some money we want him to take a hard look at it and ask himself whether he would want that spending published."

The Getty Trust includes the J. Paul Getty Museum in Los Angeles, a research institute, a library, an art conservation program and a grant-making office. The museum instantly became one of the world's wealthiest in 1982, when it received the estate of the oilman J. Paul Getty, giving it six times more money than its next-richest American sibling, the Metropolitan Museum of Art.

DOJ_NMG_0014091

Over the next two decades, the Getty grew significantly, spending hundreds of millions of dollars to enlarge its collection. But many critics say it has failed to live up to its early promise, a problem even before Mr. Munitz's arrival.

Mr. Munitz, a former business executive and chancellor of the California State University system who is well-connected in California political circles, has been one of the nation's best-paid executives of a nonprofit institution, with salary, benefits and perks totaling more than $1 million.

Federal Directive Targets Risky Mortgage Practices (WT)

By Patrice Hill

The Washington Times, February 10, 2006

Third of three parts

Federal banking agencies, concerned about the potential for abuses in mortgage lending, are going after the worst practices in the industry.

A directive last month from the Federal Reserve and four other federal agencies targets the proliferation of loans offering interest-only payments for extended periods and adjustable-rate mortgages that offer the option of paying interest only, making a minimum payment each month or adding in principal. That includes about half of all mortgages made last year.

Regulators say they are particularly concerned that some loans not only do not pay down principal, like a traditional mortgage, but they also increase the amount of principal that a consumer must pay by as much as 100 percent through "negative amortization."

The regulators also expressed concern about the growing practice of "layering" risky mortgages on top of already dicey lending practices, such as requiring no down payment or proof of income from borrowers.

The regulators said banks that offer such loans will be held accountable for making full disclosure of the risks to consumers.

But many inside and outside the mortgage industry question how much impact the banking directive will have, because so many mortgage brokers operate outside the banking system. Only those that are subsidiaries of banks would seem to be affected.

"Banking regulators actually have fairly minimal control or even influence over a huge portion of our economy," said Christopher Cruise, a Washington mortgage broker and trainer for the Mortgage Training Institute.

"I'm not saying we're thumbing our nose at the regulators," he said. But "if I'm a street-level originator licensed by the state of Maryland generating 20,000 loans in a year, and I find rich investors to buy them, nothing the [Office of the Comptroller of the Currency] says has any impact on me."

Mortgage companies such as Countrywide, the biggest nonbank lender in the country, appear to be unaffected, he said.

"I think they own a bank, I don't think the bank owns them. They sell their mortgages to Wall Street," he said.

'Empire of debt'

Although mortgage brokers perceive few limits on current practices, many nevertheless are concerned about the massive debts they see borrowers take on to buy houses and maintain affluent lifestyles.

Mortgage brokers in California report that some borrowers in recent years have been making a living by taking advantage of soaring housing prices and "flipping" real-estate investments — buying and selling them in rapid succession — while using equity loans on the properties as "income."

The practice could amount to mortgage fraud if the borrowers disguised the source of their "income" on their loan applications, the brokers said.

Mr. Cruise noted that debt appears to be addictive for some consumers who simply cannot save or go without lavish things. Some will refinance their mortgage at Christmastime, for example, so they can splurge on expensive presents.

"I feel like a drug dealer," he said. "I'm horrified at the empire of debt we're creating."

Mr. Cruise said some of his customers are so intent on getting loans, they won't take "no" for an answer. "We're enablers. We're just middlemen. In a sense, we profit from their foolishness."

Most mortgage brokers follow the disclosure requirements of the Truth In Lending Act, which specifies, among other things, that the full cost of the loan — principal plus interest — must be clearly spelled out to consumers before they sign the mortgage contract.

But Mr. Cruise said many consumers never bother to read the disclosures. With today's complex and sophisticated loan instruments, the old guidelines are inadequate and consumers are not getting the disclosures they need to make well-informed decisions, he said.

The law does not specify, for example, that lenders must disclose how much monthly payments may rise when rates are fully adjusted and principal is added under a worst-case scenario.

Most mortgage brokers today are in their 20s or early 30s and have not lived through a deep recession or other "worst-case scenario" in their adult lives, Mr. Cruise said.

"I'm not sure the loan officers themselves know what could happen" if rates rise precipitously or the economy plunges, he said.

Distant control

The federal banking directive specifies that lenders should disclose the terms of fully indexed loans to borrowers.

But Jack M. Guttentag, a retired professor from University of Pennsylvania's Wharton School of Business who sponsors a mortgage education Web site, mtgprofessor.com, said it's not clear whether the guidelines will change anything.

"What a broker or loan officer tells a borrower is pretty much up to them, so long as they comply with the disclosure laws," which don't prohibit most current practices, he said. "That is part of the market culture, and the regulators would have their hands full trying to change it."

Mortgage brokers also are right to question whether the directive applies to them, because the Federal Reserve has, at best, distant control over what the nonbank subsidiaries of bank-holding companies do, he said.

Deborah Lagomarsino, a Fed spokeswoman, declined to say whether or how the Fed would ensure that its directive is followed by the many mortgage companies not directly regulated by the Fed.

In any case, the guidance is too vague to be of much help to lenders that have established guidelines that detail the credit scores, loan-to-value ratios and other standards that borrowers must meet for loans.

"Sending me a bunch of homilies about how important it is to be careful of this or that will leave me unimpressed," Mr. Guttentag said. "If you really want me to take notice, show me where my guidelines fall short."

Because of the light regulation and demonstrated abuses, Mr. Guttentag has established a program to certify mortgage brokers and lenders in order to separate the unethical ones from "upfront" ones who disclose their fees and essential borrowing information.

"Many potential borrowers are shocked to discover that there is no registry of bad apples — and no system to certify good ones," he said.

One of the commitments a mortgage lender must make to be certified under Mr. Guttentag's program is to disclose what will happen to monthly payments in worst-case scenarios.

Some financial analysts say the banking directive will have a definite impact on banks as well as on investors who have been using interest-only loans to purchase property.

David Lereah, chief economist with the National Association of Realtors, says he expects the directive particularly to discourage speculators who "flip" properties in transactions that require minimal down payments and liberal loan terms.

"There will be fewer investors in the market this year," he said.

Sources: Gretzky Knew Of Gambling (PHI)

By Jennifer Moroz

The Philadelphia Inquirer, February 10, 2006

TRENTON - State wiretaps recorded hockey legend and NHL coach Wayne Gretzky talking about a sports gambling ring allegedly run by his assistant, former Flyer Rick Tocchet, two New Jersey law enforcement sources confirmed yesterday.

As part of a probe into what state law enforcement officials have described as a nationwide, multimillion-dollar illegal bookmaking operation, investigators are looking into whether Gretzky - coach and part-owner of the Phoenix Coyotes - placed any bets through his wife, Janet Jones, the sources said on condition of anonymity.

Gretzky, who has not been accused of wrongdoing, denied any involvement.

"If I had made one bet, I would have quit the Coyotes," Gretzky told the East Valley (Ariz.) Tribune before last night's game with the Dallas Stars. "I would never embarrass the team or the organization. If I had made one bet, I would have quit Team Canada. I would never embarrass them.

"There's nothing for me to hide from."

This week, sources confirmed that Jones and former Flyers center Jeremy Roenick, now with the Los Angeles Kings, were among several high-profile figures - including at least a half-dozen former and current NHL players - who had placed bets with the five-year-old gambling operation.

New Jersey state officials say that the ring accepted wagers on college and professional sports - mostly football and basketball - and that there was no evidence of any bets on National Hockey League games.

The Star-Ledger of Newark, citing unidentified law enforcement sources, first reported yesterday that state investigators had recorded Gretzky talking about the ring. The newspaper also reported that Jones bet $500,000 during a recent six-week period, including $75,000 on the Super Bowl.

DOJ_NMG_0014093

"At no time did I ever place a wager on my husband's behalf, period," Jones said in a statement provided by the Coyotes last night, which did not address her own possible involvement. "Other than the occasional horse race, my husband does not bet on any sports."

After the Coyotes' 5-1 loss last night, Gretzky said he still planned to attend the Turin Olympics as Team Canada's executive director.

"I'm still going to coach the Phoenix Coyotes. I've done nothing wrong," he said. "I'm going to Italy on Sunday. I'm going to be with Team Canada."

State police officials said investigators were interviewing the biggest bettors to determine whether they had engaged in any criminal activity. None has been accused of any wrongdoing.

So far, the only people charged in connection with the operation are Tocchet, who played for the Flyers from 1984 to 1992 and again from 1999 to 2002; his alleged partner, James Harney, a state trooper from Marlton who officials say accepted wagers while on patrol; and James Ulmer of Woolwich, who investigators said helped the pair taking bets.

The three men are scheduled to be arraigned Feb. 21 on charges of promoting gambling, money laundering and conspiracy in state Superior Court in Burlington County.

Attorneys for Harney and Tocchet - who is on indefinite leave from his job as a Coyotes associate coach - have called the charges overblown and irresponsible. Roenick has not commented.

On Tuesday, the day state officials announced the charges against Tocchet and Jones' name surfaced as a bettor, the Great One said he "wasn't involved."

"The reality is, I'm not involved, I wasn't involved, and I'm not going to be involved," Gretzky said. "Am I concerned for both of them [Jones and Tocchet]? Sure, there's concern from me. I'm more worried about them than me. I'm like you guys, I'm trying to figure it all out."

Elliot Mintz, a spokesman for Jones, said in a statement that she might be called as a witness before a New Jersey grand jury.

Some law enforcement officials quietly predict that federal authorities will step in to investigate numerous possible violations of federal law.

Michael Drewniak, a spokesman for the U.S. Attorney's Office in New Jersey, said the FBI had assisted state police "concerning interstate aspects" of the investigation, but that federal involvement had been minimal so far.

"At this time, this remains very much a state case," he said. He declined further comment.

Gretzky's Wife: 'Great One' Didn't Gamble (USAT)

By Kevin Allen, Usa Today

USA Today, February 10, 2006

Actress Janet Jones said Thursday that she never placed a wager on behalf of her husband, Phoenix Coyotes coach Wayne Gretzky, and Gretzky said he's "done nothing wrong, nothing that has to do with betting."

Addressing a betting scandal that led to the arrest of Coyotes associate Rick Tocchet, she released a statement, saying, "Other than the occasional horse race, my husband does not bet on any sports."

Reached by phone by USA TODAY, Jones said the statement would be her only comment: "I would like to say a thousand things, but I can't."

After the Coyotes' 5-1 loss to the Dallas Stars in Phoenix, Gretzky said he "felt like I've defended myself against something that absolutely didn't happen."

Jones' statement comes as the Associated Press, citing a person with knowledge of the investigation, reported Gretzky had been recorded on a wiretap talking to Tocchet about how Jones could avoid being implicated in the case.

According to that news report, Jones allegedly bet $100,000 on football games over the course of the investigation. The report said there was no evidence Gretzky bet on games.

USA TODAY could not independently confirm Gretzky was recorded on a wiretap.

FBI spokesman Rich Kolko confirmed the bureau was asked Thursday to assist in the case.

According to The Arizona Republic, citing two NHL officials with knowledge of the investigation, Coyotes general manager Mike Barnett, Gretzky's former agent, bet on the Super Bowl with Tocchet.

Barnett said in a statement he cooperated with investigators in New Jersey and "they informed me my conduct in no way violated federal or state laws."

Gretzky said he will travel to Italy to serve as executive director of Canada's Olympic men's hockey team.

David Gourevitch, a former prosecutor who now specializes in defending white collar cases, called the leaks about Gretzky "inappropriate" and "salacious" and does not prove that Gretzky committed a crime.

DOJ_NMG_0014094

"They are leaking stuff that they know is inflammable and will garner publicity," says Gourevitch. "But it is not clear what they are leaking violates a law. It's not a crime to know that some else is engaged in a crime," he adds. "There is no snitch obligation and there doesn't seem to be as yet a suggestion that Gretzky was placing bets or personally involved in this."

Team Canada and Coyotes officials say Gretzky plans to travel to Italy to serve as executive director of the Olympic men's hockey team.

The New Jersey attorney general said Thursday that arraignment hearings for the trio charged in "Operation Slapshot" will be Feb. 21.

Tocchet, James Harney and James A. Ulmer all face charges of money laundering, promotion of gambling and conspiracy, while Harney, a New Jersey state trooper, has the added charge of official misconduct because he allegedly committed these acts while acting as a public servant.

The reaction around the hockey world is that it's shocking even to have Gretzky's name associated with the scandal.

"When I played with and against Gretzky, I viewed him as a player who understood what he meant to the game and always put the game first," said former NHL player Tom Laidlaw, who played with Gretzky in Los Angeles. "He was always concerned about his image, and I mean that in a good way. And Janet struck me as someone who also understood who he was and how important it was to him to have the proper image."

Contributing: Adam Shell, Kevin Johnson

Gretzky Taped Trying To Aid Wife (WT/AP)

By Angela Delli Santi And Geoff Mulvihill

The Washington Times, February 10, 2006

TRENTON, N.J. -- Wayne Gretzky was recorded on a wiretap talking to the man suspected of financing a gambling ring, discussing how the hockey great's wife could avoid being implicated, a person with knowledge of the investigation told the Associated Press yesterday.

Mr. Gretzky, coach and part owner of the Phoenix Coyotes, can be heard on wiretaps made within the past month talking about his wife with assistant coach Rick Tocchet, the person said, speaking on the condition of anonymity because the investigation was ongoing.

Mr. Gretzky's wife, actress Janet Jones, purportedly bet at least $100,000 on football games over the course of the investigation by state authorities, the person said.

There is no evidence that Mr. Gretzky placed any bets, according to the person.

"At no time did I ever place a wager on my husband's behalf, period," Mrs. Jones said in a statement provided by the Coyotes last night. "Other than the occasional horse race, my husband does not bet on any sports."

Authorities say from Dec. 29 through Feb. 5 -- the day of the Super Bowl -- bettors placed $1.7 million in wagers with the ring run by a New Jersey state trooper, Mr. Tocchet and a South Jersey man. All face charges of promoting gambling, money laundering and conspiracy and are scheduled to be arraigned in Superior Court in Mount Holly on Feb. 21, the state Attorney General's office said yesterday.

Mrs. Jones has not been charged.

Elliot Mintz, a spokesman for Mrs. Jones, said in a statement that she may be called as a witness before a grand jury in New Jersey.

"Janet is merely one of a number of witnesses, and there is no allegation whatsoever that Janet has violated any law," he said.

Investigators are looking into whether anyone involved in the five-year-old ring, which authorities say had a connection to organized crime in Philadelphia and southern New Jersey, bet on National Hockey League (NHL) games. Mr. Gretzky is not the main focus of the probe, the person said.

The Star-Ledger of Newark, citing unidentified law-enforcement sources, first reported a wiretap involving Mr. Gretzky in yesterday's newspapers. The newspaper also reported that Mrs. Jones bet $500,000 during the investigation, including $75,000 on the Super Bowl.

Earlier in the week, Mr. Gretzky denied any involvement in the ring. Mr. Gretzky did not attend the Coyotes practice in Phoenix yesterday.

Lawyers involved in the case said details of the three-month investigation should not be made public.

"I have never been involved in a case where the prosecution has engaged in such inappropriate conduct in terms of making investigators available to the press, appearing on nationally syndicated television," said Kevin Marino, a lawyer for Mr. Tocchet, who was granted an indefinite leave from the NHL on Wednesday. "It's improper, it's unwarranted, and I will not tolerate it."

DOJ_NMG_0014095

Attorneys for all three men charged in what authorities have dubbed "Operation Slapshot" said they will fight the charges.

"This case will not be a guilty plea," said Charles A. Peruto Jr., who is representing James Ulmer. Mr. Ulmer and Trooper James Harney are accused of taking wagers and cuts of the bets.

The accusations have sent shock waves through the hockey world.

State investigators said they will interview more hockey players who were thought to have placed bets, in part to determine whether there was any gambling on hockey. So far, authorities say, they do not have evidence that there was.

The NHL has hired Robert Cleary, a former federal prosecutor who handled the Unabomber case, to investigate.

Mr. Cleary said yesterday that he was not sure how long his work might take, in part because he wants to stay out of the way of law-enforcement agents who are continuing to investigate.

Hockey players are prohibited from making NHL wagers, legal or otherwise. There are no rules that forbid them from placing legal bets on other sports.

Task Force Run By FBI Unmasks Identity Thieves (SLT)

By Pamela Manson, The Salt Lake Tribune

Salt Lake Tribune, February 10, 2006

Matthew Rodney Page, of Kaysville, surfed the Internet to find someone with his name and a similar date of birth to help get himself $42,000 in auto loans, two new credit cards and the fee for flying lessons.

Bryan Nelson Hansard, of Bountiful, "washed" stolen checks - removed the ink with chemicals, then rewrote the dollar amount or recipient - and deposited them into his own bank accounts.

These Davis County residents are part of a trend of using the names and financial information of others to steal money and merchandise. As the offense started to become more prevalent, authorities set up the Utah Identity Theft Task Force (ITTF), which operates as part of the FBI's Joint Terrorism Task Force.

Since its inception in November 2004, "the task force has been a resounding success," said Kathy Roberts, inspector in charge of the U.S. Postal Inspection Service's Denver division, which includes Utah.

At a recent news conference in Salt Lake City, Roberts and other officials ticked off Utah ITTF statistics from the past 15 months - 190 investigations launched; 1,366 victims of identity theft identified; about 150 indictments returned with convictions won in 127 of them so far; and more than 25 training sessions held on fraud prevention for law enforcement agencies, community groups and merchants.

Identity thieves use stolen information to obtain credit cards, cash checks made out to others, take out loans, collect tax refunds due to another taxpayer and get a driver license or passport under a false name. In addition to cheating merchants and banks, they cause financial hardship to their victims, who often are left with bad credit ratings that take a long time to correct.

The majority of cases handled by the identity theft task force involve "mailboxing," the stealing of checks, credit cards and other items from mailboxes. Thieves using someone else's personal information to get a credit card is the next biggest category.

Among the ways scam artists find information is by going through customer records at their own jobs or by pretending to be salespeople in telephone calls.

Identity thieves run the gamut from individuals to members of street gangs to white collar criminals, according to Timothy Fuhrman, special agent in charge of the FBI's Salt Lake City office.

Advertisement

Fuhrman and Paul Warner, who recently stepped down as U.S. attorney for Utah to become a federal magistrate, said many thieves are drug addicts trying to support their habit.

Punishment for identity theft-related crimes can be stiff. Aggravated identity fraud carries a minimum mandatory sentence of two years, which must be served after all sentences are served.

Other maximum terms are 30 years for bank fraud; 15 years for identity theft; 10 years for possession of stolen checks; and five years for conspiracy to commit identity fraud and possession of stolen mail.

Page, 40, pleaded guilty and was sentenced Feb. 1 to one month in federal prison for bank fraud and two years for aggravated identity theft.

Hansard, 35, who admitted committing bank fraud, was sentenced last year in U.S. District Court to 18 months behind bars.

ITTF members include the FBI, U.S. Postal Inspection Service, Secret Service, Utah Attorney General's Office, Department of Corrections, Department of Public Safety, Ogden Police Department, Salt Lake County Sheriff's Office and the U.S. Attorney's Office. Numerous local law enforcement agencies also participate in investigating identity theft crimes.

Protect yourself

DOJ_NMG_0014096

Even people who are careful with their personal information can be victimized by identity theft, but these tips from the U.S. Postal Inspection Service can help.

* Review your consumer credit reports annually.
* Shred and destroy unwanted documents that contain personal information.
* Deposit mail in U.S. Postal Service collection boxes.
* Do not leave mail in your mailbox overnight or on weekends.

More suggestions on how to avoid identity fraud are posted at http://www.usps.com/postalinspectors.

Decker Takes 5th Amendment (WINSJ)

By David Rice, JOURNAL RALEIGH BUREAU

Winston-Salem (NC) Journal, February 10, 2006

Former member of House declines to testify before hearing into possible illegal campaign donations

RALEIGH -- Former state Rep. Michael Decker took the Fifth Amendment yesterday, citing his right against self-incrimination as he declined to testify about campaign donations he got from optometrists after he switched parties in 2003 to help optometrist Jim Black remain speaker of the House.

"We have advised Rep. Decker ... to rest upon his Fifth Amendment rights," David Freedman, Decker's attorney, told Larry Leake, the chairman of the State Board of Elections after Leake called on Decker to testify. The elections board is investigating possible illegal donations from optometrists and the video-poker industry to the Black and Decker campaigns. A federal grand jury is also investigating, and several optometrists said they have been interviewed by the FBI and U.S. Treasury agents.

Although Black initially testified yesterday that he couldn't recall handling blank checks provided by his fellow optometrists, he later acknowledged to the elections board that he filled in Decker's campaign as the payee on at least three of the checks.

"I don't remember seeing blank checks - unless they were in an envelope, sealed, with somebody's name on it," Black said at first.

Then Leake handed Black a copy of a $4,000 check made out to Decker's campaign from M. Scott Edwards of Murfreesboro, the treasurer of the N.C. Optometric Society, along with two $100 checks from Gary Roach, an optometrist from Morrisville.

Black acknowledged that it was his handwriting that designated Decker's campaign as the payee. But Black and his attorneys argued that the donations were not illegal under state law.

"The law specifically allows ... for the donor to fill out a check and leave the determination of who it goes to until another time," said Kenneth Bell, one of Black's attorneys. "The law specifically allows for that."

Black acknowledged that he urged optometrists and others to support Decker with campaign donations when Decker, a Republican from Walkertown, switched parties in January 2003, creating a 60-60 tie in the House that allowed Black, a Democrat, to remain speaker.

"I encouraged a lot of people to give to Mr. Decker," Black said. "I knew he was going to be under siege. If he was going to survive politically, he needed to build a war chest."

After returning to the GOP, Decker was soundly defeated in the 2004 Republican primary.

Black gave an impassioned defense of his actions to help raise campaign money for Decker, but he denied giving Decker money in return for his party switch.

"I want to right here, right now, under oath, tell you that I never gave Michael Decker anything to change parties or to vote for me or for any other political purpose," Black said. "There was nothing offered to him, nothing promised to him. He changed parties because I'd always treated him with respect and dignity, and his own party didn't.

"Now, if Michael Decker's on my team - and he was the newest, very important member of my team - I don't want Michael Decker to get beat in the next election. So I want to help him raise funds, as I do all the people on my team - Democrat and Republican," Black testified.

Leake read a quotation from a 1991 newspaper article in which Black was quoted as saying that he would ask optometrists to form a political-action committee and stop the practice of sending checks with the recipients' names left blank.

"I'm going to make a proposal that we not send a check anywhere that's not filled out," Black was quoted as saying at the time.

But yesterday marked the second day of testimony from optometrists who said they had given the N.C. Optometric Society PAC dozens of checks that they signed but left the "payee" line blank.

Many of the checks found their way to Decker's campaign, and, in some cases, were made out to Decker personally and appeared to have been cashed.

DOJ_NMG_0014097

David Freeman, an optometrist in Winston-Salem, said he occasionally got checks from Edwards, the optometric PAC's treasurer, with instructions to pass them along to Decker.

Leake showed J. Michael Burke, another optometrist from Winston-Salem, two $100 checks from Burke that had personally been made out to Decker.

"That was not the intent of the contribution," Burke replied.

"They came in an envelope. I'd just add my own check and forward it on to Mike," Freeman said.

Edwards, too, cited his Fifth Amendment rights and declined to testify yesterday.

Although Black said that personal donations were a way to keep optometrists personally involved, several of the optometrists who provided blank checks that ultimately went to Decker or his campaign said they did not know Decker.

"I've heard maybe three or four say they knew who Michael Decker was. So how are these people involved if their money goes to somebody they don't know from Adam's housecat?" asked Chuck Winfree, a Republican member of the elections board from Greensboro.

Lorraine Shinn, a Republican board member from Greenville, pointed to the $4,000 check from Edwards and the optometrists' PAC on Jan. 15, 2003, that went to Decker's campaign - nine days before he switched parties.

"That, to me, is buying a vote in this situation," she said.

Black said that Decker told him that Black had Decker's vote for speaker in mid-November 2002, two months before he actually switched parties.

Board members grew frustrated with what they considered evasive answers.

When Michael Haines, an optometrist from Four Oaks, asked the difference between "probable" and "possible," Winfree erupted.

"Four years ago we had hearings and we had witnesses in the Meg Scott Phipps matter, and we had witnesses sitting there evading answers, and they are now in the custody of the federal marshals," Winfree said.

"That's a threat," said Press Millen, an attorney for the optometrists. "I think that's a totally inappropriate thing that he said."

The hearing will enter its third day today, and Leake said that it will have to resume later because testimony on the video-poker portion of the investigation has not begun.

The board could take action on the optometrist investigation today, and Leake made it clear that he thinks that the optometrists have run an illegal PAC through their separate "legislative committee."

"I believe that there is a significant likelihood that there were illegalities on the part of certain individuals or parties," he said.

But Leake said that the board decided not to offer Decker immunity from civil penalties in order to get him to testify before the elections board.

"This board has enjoyed what I would call unparalleled cooperation from the U.S. Attorney's Office ... and from the office of the district attorney," he said. "While we have that power, we are being very careful that we do not frustrate any investigation or any activities that they have ongoing."

Convicted Torture Killer Of 19-year-old Girl Executed (FINDLAW/AP)

By Michael Graczyk, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 10, 2006

(AP) - HUNTSVILLE, Texas-A paroled burglar who claimed he wanted to be a serial killer of minorities was executed Wednesday night for the torture-slaying eight years ago of a 19-year-old mentally impaired woman who once worked with him.

Robert Neville Jr., apologizing profusely, addressed his victim's mother by name as she and her two daughters stood close to the glass with their arms around each other. He expressed love to them.

"I hope you can find it in yourselves to forgive me and I hope all this here will kind of settle your pain. And I hope the Lord will give you comfort and peace. I just want you to know I am very sorry for what I have done," he said.

Referring to his victim, Amy Robinson, 19, Neville, said, "If I see Amy on the other side, I will tell her how much you love and miss her. And we will have a lot to talk about."

Neville then turned toward his parents, who watched through an adjacent window.

"I am sorry for putting you through all this pain and stuff," he said. "I love you all and I will see you on the other side."

Seven minutes later at 6:19 p.m. CST, he was pronounced dead.

Neville, 31, was the third prisoner executed this year and the first of three over the next 15 days in the nation's most active capital punishment state.

Neville and a companion, Michael Wayne Hall, were condemned for the fatal shooting of Robinson, who was abducted as she rode her bike to work at a Dallas-area supermarket. She was taken to a remote area of Tarrant County where she was shot repeatedly with a pellet gun, then killed with shots from a .22-caliber rifle as she begged for her life.

DOJ_NMG_0014098

Hall, 26, remains on death row. He does not have an execution date.

"I think they just thought of her as you would think of a cat or dog or something," said Alan Levy, the Tarrant County assistant district attorney who prosecuted the pair.

At the time of the Feb. 15, 1998, slaying, Neville had been on parole about eight months after serving two years of a 10-year prison term for burglary.

"He did mention Amy. We're really glad we came," Tina Robinson, the victim's mother, said, flanked by two other daughters. "I feel like this is a victory for Amy. We're really relieved.

"I think he really felt bad for what he did, even though it's not going to bring Amy back."

About an hour before his scheduled execution time, the U.S. Supreme Court rejected his final appeals.

His lawyers had hoped to block the execution with appeals in the federal courts that questioned whether the lethal drugs used in the punishment were humane and that Neville suffered a mental illness brought on by lupus that should disqualify him from the death penalty.

The Supreme Court has ruled mentally retarded people are ineligible for capital punishment but has not extended the blanket prohibition to the mentally ill.

Neville and Hall were arrested about two weeks after Robinson was reported missing. They were stopped at a customs checkpoint near Eagle Pass as they were trying to cross into Mexico. They told authorities they could find Robinson's body in a grassy field in the Trinity River bottoms just north of Arlington.

Robinson suffered from a genetic disorder, Turner's syndrome, a rare chromosome disorder found only in women and characterized by short stature and lack of sexual development at puberty.

She also was described as mentally challenged. Prosecutors said she was "easy prey," which is how Neville and Hall, days after their arrest, characterized their victim as they spoke with reporters and laughed about how Robinson died as she pleaded to live.

The pair had worked with her at an Arlington Kroger store before they were fired and knew the route she took as she rode her bike to work. When they offered her a ride, she accepted.

"We had a bet going to see who could shoot and kill the most people between the two of us," Neville told the Fort Worth Star-Telegram two weeks after his arrest, explaining that he and Hall wanted to become serial killers whose victims were racial minorities. "No matter if it was blacks or Mexicans - anybody as long as they weren't our color."

Robinson was part Native American.

Neville declined to speak with reporters in the weeks before his scheduled execution.

Next week, another inmate, Clyde Smith, 32, faces injection for the robbery and slaying of a Houston taxi driver in 1992.

Texas Department of Criminal Justice execution schedule: http://www.tdcj.state.tx.us/stat/scheduledexecutions.htm

Supreme Court Puzzles Some With Mixed Answers On Lethal Injection (WP)

By Charles Lane

The Washington Post, February 10, 2006

In the past two weeks, the Supreme Court stopped two executions in Florida and allowed a lower court to halt another in Missouri -- but the justices allowed three other death sentences, in Texas and Indiana, to proceed.

The court's actions are not necessarily contradictory under the law, but they have puzzled many on both sides of the debate over capital punishment because in each case the death-row inmate raised a similar issue: the legality of lethal injection as the means for execution.

In the Texas case, for example, lawyers for Robert Neville Jr. took the wording for their Feb. 8 appeal from a petition that the court had accepted 14 days earlier when it halted the execution of Clarence E. Hill in Florida. But the justices rejected Neville's bid; he was put to death Wednesday.

"We look to the Supreme Court for consistency and a policy everyone can follow, and we're not getting it from this court," said Richard Alley, Neville's lawyer. Florida Gov. Jeb Bush (R) also cited "uncertainty" about the Supreme Court's direction when he declared Feb. 1 that he will not sign any more death warrants until the court issues final rulings on the Florida cases.

"I am sure the court is trying to apply some sort of sensible standard," said Douglas A. Berman, an expert in criminal sentencing law at Ohio State University's Moritz College of Law. "But they need to do a heck of a lot better job explaining why."

The probable explanation for the court's apparent zigzag is that a majority of the court is ready to consider only a relatively narrow issue related to lethal injection. But because the court generally does not reveal more than a bare minimum of information about how and why it chooses to take up any particular matter, lawyers have only been able to arrive at this educated guess after much litigation.

DOJ_NMG_0014099

Introduced in Oklahoma in 1977 as an alternative to the electric chair, lethal injection has been adopted as the principal mode of execution by 37 of 38 death-penalty states, including Maryland and Virginia, as well as the federal government and the U.S. military. The District has no death penalty.

Yet anti-death-penalty activists argue that the dosage of anesthetic in the three-drug "protocol" used to kill capital offenders is flawed, and that, if it is administered improperly by untrained personnel, the process of suffocation and cardiac arrest caused by the other two drugs can therefore be as painful as electrocution or the gas chamber.

Their claim was bolstered by a 2005 article in the Lancet, a medical journal, but state law enforcement officials remain skeptical.

"It's sort of a legal 'Hail Mary' pass," said Joshua Marquis, prosecutor in Astoria, Ore., and a vice president of the National District Attorneys Association.

Indeed, the argument had made little headway in court until the night of Jan. 25, when the justices issued a stay of execution to Hill, the convicted killer of a Pensacola, Fla., police officer, as he lay on a gurney waiting for the flow of lethal chemicals.

The court acted without recorded dissent after first rejecting Hill's request to consider the broad issue of whether lethal injection as such is "cruel and unusual punishment."

But it did say it would hear Hill's narrower claim, which had been rejected by a federal appeals court in Atlanta: that he should have an opportunity to argue in the lower courts that Florida's lethal-injection formula, which is similar to that used in other jurisdictions, would cause him excessive pain, thus violating his civil rights.

The next day, the court's unanimity fractured. It denied a stay of execution to Indiana death-row inmate Marvin Bieghler, who was appealing the Indiana Supreme Court's rejection of his broad challenge to the constitutionality of lethal injection.

Two justices, John Paul Stevens and Ruth Bader Ginsburg dissented, signaling that they thought the court should hear the broader constitutional claim, too.

Bieghler then brought the broad claim to the lower federal courts, winning a stay of execution from the federal appeals court in Chicago. That court based its 2 to 1 decision on the Supreme Court's grant of a stay to Hill. But the majority of the appeals court said it had acted only because it was not "comfortably certain" about the meaning of the court's stay for Hill.

The next day, the Supreme Court overturned that stay -- with dissents by Stevens, Ginsburg and Stephen G. Breyer -- and Bieghler was put to death. That ruling is the clearest indication that the court is, indeed, interested only in the narrow claim raised by Hill -- that there should be a chance to raise a civil rights challenge to the injection formula.

On Jan. 31, the court granted a stay to another Florida inmate, Arthur D. Rutherford, who was in an identical position to Hill.

A day later, on Feb. 1, the court denied a stay to Texas's Jaime Elizalde Jr. -- but refused to vacate a stay for Missouri's Michael A. Taylor that had been imposed by the federal court of appeals in St. Louis. This time, Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas dissented.

Taylor had raised a Hill-like narrow claim early in his appeals process but had been given only a hasty, last-minute hearing on the claim in federal district court, said Thomas C. Goldstein, a Washington lawyer who represents a Tennessee death-row inmate at the Supreme Court. This apparently prompted the appeals court to give him a stay, and a majority of the Supreme Court, including new Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. to let it stand.

The bottom line appears to be, Goldstein said, that while the court will not block executions for those raising only a broad claim that lethal injection is cruel and unusual, it has agreed to decide whether challenges to a lethal-injection formula may be raised as a civil rights lawsuit, and is therefore blocking executions for people who have not yet had a sufficient day in court on that claim.

Meanwhile, however, it is also not stopping executions in which death-row inmates seem to be raising the narrow issue only at the last minute, to take advantage of its decision to hear Hill's case. In a 2004 opinion, the court had expressed opposition to such latecomers.

That would explain why the court denied Texas's Neville a stay of execution -- with no recorded dissents.

With 22 executions scheduled by the states and the federal government before the end of June, when the court's term ends, lower courts remain caught up in the lethal-injection issue.

In California, Angelo Michael Morales is challenging that state's injection formula before a San Jose federal district judge. His execution is set for Feb. 21.

In Maryland, Vernon L. Evans Jr. has received a stay of execution from the Court of Appeals so that it could decide several claims, related both to alleged racial discrimination and to the state's lethal-injection protocol. But his lawsuit is based on alleged violations of state rather than federal law.

DOJ_NMG_0014100

CIVIL LAW:

Judge Questions Viability Of NYC's Gun Litigation (LAW)

By Tom Perrotta, New York Law Journal

New York Law Journal, February 10, 2006

Two months after allowing New York City's lawsuit against the gun industry to proceed, a federal judge in Brooklyn suggested Wednesday the suit might be doomed by language in the appropriations bill passed by Congress last year.

In a brief order, Eastern District of New York Judge Jack B. Weinstein ordered the city to explain why its suit should not be dismissed in light of the new legislation, which bars the use of a federal database that tracks firearms as evidence in civil litigation.

The Firearms Trace System database is central to the city's suit, which alleges that gun manufacturers sell excess weapons in cities and states with weak gun laws, knowing that unqualified buyers in New York will obtain the weapons through "straw" purchases.

The city alleges that gun manufacturers know which dealers are selling weapons that are used in crimes, and it had intended to use the database to help prove its case.

Assistant Corporation Counsel Eric Proshansky, the city's lead attorney on the case, said the new legislation would force the city "to prove this case in a manner that does not require trace data" -- a far more difficult task.

The legislation was signed into law on Nov. 22, before Weinstein issued a 111-page opinion that determined the city's suit was exempt from the Protection of Lawful Commerce in Arms Act, a different law that shields gun manufacturers from civil lawsuits.

Weinstein was unaware of the appropriations legislation when he issued his order in early December. At the time, the judge stayed his ruling, and the 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals later accepted an interlocutory appeal.

Wednesday, however, Weinstein rescinded his stay, saying he still had jurisdiction over matters not involved in the appeal. He scheduled a hearing for March 3.

"Decision by this court on the effect of the new legislation may affect the nature of any appeal now pending," Weinstein wrote in City of New York v. Beretta U.S.A. Corp., 00-cv-3641, a three-page order. "To avoid any unnecessary work by the parties and the Court of Appeals this court withdraws its stay."

An attorney for the National Shooting Sports Foundation, the gun industry's trade association, objected to Weinstein's sua sponte order for a hearing. The attorney, Lawrence G. Keane, said the appropriations bill addressed an evidentiary question separate from issues pending before the circuit, and should not be considered until the appeal is completed, if necessary.

"He has no jurisdiction, and even if he does the issue is not ripe," Keane said. "The trial hasn't started."

Proshansky said it made no difference to the city whether the evidentiary issue was addressed before or after the circuit appeal. He said he was more concerned with the little-noticed language that was inserted into the appropriations bill.

"It basically says you can't use this evidence in court," Proshansky said. "What's most frustrating is to see the federal government interfering with local efforts to protect the public safety."

The city's lawsuit, now more than five years old, has received the strong backing of Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg. It alleges that gun manufacturers -- including Beretta U.S.A. Corp., Smith & Wesson Corp., and Colt's Manufacturing Company -- have created a public nuisance through the sale and marketing of weapons that are later used to commit crimes. The city is not seeking monetary damages, but wants changes to the gun industry's marketing practices. It also is seeking attorney fees.

Last year, the gun manufacturers sought to dismiss the suit after the Protection of Lawful Commerce in Arms Act was signed into law. Weinstein found that the city's claim fit into an exception made for suits that allege a knowing violation of a state or federal statute applicable to the sale or marketing of guns.

Michael L. Rice of Jones Day, which represents Colt's Manufacturing, said the defendants wish to resolve litigation through the pending appeal. "We would like to get the suit resolved on that basis," Rice said. "We think it's clear that the Protection of Lawful Commerce [in Arms] Act is the clean, direct way to end the lawsuit."

Senators Urge Major Changes To Asbestos Bill (REU-Y2)

By Susan Cornwell

Reuters, February 10, 2006

A group of Republican senators on Thursday proposed completely rewriting an asbestos bill to allow lawsuits under strict medical criteria rather than create a $140 billion fund to pay victims of the mineral.

DOJ_NMG_0014101

The new approach to resolve years of litigation over lung-scarring diseases and cancer linked to asbestos was offered by Texas Republican John Cornyn, who said he had 14 Republican co-sponsors and hoped to attract Democrats.

Cornyn's proposal is similar to a bill introduced in the House that would allow asbestos lawsuits to go forward only if claimants met certain medical standards. He introduced the plan as an amendment to a bill that would halt asbestos lawsuits and create an industry-financed $140 billion fund to pay claims.

Many critics of the fund are concerned it will run out of money, leaving taxpayers to foot the bill.

"I believe the likelihood is that the trust fund will sooner rather than later, prove unsustainable," Cornyn said.

Asbestos fibers were widely used for their insulating and fire-retardant capabilities for years. Some 70 U.S. companies, including W.R. Grace and Co. and USG Corp., have been pushed into bankruptcy proceedings by injury claims.

The asbestos fund bill on the Senate floor is sponsored by Pennsylvania Republican Sen. Arlen Specter (news, bio, voting record) -- who immediately spoke against Cornyn's proposal -- and Vermont Democrat Sen. Patrick Leahy (news, bio, voting record). Their bill would require asbestos companies and insurers to finance the fund to end all litigation.

The fund proposal has split the business community as well as senators in both parties and has struggled to gain support.

On Wednesday, Senate Democrats said their analysis of the proposed fund showed that it would run out of money and need a federal bailout to pay injury claims.

Cornyn said his proposed amendment would establish a "national floor" with respect to medical criteria. It would require physical impairment, to which exposure to asbestos was a substantial contributing factor, to bring an asbestos claim to court. Several states have passed similar legislation.

His proposal would also extend the statute of limitations for filing claims, so people who are not yet sick from asbestos can still have their cases heard if they fall ill in the future, Cornyn said. Further, the plan would attempt to limit fraud by medical screeners that vouch for claims.

Specter said medical criteria would not help injured employees of bankrupt firms because they had no one to sue.

Utah Republican Sen. Bob Bennett said support was divided for the bill because some companies, like USG, would have vast asbestos liabilities wiped out if the fund passes. Others, like Foster Wheeler Ltd, would have to pay into the fund many times what their asbestos outlays would otherwise be.

"People have done the numbers. Some say I'm better off in the tort (court) system and others say, 'I'll pay anything to get out," Bennett told the Senate.

The Coalition for Asbestos Reform, a lobbying group representing companies opposed to the trust fund, urged senators to vote for Cornyn's amendment. Its chairman Thomas O'Brien, former counsel to Foster Wheeler, said Cornyn's approach would create "a national standard that would finally bring asbestos litigation abuses under control."

Shares of companies with asbestos liabilities were mixed in afternoon trading.

Foster Wheeler was up 1.21 percent to $48.58 a share on Nasdaq. W.R. Grace was down 1 percent to $10.91 a share and USG was off 1.63 percent to $88.76, both on the New York Stock Exchange.

Asbestos Bill Meets Test, Faces New One (AJC/AP)

By Mary Dalrymple

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, February 10, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Senate rejected an attempt Thursday to keep asbestos cases in the courts, removing one obstacle to the creation of a $140 billion trust fund for paying victims and ending their lawsuits.

Opponents quickly raised another obstacle. Sen. John Ensign, R-Nev., questioned the fund's future costs to taxpayers and asserted that the bill violates budget rules.

The bill would establish a privately funded trust fund, administered through the Labor Department, to compensate asbestos victims.

The fibrous mineral was commonly used until the mid-1970s in insulation and fireproof material. Its tiny fibers can cause cancer and other ailments when inhaled. Disease can take decades to develop.

Sen. John Cornyn, R-Texas, tried to kill the proposed trust fund and create, instead, new medical standards for bringing an asbestos case to court. He said lawmakers could weed out suits brought by people not yet sick from asbestos exposure and thin the mass of cases clogging the judicial system.

"I believe that the likelihood is far greater that the trust fund will sooner, rather than later, prove unsustainable and return us to the same broken tort system, only then leaving thousands of Americans in the wake of a failed government program wondering where to go and why they must now go back to court," he said.

The Senate voted 70-27 to shelve the proposal.

Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, the Pennsylvania Republican who sponsored the trust fund bill, said changing the standards for bringing a case to court can't help the thousands of people suffering deadly disease who have no one to sue.

Specter and other trust fund supporters say it could compensate veterans and former employees of bankrupt companies. They also argue that smaller companies could avoid bankruptcy by sidestepping lengthy court battles.

The White House gave the bill lukewarm support but expressed serious concerns about some parts of the legislation. Some critics question whether the trust fund, financed by asbestos manufacturers, users and insurers, would be emptied by claims.

Ensign said there remains the possibility that taxpayers will have to pick up the tab in future years if the trust fund runs out of money.

"I don't think that the underlying piece of legislation can be fixed to any great certainty to make sure that the taxpayers in the future aren't ending up holding a huge mess that includes a great deal of debt for future generations," Ensign said.

His objection requires 60 of 100 votes to overcome, with a vote expected next week.

Specter said private companies fill the trust fund, not the government, and that the trust fund's opponents had seized on a technicality.

"This is a convenient maneuver to defeat the bill," he said.

Forward On Asbestos (WP)

The Washington Post, February 10, 2006

IN A TRIUMPH of good sense and bipartisan cooperation, the Senate voted on Tuesday to go forward with a bill that would fix the broken asbestos litigation system. Hundreds of thousands of asbestos injury claims have already landed in the courts, contributing to the bankruptcy of more than 70 companies. Without reform, this process will drag on, triggering the bankruptcy of yet more firms, many of which have only tenuous asbestos connections, because the main firms responsible have already gone under. Meanwhile, many who are ill from asbestos-related diseases won't be able to get timely compensation or, in some cases, any compensation. Unless the bill passes, Navy veterans, for example, will go uncompensated for diseases caused by asbestos on ships. Veterans are not allowed to sue the government, and many of the shipbuilders are long since bankrupt.

The bill will be debated and amended, and it may face a second attempted filibuster before it gets a vote. Some amendment may be reasonable at the margins, but the bill's central idea -- to replace litigation with a $140 billion compensation fund to be financed by defendant companies and their insurers -- must be preserved. Democrats complain that the fund won't have enough money to compensate asbestos victims; Republicans complain that the fund will have too much money, the raising of which will constitute a burden on small and medium-size firms. The fact that the bill is being attacked from both directions suggests that its authors, Sens. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) and Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.), have balanced competing interests in a reasonable manner.

Unfortunately, the bill's critics are not always so reasonable. Sen. Harry M. Reid of Nevada, the Democratic minority leader, has complained, "One would have to search long and hard to find a bill in my opinion as bad as this." He has even described the legislation as the work of lobbyists hired by corporations to limit asbestos exposure. But the truth is that the bill's main opponents are trial lawyers, who profit mightily from asbestos lawsuits and who constitute a powerful lobby in their own right. Mr. Specter and Mr. Leahy are in fact model resisters of special interests who have spent more than two years crafting legislation that serves the public interest. For Mr. Reid to demean this effort in order to fire off campaign sound bites is reprehensible.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Ex-Officer Charged With Making Threats (NSDY/AP)

By Associated Press

Long Island Newsday, February 10, 2006

HAGERSTOWN, Md. -- The FBI on Thursday charged a former police officer with making racial, bomb and anthrax threats after he was fired by the city.

The threats began four months after Jeffrey S. Shifler was dismissed in November 2003 for falsifying payroll records, court records said.

Shifler, 41, was in custody, authorities said. He was expected to appear Friday in federal court in Baltimore. He faces as many as 10 years in prison if convicted on all counts.

No phone listing was available for him.

DOJ_NMG_0014103

Shifler made 14 anonymous phone calls and sent at least nine anonymous letters containing threats, insults or false crime reports, according to a court complaint. The threats targeted police employees and a black city council member, and such institutions as schools and public office buildings.

Many letters were on photocopied Hagerstown Police Department letterhead, the complaint alleges.

Shifler was hired by the nearby town of Boonsboro after being fired in Hagerstown. It was unclear whether he was still working there.

U.S. Files Fewer Discrimination Charges (AP)

AP, February 10, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) - The U.S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission filed fewer charges of discrimination against private employers last year for the third straight year.

Commission chair Cari M. Dominguez said the commission's prevention efforts through outreach and training might be responsible but added that other factors, like the economic slowdown, might also be involved. "We are pleased to see that our proactive prevention efforts may be having an impact," she said.

Commission field offices filed 75,428 charges in the 12 months ended Sept. 30, down from 79,432, 81,293 and 84,442 in fiscal years 2004, 2003 and 2002, respectively. The average complaint took 171 days to process in fiscal 2005.

During 2005, 77,352 discrimination complaints were resolved, 21.5 percent with a favorable outcome for the individual who complained, up from 19.5 percent the previous two years.

The commission obtained $380 million in compensation for those who complained of discrimination, including a record $271.6 million through mediation and other means short of going to court.

The type of complaints remained relatively unchanged from previous years: Allegations of racial discrimination remained the largest group, 26,740 charges accounting for 35.5 percent of all filings.

Sex discrimination accounted for 23,094 charges or 30.6 percent of all complaints; retaliation, 22,278 or 29.5 percent; age, 16,585 or 22 percent; disability, 14,893 or 19.7 percent; national origin, 8,035 or 10.7 percent; religion, 2,340 or 3.1 percent and equal pay, 970 or 1.3 percent. The total exceeds 100 percent because individuals may allege more than one kind of discrimination in a complaint.

In addition, there were 12,679 complaints of sexual harassment, 14 percent filed by men, and 4,449 pregnancy discrimination complaints.

EEOC enforces federal antidiscrimination laws among private employers. The Justice Department enforces those laws among government workers.

Katrina Disaster Seen As Chance To Fix New Orleans Bureaucracy (AP)

By DOUG SIMPSON, The Associated Press

AP, February 9, 2006

BATON ROUGE, La. (AP) — Hurricane Katrina created a chance to slash the city bureaucracy in New Orleans, which has two elected sheriffs, two elected clerks of court and two separate court systems, a legislative panel voted on Thursday.

The city's population has plummeted since the storm, giving critics the chance to streamline a system, stemming from the 19th century, which gives the city numerous elected positions long seen as redundant. Rep. Peppi Bruneau, a key supporter, urged colleagues to support the change, calling New Orleans' bureaucracy outmoded, time-consuming, antiquated and out of step with the rest of the country.

"It's time to join the rest of the United States of America," said Bruneau, R-New Orleans.

Without objection, a House judicial committee approved a bill that would combine the city's clerks and sheriffs offices, plus consolidate the city civil and criminal court systems. The bill, backed by Gov. Kathleen Blanco and sponsored by House Speaker Joe Salter, D-Florien, now moves to the House floor for debate.

Separate legislation is aimed at consolidating New Orleans' seven elected property tax assessors into one elected assessor post. That measure awaits debate in the House Ways and Means Committee.

Passage of Salter's bill came after Rep. Cedric Richmond, D-New Orleans, head of the Legislative Black Caucus, said race is one reason the state is moving to slash the number of the city's elected officials, most of whom are black. Many of New Orleans black residents remain displaced — living in other states because of hurricane damage — and Richmond questioned why lawmakers and Gov. Kathleen Blanco were pushing the consolidation now, while black voters are elsewhere, unable to voice concerns about the proposed changes.

Race, Richmond said, "is the elephant that's been in this room the whole time. It may be uncomfortable, but let's address it."

DOJ_NMG_0014104

Salter later said: "I can assure you that my bringing the bill was not predicated on race."

Richmond noted that the U.S. Justice Department would need to approve the changes, because Louisiana remains restricted under the Voting Rights Act of 1965, imposed on states with ahistory of election discrimination against blacks.

The court consolidation plans also face opposition from the New Orleans Bar Association, judges and other court officials in New Orleans, who said their courts are still reeling from Katrina's flooding and need to worry first about getting the city's judicial system back in order.

State Supreme Court Justice Bernette Johnson, a former civil district judge in the city, called the bill "half-baked." She urged lawmakers to focus instead on passing measures to ensure that New Orleans levee system is better managed.

"This legislation ... is not going to help New Orleans right now," Johnson said. "This is a distraction."

The city's two sheriffs also oppose the measures: Criminal Sheriff Marlin Gusman, who runs the city jail, and Civil Sheriff Paul Valteau, whose office functions in support of the city's civil district court.

"Downsizing our office right now, when we have over 1,350 inmates ... just doesn't make sense to me," Gusman said.

The criminal sheriff has traditionally been one of the city's most powerful elected positions. The former sheriff, Charles Foti, was elected state attorney general in 2003.

Bruneau said the city already has a police chief, its top law-enforcement officer, and doesn't need an additional two sheriffs.

Richmond said he supported some form of consolidation but added the matter could wait until the regular session set for next month. That way, Richmond said, the Legislature could also deal with other proposed consolidation, including compressing the city's juvenile, municipal and city courts.

Rather than get it all done at once, Bruneau responded that he wanted to get the initial consolidation done during the current special session, then continue in the regular session.

"It's like eating a hamburger — you can eat it in a couple bites or you can shove the whole thing in your mouth at one time," he said.

Richmond tried to amend the measure to remove consolidation of sheriffs, but the committee voted it down with a 6-7 vote.

More Injuries As Race Riots Disrupt Jails In Los Angeles (NYT)

By Randal C. Archibold

The New York Times, February 10, 2006

LOS ANGELES, Feb. 9 — Five days of racial rioting have left one inmate dead and dozens injured at Los Angeles County jails as blacks and Latinos have taken their conflicts from the streets behind bars, the authorities said.

The latest occurred Thursday when 200 inmates at Pitchess Detention Center, a collection of jails in the northern fringes of the county where most of the violence has occurred, clashed briefly until deputies used tear gas to bring them under control. There were no reported injuries.

On Wednesday night, two dozen inmates were injured in a riot among 300 people that ended after teams of deputies fired rubber pellets. That riot, as well as those that took place Monday and Tuesday, was at the Pitchess center.

Since the worst of the rioting on Saturday, when a 43-year-old inmate was beaten to death, the sheriff's department has locked down all jails, suspending activities and privileges in the system — the nation's largest, with 21,000 inmates.

"We are convinced it is traced back to an age-old gang war in South Los Angeles," said Steve Whitmore, a spokesman for the Sheriff's Department. "It is a small core group of people, and most of the inmates don't want to fight."

Mr. Whitmore declined to elaborate on a motive for the violence, but members of the clergy and community advocates who met Thursday with inmates said they were told that a gang called the Mexican Mafia had ordered retaliation on black gang members who had apparently attacked Latino gang members in Los Angeles in a dispute involving drugs, turf or both.

In a move deployed only in emergencies, deputies have segregated black and Latino inmates and put "shot callers" from the gangs in separate cells, Mr. Whitmore said.

Sheriff Lee Baca has outlined a plan to move some of the most dangerous inmates next month to a more secure but underused jail in downtown Los Angeles.

Mayor Antonio R. Villaraigosa of Los Angeles said in an interview that the persistence of the clashes and their racial nature troubled him and that he would visit the jail complex in the next few days.

"I feel, as someone who has dedicated his life to trying to bridge communities and promote understanding between racial groups, we obviously all should be concerned about the level of violence and racial nature of the conflicts," he said.

Mr. Villaraigosa, who has no authority over the jails, said he would seek to cool tempers in his visit.

Racial violence has flared at the jails since the early 1980's, when hardening street gangs bloodied neighborhoods all over Los Angeles and carried their disputes into jails and prisons.

DOJ_NMG_0014105

But some observers said they believed the jail violence pointed to long-held but little-discussed black-Latino tensions that go beyond street gangs.

With substantial support from black voters, Mr. Villaraigosa last year became the city's first Latino mayor in more than 100 years.

But he took office after a spate of fights among black and Latino students at several schools in Southern California, including one in South Los Angeles that endured at least three such brawls.

"What you are seeing in the jails is symptomatic of a much deeper malaise," said Earl Ofari Hutchinson, a radio talk-show host who organizes the weekly Los Angeles Urban Policy Roundtable, a discussion group that recently addressed the conflict among blacks and Latinos.

"Blacks and Latinos have been clashing in schools, on the streets, in the workplace, in hospitals," Mr. Hutchinson said, noting the decline in the black population as the number of Latinos increases. "I don't necessarily mean physically clash, but struggling over turf as neighborhoods change and become predominantly Latino."

Discriminatory Online Ads Targeted In Craigslist Lawsuit (LAW/AP)

By Dave Carpenter, The Associated Press

AP, February 10, 2006

A federal lawsuit accuses the online site Craigslist of violating fair housing laws by publishing discriminatory classified ads, reviving the question of what legal boundaries, if any, should exist for postings on the Internet.

But legal experts say the lawsuit against Craigslist, a fast-growing online network of classified ads and forums, faces an uphill battle because of laws in place to protect online service providers.

The lawsuit, filed by a Chicago fair housing group in U.S. District Court on Feb. 3, contends that Craigslist's Chicago site distributed more than 100 ads that violated the federal Fair Housing Act by excluding prospective buyers or tenants on the basis of race, gender or religion.

Among the housing ads cited as objectionable by the Chicago Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights Under Law Inc. were ones that read "NO MINORITIES," "Requirements: Clean Godly Christian Male," and "Only Muslims apply."

While it remained unclear Thursday if the suit is the first of its kind, it signifies a burgeoning effort by housing watchdog groups to extend to the Internet the same legal restrictions facing those that publish print classifieds.

"Our goal is to have the Internet places like Craigslist treated no differently than newspapers and other media who have traditionally been posting real estate advertisements," said Stephen Libowsky, a counsel for the housing group. "All of the gains are going to get lost if the same rules don't apply."

The nonprofit group is an affiliate of the National Fair Housing Alliance. Its Louisiana affiliate, the Greater New Orleans Fair Housing Action Center, recently filed a similar complaint against the hurricane relief Web site Katrinahousing.org, alleging it found 68 discriminatory housing ads.

San Francisco-based Craigslist, founded in 1995 as a roundup of local events, now has listings in more than 20 countries and 150 cities and runs 8 million new classified ads a month. Its huge scope means the Chicago case will likely be watched closely by other online sites. EBay Inc. owns 25 percent of Craigslist.

A ruling against it "would have a chilling effect on the Internet and what it was intended to provide, and that is an open forum and free expression," said Melissa Klipp, a Florham Park, N.J.-based attorney who practices Internet law.

The lawsuit seeks, among other things, to require Craigslist to report to the government any individual seeking to post a discriminatory ad and to develop screening software to preclude discriminatory ads from being published on its Web site.

Craigslist, which has 19 employees, maintains that screening its almost-nonstop classified listings would be impossible. Jim Buckmaster, its chief executive officer, said Thursday that the system is automated and that users can flag postings. If enough do, it comes off automatically. The "NO MINORITIES" ad was removed within two hours, he said.

"We admit that one or two postings per 100,000 are discriminatory," Buckmaster said. "But we feel we're in the forefront of promoting fair housing for everyone."

The site last month added a yellow link on each housing ad warning that "Stating a discriminatory preference in a housing post is illegal." When clicked, users get information about the Fair Housing Act and guidance on how to write ads that comply.

Several Internet law experts said the suit seems likely to fail, citing a 1996 federal law that says an online service provider isn't considered a publisher or a speaker when it merely passes along information provided by someone else.

Jennifer Rothman, a law professor at Washington University in St. Louis, called it "a complete nonstarter" despite legitimate concerns about discrimination.

"Congress decided it was more important not to chill speech on the Internet and not to shut down these Internet providers," she said. "If you start holding them responsible, essentially you shut down the business."

DOJ_NMG_0014106

"From a moral standpoint, of course, people will expect that if you're going to run a site like that you ought to police it," said Houston-based attorney Jeff Diamant. "But all Craigslist is doing is running a forum for people to communicate."

Air Force Eases Rules On Religion (WP)

By Alan Cooperman

The Washington Post, February 10, 2006

The Air Force, under pressure from evangelical Christian groups and members of Congress, softened its guidelines on religious expression yesterday to emphasize that superior officers may discuss their faith with subordinates and that chaplains will not be required to offer nonsectarian prayers.

"This does affirm every airman's right, even the commanders' right, to free exercise of religion, and that means sharing your faith," said Maj. Gen. Charles C. Baldwin, the Air Force's chief of chaplains.

The guidelines were first issued in late August after allegations that evangelical Christian commanders, coaches and cadets at the Air Force Academy had pressured cadets of other faiths. The original wording sought to tamp down religious fervor and to foster tolerance throughout the Air Force. It discouraged public prayers at routine events and warned superior officers that personal expressions of faith could be misunderstood as official statements.

But evangelical groups, such as the Colorado-based Focus on the Family, saw the guidelines as overly restrictive. They launched a nationwide petition drive, sounded alarms on Christian radio stations, and deluged the White House and Air Force Secretary Michael W. Wynne's office with e-mails calling the guidelines an infringement of the Constitution's guarantees of free speech and free exercise of religion.

Seventy-two members of Congress also signed a letter to President Bush criticizing the guidelines and urging him to issue an executive order guaranteeing the right of military chaplains to pray "in Jesus' name" rather than being forced to offer nonsectarian prayers at public ceremonies.

The revised guidelines are considerably shorter than the original, filling one page instead of four. They place more emphasis on the Constitution's free exercise clause, which is mentioned four times, than on its prohibition on any government establishment of religion, which is mentioned twice.

The guidelines still warn superior officers to be "sensitive to the potential" that personal expressions of faith may appear to be official statements. But they say that, "subject to these sensitivities, superiors enjoy the same free exercise rights as all other airmen." They now add that there are no restrictions in situations "where it is reasonably clear that the discussions are personal, not official, and they can be reasonably free of the potential for, or appearance of, coercion."

Baldwin acknowledged in a telephone interview yesterday that the changes reflect the criticism from evangelicals.

"I think that my evangelical friends were concerned that we did limit, and somehow restrict, the chaplains' service, for example, because the guidance said chaplains should be 'as sensitive to those who do not welcome offerings of faith as they are generous in sharing their faith with those who do,' " Baldwin said.

The Rev. Ted Haggard, president of the National Association of Evangelicals and pastor of New Life Church, a congregation near the Air Force Academy, said the revised document restores the proper balance between the free exercise and establishment clauses.

"When I read it, I thought, if I were nonreligious, I would feel protected; if I were a minority religion, I would feel respected; and as a member of the majority religion, I feel the need to be respectful," Haggard said.

Rep. Walter B. Jones Jr. (R-N.C.), a principal author of the congressional letter, said he considers the revised guidelines an improvement but is not wholly satisfied.

He noted that the revisions include a sentence saying: "We will respect the rights of chaplains to adhere to the tenets of their religious faiths and they will not be required to participate in religious activities, including public prayer, inconsistent with their faiths."

But he said the guidelines still call for "nondenominational, inclusive prayer or a moment of silence" at military ceremonies. "There is some progress, but it does not go as far as it needs to go in making sure that Christian chaplains can pray in the name of Jesus and other chaplains can pray according to their faiths," Jones said.

Americans United for Separation of Church and State, a Washington-based group whose investigation of the Air Force Academy helped spark the controversy last year, said the revisions "focus heavily on protecting the rights of chaplains, while ignoring the rights of nonbelievers and minority faiths."

Michael L. "Mikey" Weinstein, an Albuquerque lawyer who is suing the Air Force over its policy on religion, questioned the sentence allowing commanders to share their faith when it is "reasonably clear" that they are speaking personally, not officially.

DOJ_NMG_0014107

"Reasonably clear from whose perspective, the superior's or the subordinate's?" asked Weinstein, a 1977 Air Force Academy graduate. "When a senior member of your chain of command wants to speak to you 'reasonably' about religion, saying 'Get out of my face, sir!' is not an option."

Police Kill Carjacker During Gun Battle In Venice (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 10, 2006

A chase and fierce gun battle between a shotgun-wielding carjacker and police ended early this morning when the suspect was cornered and shot dead in Venice.

Santa Monica police Chief James T. Butts said his officers acted "valorously."

"It took a great deal of courage," Butts said. "This person has manifested the intent to kill you, and these officers chased him. That's what you expect of police officers in a free society."

The incident began in Santa Monica about 5:00 a.m., when a motorist stopped to help what he thought was a driver with car trouble. Instead, the suspect jumped out of a vehicle, pointed a shotgun at the would-be good Samaritan, and commandeered the car. The motorist was not injured.

Butts said officers stopped the car at 7th and California streets, where a gun battle broke out. The man, who has not been identified, fled in the carjacked auto.

About a half-mile later, with police pursuing, the suspect crashed the car in the 1300 block of Electric Avenue in Venice. When he ignored commands to surrender and pointed a shotgun at police, officers opened fire, Butts said.

The suspect was declared dead at the scene. No officers were hurt, Butts said.

Four Presidents And A Funeral (WSJ)

By Peggy Noonan

The Wall Street Journal, February 10, 2006

Listen, I watched the funeral of Coretta Scott King for six hours Tuesday, from the pre-service commentary to the very last speech, and it was wonderful -- spirited and moving, rousing and respectful, pugnacious and loving. The old lions of the great American civil rights movement of the 20th century were there, and standing tall. The old lionesses, too. There was preaching and speechifying and at the end I thought: This is how democracy ought to be, ought to look every day -- full of the joy of argument, and marked by the moral certainty that here you can say what you think.

There was nothing prissy, nothing sissy about it. A former president, a softly gray-haired and chronically dyspeptic gentleman who seems to have judged the world to be just barely deserving of his presence, pointedly insulted a sitting president who was, in fact, sitting right behind him. The Clintons unveiled their 2008 campaign. A rhyming preacher, one of the old lions, a man of warmth and stature, freely used the occasion to verbally bop the sitting president on the head.

So what? This was the authentic sound of a vibrant democracy doing its thing. It was the exact opposite of the frightened and prissy attitude that if you draw a picture I don't like, I'll have to kill you.

It was: We do free speech here.

That funeral honored us, and the world could learn a lot from watching it. The U.S. government should send all six hours of it throughout the World Wide Web and to every country on earth, because it said more about who we are than any number of decorous U.N. speeches and formal diplomatic declarations. * * *

A moment for a distinction that must be made. Some have compared Mrs. King's funeral to the Paul Wellstone memorial. It was not like the Wellstone memorial, and you'd have to be as dim and false as Al Franken to say it was. The Wellstone memorial was marked not by joy but anger. It was at moments sour, even dark. There was famous booing.

The King funeral was nothing like this. It was gracious, full of applause and cheers and amens. It was loving even when it was political. It had spirit, not rage. That's part of why it was beautiful.

It was also beautiful because, as the first speaker, Bishop Eddie L. Long, senior pastor of the New Birth Missionary Baptist Church in Lithonia, Ga., said in almost his first words, "This is a worship. This is a celebration. This is a moment that we give to honor God."

It was a religious service in which no one was afraid to talk about God. "Praise the Lord," and "Lord, we lift your name on high" and "How we love to sing your praises" rang through the room. Scripture was quoted, stories told. Blacks in America are not afraid to love Jesus the way they want to love him, to use the language and symbols they want to use. I want to kiss their hands for this. I also happen to honor the fact that, by and large, older blacks at least have not given way to 20th-century stoicism in their style of mourning. The Kennedys, who had too much experience with funerals, set the stoic style 40 years ago, and while it was elegant and moving in its own way, it left an entire nation thinking it was in rather poor taste to cry aloud and sob.

DOJ_NMG_0014108

As for the speakers, no one has ever been or could be better than the Rev. Bernice King, who spoke of her mother's love, her mother's end, and the possible metaphorical meaning of the cancer that killed her.

The Rev. Joseph Lowery gave a beautiful poem about Martin being with Rosa in heaven and then finding out that Coretta was coming, and rushing to greet her at the pearly gates. Strike you as corny? Not me. It was beautiful because it was not only full of unselfconscious faith, it assumed unselfconscious faith on the part of the audience, and so was both an implicit compliment and a declaration of shared assumptions. The audience responded with amens and cheers. When he bopped the president over weapons of mass destruction, what seemed, on CNN, to be half the room stood and applauded.

When George Bush 41 followed him to the podium, he teased Mr. Lowery in a way that complimented his eloquence. People sometimes marvel at the grace of George H.W. Bush. He is a warm and gracious man, and he's old enough to appreciate the humor in everything. He's old enough to appreciate life. But it is also true that when you attack him or his son from the left he doesn't get mad because in his heart he kinda thinks you're right. Attack him from the right; you won't be overwhelmed by his bonhomie then.

President Bush was fine, his eloquence of the formal kind. He needs to find the place between High Rhetoric and off-the-cuff plainspeak. He always does one or the other. But there's a place in between, a place that's not fancy and not common, that would serve him well if he could find it.

Bill Clinton was, as always, the master. Say what you will, he is the only politician in America with the confidence to call Episcopalians "the frozen chosen" and know everyone will laugh and take no offense. Amid all the happy bombast he was the one who pointed at the casket and said, "There's a woman in there." He talked about Mrs. King in good strong plain terms. Yes, he caused a quarter-second of awkwardness when he said of the beautiful Coretta that even at age 75 she still had the goods, but in moments of exuberance we all forget our own history.

The real news was how the Clintons used the funeral to unveil how they will run in 2008: Together, side by side, with beautiful hairdos. I haven't seen them like this -- both standing at the podium -- since 1992, when they were new. In the years since, after the health-care failure and the Whitewater scandals, the West Wing attitude toward the president's wife was a quiet and respectful "Get that woman off the podium!" Not anymore. All is new again. Mrs. Clinton has clearly been working on her public speaking, and attempted to use her hands as her husband uses his, now in an emphasizing arc, now resting on her chest. But his are large, long and elegant, and hers are puffed and grasping.

Both Clintons spoke in the cadence and with the imagery of the Bible. Mrs. Clinton's first words, in which she referred to Mrs. King's brave decision to continue her husband's work after his murder, were steeped in religiosity. "As we are called, each of us must decide whether to answer that call by saying, 'Send me.'" She ended with, "The work of peace never ends. So we bid her earthly presence farewell. We wish her Godspeed on her homecoming. And we ask ourselves, 'Will we say, when the call comes, "Send me"?'"

Oh I think we will, Ms. Meanieface!

If you don't understand that Mrs. Clinton was rehearsing her 2008 announcement speech, then you are a child and must go home and have a nice cup of cocoa.

This is what is coming: I have had a blessed life. And like so many people I could choose, after all these years, a life of comfort. Watch it from the sidelines, tend to my own concerns, watch the garden grow. But our nation calls out. And if we are to be Americans we must meet the call. "Send me."

With Bill nodding beside her, his hands clasped prayerfully in front of him, nodding and working that jaw muscle he works when he wants you to notice, for just a second, how hard it is sometimes for him to contain his admiration.

God I love them. * * *

Apart from its beauty, dignity and fight, Mrs. King's funeral got me thinking about this: Did she know how much she was loved? It's hard for a person to know that. If only she could have gone to her own funeral, she would have known. I wonder if it wouldn't be good if somewhere along the way, just once in your life, you got to call your own funeral. Pick the church, the speakers, the music, sit in the pew, clap when they talk about how wonderful you were. Then afterwards have a long lunch and toast your memory. Then the next day you go to work as usual, but maybe in a different mood. I don't see why we don't do this. Is this a stupid thing to say? It's allowed. I've got free speech.

Ms. Noonan, a contributing editor of The Wall Street Journal and columnist for OpinionJournal.com1, is the author of "John Paul the Great: Remembering a Spiritual Father," (Penguin, 2005).

Voting Rights Under Siege (NYT)

The New York Times, February 10, 2006

American laws that strip convicted felons of the right to vote, barring nearly five million from the polls in the last election, are the most punitive and regressive laws of their kind in the democratic world. Several states have recently softened or eliminated the voting bans, and many others are considering laws that could eventually establish voting as a basic American right that should never be curtailed in a way that bars a whole class of people from the polls.

DOJ_NMG_0014109

This attitude is gaining traction even in the Deep South, which pioneered voting bans to disenfranchise black Americans in the late 19th and early 20th centuries. But the new trend toward fairness has somehow vaulted over Pennsylvania, where the Republican majority in the State House is pushing to pass one of the most odious felon-voting bans ever seen above the Mason-Dixon line.

Under current Pennsylvania law, people can vote once they leave prison. But a bill pending in the Legislature would disenfranchise those on parole or probation. The bill would go further and bar convicts from voting until the dates when their maximum sentences would expire — even if they had been fully released from the system much earlier.

Pennsylvania, a swing state that will hold some critical elections this fall, is being barraged by legislation, championed by Republican lawmakers, that would raise voting barriers, especially for groups that tend to be Democratic. One measure would institute one of the most restrictive voter-identification laws in the nation, in a state that currently requires only first-time voters to prove their identities. Pennsylvanians — who have been at the forefront of fairness in voting rights issues — should not allow partisanship to erase that legacy.

ANTITRUST:

Microsoft Rivals Gripe To U.S. About Its New Vista Software (WSJ)

By Kevin J. Delaney And Robert A. Guth

The Wall Street Journal, February 10, 2006

The Justice Department said it has received complaints about Microsoft Corp.'s coming Windows Vista operating system, focusing in part on concerns over the introductory "first-boot" screens displayed on new personal computers and other aspects of the software.

The government, in a status report on Microsoft's compliance with an antitrust settlement, said an unidentified company complained about the ability of PC makers to customize the initial process of booting up Vista. Some PC makers use those screens to offer broadband Internet access, antivirus and other PC-related services and software.

The Wall Street Journal Tuesday reported that Hewlett-Packard Co. has tussled with Microsoft over the screens. The PC maker in recent months briefed the Justice Department on those concerns, a person familiar with the matter said. An H-P spokesman declined to comment. The report said that in addition to the first-boot process, "several industry members" had expressed other unspecified concerns regarding Windows Vista, which Microsoft is expected to begin selling later this year. A Microsoft spokesman said it has worked closely with partners "to make sure Windows Vista provides flexibility...while remaining faithful to the goal of putting users first." (See related article.1)

The complaints were disclosed as part of a regular monitoring by the Justice Department of Microsoft's compliance with its 2001 antitrust settlement with the federal government. The status report noted that Microsoft's recent decision to license elements of its server software was a "constructive proposal" in addressing concerns of the plaintiffs in the antitrust settlement. A Justice Department spokeswoman declined to comment further.

Separately, executives at search company Google Inc. asserted in an interview that Microsoft is using its influence over the browser-software market to push its MSN Web-search service to the disadvantage of rivals. Google objects to how Microsoft handles a default search-engine setting in its Internet Explorer 7 Web-browser software, which Microsoft considers part of Vista. A Google spokesman declined to say whether the company had discussed its concerns with the Justice Department.

Google wants Microsoft to ask consumers directly which search service they want as a default when upgrading from older versions of Explorer -- a change Microsoft feels is intrusive. Explorer 7 features a built-in box linking to the user's default search engine, making ownership of that default setting more strategically important to the search companies. Google said Microsoft has put other roadblocks in the way of consumers' changing their default search setting away from MSN. "It's a way in which they're using their dominant position to favor their product," said Sundar Pichai, a Google group-product manager.

Microsoft has said it has listened to Google's requests and made changes to make it easier for consumers to choose other search engines.

RIM Unveils Plan To Keep US BlackBerrys Alive (REU)

By Susan Taylor

Reuters, February 9, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0014110

OTTAWA (Reuters) - Research In Motion <RIM.TO> <RIMM.O> unveiled a plan on Thursday that it says will let its BlackBerry e-mail device work even if it loses a patent fight, and said the workaround will prevent a shutdown of service in the United States.

In an announcement made as the clock ticked toward a February 24 court hearing on U.S. patent holding company NTP Inc.'s request for an injunction to halt U.S. BlackBerry service, RIM also said it was still willing to negotiate a deal.

NTP questioned why RIM simply didn't go ahead and make the software changes for the workaround and argued the BlackBerry maker was trying to bully it. One analyst described the announcement as part of a "high stakes poker game."

The Waterloo, Ontario-based technology company, whose addictive device has been dubbed the "CrackBerry" by many users, said it is willing to "generously compensate" NTP, but called NTP's offer to license disputed technology "untenable."

The legal battle is heating up ahead of a hearing that could be the final step before U.S. District Judge James Spencer decides whether to impose an injunction granting NTP's request -- potentially shutting off more than 3 million U.S. BlackBerry subscribers.

The U.S. Justice Department has argued against a shut-down, saying NTP has not submitted enough evidence to show government users could be exempted "without substantial hardship."

NTP sued RIM for patent infringement in 2002 and won an injunction in 2003 to shut down the U.S. service. That injunction was stayed pending appeals, and the court has issued several rulings since.

RIM shares have been up and down like a yo-yo as a result, adding or subtracting hundreds of millions in market value.

The stock added 97 cents, or 1.4 percent, to end at $69.62 on Nasdaq and were up C$1.07, or 1.4 percent, at C$79.72 on the Toronto Stock Exchange on Thursday.

"It's a very high-stakes poker match," Canaccord Adams analyst Peter Misek said. "I think what's going on here is that NTP was daring RIM to unveil the workaround to let them know whether or not they actually had one."

RIM said it has developed and tested workaround software for all BlackBerry handsets in the United States and will activate the changes if there is an injunction.

It said the workaround alters the way e-mail messages are delivered and queued, but "users will not see any changes in the way they use the BlackBerry device".

"RIM's workaround provides a contingency for our customers and partners and a counterbalance to NTP's threats," said RIM Co-Chief Executive Jim Balsillie. "This will hopefully lead to more reasonable negotiations, since NTP risks losing all future royalties if the workaround is implemented."

NTP co-founder Don Stout said the onus is on RIM to reveal its workaround more fully and then convince the court it does not infringe on any NTP patents.

"To tell the world they have a workaround without sharing what it is, to me suggests they're not comfortable with it," Stout said. "If they've got a workaround, go do it. I mean, quit screwing around with tantalizing the world."

He added: "They're just using the bully pulpit again."

RIM said a patent law and workaround expert believes its designs do not infringe on any of the NTP patent claims remaining in the lawsuit.

"The legal merits of the workaround will be challenged by NTP," American Technology Research analyst Rob Sanderson said in a note. "This could mean the legal battle continues for an extended period, perhaps years."

RIM said it has filed patent applications for its workaround and will soon begin shipping handsets with the software update in a dormant mode. It will make the free update available at www.blackberry.com/workaround at a later date for customers to download and install.

In a court filing last month, RIM said it stands to lose customers even after rolling out a workaround.

"It is reasonably certain that some of RIM's existing customers will opt for other providers ... rather than go through the trouble of installing the new software," it said.

(Additional reporting by Robert MacMillan in New York)

BlackBerry Maker RIM Develops Software 'Workaround' In Event Of Injunction (LAW/AP)

The Associated Press

AP, February 10, 2006

Research in Motion Ltd., the Canadian maker of the BlackBerry wireless e-mail device, said Thursday it has developed software "workaround" designs for its popular handsets in case a court bars the use of current software in a pending patent dispute.

Although there is currently no injunction in place in the patent litigation with NTP Inc., RIM said it developed the workaround software as a contingency to allow BlackBerry service to continue should the court declare an injunction.

RIM stressed it still believes it has "strong legal and factual arguments opposing an injunction." Jim Balsillie, RIM's chairman and co-chief executive, called the workaround software "a counterbalance" to the NTP lawsuit.

NTP has convinced a federal jury that its patents were infringed by RIM and is asking a federal judge in Richmond, Va., to turn off the network. The judge has indicated he could decide on NTP's request following a hearing scheduled for Feb. 24.

The lawsuit against RIM has drawn objections from the U.S. government and big corporate users who rely on BlackBerry e-mail service.

NTP has said such an injunction would not apply to government BlackBerry users, who may account for up to 200,000 of the company's 4.3 million customers, though RIM has questioned whether it would be possible to separate its service in such a way.

Despite the threat of a BlackBerry blackout, many analysts think an actual shutdown still is unlikely because putting RIM out of business would make it harder for NTP to collect a big settlement.

Union: Mittal Pledges To Honor Agreements (AP)

AP, February 10, 2006

German Industrial Union Says Mittal Steel Pledges to Honor Labor Agreements Made by Arcelor

FRANKFURT, Germany (AP) -- Germany's biggest industrial union said it received assurances Thursday from Mittal Steel Co. that if it acquires rival Arcelor SA, no labor agreements would be affected.

Meanwhile, U.S. antitrust regulators are looking at Mittal's hostile bid for Arcelor, Justice Department spokeswoman Gina Talamona confirmed Thursday.

Mittal Steel Europe Chief Executive Roeland Baan met with union deputy chairman Berthold Huber for several hours to address Mittal's euro18.6 billion (US$22.5 billion) bid for Luxembourg's Arcelor, IG Metall spokeswoman Ingrid Gier said.

Mittal employs approximately 1,600 workers in Germany, while Arcelor employs 14,000.

Gier said the German union considered the talks and Mittal's pledge a "first important step."

It was not the first trip Mittal executives have made to lobby for the unsolicited takeover.

The company's chairman and chief executive, Lakshmi Mittal, has visited Luxembourg, France, Spain and Belgium to explain his bid for Arcelor, which would merge the world's No. 1 and No. 2 steel makers.

The takeover, which would be the biggest steel deal ever, would have repercussions across Europe, but also in North America and Asia, where both companies have plants.

European critics of the deal -- especially in France -- are worried that it would mean job losses or less protection for Arcelor's 94,000 employees.

Mittal has insisted that no jobs would be cut and that Arcelor's existing labor agreements would be respected.

Realtors Ask Administration To Stop Bankers From Delving Into Real Estate (HILL)

By Elana Schor

The Hill, February 10, 2006

Congress and the Bush administration are again getting caught in the crossfire of a long-standing turf war between the National Association of Realtors, which bills itself as the nation's biggest trade association, and the banking industry over whether banks can engage in real-estate activities.

Federal regulators signed off late last year on several bids for real-estate development from large banking chains, alarming the Realtors and reinvigorating the group's push for a bill, co-sponsored by Reps. Ken Calvert (R-Calif.) and Paul Kanjorski (D-Pa.), prohibiting banks from "directly or indirectly" engaging in real-estate activities. Banking lobbyists dismiss the Realtors' claims that the regulators are gradually dismantling existing law.

"This issue is totally phony. Banks for a long time have been able to own their own real estate," said Ed Yingling, president of the American Bankers Association. "The Realtors would like to think it's something new, but it's not."

The Calvert-Kanjorski bill is hardly new to Capitol Hill, having snagged the support of a majority of the House in each of the past three Congresses. But banking lobbyists pushed back last year with a bill of their own that only needed two co-sponsors — House Financial Services Committee Chairman Mike Oxley (R-Ohio) and his ranking Democrat, Barney Frank (Mass.) — to make a splash.

With their bill stalled in both House and Senate committees, the Realtors now are aiming at the Bush administration in their vigorous lobbying efforts against banks involved in real estate. The group has promoted letters this month to new Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke, Treasury Secretary John Snow and leaders at the Office of the Comptroller of the Currency (OCC), which has jurisdiction over national banks, asking for a definitive exclusion of banks from the real-estate market.

DOJ_NMG_0014112

In a unique twist, the Realtors also have chosen to side publicly with bankers in the fight to prevent retail behemoth Wal-Mart from opening an industrial loan corporation to conduct banking activities. Just as the Realtors fear banks encroaching on their business, bankers want Congress to keep commercial corporations off their turf.

"We find it ironic that the banks are using our argument, that banks and commerce should not be mixed, to make arguments that Wal-Mart shouldn't have a bank," said Jerry Giovanello, the Realtors' senior vice president of government affairs.

Rep. Jim Leach (R-Iowa) introduced a bill in September that would block Wal-Mart's banking bid, and Leach picked up the endorsement of Alan Greenspan before he departed the Federal Reserve Board chairmanship last week. A Leach spokesman said the lawmaker has had no negotiations on the bill, whether with Oxley or others, so far this year.

The Realtors have similarly leveraged their congressional clout to block regulators from expanding banks' involvement in real estate. Sympathetic members have quietly inserted a rider into the past three Treasury Department appropriations bills preventing banks from fully entering the real-estate market.

Banking lobbyists are hardly won over by the Realtors' support of their work to clarify the industrial loan corporations.

"Congress has spoken that real-estate activities [that are] financial services are allowed and ought to be regulated," said Steve Bartlett, president of the Financial Services Roundtable. "The Realtors are just wrong."

Oxley has expressed an affinity for the bankers' view — that Congress definitively allowed regulators to draw the line between banking and real estate in 1999's Gramm-Leach-Bliley Act.

Oxley issued a statement after the recent OCC rulings, affirming the regulator's ability to allow banks limited powers in real-estate development.

"The actions that the OCC has taken in its authorization letters are reasonable, well within the law, and within precedent," Oxley said. "The letters do not constitute an expansion of national banks' authority to make the type of equity investments that breach the separation of banking and commerce."

But Giovanello stayed on offense, questioning Oxley and Frank's decision to request two Government Accountability Office (GAO) studies on transparency and competition in real estate while not asking for a similar inquiry into banking.

"We don't know why the House Financial Services Committee keeps asking the GAO to investigate real-estate competition when, over the past four or five years, banks have been consolidating. When are they going to ask for a similar study on banks?" Giovanello said.

In September, the week after the GAO reported to Oxley and Frank on their most recent real-estate-related inquiry, the Justice Department sued the Realtors, arguing that the group's online listings unfairly obstruct competitors' business.

Oxley's and Frank's offices did not return calls for further comment by press time.

Realtors can count Oxley's Senate counterpart, Banking Committee Chairman Richard Shelby (R-Ala.), as an ally; he is among seven co-sponsors of his chamber's counterpart to the Calvert-Kanjorski bill.

Federal Judge Dismisses Lawsuit Against Team, NFL (AP)

By Terry Kinney

AP, February 10, 2006

CINCINNATI - A judge dismissed Hamilton County's federal antitrust lawsuit against the Cincinnati Bengals and the National Football League on Thursday because the suit was not filed within the four-year statute of limitations.

U.S. District Judge S. Arthur Spiegel threw out the suit without getting to the merits of the county's argument that the Bengals misled taxpayers and officials by contending that they needed a new stadium to be profitable and might move if they didn't get one.

Hamilton County taxpayers approved a one-half-cent sales tax increase in 1996 to finance the $450 million Paul Brown Stadium. Commissioners signed a lease with the Bengals the following year.

The antitrust lawsuit was not filed until 2003, three years after the Bengals began using the stadium.

"To be sure, the lease that Hamilton County enjoys with the Bengals is highly favorable - perhaps egregiously so - to the Bengals," Spiegel wrote.

He said prior members of the board were aware of allegations that league and its teams wielded unlawful antitrust power to obtain favorable leases, but by not filing suit sooner the chance "was lost to the passage of time."

"We are pleased that Judge Spiegel took the time to thoroughly analyze the case and conclude that the facts were on our side," Bengals owner Mike Brown said in a statement released by the team.

Likewise, "We appreciate Judge Spiegel's careful consideration of the issues and believe that his opinion conclusively demonstrates that there was no basis for the county's claims," NFL spokesman Greg Aiello said.

Commissioner Pat DeWine urged the other two board members to let the matter drop. He said the county faces more important local issues, such as developing county property on Cincinnati's riverfront and building a new county jail.

DOJ_NMG_0014113

Commissioner Todd Portune said he favored discussing all options with attorneys, including an appeal, filing a lawsuit in state court or seeking to reopen negotiations with the Bengals.

It was Portune who originally sued against the Bengals as an individual taxpayer. When conflict-of-interest questions arose regarding his position as a commissioner, community activist Carrie Davis took his place as lead plaintiff.

Eventually, county commissioners took over the suit.

Portune said Thursday that the Bengals were largely to blame for the county facing a deficit of $191 million.

"There is no doubt that Hamilton County is in an upside-down financial position because of a lease agreement that is unconscionable, has terms that are onerous, has terms that have resulted in the county being in this upside down and burdensome financial position," Portune said.

In February 2004, Spiegel rejected the NFL's motion to dismiss the case, ruling that Davis could pursue her claims that the NFL violated federal antitrust provisions by using its monopoly to "extort" new stadiums and highly favorable lease terms.

In his ruling Thursday, Spiegel explained why he did not rule at that time that the statute of limitations had expired.

He said a new standard was applied when the county commission took over the suit, based not on what an outsider like Davis could know about negotiations but what commissioners knew or should have known.

Spiegel noted that county officials knew all along that the Bengals were profitable, although the lawsuit alleged that the statute of limitations started not in 1997 but in May 2001 when commissioners got a clearer image of profits based on information in a lawsuit between the league and Oakland Raiders owner Al Davis.

South Korean Trade Regulator Questions Intel Employees (AP)

AP, February 10, 2006

(02-09) 20:12 PST SEOUL, South Korea (AP) --

Investigators from South Korea's antitrust watchdog questioned some employees at Intel Corp.'s local subsidiary this week as part of an inquiry that began last year, a company spokesman said Friday.

The Korean Fair Trade Commission "made an unscheduled visit to our offices on Tuesday during normal business hours," said Chuck Mulloy, legal affairs spokesman for Intel in Santa Clara, California.

"This is part of an ongoing inquiry that we disclosed in June of 2005," Mulloy said, adding it was "not appropriate for us to talk about specifics." Mulloy said the visit to Intel Korea marked the first time regulators had arrived unannounced.

The Fair Trade Commission refused to comment.

Yonhap news agency quoted an unidentified FTC official as saying that the probe was focused on whether Intel abused its dominant position by pressuring computer makers to avoid using chips made by Intel rivals.

Intel, the world's largest chip maker, is facing numerous legal battles over how it maintains its leading position. Intel has repeatedly denied it has broken any laws.

Japan's Fair Trade Commission said last year that Intel violated fair trade laws — a ruling the company accepted without admitting wrongdoing.

S.Korea Says No Conclusion Yet On Intel Probe (REU)

By Rhee So-eui

Reuters, February 10, 2006

SEOUL, Feb 10 (Reuters) - South Korea's antitrust watchdog said on Friday it had not yet reached a conclusion on whether Intel Corp. broke regulations in marketing its computer chips after raiding the firm's Seoul office this week.

The Fair Trade Commission is also investigating Samsung Electronics Co. Ltd. and LG Electronics Inc. , which make PCs using Intel's microprocessors.

South Korea, which fined Microsoft Corp. for antitrust violations in December, began investigating Intel in the middle of last year, following similar probes launched by Japan and the European Union.

Intel, the world's largest chipmaker, confirmed on Thursday that FTC officials paid an unscheduled visit to the Seoul office.

The officials talked to Intel staff and took away some documents as part of an ongoing probe, a spokeswoman for Intel Korea said.

"It will take a while for us to reach a conclusion," FTC spokesman Kim Joo-hyok said by telephone.

If a company is found to have violated antitrust laws, the FTC can order it to correct business practices and can also impose fines.

Sometimes companies are asked to make public notices acknowledging anti-competitive practices.

The watchdog had received a complaint that Intel was using its dominant position in South Korea to increase microprocessor sales, Kim said. He declined to say who filed the complaint.

DOJ_NMG_0014114

Samsung and LG said FTC officials visited them earlier this week for preliminary investigation, but declined to comment further.

Intel is estimated to have more than 80 percent of the South Korean market for microprocessors, the central chips in personal computers. The country accounts for 6 to 7 percent of the global PC market, analysts said.

LEADING POSTION IN KOREA

Analysts said the FTC investigation was unlikely to trigger major changes to Intel's leading position in South Korea.

"There may be fines or orders on business practices, but it won't have an impact on Intel's business in the market," said Michael Min, an analyst at Korea Investment & Securities.

Min said smaller U.S. rival Advanced Micro Devices Inc. could still increase its market share in South Korea given its aggressive marketing recently.

AMD sued Intel in the United States in June, charging it with anti-competitive practices such as offering discounts to computer makers who agreed to curtail use of AMD chips.

"AMD continues to believe -- as specified in its private U.S. antitrust complaint filed on June 27, 2005 in U.S. federal court in Delaware -- that PC manufacturers worldwide are victims of Intel's monopoly power," AMD said in a statement.

The European Union has been investigating Intel's business practices since 2001, while Japan ordered Intel to eliminate discounts to PC makers in March, 2005.

In the Microsoft case, the U.S. software firm was fined $32 million in South Korea and ordered to separate its instant messaging service from its Windows software.

Shares in Samsung Electronics fell 1.45 percent to 681,000 won by 0440 GMT, versus the wider market's 0.22 percent fall, while LG Electronics feel 0.75 percent to 79,700 won.

Intel Says Employees Questioned By South Korean Regulators (BLOOM)

By Ian King

Bloomberg, February 10, 2006

Feb. 9 (Bloomberg) -- Intel Corp., the world's biggest computer chipmaker, said South Korean regulators questioned some of the company's employees as part of an investigation of its marketing and rebate programs.

Officers from the Korea Fair Trade Commission are following up on an investigation begun in June when the agency requested documents related to local marketing practices, Chuck Mulloy, a spokesman for Santa Clara, California-based Intel, said today.

``They paid a visit earlier this week and asked some questions consistent with previous inquiries," Mulloy said in an interview. ``We cooperated with them then and will continue to cooperate."

Intel is facing a U.S. antitrust lawsuit based on a complaint filed last June by rival Advanced Micro Devices Inc. European regulators investigating antitrust claims have also raided Intel offices, and Japan's Fair Trade Commission last year told the company to remove a clause from its contracts forcing PC makers to exclusively use its chips.

Shares of Intel rose 54 cents to $21.20 at 12:24 p.m. New York time in Nasdaq Stock Market composite trading. The shares had dropped 12 percent in the past 12 months before today.

Advanced Micro, based in Sunnyvale, California, is the world's second-largest maker of personal-computer chips.

South Korea's Antitrust Officials Continue Intel Probe (MERCN)

By Elise Ackerman

The San Jose Mercury News, February 10, 2006

An Intel spokesman confirmed that the South Korean trade officials paid an unscheduled visit to the company's Seoul office on Tuesday morning as part of an ongoing investigation into the tech giant's business practices.

Chuck Mulloy said Korean Fair Trade Commission investigators asked to meet with company officials and requested information. ``They have been asking for information and we have been providing information for many, many months," Mulloy said.

Intel first disclosed the Korean inquiry in a regulatory filing in August, stating that Korean antitrust regulators began looking into its marketing and rebate programs in June.

Also in June, rival chip maker Advanced Micro Devices sued in federal court alleging that Intel provided secret and discriminatory discounts.

Today, AMD said in a statement that the ``dawn raids are part of an investigation into Intel's business dealings with four Korean PC makers."

DOJ_NMG_0014115

The statement quoted Thomas M. McCoy, AMD executive vice president: ``The dawn raids in Korea make it abundantly clear that competition authorities worldwide are intensifying their investigative efforts into Intel's anti-competitive business practices because they have good reason to believe evidence of illegal monopoly abuse is there to be found."

Mulloy said the visit was conducted during normal business hours and that investigators ``did not come in with guns drawn."

``It is not unusual for a company as successful as Intel to come under scrutiny," Mulloy said. ``It is also not unusual for us to cooperate."

ENVIRONMENT:

Six People Accused Of Illegally Harvesting Leopard Sharks In California (FINDLAW/AP)

By Dan Goodin, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 10, 2006

(AP) - SAN FRANCISCO-A church pastor, four men in the aquarium industry and a commercial fisherman have been accused of illegally catching and selling hundreds of juvenile leopard sharks.

An indictment Wednesday charged the men with selling 465 leopard sharks that were too small to harvest to pet distributors throughout the United States, and in The Netherlands and the United Kingdom.

California leopard sharks, which can take 13 years to reach maturity and live as long as 30 years, are protected under a state law that prohibits the commercial catching of specimens under 36 inches (90 centimeters) long.

The leopard shark's gray body and black bars make it a "particularly attractive" species, said Christina Slager, a curator at the Monterey Bay Aquarium.

"In general sharks are struggling in the wild, and leopard sharks are no different," Slager said. "If these animals aren't allowed to reach an age or size where they can reproduce before they are removed from the environment, that has drastic implications for future generations."

The six defendants were arrested on Tuesday, when the indictment was unsealed. Two pleaded not guilty. The Associated Press was unable to reach the other four. They face maximum penalties of five years in prison, a $250,000 (â,¬210,000) fine and possible requirement to pay restitution for each count, according to the U.S. Attorney's office.

Seven of the 19 baby leopard sharks confiscated during the two-year investigation died, the U.S. Attorney's office said. Three are on exhibit at the Monterey Bay Aquarium, and nine were returned to the wild in 2004.

Bush Administration Moves To Sell National Forest Land (KRT)

By Seth Borenstein

Knight Ridder, February 10, 2006

WASHINGTON - The Bush administration will unveil a proposal Friday to sell up to 200,000 acres of national forest land in "isolated parcels" ranging from a quarter of an acre to 200 acres, much of it in California.

The sale is part of a National Forest Service plan to raise $800 million over the next five years to pay for rural schools in 41 states, offsetting shrinking revenues from sale of timber from national forests. The Bureau of Land Management also plans to sell federal lands to raise an estimated $182 million over five years.

Environmentalists charge that the short-term gain would be more than offset by the loss of public land. Congress would have to approve the land sales, but it has rejected similar recent proposals.

"I am outraged, and I don't think the public is going to stand for it for one minute," said Wilderness Society policy analyst Mike Anderson. "It's a scheme to raise money at the expense of the national forests, the wildlife, recreation and all the other values that Americans hold dear. It's the ultimate threat to the national forest."

Jerry Taylor of the Cato Institute, a libertarian think tank, said the proposed land sales make sense.

"Private property will end up in the possession of those who value it the most," Taylor said. "That is an iron law of economics."

Details about what plots of land would be put up for sale are expected to be revealed at a noon press conference by Undersecretary of Agriculture Mark Rey, a former timber industry lobbyist. The Forest Service owns 193 million acres of land and plans to sell about 175,000 to 200,000 acres, according to Forest Service spokeswoman Heidi Valetkevitch.

"They could be theoretically from every national forest," Valetkevitch said. "California has a lot on the list, I understand."

The lands in question aren't environmentally sensitive wilderness or protected scenic areas, Valetkevitch said. "It could be something that's in a neighborhood that people don't even know is forest land," she said.

DOJ_NMG_0014116

Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., attacked the plan as "crazy," saying: "Here the administration wants to pass more tax cuts for the rich, and to pay the bill, they want to sell off public land - our nation's natural heritage."

The Forest Service owns 20 percent of California, including much of the Sierra Nevada, Lake Tahoe, Big Sur and dense forests along the Oregon border. The Bureau of Land Management owns 15 percent of the Golden State.

