Americans Say President Shouldn't Suspend Rights (REU)

By Andrew Stern

Reuters, February 11, 2006

Most Americans believe a president should not be allowed to suspend constitutional guarantees in order to fight terrorism, a poll released on Friday said.

The poll, taken for the American Bar Association in the wake of the controversy generated by President Bush's domestic spying program, found the public divided over whether government eavesdropping on personal communications could ever be justified.

"As our poll shows, and legal scholars agree, the awesome power of government to penetrate citizens' most private communications must not be held in one set of hands," Michael Greco, the group's president, told a news conference.

"To prevent the very human temptation to abuse this power there must be checks and balances in the form of oversight by the courts and Congress," he said.

"I personally reject the false choice that is being offered Americans that they must give up their liberties to have security. We must protect both, and we can protect both," he added.

With the administration refusing to provide details of the eavesdropping program, which was a closely held secret until recently, the extent of any violations are unclear, Greco said.

The program, authorized by Bush in 2001, allows the National Security Agency to monitor the international phone calls and e-mails of U.S. citizens to track people with suspected ties to al Qaeda and other militant groups.

The White House has said warrantless eavesdropping is legal under Bush's Constitutional powers as commander-in-chief and a congressional authorization for the use of military force adopted days after the September 11 attacks.

The program bypassed secret courts created under the 1978 Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act that grant warrants. Greco said if those courts do not work as they should, the administration should ask Congress to amend the law.

The Harris Interactive telephone survey of 1,045 adults taken February 3-6 found that 77 percent have reservations about the fundamental issues raised by the eavesdropping controversy, the ABA said in releasing the survey.

Of that group, 52 percent agreed that a president should never be able to "suspend the constitutional freedoms of people like you." Another 25 percent said constitutional freedoms should never be suspended unless authorized by a court or Congress.

Only 18 percent said a president could lift constitutional guarantees any time if it was necessary to protect the country and another 5 percent said they did not know or declined to answer. The poll had a margin of error of plus or minus 3 points.

A second question asking what would justify government eavesdropping on personal communications without a search warrant or court order found 45 percent saying such action would never be justified.

A further 48 percent were divided, with 22 percent saying it would be OK based on "an anonymous tip that you may be helping to plan a terrorist attack in the United States" and 21 percent saying it would be justified based on "someone's suspicion that you may be sending money to a terrorist organization."

ABA delegates plan to vote on Monday on a policy proposal calling on Bush "to abide by our constitutional system of checks and balances and respect the roles of Congress and the judiciary in protecting national security consistent with the Constitution." It also calls for a halt to the eavesdropping.

The Shoe (Bomb) On The Other Foot (NSWK)

By Jonathan Alter

DOJ_NMG_0014296

Newsweek, February 11, 2006

President Bush's revelation about a foiled bomb plot shows the dangers of declassification for purely partisan purposes.

Poor Porter Goss. First, the longtime Florida congressman leaves his safe seat to become director of the CIA, only to find that he's been neutered by a new bureaucratic setup where he reports to John Negroponte, the director of national intelligence. Then he writes an op-ed piece decrying intelligence leaks in The New York Times on Friday, the exact same day as a story appears identifying today's biggest leaker of antiterrorism secrets in Washington—President George W. Bush.

For crass political reasons—namely to advance his position on the National Security Agency spying story—the president chose to use a speech to the National Guard Association to disclose details of a 2002 "shoe bomb" plot to blow up the U.S. Bank Tower, the tallest building in Los Angeles. While the plot had been revealed in general terms in the past, the White House this week arranged for Bush's counterterrorism adviser, Frances Fragos Townsend, to explain to reporters in a conference call exactly the kind of details that Goss claimed on the op-ed page helped the enemy. "We are at risk of losing a key battle," Goss wrote. "The battle to protect our classification system."

That system is at particular risk when it is exploited for political purposes. The president is allowed to declassify whatever he wants; that's one of the privileges of being president. So in this case—unlike the NSA's warrantless eavesdropping—there is no issue of Bush breaking the law. But let's be clear on what this was: a deliberate effort to use declassification for partisan purposes, in this case, defending the administration's policy on NSA surveillance, which Karl Rove says publicly will be a big part of the 2006 midterm campaign.

The White House made perfect political use of the twilight zone of intelligence. While Townsend did not explicitly claim that the NSA surveillance program had foiled the Los Angeles plot, she tried to imply that it might have played a role. "We use all available sources and methods in the intelligence community but we have to protect them," she told reporters. "So I'm not going to talk about what ones we did or didn't use in this particular case."

Let's get this straight. The president and administration officials will suddenly talk about details of the foiled plot—details that were highly classified until now. But they won't say if the controversial NSA program was involved. Given their new willingness to talk at length about the case, can anyone seriously doubt that had the NSA eavesdropping cracked this case, they would have mentioned that? Simply saying that the NSA helped foil the plot—if it had—would not have compromised "sources and methods." You can bet that if this were an NSA case, we'd know it.

The chronology of Bush's politicizing of intelligence goes something like this: First, the president discloses classified information without any good reason to do so. Why now? It's not as if Los Angeles is hosting the Olympics or under some new threat. (To understand how hurried and political this disclosure was, consider the fact that Los Angeles Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa, a Democrat, wasn't briefed on the foiled plot and has been stiffed in his efforts to meet with the president about homeland security in his city, a problem that New York City Mayor Michael Bloomberg and other Republican mayors do not have). Then, by implying without stating that the NSA may have been involved, the White House uses sensitivity about classified information as a shield against finding out whether the NSA is relevant to the Los Angeles plot in the first place.

Goss, meanwhile, is left hanging out to dry: he seems to be calling for more criminalization of intelligence leaks in one part of the paper while the president leaks like a sieve in the other. Elsewhere, he makes a big distinction between whistleblowers who seek accountability through proper channels (they're right) and those who go to the media (obviously wrong). Feeling some pressure three quarters into his op-ed piece to offer even one example of how media coverage has jeopardized an intelligence operation, Goss hauls out the same chestnut Bush used in a press conference last month—the revelation that Osama bin Laden's satellite phone had been tapped. The implication was that once the evil American media revealed this fact, bin Laden stopped using the phone and was harder to catch. In fact, bin Laden gave up his satphone after President Bill Clinton used coordinates from the phone to bomb him in 1998. It was Clinton's missiles, not the media, that convinced the Al Qaeda leader he needed a more secure way to communicate.

Will the White House get away with using intelligence as a political weapon? Probably. Imagine if it were Clinton, not Bush, who decided to reveal classified information about the plot against Los Angeles in a politically convenient way. The rightwing gabfests would be having a field day, as well they should. But now the shoe bomb is on the other foot.

DOJ_NMG_0014297

Terror Case In Buffalo Awaits Word On Wiretaps (NYT)

By David Staba

The New York Times, February 11, 2006

BUFFALO, Feb. 10 — A man accused of illegally wiring money to Yemen has asked a judge to determine whether any of the evidence against him was gathered secretly and without a warrant as part of the Bush administration's domestic surveillance program.

The suspect, Mohammed T. Albanna, 54, of Lackawanna, N.Y., just south of Buffalo, and two other men face charges that they ran a business that transferred $3.5 million from Yemeni-Americans to relatives in that country without the required permits.

Last month, Mr. Albanna's lawyer, Philip M. Marshal, asked Judge William M. Skretny of Federal District Court here to force prosecutors to reveal if secret surveillance by the National Security Agency was used. The no-warrant wiretaps were approved by President Bush after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks to hunt for evidence of terrorist activity and are now the focus of a debate over the extent of executive power.

Last week, the judge ordered an assistant United States attorney, Timothy C. Lynch, to produce a response from the Justice Department in Washington by Feb. 27.

Mr. Marshall said Wednesday that he possessed no evidence that no-warrant eavesdropping was involved in the case, but made the request after news of the National Security Agency program was made public in December.

"I don't know if they're going to say yes, no or 'We're not going to say,' " Mr. Marshall said. "If they don't give an answer by Feb. 27, the judge has ordered that someone from the Justice Department appear in his court. The judge is going to want to know why."

Mr. Lynch, who has been involved with the prosecution since the three men were indicted in 2002, said he had no knowledge of secret eavesdropping in the case. Prosecutors have not suggested that Mr. Albanna or his co-defendants were involved in terrorism. "I told the judge the only investigative techniques I know that were used in this case were interviewing witnesses, intercepting express mail packages and using court-approved wiretaps," Mr. Lynch said.

Mr. Albanna, an American citizen who runs a business that supplies candy and cigarettes to stores in the Buffalo area, said he and his co-defendants were part of an informal system, known as hawala, used to send money to people in countries lacking sophisticated banking and communications technology.

He was a spokesman for the Yemeni community in Lackawanna during the prosecution of six men who traveled to Afghanistan and participated in an Al Qaeda training camp in the summer of 2001 before returning to the Buffalo area. All six pleaded guilty to supporting a terrorist organization and are in prison.

A seventh man, Jaber Elbaneh — Mr. Albanna's nephew — remained in Yemen and was charged in absentia. The Justice Department issued a $5 million reward for his capture in 2003.

Mr. Albanna said Mr. Elbaneh's relatives in Lackawanna believed that he has been in custody in Yemen since late that year.

Mr. Albanna was charged in the money-transfer case two months after the arrests of the six men made international headlines. He said Wednesday that he wondered if his high profile as a spokesman for those men was a factor in the federal investigation. "That's what we're trying to find out," he said.

Convict In Al Qaeda Plot Seeks Case Review (WT/AP)

By Matthew Barakat, Associated Press

The Washington Times, February 11, 2006

A Falls Church man convicted of joining al Qaeda and plotting to assassinate President Bush has joined the ranks of those seeking a review of their convictions based on concerns about Mr. Bush's post-September 11 eavesdropping program.

Attorneys for Ahmed Omar Abu Ali, 24, last week asked a federal judge to order prosecutors to divulge whether Abu Ali was ever a subject of the warrantless eavesdropping program that Mr. Bush ordered implemented shortly after the attacks in 2001. They also asked the judge to delay Abu Ali's Feb. 17 sentencing.

DOJ_NMG_0014298

Born in Houston and raised in Northern Virginia, Abu Ali traveled to Saudi Arabia to attend college and was arrested by the Saudis in June 2003. He admitted joining al Qaeda and discussing numerous terrorist plots, including a plan to assassinate Mr. Bush and to return to the United States as the leader of a terror cell.

Abu Ali said he had been tortured into a false confession, but a U.S. District Court jury in Alexandria rejected his claims and in November convicted him on all counts. He faces a mandatory minimum sentence of 20 years and up to life in prison.

It is not clear how Abu Ali's case would have been affected by the eavesdropping program, if at all. Court testimony indicated that the Saudis arrested Abu Ali on their own initiative as part of an investigation into the May 2003 bombings in Riyadh that killed more than 30 people.

An FBI agent testified that Abu Ali had been under investigation in the United States, but that investigation preceded September 11, 2001, when authorities were investigating a group of Muslim men who used paintball games as a means to train for holy war around the world.

The defense motion, though, argues that Abu Ali was a likely target of the National Security Agency eavesdropping program because he was under government surveillance while the program was in effect and because the eavesdropping focused on al Qaeda.

Also, the law requiring prosecutors to turn over evidence gained from wiretaps is broad, so it's possible that any wiretaps involving Abu Ali should have been disclosed to the defense even if their contents were not central to the issues at trial.

The defense also wrote a letter to prosecutors seeking details about any undisclosed surveillance. In response, prosecutor David Laufman wrote that the government sees "no basis to stay Mr. Abu Ali's sentencing."

Attention In N.S.A. Debate Turns To Telecom Industry (NYT)

By Scott Shane

The New York Times, February 11, 2006

WASHINGTON, Feb. 10 — Though much of official Washington has been caught up in the debate over the National Security Agency's domestic surveillance program, one set of major players has kept a discreet silence: the telecommunications corporations.

Some companies are said by current and former government officials to have provided the eavesdropping agency access to streams of telephone and Internet traffic entering and leaving the United States. The N.S.A. has used its powerful computers to search the masses of data for clues to terrorist plots and, without court warrants, zeroed in on some Americans for eavesdropping, those officials say.

Now the companies are in an awkward position, with members of Congress questioning them about their role in the eavesdropping. On Thursday two Democratic senators, Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts and Russell D. Feingold of Wisconsin, wrote to the chief executives of AT&T, Sprint Nextel and Verizon, asking them to confirm or deny a report in USA Today on Monday that said telecommunications executives had identified AT&T, Sprint and MCI (now part of Verizon) as partners of the agency.

The two senators demand information that, if it exists, would be highly classified: details of secret N.S.A. requests for help and the number of people whose communications were intercepted.

In a Feb. 2 reply to a similar query from Representative John Conyers Jr. of Michigan, the top Democrat on the House Judiciary Committee, AT&T offered a careful response. The two-paragraph note did not deny that the company was assisting the agency.

"Without commenting in any way on press reports," wrote Wayne Watts, AT&T's senior vice president and associate general counsel, "let me assure you that AT&T abides by all applicable laws, regulations and statutes in its operations and, in particular, with respect to requests for assistance from governmental authorities."

The Electronic Frontier Foundation, a nonprofit privacy group, has filed a class-action suit against AT&T maintaining that the company's cooperation with the agency is violating customers' privacy. The suit says the company is providing the N.S.A. "direct access" to its "key domestic telecommunications facilities," but does not offer proof.

DOJ_NMG_0014299

December's disclosure of the N.S.A. program and the corporate role in it has trained an unusual spotlight on the extensive and secret cooperation between the government and communications companies.

The companies routinely assist law enforcement and intelligence agencies with eavesdropping authorized by court warrants, a task streamlined by a 1994 law requiring a back door for the government in every new telephone technology. The law, called the Communications Assistance for Law Enforcement Act, or Calea, has created a thriving "lawful intercept" industry for technology to make eavesdropping easier.

But for decades such cooperation has sometimes gone further. Federal law permits companies to intercept calls or e-mail messages without a warrant and protects them from lawsuits if a "certification" is provided by the attorney general or his deputies stating that no warrant is needed.

Such certifications may have been provided to companies assisting the N.S.A. program, because President Bush has said that he authorized it in a secret executive order to operate without warrants. Mr. Bush has said the program is aimed at international communications of people in the United States who are suspected of links to Al Qaeda.

The companies "are going to want to see an explanation of why it's lawful," said Kenneth C. Bass III, a communications lawyer in Washington who worked closely with the N.S.A. as a Justice Department official from 1978 to 1981.

Corporate cooperation with the agency is one of the government's most sensitive secrets, and neither company representatives nor N.S.A. officials would discuss it. "If the carriers could talk about this, they'd say, 'We believe we're doing this on a legal basis, and we think this is an appropriate role for us,' " said Michael J. Kleeman, a veteran telecommunications entrepreneur now at the University of California, San Diego.

Mr. Kleeman and other experts say the kind of cooperation now being provided by the companies has long been customary and is mirrored in many other countries. American telephone executives have traditionally seen their companies' cooperation with intelligence agencies as a patriotic duty, industry officials say. The officials say they have not heard of companies' receiving regulatory breaks, contracts or other benefits for cooperation, both because a quid pro quo is not necessary and because it might expose the secret assistance.

The companies' ties to Washington are formidable. Once a year, 30 of the country's top telecommunications and Internet executives gather in the capital to talk with the government about national security topics like how phone systems can survive nuclear attack.

All members of the National Security Telecommunications Advisory Committee, as the group is known, have been given security clearances to discuss classified programs with senior domestic security, intelligence and White House officials. (Vice President Dick Cheney was at last year's meeting.) Asked whether the committee had discussed the N.S.A. eavesdropping, a committee spokesman, Steve Barrett, said in an e-mail message, "The N.S.T.A.C. is not involved in the gathering of intelligence."

The digital revolution has made government eavesdropping more dependent than ever on corporate cooperation, telecommunications experts say. For decades, the N.S.A. was able to snatch most communications out of the air, maintaining a network of dish antennas to capture traffic transmitted by commercial satellites. But most international traffic has shifted over the last two decades to undersea fiber-optic cables. While a tap can be placed surreptitiously on a cable, company cooperation makes it far easier to sort the thousands of digital messages carried simultaneously in it.

"If you're going to monitor traffic over a fiber cable, you really need the carrier's cooperation," said Jerry Lucas, a telecommunications veteran whose company, TeleStrategies Inc., runs a regular conference called "Intelligence Support Systems for Lawful Interception" where government officials meet company technicians to discuss eavesdropping issues.

As digital technology has grown more complex, the Calea law has made snooping easier, said Anthony M. Rutkowski, president of the Global Lawful Intercept Industry Forum, a group of companies that produce equipment to comply with Calea (pronounced kuh-LEE-uh) and similar foreign laws.

"I don't know of a vendor anywhere that hasn't built intercept capability into its equipment," Mr. Rutkowski said.

But the cost of adding intercept capability sometimes leads to resistance. Currently some companies are fighting a government effort to require intercept capability on the Internet phone service called Voice Over Internet Protocol, or V.O.I.P.

Mr. Rutkowski said the controversy over the N.S.A.'s current practices, like past controversies about domestic surveillance, might have value.

"The marvelous thing about the resilience of the system is that the pendulum does swing," Mr. Rutkowski said. "Eventually it creates a balance between the legitimate need of the government for information against the privacy rights of the citizens."

Justice Moves At Glacial Pace For `enemy Combatant' (CHIT)

By Andrew Zajac, Washington Bureau

Chicago Tribune, February 11, 2006

Unusual circumstances keep a terror suspect, arrested in Illinois in 2001, mired in legal limbo and held in a Navy brig hoping for day in court

WASHINGTON -- With the recent transfer of terror suspect Jose Padilla to a Miami jail to await trial, the sole remaining "enemy combatant" in the U.S., Ali Saleh Kahlab al-Marri, still sits in the Charleston Naval Brig, awaiting the outcome of a slow legal battle over how to dispense justice when an alleged terrorist is a legal alien.

In the eyes of the government, al-Marri is an Al Qaeda sleeper agent sent to the U.S. heartland to help the terrorist network's operatives get settled for follow-up attacks after Sept. 11, 2001.

His lawyers say al-Marri, 40, is an innocent civilian who legally came to the U.S. with his family to obtain a master's degree in engineering at Peoria's Bradley University.

Arrested in West Peoria in December 2001, al-Marri, a Qatari national, was declared an enemy combatant by President Bush on June 23, 2003, and has been held since then in solitary confinement at the South Carolina Navy brig. Al-Marri was effectively out of reach of the U.S. legal system until the Supreme Court declared in June 2004 that enemy combatants have some legal rights.

"Enemy combatant" is the name the Bush administration has used to label some terrorism suspects. These "combatants" reside in a kind of legal limbo, lacking rights traditionally assigned to criminal defendants and prisoners of war. The three enemy combatants initially held in the U.S.--the rest are imprisoned at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba--have been in a strange legal limbo, in part because of their differing circumstances.

Al-Marri and Padilla were arrested on American soil, but unlike al-Marri, Padilla is a U.S. citizen. A third combatant, Yaser Hamdi, was a U.S. citizen but was picked up on a battlefield in Afghanistan.

In addition to seeking a day in court, al-Marri has sued for relief from allegedly harsh and abusive detention. His lawsuit says he has been subjected to prolonged isolation and denial of basic necessities including bedding, clothing and medical care. The government denies mistreating him.

Cautionary tale

Al-Marri's predicament, and the glacial pace of its resolution, is a cautionary tale for millions of non-citizen legal U.S. residents, according to Jonathan Hafetz, one of his attorneys.

"The government can say, `We think you're a bad guy. We're just going to hold you because we think you are,'" said Hafetz of the Liberty and National Security Project at the Brennan Center for Justice in New York.

A federal court in South Carolina ruled in July that as a non-citizen, al-Marri could not simply demand that the government charge him with a crime or release him. The ruling noted the decision "does not close the door to this court to [al-Marri]," but it did not spell out what al-Marri needed to do to challenge his enemy combatant status.

In December, the court said al-Marri was entitled to "receive notice of the factual basis for his classification [as an enemy combatant], and a fair opportunity to rebut the government's factual assertions by presenting more persuasive evidence before a neutral decisionmaker."

But his lawyers say that standard, borrowed from the Supreme Court's June 2004 decision, stacks the deck against al-Marri because some of the evidence against him is secret and unavailable. And the public portion of the government's evidence consists of a sworn statement from a federal agent who did not have firsthand knowledge of the assertions about al-Marri's alleged ties to Al Qaeda, Hafetz said. The allegations include phone calls al-Marri made and material on his laptop.

"All the government has submitted to say they can hold him for the rest of his life is the statement of a single government agent who has no direct knowledge," Hafetz said.

DOJ_NMG_0014301

A Justice Department spokesman declined to comment on the case. But as in all enemy combatant cases, government lawyers in court papers call for giving the president a free hand in dealing with detainees. Their arguments in the al-Marri case lean heavily on the Supreme Court's June 2004 decision regarding Hamdi.

The justices ruled that Hamdi was entitled to a hearing to contest his enemy combatant status but that national security considerations justified compromises, including possibly the use of secondhand information not normally admissible in court.

Government lawyers argue that as a non-citizen U.S. resident, al-Marri cannot demand any more rights or protections than those contemplated for a citizen like Hamdi.

Different circumstances

But Hafetz said the Supreme Court's hearing framework seeks to avoid interference with military operations, a concern specific to the case of Hamdi, who was picked up on the Afghan battlefield. He said it should not apply to al-Marri, who was arrested in the U.S., where obstructing the military is not an issue.

The hearing envisioned for Hamdi never occurred. He was released and allowed to return home to Saudi Arabia in October 2004 after forfeiting his U.S. citizenship.

Padilla, likewise, has not faced a hearing on his enemy combatant status.

The one-time Chicago gang member was arrested at O'Hare International Airport in May 2002 and taken into federal custody. Bush later declared Padilla an enemy combatant, who was transferred to the brig in June 2002.

In a surprise development, Padilla in January was transferred from military control to the custody of the Justice Department in Miami to face terrorism-related charges unrelated to the allegations used to detain him as an enemy combatant.

Al-Marri, meanwhile, has not budged and, according to his lawyers, has not been interrogated in more than a year. Since being moved to the brig, he has not been permitted visits with family, including a wife and five children, who live in Saudi Arabia. A brother, Jarallah al-Marri, is detained at the Guantanamo Bay naval base.

Accusations against Ali al-Marri include that he made a series of telephone calls in late 2001 to a number in the United Arab Emirates used by suicide hijacker Mohammad Atta and others involved in the Sept. 11 attacks. The government says the phone number belonged to Mustafa Ahmed al-Hawsawi, an alleged Al Qaeda paymaster.

Al-Marri's lawyers say they want to know if any evidence against their client was collected through torture.

Al-Marri denies being a terrorist or committing any crimes.

A leading expert on military law faulted the government for delaying a resolution of enemy combatant claims.

"There's this sense that time has no value," said Eugene Fidell, president of the National Institute of Military Justice. "I think the government has to explain what its game plan is. The legal system is illusory for people in his position."

Fidell said federal judges need to be more assertive in establishing a clear process for handling cases of enemy combatants.

"In his [al-Marri's] case as in Padilla's, they were subject to the district court and then whisked out with no watchful eye over them," he said.

---

azajac@tribune.com

Bail Denied For Brooklyn Bookseller Accused Of Financing Terrorism (NYT)

By Julia Preston

The New York Times, February 11, 2006

A federal judge denied bail yesterday to a Muslim bookseller from Brooklyn accused of plotting to buy arms for Islamic fighters in Afghanistan, saying the government appeared to have "very strong evidence" for the terror charges against him.

The judge, Loretta A. Preska, referred to transcripts of secretly recorded conversations between a government informer and the bookseller, Abdulrahman Farhane. Judge Preska said Mr. Farhane understood that he was talking about transferring funds to the Middle East "to purchase arms and equipment," which he knew would be used "for jihad against the United States and other Western powers."

DOJ_NMG_0014302

The evidence that prosecutors presented at Mr. Farhane's bail hearing, in United States District Court in Manhattan, added significant substance to the government's case against him and three other defendants, including Tarik Shah, a New York jazz musician and martial arts instructor who also is Muslim. Mr. Shah, 43, was arrested May 29 and charged with conspiring to teach martial arts to members of Al Qaeda. The tapes include conversations with Mr. Shah and Mr. Farhane about financial transfers.

The evidence bolstered the case against Mr. Shah. Based on an F.B.I. sting, prosecutors were accusing Mr. Shah of agreeing with an undercover F.B.I. informer to train Qaeda fighters in "hand-to-hand combat." But the government did not claim that Mr. Shah had met or had contact with any terrorist operative.

Now Mr. Farhane, a Moroccan-American who is 52, has emerged as the central figure in the case. According to Judge Preska, the prosecutors have audio recordings that capture him discussing specific ways to raise money and transfer it to Islamic fighters battling the United States forces in Afghanistan in the fall of 2001, after the Sept. 11 attacks.

Victor L. Hou, an assistant United States attorney, , said yesterday that Mr. Farhane had introduced Mr. Shah to the government informer at his bookstore. The informer recorded the conversations about financial transfers.

Also charged with terror conspiracy are Rafiq Sabir, a doctor from Florida, and Mahmud Faruq Brent, a paramedic from Washington, D.C. They and Mr. Shah have been detained without bail since their arrests.

In a letter on Thursday to Judge Preska, Mr. Hou wrote that Mr. Farhane, after he was arrested Oct. 26, told investigators that he had introduced Mr. Shah to the informer to help him "send money to jihadists overseas."

The prosecutors also cast new light yesterday on the role of the government informer, a Yemeni named Mohamed Alanssi, who set himself on fire in front of the White House in November 2004, apparently to protest his handling by F.B.I. agents. Mr. Alanssi was a witness in the case in Brooklyn last year that convicted a Yemeni sheik, Mohammed Ali Hassan al-Moayad, of financing terrorism.

Mr. Hou said that "the confidential source" — whom the defense has identified as Mr. Alanssi — first identified Mr. Farhane to the F.B.I. in the weeks after 9/11 as having "radical views of Islam." Starting in December 2001, Mr. Alanssi secretly recorded a series of conversations with Mr. Farhane, many of them at his Brooklyn bookstore. Judge Preska said recordings from the fall of 2001 make it clear that Mr. Farhane was talking about sending money for "wireless communications and advanced weapons" for Islamic fighters.

Michael Hueston, Mr. Farhane's lawyer, called his client a "family man" with six children, including two born in the United States. He questioned why prosecutors had waited since 2001 to arrest him if they regarded him as dangerous.

Mr. Hou grew impassioned when he sought to rebut a statement Mr. Farhane made in court on Wednesday, when he pleaded not guilty and said, "I love this country." Mr. Hou said wiretap recordings in March 2004 register Mr. Farhane as saying: "This is not a country where we should stay. The longer one stays here, the more people make you sick."

The prosecutor said a search of Mr. Farhane's home and store — the House of Knowledge, on Atlantic Avenue — had turned up address books showing that he had several criminal contacts. Karim El-Mejjati, a Moroccan who has been linked to terrorist bombings in Saudi Arabia and Casablanca, had once given Mr. Farhane's address as his own, Mr. Hou said. His book listed, among others, Abad Elfgeeh, who Mr. Hou said was a "money launderer" for Sheik al-Moayad.

Mr. Farhane was arrested in October on lesser charges of making false statements to the F.B.I. Prosecutors brought the terror financing charges against him this week.

U.S. Bookseller's Bail Revoked In Terror Case (FINDLAW/AP)

By Larry Neumeister, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 11, 2006

(AP) - NEW YORK-A bookstore owner accused of supporting terrorists was jailed without bail Friday after a prosecutor played taped conversations in which the man is heard advising not to think of America "as our country."

Abdulrahman Farhane, a 51-year-old U.S. citizen of Moroccan descent, was taken into custody and his $150,000 (â‚¬125,300) bail was revoked by U.S. District Judge Loretta A. Preska, who said her review of government evidence showed the nature of the case and quality of evidence was very serious.

"It appears the government has very strong evidence of the terrorism offenses charged," the jurist said before the red-bearded New York man was led away.

During two bail hearings this week, prosecutors were forced to reveal new details of the case against Farhane, 42-year-old musician Tarik Shah and two others.

When he was initially arrested in October, Farhane was charged with making false statements to the FBI. Shah was originally accused last spring of offering to train others in the martial arts, leading his lawyer to call it the "karate-chop case."

But an indictment returned earlier this week portrayed the case in more sinister terms, saying Farhane and Shah conspired in 2001 to help an FBI cooperating witness send money to aid Islamic militants fighting Americans in Afghanistan.

After reviewing conversations taped by the FBI in Farhane's bookstore in December 2001, the judge said the tapes "make it clear" that Farhane offered to help another man transfer money to the Middle East in 2001 even though he was told some of the money would be spent on communications and advanced weapons.

She said he also told the FBI after his arrest last fall that he knew some of the money might end up being used to fight U.S. forces in Afghanistan.

The judge announced her conclusions after Assistant U.S. Attorney Victor Hou tried to discredit Farhane's Wednesday comment in court that he did nothing wrong, insisting, "This is my country. I love my country."

Hou said a court-authorized telephone wiretap captured statements in 2004 in which he complained about America.

"We should not think of this as our country. This is not a country where we should stay," Hou said Farhane told another man on March 10, 2004. "The longer people stay here, the more people make you sick."

In an April 13, 2004, conversation, Hou said Farhane seemed to be applauding an attack on U.S. forces in Iraq when he said, "The Sunnis gave the U.S. military a lesson they won't forget."

The prosecutor said a man in a Jan. 16, 2004, telephone call with Farhane promised loyalty, saying, "I will kill for you."

He described Farhane as a dangerous facilitator who incites and inspires others and who brought Shah into the scheme because he believed the musician could help with ways to send money to the Middle East.

"You cannot trust him," Hou said.

In a letter to Preska, Hou said Farhane told the FBI last October that there was a duty for Muslims to wage violent jihad to repel invaders in Muslim lands.

Hou said the FBI also found address books belonging to Farhane that read like a "who's who of terrorism financiers in the United States" and then he identified several men who have been convicted and sentenced in U.S. terrorism cases.

He belittled the claims of love for America by the father of six children, saying "behind closed doors when he thinks nobody's listening, he's telling what he really believes."

Defense attorney Michael Hueston argued for continued bail, saying his client had obeyed restrictions since he was put on electronic monitoring after his Oct. 26 arrest.

Hueston said the absence of danger was illustrated by the government's failure to arrest his client between 2001 and last October and contended extensive taping of his client revealed no conversations in which he threatened U.S. forces.

"He's a family man," he said.

Hou suggested that law enforcement authorities waited to arrest Farhane in order to protect a wider investigation.

Terror Trial To Start Despite Late Evidence, Defense Lawyers Say (FINDLAW/AP)

By Don Thompson, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 11, 2006

(AP) - SACRAMENTO-Federal prosecutors have released mounds of documents and hundreds of hours of audiotapes to attorneys defending a father and son charged in a terrorism probe, but the defense said the last-minute flood of evidence will not delay the trial.

Jury selection is expected to begin Tuesday in the trials of Umer Hayat, 48, and his 23-year-old son, Hamid, both of Lodi. Their trials will run concurrently with separate juries.

DOJ_NMG_0014304

The U.S. attorney's office last week turned over 253 compact discs and 45 audiotapes with an estimated 990 hours of secretly recorded conversations - most in foreign languages - between the Hayats and a government informant.

This week, they turned over much more material, mostly documents, that the defense team is struggling to digest as it prepares for trial, said attorney Johnny Griffin III, who represents Umer Hayat.

Nonetheless, "we will not be seeking any types of continuances of the start of the trial," Griffin said Friday.

The government is required to turn over evidence the defense can use to question prosecution witnesses.

The Hayats are accused of lying to the FBI about Hamid Hayat attending a terrorist training camp in Pakistan in 2003 and 2004. Hamid Hayat also is charged with providing material support to terrorists by attending the camp and returning to the United States last May with the intent to commit terrorist acts.

Both men were arrested in June in the agricultural town about 35 miles south of Sacramento. They have denied the charges and are being held in Sacramento County Jail awaiting trial.

A Late Surprise For Lodi Defense (SACBEE)

By Denny Walsh, Bee Staff Writer

The Sacramento Bee, February 11, 2006

With terrorism trials near, new trove of evidence is revealed.

Shortly before the start of trials of Umer Hayat of Lodi and his son Hamid Hayat on terrorism-related charges, federal prosecutors dumped a huge load of tapes and a stack of FBI reports on defense attorneys.

In addition, they filed documents under seal and heavily redacted other documents to keep information secret.

The government's actions once again suggest it wants to delay the start of the trials in the highly publicized case. The trials, with two juries at the same time in the same courtroom, are scheduled to start Tuesday.

The government has gone to extraordinary lengths to keep information secret and repeatedly has sought to delay the trials of the two Lodi men charged with lying to the FBI about their alleged terrorist ties.

Umer Hayat, a 48-year-old Lodi ice cream truck driver, and his 23-year-old son Hamid have been in jail since June 5, in connection with an FBI terrorism investigation. In addition to accusations of false statements, Hamid Hayat is charged with supporting terrorism by attending an al-Qaida training camp in Pakistan.

Thirteen days before the start of Tuesday's trials, prosecutors gave defense lawyers 253 compact discs and 45 audiotapes containing an estimated 990 hours of surreptitiously recorded conversations involving the Hayats and an FBI informant dating back to April 30, 2003. A substantial portion of the recordings are in foreign languages.

While prosecutors said their actions were necessary, one defense attorney involved in several terrorism cases elsewhere says the actions indicate a troubling pattern.

San Diego attorney Mahir T. Sherif said the government's attitude has been to "do whatever it takes to get a conviction or get these people we are suspicious of out of the country. And if that means arresting them first and getting evidence later, so be it. That's the tone that has been set at the top of the federal executive branch."

The pattern, he said, is to arrest without proof beyond a reasonable doubt and, if the subjects are not deportable, then prosecutors "try to break them down to get a plea deal."

"The government wants to be able to say it thwarted another terrorist plot," Sherif said.

The prosecutors' last-ditch surrender of material could have prompted defense attorneys to ask U.S. District Judge Garland E. Burrell Jr. for more time to prepare for trial.

On at least five occasions since the Hayats were first indicted June 16, prosecutors have opposed defense efforts to get a speedy trial. And the government succeeded in postponing the initial Aug. 23 trial.

When prosecutors recently suggested defense attorneys obtain security clearances - a process that would take months - the Hayats' lawyers, Johnny Griffin III and Wazhma Mojaddidi, labeled the suggestion "insincere, unfounded and just another tactic by the government to force delays in this case."

The defense attorneys first invoked the federal Speedy Trial Act on July 1, asking for a trial within 70 days of the Hayats' arraignments. But, from the outset, the government opposed such requests.

DOJ_NMG_0014305

The prosecutors "obviously felt they would have had a hard time proving a case had it gone to trial within 70 days," Sherif said. "If they felt they could get a conviction by going to trial when the defense wanted to, they would not have hesitated."

To justify stopping the speedy trial clock, prosecutors and Burrell repeatedly cited time consumed in honoring the defense attorneys' requests that more than 40 federal, state and local government agencies be surveyed for whatever information may exist about the Hayats.

But the government felt no compulsion to comb the files of all the agencies listed in the defense requests, according to court papers.

In a July 6 motion to stop the speedy trial clock, prosecutors said they had asked only select federal agencies in the executive branch and intelligence community to review their files.

As to other federal agencies, the defense would have to present facts tending to show an agency is in possession of information helpful to the defense "before the government has an obligation to initiate a review," prosecutors said in the motion.

Further, prosecutors said, they have no obligation to search for information "in the custody, possession, and control of state or local law enforcement agencies."

Griffin, a former federal prosecutor, said the government had the responsibility to search for all relevant information about the defendants, even without the defense requests. And, he said, the government should have been ready for trial before it arrested the Hayats and fought to keep them in jail without bail.

The defense attorneys complained for months that they were not being given access in a timely fashion to information in the government's possession.

In a heated Aug. 5 debate before Burrell, a prosecutor argued that the government could not search for and retrieve all information relative to the Hayats by the Aug. 23 trial date.

"So, if they want to push the pause button," Griffin countered, "they want to stop (the speedy trial clock), they should dismiss the case. And if and when they're fully prepared to honor their discovery obligation, and therefore truly announce (they are) ready for trial, then let's try the case."

Two months later, when prosecutors S. Robert Tice-Raskin and Laura Ferris told the judge they still were not finished searching and retrieving information from the files of various federal intelligence agencies and asked for another delay, Mojaddidi told Burrell the prosecutors were "buying time to develop a case against our clients, which they do not yet have."

Running on a parallel track has been the prosecution's effort to keep secret material connected to the case, some of it unclassified by the government.

Prosecutors have met with Burrell in secret on a number of occasions and have submitted to him a steady stream of sealed documents, all under the authority of the federal Classified Information Procedures Act.

Prosecutors recently filed a series of motions - some heavily redacted - asking Burrell for "protective orders" covering unidentified material they were submitting to the judge.

In one motion, the prosecutors ask Burrell to order restrictions on the dissemination of unclassified information.

According to the motion, the information in question is contained in "sensitive declassified recorded conversations involving the defendants, (a) confidential witness and/or other individuals," and in "declassified imagery which the United States intends to use at trial in this matter. This imagery is highly sensitive."

"Disclosure of the sensitive information beyond the defense team should be precluded to avoid the risk of revealing U.S. government investigative tactics and techniques relating to both the recorded conversations and the imagery," the motion says. "Knowledge of such tactics and techniques could be employed by others to limit the success of future use of these various techniques."

After all the rhetoric about how the case implicates national security and classified information, prosecutors now acknowledge that their search yielded no classified documents they will use at trial.

What is classified, they say, is information needed to lay a foundation for what are described in court documents as four images of "the earth's surface and of the objects ... in the vicinity of Balakot, Pakistan." In other words, the details of how the images were obtained and processed are classified.

DOJ_NMG_0014306

Griffin and Mojaddidi have told the prosecutors and Burrell they don't care about the details of the images' origins, and they will not object to their admissibility. They also want the images admitted as evidence because they think it will help their clients in the eyes of the jurors.

Burrell has ordered Umer and Hamid Hayat tried before two juries at the same time.

Umer Hayat is charged in a grand jury indictment with lying to the FBI to conceal his alleged firsthand knowledge of terrorist training camps in his native Pakistan and his son's alleged training at one or more of the camps.

Hamid Hayat is charged in the same indictment with providing material support to terrorists by undergoing the training and re-entering this country to await instructions from unnamed others "to wage violent jihad against the United States."

The Hayats, both U.S. citizens, have pleaded not guilty. If convicted, Hamid Hayat faces a 23-year prison term and Umer Hayat faces an eight-year term.

After more than eight months of legal wrangling over defense access to information and the timing of the trials, the case still hangs primarily on confessions the two Lodi men allegedly made to FBI agents June 4. Their attorneys say those statements were made under duress.

Related graphic Lodi terror case [190k PDF]

About the writer:

The Bee's Denny Walsh can be reached at (916) 321-1189 or dwalsh@sacbee.com.

Would-be Terrorist Got Cold Feet After Sept. 11 (DMN/AP)

Associated Press

The Dallas Morning News, February 11, 2006

Malaysian officials say he had trained to pilot jet in West Coast attack

KUALA LUMPUR, Malaysia – A Malaysian man recruited by al-Qaeda to pilot a plane in a Sept. 11-style attack on the West Coast pulled out after observing the carnage of the 2001 assaults, Southeast Asian officials said Friday.

Malaysian engineer Zaini Zakaria was among three men al-Qaeda was preparing to take part in an attack in the U.S., the officials said. Mr. Zaini, 38, has been detained without trial under the Internal Security Act in Malaysia since he surrendered in December 2002.

On Thursday, President Bush outlined details of an alleged plot to hijack an airliner and fly it into a skyscraper in Los Angeles. He said that terrorists intended to use shoe bombs to break into the cockpit and fly the plane into the 73-story US Bank Tower downtown.

Mr. Bush said that cooperation between Washington and several Asian countries had helped to thwart the plan. "It took the combined efforts of several countries to break up this plot," he said.

The plan never appeared close to the stage where it could be put into execution. Scores of arrests after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks severely curtailed al-Qaeda and its Southeast Asian affiliate, Jemaah Islamiyah.

Mr. Zaini, a native of the northeastern state of Kelantan, surrendered to Malaysian authorities in Kelantan in December 2002, said his former lawyer, Saiful Izham Ramli.

The two other men implicated in the attack plans were Zacarias Moussaoui, who is in U.S. custody, and Abderraouf Jdey, who remains at large with a $5 million U.S. bounty on his head.

Two Malaysian security officials, speaking on condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to discuss the issue with the media, said Mr. Zaini was the only suspect in the alleged plot known to be in Malaysian custody.

Mr. Zaini traveled to al-Qaeda camps in Afghanistan in 1999, where he met senior figures in the terrorist group, including an Indonesian, Riduan Isamuddin, also known as Hambali, one of the Malaysian security officials said. Mr. Isamuddin was arrested in 2003 in Thailand and is in U.S. custody.

After returning to Malaysia the same year, Mr. Zaini enrolled in a flight school and obtained a license to fly a small plane. He then began making inquiries in Australia about getting a license to fly a jet, the official said.

But Mr. Zaini was never told what his mission for al-Qaeda would be.

When he saw media coverage of the Sept. 11 attacks, he severed his ties with the militants, the official said.

DOJ_NMG_0014307

Mr. Zaini told Malaysian interrogators that he "didn't want that kind of jihad," the official said.

A second Malaysian security official said Mr. Zaini told his Malaysian interrogators that "he was not prepared to die as a martyr, so he backed out."

A possible "second wave" attack was mentioned briefly in the June 2004 U.S. National Commission report on the Sept. 11 attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon. The report quoted Khalid Shaikh Mohammed, the reputed Sept. 11 mastermind, as saying "three potential pilots were recruited for the alleged second wave." It identified them as Mr. Moussaoui, Mr. Jdey and Mr. Zaini.

Mr. Mohammed, who was arrested in Pakistan in 2003, told his U.S. interrogators that "he was too busy with the 9/11 plot to plan the second wave of attacks," the report said.

Mr. Moussaoui, a Frenchman of Moroccan descent, has pleaded guilty in a U.S. court to conspiring to fly planes into buildings, and a jury is being selected to decide whether he is put to death or sentenced to life in prison.

The State Department is offering a reward of up to $5 million for information leading to the capture and conviction of Mr. Jdey, who was born in Tunisia but is a naturalized Canadian citizen.

Mr. Saiful, the former lawyer for Mr. Zaini, said his client never told his lawyers about taking flight classes, and his arrest records do not describe him as a pilot or being a suspect in a "second wave" attack.

He said authorities had sought Mr. Zaini mainly for his links with Jemaah Islamiyah, a common charge for which scores of suspects are being held in a high-security prison in Kamunting under a law that allows indefinite detention without trial.

Mr. Zaini's wife is from the Ulu Tiram district in southern Johor state, the site of a school where Mr. Isamuddin and other Indonesian terrorist leaders were thought to be based for some years.

In 2003, the U.S. ordered a freeze on Mr. Zaini's financial assets and those of several other suspects. His family is now so poor that they cannot afford to travel to Kamunting in central Malaysia to visit him, Mr. Saiful said.

Moussaoui Trial Difficult For Both Sides (MINNST)

By Greg Gordon

Minneapolis Star Tribune, February 11, 2006

A newly released transcript of a secret hearing revealed huge logistical problems in the trial of Zacarias Moussaoui

WASHINGTON, D.C. - Confessed Al-Qaida conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui refused for months to speak with his lawyers or to review key documents for his sentencing trial, prompting a federal judge to consider meeting privately with him and his lawyers, it was disclosed Friday.

U.S. District Judge Leonie Brinkema decided instead to order guards at the city jail in Alexandria, Va., to give court-appointed defense lawyers greater access to Moussaoui in hopes that communication would improve, according to a newly declassified transcript of a secret Jan. 5 court hearing.

Jury selection began this week in the sentencing trial to determine whether Moussaoui, who pled guilty last April to six counts of conspiring with the Sept. 11 suicide hijackers, will get the death penalty. Moussaoui's outbursts in front of prospective jurors created a new complication in the case.

A host of problems

In ordering release of the transcript, Brinkema offered a glimpse of huge, behind-the-scenes logistical problems plaguing the only U.S. prosecution stemming from the 2001 attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon.

The transcript also revealed that Minneapolis FBI agent Harry Samit, one of two agents who arrested Moussaoui 3½ weeks before the attacks, will be a central witness for both prosecutors and defense lawyers. As many as seven Minneapolis FBI and immigration agents and personnel were listed as possible witnesses, along with two former FBI counter-terrorism chiefs, lawyers said.

During the closed hearing, Brinkema pressed defense lawyers to reduce the large number of classified documents they seek to introduce and urged prosecutors to assist them.

DOJ_NMG_0014308

She said she will require government security officers to stay on 24-hour call in case issues surrounding classified information arise. She said it is possible that impasses over sensitive material will force emergency reviews by a federal appeals court.

"I've got to remind both sides this case is going to look terrible and play terribly in the public's eye if we get it started and I have to have a three-day recess to resolve those matters or argue them before an appeals court," she said. "And we may lose this jury."

She conceded that both sides "are laboring under unbelievably difficult conditions."

He's not talking to his lawyers

Brinkema asked defense lawyers if they were communicating with Moussaoui.

"He's refused all correspondence from us, including packages," defense lawyer Alan Yamamoto replied.

Brinkema also said that when she finishes crafting substitutions for the classified statements of Al-Qaida captives whom Moussaoui sought to question, she would herself send them to Moussaoui for his review, so he cannot later claim that his rights were denied. "He tends to read things I send him," Brinkema said.

The case was hung up for two years over Moussaoui's demand for access to captives who support his contention that he knew nothing about the Sept. 11 plot.

Efforts to improve relations between Moussaoui, a 37-year-old Frenchman of Moroccan descent, and his lawyers apparently failed. On Monday, he disrupted each of four initial sessions with prospective jurors, denouncing his lawyers until he was ordered removed from the courtroom.

The judge has scheduled a public hearing Tuesday to discuss trial "logistics" and is expected to warn Moussaoui that he will be constrained or barred from the trial if his outbursts continue.

Greg Gordon is a correspondent in the Star Tribune Washington bureau.

'Vengeful Act' (NSWK)

By Jamie Reno

Newsweek, February 11, 2006

A family lawyer for Zacarias Moussaoui discusses the sanity and possible execution of 9/11's alleged '20th hijacker.'

Jury selection began in Alexandria, Va., this week in the federal death-penalty trial of Zacarias Moussaoui, the only person in the United States charged in the September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. Arrested in August 2001, Moussaoui, whose incarceration has been marked by bizarre in-court outbursts and an uncooperative relationship with his attorneys, had insisted since 9/11 that he had nothing to do with the terrorist plot. But in April, he surprised everyone and changed his plea to guilty of conspiring to fly planes into U.S. buildings. Moussaoui now faces the death penalty or life in prison.

Moussaoui's mother, Aicha El-Wafi, who lives in France but plans to attend the trial when it begins next month, told reporters last year that her son is a "scapegoat" and that he pleaded guilty simply "to have peace." She also said her son should be "judged and convicted for what he did, and not because he is an Arab or an Islamist." El-Wafi's American attorney, Randy Hamud, a controversial civil-rights advocate who also represented several San Diego-based Middle Eastern students who were friendly with 9/11 terrorists Nawaf Alhazmi and Khalid Almidhar, remains in contact with Moussaoui's family. He spoke to NEWSWEEK about his belief that Moussaoui is "deranged" and a scapegoat. Excerpts:

NEWSWEEK: How would you describe Zacarias Moussaoui's mental state?

Randy Hamud: Over the years, his paranoia and delusional thoughts and words have skewed the whole of the proceedings. Khalid Shaikh Mohammed [the alleged mastermind of the attacks] has stated that Mr. Moussaoui wasn't included in the 9/11 plot because he was unstable, and he continues to be unstable.

Do you think he's mentally fit to stand trial?

No, I don't. How can he plead guilty to 9/11 when in the same breath he denied being a participant in that plot? It was not a rational decision or a shining moment in our jurisprudential system when the judge accepted such a preposterous plea.

But Moussaoui did plead guilty. Why should he not be given the death penalty or life in prison?

Because he never was a 9/11 player, has always maintained that he had nothing to do with 9/11, and even concurrently with his guilty plea, he denied he was a 9/11 player ... And because he was not a 9/11 player, he certainly does not deserve the ultimate penalty. With his professed membership and support of Al Qaeda, he's talked himself into 10 years in prison, not the death chamber. If he is executed for 9/11, it would be the vengeful act of a vengeful government.

What do you think of Moussaoui's defense attorneys?

He has a first-class team of defense lawyers who were battling the government, him and public opprobrium to cobble together his sound defense to the charges. Unfortunately, his impulsive guilty plea short-circuited their magnificent efforts.

What was your involvement with Moussaoui's defense team early on?

None, other than to interface with his mother and the defense team, and earlier on, on her behalf, to measure the skills of the defense team with a view toward retaining other counsel if they were not up to the task. I soon found that they were well qualified and committed to his defense.

What do you expect from the defense during this death-penalty trial?

They will have to present all evidence of mitigation and sympathy for Mr. Moussaoui, including his childhood, etc. Also, they will probably try to establish that he did not really know any details about 9/11 and could not have helped the government to prevent it if he had been cooperating, [that] before 9/11 the government itself knew more about the conspiracy and the conspirators than did Mr. Moussaoui; only bureaucratic bumbling prevented timely discovery of the plot.

What do you expect from the prosecution during this trial?

Inflammatory statements, testimony from the victims' families, every stratagem by which they can appeal to the passion and prejudices of the jury.

Do you think the Muslim world be watching this trial closely?

I think so, because he is on trial for his life. The recent conviction of imam [Abu Hamza] al-Masri in England [for charges including incitement to murder] has been overshadowed by the [Prophet Muhammad] cartoon controversy which has set the Islamic world aflame. When that settles down, Moussaoui"s trial should get lots of play on Al-Jazeera and the other Arabic and Middle East networks. Since Abu Ghraib and Guantanamo, nobody in the Middle East believes that Muslim Arabs are fairly treated anywhere in the U.S. or in any venue where the U.S. military calls the shots.

How does this trial compare and contrast to other trials around the world involving suspected terrorists and members of Al Qaeda?

In the other trials, there seems to be an actual nexus between the charges and the defendants. Not so here; he was not a 9/11 player even though he pled guilty to it. It's all a fantastic fantasy in which the court participated by accepting his plea because, I believe, it had finally lost patience with him and his outbursts.

How do you think the American public views Moussaoui?

As a demon and a pariah, just as the administration has depicted him since his arrest. Even that widely used photo of the clean-shaved, shaved-headed, "buff" Moussaoui is a grand illusion; in person, he is a meek, little man who is not buff, not menacing, and really looks nothing like that notorious photograph.

How did you come to represent Moussaoui's mother?

She learned of my work through the media and contacted me first in May of 2002 when Mr. Moussaoui was not cooperating with his lawyers. She asked me if I could try to help convince him to cooperate with his attorneys.

Do you believe, as Moussaoui's mother does, that Moussaoui is a scapegoat?

Yes, I do. He may be guilty of membership or sympathy for Al Qaeda, but he certainly was not a 9/11 player. That's the rub. The government failed to bring to the bar of justice any of the real 9/11 players, such as Khalid Shaik Mohammed, Ramzi bin al-Shibh, even Osama Bin Laden, and needs a scapegoat so it can gloat to the American people that it has captured and executed one of the culpable parties.

What is Moussaoui's mother's position at this point?

She is devastated. She's planning to come to the United States the first week in March when the actual trial begins. She was crushed when he pled guilty, because she knows he had nothing to do with 9/11.

I'm sure you realize that your opinions about this case are going to anger many Americans, right?

Not really. Americans usually like criminal defendants to be connected to the charges and usually don't like the thought of accepting the guilty plea of a deranged man who is clearly innocent of the actual charges against him. Remember, he was in jail on 9/11. And for a while during the period of his self-representation, his publicized written and oral tirades actually caught the attention and sympathies of several columnists and pundits who wondered aloud whether Mr. Moussaoui was "all there." He hasn't changed. We've changed. We're trying to execute someone for a crime which the government itself knows he did not commit. It's a dark chapter in our jurisprudential history. Hopefully it will be an exception rather than the new paradigm for the future.

Brit Treasury Chief Forms Terrorism Team (AP)

By TARIQ PANJA

Associated Press, February 11, 2006

LONDON (AP) -- British Treasury Chief Gordon Brown plans to assemble a team of financial experts to end terrorism funding streams - the equivalent of the intelligence experts who broke the Nazis' Enigma Code during World War II, his office said Friday.

In a speech Monday at the Royal United Services Institute for Defense and Security Studies- a professional forum concerned with national and international defense and security - Brown is expected to outline a series of measures aimed at cutting off terrorists' cash flow.

His comments come as the British parliament prepares for key votes on national ID cards and anti-terrorism legislation.

Brown is widely backed as the most likely candidate to take over from Prime Minister Tony Blair, who will not run in Britain's next general election. In Monday's speech, Brown is expected to say that in his role as finance minister, he has played a significant international security role.

"And I have discovered that this requires an international operation using modern methods of forensic accounting as imaginative and path-breaking for our times as the Enigma codebreakers at Bletchley Park achieved more than half a century ago," Brown will say, according to excerpts of the speech obtained by the Associated Press.

A spokesman for the Treasury, speaking on customary condition of anonymity, said the speech will focus on the balance between security and liberty.

In July 2005, 56 people - including four suicide bombers - died when London's transit system was attacked. Part of Brown's speech is expected to focus on the importance of strangling extremists' sources of money, and how that would help minimize the chances of further attacks.

Brown is also expected to outline intelligence evidence gathered by British security sources showing the funding and planning of terror attacks by global networks.

He is also planning to announce a review of the rules protecting charities from exploitation by extremist groups, and tougher action to prevent terrorists abusing bureaux de change and wire transfers.

Closer communication with banks to monitor suspicious transactions and a possible strengthening of the system for seizing assets will also be outlined by Brown.

Since Sept. 11, Britain has frozen $139 million in terrorist assets, including from over 100 organizations linked to al-Qaida, according to figures released by the Treasury Department.

Syrian Accused Of Planning 2003 Attacks (LAT)

From Times Wire Reports

The Los Angeles Times, February 11, 2006

A Syrian was charged with masterminding suicide bombings in 2003 that killed 58 people in Istanbul, and Turkish prosecutors claimed that Osama bin Laden personally ordered him to carry out attacks.

Loai Mohammed Haj Bakr Saqa, 32, was accused of serving as a point man between Al Qaeda and homegrown militants behind the series of suicide bombings in Istanbul in 2003, said the indictment.

It said Saqa had given the militants in Turkey about $170,000.

DOJ_NMG_0014311

Saqa had cosmetic surgery, according to a medical report, and operated by using an array of fake IDs and aliases even with Al Qaeda contacts, according to the indictment.

PATRIOT ACT:

GOP Accepts Patriot Act Compromise (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, February 11, 2006

CAMBRIDGE, Md. -- Speaker J. Dennis Hastert said yesterday that House Republicans can accept the USA Patriot Act deal struck Thursday, and key Senate Democrats also endorsed the proposed changes as a good compromise.

"I think they were enough to make sure we can protect the American people," Mr. Hastert, Illinois Republican, told reporters as House Republicans were meeting on Maryland's Eastern Shore for their annual retreat.

Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, who in December led a filibuster of the bill and boasted he had "killed" the last version, supports the new compromise, a spokesman for the Nevada Democrat said.

The announcements mean the bill, which extends the USA Patriot Act while adding a few new checks, is likely to clear final legislative hurdles and be sent to President Bush for his signature.

The House Republicans met with Mr. Bush for nearly two hours yesterday, most of it behind closed doors, to talk about their agenda and strategy going into November's congressional elections. During the meeting, Mr. Bush repeated his pledge to catch terrorists "dead or alive."

"Laura doesn't like me saying this, but I believe we do need to find al Qaeda, dead or alive," he said, according to a participant.

He also defended the National Security Agency surveillance program, telling the Republicans: "I wake up every morning thinking about a future attack and, therefore, a lot of my thinking and a lot of the decisions I make are based upon the attack that hurt us."

After weeks of rejecting calls for greater congressional oversight, Mr. Bush has agreed to allow briefings for all members of the intelligence committees. Previously just the "gang of eight" -- the top Republican and Democrat on the House and Senate intelligence committees, as well as the Republican and Democrat leaders in each chamber -- were briefed.

Rep. Heather A. Wilson, New Mexico Republican and a member of the House intelligence committee who had sought disclosure to the committee, stood up and thanked the president.

Mr. Hastert told reporters the expansion of the briefings was the right step, and when asked whether Congress would take action to rein in the activities, he defended them.

"It really comes down to what we do to keep this country safe," he said. "Somebody in this country, whether it is a foreign national or a citizen, talking to al Qaeda, somebody ought to know about it and why it is happening."

Republicans described the session as very open and extremely friendly. Rep. John T. Doolittle, California Republican, said Mr. Bush delivered "the equivalent of a post-graduate seminar on world diplomacy."

The president also defended the new Medicare prescription drug benefit, which took effect at the beginning of the year, saying there were bound to be some glitches in a program that has signed up 26 million seniors.

Mr. Bush tossed in a number of jokes, including several at his own expense: "If any of you are ever president, make sure you surround yourself with smart, capable people -- people smarter than you; in my case, it wasn't all that hard to find."

He also said he will not be swayed by low approval ratings.

"If I worried about the polls, I'd be laying on the ground in the fetal position," Mr. Bush said.

Despite the polls, House Republicans said there's no effort to try to separate themselves from him.

Rep. Thomas M. Reynolds of New York, chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee, said among House Republicans Mr. Bush is "pretty well sought-after" to campaign in their districts.

DOJ_NMG_0014312

He said some Republicans, such as Rep. Rob Simmons of Connecticut, may not want to have Mr. Bush campaign in their district, but many Southern Democrats don't want House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat, campaigning for them.

"I think it's a nice trade-off," he said.

Hastert Backs Compromise On Patriot Act (AP)

By Jim Abrams

AP, February 11, 2006

Legislation to renew the anti-terror Patriot Act was cleared for final congressional passage Friday when House Speaker Dennis Hastert blessed a day-old compromise between the White House and Senate Republicans.

Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid also indicated he will vote for the bill when it comes to a vote, possibly next week.

The legislation gives federal agents expanded powers to investigate suspected terrorists in the United States, and the Bush administration has said it is one of the key weapons in the war on terror.

"I think they (the changes in the bill) were enough to make sure we can protect the American people," Hastert told reporters at Cambridge, Md., speaking of three revisions that the white House and Senate GOP holdouts announced on Thursday.

The House "should move forward with it as soon as the Senate" acts, he said. A short-term extension of the measure expires on March 10.

Passage of the bill was stalled late last year when four Senate Republicans joined Democrats in saying that it shortchanged civil liberties protections in the name of the war on terror.

Reid's spokesman, Jim Manley, said the Nevada Democrat intends to vote for the bill. The Senate's second-ranking Democrat, Sen. Richard Durbin of Illinois, is also among its supporters.

Judiciary Committee member Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., also said the bill had been substantially improved by the changes and she would vote for it.

Any changes made would still have to be approved by the House, but Sen. Larry Craig, R-Idaho, another negotiator, said that with the Senate and the White House in concert, he thought the House would go along. He said he had consulted with House Judiciary Committee Chairman James Sensenbrenner, R-Wis. "There will be no additional negotiations," Craig said.

Sensenbrenner declined comment, but Hastert said he had discussed the bill with the chairman.

The changes, worked out over several weeks of talks, specifically with the office of White House counsel Harriet Miers, covered three main areas:

_Under the first, recipients of court-approved subpoenas for information in terrorist investigations would have the right to challenge a requirement that they refrain from telling anyone.

_The second removes a requirement that an individual provide the FBI with the name of an attorney consulted about a National Security Letter, which is a demand for records issued by administrators.

_The third clarifies that most libraries are not subject to National Security Letter demands for information about suspected terrorists.

White House spokesman Scott McClellan said the agreement would "continue to build upon the civil liberties protections that are in place but do so in a way that doesn't compromise our national security priorities."

But Sen. Russell Feingold, D-Wis., a leader in opposing the act, said he would continue to fight it.

He said the deal did not provide meaningful judicial review of gag orders because such review can only take place after a year has passed and can only be successful if the recipient proves the government acted in bad faith.

The deal also does not ensure that when government agents break into homes to do "sneak-and-peek" searches that it tells the owners of those homes, in most circumstances within seven days, as courts have said they should, Feingold added.

The law originally was passed within days of the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, and the administration says it has been an important weapon in the government's arsenal for tracking suspected terrorists.

DOJ_NMG_0014313

Renewal of the law was blocked last year when critics said its provisions shortchanged civil liberties, particularly in the cases of individuals who were not suspected of terrorist activities themselves, but might have had innocent dealings with suspects.

Also at issue was concern over the government's ability to demand information from libraries.

As a result of the deadlock, lawmakers had to approve two temporary extensions of the old law. The current extension expires March 10.

Republicans said that with the changes, the chance would be remote that any library would have to turn over information.

But Democrats said the same provision made explicit that some libraries could be forced to turn over information, adding that existing law is vague on the subject.

Other than Sununu, the Republicans who had defied the president's wishes on the Patriot Act last December were Craig, Lisa Murkowski of Alaska and Chuck Hagel of Nebraska.

Hastert Backs Deal On USA Patriot Act (REU)

Reuters, February 11, 2006

House Speaker Dennis Hastert on Friday embraced a deal reached by a group of Senate Republicans and the White House to renew the USA Patriot Act, a centerpiece of President Bush's war on terrorism.

Hastert, an Illinois Republican, said once the Senate passes the measure, likely next week, the House would give it final congressional approval so Bush can sign it into law.

"If the Senate passes it, we'll pass it," Hastert told reporters at a retreat by House Republicans in Cambridge.

The deal, announced on Thursday, was designed to address demands for better protection of civil liberties.

The Patriot Act, initially enacted after the September 11 attacks, expanded the power of federal law enforcement to conduct wiretaps and secret searches and share information.

The pending legislation would make permanent 14 key provisions, now set to expire on March 10, and extend two others for four years.

While some Senate Democrats portrayed the White House-backed deal as failing to address civil liberties concerns adequately, several Senate Republicans and Democrats who had earlier balked at renewing the law now supported it.

One change would allow individuals to challenge gag orders when they have been subpoenaed to produce sensitive information on library, medical, education or gun-related records.

Another would clarify that traditional libraries would not be subjected to special subpoenas, which are not issued by judges, to gain records.

A group of Republican and Democratic senators combined in December to stage a filibuster, a procedural move that blocked a vote on an earlier House-passed measure to renew the act.

Since then, Congress approved two short-term extensions.

"It's time we get it done on a long-term basis," Hastert said.

Another Cave-In On The Patriot Act (NYT)

The New York Times, February 11, 2006

The Patriot Act has been one of the few issues on which Congress has shown backbone lately. Last year, it refused to renew expiring parts of the act until greater civil liberties protections were added. But key members of the Senate have now caved, agreeing to renew these provisions in exchange for only minimal improvements. At a time when the public is growing increasingly concerned about the lawlessness of the Bush administration's domestic spying, the Senate should insist that any reauthorization agreement do more to protect Americans against improper secret searches.

When the Patriot Act was passed after Sept. 11, 2001, Congress made some of its most far-reaching provisions temporary so it would be able to reconsider them later on. Those provisions were set to expire last December, but Congress agreed to a very short extension so greater civil liberties protections could be added. This week, four key Republican senators — later backed by two Democrats — said that they had agreed to a deal with the White House. It is one that does little to protect Americans from government invasions of their privacy.

DOJ_NMG_0014314

One of the most troubling aspects of the Patriot Act is the "gag order" imposed by Section 215, which prohibits anyone holding financial, medical and other private records of ordinary Americans from saying anything when the government issues a subpoena for those records. That means that a person whose records are being taken, and whose privacy is being invaded, has no way to know about the subpoena and no way to challenge it.

Rather than removing this gag order, the deal keeps it in place for a full year — too long for Americans to wait to learn that the government is spying on them. Even after a year, someone holding such records would have to meet an exceedingly high standard to get the gag order lifted. It is not clear that this change has much value at all.

The compromise also fails to address another problem with Section 215: it lets the government go on fishing expeditions, spying on Americans with no connection to terrorism or foreign powers. The act should require the government, in order to get a subpoena, to show that there is a connection between the information it is seeking and a terrorist or a spy.

But the deal would allow subpoenas in instances when there are reasonable grounds for simply believing that information is relevant to a terrorism investigation. That is an extremely low bar.

One of the most well-publicized objections to the Patriot Act is the fact that it allows the government to issue national security letters, an extremely broad investigative tool, to libraries, forcing them to turn over their patrons' Internet records. The wording of the compromise is unclear. If it actually says that national security letters cannot be used to get Internet records from libraries, that would be an improvement, but it is not clear that it does.

In late December, it looked as if there was bipartisan interest in the Senate for changing the worst Patriot Act provisions and standing up for Americans' privacy rights. Now the hope of making the needed improvements has faded considerably.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Mayor Miffed: The White House Never Calls (LAT)

By Steve Hymon

The Los Angeles Times, February 11, 2006

Los Angeles Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa's frustration at not being told personally by the White House about the details of the reported terror plot against the city's tallest building stems from a greater annoyance:

Nearly 7 1/2 months after taking office, Villaraigosa said Friday that he still has not succeeded in speaking or meeting with President Bush.

Villaraigosa said that his office contacted the White House on two occasions last summer to set up meetings with Bush when the mayor was traveling to Washington, but that the White House turned down both.

The mayor — who co-chaired John Kerry's campaign to unseat Bush in 2004 — said the only personal contact he has had with the president is a congratulatory letter he received after being elected last year. In the four-sentence letter, Bush wrote, "I look forward to working with you as we strive to make our nation safer, stronger and better."

If he could get a meeting, Villaraigosa said, he would talk to the president about how to better protect the nation's second-largest city against terrorist attacks.

"No question about it, I would like to talk to him about the issue of homeland security and the issue of first responders and the need of cities to be fully reimbursed for the new, added cost" of security, Villaraigosa said. "I want to make the case that this is draining other very important municipal needs."

Dana Perino, a White House press secretary, said the White House had received two requests from the mayor for a meeting: one in a letter, the other in an e-mail.

"Because of scheduling reasons, the mayor was offered meetings with top officials, and those offers were kindly declined" by the mayor's office, Perino said.

"The other thing I would say," she added, "is the president has encouraged members of the Cabinet to meet with the mayor of Los Angeles," and Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff "was recently there. We want to work with the mayor, and we look forward to a good relationship with him."

DOJ_NMG_0014315

Villaraigosa was visibly upset Thursday after a Bush speech in which the president offered new details of an alleged plot by Al Qaeda operatives to hijack a plane and fly it into the U.S. Bank Tower downtown. The plot, Bush said, had been broken up.

The mayor complained Friday that, although his staff was notified of some details, he deserved a call himself. Homeland Security officials took umbrage at that comment, saying that Bush was only giving a speech and that there was no direct threat to Los Angeles at present.

The mayor has only to look at some of his counterparts to feel miffed:

Bush met with former Los Angeles Mayor James K. Hahn in January 2002 and again that April, when Hahn and mayors from other cities gathered with the president to discuss security issues.

Bush has also met with New York City Mayor Michael Bloomberg, a Republican, and Chicago Mayor Richard Daley, a Democrat, on several occasions.

In March 2001, less than two months after Bush took office, he met with Daley in Chicago.

"We had a long-ranging discussion, and I came just to introduce myself so he got to know me," said Bush, according to a transcript on the White House website. "And he now knows he can pick up the phone and call the White House any time he needs to."

Asked if he believed that Bush was ignoring him because of partisan politics, Villaraigosa said, "I hope not."

"One of the things that you noticed in my State of the Union [response] is that my comments were not partisan," the mayor said. "We distinguished between Democrats and Republicans, but ... I didn't spend a lot of time criticizing. I spent more time sharing a vision."

U.S. Concludes 'Cyber Storm' Mock Attacks (AP-Y2)

By Ted Bridis, Associated Press Writer

AP2, February 11, 2006

The government concluded its "Cyber Storm" wargame Friday, its biggest-ever exercise to test how it would respond to devastating attacks over the Internet from anti-globalization activists, underground hackers and bloggers.

Bloggers?

Participants confirmed parts of the worldwide simulation challenged government officials and industry executives to respond to deliberate misinformation campaigns and activist calls by Internet bloggers, online diarists whose "Web logs" include political rantings and musings about current events.

The Internet survived, even against fictional abuses against the world's computers on a scale typical for Fox's popular "24" television series. Experts depicted hackers who shut down electricity in 10 states, failures in vital systems for online banking and retail sales, infected discs mistakenly distributed by commercial software companies and critical flaws discovered in core Internet technology.

Some mock attacks were aimed at causing a "significant cyber disruption" that could seriously damage energy, transportation and health care industries and undermine public confidence, said George Foresman, an undersecretary at the Homeland Security Department.

There was no impact on the real Internet during the weeklong exercise. Government officials from the United States, Canada, Australia and England and executives from Microsoft, Cisco, Verisign and others said they were careful to simulate attacks only using isolated computers, working from basement offices at the Secret Services headquarters in downtown Washington.

The Homeland Security Department promised a full report on results from the exercise by summer.

Foresman likened his agency's role during any Internet attack to an orchestra conductor, coordinating responses from law enforcement, intelligence agencies, the military and private firms. The government's goal is a "symphony of preparedness," Foresman said.

Homeland Security coordinated the exercise. More than 115 government agencies, companies and organizations participated. They included the White House National Security Council, Justice Department, Defense Department, State Department, National Security Agency and CIA, which conducted its own cybersecurity exercise called "Silent Horizon" last May.

DOJ_NMG_0014316

An earlier cyberterrorism exercise called "Livewire" for Homeland Security and other federal agencies concluded there were serious questions over government's role during a cyberattack depending on who was identified as the culprit — terrorists, a foreign government or bored teenagers.

It also questioned whether the U.S. government would be able to detect the early stages of such an attack without significant help from private technology companies.

___

On the Net:

Department of Homeland Security: http://www.dhs.gov

U.S. Officials Defend Ploys To Catch Immigrants (NYT)

By Steven Greenhouse

The New York Times, February 11, 2006

Despite criticism from advocates for immigrants, federal immigration officials said in recent days that they would not forswear the practice of impersonating occupational safety officials to round up illegal immigrants.

Last July, federal agents arrested 48 workers at Seymour Johnson Air Force Base in North Carolina on charges of being illegal immigrants after the agents tricked the workers into attending what was billed as a mandatory training session sponsored by the federal Occupational Safety and Health Administration.

Afterward, the federal Labor Department, North Carolina officials and immigrant and job safety advocates criticized the ploy. They argued that the sting might cause immigrant workers to distrust safety officials just as the authorities were stepping up efforts to reduce the disproportionately high injury rate among Hispanic workers.

Lawyers for several labor and immigrant groups said yesterday that they were dismayed that when they met with officials at Immigration and Customs Enforcement on Jan. 30, the officials refused to rule out again using a safety-related ruse to lure immigrant workers.

Marielena Hincapié, director of programs at the National Immigration Law Center, said, "They said they would not commit to not doing this anymore, despite the fact that this would have a chilling effect on workers."

Ana Avendano, a lawyer with the A.F.L.-C.I.O., also criticized immigration officials for not providing the assurances that safety advocates were seeking.

"We told them that the population of workers that we're dealing with is suffering the highest mortality rate and highest injury rate on the job," Ms. Avendano said. "If immigration officials are going to use OSHA as a ruse, all they will do is reduce the trust of workers to go to OSHA with concerns about safety problems."

Dean Boyd, a spokesman for Immigration and Customs Enforcement, emphasized that ruses were standard law enforcement policy. "We're not going to rule out valid investigative techniques," he said.

Mr. Boyd said that if immigration officials were to do such a sting in the future, it would be only after coordinating with federal safety officials.

OSHA officials repeated yesterday the stance they took after the July raid, saying the agency worked to build trust with Hispanic workers. They also said they did not condone using the agency's name in this type of ruse.

At a Senate hearing in October, Michael Chertoff, the secretary of homeland security, said it was appropriate to use ruses, but he added that those involving health and safety were not appropriate.

Mr. Boyd said the employment of illegal immigrants at sensitive facilities like military bases posed a serious threat to domestic security. He said that, given their illegal status, they might be vulnerable to exploitation by criminals or terrorists.

"That's why we're aggressively targeting these types of workers at sensitive facilities," Mr. Boyd said. "We've got an obligation under the law to do what we need to do to remove those people immediately from a position where they could do potential harm."

On Thursday, immigration agents arrested nine illegal immigrants who were working for a subcontractor at the Dugway Proving Ground, a military testing site southwest of Salt Lake City. Last month, immigration officials arrested 11 illegal immigrants at Tyndall Air Force Base near Panama City, Fla.

Arizona Plans To Tackle Illegal Aliens (WT)

DOJ_NMG_0014317

The Washington Times, February 11, 2006

PHOENIX (AP) -- Arizona has long been one of the busiest gateways for aliens trying to sneak into the country, and some lawmakers believe it's time to dispatch state police squads to catch those who slip past border agents.

The notion is gaining political traction as the public's frustration about the state's porous border with Mexico grows. Over the years, it was often resisted by officials who contended that stopping illegal entry should be the sole province of the federal government.

A state lawmaker has proposed a plan that includes $20 million for the Arizona Department of Public Safety to mount a 100-member squad to operate surveillance equipment, construct border barriers, target drug and immigrant smugglers and perhaps patrol the border.

"I'm not putting the handcuffs on. Whatever they need to do, they need to be doing," said Republican Rep. Russell Pearce, the plan's sponsor.

A different plan by Gov. Janet Napolitano, a Democrat, would have two state police squads focus on alien smuggling cases. Both plans offer millions of dollars to communities to thwart illegal entries, and money for combating gang-related border crime.

Arizona has been dogged by a heavy flow of illegal aliens since the government tightened enforcement in El Paso, Texas, and San Diego during the mid-1990s. The Border Patrol apprehended 725,093 illegal border crossers in Arizona in fiscal 2000, though the numbers declined after the September 11 terrorist attacks prompted heightened border security.

State police in Arizona already work near the border. An average of 27 state police officers are near the border at any given time, assisting federal authorities in looking for fugitives trying to leave the country and people attempting to bring ill-gotten cash and stolen vehicles into Mexico.

Advocates for state and local action said the idea will not fix Arizona's vast immigration problems, but would discourage some people from sneaking across the border.

"If the federal government isn't going to do the job and Arizona is footing billions of dollars a year for illegal aliens, it makes sense for the state to get involved," said Ira Mehlman, spokesman for the Federation for American Immigration Reform, which favors limits on immigration.

Opponents say racial profiling could increase if officers unfamiliar with immigration law were to try and enforce it. They also say it could make investigating crime harder in immigrant communities, because fewer aliens would cooperate with police for fear of being sent home. Local officers also lack understanding of complex immigration law, they say.

U.S. Cites Rise In Violence Along Border With Mexico (NYT)

By Rachel L. Swarns

The New York Times, February 11, 2006

WASHINGTON, Feb. 10 — Mexican criminal syndicates are stepping up their attacks on American agents patrolling the border as officials of the Homeland Security Department intensify efforts to stem the flow of immigrants and drugs into the United States, American officials said this week.

In recent months, scores of Border Patrol agents have been fired upon or pelted with large stones as well as with cloth-covered stones that have been doused with flammable liquid and set ablaze. Since October, agents have been attacked in more than 190 cases, officials said on Thursday.

Most of the attacks have occurred along the Mexican border near San Diego, but shootings have also been reported along the border in Texas near the cities of Laredo and McAllen. In the fiscal year that ended on Sept. 30, there were 778 attacks on agents, up from 374 in the previous fiscal year, Homeland Security Department officials said.

One stone struck an agent in the eye; a gunshot hit an agent in the leg. The officials could not say precisely how many officers had been injured in the attacks, which have originated from both sides of the border.

"This is what we're facing," said David V. Aguilar, the Border Patrol chief, who played a videotape at a news conference on Thursday that featured a patrol car riddled with bullets and agents scrambling for cover as stones rained down on them. "This is a very serious type of situation."

DOJ_NMG_0014318

The homeland security secretary, Michael Chertoff, who led the news conference, said officials planned to continue their efforts at securing the United States-Mexico border.

This week President Bush asked Congress to increase the Homeland Security Department's budget by nearly 6 percent. The Border Patrol would receive an extra $459 million to hire 1,500 new agents, bringing the total force to about 14,000. An additional $410 million would be allocated to add 6,700 beds for detainees so fewer illegal immigrants would have to be released before being deported. Another $100 million would be spent on cameras, sensors and other detection technology.

Mr. Chertoff said the department planned to focus on illegal immigrants from countries other than Mexico, who have typically been released after apprehension because of shortages of beds. Last fall, he expanded the use of summary deportations, a process known as expedited removal, in which illegal immigrants from countries other than Mexico are detained and then deported without seeing an immigration judge.

But officials have struggled to find space for family groups and remain unable to process illegal immigrants from El Salvador because of a court ruling from the 1980's, when civil war wracked that country, that requires officials to allow Salvadorans to see judges before deportation.

Nationwide, 18,207 illegal immigrants from countries other than Mexico, nearly 60 percent of the total apprehended, were released on their own recognizance in the first three months of this fiscal year.

Officials of the Homeland Security Department said they were making headway in detaining and deporting these illegal immigrants. They are also working on finding more space for families and battling to change the rule regarding Salvadorans.

As for the violence on the border, the officials said Mexico had deployed 300 federal officers along its side of the border to help out. But many of the Mexican gangs remain entrenched.

Last week, immigration officials announced that they had seized a cache of weapons, including materials for 33 explosive devices, assault weapons and machine gun assembly kits, in Laredo. Officials believe the weapons were intended for criminals in Mexico.

"These are very sophisticated, hardened criminals who will use violence to protect their criminal businesses," Mr. Chertoff said. "We've got to be prepared to deal very decisively with any violence directed at our Border Patrol agents."

Border Wall May Be Boon For Smugglers (DMN)

By Alfredo Corchado

The Dallas Morning News, February 11, 2006

If difficulty in moving illegal immigrants rises, so does price

AHUALULCO, Mexico – A bill to erect a wall to help keep illegal immigrants out of the U.S. has not been approved by Congress, but it probably can count on support from an unlikely constituency – people smugglers.

That's because along the border, and in places such as this town in San Luis Potosí state, smugglers expect that such a wall would lead to an increase in their business moving people across the Rio Grande.

Already some coyotes, as the smugglers are known, are pumping up their prices. The fee they charge to take a Mexican to Dallas, for instance, has increased from $1,200 to $1,500, some residents say.

"That's the way it is," said a smuggler who identified himself as Gregorio Prieto, as he played pool and negotiated with prospective clients at the Ahualulco Billiards hall near the town's central plaza.

"Any time the crossing gets harder, the price also goes up. Because nothing will stop the flow as long as Americans want their labor. They're just making it more difficult for the ilegales and more profitable for us."

In December, the House approved a bill that includes plans to erect 700 miles of physical barriers in key zones of the 2,000-mile U.S.-Mexico border. Advocates say the fence will keep out drug smugglers, terrorists and illegal immigrants, especially in high-volume areas.

AP Members of the Mexican congress tour the construction of a wall along the U.S.-Mexico border near Tijuana.

"A lot of the people coming across the border are criminals and potentially terrorists – people who have a mind to commit crimes against Americans and maybe to blow us all up and kill us," Rep. James Sensenbrenner said at a recent meeting with a sheriffs' coalition in Houston. The Wisconsin Republican is one of the bill's authors.

DOJ_NMG_0014319

Critics say the barriers would simply push traffic to weak points along the border.

The bill is awaiting action by the Senate, which is likely to reject the measure, analysts say.

But even the possibility of a wall is affecting informal commerce, such as traffic in Mexican beer and culinary delicacies like gorditas, corn tortillas fried and filled with some combination of meat, beans, cheese, potatoes and nopales, or cactus, that are popular with Mexicans.

One family that has made a business of sending homemade gorditas to Dallas is considering relocating to North Texas, in part over concern that a wall would hurt business.

Family matriarch Doña Constantina Rivera, who has long sent gorditas to her emigrant children in Dallas, says she may abandon the practice.

When Ms. Rivera's children left for Texas in the late 1990s, she tried to assuage their nostalgia for home, doing what came naturally: She baked gorditas and sent them off to her homesick offspring with the help of informal couriers who ferry goods across the border.

The gorditas were so tasty that other immigrants sought them out. Demand grew and so did the number of gorditas sent north, sometime hundreds a week.

But the informal business drew attention. When Ms. Rivera's gordita trade was featured on the front pages of Mexican newspapers and on television newscasts, San Luis Potosí state authorities tried to collect taxes from her.

She's fighting those efforts, arguing that the business doesn't generate enough to pay taxes.

Now, talk of a "Berlin Wall," as President Vicente Fox described the proposed barrier, has made the Rivera family so nervous that Ms. Rivera and other relatives are planning to move to Dallas before any barrier goes up. "Half our family lives in Dallas," said daughter Anita, 24. "No wall is going to separate us."

This would not be the first time American legislation significantly affected affairs on the Mexican side.

The Immigration Reform and Control Act of 1986 allowed millions of illegal immigrants residing in the U.S. to become legal permanent residents. But the amnesty bill also led to coyotes raising the prices they charged to smuggle people across the Rio Grande. Some Mexican families living in the U.S. were effectively fenced in, unable to move back and forth between the two countries.

After devaluation of the peso in 1994, the number of Mexicans trying to illegally cross the border increased, and the U.S. responded with a series of border-control operations, including Operation Hold the Line in Texas.

The operation, which involved the addition of hundreds of Border Patrol agents, was credited with reducing crime as well as illegal immigration into the El Paso area.

It also contributed to a significant increase in the death toll, critics said, as immigrants tried to cross in less heavily patrolled areas where the terrain was more dangerous. Last year, an estimated 500 Mexicans died trying to cross the border.

Now, the wall proposal has been drawing similar criticism.

"The bill is good business for the smuggling business," said Mexican Consul Juan Carlos Foncerrada Berumen in El Paso, who has heard reports of border crossers in the region. "Coyotes are good at exploiting and manipulating the news about a possible wall. This is good for business because they can justify raising the prices."

In Ahualulco, near a recently closed bar called Los Amigos del Norte (Friends of the North), shop owner Tomás Galabis, 66, said the talk on the street about border barriers has people stirred up.

"Even the bar owners left recently, afraid that the wall would keep them out," he said. "The risks have people nervous."

Playing pool at Ahualulco Billiards, Lázaro Rivas, 22, talked about the higher prices being charged by smugglers. "I'm planning to go to Dallas," he said, "but $1,500 is a lot of money. I'll still go, but I have to dig deeper to come up with the extra cash."

Rivera family members say they believe the time has come to make a move.

"If we don't leave now, it will be harder, and coyotes will take advantage of us," said 27-year-old Jesús, husband of Anita Rivera. "It's happened before."

Cross-Border Tunnel Found In San Diego (WP/AP)

DOJ_NMG_0014320

By The Associated Press

The Washington Post, February 11, 2006

SAN DIEGO -- An incomplete tunnel was found in the same area where investigators recently found one of the longest passages discovered beneath the U.S.-Mexico border, officials said.

The 3-foot-wide tunnel extended from just south of the border fence in Mexico to a point about 23 feet into the United States, ending at a concrete levee, Border Patrol spokesman Richard Kite said.

A patrol agent noticed a distortion in the road running along the border fence, and agents digging in the area found the tunnel Thursday, Kite said.

"It was only about six inches below the asphalt," he said.

A 2,400-foot tunnel linking a warehouse near the airport in Tijuana, Mexico, to another warehouse in San Diego was discovered last month.

___

Information from: The San Diego Union-Tribune, http://www.uniontrib.com

More Medicines From Abroad Seized (LAT)

By Lisa Girion

The Los Angeles Times, February 11, 2006

The U.S. government apparently is stepping up seizures of cheap drugs ordered by Americans — mainly seniors — from abroad, Canadian pharmacies say.

The pharmacies, which sell drugs by mail and over the Internet, say their shipments are being intercepted by U.S. Customs officials around the country where foreign mail is handled.

"It's huge — we've had over 800 seizures in January," up from 15 in a typical month, said Barney Britton, president of Calgary-based MinitDrugs.

Other pharmacies reported four- to five-fold increases. An informal survey of 30 Canadian pharmacies that cater to American customers, conducted by a senior-citizen advocacy website, showed that the rise began in November, doubled in December and doubled again in January.

Health officials in Minnesota, the first of several states to make cheaper Canadian drugs more readily available to its residents, echoed the reports from north of the border. They said seizures increased in late December from less than 1% to about 4% of shipments, said Brian McClung, a spokesman for Minnesota Gov. Tim Pawlenty.

Ordering drugs from abroad is illegal. But U.S. Customs and Food and Drug Administration officials have generally allowed the practice, apart from occasional seizures designed to publicize potential risks.

Federal regulators say that policy hasn't changed — and there is no crackdown.

"It's not a special effort other than our normal enforcement," said Lynn Hollinger, a spokeswoman for U.S. Customs and Border Protection.

People whose drugs are seized are not cited and generally are able to get them replaced free of charge by the foreign pharmacy. But many customers are infuriated.

"It's despicable," said Samuel Robert Greenberg, a Laguna Niguel retiree who lost a package of anti-cholesterol pills and glaucoma eyedrops late last month. "They are playing with people's lives."

Greenberg, 73, said he and his wife had bought drugs from Canadian pharmacies for years without incident.

But if replacements for his Lipitor pills don't arrive by next week, Greenberg said, he will have to buy from a local pharmacy at a cost of about $3 a pill — a third more than he pays through the mail.

Greenberg said such seizures were a waste of government resources. "Forget about the heroin," Greenberg said. "They are going to stop the Lipitor."

Although the FDA has never taken enforcement action against an individual for ordering prescription drugs from abroad, it has conducted a handful of what it calls "blitzes" over the last five years in cooperation with the Customs Service at international mail centers.

DOJ_NMG_0014321

The FDA analyzed the drugs seized in those cases and publicized their findings in an effort to warn mail-order customers about the risks of getting the wrong medication, poor-quality substitutes or counterfeits.

Some Canadian pharmacy operators believe U.S. authorities timed the latest seizures to coincide with the Jan. 1 launch of Medicare's drug-discount program, which competes for the business of American seniors.

"I think, quite frankly, that [U.S. authorities] see an opportunity," said Britton of MinitDrugs. "They know that this would probably be the most vulnerable time for us."

Canadian pharmacies report declines of 10% to 30% in U.S. orders since the Medicare program began. But many seniors, particularly those whose drug needs are modest, find Canadian pharmacies are cheaper.

According to a Kaiser Family Foundation study published in 2004, 25% of eligible seniors — as many as 7.4 million people — could pay less buying drugs on their own. If too few seniors sign up for the Medicare drug plan, experts say, the program could run into financial trouble.

Most Canadian pharmacies accept the cost of replacing seized drugs to preserve an $800-million market that serves about 2 million U.S. customers. Over the last five years, less than 1% of all shipments have been seized, said Andy Troszok, president of the Canadian International Pharmacy Assn.

The association has not yet determined how much that rate has increased. But so far, he said, the seizures do not represent a serious threat.

"We are currently still chalking it up as the cost of doing business," said Troszok, who owns Extended Care Pharmacy in Calgary.

The pharmacies learn of the confiscations from customers who have received seizure notices. A customer also can use a tracking number to find out what happened.

A sudden, unannounced policy of increased enforcement — after years of looking the other way — would be irresponsible, Troszok said.

"It's an issue of patient safety," he said. "We're not talking about Viagra and narcotics abuse. We are talking about people with breast cancer, heart disease and diabetes and are established on medication. Who is going to be liable for these people going off medical regimens and suffering or even dying?"

Canadian pharmacies, which are able to purchase brand-name drugs at low wholesale prices negotiated with the purchasing power of the Canadian government, already had been adapting to increasing political and market pressure.

When major drug makers began curbing sales to Canadian pharmacies that shipped to the U.S., many began ordering in bulk from drug factories in Europe, India and Israel.

"The business just gets smarter and adapts," said Bill Pigden, business development manager for CanAmerica Global Health Services, a Winnipeg-based pharmacy.

Ex-FEMA Head Says White House Knew About Levees (LAT)

By Edwin Chen

The Los Angeles Times, February 11, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Bush administration's bungled response to Hurricane Katrina came under fresh scrutiny today amid revelations during a Senate hearing that senior White House officials had learned of the disastrous flooding in New Orleans a day earlier than they had previously indicated.

The testimony of Michael D. Brown, the ousted director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, raised questions about whether top White House aides had kept President Bush fully abreast of the fast-breaking catastrophe after a levee breached on Aug. 29, allowing the waters of the Gulf of Mexico to cover huge portions of New Orleans.

Bush, who was vacationing at his ranch when Katrina struck, has taken considerable criticism — and has accepted responsibility — for his administration's slow response to the hurricane. But the latest information suggests that he may not have known the full dimensions of the unfolding disaster.

DOJ_NMG_0014322

Top administration aides, and Bush himself, have said that they had been caught off guard on Tuesday, Aug. 30, by the news of the levee breach and the subsequent flooding. Bush has recalled publicly that earlier that morning he felt a sense of relief, thinking that the city had "dodged the bullet."

But Brown told the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee this morning that he had called a senior White House aide, most likely deputy chief of staff Joe Hagin, the previous evening, Monday, Aug. 29, to inform him of the levee break.

Brown, testifying under oath, was unable to say with total assurance that it was Hagin with whom he spoke that night, but said it "probably" was Hagin, a person with whom he had "a personal relationship." Brown added that he was fully confident that Hagin, who was with the president at his ranch, would inform Bush.

"I never worried about whether I talked directly to the president because I knew that in speaking to Joe I was talking directly to the president," Brown testified. "I told him we were realizing our worst nightmare," Brown added.

At the White House this morning, Press Secretary Scott McClellan defended the steps the president and his aides took, saying that ahead of the storm the administration had issued warnings and emergency declarations to speed assistance to the Gulf Coast. But, he acknowledged, "there were failures at all levels of government."

"The president was focused on saving lives," McClellan said.

As Brown recalled the sequence of events, a top FEMA staffer, Marty Bahamonde, first heard reports of the 17th Street levee breach on Monday morning. The aide took a helicopter tour and confirmed the situation around 5 p.m. Bahamonde then informed Brown.

Brown said he called the traveling White House in Crawford, Texas, almost immediately.

The apparent miscommunication over the levee breach was but one example of what committee Chairman Susan M. Collins (R-Me.) today called a glaring instance of an overall governmental response that was "riddled with missed opportunities, poor decision-making and failed leadership."

Collins' committee is winding down a five-month-long investigation of the government's response to Katrina, having held nearly 20 hearings, taking testimony from more than 200 witnesses and reviewing hundreds of thousands of government documents.

The Maine Republican said her committee hopes to fully understand the nature of "this enormous disconnect between what was happening on the ground — a city 80% flooded, uncontrolled levees, people dying, thousands of people waiting to be rescued — and the official reaction among many of the key leaders in Washington and in Northern Command that somehow New Orleans had dodged the bullet."

Collins said this morning that one lesson she already has learned is that there is "a strong correlation between effective leadership and effective response. Unfortunately, I have also found the converse to be true."

In his testimony, Brown also blamed FEMA's slow response on "a culture clash" between FEMA and its parent agency, the Department of Homeland Security, that he said was "doomed to failure."

Repeatedly, Brown said, top DHS officials rebuffed his pre-Katrina efforts to bolster FEMA's capacities in response to disasters.

Times staff writer James Gerstenzang contributed to this report.

Brown Blames Superiors For Response To Katrina (WP)

By Spencer S. Hsu

The Washington Post, February 11, 2006

Michael D. Brown, the former Federal Emergency Management Agency director, accused the Bush administration yesterday of setting the nation's disaster preparedness on a "path to failure" before Hurricane Katrina by overemphasizing the threat of terrorism, and of discounting warnings on the day the storm hit that a worst-case flood was enveloping New Orleans.

Brown called "a little disingenuous" and "just baloney" assertions by Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff and other top Bush administration officials that they were unaware of the severity of the catastrophe for a day after Katrina struck on

Aug. 29. Investigators say their inaction delayed the launch of federal emergency measures, rescue efforts and aid to tens of thousands of stranded New Orleans residents.

Brown's highly charged testimony before a Senate investigative panel was a striking about-face from his comments to its House counterpart in September, when he was still on the administration payroll. At that time, Brown leveled his harshest criticism for what President Bush has called an "inadequate" response at Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco (D) and New Orleans Mayor C. Ray Nagin (D), who Brown said failed to fully evacuate the city and to forge a unified command.

His sometimes combative exchanges with senators also offered a rare glimpse of a former Bush official publicly criticizing the administration. He sharpened his earlier criticism and named people whom he had previously described only in general terms.

After the White House declined to offer Brown a legal defense of executive privilege, which would have allowed him not to testify to lawmakers, Brown said yesterday that Chertoff and his predecessor, Tom Ridge, paved the way for FEMA's Katrina failures by fomenting a "cultural clash" between FEMA and the Department of Homeland Security. DHS absorbed FEMA in 2003, and the head of the emergency agency stopped reporting to the president.

Internal turf wars siphoned away FEMA's disaster response capability and funding, Brown said. If not repaired, he said, the Department of Homeland Security is "doomed to fail, and that will fail the country."

Brown also cited a "disconnect" with Bush officials in the hours before and after Katrina hit. He said they were distracted by the fight against terrorism from the general threat posed by recurring natural disasters and from specific warnings that a direct hit by a projected Category 5 hurricane would swamp New Orleans and strand as many as 100,000 people.

Brown said he called and spoke at least twice on Aug. 29 with White House Deputy Chief of Staff Joseph Hagin or Chief of Staff Andrew H. Card Jr., telling them: "New Orleans is flooding; it's the worst-case scenario." But the message apparently did not get through to Homeland Security officials.

"They should have had awareness of it, because they were receiving the same information that we were," Brown said.

"Had there been a report coming out . . . that said, 'Yes, we've confirmed that a terrorist has blown up the 17th Street Canal levee,' then everybody would have jumped all over that and been trying to do everything they could," Brown said. "But because this was a natural disaster, that has become the stepchild within the Department of Homeland Security."

The Category 3 storm eventually killed 1,321 people, including 1,072 in Louisiana; displaced about 2 million people; and caused more than $150 billion in damage.

Speaking to reporters yesterday, White House spokesman Scott McClellan cited "conflicting reports" immediately after the storm hit. "Some were saying" the levee system "was overtopped," he said. "Some were saying it was breached. And, again, we knew of the flooding that was going on -- that's why our top priority was focused on saving lives."

Testifying after Brown, Matthew Broderick, the department's director of operations coordination, and Robert B. Stephan, assistant secretary for infrastructure protection, faulted Brown for failing to communicate with the chain of command.

"Mr. Brown should have picked up the phone and called the secretary right away," Broderick said.

Brown, who first received reports that city levees were failing at 10 a.m. on Aug. 29, said that he relayed them to headquarters for confirmation and alerted Hagin, who was with Bush at the president's Texas ranch as well as in Arizona and California that day.

Brown said he could not recall whether Bush was on the line, but he added: "I knew that in speaking to Joe, I was talking directly to the president." Brown later said that he did not ask Hagin for any particular help, and that he regretted not calling for military assistance the weekend before Katrina made landfall.

Brown, a Bush political loyalist who became the face of the government's failed response, said under questioning that he repeatedly asked the White House and other federal agencies for help, but that his authority was limited by FEMA's position within the Department of Homeland Security and that the agency's resources were overwhelmed.

He has been criticized for his lack of leadership after the storm, for his own lack of awareness of the developing crisis and for misstatements about conditions at New Orleans's convention center, where thousands were stranded without food and water. Leaked e-mails have portrayed Brown as more concerned with his public appearance and planned departure from FEMA than with disaster operations.

DOJ_NMG_0014324

Brown's deputy at FEMA, Patrick Rhode, testified yesterday that he participated in a conference call on the afternoon of Aug. 29 detailing catastrophic levee failures and alerted the department's Homeland Security Operations Center, which was feeding reports to the White House.

Senators released a timeline showing that authorities received 16 reports from federal, state and local agencies and the American Red Cross that New Orleans's levees had been breached between 8:30 a.m. and 6 p.m. on Aug. 29, though the Homeland Security Operations Center reported the opposite at 6 p.m.

A perplexed Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine), chairman of the Senate investigation, asked why the official reaction of Washington and the military was that New Orleans had "dodged the bullet" despite reports from the ground that the city was 80 percent flooded, its levee system had failed and thousands faced death.

"All they had to do," Brown said, was listen to the Homeland Security teleconferences "and pay attention."

Collins singled out Chertoff and other department officials for a "lack of awareness" of fundamental emergency operations and a "slow, hesitant response." She said that though "DHS's playbook appears designed to distance" top officials from FEMA, they "must answer for decisions that they made or failed to make."

Under questioning, Brown said he did not directly brief Chertoff -- who was "gone or going to Atlanta" for an Aug. 30 event on the possible flu pandemic -- because "it would have wasted my time." He said he preferred to call Card or Hagin directly.

Sen. Robert F. Bennett (R-Utah) called Brown's remarks "staggering." He said they demonstrated "a dysfunctional department to a degree far greater than any we've seen."

After Brown spoke to the Senate, he was subpoenaed to reappear before House investigators.

Next week, Chertoff and Frances Fragos Townsend, the White House's homeland security adviser, are scheduled to discuss internal changes. And the House investigative committee is scheduled to issue its Katrina report.

Ex-FEMA Leader Faults Response By White House (NYT)

By Eric Lipton

The New York Times, February 11, 2006

WASHINGTON, Feb. 10 — Michael D. Brown, the former federal emergency management chief who became a ridiculed symbol of the Bush administration's flawed response to Hurricane Katrina, returned in anger to Capitol Hill on Friday and lashed back at his former superiors.

Mr. Brown said that he told a senior White House official early on of the New Orleans flooding, and that the administration was too focused on terrorism to respond properly to natural disasters.

Testifying before a Senate committee, Mr. Brown said he notified a senior White House official — who he said was probably Joe Hagin, the deputy White House chief of staff, but might have been Andrew H. Card Jr., the chief of staff — on the day the hurricane hit to report that it had turned into his "worst nightmare" and that New Orleans was flooding.

It was the first public identification of any White House official who was said to have directly received reports of extensive flooding on Monday, Aug. 29, the day Hurricane Katrina hit.

In the aftermath of the storm, administration officials said they were caught by surprise when they were told of the levee breach on Tuesday, Aug. 30. Mr. Hagin was the senior staff member with President Bush on the day the hurricane hit, when Mr. Bush was traveling in California.

Mr. Brown's politically charged appearance before the Senate Committee on Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs quickly divided the panel's members by party.

Several Republican senators peppered him with hostile questions and suggested he was trying to deflect the blame from his own failures.

In contrast, Mr. Brown drew a gentle, even warm response from Democrats who said he had unfairly been made a scapegoat by the administration, though last year it was frequently Mr. Brown himself who drew the most fire from Democrats in Washington.

DOJ_NMG_0014325

In contrast to low-key statements in the past, Mr. Brown, who resigned under pressure on Sept. 12 as director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, was aggressively on the defensive, saying he was "sick and tired" of his remarks or e-mail messages being taken out of context or hearing that he lacked the leadership skills for his job.

Mr. Brown said it was "baloney" for Department of Homeland Security officials to claim they did not know of the extent of the flooding until Tuesday, because he and other FEMA officials had notified them the day before.

In response to questioning, Mr. Brown also said he believed he told the White House on Monday that a breach had occurred in the 17th Street Canal levee, passing on observations made by one of his staff members on the ground in New Orleans that day.

"Everything that we had planned about, worried about, that FEMA, frankly, had worried about for 10 years was coming true," Mr. Brown said he told the White House aide.

Scott McClellan, the White House press secretary, said Friday morning while the hearing was under way that the administration already knew the city was being flooded. Regardless of the call from Mr. Brown, there were conflicting reports about whether a levee had been breached, Mr. McClellan said.

"The top priority at that time was on saving lives; it was on search and rescue operations," Mr. McClellan said.

Mr. Brown said that he could not recall if he personally called the homeland security secretary, Michael Chertoff, to relay the account of the levee breach. Even if he had, Mr. Brown said, it would have been a waste of time because FEMA's role within the Homeland Security Department had been subordinated to fighting terror. As a result of that, he said, he was unable to quickly get the kind of action he needed, unless he called the White House staff.

The Bush administration, as a whole, he said, did not seem to care enough about natural disasters and had relegated natural disasters to a "stepchild" of national security.

"It is my belief," Mr. Brown told the senators, that if "we've confirmed that a terrorist has blown up the 17th Street Canal levee, then everybody would have jumped all over that and been trying to do everything they could."

Republicans, including Senator Susan Collins of Maine, the chairwoman, said Mr. Brown's disdain for the new domestic security structure left the department without crucial information it needed about what was happening in New Orleans. Senator Norm Coleman, Republican of Minnesota, said Mr. Brown was shifting attention away from his own lack of responsiveness to the disaster.