Rural schools get 25 percent of federal forest timber sale proceeds, but those revenues have fallen, so the idea is to sell forest land to make up for that, Valetkevitch said.

Anderson of the Wilderness Society argued that money for rural schools could come from many sources and that the land sales are being proposed "so the budget deficit doesn't get worse." He noted that if forests are sold, future federal timber sales likely would yield even less money for rural schools.

The president's new fiscal 2007 federal budget calls for the bureau to raise $1 million in 2007 land sales, $28 million in 2008, $40 million in 2009, $42 million in 2010 and $71 million in 2011.

Dave Alberswerth, a Wilderness Society senior policy adviser, said that would be "way more than they have been selling in recent years." From 2000 to 2004, the bureau sold 13,160 acres for an average price of $320 an acre, he said. At that rate, the government would have to sell more than half a million acres to garner $182 million.

Oil Giants Fell Behind On Fees (NYT)

By Edmund L. Andrews And Simon Romero

The New York Times, February 10, 2006

WASHINGTON, Feb. 9 — More than three dozen energy companies fell nearly $500 million behind last year on royalty payments the federal government says they owed for oil and gas extracted from public territory, according to Interior Department documents released Thursday.

While most of that money was later turned over after the government demanded payment, almost $60 million remains in dispute.

The companies, which included major producers like Chevron, Shell and ConocoPhillips, had claimed lucrative government incentives for drilling in the Gulf of Mexico even though the incentives were not supposed to be available if market prices climbed above certain "threshold prices."

The Interior Department, in a report sent to lawmakers looking into the energy royalty program, identified 41 companies that incorrectly claimed about $493 million in "royalty relief" during 2004, when prices for both oil and gas climbed to records.

The Interior Department said that 38 of the 41 companies quickly paid $435 million in back royalties after it sent out warning letters in December, months after the money should have been paid.

But three companies — Kerr-McGee, Forest Oil and AGIP — continue to protest $58 million in additional payments.

Indeed, Kerr-McGee officials suggested on Thursday that they planned to challenge the government's legal authority to impose price thresholds in the first place.

"We pride ourselves on operating legally," said John Christiansen, a spokesman for Kerr-McGee, which is based in Oklahoma City. "Now the Interior Department is claiming it has the power to cancel royalty relief granted by Congress."

Mr. Christiansen said Kerr-McGee would fight the case if the government did not back down. "We'll take this issue to the federal court system if necessary," he said.

Royalty payments for oil and gas extracted from federal territory have drawn increased attention from Congress since The New York Times reported last month that payments had not climbed in line with the huge increase in market prices.

Last year, the government received about $5.15 billion in royalties on natural gas and about $3.5 billion in royalties on oil. While royalties have climbed sharply since 2003, they are still barely even with amounts collected in 2001, when market prices were much lower.

One apparent reason for the shortfall is that the government has had trouble auditing the flow of money.

Under the government's royalty relief program, companies that drill in deep waters off the Gulf of Mexico do not have to pay the standard royalty of 12 percent on large quantities of the oil or gas they produce.

But federal regulations also call for that special incentive to be suspended if market prices rise above certain threshold levels. Market prices for both oil and natural gas have been higher than those levels since the end of 2002.

Administration officials said Thursday that they sent out letters to 41 companies in December, almost a full year after the end of 2004, reminding the companies that they had not been entitled to the incentives and needed to pay up.

The list included many of the biggest producers in the Gulf of Mexico: Anadarko, Amerada Hess, British Petroleum, Chevron, ConocoPhillips, Kerr-McGee, Shell and more than two dozen others.

DOJ_NMG_0014117

But several major producers, like Exxon Mobil, the sixth-largest producer of natural gas in the Gulf of Mexico, were not on the list. Exxon officials said that their company stopped claiming royalty relief long ago, because market prices had exceeded the price thresholds.

Lawyers for some of the companies said that they should never have been included on the list released by the Interior Department, because the companies had actually paid the proper royalties or had not disputed the demand for additional royalties.

"We think it was inappropriate for Chevron and Unocal to have been included on the list," said Donald Campbell, a spokesman for Chevron, which acquired Unocal last year.

"Chevron's policy is to pay royalties when deepwater lease price thresholds are exceeded," Mr. Campbell said. "Based on our review to date, Chevron has consistently followed that policy and has paid royalties for the calendar years when lease price thresholds have been exceeded."

Mining Fines Among Smallest Laws Limit Size, Allow Reduction (USAT)

By Thomas Frank

USA Today, February 10, 2006

Coal companies pay some of the smallest fines of any industry for federal violations even as the nation tries to curb one of the deadliest periods in recent coal-mining history, a USA TODAY analysis found.

The federal government levied a larger fine — $550,000 — for the 2004 Super Bowl showing of Janet Jackson's breast than it did for the 2001 deaths of 13 Alabama miners in one of the deadliest mine disasters in a quarter-century. And the $435,000 fine against mine operator Jim Walter Resources was cut by a judge to $3,000.

USA TODAY's review of safety laws and corporate records found:

·Federal law limits fines to $60,000 for each violation of a mine health and safety standard. The Environmental Protection Agency, the Federal Communications Commission and the Securities and Exchange Commission can levy fines of $1 million or more for a single violation.

·Labor Department rules require mining fines to be cut by 30% if violations are quickly abated.

“That doesn't make any sense,” says Steve Webber, who oversaw mining penalties for the federal government from 1999 to 2003, when he retired. “You're rewarding (mine) operators for correcting conditions that should not have existed in the first place.”

The Bush administration has said that higher fines are not as effective as forcing companies to close unsafe areas until they are fixed.

Tim Biddle, an attorney for coal companies, said higher penalties won't improve safety. “I really don't think any responsible mine operator makes any decision about safety based on civil penalties,” he said.

·Mining fines are set by a complicated formula that often results in small penalties for negligence. A mine operator could be fined just a few hundred dollars for “high negligence” of worker safety.

The Occupational Safety and Health Administration, which inspects most workplaces, sets a $5,000 minimum fine on firms that knowingly endanger workers.

Mining fines have taken on added importance as federal and state officials investigate fatal accidents that have killed 19 miners this year. The Sago Mine disaster Jan. 2 in West Virginia accounted for 12 deaths.

West Virginia's federal lawmakers recently proposed setting a $10,000 minimum fine for mine-safety violations for “negligence or reckless disregard.”

Mining fines are particularly small compared with recent record profits in the coal industry. The 10 largest publicly held coal companies reported combined profits of $2.4 billion last year on $24 billion in sales.

“The price of coal has increased dramatically and the price of penalties has not,” Davitt McAteer, mine-safety chief in the Clinton administration, told a Senate panel recently. Increasing fines “needs to be done and it needs to be done immediately.”

Panel Backs U.S. Plan To Transport Nuclear Waste (WSJ)

By John J. Fialka

The Wall Street Journal, February 10, 2006

WASHINGTON -- A panel of scientists, engineers and other experts endorsed the Energy Department's plans to ship tens of thousands of tons of nuclear waste for disposal in Nevada, saying they pose "no fundamental technical barriers" and relatively low and manageable risks.

DOJ_NMG_0014118

A review by the panel, organized by the National Research Council, an arm of the National Academy of Sciences, was the first major outside study of the government's plans for waste removal, which will take two decades and involve transportation routes through or near many population centers.

The panel's report gives a boost to administration proposals to spur nuclear power by moving spent nuclear-power-plant fuel from 70 sites in 31 states and to minimize waste-storage needs by reprocessing some elements from spent fuel. The Yucca Mountain disposal site, located 90 miles from Las Vegas, would also receive high-level nuclear-weapons waste from four government sites.

The panel called for the federal government to give states and communities advance knowledge of the travel routes of the waste, which would be shipped primarily by rail. It also called for federal aid to help them train teams of firefighters and others to deal with accidents involving trains or trucks carrying waste.

While the experts found the risks of radiation and other health-related damage from accidents were "generally low," they also found that public acceptance of the shipments will be complicated by a "fear factor" that might be reduced if people understood, in general, how the waste would be moved and the nature of the risks involved.

Activists from antinuclear groups and the state of Nevada, which is opposed to burying the waste there, have claimed that the waste shipments could result in massive nuclear accidents -- claims the panel rejected. But it warned that governments had to be prepared to manage "increased anxiety" that could lower property values and reduce tourism along some routes.

Neal F. Lane, a physicist at Rice University, who was chairman of the panel, said experts on the 16-member panel agreed that the timing or exact routes of particular shipments should remain secret. The Energy Department estimates that there would be 9,600 rail shipments, most of them by dedicated and guarded waste-carrying trains, and 1,100 truck shipments. Overall, some 70,000 tons of radioactive waste may be dumped at Yucca Mountain, should the government complete development of the facility.

The possibility of hazards caused by collisions, derailments or other accidents, or theft by terrorists, the panel concluded, will be minimized by putting the spent fuel and other waste in specially designed steel and concrete canisters, some weighing as much as two tons, that are designed to withstand most fires and the shock of accidents.

When the waste will begin to move is still unknown because the U.S. Nuclear Regulatory Commission must first issue a license to Yucca Mountain, a process that could extend beyond 2010. The opening of the facility will be crucial to the plans of the nuclear-power industry, which is running out of temporary storage space and will need to show regulators that new power plants won't encounter waste-storage problems.

Frankensense (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 10, 2006

Frankenstein is finally dead, or at least his political imitators are. That good news comes from the World Trade Organization, which struck a blow for science over scare-mongers by ruling this week against Europe's attempt to ban genetically modified food.

The written decision in the case brought by Argentina, Canada and the U.S. against the European Union won't be released for months, but the press leaks give a good picture of the ruling. All one needs to know is that Friends of the Earth and Greenpeace are howling that an "undemocratic" body is trying to "force-feed markets with GMOs." Expanding consumer choice and free trade equals force-feeding? Sounds like the good guys won.

The EU can accurately say its review process for new GMOs, which is stricter and slower than that used in the U.S., wasn't struck down. However, the panel said a clear review process has to be in place, and one not based on junk science. That means no more moratoriums on approving new GMOs such as that imposed by Brussels from 1998 to 2003.

The absence of proper and timely regulatory approvals led to the complaint in the first place. So did the fact that at least six EU member states have ignored regulator decisions to approve some new genetically modified products. The WTO also rejected this practice. American and Canadian producers currently lose an estimated $500 million of business a year thanks to European barriers on GM foods.

The emphasis on using good science is especially welcome. GMOs are typically vilified with disinformation campaigns, nowhere more so than on the Continent. Agriterrorists such as France's José Bové destroy fields of GM crops ("Frankenfood" to the looters) to the cheers of radicals and much of the media. The propaganda has had its intended effect. Opinion polls show a majority of Europeans look askance at biotech products.

In reality, farmers have been genetically modifying crops for millennia through hybridization. Early cultivators favored the seeds of plants that were sturdiest and produced the largest yields. Gene splicing is no different, except that it is quicker and more versatile and offers permanent, reproducible crop varieties. Humans have consumed "new" GM foods for a decade now with no discernible ill effects.

DOJ_NMG_0014119

Of course, this dispute was never really about science and health. Politicians trip over themselves to oppose goods "unsafe" in the public imagination. But they also know that Europe's farmers will find it harder to compete in a world market full of cheaper, healthier GM products.

More sinister is the effect European GMO policies have on the world's poorest farmers. African countries receive preferential access to European farm markets and have been reluctant to introduce GM crops at home. The concern is cross-pollination because the EU has zero tolerance for GM traces in non-GM imports. As a result, gene-altered seed stocks that better resist disease and severe climate conditions -- which would provide more food and export income for the people who need them most -- remain out of reach in many developing countries.

Certain European leaders have already vowed to defy this week's ruling to "protect" their people. The Continent has no monopoly on protectionists. But the WTO has just exposed the sham science and populist politics behind the EU's biotech regime and made it harder to stop better farm products from making it to market. The world's poor will be the biggest beneficiaries.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Handprint Could Be Key To Church Fire Probe (CNN)

By Rusty Dornin

CNN.com, February 10, 2006

ALICEVILLE, Alabama (CNN) -- Investigators looking into the fires at nine Baptist churches in Alabama over the past week are hoping a handprint left on one church's front door may help catch a perpetrator.

The Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives would not indicate whether its agents were able to lift a readable fingerprint from the inside part of the front door at Dancy First Baptist Church, south of Aliceville in Pickens County.

Arsonists entered the church by kicking in a back door, then set a fire near the pulpit before trying to escape through the front door, authorities said. (Watch how the church blazes have become an ATF priority -- 2:04)

However, the front door had a dead-bolt lock, and the arsonists had to exit through the back door, where police said they found a footprint that might have come from someone kicking the door.

The fire consumed the pulpit, communion table and part of the ceiling. Churchgoers were allowed to take a look at the damaged church Thursday, and the Rev. Walter Hawkins said they hope to have it rebuilt by May.

"They are material things that can be replaced," Hawkins said. "The church is in our heart. That's what we live on." Hawkins added that he hopes the arsonists "have a repentance of heart."

"Forgive them, they know not what they do," a sign in front of the church reads.

Authorities have been investigating the fires to determine if they're connected and, if so, who is behind them.

Nine churches -- five with predominantly African-American congregations and four with predominantly white ones -- have been set ablaze in the past week in central and western Alabama. Nobody has been injured. (Map)

James Posey, a preacher at the fire-damaged Morning Star Baptist Church, speculated that the perpetrators could have been hatemongers, devil worshippers or thrill seekers.

"I would like to ask them: What did you get from this? Why did you do it?" Posey said.

N.G. Berrill, a forensic psychologist, said arsonists "love the power" and "the theater associated with fire."

Investigators are going "to look for any communications that might be left specifically, consciously or inadvertently at the scenes of the crime," Berrill said.

More than 100 ATF personnel, including special agents and forensic experts, are investigating the fires. A criminal and geographical profiler also has been called in. (Full story)

The ATF has said witnesses have reported seeing a dark-colored SUV near some of the fires. But it is not clear if the vehicle is linked to the blazes.

Fears And Precautions Spread After Alabama Church Fires (NYT)

By Rick Lyman

The New York Times, February 10, 2006

ASHBY, Ala., Feb. 9 — Larry Crocker leaned on his cane in the hard clay beside the ruins of Ashby Baptist Church, listening for the distant rumble of the truck that was to bring the mobile sanctuary that would be the church's temporary new home.

DOJ_NMG_0014120

"I just hope that I don't know whoever's doing this," Mr. Crocker, a member of a nearby congregation, said of the rash of church fires in the area . "I'd hate to think I'd know a person who could do something like this."

But as investigators sift the rubble after nine church fires across rural Alabama in the last week, all suspected arsons, the evidence they are finding and the pattern of the attacks suggest that those behind the arsons were either locals or, at the very least, frequent-enough visitors to cherry-pick the most vulnerable and remote churches and drive the region's coal-dark roads at night with brazen efficiency.

"Everybody's fairly nervous out there now," said Jim Parker, pastor of the Ashby church. "People are taking some sort of precaution at almost every church."

Five churches, including Ashby Baptist, were set on fire just before dawn last Friday in rural Bibb County, about an hour south of Birmingham. They were all Baptist churches, four with predominantly white congregations and one with a black congregation.

Then, early Tuesday, four more churches — all Baptist and, this time, all black congregations — were hit on a long stretch of country highways in more rural counties along Alabama's western edge.

Although investigators say they have reached no firm conclusions about who might be behind the arsons, they point to strong similarities between the two strings of attacks. In both cases, the churches tended to be the most secluded; indeed, in Bibb County, the arsonists passed by several churches beside the highway to seek out those tucked deep into the pine woods.

The doors of many of the churches were kicked down. And witnesses in both areas said they had seen a dark-colored S.U.V., perhaps a Nissan Pathfinder, near some of the blazes.

At Six Mile Baptist Church, which has not been damaged, church members have carved up the night, taking shifts to drive by their sanctuary. The same is happening at several other churches across central Alabama.

"Different ones of us are going out at random times, just to be sure everything is O.K.," said Jimmy Jones, a retired elementary school principal and a member of the Six Mile Baptist congregation, in Bibb County. "We've bought some new lights that we can leave on at the church at night."

David Hand, pastor of Old Union Baptist Church, which was damaged last week, said everyone was keeping an extra watchful eye.

"We're doing what we can," Mr. Hand said. "Our neighbors are watching out for us, and the sheriff has extra patrols. We have some dogs out at the nearby houses. Hopefully, they'll give us some warning if anyone comes back around."

At Antioch Baptist Church, about 15 miles from Ashby's charred sanctuary, H. L. Morrison sat in the front pew and watched a clean-up team from a company called Restoration Xpress wipe the soot from the sanctuary's white wood ceiling and assess the fire damage on the table before the pulpit.

"This church was full of smoke, but it didn't burn," Mr. Morrison, a member of the congregation, said.

Indeed, Antioch Baptist was lucky. Pleasant Sabine Baptist Church, around the corner on a dirt road, burned to its foundation.

But the effort to gut Antioch Baptist fizzled. A three-foot floral arrangement on the table in front of the pulpit was set ablaze, but the flames died before they could ignite the surrounding wood.

The heat from the fire cracked the glass top on the table into a star-shaped pattern, and there was a burn mark on the carpet in the shape of a teardrop. But neither the pulpit nor the small plastic models of churches just beside the fire were as much as scorched, and a plastic bucket of money for the poor still rested, untouched, on the floor beside the table.

"About eight dollars in there," Mr. Morrison said. "They weren't thieves, whoever they were."

After the attack, the pastor placed a new message on the board outside the church: "The Lord is my helper. I will not fear what man shall do unto me."

Jim Cavanaugh, a special agent with the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, said it was too early for investigators to know why only Baptist churches were singled out. It could simply be that so many of the churches in rural Alabama are Baptist.

One line of speculation is that people who hunt at night are responsible, because they are among the few familiar with navigating Alabama's country lanes in the dead of night.

"In the past, of course, when we had these kind of church burnings in Alabama, they seemed to be racially motivated," said Jerry Wilkins, director of the Bibb County Baptist Association. "At least here, that doesn't seem to be the case, which is something."

City Man Sentenced In Drug Fraud Case (BSUN)

By A Sun Reporter

The Baltimore Sun, February 10, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0014121

Hudson, co-defendant convicted in scheme to sell pill prescriptions

A 49-year-old Baltimore man was sentenced to 30 years in prison for distributing Oxycontin and engaging in health-care fraud, the U.S. attorney's office said today.

Oliver Clifton Hudson and his co-defendant, Gregory Wayne Banks, 53, of Severna Park, were convicted in federal court Nov. 7. Both claimed to not be subject to the jurisdiction of the court and were removed from the courtroom after they refused to participate in the trial, according to court documents. Hudson returned to the courtroom today when U.S. District Judge J. Frederick Motz handed down his sentence. Banks is scheduled to be sentenced tomorrow.

"Criminal defendants are entitled to raise any valid legal claims and required to treat the court with respect," U.S. Attorney Rod J. Rosenstein said in a statement. "Instead, Oliver Hudson and his co-defendants made frivolous claims that judges cannot control their 'flesh and blood.' Defendants do not benefit when they disrupt criminal proceedings."

According to evidence presented at their trial, Hudson and Banks fraudulently obtained Oxycontin and other oxycodone drugs from pharmacies in Baltimore City and Baltimore, Anne Arundel, Howard, Montgomery and Harford counties. The drugs were obtained using prescriptions created with computers and photocopiers, officials said.

The defendants sent "runners" to various pharmacies with the prescriptions and made themselves available by telephone -- posing as health clinic officials -- to answer questions from pharmacy employees seeking verification for the prescriptions, officials said.

Furthermore, the defendants fraudulently obtained health insurance cards by paying people to "rent" their insurance for the purchases, officials said. The pharmacies would then unwittingly charge health insurance companies for the cost of the fake prescriptions, leaving only a co-payment for the defendants to pay.

Once obtained, the oxycodone prescriptions were ultimately resold on the street. Officials said the defendants sold more than 41,000 oxycodone pills using this scheme.

News Briefs From San Diego County (AP)

The Associated Press, February 9, 2006

SAN DIEGO (AP) - City officials have launching an investigation into illegal activity by city employees after two workers from the Park and Recreation Department were arrested on suspicion of drug possession and sales.

The employees, who are brothers, were arrested Jan. 25 as part of a broader Drug Enforcement Administration Investigation, authorities said. They are accused of dealing marijuana out of a Park and Recreation vehicle and had been under surveillance.

Fred Sainz, spokesman for Mayor Jerry Sanders, said the mayor was very disturbed by the arrests and ordered the probe.

"We have started our own investigation to see if other city assets or offices are involved," Sainz said.

Girls Try Drugs, Alcohol At Higher Rates (WP/AP)

By Karen Matthews, Associated Press

The Washington Post, February 10, 2006

NEW YORK -- In a reversal of past trends, teenage girls are trying marijuana, alcohol and cigarettes at higher rates than boys, the White House drug czar said Thursday.

The findings from a new government analysis come even as teen drug use is declining overall.

The National Survey on Drug Use and Health, released by John Walters, the national drug policy director, indicates 1.5 million girls ages 12 to 17 started drinking alcohol in 2004, the most recent year for which data is available. That compares with 1.28 million boys.

Among the same age group, 730,000 girls started smoking cigarettes in 2004, compared with 565,000 boys, and 675,000 girls starting using marijuana, compared with 577,000 boys, the survey found.

The nationwide survey, based on interviews with 70,000 families, also found that girls surpassed boys in abusing prescription drugs. Of the youths surveyed in 2004, 14.4 percent of girls and 12.5 percent of boys reported misusing prescription drugs.

"This is the first time that we've recorded this kind of relationship between boys' and girls' drug use," said Walters. "In the past, boys have had higher rates of use _ and significantly higher rates of use at certain times in the past."

Overall illicit drug use among youths 12 to 17 has declined 19 percent since 2001, according to the survey.

"In order to drive it down further, we have to deal with today's substance abuse reality, and today's reality is, girls have been using at higher rates than boys in critical areas," Walters said.

Experts who joined Walters at a news conference in a Manhattan hotel said girls' use of drugs, alcohol and cigarettes is particularly alarming because girls are more vulnerable to their effects.

DOJ_NMG_0014122

"Boys and girls react to drugs differently," said Dr. Warren Seigel, past president of the New York State chapter of the American Academy of Pediatrics.

Seigel said research has shown that girls may become addicted to nicotine faster than boys and even moderate drinking can disrupt their growth and the development of their reproductive systems.

"It's imperative that parents understand that these differences exist, and understand the differences between girls and boys, because it requires some different parenting skills," he said.

Dr. Ralph Lopez, an associate professor at Cornell University's Weill Medical College and the author of "The Teen Health Book: A Parents' Guide to Adolescent Health and Well-Being," said teenage girls are at risk for drug and alcohol use because they feel pressure to succeed academically and also to look perfect.

"They have to be skinny and gorgeous," he said. "We don't do that to the boys."

Lopez said many parents are afraid to confront their children about drugs.

"I'm afraid that our parents have dropped the ball in many cases," he said. "I have a line in my practice that if you are popular with your kids, you're doing something wrong."

___

On the Net:

http://www.whitehousedrugpolicy.gov/

More Girls Than Boy Trying Drugs For First Time-US (REU)

Reuters, February 9, 2006

WASHINGTON (Reuters) - More girls than boys are becoming first-time users of alcohol, cigarettes and marijuana, reversing previous trends, the U.S. drug czar said in a report released on Thursday.

"Girls have become users at rates that exceed boys or equal boys now, which never used to be the case," John Walters, director of the White House Office of National Drug Control Policy, said in a telephone interview.

The report found 1.5 million U.S. girls 18 or under started using alcohol in 2004, compared with 1.2 million boys. It found that 730,000 girls started smoking cigarettes, compared with 565,000 boys, and 675,000 girls started using marijuana, compared with 577,000 boys.

The report was published on the Internet at http://www.mediacampaign.org/pdf/girls_and_drugs.pdf.

Walters said there were several reasons why girls might turn more to drugs and alcohol than boys.

"They are more likely to be influenced by peer pressure, even when they have been told and accepted that these behaviors are risky for them," Walters said.

"They are twice as likely to be victims of depression. They report that when they use, that they do that to improve their moods."

The report, based on government surveys, found that 1.6 million girls reported having at least one major depressive episode in 2004. "That's more than twice as many as boys," the report reads.

Walters said girls often used drugs and cigarettes to try to stay slim.

He said parents should talk to children before they were at risk of drug use.

"It is not going to be a stranger or some sinister person who offers it," Walters said. "It is going to be your best friend. We have to be sure to prepare them for how they are going to say no to their best friend."

Girls Matching Boys In Substance Abuse (WT)

By Cheryl Wetzstein

The Washington Times, February 10, 2006

Young men and women are abusing tobacco, alcohol and drugs at the same rate, according a report released yesterday that urged parents to get more involved in the lives of their teenage children.

"The gender gap has closed. Girls are smoking, drinking and using drugs equal to boys," said Susan Foster, vice president of the National Center on Addiction and Substance Abuse (CASA) at Columbia University and lead author of a new book on women and substance abuse.

CASA's book, released yesterday during an event on Capitol Hill, documents how women differ from men in their vulnerabilities to substance abuse. It also makes recommendations on how parents, policy-makers, educators and treatment professionals can improve their responses to substance abuse by girls and women.

A separate report released yesterday in New York City by the White House Office of National Drug Control Policy (ONDCP) and Seventeen magazine said teenage girls now match teenage boys in illicit drug and alcohol use, surpass them in cigarette and prescription drug use, and are more likely than boys to start using illicit substances.

DOJ_NMG_0014123

"Girls are telling us that they understand the risks associated with drugs, alcohol and cigarettes. But that doesn't appear to be stopping them from using," White House drug czar John P. Walters said yesterday.

Susan Molinari, chairwoman of the Century Council, an educational group funded by the distilled-spirits industry, said that, overall, underage drinking has dropped since 1992 among both girls and boys.

However, almost half of mothers think it's OK for their teen daughters to drink, the council found in a recent survey of nearly 900 mothers and daughters. Moreover, 30 percent of girls ages 16 to 18 said they drank with friends -- but only 9 percent of their mothers said they knew about it.

"These data illustrate a disturbing misperception among moms about the seriousness of problems associated with alcohol consumption by their teenage daughters," said Mrs. Molinari, whose group offers a program called "Girl Talk" to discourage underage drinking.

Parental disapproval of tobacco, alcohol and drugs is a strong influence on teens, as is parental monitoring of teens and their friends, said the ONDCP, which offers parents and community leaders a wealth of anti-drug materials.

At the Capitol Hill event, Joseph A. Califano Jr., CASA chairman and president, said he hoped the group's new book, "Women Under the Influence," will stimulate new public attitudes about women and substance abuse.

There is no doubt women can become addicted faster -- even with less exposure to substances -- and suffer the consequences more quickly, he said.

"If young women knew that, they might be quicker to say, 'No, I'm not going to have that second beer,' " said Rep. Nancy L. Johnson, Connecticut Republican.

Teen Girls Turn To Drugs, Cigarettes (UPI)

United Press International, February 10, 2006

WASHINGTON, Feb. 10 (UPI) -- The latest U.S. national survey on alcohol and drug use finds that teenage girls are more likely than boys to smoke and abuse prescription drugs.

They had already equaled boys in drinking and illegal drug abuse, The Washington Post reports.

The National Survey on Drug Use and Health has been conducted every year since 1971. The figures on teenage girls are based on the 2004 study, which interviewed 70,000 households.

Experts say that teenage girls are more likely than boys to use drugs and alcohol to escape from family problems and other pressures in their lives. They also may take up smoking to help keep their weight down.

More Girls Than Boys Turning To Drugs (ABC)

ABC News, February 9, 2006

Feb. 9, 2006 — For the past year, first lady Laura Bush has spearheaded an initiative to steer boys away from gangs, crime and drugs. She felt the program was needed because, she said, because we have "shifted our gaze away from boys for the last several decades." A White House report released today on drug use among youths suggests that we need to keep a closer eye on girls as well.

The report reveals that in 2004, the most recent year studied, 1.5 million girls started using alcohol — 173,000 more than the number of boys who started drinking.

During his State of the Union address, President Bush said that drug use among youth was down 19 percent since 2001. But this latest report has raised concerns about whether the message about the dangers of drugs, alcohol and smoking is reaching girls as well as it is boys.

"The reason we're pointing to this alarming trend is because if we're going to get girls to continue to decline in drug use effectively, we're going to have to deal with those causes, which are different," drug czar John Walters said.

As with alcohol use, first time tobacco and marijuana use was also higher among girls than boys. In 2004, 729,000 girls — 164,000 more than boys — started smoking cigarettes, and 675,000 girls — 98,000 more than boys — started using marijuana. Since 2002, more girls than boys have started using marijuana. The study found that for girls, marijuana was used more than cocaine, heroin, Ecstasy, and all other illicit drugs combined.

That's because girls are under a lot of stress because of their changing roles in society, said Dr. Keith Ablow, child psychologist and author. They are abusing drugs and alcohol to self-medicate.

"I think we're deluging young girls with certain expectations," he said. "They're watching dramas on television that ask them to have relationships where girls are deciding between two boys at such an early age. Fashion is designed for adults but in little sizes."

DOJ_NMG_0014124

"We're going to have to focus on the particular, unique circumstances we're faced with girls, which is different today than it's ever been before, which has obstacles we've not faced before, but obstacles we can overcome if we do the right thing," Walters said.

On the home front, Ablow said that parents should behave like detectives and assume there might be a problem, especially if a girl is exhibiting low self-esteem.

"We want to believe our families are perfect," he said. "That's understandable, but better would be to say, let's think what might be wrong. Let's make sure we don't get into denial and become very sensitive to what might be going on in the lives of our daughters."

Ablow, who has a 7-year-old daughter, said to pay attention if a girl's grades began to slip or if she lost interest in activities that she once enjoyed.

"Drug use and abuse is a symptom, almost always — I'd say always — of an underlying, other deeper problem," he said. "In this case, we're looking at depression, attention-deficit problems, potentially eating disorders."

US Girls Match Boys In Alcohol, Drugs, Cigarette Use (AFP)

AFP, February 9, 2006

WASHINGTON (AFP) - American girls are puffing more cigarettes and popping more prescription pills than boys, and using as much alcohol and illicit drugs, the White House drugs control czar said.

The warning was based on an analysis of recent studies which showed girls typically use drugs and alcohol to boost dented self-esteem and self-confidence, as they face the hard choices and questions of early adolescence.

"The trends of substance use among our adolescent girls are alarming," said John Walters, director of the White House office of National Drug Control Policy.

Though overall drug use among youths in the United States had dipped in recent years, statistics for girls were causing concern, he said, and debunked conventional wisdom that boys were more at risk from illegal drugs.

"Girls are telling us that they understand the risks associated with drugs, alcohol and cigarettes," Walters said in a statement, issued in New York.

"But that doesn't appear to be stopping them from using (them)," Walters said, urging parents to talk to their daughters about the importance of staying drugs-free.

Atoosa Rubenstein, editor in chief of Seventeen magazine, which cooperated with the White House initiative, said young girls were becoming more independent and starting to make decisions about their future."

"Combine this new responsibility with all the stress and pressures in their lives and the result, unfortunately, can be substance abuse," she said.

Girls Equal, Exceed Boys In Substance Abuse (LIVESCI)

By Corey Binns

LiveScience.com, February 9, 2006

Adolescent girls abuse drugs and alcohol just as much if not more than boys, a new study indicates.

Contrary to popular belief, more girls are new substance abusers. In 2004, 1.5 million girls started using alcohol, 730,000 girls started smoking, and 675,000 started using marijuana, according to the 2004 National Survey on Drug Use and Health.

The Office of National Drug Control Policy (ONDCP) reported the findings today.

"Over the last few years, we have seen overall drug use decrease among teens—boys and girls. But the trends of substance use among our adolescent girls are alarming," said ONDCP Director John P. Walters.

Conversely, a 2003 Centers for Disease Control survey of high school students found male students more likely to report methamphetamine use than their female classmates.

Marijuana is the drug of choice for girls; they prefer it over cocaine, heroin, Ecstasy, and all other illicit drugs combined, according to ONDCP.

Girls smoke cigarettes and abuse prescription drugs more than boys. And since 2003, girls have caught up with boys in abuse of illicit drugs and alcohol.

Girls abuse for different reasons that boys. Drug and alcohol use has a more profound impact on teen girls, both physically and psychologically.

They tend to use substances to help their mood, boost their confidence, and cope with problems. Yet smoking marijuana can increase the risk of depression by five times in teen girls, and double the risk of depression for teens of both genders, research shows.

A desire to lose weight also contributes to drug abuse; girls pop diet pills four times more than boys.

DOJ_NMG_0014125

Substance abuse can lead to physical, mental, and social consequences for girls, especially when their bodies and brains are still developing.

"Girls are telling us that they understand the risks associated with drugs, alcohol, and cigarettes," Walters said. "But that doesn't appear to be stopping them from using."

Drug Use Often Masks Self-worth Issues (MINNST)

By Jenna Ross

Minneapolis Star Tribune, February 10, 2006

Andrea Raines downed Ecstasy and alcohol, did methamphetamine and morphine, smoked marijuana and snorted cocaine

But that wasn't enough, she said. Throughout three years of chemical abuse, she would make herself throw up.

Raines, now 16, was like many adolescent girls who use drugs. She was insecure. "I didn't like my body," Raines said. "I wanted to be skinnier. I wanted to be like the women you see on TV."

A report by the White House Office of National Drug Control Policy released Thursday notes that young females across the country tend to use alcohol or drugs to lose weight, improve their mood, increase their confidence, cope with problems and lose their inhibitions.

The report also said more girls than boys are starting to drink and smoke cigarettes and marijuana.

And, according to the report, the girls who drink alcohol or take drugs are more likely to have sex.

Raines' drug use began with marijuana at age 12. When she started hanging with a group of older guys, she began using harder drugs. By the time she was 14, she had lost weight, close friends and her virginity.

Now, Raines lives at Minnesota Teen Challenge in Minneapolis, where she attends therapy and goes to school with 12 high school girls with similar histories. It's the fourth drug treatment she's tried in less than a year and a half.

This time, it's working. She has regained her "self-worth," put on 48 pounds and hopes to graduate from high school a year early.

Raines, who grew up in Coon Rapids, has a great deal of advice she would give young girls getting high. She'd tell them to listen to their parents and carefully consider their friends. Then she'd tell them this:

"Don't try to be so much like the world," she said. "The world is evil."

Lund Pleads Case For Olympic Eligibility (AP-Y2)

By Tom Withers, AP Sports Writer

AP2, February 10, 2006

U.S. skeleton racer Zach Lund's hopes of competing in the Olympics now rest in the hands of a special arbitration court.

The Court of Arbitration for Sport is expected to rule Friday on whether Lund should be allowed to race in the Turin Games after testing positive for finasteride — an ingredient in a hair-restoration product that also can be used as a steroid-masking agent. Lund insists he tested positive because he was taking an baldness-fighting drug.

Lund spent more than three hours Thursday at a hearing with the CAS. The men's skeleton competition scheduled to begin next week.

Lund was publicly warned but not suspended by the U.S. Anti-Doping Agency on Jan. 23 after the positive test. But last week, the World Anti-Doping Agency filed an appeal with the CAS over Lund's Olympic eligibility.

The World Anti-Doping Code recommends a two-year suspension for a first serious doping violation, and it has the right to appeal any decision it feels to be too lenient or incorrect.

Lund attended Thursday's hearing at a Turin hotel with his attorney, Howard Jacobs, who declined to comment to The Associated Press afterward. WADA participated in the hearing via a conference call.

Lund, 26, was the overall World Cup leader before he was sanctioned, a ruling that compounded other pre-Olympic problems for the U.S. Bobsled and Skeleton Federation.

At the time, the USBSF was dealing with accusations of sexual harassment against U.S. coach Tim Nardiello, who was suspended, reinstated and ultimately fired after ignoring orders to stay away from the American team during its final Olympic preparations.

Finasteride has been on the banned list since 2005. Two athletes, Argentine tennis player Mariano Hood and German soccer player Nemanja Vucicevic, were banned for taking the same drug last year.

On Thursday, the Montreal Canadiens said goalie Jose Theodore tested positive for a banned substance in pre-Olympic screening because he was using a hair-growth drug that can be used as a masking agent.

DOJ_NMG_0014126

Theodore was not picked for Canada's Olympic team, but was on the preliminary 81-player eligibility list. No punishment was handed down because he is appealing the result to an arbitrator.

Duke Strengthens Drug - Testing Policies (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, February 9, 2006

DURHAM, N.C. (AP) -- Student athletes at Duke who test positive for steroids will have to sit out of competition for a year, while a second offense will result in lost eligibility, the school announced Thursday.

The changes come after allegations last spring of steroid use by former baseball players. Bill Hillier, who compiled a 121-214 record in six years, resigned as coach a month after two former Duke players told the university newspaper that used steroids while playing for the school.

Those players and others have said Hillier suggested that they use steroids. Hillier has denied the allegations.

The new policy goes into place immediately. Evidence of blood doping or masking agents and refusal to take or attempts to manipulate a test are treated as positive tests, the school said.

The new rules also call for treatment and counseling for athletes who test positive for illegal drugs or any other substance banned by the NCAA. Athletes who flunk a second test for such drugs would be suspended for at least half of a season, while a third offense would result in a permanent ban from competition.

The previous policy did not distinguish between steroids and other drugs, said James E. Coleman Jr., a Duke law professor who headed the committee that recommended the changes.

The policy also allows for unannounced drug testing for players in all of Duke's 26 varsity programs.

Duke Tightens Athletes' Drug Rules (DURHS)

By BRYAN STRICKLAND, The Herald-Sun

Durham (NC) Herald Sun, February 10, 2006

DURHAM -- Duke University's athletics program became the latest to crack down on the use of performance-enhancing drugs Thursday, less than a year after allegations surfaced regarding steroid use in the baseball program.

The school's new drug policy differentiates between performance-enhancing drugs and other substances banned by the NCAA -- so-called "street drugs" -- by imposing harsher penalties for student-athletes who test positive for steroids and the like.

The previous policy treated all banned substances the same, calling for counseling, treatment and further evaluation for a first offense, a suspension for at least half the season for a second offense and a permanent ban from competition for a third offense.

That remains the penalty schedule for street drugs. But performance-enhancing drugs now carry a minimum one-year ban for a first offense and a permanent ban for a second offense.

"There's only one reason in the world to use steroids, and that's to gain an advantage and to cheat," said Brad Berndt, assistant director of athletics. "An educational institution should uphold all the ideals of what's best about integrity and honesty. There's no other reason to take a steroid other than to gain an advantage over your opponent. Besides, they're illegal."

Berndt, who has overseen the NCAA's drug-testing program on the Duke campus for the last eight years, was one of six members of a committee appointed last year by Duke President Richard Brodhead to review and rework the athletics department's drug policy.

Berndt said the committee sought comments from all of the school's head and assistant coaches and the Student-Athlete Advisory group during its research phase.

Berndt said a review was due but was surely sped up by the events of last April, when former Duke baseball players Aaron Kempster and Gavin Stanley told Duke's student newspaper, The Chronicle, that they had used steroids in the summer of 2002. They also claimed they did so at the suggestion of their coach, Bill Hillier.

Hillier turned in his resignation a month later at the end of the season, a decision that he and the school said came as a result of his 121-214 record over six seasons rather than the former players' claims.

"Honestly, we were ready to review our policy. We probably reviewed it a little bit faster than we would have had that not come up," Berndt said. "The two folks that went to the media were two folks that were disenchanted with the baseball program first of all, and used that as a vehicle to bring some bad publicity to the program.

"I think it was very, very isolated, and it was three or four years after the fact. I think if they had been really concerned, they would have come to us as administrators and would have said, 'Hey, we've got a problem,' and we would have dealt with it. And they would have done so earlier."

DOJ_NMG_0014127

Chris Kennedy, senior associate athletics director, also downplayed the claims. But he did say some good had come out of them, both in terms of the new policy and in terms of making sure coaches are delivering the anti-drug message loudly and clearly.

"The important conclusion that we came to out of that, by talking to bunches of past and current baseball players, is that as in every other team that we sponsor, coaches want people to get bigger and stronger because otherwise you're going to get beat," said Kennedy, who has been involved with the school's drug policy since its infancy in the early 1980s. "But there was none of this winking and, 'You know what to do,' stuff like that. If they interpreted it that way, they grossly misinterpret what was being said.

"What we want our coaches to say is, 'You need to get bigger and stronger; here's how you do it. We're going to fit you in with our nutritionist and she's going to talk to you about protein, and you'll get with the weight coach and work out a program for you. Do not take performance-enhancing drugs. Do not take steroids. Do not take supplements.' "

Steroids have been big news at the highest level of sports over the last year or so, as evidenced by congressional hearings involving commissioners from Major League Baseball, the NBA and the NHL last spring.

The changing landscape has led to changes at other area schools as well.

In October, UNC adopted a new policy with much stiffer penalties for "anabolic agents" than other drugs: termination for eligibility for a first positive test for steroids, versus at a minimum a probationary period for a first offense involving a street drug, followed by loss of half a season for a second offense and termination of eligibility for a third offense.

N.C. State updated its policy in July 2004, before steroids became such a hot-button issue. It doesn't differentiate between steroids and street drugs in terms of its minimum penalties.

Duke's policy falls somewhere in the middle.

"We want it to be a stiff penalty, but we're also in the business of education, so we want to make sure we educate the student and give them another chance," Berndt said. "It is pretty strong, and it's very consistent with the NCAA policy. That was one of the things that was kind of leading this committee all along: What does the NCAA do? Not only what's best for Duke, but what does the NCAA do?"

Like Duke's new policy, the NCAA suspends athletes for one year for a first offense of its steroid policy and for lifetime for a second offense.

But the NCAA's drug-testing procedures alone reach a tiny percentage of the total athletes. Berndt said the NCAA was on campus last Thursday to conduct the year-round phase of its drug testing, which typically involves one trip to each campus over the course of a school year to test 18 football players and eight athletes from one other team for performance-enhancing drugs only. The NCAA also randomly tests during its postseason tournaments for both street drugs and steroids.

"Our rule is, 'If we don't give it to you, don't put it in your body,' " Duke football coach Ted Roof said. "We believe that the only way to get an edge is to work hard. There are no shortcuts to success."

Berndt said Duke started its own testing about 10 years ago. The school was randomly testing 30 athletes on five or six occasions during the course of a school year in the past but is in the process of increasing that number to nine or 10 times a year. The increased testing will now include summer school and will reach more of the school's Olympic sports.

Duke has 26 teams. But Berndt said four have received much of the focus of testing in the past -- football, men's and women's basketball, and baseball. School officials hope that wider testing and stiffer penalties will keep their athletes on the straight and narrow.

"Obviously, we hope it will deter drug use, partly by giving our kids a reason to say, 'I can't do that,' " Kennedy said. "They're in the dorm at 2 a.m. on a Saturday or Sunday morning and everybody else is doing something and it's like, 'Oh, come on.'

"But the kid might say, 'Listen, I could be tested Tuesday. I can't do that.' "

Duke senior basketball player Shelden Williams, who said he had been tested a couple of times during his career and during his participation over the summer with USA Basketball, said the increased testing and penalties don't bother him.

"It's only annoying if you have something to hide," Williams said. "It's no problem for me. I don't have anything to hide. Being tested is I guess a walk in the park."

1:21 Pm | Duke Toughens Steroids Policy (CO)

By Ken Tysiac

The Charlotte Observer, February 10, 2006

Duke University has toughened its policy on steroids, mandating a one-year suspension for any athlete who tests positive for anabolic steroids, blood doping or masking agents, the school announced Thursday.

A second positive test will result in termination of athletics eligibility.

Duke's policy for athletes who test positive for street drugs or NCAA-banned substances other than steroids is basically unchanged. Those athletes will receive evaluation, treatment and counseling, with at least a half-season suspension for the second offense and a permanent ban for a third offense.

Steroids were treated the same as street drugs under Duke's previous policy. A committee commissioned by university president Richard Brodhead created the new policy.

Stories last year about alleged steroid use by former members of Duke's baseball team were one reason the university decided to review its policy, committee member Tallman Trask III said in a statement.

"While we fully checked out these allegations and were satisfied that this was not a widespread problem, we nonetheless felt it was important to take this pro-active step in strengthening our drug policy," said Trask, Duke's executive vice president. "We also felt Duke could, and should, take a leadership role in this area, and that it is in the best interest of our student-athletes' health and well-being that we do so."

The University of North Carolina strengthened its steroid policy in October, requiring permanent dismissal for athletes testing positive for anabolic steroids.

Duke's policy provides a second chance for steroid offenders.

"We are an educational institution," said Duke law professor James E. Coleman Jr., who chaired Duke's committee. "We felt it was appropriate to give a student who tested positive for a steroid a second chance to learn from and recover from the error, if possible."

-- Ken Tysiac: ktysiac@charlotteobserver.com

-- Read tomorrow's Charlotte Observer for more details on this developing story.

Feds Raid Moonshine Still (CLAYTRIB)

By Blake Spurney, Editor

Clayton (GA) Tribune, February 9, 2006

Federal agents from the U.S. Forest Service and the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms raided a moonshine still Feb. 2 off Muscadine Lane in eastern Rabun County.

The still, on Forest Service land in the Pool Creek community, had been under surveillance for nearly two months. No arrests have been made, though Rabun County sheriff's deputies and Georgia Department of Revenue agents helped execute warrants at three local residences.

Authorities released few details about the still's operation, including the names of potential suspects. The investigation is ongoing.

"Suffice it to say, the suspects have been under surveillance with our operation," said ATF spokesman Marc Jackson.

"It was estimated that up until our enforcement action on it, that this suspected still was suspected of producing 45-70 gallons per cycle," Jackson added. The still had yielded about seven cycles since Dec. 8.

The still was estimated to hold 750 gallons of mash. It was tucked away off Forest Service Road 517. Liquor was transported from the site in a 55-gallon barrel to another location where it was transferred to jars. Its operators had built a makeshift road through the woods, apparently on an old logging roadbed. The liquor was distilled through an old radiator.

Jackson said samples taken of the finished product detected "an enough amount of lead to cause a concern for public safety."

The Forest Service brought in a bulldozer Friday morning to finish cutting the still. Some parts of it had been dismantled the previous evening.

The ATF got involved in the investigation upon getting a referral from the Forest Service.

"That's what makes it unique was that it was found on Forest Service land," Jackson said.

State revenue agents merely assisted the federal investigation.

"It was a federal warrant executed on federal land," said Revenue Department spokesman Charles Willey, declining further comment.

Because the raid stemmed from a federal investigation, no suspect was immediately arrested. Jackson said no affidavits had been filed and that arrests typically came after a federal grand jury indictment.

U.S. Attorney's Office spokesman Pat Crosby said he could neither confirm nor deny an ongoing investigation. Therefore, it's likely no decision has been made as to whether the case will prosecuted in federal court.

A federal conviction for transporting, selling or manufacturing nontaxed liquor carries a possible sentence of up to five years in prison and a maximum fine of $10,000.

DOJ_NMG_0014129

The residences that were searched as part of the investigation are located on Pool Creek Road, Earl's Ford Road and Screamer Street. Two vehicles suspected of hauling liquor were seized, as was an unspecified quantity of liquor found at two of the residences.

A woman who answered the phone at the suspect's residence on Pool Creek Road said, "There's no comment."

Man Sentenced In Arson-for-hire Case (BUCKSCCT)

By HARRY YANOSHAK, Bucks County Courier Times

Bucks County (PA) Courier-Times, February 9, 2006

PHILADELPHIA - A New Jersey man was sentenced to five years in federal prison Wednesday for hiring two men to torch the Morrisville restaurant across the street from what used to be his pizzeria.

From his own family to the man whose deli-restaurant was damaged by Molotov cocktails, many in U.S. District Court posed the same question to Alessandro "Alex" Tramo: "What were you thinking?"

Tramo's answer: He wasn't.

The abuse of prescription drugs had clouded his judgment, he told U.S. District Court Judge Anita Brody, whose sentence of five years was the mandatory minimum.

"I forever regret having anything to do with this incident," he told the court as his wife, Lisa, sat in the audience and wiped away tears.

Tramo pleaded guilty to hiring the men to burn Ben's Deli and Restaurant on Dec. 2, 2000. The 3:45 a.m. fire was brought under control in about 20 minutes and seriously damaged the landmark cafeteria-style eatery.

An investigation by Morrisville and Bucks County fire marshals and the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms resulted in an indictment against Tramo, 34, of Bordentown; Bruce Armstrong, 35, of Trenton; and William Anderson, 39, of Morrisville.

Tramo, who then owned Anthony's 4 Pizza, hired the two to eliminate Ben's as a competitor, the investigators determined.

Armstrong and Anderson pleaded guilty and agreed to testify against Tramo. After that, Tramo pleaded guilty to arson and criminal conspiracy to commit arson.

Armstrong was sentenced to 40 months in federal prison. Anderson will be sentenced March 8.

The government said Tramo paid Anderson $3,000 to torch Ben's, and Anderson then gave Molotov cocktails and $2,000 to Armstrong.

The cocktail was a mixture of castor oil and nitromethane, a highly explosive liquid gas used to power remote-controlled model cars. The fuel was packed in glass root beer bottles.

After owners Joe Koebert and Nickolas Blasy rebuilt Ben's, Tramo tried to hire Armstrong in summer 2003 to again to torch the restaurant, according to the government case against him. Armstrong was cooperating with authorities at the time and his phone calls to Tramo were recorded, Assistant U.S. Attorney Robert E. Goldman said.

In court Wednesday, Tramo said he was upset that his poor decision-making skills cost him precious time with his wife and their girls, 3 and 6.

"Please don't keep me from my precious children," the defendant told the judge.

Brody, who acknowledged the support of Tramo's wife and other family members, said the minimum sentence was appropriate, given the seriousness of the crime.

Tramo's criminal history in Bucks County includes convictions for stalking and harassment, forgery and making terroristic threats. He was sentenced to county probation for those crimes, records showed.

"There's just no question about it," Brody said. "When you take all the factors into consideration, this sentence is very appropriate. You destroyed a business, you put firefighters' lives in jeopardy, and you even contemplated burning down this business a second time."

A dozen of Tramo's family members, including relatives who had flown in from Italy, attended the sentencing. His wife declined to comment. She asked the judge to send her husband to a federal prison nearby.

Defense lawyer Marc Neff said he was satisfied that Tramo received only the mandatory minimum sentence. "In a moment of lapsed judgment, he did something stupid," the lawyer said.

Called to testify, Koebert said that he had suspicions about Tramo early on, but he couldn't believe that he could do such a thing.

"What were you thinking?" Koebert asked.

After Tramo was led away, apologizing to his family in Italian, Koebert shook hands with Tramo's wife, mother and relatives.

"We were friends. We were friends," he told them.

Then he said, "Look at how he's devastated his family."

Cousin Ben Tramo said the family is hurting.

"Hopefully, when this is all over, we'll all try to put this behind us. He has a wife and two beautiful kids waiting for him," he said.

Referring to the question asked by Koebert, Ben Tramo said, "For the past months that's what we were all saying: 'What were you thinking?' "

Harry Yanoshak can be reached at 215-949-4203 or hyanoshak@phillyBurbs.com.

IMMIGRATION:

Border Violence Alarms Chertoff (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, February 10, 2006

Department of Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, concerned about rising border violence, said yesterday nearly $1 billion in next year's proposed $42.7 billion department budget will be used for new U.S. Border Patrol agents, upgraded electronic security measures, and more fences, roads, and detention beds.

"There has been an over-100 percent increase in the last fiscal year in border violence aimed at our Border Patrol agents, and that ranges from gunshots fired across the border to rocks being thrown, sometimes flaming rocks, and let me tell you, rockings are serious," Mr. Chertoff said at a press conference in Washington.

"We are not going to tolerate this kind of behavior ... if they think they're going to back us down or chase us away, the answer to that is no. Our Border Patrol is properly trained. They have rules of engagement. They are entitled to defend themselves. They will defend themselves. We will support them in applying these rules of engagement," he said.

Border Patrol Chief David V. Aguilar noted there had already been 192 assaults on his agents since the start of the new fiscal year in October.

Mr. Chertoff said much of the border violence has been the result of increased enforcement efforts by the U.S. government, but that the department was committed to securing the nation's borders as part of the strategy that "involves not only apprehensions at the border, but detention, removal and more vigorous work site enforcement."

The new budget calls for $458.9 million for 1,500 new Border Patrol agents, doubling the number of agents added to 3,000 since 2005. This represents a 42 percent increase in the agent work force since the September 11 attacks.

The budget also calls for:

·$100 million for technology that will enhance electronic surveillance and operational response capability along the border. Mr. Chertoff said the money will provide significant procurement investments needed to begin an aggressive deployment plan that began in fiscal 2005.

·$30 million to complete construction of the San Diego border infrastructure project that includes multiple fences and patrol roads to enable quick enforcement response.

·$410.2 million for an additional 6,700 detention bed spaces -- to eliminate an existing "catch and release" program in which apprehended illegal aliens are released because of a lack of bed space.

Mr. Chertoff said rising violence along the U.S.-Mexico border represented not only a threat to law-enforcement personnel but to everyone.

"This is dangerous to our country; it's dangerous to Mexico; it's dangerous to the human beings who are being smuggled into the country and then left to die in the desert, or subject to being victims of assaults by the coyotes [alien smugglers] themselves," he said.

"So, from a humanitarian and a national security standpoint, we have to have a very strong commitment to ending this activity by illegal trafficking organizations," he said.

Senator Calls Immigration A National-security Concern (WT)

By Robert Stacy Mccain

The Washington Times, February 10, 2006

Immigration should be treated as a national security issue, Sen. John Cornyn yesterday told a gathering of conservative activists.

"The federal government needs to obtain operational security of our borders," the Texas Republican said in a speech to the 33rd annual Conservative Political Action Conference (CPAC) at the Omni Shoreham Hotel in Washington.

DOJ_NMG_0014131

"We are proud to be a nation of immigrants ... but we are also a nation of laws," said Mr. Cornyn, warning that other nations, including Mexico, must "have respect for this country's laws and our nation's sovereignty."

He said human traffickers, drug smugglers and criminal gangs from Brazil, China and other countries are "using Mexico as a point of entry into the United States."

Mr. Cornyn, whose appearance capped a morning of speeches and panel discussions devoted to border issues, drew applause when he said he would push for a Senate bill to provide "a comprehensive solution" to U.S. immigration problems "that does not include amnesty."

Earlier CPAC discussions highlighted what Mark Krikorian of the Center for Immigration Studies called the "gap between elite and public opinion" on the issue.

"That divide ... really is what drives the debate," said Mr. Krikorian, who sparked laughter with his remarks on proposals by President Bush and others for an immigrant guest-worker program.

"It's the Nigerian e-mail scam of immigration. It's obviously false, but people keep falling for it over and over," Mr. Krikorian said, noting that in other countries with such programs, most "guest workers" become permanent residents.

Veteran conservative activist Phyllis Schlafly suggested that guest-worker proposals would create a separate caste for foreign laborers.

"We don't want a servant or serf or peasant class," the Eagle Forum president said.

Rep. J.D. Hayworth, Arizona Republican, opened one morning panel by emphasizing the issue of border enforcement.

"In the spirit of Ronald Reagan, who said his grand strategy for the Cold War was this, 'We win, they lose,' let me propose this simple notion ...: Let's enforce existing laws, and then move to close loopholes that exist that others game and take advantage of," Mr. Hayworth said. " 'Enforcement first' should be our call to action."

Colin A. Hanna, president of Let Freedom Ring, a public-policy organization that advocates enhanced border security, noted that the U.S.-Mexico border is one "between two allies," but said that "recently, the Mexican government has not acted like much of an ally in addressing illegal immigration."

CPAC attendees signaled their mood with loud cheers for Chris Simcox, president of the Minuteman Civil Defense Corps, a group that has made headlines with its civilian border vigils.

"I'm tired of hearing sheriffs from Texas ... begging and pleading for military support because they're outmanned and outgunned on the borders," said Mr. Simcox, who called the inflow of illegal aliens and drugs "terrorism that's affecting the lives of people who live along the border."

Temporary Manager Visas Used To Circumvent Limits (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, February 10, 2006

One of the country's temporary work visa programs, used particularly by foreign technology workers, is being abused by companies looking to get around protections for American workers, according to a new government report.

The L visa, which is intended for foreign companies who want to transfer managerial employees or workers with "specialized knowledge" temporarily to the United States, has been abused to get around limits on other types of visas, according to the Department of Homeland Security's inspector general.

Congress has capped the number of workers who can come under the H-1B visa category each year at 65,000, but has not placed limits on the L-1 visa, which applies to workers with specialized knowledge. Also, the L visa does not require that workers are paid the "prevailing wage" so that American workers are not displaced.

"Software companies appear to be using the L visa to get around H quotas," one consular post in Southeast Asia told investigators. State Department officials often are called upon to double-check information abroad.

L visas have proven attractive for technology companies -- and particularly firms that outsource labor to India. Nearly 50 percent of the petitions received under the "specialized knowledge" category in fiscal 2005 were for people born in India.

The inspector general found that it is difficult for adjudicators at U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services (USCIS) to determine what constitutes a manager, particularly because companies vary in size and organization. Adjudicators also have to rely on a company's claims about its own operations, a worker's status at the time of the petition and how a worker will be used in the United States.

In some cases, adjudicators said, applications were prepared by lawyers and "were either too vague, or conversely too technical, for the adjudicator to make appropriate decisions."

Sen. Charles E. Grassley, the Iowa Republican who inserted a provision into a bill to require the study, said it showed "extensive and well-known fraud and abuse in the L visa program."

DOJ_NMG_0014132

"When our own consular officers agree that there are problems with the L visa program, something has to be done," he said. "We can't have companies bypass the H-1B visas just to get around protections intended to help American workers."

The inspector general concluded that although the claims about displacing U.S. workers "may have merit," it is not a significant national trend.

Angelica Alfonso, a spokeswoman for USCIS, said the report is accurate in saying L-1 visas are difficult to adjudicate and have "the potential of being exploited to fraud and abuse."

"USCIS has provided additional guidance to minimize such vulnerabilities. In addition, in 2006, USCIS plans to conduct a benefit fraud assessment to determine the nature and extent of fraud in the L-1A non-immigrant classification," she said.

The L-1A category applies to managers and executives.

The inspector general called for USCIS to come up with new ways to make sure overseas checks are made and has given the agency 90 days to respond.

Bipolar Border Budgeting (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 10, 2006

THROWING MONEY AT A PROBLEM doesn't solve it. Knee-jerk reactions don't help, either. When it comes to illegal immigration, the Bush administration, apparently unable to decide which approach it prefers, has opted for both. But spending more on border enforcement will do little to curb illegal immigration and may even distract attention from better solutions to the problem.

In his State of the Union address, President Bush reaffirmed his call for immigration reform, noting a need for both stronger border enforcement and for "a rational, humane guest-worker program." In this week's budget proposal, however, the president lost his good sense and succumbed to hysteria, shifting emphasis to Border Patrol spending. Over the last 10 years, such spending has increased by many times, yet illegal immigration continues to climb.

A more sensible step would be a guest-worker program that makes temporary workers legal and reduces people smuggling, along with the risks and related crimes that go with it. In Bush's budget there is a small nod in this direction, with $247 million to support such a program. But most of the $22.2 billion allotted for border and transportation security, up 10% over last year, is directed at enforcement: hiring 1,500 Border Patrol agents, buying high-tech detection gadgets and expanding fences along our southern border.

The other disappointment in the president's budget is that he continued his annual practice of ignoring states' requests for reimbursement for jailing illegal immigrants. California will spend $662 million this year to imprison illegal immigrants convicted of crimes, but it will receive only $107 million from the federal government to help pay for it.

Meanwhile, federal immigration jails are so overcrowded that many suspects caught by border agents are released with nothing more than a promise to show up later in immigration court. Michael Chertoff, the secretary of Homeland Security, asserted at a news conference on Thursday that this practice would end. The "catch and release" program has been an embarrassment for years, as a shortage of bed space in detention centers allowed many immigrants to be released into the United States. If Chertoff gets his way, detention space will be expanded and "catch and return" will become watchwords as migrants are returned to their home countries.

There is no quick fix to the problem of illegal immigration. A massive migration from Central America into the United States, mostly in pursuit of better wages, will not be stemmed by increased spending on bigger fences or more officers.

Many politicians fall for the temptation of promising better enforcement. And Americans want their country to better police its borders. But the solution is to balance enforcement with better control and regulation of the flow of labor into the United States. Unless administration policies address the whole problem, it's not going to go away.

TAX:

KPMG Tax-Shelter Settlement May Be Revised Amid Opt-Outs (WSJ)

By Nathan Koppel

The Wall Street Journal, February 10, 2006

A federal judge postponed a proposed $225 million class-action settlement with accounting firm KPMG LLP and law firm Sidley Austin Brown & Wood LLP in a tax-shelter lawsuit.

The order, issued yesterday, came in response to a motion by KPMG in federal court in Newark, N.J., to revise the settlement because potential members opted out of the deal. The postponement was reported in the New York Times.

DOJ_NMG_0014133

"This settlement could be in jeopardy," said attorney Edmundo Ramirez, whose client was one of 284 potential members of the KPMG class. Mr. Ramirez said his client rejected the original settlement, considering it "a sweetheart deal for KPMG."

In an interview, attorney Melvyn Weiss, a partner at Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman LLP and the lead lawyer for the plaintiffs in the case, said the parties may reduce the original settlement amount, but he believed an accord could still be reached in about a month. Milberg Weiss filed the suit last year, claiming KPMG sold fraudulent tax shelters. KPMG has admitted wrongdoing and agreed to pay the U.S. $456 million in restitution.

As originally proposed, the settlement would have awarded $195 million to purchasers of allegedly fraudulent tax shelters sold by KPMG. Milberg Weiss and other class counsel stood to earn $30 million from the settlement. If the plaintiffs' recovery is reduced in a new settlement, the plaintiffs' lawyers would also earn less, Mr. Weiss said.

According to a previous court filing, 61 of the 284 potential class members opted out of the original settlement, a high rate of rejection. The opt-outs lowered the settlement's value to KPMG, according to lawyers, because the plaintiffs who rejected the settlement are now free to file individual suits against the accounting firm. Indeed, many of the plaintiffs have sued KPMG in state and federal courts across the country. "KPMG wants to lower the class settlement because of the high number of plaintiffs who have opted out," Mr. Ramirez said.

A KPMG spokesman said, "These continuing discussions are consistent with our goals for a fair settlement." An attorney representing Sidley Austin didn't return a call for comment.

High Court To Hear Challenge To Company Tax Breaks (NLJ)

By Marcia Coyle, The National Law Journal

National Law Journal, February 10, 2006

In North Carolina this spring, a state court will take up a constitutional challenge to $242 million in state tax breaks given by state officials to Dell Inc. to build a plant in Winston-Salem. In Minnesota, another suit is pending attacking the validity of two multimillion-dollar tax-incentive programs to attract and keep businesses in special zones in that state.

The North Carolina and Minnesota suits are among a number percolating around the country that have been inspired largely by a federal appellate decision in 2004 that struck down Ohio's investment tax credit -- a sacred tool of state economic competition.

The Ohio case, which involved a $280 million tax incentive plan for DaimlerChrysler Corp.'s expansion in that state, is now before the U.S. Supreme Court, which is scheduled to hear arguments on March 1. DaimlerChrysler Corp. v. Cuno, No. 04-1704; Wilkins v. Cuno, No. 04-1724.

The case has raised to a high profile a long-running debate over the constitutionality of state tax incentives under the so-called dormant or negative commerce clause, which prohibits states from acting in a way that interferes with interstate commerce, as well as a debate over the effectiveness of tax incentives as an economic-development tool.

Business and government officials predict "dire ramifications" if states lose the ability to offer these incentives and businesses lose the ability to use them.

They note that one study reported last year that more than 330 statutory income or franchise tax credits and incentives are offered by 46 states.

But of all the many state and local provisions designed to attract and encourage business development, the most common form of tax incentive in America is the investment tax credit, according to Walter Hellerstein of the University of Georgia School of Law, who is considered the leading academic authority on state and local taxation.

Since the Ohio credit's inception in 1995, corporations have used it in investing more than $30 billion in Ohio plants and equipment, according to the state. In 2002, more than 2,100 corporate taxpayers took Ohio ITC credits, totaling more than $73 million.

"The Constitution is not an economic suicide pact among the States," said Ohio State Solicitor Douglas R. Cole in his high court brief. "The Court should not turn it into one here."

BALKANIZATION?

But neither is the Constitution a facilitator of the economic balkanization of the states, said retired North Carolina Supreme Court Justice Robert F. Orr, head of the North Carolina Institute for Constitutional Law, which filed the Dell lawsuit.

"What we're seeing nationally is large corporations able to play one state off another," he said. "States, in desperate search for jobs, are forced to hand out huge tax breaks that shift the burden to small businesses and individuals and deprives local governments of revenue.

"This is the modern-day version of the trade wars that the framers put the commerce clause into the Constitution in the first place to prevent."

DOJ_NMG_0014134

What the two sides can agree on now is that uncertainty permeates the legal and business landscapes following the Ohio decision by the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals.

"There are a fair number of jurisdictions -- upwards of 40 -- that have similar incentive programs. Is this a precursor for further overturning?" asked Eli J. Dicker, chief tax counsel at Tax Executives Institute, a non-profit association of corporate and other business tax executives.

"If a businessperson is trying to plan where to build a factory, whether it be a vehicle or high-tech assembly line, with a lot of jobs in play, I would strongly suspect there is a hesitancy now, especially when the economics may be uncertain."

OHIO PRECURSOR?

The Ohio story began in the mid-1990s, when DaimlerChrysler decided to expand its capacity to build Jeeps. Faced with a choice of expanding an existing facility in Toledo or crossing the border into Michigan, the company approached Ohio officials about tax incentives to remain in Ohio.

One of the decisive incentives for DaimlerChrysler was the investment tax credit, which provides a one-time credit against Ohio's corporate franchise tax to any company that makes a qualifying investment in the state.

The suit challenging the tax incentives was brought by a Toledo resident, a small business owner whose property was taken, and some citizens of Michigan. They claimed that the incentive package discriminated against interstate commerce by "providing preferential treatment to in-state economic activity."

The 6th Circuit agreed, striking down the investment tax credit, but upholding a property tax exemption. On the investment tax credit, the court said that corporations would be treated unequally based on their investment decisions.

For example, a business paying Ohio taxes would receive a credit against those taxes in exchange for investing in Ohio, but a business paying Ohio taxes choosing to invest in Michigan would not.

The Supreme Court's jurisprudence in this area is "at best uncertain and at worst indecipherable to those of us who spend our life working in this area," said Georgia's Hellerstein.

From a practical perspective, Hellerstein said, "There's an overwhelming need" for clarification. "You have both taxpayers and states that really have no clue as to whether a particular tax incentive is going to be sustained," he said.

"One thing we know is that states are free to enact legislation that encourages economic development. Even in the course of striking down legislation that it has found violative of the commerce clause, the court has made clear states are not hamstrung in those efforts," Hellerstein said.

DRAWING THE LINE

But where is the line between what is discriminatory and what isn't, asked Chris Atkins, senior attorney with the Tax Foundation.

"We want the Court to say this type of investment credit is OK or draw a reasonable line saying, it's not OK but lowering tax rates or building new roads is OK," said Atkins.

"The 6th Circuit didn't draw that line. Saying the credit discriminated because it encouraged investment in Ohio is very broad. There's a whole range of spending policies that encourage investment in the state, from infrastructure improvements to building schools."

The Ohio case differs from prior high court challenges in this area. The Commerce Clause historically has been enforced by one business suing to take away a benefit given to another. But the Ohio case is brought by nonbusiness taxpayers, raising a potential standing problem on which the justices have ordered briefing, and which could prevent a ruling on the merits.

"The usual plaintiffs who typically would bring challenges are choosing not to because if they're being discriminated against by Ohio, they may be, by the same token, getting the benefit of the same provision in Alabama or Minnesota," said Peter Enrich of Northeastern University School of Law, who is counsel to the Ohio plaintiffs.

"The way these tax incentives have grown like topsy has created a situation where it's not in the interests of business taxpayers to bring these suits."

Although Enrich argues that his clients do have standing, his high court opponent, Theodore B. Olson of Los Angeles-based Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher, who is counsel to DaimlerChrysler, contends that their standing is "even weaker than usual" because they do not complain that the state has imposed a discriminatory tax on them, but that a credit against that tax -- which most of them do not pay -- "somehow reduces the state's overall tax receipts" to which they contribute. That is not the "concrete and particularized injury" that standing demands, according to Olson.

DIRE IMPACT?

If the high court gets beyond the standing issue and reaches the merits of the case, the impact of any decision, of course, will depend on how it is written.

DOJ_NMG_0014135

The U.S. Chamber of Commerce and other business groups contend that the 6th Circuit's approach would result in a loss of economic investment and activity to various foreign countries, as well as a decrease in investment by foreign manufacturers in the United States.

They also predict that there would be "significant financial statement impacts" on those companies that included the incentives in their calculations of profitability.

Philadelphia firm Blank Rome, in a tax bulletin on the Ohio decision, warned that "the magnitude of the credits that may be 'clawed back' or voided in the future could cause many publicly traded companies to restate their earnings."

Tax counsel Walter Nagel, of the Washington office of Boston's Sullivan & Worcester, predicted that the most likely impact of a decision against Ohio would be some action by Congress to overturn the Supreme Court ruling.

Ohio senators already have introduced bills to overturn the 6th Circuit ruling, he noted. However, he and others agreed, Congress appears to be waiting to see what the high court does.

But, Nagel asked, "What happens to everybody up until Congress overrides it? Then there's real potential for chaos in terms of who gets taxes back, which benefits go away. One ramification is that only the immediate taxpayer loses the benefit, but another ramification is everybody else -- taxpayers indirectly injured by paying higher taxes -- could well enjoy a modest reduction because it's a large base."

Nagel said that there is no consistent rule regarding what happens when a tax or economic incentive is found to be unconstitutional. A decade of litigation over the appropriate remedy, he said, has followed key Supreme Court decisions finding taxes unconstitutional.

States are infinitely creative in finding ways to attract business, said a number of tax scholars and practitioners, and will continue to be creative if Ohio loses in the high court.

Georgia's Hellerstein thinks Ohio will win, given the Court's current composition. But, he added, "One easy way for states to encourage business is simply to subsidize them. They can provide in-kind benefits in the form of subsidies."

The high court has indicated that subsidies from the general treasury do not create the same constitutional problems as using the state taxing power.

But the Tax Foundation's Atkins countered, "I think businesses might feel more comfortable keeping more of their own money taking that credit off their liability than essentially becoming beholden to the appropriations process. Some may see it as a bit more entanglement than they are willing to endure."

And direct cash subsidies could invite litigation, said Enrich. "The pressures on states to find ways to advantage in-state economic activity are immense. I think states would continue to look for new ways to do that. Some won't pose constitutional problems."

Regardless of what the high court decides, North Carolina's Orr said, his foundation is organizing a national, bipartisan coalition to generate debate about these tax policies.

"We now see more and more local companies threatening to move unless they get incentives to stay," said Orr. "We're not taking this lying down."

No Thanks (WSJ)

By John Harwood

The Wall Street Journal, February 10, 2006

TAX OVERHAUL'S DEMISE leaves unhappy Bush panel.

Former Sen. Mack, "disappointed" that presidential advisory group he headed isn't producing action, cautions the issue will become "more difficult" to push as president's term continues. Absence of tax overhaul in Bush's State of the Union address is seen as sign of Treasury Secretary Snow's lack of clout.

Some senior Republicans want to put off overhaul debates until Washington tackles baby-boom retirement, the subject of commission Bush has called for. The liberal Center for American Progress wants Democrats to step in, placing tax overhaul atop its "15 new ideas," with plan to cut employee payroll-tax contributions on earnings below $90,000.

Ex-Sen. Breaux, Mack's co-chair, got note from Snow but "no saying 'thank you' " from Bush for panel's work.

REPUBLICANS speak up to House leaders about election-year needs.

Format for this weekend's retreat in Maryland is "unstructured," says Ohio Rep. Pryce, who chairs Republican conference. Newly elected Majority Leader Boehner calls these "times of renewal."

House Democrats press Boehner to open legislative process while banning lobbyists' gifts. But House reform timetable slips, while McCain presses Senate effort to change spending "earmarks." Answering attacks on Santorum's lobbying ties, Senate Republican campaign committee hits challenger Casey's donations from a former Abramoff colleague.

CONTRACEPTION FIGHT spreads in the states.

DOJ_NMG_0014136

After FDA delays bid to sell "Plan B" pills without a prescription, backers of morning-after contraceptive push bills legalizing such distribution in Colorado, New Jersey, Kentucky and Illinois. It is already available without a prescription in eight states.

Maker Barr Pharmaceuticals Inc., which has seen Plan B prescriptions double to 1.2 million since 2003, quietly encourages the move.

Priscilla Smith of Center for Reproductive Rights says emergency contraception can "reduce abortions dramatically."

Social conservatives, saying such drugs starve new life, weigh bills to let pharmacists refuse to dispense them.

BERNANKE FACES pressure to answer deficit questions in next week's congressional testimony. "He ultimately will have to speak out on serious things that affect the economy," says Senate Banking Chairman Shelby. "If he doesn't, there will be a void." With Fed nominees Kroszner and Warsh headed for confirmation, open market committee should be back to full strength at March 27-28 meeting for first time in a year.

NGA CHAIR HUCKABEE hits Congress for trimming deficit "on the backs of the states" with proposals to increase state cost-sharing on Medicaid. Arkansas' Republican governor, a 2008 White House hopeful, says states instead need more flexibility to experiment with approaches to reining in Medicaid costs.

HOUSE DEMOCRATS CRITICIZE Bush budget proposal cutting Social Security survivors' benefits. "Continues the Bush administration's raid on the middle class," says Washington House candidate Darcy Burner, one of many challengers joining coordinated campaign offensive. Republicans leaders have signaled they won't pursue the proposal, which would cut $255 lump-sum death benefit for survivors.

MY VALENTINE? Veterans History Project sponsors a lecture at Library of Congress on "The American Soldier and 'Mademoiselle': Love and Marriage After WWI and WWII." With military-family breakups sharply up since 2000, nevadadivorce.net offers quick splits for $1,000 but cautions "7-day stay in Guam required."

CHANGES LOOM for Pentagon weapons purchasing.

New acquisition chief Ken Krieg wants war fighters in places like Iraq and Afghanistan to play bigger role in deciding what military needs. His goal is more rapidly identifying current needs in hopes of shortening lead time on development of new weapons systems, which now sometimes runs 20 years.

"We need to institutionalize the combatant commanders in the process," he says. Most big decisions on new hardware are currently dominated by service bureaucracies in the Pentagon.

National Guard Association unveils bust of "First Lt. George W. Bush" before president's speech yesterday.

MINOR MEMOS: Randolph-Macon College physicists say dollar bills in Bush's $2.77 trillion budget, laid end to end, would reach to the sun and back. ... Budget also represents $87,800 in federal spending every second for a year. * * *

Thursday, Feb. 9

Dueling data: An American Bar Association poll shows 52% of Americans believe the president alone can't suspend constitutional freedoms, and 25% more say he must get permission from a court or Congress. That, the ABA, concludes, demonstrates that 77% of Americans have "deep reservations" about President Bush's warrantless surveillance program. Only 18% of the respondents to the poll conducted last weekend said the president can shelve constitutional freedoms "anytime the president thinks it is necessary to protect the country." ABA President Michael S. Greco said the poll, conducted for the ABA by Harris Interactive, found that "While everyone agrees on the need for aggressive deterrence of terrorism, the disclosure of unchecked domestic spying by the president is deeply troubling to many Americans."

Meantime, an Associated Press-Ipsos poll released Thursday showed that Bush is making some headway in defending the National Security Agency's secret eavesdropping program. It found that 48% support the administration, up from 42% a month ago. Half of the respondents said the administration should get a court warrant, down from 56% last month.

Greco offered an idea most could embrace: "It is a time when we should be having conversations about our constitutional freedoms as well as our security." --Mary Lu Carnevale

* * *

Katrina's wake: White House Homeland Security Adviser Fran Townsend plans to brief state emergency managers in Alexandria, Va., Saturday morning about some of the findings of the White House inquiry into Hurricane Katrina. The report is expected to be critical of the Department of Homeland Security and its policies that stripped the Federal Emergency Management Agency of funds and authority. --Bobby Block * * *

Health-care providers are starting to gin up opposition to President Bush's plan to cut billions from projected Medicare and Medicaid payments.

The American Hospital Association and five other hospital organizations are running advertisements saying that $25 billion in proposed hospital cuts over five years "will threaten people's ability to get the care they need." The ads have appeared the last two days in such publications as the Washington Times, The Hill and Roll Call. Meanwhile, the American Clinical Laboratory Association, which represents local, regional and national labs across the U.S., is complaining about a budget proposal to expand competitive bidding for lab services in Medicare. The lab group argues that competitive bidding would hurt quality by putting too much emphasis on price.

DOJ_NMG_0014137

Earlier this week, Health and Human Services Secretary Michael Leavitt told Congress that expanded competitive bidding for lab and other services would "ensure more appropriate Medicare payments." --Laurie McGinley * * *

Bernanke the Inflation Fighter: Economists have some advice for Ben Bernanke as he takes over at the Federal Reserve: establish your credibility as an inflation fighter.

But, at the same time, they have concern that he could take that effort too far. When asked in the latest WSJ.com forecasting survey1 which mistake Mr. Bernanke is more likely to make -- raising rates too much or not enough -- three-quarters of economists said he is more likely to lift rates too high.

The new Fed chief faces the same puzzle that always confronts the Fed: how to check inflation without lifting rates so high that economic growth is snuffed out. But the challenge is especially acute now. Soaring energy prices have nudged up inflation pressures at the same time the Fed has been steadily lifting rates. Now, Mr. Bernanke must pick the right time to stop the increases. The matter could be further complicated because some have questioned Mr. Bernanke's resolve on price stability. Four years ago, he made comments about using loose money to fend off a very different threat: deflation. --Tim Annett

· Read the full article2, and see a video report3 of the Journal's David Wessel discussing economists' expectations for the first quarter. Plus, download forecasts for GDP, inflation, productivity, employment and interest rates4.

* * *

Wednesday, Feb. 8

Apparently stung by criticism of his budget policies, President Bush pushed back against opponents like Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid, who termed the president's plan "immoral" for reining in Medicaid and other social-services programs.

"People talked about how the decision to reform Medicaid was immoral," Mr. Bush said Wednesday in a speech to the Business and Industry Association of New Hampshire. "Well, it's not immoral to make sure that prescription drug pharmacists don't overcharge the system. You're a taxpayer, you expect the Medicaid person we're helping to be able to buy drugs at a reasonable cost. But it turns out that there was inflated markups for people who had government help to buy drugs. That doesn't make any sense, so we reformed that."

He also defended reforms preventing parents from transferring assets to children in order to qualify for Medicaid long-term care. And he responded to concerns about cuts in the student-loan program raised by a student at an appearance last month. "I said, well, I didn't think we were -- as a matter of fact, I thought we were helping you get student loans.... Let me tell you what those reforms were. There were too many subsidies to folks who were providing loans to the students. And so we decided to reform those subsidies to make it more rational for the taxpayers, and at the same time, to help the students. By reducing the cost of lending, we saved the taxpayers $22 billion, of which $10 billion will be used to increase student loans. So here is an example of staying focused on the mission, providing money for loans, and at the same time, providing relief for the taxpayer." --John D. McKinnnon * * *

Teacher's Pet? House Minority Leader John Boehner's choice for the new chairman of the House Education and the Workforce Committee, California's Rep. Howard "Buck" McKeon, is likely to cause higher-education groups to groan.

McKeon has led committee efforts to hold down college-tuition increases, including proposing federal sanctions against colleges that raised their tuition well above the inflation rate. McKeon backed down two years ago when his proposal to cut student loans on campuses with fast-rising tuition didn't attract cosponsors -- and even Republican colleagues pointed out that it would hurt students more than their universities. But Boehner supported other McKeon efforts to hold down tuition increases, including requiring colleges to report big price jumps.

McKeon and Boehner complain that their efforts to raise Pell Grants have been counteracted by subsequent tuition increases, leaving students no better off. The Higher Education Act, which defines the government's relationship with colleges and universities, is up for renewal this year. --June Kronholz * * *

The Treasury and the World Bank are sparring over the Group of Eight's plan to cancel $37 billion in loans to 42 poor countries.

The debts are supposed to be forgiven in July, but Treasury officials worry that the World Bank will miss the deadline. "We strongly urge the bank to move as quickly as possible to get this done," a senior Treasury official said. But some World Bank member nations see the U.S. as the holdup; they don't trust the U.S. to refill its share of the World Bank's kitty as loan forgiveness drains it over the next 40 years.

Treasury Secretary Snow promised the G8 last year that he would support a bill promising future payments, but the administration's support has been lukewarm. "In the American system, current Congresses cannot obligate the appropriations decisions of future Congresses," said Treasury spokesman Tony Fratto. --Michael M. Phillips * * *

A Push for Education: Chief executives of several Business Roundtable companies, in Washington Wednesday, lauded President Bush's focus on increased funding for physical science research, on encouraging immigration of math and science whizzes from abroad and -- especially -- on improving K-12 math and science education. The executives warned, though, that the U.S. shouldn't count on continuing to rely on immigrant scientists to compensate for what they see as shortcomings of American school systems. U.S.-trained Chinese and Indian scientists increasingly have promising opportunities in their home countries.

"It's not a problem for our businesses. It's our job not to let it be a problem" by hiring overseas when talent is in short supply in the U.S., said William D. Green, chief executive of Accenture, a consulting company. Pfizer CEO Hank McKinnell added, at a small press briefing: "We want to make sure our kids and grandkids -- and yours -- have jobs." --David Wessel * * *

The scandal surrounding disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff has shaken up Capitol Hill. But it still poses significant problems for the Bush White House.

A court hearing scheduled later this month may bring fresh attention to the case of former White House aide David Safavian, who is charged with lying in connection with a golf trip Mr. Abramoff arranged. Justice Department officials haven't closed their review of actions by former Interior Department official J. Steven Griles, who disputes claims that he favored Abramoff clients, such as Native American tribes involved in casinos. Calls for the White House to release photos of Mr. Abramoff with the president -- and details of his contacts with presidential aides including Karl Rove -- haven't abated. --Jeanne Cummings

· Read more in today's Journal article5.

* * *

Tuesday, Feb. 7

A coalition of business and academic leaders is launching a lobbying and media campaign to build support for President Bush's new plan to boost the competitiveness of American business.

The campaign opens Thursday with ad buys in national print publications, and will be followed up with ad buys in other media and direct advocacy on Capitol Hill.

The goal is "to try to increase the awareness in Washington and Congress," said Craig Barrett, chairman of Intel Corp. Barrett co-chairs the National Innovation Initiative Leadership Council, which is leading the campaign, with William Brody, president of Johns Hopkins University.

In his State of the Union address, Bush promised to seek increases in spending for scientific research and development and for math and science education. Among other things, the Bush plan would boost next year's spending by 9.3% for the National Science Foundation, the Department of Energy's Office of Science and the Commerce Department's National Institute of Standards and Technology, a step toward doubling their budgets over the next decade. Companion bills have been introduced by several members of Congress. But even so, the Bush initiative is expected to face a tough road toward passage this year, amid the broader concerns on Capitol Hill about the budget deficit.

"The question will now be, as the legislative process works, exactly what stays in and what gets consolidated and what the final bottom line is," Barrett said. "We're just trying to show there is a lot of latent interest and enthusiasm." --Greg Hitt

· Read excerpts6 and full text7 of Bush's State of the Union address. Compare text8 of his past speeches.

* * *

Steel Deal: The Justice Department is planning to investigate whether Mittal Steel Co.'s $24 billion hostile bid for chief rival Arcelor SA complies with antitrust law, a department official said. A tough U.S. investigation could delay the deal or force changes to eliminate overlapping product lines.

The proposed merger of the world's largest steelmakers would lengthen Mittal's wide lead in producing steel for the U.S. auto industry and other big manufacturers. European antitrust officials have already said they would review the deal. Mittal is based in the Netherlands but is run from London. Arcelor is based in Luxembourg but is run from Paris. Mittal has an enormous market presence in the U.S., giving the Justice Department authority to review the deal if it proceeds. "It's obviously something we'd look at," the Justice official said.

U.S. antitrust enforcers investigated Mittal's last acquisition but cleared it in December 2004 after a product-by-product review. The latest deal would give Mittal 11% of world crude-steel production, with much higher shares in some markets, analysts have said. --John R. Wilke * * *

Voting Block: Nearly half of U.S. states aren't yet in compliance with standards required under the 2002 Help America Vote Act and some are unlikely to meet all requirements in time for this year's mid-term elections, according to a report by Electionline.org9. The law, passed in the wake of voting problems during the 2000 presidential election, provided funds to help states upgrade voting machines, create statewide voter databases and improve voter identification.

DOJ_NMG_0014139

But states have had trouble meeting the law's January 2006 deadline, Electionline says. New York has struggled to replace lever voting machines with electronic systems and construct a statewide voter database. It faces potential Justice Department action. California has had problems certifying voting machines purchased by some of its cities. And partisan squabbling has complicated efforts in Wisconsin and Ohio to impose voter ID rules. So far, the report says, changes are "not as comprehensive as HAVA's authors had envisioned four years earlier." --Deborah Solomon * * *

Cupid's Calculations: When the Census Bureau combed its files10 for Valentine's Day facts, it found there are 120 single men (never married, widowed or divorced) in their 20s for every 100 single women in their 20s. For those 65 years of age and older, the numbers are even more lopsided: 33 single men for every 100 single women.

Each year, some 2.2 million marriages take place in the U.S. In 2004, 145,800 were performed in Nevada, ranking it the No. 4 state for marriages even though it ranks only 35 for population. The median age for first marriages was 25.8 for women and 27.4 for men in 2004, and the oldest first-time brides and grooms were in the Northeast. (In Massachusetts, the median age for women was 27.4 years and for men, 29.1.)

Census counted some 4.7 million opposite-sex cohabitating couples in 2004. That's 4.2% of all households.

Continuing the counting, the bureau found 1,271 establishments producing chocolate and cocoa products in 2003. California (146) and Pennsylvania (120) topped the list. Shipments of chocolate and cocoa products totaled $13.5 billion. Americans' per capita consumption of candy declined to 24.7 pounds in 2004, down from 27 pounds in 1997. Census tallied 22,022 florists, employing 113,270 people in 2003. And it pinpointed 28,527 jewelry stores, with sales of $2.4 billion (unadjusted) in February 2005.

Citing Hallmark, the Census Bureau figures some 180 million cards are exchanged for Valentine's Day, excluding all those packages of cards kids give their classmates. * * *

Oh Brother! "The president's brother's on board -- Bill Clinton," Scott McClellan said when he dropped by the press pen aboard Air Force One shortly before takeoff to attend the funeral of Coretta Scott King.

Mr. McClellan's joke alluded to the close relationship between Clinton and President Bush's father, who have worked together on aid programs for victims of the tsunami and Hurricane Katrina. Indeed, Clinton was onboard, along with his wife, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton. Four presidents attended the service for King at the New Birth Missionary Baptist Church in Lithonia, Ga.: President Bush, George H.W. Bush, Jimmy Carter and Clinton.

Rhode Island Revelation (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 10, 2006

Let's hope James Carville, Robert Rubin, Nancy Pelosi and other national Democrats are all sitting down for this one: The Rhode Island legislature is considering a flat tax, and the proposal comes from its majority Democrats.

That's right, last week Ocean State Democratic leaders proposed an optional flat rate income tax of 5.5% as an alternative to the current "progressive" tax schedule, which imposes rates ranging from 3.75% to 9.9% for the highest earners. The flat tax is part of a more comprehensive reform plan that would also include a sales tax holiday weekend in August and a full week of relief on "energy efficient" items in March 2007 from the state's 7% sales tax.

And listen to how House Speaker William Murphy pitched the idea at a news conference: "The ultimate goal is to put more money directly into people's pockets both by giving relief to those who need it and by making Rhode Island a more attractive place for business that will provide high-paying jobs for more Rhode Islanders." What's going on here? Have the state's liberals all taken Art Laffer happy pills?

The answer is tax competition, and the discovery that Rhode Island's high tax burden is damaging its economy. Just as the countries of the former Soviet bloc have passed flat taxes to make themselves more competitive, Rhode Island politicians are hoping the idea can help them stop their most talented workers and growth industries from going elsewhere.

In a recent survey by the Boston-based Beacon Hill Institute -- which measured the economic competitiveness of states based on their ability to generate income and growth -- Rhode Island ranked 37th, or well behind Massachusetts, Vermont, New Hampshire and Connecticut, which were all in the top 20. Only two years ago, Rhode Island ranked 22nd in the same survey.

The Democrats noted in their press release that Rhode Island's current top marginal income tax rate of 9.9% is among the highest of the 41 states with broad-based income taxes. They also cited a study that showed this high marginal rate "might be having an effect on the retention of wealth in Rhode Island by causing retirees and companies to move to states with lower taxes, and causing large companies with multiple locations to put their highest earners somewhere other than Rhode Island."

That "somewhere" else is often just up the road in Massachusetts, which has a 5.3% flat tax. One reason the Bay State, once known as Taxachusetts, cut its tax rate was to be able to compete with nearby New Hampshire, which still has no income tax at all. Bay Staters were moving to southern New Hampshire in droves, taking their tax dollars and high-tech know-how with them.

DOJ_NMG_0014140

Rhode Island currently piggybacks the already complicated federal tax system -- residents pay the state 25% of their federal tax liability -- which further increases complexity and costs on businesses and individual filers. By contrast, the proposed flat tax would be levied on adjusted gross income (AGI) with no deductions, exemptions or credits. The fairest taxes are not only simple but are levied on the broadest base possible. And working off AGI is both.

All of this ought to be especially instructive to national Democrats, who typically confront tax cuts with garlic and crosses. It's especially useful to have liberals underscoring that marginal income tax rates matter to incentives, and can drive both investment and workers into lower-tax venues. California and New York liberals still haven't figured that out.

Rhode Island Republicans, including Governor Don Carcieri, were also caught off guard by the Democrats' proposal and now sound like Beltway Democrats in raising objections. House Minority Leader Robert Watson has said he'd like to know how the Democrats "plan on paying for these tax cuts." A spokesman for the Governor had a similar cart-before-the-horse mentality, telling the Providence Journal that "the governor hopes to work with the General Assembly to make the spending cuts necessary to enact real tax relief."

But opposing good policies out of partisanship isn't going to make Rhode Island a more attractive place to work and invest. Tax cuts will. Republicans might try congratulating Democrats for their supply-side revelation, and then join them in doing right by taxpayers.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Sends Congress A Familiar Budget Hit List (WSJ)

By Jackie Calmes

The Wall Street Journal, February 10, 2006

WASHINGTON -- President Bush sent Congress his list of 141 programs to be killed or reduced to achieve almost $15 billion in savings, and almost half are three-time losers -- cuts he proposed for fiscal years 2004, 2005 and 2006, only to be ignored by Congress each time. The total savings are less than 4% of the current year's projected deficit.

If the third time wasn't a charm, the fourth probably won't be either, congressional staffers say. "We look at it," is all one Republican aide would say of the hit list disclosed by the Office of Management and Budget.

Of 91 programs targeted for elimination, 40 are making their fourth annual appearance on the list. Of 50 to be reduced, 20 are perennials. Among those that would get a death sentence -- but for Congress's equally persistent protection -- are the $79 million Advanced Technology Program, $49 million Emergency Steel Guarantee Loan Program and $64 million Oil and Gas Research and Development Program. Each benefits industries that are flourishing right now, administration officials argue.

Also recycled are a raft of education programs -- among them the $99 million Even Start for helping parents and students with literacy, and others for school counseling, alcohol-abuse and drop-out prevention, arts and migrant-education. A $22 million National Writing Project -- to teach teachers how to teach writing -- keeps making the list because it is redundant, OMB said, and because the money goes to a single nonprofit firm that is friendly with an appropriations committee member in Congress.

Well-placed friends also are certain to help another target -- the $9 million Exchanges with Historic Whaling and Trading Partners program -- escape the president's net. Supporters of the noncompetitive grants, for educational activities for Alaskan, Hawaiian and Massachusetts children on their states' once-vibrant whaling industries, include: former Senate Appropriations Committee Chairman Ted Stevens of Alaska, its senior Democrat, Daniel Inouye of Hawaii, senior Democratic Sen. Ted Kennedy of Massachusetts and -- with Congress's recent decision to add benefits for an Indian tribe in Mississippi -- the new chairman of Senate Appropriations, Thad Cochran of Mississippi.

The single biggest item on Mr. Bush's list, nearly $1.2 billion for grants to states for vocational education, is on it for just the second time. Among the smallest is $1 million for Close Up Fellowships, which long have brought low-income students not long in the country to observe the federal government at work. This is Close Up's fourth straight mention.

Separately yesterday, the liberal Center on Budget and Policy Priorities called into question some of the budget increases Mr. Bush boasts of in the budget he proposed this week for the fiscal year 2007 that starts Oct. 1. Using unreleased data from OMB, the center's analysts found that in the years 2008 to 2011, the Bush administration would make deep cuts in such areas as veterans' health care, health research and student loans.

In a break from past practice, the administration didn't include a five-year breakdown of proposed spending beyond 2007. OMB spokesman Scott Milburn said such out-year projections are speculative at best.

Most Of The Programs On Bush's Budgetary Hit List Are Retreads (USAT)

By Richard Wolf

DOJ_NMG_0014141

USA Today, February 10, 2006

WASHINGTON — Most of the 141 programs President Bush wants to cut or eliminate in his 2007 budget are survivors of past Bush hit lists, a list released Thursday by the White House showed.

Of 91 programs proposed for termination, all but 13 have been on the chopping block before. The 13 new programs would save the government $581 million — about 0.02% of the $2.77 trillion budget.

Including the other 50 programs that would be cut but allowed to continue, Bush wants to save $14.7 billion overall, about 0.5% of the budget. Last year, he tried to trim $15.8 billion from 154 programs; Congress agreed to cut $6.5 billion.

All of those numbers are small compared with the big ones in the budget: the skyrocketing costs of Medicare, Medicaid and Social Security, Bush's effort to boost spending on defense and homeland security, and the cost of making his tax cuts permanent.

The White House says the effort to cut or kill relatively small programs is important. Among the new targets is a food program for low-income women, children and seniors and an Internet-based listing of job openings.

"We've got to get away from the idea that it's OK to waste just a little money," says Scott Milburn, spokesman for the White House budget office. "When you've got a $2.77 trillion budget, a lot of little problems add up to big money."

Milburn says the White House is making headway, even if Congress doesn't go along completely. He points out that of the 78 programs Bush has again asked Congress to kill, lawmakers reduced funding last year in 33.

Budget watchdog groups want Bush to cut more. Keith Ashdown of Taxpayers for Common Sense says the president is focused only on domestic programs.

"They're leaving war-on-terrorism and defense spending off the table," Ashdown says. "They're basically trying to cut from around 13% to 15% of the budget. It leaves you with fewer oxes to gore."

Bush is being criticized by conservatives as too cautious in his cuts and by liberals as too brazen:

·"There is no shortage of candidates for elimination," says Brian Riedl of the conservative Heritage Foundation. "There is only the shortage of political will to make the difficult decisions."

·"Every year they propose the same drastic cuts," says Kirstin Brost, spokeswoman for Rep. David Obey, D-Wis., top Democrat on the House Appropriations Committee. "They've cut programs that help average Americans to the bone to pay for supersized tax cuts for millionaires."

Bush Calls For Eliminating Program For Needy Seniors (AP)

By frederic frommer

The Associated Press, February 10, 2006

President Bush wants to eliminate a program that provides poor seniors with vegetables, peanut butter and other nutritious foods, proposing that recipients be moved to food stamps.

But critics argue that the change, part of the President's budget plan, will leave the seniors worse off than they are now.

The Commodity Supplemental Food Program, targeted for the chopping block, provides nutritionally balanced boxes of food to about a half-million poor people monthly, including nearly 14,000 in Minnesota. The majority of beneficiaries are elderly, although some women and children also participate.

The Department of Agriculture, which administers the CSFP program, proposes moving recipients to food stamps starting in the fiscal year that begins Oct. 1. But CSFP advocates say that many seniors are reluctant to sign up for food stamps and that, in any event, the CSFP often provides a more generous package.

The proposal could face an uphill battle on Capitol Hill. Wisconsin Sen. Herb Kohl, the ranking Democrat on the Senate Appropriations agriculture subcommittee, said he would oppose it.

"I call it misplaced priorities. How do you justify doing something like this, while at the same time giving people like Herb Kohl huge tax cuts?" said Kohl, a multimillionaire.

"It really does come under the category, in the most extreme way, of balancing the budget on the backs of those who are most needy. And in this case we're not even balancing the budget."

Congress funded about $111 million for the program in the current fiscal year, including a $4 million supplement for victims of Hurricane Katrina.

The CSFP program, which dates back to 1968, operates in 32 states and the District of Columbia. Its lack of national reach is one reason the administration wants to eliminate it, according to USDA officials.

Kate Coler, the USDA's deputy under secretary for Food, Nutrition and Consumer Services, said the department believes it can serve people more efficiently through food stamps and the Women, Infants and Children program, which are both nationwide.

"It's really a duplicative program," she said of CSFP.

DOJ_NMG_0014142

Recipients of CSFP boxes receive powdered milk, vegetables, cereal, juice, meat, fruit, protein (peanut butter or beans), starch (such as dehydrated potatoes, rice or pasta) and cheese.

"When I heard about this, my first thought was, 'What are they thinking?'" said R. Jane Brown, Executive Director of the Second Harvest Heartland in Maplewood, Minn. Brown's hunger relief organization administers the CSFP program for the Twin Cities and central and western Minnesota.

"It's a program that everyone who has benefited from has nothing but good stories to tell about it."

Sarah Mayek, 75, of Milwaukee, receives both the CSFP box and $10 a month for food stamps.

"You try to stretch your budget a little bit," Mayek said. Without CSFP, she said, "I would have to adjust. But I raised 11 children. I know how to cut corners."

Tim Robertson, president of the National CSFP Association, which represents state and local organizations that administer the program, challenged the USDA's premise that people will switch over to food stamps.

"Seniors have repeatedly said they don't want to be on that program," Robertson said, because of the perceived stigma of using food stamps and the paperwork hassles.

The USDA's own statistics show that just 28 percent of seniors eligible for food stamps participate in the program.

Jean Daniel, a spokeswoman for the USDA's Food and Nutrition Service, said her agency is working to remove the perceived stigma. For example, she said, the agency is getting the word out that food stamp payments are now made by an electronic transfer card, not actual stamps.

"We try to make the point that this is not a welfare program, this is a nutritional assistance program," she said.

Lawmakers Slam Bush Cut In Weatherization Funds (REU)

By Tom Doggett

Reuters, February 10, 2006

Democratic lawmakers on Thursday slammed the Bush administration's proposal to cut funds for a government program that helps poor people weatherize their homes, even though the White House's energy task force recommended increasing money for the program.

The administration wants to gut 32 percent of the money in the Energy Department's budget for weatherization assistance grants, which help low-income families buy storm windows and insulation for their homes to make them more energy-efficient. The program's funding would fall to $164.2 million.

Sen. Jeff Bingaman, the top Democrat on the Senate Energy Committee, said slashing the program's funds did not make much sense "at a time when home energy bills are at historically high levels."

Bingaman, speaking at committee hearing on the Energy Department budget, pointed out President George W. Bush pledged during this 2000 campaign to nearly double funding for the program and the White House energy task force headed by Vice President Dick Cheney called for more weatherization funds.

The administration's request of $164.2 million for the weatherization program is not only a cut, but is also short of the $600 million Congress authorized for the program in a sweeping energy bill that Bush signed into law last August.

Energy Secretary Sam Bodman defended what he described as a "painful" cut in the program's budget, saying the department had a limited amount of money and it was targeted to programs that have the most promising results.

"I personally made this decision (to reduce the weatherization funds) as it came across my desk, and it was strictly knowing how much money I had to spend and where I had to put the funds," he said.

Bodman said the lower budget for the program would still pay for weatherizing 64,000 homes in the 2007 spending year. But that's down from 97,000 homes at current funding levels.

Democratic Sen. Robert Menendez of New Jersey said cutting the program would hurt the neediest Americans who require help to save on their high energy costs.

"The recipients of this (program) are the people who are on lowest levels of economic opportunity in our society," he said. "They are the elderly. They are poor families with children. They are the disabled. They are the least capable of meeting their energy needs and they will be coldest, if we don't have the type of robust weatherization program that we should have."

Environmental and consumer groups have also come out against reducing the budget for the weatherization program, which has proven to save energy at the same time Bush calls for the United States to reduce its foreign energy imports.

"The only way to ease the pain of record energy prices for consumers and businesses alike, and to address critical energy-related security and environmental issues, is to back up the rhetoric with the reality of adequate federal funding for key energy-efficiency programs," said Kateri Callahan, president of the Alliance to Save Energy.

Sen. Pete Domenici (news, bio, voting record), who chairs the Senate's energy committee, told reporters that lawmakers would likely restore some of weatherization funds the administration wants to cut.

DOJ_NMG_0014143

White House Seeks To Make Case For Programs Cuts (REU-Y2)

By Caren Bohan

Reuters, February 10, 2006

The White House defended reductions in programs from veterans healthcare to housing on Thursday as it sought to persuade a reluctant Congress to enact its proposals for 141 domestic spending cuts.

President George W. Bush, who unveiled a $2.77 trillion budget for fiscal 2007 on Monday, said the government could save nearly $15 billion from the cuts.

The proposals include requiring that higher-income veterans pay more for their medical care, eliminating a writing program in public schools and the consolidation of housing programs.

The White House says the cuts target programs that were either not performing well or not fulfilling important functions.

But the proposals have gotten a wary reception in Congress, with Democrats lashing out at Bush for pushing tax cuts for the rich while reducing programs for the poor and middle class.

Even prominent members of Bush's Republican party criticized his budget.

House Appropriations Committee Chairman Jerry Lewis complained about "fees and gimmicks," which he said the White House knows Congress will again reject, but give Bush leeway to propose spending increases in favored areas such as defense.

"These proposals make a difficult appropriations season even harder," said the California Republican, who must steer a series of spending bills through Congress this summer that uphold a budget blueprint Republicans hope to pass.

Of the savings proposals, 22 of the 141 are new. The rest revive reductions that Congress either rejected or adopted only in part last year.

ARRAY OF CUTS

Following are details on some of them:

* A monthly food package to help poor women, children and the elderly would be eliminated. The White House said part of its mission overlaps with the more effective nutrition program for Women, Infants and Children. It said the elderly could receive temporary benefits and be shifted to food stamps.

* Nineteen small education plans such as a writing program and one for economic education would be terminated. The White House said states can support the activities through federal grants giving them the discretion on how to spend the money.

* A program to provide block grants to states to improve juvenile justice system would be eliminated. The administration said the program has not been effective and is not needed with crime at historic lows.

* The White House would cut $30 million from an Internal Revenue Service modernization program that will encourage more electronic filing and use of the Internet for tax services. The White House said the program has had some success but is moving ahead more slowly than expected.

* A program for public-housing modernization and renovation would be reduced by 11 percent, with the savings redirected toward programs such as housing block grants for states and rental assistance.

* A program of revolving loans for clean water programs for states would be pared back. The administration said that over the past three years Congress has given the program more money than requested and therefore it needs less funding in 2007.

* The White House would require higher-income veterans with no disabilities to pay a $250 annual enrollment fee for medical care and raise co-pays for their drug purchases to $15 from $8. The administration said the change would allow the veterans' health program to focus on its core mission of helping poor veterans and those with special needs or disabilities.

Congress Fixes Error In $39 Bln Spending-cut Law (REU-Y2)

Reuters, February 10, 2006

The Senate and House have passed legislation aimed at ending confusion over a $39-billion spending-cut bill signed into law by President Bush on Wednesday, which varied slightly from the final version passed by the House.

The two chambers passed the fix late on Wednesday, hours after the technical problem was discovered and the bill was enacted into law with Bush's signature.

The problem stemmed from a typographical error written into the contentious bill as it bounced back and forth from the House and Senate since December.

The clerical error involved Medicare payments for the rental of medical equipment such as oxygen tanks. The version signed by Bush contained the payment schedule intended by both chambers, but not contained in the final House-passed bill.

The legislative fix stated that the version signed by the president reflected "the intent of the Congress in enacting the bill into law."

DOJ_NMG_0014144

The spending-cut bill cuts domestic programs, including health care for the poor and elderly, raises some student loan costs and cuts federal enforcement of child support payments. Democrats and some moderate Republicans boycotted the measure and it only passed the Senate in December after Vice President Dick Cheney cast a rare tie-breaking vote.

Democrats on the House and Senate budget committees were not available for comment on whether they would challenge the propriety of Bush signing a bill that technically was not passed in identical form by both chambers.

The Vanishing Future (NYT)

By Paul Krugman

The New York Times, February 10, 2006

At this point we've had six years to grow accustomed to Bush budget chicanery. (Yes, six years: George W. Bush's special mix of blatant dishonesty and gross irresponsibility was fully visible during the 2000 presidential campaign.) What still amazes me, however, is the sheer childishness of the administration's denials and deceptions.

Consider the case of the vanishing future.

The story begins in 2001, when President Bush was pushing his first tax cut through Congress. At the time, the administration insisted that its tax-cut plans wouldn't endanger the budget surplus bequeathed to Mr. Bush by Bill Clinton. But even some Republican senators were skeptical. So the Senate demanded a cap on the tax cut: it should not reduce revenue over the period from 2001 to 2011 by more than $1.35 trillion.

The administration met this requirement, but not by scaling back its tax-cutting ambitions. Instead, it created fictitious savings by "sunsetting" the tax cut, making the whole thing expire at the end of 2010.

This was obviously silly. For example, under the law as written there will be no federal tax on the estates of wealthy people who die in 2010. But the estate tax will return in 2011 with a maximum rate of 55 percent, creating some interesting incentives.

I suggested, back in 2001, that the legislation be renamed the Throw Momma From the Train Act.

It was also obvious that the administration had no intention of abiding by its concession to fiscal prudence, that it would try to eliminate the sunset clause and make the tax cuts permanent.

But it quickly became clear that the budget forecasts the administration used to justify the 2001 tax cut were wildly overoptimistic. The federal government faced a future of deficits, not surpluses, as far as the eye could see. Making the tax cut permanent would greatly worsen those future deficits. What were budget officials to do?

You almost have to admire their brazenness: they made the future disappear.

Clinton-era budgets offered 10-year projections of spending and revenues. But the Bush administration slashed the budget horizon to five years. This artificial shortsightedness greatly aided the campaign to make the 2001 tax cut permanent because it hid the costs: since budget analyses no longer covered the years after 2010, the revenue losses from extending the tax cut became invisible.

But now it's 2006, and even a five-year projection covers the period from 2007 to 2011, which means including a year in which making the Bush tax cuts permanent will cost a lot of revenue — $119.7 billion, but who's counting? Has the administration finally run out of ways to avoid budget reality?

Not quite. As the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities points out, until this year budget documents contained a standard table titled "Impact of Budget Policy," which summarized the effects of the administration's tax and spending proposals on future outlays and revenues. But this year, that table is missing. So you have to do some detective work to figure out what's really going on.

Now, the administration has proposed spending cuts that are both cruel and implausible. For example, administration computer printouts obtained by the center show that the budget calls for a 13 percent cut in spending on veterans' health care, adjusted for inflation, over the next five years.

Yet even these cuts would fall far short of making up for the revenue losses from making the tax cuts permanent. The administration's own estimate, which can be deduced from its budget tables, is that extending the tax cuts would cost an average of $235 billion in each year from 2012 through 2016.

In other words, the administration has no idea how to make its tax cuts feasible in the long run. Yet it has never, as far as I can tell, allowed unfavorable facts to affect its determination to make the tax cuts permanent. Instead, it has devoted all its efforts to hiding those awkward facts from public view. (Any resemblance to, say, its Iraq strategy is no coincidence.)

At this point the administration's budget strategy seems to be simply to ignore reality. The 2007 budget makes it clear, once and for all, that the tax cuts can't be offset with spending cuts. But Bush officials have decided to ignore that unpleasant fact, and let some future administration deal with the mess they have created.

Iraq, Not Homeland, Bush Budget Buster (USAT)

DOJ_NMG_0014145

USA Today, February 10, 2006

President Bush submitted a budget to Congress this week that is so big, most of us just shrug it off without thinking about what it means to us individually. Think about this:

· The $2.77 trillion budget for the fiscal year starting in October breaks down to an average of $9,293.62 for everyone in the USA.

· The latest budget request for Iraq of about $96 billion brings the cost of that war to $322 billion, an average of $1,080.34 per person.

If you think big business or somebody else will pay the bill, think again. About 45% of the federal government's revenue comes from individual income taxes.

The income tax is the fairest tax we have. Paying more for education, health care, Social Security, real "homeland security" and the most modern military equipment and decent pay for servicemen and women doesn't bother me. But ...

Bush simply can't convince me on continuing the cost in Iraq — in dollars and, more important, in precious lives -for a war that he never should have started.

The $20 billion-plus for Afghanistan in the new budget is another matter. That's where several of the terrorists came from who hit us on 9/11. That's where we should have concentrated and continued the hunt for Osama bin Laden and his gang.

Instead, Bush got sidetracked to Iraq. Paraphrasing poet Robert Frost: Two roads diverged in the woods and I ... I took the one I shouldn't have traveled by.

"Staying the course" on that wrong road will not bankrupt us financially. But it is busting our budget, continuing to cost countless innocent lives, and making us look morally bankrupt in the eyes of much of the rest of the world.

Pentagon Budget 'A Great Surprise' (WP)

By Renae Merle

The Washington Post, February 10, 2006

Richard Bernstein, like many other defense contractors, was anxious as the Pentagon spending blueprint for fiscal 2007 was being developed in recent months. "There were a lot of rumors that the defense budget would get cut back, and there was some concern," recalled Bernstein, president of BAI Aerosystems Inc, a small dronemaker in Maryland.

When that Defense Department budget was unveiled Monday, however, Bernstein and most other defense executives were relieved. The $439 billion proposal would increase spending on weapons to $84.2 billion, $8 billion more than this year, and includes $1.7 billion for unmanned aerial vehicles, an increase of about 3 percent, to begin buying 322 of the pilotless planes over the next five years. "It was a great surprise," said Bernstein, who read the budget proposal on the Internet from Australia, where he was attending an industry trade show.

The proposed 7 percent increase in the budget for weapons procurement and research and development is twice that expected by Troy Lahr, a defense analyst at investment bank Stifel, Nicolaus & Co. "And we were among the more bullish," said Lahr, noting that most of his counterparts were expecting the budget to remain flat or increase 1 percent to 2 percent.

The Pentagon probably reasoned that members of Congress would be reluctant to make significant cuts that could cost jobs in their districts with midterm elections near, analysts said. Last year, Congress rejected cuts to retire an aircraft carrier and scale back production of the C-130J cargo jet.

"It might be easier to close bases in Germany than tackle the U.S. industrial complex," said Michael E. O'Hanlon, a senior fellow at the Brookings Institution.

One negative surprise was slower growth than expected in the Pentagon's information technology budget. It would increase less than 1 percent, to $30.54 billion, in the fiscal year starting Oct. 1. Overall, government information technology spending would increase 2.8 percent, to $64.29 billion. That is significantly slower than the 5 percent to 6 percent increases the IT industry has been used to receiving since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

Dendy Young, chairman and chief executive of Chantilly-based GTSI Corp., which develops and maintains computer systems for the government, said, "I am concerned that the priority for IT investment seems to be declining."

To be sure, the budget proposal includes some cuts. Despite the objections of British Prime Minister Tony Blair, it would cancel an engine being developed by London-based Rolls-Royce PLC and General Electric Co. of Connecticut for the F-35 Joint Strike Fighter. "We were surprised that the DoD has decided they no longer need the engine," said Mike Ryan, Rolls-Royce's executive vice president of government business. Ryan estimates that the government spent $1.2 billion through 2005 on the engine.

And the Air Force would limit to 180 the total number of Boeing C-17 cargo jets being built, despite lobbying by officials from Long Beach, Calif., where the plane is made, to keep the production line open. "We're a little disappointed," said Robert M.

DOJ_NMG_0014146

Swayze, economic development bureau manager for the city. City officials will probably join companies that supply parts for the plane in a District rally being planned by Boeing to oppose the decision, he said.

The overall defense-funding proposal is a relief for Wall Street. After being sluggish for months, for example, shares of Lockheed Martin Corp. closed at $70.62 yesterday, compared with $68.92 last Friday and a 52-week low of $58.28.

But many industry experts remain convinced that defense spending will inevitably fall because of the budget deficit and the cost of fighting the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan. In a conference call with analysts last week, Boeing Chairman Jim McNerney warned that the company expected "defense growth to moderate due to a tightening budget environment." The 2007 budget proposal does not change that outlook, said company spokesman Todd Blecher.

The administration spending plan just postpones the inevitable, some industry analysts said, noting the mismatch between the projected budget level over the next few years and the costs of the programs. Manufacturers have defended spending on Cold War-era legacy programs by modifying them. The F-22 fighter, designed to shoot down Soviet MiGs, is now the F/A-22, adding a ground support role. Four giant Ohio-class submarines, built to carry nuclear missiles targeted at the Soviet Union, are being converted to carry shorter-range cruise missiles and Navy SEALs and other special operations troops.

As the Pentagon spends more on initiatives to transform the military to combat insurgents and other nontraditional threats, supporting expensive traditional weapons will become more difficult, some analysts predict.

"Here is the problem: People like me have been talking about the coming train wreck for so long now that people are tired of hearing it," said Christopher Hellman, director of the project on military spending oversight at the Center for Arms Control and Non-Proliferation. "But the truth of the matter is that it will happen; we're not making it up."

Still Shortchanging The Troops (NYT)

The New York Times, February 10, 2006

It's amazing how Donald Rumsfeld's Defense Department can produce a $439 billion spending plan and still skimp on the one thing the American military desperately needs: expanded ground forces so the weakened and cannibalized Army can meet the requirements of Iraq without hurting its ability to respond to other threats.

While the Pentagon intends to increase pay and recruitment bonuses, no part of its nearly 7 percent budget increase is aimed at raising overall troop strength. Instead, a large chunk of this nearly $30 billion bonanza goes to buying more new weapons and postponing overdue cuts in wasteful Air Force and Navy projects unrelated to fighting terrorism.

The prospects for Iraq might be very different today if Mr. Rumsfeld had listened to some of his own senior generals and occupation officials and authorized significantly larger ground forces from the beginning. The early looting might have been contained before it shattered political confidence and vital infrastructure. The insurgency might never have gotten such a head start. The incineration tactics of Falluja and the Abu Ghraib nightmare might have been avoided. And the Army's downward spiral of readiness, recruitment and morale might never have begun. But the obstinate ideologues in Mr. Rumsfeld's Pentagon have never accepted the fact that the reality of Iraq did not fit their assumptions. The budget and the four-year plan released with it read almost as if the current conflict had never happened and could never happen again.

Instead of reallocating resources toward the real threats America faces, the military services continue to pour their money into fighting fictive superpowers in the wild blue yonder and on and below the seven seas. Pentagon budgeters showed themselves so pathetically unable to restrain spending on expensive ships and planes that they actually cut back, rather than increased, the overall size of the Army over the next few years to pay for it.

It would cost about $4 billion to $5 billion a year to give the Army 30,000 more troops, the minimum it needs to check its alarming slide. Instead the Pentagon chose to begin the construction of two unneeded new stealth destroyers, which will end up costing $2 billion to $3 billion each.

It also decided to splurge on a new nuclear attack submarine for $2.6 billion and to shell out $5.5 billion for separate Navy and Air Force versions of new stealth fighter jets, plus another $5.5 billion for yet a third version that either can use. In all, the Pentagon is asking for $84 billion to buy weapons systems (twice what it got in 1996) and $73 billion more for research and development.

This budget would be wasteful even under a worst-case assumption that had a second superpower arising within the lifespan of these weapons, turning hostile to America and arming itself to the teeth with the most advanced weapons. There's still unnecessary spending that could be used to repair the Army, which has been ground down at least as much by Pentagon miserliness as by Iraqi insurgents.

The military contractors are doing just fine. It's the troops in Iraq who need help from Washington.

Bush's Domestic Policy Adviser Resigns (NSDY/AP)

By Associated Press

DOJ_NMG_0014147

Long Island Newsday, February 10, 2006

WASHINGTON -- President Bush's domestic policy adviser, Claude Allen, has resigned to spend more time with his family, the White House said Thursday.

Allen has been working for the administration since Bush's first year in office -- first as the No. 2 official at the Health and Human Services Department, and for the last year as domestic policy adviser in the White House.

In a statement, Bush said Allen has helped develop policies that have strengthened the country's families, schools and communities. Bush thanked Allen for "his many years of principled and dedicated service to our country."

Allen, a father of four and former attorney, did not respond to inquiries asking about his departure or future job plans. His office referred calls to the White House press office, which said he will be taking some time off to spend more time with his family.

Press secretary Scott McClellan said Allen had been considering his resignation for several weeks, but decided to stay on through last week's State of the Union address.

In his resignation letter, Allen thanked the president for the opportunity to serve and said he treasured his time working for the administration. "Although this is a difficult decision, it is the best decision for my family," the letter said.

Bush Wins Praise For Competitiveness Plan (MBSN)

By Martin Crutsinger

Myrtle Beach (SC) Sun News, February 10, 2006

WASHINGTON - President Bush's plan to boost the competitiveness of U.S. industry through innovation won support from members of Congress Thursday, although Democrats criticized the initiative for slashing some education programs to pay for more spending on math and science.

Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez won widespread support from members of the House Government Reform Committee for Bush's "American Competitiveness Initiative," one of the biggest new programs in the budget Bush sent to Congress on Monday.

The initiative, which the president highlighted in his State of the Union address, would double government funding for basic research in the physical sciences, train thousands of new science and math teachers and extend a popular tax credit businesses can receive for investing in research and development. The total pricetag over 10 years would be $136 billion.

Gutierrez said country had a choice on how it would respond to increased global competition from countries such as China and India.

"Some want to respond by retreating into isolationism," Gutierrez said. He said the alternative offered by the president through the competitiveness initiative was "maintaining our leadership by competing with confidence."

Committee Chairman Tom Davis, R-Va., said he believed there was a need to boost math and science teaching in high schools to reverse a slide in which the country's colleges are graduating fewer engineers today than 20 years ago.

But Rep. Chris Van Hollen, D-Md., said he was concerned because while Bush's budget called for increasing areas of the Education Department budget to train 70,000 new math and science teachers and to attract 30,000 math and science professionals to tutor in the schools, the money was taken from other education programs.

For the second straight year, Bush's new budget would cut overall discretionary spending for education programs. He also asked Congress to eliminate 42 education programs he deemed unnecessary or inefficient, covering such areas as providing money for the arts, parent-resource centers and drug-free schools.

Van Hollen said he was also concerned that Bush was scrimping on the necessary support for the National Institutes of Health, including his proposal to trim spending for 18 of the 19 medical research institutes, calling cutbacks in these areas a mistake given the need to maintain the country's lead in medical research.

Gutierrez, however, said that the president's budget was seeking to find the right priorities for spending while at the same time pursuing Bush's goal of cutting the deficit in half by 2009.

Gutierrez urged individual members of Congress to refrain from inserting money into budget bills for pet projects, a process known as "earmarking."

"The most successful research is based on careful planning and merit-based peer review," Gutierrez said. "So to maximize the impact of (American Competitiveness Initiative) research, we encourage Congress to resist earmarking scientific research funding."

Can Bush Make America More Competitive In Math And Science? (CSM)

By Linda Feldmann, Staff Writer Of The Christian Science Monitor

The Christian Science Monitor, February 10, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0014148

WASHINGTON - Americans have heard the warnings for decades: The nation is in danger of falling behind other technological powerhouses in the world, posing a threat to its way of life. In the 1950s, it was the Soviet Union; in the 1980s, Japan. Now the big competitors are India and China.

President Bush's competitiveness initiative, outlined in his federal budget, would focus $136 billion over 10 years on boosting research and education. Much of that cost would come in the form of tax incentives for research and development; the rest represents new funding, including a doubling of the budgets of three federal agencies focused on science and technology.

The education piece of Mr. Bush's plan seems relatively small - $380 million in fiscal 2007 - but it is getting most of the attention. From that, $90 million would go to boost the ranks of students taking Advanced Placement and International Baccalaureate classes in math, science, and foreign languages by training 70,000 additional teachers in those subject areas in high-poverty high schools.

Overall, Bush's AP Incentive Program aims to boost the number of students taking AP math and science exams from 380,000 today to 1.5 million in 2012.

In a nation that seems to have a cultural aversion to tackling "hard" subjects like math and science, can those numbers be achieved? And without the stark image of Sputnik - the Soviet satellite whose launch in 1957 caught the US by surprise - to spur a fear of national decline, will the nation rally to the "competitiveness" cause and push Congress to fund the plan?

After all, in earlier waves of national concern about competitiveness, education reform fell short and yet the US still leads the world in economic might and innovation, says Michael Petrilli, vice president of the Fordham Foundation, a school-reform think tank.

"But I think, as Tom Friedman argued in his bestselling book, the economy is fundamentally different today," Mr. Petrilli says. "If our kids are going to have an opportunity to have good-paying jobs and enjoy the lifestyle they're used to, they're going to have to be able to use their brains. By any measure, our students are falling behind the rest of the world, especially in math and science."

The recent growth in participation in the College Board's Advanced Placement Program provides cause for hope. On Tuesday, the program reported an increase in success by high school students in all 50 states and the District of Columbia in AP courses over the past five years. The proportion of high school students passing AP exams - earning at least a 3 on a 5-point scale - has jumped from 10 percent to 14 percent since 2000.

Minority students remain underrepresented. Though African-Americans make up 13 percent of the high school population, they are 6 percent of AP test-takers. Native Americans make up 1 percent of students, but 0.5 percent of the AP population. The news is better for Latinos, who represent 13 percent of the student population and 13 percent of AP test-takers.

One constituency supportive of the president's education initiative is the business community, which fears that a future of unqualified American students will harm the bottom line. But some education analysts worry that - among the issues on business's plate, including tax cuts - education funding won't be high on the agenda when it comes time to lobby Congress.

"We are very willing to go to the mat on this," says Susan Traiman of the Education and Workforce Policy at the Business Roundtable. In the National Academy of Sciences report from last fall, which served as a blueprint for Bush's competitiveness initiative, the first recommendation centered on education, she notes.

"With the coming retirement of baby boomers who are in the science and engineering workforce, we need to make sure we have young people coming up behind them ready to enter those careers," Ms. Traiman says.

Education experts are also wondering whether Bush's first-term education initiative - No Child Left Behind (NCLB), which aims to improve the achievement of low performers - will work at cross-purposes with the American Competitiveness Initiative. The FY 2007 budget for the Department of Education took a big hit - a 5.5 percent reduction. Education Secretary Margaret Spellings maintains that the department can do both: raise the bottom and enhance achievement at the top. The budget would boost funding for NCLB by 4.6 percent.

Given the other education programs slated for abolition, many of them aimed at inner-city students, skepticism remains.

"I doubt whether most of this competitiveness stuff will be funded," says John Jennings of the nonprofit Center on Education Policy. "He's asking for so much less for education, and asking to eliminate so many popular ... programs. I find it hard to believe Congress will eliminate these programs and create new programs."

bush advisor to visit (RNO)

Raleigh News & Observer, February 10, 2006

North Carolina likes to think of itself as a hotbed of innovation.

Apparently, the Bush administration is keying in on that reputation.

DOJ_NMG_0014149

For the second time in a week, a senior Bush adviser will visit the state to discuss the president's "American Competitiveness Initiative." Commerce Secretary Carlos M. Gutierrez, right, this morning will meet with business and education leaders at IBM's Research Triangle Park campus to promote the stronger focus on technological and scientific innovation.

Bush's initiative is meant to increase competitiveness with other nations. Treasury Secretary John W. Snow touted the effort in Kannapolis last week.

TRADE GAP REPORT TO BE RELEASED

The Commerce Department releases its monthly trade report today, and some economists predict that the U.S. trade deficit -- aggravated by energy costs and Chinese imports -- widened in December and set an all-time high for the year.

The increase in the deficit last year has prompted U.S. lawmakers to increase criticism of China, which they claim keeps the value of its currency artificially low, making its exports less expensive to U.S. consumers.

The projected December shortfall of $64.9 billion would be the third-largest ever, and follows a $64.2 billion November gap. It would bring the 2005 trade deficit to $727 billion.

Ethics Scandal Looms Over Republicans' Retreat (REU-Y2)

By Thomas Ferraro

Reuters, February 10, 2006

Republicans in the U.S. House of Representatives, rocked by an ethics scandal, gathered at a secluded Maryland town on Thursday for a retreat, hoping to regroup under new leadership and position themselves to retain power in November's elections.

A week after electing Rep. John Boehner (news, bio, voting record) of Ohio as majority leader in place of the indicted Texan Tom DeLay, the Republicans were to hold three days of meetings at a hotel in Cambridge, Maryland, a two-hour bus ride from Washington.

Lobbying scandals and Justice Department investigations involving Republican lawmakers and former aides threaten the party's control of the House, which it has held since 1995.

Boehner said the retreat would allow a "period of renewal," but gave no hint whether he could quickly unite his 231-member caucus on lobbying reform. House Speaker Dennis Hastert, an Illinois Republican, has said this is his top priority.

In the wake of a scandal involving Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff, Boehner has called for more public disclosure of the relationships between lawmakers and lobbyists rather than a fundamental overhaul of the way Congress does business.

Unlike some of his colleagues, he is also opposed to abolishing so-called "earmark" spending for pet projects, urging instead more transparency.

President George W. Bush who, along with fellow Republicans in Congress has been battered by slumping poll numbers, was to speak to the group on Friday.

"I think you have some nervous Republicans who are looking at a political environment that is very dangerous for their party," said Amy Walter of the nonpartisan Cook Political Report.

A number of senior Republicans have been drawn into the investigation into Abramoff, who pleaded guilty last month to fraud charges and agreed to help prosecutors in their corruption probe.

Ethan Siegal of the Washington Exchange, a private group that tracks legislation and politics for institutional investors, said, "House Republicans need to focus on an agenda that plays to their (conservative) base and demonstrates to the voting public at large that they are competent and deserve to remain in power."

There was also concern about Bush's proposed $2.77 trillion budget submitted this week that would boost defense spending, slow the growth of Medicare and cut a host of domestic programs in an effort to soothe Republican worries over high deficits.

Boehner was the upset winner of a House Republican leadership election last week, defeating Roy Blunt of Missouri. Blunt was seen by some as too close to DeLay, who was forced to step down as majority leader last year after being indicted in Texas on campaign-related felony charges.

Other likely topics for the meeting included energy prices, health care, national security, the Iraq war, immigration and education.

GOP Gets Quick Course In Ethics (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, February 10, 2006

CAMBRIDGE, Md. -- House Republicans will get a refresher course on ethics tomorrow as part of their three-day retreat to discuss lobby and ethics reforms and try to clarify a vision for 2006.

DOJ_NMG_0014150

Rep. Doc Hastings of Washington, chairman of the ethics committee, will review the code of conduct for the 180 Republicans who have gathered at a conference center on Maryland's Eastern Shore.

They will hear a pep talk from President Bush today.

Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman told the lawmakers yesterday that Democrats are failing to capitalize on Republican ethics questions ahead of difficult midterm congressional elections in November.

Mr. Mehlman said politics is supposed to be a zero-sum situation: If one party is doing poorly, the other does well. But Republicans' travails have not helped Democrats, he said.

"The law of political physics is being defied by Nancy Pelosi, Howard Dean and Harry Reid," he said, referring to the top Democrats in the House, the national party and the Senate.

Mr. Mehlman said more of the electorate is voting based on ideology, providing a cushion for the president's lower approval numbers and a general feeling that the country is moving in the wrong direction.

Rep. David Dreier of California, chairman of the Rules Committee, rejected calls by Democrats and some Republicans to alter the way the House debates and votes, including lag time to read legislation and a time limit on floor votes.

The current rules set a minimum but not a maximum time limit.

The Republican leadership has been accused of abusing the rule, most notably in the 2003 vote on the Medicare prescription-drug legislation.

That three-hour vote included heavy persuasion, and the ethics committee admonished Rep. Tom DeLay, Texas Republican, for the appearance of trying to strong-arm a Republican colleague.

Top House Democrats wrote a letter calling for fewer "closed rules" that prevent amendments and a requirement that measures be available for 24 hours before they are brought up for a floor vote.

Mr. Dreier told reporters that Republicans already allow Democrats to have a substitute on most bills, and said more Democratic amendments were allowed last year than Republican amendments.

Although Republicans want reforms to be bipartisan, he said, their priority is "moving the Republican agenda."

"There's no reason in the world we should be tying hands," Mr. Dreier said.

Sen. McCain Leads Effort To Cut Earmarks (AP-Y2)

By Jim Abrams

AP2, February 10, 2006

Ten senators led by Sen. John McCain (news, bio, voting record) took on the Senate's much maligned practice of inserting individual members' special projects, often without the knowledge of their colleagues, into larger spending bills.

The "Pork-Barrel Reduction Act," introduced Thursday by eight Republicans and two Democrats, is the latest in a rash of proposals promoting ways to restore integrity to the political process in the wake of lobbying and ethics scandals.

McCain's bill would allow senators to raise points of order against special projects, or earmarks, that are attached to spending bills without having been approved by the relevant committee. Under the procedure, which also applies to policy changes embedded in spending bills, 60 votes would be needed to override the point of order and keep the provision in the bill.

The measure also would require that earmarks be described in detail and the sponsor identified. House-Senate compromise bills would have to be made public at least 48 hours before the Senate considers them.

Critics of earmarks complain they are often put in bills only after the bills have passed the House or Senate, and that lawmakers are forced to vote on massive spending bills put together by House-Senate negotiators without knowing what's in them.

According to a Congressional Research Service study, the number of earmarks in spending, or appropriations, bills went from 4,126 in 1994 to 15,877 in 2005. The value of those earmarks doubled to $47.4 billion in the same period.

"It's a relatively recent phenomenon that members of Congress have begun to believe that their political support is only or largely determined by a number," Sen. John Sununu (news, bio, voting record), R-N.H., said of the desire of lawmakers to secure projects they can brag about back home.

The bill introduced by McCain, R-Ariz., is one of several to tackle the earmarks issue. Senate Rules Committee Chairman Trent Lott, R-Miss., and Sen. Dianne Feinstein (news, bio, voting record), D-Calif., have a similar bill, and Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., also has a plan.

In the House, Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi on Thursday wrote new Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, Thursday urging him to move on both lobbying and House procedural reform, including putting an end to secret earmarks and earmarks that fund activities in which the author has a financial interest.

"If we want to stay the majority as a party," said Sen. Lindsey Graham (news, bio, voting record), R-S.C., a cosponsor of the McCain bill, "we will reform the way we've been doing business the last few years or we will lose."

DOJ_NMG_0014151

McCain said the Jack Abramoff lobbying scandal, which has exposed the sometimes unsavory ties between lobbyists and members of Congress, has set the stage for passing legislation that can both make congressional procedures more open and deal with such issues as limiting gifts and travel arranged by lobbyists. "The Abramoff thing is a long way from over," he said.

Also on Thursday, Sens. John Kerry, D-Mass., and Ken Salazar, D-Colo., introduced a bill that would deny federal pension benefits to members of Congress convicted of bribery, conspiracy or other serious ethics offenses.

Just Say No To Earmarks (WSJ)

By Tom Coburn

The Wall Street Journal, February 10, 2006

John McCain and I recently delivered a letter to our colleagues announcing our intention to challenge every individual earmark on the floor of the Senate. Many senators, staff and reporters have asked if we are serious. The answer is yes.

I am convinced that forcing hundreds or, if necessary, thousands of votes to strike individual earmarks is the only way to produce meaningful results for American taxpayers. Bringing the Senate to a standstill for as long as it takes would be a small price to pay for shutting down what Jack Abramoff described as Congress's "earmark favor factory." The battle against pork is crucial. Pork is the root cause of the unholy relationship between some members of Congress, lobbyists and donors. Inside Congress, the pork process is effectively a black market economy: Thousands of instances exist where appropriations are leveraged for fundraising dollars or political capital. It is delusional to claim Congress can redeem its relationship with K Street without eliminating earmarks. The problem is not lobbyists. The problem is us.

Those who argue that fighting pork distracts members from the more costly challenge of entitlement reform don't understand human nature. Earmarks are a gateway drug on the road to the spending addiction. One day an otherwise frugal member votes for pork, the next day he or she votes for a bloated spending bill or entitlement expansion: A "no" vote might cut off their access to earmarks.

The most vocal opponents to a zero-tolerance approach toward pork are, sadly, the bipartisan leaders of the House and Senate. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, to his credit, has issued only a mild defense of earmarking by stating we should "mend, not end" the practice. Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid and House Speaker Denny Hastert, on the other hand, have been enthusiastic in their defense of pork. Sen. Reid offered a fictional account of American history when he said the pork process "has been going on since we were a country." He and other pork apologists ignore the reality that pork as we know it today didn't exist 20 years ago. In 1987, President Reagan vetoed a spending bill because it contained 121 earmarks. The number of earmarks has skyrocketed over the past decade, from 4,126 in 1994 to 15,268 in 2005, according to the Congressional Research Service.

Nowhere in our founding documents is a justification for today's out-of-control earmarking. In fact, Madison and the other framers were clear that the general welfare clause of the Constitution should never be construed as a blank check for Congress. Pork is a modern indulgence, not an ancient or noble tradition.

Speaker Hastert, for his part, has said pork is "what members do" and that members are best positioned to know where to put a "red light in their district." This vision of an imperial Congress, where urban planners in state and local governments can be usurped by individual congressman and their 20-something staffers, is unsettling. And every hour members spend on parochial obsessions is an hour they can't devote to oversight, balancing the budget or serious national security issues.

The American people are demanding real reform, not cosmetic measures that will clean the outside of the cup but leave the inside filthy. As Congress confronts its culture of corruption and our enormous fiscal challenges, it's time to "just say no" to earmarks.

Mr. Coburn is a Republican senator from Oklahoma.

Official Resigns Public TV Post (NYT)

By Stephen Labaton And Elizabeth Jensen

The New York Times, February 10, 2006

WASHINGTON, Feb. 9 — The top television executive at the Corporation for Public Broadcasting announced on Thursday that he would be stepping down. This is the latest in a string of departures of officials and consultants who played central roles in an effort by conservatives to bring what they viewed as more balance to public television and radio.

The executive, Michael Pack, controlled a $70 million production budget and was described by the official who hired him as a conservative Republican. He chose to resign after Patricia S. Harrison, the corporation's new president, forced him to decide between renewing his employment contract and exercising a soon-to-expire option that gives him $500,000 to produce a documentary.

DOJ_NMG_0014152

Ms. Harrison said the departures of Mr. Pack and a senior consultant, James Denton, were business decisions and were not part of any purge of ideologically driven officials. "You are connecting dots when there is no connection," she said in an interview. "I have not fired a single person since I came on board here."

But other officials in public broadcasting saw political overtones to the moves. Since being named president of the corporation last June, Ms. Harrison, a former co-chairwoman of the Republican National Committee, has attempted to tamp down a debate over balance in programming that has threatened to undermine financial support for public broadcasting from both Congress and private sources. Public broadcasting officials who had been at odds with the corporation said the personnel changes could shore up support among Republican moderates and Democrats, important traditional allies in budget fights.

"Pat Harrison appears to be trying to ratchet down some of the ideological orientation of the organization," said John Lawson, president of the Association of Public Television Stations.

"The best thing that C.P.B. can do now is stay out of the spotlight," Mr. Lawson added. "If changes in management at C.P.B. signal to Democrats and Republicans alike that C.P.B. will be nonpartisan and programming decisions will be made on a nonideological basis, that's a very positive development as we go about seeking support from Congress."

The White House this week proposed a cut of more than $100 million, or more than 25 percent, in the corporation's budget.

The corporation has faced tumult since last spring, when it was disclosed that Kenneth Y. Tomlinson, who was then its chairman, was pressing public broadcasters to correct what he and other conservatives saw as liberal bias. Mr. Tomlinson was forced to resign in November, after the corporation's inspector general found evidence that he had repeatedly broken federal law and the organization's own regulations. He remains the head of a separate agency, the Broadcasting Board of Governors, which oversees most government broadcasting operations abroad. Mr. Pack's departure followed the recent decision by Ms. Harrison not to renew the contract of Mr. Denton, who oversaw one of the corporation's largest projects: a $20 million documentary series called "America at a Crossroads" examining the nation's role in a post-9/11 world. (The New York Times has received financing for one program, "Indonesia: Battleground for the Soul of Islam," as part of that series.)

Mr. Denton, the son of Jeremiah Denton, a conservative Alabama Republican who served in the Senate in the 1980's, was seen by some documentary makers as advancing a conservative political agenda. In an interview, he disputed the complaints that he had sought to bring a conservative bent to programming, calling them "absurd."

Mr. Denton provoked a controversy last year when, at a forum on one of the corporation's largest initiatives, creating projects designed to teach history and civics to teenagers, he suggested to producers that they tell corporate partners the programs could be a "Trojan horse" to get their technology into the schools.

A third official involved in the effort to change the political direction of public broadcasting, William Schulz, submitted his resignation last month. Mr. Schulz, a conservative who once worked with Mr. Tomlinson at Reader's Digest, was one of the two men hired last year to serve as the corporation's ombudsmen, responsible for monitoring the balance of programs. He said in an interview that he had resigned because he had other projects that were interfering with his obligations to the corporation.

In an interview on Thursday afternoon, Ms. Harrison said the personnel moves had "nothing to do with politics or ideology."

"These are business decisions," she said. "It was not in the best interests of the corporation to extend or enhance Michael Pack's option to produce a program."

"In the case of Jim Denton, he did a great job," she added. "His contract was over in December."

Other broadcasting executives said that Ms. Harrison had heard complaints from producers that the "America at a Crossroads" and history and civics projects have moved too slowly and been disorganized.

Among other programming moves, he helped bring to public television a show featuring The Wall Street Journal's conservative editorial board and another whose host was Tucker Carlson, the conservative commentator.

Mr. Pack called "America at a Crossroads" "a good example of the way to bring diversity of views to public broadcasting across the political spectrum." With new voices and a mix of cultural and political topics, he said, "I hope it will be a model for how to bring a true diversity of opinion and in some ways get out of the left-right box."

Ex-Press Aide For NASA Offers Defense (NYT)

By Andrew C. Revkin

The New York Times, February 10, 2006

George C. Deutsch, the young NASA press aide who resigned on Tuesday amid claims that he had tried to keep the agency's top climate scientist from speaking publicly about global warming, defended himself publicly yesterday.

Speaking to a Texas radio station and then to The New York Times, Mr. Deutsch said the scientist, James E. Hansen, exaggerated the threat of warming and tried to cast the Bush administration's response to it as inadequate.

Mr. Deutsch also denied lying about having a college degree and trying to inject religion into some NASA Web presentations.

"I have never been told to censor science, to squelch anything or to insert religion into any issue," he told the radio reporter, Brian Cain.

Parts of that interview were posted on the Web site of WTAW-AM, in College Station (wtaw.com), where Mr. Deutsch attended Texas A&M University until he joined President Bush's campaign in 2004.

After seeing a transcript of some of the criticisms, Dr. Hansen said, "This is so wacky that it deserves little response."

In the radio interview, Mr. Deutsch also criticized others within NASA who supported Dr. Hansen's view that he was being suppressed. Leslie McCarthy, a public affairs officer who told The Times of several conversations in which Mr. Deutsch said his job was to "make the president look good," said she would not comment on his assertions.

"The House Science Committee is conducting an investigation because they were concerned and I'm just not prepared to stoop to his level," Ms. McCarthy said in a telephone interview last night.

Starting in late January with several interviews in The New York Times, Dr. Hansen, the director of NASA's Goddard Institute for Space Studies in Manhattan, and several career NASA public affairs officials and scientists complained about what they said were intensifying efforts by political appointees in NASA, including Mr. Deutsch, to control more closely his lectures and Web presentations.

Last Friday, after more NASA scientists and public affairs officers told The Times of other instances in which political appointees altered news releases or Web presentations in ways the workers said were tinged by politics, Michael D. Griffin, the NASA administrator, issued a "statement of scientific openness" to all NASA employees saying, "we have identified a number of areas in which clarification and improvements to the standard operating procedures of the Office of Public Affairs can and will be made."

Dr. Griffin also said "it is not the job of public affairs officers to alter, filter or adjust engineering or scientific material produced by NASA's technical staff."

The Times reported on Wednesday that contrary to his résumé on file with NASA, Mr. Deutsch, who is 24, never graduated from Texas A&M. Yesterday, in an interview with The Times, Mr. Deutsch said he had written the résumé in anticipation of graduating.

"When I left college," he said, "I did not properly update my résumé. As a result, it may appear misleading to some. However, I was up front with NASA about my undergraduate status when they hired me."

In an e-mail message, Mr. Deutsch said that remarks about religious views on the creation of the universe sent last October to a Web designer working on a presentation on Albert Einstein were "personal observations" and never were reflected in the material that was posted online.

"We are both Christians, and I was sharing with him my personal opinions on the Big Bang theory versus intelligent design," Mr. Deutsch wrote to The Times. "What I said about intelligent design did not affect the presentation of the Big Bang theory in the subsequent Einstein Web story. This is a very important point, because I have been accused of trying to insert religion into this story, which I was not trying to do."

Former NASA Spokesman Speaks Out (WTAW)

WTAW-AM, February 10, 2006

(posted 2/9/06) A controversy involving allegations of censorship at NASA has apparently led to the resignation of a public affairs officer at the agency. ...

George Deutsch Interview, Part 2

Click icon to hear part two of WTAW's exclusive interview with former NASA public affairs officer George Deutsch. ...

George Deutsch Interview, Part 3

Man Who Left NASA Says He's Under Attack (AP)

AP, February 10, 2006

COLLEGE STATION, Texas -- A staffer who resigned from NASA after he was accused of restricting access to a noted climate scientist said Thursday he was targeted because of his political ties.

George C. Deutsch, 24, resigned from the agency's public relations department earlier this week.

"What you do have is hearsay coming from a handful of people who have clear partisan ties and they are really coming after me as a Bush appointee," he told radio station WTAW. "I was an easy target. I was low-hanging fruit."

The New York Times reported Wednesday that Deutsch attempted to limit reporters' access to Jim Hansen, a noted NASA climate scientist, and insisted that a Web designer insert the word "theory" before any mention of the Big Bang.

Deutsch denied the allegations.

DOJ_NMG_0014154

"I have never been told to censor science, to squelch anything or to insert religion into any issue, absolutely not," said the former Bush campaign worker.

'Culture War' At NASA? (HC)

By Mark Carreau

Houston Chronicle, February 10, 2006

The young public affairs officer who resigned from NASA this week amidst controversy over his handling of communications on global warming charged on Thursday he's the victim of a politically motivated smear campaign.

George Deutsch, 24, a former Texas A&M University student who left the school to work on President Bush's 2004 re-election campaign, lashed back at those who accused him of scientific censorship.

He directed much of his wrath at James Hansen, a prominent NASA climatologist who complained in media reports that Deutsch was relying on Republican dogma to restrain scientifically motivated concerns about global warming.

'A very partisan agenda'"What is going on at NASA and throughout the federal government is a culture war," Deutsch said in a statement from his Washington-area home. "I quickly learned one thing: Dr. Hansen and his supporters have a very partisan agenda and ties reaching to the top of the Democratic Party."

In a telephone interview, Deutsch accused the space agency of too often showcasing Hansen as its expert on global warming, passing over other scientists whose views were not as alarming.

"If you don't have an idea that is in line with his agenda of global warming, if you don't have this sky-is-falling mentality, then you are considered the wacko," he charged.

Deutsch said he was especially appalled at what he characterized as an alliance between Hansen and Al Gore, the former Democratic presidential nominee who writes and speaks often on environmental issues.

Deutsch resigned from NASA late Tuesday after one year as a junior member of the agency's Washington public affairs staff. His departure came after a little-known Web site operated by a Texas A&M biochemistry graduate disclosed Deutsch's résumé falsely claimed an undergraduate degree from the school.

Hansen, NASA fire backOn Thursday, both Hansen, who directs climate research from the Goddard Institute for Space Studies in New York City, and NASA challenged the allegations by Deutsch.

"I have no idea where he got that idea. It would be the opposite of our credo about presenting all sides of a problem," Hansen wrote in an e-mail in response to the charge he tried to suppress opposing views.

Hansen also characterized himself as a moderately conservative independent who favors the positions of U.S. Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., on campaign finance reform and climate change.

Hansen's views on global warming were not favored over others, said Dean Acosta, chief spokesman for NASA administrator Michael Griffin. "I can tell you categorically that is not happening," said Acosta.

Deutsch acknowledged he'd erred in claiming an A&M degree on his résumé. He claimed he informed NASA that he lacked the math class he needed to complete the degree.

Politics Vs. Climate Reality (USAT)

USA Today, February 10, 2006

Would that the rise and fall of George C. Deutsch, 24, a NASA political appointee, could become a metaphor — one taken all the way to its logical conclusion — for the Bush administration's policies on global warming. Deutsch has for months embodied the White House's earth-is-flat take on why the earth is warming, with consequences from melting glaciers to freak weather.

Working in NASA's public relations, he tried to muzzle a renowned climate scientist who — like serious scientists the world over — warns that global warming is a threat requiring government intervention to curb emissions from cars, factories and more.

This furthered the business-friendly Bush administration's increasingly lonely mantra that the science isn't solid enough for more than voluntary measures. But scientific consensus long ago moved on. The issue now is not whether global warming is happening, but how severe the effects will be.

This week, evangelical Christians, normally among President Bush's most loyal supporters, broke with him on the issue and urged action: 86 prominent figures released a statement warning that “millions of people could die” because of global warming.

One casualty of all this was Deutsch, who resigned when it was discovered his résumé was longer on political loyalty — work on Bush's re-election campaign — than on education. Texas A&M University said he never received the journalism degree he claimed.

But that merely removed the symptom, not the underlying problem.

DOJ_NMG_0014155

That a low-level bureaucrat could overrule a prestigious scientist says worlds about how the administration balances politics against science. Further evidence can be found at the Food and Drug Administration, which has stifled overwhelming evidence that the “morning-after pill” is safe and effective. It blocked over-the-counter sales — a transparent payoff to abortion opponents.

Global warming is a good place to beginaltering that facts-be-damned approach. The administration has a ready-made environmental bandwagon to jump back onto. The world agreed in 1992 to prevent dangerous climate change. Countries have since worked on mandatory emissions curbs in what is known as the Kyoto Protocol, but Bush, as soon as he took office, turned his back on it.

Ignoring the impact of climate change is getting difficult: Federal officials are considering declaring the polar bear a threatened species because rising Arctic temperatures are melting the ice pack that's their home.

Now that scientific fact has spoken louder than ideology at NASA, perhaps the same can happen at the White House.

Backlash Brewing (WP)

By Al Kamen

The Washington Post, February 10, 2006

Deutsch's Potshot at Jayson Blair

Speaking of kids, it isn't that George C. Deutsch , 24, the NASA press aide who quit after it turned out he lied about being a Texas A&M University graduate, didn't have any press experience.

Deutsch earned his bit of fame last week when he was criticized for preventing reporters from talking to James E. Hansen , NASA's leading climate scientist, because, as the New York Times reported, Deutsch told colleagues his job was to "make the president look good." The non-college graduate also opined about the big-bang theory and said NASA should not discount "intelligent design by a creator."

Deutsch did attend the Texas university and did some writing for the Battalion, the student paper. In an opinion piece in 2003 when New York Times reporter Jayson Blair was unmasked as a fabricator, Deutsch wrote: "Blair's decisions and actions lacked ethics and integrity. As a reporter, he cared only about himself and furthering his career at the expense of the truth."

Unclear if Deutsch plans to re-enroll to finish his degree.

And Another Thing . . . (SSR)

Spokane (WA) Spokesman-Review, February 10, 2006

Don't they get it?

Outward appearances play such a role in politics that you'd expect the professionals in the field to show themselves in the best light at all times. If not every moment, at least when they're on center stage.

The U.S. House of Representatives moved conspicuously onto center stage for an ethical melodrama after former Majority Floor Leader Tom DeLay was indicted on federal conspiracy charges and super-lobbyist Jack Abramoff pleaded guilty to conspiracy, fraud and tax evasion. With more developments to come in both cases, there has been considerable talk about reform efforts to reduce the influence money and favors have over the lawmaking process – but little more than talk. The closest facsimile of action has been the election by House Republicans last week of Ohio Congressman John Boehner to replace DeLay.

No sooner had the outcome been announced, however, than it was remembered that in 1995, when Congress was considering elimination of tobacco subsidies, Boehner was going about on the House floor distributing tobacco lobbyists' campaign checks to select colleagues. Boehner, who's enjoyed his own share of lobbyists' hospitality, has called himself a reformer.

That was the case again this week after it was revealed that he rents a $1,600-a-month Capitol Hill basement apartment from longtime friend and lobbyist John D. Milne. And that some of Milne's clients have a direct interest in legislation Boehner has sponsored or managed through the legislative process.

It's important, of course, that Boehner's actions are legal and free of conflicts of interest, which he insists that they are. It's equally important, though, that the public have confidence in government, an attitude that's hard to sustain when questionable appearances keep raising suspicions.

Earth to NASA

Political operatives are boldly going where they've never gone before. The National Aeronautics and Space Administration is the latest battleground in the war between science and politics.

First, the agency's public information office was accused of censoring its scientists' findings on global warming. Then it imposed itself on the origins-of-the-universe debate.

DOJ_NMG_0014156

George Deutsch, a young intern from the Bush-Cheney campaign, landed a job at NASA after the election and kept right on campaigning. Instead of helping scientists communicate their findings, he decided to politicize them. Some scientists say their reports on global warming were watered down. Scientist James Hansen said the administration didn't want him giving speeches on the topic.

Deutsch also ordered that all mentions of "Big Bang" carry the word "theory" on the NASA Web site. That's not so bad, but his rationale was: "It is not NASA's place, nor should it be, to make a declaration such as this about the existence of the universe that discounts intelligent design by a creator – the other half of the argument."

We're guessing Deutsch was motivated by more than just science, but that's just a theory. Deutsch was dumped on Tuesday for lying on his resume. We hope NASA administrators can see that there was a bigger problem.

Academy To Referee Climate-Change Fight (WSJ)

By Antonio Regalado

The Wall Street Journal, February 10, 2006

Seeking to resolve a scientific dispute that has taken on a rancorous political edge, the National Academy of Sciences said it had agreed to a request from Congress to assess how well researchers understand the history of temperatures on earth.

The study by the academy, an independent advisory body based in Washington, will focus on the "hockey stick," a chart of past temperatures that critics say is inaccurate. The graph gets its name because of the sudden, blade-like rise of recent temperatures compared with past epochs.

The controversy took a sharp political turn in July when Rep. Joe Barton (R., Texas), head of the House Energy and Commerce Committee, launched a probe into the work of three climate specialists who generated the graph, including Michael Mann, now a professor at Pennsylvania State University.

Mr. Barton's inquiry drew a rebuke from several scientific societies as well as fellow Republican Sherwood Boehlert of New York, chairman of the House Committee on Science, who called it a blatant effort to intimidate global-warming researchers.

After Mr. Barton didn't respond to an offer to jointly bring the issue to the National Academy, Mr. Boehlert independently asked for a review in November, science committee chief of staff David Goldston said. "It appeared that the issue was not going to go away by itself. We thought this was an appropriate way to get an assessment of the science," Mr. Goldston said in an interview.

Larry Neal, deputy staff director for Mr. Barton's committee, said in a statement that because "combating climate change is a breathtakingly expensive prospect," it deserved closer study, and that the academy was "unlikely" to address all of Mr. Barton's concerns.

Mr. Barton has already sought a separate analysis of the hockey stick led by statistician Edward Wegman of George Mason University, people familiar with the matter said. Dr. Wegman couldn't be reached yesterday.

Using records stored in ice, tree rings, and coral reefs, scientists including Dr. Mann have estimated that current air temperatures exceed any in the past 1,000 years. Such findings are not only evidence for man-made global warming, but also underlie predictions of future temperature rises.

An 11-member academy panel will now study the accuracy and importance of such research, in particular the work of Dr. Mann, whose hockey-stick graph was included in a report issued by the United Nations in 2001. An academy spokesman said the report would be completed in about four months.

Dr. Mann's critics, including two amateur Canadian climate researchers, say his work contains serious inaccuracies. Dr. Mann has denied that, but the debate has prompted several climate researchers to take a fresh look at temperature reconstructions.

While some recent publications have found fault with the hockey stick and similar studies, others have sought to rebut critics.

The debate comes as many scientists express growing alarm over the warming trend. The planet has warmed more than one degree over the past century, and recent heating is widely blamed on greenhouse gases emitted by the burning of coal, oil and natural gas.

More than 150 countries have ratified the Kyoto Protocol, an international agreement to slash gas emissions by 2012. The U.S. hasn't signed the treaty, which the Bush administration has said is ineffective and would slow economic growth.

Write to Antonio Regalado at antonio.regalado@wsj.com1

More Vets Get Health Care, But 'Priority 8' Is Like Priority Zero (WP)

By Christopher Lee

The Washington Post, February 10, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0014157

Three years ago, then-Secretary Anthony J. Principi announced that the Department of Veterans Affairs was suspending health care enrollment for some higher-income veterans who did not have injuries or illnesses related to their military service.

The move to exclude "Priority 8" veterans was unpopular, but Principi said it was necessary to prevent the VA medical system from being swamped by the rising number of veterans who were eligible for care. At the time, about 6.8 million veterans were enrolled in the VA health system. Now more than 7.5 million are -- including 5.4 million who received treatment last year.

Others could not get in the door, however. More than a quarter-million "Priority 8" veterans who tried to sign up for VA health care coverage between January 2003 and October 2005 were turned away because of the new effort to rein in costs. The 263,257 veterans who were not allowed enroll included 5,459 veterans in Virginia, 3,051 in Maryland and 164 in the District of Columbia, according to figures the VA recently released.

There are 24.4 million veterans in the United States, and 16.9 million are not enrolled in the VA health care system. As many of 10 million of those not enrolled are Priority 8 veterans, the VA says. The annual household income cutoff for Priority 8 veterans varies by region. It was $57,500 for a veteran with three dependents who lived in Arlington or Fairfax counties, or in Montgomery or Prince George's counties.

Rep. Lane Evans (Ill.), ranking Democrat on the House Veterans Affairs Committee, called on the administration to increase the VA budget.

"There is no reason for the VA to give the cold shoulder to veterans who have served our country honorably," Evans said in a written statement.

Lisette Mondello, a VA spokeswoman, said the affected veterans could not enroll because they were not eligible. "We want to be clear that absolutely nobody is being cut from VA health care rolls and no veteran will be dis-enrolled from VA health care unless they specifically request it," Mondello wrote news organizations.

VERBATIM (WP)

The Washington Post, February 10, 2006

That Was Then

" During my stewardship here, I'm going to put everybody under oath when we have testimony, as we do on confirmation hearings."

Judiciary Committee Chairman
Arlen Specter, April 5, 2005

This Is Now

"It is my judgment that it is unnecessary to swear the witness."

Specter, declining to put Attorney General
Alberto R. Gonzales under oath, Feb. 6, 2006

GOP Senator Says Withhold Congress' Pay (AP-Y2)

By Andrew Taylor

AP2, February 10, 2006

A potential GOP presidential candidate has come up with a familiar way to cater to conservative core voters — bashing Congress.

Virginia Sen. George Allen (news, bio, voting record), a darling of conservatives, says lawmakers' paychecks should be withheld if they don't pass spending bills on time. He says that would solve the problem of larding spending into end-of-session bills that sometimes pass without anybody reading them.

Allen was to unveil the plan Thursday night before the CPAC convention, a gathering of conservative activists in Washington.

The senator said his so-called pay check penalty "provides powerful incentives for senators and congressmen to perform their jobs on time, with discipline."

Congress is supposed to pass spending bills by the Oct. 1 start of the budget year, but invariably fails to do so. Allen voted for every appropriations bill last year and the most recent "omnibus" appropriations bill in November 2004.

Keeping The Faith At The White House (CHIT)

Chicago Tribune, February 10, 2006

For all the hoopla surrounding cuts in Medicare and Medicaid spending, a quieter revolution is taking place in Washington: The advancement of “faith-based’’ social services.

DOJ_NMG_0014158

As President Bush signed a significant budget-cutting bill today with an audience of congressional leaders in the East Room of the White House, he signed into law protections for religious groups that spend federal money on the social services that they deliver.

Legal protection for many federally financed private groups to hire people of their choosing already had been provided by the Welfare Reform Act of 1996 signed by President Clinton. In the reauthorization of that act, Congress has extended that authority for programs operating under the $17-billion Temporary Assistance to Needy Families through 2010 and also has extended this "Charitable Choice" authority to his new Marriage and Fatherhood Program.

Bush signed all of this into law today as he approved a Deficit Reduction Act that will rein in the growth of Medicare and Medicaid. The choice provisions were added to the bill.

The act is expected to cut $6 billion from Medicare over five years, requiring wealthier recipients to pay higher premiums. In addition, Bush is asking Congress to trim $36 billion more from Medicare over the next five years in the 2007 budget that he is proposing, slowing the program's annual growth from 8.1 to 7.7 percent.

"One of the reasons for the success of welfare reform is a policy called charitable choice, which allows faith-based groups that provide social services to receive federal funding without changing the way they hire," Bush said. "Ten years ago, Congress made welfare the first federal program to include charitable choice. The bill I sign today will extend charitable choice for another five years, and expand it to the new healthy marriage and responsible fatherhood programs.

In the 2007 budget that Bush proposed this week - which calls for spending cuts throughout many federal agencies - the president is asking Congress to boost spending for his "faith-based initiatives."

Bush is asking Congress for $323 million for programs such as a "Compassion Capital Fund" of $100 million - with half of the fund earmarked for a program aimed at steering youth away from gang involvement, an initiative that First Lady Laura Bush is leading. Other programs include mentoring for children of prisoners ($40 million) and a "re-entry" program for 600,000 convicts returning to society this year ($60 million) as well as help for recovering drug addicts that 14 states and one Indian tribe are offering ($98 million).

That $323 million request represents a 36 percent increase in what is going to the president's faith-based initiatives this year, $236 million.

In addition, five federal agencies including the Department of Education and Health and Human Services increased their own grants to faith-based groups to $1.334 billion in 2004 - up 14 percent from the year before. Combined with grants from the U.S. Agency for International Development and Department of Agriculture, the overall 2004 spending was closer to $2 billion.

The White House is collecting data on all those agencies' grants in 2005 and plans to announce how they fared on March 9. Watch for another reported increase in spending.

Bush maintains the government can pay for these increases - as well as a much more costly 7 percent boost in defense spending ($18.5 billion) - while cutting spending elsewhere and preserving the tax cuts that the president won during his first few years in office.

"You will hear the argument during the budget debates -- you know -- all the noise coming out of Washington, that you need to raise taxes in order to balance the budget," Bush said earlier today in Manchester, N.H., making his first public pitch for his new budget. "I've been there long enough to tell you, that's not the way Washington works. They're going to raise your taxes and they're going to find new ways to spend your money."

With the way the White House is spending money on social services offered by faith-based groups, religious leaders have been concerned that federal money carries federal strings. They have sought protection in matters such as hiring for the private groups collecting federal money - groups that may restrict hiring to members of their own church, for instance.

A federal court recently ruled in favor of the faith-based groups' right to hire as they choose. The White House failed to win broad legislation for Charitable Choice in 2001 so has been working on the issue case by case. The act signed today represents the first chance Bush has had to sign choice into law for one of his programs, the marriage and fatherhood program.

"This represents a major development in the president's efforts to advance his faith-based initiative… For five years, this initiative has been blocked in Congress," said Jim Towey, director of the White Office of Community and Faith-Based Initiatives. "The story line that had been written - that the faith-based initiative has been blocked throughout his presidency - that story line has given way to a signature today."

Senate Confirms Ameriquest Founder As Ambassador (LAT)

By Jonathan Peterson, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, February 10, 2006

WASHINGTON — Roland E. Arnall is heading for Amsterdam.

DOJ_NMG_0014159

The Southern California mortgage-lending magnate was confirmed late Wednesday as U.S. ambassador to the Netherlands, 16 days after his Ameriquest Mortgage Co. agreed to pay $325 million to settle allegations of unfair lending practices by regulators in 49 states and the District of Columbia.

The uncontested Senate voice vote brought a peaceful end to a divisive, three-month confirmation process, in which Democrats led by Sen. Paul S. Sarbanes (D-Md.) had insisted that Ameriquest resolve the allegations against it before they would confirm Arnall.

"With Ameriquest's recent settlement with the attorneys general over its mortgage lending practices, Sen. Sarbanes did not object to moving forward on this nomination," said Jesse Jacobs, a spokesman for Sarbanes.

Arnall's loyalists were ebullient at the vote, which came as an anticlimactic finale to a process in which the media-shy billionaire had been subjected to a public grilling. Supporters, including business associates and some civil rights activists, had said throughout the debate that he would be an effective diplomat.

"We are pleased that Mr. Arnall's nomination to be the ambassador to the Netherlands has been confirmed by the United States Senate," Adam J. Bass, Ameriquest's vice chairman and a nephew of Arnall, said in a statement Thursday. "We take great pride in knowing that our company's founder will be representing our country abroad and know he will serve with honor and distinction."

Some of Arnall's critics, however, decried his appointment: "I find it unbelievable that the reward for settling this case is not jail avoidance but being named ambassador to another country by the United States," said Ira Rheingold, general counsel of the National Assn. of Consumer Advocates.

Arnall was not available for comment.

The 66-year-old Holmby Hills resident emerged in recent years as a major Republican financier, directly or indirectly helping raise more than $12 million for President Bush and Republican activities.

Arnall turned Orange-based Ameriquest into a major national lender by tailoring home loans to people with weak credit histories and other problems that limit their options in traditional credit markets. In October, he resigned his positions with the firm to comply with State Department ethics requirements for ambassadors. His wife, Dawn, retained her posts with Ameriquest and its related companies.

While Ameriquest's fortunes soared under Arnall's leadership, complaints that some of its employees engaged in unfair lending practices — pressuring borrowers to refinance loans with costly terms, for example, or surprising borrowers with unexpected fees at closing — drew the attention of state regulators.

Under the Jan. 23 settlement, Ameriquest promised to take steps to safeguard consumers.

That deal cleared most of the roadblocks to Arnall's confirmation. Republicans brought the matter up Wednesday night, and with no objection and no debate, Arnall became an ambassador.

Special correspondent Mike Hudson contributed to this report.

OTHER NEWS:

Jobless Claims Fall To 6-Year Low (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 10, 2006

WASHINGTON -- A closely watched barometer of joblessness fell to its lowest reading in nearly six years, offering further proof that so far this year the labor market is improving along with the economy.

The Labor Department said the number of workers filing initial unemployment claims last week was 277,000, a figure that pushed the more telling four-week moving average of jobless claims down to 276,500, its lowest level since April 2000.

The claims data provide the latest bit of evidence that strong economic activity is improving conditions for workers. Last week, the Labor Department released figures showing that the economy added 687,000 jobs over the past three months, pushing the unemployment rate down to 4.7%, its lowest mark since July 2001. Moreover, hourly wages rose 3.3% over the past year, the fastest growth rate in nearly three years.

Many analysts are convinced that readily improving labor conditions, in tandem with other robust economic indicators, will lead the Federal Reserve to raise the federal-funds rate by another quarter point to 4.75% next month in an effort to tamp down inflationary pressures on prices and wages.

"They're going to view the tightening labor market as a sign of inflation worries to come," said Gina Martin, an economist at Wachovia Corp. in Charlotte, N.C. "We think they're going to go up to 5% in May and then stop there for the rest of the year."

Separately, U.S. wholesale inventories climbed during December at twice the pace expected, even as sales rebounded and increased at the same rate as stocks.

DOJ_NMG_0014160

Wholesale inventories rose by 1.0% to a seasonally adjusted $362.48 billion, the Commerce Department said Thursday. November inventories increased by 0.5%, revised from a 0.4% climb. Wholesale sales rose by 1.0% to a seasonally adjusted $314.91 billion. That followed a 0.7% decrease in November, which was unrevised. The inventory-to-sales ratio held steady at 1.15. The ratio measures how many months it would take for a company to deplete its current inventory.

Overall inventories held by U.S. businesses -- wholesalers, manufacturers and retailers -- increased in the final quarter of 2005 after six months of liquidation. The latest government report on gross domestic product said companies elevated stockpiles by $25.7 billion in the fourth quarter, after decreases of $13.3 billion in the third quarter and $1.7 billion in the second.

Year over year, wholesale inventories were up by 6.7% in December, while sales were 8.3% higher than the level in December 2004.

Inventories of durable goods -- meant to last three or more years -- rose 0.6% in December, after increasing 0.8% in November. Durable goods sales went up 1.3%, after falling by 0.2% in November. The 0.6% increase in durable goods inventories was led by growth in stocks of autos, up 1.2%. Driving up sales of durables were the auto sector, up 1.8%, and professional equipment, 2.5% higher.

Inventories of non-durable goods rose 1.6% in December, after inching up 0.1%. The increase in non-durables was the biggest since a climb at an equal rate in April 2001. Non-durable sales increased by 0.7% after declining 1.3%. Petroleum sales rose 4.4% in December.

Dow Rises On Jobs, Earnings Reports (USAT)

USA Today, February 10, 2006

NEW YORK — Stocks were mostly higher Thursday as a six-year low in unemployment claims and strong corporate earnings encouraged investors. However, the momentum sagged in late-afternoon trading as uncertainty about the economy resurfaced.

While weekly first-time jobless claims rose slightly, Wall Street was encouraged that the Labor Department said the four-week moving average fell to its lowest since April 2000.

Positive earnings news from Best Buy, Aetna and Marriott International also encouraged buyers. However, with longer-term questions remaining about the housing market, the economy, interest rates, oil prices and geopolitics, analysts question whether the trend higher could continue.

“Right now, it's like an absence of bad news is being treated as good news,” says Hans Olsen, managing director and chief investment officer at Bingham Legg Advisers.

The Dow Jones industrial average rose 24.73 points to 10,883.35 after gaining 108.86 points Wednesday. The Standard & Poor's 500 index fell 1.87 points to 1263.78, and the Nasdaq composite dropped 11.11 points to 2255.87.

Best Buy gained $4.13 to $52.96. The electronics retailer raised its forecast for fourth-quarter earnings. Aetna climbed $3.15 to $99.27. The insurer reported fourth-quarter net income up 41% to $423 million and boosted its 2006 outlook. Marriott added $1.53 to $67.64 after it said fourth-quarter earnings rose 25% to $237 million and increased its 2006 forecast.

·Whole Foods Market fell $6.78 to $65.27. The top U.S. natural and organic foods retailer posted a quarterly profit just shy of Wall Street expectations.

·Martin Marietta Materials climbed $4.92 to $94.07. The company posted a strong fourth-quarter profit and issued an earnings forecast well beyond Wall Street expectations.

·Brinks slid $5.03 to $48.80. The security company said its fourth-quarter profits, which missed analysts' forecasts, were “disappointing.”

·NightHawk Radiology closed at $20.65, up 29% from the $16 at which the company sold 6.3 million shares in an initial public offering. NightHawk employs radiologists in Switzerland and Australia to read X-rays in the off-hours of U.S. health care providers.

·EResearch Technology tumbled $3.26, or 18%, to $14.50. The health care technology company's profit forecasts were lower than expected.

Dow Industrials Build On Rally (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 10, 2006

A stock rally lost steam in the final hours Thursday, tripping up the Dow Jones Industrial Average as it made another push toward 11000, though the industrials still finished up for the day.

The market started to pull back just after the Dow industrials crossed 10950, which has proven to be a tough obstacle for stocks, said Todd Leone, head of listed trading at SG Cowen. "Every time we get near there, we fade," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0014161

Remarks from Michael Moskow, president of the Federal Reserve's Chicago branch, also took the air out of stocks. Mr. Moskow said inflation is currently at "the upper end" of his comfort zone, and that monetary policy may have to be tightened further if inflation expectations keep rising.

The Fed official's speech before the Risk Management Association in Chicago, which didn't say anything remarkably surprising about interest rates, put "a bit of fright into the market," said Larry Peruzzi, senior equity trader at Boston Company Asset Management.

While stocks had a good run Wednesday, when the industrials rose more than 100 points, the market has been dour this month. The lackluster action could be a sign that stocks are on a downward trend that could last months, said Steven Shobin, chief investment strategist at AmeriCap Advisers. One sign of a market top, he said, is weakness in former leaders, such as the energy sector.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average, up as much as 94 points earlier, gained just 24.73 points to 10883.35. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index fell 1.89 to 1263.76 and the Nasdaq Composite Index slid by 11.11 to 2255.87.

Stocks rallied early, extending Wednesday's triple-digit Dow gain thanks to a strong earnings report from Aetna and Marriott International, as well as upbeat guidance from Best Buy.

An auction of $14 billion in 30-year Treasury bonds -- the first "long bond" sale in five years -- was met with robust demand. A little more than half of the bids were at the highest price. Indirect bidders snapped up 65% of the total, indicating there was a strong appetite for U.S. debt from foreign buyers.

Longer-dated bonds rose after the results of the auction were released at about 1 p.m. Eastern. The current 30-year bond, auctioned in February 2001, gained 16/32 point, or $5 for each $1,000 invested, to yield 4.645%. The new long bond, which begins trading tomorrow, will yield 4.5%. The benchmark 10-year note finished slightly higher, yielding 4.54%.

American International Group gained 1.1% as investors expressed relief that the company's skirmish with regulators is behind it. AIG agreed to a $1.64 billion settlement7 with the Securities and Exchange Commission and New York authorities over alleged accounting improprieties. The insurance provider said the deal should result in a $1.15 billion after-tax charge for the fourth quarter.

Light, sweet crude rose seven cents to $62.62 a barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange. Comex gold futures for April, which fell nearly $20 an ounce Tuesday, jumped $14.30 to $568.10.

In major market action:

Stocks were mixed8. On the New York Stock Exchange, where 1.8 billion shares traded, 1,728 stocks rose and 1,615 fell. On the Nasdaq Stock Market, where 2.3 billion shares traded, 1,378 rose and 1,642 declined.

Bonds advanced9. The benchmark 10-year Treasury note gained 1/32, or 31 cents per $1,000 invested, to yield 4.541%. The 30-year bond rose 1/32 to yield 4.675%. Yields move inversely to prices.

The dollar slipped.10 It traded at 118.50 yen, down from 118.53 yen late Wednesday, while the euro rose to $1.1959 from $1.1951.

Bernanke The Inflation Fighter (WSJ)

By Tim Annett

The Wall Street Journal, February 10, 2006

Economists have some advice for Ben Bernanke as he takes over at the Federal Reserve: establish your credibility as an inflation fighter.

But, at the same time, they have concern that he could take that effort too far. When asked in the latest WSJ.com forecasting survey which mistake Mr. Bernanke is more likely to make -- raising rates too much or not enough -- three-quarters of economists said he is more likely to lift rates too high.

The new Fed chief faces the same puzzle that always confronts the Fed: how to check inflation without lifting rates so high that economic growth is snuffed out. But the challenge is especially acute now. Soaring energy prices have nudged up inflation pressures at the same time the Fed has been steadily lifting rates. Now, Mr. Bernanke must pick the right time to stop the increases.

The matter could be further complicated because some have questioned Mr. Bernanke's resolve on price stability. Four years ago, he made comments about using loose money to fend off a very different threat: deflation.

Today, there is pressure on Mr. Bernanke to keep tightening. Sixty-one percent of the economists said it's more important for Mr. Bernanke to establish his anti-inflation credentials than it is to avoid overshooting on rates.

"It's hard to put the inflation genie back in the bottle," said Michael P. Niemira, chief economist for the International Council of Shopping Centers. "If you raise rates a little too much, it's much easier to go back."

DOJ_NMG_0014162

On average, the economists expect the federal-funds rate, charged on overnight loans between banks, to be 4.75% by June and to remain at that level through year-end. That suggests the Bernanke Fed would raise the funds rate from its current 4.5% and then halt the string of increases embarked upon in June 2004, when the funds rate sat at a 46-year low of 1%.

Some economists think the central bank will be more aggressive than the average forecast suggests: 22 predict the funds rate will be 5% by June. But only four see the Fed moving beyond 5% this year, and 10 expect policy makers to reverse course and trim rates in the second half. David Rosenberg of Merrill Lynch thinks the Fed is done tightening and that it will cut rates by a full point, to 3.5%, by December.

Eyes on Prices

Inflation as measured by the Labor Department's consumer-price index is forecast to diminish this year: the economists predict the CPI will increase 3% in annual terms in May but only 2.4% in November. The CPI was up 3.4%, year over year, in December 2005, the last month for which data are available.

Just over half of the economists surveyed said energy prices will be the most important factor in determining the inflation rate this year. But while economists lifted their forecasts for oil prices from the levels they predicted in a survey conducted in December, the economists said they don't expect oil to reach a level that would stoke significant increases in overall inflation.

ABOUT THE SURVEY

The Wall Street Journal surveys a group of more than 50 economists throughout the year. Broad surveys on more than 10 major economic indicators are conducted semiannually, at midyear and at year-end. Between each semiannual survey, four monthly updates are conducted for the most closely watched forecasts. This is the monthly survey for February. For prior installments of the semiannual and monthly surveys, see: WSJ.com/Economist3.

Although oil prices have soared over the past year, businesses generally haven't passed their higher energy costs on to their customers in the form of higher prices. The economists predicted that crude oil would need to be sustained at around $80 a barrel in order for businesses to be compelled to do so and for that to cause a significant increase in inflation pressures across the economy.

Economists predicted crude-oil futures prices would stand at around $62 a barrel in June, compared with the $56.29 they forecast in a survey conducted in December. Today, crude oil for delivery next month stands at around $63.

Oil's price is less significant than how the Fed responds to it, according to Neal Soss of Credit Suisse First Boston. "The monetary policy response to a rise in the oil price is the relevant factor that would help determine the extent of pass-through by businesses and any subsequent inflation pressure across the economy," he said.

First-Quarter Bounce

The Commerce Department said last month that gross domestic product, the broadest measure of U.S. economic output, grew at an annual rate of 1.1% during the final quarter of 2005. That was substantially slower than the 4.1% rate of growth that was reported for the third quarter.

But the weak reading hasn't rattled the economists. Fifty-six percent said the report doesn't worry them because they believe that any weakness has since passed. Thirteen percent believe the data will be revised to show a stronger rate of growth (the government will issue two more readings on fourth-quarter GDP). Only four economists say the report heralds a weakening expansion.

The economists foresee growth rebounding sharply during the first three months of 2006, clocking in at a 4.3% annual rate, up from the 3.6% rate of growth that they forecast in the last survey and the highest average forecast since economists were first asked for first-quarter predictions in May.

Mr. Niemira said the first quarter should be a "reactive quarter" where many of the categories that were weak at the end of 2005, such as consumer spending and the trade balance, rebound. But he worries the consumer is facing strains, such as mild job growth, that could pinch spending, and thus the economy, down the road.

The economists expect growth to taper somewhat as the year wears on, to a 3.3% rate in the second quarter, a 3.1% rate in the third quarter, and a 3% rate in the fourth quarter. They see only a 15% chance of a recession over the next 12 months.

Risks to Growth

When asked about their biggest worry for the U.S. outlook this year, 38% said they were most concerned about a weakening housing market. A slowdown in consumer spending ranked as the top concern for 23% of the economists, while three said they were wary of a possible slowdown in business outlays.

On a broader scale, 48% said that an energy-price shock posed the most danger for the global economy in 2006, while 23% view terrorism as the greatest potential threat to global growth.

Among other findings in the survey:

DOJ_NMG_0014163

· The economists expect the spread between short- and long-term interest rates to remain tight. They predict the yield on the three-month Treasury bill will be 4.71% in June and 4.67% in December, while they expect the yield on the 10-year note to be 4.79% in June and 4.88% in December.

· Nonfarm business productivity is expected to grow 2.4% in 2006, on average. Productivity, or output per hours worked, rose 2.7% during 2005, though it fell 0.6% during the fourth quarter.

Life After Fed Proves Tricky For Greenspan (FT)

By Richard Beales And Jennifer Hughes In New York And Andrew Balls In Washington

Financial Times, February 10, 2006

Barely a week after leaving the US Federal Reserve, Alan Greenspan has been reminded how tricky life can be in the private sector for a man revered as the world's greatest former central banker.

His comments at a Wall Street dinner on Tuesday rippled through currency and bond market trading rooms on Thursday, drawing comment not just on what he did - or maybe didn't - say but whether he should have said anything at all.

The remarks, during a talk for bankers and top hedge fund clients of Lehman Brothers, were interpreted as relatively hawkish on the US interest rate outlook, and contributed to a modest rise in the dollar and a decline in Treasury prices. Earlier on Tuesday Mr Greenpan spoke by video link to a Tokyo conference organised by CLSA, the Asian investment banking unit of Credit Agricole.

According to one person who was present at the dinner, Mr Greenspan made upbeat comments on the short-term outlook for the US economy, while noting the uncertainty over the slowdown in the housing market and how its impact on consumer spending would not be known for six months.

"By 7.30am, two people [from Lehman] had called us," said Anthony Karydakis, chief fixed income strategist at JPMorgan Asset Management. "Greenspan qualified his remarks in a number of ways, but people tried to keep only the soundbites," said Mr Karydakis, who did not attend the dinner.

Mr Greenspan, according to the person present, also said there was plenty of liquidity in global financial markets that was supporting activity, and that the low level of long-term interest rates, as a result of global economic forces, may have muted the impact of the Fed's interest rate increases since June 2004 to some degree. He also talked about the dangers posed to the US and global economies by a rise in protectionism.

While these are familiar themes that Mr Greenspan discussed in public before leaving the Fed, some observers suggested he would have done better to defer his appearances at least until next week when Ben Bernanke, the new chairman, is due to present the central bank's twice-yearly monetary policy report to the US Congress for the first time. "I'm surprised he encroached on the blackout," said one trader.

Others questioned Mr Greenspan's willingness to speak to a small audience of hedge fund luminaries such as Stanley Druckenmiller of Soros Fund Managment. "I thought it was somewhat innopportune on Greenspan's part to go to a forum that he knew could cause ripples," said Mr Karydakis. "It was inevitable, and Greenspan should have known that. If he didn't, he could be accused of naivete."

An associate of Mr Greenspan declined to comment on his appearance at the dinner or the content of his remarks. The Fed also declined to comment, saying the central bank no longer spoke on behalf of its former chairman. "Board members who complete their term may meet with and speak to groups without restriction provided they reveal no confidential information," a spokesman said.

Will Lawyers Get Hung Up In Quest For Cell Phone Records? (LAW)

By Tresa Baldas, The National Law Journal

National Law Journal, February 10, 2006

The sale of cell phone records over the Internet -- a hot topic that recently spurred litigation, legislation and a federal investigation -- has more than a few lawyers nervous.

Attorneys are among the top customers of the controversial Web sites, according to private investigators, privacy advocates and Web site operators who sell the phone records.

"Let's put it this way, the legal profession is keeping it alive," said Rob Douglas, a former private eye turned security consultant who has helped the Federal Trade Commission investigate and prosecute online operators that sell phone records.

"I've investigated them with the federal government and in private lawsuits ... and in every single case, the overwhelming majority of users of these companies are attorneys," Douglas said.

DOJ_NMG_0014164

These attorneys include divorce lawyers, who want to know who feuding spouses are talking to; business lawyers, who want to know who their clients' competitors are talking to; and employment lawyers, who want to know if employees are selling any trade secrets.

The online data industry has come under intense scrutiny in recent months, triggering private lawsuits and federal and state investigations.

In the last two weeks, four wireless carriers -- Cingular, Verizon, Sprint Nextel and T-Mobile -- have filed lawsuits against Web site operators for allegedly using trickery to obtain customers' phone records. State attorneys general in Illinois and Missouri filed similar lawsuits against rogue Internet operators in January, while Texas said it was investigating such Web sites. Illinois v. First Information Specialist, No. 2006CH29 (Sangamon Co., Ill., Cir. Ct.).

The FTC is investigating 40 Web sites that were named defendants in a complaint filed by the Electronic Privacy Information Center, a Washington nonprofit privacy advocacy group. And on Capitol Hill, three lawmakers in recent weeks introduced bills to outlaw the sale of phone lists. The U.S. House Energy and Commerce Committee held a hearing last week to determine how widespread the problem of cell phone data theft is, and whether or not the cell phone industry is doing enough to protect customers' records from data burglars.

Given all the controversy surrounding the sale of cell phone records, attorneys were reluctant to comment on the subject. Of the more than a dozen divorce, business and criminal defense attorneys contacted for this story, none said they used the tactic. Most wouldn't even talk about the subject. One lawyer said, "Good luck finding anyone to admit to it."

Attorney Paul Murphy, a business litigator with Murphy Rosen & Cohen in Santa Monica, Calif., said he has sometimes used people-finder Web sites for as little as $10 a search to help locate potential witnesses involved in business disputes. But he never tried to get cell phone records, he said, adding that he was unaware that such Web sites even existed until about a month ago.

"The interesting thing now is that other lawyers are being made aware of this," Murphy said, noting that some attorneys might now be tempted to try it. "It can be a very valuable tool to try to get information to see who's calling people ... but it does concern me that this could violate people's privacy."

Jay Patel, manager of www.abika.com, one of the 40 Web sites named in the FTC complaint, defended the sale of cell phone records over the Internet, calling it a legitimate business tool for the legal profession and law enforcement. "Many of the searches are used by lawyers, private investigators, bail bond agents, law enforcement and even some government agencies use the searches. Many people who have been victim[s] of fraud use the searches," Patel said. "There have been many cases where searches have helped people prove they're innocent or save themselves from harm."

Patel, however, recently stopped selling cell phone records, saying "after the media coverage there was such a huge demand for these searches that anybody and everybody started requesting it. This made it hard to vet the ones with a legitimate need or not ... To tell you the truth, many people started practically begging for it."

Another Web site named in the FTC complaint, www.locatecell.com, also recently stopped providing cell phone searches, but only on customers of Cingular Wireless, T-Mobile and Verizon, which, along with the states of Illinois and Missouri, are suing the site's owners over the sale of phone records.

A lawyer representing the operators of locatecell.com, Philip L. Schwartz of the Law Offices of P.L. Schwartz in Boca Raton, Fla., did not return calls seeking comment.

Meanwhile, several lawyers and privacy experts argue that the law is gray in the area of cell phone privacy, noting that there is no statute on the books that criminalizes getting or selling phone records.

"Are cell phone records private? We probably all assumed that they were, but the answer is probably to the contrary. We probably have some privacy interest but it's not protected by common law or statute," said Harold J. Krent, dean of the Chicago-Kent College of Law. Krent noted that given the vagueness of the law, attorneys who obtain cell phone records via the Internet are not doing anything illegal or unethical.

Washington attorney Frank Morris, with Epstein Becker & Green, who advises companies on privacy matters, noted that the "problem right now is that there are no rules." Morris said he has never tried to get cell phone records via the Internet, but has heard of other lawyers doing it. "There does seem to be a lot of smoke around it."

Conservatives Unsettled About Movement's Future (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney And David D. Kirkpatrick

The New York Times, February 10, 2006

WASHINGTON, Feb. 9 — Despite the triumph of placing two conservatives on the Supreme Court within four months, leaders of the conservative movement these days seem less celebratory than divided.

DOJ_NMG_0014165

Heading into a midterm Congressional election in which the enthusiasm of conservative advocates could play a vital role in determining how Republicans fare, conservative leaders face internal rifts over polarizing issues and are dogged by a sense that a Republican-led Congress and a Republican president are not taking the nation in the proper direction on some critical matters, party leaders said.

The fissures were evident as members gathered here on Thursday for the first day of the annual Conservative Political Action Conference. The first session was marked by disagreement over whether to support a White House plan to allow some illegal immigrants to work legally within the United States and challenges to the legality of the Bush administration's program of eavesdropping without warrants on communications between Americans in the United States and people abroad who might have links to terrorism.

In interviews, conservative leaders emphasized their admiration for President Bush, and said they were heartened by the placement of Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. on the Supreme Court. But they made it clear that that was not enough.

The leaders expressed concern about the loyalty of elected Republicans in Washington to the conservative agenda, complained about the growth of spending in Mr. Bush's latest budget and said they were uncertain, at a time when Congressional Republicans are squirming under the glare of a corruption inquiry, of the future of the movement.

"The degree to which the conservative movement is dissatisfied is very real," said Newt Gingrich, the former House speaker, who will give the closing speech at the conference on Saturday. "Conservatism is at its biggest crossroads since Reagan was nominated in 1980."

Senator Sam Brownback, a conservative Republican from Kansas, said, "They are feeling good as far as the judiciary is concerned. There is a strong feeling that one of the things that we campaigned on is coming through. But people are concerned about spending. And there is a strong feeling that immigration needs to be gotten under control."

David Keene, the chairman of the American Conservative Union, said, "There is some frustration, and some belief that both the president and folks in Congress have forgotten what it is we want done, what it is that gets us behind them."

The sentiments — coming on the 25th anniversary of the inauguration of President Ronald Reagan — reflect the strains that this diverse and powerful political coalition faces while Mr. Bush struggles to regain his political clout and House Republicans try to settle down after the departure of Representative Tom DeLay of Texas as majority leader. It was also evidence, coming after the Supreme Court victories, of what even some conservatives said was the difficulty of sating their segment of the electorate.

Paul Weyrich, chairman of the Free Congress Foundation and a founder of the modern conservative movement, said he was fielding a host of messages from conservatives complaining about White House policies on immigration, spending and the war in Iraq.

"If I just went by what I am getting on a daily basis," Mr. Weyrich said, "I would say that Republican nervousness is justified."

Some conservatives scoffed at the dissatisfaction, saying that the Supreme Court accomplishment alone established a conservative legacy for Mr. Bush that would reshape the country.

"The last 12 months have been a very good year," said Grover G. Norquist, a conservative with close ties to the White House. "For all the talk about DeLay, Katrina, government spending too much, dah-dah, dah-dah, dah-dah — excuse me: Roberts. Alito. So as much as people want to say, 'I didn't get X, Y and Z,' I say, 'Roberts and Alito.' "

Republicans in Congress said they were aware of conservative disappointment with them, particularly regarding spending and the continued growth in the size of government.

"Spending is our Achilles heel," said Senator Lindsey Graham, Republican of South Carolina. "The one issue that I find we are the weakest on is we have been in change of this government 10 years and it is growing too much. If we don't show spending control, it is a bust."

Senator Tom Coburn, Republican of Oklahoma and a conservative champion when elected in 2004, said Mr. Bush's 2007 budget, while a start, was "not good enough."

"I believe he should have made a request for the American people to sacrifice," Mr. Coburn said. "There are plenty of things to trim, and the president needs to lead on that."

Some conservatives were scornful of White House efforts to allow at least some illegal immigrants to work legally in this country, and some challenged the legality of Mr. Bush's surveillance program, saying that it was an abuse of presidential power and that Mr. Bush should come to the Congress and ask for authority to allow it.

"Think hard down the road to a future administration not occupied by the people we have now," said Bob Barr, a former congressman from Georgia. "We have to keep that precedent in mind: That gauntlet, if we throw it down, will be taken up by someone in the future that we really don't like and be used against us."

Mr. Graham said many conservatives like himself were troubled by the administration's arguments for its program to eavesdrop on communications. "The inherent power argument, if you take it to the natural conclusion, there is no role for Congress in a time of war," he said.

Vice President Dick Cheney drew restrained applause Thursday night when he offered a defense of the surveillance program at a dinner of conservative leaders, reflecting the ambivalent feeling among many conservatives toward the program.

America At A Crossroads (WT)

By Newt Gingrich

The Washington Times, February 10, 2006

For over three decades now, American history has been written on the right. The crossroads confronted by conservatives have been America's crossroads, and the path forward charted by conservatives has consistently been the path of the nation. Today, America, and therefore conservatives too -- stand at another crossroads, with another set of historic choices that will determine whether we leave our children and grandchildren a country as safe, prosperous and free as the country our parents and grandparents fought and worked to give us.

Throughout the 1970s, Ronald Reagan argued that the choice faced by Americans was not between left and right but between up and down -- down toward "the totalitarianism of the ant heap" or up toward "that shining city on a hill."

In the 1990s, conservatives again spoke to the hopes of a broad majority of Americans. The choice then, as we framed it, was between the arrogance and stagnation bred of 40 years of one-party congressional government or restoring the bonds of trust between the people and their elected representatives.

Today, the world has been freed of Soviet totalitarianism but faces a more committed fascist-like threat from the irreconcilable wing of Islam. At home, welfare reform has proved that even the poorest Americans can make their own futures, but other government programs continue to make people worse off the longer they stay in them. For example, children covered by Medicaid are nearly six times more likely to be treated for severe obesity than are children with private insurance.

As before, our choices aren't necessarily easy, but they are simple. One path leads backward to decline and defeat. It is the path of government dependence at home and American surrender abroad. It is the path led by the rich and powerful who stood and applauded the president's State of the Union admission that Congress failed to pass a plan to save Social Security. It is the path of those who put party politics above controlling our borders; who embrace the easy illusion of protectionism over the hard work of competition. The path of those who would surrender self-government to the rule of judges and exchange property rights for government confiscation, religious freedom for sterile secularism, and freedom of speech for supposed campaign finance reform.

The other path is the way forward, toward winning the future. What does it mean to "win the future"? It means to chart a course, as Ronald Reagan once said, that "will preserve for our children this, the last best hope of man on earth." It is the path of limited, effective government at home and an unapologetic defense of American values abroad.

The way forward will be led by those who understand that the problem in Washington isn't merely Jack Abramoff; it's a government so powerful and bloated that a special-interest group would decide it is worth their while to spend $80 million to hire Jack Abramoff. It is the path of those who believe a balanced budget is not only a financial imperative, but is a moral imperative because massive government is inherently corrupting. And the way forward is the path of those who know that true compassion lies in not sacrificing the well-being of the poor for the well-being of the bureaucracy; of those who understand that there is something profoundly wrong when the federal government's largest single health program makes poor children less, not more, healthy.

All of Western civilization joins America at this crossroads. Abroad, the path of defeat and decline is followed by those who would censor our civilization on behalf of the fascist tyrants of the irreconcilable wing of Islam. It is seen in the pathetic weakness of governments that accept lectures on tolerance from theocrats who oppress women and outlaw all religions but their own. It is the path of those who would prop up Hamas with financial contributions while Hamas remains committed to terrorism and the destruction of Israel; those who ignore Iran's genocidal intentions, despite the clarity of its leader's rhetoric; and those who would abandon the people of Iraq to butchers, bombers and beheaders.

There is a better way -- a way forward toward a future that defends American values and preserves American civilization. The path toward winning America's future abroad begins with a few simple but resolute steps. Formally protest the lack of freedom of religion in Saudi Arabia. Isolate Hamas until it renounces terrorism and the destruction of Israel. Demand complete onsite inspections of nuclear facilities in Iran. Support Iranian democrats. Force the Syrians to stop aiding terrorists in Iraq. Withdraw American troops from Iraq as victory permits, not as advocates of appeasement demand.

DOJ_NMG_0014167

Twice before we've stood at the crossroads, and twice before conservatives have led the way forward to greater safety, prosperity and freedom for all Americans. Today, the stakes are higher than ever before. Our fellow Americans are once again looking to conservatives and asking this question: What are you doing to win the future?

Former House Speaker Newt Gingrich is a senior fellow at the American Enterprise Institute and author of "Winning the Future: A 21st Century Contract with America."

Anti-war Mom Sheehan Will Not Run For Senate (REU-Y2)

Reuters, February 10, 2006

Cindy Sheehan, the anti-Iraq war activist whose son was killed in the conflict there, put an end to speculation on Thursday that she would launch a long-shot bid to become a U.S. senator from California.

Sheehan, speaking in front of San Francisco City Hall, said she would not run for the office.

"If I thought that running for Senate would bring our young people home more quickly I would do it in a minute, but I am not convinced that that would do so," Sheehan said.

A campaign would have pitted her against California's senior senator, Dianne Feinstein, a Democrat who is one of the state's most popular politicians.

Although experts and polls suggest Feinstein, in office since 1992, will win reelection easily, a campaign by Sheehan would have provided her with a platform for her anti-war message.

Sheehan, 48, became a central figure in the U.S. anti-war movement last summer after she camped out outside President George W. Bush's Texas ranch to call for a withdrawal of U.S. forces. Her soldier son Casey was killed in Iraq in 2004.