"You're not prepared to kind of put a mirror in front of your face and recognize your own inadequacies and say, 'You know something, I made some big mistakes. I wasn't focused. I didn't get things done,' " Mr. Coleman said.

The remark provoked Mr. Brown to raise his voice almost to a shout.

"What do you want me to say?" Mr. Brown said. "I have admitted to mistakes publicly. I've admitted to mistakes in hearings. What more, Senator Coleman, do you want from me?"

Mr. Coleman responded: "A little more candor would suffice."

Democrats, including Senator Frank R. Lautenberg of New Jersey and Daniel K. Akaka of Hawaii, said Mr. Brown was being made a scapegoat to deflect criticism from the White House.

"Keep your chin up and fight back," Mr. Lautenberg said.

Several senators, including Democrats, said they were surprised by Mr. Brown's inability to remember crucial details from the early days of the storm, including which White House aide he spoke with and whether Mr. Bush participated in the telephone call.

Mr. Brown also gave differing answers about whether he actually mentioned the levee breach to the White House. At first he said he could not recall whether he used those words but then later he said that he was sure Mr. Hagin or Mr. Card knew it and that he would have told one of them about the breach during the conversation.

He said he could not recall whether he told the White House aide that he needed any particular help — at a time when the city was flooding, thousands were packed into the Superdome without adequate supplies and others were beginning to climb to roofs or attics to avoid drowning.

DOJ_NMG_0014326

Two senior Homeland Security Department officials, who testified after Mr. Brown, said that his unwillingness to honor the chain of command and give regular updates to Mr. Chertoff or others in the department severely hampered the department's response.

"We have a president, we have a secretary that are seeing things on television, we're getting reports, what is going on down there?" said Gen. Matthew E. Broderick, who served as the director of the Homeland Security Department's information center in Washington during the storm, recalling his request to FEMA for more information.

Brown Defends His Role In Response To Katrina (WT/AP)

By Lara Jakes Jordan, Associated Press

The Washington Times, February 11, 2006

Former federal disaster chief Michael D. Brown said yesterday he told top Bush officials of massive flooding in New Orleans the day Katrina howled ashore and warned "we were realizing our worst nightmare."

More defiant than defensive, Mr. Brown told senators he dealt directly with White House officials the day of the Aug. 29 storm, including Chief of Staff Andrew H. Card Jr. and Deputy Chief of Staff Joe Hagin.

He also said officials from the Department of Homeland Security were getting regular briefings that day. Administration officials have said they did not realize the severe damage Katrina had caused until after the storm had passed.

Under oath, Mr. Brown told the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee that he could not explain why his appeals failed to produce a faster response to the storm that killed 1,300, uprooted hundreds of thousands of Gulf Coast residents and caused tens of billions of dollars in damage.

"I expected them to cut every piece of red tape, do everything they could ... that I didn't want to hear anybody say that we couldn't do everything they humanly could to respond to this," Mr. Brown said about a video conference with administration officials -- in which President Bush briefly participated -- the day before Katrina hit. "Because I knew in my gut this was the bad one."

At an occasionally contentious White House briefing yesterday, Bush spokesman Scott McClellan said there were conflicting reports about the levees in the immediate aftermath of the storm.

"We knew of the flooding that was going on," Mr. McClellan said. "That's why our top priority was focused on saving lives. ... The cause of the flooding was secondary to that top priority and that's the way it should be."

Some senators suggested Mr. Brown, in his second Capitol Hill appearance since Katrina, look inward before pointing the finger elsewhere.

"You're not prepared to put a mirror in front of your face and recognize your own inadequacies," said Sen. Norm Coleman, Minnesota Republican. "Perhaps you may get a more sympathetic hearing if you had a willingness to confess your own sins in this."

Mr. Brown responded: "That's very easy for you to say sitting behind that dais and not being there in the middle of that disaster watching that human suffering and watching those people dying and trying to deal with those structural dysfunctionalities, even within the federal government."

Mr. Brown, who quit under fire as chief of the FEMA, agreed with some senators who characterized him as a scapegoat for government failures.

"I feel somewhat abandoned," Mr. Brown said.

Department of Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff has said he did not know that New Orleans' levees were breached until Aug. 30. Mr. Bush at the time said, "I don't think anybody anticipated the breach of the levees."

Recounting conference calls that described initial damage reports the day Katrina struck, Mr. Brown scoffed at assertions that Homeland Security didn't know about the devastation's scope until the next day. He called those claims "just baloney."

The disjointed federal response, Mr. Brown said, was in part the result of FEMA being swallowed in 2003 by the newly created Homeland Security Department, which he said was focused on fighting terrorism.

Natural disasters "had become the stepchild of the Department of Homeland Security," he said. Had there been a report that "a terrorist had blown up the [New Orleans] 17th Street Canal levee, then everybody would have jumped all over that."

DOJ_NMG_0014327

Some senators attempted to trace the failures back to the White House.

"You quite appropriately and admirably wanted to get the word to the president as quickly as you could," said Sen. Joe Lieberman, Connecticut Democrat, asking about Mr. Brown's conversation with Mr. Hagin on the evening of Aug. 29. "Did you tell Mr. Hagin in that phone call that New Orleans was flooding?"

Mr. Brown answered: "I think I told him that we were realizing our worst nightmare, that everything we had planned about, worried about, that FEMA, frankly, had worried about for 10 years was coming true."

Sen. Robert F. Bennett, Utah Republican, suggested Mr. Brown may have delayed the federal response by cutting Homeland Security out of the loop about the levee failures and going straight to the White House.

"I think I now understand why Secretary Chertoff says he didn't know," Mr. Bennett said. "The reason he didn't know is because you didn't think it important to tell him."

Mr. Brown said he communicated directly with the White House instead of Homeland Security because FEMA's parent agency "just bogged things down."

After three hours of testimony, Mr. Brown was handed a subpoena ordering him to reappear in front of a House panel investigating the storm response. Mr. Brown is expected to be questioned by House investigators this weekend -- days before the panel is expected to release its findings on the storm.

Brown Blames Federal Infighting (BRA)

By GERARD SHIELDS

Baton Rouge Advocate, February 11, 2006

WASHINGTON — The former director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency told a U.S. Senate investigating committee on Friday that differences with his superiors became so widespread that they hampered the federal government's response to Hurricane Katrina.

Michael Brown also told the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee that he alerted the White House and his bosses at the U.S. Department of Homeland Security of levee breaches in New Orleans a full day before they have acknowledged.

Brown said he called White House and Homeland Security officials the Monday afternoon after the hurricane hit. President Bush and Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff have said that they did not know about the levee breaches until Tuesday.

Brown acknowledged that he did not directly call Chertoff, who was technically his supervisor.

"It would've wasted my time," Brown said. "DHS was an additional bureaucracy that would have slowed me down."

One committee member, U.S. Sen. Robert Bennett, R-Utah, called the revelation "staggering" and an example of dysfunction in the Homeland Security department.

"Now I know why Secretary Chertoff didn't know," Bennett said. "The reason he didn't know is because you didn't think it important to tell him."

White House spokesman Scott McClellan said Friday that news of flooding was coming into the White House but that there were conflicting reports.

U.S. Sen. Susan Collins, R-Maine, serves as chairwoman of the committee, and agreed that Brown's testimony signaled deficiencies in the agency designated to handle U.S. disasters.

"It also reflects the tensions between the two (agencies) that pre-dates the storm, tensions over resources, role and responsibilities within the department," she said.

FEMA, whose director in the past held a Cabinet position answerable to the president, was placed under the Department of Homeland Security in 2003. Brown, who was hired the same year, authorized two studies that found FEMA lacking in its ability to handle a natural disaster. The latest study and recommendations for improvement came out five months before Katrina hit on Aug. 29.

"We were never given the money and never given the resources to implement any of those recommendations," Brown said.

DOJ_NMG_0014328

Brown called putting FEMA under the Homeland Security department a "fatal flaw." He painted his division as secondary in a department more focused on preventing terrorist attacks than handling natural disasters.

"The cultural differences are so wide that FEMA cannot function in DHS," said Brown, who was eventually dismissed and now runs his own consulting business. "Because this was a natural disaster, it became the stepchild to national security."

Had there been a report that "a terrorist had blown up the 17th Street Canal levee, then everybody would have jumped all over that," Brown added.

Brown was designated principal federal official under the national response plan by Chertoff after the storm hit. The designation hampered Brown's ability to manage the aftermath, he said.

"You can't run a disaster that way," Brown said. "I was literally restrained by Secretary Chertoff and told to stay in Baton Rouge."

U.S. Sen. Norm Coleman, R-Minn., criticized Brown for failing to properly manage the storm's aftermath. He called the hurricane a "perfect storm of inadequate response."

"You'd get more of a sympathetic hearing if you were willing to confess your own sins," Coleman said. "Leadership makes a difference. You didn't provide that leadership."

Brown shot back, defending his actions.

"Senator, that's easy for you to say sitting behind that dais and not standing in the catastrophe and watching all the suffering," he said.

Other senators, including Democrats, said they believed that Brown was being wrongly blamed for the storm recovery faults by the Bush administration.

"You have been selected as the designated scapegoat," said U.S. Sen. Frank Lautenberg, D-N.J. "Keep your chin up and fight back."

But other witnesses at Friday's hearing also blamed Brown for much of the slow response.

Robert Stephan, assistant DHS secretary for infrastructure protection, said Brown failed under his designation as principal federal officer to establish a unified command structure of agencies involved.

"He continued to act as FEMA director as opposed to rising up to a higher level of responsibility," Stephan said.

Matthew Broderick, director of DHS operations coordination, indicated that he didn't believe the initial reports of broken levees and was pushed back by FEMA officials when trying to confirm them.

"We trusted that they would do the proper thing and keep us informed," Broderick said. "Mr. Brown should've picked up the phone and called the secretary right away."

Brown's one regret, he said, was not calling in the military before the hurricane made landfall.

"It's just a judgment I made," he said. "In hindsight, I wish I would've rolled the dice."

Also Friday, U.S. Sen. Mary L. Landrieu, D-La., released the following statement in response to Brown's testimony:

"Today's testimony is additional evidence that FEMA was not prepared before Katrina hit, just as it is not prepared today. The allegations raised at today's hearings are very troubling. They demand clear, immediate explanations.

"For months, this administration pointed fingers at others for their bungling. Now, they're pointing fingers at one another. All the while, FEMA remains anemic and the rebuilding they are managing remains inefficient, ineffective and slow.

"I am impressed by the strides taken by the Homeland Security Committee to get to the bottom of these mistakes. In particular, Sens. Collins and Lieberman should be commended for their focused efforts. We must all work together to reform and repair FEMA so our nation will be prepared before the next disaster, be it manmade or natural, occurs."

'We Were Realizing Our Worst Nightmare' (NOTP)

By Bruce Alpert

New Orleans Times-Picayune, February 11, 2006

Brown says he told White House of calamity

DOJ_NMG_0014329

WASHINGTON -- Two decisions by key federal officials not to share information led Washington to believe that New Orleans had "dodged the big one" in the hours after Hurricane Katrina made landfall, when in fact 80 percent of the city was flooding, Senate investigators believe.

Michael Brown, who was FEMA chief at the time, decided not to bring his appeals for Katrina relief directly to his superiors at the Department of Homeland Security after the storm, because he considered it a waste of time.

And the Homeland Security operations room coordinator decided not to notify department Secretary Michael Chertoff and President Bush on Aug. 29, the day the hurricane hit, of levee breaches that put much of New Orleans under water. The official said he considered the reports too sketchy.

Still, Brown, testifying Friday under oath, said officials should have known. On the night of Aug. 29, he said, he warned a top Bush administration official that "we were realizing our worst nightmare."

Brown told senators that he dealt directly with White House officials the day Katrina hit, including chief of staff Andrew Card and deputy chief of staff Joe Hagin. He also said that officials from the Homeland Security Department were getting regular briefings that day.

Sen. Susan Collins, chairwoman of the Senate Homeland Security and Government Affairs Committee, R-Maine, said the communications snafus could have contributed to the delays in bringing supplies to the city and federal troops to assist with search and rescue operations.

"What is so troubling is we have heard over and over again -- from top DHS officials, from top Department of Defense officials, from the leadership throughout the administration -- that they were simply unaware of how catastrophic the hurricane's impact had been because of the breaching of the levee," said Collins, R-Maine.

The 19th hearing by Collins' committee brought more attempts to deflect blame, with Brown saying his Homeland Security superiors devoted too much time to preparing for terrorist attacks instead of natural disasters, and the department saying that Brown failed to carry out his most important duty: to inform Chertoff and the president of the worsening situation in New Orleans.

Brown said it is "just baloney" and "a little disingenuous" for the Department of Homeland Security to say that it wasn't informed of the levee breaches Aug. 29, the day the hurricane struck.

Focused on terrorism

Brown, who served as director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency until his resignation two weeks after Katrina hit, suggested that the administration's emphasis on fighting terrorism may have been partly to blame for the slow response.

FEMA, he said, had become a stepchild at the newly created Department of Homeland Security. Had a terrorist "blown up the 17th Street Canal levee, then everybody would have jumped all over that," he said.

Brown was roundly criticized by some members of the Senate panel for what they considered a poor job of coordinating the government's response to the hurricane, but others said he made a convenient target for blame.

"You have been selected as the designated scapegoat," said Sen. Frank Lautenberg, D-N.J.

Lautenberg said he reached that conclusion because problems at FEMA persisted after Brown left, as exhibited by the delays in getting trailers to people in Louisiana and Mississippi who have requested them, and because the Bush administration had ignored Brown's request for more money to prepare for disasters such as Katrina.

"So Mr. Brown isn't on the payroll. . . . Who's responsible for not keeping up with our responsibilities? Somebody. And the fingers, no matter which way they try to point them, to me they point at the White House."

Shifting the blame

Sen. Joseph Lieberman, D-Conn., questioned Matthew Broderick, who was director of the Homeland Security Operations Center when Katrina hit and was responsible for keeping Chertoff and Bush updated on the hurricane.

Lieberman said he couldn't understand why Broderick, a retired brigadier general with the Marines, didn't report the levee breaches to Chertoff and the White House sooner than the morning of Aug. 30.

Broderick attributed the delay to conflicting reports from New Orleans, putting the blame largely on Brown and other FEMA officials, who he said were refusing to keep him updated. One FEMA official, he said, told him that the only information he would get would be the twice daily -- morning and evening -- official FEMA Hurricane Katrina update reports.

But Lieberman said he found the response inexplicable because there were reports from numerous federal agencies, including the National Weather Service and Transportation Security Administration, about levee breaks in New Orleans. A Senate investigator said Broderick should have "just turned on his TV."

No answer

Brown was asked to explain why it took two days to place an order for 500 buses that Gov. Kathleen Blanco had requested to rescue people from the Superdome and Ernest N. Morial Convention Center.

Brown said he could not give an explanation, except to say that the delays reflected a March 2005 report that found FEMA's system of controlling and tracking assets inadequate. Brown also mentioned a "brain drain" at FEMA caused by the retirement of many experienced officials, while Collins noted that a memo from senior officials in the agency complained that too many key jobs were filled with political appointees.

The former FEMA chief, who was subpoenaed Friday to give closed testimony this weekend to a House committee also investigating the slow response to Katrina, said he tried to take steps to improve the agency's preparedness but was rebuffed by Homeland Security superiors. For instance, he said, his request in the year before Katrina to get money to do a follow-up exercise, focused on a possible catastrophe in New Orleans, was ignored.

The disconnect between him and Chertoff couldn't be clearer. At one point after the hurricane struck, Brown testified, he was ordered to give Chertoff a briefing, and he assembled some of his top people.

"They spent the night getting their briefings together," Brown said. "And then they twiddled their thumbs for about and hour and a half, two hours that morning waiting for him to get off some phone calls or something. And I finally dismissed the briefers and just told them to go back to work. Because you can't have two people in control; either somebody's going to run the disaster or somebody's not going to run the disaster."

Brown under fire

Brown had some testy confrontations with senators.

"As I listen to your testimony, you're not prepared to, kind of, put a mirror in front of your face and recognize your own inadequacies and say, 'You know something? I made some big mistakes,' " said Sen. Norm Coleman, R-Minn.

Brown responded: "That's very easy for you to say sitting behind that dais and not being there in the middle of that disaster watching that human suffering and watching those people dying and trying to deal with those structural dysfunctionalities, even within the federal government."

Brown said he had admitted mistakes and told senators he spent some nights in his hotel room "crying and screaming" because he couldn't get the bureaucracy to respond to the tremendous suffering.

Sen. Robert Bennett, R-Utah, said that from Brown's testimony he has a sense why Chertoff reported not knowing immediately how bad things were in New Orleans. "The reason he didn't know is because you didn't think it important to tell him," Bennett said.

Brown said he preferred to deal directly with the White House, because he knew the Homeland Security bureaucracy was focused on terrorism, and asking it for help "just bogged things down."

White House spokesman Scott McClellan said there were conflicting reports about the levees in the immediate aftermath of the storm.

"We knew of the flooding that was going on," McClellan said. "That's why our top priority was focused on saving lives. . . . The cause of the flooding was secondary to that top priority, and that's the way it should be."

Sen. Mary Landrieu, D-La., said the testimony Friday showed that FEMA was not prepared before Katrina hit, "just as it is not prepared today."

"For months, this administration pointed fingers at others for their bungling," Landrieu said. "Now they're pointing fingers at one another. All the while, FEMA remains anemic and the rebuilding they are managing remains inefficient, ineffective and slow."

In all, according to a timeline released by the Senate Committee, 28 separate agencies had issued some kind of warning Aug. 29 about the flooding in metropolitan New Orleans resulting from levee breaches.

"It is clear that if the administration knew sooner that our levees had breached, they should have acted sooner," said Rep. William Jefferson, D-New Orleans.

DOJ_NMG_0014331

"By providing major federal resources immediately, the administration could have avoided the major loss of life and property with which our city must now cope. Obviously, the delay in federal action made the situation much worse."

. . . . . .

Bruce Alpert can be reached at bruce.alpert@newhouse.com or (202) 383-7861.

The Associated Press contributed to this report.

Blame Over Response To Katrina Intensifies (HCHRON)

By SAMANTHA LEVINE

Houston Chronicle, February 11, 2006

Ex-FEMA chief, homeland security officials offer conflicting details at Senate hearing

WASHINGTON - A clash among top officials in the Bush administration led to heated rhetoric and a hard-to-pin-down story Friday about how the federal government bungled its response to Hurricane Katrina.

Contradicting earlier statements by the White House, former Federal Emergency Management Agency chief Michael Brown said he told President Bush and other White House officials on the day before the storm how bad things were going to be in New Orleans. He said video teleconference calls and e-mail on Aug. 29, the day the storm hit, relayed information about the devastating flooding.

"They were aware of what was going on," Brown said in a hearing before the Senate's homeland security committee.

"For them to claim that we didn't have awareness of it [the levee collapsing] is just baloney," Brown said.

But as Sen. Susan Collins, R-Maine, the committee chairwoman pointed out, President Bush and other senior administration officials have said that for hours after water pouring through broken levees inundated New Orleans, they thought the city had "dodged the bullet."

Indeed, two senior officials with the Department of Homeland Security told the panel Friday that Brown failed to provide live information to Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff and did not set up the command centers required under the national emergency response plan.

Brown left us "virtually blind," said Robert Stephan, assistant secretary for infrastructure protection at the DHS.

But in another apparent contradiction, Bush spokesman Trent Duffy said Friday, "I completely reject any suggestion that the White House was not fully aware of the severity of the damage or the risk."

About 1,200 people died and thousands of homes were destroyed in the hurricane and the flooding it triggered.

Bush removed Brown from the Gulf Coast disaster zone about a week after the storm hit. Brown resigned three days later.

Senators stunnedBrown said the homeland security agency paid little attention to the storm because it is almost entirely focused on terrorist attacks.

He said DHS systematically denied funding to beef up FEMA's emergency preparations, and got little response when he discussed FEMA's shortcomings with White House officials, including Deputy Chief of Staff Joe Hagin and Chief of Staff Andy Card.

Duffy would not comment on conversations among administration officials.

Brown stunned the senators when he said he preferred to call Hagin rather than Chertoff about the storm because he found the DHS bureaucracy slow and frustrating.

Calling Chertoff, he said, "would have wasted my time" because the "culture was such that I didn't think that would have been effective and would have exacerbated the problem."

"That is a staggering statement," said Sen. Robert Bennett, R-Utah. "It demonstrates a dysfunctional department to a degree far greater than any we've seen."

When FEMA public affairs official Marty Bahamonde relayed desperate news of the flooding in New Orleans on the day of the storm, Brown said he called Hagin, who was with Bush at the president's ranch in Crawford.

"I think I told him that we were realizing our worst nightmare, that everything we had planned about, worried about, that FEMA, frankly, had worried about for 10 years was coming true," Brown said.

Testy exchangeSen. Norm Coleman, R-Minn., cast doubt on Brown's account.

DOJ_NMG_0014332

Coleman mentioned a much-publicized e-mail exchange in which Brown was told about the horror unfolding in New Orleans and responded, "Thanks for the update. Anything specific I need to do or tweak?"

Brown lashed out at Coleman, saying he was getting sick and tired of e-mail being taken out of context and that at the time, he had been doing many other things to respond to the emergency.

Coleman also accused Brown of being unwilling to "put a mirror in front of your face and recognize your own inadequacies."

"Senator, with all due respect, what do you want me to say?" Brown asked. "I have admitted to mistakes publicly. I've admitted to mistakes in hearings. What more, Senator Coleman, do you want from me? What do you want from me? I'm asking you. What do you want from me?"

The hearing was one of the last before the House and Senate complete their parallel investigations of how federal, state and local governments reacted to a storm that caused destruction that will take years and tens of billions of dollars to repair.

The House Government Reform Committee will release its report, which is expected to be harsh, on Wednesday. The Senate will release its report in mid-March.

samantha.levine@chron.com

Brown Says He Gave Bush Aide Early Warning On La. Flooding (BOS)

By Charlie Savage

The Boston Globe, February 11, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Michael Brown, former director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, said yesterday that he told a top aide to President Bush that New Orleans was being flooded on the same day that Hurricane Katrina hit land last year, raising new questions about the government's delayed response to the catastrophe.

Testifying before a Senate committee, Brown also characterized as "just baloney" contentions by top Homeland Security officials that they did not know the levees protecting New Orleans had collapsed until the day after the storm roared ashore. And, Brown said, he was being made a scapegoat for the Bush administration's flawed handling of FEMA.

"I feel somewhat abandoned," said Brown, the public face of the government's slow response in the early stage of the catastrophe.

Brown's testimony marked his first comments on the Katrina disaster since leaving the federal payroll in November, freeing him to speak more directly about communications between FEMA and the White House than when he testified last Sept. 27 before Congress. Although Brown had resigned under pressure two weeks before his testimony, he remained on the payroll as a consultant until November.

His testimony also came a day after Democrats on the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee released a series of internal e-mails written during the crisis. The documents showed that FEMA e-mails warned Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff's chief of staff about extensive flooding as early as 9:27 p.m. on Aug. 29, the day of the storm.

In the days after the levee breach, the federal government came under harsh criticism for delays in sending troops and supplies into the city amid concurrent leadership breakdowns at the state and local levels of government. Meanwhile, the situation for people trapped in the flooded city grew perilous.

Bush later said that he and others relaxed immediately after the storm, mistakenly believing that the city had weathered the hurricane without major problems. He and Chertoff continued their regularly scheduled events on Aug. 30, rather than immediately moving into crisis mode.

But in his testimony yesterday, Brown said he sounded the alarm with aides to top administration officials on the evening of Aug. 29, as soon as he learned the levees protecting New Orleans from catastrophic flooding were failing. He said he called Joe Hagin, the deputy White House chief of staff, who was with Bush at his ranch at Crawford, Texas, at the time.

"I think I told him that we were realizing our worst nightmare, that everything we had planned about, worried about, that FEMA, frankly, had worried about for 10 years, was coming true," Brown said. ". . . New Orleans is flooding. It's the worst-case scenario."

DOJ_NMG_0014333

But White House spokesman Scott McClellan rejected the contention that Bush understood the levee had breached earlier than the administration has acknowledged.

"There were conflicting reports coming in, in the initial aftermath of the storm, in regards to the levee system," he said.

"Some were saying it was overtopped, some were saying it was breached. And, again, we knew of the flooding that was going on; that's why our top priority was focused on saving lives. The cause of the flooding was secondary to that top priority, and that's the way it should be."

In later testimony yesterday, Robert Stephan, the Homeland Security assistant secretary for infrastructure protection, objected to criticism by senators that Brown's testimony and the FEMA e-mails showed that communications had broken down at the upper levels of the department. He said Brown erred by not conveying his message more urgently.

"If he's got a critical information piece, that's the whole nugget we're all waiting for confirming catastrophic flooding of the entire New Orleans downtown area, that to me is something that you don't just casually post to an e-mail and send to administrative headquarters somewhere light-years away," Stephan said. "You pick up the phone and say 'Boss, Secretary Chertoff, this is going down right here, this is serious, this is the one we were all waiting for.' Why did he not do that?"

Brown also said that structural changes to FEMA since it was folded into the new Department of Homeland Security after the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, crippled the agency's ability to respond to a natural disaster. The department, he said, was narrowly focused on responding to a terrorist attack but insufficiently attuned to a natural disaster.

Brown said that in the months leading up to the hurricane, he had begged Chertoff and, before him, former Homeland Security Secretary Tom Ridge, for more funds for disaster planning and training exercises for FEMA, even proposing a New Orleans flood scenario. But he was turned down, he said, because natural disasters were "the stepchild" at Homeland Security.

"It's my belief that had there been a report . . . that a terrorist has blown up the 17th Street canal levee, then everybody would have jumped all over that and been trying to do everything they could," he said.

Brown Details Katrina Alerts (BSUN)

By Johanna Neuman

The Baltimore Sun, February 11, 2006

Ex-FEMA chief testifies he told White House, not Homeland Security, about scale of storm

WASHINGTON -- Former FEMA Director Michael D. Brown testified yesterday that, hours before Hurricane Katrina struck the Gulf Coast, he called President Bush directly and told him the storm was going to be "a catastrophe within a catastrophe." And the next day, with New Orleans levees collapsing, he called a senior White House aide to report "our worst nightmare" had occurred.

What Brown said he did not do was communicate with his superiors at the Department of Homeland Security, who had critical responsibilities for launching and overseeing the federal government's response to the rapidly unfolding tragedy. The Federal Emergency Management Agency is part of the Homeland Security Department, but Brown said he thought talking to his boss, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, "would have wasted my time."

Yet members of the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, before which Brown testified yesterday, suggested that his decision to ignore his department and its established procedures reflected the kind of high-level communications breakdown that hamstrung Washington's response to Katrina.

Lower-level Homeland Security officials who had had operational responsibilities for dealing with the crisis agreed. They told the committee that they had repeatedly been hampered by a lack of information from FEMA about events on the ground.

"There was a prevailing attitude from Mr. Brown that he did not want Homeland Security to interfere with any of his operations or what he was doing," Matthew Broderick, director of operations coordination for the department, told the committee. "Mr. Brown should have picked up the telephone and called the secretary right away."

At one level, testimony at the Senate hearing was another round in the blame game that has raged over the past months as a mountain of evidence has accumulated on the shortcomings of the government's response to a disaster that claimed more than 1,300 lives, left tens of thousands of people homeless and inflicted billions of dollars in damage on the Gulf Coast.

DOJ_NMG_0014334

But the hearing also provided graphic evidence of how personal and bureaucratic rivalries among senior administration officials had taken precedence over effective response to the emergency. Brown, for example, devoted much of his testimony to denouncing the Homeland Security Department and complaining about the fact that his agency had been made a part of it.

The department was created after the Sept. 11 attacks as part of an effort to coordinate the far-flung government agencies responsible for dealing with catastrophic events -- natural disasters as well as terrorism.

Saying FEMA had become a "stepchild" in a department preoccupied with terrorism, Brown said, Homeland Security policies and decisions "put FEMA on a path to failure."

With Chertoff expected to testify Tuesday, his spokesman, William "Russ" Knocke, said that the secretary would not engage in a shouting match with Brown. "We're not interested in a point-by-point response," he said. "We're interested in lessons from [an] unprecedented storm season and applying those in a constructive way as [we] prepare for next storm season."

In his testimony, Brown asserted that he had been able to "cut through any interagency bureaucracy" by calling the White House instead of working with Homeland Security. Under questioning by members of the committee, however, Brown said that in his calls -- 30 calls to White House Chief of Staff Andrew H. Card Jr. or his deputy, Joe Hagin -- he had not asked the White House to take specific actions. Rather, he said, his goal was to keep the White House informed.

Asked about what he had told a senior White House official in an Aug. 29 call, Brown said: "Nothing specific, I just thought they needed to be aware."

In one key conversation with a senior White House official just after FEMA learned that the levees had failed, Brown said he reported that "our worst nightmare" had occurred but said he did not remember whether he had passed on that the levees had failed, dooming the city.

The White House, stung by suggestions that the president may have been slow to grasp the seriousness of the crisis, released a four-page briefing designed to show that he had responded quickly and appropriately. Among other things, the White House pointed out that on Aug. 28, the day before Katrina reached the coast, he had called Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco and urged her to issue a mandatory evacuation order for New Orleans and the area around it.

"He is concerned about the impact that this hurricane would have on our people. And he asked me to please ensure that there would be a mandatory evacuation," the White House quoted Blanco as saying in a CNN news report that day.

Evacuation efforts were bogged down because officials had failed to provide adequate transportation and other support for thousands of poor New Orleans residents who lacked means to move to safety on their own. The same was true for many hospital patients and nursing home residents, some of whom died when they were trapped by the floods that swept through the city.

Johanna Neuman writes for the Los Angeles Times.

Brown: I Warned White House As Katrina Hit (AP)

By Lara Jakes Jordan

AP, February 11, 2006

Former federal disaster chief Michael Brown, the face of the government's listless response to Hurricane Katrina, said Friday he told top Bush officials the day the storm howled ashore of massive flooding in New Orleans and warned "we were realizing our worst nightmare."

More defiant than defensive, Brown told senators he dealt directly with White House officials the day of the Aug. 29 storm, including chief of staff Andrew Card and deputy chief of staff Joe Hagin.

He also said the Homeland Security Department was among a half-dozen government agencies that received regular briefings that day from him and other officials by way of video conference calls. Administration officials have said they did not realize the severe damage Katrina had caused until after the storm had passed.

Under oath, Brown told the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee that he could not explain why his appeals failed to produce a faster response.

DOJ_NMG_0014335

"I expected them to cut every piece of red tape, do everything they could ... that I didn't want to hear anybody say that we couldn't do everything they humanly could to respond to this," Brown said about a video conference with administration officials — in which President Bush briefly participated — the day before Katrina hit. "Because I knew in my gut this was the bad one."

In the end, the storm claimed more than 1,300 lives, uprooted hundreds of thousands more and caused tens of billions in damage. The devastation in New Orleans and other Gulf Coast communities left Americans with enduring images of their countrymen dying in flooded nursing homes and pleading for rescue from rooftops.

Brown, in his second Capitol Hill appearance since Katrina, told his side to the senators five months after he quit under fire as chief of the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

He agreed with some senators who characterized him as a scapegoat for government failures.

"I feel somewhat abandoned," said Brown,

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff has said he did not know that New Orleans' levees were breached until Aug. 30. Bush at the time said, "I don't think anybody anticipated the breach of the levees."

At an occasionally contentious White House briefing Friday, Bush spokesman Scott McClellan said there were conflicting reports about the levees in the immediate aftermath of the storm.

"We knew of the flooding that was going on," McClellan said. "That's why our top priority was focused on saving lives. ... The cause of the flooding was secondary to that top priority and that's the way it should be."

After three hours of testimony, Brown was handed a subpoena ordering him to reappear in front of a House panel investigating the storm response. Brown is expected to be questioned by House investigators this weekend — days before the panel is expected to release its findings on the storm.

Recounting conference calls that described initial damage reports the day Katrina hit, Brown scoffed at claims that Homeland Security didn't know about the devastation's scope until the next day. He called those claims "just baloney."

Some senators suggested Brown look inward before pointing the finger elsewhere.

"You're not prepared to put a mirror in front of your face and recognize your own inadequacies," said Norm Coleman, R-Minn. "Perhaps you may get a more sympathetic hearing if you had a willingness to confess your own sins in this."

Brown responded: "That's very easy for you to say sitting behind that dais and not being there in the middle of that disaster watching that human suffering and watching those people dying and trying to deal with those structural dysfunctionalities, even within the federal government."

The disjointed federal response, Brown said, was in part the result of FEMA being swallowed in 2003 by the newly created Homeland Security Department, which he said was focused on fighting terrorism.

Natural disasters "had become the stepchild of the Department of Homeland Security," he said. Had there been a report that "a terrorist had blown up the 17th Street Canal levee, then everybody would have jumped all over that," he added.

Some senators attempted to trace the failures back to the White House.

"You quite appropriately and admirably wanted to get the word to the president as quickly as you could," said Joe Lieberman, D-Conn., asking about Brown's conversation with Hagin on the evening of Aug. 29. "Did you tell Mr. Hagin in that phone call that New Orleans was flooding?"

Brown answered: "I think I told him that we were realizing our worst nightmare, that everything we had planned about, worried about, that FEMA, frankly, had worried about for 10 years was coming true."

Sen. Robert Bennett, R-Utah, suggested Brown may have delayed the federal response by cutting Homeland Security out of the loop about the levee failures and going straight to the White House.

"I think I now understand why Secretary Chertoff says he didn't know," Bennett said. "The reason he didn't know is because you didn't think it important to tell him."

Brown said he communicated directly with the White House instead of Homeland Security because FEMA's parent agency "just bogged things down."

White House 'warned Of Levee Breach' (FT)

By Andrei Postelnicu

DOJ_NMG_0014336

Financial Times, February 11, 2006

The White House was alerted of a breach in the New Orleans levee system on the night Hurricane Katrina struck the city, a former Bush administration official told US senators on Friday.

The testimony from Michael Brown, the former head of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, to a Senate committee clashes with White House statements that the administration had been taken by surprise by the levee failure.

Mr Brown, told the Senate's homeland security committee that he told Joseph Hagin, President Bush's deputy chief of staff, about the levee breach on the night of August 29th, as Katrina made landfall on New Orleans.

"I think I told him we were realising our worst nightmares," Mr Brown said. In response to inquiries about the president's awareness of the situation, Mr Brown said he thought "If I've told Joe Hagin or [chief of staff] Andy Card, I've told the president".

White House officials have said they did not know about the levee breach and subsequent flooding of New Orleans until the morning of Tuesday, August 30th. The Bush administration has come under sharp criticism for the delays in getting emergency supplies into New Orleans in Katrina's aftermath.

"For them [the White House] to claim that we didn't have awareness of it is just baloney," Mr Brown said.

The former official, who resigned less than two weeks after Katrina struck amid uproar about the US government response to the hurricane, also told lawmakers that he often bypassed Michael Chertoff, his boss at the Department of Homeland Security in favour of talking directly to the White House.

The revelations come as a five-month investigation into the hurricane response revealed in detail the chain of events that saw images of mosrly poor and black Americans in distress in a crippled city.

A Fema official who was in New Orleans emailed his supervisors in Washington to say conditions "are far more serious than media reports are currently reflecting", investigators found.

Mr Brown said that going through the chain of command at the homeland security department "would have been a waster of time". The department, which was created following the September 11th terrorist attacks, was "was an additional bureaucracy that was going to slow me down even more, and the way I got around that was dealing directly with the White House".

The remarks atracted retorts from senators describing the situation as "dysfunctional". While some admitted the "structural" deficiencies of the new department, they accused Mr Brown of a leadership failure which, combined with the structure, became a "perfect storm".

Mr Brown, whose appointment without obvious qualifications for the Fema job brought the White House under attack, sought to defend his record at the agency by mentioning previous responses to California wildfires and the crash of a space shuttle.

He told senators he was "sick and tired of emails taken out of context".

Brown Warned White House Before Katrina Struck (REU)

By Richard Cowan

Reuters, February 11, 2006

Former federal disaster chief Michael Brown told a U.S. Senate panel on Friday he warned President George W. Bush of impending catastrophe in New Orleans last summer and informed White House aides of dangerous flooding shortly after Hurricane Katrina struck.

Brown said on August 29, the day the hurricane hit, he relayed urgent reports that the city's levee pumps were failing, contradicting White House officials who have said they were unaware on August 29 the levees were no longer functioning.

With the pumps overwhelmed and the levees seriously breached, floodwaters overtook much of New Orleans in a natural disaster that killed about 1,200 people along the Gulf Coast.

On September 1, Bush said in a television interview, "I don't think anyone anticipated the breach of the levees."

Yet Connecticut Sen. Joseph Lieberman, the committee's ranking Democrat, cited a report from the National Weather Service at 9:14 a.m. on August 29 that at least one of the levees protecting the city was breached.

Brown, who headed the Federal Emergency Management Agency, said in his first detailed testimony about his contacts with Bush and top White House officials that he informed the White House that "we were realizing our worst nightmare."

DOJ_NMG_0014337

The Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee is investigating failures by federal, state and local officials to deal with the hurricane and particularly why the Bush administration was so slow to react to the emergency.

Brown blamed the poor federal response to Katrina in part on the absorption of FEMA into the Department of Homeland Security, which he said was focused on preventing terrorist attacks and neglected the threat of natural disasters. He urged it be set up as a separate agency once again.

In addition to one or two direct talks with Bush before the storm, Brown said he talked with White House officials about 30 times once Katrina hit land. Those conversations included White House Chief of Staff Andrew Card, Brown said, adding: "Sometimes the president would get on the phone."

Before agreeing to answer questions about his contacts with the White House, Brown sought assurances he would not be caught in a legal cross-fire over whether those conversations should be divulged.

Committee head Susan Collins, a Maine Republican, gave Brown a green light to testify, saying the White House was given the chance, but had not invoked executive privilege.

'UNMANAGEABLE SITUATION'

In his testimony, Brown said Homeland Security chief Michael Chertoff's sprawling agency was making Katrina response decisions contrary to his own. "It became an absolutely unmanageable situation," Brown said.

Brown emerged as the main scapegoat for the government's response. He was forced to resign shortly after the disaster.

Collins, who is leading the Senate probe of the government response, put some of the blame on Brown's shoulders. Following his testimony, Collins said Brown "let his poor relations" with Chertoff interfere with communications.

Some Democrats on the committee tried to lay blame squarely with the White House. "Keep your chin up. Fight back," Sen. Frank Lautenberg of New Jersey told Brown, adding that the Bush administration was handling hurricane reconstruction poorly.

Besides those killed, hundreds of thousands were made homeless in the storm, which devastated much of Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama. Nearly six months later, many of those displaced do not know whether their homes will be rebuilt.

Bush was nearing the end of his monthlong summer vacation when the hurricane struck. He was on a working trip to Arizona and California on the day it hit and the day after, August 29 and August 30, and returned to Washington from his Texas ranch on August 31.

Brown's appearance before the Senate panel was followed by a subpoena to appear before the House Select Bipartisan Committee to Investigate the Preparation for and Response to Hurricane Katrina. The panel is meeting this weekend.

"This will be a closed meeting. We want to get the information we need from Brown without causing a further media circus," said Tom Davis, a Republican from Virginia who chairs that committee.

(Additional reporting by Alan Elsner and Donna Smith)

Former FEMA Chief Blames Chertoff For Katrina Response (KRT)

By Seth Borenstein

Knight Ridder, February 11, 2006

WASHINGTON - As Hurricane Katrina's deadly floodwaters kept rising in New Orleans streets last August, the two top federal disaster chiefs feuded while other officials wouldn't talk to each other, according to testimony Friday at a Senate hearing.

In his first testimony since leaving the government payroll, former Federal Emergency Management Agency Director Michael Brown, who's been roundly criticized for his handling of Katrina, said he felt like a scapegoat for a government-wide failure and squarely blamed his boss, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff.

"I was literally constrained by Secretary Chertoff," Brown said. "My hands were tied."

Brown said he tried to bypass his boss and work directly with the White House, a tactic he said had worked in the past. But White House Chief of Staff Andrew Card told him he had to work with Chertoff, Brown said.

Chertoff, he said, wouldn't let him fly to the disaster scene from his Baton Rouge, La., base.

On Monday, Aug. 29, when the storm hit the Gulf Coast, Brown said Homeland Security officials continually downplayed alarming reports from a FEMA agent who said he saw massive levee breaches and flooding in New Orleans.

DOJ_NMG_0014338

Brown blamed the Bush administration's absorption with terrorism for its slow response to Katrina. He said that if his FEMA agent on the scene had confirmed "that a terrorist has blown up the 17th Street Canal levee, then everybody would have jumped all over that ... but because this was a natural disaster, that has become the stepchild within the Department of Homeland Security." FEMA is a subdivision of the Department of Homeland Security, but prior to 2003 was an independent agency.

Homeland Security officials weren't listening to how bad it was, Brown said. They were tuned into FEMA's video teleconferences (VTCs) along with White House officials, but didn't seem to get the message, he said.

White House spokesman Scott McClellan said Friday that the White House "knew of the flooding that was going on."

But Homeland Security officials told the Senate Governmental Affairs Committee that they didn't know about major flooding in New Orleans until Tuesday, Aug. 30.

Retired Gen. Matthew E. Broderick, who was in charge of the department's operations center, said he went home Monday thinking that there was little flooding and that "they seemed to be having a party in the French Quarter that evening."

"When we came in Tuesday, we realized this was serious,'" Broderick said.

Brown called Homeland Security officials' claims "a little disingenuous."

"All they had to do was listen to those VTCs and pay attention to these VTCs and they would have known what was going on," Brown said. "And in fact I e-mailed a White House official that evening about how bad it was."

Brown said the department claimed to be unaware of what was happening because "you know, they're off doing other things."

Two top Homeland Security officials denied that they weren't listening. They said that Brown wasn't talking to them and that he kept other FEMA officials from telling them what was going on.

But the Senate committee released a timeline of 26 notices that warned of horrible flooding in New Orleans before Tuesday morning.

By noon on Monday, five notices of flooding had been sent to Broderick's Homeland Security operations center or to the White House. By 6 p.m., 17 flooding notices had been sent. Despite the notices, the Homeland Security Operations Center's situation report said as of 6 p.m. that "preliminary reports indicate the levees in New Orleans have not been breached."

Broderick said he knew there was flooding, but said "we didn't know the degree." He blamed Brown and FEMA for using e-mail instead of making phone calls.

On Sept. 9, Chertoff replaced Brown as on-scene commander with Coast Guard Vice Adm. Thad Allen.

"The situation was dramatically turned around following the arrival of Vice Admiral Allen," said Robert Stephan, assistant secretary for infrastructure protection and the author of the nation's disaster plan.

Friday's hearing showed that FEMA and its Homeland Security overseers had "two different game plans," said Joe Myers, Florida's former emergency management chief. Brown seemed to be working from an old disaster-management plan that was used through 2004, while Chertoff's people were using a plan that had been put into effect in April 2005, he said.

Brown also told senators that FEMA became ineffective because there was too much bureaucracy.

Broderick's and Stephan's testimonies were a treasury of bureaucratic acronyms; they used 107 of them in their opening remarks. Asked if that symbolized excessive bureaucracy, Broderick said Homeland Security had added only four acronyms to the lexicon of disaster planning.

Katrina Hearings Put New Pressure On White House (WSJ)

By Robert Block

The Wall Street Journal, February 11, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Congressional hearings on Hurricane Katrina are increasingly pointing to bureaucratic failings at the Department of Homeland Security and the White House, putting new pressure on the White House to open up its records to legislators despite objections that such a move would undercut executive privilege.

The probe is also giving momentum to efforts, inside the administration and on Capitol Hill, to overhaul the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

DOJ_NMG_0014339

"While DHS's playbook appears designed to distance headquarters as much as possible from FEMA, the department's leaders must answer for decisions they made -- or failed to make -- that contributed to the problems," Susan Collins, the Republican senator from Maine who is chairing the Senate's Katrina investigation, said at hearings Friday.

So far, the Bush administration has invoked executive privilege and refused to share with the committee any of its documents about what actions the White House took during the disaster.

But the administration's wall of silence was breached yesterday by Michael Brown, the former FEMA director, who agreed to testify before the Senate Homeland Security and Government Affairs Committee. There, he said that his agency's mission was marginalized when it was swallowed by the newly created Homeland Security agency in 2003. He said he often complained to White House officials, including White House Chief of Staff Andrew Card, about the danger of undermining FEMA but they failed to act on his warnings.

Mr. Brown, who quit under fire just days after the storm slammed into the Gulf Coast, provided the first detailed look into communications between emergency-management officials and the White House after the hurricane, and pushed blame for the disaster closer to the president.

From the immediate disastrous aftermath of the storm until now, Bush administration officials have maintained that they had been caught completely by surprise when they were told on Tuesday, Aug. 30 -- a full day after the storm hit -- that the levees protecting New Orleans had broken, allowing floodwaters to swamp the city. At the time, President Bush said, "I don't think anybody anticipated the breach of the levees."

Department of Homeland Security officials also have said that they were unaware of the failure of the levees until Tuesday morning.

"I find it a little disingenuous," Mr. Brown said. "For them to claim that we didn't have awareness of it is just baloney."

The White House hasn't responded to yesterday's testimony.

While DHS officials acknowledge that the response to the storm was unacceptable, they have heaped much of the blame for the slow response on Mr. Brown, saying he failed to provide Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff with up-to-date information.

"My obligation was to the White House and to make sure the president knows what's going on, and I did that," Mr. Brown said Friday. He said this was exactly the way he functioned during previous disasters, including the four hurricanes that hit Florida in 2004. Mr. Brown said that the DHS had robbed FEMA of resources and funds. "There was a cultural clash that didn't recognize the absolute inherent science of preparing for a disaster."

The White House has commissioned its own study into the Katrina fiasco that has been headed by Homeland Security Advisor Frances Fragos Townsend. Ms. Townsend is due to present some of her findings to state emergency managers meeting near Washington Saturday. Ms. Townsend is expected to be critical of DHS policies that stripped FEMA of many of its preparedness activities.

Sen. Collins has said that, when her investigation is over, she will propose legislation aimed at improving the country's emergency response and fixing problems inside the DHS.

Mr. Chertoff, meanwhile, is expected to try to pre-empt congressional action by announcing his own reorganization of FEMA in coming weeks.

Write to Robert Block at bobby.block@wsj.com6

Stormy Dean Slams Bush: Points Finger For Katrina Deaths (BOSH)

By Kimberly Atkins

Boston Herald, February 11, 2006

Howard Dean yesterday blamed President Bush for the deaths of thousands of Hurricane Katrina victims - prompting a swift rebuke from Republicans.

Appearing in Boston before members of the New England Press Association, the failed presidential candidate sharply criticized Bush for failing to respond to the disaster.

DOJ_NMG_0014340

"Michael Brown is testifying that he had direct contact with the (president's) chief of staff - as the levees were breaking," Dean said, referring to the former FEMA head's testimony before a congressional committee yesterday. "Thousands of people died in New Orleans because the president didn't pay attention and denied that he knew about it. . . . it turns out that wasn't true."

Dean - whose controversial one-year tenure as party chairman saw some Democratic leaders calling on him to tone down his rhetoric - called the Bush administration more corrupt than Richard Nixon's.

While Nixon obstructed justice to protect the presidency, "this administration has done more than that, they have leaked military secrets at a time of war to fulfill their political agenda," Dean said.

Danny Diaz, spokesman for the Republican National Committee, dismissed Dean's criticisms. "Howard Dean's Democratic Party lacks leadership, direction or anything substantive to add to national dialogue," Diaz said. "The reality is Democrats fail to have a political strategy that resonates with the American people and so they resort to political attacks."

Dean also said the Democratic Party needs to right itself if it hopes to have a shot of winning back the Oval Office, and that starts with taking a move from the GOP playbook and organizing more effectively from the bottom up.

The road to the White House, he said, starts with grassroots organizing in local races. He praised the campaign that helped Boston City Councilor Sam Yoon make history as the first Asian-American elected to the office.

"If we ever want to win again, it is not enough to have operatives in all 50 states," he said. "It is not enough to have a voting list as good as the Republicans. We have to stand up and say who we are."

Auditors Find Huge Fraud In FEMA Aid (NYT)

By Eric Lipton

The New York Times, February 11, 2006

WASHINGTON, Feb. 10 — Thousands of applicants for federal emergency relief money after Hurricanes Katrina and Rita used duplicate or invalid Social Security numbers or bogus addresses, suggesting that the $2.3 billion program was a victim of extensive fraud, a Congressional auditor will report Monday.

The examination of the so-called Expedited Assistance program determined that the Federal Emergency Management Agency failed to take even the most basic steps to confirm the identifies of about 1.4 million people who sought expedited cash assistance, leaving the program vulnerable to the "significant fraud and abuse," the Government Accountability Office intends to report.

The auditors did not try to estimate the total dollar amount of fraudulent claims. But the report says that FEMA itself had found that 900,000 of the 2.5 million applications for all forms of individual assistance were "potential duplicates."

Even when FEMA's automated computer system picked out what might be fraudulent applications, payments were at times still sent, says the advance testimony of Gregory D. Kutz, the managing director of the G.A.O.'s forensic audits unit.

The controls were so lax that auditors were able to secure their own $2,000 relief check by using "falsified identifies, bogus addresses and fabricated disaster stories," and then simply waiting for the money to arrive in the mail, says the report for the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, a copy of which was obtained by The New York Times.

Nicol Andrews, a FEMA spokeswoman, said the agency recognized there could be fraud. But Ms. Andrews said the priority was getting aid as fast as possible to hundreds of thousands of families in dire need.

"We took a calculated risk in a catastrophic situation," she said. "It was the right thing to do. Unfortunately, some may have cheated the system."

She added that some arrests have been made. The agency is also suspending payments to people suspected of trying to cheat the system.

Still, the auditors found signs of fraud nearly everywhere:

¶Nearly half of the 11,000 individuals who received special debit cards as payment — an approach used in the immediate aftermath of the storm in Texas — got a second $2,000 payment in emergency aid.

¶Inspections of 200 properties in Texas and Louisiana listed as home addresses turned up 80 that were vacant lots or nonexistent apartments.

DOJ_NMG_0014341

¶More than half of a group of 248 other applicants had used Social Security numbers that were never issued, belonged to dead people or did not match the name provided.

In one case, auditors found 17 individuals, some with the same last name and addresses, who used 34 bogus Social Security numbers to collect more than $103,000 in payments.

Auditors found isolated instances where the electronic debit cards were used to pay for "adult entertainment," a .45-caliber handgun, jewelry or bail bond services.

FEMA Tries To Pause La. Role (BRA)

By MIKE DUNNE

Baton Rouge Advocate, February 11, 2006

Agency says state not engaged enough in long-term planning

The Federal Emergency Management Agency has told Gov. Kathleen Blanco that state and local officials need to take on more leadership in planning Louisiana's long-term recovery.

This week, FEMA put out a notice to workers that it would put on "pause" the long-term recovery planning process known as ESF-14. It is designed to spur not only recovery but to build in elements that would avert or mitigate damages from future disasters.

FEMA told workers the pause was for at least two weeks. However, officials at the Louisiana Recovery Authority, the advisory partner in the process, were stumped when they started getting calls about the "pause."

Late Friday, LRA spokeswoman Pam Laborde said the "pause is on pause." Apparently, when word reached Blanco on Friday, she called Acting FEMA Director R. David Paulison to find out what was happening.

James McIntyre, a spokesman for the FEMA Baton Rouge recovery field office, said Blanco and Paulison "came to an agreement" to continue the process but "with state and local governments taking more ownership of the process and the federal government taking more of a support role than a lead role."

Earlier in the day, FEMA spokeswoman Nicol Andrews in Washington, D.C., said the long-term recovery planning process was "paused" because of a lack of "engagement" in the state.

The process has worked well in Florida and elsewhere after disasters and is working in Mississippi, but is not working in Louisiana, Andrews said.

Later in the day, McIntyre said FEMA and state officials will meet next week to work out how the state will take more ownership. He was unsure when that might happen.

Meanwhile, Blanco and the Legislature are meeting in another special session on hurricane recovery related issues.

Laborde said the LRA has "been an active partner" with FEMA, working in 26 parishes and using 50 state employees on the effort. The LRA Foundation generated extra private funds to hire a "dream team" of planners to advise the process. Planning meetings have been going on this week in Lake Charles and are planned for next week in Abbeville.

Local plans are due to the state by the end of March and will be put into a state plan that will address housing and community development, environmental and coastal issues, human services, transportation and infrastructure and economic development.

An environmental activist who has been following the process, Darryl Malek-Wiley of the Sierra Club, said midday Friday that, "I am very disappointed this process has been put on hold."

The state helped host a series of meetings in four states on Jan. 21 to get public input on what the recovery priorities should be. Levee protection, affordable housing, jobs and better schools surfaced as the main topics.

Malek-Wiley attended one of those meetings in San Antonio where people "were very engaged. I did hear that no public attended a meeting in Shreveport."

He questioned whether sufficient effort has been put into the process to reach out and engage residents.

The people attending in San Antonio, many of them evacuees bused to the meeting from shelters, "were pleased with the discussion" and the ability to take part in the process, he said.

The ESF-14 process is important because "any future federal dollars can be directed by this plan," Malek-Wiley said.

"At one session, a FEMA representative talked about building a new 20,000-unit housing development at Lapalco Boulevard and U.S. Highway 90 (on the west bank of Jefferson Parish) and we were able to point out that area is very low," Malek-Wiley said.

He and other activists want to ensure the plan is environmentally friendly.

U.S. Should Share Oil Royalties With States -Shell (REU)

By Tom Doggett

Reuters, February 11, 2006

The U.S. government should share more of the royalties it collects from energy companies for offshore oil and natural gas drilling with the states, particularly to help rebuild hurricane-ravaged Louisiana, a top Shell Oil executive said on Friday.

Gulf Coast states that have offshore drilling collect royalties for oil and gas production in the their waters which usually extend only a few miles from shore. Any exploration beyond that is in federal waters, where the government collects royalties that go to the general treasury to pay for various programs benefiting the whole country.

Marvin Odum, who is responsible for Shell's energy exploration and production businesses in the United States and the rest of the North and South America, said he supports efforts by the Gulf Coast states and local communities to get some of the federal oil and gas revenue.

"It's certainly something that we think the government can and should push through," Odum said in a interview with Reuters.

Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Blanco said this week she wants the government to give the state 50 percent of the federal offshore royalties to help repair coastal wetlands left vulnerable to hurricanes due to oil industry development.

While Odum supports revenue sharing, he would not comment on how much federal royalties Louisiana or any other state should get or what they should spend it on.

"That's between the states and the federal government, that's what they need to work out," he said. "Whether or not Louisiana would choose to use some of that money specifically for hurricane restoration and recovery, obviously that's a great need, that would be again a government decision."

Separately, Odum said "quite a bit" of the $15 billion that Shell's parent company, Royal Dutch Shell Plc, plans to spend worldwide this year for oil and gas exploration and production will be targeted for the United States.

While that amount reflects higher drilling and exploration costs, he said there will still be money for new investment. "It's a significant increase in activity worldwide," he said.

In the United States, he said Shell will focus on drilling for new oil in the deeper waters of the Gulf of Mexico and off the Alaskan coast, and developing natural gas resources from south Texas through the Rocky Mountain region.

The company will also invest in developing the vast oil shale resources in the Western United States, which the government estimates holds more than 1 trillion barrels of oil.

Oil shale is sedimentary rock containing organic material that can be crushed and heated to produce oil. The process is a costly one, and most U.S. oil shale projects were abandoned in the early 1980s when crude prices collapsed.

However, with oil prices expected to average above $60 a barrel in the next two years, oil shale development looks profitable again.

Odum said the company will know in about five years whether developing oil shale is commercially viable.

He said the government should open more offshore and onshore areas to drilling to help reduce U.S. reliance on foreign oil imports.

Odum declined to say whether President Bush's goal of cutting U.S. Mideast oil imports by 75 percent in 2025 could be reached.

However, he said even if more areas are opened to drilling the United States will still be heavily dependent on foreign suppliers to meet its energy needs over the next two decades. "I think that's a reasonable case," he said.

Katrina's Unclaimed To Get Hometown Burial (WP)

By Peter Whoriskey

The Washington Post, February 11, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0014343

City to Take Custody of Unclaimed Storm Victims

NEW ORLEANS -- Inside a fleet of refrigerated trucks parked an hour west of here lie the bodies of more than 200 unidentified or unclaimed victims of Hurricane Katrina.

"Some, we don't know who they are," said Chuck Smith, leader of the federal mortuary effort in Carville, La. "And with some, we can't locate the families, or the families are unable to make provisions."

The question now, five months after the storm, is what to do with the dead.

The makeshift morgue, a joint federal and state effort, is scheduled to close by the end of the month. And like virtually every other challenge facing this flooded metropolis, the funeral tasks have been complicated by the vast scale of the disaster and the difficulties of coordinating local, state and federal efforts.

Initially, state authorities had selected a four-acre cemetery site in Carville, and in preparation for the burials, had graded and planted the ground. A memorial was envisioned there.

But that did not sit well with many in New Orleans who argued that a proper burial includes the sense, spiritual and geographical, of "going home." Most of the dead come from the city.

"I told them we cannot be burying New Orleanians outside of New Orleans," Mayor C. Ray Nagin said of his protests to state officials.

The mayor said he also objected to the proposed use of wooden caskets, which "over time would have disintegrated into the earth," making it difficult to relocate remains if more identifications are made later.

So now the city will take custody of the dead. The trouble is that the city, already struggling with the burdens of hurricane recovery, must now scramble to build a mausoleum for the Katrina victims.

New Orleans officials met last week with FEMA officials to discuss the city's request for financial help to build the mausoleum, which is expected to cost about $400,000. A Federal Emergency Management Agency spokesman said FEMA is prepared to reimburse the city for at least some of the mausoleum expense.

It would be built at a publicly owned cemetery here, said the city's health director, Kevin Stephens, and made of some appropriate material, such as granite. The bodies will be held in metal caskets, and if one of the unidentified bodies within the mausoleum is later identified, it can easily be removed and placed elsewhere for burial.

The city is also working with a corporate donor who may contribute nearly $1 million to a memorial for the victims, Nagin said.

While the mausoleum is being planned and built, the bodies will be in the custody of a mortuary company that the city is choosing, Stephens said.

Katrina's dead have proved a large-scale logistical challenge. State officials, working with local coroners, have recovered 1,103 bodies.

Of those, 97 are still unidentified, and a large portion of those will be difficult to identify, state officials said, because investigators lack not only personal effects but also the locations where the bodies were recovered. Without those initial clues, it is difficult to know from whom to seek DNA samples to match the body with a family.

DNA has been used to make identifications in some cases, but the vast majority of bodies have been identified using more conventional techniques, with workers searching through flooded New Orleans dentists' offices and poring over soggy dental records.

"We're down to those we have no idea on," Smith said. "The ones that only DNA will get."

Once the bodies are identified, moreover, there is no guarantee that they can be released.

As of Friday, 106 bodies had been identified but remained on the trucks either because the families could not be located or because the families, who are scattered across the country, did not have the means to arrange a funeral.

"So many people have been completely displaced," said Bob Johannessen, a state spokesman. "A family that winds up in Buffalo, New York, may not have the wherewithal to claim a body and conduct a burial."

An array of complications has slowed the process of releasing and burying the bodies.

In four or five cases, the next of kin is mentally impaired. In 20 or more cases, the families are working with FEMA to receive money for burials. In others, the grief-stricken families are simply letting the government handle arrangements.

DOJ_NMG_0014344

"There are some who say just let the state take care of it," said Randy Lemoine, director of the call center where identifications are being coordinated. "We're talking about very poor families. Some are dragging their feet to see how the state will handle the process.

"Other families are still dealing with their own grief," he said. "They are struggling to get their personal affairs in order. It's heart-rending to hear their stories."

The mortuary team's task goes well beyond those killed by this year's hurricanes, too. An estimated 1,300 dead were displaced when caskets laid to rest long before the storm were swept away by floodwaters, officials said. One coffin in Cameron Parish was carried more than 33 miles by Hurricane Rita's storm surge. It was found beneath a highway overpass.

In this city, whose cemeteries and jazz funerals are a distinctive regional custom, the focus is on returning Katrina's victims.

"There is something about being buried in the place you lived and coming home," said Stephens, the city health director. "We need to bring closure. We really do need to bring closure."

WAR NEWS:

Iran "Making Mistake" With Iraq Meddling: Rumsfeld (REU-Y2)

By Will Dunham

Reuters, February 11, 2006

Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, days after calling Iran the world's top state sponsor of terrorism, ratcheted up the pressure on Tehran on Friday with fresh accusations of interference in Iraq.

Rumsfeld, in Taormina, Sicily, for a meeting of NATO defense ministers, used an appearance in Europe for the second time in a week to talk tough over Iran, which the United States and European Union fear is covertly developing nuclear weapons.

Asked during a news conference about U.S. assertions that Iran, as well as Syria, supports insurgents in Iraq, Rumsfeld said: "We have undertaken a series of initiatives to try to persuade them that their behavior is harmful to a new Iraqi government and indeed harmful to the region. Thus far we've not been successful."

"I think they're making a mistake," Rumsfeld said, "although I can certainly understand that from their standpoint having a free and sovereign and democratic Iraq on their borders probably is not terribly encouraging to their type of government. So I can understand their resistance to that."

Rumsfeld did not make specific allegations of misconduct by either Iran or Syria relating to Iraq. In the past, U.S. officials have accused heavily Shi'ite Muslim Iran of encouraging radicalism among Iraq's majority Shi'ites and of allowing dangerous weaponry to pass into Iraq.

Iran's President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad has said such accusations are unfounded.

U.S. officials have also accused Syria of allowing foreign fighters and financing to flow across its border into Iraq. Syria says it is doing what it can and says Iraq and the United States have failed to control their own side of the border.

The United States has about 139,000 troops in Iraq fighting a tenacious insurgency nearly three years into the war.

IRAN NUCLEAR AMBITIONS DISCUSSED

Rumsfeld said that during a private meeting with Russian Defense Minister Sergei Ivanov in Taormina, the subject of Iran's nuclear ambitions came up, but refused to elaborate.

"I'm not going to get into substance of my conversation. It was a private meeting," Rumsfeld said.

At an annual security conference in Munich last Saturday, Rumsfeld accused Iran of being the world's "leading state sponsor of terrorism," a charge Iran swiftly rejected.

Iran has announced it would resume enrichment of nuclear fuel after the governing board of the International Atomic Energy Agency voted last weekend to report Iran to the U.N. Security Council over its nuclear program.

Iran insists its nuclear program is aimed at generating electricity, but the United States and European countries have said it is seeking to build an atomic arsenal.

DOJ_NMG_0014345

On the issue of Iran, British Defense Secretary John Reid said the resolve of Western powers should not be underestimated. "We must never, ever be in the position where ... we would never be prepared to stand up for what we believe in," Reid told a separate news conference.

Bush - Annan Meet At White House (UPI)

By ROLAND FLAMINI

United Press International, February 11, 2006

WASHINGTON, Feb. 10 (UPI) -- Kofi Annan's meeting with President George Bush on Monday represents the U.N. Secretary-General's return to Washington's good graces after the squabbles of the Iraq war, which Annan once declared illegal. His last White House visit was exactly two years ago. Since then, however, the Bush administration has mellowed towards the Secretary-General and enlisted U.N. help in re-shaping post-war Iraq, up to and including the December parliamentary elections.

Iraq will be high on Annan's talks agenda, notably the planned National Accord Conference, which the Arab League and the United Nations are "helping" the Iraqis to plan and convene. The purpose of the conference, which a senior U.S. official said could be held as early as March and will strive to include all Iraqi political parties and major institutions, is aimed at finalizing the emergence of the democratization of Iraq. A recent statement by the Arab League said the conference will confirm, "the unity, independence, and sovereignty of Iraq."

The same Arab League statement said the conference is also expected to call for the withdrawal of coalition forces, once Iraq's armed forces and police are able to handle the country's security situation. The senior American official said the call for a pullout was acceptable to Washington as long as no deadline was specified because, "The United States is against setting a time-table."

The Bush administration hopes the conference will help with its exit strategy; but with the United States not officially a participant in the discussions, the White House will once again turn to the U.N. to help to push the proceedings in the desired direction.

The violence across the Islamic world over the cartoons lampooning Mohammed is another item that has thrust itself into the bi-lateral agenda. Annan wants to launch a reconciliation campaign through the newly formed U.N. Alliance of Civilizations, run jointly by Spain and Turkey and designed to find solutions to just such cultural conflicts between the West and Islam.

Iran's insistence on enriching its own uranium in defiance of international opposition will also come up, if for no other reason than that it is a rare occasion when the United States, the European Union and the United Nations are walking in step. The ball will shortly be in Annan's court when the International Atomic Energy Agency, the U.N.'s nuclear watchdog, reports Iran to the U.N. Security Council for action.

Africa is another talking point for Annan, according to a U.N. source, particularly the Secretary-General's effort to persuade NATO, including the United States, to join a planned U.N. peacekeeping force that may take over from the African Union's troops in western Sudan's conflict-torn Darfur region.

The issue of reforming the world organization has dominated the U.N. for the past year, with the United States in the person of its pugnacious representative John Bolton taking the lead in pushing for change in several key areas, and many suspicious Third World countries resisting it as a form of growing American influence (the Bush administration says, why not? the United States foots a third of the U.N. bill). For example, a Human Rights Council is expected to replace the Geneva-based Human Rights Commission, but many member countries are resisting Washington's insistence that only countries with a good human rights record should be eligible for membership of the new body.

In a sense, the meeting brings together two lame ducks, both working against a countdown to leave their mark. Annan's second (and last) term as Secretary-General ends in Jan 2007, and Bush has barely 33 months left in office, but more important can't be re-elected. Annan is rendered lamer by the fallout from the multi-million dollar Oil for Food scandal, in which his son Kojo was implicated by an independent inquiry. At the very least the Secretary-General himself is criticized for not keeping a tighter rein on the program, which involved selling Iraqi oil and using the money to buy food and medicine for the Iraqis while the country was under U.N. sanctions.

DOJ_NMG_0014346

The Oil for Food program is not likely to come up directly, but it will be "in the room" when the president and Annan discuss U.S. proposals for management and oversight of the world body.

The issue of Annan's successor is not expected to come up either, according to the U.N. source. But a recent remark by Bolton that the United States does not regard as carved in stone the system of choosing the Secretary-General on the basis of a regional rotation has thrown an additional element of doubt into already complex and opaque selection process. Under the time-honored regional system, the new head of the U.N. should be from Asia. The Bush administration is said to favor an Eastern European candidate as a tribute to "New Europe's" support in the Iraq war. The White House favorite is former Polish president Aleksander Kwasniewski.

General Says Training Of Iraqi Troops Suffered From Poor Planning And Staffing (NYT)

By Thom Shanker

The New York Times, February 11, 2006

WASHINGTON, Feb. 10 — The American general in charge of training the new Iraqi military after Baghdad fell says the Bush administration's strategy to use those forces to replace departing American troops was hobbled from its belated start by poor prewar planning and insufficient staffing and equipment.

The account by Maj. Gen. Paul D. Eaton, who retired on Jan. 1 after 33 years in the Army, suggests that commanders in Iraq might by now have been much closer to President Bush's goal of withdrawing American forces if they had not lost so much time in the first year to begin building a capable Iraqi force.

General Eaton's views, drawn from an essay he is preparing for publication and from interviews in which he broke a long silence on the topic, were broadly affirmed by Pentagon and other civilian officials involved at the time. They agreed that the mission had also been slowed by conflicting visions from senior Pentagon and administration officials, civilian administrators in Baghdad and the former top commander of the military's Central Command, which carried out the invasion.

While he criticized others for decisions that led to what he called a false start, General Eaton accepted responsibility for the most visible setback in the training, when a battalion of the new Iraqi Army dissolved in April 2004 as it was sent into its first major battle. The Pentagon sent Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus, who had commanded the 101st Airborne Division during the invasion and early occupation, to review the program and then to take over the training mission after General Eaton completed his yearlong tour.

"Paul Eaton and his team did an extraordinary amount for the Iraqi Security Force mission," said General Petraeus, now commander of the Army's Combined Arms Center at Fort Leavenworth, Kan. "They established a solid foundation on which we were able to build as the effort was expanded very substantially and resourced at a much higher level."

General Eaton was commander of all Army infantry training at Fort Benning, Ga., when he was told on May 9, 2003 — just over a week after President Bush's "mission accomplished" speech — to hurry to Baghdad, where he was to set up and then command an organization to rebuild Iraq's military.

"I was very surprised to receive a mission so vital to our exit strategy so late," the general said. "I would have expected this to have been done well before troops crossed the line of departure. That was my first reaction: 'We're a little late here.' "

Pentagon officials initially told him that rebuilding the army was their fifth priority for Iraqi security forces, falling behind the civil defense corps, the police, border forces and guards for government buildings, power plants and oil lines.

L. Paul Bremer III, chief of the occupation government, insisted that police training not fall under the military, but under his civil administration. Gen. Tommy R. Franks, who planned and carried out the invasion of Iraq, made sure that retraining and managing the Iraqi armed forces would not burden his war-fighting headquarters at Central Command, and insisted that the task be managed by a separate unit with its own staff and budget, General Eaton said.

Some major allies, alienated by American policies, also refused to contribute experienced military personnel, General Eaton said. In particular, Germany and France, which have taken part in rebuilding Afghanistan's military after the war in that country, declined to assist in Iraq to show their disagreement with the invasion.

DOJ_NMG_0014347

"We set out to man, train and equip an army for a country of 25 million — with six men," General Eaton said. He worked into the autumn with "a revolving door of individual loaned talent that would spend between two weeks and two months," he said, and never received even half the 250 professional staff members he had been promised.

The general's broad assessment of the problems he confronted was seconded by Walter B. Slocombe, sent by the Bush administration to Baghdad for six months to serve as the senior civilian adviser on national security and defense.

Mr. Slocombe, an under secretary of defense in the Clinton administration, said: "I have to agree with General Eaton, that it was hard to get the resources we needed out there. There was not a broad enough sense of urgency in Washington."

General Eaton said his small staff "thought we were going to build an army in a benign environment, that we were going to be able to incubate this army." The rise of a tenacious insurgency ultimately killed that hope, but at the start of his tour, the main problem was not the insurgency, which had not yet emerged in full force; it was the chaos that followed the invasion.

He arrived as looting swept Iraq, causing a bitter debate in Washington that focused on whether more American troops should have been committed to the occupation. He had to rebuild bases and barracks that had been stripped bare by looters.

Although the Iraqi Army had dissolved during the American-led invasion, the decision by Mr. Bremer and the Pentagon not to preserve or recall any complete Iraqi units meant the training task was bigger than expected.

It also left General Eaton without any Iraqi noncommissioned officers. Training an army without noncommissioned officers to serve as drill sergeants is like pitching a tent without poles.

He also found that a civilian contractor hired to conduct training would be incapable of imparting military skills and discipline — what he called "soldierization."

In a Sept. 5, 2003, briefing in Baghdad for Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, General Eaton proposed speeding up the program by sending former Iraqi Army officers for training at a base in Jordan, and setting up a separate academy in Iraq for training noncommissioned officers. Mr. Rumsfeld approved the plan.

Scrounging the most basic equipment for the new Iraqi military was another problem. "We were told to find anything we needed for the soldiers — boots, canteens, rucksacks, belts, beds, blankets," General Eaton said. "We were directed to pull it from Iraqi sources where possible."

He said the most important accomplishments that first year were organizing the command structure, beginning construction of military bases across Iraq, setting up officer training in Jordan and the noncommissioned officer academy, and attracting troop contributions from nine nations.

But problems with the nascent security force became painfully clear when the first battalion of the new Iraqi Army ordered to fight insurgents ran away in April 2004 as it was being sent to Falluja to fight alongside allied forces against an uprising in the restive Sunni triangle west of Baghdad.

"The only serious mistake I committed was that I did not stop the employment of the Second Battalion in Falluja," General Eaton said. "This battalion had been originally recruited to defend Iraq from external enemies. And as they attempted to move over land to Falluja, they ran into a Shiite mob that fired into the trucks and cajoled these young Iraqi men for fighting with the occupier against their own citizens."

He said the Iraqis the Americans had selected "failed their leadership; they failed in contact."

Iraqis Certify Election Results On A Day Of More Violence (NYT)

By Sabrina Tavernise

The New York Times, February 11, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq, Feb. 10 — Iraqi officials certified the results of parliamentary elections on Friday, setting the country on a timeline for forming a new, permanent government, while the kidnappers of an American journalist issued a new deadline for killing her if their demands were not met.

The certification of the election began a series of deadlines that requires political leaders to choose a president, a prime minister and a cabinet within two months. But the negotiations are likely to be contentious, and few here expect them to be completed according to the timetable. It took three months for Iraqis to form an interim government last spring.

DOJ_NMG_0014348

The final election results, announced at a news conference in Baghdad, were unchanged from preliminary ones announced in January, in which an alliance of Shiite parties won the single largest portion in the 275-seat Parliament. Election officials said more than half of the total of 11.9 million voters on Dec. 15 were women, reflecting Iraq's demographic composition.

Al Rai, a satellite television station in Kuwait, reported that the captors of the American journalist Jill Carroll had set a Feb. 26 deadline to kill her. The station said Ms. Carroll was being held with a group of women in a house owned by one of the kidnappers in Baghdad. In a telephone interview from Kuwait, Jassem Boudai, the station's owner, said people who identified themselves as being close to the kidnappers had contacted the station and said they were now asking for the release of just one Iraqi woman from prison in exchange for Ms. Carroll. Before, they had demanded the release of all women in prison. Ms. Carroll has appeared in three videotapes since her Jan. 7 capture in western Baghdad.

The people who contacted the station claimed the kidnappers were part of the same group that took two Italian aid workers in September 2004, Mr. Boudai said. He said that a letter from Ms. Carroll had been received and that the station had delivered it to the authorities. The station also reported that the kidnappers claimed they had not killed Ms. Carroll's interpreter, Allan Enwiyah, who was shot dead at the scene of the kidnapping. It is not clear whether the group holding Ms. Carroll is the same one that abducted her.

Iraq was torn by fresh sectarian violence on Friday. A car bomb tore through a Sunni Arab mosque in southern Baghdad, killing at least 8 Sunni worshipers and wounding 22, an Interior Ministry official said. The blast spewed shrapnel into a crowd of worshipers around 1 p.m., said the official, who asked that his name not be used, as he was not authorized to speak publicly. The attack was unusual, in that it struck at a Sunni Arab target. Most large, lethal bombings have been aimed at Shiites.

Iraqi political leaders have 15 days to gather for the first session of Parliament, in which lawmakers will nominate a speaker and two deputies, and within another 15 days will choose a president. At the same session, the president will ask the largest holder of seats — the Shiites — for their choice for prime minister. The nominee will have 30 days to form a cabinet. The largest Shiite bloc is expected to announce its choice on Saturday.

Officials spent nearly two months counting the votes, even inviting an international team of experts to review allegations of fraud. But the extra time seemed to have paid off: Sunni Arabs, who staged protests after the election against what they said was evidence of fraud, gradually came to accept the results.

Sunni Arabs, thought to make up about 20 percent of Iraq's population, often say they are far more. But the vote, which drew broad participation from Sunnis, won them 21 percent of the seats in Parliament. "Everybody has moved on now," said Ashraf Jehangir Qazi, the United Nations envoy to Iraq. "But people by and large have accepted the results."

In other sectarian violence, gunmen kidnapped a Sunni Arab cleric, Adel Khalil Dawood al-Azzawi, the former imam of the Nuiami mosque, from his house on Thursday night, the ministry official said. On Friday, the American military announced the death of two marines, whose vehicle hit a homemade bomb near the western city of Falluja on Thursday.

Iraq's Shiites Near Pick For Prime Minister (WP)

By Nelson Hernandez

The Washington Post, February 11, 2006

Main Alliance Divided Between Incumbent Jafari and Deputy President Mahdi

BAGHDAD, Feb. 10 -- The Shiite religious coalition that won the most seats in December's parliamentary elections could announce its choice for prime minister as soon as Saturday, politicians said Friday, as Iraq's electoral commission released certified results of the vote.

The results, which are final, did not change the expectation that the next prime minister will come from the ranks of the United Iraqi Alliance, a coalition of Shiite religious parties, which won 128 out of 275 seats in the Dec. 15 elections. Two candidates from the coalition have taken center stage: Ibrahim Jafari, the current prime minister, and Adel Abdul Mahdi, a secular economist who is one of Iraq's two deputy presidents.

The alliance is divided, however, among its member parties over which man to put forward, Shiite politicians said. Jafari's support comes from his Dawa party and followers of Moqtada Sadr, a popular cleric. Abdul Mahdi's primary backer is his own party, the powerful Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq. It is still unclear which way a number of smaller parties in the coalition will swing.

DOJ_NMG_0014349

"We will try to decide who is the candidate by consensus," said Bahaa Araji, a member of Sadr's group. "If not, the alliance will appeal to voting tomorrow. It seems that Dr. Jafari is most likely getting the post."

Noting that each candidate thinks he is the best choice, Araji said, "This is what makes it difficult now to achieve the consensus."

Though Jafari might have a slight advantage within the alliance, his nomination would likely receive a cool reception among Iraq's other religious and ethnic groups. The Kurdish coalition, which won 53 seats, has often squabbled with Jafari over the issue of who will control the oil-rich northern city of Kirkuk. The leading Sunni Arab coalition, which won 44 seats, fears Jafari's religious bent and his party's ties to Iran, a Shiite theocracy.

"We don't have much influence over who they are going to choose for the post of prime minister," said Naseer Ani, a member of the Sunni coalition. "Mr. Jafari was and still is prime minister, but as we and others have seen, his government's performance was a failure in many respects: in security, services and so on. This we believe will affect his chances to be chosen again for the post if the matter reaches the stage of voting inside the alliance."

The Shiite leadership is hoping to avoid an internal battle over the nominee. In a sermon Friday at the Imam Ali mosque in Najaf, Sheik Sadr Udeen Qabanchi told worshipers that Shiite factions "must shape up to run the political process effectively without causing embarrassment to the religious authorities."

Once the new parliament convenes, which is required within two weeks now that the election results have been certified, its first order of business will be to choose a three-member presidency council, which then will put forward nominees for prime minister and other leadership positions. But the strongest parties typically negotiate in advance who will fill each post, and the Shiites' announcement of their pick for prime minister will open the way for choosing nominees for posts such as president, defense minister, interior minister and oil minister.

On Friday, the U.S. ambassador to Iraq repeated his hope that the new government would include Shiite, Sunni Arab, Kurdish and secular representatives.

"We hope that this will be a government based on national unity, formed without regard to sectarianism, committed to peace and with capable ministers who place loyalty to Iraq above that of loyalty to faction," Zalmay Khalilzad, the U.S. ambassador to Iraq, said in a statement. "These ministers should be dedicated to the defense of Iraqi democracy, not to party militias."

The gravity of the situation here was driven home once more by violence. Two Marines died of their wounds after their patrol in Fallujah, about 35 miles west of Baghdad, was hit by a roadside bomb Thursday, U.S. military authorities said in a statement Friday.

In Baghdad's Dora neighborhood, a car bomb exploded near a Sunni mosque Friday, killing at least eight people and wounding more than 20, police and witnesses at the scene said. Capt. Salam Ghadban, a spokesman for the Baghdad police, confirmed the number of casualties.

Witnesses said a parked car loaded with explosives was remotely detonated near the main gate of the Iskan al-Shaabi mosque in Dora, one of Baghdad's most violent districts.

"While I was about to leave the mosque, the explosion happened. We were panicked. I ran out immediately. I saw people shouting and crying. One man was crawling because he lost one leg," said Ihsan Ali, 28, as he stood near the wreckage of his car.

Another roadside bomb exploded in the Ghazaliya neighborhood, in western Baghdad, Ghadban said. Five Iraqi army soldiers were killed and two civilians were wounded, he said.

Correspondent Jonathan Finer and special correspondents Omar Fekeiki, Bassam Sebti and K.I. Ibrahim in Baghdad and Saad Sarhan in Najaf contributed to this report.

Shiite Coalition Struggles To Agree On A Prime Minister (KRT)

By Nancy A. Youssef

DOJ_NMG_0014350

Knight Ridder, February 11, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq - Iraq's leading Shiite Muslim political group showed signs of fracturing this week as it debated whether to choose a secular Shiite or a more religious leader to be the country's prime minister.

The next prime minister will play a crucial role in deciding how the new government tackles the largely Sunni Muslim insurgency, sectarian strife and the economic woes that plague the country. U.S. officials are hoping that Iraq's first permanent government since the fall of Saddam Hussein's dictatorship can stabilize the country, avert a civil war and allow American and other foreign troops to leave.

Members of the Shiite-dominated United Iraqi Alliance slate, which won 128 of the 275 seats in parliament, have narrowed their choice to two candidates, interim Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari, who has the backing of the slate's more religious voters, and Vice President Adil Abdel Mahdi, who's more secular.

The slate plans to make its choice Saturday, and that person will seek approval from the full National Assembly. Because the United Iraqi Alliance holds so many seats, its choice is likely to become the prime minister.

The race between al-Jaafari and Mahdi is a tough one. The United Iraqi Alliance, which is made up of four parties, is evenly split and has spent the last week wrangling over how to choose a candidate. The margin of victory could be as little as one vote, said Nasir al-Saadi, a member of the slate.

Choosing al-Jaafari would satisfy much of the United Iraqi Alliance's base, which wants the government to pursue a more Islamist agenda. The supporters of rebel Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, who represent nearly half of Baghdad, support al-Jaafari.

But the slate has promised to form a consensus government that all the country's sects embrace, including Sunni Arabs and Kurds. During his one-year tenure, al-Jaafari has angered the country's minority Sunnis, who charge that Iraq's predominantly Shiite military and security forces have targeted them for imprisonment and execution under his leadership.

Some Kurds say they support Mahdi and have been frustrated by al-Jaafari's strained relationship with Iraqi President Jalal Talabani, a Kurd. They also say al-Jaafari didn't do enough to meet Kurdish demands on key issues such as continued autonomy in their northern region.

"The elite look at Mahdi as someone who will build a modern government because of his enlightened thoughts. But Jaafari is much closer to the Shiite Islamic religious leadership," said Hazim Abdel Hamid al-Nuaimi, a professor of politics at al-Mustansiriya University. "Mahdi represents reform. And Jaafari represents the conservative line."

The United Iraqi Alliance members who oppose Mahdi say they were elected to install a more Islamic government, not a more secular one. And many in the slate are happy with the advances that Shiites have made in al-Jaafari's government.

The United Iraqi Alliance members never wanted to vote on their candidate, hoping that they could agree on a leader. They fear that the next prime minister may win support from only half the slate's members, but they reluctantly agreed to the vote because they worry that their lengthy debate is eroding the public's confidence, said Abbas al-Bayati, a member of the slate.

Government leaders conceded that the public had expected a list of candidates for prime minister by now, eight weeks after the Dec. 15 election. With so many Iraqis pinning their hopes on the new governing body, it's important they see efficiency, leaders said.

"Of course this delay is not in the interest of Iraq," said Faraj al-Haidari, a National Assembly member who represents a Kurdish slate. "It will disappoint the street. And all ministries now are on hold. They cannot make decisions to improve the daily life of Iraqis."

Without a candidate, the parties have had a difficult time choosing the rest of the government. Some candidates for key posts said they couldn't decide until they knew what kind of leader Iraq would have.

The prime minister "will define the platform," said Mithal Alusi, a candidate to lead the Ministry of Defense, who's said he won't consider the post until the slate spells out its agenda.

Knight Ridder Newspapers special correspondents Zaineb Obeid, Ahmed Mukhtar and Huda Ahmed contributed to this report from Baghdad.

Shi'ites To Choose Premier Nominee (WT)

By Sharon Behn

DOJ_NMG_0014351

The Washington Times, February 11, 2006

Iraq's majority Shi'ite coalition is to announce its nominee for the powerful post of prime minister this weekend, as certified election results released yesterday confirmed the Shi'ites' overwhelming victory at the polls.

Iraqi officials and U.S. sources said yesterday the nomination was likely to go to either Vice President Adil Abdul Mahdi of the powerful pro-Iranian Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq (SCIRI) or Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari of the Islamic Dawa party.

"Tomorrow we will see who will be prime minister," Karim al-Musawi, SCIRI's Washington-based spokesman said yesterday. He deemed Mr. Mahdi's chances of getting the top post as very good.

The formation of a new government -- which promises to be a much-stormier process -- will take place within the next "six to eight weeks," Mr. al-Musawi said.

U.S. Ambassador to Iraq Zalmay Khalilzad welcomed the results and called for "a government based on national unity, formed without regard to sectarianism, committed to peace and with capable ministers who place loyalty to Iraq above that of loyalty to faction."

The announcements did nothing to stem the daily sectarian violence in Iraq, as a car bomb exploded outside a Sunni mosque in Baghdad's Dora district, killing nine persons and wounding dozens.

The U.S. military announced that two Marines were killed the previous day by a roadside bomb near Fallujah, 40 miles west of Baghdad.

The Independent Electoral Commission of Iraq announced the certified results of the Dec. 15 vote after a protracted appeals process amid accusations of fraud and ballot-box stuffing.

According to the final tally, the Shi'ite United Iraqi Alliance won 128 seats; the Kurdish alliance got 53 seats; the Sunni Iraqi Accord Front won 44 seats; the secular list headed by former Prime Minister Iyad Allawi won 25 seats; the Sunni Iraqi Front for National Dialogue won 11 seats; the Kurdistan Islamic Union got five seats; and a smattering of smaller parties won nine seats.

The nomination of a prime minister is partly the result of pressure by American and British officials to move forward on the election results. Unofficial final results were released on Jan. 20.

"What we will probably see is the announcement of a [Shi'ite] alliance candidate, Adil Abdul Mahdi of SCIRI or Mr. al-Jaafari," said Jonathan Morrow of the Washington-based U.S. Institute of Peace.

According to Iraq's constitution, President Jalal Talabani must convene the new 275-seat parliament within two weeks of election certification.

In the next 90 days, parliament will elect a three-person presidency council, which, in turn, will appoint a prime minister. The prime minister then names a Cabinet, which must be confirmed by parliament.

In reality, close observers of the process say, there will be a lot of closed-door negotiations, and only when the whole package is decided will any announcements be made.

"Nothing will be agreed until it is all agreed," said Mr. Morrow, who is often in Iraq as a legal consultant to the constitutional process. Major horse-trading is expected among Sunni, Kurd and Shi'ite factions concerning key ministries.

SCIRI officials say senior ministry posts -- such as interior -- will remain in Shi'ite hands, while junior ministries would be parceled out among the minority Kurds and Sunnis.

U.S. officials see a new government as a prerequisite to quelling the Sunni-backed insurgency.

But Mr. Morrow cautioned that the deep Sunni antagonism to the new government of Iraq will not be resolved simply by seeing the people they voted for holding ministerial posts.

"Their anxiety is more deep-seated," he said. "It is based on the construction of the Iraqi state and on Sunni Arabs not getting their share of the oil revenues."

A SCIRI official, speaking on the condition of anonymity, agreed that tough negotiations are ahead. "The ministerial position distribution will be OK, but federalism and oil -- these are the obstacles in the road," he said in a telephone interview.

In Iraq, Carnage Amid Conciliation (LAT)

By Richard Boudreaux, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, February 11, 2006

Nine die in bombing and shooting at a Sunni mosque. The Dec. 15 vote is certified and sectarian leaders ease confrontational stances.

BAGHDAD — A bomb exploded in a car parked 10 yards from a Sunni Muslim mosque Friday, killing eight worshipers in Iraq's deadliest attack during a week otherwise marked by conciliatory words between leaders of feuding religious sects.

The midday blast hit people leaving Iskan Shaabi Mosque after the main weekly prayer service in Baghdad's Dora neighborhood. Witnesses said bodies flew through the air and nearby cars went up in flames, sending smoke through the mosque's shattered windows. At least 22 people were wounded.

No group claimed responsibility. A Sunni Arab political party blamed foreign elements of the Sunni-led insurgency, which reportedly has been divided over whether to continue targeting civilians in its campaign against U.S. forces and Iraq's Shiite Muslim-led government.

Two Marines died after their patrol hit a roadside bomb Thursday near the embattled city of Fallouja, 35 miles west of Baghdad, the U.S. military announced.

Iraq's electoral commission certified final results for the Dec. 15 elections, setting the stage for U.S.-backed talks aimed at bringing minority Sunnis into a broad-based government and undercutting the insurgency.

In the run-up to the talks, Shiite and Sunni leaders have tempered their words and insurgents have diminished the scale of violence.

Shiites marked their most important religious holiday Thursday without suffering an insurgent attack such as the bombings that had marred it the previous two years.

During Friday prayers at Baghdad's Umm Qura Mosque, normally a font of hard-line Sunni rhetoric, Sheik Ali Sanad offered rare words of affection for Imam Hussein, the Shiite figure commemorated in Thursday's Ashura festivities. Sanad called on Sunnis and Shiites to honor Hussein's legacy by "stopping the bloodshed in Iraq … through honest dialogue."

The gesture echoed a call Wednesday by the largest Shiite party's leader, Abdelaziz Hakim, for greater respect for human rights by Iraq's Shiite-led police forces, whose alleged violent raids, arbitrary detentions and summary executions have enraged Sunnis.

One such incident blamed on police occurred in Baghdad late Thursday. Adel Khalil Dawoud, a Sunni cleric, was dragged from his home by at least 15 men in the uniform of the Interior Ministry's special forces, the cleric's brother said.

Dawoud had fled to Jordan to avoid sectarian attacks and recently returned. The Interior Ministry called the incident a kidnapping and denied that its forces were involved.

Citing such alleged police abuse, Sunni political leaders have demanded the removal of Interior Minister Bayan Jabr as a condition for joining the government. Jabr has incorporated members of his Badr Brigade, the sectarian militia of Hakim's Shiite party, into the ministry's police.

U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad appeared to endorse the Sunni demand in a statement Friday, saying Cabinet ministers in the new government "should be dedicated to the defense of Iraqi democracy, not to party militias."

The mosque bombing did not fit the recent pattern of Shiite violence against Sunnis. Car bombs are a hallmark of Sunni guerrillas, aimed mainly at U.S. troops and Iraqi government targets and rarely used to kill civilians or blow up mosques.

But fighting has been reported in recent months between the foreign-led fighters of Al Qaeda in Iraq and their erstwhile home-grown allies. Gunmen have attacked Sunni tribal and religious leaders who broke with Al Qaeda to support the entry of the Iraqi Islamic Party and other Sunni groups in the December elections.

Ammar Wajuih, a spokesman for the Iraqi Islamic Party, said Friday's attack was "evidence that terrorists from outside the country … are trying to ignite sectarian violence among Iraqi people who want to live peacefully."

"We condemn this attack, just as we condemn attacks on Shiite mosques," he added.

Associated Press said one of its photographers saw several masked gunmen shouting "God is great!" drive up to the mosque an hour after the blast and fire into a crowd outside. A woman was killed, bringing the death toll to nine.

DOJ_NMG_0014353

The election results announced Friday did not alter uncertified returns released three weeks ago that gave the main Shiite alliance and its Kurdish coalition partners 181 of parliament's 275 seats, just short of the two-thirds majority required to form a government.

Two Sunni blocs got 55 seats. Talks aimed at drawing them and smaller parties into the government are expected to start as soon as the Shiite alliance, which is entitled to nominate the prime minister, settles an internal fight.

Vice President Adel Abdul Mehdi, whose secular outlook makes him more acceptable to Sunnis and other opposition groups, is challenging Ibrahim Jafari, the religious scholar now serving as prime minister.

Unless a decision is made by consensus, Shiite leaders say, their alliance's 128 members of parliament will vote as early as today.

"It's close," said Nasser Saadi, a member of the alliance. "If there's a difference, it's not more than one or two votes."

*

Times staff writers Suhail Ahmad, Caesar Ahmed, Shamil Aziz, Saif Rasheed and Raheem Salman contributed to this report.

Neighborhood Peace A Casualty Of War (WP)

By Jonathan Finer

The Washington Post, February 11, 2006

As Battle Breaches Baghdad Haven, Shiites and Sunnis Unite

BAGHDAD -- To generations of its residents, the tightknit neighborhood known as Tobji was among this city's rare oases. People argued amiably in sidewalk cafes kept open until nearly midnight. Shiite and Sunni Muslims married into each other's families and lived side-by-side. Until recently, Iraq's police and army, with more than enough trouble spots to worry about, rarely came around.

It was a neighborhood, residents said, that lived up to its formal name, Salam, which means peace. But in volatile Baghdad, home to more than 5 million people, even stable sections sit a few stray shots from chaos. It took scarcely two months for the sectarian conflict consuming other corners of the capital to gain a foothold in Tobji.

It began, residents say, one November day when gunmen killed Majid Abdul Hussein, a local preacher and member of a powerful Shiite militia. Days later, a former member of Saddam Hussein's Sunni-led Baath Party was gunned down in broad daylight. Before locals realized it, they said, theirs had become yet another fractured community, a place nearly silent after dark save for the crackle of gunfire.

Then, on Jan. 23, men in camouflage uniforms rounded up 53 Tobji residents, nearly all of them Sunnis, in pre-dawn raids. Two people were killed. Other than two old men who were released days later, none of those taken have been heard from since.

Locals said the uniforms the gunmen wore and the vehicles they drove identified them as Interior Ministry police commandos, whose ranks are dominated by former members of Shiite factional militias. Since Iraq's Shiite majority first gained political power in elections a year ago, raids like the one in Tobji have taken place in neighborhoods in Baghdad and other Iraqi cities. They always target Sunni men, and witnesses always implicate the police.

Iraqi officials have denied any government role in the raids, blaming groups intent on destabilizing the country.

"It happens too often that people impersonate government forces, impersonate police," said Baghdad's governor, Hussein Taha, who oversees his province's police force. "When the terrorists feel chased in one area, they transfer to another and carry out operations there randomly, even if it affects civilians. That is what happened to Tobji."

Asked how many Tobji residents have died violently in recent months, Mariam Nouri, 27, whose family came to the neighborhood more than 50 years ago, counted them by name.

"There's Hussein, Firas, Abbas, Osama, Uday," said Nouri, a Sunni, whose brother, father and uncle were dragged from her home during the recent raid. Hardly pausing for breath, she ticked off 11 of the dead from memory. "It might be more like 15," she said. "There are some I've forgotten."

Sunni leaders have responded to the raids in Tobji, northwest of downtown, and in other Baghdad neighborhoods by calling on residents to defend themselves. Adnan Dulaimi, a prominent Sunni Arab politician, called for further unrest unless the country's next government puts police beyond the control of Shiite militias. The Iraqi Accordance Front, the country's dominant Sunni political group, warned Wednesday of "nationwide civil disobedience" unless what it termed "haphazard raids" were halted.

DOJ_NMG_0014354

Observers in the capital say the destructive cycle of raids, denunciations and retaliatory violence represents the first tentative steps toward a wider sectarian conflict spreading like a virus from community to community.

"It started in Iskan, then Sadiya and Ghazaliya," said Abbas Lafta, 35, a Shiite resident of Tobji, citing once-tranquil Baghdad enclaves that have fallen like dominoes toward his neighborhood in the past year. "People used to move here to get away from those places. Now we are one of them."Neighborhood Checkpoints

Bounded by a highway overpass and a park with a scraggly dirt soccer field, Tobji got its name from the cramped commercial street, lined with vendors' stalls, that bisects the neighborhood. Dozens of sheep graze along a grassy median, snarling traffic near an open-air market.

On a recent weekday, side roads leading from a main thoroughfare were blocked with concrete barriers, and Iraqi soldiers operated a checkpoint at the top of one busy street. A second checkpoint on the neighborhood's southern edge was manned entirely by civilians, who watched cars intently as they departed. It was not always this way.

"It is like someone saw this was a safe place and wanted to provoke things," said Muthana Mahmoud, 43, who has lived in Tobji all his life.

Juliet Hadad, 41, a mother of six, said: "Before, when we lived normally, you would feel no tension here. Now we are scared, not just of Sunnis, but of our own people. I grounded my children. I don't let them go anywhere now."

As the conflict began to escalate late last year, eight people were killed in a two-week span following the country's Dec. 15 elections. But it was the Jan. 23 raid, Sunni and Shiite residents said, that did the most to inflame sectarian tension.

Residents said it began just after 4 a.m., as about 20 sport-utility vehicles and pickup trucks without license plates, resembling those driven by Iraq's police commandos, rumbled into the neighborhood bearing a force of nearly 200 armed men.

For the next three hours, the gunmen, many of them clad in yellow-and-gray camouflage uniforms, burst into Sunnis' homes, sometimes leaping from roof to roof, rounding up men and terrifying their families. They took their cell phones and cut landlines so residents could not call for help.

"They had beards, and their dialect sounded like they were from the south," said Mahmoud, who said three men leapt onto his roof from a neighbor's window. When his brother answered the door, one of the men asked him, "Are you Abu Abbas?"

"No," his brother said. "I don't know who that is."

"They blindfolded him and took him outside," Mahmoud said. "Then they came back for me. They took me up to the roof and held me over the edge by my feet. They only let me go when my mother came up, screaming."

Nouri thought her family would be safe, even though they are Sunnis, because her father and uncle work for Interior Ministry police units. But even after presenting their identification cards to the gunmen, they were detained.

"When my sister asked, 'Why, why are you taking them when they are like you?' they pointed their guns at her and hit her on the head," Nouri said. "I was cursing them and saying, 'God is my defender!' "

Down the street, two men who tried to defend their homes were killed. When the gunmen grabbed the wife of Bilal Ali Ghazal by the hair and pulled her toward their car, he grabbed a rifle and went to his roof, firing shots to try to draw help. An attacker in the street shot him in the stomach.

Ismael Egaidi killed one of the gunmen who entered his home before dying in a hail of bullets, residents said.

Desperate to find what became of the 51 men who were detained but never released, Tobji residents said they had made daily visits to Baghdad's Interior Ministry, only to be told there was no information. When word spread that seven bullet-riddled bodies had turned up in the Rustamiyah neighborhood, relatives of those detained in Tobji dashed to the morgue to look for familiar faces. They found none.

Residents say the government's denial of police involvement in the raid does not square with what they witnessed that night. The assailants were driving around Baghdad in a large convoy of sport-utility vehicles that locals recognized as those used by police since the late 1990s. They wore camouflage uniforms and carried Glock pistols, the same as those issued to police officers.

DOJ_NMG_0014355

"Explain to me how this can be anyone other than the Iraqi security forces," said Muhammed Majid, a Tobji resident. But even Majid acknowledged that he could not be sure who was responsible.Armed Citizens

With nowhere else to turn, Tobji residents intent on stopping the escalating violence are relying on one another. In recent weeks, both Sunnis and Shiites have contributed manpower to an 80-member neighborhood citizens force that patrols the streets alongside the Iraqi army, manning checkpoints and alerting soldiers to suspicious outsiders.

Neighbors have started collecting money to pay a small salary to the volunteers, who call themselves "the guardians."

When they first took to the streets in December, they were arrested and their guns confiscated by Iraqi police because they had no licenses to carry weapons. But after the January raid, they demanded, and were issued, badges from the Interior Ministry authorizing them to carry rifles.

"Some of them were in the military once, but they all know how to use guns," said Lafta, the 35-year-old neighborhood resident, who helps supervise the program. "Things have been a bit quieter since they got out there."

But many residents insist the neighborhood will never be the same.

"The politicians say, 'Defend yourself,' but how do you defend yourself against an army with machine guns and vehicles?" Mahmoud said. "The ones who defended themselves are the ones who got killed."

Residents said the influx of people fleeing other neighborhoods since 2003 has steadily driven up apartment rents. But now a migration out of Tobji is underway.

"I don't think we will ever get back what we had," Lafta said. "The number who were arrested was so large, and their relatives are so angry. They will not rest. They will always have hatred in their hearts. They will want to take more revenge. I know Shiites who have already gotten threatening letters. If I get one, I will leave."

Special correspondent Omar Fekeiki contributed to this report.

The Chiefs Of Baghdad (FT)

By Steve Negus

Financial Times, February 11, 2006

Eighteen months ago, the radical Iraqi Shia movement known as the Sadrists was at war with the country's interim government and its US backers in the streets of the holy city of Najaf while their young upstart leader Moqtada al-Sadr was a fugitive. Now the Sadrists are one of the partners in the United Iraqi Alliance, the Shia coalition that dominates government and is likely to be one of the most powerful forces shaping Iraqi politics in the next four years.

This may alarm many people outside Iraq, but the Sadrists are folk heroes in parts of Baghdad, perceived as tough but fair men who do the job that the government can't or won't do. Through an Iraqi colleague, whom I shall call Haydar, I came to learn about some of the things the Sadrists do through their "Mahdi Army", in particular a group that specialises in tracking down people kidnapped by Baghdad's criminal gangs.