Sheehan has continued to stay in the news. Last week, police arrested her at the House of Representatives shortly before Bush gave his annual State of the Union address because she was wearing a T-shirt with an anti-war slogan.

On January 29 she met Venezuela's left-wing president, Hugo Chavez, who also criticized Bush.

No Senate Run For Activist Cindy Sheehan (AP-Y2)

AP2, February 10, 2006

Peace activist Cindy Sheehan said Thursday she will not run against U.S. Sen. Dianne Feinstein (news, bio, voting record) in the Democratic primary.

Sheehan, who camped outside President Bush's ranch in Texas to protest the Iraq war, said she won't challenge the state's senior senator even though she thinks Feinstein hasn't done enough to oppose the war. Sheehan's 24-year-old son was killed in Iraq in 2004.

"I think I'm more effective on the outside than on the inside," Sheehan said.

During a trip to Venezuela last month, Sheehan said supporters had encouraged her to take on Feinstein in the June primary.

Sheehan, 48, was arrested last week before Bush's State of the Union address and ejected from the House gallery on a charge of unlawful conduct for wearing a T-shirt with an anti-war message. Capitol Police later dropped the charge, but Sheehan said Thursday she plans to sue over the incident.

Sheehan also said she plans to pitch her tent outside the president's ranch in April.

Steele's Words At Meeting Faulted (BSUN)

By Jennifer Skalka

The Baltimore Sun, February 10, 2006

Discussing his position on embryonic stem cell research with Baltimore Jewish leaders yesterday, Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele said he is "concerned about the destruction of human life" and made a comparison between the controversial science and experiments done on Jews during the Holocaust.

"You of all folks know what happens when people decide they want to experiment on human beings, when they want to take your life and use it as a tool," said Steele, a Republican candidate for U.S. Senate, to a crowd of about 40 at a Baltimore Jewish Council board meeting. "I know that as well in my community, out of our experience with slavery, and so I'm very cautious when people say this is the best new thing, this is going to save lives."

Steele's remarks, which followed a well-received speech about his trip to Israel in November, came in response to a board member's question about Steele's stance on embryonic stem cell research. His answer stunned many in the audience.

"If the lieutenant governor was drawing a comparison between stem cell research and human medical experimentation during the Holocaust, he must understand the pain this kind of analogy would inflict on survivors and their families," Art Abramson, executive director of the Baltimore Jewish Council, said in a statement to The Sun. "We absolutely reject any comparisons between ethical and lifesaving medical research, and the horrors committed by the Nazis in their evil drive to create a master race. We welcome any clarification Lt. Gov. Steele can offer about his remarks."

DOJ_NMG_0014168

Steele later issued a statement expanding on his comment.

"When I was asked the question about stem cell research, I had just finished speaking at length about my first trip to Israel and the powerful memories I had of my visit to the Holocaust museum there," Steele said. "Those memories have had a lasting impression on me, but in no way did I intend to equate the two or trivialize the pain and suffering of more than six million Jews."

Jewish Council board member Michele Lax said after the lunch that Steele's comments revealed a "total lack of sensitivity."

"I was just really shocked and outraged," said Lax, a retired attorney from Owings Mills. "I can't believe that he could make a comparison to the Nazis with embryonic stem cell research, which saves lives. It just shows you what his true colors are and how far right wing he is."

Sam Penn, a retired businessman and the board member who questioned Steele, said he thought the lieutenant governor's answer was "ludicrous."

"The Holocaust, they were killing people," Penn said. "Stem cell research, we want to help people."

Abba Poliakoff, a Baltimore attorney and board member, said that while he disagrees with Steele's position on embryonic stem cell research, he was not offended by his remarks.

"If a person has a strong moral and ethical belief, and he takes his guidance and he takes his lesson from what happened in the Holocaust, how could I fault the person?" said Poliakoff, who attended the lunch.

Myrna Cardin, wife of Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin, a Baltimore Democrat also running in the race for Senate, attended the luncheon in her role as past board president. Through a Cardin campaign spokesman, she declined to comment, but the congressman issued a statement.

"Michael Steele's comments were offensive to both millions of Americans who stand to benefit from this research and to Holocaust survivors and their families," the congressman said. "Michael Steele has it backward. This is not about experimenting on humans. It is about saving lives. "

A Catholic and former seminarian who often speaks about his faith, Steele espouses strong moral views and is opposed to the death penalty and abortion. The Catholic Church teaches that life begins at conception and opposes the use of embryos in scientific research, saying a human being is destroyed in the process.

In answering Penn's question about embryonic stem cell research, Steele said that "the governor and I have pretty squarely laid out where we are on that."

"I'm very concerned when we start tinkering around with life," Steele said during the council event, adding, "I'm very concerned about the destruction of life."

A spokesman for Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. did not return a call for comment.

Steele expressed support for research using adult stem cells but said embryonic stem cell research could be "a very slippery slope."

The Maryland General Assembly is debating state funding for stem cell research, with Democratic lawmakers proposing $25 million a year for five years for a plan that emphasizes embryonic research. Their legislation outlaws human cloning and commits to using only those embryos that would otherwise be discarded from fertility clinics.

Ehrlich has proposed $20 million for stem cell research, saying that science should determine what types of research are funded. The Maryland Technology Development Corp., a quasi-public agency that falls within the state Department of Business and Economic Development, would administer the grants under the governor's plan. Ehrlich has also promised $13.5 million for a new center for regenerative medicine in Baltimore.

Scientists believe stem cell research could produce cures for a range of debilitating illnesses such as Parkinson's and Alzheimer's diseases. But many conservatives, as well as leaders of the Catholic Church, echo what Steele said - that adult stem cell research shows promise, while embryonic, which uses cells harvested from human embryos, is unethical.

Curt I. Civin, a cancer research expert at the Johns Hopkins University, expressed disappointment with Steele, saying that it doesn't sound like he stands with the governor, who has indicated an openness to embryonic research.

"I certainly would reject any comparison between what stem cell researchers want to do and the Holocaust," Civin said. "What stem cell researchers want to do is learn about diseases. ... This is so unlike the medical horrors that were done during the Holocaust that I can't even begin to compare them. We're trying to save lives by doing this."

Douglas Greenberg, executive director of the University of Southern California Shoah Foundation Institute, a group that was founded by director Steven Spielberg and has recorded the testimony of 52,000 Holocaust survivors, said he believes that politicians should never use the Holocaust to make a contemporary political point. He said he was pleased that Steele revised his remarks.

DOJ_NMG_0014169

"What he originally said, whether he intended it to be or not, is an insult to those men and women who are still alive who survived these awful experiments," Greenberg said. "And also to the memory of 6 million murdered men and women and children."

In Nazi Germany, aides to Hitler conducted experiments on humans in hopes of producing a pure Aryan race, and killed millions of Jews, Gypsies and other minorities in ethnic-cleansing executions.

Bradley Wine, a member of Steele's Senate campaign finance committee and the Greater Washington chairman of the Republican Jewish Coalition, said that he knows the lieutenant governor well and that they have often discussed the shared experiences of Jews, Catholics and African-Americans. Wine also said he and Steele have discussed the "profound impact" his trip to Israel, an outreach effort to explore business opportunities with the state, had on him.

"I know that he would never utilize a reference to the Holocaust lightly or in a way designed to be political," Wine said.

No Joke: Maryland Democrats Will Honor Steele (WT)

By S.a. Miller

The Washington Times, February 10, 2006

ANNAPOLIS -- The Maryland Democratic Party has been relentless in criticizing Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele in his run for U.S. Senate, but party officials say that won't stop them from paying homage to the conservative Republican during Black History Month.

"Michael Steele is an important figure in African-American history in Maryland. There is no question about it," said Derek Walker, executive director of the state Democratic Party.

"We should be proud of the achievements of African-Americans, regardless of what party they are from or what their background is," he said.

Mr. Steele, the first black elected to statewide office in Maryland, will be celebrated Monday as part of the state Democratic Party's campaign to honor a black Marylander each day this month, Mr. Walker said.

The party distributes a daily e-mail spotlighting the day's honoree.

When told of the party's plans, Mr. Steele said it sounded like a joke -- but added that he would be appreciative if the Democrats truly mean to honor him.

"I appreciate the honor, and I thank them for it," the lieutenant governor said.

In recent days, Democrats have scolded Mr. Steele for not taking a public stance on the nomination of U.S. Supreme Court Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr., for opposing the $1 increase to Maryland's minimum wage, for not criticizing President Bush's budget proposal and for being allied with congressional Republicans who received low civil-rights scores from the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

"We'll see what the next e-mail they send out looks like," Mr. Steele said.

Some black Democratic lawmakers said it is about time their party credited Mr. Steele for raising the profile of black Marylanders in state politics.

"I think it is a great idea," said Delegate Emmett C. Burns Jr., Baltimore County Democrat. "Michael Steele is an honorable man."

The party also plans to honor Kweisi Mfume, a Democrat and former NAACP leader who has been at odds with his party over its lackluster support for his Senate run.

Mfume campaign spokesman Dan Walter said it is "appropriate" that the party would honor Mr. Mfume and Mr. Steele.

Racial issues have overshadowed Maryland's Senate race -- one of the most closely watched contests in the nation -- as the Democratic Party struggles to shore up black votes lost to Mr. Steele and the Republican Party that backed him in 2002.

Black Democratic lawmakers said racially tinged attacks against Mr. Steele are fair because he is a conservative Republican, and key Democratic leaders -- such as gubernatorial candidates Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley and Montgomery County Executive Douglas M. Duncan, both white -- declined to repudiate their comments.

In addition, black Democrats have blamed Mr. Mfume's fundraising woes on their leaders' push to give the Senate nomination to Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin, a white Democrat and 10-term congressman.

Mr. Walker has said the party is "militantly neutral" about Democratic contenders seeking to replace retiring Sen. Paul S. Sarbanes.

Still, Democratic endorsements for Mr. Cardin and Mr. Mfume have divided closely along racial lines.

Largess Preceded Md. Vote On Wal-Mart (WP)

By John Wagner And Ann E. Marimow

The Washington Post, February 10, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0014170

Two labor unions pushing for legislation that could expand Wal-Mart's health benefits made campaign contributions to 48 members of the Maryland General Assembly in the month before the high-profile vote.

The contributions, totaling more than $36,000 in the run-up to the January vote, came to more than a quarter of the state's legislators from affiliates of the Service Employees International Union and the United Food and Commercial Workers International Union, according to analysis of campaign finance reports filed last month.

"They were obviously trying to get somebody's attention," Bobbie Walton, executive director of the watchdog group Common Cause Maryland, said of the two unions, which were pitted against the retailing giant on the issue.

The House and Senate decided last month, with just a few votes to spare, to override Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr.'s veto of the bill setting a threshold for benefits provided by large employers.

Wal-Mart retained as many as a dozen Annapolis lobbyists for the fight, which drew national attention, and tried to sway public opinion through radio and newspaper ads. This week, a retailing association aligned with the company filed suit in an attempt to block the law.

But in the weeks before the override vote, Wal-Mart made only seven direct political contributions to lawmakers, one of which was returned, according to Maryland State Board of Elections records.

The final weeks before the legislature convenes are typically feverish ones for fundraising because Maryland law bans contributions during the 90-day sessions.

But donations from SEIU and UFCW, collectively, were more than seven times what the unions had given previously in the month before sessions started, dating back to 1999, the first year that contributions are recorded in a database maintained by the elections board.

Moreover, about a third of the lawmakers who received money in the weeks just before the session had not received any contributions from these union chapters before Ehrlich's veto of the bill last spring. All told, SEIU affiliates contributed $20,570 in the month before the vote, and UFCW affiliates contributed $16,050.

Combined, the contributions exceeded what the two unions gave lawmakers in the final months of the 2002 campaign, the last time state lawmakers stood for election.

"Our members have given in greater amount to our political action funds because they understand the importance of the upcoming election year, due in no small part to what they viewed as a list of unpopular vetoes made by the current governor," said Robert L. Moore, president of the SEIU chapter that serves Maryland and the District.

Aides to Ehrlich (R) suggested that the money was more evidence of the unions' role in muscling through the legislation, which requires employers with 10,000 or more workers to spend at least 8 percent of their payroll on health benefits -- or make a contribution to Medicaid, the state's health program for the poor. Wal-Mart is the only known Maryland employer that does not meet that obligation.

"There's no question. If you had eyes, you could see the sea of purple here," said Alan Friedman, Ehrlich's director of legislative relations, referring to the purple T-shirts worn by SEIU members present during debate over the bill, which was also championed by health care advocates.

The union efforts extended beyond campaign contributions. Days before the veto-override vote, the state chapter of the AFL-CIO announced that it would not endorse any lawmaker who did not support the override.

Other groups active in the debate included Wake-Up Wal-Mart and Wal-Mart Watch, two national organizations that monitor the company's business practices. Wake-Up Wal-Mart is funded by the UCFW, and Wal-Mart Watch receives money from the SEIU.

Among the lawmakers who received union contributions in the month before the session began was Del. Norman H. Conway (D-Wicomico), who said he sided with the unions last spring because of concerns about the state's rising Medicaid costs. But, he said, he was open to hearing Wal-Mart's case.

The day before the House voted to override the bill, he received a call from a Wal-Mart vice president in Arkansas. Conway wanted a guarantee that the company would build a proposed distribution plant with the potential to create hundreds of jobs in the county next to his rural district.

Conway said that he did not get the commitment and that he decided to stick with his original position.

Conway attributed the $1,500 in donations from two SEIU chapters more to his status as chairman of the Appropriations Committee than to his vote on the "Wal-Mart bill."

"Money doesn't influence me," he said. "I look at the issue and try to understand the impacts. I'm going to do what I ultimately think is the right thing."

Just before the session began Jan. 11, Del. Murray D. Levy (D-Charles), who voted against the bill last spring, received $100 apiece from SEIU and UFCW chapters.

DOJ_NMG_0014171

Levy said he was bombarded with phone calls and e-mails from both sides of the debate. Despite the pressure, Levy did not change his mind, because he said that going after one company was not a solution to the massive problem of health care.

Wal-Mart delivered just a handful of contributions, totaling $1,650, leading up to the session. And, in one case, the company's check was returned.

Del. Joseph J. Minnick (D-Baltimore County), who did not vote in April, said he was receptive to Wal-Mart's case that "government should not be in business's business."

He ultimately voted to override the veto, however, because he said companies should help pick up the cost of health care. When he realized that Wal-Mart had written him a check for a fundraiser just before the session began, he decided to give it back.

"If I don't support their issue, I shouldn't be accepting a contribution, plain and simple -- not only Wal-Mart, but anyone else."

An Old Way To Fight AIDS (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 10, 2006

PRESIDENT BUSH HAS BEEN a reliable ally in the global fight against AIDS, proposing to increase federal funding to about $4 billion next year. With so much at stake, efficiency is vital, and according to a growing body of research, one procedure that is relatively inexpensive and can drastically reduce the transmission of AIDS is male circumcision.

Last fall, the first rigorous trial on the subject conducted in South Africa found that circumcised men are 60% less likely to contract HIV. Researchers, who halted the study early because the results were so convincing, suspect that the foreskin contains a concentration of cells that are easily infected by the virus. Similar studies in Uganda and Kenya are expected to release their preliminary findings this summer. If they're similar, as many predict, health officials and donor countries such as the U.S. should help increase access to a safe and affordable procedure that has gone out of favor in most of the world.

Globally, only a quarter of men are circumcised, and rates are exceptionally low in many areas where HIV is dangerously prevalent, including India, Asia and southern Africa. Even with the increased availability of antiretroviral drugs, AIDS is getting worse in many parts of the world. In 2005, there were 5 million new cases worldwide (including 700,000 children), and 3 million people died of the disease.

Since the South African study was released late last year, health officials in countries such as Botswana and Swaziland have begun phasing in adult and infant circumcision programs, and waiting lists for the procedure at clinics are growing. If public clinics are overrun, people may turn to rural doctors, in which case dangerous and even deadly infections could occur. There also is concern that newly circumcised men may increase risky behavior, so any circumcision program should be accompanied by a strong message reinforcing the need for safe sex.

To a lesser degree, the issue has relevance in the United States. Overall circumcision rates have fallen to just half of all men in recent years, and 16 states — including California — have cut funding for the surgery because of an incorrect belief that it has no medical benefit. Although HIV rates are considerably lower in the United States than in other countries, they are highest among minorities and the poor. HIV rates in those populations could climb once their children become sexually active.

The United States is to be commended for increasing its funding for HIV prevention in recent years. And the Group of 8 industrialized nations has promised to provide universal access to AIDS treatments by 2010. Properly planned circumcision programs should be part of both efforts.

Putin Considers Inviting Hamas Leaders To Moscow (NYT)

By Renwick McLean And Greg Myre

The New York Times, February 10, 2006

MADRID, Feb. 9 — Pulling away from an agreed American and European policy, President Vladimir V. Putin of Russia said Thursday that he was considering inviting the newly victorious leaders of the radical Palestinian Islamic group Hamas to Moscow to discuss solutions to the conflict in the Middle East.

He spoke during a day of chaos and violence in the Gaza Strip, where three armed Palestinians were killed as they attacked Israeli forces and Palestinian gunmen kidnapped an Egyptian diplomat. The kidnapping was the most serious attack against diplomats in Gaza since a United States diplomatic convoy was hit by a roadside bomb in October 2003, killing three security guards.

Speaking at a joint news conference in Madrid with Prime Minister José Luis Rodríguez Zapatero, Mr. Putin rejected suggestions that Russia join with the European Union and the United States in declaring Hamas, which won the Palestinian parliamentary elections on Jan. 25, a terrorist organization.

DOJ_NMG_0014172

"I am profoundly convinced that burning bridges in politics is the easiest thing to do, but it has no perspective, it has no future," he said. "Preserving our contacts with Hamas, we are willing in the near future to invite the authorities of Hamas to Moscow to carry out talks."

Hamas responded favorably on Thursday. "If we receive an official invitation to visit Russia, we will visit Russia," said Ismail Haniya, a senior Hamas leader, according to a Reuters report from Gaza City.

But Israeli officials said Mr. Putin's remarks conflicted with the ground rules for negotiations that Russia signed on to in London last month at a meeting of the so-called quartet on the Middle East, which also includes the United States, the European Union and the United Nations. They called on Hamas to renounce violence, disarm militias, recognize Israel and respect previous agreements with it, and implied that international aid would be cut off if changes were not made.

In New York, the Israeli foreign minister, Tzipi Livni, warned that any weakness in dealing with Hamas would "legitimize terror," according to the Israeli ambassador to the United Nations, Dan Gillerman.

At a lunch meeting with Secretary General Kofi Annan and the ambassadors of all five Security Council permanent members, Ms. Livni said, "Any show of weakness or hesitation on the part of any country and especially a member of the Security Council would only act to legitimize terror and give Hamas a feeling that maybe the international community was weakening," Mr. Gillerman reported.

A senior State Department official said that the administration was surprised and irritated by Mr. Putin's remarks, but that Russia had assured the United States that there would not be any senior-level contacts with Hamas. Asked about Mr. Putin's statement, the official said, "Frankly, it doesn't help."

A spokesman for the Russian Foreign Ministry, Mikhail Kamynin, said Russia would adhere to the approach agreed upon in London. Later Thursday, Russia's special Middle East envoy, Aleksandr Kalugin, said Moscow hoped to bring Hamas "up to international requirements" and draw it into dialogue with Israel, The Moscow Times reported.

While Mr. Putin seemed to catch the Bush administration and some others by surprise, it was not the first time he had voiced such an opinion. In a news conference late last month, after the Palestinian elections, he said Russia had "never regarded Hamas as a terrorist organization," and did not rule out financial aid for a Hamas-led government.

In Gaza, the Egyptian diplomat, Hussam el-Musli, was driving through Gaza City when two masked gunmen shot the tires of his vehicle, pulled him from his car and then drove away with him, according to witness accounts. No group claimed responsibility, and the motive was not clear.

Hamas condemned the kidnapping. But a spokesman, Sami Abu Zuhri, called the attacks along the Israeli border in which three Palestinians were killed "a natural response to the Israeli crimes," a reference to recent Israeli airstrikes that have killed Palestinian militants in Gaza.

The Palestinian leader, Mahmoud Abbas, also denounced the kidnapping, saying in a statement that it was "foreign to the traditions of the Palestinian people."

But Palestinian gunmen in Gaza have repeatedly seized Western journalists and aid workers in recent years, though all have been released unharmed, usually within a few hours. The kidnappers often say their motive is to get jobs in the Palestinian Authority security forces or to secure the release of jailed relatives and fellow militants.

The kidnappers are rarely, if ever, prosecuted by the Palestinian Authority. In some instances, the authority has released prisoners as demanded by the kidnappers. Still, Thursday's kidnapping was highly unusual because the target was from Egypt, a close ally of the Palestinians that often acts as a mediator between Israel and the authority.

Before dawn on Thursday, Israeli soldiers killed two armed Palestinians who attacked the Erez crossing on the Gaza-Israel border, the military said. Israel has been permitting 5,000 Palestinian workers to commute to Israel each day through the crossing, and virtually all pass through Erez during a hectic rush hour well before dawn.

About half of the workers had gone through Erez by 4 a.m. when the flood of laborers suddenly stopped, Israeli officials said. Israel security officers called their Palestinian counterparts, but did not receive a coherent explanation, they said. Then at 4:30 a.m., the two Palestinians attacked an Israeli military position with grenades and gunfire, the military said.

Responsibility for the attack was jointly claimed by Al Aksa Martyrs Brigades, which is part of Mr. Abbas's Fatah movement, and the Popular Resistance Committees, which includes militants from various groups.

Israel closed the crossing after the attack.

A few hours later and a short distance away, Israeli troops shot and killed one of two Palestinians who were planting a bomb along the border fence, according to the Israeli military.

In a separate development, nearly all the 137,000 Palestinian government employees received their overdue January paychecks on Thursday, Palestinian officials said. The Palestinian Authority needs more than $100 million to meet its monthly payroll, and pay is sometimes late.

DOJ_NMG_0014173

The authority could face even greater difficulties if Hamas takes over the government as expected in the next few weeks. Israel this week agreed to hand over $54 million in tax and customs revenues that it collected on behalf of the Palestinians, but said it would not continue the monthly transfer if Hamas came to power.

In another development on Thursday, Israeli radio reported that the Palestinian Authority had released dozens of members of the Islamic Jihad faction who were jailed in the West Bank town of Jericho. The authority has imprisoned some militants wanted by Israel, but Israel complains that they are routinely released after relatively short periods.

Putin To Issue Invite To Hamas Leaders (WP)

By Scott Wilson

The Washington Post, February 10, 2006

JERUSALEM, Feb. 9 -- Russian President Vladimir Putin indicated Thursday that he would soon invite the leaders of Hamas to visit Moscow, signaling the first crack in diplomatic efforts to isolate the radical Islamic group as it prepares to form the next Palestinian cabinet.

"Russia is maintaining contacts with the Hamas organization and intends in the near future to invite the leadership of this organization to Moscow," Putin said at a news conference during a visit to Madrid.

Putin's announcement drew a sharp rebuke from Israeli officials, who said it marked a break from the position held by the group known as the quartet -- Russia, the United States, the European Union and the United Nations -- since Hamas's victory in parliamentary elections last month.

"Israel supports the quartet position -- Russia being a full and active member of the quartet -- as expressed by [U.N. Secretary General] Kofi Annan in the days following the elections, that said Hamas is not a partner for a political dialogue unless, one, it recognizes Israel, two, it abandons terrorism, and three, it accepts the legitimacy of signed agreements," said Mark Regev, the Israeli Foreign Ministry spokesman.

In Washington, U.S. officials were caught off guard by Putin's comments and sought clarification from Russian officials. Like Regev, C. David Welch, the U.S. assistant secretary of state for Near Eastern affairs, noted to reporters that Russia was a member of the quartet and had agreed to the group's stance toward Hamas.

"These are the principles that were clearly articulated now several times by the quartet and again with Russian participation and agreement," Welch said. "We would expect that any meeting that occurs with any Palestinian representative, including Hamas, would emphasize these principles."

Hamas leaders, now touring Arab countries to outline their political program and seek financial support for the nearly bankrupt Palestinian Authority, indicated that they would accept Putin's invitation.

The Palestinian Authority's president, Mahmoud Abbas, is expected to ask Hamas, known formally as the Islamic Resistance Movement, to form the next cabinet when the legislature convenes next week. The movement won 74 of 132 parliamentary seats, imperiling the Palestinian Authority's lifeblood of foreign aid because the United States, Israel and other nations consider Hamas a terrorist organization for carrying out scores of attacks targeting Israeli civilians.

Israel has urged foreign governments to isolate a Palestinian Authority that includes Hamas until the movement recognizes the Jewish state's right to exist. But Hamas leaders have said they have no intention of doing so and would only consider a long-term truce with Israel if it withdraws from all territory it occupied in the 1967 Middle East war.

The Bush administration and European diplomats have publicly endorsed the Israeli position, but Putin's invitation opens a schism in that once-unified front. The quartet is the sponsor of the now-dormant peace plan known as the "road map," which envisions a two-state solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. Hamas does not support that outcome.

In another development, the Palestinian Authority's attorney general, Ahmed Moghani, confirmed that he has frozen more than two dozen bank accounts of former government officials who have been implicated in a widening corruption investigation that dates back nearly a decade. Although the inquiry mostly covers the period when Yasser Arafat ran the Palestinian Authority, the preliminary results have been disclosed in recent days for political reasons.

Moghani has announced that at least $700 million and perhaps far more has been stolen from the Palestinian Authority since 1997. So far he has arrested at least 25 officials of the Fatah movement -- founded by Arafat and now led by Abbas -- which lost its monopoly on power in the Jan. 25 parliamentary elections. The inquiry has found that front companies, construction-contract kickbacks, phantom payrolls and other methods were used to steal perhaps more than $1 billion from the Palestinian Authority, most of it donated by foreign governments.

Abbas, commonly known as Abu Mazen, authorized the attorney general to announce the preliminary findings before Hamas, which campaigned on an anti-corruption platform, entered parliament. A technical team from the World Bank is also meeting with Palestinian officials to determine whether to release $300 million in emergency funds that the bank withheld from the Palestinian Authority last year after it failed to carry out specified reforms.

DOJ_NMG_0014174

"I think by doing this Abu Mazen would like to improve the reputation of Fatah, which is now almost totally destroyed," said Bassem Eid, director of the Palestinian Human Rights Monitoring Group. "In addition, he doesn't want the coming government of Hamas to look into this. Then he would be in trouble."

Also on Thursday, masked gunmen kidnapped the Egyptian military attache in the Gaza Strip a few hundred yards from his office. None of the various Palestinian armed groups asserted responsibility for the abduction. Egypt has played an important role in Gaza, serving as a broker between the various parties whose rivalry has sharpened since the elections.

Earlier in the day, Israeli soldiers killed three Palestinian gunmen in two separate attacks on the Erez crossing into Israel in northern Gaza. Israeli military officials said the men were armed with rifles and hand grenades.

Staff writer Glenn Kessler in Washington contributed to this report.

Putin Invites Hamas To Talks (WT/REU)

By Adrian Croft

The Washington Times, February 10, 2006

MADRID -- Russian President Vladimir Putin yesterday invited Hamas leaders to Moscow, saying his country -- unlike most of the West -- does not consider the winner in the Palestinian elections a terrorist organization.

"Maintaining our contacts with Hamas, we are ready in the near future to invite the Hamas authorities to Moscow to hold talks," Mr. Putin told a press conference in the Spanish capital, Madrid, where he was on a visit.

Ismail Haniyeh, a senior Hamas official, said in Gaza that leaders of the group, whose charter calls for Israel's destruction, "would be delighted" to visit Russia if Mr. Putin tendered a formal invitation.

Hamas, which won a crushing victory over the long-dominant Fatah party in an election on Jan. 25, is considered a terrorist organization by Washington.

Mr. Putin disagreed yesterday.

"We haven't considered Hamas a terrorist organization. Today, we must recognize that Hamas has reached power in Palestine as a result of legitimate elections and we must respect the choice of the Palestinian people," he said.

An Israeli government source voiced surprise at Mr. Putin's comments, calling them a departure from a position taken by a Quartet of international negotiators on Middle East peace, to which Russia belongs along with the United States, European Union and the United Nations.

Israeli Foreign Ministry spokesman Mark Regev said in Jerusalem that no talks should be held with Hamas until it recognized the Jewish state's right to exist and "renounced terror."

State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said in Washington that the Bush administration has "contacted the Russian government about what their intentions are."

"If there are any contacts between the Russian government and Hamas, we would expect that they would send that very clear message, both in public and private, that is contained in the Quartet statement," he said.

At a meeting in London on Jan. 30, Quartet representatives said the Palestinians risked losing international aid if Hamas did not renounce violence and recognize Israel. Hamas has rejected the demand.

A State Department official said Russia had not revealed Mr. Putin's plan to invite Hamas leaders at the Quartet meeting.

Russia's Foreign Ministry said the talks with Hamas will build on the group's agreement last month and will send Hamas a clear signal that it must make "responsible decisions."

"It needs to be stressed that our dialogue with Hamas will run along with contacts which leading regional parties, including Egypt, already have with this organization," the ministry said.

Russia's special Middle East envoy, Alexander Kalugin, was quoted by Itar-Tass news agency as saying Russia hoped to bring Hamas "up to international requirements" and draw it into dialogue with Israel.

In Gaza yesterday, Palestinian gunmen abducted an Egyptian military attache, the first kidnapping of a diplomat in the turbulent territory where militants hold sway.

The motive for the abduction of Egyptian diplomat Hussam el-Musli was not clear, and no one had taken responsibility.

Gaza has seen a rash of kidnappings since Israel's pullout in September, but foreigners seized by militants with grudges against the Palestinian Authority have been released quickly.

Death Penalty Asked For Beslan Raider, Reviving A Debate (NYT)

By Steven Lee Myers

The New York Times, February 10, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0014175

MOSCOW, Feb. 9 — A senior prosecutor on Thursday asked a court in southern Russia to sentence to death the only attacker known to have survived the siege of Middle School No. 1 in Beslan in September 2004. The request rekindles a contentious debate in Russia over capital punishment.

The deputy prosecutor general, Nikolai I. Shepel, made the request as he summed up the case against the defendant, Nurpashi Kulayev, after an emotionally wrought trial. Mr. Shepel said the gravity of the terrorist siege, which ended with the deaths of 331 hostages, warranted a penalty of death, despite a government moratorium on executions that has been in place since 1996.

His appeal came only two days after President Vladimir V. Putin reiterated his personal opposition to the death penalty but said he would move cautiously in seeking its final abolition by the Parliament — years after Russia committed to doing so.

"The court's decision should have a sobering effect on those who want to go down the path of terrorism, so that they know their only future is an unmarked grave," Mr. Shepel said in his remarks, shown on television.

The bloody siege in Beslan by Chechen militants, along with other terrorist attacks, has prompted some officials here to call for the restoration of capital punishment, at least for crimes as serious as terrorism. But such a step would contradict not only Russia's international commitments but also a Constitutional Court ruling in 1999 that declared the death penalty unconstitutional as long as jury trials were not universal.

Since that ruling, jury trials have been established in most regions, but they are used inconsistently. Mr. Kulayev is being tried before a panel of judges, for example.

Mr. Kulayev had admitted taking part in the attack on Beslan, in which the attackers rounded up more than 1,000 hostages at the school. But he denied responsibility for any of the deaths, most of which occurred when the siege ended on the third day in a convulsion of explosions and gunfire.

His trial, which began last summer, has provoked anger and grief among survivors and relatives of the Beslan victims, who wanted the trial to address broader issues.

On Thursday, with the prosecution wrapping up its case against Mr. Kulayev, several relatives announced a hunger strike, protesting that the trial was neither objective nor thorough. "The true culprits have not been named," said one, Ella Kesayeva, according to Interfax.

A verdict could be announced within days.

Russia's moratorium on capital punishment stems from an agreement President Boris N. Yeltsin made in 1996 as a condition for joining the Council of Europe, an organization of 46 nations that oversees legal, political and human rights issues. Government executions have reportedly not been carried out since then, and in 1999, Mr. Yeltsin commuted the death sentences of 716 prisoners.

But Russia did not submit legislation erasing the death penalty from its criminal code by 1999, as it had promised, and it is the only member of the European group that still has the death penalty on the books.

In an interview with Spanish journalists on Tuesday, Mr. Putin said he would defer to Parliament on the issue, but spoke against capital punishment, as he had before. "Any punishment has several goals," he said. "They include correction and retribution. There is no correction in the case of the death penalty, only retribution."

Even so, polls suggest that a majority of Russians favor the death penalty, as do some legislators, and that has stalled its abolition in Parliament. The Communist leader, Gennadi A. Zyuganov, said Thursday that the Beslan attack underscored the need for capital punishment.

Ella A. Pamfilova, Mr. Putin's human rights adviser, said government leaders needed to defy popular opinion on certain issues. "As for the death penalty," she told Interfax, "our society is already cruel enough."

Tensions Over Russia Set Tone At G-8 Meeting (WT)

By Michael Mainville

The Washington Times, February 10, 2006

MOSCOW -- A meeting of the Group of Eight finance ministers beginning today threatens to be overshadowed by tensions over President Vladimir Putin's record on democracy and Russia's reliability as an energy supplier.

The two-day session, attended by Treasury Secretary John W. Snow, is the first important meeting to be hosted by Russia in its role as this year's president of the powerful G-8 major industrial nations.

Energy security, education, efforts to fight infectious diseases and debt relief for poor countries are all on the agenda. But the tone has been set by Washington's public questioning of Russia's fitness to lead the group and Moscow's prickly response.

Despite its relatively small economy -- about the size of Portugal's -- Russia was added to the G-7 club of Britain, Canada, France, Germany, Italy, Japan and the United States in 1998.

DOJ_NMG_0014176

But the West's relationship with Russia has become strained since Mr. Putin moved in recent years to concentrate more power in the Kremlin. And despite some cooperation on containing Iran's nuclear ambitions, Mr. Putin's foreign policy has often been at odds with the West, especially with Russian support for autocratic regimes in Belarus and Uzbekistan.

On Sunday, Sen. John McCain called on G-8 leaders to boycott the group's July summit in St. Petersburg, Russia, saying the country "is neither a democracy nor one of the world's leading economies." He accused the Kremlin of being "in pursuit of autocracy at home and abroad."

Concerns about Russia's commitment to G-8 principles peaked after gas supplies to Ukraine were cut off on Jan. 1 in a price dispute between Moscow and a former ally that has taken a pro-Western stance. The move disrupted gas supplies to Europe, which buys about half its natural gas from Russia.

Moscow insisted it was simply asking Ukraine to pay fair market prices. But senior U.S. officials told The Washington Times this week they believe Russia is using its control of Soviet-era pipelines to hold down purchase prices in Central Asia while skimming huge profits through corrupt middlemen.

Repeated calls seeking comment from the Russian Embassy in Washington yesterday were not returned.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice publicly criticized Russia's actions in the Ukraine gas dispute last month, saying there was a "distance between Russian behavior" and "what would be expected of a responsible member of the G-8."

At a subsequent press conference with French Foreign Minister Philippe Douste-Blazy, Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov complained that a reporter had asked Mr. Douste-Blazy "if [he] wanted to join the criticism of Russia, and did not ask me if I wanted to join the criticism of the United States."

"It hasn't been a very successful start" to Moscow's tenure as G-8 chairman, said Lilia Shevtsova, a political analyst with the Moscow Carnegie Center.

"The dispute with Ukraine created a lot of concerns over Russia's role as an energy superpower at the same time as this unfortunate new law on [nongovernmental organizations] was passed."

Also in January, Mr. Putin signed a law imposing strict curbs on NGOs -- one of the few areas of public life outside state dominance after a Kremlin drive to consolidate control over parliament and regional governments, the media and strategic business sectors.

The London-based Foreign Policy Center, a prominent British think tank with links to Prime Minister Tony Blair, released a report last week saying Russia's presidency of the G-8 was "a PR disaster."

The center released what it called a "G-8 scorecard" -- assessing Russia according to 12 criteria tied to the G-8's founding declaration, including openness and freedom of speech, rule of law, and economic weight in the world. In no category did Russia score better than "sporadic compliance with G-8 norms" and in many instances it received the worst possible score.

"Russia's faltering chairmanship of the G-8 raises fundamental questions about whether Russia should be a member at all," the center's director, Stephen Twigg, said with the release of the report.

What! No Vodka? Pause In Production Has Russians Uneasy (WSJ)

By Guy Chazan

The Wall Street Journal, February 10, 2006

MOSCOW -- There was an eerie silence last week at ZAO Veda's vodka distillery, one of Russia's biggest. For the first time in its 10-year history, the plant stopped production. Bored workers kept busy by scrubbing down machinery with Ajax.

It was the same picture in towns and cities across Russia. The country's entire vodka industry ground to a halt, thanks to a Siberia-size bureaucratic snafu over a new tax on alcohol.

"This is unprecedented," said Yuri Lobanov, Veda's exasperated technical director, as he walked past empty conveyor belts. "We're losing a ton of money."

For the liquor industry, it has been a catastrophe. Rarely in its history has Russia stopped making vodka. Even during World War II, the Soviets churned out industrial quantities of the stuff.

So far, the disruption has had little effect on big cities like Moscow, where distributors, sensing trouble ahead, amassed huge stocks late last year. In remote regions, popular brands of vodka have vanished from store shelves.

"Our selection has shrunk, and we've had to raise prices," says Svetlana Matakayeva of the Alkon liquor store in Cherkessk, southern Russia. "Customers are beginning to complain."

In Moscow, drinkers shrug off the threat of shortages. "As long as they're still selling 95-proof antiseptic at the drugstore for 30 cents a bottle, we'll survive," says Mikhail Vasiliev, an accountant shopping for spirits at a Moscow supermarket.

Vodka is a national staple, as quintessentially Russian as caviar and the Bolshoi ballet. Each year, Russians knock back 9.1 liters of spirits a person, most of it vodka, according to beverage research company Canadean. Americans, in contrast, drink 4.9.

DOJ_NMG_0014177

The crisis began with a law passed last year to tighten state control of the alcohol industry and make life harder for the thousands of producers of counterfeit vodka that by some estimates still account for a third of the Russian market.

The law introduced a new excise stamp, the sticker that goes on all strong alcoholic beverages in Russia to prove tax has been paid on it. Tax authorities were supposed to start handing them out to distilleries Jan. 1, but regulations setting out how the new system works weren't drafted in time.

Desperate efforts by the liquor lobby to delay implementation came to nothing. The new, high-security stickers were printed and stockpiled, but the distillers couldn't get at them. Without them, they couldn't sell their alcohol.

Wineries have been affected, too. "It's absolutely absurd," says Vladimir Yegorov, deputy chief executive of a champagne factory in Nizhny Novgorod that also has been forced to stop work. "They've managed to shut down an entire sector, and it's not because of a power blackout or force majeure, but incompetent bureaucrats."

Mr. Yegorov's company has taken the unprecedented step of suing the government for "illegal conduct." He admits its chances of victory are slim. "It's more of a cry of desperation really," he says.

Though the law was part of a crackdown on fake vodka, it is the illegal producers who have benefited most from the crisis. Bootleg vodka with fake stamps now is filling the void left by legal distillers. That could spell trouble for Russia's public health system: According to official statistics, around 40,000 people die in Russia every year from poor-quality counterfeit vodka.

Russia's finance ministry, which has borne the brunt of the liquor barons' anger, says it isn't to blame. It says the original law was so badly written it needed major changes that weren't passed until December. Officials couldn't draft their instructions before then.

"For more than a week now, federal excise stamps have been given out to anyone who wants them," the ministry said in a statement late last month.

That is no consolation to importers. The new stamps for imported liquor haven't even been printed yet. That has led to massive disruptions in shipments of whiskey, rum and cognac to Russia -- one of the world's fastest-growing markets for premium spirits.

"The importers are out of business," says Alexander Romanov of the Alcoholic Beverages Committee of the Association of European Business. "There will definitely be a period of shortage."

Vodka -- which means "little water" in Russian -- has been part of the national fabric since it was invented here in the 14th century. Served straight and chilled, it is an essential attribute of any meal. Soviet soldiers were given shots to drink before they went into combat in World War II. Russian men often swig it at breakfast.

Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev earned the wrath of millions in the mid-1980s with his antialcohol drive, when liquor production and sales were drastically curbed. Industrial output rose, divorce rates fell and there were fewer accidents. Hardened alcoholics simply switched to toxic surrogates like bug spray and eau de Cologne.

The antibooze drive was finally ditched in the late 1980s, and as market reforms spawned new private-sector distilleries, the trickle of vodka became a torrent. Liquor production has nearly doubled in the past 10 years, to 1.32 billion liters last year from 706 million in 1996.

The current stoppage has been a disaster for the sector. Even huge state-owned giants like Kristall, Russia's biggest distillery, still are shuttered. Industry officials say Russia's treasury sacrificed $70 million in unpaid excise tax while producers sustained losses of $35 million. Exports have been largely unaffected: Russia's leading export brand, Stolichnaya, is bottled in neighboring Latvia.

Veda's distillery stood idle for four weeks as managers scrambled to get the new stamps. The plant lies in Kingisepp, a town of 54,000 a short drive from the Estonian border that is full of dreary Khrushchev-era apartment blocks and men playing at outdoor Internet casinos. Veda, Russia's second biggest vodka producer, set up the plant in 1996 in an old state-owned bakery, and it now is one of the town's biggest employers.

All of last month, the company produced nothing but still had to pay salaries and rent, as well as heating and lighting bills. It says it posted a loss of $2.5 million in the shutdown. "We're not oil men," says Zhanna Bulavchik, the company's commercial director, in her St. Petersburg office. "We can't sustain those kind of losses."

Veda got its new stamps and restarted production last Saturday. But ambitious plans to increase output 35% this year from 75 million liters in 2005 are in disarray.

Meanwhile, about half of Russia's distilleries still aren't working. "I've been in the business nine years and I've never seen anything like it," Ms. Bulavchik says.

U.S. To Shift Envoys To China, India (WP)

By Bradley Graham And Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, February 10, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0014178

Russia, Germany to Lose Diplomatic Posts in Early Restructuring

China and India have emerged as the big winners -- and Russia and Germany as the top losers -- in the first round of a broad restructuring of U.S. diplomatic posts ordered by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice.

Rice announced plans last month to shift hundreds of Foreign Service positions from Europe and other developed countries to more challenging assignments in Asia, the Middle East and elsewhere as part of an increased U.S. focus on battling terrorism and bolstering security in threatened regions. But the secretary and her aides released few details at the time.

Two State Department lists obtained by The Washington Post this week -- one showing which diplomatic positions will be eliminated, the other specifying which embassies and consulates are due to expand -- provide a clearer picture of the impact of the moves.

Of 61 positions slated for elimination in the initial batch, 10 will fall in Russia and seven in Germany. U.S. embassies in several other countries -- Belgium, Poland, Italy, Spain, Ukraine, Japan and Brazil -- will lose two or three posts. All told, 38 of the cuts will come in European nations.

On the plus side, of 74 new U.S. diplomatic positions, China will get 15, including a dozen at the U.S. Embassy in Beijing. India ranks second with 12 new posts, seven of them in New Delhi. And Indonesia is third with five new slots in Jakarta. Other countries that are to receive at least three more U.S. diplomatic slots include Nigeria, Israel, Lebanon, Vietnam, Tajikistan, Bolivia, Ecuador, Venezuela and Nicaragua.

The lists of closures and add-ons constitute just the beginning of a major rearrangement that State Department officials say will affect a substantial portion of the 6,400 Foreign Service positions. A senior State Department official involved in the planning said the first round grew out of assessments by regional bureaus of jobs they could "safely give up" and of "places where there was a crying, urgent need to have additional representation."

"This is a down payment for a shift that will probably take place over several years," the official said.

Rice has portrayed the restructuring as an essential feature of her larger "transformational diplomacy" campaign, which envisions a more active role for U.S. diplomats in fostering the growth of democratic states worldwide. Although the shifting of posts has been welcomed generally by the American Foreign Service Association representing U.S. diplomats, the potential scale of the change has unsettled some State Department employees.

"We're waiting to see just how far the secretary plans to go with this," said one Foreign Service officer who has discussed the plan with senior department officials.

One particular concern, the officer said, involves future levels of security and support for the expanded embassies and consulates. The new jobs listed so far have been confined to political, economic and public diplomacy positions. No mention has been made of additional security personnel to enhance protection, office management specialists to handle heavier administrative loads or technology experts to deal with computer problems and other technical issues.

Asked about this aspect, the senior State Department official said parallel plans are being drawn to provide extra support staff.

Some of the overseas posts on the initial cut list had been due to receive fresh replacement officers, who already had begun foreign language training or taken other steps to prepare for the positions. State Department officials say that fewer than 30 such "broken handshake" cases exist and that the affected officers are being helped to secure alternate assignments.

To find volunteers for the newly created positions, the State Department issued a memo last month advising Foreign Service personnel not to wait for the formal bidding process normally used to decide assignments. Instead, willing officers were encouraged to make their interest known to the relevant regional bureaus.

"Bureaus will be authorized to extend handshakes even before the positions appear" on the bid list, the memo said.

Dane Sees Greed And Politics In The Crisis (NYT)

By John Vinocur And Dan Bilefsky

The New York Times, February 10, 2006

COPENHAGEN, Feb. 9 — Prime Minister Anders Fogh Rasmussen said Thursday that attempts by European companies in the Middle East to disassociate themselves from Denmark or Danish products were "disgraceful."

At the same time, Mr. Rasmussen tried to shield the Bush administration and some of Denmark's partners in NATO from accusations that they had been tardy and overcautious in coming to Denmark's defense in the crisis, which he attributed more to attempts by Iran and Syria to cause diversions in the Middle East than to a few satirical cartoons depicting the Prophet Muhammad in a Danish newspaper.

Looking tired after what he acknowledged had been a difficult week, Mr. Rasmussen said in an interview that attempts to gain commercial advantage at Denmark's expense had struck at the hearts of all Danes.

DOJ_NMG_0014179

Mr. Rasmussen did not refer to a particular business organization or country. But his response came in reply to a question referring to attempts in the Arab world by companies associated with Nestlé, the Swiss food giant, and Carrefour, the French retailer, to distance themselves from Denmark. Danish industry estimates it has lost more than $55 million in sales in the Middle East since the furor began a week ago.

But the prime minister declined to criticize the Bush administration about its cautious defense of an ally. President Bush referred to his solidarity with Denmark for the first time on Wednesday, after five days of rioting in the Middle East against Danish interests.

"I have never doubted that Bush would stand up for Denmark," Mr. Rasmussen said. "He values faithfulness and loyalty. I was not surprised he decided to call me and express support."

Mr. Rasmussen reiterated that there would be no Danish apology for the cartoons. He brushed aside any suggestion that Denmark's policies requiring immigrants to accommodate themselves to Danish tradition were at fault, and asserted, "We are on the right track." More broadly, he said, "I see a very clear tendency that other European countries will go in our direction."

In light of statements here that Denmark had been abandoned in the early phase of the crisis, Mr. Rasmussen was asked if Parliament would maintain troops in Iraq and Afghanistan if it were asked to vote on the issue now. "The situation would be the same; we haven't changed," he said.

Mr. Rasmussen argued that the cartoon crisis had been hijacked by Middle Eastern interests using the caricatures for domestic ends.

He said Iran, isolated over its nuclear program, was using the cartoons to generate support in the Muslim world, while Syria, under investigation for the assassination of the former Lebanese prime minister, Rafik Hariri, was trying to cause a distraction. The Palestinian Authority, divided over the recent election of Hamas, was exploiting the cartoon crisis to unite its disparate elements, he said.

"We have religious extremists who exploit the situation and fuel the flames to pursue their own agenda," he said. "Religious extremists aim at destabilizing the situation in the whole region."

The issue will be discussed this week at a meeting of NATO defense ministers in Sicily, he said.

Mr. Rasmussen said he believed that Islam was compatible with democracy but argued that it was incumbent on Muslim immigrants in Denmark and Europe in general to embrace the liberal values of their adopted countries.

"Denmark is a liberal country," he said. "We do believe in individual liberty and freedom. People can live according to their own customs. However, I think we have to insist on respecting our core values, including freedom of expression, gender equality for women and men, and a clear distinction between politics and religion."

Mr. Rasmussen said the perception of Denmark in the Muslim world had been distorted by falsehoods spread by cellphone and Internet messages across the Middle East.

In particular, he said the government was re-evaluating relations with local Muslim leaders who traveled to the Middle East in December, stoking tensions by showing the cartoons to religious leaders.

Asked if he would have done anything differently in retrospect, Mr. Rasmussen said he had no regrets. "I don't think we could have done something in another way," he said. "We are witnessing events with deep sadness and disbelief. We are not used to it in Denmark."

Danish Premier Faults Iran, Syria (WP)

By Kevin Sullivan

The Washington Post, February 10, 2006

Governments Using Cartoon Controversy as 'Distraction' From Their Own Crises, He Says

COPENHAGEN, Feb. 9 -- Prime Minister Anders Fogh Rasmussen of Denmark said Thursday that the governments of Iran and Syria had intentionally inflamed Muslim protests against a Danish newspaper's publication of cartoons depicting the prophet Muhammad to distract attention from their own diplomatic crises.

"Syria and Iran have taken advantage of the situation because both countries are under international pressure," Rasmussen said in an interview that echoed statements Wednesday by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice. Rasmussen also said he would "not exclude the possibility" that Syria had also been involved in violent protests in Beirut, the Lebanese capital.

"I think they have taken this opportunity to use this case and a small country like Denmark as a distraction," Rasmussen said. He alleged that Iran was trying to divert attention from international pressure over its nuclear program and Syria from allegations that it was behind the assassination of former Lebanese prime minister Rafiq Hariri.

"It is obvious that these events have now gone beyond the cartoons," he said, responding to a question about Rice's statements. "We are now facing an international crisis which has its roots in tensions in the Muslim world."

DOJ_NMG_0014180

Rasmussen said he held "the two governments responsible" for mobs that attacked and burned Danish embassies in Tehran and Damascus. He said Denmark had lodged formal protests with the two governments and was considering further "diplomatic steps," which he declined to specify.

Rasmussen, a right-of-center former economic affairs minister who was elected in November 2001, said he has watched the events of the past week in "disbelief and sadness." Protesters in countries in the Middle East and Asia have burned Danish flags, attacked Danish embassies and called for Danes to be beheaded and massacred for cartoons seen in the Muslim world as a grave insult to the most revered figure in Islam.

"We are seeing ourselves portrayed as an intolerant nation, as a nation hostile to Islam," Rasmussen said in his spacious corner office at the parliamentary palace. "And it's a false picture. I think it's fair to say that Denmark is one of the most open and tolerant countries in the world. We have a real freedom of religion and we do respect all religions."

Rasmussen, who received a phone call of support from President Bush on Tuesday, said he was pleased with Bush's recent statements condemning violence against Danish diplomatic missions.

"We consider ourselves a faithful and loyal ally of the United States and we appreciate very much to see this reciprocated in the support from the United States," Rasmussen said.

The Bush administration's statements on the situation have shifted. Initially, the administration condemned the cartoons as offensive, but now Bush and other officials are stressing their opposition to the widespread violence. Rasmussen said the administration's initial stance on the cartoons "caused some public debate in Denmark, whether it could be considered a support or not. . . . We do realize that this is also a balance for the United States."

Muslims have staged violent demonstrations against Denmark in Iraq and Afghanistan, where several people have died in protests. But Rasmussen said Denmark had no plans to withdraw or reduce its 530 troops in Iraq or 390 troops in Afghanistan because of that violence.

Throughout the crisis, Rasmussen has publicly said he was sorry that the cartoons had offended Muslims. But he has steadfastly refused to apologize for their publication, because, he said in the interview, "neither the government nor the Danish people can be held responsible for what is published in an independent newspaper."

During the growing global debate about freedom of expression -- and whether the Jyllands-Posten newspaper was wrong to publish the dozen cartoons -- Rasmussen has emerged as its unapologetic champion. "I think freedom of expression is the safeguard of all other freedoms," he said. "I consider freedom of expression the most important freedom of all."

Rasmussen said he supported free speech even when it was directed harshly at him. As Muslim anger has been channeled through the Internet, he has been the subject of unflattering cartoons and altered photos.

"I don't feel offended -- that's part of the game," Rasmussen said, laughing. "As a politician, I am used to caricatures. I think it's a question of culture and tradition and maybe one of the reasons why most Danes don't understand why cartoons can cause all this."

Rasmussen said he would not support an idea, suggested by a top official of the European Union this week, that the E.U. consider adopting a voluntary code of conduct for the press.

But Rasmussen said he did believe the government had a responsibility to limit some expression -- that which would incite violence or terrorism. Following his election, two months after the Sept. 11 attacks on New York and the Pentagon, one of his government's first acts was to pass an anti-terrorism law that prohibits instigating terrorism or offering advice to terrorists. That law was widely seen as one of Europe's toughest responses in a post-Sept. 11 debate over how far to restrict civil liberties in the name of fighting extremist violence.

"If the freedom of expression is oppressed or suppressed because of violence or the threat of violence, then freedom of expression is dead," he said. "Therefore, you must have certain limitations. It must be prohibited to incite violence or terrorism."

Many countries in Europe have laws banning racist hate speech that stem from their experiences with Nazi Germany and the Holocaust.

Rasmussen said Denmark has laws outlawing racist or blasphemous expressions. A group of 11 Muslim organizations used that law to sue the Jyllands-Posten newspaper after the cartoons were published in late September, but last month the prosecutor declined to go forward with the case, saying the cartoons did not violate those laws. The Muslim groups have appealed to Denmark's top prosecutor.

Freedom Of Speech Carries Responsibility, Annan Says (LAT)

By Maggie Farley, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, February 10, 2006

His words are directed at publishers of cartoons of Islam's prophet that have sparked protests.

DOJ_NMG_0014181

UNITED NATIONS — Secretary-General Kofi Annan chastised newspapers Thursday that continue to publish cartoons depicting the prophet Muhammad in the face of the religious controversy the drawings have ignited.

"Honestly, I do not understand why any newspaper will publish the cartoons today," he told reporters at the United Nations. "It is insensitive, it is offensive, it is provocative, and they should see what has happened around the world.

"This does not mean that I am against freedom of speech, or freedom of the press," he added. "But as I have indicated in the past, freedom of speech is not a license. It does entail exercising responsibility and judgment."

Caricatures of Muhammad first appeared in the Danish right-leaning newspaper Jyllands-Posten last fall and have been reprinted in recent weeks elsewhere in Europe. Their appearance has triggered often-violent protests among Muslims.

The protests continued Thursday, with about 2,000 Muslims rallying in Dhaka, the capital of Bangladesh, Associated Press reported. Elsewhere, Malaysia's government indefinitely shut down a local newspaper for reprinting a cartoon of Muhammad, and Indonesia canceled badminton games against Denmark because of safety concerns, the news service reported.

When asked about claims this week by U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice that Syria and Iran had inflamed the controversy and incited protests, Annan told reporters that he had "no evidence to that effect."

He also condemned the violent response by demonstrators.

"They should not attack innocent civilians," he said. "They should not attack people who are not responsible for the publication of the cartoons."

At the United Nations, a group of Islamic nations Thursday introduced anti-defamation language into a founding document for a new U.N. Human Rights Council, which is being formed to replace the widely criticized U.N. Human Rights Commission based in Geneva.

The proposed text would "prevent instances of intolerance, discrimination, incitement of hatred and violence arising from any actions against religions, prophets and beliefs which threaten the enjoyment of human rights and fundamental freedoms."

The text also says that "defamation of religions and prophets is inconsistent with the right to freedom of expression" and urges states, organizations and the media to exercise "responsibility in promoting tolerance and respect for religious and cultural values."

Hamas Joins Call For Calm In Cartoon Row (AFP-Y2)

AFP, February 10, 2006

The radical Palestinian group Hamas joined voices for calm in the international furore sparked by cartoons of the Prophet Mohammed, as a Taliban commander in Afghanistan said 100 suicide bombers had volunteered.

Hamas "is prepared to play a role in calming the situation between the Islamic world and Western countries on condition that these countries commit themselves to putting an end to attacks against the feelings of Muslims," the organisation's leader Khaled Meshaal told a news conference.

His conciliatory tone came a day after he warned the Western press was "playing with fire" by publishing the cartoons which have led to riots around the world.

As Muslim protests over the cartoons subsided on Thursday, a Taliban commander in Afghanistan warned that 100 militants had enlisted as suicide bombers and Denmark said it feared for the safety of its troops in Iraq.

Mullah Dadullah, one of the Taliban's most senior military commanders, said his Islamic extremist group had also offered a reward of 100 kilograms (220 pounds) of gold to anyone who killed people responsible for the drawings.

Meanwhile Afghan authorities arrested more than 40 Pakistani workers for inciting violence Wednesday during a protest against the cartoons in which four people were killed.

The deaths in Qalat raised the death toll to 11 in five days of protests in Afghanistan against the cartoons. Two people have also died in protests in Somalia and Lebanon.

The cartoons, including one showing the Prophet Mohammed with a bomb in his turban, were first published in the Danish daily Jyllands-Posten in September, but have since been widely reprinted.

The newspaper's chief editor, Carsten Juste, said Thursday the culture editor who had decided to publish the cartoons, Flemming Rose, had been sent on holiday for an indefinite period "because nobody can bear the weight that is on his shoulders," according to the online edition of the Danish daily Politiken.

Danish military officials said the country's troops deployed in Iraq were keeping a low profile Thursday to avoid any clashes with Shiites during their holy mourning festival of Ashura.

Calls for calm came from many quarters Thursday after days of violent protests.

A senior figure at Al-Azhar, the highest authority in Sunni Islam, said it was time to move on from high emotion to constructive dialogue.

DOJ_NMG_0014182

"Quiet debate and dialogue, without passion" is the way forward, Ali al-Samman, who heads an interconfessional dialogue committee at the prestigious seat of learning in the Egyptian capital, said.

UN chief Kofi Annan again slammed the violence. "It is unfortunate that we all need to take steps to calm the situation and whatever the anger of those concerned, violence is not the answer," the secretary general told reporters.

Annan, asked whether he thought some governments were behind the violence, replied: "It's difficult for me to say. I have no evidence to that effect."

Russian President Vladimir Putin also called for cool: "The situation should be brought under control as soon as possible."

In Brussels, European Union justice commissioner Franco Frattini called for an urgent "relaunch of dialogue" with the Islamic world in response to the wave of protests.

Nearly 3,000 Danes by Thursday afternoon had signed an open letter calling for "peace with the Muslim world".

In Paris, close to 100 Arab and European academics, political and religious figures also issued a joint appeal for "moderation and wisdom" in the row.

However in Lebanon, the head of the country's Shiite movement Hezbollah insisted on an apology for the cartoons, as hundreds of thousands of Shiites gathered in southern Beirut to mark the Ashura festival.

"There will be no compromise before we receive an apology," Hassan Nasrallah told the crowds at the Shiite gathering.

Up to 15,000 South African Muslims also took to the streets in Cape Town, and handed over a petition to the Danish consulate.

The protestors sang Arabic songs and carried banners stating "Cartooning our prophet will earn you no profit" and "We will sacrifice our lives for our prophet."

The United States warned of potential violence during protests planned this week in Kenya's capital.

Kenyan Muslims have called for demonstrations, including a possible march on the Danish embassy in Nairobi.

The White House, meanwhile, insisted US President George W. Bush would go ahead with his planned trip to Pakistan in March despite widespread outrage over the cartoons there. Protesters burned his effigy Wednesday.

Egyptian writer and Nobel literature prize laureate Naguib Mahfouz said a boycott of Danish products was "the only option" for Muslims to retaliate.

"The world only understands the language of force," he told the English-language Al-Ahram Weekly.

Liberal Dutch politician Ayaan Hirsi Ali said the European press had been right to publish contentious cartoons of the Prophet Mohammed.

Ali, a close friend of Dutch filmmaker Theo van Gogh, who was killed by a Muslim extremist in 2004, said media who "lacked the courage to show their readers the caricatures" should be ashamed.

Somali-born Ali, who describes herself as "a dissident of Islam", told journalists in Berlin: "I am of the opinion that it was correct to publish the cartoons of Mohammed in Jyllands Posten and it was right to re-publish them in other papers across Europe.

"Shame on those politicians who stated that publishing and re-publishing the drawings was 'unnecessary', 'insensitive', 'disrespectful' and 'wrong'," she added, echoing the words of British Foreign Secretary Jack Straw.

Ali said it was wrong to expect people from other cultures to abide by the Muslim ban on depicting their prophet.

"Demanding that people who do not accept Mohammed's teachings should refrain from drawing him is not a request for respect but a demand for submission."

She listed numerous teachings of Mohammed which she rejected and said she believed there was a need to be critical of him to educate people.

"The prophet did and said good things. But I wish to defend the position that he was also disrespectful and insensitive to those who disagreed with him.

"I think it is right to make critical drawings and films of Mohammed."

Pope Meets Laura Bush, Says Worried About Terror (REU-Y2)

By Steve Holland

Reuters, February 10, 2006

Pope Benedict received U.S. First Lady Laura Bush on Thursday and told her that he was worried about terrorism around the world and violence sparked by the publication of cartoons of the Prophet Mohammad.

"He talked to me about the worries of terrorism, the worries right now about the violence in Beirut, Damascus and other cities," she told reporters after the meeting the Pope.

"His hope and certainly our hope (is) for peace and tolerance for each of us, to treat everyone else with respect," she said.

DOJ_NMG_0014183

Angry Muslims have demonstrated around the world over the cartoons, first published in Denmark, then Norway and several other countries in Europe and elsewhere.

The caricatures, including one showing the Prophet Mohammad wearing a bomb-shaped turban, have unleashed fury among many Muslims who consider any portrayal of their prophet as blasphemous, let alone one showing him as a terrorist.

The Vatican has already condemned the cartoons.

"I know that Muslims are offended with these cartoons. I understand their offence (but) on the other hand I don't think violence is the answer. I think everyone around the world needs to speak out and say 'lets stop the violence,'" she said.

The Pope told Mrs Bush that he hoped her stay in Italy for the start of the winter Olympics would be peaceful.

"We hope you will have a peaceful time," the Pope told Mrs Bush and her daughter Barbara when he welcomed them into his private study in the Vatican's Apostolic Palace.

Mrs Bush and Barbara, 24, are in Italy as head of the official U.S. delegation to the Turin games, which start on Friday.

The First Lady, Barbara and Francis Rooney, the U.S. ambassador to the Vatican, spoke privately for about 15 minutes in the Pope's study.

At the picture taking session afterwards Mrs Bush gave the Pope a silver bowl and he gave his visitors rosary beads and medals of his pontificate.

Mrs Bush is due to have lunch with Italian Prime Minister Silvio Berlusconi and visit a Rome hospital before heading to Turin for the start of the games.

She will also visit U.S. military personnel stationed at the Aviano air base in the north before returning to the United States.

First Lady Discusses Terrorism With Pope (AP)

By Nicole Winfield

AP, February 10, 2006

Laura Bush said Pope Benedict XVI expressed concern over violence linked to the prophet drawings in their meeting Thursday, with the pontiff calling for peace and tolerance.

"He talked to me about the worries of terrorism, the worries right now of the violence in Beirut and Damascus and other cities," Mrs. Bush said after the 20-minute audience in the pope's private library.

The pontiff, she said, also expressed his hope "and certainly our hope, for peace and for tolerance, for each of us to treat everyone else with respect."

Benedict also wished Mrs. Bush "a peaceful time" in Turin, where she is heading the official U.S. delegation to the Olympics.

"We're looking forward to the games," Mrs. Bush told the pope as she arrived for the meeting along with her daughter Barbara and the U.S. ambassador to the Holy See, Francis Rooney.

Mrs. Bush told reporters after the meeting that she understood the offense Muslims around the world feel about the publication in European newspapers of the caricatures of the Prophet Muhammad.

"On the other hand, I don't think violence is the answer. I think that everyone around the world needs to speak out and say 'Let's stop the violence.' It's really not necessary to get the point across that they were offended by those cartoons."

She said she and the pope discussed the violence briefly, although spoke at greater length about religion and the separation of church and state in the United States.

During the audience, Mrs. Bush gave Benedict a small silver bowl engraved with the U.S. presidential seal and the signatures of the president and first lady; the pope in turn gave the first lady and Barbara rosaries and Rooney a Vatican medal.

As she left, the first lady told the pope that the president "sends his best wishes." She said she would also relay the pope's good wishes back to him.

She wore a black suit and black lace mantilla, or head covering; Barbara, 24, wore a black skirt and top and high-heeled black boots.

The audience kicked off a visit that will take Mrs. Bush to Turin, where she is heading a U.S. Olympic delegation that includes former Olympians Dorothy Hamill, Kerri Strug, Eric Heiden, Debi Thomas and Herschel Walker. The games begin Friday and last through Feb. 26.

After the meeting at the Vatican, Mrs. Bush lunched with Italian Premier Silvio Berlusconi and visited a Rome hospital where she participated in a panel discussion on breast cancer. The event was organized by the Italian chapter of the Susan G. Komen Breast Cancer Foundation, founded by a friend of the first lady.

"Early detection is the only cure," Mrs. Bush told the crowd.

Swifter, Higher, Stronger, Safer? (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0014184

By Daniel Williams

The Washington Post, February 10, 2006

TURIN, Italy, Feb. 9 -- The worldwide Muslim protests against caricatures of Muhammad that appeared in a Danish newspaper last year have compounded Italy's security headaches for the Winter Olympics, which already suffer from possible disruption by local anti-globalization groups, opponents of a high-speed railway line and striking tram drivers.

Signs of concern are all over this town near Italy's northwest frontier. About 10,000 police from all over the country are patrolling boulevards and back alleys. Bomb-sniffing dogs stand guard at the airport, train station, stadiums and street corners. About 300 specially trained troops will patrol the nearby mountain sites on snowmobiles and skis. Airspace over Turin will be closed to anything with mechanical wings except for F-16s from the Italian air force that will zoom about during Friday's Opening Ceremonies and two surveillance planes supplied by NATO that will monitor wayward flights.

Missiles have been mounted around the city.

All that was in the works before the Muhammad cartoon unrest overwhelmed the local news. Because of the uproar, Interior Minister Giuseppe Pisanu, Italy's top official for civilian police and the intelligence corps, called an emergency meeting of security officials Monday regarding possible new threats. Pisanu said the riots and protests in the Middle East, Central Asia and Far East countries have been "carried out coldly with political ends. We mustn't forget that Islamic extremism is an essentially political movement that cynically uses religious values."

At least two Italian newspapers reprinted the Muhammad caricatures that included one showing the prophet of Islam wearing a turban shaped like a bomb.

Nonetheless, Pisanu said, homegrown violence is the most likely problem for the Olympics. "For the Olympics I fear the rising aggressiveness of anti-globalization protesters, anarchists and all the domestic subversion movements that are pursuing the Olympic spotlight. Unfortunately, these people have already done very serious damage to the image of our country," Pisanu said.

He was referring to the bumpy ride of the Olympic flame to Turin. Protesters blocked its passage in several Italian cities. In Genoa a few weeks ago, it had to travel by sea to arrive in town. The group of demonstrators include residents of towns near Turin who oppose construction of a railway tunnel through the Alps as part of a cross-European, high-speed train network. Assorted masked anti-globalization militants are protesting corporate sponsorship of the Olympics.

On a clear, sunny Thursday, the flame arrived in Turin and guest runners carried it along streets lined with cheering people. But the flame had to compete with unemployed laborers who held up self-described "fake torches" to protest layoffs at the local Fiat auto plant. Police surrounded anti-globalization demonstrators who tried to approach the route. Plenty of gesticulating broke out, but no violence.

More protests are planned for Friday, when the flame will once again navigate Turin.

On Tuesday, the country's president, Carlo Azeglio Ciampi, urged Italians to show a "sense of responsibility" and keep the Olympics incident-free. "For two weeks, Turin will be the capital of Italy," he said. "I am confident that everyone will work together for the Olympics."

Italian politicians took the message as an opportunity to point fingers at each other for trouble that had yet to break out. Italy is in the middle of heated campaigns for parliamentary elections scheduled for April. Pier Ferdinando Casini, who is a leader in Prime Minister Silvio Berlusconi's government, said it was up to the opposition, some of whom back the groups opposing the high-speed rail network, to head off any trouble. He called the opposition "irresponsible."

Romano Prodi, who is running against Berlusconi for prime minister, countered that he did not endorse disruption, but understood that the government "had done little" to resolve the problems of the tunnel with local residents.

Italian officials have long predicted that, with elections on the horizon, Italy would be the focus of a terrorist attack. Berlusconi supported the U.S.-led occupation of Iraq by dispatching about 3,000 soldiers to the southern Iraqi town of Nasiriyah. The Italians have begun a withdrawal, but it will not be complete until later this year.

In recent months, Italian authorities have deported about 30 Islamic militants they said were inciting violence, including an imam preaching in Turin. The Italians rely on wiretapping to keep tabs on terrorist suspects and their supporters. Officials say they have 2,000 people under close watch.

Turin is not the only possible target. Italy has several crowded tourist sites and Italy has intensified security at hundreds of them at a cost of more than $100 million.

Italy has significant experience in dealing with high-profile events. Officials cite the trouble-free funeral of Pope John Paul II last year as a prime example. On the other hand, violence broke out at a summit of the Group of Eight industrialized nations held in Genoa in 2001, which was marred by mob violence and vicious police counterattacks.

Pisanu described the Islamic threat as less to do with al Qaeda than with independent North African origin "Islamic-European" militant groups.

The security nerve center in Turin is called the National Center for Olympic Information. Spread around the city and Olympic sites are 21 operation rooms all linked together by sophisticated communications. Officials at the center said that athletes from any country involved in the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan are at risk. In all, there are 2,500 athletes in Turin scheduled to perform in front of a million spectators during the Games, which end Feb. 26.

Ciampi made a broader appeal on Thursday, calling for a worldwide "Olympic truce" during which no one would make war on anyone else, but instead "brotherhood prevails in the world."

The Ayatollah Joke Book (WP)

By Michael Kinsley

The Washington Post, February 10, 2006

Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, the noted wit, expert on freedom and unelected religious leader -- the leader who counts -- of Iran, observed the other day that in the West, "casting doubt or negating the genocide of the Jews is banned but insulting the beliefs of 1.5 billion Muslims is allowed." He apparently thought that this was a devastating point. Touche, Ayatollah Khamenei.

The worldwide fuss over 12 cartoon images of the prophet Muhammad (some mocking, some benign) that ran in a Danish newspaper has already killed a number of people. Many self-styled voices of Islam have made the bizarre comparison between showing pictures of Muhammad and expressing doubt about the Holocaust. A government-controlled Tehran newspaper announced a contest for cartoons about the Holocaust, asking "whether freedom of expression" applies to "the crimes committed by the United States and Israel." In a spirit of "see how you like it," a European Muslim group posted on the Web a cartoon of Anne Frank in bed with Hitler.

Muslim complaints about a Western double standard would be more telling if the factual premise were accurate. But it is not. In fact, it is nearly the opposite of the truth. Nothing is easier and more common in the West, including the United States, than criticizing the United States -- except for criticizing Israel. A few Western countries have stupid laws, erratically enforced, against denying the Holocaust, but that hasn't stopped Holocaust denial from becoming a literary industry and cultural phenomenon. Nevertheless, there has been no rioting about the historical reality of the Holocaust. No one has died over it.

Meanwhile, whatever point these European Muslims were making with their cartoon of Hitler and Anne Frank is more or less disproved by their very exercise. No one tried to stop them from putting the cartoon on the Web. The notion that jokes about Frank are beyond the pale is provably false. There's a play running in New York right now called "25 Questions for a Jewish Mother." It's a monologue written and acted by stand-up comic Judy Gold, who says on stage every night that her mother used to read to her from a pop-up version of Anne Frank's diary, and would say, "Pull the tab, Judith. Alive. Pull it again. Dead." Maybe you had to be there. But the New York Times reviewer called the play "fiercely funny, honest and moving" and did not demand that the author be executed or even admonished.

By contrast, in a spectacular exercise of self-censorship, almost every major newspaper in this country is refraining from publishing the controversial Danish cartoons, even though they are at the center of a major news story that these papers cover at length every day. An editorial in the Times on Wednesday said that not publishing the cartoons was "a reasonable choice" because they would offend many people and "are so easy to describe in words." As I write I am looking at a front-page photo in today's Times of Mariah Carey singing into a microphone. Words do it justice, I think.

Of course it is not Western values that are trampling freedom of expression, it is the ayatollah's own values, combined with the threat of violence. The other problem with his little joke about double standards, and with the whole, supposedly mordant, comparison between denying the Holocaust and portraying the prophet is that the offended Muslims do not want a world where people are free to do both. They don't even want a world where people are not free to do either, which would at least be consistent. They want a world where you may not portray Muhammad (even flatteringly, slaying infidels or whatnot), but you may deny the Holocaust all day long.

The bewildered prime minister of Denmark, trying to calm the whirlwind that has descended on his innocent, unsuspecting country, gets it spectacularly wrong when he reassures disgruntled Muslims that Denmark supports "freedom of religion" and is "one of the world's most tolerant and open societies." Tolerance, openness and freedom of religion are not what they have in mind.

A lively debate is going on about whether Islam really does forbid any portrayal of the prophet, however benign, or whether that is a recent innovation of some subset of the faithful with possible ulterior motives. This debate misses the point. Some Christians believe they are required to wear particular sorts of clothing. Some Jews and Muslims don't eat pork. They don't claim that their religion requires other people to wear special clothing or avoid eating pork. Tolerance and ecumenism can do only so much. They have nothing to offer a Muslim in Afghanistan who is personally insulted and enraged about an image that appears in a newspaper in Denmark.

DOJ_NMG_0014186

The shameful American position on all this is boilerplate endorsement of free expression combined with denunciation of the cartoons as an "unacceptable" insult. When three protesters died this week in a confrontation at a U.S. military base in Afghanistan, an American spokesman there said that Afghans "should judge us on what we're doing here, not on what some cartoonist is doing somewhere else." But the limits of free expression cannot be set by the sensitivities of people who don't believe in it. How can President Bush continue to ask young Americans to sacrifice their lives for freedom in the Muslim world, if he won't even defend freedom verbally when forces from that world are suppressing it in our own?

Curse Of The Moderates (WP)

By Charles Krauthammer

The Washington Post, February 10, 2006

As much of the Islamic world erupts in a studied frenzy over the Danish Muhammad cartoons, there are voices of reason being heard on both sides. Some Islamic leaders and organizations, while endorsing the demonstrators' sense of grievance and sharing their outrage, speak out against using violence as a vehicle of expression. Their Western counterparts -- intellectuals, including most of the major newspapers in the United States -- are similarly balanced: While, of course, endorsing the principle of free expression, they criticize the Danish newspaper for abusing that right by publishing offensive cartoons, and they declare themselves opposed, in the name of religious sensitivity, to doing the same.

God save us from the voices of reason.

What passes for moderation in the Islamic community -- "I share your rage but don't torch that embassy" -- is nothing of the sort. It is simply a cynical way to endorse the goals of the mob without endorsing its means. It is fraudulent because, while pretending to uphold the principle of religious sensitivity, it is interested only in this instance of religious insensitivity.

Have any of these "moderates" ever protested the grotesque caricatures of Christians and, most especially, Jews that are broadcast throughout the Middle East on a daily basis? The sermons on Palestinian TV that refer to Jews as the sons of pigs and monkeys? The Syrian prime-time TV series that shows rabbis slaughtering a gentile boy to ritually consume his blood? The 41-part (!) series on Egyptian TV based on that anti-Semitic czarist forgery (and inspiration of the Nazis), "The Protocols of the Elders of Zion," showing the Jews to be engaged in a century-old conspiracy to control the world?

A true Muslim moderate is one who protests desecrations of all faiths. Those who don't are not moderates but hypocrites, opportunists and agents for the rioters, merely using different means to advance the same goal: to impose upon the West, with its traditions of freedom of speech, a set of taboos that is exclusive to the Islamic faith. These are not defenders of religion but Muslim supremacists trying to force their dictates upon the liberal West.

And these "moderates" are aided and abetted by Western "moderates" who publish pictures of the Virgin Mary covered with elephant dung and celebrate the "Piss Christ" (a crucifix sitting in a jar of urine) as art deserving public subsidy, but who are seized with a sudden religious sensitivity when the subject is Muhammad.

Had they not been so hypocritical, one might defend their refusal to republish these cartoons on the grounds that news value can sometimes be trumped by good taste and sensitivity. After all, on grounds of basic decency, American newspapers generally -- and correctly -- do not publish pictures of dead bodies, whatever their news value.

There is a "sensitivity" argument for not having published the cartoons in the first place, back in September when they first appeared in that Danish newspaper. But it is not September. It is February. The cartoons have been published, and the newspaper, the publishers and Denmark itself have come under savage attack. After multiple arsons, devastating boycotts, and threats to cut off hands and heads, the issue is no longer news value, i.e., whether a newspaper needs to publish them to inform the audience about what is going on. The issue now is solidarity.

The mob is trying to dictate to Western newspapers, indeed Western governments, what is a legitimate subject for discussion and caricature. The cartoons do not begin to approach the artistic level of Salman Rushdie's prose, but that's not the point. The point is who decides what can be said and what can be drawn within the precincts of what we quaintly think of as the free world.

The mob has turned this into a test case for freedom of speech in the West. The German, French and Italian newspapers that republished these cartoons did so not to inform but to defy -- to declare that they will not be intimidated by the mob.

What is at issue is fear. The unspoken reason many newspapers do not want to republish is not sensitivity but simple fear. They know what happened to Theo van Gogh, who made a film about the Islamic treatment of women and got a knife through the chest with an Islamist manifesto attached.

The worldwide riots and burnings are instruments of intimidation, reminders of van Gogh's fate. The Islamic "moderates" are the mob's agents and interpreters, warning us not to do this again. And the Western "moderates" are their terrified collaborators who say: Don't worry, we won't. It's those Danes. We're clean. Spare us. Please.

letters@charleskrauthammer.com

DOJ_NMG_0014187

Hope Beyond The Rage? (WP)

By David Ignatius

The Washington Post, February 10, 2006

Looking at the cartoons, a non-Muslim wonders how they could possibly have given such offense. How could a few juvenile, satirical drawings of the prophet Muhammad have created a global crisis? It seems inexplicable, until you think about American reactions to a word we hesitate even to write for fear of giving offense, calling it instead the "n-word."

The African American experience reminds us that there is a rage so deep and abiding that it can be triggered by a small comment, an unintended slight, a remark perhaps meant as a joke but heard as a grievous insult. The legacy of slavery left behind that residue of anger. It created taboos that protect what Sigmund Freud described as the sacred totems of cultural identity. It established boundaries where outsiders -- in this case, white people -- are not allowed to venture. That's why the n-word is so powerful -- it is the symbol of the suffering that a people experienced at the hands of others.

By drawing this comparison, I don't mean to condone what Muslims are doing in their violent, deadly overreaction to a provocation by a foolish newspaper editor in Denmark. And I think the Muslim world could learn something about tolerance from African Americans. The United States still abounds with racist images, but blacks are no longer rioting in the streets or burning down buildings. With time, people have learned to deal with their anger in less self-destructive ways -- even, sometimes, to laugh about it.

This week, the African American cartoonist Aaron McGruder is running a series in his taboo-busting strip "The Boondocks" making fun of civil rights leader Al Sharpton's protests about racism. In Monday's strip, Huey Freeman muses to his friend: "Give me news of hope, Caesar. Tell me of the leaders who dare to stand against the grave dangers faced by this world. I crave inspiration." His pal Caesar looks up from his newspaper: "Says here Al Sharpton is protesting a cartoon for using the n-word." To which Huey responds: "I'm going back to bed."

Maybe the Muslim world will someday be able to laugh off slurs against the prophet Muhammad, but not now. The wounds are too raw; the sense of victimization is too immediate. I travel often to Muslim countries, and I am sometimes astonished at how hundreds of years of history can seem condensed into the present, so that every current injustice is magnified by the weight of every past one. I don't understand it, but then, I have to remind myself, I'm not a Muslim. I haven't lived it.

Hoping to understand this blood-knot of rage and intolerance, I called Randall Kennedy, a prominent African American professor of law at Harvard University. He is the author of a 2002 book that explores the intense emotions aroused by the n-word, which he actually dares to spell out in the book's title. He says he's not surprised that a cartoon, like a taboo word, can become a focus for rage. For African Americans, he explains, "there are all sorts of indignities and insults, but they're momentary and ambiguous." But when white people say the hateful word, "it crystallizes something that's often hard to discern."

"When people feel they're being disrespected, they respond in all sorts of ways, including very self-destructive ways," Kennedy observes. That said, he finds the Muslim reaction to the Danish cartoons unacceptable -- just as he thinks people overreact to the n-word. "Are we going to bleep out Richard Pryor's album? Are we going to scratch out every reference to the word in 'Huckleberry Finn'? I would say with respect that's what is happening here with the reaction to the cartoons."

Whenever I'm feeling really pessimistic about the world, I remind myself of the American civil rights movement. In the space of my lifetime, America has gone from a country of brutal racism and outright segregation to a place where black folks and white folks pretty much get along. We haven't abolished racism, but by working honestly at the problem, we've made real progress. Along the way, we experienced rage and violence: Our cities burned; our nation sometimes felt at war with itself. But we passed through that dark period into a brighter one.

I want to believe that Muslims and the West are in that kind of transition. We're in the rage phase -- the part of the story where black folks are torching cities, white governors are sending in the National Guard and the problems seem insoluble. But if people keep their heads, we will eventually pass from this crazy moment into a different one where a genuine reconciliation is possible. Let's face it: We are living the clash of civilizations, and it's likely that things won't get much better until they get a bit worse.

davidignatius@washpost.com

A Global View On Cartoons Debate (USAT)

USA Today, February 10, 2006

Ruth Wishart,

columnist, in The Herald, Glasgow, Scotland: "How on earth did we get here from there? From a batch of indifferently executed cartoons published over four months ago in a Danish newspaper to worldwide riots, death threats and the destruction of embassies? ... If we are to believe the editor of the small Danish newspaper who put a match to this now global conflagration, the motivation was merely to question whether or not people had become too scared of controversy and retaliation to speak and publish freely and frankly. Ironically, he has created not a new honesty but wholesale paranoia."

DOJ_NMG_0014188

Arman-e Melli,

Kabul, Afghanistan, in an editorial: "The Muslim and Mojahed people of Afghanistan have the right to demonstrate and make the Western press realize that freedom of speech does not mean insulting the sacred beliefs of other religions. Looking at developments in the country, it is clear that the enemies of our people have exploited the religious beliefs of our people. They have changed the peaceful process of demonstrations into a violent one."

ABC,

newspaper, Madrid, in an editorial: "The problem is that the argument about 'freedom of expression' — or, in the end, any other freedom — is incomprehensible for those living in states where human rights, or basically the law, are in dire straits because of the autocratic nature of their leaders."

The People,

Nairobi, Kenya, in an editorial: "It is an issue of civil rights. In any society, there is an understanding that free speech should be used wisely so as not to provoke hostilities."

Fintan O'Toole,

columnist, for The Irish Times, Dublin: "Offense has to be taken as well as given. ... Money, success and power thicken the skin, and ours has been so hardened by our newly confident self-image that sticks and stones feel like tickles. Offense is subjective, not objective. Mass outbreaks of high dudgeon depend on the presence of two factors. One is a group with an agenda, looking for insults to exploit. The other is a wider group of people who feel so vulnerable to denigration that their feelings are available for exploitation. The Irish had those two factors 20 years ago. The Muslims have them now. The current conflict is not about religion, still less about a supposed clash of civilizations. It is about power and politics."

Politiken,

Copenhagen, Denmark, in an editorial: "The acts of violence arise from the internal tensions in Muslim societies; they show the desperation of people who see the world's cultural and economic development passing them by. The escalation of the crisis does not therefore have anything to do with Danish newspaper cartoons, and there is nothing that Denmark could have done to halt this development."

Can Dundar,

commentary in Milliyet newspaper, in Turkey: "Attacking values which people consider divine cannot be excused with the pretext of 'freedom of expression' ... The crisis seems to be getting bigger because of Europe's attitude."

Cape Argus,

Cape Town, South Africa, in an editorial: "The position of this newspaper was not to publish the offending cartoons because they would be an affront to our Muslim readers and are, quite simply, racist in their stereotyping of Arabs as people with hooked noses and as terrorists. But we also reject the notion that ... any group could, on a presumption, interdict our newspapers from publishing content."

The Nation,

Bangkok, in an editorial: "Instead of expending energy on defending freedom of expression or calling for deadly revenge, perhaps all parties should focus instead on our common decency, which is a prerequisite for rational debate. Surely for Western and Islamic civilizations, which have long been trying to come to terms with much worse atrocities over the centuries, offensive cartoons should not be all that difficult to let go of."

In Iranian Eyes, The 'Cross-Eyed British' Are To Blame (NYT)

By Michael Slackman

The New York Times, February 10, 2006

TEHRAN, Feb. 7 — The Embassy of Denmark was attacked and pelted with gasoline bombs two days in a row because of the caricatures of the Prophet Muhammad published in a Danish newspaper. The Austrian Embassy was stoned and all its windows were smashed for the same reason. The United States has been dubbed the World Oppressor, and Israel has always been at the top of the enemies list.

But to understand whom Iranians distrust most of all, you need only visit Bobby Sands Street. Named after the Irish republican who died of a hunger strike in 1981, the street runs right past the British Embassy in a busy neighborhood of Tehran.

A not-too-subtle finger in the eye.

"We have not seen anything other than bad things from the British since they stepped foot here 200 years ago," said Seyed Razi Abbassian, 72, a dealer in stamps and coins at a shop across from the street from the British Embassy. "We have no good memories of the British."

DOJ_NMG_0014189

In an often bitterly divided country, Mr. Abbassian's outlook is one that unites Iranians of many social, economic and political classes.

The idea that Britain is behind much of what goes wrong in Iran is not just a conspiracy theory but also a prism through which to view events. Indeed, America — the Great Satan itself — is often portrayed as merely a hapless, muscle-bound child manipulated by smarter, craftier, more deceitful forces in London.

One European diplomat said he once received a gift from an Iranian child: a drawing of America as a marionette with Britain pulling the strings.

"For 200 years we have had a political relationship with the British," said Mansoureh Ettehadie, a history professor and writer. "They have never been innocent. There is a feeling in Iran that is widespread, that the British have not been blameless."

As Ms. Ettehadie intimated, there are sound historical reasons for the Iranians to suspect the British. Early in the 20th century, she said, Britain tussled with France and Russia over control of the country, and Britain's success in the south, and in dominating the rich oil fields, left a bad taste. She said, for example, that for many years, Iran did not even have its own central bank, but had to rely on the Imperial Bank to issue currency.

And as every Iranian schoolchild knows, it was the British who engineered the coup that brought to power the dictatorial Reza Shah Pahlavi, who founded the hated dynasty that lasted until the Shiite revolution in 1979.

Distrust of Britain is so ingrained in the public psyche — especially among the older generation — that it has been joked about, written about and even dismissed as paranoia, but never done away with. One of the most popular novels in Iran, "My Uncle Napoleon," is a comic love story spoofing how Iranians see a British hand in all dark deeds.

The book popularized the phrase, "This is the job of the cross-eyed British," which is often used here with a smile, and a wink. It can be said when bombs go off, or when there is really bad traffic.

While many Iranians are adept at poking fun at their Brit-fixation, the prevailing view also serves to complicate already tense relations between London and Tehran over such matters as the Iranian nuclear program. One Western diplomat, who asked not to be identified so as not to inflame his host country, said Iranians often raised the specter of "historical inequities" with Britain in diplomatic meetings.

Recently, as the United States and Britain and other European partners pressed for Iran to be referred to the United Nations Security Council for its nuclear activities, Iranian officials accused the British of some recent bombings and deadly plane crashes in Iran.

In each case, government officials said that Britain was not working alone, but in tandem with Israel and the United States. Nevertheless, Britain was the ringmaster.

If there is an event that still angers many, it is the coup in 1953 that ousted the prime minister, Mohammed Mossadegh, and reinstalled Shah Mohammed Reza Pahlavi, who had fled the country. Although the Central Intelligence Agency was involved in ousting Mr. Mossadegh, sentiment here holds that British intelligence pulled the strings.

"The British were responsible for ending Mossadegh's rule," said Mustafa Jahangard, 26, who runs a fruit and vegetable store in central Tehran. Asked who is disliked more in Iran, the United States or Britain, Mr. Jahangard first drew a distinction between the American people, who "are good," and the American government, which "is bad." No such distinction was made for the British.

"The British win in this competition," he said. "England is even worse. They are sneaky."

The anger and suspicions are widespread, and widely discussed. On Jan. 31, Resalat, an Iranian daily, ran an article about the bombings in Ahvaz beneath the headline: "England's Hand in Measures Against Our National Security."

"Britain, the old colonizer, has a hand in all of these criminal measures," the article said. "Another trick of the government of the old colonizer, England, is that whenever its secret intentions — in conspiring against others — are somehow revealed, it takes totally friendly positions, that are against America's positions, regarding Iran; and when everything is back to normal, it follows up its previous hostile positions."

The British Embassy occupies a large compound in Tehran and is tucked back inside, behind a tall brick wall. Reza Razavi said he had run his pen store on a corner, on the other side of the wall, for 12 years, and had never, to his knowledge, had a British customer from the embassy. He said it was easy to believe that the British were up to no good because of recent charges made public by Russia about a British diplomat caught working as a spy — and of course the Mossadegh affair.

As for all the negative deeds Iranians attribute to the Americans, he said, "If you think about it, America was under the British as well."

For Americans, It Can Pay To Play In Iran's Court (WP)

By Karl Vick

The Washington Post, February 10, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0014190

Imports Pump Up Basketball's Popularity

TEHRAN -- Making himself as inconspicuous as a 7-foot-2 black man can be in Iran, Garth Joseph sidled up to the store counter. His air was at once playful and furtive. "Give me that good stuff," he whispered.

The clerk, a bespectacled woman dressed in a black head scarf, reached under the counter and brought forth a slab of pork: It was black-market bacon, absolutely illegal in the Islamic Republic of Iran and priced like the contraband it was.

"Fifteen dollars for bacon!" Joseph squawked, reaching into his sweats for his wad of green Iranian currency. "It's so much money, but I love bacon. I eat about two pounds of bacon a day in America."

But in America, Joseph warmed the bench during his only season in the National Basketball Association, hobbled by injuries and struggling for a place in a league moving away from the big man. And in Iran, he is huge in every way, the object of stares and delight not only for his gargantuan size, but also as the most conspicuous and highest-paid of the basketball players who left the United States to play the pivot along the "axis of evil," a grouping in which President Bush included the country where they have found their fortunes.

About 20 Americans play hoops for a living in Iran. They nurture pro careers that might not exist in the States, navigate a culture that offers precious few diversions in public -- though a lot more behind closed doors -- and, as much as possible, avoid politics. Iran is at the center of international concern for its nuclear ambitions and has remained notorious to the United States since 1979, when student radicals took over the U.S. Embassy in a siege that lasted 444 days. But for offshore ballplayers working for a paycheck, Iran is just another stop on an international circuit that quietly counterbalances the NBA's burgeoning import of players from Croatia, Congo and China, to name just the C's.

"One of my friends -- he's really like a cave man -- he says, 'Are they walking around with AKs?' " said Andre Pitts, a Texas native who plays point guard on the same team with Joseph, Saba Battery. "I said, 'If you came here, you wouldn't ever want to go back, the way they treat you.' "

Black-market bacon is the least of it. American players are paid from $60,000 to $200,000 a year to elevate a sport that in Iran ranks in public popularity behind soccer, volleyball and wrestling, in that order. The Americans are considered so special they are not even required to cover their tattoos with bandages, as their Iranian teammates do on game days. They are paid in dollars, which they must wire home through third countries because U.S. banks are prohibited by sanctions from doing business with Iran.

The Americans "cover up the weaknesses of the team and help basketball in the whole country," said Mustafa Hashemi, coach of Petrochimi, sponsored by the Petroleum Ministry in the southern city of Mahram, a city so devoid of acceptable restaurants that the Americans eat in a company cafeteria.

"It's like being at a camp," said Eddie Elisma, a New York native drafted in 1997 by the Seattle SuperSonics and now a Petrochimi team leader. "It's not as bad as you think."

In fact, inside a private home, life in Iran can be exactly the opposite of the public image. In Joseph's six months in Tehran, his most striking discovery has been the nation's double life. He first noticed it during Ramadan, the month when observant Muslims fast during daylight hours.

"They eat," Joseph declared. "They don't eat in public, but they eat.

"It's like I found out: A lot of things aren't done in public here. They're done, though."

On the streets of Tehran, for instance, many women glide along under the enveloping black chador that covers all but their faces. "Little ninjas walking around," Joseph said. "You can't look at them -- you're afraid they'll smack you."

About two weeks after arriving, he was invited inside an apartment in the prosperous, generally liberal north of Tehran. He watched as female guests arrived and peeled off their cloaks.

"Nice miniskirts," Joseph said, smiling at the memory. "You know, I'm married. But I'm lookin'."

And behind closed doors, the liquor flowed freely -- both the homemade vodka that has been produced in Iran since the 1979 revolution and the bottles of Smirnoff that have become readily available in recent years through discreet dealers.

"Do you like my liquor collection?" Pitts said, gesturing to the well-stocked alcove in his own apartment, sleekly decorated in blacks and whites.

For Americans playing offshore, any hardships are relative. Before arriving in Tehran last season, Pitts played in Turkey, Cyprus, Lebanon, Hong Kong and Syria, where he was a star. Joseph, whose brief time in the NBA was split between Toronto and Denver, arrived here after four seasons in China, where he once played an outdoor game at minus-20-degree temperatures on a dirt court.

"The Middle East -- based on what they read in The Post or see on CNN -- will scare most travelers off," said Jerald Wrightsil, who built a business representing U.S. players offshore after his own overseas career in the 1990s, when Eastern Europe was the new frontier. "But players chasing a paycheck, they're willing to take that chance."

DOJ_NMG_0014191

There have been perils. Stones sometimes rain down from the stands, said Pitts, adding that a fragment injured an eye of one teammate.

But players say the primary risk in Iran is being bored to death. The conservative Muslim clerics who prohibit the public sale of pork, proscribed by the Koran, do the same for alcohol. Women are required to cover their hair, and public mixing of the sexes is officially discouraged.

For the professional athlete, such strictness has its upside.

"It prolongs my career," said Pitts, recalling the night spots of secular Syria, where women sometimes danced on the bar. "I'm getting good rest."

But it's not for everyone. Joseph, a jocular extrovert, was flummoxed to find health clubs populated by only men.

"How do you live here without looking at women?" he asked. "What do you go to the weight room for?" Worse was learning that, in Iran, even beaches are segregated by sex.

He shook his head, just inches from the ceiling in his bleak, two-bedroom apartment overlooking the Sadr Expressway, its traffic roaring through the gray of Tehran in winter. The bed was in the living room, to be closer to the satellite television that players describe as their life-support system. "I never watch Iranian TV," Joseph said. "Always some military guy on."

On the coffee table: old issues of People and a basketball magazine. "Oh, I got to keep my place a little Americanized," he said. The one book in the room was The Essential Atlas of the World.

Joseph was saying that China at least had TGIFridays and Outback Steakhouses. Iran is simply more foreign. Boxes of tissues take the place of napkins, and bathroom light switches are outside the door. Clothes dryers are novelties. The lemon that restaurants put on the food makes everything taste the same. And cutlery?

"I ordered a steak and they bought me a spoon," Joseph said.

The Americans not only have adjusted to Iran's duality, they also abet it. Officially, Saba Battery -- a Tehran-based team that belongs to the Defense Ministry -- refuses to employ Americans. The pretense was imposed by its owner, an arm of a government that has no diplomatic relations with Washington and regularly renews the paint on the "Death to America" slogans still scattered around the capital.

Joseph's connection to the Great Satan is at least ambiguous. Though he lives outside Albany, N.Y., he remains a citizen of Dominica, the Caribbean island where he was born and raised.

But Pitts, born and raised in Seguin, Tex., is officially listed on the team roster as a citizen of Senegal. He even has a Senegalese passport, though he's not sure how he came by it.

"My agent got it for me," he said. "Basically, I'm here for the money."

Would Iranians Rally 'Round The Flag? (LAT)

By Edward N. Luttwak, Edward N. Luttwak Is A Senior Fellow At The Center For Strategic And International Studies In Washin

The Los Angeles Times, February 10, 2006

Various ethnic and religious factions might see little to gain in supporting Tehran if the country's nuclear facilities were bombed.