Haydar is a proud father of 11, personally devout but well acquainted with the rougher and more roguish sides of life. In many ways he is an archetypal inhabitant of the east Baghdad slum of Sadr City. Laid out in the 1960s by populist dictator Abd al-Karim Qassem as a home for impoverished Shia migrants from the southern countryside, Sadr City was at first named "Revolution City" then changed to "Saddam City" after Saddam Hussein took power in 1979. Hussein had given the district his name, but little else. Its potholed roads are lined with open sewers choked with plastic bags. In the summer, smoke from burning trash combines with heat and dust to create an acrid haze that hangs over the city. In the winter, flooded drains overflow to form reeking pools of black muck. After the dictator was toppled by the US, the inhabitants of the slum lost little time in renaming it after Moqtada's father, the Ayatollah Mohammed Sadek al-Sadr, a venerated Shia cleric murdered by the old regime.

Sadr City is viewed by other Baghdadis as a den of gangsters. Haydar, however, is proud of his neighbourhood. It is, he admits, home to quite a few of Baghdad's criminal elements and is a good place to buy weapons or a forged passport. However, he points out, it is also one of the few places in Baghdad where I, a foreigner, can walk about without having to worry about being abducted either by ordinary criminals or by insurgents. Rory Carroll, a reporter for The Guardian newspaper might not attest to this too enthusiastically. In October a Sadrist faction abducted and held him for 36 hours in an attempt to exchange him for a prisoner held by the British, then released him. But the view that foreigners were not likely to be nabbed in Sadr City was widely shared among the Baghdad press corps at the time, and the reason was that the neighbourhood was to a large extent under the control of the Mahdi Army.

DOJ_NMG_0014356

This is not what most of the rest of the world would think, associating as they do the Sadrists with the "militia" that fought the Americans in the summer of 2004. The Sadrists themselves are adamant that the Mahdi Army, despite its name, is not a militia, but a network of pious youth who, armed with their own private weapons, rose up when their leader was threatened. This doesn't explain why they still have commanders and units. Nonetheless, "militia" is a term of abuse these days and politicians say such things have no place in the new Iraq, so the fiction exists. As part of the deal under which the Mahdi Army stopped fighting in October 2004, Sadr said the movement would dissolve itself as a military institution and work as a political party and community movement, possibly "assisting the police" in keeping order in Sadr City.

It's not just the police who could do with assistance. Much of Iraq these days seems to be going the way of Sadr City. The state began to fail during the years of UN sanctions and the collapse of Saddam Hussein's regime completed the job. Iraqis usually have little faith in formal governmental institutions, and the institutions generally live down to their expectations. Local political or religious movements, with their armed back-up, are more legitimate and powerful than any minister cloistered in Baghdad.

Last year I went with Haydar to the site of an incident he had told me about - a kidnappers' safehouse, just off one of Sadr City's trash-strewn vacant lots. The owner, according to neighbours, was a decent guy, but had been enlisted or possibly coerced by his drinking buddies to watch over their captives. Ever since Hussein had released about 100,000 prison inmates on the eve of his regime's downfall, much of Iraq has been overrun by criminal gangs, and kidnapping for ransom - in addition to arms sales, drug dealing and subcontracting themselves out to insurgents - is one of the easiest ways to earn a living.

In this case the locals had informed on the kidnappers to the police, who raided the house and arrested them. Inexplicably the owner was released from policy custody soon thereafter, and the residents surmised that he had paid a bribe. They contacted the Mahdi Army, who raided the house and forced the police to keep the rest of the perpetrators in prison. "They are the real heroes, not the police," one of the residents told us. "They are the real champions of the people." True to its Robin Hood reputation, the Mahdi Army performed the "service" of ridding the area of kidnappers while asking for nothing in return. The Sadrists accept donations, but not quid pro quo.

We asked which Mahdi Army "sheikh" had taken charge of this operation and were given the nomme de guerre of Abu Jaafar. Although technically a fugitive from the Americans, who were hunting him because of his role in the 2004 fighting, Haydar found him after making a few inquiries. So, a few hours later, we met him in the group's own safe house, a small but clean apartment with doves warbling on the floor. Jaafar spoke to us surrounded by his jamaa, his personal following of about two dozen young men in the black button-down shirt and black trousers that have become the Mahdi Army's ad hoc uniform. For more than a year, this group had been in charge of tracking down gangs. In that time, four of their members were killed and four others permanently maimed.

The Mahdi Army is a young man's movement - Sadr himself is only in his thirties - but Jaafar, at 27, was a young leader even by Sadrist standards. With his well-trimmed beard and self-assurance, he resembles many other earnest and charismatic young men who have risen to positions of authority in Islamist movements across the Arab world. He was a former seminary student before taking command of the anti-gang squad. He eschews much of the lofty religious rhetoric and generalities favoured by other Sadrist clerics, which make conversations with them sometimes difficult. Instead, he seemed to relish relating the details, names and places of Iraq's underground.

"It's all about geography," Jaafar explains, beginning a narrative of his group's current case. The jamaa had been contacted by a Kurdish lawyer, whose teenaged son had been kidnapped. The boy had been taken in the south Baghdad district of Kerrada. Based on this, Jaafar decided to stake out a coffee house just off the neighbourhood's main shopping street, frequented by a man we shall call Mustafa, a Kurdish gangster with a finger in every dodgy pie in the area.

After several days, the Mahdi Army noticed Qais, a gangster from Sadr City known to be involved in kidnapping, enter the coffee shop to speak with Mustafa. This, they decided, was a likely suspect. They placed a tail on Qais and told the father to inform the gang he was ready to pay the ransom. Qais set up one fake drop after another, sending the father into Baghdad's streets night after night to make sure that he had not brought along gunmen. Qais did not notice, however, that he himself was under observation. The Mahdi Army decided that they had their man. When Qais set up the final drop-off the Mahdi Army decided to grab him.

DOJ_NMG_0014357

One member of the jamaa, Mohammed, however jumped the gun. He and a colleague, Maytham, showed up before the other Sadrists. They leapt out of their car with pistols, but Qais, Mustafa and his men had machineguns. When the shooting stopped, both Sadrists and Qais had been hit. The gang, realising that the Mahdi Army were after them, scattered to the winds. Qais and Mohammed survived; Maytham was killed. "Mohammed was over-eager," said Jaafar with a certain weary resignation.

Three weeks later, at least some of the gang had been rounded up. Mustafa appears to have escaped to Kurdistan - the old men playing dominos in front of his favourite Kerrada coffee house, at any rate, told us that he had not been seen for a month. Several others, however, were now in the custody of the police, cooling their heels in Sadr City's al-Rafidain police station.

We were taken there by a man called Ali, one of Jaafar's lieutenants. Ali was clearly a hard guy. He has two martyrs in his family. His father was killed by Hussein in the 1991 Shia intifada that followed the first Gulf war. His brother was killed in another uprising that broke out when gunmen thought to be linked to the Hussein regime killed Ayatollah Mohammed Sadek al-Sadr, father of Moqtada and the founder of the movement in 1999. Ali and several of his friends, Kalashnikovs in hand, had personally arrested one of the three imprisoned gang members and had a certain proprietorial interest in the case.

We arrived in Sadr City amid reports that a car bomb had just been discovered on the city's outskirts. Mahdi Army militants were stopping anyone who looked like they were from out of town (including one of our cars) and checking vehicles for explosives. When we arrived at the station, Ali was shocked to find out that the gang suspects had been transferred to the Major Crimes Unit in another part of town. He immediately got on the phone to Jaafar - the police at Major Crimes were notorious for freeing suspects. Without the Mahdi Army keeping tabs on the case, Ali said, the police would be sure to let Qais' gang go.

We then walked into the station with Ali and asked the senior officer, a grizzled lieutenant, for the police version of the case. Somewhat reluctantly, the officer described, using the stilted language of an interior ministry press release, a "shared operation" in which the police and Mahdi Army "co-operated" to round up a gang "implicated in criminal activities". Ali was incensed - "Co-operated? All you did was transfer them to the Major Crimes Unit," he said to the lieutenant. The Mahdi Army were the ones who suffered a martyrdom, he pointed out to another policeman. "The police do nothing," he said, walking out of the station in disgust. "We are the authority here."

On the way home, I asked Haydar in what sorts of situations he himself might turn to the Mahdi Army. Certainly a kidnapping case, he said, also if there is stealing or gang activity going on in the neighbourhood. What about murder? I asked. Well, you might ask the Mahdi Army to mediate in a murder case, but if a relative is killed first you turn to your tribe. Even in Hussein's day, while the police might arrest and jail a murderer, the matter isn't over until either blood vengeance or blood money is obtained. There are two parallel systems of law enforcement in modern Iraq: the authorities keep order; your family gets you justice.

The Mahdi Army seems to fall somewhere between the two. Haydar described an incident he had seen at a wedding. One of the guests started firing his weapon into the air - a traditional way of celebrating, but one that is now considered a bit anti-social. The Mahdi Army showed up, and asked him to stop. The guest responded: "Who are you?" The Mahdi Army, having been insulted, switched from an ostensibly neutral order-keeper to an aggrieved party. Some 150 "brothers" pulled up, wanting to beat up the guest. Haydar and a tribal sheikh had to mediate to sort it out.

At various times, the Mahdi Army seems to have taken on the trappings of a state. It has run its own courts, for example - although these are more tribal-style arbiters of a dispute, rather than traditional criminal court magistrates. Perhaps more revealing is its attitude towards dealing out punishment. After the Mahdi Army withdrew from Najaf, the Iraqi military claimed to have discovered Sadrist-run prisons and torture chambers. However, if such places exist in Sadr City, they are a very well-kept secret. Haydar, for his part, does not believe they exist.

Nonetheless, the Mahdi Army has a reputation for vigilantism. Any messianic movement will attract both thugs and saints, and various combinations of the two. The Sadrists were known for attacks on gypsy encampments, which in Iraq often double as primitive semi-mobile brothels. Although they enjoyed some protection under Hussein, who had a weakness for gypsy dancing, they are now among the country's most vulnerable groups. The Sadrists also have a reputation in universities for intimidating their more secular-minded counterparts. I asked Haydar about a recent incident in Basra. The press had depicted it as a more or less unprovoked assault against a co-ed picnic, in which militiamen beat students - focusing particularly on the women - for daring to mingle the sexes in public. According to Haydar's version of events, culled from other Sadr City residents as well as relatives in Basra, the Mahdi Army had responded to locals' complaints about students behaving "inappropriately" in their neighbourhood. The Mahdi Army tried to get the students to disperse, were defied, and used force. According to Haydar, the Mahdi Army was upholding the social norm in a public place. "If you took a woman to a private place [and] someone intervenes, you're in the right - you could kill them right there," he explained. "If you do it in public and they intervene, then they're in the right."

DOJ_NMG_0014358

Haydar is a devotee of Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, the most popular and influential Shia cleric in Iraq. He is the epitome of orthodox Shi'ism, which venerates scholarly knowledge. When the elder Ayatollah Sadr first emerged, many in Sistani's circle of clerics looked at him as having too little of the seminary about him, and too much of the street. And when the younger Sadr assumed control of the movement, he was years from becoming an ayatollah (in Shi'ism, the rough equivalent of a tenured full professor), and was more like a graduate student. The Grand Ayatollah never disrespected the younger Sadr in public, but many of his deputies showed no such compunction. One Sistani scholar suggested that the younger Sadr might be better off "finishing his studies" than meddling in politics. Others referred to his movement as a "phenomenon linked to unemployment".

Haydar has no doubt that the Mahdi Army contains a rough element, including, he believes, criminal gangs who appropriate the name as a cover for their activities. In his neighbourhood, however, he witnessed the other side of the Sadrist movement. Sadrist cadres took control of the area, fending off the chaos that engulfed much of Baghdad. They defended the suburb against Hussein's security thugs or the estimated 100,000 former inmates released from prison, thought to make up the bulk of the gangs that ravaged the rest of Baghdad. Sadrists brought in drinking water, paid the salaries to keep staff at work running the hospitals. "When no one was there to protect us, they protected us," Haydar says.

Several weeks later, Ali became his family's third martyr. He had been coming back to the safe house at midnight when he encountered a US checkpoint in the street. Having a pistol in his car, he panicked and ran. He was shot in the head, with the bullet reportedly taking much of his face away. He had been engaged to be married a week before. The funeral tent was packed with mourners, some in tribal dress, some in the black uniform of the Mahdi Army. Abu Jaafar kept order, restraining them at one point as a US patrol drove by. As the coffee was served, a religious chanter recited a poem over the sound system, addressed to the Hidden Imam, the Mahdi for whom the army is named, the one who will return to bring just rule to the world:

"Why do you wait, oh Imam?
These youths are killed for your religion and for your victory
A week after his engagement,
He sees how his companions gather in his honour.
The candle of youth is extinguished by the Americans."

As the day wore on, a stream of politicians arrived to pay their respects. Fatah al-Sheikh, a Sadrist who had run for and won a seat in parliament, gave an angry address calling for a full US withdrawal from Sadr City. The commander of the Mahdi Army also made an appearance, vowing to fight if the Americans returned in force. One particularly incongruous guest, sitting in the first rank of dignitaries among the black shirts, beards, robes and turbans, was a figure with a carefully trimmed moustache and a grey business suit. He was Mudhar Shawkat, a longtime associate of Ahmed Chalabi, onetime darling of the neo-conservatives in Washington and now Iraq's deputy prime minister. Chalabi, a staunch secularist but a stauncher opportunist, had currently thrown in his lot with the Sadrists and was said to be coaching Sadr on the finer points of statesmanship. Shawkat's address betrayed little of Chalabi's secular vision, nor his government's position that militias have no place in the new Iraq.

"All of those who know me," said Shawkat, "know that I am a Sadrist by thought, and Sadrist in my actions. The Sadrist trend is not an alliance or party, it is an Iraqi movement - the trend of those who have been dealt injustice, the trend of the black soil... If the Mahdi Army was allowed to defend Sadr City [by itself], it could be the safest city in Iraq."

As we drove away from the funeral, a police car loaded with armed officers came ploughing through traffic. In most of the rest of the city, the police force cars over by sticking their guns out the window, firing shots and shouting over a loudspeaker, "Out of the way!" However, these particular police were shouting, "Out of the way, brothers!" You could view this as a tribute to the neighbourhood's sense of shared struggle, but Haydar thought of it as an acknowledgment that this is one part of town where the state has to watch where it treads.

Steve Negus is the FT's Iraq correspondent.

DOJ_NMG_0014359

Tighter Borders Take A Toll In Iraq (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson

The Washington Post, February 11, 2006

Success of Effort Against Smuggling Hits Villagers Hard

OM AL-KABARI, Iraq -- In this once-thriving smuggling village on Iraq's border with Syria, the last donkeys are dying.

Mothers complain they have no shoes for their children and only soup to feed them. Men sit idly playing checkers and bemoaning the night when American scout helicopters swooped overhead, spelling the end of their livelihoods.

"We could get around everything, but not the helicopters," sighed Mahmood Ahmed, 29, who, along with most of the men in this village of 400 people, admitted he was a smuggler. "We're having nightmares about them."

With their income shriveling, the smugglers could no longer afford food for the hundreds of donkeys they used to haul 30-gallon drums of benzene, cartons of cigarettes and other goods into Syria.

"There is no grass, no money to feed them. So they all died," said Yassin Ali, 39, pointing to a mangy, skeletal white donkey lying listless nearby.

The dramatic downturn in the fortunes of villages along the border is one sign that a surge of American and Iraqi troops into the region in recent months has sharply curtailed illegal traffic over the frontier, U.S. and Iraqi officials and local residents say.

U.S. commanders last year launched a plan to gain better control of Iraq's borders to try to stop the flow of outside fighters, weapons and cash to the Iraqi insurgency. Several thousand additional U.S. and Iraqi troops have been sent into regions near Syria since last summer to bolster a growing contingent of Iraqi border guards. Scores of border forts have been built or refurbished and manned, and there are plans to erect a double chain-link fence along the border during the coming year, according to U.S. and Iraqi officials.

"It's much more than just a line in the sand right now," said Lt. Col. Gregory Reilly of Sacramento, Calif., commander of a U.S. cavalry squadron that oversees about 115 miles of Iraq's northwestern border with Syria, from the Tigris River to the Euphrates. "It's not like a vast open border, not at all. It's a very difficult border to cross."

Syrian border police are also aggressively patrolling their side, Reilly said, in contrast with official statements in Washington accusing Damascus of lax control. "The Syrians are actually doing their job. They are more violent than we are. If they see someone, they will open up shooting," Reilly said as he walked along a dirt berm in view of Syrian guards several weeks ago. Iraqi officers said Syrian guards had recently shot at Iraqi border police, leading to skirmishes.

Controls have been tightened at official border-crossing points. At the town of Rabiyah, a 10-wheel cargo truck rumbled past a newly constructed Iraqi customs station toward a Syrian checkpoint marked by a huge portrait of Syria's late president Hafez Assad. A few months ago, the Iraqi entry point here was in disarray, U.S. and Iraqi officials said. Inbound and outbound traffic were mixed together. Iraqi guards had only five rifles, lacked ammunition and "had no idea what passport was fake and what was real," said Col. Fadel Shaaban Abas, commander of Iraqi customs police at Rabiyah.

"It was complete chaos. You had no idea who was coming and going," said Reilly, commander of 1st Squadron, 3rd Armored Cavalry Regiment, which finishes a year-long tour in Iraq this month. A suicide car bombing in late May closed the entry point for two weeks.

Today, up to 5,000 people, mostly on foot, and about 300 vehicles cross the border daily through divided lanes. Customs revenue has almost tripled. The 120 Iraqi customs police are armed with AK-47 assault rifles or pistols and are backed up by a new, 260-man police battalion, which arrived in December, Abas said. A U.S. customs team recently trained the police officers to spot false passports, and now they find three or four a day, said Staff Sgt. Robert Lowery of Naples, Fla.

Fighters from abroad -- both Iraqis who had left the country and some foreigners -- still manage to get into Iraq, but not simply by sneaking over the border, U.S. officials assert.

"The myth is that foreign fighters are crossing a porous border," said Maj. Chris Kennedy, executive officer with the 3rd Armored Cavalry. Instead, many of the incoming fighters can simply fly into Baghdad, using valid Iraqi passports made from "boxes and boxes" of blank passports shipped out of Iraq during Saddam Hussein's rule, Kennedy and other U.S. officers said. Iraqis are now posted at the border to listen for foreign accents, although many insurgents entering are Iraqis themselves, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0014360

But while U.S. officers are less worried about foreign fighters trying to sift through border villages, they express concern that the severe economic impact of shutting down smuggling routes could create a new breeding ground for insurgents in Iraq.

"The biggest fear is you have a financier who comes through and builds a cell" in an impoverished border village, said Reilly, who estimated that 100,000 people live in primarily Sunni Arab villages along the stretch of border he oversees.

In Om al-Kabari, Mahmood Ali, a father of six, said he considered smuggling to be one of the few legitimate alternatives for earning a living in the village, where drought has curtailed farming in recent years.

"It's a more honorable job than stealing or being an Ali Baba, or insurgent -- you're risking your life . . . to put food on the table," said Ali, squatting in a circle sharing tea with the other village men.

Smuggling, while always a local occupation, accelerated with the economic embargo imposed on Iraq in the 1990s and then skyrocketed when border controls collapsed after the overthrow of President Saddam Hussein in April 2003, villagers said. The smugglers would take out loans at the local sheep market or from goods distributors in the city of Mosul, 100 miles to the east. They would use the money to buy benzene or cartons of cigarettes, load up their donkeys and set out for the border at night in teams of three or four.

It was a risky trade, said Ahmed, who was once caught by Syrian forces, beaten and detained for nine months in a crowded Syrian jail. He said five men from the village had been killed by the Syrian army since 2003. "The Syrians, most of the time, don't detain you, they just shoot you," he said. "There are no warning shots at all."

Still, it was the most lucrative job around. If they successfully met up with buyers in Syria, the teams of smugglers could each make about $27 a month, an average income for Iraqis in the region.

But then last spring, the arrival of U.S. Kiowa scout helicopters, backed up by American and Iraqi ground forces, halted the smuggling spree.

"It was my black day," recalled Yassin Ali, the first of the villagers to be caught by U.S. forces. "All of a sudden we were moving one night and we didn't hear anything, and they turned on the lights." The smugglers froze, but after a minute, when the lights went off again, they tried to flee, thinking the helicopter had gone and the crew could no longer see them. "But it still saw us, even from afar, and they were right back on us," Ali said. "Then the Humvees came up."

Next to the village, an Iraqi border fort is now manned by 24 Iraqi police officers who live there and work in shifts. It is one of 56 forts with 2,700 border police now operating along the northwestern border in conjunction with U.S. and Iraqi troops. Equipped with new jeeps, pickup trucks mounted with machine guns, binoculars and night vision goggles, the police patrol the border around the clock.

"Before, there was no tracking . . . whatsoever, and they could go in day and night," said 1st Lt. Abrahim Assaf Khuder, a police company commander. Now Khuder estimates smuggling has dropped 95 percent, with fewer than three to five interdictions a week. "What really decreased the numbers is the choppers," he said.

The smugglers admit they still occasionally try to make it across the border, adding they are happy the U.S. helicopters don't shoot them. Unlike in the past, they say, they never carry weapons.

"What can we do? We have no jobs, no benzene, no clothes for our families, and the choppers are on our heads all the time. We can't even buy shoes for our kids," Mahmood Ali said, pointing to the bare feet of his 6-year-old son. Monthly rations of grain from the government -- about 20 pounds a person -- only come every four months, he said.

"These towns are in dire need," said Reilly, who has attempted to alleviate the damage from the smuggling crackdown by shipping pallets of food and water to the villages and planning two well-building projects. Reilly has also proposed creating a free-trade zone along the border. In a recent meeting with villagers, they pressed him for permission to cross one day a week. "Syria has to approve it," Reilly told them.

" Inshalla h ," they replied. God willing.

Carroll Kidnappers Reportedly Set Deadline (AP)

By Paul Garwood

Associated Press, February 11, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0014361

BAGHDAD, Iraq -- Kidnappers of American journalist Jill Carroll have threatened to kill her if their demands are not met by Feb. 26, the owner of a Kuwaiti TV station that has aired a new tape of the hostage said Friday.

Al Rai satellite station owner Jassem Boudai said the kidnappers set "more specific" demands than the release of all Iraqi women from prison, which the group laid down in the first videotape released last month. Boudai refused to elaborate.

He said that "sources close to the kidnappers" told the station Friday of the new deadline.

The small, privately owned station aired a tape Thursday showing Carroll, 28, appealing for her supporters to do whatever it takes to win her release "as quickly as possible."

The U.S. military has released five Iraqi women from detention but said the releases were routine and not part of any swap for Carroll. Five Iraqi women remain in U.S. military custody.

Friday's message was not conveyed in the latest videotape, but by "another method," Boudai said. He did not elaborate, and it was unclear whether he passed the latest demands along to authorities.

Boudai said the sources claimed Carroll, who was abducted in Baghdad on Jan. 7, "is in a safe house owned by one of the kidnappers in downtown Baghdad with a group of women."

He said the sources also claimed Carroll was in good psychological condition and was doing housework with the women in the place of her detention. The sources also said the kidnappers denied killing Carroll's translator when they abducted her at gunpoint, as has previously been reported.

Later Friday, Boudai told CNN that he believed Carroll's kidnappers were the same ones who seized two Italian aid workers in September 2004 and released them several weeks later. Italian media said a $1 million ransom was paid in that case.

"I think they are the same group who contacted us last year when the two Italian girls were kidnapped in Iraq," Boudai said.

The station on Friday also reported the latest threat by the kidnappers to kill Carroll, a freelance reporter for the Christian Science Monitor.

Monitor spokeswoman Ellen Tuttle declined comment on Friday.

Two previous tapes of Carroll were aired without audio by Qatar-based Al-Jazeera on Jan. 17 and Jan. 30. The first tape made by the kidnappers, who identified themselves as the "Revenge Brigades," included a threat to kill Carroll within 72 hours unless all Iraqi women were released from custody.

Security experts said kidnappers' choice of Al Rai for the latest tape indicated an effort to increase pressure on the U.S. government.

Al Rai broadcast the new 22-second video in its entirety and with Carroll's voice, unlike Al-Jazeera, which has a policy not to broadcast voices. She spoke of having sent two letters but did not say to whom.

"I am with the mujahedeen," she said. "I sent you a letter written by my hand, but you wanted more evidence, so we are sending you this letter now to prove I am with the mujahedeen."

An Al-Jazeera employee, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he is not authorized to make statements for the station, confirmed the first two videos referred to a letter. The station did not mention any letters when it aired the videotapes. It did report that the kidnappers were demanding the release of women held prisoner in Iraq.

When the new tape was delivered to Al Rai's Baghdad office, it was accompanied by a letter written by Carroll, the station said.

Boudai said his station gave U.S. authorities the letter, which he described only as "sensitive." The station did not reveal its contents, he said, out of concern for the reporter.

Before the latest threat was reported, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said the United States continued "to make every effort to secure her release, to see that she's back safe and sound with her family and her co-workers."

Some analysts said Carroll's kidnappers used the relatively unknown station to get more of its message across and to avoid being tainted by Al-Jazeera's reputation as being biased toward insurgents.

Al-Jazeera came under criticism for airing videos showing al-Qaida in Iraq with hostages they soon beheaded. The station cut the tape when masked gunmen drew knives and moved toward their doomed victims.

Since then, Al-Jazeera has sought to air just enough material for news value without appearing to be a conduit for gruesome propaganda.

"There are a lot of question marks for insurgents at Al-Jazeera because they don't air all their tapes in entirety, or not immediately or sometimes not at all," said Mustafa al-Ani, director of terrorism studies at Gulf Research Center in the United Arab Emirates.

"But these small stations will jump at such opportunities because they aren't famous," he said. "Very few people had heard of Al Rai before that tape, but now people all over the United States know it."

A top U.S. media analyst said being able to get the full message out could put public pressure U.S. officials to question the Bush administration's approach to Iraq.

"These videos will prompt us to feel fear, hope, heightened anger or frustration about a matter as viewers will have little control over, and this could lead us to putting more pressure on our public officials," said Bob Steele of the Florida-based Poynter Institute for Media Studies.

—

Associated Press writer Diana Elias contributed to this report from Kuwait City.

Ex-C.I.A. Official Says Iraq Data Was Distorted (NYT)

By Scott Shane

The New York Times, February 11, 2006

WASHINGTON, Feb. 10 — A C.I.A. veteran who oversaw intelligence assessments about the Middle East from 2000 to 2005 on Friday accused the Bush administration of ignoring or distorting the prewar evidence on a broad range of issues related to Iraq in its effort to justify the American invasion of 2003.

The views of Paul R. Pillar, who retired in October as national intelligence officer for the Near East and South Asia, echoed previous criticism from Democrats and from some administration officials, including Richard A. Clarke, the former White House counterterrorism adviser, and Paul H. O'Neill, the former treasury secretary.

But Mr. Pillar is the first high-level C.I.A. insider to speak out by name on the use of prewar intelligence. His article for the March-April issue of Foreign Affairs, which charges the administration with the selective use of intelligence about Iraq's unconventional weapons and the chances of postwar chaos in Iraq, was posted Friday on the journal's Web site after it was reported in The Washington Post.

"If the entire body of official intelligence on Iraq had a policy implication, it was to avoid war — or, if war was going to be launched, to prepare for a messy aftermath," Mr. Pillar wrote. "What is most remarkable about prewar U.S. intelligence on Iraq is not that it got things wrong and thereby misled policymakers; it is that it played so small a role in one of the most important U.S. policy decisions in decades."

In an interview on Friday, Mr. Pillar said he recognized that his views would become part of the highly partisan, three-year-old battle over the administration's reasons for going to war. But he said his goal in speaking publicly was to help repair what he called a "broken" relationship between the intelligence produced by the nation's spies and the way it is used by its leaders.

"There is ground to be replowed on Iraq," said Mr. Pillar, now a professor at Georgetown University. "But what is more important is to look at the whole intelligence-policy relationship and get a discussion and debate going to make sure what happened on Iraq doesn't happen again."

President Bush and his aides have denied that the Iraq intelligence was politicized. Stephen J. Hadley, the national security adviser, said in November, "Our statements about the threat posed by Saddam Hussein were based on the aggregation of intelligence from a number of sources, and represented the collective view of the intelligence community. Those judgments were shared by Republicans and Democrats alike."

Reports by the Senate Intelligence Committee and the presidential commission on weapons intelligence headed by Laurence H. Silberman, a senior federal judge, and Charles S. Robb, the former Virginia governor and senator, found that C.I.A. analysts had not been pressed to change their views. A second phase of the Senate committee review, on how administration officials used intelligence, has not been completed.

DOJ_NMG_0014363

Mr. Pillar alleged that the earlier studies had considered only "the crudest attempts at politicization" and that the real pressures were far more subtle. "Intelligence was misused publicly to justify decisions that had already been made," chiefly to topple Mr. Hussein in order to "shake up the sclerotic power structures of the Middle East," he wrote.

According to Mr. Pillar's account, the administration shaped the answers it got in part by repeatedly asking the same questions, about the threat posed by Iraqi weapons and about ties between Mr. Hussein and Al Qaeda. When intelligence analysts resisted, he wrote, some of the administration's allies accused Mr. Pillar and others of "trying to sabotage the president's policies."

In light of such accusations, he wrote, analysts began to "sugarcoat" their conclusions.

Mr. Pillar called for a formal declaration by Congress and the White House that intelligence should be clearly separated from policy. He proposed the creation of an independent office, modeled on the Government Accountability Office and the Congressional Budget Office, to assess the use of intelligence at the request of members of Congress.

Mr. Pillar suggested that the root of the problem might be that top intelligence officials serve at the pleasure of the president.

A C.I.A. spokeswoman, Jennifer Millerwise Dyck, said the agency had no comment.

Danielle Pletka, vice president for foreign and defense policy studies at the conservative American Enterprise Institute, said that the C.I.A. had long resisted intervention in Iraq, and that internal pressure on analysts to resist war was greater than any external pressure.

"If the C.I.A. had spent less time leaking its opinions, throughout the 1990's, opposed to any conflict with Iraq, and more time developing assets inside Iraq, the agency would have more credibility and better intelligence," said Ms. Pletka, who served for a decade, until 2002, as a Republican staff member on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

Misuse Of Prewar Data Is Alleged (BSUN)

By Cam Simpson

The Baltimore Sun, February 11, 2006

Ex-CIA official criticizes White House actions

WASHINGTON -- The former CIA official assigned to manage the U.S. government's secret intelligence assessments on Iraq says the Bush administration chose war first and then misleadingly used raw data to assemble a public case for its decision to invade.

Paul Pillar, the CIA's national intelligence officer for the Middle East and South Asia from 2000 to 2005, said the Bush administration also played on the nation's fears after the 2001 terrorist attacks, falsely linking al-Qaida to Saddam Hussein's government even though intelligence agencies had not produced any analysis supporting "the notion of an alliance" between the two.

Instead, Pillar writes in the next issue of the journal Foreign Affairs, connections were drawn between the terrorists and Iraq because "the administration wanted to hitch the Iraq expedition to the 'war on terror' and the threat the American public feared most, thereby capitalizing on the country's militant post-9/11 mood."

The specific critiques in Pillar's 4,500-word essay, "Intelligence, Policy and the War in Iraq," are not new. But it apparently is the first time such criticism has been publicly leveled by such a high-ranking intelligence official directly involved behind the scenes before, during or after the invasion of Iraq nearly three years ago.

Because of his position, Pillar would have had access to, and probably intimate knowledge of, nearly every piece of Iraq-related intelligence maintained by all federal agencies.

Pillar also writes in his essay that the administration went to war without considering any strategic-level intelligence assessments "on any aspect of Iraq" and that the intelligence community foreshadowed many post-Hussein woes, though the findings were largely ignored before the March 2003 invasion.

Excerpts from Pillar's article were first reported by The Washington Post yesterday. Foreign Affairs released a copy of the essay later in the day.

DOJ_NMG_0014364

Pillar, a career intelligence official, retired from the CIA last year and is a visiting professor at Georgetown University in Washington.

The White House did not respond specifically to Pillar's charges yesterday, but Frederick Jones, a spokesman for the National Security Council, pointed to previous administration statements defending its use of intelligence.

The administration first went on the offensive in the fall in an effort to thwart what President Bush, in a Veterans Day speech, called a "deeply irresponsible" effort "to rewrite the history of how that war began."

Jones said yesterday that the administration's prewar statements "about the threat posed by Saddam Hussein were based on the aggregation of intelligence from a number of sources and represented the collective view of the intelligence community."

But in his essay, the man responsible for coordinating the intelligence community's collective view of Iraq challenged the notion that the prevailing wisdom within the nation's spy services supported the decision to invade.

"If the entire body of official intelligence analysis on Iraq had a policy implication, it was to avoid war," Pillar wrote.

He also wrote that the Bush administration "used intelligence not to inform decision-making but to justify a decision already made," the decision to oust Hussein's government.

In making its case, the administration aggressively promoted pieces of "intelligence to win public support for its decision to go to war," Pillar wrote.

He also wrote that "this meant selectively adducing data - 'cherry-picking' - rather than using the intelligence community's own analytic judgments."

Although he acknowledged that the intelligence community was wrong about Iraq's capabilities to produce weapons of mass destruction, Pillar wrote that intelligence "was not what led to the war."

He saved some of his sharpest criticisms for the administration's repeated public statements in 2002 and 2003 about "links" between Iraq and al-Qaida, statements that have been repeated even though an independent commission that investigated the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks found no collaborative relationship between the two.

Pillar's allegations about the public use of selective intelligence on Iraq follows news that I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby Jr., Vice President Dick Cheney's former chief of staff, told a grand jury that he was authorized by his bosses to leak classified information about Iraq in the summer of 2003 to defend the administration's case for war.

Cam Simpson writes for the Chicago Tribune.

Ex-CIA Official Criticizes Use Of Intel (AP)

By Elisabeth Goodridge

AP, February 11, 2006

The Bush administration deliberately misused or ignored intelligence analysis in the buildup of the 2003 invasion into Iraq, according to a former top intelligence official.

Paul R. Pillar, who served as the National Intelligence Officer for Near East and South Asia from 2000 to 2005, also accused the administration of ignoring reports that Iraq would likely endure a violent transition period.

The administration "went to war without requesting — and evidently without being influenced by — any strategic-level intelligence assessments on any aspect of Iraq," Pillar wrote in an upcoming article of Foreign Affairs.

The White House did not immediately return a call for comment Friday.

Pillar said the administration drove intelligence officials to discover information that would help them meet their policy objectives.

"The Bush administration deviated from the professional standard not only in using policy to drive intelligence, but also in aggressively using intelligence to win public support for its decision to go to war," Pillar wrote. "This meant selectively adducing data -- 'cherry-picking' -- rather than using the intelligence community's own analytic judgments."

He also wrote that the intelligence community assessed that in Iraq, "war and occupation would boost political Islam and increase sympathy for terrorists' objectives."

House Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., called for an investigation Friday.

DOJ_NMG_0014365

"Evidence that the Bush White House manipulated and selectively declassified intelligence to wage a public relations campaign before, during and after the invasion of Iraq grows every day," he said.

Pillar served in the intelligence community for more than 20 years. He is now a professor at Georgetown University.

Book Casts Doubt On Case For War (LAT)

By John Daniszewski

The Los Angeles Times, February 11, 2006

Believing the evidence fell short, Bush discussed with Blair the possibility of inciting a conflict with Iraq, British author says.

LONDON — It was the end of January 2003. Secretary of State Colin L. Powell was five days away from giving a critical speech at the U.N. Security Council, laying out the case that Iraq was hiding weapons of mass destruction and posed a danger to world peace.

But huddled with aides at the White House, President Bush and British Prime Minister Tony Blair were not sure there was enough evidence to convince the Security Council. Without the council's explicit authorization, their plans for an invasion to depose Saddam Hussein could be difficult to defend under international law.

Bush proposed an alternative: paint a U.S. spy plane in United Nations colors and see if that didn't tempt Hussein's forces to shoot at it. In any case, he said, the war was "penciled in" for March 10 and the United States would go ahead with or without a second U.N. resolution.

Blair replied that he was "solidly with" the president.

That is the gist of an account of the Jan. 31, 2003, meeting contained in the new edition of "Lawless World," a book by British author Philippe Sands. He has not identified the writer of the memorandum on which the account is based, but British media reports say it was one of the aides in attendance: Sir David Manning, then security advisor to Blair and now the British ambassador in Washington.

A spokesman for Blair on Friday refused to address the allegations but repeated Downing Street's insistence that there was no decision to commit British forces to war in Iraq until after it was authorized by Parliament on March 18, two days before the invasion was launched.

A spokesman for Manning said the ambassador would not comment.

Sands, 45, is a professor of international law and a founding member of the Matrix law office in London, where Cherie Blair, the prime minister's wife, also works. His book, initially published last year, is not primarily about the decision to go to war in Iraq. Rather, it examines a range of issues in which, he argues, the Bush administration, with Britain's complicity, has undermined the "rules-based" international system built largely by the United States and Britain after World War II.

Sands said there was no doubt about the authenticity of the documents he quotes.

"They have not been denied, and they cannot be denied," he told the Los Angeles Times this week. Britain's Channel 4 News said it had seen the document outside Britain. The channel's Jon Snow presented excerpts in a broadcast last weekend.

The text, in Sands' view, shows that U.S. and British leaders had determined six weeks before the invasion to launch a war to disarm Hussein, even without explicit U.N. approval.

According to the secret notes of the meeting, as paraphrased in Sands' book and then quoted directly by Channel 4, Bush told Blair that "the U.S. was thinking of flying U2 reconnaissance aircraft with fighter cover over Iraq, painted in U.N. colors. If Saddam fires on them, he would be in breach" of U.N. resolutions.

Bush also was quoted as saying an Iraqi defector might make a public presentation about weapons of mass destruction in Iraq and that there was a small possibility the Iraqi leader would be assassinated.

The accounts say Bush promised to put the full weight of the United States behind getting another U.N. resolution, but if that failed, military action would follow anyway. He is also quoted as saying he believed that internecine warfare in Iraq was unlikely.

Blair is quoted as saying that a second Security Council resolution was desirable to "provide an insurance policy against the unexpected, and international cover — including with the Arabs." But he is also quoted as saying he was behind Bush.

DOJ_NMG_0014366

"The documents … indicate very clearly that neither man considered that the British or American governments had enough evidence," Sands said. "Why would the U.S. president and the British prime minister spend any time concocting ways of provoking a material breach if they knew they could prove Saddam had weapons of mass destruction?"

Sands contends that U.S. and British actions have eroded pillars of international relations such as the U.N. Charter, the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the Geneva Convention, and that has made international action in Iraq more difficult.

"By ripping up the rule book, they undermined their ability to forge a consensus," he said.

Sands saw a "setting aside of the classical rules of international law, which basically say you can only use force in two circumstances: in self-defense or where the Security Council has authorized the use of force…. They never argued self-defense," he said. "So they argued that the Security Council had agreed to the use of force. I don't think there are many people who accept that argument."

Ian Gleeson, a spokesman for the British government, said the country had waited until March 18 to commit its forces and earlier pursued "all other avenues" to compel Hussein to disarm.

"Obviously, all these matters have been thoroughly investigated during the various inquiries we've had here, so we've got nothing further to add, and I am certainly not commenting directly on the book," Gleeson said.

When asked about the allegations in Washington last week, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said: "Look, this is ground that has been plowed over and over and over again. The president and others couldn't have been more clear where we stood at that point in time with respect to seeking a diplomatic solution versus a military alternative."

Sands disagreed with the assertion that Blair's conduct had already been investigated, adding that the documents now coming out could form the basis of an impeachment motion against the British prime minister.

"He misled Parliament as to the state of his knowledge [about Hussein's weapons], and he misled Parliament as to the extent to which he had or had not committed to the U.S. president the United Kingdom's support, and that requires, at the very least, a full and thorough inquiry."

Ex-ambassador Says U.S. May Spend Decades In Iraq (COPLEY)

By PAUL E. KOSTYU, Copley Columbus bureau CHIEF

Copley News Service, February 11, 2006

COLUMBUS - Iraq is building into a civil war and the United States is at risk of being sucked into a battle lasting decades, said former U.S. Ambassador to Iraq Joseph Wilson.

Wilson, whose wife, Valerie Plame, was outed as a CIA operative allegedly by members of the Bush administration, said the United States has lost its political capital throughout the world.

“We’re in a period of instability,” he said. “9/11 was a terrible insult to us. It was an assault on everything we stand for, and it was an assault on what most of the world stands for.”

He said when the U.S. went into Afghanistan, “we had the world with us. We were still the city on the hill whether they agreed or disagreed with our policies.”

Now, the political dynamics of the Middle East have changed. “It was not a political change we anticipated when we got into this,” he said.

Consequently, the Iraq war has to be solved with the help of “a concert of nations” at the political table, not on the battlefield.

He said the nations should include Saudi Arabia, Jordan, Iran, Egypt, Kurds, Israel and Syria and their patrons, otherwise the battlefield becomes the solution.

“You cannot do it from Baghdad,” he told a gathering of newspaper executives Friday at the annual convention of the Ohio Newspaper Association. “You have to do it from outside.”

In the meantime, Wilson said, the focus of the U.S. military in Iraq has to change. He said it has to move away from “unnecessarily killing Arabs” because the more the U.S. military sides with one faction in Iraq, the more it becomes viewed as a mercenary force.

Instead, he said, the military should focus on things other than direct combat, including, for example, training an Iraqi national army, logistical support, intelligence gathering, policing streets, infrastructure needs and defending itself.

DOJ_NMG_0014367

Wilson said when President Bush says the war is not about oil, Israel or the manipulation of intelligence data, then "it must be one of those. We were sold on the threat to national security."

He said some people fear the world is seeing the beginning of a war that could last 30 to 100 years.

"War is so unpredictable and so long lasting," said Wilson, who was appointed ambassador by President George H.W. Bush.

He said the recent uproar in Muslim communities worldwide over the publishing in Europe of political cartoons about the Prophet Mohammed "is a symptom of an underlying emotion that we are involved in a modern-day crusade."

Wilson called columnist Bob Novak, who initially identified Plame as a CIA operative in a column, "a pawn in someone else's game. He's doing someone else's bidding." Novak spoke at last year's convention.

Wilson accused the Bush administration of using "lies, distortion and character assassination" to discredit him even after it understood Saddam Hussein did not have weapons of mass destruction.

"This is a debate about what sort of country we have," he said.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Executive Loses Case On Trading (NYT)

By Gretchen Morgenson

The New York Times, February 11, 2006

Another telecom titan has tumbled.

In one of the last of the major conflict-of-interest cases that rocked Wall Street nearly four years ago, a New York State judge has found that the former chief executive of McLeodUSA, a once highflying telecommunications company that has filed for bankruptcy twice since 2002, is liable for improper trading of hot new stock offerings during the technology stock boom.

Eliot Spitzer, the New York attorney general, sued the executive, Clark E. McLeod, and four other high-profile telecommunications executives in 2002, contending that they had steered investment banking business to Salomon Smith Barney in exchange for inflated ratings on their companies' stocks and hot new shares of other companies.

Mr. McLeod netted $9.96 million in profits on 34 stock allocations from 1997 to 2000, the court filings said. Salomon Smith Barney received more than $77 million in underwriting fees from McLeodUSA.

In a decision issued Thursday, Justice Richard B. Lowe III of New York State Supreme Court in Manhattan wrote that Mr. McLeod's acceptance of initial public offering shares from the same brokerage firm that his company used as an investment banker, a practice known as spinning, was "a sophisticated form of bribery."

He also found that because Mr. McLeod did not disclose his hot-stock grants and the profits generated by them, he misled both the investing public and his own company's board.

"We are gratified that New York courts have recognized that undisclosed stock spinning is illegal and deceives the public," Mr. Spitzer said in a statement. "This decision sends a message that executives who put their own interests ahead of their shareholders' will be held accountable."

Mr. McLeod, who lives in Cedar Rapids, Iowa, challenged Mr. Spitzer's assertions that his receipt of undisclosed hot stock offerings was illegal. His lawyer continued that challenge yesterday, calling the case against Mr. McLeod another example of overreaching by Mr. Spitzer.

"Clark McLeod is not Bernie Ebbers or anybody else of that ilk," said Harold K. Gordon, a partner at Jones Day in New York. "There is no evidence that there was any connection between Mr. McLeod's receipt of these I.P.O. shares and Salomon Smith Barney acting as the company's investment banker."

Stating that Justice Lowe erred in his decision, Mr. Gordon said Mr. McLeod would probably appeal.

The civil case against Mr. McLeod recalls the heady days of 1999 and 2000, when telecommunications companies like WorldCom and Qwest were stock market darlings and the men who ran them rock stars. A central figure in the case was Jack B. Grubman, the powerful Salomon Smith Barney telecommunications analyst who recommended McLeod-USA stock repeatedly to the public, even as it plummeted.

DOJ_NMG_0014368

Indeed, Mr. Spitzer contended that Mr. McLeod sold 2.2 million shares of his company's stock after Mr. Grubman began recommending it, realizing a profit of almost $100 million from the sales. Mr. Grubman was barred from the securities industry in 2002.

Mr. McLeod appears to have pursued the initial public offering shares aggressively. For example, Mr. McLeod testified that he personally asked for initial offering allocations from chief executives of several companies McLeodUSA did business with and that Salomon Smith Barney was going to offer to the public.

The court must schedule a hearing to set the amount of damages and restitution to be paid by Mr. McLeod.

The other executives sued by Mr. Spitzer for their initial public offering profits were Philip F. Anschutz, former chairman of Qwest Communications; Bernard J. Ebbers, former WorldCom chief executive; Joseph P. Nacchio, former chief executive of Qwest who will be tried this year on insider trading charges in Denver; and Stephen Garofalo, chief executive of Metromedia Fiber Networks.

All four have settled with the attorney general. Mr. Anschutz paid $4.4 million to settle; Mr. Nacchio paid $400,000; and Mr. Garofalo paid $1.5 million. The settlement with Mr. Ebbers, which has not yet been completed, will be a part of his global resolution involving the holders of stock and bonds who lost money when WorldCom collapsed.

Andrew J. Lorin, an assistant New York attorney general and enforcement section chief, argued the case before Justice Lowe. "McLeod reached out to Salomon Smith Barney to get these hot I.P.O. shares, which were like cash, while at the same time McLeod's company was sending tens of millions of dollars in banking business to S.S.B.," he said.

"It's simply wrong that an executive should receive these types of payments from a company vendor and that none of it was disclosed to the board or the shareholders."

Insurance Scandal (WSJ)

By Karen Richardson

The Wall Street Journal, February 11, 2006

Four Ex-Executives To Answer Charges

Three former top executives of Berkshire Hathaway Inc.'s General Re and one former American International Group Inc. executive are scheduled to be arraigned in federal district court in Alexandria, Va., Thursday on charges that they helped insurance giant AIG cook its books.

Absent from those proceedings -- and probably future court dates related to the matter -- will be former AIG Chief Executive Maurice R. "Hank" Greenberg, who was referred to as an "unindicted co-conspirator" by the grand jury that handed up the indictment.

Despite a year's worth of work digging through thousands of pages of documents and listening to hours of recorded conversations, prosecutors didn't find any hard evidence that Mr. Greenberg knew his company might have been committing a crime by entering into a questionable "finite reinsurance" transaction with General Re, according to people familiar with the government's case. Finite-reinsurance products allegedly can be used to burnish a company's financial results.

Some legal experts say it now looks unlikely that Mr. Greenberg will face criminal charges in the scandal that ultimately led to his ouster from the top job at AIG, unless some new evidence emerges against him. In April, Eliot Spitzer, the hard-charging New York attorney general who was also investigating AIG and Mr. Greenberg, told a television interviewer that his office had "powerful evidence" against the then-AIG CEO. But in November, Mr. Spitzer decided not to pursue criminal charges against Mr. Greenberg.

The federal grand jury in Virginia, however, delivered indictments two weeks ago against the three former General Re executives -- Ronald Ferguson, Elizabeth Monrad and Robert Graham -- as well as Christian Milton, AIG's former head of its U.S. reinsurance operations.

Justice Department prosecutors could still pursue Mr. Greenberg if one of those facing indictments were to offer up new evidence against him. But Mr. Milton's lawyer said in an interview two weeks ago that his client will plead not guilty and go to trial.

Last week, AIG's shares rallied after the insurance giant agreed to a $1.64 billion civil settlement with multiple regulators over fraud and other allegations related to the scandal.

Mr. Greenberg isn't expected to abandon his counterattack. The former AIG chief, who took part in the D-Day landing in Normandy, isn't known for backing down from a fight, and friends say he isn't about to back down from this one. An insurance agency owned by his C.V. Starr & Co. has been slapped with a restraining order aimed at preventing it from taking existing business away from AIG, pending arbitration. As a result, Mr. Greenberg may still get his day in court.

Write to Karen Richardson at karen.richardson@awsj.com5

Ex-Hollinger Official: Give Me My Stuff Back (CHIST)

By ERIC HERMAN, Staff Reporter

Chicago Sun-Times, February 11, 2006

Media mogul Conrad Black, who once controlled the company that owns the Chicago Sun-Times, ripped prosecutors Friday for blocking his access to treasured personal belongings.

Black, 61, faces charges he helped steal $84 million from Hollinger International, the company that owns the Sun-Times. The charges include obstruction of justice for allegedly removing documents from his Toronto office last year. At a court hearing Friday, prosecutors said they wanted to make sure the evidence stayed out of Black's reach. But a lawyer for Black said the material includes items with no relevance to the case, including a picture of Black's father.

After the hearing, Black said the items also include a bust of Marshal Ferdinand Foch -- a French military commander from World War I -- and a sketch of Maurice Duplessis, who served as premier of Quebec from 1936 to 1959. Black is the author of a 1976 biography of Duplessis.

CONRAD'S HERO

Marshal Ferdinand Foch (1851-1929) led the Allied forces in the last months of World War I and is credited by many historians with masterminding the victory over Germany. A career military man, Foch wrote books on war and taught at France's war college. Once war began, he argued for a unified command structure among Britain, Belgium and France -- a view that would be proved right.

In 1918, the Allies' leaders put Foch in charge of the Allied armies. Citing his determination, King Albert I of Belgium said, "that man could make the dead fight."

Foch waged relentless attacks against the German army in the summer of 1918, halting their advances until American troops arrived.

--Eric Herman

"There's a lot of nonsense going on here. This has absolutely no relevance to this case," Black said. "It's irritating. Come on, it would be irritating to you, wouldn't it? If you had pictures of your family, a picture of the guy you wrote a book about that his secretary gave you, that had been a present from his own parliamentary caucus?"

Black's interest in historical figures like Foch dates back to his childhood, when he was fascinated with Napoleon. In 2003 he published a second work of history, the 1,360-page Franklin Delano Roosevelt: Champion of Freedom.

Black has pleaded not guilty, and said Friday he wished he had an earlier trial date. The trial is scheduled to start in March 2007.

"I want to get on with it. . . . I want to expose this case for the complete fraud that it is," Black said.

Prosecutors have not had access to items from Black's Toronto office, either. Under a court order in Canada, they are being held by the accounting firm Ernst & Young.

At Friday's hearing, Judge Amy St. Eve ordered both sides not to remove the material until prosecutors obtained the evidence under an international treaty.

In May 2005, Black and his chauffeur removed 13 boxes of documents from his Toronto office. At the time, Black knew he was under investigation by the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission as well as the Justice Department, prosecutors say. A Canadian court had issued an order barring the documents' destruction. A security camera captured the incident on video.

Black Eager To Proceed With Fraud Trial (FINDLAW/AP)

By Dave Carpenter, Ap Business Writer

AP, February 11, 2006

(AP) - CHICAGO-Former media tycoon Conrad Black said Friday he's eager to get on with his fraud and racketeering trial and reiterated his defiance of the case he has called a massive smear job against him.

Black isn't scheduled to go on trial until March 2007 on charges related to the alleged looting of more than $84 million from Hollinger International Inc. by high-level executives. But he said after making his third required appearance in U.S. District Court that he wishes it could start sooner.

"I want to get on with it," he told reporters after the status hearing. "I want to expose this case for the complete fraud that it is."

Attorneys for the two sides jockeyed over whether prosecutors followed proper procedure in subpoenaing documents and personal effects of Black and co-defendant John Boultbee, Hollinger's former chief financial officer, from Toronto-based parent firm Hollinger Inc.

Black's attorneys asked to have the subpoena quashed, claiming the request didn't go through Canadian authorities as required under a U.S.-Canada treaty.

Prosecutors withdrew the subpoena, acknowledging they did not fully adhere to the treaty because they wanted to move swiftly out of concern the documents would go missing. Judge Amy St. Eve ordered that no one attempt to remove the documents until the treaty has been complied with.

At issue are 13 boxes of documents that Black is alleged to have taken from Hollinger Inc.'s offices last May in defiance of a Canadian court order that no documents be removed without permission. Black subsequently returned the documents.

Black, Boultbee and two other former Hollinger executives - Peter Atkinson and Mark Kipnis - are charged with using their positions to plunder millions from Chicago-based Hollinger International, which formerly owned newspapers in Canada, London and Jerusalem and now holds Chicago-area papers. All have pleaded not guilty to the criminal charges.

Prosecutors had wanted to go to trial as soon as this fall, but St. Eve set it for March 5, 2007, because of a conflict with a terrorism trial she is due to preside over this fall.

If convicted on all counts, Black faces a maximum sentence of 95 years in prison, $7 million in fines and forfeiture of money that allegedly was obtained fraudulently.

The judge scheduled the next status hearing in the case for April 21.

Mistrial Declared In Second Cendant Fraud Case (FINDLAW/AP)

By Stephen Singer, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 11, 2006

(AP) - HARTFORD, Connecticut-Federal prosecutors are weighing whether to take another shot at former Cendant Corp. Chairman Walter Forbes who again saw fraud charges leveled against him fall apart in another mistrial.

A federal judge declared the mistrial Thursday - the second to date - in the accounting-fraud trial against Forbes, whose company whose company was ensnared in one of the first corporate scandals of the 1990s.

Forbes was accused of participating in a scheme that cost the company and investors more than $3 billion (â‚¬2.5 billion).

The jury in the second trial deliberated in Hartford for 27 days.

Jurors sent a note to U.S. District Judge Alvin W. Thompson Thursday morning saying they were deadlocked, Thompson's clerk said. Thompson, who had encouraged the jury to work through a previous deadlock, discussed the note with the jurors and then discharged them.

Defense attorney Brendan Sullivan had no comment after court Thursday. Federal prosecutors must decide whether to ask for a third trial. They said Thursday they were reviewing their options.

James W. Bergenn, a Hartford attorney and legal analyst on local television, said he would not be surprised if prosecutors sought a third trial.

"They almost never change their view even if they lose to a jury," said Bergenn, who is not involved in the case. "It's very, very, very rare that a prosecutor in my experience says, 'We were wrong.'"

In the most recent trial, prosecutors reduced the number of charges from 16 to four - conspiracy to commit securities fraud, securities fraud and two counts of false reporting to the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission.

Forbes argued that he did not know about the fraud.

Jurors last year convicted Forbes' co-defendant, Cendant Vice Chairman E. Kirk Shelton, of conspiracy, mail fraud, wire fraud, securities fraud and making false statements to the SEC.

Shelton was sentenced to 10 years in prison and ordered to pay $3.27 billion (â,¬2.73 billion) in restitution to Cendant, including a balloon payment of $15 million (â,¬12.53 million) and monthly installments of $2,000 (â,¬1,670) after he is released from prison.

Prosecutors said Shelton inflated revenue by $500 million (â,¬417 million) at Cendant's predecessor, CUC International, to drive up the stock price. The fraud was reported in 1998, causing Cendant's market value to drop by $14 billion (â,¬12 billion) in one day.

CUC, which ran a membership-marketing operation, merged with HFS Inc., a travel and real-estate services company, to form Cendant. Its brands include Ramada, Howard Johnson, Avis, Coldwell Banker and Century 21.

The Cendant allegations were among the first in a series of corporate accounting scandals in recent years that sparked outrage among investors. At the time, the $3 billion fraud was the largest case of accounting fraud in the country, prosecutors said.

Forbes was chief executive of CUC and Shelton was president before CUC merged with HFS Inc. to form New York-based Cendant in December 1997.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Cheney Role Risks Political Fallout (WSJ)

By Anne Marie Squeo And John D. McKinnon

The Wall Street Journal, February 11, 2006

CIA-Leak Case May Hand War Critics Momentum, But Legal Issues Are Slim

WASHINGTON -- The disclosure that Vice President Dick Cheney may have authorized his former chief of staff to release classified information to justify the war in Iraq has political consequences for the White House, but the legal fallout may be muted.

Mr. Cheney, in his role as second-in-command of the country, has significant leeway, albeit not as much as the president, to declassify information. The information I. Lewis Libby, the chief of staff, said he was authorized by his superiors to discuss with reporters was the October 2002 National Intelligence Estimate titled "Iraq's Continuing Programs for Weapons of Mass Destruction."

The 90-page report, prepared by the National Intelligence Council for the director of the Central Intelligence Agency, was prepared in advance of the March 2003 invasion of Iraq and became the subject of intense focus in mid-2003, after weapons inspectors failed to find evidence that Saddam Hussein had been building such weapons. Mr. Libby has been indicted on charges of lying and obstruction of justice related to a federal probe into whether administration officials intentionally blew the cover of a CIA official.

"The president can declassify anything," William Banks, a Syracuse University law professor and expert on national-security law, said. While the president would have to amend his own executive order governing secrets in order to declassify something on the fly, that can be accomplished very informally, even orally and in secret. "He could do it on a cocktail napkin," Mr. Banks said.

The vice president's authority to declassify is less clear. Some legal scholars believe that Mr. Cheney would share in the president's authority, as an elected official. Alternatively, the president could delegate his declassification authority to the vice president.

"The classification system is rooted for the most part not in statute but in executive order. ...In the case of the NIE, the White House was free to declassify it at a moment's notice," said Steven Aftergood, director of the project on government secrecy at the Federation of American Scientists, which favors increased public access to government information.

On July 18, 2003, the administration, facing criticism for the intelligence used to justify the war, declassified an eight-page part of the NIE dubbed "key judgments" and conducted a lengthy background briefing with reporters to discuss it.

DOJ_NMG_0014372

As such, the trial of Mr. Libby, scheduled to start early next year, is likely to resurrect a sensitive issue for the Bush administration going into November's midterm congressional elections: the rationale for the Iraq war and tactics used to quell criticism.

The implication from the disclosure that Mr. Libby had authority to discuss sensitive intelligence matters with the press "is that the White House -- the vice president -- has been using his declassification authority as a way to advance the administration's political agenda," said Mr. Aftergood. "In other words, information that supports the administration's position on Iraq or whatever is selectively declassified and other information is not. That's not a criminal offense, but it's kind of sleazy."

The investigation into who leaked the identity of CIA agent Valerie Plame to the media continues, though Mr. Libby has been the only one charged. The five-count indictment against him doesn't actually allege he leaked Ms. Plame's name or that he disclosed classified information. Yet both factors are expected to factor into the government's case against him.

Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald disclosed Mr. Libby's authorization to release NIE information in a letter to Mr. Libby's defense team last month. That letter, which recapped discussions between the two sides in the case, was filed with the court as part of a motion to compel Mr. Fitzgerald to turn over information he had refused to provide. A judge is expected to rule on the matter in coming weeks.

Mr. Fitzgerald doesn't say in the court filings that Mr. Libby's superiors gave him permission to disclose Ms. Plame's identity. A 1982 federal law makes it illegal to intentionally blow the cover of a covert agent, potentially endangering the agent's life and those with whom the agent works. A spokesman for Mr. Fitzgerald declined comment.

Mr. Fitzgerald makes clear in his letter that his interest in mentioning the authorization isn't to show some motive or intent. Rather, he notes that Mr. Libby's discussions with reporters, where he is alleged to have discussed Ms. Plame's identity, are "inextricably linked" to the administration's efforts to shore up support for the war, in part by citing the intelligence report.

Mr. Libby's attorneys have said they don't plan to raise a defense based on authorization by superiors. In recent court filings, they have indicated that they are likely to focus on the demands of Mr. Libby's job and suggest that any inconsistencies between his testimony and other facts are the result of a mistake, not an intent to lie.

Ms. Plame, who has since retired from the CIA, was first named in a newspaper column by Robert Novak on July 14, 2003, that cited two senior administration officials. That article and subsequent ones discussed White House reaction to public criticism of the war a week earlier by Ms. Plame's husband, former ambassador Joseph Wilson. Mr. Wilson had been sent by the CIA to check out claims that Iraq had sought uranium ore, critical to making nuclear weapons, from Niger, and found no evidence to support that.

Write to Anne Marie Squeo at annemarie.squeo@wsj.com1 and John D. McKinnon at john.mckinnon@wsj.com2

Abramoff E-Mail Plays Up Bush Contacts (AP)

By Pete Yost

AP, February 11, 2006

Jack Abramoff had brief conversations with President Bush almost a dozen times and the president knew him well enough to make joking references to Abramoff's family, according to an e-mail the fallen lobbyist sent a magazine editor.

Bush "joked with me about a bunch of things, including details of my kids," Abramoff recalled of his contacts with the president.

The recipient of the e-mail, Washingtonian magazine editor Kim Eisler, confirmed its contents.

Bush's contacts with Abramoff — who has pleaded guilty in a fraud and bribery case and is cooperating with a public corruption investigation — have become an issue because the president has said he doesn't recall ever meeting the lobbyist.

Time magazine and the Washingtonian have reported the existence of about a half-dozen photos showing Abramoff and Bush together.

The president acknowledged having his picture taken with Abramoff but suggested the photos were of no significance because he is photographed with so many people. Bush said there was no reason to publicly release the photographs.

"I frankly don't even remember having my picture taken with the guy," Bush told a news conference on Jan. 26. "I don't know him."

DOJ_NMG_0014373

On Thursday, White House press secretary Scott McClellan said that "what the president said still stands."

Abramoff's e-mail states that Bush "has one of the best memories of any politician I have ever met." The e-mail said that Bush's ability to recall is one of his "trademarks, though of course he can't recall that he has a great memory!"

The e-mail adds, "Perhaps he has forgotten everything. Who knows."

On Friday, Eisler said that Abramoff made the comments more than two weeks ago in response to a question from the magazine editor, who wanted to double-check some information before appearing on a television show.

A liberal Web log, ThinkProgress, first disclosed the existence of the Abramoff-Eisler e-mails this week.

Three More Lawmakers Tied To Abramoff (AP)

By Toni Locy And Pete Yost

AP, February 11, 2006

Three members of Congress have been linked to efforts by lobbyist Jack Abramoff and a former General Services Administration official to secure leases of government property for Abramoff's clients, according to court filings by federal prosecutors on Friday.

The filings in U.S. District Court do not allege any wrongdoing by the elected officials but list them in documents portraying David Safavian, a former GSA chief of staff, as an active adviser to Abramoff, giving the lobbyists tips on how to use members of Congress to navigate the agency's bureaucracy.

Abramoff is cooperating with federal investigators in a wide-ranging probe of corruption on Capitol Hill that threatens several powerful members of Congress and their staff members. Last month, he pleaded guilty to federal charges of conspiracy, tax evasion and mail fraud.

Safavian is charged with lying to a GSA ethics officer when he said Abramoff was not seeking business with the agency at the time the lobbyist paid for Safavian and several others to go on a golf outing to Scotland in August 2002.

At the time of the trip, prosecutors said, Abramoff was trying to get GSA approval for leases of the Old Post Office Pavilion in Washington for an Indian tribe to develop and for federal property in Silver Spring, Md., for use by a Jewish school.

Two of the elected officials referred to in Friday's filings have been identified in published reports as Reps. Steven LaTourette, R-Ohio, and Don Young, R-Alaska. According to Roll Call, a Capitol Hill newspaper, the two representatives wrote to the GSA in September 2002, urging the agency to give preferential treatment to groups such as Indian tribes when evaluating development proposals for the Old Post Office.

LaTourette maintains he did nothing improper by advocating special opportunities for certain small businesses in areas known as HUBzones, or Historically Underutilized Business zones. His spokeswoman, Deborah Setliff, said that the letter was reviewed by Young's chief of staff and counsel and that it did not advocate any particular business over another.

A spokesman for Young did not return telephone calls.

Friday's filings by prosecutors refer to a third member of Congress, Rep. Shelly Moore Capito, R-W.Va. Her name appears in e-mails that suggest she was trying to help Abramoff secure a GSA lease for land in Silver Spring for a religious school.

Capito claims to know nothing about the effort. "The action taken by her former chief of staff was done without her knowledge, approval or consent," said her spokesman, Joel Brubaker. "She was not aware of any contact with GSA of any type on this matter."

Mark Johnson, Capito's former chief of staff, said he did not bring the issue to Capito's attention. He said he was contacted by Neil Volz, a colleague of Abramoff's and a former chief of staff for Rep. Bob Ney, R-Ohio.

Johnson said Volz asked him to check on the status of a project involving the GSA. Johnson said he believes he called a friend at the GSA but doesn't recall the outcome.

Prosecutors included the e-mails in documents filed in response to a request by Safavian's lawyers to dismiss the indictment against him. Safavian's lawyers want a federal judge to throw out the charges on grounds there is no evidence of wrongdoing.

In their filing, prosecutors laid out a series of contacts between Abramoff and Safavian that show the former GSA official gave inside information and advice to the lobbyist.

DOJ_NMG_0014374

Safavian used his personal e-mail during business hours to communicate with Abramoff several times, according to prosecutors. He also edited the draft of a letter that was probably sent under LaTourette and Young's names.

And Safavian advised Abramoff to tell his wife to use her maiden name during a meeting with GSA officials so she wouldn't draw attention to her politically connected husband's involvement in the project.

In a July 23, 2002, e-mail to a GSA official, Safavian discussed getting information about the Silver Spring site to Capito's office. But Volz discovered a complication the next day.

Volz told Abramoff that someone at the GSA wanted the congresswoman to put her request in writing. "We can't ask the most vulnerable Republican incumbent member of Congress in the House to put something in writing that can be made public," Volz wrote. "The congresswoman's office has already put the request in and you would think that would be enough!!!"

___

Associated Press writer Mark Sherman contributed to this report.

Lobbyist Confirms Talks With Reids Office (AP)

AP, February 11, 2006

One of Jack Abramoff's ex-colleagues confirmed Friday he contacted Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid's office on behalf of the influential lobbyist but said he doesn't believe Abramoff's billing records accurately reflect the extent of his work.

Ronald Platt, a lobbyist who worked with Abramoff at the Greenberg Traurig firm between 2001 and 2004, said he contacted Reid's office in 2001, as the billing records show, about the timing of minimum wage legislation affecting Abramoff's Northern Mariana Islands client.

"When Abramoff first arrived at Greenberg Traurig, I did a new colleague a favor by simply asking Reid staffers about when the minimum wage legislation affecting the Mariana Islands would be voted upon by the Senate. I communicated this to Abramoff," Platt said in a statement e-mailed to The Associated Press.

AP reported Thursday that lobbying firm billing records obtained under public records law from the Northern Mariana Islands showed Abramoff billed the islands for 21 contacts in 2001 with Reid's office.

The records listed the minimum wage as the issue and Platt as the point of contact for most of those contacts. Platt had formally registered with the Senate in 2001 to lobby for the Marianas as well as some Abramoff tribal clients.

Reid's office confirmed this week it had "routine contact" with Platt over the years on lobbying issues such as the Marianas, tribes and other issues but said it could not verify all the contacts listed in the billing records.

In his statement, Platt sought to minimize the extent of his lobbying of Reid's office on behalf of Abramoff, who has pleaded guilty in a fraud and bribery case.

"These contacts were incidental, insofar as I simply bumped into Reid staffers at Democratic Party functions or occurred incidental to discussions regarding my clients, not Abramoff's," Platt said. "Any contacts that I may have had in regards to Abramoff's tribal clients would have been similarly incidental."

As for the 21 contacts listed in the billing records, Platt noted Abramoff has pleaded guilty to defrauding clients and said the references in the AP story were inaccurate. He was not more specific.

Audits of Abramoff's work for the Marianas during the 1990s, when he worked for the Preston Gates lobbying firm, concluded more than $1 million in expenses could not be substantiated.

However, the 2001 Marianas billing records cited by AP were similarly audited and the island's government raised no concerns. In fact, the island's auditor concluded Greenberg Traurig had provided "more lobbyist services ... in terms of time spent" for less money than had been seen in earlier years.

Platt also said the AP did not attempt to reach him for comment before its story moved Thursday.

AP contacted Platt's new lobbying firm in late December seeking to interview him about the billing records and was referred to Greenberg Traurig.

Platt also did not return two phone messages Friday renewing a request for an interview, sending an e-mail statement instead.

DOJ_NMG_0014375

Greenberg Traurig declined to comment. "Consistent with our ethical obligations to clients, our firm continues to cooperate fully with ongoing government investigations," the firm said.

Dem Leader Faces Increasing Scrutiny In Lobbyist Scandal (HCHRON)

By MICHAEL HEDGES

Houston Chronicle, February 11, 2006

Sen. Harry Reid helped lead the effort to portray DeLay as corrupt

WASHINGTON - Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, who has helped lead the effort to paint Rep. Tom DeLay and the Republican Party as corrupt, faced increased criticism Friday about his extensive contacts with the lobbyist who set off the unfolding congressional ethics scandal.

Reid, D-Nev., who last month compared DeLay to a gangster for his connections with high-profile lobbyist Jack Abramoff, received $68,000 for his campaigns and political committees from Abramoff clients and associates.

Around the time of the contributions, Reid wrote letters to the U.S. Interior Department urging action that would benefit an Indian tribe client of Abramoff's. In addition, Reid's staff had extensive contacts with lobbyists working for Abramoff, according to documents and e-mails disclosed by the Associated Press.

The fresh revelations about Reid could undermine the Democrats' efforts to make what they call the GOP's "culture of corruption" a major issue in this year's congressional elections.

"The fact that he is a leader in the Senate and is going to have to be the spokesman for these things, it does make it a little harder and he may have to back off," said John Fortier, a political scholar at the conservative American Enterprise Institute.

Reid stuck to his stance Friday that he has no need to return or donate to charity the $68,000 in legal contributions from Abramoff's Indian gaming clients and lobbying associates of Abramoff.

"That would suggest the tribes themselves have done something wrong," said Jim Manley, a Reid spokesman.

Reid has a long and proud history as a member of the Indian affairs committee, Manley said.

Like DeLay, Reid has denied using his office to benefit Abramoff clients.

DeLay donated to charity $15,000 received directly from Abramoff and his wife, but has not returned money received from Indian clients associated with Abramoff.

On Jan. 13, Reid wrote in an opinion piece in the Houston Chronicle, "Our nation's capital has been overrun by organized crime — Tom DeLay style. The gangsters are the lobbyists, cronies and lawmakers who have banded together and abused their power to serve their own interests."

Michael Connelly, a spokesman for DeLay, said the Texas Republican now feels sorry for Reid: "Hypocrisy comes at a high price, and it looks like the senator's bill has come due."

Republican political groups were swift to label Reid a hypocrite.

"It's time for Senator Reid to stop the charade, cut a $68,000 check, and pronounce his ethics crusade dead in the water," said Brian Nick, spokesman for the National Republican Senate Committee.

Abramoff and associate Michael Scanlon, a former DeLay aide, have pleaded guilty to defrauding the tribes of roughly $66 million and are cooperating in a federal investigation of corruption in Congress.

At least 32 times before 2005, an Abramoff Indian gaming client or associate donated to Reid's campaign or political funds.

In March 2002, Reid urged Interior Secretary. Gale Norton to reject efforts by the Jena band of Choctaw Indians in Louisiana to get a casino license. He wrote a related letter to Norton in April 2003 as Abramoff lobbied for a rival tribe, the Louisiana Coushattas.

An Abramoff lobbying team that worked with Democrats met with top Reid staff members more than 20 times in 2001 on issues critical to Abramoff clients, according to invoices of Abramoff's lobbying firm obtained from government officials. Shortly before and after at least one meeting, Abramoff's law firm and an Abramoff deputy sent checks to Reid's re-election committee.

michael.hedges@chron.com

Abramoff Pressed GSA Contact On Getting Land (WP)

By James V. Grimaldi And Susan Schmidt

DOJ_NMG_0014376

The Washington Post, February 11, 2006

Convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff had more extensive discussions than previously disclosed with a top General Services Administration official regarding federal property the lobbyist sought to acquire around the time the two men went on a $130,000 golf trip to Scotland in 2002, according to papers filed by prosecutors in federal court yesterday.

Former GSA chief of staff David H. Safavian is charged with obstructing justice in telling investigators that Abramoff was not seeking business with his agency at the time he went on the golf trip, which was paid for by Abramoff's Indian tribal clients.

In their filing, prosecutors produced e-mails showing that Abramoff engaged in an aggressive campaign to secure for himself and clients the use of GSA-controlled property, including the Old Post Office in downtown Washington. Among his efforts, Abramoff considered trying to get a provision backing the land acquisition added to a bill being managed by House Administration Committee Chairman Robert W. Ney (R-Ohio), who also went with Abramoff on the golf trip, which prosecutors have called "lavish."

In an e-mail sent to a colleague the day after Abramoff and Safavian returned to the United States on a private jet, Abramoff said: "Had good chats with David during the trip. He wants us to push hard on this project [Old Post Office] and he thinks we can get it."

Safavian's attorney, Barbara Van Gelder, said the case should be dismissed because Abramoff had no real business before the government at the time of the trip. Van Gelder said the new e-mails merely show that Abramoff was seeking information from Safavian, a longtime friend and former colleague.

E-mails filed in 85 pages of exhibits yesterday detail an extensive interaction between the two. "It will be up to the jury to decide the strength of the Government's evidence," prosecutors said in arguing against Van Gelder's request that the court throw out the case.

The e-mails show how Abramoff and members of his team were strategizing among themselves and with Safavian about how to acquire or lease part of 600 acres of the Naval Surface Warfare Center-White Oak in Montgomery County. Abramoff wanted the property for a Jewish school he operated. He also wanted to gain use of the Old Post Office for a tribal client. A key strategy involved getting members of Congress, at Safavian's suggestion, to press the GSA on the issue.

At one point, Abramoff asked a member of his lobbying team, Neil G. Volz, if he could get a provision inserted into an election-reform bill to advance the acquisition of the land. The bill was sponsored by Ney, Volz's former boss.

Former Christian Coalition leader Ralph Reed was also on the trip with Abramoff, Ney, and Ney's chief of staff, William Heaton. Ney, who reported to the House that the trip was paid for by a think tank, is under investigation for allegedly promising to add a provision to the same bill for an Indian tribe attempting to reopen a shuttered Texas casino.

"If we were to craft something oblique, any chance of slipping into the election reform bill?" Abramoff asked Volz. "I know we are loading that up, but I thought I'd ask." Volz replied by saying he wanted to call Safavian at home to discuss it.

Ney's spokesman said he would not comment on Abramoff's e-mail "regarding a hypothetical legislative provision" in the bill. "I fail to see how anything involving Jack Abramoff could be given any degree of credibility," Brian J. Walsh said.

An attorney for Volz did not return a call.

Safavian's lawyer said that she does not think Abramoff even met with Safavian on the day the e-mails were exchanged, as Abramoff asserted in his e-mails. Abramoff, she said, was not technically seeking to do business with GSA. "What Jack Abramoff was doing was getting information to seek to do business," she said.

The total cost of the Scotland trip, which was paid for by funds Abramoff obtained from his Indian tribe lobbying clients, was more than $130,000. Safavian, who had told ethics officers he would reimburse all costs but airfare, gave Abramoff a check for $3,100 to cover his share of expenses associated with the trip, prosecutors said.

Abramoff's Charity Began At Home (LAT)

By Chuck Neubauer And Richard B. Schmitt

The Los Angeles Times, February 11, 2006

The lobbyist admits he used nonprofits to evade taxes, pad his pockets and bribe officials.

DOJ_NMG_0014377

WASHINGTON — In his own way, disgraced super-lobbyist Jack Abramoff engaged in many charitable endeavors over the course of his decade-long career as a Washington insider.

There was the time he laundered money through a religious group's accounts to try to bribe a congressional aide. He diverted funds from a youth athletic foundation to bankroll a golf junket for a congressman and to bolster the bank account of his Washington restaurant. He used two other nonprofits to line his own pockets with millions of dollars defrauded from clients.

Charities are supposed to advance the public interest, which is why they aren't taxed. But Abramoff, by his own admission, used them to evade taxes, enrich himself and bribe public officials, according to a plea agreement he signed with federal prosecutors in January.

"One of the most disturbing elements of this whole sordid story is the blatant misuse of charities in a scheme to peddle political influence," said Mark Everson, the commissioner of the Internal Revenue Service.

Abramoff's use and misuse of nonprofits played a key role in each of the three counts of his indictment: conspiracy, mail fraud and tax evasion. He admitted evading $1.7 million in income taxes over three years, in part by using nonprofits to conceal personal income from the IRS.

The fast-growing ranks of tax-exempt, nonprofit organizations are tailor-made for operators like Abramoff.

The number of tax-exempt groups in the United States has tripled over the last three decades, but nonprofit groups usually pay no tax, so there is little incentive for the IRS to keep an eye on them.

The lack of oversight is especially meaningful in Washington, where trade associations, public-interest groups and grass-roots lobbying organizations all have tax-exempt status under generous IRS rules designed to foster public debate. Members of Congress are also getting into the act and forming their own charities.

Abramoff and a partner, Michael P.S. Scanlon, a onetime aide to former House Majority Leader Tom Delay (R-Texas), admitted bilking Indian tribes out of tens of millions of dollars and attempting to bribe public officials. They used a network of charities and other nonprofits — some existing, some they created — to forge a full-service influence-peddling operation.

They included:

The Capital Athletic Foundation, created by Abramoff as a sports-oriented youth charity. He funded it with millions improperly diverted from his lobbying clients and treated it as his "personal piggy bank," a lawmaker said, spending money on pet projects that had nothing to do with its stated purpose.

The American International Center, a bogus "international think tank" at a beach house near Rehoboth Beach, Del. Abramoff and Scanlon used the center to collect millions from their lobbying clients and then send it to their personal bank accounts.

Toward Tradition, a nonprofit in Mercer Island, Wash., that promotes "traditional Judeo Christian values" and was used to help Abramoff funnel an alleged $50,000 bribe of an aide to Delay.

The National Center for Public Policy Research in Washington, an obscure conservative organization that Abramoff used to defraud an Indian tribe and an offshore gaming alliance of more than $2 million for his and Scanlon's personal enrichment.

Abramoff's story is not just one of clever fraudsters, but of the seeming willingness of some donors and charities to look the other way. They say that they too are victims, although some experts question whether they were diligent enough.

Rabbi Daniel Lapin, the head of Toward Tradition, said he had no reason to be suspicious of a gift from an Abramoff client called eLottery, even though his organization is avowedly anti-gambling. Abramoff, a former board member of the group, was considered a trusted friend.

"Toward Tradition and I interact with thousands of individuals and hundreds of organizations every year," he said in a statement. "It is just unrealistic to suppose that none of these relationships are ever going to become problematic. There was no reason for Toward Tradition to spurn Jack Abramoff's support."

But some experts say that charities ask for trouble when they accept gifts with strings attached.

"The moment the donor appears to have a vested interest in who I hire and how I conduct my business ... I think I have an obligation to look into that," said Diana Aviv, the president and chief executive of Independent Sector, a Washington-based coalition that lobbies on behalf of nonprofit groups.

DOJ_NMG_0014378

The story of Abramoff's misuse of charities and nonprofits was pieced together from his plea agreement, nonprofit tax returns, interviews, and emails and other documents released by the Senate Indian Affairs Committee, as well as testimony from the committee's hearings on Abramoff.

The Senate Finance Committee is investigating Abramoff's use of charities and other tax-exempt organizations, and has requested detailed information from the Capital Athletic Foundation and the National Center for Public Policy Research

Abramoff, a Republican activist since college, became a lobbyist when the GOP captured control of Congress in 1994. He was good at his job. Among his early handiwork was helping to preserve tax breaks for the $20-billion-a-year Indian gaming industry, which bankrolls schools, hospitals and tourist attractions for the tribes.

By the new millennium, he was viewed as one of the most powerful and effective lobbyists in Washington. In January 2001, he moved his lobbying business to the new Washington office of the Greenberg Traurig law firm of Miami, which would become the base for an even more aggressive operation.

Abramoff, by then secretly partnering with Scanlon, aggressively recruited new Indian tribes as clients. In addition to paying lobbying fees to Greenberg, Abramoff persuaded the tribes to send millions to Scanlon's consulting firm, Capitol Campaign Strategies, which performed "grass roots and public relations work" for inflated fees.

Through that arrangement, according to their guilty pleas, the men secretly split some $40 million they stole from the tribes between 2001 and 2004.

Less than a year into his new job, Abramoff engineered his first major fraud involving a charity, converting a $1-million check that one of his new tribal clients, the Coushatta Tribe of Louisiana, had written to Greenberg for lobbying services.

He convinced his new partners at Greenberg Traurig that the Coushatta intended the money as a contribution to a charitable organization, the Capital Athletic Foundation. Abramoff had organized the group a few years earlier. The law firm forwarded the money.

But he told Scanlon he wanted the money to first go through Greenberg to pump up its lobbying revenues so it did not drop out of the ranks of the top 10 lobbying firms. The tribe believed that the money was being used for lobbying or political activities on its behalf. Scanlon sent the tribe a fraudulent $1-million invoice on behalf of Greenberg -- misspelling it "Greenburg" — for "public affairs services." Greenberg had not authorized the invoice; the Coushatta had not authorized giving the money to the Capital Athletic Foundation.

Abramoff had thus achieved an unusual twofer: He defrauded the tribe out of its money using the false Greenberg invoice, and then shook the money loose from Greenberg by telling his partners that it was a charitable donation from the Coushatta.

"In my personal view, this payment reveals the extent of Mr. Abramoff's shamelessness," David Sickey, a Coushatta tribal council member, told a Senate panel investigating Abramoff last fall.

Getting money from the Coushatta was "an absolute cake walk," Scanlon emailed Abramoff.

Greenberg Traurig fired Abramoff nearly two years ago after learning of "conduct we found unacceptable," the firm said in a statement. The firm said it is cooperating with investigators.

Abramoff's spokesman had no comment for this story. Scanlon's attorney did not respond to written questions.

The Coushatta check was the first of several large payments that Abramoff and Scanlon diverted from clients, often by laundering the sums through friendly charities. Abramoff used the $1 million as seed money for the athletic foundation, which he had formed in 1999 and was apparently his favorite "charity." It was established with the stated mission of funding sports programs in the Washington area. But tax records show that little money went for that purpose.

Soon after the Coushatta check was received, for example, Abramoff and a business associate discussed in emails depositing the $1 million in a Maryland bank headed by a friendly banker to help "grease" the way for obtaining a favorable bank reference letter for an oil-drilling venture in Israel. They deposited the money in the athletic foundation's account at the bank in November 2001, but it is not clear whether he got his letter or what happened to the oil deal.

In early 2002, the bank account grew when another tribal client — the Mississippi Choctaws — made the first of two $500,000 payments to the athletic foundation. Tribal leaders testified that they had been led to believe it would be "passed through" to other organizations that would support grass-roots projects to educate voters about Indian gaming issues.

DOJ_NMG_0014379

Around the time the first $500,000 was received in the foundation's bank account, $200,000 was transferred out of the account to Livsar Enterprises, the holding company that Abramoff had set up to establish Signatures, the high-end restaurant he was getting ready to open the following month in Washington, the Times learned.

An email exchange with his restaurant partner showed that Abramoff had been anxiously awaiting the Choctaw money as they scrambled to get the restaurant opened. The Choctaw money arrived on Jan. 3. His partner wrote that night that a banker "really saved us today" by transferring money from the athletic foundation to the restaurant account. Money was transferred back a few weeks later.

The restaurant became a centerpiece of Abramoff's lobbying operation, where he wined and dined congressmen and their staffs as part of his acknowledged bribery schemes.

The athletic foundation gave Abramoff an aura of respectability around town. He once persuaded Washington Redskins owner Dan Snyder to lend his name to a fundraiser for the foundation, although the benefit never took place.

The athletic foundation also gave Abramoff access to millions for his pet causes, many of which dovetailed with his orthodox Jewish beliefs. The biggest beneficiary was Eshkol Academy, an Orthodox Jewish boys school he founded in Columbia, Md., which at least one of his sons attended. The foundation also sent $100,000 to an Israeli settler who ran a sniper training workshop for militant Jews.

Abramoff has admitted that he used the foundation to pay the $166,000 cost of a trip to play the storied St. Andrew's golf course in Scotland, which included Rep. Bob Ney (R-Ohio), two top aides and others.

Abramoff admitted in his plea agreement that the trip was part of a bribery scheme intended to offer "things of value" to Ney and his staff in exchange for a series of official acts. Ney, who has denied any wrongdoing, is under federal investigation.

Abramoff also acknowledged that in raising money toward the golf outing, he defrauded two clients that thought they were donating to an athletic foundation. He obtained $25,000 apiece from the Saginaw Chippewa Indian Tribe and SPI Spirits Group, the manufacturer of Stolichnaya vodka. Officials of the Chippewa tribe have said they made the donation because Abramoff told them it would impress DeLay.

There is no indication that DeLay knew his name was being used this way.

"The congressman would never allow his name to be used for nefarious purposes as is the case here," said Delay spokeswoman Shannon Flaherty.

Abramoff told a fellow lobbyist at Greenberg Traurig Tony Rudy, in an email that the athletic foundation was "a foundation doing some issues education." But another lobbyist at the firm, Todd Boulanger, suspected something was awry.

Asked by Rudy to help raise funds from the Chippewa, Boulanger responded in an email, "I'm sensing shadiness."

Rudy, a top aide to DeLay before going to work for Abramoff, figured in an earlier chapter of the lobbyist's saga.

It involved another node in Abramoff's network of nonprofits: Toward Tradition, the Judeo Christian group that supports "a moral public culture," according to its Web site.

In 2000, Abramoff got lobbying clients to give Toward Tradition $50,000 and he set the condition that it be used to hire Rudy's wife, when Rudy was on DeLay's staff. She was hired to organize a Washington political conference the nonprofit was planning.

Abramoff admitted in his plea bargain that the payment was intended to bribe the DeLay aide to help block legislative restrictions on internet gambling and increases in postal rates. The money came from eLottery, an internet lottery firm, and the Magazine Publishers Assn. The proposed internet restrictions were voted down, and the rate increases were slowed.

Both organizations said they didn't know what the money would ultimately be used for. They said the contributions were made at the direction of Abramoff and his lieutenants in the hope of burnishing the clients' images among conservatives in power in Washington.

Rudy did not respond to several requests for comment.

For all the money that was coursing through his operation, Abramoff seemed under constant financial stress because of the drain from his school and restaurant.

Moreover, some of his tribal clients were starting to balk at his stiff fees. But he managed to tide himself over, and nonprofits were once again the vehicle.

One was the National Center for Public Policy Research, a small conservative Washington think tank on whose board Abramoff had sat for years. It was run by his old friend Amy Ridenour.

"I completely trusted Jack," Ridenour told the Senate Indian Affairs Committee investigating Abramoff in June. She told them she now believes he lied to her and defrauded her organization and the tribe.

Abramoff used the group as a money laundromat.

In 2002, he had the Choctaws write a $1-million check to the center, purportedly to educate the public on the benefits of Indian gaming. He convinced Ridenour that the tribe wanted to donate $450,000 to the athletic foundation and pay $500,000 to Capitol Campaign Strategies, Scanlon's consulting firm, for the educational work. The final $50,000 would go to a businessman to run the program.

She later learned the $50,000 paid a personal debt of Abramoff's. She also said she hadn't realized Scanlon was sharing his fees with Abramoff, or that the tribe had not authorized the payment to the foundation.

At a hearing in June, Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) accused Abramoff and Scanlon of profiting by $1 million in this deal and committing what "appears to be a $1-million fraud."

In 2003, Abramoff used the center again to convert $1.25 million from an offshore gambling client to a company called Kaygold, which turned out to be his personal holding company. It operated from his home and had no other employees.

Meanwhile, Scanlon turned to the "global think tank" he had set up in 2001, the American International Center, a nonprofit based near a vacation home he owned on the Delaware shore and which had no discernible assets or expertise. McCain called it a "gigantic scam."

Scanlon and Abramoff had convinced the Coushatta that their profitable central Louisiana casino was endangered by competition from another tribe and the possibility that Texas would legalize casino gambling.

On April 9, 2003, the Coushattas paid the American International Center $2.3 million for political and grass-roots work. Four days later, Scanlon transferred $1.3 million to his consulting firm and $991,000 to Kaygold. Scanlon spent all but $15,000 of his share for work on his home and other personal expenses.

"Where it went after that, the committee cannot yet say," McCain said at the Indian Affairs Committee hearing in November. "What it can say, however, is that the Coushatta apparently received little of the intended benefits for the vast sums it paid."

Later in 2003, a tiny Alexandria, La., newspaper, the Town Talk, revealed that the Coushattas had paid Scanlon's company $13.7 million for public relations work, a grossly inflated sum. Members of the tribe began to suspect they had been duped.

In early 2004, the Washington Post revealed more details of the fraud, including the fact that four tribal clients had paid a staggering $31 million to Scanlon's company at Abramoff's recommendation, triggering the Senate investigation.

Last month, Abramoff pleaded guilty and agreed to cooperate in a wide-ranging corruption probe of members of Congress and their staffs. He faces nine to 11 years in prison and penalties totaling $26.7 million.

Scanlon, who pleaded guilty in November to conspiring to defraud the Indian tribes and to bribe public officials, also is cooperating with investigators.

Abramoff's charities are dormant. His restaurant business is closed. His Jewish academy has shut down and is being sued by its former teachers for back pay.

Reform Trend May Curb Casino Plans (MJS)

By STEVE SCHULTZE

Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, February 11, 2006

New gaming venues unlikely to open soon, experts say

A reform movement taking hold in Congress on the heels of a lobbying scandal and concern over tribal casino proliferation could hurt the odds for off-reservation casino plans for Kenosha, Beloit and Shullsburg.

Backers of those deals remain committed to pushing for casino approval decisions by the U.S. Bureau of Indian Affairs and say their deals should be exempt from any potential changes in the federal law governing off-reservation casinos.

DOJ_NMG_0014381

But congressional concern over disgraced Washington, D.C., lobbyist Jack Abramoff, who has pleaded guilty to bilking millions of dollars from his tribal clients, and efforts to curb new off-reservation casinos create more uncertainty about the Wisconsin deals.

"I don't think the climate is going to support any expanded gaming efforts by tribes," said Bruce Greene, a Boulder, Colo.-based Indian law expert.

Eric Eberhard, a Seattle lawyer with an extensive tribal gaming practice, said approval of any off-reservation casinos is unlikely for the next three years. Such plans have languished under President Bush, he said.

The lobbying scandal only makes things worse for such deals, Eberhard said.

At stake here are three longstanding off-reservation casino proposals by four tribes: the Menominee tribe's $808 million casino development for Kenosha; a joint proposal by the Bad River and St. Croix Chippewa bands for a $200 million casino in Beloit; and the Lac du Flambeau Chippewa tribe's application for a $110 million casino in Shullsburg, in southwestern Wisconsin.

Greene said the Abramoff scandal has heightened concern over tribal casinos, now a $19 billion-a-year industry. The Abramoff case was a lobbying scandal, however, not a casino scandal, said Greene, who doesn't represent any Wisconsin tribes. Abramoff was charged with diverting millions of dollars in fees from tribes in Louisiana and Michigan intent on preserving local casino monopolies.

Greene disagrees with critics who say rules are too loose on new off-reservation casinos. Greene also opposes efforts by U.S. Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) to clamp a moratorium on siting additional gambling parlors away from traditional reservations and impose tougher federal oversight.

McCain, chairman of the Senate Indian Affairs Committee, introduced a measure late last year that would amend the 1988 Indian Gaming Regulatory Act, a groundbreaking measure that spelled out authority for tribal casinos. Rep. Mike Rogers (R-Mich.) introduced a bill last month to impose a two-year moratorium on any new tribal casinos. Another casino reform measure is expected from Rep. Richard Pombo (R-Calif.).

McCain's proposal will likely inhibit federal action on pending casino plans, Greene said, "and it's already a god-awful ridiculously slow process."

In addition to the federal approval, the off-reservation deals also need concurrence by Gov. Jim Doyle, who has not said how he would act.

The Wisconsin off-reservation casino proposals are literally years in the making. The Menominee plan, by far the most ambitious, envisions a destination casino and conference center at the site of the Dairyland Greyhound Park racetrack.

It would be unfair to change the rules for the Menominee casino plan and others that have already been developed, said Evan Zeppos, a spokesman for the Menominee tribe.

The existing rules have worked well, requiring extensive public review and local support, he said. Only three off-reservation casinos nationally have gone through all required approvals since 1988, demonstrating the current law has not permitted a proliferation of off-reservation casinos, he said.

One of those three was the Forest County Potawatomi's Milwaukee casino, the state's most lucrative venue. Tribes in Washington state and Michigan also have won federal and state approvals for off-reservation casinos.

About 10 proposed off-reservation deals utilizing the same federal-state approval process are pending, including the three from Wisconsin, said George Skibine, the Bureau of Indian Affairs official in charge of reviewing the plans. A similar number of casino plans for tribes seeking federal recognition or restoration of tribal status also have been proposed.

Skibine said he didn't think the current political atmosphere changed how his agency looked at formally submitted off-reservation plans. "We just implement the law that's on the books now," Skibine said.

The Menominee tribe opposes the McCain bill unless it's amended to permit plans already submitted to the Bureau of Indian Affairs to proceed.

"Maybe it should be called the 'Jack Abramoff Act,' " Zeppos said of the McCain legislation, because it would accomplish what Abramoff sought for his tribal clients. "It eliminates all the competition for those big, rich tribes."

DOJ_NMG_0014382

The Menominee and Potawatomi tribes have clashed over the Kenosha proposal, with the Potawatomi arguing that it would unfairly cut into its business.

The tribes also part company on the need for casino reforms, with the Potawatomi tribe backing at least the stated intent of some of McCain's efforts.

"We like the direction Sen. McCain is heading," said Potawatomi tribal attorney Jeff Crawford. The Potawatomi would like to add requirements to the law of firm historic tribal ties to a proposed casino site, as well as greater scrutiny of casino developers.

Without such safeguards, casino location decisions are purely market-driven, Crawford said. The Potawatomi have criticized the Menominee plan, saying too much money from a Kenosha casino would be diverted to two key backers - non-Indian Kenosha businessman Dennis Troha and the Connecticut-based Mohegan tribe.

Troha and his family members have donated some $240,000 to Doyle or to Democratic soft money accounts that could be used for Doyle. Doyle's campaign also received $20,000 last year from people with ties to the Mohegans.

Joe Hunt, a spokesman for the Beloit casino project, also said it would be unfair for new laws to block that casino plan. The McCain bill "basically takes six years of work and tosses it out the window," he said.

The Bad River and St. Croix bands, both located in northwestern Wisconsin, aren't "reservation shopping" by seeking a casino site in Beloit because that community invited them, Hunt said.

"Neither Bad River nor St. Croix tribe is connected in any way to any Abramoff contribution anywhere - just so you know," Hunt said.

Lac du Flambeau tribal President Vicki Doud said in a statement that McCain's legislation would add additional unneeded obstacles to its Shullsburg plan.

"This continuous onslaught of our rights under Indian Gaming Regulatory Act is turning tribes into victims as opposed to the intended beneficiaries," Doud said.

A longstanding lawsuit by the owners of Dairyland Greyhound Park seeking to roll back casino gambling in Wisconsin also could impinge on the off-reservation casino plans. The suit says that a 1993 state constitutional amendment limiting gambling expansions should have prevented state-tribal agreements allowing casino games.

A decision in the case by the state Supreme Court is expected this year.

Executive Severance Is A Focus At Getty (NYT)

By Randy Kennedy And Carol Vogel

The New York Times, February 11, 2006

Amid a broad state inquiry into the finances of the J. Paul Getty Trust in Los Angeles, the nation's third-largest private foundation, questions are being raised about whether excessive severance packages were paid to two senior executives who resigned recently, former Getty officials with knowledge of the trust's finances said yesterday.

One of the executives, Deborah Gribbon — who left in the fall of 2004 as director of the Getty Museum after disputes with the trust's president, Barry Munitz — was paid $3 million on her resignation, almost nine times her base salary of $350,000, two former Getty officials said. The other executive, Jill Murphy, who served as Mr. Munitz's chief of staff, was paid $250,000 in severance when she agreed to leave late last year.

Information about the payments came to light a day after Mr. Munitz resigned as the trust's president and chief executive amid questions about his leadership and possible abuse of expenses and perks. The California attorney general's office is conducting a wide-ranging investigation into the trust's finances and into Mr. Munitz's actions.

The severance packages could prove troubling to the Getty because such payments might violate federal tax laws governing spending by nonprofit foundations, which specify that they must use their resources for the public good.

In December, the Council on Foundations, which represents more than 2,000 grant-making foundations and corporations, placed the Getty on probation as questions about its spending became public and the trust did not cooperate fully with an inquiry begun by the council. The council, which can censure or eject members, said it was looking into whether trust officials had used the trust's money for personal benefit; into a land deal between the trust and Eli Broad, a billionaire financier who is a friend of Mr. Munitz's; and into whether there was "inappropriate compensation for the foundation's C.E.O. and potential self-dealing."

DOJ_NMG_0014383

The council has the power to look not only into Mr. Munitz's actions as the head of the trust but also into those of its other officials and of its entire board, which now has 14 members.

"Foundations are clearly in an era of public scrutiny because we are growing in size and service, and in public awareness," said Steve Gunderson, the council's president, who would not comment on the inquiry. Of Mr. Munitz's resignation, he said yesterday, "It sends a signal to this sector to take steps to police itself."

The Getty Trust announced on Thursday that Mr. Munitz, who had led the trust, one of the world's richest art organizations, for eight years, agreed to resign without a severance package and had also agreed to pay $250,000 to resolve "any continuing disputes" that the trust's board might have with him.

The board did not explain the nature of any disputes, but trust officials said that some of his expenses, perks and other costs should not have been charged to the trust. Mr. Munitz, one of the most highly paid nonprofit foundation presidents in the country, received an annual salary, benefits and perks worth more than $1 million.

According to former Getty employees, Ms. Murphy was given tremendous power by Mr. Munitz, who traveled frequently and was said to be disengaged from the trust's day-to-day activities for long periods. The former employees complained that she was difficult to deal with and impeded important decisions involving the museum and the trust's other arms: research, grant-making and conservation. Ms. Murphy did not return phone calls yesterday seeking comment.

For the last several months, the Getty has been under siege on several fronts. Its former antiquities curator, Marion True, is on trial in Italy on charges of trafficking in looted antiquities. She resigned last October amid questions about possible improprieties involving a real estate deal.

On Thursday, another former Getty employee with knowledge of the attorney general's inquiry said that investigators were looking into several instances in which Mr. Munitz had authorized grants or uses of the trust's money without obtaining proper approval. In some cases, the former employee said, the money was spent on pet projects of Mr. Munitz's, at least one involving chess, that had very little to do with the Getty's mission.

In interviews, Mr. Munitz has defended his actions and his spending, saying that his job required him to court powerful collectors and donors around the world. He has also stressed that the trust's board had approved all his expenses, including first-class air travel, stays at five-star hotels and a leased Porsche Cayenne.

Ms. Gribbon, who declined to comment when reached by phone yesterday, repeatedly clashed with Mr. Munitz after being named director of the museum in 2000, current and past employees have said. They said she became deeply frustrated that she was unable to make decisions about the museum's direction without Mr. Munitz's approval.

She became so unhappy, some former employees said, that she tried to persuade board members not to renew Mr. Munitz's contract when it was up for renewal in December 2003. But the board stood by Mr. Munitz. Three years remained on his contract when he resigned Thursday.

Getty Foundation Chief Resigns Amid Investigations (WP)

By Sonya Geis

The Washington Post, February 11, 2006

LOS ANGELES, Feb. 10 -- The head of the J. Paul Getty Trust, one of the nation's richest foundations, has abruptly resigned amid news of investigations into his spending of foundation money on international travel and luxury items.

The California attorney general's office, an internal committee organized by the Getty, and the Council on Foundations in Washington have all been investigating Barry Munitz, trust president and chief executive, who resigned on Thursday.

The Getty board of trustees said in a statement that Munitz will not receive a severance package and will pay $250,000 to the foundation "in order to resolve any continuing disputes with him."

Munitz's resignation is the latest in a series of high-profile blows to the $7 billion foundation, the third-largest in the nation, which oversees the gleaming white marble J. Paul Getty Museum in the Brentwood area of Los Angeles. Last year, Getty Museum antiquities curator Marion True was indicted in Italy on charges of trafficking in stolen art. She resigned in October after reports surfaced of an improper real estate deal. A number of high-level administrators have also left the Getty Museum in the past three years citing differences with Munitz.

DOJ_NMG_0014384

In June, Munitz's spending came under scrutiny when the Los Angeles Times reported that he used Getty money to buy a $72,000 Porsche, fly first-class overseas with his wife, and stay in hotels charging $1,000 a night. He was also accused of seeking an increase in his pay, which was $1.2 million, while instituting budget cuts in the flagship Getty Museum. At the time, he acknowledged spending freely on travel and said the board of trustees had authorized all of his activities. In a letter to the board announcing his resignation, Munitz said: "I'm taking this action, after lengthy consideration, so both the institution and I can move forward."

The state attorney general's office opened an investigation of the trust in August. The Getty hired a prominent Los Angeles lawyer to investigate both Munitz's spending and charges that some of the Italian artworks owned by the Getty Museum are stolen pieces. Both investigations will look at a 2002 real estate deal that Munitz made with billionaire philanthropist Eli Broad.

The Council on Foundations is also conducting an investigation related to the sale of Getty property, Munitz's spending and compensation, and potential self-dealing. In December, the Council placed the Getty on probation over its failure to provide documents in a timely manner.

Edward Goldman, art critic for Los Angeles public radio station KCRW, blamed the accumulation of the Getty's troubles on an institutional culture that lacks transparency. "They are trying to build up a reputation as a scholarly museum," he said. "At same time, when something goes wrong, they act like a corporation. They hide behind barriers."

Munitz has overseen the trust since 1997, when he was hired days before the opening of a hilltop campus for the museum, library and art conservation offices. The museum's old home, the Getty Villa in Malibu, reopened last month, after $275 million in renovations, as a site for Greek and Roman art.

Munitz Steps Down As Head Of Getty Trust (LAT)

By Jason Felch, Ralph Frammolino And Robin Fields, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, February 11, 2006

After criticism for lavish spending, the chief agrees to pay $250,000 and forfeit severance pay and benefits. He admits no wrongdoing.

Barry Munitz abruptly ended his controversial eight-year tenure as head of the J. Paul Getty Trust on Thursday, agreeing to resolve "any continuing disputes" by paying the Getty $250,000 and giving up severance pay and benefits that would have exceeded $1.2 million.

Munitz admitted no wrongdoing, and the trust did not specify the issues underlying his resignation. But the decision came after more than a year of relentless controversy at the Getty, much of which has centered on Munitz's leadership.

The Times reported in June that he had lavishly spent Getty funds on first-class international travel with his wife, approved grants to friends and associates, and lobbied for a raise while he ordered budget cuts and layoffs. The report triggered a continuing investigation by the state attorney general into whether Munitz's actions compromised the Getty's nonprofit status.

The resignation marked a stunning downfall for a man who brought extensive business and academic experience to the world's richest art institution, not to mention a bevy of friendships with Los Angeles' power elite. An advisor to Govs. Pete Wilson and Gray Davis and former head of the California State University system, Munitz counted billionaire Eli Broad and former Paramount Studios chief Sherry Lansing as close friends.

Late in 1997, he moved from Cal State to the trust, which includes the nation's third-richest private foundation, days before the opening of the Getty Center.

His departure came after more than three months of steadily increasing pressure. In late October, the Getty board announced that it had hired Los Angeles attorney Ronald L. Olson to conduct an independent review of the trust's operations. Olson's investigation would examine Munitz's spending as well as charges by Italian authorities that many of the Getty's prized antiquities had been looted from that country.

At the time, the Getty board chairman, John Biggs, issued a statement saying Olson's investigation was intended to ensure that "the board and each of its members and employees meets all legal requirements as well as the highest ethical standards."

DOJ_NMG_0014385

The board discussed Olson's findings at a meeting this past weekend. Biggs said Thursday that Munitz had suggested resigning a couple of weeks ago but "made a firm decision during the early part of this week."

Since then, Munitz had been negotiating with the board over "a severance arrangement that was satisfactory," Biggs said.

Under the terms of his contract, Munitz would have been entitled to a lump-sum payment equal to two years' worth of salary and benefits if he had resigned because he had been forced to take a pay cut, accept a lesser title or have his job definition changed without his consent.

But he would have received nothing if he left without reason. In the end, Biggs said, Munitz "voluntarily terminated without cause" and didn't ask for a buyout, "although I'm sure he would have liked to have had it if we offered."

Munitz, 64, did not return calls asking for comment. In the Getty's statement, he is quoted as saying, "I'm taking this action, after lengthy consideration, so both the institution and I can move forward."

Biggs would not comment on whether the departure related to the committee's findings but said the $250,000 payment by Munitz was a "ballpark" figure to cover "disputed items" that are part of the attorney general's review.

In return, Biggs said, the board agreed not to seek any other restitution for expenditures it believed were inappropriate. Munitz admitted no wrongdoing in connection with the payment.

"We're not going to go back and say there was any travel expense that he has to reimburse us for," Biggs said. "He's given us $250,000 and that, as far as we're concerned, takes care of it."

Munitz's departure was welcomed by many former Getty officials, some of whom left the trust over differences with his administration.

"Barry did the right thing. So did the trustees, who have obviously learned a lot," said John Walsh, who directed the Getty Museum from 1983 to 2000. "Now they need a president who cares about what the Getty does and understands its potential."

Walsh's successor, Deborah Gribbon, who in 2004 quit one of the most sought-after museum jobs in the country because of differences with Munitz, declined to comment.

"I'm sad for Barry," said Stephen Rountree, who worked as a high-ranking administrator at the Getty for more than 20 years before leaving in January 2003 to become president and chief executive of the Music Center of Los Angeles County.

Munitz "had many skills in terms of relationships with the board and a lot of creative ideas about wider partnerships between the Getty and institutions in Europe and in this country," Rountree said. But he added, "I think he's wise to have moved on…. We really need the Getty to be functioning without all these distractions."

Vocal Munitz critic Barbara Whitney said, "I cannot begin to imagine how happy and relieved the thousand people who work there are." In August 2004 she left her post as the Getty's associate director for administration and public affairs.

"There has been a lot of damage done, and I have a lot of confidence in people who work in that organization and hope that they'll not be so worn down," she said.

Munitz was controversial from the start. He arrived days before the opening of the Getty Center in 1997 and almost immediately announced major changes, eliminating two of the trust's seven programs and folding a third into the museum.

The shake-up embittered many longtime Getty employees. But many observers said it also focused the Getty on its strengths: the Getty Museum, with its antiquities and collection of pre-modern art; the Getty Research Institute; and the Getty Conservation Institute, widely respected for restoring art worldwide. Munitz also ramped up grant-giving by the Getty Foundation.

The overall thrust, Munitz said, was to "bring the Getty down the hill" by making it more accessible to the average citizen while instilling "a sense of economic reality" in the wealthy art institution.

Yet Munitz's own travel and executive expenses became more extravagant. He used Getty money to buy a $72,000 Porsche Cayenne, repeatedly flew first-class, stayed in $1,000-a-night hotels and had his assistants express-mail umbrellas when he traveled.

Under the tax code, nonprofits must use their resources for the public good. The Internal Revenue Service considers excessive pay, travel and perks to be "self-dealing": the illegal use of tax-exempt resources for private benefit.

While the line blurred between professional and personal expenses, Munitz also spent long stretches away from the Getty. In his absence, he delegated much of the day-to-day management to his chief of staff, Jill Murphy, a former waitress whom Munitz met at a Sacramento restaurant.

DOJ_NMG_0014386

She became the focus of bitterness and frustration among Getty veterans, who resented her no-nonsense style, youth and lack of an arts background.

Staff discontent boiled over in October 2004, when Gribbon quit over her differences with Munitz.

After The Times wrote about Munitz's free-spending ways, Sen. Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa), chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, denounced the Getty board for "spending more time watching old episodes of 'Lifestyles of the Rich and Famous' than doing its job of protecting Getty's assets for charitable purposes."

The board has appointed Deborah Marrow, director of the Getty Foundation, to serve as interim president while it searches for a replacement for Munitz.

Times staff writers Christopher Reynolds and Mike Boehm contributed to this report.

Another Getty Milestone (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 11, 2006

WHEN BARRY MUNITZ abruptly resigned on Thursday as head of the J. Paul Getty Trust, he said he hoped the breakup would let him and the nation's richest art institution "move forward." He got that half right. The change is critical to the Getty's progress, but Munitz himself was already moving freely and comfortably (if not forward) during his eight years as president and CEO of the Getty — jetting to and fro in the first-class cabin, on the deck of a rented yacht or behind the wheel of his company car, a Porsche SUV. The Getty board vigorously defended Munitz last year, but his lavish pay, perks and expenses drew an investigation by the California attorney general and rebukes from the chairman of the U.S. Senate Finance Committee.

The terms of Munitz's resignation — the third in a series of notable departures, following embattled antiquities head Marion True and board member Barbara Fleischman — suggest that the trustees may be getting serious about rebuilding the institute's reputation. Munitz not only won't collect at least $1.2 million in severance benefits that his contract promised, he'll pay the Getty about $250,000 to cover any lingering disputes. That's not a golden parachute, it's a kick out the door.

But ridding the Getty of Munitz is really just the start for the board. The trustees still must resolve accusations from foreign authorities about looted antiquities. They have to find a president who can restore the institution's integrity and morale while cultivating innovative leadership throughout the Getty, rather than accreting power and weeding out perceived enemies. And they must bring executive pay and perks back into line with the amounts paid by most nonprofit institutions.

The cloud of scandal hasn't dimmed the Getty's popularity. Reservations for the Getty Villa in Malibu, which reopened last month after a nine-year, $275-million renovation, are booked through July.

Instead, its effect has been on the Getty's image and, to some degree, on that of other museums and foundations across the country. Disclosures about Munitz's extravagant perks could have led the public to believe that charitable donations and subsidies are routinely used to pamper executives. That's one of the reasons the board's initial defense of Munitz last year was so troubling; in many ways, more than just the Getty's reputation was at stake. The Washington-based Council on Foundations, an association for philanthropies, placed the Getty on probation late last year in part to show that the institute's practices were atypical.

The trustees' support for Munitz ultimately evaporated in the face of a review by a law firm the board hired in October to address the attorney general's probe, the antiquities disputes and other controversies. The lawyers can help the institution get past those issues, allowing new museum director Michael Brand to focus on collecting and displaying art. It's the board's responsibility, however, to restore the public's faith that the Getty is using its vast resources for the public good.

U.S. Ambassador Hands Over Looted Art (MH)

By Stephen Graham

The Miami Herald, February 11, 2006

BERLIN - The United States returned three paintings stolen at the end of World War II to the mayor of the western German town that owned them.

U.S. Ambassador William Timken handed over the 19th-century works by Heinrich Buerkel to the mayor of Pirmasens at a ceremony Friday in Berlin.

DOJ_NMG_0014387

Officials say the three paintings, now valued at $125,000, were among works believed stolen on March 22, 1945, as U.S. forces pushed into Germany. They were recovered after they turned up in an auction in the United States last year.

"I am a strong believer that rightful owners of property should have their property," Timken said at a ceremony at the Amerika Haus U.S. cultural center. "They're your possessions."

Pirmasens Mayor Bernhard Matheis invited Timken to his town for next year's opening of a new building housing Buerkel's work. "It's an extraordinarily big day for Pirmasens," said Matheis. "These are very important paintings for our collection."

He said the works "symbolize and reflect a big part of our history" as well as good contemporary U.S.-German relations.

The museum moved the paintings to a school in 1942 to protect them from Allied bombing. On Sept. 19, 1945, the museum reported that about 50 paintings stored in the school's air-raid shelter had been lost "during the arrival of the American troops" six months earlier.

Timken said the town had been occupied at the end of the war by troops from the U.S. 66th Infantry Reserves and the 71st Infantry Division. However, Robert Wittman, an FBI agent who helped return the works, said it was impossible to say whether U.S. soldiers took the pictures.

According to the FBI, the three paintings were acquired by a New Jersey resident about 20 years after the war, and handed down to his daughter in the late 1980s. In October, the paintings were offered for sale by auctioneer William H. Bunch Auctions & Appraisals of Chadds Ford, Pa. German officials alerted the FBI after museum staff noticed that the paintings were up for sale.

The paintings are "Amalfi Cave," from about 1845; "After the Hunt," about 1830; and "The Horse Roundup," about 1861-63. They all depict outdoor scenes of rural life.

"Once the family found out they were stolen, they felt they had a moral obligation to return them," Wittman said after Friday's ceremony.He said the family, who have asked to remain anonymous, had received no payment for parting with the works.

German authorities gave the family a high-quality reproduction of their favorite, "Amalfi Cave," to replace the original that had hung in the family kitchen, Wittman said.

The issue of looted German art was last in the spotlight in the early 1990s, when two Texan residents were exposed trying to sell medieval treasures apparently looted by their brother, Army Lt. Joe T. Meador.

The works, including the "Samuhel Gospels," a ninth-century manuscript written in gold and a 16th-century prayer book, were returned to the town of Quedlinburg after the Meadors accepted a settlement worth about $2.75 million.

Inmate Charged In Slayings Of 2 Who Identified Him In '81 Robbery (COLDISP)

By Kevin Mayhood, THE COLUMBUS DISPATCH

Columbus Dispatch, February 10, 2006

A Columbus man used a gun to take revenge on two witnesses who helped send him to federal prison, authorities say.

Thomas A. Henderson, 55, now faces two charges and the possibility of the death penalty.

Henderson was indicted in federal court yesterday for the 1996 killing of Robert Earl Bass outside his Pickerington apartment and the 1998 death of Ecolia Washington outside her North Side home.

Both were shot early in the morning in their cars.

"This was just strictly retaliation on his part for the long sentence he served," said Columbus Police Sgt. Jeff Sacksteder, head of the coldcase squad.

Sacksteder said that Columbus police investigator Dennis Graul and FBI Special Agent Tim Creedon had worked on the case since 2003 and had put together the evidence for yesterday's indictment. He wouldn't offer other details.

Henderson is serving 20 years in the Elkton federal prison in Columbiana County. That incarceration is in connection with his guilty plea to 15 drug, money-laundering and firearms charges in 2002.

Authorities say the deaths in the 1990s occurred after Washington and Bass fingered Henderson in a 1981 bank robbery.

That year, Washington drove with Henderson from Columbus to visit Bass, who was in jail in Dade County, Fla. Along the way, they robbed a bank in Macon, Ga.

Henderson returned to Columbus with more than $100,000, according to news reports of the robbery.

DOJ_NMG_0014388

Police interviewed both Washington and Bass. Bass tied Henderson to the robbery; Washington, who was charged with helping with the robbery, ended up testifying against him.

Henderson was sentenced to 15 years in prison for it.

While in federal prison in Terre Haute, Ind., he was brought to Columbus on three counts of aggravated murder.

A former cellmate had told authorities that Henderson admitted fatally shooting three Columbus men: Anthony Hawkins, 24, during a dispute at Agler Road and Joyce Avenue in 1978; and Robert Catchings, 49, and Donald Beauford, 40, in Catchings' Richmond Avenue apartment in 1981.

In September 1982, Henderson pleaded guilty to voluntary manslaughter in the death of Hawkins. But Assistant Franklin County Prosecutor Patrick Sheeran dropped the other charges because he had no physical evidence or eyewitnesses.

Henderson was sentenced to seven to 25 years for the death, with the sentence running concurrently to the bank robbery term.

Sheeran, now a Common Pleas judge, wrote the parole authorities in 1982, asking that they keep Henderson in prison for at least 20 years.

"We all consider him extremely dangerous," he said at the time.

Henderson was released in 1995. Authorities say he then targeted the two people who had helped put him in prison.

Bass was 47 when he was found dead in his car outside 1665 Whitney Circle at about 1 a.m. Nov. 4, 1996. He had been shot in the back of the head.

Police had a number of suspects. Bass had provided information to prosecutors in the Lucasville prison riot trials, as well as against Henderson.

An East Side man briefly was charged with Bass's death in 1997 but released after police found evidence that contradicted a witness.

On Nov. 4, 1998, firefighters were called to a burning van across the street from 2148 Avalon Place. Washington's badly burned body was found inside. She'd been shot repeatedly from close range.

Sacksteder said police long suspected that Henderson had killed the pair, but "we just couldn't get the dots connected."

Henderson is charged with two counts of killing a witness and two counts of using a firearm in a crime.

If convicted, he could be sentenced to life in prison without parole or the death penalty. U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales will decide whether prosecutors will pursue death.

Ex-Chinese Bank Managers, Wives Plead Not Guilty In Las Vegas (FINDLAW/AP)

By Ken Ritter, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 11, 2006

(AP) - LAS VEGAS-Two former Bank of China managers and their wives pleaded not guilty Friday to charges they embezzled $485 million (â,¬405 million) in China and tried to launder the money in Hong Kong, Canada and the United States.

Through interpreters and their lawyers, former bankers Xu Guojun, 47, and Xu Chaofan, 40, and their wives, Yu Ying Yi, 43, and, Kuang Wan Fang, 39, each pleaded not guilty to racketeering conspiracy, money laundering and transporting stolen money, plus visa and passport fraud. If convicted of all charges, each faces a maximum of 70 years in prison and a $1.5 million (â,¬1.25 million) fine.

Citing "new, far more wide-ranging charges" contained in a Jan. 31 superseding indictment, U.S. District Magistrate Judge Lawrence Leavitt canceled a trial scheduled later this month and set a March 27 trial date. But he said that likely will be changed due to the case's complexity.

Defense lawyer Lawrence Litman of Las Vegas, representing Fang, said outside court that the RICO and money laundering conspiracy allegations set the scene for federal prosecutors to have to prove the Chinese defendants committed crimes abroad.

"We're actually going to have a trial here about whether money was stolen in China, because that's the basis for all the charges," Litman said. "If they were convicted in China and then came here with the money, that would be different."

Fang's brother, Kwong Wa Po, 42, who also is named in the 15-count indictment remained a fugitive Friday. If convicted of all charges, he would face 40 years in prison and a $750,000 (â,¬626,566) fine.

DOJ_NMG_0014389

The four defendants, in shackles and jail uniforms, said they understood the charges against them, and each pleaded not guilty. They remain jailed following their arrests more than a year ago on a Sept. 21, 2004, indictment alleging they entered the United States using false identities and staged fake marriages with naturalized U.S. citizens.

Defense lawyers Mitchell Posin, representing Xu Chaofan, and Bret Whipple, representing Xu Guojun, have characterized their clients as pawns in a new era of U.S.-Chinese legal cooperation. They say they'll challenge efforts to hold the two men to U.S. banking standards and laws.

"We're also going to be challenging the reliability of any of the information coming out of China," Posin said. "We have rules and regulations. In China, there's always the danger that anything coming out is coming from the government."

Lawyer Travis Shetler, representing Yi, declined immediate comment.

The indictment alleges that Xu Guojun and his wife, Yi, and Xu Chaofan and his wife, Fang, were part of a racketeering and money laundering conspiracy dating to 1998.

They are accused of trying to launder more than $3 million (â,¬2.5 million) in Las Vegas by making deposits at four casinos, which can operate somewhat like banks. The casinos are not accused of wrongdoing.

The case stems from an investigation that led to the conviction of another former bank manager, Yu Zhendong, and his return to China from the United States in 2004 under a promise he wouldn't be executed. China frequently sentences defendants to death for nonviolent offenses.

The Bank of China is one of China's four biggest state-owned commercial banks.

CIVIL LAW:

Investors Win $371.7 Million Over Seizure Of Meritor Savings Bank (AP)

AP, February 11, 2006

PHILADELPHIA - A federal claims court judge on Friday awarded $371.7 million to investors who sued over the 1992 seizure of Meritor Savings Bank, successor to the 176-year-old Philadelphia Saving Fund Society.

U.S. Claims Court Judge Loren A. Smith in Washington also indicated that Meritor investors may deserve an additional $402 million, but he left that question to be resolved upon appeal.

Justice Department spokesman Charles Miller said government officials are still reviewing the decision and had not yet decided on a response.

Gary Hindes, whose New York investment firm is a major Meritor shareholder, said the decision would amount to $6.75 a share.

"It's not as good a victory as I'd want to have," Hindes said. "But at least we know we have a floor under us."

Investors sued in 1993 after the Federal Deposit Insurance Corp. seized Meritor although the government had promised to relax the bank's capital requirements in 1982 to induce it to rescue a failing bank, Western Savings Fund.

Smith ruled in 2003 that the FDIC had violated the 1982 agreement.

Investors' lawyer Thomas M. Buchanan contended that the bank could have become profitable again if the government, instead of forcing what he called an unwarranted takeover in December 1992, had let it "shrink gradually."

The case is one of a number accusing the government of bad faith in dealings with hard-pressed savings and loans in the 1980s and early 1990s.

The award, if it stands, would be the second-highest to date, but it is sure to be appealed, Buchanan said. A $909 million award in August 2002 to investors of a California bank was reduced on appeal to $381 million in 2004.

The judge indicated that he thought investors' claim to another $402 million had merit but precedents in the case were unclear and it would be "presumptuous" for him to award restitution. He said he would leave the parties to argue the matter in the federal circuit.

Shares of Meritor still trade and closed Friday at $4.45 in over-the-counter trading.

Trial Bar Cleanup (WSJ)

DOJ_NMG_0014390

The Wall Street Journal, February 11, 2006

It's amazing what a little courage from the bench can do to clean up the justice system. Now that word is out that most silicosis lawsuits are shams, ever more judges are helping to expose the corruption.

The latest is Florida state Judge David Krathen, who in a recent hearing rebuked plaintiffs lawyers for inventing silicosis suits, and declared "mind-boggling" the effect that phony suits were having on the "economic well-being of this country." He vowed to ride herd on the claims in his court, separating the good cases from the fake.

This isn't the way trial lawyers are used to being treated, and credit for this tougher approach goes in part to Texas federal Judge Janis Graham Jack. Judge Krathen made specific reference to the litigation Judge Jack presided over last year, in which she exposed how lawyers, doctors and X-ray screening companies had "manufactured" some 10,000 bogus silicosis suits "for money."

Of the 10,000 suits that Judge Jack sent back to state courts, more than half have already been dismissed -- often at the request of the lawyers who first filed them. Even the wizards of the plaintiffs bar are wary of re-entering court sporting discredited doctors and screening companies, many of which are now the focus of federal and Congressional investigations. Separate silicosis suits have also been dismissed in Ohio.

Those plaintiffs attorneys who continue to roll the dice are having to resort to ever more desperate practices. In the Florida case, lawyers rushed to file most of their claims the day before a new state statute curbing asbestos and silicosis suits took effect. They also filed all 111 in Broward County, which is notoriously friendly to the trial bar -- or at least it was until they met Judge Krathen, a former trial attorney himself.

The judge allowed defense attorneys to present what they'd uncovered so far about those 111 claims. The stunner was that 72% of the plaintiffs had filed both asbestosis and silicosis suits -- despite the medical rarity of having both ailments. Defense lawyers also noted that one of the X-ray screening firms (N&M) singled out in Judge Jack's courtroom also had a role in the Florida suits.

When a trial lawyer defended the practice of driving mobile X-ray vans to do mass screening, Judge Krathen cut him off, noting that N&M "reeks from fraud." He went on to say: "I'm offended, and I've practiced law for 30 years and now on the bench for three years, that lawyers resort to drive-up buses or vans, unmarked, to sit there, and it looks like . . . are involved in bilking our society and our institutions out of money for no valid reason."

The judge has since ordered the trial lawyers to pony up fact sheets about their clients. These questionnaires are arguably the most detailed a judge has ever requested in such a suit, demanding not only exhaustive information about plaintiffs' diagnoses, but specifics about any prior asbestos lawsuits.

Judge Krathen also took aim at the plaintiffs lawyers' scattershot approach to naming defendant companies -- 80 in all -- and demanded that their clients start identifying specific products that supposedly caused them harm. This was after a lawyer representing a construction-related firm called Vulcan Materials told the judge that while his company had been named in 17,000 claims, its products had only been positively identified by plaintiffs in 23. The lawyer estimated it can cost Vulcan up to $17,000 to get dismissed from a case.

The judge summed things up this way: "In the years I've practiced law, the toughest time was getting a good legitimate case bought into by the jury because of all the horrible publicity that comes out from the negative kind of stuff that goes on in [the Jack suit]. . . I'm concerned about the good clients, the good cases, and I'm concerned about the economic well-being of our economy and our companies that support jobs here in the U.S. . . I want this information [about patients and products] up front."

That's the sort of fair-minded approach that has unfortunately been missing from judges in the many years that the asbestos and silicosis blobs have been destroying honest companies and clogging courtrooms. It's good to see a few more judges standing up to the trial bar's transparent corruption.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Dad Slams Attack On Bush At King Rite (CBS)

CBS, February 11, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0014391

(CBS) Former President George H.W. Bush has expressed dismay and anger at attacks on his son, President Bush, at the funeral for Coretta Scott King.

"In terms of the political shots at the president who was sitting there with his wife, I didn't like it and I thought it was kind of ugly frankly," the former president said in an exclusive radio interview with CBS News White House correspondent Peter Maer.

"Anybody that shoots at the president of the United States at a funeral, I just didn't appreciate that," Mr. Bush added. Listen to former President George H.W. BushFormer President Carter and the Rev. Joseph Lowery criticized the president during remarks they made at the King funeral in Atlanta.

The Rev. Lowery, who co-founded the Southern Christian Leadership Conference with Martin Luther King Jr., drew a roaring standing ovation when he said: "For war, billions more, but no more for the poor" - a takeoff on a line from a Stevie Wonder song. The comment drew head shakes from Mr. Bush and his father as theysat behind the pulpit.

Former President Carter brought up the government response to Katrina, saying, "We only have to recall the color of the faces of those in Louisiana, Alabama and Mississippi" to know that inequality exists. He also noted that the Kings once were "victims of secret government wiretapping" - echoing Mr. Bush's domestic spying program.

Former President Bush also had praise for his friend, Bill Clinton: "I thought President Clinton was maybe the best. It was his crowd. They talk about Bill Clinton being 'the first black president,' well when you walk into that church with 12,000 or whatever it was, I mean it was very clear who that crowd loved and respected."

The Associated Press contributed to this report.

Four Presidents And A Funeral (WSJ)

By PEGGY NOONAN

Wall Street Journal, February 11, 2006

A spirited tribute to Mrs. King--and to democracy

Listen, I watched the funeral of Coretta Scott King for six hours Tuesday, from the pre-service commentary to the very last speech, and it was wonderful--spirited and moving, rousing and respectful, pugnacious and loving. The old lions of the great American civil rights movement of the 20th century were there, and standing tall. The old lionesses, too. There was preaching and speechifying and at the end I thought: This is how democracy ought to be, ought to look every day--full of the joy of argument, and marked by the moral certainty that here you can say what you think.

There was nothing prissy, nothing sissy about it. A former president, a softly gray-haired and chronically dyspeptic gentleman who seems to have judged the world to be just barely deserving of his presence, pointedly insulted a sitting president who was, in fact, sitting right behind him. The Clintons unveiled their 2008 campaign. A rhyming preacher, one of the old lions, a man of warmth and stature, freely used the occasion to verbally bop the sitting president on the head.

So what? This was the authentic sound of a vibrant democracy doing its thing. It was the exact opposite of the frightened and prissy attitude that if you draw a picture I don't like, I'll have to kill you.

It was: We do free speech here.

That funeral honored us, and the world could learn a lot from watching it. The U.S. government should send all six hours of it throughout the World Wide Web and to every country on earth, because it said more about who we are than any number of decorous U.N. speeches and formal diplomatic declarations.

A moment for a distinction that must be made. Some have compared Mrs. King's funeral to the Paul Wellstone memorial. It was not like the Wellstone memorial, and you'd have to be as dim and false as Al Franken to say it was. The Wellstone memorial was marked not by joy but anger. It was at moments sour, even dark. There was famous booing.

The King funeral was nothing like this. It was gracious, full of applause and cheers and amens. It was loving even when it was political. It had spirit, not rage. That's part of why it was beautiful.

It was also beautiful because, as the first speaker, Bishop Eddie L. Long, senior pastor of the New Birth Missionary Baptist Church in Lithonia, Ga., said in almost his first words, "This is a worship. This is a celebration. This is a moment that we give to honor God."

DOJ_NMG_0014392

It was a religious service in which no one was afraid to talk about God. "Praise the Lord," and "Lord, we lift your name on high" and "How we love to sing your praises" rang through the room. Scripture was quoted, stories told. Blacks in America are not afraid to love Jesus the way they want to love him, to use the language and symbols they want to use. I want to kiss their hands for this. I also happen to honor the fact that, by and large, older blacks at least have not given way to 20th-century stoicism in their style of mourning. The Kennedys, who had too much experience with funerals, set the stoic style 40 years ago, and while it was elegant and moving in its own way, it left an entire nation thinking it was in rather poor taste to cry aloud and sob.

As for the speakers, no one has ever been or could be better than the Rev. Bernice King, who spoke of her mother's love, her mother's end, and the possible metaphorical meaning of the cancer that killed her.

The Rev. Joseph Lowery gave a beautiful poem about Martin being with Rosa in heaven and then finding out that Coretta was coming, and rushing to greet her at the pearly gates. Strike you as corny? Not me. It was beautiful because it was not only full of unselfconscious faith, it assumed unselfconscious faith on the part of the audience, and so was both an implicit compliment and a declaration of shared assumptions. The audience responded with amens and cheers. When he bopped the president over weapons of mass destruction, what seemed, on CNN, to be half the room stood and applauded.

When George Bush 41 followed him to the podium, he teased Mr. Lowery in a way that complimented his eloquence. People sometimes marvel at the grace of George H.W. Bush. He is a warm and gracious man, and he's old enough to appreciate the humor in everything. He's old enough to appreciate life. But it is also true that when you attack him or his son from the left he doesn't get mad because in his heart he kinda thinks you're right. Attack him from the right; you won't be overwhelmed by his bonhomie then.

President Bush was fine, his eloquence of the formal kind. He needs to find the place between High Rhetoric and off-the-cuff plainspeak. He always does one or the other. But there's a place in between, a place that's not fancy and not common, that would serve him well if he could find it.

Bill Clinton was, as always, the master. Say what you will, he is the only politician in America with the confidence to call Episcopalians "the frozen chosen" and know everyone will laugh and take no offense. Amid all the happy bombast he was the one who pointed at the casket and said, "There's a woman in there." He talked about Mrs. King in good strong plain terms. Yes, he caused a quarter-second of awkwardness when he said of the beautiful Coretta that even at age 75 she still had the goods, but in moments of exuberance we all forget our own history.

The real news was how the Clintons used the funeral to unveil how they will run in 2008: Together, side by side, with beautiful hairdos. I haven't seen them like this--both standing at the podium--since 1992, when they were new. In the years since, after the health-care failure and the Whitewater scandals, the West Wing attitude toward the president's wife was a quiet and respectful "Get that woman off the podium!" Not anymore. All is new again. Mrs. Clinton has clearly been working on her public speaking, and attempted to use her hands as her husband uses his, now in an emphasizing arc, now resting on her chest. But his are large, long and elegant, and hers are puffed and grasping.

Both Clintons spoke in the cadence and with the imagery of the Bible. Mrs. Clinton's first words, in which she referred to Mrs. King's brave decision to continue her husband's work after his murder, were steeped in religiosity. "As we are called, each of us must decide whether to answer that call by saying, 'Send me.'" She ended with, "The work of peace never ends. So we bid her earthly presence farewell. We wish her Godspeed on her homecoming. And we ask ourselves, 'Will we say, when the call comes, "Send me"?'"

Oh I think we will, Ms. Meanieface!

If you don't understand that Mrs. Clinton was rehearsing her 2008 announcement speech, then you are a child and must go home and have a nice cup of cocoa.

This is what is coming: I have had a blessed life. And like so many people I could choose, after all these years, a life of comfort. Watch it from the sidelines, tend to my own concerns, watch the garden grow. But our nation calls out. And if we are to be Americans we must meet the call. "Send me."

With Bill nodding beside her, his hands clasped prayerfully in front of him, nodding and working that jaw muscle he works when he wants you to notice, for just a second, how hard it is sometimes for him to contain his admiration.

God I love them.

DOJ_NMG_0014393

Apart from its beauty, dignity and fight, Mrs. King's funeral got me thinking about this: Did she know how much she was loved? It's hard for a person to know that. If only she could have gone to her own funeral, she would have known. I wonder if it wouldn't be good if somewhere along the way, just once in your life, you got to call your own funeral. Pick the church, the speakers, the music, sit in the pew, clap when they talk about how wonderful you were. Then afterwards have a long lunch and toast your memory. Then the next day you go to work as usual, but maybe in a different mood. I don't see why we don't do this. Is this a stupid thing to say? It's allowed. I've got free speech.

Ms. Noonan is a contributing editor of The Wall Street Journal and author of "John Paul the Great: Remembering a Spiritual Father," (Penguin, 2005), which you can order from the OpinionJournal bookstore. Her column appears Thursdays.

Racial Icons (NSWK)

By Eleanor Clift

Newsweek, February 11, 2006

President Bush deserves credit for sitting through the awkward moments at Coretta Scott King's funeral—and for his role in setting up an African-American history museum.

Southerners have a saying, "Bit dog always hollers." That's how Jody Powell, President Carter's former press secretary, responded when asked about criticism, coming mainly from Republicans, that Carter had overstepped the bounds of good taste in his eulogy of Coretta Scott King by mentioning that she and her husband had been illegally wiretapped. Carter did not imply that Republicans were responsible. Indeed it was President Kennedy and his brother Bobby who authorized the FBI's eavesdropping on Martin Luther King Jr.

Yet with Senate hearings going on in Washington on the legality of Bush's domestic-spying program, it was inescapable that people would make the connection to present-day abuses. The FISA law (Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act) was signed into law by Carter, and he is justifiably angry about the way Bush brushes it aside as a troublesome bureaucratic impediment. Whether the funeral of a civil-rights icon was the right place and time to jab Bush is debatable, but it's not surprising given Carter's strong feelings.

Coretta King spoke out against the Iraq war and no doubt would have appreciated the occasional discordant political note in the rosy tributes paid to her. Bush deserves credit for sitting through it all despite the awkward moments and remaining good-natured and even eloquent in his eulogy. That evening he welcomed the Harlem Dance Theater to the White House for a special performance, and among the guests was Lonnie Bunch, the director of the National Museum of African-American History and Culture. "Hey, Bunch!" Bush said, clapping him on the back, a familiarity Bush earned when he signed legislation creating the museum in December '03. It had been a long time coming. Georgia Rep. John Lewis first introduced the legislation in 1988, and every year after that, to no avail. Even President Clinton, who's been called the first black president because of his close ties to the African-American community, couldn't get enough support in Congress for the museum.

Bush's museum action pulled off the seemingly impossible. With his re-election campaign looming and needing help to win more of the black vote, he mustered the votes to build the museum on federal land, and to provide $250 million, half what the proposed structure is expected to cost. Sure, there was political self-interest, but Bush is also personally committed. One of the first checks the Smithsonian got for the new African-American museum came from the president and his wife, Laura. Then the newly re-elected Bush directed a portion of the funds that went unspent by his Inaugural committee to the museum. That amounted to a cool $5 million. The African-American museum is still seven years off, but it's been awarded space on the Mall in Washington off Constitution Avenue between 14th and 15th Streets, an apt location since the 14th and 15th amendments to the Constitution secured civil rights for black Americans after slavery. Bunch promises the museum's exhibits will be "a lens into what it means to be an American," the optimism and resilience that are core values of the black experience along with the Gordian knot of race relations.

Bunch is off to a good start, but raising money is never easy, and there's strong competition from across the river in Virginia. Former governor Doug Wilder, now mayor of Richmond, was in Washington this week unveiling his plans for a National Slavery museum, and he's a lot farther along than anybody dreamed possible. He's got the land (32½ acres on the banks of the Rappahannock River in Fredericksburg, Va.) and he's got an acclaimed architect, Chen Chung Pei, son of the legendary I. M.

DOJ_NMG_0014394

Pei, whose vision includes the full-scale replica of a slave ship. Wilder is the grandson of slaves but he couldn't get his father to talk about the subject. "He would bite on his pipe so hard it almost snapped in two," Wilder recalls. His own interest was piqued on a visit to Goree Island, a slave transit point in the African nation of Senegal, when he looked out the "door of no return" where slaves would board the ship, and realized he was governor of a state where many of them were taken. He determined then their story had to be told, and what better place than in Virginia, which had more slaves than any other place.

Wilder is gambling that an illuminated sign with a slave ship at the exit off I-95 in Fredericksburg will draw visitors, and he resists the notion that he is competing with Washington. "You can't have too many [museums], and there's enough money to go around," he says, smiling. "Just give us ours." He's counting on what he calls "enlightened self-interest" from corporations who acknowledge past participation in slavery, "not reparations," he adds, "but acknowledgment of doing what is right." Actor Ben Vereen, who played Chicken George in "Roots," accompanied Wilder and put it more bluntly: "Corporate America, we need you now. We bought your cars—we smoked your cigarettes—now it's time to tally up." The U.S. National Slavery Museum is scheduled to open in 2007.

A Fitting Funeral For Mrs. King (WP)

By Colbert I. King

The Washington Post, February 11, 2006

Speech and expression are coming in for some hard knocks these days. Enraged Muslims are marching by the thousands over cartoons of the prophet Muhammad. The Post's editorial page is being pilloried for publishing an op-ed piece by a leader of the terrorist group Hamas and for publishing a cartoon that critics mistakenly describe as mocking military amputees. And now some conservative talking heads are out of sorts because of what was said from the pulpit of New Birth Missionary Baptist Church in Lithonia, Ga., during Coretta Scott King's funeral on Tuesday.

The fuss over the funeral is probably the silliest snit of all.

First, consider what took place. It wasn't a state funeral scripted by a 138-page detailed planning document, as in the case of Ronald Reagan's services. Neither was it a funeral for a cloistered, apolitical newcomer on the block.

Mrs. King and her late husband, the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr., were renowned proponents of nonviolence and racial and economic justice. They had close ties to peace and social action organizations. Mrs. King was a fixture at antiwar rallies. She was a dignified and reserved public figure, yes; a shrinking violet, no. To recall, she was arrested here in Washington at the South African Embassy in an anti-apartheid protest.

So it should have come as no surprise that during a six-hour funeral for a woman whose life was dedicated to the civil rights and peace movements -- and on a program with more than 35 participants -- a few would have something to say about racism, the futility of war, and military spending when it trumps the needs of the poor. That the outspoken critics happen to have been a preacher, an ex-president and a mayor, and that they did it in the presence of a sitting president, is hardly the outrageous act that conservative pundits have made it out to be.

They profess to be shocked , shocked, that a funeral service would touch on issues that were critical to the life's work of Mrs. King. Their ignorance also may be emblematic of the cultural gulf that separates many blacks and whites when it comes to the way in which we deal with death and its rituals.

There was no way on earth that four presidents, two planeloads of members of Congress and several high priests of black preacherdom could come together in a megachurch before an audience of 10,000, mostly black folks -- including celebrities, wannabes and pretenders to the civil rights throne -- all decked out in their Sunday finest, and not expect to have the event become, well, a tad extravagant rhetorically.

Besides, that's the way it often is at black Baptist home-going services.

At this stage in life, I attend far more funerals than weddings. Raised as a Baptist, I've been doing black funerals since childhood. Done my share of white funerals, too, especially since entering the white-collar world and becoming an Episcopalian or, as Bill Clinton playfully said Tuesday of President Bush the elder (also an Episcopalian), part of the "frozen chosen."

Now I must be careful here with generalizations, but Karla FC Holloway, a Duke University professor and author of African American mourning stories, has noted that white funerals, for the most part, tend to be short and restrained. Black Baptist services, on the other hand, historically have tended to be longer, elaborate, more spontaneous and a time to "get it said." That's what was going on in Atlanta.

DOJ_NMG_0014395

How could a civil rights icon such as Coretta Scott King, a child of the Baptist Church, whose husband was shot dead, whose home was bombed, and whose own government attempted to smear her husband and break up her marriage, not have a home-going service that didn't bring out its share of freely and honestly expressed emotions?

These remarks were denounced as "political":

· The Rev. Joseph Lowery said, "We know now there were no weapons of mass destruction over there. . . . But Coretta knew and we knew that there are weapons of misdirection right here. . . . Millions without health insurance. Poverty abounds. For war billions more but no more for the poor. . . . Our marvelous presidents and governors come to mourn and praise . . . but in the morning will words become deeds that meet need?"

· Atlanta Mayor Shirley Franklin described Mrs. King as singing "for liberation, she sang for those who had no earthly reason to sing a song," using a voice heard "from the tin-top roofs of Soweto to the bomb shelters of Baghdad."

· Former president Jimmy Carter, aware of the current debate over domestic spying, said, "It was difficult for [the Kings] personally with the civil liberties of both husband and wife violated, and they became the targets of secret government wiretapping and other surveillance."

They drew strong applause and, in Lowery's case, a standing ovation.

Barbs because George W. Bush was sitting in the pulpit? Those remarks would have been delivered had the president been down in Crawford, Tex., or up in the White House. And as harsh as they were to conservative ears, they also served a useful purpose. For 10,000 mourners bearing a special kind of pain, those words had a cathartic effect. They became the vehicle through which emotional tensions in the church could surface, the means by which the assembled could give expression to what they were feeling deep down inside. Hence, the laughter, the cheers and loud roars.

George W. Bush -- no passionate orator himself but no political slouch when it comes to reading an audience, black, white or brown -- apparently got it.

Too bad some conservatives on the outside looking in, and caught in their own cramped world, did not.

kingc@washpost.com

Affirmative Blackmail (WSJ)

By David E. Bernstein

The Wall Street Journal, February 11, 2006

According to its mission statement, a primary goal of the American Bar Association is to "promote respect for the law." In the interest of mandating racial preferences in admissions, however, the ABA is about to order law schools to do just the opposite -- in fact, to violate the law -- and is resorting to blackmail to achieve its end.

Meeting in Chicago today, the ABA's Council of the Section on Legal Education and Admissions to the Bar will vote on new "equal opportunity and diversity" standards. If they are approved, any law school that seeks to maintain or acquire ABA accreditation will be required to engage in racial preferences in hiring and admissions, regardless of any federal, state or local laws that prohibit of such policies. Since only graduates of ABA-accredited schools may take the bar exam in the vast majority of states, the association has, in effect, a legal monopoly on accreditation standards.

The new Standard 211, styled "Equal Opportunity and Diversity," would govern admissions and faculty hiring policies. It says nothing about treating people from different groups equally, and lots about "diversity" -- a code word for affirmative action preferences. "Consistent with sound legal education policy and the Standards," part (a) says that a law school must provide "full opportunities for the study of law and entry into the profession by members of underrepresented groups, particularly racial and ethnic minorities," and it must also commit "to having a student body that is diverse with respect to gender, race and ethnicity."

Part (b) says, "Consistent with sound educational policy and the Standards, a law school shall demonstrate by concrete action a commitment to having a faculty and staff that are diverse with respect to gender, race and ethnicity."

DOJ_NMG_0014396

This sounds innocuous, since law schools can reasonably differ on what constitutes "sound legal education policy." Some might think that the educational benefits of a racially heterogeneous student body justify significant racial preferences; others might give more weight to data showing significant educational costs resulting from preferences.

An empirical study by Richard Sander of UCLA, for example, confirms anecdotal evidence that student beneficiaries of such preferences tend to struggle in law school and end up at the bottom of their classes. Statistics published in the year 2000 also reveal that under current affirmative action policies, 42% of all African-American matriculants to law school either never graduate or never pass the bar (compared with 14% of whites). Some schools might conclude dooming a huge percentage of African-American students to failure is contrary to sound educational policy, and limit their "diversity" efforts to recruitment and retention.

That will not be possible, according to the "interpretations" of Standard 211, which have "equal weight" to the rules themselves. Interpretation 211-1 states that "the requirements of a constitutional provision or statute that purports to prohibit consideration of gender, race, ethnicity or national origin in admissions or employment decisions is not a justification for a school's non-compliance with Standard 211."

Racial preferences will thus generally be necessary to comply with Standard 211 -- despite the fact that several states, including California and Florida, ban race as a factor in law school admissions or hiring or both. Equally outrageous is Interpretation 211-2, which states that, "consistent with the Supreme Court's decision in Grutter v. Bollinger, a law school may use race and ethnicity in its admissions process to promote equal opportunity and diversity." This is a complete misstatement of the law, and the attorneys who wrote this are either incompetent or, more likely, intentionally dissembling.

First, Grutter held only that racial preferences in higher education are legal when used to promote diversity, not when used to promote equal opportunity. The Supreme Court has consistently disapproved of the use of racial preferences other than for either educational diversity, or to remedy past discrimination, and nothing in Grutter is to the contrary.

Second, Grutter did not hold that any law school may use race in its admissions process to promote racial diversity. Rather, the court stated that it was deferring to the Michigan Law School's "educational judgment that such diversity is essential to its educational mission." Other law schools may not share that educational judgment, particularly if the only way to achieve such diversity is by admitting underqualified minority students. Nothing in Grutter would permit such a law school to engage in racial preferences.

Ironically, left-wing lawyers and law professors used to scream that the Grutter litigation posed a threat to academic freedom by trying to prohibit law schools from tailoring the racial balance of their student bodies to enhance the students' educational experience. Now they want to use the heavy hand of ABA accreditation to deny academic freedom to law schools that would not choose racial preferences.

It's worth remembering that the fifth vote in Grutter was provided by Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who apparently thought that her opinion would permit, but not require, law schools to use racial preferences for diversity purposes. Now that the ABA is trying to turn "may" into "must," one wonders whether Justice Samuel Alito will be similarly sympathetic to the assertion that allowing racial preferences in admissions enhances academic freedom.

An even greater irony, however, is the ABA's role in all of this. One can be quite certain that despite the plain language of the "interpretations" quoted above, the ABA will claim that it is not really trying to force law school faculties and administrations to violate both the law and their consciences in pursuit of racial "diversity." But in the past, ABA accreditation officials have bullied law schools into precisely that position, even in the absence of written authority backing their demands.

If passed, the new written standards will only embolden the accreditation bureaucracy, composed mainly of far-left law professors, to demand explicit racial preferences and implicit racial quotas -- all in brazen defiance of the law.

Mr. Bernstein, a professor at George Mason University School of Law, is the author of "You Can't Say That!: The Growing Threat to Civil Liberties from Antidiscrimination Law" (Cato, 2003).

ANTITRUST:

Senate Confirms Barnett As Assistant Attorney General (DOWJONES)

DOJ_NMG_0014397

Dow Jones, February 11, 2006

WASHINGTON -(Dow Jones)- The Senate on Friday confirmed Thomas O. Barnett as assistant attorney general for the Justice Department's antitrust division.

Barnett was confirmed by unanimous consent. He has held the job on an acting basis.

- By Siobhan Hughes, Dow Jones Newswires; 202-862-6654; Siobhan.Hughes@ dowjones.com

Microsoft Gets EU Scrutiny (BLOOM)

By MATTHEW NEWMAN, BLOOMBERG NEWS

Bloomberg, February 11, 2006

Complaints about upcoming Vista gathered by regulators

European regulators are reviewing complaints against Microsoft Corp. from computer makers concerned that the next version of the Windows operating system may prevent manufacturers from customizing the software.

The European Commission, the European Union's antitrust authority in Brussels, Belgium, is "monitoring" complaints about the software, called Vista, and hasn't started a formal inquiry, commission spokesman Jonathan Todd said in an e-mail.

"Approaches are being made about Vista by U.S. and non-U.S. companies," Philip Lowe, the top civil servant in the commission's competition department, said in an interview Friday in London, where he was attending a conference.

Microsoft, which is under regulatory scrutiny around the world, plans to start selling Vista later this year. The first new version of Windows for personal computers since 2001 also is attracting complaints in the United States, according to Justice Department court documents filed in Washington this week. The United States and the EU didn't identify the companies that complained.

Todd said the manufacturers have expressed "concerns" and haven't filed formal complaints. The commission can start new investigations on its own initiative and doesn't require competitors' complaints to do so.

Microsoft spokesman Tom Brookes declined to comment. Microsoft general counsel Brad Smith said Thursday that he's confident Vista doesn't infringe on a U.S. antitrust settlement agreement.

PC makers are looking to customize the first screen users see when turning on their computer, and may be concerned that Microsoft's Vista won't permit such changes, Nicholas Economides, an economics professor at New York University, said in an interview.

Regulators Approve Regis Acquisition (MINBIZ)

By John Vomhof Jr.

Minneapolis Business Journal, February 11, 2006

Regis Corp.'s $2.6 billion purchase of Alberto-Culver Co.'s Sally Beauty Co. retail chain received federal antitrust approval on Friday.

The Federal Trade Commission said officials completed their investigation of the deal without taking any action to block it.

Last month, Edina-based Regis agreed to buy Denton-based Sally Beauty chain for $2.2 billion in stock and $400 million in debt. The combined company will retain the name Regis Corp., with Sally Beauty becoming a subsidiary of Regis.

The deal will greatly expand Regis' presence in the retail sector. Sally Beauty, founded in 1964, has more than 2,400 Sally Beauty retail stores and 800 Beauty Systems group outlets; the company generated revenue of $2.25 billion in the year ending in September 2005.

Regis (NYSE: RGS) owns or franchises more than 11,000 salons, 90 hair restoration centers and 35 beauty schools worldwide.

The Minneapolis/St. Paul Business Journal is an affiliated publication of the Dallas Business Journal.

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

EPA Budget Cuts Trouble Environment Groups (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0014398

By John Heilprin

AP, February 11, 2006

Grants to state and local governments for land and water conservation would be cut 40 percent, and money for the Environmental Protection Agency's network of libraries for scientists would be slashed severely under President Bush's proposed budget.

By contrast, Bush next year would spend $322 million for "cooperative conservation" — up from $312 million the Congress approved last year — to encourage more private landowners to protect endangered species, conserve wildlife habitats and do other nature work traditionally done by government.

Other proposed increases are $50 million more for cleaner-burning diesel engines and $5 million more for drinking water improvements.

Cuts and proposals to sell some of the government's vast land holdings have upset environmentalists.

Early in his presidency, Bush called for restoring the federal Land and Water Conservation Fund to the full $900 million authorized by Congress. Last year, it was approved at $142 million. For 2007, he wants just $85 million in grants for creating and preserving non-federal parks, forest land and wildlife refuges, a 40 percent cut.

"This is the most troubling budget we've seen from this White House," said Heather Taylor, deputy legislative director for Natural Resources Defense Council.

The proposal sent to Congress this week would trim EPA's budget by nearly 5 percent, down to $7.2 billion, and the Interior Department's budget by 2.4 percent, to $9.1 billion.

Sen. James Jeffords, I-Vt., said it shows the environment isn't a Bush administration priority. "We cannot allow this dangerous trend to continue," said Jeffords, a senior member of the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee.

Interior Secretary Gale Norton and EPA Administrator Stephen Johnson said their budgets represent, within the context of reducing the federal deficit, a responsible allocation of resources that will still lead to environmental improvements.

One potential hole in the Interior budget is $312 million for an Office of Surface Mining program to reclaim abandoned mines. The money comes from coal mining fees set to expire in June. The Bush administration is asking Congress to reauthorize the fees.

"Nobody wants to see the program come to a halt," Norton said.

The budget also would cut $89 million from the National Park Service's nearly $2.6 billion budget.

Environmentalists contend a bigger danger is the administration's plan to raise $250 million over five years by selling 125,000 acres of the Bureau of Land Management's 261 million acres.

The lands are typically part of a "checkerboard" pattern of small parcels surrounded by suburban or urban areas, Interior officials say, and have been identified as holding little natural, historic, cultural or energy value.

The administration anticipates selling them for $2,000 an acre. The Forest Service plans to sell 170,000-200,000 acres in 41 states, according to The Wilderness Society.

Another proposal affects EPA's electronic catalog that keeps track of tens of thousands of agency documents and research studies, according to EPA internal memos. The agency would cut four-fifths of its library budget — from $2.5 million to $500,000. It pays for a network of dozens of libraries and reading rooms nationally.

"How are EPA scientists supposed to engage in cutting edge research when they cannot find what the agency has already done?" said Jeff Ruch, executive director of Public Employees for Environmental Responsibility, which obtained the EPA memos.

EPA spokeswoman Eryn Witcher said materials will still be available.

"EPA is working to modernize our antiquated system by streamlining our physical collections and making them available online to provide more information to a wider group of people, including scientists," she said.

Low-interest loans to states for treating wastewater, cutting other water pollution and managing watersheds would be cut by 22 percent, to $688 million.

Bush has requested $184 million for EPA's homeland security programs — including monitoring water supplies against terrorists and decontaminating buildings after chemical or biological attacks — and more than $100 million for its energy-related programs.

DOJ_NMG_0014399

Power Plant Would Reuse Carbon Dioxide (NYT)

By Matthew L. Wald

The New York Times, February 11, 2006

Subsidiaries of BP and Edison International said yesterday that they were planning to build a power plant that would run on oil residues, and that 90 percent of the carbon dioxide would be captured and pumped into an oil field, where it would help push more oil to the surface.

The $1 billion plant would be adjacent to a BP refinery in Carson, Calif., about 20 miles south of Los Angeles, and would be the first such plant in the country, the companies said. BP is already drawing up engineering plans for a plant in Scotland that would sequester its carbon dioxide in an underground oil-bearing formation; that plant is to run on natural gas.

The companies said they hoped to make a final decision on the plant in 2008 and have it running in 2011. It would qualify for a tax credit as a carbon-free energy source under the 2005 energy bill, company executives said.

The plant would run by mixing an oil residue, petroleum coke, in a chamber with steam and a controlled amount of oxygen. In this technique, called gasification, both the fuel and the water give up hydrogen atoms to form hydrogen gas. This process also produces carbon monoxide, which is converted to carbon dioxide, giving off heat to sustain the reaction.

The hydrogen is then burned in a turbine engine, the kind that electric companies normally run on natural gas, and the dominant combustion product is water. The carbon dioxide is compressed into a liquid and injected into an oil field.

Although the fuel is an oil residue, and not coal, the technology is the same as one mentioned by President Bush in his State of the Union speech on Jan. 31, in which he said, "We will invest more in zero-emission coal-fired plants."

When coal or other fuels are gasified, conventional pollutants like sulfur and carbon dioxide, which is believed to be responsible for climate change, can be removed before combustion, while the volume of gas is still relatively small.

Petroleum coke from the Carson refinery is usually trucked to the harbor and shipped to China, where it is burned for fuel.

As a nearly carbon-free source of electricity, the plant would compete with wind power. Its construction cost is about double the cost of a wind turbine, according to Theodore F. Craver Jr., the chairman and chief executive of Edison Mission Energy, an unregulated subsidiary of Edison International.

But the production of wind turbines cannot be scheduled, and they generally produce only about 30 percent as much electricity as they would by running around the clock; this plant will run 90 to 95 percent of the hours in a year, he said. And the Los Angeles Basin, where it is situated, is often short of power, he said.

Steve Westwell, chief executive of BP Alternative Energy, said that all of the technologies had already been demonstrated individually, including separating carbon dioxide from hydrogen, and pumping the carbon dioxide under pressure into the ground. One area in which the project would stretch existing technologies is in the turbine; hydrogen burns hotter than natural gas, and tends to make turbine blades brittle.

BP is seeking to put the carbon dioxide in oil fields owned by Occidental Petroleum.

Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger, who attended the project announcement, said, "This will be the first plant of its kind in the whole country, and I think it is a perfect fit for our state."

Plan Unveiled For Hydrogen Power Plant (LAT)

By Elizabeth Douglass

The Los Angeles Times, February 11, 2006

Oil giant BP and Edison say they will spend $1 billion to build a nonpolluting facility in Carson. It is expected to be completed in 2011.

Oil giant BP and Edison International said Friday that they would spend $1 billion to build a one-of-a-kind hydrogen power plant in Carson to supply the region with badly needed electricity without polluting the air.

Slated for completion in 2011 next to BP's Carson oil refinery, the 500-megawatt facility would be the world's largest hydrogen-fired power plant, churning out enough electricity to serve more than 300,000 average homes, executives said at a news conference that drew Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger and other state officials.

DOJ_NMG_0014400

But what sets the project apart is the unique way it would make electricity by using the refinery's leftovers while capturing the resulting carbon dioxide, the primary greenhouse gas linked to global warming, so the environment isn't harmed, the executives said.

BP America Inc. President Ross Pillari called the planned facility "the cleanest and greenest power plant in the United States." Alan Lloyd, secretary of the California Environmental Protection Agency, told the gathering that the plant would be so nonpolluting that "the only emissions are water vapor."

The state has been pushing to augment electricity supplies — considered particularly thin in Southern California — through the construction of power plants and the increased use of alternative, less-polluting energy sources.

The proposed plant would be "a very major step forward" in meeting the region's power needs, said John Bryson, chief executive of Rosemead-based Edison International, whose Southern California Edison utility provides electricity to more than 13 million customers. Another Edison unit, its unregulated Edison Mission Group, would own 49% of the project and London-based BP would own 51%.

Who would buy the power and what they would pay have yet to be determined, company executives said. One problem is price; the hydrogen plant will cost more to build than one using natural gas, and its electricity would be more expensive.

Most of the power plants built in the U.S. in recent years have been fueled by natural gas, a cleaner-burning fuel that remains relatively cheap despite price increases that have rivaled the run-up in the cost of crude oil. More than 40% of California's electricity is made with natural gas, and the state has launched ambitious efforts to reduce that dependence and to slash emissions of carbon dioxide and other greenhouse gases.

"It definitely costs more … and we're going to have to sell it in a competitive market," said Doug McFarlan, spokesman for Edison Mission Group. "Those are the questions that we need to sort through before we make a decision to apply for construction permits."

The companies acknowledged that the project relies to some extent on landing federal tax breaks and incentives for construction of gasification plants similar to theirs, such as those offered under the Federal Energy Policy Act of 2005.

"This is cutting-edge, but at a cost," said Michael Shames, executive director of San Diego-based Utility Consumers' Action Network. He said that building a natural gas-fired plant of the size contemplated by BP and Edison would cost about $400 million.

The proposed BP-Edison hydrogen plant would be fueled by petroleum coke, a coal-like refinery byproduct, and recycled water, which would be "gasified," or converted into two gases: hydrogen and carbon dioxide. The hydrogen would run turbines to produce the electricity.

About 90% of the carbon dioxide, a pollutant that typically is released into the air, would be collected and piped to local oil fields, where it would be injected into the ground to help retrieve hard-to-get oil. The carbon dioxide would be left underground.

"It is a perfect fit for our state," Schwarzenegger said. "I've always said you don't have to choose between a healthy environment and a healthy economy."

David Hawkins, climate center director at the Natural Resources Defense Council, called the project "the only way to make electricity from fossil fuels and protect the planet from global warming." But Hawkins, who attended Friday's news conference, added that "they need to make sure that this project is a good community neighbor."

In nearby Wilmington, Jesse Marquez, executive director of the Coalition for a Safe Environment, said his group "will definitely scrutinize the environmental report on it to assure the public that there will be no environmental impact to the community."

I'm For New Exploration And Production Of Oil (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 11, 2006

In regard to your Feb. 1 editorial "Oil Bashing, Round Two1" criticizing my proposal for a windfall profits rebate for consumers who are being price-gouged by the big oil companies:

The oil market is not a free market, and when price-gouging occurs, government has an obligation to stand up for consumers. The Journal disagrees. Fair enough. We can disagree about that.

DOJ_NMG_0014401

But when you claim that I oppose "new energy production in places where companies want to explore," it is not accurate. I support opening up Lease 181 in the Gulf of Mexico, which is part of the Outer Continental Shelf. I support building a new Alaska natural gas pipeline. I've voted for a whole range of incentives to encourage more domestic oil and natural production over the years.

My legislation would exempt oil companies from paying the excise tax that would fund the windfall profits rebate if they invest profits from oil sold for more than $40 a barrel in the exploration, drilling and production of new domestic supplies or to develop alternative domestic energy supplies.

I strongly support new exploration and production, even in some places now off limits and specifically in one of the places you say I do not.

Sen. Byron L. Dorgan (D., N.D.)

Washington

Kicking The Habit, All Over The World (LAT)

By Michael T. Klare, Michael T. Klare, A Professor At Hampshire College, Is The Author Of "Blood And Oil: The Dangers And

The Los Angeles Times, February 11, 2006

PRESIDENT BUSH was right to say that the United States is "addicted to oil" in his State of the Union address. For too long we have been consuming ever-greater quantities of the stuff without paying heed to the political, economic and environmental hazards involved. Bush also made some useful, if timid, suggestions on how to curb our insatiable thirst for oil. But he failed to address a critical aspect of the problem: Other countries, including China and India, are just as addicted to oil, and unless we strive to suppress their appetites along with our own, the problems we face will continue to multiply.

For decades, the United States has been the world's leading consumer of petroleum, devouring about one-fourth of the global supply daily. Although higher gasoline prices have weakened demand slightly, we are still expected to consume 27% more oil in 2025 than we do today, according to the latest Department of Energy projections. But an even greater increase in demand is expected from Asia. China's oil consumption is expected to rise by 97% between 2004 and 2025, and India's by 78%. The resulting demand crunch could easily overwhelm the global supply of petroleum.

In the U.S., oil demand is largely spurred by Americans' collective love affair with the automobile. We also own far more vehicles, on a per-capita basis, than any other large nation. But all indications are that Chinese and Indian consumers are beginning to emulate us: In 2001, 16 million Chinese owned private cars; by 2020, the number is expected to hit 130 million; India's ownership rate is expected to grow just as fast.

The rising demand for oil in rapidly developing countries has enormous implications for the United States. To begin with, it is driving up energy prices for American consumers. With global petroleum supplies tighter than they have been in decades, and China and India competing with the U.S. for available supplies, the price is bound to rise. A year ago, the Energy Department was predicting that oil prices would hover in the $30 to $35 a barrel range over the next 20 years; now it is projecting $50 to $55 a barrel for that same period. Some energy analysts expect prices to climb even higher, especially if China's economy continues to grow at 10% a year and the global supply of oil fails to keep pace.

But this is the least of our problems. In their quest for foreign sources of petroleum, China and India are buying up fields around the world and, in some cases, forging close ties with such states as Iran, Sudan, Uzbekistan and Venezuela, which are considered unfriendly or even hostile to the U.S.

"A more troubling aspect of the recent surge in overseas energy deals by China and India is their willingness to invest in countries that are pursuing policies that are harmful to global stability," Assistant Secretary of State E. Anthony Wayne told the Senate Foreign Relations Committee in July. For example, "both Chinese and Indian firms have reportedly been involved in oil and gas-sector deals in Iran that raise concerns under U.S. law and policy." This is especially true when such investment is accompanied by arms and military technology, as has been the case with Chinese links to Iran and Sudan.

DOJ_NMG_0014402

It is easy to condemn Beijing and New Delhi for such behavior, but it's hardly surprising that they're prepared to shop anywhere for oil. Under these circumstances, the world is likely to become increasingly well-armed and unstable, posing acute dangers for the U.S. whether or not we reduce our own consumption of petroleum.

And this is not the only danger we face. The U.S. is the leading emitter of carbon dioxide and other greenhouse gases into the atmosphere, thus heightening the risk of catastrophic climate change. If we implement Bush's proposed initiatives and consume less petroleum (which accounts for the largest share of our carbon emissions), we stand a chance of slowing climate change. But, according to the Energy Department, developing nations in Asia now account for about 19% of the world's oil-related carbon emissions (compared with 24% for the U.S.); by 2025, their share is projected to rise to 28%.

It follows from all this that it is not enough to curb the U.S. addiction to oil. We also need to work with China, India and other oil-addicted countries to curb their fast-growing demand. This means persuading the leaders of those countries to adopt the same sort of initiatives as those proposed by Bush. Even better, the president should invite them to join the U.S. in these efforts as equal partners. U.S. companies should also be encouraged to form partnerships with foreign firms to develop new energy alternatives and transportation systems that would spur economic growth in participating countries.

Yes, Americans are addicted to petroleum, but so are others around the world. Unless we work together to curb its harmful effects, we will all suffer from the resulting damage.

The Grass Station (NYT)

By Constance Casey

The New York Times, February 11, 2006

THOSE of us who labor in the garden got an unexpected thrill listening to the State of the Union last week when President Bush touted a plant, switch grass to be exact, as a way to "make our dependence on Middle Eastern oil a thing of the past."

How pleasing to see official presidential recognition of the usefulness and worthiness of this common member (panicum virgatum) of the millet family. Previously insufficiently appreciated in our capital, switch grass is inexpensive food for cattle, horses, sheep and goats. This deep-rooted perennial controls erosion by slowing down water run off and keeping beneficial sediments in the field, and it is habitat for songbirds, game birds and waterfowl.

And yes, ethanol can be made from switch grass, which grows in abundance on the prairies of the Great Plains. If grass had ambition (besides wanting to propagate), the panicum virgatum might see itself as a cure for global warming and a savior of the family farm. If burning compressed switch grass really does work to reduce the use of fossil fuels, it would reduce the carbon we release into the air. Then farmers could find new profits in growing the stuff. And the more, the better. Switch grass, like every other plant, takes carbon dioxide out of the air and uses it to build plant tissue. Fold that, Republicans, into your Clear Skies legislation.

Switch grass cleans water as well as air; its wide-spreading roots filter out pesticides, herbicides and excess fertilizer before they reach the waterways. Up in Manitoba, Canada, where they care deeply about staying warm, they're experimenting with stoves that burn pellets of switch grass.

Senator Joseph Lieberman, Democrat of Connecticut, recently recommended switch grass as a balm for international tension. It's likely we'll find ourselves competing with China for oil, he told the Council on Foreign Relations, so we'll need to look at other fuels. He suggested that tons of agricultural materials, like corn, sugar cane and switch grass, could be used "to create billions of barrels of new fuels."

At this point I wouldn't be surprised to hear someone say that switch grass is a cure for lower-back pain and nearsightedness.

Family farmers know that switch grass is easy to grow. It doesn't complain about growing in sand; it doesn't mind clay either. It's tolerant of floods as well as of droughts. It would work as part of the effort to restore the Louisiana wetlands that can help protect New Orleans from hurricanes.

Switch grass is native to most of North America, from Canada to Texas. The day after the State of the Union, the president joked that he might bring in a few extra dollars at his Crawford ranch by growing switch grass for fuel. Whoa, Mr. President, take a look next time you're trimming the brush: odds are you have plenty.

DOJ_NMG_0014403

Let's not forget that switch grass is beautiful and looks great in floral arrangements. On the very same day the president spoke, I got the latest Brooklyn Botanic Garden handbook, "Designing Borders for Sun and Shade," in the mail. The handbook strongly recommended switch grass as part of a perennial border. There's "Dallas Blues," "Alamo," and the prettiest, wine-red "Shenandoah." The handbook suggests combining switch grass with asters, sunflowers and black-eyed Susans for an all-native garden with a nice prairie feel.

To me, though this may seem at first unrelated, this is just one more reason that "America the Beautiful" should be our national anthem instead of that song with the bombs bursting in air. The clue to achieving clean fuel, clean air, clean water, world peace has been right there all the time in those "amber waves of grain."

Congress's Duty On Energy (NYT)

The New York Times, February 11, 2006

Senator Pete Domenici told a recent gathering of experts that if Congress is going to do anything useful this year about the two big energy-related questions of our time — oil dependency and global warming — it will have to focus on "four or five big things" instead of the usual laundry list of tax breaks, subsidies and modest research programs.

A New Mexico Republican who runs the Senate energy committee, Mr. Domenici has become something of a Senate visionary on energy policy. With Jeff Bingaman, a New Mexico Democrat, he co-sponsored a resolution that not only accepted the basic science of global warming but also endorsed mandatory controls on emissions of carbon dioxide. The realist in him knows that this Congress is unlikely to take either of the steps (much less both) that would be most likely to lower oil consumption as well as greenhouse gases: a big increase in fuel economy standards and a big gasoline tax.

But he is willing to entertain other incentives to produce fuel-efficient cars, to develop fuels other than gasoline — most likely ethanol, not just from corn but from other crops — and to build a new generation of power plants capable of capturing carbon dioxide before it goes into the atmosphere. Mr. Domenici's vision of the future also includes safer, less expensive nuclear plants, which have the virtue of generating no greenhouse gases.

There are several legislative vehicles at hand for achieving some of these objectives. One is the Fuel Choices for American Security Act of 2005. There are identical versions in both houses, each with broadly bipartisan sponsorship, including conservatives who would normally resist federal mandates but who believe that reducing oil consumption is an urgent matter of national security.

The bill would establish a goal for fuel savings of 2.5 million barrels a day (about what we now import from the Persian Gulf), increasing to 7.5 million barrels by 2025. It would also provide some of the means to get there, including serious production incentives for a new generation of cars and fuels.

Although the bill does not address other imperatives, like cleaner power plants, it would have a positive spillover effect on global warming because fuel-efficient cars and trucks would produce lower greenhouse gases. The question is whether Congress can focus on the big issues without engaging in the diversionary food fights that every energy bill seems to inspire.

It will be hard for someone not to raise red flags like drilling in the Arctic, or for Congress in general not to indulge its appetite for pork. But with even President Bush signing on (at least in speeches) to the need for a new energy future, this is not the time for business as usual.

Gov't Seeks $16M Unpaid Mine Safety Fines (AP)

By NANCY ZUCKERBROD

Associated Press, February 11, 2006

By , Writer WASHINGTON (AP) - Kentucky mine operator Stanley Osborne has accumulated more than $200,000 in safety fines since the 1980s, but the federal government has not been able to collect the money.

In a new approach, the Mine Safety and Health Administration filed suit against Osborne this month. "We just can't be chasing people around for these collection cases when they should be paying their civil penalties," said Thomas Mascolino, deputy associate solicitor at the Labor Department.

MSHA, part of the Labor Department, was owed more than $16 million in delinquent fines at the end of last year, said agency spokesman Dirk Fillpot. More than $11 million was for violations at coal mines.

DOJ_NMG_0014404

The problem isn't new, but it has gained attention following mining accidents that have left 21 miners dead so far this year.

West Virginia lawmakers have asked the Government Accountability Office, the investigative arm of Congress, to look into how the mine agency assesses and collects fines.

"It is critically important that penalties for serious violations be painful," the lawmakers said in a letter to the GAO.

But critics wonder how safety fines can be painful when they can go uncollected.

"The payment of fines assessed by MSHA is essentially voluntary," said Wes Addington, a lawyer at the Appalachian Citizens Law Center, which is based in Prestonsburg, Ky., and represents miners in discrimination cases.

Addington recently analyzed fines levied against companies in Kentucky - the nation's third-largest coal producer - and found there were one or more years during the past decade in which one-third of the state's underground mines paid little or none of their fines.

Fillpot said MSHA has collected 80 percent of the fines it has assessed in the past decade.

He said the agency first tries to collect the fines and after 180 days asks the Treasury Department to get involved. Treasury can ask collection agencies to go after the fines.

If an operator cannot be found, goes out of business or doesn't have the money, MSHA can write the debt off. The Internal Revenue Service can consider the money part of the operator's earned income, meaning it is taxable.

"The process needs to change," said Stephen Webber, who headed the mine agency's assessments office at the end of the Clinton administration and for a few years under the Bush administration.

"If mine operators are not paying their civil penalty assessments, they're not going to have the right attitude toward health and safety," Webber said. "They'll just get another assessment and not pay it."

Webber said he suggested to Labor Department lawyers that they shut down mines that had delinquent fines: "That would have an effect." But the idea was rejected, he said.

If a coal operator isn't fixing the problem for which he is cited, MSHA can shut down the part of the mine in question, said Mascolino. But he said the agency can't take that action just because fines haven't been paid.

"Our power to shut a portion of a mine is always directed to the finding of a current existing health and safety violation," he said.

Another option Webber supports is creation of a system by which mine operators would have to pay outstanding fines to renew permits. West Virginia has such a law, ensuring the state is paid, he said.

There is no similar federal permit system, Mascolino said.

"They don't have it, but they need it," said Webber, who thinks Congress ought to mandate the change.

In the case of Osborne, who has operated several mines in eastern Kentucky, the agency didn't go after old fines but asked the court to make Osborne post a bond for payment of future fines.

Mascolino said the goal is to make other operators think twice about ignoring fines.

"That's what this case is about," he said, adding that the legal strategy has been developing since last year, before the recent spate of mine accidents.

Osborne couldn't be reached for comment on the new suit. But he offered an explanation on the unpaid fines during a worker discrimination case last year, saying, "I don't have the money."

Miner representatives are skeptical, noting coal prices are up.

"Those operators that do not pay their fines in a timely manner, they should not be able to operate," said Dennis O'Dell, top safety expert at United Mine Workers of America. "They're making all kinds of money."

Hydra-Headed Hybrids (WP)

The Washington Post, February 11, 2006

IN NORTHERN VIRGINIA, the hybrid has become hydra-headed. As plenty of the region's commuters know, hybrid vehicles are the main culprit in the ever-worsening traffic in the region's carpool lanes. Thanks to a regulatory perk, hybrid drivers are allowed to use carpool lanes -- chiefly those on Interstate 95 -- without carrying a single passenger; that's a major reason Northern Virginia ranks just behind California as the nation's hottest market for hybrid sales.

DOJ_NMG_0014405

Obviously, it defeats the purpose of carpool lanes to flood them with passengerless hybrids. Realizing that, officials have long planned to end the sweet deal for hybrids this summer. But, incredibly, Virginia lawmakers have voted to prolong it. This is a supremely bad idea.

There is no mystery about hybrids' impact on the carpool lanes, known as HOV, or high-occupancy-vehicle, lanes. Introduced only five years ago, hybrids now account for at least 22 percent of rush-hour traffic on I-95's HOV lanes. That's even more than the 15 percent believed to be cheaters -- those in conventional cars who use the HOV lanes despite carrying no passengers. With hybrid sales soaring, the problem is getting worse in a hurry. There are already more than 11,700 hybrids on Virginia's roads -- triple the number three years ago -- and the vast majority of them are in Northern Virginia. At current trends another 5,000 will be added to the region's roads this year.

State incentives to drive hybrids once made some sense. Powered by battery as well as gasoline, hybrids are somewhat cleaner and more fuel-efficient than their exclusively gasoline-powered cousins. When the state granted HOV access to hybrids starting in 2000, the idea was to strike a blow for the environment and against profligate gas consumption.

But that deal has outlived its usefulness. Hybrids' environmental advantages have diminished as stricter federal rules have required gas-powered cars to have cleaner engines, starting with 2004 models. The region's air quality, though still in need of improvement, has made major gains for more than a decade. Whatever marginal environmental benefits are realized by encouraging hybrid sales on the promise of HOV access, at this point the policy may be doing more harm than good. By slowing carpoolers and long-haul bus trips at rush hour, hybrids may well push frustrated commuters back into their own cars, increasing net emissions. By slowing traffic, hybrids threaten to kill the HOV system.

The hybrid invasion of carpool lanes must end. If that doesn't happen on schedule this summer, it will only become more difficult to do as pressure builds from the growing numbers of hybrid owners and dealers. Nonetheless, both houses of the General Assembly have passed legislation that would extend the deal by a year, until July 2007. The sponsor of one of the bills, Sen. Jeannemarie Devolites Davis (R-Fairfax), says it will maintain the status quo while Virginia and federal officials negotiate regulations governing how much HOV traffic is too much and how many passengerless hybrids are too many. But that is beside the point, which is that high-occupancy lanes are already being clogged by low-occupancy cars. Gov. Timothy M. Kaine (D) should veto the legislation. It's time to restore some rationality to the roads.

Tribal Land Issue Heating Up In Scott County (MINNST)

Minneapolis Star Tribune, February 11, 2006

As the tribe buys property, it shouldn't be allowed to put the holdings into a tax-exempt trust that takes land off property tax rolls and frees land from local land-use restrictions, some local officials say.

Anthony Lonetree, Star Tribune Outside the hotel-and-casino complex that has enriched the Shakopee Mdewakanton Sioux Community is a statue of an Indian chief with the quote: "Over these hills I once rode free upon my horse."

This is a people who love the land. Twenty-four years after bringing high-stakes gaming to Minnesota, the Mdewakanton Sioux tribe now is the biggest landowner in Scott County -- excluding agencies like the state Department of Natural Resources.

The tribe, determined to develop its property as it sees fit, is asking the federal government to move 760 acres off the property-tax rolls and into trust. Until then, the land is subject to local land-use controls, and that's unacceptable to Tribal Chairman Stanley Crooks.

"When you are sovereign, you determine what's best for you," he said. He described as "demeaning" a recent suggestion by Gov. Tim Pawlenty that tribal and local officials engage in talks to let some -- but not all -- of the land be put into trust.

Yet Scott County and other officials say local governments should continue to manage growth within one of the nation's fastest-growing counties -- and to share in the property-tax revenues that development would bring.

The dispute dates to the mid-1990s, and while it is to be decided at the federal level, perhaps within the next few months, it continues to roil emotions locally.

DOJ_NMG_0014406

In December, without advance public notice, the Prior Lake City Council voted to withdraw opposition to having 106 acres within that city put into trust for the tribe, spurring a battle between the county and the tribe in the commentary sections of local and daily newspapers.

The tribe also created and paid for a flier to be inserted in thousands of local papers accusing a Scott County commissioner of having stated in a commentary piece that the tribe was "unacceptable."

Stakes are high, County Administrator David Unmacht said. The federal government's decision could determine the fate of not just 760 acres, he said, but that of other recently acquired tribal parcels, as well -- taxable property now totaling an additional 750 acres. Considering that 640 acres equals one square mile, that's a lot of land.

If not in trust, tribal officials say, the fields will go undeveloped.

By its rules

The Shakopee Mdewakanton Sioux Community is sovereign in that it manages its affairs independent of most state and federal laws. But tribes also can be subject to limits set by Congress. For the Sioux, that means having a civil court but letting Scott County handle criminal matters.

For decades, poor tribes relied upon the federal government to put lands into trust to protect them from forfeiture.

Today, however, said David Wilkins, an American Indian Studies professor at the University of Minnesota, many tribes use gaming profits to buy back lands lost a century ago. In his view, the Bureau of Indian Affairs (BIA) should approve every application to put land in trust: "If we [as tribes] say, 'This will benefit us, trustee,' then do it," he said, referring to the basic nature of a trust relationship.

Whether a tribe is wealthy, he added, is irrelevant.

As a semi-sovereign nation, the Shakopee Mdewakanton Sioux Community does not disclose its financial records. But according to its website, Mystic Lake Casino Hotel now boasts of more than 4,000 slot machines and 100 blackjack tables, plus three hotel towers and a resort-styled golf course.

The tribe, too, is proud of its stewardship of the land. Prairies have been restored; its building codes are stringent, officials say.

Land is needed for housing tribal families, however. Two parcels in the trust application -- one in Shakopee and the other in Prior Lake -- would take the bulk of new residential development. The tribe also wants to move its powwow grounds and to develop a cultural center and new government center in Shakopee, as well.

In 1998, the tribe applied to have 593 acres put into trust, and the BIA rejected the application. It said then that the tribe's business acumen made it one of the nation's most successful Indian enterprises and it failed to show the need for the benefits that having land in trust could bring.

The decision will figure into current deliberations, said Terry Virden, director of the BIA's midwest regional office. But, so, too, he added, will other factors. Now, he said, there is more development near the reservation than in 1998, easing concerns about land-use pressures. Opposition seems less heated, too, he added.

Virden said a decision is expected within two months. If the agency had to its issue its decision today, he added, he doesn't know what it would be.

The county has said that if the tribe developed the parcels as proposed, local jurisdictions could lose $2.9 million a year in tax revenues. In 2005, the undeveloped parcels produced $65,642 in property taxes.

Local change

In Prior Lake, the decision to support the trust application prompted outrage among some citizens, who've begun a petition drive (at www.offthecouch.org) urging a new city policy opposing it.

During his State of the City address Monday, Mayor Jack Haugen apologized for the suddenness of the decision but not for the action itself.

Just four months ago, he had joined local officials in appearing before Virden to argue against the trust, and, in fact, helped lead the presentation. But, he said in a recent interview, he realized later "my heart wasn't in the position."

During the presentation, officials noted the tribe was entrenched in an "all or nothing" position. Talk to Crooks, and that seems clear: "There is no 'win-win' situation," he said of any talks. "Not for the tribe."

Interior Ordered To Pay Cobell Lawyers (ICT)

By David Melmer, Indian Country Today

Indian Country Today, February 10, 2006

WASINGTON - The Department of the Interior was ordered by the U.S. District Court to pay attorneys' fees and expenses that have accumulated in the ongoing Cobell v. Norton case.

The total amount ordered paid by U.S. District Judge Royce Lamberth is more than $7 million. That money will come out of BIA and Interior accounts, and will affect tribal programs.

On Jan. 26, Interior Associate Deputy Secretary James Cason sent a letter to tribes notifying them that the court-mandated legal fee payment sent to Cobell attorneys on Jan. 18 would adversely affect tribal programs. He detailed where the $7 million would come from to forewarn them that some of their expectations may not be met this year.

The largest impact will be in the area of historical accounting, with a contribution of $2 million. That department, which focuses on identifying the rightful owners of special deposit accounts, was chosen because it would not be as difficult to move the work to a later and more protracted timeline.

"It's a matter of do we get them done this year or next year," Cason said.

Tribal attorneys who expect payment for work they have done for the Interior or BIA on water rights, boundary disputes or other issues may not be paid this year, Cason said. Most of that work is performed by the Justice Department, but from time to time tribal attorneys are asked to step in.

In numerous cases such as this, lawyers would do a lot of background work to make sure attorneys' fees would not be reimbursed out of tribal funds, John Dossett, general counsel for the National Congress of American Indians, said.

"In this case, none of that was done. I don't see [where] that happened. Tribes are concerned that money will come out of tribal programs, and it's clearly not what that fund is for," Dossett said.

Sen. Tim Johnson, D-S.D. and member of the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs, wrote in a response to Cason's letter: "I understand the Court's Order disturbed funding expectations; however, the inflammatory letter sent was an entirely unnecessary and inappropriate attempt to undermine the relationship between tribes and tribal members involved in the Cobell v. Norton case. It is my sincere hope that the Department revisits this decision and finds an adequate solution that fulfills its obligations to the first Americans."

NCAI President Joe Garcia called for a fair settlement to be negotiated soon and in good faith. During the annual State of the Indian Nations address on Jan. 30, Garcia said the decision to take funds from the BIA budget to comply with court orders to pay attorneys' fees "impedes our progress as tribal governments on nearly all other issues."

"Every year, the BIA budget gets cut. Every year we see somewhere from $100 million to $150 million taken out and moved over to Office of Special Trustee; that's a bigger concern. This issue of reimbursement of attorneys' fees is much smaller."

The majority of funds that will be paid to the Cobell attorneys will not come out of tribal programs. Cason said education and law enforcement are exempted.

"One of the problems the critics have not embraced is where you take the money from," Cason said, noting that there wasn't any money lying around that wasn't in use and that the department had to abide by the court order.

A 0.1 percent levy, which will generate $1 million, was imposed on most programs, including central office operations and tribal operations. In each case, the levy was small and broad-based, Cason said.

"We tried to spread the millions out so no one particular program took a big hit," Cason said.

"My advice to tribal leaders is, be careful. The financial environment has changed."

Some tribes will have an allocation reduced by $100. Cason said if that tribe works on a very slim margin, it would have a greater impact.

The BIA contributed $3 million to the attorneys' fee account, with $2 million of that coming from an account that would reimburse tribal attorneys and the other $1 million from the 0.1 percent levy.

The Cobell plaintiffs referred to the levy and fund distribution as a "cruel effort to inflict more pain on the victims of the government's long-acknowledged misbehavior." They claim the funds used to pay attorneys' fees come from areas that are designed to "punish Native Americans."

"Now that we have secured the rights to this accounting, and now that the government must pay the costs of that accounting, the Interior Department is planning to loot Indian accounts once again to cover up its misdeeds," said Eloise Cobell, lead plaintiff in the class action lawsuit.

The suit was filed nearly 10 years ago in an attempt to hold the government accountable and reconcile Individual Indian Money trust accounts for lease, royalties and other payments due tribal land owners. Cobell has stated that some $300 billion is at stake.

The Office of Special Trustee contributed $300,000 of funds that were planned for trust improvement activities; the Department of Treasury, another $2 million.

Cobell said the government could have found funds elsewhere to pay these legal fees. "They don't have to make Indians pay because they lost in court," she said.

The government, by its own admission, has spent some $100 million defending this lawsuit. Cobell said the fees and expenses were planned and the plaintiffs made it clear two years ago they would be seeking the legal fees.

"It's an interesting irony; when we pay, they claim we are divisive and terrible," Cason said of Cobell's criticism.

"If they are so concerned about the money they should say, 'We don't want programs to be hurt, so don't pay this.' If there was some magical pot of money somewhere - I don't know where it is," Cason said.

The Cobell plaintiffs continue to claim the government cannot win this drawn-out litigation. A settlement compromise has been placed on the table for reimbursement to the IIM account-holders for $27.5 billion. That figure is disputed by the government. The Senate Indian Affairs Committee has held hearings on proposed legislation that will settle the lawsuit, but failed to include monetary funds in the legislation.

"There are side effects of the litigation. I think the tribes have been supportive, but as time goes by there are side effects to the budget," Dossett said.

A group of tribal leaders, in a recent meeting in Bismarck, N.D., offered another possible settlement figure that ranges from $13 to $27.5 billion.

"I have never seen a more blatant and transparent attempt to politicize this case in order to divide and conquer Indian country," Cobell said.

"The funds that were cut serve the nation's poorest peoples and we should do everything that we can to maintain and increase program funding for Indian Country, not cut funding," Johnson said. "There are clearly better alternatives than cutting program funding, and I am willing to pursue solutions at the legislative level that do not involve politicizing the Cobell litigation."

The amount to be taken from tribal programs will not have as much impact as the most recent budget submitted by President Bush, which cuts the BIA by $65 million.

Distribution of attorneys' fees:

* Dennis Gingold, lead plaintiff attorney: $2 million

Expenses related to the lawsuit:

* Price Waterhouse Coopers: $2.5 million
* Thaddeus Holt: $350

Total fees and expenses:

$7,066,471

Source: Interior Department Associate Deputy Secretary James Cason's Jan. 26 letter to tribal leaders.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Drug Smuggling Air Marshals? (TIME)

By SALLY B. DONNELLY

Time, February 11, 2006

The arrest of a pair of agents on possible cocaine charges raises new concerns about the aviation security program

For a law enforcement agency that works hard to be invisible, the Federal Air Marshals have been generating a lot of attention lately. On Thursday, two of the agency's several thousand highly trained traveling armed guards were taken into custody in Houston. Although the US Attorney's office would not comment beyond acknowledging that the Air Marshals were arrested by agents from the Federal Bureau of Investigation and the Department of Homeland Security's Inspector General's office, Government sources tell TIME that the two Air Marshals, are allegedly involved with the possession or transportation of cocaine, and may have been paid several thousand dollars to move the drugs.

The marshals, one of whom is a former agent of the Drug Enforcement Administration, will likely appear in court to face criminal charges next week, and will almost certainly be suspended.

The incident comes only two months after two marshals shot and killed a man who claimed—falsely, as it turned out—to have a bomb while boarding an airplane in Miami. Although the official results of an investigation will not be complete until late spring, it is expected to conclude that the agents acted appropriately in their dealings with the passenger.

The arrest in Houston is a shock to an agency that plays an important role in aviation security. Although there have been air marshals flying for decades, on Sept. 11, 2001, the numbers had dwindled to only three dozen agents. After the attacks, the agency was drastically increased in size and many agents were drafted from other law enforcement agencies and local police departments.

New agents were-and are—subject to security screening and background checks similar to other federal law enforcement agencies, which are required to be updated only every five years.

Critics said the rush to expand allowed too many inexperienced men and women into the service, and there were reports of marshals clashing with airline personnel or other law enforcement agents. Aviation sources say the agency has spent the last few years weeding out poor performers, but the arrest of the two agents in Houston is sure to further stoke those concerns.

F.B.I. Raids In Puerto Rico (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, February 11, 2006

SAN JUAN, P.R., Feb. 10 (AP) — F.B.I. agents searched five homes and a business on Friday but made no arrests in an effort to thwart what the bureau said was a "domestic terrorist attack" planned by militants favoring independence for Puerto Rico.

The bureau said the investigation was focused on the Boricua Popular Army. The group, also known as the Macheteros or "cane cutters," was accused of bombings and attacks in the 1970's and 1980's. In September, F.B.I. agents killed Filiberto Ojeda Ríos, one of the group's leaders.

Everett Men Arrested In Connection To Fire (SEATIMES)

By Brian Alexander, Times Snohomish County Bureau

The Seattle Times, February 11, 2006

Two Everett men were jailed and two more suspects could be arrested soon in connection with a December fire that gutted a large condominium building under construction in downtown Edmonds.

The 21-year-old and 18-year-old men were arrested Thursday after they turned themselves in to police in Everett. They are being held in Snohomish County Jail on $75,000 bail each and might face federal charges, according to information released at a news conference Friday.

It was unclear what the motive was for the fire that burned down the 90,000-square-foot structure, at 505 Fifth Ave. S., on Dec. 17, but investigators said Friday it was unrelated to a local controversy about the building's size and height and it was not connected to ecoterrorism.

Neither of the men appeared to have significant local criminal records.

According to a probable-cause statement by an Edmonds police detective, a tip on the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives hotline identified the four suspects. The two men turned themselves in when they learned ATF investigators and police were on to them, said Kelvin Crenshaw, ATF special agent in charge.

During the investigation, an employee of the construction company was identified as an "associate" of the suspects, but the employee did not appear to be a suspect himself, according to the statement.

The employee then helped identify the men who were arrested Thursday, as well as two others, according to the detective's statement.

Authorities expect to arrest at least one of the two remaining suspects in the near future, said ATF spokeswoman Julianne Marshall.

Bruce Miyake, an assistant U.S. attorney, says he is considering whether to pursue federal charges against the people arrested in connection with the arson.

The minimum sentence for a federal arson conviction is five years, compared with less than two years for the state minimum, Miyake said.

A decision on the charges will be made by Monday, he said.

The break in the case was the result of tips and help from the public, Crenshaw said.

Bob Gregg, the building's owner, said he plans to rebuild "The Gregory" with nearly the same design and hopes it will be completed before the end of the year.

Gregg said he was "greatly relieved" to learn about the arrests, and it "brings some closure."

The estimated damage to the building was $4.5 million, Gregg said. Most of the building has already been torn down, but portions of the foundation that weren't damaged in the fire will be reused in the reconstruction.

The cause of the fire was previously undetermined because of part of a string of lights that couldn't be found in the wreckage of the fire, Crenshaw said. Without being able to find remains of the lights, investigators couldn't rule them out as a possible cause, he said.

Brian Alexander: 425-745-7845 or balexander@seattletimes.com

TAX:

Cheney Says New Unit Will Prove Tax Cuts Boost Revenue (WP)

By Nell Henderson

The Washington Post, February 11, 2006

Vice President Cheney said Thursday night that the verdict is in before the Bush administration's new tax analysis shop has even opened for business: Tax cuts boost federal government revenue.

That assertion won applause from his audience at the Conservative Political Action Conference, but it is a long-standing source of debate among many economists and tax experts at a time of rising federal budget deficits.

Cheney touted President Bush's recently announced proposal to create a tax analysis division as a move toward providing more evidence for the administration's side of the argument.

"The president's tax policies have strengthened the economy, as we knew they would," Cheney told the conference, according to a text posted on the White House's Web site. "And despite forecasts to the contrary, the tax cuts have translated into higher federal revenues."

Cheney said some forecasters have underestimated the degree to which tax cuts would stimulate economic growth and tax revenue.

"It's time to reexamine our assumptions and to consider using more dynamic analysis to measure the true impact of tax cuts on the American economy," Cheney said, explaining why Bush has proposed the new Treasury Department division. "The evidence is in, it's time for everyone to admit that sensible tax cuts increase economic growth and add to the federal treasury."

Bush's proposal, unveiled in his budget plan last week, comes as he is pushing Congress to make permanent the recent tax cuts that are scheduled to expire in coming years. The nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office predicted last month that the budget deficit would swell to $337 billion this year and that the red ink would end in 2012 only if the tax cuts were allowed to expire.

Treasury officials said yesterday that the president's proposed Division on Dynamic Analysis -- with a handful of employees and a $513,000 budget -- would go beyond the government's old "static" methods of analyzing proposed changes in tax policy only in terms of their direct effects on certain affected taxpayers. Instead, "dynamic" analysis looks at how tax changes cause consumers and businesses to behave differently in ways that affect the overall economy's growth.

DOJ_NMG_0014411

For example, a tax break to encourage business investment might lower some individual companies' tax bills -- looking like a hit to Treasury revenue under a static analysis. But if that tax cut caused businesses to buy more equipment, hire more workers and increase profits, that might contribute to stronger overall economic growth -- causing the employees and companies to pay more in income, sales and other taxes over time.

Treasury officials said yesterday that they would not initially use their dynamic analysis for "scoring," or estimating the effects of tax changes on the government's tax receipts. But the department said in a statement: "It is envisioned that dynamic analysis eventually would evolve into dynamic scoring . . . (maybe within a year or two)."

Some tax-cut proponents contend that tax cuts can essentially pay for themselves by spurring such strong economic growth that the additional tax revenue more than offsets the money lost to the cuts.

Many economists dispute that, arguing that the effects of tax cuts depend on how they are structured, on economic circumstances and on many other variables.

"All economists agree tax policy has an effect on the economy. The hard thing is to figure out how to measure these effects in the real world," said Leonard E. Burman, co-director of the Urban Institute-Brookings Institution Tax Policy Center.

Both Congress's Joint Committee on Taxation and the CBO provide dynamic analyses of how tax changes are likely to affect the larger economy, but they do not use dynamic scoring in the budget process.

"I am a proponent of doing this," said Douglas Holtz-Eakin, a fellow at the Council on Foreign Relations who introduced dynamic analysis while he was CBO director.

But, he added, because of the challenges of developing good models and the difficulty of the findings, "there are limits to how useful it is as a policy tool."

White House Calls For New Tax-Cut Analysis Unit (WSJ)

By Robert Guy Matthews

The Wall Street Journal, February 11, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Bush administration, in a maneuver in the long-running battle between proponents and critics of supply-side economics, said it wants to create a "dynamic analysis" unit within the Treasury's tax-policy office to determine how tax proposals would affect economic growth.

President Bush's 2007 budget, released earlier this week, proposed $513,000 to set up the office. If approved by Congress, the office's main task would be to determine the macroeconomic effects of proposed tax cuts.

For decades, adherents of supply-side economics have argued that cutting tax rates can pay for itself -- or come close -- by stimulating economic activity that generates more tax revenue. They have been frustrated that estimates by Treasury and congressional score-keepers don't reflect this approach.

Many mainstream economists, while acknowledging that tax cuts can have revenue-generating effects, challenge the magnitude of the effects that supply-siders predict.

The analyses produced by the new Treasury unit probably would bolster White House arguments that certain tax cuts generate hardier long-term economic growth. "They have been making the argument that tax cuts are essential for economic growth," said Eric Toder, a former Clinton administration Treasury tax economist now at Urban Institute, a think tank here. "I take it as some kind of indication that they are concerned that people are getting worried about budget deficits and the administration wants to provide more ammunition in support of their tax cuts."

Dynamic analysis means assessing the economic effects of tax or other legislative proposals on the macroeconomy and the federal budget, often with alternative sets of assumptions. It is a step toward the more controversial practice of dynamic scoring, using such analyses to estimate the effect that a proposed tax change will have on federal revenues. Dynamic scoring makes it easier to enact tax cuts because it reduces, and might even eliminate, the negative effect on federal revenues.

The Bush administration isn't proposing that the office engage in dynamic scoring. But some analysts said that creating a Treasury office for dynamic analysis would be a first step toward dynamic scoring. "I think this is a signal that if they do this dynamic analysis now, that in time they will do dynamic scoring," said Michael Graetz, a Yale Law School tax professor who was a Treasury official in the George H.W. Bush administration.

DOJ_NMG_0014412

Robert Carroll, deputy assistant Treasury secretary for tax analysis said that there were no immediate plans to start dynamic scoring, but added that the administration hadn't ruled it out either. "We here at Treasury have to become more comfortable," he said. "The models are complicated and sensitivity is an issue." He added, "This seems to me, a very reasonable first step," he said.

The Congressional Budget Office and Joint Committee on Taxation, the official scorekeepers in Congress, conduct dynamic analyses, but don't use dynamic scoring to price tax proposals. Mr. Carroll said the assumptions that they use would be different than the assumptions used at Treasury and therefore another dynamic-analysis division is needed.

Mr. Carroll said he expects to offer a dynamic analysis of Mr. Bush's proposed $1.7 trillion in tax cuts in time for the midsession budget review later in the year. Mr. Carroll also said he expects the new office to work on the current tax-overhaul proposal put forth late last year by a panel commissioned by President Bush.

Write to Robert Guy Matthews at robertguy.matthews@wsj.com1

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Tells Nervous GOP To Focus On Economy (AP)

By David Espo

AP, February 11, 2006

President Bush told nervous lawmakers in his own party on Friday that Republicans should stress the economy and the war on terror as they move deeper into the election year.

Bush also defended his administration's program of warrantless wiretapping, and vowed to stay the course in the global campaign to wipe out terrorism, according to participants in a closed-door session. "Don't lose your nerve. I'm not going to lose mine," one member of his audience quoted him as saying.

Bush spent more than 90 minutes with House Republicans, gathered for a retreat at a resort on Maryland's Eastern Shore. He spoke near the midpoint of their three-day meeting, a blend of policy and politics that included the premiere of a tongue-in-cheek video modeled on Star Wars.

Shown to lawmakers on Thursday night, the video lampooned GOP political opponents as "The evil Democrat empire." California Rep. Nancy Pelosi (news, bio, voting record), the Democratic leader, was depicted as "Darth Nancy."

The "empire" soon struck back, as Pelosi and other Democrats announced that Star Wars director George Lucas would be appearing with them at a town hall-style meeting at the Capitol next week.

GOP leaders described the session with Bush as unusually wide-ranging. "He answered nearly every question under the sun," said Rep. Deborah Pryce (news, bio, voting record) of Ohio, and Speaker Dennis Hastert called it "an hour and a half of give and take."

Other officials said Bush was asked about the controversy surrounding the National Security Agency wiretapping program, about education, health care and immigration, and the polls that show a majority of people believe the country is on the wrong track.

Social Security, the issue that dominated Bush's agenda a year ago, did not come up, they said.

These officials spoke on condition of anonymity, saying they were not authorized to speak publicly about the event.

The president's own support in the polls is in the neighborhood of only 40 percent, and some Republicans are concerned about the drag that might have on their ability to retain control of the House in the November elections.

When asked about polls, Bush responded that if he worried about them, "I would be in the fetal position right now, which wouldn't be a pretty sight," one participant said. Participants in the meeting said he then described his own role as that of "educator in chief" who travels the country discussing the war on terror and the economy, and he recommended GOP lawmakers do likewise.

DOJ_NMG_0014413

According to those in the audience, he said policies he had advocated and Congress had approved had begun modernizing health care, and he cited laser eye surgery as an example of how competition can help lower costs.

White House aides had arranged for only the first few minutes of the session to be open to reporters. But an apparent mistake left a microphone on for longer than anticipated.

In the interim, he said, "I support the free press, let's just get them out of the room. ..."

"I want to share some thoughts with you before I answer your questions," he went on to the Republican House members. "First of all, I expect this conversation we're about to have to stay in the room. I know that's impossible in Washington."

He then moved to a defense of the NSA program that allows wiretaps without court warrants as part of certain terrorist investigations.

"I wake up every morning thinking about a future attack, and therefore, a lot of my thinking, and a lot of the decisions I make are based upon the attack that hurt us," Bush said.

Referring to the controversy surrounding whether the program is legal, he said, "We put constant checks on the program."

"I take my oath of office seriously. I swear to uphold the Constitution and laws of the United States," Bush said.

The Star Wars-style video was aired Thursday night, when Rep. Tom Reynolds of New York, chairman of the GOP campaign committee, briefed lawmakers on the party's midterm election prospects.

In comments to reporters on Friday, he conceded that historical trends and the polls portend difficulties. But he said Democrats must win 82 percent of the competitive seats on the ballot to gain a majority in November.

Ethics Scandals Cast Shadow On GOP Retreat (LAT)

By Richard Simon

The Los Angeles Times, February 11, 2006

CAMBRIDGE, Md. — "We are in trouble."

Rep. Paul D. Ryan (R-Wis.) made that comment a week ago, discussing his party's political fortunes. And his remark aptly summarized the attitude here Friday at a gathering of House Republicans.

In years past — especially since President Bush took office — these annual retreats have been celebratory affairs, with Republicans reveling in their success and plotting an aggressive legislative agenda.

This meeting, however, was marked by anxiety and uncertainty. The GOP House members, fresh from a leadership battle within their ranks, are divided over how the party should respond to ethics scandals roiling Capitol Hill.

And with Bush having backed off his prime legislative goal of a year ago — restructuring Social Security — and promoting no programs of similar scope, some Republican lawmakers wonder whether they need an improved strategy for this fall's congressional elections.

For Bush, who spoke to the assemblage at a riverside resort on Maryland's Eastern Shore, the campaign message was clear. He urged his fellow Republicans to run on a record that included more tax reductions, more cuts to the federal budget and a tough stance in the war on terrorism.

"We've got a record, and it's a record of accomplishment," Bush said before a closed-door question-and-answer session.

But, as indicated by Ryan's comment, new poll results have raised questions among many Republicans about whether the public will embrace the president's message.

A survey conducted Feb. 1-5 showed that by 50% to 41%, the public favored a Democratic House. And 31% of those interviewed said they viewed November's vote as a chance to cast a ballot against Bush.