THERE MAY BE good reasons to oppose an air attack on Iran's nuclear installations at this time, but one of the arguments that is advanced most often is seriously flawed.

The argument is based on a familiar axiom that ruling regimes, even unpopular ones, are strengthened by such attacks because the bombarded nation rallies around its rulers. But this does not apply to Iran. It's true that when Germans, Japanese and Serbs, among others, were bombed, they did indeed support their leaders all the more because the attacks increased their sense of national solidarity.

Iran, however, is not a nation-state but rather a multinational empire dominated by Persians, much as the Soviet Union was once dominated by Russians. Except that in this case, the Persians only account for just over half the population of Iran (making them a smaller proportion than the Russians were even in the final days of the Soviet Union).

No scholar who studies Iran would dispute that there is a very strong Persian identity and pride of ownership in ruling Iran among the Persians, but only a very weak sense of Iranian participation among non-Persians. Iran is not like Lebanon, where the different communities often fight each other. Instead, Iran's minorities each resist the Persian-dominated central government. Just in the last month, guerrillas of Baluch nationality kidnapped soldiers in southeast Iran. Arabs of Khuzistan province next to Iraq detonated bombs in Ahwaz, and Kurds clashed with the rural police.

To the extent that the different nationalities each have their own identities and oppose the essentially Persian regime, they are likely to applaud external attacks on the nuclear installations rather than rally to the defense of their rulers.

So how does factional solidarity in Iran break down?

DOJ_NMG_0014192

The Kurds, who account for about 9% of the population, have been encouraged by the example of virtual Kurdish independence in Iraq next door. Their demands for autonomy are becoming more forceful, and something of an insurgency seems to have started. Very few Kurds are likely to rally around their Persian overlords.

Smaller nationalities that are known to be disaffected because of recent examples of violent resistance include the Arabs at 3% of Iran's population and the Baluch at 2%. Little is known of the intensity of the national sentiments of the Turkmen and Lurs (2% each), and still less of the Gilaki and Mazandarani (8% in all), who may be politically more assimilated simply because they speak Persian dialects.

Along with the Kurds, all the smaller nationalities amount to only a quarter of Iran's population; but Turkic-speaking Azeris add another 24% all by themselves. Many Azeri families in Tehran especially are believed to be thoroughly assimilated, but the more numerous Azeris farther north are not, and national revival and separatist groups have become increasingly active among them. Since Azerbaijan just across the border gained its independence from the Soviet Union, the Azeris have a national home of their own, and it is not Iran.

The religious extremism of Iran's regime has further fractured the nation's solidarity by discriminating not only against the non-Muslim Bahais, Christians, Jews and Zoroastrians who amount to only 2% of the total population, and are of yet smaller political significance, but also against the 9% or more who are Sunnis (who are not even allowed to have their own mosque in Tehran, where 1 million of them live).

So, all in all, at least half the population is unlikely to be motivated by feelings of solidarity with their rulers. Only among the Persians are many likely to react to an attack as the axiom prescribes; others might welcome the humiliation of their oppressors. The bombing of Iran's nuclear installations may still be a bad idea for other reasons, but not because it would strengthen the hold of its rulers. One may hope that Iran's rulers are not misled by their own propaganda and will therefore accept a diplomatic solution rather than gamble all on an irrelevant axiom.

For Venezuela, U.S., A (Very) Little Civility (WP)

By Pamela Constable

The Washington Post, February 10, 2006

After an especially ugly week in the hostile relationship between the Bush administration and the government of Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez, Venezuela's envoy here tried yesterday to salvage some civility, saying his country sought "mature and rational relations" with Washington and would remain a "reliable" source of energy to all foreign customers, including the United States.

The State Department responded in kind, with its spokesman saying Washington was "open to a good relationship with Venezuela" and hoped for a "positive one." The spokesman, Sean McCormack, said that the two countries were cooperating in the fight against drugs and that the administration was prepared to work with governments across the political spectrum, including those with "left-of-center" views.

But the exchange did little to dispel a growing sense among officials and analysts that the current political breach between Caracas and Washington -- still major oil trading partners and former longtime democratic allies -- is becoming potentially irreparable.

In the past week, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld has compared Chavez to Adolf Hitler, and the administration's top intelligence official, John D. Negroponte, has condemned his ties with Iran and North Korea. Venezuela has expelled a U.S. naval attache on charges of spying, and Washington has expelled a senior Venezuelan diplomat in return.

Meanwhile, rumors have circulated in both capitals that the United States may put Venezuela on a list of states that sponsor terrorism, a designation that would make it ineligible for most U.S. aid and programs. A State Department spokesman yesterday declined to say whether such a move was being considered.

There were other signs that the antagonism was hardening between the United States and Chavez, a self-styled revolutionary leader and protege of Cuba's Fidel Castro. First elected president in 1998 and reelected in 2000, he survived a coup attempt two years later and has since repeatedly accused the United States of seeking to overthrow him. He has vowed to thwart a U.S.-backed hemispheric free-trade pact and forge an alternative economic pact within Latin America.

In an interview Wednesday, the senior State Department official for Latin America, Thomas A. Shannon Jr., described the U.S. differences with Chavez as "a battle of ideas . . . a battle that we shouldn't be afraid of." He depicted Chavez as a defiant but comic figure, "standing there and desperately taking swings at us. We must go around him and engage the rest of the region in our common positive agenda," he said.

Shannon, a scholarly diplomat, is viewed among Latin America experts here as less ideologically allergic to Chavez than his recent predecessors, and he said he hoped the two governments could find common ground on a number of issues. But yesterday, Venezuelan Ambassador Bernardo Alvarez complained that he had not been able to see Shannon, although he said he has traveled to several states to promote Venezuela's project to assist poor families through home heating oil subsidies.

DOJ_NMG_0014193

"We are not against the United States. We are against certain policies of the United States, but we have a lot of important things in common," Alvarez told journalists. "We are not a threat to the national interests of the United States or anyone else. Why are they trying to portray us as anti-American?"

Several experts on U.S.-Latin American relations in Washington said both governments were to blame for the increasingly hostile rhetoric and plummeting relations. They suggested that provocative comments such as those made by Rumsfeld could play into Chavez's hands as he seeks to rally domestic support against a foreign enemy.

"The State Department is clearly attempting to set a different tone, but there are other voices in the administration that reflect knee-jerk Cold War thinking," said Julia Sweig, an associate scholar at the Council on Foreign Relations. "Chavez has figured out how to play those cards really well, but it would be a mistake to ascribe to individuals like Chavez and Castro the deep social cleavages in the region."

Otto Reich, a former senior State Department official who is now a private consultant, said that the Bush administration had largely refrained from verbal mud-slinging and that Chavez was responsible for provoking U.S. hostility. "We didn't start this," he said. "If there is going to be change, it has to come from the other side."

Reich said that there was little chance other Latin American leaders, even those with left-of-center views, would follow Chavez's leadership, but that Chavez could do serious regional harm. Those leaders should be "concerned that he is giving all of Latin America a bad name," Reich said. "The region badly needs foreign investment, and it doesn't help to have him running around with a red beret and incendiary rhetoric."

'New Populists' Vs. The West (CSM)

By Howard Lafranchi

The Christian Science Monitor, February 10, 2006

WASHINGTON - Some might call it the axle of anti-American populism.

With linchpins in Tehran on one end and Caracas on the other, a new brand of international populism is rising by fanning flames of division between Western powers and the "powerless" of the developing world.

Leaders, from Iran's President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad to Venezuela's President Hugo Chávez, are winning points at home by striking a nationalist and anti-American pose. Their method: Use the international stage to rail against what they see as a disconnect between the values espoused by the world's sole superpower and its actions.

· Mr. Ahmadinejad consolidates his domestic political power and wins support among several countries caught in America's cross hairs by pointing out that Washington accepts the nuclear status of Pakistan - which it needs on its side in the war on terror - while opposing Iran's program, which Iran insists is for power-generation only.

· Mr. Chávez, espousing a philosophy of "democratic socialism" in any international forum that will listen, accuses the United States of trying to overthrow his own democratically elected government. He fires up sympathetic crowds by branding "US imperialism [as] our real enemy."

Yet for all their heated rhetoric, the two leaders have a vision for the world, one that seeks to end the "sole superpower" reality. Beyond simply opposing America's robust exercise of power - a sentiment increasingly found in the developing world, especially - their aim is to join political forces to provide a significant counterweight in the international arena.

"There is no great level of love between Venezuela and Iran, but they both are seeking a multipolar world, and that's where the two of them find a point of intersection," says Miguel Tinker-Salas, a Latin America and US foreign-policy expert at Pomona College in Claremont, Calif.

The two leaders, though, are impelled by different motives. Chávez is motivated by an antiglobalization stance that vilifies Washington as the epicenter of market- oriented economics, says Thomas Carothers, an expert on democracy and rule of law at Carnegie Endowment for International Peace. Ahmadinejad's wrath, he says, is more focused on the Bush administration's agenda for secular democracy in the Middle East.

Russia's Vladimir Putin also belongs on the list, says Mr. Carothers, for his challenge to the West over its promotion of democracy in Russia and in the former Soviet neighboring countries.

"We're seeing on different fronts different leaders who are pushing back," he says, "with the idea of resisting the West." It is "no coincidence" that all three countries are "flush with oil money" that allows their leaders the luxury of promoting their causes, he adds. A risk of overreaction by the West

The West's response to the populists' challenge need not - indeed, should not - be uniform, some analysts say. Each presents a different challenge.

DOJ_NMG_0014194

"The Latin American populists like Chávez have a very limited capacity to do anything that threatens substantial harm to our interests, so it's key in those cases not to overreact," says Andrew Bacevich, director of the Center for International Relations at Boston University.

Iran, on the other hand, is different because of the "nuclear question" and "the importance we assign to stability in that region," he says. Iran plays a key role in events in both Iraq and Afghanistan.

In some current international controversies, it's the West, not simply America, that is in the line of fire - as with the Muslim world's fury over cartoons depicting the prophet Muhammad. But Chávez and Ahmadinejad, in particular, "are finding it pays politically to focus on the US," adds Mr. Tinker-Salas.

Iran lost no time this week announcing an end to cooperation on its nuclear program with the International Atomic Energy Agency, after the IAEA on Saturday approved a US-supported resolution that reports Iran to the United Nations Security Council.

Landing Iran in the Security Council was a goal of the Bush administration for at least two years. But the vote also revealed cracks in the international community and support for Iran - albeit from some at the top of Washington's blacklist. Syria, Venezuela, and Cuba all voted "no" on the IAEA resolution.

Iran's foreign minister will travel to Cuba and Venezuela this month in a bid to further cement support for Iran's battle against the "world oppressor" - the US. Ahmadinejad has established contact, too, with Evo Morales, the recently elected populist president of Bolivia. Rumsfeld takes a jab

The US is also caught in what State Department officials describe as a "tit-for-tat" imbroglio with Chávez. After Caracas expelled a military attaché assigned to the US Embassy on charges of spying, the US responded last Friday by expelling a Venezuelan diplomat.

The US action followed comments by Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld in which he likened Chávez to Adolf Hitler, saying both were "elected legally." The election of "populist" leaders like Chávez and Bolivia's new president, he added, "are worrisome."

Some experts caution against such riffs, saying they only play into the hands of the new populists, coming at a time when US standing in the world is low and more people seem to sympathize with challenges to American power.

"People see a certain hypocrisy in US actions, and what we're seeing from people like Chávez and Iran's president are attempts to exploit that," says Tinker-Salas.

"The US has a pretty good record of falling into this trap," adds Mr. Bacevich of Boston University. "The Bush administration has so overused the Hitler analogy that it's almost demeaning to history."

Iran's depiction of an "arrogant West" has "some echo" in parts of the developing world, he adds, but that doesn't mean Damascus, Havana, and Caracas are poised to lead a new anti-West movement.

Still, anti-Western sentiment shows signs of spreading, fed by economics, nationalism, or culture, says Carothers. That should give the US pause from "sparring" with the new populists, he says, "as tempting as that might be."

The current circumstances should also encourage the US to reduce its use of all foreign oil, he adds.

"It takes ready cash to fiddle with politics outside your borders," he says, "and thanks to oil prices that's something that all of these leaders have."

Candidate Of Haiti's Poor Leads In Early Tally With 61% Of Vote (NYT)

By Ginger Thompson

The New York Times, February 10, 2006

PORT-AU-PRINCE, Haiti, Feb. 9 — Unofficial electoral results that had been carried in by mules, trucks and helicopters from polling centers across the country appeared Thursday to give an early lead to René Préval, a former president considered a champion of the poor masses and a thorn in the side of the elite.

The Provisional Electoral Council announced Thursday night that Mr. Préval had won 61 percent of the 15 percent of the votes tabulated from the election Tuesday, including 67 percent of the votes counted so far in the department that includes Port-au-Prince.

While several of his opponents quietly began to move toward conceding, others cautioned that it was still too early to declare a winner, and the political hostilities that have kept this country near the brink of anarchy lingered in the air.

Heavily armed gang members who control some of the slums that are Mr. Préval's political strongholds have threatened violence if he is not declared the winner with more than 50 percent of the votes, thereby avoiding a runoff election. It was also from the slums that Mr. Préval's mentor, the former president, Jean-Bertrand Aristide, drew his political strength.

A spokesman for Charles-Henry Baker, a wealthy factory owner considered the candidate of the tiny elite, said his campaign had begun preparing charges of fraud to try to stop Mr. Préval from winning power.

DOJ_NMG_0014195

As Haiti, a country of 8.5 million people, braced for final results, which are not expected until this weekend, it was not easy to tell whether the nation was on the verge of its first real steps out of anarchy, or set to plunge into another cycle of political upheaval.

Ending the political fighting between the rich and the poor must be the first of a long list of priorities for its next president. And the question looming over Mr. Préval is whether a man whose previous term as president was overshadowed by Mr. Aristide, a polarizing political leader, is up to the task.

"Préval has to turn history upside down in Haiti," said Mark Schneider, of the International Crisis Group, a nonpartisan organization focusing on conflict resolution. "For decades, if not centuries, Haitian politics have been ruled by a take-no-prisoners mentality. The determination of the Haitian people to use the ballot to change their history became evident after the record turnout Tuesday. And if the early reports of a first round win turn out to be accurate, I would hope that René Préval knows that he cannot govern alone."

In an interview last month at his sister's house in Port-au-Prince, and then another this week in Marmelade, his father's hometown, Mr. Préval, a former bakery owner, said his priority would be to provide relief to the two-thirds of the population living in extreme poverty. His plans include what he described as a "universal public school program," and at least one free meal a day for poor children.

Mr. Préval also said he would investigate the cases of hundreds of prisoners who claim they are being held for political purposes, and would negotiate with gangs, rather than using only force against them, to end violence and lawlessness in slums like Cité Soleil.

"What do you prefer?" he asked. "An amnesty, or for people to keep dying?"

Mr. Préval said he that would recruit Haitian professionals overseas to help rebuild the government, and hinted that he had offered a job in his administration to a former presidential candidate, Dumarsais Siméus, a Haitian-born business magnate who was forced out of the race because he is an American citizen.

A chief objective of Mr. Préval's government, one of his advisers said, would be to attract more investment from the United States. In the last decade, the adviser said, United States investment in Haiti was less than $10 million, the amount invested in a single year in the neighboring Dominican Republic.

But Mr. Préval also suggested that he would reach out to his opponents among the middle and upper classes. He said that much of his campaign had been financed by the elite, and that he would appoint a prime minister from the political party that wins control of the parliament, which is highly unlikely to be his own.

"People know that I don't like to speak of myself," said Mr. Préval, 63. "But I think the first thing that people appreciate about me is that Préval has not stolen. Préval is not an assassin. Préval respects freedom. Préval is frank and honest.

"He says what he can and cannot do, and he doesn't make promises he cannot keep."

After graduating from college in Belgium, he lived in New York. "I always told my father I worked on Wall Street," Mr. Préval said of those years. "But I never told him I was a messenger. I used to think how my father would kill me if he saw me sweeping floors and making coffee."

By 1990, Mr. Préval had returned to Haiti and had opened a bakery that supplied bread to an orphanage run by Mr. Aristide, who was then a priest. When Mr. Aristide rose to power as Haiti's first elected president, he appointed Mr. Préval prime minister.

Haitians called the men the Twins. In voodoo, twins are believed to have an eternal bond and magical powers. And after Mr. Aristide was overthrown by a military coup, Mr. Préval went with him into exile.

When Mr. Aristide was restored to power in 1994, Mr. Préval returned with him. And with Mr. Aristide's blessing a year later, Mr. Préval was elected president a year later.

He was credited with supporting important human rights investigations that led to trials and convictions against high-ranking police and military officers involved in political assassinations.

But his government was crippled by a Parliament dominated by his opponents and meddling by his old ally, Mr. Aristide. And critics said his greatest single achievement was becoming the only president, in a country roiled by a long history of military coups, to finish a full term in office and peacefully turn over power.

Political observers said Mr. Préval, who served as president from 1996 to 2000, was not able to keep many promises during his last term in office.

A slight, unassuming, plain-talking agronomist, Mr. Préval had never been a high achiever before he stumbled into political power in the shadows of the extremely charismatic Mr. Aristide. And until now he had essentially stayed there.

His successor was Mr. Aristide. But by then, aides to Mr. Préval said, relations between the two had been severely strained, and Mr. Préval retired to his father's hometown, near the north coast.

DOJ_NMG_0014196

Then two years ago, another armed uprising, along with pressure by the United States, forced Mr. Aristide from power and pushed Haiti, the hemisphere's poorest country, close to collapse.

Political observers have said Mr. Préval was sought out by the United States and governments leading the United Nations Stabilization Mission struggling to restore order.

"I think Préval wants to show he's his own man, that he can leave his own legacy, and solve some of this country's worst problems," said Mr. Schneider, of the International Crisis Group. "Hopefully his opposition will recognize they don't have an option, for the sake of the country, but to cooperate."

Haitians Patiently Await Final Election Results (CSM)

By Danna Harman

The Christian Science Monitor, February 10, 2006

PORT-AU-PRINCE, HAITI - The streets remained empty Thursday, with shops closed, businesses boarded up, and schools locked: Haiti, as if holding its breath, waited patiently as the ballots continued to trickle in.

Final results from Tuesday's presidential election are expected over the weekend. At press time Thursday, partial returns show that René Préval had a comfortable lead over his 33 opponents - a finding that at least one of his rivals said was not acceptable.

With 9,000 UN troops and 5,000 Haitian police out in full force to maintain security, National Police Chief Mario Andersol warned of the possibility of violence, should candidates feel the vote wasn't going their way. Election day itself, despite massive disorganization, was generally peaceful - giving hope to many here that the entire exercise would be a success.

"We have gotten this far. Let's continue to be calm," begged Rosemond Pradel, secretary general of the Provisional Electoral Council (CEP).

The reason it has taken so long for the votes to be counted, explained Mr. Pradel, was that the ballots were still being ferried - by plane, truck, and even mule - from around the country to the vote tabulation center in Port-au-Prince, often over difficult terrain. Logistical and technical problems have beset Haiti's election, the first since President Jean-Bertrand Aristide was ousted two years ago.

Polling stations across Port-au-Prince - from the Cité Soleil slum to the upscale Petionville suburb - began posting results late Wednesday, most showing Préval with between 60 and 92 percent of the vote. Though Préval's support outside the capital is not as strong, his political adviser Bob Manuel told reporters he felt confident his candidate would win more than 50 percent of the votes nationwide, thus avoiding a run-off and becoming Haiti's next president.

Préval, an ally of Mr. Aristide, has remained secluded all week in his rural hometown of Marmelade and refused to comment on developments.

But candidate Charles Henri Baker, a wealthy businessman who, according to pre-election polling, is Préval's closest opponent, called the elections "a mess" Thursday and saidhis party was collecting evidence of fraud. "Even if you got ink on your finger, it was the kind that washed off on your pants when wet," he said. Pradel dismissed those claims, saying it was the same sort of ink used in all past Haitian elections.

"We have eyewitnesses to voters casting ballots up to eight times by going to different stations," Baker also charged in a phone interview. "This has to be looked into."

International election monitoring groups have said, however, that, despite minor irregularities, there was no credible evidence of widespread fraud. "Having been on the ground in Haiti observing the preparations and the elections, I would say it was a reasonably fair election," Knowlson Gift, Trinidad's Foreign Minister, told The Associated Press.

UN Secretary-General Kofi Annan, meanwhile, congratulated the Haitian people in a statement Wednesday in New York, saying he was pleased that, "compared to previous elections, [this one] ... was remarkably free from violence." The secretary-general appealed to all to respect the official results to be announced by the CEP and said it was "essential that all political and social actors come together in a spirit of national reconciliation and dialogue."

Baker, however, stressed there was "no way" he would consider partaking in a future Préval government. "[Préval's] morality and mine don't mix together. I am an honest person. I believe in the law. So I don't think we will be working together," said Baker, adding: "We will be in bad shape if he becomes president."

Even as the process of counting the votes and evaluating the election stretched on, and fears of future violence weighed down on Haiti, many here tried to begin discussing the next steps for the country.

"We have spent so long talking about ballots and IDs and polling stations - but what about the issues?" asked Maryse Kedar, a former minister under Préval, pointing at what many here have called a "substance-lite" election. "What are the new ideas that have come from this process? How are we going to fix Haiti?"

DOJ_NMG_0014197

"We remain very divided," said Jean-Junior Joseph, a spokesman for interim Prime Minister Gérard Latortue, who stressed that he hopes the elections do not end up adding to that divide. "This country really needs reconciliation and dialogue. That should be our first priority."

Europe's Energy Musketeers Must Stand Together (FT)

By Kazimierz Marcinkiewicz

Financial Times, February 10, 2006

In the past few weeks, European governments have faced growing pressure to fulfil one of their most basic functions as public authorities, namely to secure natural gas supplies for their national markets. Not only the countries of central and eastern Europe but also those in the Mediterranean basin, such as Italy, have been forced increasingly to limit natural gas consumption by their industries. Political ambitions, terrorism and even climatic conditions are now threatening the energy security outlook for most European Union member states as well as other countries.

On January 1, Gazprom, the Russian company, reduced the amount of natural gas transmitted to EU member states via Ukraine's transmission system. Basically, a dispute between third countries directly touched a number of EU members. More recently – due this time perhaps to climate conditions – natural gas supplies again have been limited.

The shortages provided tangible evidence of institutional weakness in European energy security structures. The citizens of affected countries expect effective responses from the EU. But up to now, the relevant governments have been unable to respond adequately because Europe lacks the necessary treaty provisions.

It must be underlined at this point that energy security is a fundamental matter: a cut to energy supplies leads to economic disequilibrium and causes losses across a range of sectors. The governments concerned must protect their citizens and industries against such a scenario. At the same time, we are fully aware that security comes at a price and that it brings its own value.

We cannot remain defenceless nor isolated amid this increasingly threatening situation. The long-term strategic interests of EU member states demand a new initiative. In Europe, there is a widespread feeling that EU countries should act in solidarity: after all, the Union is a vehicle for deeper economic co-operation. Yet, the field of energy security is not within the scope of the EU's competencies. This is a paradox. In 1950, it was precisely in the then-strategically important sector of coal energy that the great process of European integration began, resulting eventually in the European Coal and Steel Community. A few years later, Euratom, the European Atomic Energy Community, was created. The problems of energy security were thus at the very heart of the European integration process. We should remember this heritage.

Up to now, EU activity on the fringes of the energy security problem – for example in the security of natural gas supplies – has been market-related and has served mainly to achieve a single market for natural gas. This was intended to make it more secure. Yet, a difficulty here is in finding bridging solutions aimed at liberalisation of the market, a goal the European Commission rightly promotes, while emphasising the necessity of effective provision of energy security that rests upon EU member governments.

It is the right time, in my view, to suggest a common effort to face not only current but also future challenges. That is why I want to propose to our partners from the EU and the Nato alliance a treaty on energy security. It would be an expression of solidarity for all parties, uniting them in the face of any energy threat provoked by either a cut or a diminution of supply sources that may occur because of natural disasters, disruption of wide distribution and supply systems or political decisions by suppliers.

Such an energy security treaty could follow formulas contained in the 1949 Washington Treaty, an agreement that allowed for effective transatlantic co-operation, or provisions of the modified Treaty of Brussels that established the Western European Union in 1948.

A European energy security treaty along these lines could become a real tool that would give us some badly needed certainty, as well as security in crisis situations. That is why it is essential that the treaty contains a clearly and firmly stated guarantee clause based on the "musketeer principle": "All for one – one for all".

Our president is raising this issue today in Washington and I will shortly present an initiative that expands on this idea. It seems clear that Europe will continue to depend on external energy supplies. I am convinced that the latest – unprecedented – curtailment of natural gas supplies to the EU, in one of the harshest winters of recent years, created a sufficient predicament to encourage bold and firm action. An energy security treaty would give us ways and means to provide stability and security that we all wish for.

The writer is prime minister of Poland

Driving Toward Middle East Nukes In Our S.U.V.'s (NYT)

By Thomas L. Friedman

DOJ_NMG_0014198

The New York Times, February 10, 2006

LONDON

The world stands today at a very dangerous dividing line. It is the dividing line between the post-cold-war world, which we have known since 1989 — one of expanding democracy and free markets — and a post-post-cold-war world, which is unknown but almost certain to be a much less stable, prosperous and benign place.

I believe the questions that will determine whether we enter the post-post-cold-war world will come down to two: how India, China and Russia deal with Iran's nuclear ambitions, and how the West, particularly America, deals with $60-a-barrel oil.

Let me explain: if Iran develops a nuclear bomb, Saudi Arabia, Egypt and possibly other Sunni Arab states are bound to follow. The Sunni Arabs can overlook Israel's bomb, but they will never stand for the Persian Shiites having a bomb and them not. That's about brothers with a centuries-old rivalry. And if the Arab world starts to go nuclear, then you will see the crumbling of the whole global nuclear nonproliferation regime.

A world with so many nuclear powers, particularly in its primary oil-producing region, could only be a more dangerous and unstable place, compared with the post-cold-war world. Imagine Iran with $60-a-barrel oil to make all the mischief it wants, and a nuclear weapon to shield it from any retaliation. Indeed, if you want to know what the post-post-cold-war world would sound like, listen to Iran's poisonous president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad. He was quoted in The Guardian of London the other day as saying: "Our enemies cannot do a damn thing. We do not need you at all. But you are in need of the Iranian nation."

I'm convinced that the only countries capable of getting Iran to back down — through diplomacy — are China, India and Russia. Europe is too weak, and America has already used every economic sanction it can on Iran. China, India and Russia have been great beneficiaries of the post-cold-war order, and the trade, economic development and exports it has made possible. That order was largely shaped and safeguarded by the United States, with China, India and Russia often getting a free ride.

But that order will continue only if China, India and Russia get over their reluctance to get too close to America and become real stakeholders in maintaining this post-cold-war world.

I want to share power and responsibility with them — starting with the three of them, which represent half of humanity, looking Iran in the eye and telling its leadership that they will join in any and all U.N. sanctions if Iran tries to build an A-bomb. That would get Tehran's attention.

As for America, its leadership task has shifted. If the Bush team continues to let Dick Cheney set its oil policy — one that will keep America dependent on crude oil — the post-cold-war democracy movement that was unleashed by the fall of the Berlin Wall will be either aborted, diluted or reversed. If regimes like those in Iran, Venezuela, Syria, Burma, Sudan and Nigeria have the benefit of 10 years of $60-a-barrel oil, whatever democratic tide President Bush thinks he is unleashing will be stymied. The worst regimes in the world will have the most power to support the most regressive political and religious trends.

I don't approve of the Danish newspaper cartoons mocking the Prophet Muhammad. Yes, you can see much worse in the Arab-Muslim press on any day. But why should the West get into that gutter? What I approve of even less are the blatant efforts to intimidate the world media that have printed these cartoons — an intimidation effort cynically fueled by Iran, Syria and its theocratic allies. What do you think will happen after a few more years of $60-a-barrel oil? You will see a radical arc from Iran to Syria to Hezbollah to Hamas — all financed by Iran — intimidating every moderate in the Muslim world.

A British official recalled for me that in 1946, the British foreign secretary, Ernest Bevin, remarked, "Give me 100,000 tons of coal and I will give you a foreign policy." What he meant was, Give me the energy source to heat the homes and run the businesses of Europe, and I will give you a rebuilt Europe.

Well, I say, Give me even $30-a-barrel oil and I will give you an Iranian regime that is a lot less smug — an Iran that will need to be tied into the world much more in order to create real jobs for its exploding population.

That's why we need an urgent national effort, starting with a gasoline tax, to move the U.S. economy onto a path of more fuel-efficient cars and renewable energy. If we do it, everyone will follow.

If we don't, then say hello to the post-post-cold-war world and say goodbye to the post-cold-war world. It was fun while it lasted.

Planned Economy As China's Trade Clout Grows, So Do Price-Fixing Accusations (WSJ)

By John R. Wilke And Kathy Chen

The Wall Street Journal, February 10, 2006

Ten years ago, China's pharmaceutical firms had a sliver of the world's market for vitamin C. Today, China is the OPEC of vitamin C.

DOJ_NMG_0014199

Chinese manufacturers currently supply more than 85% of the vitamin C used in the U.S. Just like the oil cartel, they can heavily influence world prices. After a 2001 agreement among China's four largest producers, spot prices for vitamin C rose to as high as $9 a kilogram from lows of less than $3.

Cooperation among competitors is illegal in the U.S. when it leads to higher prices for consumers. So far, about half a dozen civil antitrust suits have been filed against Chinese vitamin C manufacturers in various U.S. courts. Federal prosecutors in Texas are reviewing similar allegations, though the Justice Department hasn't yet decided whether or not to pursue criminal charges, people close to the inquiry say.

As China becomes ever more dominant in manufacturing, its ability to dictate the prices of industrial and consumer products is steadily rising. As a result, Chinese manufacturers are increasingly running afoul of Western antitrust law in products from vitamin C to a mineral used in steel production. These legal struggles could become another point of tension in the U.S.-China relationship, which has been tested by disagreements over matters from textile tariffs to the trade deficit.

Chinese companies deny breaking U.S. law and have hired U.S. law firms to mount a defense. The companies are expected to argue they are acting as agents of the Chinese government and therefore aren't subject to antitrust law. A Chinese industry executive says the companies raised prices to stave off accusations they were "dumping," or illegally selling products abroad at below cost to win market share.

There are signs the vitamin C model is migrating to other Chinese exports. In a meeting of Chinese makers of the pain reliever acetaminophen, the companies "fervently indicated their wish to use the example of vitamin C industry self-regulation," according to minutes posted on the group's Web site. Prices subsequently jumped 20%. Chinese makers of saccharin, rayon and magnesite -- a mineral used in steel production -- recently formed similar alliances. Magnesite producers also are being sued in the U.S.

In the case of saccharin, Chinese producers had been accused by the U.S. Commerce Department of dumping. Then in March 2003, five companies formed a "Saccharin Sub-committee" of the China Chamber of Commerce, a quasigovernment body. They declared that low prices no longer made sense now that they had overtaken their U.S. and South Korean rivals.

"Due to disorderly internal competition...various enterprises lost huge profits" and had to pay antidumping duties levied by the U.S., according to minutes of the meeting posted on the group's Web site. The companies agreed to raise export prices and said "self-regulation should continue into 2004 to prevent the mutual slaughtering of aggressive competition."

William Isaacson, a Washington lawyer who filed the first of the civil lawsuits against Chinese producers of vitamin C and magnesite, says these aren't isolated instances. "Once Chinese companies can control a market, this becomes their business model," he contends. His vitamin C case is pending in federal court in Brooklyn, N.Y. The magnesite case was filed in U.S. District Court in Newark, N.J.

American courts have been increasingly willing to claim jurisdiction across international borders in antitrust cases if harm can be shown to U.S. consumers. U.S. companies that use vitamin C include makers of dietary supplements, soft drinks and animal feed.

Monopolies remain active in parts of China's economy, even though price-fixing was formally outlawed in 1998. A sweeping new antimonopoly law is being drafted in Beijing. Its adoption has been slowed by squabbling among Chinese government agencies forced to give up the ability to set prices. It isn't clear if the new law would bar price collusion in the vitamin market.

China's state-run pharmaceutical companies began making vitamin C in 1958 catering to domestic demand. In the late 1970s, Chinese government researchers found a way to speed up the basic production process, which is done by fermenting ascorbic acid. Chinese companies then could make vitamin C in two steps rather than five, as was common in the West.

Looking Abroad

Vitamin C, thus, was among the first Western drugs for which China developed its own intellectual property and a clear cost advantage over foreign rivals. With its new technology, Chinese producers began to look for sales abroad. The promise of export profits attracted new producers. Production lines multiplied and volume soared.

Northeast Pharmaceutical Group Co. was one of the first to begin exporting. Based in the gritty industrial city of Shenyang, 800 miles northeast of Beijing, Northeast is among the biggest Chinese vitamin C producers and boasts that it is one of China's best-known pharmaceutical brands. It employs 8,000 workers making products from antibiotics to the AIDS drug AZT. Vitamin C is its best seller, with more than 15,000 tons a year under production.

China's vitamin makers got a big break in 1997, thanks to an earlier antitrust dispute. After a long investigation, the U.S. Justice Department accused European and Japanese companies of price-fixing in a dozen vitamins, including vitamin C. It became the largest-ever criminal antitrust case, resulting in nearly $1 billion in government fines and several jail terms for executives.

DOJ_NMG_0014200

With the European-Japanese cartel broken, Chinese companies flooded the market with low-price vitamin C, forcing plant closings and consolidation among European and Japanese firms. Chinese companies, who previously had been overshadowed by their bigger rivals, quickly captured much of the world market.

Prices fell sharply from the high of $12 a kilo established by the European and Japanese cartel members in 1996. By late 2001, competition pushed prices down to $2.80 a kilo. (A kilogram equals 2.2 pounds.)

People familiar with the matter say China's vitamin C makers were told at that time by the Chinese government to deal with Western complaints about price dumping. They say the companies took that to mean they should coordinate to raise prices.

Ma Xiaoye, director of independent think tank Shanghai Academy for World Watch and a former Chinese trade official, says the government routinely encourages Chinese companies to "coordinate" to avoid price wars that often spark antidumping charges, a practice he says is legal. He says these requests aren't binding and that the groups don't usually set specific prices.

Mr. Ma says these efforts often don't result in any agreement. "Vitamin C was an exception, because there are only a few companies," Mr. Ma says. "It was easier" for them to agree on an approach.

In November 2001, the four largest Chinese producers formed the Vitamin C Chapter of the China Chamber of Commerce of Medicines & Health Products Importers & Exporters. On its Chinese-language Web site, the chapter announced a "self-discipline agreement...to stabilize and raise export prices."

Soon after, spot prices for vitamin C shot up to as high as $7 a kilo. By 2003, rising demand and supply shortages pushed the price higher.

Guan Ningyun, legal director of the China Chamber of Commerce of Medicines & Health Products Importers & Exporters denies the group sets prices, saying in an interview that "it's the market force that pushes prices up."

The rise enticed a few Chinese producers to grab market share by cutting their prices, according to the U.S. civil suits. U.S. import data show a noticeable price dip in mid-2003.

In November, the Vitamin C trade group held an "emergency meeting" in which members again agreed not to cut prices, according to allegations in the U.S. civil suits. Spot prices rose to as high as $9 a kilo by the end of December. As U.S. lawyers readied lawsuits at the end of 2004, prices again drifted downward. It also is possible that some Chinese producers were backsliding on their promises. In recent months, as antitrust scrutiny increased, U.S. prices have fallen to as low as $3.80 a kilo.

Bulk purchasers of vitamin C in the U.S. were buffeted by the price swings. "We were paying about $4 a kilo, then within a year it was $8," says Bradley Reynolds, a vice president at Animal Science Products Inc., Nacogdoches, Texas, who says the higher costs hurt profits. The family-owned, feed-supplement company blends vitamins for customers from catfish farmers to pet-food makers.

Mr. Reynolds's family firm is a lead plaintiff in one of the civil lawsuits against the Chinese vitamin C makers. It was among the U.S. businesses that won damages in the European vitamin case. Though he won't divulge the amount, Mr. Reynolds says, "it wasn't near as much as they stole."

Livestock feed accounts for about 10% of U.S. vitamin C consumption. About a third goes to food and beverage makers, where it is used as a preservative as well as a nutrient. The rest is used in pharmaceuticals and diet supplements.

The proliferation of private antitrust suits against Chinese companies has brought teams of U.S. lawyers to China seeking to defend them. Attorneys looking to defend Chinese magnesite producers recently took part in a bake-off in Beijing. The first round included 30-minute pitches in an auditorium at the China Chamber of Commerce of Metals, Minerals & Chemicals. In later meetings, held in ornate ceremonial rooms over rounds of steaming chrysanthemum tea, lawyers made individual presentations about their defense strategy.

The Chinese executives rarely spoke, the U.S. participants say, but appeared to understand every word. Their Chinese lawyers quizzed the U.S. attorneys closely about U.S. law and cited the latest cases and law-review articles. A similar competition was held for law firms seeking to represent Chinese vitamin C manufacturers.

Some attorneys maintain that antitrust law still is largely an alien concept for Chinese companies. "China today is where Japan or [South] Korea were a decade ago -- they don't fully appreciate the seriousness of these lawsuits and possible criminal investigations," says Kirby Behre, a Washington, D.C., lawyer with Paul, Hastings Janofsky & Walker LLP, which has numerous clients in China.

James Serota, an attorney with Greenberg Traurig LLP in New York, who is representing Northeast Pharmaceutical, declines to comment, citing the pending civil cases. Other vitamin C makers who have been sued decline to comment. In the past, many have said they have done nothing wrong. North China Pharmaceutical Group Ltd. called the suits "groundless" in reports carried by Xinhua, the official China news agency, in June. In Xinhua reports, Shijiazhuang Pharmaceutical Group Ltd. said the suits were "deliberately provocative."

One Possible Defense

DOJ_NMG_0014201

A recent court filing by Northeast Pharmaceutical in a Massachusetts state court signals one possible defense. The filing says Northeast is "supervised and directed" by the Shenyang municipal government and should be treated by U.S. courts as an "agent or instrumentality" of the People's Republic of China.

Under international law, sovereign nations are immune from antitrust enforcement by another country. That is why lawsuits against the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries are routinely dismissed. Although they have a number of different shareholders, the vitamin C makers are overseen by state officials and a majority of their stock is still held by government groups, according to Northeast's court filing.

It isn't clear how close these ties remain. A high-level official in the local government office that oversees North China Pharmaceutical says the government no longer "interferes" in management. "We don't help set prices, that concept is 20 or 30 years old," says the official. "They do what it takes to earn money."

Plaintiffs' lawyers are expected to challenge the immunity defense on the grounds that it doesn't apply to companies indirectly owned by the state or state-owned companies that engage in purely commercial activity.

China's chambers of commerce could be major figures in the cases. Many of the price agreements were set up under their auspices. These days, the chambers awkwardly combine their old role in China's centrally planned economy, in which they set prices and market standards, with their new one as champion of the country's newly privatized businesses. In some ways, they symbolize the learning process the country is undergoing as it becomes a key player in global trade.

"China's chamber of commerce has two personalities," says Wang Ming, deputy dean of School of Public Policy & Management at Tsinghua University.

U.S. trial lawyers are examining other Chinese industries for evidence of price fixing. Two of the firms that filed cases against Chinese vitamin C makers -- Boies Schiller & Flexner LLP, and Cohen, Milstein Hausfeld & Toll PLLC -- earlier won settlements of $1.2 billion for U.S. businesses overcharged by the European vitamin cartel. They included drug giant Abbott Laboratories and cereal maker General Mills Inc.

The team of prosecutors and FBI agents looking into Chinese vitamin C is the same one responsible for breaking up the European vitamin cartel. But criminal price-fixing cases are extraordinarily difficult to prove. Witnesses and evidence are often beyond the reach of investigators. This case, in particular, would be fraught with political and economic complications.

"These civil suits are probably going to go forward," predicts Mr. Behre, the Paul, Hastings lawyer. "But whether or not the government decides to bring a criminal case becomes a political question."

Mr. Reynolds, the Texas feed-supplement maker, doesn't think it's all that complicated. "If China is going to be a world player, they've got to play by the rules."

DOJ_NMG_0014202

From: Miller, Charles S
Sent: Friday, February 10, 2006 11:18 AM
To: Agarwal, Asheesh (CIV); Ames, Andrew; Apisson, Elizabeth M; Baxter, Felix (CIV); Branda, Joyce (CIV); Brody, Stephen (CIV); Bucholtz, Jeffrey (CIV); Bukvics, Jennifer (CIV); Claterbos, Barbara (CIV); Cohen, David M. (CIV); Cohn, Jonathan (CIV); Davidson, Jeanne (CIV); Fadely, Kathlynn (CIV); Fargo, John (CIV); Fielding, Gabrielle (CIV); Figley, Paul (CIV); Flentje, August (CIV); Garren, Timothy (CIV); Glynn, J.Patrick (CIV); Gorsuch, Neil M; Hertz, Michael (CIV); Hollis, Robert (CIV); Hunt, Jody (CIV); Hussey, Thom (CIV); Jeweler, James (CIV); Katsas, Gregory (CIV); Keisler, Peter D (CIV); Kohn, Chris (CIV); Kopp, Robert (CIV); Letter, Douglas (CIV); Levine, Larry (EOIR); Lindemann, Michael (CIV); Magnuson, Cynthia; McCallum, Robert (SMO); Meron, Daniel (CIV); Miller, Charles S; Nichols, Carl (CIV); Nowacki, John; Pyles, Phyllis (CIV); Reyes, Luis (SMO); Riley, Sharon (CIV); Rivera, Jennifer (CIV); Roehrkasse, Brian; Schiffer, Stuart (CIV); Scolinos, Tasia; Seidel, Rebecca; Senger, Jeffrey M; Spellberg, Dianne (CIV); Swenson, Lily F; Thirolf, Eugene; Wilson, Karen L; Zwick, Ken (CIV)
Subject: 2/10/06 Civil Division News

Interior ordered to pay Cobell lawyers

R-CALF: Litigation Against USDA Moves Toward Final Decision

RIM says 'work around' is free of patent risk

Billions Wasted In Iraq?

Feds put lid on bogus olive oil

'Tawdry Shleifer Affair' Stokes Faculty Anger Toward Summers

Federal judge 'shocked' by E.P.A. statements

Indian Country Today

February 10, 2006

Interior ordered to pay Cobell lawyers

by: David Melmer / Indian Country Today

WASHINGTON - The Department of the Interior was ordered by the U.S. District Court to pay attorneys' fees and expenses that have accumulated in the ongoing Cobell v. Norton case.

The total amount ordered paid by U.S. District Judge Royce Lamberth is more than $7 million. That money will come out of BIA and Interior accounts, and will affect tribal programs.

On Jan. 26, Interior Associate Deputy Secretary James Cason sent a letter to tribes notifying them that the court-mandated legal fee payment sent to Cobell attorneys on Jan. 18 would adversely affect tribal programs. He detailed where the $7 million would come from to forewarn them that some of their expectations may not be met this year.

The largest impact will be in the area of historical accounting, with a contribution of $2 million. That department, which focuses on identifying the rightful owners of special deposit accounts, was chosen because it would not be as difficult to move the work to a later and more protracted timeline.

"It's a matter of do we get them done this year or next year," Cason said.

Tribal attorneys who expect payment for work they have done for the Interior or BIA on water rights, boundary disputes or other issues may not be paid this year, Cason said. Most of that work is performed by the Justice Department, but from time to time tribal attorneys are asked to step in.

In numerous cases such as this, lawyers would do a lot of background work to make sure attorneys' fees would not be reimbursed out of tribal funds, John Dossett, general counsel for the National Congress of American Indians, said.

"In this case, none of that was done. I don't see [where] that happened. Tribes are concerned that money will come out of tribal programs, and it's clearly not what that fund is for," Dossett said.

Sen. Tim Johnson, D-S.D. and member of the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs, wrote in a response to Cason's letter: "I understand the Court's Order disturbed funding expectations; however, the inflammatory letter sent was an entirely unnecessary and inappropriate attempt to undermine the relationship between tribes and tribal members involved in the Cobell v. Norton case. It is my sincere hope that the Department revisits this decision and finds an adequate solution that fulfills its obligations to the first Americans."

NCAI President Joe Garcia called for a fair settlement to be negotiated soon and in good faith. During the annual State of the Indian Nations address on Jan. 30, Garcia said the decision to take funds from the BIA budget to comply with court orders to pay attorneys' fees "impedes our progress as tribal governments on nearly all other issues."

"Every year, the BIA budget gets cut. Every year we see somewhere from $100 million to $150 million taken out and moved over to Office of Special Trustee; that's a bigger concern. This issue of reimbursement of attorneys' fees is much smaller."

The majority of funds that will be paid to the Cobell attorneys will not come out of tribal programs. Cason said education and law enforcement are exempted.

"One of the problems the critics have not embraced is where you take the money from," Cason said, noting that there wasn't any money lying around that wasn't in use and that the department had to abide by the court order.

A 0.1 percent levy, which will generate $1 million, was imposed on most programs, including central office operations and tribal operations. In each case, the levy was small and broad-based, Cason said.

"We tried to spread the millions out so no one particular program took a big hit," Cason said.

"My advice to tribal leaders is, be careful. The financial environment has changed."

Some tribes will have an allocation reduced by $100. Cason said if that tribe works on a very slim margin, it would have a greater impact.

The BIA contributed $3 million to the attorneys' fee account, with $2 million of that coming from an account that would reimburse tribal attorneys and the other $1 million from the 0.1 percent levy.

The Cobell plaintiffs referred to the levy and fund distribution as a "cruel effort to inflict more pain on the victims of the government's long-acknowledged misbehavior." They claim the funds used to pay attorneys' fees come from areas that are designed to "punish Native Americans."

"Now that we have secured the rights to this accounting, and now that the government must pay the costs of that accounting, the Interior Department is planning to loot Indian accounts once again to cover up its misdeeds," said Eloise Cobell, lead plaintiff in the class action lawsuit.

The suit was filed nearly 10 years ago in an attempt to hold the government accountable and reconcile Individual Indian Money trust accounts for lease, royalties and other payments due tribal land owners. Cobell has stated that some $300 billion is at stake.

The Office of Special Trustee contributed $300,000 of funds that were planned for trust improvement activities; the Department of Treasury, another $2 million.

Cobell said the government could have found funds elsewhere to pay these legal fees. "They don't have to make Indians pay because they lost in court," she said.

DOJ_NMG_0014204

The government, by its own admission, has spent some $100 million defending this lawsuit. Cobell said the fees and expenses were planned and the plaintiffs made it clear two years ago they would be seeking the legal fees.

"It's an interesting irony; when we pay, they claim we are divisive and terrible," Cason said of Cobell's criticism.

"If they are so concerned about the money they should say, 'We don't want programs to be hurt, so don't pay this.' If there was some magical pot of money somewhere - I don't know where it is," Cason said.

The Cobell plaintiffs continue to claim the government cannot win this drawn-out litigation. A settlement compromise has been placed on the table for reimbursement to the IIM account-holders for $27.5 billion. That figure is disputed by the government. The Senate Indian Affairs Committee has held hearings on proposed legislation that will settle the lawsuit, but failed to include monetary funds in the legislation.

"There are side effects of the litigation. I think the tribes have been supportive, but as time goes by there are side effects to the budget," Dossett said.

A group of tribal leaders, in a recent meeting in Bismarck, N.D., offered another possible settlement figure that ranges from $13 to $27.5 billion.

"I have never seen a more blatant and transparent attempt to politicize this case in order to divide and conquer Indian country," Cobell said.

"The funds that were cut serve the nation's poorest peoples and we should do everything that we can to maintain and increase program funding for Indian Country, not cut funding," Johnson said. "There are clearly better alternatives than cutting program funding, and I am willing to pursue solutions at the legislative level that do not involve politicizing the Cobell litigation."

The amount to be taken from tribal programs will not have as much impact as the most recent budget submitted by President Bush, which cuts the BIA by $65 million.

Distribution of attorneys' fees:

* Dennis Gingold, lead plaintiff attorney: $2 million

* Thaddeus Holt: $491,000

* Mark Brown: $80,000

* Kilpatrick Stockton: $406,097

* Native American Rights Fund: $1.5 million

* Geoffrey Rempel: $40,000

* Stacy Gingold Bear: $8,000

Expenses related to the lawsuit:

* Price Waterhouse Coopers: $2.5 million

* Thaddeus Holt: $350

Total fees and expenses:

$7,066,471

END

CattleNetwork.com

2/9/06

DOJ_NMG_0014205

R-CALF: Litigation Against USDA Moves Toward Final Decision

(Billings, Mont.) – In its ongoing effort to maintain adequate import protections against the introduction of foreign animal diseases, R-CALF USA on Tuesday filed arguments with the U.S. District Court – District of Montana to support its request for oral arguments on, and full consideration of, its motion for summary judgment in the organization's litigation against USDA, specifically with regard to the agency's "BSE: Minimal Risk Regions and Importation of Commodities" rule (Final Rule).

"At this point, our case is fully briefed, and we must now wait for the District Court to review all the facts in this case and issue a decision on whether a final hearing will be held," explained R-CALF USA President Chuck Kiker. "We remain confident in our science and in our position and look forward to the Court's decision.

"USDA continues to make statements that stand in direct contradiction to the facts in the case, and, in our latest filing, we describe the surreal nature of USDA's BSE management – that is, the agency's pattern of making assertions based on limited or no evidence, and then sticking with those assertions, even in the face of solid evidence that proves USDA's assertions were incorrect," Kiker said. "For example, USDA continues to claim the Canadian ban on feeding ruminant protein to cattle is effective, even after another cow with BSE was detected just last month – a cow born 32 months after the implementation of Canada's feed ban.

"This is particularly surprising given that, in late 2004, USDA's own analysis of the risk of allowing imports from Canada relied on the fact that up until then, the BSE cases discovered among Canadian-born cattle were all in cattle that matured before Canada implemented its feed ban," Kiker pointed out. "USDA's risk analysis said if infected cattle had been born after the feed ban, that kind of situation would be evidence the ban is not effective in preventing the spread of BSE – but, USDA apparently has forgotten that conclusion in the face of just such evidence from the latest two BSE cases in Canada.

"USDA claims the prevalence of BSE in Canada is low, and even decreasing, despite the fact that Canada is detecting diseased cattle at a rate of about one case for every 20,000 head tested," said R-CALF USA CEO Bill Bullard. "Also, the age of diseased cattle in Canada is becoming younger, indicating a growing BSE problem, not a decreasing one.

"USDA claims its Final Rule ensures that no diseased cattle can enter the United States from Canada, while simultaneously, the agency is assisting the Canadian government in a search for the offspring of this latest diseased cow –all of which are under 30 months of age and therefore eligible for export to the United States," Bullard continued.

"In addition to USDA, the Canadian government, the American Meat Institute (AMI) and the National Meat Association (NMA) – joined by the Canadian and Alberta cattle associations – have filed motions in a desperate effort to discourage the District Court from conducting a thorough probe and in-depth review of the agency's Final Rule," Bullard noted.

R-CALF USA filed an objection to these third-party efforts to prevent U.S. cattlemen's concerns from being heard.

"The previous decision in this case dealt with the issue of a preliminary injunction, which was just that – preliminary," said Bullard. "The preliminary injunction does not resolve the case on the merits, and that's why R-CALF has asked the District Court to schedule a hearing in this matter. And now that all the written facts are before the District Court, a final hearing will provide the court the opportunity to consider, and issue a final decision on, the full merits of our case."

R-CALF is confident the events that have unfolded since the adverse decision last July by the U.S. 9th Circuit Court of Appeals – including the Food and Drug Administration's proposal to make needed improvements to the feed ban, USDA's abandonment of an age restriction for importing Japanese beef, reports from the Office of Inspector General that criticize USDA's management of BSE mitigation measures, as well as the discovery of a BSE-positive Canadian cow born years after the Canadian feed ban – all reinforce what R-CALF USA has said all along: USDA's Final Rule is premature, and additional, more stringent measures are needed before the United States should consider a relaxation of import restrictions for countries with ongoing BSE problems.

"We remain deeply concerned with USDA's stubborn refusal to respond to facts that demonstrate the inaccuracy of the agency's assumptions when it comes to protecting the U.S. cattle industry and U.S. consumers from BSE," Kiker emphasized.

END

Toronto Globe and Mail

February 10, 2006

RIM says 'work around' is free of patent risk

SIMON AVERY AND BARRIE MCKENNA

Research In Motion Ltd. says any worries U.S. customers have about the company's legal dispute with NTP Inc. can be overcome with a few clicks of the mouse.

With a judge scheduled in just two weeks to consider a shutdown of BlackBerry service in the United States, RIM said yesterday that it is in the final stages of preparing a new wireless e-mail system that will work around NTP patents.

Investors reacted positively, but legal and technical experts had mixed opinions as to what the strategy means for RIM, which last year failed to overturn on appeal a judgment that it infringed on NTP's technology.

Waterloo, Ont.-based RIM said the contingency involves special software that will circumvent the patent claims at the centre of the five year-old legal fight with Virginia-based NTP.

While the modification will require customers to download new software to their BlackBerrys, and corporate IT managers to upgrade the software on their BlackBerry servers, the workaround won't change the way the devices are used or administered, RIM said.

"RIM's workaround provides a contingency for our customers and partners and a counterbalance to NTP's threats. This will hopefully lead to more reasonable negotiations since NTP risks losing all future if the workaround is implemented." Jim Balsillie, RIM's chairman and co-chief executive officer, said in a news release.

The company, which first mentioned last November that it was developing a workaround, continued to give sketchy details. RIM said the system has "required substantial R&D effort" and the company has obtained a confidential opinion from "one of the world's largest law firms" that its new software will not infringe on any of the contested patents.

Lawyers for NTP expressed skepticism that RIM has found a way around a BlackBerry shutdown because it hasn't provided full technical details. "There's no new news here," said Kevin Anderson, an NTP lawyer. "This is the same thing they've been saying for months. Where's the beef?"

Andrew Seybold, an early consultant to RIM and president of Outlook 4Mobility, a consultancy and publishing firm, said the new system will likely keep e-mails flowing without users seeing a big difference. But behind the scenes, the new system will be moving e-mail traffic slightly differently.

"Talking theoretically, it means that maybe mail delivery will be a little slower. But it appears to me that the workaround will keep customers up and running," he said. "What I think it does more importantly is it gives [RIM] a stronger position to go back to the NTP folks and come up with a settlement."

A $450-million (U.S.) settlement announced last March fell apart in June. Since then the two sides appear to have made no material progress in talks, even though a court magistrate remains involved in the process. U.S. District Court Judge James Spencer has scheduled a hearing on injunctive relief and damages on Feb. 24.

The timing means the judge may issue a decision before the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office completes a re-examination of NTP's contested patents. The PTO has already rejected all of them on preliminary review.

RIM's workaround buys the company some time, increases its bargaining leverage with NTP, and may ease concerns among nervous customers, said law professor Martin Adelman, director of the intellectual property law program at George Washington University.

RIM's insistence that it can keep the BlackBerry service running with a workaround may actually increase the chances that Judge Spencer will grant NTP's request for an injunction, he said.

The U.S. Department of Justice has weighed in on the case, saying the BlackBerry is an essential communications device for parts of government and necessary for national security. That assertion puts added pressure on Judge Spencer. RIM's modification "would get him off the hook," Mr. Adelman said.

NTP is likely to challenge the legality of RIM's software fix, alleging that the changes also violate its patents.

Mike Abramsky, an analyst at RBC Dominion Securities Inc., said a workaround would be "risky" for RIM. The company risks introducing glitches to its highly reputable system and prolonging uncertainty that could help major rivals like Microsoft Corp., he said.

"The legal merits of the workaround will be challenged by NTP," said Rob Sanderson, an analyst with American Technology Research. "This could mean the legal battle continues for an extended period, perhaps years."

"The workaround seems to require users to incur a significant penalty for a less optimal service," said Brian Modoff, an analyst with Deutsche Bank Securities Inc.

RIM shares closed up $1.07 to $79.72 on the Toronto Stock Exchange.

END

CBS News

Feb. 9, 2006

Billions Wasted In Iraq?

(CBS) Some $8.8 billion dispersed for reconstruction efforts in Iraq is unaccounted for, says the U.S. official in charge of tracing it.

For a report to be broadcast this Sunday, Feb. 12, at 7 p.m. ET/PT, 60 Minutes correspondent Steve Kroft investigates the billions spent on reconstruction-related work, particularly money paid to a contractor, Custer Battles, now being sued for fraud.

Stuart Bowen, special inspector general for Iraq reconstruction, says $8.8 billion is unaccounted for because oversight on the part of the Coalition Provisional Authority, the entity governing Iraq after the war, "was relatively nonexistent."

The former number two man at the Coalition's transportation ministry, Frank Willis, concurs. "I would describe [the accounting system] as nonexistent." Without a financial infrastructure, checks and money transfers were not possible, so the Coalition kept billions in cash to pay for its multitude of projects. "Fresh, new, crisp, unspent, just-printed $100 bills. It was the Wild West," says Willis.

Such an atmosphere made it possible for billions to go missing and companies to defraud the Coalition. Custer Battles, a company quickly formed after the war to get reconstruction contracts, goes on trial next week, accused in a whistleblower suit by an ex-employee of bilking the U.S. government out of $50 million.

"[Custer Battles] wanted to open fraudulent companies overseas and inflate their invoices to the U.S. government," says the ex-employee, Robert Isakson. He says he refused to go along with the scheme and "two weeks later, apparently I heard they began exactly the fraud they described to me," he tells Kroft.

Willis remembers Custer Battles, which was formed by former Army Ranger Scott Custer and a failed congressional candidate, Mike Battles, who claimed to be active in the Republican party and have connections to the White House. "They came in with a can-do attitude, whether they could or not," he says. "They were not experienced. They didn't know what they were doing," says Willis.

They nevertheless got contracts and their work quickly drew complaints. "They failed miserably," says Col. Richard Ballard of a $16.8 million contract Custer Battles got to secure the Baghdad Airport. Col. Ballard, the inspector general for the Army in Iraq at the time, says the company failed to provide the X-ray equipment required by the contract.

"These were multi-million-dollar devices for which they received a considerable cash advance so that they could procure them, and then they never procured this equipment," says Col. Ballard. On a bomb-sniffing dog and trainer Custer Battles did procure, Col. Ballard says, "I think it was a guy and his pet, to be honest with you," he tells Kroft. The Colonel noted that the dog "would refuse to sniff the vehicles."

In a memo obtained by 60 Minutes, the airport's director of security wrote to the Coalition: "Custer Battles has shown themselves to be unresponsive, uncooperative, incompetent, deceitful, manipulative and war profiteers. Other than that, they are swell fellows."

Instead of removing Custer Battles, the Coalition praised them and continued to give them contracts. One of those contracts involved procuring trucks for moving cash around the country – some of which were inoperative and had to be delivered via tow truck. "I don't really know [how they got away with it]," says British Col. Philip Wilkinson, to whom the trucks were delivered. "The assumption that we had was that they had to have high political top cover...," Col. Wilkinson tells Kroft.

Custer and Battles are now under federal investigation and declined to be interviewed. But in taped depositions, they disavowed any knowledge of fraudulent invoices outlined in the lawsuit.

END

NorthJersey.com

Friday, February 10, 2006

Feds put lid on bogus olive oil

By AMY KLEIN
STAFF WRITER

Federal agents who raided a Clifton warehouse Thursday weren't looking for the typical heroin mill or pile of laundered money.

They were after a more slippery stash.

The agents seized about 22,700 gallons of oil after the Food and Drug Administration found that the Hermes and San Giovanni brands had been substituting soybean oil for some of their extra virgin and pomace olive oil.

Olive oil is approximately five or six times more expensive than soybean oil, according to the FDA, which estimated the profit of the swap at $105,600.

"We will not permit New Jersey consumers to be defrauded," said U.S. Attorney Christopher J. Christie. "We should all have confidence that the products we purchase are what they purport to be."

The labels on the 3-liter tins of oil in 4,855 cases represented that each contained extra virgin olive oil or pomace olive oil, when in fact the tins contained quantities of soybean oil or a similar substance, federal authorities said.

In addition, the Hermes label states that its oil was imported from Greece, while a federal seizure warrant states it was packed in Italy, they said.

The oil will remain at the warehouse, belonging to Quivican Trucking Corp. on River Road in Clifton, while the U.S. Attorney's Office seeks a court order to have it destroyed.

"We're working with the company to rectify the situation," said FDA spokeswoman Cathy McDermott. "The FDA and Department of Justice will be working with the company to bring it to closure."

Prior to the seizure by U.S. marshals, the oil had been held at the warehouse under a state-ordered embargo that was requested by the FDA, McDermott said.

According to several online stores, a three-liter tin of Hermes extra virgin olive oil sells for about $17.

Hermes is owned and distributed by Krinos Foods, which is headquartered in Long Island City, N.Y. San Giovanni olive oil is distributed by DMK Marketing, LLC, based in East Moriches, N.Y.

It's not the first time Krinos Foods has been accused of adulterating its olive oil. In 1997, a similar seizure warrant was filed in New York for more than 1,700 cases of Hermes olive oil that had been mislabeled. The president of Krinos did not return calls for comment Thursday.

McDermott said the FDA learned about Krinos' latest apparent attempt to substitute another oil in its Hermes brand from a media report that exposed the alleged fraud.

END

Harvard Crimson

Published On Friday, February 10, 2006 5:12 AM

'Tawdry Shleifer Affair' Stokes Faculty Anger Toward Summers

By NICHOLAS M. CIARELLI and ANTON S. TROIANOVSKI

Crimson Staff Writers

Six months after the University paid $26.5 million to settle a government lawsuit implicating Harvard economist Andrei Shleifer, controversy over the case has erupted anew and fed the Faculty's current uprising against Shleifer's close friend, University President Lawrence H. Summers.

"I've been a member of this Faculty for over 45 years, and I am no longer easily shocked," is how Frederick H. Abernathy, the McKay professor of mechanical engineering, began his biting comments about the Shleifer case at Tuesday's fiery Faculty meeting.

But, Abernathy continued, "I was deeply shocked and disappointed by the actions of this University" in the Shleifer affair, which was detailed in a lengthy magazine article that jolted many professors out of their reading period slumber last month.

Shleifer, the Jones professor of economics, was found liable by a federal court in 2004 for conspiracy to defraud the U.S. government while leading a Harvard economic reform program in Russia as it transitioned to capitalism in the 1990s. Shleifer settled the case for $2 million.

The article, in the January issue of Institutional Investor magazine, suggests that Shleifer's relationship with Summers shielded the professor from the consequences of the scandal while at Harvard.

At Tuesday's meeting, many professors let out murmurs of disbelief when Summers said he was not sufficiently familiar with the facts of the case to comment on it.

"I have taken no role in Harvard's activities in the courts, nor...familiarized myself with the facts of the situation," Summers told Abernathy.

"Do you have no opinion of this situation?" Abernathy queried in response, having already stepped away from the microphone.

"I am not knowledgeable of the facts and circumstances to be able to express an opinion as a consequence of my recusal," Summers said, eliciting more murmurs from the audience.

'THERE MIGHT BE A SCANDAL'

The 18,000-word article, "How Harvard Lost Russia," by investigative journalist David McClintick '62, is a copious narrative of the activities of the Harvard Institute for International Development (HIID) in advising the Russian government while supported by funding from the State Department's Agency for International Development (AID).

Federal prosecutors have charged that Shleifer and his wife, hedge fund manager Nancy Zimmerman, violated State Department conflict-of-interest restrictions by investing in Russia beginning in 1994.

The U.S. government filed an 11-count lawsuit in September 2000 against the University, Shleifer, Zimmerman, former Harvard employee Jonathan Hay, and Hay's wife Elizabeth Hebert.

McClintick's article alleges that Summers knew that Shleifer and Zimmerman had been investing in Russia, but not that Summers knew specific details of the investments.

In an e-mail last night, Summers' spokesman reiterated the stance the president took at the Faculty meeting Tuesday, insisting that Summers could not comment because of his recusal.

"The president's position is that without specific knowledge of the arguments in evidence offered in the litigation from which he was recused, he is not in a position to comment on the matter," the spokesman, John D. Longbrake, wrote.

But in an August 1996 scene recounted in McClintick's article, Summers, then the deputy secretary of the Treasury, told the couple it would be "a good idea for Andrei to make sure he was operating within the rules of whatever legal arrangements he had with Harvard." Summers told Zimmerman she "should just think hard" about her activities, the story reported.

"There might be a scandal, and you could become embroiled," Summers told Zimmerman, according to the article. "The world's a shitty place."

'UNTHINKABLE'

Years later, after Summers became University president in 2001, he "was concerned to make sure that Professor Shleifer remained at Harvard" and expressed as much to then-Dean of the Faculty Jeremy R. Knowles, Summers testified in a 2002 deposition quoted in the article. Knowles later elevated Shleifer to an endowed professorship.

On June 28, 2004, a U.S. district court found Shleifer liable for conspiracy to defraud the U.S. government, and concluded that Harvard had breached its contract with the government. Under the settlement, announced in August, neither the University nor Shleifer admitted any liability.

But as became apparent at Tuesday's meeting, a number of professors remain unconvinced that Summers'—and Harvard's—hands are clean.

"The outcome of the tawdry Shleifer affair...would have been unthinkable—unthinkable—during the last two presidencies, but is all too characteristic of the present malaise," Agassiz Professor of Zoology Farish A. Jenkins Jr. told Summers at the meeting.

Abernathy said yesterday that he was not satisfied with Summers' response that he knew too little about the matter to comment on it.

DOJ_NMG_0014210

“I’m sure he’s more familiar with the facts than I am or you are,” Abernathy said. “I would have been very pleased had President Summers said that it was a sorry event in Harvard’s history but it’s behind us, and I have recused myself from it, and I’m not going to make any comments one way or the other.”

One of Shleifer’s colleagues, Professor of Economics David I. Laibson, yesterday expressed his department’s support for one of its stars.

“By any measure, he is on a Nobel Prize winning trajectory,” Laibson wrote in an e-mail. “We are very lucky to have Shleifer as a colleague. And that view is shared by everyone in our department.”

Shleifer yesterday declined to comment on McClintick’s article or on the meeting.

“I wasn’t there and I don’t have anything to say,” he wrote in an e-mail.

‘IS IT TRUE?’

McClintick, a former investigative reporter for The Wall Street Journal and the author of three books, said in a telephone interview last night that his research, which included two trips to Russia and a close reading of the “very revealing” court record, had helped shed light on the Shleifer affair by presenting a detailed account of the whole matter in a single article.

But until the story’s publication, many professors were wary of discussing the matter.

“There is a good deal of pent-up concern about this on the Harvard Faculty, but many Harvard Faculty members have been reluctant to speak out,” McClintick said. “Most of the conversations I had [with faculty] were away from Harvard Square, away from Cambridge, in people’s homes late at night.”

Now, thanks to McClintick’s article, the Shleifer matter is getting broader attention from observers.

“A number of people have contacted and asked me about [the article],” said Harry R. Lewis ’68, the McKay professor of computer science. “People I haven’t heard from in years...have called me up and said, ‘Is it true?’”

Lewis is writing a book about Harvard, which claims, in a passage quoted in McClintick’s piece, that the “relativism with which Harvard has dealt with the Shleifer case undermines Harvard’s moral authority over its students.”

Shleifer, meanwhile, remains a senior Faculty member with a coveted endowed professorship. Yet some Faculty members speculate that Harvard has pursued or is considering disciplinary action against him.

The group of professors that usually investigates complaints against Faculty members, the Committee on Professional Conduct, operates confidentially. But Abernathy said yesterday that outgoing Dean of the Faculty William C. Kirby told him that the committee may be examining the Shleifer case.

“Kirby said to me such things are normally heard by [the committee],” Abernathy said. “But his remark was noncommittal.”

Kirby’s spokesman, Robert Mitchell, declined to comment on that possibility, citing Faculty policy.

Yet even as much of the controversy surrounding the Shleifer affair centers on circumstantial evidence and speculation, it has provided ammunition for some of Summers’ most vocal critics.

J. Lorand Matory ’82, professor of anthropology and of African and African American studies, called Summers’ responses at the Faculty meeting to queries about the Shleifer matter “nothing short of disgusting.”

“He cares so little for Harvard’s name and Harvard’s mission to do good in the world,” Matory said of Summers. “I have come to the conclusion that he does not reason in the same way that most humans reason.”

END

Downtown Express (Manhattan)

Feb. 9, 2006

Federal judge ‘shocked’ by E.P.A. statements

By Ronda Kaysen

The activists who have been fighting the Environmental Protection Agency ever since Christine Todd Whitman told Downtown residents and workers after 9/11 that the air in their neighborhood was safe to breathe and they should come home and breathe it — despite a lack of evidence — finally had their day in court. But the victory, the first in a long line of setbacks, was bittersweet.

Last week, Judge Deborah A. Batts said Whitman, who was head of the E.P.A. at the time, used "conscience shocking" judgment when she assured people the air in Lower Manhattan was safe. The judge stripped the former New Jersey governor of her immunity in a class action lawsuit brought against her and the E.P.A. on behalf of Downtown residents and students who claim they were harmed by toxins from the dust. Batts, in ruling against the agency, singled Whitman out for a series of misleading statements she continued to make in the weeks after the attacks.

"No reasonable person would have thought that telling thousands of people that it was safe to return to Lower Manhattan, while knowing that such return could pose long-term health risks and other dire consequences, was conduct sanctioned by our laws," Batts wrote. "Whitman's deliberate and misleading statements made to the press… shocks the conscience."

Her ruling lays the groundwork for residents to sue both the E.P.A. and Whitman to force the agency to test Lower Manhattan, Brooklyn and New Jersey homes and offices, clean any remaining dust and debris, and fund a medical monitoring program.

Last week the coalition of residents, workers and elected officials celebrated a rare victory in a struggle that has been marred by repeated setbacks in the years since the incineration of the Trade Towers wreaked havoc on their neighborhood. Even in victory, the group was weary and apprehensive that anything positive might come of the recent decision.

"It is extremely frustrating, even outrageous, that we are here, once again, as a group," said Senator Hillary Clinton, speaking at a press conference after the ruling last week. "We didn't have a lot of tools at our disposal. Trying to persuade the White House and this administration to act in the best interests of Americans is a lonely, almost impossible task."

The senator's frustration was echoed by the plaintiffs on the case and other residents who have spent the last four and a half years struggling with little success to get the E.P.A. to clean Lower Manhattan.

"It's sort of a mix of sorrow and triumph," said Jo Polett, a plaintiff on the case. "It is a very sad thing that citizens have to sue their government to get them to do the right thing."

Although the ruling is a vindication for residents who have described their struggle with the E.P.A. as akin to shouting into an empty barrel, it does not ensure that anything will actually happen. "It's a positive step in the right direction but it's a shame that we still haven't had an adequate testing and cleanup in the last four years and we wonder if that will ever happen," said Catherine McVay Hughes, chairperson of Community Board 1's World Trade Center Redevelopment Committee. "We wished that this had happened earlier."

Hughes was the community liaison to a defunct E.P.A. panel created at the request of Senator Clinton to devise a testing and cleanup plan for Lower Manhattan. Residents worry that the toxic plume of dust that spread over Lower Manhattan and parts of Brooklyn and New Jersey after the attacks has settled into the air conditioning ducts of their homes and other inaccessible places, continuing to contaminate them with each passing year.

In December, E.P.A. dismantled the panel, ignoring the advice of its own panelists, and moved forward with a testing and cleanup plan that critics described as grossly inadequate.

Last month, E.P.A. Regional Administrator Alan Steinberg told City Councilmember Alan Gerson that he would not attend a City Council hearing to question the E.P.A. about its decision, insisting in a letter, "E.P.A.'s activities related to Lower Manhattan have already been widely disclosed."

But after Judge Batts' ruling, Steinberg's office reached out to Gerson and now says the administrator will meet with him in private. "I don't know if this has to do with the ruling," said Gerson, "But I'm assuming everything is interrelated."

For some residents, any validation was enough to give a long and lonely struggle a much-needed boost. "I was very excited to hear that someone was looking at the truth and acknowledging that people should be held responsible," said Diane Lapson, a plaintiff on the case and a resident at Independent Plaza North, a large apartment complex seven blocks north of the Trade Center. "I'm encouraged that somebody would finally acknowledge what we've been saying all along."

DOJ_NMG_0014212

Lapson, who is president of her tenants association, stayed at I.P.N. in the days after 9/11, assisting residents who could not leave. One of Lapson's neighbors approached her. His wife was pregnant with twins and he wondered if they should move out of the neighborhood. Despite assurances from the E.P.A., Lapson advised her neighbor to move. "If you pulverize two buildings. Where is it? Where's the building? It's in our A.C." Lapson, who stayed, now suffers from ongoing pulmonary complications.

Most recognize that the win will likely be short lived. "I assume they're going to appeal it as far as they can appeal it," said Clinton.

Whitman released a statement last week dismissing the judge's ruling as "completely inaccurate" and said she expected the Justice Department would appeal. "I firmly believe that the agency's findings that the air quality was safe were correct," she said in her statement.

Charles Miller, a spokesperson for the U.S. Dept. of Justice, said the department was still reviewing the court documents.

Polett, who suffers from ongoing pulmonary complications and often speaks in a raspy voice, said she felt a twinge of pity for Whitman. "For two seconds, I felt sorry for her that she got herself in a situation that she has no recourse but to keep lying," she said.

The day Judge Batts declared Whitman's actions "conscience shocking," in the same courthouse, another judge, Judge Alvin K. Hellerstein came to a very different conclusion about a similar case. A group of rescue workers and first responders also sued the E.P.A. and Whitman for misleading them about their safety at the site. Hellerstein dismissed the case in its entirety from the bench.

"It's basically the same animal, just different plaintiffs," Miller said in a telephone interview.

Jeanne Markey, who represents the residents in the case ruled by Batts had a very different assessment of how the two cases played out. "It's a different scenario when someone wants to put their child back in Stuyvesant High School," than someone who is a city workers working at a dangerous site.

[Both Hellerstein, 72, and Batts, 58, were appointed by President Clinton.]

Litigation is a slow moving beast and as months have turned into years since the attacks, residents wonder if a precious window of opportunity has been missed in the long struggle to see their homes tested and cleaned.

"This is all converging into a perfect storm," said Clinton. "We all know the clock is ticking."

U.S. Rep. Jerrold Nadler was more blunt. "This cover-up is an ongoing conspiracy to cause the shortening of lives of thousands of people in the city," he said at the press conference.

Hughes, a Financial District resident, hopes that the ruling will uncover "what people knew and when they knew it." But she spoke with an air of sadness. The E.P.A.'s response to Hurricane Katrina in the Gulf Coast has given her little hope that if another environmental disaster were to strike Lower Manhattan she could rely on the agency vested with the public's safety. "We wanted to believe that it was safe to come back to work, safe to come back to live, and safe to bring back our neighborhood," she said. "I doubt that much has changed in terms of environmental safety and health except that now people know that they're on their own."

END

DOJ_NMG_0014213

Image not available for this document, ID: 0.7.10316.36334-000001

Williams, Jan

From: Williams, Jan

Sent: Monday, February 13, 2006 8:07 AM

To: /o=USDOJ/ou=CRT/cn=Recipients/cn=Mailboxes/cn=wsanchez; Bradbury, Steve; Brand, Rachel; Clark, John (USMS); Clement, Paul D; Fisher, Alice; Flores, Robert; Gillis, John; Herraiz, Domingo S.; Keisler, Peter D (CIV); Kim, Wan (CRT); Leonhart, Michele M.; McCallum, Robert (SMO); McNulty, Paul J; Moschella, William; O'Connor, Eileen J. (AAG/TAX); Schofield, Regina; Spagnoli, Deborah A. (USPC); Tamargo, Mauricio J; Tandy, Karen P (DEA); Wooldridge, Sue Ellen (ENRD); Balfe, Robert; Biskupic, Steven (USAWIE); Bogden, Daniel (USANV); Brooks, Susan; Brownlee, John (USAVAW); Buchanan, MaryBeth (USAPAW); Canary, Leura G. (USAALM); Charlton, Paul (USAAZ); Chiara, Margaret M. (USAMIW); Christie, Christopher (USANJ); Colantuono, Thomas P. (USANH); Connolly, Colm (USADE); Corrente, Robert (USARI); Cummins, Bud (USAARE); Dugas, David R. (USALAM); Fitzgerald, Patrick J. (USAILN); Garcia, H; Garcia, Michael J (SDNY); Graves, Todd (USAMOW); Greenlee, Jim (USAMSN); Heavican, Michael (USANE); Heffelfinger, Tom (USAMN); Huber, David L. (USAKYW); Iglesias, David C. (USANM); Immergut, Karin (USAOR); Jenkins, Anthony; Kubo, Ed (USAHI); Lam, Carol (USACAS); Lampton, Dunn (USAMSS); Larson, Charles (USAIAN); Letten, James (USALAE); Lockhart, Gregory; Marino, Thomas (USAPAM); Martin, Alice (USAALN); Mauskopf, Roslynn; McDevitt, Jim A. (USAWAE); McKay, John (USAWAW); Mead, Matthew H. (USAWY); Meehan, Patrick (USAPAE); Melgren, Eric (USAKS); Mercer, Bill (USAMT); Miller, Gregory (USAFLN); Moss, Thomas (USAID); Murphy, Stephen J. (USAMIE); Nahmias, David (USAGAN); O'Connor, Kevin (USACT); O'Melia, Michael (USAAZ); Orwig, Matt (USATXE); Perez, Paul (USAFLM); Rapadas, Leonardo; Roper, Richard (USATXN); Rosenstein, Rod (USAMD); Ryan, Kevin (USACAN); Scott, McGregor (USACAE); Shappert, Gretchen (USANCW); Sperling, Sheldon J. (USAOKE); Suddaby, Glenn T. (USANYN); Sullivan, Michael (USAMA); Sutton, Johnny K. (USATXW); Vines, Jim (USATNM); Wagoner, Anna Mills S. (USANCM); Wainstein, Kenneth; Washington, Donald (USALAW); Whitaker, Matt (USAIAS); White, Greg (USAOHN); Whitney, Frank (USANCE); Wood, Lisa (USAGAS); Wood, Maxwell; Wrigley, Drew (USAND); Yang, Debra
(USACAC); /o=USDOJ/ou=USAPAE/cn=Recipients/cn=Mailboxes/cn=SMalloy; Agarwal, Asheesh (CIV); Akers, Eric J.; Ames, Andrew; Barnett, Thomas O.; Battle, Michael (USAEO); Beach, Andrew; Beck, Cherith (USAARE); Bianco, Joseph F.; Blomquist, Kathleen M; Boardman, Michelle; Boote, John; Bottner, Andrea; Bounds, Ryan W (OLP); Bucholtz, Jeffrey (CIV); Burch, Victoria; Chambers, Shane P; Clinger, James H; Cohen, Brian; Cohn, Jonathan (CIV); Comisac, Rena (CRT); Cook, Elisebeth C; Cook, Marita L. (USAWY); Cooperstein, Theodore M; Coppenger, Chesed L. (TAX); Costigan, Michael; Coughlin, Robert; Curtis, O. Benton; Daley, Cybele; David, Matt; Dhillon, Uttam; Dummermuth, Matt (USAVAE); Eisenberg, John; Elwood, Courtney; Elwood, John; Flaherty, Connor; Freeman, Sharee (CRT); Friedrich, Matthew; Gambatesa, Donald (USMS); Garre, Gregory G; Glut, Martha (USANE); Gober, Chris; Golden, Lois; Goodling, Monica; Gorsuch, Neil M; Greg Harris; Hagle, Timothy; Harris, Gregory; Henke, Tracy (SMO); Hertling, Richard; Hofer, Patrick F. (TAX); Hoisington, Jana; Holland, Eric W; Irving, John (ODAG); Jaffer, Jamil N; Jezierski, Crystal; Jordan, Theresa

(USADE); Jungeblut, Neal P.; Katsas, Gregory (CIV); Keehner, Laura; Kessler, Elizabeth A; Korn, Jennifer; Lesch, Jaclyn; Little, Kimani (CRT); Longlet, Benjamin; Lonick, Saundra; Luckinbill, Trent W.; Macklin, Kristi R; MacLean, Alex (CRT); Magnuson, Cynthia; Marshall, C. Kevin; Martinson, Wanda; Masoudi, Gerald; McArthur, Patrick; McDonald, Bruce; McFarland, Steven T (ODAG); McIntosh, Brent; McKee, Cindy (USAKS); McKeown, Matt (ENRD); McKnight, Cynthia M (CRT); McNally, Edward; McNeil, Tucker (OPA); Mercer, Bill (ODAG); Meron, Daniel (CIV); Metcalf, Mark H (CRT); Miranda, Matthew; Monheim, Thomas; Moore, Miriam (ODAG); Morrison, Richard T. (TAX); Murphy, Sean; Neumayr, Mary (ENRD); Nichols, Carl (CIV); Nichols, Grant W; Nowacki, John; OConnell, James; Otis, Lee L; Otis, William G.; Pagliocca, Theresa; Parsky, Laura; Peabody, Payson R. (TAX); Peed, Carl; Potter, Janet; Racicot, Tim (USAMT); Reyes, Luis (SMO); Roe, Price (OCIO); Roehrkasse, Brian; Roper, Matt M; Rosenberg, Chuck; Rowe, Kiri; Sampson, Kyle; Schlozman, Brad (CRT); Schmitt, Glenn; Schwartz, Arthur; Scolinos, Tasia; Seidel, Rebecca; Selim, George (CRS); Sellers, Kiahna (OAG); Smith, Kimberly A; Sours, Raquel; Strug, Kerri; Swenson, Lily F; Taylor, Bruce A.; Tenpas, Ronald J (ODAG); Todd, Gordon (SMO); Tomlinson, Linda (USANH); Turner, Donald J. (USAPAM); Tzitzon, Nicholas; Underhill, Deborah; Vargas, Omar (CRT); Voris, Natalie (USAEO); Warren, Julie; Williams, Jan; Woodruff, William; Boente, Dana J. (TAX); Nash, Stuart (ODAG); Oldham, Jeffrey L; Pacold, Martha M; Purpura, Michael M (ODAG); Rowan, Patrick (ODAG); Senger, Jeffrey M; Taylor, Jeffrey (OAG); Webb, Lauren; White, Clifford

Subject: The Morning Update: 2/13/06

Attachments: tmp.htm

Importance: Low

The Morning Update

This morning, President Bush will recognize the work of those receiving the National Medals of Science and Technology. The highest award the President can bestow for outstanding achievement in science and technology, these medals honor work that has helped expand the horizons of human knowledge.

In the afternoon, the President will meet with United Nations Secretary-General Kofi Annan. The two leaders will discuss the many important issues the United Nations is deeply engaged in, including U.N. reform, human rights, international security, and humanitarian and development assistance. Following this meeting, the President will recognize the World Series Champions, the Chicago White Sox.

10:40 am: THE PRESIDENT makes Remarks and participates in Presentation of the National Medals

EST of Science and Technology

The White House | Washington, DC

1:15 pm: THE PRESIDENT meets with the Secretary-General of the United Nations

EST The White House | Washington, DC

2:35 pm: THE PRESIDENT participates in a Photo Opportunity and makes Remarks to the 2005

EST World Series Champions, the Chicago White Sox

The White House | Washington, DC

7:05 pm: THE PRESIDENT attends a National Republican Senatorial Committee Reception

EST Private Residence | Washington, DC

From Today's Morning Headlines

In His Weekly Radio Address, President Bush Discusses The New Medicare Prescription Drug Benefit. "The new prescription drug benefit is helping a large majority of Medicare beneficiaries, President Bush <http://search.news.yahoo.com/search/news/?p=President+Bush> said Saturday while acknowledging that some patients have experienced problems. 'When you make a big change in a program involving millions of people, there are bound to be some challenges,' Bush said in his weekly radio address. 'And this has been the case with the new drug coverage.' Under the Medicare Part D program, about 43 million elderly or disabled Americans are eligible to enroll in a private plan that will provide prescription drug coverage, subsidized by the federal government. Thanks to competition, the program is getting cheaper for beneficiaries and taxpayers alike, Bush said <http://news.yahoo.com/s/ap/20060211/ap_on_go_pr_wh/bush;_ylt=Ah4d347QUt4O6DkEL9tUikeyFz4D;_ylu=X3oDMTA5aHJvMDdwBHNlYwN5bmNhdA--> . The average premium that beneficiaries pay is now expected to be about $25 a month instead of $37, as projected last year. The typical senior citizen will pay about half of what he used to spend on prescription drugs, the president said." (Kevin Freking, "President Touts New Medicare Drug Benefit," The Associated Press, 2/11/06)

Mrs. Bush Talks About Her Olympic Experience. MRS. BUSH: "We've had a terrific time. I got to meet with our Olympians - our team - right before they walked in, when they were all together and that was interesting. We have a really wonderful Olympic team with so many cute young people. A few older people as well. But it was really fun to get to see all of them. They really represent the best of America, and I hope and know they will be really good ambassadors for our country." (ABC's "Good Morning America," 2/13/06)

Budget Surplus Hits Highest January Level In Last Four Years. "The federal government ran a $21 billion budget surplus last month, the best January showing in four years, as both spending and tax receipts set records for the month.
<http://news.yahoo.com/s/ap/20060210/ap_on_go_ot/budget_black_ink;_ylt=A rN797q0EACiidLz7FhTC_uyFz4D;_ylu=X3oDMTA5aHJvMDdwBHNlYwN5bmNhdA> The Treasury Department said the government spent $209 billion last month, a record amount for January and up 7.9 percent from January 2005.
Government tax receipts, however, also set a record for the month of $230 billion, up 13.7 percent from January 2005. The faster growth in receipts than in spending pushed the surplus for the month to $21 billion, more than double the $8.6 billion surplus the government recorded in January 2005. It was the biggest January surplus since $43.7 billion in 2002." (Martin Crutsinger, "Gov't Budget Surplus Hits $21B For Jan.," The Associated Press, 2/10/06)

Chairmen Of The House And Senate Intelligence Committees Outline The President's Authority And Responsibility To Authorize The NSA Terrorist Surveillance Program. REP. HOEKSTRA: "And to believe that we gave the president the authority to kill bin Laden, but if he was on his cell phone, we said, Oh, but if you want to listen to him calling into the United States, perhaps planning the next attack because we didn't know when that might occur, I'm sorry, you've got to go to the court. And you've got to do this one-inch-thick document. And you've got to have a legal review before you can actually listen to what bin Laden is saying.
Intercepting communications from your enemy is an essential element of war. It's always been a key component conducted in war." NBC'S RUSSERT:
"So you believe the authorization passed in September of 2001 granted the president the authority for eavesdropping?" REP. HOEKSTRA: "We gave the president to conduct - we gave the president the necessary authority to use the tools to effectively fight and eliminate Al Qaida.
Absolutely." SEN. ROBERTS: "And he already has that under the Constitution anyway." (NBC's "Meet The Press," 2/12/06)

Secretary Rice Decries Violent Protests In The Middle East. SEC. RICE:
"Everybody understands, George, that there is a sense of outrage, that there is a sense of - that these cartoons were inappropriate in the Muslim world, and in much of the world it is viewed that way. Obviously, there is an issue of free speech, but there is also an issue of press reasonability, and the United States has been very clear about that, but you don't express your outrage by going out and burning down embassies in Syria. You don't express your outrage by violence that kills innocent standers- by. You express your outrage peacefully, as people have done in some places. And let me just note that in some countries - Afghanistan, the government of Lebanon, the Grand Ayatollah Sistani - this point has been made and made over and over, that whatever the sense of outrage, violence is not the answer." (ABC's "This Week," 2/12/06)

Ambassador Khalilzad Writes About The Political Path Forward In Iraq.
"Yet this is a moment of opportunity. Thanks in part to systematic outreach efforts by the United States, Sunnis have undergone a sea change in attitude about participating in post-Hussein governance, culminating in their massive turnout in the December elections. They have come to governance, culminating in their massive turnout in the December elections. They have come to understand that the U.S. is not seeking to occupy their country permanently, and many have been convinced that protracted violence would destroy their country's future. To build on this progress, Iraq's leaders now need to agree on a process to unite the country. <http://www.latimes.com/news/opinion/sunday/commentary/la-oe-khalilzad12 feb12,0,4331504.story?coll=la-sunday-commentary> " (Amb. Zalmay Khalilzad, Op-Ed, "A Political Blueprint For Iraq," Los Angeles Times, 2/12/06)

The President's Emergency Plan For AIDS Relief Brings Therapy And Care To Those In Need In Africa. "In its first two years, the Bush administration's global AIDS plan has spent $5.2 billion to help prevent 47,100 infections in infants, bring drug therapy to 471,000 ill people and care for more than 1.2 million children orphaned by the disease. <http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2006/02/12/AR20060 21201078.html> Those were among the highlights of a data-heavy report submitted to Congress last week describing early results of the $15 billion five-year project, formally known as the President's Emergency Plan for AIDS Relief (PEPFAR). The vast majority of the money is being spent in 12 African nations and in Guyana, Haiti and Vietnam, although the program is paying for AIDS work in more than 100 other countries, including Russia and India. ... The plan seeks to bring anti-retroviral drugs to 2 million people in the 15 countries by the end of its fifth year. There are 401,000 on treatment now and 70,000 more in other countries receiving grants." (David Brown, "Progress Varies On Global AIDS Plan," The Washington Post, 2/13/06)

This Weekend From The White House

President's Radio Address <http://www.whitehouse.gov/news/releases/2006/02/20060211.html>

* In Focus: Medicare <http://www.whitehouse.gov/infocus/medicare/>

President Addresses House Republican Conference <http://www.whitehouse.gov/news/releases/200 6/02/20060210-2.html>

Setting The Record Straight: The New York Times Story On Hurricane Preparations <http://www.whitehouse.gov/news/releases/2006/02/20060210-3.html>

* Setting The Record Straight <http://www.whitehouse.gov/news/setting-record-straight/>

You are currently subscribed to Communications Update - Agencies as:
jan.williams@usdoj.gov.
To unsubscribe send a blank email to:
leave-whitehouse-communications-update-agency-1239098E@list.whitehouse.gov

The Morning Update

This morning, President Bush will recognize the work of those receiving the National Medals of Science and Technology. The highest award the President can bestow for outstanding achievement in science and technology, these medals honor work that has helped expand the horizons of human knowledge.

In the afternoon, the President will meet with United Nations Secretary-General Kofi Annan. The two leaders will discuss the many important issues the United Nations is deeply engaged in, including U.N. reform, human rights, international security, and humanitarian and development assistance. Following this meeting, the President will recognize the World Series Champions, the Chicago White Sox.

10:40 am: EST	THE PRESIDENT makes Remarks and participates in Presentation of the National Medals of Science and Technology The White House | Washington, DC
1:15 pm: EST	THE PRESIDENT meets with the Secretary-General of the United Nations The White House | Washington, DC
2:35 pm: EST	THE PRESIDENT participates in a Photo Opportunity and makes Remarks to the 2005 World Series Champions, the Chicago White Sox The White House | Washington, DC
7:05 pm: EST	THE PRESIDENT attends a National Republican Senatorial Committee Reception Private Residence | Washington, DC

From Today's Morning Headlines

In His Weekly Radio Address, President Bush Discusses The New Medicare Prescription Drug Benefit. "The new prescription drug benefit is helping a large majority of Medicare beneficiaries, President Bush said Saturday while acknowledging that some patients have experienced problems. 'When you make a big change in a program involving millions of people, there are bound to be some challenges,' Bush said in his weekly radio address. 'And this has been the case with the new drug coverage.' Under the Medicare Part D program, about 43 million elderly or disabled Americans are eligible to enroll in a private plan that will provide prescription drug coverage, subsidized by the federal government. Thanks to competition, the program is getting cheaper for beneficiaries and taxpayers alike, Bush said. The average premium that beneficiaries pay is now expected to be about $25 a month instead of $37, as projected last year. The typical senior citizen will pay about half of what he used to spend on prescription drugs, the president said." (Kevin Freking, "President Touts New Medicare Drug Benefit," The Associated Press, 2/11/06)

Mrs. Bush Talks About Her Olympic Experience. MRS. BUSH: "We've had a terrific time. I got to meet with our Olympians – our team – right before they walked in, when they were all together and that was interesting. We have a really wonderful Olympic team with so many cute young people. A few older people as well. But it was really fun to get to see all of them. They really represent the best of America, and I hope and know they will be really good ambassadors for our country." (ABC's "Good Morning America," 2/13/06)

Budget Surplus Hits Highest January Level In Last Four Years. "The federal government ran a $21 billion budget surplus last month, the best January showing in four years, as both spending and tax receipts set records for the month. The Treasury Department said the government spent $200 billion last month, a record amount for for the month. The Treasury Department said the government spent $209 billion last month, a record amount for January and up 7.9 percent from January 2005. Government tax receipts, however, also set a record for the month of $230 billion, up 13.7 percent from January 2005. The faster growth in receipts than in spending pushed the surplus for the month to $21 billion, more than double the $8.6 billion surplus the government recorded in January 2005. It was the biggest January surplus since $43.7 billion in 2002." (Martin Crutsinger, "Gov't Budget Surplus Hits $21B For Jan.," The Associated Press, 2/10/06)

Chairmen Of The House And Senate Intelligence Committees Outline The President's Authority And Responsibility To Authorize The NSA Terrorist Surveillance Program. REP. HOEKSTRA: "And to believe that we gave the president the authority to kill bin Laden, but if he was on his cell phone, we said, Oh, but if you want to listen to him calling into the United States, perhaps planning the next attack because we didn't know when that might occur, I'm sorry, you've got to go to the court. And you've got to do this one-inch-thick document. And you've got to have a legal review before you can actually listen to what bin Laden is saying. Intercepting communications from your enemy is an essential element of war. It's always been a key component conducted in war." NBC'S RUSSERT: "So you believe the authorization passed in September of 2001 granted the president the authority for eavesdropping?" REP. HOEKSTRA: "We gave the president to conduct – we gave the president the necessary authority to use the tools to effectively fight and eliminate Al Qaida. Absolutely." SEN. ROBERTS: "And he already has that under the Constitution anyway." (NBC's "Meet The Press," 2/12/06)

Secretary Rice Decries Violent Protests In The Middle East. SEC. RICE: "Everybody understands, George, that there is a sense of outrage, that there is a sense of – that these cartoons were inappropriate in the Muslim world, and in much of the world it is viewed that way. Obviously, there is an issue of free speech, but there is also an issue of press reasonability, and the United States has been very clear about that, but you don't express your outrage by going out and burning down embassies in Syria. You don't express your outrage by violence that kills innocent standers- by. You express your outrage peacefully, as people have done in some places. And let me just note that in some countries – Afghanistan, the government of Lebanon, the Grand Ayatollah Sistani – this point has been made and made over and over, that whatever the sense of outrage, violence is not the answer." (ABC's "This Week," 2/12/06)

Ambassador Khalilzad Writes About The Political Path Forward In Iraq. "Yet this is a moment of opportunity. Thanks in part to systematic outreach efforts by the United States, Sunnis have undergone a sea change in attitude about participating in post-Hussein governance, culminating in their massive turnout in the December elections. They have come to understand that the U.S. is not seeking to occupy their country permanently, and many have been convinced that protracted violence would destroy their country's future. To build on this progress, Iraq's leaders now need to agree on a process to unite the country." (Amb. Zalmay Khalilzad, Op-Ed, "A Political Blueprint For Iraq," Los Angeles Times, 2/12/06)

The President's Emergency Plan For AIDS Relief Brings Therapy And Care To Those In Need In Africa. "In its first two years, the Bush administration's global AIDS plan has spent $5.2 billion to help prevent 47,100 infections in infants, bring drug therapy to 471,000 ill people and care for more than 1.2 million children orphaned by the disease. Those were among the highlights of a data-heavy report submitted to Congress last week describing early results of the $15 billion five-year project, formally known as the President's Emergency Plan for AIDS Relief (PEPFAR). The vast majority of the money is being spent in 12 African nations and in Guyana, Haiti and Vietnam, although the program is paying for AIDS work in more than 100 other countries, including Russia and India. ... The plan seeks to bring anti-retroviral drugs to 2 million people in the 15 countries by the end of its fifth year. There are 401,000 on treatment now and 70,000 more in other countries receiving grants." (David Brown, "Progress Varies On Global AIDS Plan," The Washington Post, 2/13/06)

This Weekend From The White House

President's Radio Address

- In Focus: Medicare

President Addresses House Republican Conference

Setting The Record Straight: The New York Times Story On Hurricane Preparations

- Setting The Record Straight

You are currently subscribed to Communications Update - Agencies as:
jan.williams@usdoj.gov.
To unsubscribe send a blank email to:
leave-whitehouse-communications-update-agency-1239098E@list.whitehouse.gov

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Monday, February 13, 2006 8:26 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Attorney General's News Briefing for Sunday, February 12, 2006
Attachments:	agnb060212.pdf; agnb060212.doc

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 12, 2006 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

"Aggressive" Inquiry Into Wiretapping Article "Rapidly Expanding." 3
Pakistani President Says US Airstrike Killed Zawahiri Relative, Wanted Terrorist 4
Montana Judge Aides FBI In Collaring Would-Be Al Qaeda Accomplice 4
Moussaoui's Attorneys Contend Government Failed To Aggressive Investigate Him 5
FBI Probe Said To Have Infused Lodi Muslim Community With Fear, Suspicion 5
United Arab Emirates Firm Could Take Over Operations At 6 US Ports 6

Homeland Response:

House Investigators' Katrina Report Singles Out Chertoff, Homeland Security 6
New Orleans Still Seeking Sponsors For Mardi Gras 6
Writer Says Bush Has "Written Off New Orleans." 6

War News:

Roadside Bombs Now Responsible For 61% Of Coalition Deaths In Iraq 7
Iraqi Shiites' Prime Minister Nomination Stalled 7
Opposing Experts Agree Saddam's Trial Is "A Mess," Offer Different Solutions 8
Army Adds Incentives To Retain Needed Officers 8
Army Doctors' Experience, Revised Procedures Leading To Fewer Iraq Deaths 8
Herring Says Military Contractors Are Winners From Iraq War .9

Corporate Scandals:

Enron Prosecutors Face Challenge Over Credibility Of Witness Who Took Plea Deals 9

Criminal Law:

Former Abramoff Colleague Confirms Contacts With Reid's Office 9
Defense Attorney Says Laski Will Plead Not Guilty Today, Seek Plea Agreement 10
Hollywood Law Firm Helped Pellicano Pursue Trademark For Wiretap Device 10
Rise In Violent Crime Over Petty Disputes Noted In Some Areas 11
Catholic Church Under Fire For New Sex Abuse Scandal 11
Hines Says Plame Investigation Hurts Bush Because He Won't Fire Those Involved 11

Civil Rights:

First Lady Criticizes Hillary Clinton For MLK Day Criticism Of Administration 11
Indiana Legislature Considering Extensive Abortion Consent Bill In Country 12
Federal Judge Selects CA Prison Health Chief 12
Under Pressure From China, San Francisco Bars Religious Group From New Year's Parade 12

Antitrust:

Critics Worry About Wal-Mart's Plan To Move Into Banking Industry 13

Environment/Indian Affairs:

Kyoto Protocols Generate Projects In Developing Countries .13
Georgia Jury Boosts Value Of Property Seized By Eminent Domain 13
Mid-Atlantic, Northeast Hit By Major Snowstorm 13
Backers, Foes Of Tribal Casinos Prepare For Meetings This Week 14

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Tenth Church Burns In Alabama 14

Tax:

Trade Off Between Bush Tax Cuts And AMT Tax Seen As Necessary 15

Congress-Administration:

Bush Touts Modernization Of Medicare, Admits Problems ... 15
Bush Competitiveness Plan Seen As Having Widespread Support 16
Spending, Immigration Concerns Fuel Conservative Anger At Bush 16
Republicans Concerned Bush Budget Will Impact 2006 Elections 17
Deficit Reduction Bill Includes Provision That Hikes Student Loan Interest Rates 18
User Fee Increases In Bush Budget Face Opposition 18
Opponents Of Social Security Reform Surprised By Inclusion In Bush Budget 18
Students Ignore Option To Benefit From NCLB Tutoring Program 18
House Republicans Meet In Cambridge, Maryland For Retreat 19
Bush, Abramoff Appear In Same Photo 20
Leadership PACs Seen As Loophole For Members Of Congress 20
DeLay Resumes Appropriations Committee Seat 21
Poll Shows 45% Think Bush Treated Same As Other Presidents By Media 21
Hagel Independence From Bush May Prove Attractive To Conservatives 21
Frist Seen As Distancing Himself From Bush 21
McCain Seeks Support For 2008 Campaign From Bush Network 22
Gingrich Gets Rousing Welcome At Conservative Conference 22
Congress Resists Smoking Bans 22
Rumsfeld Said To Have "Lost" In Effort To Change Pentagon Culture, Foreign Policy 22

Other News:

Economic Reports May Prompt Stock Markets Sell-Offs 23
Full Employment Seen As Worthy Economic Goal 23
New Space Race Underway 23
Romney Tied For Third In Michigan 2008 Poll 24
Warner Faces Hurdles In Building Name Recognition 24
Kerry Has Over $9M Left Over From 2004 Campaign 24
Pennsylvania GOP Endorses Swann For Governor 24
Steele Offers Qualified Support For Stem Cell Research 24
Santorum, Casey Take Advantage Of Subsidized Air Travel .. 25
Minnesota Senate Race Attracts National Attention 25
Danforth Worries Religious Conservatives Taking Over GOP 25
Robertson's Gaffes Draw Increasing Scrutiny 26
Remote West Texas To Get Public Radio Station 26
Gore's Daughter Profiles Groundbreaking Women In New Book 26
Iran Threatens To Abandon Nonproliferation Treaty 26
Muslim Protests Over Mohammed Cartoons Continue To Spread 27
Modern Checkpoints Mark Change For Palestinian Border Crossers 29
Sharon Hospitalized For Emergency Surgery 29
Hughes Diplomatic Office Rated As "Not Performing." 30
Rumsfeld Strengthens Tunisia Ties 30
Mongolia Seeks To Improve Relations With US 30
Syria Fills Cabinet Vacancies 30
Royal Feud Puts Moroccan Freedoms On Trial 30
Avian Flu Found In Three European Union Countries 30
Snow Optimistic On Russia WTO Candidacy 31
Latin American Leaders Push Pipeline Plan 31
US Rejects Morales Position On Coca 31
In Election Limbo, Haiti Experiences "Fragile Peace." 32
In Race For UN Leadership, "Many Names, Few Rules And Talk Of Asia's Turn." 32
Italy Will Elect New Parliament In April 32
Bush Should Step Up On Darfur, WPost Says 32

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages 33

Washington's Schedule:

Today's Events In Washington 33

DOJ_NMG_0014226

TERRORISM NEWS:

"Aggressive" Inquiry Into Wiretapping Article "Rapidly Expanding." The New York Times (2/12, Johnston, 1.19M) reports, "Federal agents have interviewed officials at several of the country's law enforcement and national security agencies in a rapidly expanding criminal investigation into the circumstances surrounding a New York Times article published in December that disclosed the existence of a highly classified domestic eavesdropping program." The "people who have been interviewed and others in the government who have been briefed on the interviews said the investigation seemed to lay the groundwork for a grand jury inquiry that could lead to criminal charges," and "several officials described the investigation as aggressive and fast-moving." The case is considered "potentially far reaching because it places on a collision course constitutional principles that each side regards as paramount:" punishing those responsible for a serious security breach" against "confidentiality of sources and the ability to report on controversial national security issues free of government interference." Still, "some media lawyers believe that The Times has powerful legal arguments in defense of its reporting and in protecting its sources."

Rep. Wilson's Demand For Domestic Spying Briefing Seen As Sign Of Program's Low Popular Support. CQ Weekly (2/13, Horrigan) reports, "The Bush administration's domestic wiretapping program had a bad week on Capitol Hill, culminating in Pennsylvania Republican Arlen Specter, Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman's announcement of legislation to place the plan under judicial review from the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court." However, in "a more immediate political reversal" New Mexico Rep. Heather A. Wilson (R) "announced she was breaking ranks…to demand a full briefing on the program before the Intelligence Committee." She "is more than a little motivated this year to put some distance between herself and the White House, since she's waging one of the House's most competitive re-election bids." Wilson's "skepticism could well signal to similarly situated GOP incumbents that the White House program may not be drawing the popular support the president is banking on."

GOP Lawmakers Growing Restless Over Domestic Spying. Newsweek (2/12, Isikoff, Hosenball, Thomas) reports, "It is not yet clear how the public feels about warrantless wiretapping," but "the solons of Capitol Hill—and, increasingly, those in the Republican Party—are growing restless and ready to challenge the authority of the Bush White House," partly because "congressional egos and prerogatives are on the line. Members of both parties feel bullied by the sometimes high-handed treatment they get from the Bush administration, particularly from Vice President Dick Cheney," whose "attitude seems to be: bring it on." While "a senior White House official shrugged off the push-back from Republican lawmakers against warrantless eavesdropping," should it emerge "that the United States has been secretly spying on more seemingly innocent Americans, then the Bush administration really will have a problem, and it won't just be among ruffled lawmakers on Capitol Hill."

Brooks Proposes Solution To Domestic Spying Debate. David Brooks writes in his column in the New York Times (2/12, 1.19M), "We need the Gang of 14 back again, because another issue has ossified into abstract ideological debate:" National Security Agency wiretapping. A sustainable bipartisan solution "would be based on a series of truths:" the need for "aggressive intelligence programs to head off attacks;" that such "programs will not survive with the current level of Congressional disquiet;" and the understanding that "we can't throw the mess to the courts to resolve" The solution is to "exempt searches covered by the Bush program from the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act" but "give the intelligence committees oversight responsibilities for those programs. You toughen the penalties for anybody who dares to leak secrets about those programs" and let committee members know that if the United States is attacked, and they opposed programs that could have prevented that attack, then it will be their name in the headlines."

NYTimes Says Recent Revelations Emphasize Untrustworthiness Of Bush Administration. The New York Times (2/12, 1.19M) editorializes, "We can't think of a president who has gone to the American people more often than George W. Bush has to ask them to forget about things like democracy, judicial process and the balance of powers — and just trust him. We also can't think of a president who has deserved that trust less" as "last week produced a flood of evidence that vividly drove home the point." Attorney General

DOJ_NMG_0014227

Alberto Gonzales asserted that "the administration can be relied upon to police itself and hold the line between national security and civil liberties on its own," when, "in sworn testimony at his confirmation hearing last year, he dismissed as 'hypothetical' a question about whether he believed the president had the authority to conduct warrantless surveillance" when "Gonzales knew Mr. Bush was doing just that." Tim Golden of The Times reported that the US military "had taken to tying up and force-feeding the prisoners who had gone on hunger strikes by the dozens at Guantánamo Bay" even as "the administration continues to claim that it can be trusted to…decide in secret and on the president's whim who is to be jailed without charges, and to insist that Gitmo is filled with dangerous terrorists." Finally, "the next edition of the journal Foreign Affairs includes an article by the man in charge of intelligence on Iraq until last year, Paul Pillar, who said the administration cherry-picked intelligence to support a decision to invade that had already been made."

SC Paper Praises Sen. Graham For Making Clear The Arguments For Judicial Oversight. The Myrtle Beach Sun News (2/12) editorializes, "No flaming liberal or terrorism softy, Sen. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., last week demolished President Bush's arguments that he needs the permission of neither Congress nor the courts to probe Americans' communications for links to terrorists," explaining that "Congress did not intend to give him authority to circumvent the 1978 Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act and undertake domestic spying on his own authority" and "the Constitution clearly envisions a role for Congress and the courts in checking and balancing the president's undisputed constitutional war-making powers." He said it is "possible to have an effective spying program under FISA," and "if FISA as written is inadequate to the administration's needs…Congress could fix the problem without undermining the surveillance program or revealing operational details to the public." While "Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney lose no opportunity to reassure law-abiding Americans that erroneous federal persecution could never happen to them," the pair's "judgment is a poor substitute for independent judicial oversight via the FISA court," and "Graham deserves great credit for making this distinction clear."

Pakistani President Says US Airstrike Killed Zawahiri Relative, Wanted Terrorist. ABC World News Tonight (2/11, story 8, :15, Avila) reported, "The President of Pakistan said a missile strike on a terrorist hideout last month killed a close relative of al Qaeda's number two leader, Ayman al-Zawahiri, and another man wanted by the US. It is the first time Pakistan has provided details about the people that were killed in that attack." The CBS Evening News (2/11, story 7, :15. Mitchell) also reported the story.

The Washington Post/AP (2/12, Khan) adds, "Until now, President Gen. Pervez Musharraf had only said 'foreigners' died." Pakistani intelligence officials say "the two men were Midhat Mursi al-Sayid Umar and Abdul Rehman al-Maghribi," and that "sympathizers buried the five bodies at an undisclosed location that authorities have been unable to find."

Montana Judge Aides FBI In Collaring Would-Be Al Qaeda Accomplice. The CBS Evening News (2/11, story 8, 2:10, Mitchell) reported, "The FBI is investigating an alleged terrorist plot to attack oil facilities in this country. The alleged conspiracy might never have come to light if it had been for a judge with an interesting sideline." CBS (Pinkston) added, "By day, Shannen Rossmiller is a municipal court judge in the town of Montana. At home, she's also a wife, mother of three, and part-time cyber-sleuth, tracking down possible terrorists. For the second time in two years, Shannen Rossmiller is helping down Federal authorities track down terrorists, this time putting the FBI on to this man, 47-year-old Michael Curtis Reynolds. CBS news has learned Reynolds is in custody in Pennsylvania on weapons charges and may face more serious counts thanks to a tip from Judge Rossmiller." Rossmiller was "scanning terrorist Websites when she noticed a posting from Reynolds seeking $40,000 to why fuel trucks to blow up refineries in New Jersey and Wyoming and a section of the Alaska oil pipeline. Posing as an Alaska banker, Rossmiller promised the money, set up a date and time for the rendezvous near Pocatello, Idaho and notified the FBI. They set up a sting." Rossmiller: "He picked up the $40,000 in cash which he intended to use for his means to do what he had wanted to do or indicated he wanted to do with the Alaska pipeline and some other locations." Pinkston: "At Reynolds' Pennsylvania home, Federal authorities seized his computer and files that according to a court document spelled out his bomb plans. Back in 2004, Judge Rossmiller helped snare Washington state National Guardsman Ryan Anderson."

DOJ_NMG_0014228

The Philadelphia Inquirer (2/12, Lubrano, Shiffman, 423K) adds that Reynolds "has not been publicly charged with terrorism. But a federal prosecutor leveled that accusation during a December court hearing." While "Reynolds' lawyer, Philip Gelso, declined to comment," authorities say Reynolds told them he "was a patriot and intended to expose an al-Qaeda cell inside the United States."

The Philadelphia Inquirer (2/12, Lubrano, 423K) adds, "Rossmiller began trolling the Internet for potential terrorists after Sept. 11, 2001. Stunned and angered by the attacks on the United States, Rossmiller read the Koran, studied radical Islamic culture, and learned enough Arabic to lurk in chat rooms and ensnare jihadists. She had fractured her pelvis after slipping in the tub, and the convalescence afforded her the time to start her new avocation." An FBI agent in the Salt Lake City office "vouched for Rossmiller's credibility, saying, 'She's legitimate.'"

Moussaoui's Attorneys Contend Government Failed To Aggressive Investigate Him. The Washington Times/AP (2/12) reports that Zacarias Moussaoui's defense lawyers, in a closed hearing, "disclosed several details in the Jan. 5 hearing that go beyond and sometimes contradict what was disclosed in the September 11 commission report," including that "government correspondence shows 'the actual (redacted) information that essentially tells them in August that Moussaoui is a bin Ladenite who traveled to Afghanistan,'" and that "that the government explicitly barred one FBI agent in the summer of 2001 from interviewing Moussaoui or any member of Moussaoui's family for fear that such contact would alert al Qaeda to the government's investigation of two other al Qaeda terrorists." The "defense contends that the government knew more about the terrorists' plans than Moussaoui and still was unable to prevent the attacks." The US's knowledge of Moussaoui and his terrorist connections will be a key issue at his March 6 death-penalty trial."

Columnist Says Not Trying Moussaoui As "A Mere Terrorist" But Part of 9/11 Has Created A "Show Trial." Slate Columnist Dahlia Lithwick writes in an op-ed in the Washington Post (2/12, B3, 744K), "What's strange about Zacarias Moussaoui's courtroom outburst last week …is that the 'circus' comment came from the guy who's supposed to be crazy," and, "as is usually the case, if you unbraid the message from its wacky messenger, Moussaoui's claims ring true." After all, "Why is it that Moussaoui's story hasn't changed much in four years, while the government has downgraded him from hijacker to secret-keeper? It leads one inexorably to Moussaoui's last talking point: that this is a show trial," and "largely…because the administration has learned nothing from its dealings with the other captured terrorists -- about the need for clarity, humility and small but certain gains in court." Consider "the benefits of trying Moussaoui as a mere terrorist, rather than as a perpetrator of Sept. 11. For one thing his trial would appear fair, not just to the defendant,…but to the world, which would see that, when the charges actually correspond to the crime, the American court system works quite well."

FBI Probe Said To Have Infused Lodi Muslim Community With Fear, Suspicion. The Stockton (CA) Record (2/12, Hood) reports, "They notice when unfamiliar cars circle the block, drivers talking on cell phones. They notice when new residents move into nearby apartments that overlook their homes and are suspicious of door-to-door salespeople. That's life for members of Lodi's Muslim community in the eight months since two of their own were arrested, accused of ties to terrorists." In the wake of the FBI investigation that led to the arrest of Umer and Hamid Hayat on terrorism-related charges, "no one is above suspicion -- not of plotting terrorist attacks, but for being a federal agent or someone working for the government." The Record adds, "FBI Special Agent John Cauthen said if that's how Lodi's Muslims feel, it's not the FBI's doing. He said the FBI took pains to meet with anyone with concerns or complaints about the FBI's surveillance and conduct in Lodi. 'To say the investigation was different or the intent was to cause a chilling effect, it doesn't connect from where I'm sitting,' said Cauthen from his Sacramento office. 'We're not on a fishing expedition, hanging out in Lodi waiting for something to happen. We're just doing what's logical based on the evidence and facts in front of us.' But one of those who complained said the FBI used its highly visible presence to keep anyone from trying to help the Hayats' defense. 'It was clear intimidation, having the FBI around the mosque,' said Basim Elkarra, executive director of the Council for American-Islamic Relations' Sacramento Valley chapter. 'And it affected everyone. It was intimidation, and it worked. Some people feel it was a message to other Muslims.'"

DOJ_NMG_0014229

United Arab Emirates Firm Could Take Over Operations At 6 US Ports. The Washington Post (2/12, A17, Bridis, 744K) reports that Dubai Ports World, a United Arab Emirates company, "is poised to take over significant operations at" New York, New Jersey, Baltimore, New Orleans, Miami and Philadelphia "as part of a corporate sale, leaving a country" that "was an important operational and financial base for the hijackers who carried out the attacks against the World Trade Center and the Pentagon" on Sept. 11, 2001 "with influence over a maritime industry considered vulnerable to terrorism." However, "the Bush administration considers the UAE an important ally in the fight against terrorism…and is not objecting" to the sale of Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Co.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

House Investigators' Katrina Report Singles Out Chertoff, Homeland Security. The Washington Post (2/12, A1, Hsu, 744K) reports, "A blistering report by House investigators" says that "leaders from President Bush down disregarded ample warnings of the threat to New Orleans and did not execute emergency plans or share information that would have saved lives" in response to Hurricane Katrina. "A draft of the report…includes 90 findings of failures at all levels of government," and "lays primary fault with the passive reaction and misjudgments of top Bush aides, singling out Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, the Homeland Security Operations Center and the White House Homeland Security Council." It adds that "Regarding Bush…'earlier presidential involvement could have speeded the response' because he alone could have cut through all bureaucratic resistance," and his "televised statement on Sept. 1 that 'I don't think anybody anticipated the breach of the levees,'" does "not appear to be consistent with the advice and counsel one would expect to have been provided by a senior disaster professional," as "about 56 hours before Katrina made landfall, the National Weather Service and National Hurricane Center cited an 'extremely high probability' that New Orleans would be flooded and tens of thousands of residents killed."

Reuters (2/12) adds the report concludes that "the response to the disaster showed the government failed to learn from the September 11, 2001 hijacking attacks,."

LATimes Says Brown's Testimony Reveals Lessons. The Los Angeles Times (2/12, 958K) editorializes that Michael Brown's "testimony was more than just good political theater, however — it was a guided tour of a dysfunctional federal bureaucracy." He "painted a picture of an unresponsive White House that did not grasp the gravity of the situation in New Orleans" even as "FEMA's parent agency, the Department of Homeland Security, was too preoccupied with terrorism to be of much help on natural disasters." He also "illuminated two obvious yet fundamental problems that threaten anyone dwelling in particularly risky environs:" it is "hard to coordinate all the federal, state and local agencies involved in responding to a catastrophe" and "disaster plans are worthless if they're not implemented." Therefore, "communities across the country need to work with state and federal governments to define just how much they can and must do in the event of a catastrophe like Hurricane Katrina, as well as what precisely it will take for the feds to send in the cavalry."

New Orleans Still Seeking Sponsors For Mardi Gras. The New York Times (2/12, Rivlin, 1.19M) reports that New Orleans officials " boldly decided last fall to hold the parades of Mardi Gras, even though the city treasury was empty and large swaths of the town still lay in ruins. The price, though, was their demand that the beloved party abandon tradition and seek corporate sponsors," but "no corporation has come up with the $2 million the city was hoping to receive for the naming rights," and only Glad Products "has said it will contribute to the cause" with "an unspecified six-figure donation to the city and a gift of 100,000 trash bags." Should "no additional corporate sponsors step forward, the city will have to dig into its nonexistent treasury to pay for the celebration, which many officials say the city needs to raise its spirit and its economy." People "in the sponsorship business say the city should have started searching for corporate donors in August, when companies typically start thinking about their marketing budget for the coming year," and "many image-conscious corporations may be reluctant to lend their name to an event that often becomes a bacchanal."

Writer Says Bush Has "Written Off New Orleans." Writer Jennifer Moses argues in an op-ed in the Washington Post (2/12, B7, 744K), "In his State of the Union address" President Bush mentioned New Orleans, saying

DOJ_NMG_0014230

"$85 billion is a lot." However, "nothing close to $85 billion has been spent, and that's because most of it is tied up with something called the Stafford Act, which restricts the use of federal money for precisely the kind of things that Louisiana needs to recover, particularly housing relief." Bush "has largely written New Orleans off," and "the president's rejection of the bipartisan Baker plan… was tantamount to a death sentence." Then, "in an instance of double bind so mind-numbingly stupid that you have to think that Washington is run by a mob of sadists, the president's point man for Gulf Coast recovery, Donald Powell, recently urged Louisiana to use its share of federal funds to buy out uninsured homeowners living outside the flood plain" when "all of New Orleans, as well as most of South Louisiana as a whole, is both below sea level and within the federal levee system, meaning, again, that New Orleans-area homeowners get diddly squat."

WAR NEWS:

Roadside Bombs Now Responsible For 61% Of Coalition Deaths In Iraq. ABC World News Tonight (2/11, story 7, 2:40, Avila) reported on the "mounting danger of roadside bombs in Iraq the number of attacks on US and coalition troops using IEDs, or improvised explosive devices, doubled from the year before, to nearly 11,000. More importantly, they now account for some 61% of all combat deaths and 71% of the wounded. And for those soldiers who are lucky enough to survive, the recovery is long and difficult." ABC also profiled the experience of Marine Michael Berninger, who was hit by two roadside bombs. Berninger "volunteered to serve in Iraq. A truck driver, which is among the most dangerous jobs because of roadside bombs. In fact, Michael was in the war zone less than four months, yet, he was hit by bombs twice. The second time, shrapnel from the device damaged his spine." Berninger "now has a chest full of medals, including the Purple Heart, and wants to return to finish his mission in Iraq. But he came home with more than physical injuries. He now suffers from posttraumatic stress disorder, with debilitating nightmares and flashbacks."

Defense Department Delays Use Of IED Destroyer. The Los Angeles Times (2/12, Mazzetti, 958K) reports, "A new high-tech vehicle that destroys roadside bombs" called the Joint IED Neutralizer "has passed a series of U.S. military tests but has not yet been sent into battle," and "to many in the military, the delay in deploying the vehicles, which resemble souped-up, armor-plated golf carts, is a case study of the Pentagon's inability to bypass cumbersome peacetime procedures to meet the urgent demands of troops in the field." The Pentagon's IED task force sadi the JIN "required further testing, and...a decision to delay deployment had been made jointly by Pentagon officials and commanders in Iraq," but "the Marine Corps believes otherwise and recently decided to circumvent the testing schedule and send JIN units to…Iraq." The Defense Department and Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld have "faced similar charges of failing to act quickly to protect soldiers in combat," including "complaints about the military's failure to provide sufficient body armor for soldiers and adequate armor for transport vehicles."

Motorcycle Bomb Explodes In Baghdad. The Washington Post/AP (2/12) reports, "A bomb rigged to a motorcycle exploded early Sunday outside a local restaurant in central Baghdad, wounding nine people," and "machine gun fire was heard shortly after."

Iraqi Shiites' Prime Minister Nomination Stalled. The New York Times (2/12, Worth, 1.19M) reports, "Shiite political leaders failed to agree Saturday on their nominee to be Iraq's new prime minister, saying they would take a vote on Sunday if efforts to pick a candidate by consensus had not succeeded by then." While "the Shiite United Iraqi Alliance…expected to formally nominate Adel Abdul Mahdi on Saturday," Iraq's current prime minister, Ibrahim al-Jaafari, "refused to withdraw his name from contention, and he still commands wide support in the Shiite ranks." Sami al-Askari, an independent Shiite member of the alliance, said that there will be "one more effort to pick a premier by consensus" on Sunday, before resorting to "a secret ballot, the results of which will be final."

The Washington Times/AP (2/12, Abdul-Zahra) adds that the vote was postponed "at the request of radical cleric Sheik Muqtada al-Sadr's faction." The Washington Post (2/12, Hernandez, Fekeiki, 744K) also covered this story.

Iraq's Leaders Must "Unite The Country," Khalilzad Writes. In a Los Angeles Times (2/12, 958K) op-ed piece headlined, "A Political Blueprint For Iraq.", US Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad writes that "From the moment the US decided to remove the brutal regime of Saddam Hussein and help Iraqis establish a representative government, one of our key challenges has been enabling the leaders of Iraq's major communities to overcome their mistrust and fear of each other. This has not been easy." Khalilzad goes on to write that "this is a moment of opportunity. Thanks in part to systematic outreach efforts by the United States, Sunnis have undergone a sea change in attitude about participating in post-Hussein governance, culminating in their massive turnout in the December elections. They have come to understand that the US is not seeking to occupy their country permanently, and many have been convinced that protracted violence would destroy their country's future. To build on this progress, Iraq's leaders now need to agree on a process to unite the country."

DOJ_NMG_0014231

Opposing Experts Agree Saddam's Trial Is "A Mess," Offer Different Solutions. The Minneapolis Star Tribune (2/12, Rosen, 424K) reports, "Curtis Doebbler is one of two American lawyers on Saddam Hussein's international legal defense team," and "Michael Scharf, a Case Western Reserve University law professor and former State Department official, heads an international team of war crimes experts advising the trial's inexperienced Iraqi judges and prosecutors." Both "agree on only one thing about the nearly four-month-old trial of the deposed dictator: It's a mess." Doebbler "blames the U.S. government," accusing it "of running -- and rigging -- the trial behind the scenes," while "Scharf blames Saddam and his attorneys, who he says are intent on turning the trial into a circus." Doebbler says "the only way to save Saddam's trial…is to start over under U.N. control somewhere outside Iraq." Scharf, however, says "the trial should continue in Iraq because the Iraqi people have told pollsters in overwhelming numbers that Saddam should be tried and judged by his countrymen."

Army Adds Incentives To Retain Needed Officers. The Washington Post (2/12, A12, Tyson, 744K) reports, "The Army, forecasting a shortage of" short 3,500 active-duty officers by 2007, "is boosting the incentives it offers to try to hold on to experienced commanders." Besides "speeding promotions and rolling out incentives to entice officers to stay, the Army is also using involuntary 545-day call-ups to compel inactive officers to leave civilian life for duty in Iraq." While "the looming officer shortage is part of a wider manpower crunch the Army faces stemming from the surge in demand for U.S. ground forces at home and overseas," it remains "distinct from the Army's recruiting difficulties, reflecting less a problem with signing up new officers than one of promoting and retaining experienced officers."

Army Doctors' Experience, Revised Procedures Leading To Fewer Iraq Deaths. The Los Angeles Times (2/12, Kraul, 958K) reports, "The knowledge that U.S. military doctors have gained in Iraq is helping them save the lives of more combat wounded than ever before." Because of "quicker medical evacuations, improved emergency room instruments and new surgical approaches…fewer injured service members are dying." The "military surgeons have generally changed their approach to critical trauma injuries by opting when possible for 'damage control surgery' rather than immediate major chest or abdominal intervention," and "the mortality rate among those wounded in Iraq is about 10%, compared with 20% in the 1991 Persian Gulf War, 24% in Vietnam and 30% in World War II, according to a recent issue of the New England Journal of Medicine." However, "the higher survival rate raises other issues…such as the quality of life for the increased number of troops with multiple amputations and disfiguring wounds."

Explosions In Iraq Can Lead To Amputations. The New York Times (2/12, A1, Macur, 1.19M) reports, "Explosions have killed 1,123 American service members in Iraq and have wounded at least 10 times more, often with a devastating combination of injuries -- ruptured organs and severed spines, obliterated limbs and burst eyeballs. Among the more than 16,653 Americans wounded in Iraq are 387 amputees." The "amputations, traumatic though they are, are often accompanied by painful complications." Most have an infection, and "about 20 percent of the amputees have had potentially serious blood clots." Then, "about half of them experience a condition in which bone grows at the site of amputation, called heterotopic ossification" which "can prevent proper fitting of a prosthesis or pierce the skin." Also, "the psychological effects of losing a limb, particularly for young, active military members, can be deep and lasting, a constant reminder of the war."

Columnist Criticizes Lack Of Psychiatric Support For Returning Veterans. Ann Louise Bardach, who writes the Interrogation column for Slate and is the author of 'Cuba Confidential, Love and Vengeance in Miami and Havana," writes in an op-ed in the Los Angeles Times (2/12, 958K), "Treatment of returning veterans is woefully inadequate, owing to a lack of funding. Although the VA acknowledges PTSD as a serious problem for returning veterans, VA hospitals around the country have sharply reduced their inpatient psychiatric beds." Meanwhile, "suicide…is an enormous and growing concern," as "the Army estimates that the suicide rate among Iraq veterans is one-third higher than the historical wartime average, owing to the psychological strains of no-holds-barred insurgency warfare. That means we're looking at a future blizzard of suicides without an adequate VA program in place to address the crisis." Even "thirty years after Vietnam, we seem to have learned very little."

DOJ_NMG_0014232

Herring Says Military Contractors Are Winners From Iraq War. Hubert B. Herring writes in his column in the New York Times (2/12, 1.19M), "Some indisputable winners" in the Iraq war "are clear now: military contractors." If one "bought 100 shares of each of the top six military contractors at their lows of the last six years" it "would have cost $12,731.50. On Friday, it would have been worth three and a half times that: $44,417. Little wonder. Just look at the money machines these contractors have become as the war drags on."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Enron Prosecutors Face Challenge Over Credibility Of Witness Who Took Plea Deals. The Houston Chronicle (2/12, Fowler, Roper) reports, "When the case of former HealthSouth CEO Richard Scrushy went to trial last summer, the deck seemed stacked against him." The Chronicle continues, "Five former chief financial officers took the stand as government witnesses, giving powerful testimony that Scrushy personally orchestrated a $2.7 billion accounting fraud at the hospital chain. … But when the trial was over, Scrushy was acquitted. The reason? Jurors said the CFOs weren't credible." The Chronicle adds, "By highlighting so-called 'sweetheart deals' the CFOs made with prosecutors to reduce jail time they were facing and labeling them as "rats," Scrushy attorney Jim Parker painted the men as untrustworthy. … '(The jury) wouldn't trust them today to get their car parked,' Parker said." The Chronicle notes, "Former Enron executives Ken Lay and Jeff Skilling face a similar challenge in their criminal trial, with as many as 16 former Enron employees in government plea agreements. But there's a difference … With two exceptions, the defense won't simply demonize those with plea deals who end up testifying or call them rats. To prove their thesis that Enron was not a corrupt enterprise, the defense needs to show jurors the witnesses are good people who didn't really commit the crimes they admitted to but were pressured by the government. … It's a twist on an already tough tango, as prosecutors try to present credible witnesses, defense attorneys try to discredit them and prosecutors come back and try to mend any damage."

Defense Says "Feel" Of Enron Case Important. The AP (2/12, Hays) reports, "A few snippets of video and audio clips of Kenneth Lay and Jeffrey Skilling speaking to employees or Wall Street analysts don't really show who the former Enron Corp. chiefs were or what they did before the company crashed in scandal more than four years ago, their attorneys contend." The AP continues, "So the lawyers convinced a federal judge to let them give jurors in Lay's and Skilling's fraud and conspiracy trial a much bigger dose of the pair headlining employee meetings and conference calls with analysts. That means jurors have been sitting through several hours of video and audiotapes that include company cheerleading and detailed discussions of business issues unrelated to the criminal charges against the two men." The AP adds, "The defense teams say jurors get a better sense of Enron and the defendants when they see Lay getting standing ovations from employees and hear analysts fawning over Skilling's smarts. … 'The feel of a case is as important as the think of a case,'' Lay's lead lawyer, Michael Ramsey, said outside of court." The AP notes, "There's more to come Monday when Ramsey wraps up his cross-examination of the government's first witness, former Enron investor relations chief Mark Koenig, who will spend his seventh day on the witness stand."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Former Abramoff Colleague Confirms Contacts With Reid's Office. The AP (2/12) reports Ronald Platt, a former colleague of controversial lobbyist Jack Abramoff, "confirms he contacted Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid's office on behalf of the influential lobbyist but says he does not believe Abramoff's billing records accurately reflect the extent of his work." Platt, "a lobbyist who worked with Abramoff at the Greenberg Traurig firm between 2001 and 2004, said he contacted Reid's office in 2001, as the billing records show, about the timing of minimum wage legislation affecting one of Abramoff's clients, the Northern Mariana Islands." Platt said, "When Abramoff first arrived at Greenberg Traurig, I did a new colleague a favor by simply asking Reid staffers about when the minimum wage legislation affecting the Mariana Islands would be voted upon by the Senate. I communicated this to Abramoff."

DOJ_NMG_0014233

Former Mariana Clients Turn On Abramoff. CQ Weekly (2/13, Zeller) reports that in the mid 1990s, the Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands "hired lobbyist Jack Abramoff to maintain its treasured exemptions from federal labor laws. The exemptions permit the commonwealth, a U.S. territory, to offer lucrative offshore shelter to American clothing manufacturers, who were then smarting from anti-sweatshop campaigns." By "setting up shop in the archipelago, U.S. textile concerns can plausibly plaster 'made in the U.S.A.' labels on their products, leaving conscience-stricken consumers with the impression that they are manufactured on the mainland — not on the rim of the Phillipine Sea." But now that Abramoff is "in bad moral odor — and awaiting sentencing for last month's fraud plea bargain — on American shores, the Marianas is undertaking its own reverse-engineering of its ethical image. In the mad rush among former Abramoff clients and associates to make it seem as though the disgraced lobbyist never did business with anyone, the territorial government is claiming that it, too, has been damaged by Abramoff's misdeeds — even though it's quite clear that he delivered just what the Islands wanted at the time." The "rather delicious irony in the Marianas case is that the two men making the most prominent denunciations of Abramoff now were among his lustiest supporters then."

Defense Attorney Says Laski Will Plead Not Guilty Today, Seek Plea Agreement. The AP (2/12) reports, "The lawyer representing former Chicago City Clerk James Laski said his client will plead not guilty Monday and wants to make a deal with the federal government. … Attorney Jeffrey Steinback said he will ask U.S. District Judge Charles Norgle for more time to negotiate a plea deal for Laski. Steinback said a deal seemed like the way to go after he reviewed transcripts of tapes the government made of Laski during its investigation." The AP notes, "Laski is the highest ranking official among 42 people charged in the federal investigation of corruption in Chicago government, which stemmed from a probe into a city program that awarded hauling jobs to trucking companies."

Hollywood Law Firm Helped Pellicano Pursue Trademark For Wiretap Device. The New York Times (2/12, Halbfinger, Weiner) reports, "Throughout the three-year federal investigation of Anthony Pellicano, the celebrity detective at the center of a huge Hollywood wiretapping scandal, the top-tier entertainment lawyer Bert Fields and his firm have insisted that they never knew their go-to investigator was secretly recording his targets' phone calls. But an indictment unsealed this week makes clear that Mr. Fields's firm…also played a central role in his pursuit of a trademark for the very device the government says he was using to wiretap his targets: a combination of computer hardware and software he called, aptly enough, Telesleuth. Brian Sun, a lawyer for Mr. Fields's firm, Greenberg, Glusker, Fields, Claman, Machtinger & Kinsella, said its lawyers believed that Mr. Pellicano intended to use Telesleuth on behalf of his many law-enforcement clients. Mr. Sun said the firm also believed that Telesleuth could not be used as a wiretapping device, although the participant in a call could use it to record a conversation."

Pellicano Charges Said To Show Need For Greater Private Eye Regulation. The Los Angeles Times (2/12, Hong) reports, "America's appetite for litigation, a rise in corporate snooping on employees, partners and rivals, and the trafficking of vast stores of private information on computer databases have fueled a boom in private investigations. The burgeoning industry and its darker practitioners have alarmed privacy advocates, federal regulators and legitimate investigators, who say the Pellicano case underscores the need for more public scrutiny of investigators and their employers. California has nearly 10,000 licensed private investigators, up from about 6,000 in 1990. As their ranks multiply, 'we're unable to tell the good players from the bad players,' said Robert H. Townsend, a Dana Point private investigator with 40 years' experience."

Former Reporter's Lawyers Subpoena Ovitz In Civil Suit. The Los Angeles Times (2/11, Krikorian, Blankstein) reports, "Attorneys for a former Los Angeles Times reporter allegedly threatened by indicted private investigator Anthony J. Pellicano have subpoenaed onetime Hollywood power player Michael Ovitz to provide a sworn deposition in her civil case. Lawyers for Anita Busch said they took the step after Monday's sweeping federal indictment charged that Pellicano and others accessed confidential police records to try to find embarrassing information about the reporter and dozens of others. Busch's civil lawsuit…accuses Pellicano and others, including former Los Angeles Police Sgt. Mark Arneson, of locating and threatening the reporter over unspecified stories about the entertainment business. … Noting how Ovitz has acknowledged cooperating with authorities, the attorneys said they hoped he would also help them determine who was behind the threat to Busch." They suspect it was Pellicano.

DOJ_NMG_0014234

Rise In Violent Crime Over Petty Disputes Noted In Some Areas. The New York Times (2/12, Zernike, 1.19M) reports while "violent crime has been at historic lows nationwide and in cities like New York, Miami and Los Angeles, it is rising sharply" in Milwaukee "and in many other places across the country." While "such crime in the 1990's was characterized by battles over gangs and drug turf, the police say the current rise in homicides has been set off by something more bewildering: petty disputes that hardly seem the stuff of fistfights, much less gunfire or stabbings." Police Chief Nannette H. Hegerty of Milwaukee "calls it 'the rage thing.'" Hegerty said, "We're seeing a very angry population, and they don't go to fists anymore, they go right to guns." Nationally, the "homicide rate peaked in 1991, declined steadily after 1993 and has remained essentially flat since 1999. But in the first six months of 2005, according to preliminary statistics from the F.B.I., the number of homicides nationwide rose 2.1 percent, with the greatest increase, 4.9 percent, in the Midwest. Yet many cities have seen far steeper increases."

Catholic Church Under Fire For New Sex Abuse Scandal. NBC Nightly News (2/11, story 6, 2:30, Williams) reported, "Tonight, questions about real reform in the Catholic Church in the US. After the original sexual abuse accusations, churn leaders promised to clean up the parishes, but now there are fresh allegations and charges that church leaders ignored new warning signs and that again here children have paid the price." NBC (Stafford) added, "Reverend Daniel McCormick. To the boys he coached at a Catholic school in Chicago, he was Father Dan. To prosecutors here, he's now an accused child molester." The "outrage comes in part from the timeline in this case. A boy first reported Reverend McCormick to police back in August, but no charges were filed at the time. The priest was allowed to continue teaching and coaching for months until a second boy spoke out. Now, a third boy says he too was abused and the alleged abuse happened after church leaders learned of the first boys' allegations."

Hines Says Plame Investigation Hurts Bush Because He Won't Fire Those Involved. Cragg Hines writes in his column in the Houston Chronicle (2/12, 581K) that the question of firing the vice president "arises as we juxtapose a damning claim from Vice President Dick Cheney's former chief of staff, the indicted I. Lewis 'Scooter' Libby, against President Bush's once definitive determination to 'take appropriate action' if anyone in his administration leaked classified information." With his claims that his superiors authorized leaking Plame's name, "we have Libby reaching for Cheney's throat — at least as a pretrial tactic." This case "seeps its way closer to the Oval Office because an obstinate Bush will not keep his word and cut his losses" by firing people involved. Instead, he moves "the goal posts for what it takes to get the heave-ho."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

First Lady Criticizes Hillary Clinton For MLK Day Criticism Of Administration. At the Winter Olympics in Turin, Italy, First Lady Laura Bush yesterday said Sen. Hillary Clinton's criticism of the Bush Administration on Martin Luther King Day was "out of bounds." ABC World News Tonight (2/11, story 4, Avila) reported Mrs. Bush "made it clear that not all the bad blood between the Clinton and Bush families has been spilled…revealing a touch of anger about her predecessor, Senator Hillary Clinton." Mrs. Clinton has "apparently irritated the current First Lady with these remarks in a speech on Martin Luther King Day." Sen. Clinton: "So we have a culture of corruption. We have cronyism. We have incompetence. I predict to you that this Administration will go down in history as one of the worst that has ever governed our country." Asked by ABC's Robin Roberts if that was "just politics" or "fair game? Or is that out of bounds, a statement like that?" First Lady Laura Bush: "Well, of course I think it's out of bounds. But I think it's politics, it's certainly politics."

The AP (2/12) adds, "Mrs. Bush pointed out that former Presidents Bush and Clinton and her husband are part of a unique club that also includes the wives." The First Lady said, "We know what it's like to live in that house. We certainly know what it's like to have your husband criticized. … So I think there's a certain empathy that we might have for each other that we wouldn't have maybe for somebody else who said something like that." Reuters (2/12) also reports on the First Lady's comments.

Some Wonder About Bush Relationship With Clinton. The Houston Chronicle (2/12, Mason, 581K) in its "White House Watch" column speculates on what the atmosphere was like on Air Force One between the Bush's, the Clintons and RNC Chairman Ken Mehlman after Coretta Scott King's funeral. In addition to the latest jabs between them, "Bush also has been making perhaps one too many jokes lately about his father's partiality for former President Clinton, whom Bush now refers to as an extra brother." The Chronicle notes, "The tone and frequency of the jokes has some Washington insiders wondering if the president is somewhat miffed about the relationship." White House spokesman Scott McClellan said, "They had a good visit. … The president is glad to have his 'brother' traveling with us today."

DOJ_NMG_0014235

Relationships Between Presidential Couples Examined. The AP (2/12, Woodward) in a Valentine's Day article notes, "Presidents and their wives have been an amorous lot, their White House years coming at the pinnacle of lives entwined. The men pursued and loved these women as intensely as they clawed to power and unleashed armies." One "no-nonsense woman, Barbara Bush, got a treacly note from her husband, George, asking her to show more affection for the television cameras in the 1988 campaign, like their opponents, the Dukakises." Bush 41 wrote, "Sweetsie…Please look at how Mike and Kitty do it. Try to be closer in more -- well er romantic -- on camera. I am practicing the loving look, and the creeping hand. Yours for better TV and more demonstrable affection. Your sweetie pie coo coo. Love 'ya GB."

Indiana Legislature Considering Extensive Abortion Consent Bill In Country. The Washington Post/AP (2/12, A10, Martin) reports that women "seeking an abortion in Indiana would be told that life begins at conception under a proposal that would give the state one of the furthest-reaching abortion consent laws in the country." Only South Dakota "has gone as far in what it orders doctors to tell women before they can get abortions, and that law has been blocked by a court." Supporters say "the legislation would provide women with key information before they make an irreversible decision, but critics argue it blurs the line between church and state and could infringe on doctors' First Amendment rights."

The Washington Times (2/12, 90K) also reports the AP story.

Federal Judge Selects CA Prison Health Chief. The Los Angeles Times (2/12, Warren) reports, "Ending a nationwide search, a federal judge has picked the top health official in Santa Clara County to take charge of California's deeply troubled prison healthcare system, sources familiar with the selection process said Saturday." The Times continues, "Bob Sillen, 63, is expected to be formally appointed as a federal receiver on Tuesday by U.S. District Judge Thelton Henderson. The San Francisco judge decided to act after concluding last July that 'extreme measures' were needed to fix a system that kills one inmate each week through medical incompetence or neglect." The Times adds, "The move effectively shifts power from state to federal authorities for all decisions related to inmate care — including medical staffing, treatment standards and contracts with outside hospitals. … Legal scholars said the appointment marks the first time a government operation of this size has been placed under a federal receiver. … This week, the sources said, Henderson will issue an order detailing the extraordinary powers Sillen will have in managing the system, which provides healthcare for 168,000 inmates and employs 6,000 people in 33 prisons."

Under Pressure From China, San Francisco Bars Religious Group From New Year's Parade. ABC World News Tonight (2/11, story 3, 2:20, Avila) reported the "final preparations are being made for America's oldest and largest Chinese new year's parade. This is the Chinese Year of the Dog, but in San Francisco, it can be called the year of the dog fight. Normally one of the most tolerant cities in America, San Francisco is in the middle of a bitter disagreement of who is allowed to march in tonight's annual parade." Falun Gong "a religious group outlawed by China, has been banned from the festivities." ABC (Rooney) added, "Falun Gong got its start only in 1992, and grew quickly. By 1999, the Chinese communist government denounced it as a dangerous cult. Members have been arrested, tortured, even executed. The Falun Gong claim they are persecuted in the US, as well as China." Falun Gong "and at least one city official say the Chinese Chamber of commerce here in San Francisco excluded the Falun Gong under pressure from the Chinese government." Chris Daly, San Francisco Board of Supervisers: "Mainland China has significant influence here in San Francisco, and other major American cities. It's not just me saying it. The United States Congress and in a concurrent resolution stated that." Falun Gong "has sued to be included in future parades.

DOJ_NMG_0014236

They say they have to be the voice of freedom here in the US for people who have no voice in China."

ANTITRUST:

Critics Worry About Wal-Mart's Plan To Move Into Banking Industry. The Washington Post (2/12, F1, Day, 744K) reports Wal-Mart "entered the grocery business in 1988 to compete with established names such as Kroger, Safeway and Albertsons, which had dominated food retailing for decades. Today Wal-Mart is America's biggest grocer, with 16 percent of the U.S. retail food market, and its sales continue to climb, even as dozens of grocery chains struggle." Congressional lawmakers "and federal regulators now face a tough question: Should they permit Wal-Mart to use a legal loophole to enter banking and potentially do in that arena what it has done to nearly every other consumer product and service it has touched?" The question "rattles bankers from Maine to California, even though the retailer no longer wants a full-service bank, only a limited-purpose one. It has whipped up longtime Wal-Mart critics, including labor unions, consumer groups and some congressmen on both sides of the aisle, who say the company is already too big, with too much power over the American economy, sometimes to the detriment of workers' pay and domestic jobs."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Kyoto Protocols Generate Projects In Developing Countries. The Los Angeles Times (2/12, Dickerson, 958K) reports, "Thanks to the Kyoto Protocol, the 1997 international treaty on climate change, efforts by industrialized countries to fight global warming are popping up in far-flung places like Villagran," a Mexican hamlet "about 40 miles southwest of the city of Queretero. Nearly 600 Kyoto-related projects are in the pipeline in the developing world, according to a recent tally by a Danish climate research center funded in part by the United Nations. About 40% of them are in Latin America, including hydroelectric power plants in Honduras and wind-powered turbines in Chile." The accord, "which the United States has not ratified, calls for reducing overall greenhouse-gas emissions by major industrialized countries in the period 2008-2012 to amounts at least 5% below 1990 levels." More than "150 nations have signed and ratified the treaty, but the burden to reduce emissions falls on about three dozen industrialized countries responsible for most of the climate mess. One way for industrialized countries to meet their reduction targets is to support environmental projects in developing regions. Dubbed the Clean Development Mechanism, it was designed to lower compliance costs for rich nations while funneling much-needed development to poor ones."

Georgia Jury Boosts Value Of Property Seized By Eminent Domain. The Los Angeles Times/AP (2/12) reports, "A jury has decided that a Georgia hospital is going to have to pay about five times what it offered if it wants to condemn a rental house where a frail, 93-year-old woman has lived for 26 years." The AP continues, "The jury said last week that Phoebe Putney Memorial Hospital would have to buy the 60-year-old brick duplex for $200,000 — it has been appraised at $50,000 to $60,000 — and give the tenant $51,000 to help her move. … 'It just proves that no one can assume absolute power over someone's life without having to answer to the legal system,' said lawyer Eddy Meeks, who represented the tenant, Julia Lemon, and the home's owner, Julie Montgomery." The AP adds, "Phoebe, southwest Georgia's largest hospital, pursued the property's condemnation last year so it could expand a child development center for employees' children. Phoebe officials said they might appeal the verdict. … Meeks said he might appeal the condemnation, which was approved by a court last year."

Mid-Atlantic, Northeast Hit By Major Snowstorm. The CBS Evening News (2/11, story 2, 4:00, Mitchell) reported, "Residents from Virginia to New England tonight are bracing for a raging nor'easter, packing blizzard conditions and dropping as much as 15 inches of snow in some areas." CBS (Chen) added, "We were beginning to think winter was going to skip right over us this year. January was the nation's warmest on record. That was certainly the case here in Washington. February was starting out mild, but as you can see, that's changing and quickly." Washington is "pretty excited about this but taking it seriously, as well. So much so that First Lady Laura Bush has delayed her return trip. She's been at the Olympics in Italy. She's delayed her trip home because of the weather, because they wanted to make sure it would be safe for her plane to land here."

DOJ_NMG_0014237

NBC Nightly News (2/11, lead story, 2:30, Williams) reported, "Good evening from Torino, Italy, where on the streets of this city, at the foot of the Italian Alps, there is not a bit of snow tonight. But where First Lady Laura Bush has decided to stay an extra night because of the weather back home." NBC (Dawson) added, "By Saturday afternoon, Delta, a major carrier in the Northeast, had already canceled dozens of flights and other airlines were expected to follow." Across the nation, "temperatures in January averaged nearly 40 degrees, eight and a half degrees above normal. Those warm temperatures have pushed energy demand in the US down by 20%. Good news given that oil prices are at record highs."

World News Tonight (2/11, story 5, :20, Avila) reported, "Outside the White House, across the Northeast, the story is snow and lots of it. As the first major storm takes aim, heavy snow is expected to make for blizzard conditions with more than a foot forecast for some cities. Delta Airlines is canceling flights at all major East Coast airports between Washington and Boston."

Backers, Foes Of Tribal Casinos Prepare For Meetings This Week. The Vancouver (WA) Columbian (2/12, Mize) reports, "This week's two meetings on the Cowlitz Tribe's casino project are supposed to be purely informational, a chance to discuss the complicated federal process for reviewing such requests and to answer questions." The Columbian continues, "Even so, supporters and opponents of the $510 million project west of La Center are rallying their forces as though sheer numbers and rhetorical thunder will determine who wins and who loses. … 'Lest anybody think people out here don't care,' said Tom Hunt, a spokesman for Citizens Against Reservation Shopping, a group formed in June to oppose the Cowlitz project. 'We want to show them they do care.'" The Columbian adds, "Cowlitz tribal leaders also want to make an impression on federal officials. … John Barnett, Cowlitz chairman, sent a letter to tribe members last month imploring them to turn out in force for a pizza dinner and rally before each meeting and to stay for the proceedings. 'Your tribe needs your help,' Barnett wrote in a Jan. 24 letter. 'These are two of the most critical meetings in our tribe's history. It is crucial that you, your family and your friends attend at least one of these meetings. Attendance at both meetings is even better.' … Emotions were ratcheted up another notch Friday when Kamie Biehl, founder of Stand Up For Clark County Citizens, announced she was stepping down as group chairwoman after allegedly receiving threats to herself and family. … Some of the contentiousness has even trickled back to Washington, D.C. Federal officials, realizing the potential for informational meetings to become caustic free-for-alls, were crafting ground rules late Friday afternoon."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Tenth Church Burns In Alabama. NBC Nightly News (2/11, story 5, 2:10, Williams) reported that in Alabama, "another church is reported to be on fire tonight. That would make 10 churches burned this month, all of them in rural areas, all of them Baptist churches. While the FBI and other investigators search for those responsible, the congregations are searching for some way to move forward without fear." NBC (Mott) added, "Though the fire at the Spring Valley Baptist Church this past Tuesday burned out, it lit another kind of flame." Rep. Artur Davis: "If you think you scared somebody, you haven't scared anybody. If you think you've intimidated somebody, you haven't intimidated anybody." Mott: "There's confidence in rural Alabama, despite nine unsolved church arsons here since February 3, first in the central part of the state, then near its western border."

The Montgomery (AL) Advertiser (2/12, Linn) reports, "Federal and state authorities on Saturday responded to another Baptist church fire in rural Alabama, bringing the total to 10 in eight days." The Advertiser continues, "The fire, reported about 4:15 p.m. at Beaverton Free Will Baptist Church in Lamar County near the Mississippi line, had fully engulfed the church by the time firefighters arrived, said Cristal Oakes of the Lamar County Sheriff's Department. … The church near Beaverton is situated between 45 and 60 miles north of four Baptist churches that burned early Tuesday morning in rural Pickens, Greene and Sumter counties. … 'At this point we have not determined what the cause and origin of the fire is,' said Ronald Turk of the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, the federal agency that investigates arson." The Advertiser adds, "Temperatures were predicted in the low 20s overnight, and authorities said the fire may have been an accident related to a heater. Some communities in the area had received a light dusting of snow. … Unlike five Baptist church fires in Bibb County on Feb. 3 and four in west Alabama on Tuesday this fire was reported during daylight hours. But like the others, the fire was in a rural community, where Baptist churches sit just off the beaten path -- churches like Mount Hebron's Pleasant Valley Baptist Church, which is just up a dirt road from some train tracks, past where jack rabbits forage at night."

DOJ_NMG_0014238

TAX:

Trade Off Between Bush Tax Cuts And AMT Tax Seen As Necessary. The New York Times (2/12, Andrews, 1.19M) reports, "Never before has so much of the income tax code consisted of temporary measures. And never before has it been so inherently unsustainable." Almost "all of President Bush's tax cuts and credits…are set to expire by 2011." And "the huge volume of expiring tax cuts is set to collide with an equally expensive challenge that neither Mr. Bush nor the Congress has started to address," the alternative minimum tax, which "is now set to impose big tax increases on tens of millions of middle-income families over the next few years." The Times states, "If Mr. Bush's tax cuts are extended, but the A.M.T. is unchanged, tens of millions of people will face big new surcharges." And if the AMT "is frozen or simply repealed, Congress is likely to make up for the lost money by cutting back or eliminating scores of other tax breaks."

Taxpayers To Feel Pain Of AMT Tax. The New York Times (2/12, Johnston, 1.19M) reports, "After President Bush and Congress cut tax rates on dividends and long-term capital gains to a top rate of 15 percent in 2003, many investors bought stocks that make big cash payouts, expecting to benefit from lower taxes." But "it has not worked out that way. That is because your actual tax rate may not be the one that the politicians talked about or that the Internal Revenue Service prints on its tax forms." That's because the alternative minimum tax "has its own rules, including fewer deductions and just two tax rates, 26 percent and 28 percent. If the alternative tax is higher than the one you would owe under the regular tax system, you pay the higher bill." But while Bush "again called for making his tax cuts permanent" in his State of the Union speech "he said nothing about overhauling or repealing the alternative minimum tax."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Touts Modernization Of Medicare, Admits Problems. President Bush urged senior citizens to sign up for the new Medicare drug program, saying it's a "good deal" and promising the government would address problems with its implementation. Bush's radio address was covered by the wire services and some local TV stations. The AP (2/12, Freking) reports Bush said the new Medicare prescription drug benefit "is helping a large majority of Medicare beneficiaries" but admitted "that some patients have experienced problems." Because of "competition, the program is getting cheaper for beneficiaries and taxpayers alike, Bush said." The AP notes, "The average premium that beneficiaries pay is now expected to be about $25 a month instead of $37, as projected last year. The typical senior citizen will pay about half of what he used to spend on prescription drugs," according to Bush. But, "the government also estimates that several hundred thousand low-income beneficiaries had trouble making the transition to the new program."

Reuters (2/12, Bohan) reports Bush said the "government was working to fix" the problems with the Medicare drug program but "insisted the program was a 'good deal' for seniors and encouraged more to sign up." Some Democrats have blamed the problems on "what they say was the excessive influence of private insurers and pharmacies in shaping the legislation. They view it as an issue on which Bush's Republican allies may be vulnerable in the 2006 elections. Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton recently said "the best way to fix the problems might be to scrap the program and start over." Bush said HHS Secretary Mike Leavitt "has been traveling to several states to meet with governors about the drug benefit. He said officials were trying to make sure more information is shared by Medicare, the health plans and the states, and that it is up-to-date."

The Boston Globe (2/12, Easton, 484K) in an article on conservative dissatisfaction with Bush notes that at CPAC Rep. Tom Tancredo "drew big applause when he called for repealing the administration's costly prescription drug plan, which the president extolled in his Saturday radio address as 'a good deal for seniors.'"

And Bloomberg (2/12, Young) adds, "Fiscal conservatives usually aligned with Bush's Republican party have also assailed the president's embrace of an expansion to a government entitlement program." But "Bush was unapologetic, saying he 'was proud to sign this Medicare reform into law.'"

There was almost no local television coverage of the President's radio address praising the new Medicare D plan. Those stations that did cover it tended to note that Mr. Bush admitted there are problems as it starts up. An example: KLAS-TV Las Vegas (1/11, 6:38 p.m.) reported, "President Bush is praising the new prescription drug benefit initiative. During his weekly radio address today, Mr. Bush acknowledged that there are challenges with the Medicare program."

DOJ_NMG_0014239

Bush Competitiveness Plan Seen As Having Widespread Support. The Los Angeles Times (2/12, Havemann, Simon, 958K) reports President Bush's "new American Competitiveness Initiative is triggering a stampede of bipartisan support. It could be one of the few administration initiatives to be enacted in this congressional election year." With last year's "Social Security push all but abandoned, Bush's domestic focus now is a much less ambitious effort: to prevent the United States from falling behind economic competitors in Asia and elsewhere, by providing federal support for math and science education and for basic research in the physical sciences." The "sour notes have been few and have come largely from critics who wish Bush's initiative had been more ambitious." Bush's "long-range plan calls for doubling the government's annual spending on physical science research over the next decade, from $9.8 billion this year to $19.5 billion in 2016. Bush's 2007 budget, sent to Congress last week, would provide a down payment of $910 million, an increase of 9.3%."

Bush Call For More Skilled Worker Visas Resonates With Silicon Valley Firms. The Los Angeles Times (2/12, Iritani, 958K) reports that President Bush's "recent call for more visas for skilled foreign workers increases the likelihood that relief is on the way for U.S. technology firms that say they are struggling to fill key positions." In a Feb. 2 speech at the Minnesota headquarters of 3M, Bush "called on Congress to be 'realistic' and 'reasonable' and expand the quota of H-1B visas, which are used to bring in skilled workers on a temporary basis." Silicon Valley companies "are among the most vocal advocates of H-1B reform. For decades, these companies attracted engineers, computer programmers and other professionals from around the globe. Now they say they are experiencing a reverse brain drain as skilled workers flock to the booming economies of China and India." Though the "debate in this country about outsourcing work overseas has quieted down in the United States, it remains a sensitive political issue. In December, an effort to get an H-1B visa expansion provision attached to a budget bill was defeated in Congress."

Spending, Immigration Concerns Fuel Conservative Anger At Bush. The Boston Globe (2/12, Easton, 484K) in its "Washington Briefing" column titled "A Wrathful Right Turns On Bush" reports, "The Republican family feud was laid bare in public last week at" CPAC. Conservative activists "are a notoriously cranky bunch, quick to pounce on politician friends who stray toward the center. But this year the spears aimed at George W. Bush were especially sharp." That "can't be a good sign for a White House hoping to maintain control of Congress next November when its one-time allies lump in the president with two of their perpetual bogeymen: John McCain and Ted Kennedy." The President's "budget-busting spending was a big reason for the foul mood. But two other issues captured the growing split between the president and a powerful conservative movement that twice helped him capture the Oval Office: immigration and the Medicare prescription drug plan."

The AP (2/12, Lester) reports that at CPAC conservative Republicans questioned whether Bush "is conservative enough when it comes to government spending and growth." Conservatives "are quite unhappy with Bush administration initiatives…and special spending projects from Congress that have ballooned the cost and scope of the federal government." Conservatives "feel that limited government overrides all other issues such as gun rights, pro-life policies and conservative judges. Yet, despite their unhappiness, Bush remains popular with this group, especially for his court appointments and handling of terrorism." ACU chairman David Keene said, "They like Bush. … But they are frustrated and disappointed with some things the administration has done." He "said conservatives are starting to look ahead at future leaders, accepting that they've gotten some of what they want from Bush.

Justice Department Reviewing Conduct Of Immigration Judges. The Los Angeles Times (2/12, Simmons, 958K) reports the "complaints of insensitive -- even abusive -- conduct by some U.S. immigration judges have prompted a broad federal review." Describing the "conduct of some judges as 'intemperate and even abusive,' U.S. Atty. Gen. Alberto R. Gonzales recently announced that the Justice Department was launching a comprehensive review of the nation's immigration courts." The review "will focus on the performance of the nation's 224 immigration judges, including 55 in California. Last year, the jurists, who are appointed by the attorney general, heard about 270,000 cases, according to department statistics." The review "is being conducted by the deputy and associate attorneys general. It will assess the nature and scope of the problems within the system and recommend improvements, a Justice Department official said." The National Assn. of Immigration Judges "supports the review but believes that incidents of misconduct are rare, said Dana Leigh Marks, vice president of the organization."

DOJ_NMG_0014240

NAFTA Seen As Fueling Illegal Drug Trade As Well. The Houston Chronicle (2/12, Pinkerton, 581K) reports that in Nuevo Laredo, the "five bridges spanning the green waters of the Rio Grande bustle with more than 21,000 cars, trucks and buses every day. This border town — and its American sister city across the river — see more than $100 billion in commerce rumble through every year. They're known as 'Los Dos Laredos,' and few dispute the towns are one of the great NAFTA success stories." But US drug agents "say that free trade with Mexico has had an ugly and unintended consequence: Just as legitimate business people have flocked to Nuevo Laredo, so have criminals. And they have quickly turned it into one of the most dangerous and violent towns along the U.S.-Mexico border, agents say." US drug agents "say they aren't surprised the city of 310,000 has become such a coveted outpost for smugglers. They've worried for years that free trade unwittingly fuels trafficking."

Assaults On Border Patrol Officers On The Rise. The Washington Post (2/12, C2, Barr, 744K) reports in its "Federal Diary" column that assaults "against Border Patrol officers appear to be on the increase -- from gunshots fired to rocks thrown." Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said, "Let me tell you, rockings are serious. You can get serious injuries when a rock . . . hits a Border Patrol agent." The Post adds according to David V. Aguilar, "the Border Patrol chief, there were 374 assaults against officers in fiscal 2004 and 778 assaults in fiscal 2005. Since Oct. 1, the start of the fiscal year, there have been 192." Chertoff and Aguilar "talked about the dangers faced by Border Patrol officers as part of a briefing on the president's new budget proposal. The Department of Homeland Security would receive a 6 percent increase in funding under President Bush 's plan, with a substantial part of the extra funds directed toward tightening border security and cracking down on smugglers and cartels."

Republicans Concerned Bush Budget Will Impact 2006 Elections. The Boston Globe (2/12, Klein, 484K) reports, "Republicans are expressing deep skepticism about President Bush's plans to cut social programs while promoting the extension of his tax cuts, saying the juxtaposition of the two GOP priorities could spur an election-year backlash." Bush's budget "is increasingly being met with criticism from both ideological poles of his party. Moderates are expressing concern about slashing popular programs that benefit the poor at the same time they're being asked to cut taxes on the rich, and conservatives are saying the proposal does not go far enough in controlling the record budget deficit." The "reaction to Bush's proposal this year was notably cool from members of his own party," and Republican Main Street Partnership executive director Sarah Chamberlain Resnick "said she sees at least one bright spot in the budget proposal: It will give moderates from districts that are heavily Democratic a chance to demonstrate their independence from Bush."

Sen. Menendez Faults Bush Budget For Burdening Middle Class. The AP (2/12, Gold) reports, "The budget proposed by President Bush adds to middle-class burdens while providing greater benefits for the wealthy and oil companies, Sen. Robert Menendez, D-N.J., said Saturday." Menendez said Bush's budget "will increase health insurance premiums and out-of-pocket costs through new schemes that will expand tax shelters for the healthy and the wealthy and drive up costs for the rest of us."

Coburn's Unwillingness To Support Earmarks Noted. In his Washington Post column (2/12, B7), George Will profiles Sen. Tom Coburn, the "most dangerous creature that can come to the Senate, someone simply uninterested in being popular. When House Speaker Dennis Hastert defends earmarks -- spending dictated by individual legislators for specific projects -- by saying that a member of Congress knows best where a stoplight ought to be placed, Coburn, in an act of lese-majeste, responds: Members of Congress are the least qualified to make such judgments." Coburn "came to the nation's attention last October when he proposed taking the $223 million earmarked for Alaska's 'Bridge to Nowhere' and using it to repair a New Orleans bridge destroyed by Hurricane Katrina." Because this "threat to Alaska also threatened Congress's code of comity -- mutual respect for everyone's parochial interests -- his proposal lost by 67 votes. But rather than do the decent thing -- apologize, tug his forelock and slink away chastened -- he refused to stop talking about it, made it an embarrassment to the Senate and catalyzed revulsion against spending that is both promiscuous and parochial."

DOJ_NMG_0014241

Deficit Reduction Bill Includes Provision That Hikes Student Loan Interest Rates. ABC World News Tonight (2/11, story 6, 2:45, Avila) reported, "A warning for the college bound. Lock in your loan now, because the cost of money you borrow to pay for school is going up. This week, the government changed the rules for Federal loan programs. While students and parents can borrow more money, they will also face higher interest rates." ABC (Yang) added, "President Bush says the global economy means that America has to haven educated work force in order to remain competitive. But the President and the Republican Congress this week made going to college a little bit more expensive for millions of students." While a provision of the deficit reduction bill "makes more money available to more students, it raises interest rates on some loans by as much as 2%. That's on top of rising college costs, up 46% over the last five years." In his budget proposal, "Mr. Bush said he wanted to freeze Pell Grants, the money that goes to low income students. That proposal is already drawing opposition from both Republicans and Democrats in Congress."

And the AP (2/12, Gold) notes that in the Democratic weekend radio address Sen. Robert Menendez "said Bush's budget for 2007, released Monday, would increase college costs 'by locking in the largest student aid cut in the history of our nation.'"

User Fee Increases In Bush Budget Face Opposition. The AP (2/12, Taylor) reports, "President Bush hates new taxes, that's for sure. But tell that to airline passengers, higher-income veterans and owners of freighters using the St. Lawrence Seaway. They are among those hit up for billions of dollars under his new budget plan." Bush's budget "contains $3.5 billion in new user fees" which "would swell to $47.2 billion over five years, dunning taxpayers and industry to help pay for government services." But most "arrived on Capitol Hill dead as a doornail" because they "mostly are proposals rejected in the past."

Opponents Of Social Security Reform Surprised By Inclusion In Bush Budget. The Washington Times (2/12, Fagan, 90K) reports, "Opponents of President Bush's Social Security personal accounts plan were jolted into action last week when the proposal showed up in Mr. Bush's newest budget request." Bush "didn't push for it in his State of the Union address last month, instead calling for a bipartisan commission to study how best to reform the system -- a move that 'relieved' Democratic opponents of the plan such as Sen. Charles E. Schumer." Yet "that relief quickly dissipated Monday, opponents said, when they discovered Mr. Bush's 2007 budget proposal mentioned the plan." And "Republicans said Congress won't act on the proposal during this already highly charged election year." One House GOP leadership aide said that "it would be difficult for us to tackle this in a partisan election atmosphere." The Times notes, "Democrats said it was contradictory for Mr. Bush to suggest a bipartisan panel to explore various reform ideas while continuing to push his own plan." But "White House spokesman Trent Duffy disagreed, saying Mr. Bush's budget 'simply reiterated what he said all of last year' about his Social Security plan, and 'doesn't color in any way' the outcome of the bipartisan commission."

Brownstein Says Entitlement Reform Will Take Bipartisan Effort. Ron Brownstein in his column in the Los Angeles Times (2/12, 958K) writes that the failure of the 1995 Kerrey-Danforth entitlement commission "should caution President Bush, who pledged in his State of the Union address to appoint yet another commission on entitlements. A commission can be useful only if it recognizes that at this point, the solution to the entitlement problem doesn't require an intellectual breakthrough. It demands something even more rare these days: a political accommodation between the parties." Democrats need to agree to spending cuts and Republicans tax increases, but even then "Washington won't tame the entitlement problem without also slowing the overall increase in healthcare costs. … That won't happen without comprehensive healthcare reform, an issue Washington hasn't addressed since the collapse of Clinton's universal coverage plan in 1994.

Students Ignore Option To Benefit From NCLB Tutoring Program. The New York Times (2/12, A1, Saulny, 1.19M) in a front page story reports, "Four years after President Bush signed the landmark No Child Left Behind education law, vast numbers of students are not getting the tutoring that the law offers as one of its hallmarks." In New York City, "fewer than half of the 215,000 eligible students sought the free tutoring." And "New York's participation rate is better than the national average: across the country, roughly two million public school students were eligible for free tutoring in the school year that ended in 2004, according to the most recent data from the Department of Education, yet only 226,000 -- or nearly 12 percent -- received help." Educators "give multiple reasons for the problems: that the program is allotted too little federal money, is poorly advertised to parents, has too much complicated paperwork for signing up, and that it has not fully penetrated the most difficult neighborhoods, where there are high concentrations of poor, failing students."

DOJ_NMG_0014242

Maryland Schools Face NCLB Deadline. The Washington Post (2/12, C1, Anderson, 744K) reports, "It has been eight years since Maryland told the Prince George's County school to shape up, or else. It has been four years since the federal government raised the pressure with a law meant to force shake-ups through aid and sanctions." But, "Charles Carroll Middle School has continued to fall short of state standards, even though the county has switched textbooks, changed principals three times and even assigned a 'turnaround specialist.'" Now "Maryland faces a question posed by the No Child Left Behind law: What happens when a school reaches the end of the line?" The Post notes, "Last week, the Bush administration offered one answer. It proposed $100 million to help parents with children in last-stage public schools move them to private schools or obtain tutoring. The proposal riled school-voucher opponents but underscored the issue's growing urgency."

House Republicans Meet In Cambridge, Maryland For Retreat. The New York Times (2/12, Hulse, 1.19M) reports House Republicans "descended in force upon" Cambridge, Maryland "for three days to ponder their political and policy future and ended up talking about 'the Force.'" At a retreat "intended to help them regain their footing after a corruption scandal and a leadership shake-up, about 180 lawmakers were treated to a film spoof that portrayed Republicans as the 'Star Wars' heroes being pursued by the evil Democratic empire led by 'Darth Nancy.' That would be" House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi. The "short video, produced by the National Republican Congressional Committee, had the audience in stitches, according to those on hand. But it was also a tacit admission that House Republicans are in for an epic battle this November as they try to retain their majority in a midterm election cycle that has historically meant Congressional losses for the party in power." New Majority Leader Rep. John Boehner, "who served in the leadership during the heady days of the Republican takeover in 1994, put a lot of stock in the retreat's potential. After his election, he helped restructure the conference, saying he wanted to provide individual lawmakers with more opportunity to vent and voice their ambitions after years of top-down management of the House."

Boehner's Positions On Several Issues At Variance With Those Of Caucus. The Washington Post (2/12, A7, Weisman, 744K) reports that as Rep. Boehner "moves to unite his fractious House Republicans," he has "another issue to finesse: his own views on some key issues, which have clashed with the stance of much of the Republican Party. From illegal immigration to sanctions on China to an overhaul of the pension system, Boehner, as chairman of the House Committee on Education and the Workforce, took ardently pro-business positions that were contrary to those of many in his party. Religious conservatives -- examining his voting record -- see him as a policymaker driven by small-government economic concerns, not theirs." In the coming months, Boehner "must decide whether to stick to his well-established beliefs and try to bend his party's stance or give in to the majority of the majority party." In an interview, Boehner "vowed to lead by consensus," but he "also stood by his positions, especially on a tough illegal immigration bill that passed in December with overwhelming Republican support over Boehner's opposition." One provision "would mandate that every business verify the legality of every employee through the federal terrorism watch list and a database of Social Security numbers. For the bill's authors, the measure is central to choking off illegal immigrants' employment opportunities. To business groups and Boehner, it is unworkable."

With Boehner As Majority Leader, Luntz Is Out Of Favor. The Washington Post (2/12, A5, Cillizza, 744K) reports that at the House GOP retreat, Republican pollster Frank Luntz "was on the original schedule to make a presentation -- but he did not." Luntz said that "he was not disinvited from the retreat, only that his presentation was rescheduled." Sean Spicer, "a spokesman for House Republican Conference Chairman Deborah Pryce (Ohio), confirmed that Luntz did not appear at the retreat but will address House Republicans on Wednesday." But according to "several Republican party strategists, newly elected Majority Leader John A. Boehner (Ohio) made it clear to members that if Luntz was going to the retreat, he wouldn't be in attendance." Luntz was "instrumental in the creation of the

DOJ_NMG_0014243

'Contract With America' -- the document widely credited with delivering Republicans the House majority in 1994. Boehner's relationship (or lack thereof) with the pollster goes back -- at least -- to late 1998, when Boehner was seeking to hold onto his job as House GOP Conference chairman." Days before the GOP caucus "met to hold leadership elections, Boehner appeared on several Sunday talk shows making clear that he and Gingrich had often parted ways on strategy. Luntz said at the time that Boehner made a 'big mistake' by criticizing Gingrich, and he heaped praise on Rep. J.C. Watts (Okla.), who was challenging Boehner for the conference chairmanship. Watts beat Boehner -- throwing the Ohioan unceremoniously out of leadership."

Bush, Abramoff Appear In Same Photo. The CBS Evening News (2/11, story 3, :30, Mitchell) reported, "A photograph of President Bush in the company of disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff is posted on the Time magazine web site tonight. The photograph show Mr. Bush with his back to the camera, meeting a native American tribal chief in the executive office building back in May 2001. Jack Abramoff can be seen looking on from the background. President Bush has said he does not remember ever meeting with Abramoff."

Time (2/12, Zagroin, Cooper) reports the White House "has continued to assert that the President had no recollection of ever meeting Abramoff. When TIME reported in January that it had viewed unpublished photographs of Abramoff with Bush, aides responded that the pictures meant nothing since the President is photographed with thousands of supporters and White House visitors every year." Now, "finally, the first such photo has come to light. It shows a bearded Abramoff in the background as Bush greets an Abramoff client, Raul Garza, who was then the chairman of the Kickapoo Traditional Tribe of Texas; Bush senior advisor Karl Rove looks on. The photograph was provided to TIME by Mr. Garza." The meeting "took place in the Eisenhower Executive Office Building adjacent to the White House on May 9, 2001." White House Press Secretary Scott McClellan "said the White House had still found no record of Abramoff's presence but confirmed that it is Abramoff in the picture." This meeting, "however, was a relatively small gathering attended by some two dozen people, including Garza and another Indian tribal leader who was Abramoff's client. At least two tribes, the Coushatta of Louisiana and the Mississippi Band of Choctaw, contributed $25,000 each to the anti-tax group Americans for Tax Reform, which is headed by Grover Norquist, a well-known conservative ally of the White House."

The New York Times (2/12, Shenon, Bergman, 1.19M) reports the "first photograph to be published of the two men shows a small, partly obscured image of Mr. Abramoff looking on from the background as Mr. Bush greets a Texas Indian chief in May 2001. By itself, the picture hardly seems worthy of the White House's efforts to keep it out of the public eye." Abramoff "is little more than a blurry, bearded figure in the background at a gathering of about two dozen people. But it provides a window, albeit an opaque one, into Mr. Abramoff's efforts to sell himself to Indian tribes as a man of influence who could open the most secure doors in Washington to them. And it leaves unanswered questions about how Mr. Abramoff and the tribal leader, whom he was trying to sign as a client, gained access to a meeting with the president on the White House grounds that was ostensibly for a group of state legislators who were supporting Mr. Bush's 2001 tax cut plan."

The Washington Post/Bloomberg (2/12, A4) reports White House spokesman Scott McClellan "told Time that the photo does not change anything. 'The president has taken countless, tens of thousands of pictures at home and abroad over the last five years,' McClellan told Time. 'A photo like this has no relevance to the Justice Department's investigation.'" The AFP (2/12) reports the "publication of the photo came amid a mushrooming scandal of influence-peddling in Washington, and threatened to raise fresh questions about Abramoff's link to the Republican administration."

Leadership PACs Seen As Loophole For Members Of Congress. The Minneapolis Star Tribune (2/12, Talev, 424K) reports Alaska Rep. Don Young "gained notoriety last year as the chairman of the House Transportation Committee who secured more than $200 million for a 'bridge to nowhere' in his home state." But what was "less noticed was the Republican's support for projects elsewhere in the country favored by contributors to Midnight Sun, a political action committee." Young's leadership PAC, Midnight Sun's "treasurer is a lobbyist with a client list that includes transportation interests." In southeast Arkansas, "more than a dozen men and women connected to road paving and auto sales in and near Pine Bluff gave about $28,000 last March to Midnight Sun, on top of about $20,000 to Young's reelection committee. When the highway bill passed a few months later, it had more than $200 million for their region over the next five years." Many campaign finance experts "see leadership PACs as part of the problem, a way to skirt campaign limits and hide special-interest ties." But few lawmakers "want to clamp down on a fundraising vehicle that is being increasingly relied on by politicians as other contribution limits have kicked in."

DOJ_NMG_0014244

Crime Fighting Strategies Seen As Useful For Congressional Reform. In his Washington Post column (2/12, B1), Michael Grunwald says that with the falling crime rate, "nobody argues anymore that bad neighborhoods are doomed" except for one "here in Washington. It is enduring a crime wave unparalleled in recent memory, and even though its leaders are making noises about cleaning it up, many experts remain skeptical that its culture of recidivism can be reformed. Then again, the neighborhood in question, the U.S. Congress, has always inspired skepticism." As "new pay-for-policy allegations emerge about representatives with made-for-cartoon names like Doolittle, DeLay and Ney, conventional wisdom is congealing around the notion that Congress is what it is, and can't be changed. But that was once conventional wisdom about New York, too." Grunwald then considers several crime reduction strategies such as more visible Justice Department and Federal Election Commission enforcement presence on Capitol Hill.

DeLay Resumes Appropriations Committee Seat. The Houston Chronicle (2/12, Levine, 581K) reports Rep. Tom DeLay, R-Sugar Land, "is officially back on the House committee that oversees how the federal government spends its money. After giving up his post as House majority leader in January after a lobbying scandal and his indictment on campaign finance charges, DeLay last week regained his seat on the House Appropriations Committee." Now back "as a rank-and-file member, the lawmaker was assigned to two subcommittees — the panels that oversee the NASA budget and several federal agencies, including Justice, State and Homeland Security. His district includes the Johnson Space Center." DeLay, who has "never chaired a subcommittee and is not slated to do so now, will be among the most senior members of the panel."

Poll Shows 45% Think Bush Treated Same As Other Presidents By Media. The Houston Chronicle (2/12, Mason, 581K) in its "White House Watch" column notes, "A new CBS News/New York Times poll found that 45 percent of Americans asked think Bush gets about the same treatment from the media as other presidents." It also "found that 35 percent said reporters are tougher on him than on other presidents, and 18 percent said Bush has it easier. It would be interesting to hear what Bill Clinton thinks of these perceptions." Clinton "made a stop by the press cabin last week on Air Force One -- something Bush has done only once."

Hagel Independence From Bush May Prove Attractive To Conservatives. The New York Times Magazine (2/12, Lelyveld) in a lengthy examination of Sen. Chuck Hagel's prospects in a potential 2008 presidential campaign highlights Hagel's opposition to President Bush, in particular on Iraq. But on domestic issue Hagel also "broke with his party leadership to vote against the new prescription-drug program under Medicare, the No Child Left Behind bill and a big farm bill stuffed with incentives for corporate agriculture. Each, he felt, was ill conceived in practical terms and unwarranted as an expansion of federal mandates and spending. Only on the Bush tax cuts -- all of which he has supported -- has he been deaf to warnings about the consequences for the federal deficit. (Though, he says, he'd never take 'the pledge' to oppose any and all tax hikes.)" ACU chairman David Keene noted "that Hagel has taken a more conservative position than the Bush administration every time he has broken with it on a major issue." One "issue that could propel him into the campaign is not one on which candidacies normally rise or fall. Call it the issue of competence." But "while he doesn't exactly say that the current administration has been careless and incompetent, that theme cries out between the lines of much of what he does say. After the botched reconstruction of Iraq and the nonchalant response to the hurricane on the Gulf Coast, it's not a stretch to hear an implied critique when he says, as he did talking to local reporters in Ames, Iowa, last fall, that the president should 'stay focused on governing the country' and 'reach out to Congress.'"

Frist Seen As Distancing Himself From Bush. Robert Novak in his syndicated column (2/12) writes, "In recent national television appearances, Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist backed away from unequivocal support of President Bush in what Republican insiders viewed as preparation for a 2008 presidential run." Novak notes, "On NBC's 'Meet the Press' Jan. 29, Frist said, 'I would have probably put more troops in [Iraq] if the decision had been up to me.' He said the White House is not cooperating with Hurricane Katrina investigations by Congress. As for the Bush budget, he said: 'We are spending too much in Washington, D.C.' He suggested his and the White House's position in the Terri Schiavo case was wrong. On NBC's 'Today' program the next day, when asked about the administration's National Guard policy, Frist replied: 'I am opposed to cutting the Guard myself.'"

DOJ_NMG_0014245

McCain Seeks Support For 2008 Campaign From Bush Network. The Washington Post (2/12, A1, Balz, 744K) in a front page story reports, "With a 2008 campaign in the offing," Sen. John McCain "has begun an intensive courtship of Bush's financial and political networks. His recent travels included a December swing through the heart of Bush country in Texas that put him in front of many of the president's leading supporters there." While "Republicans look toward 2008 and worry about maintaining the White House, a streak of pragmatism has drawn them to look again at a man who often has been an antagonist of the president and party leaders." In preparation "of a likely campaign, he appears eager to reach accommodation with longtime GOP adversaries. He has undertaken the kind of practical steps necessary to enhance his chances of winning the nomination, focusing on organizations in states critical to winning the GOP nomination and building relationships with Republicans who rejected him in 2000."

McCain Supporters Encouraged By Criticism Of Obama. Robert Novak in his syndicated column (2/12) writes, "Key supporters of Sen. John McCain's prospective bid for the 2008 Republican presidential nomination were delighted by his outburst against Sen. Barack Obama, the rising Democratic superstar." Novak adds, "The downside of McCain's outburst, say his supporters, is that it strengthens the perception that he may be too hot-tempered to serve as president."

Gingrich Gets Rousing Welcome At Conservative Conference. The AP (2/12, Lester) reports former Speaker Newt Gingrich "told cheering conservatives Saturday it is time to overhaul a balky, slow-moving government locked in the last century. Citing multiple government failures after Hurricane Katrina, the former House speaker said the government meltdown at all levels illustrated how badly government needs to be updated in all of its operations." Gingrich said, "The system failed, the city of New Orleans failed, the state of Louisiana failed and the government of the United States failed. When you see an American body on an American street sitting there for three days on television because the government can't collect the dead, something has failed." The Washington Times (2/12, 90K) also runs the AP story.

Congress Resists Smoking Bans. The New York Times (2/12, Kornblut, 1.19M) reports that when Washington's "citywide smoking ban takes effect here next month, at least one workplace in town will be spared: Congress, the beneficiary of a kind of diplomatic immunity for federal lawmakers." That is "excellent news" smokers such as Majority Leader John A. Boehner, cigar smoker Barney Frank, and struggling quitter Sherwood Boehlert. While the "rest of the country has turned against smoking with great zeal, Congress has stubbornly — some would say proudly — refused to bend. Smoking is still allowed in numerous indoor spaces in the Capitol, most noticeably in the gilded reception area where lawmakers crowd together during the long yeas and nays." Members are "uncharacteristically shy about discussing their smoking habits in a public domain where smoking is supposedly taboo." Yet in private, "some lawmakers have shown little desire to tamp down the addiction. In some corners, the right to smoke in Congress is seen as a last stand against political correctness, a bulwark against the antismoking fervor that swept the political universe during the Clinton years."

Rumsfeld Said To Have "Lost" In Effort To Change Pentagon Culture, Foreign Policy. In a Washington Post (2/12, B2, 744K) Outlook article reporter David Von Drehle says that if you "read closely in the barrage of weighty tomes" Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld and company "put out in recent days, you might discover that the Rumsfeld era is over, and Rumsfeld lost. The secretary had staked his tenure on two ideas. He wanted to change Pentagon culture, and he wanted the military to drive American foreign policy. Neither idea survived the week." First, the "signature effort of Rumsfeld's historic tenure -- his 'transformation' of the world's most powerful military -- melted away under the cover of the imposing Quadrennial Defense Review. In 92 dense pages it revealed that while America's troops will be called to perform new missions in countries around the globe, the entrenched forces in Washington, the contractors and the members of Congress, have survived Rumsfeld virtually unscathed." Another secret "hidden in plain sight in last week's $439 billion Pentagon request -- up nearly 7 percent from the wartime budget of fiscal 2006 -- was that the real sum is much higher. Military spending in the coming months will pass the half-trillion-dollar mark. That $439 billion doesn't include the ongoing costs of operations in Afghanistan and Iraq, for which the Pentagon will soon seek a 'supplemental appropriation' of at least $70 billion for the rest of this fiscal year and another $50 billion to start next year." Which "leads to last week's third secret. Iraq remains the urgent focus of America's largest deployed force; it is a key to U.S. foreign policy and determines the political terrain at home. But it has been reduced to the status of a troubled subsidiary in the corporate flow chart of Rumsfeld's Pentagon: off-budget for accounting purposes, and, apparently, incidental to future strategy."

DOJ_NMG_0014246

OTHER NEWS:

Economic Reports May Prompt Stock Markets Sell-Offs. The New York Times (2/12, De Aenlle, 1.19M) reports Wall Street traders "will have a lot of information served to them this week, but in the opinion of Mike Williams, a strategist at Tocqueville Asset Management, they will find little of it palatable." Reports on "consumer activity (retail sales and consumer confidence), manufacturing (industrial production and capacity utilization) and the housing market (housing starts and building permits) will follow one another in quick succession, beginning on Tuesday." Williams "foresees readings ranging from neutral to favorable, showing a resumption of healthy economic growth after a subdued fourth quarter. But he is concerned that Wall Street will make the worst of a good situation and sell on the news."

Bull Market May Have Little Ground To Advance. The Los Angeles Times (2/12, Petruno, 958K) reports this "bull market hasn't surrendered much since it began more than three years ago. But that may be because it hasn't had a lot to give, at least in the case of blue-chip shares." The Standard & Poor's 500 index "lost 751 points, or 49%, in its slide from its record high on March 24, 2000, to its bear-market low of 776.76 on Oct. 9, 2002. Since the low, the index has recovered 490 points, or about two-thirds of what it lost." Historically, by the time "most bull markets have reached their fourth year they've recouped all of the previous bear-market loss, says Sam Stovall, investment strategist at S&P in New York. The cautious tone of this advance may be a big reason the S&P hasn't experienced as much as a 10% correction, or short-term pullback, in three years, Stovall says."

Full Employment Seen As Worthy Economic Goal. The New York Times (2/12, Uchitelle, 1.19M) reports many Americans "may not realize full employment was once a hotly pursued goal — a condition considered so important that many politicians wanted it legislated and not left to chance." These are "radical concepts today. Fear of another depression prompted the first debate, in the mid-1940's, and a steep recession contributed to the second, in the mid-1970's. Both bills, as finally enacted, failed to achieve their original goal. And as inflation rose in the late 70's, government shifted to fighting it, often at the expense of employment." Out of the "second Congressional debate came not full employment but a fear of it. The law that Congress finally enacted, the Humphrey-Hawkins Act of 1978, set full employment as a goal — along with low inflation. Soon, however, each was viewed as the enemy of the other and full employment, defined as the right to a job, lost out." The "late-90's hiring boom, approaching full employment, has lingered fondly in public memory. And now that the unemployment rate is falling once more — it dropped two-tenths of a percentage point last month, to 4.7 percent, its lowest level in four and a half years — there is talk again of somehow bringing back, if not full employment, then at least the late 90's version of it."

New Space Race Underway. The Los Angeles Times (2/12, Johnson, 958K) reports, "Thirty-four years after the last Apollo astronaut walked on the lunar surface, a new space race is underway. It will be a long race, with humans unlikely to set foot on the moon again in the next 10 to 15 years. But countries are gearing up to take their first steps." India's "20,000 space workers are readying a lunar orbital mission set for 2007. Japan plans to send a robotic rover to the lifeless rock by 2013, and the European Space Agency has a probe, SMART-1, orbiting the moon." Although many countries "are talking about sending people to the moon, only two, the United States and China, have set dates for manned lunar landings. NASA says its next manned mission will be as early as 2018; China says it wants to land 'taikonauts' — as Chinese astronauts are called — as early as 2017." Each country is "going for its own reasons — some commercial, some strategic, some for national pride. But if the plans come to fruition, the moon could become a busy extraterrestrial outpost for scientists, engineers and possibly ordinary citizens in the coming decades. It would also serve as a vital way station for man's long-dreamed-of trip to Mars." And "leading the way is the only country that has set foot there before, the United States."

DOJ_NMG_0014247

Romney Tied For Third In Michigan 2008 Poll. The Boston Globe (2/12, Easton, 484K) in its "Washington Briefing" column notes, "On the Romney '08 front, a new Strategic Vision poll shows the Massachusetts governor tied for third with Newt Gingrich and George Allen among Michigan Republican voters asked to consider prospective presidential candidates." The leaders, "John McCain, at 37 percent, and Rudolph Giuliani, at 25 percent. Michigan -- Mitt Romney's childhood home and the state his father governed -- is considered key to a potential presidential run."

Warner Faces Hurdles In Building Name Recognition. The Washington Post (2/12, A9, Shear, 744K) reports, "A lot has changed for Mark R. Warner since he left behind the Virginia governorship and his 80 percent approval ratings to begin mulling a presidential campaign." Yet, "perhaps nothing more than this: At just 3 percent in a recent poll asking Democrats nationwide to rate their presidential preference, Warner has become an unknown overnight." So "Warner's purpose in New Hampshire is serious." Warner will "likely to be competing with such superstars as Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), who was preferred by more than 10 times as many Democratic voters in a CNN poll, and Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.), who received more than 59 million votes in the 2004 presidential election." Similar to Sen. Chuck Hagel, Warner has made competence a theme, saying Republicans have "pushed competence to the side and made partisan loyalty the standard."

In a more positive story, Knight Ridder (2/12, Thomma) says Warner's message in New Hampshire that he's won in a "red state" and has a strong management style was well received "among party activists considering which candidate they'll work for." Former Rep. Dick Swett said, "Those in the know have a very high opinion of him." But "Warner only has the support of 2 percent of New Hampshire Democrats in a new poll, well back in the pack and far behind presumed frontrunner Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York."

Kerry Has Over $9M Left Over From 2004 Campaign. The Boston Globe (2/12, Easton, 484K) in its "Washington Briefing" column notes, "Last week The Briefing understated Senator John Kerry's campaign war chest. In addition to nearly $800,000 in his PAC and Senate committee, Kerry has $9.1 million left over from his 2004 primary campaign account." His aides say since the 2004 campaign Kerry "has doled out $3 million to Democratic candidates and organizations."

Pennsylvania GOP Endorses Swann For Governor. The Washington Post/AP (2/12, A4, Press) reports, "Pennsylvania's Republican Party leaders endorsed former Pittsburgh Steelers star Lynn Swann for governor Saturday, virtually guaranteeing that he will be the candidate to face Democratic incumbent Ed Rendell this fall." He won on "a unanimous voice vote during a meeting of the 300-plus-member Republican State Committee at a downtown hotel."

The Philadelphia Inquirer (2/12, Couloumbis, 423K) notes, "RNC chairman Ken Mehlman last week "said the national committee will send staff to Pennsylvania by the end of the month to help in the governor's race and U.S. Sen. Rick Santorum's reelection. 'We intend to work very hard with both campaigns,' he added." The Inquirer states, "It is a politically enviable position to be in." Observers say Swann "snagged the state GOP's favored-son status not because party heads came together to decide he was the best candidate to beat Rendell -- but because rank-and-file party members liked him, and rallied behind him." The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (2/12, Barnes, 261K) also reports on Swann's endorsement.

Steele Offers Qualified Support For Stem Cell Research. The Washington Post (2/12, C3, Marimow, 744K) reports, "Maryland Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele expressed qualified support yesterday for embryonic stem cell research, just days after causing an uproar by linking the science to medical experimentation during the Holocaust." He "used a radio interview to try to distance himself from the dust-up and expand his views on the controversial research. He offered several conditions of his support and gave one example of a type of research that some leading scientists in the field say is not practical at this point." He "cited research at the National Institutes of Health, which he said involved scientists extracting the cells they need 'without destroying the embryo.'" Yet, "several leading stem cell researchers…have said that technique is impractical for now."

DOJ_NMG_0014248

Steele Silent On Top Issues. The Baltimore Sun (2/12, Skalka, 296K) reports, "Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele announced his bid for U.S. Senate in October with a promise to be a different kind of candidate, to build bridges between citizens and government and to be a voice for all Marylanders." But "with debates raging on a series of national and state issues -- including the appointment of a new Supreme Court justice and the revision of minimum-wage laws -- Steele has stayed out of the fray." Steele said, "I don't need to talk about issues right now. … I need to establish a relationship with voters." But his "strategy of silence faltered last week when he compared embryonic stem cell research to the experiments done by Nazi doctors -- a flub that exposed him to harsh criticism, left him struggling to formulate a clear position on a politically vexing issue and led critics to question whether he had sufficient seasoning to ascend to the Senate."

Santorum, Casey Take Advantage Of Subsidized Air Travel. The Philadelphia Inquirer (2/12, Budoff, 423K) reports, "It's a tempting offer for the time-strapped elected official: fly by private jet, courtesy of a corporation, without the hassle of long lines and lost luggage." The Inquirer notes, "Sen. Rick Santorum (R., Pa.) took advantage of the perk 10 times in the last two years, paying more than $18,000 -- a fraction of the true cost of the flights -- to six companies with legislative interests before Congress, according to campaign-finance documents." Santorum's Democratic challenger, state Treasurer Robert Casey Jr., has called for closing the air travel loophole, but he also "had already charged through the loophole by accepting a jet ride from the Texas law firm of Baron & Budd in June to raise money and later repaying only the cost of a first-class ticket."

Minnesota Senate Race Attracts National Attention. The Minneapolis Star Tribune (2/12, Lopez, 424K) reports, "Minnesota voters this fall will fill one of the nation's few open seats in the U.S. Senate, and the 2006 contest already is attracting the money and attention of the rich and powerful across the country." Yet, "instead of the prize provoking a bloody free-for-all among Minnesota's most ambitious politicians, the field has cleared out early in both leading parties, with candidates dropping out and many high-profile names never entering." That "dearth of contestants may reflect national parties' and interest groups' increasingly aggressive intervention in Minnesota politics." As the election approaches "Minnesota voters are almost certain to see both a parade of big names and a blitz of national ads, many likely to be sponsored by organizations other than the candidates themselves." But currently the only candidates "are Hennepin County Attorney Amy Klobuchar and veterinarian Ford Bell on the DFL side and Republican Sixth District U.S. Rep. Mark Kennedy, who was anointed early on by GOP leaders and who faces only token opposition from retired minister Harold Shudlick."