The poll, conducted by the Pew Research Center for the People and the Press, has an error margin of plus or minus 3 to 4 percentage points.

"House Republicans are at some risk of losing their majority," said John J. Pitney, a professor at Claremont McKenna College. "The Democrats don't need a huge tide. A few good ripples could do the trick."

Rep. Jack Kingston of Georgia, a midlevel House GOP leader, said that to stem Democratic advances, Republicans intended to spotlight issues that connected "with the American dinner table." These include extending tax cuts enacted during Bush's first term that are due to expire this decade, and addressing energy prices.

DOJ_NMG_0014414

Another issue discussed at the retreat — but unlikely to be emphasized nationally — was immigration policy. Although most Republicans support tougher border controls, the party is riven over Bush's call for a guest-worker program.

The GOP meeting, which wraps up today, convened a week after House Republicans elected Rep. John A. Boehner of Ohio to succeed Rep. Tom DeLay of Texas as majority leader. DeLay left the post after he was indicted in his home state on money-laundering charges. In winning the race, Boehner upset a DeLay ally, Rep. Roy Blunt of Missouri.

Also shadowing the retreat were scandals involving former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Rancho Santa Fe), who resigned late last year after pleading guilty to bribery, and lobbyist Jack Abramoff, a once-close associate of several GOP congressional leaders who pleaded guilty in January to corruption charges stemming from his business activities.

In a sign of a new wariness toward influence-peddling, lobbyists — welcomed at previous retreats — were barred from the grounds this year.

Several measures have been proposed in Congress that would tighten the guidelines governing lawmakers' dealings with lobbyists. House Republicans, however, are split over how far to go, and no consensus was expected to emerge from the retreat.

Some back a ban on lawmaker trips paid for by interest groups. There also is a push to end the long-standing practice of allowing House and Senate members to insert pet projects into spending bills — items often included at the behest of lobbyists.

Both proposals have sparked dissent. The privately funded trips are popular among lawmakers, and some say that a ban could deprive lawmakers of valuable fact-finding opportunities or shift the costs for such travel to the taxpayers.

Boehner, in a break with House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), is among those who have questioned the proposed travel ban.

And Rep. Thomas M. Reynolds (R-N.Y.), typifying a view held by many of his colleagues, said Friday that projects added to spending bills could be among a lawmaker's strongest assets at reelection time.

A newspaper in his area, he said, "believes that I ought to be bringing home the bacon."

Pitney, of Claremont McKenna, expressed skepticism that approval of new ethics rules would significantly affect the outcome of November's election.

"No matter what passes, the Democrats will say that it's not enough," he said.

Pointing to complaints about the new Medicare prescription drug program, Pitney said Republicans instead should be "working like crazy" to fix those problems.

Reynolds, chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee, which helps House GOP candidates, dismissed the possible consequences of the cases involving Cunningham, DeLay and Abramoff (the latter's cooperation with federal investigators could cause legal woes for Republican lawmakers).

"I have never seen the actions of one member of Congress affect another member's outcome" in an election, Reynolds said.

Still, Reynolds said he was attempting to recruit Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), a champion of reform, to stump for House Republican candidates this fall.

Bush, in his speech, urged unified GOP support for initiatives he outlined in his State of the Union address last week: big boosts in funding for science and math education, increased research aimed at making the U.S. more competitive in the global economy, and faster development of alternative energy sources to reduce U.S. dependence on Middle Eastern oil.

At the start of his question-and-answer period, in remarks heard by reporters when microphones were left on, Bush defended the secret spying program he authorized after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks. Some GOP senators have joined Democrats in questioning the legality of monitoring international phone calls and e-mails of people in the U.S. without obtaining court warrants.

Sept. 11 "changed the way I think," Bush said, echoing his previous comments on the issue. "I wake up every morning thinking about a future attack, and therefore, a lot of my thinking and a lot of the decisions I make are based upon the attack that hurt us."

Ryan, the Wisconsin congressman, on Friday sounded a more positive note about the party's direction than he had last week.

DOJ_NMG_0014415

"With a new [House] leadership team and a clear recognition that reform is essential to upholding our principles, I see real renewal occurring that is healthy and positive," he said.

Bush Rallies Scandal-rocked Republicans (REU)

By Thomas Ferraro

Reuters, February 11, 2006

President Bush was closely questioned by fellow Republicans on his policy on Iran, health care, immigration and other hot-button issues on Friday at a closed meeting meant to rally party members for this year's congressional elections.

Sources at a retreat of the scandal-rocked Republicans in the House of Representatives said Bush drew an ovation when he defended his program to eavesdrop without court warrants on Americans with suspected terrorist ties, a program that has been questioned by both Democrats and some Republicans.

But the sources, who asked not to be named as the meeting was formally closed, said lawmakers, anxious over polls showing waning faith in them and the president, pressed him on issues that could be critical in the November elections.

Many members of the president's party have voiced concerns about the $2.77 trillion federal budget that Bush proposed this week, which would boost defense spending but bring cuts in 141 domestic programs, from veterans health care to housing.

In brief opening remarks, which were public, Bush cited what he said had been major House accomplishments in 2006, including passage of bills on energy, bankruptcy, immigration and the anti-terrorism USA Patriot Act.

"And we're ready to lead again," Bush told the second day of a three-day meeting of House Republicans in Cambridge, Md., a two-hour bus ride from Washington. "We don't fear the future because we're going to shape the future."

Many senior lawmakers have been drawn into an investigation of powerful Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff, who last month pleaded guilty to fraud and agreed to cooperate with investigators.

"GLITCHES" IN DRUGS PROGRAM

One Republican said Bush defended the new Medicare prescription drug program, whose introduction has drawn enormous criticism, saying, "When you enroll 26 million people into program in 30 days, there are going to be some glitches."

Many political analysts say public dissatisfaction over the ethics scandal, the Iraq war and other issues including health care, threatens the party's control of the House, which it has held since 1995.

Bush shrugged off the importance of opinion polls. One attendee at the meeting said he drew laughter by joking: "If I watched the poll numbers every day, I'd be lying in the fetal position. It wouldn't be a pretty sight." Bush said he acted on the basis of what he believes is right, not polls.

Bush again asserted that the domestic surveillance program was legal, and he drew support from House Speaker Dennis Hastert, who told reporters, "There are adequate protections."

"If somebody in this country, whether he is a foreign national or a citizen, is talking to al Qaeda somebody ought to know about it and know why it is happening," Hastert said.

House Republicans described their retreat as a chance to regroup and discuss their emerging legislative agenda, which they say will include lobbying and ethics reform.

The retreat was to end on Saturday after members and staff attend a seminar on the House's ethics rules. "I think it'll help ensure that members and staff live up to those rules," said House Majority Leader John Boehner of Ohio.

Boehner was elected House majority leader last week, replacing Rep. Tom DeLay, who was forced to step down from the leadership post last year after being indicted in his home state of Texas on campaign-related felony charges.

Bush Reveals Rationale Behind Surveillance (AP)

By Jennifer Loven

AP, February 11, 2006

President Bush defended his warrantless eavesdropping program Friday, saying during what he thought were private remarks that he concluded that spying on Americans was necessary to fill a gap in the United States' security.

DOJ_NMG_0014416

"I wake up every morning thinking about a future attack, and therefore, a lot of my thinking, and a lot of the decisions I make are based upon the attack that hurt us," Bush told the House Republican Caucus, which was in retreat at a luxury resort along the Choptank River on Maryland's Eastern Shore.

The president said he asked the National Security Agency to devise a way to gather intelligence on terrorists' potential activities, and the result was the super-secret spy outfit's program to monitor the international e-mails and phone calls of people inside the United States with suspected ties to terrorists overseas. Bush said lawyers in the White House and at the Justice Department signed off on the program's legality, and "we put constant checks on the program."

"I take my oath of office seriously. I swear to uphold the Constitution and laws of the United States," Bush said.

The president's comments on the NSA eavesdropping came after six minutes of remarks intended for public consumption. In them, Bush stroked lawmakers with thanks and gave a gentle push for his 2006 priorities in a scaled-back version of last month's State of the Union address.

"I'm looking forward to working with you. And I'm confident we'll continue the success we have had together," he said. "So I've come to say thanks for your hard work in the past and thanks for what we're going to do to make this country continue to be the greatest country on the face of the Earth."

He indirectly pressed his call — difficult in an election year — for Congress to approve $70 billion in savings from benefit programs such as Medicare, Medicaid, food stamps and payments to farmers over the next five years, and to cut dozens of other programs that the White House has determined don't produce results.

"It's hard work, to cut out and cut back on programs that don't work," Bush said. "Every program sounds beautiful in Washington, D.C. until you start analyzing the results."

Reporters then were ushered out — "I support the free press, let's just get them out of the room," Bush said — so the president could speak privately to his fellow Republicans.

"I want to share some thoughts with you before I answer your questions," said Bush, unaware that microphones were still on and were allowing those back in the White House press room to eavesdrop on his eavesdropping defense. "First of all, I expect this conversation we're about to have to stay in the room. I know that's impossible in Washington."

That was not to be — and it was telling that the president chose the controversial NSA program as the first topic to raise out of reporters' earshot. Even so, there was no substantive difference between those statements and the series of public speeches he has given recently on the program.

The eavesdropping program has come under fire from Republicans as well as Democrats. They argue that Bush already has the authority to monitor such communications through existing law that requires a warrant from a secret court set up to act quickly, or even after the fact. Bush has argued that the system isn't nimble enough.

The titular head of the Republican Party faced a House GOP Caucus in turmoil.

With most of Congress up for re-election in November, the House GOP is just off a bruising fight to replace former Majority Leader Tom DeLay, R-Texas, is grappling with reforming the time-honored congressional tradition of funding individual pet projects known as earmarks, and faces potentially damaging revelations in an ongoing public corruption investigation centered on a high-flying lobbyist with extensive ties to Republicans.

Though the lawmakers gave Bush a standing ovation and interrupted his remarks several times with applause, questions in the private setting typically are sharper than in public get-togethers.

White House press secretary Scott McClellan said that Bush kept his prepared remarks brief so that he would have extra time for the more freewheeling portion of the discussion, which went on for one hour and 40 minutes. Only the first few minutes of that — before any lawmakers' questions — were heard by reporters.

Bush Defends Spy Program In Speech At GOP Meeting (BSUN)

By Julie Hirschfeld Davis And Gwyneth K. Shaw

The Baltimore Sun, February 11, 2006

Budget, energy, education, health care also discussed at Md. retreat

CAMBRIDGE -- President Bush defended his warrantless eavesdropping program to House Republicans yesterday amid criticism by some in his own party, telling lawmakers the activities were legal and under constant review.

Bush described the National Security Agency wiretapping program as an outgrowth of his belief that "we must do everything in our power to protect the country," adding that he often thinks about the possibility of another terrorist attack.

His remarks came during what Bush intended to be a private session with about 180 Republicans gathered at a posh waterfront resort here for an annual agenda-setting retreat. But a technical glitch enabled reporters to hear the comments, which Bush opened by exhorting lawmakers to keep the discussion to themselves.

"I expect this conversation we're about to have to stay in the room. I know that's impossible in Washington," Bush said after reporters were escorted out of the ballroom where he spoke.

His off-camera defense of the eavesdropping program, which Democrats and some Republicans say should be subjected to court review, echoed Bush's public drive to rally support for it.

"September the 11th changed the way I think," Bush said. "I wake up every morning thinking about a future attack."

Bush argued that the eavesdropping, which tracks some communications inside the United States, passes legal muster.

"See, like you, I take my oath of office seriously. I swear to uphold the Constitution and laws of the United States," Bush said.

Bush spent more than 90 minutes in the closed-door session fielding questions from the members of Congress on such topics as energy policy and health care, as well as others that have divided the party, such as the NSA program and his immigration plan, a White House aide said.

Lawmakers, some in jeans or chinos as they relaxed with their families at the resort on the banks of the Choptank River, asked between 10 and 15 questions, one senior Republican aide estimated.

Bush was upbeat in his remarks to a Republican team struggling to regain its footing and protect its majority status amid ethics scandals and intraparty bickering.

The House Republicans swarmed around him for about a half-hour before he spoke, lining up with their children and spouses for handshakes and photographs.

In brief remarks before the news media representatives were ushered out, Bush urged the Republican House to enact an agenda of deep spending cuts, permanent tax cuts, tax breaks for private health care spending, alternative energy development, and improved math and science education.

Bush, whose sagging popularity could signal a problem for Republicans up for re-election this year, also acknowledged the difficulties they share.

"It's hard work to cut out and cut back on programs that don't work," he said during a six-minute speech packed with praise for the House members.

White House press secretary, Scott McClellan, said the president wanted to spend the bulk of his time answering Republicans' questions behind closed doors. McClellan added that Republicans "were very appreciative" that Bush spent "most of his time answering questions and talking about priorities that are most on the minds of the American people."

The president waited until he thought reporters were safely out of hearing range, however, before raising the NSA program, in a nod to its sensitivity and the party divisions it has exposed.

After Bush departed, Republican leaders told reporters he had left the House members optimistic about the year ahead.

"The president and the Congress share a very aggressive agenda," said House Speaker Dennis Hastert of Illinois.

Rep. John T. Doolittle of California said he was impressed with the detail and sophistication of Bush's remarks during a rare opportunity to see the president in a closed-door setting. He called it "the equivalent of a post-graduate seminar on world diplomacy."

One Republican aide who was present for the question-and-answer session described it as cordial, with some members offering glowing compliments before asking Bush a question.

Maryland's two Republican House members, Reps. Wayne T. Gilchrest and Roscoe G. Bartlett, did not attend the meeting. Gilchrest, whose district includes Cambridge, said he hoped to catch the closing session of the conference today at the Hyatt resort.

DOJ_NMG_0014418

Hastert and other party leaders said Bush's appearance would help crystallize discussions held during the conference, which included a session with White House budget chief Joshua B. Bolten after Bush returned to Washington.

Fiscal conservatives are pressing the party to take major steps to curtail government spending, and Bush's $2.77 trillion budget for the fiscal year beginning in October has not been enthusiastically embraced on Capitol Hill.

The retreat will continue until this afternoon, weather permitting, with a scheduled discussion of proposed changes to the rules governing lawmakers' interactions with lobbyists. The scandal enveloping Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff has roiled Washington and prompted calls for reforms.

julie.davis@baltsun.com gwyneth.shaw@baltsun.com

Bush's Job Approval Stuck Near Bottom (AP)

By Will Lester

AP, February 11, 2006

President Bush's marks on overall job approval and for handling the economy are mired near their lowest levels despite a spike in consumer confidence over the past month, an AP-Ipsos poll found.

Bush's job approval is now at 40 percent and his approval on handling the economy at 39 percent. Those numbers haven't budged over the last month even with the public's confidence in the economy growing and the president delivering an upbeat State of the Union address.

Consumer confidence was measured at its highest level in 16 months in the RBC CASH index released Friday.

The AP-Ipsos poll found that the president has slightly improved his standing on handling foreign policy and terrorism to 47 percent. This comes as the public has grown more accepting of the administration's policy on domestic eavesdropping, with almost half now supporting it — up from 42 percent last month.

The president has been campaigning aggressively for that program over the last month, repeatedly telling people that eavesdropping on some international calls is legal and necessary in his war against terrorism.

The poll found low approval of Congress with 47 percent wanting Democrats to take control. Republican control was favored by 37 percent.

The telephone poll of 1,000 adults was conducted Monday through Wednesday and has a margin of error of plus or minus 3 percentage points.

Republican Speaks Up, Leading Others To Challenge Wiretaps (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, February 11, 2006

WASHINGTON, Feb. 10 — When Representative Heather A. Wilson broke ranks with President Bush on Tuesday to declare her "serious concerns" about domestic eavesdropping, she gave voice to what some fellow Republicans were thinking, if not saying.

Now they are speaking up — and growing louder.

In interviews over several days, Congressional Republicans have expressed growing doubts about the National Security Agency program to intercept international communications inside the United States without court warrants. A growing number of Republicans say the program appears to violate the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, the 1978 law that created a court to oversee such surveillance, and are calling for revamping the FISA law.

Ms. Wilson and at least six other Republican lawmakers are openly skeptical about Mr. Bush's assertion that he has the inherent authority to order the wiretaps and that Congress gave him the power to do so when it authorized him to use military force after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

The White House, in a turnabout, briefed the full House and Senate Intelligence Committee on the program this week, after Ms. Wilson, chairwoman of the subcommittee that oversees the N.S.A., had called for a full-scale Congressional investigation. But some Republicans say that is not enough.

DOJ_NMG_0014419

"I don't think that's sufficient," Senator Susan Collins, Republican of Maine, said. "There is considerable concern about the administration's just citing the president's inherent authority or the authorization to go to war with Iraq as grounds for conducting this program. It's a stretch."

The criticism became apparent on Monday, when Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales was the sole witness before the Senate Judiciary Committee in a hearing on the legality of the eavesdropping. Mr. Gonzales faced tough questioning from 4 of the 10 Republicans on the panel, including its chairman, Senator Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania.

By week's end, after Ms. Wilson became the first Republican on either the House or the Senate Intelligence Committees to call for a Congressional inquiry, the critics had become a chorus. Senator Lisa Murkowski, Republican of Alaska, said the more she learned about the program, the more its "gray areas" concerned her.

Mr. Specter said he would draft legislation to put the issue in the hands of the intelligence surveillance court by having its judges rule on the constitutionality of the program.

Even Senator Orrin G. Hatch, the Utah Republican and Judiciary Committee member who has been a staunch supporter of the eavesdropping, said that although he did not think the law needed revising, Congress had to have more oversight.

"The administration has gone a long way in the last couple of days to assure people that this highly classified program is critical to the protection of the nation," Mr. Hatch said. "I think they've more than made a persuasive case. The real question is how do we have oversight?"

In part, the backlash is a symptom of Congressional muscle flexing; a sort of mutiny on Capitol Hill, where lawmakers have been frustrated by the way Mr. Bush boldly exercises his executive authority.

Senator Lindsey Graham, Republican of South Carolina, who has also criticized the program, said Ms. Wilson's comments were "a sign of a growing movement" by lawmakers to reassert the power of the legislature.

"This is sort of a Marbury v. Madison moment between the executive and the legislative branch," Mr. Graham said in a reference to the 1803 Supreme Court decision in which the court granted itself the power to declare laws unconstitutional.

"I think there's two things going on," said Mr. Graham, a Judiciary Committee member. "There's an abandonment of you-broke-the-law rhetoric by the Democrats and a more questioning attitude about what the law should be by the Republicans. And that merges for a very healthy debate."

Senator Chuck Hagel, Republican of Nebraska, said: "I don't think anyone wants any kind of constitutional showdown over this. We want the president to succeed, but the fact is we are a coequal branch of government and we have serious oversight responsibilities."

The White House insists that there is no need to amend the law, a position that a spokeswoman, Dana Perino, restated on Friday. But Mr. Bush also made clear on Friday that he was tuned in to the growing Republican angst. At a retreat with House Republicans in Cambridge, Md., he began private remarks by defending the legality of the eavesdropping, a White House pool report said.

Apparently thinking that his microphone had been turned off so reporters could not hear, the president told lawmakers that he wanted to "share some thoughts with you" before answering questions.

"I expect this conversation we're about to have to stay in the room," Mr. Bush began. "I know that's impossible in Washington."

He restated what he had said publicly, that the program was legal and necessary for the nation's safety.

"You've got to understand something about me," Mr. Bush said. "Sept. 11 changed the way I think. I told the people exactly what I felt at the time, and I still feel it, and that is we must do everything in our power to protect the country."

Ms. Wilson later stood up to pose a question, and many in the room braced for a confrontation, said an attendee who insisted on anonymity because the session was private.

But there was no showdown. Ms. Wilson simply thanked Mr. Bush and told him that everyone wanted to catch the terrorists.

At the age of 45, Ms. Wilson has considerable credentials in national security. She is a graduate of the Air Force Academy and a former Air Force officer. A Rhodes Scholar, Ms. Wilson obtained a master's degree and doctorate in international relations. She also worked as an arms control negotiator for the National Security Council under the first President Bush.

"I think that had an impact on the administration," she said. "They knew that people in Congress would listen to me on this."

DOJ_NMG_0014420

But Ms. Wilson, who represents a swing district in Albuquerque, also faces a tough re-election challenge from the attorney general of New Mexico, Patricia Madrid.

Representative Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, said Ms. Wilson was most likely distancing herself from the White House to curry favor back home.

Yet Representative Jane Harman of California, the senior Democrat on the Intelligence Committee, said Ms. Wilson expressed private concerns to her about the eavesdropping last year, shortly after it became public.

"She was very concerned," said Ms. Harman, who has supported the program in the past but said she now believed that its legal underpinnings were weak. "She came to me, asking me what I thought."

Ms. Wilson said she decided to speak out this week because she had become increasingly "frustrated that the administration was not giving us the information we needed to do our job." With Mr. Gonzales unable or unwilling to answer questions at the Senate hearing, she said, there was no way to determine whether the surveillance law needed to be updated.

"I think the argument that somehow, in passing the use-of-force resolution, that that was authorizing the president and the administration free rein to do whatever they wanted to do, so long as they tied it to the war on terror, was a bit of a stretch," she said. "And I don't think that's what most members of Congress felt they were doing."

White House Effort To Defuse GOP Qualms On Security May Isolate Democrats (KRT)

By James Kuhnhenn

Knight Ridder, February 11, 2006

WASHINGTON - Twice this week the White House gave ground on issues of national security to appease dissident Republican lawmakers, an uncharacteristic retreat for a president who believes that the best defense is a good offense.

First, the Bush administration agreed to brief the full House and Senate Intelligence Committees on its domestic surveillance program, after refusing to do so for years. Then White House officials compromised on civil-liberties concerns that had blocked renewal of the Patriot Act.

The concessions yielded mixed results. The Patriot Act is now virtually assured of passage. But some Republicans still resist the secret domestic-surveillance program and insist on new legislation to resolve questions about whether it's constitutional.

The developments show that the White House can be forced to compromise even on national security when Republicans and Democrats demand it together. But they also demonstrate that if the White House can appease GOP dissidents, Democrats run the risk of being labeled soft on national security and may have to back down.

As both parties head into the 2006 congressional elections, the White House is trying to minimize divisions within the Republican Party. Democrats, meanwhile, are walking a fine line, supporting an aggressive stance against terrorism while calling for civil liberties protections.

For example, when Republicans announced Thursday that they'd brokered a Patriot Act deal with the White House, two of the Democratic Party's leaders, Sens. Harry Reid of Nevada and Richard Durbin of Illinois, welcomed the agreement as a positive step, even though many Democrats harbored reservations about it.

But Democrats continue to insist on an investigation into the domestic-spying program - with some calling the president's actions criminal - not least because they enjoy political cover from continued resistance to the program by some Republicans.

The White House welcomes the political fight.

"With an important election coming up, people need to know just how we view the most critical questions of national security," Vice President Dick Cheney told conservative activists this week.

In an interview with Knight Ridder on Friday, Reid took up the challenge.

"No matter what the president says about the American people supporting his absolute power to do whatever he wants in the fight against terrorism, that is not how the American people feel," the Senate Democratic leader said.

Polls indicate that the country is closely divided on the issue. The Pew Research Center for the People and the Press found this week that 54 percent believe it was proper for the government's secret National Security Agency to monitor calls and e-mails between U.S. residents and suspected terrorists without court warrants. Forty-three percent opposed it.

As a result, some Democrats aren't eager to fight President Bush on national security.

"The White House is defusing these issues among Republicans, but on the other hand they will use it as a wedge against Democrats," said Marshall Wittmann, an analyst at the centrist Democratic Leadership Council. "This issue will not be played with great subtlety come the fall. It will be, who do you want? The ACLU or the NSA to defend you?"

This week's congressional hearings kept Washington's focus on the spying program even as some Democrats tried to play up Republican lobbying scandals and cuts in Bush's budget.

Still, Reid said that Democrats wouldn't turn away from the debate over spying.

"People want the war on terrorism to be fought every way that they can. I agree with them," he said. "But there is no reason to do things that appear to be illegal and unconstitutional, as even Republicans say. We have significant support from the Republicans. ... These are real conservative Republicans saying slow down there."

Among the Republicans still raising questions about the program are Sens. Lindsey Graham of South Carolina, Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania and Mike DeWine of Ohio. In the House, Rep. Heather Wilson, R-N.M., a member of the House Intelligence Committee, pressed the White House to give her panel more details about the NSA program.

Even after the briefings, Republican critics didn't back down.

Specter said he'd propose legislation to require the program to be reviewed by the secret federal court that reviews government requests for warrants authorizing domestic spying.

DeWine said the intelligence committees need to continue oversight of the program, but he favors amending the law to let Bush continue.

"In an emergency, I believe the president of the United States has the authority to protect the American people," said DeWine. "After a certain period of time, it is right and prudent for the president to go to Congress to get specific statutory authorization to continue such a program. I think we, in all likelihood, have reached such a time."

RNC Chief Defends Domestic Wiretaps (WP)

By Dan Balz

The Washington Post, February 11, 2006

Mehlman Assails Democrats on Security Issues

Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman yesterday accused Democratic leaders of wanting to deny law enforcement officials the tools they need to defend against terrorism and criticized them for challenging President Bush's program of warrantless surveillance of potential terrorists.

In a sharply worded speech to the Conservative Political Action Conference, Mehlman said Republicans do not question the patriotism of the opposition party leaders, but he added, "These are people we know love their country. The question is: Can they protect it?"

Citing national security, the federal judiciary and the economy, Mehlman said Americans will have clear choices in the 2006 election. He urged his audience of conservative activists to take the GOP message directly to friends and neighbors, rather than trusting major news organizations that he said have failed to understand the appeal of conservative ideas and leaders.

"We can't depend on the . . . mainstream media to do it for us," he said. "They got Ronald Reagan wrong, just like Democrats did, and they're still getting conservatives wrong."

Democrats have accused GOP leaders of trying to play politics with national security issues and have pointed out that the administration's covert surveillance program has even drawn challenges from some Republicans.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) spoke after Mehlman, and he promised that on June 5 he will bring to the floor a constitutional amendment to bar same-sex marriage, and pledged a May vote on eliminating the estate tax, items high on the conservative agenda.

Frist said the amendment is needed to protect the majority of Americans, whom he said oppose same-sex marriage, from "the whims of a few activist judges" who seek to "override the commonsense of the American people." He added, "When America's values are under attack, we need to act."

A similar amendment failed to win the necessary votes in 2004.

DOJ_NMG_0014422

Frist charged the Democrats with being leaderless and in the back pocket of liberal constituency groups such as MoveOn.org, NARAL Pro-Choice America and People for the American Way.

Claiming credit for the confirmation of Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr., Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. and several conservative judges filibustered by Democrats in the previous Congress, Frist said Democrats were not speaking for their constituents when they opposed Alito. "It looked to me like they were speaking for those far-left, liberal interest groups," he said.

RNC Chief Slams Democrats (WT)

By Bill Sammon

The Washington Times, February 11, 2006

Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman yesterday ridiculed Democrats and the "mainstream media," but said Republicans must embrace reform in order to win the 2006 elections.

"One of the oldest lessons in history is that power corrupts," Mr. Mehlman warned in a speech to the Conservative Political Action Conference in Washington.

"And if we are to learn from that particular lesson of history, then we must take a stand, right here, right now, against corruption," he added. "We must remember that public service is a sacred trust, and we cannot allow it to be sullied by anyone -- Democrat or Republican."

The acknowledgement was an attempt to counter the Democratic charge that Republicans are immersed in a "culture of corruption." In recent months, Rep. Tom DeLay, Texas Republican, has been indicted and Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff, in a separate case, has pleaded guilty to corruption charges.

But Mr. Mehlman spent most of his speech excoriating Democrats and journalists. Less than a week after saying he detected "a lot of anger" in Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, Mr. Mehlman yesterday slammed the New York Democrat for advocating a rollback of President Bush's tax cuts.

"To support our troops in Iraq, guess how Hillary Clinton would pay for it?" he said. "Higher taxes."

Mr. Mehlman also went after House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat, and Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean for attacking the National Security Agency's (NSA) terrorist surveillance program.

"Do Nancy Pelosi and Howard Dean really think that when the NSA is listening in on terrorists planning attacks on America, they should hang up when those terrorists call their sleeper cells in the United States?" he said.

Mr. Mehlman also expressed incredulity that Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat, was "proud when he announced last year, and I quote, 'We killed the Patriot Act.' "

"We do not and we never should question these Democrat leaders' patriotism," he added. "But we do question their judgment and we do question their ability to keep the American people safe."

Mr. Mehlman took an even tougher line against the press, which has been highly critical of the surveillance program.

"The media calls this program 'domestic spying,' " he said. "This is the same mainstream media that called a story based on forged documents 'fake but accurate.' "

It was a slap at CBS News, which in September 2004 used forged documents to question President Bush's military record. The scandal forced Dan Rather from his anchor chair and resulted in the firing of CBS producer Mary Mapes, among others.

"Between the time Ronald Reagan was elected and today, evening viewership of network news dropped from 52 million people to 29 million people," Mr. Mehlman said, drawing applause from his audience of mostly young conservatives. "During the same time daily newspaper readership has fallen from 67 percent to 52 percent.

"And our grass-roots efforts can fill the vacuum," he said. "The mainstream media just doesn't get it."

Republican Chief Outlines 2006 Strategy (AP)

By Barry Schweid

AP, February 11, 2006

Republican national chairman Ken Mehlman on Friday outlined a political strategy for 2006 to portray Democrats as too weak to protect the country and to bypass the mainstream media to spread the GOP message.

DOJ_NMG_0014423

Speaking at the Conservative Political Action Conference, Mehlman roused the crowd at a Washington hotel to cheers as he told them President Bush had finally responded to decades of terrorist attacks.

"For a generation, terrorists learned they could make war on free nations without fear of war in return," Mehlman said, adding that Bush understood how to respond. "On Sept. 12, the terrorists got war in return."

Bush's stance on fighting terror is popular with participants in this annual meeting of hard-line conservatives from around the country and so are his federal court appointments.

But many at this national conference question the Bush administration's spending, deficits, immigration policies, prescription drug plan and increased use of federal power.

The GOP chief said such questioning is healthy for the Republican Party and the conservative movement.

John R. Bolton, the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, keynoted the conference dinner, sketching out the Bush administration's efforts to reform the U.N.

Bolton's targets included waste and abuse of peacekeeping operations reported by the U.N. itself that he said virtually matches in losses the amount the United States contributes to the operation.

He also condemned a "culture of anti-Semitism and anti-Israel" that he said was pervasive at the United Nations and includes offices that exist only as part of an anti-Israel network.

Turning to Iran, whose nuclear programs have been referred to the Security Council, for possible punitive action, Bolton said Iran should follow Libya's lead, which abandoned its pursuit of unconventional weapons and shipped the technology to a U.S. facility at Oak Ridge, Tenn. Bolton drew a laugh by saying the United States could find room at Oak Ridge for Iranian nuclear equipment, as well.

"Like Libya, they can come to the conclusion that their pursuit of nuclear weapons is more harmful than the elimination of the program," Bolton said.

The fight against terrorism is centered in Iraq, Mehlman said, and the only way to prevent terrorists from taking charge there is to stick it out and win.

He quoted Democratic chairman Howard Dean saying that the idea the United States can win in Iraq is wrong and reminded that Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass., accused American soldiers of "terrorizing women and children."

"Democratic leaders always seem to blame America first," Mehlman said, "especially when a Republican is in the White House."

Mehlman said the loss in popularity of the mainstream media — both the evening network news and daily newspapers — is an opportunity for conservatives. He pointed to the growing popularity of talk radio and blogging.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist told the group he plans to push for a Senate vote in May on the inheritance tax, called the "death tax" by conservatives. And he said he would push for a vote June 5 on "the marriage protection amendment" that seeks to amend the Constitution to define marriage as a union between a man and a woman.

___

Associated Press writer Will Lester contributed to this report.

House Republicans Search For Legislative Plan (WSJ)

By Brody Mullins

The Wall Street Journal, February 11, 2006

CAMBRIDGE, Md. -- House Republicans, after internal consultations and a pep talk from President Bush, say they haven't yet settled on their election-year legislative agenda.

Newly installed Republican Majority Leader John Boehner of Ohio said the House caucus must first "bring our team together" after recent setbacks before developing a plan for the year. Only then can Republicans figure out "where we are going," he said.

During the party's three-day retreat here, private discussions focused on issues such as lowering taxes, reducing health-care costs, weaning the country off oil imports and bolstering homeland security. With the Justice Department investigation into lobbying and corruption, Republicans added ethics reform to their list.

DOJ_NMG_0014424

Mr. Bush, citing 2005 accomplishments such as bankruptcy legislation and a new Central American trade pact, told members, "We're ready to lead again." But the modest tenor of his remarks, which included no ambitious calls to action like last year's Social Security initiative, underscored reduced expectations as the party strives to hold its majority in November elections.

"We know that this is going to be a short legislative year," said Rep. Deborah Pryce (R., Ohio), who organized the retreat.

Party leaders said they wouldn't have a detailed legislative plan for a few more weeks. The retreat "is not about coming out of here with a 10-point plan," Mr. Boehner said.

In fact, Republicans are still wrapping up work they expected to finish last year, including a two-year extension of President Bush's 15% tax rates on capital gains and dividends, and a renewal of the Patriot Act, which was passed after Sept. 11 to strengthen the government's antiterror powers. Last week, Republicans reached a breakthrough on the Patriot Act and inched closer to enacting a budget-reduction bill. Party leaders hope to clear the capital-gains bill by month's end, but obstacles remain.

Beyond those leftovers, Republicans may find it difficult to make progress on other issues. Not long after House Speaker Dennis Hastert of Illinois unveiled a lobbying-overhaul package, it received criticism from other party leaders. Mr. Boehner, now the No. 2 House Republican under Mr. Hastert, called some of the provisions, such as a ban on privately funded travel, "childish." When Republican leaders proposed banning former-lawmakers-turned-lobbyists from the House floor and gym, they came under fire from senior Republicans, including Financial Services Committee Chairman Michael Oxley of Ohio.

Further complicating the lobbying-overhaul issue, Republicans hope to add provisions to the bill that would ban so-called 527 organizations from spending money on political campaigns. That issue could draw fire from Democrats. Such organizations are typically funded by unions and wealthy liberals and often support Democratic candidates.

Other issues on the agenda for this year could be just as complicated. President Bush called for Republicans to approve legislation to permanently extend his 2001 tax cuts on individuals. But New York Republican Rep. Tom Reynolds, the chairman of the House Republicans' campaign arm and a member of the House tax-writing committee, said there is little chance that the bill could clear the Senate.

Write to Brody Mullins at brody.mullins@wsj.com1

Results Of Poll On Public Attitude On Bush (AP)

By The Associated Press

AP, February 11, 2006

The Associated Press-Ipsos poll on public attitudes about President Bush and Congress, conducted Feb. 6-8, is based on telephone interviews with 1,000 adults from all states except Alaska and Hawaii.

Results were weighted to represent the population by demographic factors such as age, sex, region, race and income.

No more than one time in 20 should chance variations in the sample cause the results to vary by more than plus or minus 3 percentage points from the answers that would be obtained if all Americans were polled.

There are other sources of potential error in polls, including the wording and order of questions. Results may not total 100 percent because of rounding. An X signifies less than 1 percent.

___

(Early January results are in parentheses)

1. Generally speaking, would you say things in this country are heading in the right direction, or are they off on the wrong track?

_Right direction, 35 percent (32)

_Wrong track, 61 percent (65)

_Not sure, 4 percent (3)

2. Overall, do you approve, disapprove or have mixed feelings about the way George W. Bush is handling his job as president?

_Approve, 40 percent (40)

_Disapprove, 57 percent (59)

_Mixed feelings, 2 percent (1)

DOJ_NMG_0014425

_Not sure, X percent (X)

3. And when it comes to handling the economy, do you approve or disapprove or have mixed feelings about the way George W. Bush is handling that issue?

_Approve, 40 percent (39)

_Disapprove, 58 percent (59)

_Mixed feelings, 2 percent (2)

4. And when it comes to domestic issues like health care, education and the environment, do you approve or disapprove or have mixed feelings about the way George W. Bush is handling that issue?

_Approve, 39 percent (35)

_Disapprove, 58 percent (62)

_Mixed feelings, 2 (2)

_Not sure, X percent (X)

5. When it comes to handling foreign policy issues and the war on terrorism, do you approve or disapprove or have mixed feelings about the way George W. Bush is handling that issue?

_Approve, 47 percent (44)

_Disapprove, 50 percent (54)

_Mixed feelings, 2 percent (1)

_Not sure, 1 percent (X)

6. When it comes to handling the situation in Iraq, do you approve or disapprove or have mixed feelings about the way George W. Bush is handling that issue?

_Approve, 38 percent (39)

_Disapprove, 60 percent (58)

_Mixed feelings, 1 percent (1)

_Not sure, 1 percent (X)

7. When it comes to Social Security, do you approve, disapprove or have mixed feelings about the way George W. Bush is handling that issue?

_Approve, 36 percent (35)

_Disapprove, 60 percent (60)

_Mixed feelings, 3 percent (2)

_Not sure, 1 percent (3)

8. Overall, do you approve, disapprove or have mixed feelings about the way Congress is handling its job?

_Approve, 35 percent (34)

_Disapprove, 61 percent (63)

_Mixed feelings, 2 percent (2)

_Not sure, 1 percent (1)

9. And if the election for Congress were held today, would you want to see the Republicans or Democrats win control of Congress?

_Republicans, 37 percent (36)

_Democrats, 47 percent (49)

_Neither (VOLUNTEERED), 13 percent (12)

_Not sure, 3 percent (3)

10. Should the Bush administration be required to get a warrant from a judge before monitoring phone and Internet communications between American citizens in the United States and suspected terrorists, or should the government be allowed to monitor such communications without getting a warrant?

_Should be required to get a warrant, 50 percent (56)

_Should be allowed to monitor without a warrant, 48 percent (42)

_Not sure, 2 percent (2)

Bob Barr, Bane Of The Right? (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, February 11, 2006

You could find just about everything at the annual Conservative Political Action Conference this week: the bumper sticker that says "Happiness is Hillary's face on a milk carton," the "Straight Pride" T-shirt, a ride on an F-22 Raptor simulator at the Lockheed exhibit, and beans from the Contra Cafe coffee company (slogan: "Wake up with freedom fighters").

As of midday yesterday, a silent auction netted $300 for lunch with activist Grover Norquist, $275 for a meal with the Heritage Foundation president and $1,000 for a hunting trip with the American Conservative Union chairman. But lunch with former congressman Bob Barr (R-Ga.), with an "estimated value" of $500, had a top bid of only $75 -- even with a signed copy of Barr's book, "The Meaning of Is," thrown in.

No surprise there. The former Clinton impeachment manager is the skunk at CPAC's party this year. He says President Bush is breaking the law by eavesdropping on U.S. citizens without warrants. And fellow conservatives, for the most part, don't want to hear it.

"You've heard of bear baiting? We're going to have, today, Barr baiting," R. Emmet Tyrell, a conservative publisher, announced as he introduced a debate Thursday between Barr and Viet Dinh, one of the authors of the USA Patriot Act.

"Are we losing our lodestar, which is the Bill of Rights?" Barr beseeched the several hundred conservatives at the Omni Shoreham in Woodley Park. "Are we in danger of putting allegiance to party ahead of allegiance to principle?"

Barr answered in the affirmative. "Do we truly remain a society that believes that . . . every president must abide by the law of this country?" he posed. "I, as a conservative, say yes. I hope you as conservatives say yes."

But nobody said anything in the deathly quiet audience. Barr merited only polite applause when he finished, and one man, Richard Sorcinelli, booed him loudly. "I can't believe I'm in a conservative hall listening to him say [Bush] is off course trying to defend the United States," Sorcinelli fumed.

Far more to this crowd's liking was Vice President Cheney, who stopped by CPAC late Thursday and suggested the surveillance program as a 2006 campaign issue. "With an important election coming up, people need to know just how we view the most critical questions of national security," he told the cheering crowd.

Dinh, now a Georgetown law professor, urged the CPAC faithful to carve out a Bush exception to their ideological principle of limited government. "The conservative movement has a healthy skepticism of governmental power, but at times, unfortunately, that healthy skepticism needs to yield," Dinh explained, invoking Osama bin Laden.

Dinh brought the crowd to a raucous ovation when he judged: "The threat to Americans' liberty today comes from al Qaeda and its associates and the people who would destroy America and her people, not the brave men and women who work to defend this country!"

It was the sort of tactic that has intimidated Democrats and the last few libertarian Republicans who question the program's legality. But Barr is not easily suppressed. During a 2002 Senate primary, he accidentally fired a pistol at a campaign event; at a charity event a decade earlier, he licked whipped cream from the chests of two women.

Barr wasn't going to get a lesson on patriotism from this young product of the Bush Justice Department. "That, folks, was a red herring," he announced. "This debate is very simple: It is a debate about whether or not we will remain a nation subject to and governed by the rule of law or the whim of men."

He invoked Goldwater and Reagan and even said he would support Bush's program if it had congressional support. But Barr was a prophet without honor in his own land. "Why does the FISA law trump the Constitution?" one woman demanded of him. "Why should a non-elected, non-briefed judge be able to veto our national security?"

Conservatives were sore that Barr put his disagreements with Bush in the pages of Time magazine. Another questioner scolded Barr for agreeing to introduce an Al Gore speech that was also sponsored by MoveOn.org. "I have nothing whatsoever to do with them," Barr pleaded.

DOJ_NMG_0014427

Still, the old prosecutor managed to elicit a crucial concession from Dinh: that the administration's case for its program comes down to saying "Trust me."

"None of us can make a conclusive assessment as to the wisdom of that program and its legality," Dinh acknowledged, "without knowing the full operational details. I do trust the president when he asserts that he has reviewed it carefully and therefore is convinced that there is full legal authority."

The crowd was against him, but Barr, leaving the event, claimed the clear conscience of a conservative. "I just told them what they need to know," he said.

Barr elaborated on his conundrum. "It's difficult," he acknowledged. "It's not about sex, which was very easy to explain."

Love him or hate him, you have to give Barr high marks for consistency. "Whether it's a sitting president when I was an impeachment manager, or a Republican president who has taken liberties with adherence to the law, to me the standard is the same," he said.

And, besides, who cares about a little criticism?

"No more than normal," Barr reported.

Political researcher Zachary A. Goldfarb contributed to this report.

Oops! - Bush Unaware Mikes Were Still On (AP)

AP, February 11, 2006

The eavesdropping tables were turned on President Bush on Friday. The president apparently believed he was speaking privately when he talked about listening in without a warrant on domestic communications with suspected al-Qaida terrorists overseas. But reporters were the ones doing the listening in this time.

The incident happened at a House Republican retreat. After six minutes of public remarks by the president, reporters were ushered out. "I support the free press, let's just get them out of the room," Bush said, intending to speak behind closed doors with fellow Republicans and take lawmakers' questions.

When reporters left, Bush spoke about the National Security Agency program that he authorized four years ago and which has drawn criticism from Democrats and Republicans alike.

However, the microphones stayed on for a few minutes. That allowed journalists back at the White House to eavesdrop on Bush's defense of the eavesdropping. His private statements were basically no different from what he's said in public.

"I want to share some thoughts with you before I answer your questions," Bush began. "First of all, I expect this conversation we're about to have to stay in the room. I know that's impossible in Washington."

He was right.

Smoking Dutch Cleanser (NYT)

By Maureen Dowd

The New York Times, February 11, 2006

Vice President Dick Cheney bitterly complains that national security leaks are endangering America. Unless, of course, he's doing the leaking, tapping Scooter Libby to reveal national security information to punish a political critic.

President Bush says he will not talk about specific security threats to America. Unless, of course, he needs to talk about a specific threat to Los Angeles to confuse the public and gain some cheap political advantage.

The White House says it has done everything possible to protect the homeland. Unless, of course, it hasn't. Then it can lie to hide the callous portrait of Incurious George in Crawford as New Orleans drowned.

The attorney general can claim that torture and warrantless wiretapping are legal, and can mislead Congress. Unless, of course, enough Republicans stand up and say, as Arlen Specter told The Washington Post, that if that lickspittle lawyer thinks all this is legal, "he's smoking Dutch Cleanser."

The president doesn't know the Indian Taker Jack Abramoff. Unless, of course, W. has met with him a dozen times, invited him to Crawford and joked with him about his kids.

DOJ_NMG_0014428

The Bushies can continue to claim that the invasion of Iraq was justified because Saddam was a threat to our security. Unless, of course, he wasn't, and the Cheney cabal was simply abusing the trust of Americans to push a wild-eyed political scheme.

At the Bush White House, the mere evocation of the word "terror" justifies breaking any law, contravening any convention, despoiling any ideal, electing any Republican and brushing off any failure to govern.

Asked yesterday by Senator Susan Collins why the administration had reacted in slo-mo on Katrina, with "people dying, people waiting to be rescued," Michael Brown replied that if FEMA had declared that a terrorist had blown up the 17th Street Canal levee, "then everybody would have jumped all over that and been trying to do everything they could."

Instead of just going after the 9/11 fiends, as W. promised with his bullhorn, the president and Vice President Strangelove have cynically played the terror card to accrue power and sidestep blame. They have twisted our values, mismanaged crises, fueled fundamentalist successes and violence around the world, and magnified a clash of civilizations.

It used to take an Israeli incursion to inflame the Arab world. Now all it takes is a cartoon in Denmark.

W. and Vice have wasted hundreds of billions of dollars, turning Iraq into a terrorist training ground, leaving the 9/11 villains at large, and letting cronies and losers botch the job of homeland security.

Brownie, one of the biggest boneheads in U.S. history, considered the homeland security chief, Michael Chertoff, so useless that he deliberately didn't call him right away about the suffering in New Orleans.

"The culture was such that I didn't think that would have been effective and would have exacerbated the problem, quite frankly," Brownie told the Republican senator Bob Bennett, who called the statement "staggering." A telephone call to his boss, Brownie said, "would have wasted my time."

The doofus who frittered away lives e-mailing colleagues about being a "fashion god" and wondering how he looked on television may have just been engaged in self-protective spin. Or has the Homeland Security Department simply created another set of paralyzing turf battles?

The most dysfunctional man in government is calling the government dysfunctional.

W.'s sophomoric "Brownie, you're doing a heck of a job" line makes even Brownie cringe. "Unfortunately," the former FEMA chief complained, "he called me 'Brownie' at the wrong time. Thanks a lot, sir."

In the new Foreign Affairs, Paul Pillar, who was a senior C.I.A. official overseeing Middle East intelligence assessments until October, says the obvious conclusion that should have been drawn from the intelligence on Iraq was that war was unnecessary. He says the White House "went to war without requesting — and evidently without being influenced by — any strategic-level intelligence assessments on any aspect of Iraq."

He calls the relationship between the intelligence community and the policy makers — you guessed it — politicized, damaged by bureaucratic rivalries and dysfunctional.

A final absurd junction of dysfunction was reached on Wednesday, when Republican Party leaders awarded Tom DeLay with a seat on the Appropriations subcommittee overseeing the Justice Department, which is investigating Jack Abramoff, including his connections to Tom DeLay.

Perfect.

Irresponsible Rhetoric, Again (WP)

The Washington Post, February 11, 2006

AMERICANS, OFTEN cynical about their political institutions and often for good reason, had cause last week to feel pretty good about their national legislature. On some tough policy challenges, Congress debated with seriousness, patriotism and some measure of bipartisanship. Senators came up with a compromise on the USA Patriot Act that, while not entirely satisfying to most, preserved the police powers the government says it needs while extending a bit more protection to civil liberties. They turned back an early effort to quash an asbestos relief bill that would replace a dysfunctional court process with a system designed to give sufferers of asbestos-related disease a real chance at relief. And senators and House members alike began exploring ways to evaluate President Bush's extralegal program of domestic surveillance and preserve the useful parts of it in a defensible legal framework.

DOJ_NMG_0014429

So you might think this was what Vice President Cheney had in mind when he told a Republican crowd on Thursday night, in reference to the surveillance program, that "a debate is now underway. At the very least, this debate has clarified where all of us stand on the issue."

Unfortunately, though, Mr. Cheney wasn't celebrating the reasoned process that Congress belatedly has embarked on. Instead he was engaging in the administration's tired practice of trying to choke off debate by suggesting that anyone who disagrees with President Bush basically doesn't want to fight the war on terrorism. Some Democrats have their own brand of irresponsible rhetoric when it comes to criticizing the president's policies. But the administration has patented the practice of taking a complicated policy issue and turning it into a club for the coming campaign: "And with an important election coming up, people need to know just how we view the most critical questions of national security, and how we propose to defend the nation that all of us, Republicans and Democrats, love and are privileged to serve," Mr. Cheney told a cheering crowd at the Conservative Political Action Conference. "As always, the president has made his thinking absolutely clear to the citizens of this land: If there are people inside our country talking with al Qaeda, we want to know about it, because we will not sit back and wait to be hit again."

This might be a fair gibe if Mr. Cheney's political opponents were against knowing who's talking with al Qaeda. But they're not. Both the Democrats whom the vice president caricatures, and the Republicans who he does not acknowledge also have doubts about the program, support responsible surveillance policies. They are looking for ways to allow surveillance to take place within the boundaries of the Constitution -- which ultimately would strengthen the defense and law enforcement value of any overheard conversations. They may not succeed, and the bipartisan good sense in evidence this week may not last. But we hope they won't be deterred by the vice president's mischaracterization of what's happening.

Gov't Budget Surplus Hits $21B For Jan. (AP)

By Martin Crutsinger

AP, February 11, 2006

The federal government ran a $21 billion budget surplus last month, the best January showing in four years, as both spending and tax receipts set records for the month.

The Treasury Department said the government spent $209 billion last month, a record amount for January and up 7.9 percent from January 2005. Government tax receipts, however, also set a record for the month of $230 billion, up 13.7 percent from January 2005.

The faster growth in receipts than in spending pushed the suplus for the month to $21 billion, more than double the $8.6 billion surplus the government recorded in January 2005. It was the biggest January surplus since $43.7 billion in 2002.

For the first four months of the budget year that began on Oct. 1, the deficit totals $98.3 billion, an improvement of 10.2 percent from last year's pace when the deficit totaled $319 billion.

The Bush administration on Monday estimated that the deficit for this year will hit a record in dollar terms of $423 billion, surpassing the old mark of $413 billion set in 2004. The administration blamed increased spending for hurricane relief and the costs of wars in Iraq and Afghanistan for the increase.

However, private economists believe the deficit, while up from last year, will be smaller than the administration's forecasts. Many forecasters are pegging this year's deficit at around $360 billion.

They note that the administration for the past two years has estimated a deficit for the current budget year that is significantly higher than other forecasts, allowing them to claim improvement at the end of the budget year.

President Bush has promised to cut the deficit in half by 2009, the year he will leave office. But that pledge is linked to a projected deficit of $521 billion for 2004 that never materialized.

Democrats Cry Foul Over Clerical Error In Bill (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, February 11, 2006

CAMBRIDGE, Md. -- The budget cut bill President Bush signed on Wednesday did not pass both the House and Senate in identical form, and House Democrats now say that means it is not legitimately a law.

DOJ_NMG_0014430

Because of a clerical error, the version the House voted on had a different reimbursement time period in one section than the time period in the version that passed the Senate.

Rep. Charles B. Rangel of New York, the top Democrat on the Ways and Means Committee, called the law into question and sent a letter to House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, Illinois Republican, demanding a new vote on the bill.

"I don't yet know exactly what happened and who is at fault, but it is clear that the legislation signed by the president on Wednesday is not what actually passed the House of Representatives on February 1," Mr. Rangel wrote in his letter.

The bill was the $39 billion budget reductions measure that Republican leaders have touted as a start toward fiscal discipline, but which Democrats said damaged health care programs and student loans.

It passed the Senate 50-50 on Dec. 21, with Vice President Dick Cheney breaking the tie, and passed the House 216-214 on Feb. 1.

After the Senate voted on the bill, aides said, a Senate clerk inadvertently changed the length of time Medicare would reimburse for certain medical equipment to be rented from 13 months to 36 months.

Congressional Quarterly reported that staffers discovered the error before the House passed the bill, but did not disclose the mistake until this week.

After the House vote, a Senate clerk changed the length of time back to 13 months and sent the bill to Mr. Bush under the signatures of Mr. Hastert and Senate President Pro Tem Ted Stevens, Alaska Republican, the presiding officers of each chamber. The Senate passed a resolution stating they meant to say 13 months in the bill.

Democratic senators said they would not stand in the way of the measure becoming law, Senate aides said.

However, House Democrats want to force another vote on the bill, which would be the third time in three months House Republicans will have voted to cut Medicare -- even though each vote was on the same basic measure.

Liberal activists said they want the process to be as difficult as possible for Republicans.

Cara Morris Stern, spokeswoman for the Emergency Campaign for America's Priorities, said lawyers in the group are looking at a legal challenge to the measure.

She said Republicans face a dilemma of having to vote again or "open up their actions to a very public scrutiny of a House mired in conflict and abuse of power."

Asked about the issue before Democrats made their challenge yesterday, Mr. Hastert seemed uncertain about whether there will have to be another vote.

"They're trying to work it out, and we'll see what happens," he said.

The Constitution requires in Article I that bills must pass the House and Senate, and that means "in precisely the same form," according to several research papers done for the Congressional Research Service.

William Eskridge Jr., the John A. Garver Professor of Jurisprudence at Yale Law School, said there is no precedent in case law that governs the situation.

He said there is a good argument that the process violated constitutional mandates for how a bill becomes a law, and said judges could go either way on whether the bill was properly signed into law.

But Mr. Eskridge said judges probably would dismiss a challenge by arguing the dispute is a political question best left to the elected branches to sort out.

"Judges would differ on that if they ever got their teeth into it, but the real answer is it would not be what judges call justiciable," he said.

Just-Passed Budget Bill May Be Challenged (AP)

By Andrew Taylor

AP, February 11, 2006

Opponents of a major budget bill just signed by President Bush are weighing a court challenge on the grounds that the measure is unconstitutional because it was amended after the House voted on it.

At issue is a provision involving the period of time the government pays to rent some types of durable medical equipment before medical suppliers transfer it to Medicare patients. The Senate voted for 13 months, as intended by Senate and House negotiators, but a Senate clerk erroneously put down 36 months in sending the bill back to the House for a final vote, and that's what the House approved Feb. 1.

DOJ_NMG_0014431

By the time the bill was shipped to Bush, the number was back to 13 months as passed by the Senate but not the House.

The issue is arcane and technical, but the broader constitutional question is very simple. As anyone who passed high school civics knows, a bill can only become a law if the House and Senate pass it in identical form. That didn't happen in this case.

"That bill ... is actually not a properly enacted law," said Michael Gerhardt, a professor of constitutional law at the University of North Carolina School of Law. "It wouldn't surprise me if a court struck it down. That bill was not approved by the House."

"I don't yet know exactly what happened and who is at fault, but it is clear that the legislation signed by the president on Wednesday is not what actually passed the House of Representatives on February 1," said Rep. Charles Rangel, D-N.Y., the top Democrat on the House Ways and Means Committee.

Bush and his GOP allies on Capitol Hill consider the matter over.

But opponents of the bill are actively considering trying to get it struck down by the courts.

"There is a high probability that some legal action will be pursued," said Brad Woodhouse, spokesman for the Emergency Campaign for America's Priorities, a group of organizations opposing the budget bill, which contains $39 billion in cuts to Medicaid, Medicare, student loan subsidies and other programs. "Perhaps a temporary restraining order to stop the implementation and then broader legal action after that."

Legal experts say any court challenge would be on firm legal ground.

"Each house has to pass the whole law and the same law," said Alan Morrison, senior lecturer in law at Stanford University Law School. "This is a case where the Constitution is very clear."

Morrison was the lead attorney in the case to overturn the 1996 line item veto law, which was decided on the same elementary constitutional concept: that a law must pass the House and Senate in the same form and once signed by the president can only be changed by another law approved by all three parties.

The budget bill was one of the main accomplishments of Congress last year, as Republicans managed for the first time in eight years to take on the growth of federal benefit programs.

The measure blends modest cuts to Medicaid, Medicare and student loan subsidies with a renewal of the 1996 welfare reform bill and $10 billion in new revenues from auctioning television airwaves to wireless companies. There's also $1 billion in new spending to extend an income subsidy program for dairy farmers and a reprieve for physicians who had faced a 4 percent cut in Medicare fees.

Morrison said courts would take a dim view of the idea that it is OK for the Speaker of the House — who along with the Senate's President Pro Tempore signed the official copies of bills sent to the president — to endorse a bill that's different from what the House voted on. That could set a precedent that could be abused.

"It's not the mischief in this case that would cause the (Supreme) Court to be worried," Morrison said. "It's the next case or the case after that where there isn't a clerical mistake but there's an effort to deceive or change the result."

Recognizing the problem, the Senate on Wednesday passed a resolution just hours after Bush signed the bill confirming that the measure transmitted to the president was "deemed the true enrollment reflecting the intention of the Congress."

Legal experts, however, say the resolution doesn't solve the problem.

Even though Congress routinely passes so-called technical corrections bills fixing glitches in laws that it's already passed and even correcting bills before sending them to the White House, sending the president a bill that's passed House and Senate in different form just isn't done.

"I don't know that we've had a circumstance where the president may be signing a bill that one of the chambers didn't actually approve," said Gerhardt. "That's the unique wrinkle here."

If the law is struck down, Congress could go ahead and try to pass it again. But that would prove difficult since the spending cut plan advanced under fast-track budget rules that block Democrats from filibustering bills to death in the Senate.

Bush's Budget Cuts Elderly Nutrition Plan (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0014432

By Frederic J. Frommer

AP, February 11, 2006

The boxes arrive every month at churches, senior citizen centers and other sites for distribution to nearly a half-million poor elderly people. Each is stocked with a mix of nutritious foods such as cereal, peanut butter, fruit, vegetables and pasta. Sometimes volunteers deliver them right to people's homes.

Now President Bush wants to eliminate the program, one of 141 federal initiatives that his proposed new budget would scrap or cut dramatically. He is proposing to shift people in the Commodity Supplemental Food Program over to food stamps.

Defenders of the nutrition-in-a-box program say many elderly people are reluctant to sign up for food stamps, and, in any event, the commodity program often provides a more generous package.

"It really does come under the category, in the most extreme way, of balancing the budget on the backs of those who are most needy. And in this case we're not even balancing the budget," said Wisconsin Sen. Herb Kohl, the ranking Democrat on the Senate Appropriations agriculture subcommittee.

"I call it misplaced priorities. How do you justify doing something like this, while at the same time giving people like Herb Kohl huge tax cuts?" said Kohl, a multimillionaire.

The commodity program, run by the Agriculture Department, benefits mainly elderly people, although some new mothers and children also participate. The department wants to move recipients to food stamps in the fiscal year that begins Oct. 1. The program cost about $111 million this fiscal year, including a $4 million supplement for victims of Hurricane Katrina.

The program, which dates back to 1968, operates in 32 states and the District of Columbia.

Its lack of national reach is one reason the administration wants to eliminate it, according to USDA officials.

Kate Coler, the USDA's deputy undersecretary for Food, Nutrition and Consumer Services, said the department believes it can serve people more efficiently through food stamps and the Women, Infants and Children program, which are both nationwide.

"It's really a duplicative program," she said of CSFP.

But Tim Robertson, president of the National CSFP Association, which represents state and local organizations that administer the program, challenged the USDA's premise that people will switch over to food stamps.

"Seniors have repeatedly said they don't want to be on that program," Robertson said, because of the perceived stigma of using food stamps and the paperwork hassles.

The USDA's own statistics show that just 28 percent of seniors eligible for food stamps participate in the program.

Sherrie Tussler, executive director of the Hunger Task Force, which administers the program in Milwaukee, said the commodity program helps elderly people stretch their food-buying budget.

"Sometimes seniors are choosing between utility bills and prescription drugs and whether they get to eat," she said.

The Bush administration is proposing to provide CSFP beneficiaries with transitional food stamp benefits of $20 a month for six months, or until they are deemed eligible for food stamps, whichever comes first.

Sarah Mayek, 75, of Milwaukee, receives both the CSFP box and $10 a month for food stamps.

"You try to stretch your budget a little bit," Mayek said. Without CSFP, she said, "I would have to adjust. But I raised 11 children. I know how to cut corners."

Jean Daniel, a spokeswoman for the USDA's Food and Nutrition Service, said her agency is working to remove the perceived stigma. For example, she said, the agency is getting the word out that food stamp payments are now made by an electronic transfer card, not actual stamps.

"We try to make the point that this is not a welfare program, this is a nutritional assistance program," she said.

____

Associated Press Food and Farm Writer Libby Quaid contributed to this story.

New House Leader Seeks To Rebuild Unity (AP)

By David Espo

AP, February 11, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0014433

House Republicans are on retreat on Maryland's peaceful Eastern Shore, seeking what newly elected Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, describes as "renewal and rebuilding" after a tough stretch in the Capitol.

Yet like a lot of vacationers, they've brought their problems with them.

Some are the product of the calendar, others more of their own making.

A controversy over earmarks — the congressional name for funding pet projects — is particularly intense. Especially since one GOP-led committee compiled a secret tally sheet showing earmark requests made by Republicans calling for reform.

"Earmarks have become the currency of corruption," Rep. Jeff Flake, R-Ariz., recently wrote Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill. "We can't allow this to continue."

High on the list of challenges for the GOP is the annual drafting of a budget. President Bush's appearance on Friday's program was a reminder that he's calling for $70 billion in savings over five years from benefit programs such as Medicare, Medicaid, food stamps and payments to farmers.

Then there's the shadow of scandal, which in recent months has pushed Texas Rep. Tom DeLay from the leadership, Ohio Rep. Bob Ney from his committee chairmanship and California Rep. Randy Cunningham from Congress after a confession of bribe-taking. All are Republicans.

New York Rep. Tom Reynolds, the chairman of the GOP campaign committee, noted at a news conference that "2006 is also an election year."

A few hours later he provided a political briefing for the rank and file, a presentation that participants said later had lampooned Democratic leaders as Darth Vader and other "Star Wars" characters.

Internal divisions also have surfaced at a time Republicans — their poll numbers sagging — try to reclaim the mantle of reform that helped them win the majority more than a decade ago.

Fiscal conservatives are particularly determined to cut back on earmarks.

The practice, an old one, has mushroomed in recent years under Republican sponsorship, and the legislation backed by Flake and numerous other lawmakers is designed to trim it.

The measure would preserve the existence of earmarks, but for the first time allow critics to challenge them one by one on the House floor.

Flake, who issues a stream of news releases accusing his fellow lawmakers of wasteful spending, says the purpose is transparency in government. The theory is that forcing lawmakers to defend projects will expose them to ridicule and, eventually, the practice will ebb.

So far, the legislation has sparked an intense internal struggle pitting Republican against Republican.

The committee that controls the pursestrings compiled a list of earmarks requested last year by GOP lawmakers who favor Flake's bill.

The total was 717 requested earmarks, although none for Flake, for more than $4.5 billion.

The response was sharp.

"I am shocked that the Republican staff of a Republican-led committee in a Republican-majority Congress would do opposition research on a fellow Republican," first-term Rep. Lynn Westmoreland of Georgia wrote in a letter to fellow GOP lawmakers. "I do not see any other purpose behind the preparation of this report other than for it to be leaked to the press."

The Associated Press obtained copies of both the Appropriations Committee tally and the letter.

By committee count, Westmoreland requested 59 earmarks last year, for a total of $536 million. His office declined to release the entire list of projects he requested.

Spokesman Brian Robinson said that until the current system is changed, "we have to play by the rules that are in place — that's only fair to our constituents. Members don't release their request lists. We've released more than most would simply by saying that we sent the committee only 43 percent of the requests that came to our office."

Flake, in an interview, likened the tally sheet to a type of blackmail on the part of members of the House Appropriations Committee. Rank and file lawmakers are required to submit their requests in writing, thus creating a paper trail, he said. No such requirement is imposed on senior lawmakers, he added, including subcommittee chairmen with the power to insert or omit individual projects from the bills they draft.

DOJ_NMG_0014434

"It is no coincidence that the growth of earmarks has paralleled the monstrous increase in overall federal spending," he wrote recently in The New York Times.

Or that the subject is on the agenda for the Republican retreat.

___

EDITOR'S NOTE — David Espo is chief congressional correspondent for The Associated Press.

Ethics Scandal Looms Over Republicans' Meeting (REU)

By Thomas Ferraro

Reuters, February 11, 2006

Republicans in the House of Representatives, rocked by ethics scandals, met in a secluded Maryland town on Thursday, hoping to regroup under new leadership and position themselves to retain power in November's elections.

A week after electing Rep. John Boehner of Ohio as majority leader to succeed indicted Texan Tom DeLay, Republicans opened a three-day retreat at a time when public opinion polls show broad discontent with Congress and the White House.

"I'm going to tell them they face challenges and opportunities," Republican Party Chairman Ken Mehlman said shortly before addressing the gathering at a waterfront hotel in Cambridge, a two-hour drive from Washington.

"I'm going to tell them that the public clearly wants reform -- that the public believes that the country needs to continue reforming things if we are going to be on the right track," Mehlman told reporters, referring to lobbying practices on Capitol Hill and such basics as health care, education and national security.

Lobbying scandals and Justice Department investigations involving Republican lawmakers and former aides threaten the party's control of the House, which it has held since 1995.

Boehner said the retreat would allow for a "period of renewal" and bonding. He said it would take time to unite his 231-member caucus on a lobbying reform package, one that party leaders said would seek input from Democrats.

"We're going to have, frankly, an ethics seminar for all our members and staff so that they know what the rules are, and I think it'll help ensure that members and staff live up to those rules," Boehner said.

REFORM OR OVERHAUL?

In the wake of a scandal involving Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff, Boehner has called for more public disclosure of the relationships between lawmakers and lobbyists rather than a fundamental overhaul of the way Congress does business.

Unlike some of his colleagues, he is opposed to abolishing "earmark" spending for pet projects, urging instead more transparency.

A number of Republicans have been drawn into the investigation of Abramoff, who pleaded guilty last month to fraud charges and agreed to help prosecutors in their corruption probe.

Separately, Republican Randy Cunningham of California resigned from the House in November after pleading guilty to taking $2.4 million in bribes in exchange for help in securing Defense Department contracts.

Boehner was the surprise winner of a House Republican leadership election last week, defeating Roy Blunt of Missouri. DeLay was forced to step down as majority leader last year after he was indicted in Texas on campaign-related felony charges.

President George W. Bush was scheduled to address House Republicans on Friday. Bush was expected to focus on his $2.77 trillion proposed federal budget that would boost defense spending, slow Medicare's growth and cut domestic programs in an effort to soothe Republican frustrations over high deficits.

(Additional reporting by Richard Cowan)

A Wink And A Nod For Lobbying Reform (NYT)

The New York Times, February 11, 2006

A long string of scandals has raised questions about whether Capitol Hill is really run by the lawmakers or the lobbyists. The public has a right to expect reform, but so far the only sign of change is a new House majority leader — John Boehner of Ohio, a polished veteran of the big-money nexus who even pays his D.C. rent to a lobbyist-landlord.

DOJ_NMG_0014435

Mr. Boehner has been shockingly blasé about the need for Housecleaning. He's been signaling anxious colleagues that the whole issue should be directed toward the ultimate dead-letter office: the House ethics committee. This is the watchdog that was effectively put to sleep in the Tom DeLay era.

Other lawmakers are more properly alarmed and are proposing to graft some ethical spine onto Congress. In the Senate, Barack Obama of Illinois has proposed an ethics enforcement commission of former lawmakers and judges. That sparked a fit of pique from Senator John McCain, who seems to regard reform as private territory on which no freshman Democrat may trespass. Mr. McCain wants to zero in on "earmarking," the lawmakers' addiction to passing billions in hidden pork projects at the behest of lobbyists. There should be plenty of room for both ideas, and the two senators' developing rivalry for reform — already dubbed the "McBama" dynamic — is exactly the energy level Congress needs.

A worthwhile bipartisan proposal is expected next week from Representative Christopher Shays, Republican of Connecticut, and Martin Meehan, Democrat of Massachusetts. They want to create an office of public integrity to enforce stronger ethics and lobbying regulations in both houses. It would be staffed by nonpartisan professionals empowered to investigate and pursue complaints of impropriety from outside Congress and within it.

Easy money from special pleaders is at the heart of Congress's dilemma. A major bipartisan push from below is the only possibility of dragging leaders like Mr. Boehner to credible reform.

Censorship Is Alleged At NOAA (WP)

By Juliet Eilperin

The Washington Post, February 11, 2006

Scientists Afraid to Speak Out, NASA Climate Expert Reports

NEW YORK, Feb. 10 -- James E. Hansen, the NASA climate scientist who sparked an uproar last month by accusing the Bush administration of keeping scientific information from reaching the public, said Friday that officials at the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration are also muzzling researchers who study global warming.

Hansen, speaking in a panel discussion about science and the environment before a packed audience at the New School university, said that while he hopes his own agency will soon adopt a more open policy, NOAA insists on having "a minder" monitor its scientists when they discuss their findings with journalists.

"It seems more like Nazi Germany or the Soviet Union than the United States," said Hansen, prompting a round of applause from the audience. He added that while NOAA officials said they maintain the policy for their scientists' protection, "if you buy that one please see me at the break, because there's a bridge down the street I'd like to sell you."

NOAA Administrator Conrad C. Lautenbacher denied Hansen's charges, saying his agency requires its scientists to tell its press office about contacts with journalists but does not monitor their communications.

"My policy since I've been here is to have a free and open organization," Lautenbacher said. I encourage scientists to conduct peer-reviewed research and provide the honest results of those findings. I stand up for their right to say what they want."

Hansen prefaced his speech, which focused largely on how quickly humans must act in order to prevent irreversible climate change, by saying he was speaking as an individual. "I'm not speaking for the agency or the government," he said.

Most scientists who study climate change have concluded that Earth's current warming is being driven by the burning of fossil fuels. The administration does not question the link between human activity and climate change, but it has called for more research and supports solutions other than mandatory limits on carbon emissions.

After the panel discussion -- which also featured Princeton University professor Michael Oppenheimer, American Enterprise Institute fellow Steven Hayward and Stanford University professor Paul Ehrlich -- Hansen said he knows of NOAA scientists who are chafing at the administration's restrictions but are afraid to speak out.

New School President Bob Kerrey, a former Democratic senator from Nebraska, said he invited Hansen to speak because he was "very concerned" about what he called the administration's efforts to steer the debate over global warming: "It's not only inappropriate; it stifles the very debate we're trying to have today, and that we need to have on this issue."

Kerrey said of Hansen, "He's not a radical; he's a scientist who's studied the issue. Let the disagreement occur without stifling one side of the argument."

DOJ_NMG_0014436

After Hansen told the New York Times and The Washington Post in late January that political appointees at NASA had made it hard for him and other researchers to convey their findings on climate change to the public, NASA Administrator Michael D. Griffin e-mailed agency employees last week and vowed to support "scientific openness."

Griffin, who had been chastised by House Science Committee Chairman Sherwood L. Boehlert (R-N.Y.) over the issue earlier in the week, said he would draft a new policy that would respect scientists' right to speak out.

In an interview Friday, Boehlert -- who has met personally with Griffin and spoken on the phone with him several times since the controversy erupted last month -- said he was satisfied Griffin was taking the necessary steps.

"The administration should make it abundantly clear, as Michael Griffin did in his letter to NASA employees, that there will be no effort, in any way, shape or form, deliberate or hinted at, that would stifle a respected scientist working for the government, doing research paid for by the American taxpayers, from talking about their work," Boehlert said.

He added that he had not received "outpourings from the scientific community" alleging government censorship and that, to his knowledge, "there are no plans in place to intimidate or stifle science."

Also Friday, George C. Deutsch, 24, a NASA spokesman who resigned this week after allegations that he had edited scientists' writings to conform to administration views and tried to limit reporters' access to Hansen, e-mailed reporters to say there is a "culture war" in the government over climate change. Deutsch's resignation came after it was learned he had not graduated from Texas A&M University, as he claimed on his résumé.

"There is no pressure or mandate, from the Bush administration or elsewhere, to alter or water down scientific data at NASA, period," Deutsch said, adding that after being tasked to work with Hansen, "I quickly learned one thing: Dr. Hansen and his supporters have a very partisan agenda and ties reaching to the top of the Democratic Party.

"Anyone perceived to be a Republican, a Bush supporter or a Christian is singled out and labeled a threat to their views. I encourage anyone interested in this story to consider the other side, to consider Dr. Hansen's true motivations and to consider the dangerous implications of only hearing out one side of the global warming debate," Deutsch said.

And On The Eighth Day, God Went Green (NYT)

By John Tierney

The New York Times, February 11, 2006

And on the eighth day, God said, Let there be a thermostat for the heavens and the earth, and God saw that it was good. And God said, Let no man adjust it more than 2 degrees Fahrenheit, or 1 degree Celsius, until the end of time.

Now that evangelical Christians have joined the battle against global warming, we may as well acknowledge that America has one truly national religion: environmentalism.

Its tenets, already taken for granted in the blue states, were embraced this week by the Christian leaders who formed the Evangelical Climate Initiative. They haven't yet rewritten Genesis, but their advertising campaign warns of "millions of deaths" from biblical scourges — floods, droughts, pestilence — unless humans make a "sacred commitment" to stop global warming.

It may look odd for evangelicals to be taking up Hollywood's most fashionable cause, but the alliance makes perfect sense. Environmentalism has always fundamentally been a religion — "Calvinism minus God," in the words of Robert Nelson, a professor of environmental policy at the University of Maryland. He calls the global warming debate the latest example of environmentalist creationism.

The Puritans and other Calvinists believed that God was revealed not just in Scripture but also in the "Book of Nature." To them, the wilderness was an unchanged record of God's handiwork at "the Creation," offering a glimpse of the world before man's pride and sinfulness alienated him from nature and caused him to be expelled from Eden.

Environmentalists have had similar notions, starting with John Muir, who considered nature "a mirror reflecting the Creator." Al Gore urged the "moral courage" to secure "our place within creation." When Bruce Babbitt was secretary of the interior, he called plants and animals "a direct reflector of divinity," and he warned Americans not to "recklessly destroy the patterns of creation."

There is one large problem with this version of creationism. The world we see was not created in a week, and it has looked a lot different in the past.

DOJ_NMG_0014437

The forests that seemed divine to the Puritans and to Muir and Babbitt were not present at the Creation. They were merely the latest adaptation to changing climatic conditions and competition with other species, including humans — Indians had been managing the forests by cutting trees and setting fires. There is no such thing as a "natural" forest in America, Nelson writes, unless you reject creationism and define nature as "the Darwinian vision of unremitting struggle for survival."

Darwin's Book of Nature isn't as morally satisfying as Calvin's, at least not for those who enjoy berating Americans for their sinful desires to cut down trees and burn fossil fuels. But it does make for a clearer way to think about global warming. Instead of assuming that humans will be punished for tinkering with God's handiwork, you can consider the best strategy for our species' survival.

That means rejecting the assumption that we must immediately start atoning for our excesses. Solutions like the Kyoto treaty amount to expensive hair shirts that appeal to penitents but not necessarily to economists. Even economists who support the Kyoto treaty acknowledge that it will make only a small difference far in the future while imposing serious costs today.

And those costs seem too high to other economists, like the four Nobel laureates and their colleagues who met in Copenhagen in 2004 to study proposals to help the world's poor. The Copenhagen Consensus, as they called it, was that programs to slow global warming are one of the worst investments — far less worthwhile than programs to immediately combat disease and improve drinking water and sanitation.

Saving lives now makes more sense than spending large sums to avert biblical punishments that may never come. Scientists agree that the planet seems to be warming, but their models are so crude that they're unsure about how much it will heat up or how much damage will be done. There's a chance the warming could be mild enough to produce net benefits.

For now, the best strategy is to refine the forecasts and look for the cheapest and least painful ways to counteract global warming, including heretical ideas like geo-engineering schemes to cool the planet by blocking sunlight. It's hard today to imagine how that would be done — or how environmentalists would ever allow something so "unnatural." But maybe they could be convinced that we're just resetting God's thermostat back to the eighth day of Creation.

No Regrets For Miers (DMN)

By G. Robert Hillman

The Dallas Morning News, February 11, 2006

WASHINGTON – For Harriet Miers, her ill-fated nomination to the U.S. Supreme Court seems so long ago.

Even now, four months after President Bush turned to her, she isn't sure exactly how it came to be. Nor does she have any regrets about accepting the offer that faltered in a storm of opposition by conservatives within the Republican Party.

"There was a lot of noise," Ms. Miers acknowledged Thursday in her first interview since the nomination. "But there were also a lot of great moments."

Would she accept again?

"I not only would say 'yes' when called to this nature of service," said Ms. Miers, the top White House lawyer. "But I would recommend it to others, and I have."

By nearly any measure, though, it was tough sledding for the Dallas lawyer who followed Mr. Bush to the White House in 2001.

Previously, she had been the first woman to head the Texas and Dallas bar associations and had served one term on the Dallas City Council. But she had backed a few Democrats and had never been a judge, leaving some leading conservatives complaining about a lack of a legal paper trail that could use to rally support for her.

Also, many conservatives were unconvinced that she staunchly opposed abortion rights. She was quickly branded a crony because of her longtime legal work for Mr. Bush and his campaigns. And she was pilloried on late-night television and in newspaper editorial pages.

"I didn't see a lot of it," Ms. Miers said, sitting at the head of the conference table in her wood-paneled West Wing White House office.

"We tell nominees not to pay attention," she explained, referring to the instructions she routinely gives others, "and I did my best to do the same."

DOJ_NMG_0014438

She regrets, however, that "things that were being said about me made my brothers upset, or friends upset or whatever."

"But we understood it was a battle worth fighting," she said, "and that's what we were doing."

Ms. Miers allowed that "you always feel bad if you're the reason other people are having to spend time ... time that you know they have very important work to do."

"The process is very time consuming, both for the nominee and for those working with the nominee," she said.

As White House counsel, Ms. Miers manages the search and vetting of judicial nominees, including those for the Supreme Court. She was very much involved with the confirmation of John Roberts as chief justice and, later, her successor nominee, Samuel Alito.

He was confirmed by the Senate just last week, and there's already a picture of his ceremonial swearing in at the White House waiting to be hung in her outer office.

Even now, Ms. Miers continues updating the lists of potential nominees, among the pressing duties and issues that pass over her desk. They also include dealing with recent swirling controversy over the president's authorization of warrantless electronic surveillance of some Americans believed linked to terrorists.

Obviously, she acknowledged, it's become a "matter of great attention."

With Bush from start

Ms. Miers came to the White House with Mr. Bush at the start of his first term as staff secretary, a senior aide who manages the never-ending flow of paper to the president and other matters. Later, she moved up to deputy chief of staff for policy, then a year ago to White House counsel.

On Oct. 3, the president tapped her to replace retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. Ms. Miers withdrew her nomination on Oct. 27 and, as she put it, "went right back to work" as the president's top lawyer.

Asked if she planned on staying through the president's second term, Ms. Miers replied in her well-honed, soft-spoken legal way: "We serve at the pleasure of the president."

Texas in her future?

Right now, she said, she envisions returning to Texas after leaving the White House, perhaps heading back into private legal practice. And she would not flatly rule out running again for public office.

"As a lawyer, I've learned never to say never," Ms. Miers said, making it clear, though, that she was not now contemplating any such run.

Asked if she might someday succeed Chief of Staff Andrew Card, who is in his sixth year at the White House, she simply praised him and said she looked forward to working with him.

Looking back on her nomination, which she said now seems "a very long time ago," Ms. Miers said she didn't learn until very late in the search that she was under consideration for the high court.

"I'm not even sure that I could recall," she said. "It sort of became apparent to me that I was being asked questions, or that it was a possibility."

"I am not aware of what happened, exactly how it happened, or who was involved," she said.

In any case, in short order, Mr. Card, who had asked one of her deputies to quietly check into Ms. Miers' background, clued her in, and the president discussed the job with her.

She said she had "some time," but "not a whole lot" to ponder the possibility and from the start took it quite seriously.

"I think that if you're called to serve your nation in a role like the Supreme Court," Ms. Miers said, "the answer should be yes, unless there are very good reasons why not."

Asked if she had particularly weighed the possibility because she would be replacing one of two women on the high court, Ms. Miers said, "I'm a lawyer, and I looked at this as a lawyer being asked to serve on the court."

She also dismissed the scathing criticism that she was unqualified.

"I said 'yes,' to the request to be considered," Ms. Miers said. "I recognize that my background was somewhat different than lots of members of the court presently serving – however, not so different from others who have served.

"I came from a background as a practicing lawyer, from public service and community service and growing up in an American experience of the sort I lived," she said. "And that type of background brings a dimension to the court that is important."

DOJ_NMG_0014439

Others, she noted, made the "judgment of the kind of person they were looking for, the kinds of qualities that they were looking for, the kind of experience that they were looking for."

"The decision to nominate me was not mine," she said, adding later: "It's the president's choice."

She had stepped aside, she said, "at the right time for the right reasons," citing senators' inquiries about her work for the president, which she said was protected by executive privilege.

"It had been made very clear to me that there were going to be requests that I knew no executive officer would have any business producing," she said. "It was too great an issue."

In defense of SMU

She also defended her Dallas alma mater, Southern Methodist University, against criticism during the confirmation process that its law school was no Ivy League institution.

"I'm grateful to the school for the education that they gave me," she said, noting that SMU had helped her financially when she faced dropping out to help support her family after her father was disabled by a stroke.

"I'm proud of the contribution the school makes through its undergraduate and graduate school," Ms. Miers said.

And, she said, she was heartened by the all the friends and acquaintances, some of them out of touch for years, who had rallied around her in what she called the "great moments" of her grueling ordeal.

"I had an opportunity to become reacquainted with people that, at different points in my life, meant a lot to me," Ms. Miers said. "It helped me underscore what it's like to be a lawyer and why you're a lawyer and the role lawyers play, both in the profession and in the community."

Roberts Off To Quiet Start At Court (AP)

By Gina Holland

AP, February 11, 2006

So far, Chief Justice John Roberts has led a harmonious Supreme Court, rallying colleagues to settle cases in the most limited, least controversial way. The question is whether that will last or has been just a short-term necessity for a changing court.

The first few months of Roberts' tenure have not been short on divisive issues: assisted suicide, abortion, capital punishment.

But cases decided so far have broken little new ground, and there have been no bitter dissents.

Of the court's 18 authored opinions so far, only two came from 5-4 votes. And three cases that were expected to split the court — on abortion, campaign finance and the rights of disabled inmates — were resolved unanimously without setting important precedent.

"One almost wonders why the court took the cases in the first place," Richard Pildes, a constitutional law professor at New York University, wrote online as he and other court watchers struggled over what to make of the early days of the Roberts era.

One explanation is the retirement of Sandra Day O'Connor, who was replaced Jan. 31 by Samuel Alito. The timing of the transition is awkward, because justices are nearly midway through a term and have heard arguments in more than half the cases they will rule on this year.

Alito may have to break ties in some pending cases, because whatever positions O'Connor took do not count anymore. It's not clear if any appeals have been deliberately held up to give Alito a chance to change the outcome.

"No court is going to reach out with huge decisions when it is quite clearly in transition," said Dennis Hutchinson, an expert on the Supreme Court at the University of Chicago.

Jay Sekulow, chief counsel for the conservative American Center for Law and Justice, predicted that the cautious decisions will continue even with Alito on the bench.

"This is a court that's going to move incrementally. That seems to be John Roberts' style," Sekulow said.

Roberts, who just turned 51, succeeded William H. Rehnquist, who died last fall at age 80.

As the court's leader, he oversees private meetings, presides during the argument sessions, and assigns the writing of opinions when he is in the majority.

DOJ_NMG_0014440

So far Roberts has disagreed with just two opinions, and he did not file his own dissent either time. One of the rulings upheld Oregon's one-of-a-kind assisted-suicide law from a challenge by the Bush administration. Another said states can be sued in bankruptcy proceedings.

In both, Roberts was on the same side as Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas, the court's most conservative justices.

Roberts said during his Senate confirmation hearing in September that the chief justice should "act as a force to help bring about some cohesiveness and collegiality."

"I have told people, when pressed, that I prefer to be known as a modest judge," he also said.

The Roberts court, at this point, has been modest. Some examples, under his leadership the court:

_Dodged a decision on a parental abortion law from New Hampshire. On a 9-0 vote the justices said a lower court should reconsider whether the entire law was unconstitutional, or just part of it.

_Backed out of deciding whether a campaign finance law, in practice, violated free-speech rights of an anti-abortion group.

_Dismissed without explanation a police interrogation case.

_Passed up a chance to decide when inmates can use a federal disabilities law to sue states for not accommodating their disabilities.

Roberts, whose previous job was judge on the federal appeals court based in Washington, sometimes suggested ways that cases could be decided on limited grounds during the oral argument sessions.

"This is an even more extreme form of the kind of modest style of decision-making that Roberts had when he was on the D.C. Circuit," Pildes said in an interview. "One of the interesting issues to watch for now is whether this pattern will continue, or whether (now that) the court has a stable complement of justices it will shift back into issuing more sweeping opinions."

The first sign of the new court may come when justices meet for the first time with Alito instead of the moderate O'Connor. At the Feb. 21 session, justices could say whether they will hear arguments in several significant cases. Among them are the Bush administration's attempt to reinstate a ban on a type of late-term abortion and an appeal from an American terror suspect held without traditional legal rights.

The court also will have more rulings to announce. So far, Roberts has had just one opinion, although he likely has been working on several more during the court's monthlong recess.

"I imagine Roberts would like to be a consensus builder," said Stephen Wermiel, an American University law professor.

Political Skeletons, Cut And Pasted (NYT)

The New York Times, February 11, 2006

Staff members for a Republican congressman, carefully perusing his biography on Wikipedia — the free-form, online encyclopedia — recently happened upon the insertion that "he likes to beat his wife and children." The Web's collective form of fact-gathering tends to invite such sliming. But now, a more tricky problem is emerging: the editing of legislative biographies by staff members and loyalists devoted to gilding the incumbent.

The deletion of unattractive facts by apple-polishers became so obvious that Wikipedia's detectives temporarily blocked some Senate addresses from making entries. The electronic addresses of Senate offices turn out to be more easily traced than those of House members, so there is no comparable record of protective edits by lower house scriveners.

Senator Dianne Feinstein's net worth was mysteriously deleted from her biography, along with the $190,000 fine she had to pay for not disclosing that her husband had guaranteed her 1990 campaign loans. Wikinews, the encyclopedia's arm of corrective reporters, found Senator Joseph Biden's past problems with campaign plagiarism charges had evaporated, thanks to someone at one of his office computers. Members of Senator Norm Coleman's staff massaged a description of him as a liberal college Democrat; he morphed into an "activist," then merely an "active college student." A reference to Senator Tom Harkin's discredited claims to have flown combat missions in Vietnam disappeared.

An entry on Wikipedia is still almost guaranteed to be closer to reality than a compilation of campaign commercials. But when everybody is invited to contribute to lawmakers' biographies, the most interested participants are almost always going to be the people on their payrolls.

DOJ_NMG_0014441

OTHER NEWS:

In D.C. Visit, Perry Is Of Two Minds On Spending (HCHRON)

By BENNETT ROTH

Houston Chronicle, February 11, 2006

WASHINGTON - Texas Gov. Rick Perry showed Friday that he could be both a new-style conservative and an old-style politician.

He chided runaway Republican spending in a speech to fiscal hawks and then made the rounds of government agencies in search of federal aid for the state.

Perry spent much of a one-day visit to the nation's capital stating his case that Texas needed $2 billion for hurricane relief, as well as expedited funding for border-enforcement programs.

He began his day with an address crafted to appeal to the Conservative Political Action Conference, an influential group that has grown increasingly disenchanted with the spending policies of President Bush and the GOP-controlled Congress.

He accused the Republican lawmakers of allowing the federal deficit to explode as spending on entitlements such as Medicare and Social Security grow.

"The public expects Democrats to spend every dime in the Treasury and then ask for more because that's what Democrats do," said Perry, a former Democrat turned Republican.

"On the other hand, they elect Republicans to stop that from happening," he said, "and if Republicans keep spending like Democrats, the public will elect the real thing."

Perry denied that his appearance before the group — he was the only governor to address the conference — was an indication that he harbors national ambitions. The governor said he is focused on his re-election.

Donald Ely, a Republican state committeeman from Pennsylvania, said he would like to see Perry as a vice presidential candidate on ticket headed by Virginia Sen. George Allen in 2008.

"He's more conservative than George Bush," Ely said. "I'm not a Bush Republican. I'm a Reagan conservative."

In his speech, Perry only referred once to Bush, although not by name, praising his leadership in the war on terror. By contrast, he made five mentions of Reagan. Perry also suggested the federal government's priorities had been misplaced, with insufficient money allocated for border control.

The governor later met with a host of federal officials, including Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, to discuss speeding up federal border-enforcement grants to pay for overtime for local law enforcement officials and other pressing needs.

Kathy Walt, Perry's press secretary, said Homeland Security officials agreed to share information and intelligence so the state can better coordinate the deployment of state resources and security personnel to the border.

Although Walt said Perry did not raise the issue at the meeting with Chertoff, Texas stands to lose money if Congress approves a recommendation included in Bush's 2007 budget proposal to eliminate the State Criminal Alien Assistance Program. The program reimburses states and localities for some costs of jailing illegal immigrants.

Last year, Walt said, Texas received about $26 million from a $305 million appropriation. She said the state is expecting about $31 million from the $405 million approved for this year.

Perry discussed hurricane relief with Chertoff and with Sen. Thad Cochran, R-Miss., the chairman of the Senate Appropriation Committee.

Saying that that federal funding for Rita had fallen "substantially short" of what was needed, Perry urged lawmakers to include $2 billion in a supplemental spending bill to deal with the storm's aftermath.

bennett.roth@chron.com

Talent Changes Stem-cell Stance (KCS)

By Matt Stearns And Steve Kraske

The Kansas City Star, February 11, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0014442

WASHINGTON — Sen. Jim Talent attempted an election-year pirouette Friday on stem-cell research, an issue that has split the Missouri Republican Party.

Talent withdrew his four-year support of federal legislation that would ban human cloning, including what opponents call embryonic therapeutic cloning that most researchers see as key to early stem-cell study. Talent's pro-life supporters adamantly oppose the technique.

In making his position change, the Missouri Republican sought to satisfy the pro-life camp by promoting a type of stem-cell research that "signals the end of ethical dilemmas in this type of research."

"If we can get the stem cells without the cloning, we render the current controversy scientifically obsolete," Talent said Friday in a half-hour Senate floor speech that was equal parts science lesson and politics.

Still, the Missouri Catholic Conference issued a scathing news release accusing Talent of abandoning his pro-life principles. And Missouri scientific leaders remained unhappy that Talent seemed to favor a type of research that is only in preliminary stages and is not being performed in Missouri.

Stem-cell research is a hot political issue in Missouri because supporters of embryonic stem-cell research — including many Republican business leaders in Kansas City and St. Louis — are trying to get an initiative on the November ballot that would prevent Missouri from enacting stricter laws on the research than the federal government would.

Talent's Democratic opponent, Claire McCaskill, supports the initiative. She had lambasted Talent for co-sponsoring the restrictive legislation, which was originally introduced by Sen. Sam Brownback, a Kansas Republican. The pro-life movement also opposes the initiative because they see all types of human cloning as violating their view of the sanctity of human life.

Talent would not say Friday whether he would support the ballot initiative, although he reiterated his basic support for the goals of the legislation he abandoned — specifically, the banning of cloning of human embryos, including those created solely for research purposes through a process called somatic cell nuclear transfer.

Instead, he sought to present what he called "a common ground solution" that would entail a more flexible regulatory ban on somatic cell nuclear transfer while increasing federal funding for a type of research known as altered nuclear transfer.

Altered nuclear transfer in theory creates "nonembryos" that contain embryonic stem cells. It gives the benefits of early stem-cell research without the cloning that is anathema to so many in the pro-life movement, Talent said.

"Science would have the stem cells it needs in a morally acceptable way that would allow for full federal funding of stem-cell research," Talent said. "The pro-life community would have an effective ban on human cloning. We would turn a zero-sum game into a win-win proposition for everyone."

Talent said he was trying to find "an island of unity in a sea of controversy."

William Hurlbut, a leading proponent of altered nuclear transfer research, said Friday: "You never create an embryo by this method. You never create a living human organism."

Even so, many in the pro-life movement view altered nuclear transfer as no more acceptable than the research they condemn as cloning. That is because the research still involves creating a blastocyst — a ball of cells — and crippling it in the petri dish to prevent it from growing into a human embryo.

"We have concerns about the intentional creation of what may be developmentally disabled human 'embryos' for the sole purpose of destroying them to harvest their stem cells," wrote Carrie Gordon Earll of Focus on the Family, a leading conservative group.

The pro-life movement also is confused by Talent's rationale for pulling his support for Brownback's bill.

Talent said he was concerned that the bill's wording would inadvertently ban altered nuclear transfer research that did not involve the cloning of human embryos.

Nonsense, said Richard Doerflinger, deputy director of pro-life activities for the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops, whose group helped Brownback write the bill.

"This doesn't make any sense to us," Doerflinger said. "The Brownback bill … clearly allows research other than cloning human embryos. … I think this man is very confused."

Talent did not tell Brownback that he was pulling support for the bill, an aide to the senator from Kansas said.

DOJ_NMG_0014443

Brownback would not comment Friday, but he has never said he considers altered nuclear transfer research to be ethically sound.

"There's been a lot of support for Jim Talent from the pro-life community," said Larry Weber, executive director of the Missouri Catholic Conference. "Today he stepped off that platform. At this point, it's essentially vacant with respect to the U.S. Senate election. His candidacy gave pro-life voters something they could gravitate towards. Unfortunately, it's just not there any more."

Missouri's scientific community wasn't thrilled either.

No researchers at Kansas City's Stowers Institute or St. Louis' Washington University currently do altered nuclear transfer research, said scientists at the state's two leading bioresearch centers.

"All federally allowed research with stem cells should proceed," said William Neaves, president of the Stowers Institute. "At this time, it's not possible to know which type of research would hold the most promise."

And it doesn't make sense at this time to tilt the playing field in favor of one type of research, especially for altered nuclear transfer, for which "there is no evidence this will work in people," said Steven Teitelbaum, a researcher at Washington University who uses stem cells in his research.

Talent pointed out in his speech that somatic cell nuclear transfer remains equally unproven in its medical efficacy.

McCaskill wasted no time in trying to exploit Talent's new position.

"Strong leaders need to have clarity," McCaskill said. "He appears to be in a fog."

The dual risks of being viewed as a flip-flopper on a high-profile issue and of antagonizing part of his base could prove politically fatal, said George Connor, a political scientist at Missouri State University.

"Instead of saying, 'This is what I believe,' and going out on the campaign trail and defending it, he's trying to have the best of both worlds."

"This is a very dangerous thing for Senator Talent," Connor added. "It could cost him the race. I just think it's an astounding mistake."

But Missouri Rep. Brian Yates, a Lee's Summit Republican, called it a smart move.

"I see where the senator is going," Yates said. "A lot of life sciences are still evolving. It may be premature to enact legislation to criminalize life sciences research without more information or without better definitions of what should be allowed. … I think it's probably a good thing to take a step back and review this issue."

Talent said in an interview following his speech that politics had nothing to do with his decision to abandon the Brownback bill and push for more altered nuclear transfer research. He said the decision was the result of a yearlong examination of the issues.

"It really is an attempt to get everybody to understand there are at least some areas where you can have what you want without denying the other side what they want," Talent said.

Still, he acknowledged he had waded into politically perilous waters.

"My wife says to me last night, 'Jim … two things are going to happen: Nobody's going to like it and they're all going to say you're doing it just for political reasons,' " Talent said. "And I said to her, 'Well, if nobody likes it, why in the world would I be doing it for political reasons?' "

Steele Apologizes For Holocaust Remarks (WP)

By Robert Barnes And Matthew Mosk

The Washington Post, February 11, 2006

Compared Stem Cell Research to Nazi Medical Experiments

Maryland Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele profusely apologized yesterday for comments linking stem cell research to Nazi experimentation, but the offhand analogy could undermine what had been a concerted effort by the Republican to run for the U.S. Senate as a moderate "bridge" between Democrats and Republicans in his left-leaning state.

Steele issued apologies in a radio interview and in phone conversations with Jewish leaders in Baltimore and Washington, and then continued to express regret throughout a series of stops in Prince George's County.

DOJ_NMG_0014444

"I offended members of the Jewish community and members of the Maryland community," Steele said outside a Prince George's nursing home. "It was a remark that was an improper inference, because I never specifically said Holocaust. . . . And it did not reflect my attitude and my belief, and I am really sorry about the whole thing."

Besides offending those Steele was trying to befriend, some politicians and political observers said his remarks appeared to hurt him in several ways: putting him on the wrong side of a popular issue, reinforcing a worry among even some Republicans that he can be an accident-prone candidate in a high-profile race, and signaling to swing voters that he is more conservative than the almost-nonpartisan image he has cultivated.

"Some people could think he's not moderate . . . but a hard-right Republican," said University of Maryland Prof. Ronald Walters, who has been closely following Steele's campaign.

Keith Haller, who conducts polls for Maryland media and others, said his recent surveys show that Steele has "risen above the cacophony of partisan battles" in the state. "His popularity has been steadily soaring, so he certainly didn't need to engage on this issue, in such an awkward way."

In an appearance Thursday before the Baltimore Jewish Council, Steele responded to a question about stem cell research by saying he was "cautious" about the idea of "tinkering around with life," and added:

"Look, you of all folks know what happens when people decide they want to experiment on human beings, when they want to take your life and use it as a tool," Steele said, according to a recording of the event. "I know that as well from my community and our experience with slavery."

Jewish leaders, for the most part, accepted Steele's apology. Ron Halber, executive director of the Jewish Community Relations Council of Greater Washington, said he considered it an exercise of bad judgment by a good man.

"He understands his remarks were offensive," Halber said. "People in the Jewish community are upset about them. What was behind the words were not the feelings of a hatemonger, though."

His Democratic opponents were glad Steele apologized but sharp in their criticism.

"Michael Steele does not have the right to compare the lifesaving potential of stem cell research to the barbarity of the Holocaust," said Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin, one of several Democrats running to replace retiring Sen. Paul S. Sarbanes (D). "His remarks were offensive to the millions of Americans who stand to benefit [from] this research, as well as to Holocaust survivors and their families."

State Sen. Sharon M. Grosfeld (D-Montgomery), the daughter of a Holocaust survivor, said she was "shocked by the ignorance of the statement." Another Senate candidate, former congressman and former NAACP president Kweisi Mfume, said he also was offended by Steele's comments about slavery. "Any further comparison to equate slavery to stem cell research is a reach that I and others who are the descendants of slaves don't understand," he said.

Republican Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr., who has recommended $20 million in state money for stem cell research but wants to let an outside panel decide which kind of cell research should be funded, tried to deflect criticism from his former running mate.

"I think after an adult, straight-up person makes a comment and then apologizes for the comment, unless you want to make a political deal out of it, or you want to cause some sort of political damage because you dislike his candidacy, what else can the guy do?" Ehrlich told the Associated Press.

Steele's Senate candidacy has been greatly aided by national Republican leaders, who recruited him to run believing he is the party's best hope. But Steele has studiously avoided following a GOP script in a state where President Bush is a help only in fundraising.

The stem cell issue is one in which Marylanders differ greatly from Bush and other prominent Republicans. Haller said that in his latest poll for the Baltimore Sun, 60 percent of the voters supported embryonic stem cell research; the state's increasingly important independent voters favored it 3 to 1, and even a plurality of Republicans are in favor.

Steele has cited his strong Catholic faith -- he spent several years as a seminarian -- in explaining his opposition to abortion and the death penalty, even though he said yesterday he does not let his religion enter into "policy discussions."

"It is a force in my life. I tried to share a little bit of that because most politicians get up and give you the pat, 30-second sound bite," Steele said. "I will continue to do that, but unfortunately in that process, there was an inference that was not right."

DOJ_NMG_0014445

Steele was elected Maryland's first statewide African American officeholder as Ehrlich's running mate and has not campaigned on his own for such a high-profile job. He has regretted off-the-cuff remarks before.

Last summer, when news reports broke that Ehrlich had held a fundraiser at an all-white country club, Steele said he didn't care because "I don't play golf. It's not an issue with me." A couple of weeks later, he changed his mind and said, "The core issue there is, the perception of discrimination is just as insidious as the reality of discrimination." He said his first answer was "flippant."

Staff writer Hamil R. Harris contributed to this report.

Steele Apologizes For Stem Cell Remarks (BSUN)

By Jennifer Skalka

The Baltimore Sun, February 11, 2006

Lt. governor calls Holocaust reference 'irresponsible'

In a quick move to stanch criticism of his remarks likening embryonic stem cell research to Nazi medical testing, Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele apologized yesterday, saying his comments to Baltimore Jewish leaders do not reflect what is in his heart.

Steele, a Republican candidate for the U.S. Senate, said during a morning interview on WBAL Radio that he "made an unfortunate, irresponsible inference."