Danforth Worries Religious Conservatives Taking Over GOP. The CBS Evening News (2/11, story 9, 3:15, Mitchell) reported, "It appears sometimes that issues of faith and politics are dividing Americans more frequently than ever. And one senior figure with a foot in both camps believes it's no accident. For tonight's weekend journal, Bill Whitaker talks to the Senate veteran who is known far and wide as St. Jack." Former Sen. John Danforth: "I am concerned about the Republican Party becoming in essence the party of the Christian conservatives." CBS (Whitaker) added, "This is no Republican basher speaking. It's party stalwart John Danforth, a lifelong Republican with rock solid conservative credentials." But, "now this faithful Republican is worried about the direction his party is taking." Danforth: "It makes the party seem exclusive, and I think it makes American politics meaner." Whitaker: "How did he come to this?" Danforth: "I was appalled by the Terri Schiavo case." Whitaker: "Seeing Republicans, who traditionally had stood for keeping government off citizens' backs, in this case pushing the Federal Government into such a personal affair." Whitaker: "Danforth's brother died of Lou Gehrig's disease, one of the many scientists believe stem cell research might cure. He's campaigning to convince Missouri to allow the research." Danforth: "I want cures to be found. They would say that cells in a petri dish are morally equivalent to an 11-year-old child. It is a statement based solely on a religious point of view."

Fish Says "Liberal Religion" Means Beliefs Not Taken Seriously. In a New York Times op-ed (2/12), Florida International University law professor Stanley Fish addresses the controversy caused by the publication of caricatures of Mohammed in the Danish and later European media, adding that the "first tenet of the liberal religion is that everything (at least in the realm of expression and ideas) is to be permitted, but nothing is to be taken seriously. This is managed by the familiar distinction — implied in the First Amendment's religion clause — between the public and private spheres. It is in the private sphere — the personal spaces of the heart, the home and the house of worship — that one's religious views are allowed full sway and dictate behavior." But in "the public sphere, the argument goes, one's religious views must be put forward with diffidence and circumspection. You can still have them and express them — that's what separates us from theocracies and tyrannies — but they should be worn lightly. Not only must there be no effort to make them into the laws of the land, but they should not be urged on others in ways that make them uncomfortable. What religious beliefs are owed — and this is a word that appears again and again in the recent debate — is 'respect'; nothing less, nothing more."

DOJ_NMG_0014249

Robertson's Gaffes Draw Increasing Scrutiny. The Los Angeles Times (2/12, Fiore, 958K) profiles televangelist Pat Robertson, whose "famous fundraising prowess that has made him one of the world's most recognizable and influential televangelists. But lately the charismatic broadcaster is better known for something else — a series of controversial and incendiary remarks that have foisted him into the news. And the limelight has not been flattering." Robertson's "evangelical peers have branded him 'arrogant' for his comments, and students at the Christian university he founded worry that his candor could damage their school's credibility. The political left eagerly monitors his appearances on his spirits-raising morning show. What they find becomes fodder for talk-show monologues." Outspokenness "is nothing new" for Robertson, but "at age 75, and freed from the need to marshal political capital, Robertson seems even less restrained than ever. His verbal grenades sound more like bombs, and even those in the evangelical community are noticing."

Remote West Texas To Get Public Radio Station. The New York Times (2/12, Novovitch, 1.19M) reports "far West Texas, a 20,000-square-mile area," has been "been barren of broadcasting except for a few pirate stations and two small, low-wattage operations. A 100,000-watt station, the strongest FM signal allowed, with call letters KRTS (93.5 on the dial), will sign on Monday at 4 p.m. Central time when Dan Rather, the former CBS anchor and a native Texan, flips a switch, says a few ceremonial words then cuts away to the National Public Radio program 'All Things Considered.'" Marfa Public Radio "will be the first radio station offering national and world news to far West Texas, with a potential 50,000 listeners, counting travelers and residents, according to its president." Though Marfa "may seem an unlikely home for public radio," the "vast, sparsely populated region in recent years has attracted urban refugees who live or vacation here. Local residents had tried for decades to bring public radio to the area, but it was the influx of outsiders that helped them finally start a station."

Gore's Daughter Profiles Groundbreaking Women In New Book. The New York Times (2/12, Starr, 1.19M) reports Karenna Gore Schiff "a lawyer and former journalist, played a central role in Gore's 2000 presidential campaign. In 'Lighting the Way: Nine Women Who Changed Modern America,' Schiff writes that she decided to profile women who had spearheaded progressive change in part to mitigate the pain of that election loss."

Iran Threatens To Abandon Nonproliferation Treaty. The New York Times (2/12, Fathi, 1.19M) reports, "Iran's president warned on Saturday that Iran could withdraw from the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty if international pressure increased over its nuclear program. His threat was a significant escalation of the government's previous position that it would only stop complying with spot inspections of military installations and sites it has not declared to be part of its nuclear program." President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad told "tens of thousand of demonstrators who had gathered to mark the 27th anniversary of the Islamic revolution" that "The Islamic Republic has continued its program within the framework of the International Atomic Energy Agency and the nonproliferation treaty. ... But if we see that you want to use the NPT regulations to deprive us of our rights, know that the people will revise their policy in this regard. ... I ask our dear people to prepare themselves for a great struggle. Fasten your seat belts and pull up your sleeves."

UN Equipment Removed From Sites. The Washington Times/AP (2/12, Karimi) reports that "diplomats in Europe said the UN nuclear watchdog agency had stripped most of its surveillance equipment from Iranian nuclear sites.

DOJ_NMG_0014250

The diplomats, who asked for anonymity in exchange for revealing the confidential developments, said President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's threat was part of retaliatory measures announced by Iran that have left the International Atomic Energy Agency with only the most basic means to monitor Iran's nuclear activities."

US Planning Iran Attacks, UK Paper Reports. AFP (2/12) reports, "US military strategists are reportedly drawing up plans for an attack on Iran as a last resort to stop the Islamic republic from developing nuclear weapons. In a front-page dispatch from Washington, the Sunday Telegraph newspaper in London said Central Command and Strategic Command planners were 'identifying targets, assessing weapon-loads and working on logistics for an operation.' The planners are reporting to the office of Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld with a view to having a military option if diplomatic efforts fail to put the brakes on Iran's suspected quest for nuclear weaponry. 'This is more than just the standard military contingency assessment,' the Sunday Telegraph quoted a senior Pentagon adviser as saying. 'This has taken on much greater urgency in recent months.'"

Experts Caution That Iran "Prepared To Retaliate" The Boston Globe (2/12, Bender, 484K) reports, "Iran is prepared to launch attacks using long-range missiles, secret commando units, and terrorist allies planted around the globe in retaliation for any strike on the country's nuclear facilities, according to new US intelligence assessments and military specialists." Military and intelligence analysts "warn that Iran -- which a recent US intelligence report described as 'more confident and assertive' than it has been since the early days of the 1979 Islamic revolution -- could unleash reprisals across the region, and perhaps even inside the United States, if the hard-line regime came under attack."

Khatami Predicts Higher Oil Prices If UN Sanctions Hit Iran. AFP (2/11) reported, "Former Iranian president Mohammad Khatami has warned of a rise in world oil prices if the United Nations imposes sanctions on Tehran over its disputed nuclear program. 'Currently the price of each barrel of oil is $70, and this high price has created many difficulties for the industrialized world," Khatami told reporters on the sidelines of an international conference on Islam and the West. 'The first effect of a sanction against Iran will be that this high price will even increase higher.'"

Muslim Protests Over Mohammed Cartoons Continue To Spread. The protests over the caricatures of the prophet Mohammed continue to spread in the Islamic world, and Denmark recalled its diplomats from Indonesia over fears of violence. NBC Nightly News (2/11, story 4, 2:20, Friesen) reported the Danes are "proud of their reputation as peace-loving and liberal-minded. Astonished, they're now the focus of so much Muslim rage." There was "more anger on the streets. In London and across Europe, the rallies noisy, but peaceful. Though in Indonesia, the mood is so hostile, today, Danish diplomats pulled out. They left Syria and Iran too as what officials described as concrete and serious threats. Iran's President asked why it's all right to insult Islam, but a crime to question the Holocaust? At the Olympics, Denmark's team is now under tight security, three-plainclothes guards escorting them yesterday. This is the worst political crisis Denmark has faced since the Second World War, made worse by emails and text messages spreading rumors and lies about the country through the Muslim world. One claiming Danes were burning the Koran in Copenhagen's main square. Danes have been told to avoid travel to Muslim countries. 15,000 people are canceling trips."

The CBS Evening News (2/11, story 5, :20, Mitchell) reported, "Denmark today pulled its diplomats out of Iran and Indonesia as Muslim protests over political cartoons satirizing the prophet Mohammed continued. Hundreds of Muslims in Jakarta, into their second week of protest there. In Paris, about 7,000 Muslims protested against French papers that reestablished the Danish caricatures. Thousands have also filled London's Trafalgar square in another peaceful protest."

Iran Blames US, Europe Over Offensive Cartoon. The AP (2/12, Karimi) reports, "Iran's hard-line president on Saturday accused the United States and Europe of being 'hostages of Zionism' and said they should pay a heavy price for the publication of caricatures of the Prophet Muhammad that have triggered worldwide protests." In a speech marking the 27th anniversary of the Islamic Revolution Saturday, Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad was quoted as saying, "Now in the West insulting the prophet is allowed, but questioning the Holocaust is considered a crime. ... We ask, why do you insult the prophet? The response is that it is a matter of freedom, while in fact they (who insult the founder of Islam) are hostages of the Zionists. And the people of the US and Europe should pay a heavy price for becoming hostages to Zionists." In its coverage, the Washington Post (2/12, A24, Jordan, 744K) notes, "Thousands of Muslims in London and other European cities rallied peacefully Saturday to condemn both published cartoons of the prophet Muhammad and the violent reactions to them. Men and women, some pushing babies in strollers, crowded into Trafalgar Square as speakers not only denounced the cartoons as an unacceptable insult to the holiest figure in Islam, but also condemned the burning of embassies in Syria and Lebanon, deaths in Afghanistan and other violence that has come in response."

DOJ_NMG_0014251

Danish Diplomats Leave Iran, Indonesia. The Washington Times (2/12, Dispatches, 90K) reports, "Denmark said yesterday it had withdrawn diplomats and staff from Indonesia and Iran because of security threats, while Muslims held demonstrations in European cities and elsewhere over cartoons of the prophet Muhammad. Denmark ... warned Danes to leave Indonesia, saying they faced a 'significant and imminent danger' from an extremist group." The AP (2/12, Ritter) notes that Denmark's ambassador to Syria also was withdrawn, adding, "Danish embassy buildings in all three countries had been targeted by angry mobs protesting the publication of the caricatures in September."

In "Liberal Denmark," Cartoon Crisis Prompts Identity Crisis. The New York Times (2/12, Bilefsky, 1.19M) reports, "Ater rioting that has raged for weeks across the Muslim world after a Danish newspaper's publishing of caricatures of the Prophet Muhammad, Denmark has sunk even more deeply into an identity crisis. A country that once prided itself on having Europe's most open immigration policies and a generous welfare state is grappling with how to preserve its vaunted liberalism while remaining Danish. 'The furor over the cartoons has been a wake-up call for Danes,' says Flemming Rose, the cultural editor of the paper, Jyllands-Posten. ... 'We are used to seeing ourselves as a permissive and open society on the side of the good, and it is shocking to see Danes as objects of hate.'"

Philadelphia Paper Picketed Over Cartoon. The Philadelphia Inquirer (2/12, Fifield, Bahadur, 423K) reports, "Hundreds of Muslims chanted and carried banners and signs outside the Inquirer-Daily News Building yesterday, protesting The Inquirer's decision to reprint a caricature of the prophet Muhammad. Many said they thought that the paper had defamed their religion by publishing an image that has angered Muslims across the world and resulted in mass protests and the burning of Western embassies. Many Muslims consider any depiction of Muhammad to be sacrilegious." Meanwhile, the Pittsburgh Post-Gazette's (2/12,) Ann McFeatters notes, "The inflamed passions, violence and false allegations stoked by some sophomoric cartoons satirizing the revered Mohammed, such as one with his headdress drawn as a bomb with a lit fuse, first published four months ago in a Danish newspaper, should worry every rational human. It is not farfetched that the religious fervor of outraged Islamic fundamentalists could ignite even more hatred that would take generations to wipe out."

In its coverage, the Dallas Morning News (2/12, Weiss) reports, "The worldwide furor over anti-Muslim cartoons started out as a specifically Danish squabble. But what began with satirical cartoons of the prophet Muhammad has raised questions about freedom of expression, religious and cultural sensitivities, and political hypocrisy and violence in the name of faith." Most protests, "including this one in Philadelphia Saturday, have been more loud than violent."

Mideast Rage A Question Of "Justice." The New York Times (2/12, Slackman, 1.19M) reports, "While the West speaks of democracy and freedom, Muslims here tend to speak of justice. There is widespread feeling that the region's governments deny their people justice, and this feeling has been instrumental in the increased support for Islamists throughout the Middle East, whether the Muslim Brotherhood in Egypt, or Hamas among the Palestinians. 'It has reached to the point where Egyptians do not feel entitled to anything, and all they want is justice,' said Ibrahim Aslan, a leading Egyptian writer. 'Across history, in literature, Egyptian peasants asked for justice, not for freedom or democracy. Just justice. Social justice.' Islamists promise not just piety, but an end to corruption and misrule. That challenge helps explain the eagerness of established governments to pursue the conflict over the Danish cartoons — to increase their own credibility on religious issues and resist the Islamists' rising popularity."

"Why Not Publish These Cartoons," Columnist Asks. The Washington Post's (2/12, B6) Deborah Howell notes that "Hundreds of readers have asked why The Post hasn't reprinted the Danish cartoons of the prophet Muhammad that inflamed Muslims around the world, leading to deadly protests and the burning of embassies. Some readers questioned the Post's journalistic courage." Executive Editor Len Downie "made the decision, consulting with other top editors. The issue, he said, is one of journalistic judgment, not courage."

Riots Seen As Obscuring The Real Islam. The New York Times (2/12, 1.19M) guest columnist Emran Qureshi

DOJ_NMG_0014252

notes, "In a world of wrenching change, the Danish cartoon affair has widened a growing fissure between Islam and the West. The controversy comes at a time when many in the Islamic world view the war on terrorism as a war on Islam. They draw on memories of colonization and of the Crusades, when Western invaders ridiculed the Prophet Muhammad as an imposter. Sadly, the recent polarization obscures a rich humanistic tradition within Islam — one in which cosmopolitanism, pluralism and a spirit of open-minded inquiry once constituted a dominant ethos."

Old NYT Images Of Muhammad Appear "Gone For Good." In a feature story, the New York Times (2/12, Kifner, 1.19M) reports, "Deep in the bowels of this newspaper's old morgue ... is a folder with a photograph of a Persian miniature painting depicting the Angel Gabriel appearing to the Prophet Muhammad. It was used to illustrate an article about Islam in 1974. Taped on the back is a copy of an editor's note published two days later that said, 'Since it is an affront to Moslems to depict such likenesses, The Times expresses its regrets to those who were offended by the use of the photograph.' So controversy over depictions of Muhammad, like those that have led to demonstrations, destruction and death over cartoons published in a Danish newspaper, are not new. In truth, however, the depictions that caused some of the past protests were rather admiring."

Modern Checkpoints Mark Change For Palestinian Border Crossers. The Boston Globe (2/12, Frankel, 484K) reports, "All along the boundaries between Israel and the Palestinian territories, this is the new reality. As Israel moves ahead with its plan to complete a barrier separating Israeli and Palestinian towns, the burden of preventing terrorist infiltration into Israel is falling to the 28 checkpoints ... that Israel is building to accommodate the flow of people and goods." Bezalel Triber, a brigadier general in the reserves who is heading Israel's drive to build the crossings, was quoted as saying, "The point is to move to full remote control, where no [Israeli] should talk to a Palestinian or touch him. ... It is more respectful, it's better from a security standpoint and there is no friction between people."

Sharon Hospitalized For Emergency Surgery. Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon was hospitalized for surgery for an abdominal condition that frequently affects comatose patients. ABC World News Tonight (2/11, lead story, 1:40, Avila) reported it was a "sudden and serious turn for the worse" for Sharon, but he is "is out of danger for now. This latest complication is considered a setback." Doctors "are saying it's almost certain Ariel Sharon has suffered severe brain damage and tonight, Israelis are coming to the realization that the chances of their Prime Minister recovering in a meaningful way is slipping away."

The CBS Evening News (2/11, story 4, 1:20, Mitchell) reported it was "another major setback for ailing Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon." For "a while reports indicated Sharon was near death, but tonight the Prime Minister is said to be out of danger." Sharon is "still a political presence here, but it's hard not to think of and talk about Ariel Sharon in the past tense. He's been in a coma for more than a month now. Acting Prime Minister Ehud Olmert is not only leading the country and has been since Ariel Sharon went into that coma, he is leading the country now and he's also leading Ariel Sharon's party, the party that Ariel Sharon formed into elections, election they're expected to win easily next month."

NBC Nightly News (2/11, story 3, :20, Williams) reported, "In Israel, doctors say Prime Minister Ariel Sharon is out of immediate danger after emergency surgery this morning. The 77-year-old Sharon was rushed into surgery to remove part of his large intestine. This is his seventh operation since suffering a massive stroke five weeks ago. He remains in a coma."

The New York Times (2/12, Myre, 1.19M) reports, "Prime Minister Ariel Sharon of Israel underwent emergency surgery on his large intestine on Saturday and emerged in stable condition, though he remained in a coma, the Hadassah Ein Kerem Hospital said. ... Doctors observed that Mr. Sharon's abdomen was swollen, and after conducting a CT scan, he was taken into surgery on Saturday morning, Dr. Shlomo Mor-Yosef, the director of the hospital, said at a news conference." Hospital officials "initially said Mr. Sharon's life was in danger. But after the four-hour operation, Dr. Mor-Yosef said, 'The situation is serious, it is stable, it is critical, but there is no immediate danger to the life of Prime Minister Ariel Sharon.'" The Washington Post (2/12, Wilson, 744K) notes, "Sharon's sons, Omri and Gilad, rushed to the hilltop hospital early Saturday to be with their father, and his key advisers were there as well."

The Los Angeles Times (2/12, King, 958K) adds that "Sharon on Saturday survived his latest medical crisis — one that has served, somewhat poignantly, to underscore the degree to which the Israeli political torch has already passed to his successor, Ehud Olmert,' who "has assumed the leadership of Kadima, the centrist party Sharon founded weeks before his stroke." In an acknowledgment that Sharon had departed the political stage, his party was unable to give him even a symbolic place on its slate of candidates in the coming election."

DOJ_NMG_0014253

The Washington Times (2/12, Mitnick, 90K) and also covers the story.

Hughes Diplomatic Office Rated As "Not Performing." The Houston Chronicle (2/12, Mason, 581K) in its "White House Watch" column notes a new government web site that tracks government program performance rates Karen Hughes' office of public diplomacy at the State Department as "not performing." Her "tenure at the State Department has been short and bumpy." Hughes "has no foreign policy background and has made a few gaffes -- such as dramatically overstating, during a trip to Indonesia, the number of people Saddam Hussein had gassed."

AFP (2/9) noted that the Internet site put together by the White House's Office of Management and Budget and heralded by Bush on Wednesday as a way to see 'whether or not a program is working.'"

Rumsfeld Strengthens Tunisia Ties. The Washington Post/Reuters (2/12, A26) reports, "Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld said on Saturday that the United States wants to strengthen military ties with Tunisia, Algeria and Morocco and played down the threat posed by al Qaeda in the three North African states. Rumsfeld arrived in Tunis after a NATO meeting in Sicily to begin a three-day visit to the Mahgreb -- his first to the region as defense secretary -- and praised Tunisia's support in the US campaign against global terrorism. 'They have been attacked by terrorists in this country,'" Rumsfeld said, adding, "They have felt the sting of that type of violence."

Mongolia Seeks To Improve Relations With US. The Washington Post (2/12, Cody, 744K) reports that squeezed between giants Russia and China, "Mongolia increasingly has forged relations with 'third neighbors,' more distant nations that can offset the influence of Moscow and Beijing. Japan has played the role prominently, becoming Mongolia's largest aid donor, and so have Germany and South Korea. But foremost among the third neighbors is the United States, the superpower that Mongolians have courted as an aid source and a counterweight to Russia's residual status and China's economic tentacles stretching across the Gobi Desert."

Syria Fills Cabinet Vacancies. Reuters (2/12) reports, "President Bashar al-Assad appointed interior and foreign ministers on Saturday, filling a major vacuum in his government as the country faces pressure over its role in Lebanon. A senior security officer, Bassam Abdel Majeed, was appointed as interior minister, and a career diplomat, Walid al-Moualem, was appointed to the foreign affairs portfolio, the state news agency announced." The main figure "gone from the cabinet is Farouq al-Shara, who had been foreign minister for 22 years. He was appointed vice president, a mostly ceremonial position."

Royal Feud Puts Moroccan Freedoms On Trial. The Washington Post (2/12, A1, Whitlock, 744K) reports, "The monarchy in this North African country dates back 1,200 years and has survived foreign invaders, civil wars and communist plots. Now it is confronted by a new threat: a grandmother who preaches nonviolence and democracy. This week, Moroccan prosecutors are scheduled to resume a criminal trial against Nadia Yassine, a leader of Justice and Charity, an underground Islamic movement that has become increasingly aggressive in testing the rule of King Mohammed VI. Yassine, 47, was charged last June with publicly criticizing the monarchy after she stated in a newspaper interview that the country would be better off as a republic than as a kingdom."

Avian Flu Found In Three European Union Countries. The CBS Evening News (2/11, story 6, :15, Mitchell) reported, "For the first time bird flu has spread to countries of the European Union. Officials said today the virus has been detected in dead wild swans in Greece and Italy as well as in Bulgaria. Officials say there is no immediate threat to human beings."

The New York Times (2/12, Rosenthal, 1.19M) reports, "The lethal A(H5N1) bird flu virus has been detected in wild birds in Italy and Greece, European officials announced yesterday, the first time its presence has been detected in the European Union. It was also detected in Bulgaria. The arrival of bird flu in Western Europe had been predicted for some months, since the virus has marched steadily from China, to Russia, to the Balkans and, in the last week, to West Africa. It is being carried by migrating birds, so all countries on their flight paths are vulnerable." The Washington Post/AP (2/12, A25, Sanminiatelli) notes that 'the announcement that the disease was detected in five swans in southern Italy came a day after the opening of the Winter Olympics in Turin, several hundred miles to the north. Italian officials said the virus had affected only wild birds and posed no immediate risk to people."

DOJ_NMG_0014254

Keeping One's Distance May Be Key In Case Of Pandemic Flu. The New York Times (2/12, McNeil, 1.19M) reports, "If the avian flu goes pandemic while Tamiflu and vaccines are still in short supply, experts say, the only protection most Americans will have is 'social distancing,' which is the new politically correct way of saying 'quarantine.' But distancing also encompasses less drastic measures, like wearing face masks, staying out of elevators — and the bump. Such stratagems, those experts say, will rewrite the ways we interact, at least during the weeks when the waves of influenza are washing over us."

Africa "A Worrisome New Front." The New York Times (2/12, Rosenthal, McNeil, 1.19M) reports, "As epidemics go, it was a relatively small outbreak: 40,000 chickens died in mid-January on a commercial poultry farm in Nigeria. No humans seemed to have been infected. But to many experts on avian flu, it was the outbreak they had been dreading for months. It was the first time the fast-moving A(H5N1) virus had been reported in Africa. And while United Nations agencies are now scrambling to form medical and veterinary response and surveillance teams, scientists say its appearance there is deeply worrisome for two reasons. First, the continent is ill prepared to deal with epidemics, whether human or animal. Second, the Nigerian outbreak comes only a month or two before birds begin migrating north from Africa to Europe, which has so far been largely untouched by the virus."

Snow Optimistic On Russia WTO Candidacy.

Reuters (2/12) reports, "US Treasury Secretary John Snow told Russian President Vladimir Putin on Saturday Washington was committed to a speedy conclusion of talks on admitting Moscow to the World Trade Organization. ... 'On WTO let me assure you that we are committed to an early resolution,' Snow said in televised remarks at a meeting with Putin in the Kremlin. '"I think we are narrowing the differences and should be very close to resolution.'"

Energy Prices, Tight Oil Supply Pose Big Risk, G-8 Ministers Warn. The New York Times (2/12, Kramer, 1.19M) reports, "Finance ministers from the world's richest countries and Russia said Saturday that 'high and volatile' energy prices posed a risk to global economic growth that otherwise appeared solid." According to US Treasury Secretary John W. Snow, "We're all concerned about the risk of rising energy prices and what they do to global growth." The Washington Times (2/12, Mainville, 90K) notes the ministers' communiqué as saying, "Overall global growth remains solid, and this is expected to continue in 2006. ... Risks remain, including high and volatile energy prices." In its coverage, the Los Angeles Times (2/12, Holley, 958K) adds, "The communique lauds the rapid economic growth in recent years shown by Russia, ... and Russia's commitments to boost aid to poor countries and make early payments on its Soviet-era debt to the group of top lending nations known as the Paris Club."

Latin American Leaders Push Pipeline Plan.

The Washington Post (2/12, A24, Reel, 744K) reports, "South American leaders from Venezuela to Argentina are proposing to build the world's largest fuel pipeline across Latin America, and they hope it will deliver much more than natural gas: They portray the plan as the first blueprint for a new era of regional cooperation, greater independence from international markets and a more prominent voice on the world stage. President Hugo Chavez of Venezuela has labeled the proposal a 5,000-mile symbol of diminishing US influence in Latin America. Enthusiastic support for the project from regional heavyweights, including Brazil and Argentina, has prompted others to describe the project as the first true joint venture of a political coalition determined to forge a new South American identity."

US Rejects Morales Position On Coca.

The New York Times (2/12, Forero, 1.19M) reports newly elected Bolivian President Evo Morales "has not yet provided many details on his coca policy, except to say that his government will 'depenalize' coca cultivation and show zero tolerance toward trafficking: in other words, 'yes to coca, no to cocaine.' He has long opposed American eradication efforts and championed the coca leaf, which without significant processing has no mind-altering effects and is chewed here to mitigate hunger and increase stamina." The American government, "which for several administrations has contended that only aggressive eradication and interdiction will control trafficking, scoffs at Mr. Morales's ... stance. 'This idea that he's going to go after traffickers but letting the coca bloom is tough seeing as workable,' says a high-ranking Congressional aide in Washington who helps shape anti-drug policy, speaking on the condition of anonymity because he is not authorized to give statements. 'It's a naïve, pie-in-the-sky approach to let the flower bloom but interdict the bouquet.'"

DOJ_NMG_0014255

In Election Limbo, Haiti Experiences "Fragile Peace." The New York Times (2/12, Thompson, 1.19M) reports, "The national elections, so long in coming, seem to have brought a fragile peace to the most troubled country in the hemisphere. Partial results gave a wide lead to René Préval, a former president who is considered a protégé to former President Jean-Bertrand Aristide. However, it remained unclear whether he would win the more than 50 percent of the vote to avoid a runoff."

The Los Angeles Times (2/12, Williams, Regnault, 958K) adds, "With one presidential term behind him and his campaign for a return to power undertaken with reluctance, Rene Preval has made clear he has no illusions about the daunting challenges that lie ahead for the next leader of Haiti. Torchbearer for the unfulfilled aims of his predecessor and ally, Jean-Bertrand Aristide, Preval may be uniquely positioned to re-energize the exiled president's followers in the thwarted mission of empowering the poor and steering this most backward of Western nations out of its historical rut of violence, illiteracy and injustice."

In Race For UN Leadership, "Many Names, Few Rules And Talk Of Asia's Turn." The New York Times (2/12, Hoge, 1.19M) reports, "Choosing a new secretary general may be the most telling single action the United Nations takes in 2006, but the organization is saddled with an ill-defined selection procedure that leaves the choice subject to 11th-hour compromises, great power maneuvers and regional rivalries. The most discussed candidates, at least at the moment, include a Jordanian prince, a Nobel laureate from East Timor, two Eastern European presidents, Sweden's most accomplished diplomat, a former Sri Lankan ambassador to Washington, a Harvard-trained Thai lawyer, a Canadian judge, South Korea's foreign minister and a Turkish economist. But if history is a guide, it is likely that none of them will emerge the winner and that the person who does is not being publicly discussed."

Italy Will Elect New Parliament In April. The Los Angeles Times (2/12, 958K) reports, "Italy dissolved its parliament and scheduled elections for early April, opening what promises to be a bitter campaign pitting Premier Silvio Berlusconi against a strong center-left opponent. Parliament ended two weeks later than originally planned after Berlusconi negotiated a delay that allowed his government to push through a flurry of legislation. It also allowed the premier to keep up a barrage of TV and radio appearances."

Bush Should Step Up On Darfur, WPost Says. In an editorial headlined "Mr. Bush And Genocide," the Washington Post (2/12, 744K) posits that "for the past 18 months, the Bush administration and its allies have clung to the fiction that they could stop the genocide in the Sudanese territory of Darfur by sending in African Union forces. On Thursday United Nations Secretary General Kofi Annan spoke the truth about these troops," saying "that the UN force that may replace the African Union had better be 'a completely different force and have a completely different concept of operation.' The issue is whether President Bush, who is due to meet Mr. Annan tomorrow, is willing to hear this message." The Post asks, "Will the administration accept Mr. Annan's appeal for an entirely more serious peacekeeping deployment? The administration is pushing for the creation of some kind of UN force but seems unsure whether it's willing to support a strong one."

Darfur Photos Show Troubled Land, People. In his biweekly column, New York Times (2/12,, 1.19M) columnist Nicholas Kristof writes, "On my fifth and last trip to Darfur, in November, I smuggled in 20 disposable cameras to hand out to these disposable people. While taking photos without a permit is illegal in Sudan, two aid groups agreed to distribute the cameras, teach the genocide survivors how to use them, and then send me the pictures (for their own protection, I'm not naming those aid groups)." Kristof continues, "The photos were taken in makeshift camps near the town of Zalingei where survivors have lived since fleeing their villages. ... These scenes reflect the banality of waiting — for food, for protection, for death. In short, such photos are a bit like those from the Warsaw Ghetto in the early 1940's." He concludes, "On Tuesday, Mr. Bush spoke movingly at the funeral of Coretta Scott King. I hope he'll look at these photos and ruminate on an observation of the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr.: 'Man's inhumanity to man is not only perpetrated by the vitriolic actions of those who are bad, it is also perpetrated by the vitiating inaction of those who are good.'"

DOJ_NMG_0014256

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:
"Bomb Buster For Iraq Hits Pentagon Snag."
"Vernon Shoo-Ins Shoo Outsiders."
"Dorms Fuel Jail Unrest."
"Keeping The Olympics On Edge."
"Shooting For The Moon, Once Again."
"In Campaign, Westly Seeks An Insider-Outsider Balance."

New York Times:
"Tutor Program Offered By Law Is Going Unused."
"Violent Crime Rising Sharply In Some Cities."
"Healing, With New Limbs And Fragile Dreams."
"Bolivia's Knot: No To Cocaine, But Yes To Coca."
"Eats Shoots, Leaves And Much Of Zoos' Budgets."
"Reform Jews Hope To Unmix Mixed Marriages."

Washington Post:
"A Hand Up In A System Full Of Letdowns."
"Report On Katrina Spreads Blame."
"For Possible '08 Run, McCain Is Courting Bush Loyalists."
"Feud With King Tests Freedoms In Morocco."
"TV When -- And Where -- You Want It."

Washington Times:
"G-8 Nations Cite Threat Of Energy Costs."
"Year's First Snow Hits Region."
"Sharon Undergoes Emergency Surgery."
"UAE Firm Eyeing U.S. Ports."
"Un-Pleasant Gentrification."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"Hey, Aren't You A Famous Olympic Athlete?"
"Lenders Pull Out Wallets."
"The Eternal Eight."
"It's Not Easy Being A Democrat: 'They Even Took My Seat.'"

Dallas Morning News:
"And Baby Makes Two."
"Prepping To Fight A Deadly Flu."
"Fighter Start To Finish."
"He Helps Cupid's Arrow Hit Its Mark."
"Danger Escalates For Border Agents."

Houston Chronicle:
"Free Trade Fuels Drug Smuggling."
"Off To A Gold Start."
"Witnesses' Plea Deals Pose Delicate Challenge."
"Family Kept Grim Secret Too Long To Save Teketria."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Sharon Hospitalized; Fossett-Record Flight; San Francisco-Chinese New Year's; Laura Bush-Hillary Clinton; Winter Weather; Student Loan Rates; Iraq-Roadside Bombs; Pakistan-US Missile Strike; Olympics; Olympics-Skiing Aerodynamics.
CBS: Fossett-Record Flight; Winter Weather; Bush-Abramoff Meeting; Sharon Hospitalized; Muslim Cartoon Protests; Avian Flu-Europe; Pakistan-US Missile Strike; FBI-Al Qaeda Plot; Danforth-Politics, Religion; UVA Basketball Coach-Cancer.
NBC: Winter Weather; Olympics; Sharon Hospitalized; Muslim Cartoon Protests; AL Church Fires; Catholic Church-Reform; Fossett-Record Flight; Oldest Olympian; Snowboarding-Half Pipes.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.

White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — No public schedule.
VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

US Senate: No public schedule.

US House: No scheduled events.

Other: UTILITY REGULATORS _ Winter meeting of the National Association of Regulatory Utility Commissioners. Location: Hyatt Regency-Washington on Capitol Hill, 400 New Jersey Ave. NW

LINCOLN BIRTHDAY _ 12 p.m. The National Park Service, Military District of Washington and the Lincoln Birthday National Commemorative Committee sponsor the 197th birthday anniversary of Abraham Lincoln. Location: Lincoln Memorial.

SISTER DOROTHY MEMORIAL _ 4:30 p.m. The Robert F. Kennedy Memorial Center for Human Rights and the Washington Office on Latin America host a vigil to commemorate one-year anniversary of the murder of American nun Sister Dorothy Stang. The vigil will feature brief remarks on Sister Dorothy's life and work, as well as the cultural challenges that she faced in the Brazilian Amazon. Participants include former Maryland Lt. Gov. Kathleen Kennedy Townsend and Reps. Tim Ryan, D-Ohio; Jim McGovern, D-Mass; and Mike Turner, R-Ohio. Location:

DOJ_NMG_0014257

Outside the campus chapel at Trinity University, 125 Michigan Ave. NE.

ABC _ THIS WEEK WITH GEORGE STEPHANOPOULOS _ Topic: Muslim cartoon controversy; Iran nuclear; and CIA leak investigation. Guests: Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, and Sen. Joseph Biden, D-Del. Guest: Pittsburg Steelers star and hall of famer Lynn Swann speaks on his campaign to become Pennsylvania's first black governor. Topic: American Heart Association ``Go Red" campaign for women. Guest: Actress Sigourney Weaver.

CBS _ FACE THE NATION WITH BOB SCHIEFFER _ Interviews with Secretary of State Rice and Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean.

CNN _ 11 a.m. - 1 p.m. LATE EDITION WITH WOLF BLITZER _ Topics: U.S. Intelligence; Iraq; Terrorism; Nuclear Nations. Guest: Sens. Chuck Hagel, R-NE., Foreign Relations Committee; Select Intelligence Committee; and Joseph Lieberman, D-Conn., Armed Services Committee; Homeland Security Committee. Topic: Iraq: The Next Chapter. Guest: Iyad Allawi, former Iraqi Interim Prime Minister, Iraqi Parliament member. Topics: Middle East Violence; Future of the Middle East. Guest: Nabil Fahmy, Egyptian Ambassador to the U.S.; Guest: Afif Safieh, Palestinian Representative to the U.S.; and Danny Ayalon, Israeli Ambassador to the U.S.

FOX _ FOX NEWS SUNDAY WITH CHRIS WALLACE _ Topic: President Bush says the war on terror is working, but some Democrats say the GOPs using the politics of fear to win in November. Guest: Sen. George Allen, R-Va. Topic: Was criticism of President Bush at Coretta Scott Kings funeral over the line? Well talk with the civil rights leader who took on the president and a former top White House aide. Guests: Rev. Joseph Lowery (Georgia Coalition for the Peoples Agenda) and Ron Christie (author, ``Black in the White House). Topic: A man who is in daily contact with Mars. Guest: Dr. John Grant, Geologist, National Air and Space Museum.

NBC _ MEET THE PRESS WITH TIM RUSSERT _ Topic: The debate over intelligence gathering. Guests: Sen. Pat Roberts, R-Kans., chairman, Intelligence Committee; former Sen. Tom Daschle, D-S.D., former Democratic Leader; and Reps. Peter Hoekstra, R-Mich., chairman, Intelligence Committee; and Jane Harman, ranking member, Intelligence Committee.

Copyright 2006 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 12, 2006 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

"Aggressive" Inquiry Into Wiretapping Article "Rapidly Expanding." ... 3
Pakistani President Says US Airstrike Killed Zawahiri Relative, Wanted Terrorist ... 4
Montana Judge Aides FBI In Collaring Would-Be Al Qaeda Accomplice ... 4
Moussaoui's Attorneys Contend Government Failed To Aggressive Investigate Him ... 4
FBI Probe Said To Have Infused Lodi Muslim Community With Fear, Suspicion ... 5
United Arab Emirates Firm Could Take Over Operations At 6 US Ports ... 5

Homeland Response:

House Investigators' Katrina Report Singles Out Chertoff, Homeland Security ... 5
New Orleans Still Seeking Sponsors For Mardi Gras ... 6
Writer Says Bush Has "Written Off New Orleans." ... 6

War News:

Roadside Bombs Now Responsible For 61% Of Coalition Deaths In Iraq ... 6
Iraqi Shiites' Prime Minister Nomination Stalled ... 7
Opposing Experts Agree Saddam's Trial Is "A Mess," Offer Different Solutions ... 7
Army Adds Incentives To Retain Needed Officers ... 7
Army Doctors' Experience, Revised Procedures Leading To Fewer Iraq Deaths ... 7
Herring Says Military Contractors Are Winners From Iraq War ... 8

Corporate Scandals:

Enron Prosecutors Face Challenge Over Credibility Of Witness Who Took Plea Deals ... 8

Criminal Law:

Former Abramoff Colleague Confirms Contacts With Reid's Office ... 9
Defense Attorney Says Laski Will Plead Not Guilty Today, Seek Plea Agreement ... 9
Hollywood Law Firm Helped Pellicano Pursue Trademark For Wiretap Device ... 9
Rise In Violent Crime Over Petty Disputes Noted In Some Areas 10
Catholic Church Under Fire For New Sex Abuse Scandal ... 10
Hines Says Plame Investigation Hurts Bush Because He Won't Fire Those Involved ... 10

Civil Rights:

First Lady Criticizes Hillary Clinton For MLK Day Criticism Of Administration ... 10
Indiana Legislature Considering Extensive Abortion Consent Bill In Country ... 11
Federal Judge Selects CA Prison Health Chief ... 11
Under Pressure From China, San Francisco Bars Religious Group From New Year's Parade ... 11

Antitrust:

Critics Worry About Wal-Mart's Plan To Move Into Banking Industry ... 11

Environment/Indian Affairs:

Kyoto Protocols Generate Projects In Developing Countries ... 12
Georgia Jury Boosts Value Of Property Seized By Eminent Domain ... 12
Mid-Atlantic, Northeast Hit By Major Snowstorm ... 12
Backers, Foes Of Tribal Casinos Prepare For Meetings This Week ... 12

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Tenth Church Burns In Alabama ... 13

Tax:

Trade Off Between Bush Tax Cuts And AMT Tax Seen As Necessary ... 13

Congress-Administration:

Bush Touts Modernization Of Medicare, Admits Problems ... 13
Bush Competitiveness Plan Seen As Having Widespread Support ... 14
Spending, Immigration Concerns Fuel Conservative Anger At Bush ... 14
Republicans Concerned Bush Budget Will Impact 2006 Elections ... 15
Deficit Reduction Bill Includes Provision That Hikes Student Loan Interest Rates ... 16
User Fee Increases In Bush Budget Face Opposition ... 16
Opponents Of Social Security Reform Surprised By Inclusion In Bush Budget ... 16

Students Ignore Option To Benefit From NCLB Tutoring Program ... 16
House Republicans Meet In Cambridge, Maryland For Retreat.. 17
Bush, Abramoff Appear In Same Photo... 18
Leadership PACs Seen As Loophole For Members Of Congress18
DeLay Resumes Appropriations Committee Seat ... 19
Poll Shows 45% Think Bush Treated Same As Other Presidents By Media ... 19
Hagel Independence From Bush May Prove Attractive To Conservatives ... 19
Frist Seen As Distancing Himself From Bush... 19
McCain Seeks Support For 2008 Campaign From Bush Network19
Gingrich Gets Rousing Welcome At Conservative Conference .. 20
Congress Resists Smoking Bans ... 20
Rumsfeld Said To Have "Lost" In Effort To Change Pentagon Culture, Foreign Policy... 20

Other News:

Economic Reports May Prompt Stock Markets Sell-Offs ... 20
Full Employment Seen As Worthy Economic Goal ... 21
New Space Race Underway... 21
Romney Tied For Third In Michigan 2008 Poll ... 21
Warner Faces Hurdles In Building Name Recognition ... 21
Kerry Has Over $9M Left Over From 2004 Campaign ... 21
Pennsylvania GOP Endorses Swann For Governor ... 22
Steele Offers Qualified Support For Stem Cell Research ... 22
Santorum, Casey Take Advantage Of Subsidized Air Travel... 22
Minnesota Senate Race Attracts National Attention... 22
Danforth Worries Religious Conservatives Taking Over GOP 22
Robertson's Gaffes Draw Increasing Scrutiny ... 23
Remote West Texas To Get Public Radio Station... 23
Gore's Daughter Profiles Groundbreaking Women In New Book 23
Iran Threatens To Abandon Nonproliferation Treaty ... 23
Muslim Protests Over Mohammed Cartoons Continue To Spread ... 24
Modern Checkpoints Mark Change For Palestinian Border Crossers... 26
Sharon Hospitalized For Emergency Surgery ... 26
Hughes Diplomatic Office Rated As "Not Performing."... 26
Rumsfeld Strengthens Tunisia Ties... 26
Mongolia Seeks To Improve Relations With US... 27
Syria Fills Cabinet Vacancies... 27
Royal Feud Puts Moroccan Freedoms On Trial ... 27
Avian Flu Found In Three European Union Countries... 27
Snow Optimistic On Russia WTO Candidacy... 27
Latin American Leaders Push Pipeline Plan... 28
US Rejects Morales Position On Coca ... 28
In Election Limbo, Haiti Experiences "Fragile Peace."... 28
In Race For UN Leadership, "Many Names, Few Rules And Talk Of Asia's Turn." ... 28
Italy Will Elect New Parliament In April ... 28
Bush Should Step Up On Darfur, WPost Says... 28

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages ... 29

Washington's Schedule:

Today's Events In Washington ... 29

DOJ_NMG_0014260

TERRORISM NEWS:

"Aggressive" Inquiry Into Wiretapping Article "Rapidly Expanding." The New York Times (2/12, Johnston, 1.19M) reports, "Federal agents have interviewed officials at several of the country's law enforcement and national security agencies in a rapidly expanding criminal investigation into the circumstances surrounding a New York Times article published in December that disclosed the existence of a highly classified domestic eavesdropping program." The "people who have been interviewed and others in the government who have been briefed on the interviews said the investigation seemed to lay the groundwork for a grand jury inquiry that could lead to criminal charges," and "several officials described the investigation as aggressive and fast-moving." The case is considered "potentially far reaching because it places on a collision course constitutional principles that each side regards as paramount:" punishing those responsible for a serious security breach" against "confidentiality of sources and the ability to report on controversial national security issues free of government interference." Still, "some media lawyers believe that The Times has powerful legal arguments in defense of its reporting and in protecting its sources."

Rep. Wilson's Demand For Domestic Spying Briefing Seen As Sign Of Program's Low Popular Support. CQ Weekly (2/13, Horrigan) reports, "The Bush administration's domestic wiretapping program had a bad week on Capitol Hill, culminating in Pennsylvania Republican Arlen Specter, Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman's announcement of legislation to place the plan under judicial review from the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court." However, in "a more immediate political reversal" New Mexico Rep. Heather A. Wilson (R) "announced she was breaking ranks…to demand a full briefing on the program before the Intelligence Committee." She "is more than a little motivated this year to put some distance between herself and the White House, since she's waging one of the House's most competitive re-election bids." Wilson's "skepticism could well signal to similarly situated GOP incumbents that the White House program may not be drawing the popular support the president is banking on."

GOP Lawmakers Growing Restless Over Domestic Spying. Newsweek (2/12, Isikoff, Hosenball, Thomas) reports, "It is not yet clear how the public feels about warrantless wiretapping," but "the solons of Capitol Hill—and, increasingly, those in the Republican Party—are growing restless and ready to challenge the authority of the Bush White House," partly because "congressional egos and prerogatives are on the line. Members of both parties feel bullied by the sometimes high-handed treatment they get from the Bush administration, particularly from Vice President Dick Cheney," whose "attitude seems to be: bring it on." While "a senior White House official shrugged off the push-back from Republican lawmakers against warrantless eavesdropping," should it emerge "that the United States has been secretly spying on more seemingly innocent Americans, then the Bush administration really will have a problem, and it won't just be among ruffled lawmakers on Capitol Hill."

Brooks Proposes Solution To Domestic Spying Debate. David Brooks writes in his column in the New York Times (2/12, 1.19M), "We need the Gang of 14 back again, because another issue has ossified into abstract ideological debate:" National Security Agency wiretapping. A sustainable bipartisan solution "would be based on a series of truths:" the need for "aggressive intelligence programs to head off attacks;" that such "programs will not survive with the current level of Congressional disquiet;" and the understanding that "we can't throw the mess to the courts to resolve" The solution is to "exempt searches covered by the Bush program from the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act" but "give the intelligence committees oversight responsibilities for those programs. You toughen the penalties for anybody who dares to leak secrets about those programs" and let committee members know that if the United States is attacked, and they opposed programs that could have prevented that attack, then it will be their name in the headlines."

NYTimes Says Recent Revelations Emphasize Untrustworthiness Of Bush Administration. The New York Times (2/12, 1.19M) editorializes, "We can't think of a president who has gone to the American people more often than George W. Bush has to ask them to forget about things like democracy, judicial process and the balance of powers — and just trust him. We also can't think of a president who has deserved that trust less" as "last week produced a flood of evidence that vividly drove home the point." Attorney General Alberto Gonzales asserted that "the administration can be relied upon to police itself and hold the line between national security and civil liberties on its own," when, "in sworn testimony at his confirmation hearing last year, he dismissed as 'hypothetical' a question about whether he believed the president had the authority to conduct warrantless surveillance" when "Gonzales knew Mr. Bush was doing just that." Tim Golden of The Times reported that the US military "had taken to tying up and force-feeding the prisoners who had gone on hunger strikes by the dozens at Guantánamo Bay" even as "the administration continues to claim that it can be trusted to…decide in secret and on the president's whim who is to be jailed without charges, and to insist that Gitmo is filled with dangerous terrorists." Finally, "the next edition of the journal Foreign Affairs includes an article by the man in charge of intelligence on Iraq until last year, Paul Pillar, who said the administration cherry-picked intelligence to support a decision to invade that had already been made."

DOJ_NMG_0014261

SC Paper Praises Sen. Graham For Making Clear The Arguments For Judicial Oversight. The Myrtle Beach Sun News (2/12) editorializes, "No flaming liberal or terrorism softy, Sen. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., last week demolished President Bush's arguments that he needs the permission of neither Congress nor the courts to probe Americans' communications for links to terrorists," explaining that "Congress did not intend to give him authority to circumvent the 1978 Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act and undertake domestic spying on his own authority" and "the Constitution clearly envisions a role for Congress and the courts in checking and balancing the president's undisputed constitutional war-making powers." He said it is "possible to have an effective spying program under FISA," and "if FISA as written is inadequate to the administration's needs…Congress could fix the problem without undermining the surveillance program or revealing operational details to the public." While "Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney lose no opportunity to reassure law-abiding Americans that erroneous federal persecution could never happen to them," the pair's "judgment is a poor substitute for independent judicial oversight via the FISA court," and "Graham deserves great credit for making this distinction clear."

Pakistani President Says US Airstrike Killed Zawahiri Relative, Wanted Terrorist. ABC World News Tonight (2/11, story 8, :15, Avila) reported, "The President of Pakistan said a missile strike on a terrorist hideout last month killed a close relative of al Qaeda's number two leader, Ayman al-Zawahiri, and another man wanted by the US. It is the first time Pakistan has provided details about the people that were killed in that attack." The CBS Evening News (2/11, story 7, :15. Mitchell) also reported the story.

The Washington Post/AP (2/12, Khan) adds, "Until now, President Gen. Pervez Musharraf had only said 'foreigners' died." Pakistani intelligence officials say "the two men were Midhat Mursi al-Sayid Umar and Abdul Rehman al-Maghribi," and that "sympathizers buried the five bodies at an undisclosed location that authorities have been unable to find."

Montana Judge Aides FBI In Collaring Would-Be Al Qaeda Accomplice. The CBS Evening News (2/11, story 8, 2:10, Mitchell) reported, "The FBI is investigating an alleged terrorist plot to attack oil facilities in this country. The alleged conspiracy might never have come to light if it had been for a judge with an interesting sideline." CBS (Pinkston) added, "By day, Shannen Rossmiller is a municipal court judge in the town of Montana. At home, she's also a wife, mother of three, and part-time cyber-sleuth, tracking down possible terrorists. For the second time in two years, Shannen Rossmiller is helping down Federal authorities track down terrorists, this time putting the FBI on to this man, 47-year-old Michael Curtis Reynolds. CBS news has learned Reynolds is in custody in Pennsylvania on weapons charges and may face more serious counts thanks to a tip from Judge Rossmiller." Rossmiller was "scanning terrorist Websites when she noticed a posting from Reynolds seeking $40,000 to why fuel trucks to blow up refineries in New Jersey and Wyoming and a section of the Alaska oil pipeline. Posing as an Alaska banker, Rossmiller promised the money, set up a date and time for the rendezvous near Pocatello, Idaho and notified the FBI. They set up a sting." Rossmiller: "He picked up the $40,000 in cash which he intended to use for his means to do what he had wanted to do or indicated he wanted to do with the Alaska pipeline and some other locations." Pinkston: "At Reynolds' Pennsylvania home, Federal authorities seized his computer and files that according to a court document spelled out his bomb plans. Back in 2004, Judge Rossmiller helped snare Washington state National Guardsman Ryan Anderson."

The Philadelphia Inquirer (2/12, Lubrano, Shiffman, 423K) adds that Reynolds "has not been publicly charged with terrorism. But a federal prosecutor leveled that accusation during a December court hearing." While "Reynolds' lawyer, Philip Gelso, declined to comment," authorities say Reynolds told them he "was a patriot and intended to expose an al-Qaeda cell inside the United States."

The Philadelphia Inquirer (2/12, Lubrano, 423K) adds, "Rossmiller began trolling the Internet for potential terrorists after Sept. 11, 2001. Stunned and angered by the attacks on the United States, Rossmiller read the Koran, studied radical Islamic culture, and learned enough Arabic to lurk in chat rooms and ensnare jihadists. She had fractured her pelvis after slipping in the tub, and the convalescence afforded her the time to start her new avocation." An FBI agent in the Salt Lake City office "vouched for Rossmiller's credibility, saying, 'She's legitimate.'"

Moussaoui's Attorneys Contend Government Failed To Aggressive Investigate Him. The Washington Times/AP (2/12) reports that Zacarias Moussaoui's defense lawyers, in a closed hearing, "disclosed several details in the Jan. 5 hearing that go beyond and sometimes contradict what was disclosed in the September 11 commission report," including that "government correspondence shows 'the actual (redacted) information that essentially tells them in August that Moussaoui is a bin Ladenite who traveled to Afghanistan,'" and that "that the government explicitly barred one FBI agent in the summer of 2001 from interviewing Moussaoui or any member of Moussaoui's family for fear that such contact would alert al Qaeda to the government's investigation of two other al Qaeda terrorists." The "defense contends that the government knew more about the terrorists' plans than Moussaoui and still was unable to prevent the attacks." The US's knowledge of Moussaoui and his terrorist connections will be a key issue at his March 6 death-penalty trial."

DOJ_NMG_0014262

Columnist Says Not Trying Moussaoui As "A Mere Terrorist" But Part of 9/11 Has Created A "Show Trial." Slate Columnist Dahlia Lithwick writes in an op-ed in the Washington Post (2/12, B3, 744K), "What's strange about Zacarias Moussaoui's courtroom outburst last week …is that the 'circus' comment came from the guy who's supposed to be crazy," and, "as is usually the case, if you unbraid the message from its wacky messenger, Moussaoui's claims ring true." After all, "Why is it that Moussaoui's story hasn't changed much in four years, while the government has downgraded him from hijacker to secret-keeper? It leads one inexorably to Moussaoui's last talking point: that this is a show trial," and "largely…because the administration has learned nothing from its dealings with the other captured terrorists -- about the need for clarity, humility and small but certain gains in court." Consider "the benefits of trying Moussaoui as a mere terrorist, rather than as a perpetrator of Sept. 11. For one thing his trial would appear fair, not just to the defendant,…but to the world, which would see that, when the charges actually correspond to the crime, the American court system works quite well."

FBI Probe Said To Have Infused Lodi Muslim Community With Fear, Suspicion. The Stockton (CA) Record (2/12, Hood) reports, "They notice when unfamiliar cars circle the block, drivers talking on cell phones. They notice when new residents move into nearby apartments that overlook their homes and are suspicious of door-to-door salespeople. That's life for members of Lodi's Muslim community in the eight months since two of their own were arrested, accused of ties to terrorists." In the wake of the FBI investigation that led to the arrest of Umer and Hamid Hayat on terrorism-related charges, "no one is above suspicion -- not of plotting terrorist attacks, but for being a federal agent or someone working for the government." The Record adds, "FBI Special Agent John Cauthen said if that's how Lodi's Muslims feel, it's not the FBI's doing. He said the FBI took pains to meet with anyone with concerns or complaints about the FBI's surveillance and conduct in Lodi. 'To say the investigation was different or the intent was to cause a chilling effect, it doesn't connect from where I'm sitting,' said Cauthen from his Sacramento office. 'We're not on a fishing expedition, hanging out in Lodi waiting for something to happen. We're just doing what's logical based on the evidence and facts in front of us.' But one of those who complained said the FBI used its highly visible presence to keep anyone from trying to help the Hayats' defense. 'It was clear intimidation, having the FBI around the mosque,' said Basim Elkarra, executive director of the Council for American-Islamic Relations' Sacramento Valley chapter. 'And it affected everyone. It was intimidation, and it worked. Some people feel it was a message to other Muslims.'"

United Arab Emirates Firm Could Take Over Operations At 6 US Ports. The Washington Post (2/12, A17, Bridis, 744K) reports that Dubai Ports World, a United Arab Emirates company, "is poised to take over significant operations at" New York, New Jersey, Baltimore, New Orleans, Miami and Philadelphia "as part of a corporate sale, leaving a country" that "was an important operational and financial base for the hijackers who carried out the attacks against the World Trade Center and the Pentagon" on Sept. 11, 2001 "with influence over a maritime industry considered vulnerable to terrorism." However, "the Bush administration considers the UAE an important ally in the fight against terrorism…and is not objecting" to the sale of Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Co.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

House Investigators' Katrina Report Singles Out Chertoff, Homeland Security. The Washington Post (2/12, A1, Hsu, 744K) reports, "A blistering report by House investigators" says that "leaders from President Bush down disregarded ample warnings of the threat to New Orleans and did not execute emergency plans or share information that would have saved lives" in response to Hurricane Katrina. "A draft of the report…includes 90 findings of failures at all levels of government," and "lays primary fault with the passive reaction and misjudgments of top Bush aides, singling out Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, the Homeland Security Operations Center and the White House Homeland Security Council." It adds that "Regarding Bush…'earlier presidential involvement could have speeded the response' because he alone could have cut through all bureaucratic resistance," and his "televised statement on Sept. 1 that 'I don't think anybody anticipated the breach of the levees,'" does "not appear to be consistent with the advice and counsel one would expect to have been provided by a senior disaster professional," as "about 56 hours before Katrina made landfall, the National Weather Service and National Hurricane Center cited an 'extremely high probability' that New Orleans would be flooded and tens of thousands of residents killed."

DOJ_NMG_0014263

Reuters (2/12) adds the report concludes that "the response to the disaster showed the government failed to learn from the September 11, 2001 hijacking attacks,."

LATimes Says Brown's Testimony Reveals Lessons. The Los Angeles Times (2/12, 958K) editorializes that Michael Brown's "testimony was more than just good political theater, however — it was a guided tour of a dysfunctional federal bureaucracy." He "painted a picture of an unresponsive White House that did not grasp the gravity of the situation in New Orleans" even as "FEMA's parent agency, the Department of Homeland Security, was too preoccupied with terrorism to be of much help on natural disasters." He also "illuminated two obvious yet fundamental problems that threaten anyone dwelling in particularly risky environs:" it is "hard to coordinate all the federal, state and local agencies involved in responding to a catastrophe" and "disaster plans are worthless if they're not implemented." Therefore, "communities across the country need to work with state and federal governments to define just how much they can and must do in the event of a catastrophe like Hurricane Katrina, as well as what precisely it will take for the feds to send in the cavalry."

New Orleans Still Seeking Sponsors For Mardi Gras. The New York Times (2/12, Rivlin, 1.19M) reports that New Orleans officials " boldly decided last fall to hold the parades of Mardi Gras, even though the city treasury was empty and large swaths of the town still lay in ruins. The price, though, was their demand that the beloved party abandon tradition and seek corporate sponsors," but "no corporation has come up with the $2 million the city was hoping to receive for the naming rights," and only Glad Products "has said it will contribute to the cause" with "an unspecified six-figure donation to the city and a gift of 100,000 trash bags." Should "no additional corporate sponsors step forward, the city will have to dig into its nonexistent treasury to pay for the celebration, which many officials say the city needs to raise its spirit and its economy." People "in the sponsorship business say the city should have started searching for corporate donors in August, when companies typically start thinking about their marketing budget for the coming year," and "many image-conscious corporations may be reluctant to lend their name to an event that often becomes a bacchanal."

Writer Says Bush Has "Written Off New Orleans." Writer Jennifer Moses argues in an op-ed in the Washington Post (2/12, B7, 744K), "In his State of the Union address" President Bush mentioned New Orleans, saying "$85 billion is a lot." However, "nothing close to $85 billion has been spent, and that's because most of it is tied up with something called the Stafford Act, which restricts the use of federal money for precisely the kind of things that Louisiana needs to recover, particularly housing relief." Bush "has largely written New Orleans off," and "the president's rejection of the bipartisan Baker plan… was tantamount to a death sentence." Then, "in an instance of double bind so mind-numbingly stupid that you have to think that Washington is run by a mob of sadists, the president's point man for Gulf Coast recovery, Donald Powell, recently urged Louisiana to use its share of federal funds to buy out uninsured homeowners living outside the flood plain" when "all of New Orleans, as well as most of South Louisiana as a whole, is both below sea level and within the federal levee system, meaning, again, that New Orleans-area homeowners get diddly squat."

WAR NEWS:

Roadside Bombs Now Responsible For 61% Of Coalition Deaths In Iraq. ABC World News Tonight (2/11, story 7, 2:40, Avila) reported on the "mounting danger of roadside bombs in Iraq the number of attacks on US and coalition troops using IEDs, or improvised explosive devices, doubled from the year before, to nearly 11,000. More importantly, they now account for some 61% of all combat deaths and 71% of the wounded. And for those soldiers who are lucky enough to survive, the recovery is long and difficult." ABC also profiled the experience of Marine Michael Berninger, who was hit by two roadside bombs. Berninger "volunteered to serve in Iraq. A truck driver, which is among the most dangerous jobs because of roadside bombs. In fact, Michael was in the war zone less than four months, yet, he was hit by bombs twice. The second time, shrapnel from the device damaged his spine." Berninger "now has a chest full of medals, including the Purple Heart, and wants to return to finish his mission in Iraq. But he came home with more than physical injuries. He now suffers from posttraumatic stress disorder, with debilitating nightmares and flashbacks."

Defense Department Delays Use Of IED Destroyer. The Los Angeles Times (2/12, Mazzetti, 958K) reports, "A new high-tech vehicle that destroys roadside bombs" called the Joint IED Neutralizer "has passed a series of U.S. military tests but has not yet been sent into battle," and "to many in the military, the delay in deploying the vehicles, which resemble souped-up, armor-plated golf carts, is a case study of the Pentagon's inability to bypass cumbersome peacetime procedures to meet the urgent demands of troops in the field." The Pentagon's IED task force sadi the JIN "required further testing, and...a decision to delay deployment had been made jointly by Pentagon officials and commanders in Iraq," but "the Marine Corps believes otherwise and recently decided to circumvent the testing schedule and send JIN units to…Iraq." The Defense Department and Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld have "faced similar charges of failing to act quickly to protect soldiers in combat," including "complaints about the military's failure to provide sufficient body armor for soldiers and adequate armor for transport vehicles."

DOJ_NMG_0014264

Motorcycle Bomb Explodes In Baghdad. The Washington Post/AP (2/12) reports, "A bomb rigged to a motorcycle exploded early Sunday outside a local restaurant in central Baghdad, wounding nine people," and "machine gun fire was heard shortly after."

Iraqi Shiites' Prime Minister Nomination Stalled. The New York Times (2/12, Worth, 1.19M) reports, "Shiite political leaders failed to agree Saturday on their nominee to be Iraq's new prime minister, saying they would take a vote on Sunday if efforts to pick a candidate by consensus had not succeeded by then." While "the Shiite United Iraqi Alliance…expected to formally nominate Adel Abdul Mahdi on Saturday," Iraq's current prime minister, Ibrahim al-Jaafari, "refused to withdraw his name from contention, and he still commands wide support in the Shiite ranks." Sami al-Askari, an independent Shiite member of the alliance, said that there will be "one more effort to pick a premier by consensus" on Sunday, before resorting to "a secret ballot, the results of which will be final."

The Washington Times/AP (2/12, Abdul-Zahra) adds that the vote was postponed "at the request of radical cleric Sheik Muqtada al-Sadr's faction." The Washington Post (2/12, Hernandez, Fekeiki, 744K) also covered this story.

Iraq's Leaders Must "Unite The Country," Khalilzad Writes. In a Los Angeles Times (2/12, 958K) op-ed piece headlined, "A Political Blueprint For Iraq.", US Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad writes that "From the moment the US decided to remove the brutal regime of Saddam Hussein and help Iraqis establish a representative government, one of our key challenges has been enabling the leaders of Iraq's major communities to overcome their mistrust and fear of each other. This has not been easy." Khalilzad goes on to write that "this is a moment of opportunity. Thanks in part to systematic outreach efforts by the United States, Sunnis have undergone a sea change in attitude about participating in post-Hussein governance, culminating in their massive turnout in the December elections. They have come to understand that the US is not seeking to occupy their country permanently, and many have been convinced that protracted violence would destroy their country's future. To build on this progress, Iraq's leaders now need to agree on a process to unite the country."

Opposing Experts Agree Saddam's Trial Is "A Mess," Offer Different Solutions. The Minneapolis Star Tribune (2/12, Rosen, 424K) reports, "Curtis Doebbler is one of two American lawyers on Saddam Hussein's international legal defense team," and "Michael Scharf, a Case Western Reserve University law professor and former State Department official, heads an international team of war crimes experts advising the trial's inexperienced Iraqi judges and prosecutors." Both "agree on only one thing about the nearly four-month-old trial of the deposed dictator: It's a mess." Doebbler "blames the U.S. government," accusing it "of running -- and rigging -- the trial behind the scenes," while "Scharf blames Saddam and his attorneys, who he says are intent on turning the trial into a circus." Doebbler says "the only way to save Saddam's trial…is to start over under U.N. control somewhere outside Iraq." Scharf, however, says "the trial should continue in Iraq because the Iraqi people have told pollsters in overwhelming numbers that Saddam should be tried and judged by his countrymen."

Army Adds Incentives To Retain Needed Officers. The Washington Post (2/12, A12, Tyson, 744K) reports, "The Army, forecasting a shortage of" short 3,500 active-duty officers by 2007, "is boosting the incentives it offers to try to hold on to experienced commanders." Besides "speeding promotions and rolling out incentives to entice officers to stay, the Army is also using involuntary 545-day call-ups to compel inactive officers to leave civilian life for duty in Iraq." While "the looming officer shortage is part of a wider manpower crunch the Army faces stemming from the surge in demand for U.S. ground forces at home and overseas," it remains "distinct from the Army's recruiting difficulties, reflecting less a problem with signing up new officers than one of promoting and retaining experienced officers."

Army Doctors' Experience, Revised Procedures Leading To Fewer Iraq Deaths. The Los Angeles Times (2/12, Kraul, 958K) reports, "The knowledge that U.S. military doctors have gained in Iraq is helping them save the lives of more combat wounded than ever before." Because of "quicker medical evacuations, improved emergency room instruments and new surgical approaches…fewer injured service members are dying." The "military surgeons have generally changed their approach to critical trauma injuries by opting when possible for 'damage control surgery' rather than immediate major chest or abdominal intervention," and "the mortality rate among those wounded in Iraq is about 10%, compared with 20% in the 1991 Persian Gulf War, 24% in Vietnam and 30% in World War II, according to a recent issue of the New England Journal of Medicine." However, "the higher survival rate raises other issues…such as the quality of life for the increased number of troops with multiple amputations and disfiguring wounds."

DOJ_NMG_0014265

Explosions In Iraq Can Lead To Amputations. The New York Times (2/12, A1, Macur, 1.19M) reports, "Explosions have killed 1,123 American service members in Iraq and have wounded at least 10 times more, often with a devastating combination of injuries -- ruptured organs and severed spines, obliterated limbs and burst eyeballs. Among the more than 16,653 Americans wounded in Iraq are 387 amputees." The "amputations, traumatic though they are, are often accompanied by painful complications." Most have an infection, and "about 20 percent of the amputees have had potentially serious blood clots." Then, "about half of them experience a condition in which bone grows at the site of amputation, called heterotopic ossification" which "can prevent proper fitting of a prosthesis or pierce the skin." Also, "the psychological effects of losing a limb, particularly for young, active military members, can be deep and lasting, a constant reminder of the war."

Columnist Criticizes Lack Of Psychiatric Support For Returning Veterans. Ann Louise Bardach, who writes the Interrogation column for Slate and is the author of 'Cuba Confidential, Love and Vengeance in Miami and Havana," writes in an op-ed in the Los Angeles Times (2/12, 958K), "Treatment of returning veterans is woefully inadequate, owing to a lack of funding. Although the VA acknowledges PTSD as a serious problem for returning veterans, VA hospitals around the country have sharply reduced their inpatient psychiatric beds." Meanwhile, "suicide…is an enormous and growing concern," as "the Army estimates that the suicide rate among Iraq veterans is one-third higher than the historical wartime average, owing to the psychological strains of no-holds-barred insurgency warfare. That means we're looking at a future blizzard of suicides without an adequate VA program in place to address the crisis." Even "thirty years after Vietnam, we seem to have learned very little."

Herring Says Military Contractors Are Winners From Iraq War. Hubert B. Herring writes in his column in the New York Times (2/12, 1.19M), "Some indisputable winners" in the Iraq war "are clear now: military contractors." If one "bought 100 shares of each of the top six military contractors at their lows of the last six years" it "would have cost $12,731.50. On Friday, it would have been worth three and a half times that: $44,417. Little wonder. Just look at the money machines these contractors have become as the war drags on."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Enron Prosecutors Face Challenge Over Credibility Of Witness Who Took Plea Deals. The Houston Chronicle (2/12, Fowler, Roper) reports, "When the case of former HealthSouth CEO Richard Scrushy went to trial last summer, the deck seemed stacked against him." The Chronicle continues, "Five former chief financial officers took the stand as government witnesses, giving powerful testimony that Scrushy personally orchestrated a $2.7 billion accounting fraud at the hospital chain. … But when the trial was over, Scrushy was acquitted. The reason? Jurors said the CFOs weren't credible." The Chronicle adds, "By highlighting so-called 'sweetheart deals' the CFOs made with prosecutors to reduce jail time they were facing and labeling them as "rats," Scrushy attorney Jim Parker painted the men as untrustworthy. … '(The jury) wouldn't trust them today to get their car parked,' Parker said." The Chronicle notes, "Former Enron executives Ken Lay and Jeff Skilling face a similar challenge in their criminal trial, with as many as 16 former Enron employees in government plea agreements. But there's a difference … With two exceptions, the defense won't simply demonize those with plea deals who end up testifying or call them rats. To prove their thesis that Enron was not a corrupt enterprise, the defense needs to show jurors the witnesses are good people who didn't really commit the crimes they admitted to but were pressured by the government. … It's a twist on an already tough tango, as prosecutors try to present credible witnesses, defense attorneys try to discredit them and prosecutors come back and try to mend any damage."

Defense Says "Feel" Of Enron Case Important. The AP (2/12, Hays) reports, "A few snippets of video and audio clips of Kenneth Lay and Jeffrey Skilling speaking to employees or Wall Street analysts don't really show who the former Enron Corp. chiefs were or what they did before the company crashed in scandal more than four years ago, their attorneys contend." The AP continues, "So the lawyers convinced a federal judge to let them give jurors in Lay's and Skilling's fraud and conspiracy trial a much bigger dose of the pair headlining employee meetings and conference calls with analysts. That means jurors have been sitting through several hours of video and audiotapes that include company cheerleading and detailed discussions of business issues unrelated to the criminal charges against the two men." The AP adds, "The defense teams say jurors get a better sense of Enron and the defendants when they see Lay getting standing ovations from employees and hear analysts fawning over Skilling's smarts. … 'The feel of a case is as important as the think of a case," Lay's lead lawyer, Michael Ramsey, said outside of court." The AP notes, "There's more to come Monday when Ramsey wraps up his cross-examination of the government's first witness, former Enron investor relations chief Mark Koenig, who will spend his seventh day on the witness stand."

DOJ_NMG_0014266

CRIMINAL LAW:

Former Abramoff Colleague Confirms Contacts With Reid's Office. The AP (2/12) reports Ronald Platt, a former colleague of controversial lobbyist Jack Abramoff, "confirms he contacted Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid's office on behalf of the influential lobbyist but says he does not believe Abramoff's billing records accurately reflect the extent of his work." Platt, "a lobbyist who worked with Abramoff at the Greenberg Traurig firm between 2001 and 2004, said he contacted Reid's office in 2001, as the billing records show, about the timing of minimum wage legislation affecting one of Abramoff's clients, the Northern Mariana Islands." Platt said, "When Abramoff first arrived at Greenberg Traurig, I did a new colleague a favor by simply asking Reid staffers about when the minimum wage legislation affecting the Mariana Islands would be voted upon by the Senate. I communicated this to Abramoff."

Former Mariana Clients Turn On Abramoff. CQ Weekly (2/13, Zeller) reports that in the mid 1990s, the Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands "hired lobbyist Jack Abramoff to maintain its treasured exemptions from federal labor laws. The exemptions permit the commonwealth, a U.S. territory, to offer lucrative offshore shelter to American clothing manufacturers, who were then smarting from anti-sweatshop campaigns." By "setting up shop in the archipelago, U.S. textile concerns can plausibly plaster 'made in the U.S.A.' labels on their products, leaving conscience-stricken consumers with the impression that they are manufactured on the mainland — not on the rim of the Phillipine Sea." But now that Abramoff is "in bad moral odor — and awaiting sentencing for last month's fraud plea bargain — on American shores, the Marianas is undertaking its own reverse-engineering of its ethical image. In the mad rush among former Abramoff clients and associates to make it seem as though the disgraced lobbyist never did business with anyone, the territorial government is claiming that it, too, has been damaged by Abramoff's misdeeds — even though it's quite clear that he delivered just what the Islands wanted at the time." The "rather delicious irony in the Marianas case is that the two men making the most prominent denunciations of Abramoff now were among his lustiest supporters then."

Defense Attorney Says Laski Will Plead Not Guilty Today, Seek Plea Agreement. The AP (2/12) reports, "The lawyer representing former Chicago City Clerk James Laski said his client will plead not guilty Monday and wants to make a deal with the federal government. … Attorney Jeffrey Steinback said he will ask U.S. District Judge Charles Norgle for more time to negotiate a plea deal for Laski. Steinback said a deal seemed like the way to go after he reviewed transcripts of tapes the government made of Laski during its investigation." The AP notes, "Laski is the highest ranking official among 42 people charged in the federal investigation of corruption in Chicago government, which stemmed from a probe into a city program that awarded hauling jobs to trucking companies."

Hollywood Law Firm Helped Pellicano Pursue Trademark For Wiretap Device. The New York Times (2/12, Halbfinger, Weiner) reports, "Throughout the three-year federal investigation of Anthony Pellicano, the celebrity detective at the center of a huge Hollywood wiretapping scandal, the top-tier entertainment lawyer Bert Fields and his firm have insisted that they never knew their go-to investigator was secretly recording his targets' phone calls. But an indictment unsealed this week makes clear that Mr. Fields's firm…also played a central role in his pursuit of a trademark for the very device the government says he was using to wiretap his targets: a combination of computer hardware and software he called, aptly enough, Telesleuth. Brian Sun, a lawyer for Mr. Fields's firm, Greenberg, Glusker, Fields, Claman, Machtinger & Kinsella, said its lawyers believed that Mr. Pellicano intended to use Telesleuth on behalf of his many law-enforcement clients. Mr. Sun said the firm also believed that Telesleuth could not be used as a wiretapping device, although the participant in a call could use it to record a conversation."

Pellicano Charges Said To Show Need For Greater Private Eye Regulation. The Los Angeles Times (2/12, Hong) reports, "America's appetite for litigation, a rise in corporate snooping on employees, partners and rivals, and the trafficking of vast stores of private information on computer databases have fueled a boom in private investigations. The burgeoning industry and its darker practitioners have alarmed privacy advocates, federal regulators and legitimate investigators, who say the Pellicano case underscores the need for more public scrutiny of investigators and their employers. California has nearly 10,000 licensed private investigators, up from about 6,000 in 1990. As their ranks multiply, 'we're unable to tell the good players from the bad players,' said Robert H. Townsend, a Dana Point private investigator with 40 years' experience."

Former Reporter's Lawyers Subpoena Ovitz In Civil Suit. The Los Angeles Times (2/11, Krikorian, Blankstein) reports, "Attorneys for a former Los Angeles Times reporter allegedly threatened by indicted private investigator Anthony J. Pellicano have subpoenaed onetime Hollywood power player Michael Ovitz to provide a sworn deposition in her civil case. Lawyers for Anita Busch said they took the step after Monday's sweeping federal indictment charged that Pellicano and others accessed confidential police records to try to find embarrassing information about the reporter and dozens of others. Busch's civil lawsuit…accuses Pellicano and others, including former Los Angeles Police Sgt. Mark Arneson, of locating and threatening the reporter over unspecified stories about the entertainment business. … Noting how Ovitz has acknowledged cooperating with authorities, the attorneys said they hoped he would also help them determine who was behind the threat to Busch." They suspect it was Pellicano.

DOJ_NMG_0014267

Rise In Violent Crime Over Petty Disputes Noted In Some Areas. The New York Times (2/12, Zernike, 1.19M) reports while "violent crime has been at historic lows nationwide and in cities like New York, Miami and Los Angeles, it is rising sharply" in Milwaukee "and in many other places across the country." While "such crime in the 1990's was characterized by battles over gangs and drug turf, the police say the current rise in homicides has been set off by something more bewildering: petty disputes that hardly seem the stuff of fistfights, much less gunfire or stabbings." Police Chief Nannette H. Hegerty of Milwaukee "calls it 'the rage thing.'" Hegerty said, "We're seeing a very angry population, and they don't go to fists anymore, they go right to guns." Nationally, the "homicide rate peaked in 1991, declined steadily after 1993 and has remained essentially flat since 1999. But in the first six months of 2005, according to preliminary statistics from the F.B.I., the number of homicides nationwide rose 2.1 percent, with the greatest increase, 4.9 percent, in the Midwest. Yet many cities have seen far steeper increases."

Catholic Church Under Fire For New Sex Abuse Scandal. NBC Nightly News (2/11, story 6, 2:30, Williams) reported, "Tonight, questions about real reform in the Catholic Church in the US. After the original sexual abuse accusations, churn leaders promised to clean up the parishes, but now there are fresh allegations and charges that church leaders ignored new warning signs and that again here children have paid the price." NBC (Stafford) added, "Reverend Daniel McCormick. To the boys he coached at a Catholic school in Chicago, he was Father Dan. To prosecutors here, he's now an accused child molester." The "outrage comes in part from the timeline in this case. A boy first reported Reverend McCormick to police back in August, but no charges were filed at the time. The priest was allowed to continue teaching and coaching for months until a second boy spoke out. Now, a third boy says he too was abused and the alleged abuse happened after church leaders learned of the first boys' allegations."

Hines Says Plame Investigation Hurts Bush Because He Won't Fire Those Involved. Cragg Hines writes in his column in the Houston Chronicle (2/12, 581K) that the question of firing the vice president "arises as we juxtapose a damning claim from Vice President Dick Cheney's former chief of staff, the indicted I. Lewis 'Scooter' Libby, against President Bush's once definitive determination to 'take appropriate action' if anyone in his administration leaked classified information." With his claims that his superiors authorized leaking Plame's name, "we have Libby reaching for Cheney's throat — at least as a pretrial tactic." This case "seeps its way closer to the Oval Office because an obstinate Bush will not keep his word and cut his losses" by firing people involved. Instead, he moves "the goal posts for what it takes to get the heave-ho."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

First Lady Criticizes Hillary Clinton For MLK Day Criticism Of Administration. At the Winter Olympics in Turin, Italy, First Lady Laura Bush yesterday said Sen. Hillary Clinton's criticism of the Bush Administration on Martin Luther King Day was "out of bounds." ABC World News Tonight (2/11, story 4, Avila) reported Mrs. Bush "made it clear that not all the bad blood between the Clinton and Bush families has been spilled…revealing a touch of anger about her predecessor, Senator Hillary Clinton." Mrs. Clinton has "apparently irritated the current First Lady with these remarks in a speech on Martin Luther King Day." Sen. Clinton: "So we have a culture of corruption. We have cronyism. We have incompetence. I predict to you that this Administration will go down in history as one of the worst that has ever governed our country." Asked by ABC's Robin Roberts if that was "just politics" or "fair game? Or is that out of bounds, a statement like that?" First Lady Laura Bush: "Well, of course I think it's out of bounds. But I think it's politics, it's certainly politics."

The AP (2/12) adds, "Mrs. Bush pointed out that former Presidents Bush and Clinton and her husband are part of a unique club that also includes the wives." The First Lady said, "We know what it's like to live in that house. We certainly know what it's like to have your husband criticized. … So I think there's a certain empathy that we might have for each other that we wouldn't have maybe for somebody else who said something like that." Reuters (2/12) also reports on the First Lady's comments.

Some Wonder About Bush Relationship With Clinton. The Houston Chronicle (2/12, Mason, 581K) in its "White House Watch" column speculates on what the atmosphere was like on Air Force One between the Bush's, the Clintons and RNC Chairman Ken Mehlman after Coretta Scott King's funeral. In addition to the latest jabs between them, "Bush also has been making perhaps one too many jokes lately about his father's partiality for former President Clinton, whom Bush now refers to as an extra brother." The Chronicle notes, "The tone and frequency of the jokes has some Washington insiders wondering if the president is somewhat miffed about the relationship." White House spokesman Scott McClellan said, "They had a good visit. … The president is glad to have his 'brother' traveling with us today."

DOJ_NMG_0014268

Relationships Between Presidential Couples Examined. The AP (2/12, Woodward) in a Valentine's Day article notes, "Presidents and their wives have been an amorous lot, their White House years coming at the pinnacle of lives entwined. The men pursued and loved these women as intensely as they clawed to power and unleashed armies." One "no-nonsense woman, Barbara Bush, got a treacly note from her husband, George, asking her to show more affection for the television cameras in the 1988 campaign, like their opponents, the Dukakises." Bush 41 wrote, "Sweetsie…Please look at how Mike and Kitty do it. Try to be closer in more -- well er romantic -- on camera. I am practicing the loving look, and the creeping hand. Yours for better TV and more demonstrable affection. Your sweetie pie coo coo. Love 'ya GB."

Indiana Legislature Considering Extensive Abortion Consent Bill In Country. The Washington Post/AP (2/12, A10, Martin) reports that women "seeking an abortion in Indiana would be told that life begins at conception under a proposal that would give the state one of the furthest-reaching abortion consent laws in the country." Only South Dakota "has gone as far in what it orders doctors to tell women before they can get abortions, and that law has been blocked by a court." Supporters say "the legislation would provide women with key information before they make an irreversible decision, but critics argue it blurs the line between church and state and could infringe on doctors' First Amendment rights."

The Washington Times (2/12, 90K) also reports the AP story.

Federal Judge Selects CA Prison Health Chief. The Los Angeles Times (2/12, Warren) reports, "Ending a nationwide search, a federal judge has picked the top health official in Santa Clara County to take charge of California's deeply troubled prison healthcare system, sources familiar with the selection process said Saturday." The Times continues, "Bob Sillen, 63, is expected to be formally appointed as a federal receiver on Tuesday by U.S. District Judge Thelton Henderson. The San Francisco judge decided to act after concluding last July that 'extreme measures' were needed to fix a system that kills one inmate each week through medical incompetence or neglect." The Times adds, "The move effectively shifts power from state to federal authorities for all decisions related to inmate care — including medical staffing, treatment standards and contracts with outside hospitals. … Legal scholars said the appointment marks the first time a government operation of this size has been placed under a federal receiver. … This week, the sources said, Henderson will issue an order detailing the extraordinary powers Sillen will have in managing the system, which provides healthcare for 168,000 inmates and employs 6,000 people in 33 prisons."

Under Pressure From China, San Francisco Bars Religious Group From New Year's Parade. ABC World News Tonight (2/11, story 3, 2:20, Avila) reported the "final preparations are being made for America's oldest and largest Chinese new year's parade. This is the Chinese Year of the Dog, but in San Francisco, it can be called the year of the dog fight. Normally one of the most tolerant cities in America, San Francisco is in the middle of a bitter disagreement of who is allowed to march in tonight's annual parade." Falun Gong "a religious group outlawed by China, has been banned from the festivities." ABC (Rooney) added, "Falun Gong got its start only in 1992, and grew quickly. By 1999, the Chinese communist government denounced it as a dangerous cult. Members have been arrested, tortured, even executed. The Falun Gong claim they are persecuted in the US, as well as China." Falun Gong "and at least one city official say the Chinese Chamber of commerce here in San Francisco excluded the Falun Gong under pressure from the Chinese government." Chris Daly, San Francisco Board of Supervisers: "Mainland China has significant influence here in San Francisco, and other major American cities. It's not just me saying it. The United States Congress and in a concurrent resolution stated that." Falun Gong "has sued to be included in future parades. They say they have to be the voice of freedom here in the US for people who have no voice in China."

ANTITRUST:

Critics Worry About Wal-Mart's Plan To Move Into Banking Industry. The Washington Post (2/12, F1, Day, 744K) reports Wal-Mart "entered the grocery business in 1988 to compete with established names such as Kroger, Safeway and Albertsons, which had dominated food retailing for decades. Today Wal-Mart is America's biggest grocer, with 16 percent of the U.S. retail food market, and its sales continue to climb, even as dozens of grocery chains struggle." Congressional lawmakers "and federal regulators now face a tough question: Should they permit Wal-Mart to use a legal loophole to enter banking and potentially do in that arena what it has done to nearly every other consumer product and service it has touched?" The question "rattles bankers from Maine to California, even though the retailer no longer wants a full-service bank, only a limited-purpose one. It has whipped up longtime Wal-Mart critics, including labor unions, consumer groups and some congressmen on both sides of the aisle, who say the company is already too big, with too much power over the American economy, sometimes to the detriment of workers' pay and domestic jobs."

DOJ_NMG_0014269

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Kyoto Protocols Generate Projects In Developing Countries. The Los Angeles Times (2/12, Dickerson, 958K) reports, "Thanks to the Kyoto Protocol, the 1997 international treaty on climate change, efforts by industrialized countries to fight global warming are popping up in far-flung places like Villagran," a Mexican hamlet "about 40 miles southwest of the city of Queretero. Nearly 600 Kyoto-related projects are in the pipeline in the developing world, according to a recent tally by a Danish climate research center funded in part by the United Nations. About 40% of them are in Latin America, including hydroelectric power plants in Honduras and wind-powered turbines in Chile." The accord, "which the United States has not ratified, calls for reducing overall greenhouse-gas emissions by major industrialized countries in the period 2008-2012 to amounts at least 5% below 1990 levels." More than "150 nations have signed and ratified the treaty, but the burden to reduce emissions falls on about three dozen industrialized countries responsible for most of the climate mess. One way for industrialized countries to meet their reduction targets is to support environmental projects in developing regions. Dubbed the Clean Development Mechanism, it was designed to lower compliance costs for rich nations while funneling much-needed development to poor ones."

Georgia Jury Boosts Value Of Property Seized By Eminent Domain. The Los Angeles Times/AP (2/12) reports, "A jury has decided that a Georgia hospital is going to have to pay about five times what it offered if it wants to condemn a rental house where a frail, 93-year-old woman has lived for 26 years." The AP continues, "The jury said last week that Phoebe Putney Memorial Hospital would have to buy the 60-year-old brick duplex for $200,000 — it has been appraised at $50,000 to $60,000 — and give the tenant $51,000 to help her move. … 'It just proves that no one can assume absolute power over someone's life without having to answer to the legal system,' said lawyer Eddy Meeks, who represented the tenant, Julia Lemon, and the home's owner, Julie Montgomery." The AP adds, "Phoebe, southwest Georgia's largest hospital, pursued the property's condemnation last year so it could expand a child development center for employees' children. Phoebe officials said they might appeal the verdict. … Meeks said he might appeal the condemnation, which was approved by a court last year."

Mid-Atlantic, Northeast Hit By Major Snowstorm. The CBS Evening News (2/11, story 2, 4:00, Mitchell) reported, "Residents from Virginia to New England tonight are bracing for a raging nor'easter, packing blizzard conditions and dropping as much as 15 inches of snow in some areas." CBS (Chen) added, "We were beginning to think winter was going to skip right over us this year. January was the nation's warmest on record. That was certainly the case here in Washington. February was starting out mild, but as you can see, that's changing and quickly." Washington is "pretty excited about this but taking it seriously, as well. So much so that First Lady Laura Bush has delayed her return trip. She's been at the Olympics in Italy. She's delayed her trip home because of the weather, because they wanted to make sure it would be safe for her plane to land here."

NBC Nightly News (2/11, lead story, 2:30, Williams) reported, "Good evening from Torino, Italy, where on the streets of this city, at the foot of the Italian Alps, there is not a bit of snow tonight. But where First Lady Laura Bush has decided to stay an extra night because of the weather back home." NBC (Dawson) added, "By Saturday afternoon, Delta, a major carrier in the Northeast, had already canceled dozens of flights and other airlines were expected to follow." Across the nation, "temperatures in January averaged nearly 40 degrees, eight and a half degrees above normal. Those warm temperatures have pushed energy demand in the US down by 20%. Good news given that oil prices are at record highs."

World News Tonight (2/11, story 5, :20, Avila) reported, "Outside the White House, across the Northeast, the story is snow and lots of it. As the first major storm takes aim, heavy snow is expected to make for blizzard conditions with more than a foot forecast for some cities. Delta Airlines is canceling flights at all major East Coast airports between Washington and Boston."

Backers, Foes Of Tribal Casinos Prepare For Meetings This Week. The Vancouver (WA) Columbian (2/12, Mize) reports, "This week's two meetings on the Cowlitz Tribe's casino project are supposed to be purely informational, a chance to discuss the complicated federal process for reviewing such requests and to answer questions." The Columbian continues, "Even so, supporters and opponents of the $510 million project west of La Center are rallying their forces as though sheer numbers and rhetorical thunder will determine who wins and who loses. … 'Lest anybody think people out here don't care,' said Tom Hunt, a spokesman for Citizens Against Reservation Shopping, a group formed in June to oppose the Cowlitz project. 'We want to show them they do care.'" The Columbian adds, "Cowlitz tribal leaders also want to make an impression on federal officials. … John Barnett, Cowlitz chairman, sent a letter to tribe members last month imploring them to turn out in force for a pizza dinner and rally before each meeting and to stay for the proceedings. 'Your tribe needs your help,' Barnett wrote in a Jan. 24 letter. 'These are two of the most critical meetings in our tribe's history. It is crucial that you, your family and your friends attend at least one of these meetings. Attendance at both meetings is even better.' … Emotions were ratcheted up another notch Friday when Kamie Biehl, founder of Stand Up For Clark County Citizens, announced she was stepping down as group chairwoman after allegedly receiving threats to herself and family. … Some of the contentiousness has even trickled back to Washington, D.C. Federal officials, realizing the potential for informational meetings to become caustic free-for-alls, were crafting ground rules late Friday afternoon."

DOJ_NMG_0014270

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Tenth Church Burns In Alabama. NBC Nightly News (2/11, story 5, 2:10, Williams) reported that in Alabama, "another church is reported to be on fire tonight. That would make 10 churches burned this month, all of them in rural areas, all of them Baptist churches. While the FBI and other investigators search for those responsible, the congregations are searching for some way to move forward without fear." NBC (Mott) added, "Though the fire at the Spring Valley Baptist Church this past Tuesday burned out, it lit another kind of flame." Rep. Artur Davis: "If you think you scared somebody, you haven't scared anybody. If you think you've intimidated somebody, you haven't intimidated anybody." Mott: "There's confidence in rural Alabama, despite nine unsolved church arsons here since February 3, first in the central part of the state, then near its western border."

The Montgomery (AL) Advertiser (2/12, Linn) reports, "Federal and state authorities on Saturday responded to another Baptist church fire in rural Alabama, bringing the total to 10 in eight days." The Advertiser continues, "The fire, reported about 4:15 p.m. at Beaverton Free Will Baptist Church in Lamar County near the Mississippi line, had fully engulfed the church by the time firefighters arrived, said Cristal Oakes of the Lamar County Sheriff's Department. … The church near Beaverton is situated between 45 and 60 miles north of four Baptist churches that burned early Tuesday morning in rural Pickens, Greene and Sumter counties. … 'At this point we have not determined what the cause and origin of the fire is,' said Ronald Turk of the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, the federal agency that investigates arson." The Advertiser adds, "Temperatures were predicted in the low 20s overnight, and authorities said the fire may have been an accident related to a heater. Some communities in the area had received a light dusting of snow. … Unlike five Baptist church fires in Bibb County on Feb. 3 and four in west Alabama on Tuesday this fire was reported during daylight hours. But like the others, the fire was in a rural community, where Baptist churches sit just off the beaten path -- churches like Mount Hebron's Pleasant Valley Baptist Church, which is just up a dirt road from some train tracks, past where jack rabbits forage at night."

TAX:

Trade Off Between Bush Tax Cuts And AMT Tax Seen As Necessary. The New York Times (2/12, Andrews, 1.19M) reports, "Never before has so much of the income tax code consisted of temporary measures. And never before has it been so inherently unsustainable." Almost "all of President Bush's tax cuts and credits…are set to expire by 2011." And "the huge volume of expiring tax cuts is set to collide with an equally expensive challenge that neither Mr. Bush nor the Congress has started to address," the alternative minimum tax, which "is now set to impose big tax increases on tens of millions of middle-income families over the next few years." The Times states, "If Mr. Bush's tax cuts are extended, but the A.M.T. is unchanged, tens of millions of people will face big new surcharges." And if the AMT "is frozen or simply repealed, Congress is likely to make up for the lost money by cutting back or eliminating scores of other tax breaks."

Taxpayers To Feel Pain Of AMT Tax. The New York Times (2/12, Johnston, 1.19M) reports, "After President Bush and Congress cut tax rates on dividends and long-term capital gains to a top rate of 15 percent in 2003, many investors bought stocks that make big cash payouts, expecting to benefit from lower taxes." But "it has not worked out that way. That is because your actual tax rate may not be the one that the politicians talked about or that the Internal Revenue Service prints on its tax forms." That's because the alternative minimum tax "has its own rules, including fewer deductions and just two tax rates, 26 percent and 28 percent. If the alternative tax is higher than the one you would owe under the regular tax system, you pay the higher bill." But while Bush "again called for making his tax cuts permanent" in his State of the Union speech "he said nothing about overhauling or repealing the alternative minimum tax."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Touts Modernization Of Medicare, Admits Problems. President Bush urged senior citizens to sign up for the new Medicare drug program, saying it's a "good deal" and promising the government would address problems with its implementation. Bush's radio address was covered by the wire services and some local TV stations. The AP (2/12, Freking) reports Bush said the new Medicare prescription drug benefit "is helping a large majority of Medicare beneficiaries" but admitted "that some patients have experienced problems." Because of "competition, the program is getting cheaper for beneficiaries and taxpayers alike, Bush said." The AP notes, "The average premium that beneficiaries pay is now expected to be about $25 a month instead of $37, as projected last year. The typical senior citizen will pay about half of what he used to spend on prescription drugs," according to Bush. But, "the government also estimates that several hundred thousand low-income beneficiaries had trouble making the transition to the new program."

DOJ_NMG_0014271

Reuters (2/12, Bohan) reports Bush said the "government was working to fix" the problems with the Medicare drug program but "insisted the program was a 'good deal' for seniors and encouraged more to sign up." Some Democrats have blamed the problems on "what they say was the excessive influence of private insurers and pharmacies in shaping the legislation. They view it as an issue on which Bush's Republican allies may be vulnerable in the 2006 elections. Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton recently said "the best way to fix the problems might be to scrap the program and start over." Bush said HHS Secretary Mike Leavitt "has been traveling to several states to meet with governors about the drug benefit. He said officials were trying to make sure more information is shared by Medicare, the health plans and the states, and that it is up-to-date."

The Boston Globe (2/12, Easton, 484K) in an article on conservative dissatisfaction with Bush notes that at CPAC Rep. Tom Tancredo "drew big applause when he called for repealing the administration's costly prescription drug plan, which the president extolled in his Saturday radio address as 'a good deal for seniors.'"

And Bloomberg (2/12, Young) adds, "Fiscal conservatives usually aligned with Bush's Republican party have also assailed the president's embrace of an expansion to a government entitlement program." But "Bush was unapologetic, saying he 'was proud to sign this Medicare reform into law.'"

There was almost no local television coverage of the President's radio address praising the new Medicare D plan. Those stations that did cover it tended to note that Mr. Bush admitted there are problems as it starts up. An example: KLAS-TV Las Vegas (1/11, 6:38 p.m.) reported, "President Bush is praising the new prescription drug benefit initiative. During his weekly radio address today, Mr. Bush acknowledged that there are challenges with the Medicare program."

Bush Competitiveness Plan Seen As Having Widespread Support. The Los Angeles Times (2/12, Havemann, Simon, 958K) reports President Bush's "new American Competitiveness Initiative is triggering a stampede of bipartisan support. It could be one of the few administration initiatives to be enacted in this congressional election year." With last year's "Social Security push all but abandoned, Bush's domestic focus now is a much less ambitious effort: to prevent the United States from falling behind economic competitors in Asia and elsewhere, by providing federal support for math and science education and for basic research in the physical sciences." The "sour notes have been few and have come largely from critics who wish Bush's initiative had been more ambitious." Bush's "long-range plan calls for doubling the government's annual spending on physical science research over the next decade, from $9.8 billion this year to $19.5 billion in 2016. Bush's 2007 budget, sent to Congress last week, would provide a down payment of $910 million, an increase of 9.3%."