"I humbly apologize to everyone, certainly in that room and anyone who is now following this, because that is not where my heart or where my head is," Steele said.

"It was just unfortunate, and I am very sorry for anyone taking offense by the remarks."

Steele told the board of the Baltimore Jewish Council during a Thursday luncheon that "you of all folks know what happens when people decide they want to experiment on human beings, when they want to take your life and use it as a tool."

Democrats who are vying to oppose Steele in the fall weren't letting the gaffe go by yesterday -- a sign that the incident could become a factor in the campaign.

U.S. Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin, a Senate candidate, held a news conference in Annapolis to denounce Steele's remarks.

"Michael Steele opposes this life-saving research," Cardin said. "This is an appropriate issue for us to debate. ... Michael Steele is wrong on stem cell research, and he's wrong on other issues."

Three other Democratic Senate candidates -- Kweisi Mfume, former congressman and former head of the NAACP; Lise Van Susteren, a forensic psychiatrist; and American University professor Allan Lichtman -- issued statements critical of Steele.

So did a Democratic National Committee spokesman, who lambasted the head of the Republican National Committee for not repudiating Steele's remarks, calling his inaction "political hypocrisy at its worst."

Mfume originally condemned Steele's remarks, saying that there can be no comparison between stem cell research and "the reprehensible horrors committed by the Nazis against innocent men, women and children."

But he later added to his comments. "I'm glad to know that Mr. Steele has apologized for his remarks, and if the larger Jewish community is prepared to accept that, then we should move on," he said in a statement provided by a campaign spokesman.

Van Susteren was less forgiving. "Mr. Steele, do you know what it's like to tell the parent of a child with diabetes that we aren't doing everything we can to find a cure?" she said in statement emphasizing her medical background.

"Do you know what it's like to tell the child of an Alzheimer's patient that instead of helping, the government is putting up roadblocks? I do. ... It is a tragedy that those in power who could do something to alleviate suffering ... do not."

James Gimpel, a political science professor at the University of Maryland, College Park, said Steele's views about stem cell research are anchored in his Catholic religious beliefs, but that he can't be pleased with the attention they have attracted.

"His views on stem cell research are probably not that well known, and this was not exactly the best way to make them known," Gimpel said.

Still, he questioned whether Steele lost many votes this week because Jews tend to vote Democratic.

David A. Harris, deputy executive director of the National Jewish Democratic Council in Washington, disagreed.

"I think the conscience of many Marylanders will be deeply offended by what he said, and it's not limited to American Jews," Harris said.

DOJ_NMG_0014446

In addition to his radio apology, Steele phoned Art Abramson, executive director of the council, to apologize directly. Abramson said Steele offered to visit with the council again to make amends. Instead, Abramson suggested he send a letter, which he did.

In it, Steele calls the Holocaust "one of the world's darkest chapters."

"By remembering the uniqueness of this tragedy we hope we can prevent it from occurring ever again," Steele wrote. "I feel terrible for any pain I have caused by my inappropriate comments."

Abramson said he felt Steele's apology was "appropriately handled."

"I believe his apology was humble and sincere, and I accept it," Abramson said.

Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. said some people will try to use Steele's remarks to damage his Senate candidacy, but the governor praised Steele for apologizing and called him "a straight-up guy."

"Mike is very strong, and he is running strong in the polls, and there is a great deal of fear associated with this campaign because of his polling numbers and his excellent fundraising and his life story," the governor said.

"He is a real threat to this monopoly establishment."

For his part, Steele advised against using his statements for political purposes.

"I just hope that there is no grandstanding on this because this is a very sensitive issue, both with respect to the Holocaust and the memory of those affected there, but also the issue of stem cell [research]," Steele said during the radio interview.

In Annapolis, Cardin, flanked by Democratic lawmakers and his wife, Myrna Cardin, who attended the Jewish Council lunch, chided Steele for comparing stem cell research to what he called "the barbarity of the Holocaust."

Myrna Cardin said Steele's remarks were "quite horrifying." "Those were not the words that any of us ever wanted to hear," she told reporters.

The congressman was joined by Baltimore County Sen. Paula C. Hollinger and Baltimore Del. Samuel I. Rosenberg, the Democratic sponsors of bills to commit $25 million a year for five years to stem cell research, which scientists believe could hold the key to treatments or cures for many illnesses.

Their bills emphasize the importance of embryonic stem cell research. The governor's competing plan would dedicate $20 million to stem cell research, but it does not specify whether the funding would go to embryonic or adult stem cell proposals.

Ehrlich, who has said science should guide decisions about how the money will be distributed, has given the Maryland Technology Development Corporation, a quasi-public agency that falls within the Department of Business and Economic Development, the responsibility for determining who will get the money.

At the council luncheon, Steele suggested that he and Ehrlich were in agreement on stem cell research. "The governor and I have pretty squarely laid out where we are on that," Steele said.

Rosenberg said yesterday that given Steele's remarks to the council, the governor owes the public a firm explanation of his position on embryonic research.

Henry Fawell, an Ehrlich spokesman, responded that the governor "has supported government funding of stem cell research since he was a member of Congress. His plan allows for embryonic stem cell research funding."

jennifer.skalka@baltsun.com

Sun reporters David Nitkin, Kelly Brewington and Lynn Anderson contributed to this article.

Seeing A Jungle In Congress, A Lion Of The Nixon Era Runs Again (NYT)

By John M. Broder

The New York Times, February 11, 2006

RUMSEY, Calif., Feb. 6 — As he shambles through his organic orange and olive groves here, Pete McCloskey hardly resembles the liberal lion he once was in Congress, the scourge of the Nixon White House and a father of the environmental movement. He wears beat-up denim clothes and high rubber boots as he imagines mucking out Congress as he does the stables of his prized Arabian horses.

DOJ_NMG_0014447

Yes, this is the same Pete McCloskey, now 78, the left-wing Republican from the San Francisco Bay Area who in the early 1970's thundered on the House floor for the impeachment of President Richard M. Nixon and demanded an immediate end to the Vietnam War, who helped create Earth Day and wrote the Endangered Species Act.

Now Mr. McCloskey, marching to a drummer perhaps only he hears, is taking on a powerful incumbent member of Congress of his own party, Richard W. Pombo, in a long-shot quest to return to Washington for one last hurrah. He accuses Mr. Pombo of being one of the most corrupt members of Congress, a tool of the deposed majority leader Tom DeLay and one of the biggest recipients of the largess of the lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

Mr. McCloskey said that he was challenging Mr. Pombo because he could not find anyone else to run against the seven-term incumbent from California's 11th Congressional District, which stretches from the East Bay suburbs of San Francisco into the agricultural San Joaquin Valley. Mr. McCloskey has rented a room in a house in Lodi to establish residency in the district, which does not include his farm outside Rumsey, about 90 miles northwest of Lodi.

This is the same Pete McCloskey who as a congressman criticized Israeli military operations, discussed the influence of Jewish money in American politics, spoke to a group of Holocaust deniers and urged negotiations with Yasir Arafat and creation of a Palestinian state long before American presidents and Israeli prime ministers were ready to do so.

The same Republican who ran for Senate in 1982 by disagreeing with President Ronald Reagan on nearly every major issue and who campaigned for John Kerry in 2004 against President Bush, the son of a man he considers a good friend.

Mr. McCloskey said he was motivated to run this time by Mr. Pombo's ties to Mr. DeLay and Mr. Abramoff and his acceptance of large campaign contributions from Indian tribes, land developers, sweatshop owners and oil companies. He strongly disapproves of Mr. Pombo's record as chairman of the House Resources Committee, where he has tried to revise the Endangered Species Act and open public lands to oil and mineral extraction.

"This man is an embarrassment," Mr. McCloskey said of Mr. Pombo. "He is Tom DeLay's handmaiden, he wants to privatize millions of acres of federal lands, and he believes the Supreme Court is a threat to our democracy. Those are fundamental enough reasons to make you want to defeat a guy."

Mr. Pombo and his advisers dismiss Mr. McCloskey as a carpetbagger, a crank and an egotist. They say he represents no threat to the incumbent, and they have, so far, swatted away his demand for public debates.

"He's not only out of the mainstream of the Republican Party, he's outside the mainstream of American society," said Wayne Johnson, Mr. Pombo's principal political consultant. "He's like Austin Powers, trapped in the 1970's."

Mr. Pombo declined to comment on the race.

Mr. McCloskey's old friends and allies said they were not surprised to see him enter the fray again. They said he had shown courage on the battlefield as a young Marine officer in Korea and in his political career, taking on the leadership of his own party, even challenging Nixon in the 1972 presidential primary.

Mr. McCloskey won one delegate in that race, the son of a friend.

"He's a guy that led six bayonet charges and was the highest-decorated second lieutenant in the Korean War," said Jim Johnson, a retired Republican member of Congress from Colorado who served with Mr. McCloskey. "He's fearless. And when he gets angry and gets onto something, he will do what he can to change it."

Kenneth L. Khachigian had a slightly different perspective. He was a young speechwriter in the Nixon White House who watched Mr. McCloskey's hopeless 1972 challenge with disdain and some amusement.

"He wasn't taken seriously at all," said Mr. Khachigian, now a political consultant in California. "He was more of a nuisance."

He said Mr. McCloskey's campaign for Congress this year was just as quixotic, adding: "He's looking for attention. And one way to get it is to go back to doing what he does best — ticking off fellow Republicans."

Mr. Pombo has a considerable advantage in money, with about $1.25 million in his campaign account and his political action committee, known as RichPAC.

Mr. McCloskey's campaign balance is $0. He said he was considering lending his campaign $50,000 of his own money — half his savings, he said — to get it off the ground. He admitted that he knew virtually nobody in the 11th Congressional District, but he said was planning to make up for that with shoe leather and a bus tour modeled on Senator John McCain's "Straight Talk Express."

DOJ_NMG_0014448

Mr. McCloskey knows that his odds of winning the June 6 primary are long, but he is driven by the same fire that moved him during his 15 years in Congress that began in 1967 when he defeated Shirley Temple Black in a special election for a House seat representing a prosperous and liberal district in the area around Palo Alto now known as Silicon Valley.

He said he no longer recognized the Republican Party in which he served alongside such moderate and liberal luminaries as Mark O. Hatfield, Charles H. Percy and John V. Lindsay. He remembers with a nostalgic sigh being befriended by the moderate Republican rookie congressman from Houston, George Bush, when he arrived to take his seat in 1967. He and Mr. Bush still carry on a lively correspondence, although they differ strongly on the current president.

"What this campaign is about is which way does this Republican Party go," Mr. McCloskey said in an interview in the cluttered living room of his retirement farm.

He said neoconservatives — including his old friend and colleague Dick Cheney — had taken over the government and driven the nation into an ocean of red ink and a ruinous war in Iraq. He said he agreed with a fellow marine and former House colleague, Representative John P. Murtha, Democrat of Pennsylvania, that the nation should withdraw most of its troops from Iraq by year's end.

While his antiwar position and his views on the environment, abortion and gay rights (he is for them) could be popular in a Democratic primary in many Congressional districts, it is not likely to endear him to the voters of California's 11th, which has a preponderance of Republican voters and has easily returned Mr. Pombo to Washington since he was first elected in 1992.

Even so, Helen Hooper McCloskey, Mr. McCloskey's former press secretary and wife of 23 years, supports her husband's campaign, calling it a brave if somewhat foolhardy last act to restore his reputation and rescue the things he holds dear.

"He is an endangered species himself — the liberal Republican," she said.

Photo With Bush Helps Congressman's Rival (AP)

By T.a. Badger

AP, February 11, 2006

A photo of President Bush cupping the cheeks of Rep. Henry Cuellar at last week's State of the Union address has been the gift that keeps on giving for Cuellar's chief rival for the Democratic nomination.

The Washington Post picture of Cuellar beaming as the president holds his face is a boffo hit on the Internet, inspiring humorous-caption contests and accusations that Cuellar is a stealth Republican.

Cuellar's Democratic rival, Ciro Rodriguez, has produced a leaflet centered around the photo. It reads: "George Bush thinks Henry Cuellar is `chulo'" — Spanish slang for "pretty boy."

Before the picture came out, Rodriguez, a former congressman trying to regain the House seat he lost in 2004 to Cuellar, had been low on money, momentum and a memorable message.

But the Rodriguez campaign said the picture has generated more than $80,000 in contributions in little more than a week and given a major boost to his supporters a month before the Democratic primary.

"The saying goes, `A picture tells you a thousand words,'" Rodriguez said. "Well, in this case, it's gone beyond a thousand, especially on the dollars."

The photo flap became even richer when it was revealed that Cuellar listened to the State of the Union address while standing on the Republican side of the aisle. Cuellar also served briefly as Texas secretary of state under GOP Gov. Rick Perry

Colin Strother, a Cuellar spokesman, said that Cuellar is a true Democrat regardless of where he chose to listen to the speech, and that the photo is being blown out of proportion.

"Henry was far from the only Democrat to share a moment with the president that evening — he was just the one immortalized on camera," Strother said. "We're moving forward, and whatever Ciro chooses to do with the photo is up to his campaign."

Democrats Look For Gains In Governors' Races (REU)

By John Whitesides

DOJ_NMG_0014449

Reuters, February 11, 2006

Democrats are positioned for gains in governors' races in November and could capture governorships in many big battleground states, giving the party an early edge in the 2008 fight for the White House.

Republicans must defend 22 of the 36 governors' offices on the ballot in November, including eight states where the incumbent retired or is barred from running again. Democrats defend 14 governorships but only one in which the incumbent is not running.

The lopsided political map, along with a tough national election climate for Republicans, put Democrats in a strong position to pick up at least the four governorships needed for a national majority. Republicans hold 28 governorships to 22 for Democrats.

"The math is not in our favor this year," said Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, chairman of the Republican Governors' Association, who is stepping down this year ahead of a potential 2008 presidential bid.

"Just looking at the math," he told Reuters. "We should lose four to six spots. But we expect to do better than the math would indicate."

New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson, chairman of the Democratic Governors' Association and a candidate for re-election this year, said he anticipated a net gain of five or six governorships for his party.

"We think the states are the most fertile territory for Democrats and winning a majority of governorships in 2006 enhances our chances for winning the presidential election in 2008," Richardson, another potential White House candidate, told Reuters.

Among the biggest prizes in November's mid-term election, when control of Congress also will be at stake, are open governors' offices in Ohio, Florida, Massachusetts and New York, where incumbent Republicans are retiring.

Governorships held by Republicans in the key swing states of Nevada, Colorado and Arkansas, and the Democratic office in Iowa, also are open and up for grabs.

'CHALLENGING RACES'

"We have eight open seats and some of them are in places where Democrats have a solid voter lead," Romney said. "New York, Massachusetts, Ohio and even Arkansas, are places where we have to overcome a blue tide. Those are more challenging races for us."

Both parties crave the advantages offered by a sitting governor, particularly in years with a presidential race. Governors typically raise big money, muster a ready pool of volunteers and generate heavy local media coverage for national candidates.

A popular governor can be worth two percentage points or more to a viable White House candidate, analysts say, giving Democrats a sterling opportunity to lay the groundwork for 2008.

"It's not just the numbers that matter, it's the places," said Larry Sabato, a political analyst at the University of Virginia, pointing to the big swing states up for grabs in November. "The Democrats can set themselves up nicely for the 2008 presidential contest, assuming they nominate an electable candidate."

While national Republicans have suffered a series of recent setbacks, including the loss of two governors' races last year, scandals involving prominent party leaders and Bush's low approval ratings, Romney said they should not effect governors' races.

"People choose their governor based on state issues, not national issues," Romney said. "While the national attitude may color things at the margin, overwhelmingly governor's races are decided by the campaigns of the candidates themselves."

Incumbent Republican Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger faces a tough re-election race in Democratic-leaning California, as do Republicans Bob Ehrlich in Maryland and Tim Pawlenty in Minnesota.

Democratic incumbents Ed Rendell in Pennsylvania, Jennifer Granholm in Michigan and Jim Doyle in Wisconsin also have potentially close elections, although their home states are Democratic-leaning.

Richardson pointed to six popular Democratic governors favored to win easy re-election in Republican-leaning states -- Kansas, Oklahoma, Arizona, Tennessee, Wyoming and himself in New Mexico -- as evidence of Democratic growth in red states.

"The Congress and the White House appear to be in gridlock," Richardson said. "The Democratic Party has to rebuild itself not from Washington down but from the states up. We have to be competitive in red states."

Motivation Behind Crime Study Questioned (WP)

By Matthew Mosk

The Washington Post, February 11, 2006

Ehrlich Administration Defends Project as Public Safety Officials Wonder if Goals Are Political

Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr.'s administration has commissioned a criminologist to conduct an expedited audit of Maryland crime statistics, just as Ehrlich gears up for a reelection campaign that could put a spotlight on violence in Baltimore and Prince George's County.

Police in the five largest Maryland jurisdictions were notified last month that they would be asked to contribute data for a study that would be completed by Aug. 14, less than three months before Election Day.

"A full and accurate measure of these statistics is central to our mission of assisting victims and controlling and preventing crime," said Alex Ray, a spokesman for the Governor's Office of Crime Control and Prevention, which commissioned the study.

But public safety officials in several Maryland jurisdictions questioned whether the real goals of the project are political, given the expectation that if Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley is the Democratic Party nominee, Ehrlich will attempt to blame him for Baltimore's persistent crime woes.

"Nothing about this study adds up," said Kristen Mahoney, a high-ranking police official who advises O'Malley, one of two Democrats vying to challenge the Republican governor in November.

The University of Maryland professor who will conduct the study said yesterday that officials in the governor's crime control office approached him with the idea, recommended the timetable and said they will pay him $340,000.

That branch of the governor's office was the target of a federal investigation during the 2002 election season in which top officials there were accused of using grant money to help bolster Democratic Lt. Gov. Kathleen Kennedy Townsend's ties to constituent groups. An indictment of the agency's director was eventually dismissed.

The latest study has brought similar questions from officials in several jurisdictions under review. Officials questioned whether Ehrlich sanctioned the project and whether it was politically motivated.

A spokesman for Ehrlich said the governor was told of the proposal as part of a routine briefing from public safety agencies. "The governor does not make any decisions on grant proposals," added Henry Fawell, Ehrlich's deputy press secretary.

Baltimore police, for one, will not be helping, said the department's spokesman, Matt Jablow.

Prince George's County State's Attorney Glenn F. Ivey (D) called the steep price and quick turnaround time highly unusual, based on his past dealings with the crime prevention office.

"We've worked with them on grants for crime issues for the previous three years pretty closely, and I would have expected, for a grant of that magnitude, they would have touched base with us to see if we thought it would even be useful," Ivey said. "Reviewing all the statistics on crime would be extremely difficult to do, and do a good job, in six months."

The professor hired to conduct the study, Charles F. Wellford, said that if there is a political motive behind the project, he is not aware of it.

"It's certainly not my motive, and certainly not the intent," Wellford said. "It's not unusual for us to get called in to try to be an objective voice on what crime data are saying."

Wellford said it was not until he conducted a Jan. 24 meeting with police from several of the jurisdictions that he heard suspicions about the role politics might have played in getting the study going.

"I don't know if they were trying to pay me a compliment, but one of them said, 'If it weren't for your involvement, we would think politics was behind this,' " Wellford said.

Wellford's grant application says the project will review "how accurately [crime] is reported to the public." To do this, he said, he has hired a private survey firm to conduct thousands of telephone interviews with crime victims, and he will pore over data from the five jurisdictions.

Wellford said meeting the target date will require cooperation from the five police agencies.

Montgomery County Executive Douglas M. Duncan (D), another O'Malley rival who aims to campaign for governor in part by highlighting the crime problem in Baltimore, has asked his police department to cooperate fully.

DOJ_NMG_0014451

"This is absolutely something that needs to be done," said David Weaver, Duncan's communications director. "We look forward to seeing the results."

Trade Gap Hits Record For 4th Year In A Row (WP)

By Paul Blustein

The Washington Post, February 11, 2006

The U.S. trade deficit soared to a record in 2005 for the fourth year in a row, according to a government report released yesterday that provided a reminder of the dangers hovering over a generally robust economy.

The United States imported $725.8 billion more in goods and services than it exported last year, the Commerce Department said. That is up 17.5 percent from last year, and it is an all-time high not only in dollar terms but as a proportion of the economy; the figure is equal to 5.8 percent of gross domestic product.

For December alone, the trade gap increased to $65.7 billion from a revised $64.7 billion in November. That is the third-highest monthly deficit ever.

In some respects, the trade deficit reflects the strength of the U.S. economy, at least relative to other major trading partners.

Because U.S. economic growth has been rapid in recent years, American consumers are snapping up foreign goods of all kinds -- autos, electronics and clothing being some of the biggest categories. At the same time, relatively sluggish growth in economies such as the European Union and Japan has dampened demand for goods made in the United States. Thus even though U.S. exports rose 10.4 percent last year to $1.27 trillion, imports surged 12.9 percent to nearly $2 trillion.

But the gap worries many economists because it means the United States must borrow heavily from overseas. The dollars that Americans spend on imports are often invested by foreigners in the bonds of the U.S. Treasury and mortgage agencies such as Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac, so the more the trade deficit widens and the longer it persists, the greater U.S. indebtedness becomes. That is why some analysts fret about a scenario in which foreigners would sell off U.S. securities en masse, causing interest rates to soar and the global economy to fall into recession.

Nothing of the sort has materialized so far. On the contrary, overseas demand for U.S. investments last year was powerful enough to drive up the dollar against most major currencies.

"It's true that many of us have been concerned that foreigners will grow tired of financing these ever larger trade deficits, and so far there hasn't been much sign of that," said Jeffrey A. Frankel, a Harvard University economist who served on President Bill Clinton's Council of Economic Advisers.

"But there are plenty of reasons to be concerned," Frankel said. "We know [the trade deficit] means we're borrowing against the future, and that our children will have lower standards of living than they would otherwise. And just because a 'hard landing' hasn't happened yet doesn't mean it won't."

Furthermore, Frankel added, a big trade deficit generates pressure for protectionism. The report yesterday prompted many members of Congress and labor groups to step up their calls for a tougher U.S. trade policy and rollbacks in the free-trade deals negotiated in recent years.

"This trade deficit is unsustainable -- we cannot sit back as other nations produce the world's goods and we continue to lose family-supporting, middle class jobs," said Richard L. Trumka, the secretary-treasurer of the AFL-CIO, in a statement calling for Congress to "reject the flawed trade agreements" such as NAFTA and CAFTA.

Critics of the Bush administration's trade policies drew special attention to the mounting U.S. deficit with China, which rose 24.5 percent to $201.6 billion last year, the biggest gap the United States has ever posted with a single country. Lawmakers have been accusing China for some time of playing unfairly in global markets, especially by keeping the value of the Chinese currency, the yuan, at an artificially cheap level.

"Particularly disturbing is the news that our trade deficit with China is two and a half times bigger than it was when we signed a trade agreement with them in 2000," said Sen. Byron Dorgan (D-N.D.) in a statement, referring to the accord allowing Beijing to join the World Trade Organization. "That's pretty compelling evidence something has to change."

Although the gap with China accounts for more than a quarter of the total deficit, the imbalance is spread across a wide variety of trading partners.

DOJ_NMG_0014452

The U.S. trade deficit with the European Union was $122.4 billion last year; with Japan, it was $82.7 billion; with Canada, $76.5 billion; with Mexico, $50.1 billion; and with nations belonging to the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries, it was $92.7 billion.

The imbalances reinforce the view held by many economists that the widening trade deficit stems primarily from a reduction in U.S. national savings in recent years, including the deterioration in the federal budget deficit.

Because the budget deficit requires the government to borrow, it counts as a decline in national savings.

One important factor fueling the rise in last year's deficit was the rise in the price of imported oil. Imports of petroleum products rose 39 percent, to $251.6 billion.

That was by no means the whole story. Christian E. Weller, senior economist at the Center for American Progress, a Washington think tank, calculated that even if the deficit in petroleum had not increased, the overall gap still would have totaled a record $660 billion.

U.S. Trade Deficit Sets Record, With China And Oil The Causes (NYT)

By Vikas Bajaj

The New York Times, February 11, 2006

The United States trade deficit widened to a record $726 billion in 2005, the government reported yesterday, adding more fuel to the increasingly partisan debate between advocates of further globalization and those who contend that free trade is causing the loss of too many American manufacturing jobs.

Hitting its fourth consecutive annual record, the gap between exports and imports reached almost twice the level of 2001. It was driven by strong consumer demand for foreign goods and soaring energy prices that added tens of billions of dollars to the nation's bill for imported oil. The nation last had a trade surplus, of $12.4 billion, in 1975.

The continued growth in the trade deficit, particularly with China, is likely to renew a fight in Congress as early as this spring over President Bush's trade policies. Lawmakers have seized on the growing imbalance with China to call on the White House to take a harder line with Beijing over its currency practices.

But as long as the American economy is growing faster than most of its trading partners and energy prices stay at elevated levels, economists expect little improvement, and perhaps even a slight widening, in the trade imbalance this year.

"You would need a dramatic slowdown in domestic U.S. demand to bring down the U.S. trade deficit, and we think that is unlikely," said Dean Maki, chief United States economist at Barclays Capital in New York.

That means the nation will go deeper into debt with the rest of the world as Americans continue to rely on the strong flow of foreign money, particularly from central banks in Asia, to finance the trade gap. China, Japan and other foreign governments are some of the biggest holders of government securities, lending money to cover the substantial federal budget deficit and helping to keep interest rates and home mortgage costs here relatively low.

As a result, American consumers are able to spend more and save less.

Many economists say this situation is unsustainable over the long run, arguing that the United States could eventually face a harsh correction that would depress spending, increase the cost of borrowing and sharply lower the value of the dollar.

"There are certainly going to be inflows, the question is at what price?" said James O'Sullivan, an economist at UBS, an investment house. "As time goes on, it will become a little more difficult to attract foreign funds. That's another way of saying the dollar will fall."

But other economists argue that the huge trade gap mostly reflects stronger American growth and that money is flowing into the country at relatively low rates because of the attractiveness of the United States as a place to invest. They see little reason to fear a dollar crisis.

"As long as foreigners are willing to put their capital in the United States, we can sustain a trade deficit of 6 percent or more" of overall economic activity, said Phillip L. Swagel, a resident scholar at the American Enterprise Institute in Washington who served as a staff economist for President Bush's Council of Economic Advisers.

"It would be better that we saved more on our own," Mr. Swagel added, "but given that we aren't, I would rather have investment go on by foreign capital."

DOJ_NMG_0014453

For its part, the Bush administration urged caution on the deficit.

Commerce Secretary Carlos M. Gutierrez, touring an I.B.M. operation in North Carolina, told The Associated Press, "We can't overreact and make tactical choices that will hurt our economy."

As a share of the gross domestic product, the trade gap increased to 5.8 percent, from 5.3 percent in 2004 and 4.5 percent in 2003.

While most economists dismiss the importance of bilateral trade imbalances, it is the deficit with China that has set off the most political fireworks. That nation had the largest gap with the United States of any country, at $201.6 billion for the year, up 24.5 percent from 2004. In December, the deficit with China narrowed nearly 12 percent, to $16.3 billion.

Following increased pressure from the White House, the Chinese government allowed the yuan to rise by about 2 percent in July and allowed its currency to float in a narrow band. Since then the yuan, also known as the renminbi, has risen by an additional 0.7 percent. One dollar buys about 8.0505 yuan.

A stronger Chinese currency would make imports to the United States more expensive and American exports to that country cheaper. Most analysts agree the yuan would rise significantly if it were set free, but many experts also worry that many financial institutions in China are not strong enough to survive the shocks that might accompany a fully convertible currency.

In the Senate, Charles E. Schumer, Democrat of New York, and Lindsey Graham, Republican of South Carolina, have proposed imposing a 27.5 percent tariff on Chinese imports if the country does not allow its currency to appreciate further against the dollar. Late last year, the senators agreed to hold off on the measure after the Senate voted against stopping a floor vote on it.

Mr. Schumer said "there is a very strong likelihood that we will move our bill in March should the Chinese not show further movements."

"If you believe in free trade, you play by the rules," he said when asked if a protectionist tariff would hurt the American economy. "The long-term damage of the Chinese pegging their currency far exceeds any immediate benefits and almost every economist would agree with that. They might not agree with our methodology."

Experts note that a large portion of the deficit with China reflects its growing role as a hub for the assembly of goods as Asian manufacturers have shifted production there to save money. The overall deficit with Asia has changed little in recent years.

Bush administration officials have said they, too, would like to see the yuan appreciate further, but have contended that sanctions like a tariff would be counterproductive and would hurt consumers. This month, the Treasury Department urged the International Monetary Fund to improve its policing of currency manipulations by governments, without directly referring to China.

Treasury Secretary John W. Snow is expected to bring up the issue of exchange rates at a meeting of the Group of 8 finance ministers in Moscow this weekend.

But even some longstanding advocates of free trade are growing increasingly frustrated with China's intransigence on the currency front, warning that it may be inviting protectionist legislation by repeatedly deflecting Washington's requests.

"The administration," said C. Fred Bergsten of the Institute for International Economics in Washington, "has to let the Chinese know that it may not be able to stop it even though it doesn't want it."

While China draws most of the attention, perhaps the most important factor behind the swelling deficit last year was the rising cost of importing oil and other energy supplies. Trade in petroleum products accounted for 29 percent of the total deficit, up from 25 percent in 2004. Imports of petroleum goods climbed 39 percent, to $251.6 billion, after rising by 39 percent in 2004.

Over all, the deficit jumped nearly 18 percent in 2005 compared with the previous year. Excluding oil and other petroleum products, the trade gap grew by 10 percent.

After China, the United States' second-biggest deficit was with Japan, at $82.7 billion, up 9.4 percent, followed by Canada, a big supplier of oil and natural gas, at $76.5 billion, up 15.1 percent.

The deficit with members of the Organization of the Petroleum Exporting Countries increased by 29 percent, to $92.7 billion. For December, the trade deficit grew by 1.5 percent over the previous month, to $65.7 billion, as imports of computers, cars and airplanes rose and exports of planes, which had risen sharply in November, dropped. It was the third-largest monthly trade gap on record.

And with oil prices rising again, said Ashraf Laidi, chief currency analyst for the MG Financial Group in New York, "we can expect to see worse numbers to come."

DOJ_NMG_0014454

US Trade Deficit Balloons To Record $726bn (FT)

By Christopher Swann

Financial Times, February 11, 2006

The US trade deficit ballooned to a record $726bn in 2005, inflated by surging imports from China and soaring energy prices.

In December the US imported $65.7bn more than it exported, up from $64.7bn in November. The widening came in spite of a strong 2.1 per cent rise in exports. The increase was all the more impressive because volatile aircraft sales were down on the month. Imports grew by 1.9 per cent.

But with imports now almost 60 per cent larger than exports, American companies would have had to sell 3 per cent more abroad just to prevent the deficit from rising.

Over 2005, the deficit totalled 5.8 per cent of American national income. The current account deficit - a more inclusive measure that includes other income flows - was 6.5 per cent of national income.

Economists have long fretted that global investors will eventually become unwilling to finance the US deficit, without a fall in the dollar and a rise in US interest rates. So far, however, there has been no sign of demand for US assets weakening. Last year the dollar rose by 3.5 per cent on a trade weighted basis.

But Nigel Gault, the head of US analysis at Global Insight, a consultancy, said the risks were increasing to the US economy as the deficit continued to widen. “An accident has been a possibility for some time and the further we go down this road the greater the chances that it will come to an unhappy end,” he said.

The consultancy is expecting the trade deficit to rise further to $810bn this year. The politically sensitive bilateral deficit with China was $202bn in 2005 - a quarter of the total shortfall. The deficit was slightly lower on the month - falling from $18.5bn to $16.3bn.

US lawmakers have become increasingly restive over the rising deficit, threatening action unless China moves towards floating its undervalued currency and clamps down on theft of US intellectual property. Charles Schumer, a Senator from New York, has been proposing an increase in tariffs on Chinese goods to offset this alleged currency manipulation.

Imports of oil were less of a problem in December, falling to 311.5m barrels a day from 314. But during the course of the year, surging oil imports have blighted the trade figures.

Paul Ashworth, an analyst at Capital Economics, said the rising deficit with China was responsible for a third of the overall deterioration in 2005. “This will no doubt give protectionists in Congress some ammunition as the mid term elections approach,” he said.

Overall, the rising deficit detracted 1.2 per centage points from economic growth.

U.S. Trade Deficit Ballooned To A Record In 2005 (WSJ)

By Greg Hitt And Murray Hiebert

The Wall Street Journal, February 11, 2006

Widening Gap With China Likely to Revive Demands That Beijing Take Action

The nation's record $725.75 billion trade deficit last year, fed by a massive inflow of imports from China, is likely to aggravate protectionist sentiment in Congress and renew calls for Beijing to take steps to ease the imbalance.

The 2005 deficit -- 17.5% wider than the 2004 gap, according to a Commerce Department report released Friday -- comes at a time of high economic tensions between Beijing and Washington, and it produced an immediate reaction.

Sen. Charles Schumer, a New York Democrat and one of China's most vocal critics on Capitol Hill, said that "the numbers show the need for China to play fair." Indeed, the yawning trade gap, which came despite an improved performance by U.S. exporters, is expected to reignite a battle over policies that critics say keep China's currency artificially weak, giving its goods an unfair advantage in global markets and threatening U.S. jobs.

That battle seemed to subside last year after China allowed the value of its currency, which had been pegged to the dollar, to fluctuate in a narrow range against a basket of other currencies. Though the increase has been modest, the yuan closed Friday at its highest level against the dollar since the July revaluation.

DOJ_NMG_0014455

Even so, Mr. Schumer said that he and Sen. Lindsey Graham, a South Carolina Republican, may push next month for a Senate vote on their proposal to impose a 27.5% across-the-board tariff on Chinese goods if Beijing fails to do more to strengthen its currency. The senators have twice postponed votes on the measure, which enjoys wide support, to give the Bush administration more time to work with China on the issue. But Mr. Schumer said he is running out of patience. Sen. Graham plans to visit China in the spring to stress the depth of congressional concerns.

Oil also contributed to the gap. U.S. imports of petroleum products jumped 39.4% in 2005, as oil prices surged world-wide and refineries along the Gulf of Mexico were damaged by Hurricane Katrina.

But China commanded the bulk of the political attention. For the year, the U.S. deficit with China -- by far its largest gap with any single country -- rose to a record $201.62 billion, up more than 20% from $161.97 billion in 2004.

Despite the political heat generated by such numbers, the economic relationship between the U.S. and China is more complex than the figures indicate. For one thing, Commerce Department's data on trade between two countries includes only goods, not services, where American companies have a greater competitive edge. The U.S. ran a small overall surplus in services in 2005.

The U.S. and China also calculate the trade imbalance differently. Last month Beijing released figures suggesting its trade surplus with the U.S. was only $114.2 billion. Behind the discrepancy is the intermediary role Hong Kong plays in the shipment of goods, argued U.S. Federal Reserve Board analysts in a recent report. Washington counts in its trade figures with China goods shipped through Hong Kong, while Beijing doesn't count those transitory shipments.

Some analysts say all official statistics inflate the value of Chinese exports, because a growing number of U.S. and Asian companies now ship components to China for final assembly. However, China's export figures reflect the full value of those products, rather than the value added in China. More than 58% of China's total exports -- and 64% of its exports to the U.S. -- last year came from foreign companies or foreign joint ventures, according to China's General Administration of Customs.

Businesses in the U.S. and elsewhere also typically share in the profits reaped from marketing Chinese-made goods. For example, a bra produced in China by Ace Style for such labels as Vanity Fair or Calvin Klein retails at Wal-Mart for about $23. Chief Operating Officer Stephen Lo estimates that the Hong Kong-based manufacturer earns about 50 cents for each bra, while the retailer and brand owner earn $1.15 to $2.30 each. The remainder goes to covering production costs, as well as transport and other costs incurred by Wal-Mart Stores Inc.

While some smaller U.S. manufacturers complain about Chinese trade, major American multinationals -- which have benefited from the lower costs of producing and outsourcing there -- have been muted in their criticism. Meanwhile, a January study by the U.S.-China Business Council, which represents U.S. companies doing business in China, says that increased trade with China will lower prices, boosting real disposable income for American families by $1,000 a year between 2001 and 2010.

At the same time, the big U.S. trade deficit with China allows China to lend more money to the U.S. In the first 11 months of 2005, Chinese investors purchased a net $81 billion of U.S. bonds, which may have helped keep U.S. long-term interest rates down. Those kinds of benefits, however, do little to allay the widespread fears sparked by the painful changes wracking the U.S. economy as manufacturing and other high-wage jobs are shipped abroad.

Despite its free-trade leanings, the White House has started tapping into this angst. In his State of the Union speech, President Bush cited the challenge posed by China to justify a new initiative aimed at improving the competitiveness of American industry. Mr. Bush is proposing to boost spending on math and science education and to extend tax breaks supporting business research. Moreover, Mr. Bush's top trade negotiator, Rob Portman, is expected to embrace more aggressive use of trade remedies in his long-awaited "top to bottom" review of U.S. policy toward China. The review could be released as soon as next week.

On Capitol Hill, where lawmakers face election-year pressures, the climate is ripe for legislation that would toughen U.S. policy toward China. Just this week, leading House Democrats unveiled legislation to create a new prosecutor for trade disputes. And a bipartisan group of senators called for repeal of normal trade relations with Beijing, a move that would raise tariffs on goods shipped from mainland China.

The heightened tensions will add drama to Chinese President Hu Jintao's planned visit to Washington in April. China isn't likely to move aggressively to address currency concerns before then. But as pressure grows on Beijing, one "solution for the Chinese government...to narrow the trade deficit" would be to sign a series of business deals with U.S. companies, perhaps to buy additional civilian aircraft or for U.S. nuclear-energy equipment, said Yuan Gangming, a researcher at Tsinghua University's China and World Economy Center.

DOJ_NMG_0014456

Beyond China, total U.S. imports of goods and services last year reached nearly $2 trillion, up $227.8 billion amid strong U.S. demand for foreign-made autos, consumer goods and industrial supplies, among other things. Exports totaled $1.271 trillion, up $119.7 billion, helped by sales of civilian aircraft, medical equipment and heavy machinery.

December's trade deficit was $65.67 billion, up slightly from November's revised $64.69 billion. Exports were $111.51 billion, up $2.3 billion from November. Imports rose $3.3 billion to $177.2 billion. Analysts said that, because the December gap was smaller than prior official estimates, the government might raise its estimate of fourth-quarter economic growth to a 1.3% annualized pace, up from the previously reported 1.1%.

---- Mei Fong, Kersten Zhang, Zhou Yang and Cui Rong contributed to this article.

Write to Greg Hitt at greg.hitt@wsj.com2 and Murray Hiebert at murray.hiebert@wsj.com3

TODAY'S MARKETS (WSJ)

By SCOTT PATTERSON

The Wall Street Journal, February 11, 2006

Oil, Stocks Conclude Volatile Week

Despite Stock Gains,

Market Remains Wary

February 10, 2006 10:44 p.m.

Early Friday, stocks declined as oil prices moved higher. By the end of the day, stocks and oil had switched places, helping to cap a turbulent week on Wall Street with a moderate gain.

Analysts said the decline by oil prices helped ease investors' fears of another factor dragging on stocks: the Federal Reserve.

"Oil has been down all week," said Jay Suskind, director of trading at Ryan Beck. "There's been this fear of inflation, and with [oil prices falling], that takes some pressure out of inflation," leading to hopes that the Fed may not have to raise short-term rates higher than most investors feel comfortable with.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average rose 35.70 points to 10919.05, and is up 1.9% year to date. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index gained 3.21 to 1266.99, up 1.5% for the year, and the Nasdaq Composite Index added 6.01 to 2261.88, up 2.6% this year.

Oil fell 78 cents to $61.84 a barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange Friday, having declined four out of five days this week. For 2006, though, oil is still up 1.3%.

Gold futures, which have whipped around this week, sank $14.50 to $553.50 a troy ounce on the Comex division of the Nymex. For the week, gold is down $17.20 an ounce, or 3%. Gold, which is up 6.4% in 2006, has had six days of move of more than $10 so far this year, and half of those big swings came just this week.

Fed jitters could come back next week, though, when new chairman Ben Bernanke appears before Congress. If Mr. Bernanke sounds a hawkish tone about rates, investors will let the stock market have it.

Despite a strong showing this week, analysts are wary of stocks. The Dow industrials are on a Sisyphusian trek toward 11000 after cracking and losing that elusive level in January. Until blue-chip stocks make another move past 11000, strategists don't think the market can have a strong, sustained rally.

"This kind of churning action is fairly typical of late stage bull markets, and that's where I still think we are," said Kenneth Tower, chief market strategist at CyberTrader. "This bull market started in October 2002, and it's getting old."

Friday, the decline by oil helped investors look past a largely unsurprising government report that the U.S. trade deficit widened9 1.5% in December, hitting a record $725.76 billion for 2005, up 18% from $617.58 billion in 2004. December's $65.68 billion deficit was wider than the $64.70 billion gap expected. A brief rise in oil prices at the open added to the negative tone, though prices have since turned lower.

DOJ_NMG_0014457

Investors also kept their eye on the bond market a day after the first auction of 30-year Treasurys in five years. Strong demand for the "long" bond has dropped yields for more seasoned maturities lower than short-term bond yields, leaving the yield curve fully inverted. The two-year Treasury note fell 2/32 point to yield 4.69%, while the 30-year bond slid 21/32 point to yield 4.55%.

Economists are concerned about the inverted yield curve -- so called because the normally upward slope of yields plotted on a graph is reversed -- which in the past has been correlated with recessions. Weak appetite for short-term securities indicates concerns about the near-term strength of the economy. The curve inverted briefly in late 2005, triggering a stock selloff on Wall Street. In recent weeks, the inversion seems to be worsening.

In major market action:

Stocks rose10. On the New York Stock Exchange, where 1.71 billion shares traded, 1,721 stocks rose and 1,610 fell. On the Nasdaq Stock Market, where 2.04 billion shares traded, 1,358 rose and 1,613 declined.

Bonds declined11. The benchmark 10-year Treasury note fell 12/32, or $3.75 per $1,000 invested, to yield 4.588%. The 30-year bond slid 21/32 to yield 4.553%. Yields move inversely to prices.

The dollar was mixed.12 It traded at 117.80 yen, down from 118.76 yen late Thursday, while the euro fell to $1.1905 from $1.1981.

Stocks Close Higher On Rebound (LAT)

Times Wire Services

The Los Angeles Times, February 11, 2006

Concerns about Pfizer's profit warning and the U.S. trade deficit drag the Dow down most of the day. Major indexes end the week mixed.

Stocks rebounded from an earlier decline to post moderate gains Friday as investors looked past a mediocre outlook from Pfizer and a new record U.S. trade deficit. The major indexes finished the week mixed.

Pfizer's profit warning dragged the Dow Jones industrial average into negative territory for most of the day and added to traders' concerns about weak overall corporate earnings in 2006 amid a slowing economy. A fourth straight record trade deficit of $725.8 billion last year also left Wall Street wondering whether rising energy and import prices could spark domestic inflation.

But the market managed to recoup its losses and pressed higher late in the day, giving the Dow a sturdy advance this week. Analysts have been expecting volatility among stocks following January's rally and with no major events on the horizon to clarify investors' uncertainty about the economy.

Steven Goldman, chief market strategist for Weeden & Co., said traders were assessing the latest round of earnings reports and whether stocks are fairly priced — or even overpriced. He added that the widening gap between short- and long-term bond yields also stoked worries about a downturn.

"To me, valuation on the average stock has reached fully valued territories," Goldman said. "If you look at price-to-earnings-ratios, they're within 7% of the all-time high."

The Dow rose 35.70 points, or 0.3%, to 10,919.05, after losing as much as 63 points early in the session.

Broader stock indicators also reversed course to close higher. The Standard & Poor's 500 index gained 3.21 points, or 0.3%, to 1,266.99 and the Nasdaq composite index advanced 6.01 points, or 0.3%, to 2,261.88.

For the week, the Dow was up 1.2%, the S&P 500 added 0.2% and the Nasdaq slipped 0.03%.

U.S. Treasury yields rose as dealers braced for potentially troublesome comments from new Federal Reserve Chairman Ben S. Bernanke in testimony to Congress next week. Bond yields move in the opposite direction as prices.

In recent days the market has become more convinced that Bernanke's comments will be upbeat on the economy and thus bearish for bond prices, setting the stage for perhaps two more additional rate increases by the Fed.

The 10-year Treasury note rose to 4.59% from 4.54% on Thursday. Gold futures plunged $14.30 an ounce to $550.20.

Crude oil futures slipped following a report suggesting that high prices were starting to stifle demand. The drop came even as concerns about political unrest in oil-producing countries persisted, with a barrel of light crude losing 78 cents to $61.84 in New York trading.

DOJ_NMG_0014458

In other market highlights:

• Investors were unhappy with a lowered sales outlook for Pfizer's top-selling Lipitor cholesterol drug. The company's 2006 earnings forecast of $2 a share was 3 cents short of analysts' estimates. Pfizer dropped 66 cents to $25.68.

• Insurer Aon rallied $3.23, or 9.3%, to $38.11 for the best performance in the S&P 500. Its fourth-quarter net income surged to $224 million from $81 million on growth in its North American brokerage business, lower litigation expenses and a gain from the sale of a unit.

An index of insurers gained 1% for the fourth-best performance among 24 industry groups in the S&P 500. American International Group added 78 cents to $67.90, a day after agreeing to pay $1.6 billion to settle fraud and bid-rigging allegations.

• A gauge of energy shares retreated 0.5% for the worst performance among 10 industry groups in the S&P 500 as oil prices declined. Valero Energy, the biggest U.S. refiner, slid $2.33 to $50.65. Exxon Mobil fell 49 cents to $59.43.

• Oracle confirmed late Thursday that it would cut as many as 2,000 jobs as part of its effort to absorb its recent acquisition of Siebel Systems and issued earnings guidance in line with Wall Street forecasts. Oracle finished flat at $12.69.

Among other technology issues, Google added $3.84 to $362.61 and Apple Computer rose $2.36 to $67.31.

Proxmire Remembered For Humble Handshakes (MJS)

By STEVEN WALTERS

Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, February 11, 2006

State's leaders recall how longtime senator shaped politics

Madison - Former U.S. Sen. William Proxmire was remembered Friday as a Democratic Party pioneer, an everyman who tirelessly shook hands at sporting events and plant gates and who spent only $145 on his last re-election campaign in 1982.

In his 32 years in the Senate, Proxmire was a champion of taxpayers, a man of unquestioned integrity and someone who was not afraid to take on his own party's leaders, said speakers at the Capitol memorial service attended by more than 300.

Proxmire died Dec. 15 at the age of 90.

After Republican U.S. Sen. Joseph McCarthy died while in office in 1957, Proxmire won in an upset in a special election against the sitting Republican governor. That "made it safe for people to vote Democratic in this state," said U.S. Rep. Dave Obey (D-Wis.), the longest-serving member of the state's congressional delegation.

"He was the first to get to the promised land," Obey said.

Proxmire's refusal to take campaign contributions made him independent of all special-interest groups, Obey said. That's especially noteworthy, given the current influence-peddling scandals that have led to the conviction of Washington, D.C., lobbyist Jack Abramoff and investigations of other members of Congress, he said.

"Absolutely no one ever questioned Proxmire's integrity," Obey said.

Proxmire's 1957 win was a "breakthrough" for Democrats, said Gov. Jim Doyle. It ushered in 18 years of two of the nation's leading Democrats - Proxmire and Gaylord Nelson, who died July 3 - representing Wisconsin in the U.S. Senate, the governor added.

Proxmire won that U.S. Senate seat after three straight losing Democratic campaigns for governor.

Two Democratic members of Congress from Wisconsin, U.S. Sen. Russ Feingold and U.S. Rep. Ron Kind, remembered when Proxmire shook their hands as children outside sporting events. Kind said he was 11; Feingold, who was 9 when he first met Proxmire, said the senator shook so many hands that his own right hand sometimes bled.

When Proxmire told Kind, "I'm Bill Proxmire - your U.S. senator," Kind said, it triggered a "lifetime of fascination" with politics.

Kind later worked as an intern in Proxmire's Washington office and helped write some of the senator's speeches - including some of the 3,000 speeches he gave every day the Senate was in session calling for Congress to ratify an international anti-genocide treaty.

That treaty was finally ratified in 1986.

U.S. Sen. Herb Kohl (D-Wis.), who won Proxmire's seat in the Senate after his 1989 retirement, said Proxmire always returned one-third of his office expenses to taxpayers and cast 10,252 straight roll-call votes.

DOJ_NMG_0014459

Proxmire "was the last of the true populist politicians," Kohl said.

John Finerty, who served as Proxmire's campaign treasurer, said the senator spent $177 on his 1976 campaign and only $145 on his final campaign in 1982. All campaign donations were sent back, Finerty said.

Finerty said Proxmire's favorite factory gate was at the Allis-Chalmers plant on S. 70th St. in West Allis. Proxmire would shake the of hands of hundreds of factory workers entering and leaving the plant, then sprint to another parking lot to greet shift supervisors and managers, Finerty recalled.

Other speakers recalled Proxmire's legendary fitness - the staples of his diet were fruit, vegetables and freshly squeezed grapefruit juice, Finerty noted - and how he jogged 5 miles each day, including to and from work when he was in Washington.

His widow, Ellen Proxmire, said her husband waged a long, courageous battle with Alzheimer's disease.

As the disease progressed, she said in a taped tribute, "his world became smaller and smaller."

Of Mouse And Women (WP)

By Bob Thompson

The Washington Post, February 11, 2006

Karenna Gore Schiff Writes About Heroines Who Saved the Day

NEW YORK Let's begin with a brief case study in how the cynical, superficial American media (that's us) can distort the lives of political figures and their families.

We are talking with Karenna Gore Schiff about her new book, "Lighting the Way: Nine Women Who Changed Modern America." The smart, personable 32-year-old daughter of the Man Who Was Almost President tells us she wrote it as a kind of therapy, an antidote to the "punched-in-the-gut" feeling she got whenever she looked at the newspaper after the 2000 election.

We nod. Seems perfectly understandable.

She also wrote the book, she says, because ever since she was a little girl, she has wished there were "more female faces in the historical pantheon." She remembers sitting at her desk at Arlington's Oakridge Elementary School, looking at the chart of the presidents on the wall and wondering why they were all male.

We'll buy that. We've got daughters ourselves, don't we?

In fact, there isn't the slightest reason to doubt the sincerity of the motives that Schiff cites for launching her literary venture. But we have a problem with them anyway.

Her reasons are just a little too . . . reasonable . We start picturing that glazed look in our readers' eyes, the one that shows up just before they abandon us for the Boondocks and Zippy the Pinhead.

Ah, but then Schiff lets her guard down for an instant -- despite a lifetime of watching journalists turn Al and Tipper Gore into unrecognizable caricatures of the parents she knows and loves -- and lets slip something we can twist into a sexier lead.

Why did she really write this book? Hey, isn't it obvious?

It's because her mom wouldn't let her watch "Mighty Mouse" as a kid.

Hold that thought for a while. It may not be quite as ridiculous as it sounds.

* * *

As Schiff explains the origins of "Lighting the Way," she sips water in the living room of the Upper East Side apartment she shares with her husband, Drew, a physician, and their two children, 6-year-old Wyatt and 4-year-old Anna. Built-in bookcases line one wall. There's a ladder in case anyone needs to reach the upper shelves.

In November 2000, she says, she was exhausted from campaigning and looking to focus on her family. Still, she headed down to Washington now and then to be with her parents -- "sitting on the train or the shuttle and trying not to listen to all the conversations around me, because they were so painful" -- as her father contested the Florida election result.

Just losing would have been bad enough. But losing the way Al Gore lost . . . well, it was "a very dark time."

It got worse with 9/11 (Schiff and her family were in Manhattan that day) and the run-up to the invasion of Iraq. She was stunned by the way people who disagreed with the administration's decision to go to war or even questioned the way the war was to be conducted were "shut up and shouted down and pushed aside and more or less called traitors."

DOJ_NMG_0014460

Cynicism seemed a logical option, but she didn't want to go there; she had seen too much of it among her generational peers. Instead, she sought refuge in the American past. She would tell the stories of women -- maybe not presidents or even politicians, but public servants just the same -- who had changed the world for the better despite the scorn the "mainstream" heaps on dissenters.

Take anti-lynching crusader Ida B. Wells-Barnett. Born into slavery in 1862, she became the nation's leading agitator against the barbaric practice of stringing up black men for the merest hint of an offense -- never mind if it was false -- toward a white woman. Nothing seems easier today than to say that lynching is wrong, but that was a less-than-mainstream notion in the 1890s. Schiff cites editorials in this newspaper and the New York Times condemning Wells-Barnett for her "exaggerations," as The Post put it, and for her shameful failure to highlight black crimes against whites .

Take Alice Hamilton, a pioneer in occupational medicine. Hamilton "saw men and women poisoned and crippled by their work," as Schiff writes, and became "at the height of the Industrial Revolution, one of the only physicians who made workplac e safety her mission." In 1919, she became the first woman appointed to the Harvard faculty, though Schiff notes that the university barred its new hire from ever taking part in commencement or -- God forbid -- receiving "the treasured faculty football tickets."

Or take labor organizer Mary Harris "Mother" Jones, better known these days for lending her name to a left-wing magazine than for her efforts to confront the early 20th-century horrors of child labor. Mother Jones's personal story (she lost her husband and all four children to a yellow fever epidemic) fascinated Schiff, but she was equally concerned to sketch the forgotten context of Jones's activism.

"It was totally accepted by the leaders of the business and the political worlds that 8-, 10-, 11-year-olds were going into factories, working 12-hour days, getting maimed by machinery and poisoned by new chemical processes," she says. "There was no recourse and there was no accountability. They just blatantly defended that, saying, 'That's the free market.' "

Schiff writes about Septima Clark, whose "citizenship schools" were crucial to the success of the civil rights movement, and about Virginia Durr, who fought segregation from the other side of the color line. In addition to Durr's own accomplishments, she witnessed what Schiff calls "one of the most striking moments in United States history."

At a conference in Birmingham, first lady Eleanor Roosevelt was evicted by police when she sat down in the section reserved for blacks. Refusing to abandon the principle of integration, Roosevelt found a folding chair and plunked herself in the middle of the aisle separating black and white. The New York Times, which covered the Birmingham event, failed to mention this.

Four other formidable women round out Schiff's list. None is a household name. Schiff wanted to add faces to the pantheon, not just praise those already enshrined.

We ask what she found most surprising about the lives of these nine women who fought racism, child labor, industrial poisoning and the indifference of society toward the needs of the poor? The answer comes with a short laugh.

"I was surprised -- and sort of oddly exhilarated -- by the venom in the established media toward them," Schiff says.

* * *

So far, so good. There's one thing that has been nagging at us, however, and we need to politely bring it up.

"Mainstream" is clearly one of Schiff's favorite words -- and it mostly carries a negative connotation. The women featured in "Lighting the Way" struggle constantly against mainstream politicians, the mainstream press and mainstream thinking in general.

But isn't there something slightly odd about this choice, coming as it does from the daughter of a man sufficiently mainstream to win the popular vote in a national election?

We're not criticizing dad , we assure her. Yet we're talking about the son of a U.S. senator, a Harvard-educated family scion seemingly born to high office. We're talking about a congressman, senator and then a vice presidential candidate who balanced a centrist presidential ticket by carefully tipping it neither left nor right. We're talking . . .

Schiff politely interrupts to say she sees her family legacy -- differently.

When she first became politically aware, she explains, it was the middle of the Reagan era. "He was immensely popular," she reminds us, yet her father was saying that "he's taking the country in the wrong direction, he's ignoring things that are truly important." This had a big impact, even on a teen soon to enter a rebellious phase. Another relevant bit of family history -- impressed on her "from early childhood" -- was her grandfather's U.S. Senate defeat in 1970 for being out of the Southern mainstream on Vietnam and civil rights. And by the way, have we checked out her dad's speech last month on wiretapping?

DOJ_NMG_0014461

We promise to Google the speech later; we then shift gears slightly.

It's not only that Schiff's women seemed to operate further from the political mainstream than Al Gore has, we suggest. It's that they were mostly neck deep in humanity, fighting for people -- be they 8-year-old children sent to work in mills and mines, African Americans terrorized into second-class citizenship, or factory workers poisoned by lead dust. Gore's major concerns, from the arms race to the environment, gravitate more toward systems and abstractions.

"That is definitely accurate," Schiff says, and laughs. She won't cop to Gore-as-wooden-wonk stereotypes, though. He may not be "the schmoozy type," but that's something she happens to love about him.

Speaking of media distortions: Schiff recalls how her mother got typecast as a pro-censorship prude. This was back in the '80s, when she was pressuring the music industry to put parental advisories on its increasingly raunchy and violent products.

The media version "was just so unrecognizable," she says.

Maybe so, we're tempted to say, but what about that disturbing episode with the cartoon mouse?

* * *

Some of you out there might not remember Mighty Mouse, the non-Disney animated flying rodent whose motto was "Here I come to save the day!" Schiff doesn't even know if he shows up in reruns anymore. But the Mouse of Steel, as he was also known, was quite popular when she was 6 or 7 -- and she wasn't at all pleased when her mother told her she couldn't watch.

"I'm still a little bit upset about it," she says.

"It was a huge fight," the villain confirms when we call later to check out the story. "It was one of those things. I said no."

Sex and violence weren't the issue. It was a gender role thing.

"The theme of every episode was that the girl mouse would get into trouble somehow and be kidnapped," Schiff explains, "and then it would be 'Mighty Mouse to the rescue!' and he would come and rescue her and he would be kissing her at the end and she would be fawning all over him."

Tipper Gore says, "It was giving a message to my daughter. I wanted to change that."

Schiff's immediate response was to watch the forbidden cartoon at a friend's house whenever she could, scarfing "Wonder Bread and butter-and-sugar sandwiches" in defiance of the Healthy Food Police as well. But in the long run, her mother's point got through: "I still internalized that there was something to question there."

"She became a feminist at 11," Gore says. "When I say feminist, I'm talking about equality and awareness of perceptions of roles."

So there we have it. Obviously it was just a short step from confronting the gender implications of "Here I come to save the day!" to writing a book about women with the confidence and drive to, well, save the day themselves.

Ridiculous? Of course.

But maybe containing a hint of truth just the same.

For the mother-daughter conversation didn't stop with Mighty Mouse. "She was always reminding us to question how women were portrayed in movies or ads or whatever," Schiff says, "and encouraging us to think that we could do whatever we wanted." The three Gore girls got that message from their father, too.

Schiff went from somewhat shy kid in elementary school to confident high schooler who excelled in lacrosse, field hockey and competitive water skiing. She studied history and literature at Harvard and law at Columbia and did a bit of journalism in between.

Along the way, she went through what she calls a "bratty" phase with her mother. She couldn't help but notice that dad was the one with the big career.

"Why don't you work," she would ask, "you know, like my friend's mom?"

With children of her own, Schiff says she understands the conflicts better now. It's one of the things she tried to highlight in the lives of her nine women.

And her own life? When she looks into the future, what does she see?

DOJ_NMG_0014462

Maybe she'll do another book, she says, and maybe it, too, will be history related. (She has given some thought to her Tennessee homeboy, Davy Crockett.) She knows she needs time for her kids; she has already left one legal job in which even a part-time schedule was too demanding. But it's a measure of the way the world has changed since her mother and grandmother's day that she gets the do-you-think-about-running-for-office question all the time.

Schiff doesn't know, she tells us. She hasn't ruled it out. But her book, in part, is an exploration of other ways to be a public servant.

We offer no opinion, of course, but we do know this:

If she runs, she's in for a lot of tough questions about that flying mouse.

Rice: Russia Should Send Message To Hamas (AP)

By BARRY SCHWEID

AP, February 11, 2006

WASHINGTON - Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice urged Russian Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov on Friday to send a clear, strong message in any meetings with Hamas officials that the militant group must stop terror attacks on Israel.

In response, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said, Russian officials offered assurances that "they will send this very clear, strong signal" adopted by Russia along with the United States, the United Nations and the European Union in a joint statement approved in response to Hamas' strong showing in Palestinian parliamentary elections.

Russian President Vladimir Putin has invited Hamas officials to Moscow and, while no date has been set, McCormack said the assumption was the talks would be held. Israel has responded to the invitation with fury.

In Jerusalem, Israeli officials said Putin's invitation betrayed Israel and could strain relations between the two countries.

The statement adopted by the Quartet overseeing Mideast peace efforts does not address whether nations should meet with Hamas leaders, and governments are to decide for themselves, McCormack said. Egypt has been holding such meetings.

"The Russians made this decision," McCormack said.

For its part, the Bush administration has pledged to have no contact with Hamas until it renounces its call for Israel's overthrow and accepts the existence of the Jewish state.

Besides Rice's conversation with Lavrov, U.S. Ambassador to Russia William J. Burns has been in touch with the Russians to underscore the view that Hamas is a terrorist organization, McCormack said.

He said the U.S. message to Russia, and Egypt as well, is that "they be consistent in sending the same message to Hamas."

Putin made his overture to Hamas on Thursday during a visit to Spain.

"We have never considered Hamas a terrorist organization," he said. "Having maintained our contacts with the organization Hamas, we intend to invite their leaders to Moscow in the near future to search for solutions."

On Thursday night, Egypt's ambassador to Washington, a veteran observer of ups and downs in Middle East peacemaking, said that dismay over the election of Hamas to form a Palestinian government is symptomatic of memory loss.

Israelis and Palestinians in the past refused to recognize each other, Nabil Fahmy recalled, but a lot of people seem to have forgotten that.

Fahmy suggested there is a lesson to be learned from the fact that the two sides got past their hard-line positions and made headway toward a settlement.

In the current impasse, the rise to political power of the Palestinian group Hamas in recent elections has derailed any serious attempts at peacemaking.

But Fahmy said, "I would caution against those who say we cannot find a solution."

Reaching into the past to make his point, the ambassador recalled that the Palestine Liberation Organization for years refused to accept the existence of Israel, while late Israeli Prime Minister Golda Meir questioned whether there was an identifiable Palestinian people.

Ultimately, Palestinians came around to acknowledging Israel and Israel has accepted the principle of a Palestinian state.

DOJ_NMG_0014463

Fahmy said during a policy discussion at the Woodrow Wilson Center for International Scholars that Egypt was trying to counsel Hamas.

"You need to build on what has been achieved for the Palestinian people," he said.

Egypt is a classic example of an Arab country that turned itself around.

After several wars with Israel, Egypt in 1979 signed a peace treaty with the Jewish state. It exchanged its acceptance of Israel for return of all the land it had lost to Israel in those wars.

The peace treaty has held to this day.

Rice Talks To Russian Foreign Minister Over Hamas (REU)

By Sue Pleming

Reuters, February 11, 2006

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice won assurances from Russia on Friday that Moscow would send a firm message to Hamas that the militant group must change if it wants world support, the State Department said.

Rice telephoned Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov on Friday to discuss Moscow's surprise plans to invite Palestinian election winner Hamas for talks, a move that irked Washington and was not discussed when Rice met Lavrov in London last week.

"We have been assured that should the Russian government meet with Hamas, that they would send that -- that the meeting would be with the intent of sending that clear, strong message," said State Department spokesman Sean McCormack.

The United States classifies Hamas as a terrorist body and has ruled out any direct contact until the militant group renounces violence, disarms militants and recognizes Israel.

The so-called Quartet of peace brokers between the Israelis and the Palestinians -- the United States, the United Nations, Russia and the European Union -- met in London last week and issued a statement threatening to cut aid if Hamas did not meet these conditions. Contacts with the group were not mentioned.

Hamas, which had a convincing win in the January 25 Palestinian election, has masterminded more than 60 suicide bombings against Israelis since 2000. It has rejected conditions laid down for getting aid and says they amount to blackmail.

France, in an apparent break with the United States, has signaled support for the Russian meeting and said such talks might advance the position of the Quartet.

Asked whether he thought Russia's planned meeting with Hamas and France's support highlighted a split in the Quartet in how to deal with Hamas, McCormack said individual nations had the right to choose whether they had any contact with the militant group.

But he stressed the Russians had not yet set a date for a meeting and a decision had not yet been taken over who might attend the discussions.

"What we have stated very clearly is that individual countries will make sovereign decisions about issues related to aid, issues related to contact," said McCormack.

The United States, which has given more than $1.5 billion in aid to the Palestinians since 1993, was working closely with the European Union to discuss legal and other issues connected to giving aid to the Palestinians.

Last year, the EU gave the Palestinian Authority 500 million euros ($615 million).

While the United States and other Quartet members have threatened cutting off aid to a Hamas-led government, they are looking at ways of channeling humanitarian help to the Palestinians without going through Hamas.

France Backs Putin On Speaking To Hamas (NYT)

By Joel Brinkley

The New York Times, February 11, 2006

WASHINGTON, Feb. 10 — France on Friday endorsed Russia's decision to hold talks on the Middle East conflict with Hamas, the radical Islamist Palestinian group, saying the discussion "can contribute to advancing our positions."

DOJ_NMG_0014464

Other European countries distanced themselves from the French statement, which appeared to be in defiance of the American and European view that Hamas is a terrorist organization and therefore should not be officially recognized. Israel condemned it. But the United States took a more cautious approach.

"Our position is not to tell the whole world that they can't talk to Hamas," said a senior State Department official, speaking on condition of anonymity. "That would be hard to enforce. The issue is less who's talking than what they are saying."

On Thursday, President Vladimir V. Putin of Russia said he was considering inviting Hamas, the winner of the Palestinian parliamentary elections on Jan. 25, to Moscow for talks, and on Friday the Kremlin confirmed that it would do so. Mr. Putin's remarks took the Bush administration and European leaders by surprise.

Israel reacted to the Russian decision with fury on Friday. Transportation Minister Meir Sheetrit called the Putin invitation "a real knife in the back."

But in Washington, a State Department spokesman, Sean McCormack, said Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice telephoned the Russian foreign minister, Sergey V. Lavrov, on Friday and was reassured to hear that the Russians would deliver a "clear, strong message" to Hamas.

The United States considers Hamas a terrorist group, and American officials are forbidden to talk to the organization. The European Union's policy on talks is not as clear, several officials and diplomats said in interviews. But none said their countries would talk with Hamas.

Foreign minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier of Germany is to go to Israel and the Palestinian territories on Sunday, but a German official insisted, "He is definitely not going to talk to Hamas."

A French diplomat said France "won't have contacts with Hamas," despite its statement of support for the Russian talks.

Speaking to reporters in Paris on Friday, Denis Simonneau, a French Foreign Ministry spokesman, said Russia had not informed European leaders of its intent to talk with Hamas. Still, he added, "we share with Russia the goal to bring Hamas to the positions which allow us to reach the goal of two states living in peace and security."

"As long as we remain within the framework of the goals and principles that we have set for ourselves, we consider that this initiative can contribute to advancing our positions" — specifically that Hamas disarm, renounce violence, recognize Israel and respect previous agreements with Israel.

Sabbath had begun in Israel by the time the French position became known in Jerusalem on Friday. But Daniel Ayalon, the Israeli ambassador to Washington, said in an interview, "I wish they would not have said anything about having a dialogue with terrorists."

Israeli officials in Jerusalem were less restrained when speaking on Friday about the Russian decision.

Housing Minister Zeev Boim said, "Putin is dancing with wolves."

Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni, returning from New York on Friday, said, "Every sign of weakness and of recognition will be interpreted by Hamas as legitimizing terror."

Egyptian Diplomat Is Released

GAZA, Saturday, Feb. 11 (Reuters) — An Egyptian military attaché kidnapped Thursday by gunmen in Gaza was released unharmed on Saturday, an Egyptian official in Gaza said.

A previously unknown militant group, calling itself the Free Men Brigades, had claimed responsibility for the kidnapping of the diplomat, Hussam al-Musli, demanding the release of all Palestinians held in Egyptian prisons.

The Egyptian official who had announced Mr. Musli's release would not discuss the circumstances.

Israel And US On Back Foot Over Hamas (FT)

By Guy Dinmore And Peter Spiegel

Financial Times, February 11, 2006

US and Israeli efforts to isolate Hamas diplomatically appeared to be further undermined on Friday as France cautiously endorsed a Russian offer of talks with the militant Palestinian group.

The Bush administration and Israel have refused to deal with Hamas – listed as a terrorist organisation by Washington and the European Union – which is forming a government following its victory in last month's Palestinian elections.

DOJ_NMG_0014465

US officials admit they were blindsided and dismayed by Vladimir Putin, the Russian president, when he proposed on Thursday inviting Hamas to Moscow for talks. The White House was left urging Russia to use the occasion to underscore the principles it had signed up to as a member of the international Quartet – made up of the US, Russia, the EU and the United Nations – that Hamas recognise Israel, renounce violence and endorse existing agreements.

US officials said they thought they had an understanding that no party would unilaterally talk to Hamas.

Meir Sheetrit, an Israeli cabinet minister, on Friday accused Mr Putin of "stabbing Israel in the back". But France said Russia's initiative could be positive as long as Moscow stuck to the Quartet's agreed principles.

Sergei Ivanov, the Russian defence minister, said all Quartet members would eventually have to deal with Hamas. "Hamas came to power as a result of a free, democratic election," he said at a Nato meeting in Sicily.

He added, however, that Russia remained troubled by Hamas's refusal to recognise Israel and to commit to resolve its disputes with the Jewish state peacefully.

Sergei Lavrov, Russian foreign minister, on Friday assured Condoleezza Rice, US secretary of state, that Moscow would send Hamas a "very clear, strong signal" that it must meet the conditions of the Quartet, the US State Department said.

Putin's Flexible Definition Of Terrorism (TIME)

By YURI ZARAKHOVICH

Time, February 11, 2006

The Russian leader welcomes Hamas, but jails a Chechnya human rights advocate

Who, exactly, counts as a terrorist? If you're Russian President Vladimir Putin, the definition might just depend on how close or far the "terror" is from Moscow. A court in the Nizhniy Novgorod regional center last week gave a suspended two year sentence to Stanislav Dmitriyevsky, Chair of the local Russian-Chechen Friendship Society, and editor of Rights Defense bulletin. Dmitriyevsky was found guilty of fomenting ethnic hatred, simply because in March 2004, he published an appeal by Chechen rebel leader Aslan Maskhadov — later killed by Russian security services — and Maskhadov's envoy in Europe, Akhmet Zakayev.

Maskhadov, you see, is officially a terrorist in the eyes of the Kremlin. Hamas, however, isn't. Putin said so at his Kremlin press-conference on Thursday, where he extended an invitation — eagerly accepted — to Hamas's leaders to Moscow for an official visit.

Putin's hospitality is understandable; after all, Russia does not have many friends. Those still left, like Belarus, or those now coming back after a long estrangement, like Uzbekistan, are ones who share Putin's views on how to deal with terror closer to home. Yesterday, the Uzbek authorities officially confirmed that a month ago they clamped a seven-year jail sentence on the lawyer and human rights activist Saidjahon Zainabitdinov. His official crimes were conspiring with terrorists and defaming the state. But Human Rights Watch and others believe that his real offense was telling the world — including in an interview with Time — the truth about the mass slaughter of hundreds of civilians in the Uzbek city of Andijan last May.

And so perhaps Hamas, if it wants to stay in Russia's good graces, should learn from this pattern. Terrorism is in the eye of the beholder — so if you can view the world through the cross-hairs of Putin's myopic lens, you'll do just fine.

The Face Of Hamas Rule May Not Include Its Own (LAT)

By Laura King, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, February 11, 2006

Palestinian militants consider forming a government Israel and the U.S. could live with.

GAZA CITY — The militant group Hamas, facing the threat of diplomatic isolation and a precipitous drop in foreign aid when it assumes power, is exploring the possibility of taking a less visible role in the new Palestinian government than might be expected after its sweeping parliamentary election victory.

Though the shape of the new government is not yet clear, options being weighed by the Islamist organization include appointing a nonmember as prime minister and creating a Cabinet made up mostly of people from outside parliament rather than from the ranks of the group's newly elected lawmakers.

Israel, the United States and many Western countries have made it clear they will have no dealings with a Hamas government unless the group renounces its aim of Israel's destruction and disarms its military wing.

DOJ_NMG_0014466

However, quirks in the Palestinian parliamentary system, together with all sides' desire to advance their own pragmatic interests, could combine to offer a face-saving path forward, according to an array of analysts, Western diplomats and Israeli and Palestinian officials.

The coming weeks, in their view, could yield a nuanced new Israeli-Palestinian reality under which all parties can claim they are holding fast to their principles while managing to avoid a political confrontation that could trigger the collapse of the Palestinians' fragile economy and governing structure, an outcome almost no one desires.

"It will all depend, if it's finessed the right way, whether the Israeli government can perceive and extend to the public the perception that it is not actually dealing with Hamas," said Joseph Alpher, a former senior Israeli government advisor and editor of the Mideast affairs website http://www.bitterlemons.org .

In the Jan. 25 elections, Hamas won 74 seats in the 132-member Palestinian legislature that is to be sworn in Feb. 18. Under common parliamentary practice, the holder of such a substantial majority would be expected to pick one of its own as prime minister and to allocate itself most of the senior Cabinet positions.

However, the Hamas leadership, which held internal talks this week in Cairo, has signaled that it may opt for a behind-the-scenes role. Sources at the talks said the group might put forth Gaza businessman Jamal Khudairi — who ran as an independent, though with Hamas' endorsement — as its candidate for prime minister.

Shunning the limelight would give the group, whose formal name is the Islamic Resistance Movement, the advantage of deferring uncomfortable choices about its core beliefs and its self-described mission, which for many years was to kill as many Israelis as possible. Hamas dramatically scaled back its attacks more than a year ago, when it first began running in, and winning, Palestinian local elections.

The formation of a new Palestinian national government could be weeks away, and could even come after Israel's elections March 28. The centrist Kadima party, assembled by Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon before he was felled by a massive stroke last month, holds a commanding lead in the polls, and its platform calls for steps leading to the creation of a Palestinian state.

U.S. law prohibits granting assistance to an organization such as Hamas, which is deemed a terrorist group by Washington. A Hamas-run government stands to lose hundreds of millions of dollars from the U.S. and other countries.

A major stumbling block to setting up a Palestinian government with which Israel and the United States would deal is that the defeated Fatah movement has so far refused to enter into a Cabinet alliance with Hamas. That seemingly rules out the participation of many West-friendly Palestinian officials whose political home has traditionally been Fatah.

But there are other potential scenarios.

One calls for the creation of a "technocrat" government, in which those in charge of day-to-day affairs would be professionals in their chosen fields rather than career politicians. Under Palestinian law, neither the prime minister nor members of the Cabinet are required to be lawmakers.

"This kind of outcome could give everyone a bit of breathing room," said Mahdi Abdul Hadi, who heads a prominent Palestinian think tank. In addition, he said, the idea of a professionally run government could have considerable appeal to Palestinian voters who cast their lot with Hamas primarily because they were fed up with Fatah's corruption and inefficiency.

Another possibility is tapping lawmakers aligned with neither Hamas nor Fatah to serve in the Cabinet. These include a number of internationally respected figures who could make a Hamas-appointed Cabinet far more palatable to the West and Israel.

Salam Fayyad, the highly regarded U.S.-educated former finance minister who ran on a small-party ticket in the recent elections, has reportedly been approached by Hamas intermediaries about the possibility of serving in a senior post. Ziad abu Amr, a prominent political scientist and onetime Fatah strategist who won a seat as an independent, has been mentioned as a potential foreign minister. Other lawmakers from smaller parties include Hanan Ashrawi, who is considered a moderate and is well known as a spokeswoman for the Palestinian cause.

None of these figures has spoken publicly of any potential role for themselves in government. Most have enormous ideological differences with Hamas and say they would refuse to work with the group unless it renounced its violent founding principles. Fayyad, for example, is reported by Israeli media to have told Hamas he could not serve unless the movement abandoned its goal of Israel's destruction.

DOJ_NMG_0014467

In the wake of the election, Hamas leaders have explicitly rejected the idea of direct negotiations with the Jewish state. But almost every day, some Hamas policymaker also issues an ambiguous pronouncement regarding Israel's status in the group's eyes.

Ismail Haniya, who was the movement's top candidate in the parliamentary vote, was quoted this week as saying Israel's existence was an undeniable reality, if only because of its military might. "We really can't ignore the fact of a state that is equipped with F-16s," he said.

Israel, however, may harden its stance if it sees cracks in the consensus that Hamas must be shunned unless it recognizes the Jewish state's right to exist and disarms its military wing. On Friday, Israeli officials denounced Russian President Vladimir V. Putin's offer to meet with Hamas officials, with Cabinet minister Meir Sheetrit saying the invitation amounted to "stabbing Israel in the back."

While Hamas weighs its next moves, an important parallel development has been unfolding: an effort to strengthen the Palestinians' executive branch, led by Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas.

Since the elections, Abbas has been seeking to expand his powers in the most sensitive areas: diplomatic contacts with Israel and the rest of the world, the formulation of any peace overtures, and control of the Palestinian security forces.

In coming weeks, Abbas could also create new policy posts to keep key senior associates in positions of influence. And Abbas' aides point out that the Fatah-dominated Palestine Liberation Organization — not the Palestinian government — is the agreed-upon point of contact in any negotiations relating to eventual statehood. Until now, the two had been virtually the same entity.

Hamas has already warned Abbas against trying to usurp too much power at its expense.

Still, the group is aware of its vulnerabilities. Hamas knows its election performance was propelled largely by anger over Fatah corruption rather than a repudiation of peace hopes on Palestinians' part. The group also understands that its lopsided win was due in large part to the hybrid allocation of seats — half the elected lawmakers were from a national slate and half were from individual district races, where Hamas dominated the field.

In the overall popular vote, Hamas beat Fatah by only about 44% to 41%, with the remaining share going to smaller parties.

Whichever approach Hamas chooses will have pitfalls. Israeli officials and Western diplomats have made it clear they will not accept a "shadow government" in which Hamas too obviously plays the main policymaking role even if it abstains from accepting any senior official positions.

"I don't see a dead end here yet," said Uri Dromi, a former Israeli government spokesman who is now an analyst with the private Israel Democracy Institute. "I see a lot of maneuvering and rhetoric, and Hamas going out of their way to convince everyone they're not lunatics."

Hamas will still have to answer to its street followers, who helped bring it to power. But in determining what kind of government it will seek, the group has suddenly gone from playing to a relatively small audience to a worldwide one.

"It's a very delicate time," said Ghassan Khatib, the outgoing Palestinian planning minister. "But in the end, I think the right people for the job will be found."

*

Special correspondent Fayed abu Shammalah in Cairo contributed to this report.

Cleaning Up Corruption Tops Palestinian Agenda (WT)

By Joshua Mitnick

The Washington Times, February 11, 2006

RAMALLAH, West Bank -- A series of corruption investigations has moved to the top of the Palestinian agenda after Hamas' campaign for clean government produced a rout of the ruling Fatah party in parliamentary elections last month.

DOJ_NMG_0014468

Attorney General Ahmed al-Moghani announced this week that he's pursuing 50 cases that could account for $700 million in lost funds. Palestinians say it's a significant first step, but it only scratches the surface of corruption that could implicate top security officials, private sector businessmen, nongovernmental organizations as well as Israelis.

Observers say pursuing such high-profile cases will require the joint political intervention of Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas and the newly victorious Hamas party. With a legal system that has been understaffed and subservient to the executive branch, the cases could take years to prosecute.

"The corruption is huge. It requires political will. I believe there is an understanding between [Mr. Abbas] and Hamas on the direction," said Samir Barghouti, an economist who has consulted for the European Union and the World Bank.

"The election indicated that the top issue that people want to deal with is corruption," he said.

Pursuing the corruption scandals is critical if Palestinians want to restore public trust in their self-rule government. It is also considered essential to restoring confidence of the community of international donors.

The Palestinians received about $5 billion in foreign aid over the past five years, and yet the Palestinian government is on the verge of bankruptcy, Nigel Roberts, World Bank country director for the West Bank and Gaza Strip, said in a recent interview with the Ha'aretz newspaper.

One of the cases being investigated focuses on an imaginary plan to build a pipe factory using $2 million from Italian donors and $4 million from the Palestinian Authority. The cases have pointed to workers in the Finance Ministry, and many expect them to implicate monopolies for withholding tax revenue.

"It's an accumulation of bad governance," said Sam Bahour, a Palestinian technology entrepreneur.

The announcement by the attorney general is seen as an attempt by Mr. Abbas to pre-empt a probe by Hamas, allowing him to save face of discredited Fatah.

Mr. Abbas promised to pursue corruption when he was elected a year ago, but ironically it was Hamas' landslide that stripped his ability to resist the inquiries.

Hamas officials have said that one out of every five government jobs in the government is fictitious -- a figure which would mean an annual loss of almost $200 million to the government. Observers say Hamas will need the cooperation of Mr. Abbas and other Fatah officials so the corruption inquires won't be perceived as an all-out purge.

"It would have been better to open the files before the elections," said Abed Fokaha, a newly elected parliament member from Hamas. "Abbas will [have to] treat this in the most serious manner possible. There is no way back."

Palestinians say the culture of corruption was brought to the West Bank and Gaza along with Palestinian Liberation Organization leader Yasser Arafat and his contemporaries in the wake of the peace accords that established self-rule a decade ago. A comptroller's report in 1997 suggested there was $300 million missing from Palestinian coffers, but Mr. Arafat's regime intimidated those who warned of graft.

Since then, parliamentary committees of inquiry, public petitions, and even Mr. Abbas' campaign platform have focused on corruption, but not one indictment has been served.

"Some people said, 'Let's not focus on internal issues. We need to focus on the occupation,' " said Omar Assaf, who ran for parliament with the Democratic Front for the Liberation of Palestine on an anti-corruption platform.

Mr. Assaf said he was summarily jailed in 1997 for two months because he accused Palestinian cigarette and petrol monopolies of withholding public money.

"Elsewhere in the world, if a government is labeled corrupt, they will be made accountable," he said. "But here no one has ever been made accountable."

Islamic University Is The Intellectual Center For Hamas (KRT)

By Dion Nissenbaum

Knight Ridder, February 11, 2006

GAZA CITY, Gaza Strip - The basement bookstore at Gaza City's Islamic University has everything a Palestinian student needs to get through the day, from pens and pencils to notebooks and munchies to power up for class.

DOJ_NMG_0014469

But the one-stop shop also features a few items that set the campus apart: Stacked at the entrance, alongside bootlegged video games and Harry Potter movies, are DVD tributes to Hamas "martyrs" killed in clandestine attacks on Israelis and recordings of fiery speeches by the Islamist militant group's spiritual leaders.

If Hamas' dramatic ascent to power in last month's Palestinian legislative elections was a political earthquake, Islamic University served as its intellectual epicenter. Virtually every major Hamas figure - living and dead - has taught or studied at the tranquil 25-acre campus in the heart of Gaza City, which some call Hamas U.

Sixteen members of the faculty, staff and university board of trustees will be part of the Hamas bloc in the new Palestinian Legislative Council, making up about one-fifth of the group's dominant majority. Many other incoming lawmakers, including some from the rival Fatah party, polished their political skills in these classrooms.

"Islamic University has been very rich soil for many leaders," said Dr. Jehad Hamad, a professor of political sociology at the rival Al Azhar University across the street.

Over the last 27 years, Islamic University has evolved from a rudimentary campus of tents for classrooms into a widely respected school with 17,000 students.

Here, politics and religion fuse to create a vibrant Hamas incubator that's succeeded in producing the new generation of Palestinian lawmakers.

The group's top political figure, Ismail Haniyeh, studied here. Gaza leader Mahmoud Zahar taught medicine. Jamila Shanty, the founder of the Hamas women's section, worked in the English department. Jamal Naji Khudari, the chairman of the university's board of trustees and an independent candidate backed by Hamas, is being talked about as perhaps the next prime minister.

Abdel Aziz Rantisi, one of the group's best-known leaders, served on the university faculty and denounced President Bush as an "enemy of Islam" at a campus rally a few weeks before Israel assassinated him in 2004. Ismail Abu Shanab, a Hamas political official whom Israel assassinated in 2003, served as the dean of one of the colleges. Mohammed Deif, who's considered the group's top bomb-maker, was a student here alongside Fatah leader Mohammed Dahlan, a newly elected lawmaker who's emerged as one of Hamas' most ardent adversaries.

Traces of Hamas are everywhere on campus. The modest university museum features framed congratulatory letters from "martyrs" Rantisi and Sheik Ahmed Yassin, the Hamas spiritual leader whom Israel also assassinated in 2004. A poster of Yassin hangs on the bookstore wall where the Hamas CDs and DVDs are sold. And the student council long has been dominated by Hamas.

Sitting in his expansive office in a new administration building paid for by Bahrain, Islamic University President Kamalain Shaath took in the Hamas political victory with a mix of optimism, joy and anxiety.

"I am proud to be part of this change," said Shaath, a quiet, Western-trained civil engineering professor. "But I have cautious pride, because this could give more trouble than fruit."

Like so many other institutions across the Gaza Strip and West Bank, Shaath said, his campus has been transformed into a Hamas stronghold, especially in the 15 years since Fatah leaders broke away to create the rival Al Azhar University, a fissure that's led to student clashes over the years.

"Islamic University was established as any other university, but gradually it became Hamas," Shaath said. "Hamas is affecting the whole community - and we are affected as well."

The university has flourished with aid from around the world, primarily from Arab nations but also from Europe, the World Bank and United States. Intel is launching a $1 million computer-training project this year. The U.S. Agency for International Development has paid for several projects, including a small clean-water program in 2004.

Anna-Maija Litvak, a spokeswoman for U.S. AID, said Islamic University had been "fully vetted" and had signed America's required anti-terrorism certificate before receiving any money.

"Financing higher education and training opportunities is part of our program, and Islamic University is one among many institutions that we fund," she said.

DOJ_NMG_0014470

Islamic University essentially operates as two parallel schools: one for the 10,000 women and one for the 7,000 men. Professors hold separate office hours so the halls will be filled with men one hour and women the next. The sexes have segregated cafeterias, classes and even entrances on opposite sides of the campus.

At the women's gate, security guards watch to make sure that students' head scarves don't reveal any hair and they are wearing the appropriate long, loose Islamic dresses. Sometimes the gate watchers hand out tissues to ensure that women don't come onto campus wearing makeup.

Becky Lewis, a University of South Carolina English professor who had a rare opportunity to teach at Islamic University for a semester in 1998 with her husband, said she was surprised when her female students took offense at a description of women wearing bathing suits in a John Updike short story.

After much debate about the story's message, the students decided to write to Updike, praising his writing but criticizing his description of women's bodies.

"They loved it in the end," Lewis said.

No one is quite sure where the new Hamas political era will lead. Some are in favor of a Cabinet dominated not by Hamas but by technocrats acceptable to the outside world. Others, such as 21-year-old Islamic University student Samia Hamaad, want to see the party they voted into power stick to their principles.

Wearing a white head scarf and veil that barely revealed her eyes, Hamaad said Israel should be worried about the incoming government because voters had chosen a strong voice for the Palestinian people.

"Where Islam is found, success is found," the young English major said. "We will help Hamas and trust Hamas to return all our lands - all the lands of Palestine."

Muslims' Fury Rages Unabated Over Cartoons (WP)

By Kevin Sullivan

The Washington Post, February 11, 2006

Demonstrators in 13 Countries Ignore Leaders' Appeals, Newspaper's Apology

COPENHAGEN, Feb. 10 -- Tens of thousands of Muslims took to the streets across Asia, Africa and the Middle East after weekly prayers on Friday, burning Danish flags and shouting anti-Danish and anti-American slogans in a continuing convulsion of anger over cartoons of the prophet Muhammad.

Demonstrators marched in at least 13 countries -- Kenya, Iran, India, Pakistan, Afghanistan, Malaysia, Sri Lanka, Bangladesh, Indonesia, the Philippines, Egypt, Israel and Jordan -- as the global wave of protests, spurred by a Danish newspaper's publication of cartoons depicting Islam's holiest figure and the reprinting of those cartoons in newspapers in other countries, headed toward a second consecutive weekend.

The protesters defied calls for calm from several prominent Muslim leaders and organizations as well as a statement of regret from Danish Prime Minister Anders Fogh Rasmussen and an apology by editors of the newspaper that originally published the cartoons. "The government has done what can be done," Rasmussen said in an interview Thursday. "Neither the government nor the Danish people can be held responsible for what is published in an independent newspaper. And neither the government nor the Danish people have any intention whatsoever to insult Muslims or any other religious community."

In Kenya, police shot and wounded at least one protester Friday as they tried to protect the Danish ambassador's residence. Thousands of demonstrators shouting "Kill Danes! Down with Denmark!" marched from Nairobi's largest mosque following Friday prayers. Riot police fired on a group of at least 200 people who had tried to reach the home of the Danish envoy, Bo Jensen.

"We've certainly heard their message and hope they will go home," Jensen told the Reuters news agency.

In Pakistan, more than 5,000 people demonstrated peacefully in Islamabad in the largest rally in the country since the controversy began. Another 2,000 protesters fought with police in the northwestern city of Peshawar.

In Kuala Lumpur, Malaysia, several thousand protesters marched from a mosque to the Danish Embassy, shouting, "Destroy Denmark! Destroy Israel! Destroy George Bush! Destroy America!" Others carried placards supporting an economic boycott that has almost halted Danish exports to the Middle East and North Africa.

DOJ_NMG_0014471

Addressing a large crowd, Malaysian Prime Minister Abdullah Ahmad Badawi described a "huge chasm that has emerged between the West and Islam," not simply because of the cartoons, he said, but because of Western policies regarding oil, Iraq, Afghanistan and the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

In India, thousands of angry Muslims kicked, spat on and tore Danish flags and burned effigies in the capital, New Delhi, and in the Indian-controlled portion of Kashmir, the Associated Press reported. In Bangladesh, more than 5,000 Muslims marched on Denmark's embassy in the capital, Dhaka, shouting, "Death to those who degrade our beloved prophet!"

In the Middle East, about 2,000 women, young boys and older men marched around the Dome of the Rock shrine in Jerusalem chanting "Bin Laden, strike again!" Large crowds of protesters in Gaza fired gunshots into the air and burned Danish flags. Thousands clashed with police in Egypt.

About 2,000 Muslims marched in Jordan. Demonstrators in Tehran threw gasoline bombs at the French Embassy and shouted, "Death to France!" and, "Death to America!" Several French newspapers have reprinted some of the Danish cartoons.

The violence came despite calls for calm from Ayatollah Ahmad Khatami, a senior cleric.

"I am calling on all religious men not to attack the embassies of the foreigners," Khatami told worshipers in Tehran in comments broadcast live on state radio. "Chanting slogans, staging protests and condemning such measures are holy . . . but I feel that they want their embassies to be set on fire so they can say that they are innocent. Take this excuse away from them."

In Sweden, the government shut down the Web site of a far-right political party's newspaper after it briefly posted a cartoon of Muhammad. It was the first time a Western government has intervened to block a publication in the controversy over the cartoons, the BBC reported.

Richard Jomshof, editor of the newspaper, SD-Kuriren, which is published by the anti-immigration Swedish Democrats, said the action was illegal. Jomshof's paper had posted a cartoon showing Muhammad from the rear, looking into a mirror with his eyes blacked out. He said the cartoon was about self-censorship, but Swedish Foreign Minister Laila Freivalds called it "a provocation" by "a small group of extremists."

In Copenhagen, Flemming Rose, the culture editor of the Jyllands-Posten newspaper, which originally published the cartoons on Sept. 30, was told to take a two-week vacation. "There is no disagreement whatsoever between me and the company," Rose said in an interview. "I'm tired, I have been under huge pressure, and I am grateful to the paper for this time off."

Rose said this week that he intended to print cartoons of Jesus Christ and the Israel-Palestinian conflict. He said the idea was to show that his newspaper would direct satire against all religions. Rose also said he was considering printing cartoons about the Holocaust that an Iranian newspaper intended to publish.

The newspaper's editor in chief, Carsten Juste, later publicly contradicted those statements, and Rose agreed that they represented "an error in judgment."

In Norway on Friday, the editor of Magazinet, a Christian newspaper, apologized to Muslims for reprinting the cartoons, which had made Norway a target of Muslim attacks, including the burning of its embassy in Damascus, Syria. Vebjoern Selbekk, who had initially defended the Jan. 10 publication as an expression of press freedom, said at a news conference: "I address myself personally to the Muslim community to say that I am sorry that your religious feelings have been hurt. It was never our intent to hurt anyone." Selbekk, who said he had received more than 20 e-mailed death threats, then shook hands with Mohammed Hamdan, leader of the Islamic Council in Norway, who urged forgiveness and Selbekk's safety.

"Anyone who touches him touches us," Hamdan said. "Our prophet, Muhammad, has said that everyone can make mistakes, but the best is the one who expresses regret and asks for forgiveness."

Muslims Clash With Police Over Prophet Cartoons (WT/AP)

By Lee Keath, Associated Press

The Washington Times, February 11, 2006

CAIRO -- Thousands of worshippers emerging from Friday prayers demonstrated against drawings of the prophet Muhammad in the Mideast, Asia and Africa, clashing with police in some cities despite religious leaders' attempts to keep marches peaceful.

DOJ_NMG_0014472

In Kenya, police shot and wounded one person among about 200 demonstrators trying to march to the residence of Denmark's ambassador.

About 60 protesters in the Iranian capital, Tehran, threw firebombs at the French Embassy, shattering nearly every window on its street facade, even after a cleric at a prominent Iranian mosque urged people not to attack diplomatic missions.

"Down. Down with France. Down. Down with Israel," the crowd chanted. One firebomb exploded in the embassy and started a small blaze that was quickly extinguished.

The caricatures, one of which showed Muhammad with a bomb-shaped turban, were published first in a Danish paper in September, then reprinted in European papers in recent weeks in the name of press freedom.

Arab governments, Muslim clerics and newspaper columnists have been urging calm, fearing that recent weeks of violence have only increased anti-Islamic sentiment in the West.

Eleven persons have been killed in the protests, all of them during three days of riots this week in Afghanistan. A 12th person died yesterday in Nairobi, the Kenyan capital, when he was hit by an ambulance rushing away the wounded protester.

Denmark's ambassador to Syria announced yesterday he was leaving with his colleagues because the government was offering an "unacceptably low level" of protection following recent violent demonstrations.

In France, an umbrella group of Muslim organizations announced it was suing a French weekly which recently reprinted the cartoons and ran one of its own. The group, representing the country's 5 million Muslims, said it had unanimously voted to take the magazine Charlie Hebdo to court.

Protests appeared to ease in the Mideast in recent days, though the caricatures were brought up in Iran, Lebanon and Iraq as Shi'ite Muslims marked their holy day of Ashura.

But Friday prayers -- a frequent launching ground for political demonstrations -- brought a new wave of protests in Egypt, Jordan, the Palestinian territories and Morocco.

Egypt saw its most widespread protests yet, with thousands protesting in 21 of its 26 provinces, including in Cairo and the second-largest city, Alexandria.

Protests by Palestinians were smaller than in recent days, but vehement. Gunmen fired in the air as thousands marched in Gaza, while about 2,000 women, young boys and older men marched around the Dome of the Rock shrine in Jerusalem, chanting "Bin Laden, strike again" and burning a Danish flag.

In Pakistan, rallies erupted around the country after prayers with some protesters burning foreign-made cheese and breaking windows while others clashed with police.

Thousands also demonstrated in Malaysia, Bangladesh, India and Sri Lanka, although Syria and Lebanon, the scenes of earlier violence, were calm yesterday.

U.S. Seeks Right Tone In Cartoon Uproar (AP)

By Anne Gearan

AP, February 11, 2006

WASHINGTON -- For once, the United States is partly on the sidelines of a clash of ideas between the Muslim world and the West. But the Bush administration is being less than surefooted in responding to the uproar and deadly protests over cartoon images of the Prophet Muhammad that were deeply offensive to Muslims, analysts say.

In the second week of violent protests, tens of thousands of Muslims demonstrated around the world Friday. Iranian youths rioted outside the French Embassy in Tehran despite calls for calm by government and religious leaders.

In its first reaction more than a week ago, the State Department appeared to blame the European media for publishing the cartoons, instead of condemning the violence that resulted, although U.S. officials said their message was misconstrued and taken out of context.

Then, after days of careful statements supporting press freedoms while denouncing violence, President Bush suggested anew that the press had been irresponsible.

DOJ_NMG_0014473

"America's initial response was a bit lacking and regrettable, in that it actually sided with those who were offended as opposed to the Europeans, and particularly the Danes, who should have gotten unqualified support," said Reuel Marc Gerecht, a conservative foreign policy scholar at the American Enterprise Institute and the Project for a New American Century.

Both organizations have close ties to the Bush administration.

Gerecht blames Middle East specialists in the State Department for tending to placate antidemocratic Arab regimes and mute criticism that might inflame Muslim anger.

Other analysts gave Washington better marks for its response to what, at first, was an issue primarily affecting Denmark, then other European nations where media republished the Danish cartoons.

"The administration quite rightly struck a balanced tone, balancing freedom of expression with responsibility in the media," said Ibrahim Hooper, spokesman for the Council on American-Islamic Relations, a Muslim civil rights and advocacy group.

As protests turned deadly and European embassies were attacked in Damascus, the administration went on the offensive to accuse Syria and Iran of fomenting and profiting from violence.

"The world ought to call them on it," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Wednesday.

Bush had earlier implicated Syria. Neither cited specific evidence, but spokesmen later pointed to numerous circumstantial factors, saying massive street protests could not occur in a near-totalitarian state like Syria without official participation.

The U.S. accusations are almost certainly on the mark, analysts said. But the finger-pointing also inserted the administration squarely into the controversy and may have fed the perception among Muslims that the United States was turning the protests to its own ends.

Hezbollah leader Sheik Hassan Nasrallah said Rice and Bush should "shut up," and Muslims should continue their protests.

"Where they started having difficulty, and helping to direct and bring anger toward the United States, was taking the position that this was exploitation by politicians," said Shibley Telhami, a Mideast scholar at the University of Maryland. "While it's true at some level, it comes across as if it's missing the force of it for the vast majority of Muslims."

Gerecht said the administration was right to speak out as the protests turned increasingly ugly, and as Arab government involvement seemed clear.

"What was slightly regrettable was that it took the administration a little bit of time to state the obvious," he said.

Analysts also said they do not detect much satisfaction within the administration that Europeans, not Americans, have caught the brunt of the anger. Many European governments parted company with Bush over the Iraq war, and polls show Europeans are often scornful of U.S. influence and motives overseas.

Europe and the United States both recognize that Muslim immigrants are often more assimilated in American society than they are in Europe, and that the U.S. has been the better for it, said Jon Alterman, Middle East program director at the Center for Strategic and International Studies.

"They all recognize that, so I don't think there's been much schadenfreude (taking pleasure in others' misfortune) that, 'Hey, the Europeans are taking it on the chin for a change,'" he said.

___

EDITOR'S NOTE _ Anne Gearan covers diplomacy and foreign affairs for The Associated Press.

NATO Seeks Closer Ties With Middle East (AP)

By Paul Ames

AP, February 11, 2006

NATO defense ministers sought to calm Islamic anger over cartoons of the Prophet Muhammad at a counterterrorism meeting Friday with Arab countries and Israel.

The United States and other NATO nations have been seeking partners in fighting terrorism by building ties with friendly nations in North Africa and the Middle East.

DOJ_NMG_0014474

The meeting on counterterrorism cooperation with NATO's "Mediterranean partners" — Israel, Egypt, Algeria, Morocco, Tunisia, Jordan and Mauritania — was called before the cartoons sparked protests across the Muslim world. But the controversy drew attention Friday.

"What is important here is the word respect, respect for each others' values," NATO Secretary General Jaap de Hoop Scheffer said. "Violence cannot be the answer."

German Defense Minister Franz Josef Jung said: "De-escalation is the message we have today ... We need to make clear how important it is to have a dialogue between cultures."

Despite the conciliatory tone, de Hoop Scheffer made clear that tentative efforts to build ties with the Palestinians had been ended by Hamas' victory in parliamentary elections.

"Contacts with Hamas are out of the question," he told a news conference.

The NATO chief said Algeria, Morocco and Israel "had shown a keen interest" in joining NATO naval patrols to deter potential terrorist smuggling of explosives and other materials through the Mediterranean into Europe.

The NATO ministers stressed the need to modernize their alliance so it can confront new threats such as civil unrest — highlighted this week by attacks on its peacekeepers in Afghanistan by Muslim protesters enraged by the publication of the Muhammad caricatures.

Allies agreed to find the troops needed for the NATO Response Force — an elite unit of between 20,000 and 25,000 troops able to deploy anywhere in the world within five days — to meet an October deadline.

Russia also plans to join that mission. Defense Minister Sergei Ivanov came to Sicily accompanied by a cruiser so Russian sailors could train for the patrols with their NATO counterparts.

Ivanov sought to reassure NATO that Moscow's recent decision to deploy missiles to Belarus was not directed against the western alliance.

Russia said Thursday that it will deploy four air defense units capable of shooting down targets some 90 miles away, a military official said Thursday.

Russia has close ties with Belarus' authoritarian President Alexander Lukashenko, who has become a pariah in the West for his crackdown on opposition and independent media.

Ministers could not agree over the formation of a pooled fund to pay for costs associated with NATO missions. Under the current system, member countries foot the bills for their operations under NATO.

On the sidelines of the meeting, Dutch Defense Minister Henk Kamp told The Associated Press that the Netherlands may send as many as 1,500 troops to Afghanistan on its two-year mission to expand NATO's peacekeeping operation into one of the most dangerous parts of the country.

"This will be a risky task for the Dutch armed forces and we will send a strong task force," Kamp said. "In total 1,300 to 1500 Dutch soldiers including our air force personnel."

Previous estimates have suggested the Dutch commitment would be between 1,200-1,400 strong, but more may be needed when the Netherlands take on southern area headquarters tasks in Kandahar for six months.

Evangelical Christians Express Little Sympathy For Muslims' Outrage (KRT)

By Matt Stearns

Knight Ridder, February 11, 2006

WASHINGTON - Many conservative Christians have long regarded the media as enemy territory, where traditional values are at best misunderstood and often mocked.

So you might think they would relate sympathetically to Muslim outrage over the Danish cartoons depicting the prophet Muhammad with a bomb in his turban. That outrage has sparked violent protests throughout the Islamic world.

But concerns about the goals of radical Islamic leaders, a sense that a double standard pervades the Muslim media and a general distaste for organized violence have overridden any empathy most Christian conservatives might feel for angry Muslims.

DOJ_NMG_0014475

"Unfortunately, the protesters are hinting that the cartoonist might have been right," said the Rev. Ted Haggard, president of the National Association of Evangelicals. "They're killing fellow Muslims and destroying property. Maybe the radical protests are validating the cartoon instead of proving that cartoon wrong."

No Christian leader ever espoused violence to retaliate against "Piss Christ," the controversial 1989 artwork - a photograph of a crucifix submerged in urine - by Andres Serrano, even though that riled many Christians, noted Gary Bauer, president of American Values and a longtime leader among religious conservatives.

"I understand why any religious person would get upset if they think their faith is disparaged in a drawing or a cartoon," Bauer said. "But ... how can (the cartoons) engender a greater emotional reaction than the daily bombings and attacks by groups claiming to do them in the name of Allah?

"It doesn't look like a call for respect," Bauer concluded of the Muslims' protests. "It looks like a call for submission."

Indeed, many evangelical Christians see militant Islam replacing communism as the greatest global threat, said Allen Hertzke, professor of political science and director of religious studies at the University of Oklahoma.

"They see this phenomenon as part of an orchestrated effort by what they call Islamo-fascists to take over the Islamic world," Hertzke said.

Then there's the apparent double standard for acceptable religious satire in Muslim media, especially regarding Jews.

Jews are routinely lambasted and stereotyped in the Muslim media. Hertzke recalled a Syrian TV program shown in Jordan that depicted Jews using the blood of children to make matzo. A recent cartoon on a Muslim group's Web site showed Adolf Hitler in bed with Anne Frank, a teenage Jewish martyr during World War II, saying "Write this one in your diary, Anne."

"Many evangelicals have very positive views toward Jews, and evangelicals support Israel," said John Green, a professor at the University of Akron who specializes in religion and politics. "And it's interesting that in the protests of these cartoons, the language quickly turned anti-Semitic and anti-Israel. That sends up a red flag for evangelical Christians."

Christian conservatives also generally echo the views of the Bush administration, which condemned the Muslim violence but backed off early criticisms of the cartoons themselves. President Bush pointed out that such are the vagaries of life with a free press.

"The appreciation of pluralism is something that every religious group has to grow in," Haggard of the evangelicals' group said. "We evangelicals struggle with this issue every time we send one of our kids off to college. But we think pluralism is a high value. ... Radical Muslim extremists have to grasp that pluralism is a fact of life for all cultures. We're into a new world."

Danish Producers Feel Heat Of Cartoon Boycott (FT)

By Roula Khalaf And William Wallis

Financial Times, February 11, 2006

You have to squint at the fine print on a box of Lego to know that it comes from Denmark. But in the Middle East these days, Lego's international style branding is not enough to escape the fast-spreading consumer boycott of Danish goods.

Much of the world's attention over the past week has been on the violent protests - including those in Kenya, Malaysia and Turkey on Friday - against the publication of caricatures of the Prophet Mohammed that first appeared in Denmark's Jyllands-Posten newspaper. But in large parts of the Arab world, the consumer boycott of Danish goods is by far the most widespread popular reaction to the cartoons. Previous consumer boycotts in the Middle East (including the long-standing rejection of companies that do business in Israel) have been only briefly successful.

The recent boycott of American goods, after the launch of the "war on terror" and in the aftermath of the Iraq war, petered out, perhaps because of the ubiquitous nature of US products. In contrast Danish goods, limited in the Middle East to a few items including dairy products, butter, cream cheese, pharmaceuticals and Lego, have proved far easier to target.

The mobilisation has been impressive. Starting with calls from influential clerics in Saudi Arabia - as well as Sheikh Youssel al-Qardawi, the Qatar-based Egyptian preacher with a large following across the region - the boycott call was quickly taken up by newspapers and businesses across the Middle East and supported by chambers of commerce and other professional and religious groups.

DOJ_NMG_0014476

Peter Mandelson, the European Union's trade commissioner, has warned Saudi Arabia - the birthplace of the prophet and home to Islam's holiest shrines where the boycott has been most faithfully followed - that it would be taken before the World Trade Organisation if it encouraged the boycott. Riyadh says it is not encouraging the embargo.

Only a few governments, including Iran and Libya, have openly supported the action, with others distancing themselves from it but allowing protsets.

According to Khaled al-Maena, editor of the Jeddah-based Arab News, the boycott spread with postings on the internet and chain letters sent through telephone text messages, often by young people. "People also wrote letters to the editors demanding that we support the boycott and businessmen decided to stop buying and selling Danish products," he says.

Employees at one of Dubai's sprawling Carrefour hypermarkets say that blue cheese and Lego were removed from the shelves after customers flocked to return Danish goods they'd already purchased.

At the Alpha supermarket in the upmarket neighbourhood of Zamalek in Cairo, the boycott has been successful - all the Lego has been swept off the shelves. The manager of the supermarket says a decision was made by members of the general union of Egyptian chambers of commerce to adhere to the boycott.

The owner of another Egyptian toyshop that was still stocking Lego says she had not sold a single item in a week. But several people had come in with leaflets with listed Danish products including Lego, urging her to join the boycott. "They asked why am I stocking Lego. Am I not a Muslim," she says.

The boycott appears aimed at soliciting apologies from Europe, particularly the Danish government, for what many Muslims view as a deliberate western attempt to denigrate the image of the prophet.

"We'll wait and see what happens on the political front. The Danish newspaper has apologised. Now lets see if the [Danish] government will too and if these apologies will be accepted or not," says Mahmoud Amr, the general manager of Mansh, the Egyptian distributor of Lego. Raising awareness about the greatness of the prophet seems to be another objective of the commercial protest.

Religious edicts on websites dedicated to promoting Islam to back the boycott but also recommend that Muslim organisations arrange lectures, buy television time and send preachers abroad to teach the world about the virtues of Mohammed. A new organisation dedicated to defending the prophet was set up in Saudi Arabia this week and, in addition to keeping the boycott going, it is reportedly bringing legal action against Jyllands-Posten.

The impact on the Danish companies has yet to become fully apparent. Charlotte Simonsen, head of corporate communications at Lego, says the region represents only 1 per cent of its global sales. Some shops in Kuwait, Qatar and the UAE have removed products from their shelves but she insists there is "no evidence that this represents a wider phenomenon."

But Mr Amr says a week after the boycott began to take hold he halted import orders of Lego because of a collapse in demand. "The extent to which we have been affected is still not apparent yet. But many of our clients are calling and are bringing back the products. This is not the case with all shops but still this means we are badly affected."

Meanwhile Arla, Danish-Swedish dairy products supplier, says it has been losing about £1m a day because of the boycott with total losses close to £10m so far. But the boycott is also hurting local businesses that produce Danish products. Arla, for example, has now halted a £40m project for a dairy plant in Saudi Arabia endangering 800 jobs.

So far, the boycott has been largely confined to Danish goods but, with no apparent let up in the cartoon crisis, there have been some calls for extending it to Norway.

An opinion piece published this week in Arab News, suggested escalating the boycott to all western products to give the west time "to back down and apologise for the insults they have heaped upon our beloved prophet and to make sure it never, ever happens again." If Muslims around the world failed to take this proposal seriously, the writer concludes, they should be prepared to eat not only Danish cheese "but their own pride as well."

Additional reporting by Steve Negus in Dubai and Paivi Munter in Stockholm

For Danish Firms, Boycott In Mideast A 'Nightmare' (WP)

By Kevin Sullivan

The Washington Post, February 11, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0014477

Millions of Dollars in Sales Are Lost as Markets That Were Built Over Decades Disappear in Days

COPENHAGEN, Feb. 10 -- The Arla Foods plant in Riyadh, Saudi Arabia, which produces cheese and flavored yogurt drinks, sits idle and the company's 800 employees in the country have been sent home because of a Middle East boycott of Danish goods, following a Danish newspaper's publication of cartoons of the prophet Muhammad.

"It took us 40 years to build up our business in the Middle East, and five days to bring it to a total stop," said Astrid Nielsen, spokeswoman for the Danish company here. She said suspending operations at the Riyadh plant, the company's regional base, and a near-total boycott of the company's products have cost Arla about $1.7 million a day since Jan. 28.

The boycott of Danish goods, propelled by Muslim leaders and imams preaching in mosques, has brought exports of Danish products to the Middle East and North Africa to a virtual standstill. It has scuttled a flow of goods to the region that was worth about $1 billion in the first 10 months of 2005, according to government statistics.

The boycott has been less visible than the angry mobs around the world burning Danish flags, torching embassies and carrying placards calling for "Danish blood." But it has been just as unnerving for Danish business leaders, who have spent decades expanding their sales of food, pharmaceuticals, industrial equipment and other products into the Middle Eastern market.

"As Danes, we are still sort of in a situation where we are thinking this is just a nightmare," Nielsen said, "and we are going to wake up in a little while and find that this didn't happen. We can never hope to regain what we had, but we hope we can reestablish some of it. We have a huge task ahead of us."

Prime Minister Anders Fogh Rasmussen, in an interview Thursday, said the boycott was not a major threat to Denmark's economy.

"According to the latest figures, 3 percent of Danish exports go to the Muslim world," Rasmussen said. "So seen from an overall perspective, it is of minor importance on the Danish trade balance."

Rasmussen, a former economic affairs minister, said it was "too early to make a final assessment" about the long-term impact of the boycott and whether Middle Eastern consumers would eventually start buying Danish products again.

"From experience we know that trade may be resumed in a longer-term perspective," he said. "Danish industries are famous for their ability to adapt to new situations. And our competitiveness is very strong. Danish companies are in very good shape for the time being."

Still, Rasmussen noted that companies such as Arla that do extensive business in the Middle East and North Africa "may be affected very significantly."

"And I strongly regret that, of course, because Arla is not responsible for what is published in a Danish newspaper," said Rasmussen, who has repeatedly expressed regrets that Muslims have been offended by the cartoons of Muhammad, while saying he cannot apologize for what was printed in a private newspaper.

"You can't hold a whole nation responsible for what is published in a free and independent newspaper," Rasmussen said. "I do know that it is very difficult to understand for many people in the Arab streets, because they can hardly understand how free and independent media work. But that's our system. It is unfair to take Danish companies and employees hostage in this case, in an economic sense."

Those arguments carry little weight in places such as the al-Qiswani Supermarket in the West Bank town of Beit Hanina, where prominently displayed posters urge shoppers, "If you love the Prophet, join us in boycotting Danish products." The posters are surrounded by photos of Danish cheeses, powdered milk, chocolates and other products to be avoided.

The store's owner, Abed Qiswani, 42, said his revenue has dropped 5 percent because of the boycott, which he said has been uniformly followed. He used to sell a carton of Danish cheese a week, but now those products are being left untouched, along with products from some other European countries, including French cheeses and Scandinavian cereals.

Qiswani said that when he tried to return his back stock of Danish products, his supplier told him he had lost nearly $200,000 in canceled orders as a result of the boycott in the West Bank and Jerusalem.

"What has struck me most, though, is that little children come to the store and ask if this is a Danish product," Qiswani said. "Boycotting is a very good thing. Politics is always connected to the economy. The problem these European countries have now is with the Islamic giant, and they should think about who they mess with."

DOJ_NMG_0014478

Tariq Maslanani, 11, said he no longer buys French-made Laughing Cow cheese, his favorite, because a French newspaper also ran the cartoons.

"We cannot bear anybody cursing our prophet," said the sixth-grader.

Svend Roed Nielsen, head of trade policy at the Danish Foreign Ministry, said that in addition to daily consumer goods such as cheese and butter, there has been a noticeable drop in exports of pharmaceuticals and medicines to Muslim countries. He said that he was unsure of the exact loss but that those goods accounted for about $104 million in the first 10 months of last year. He said officials had heard that the expected signings of several contracts for Danish machinery and electronic goods had been postponed.

"Things are looking quite bad at the moment," said Keld Winther Rasmussen of the Danish Dairy Board. "We have products in the country we can't sell, in ships that we can't deliver, and products in dairy plants that we will have to find other markets for."

Rasmussen said dairy industry officials had hoped that Prime Minister Rasmussen's televised comments offering regrets for the offense caused to Muslims would improve the situation. "But so far that has had no impact," he said, adding that he hoped that Danish dairy exports to the Middle East would eventually restart. "We hope this is not the end. But we can see that it is going to take a very long time to regain our hold in the market. It could take years."

Bjarne Kristiansen, manager of a dairy in Aalborg, said exports to the Middle East account for 70 percent of his company's sales -- and that market has completely dried up since the boycott took hold. He said his company is losing sales of about 100 tons of feta cheese a week.

"If this continues, after two or three weeks we might have to stop production of feta cheese, which is our main production," he said. "Hopefully we won't have to close completely, but I don't know. It is a terrible situation."

Keld Pedersen, managing director of Nordex Food, said his company has lost 20 percent of its total sales, which normally go to the Middle East. He said the company has had to cut 15 jobs out of its workforce of 200.

"Maybe the government acted too late -- we all did," Pedersen said. "We were all very surprised about how quickly this situation developed. I can't fault the government's efforts now. But Denmark cannot do this alone, and it will not only be Denmark that suffers."

Pedersen said the Jyllands-Posten newspaper, which first published the Muhammad cartoons, "should have been more careful."

"Everyone has the right to freedom of speech, but you can't cry 'Fire! Fire!' in a cinema," he said. "But it's always easier to see these things after they have happened."

Pedersen said he is pessimistic that his company's Middle Eastern market, which it has been building for 25 years, will fully recover.

"I don't think it will ever be the same again," he said. "The consumers won't forget."

Special correspondents Alexandra Topping in London and Sufian Taha in Beit Hanina contributed to this report.

A Most Un-Danish Dane (FT)

By Päivi Munter

Financial Times, February 11, 2006

Denmark, the small north European nation traditionally known as a haven of liberalism, is struggling to find a 21st century strategy to deal with substantial immigration from Muslim countries. The response of the Scandinavian people has been to elect an “un-Danish” leader to protect their Danishness.

In sharp contrast to the laid-back and sociable image the Scandinavians have of themselves, Anders Fogh Rasmussen is a loner and a tough prime minister. Despite this – or perhaps for this reason – he is thought by most of his compatriots to be the right man to defend the cohesiveness of a small and homogeneous nation faced with a large minority that defies the culture of its adopted homeland.

At the end of the toughest week in the 53-year-old Mr Rasmussen’s political career – in which he pleaded to the entire Muslim world for an end to violence over Danish cartoons of the Prophet Mohammed – few cracks have appeared in the prime minister's support at home. Faced with the most serious international crisis to hit Denmark since the German occupation – in which the Danes successfully protected the country's Jewish minority – they stand behind the leader they respect, if not love.

DOJ_NMG_0014479

Approval ratings for Mr Rasmussen, who was elected in 2001, have remained above 50 per cent, well ahead of any opposition politician. They have barely fallen since January, when the conflict over the cartoons, first published in the Danish paper Jyllands-Posten, erupted into a global stand-off between the west and the Muslim world.

Mr Rasmussen came to power on a platform that defied the traditional left-right boundaries in a country largely ruled according to social democratic principles. His centre-right coalition built its programme on two cornerstones: a tax freeze and strict restrictions on immigration. These, combined with a pledge to maintain Denmark's cradle-to-grave welfare state, constituted a radical new approach in Danish politics that secured the centre ground for Mr Rasmussen's party.

While the tax freeze has proved popular in high-tax Denmark, it is Mr Rasmussen's tough immigration policy he is best known for. Soon after his election, Mr Rasmussen set about severely curtailing the number of foreign migrants. The government passed laws making it difficult for residents to bring in spouses from outside the European Union – until then a commonly used avenue of immigration among ethnic minorities, the biggest of which are Turks, Iraqis and Lebanese.

Now a resident seeking to bring in a foreign spouse must be over 24 years of age, financially secure and have a lease on an apartment, while the couple must have a demonstrable "connection" to Denmark. These requirements make Danish immigration laws among the strictest in the European Union, a sharp departure from the country's liberal tradition.

While achieving the government's goal of dramatically reducing immigration, the law has caused considerable ill-feeling among Danish immigrants, who argue that the restrictions reflect a growing intolerance towards ethnic minorities and their culture and religion.

The immigration law has damaged Denmark's international standing, as residents married to foreigners – some of them ethnic Danes who find the rigid permit system humiliating – have been forced to emigrate or remain abroad. But the majority of Danes are staunch supporters of the policy, reflected in Mr Rasmussen's high approval ratings a year into his second term.

Danes began to see immigration as a threat to social harmony in the 1990s. A rapidly growing Muslim population that was nearing 200,000 stood out in a traditionally homogeneous country that lived off agriculture until the 1960s. Danes worried that a large part of the new minority was slow in adopting the Danish language and was living living on state benefits on the margins of society.

The growing fears about alien influences on Danish society found resonance in Mr Rasmussen, the son of a struggling farmer from Jutland, Denmark's agricultural heartland, which remains socially much more conformist than liberal Copenhagen.

Nostalgia for the era before mass immigration appears to drive one of the government's latest initiatives, too. A cultural canon, aimed at improving Danes' knowledge of their heritage, will determine the artistic works all school children must study.

Critics of Mr Rasmussen say the parochialism of his humble beginnings in the countryside has never quite left him. He may have earned plaudits for an efficient handling of Denmark's presidency of the EU four years ago, but Danish intellectuals like to joke about Mr Rasmussen's lack of sophistication and exposure to the wider world.

Peter Mose, author of the Handbook for Prime Ministers, says Mr Rasmussen's limitations in foreign policy may have contributed to the cartoon crisis, which has been brewing since September. While the publication of the drawings initially drew little attention, they spawned a controversy after Mr Rasmussen declined to meet a group of ambassadors from Muslim countries who were seeking to raise their concerns over the pictures, regarded as blasphemous by Muslims.

Many observers say Mr Rasmussen should have responded to the concerns early in order to pre-empt a crisis at a time when Denmark's participation in the Iraq war had already strained relations with its Muslim community. Instead, he resolutely defended Danes' right to freedom of expression.

"He is really good in the European context, but outside the EU he is more restricted. This is a problem when Denmark is pursuing an activist foreign policy, of which the war in Iraq is the best indication," Mr Mose says.

So far, however, this criticism is muted. Danes think the man they consider a straight shooter is the safest pair of hands to steer their small nation in a globalised world – even if he is seen by some as an oddball.

DOJ_NMG_0014480

Anne Sofie Kragh, author of a biography of Mr Rasmussen, says the prime minister is “one of the most peculiar people I have met”. According to the book, he had few friends as a child, but held a single-minded ambition to be a politician before the age of 10. He did not kiss a woman, it is claimed, until he was in his 20s.

“In Denmark, we like things to be relaxed, cosy and nice, whereas he seeks order and perfection. He’s far too ambitious to be a typical Dane, which is why he is seen as a strong leader,” Ms Kragh says.

Danish Cartoon Editor On Indefinite Leave (NYT)

By Dan Bilefsky

The New York Times, February 11, 2006

COPENHAGEN, Feb. 10 — Flemming Rose, the Danish editor whose decision to publish cartoons of the Prophet Muhammad helped provoke weeks of fury in the Muslim world, said in an interview on Friday that he was leaving his newspaper on indefinite vacation.

Mr. Rose, 47, stood by the decision of the newspaper, Jyllands-Posten, to publish the caricatures, citing freedom of the press. And he refused to apologize for the drawings, which were seen by many Muslims as sacrilegious and have prompted widespread protests, boycotts of Danish goods and the burning of Danish diplomatic missions in the Middle East.

He said in an interview, however, that the stress of recent events had given him sleepless nights.

"I am thankful that the newspaper has given me the chance to recover," said Mr. Rose, who is the newspaper's culture editor. "I am tired. In the middle of a crisis, you do not always recognize the tensions placed on you. I'm glad someone on the paper had the guts to make the decision to give me a break, because sometimes you want to keep on fighting."

The vacation announcement comes after weeks of violent clashes in Europe, Asia and the Middle East over the cartoons. At least 11 people have died.

After a brief lull on Thursday, demonstrations resumed as thousands of Muslims emerged from Friday Prayer and took to the streets in the Middle East, Asia and Africa, The Associated Press reported. The protests were mostly peaceful, but in Nairobi, Kenya, the police shot and wounded one person as officers tried to keep about 200 demonstrators from marching to the residence of Denmark's ambassador, The A.P. reported.

In Tehran about 60 protesters threw stones, firecrackers and firebombs at the French Embassy, shattering nearly every window on its street front, even after a prominent cleric urged people not to attack diplomatic missions.

Egypt had its largest protests yet, with demonstrations in most major cities. In El Mahalla el Kubra, security forces used tear gas and water cannons to break up a march of about 15,000 people after protesters threw rocks and attacked shops and cars.

Muslim leaders in Denmark said Mr. Rose's leave was unlikely to be enough to lessen tensions in the Muslim world.

"I am not his boss, but I would fire him," said Imam Abdul Wahid Pedersen, a prominent Muslim leader in Copenhagen. "What he did is disgraceful, and I can't even begin to understand what has gone on in his head."

In France, where the editor of France Soir — the first newspaper there to reprint all 12 cartoons — was fired last week, some Muslim leaders considered the fact that Mr. Rose had taken a leave a small victory.

"That's very good news," said Mohamed Henniche, president of the Union of Muslim Associations in a department northeast of Paris. "It shows that there is an evolution and that people recognize that offense has been caused."

After the publication of the cartoons in Denmark and Norway in September, and the republication last week by France Soir, the satirical French weekly Charlie Hebdo followed suit. Several Muslim organizations in France said they were planning legal action against Charlie Hebdo for incitement of hatred.

Mr. Rose acknowledged it had been a mistake to say in an interview with CNN on Wednesday that the paper intended to reprint Holocaust cartoons as part of a contest being sponsored by an Iranian newspaper. He said he had no intention to offend Jews, but had suggested publishing the Holocaust cartoons in order to document cultural satire in the Middle East for a Danish audience.

Mr. Rose also said he had erred in suggesting on Danish television that Jyllands-Posten should reprint previous cartoons satirizing Christians and Jews, including a drawing of the Star of David in the shape of a bomb by a cartoonist who drew one of the Muhammad cartoons.

DOJ_NMG_0014481

"I wanted to show that in Denmark we do not have an anti-Muslim bias and that we had published these cartoons before without having riots or boycotts of Danish goods in Israel or Christian countries," he said. Last Saturday, Jyllands-Posten did publish cartoons from the Arab world; one showed Auschwitz with a tower draped in the Israeli flag.

The paper apologized last week for offending Muslims, but has steadfastly stood by its decision to print the Muhammad cartoons.

"I feel sorry if Muslims feel offended and that was not the intention," Mr. Rose said. "But the cartoons were within the acceptable boundaries of free speech in Denmark."

The crisis began in early September when Mr. Rose commissioned the cartoons. He said he came up with the idea after the Danish writer Kare Bluitgen, the author of a children's book about religion, complained that she was having difficulty finding artists to illustrate a book about Muhammad because of fears of violent attacks by extremist Muslims.

Mr. Rose, a former war correspondent in Afghanistan and Iran, known for his fearlessness and trenchant views about immigration, was incensed, colleagues say.

He invited 25 newspaper cartoonists to draw a picture of Muhammad "how they saw him." Twelve cartoonists responded and their pictures were printed on Sept. 30. Mr. Rose said he knew that Islam barred depictions of the prophet because of concern that such images could lead to idolatry.

But he said nothing had prepared him for the reaction that followed.

An Update From France . . . (Remember Those Riots?) (WSJ)

By Theodore Dalrymple

The Wall Street Journal, February 11, 2006

LE VANS, France -- How has France changed since the two weeks of riots last November that should have shaken the country to the core?

The answer is not much. For the vast majority of the French, the riots were little more than a televisual event, to sit at home and watch on the small screen while relaxing after work. It was possible, after all, to travel the length and breadth of the country at the very height of the riots and not know that anything untoward was happening anywhere -- provided, of course, that one did not look at the television, listen to the radio, or read a newspaper or magazine.

The fact is that, for the time being, the banlieues -- the troubled suburbs -- are another country; they do things differently there.

Out of sight, out of mind: Insofar as the rioters had any coherent purpose or intention, it was to protest this peculiar, cold relationship with the rest of French society, but also -- paradoxically -- to defend it. On the one hand they wanted to catch the attention of their wicked stepmother, France; on the other, they wanted to warn her to keep her nose out of their affairs -- petty criminality and the abuse of women. (Remember that the riots were triggered by the deaths of two youths, interrupted by the police while they exercised their fundamental human right to break into warehouses.)

If they cannot be fully integrated into French society, les jeunes want to continue to be what they have hitherto been, which is, de facto, extraterritorial (except, of course, in the matter of social security payments). After all, their only other contact with the rest of French society is with the police, whom they see as an alien force that raids their territory from time to time and despises them. They want their own laws and their own hierarchy: brutal and stupid, no doubt, but at least their own.

The paralysis of the French state in the face of the challenge is almost total. This obese organism is all-powerful in the prevention of change, but utterly impotent in the initiation of change. True, there is a proposal that the curriculum vitae of applicants for posts should henceforth be evaluated by prospective employers without the name or photograph of the applicants attached so that the prospective employers cannot discriminate against applicants of sub-Saharan or North African origin. But whatever slight good this proposal might do, it assumes that the fundamental problem of French society is discrimination, which is not the case.

That is not to say that there is no discrimination. It has been estimated that, for any given level of qualification, there are twice as many unemployed French of African or North African origin as French whose ancestors really were les gaulois. This disregards the fact that in an open economy without formal legal barriers to advancement, discrimination never prevented any minority from advancing, and might even have strengthened determination to do so. The trouble is that the French economy is not a very open one, nor is it likely soon to become one. In an economy as centrally administered and directed as the French, piston -- influence -- is all-important. You have to know someone who knows someone: And it is this that allows discrimination to flourish and for elites constantly to renew themselves while shutting out new recruits.

DOJ_NMG_0014482

The French still regard the open economy with horror. A recent poll suggests that, while two-thirds of the population accepted that reform was necessary, they also wanted to keep the advantages of the present system -- a short working week, early retirement for many, and almost invincible job protection. After years of assiduous propaganda, they believe that anything else will lead directly to the horrors of the United States: uninsured people dying of untreated diseases in the streets and, above all, riots.

The case of the state monopoly, EDF (Electricité de France) is instructive, and explains why any reform is so politically difficult. Employees of this vast organization work 32 hours per week; their meals are subsidized to the tune of 50%, their electricity and gas bills by 90%; they can retire at 55; they have the right to holidays at a fifth of their market value, and on average work the equivalent of eight months per year; and when their mother-in-law dies, they can take three days' paid leave to celebrate. These are not all their privileges, only some; so it is hardly surprising that when the government proposed the privatization of EDF, they went on strike. (The government caved in.) They did so in the name of "the defense of public service" -- and the French call the Anglo-Saxons hypocrites!

When a certain critical mass of such subsidy and special privilege for important sectors of the economy is reached, reform becomes impossible without explosion. The government has created an economic monster that it cannot tame, and that is now its master. In any case, periodic explosion has long been the means by which French society has undertaken major political and economic change. In the meantime, repression will become more necessary. For the moment, the banlieues are quiet: That is to say, only 100 cars a night are burned, and life elsewhere continues in its very pleasant way. But there is an underlying anxiety (the French take more tranquillizers than any other nation). No one believes that we have heard the last of les jeunes and of profound economic troubles. The last episode was but a very minor eruption of the social volcano. Every Frenchman believes that the question of a major eruption is not if, but when.

The mutual odium of the majority population and the children of immigrants in the banlieues has only worsened. Les jeunes are still humiliatingly dependent on a state and country that they have learned to hate, without there being any in which they might feel at home. This is a miserable existential condition, and renders their egos tenderly sensitive to the slightest insult. * * *

The only hopeful sign is the number of intelligent and hardworking young women from the banlieues who, despite everything, are able to find a place in the economy. They know that the only way they will ever escape from the control of the angry, inflamed, humiliated, violent and useless young men around them, primed by Islam to maltreat women, is by struggling for economic independence from them. They are very highly motivated.

The French do not go to the banlieues, but what they fear is that the banlieues will come to them. Perhaps it is starting to happen. My nephew and a friend of his were walking through the Bois de Vincennes, overlooked by elegant Parisian bourgeois apartment blocks, when they were set upon by two Africans and three Arabs. They were not badly injured, but at the hospital their mothers were told by the staff that such attacks, carried out not for gain but for the sheer pleasure of revenge upon the hated comfortable French, were now commonplace.

How strange it is to go to the bakery every day, and be charmed by the politeness of ordinary people and the suavity of everyday life in France, and yet be thinking concurrently that the time for some serious repression may not be far off!

Mr. Dalrymple, a contributing editor at City Journal, is the author, most recently, of "Our Culture, What's Left of It: The Mandarins and the Masses" (Ivan R. Dee, 2005).

Europe Can Take Pride In Defending Cartoons (NYT)

By Roger Cohen International Herald Tribune

The New York Times, February 11, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0014483

What should we call it? Anti-Denmarkism? Or anti-Danism? The fact is Denmark, with its bike-riding commuters and sensible social democracy, its dairy farms and Lego factory, never figured much in the hatred stakes. The right expression is elusive.

But I suppose one will have to be found now that four months of global gestation have birthed a cartoon conflagration offering proof, if any were needed, that something is rotten in the state of the world.

Of course, problems arising from perceived insults to the Prophet Muhammad are nothing new since political Islam entered its current effervescence. It was precisely on this charge, in 1989, that the author Salman Rushdie earned Ayatollah Khomeini's fatwa calling on "zealous Muslims" to kill him.

Still the fact that a dozen cartoons - drawings, really - of the Prophet Muhammad that appeared in the Danish daily Jyllands-Posten on Sept. 30, 2005, have led in these early weeks of 2006 to a dozen deaths in Afghanistan, the burning of the Danish Embassy in Beirut, riots in Gaza, and appeals for calm from the White House, suggests the rising anger between the West and the Islamic world.

Yes, anger. Western societies are increasingly exasperated at seeing the Muslim perpetrators of suicide bombings, beheadings and other violence against "infidels" or "apostates" justified or sanctified through references to Islamic texts, be they the Koran itself or the traditions of the Prophet.

These societies are ever more dismayed when they see Islamic radicals, be they from Al Qaeda or agents of Iran's permanent theocratic revolution, claiming to represent a more authentic or pure Islam than the great mass of moderate Muslims. And they wonder why that great mass seems so passive before this affront.

The West, particularly Europe, is also angry that some of the essential liberties and principles of its way of life - not least the equality of men and women, the rights of homosexuals, and freedom of speech - appear unacceptable to some of the growing but estranged Islamic communities in their midst.

The compatibility of a Western liberal, democratic society and Islam as a source of law is widely questioned, especially when the thuggery of a male street mob is a frequent expression of the political exploitation of that law.

As for the Islamic world, particularly in the Middle East, its accumulated frustrations of a post-colonial period marked generally by the imposition of the sorts of brutal one-party states defeated in Europe either in 1945 or 1989 have been sharpened by the West's occupations of Afghanistan and Iraq.

At some level, these Western invasions have revived the age-old confrontation between the Caliphate and Christendom, first experienced in Islam's initial period of expansion into Spain and other parts of Europe, later in defense against the Crusades.

The defense of a notion of pure Islam and Shariah law against what are portrayed as the modernizing and corrupting force of a valueless West identified with the United States, Israel and now Europe has become a powerful jihadist rallying cry.

Of course, it did not take the West's arrival in Afghanistan and Iraq to ignite these sentiments: the attack of Sept. 11, 2001, is proof of that. But the challenge of these inchoate democratic models to the repressive societies bordering them has provoked growing ferment.

Spontaneous demonstrations are an oxymoron in Syria: The holy outrage over the cartoons in the streets of Damascus reveals the lengths to which a regime that once massacred members of the Muslim Brotherhood will go. In Iran, and in the Gaza and West Bank of Hamas, the public fury is also one measure of political unease.

All this restiveness is naturally projected into the Muslim communities of Europe, whose sense of exclusion, justified perception of prejudice and under-representation in politics have produced strong resentments.

It is against this backdrop that the decision of Jyllands-Posten, and later other European papers, to publish the depictions of Muhammad must be seen. If the initial publication was a provocation, it was also a willed one, an act of defiance, a statement that Europe will not be cowed by fear into putting such sacrilegious images off limits.

As Denmark's principled prime minister, Anders Fogh Rasmussen, has put it: "I will never accept that respect for a religious stance leads to the curtailment of criticism, humor and satire in the press."

Rasmussen is right; Europe has to make clear where it stands on its freedoms. And what, say critics, of anti-Semitic cartoons, or insulting depictions of Roma? Why are they not published, too? Are images offensive to Muslims not just a reflection of Europe's disdain for Islam?

DOJ_NMG_0014484

These arguments might carry more weight if radical Islam were not one of the most potent global forces today, its fanatical followers invoking precisely the words or traditions of the Prophet to justify heinous acts.

By what right can such acts, and their supposed holy inspiration, be ruled unfit material for the political caricaturist or satirist? If moderate Muslims will not rise in unison against this abuse of their religion, it is inevitable that Western observers will seek to express their unease.

And what is to be made of all this outrage emanating from Arab societies where the caricaturing of the Jew is commonplace, the anti-Semitic tract "The Protocols of the Elders of Zion" finds wide credence, and certain media regularly express the view that the Holocaust never happened, or was exaggerated, or was a deserved fate for the Jews?

Repressive Middle East regimes have endured in part through such manipulation of their people's ire. In many respects, this outcry is just another example. It is precisely because the difficult Afghan and Iraqi experiments are also attempts to show respect for different religious and ethnic groups that they are creating such disquiet.

Part of that anger has now been channeled into Danish-inspired Muslim anti-Europeanism. But the burning of EU flags, rather than the Stars and Stripes, should be a source of pride to Europeans. It suggests that Europe stands for something after all.

Clash Of Civilization (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 11, 2006

As a way of addressing the Islamist threat to civil liberties in Europe, the Danish cartoons of the prophet Muhammad were hardly ideal. The right to mock a religion may be absolute, but so is the right to publish most forms of pornography: Neither is appropriate in a serious publication. That applies whether the religion is Islam, Christianity or any other, and whether the cartoons are being published for the first time or reprinted elsewhere as acts of solidarity in the face of an implied threat.

But after the attacks on Western embassies in Beirut, Damascus and Tehran, the murder of a Catholic priest in Turkey, the death of at least a dozen people throughout the Middle East in anti-Danish rioting and protests in Europe in which Muslim demonstrators urged a "real Holocaust" on the West, questions about press freedom seem almost quaint. What we are dealing with here is something else entirely.

That something else might be called the premodernism of much of modern-day Islam, meaning the apparent unwillingness of too many Muslims to place reason above "honor" and deal proportionately with intellectual provocations. The Western philosophical tradition is founded on the belief that the execution of Socrates for blaspheming the gods of Athens was an injustice. When British Muslims carry placards reading "Butcher those who mock Islam," they are making their differences with that tradition depressingly plain.

Such premodernism is also on display among those Muslims who have forgotten the reciprocal obligations that the principle of "respect for religion" requires. We'll take the Islamic clerical establishment at its word that Islam forbids pictorial depictions of Muhammad -- and look forward to their fatwas against the anti-Semitic caricatures routinely featured in the Arab and Persian press.

Yet mass demonstrations almost never represent mainstream public sentiment in the West. Why then should we take it as given that they do among Muslims? Every society has its silent majorities, but it's only in democracies that those majorities exercise a decisive influence. If Islamic societies seem premodern and violent, this surely has something to do with the fact that most Muslim countries today are places where there is no democracy; where silent majorities stay silent; where, to adapt W.H. Auden, "only the man behind the rifle has free speech."

So it has been in the case of the cartoons, which were first published in September, to the fairly muted protests of Danish Muslims. Ambassadors of 10 Muslim countries demanded that the Danish government "take all those responsible to task," apparently forgetting that, unlike in their own countries, Danish authorities do not serve as press censors. Around the same time, an Egyptian newspaper reprinted the cartoons without drawing any noticeable wrath from Muslim clerics.

It was only after a December meeting of the 56 member states of the Organization of Islamic Conferences -- all but a handful of which are dictatorships or absolute monarchies -- that the "outrage" really took wing. No surprise here: as Sari Hanafi of the American University in Beirut told the New York Times, these autocracies made use of the cartoons (the most offensive of which were fabrications) as a way of showing that the expansion of freedom and democracy in their countries would lead inevitably to the denigration of Islam. From there it was but a short hop to the airwaves of al-Jazeera (owned by the Emir of Qatar), whose in-house cleric, Yussuf Qaradawi, a member of the fundamentalist Muslim Brotherhood, issued a fatwa calling for a "day of anger."

DOJ_NMG_0014485

Put simply, what we have witnessed isn't the proverbial rage of the Arab street. It's an orchestrated effort by illiberal regimes, colluding with fundamentalist clerics, to conjure the illusion of Muslim rage for their own political purposes. The Iranian mullahs seek to discredit Denmark as it assumes the rotating presidency of the U.N. Security Council, where Iran's nuclear program is being discussed. The secular Allawite regime in Syria wants to shore up its ties with the Sunni religious establishment, especially now that Bashar Assad's former vice president has declared a government in exile. The Saudis want to put behind them the latest stampede at the annual Hajj, where some 350 pilgrims were killed.

And in Europe, clerics and self-styled "community leaders" with close links to the Saudi government or the Brotherhood want to assert their dominance over populations that have yet to find their social or economic place in the mainstream of European life, as November's riots in France showed. The fact that European governments seem easily cowed by threats of violence has only made the problem worse.

In all the uproar, we find it telling that the two places where Muslim communities have shown restraint and moderation is in the United States and Iraq. American Muslims are overwhelmingly middle class, upwardly mobile and not very susceptible to the atavistic urgings of distant dictatorships. In Iraq, an unsilent majority has repeatedly made its views plain about the religious fanatics who demand to speak in their name. Just imagine the kind of anti-Western protests that would be taking place there now if Saddam were still in power.

There's a lesson in this for those who would have us believe that what this cartoon conflagration represents is a conflict of civilizations. There is a conflict all right, not between civilizations, but within one, and it pits those who would make Islam barbaric and those who would keep it civilized. In that struggle, the heirs of Socrates and the heirs of al-Farabi must make common cause.

US Worries Syria Still Blocking UN Hariri Inquiry (REU)

By Irwin Arieff

Reuters, February 11, 2006

Washington remains concerned about Syrian obstruction of a U.N. inquiry into the killing of a former Lebanese prime minister and is watching the matter closely, U.S. Ambassador John Bolton said on Friday.

Bolton spoke with reporters after meeting with Serge Brammertz, the Belgian prosecutor now leading the U.N. investigation of Rafik al-Hariri's assassination in a Beirut truck bombing last February 14.

Brammertz, the former deputy prosecutor of the Hague-based International Criminal Court, took over the investigation last month from German Detlev Mehlis, who had led the probe since June.

With the first anniversary of the murder rapidly nearing, no one has yet been formally accused of killing Hariri.

Several individuals identified as suspects have been detained by Lebanon, and Mehlis, in interim reports to the U.N. Security Council, has implicated senior Syrian intelligence officials and their Lebanese allies in his death.

Syria has repeatedly denied any role in the killing but promised full cooperation after a U.N. Security Council resolution adopted in October demanded it cooperate with the investigation or face unspecified further action.

Damascus has since allowed U.N. investigators to question several Syrian officials but has rejected a request to question Syrian President Bashar al-Assad, raising the possibility of a future showdown with the council.

Bolton said he did not want to discuss the specifics of his talks with Brammertz but told reporters:

"Our concern is that the Syrian obstruction of the Commission's investigation remains. And that is going to be an issue we watch very closely."

Asked when Brammertz would next report to the Security Council, Bolton said the investigator was "aware of the urgency of the situation ... that is in large measure occasioned by the deliberate obstruction of the crime scene of the Hariri assassination, and obstruction of justice that's going on."

DOJ_NMG_0014486

"I think any prosecutor would tell you that each day that goes by in the effort to reach a conclusion on the crime, makes it more difficult," he said.

Still, the U.N. investigative team has the resources and cooperation it needs from the government of Lebanon and was "continuing to make progress," he said.

Turin's Muslims Try To Keep A Low Profile (LAT)

By Tracy Wilkinson, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, February 11, 2006

Some would protest the prophet cartoons but dare not, citing a fear of deportation. But others are using the Olympic Games to make a point.

TURIN, Italy — Like Muslims in many parts of the world, members of the Islamic community here in the host city of the Winter Olympics would gladly hit the streets to protest cartoons satirizing the prophet Muhammad.

But Muslims here say they have been under such fierce surveillance lately by Italian police that they don't dare.

"Either you shut up or you are sent away," said Abramo Haj, a Moroccan restaurateur who has lived in Italy for 26 years. He was standing on the sidewalk here outside a makeshift mosque whose vocal imam was expelled by Italian authorities in September.

Instead of protests by Muslims, Turin, in the run-up to the Olympics, has seen daily demonstrations by a diverse assortment of activists, environmentalists and leftists.

The largest demonstration yet came Friday, hours before the opening ceremonies of the Games. Hundreds of people gathered outside the University of Turin humanities building and along streets where runners bearing the Olympic flame were expected to pass. Repeatedly in recent days, protesters have managed to force the torchbearers to take detours en route to Turin.

Demonstrators sang protest songs, played drums that have come to symbolize the worldwide anti-globalization movement, waved Palestinian and Iraqi flags and burned a paper American flag. A huge red banner hung from the facade of the six-story university building proclaiming "Conflict lives here" — a play on the Olympics 2006 motto, "Passion lives here." Another banner declared: "Laura Bush, go home!" The first lady, who is heading the U.S. delegation to Turin, is scheduled to visit another part of the university today.

Still, the protests have remained relatively low-key. There have been no clashes with the police, who on Friday stood single file in riot gear with shields to block streets and prevent access to the flame's route.

And when Alberto Re, a famed Italian mountaineer, rappelled from the dome of Turin's landmark 500-foot-tall Mole Antonelliana carrying the flame in one hand, even some of the protesters paused and craned their necks to watch.

The demonstrators have a host of complaints: unemployment, a high-speed train that they say will ruin the environment, expensive Olympic venues that they say will become white elephants, corruption, the war in Iraq. Not every cause has an obvious Olympic link, but no matter.

"We are not against the concept of the Olympics; this is not a refusal of sports," said Mateo De Marchi, 19, who was handing out leaflets for the No-Olympics Committee. "It's against the structure of these Olympics … and the corruption," he said, referring to the way the Games have become dominated by big-spending multinational sponsors.

As he spoke, his comrades were lighting their own torch, made of aluminum foil, and using it to burn a Samsung banner.

"The Olympics will be a nice party," said Pino Larobina, 46, a worker at a Fiat-owned truck factory who was carrying an enormous red flag representing his labor union.

"But the fact is Turin is becoming a ghost town because of all the factories closing. When the Games are over, what will they have given the people of Turin, who each month cannot make ends meet?"

Protesters and other critics are especially incensed that Turin has spent $1.4 billion on the Games, which have a price tag of more than $4 billion. They believe that such extravagance will not translate into new jobs in an industrial city that relied so heavily on the now declining Fiat automaker.

DOJ_NMG_0014487

"We want to show the contradictions of the city," said university researcher Gippo Mukendi, 33, a communist who is helping organize the demonstrations. "On the one hand they have the Olympics, which makes the city look rich, but only a few people will earn money with the Olympics and nothing will really be left for the city."

Italian law enforcement, gearing up for the Games, spent many months focused on the possibility of terrorist attacks by Islamic radicals. Northern Italy has a large Muslim population, and a small number have been linked to international terrorist groups. Italian authorities say they have hundreds of potential troublemakers under surveillance. About 200 people suspected of belonging to terrorist cells have been deported in the last two years, officials say.

But more recently, the authorities have focused more closely on leftist groups and anti-globalization activists who seemed more determined to disrupt the Olympics.

On Friday, Interior Minister Giuseppe Pisanu again said the recent violence in the Middle East and South Asia over the cartoons could trigger an improvised attack by an individual. But, he said, neither Italy nor the foreign agencies assisting it had received indications of a planned action by terrorist groups.

The domestic "anarchists," as the government calls them, are a different matter, Pisanu told reporters in Rome. They seek "to take advantage, with spectacular acts, of the Olympics' world stage," he said. "We must take into account a general climate that is rather tense."

Italian Prime Minister Silvio Berlusconi, a right-wing politician running for reelection, said the anti-globalization demonstrators were "subversives" who should be stopped.

"The government could strike in a decisive way anyone who carries out subversive actions at the Olympics in Turin," he was quoted as telling a television talk show Thursday night.

More than 15,000 police officers and army troops, backed by NATO surveillance aircraft and an undisclosed number of Italian and foreign undercover agents, are patrolling Turin and the surrounding Alpine hills and valleys where the Olympics will unfold over the next two weeks.

US Mulling More Nuclear Talks Before Bush India Trip (BOS/REU)

The Boston Globe, February 11, 2006

WASHINGTON (Reuters) - The top U.S. negotiator on a landmark nuclear deal with India may soon visit New Delhi for talks on the troubled accord before President Bush visits South Asia next month, U.S. officials said on Friday.

The deal, agreed in principle last July, would give India access to long-denied civilian nuclear technology, including fuel and reactors, and the failure to resolve serious differences would mar Bush's trip, officials and experts say.

In exchange for access to the technology, India promised to separate its military and civilian nuclear facilities and open the civilian facilities to international inspection.

India's powerful nuclear establishment has raised objections to a "separation plan" the Americans insist must put more facilities under international supervision.

Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns, the chief negotiator who was in New Delhi last month, has discussed with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice making another trip over the next week or so, but they have not made a decision, a State Department official said.

"I think that's just the judgment that he and she have to make -- is this the right time for him to go," said the official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the discussions.

Central to the debate is India's fast breeder reactor program, which would process plutonium from spent fuel from India's existing heavy water reactors.

The chief of India's Department of Atomic Energy Anil Kakodar has complained that putting this program under international monitors would "shackle" his scientists and leave the country dependent on imported uranium.

The landmark accord was agreed in principle last July 18 but negotiating the details has proven tougher than many officials and experts expected. Bush and India Prime Minister Manmohan Singh are both under domestic pressure to protect their respective interests.

DOJ_NMG_0014488

"It's doubtful" there will be a resolution of the issue before Bush visits New Delhi in March, a second U.S. official working on the issue told Reuters.

N.Korea Wants Talks With US On Crackdown: Envoy (REU)

Reuters, February 11, 2006

North Korea wants bilateral discussions with the United States over a crackdown on its finances and cannot return to nuclear talks until Washington ends sanctions, an Indonesian envoy said on Friday.

The last round of talks on ending Pyongyang's nuclear programs, which involve the two Koreas, China, Japan, Russia and the United States, was held in November.

Washington, Seoul and others have stressed the financial issue is a separate issue from the six-party talks.

"They indicated to me they are willing to resume the six-party talks provided the United States lift its financial sanctions that have been applied recently to North Korea," said Nana Sutresna, an Indonesian presidential envoy who visited North Korea earlier this week.

"North Korea has said they want to meet bilaterally on this issue," he told reporters.

Sutresna met top North Korean officials including Pyongyang's number two official Kim Yong-nam.

Washington has offered to brief North Korean officials on the legal basis of its crackdown on companies it suspects of helping North Korea in activities such as counterfeiting.

North Korea has indicated that a briefing was not a high-enough level for the discussions and has sought a meeting between U.S. and North Korean envoys to the six-party talks.

A spokesman for North Korea's Foreign Ministry said in December the briefing offer amounted to "backtracking from the agreement on holding talks to find a solution to the issue."

Indonesia has long ties with North Korea and has been trying to work as a mediator between the two Koreas.

Brazil Poised To Join The World's Nuclear Elite (KRT)

By Jack Chang

Knight Ridder, February 11, 2006

RIO DE JANEIRO, Brazil - While the world community scrutinizes Iran's nuclear plans, Latin America's biggest country is weeks away from taking a controversial step and firing up the region's first major uranium enrichment plant.

That move will make Brazil the ninth country to produce large amounts of enriched uranium, which can be used to generate nuclear energy and, when highly enriched, to make nuclear weapons.

Brazilians, who have long nurtured hopes of becoming a world superpower, are reacting with pride to the new facility in Resende, about 70 miles from Rio de Janeiro.

Other countries enriching uranium on an industrial scale are the United States, the United Kingdom, France, Germany, the Netherlands, Russia, China and Japan.

The plant initially will produce 60 percent of the nuclear fuel used by the country's two nuclear reactors. A third reactor is in the planning stages. The government hopes to increase production eventually to meet all of the reactors' needs and still have enough to export, Brazilian officials said.

"We want to build new power plants and grow our enrichment program to be self-sufficient," said Odair Dias Goncalves, the president of Brazil's National Nuclear Energy Commission. "In the whole world, there's a big reinvestment in this area. Countries are turning back to nuclear energy."

The Resende plant's inauguration had been set for Jan. 20, but was delayed because construction wasn't completed, Dias Goncalves said. The plant may begin uranium enrichment without the hoopla later this month, officials said.

Unlike Iran, Brazil is considered a good global citizen that isn't seeking nuclear weapons, although its military ran a secret program to develop a nuclear weapon as recently as the early 1990s.

Still, some U.S. observers fear Brazil's program will encourage more countries to make nuclear fuel, raising the danger of nuclear weapons proliferation.

DOJ_NMG_0014489

The United Nations nuclear watchdog, the International Atomic Energy Agency, earlier this month reported Iran to the U.N. Security Council for failing for three years to disclose all aspects of its nuclear program to agency inspectors. Iran responded by restricting IAEA inspections, a move that stymies efforts to determine whether it's producing fuel for power plants or developing nuclear weapons.

Brazil's nuclear fuel needs, more than 120 tons of enriched uranium a year, don't warrant the country launching an industrial facility like Resende, especially with global supplies of the material running high, said Lawrence Scheinman, a former U.S. arms control official.

"There really isn't much justification for new enrichment facilities unless countries have a very substantial number of reactors to be serviced and don't want to depend on outside suppliers," he said. "Neither Brazil nor Iran are in those positions."

Despite the criticisms, Brazil's program hasn't drawn the outcry that Iran's nuclear plans have. Disagreements between the IAEA and Brazilian officials in 2004 over access to the Resende facility were resolved within months.

Like Iran, Brazil has signed the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty, the global agreement to prevent the spread of nuclear weapons. All of Brazil's 20 facilities using nuclear material are under IAEA safeguards.

Brazilian officials have worked closely with the IAEA throughout Resende's planning and construction, Dias Goncalves said. IAEA inspectors have visited the facility 32 times.

Iranian officials, on the other hand, hid their uranium enrichment work for 18 years and obtained much of their technology from a Pakistani-led smuggling ring. Iran's leaders also have called for the destruction of Israel and are known sponsors of terrorism.

"There is no way to doubt the intent of our plans because they are completely open," Dias Goncalves said. "We have to take account of every gram of uranium used."

The road to Resende did hit a few bumps in 2004 when Brazil refused to let inspectors view centrifuges used in the enrichment process, saying they had to protect Brazilian-designed innovations vulnerable to industrial espionage.

After months of negotiations, the two sides agreed to a confidential inspection regime, which is still in place, an IAEA official said.

That agreement allows IAEA inspectors to examine material coming in and out of the centrifuges but not the equipment itself, which is covered by opaque panels, said Edson Kuramoto, president of the non-governmental Brazilian Nuclear Energy Association.

Brazilian energy adviser Rogerio Cezar Cerqueira Leite said the Resende plant will allow Brazil to sell to growing markets for enriched uranium and fuel a domestic nuclear program that's bound to expand.

"Without enriched uranium, you don't have nuclear technology," Cerqueira Leite said. "It's not just national prestige. If you don't make it yourself, you will always be behind in the nuclear race."

Many Brazilians see the eventual opening of Resende as the first step in the country becoming a world leader in nuclear research, said Cerqueira Leite. Brazil has the world's sixth largest deposit of uranium.

Teamwork By State And Defense (WP)

The Washington Post, February 11, 2006

The Jan. 21 editorial "A Transformation at State?" inaccurately suggested a lack of cooperation between the Defense Department and the State Department's Office of Reconstruction and Stabilization. The collaboration has been superb.

As The Post reported late last year, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice worked to secure funding in this year's defense authorization measure to support the deployment of State Department personnel in the event of crises. State now has $100 million this fiscal year and next to support such deployments.

In addition to its congressional efforts, the Pentagon has lent the State Department service members to provide military expertise. Combatant commands also have opened their exercises to State participation. Further, State and Defense officials jointly have developed concepts to deal with foreign contingencies.

These efforts hardly add up to a lack of cooperation. Instead, they illustrate a partnership worthy of the mutual respect our agencies have for one another.

DOJ_NMG_0014490

R. NICHOLAS BURNS
Undersecretary of State for Political Affairs
Department of State
ERIC S. EDELMAN
Undersecretary of Defense for Policy
Department of Defense
Washington

Rumsfeld Anxious Over Russian Arms Sales (FT)

By Demetri Sevastopulo And Peter Spiegel
Financial Times, February 11, 2006

Donald Rumsfeld, US defence secretary, on Friday expressed concerns about Russian arms sales but dismissed concerns that the US-Russian defence relationship was deteriorating.

"The US prefers that countries not sell weapons to countries on the terrorist list," Mr Rumsfeld said following a two-day meeting of Nato defence ministers in response to a question about Russian arms sales. Mr Rumsfeld said he was particularly concerned about arms sales to countries such as Iran and Syrian that the US says are supporting the insurgency in Iraq.

The Pentagon last week released a report which said the US "views with increasing concern [Russian] sales of disruptive weapons technologies abroad and actions that compromise the political and economic independence and territorial integrity".

US-Russia relations have recently deteriorated further following the decision by Moscow last month to cut off gas supplies to Ukraine. Last year, Russia angered the US when the Shanghai Co-operative Organisation – a group that comprises China, Russia, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Tajikistan and Uzbekistan – called on US forces to withdraw from Central Asia.

In July, Uzbekistan ordered the US to withdraw from its Karshi-Khanabad (K2) base. The US is currently negotiating with Kyrgyzstan to continue using Manas air base outside Bishkek.

Mr Rumsfeld refused to discuss his private meeting on Friday with Sergei Ivanov, the Russian defence minister. But one US official said a separate meeting between Mr Ivanov and other Nato defence ministers was "the most candid discussion in a long time".

While Mr Rumsfeld raised concerns about the arms sales issue, he dismissed concerns that the relationship was deteriorating. Russia also recently announced it would sell air-defence missile systems to Belarus, an autocratic neighbour whose increasing closeness to Moscow has raised concerns. Mr Ivanov yesterday defended the sales, saying such anti-missile systems were sold by Russia to "dozens of countries throughout the world".

"It is in all its functions a defensive weapon and Belarus is an ally," Mr Ivanov said. "We have to recognise Belarus' right to defend itself. This has nothing to do with our relationship with Nato."

Several of Nato's defence ministers also pushed Mr Ivanov on Friday on Russia's cut-off of gas supplies to Ukraine, raising concerns that Moscow was using its energy assets as geo-strategic bargaining chips. Mr Ivanov defended Russia's position, saying it was only fair to force Kiev to pay market prices for Russian gas, arguing the dispute was "not only the suppliers responsibility".

On gas supplies, Mr Ivanov said Russia would continue to meet its contractual responsibilities. "We continue to sell gas at a loss to ourselves, but we certainly do not have any intention to rip up any contracts that run through 2006."

Mr Ivanov also acknowledged that he had discussed the idea of withdrawing from the Intermediate Nuclear Forces treaty with Mr Rumsfeld, but said neither Moscow nor Washington were currently considering the move.

"When we signed the treaty, nobody besides the US and USSR possessed these missiles," Mr Ivanov said. "I don't think anyone even in their worst dreams could imagine missile technology could spread so quickly. It's just a fact of life. I think you may see all countries have them except Russia and the US."

18 Killed As Militants Fight Russian Force In Town (NYT)

By Alexander Nurnberg
The New York Times, February 11, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0014491

MOSCOW, Feb. 10 — A clash between armed militants and security officers in a village in the Stavropol region of southwestern Russia ended Friday evening after more than 24 hours of sporadic fighting, with 12 militants and at least 6 security officers dead.

On Friday night, the local bureau of the Interior Ministry reported that the security operation, which officials said involved "routine preventive passport checking," was continuing. Officers searched other homes in the area, afraid that some militants might still be at large.

The clash ultimately involved about 300 law enforcement officers, including special forces with armored vehicles and other heavy weaponry. One civilian and five security officers were wounded and were hospitalized Friday evening.

According to official reports, the battle began in the village of Tukui-Mekteb as militants opened fire from inside a house, initially killing two police officers. They moved between buildings during the fighting.

Ramazan Khaldayev, a local resident, said the police had first appeared in the village as part of an investigative "mop up" operation. Mr. Khaldayev's home and a neighbor's were searched before gunfire broke out unexpectedly at another house, he said.

As the fight drew to a close on Friday, some security officials denied that they had been unprepared for a battle. The local branch of the Federal Security Service informed Interfax and other news agencies that security forces "had been following this group" as suspected terrorists for some time.

After the clash, security officials argued that they had successfully thwarted an impending terrorist attack. Viktor Barnash, director of the Stavropol region's Anti-Organized Crime Directorate, said the operation had "managed to prevent events of a terrorist nature that would have been similar to Beslan," the southern Russian city where 331 people, more than half of them children, died after a three-day siege by Chechen militants in 2004.

Stavropol has been largely unscathed by the conflict in neighboring Chechnya, but Tukui-Mekteb, which is near Neftekumsk, is not far from the war-torn republic and has been the site of counterterrorist operations in recent years. In February 2002 a militant blew himself up with a hand grenade when discovered by the police, and in September of that year an arms cache was discovered about nine miles from the village.

Trade Showdown Looms As S.Korea Tells US: "No Rice" (REU)

By Kang Shinhye

Reuters, February 11, 2006

South Korea said on Friday that rice should be excluded from a free trade pact with the United States, drawing a line in the debate on one of the most sensitive areas of upcoming talks between the economic powerhouses.

Washington and Seoul appear to be heading for a showdown on the issue even before the opening of formal negotiations on a free trade agreement, which is expected in May.

The chief U.S. agricultural negotiator said on Wednesday that Seoul must open its long-protected rice market under any deal.

But a top South Korean agriculture official said on Friday that the country was not going to back down on its demand for rice to be exempted.

"We will keep our principle of not giving up the rice market in the free trade talks with U.S.. The idea of being self-sufficient in rice has long been part of the national sentiment," Kim Duck-ho, director of Agriculture Ministry's free trade talks bureau told Reuters by telephone.

"The United States knows quite well that rice is a very sensitive issue in South Korea. If Washington keeps demanding the opening of the country's rice market, a free trade agreement between two countries would be very difficult to reach," another official of the ministry said.

Analysts said agriculture will be one of the toughest sectors for negotiation in the trade deal, especially because of intense opposition from South Korean farmers to liberalization.

South Korean farmers and activists have staged many violent protests against measures to open up the local farm market. They were also at the forefront of often-violent protests at a World Trade Organization meeting in Hong Kong two months ago.

DOJ_NMG_0014492

Two-way goods trade between the United States, the world's largest economy, and South Korea, ranked 11th in the world in 2004 by the World Bank, totaled more than $72.5 billion in 2004, with Seoul enjoying a $19.8 billion surplus, according to government figures.

The United States currently sells around $2.4 billion a year in agricultural products to South Korea, which has an average duty on farm products of 50 percent to 60 percent, according to a senior U.S. trade official.

A recent Korea Rural Economic Institute report said that U.S. agricultural exports to South Korea could more than double under a free trade pact, resulting in the loss of up to 130,000 jobs.

South Korea has agreed with nine rice-exporting countries to increase its quota of imported rice incrementally to 8 percent of its total consumption by 2014 from 4 percent in 2004.

In return for that deal, reached in 2004 under the auspices of the World Trade Organization, South Korea won an additional 10-year delay on implementing more extensive liberalization measures for its rice market.

Internet Censorship (WSJ)

By Amy Schatz

The Wall Street Journal, February 11, 2006

Web Firms Face Grilling on China

Executives from Google Inc. and other Internet companies head to Capitol Hill next week, where they will become feature players in an awkward debate: Are U.S. companies giving in to China too easily?

Last month, Google announced an agreement with the Chinese government to censor search results from its Chinese site. It was the latest Internet company to accede to the Chinese government's censorship restrictions, following Cisco Systems Inc., Microsoft Corp. and Yahoo Inc.

The hearing will likely produce more embarrassing publicity for the companies, and it may drive legislative momentum among lawmakers concerned about China's influence on the U.S. economy. Congressional aides are expecting a standing-room-only crowd, and the reception from politicians may be chilly.

"I was asked the question the other day, do U.S. corporations have the obligation to promote democracy? That's the wrong question," says Rep. Chris Smith, the New Jersey Republican and chairman of the House human-rights subcommittee that is holding the hearing. "It would be great if they would promote democracy. But they do have a moral imperative and a duty not to promote dictatorship."

Mr. Smith plans to introduce legislation next week that would impose restrictions on Internet companies seeking to expand into China but also provide some legal protection from Chinese demands.

The bill would require U.S. Internet companies to keep email servers used for Chinese traffic offshore. That would help prevent the Chinese government from compelling the release of Internet user data. The bill also calls for creation of an office inside the State Department that would make an annual determination about which countries are restricting Internet use. It would provide a framework for users to pursue legal action against U.S. Internet companies over privacy violations.

The disclosures about Internet companies cooperating with the Chinese government are having a wider political impact. Last week, Sens. Lindsey Graham, (R., S.C.) and Byron Dorgan (D., N.D.) cited Internet companies' efforts to help the Chinese government monitor citizens' online activity as a reason to permanently revoke China's most-favored-nation trading status.

Ironically, the controversy comes as Google, Yahoo and others are fighting for "Internet freedom" in the U.S. Google is resisting a Justice Department request for information on user searches to help prosecute violations of a federal child-pornography law. Meanwhile, the company has joined competitors to resist plans by telephone and cable companies keen on exerting more control over Internet lines, which has led to concerns about discrimination and content blocking.

Inside China's Angry Villages (LAT)

By Anthony Kuhn, Anthony Kuhn, The China Correspondent For National Public Radio, Recently Visited Panlong And Taishi

The Los Angeles Times, February 11, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0014493

AT A ROADSIDE store across the street from a kindergarten in Panlong village, a local man sat beside his motorcycle having a soft drink and chatting with a visiting reporter on the recent violence the village had experienced.

"Does political power really come from the barrel of a gun?" he asked, questioning Chairman Mao's famous dictum. "Is the gun pointed at the enemy or at the people?"

Such talk seems out of place in Panlong, in the heart of the Pearl River Delta. The delta is in southern Guangdong province, one of China's wealthiest, most industrialized regions. The Cantonese focus on making money instead of talking politics, and their resistance to central government control, is aptly summed up in the popular saying, "The sky is high and the emperor far away."

But Panlong is just the latest village in Guangdong to be racked by violent protests. Peasants blocked a highway to protest what they saw as inadequate compensation for land seized from them by the government. Riot police broke up the demonstration. Similar clashes erupted in December in Dongzhou village and last summer in Taishi village.

Is Guangdong's turbulent present a preview of the rest of the country's future? One recent academic study found that as industrialization and urbanization increase the demand for rural land, developed coastal provinces like Guangdong are increasingly becoming the site of violent clashes over land-use rights.

And unrest is clearly on the rise in China as a whole. There were 87,000 civil disturbances last year — 238 a day — compared with just 8,700 in 1993, according to police statistics. Many involve peasants protesting the confiscation of their land for development purposes, but they are often equally angry about environmental degradation and official corruption. Protests by the urban poor against large-scale layoffs and predatory developers are common.

The rural clashes are evidence of the government's failure to allow farmers the means to resolve their grievances through the press or the courts. They also bespeak a failure of the government's standard tactic for quelling mass dissent: punishing protest organizers while buying off rank-and-file demonstrators with concessions.

In the villages, it's not hard to see the tension below the calm surface. Police and security agents sit in booths at the entrances to Panlong and Taishi, although most people can enter during the day. Dongzhou reportedly remains surrounded by checkpoints where police search vehicles for fugitives.

But villagers are obviously fearful about telling their story to outsiders. Panlong locals speak of being hauled off to lengthy government-run "meetings" or "classes" aimed at forcing them to maintain silence about the clashes. Some village residents say police tap their phones. Chinese media have largely been barred from reporting on the clashes, and the local government has declined requests by foreign journalists to travel to these villages. I entered Panlong and Taishi freely but was picked up by police on my way out of both villages. Authorities deleted my digital pictures of Taishi. Reporting without official permission remains illegal in China.

Over the Chinese New Year, state-run television showed pictures of President Hu Jintao frying rice cakes in the impoverished old revolutionary base of Yan'an. His message was that China will build a prosperous "new socialist countryside" by investing in rural infrastructure and basic public services.

About time, say Chinese economists and rural experts, who have suggested such measures for years. Peasants account for two-thirds of China's population yet receive just 20% of all medical services and similarly low percentages of education and social security spending. Correcting this imbalance without offending urbanites will be a delicate task, to say the least.

Even if spending in rural regions is increased, much of it is unlikely to filter down to the peasants, given the endemic state of official corruption. Chinese experts are pessimistic about the central government's willingness to break the entrenched alliance of local business interests and corrupt officials. Until that happens, local officials will continue to pocket bribes in exchange for giving state-owned land to developers at cut-rate prices, leaving farmers landless, destitute and angry.

The government could do a lot to alleviate rural tensions by increasing farmers' rights: the right to move to the cities without being denied the same benefits as urban dwellers; the right to form farmers' associations to protect their interests; and the right to recall elected village officials who fail to represent those interests. Last year, residents of Taishi tried to exercise that very right, which is already enshrined in national law. The government responded with riot police.

Travel Restrictions Could Upset Trade, European Commission President Warns (PPG)

DOJ_NMG_0014494

By Dan Fitzpatrick, Pittsburgh Post-Gazette

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, February 11, 2006

European Commission President Jose Manuel Barroso defended the relevancy of the 25-nation European Union and called for the United States to ease travel limitations on 10 new member countries in a speech at the University of Pittsburgh yesterday.

The restrictions -- which deny visa waivers to certain European citizens -- could upset transatlantic trade, he said.

Both the United States and Europe have "much to lose if protectionism rises and globalization's wings are clipped," said the commission president, speaking to a packed ballroom at Pitt's Alumni Hall in Oakland. "We need to ensure that the transatlantic economy remains competitive."

Business groups want the United States to open its visa-waiver program to Greece and nine other countries that joined the European Union in 2004, allowing applicants to stay here for three months without a visa.

Europe represents 7 percent of the world population but its exports and imports collectively represent more than 20 percent of all world trade. As many as 14 million jobs depend on the transatlantic relationship between Europe and the United States, Mr. Barroso said.

"I appreciate the efforts already made by the U.S. here but we must ... end this situation of discrimination against the new member states," added the former Portuguese premier.

As president of the European Commission, Mr. Barroso represents 457 million citizens and 25 countries. But following French and Dutch rejection last year of the European Union's first constitution, there are open questions about the future and effectiveness of the continental alliance. To be ratified, the charter needs approval of all 25 member states.

He admitted the French and Dutch votes prompted "much soul-searching" and that "scare stories" warned of paralysis or "even the end of the Union."

Beyond that, critics are concerned about Europe's sluggish economy, high unemployment rate and low productivity rates. There are divisions among the member countries as to solutions -- some want to keep social protections in place; others want more free-market reforms.

Responding to the questions of relevancy and addressing the ivory-tower image of the EU, Mr. Barroso said the Union needs to focus less on bureaucracy and be more responsive to the everyday problems of its citizens, emphasizing jobs, economic growth and the fight against terrorism and global pandemics.

He also wants European governments to put more money into education and research and adopt a common energy policy that emphasizes alternative fuels and reduces Europe's dependence on oil and natural gas.

"Europe needs to embrace change, and not forego the benefits of globalization," he said.

In response to a question from a student, Mr. Barroso said the Union also should do more to foster cultural and religious tolerance, oppose violence categorically and remain faithful to the principle of freedom of expression.

In closing remarks, Mr. Barroso encouraged the audience to think long-term about the Union and its sometimes slow integration efforts. It was only 60 years ago, he noted, that the Nazis' Polish concentration camps were liberated. And as recently as 15 years ago, several countries in Europe still were under totalitarian control.

Even 10 years ago, there was mass carnage in the Balkans.

"Now, we are 25 free democratic counties living together in peace."

G8 'fails To Meet Gleneagles Pledges On Debt' (FT)

By Fiona Symon

Financial Times, February 11, 2006

Group of Eight countries have so far failed to fulfil their high profile commitment to cancel all eligible heavily indebted poor countries' debts to the Industrial Development Agency, the International Monetary Fund and the African Development Fund, according to a report by Toronto University.

G8 countries have completed under half the policy goals they set themselves at the Gleneagles summit last year, according to the interim report published ahead of this weekend's meeting of finance ministers in Moscow.

DOJ_NMG_0014495

The university, which has been monitoring the group's compliance with its pledges since 1996, reported that overall compliance was nevertheless at the highest level in four years.

In the six months since Tony Blair, George Bush and their G8 counterparts convened in Scotland, their governments have satisfied the 21 priority commitments they made at the meeting 47.3 per cent of the time, the university's G8 Research Group calculated.

But on the issue of debt cancellation, which was the headline issue at the summit, all eight countries were awarded the lowest score of zero.

The report notes that some pledges take longer to fulfil than others and that the debt cancellation issue must be regarded as a work in progress. In previous surveys, however, pledges on debt relief have been awarded the highest compliance rates, so this interim score of zero marks a "significant shift", the report points out.

The G8 scored a perfect 100 per cent on implementing pledges on the Middle East, renewable energy and climate change, but less well, at 67 per cent, on commitments to help build Africa's capacity on trade and inward investment (67 per cent compliance).

On the Middle East, main commitment was the stimulation of a global financial contribution of up to $3bn a year over the next three years.

On renewable energy, the group's "perfect" compliance reflected leaders' commitments to develop markets for clean energy technologies, increase their availability in the developing world and help vulnerable communities adapt to climate change.

Compliance on supporting the Education for All initiative, as well as those geared towards the development of cleaner, more efficient and lower-emitting vehicles were tied at 56 per cent. But the pledge to reduce Iraq's debt by implementing the terms of the November 2004 Paris Club agreement was only 25 per cent achieved.

The US scored the highest rate of compliance overall, at 71 per cent, followed by the UK, with a score of 67 per cent. Russia was the only G8 country to score in the negative range with an interim score of -14 per cent.

University of Toronto: G8 Research Group: Interim Compliance Report, February 9 2006

NATO Commander Fears Rapid-reaction Force Delay (REU)

By Will Dunham And Mark John

Reuters, February 11, 2006

NATO's top commander of operations said on Friday he doubted whether the alliance would have enough troops to declare a long-heralded rapid reaction force fully operational in October as planned.

A delay to the 25,000-strong NATO Response Force (NRF) would be a setback to U.S.-backed efforts to turn the alliance that was Europe's Cold War protector into an outfit able to launch itself into crisis spots around the world at days' notice.

NATO Supreme Allied Commander Europe, Gen. James Jones, in an interview with Reuters at a meeting of NATO defense ministers in Sicily, said NATO allies still had not come up with the final 25 percent of the troops due to serve in the force.

"The reason I'm not confident is it isn't resourced now," Jones said, when asked if he was confident it would be fully operational by October.

"As things stand now, I can't say that, missing 25 percent of a force, that I have a great deal of confidence that we're going to generate 25 percent as if by magic. I'm hoping to get there," he added.

One observer at the talks said U.S. Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld had offered U.S. troops to help plug the gap. Rumsfeld did not allude to any promise at a final news conference but said he was confident the NRF would start on time at full strength.

Washington previously held back from offering many troops because it wants European allies to provide the bulk of the NRF. Major contributors currently include Italy, France, Spain, Germany, Britain, the Netherlands and Norway.

AFRICAN EXERCISE SCALED BACK

Jones also said the alliance would scale back the first major maneuvers for the force, first proposed by Rumsfeld in 2002, in the Atlantic island group of Cape Verde this June.

DOJ_NMG_0014496

"We've downscaled the operation in terms of some of the manpower, which is really what costs a lot of money," Jones said. He said some 6,000 troops would take part instead of a planned 8,000, insisting it would still be a valid test.

A trial run of the NRF this winter in delivering aid to victims of Pakistan's earthquake highlighted divisions in the 26-nation alliance over funding and deployment, something the ministers were due to discuss in Sicily.

"NATO must not fritter away its resources on tasks for which other organizations are better suited. Although we would not rule out future humanitarian missions, NATO's core role is military," said a French official who requested anonymity.

That view is shared by other European countries, notably Spain. But others such as United States and Britain insist that in setting up an airbridge to deliver thousands of tonnes of aid in Pakistan, the alliance showed its mettle in such situations.

Aside from differences on when the NRF should be deployed, some nations are also unhappy about the way it is funded.

Spain in particular is aggrieved that the Pakistan operation cost it some 16 million euros ($19 million) because it happened to be one of the countries whose turn it was to provide military resources to the NRF when the relief mission was launched.

It has called for more of the NRF's costs to be financed out of shared NATO funds. But Britain, Germany and France are wary of the principle of more common funding within NATO, arguing it could deter nations from investing in their own national forces.

"We have not yet found an answer to that question," de Hoop Scheffer told a news conference.

U.N. Staff To Speak With U.S. Attorney (MINNST)

By NICK WADHAMS, Associated Press Writer

Minneapolis Star Tribune, February 11, 2006

UNITED NATIONS (AP) - The United Nations has notified several employees that the U.S. Attorney's Office wants to interview them as part of an investigation into alleged corruption of its procurement division, according to a letter obtained Friday.

The letter from Maria Vicien Milburn, the director of the U.N. General Legal Division, does not outright ask the staffers to meet with the U.S. Attorney for the Southern District of New York, but says the U.N. "has a duty to cooperate" with investigations.

The Associated Press obtained the letter late Friday. The names of the recipients were not disclosed.

The criminal investigation into the U.N. procurement system has already led to a guilty plea from one U.N. employee, Alexander Yakovlev, who admitted in August to wire fraud and money laundering.

An audit by the U.N.'s Office of Internal Oversight Services in January found "substantial evidence of abuse in procurement for peacekeeping operations" that led to financial losses. In 2005, the U.N.'s Procurement Department handled almost $2 billion in purchasing for the peacekeeping department.

The letter, dated Wednesday, says that Secretary-General Kofi Annan has allowed the staffers in question to be interviewed "on a voluntary basis," with diplomatic immunity intact.

In mid-January, the United Nations ordered eight staff members to take paid leave as part of the investigation, including two senior procurement officials.

Press Freedom Boosted In Indonesia (WP)

By Ellen Nakashima

The Washington Post, February 11, 2006

Supreme Court Overturns Ruling Against Magazine Editor

JAKARTA, Indonesia, Feb. 10 -- In a ruling hailed by press freedom advocates, Indonesia's Supreme Court ruled Thursday that the editor of a prominent weekly magazine did not defame a powerful businessman. The court overturned a lower court ruling and threw out the editor's one-year prison sentence.

"This is good for press freedom in Indonesia," said Eddy Suprapto, president of the Alliance of Independent Journalists. "It's not just good for us, but for the people."

The central Jakarta district court had sentenced the editor, Bambang Harymurti, 48, to one year in prison in September 2004 for defamation and "inciting unrest" after the magazine, Tempo, published an article suggesting that Tomy Winata, a banking and real estate tycoon, could stand to gain from a suspicious fire that gutted a large market in Jakarta. An appeals court upheld the decision.

DOJ_NMG_0014497

In overturning the lower court decision, the Supreme Court set a precedent by using a 1999 press law rather than the criminal code to review the case. The press law is based on the public's right to be informed and on principles of fairness in reporting.

"The press is the fourth estate," and its function must be protected, said Justice Djoko Sarwoko.

Indonesian courts are not bound by precedent, but Harymurti and his defense team say they hope to use the decision to educate journalists, judges and prosecutors.

"I hope this will become like New York Times v. Sullivan ," said Harymurti, referring to a 1964 ruling that became a cornerstone of press freedom in the United States.

Indonesia's news media, lively if somewhat undisciplined, are trying to strengthen the institution of journalism in a society molded by decades of authoritarianism. Harymurti's appeal was a bright note in a period in which press freedom has been under fresh attack. Plaintiffs continue to sue reporters for up to $1 million in civil libel suits. A new regulation bans local broadcasters from directly relaying news from foreign television and radio stations. For the moment, though, Harymurti's supporters just want to enjoy the victory.

Tempo is often likened to Time magazine, and Harymurti's case drew international attention, with observers flying in from Australia, Asia and Europe to attend his trial.

The case's high profile was beneficial, said Janet Steele, a media professor at George Washington University who is in Jakarta on a Fulbright fellowship. "It made a lot of people think: Should a journalist ever go to prison for doing his job?"

Thursday "was just a really happy day," said Steele, author of "Wars Within," a book about Tempo during part of the 32-year rule of the former dictator Suharto.

Experts Fear Spread Of Avian Flu In Africa (KRT)

By Shashank Bengali

Knight Ridder, February 11, 2006

NAIROBI, Kenya - Nigerian authorities on Friday battled Africa's first known outbreak of deadly bird flu as experts warned that the virus already could have spread through farms in the country's rural north.

Health officials said they had quarantined large commercial poultry farms and had begun slaughtering poultry in three northern states where birds had been infected with the H5N1 virus, which can be lethal to humans.

They also bulldozed the ashes of 45,000 cremated chickens from a farm in Kaduna state, where the first outbreak was announced Wednesday.

No human cases have been reported in Nigeria. On Friday, two deaths were reported in China and Indonesia, adding to the 88 worldwide deaths previously confirmed by the World Health Organization since 2003.

With the virus having moved south from Europe and the Middle East in recent weeks, experts were closely watching developments in Nigeria, Africa's most populous country and a test for the continent's weak, underfunded public-health systems.

As it is in many African countries, poultry farming is a major industry in Nigeria and millions of people raise chickens in their backyards.

The virus can jump from birds to humans though close contact. If it mutates into a form that passes easily among humans, scientists fear that it could spark a global pandemic.

While Nigeria's response has won praise so far, experts were worried by news reports that tens of thousands of chickens had died mysteriously on large and small farms across northern Nigeria over the past month.

Boubar Seck, the West Africa bird-flu coordinator for the U.N. Food and Agriculture Organization, said that suggested that containment efforts might be too late.

The announcement Wednesday by the World Organization for Animal Health that the virus had landed in Nigeria came as the result of tests on birds that fell sick beginning Jan. 10.

It took that long for the samples to arrive at a laboratory in Italy and be analyzed. Meanwhile, Seck said, the virus probably was spreading.

DOJ_NMG_0014498

"We lost about three weeks," Seck said. "That's one of Africa's problems: We don't have the facilities. So while we were waiting, we don't know what was happening with the virus."

The Food and Agriculture Organization said Nigeria's neighboring countries should increase surveillance at their borders to keep out imported poultry. It called on Nigerian authorities to stop the movement of poultry and to close poultry markets in the affected states.

That's a major challenge in a country with a poultry population of 140 million, mostly free-ranging, according to Food and Agriculture Organization estimates.

The Nigerian government has launched a campaign to educate citizens about the virus and has offered farmers compensation for livestock losses. But some experts said that wouldn't persuade small-scale farmers - for whom chickens often are the only sources of income - to report sick birds immediately.

"On commercial farms the government compensation makes it easier to sacrifice birds," said E.B. Sonaiya, the president of the Nigerian branch of the World Poultry Science Association. "But the real problem is with free-ranging birds. They are all over."

Teams of experts from the World Health Organization and other international agencies have begun arriving to assist with the response. The United States has pledged $20 million in emergency aid, and the Food and Agriculture Organization and the U.S. Department of Agriculture have promised to send more than 1,000 sets of protective gear.

Europe 'still Not Ready For Flu Pandemic' (FT)

By Andrew Jack And Raphael Minder

Financial Times, February 11, 2006

If a flu pandemic were to hit Europe in the next few months, officials would struggle to cope with information overload and the absence of clear co-ordination and decision-making authority.

These were among the key lessons drawn from a secretive European Union-wide flu pandemic simulation held last November, the findings of which are being finalised ahead of a briefing to senior politicians in the weeks ahead.

"Common Ground", co-ordinated by the UK Health Protection Agency (HPA) on behalf of the European Commission, was designed to test the extent to which the EU could cope with a public health emergency.

Its findings will be particularly important as on Friday identified fresh outbreaks of the lethal H5N1 bird flu strain in Greece and Nigeria. China also reported its eighth human death from the virus.

Officials have stressed that the exercise was a considerable success, highlighting areas for improvement, and showing progress in areas identified as problems by a previous exercise.

But a number of participants have expressed concern with the shortcomings the simulation brought to light.

During the two-day simulation, participants drawn from government, international agencies and pharmaceutical companies across the EU struggled to discern what information was of value when a centralised computer network was inundated with reports of local outbreaks.

There was also confusion as to which agencies or governments would take critical decisions, such as the point at which vaccine manufacturers should switch from producing current seasonal flu doses to a pandemic strain.

A preliminary briefing obtained by the Financial Times stressed the need for "a simplification of the interaction between different co-ordinating institutions and agencies".

It also calls for efforts to improve "the functionality of the existing communications systems", the development of "visual information tools" and greater co-ordination between member states to share messages.

In a recent interview with the FT, Markos Kyprianou, the EU's health commissioner, lamented delays on the part of member states in informing Brussels about their preparations for seasonal vaccination. Orders had to be placed this month if vaccines were to be ready in time for next winter's flu, he said.

Mr Kyprianou said he fully recognised that responsibility for building up stocks was not a Brussels competence, but warned that Brussels could then not be asked to play a co-ordinating role – either for seasonal flu or for a possible emergency anti-viral stock for bird flu – if it was kept in the dark about national measures. "I need numbers,'' he said.

DOJ_NMG_0014499

¦ Following the discovery of infected swans in Greece, Brussels said on Friday that it had asked Greece to create a safety cordon, disinfect poultry farms and increase overall precautionary steps, pending the outcome of testing expected this weekend.

Bird Flu Spreads To Azerbaijan (NYT/REU)

By Reuters

The New York Times, February 11, 2006

BAKU (Reuters) - Avian flu was discovered in a new country on Friday with Azerbaijan finding the lethal H5N1 strain in wild birds floating dead on the Caspian Sea, and two more deaths from the virus were reported in China and Indonesia.

The virus was discovered in birds in the west African country of Nigeria earlier this week, extending what a senior United Nations official called a devastating spread from southern Asia over the past seven months.

Health experts are trying to warn people of the danger of a virus that is contracted through direct contact with infected birds. But episodes in countries as far apart as Nigeria and Iraq showed the struggle they face.

Nigerian poultry farm workers used their bare hands to throw dead chickens onto fires as village children stood by to watch in an area where H5N1 flu virus has been found.

In the southern Iraqi city of Amara, which is investigating a death that may have been caused by bird flu, children played among the dead fowl.

The World Health Organization (WHO) has already confirmed 88 human deaths since the virus re-emerged in late 2003 and the figure is steadily climbing.

Indonesia said a woman being treated for bird flu at a specialist Jakarta hospital had died and another patient was in critical condition.

The virus has also killed a 20-year-old woman farmer in the central Chinese province of Hunan, the Ministry of Health said.

There are fears the virus could mutate to a form where it can spread from human to human, sparking a pandemic in which millions could die.

David Nabarro, who heads the U.N. drive to contain the virus, said there was no evidence it had mutated to that point, but added: ``It's not far away."

SPREADING WESTWARDS

A senior scientist at the World Health Organization offered a glimmer of hope, saying a limited number of migratory birds appear to be spreading a single sub-strain of the H5N1 virus.

In theory, this could lower opportunities for the H5N1 to mutate into an easily transmissible form, according to Michael Perdue, an epidemiologist in WHO's global influenza programme.

``It could reduce the mutation level... You are less likely to have widespread mutation than if you had 20 strains hop-skotching across Asia."

Genetic sequencing of the virus found in chickens in northern Nigeria, completed late on Friday, showed it also closely matched that in poultry outbreaks in Turkey and China.

AZERBIAJAN HIT

Azerbaijan, a state that lies on a crossroads between Asia and Europe, reported its first outbreak of H5N1 on Friday.

Azerbaijan said the virus had been found in wild birds floating dead off its coast.

The birds were found in the Caspian Sea near the Absheron peninsula, which includes the capital Baku, and off the southern Massaly region, near the border with Iran, Emin Shakhbazov, deputy head of the country's veterinary service, told reporters.

Four children died in neighbouring Turkey last month from an outbreak of the virus.

NIGERIA CAMPAIGN

Villagers in Nigeria said their domestic poultry were dying too, reinforcing suspicions that bird flu may be present not only in large commercial farms but also in people's backyards in Africa's most populous country.

``We are working on this farm without taking care of our health, but what else can we do? We are calling on the government to come and help us," said Alhaj Danliti, the manager of the farm, which is a stone's throw away from the village.

DOJ_NMG_0014500

He said the farm had lost 10,000 chickens, almost its entire stock, and he did not know the nature of their disease. Several chickens collapsed and died with a yellow liquid leaking from their beaks.

Nigeria was urged to step up measures to control bird flu, clamp down on poultry trade and use culling, vaccination and movement controls where outbreaks occur.

``Control measures need to be intensified," the World Organization for Animal Health (OIE) and the U.N. Food and Agriculture Organization (FAO) said.

Preval's Lead Narrows In Haiti Election (REU)

By Jim Loney

Reuters, February 11, 2006

Former President Rene Preval could be headed for a runoff in Haiti's first election since Jean-Bertrand Aristide was ousted two years ago, according to the latest election results issued on Friday.

With about half the votes counted, Preval held 50.3 percent, just barely above the majority he would need to avoid a runoff on March 19. In results released on Thursday, Preval held 61 percent, when only 15 percent had been counted, and appeared on his way to an outright victory.

Another former president, Leslie Manigat, was in second place with 11.4 percent and industrialist Charles Baker held third with 8.3 percent, according to the results published on the Provisional Electoral Council's Web site.

Preval, a protege of Aristide and the favored candidate of Haiti's poor masses, was heavily favored to win Tuesday's election, in which Baker, the candidate of the impoverished Caribbean nation's wealthy elite, has asked for an investigation into possible fraud.

Baker said on Friday he had asked election officials to investigate whether people were allowed to vote more than once because voter lists were not followed. "We had a lot of (polling station) volunteers who said they saw people voting five times, seven times, eight times," he said.

International observers have said they saw some irregularities at polling stations but have not suggested the results were tainted by fraud.

A victory for Preval could prove unsettling to the United States, which worked to push Aristide from power two years ago. On Friday, Washington urged Preval, who maintained a low profile in his mountain hometown of Marmelade in the north, to oppose Aristide's return from exile in South Africa.

Preval inherited Aristide's strong support in the slums of Port-au-Prince and his possible victory concerned the wealthy elite who helped push Aristide from office.

Preval, who led the poorest nation in the Americas from 1996 to 2001, has not claimed victory. But he said earlier on Friday he was not surprised by the results known so far.

"During the campaign I felt the enthusiasm which would translate into a favorable vote for me," he told the Miami Herald and Reuters television in an interview.

Preval, 63, was president between the two terms of Aristide, a firebrand former Roman Catholic priest accused of despotism and corruption before he was driven out.

Although he has put some distance between himself and his mentor, Preval has said there is nothing to stop Aristide from returning to Haiti from his South African exile.

(Additional reporting by Oliver Ellrodt in Marmelade)

Awkward Start For Canada's New Leader (NYT)

By Clifford Krauss

The New York Times, February 11, 2006

TORONTO, Feb. 10 — Prime Minister Stephen Harper has gotten off to a shaky start in his first week in office, facing a rash of criticism for three cabinet appointments that appeared to compromise his past positions on making government more democratic and ethical.

DOJ_NMG_0014501

Mr. Harper, a Conservative, won a narrow victory and tenuous control of the House of Commons last month by promising that he would make Ottawa more accountable and that he would clean up after several Liberal Party scandals.

During the campaign Mr. Harper promised to halt the revolving door between the cabinet and lobbying firms, and work to transform the Senate, the upper house of Parliament, from an appointed body to an elected one.

While he was the leader of the opposition, he objected furiously last year when the Liberals lured one of his party's senior members into the cabinet days before a vote in Parliament that would probably have otherwise brought down the government of Paul Martin, who was the prime minister.

But this week Mr. Harper appointed an international trade minister who was elected only two weeks before as a Liberal, a defense minister who was once a lobbyist for military contractors and an unelected public works minister who must be appointed to the Senate to serve.

(Members of the cabinet must be members of Parliament; they are not subjected to ratification votes.)

Now conservative columnists are taking Mr. Harper to task for perceived hypocrisy, and members of the Conservative caucus who were passed over for cabinet posts are expressing bitterness.

"If you're going to break a promise, you might as well rub everyone's noses in it," wrote Andrew Coyne, an influential conservative columnist in The National Post. "He has demoralized his party's supporters. He has ruined whatever honeymoon he might have had with the press."

Mr. Harper defended his appointments as an attempt to bring the most qualified people into his cabinet.

He also said he wanted to include officials from Montreal and Vancouver, cities where the Conservatives won no seats in the House of Commons and that would have otherwise gone unrepresented.

"I expected some of the superficial criticism I've seen," he told The Vancouver Sun.

The most controversial of the appointments was of David L. Emerson of Vancouver, who was industry minister under Prime Minister Martin and was elected to the Commons last month on the Liberal Party ticket.

The local Liberal Party association has demanded that he return nearly $100,000 it spent on his campaign, resign and run as a Conservative in a special election. An online petition demanding his resignation has attracted thousands of signatures.

Mr. Emerson said he would not resign or return the money, arguing Wednesday in a conference call with reporters that he could best serve his constituents by giving them a voice in the cabinet as international trade minister. He said that he might run in the next election as a Conservative, but he also suggested that he was shaken by the sharp reaction to his party switch.

"If I knew politics would be as it has been, I wouldn't have run to begin with," he was quoted as saying. He said that his two children were being taunted in school over the issue.

Mr. Harper has promised that his first order of business will be enacting what he calls the Accountability Act, which would prohibit cabinet ministers and senior staff members from becoming lobbyists for five years after leaving office.

But his choice for defense minister is Gordon O'Connor, a retired brigadier general from Ontario, who from 1996 to early 2004 was a lobbyist for companies including Airbus, which hopes to sell tactical airlift aircraft to the Defense Ministry.

Conservatives note that the Accountability Act would not prohibit a former lobbyist from serving in government, and Mr. O'Connor said that he saw no conflict of interest.

Michael Fortier, a Conservative organizer in Montreal, did not run for the Commons in the last election. But Mr. Harper appointed him to the Senate so he could serve as public works minister.

The opposition parties are complaining that they will not be able to question Mr. Fortier on the floor of the House of Commons, as is customary with cabinet ministers, because he is not a member.

Countering criticism that he was backtracking from his promise to reform the Senate, Mr. Harper said that the appointment was only temporary and that Mr. Fortier would run for a Commons seat in the next general election.

Several members of the Conservative caucus in Parliament have criticized the cabinet choices, but most spoke behind closed doors or in comments to reporters that were strictly off the record.

One who spoke openly, Garth Turner of Ontario, reported to constituents in his blog that he had had an "unhappy" meeting with Mr. Harper afterward.

"Speaking of offices," he continued, "I'm expecting the whip will be assigning me a renovated washroom."

DOJ_NMG_0014502

Blair Seeks To Secure Political Legacy (AP)

By Danica Kirka

AP, February 11, 2006

BLACKPOOL, England -- Prime Minister Tony Blair on Friday urged his divided party to return to the core issues that unite it, appealing to delegates at Labour's centenary conference to back controversial reforms seen as a key test of his leadership.

Blair is struggling to rally his supporters behind reform proposals that have outraged some of the party faithful and spawned rebellion in his ranks.

He tried to overcome the divisions with a rhetorical appeal to the party's tradition of advocacy for working-class Britons, women and minorities, saying the best way to achieve long-held goals was to stay in power by enacting necessary and effective reforms.

"This is a moment to stand firm, to have faith that the changes we are making will, in time, work to our country's advantage and therefore to ours," he told cheering delegates. "Our party's history tells us that Labour is strongest when it is on the side of the people."

The prime minister worked to raise spirits flagging after a special election loss in a Scottish district that Labour easily won less than a year ago, although he didn't mention the election directly.

"We have to be the ones taking the hard decisions, meeting the challenges," Blair said. "That is how we won three elections. It is how we will, whatever the travails in government in the meantime, win a fourth term."

A Liberal Democrat defeated the Labour candidate in the Scottish vote Thursday night less than a year after a Labour candidate, who later died, won the seat by a 2-to-1 margin.

The defeat soured the mood of the conference in this aging coastal city, which will not decide key issues but offered Blair a chance to rally his party ahead of local government elections in May 2006.

His toughest domestic challenge lies in persuading the Labour faithful to accept reforms including a series of measures meant to improve Britain's state-funded schools.

Critics complain that state-backed schools are so inadequate that they thwart British competitiveness in the global economy.

Blair wants a return to a system granting schools more independence, and letting them be more selective about students they admit.

The mere notion has touched off a revolt in the Labour ranks, particularly among those who fear that spinning off more successful schools would set up a two-tiered system and bolster Britain's social divide.

Observers believe a defeat for the prime minister on the measures could set the stage for an early departure by Blair, who has said he will not stand for re-election.

"He could be defeated and go if he cannot get the education measures through," said Bill Jones, the author of the Dictionary of British Politics. "It would be such a huge political failure, he couldn't continue."

Blair also outlined his case for passing sensitive security laws facing Parliament next week, including a hotly debated measure on issuing national identification cards. Delegates packed into the conference hall often interrupted his remarks with applause _ particularly when he invoked the party's ethos of working for the common man.

"Everywhere our opponents seek to portray the government as out of steam," Blair said. "Yet, in reality, there is only one policy agenda in town: ours."

Even as Blair tries to shore up his position, he must consider his successor. Jones said that while treasury chief Gordon Brown is seen as the heir apparent, the transition may be far from smooth.

Other party stalwarts, such as Defense Secretary John Reid and Home Secretary Charles Clarke, may not be willing to step away quietly.

Labour's younger generation, such as David Miliband, Blair's former head of policy and now minister for communities and local government, may also stand, after long being touted as a future party leader.

Making Change From Revolution To Powerful Elite (WT)

DOJ_NMG_0014503

By David R. Sands, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, February 11, 2006

Just over a year ago, Yuri Lutsenko was manning the barricades and firing up the crowds in Kiev as a key tactician of Ukraine's "Orange Revolution."

This week, he was in Washington, meeting top U.S. officials and think tank scholars as the new government's minister of internal affairs, the most powerful law-enforcement post in the country.

"I was always sure that our democratic revolution would someday succeed, but I have to say never in my dreams did I consider that I would be one day sitting in this chair," Mr. Lutsenko said, speaking through an interpreter in an interview at the Ukrainian Embassy in Georgetown.

"I also think that a lot of the police officers who dealt with me when I was in the opposition never expected this either," the 42-year-old former electrical engineer added with a smile.

Mr. Lutsenko, a longtime activist against former President Leonid Kuchma, emerged as one of the most charismatic figures of the 2004-2005 Orange Revolution, which overturned a fraudulent presidential vote and vaulted pro-Western reformer Viktor Yushchenko to power.

With a street-rebel reputation and little administrative experience, Mr. Lutsenko was not the obvious choice to head one of the country's most powerful ministries, charged with everything from fighting corruption, terrorism and illegal immigration to overseeing Ukraine's widely resented traffic police.

"Frankly, it was absolutely unexpected for me when the president asked to take this post," he said.

He said the ministry has made good progress since he took over last February. Among his first acts were to dismiss the ministry's second in command, who heads the internal security forces, and the administrator of the traffic police.

About 2,500 police officers have been dismissed for failing to meet ministry standards and more than 600 criminal cases against officers have been referred to prosecutors, Mr. Lutsenko said. The ministry is also aggressively targeting official corruption.

Last month, three former Ukrainian police officers went on trial in the 2000 slaying of investigative journalist Georgy Gongadze. The long-stalled case proved critical in tarnishing Mr. Kuchma's rule both at home and abroad.

Mr. Lutsenko's Washington trip, which included meetings with top State Department, FBI and Department of Homeland Security officials, focused on joint cooperation on issues such as terrorism, immigration and narcotics trafficking. Kiev is also pressing for a bilateral extradition treaty, which the U.S. side has been reluctant to sign.

His trip came at a difficult moment for Mr. Yushchenko. In a nasty public break, his Orange Revolution ally, Prime Minister Yulia Tymoshenko, resigned as prime minister in August and is leading an independent bloc in hotly contested parliamentary elections next month.

Mr. Lutsenko acknowledged the uncertain political climate, but said he had no fears that the democratic, pro-Western ideals of the Orange Revolution were in danger.

"Politicians of every stripe in Ukraine now say they support those ideals," he said. "We have crossed the Rubicon and there is no going back."