Bush Call For More Skilled Worker Visas Resonates With Silicon Valley Firms. The Los Angeles Times (2/12, Iritani, 958K) reports that President Bush's "recent call for more visas for skilled foreign workers increases the likelihood that relief is on the way for U.S. technology firms that say they are struggling to fill key positions." In a Feb. 2 speech at the Minnesota headquarters of 3M, Bush "called on Congress to be 'realistic' and 'reasonable' and expand the quota of H-1B visas, which are used to bring in skilled workers on a temporary basis." Silicon Valley companies "are among the most vocal advocates of H-1B reform. For decades, these companies attracted engineers, computer programmers and other professionals from around the globe. Now they say they are experiencing a reverse brain drain as skilled workers flock to the booming economies of China and India." Though the "debate in this country about outsourcing work overseas has quieted down in the United States, it remains a sensitive political issue. In December, an effort to get an H-1B visa expansion provision attached to a budget bill was defeated in Congress."

Spending, Immigration Concerns Fuel Conservative Anger At Bush. The Boston Globe (2/12, Easton, 484K) in its "Washington Briefing" column titled "A Wrathful Right Turns On Bush" reports, "The Republican family feud was laid bare in public last week at" CPAC. Conservative activists "are a notoriously cranky bunch, quick to pounce on politician friends who stray toward the center. But this year the spears aimed at George W. Bush were especially sharp." That "can't be a good sign for a White House hoping to maintain control of Congress next November when its one-time allies lump in the president with two of their perpetual bogeymen: John McCain and Ted Kennedy." The President's "budget-busting spending was a big reason for the foul mood. But two other issues captured the growing split between the president and a powerful conservative movement that twice helped him capture the Oval Office: immigration and the Medicare prescription drug plan."

DOJ_NMG_0014272

The AP (2/12, Lester) reports that at CPAC conservative Republicans questioned whether Bush "is conservative enough when it comes to government spending and growth." Conservatives "are quite unhappy with Bush administration initiatives…and special spending projects from Congress that have ballooned the cost and scope of the federal government." Conservatives "feel that limited government overrides all other issues such as gun rights, pro-life policies and conservative judges. Yet, despite their unhappiness, Bush remains popular with this group, especially for his court appointments and handling of terrorism." ACU chairman David Keene said, "They like Bush. … But they are frustrated and disappointed with some things the administration has done." He "said conservatives are starting to look ahead at future leaders, accepting that they've gotten some of what they want from Bush.

Justice Department Reviewing Conduct Of Immigration Judges. The Los Angeles Times (2/12, Simmons, 958K) reports the "complaints of insensitive -- even abusive -- conduct by some U.S. immigration judges have prompted a broad federal review." Describing the "conduct of some judges as 'intemperate and even abusive,' U.S. Atty. Gen. Alberto R. Gonzales recently announced that the Justice Department was launching a comprehensive review of the nation's immigration courts." The review "will focus on the performance of the nation's 224 immigration judges, including 55 in California. Last year, the jurists, who are appointed by the attorney general, heard about 270,000 cases, according to department statistics." The review "is being conducted by the deputy and associate attorneys general. It will assess the nature and scope of the problems within the system and recommend improvements, a Justice Department official said." The National Assn. of Immigration Judges "supports the review but believes that incidents of misconduct are rare, said Dana Leigh Marks, vice president of the organization."

NAFTA Seen As Fueling Illegal Drug Trade As Well. The Houston Chronicle (2/12, Pinkerton, 581K) reports that in Nuevo Laredo, the "five bridges spanning the green waters of the Rio Grande bustle with more than 21,000 cars, trucks and buses every day. This border town — and its American sister city across the river — see more than $100 billion in commerce rumble through every year. They're known as 'Los Dos Laredos,' and few dispute the towns are one of the great NAFTA success stories." But US drug agents "say that free trade with Mexico has had an ugly and unintended consequence: Just as legitimate business people have flocked to Nuevo Laredo, so have criminals. And they have quickly turned it into one of the most dangerous and violent towns along the U.S.-Mexico border, agents say." US drug agents "say they aren't surprised the city of 310,000 has become such a coveted outpost for smugglers. They've worried for years that free trade unwittingly fuels trafficking."

Assaults On Border Patrol Officers On The Rise. The Washington Post (2/12, C2, Barr, 744K) reports in its "Federal Diary" column that assaults "against Border Patrol officers appear to be on the increase -- from gunshots fired to rocks thrown." Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said, "Let me tell you, rockings are serious. You can get serious injuries when a rock . . . hits a Border Patrol agent." The Post adds according to David V. Aguilar, "the Border Patrol chief, there were 374 assaults against officers in fiscal 2004 and 778 assaults in fiscal 2005. Since Oct. 1, the start of the fiscal year, there have been 192." Chertoff and Aguilar "talked about the dangers faced by Border Patrol officers as part of a briefing on the president's new budget proposal. The Department of Homeland Security would receive a 6 percent increase in funding under President Bush 's plan, with a substantial part of the extra funds directed toward tightening border security and cracking down on smugglers and cartels."

Republicans Concerned Bush Budget Will Impact 2006 Elections. The Boston Globe (2/12, Klein, 484K) reports, "Republicans are expressing deep skepticism about President Bush's plans to cut social programs while promoting the extension of his tax cuts, saying the juxtaposition of the two GOP priorities could spur an election-year backlash." Bush's budget "is increasingly being met with criticism from both ideological poles of his party. Moderates are expressing concern about slashing popular programs that benefit the poor at the same time they're being asked to cut taxes on the rich, and conservatives are saying the proposal does not go far enough in controlling the record budget deficit." The "reaction to Bush's proposal this year was notably cool from members of his own party," and Republican Main Street Partnership executive director Sarah Chamberlain Resnick "said she sees at least one bright spot in the budget proposal: It will give moderates from districts that are heavily Democratic a chance to demonstrate their independence from Bush."

Sen. Menendez Faults Bush Budget For Burdening Middle Class. The AP (2/12, Gold) reports, "The budget proposed by President Bush adds to middle-class burdens while providing greater benefits for the wealthy and oil companies, Sen. Robert Menendez, D-N.J., said Saturday." Menendez said Bush's budget "will increase health insurance premiums and out-of-pocket costs through new schemes that will expand tax shelters for the healthy and the wealthy and drive up costs for the rest of us."

DOJ_NMG_0014273

Coburn's Unwillingness To Support Earmarks Noted. In his Washington Post column (2/12, B7), George Will profiles Sen. Tom Coburn, the "most dangerous creature that can come to the Senate, someone simply uninterested in being popular. When House Speaker Dennis Hastert defends earmarks -- spending dictated by individual legislators for specific projects -- by saying that a member of Congress knows best where a stoplight ought to be placed, Coburn, in an act of lese-majeste, responds: Members of Congress are the least qualified to make such judgments." Coburn "came to the nation's attention last October when he proposed taking the $223 million earmarked for Alaska's 'Bridge to Nowhere' and using it to repair a New Orleans bridge destroyed by Hurricane Katrina." Because this "threat to Alaska also threatened Congress's code of comity -- mutual respect for everyone's parochial interests -- his proposal lost by 67 votes. But rather than do the decent thing -- apologize, tug his forelock and slink away chastened -- he refused to stop talking about it, made it an embarrassment to the Senate and catalyzed revulsion against spending that is both promiscuous and parochial."

Deficit Reduction Bill Includes Provision That Hikes Student Loan Interest Rates. ABC World News Tonight (2/11, story 6, 2:45, Avila) reported, "A warning for the college bound. Lock in your loan now, because the cost of money you borrow to pay for school is going up. This week, the government changed the rules for Federal loan programs. While students and parents can borrow more money, they will also face higher interest rates." ABC (Yang) added, "President Bush says the global economy means that America has to haven educated work force in order to remain competitive. But the President and the Republican Congress this week made going to college a little bit more expensive for millions of students." While a provision of the deficit reduction bill "makes more money available to more students, it raises interest rates on some loans by as much as 2%. That's on top of rising college costs, up 46% over the last five years." In his budget proposal, "Mr. Bush said he wanted to freeze Pell Grants, the money that goes to low income students. That proposal is already drawing opposition from both Republicans and Democrats in Congress."

And the AP (2/12, Gold) notes that in the Democratic weekend radio address Sen. Robert Menendez "said Bush's budget for 2007, released Monday, would increase college costs 'by locking in the largest student aid cut in the history of our nation.'"

User Fee Increases In Bush Budget Face Opposition. The AP (2/12, Taylor) reports, "President Bush hates new taxes, that's for sure. But tell that to airline passengers, higher-income veterans and owners of freighters using the St. Lawrence Seaway. They are among those hit up for billions of dollars under his new budget plan." Bush's budget "contains $3.5 billion in new user fees" which "would swell to $47.2 billion over five years, dunning taxpayers and industry to help pay for government services." But most "arrived on Capitol Hill dead as a doornail" because they "mostly are proposals rejected in the past."

Opponents Of Social Security Reform Surprised By Inclusion In Bush Budget. The Washington Times (2/12, Fagan, 90K) reports, "Opponents of President Bush's Social Security personal accounts plan were jolted into action last week when the proposal showed up in Mr. Bush's newest budget request." Bush "didn't push for it in his State of the Union address last month, instead calling for a bipartisan commission to study how best to reform the system -- a move that 'relieved' Democratic opponents of the plan such as Sen. Charles E. Schumer." Yet "that relief quickly dissipated Monday, opponents said, when they discovered Mr. Bush's 2007 budget proposal mentioned the plan." And "Republicans said Congress won't act on the proposal during this already highly charged election year." One House GOP leadership aide said that "it would be difficult for us to tackle this in a partisan election atmosphere." The Times notes, "Democrats said it was contradictory for Mr. Bush to suggest a bipartisan panel to explore various reform ideas while continuing to push his own plan." But "White House spokesman Trent Duffy disagreed, saying Mr. Bush's budget 'simply reiterated what he said all of last year' about his Social Security plan, and 'doesn't color in any way' the outcome of the bipartisan commission."

Brownstein Says Entitlement Reform Will Take Bipartisan Effort. Ron Brownstein in his column in the Los Angeles Times (2/12, 958K) writes that the failure of the 1995 Kerrey-Danforth entitlement commission "should caution President Bush, who pledged in his State of the Union address to appoint yet another commission on entitlements. A commission can be useful only if it recognizes that at this point, the solution to the entitlement problem doesn't require an intellectual breakthrough. It demands something even more rare these days: a political accommodation between the parties." Democrats need to agree to spending cuts and Republicans tax increases, but even then "Washington won't tame the entitlement problem without also slowing the overall increase in healthcare costs. … That won't happen without comprehensive healthcare reform, an issue Washington hasn't addressed since the collapse of Clinton's universal coverage plan in 1994.

Students Ignore Option To Benefit From NCLB Tutoring Program. The New York Times (2/12, A1, Saulny, 1.19M) in a front page story reports, "Four years after President Bush signed the landmark No Child Left Behind education law, vast numbers of students are not getting the tutoring that the law offers as one of its hallmarks." In New York City, "fewer than half of the 215,000 eligible students sought the free tutoring." And "New York's participation rate is better than the national average: across the country, roughly two million public school students were eligible for free tutoring in the school year that ended in 2004, according to the most recent data from the Department of Education, yet only 226,000 -- or nearly 12 percent -- received help." Educators "give multiple reasons for the problems: that the program is allotted too little federal money, is poorly advertised to parents, has too much complicated paperwork for signing up, and that it has not fully penetrated the most difficult neighborhoods, where there are high concentrations of poor, failing students."

DOJ_NMG_0014274

Maryland Schools Face NCLB Deadline. The Washington Post (2/12, C1, Anderson, 744K) reports, "It has been eight years since Maryland told the Prince George's County school to shape up, or else. It has been four years since the federal government raised the pressure with a law meant to force shake-ups through aid and sanctions." But, "Charles Carroll Middle School has continued to fall short of state standards, even though the county has switched textbooks, changed principals three times and even assigned a 'turnaround specialist.'" Now "Maryland faces a question posed by the No Child Left Behind law: What happens when a school reaches the end of the line?" The Post notes, "Last week, the Bush administration offered one answer. It proposed $100 million to help parents with children in last-stage public schools move them to private schools or obtain tutoring. The proposal riled school-voucher opponents but underscored the issue's growing urgency."

House Republicans Meet In Cambridge, Maryland For Retreat. The New York Times (2/12, Hulse, 1.19M) reports House Republicans "descended in force upon" Cambridge, Maryland "for three days to ponder their political and policy future and ended up talking about 'the Force.'" At a retreat "intended to help them regain their footing after a corruption scandal and a leadership shake-up, about 180 lawmakers were treated to a film spoof that portrayed Republicans as the 'Star Wars' heroes being pursued by the evil Democratic empire led by 'Darth Nancy.' That would be" House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi. The "short video, produced by the National Republican Congressional Committee, had the audience in stitches, according to those on hand. But it was also a tacit admission that House Republicans are in for an epic battle this November as they try to retain their majority in a midterm election cycle that has historically meant Congressional losses for the party in power." New Majority Leader Rep. John Boehner, "who served in the leadership during the heady days of the Republican takeover in 1994, put a lot of stock in the retreat's potential. After his election, he helped restructure the conference, saying he wanted to provide individual lawmakers with more opportunity to vent and voice their ambitions after years of top-down management of the House."

Boehner's Positions On Several Issues At Variance With Those Of Caucus. The Washington Post (2/12, A7, Weisman, 744K) reports that as Rep. Boehner "moves to unite his fractious House Republicans," he has "another issue to finesse: his own views on some key issues, which have clashed with the stance of much of the Republican Party. From illegal immigration to sanctions on China to an overhaul of the pension system, Boehner, as chairman of the House Committee on Education and the Workforce, took ardently pro-business positions that were contrary to those of many in his party. Religious conservatives -- examining his voting record -- see him as a policymaker driven by small-government economic concerns, not theirs." In the coming months, Boehner "must decide whether to stick to his well-established beliefs and try to bend his party's stance or give in to the majority of the majority party." In an interview, Boehner "vowed to lead by consensus," but he "also stood by his positions, especially on a tough illegal immigration bill that passed in December with overwhelming Republican support over Boehner's opposition." One provision "would mandate that every business verify the legality of every employee through the federal terrorism watch list and a database of Social Security numbers. For the bill's authors, the measure is central to choking off illegal immigrants' employment opportunities. To business groups and Boehner, it is unworkable."

With Boehner As Majority Leader, Luntz Is Out Of Favor. The Washington Post (2/12, A5, Cillizza, 744K) reports that at the House GOP retreat, Republican pollster Frank Luntz "was on the original schedule to make a presentation -- but he did not." Luntz said that "he was not disinvited from the retreat, only that his presentation was rescheduled." Sean Spicer, "a spokesman for House Republican Conference Chairman Deborah Pryce (Ohio), confirmed that Luntz did not appear at the retreat but will address House Republicans on Wednesday." But according to "several Republican party strategists, newly elected Majority Leader John A. Boehner (Ohio) made it clear to members that if Luntz was going to the retreat, he wouldn't be in attendance." Luntz was "instrumental in the creation of the 'Contract With America' -- the document widely credited with delivering Republicans the House majority in 1994. Boehner's relationship (or lack thereof) with the pollster goes back -- at least -- to late 1998, when Boehner was seeking to hold onto his job as House GOP Conference chairman." Days before the GOP caucus "met to hold leadership elections, Boehner appeared on several Sunday talk shows making clear that he and Gingrich had often parted ways on strategy. Luntz said at the time that Boehner made a 'big mistake' by criticizing Gingrich, and he heaped praise on Rep. J.C. Watts (Okla.), who was challenging Boehner for the conference chairmanship. Watts beat Boehner -- throwing the Ohioan unceremoniously out of leadership."

DOJ_NMG_0014275

Bush, Abramoff Appear In Same Photo. The CBS Evening News (2/11, story 3, :30, Mitchell) reported, "A photograph of President Bush in the company of disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff is posted on the Time magazine web site tonight. The photograph show Mr. Bush with his back to the camera, meeting a native American tribal chief in the executive office building back in May 2001. Jack Abramoff can be seen looking on from the background. President Bush has said he does not remember ever meeting with Abramoff."

Time (2/12, Zagroin, Cooper) reports the White House "has continued to assert that the President had no recollection of ever meeting Abramoff. When TIME reported in January that it had viewed unpublished photographs of Abramoff with Bush, aides responded that the pictures meant nothing since the President is photographed with thousands of supporters and White House visitors every year." Now, "finally, the first such photo has come to light. It shows a bearded Abramoff in the background as Bush greets an Abramoff client, Raul Garza, who was then the chairman of the Kickapoo Traditional Tribe of Texas; Bush senior advisor Karl Rove looks on. The photograph was provided to TIME by Mr. Garza." The meeting "took place in the Eisenhower Executive Office Building adjacent to the White House on May 9, 2001." White House Press Secretary Scott McClellan "said the White House had still found no record of Abramoff's presence but confirmed that it is Abramoff in the picture." This meeting, "however, was a relatively small gathering attended by some two dozen people, including Garza and another Indian tribal leader who was Abramoff's client. At least two tribes, the Coushatta of Louisiana and the Mississippi Band of Choctaw, contributed $25,000 each to the anti-tax group Americans for Tax Reform, which is headed by Grover Norquist, a well-known conservative ally of the White House."

The New York Times (2/12, Shenon, Bergman, 1.19M) reports the "first photograph to be published of the two men shows a small, partly obscured image of Mr. Abramoff looking on from the background as Mr. Bush greets a Texas Indian chief in May 2001. By itself, the picture hardly seems worthy of the White House's efforts to keep it out of the public eye." Abramoff "is little more than a blurry, bearded figure in the background at a gathering of about two dozen people. But it provides a window, albeit an opaque one, into Mr. Abramoff's efforts to sell himself to Indian tribes as a man of influence who could open the most secure doors in Washington to them. And it leaves unanswered questions about how Mr. Abramoff and the tribal leader, whom he was trying to sign as a client, gained access to a meeting with the president on the White House grounds that was ostensibly for a group of state legislators who were supporting Mr. Bush's 2001 tax cut plan."

The Washington Post/Bloomberg (2/12, A4) reports White House spokesman Scott McClellan "told Time that the photo does not change anything. 'The president has taken countless, tens of thousands of pictures at home and abroad over the last five years,' McClellan told Time. 'A photo like this has no relevance to the Justice Department's investigation.'" The AFP (2/12) reports the "publication of the photo came amid a mushrooming scandal of influence-peddling in Washington, and threatened to raise fresh questions about Abramoff's link to the Republican administration."

Leadership PACs Seen As Loophole For Members Of Congress. The Minneapolis Star Tribune (2/12, Talev, 424K) reports Alaska Rep. Don Young "gained notoriety last year as the chairman of the House Transportation Committee who secured more than $200 million for a 'bridge to nowhere' in his home state." But what was "less noticed was the Republican's support for projects elsewhere in the country favored by contributors to Midnight Sun, a political action committee." Young's leadership PAC, Midnight Sun's "treasurer is a lobbyist with a client list that includes transportation interests." In southeast Arkansas, "more than a dozen men and women connected to road paving and auto sales in and near Pine Bluff gave about $28,000 last March to Midnight Sun, on top of about $20,000 to Young's reelection committee. When the highway bill passed a few months later, it had more than $200 million for their region over the next five years." Many campaign finance experts "see leadership PACs as part of the problem, a way to skirt campaign limits and hide special-interest ties." But few lawmakers "want to clamp down on a fundraising vehicle that is being increasingly relied on by politicians as other contribution limits have kicked in."

Crime Fighting Strategies Seen As Useful For Congressional Reform. In his Washington Post column (2/12, B1), Michael Grunwald says that with the falling crime rate, "nobody argues anymore that bad neighborhoods are doomed" except for one "here in Washington. It is enduring a crime wave unparalleled in recent memory, and even though its leaders are making noises about cleaning it up, many experts remain skeptical that its culture of recidivism can be reformed. Then again, the neighborhood in question, the U.S. Congress, has always inspired skepticism." As "new pay-for-policy allegations emerge about representatives with made-for-cartoon names like Doolittle, DeLay and Ney, conventional wisdom is congealing around the notion that Congress is what it is, and can't be changed. But that was once conventional wisdom about New York, too." Grunwald then considers several crime reduction strategies such as more visible Justice Department and Federal Election Commission enforcement presence on Capitol Hill.

DOJ_NMG_0014276

DeLay Resumes Appropriations Committee Seat. The Houston Chronicle (2/12, Levine, 581K) reports Rep. Tom DeLay, R-Sugar Land, "is officially back on the House committee that oversees how the federal government spends its money. After giving up his post as House majority leader in January after a lobbying scandal and his indictment on campaign finance charges, DeLay last week regained his seat on the House Appropriations Committee." Now back "as a rank-and-file member, the lawmaker was assigned to two subcommittees — the panels that oversee the NASA budget and several federal agencies, including Justice, State and Homeland Security. His district includes the Johnson Space Center." DeLay, who has "never chaired a subcommittee and is not slated to do so now, will be among the most senior members of the panel."

Poll Shows 45% Think Bush Treated Same As Other Presidents By Media. The Houston Chronicle (2/12, Mason, 581K) in its "White House Watch" column notes, "A new CBS News/New York Times poll found that 45 percent of Americans asked think Bush gets about the same treatment from the media as other presidents." It also "found that 35 percent said reporters are tougher on him than on other presidents, and 18 percent said Bush has it easier. It would be interesting to hear what Bill Clinton thinks of these perceptions." Clinton "made a stop by the press cabin last week on Air Force One -- something Bush has done only once."

Hagel Independence From Bush May Prove Attractive To Conservatives. The New York Times Magazine (2/12, Lelyveld) in a lengthy examination of Sen. Chuck Hagel's prospects in a potential 2008 presidential campaign highlights Hagel's opposition to President Bush, in particular on Iraq. But on domestic issue Hagel also "broke with his party leadership to vote against the new prescription-drug program under Medicare, the No Child Left Behind bill and a big farm bill stuffed with incentives for corporate agriculture. Each, he felt, was ill conceived in practical terms and unwarranted as an expansion of federal mandates and spending. Only on the Bush tax cuts -- all of which he has supported -- has he been deaf to warnings about the consequences for the federal deficit. (Though, he says, he'd never take 'the pledge' to oppose any and all tax hikes.)" ACU chairman David Keene noted "that Hagel has taken a more conservative position than the Bush administration every time he has broken with it on a major issue." One "issue that could propel him into the campaign is not one on which candidacies normally rise or fall. Call it the issue of competence." But "while he doesn't exactly say that the current administration has been careless and incompetent, that theme cries out between the lines of much of what he does say. After the botched reconstruction of Iraq and the nonchalant response to the hurricane on the Gulf Coast, it's not a stretch to hear an implied critique when he says, as he did talking to local reporters in Ames, Iowa, last fall, that the president should 'stay focused on governing the country' and 'reach out to Congress.'"

Frist Seen As Distancing Himself From Bush. Robert Novak in his syndicated column (2/12) writes, "In recent national television appearances, Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist backed away from unequivocal support of President Bush in what Republican insiders viewed as preparation for a 2008 presidential run." Novak notes, "On NBC's 'Meet the Press' Jan. 29, Frist said, 'I would have probably put more troops in [Iraq] if the decision had been up to me.' He said the White House is not cooperating with Hurricane Katrina investigations by Congress. As for the Bush budget, he said: 'We are spending too much in Washington, D.C.' He suggested his and the White House's position in the Terri Schiavo case was wrong. On NBC's 'Today' program the next day, when asked about the administration's National Guard policy, Frist replied: 'I am opposed to cutting the Guard myself.'"

McCain Seeks Support For 2008 Campaign From Bush Network. The Washington Post (2/12, A1, Balz, 744K) in a front page story reports, "With a 2008 campaign in the offing," Sen. John McCain "has begun an intensive courtship of Bush's financial and political networks. His recent travels included a December swing through the heart of Bush country in Texas that put him in front of many of the president's leading supporters there." While "Republicans look toward 2008 and worry about maintaining the White House, a streak of pragmatism has drawn them to look again at a man who often has been an antagonist of the president and party leaders." In preparation "of a likely campaign, he appears eager to reach accommodation with longtime GOP adversaries. He has undertaken the kind of practical steps necessary to enhance his chances of winning the nomination, focusing on organizations in states critical to winning the GOP nomination and building relationships with Republicans who rejected him in 2000."

McCain Supporters Encouraged By Criticism Of Obama. Robert Novak in his syndicated column (2/12) writes, "Key supporters of Sen. John McCain's prospective bid for the 2008 Republican presidential nomination were delighted by his outburst against Sen. Barack Obama, the rising Democratic superstar." Novak adds, "The downside of McCain's outburst, say his supporters, is that it strengthens the perception that he may be too hot-tempered to serve as president."

DOJ_NMG_0014277

Gingrich Gets Rousing Welcome At Conservative Conference. The AP (2/12, Lester) reports former Speaker Newt Gingrich "told cheering conservatives Saturday it is time to overhaul a balky, slow-moving government locked in the last century. Citing multiple government failures after Hurricane Katrina, the former House speaker said the government meltdown at all levels illustrated how badly government needs to be updated in all of its operations." Gingrich said, "The system failed, the city of New Orleans failed, the state of Louisiana failed and the government of the United States failed. When you see an American body on an American street sitting there for three days on television because the government can't collect the dead, something has failed." The Washington Times (2/12, 90K) also runs the AP story.

Congress Resists Smoking Bans. The New York Times (2/12, Kornblut, 1.19M) reports that when Washington's "citywide smoking ban takes effect here next month, at least one workplace in town will be spared: Congress, the beneficiary of a kind of diplomatic immunity for federal lawmakers." That is "excellent news" smokers such as Majority Leader John A. Boehner, cigar smoker Barney Frank, and struggling quitter Sherwood Boehlert. While the "rest of the country has turned against smoking with great zeal, Congress has stubbornly — some would say proudly — refused to bend. Smoking is still allowed in numerous indoor spaces in the Capitol, most noticeably in the gilded reception area where lawmakers crowd together during the long yeas and nays." Members are "uncharacteristically shy about discussing their smoking habits in a public domain where smoking is supposedly taboo." Yet in private, "some lawmakers have shown little desire to tamp down the addiction. In some corners, the right to smoke in Congress is seen as a last stand against political correctness, a bulwark against the antismoking fervor that swept the political universe during the Clinton years."

Rumsfeld Said To Have "Lost" In Effort To Change Pentagon Culture, Foreign Policy. In a Washington Post (2/12, B2, 744K) Outlook article reporter David Von Drehle says that if you "read closely in the barrage of weighty tomes" Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld and company "put out in recent days, you might discover that the Rumsfeld era is over, and Rumsfeld lost. The secretary had staked his tenure on two ideas. He wanted to change Pentagon culture, and he wanted the military to drive American foreign policy. Neither idea survived the week." First, the "signature effort of Rumsfeld's historic tenure -- his 'transformation' of the world's most powerful military -- melted away under the cover of the imposing Quadrennial Defense Review. In 92 dense pages it revealed that while America's troops will be called to perform new missions in countries around the globe, the entrenched forces in Washington, the contractors and the members of Congress, have survived Rumsfeld virtually unscathed." Another secret "hidden in plain sight in last week's $439 billion Pentagon request -- up nearly 7 percent from the wartime budget of fiscal 2006 -- was that the real sum is much higher. Military spending in the coming months will pass the half-trillion-dollar mark. That $439 billion doesn't include the ongoing costs of operations in Afghanistan and Iraq, for which the Pentagon will soon seek a 'supplemental appropriation' of at least $70 billion for the rest of this fiscal year and another $50 billion to start next year." Which "leads to last week's third secret. Iraq remains the urgent focus of America's largest deployed force; it is a key to U.S. foreign policy and determines the political terrain at home. But it has been reduced to the status of a troubled subsidiary in the corporate flow chart of Rumsfeld's Pentagon: off-budget for accounting purposes, and, apparently, incidental to future strategy."

OTHER NEWS:

Economic Reports May Prompt Stock Markets Sell-Offs. The New York Times (2/12, De Aenlle, 1.19M) reports Wall Street traders "will have a lot of information served to them this week, but in the opinion of Mike Williams, a strategist at Tocqueville Asset Management, they will find little of it palatable." Reports on "consumer activity (retail sales and consumer confidence), manufacturing (industrial production and capacity utilization) and the housing market (housing starts and building permits) will follow one another in quick succession, beginning on Tuesday." Williams "foresees readings ranging from neutral to favorable, showing a resumption of healthy economic growth after a subdued fourth quarter. But he is concerned that Wall Street will make the worst of a good situation and sell on the news."

Bull Market May Have Little Ground To Advance. The Los Angeles Times (2/12, Petruno, 958K) reports this "bull market hasn't surrendered much since it began more than three years ago. But that may be because it hasn't had a lot to give, at least in the case of blue-chip shares." The Standard & Poor's 500 index "lost 751 points, or 49%, in its slide from its record high on March 24, 2000, to its bear-market low of 776.76 on Oct. 9, 2002. Since the low, the index has recovered 490 points, or about two-thirds of what it lost." Historically, by the time "most bull markets have reached their fourth year they've recouped all of the previous bear-market loss, says Sam Stovall, investment strategist at S&P in New York. The cautious tone of this advance may be a big reason the S&P hasn't experienced as much as a 10% correction, or short-term pullback, in three years, Stovall says."

DOJ_NMG_0014278

Full Employment Seen As Worthy Economic Goal. The New York Times (2/12, Uchitelle, 1.19M) reports many Americans "may not realize full employment was once a hotly pursued goal — a condition considered so important that many politicians wanted it legislated and not left to chance." These are "radical concepts today. Fear of another depression prompted the first debate, in the mid-1940's, and a steep recession contributed to the second, in the mid-1970's. Both bills, as finally enacted, failed to achieve their original goal. And as inflation rose in the late 70's, government shifted to fighting it, often at the expense of employment." Out of the "second Congressional debate came not full employment but a fear of it. The law that Congress finally enacted, the Humphrey-Hawkins Act of 1978, set full employment as a goal — along with low inflation. Soon, however, each was viewed as the enemy of the other and full employment, defined as the right to a job, lost out." The "late-90's hiring boom, approaching full employment, has lingered fondly in public memory. And now that the unemployment rate is falling once more — it dropped two-tenths of a percentage point last month, to 4.7 percent, its lowest level in four and a half years — there is talk again of somehow bringing back, if not full employment, then at least the late 90's version of it."

New Space Race Underway. The Los Angeles Times (2/12, Johnson, 958K) reports, "Thirty-four years after the last Apollo astronaut walked on the lunar surface, a new space race is underway. It will be a long race, with humans unlikely to set foot on the moon again in the next 10 to 15 years. But countries are gearing up to take their first steps." India's "20,000 space workers are readying a lunar orbital mission set for 2007. Japan plans to send a robotic rover to the lifeless rock by 2013, and the European Space Agency has a probe, SMART-1, orbiting the moon." Although many countries "are talking about sending people to the moon, only two, the United States and China, have set dates for manned lunar landings. NASA says its next manned mission will be as early as 2018; China says it wants to land 'taikonauts' — as Chinese astronauts are called — as early as 2017." Each country is "going for its own reasons — some commercial, some strategic, some for national pride. But if the plans come to fruition, the moon could become a busy extraterrestrial outpost for scientists, engineers and possibly ordinary citizens in the coming decades. It would also serve as a vital way station for man's long-dreamed-of trip to Mars." And "leading the way is the only country that has set foot there before, the United States."

Romney Tied For Third In Michigan 2008 Poll. The Boston Globe (2/12, Easton, 484K) in its "Washington Briefing" column notes, "On the Romney '08 front, a new Strategic Vision poll shows the Massachusetts governor tied for third with Newt Gingrich and George Allen among Michigan Republican voters asked to consider prospective presidential candidates." The leaders, "John McCain, at 37 percent, and Rudolph Giuliani, at 25 percent. Michigan -- Mitt Romney's childhood home and the state his father governed -- is considered key to a potential presidential run."

Warner Faces Hurdles In Building Name Recognition. The Washington Post (2/12, A9, Shear, 744K) reports, "A lot has changed for Mark R. Warner since he left behind the Virginia governorship and his 80 percent approval ratings to begin mulling a presidential campaign." Yet, "perhaps nothing more than this: At just 3 percent in a recent poll asking Democrats nationwide to rate their presidential preference, Warner has become an unknown overnight." So "Warner's purpose in New Hampshire is serious." Warner will "likely to be competing with such superstars as Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), who was preferred by more than 10 times as many Democratic voters in a CNN poll, and Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.), who received more than 59 million votes in the 2004 presidential election." Similar to Sen. Chuck Hagel, Warner has made competence a theme, saying Republicans have "pushed competence to the side and made partisan loyalty the standard."

In a more positive story, Knight Ridder (2/12, Thomma) says Warner's message in New Hampshire that he's won in a "red state" and has a strong management style was well received "among party activists considering which candidate they'll work for." Former Rep. Dick Swett said, "Those in the know have a very high opinion of him." But "Warner only has the support of 2 percent of New Hampshire Democrats in a new poll, well back in the pack and far behind presumed frontrunner Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York."

Kerry Has Over $9M Left Over From 2004 Campaign. The Boston Globe (2/12, Easton, 484K) in its "Washington Briefing" column notes, "Last week The Briefing understated Senator John Kerry's campaign war chest. In addition to nearly $800,000 in his PAC and Senate committee, Kerry has $9.1 million left over from his 2004 primary campaign account." His aides say since the 2004 campaign Kerry "has doled out $3 million to Democratic candidates and organizations."

DOJ_NMG_0014279

Pennsylvania GOP Endorses Swann For Governor. The Washington Post/AP (2/12, A4, Press) reports, "Pennsylvania's Republican Party leaders endorsed former Pittsburgh Steelers star Lynn Swann for governor Saturday, virtually guaranteeing that he will be the candidate to face Democratic incumbent Ed Rendell this fall." He won on "a unanimous voice vote during a meeting of the 300-plus-member Republican State Committee at a downtown hotel."

The Philadelphia Inquirer (2/12, Couloumbis, 423K) notes, "RNC chairman Ken Mehlman last week "said the national committee will send staff to Pennsylvania by the end of the month to help in the governor's race and U.S. Sen. Rick Santorum's reelection. 'We intend to work very hard with both campaigns,' he added." The Inquirer states, "It is a politically enviable position to be in." Observers say Swann "snagged the state GOP's favored-son status not because party heads came together to decide he was the best candidate to beat Rendell -- but because rank-and-file party members liked him, and rallied behind him." The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (2/12, Barnes, 261K) also reports on Swann's endorsement.

Steele Offers Qualified Support For Stem Cell Research. The Washington Post (2/12, C3, Marimow, 744K) reports, "Maryland Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele expressed qualified support yesterday for embryonic stem cell research, just days after causing an uproar by linking the science to medical experimentation during the Holocaust." He "used a radio interview to try to distance himself from the dust-up and expand his views on the controversial research. He offered several conditions of his support and gave one example of a type of research that some leading scientists in the field say is not practical at this point." He "cited research at the National Institutes of Health, which he said involved scientists extracting the cells they need 'without destroying the embryo.'" Yet, "several leading stem cell researchers…have said that technique is impractical for now."

Steele Silent On Top Issues. The Baltimore Sun (2/12, Skalka, 296K) reports, "Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele announced his bid for U.S. Senate in October with a promise to be a different kind of candidate, to build bridges between citizens and government and to be a voice for all Marylanders." But "with debates raging on a series of national and state issues -- including the appointment of a new Supreme Court justice and the revision of minimum-wage laws -- Steele has stayed out of the fray." Steele said, "I don't need to talk about issues right now. … I need to establish a relationship with voters." But his "strategy of silence faltered last week when he compared embryonic stem cell research to the experiments done by Nazi doctors -- a flub that exposed him to harsh criticism, left him struggling to formulate a clear position on a politically vexing issue and led critics to question whether he had sufficient seasoning to ascend to the Senate."

Santorum, Casey Take Advantage Of Subsidized Air Travel. The Philadelphia Inquirer (2/12, Budoff, 423K) reports, "It's a tempting offer for the time-strapped elected official: fly by private jet, courtesy of a corporation, without the hassle of long lines and lost luggage." The Inquirer notes, "Sen. Rick Santorum (R., Pa.) took advantage of the perk 10 times in the last two years, paying more than $18,000 -- a fraction of the true cost of the flights -- to six companies with legislative interests before Congress, according to campaign-finance documents." Santorum's Democratic challenger, state Treasurer Robert Casey Jr., has called for closing the air travel loophole, but he also "had already charged through the loophole by accepting a jet ride from the Texas law firm of Baron & Budd in June to raise money and later repaying only the cost of a first-class ticket."

Minnesota Senate Race Attracts National Attention. The Minneapolis Star Tribune (2/12, Lopez, 424K) reports, "Minnesota voters this fall will fill one of the nation's few open seats in the U.S. Senate, and the 2006 contest already is attracting the money and attention of the rich and powerful across the country." Yet, "instead of the prize provoking a bloody free-for-all among Minnesota's most ambitious politicians, the field has cleared out early in both leading parties, with candidates dropping out and many high-profile names never entering." That "dearth of contestants may reflect national parties' and interest groups' increasingly aggressive intervention in Minnesota politics." As the election approaches "Minnesota voters are almost certain to see both a parade of big names and a blitz of national ads, many likely to be sponsored by organizations other than the candidates themselves." But currently the only candidates "are Hennepin County Attorney Amy Klobuchar and veterinarian Ford Bell on the DFL side and Republican Sixth District U.S. Rep. Mark Kennedy, who was anointed early on by GOP leaders and who faces only token opposition from retired minister Harold Shudlick."

Danforth Worries Religious Conservatives Taking Over GOP. The CBS Evening News (2/11, story 9, 3:15, Mitchell) reported, "It appears sometimes that issues of faith and politics are dividing Americans more frequently than ever. And one senior figure with a foot in both camps believes it's no accident. For tonight's weekend journal, Bill Whitaker talks to the Senate veteran who is known far and wide as St. Jack." Former Sen. John Danforth: "I am concerned about the Republican Party becoming in essence the party of the Christian conservatives." CBS (Whitaker) added, "This is no Republican basher speaking. It's party stalwart John Danforth, a lifelong Republican with rock solid conservative credentials." But, "now this faithful Republican is worried about the direction his party is taking." Danforth: "It makes the party seem exclusive, and I think it makes American politics meaner." Whitaker: "How did he come to this?" Danforth: "I was appalled by the Terri Schiavo case." Whitaker: "Seeing Republicans, who traditionally had stood for keeping government off citizens' backs, in this case pushing the Federal Government into such a personal affair." Whitaker: "Danforth's brother died of Lou Gehrig's disease, one of the many scientists believe stem cell research might cure. He's campaigning to convince Missouri to allow the research." Danforth: "I want cures to be found. They would say that cells in a petri dish are morally equivalent to an 11-year-old child. It is a statement based solely on a religious point of view."

DOJ_NMG_0014280

Fish Says "Liberal Religion" Means Beliefs Not Taken Seriously. In a New York Times op-ed (2/12), Florida International University law professor Stanley Fish addresses the controversy caused by the publication of caricatures of Mohammed in the Danish and later European media, adding that the "first tenet of the liberal religion is that everything (at least in the realm of expression and ideas) is to be permitted, but nothing is to be taken seriously. This is managed by the familiar distinction — implied in the First Amendment's religion clause — between the public and private spheres. It is in the private sphere — the personal spaces of the heart, the home and the house of worship — that one's religious views are allowed full sway and dictate behavior." But in "the public sphere, the argument goes, one's religious views must be put forward with diffidence and circumspection. You can still have them and express them — that's what separates us from theocracies and tyrannies — but they should be worn lightly. Not only must there be no effort to make them into the laws of the land, but they should not be urged on others in ways that make them uncomfortable. What religious beliefs are owed — and this is a word that appears again and again in the recent debate — is 'respect'; nothing less, nothing more."

Robertson's Gaffes Draw Increasing Scrutiny. The Los Angeles Times (2/12, Fiore, 958K) profiles televangelist Pat Robertson, whose "famous fundraising prowess that has made him one of the world's most recognizable and influential televangelists. But lately the charismatic broadcaster is better known for something else — a series of controversial and incendiary remarks that have foisted him into the news. And the limelight has not been flattering." Robertson's "evangelical peers have branded him 'arrogant' for his comments, and students at the Christian university he founded worry that his candor could damage their school's credibility. The political left eagerly monitors his appearances on his spirits-raising morning show. What they find becomes fodder for talk-show monologues." Outspokenness "is nothing new" for Robertson, but "at age 75, and freed from the need to marshal political capital, Robertson seems even less restrained than ever. His verbal grenades sound more like bombs, and even those in the evangelical community are noticing."

Remote West Texas To Get Public Radio Station. The New York Times (2/12, Novovitch, 1.19M) reports "far West Texas, a 20,000-square-mile area," has been "been barren of broadcasting except for a few pirate stations and two small, low-wattage operations. A 100,000-watt station, the strongest FM signal allowed, with call letters KRTS (93.5 on the dial), will sign on Monday at 4 p.m. Central time when Dan Rather, the former CBS anchor and a native Texan, flips a switch, says a few ceremonial words then cuts away to the National Public Radio program 'All Things Considered.'" Marfa Public Radio "will be the first radio station offering national and world news to far West Texas, with a potential 50,000 listeners, counting travelers and residents, according to its president." Though Marfa "may seem an unlikely home for public radio," the "vast, sparsely populated region in recent years has attracted urban refugees who live or vacation here. Local residents had tried for decades to bring public radio to the area, but it was the influx of outsiders that helped them finally start a station."

Gore's Daughter Profiles Groundbreaking Women In New Book. The New York Times (2/12, Starr, 1.19M) reports Karenna Gore Schiff "a lawyer and former journalist, played a central role in Gore's 2000 presidential campaign. In 'Lighting the Way: Nine Women Who Changed Modern America,' Schiff writes that she decided to profile women who had spearheaded progressive change in part to mitigate the pain of that election loss."

Iran Threatens To Abandon Nonproliferation Treaty. The New York Times (2/12, Fathi, 1.19M) reports, "Iran's president warned on Saturday that Iran could withdraw from the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty if international pressure increased over its nuclear program. His threat was a significant escalation of the government's previous position that it would only stop complying with spot inspections of military installations and sites it has not declared to be part of its nuclear program." President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad told "tens of thousand of demonstrators who had gathered to mark the 27th anniversary of the Islamic revolution" that "The Islamic Republic has continued its program within the framework of the International Atomic Energy Agency and the nonproliferation treaty. ... But if we see that you want to use the NPT regulations to deprive us of our rights, know that the people will revise their policy in this regard. ... I ask our dear people to prepare themselves for a great struggle. Fasten your seat belts and pull up your sleeves."

DOJ_NMG_0014281

UN Equipment Removed From Sites. The Washington Times/AP (2/12, Karimi) reports that "diplomats in Europe said the UN nuclear watchdog agency had stripped most of its surveillance equipment from Iranian nuclear sites. The diplomats, who asked for anonymity in exchange for revealing the confidential developments, said President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's threat was part of retaliatory measures announced by Iran that have left the International Atomic Energy Agency with only the most basic means to monitor Iran's nuclear activities."

US Planning Iran Attacks, UK Paper Reports. AFP (2/12) reports, "US military strategists are reportedly drawing up plans for an attack on Iran as a last resort to stop the Islamic republic from developing nuclear weapons. In a front-page dispatch from Washington, the Sunday Telegraph newspaper in London said Central Command and Strategic Command planners were 'identifying targets, assessing weapon-loads and working on logistics for an operation.' The planners are reporting to the office of Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld with a view to having a military option if diplomatic efforts fail to put the brakes on Iran's suspected quest for nuclear weaponry. 'This is more than just the standard military contingency assessment,' the Sunday Telegraph quoted a senior Pentagon adviser as saying. 'This has taken on much greater urgency in recent months.'"

Experts Caution That Iran "Prepared To Retaliate" The Boston Globe (2/12, Bender, 484K) reports, "Iran is prepared to launch attacks using long-range missiles, secret commando units, and terrorist allies planted around the globe in retaliation for any strike on the country's nuclear facilities, according to new US intelligence assessments and military specialists." Military and intelligence analysts "warn that Iran -- which a recent US intelligence report described as 'more confident and assertive' than it has been since the early days of the 1979 Islamic revolution -- could unleash reprisals across the region, and perhaps even inside the United States, if the hard-line regime came under attack."

Khatami Predicts Higher Oil Prices If UN Sanctions Hit Iran. AFP (2/11) reported, "Former Iranian president Mohammad Khatami has warned of a rise in world oil prices if the United Nations imposes sanctions on Tehran over its disputed nuclear program. 'Currently the price of each barrel of oil is $70, and this high price has created many difficulties for the industrialized world," Khatami told reporters on the sidelines of an international conference on Islam and the West. 'The first effect of a sanction against Iran will be that this high price will even increase higher.'"

Muslim Protests Over Mohammed Cartoons Continue To Spread. The protests over the caricatures of the prophet Mohammed continue to spread in the Islamic world, and Denmark recalled its diplomats from Indonesia over fears of violence. NBC Nightly News (2/11, story 4, 2:20, Friesen) reported the Danes are "proud of their reputation as peace-loving and liberal-minded. Astonished, they're now the focus of so much Muslim rage." There was "more anger on the streets. In London and across Europe, the rallies noisy, but peaceful. Though in Indonesia, the mood is so hostile, today, Danish diplomats pulled out. They left Syria and Iran too as what officials described as concrete and serious threats. Iran's President asked why it's all right to insult Islam, but a crime to question the Holocaust? At the Olympics, Denmark's team is now under tight security, three-plainclothes guards escorting them yesterday. This is the worst political crisis Denmark has faced since the Second World War, made worse by emails and text messages spreading rumors and lies about the country through the Muslim world. One claiming Danes were burning the Koran in Copenhagen's main square. Danes have been told to avoid travel to Muslim countries. 15,000 people are canceling trips."

The CBS Evening News (2/11, story 5, :20, Mitchell) reported, "Denmark today pulled its diplomats out of Iran and Indonesia as Muslim protests over political cartoons satirizing the prophet Mohammed continued. Hundreds of Muslims in Jakarta, into their second week of protest there. In Paris, about 7,000 Muslims protested against French papers that reestablished the Danish caricatures. Thousands have also filled London's Trafalgar square in another peaceful protest."

Iran Blames US, Europe Over Offensive Cartoon. The AP (2/12, Karimi) reports, "Iran's hard-line president on Saturday accused the United States and Europe of being 'hostages of Zionism' and said they should pay a heavy price for the publication of caricatures of the Prophet Muhammad that have triggered worldwide protests." In a speech marking the 27th anniversary of the Islamic Revolution Saturday, Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad was quoted as saying, "Now in the West insulting the prophet is allowed, but questioning the Holocaust is considered a crime. ... We ask, why do you insult the prophet? The response is that it is a matter of freedom, while in fact they (who insult the founder of Islam) are hostages of the Zionists. And the people of the US and Europe should pay a heavy price for becoming hostages to Zionists." In its coverage, the Washington Post (2/12, A24, Jordan, 744K) notes, "Thousands of Muslims in London and other European cities rallied peacefully Saturday to condemn both published cartoons of the prophet Muhammad and the violent reactions to them. Men and women, some pushing babies in strollers, crowded into Trafalgar Square as speakers not only denounced the cartoons as an unacceptable insult to the holiest figure in Islam, but also condemned the burning of embassies in Syria and Lebanon, deaths in Afghanistan and other violence that has come in response."

DOJ_NMG_0014282

Danish Diplomats Leave Iran, Indonesia. The Washington Times (2/12, Dispatches, 90K) reports, "Denmark said yesterday it had withdrawn diplomats and staff from Indonesia and Iran because of security threats, while Muslims held demonstrations in European cities and elsewhere over cartoons of the prophet Muhammad. Denmark ... warned Danes to leave Indonesia, saying they faced a 'significant and imminent danger' from an extremist group." The AP (2/12, Ritter) notes that Denmark's ambassador to Syria also was withdrawn, adding, "Danish embassy buildings in all three countries had been targeted by angry mobs protesting the publication of the caricatures in September."

In "Liberal Denmark," Cartoon Crisis Prompts Identity Crisis. The New York Times (2/12, Bilefsky, 1.19M) reports, "Ater rioting that has raged for weeks across the Muslim world after a Danish newspaper's publishing of caricatures of the Prophet Muhammad, Denmark has sunk even more deeply into an identity crisis. A country that once prided itself on having Europe's most open immigration policies and a generous welfare state is grappling with how to preserve its vaunted liberalism while remaining Danish. 'The furor over the cartoons has been a wake-up call for Danes,' says Flemming Rose, the cultural editor of the paper, Jyllands-Posten. ... 'We are used to seeing ourselves as a permissive and open society on the side of the good, and it is shocking to see Danes as objects of hate.'"

Philadelphia Paper Picketed Over Cartoon. The Philadelphia Inquirer (2/12, Fifield, Bahadur, 423K) reports, "Hundreds of Muslims chanted and carried banners and signs outside the Inquirer-Daily News Building yesterday, protesting The Inquirer's decision to reprint a caricature of the prophet Muhammad. Many said they thought that the paper had defamed their religion by publishing an image that has angered Muslims across the world and resulted in mass protests and the burning of Western embassies. Many Muslims consider any depiction of Muhammad to be sacrilegious." Meanwhile, the Pittsburgh Post-Gazette's (2/12,) Ann McFeatters notes, "The inflamed passions, violence and false allegations stoked by some sophomoric cartoons satirizing the revered Mohammed, such as one with his headdress drawn as a bomb with a lit fuse, first published four months ago in a Danish newspaper, should worry every rational human. It is not farfetched that the religious fervor of outraged Islamic fundamentalists could ignite even more hatred that would take generations to wipe out."

In its coverage, the Dallas Morning News (2/12, Weiss) reports, "The worldwide furor over anti-Muslim cartoons started out as a specifically Danish squabble. But what began with satirical cartoons of the prophet Muhammad has raised questions about freedom of expression, religious and cultural sensitivities, and political hypocrisy and violence in the name of faith." Most protests, "including this one in Philadelphia Saturday, have been more loud than violent."

Mideast Rage A Question Of "Justice." The New York Times (2/12, Slackman, 1.19M) reports, "While the West speaks of democracy and freedom, Muslims here tend to speak of justice. There is widespread feeling that the region's governments deny their people justice, and this feeling has been instrumental in the increased support for Islamists throughout the Middle East, whether the Muslim Brotherhood in Egypt, or Hamas among the Palestinians. 'It has reached to the point where Egyptians do not feel entitled to anything, and all they want is justice,' said Ibrahim Aslan, a leading Egyptian writer. 'Across history, in literature, Egyptian peasants asked for justice, not for freedom or democracy. Just justice. Social justice.' Islamists promise not just piety, but an end to corruption and misrule. That challenge helps explain the eagerness of established governments to pursue the conflict over the Danish cartoons — to increase their own credibility on religious issues and resist the Islamists' rising popularity."

"Why Not Publish These Cartoons," Columnist Asks. The Washington Post's (2/12, B6) Deborah Howell notes that "Hundreds of readers have asked why The Post hasn't reprinted the Danish cartoons of the prophet Muhammad that inflamed Muslims around the world, leading to deadly protests and the burning of embassies. Some readers questioned the Post's journalistic courage." Executive Editor Len Downie "made the decision, consulting with other top editors. The issue, he said, is one of journalistic judgment, not courage."

Riots Seen As Obscuring The Real Islam. The New York Times (2/12, 1.19M) guest columnist Emran Qureshi notes, "In a world of wrenching change, the Danish cartoon affair has widened a growing fissure between Islam and the West. The controversy comes at a time when many in the Islamic world view the war on terrorism as a war on Islam. They draw on memories of colonization and of the Crusades, when Western invaders ridiculed the Prophet Muhammad as an imposter. Sadly, the recent polarization obscures a rich humanistic tradition within Islam — one in which cosmopolitanism, pluralism and a spirit of open-minded inquiry once constituted a dominant ethos."

Old NYT Images Of Muhammad Appear "Gone For Good." In a feature story, the New York Times (2/12, Kifner, 1.19M) reports, "Deep in the bowels of this newspaper's old morgue ... is a folder with a photograph of a Persian miniature painting depicting the Angel Gabriel appearing to the Prophet Muhammad. It was used to illustrate an article about Islam in 1974. Taped on the back is a copy of an editor's note published two days later that said, 'Since it is an affront to Moslems to depict such likenesses, The Times expresses its regrets to those who were offended by the use of the photograph.' So controversy over depictions of Muhammad, like those that have led to demonstrations, destruction and death over cartoons published in a Danish newspaper, are not new. In truth, however, the depictions that caused some of the past protests were rather admiring."

DOJ_NMG_0014283

Modern Checkpoints Mark Change For Palestinian Border Crossers. The Boston Globe (2/12, Frankel, 484K) reports, "All along the boundaries between Israel and the Palestinian territories, this is the new reality. As Israel moves ahead with its plan to complete a barrier separating Israeli and Palestinian towns, the burden of preventing terrorist infiltration into Israel is falling to the 28 checkpoints ... that Israel is building to accommodate the flow of people and goods." Bezalel Triber, a brigadier general in the reserves who is heading Israel's drive to build the crossings, was quoted as saying, "The point is to move to full remote control, where no [Israeli] should talk to a Palestinian or touch him. ... It is more respectful, it's better from a security standpoint and there is no friction between people."

Sharon Hospitalized For Emergency Surgery. Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon was hospitalized for surgery for an abdominal condition that frequently affects comatose patients. ABC World News Tonight (2/11, lead story, 1:40, Avila) reported it was a "sudden and serious turn for the worse" for Sharon, but he is "is out of danger for now. This latest complication is considered a setback." Doctors "are saying it's almost certain Ariel Sharon has suffered severe brain damage and tonight, Israelis are coming to the realization that the chances of their Prime Minister recovering in a meaningful way is slipping away."

The CBS Evening News (2/11, story 4, 1:20, Mitchell) reported it was "another major setback for ailing Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon." For "a while reports indicated Sharon was near death, but tonight the Prime Minister is said to be out of danger." Sharon is "still a political presence here, but it's hard not to think of and talk about Ariel Sharon in the past tense. He's been in a coma for more than a month now. Acting Prime Minister Ehud Olmert is not only leading the country and has been since Ariel Sharon went into that coma, he is leading the country now and he's also leading Ariel Sharon's party, the party that Ariel Sharon formed into elections, election they're expected to win easily next month."

NBC Nightly News (2/11, story 3, :20, Williams) reported, "In Israel, doctors say Prime Minister Ariel Sharon is out of immediate danger after emergency surgery this morning. The 77-year-old Sharon was rushed into surgery to remove part of his large intestine. This is his seventh operation since suffering a massive stroke five weeks ago. He remains in a coma."

The New York Times (2/12, Myre, 1.19M) reports, "Prime Minister Ariel Sharon of Israel underwent emergency surgery on his large intestine on Saturday and emerged in stable condition, though he remained in a coma, the Hadassah Ein Kerem Hospital said. ... Doctors observed that Mr. Sharon's abdomen was swollen, and after conducting a CT scan, he was taken into surgery on Saturday morning, Dr. Shlomo Mor-Yosef, the director of the hospital, said at a news conference." Hospital officials "initially said Mr. Sharon's life was in danger. But after the four-hour operation, Dr. Mor-Yosef said, 'The situation is serious, it is stable, it is critical, but there is no immediate danger to the life of Prime Minister Ariel Sharon.'" The Washington Post (2/12, Wilson, 744K) notes, "Sharon's sons, Omri and Gilad, rushed to the hilltop hospital early Saturday to be with their father, and his key advisers were there as well."

The Los Angeles Times (2/12, King, 958K) adds that "Sharon on Saturday survived his latest medical crisis — one that has served, somewhat poignantly, to underscore the degree to which the Israeli political torch has already passed to his successor, Ehud Olmert,' who "has assumed the leadership of Kadima, the centrist party Sharon founded weeks before his stroke." In an acknowledgment that Sharon had departed the political stage, his party was unable to give him even a symbolic place on its slate of candidates in the coming election."

The Washington Times (2/12, Mitnick, 90K) and also covers the story.

Hughes Diplomatic Office Rated As "Not Performing." The Houston Chronicle (2/12, Mason, 581K) in its "White House Watch" column notes a new government web site that tracks government program performance rates Karen Hughes' office of public diplomacy at the State Department as "not performing." Her "tenure at the State Department has been short and bumpy." Hughes "has no foreign policy background and has made a few gaffes -- such as dramatically overstating, during a trip to Indonesia, the number of people Saddam Hussein had gassed."

AFP (2/9) noted that the Internet site put together by the White House's Office of Management and Budget and heralded by Bush on Wednesday as a way to see 'whether or not a program is working.'"

Rumsfeld Strengthens Tunisia Ties. The Washington Post/Reuters (2/12, A26) reports, "Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld said on Saturday that the United States wants to strengthen military ties with Tunisia, Algeria and Morocco and played down the threat posed by al Qaeda in the three North African states. Rumsfeld arrived in Tunis after a NATO meeting in Sicily to begin a three-day visit to the Mahgreb -- his first to the region as defense secretary -- and praised Tunisia's support in the US campaign against global terrorism. 'They have been attacked by terrorists in this country,'" Rumsfeld said, adding, "They have felt the sting of that type of violence."

DOJ_NMG_0014284

Mongolia Seeks To Improve Relations With US. The Washington Post (2/12, Cody, 744K) reports that squeezed between giants Russia and China, "Mongolia increasingly has forged relations with 'third neighbors,' more distant nations that can offset the influence of Moscow and Beijing. Japan has played the role prominently, becoming Mongolia's largest aid donor, and so have Germany and South Korea. But foremost among the third neighbors is the United States, the superpower that Mongolians have courted as an aid source and a counterweight to Russia's residual status and China's economic tentacles stretching across the Gobi Desert."

Syria Fills Cabinet Vacancies. Reuters (2/12) reports, "President Bashar al-Assad appointed interior and foreign ministers on Saturday, filling a major vacuum in his government as the country faces pressure over its role in Lebanon. A senior security officer, Bassam Abdel Majeed, was appointed as interior minister, and a career diplomat, Walid al-Moualem, was appointed to the foreign affairs portfolio, the state news agency announced." The main figure "gone from the cabinet is Farouq al-Shara, who had been foreign minister for 22 years. He was appointed vice president, a mostly ceremonial position."

Royal Feud Puts Moroccan Freedoms On Trial. The Washington Post (2/12, A1, Whitlock, 744K) reports, "The monarchy in this North African country dates back 1,200 years and has survived foreign invaders, civil wars and communist plots. Now it is confronted by a new threat: a grandmother who preaches nonviolence and democracy. This week, Moroccan prosecutors are scheduled to resume a criminal trial against Nadia Yassine, a leader of Justice and Charity, an underground Islamic movement that has become increasingly aggressive in testing the rule of King Mohammed VI. Yassine, 47, was charged last June with publicly criticizing the monarchy after she stated in a newspaper interview that the country would be better off as a republic than as a kingdom."

Avian Flu Found In Three European Union Countries. The CBS Evening News (2/11, story 6, :15, Mitchell) reported, "For the first time bird flu has spread to countries of the European Union. Officials said today the virus has been detected in dead wild swans in Greece and Italy as well as in Bulgaria. Officials say there is no immediate threat to human beings."

The New York Times (2/12, Rosenthal, 1.19M) reports, "The lethal A(H5N1) bird flu virus has been detected in wild birds in Italy and Greece, European officials announced yesterday, the first time its presence has been detected in the European Union. It was also detected in Bulgaria. The arrival of bird flu in Western Europe had been predicted for some months, since the virus has marched steadily from China, to Russia, to the Balkans and, in the last week, to West Africa. It is being carried by migrating birds, so all countries on their flight paths are vulnerable." The Washington Post/AP (2/12, A25, Sanminiatelli) notes that 'the announcement that the disease was detected in five swans in southern Italy came a day after the opening of the Winter Olympics in Turin, several hundred miles to the north. Italian officials said the virus had affected only wild birds and posed no immediate risk to people."

Keeping One's Distance May Be Key In Case Of Pandemic Flu. The New York Times (2/12, McNeil, 1.19M) reports, "If the avian flu goes pandemic while Tamiflu and vaccines are still in short supply, experts say, the only protection most Americans will have is 'social distancing,' which is the new politically correct way of saying 'quarantine.' But distancing also encompasses less drastic measures, like wearing face masks, staying out of elevators — and the bump. Such stratagems, those experts say, will rewrite the ways we interact, at least during the weeks when the waves of influenza are washing over us."

Africa "A Worrisome New Front." The New York Times (2/12, Rosenthal, McNeil, 1.19M) reports, "As epidemics go, it was a relatively small outbreak: 40,000 chickens died in mid-January on a commercial poultry farm in Nigeria. No humans seemed to have been infected. But to many experts on avian flu, it was the outbreak they had been dreading for months. It was the first time the fast-moving A(H5N1) virus had been reported in Africa. And while United Nations agencies are now scrambling to form medical and veterinary response and surveillance teams, scientists say its appearance there is deeply worrisome for two reasons. First, the continent is ill prepared to deal with epidemics, whether human or animal. Second, the Nigerian outbreak comes only a month or two before birds begin migrating north from Africa to Europe, which has so far been largely untouched by the virus."

Snow Optimistic On Russia WTO Candidacy. Reuters (2/12) reports, "US Treasury Secretary John Snow told Russian President Vladimir Putin on Saturday Washington was committed to a speedy conclusion of talks on admitting Moscow to the World Trade Organization. ... 'On WTO let me assure you that we are committed to an early resolution,' Snow said in televised remarks at a meeting with Putin in the Kremlin. '"I think we are narrowing the differences and should be very close to resolution.'"

Energy Prices, Tight Oil Supply Pose Big Risk, G-8 Ministers Warn. The New York Times (2/12, Kramer, 1.19M) reports, "Finance ministers from the world's richest countries and Russia said Saturday that 'high and volatile' energy prices posed a risk to global economic growth that otherwise appeared solid." According to US Treasury Secretary John W. Snow, "We're all concerned about the risk of rising energy prices and what they do to global growth." The Washington Times (2/12, Mainville, 90K) notes the ministers' communiqué as saying, "Overall global growth remains solid, and this is expected to continue in 2006. ... Risks remain, including high and volatile energy prices." In its coverage, the Los Angeles Times (2/12, Holley, 958K) adds, "The communique lauds the rapid economic growth in recent years shown by Russia, ... and Russia's commitments to boost aid to poor countries and make early payments on its Soviet-era debt to the group of top lending nations known as the Paris Club."

DOJ_NMG_0014285

Latin American Leaders Push Pipeline Plan. The Washington Post (2/12, A24, Reel, 744K) reports, "South American leaders from Venezuela to Argentina are proposing to build the world's largest fuel pipeline across Latin America, and they hope it will deliver much more than natural gas: They portray the plan as the first blueprint for a new era of regional cooperation, greater independence from international markets and a more prominent voice on the world stage. President Hugo Chavez of Venezuela has labeled the proposal a 5,000-mile symbol of diminishing US influence in Latin America. Enthusiastic support for the project from regional heavyweights, including Brazil and Argentina, has prompted others to describe the project as the first true joint venture of a political coalition determined to forge a new South American identity."

US Rejects Morales Position On Coca. The New York Times (2/12, Forero, 1.19M) reports newly elected Bolivian President Evo Morales "has not yet provided many details on his coca policy, except to say that his government will 'depenalize' coca cultivation and show zero tolerance toward trafficking: in other words, 'yes to coca, no to cocaine.' He has long opposed American eradication efforts and championed the coca leaf, which without significant processing has no mind-altering effects and is chewed here to mitigate hunger and increase stamina." The American government, "which for several administrations has contended that only aggressive eradication and interdiction will control trafficking, scoffs at Mr. Morales's ... stance. 'This idea that he's going to go after traffickers but letting the coca bloom is tough seeing as workable,' says a high-ranking Congressional aide in Washington who helps shape anti-drug policy, speaking on the condition of anonymity because he is not authorized to give statements. 'It's a naïve, pie-in-the-sky approach to let the flower bloom but interdict the bouquet.'"

In Election Limbo, Haiti Experiences "Fragile Peace." The New York Times (2/12, Thompson, 1.19M) reports, "The national elections, so long in coming, seem to have brought a fragile peace to the most troubled country in the hemisphere. Partial results gave a wide lead to René Préval, a former president who is considered a protégé to former President Jean-Bertrand Aristide. However, it remained unclear whether he would win the more than 50 percent of the vote to avoid a runoff."

The Los Angeles Times (2/12, Williams, Regnault, 958K) adds, "With one presidential term behind him and his campaign for a return to power undertaken with reluctance, Rene Preval has made clear he has no illusions about the daunting challenges that lie ahead for the next leader of Haiti. Torchbearer for the unfulfilled aims of his predecessor and ally, Jean-Bertrand Aristide, Preval may be uniquely positioned to re-energize the exiled president's followers in the thwarted mission of empowering the poor and steering this most backward of Western nations out of its historical rut of violence, illiteracy and injustice."

In Race For UN Leadership, "Many Names, Few Rules And Talk Of Asia's Turn." The New York Times (2/12, Hoge, 1.19M) reports, "Choosing a new secretary general may be the most telling single action the United Nations takes in 2006, but the organization is saddled with an ill-defined selection procedure that leaves the choice subject to 11th-hour compromises, great power maneuvers and regional rivalries. The most discussed candidates, at least at the moment, include a Jordanian prince, a Nobel laureate from East Timor, two Eastern European presidents, Sweden's most accomplished diplomat, a former Sri Lankan ambassador to Washington, a Harvard-trained Thai lawyer, a Canadian judge, South Korea's foreign minister and a Turkish economist. But if history is a guide, it is likely that none of them will emerge the winner and that the person who does is not being publicly discussed."

Italy Will Elect New Parliament In April. The Los Angeles Times (2/12, 958K) reports, "Italy dissolved its parliament and scheduled elections for early April, opening what promises to be a bitter campaign pitting Premier Silvio Berlusconi against a strong center-left opponent. Parliament ended two weeks later than originally planned after Berlusconi negotiated a delay that allowed his government to push through a flurry of legislation. It also allowed the premier to keep up a barrage of TV and radio appearances."

Bush Should Step Up On Darfur, WPost Says. In an editorial headlined "Mr. Bush And Genocide," the Washington Post (2/12, 744K) posits that "for the past 18 months, the Bush administration and its allies have clung to the fiction that they could stop the genocide in the Sudanese territory of Darfur by sending in African Union forces. On Thursday United Nations Secretary General Kofi Annan spoke the truth about these troops," saying "that the UN force that may replace the African Union had better be 'a completely different force and have a completely different concept of operation.' The issue is whether President Bush, who is due to meet Mr. Annan tomorrow, is willing to hear this message." The Post asks, "Will the administration accept Mr. Annan's appeal for an entirely more serious peacekeeping deployment? The administration is pushing for the creation of some kind of UN force but seems unsure whether it's willing to support a strong one."

DOJ_NMG_0014286

Darfur Photos Show Troubled Land, People. In his biweekly column, New York Times (2/12,, 1.19M) columnist Nicholas Kristof writes, "On my fifth and last trip to Darfur, in November, I smuggled in 20 disposable cameras to hand out to these disposable people. While taking photos without a permit is illegal in Sudan, two aid groups agreed to distribute the cameras, teach the genocide survivors how to use them, and then send me the pictures (for their own protection, I'm not naming those aid groups)." Kristof continues, "The photos were taken in makeshift camps near the town of Zalingei where survivors have lived since fleeing their villages. ... These scenes reflect the banality of waiting — for food, for protection, for death. In short, such photos are a bit like those from the Warsaw Ghetto in the early 1940's." He concludes, "On Tuesday, Mr. Bush spoke movingly at the funeral of Coretta Scott King. I hope he'll look at these photos and ruminate on an observation of the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr.: 'Man's inhumanity to man is not only perpetrated by the vitriolic actions of those who are bad, it is also perpetrated by the vitiating inaction of those who are good.'"

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:
"Bomb Buster For Iraq Hits Pentagon Snag."
"Vernon Shoo-Ins Shoo Outsiders."
"Dorms Fuel Jail Unrest."
"Keeping The Olympics On Edge."
"Shooting For The Moon, Once Again."
"In Campaign, Westly Seeks An Insider-Outsider Balance."

New York Times:
"Tutor Program Offered By Law Is Going Unused."
"Violent Crime Rising Sharply In Some Cities."
"Healing, With New Limbs And Fragile Dreams."
"Bolivia's Knot: No To Cocaine, But Yes To Coca."
"Eats Shoots, Leaves And Much Of Zoos' Budgets."
"Reform Jews Hope To Unmix Mixed Marriages."

Washington Post:
"A Hand Up In A System Full Of Letdowns."
"Report On Katrina Spreads Blame."
"For Possible '08 Run, McCain Is Courting Bush Loyalists."
"Feud With King Tests Freedoms In Morocco."
"TV When -- And Where -- You Want It."

Washington Times:
"G-8 Nations Cite Threat Of Energy Costs."
"Year's First Snow Hits Region."
"Sharon Undergoes Emergency Surgery."
"UAE Firm Eyeing U.S. Ports."
"Un-Pleasant Gentrification."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"Hey, Aren't You A Famous Olympic Athlete?"
"Lenders Pull Out Wallets."
"The Eternal Eight."
"It's Not Easy Being A Democrat: 'They Even Took My Seat.'"

Dallas Morning News:
"And Baby Makes Two."
"Prepping To Fight A Deadly Flu."
"Fighter Start To Finish."
"He Helps Cupid's Arrow Hit Its Mark."
"Danger Escalates For Border Agents."

Houston Chronicle:
"Free Trade Fuels Drug Smuggling."
"Off To A Gold Start."
"Witnesses' Plea Deals Pose Delicate Challenge."
"Family Kept Grim Secret Too Long To Save Teketria."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Sharon Hospitalized; Fossett-Record Flight; San Francisco-Chinese New Year's; Laura Bush-Hillary Clinton; Winter Weather; Student Loan Rates; Iraq-Roadside Bombs; Pakistan-US Missile Strike; Olympics; Olympics-Skiing Aerodynamics.
CBS: Fossett-Record Flight; Winter Weather; Bush-Abramoff Meeting; Sharon Hospitalized; Muslim Cartoon Protests; Avian Flu-Europe; Pakistan-US Missile Strike; FBI-Al Qaeda Plot; Danforth-Politics, Religion; UVA Basketball Coach-Cancer.
NBC: Winter Weather; Olympics; Sharon Hospitalized; Muslim Cartoon Protests; AL Church Fires; Catholic Church-Reform; Fossett-Record Flight; Oldest Olympian; Snowboarding-Half Pipes.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.

White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — No public schedule.

DOJ_NMG_0014287

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

US Senate: No public schedule.

US House: No scheduled events.

Other: UTILITY REGULATORS _ Winter meeting of the National Association of Regulatory Utility Commissioners. Location: Hyatt Regency-Washington on Capitol Hill, 400 New Jersey Ave. NW

LINCOLN BIRTHDAY _ 12 p.m. The National Park Service, Military District of Washington and the Lincoln Birthday National Commemorative Committee sponsor the 197th birthday anniversary of Abraham Lincoln. Location: Lincoln Memorial.

SISTER DOROTHY MEMORIAL _ 4:30 p.m. The Robert F. Kennedy Memorial Center for Human Rights and the Washington Office on Latin America host a vigil to commemorate one-year anniversary of the murder of American nun Sister Dorothy Stang. The vigil will feature brief remarks on Sister Dorothy's life and work, as well as the cultural challenges that she faced in the Brazilian Amazon. Participants include former Maryland Lt. Gov. Kathleen Kennedy Townsend and Reps. Tim Ryan, D-Ohio; Jim McGovern, D-Mass; and Mike Turner, R-Ohio. Location: Outside the campus chapel at Trinity University, 125 Michigan Ave. NE.

ABC _ THIS WEEK WITH GEORGE STEPHANOPOULOS _ Topic: Muslim cartoon controversy; Iran nuclear; and CIA leak investigation. Guests: Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, and Sen. Joseph Biden, D-Del. Guest: Pittsburg Steelers star and hall of famer Lynn Swann speaks on his campaign to become Pennsylvania's first black governor. Topic: American Heart Association ``Go Red'' campaign for women. Guest: Actress Sigourney Weaver.

CBS _ FACE THE NATION WITH BOB SCHIEFFER _ Interviews with Secretary of State Rice and Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean.

CNN _ 11 a.m. - 1 p.m. LATE EDITION WITH WOLF BLITZER _ Topics: U.S. Intelligence; Iraq; Terrorism; Nuclear Nations. Guest: Sens. Chuck Hagel, R-NE., Foreign Relations Committee; Select Intelligence Committee; and Joseph Lieberman, D-Conn., Armed Services Committee; Homeland Security Committee. Topic: Iraq: The Next Chapter. Guest: Iyad Allawi, former Iraqi Interim Prime Minister, Iraqi Parliament member. Topics: Middle East Violence; Future of the Middle East. Guest: Nabil Fahmy, Egyptian Ambassador to the U.S.; Guest: Afif Safieh, Palestinian Representative to the U.S.; and Danny Ayalon, Israeli Ambassador to the U.S.

FOX _ FOX NEWS SUNDAY WITH CHRIS WALLACE _ Topic: President Bush says the war on terror is working, but some Democrats say the GOPs using the politics of fear to win in November. Guest: Sen. George Allen, R-Va. Topic: Was criticism of President Bush at Coretta Scott Kings funeral over the line? Well talk with the civil rights leader who took on the president and a former top White House aide. Guests: Rev. Joseph Lowery (Georgia Coalition for the Peoples Agenda) and Ron Christie (author, ``Black in the White House). Topic: A man who is in daily contact with Mars. Guest: Dr. John Grant, Geologist, National Air and Space Museum.

NBC _ MEET THE PRESS WITH TIM RUSSERT _ Topic: The debate over intelligence gathering. Guests: Sen. Pat Roberts, R-Kans., chairman, Intelligence Committee; former Sen. Tom Daschle, D-S.D., former Democratic Leader; and Reps. Peter Hoekstra, R-Mich., chairman, Intelligence Committee; and Jane Harman, ranking member, Intelligence Committee.

Copyright 2006 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

DOJ_NMG_0014288

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Monday, February 13, 2006 8:27 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Department of Justice News Clips for Saturday, February 11, 2006
Attachments:	dojclips060211.pdf; dojclips060211.doc

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 11, 2006 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Private Groups Seek Domestic Spying Papers (AP) 4
Carter Allowed Surveillance In 1977 (WT) 4
ABA President Urges Bush To Obey Spy Laws (AP) 5
Bar Association To Oppose Domestic Spying (CHIST).....6
Americans Say President Shouldn't Suspend Rights (REU) 7
The Shoe (Bomb) On The Other Foot (NSWK).....7
Terror Case In Buffalo Awaits Word On Wiretaps (NYT) 9
Convict In Al Qaeda Plot Seeks Case Review (WT/AP).....9
Attention In N.S.A. Debate Turns To Telecom Industry (NYT) 10
Justice Moves At Glacial Pace For `enemy Combatant' (CHIT)..... 12
Bail Denied For Brooklyn Bookseller Accused Of Financing Terrorism (NYT) 13
U.S. Bookseller's Bail Revoked In Terror Case (FINDLAW/AP) 14
Terror Trial To Start Despite Late Evidence, Defense Lawyers Say (FINDLAW/AP) 15
A Late Surprise For Lodi Defense (SACBEE) 16
Would-be Terrorist Got Cold Feet After Sept. 11 (DMN/AP) ... 18
Moussaoui Trial Difficult For Both Sides (MINNST)..... 19
'Vengeful Act' (NSWK)..... 20
Brit Treasury Chief Forms Terrorism Team (AP) 22
Syrian Accused Of Planning 2003 Attacks (LAT)..... 22

Patriot Act:

GOP Accepts Patriot Act Compromise (WT)..... 23
Hastert Backs Compromise On Patriot Act (AP) 24
Hastert Backs Deal On USA Patriot Act (REU) 25
Another Cave-In On The Patriot Act (NYT)..... 25

Homeland Response:

Mayor Miffed: The White House Never Calls (LAT) 26
U.S. Concludes 'Cyber Storm' Mock Attacks (AP-Y2)..... 27
U.S. Officials Defend Ploys To Catch Immigrants (NYT)..... 28
Arizona Plans To Tackle Illegal Aliens (WT) 28
U.S. Cites Rise In Violence Along Border With Mexico (NYT) 29
Border Wall May Be Boon For Smugglers (DMN) 30
Cross-Border Tunnel Found In San Diego (WP/AP) 31
More Medicines From Abroad Seized (LAT) 32
Ex-FEMA Head Says White House Knew About Levees (LAT)33
Brown Blames Superiors For Response To Katrina (WP) 34
Ex-FEMA Leader Faults Response By White House (NYT)....36
Brown Defends His Role In Response To Katrina (WT/AP) ...38
Brown Blames Federal Infighting (BRA) 39
'We Were Realizing Our Worst Nightmare' (NOTP) 40
Blame Over Response To Katrina Intensifies (HCHRON).....43
Brown Says He Gave Bush Aide Early Warning On La. Flooding (BOS).....44
Brown Details Katrina Alerts (BSUN) 45
Brown: I Warned White House As Katrina Hit (AP) 46
White House 'warned Of Levee Breach' (FT).....47
Brown Warned White House Before Katrina Struck (REU) 48
Former FEMA Chief Blames Chertoff For Katrina Response (KRT) 49
Katrina Hearings Put New Pressure On White House (WSJ) .50
Stormy Dean Slams Bush: Points Finger For Katrina Deaths (BOSH) 51
Auditors Find Huge Fraud In FEMA Aid (NYT) 52
FEMA Tries To Pause La. Role (BRA).....53
U.S. Should Share Oil Royalties With States -Shell (REU).....54
Katrina's Unclaimed To Get Hometown Burial (WP) 54

War News:

Iran "Making Mistake" With Iraq Meddling: Rumsfeld (REU-Y2).....56
Bush - Annan Meet At White House (UPI).....57
General Says Training Of Iraqi Troops Suffered From Poor Planning And Staffing (NYT).....58
Iraqis Certify Election Results On A Day Of More Violence (NYT).....59

Iraq's Shiites Near Pick For Prime Minister (WP) 60
Shiite Coalition Struggles To Agree On A Prime Minister (KRT) 61
Shi'ites To Choose Premier Nominee (WT) 62
In Iraq, Carnage Amid Conciliation (LAT) 63
Neighborhood Peace A Casualty Of War (WP) 65
The Chiefs Of Baghdad (FT) 67
Tighter Borders Take A Toll In Iraq (WP) 71
Carroll Kidnappers Reportedly Set Deadline (AP) 72
Ex-C.I.A. Official Says Iraq Data Was Distorted (NYT) 74
Misuse Of Prewar Data Is Alleged (BSUN) 75
Ex-CIA Official Criticizes Use Of Intel (AP) 76
Book Casts Doubt On Case For War (LAT) 77
Ex-ambassador Says U.S. May Spend Decades In Iraq (COPLEY) 78

Corporate Scandals:

Executive Loses Case On Trading (NYT) 79
Insurance Scandal (WSJ) 80
Ex-Hollinger Official: Give Me My Stuff Back (CHIST) 81
Black Eager To Proceed With Fraud Trial (FINDLAW/AP) 81
Mistrial Declared In Second Cendant Fraud Case (FINDLAW/AP) 82

Criminal Law:

Cheney Role Risks Political Fallout (WSJ) 83
Abramoff E-Mail Plays Up Bush Contacts (AP) 84
Three More Lawmakers Tied To Abramoff (AP) 85
Lobbyist Confirms Talks With Reids Office (AP) 86
Dem Leader Faces Increasing Scrutiny In Lobbyist Scandal (HCHRON) 87
Abramoff Pressed GSA Contact On Getting Land (WP) 87
Abramoff's Charity Began At Home (LAT) 88
Reform Trend May Curb Casino Plans (MJS) 92
Executive Severance Is A Focus At Getty (NYT) 94
Getty Foundation Chief Resigns Amid Investigations (WP) 95
Munitz Steps Down As Head Of Getty Trust (LAT) 96
Another Getty Milestone (LAT) 98
U.S. Ambassador Hands Over Looted Art (MH) 98
Inmate Charged In Slayings Of 2 Who Identified Him In '81 Robbery (COLDISP) 99
Ex-Chinese Bank Managers, Wives Plead Not Guilty In Las Vegas (FINDLAW/AP) 100

Civil Law:

Investors Win $371.7 Million Over Seizure Of Meritor Savings Bank (AP) 101
Trial Bar Cleanup (WSJ) 101

Civil Rights:

Dad Slams Attack On Bush At King Rite (CBS) 102
Four Presidents And A Funeral (WSJ) 103
Racial Icons (NSWK) 105
A Fitting Funeral For Mrs. King (WP) 106
Affirmative Blackmail (WSJ) 107

Antitrust:

Senate Confirms Barnett As Assistant Attorney General (DOWJONES) 108
Microsoft Gets EU Scrutiny (BLOOM) 109
Regulators Approve Regis Acquisition (MINBIZ) 109

Environment/Indian Affairs:

EPA Budget Cuts Trouble Environment Groups (AP) 109
Power Plant Would Reuse Carbon Dioxide (NYT) 111
Plan Unveiled For Hydrogen Power Plant (LAT) 111
I'm For New Exploration And Production Of Oil (WSJ) 112
Kicking The Habit, All Over The World (LAT) 113
The Grass Station (NYT) 114
Congress's Duty On Energy (NYT) 115
Gov't Seeks $16M Unpaid Mine Safety Fines (AP) 115
Hydra-Headed Hybrids (WP) 116
Tribal Land Issue Heating Up In Scott County (MINNST) 117
Interior Ordered To Pay Cobell Lawyers (ICT) 119

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Drug Smuggling Air Marshals? (TIME) 120
F.B.I. Raids In Puerto Rico (NYT/AP) 121
Everett Men Arrested In Connection To Fire (SEATIMES) 121

Tax:

Cheney Says New Unit Will Prove Tax Cuts Boost Revenue (WP) 122
White House Calls For New Tax-Cut Analysis Unit (WSJ) 123

Congress-Administration:

Bush Tells Nervous GOP To Focus On Economy (AP) 124
Ethics Scandals Cast Shadow On GOP Retreat (LAT) 125
Bush Rallies Scandal-rocked Republicans (REU) 127
Bush Reveals Rationale Behind Surveillance (AP) 127
Bush Defends Spy Program In Speech At GOP Meeting (BSUN) 128
Bush's Job Approval Stuck Near Bottom (AP) 130
Republican Speaks Up, Leading Others To Challenge Wiretaps (NYT) 130
White House Effort To Defuse GOP Qualms On Security May Isolate Democrats (KRT) 132
RNC Chief Defends Domestic Wiretaps (WP) 133

DOJ_NMG_0014291

RNC Chief Slams Democrats (WT) 134
Republican Chief Outlines 2006 Strategy (AP) 134
House Republicans Search For Legislative Plan (WSJ)....135
Results Of Poll On Public Attitude On Bush (AP)....136
Bob Barr, Bane Of The Right? (WP)....138
Oops! - Bush Unaware Mikes Were Still On (AP) 139
Smoking Dutch Cleanser (NYT) 139
Irresponsible Rhetoric, Again (WP)....140
Gov't Budget Surplus Hits $21B For Jan. (AP)....141
Democrats Cry Foul Over Clerical Error In Bill (WT) 141
Just-Passed Budget Bill May Be Challenged (AP)....142
Bush's Budget Cuts Elderly Nutrition Plan (AP) 143
New House Leader Seeks To Rebuild Unity (AP) 144
Ethics Scandal Looms Over Republicans' Meeting (REU)..146
A Wink And A Nod For Lobbying Reform (NYT) 146
Censorship Is Alleged At NOAA (WP) 147
And On The Eighth Day, God Went Green (NYT) 148
No Regrets For Miers (DMN)....149
Roberts Off To Quiet Start At Court (AP)....151
Political Skeletons, Cut And Pasted (NYT)....152

Other News:

In D.C. Visit, Perry Is Of Two Minds On Spending (HCHRON)153
Talent Changes Stem-cell Stance (KCS)....153
Steele Apologizes For Holocaust Remarks (WP) 155
Steele Apologizes For Stem Cell Remarks (BSUN)....157
Seeing A Jungle In Congress, A Lion Of The Nixon Era Runs Again (NYT)....158
Photo With Bush Helps Congressman's Rival (AP) 160
Democrats Look For Gains In Governors' Races (REU) 160
Motivation Behind Crime Study Questioned (WP)....162
Trade Gap Hits Record For 4th Year In A Row (WP)....163
U.S. Trade Deficit Sets Record, With China And Oil The Causes (NYT) 164
US Trade Deficit Balloons To Record $726bn (FT) 166
U.S. Trade Deficit Ballooned To A Record In 2005 (WSJ)...166
TODAY'S MARKETS (WSJ)....168
Stocks Close Higher On Rebound (LAT)....169
Proxmire Remembered For Humble Handshakes (MJS)....170
Of Mouse And Women (WP)....171
Rice: Russia Should Send Message To Hamas (AP)....174
Rice Talks To Russian Foreign Minister Over Hamas (REU)175
France Backs Putin On Speaking To Hamas (NYT)....175
Israel And US On Back Foot Over Hamas (FT)....176
Putin's Flexible Definition Of Terrorism (TIME)....177
The Face Of Hamas Rule May Not Include Its Own (LAT)..177
Cleaning Up Corruption Tops Palestinian Agenda (WT)....179
Islamic University Is The Intellectual Center For Hamas (KRT) 180
Muslims' Fury Rages Unabated Over Cartoons (WP)....182
Muslims Clash With Police Over Prophet Cartoons (WT/AP)183
U.S. Seeks Right Tone In Cartoon Uproar (AP)....184
NATO Seeks Closer Ties With Middle East (AP)....185
Evangelical Christians Express Little Sympathy For Muslims' Outrage (KRT) 186
Danish Producers Feel Heat Of Cartoon Boycott (FT)....187
For Danish Firms, Boycott In Mideast A 'Nightmare' (WP) 188
A Most Un-Danish Dane (FT) 190
Danish Cartoon Editor On Indefinite Leave (NYT)....192
An Update From France . . . (Remember Those Riots?) (WSJ)....193
Europe Can Take Pride In Defending Cartoons (NYT) 194
Clash Of Civilization (WSJ) 196
US Worries Syria Still Blocking UN Hariri Inquiry (REU)....197
Turin's Muslims Try To Keep A Low Profile (LAT) 198
US Mulling More Nuclear Talks Before Bush India Trip (BOS/REU)....199
N.Korea Wants Talks With US On Crackdown: Envoy (REU)200
Brazil Poised To Join The World's Nuclear Elite (KRT)....200
Teamwork By State And Defense (WP)....201
Rumsfeld Anxious Over Russian Arms Sales (FT)....202
18 Killed As Militants Fight Russian Force In Town (NYT)...202
Trade Showdown Looms As S.Korea Tells US: "No Rice" (REU) 203
Internet Censorship (WSJ)....204
Inside China's Angry Villages (LAT) 204
Travel Restrictions Could Upset Trade, European Commission President Warns (PPG)....205
G8 'fails To Meet Gleneagles Pledges On Debt' (FT)....206
NATO Commander Fears Rapid-reaction Force Delay (REU) 207
U.N. Staff To Speak With U.S. Attorney (MINNST)....208
Press Freedom Boosted In Indonesia (WP)....208
Experts Fear Spread Of Avian Flu In Africa (KRT)....209
Europe 'still Not Ready For Flu Pandemic' (FT)....210
Bird Flu Spreads To Azerbaijan (NYT/REU)....211
Preval's Lead Narrows In Haiti Election (REU)....212
Awkward Start For Canada's New Leader (NYT)....212
Blair Seeks To Secure Political Legacy (AP)....214
Making Change From Revolution To Powerful Elite (WT) ...214

DOJ_NMG_0014292

TERRORISM NEWS:

Private Groups Seek Domestic Spying Papers (AP)

By Pete Yost

AP, February 11, 2006

A federal judge said Friday he was considering setting a deadline for the Justice Department to produce records on the Bush administration's warrantless surveillance program or to explain in court why it was refusing to do so.

U.S. District Judge Henry Kennedy said he was convinced the public would suffer irreparable harm if the government dragged its feet in a lawsuit filed over access to the documents.

The lawsuit was filed by three private groups who say the government is engaging in a pattern of delay and should be compelled to provide information on the underlying legal rationale for the surveillance and the scope of the eavesdropping program.

Congress is having difficulty getting the same information.

The Electronic Privacy Information Center, the American Civil Liberties Union and the National Security Archive asked for the material shortly after The New York Times revealed the eavesdropping on Dec. 16. The only response from the government was agreeing to put the requests on a fast track for decision-making.

Justice Department lawyer Rupa Bhattacharyya said the government would respond starting March 3, but she said she had no information on when the process might be completed.

The Freedom of Information Act says the government shall respond "as soon as practicable."

"Seven, eight, nine, 10 years? Is that the government's position?" Kennedy asked the Justice Department attorney.

Timing will depend on complexity, "and in this case there are a lot of complexities," Bhattacharyya said of the highly classified program.

David Sobel, an attorney representing the three groups, said the Bush administration was taking the position that putting FOIA requests on a fast track for consideration frees the government from a specific 20-day deadline for responding that applies to ordinary requests.

"The government is suggesting it's now open-ended," Sobel complained.

Given the highly classified nature of the program, the Bush administration is likely to withhold all information about it.

Part of the groups' effort is aimed at obtaining an index of what documents exist, enabling them to present arguments in court that some of the data be declassified and released to the public.

"It's fashionable to suggest that the courts don't have a significant role to play in these matters, but I urge the court to exercise its authority to hold the government accountable," Sobel told the judge.

Sobel was referring to the fact that the Bush administration bypassed the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court and is conducting the program without obtaining court warrants.

Several of Kennedy's colleagues at the federal courthouse who are current or former members of the intelligence court have expressed concern about the program.

Kennedy was appointed to the court by President Clinton in 1997.

Carter Allowed Surveillance In 1977 (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, February 11, 2006

Former President Jimmy Carter, who publicly rebuked President Bush's warrantless eavesdropping program this week during the funeral of Coretta Scott King and at a campaign event, used similar surveillance against suspected spies.

DOJ_NMG_0014293

"Under the Bush administration, there's been a disgraceful and illegal decision -- we're not going to the let the judges or the Congress or anyone else know that we're spying on the American people," Mr. Carter said Monday in Nevada when his son Jack announced his Senate campaign.

"And no one knows how many innocent Americans have had their privacy violated under this secret act," he said.

The next day at Mrs. King's high-profile funeral, Mr. Carter evoked a comparison to the Bush policy when referring to the "secret government wiretapping" of civil rights leader Martin Luther King.

But in 1977, Mr. Carter and his attorney general, Griffin B. Bell, authorized warrantless electronic surveillance used in the conviction of two men for spying on behalf of Vietnam.

The men, Truong Dinh Hung and Ronald Louis Humphrey, challenged their espionage convictions to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 4th Circuit, which unanimously ruled that the warrantless searches did not violate the men's rights.

In its opinion, the court said the executive branch has the "inherent authority" to wiretap enemies such as terror plotters and is excused from obtaining warrants when surveillance is "conducted 'primarily' for foreign intelligence reasons."

That description, some Republicans say, perfectly fits the Bush administration's program to monitor calls from terror-linked people to the U.S.

The Truong case, however, involved surveillance that began in 1977, before the enactment of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act (FISA), which established a secret court for granting foreign intelligence warrants.

Democrats and some Republicans in Congress say FISA guidelines, approved in 1978 when Mr. Carter was president, are the only way the president may conduct surveillance on U.S. soil.

Administration officials say the president has constitutional authority to conduct surveillance without warrants in the name of national security. The only way Congress could legitimately curtail that authority, they argue, is through an amendment to the Constitution.

The administration's view has been shared by previous Democrat administrations, including Mr. Carter's.

When Mr. Bell testified in favor of FISA, he told Congress that while the measure doesn't explicitly acknowledge the "inherent power of the president to conduct electronic surveillance," it "does not take away the power of the president under the Constitution."

Jamie S. Gorelick, deputy attorney general in the Clinton administration, agreed. In 1994 testimony before the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence, Miss Gorelick said case law supports the presidential authority to conduct warrantless searches and electronic surveillance for foreign intelligence purposes.

Earlier this week, however, Mr. Carter said it was "ridiculous" for Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales to say the spying is justified by Article II of the Constitution.

Republicans say they welcome such criticism because it proves Democrats can't be trusted with national security.

"Just when you thought that the Democrats' image of being soft on defense issues couldn't get any worse, enter the sage wisdom of President Jimmy Carter to save the day," said Brian Nick, spokesman for the National Republican Senatorial Committee.

ABA President Urges Bush To Obey Spy Laws (AP)

By Anna Johnson

AP, February 11, 2006

The president of the nation's largest lawyers group said Friday that President Bush should comply with federal law when conducting electronic surveillance of Americans and refrain from scaring people into giving up their civil liberties in the fight against terrorism.

"Times of conflict have often put stress on America's liberties. It's a time when we get frightened and are tempted to take shortcuts with the Constitution," American Bar Association President Michael Greco said. "But I personally reject the false choice that is being offered Americans that they must give up their liberties to have security."

Greco, who spoke at the ABA's midyear meeting in Chicago, also released a proposal recommending that the association oppose further electronic surveillance in the U.S. for foreign intelligence purposes that does not comply with the 1978 Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act. If the ABA's policy-making body approves it in a vote set for Monday, the proposal will become official policy of the 400,000-member group.

DOJ_NMG_0014294

The proposal was recommended by an ABA task force that examined whether Bush was authorized to give the National Security Agency the power to eavesdrop on the international communications of Americans with suspected ties to terrorists without first obtaining warrants from a secretive court set up under FISA.

"We're calling on the president ... to explain to Congress what this program is about so Congress can exercise its constitutional duty of checking to make sure that the president's powers are being executed within the framework of the Constitution," Greco said.

The warrantless eavesdropping program has prompted a heated debate about presidential powers in the war on terror since it was first disclosed in December.

Bush on Friday continued his defense of the program, saying he concluded that it was needed to fill a gap in U.S security and that lawyers in the White House and at the Justice Department signed off on its legality.

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales insisted earlier this week during a Senate Judiciary Committee hearing that Bush was fully empowered to eavesdrop on Americans without warrants as part of the country's war on terror. He cautioned Congress not to end or alter the program.

But committee chairman Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., suggested the program's legality be reviewed by a special federal court set up under FISA. Committee Democrats also have generally contended that Bush acted illegally in permitting the domestic surveillance.

Bar Association To Oppose Domestic Spying (CHIST)

By ABDON M. PALLASCH, Legal Affairs Reporter

Chicago Sun-Times, February 11, 2006

The American Bar Association is preparing to weigh in against President Bush's eavesdropping on telephone calls going into and out of America.

Contrary to polls showing Americans divided on the issue, "our poll shows that average Americans and legal scholars alike agree that the awesome power of the government to penetrate citizens' most private communications must not be held in one set of hands," ABA President Michael Greco said Friday at group's annual midyear meeting in Chicago. "To prevent the very human temptation to abuse the power, there must be checks and balances in the form of oversight by the courts and Congress."

The ABA will debate and vote Monday on a resolution calling on Bush to follow the law that requires him to go before a judge in a closed courtroom to get permission to eavesdrop.

"When the voice of the legal profession in the United States, the American Bar Association, with our 407,000 members has spoken on issues in the past, people have listened, and I'm gratified the administration has listened," Greco said.

Act amended '4 times since 9/11'

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales has complained to a U.S. congressional panel that following the "FISA" (Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act) courts would not allow investigators the "nimbleness" to listen to all conversations involving al-Qaida members.

"If the president or the administration believe that FISA hampers their 'nimbleness' or their ability to move quickly, then this is a good reason to go back to Congress and say, 'We need more speed ... we need to amend the FISA act,'" Greco said. "Congress has amended the act four times since 9/11."

Asked if he thought Bush's announcement Thursday that the administration foiled an al-Qaida attack on Los Angeles weakened his argument against unapproved eavesdropping, Greco said, "The attack -- at this point the alleged attack -- on Los Angeles is disturbing, but it doesn't change the fact that neither now nor ever in the future should we be frightened into sacrificing constitutional freedoms because something happened or something is about to happen. I personally reject the false choice that is being offered Americans that they must give up their liberties to have security."

Justice Department officials could not be reached for comment.

DOJ_NMG_0014295

Asked if he thought Gonzales had the "legal acumen and knowledge" to be attorney general, Greco stood silent for a moment, then asked, "You think I should answer that question?"

Finally, he said, "The issue isn't whether the president can eavesdrop on calls from al-Qaida or to al-Qaida. The issue is whether he can wiretap calls without any accountability from Congress."

The ABA's poll of 1,000 people found 77 percent agreed the president should not be able to suspend constitutional rights without approval of a court or Congress. Earlier polls by other organizations found higher percentages of Americans willing to let the president eavesdrop on calls he thought might be related to al-Qaida.