DOJ_NMG_0014504

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 11, 2006 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Private Groups Seek Domestic Spying Papers (AP) 4
Carter Allowed Surveillance In 1977 (WT) 4
ABA President Urges Bush To Obey Spy Laws (AP) 5
Bar Association To Oppose Domestic Spying (CHIST) 6
Americans Say President Shouldn't Suspend Rights (REU) 6
The Shoe (Bomb) On The Other Foot (NSWK) 7
Terror Case In Buffalo Awaits Word On Wiretaps (NYT) 8
Convict In Al Qaeda Plot Seeks Case Review (WT/AP) 9
Attention In N.S.A. Debate Turns To Telecom Industry (NYT) 9
Justice Moves At Glacial Pace For `enemy Combatant' (CHIT) . 11
Bail Denied For Brooklyn Bookseller Accused Of Financing Terrorism (NYT) 12
U.S. Bookseller's Bail Revoked In Terror Case (FINDLAW/AP) . 13
Terror Trial To Start Despite Late Evidence, Defense Lawyers Say (FINDLAW/AP) 14
A Late Surprise For Lodi Defense (SACBEE) 14
Would-be Terrorist Got Cold Feet After Sept. 11 (DMN/AP) 16
Moussaoui Trial Difficult For Both Sides (MINNST) 17
'Vengeful Act' (NSWK) 18
Brit Treasury Chief Forms Terrorism Team (AP) 19
Syrian Accused Of Planning 2003 Attacks (LAT) 20

Patriot Act:

GOP Accepts Patriot Act Compromise (WT) 20
Hastert Backs Compromise On Patriot Act (AP) 21
Hastert Backs Deal On USA Patriot Act (REU) 22
Another Cave-In On The Patriot Act (NYT) 22

Homeland Response:

Mayor Miffed: The White House Never Calls (LAT) 23
U.S. Concludes 'Cyber Storm' Mock Attacks (AP-Y2) 24
U.S. Officials Defend Ploys To Catch Immigrants (NYT) 24
Arizona Plans To Tackle Illegal Aliens (WT) 25
U.S. Cites Rise In Violence Along Border With Mexico (NYT) 26
Border Wall May Be Boon For Smugglers (DMN) 27
Cross-Border Tunnel Found In San Diego (WP/AP) 28
More Medicines From Abroad Seized (LAT) 28
Ex-FEMA Head Says White House Knew About Levees (LAT).. 29
Brown Blames Superiors For Response To Katrina (WP) 30
Ex-FEMA Leader Faults Response By White House (NYT) 32
Brown Defends His Role In Response To Katrina (WT/AP) 33
Brown Blames Federal Infighting (BRA) 34
'We Were Realizing Our Worst Nightmare' (NOTP) 35
Blame Over Response To Katrina Intensifies (HCHRON) 37
Brown Says He Gave Bush Aide Early Warning On La. Flooding (BOS) 38
Brown Details Katrina Alerts (BSUN) 39
Brown: I Warned White House As Katrina Hit (AP) 40
White House 'warned Of Levee Breach' (FT) 42
Brown Warned White House Before Katrina Struck (REU) 42
Former FEMA Chief Blames Chertoff For Katrina Response (KRT) 43
Katrina Hearings Put New Pressure On White House (WSJ) 44
Stormy Dean Slams Bush: Points Finger For Katrina Deaths (BOSH) 45
Auditors Find Huge Fraud In FEMA Aid (NYT) 45
FEMA Tries To Pause La. Role (BRA) 46
U.S. Should Share Oil Royalties With States -Shell (REU) 47
Katrina's Unclaimed To Get Hometown Burial (WP) 48

War News:

Iran "Making Mistake" With Iraq Meddling: Rumsfeld (REU-Y2). 49
Bush - Annan Meet At White House (UPI) 50
General Says Training Of Iraqi Troops Suffered From Poor Planning And Staffing (NYT) 50
Iraqis Certify Election Results On A Day Of More Violence (NYT) 52
Iraq's Shiites Near Pick For Prime Minister (WP) 53
Shiite Coalition Struggles To Agree On A Prime Minister (KRT). 54
Shi'ites To Choose Premier Nominee (WT) 55
In Iraq, Carnage Amid Conciliation (LAT) 56
Neighborhood Peace A Casualty Of War (WP) 57
The Chiefs Of Baghdad (FT) 59
Tighter Borders Take A Toll In Iraq (WP) 62
Carroll Kidnappers Reportedly Set Deadline (AP) 63
Ex-C.I.A. Official Says Iraq Data Was Distorted (NYT) 65
Misuse Of Prewar Data Is Alleged (BSUN) 66
Ex-CIA Official Criticizes Use Of Intel (AP) 67
Book Casts Doubt On Case For War (LAT) 67
Ex-ambassador Says U.S. May Spend Decades In Iraq (COPLEY) 68

Corporate Scandals:

Executive Loses Case On Trading (NYT) 69
Insurance Scandal (WSJ) 70

Ex-Hollinger Official: Give Me My Stuff Back (CHIST) 71
Black Eager To Proceed With Fraud Trial (FINDLAW/AP) 71
Mistrial Declared In Second Cendant Fraud Case (FINDLAW/AP) 72

Criminal Law:

Cheney Role Risks Political Fallout (WSJ) 73
Abramoff E-Mail Plays Up Bush Contacts (AP) 74
Three More Lawmakers Tied To Abramoff (AP) 74
Lobbyist Confirms Talks With Reids Office (AP) 75
Dem Leader Faces Increasing Scrutiny In Lobbyist Scandal (HCHRON) 76
Abramoff Pressed GSA Contact On Getting Land (WP) 77
Abramoff's Charity Began At Home (LAT) 77
Reform Trend May Curb Casino Plans (MJS) 81
Executive Severance Is A Focus At Getty (NYT) 82
Getty Foundation Chief Resigns Amid Investigations (WP) 83
Munitz Steps Down As Head Of Getty Trust (LAT) 84
Another Getty Milestone (LAT) 85
U.S. Ambassador Hands Over Looted Art (MH) 86
Inmate Charged In Slayings Of 2 Who Identified Him In '81 Robbery (COLDISP) 87
Ex-Chinese Bank Managers, Wives Plead Not Guilty In Las Vegas (FINDLAW/AP) 88

Civil Law:

Investors Win $371.7 Million Over Seizure Of Meritor Savings Bank (AP) 88
Trial Bar Cleanup (WSJ) 89

Civil Rights:

Dad Slams Attack On Bush At King Rite (CBS) 90
Four Presidents And A Funeral (WSJ) 90
Racial Icons (NSWK) 92
A Fitting Funeral For Mrs. King (WP) 93
Affirmative Blackmail (WSJ) 94

Antitrust:

Senate Confirms Barnett As Assistant Attorney General (DOWJONES) 95
Microsoft Gets EU Scrutiny (BLOOM) 95
Regulators Approve Regis Acquisition (MINBIZ) 95

Environment/Indian Affairs:

EPA Budget Cuts Trouble Environment Groups (AP) 96
Power Plant Would Reuse Carbon Dioxide (NYT) 97
Plan Unveiled For Hydrogen Power Plant (LAT) 97
I'm For New Exploration And Production Of Oil (WSJ) 98
Kicking The Habit, All Over The World (LAT) 99
The Grass Station (NYT) 100
Congress's Duty On Energy (NYT) 100
Gov't Seeks $16M Unpaid Mine Safety Fines (AP) 101
Hydra-Headed Hybrids (WP) 102
Tribal Land Issue Heating Up In Scott County (MINNST) 102
Interior Ordered To Pay Cobell Lawyers (ICT) 104

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Drug Smuggling Air Marshals? (TIME) 105
F.B.I. Raids In Puerto Rico (NYT/AP) 106
Everett Men Arrested In Connection To Fire (SEATIMES) 106

Tax:

Cheney Says New Unit Will Prove Tax Cuts Boost Revenue (WP) 107
White House Calls For New Tax-Cut Analysis Unit (WSJ) 108

Congress-Administration:

Bush Tells Nervous GOP To Focus On Economy (AP) 108
Ethics Scandals Cast Shadow On GOP Retreat (LAT) 109
Bush Rallies Scandal-rocked Republicans (REU) 111
Bush Reveals Rationale Behind Surveillance (AP) 111
Bush Defends Spy Program In Speech At GOP Meeting (BSUN) 112
Bush's Job Approval Stuck Near Bottom (AP) 113
Republican Speaks Up, Leading Others To Challenge Wiretaps (NYT) 114
White House Effort To Defuse GOP Qualms On Security May Isolate Democrats (KRT) 115
RNC Chief Defends Domestic Wiretaps (WP) 116
RNC Chief Slams Democrats (WT) 117
Republican Chief Outlines 2006 Strategy (AP) 118
House Republicans Search For Legislative Plan (WSJ) 118
Results Of Poll On Public Attitude On Bush (AP) 119
Bob Barr, Bane Of The Right? (WP) 120
Oops! - Bush Unaware Mikes Were Still On (AP) 121
Smoking Dutch Cleanser (NYT) 122
Irresponsible Rhetoric, Again (WP) 123
Gov't Budget Surplus Hits $21B For Jan. (AP) 123
Democrats Cry Foul Over Clerical Error In Bill (WT) 124
Just-Passed Budget Bill May Be Challenged (AP) 125
Bush's Budget Cuts Elderly Nutrition Plan (AP) 126
New House Leader Seeks To Rebuild Unity (AP) 126
Ethics Scandal Looms Over Republicans' Meeting (REU) 127
A Wink And A Nod For Lobbying Reform (NYT) 128
Censorship Is Alleged At NOAA (WP) 128
And On The Eighth Day, God Went Green (NYT) 129
No Regrets For Miers (DMN) 130
Roberts Off To Quiet Start At Court (AP) 132
Political Skeletons, Cut And Pasted (NYT) 133

Other News:

In D.C. Visit, Perry Is Of Two Minds On Spending (HCHRON). 133
Talent Changes Stem-cell Stance (KCS) 134
Steele Apologizes For Holocaust Remarks (WP) 136
Steele Apologizes For Stem Cell Remarks (BSUN) 137
Seeing A Jungle In Congress, A Lion Of The Nixon Era Runs Again (NYT) 138
Photo With Bush Helps Congressman's Rival (AP) 140
Democrats Look For Gains In Governors' Races (REU) 140
Motivation Behind Crime Study Questioned (WP) 141
Trade Gap Hits Record For 4th Year In A Row (WP) 142
U.S. Trade Deficit Sets Record, With China And Oil The Causes (NYT) 143

DOJ_NMG_0014506

US Trade Deficit Balloons To Record $726bn (FT)..... 145
U.S. Trade Deficit Ballooned To A Record In 2005 (WSJ)..... 145
TODAY'S MARKETS (WSJ)..... 147
Stocks Close Higher On Rebound (LAT)..... 148
Proxmire Remembered For Humble Handshakes (MJS)..... 149
Of Mouse And Women (WP) 149
Rice: Russia Should Send Message To Hamas (AP) 152
Rice Talks To Russian Foreign Minister Over Hamas (REU) ... 153
France Backs Putin On Speaking To Hamas (NYT) 153
Israel And US On Back Foot Over Hamas (FT) 154
Putin's Flexible Definition Of Terrorism (TIME)..... 155
The Face Of Hamas Rule May Not Include Its Own (LAT) 155
Cleaning Up Corruption Tops Palestinian Agenda (WT)..... 157
Islamic University Is The Intellectual Center For Hamas (KRT) 158
Muslims' Fury Rages Unabated Over Cartoons (WP)..... 159
Muslims Clash With Police Over Prophet Cartoons (WT/AP) ... 160
U.S. Seeks Right Tone In Cartoon Uproar (AP) 161
NATO Seeks Closer Ties With Middle East (AP) 162
Evangelical Christians Express Little Sympathy For Muslims'
Outrage (KRT) 163
Danish Producers Feel Heat Of Cartoon Boycott (FT)..... 163
For Danish Firms, Boycott In Mideast A 'Nightmare' (WP)..... 165
A Most Un-Danish Dane (FT) 166
Danish Cartoon Editor On Indefinite Leave (NYT)..... 167
An Update From France . . . (Remember Those Riots?) (WSJ) 169
Europe Can Take Pride In Defending Cartoons (NYT) 170
Clash Of Civilization (WSJ)..... 171
US Worries Syria Still Blocking UN Hariri Inquiry (REU) 172
Turin's Muslims Try To Keep A Low Profile (LAT)..... 173
US Mulling More Nuclear Talks Before Bush India Trip
(BOS/REU) 174
N.Korea Wants Talks With US On Crackdown: Envoy (REU) .. 174
Brazil Poised To Join The World's Nuclear Elite (KRT)..... 175
Teamwork By State And Defense (WP) 176
Rumsfeld Anxious Over Russian Arms Sales (FT)..... 176
18 Killed As Militants Fight Russian Force In Town (NYT)..... 177
Trade Showdown Looms As S.Korea Tells US: "No Rice" (REU)177
Internet Censorship (WSJ)..... 178
Inside China's Angry Villages (LAT)..... 179
Travel Restrictions Could Upset Trade, European Commission
President Warns (PPG) 179
G8 ‘fails To Meet Gleneagles Pledges On Debt’ (FT) 180
NATO Commander Fears Rapid-reaction Force Delay (REU) . 181
U.N. Staff To Speak With U.S. Attorney (MINNST)..... 182
Press Freedom Boosted In Indonesia (WP) 182
Experts Fear Spread Of Avian Flu In Africa (KRT)..... 182
Europe ‘still Not Ready For Flu Pandemic’ (FT) 183
Bird Flu Spreads To Azerbaijan (NYT/REU)..... 184
Preval's Lead Narrows In Haiti Election (REU)..... 185
Awkward Start For Canada's New Leader (NYT)..... 185
Blair Seeks To Secure Political Legacy (AP)..... 186
Making Change From Revolution To Powerful Elite (WT)..... 187

DOJ_NMG_0014507

TERRORISM NEWS:

Private Groups Seek Domestic Spying Papers (AP)

By Pete Yost

AP, February 11, 2006

A federal judge said Friday he was considering setting a deadline for the Justice Department to produce records on the Bush administration's warrantless surveillance program or to explain in court why it was refusing to do so.

U.S. District Judge Henry Kennedy said he was convinced the public would suffer irreparable harm if the government dragged its feet in a lawsuit filed over access to the documents.

The lawsuit was filed by three private groups who say the government is engaging in a pattern of delay and should be compelled to provide information on the underlying legal rationale for the surveillance and the scope of the eavesdropping program.

Congress is having difficulty getting the same information.

The Electronic Privacy Information Center, the American Civil Liberties Union and the National Security Archive asked for the material shortly after The New York Times revealed the eavesdropping on Dec. 16. The only response from the government was agreeing to put the requests on a fast track for decision-making.

Justice Department lawyer Rupa Bhattacharyya said the government would respond starting March 3, but she said she had no information on when the process might be completed.

The Freedom of Information Act says the government shall respond "as soon as practicable."

"Seven, eight, nine, 10 years? Is that the government's position?" Kennedy asked the Justice Department attorney.

Timing will depend on complexity, "and in this case there are a lot of complexities," Bhattacharyya said of the highly classified program.

David Sobel, an attorney representing the three groups, said the Bush administration was taking the position that putting FOIA requests on a fast track for consideration frees the government from a specific 20-day deadline for responding that applies to ordinary requests.

"The government is suggesting it's now open-ended," Sobel complained.

Given the highly classified nature of the program, the Bush administration is likely to withhold all information about it.

Part of the groups' effort is aimed at obtaining an index of what documents exist, enabling them to present arguments in court that some of the data be declassified and released to the public.

"It's fashionable to suggest that the courts don't have a significant role to play in these matters, but I urge the court to exercise its authority to hold the government accountable," Sobel told the judge.

Sobel was referring to the fact that the Bush administration bypassed the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court and is conducting the program without obtaining court warrants.

Several of Kennedy's colleagues at the federal courthouse who are current or former members of the intelligence court have expressed concern about the program.

Kennedy was appointed to the court by President Clinton in 1997.

Carter Allowed Surveillance In 1977 (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, February 11, 2006

Former President Jimmy Carter, who publicly rebuked President Bush's warrantless eavesdropping program this week during the funeral of Coretta Scott King and at a campaign event, used similar surveillance against suspected spies.

"Under the Bush administration, there's been a disgraceful and illegal decision -- we're not going to the let the judges or the Congress or anyone else know that we're spying on the American people," Mr. Carter said Monday in Nevada when his son Jack announced his Senate campaign.

"And no one knows how many innocent Americans have had their privacy violated under this secret act," he said.

The next day at Mrs. King's high-profile funeral, Mr. Carter evoked a comparison to the Bush policy when referring to the "secret government wiretapping" of civil rights leader Martin Luther King.

DOJ_NMG_0014508

But in 1977, Mr. Carter and his attorney general, Griffin B. Bell, authorized warrantless electronic surveillance used in the conviction of two men for spying on behalf of Vietnam.

The men, Truong Dinh Hung and Ronald Louis Humphrey, challenged their espionage convictions to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 4th Circuit, which unanimously ruled that the warrantless searches did not violate the men's rights.

In its opinion, the court said the executive branch has the "inherent authority" to wiretap enemies such as terror plotters and is excused from obtaining warrants when surveillance is "conducted 'primarily' for foreign intelligence reasons."

That description, some Republicans say, perfectly fits the Bush administration's program to monitor calls from terror-linked people to the U.S.

The Truong case, however, involved surveillance that began in 1977, before the enactment of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act (FISA), which established a secret court for granting foreign intelligence warrants.

Democrats and some Republicans in Congress say FISA guidelines, approved in 1978 when Mr. Carter was president, are the only way the president may conduct surveillance on U.S. soil.

Administration officials say the president has constitutional authority to conduct surveillance without warrants in the name of national security. The only way Congress could legitimately curtail that authority, they argue, is through an amendment to the Constitution.

The administration's view has been shared by previous Democrat administrations, including Mr. Carter's.

When Mr. Bell testified in favor of FISA, he told Congress that while the measure doesn't explicitly acknowledge the "inherent power of the president to conduct electronic surveillance," it "does not take away the power of the president under the Constitution."

Jamie S. Gorelick, deputy attorney general in the Clinton administration, agreed. In 1994 testimony before the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence, Miss Gorelick said case law supports the presidential authority to conduct warrantless searches and electronic surveillance for foreign intelligence purposes.

Earlier this week, however, Mr. Carter said it was "ridiculous" for Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales to say the spying is justified by Article II of the Constitution.

Republicans say they welcome such criticism because it proves Democrats can't be trusted with national security.

"Just when you thought that the Democrats' image of being soft on defense issues couldn't get any worse, enter the sage wisdom of President Jimmy Carter to save the day," said Brian Nick, spokesman for the National Republican Senatorial Committee.

ABA President Urges Bush To Obey Spy Laws (AP)

By Anna Johnson

AP, February 11, 2006

The president of the nation's largest lawyers group said Friday that President Bush should comply with federal law when conducting electronic surveillance of Americans and refrain from scaring people into giving up their civil liberties in the fight against terrorism.

"Times of conflict have often put stress on America's liberties. It's a time when we get frightened and are tempted to take shortcuts with the Constitution," American Bar Association President Michael Greco said. "But I personally reject the false choice that is being offered Americans that they must give up their liberties to have security."

Greco, who spoke at the ABA's midyear meeting in Chicago, also released a proposal recommending that the association oppose further electronic surveillance in the U.S. for foreign intelligence purposes that does not comply with the 1978 Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act. If the ABA's policy-making body approves it in a vote set for Monday, the proposal will become official policy of the 400,000-member group.

The proposal was recommended by an ABA task force that examined whether Bush was authorized to give the National Security Agency the power to eavesdrop on the international communications of Americans with suspected ties to terrorists without first obtaining warrants from a secretive court set up under FISA.

"We're calling on the president ... to explain to Congress what this program is about so Congress can exercise its constitutional duty of checking to make sure that the president's powers are being executed within the framework of the Constitution," Greco said.

The warrantless eavesdropping program has prompted a heated debate about presidential powers in the war on terror since it was first disclosed in December.

Bush on Friday continued his defense of the program, saying he concluded that it was needed to fill a gap in U.S security and that lawyers in the White House and at the Justice Department signed off on its legality.

DOJ_NMG_0014509

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales insisted earlier this week during a Senate Judiciary Committee hearing that Bush was fully empowered to eavesdrop on Americans without warrants as part of the country's war on terror. He cautioned Congress not to end or alter the program.

But committee chairman Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., suggested the program's legality be reviewed by a special federal court set up under FISA. Committee Democrats also have generally contended that Bush acted illegally in permitting the domestic surveillance.

Bar Association To Oppose Domestic Spying (CHIST)

By ABDON M. PALLASCH, Legal Affairs Reporter

Chicago Sun-Times, February 11, 2006

The American Bar Association is preparing to weigh in against President Bush's eavesdropping on telephone calls going into and out of America.

Contrary to polls showing Americans divided on the issue, "our poll shows that average Americans and legal scholars alike agree that the awesome power of the government to penetrate citizens' most private communications must not be held in one set of hands," ABA President Michael Greco said Friday at group's annual midyear meeting in Chicago. "To prevent the very human temptation to abuse the power, there must be checks and balances in the form of oversight by the courts and Congress."

The ABA will debate and vote Monday on a resolution calling on Bush to follow the law that requires him to go before a judge in a closed courtroom to get permission to eavesdrop.

"When the voice of the legal profession in the United States, the American Bar Association, with our 407,000 members has spoken on issues in the past, people have listened, and I'm gratified the administration has listened," Greco said.

Act amended '4 times since 9/11'

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales has complained to a U.S. congressional panel that following the "FISA" (Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act) courts would not allow investigators the "nimbleness" to listen to all conversations involving al-Qaida members.

"If the president or the administration believe that FISA hampers their 'nimbleness' or their ability to move quickly, then this is a good reason to go back to Congress and say, 'We need more speed ... we need to amend the FISA act,'" Greco said. "Congress has amended the act four times since 9/11."

Asked if he thought Bush's announcement Thursday that the administration foiled an al-Qaida attack on Los Angeles weakened his argument against unapproved eavesdropping, Greco said, "The attack -- at this point the alleged attack -- on Los Angeles is disturbing, but it doesn't change the fact that neither now nor ever in the future should we be frightened into sacrificing constitutional freedoms because something happened or something is about to happen. I personally reject the false choice that is being offered Americans that they must give up their liberties to have security."

Justice Department officials could not be reached for comment.

Asked if he thought Gonzales had the "legal acumen and knowledge" to be attorney general, Greco stood silent for a moment, then asked, "You think I should answer that question?"

Finally, he said, "The issue isn't whether the president can eavesdrop on calls from al-Qaida or to al-Qaida. The issue is whether he can wiretap calls without any accountability from Congress."

The ABA's poll of 1,000 people found 77 percent agreed the president should not be able to suspend constitutional rights without approval of a court or Congress. Earlier polls by other organizations found higher percentages of Americans willing to let the president eavesdrop on calls he thought might be related to al-Qaida.

Americans Say President Shouldn't Suspend Rights (REU)

By Andrew Stern

Reuters, February 11, 2006

Most Americans believe a president should not be allowed to suspend constitutional guarantees in order to fight terrorism, a poll released on Friday said.

The poll, taken for the American Bar Association in the wake of the controversy generated by President Bush's domestic spying program, found the public divided over whether government eavesdropping on personal communications could ever be justified.

"As our poll shows, and legal scholars agree, the awesome power of government to penetrate citizens' most private communications must not be held in one set of hands," Michael Greco, the group's president, told a news conference.

"To prevent the very human temptation to abuse this power there must be checks and balances in the form of oversight by the courts and Congress," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0014510

"I personally reject the false choice that is being offered Americans that they must give up their liberties to have security. We must protect both, and we can protect both," he added.

With the administration refusing to provide details of the eavesdropping program, which was a closely held secret until recently, the extent of any violations are unclear, Greco said.

The program, authorized by Bush in 2001, allows the National Security Agency to monitor the international phone calls and e-mails of U.S. citizens to track people with suspected ties to al Qaeda and other militant groups.

The White House has said warrantless eavesdropping is legal under Bush's Constitutional powers as commander-in-chief and a congressional authorization for the use of military force adopted days after the September 11 attacks.

The program bypassed secret courts created under the 1978 Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act that grant warrants. Greco said if those courts do not work as they should, the administration should ask Congress to amend the law.

The Harris Interactive telephone survey of 1,045 adults taken February 3-6 found that 77 percent have reservations about the fundamental issues raised by the eavesdropping controversy, the ABA said in releasing the survey.

Of that group, 52 percent agreed that a president should never be able to "suspend the constitutional freedoms of people like you." Another 25 percent said constitutional freedoms should never be suspended unless authorized by a court or Congress.

Only 18 percent said a president could lift constitutional guarantees any time if it was necessary to protect the country and another 5 percent said they did not know or declined to answer. The poll had a margin of error of plus or minus 3 points.

A second question asking what would justify government eavesdropping on personal communications without a search warrant or court order found 45 percent saying such action would never be justified.

A further 48 percent were divided, with 22 percent saying it would be OK based on "an anonymous tip that you may be helping to plan a terrorist attack in the United States" and 21 percent saying it would be justified based on "someone's suspicion that you may be sending money to a terrorist organization."

ABA delegates plan to vote on Monday on a policy proposal calling on Bush "to abide by our constitutional system of checks and balances and respect the roles of Congress and the judiciary in protecting national security consistent with the Constitution." It also calls for a halt to the eavesdropping.

The Shoe (Bomb) On The Other Foot (NSWK)

By Jonathan Alter

Newsweek, February 11, 2006

President Bush's revelation about a foiled bomb plot shows the dangers of declassification for purely partisan purposes.

Poor Porter Goss. First, the longtime Florida congressman leaves his safe seat to become director of the CIA, only to find that he's been neutered by a new bureaucratic setup where he reports to John Negroponte, the director of national intelligence. Then he writes an op-ed piece decrying intelligence leaks in The New York Times on Friday, the exact same day as a story appears identifying today's biggest leaker of antiterrorism secrets in Washington—President George W. Bush.

For crass political reasons—namely to advance his position on the National Security Agency spying story—the president chose to use a speech to the National Guard Association to disclose details of a 2002 "shoe bomb" plot to blow up the U.S. Bank Tower, the tallest building in Los Angeles. While the plot had been revealed in general terms in the past, the White House this week arranged for Bush's counterterrorism adviser, Frances Fragos Townsend, to explain to reporters in a conference call exactly the kind of details that Goss claimed on the op-ed page helped the enemy. "We are at risk of losing a key battle," Goss wrote. "The battle to protect our classification system."

That system is at particular risk when it is exploited for political purposes. The president is allowed to declassify whatever he wants; that's one of the privileges of being president. So in this case—unlike the NSA's warrantless eavesdropping—there is no issue of Bush breaking the law. But let's be clear on what this was: a deliberate effort to use declassification for partisan purposes, in this case, defending the administration's policy on NSA surveillance, which Karl Rove says publicly will be a big part of the 2006 midterm campaign.

The White House made perfect political use of the twilight zone of intelligence. While Townsend did not explicitly claim that the NSA surveillance program had foiled the Los Angeles plot, she tried to imply that it might have played a role. "We use all available sources and methods in the intelligence community but we have to protect them," she told reporters. "So I'm not going to talk about what ones we did or didn't use in this particular case."

Let's get this straight. The president and administration officials will suddenly talk about details of the foiled plot—details that were highly classified until now. But they won't say if the controversial NSA program was involved. Given their new willingness to talk at length about the case, can anyone seriously doubt that had the NSA eavesdropping cracked this case, they would have mentioned that? Simply saying that the NSA helped foil the plot—if it had—would not have compromised "sources and methods." You can bet that if this were an NSA case, we'd know it.

DOJ_NMG_0014511

The chronology of Bush's politicizing of intelligence goes something like this: First, the president discloses classified information without any good reason to do so. Why now? It's not as if Los Angeles is hosting the Olympics or under some new threat. (To understand how hurried and political this disclosure was, consider the fact that Los Angeles Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa, a Democrat, wasn't briefed on the foiled plot and has been stiffed in his efforts to meet with the president about homeland security in his city, a problem that New York City Mayor Michael Bloomberg and other Republican mayors do not have). Then, by implying without stating that the NSA may have been involved, the White House uses sensitivity about classified information as a shield against finding out whether the NSA is relevant to the Los Angeles plot in the first place.

Goss, meanwhile, is left hanging out to dry: he seems to be calling for more criminalization of intelligence leaks in one part of the paper while the president leaks like a sieve in the other. Elsewhere, he makes a big distinction between whistleblowers who seek accountability through proper channels (they're right) and those who go to the media (obviously wrong). Feeling some pressure three quarters into his op-ed piece to offer even one example of how media coverage has jeopardized an intelligence operation, Goss hauls out the same chestnut Bush used in a press conference last month—the revelation that Osama bin Laden's satellite phone had been tapped. The implication was that once the evil American media revealed this fact, bin Laden stopped using the phone and was harder to catch. In fact, bin Laden gave up his satphone after President Bill Clinton used coordinates from the phone to bomb him in 1998. It was Clinton's missiles, not the media, that convinced the Al Qaeda leader he needed a more secure way to communicate.

Will the White House get away with using intelligence as a political weapon? Probably. Imagine if it were Clinton, not Bush, who decided to reveal classified information about the plot against Los Angeles in a politically convenient way. The rightwing gabfests would be having a field day, as well they should. But now the shoe bomb is on the other foot.

Terror Case In Buffalo Awaits Word On Wiretaps (NYT)

By David Staba

The New York Times, February 11, 2006

BUFFALO, Feb. 10 — A man accused of illegally wiring money to Yemen has asked a judge to determine whether any of the evidence against him was gathered secretly and without a warrant as part of the Bush administration's domestic surveillance program.

The suspect, Mohammed T. Albanna, 54, of Lackawanna, N.Y., just south of Buffalo, and two other men face charges that they ran a business that transferred $3.5 million from Yemeni-Americans to relatives in that country without the required permits.

Last month, Mr. Albanna's lawyer, Philip M. Marshal, asked Judge William M. Skretny of Federal District Court here to force prosecutors to reveal if secret surveillance by the National Security Agency was used. The no-warrant wiretaps were approved by President Bush after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks to hunt for evidence of terrorist activity and are now the focus of a debate over the extent of executive power.

Last week, the judge ordered an assistant United States attorney, Timothy C. Lynch, to produce a response from the Justice Department in Washington by Feb. 27.

Mr. Marshall said Wednesday that he possessed no evidence that no-warrant eavesdropping was involved in the case, but made the request after news of the National Security Agency program was made public in December.

"I don't know if they're going to say yes, no or 'We're not going to say,' " Mr. Marshall said. "If they don't give an answer by Feb. 27, the judge has ordered that someone from the Justice Department appear in his court. The judge is going to want to know why."

Mr. Lynch, who has been involved with the prosecution since the three men were indicted in 2002, said he had no knowledge of secret eavesdropping in the case. Prosecutors have not suggested that Mr. Albanna or his co-defendants were involved in terrorism. "I told the judge the only investigative techniques I know that were used in this case were interviewing witnesses, intercepting express mail packages and using court-approved wiretaps," Mr. Lynch said.

Mr. Albanna, an American citizen who runs a business that supplies candy and cigarettes to stores in the Buffalo area, said he and his co-defendants were part of an informal system, known as hawala, used to send money to people in countries lacking sophisticated banking and communications technology.

He was a spokesman for the Yemeni community in Lackawanna during the prosecution of six men who traveled to Afghanistan and participated in an Al Qaeda training camp in the summer of 2001 before returning to the Buffalo area. All six pleaded guilty to supporting a terrorist organization and are in prison.

A seventh man, Jaber Elbaneh — Mr. Albanna's nephew — remained in Yemen and was charged in absentia. The Justice Department issued a $5 million reward for his capture in 2003.

Mr. Albanna said Mr. Elbaneh's relatives in Lackawanna believed that he has been in custody in Yemen since late that year.

DOJ_NMG_0014512

Mr. Albanna was charged in the money-transfer case two months after the arrests of the six men made international headlines. He said Wednesday that he wondered if his high profile as a spokesman for those men was a factor in the federal investigation. "That's what we're trying to find out," he said.

Convict In Al Qaeda Plot Seeks Case Review (WT/AP)

By Matthew Barakat, Associated Press

The Washington Times, February 11, 2006

A Falls Church man convicted of joining al Qaeda and plotting to assassinate President Bush has joined the ranks of those seeking a review of their convictions based on concerns about Mr. Bush's post-September 11 eavesdropping program.

Attorneys for Ahmed Omar Abu Ali, 24, last week asked a federal judge to order prosecutors to divulge whether Abu Ali was ever a subject of the warrantless eavesdropping program that Mr. Bush ordered implemented shortly after the attacks in 2001. They also asked the judge to delay Abu Ali's Feb. 17 sentencing.

Born in Houston and raised in Northern Virginia, Abu Ali traveled to Saudi Arabia to attend college and was arrested by the Saudis in June 2003. He admitted joining al Qaeda and discussing numerous terrorist plots, including a plan to assassinate Mr. Bush and to return to the United States as the leader of a terror cell.

Abu Ali said he had been tortured into a false confession, but a U.S. District Court jury in Alexandria rejected his claims and in November convicted him on all counts. He faces a mandatory minimum sentence of 20 years and up to life in prison.

It is not clear how Abu Ali's case would have been affected by the eavesdropping program, if at all. Court testimony indicated that the Saudis arrested Abu Ali on their own initiative as part of an investigation into the May 2003 bombings in Riyadh that killed more than 30 people.

An FBI agent testified that Abu Ali had been under investigation in the United States, but that investigation preceded September 11, 2001, when authorities were investigating a group of Muslim men who used paintball games as a means to train for holy war around the world.

The defense motion, though, argues that Abu Ali was a likely target of the National Security Agency eavesdropping program because he was under government surveillance while the program was in effect and because the eavesdropping focused on al Qaeda.

Also, the law requiring prosecutors to turn over evidence gained from wiretaps is broad, so it's possible that any wiretaps involving Abu Ali should have been disclosed to the defense even if their contents were not central to the issues at trial.

The defense also wrote a letter to prosecutors seeking details about any undisclosed surveillance. In response, prosecutor David Laufman wrote that the government sees "no basis to stay Mr. Abu Ali's sentencing."

Attention In N.S.A. Debate Turns To Telecom Industry (NYT)

By Scott Shane

The New York Times, February 11, 2006

WASHINGTON, Feb. 10 — Though much of official Washington has been caught up in the debate over the National Security Agency's domestic surveillance program, one set of major players has kept a discreet silence: the telecommunications corporations.

Some companies are said by current and former government officials to have provided the eavesdropping agency access to streams of telephone and Internet traffic entering and leaving the United States. The N.S.A. has used its powerful computers to search the masses of data for clues to terrorist plots and, without court warrants, zeroed in on some Americans for eavesdropping, those officials say.

Now the companies are in an awkward position, with members of Congress questioning them about their role in the eavesdropping. On Thursday two Democratic senators, Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts and Russell D. Feingold of Wisconsin, wrote to the chief executives of AT&T, Sprint Nextel and Verizon, asking them to confirm or deny a report in USA Today on Monday that said telecommunications executives had identified AT&T, Sprint and MCI (now part of Verizon) as partners of the agency.

The two senators demand information that, if it exists, would be highly classified: details of secret N.S.A. requests for help and the number of people whose communications were intercepted.

In a Feb. 2 reply to a similar query from Representative John Conyers Jr. of Michigan, the top Democrat on the House Judiciary Committee, AT&T offered a careful response. The two-paragraph note did not deny that the company was assisting the agency.

DOJ_NMG_0014513

"Without commenting in any way on press reports," wrote Wayne Watts, AT&T's senior vice president and associate general counsel, "let me assure you that AT&T abides by all applicable laws, regulations and statutes in its operations and, in particular, with respect to requests for assistance from governmental authorities."

The Electronic Frontier Foundation, a nonprofit privacy group, has filed a class-action suit against AT&T maintaining that the company's cooperation with the agency is violating customers' privacy. The suit says the company is providing the N.S.A. "direct access" to its "key domestic telecommunications facilities," but does not offer proof.

December's disclosure of the N.S.A. program and the corporate role in it has trained an unusual spotlight on the extensive and secret cooperation between the government and communications companies.

The companies routinely assist law enforcement and intelligence agencies with eavesdropping authorized by court warrants, a task streamlined by a 1994 law requiring a back door for the government in every new telephone technology. The law, called the Communications Assistance for Law Enforcement Act, or Calea, has created a thriving "lawful intercept" industry for technology to make eavesdropping easier.

But for decades such cooperation has sometimes gone further. Federal law permits companies to intercept calls or e-mail messages without a warrant and protects them from lawsuits if a "certification" is provided by the attorney general or his deputies stating that no warrant is needed.

Such certifications may have been provided to companies assisting the N.S.A. program, because President Bush has said that he authorized it in a secret executive order to operate without warrants. Mr. Bush has said the program is aimed at international communications of people in the United States who are suspected of links to Al Qaeda.

The companies "are going to want to see an explanation of why it's lawful," said Kenneth C. Bass III, a communications lawyer in Washington who worked closely with the N.S.A. as a Justice Department official from 1978 to 1981.

Corporate cooperation with the agency is one of the government's most sensitive secrets, and neither company representatives nor N.S.A. officials would discuss it. "If the carriers could talk about this, they'd say, 'We believe we're doing this on a legal basis, and we think this is an appropriate role for us,' " said Michael J. Kleeman, a veteran telecommunications entrepreneur now at the University of California, San Diego.

Mr. Kleeman and other experts say the kind of cooperation now being provided by the companies has long been customary and is mirrored in many other countries. American telephone executives have traditionally seen their companies' cooperation with intelligence agencies as a patriotic duty, industry officials say. The officials say they have not heard of companies' receiving regulatory breaks, contracts or other benefits for cooperation, both because a quid pro quo is not necessary and because it might expose the secret assistance.

The companies' ties to Washington are formidable. Once a year, 30 of the country's top telecommunications and Internet executives gather in the capital to talk with the government about national security topics like how phone systems can survive nuclear attack.

All members of the National Security Telecommunications Advisory Committee, as the group is known, have been given security clearances to discuss classified programs with senior domestic security, intelligence and White House officials. (Vice President Dick Cheney was at last year's meeting.) Asked whether the committee had discussed the N.S.A. eavesdropping, a committee spokesman, Steve Barrett, said in an e-mail message, "The N.S.T.A.C. is not involved in the gathering of intelligence."

The digital revolution has made government eavesdropping more dependent than ever on corporate cooperation, telecommunications experts say. For decades, the N.S.A. was able to snatch most communications out of the air, maintaining a network of dish antennas to capture traffic transmitted by commercial satellites. But most international traffic has shifted over the last two decades to undersea fiber-optic cables. While a tap can be placed surreptitiously on a cable, company cooperation makes it far easier to sort the thousands of digital messages carried simultaneously in it.

"If you're going to monitor traffic over a fiber cable, you really need the carrier's cooperation," said Jerry Lucas, a telecommunications veteran whose company, TeleStrategies Inc., runs a regular conference called "Intelligence Support Systems for Lawful Interception" where government officials meet company technicians to discuss eavesdropping issues.

As digital technology has grown more complex, the Calea law has made snooping easier, said Anthony M. Rutkowski, president of the Global Lawful Intercept Industry Forum, a group of companies that produce equipment to comply with Calea (pronounced kuh-LEE-uh) and similar foreign laws.

"I don't know of a vendor anywhere that hasn't built intercept capability into its equipment," Mr. Rutkowski said.

But the cost of adding intercept capability sometimes leads to resistance. Currently some companies are fighting a government effort to require intercept capability on the Internet phone service called Voice Over Internet Protocol, or V.O.I.P.

Mr. Rutkowski said the controversy over the N.S.A.'s current practices, like past controversies about domestic surveillance, might have value.

DOJ_NMG_0014514

"The marvelous thing about the resilience of the system is that the pendulum does swing," Mr. Rutkowski said. "Eventually it creates a balance between the legitimate need of the government for information against the privacy rights of the citizens."

Justice Moves At Glacial Pace For `enemy Combatant' (CHIT)

By Andrew Zajac, Washington Bureau

Chicago Tribune, February 11, 2006

Unusual circumstances keep a terror suspect, arrested in Illinois in 2001, mired in legal limbo and held in a Navy brig hoping for day in court

WASHINGTON -- With the recent transfer of terror suspect Jose Padilla to a Miami jail to await trial, the sole remaining "enemy combatant" in the U.S., Ali Saleh Kahlab al-Marri, still sits in the Charleston Naval Brig, awaiting the outcome of a slow legal battle over how to dispense justice when an alleged terrorist is a legal alien.

In the eyes of the government, al-Marri is an Al Qaeda sleeper agent sent to the U.S. heartland to help the terrorist network's operatives get settled for follow-up attacks after Sept. 11, 2001.

His lawyers say al-Marri, 40, is an innocent civilian who legally came to the U.S. with his family to obtain a master's degree in engineering at Peoria's Bradley University.

Arrested in West Peoria in December 2001, al-Marri, a Qatari national, was declared an enemy combatant by President Bush on June 23, 2003, and has been held since then in solitary confinement at the South Carolina Navy brig. Al-Marri was effectively out of reach of the U.S. legal system until the Supreme Court declared in June 2004 that enemy combatants have some legal rights.

"Enemy combatant" is the name the Bush administration has used to label some terrorism suspects. These "combatants" reside in a kind of legal limbo, lacking rights traditionally assigned to criminal defendants and prisoners of war. The three enemy combatants initially held in the U.S.--the rest are imprisoned at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba--have been in a strange legal limbo, in part because of their differing circumstances.

Al-Marri and Padilla were arrested on American soil, but unlike al-Marri, Padilla is a U.S. citizen. A third combatant, Yaser Hamdi, was a U.S. citizen but was picked up on a battlefield in Afghanistan.

In addition to seeking a day in court, al-Marri has sued for relief from allegedly harsh and abusive detention. His lawsuit says he has been subjected to prolonged isolation and denial of basic necessities including bedding, clothing and medical care. The government denies mistreating him.

Cautionary tale

Al-Marri's predicament, and the glacial pace of its resolution, is a cautionary tale for millions of non-citizen legal U.S. residents, according to Jonathan Hafetz, one of his attorneys.

"The government can say, `We think you're a bad guy. We're just going to hold you because we think you are,'" said Hafetz of the Liberty and National Security Project at the Brennan Center for Justice in New York.

A federal court in South Carolina ruled in July that as a non-citizen, al-Marri could not simply demand that the government charge him with a crime or release him. The ruling noted the decision "does not close the door to this court to [al-Marri]," but it did not spell out what al-Marri needed to do to challenge his enemy combatant status.

In December, the court said al-Marri was entitled to "receive notice of the factual basis for his classification [as an enemy combatant], and a fair opportunity to rebut the government's factual assertions by presenting more persuasive evidence before a neutral decisionmaker."

But his lawyers say that standard, borrowed from the Supreme Court's June 2004 decision, stacks the deck against al-Marri because some of the evidence against him is secret and unavailable. And the public portion of the government's evidence consists of a sworn statement from a federal agent who did not have firsthand knowledge of the assertions about al-Marri's alleged ties to Al Qaeda, Hafetz said. The allegations include phone calls al-Marri made and material on his laptop.

"All the government has submitted to say they can hold him for the rest of his life is the statement of a single government agent who has no direct knowledge," Hafetz said.

A Justice Department spokesman declined to comment on the case. But as in all enemy combatant cases, government lawyers in court papers call for giving the president a free hand in dealing with detainees. Their arguments in the al-Marri case lean heavily on the Supreme Court's June 2004 decision regarding Hamdi.

The justices ruled that Hamdi was entitled to a hearing to contest his enemy combatant status but that national security considerations justified compromises, including possibly the use of secondhand information not normally admissible in court.

Government lawyers argue that as a non-citizen U.S. resident, al-Marri cannot demand any more rights or protections than those contemplated for a citizen like Hamdi.

Different circumstances

But Hafetz said the Supreme Court's hearing framework seeks to avoid interference with military operations, a concern specific to the case of Hamdi, who was picked up on the Afghan battlefield. He said it should not apply to al-Marri, who was arrested in the U.S., where obstructing the military is not an issue.

The hearing envisioned for Hamdi never occurred. He was released and allowed to return home to Saudi Arabia in October 2004 after forfeiting his U.S. citizenship.

Padilla, likewise, has not faced a hearing on his enemy combatant status.

The one-time Chicago gang member was arrested at O'Hare International Airport in May 2002 and taken into federal custody. Bush later declared Padilla an enemy combatant, who was transferred to the brig in June 2002.

In a surprise development, Padilla in January was transferred from military control to the custody of the Justice Department in Miami to face terrorism-related charges unrelated to the allegations used to detain him as an enemy combatant.

Al-Marri, meanwhile, has not budged and, according to his lawyers, has not been interrogated in more than a year. Since being moved to the brig, he has not been permitted visits with family, including a wife and five children, who live in Saudi Arabia. A brother, Jarallah al-Marri, is detained at the Guantanamo Bay naval base.

Accusations against Ali al-Marri include that he made a series of telephone calls in late 2001 to a number in the United Arab Emirates used by suicide hijacker Mohammad Atta and others involved in the Sept. 11 attacks. The government says the phone number belonged to Mustafa Ahmed al-Hawsawi, an alleged Al Qaeda paymaster.

Al-Marri's lawyers say they want to know if any evidence against their client was collected through torture.

Al-Marri denies being a terrorist or committing any crimes.

A leading expert on military law faulted the government for delaying a resolution of enemy combatant claims.

"There's this sense that time has no value," said Eugene Fidell, president of the National Institute of Military Justice. "I think the government has to explain what its game plan is. The legal system is illusory for people in his position."

Fidell said federal judges need to be more assertive in establishing a clear process for handling cases of enemy combatants.

"In his [al-Marri's] case as in Padilla's, they were subject to the district court and then whisked out with no watchful eye over them," he said.

---

azajac@tribune.com

Bail Denied For Brooklyn Bookseller Accused Of Financing Terrorism (NYT)

By Julia Preston

The New York Times, February 11, 2006

A federal judge denied bail yesterday to a Muslim bookseller from Brooklyn accused of plotting to buy arms for Islamic fighters in Afghanistan, saying the government appeared to have "very strong evidence" for the terror charges against him.

The judge, Loretta A. Preska, referred to transcripts of secretly recorded conversations between a government informer and the bookseller, Abdulrahman Farhane. Judge Preska said Mr. Farhane understood that he was talking about transferring funds to the Middle East "to purchase arms and equipment," which he knew would be used "for jihad against the United States and other Western powers."

The evidence that prosecutors presented at Mr. Farhane's bail hearing, in United States District Court in Manhattan, added significant substance to the government's case against him and three other defendants, including Tarik Shah, a New York jazz musician and martial arts instructor who also is Muslim. Mr. Shah, 43, was arrested May 29 and charged with conspiring to teach martial arts to members of Al Qaeda. The tapes include conversations with Mr. Shah and Mr. Farhane about financial transfers.

The evidence bolstered the case against Mr. Shah. Based on an F.B.I. sting, prosecutors were accusing Mr. Shah of agreeing with an undercover F.B.I. informer to train Qaeda fighters in "hand-to-hand combat." But the government did not claim that Mr. Shah had met or had contact with any terrorist operative.

Now Mr. Farhane, a Moroccan-American who is 52, has emerged as the central figure in the case. According to Judge Preska, the prosecutors have audio recordings that capture him discussing specific ways to raise money and transfer it to Islamic fighters battling the United States forces in Afghanistan in the fall of 2001, after the Sept. 11 attacks.

Victor L. Hou, an assistant United States attorney, , said yesterday that Mr. Farhane had introduced Mr. Shah to the government informer at his bookstore. The informer recorded the conversations about financial transfers.

Also charged with terror conspiracy are Rafiq Sabir, a doctor from Florida, and Mahmud Faruq Brent, a paramedic from Washington, D.C. They and Mr. Shah have been detained without bail since their arrests.

In a letter on Thursday to Judge Preska, Mr. Hou wrote that Mr. Farhane, after he was arrested Oct. 26, told investigators that he had introduced Mr. Shah to the informer to help him "send money to jihadists overseas."

The prosecutors also cast new light yesterday on the role of the government informer, a Yemeni named Mohamed Alanssi, who set himself on fire in front of the White House in November 2004, apparently to protest his handling by F.B.I. agents. Mr. Alanssi was a witness in the case in Brooklyn last year that convicted a Yemeni sheik, Mohammed Ali Hassan al-Moayad, of financing terrorism.

Mr. Hou said that "the confidential source" — whom the defense has identified as Mr. Alanssi — first identified Mr. Farhane to the F.B.I. in the weeks after 9/11 as having "radical views of Islam." Starting in December 2001, Mr. Alanssi secretly recorded a series of conversations with Mr. Farhane, many of them at his Brooklyn bookstore. Judge Preska said recordings from the fall of 2001 make it clear that Mr. Farhane was talking about sending money for "wireless communications and advanced weapons" for Islamic fighters.

Michael Hueston, Mr. Farhane's lawyer, called his client a "family man" with six children, including two born in the United States. He questioned why prosecutors had waited since 2001 to arrest him if they regarded him as dangerous.

Mr. Hou grew impassioned when he sought to rebut a statement Mr. Farhane made in court on Wednesday, when he pleaded not guilty and said, "I love this country." Mr. Hou said wiretap recordings in March 2004 register Mr. Farhane as saying: "This is not a country where we should stay. The longer one stays here, the more people make you sick."

The prosecutor said a search of Mr. Farhane's home and store — the House of Knowledge, on Atlantic Avenue — had turned up address books showing that he had several criminal contacts. Karim El-Mejjati, a Moroccan who has been linked to terrorist bombings in Saudi Arabia and Casablanca, had once given Mr. Farhane's address as his own, Mr. Hou said. His book listed, among others, Abad Elfgeeh, who Mr. Hou said was a "money launderer" for Sheik al-Moayad.

Mr. Farhane was arrested in October on lesser charges of making false statements to the F.B.I. Prosecutors brought the terror financing charges against him this week.

U.S. Bookseller's Bail Revoked In Terror Case (FINDLAW/AP)

By Larry Neumeister, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 11, 2006

(AP) - NEW YORK-A bookstore owner accused of supporting terrorists was jailed without bail Friday after a prosecutor played taped conversations in which the man is heard advising not to think of America "as our country."

Abdulrahman Farhane, a 51-year-old U.S. citizen of Moroccan descent, was taken into custody and his $150,000 (â‚¬125,300) bail was revoked by U.S. District Judge Loretta A. Preska, who said her review of government evidence showed the nature of the case and quality of evidence was very serious.

"It appears the government has very strong evidence of the terrorism offenses charged," the jurist said before the red-bearded New York man was led away.

During two bail hearings this week, prosecutors were forced to reveal new details of the case against Farhane, 42-year-old musician Tarik Shah and two others.

When he was initially arrested in October, Farhane was charged with making false statements to the FBI. Shah was originally accused last spring of offering to train others in the martial arts, leading his lawyer to call it the "karate-chop case."

But an indictment returned earlier this week portrayed the case in more sinister terms, saying Farhane and Shah conspired in 2001 to help an FBI cooperating witness send money to aid Islamic militants fighting Americans in Afghanistan.

After reviewing conversations taped by the FBI in Farhane's bookstore in December 2001, the judge said the tapes "make it clear" that Farhane offered to help another man transfer money to the Middle East in 2001 even though he was told some of the money would be spent on communications and advanced weapons.

She said he also told the FBI after his arrest last fall that he knew some of the money might end up being used to fight U.S. forces in Afghanistan.

The judge announced her conclusions after Assistant U.S. Attorney Victor Hou tried to discredit Farhane's Wednesday comment in court that he did nothing wrong, insisting, "This is my country. I love my country."

Hou said a court-authorized telephone wiretap captured statements in 2004 in which he complained about America.

"We should not think of this as our country. This is not a country where we should stay," Hou said Farhane told another man on March 10, 2004. "The longer people stay here, the more people make you sick."

In an April 13, 2004, conversation, Hou said Farhane seemed to be applauding an attack on U.S. forces in Iraq when he said, "The Sunnis gave the U.S. military a lesson they won't forget."

The prosecutor said a man in a Jan. 16, 2004, telephone call with Farhane promised loyalty, saying, "I will kill for you."

He described Farhane as a dangerous facilitator who incites and inspires others and who brought Shah into the scheme because he believed the musician could help with ways to send money to the Middle East.

"You cannot trust him," Hou said.

DOJ_NMG_0014517

In a letter to Preska, Hou said Farhane told the FBI last October that there was a duty for Muslims to wage violent jihad to repel invaders in Muslim lands.

Hou said the FBI also found address books belonging to Farhane that read like a "who's who of terrorism financiers in the United States" and then he identified several men who have been convicted and sentenced in U.S. terrorism cases.

He belittled the claims of love for America by the father of six children, saying "behind closed doors when he thinks nobody's listening, he's telling what he really believes."

Defense attorney Michael Hueston argued for continued bail, saying his client had obeyed restrictions since he was put on electronic monitoring after his Oct. 26 arrest.

Hueston said the absence of danger was illustrated by the government's failure to arrest his client between 2001 and last October and contended extensive taping of his client revealed no conversations in which he threatened U.S. forces.

"He's a family man," he said.

Hou suggested that law enforcement authorities waited to arrest Farhane in order to protect a wider investigation.

Terror Trial To Start Despite Late Evidence, Defense Lawyers Say (FINDLAW/AP)

By Don Thompson, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 11, 2006

(AP) - SACRAMENTO-Federal prosecutors have released mounds of documents and hundreds of hours of audiotapes to attorneys defending a father and son charged in a terrorism probe, but the defense said the last-minute flood of evidence will not delay the trial.

Jury selection is expected to begin Tuesday in the trials of Umer Hayat, 48, and his 23-year-old son, Hamid, both of Lodi. Their trials will run concurrently with separate juries.

The U.S. attorney's office last week turned over 253 compact discs and 45 audiotapes with an estimated 990 hours of secretly recorded conversations - most in foreign languages - between the Hayats and a government informant.

This week, they turned over much more material, mostly documents, that the defense team is struggling to digest as it prepares for trial, said attorney Johnny Griffin III, who represents Umer Hayat.

Nonetheless, "we will not be seeking any types of continuances of the start of the trial," Griffin said Friday.

The government is required to turn over evidence the defense can use to question prosecution witnesses.

The Hayats are accused of lying to the FBI about Hamid Hayat attending a terrorist training camp in Pakistan in 2003 and 2004. Hamid Hayat also is charged with providing material support to terrorists by attending the camp and returning to the United States last May with the intent to commit terrorist acts.

Both men were arrested in June in the agricultural town about 35 miles south of Sacramento. They have denied the charges and are being held in Sacramento County Jail awaiting trial.

A Late Surprise For Lodi Defense (SACBEE)

By Denny Walsh, Bee Staff Writer

The Sacramento Bee, February 11, 2006

With terrorism trials near, new trove of evidence is revealed.

Shortly before the start of trials of Umer Hayat of Lodi and his son Hamid Hayat on terrorism-related charges, federal prosecutors dumped a huge load of tapes and a stack of FBI reports on defense attorneys.

In addition, they filed documents under seal and heavily redacted other documents to keep information secret.

The government's actions once again suggest it wants to delay the start of the trials in the highly publicized case. The trials, with two juries at the same time in the same courtroom, are scheduled to start Tuesday.

The government has gone to extraordinary lengths to keep information secret and repeatedly has sought to delay the trials of the two Lodi men charged with lying to the FBI about their alleged terrorist ties.

Umer Hayat, a 48-year-old Lodi ice cream truck driver, and his 23-year-old son Hamid have been in jail since June 5, in connection with an FBI terrorism investigation. In addition to accusations of false statements, Hamid Hayat is charged with supporting terrorism by attending an al-Qaida training camp in Pakistan.

Thirteen days before the start of Tuesday's trials, prosecutors gave defense lawyers 253 compact discs and 45 audiotapes containing an estimated 990 hours of surreptitiously recorded conversations involving the Hayats and an FBI informant dating back to April 30, 2003. A substantial portion of the recordings are in foreign languages.

While prosecutors said their actions were necessary, one defense attorney involved in several terrorism cases elsewhere says the actions indicate a troubling pattern.

San Diego attorney Mahir T. Sherif said the government's attitude has been to "do whatever it takes to get a conviction or get these people we are suspicious of out of the country. And if that means arresting them first and getting evidence later, so be it. That's the tone that has been set at the top of the federal executive branch."

The pattern, he said, is to arrest without proof beyond a reasonable doubt and, if the subjects are not deportable, then prosecutors "try to break them down to get a plea deal."

"The government wants to be able to say it thwarted another terrorist plot," Sherif said.

The prosecutors' last-ditch surrender of material could have prompted defense attorneys to ask U.S. District Judge Garland E. Burrell Jr. for more time to prepare for trial.

On at least five occasions since the Hayats were first indicted June 16, prosecutors have opposed defense efforts to get a speedy trial. And the government succeeded in postponing the initial Aug. 23 trial.

When prosecutors recently suggested defense attorneys obtain security clearances - a process that would take months - the Hayats' lawyers, Johnny Griffin III and Wazhma Mojaddidi, labeled the suggestion "insincere, unfounded and just another tactic by the government to force delays in this case."

The defense attorneys first invoked the federal Speedy Trial Act on July 1, asking for a trial within 70 days of the Hayats' arraignments. But, from the outset, the government opposed such requests.

The prosecutors "obviously felt they would have had a hard time proving a case had it gone to trial within 70 days," Sherif said. "If they felt they could get a conviction by going to trial when the defense wanted to, they would not have hesitated."

To justify stopping the speedy trial clock, prosecutors and Burrell repeatedly cited time consumed in honoring the defense attorneys' requests that more than 40 federal, state and local government agencies be surveyed for whatever information may exist about the Hayats.

But the government felt no compulsion to comb the files of all the agencies listed in the defense requests, according to court papers.

In a July 6 motion to stop the speedy trial clock, prosecutors said they had asked only select federal agencies in the executive branch and intelligence community to review their files.

As to other federal agencies, the defense would have to present facts tending to show an agency is in possession of information helpful to the defense "before the government has an obligation to initiate a review," prosecutors said in the motion.

Further, prosecutors said, they have no obligation to search for information "in the custody, possession, and control of state or local law enforcement agencies."

Griffin, a former federal prosecutor, said the government had the responsibility to search for all relevant information about the defendants, even without the defense requests. And, he said, the government should have been ready for trial before it arrested the Hayats and fought to keep them in jail without bail.

The defense attorneys complained for months that they were not being given access in a timely fashion to information in the government's possession.

In a heated Aug. 5 debate before Burrell, a prosecutor argued that the government could not search for and retrieve all information relative to the Hayats by the Aug. 23 trial date.

"So, if they want to push the pause button," Griffin countered, "they want to stop (the speedy trial clock), they should dismiss the case. And if and when they're fully prepared to honor their discovery obligation, and therefore truly announce (they are) ready for trial, then let's try the case."

Two months later, when prosecutors S. Robert Tice-Raskin and Laura Ferris told the judge they still were not finished searching and retrieving information from the files of various federal intelligence agencies and asked for another delay, Mojaddidi told Burrell the prosecutors were "buying time to develop a case against our clients, which they do not yet have."

Running on a parallel track has been the prosecution's effort to keep secret material connected to the case, some of it unclassified by the government.

Prosecutors have met with Burrell in secret on a number of occasions and have submitted to him a steady stream of sealed documents, all under the authority of the federal Classified Information Procedures Act.

Prosecutors recently filed a series of motions - some heavily redacted - asking Burrell for "protective orders" covering unidentified material they were submitting to the judge.

In one motion, the prosecutors ask Burrell to order restrictions on the dissemination of unclassified information.

According to the motion, the information in question is contained in "sensitive declassified recorded conversations involving the defendants, (a) confidential witness and/or other individuals," and in "declassified imagery which the United States intends to use at trial in this matter. This imagery is highly sensitive."

"Disclosure of the sensitive information beyond the defense team should be precluded to avoid the risk of revealing U.S. government investigative tactics and techniques relating to both the recorded conversations and the imagery," the motion says.

"Knowledge of such tactics and techniques could be employed by others to limit the success of future use of these various techniques."

After all the rhetoric about how the case implicates national security and classified information, prosecutors now acknowledge that their search yielded no classified documents they will use at trial.

What is classified, they say, is information needed to lay a foundation for what are described in court documents as four images of "the earth's surface and of the objects ... in the vicinity of Balakot, Pakistan." In other words, the details of how the images were obtained and processed are classified.

Griffin and Mojaddidi have told the prosecutors and Burrell they don't care about the details of the images' origins, and they will not object to their admissibility. They also want the images admitted as evidence because they think it will help their clients in the eyes of the jurors.

Burrell has ordered Umer and Hamid Hayat tried before two juries at the same time.

Umer Hayat is charged in a grand jury indictment with lying to the FBI to conceal his alleged firsthand knowledge of terrorist training camps in his native Pakistan and his son's alleged training at one or more of the camps.

Hamid Hayat is charged in the same indictment with providing material support to terrorists by undergoing the training and re-entering this country to await instructions from unnamed others "to wage violent jihad against the United States."

The Hayats, both U.S. citizens, have pleaded not guilty. If convicted, Hamid Hayat faces a 23-year prison term and Umer Hayat faces an eight-year term.

After more than eight months of legal wrangling over defense access to information and the timing of the trials, the case still hangs primarily on confessions the two Lodi men allegedly made to FBI agents June 4. Their attorneys say those statements were made under duress.

Related graphic Lodi terror case [190k PDF]

About the writer:

The Bee's Denny Walsh can be reached at (916) 321-1189 or dwalsh@sacbee.com.

Would-be Terrorist Got Cold Feet After Sept. 11 (DMN/AP)

Associated Press

The Dallas Morning News, February 11, 2006

Malaysian officials say he had trained to pilot jet in West Coast attack

KUALA LUMPUR, Malaysia – A Malaysian man recruited by al-Qaeda to pilot a plane in a Sept. 11-style attack on the West Coast pulled out after observing the carnage of the 2001 assaults, Southeast Asian officials said Friday.

Malaysian engineer Zaini Zakaria was among three men al-Qaeda was preparing to take part in an attack in the U.S., the officials said. Mr. Zaini, 38, has been detained without trial under the Internal Security Act in Malaysia since he surrendered in December 2002.

On Thursday, President Bush outlined details of an alleged plot to hijack an airliner and fly it into a skyscraper in Los Angeles. He said that terrorists intended to use shoe bombs to break into the cockpit and fly the plane into the 73-story US Bank Tower downtown.

Mr. Bush said that cooperation between Washington and several Asian countries had helped to thwart the plan. "It took the combined efforts of several countries to break up this plot," he said.

The plan never appeared close to the stage where it could be put into execution. Scores of arrests after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks severely curtailed al-Qaeda and its Southeast Asian affiliate, Jemaah Islamiyah.

Mr. Zaini, a native of the northeastern state of Kelantan, surrendered to Malaysian authorities in Kelantan in December 2002, said his former lawyer, Saiful Izham Ramli.

The two other men implicated in the attack plans were Zacarias Moussaoui, who is in U.S. custody, and Abderraouf Jdey, who remains at large with a $5 million U.S. bounty on his head.

Two Malaysian security officials, speaking on condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to discuss the issue with the media, said Mr. Zaini was the only suspect in the alleged plot known to be in Malaysian custody.

Mr. Zaini traveled to al-Qaeda camps in Afghanistan in 1999, where he met senior figures in the terrorist group, including an Indonesian, Riduan Isamuddin, also known as Hambali, one of the Malaysian security officials said. Mr. Isamuddin was arrested in 2003 in Thailand and is in U.S. custody.

After returning to Malaysia the same year, Mr. Zaini enrolled in a flight school and obtained a license to fly a small plane. He then began making inquiries in Australia about getting a license to fly a jet, the official said.

But Mr. Zaini was never told what his mission for al-Qaeda would be.

When he saw media coverage of the Sept. 11 attacks, he severed his ties with the militants, the official said.

Mr. Zaini told Malaysian interrogators that he "didn't want that kind of jihad," the official said.

A second Malaysian security official said Mr. Zaini told his Malaysian interrogators that "he was not prepared to die as a martyr, so he backed out."

A possible "second wave" attack was mentioned briefly in the June 2004 U.S. National Commission report on the Sept. 11 attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon. The report quoted Khalid Shaikh Mohammed, the reputed Sept. 11 mastermind, as saying "three potential pilots were recruited for the alleged second wave." It identified them as Mr. Moussaoui, Mr. Jdey and Mr. Zaini.

Mr. Mohammed, who was arrested in Pakistan in 2003, told his U.S. interrogators that "he was too busy with the 9/11 plot to plan the second wave of attacks," the report said.

Mr. Moussaoui, a Frenchman of Moroccan descent, has pleaded guilty in a U.S. court to conspiring to fly planes into buildings, and a jury is being selected to decide whether he is put to death or sentenced to life in prison.

The State Department is offering a reward of up to $5 million for information leading to the capture and conviction of Mr. Jdey, who was born in Tunisia but is a naturalized Canadian citizen.

Mr. Saiful, the former lawyer for Mr. Zaini, said his client never told his lawyers about taking flight classes, and his arrest records do not describe him as a pilot or being a suspect in a "second wave" attack.

He said authorities had sought Mr. Zaini mainly for his links with Jemaah Islamiyah, a common charge for which scores of suspects are being held in a high-security prison in Kamunting under a law that allows indefinite detention without trial.

Mr. Zaini's wife is from the Ulu Tiram district in southern Johor state, the site of a school where Mr. Isamuddin and other Indonesian terrorist leaders were thought to be based for some years.

In 2003, the U.S. ordered a freeze on Mr. Zaini's financial assets and those of several other suspects. His family is now so poor that they cannot afford to travel to Kamunting in central Malaysia to visit him, Mr. Saiful said.

Moussaoui Trial Difficult For Both Sides (MINNST)

By Greg Gordon

Minneapolis Star Tribune, February 11, 2006

A newly released transcript of a secret hearing revealed huge logistical problems in the trial of Zacarias Moussaoui

WASHINGTON, D.C. - Confessed Al-Qaida conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui refused for months to speak with his lawyers or to review key documents for his sentencing trial, prompting a federal judge to consider meeting privately with him and his lawyers, it was disclosed Friday.

U.S. District Judge Leonie Brinkema decided instead to order guards at the city jail in Alexandria, Va., to give court-appointed defense lawyers greater access to Moussaoui in hopes that communication would improve, according to a newly declassified transcript of a secret Jan. 5 court hearing.

Jury selection began this week in the sentencing trial to determine whether Moussaoui, who pled guilty last April to six counts of conspiring with the Sept. 11 suicide hijackers, will get the death penalty. Moussaoui's outbursts in front of prospective jurors created a new complication in the case.

A host of problems

In ordering release of the transcript, Brinkema offered a glimpse of huge, behind-the-scenes logistical problems plaguing the only U.S. prosecution stemming from the 2001 attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon.

The transcript also revealed that Minneapolis FBI agent Harry Samit, one of two agents who arrested Moussaoui 3½ weeks before the attacks, will be a central witness for both prosecutors and defense lawyers. As many as seven Minneapolis FBI and immigration agents and personnel were listed as possible witnesses, along with two former FBI counter-terrorism chiefs, lawyers said.

During the closed hearing, Brinkema pressed defense lawyers to reduce the large number of classified documents they seek to introduce and urged prosecutors to assist them.

She said she will require government security officers to stay on 24-hour call in case issues surrounding classified information arise. She said it is possible that impasses over sensitive material will force emergency reviews by a federal appeals court.

"I've got to remind both sides this case is going to look terrible and play terribly in the public's eye if we get it started and I have to have a three-day recess to resolve those matters or argue them before an appeals court," she said. "And we may lose this jury."

She conceded that both sides "are laboring under unbelievably difficult conditions."

He's not talking to his lawyers

Brinkema asked defense lawyers if they were communicating with Moussaoui.

"He's refused all correspondence from us, including packages," defense lawyer Alan Yamamoto replied.

Brinkema also said that when she finishes crafting substitutions for the classified statements of Al-Qaida captives whom Moussaoui sought to question, she would herself send them to Moussaoui for his review, so he cannot later claim that his rights were denied. "He tends to read things I send him," Brinkema said.

The case was hung up for two years over Moussaoui's demand for access to captives who support his contention that he knew nothing about the Sept. 11 plot.

Efforts to improve relations between Moussaoui, a 37-year-old Frenchman of Moroccan descent, and his lawyers apparently failed. On Monday, he disrupted each of four initial sessions with prospective jurors, denouncing his lawyers until he was ordered removed from the courtroom.

The judge has scheduled a public hearing Tuesday to discuss trial "logistics" and is expected to warn Moussaoui that he will be constrained or barred from the trial if his outbursts continue.

Greg Gordon is a correspondent in the Star Tribune Washington bureau.

'Vengeful Act' (NSWK)

By Jamie Reno

Newsweek, February 11, 2006

A family lawyer for Zacarias Moussaoui discusses the sanity and possible execution of 9/11's alleged '20th hijacker.'

Jury selection began in Alexandria, Va., this week in the federal death-penalty trial of Zacarias Moussaoui, the only person in the United States charged in the September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. Arrested in August 2001, Moussaoui, whose incarceration has been marked by bizarre in-court outbursts and an uncooperative relationship with his attorneys, had insisted since 9/11 that he had nothing to do with the terrorist plot. But in April, he surprised everyone and changed his plea to guilty of conspiring to fly planes into U.S. buildings. Moussaoui now faces the death penalty or life in prison.

Moussaoui's mother, Aicha El-Wafi, who lives in France but plans to attend the trial when it begins next month, told reporters last year that her son is a "scapegoat" and that he pleaded guilty simply "to have peace." She also said her son should be "judged and convicted for what he did, and not because he is an Arab or an Islamist." El-Wafi's American attorney, Randy Hamud, a controversial civil-rights advocate who also represented several San Diego-based Middle Eastern students who were friendly with 9/11 terrorists Nawaf Alhazmi and Khalid Almidhar, remains in contact with Moussaoui's family. He spoke to NEWSWEEK about his belief that Moussaoui is "deranged" and a scapegoat. Excerpts:

NEWSWEEK: How would you describe Zacarias Moussaoui's mental state?

Randy Hamud: Over the years, his paranoia and delusional thoughts and words have skewed the whole of the proceedings. Khalid Shaikh Mohammed [the alleged mastermind of the attacks] has stated that Mr. Moussaoui wasn't included in the 9/11 plot because he was unstable, and he continues to be unstable.

Do you think he's mentally fit to stand trial?

No, I don't. How can he plead guilty to 9/11 when in the same breath he denied being a participant in that plot? It was not a rational decision or a shining moment in our jurisprudential system when the judge accepted such a preposterous plea.

But Moussaoui did plead guilty. Why should he not be given the death penalty or life in prison?

Because he never was a 9/11 player, has always maintained that he had nothing to do with 9/11, and even concurrently with his guilty plea, he denied he was a 9/11 player ... And because he was not a 9/11 player, he certainly does not deserve the ultimate penalty. With his professed membership and support of Al Qaeda, he's talked himself into 10 years in prison, not the death chamber. If he is executed for 9/11, it would be the vengeful act of a vengeful government.

What do you think of Moussaoui's defense attorneys?

He has a first-class team of defense lawyers who were battling the government, him and public opprobrium to cobble together his sound defense to the charges. Unfortunately, his impulsive guilty plea short-circuited their magnificent efforts.

What was your involvement with Moussaoui's defense team early on?

None, other than to interface with his mother and the defense team, and earlier on, on her behalf, to measure the skills of the defense team with a view toward retaining other counsel if they were not up to the task. I soon found that they were well qualified and committed to his defense.

What do you expect from the defense during this death-penalty trial?

They will have to present all evidence of mitigation and sympathy for Mr. Moussaoui, including his childhood, etc. Also, they will probably try to establish that he did not really know any details about 9/11 and could not have helped the government to prevent it if he had been cooperating, [that] before 9/11 the government itself knew more about the conspiracy and the conspirators than did Mr. Moussaoui; only bureaucratic bumbling prevented timely discovery of the plot.

What do you expect from the prosecution during this trial?

Inflammatory statements, testimony from the victims' families, every stratagem by which they can appeal to the passion and prejudices of the jury.

Do you think the Muslim world be watching this trial closely?

I think so, because he is on trial for his life. The recent conviction of imam [Abu Hamza] al-Masri in England [for charges including incitement to murder] has been overshadowed by the [Prophet Muhammad] cartoon controversy which has set the Islamic world aflame. When that settles down, Moussaoui"s trial should get lots of play on Al-Jazeera and the other Arabic and Middle East networks. Since Abu Ghraib and Guantanamo, nobody in the Middle East believes that Muslim Arabs are fairly treated anywhere in the U.S. or in any venue where the U.S. military calls the shots.

How does this trial compare and contrast to other trials around the world involving suspected terrorists and members of Al Qaeda?

In the other trials, there seems to be an actual nexus between the charges and the defendants. Not so here; he was not a 9/11 player even though he pled guilty to it. It's all a fantastic fantasy in which the court participated by accepting his plea because, I believe, it had finally lost patience with him and his outbursts.

How do you think the American public views Moussaoui?

As a demon and a pariah, just as the administration has depicted him since his arrest. Even that widely used photo of the clean-shaved, shaved-headed, "buff" Moussaoui is a grand illusion; in person, he is a meek, little man who is not buff, not menacing, and really looks nothing like that notorious photograph.

How did you come to represent Moussaoui's mother?

She learned of my work through the media and contacted me first in May of 2002 when Mr. Moussaoui was not cooperating with his lawyers. She asked me if I could try to help convince him to cooperate with his attorneys.

Do you believe, as Moussaoui's mother does, that Moussaoui is a scapegoat?

Yes, I do. He may be guilty of membership or sympathy for Al Qaeda, but he certainly was not a 9/11 player. That's the rub. The government failed to bring to the bar of justice any of the real 9/11 players, such as Khalid Shaik Mohammed, Ramzi bin al-Shibh, even Osama Bin Laden, and needs a scapegoat so it can gloat to the American people that it has captured and executed one of the culpable parties.

What is Moussaoui's mother's position at this point?

She is devastated. She's planning to come to the United States the first week in March when the actual trial begins. She was crushed when he pled guilty, because she knows he had nothing to do with 9/11.

I'm sure you realize that your opinions about this case are going to anger many Americans, right?

Not really. Americans usually like criminal defendants to be connected to the charges and usually don't like the thought of accepting the guilty plea of a deranged man who is clearly innocent of the actual charges against him. Remember, he was in jail on 9/11. And for a while during the period of his self-representation, his publicized written and oral tirades actually caught the attention and sympathies of several columnists and pundits who wondered aloud whether Mr. Moussaoui was "all there." He hasn't changed. We've changed. We're trying to execute someone for a crime which the government itself knows he did not commit. It's a dark chapter in our jurisprudential history. Hopefully it will be an exception rather than the new paradigm for the future.

Brit Treasury Chief Forms Terrorism Team (AP)

By TARIQ PANJA

Associated Press, February 11, 2006

LONDON (AP) -- British Treasury Chief Gordon Brown plans to assemble a team of financial experts to end terrorism funding streams - the equivalent of the intelligence experts who broke the Nazis' Enigma Code during World War II, his office said Friday.

In a speech Monday at the Royal United Services Institute for Defense and Security Studies- a professional forum concerned with national and international defense and security - Brown is expected to outline a series of measures aimed at cutting off terrorists' cash flow.

His comments come as the British parliament prepares for key votes on national ID cards and anti-terrorism legislation.

Brown is widely backed as the most likely candidate to take over from Prime Minister Tony Blair, who will not run in Britain's next general election. In Monday's speech, Brown is expected to say that in his role as finance minister, he has played a significant international security role.

"And I have discovered that this requires an international operation using modern methods of forensic accounting as imaginative and path-breaking for our times as the Enigma codebreakers at Bletchley Park achieved more than half a century ago," Brown will say, according to excerpts of the speech obtained by the Associated Press.

DOJ_NMG_0014523

A spokesman for the Treasury, speaking on customary condition of anonymity, said the speech will focus on the balance between security and liberty.

In July 2005, 56 people - including four suicide bombers - died when London's transit system was attacked. Part of Brown's speech is expected to focus on the importance of strangling extremists' sources of money, and how that would help minimize the chances of further attacks.

Brown is also expected to outline intelligence evidence gathered by British security sources showing the funding and planning of terror attacks by global networks.

He is also planning to announce a review of the rules protecting charities from exploitation by extremist groups, and tougher action to prevent terrorists abusing bureaux de change and wire transfers.

Closer communication with banks to monitor suspicious transactions and a possible strengthening of the system for seizing assets will also be outlined by Brown.

Since Sept. 11, Britain has frozen $139 million in terrorist assets, including from over 100 organizations linked to al-Qaida, according to figures released by the Treasury Department.

Syrian Accused Of Planning 2003 Attacks (LAT)

From Times Wire Reports

The Los Angeles Times, February 11, 2006

A Syrian was charged with masterminding suicide bombings in 2003 that killed 58 people in Istanbul, and Turkish prosecutors claimed that Osama bin Laden personally ordered him to carry out attacks.

Loai Mohammed Haj Bakr Saqa, 32, was accused of serving as a point man between Al Qaeda and homegrown militants behind the series of suicide bombings in Istanbul in 2003, said the indictment.

It said Saqa had given the militants in Turkey about $170,000.

Saqa had cosmetic surgery, according to a medical report, and operated by using an array of fake IDs and aliases even with Al Qaeda contacts, according to the indictment.

PATRIOT ACT:

GOP Accepts Patriot Act Compromise (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, February 11, 2006

CAMBRIDGE, Md. -- Speaker J. Dennis Hastert said yesterday that House Republicans can accept the USA Patriot Act deal struck Thursday, and key Senate Democrats also endorsed the proposed changes as a good compromise.

"I think they were enough to make sure we can protect the American people," Mr. Hastert, Illinois Republican, told reporters as House Republicans were meeting on Maryland's Eastern Shore for their annual retreat.

Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, who in December led a filibuster of the bill and boasted he had "killed" the last version, supports the new compromise, a spokesman for the Nevada Democrat said.

The announcements mean the bill, which extends the USA Patriot Act while adding a few new checks, is likely to clear final legislative hurdles and be sent to President Bush for his signature.

The House Republicans met with Mr. Bush for nearly two hours yesterday, most of it behind closed doors, to talk about their agenda and strategy going into November's congressional elections. During the meeting, Mr. Bush repeated his pledge to catch terrorists "dead or alive."

"Laura doesn't like me saying this, but I believe we do need to find al Qaeda, dead or alive," he said, according to a participant.

He also defended the National Security Agency surveillance program, telling the Republicans: "I wake up every morning thinking about a future attack and, therefore, a lot of my thinking and a lot of the decisions I make are based upon the attack that hurt us."

After weeks of rejecting calls for greater congressional oversight, Mr. Bush has agreed to allow briefings for all members of the intelligence committees. Previously just the "gang of eight" -- the top Republican and Democrat on the House and Senate intelligence committees, as well as the Republican and Democrat leaders in each chamber -- were briefed.

Rep. Heather A. Wilson, New Mexico Republican and a member of the House intelligence committee who had sought disclosure to the committee, stood up and thanked the president.

DOJ_NMG_0014524

Mr. Hastert told reporters the expansion of the briefings was the right step, and when asked whether Congress would take action to rein in the activities, he defended them.

"It really comes down to what we do to keep this country safe," he said. "Somebody in this country, whether it is a foreign national or a citizen, talking to al Qaeda, somebody ought to know about it and why it is happening."

Republicans described the session as very open and extremely friendly. Rep. John T. Doolittle, California Republican, said Mr. Bush delivered "the equivalent of a post-graduate seminar on world diplomacy."

The president also defended the new Medicare prescription drug benefit, which took effect at the beginning of the year, saying there were bound to be some glitches in a program that has signed up 26 million seniors.

Mr. Bush tossed in a number of jokes, including several at his own expense: "If any of you are ever president, make sure you surround yourself with smart, capable people -- people smarter than you; in my case, it wasn't all that hard to find."

He also said he will not be swayed by low approval ratings.

"If I worried about the polls, I'd be laying on the ground in the fetal position," Mr. Bush said.

Despite the polls, House Republicans said there's no effort to try to separate themselves from him.

Rep. Thomas M. Reynolds of New York, chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee, said among House Republicans Mr. Bush is "pretty well sought-after" to campaign in their districts.

He said some Republicans, such as Rep. Rob Simmons of Connecticut, may not want to have Mr. Bush campaign in their district, but many Southern Democrats don't want House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat, campaigning for them.

"I think it's a nice trade-off," he said.

Hastert Backs Compromise On Patriot Act (AP)

By Jim Abrams

AP, February 11, 2006

Legislation to renew the anti-terror Patriot Act was cleared for final congressional passage Friday when House Speaker Dennis Hastert blessed a day-old compromise between the White House and Senate Republicans.

Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid also indicated he will vote for the bill when it comes to a vote, possibly next week.

The legislation gives federal agents expanded powers to investigate suspected terrorists in the United States, and the Bush administration has said it is one of the key weapons in the war on terror.

"I think they (the changes in the bill) were enough to make sure we can protect the American people," Hastert told reporters at Cambridge, Md., speaking of three revisions that the white House and Senate GOP holdouts announced on Thursday.

The House "should move forward with it as soon as the Senate" acts, he said. A short-term extension of the measure expires on March 10.

Passage of the bill was stalled late last year when four Senate Republicans joined Democrats in saying that it shortchanged civil liberties protections in the name of the war on terror.

Reid's spokesman, Jim Manley, said the Nevada Democrat intends to vote for the bill. The Senate's second-ranking Democrat, Sen. Richard Durbin of Illinois, is also among its supporters.

Judiciary Committee member Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., also said the bill had been substantially improved by the changes and she would vote for it.

Any changes made would still have to be approved by the House, but Sen. Larry Craig, R-Idaho, another negotiator, said that with the Senate and the White House in concert, he thought the House would go along. He said he had consulted with House Judiciary Committee Chairman James Sensenbrenner, R-Wis. "There will be no additional negotiations," Craig said.

Sensenbrenner declined comment, but Hastert said he had discussed the bill with the chairman.

The changes, worked out over several weeks of talks, specifically with the office of White House counsel Harriet Miers, covered three main areas:

_Under the first, recipients of court-approved subpoenas for information in terrorist investigations would have the right to challenge a requirement that they refrain from telling anyone.

_The second removes a requirement that an individual provide the FBI with the name of an attorney consulted about a National Security Letter, which is a demand for records issued by administrators.

_The third clarifies that most libraries are not subject to National Security Letter demands for information about suspected terrorists.

White House spokesman Scott McClellan said the agreement would "continue to build upon the civil liberties protections that are in place but do so in a way that doesn't compromise our national security priorities."

But Sen. Russell Feingold, D-Wis., a leader in opposing the act, said he would continue to fight it.

DOJ_NMG_0014525

He said the deal did not provide meaningful judicial review of gag orders because such review can only take place after a year has passed and can only be successful if the recipient proves the government acted in bad faith.

The deal also does not ensure that when government agents break into homes to do "sneak-and-peek" searches that it tells the owners of those homes, in most circumstances within seven days, as courts have said they should, Feingold added.

The law originally was passed within days of the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, and the administration says it has been an important weapon in the government's arsenal for tracking suspected terrorists.

Renewal of the law was blocked last year when critics said its provisions shortchanged civil liberties, particularly in the cases of individuals who were not suspected of terrorist activities themselves, but might have had innocent dealings with suspects.

Also at issue was concern over the government's ability to demand information from libraries.

As a result of the deadlock, lawmakers had to approve two temporary extensions of the old law. The current extension expires March 10.

Republicans said that with the changes, the chance would be remote that any library would have to turn over information.

But Democrats said the same provision made explicit that some libraries could be forced to turn over information, adding that existing law is vague on the subject.

Other than Sununu, the Republicans who had defied the president's wishes on the Patriot Act last December were Craig, Lisa Murkowski of Alaska and Chuck Hagel of Nebraska.

Hastert Backs Deal On USA Patriot Act (REU)

Reuters, February 11, 2006

House Speaker Dennis Hastert on Friday embraced a deal reached by a group of Senate Republicans and the White House to renew the USA Patriot Act, a centerpiece of President Bush's war on terrorism.

Hastert, an Illinois Republican, said once the Senate passes the measure, likely next week, the House would give it final congressional approval so Bush can sign it into law.

"If the Senate passes it, we'll pass it," Hastert told reporters at a retreat by House Republicans in Cambridge.

The deal, announced on Thursday, was designed to address demands for better protection of civil liberties.

The Patriot Act, initially enacted after the September 11 attacks, expanded the power of federal law enforcement to conduct wiretaps and secret searches and share information.

The pending legislation would make permanent 14 key provisions, now set to expire on March 10, and extend two others for four years.

While some Senate Democrats portrayed the White House-backed deal as failing to address civil liberties concerns adequately, several Senate Republicans and Democrats who had earlier balked at renewing the law now supported it.

One change would allow individuals to challenge gag orders when they have been subpoenaed to produce sensitive information on library, medical, education or gun-related records.

Another would clarify that traditional libraries would not be subjected to special subpoenas, which are not issued by judges, to gain records.

A group of Republican and Democratic senators combined in December to stage a filibuster, a procedural move that blocked a vote on an earlier House-passed measure to renew the act.

Since then, Congress approved two short-term extensions.

"It's time we get it done on a long-term basis," Hastert said.

Another Cave-In On The Patriot Act (NYT)

The New York Times, February 11, 2006

The Patriot Act has been one of the few issues on which Congress has shown backbone lately. Last year, it refused to renew expiring parts of the act until greater civil liberties protections were added. But key members of the Senate have now caved, agreeing to renew these provisions in exchange for only minimal improvements. At a time when the public is growing increasingly concerned about the lawlessness of the Bush administration's domestic spying, the Senate should insist that any reauthorization agreement do more to protect Americans against improper secret searches.

When the Patriot Act was passed after Sept. 11, 2001, Congress made some of its most far-reaching provisions temporary so it would be able to reconsider them later on. Those provisions were set to expire last December, but Congress agreed to a very short extension so greater civil liberties protections could be added. This week, four key Republican senators — later backed by two Democrats — said that they had agreed to a deal with the White House. It is one that does little to protect Americans from government invasions of their privacy.

DOJ_NMG_0014526

One of the most troubling aspects of the Patriot Act is the "gag order" imposed by Section 215, which prohibits anyone holding financial, medical and other private records of ordinary Americans from saying anything when the government issues a subpoena for those records. That means that a person whose records are being taken, and whose privacy is being invaded, has no way to know about the subpoena and no way to challenge it.

Rather than removing this gag order, the deal keeps it in place for a full year — too long for Americans to wait to learn that the government is spying on them. Even after a year, someone holding such records would have to meet an exceedingly high standard to get the gag order lifted. It is not clear that this change has much value at all.

The compromise also fails to address another problem with Section 215: it lets the government go on fishing expeditions, spying on Americans with no connection to terrorism or foreign powers. The act should require the government, in order to get a subpoena, to show that there is a connection between the information it is seeking and a terrorist or a spy.

But the deal would allow subpoenas in instances when there are reasonable grounds for simply believing that information is relevant to a terrorism investigation. That is an extremely low bar.

One of the most well-publicized objections to the Patriot Act is the fact that it allows the government to issue national security letters, an extremely broad investigative tool, to libraries, forcing them to turn over their patrons' Internet records. The wording of the compromise is unclear. If it actually says that national security letters cannot be used to get Internet records from libraries, that would be an improvement, but it is not clear that it does.

In late December, it looked as if there was bipartisan interest in the Senate for changing the worst Patriot Act provisions and standing up for Americans' privacy rights. Now the hope of making the needed improvements has faded considerably.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Mayor Miffed: The White House Never Calls (LAT)

By Steve Hymon

The Los Angeles Times, February 11, 2006

Los Angeles Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa's frustration at not being told personally by the White House about the details of the reported terror plot against the city's tallest building stems from a greater annoyance:

Nearly 7 1/2 months after taking office, Villaraigosa said Friday that he still has not succeeded in speaking or meeting with President Bush.

Villaraigosa said that his office contacted the White House on two occasions last summer to set up meetings with Bush when the mayor was traveling to Washington, but that the White House turned down both.

The mayor — who co-chaired John Kerry's campaign to unseat Bush in 2004 — said the only personal contact he has had with the president is a congratulatory letter he received after being elected last year. In the four-sentence letter, Bush wrote, "I look forward to working with you as we strive to make our nation safer, stronger and better."

If he could get a meeting, Villaraigosa said, he would talk to the president about how to better protect the nation's second-largest city against terrorist attacks.

"No question about it, I would like to talk to him about the issue of homeland security and the issue of first responders and the need of cities to be fully reimbursed for the new, added cost" of security, Villaraigosa said. "I want to make the case that this is draining other very important municipal needs."

Dana Perino, a White House press secretary, said the White House had received two requests from the mayor for a meeting: one in a letter, the other in an e-mail.

"Because of scheduling reasons, the mayor was offered meetings with top officials, and those offers were kindly declined" by the mayor's office, Perino said.

"The other thing I would say," she added, "is the president has encouraged members of the Cabinet to meet with the mayor of Los Angeles," and Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff "was recently there. We want to work with the mayor, and we look forward to a good relationship with him."

Villaraigosa was visibly upset Thursday after a Bush speech in which the president offered new details of an alleged plot by Al Qaeda operatives to hijack a plane and fly it into the U.S. Bank Tower downtown. The plot, Bush said, had been broken up.

The mayor complained Friday that, although his staff was notified of some details, he deserved a call himself. Homeland Security officials took umbrage at that comment, saying that Bush was only giving a speech and that there was no direct threat to Los Angeles at present.

The mayor has only to look at some of his counterparts to feel miffed:

DOJ_NMG_0014527

Bush met with former Los Angeles Mayor James K. Hahn in January 2002 and again that April, when Hahn and mayors from other cities gathered with the president to discuss security issues.

Bush has also met with New York City Mayor Michael Bloomberg, a Republican, and Chicago Mayor Richard Daley, a Democrat, on several occasions.

In March 2001, less than two months after Bush took office, he met with Daley in Chicago.

"We had a long-ranging discussion, and I came just to introduce myself so he got to know me," said Bush, according to a transcript on the White House website. "And he now knows he can pick up the phone and call the White House any time he needs to."

Asked if he believed that Bush was ignoring him because of partisan politics, Villaraigosa said, "I hope not."

"One of the things that you noticed in my State of the Union [response] is that my comments were not partisan," the mayor said. "We distinguished between Democrats and Republicans, but ... I didn't spend a lot of time criticizing. I spent more time sharing a vision."

U.S. Concludes 'Cyber Storm' Mock Attacks (AP-Y2)

By Ted Bridis, Associated Press Writer

AP2, February 11, 2006

The government concluded its "Cyber Storm" wargame Friday, its biggest-ever exercise to test how it would respond to devastating attacks over the Internet from anti-globalization activists, underground hackers and bloggers.

Bloggers?

Participants confirmed parts of the worldwide simulation challenged government officials and industry executives to respond to deliberate misinformation campaigns and activist calls by Internet bloggers, online diarists whose "Web logs" include political rantings and musings about current events.

The Internet survived, even against fictional abuses against the world's computers on a scale typical for Fox's popular "24" television series. Experts depicted hackers who shut down electricity in 10 states, failures in vital systems for online banking and retail sales, infected discs mistakenly distributed by commercial software companies and critical flaws discovered in core Internet technology.

Some mock attacks were aimed at causing a "significant cyber disruption" that could seriously damage energy, transportation and health care industries and undermine public confidence, said George Foresman, an undersecretary at the Homeland Security Department.

There was no impact on the real Internet during the weeklong exercise. Government officials from the United States, Canada, Australia and England and executives from Microsoft, Cisco, Verisign and others said they were careful to simulate attacks only using isolated computers, working from basement offices at the Secret Services headquarters in downtown Washington.

The Homeland Security Department promised a full report on results from the exercise by summer.

Foresman likened his agency's role during any Internet attack to an orchestra conductor, coordinating responses from law enforcement, intelligence agencies, the military and private firms. The government's goal is a "symphony of preparedness," Foresman said.

Homeland Security coordinated the exercise. More than 115 government agencies, companies and organizations participated. They included the White House National Security Council, Justice Department, Defense Department, State Department, National Security Agency and CIA, which conducted its own cybersecurity exercise called "Silent Horizon" last May.

An earlier cyberterrorism exercise called "Livewire" for Homeland Security and other federal agencies concluded there were serious questions over government's role during a cyberattack depending on who was identified as the culprit — terrorists, a foreign government or bored teenagers.

It also questioned whether the U.S. government would be able to detect the early stages of such an attack without significant help from private technology companies.

___

On the Net:

Department of Homeland Security: http://www.dhs.gov

U.S. Officials Defend Ploys To Catch Immigrants (NYT)

By Steven Greenhouse

The New York Times, February 11, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0014528

Despite criticism from advocates for immigrants, federal immigration officials said in recent days that they would not forswear the practice of impersonating occupational safety officials to round up illegal immigrants.

Last July, federal agents arrested 48 workers at Seymour Johnson Air Force Base in North Carolina on charges of being illegal immigrants after the agents tricked the workers into attending what was billed as a mandatory training session sponsored by the federal Occupational Safety and Health Administration.

Afterward, the federal Labor Department, North Carolina officials and immigrant and job safety advocates criticized the ploy. They argued that the sting might cause immigrant workers to distrust safety officials just as the authorities were stepping up efforts to reduce the disproportionately high injury rate among Hispanic workers.

Lawyers for several labor and immigrant groups said yesterday that they were dismayed that when they met with officials at Immigration and Customs Enforcement on Jan. 30, the officials refused to rule out again using a safety-related ruse to lure immigrant workers.

Marielena Hincapié, director of programs at the National Immigration Law Center, said, "They said they would not commit to not doing this anymore, despite the fact that this would have a chilling effect on workers."

Ana Avendano, a lawyer with the A.F.L.-C.I.O., also criticized immigration officials for not providing the assurances that safety advocates were seeking.

"We told them that the population of workers that we're dealing with is suffering the highest mortality rate and highest injury rate on the job," Ms. Avendano said. "If immigration officials are going to use OSHA as a ruse, all they will do is reduce the trust of workers to go to OSHA with concerns about safety problems."

Dean Boyd, a spokesman for Immigration and Customs Enforcement, emphasized that ruses were standard law enforcement policy. "We're not going to rule out valid investigative techniques," he said.

Mr. Boyd said that if immigration officials were to do such a sting in the future, it would be only after coordinating with federal safety officials.

OSHA officials repeated yesterday the stance they took after the July raid, saying the agency worked to build trust with Hispanic workers. They also said they did not condone using the agency's name in this type of ruse.

At a Senate hearing in October, Michael Chertoff, the secretary of homeland security, said it was appropriate to use ruses, but he added that those involving health and safety were not appropriate.

Mr. Boyd said the employment of illegal immigrants at sensitive facilities like military bases posed a serious threat to domestic security. He said that, given their illegal status, they might be vulnerable to exploitation by criminals or terrorists.

"That's why we're aggressively targeting these types of workers at sensitive facilities," Mr. Boyd said. "We've got an obligation under the law to do what we need to do to remove those people immediately from a position where they could do potential harm."

On Thursday, immigration agents arrested nine illegal immigrants who were working for a subcontractor at the Dugway Proving Ground, a military testing site southwest of Salt Lake City. Last month, immigration officials arrested 11 illegal immigrants at Tyndall Air Force Base near Panama City, Fla.

Arizona Plans To Tackle Illegal Aliens (WT)

The Washington Times, February 11, 2006

PHOENIX (AP) -- Arizona has long been one of the busiest gateways for aliens trying to sneak into the country, and some lawmakers believe it's time to dispatch state police squads to catch those who slip past border agents.

The notion is gaining political traction as the public's frustration about the state's porous border with Mexico grows. Over the years, it was often resisted by officials who contended that stopping illegal entry should be the sole province of the federal government.

A state lawmaker has proposed a plan that includes $20 million for the Arizona Department of Public Safety to mount a 100-member squad to operate surveillance equipment, construct border barriers, target drug and immigrant smugglers and perhaps patrol the border.

"I'm not putting the handcuffs on. Whatever they need to do, they need to be doing," said Republican Rep. Russell Pearce, the plan's sponsor.

A different plan by Gov. Janet Napolitano, a Democrat, would have two state police squads focus on alien smuggling cases. Both plans offer millions of dollars to communities to thwart illegal entries, and money for combating gang-related border crime.

Arizona has been dogged by a heavy flow of illegal aliens since the government tightened enforcement in El Paso, Texas, and San Diego during the mid-1990s. The Border Patrol apprehended 725,093 illegal border crossers in Arizona in fiscal 2000, though the numbers declined after the September 11 terrorist attacks prompted heightened border security.

DOJ_NMG_0014529

State police in Arizona already work near the border. An average of 27 state police officers are near the border at any given time, assisting federal authorities in looking for fugitives trying to leave the country and people attempting to bring ill-gotten cash and stolen vehicles into Mexico.

Advocates for state and local action said the idea will not fix Arizona's vast immigration problems, but would discourage some people from sneaking across the border.

"If the federal government isn't going to do the job and Arizona is footing billions of dollars a year for illegal aliens, it makes sense for the state to get involved," said Ira Mehlman, spokesman for the Federation for American Immigration Reform, which favors limits on immigration.

Opponents say racial profiling could increase if officers unfamiliar with immigration law were to try and enforce it. They also say it could make investigating crime harder in immigrant communities, because fewer aliens would cooperate with police for fear of being sent home. Local officers also lack understanding of complex immigration law, they say.

U.S. Cites Rise In Violence Along Border With Mexico (NYT)

By Rachel L. Swarns

The New York Times, February 11, 2006

WASHINGTON, Feb. 10 — Mexican criminal syndicates are stepping up their attacks on American agents patrolling the border as officials of the Homeland Security Department intensify efforts to stem the flow of immigrants and drugs into the United States, American officials said this week.

In recent months, scores of Border Patrol agents have been fired upon or pelted with large stones as well as with cloth-covered stones that have been doused with flammable liquid and set ablaze. Since October, agents have been attacked in more than 190 cases, officials said on Thursday.

Most of the attacks have occurred along the Mexican border near San Diego, but shootings have also been reported along the border in Texas near the cities of Laredo and McAllen. In the fiscal year that ended on Sept. 30, there were 778 attacks on agents, up from 374 in the previous fiscal year, Homeland Security Department officials said.

One stone struck an agent in the eye; a gunshot hit an agent in the leg. The officials could not say precisely how many officers had been injured in the attacks, which have originated from both sides of the border.

"This is what we're facing," said David V. Aguilar, the Border Patrol chief, who played a videotape at a news conference on Thursday that featured a patrol car riddled with bullets and agents scrambling for cover as stones rained down on them. "This is a very serious type of situation."

The homeland security secretary, Michael Chertoff, who led the news conference, said officials planned to continue their efforts at securing the United States-Mexico border.

This week President Bush asked Congress to increase the Homeland Security Department's budget by nearly 6 percent. The Border Patrol would receive an extra $459 million to hire 1,500 new agents, bringing the total force to about 14,000. An additional $410 million would be allocated to add 6,700 beds for detainees so fewer illegal immigrants would have to be released before being deported. Another $100 million would be spent on cameras, sensors and other detection technology.

Mr. Chertoff said the department planned to focus on illegal immigrants from countries other than Mexico, who have typically been released after apprehension because of shortages of beds. Last fall, he expanded the use of summary deportations, a process known as expedited removal, in which illegal immigrants from countries other than Mexico are detained and then deported without seeing an immigration judge.

But officials have struggled to find space for family groups and remain unable to process illegal immigrants from El Salvador because of a court ruling from the 1980's, when civil war wracked that country, that requires officials to allow Salvadorans to see judges before deportation.

Nationwide, 18,207 illegal immigrants from countries other than Mexico, nearly 60 percent of the total apprehended, were released on their own recognizance in the first three months of this fiscal year.

Officials of the Homeland Security Department said they were making headway in detaining and deporting these illegal immigrants. They are also working on finding more space for families and battling to change the rule regarding Salvadorans.

As for the violence on the border, the officials said Mexico had deployed 300 federal officers along its side of the border to help out. But many of the Mexican gangs remain entrenched.

Last week, immigration officials announced that they had seized a cache of weapons, including materials for 33 explosive devices, assault weapons and machine gun assembly kits, in Laredo. Officials believe the weapons were intended for criminals in Mexico.

"These are very sophisticated, hardened criminals who will use violence to protect their criminal businesses," Mr. Chertoff said. "We've got to be prepared to deal very decisively with any violence directed at our Border Patrol agents."

DOJ_NMG_0014530

Border Wall May Be Boon For Smugglers (DMN)

By Alfredo Corchado

The Dallas Morning News, February 11, 2006

If difficulty in moving illegal immigrants rises, so does price

AHUALULCO, Mexico – A bill to erect a wall to help keep illegal immigrants out of the U.S. has not been approved by Congress, but it probably can count on support from an unlikely constituency – people smugglers.

That's because along the border, and in places such as this town in San Luis Potosí state, smugglers expect that such a wall would lead to an increase in their business moving people across the Rio Grande.

Already some coyotes, as the smugglers are known, are pumping up their prices. The fee they charge to take a Mexican to Dallas, for instance, has increased from $1,200 to $1,500, some residents say.

"That's the way it is," said a smuggler who identified himself as Gregorio Prieto, as he played pool and negotiated with prospective clients at the Ahualulco Billiards hall near the town's central plaza.

"Any time the crossing gets harder, the price also goes up. Because nothing will stop the flow as long as Americans want their labor. They're just making it more difficult for the ilegales and more profitable for us."

In December, the House approved a bill that includes plans to erect 700 miles of physical barriers in key zones of the 2,000-mile U.S.-Mexico border. Advocates say the fence will keep out drug smugglers, terrorists and illegal immigrants, especially in high-volume areas.

AP Members of the Mexican congress tour the construction of a wall along the U.S.-Mexico border near Tijuana.

"A lot of the people coming across the border are criminals and potentially terrorists – people who have a mind to commit crimes against Americans and maybe to blow us all up and kill us," Rep. James Sensenbrenner said at a recent meeting with a sheriffs' coalition in Houston. The Wisconsin Republican is one of the bill's authors.

Critics say the barriers would simply push traffic to weak points along the border.

The bill is awaiting action by the Senate, which is likely to reject the measure, analysts say.

But even the possibility of a wall is affecting informal commerce, such as traffic in Mexican beer and culinary delicacies like gorditas, corn tortillas fried and filled with some combination of meat, beans, cheese, potatoes and nopales, or cactus, that are popular with Mexicans.

One family that has made a business of sending homemade gorditas to Dallas is considering relocating to North Texas, in part over concern that a wall would hurt business.

Family matriarch Doña Constantina Rivera, who has long sent gorditas to her emigrant children in Dallas, says she may abandon the practice.

When Ms. Rivera's children left for Texas in the late 1990s, she tried to assuage their nostalgia for home, doing what came naturally: She baked gorditas and sent them off to her homesick offspring with the help of informal couriers who ferry goods across the border.

The gorditas were so tasty that other immigrants sought them out. Demand grew and so did the number of gorditas sent north, sometime hundreds a week.

But the informal business drew attention. When Ms. Rivera's gordita trade was featured on the front pages of Mexican newspapers and on television newscasts, San Luis Potosí state authorities tried to collect taxes from her.

She's fighting those efforts, arguing that the business doesn't generate enough to pay taxes.

Now, talk of a "Berlin Wall," as President Vicente Fox described the proposed barrier, has made the Rivera family so nervous that Ms. Rivera and other relatives are planning to move to Dallas before any barrier goes up. "Half our family lives in Dallas," said daughter Anita, 24. "No wall is going to separate us."

This would not be the first time American legislation significantly affected affairs on the Mexican side.

The Immigration Reform and Control Act of 1986 allowed millions of illegal immigrants residing in the U.S. to become legal permanent residents. But the amnesty bill also led to coyotes raising the prices they charged to smuggle people across the Rio Grande. Some Mexican families living in the U.S. were effectively fenced in, unable to move back and forth between the two countries.

After devaluation of the peso in 1994, the number of Mexicans trying to illegally cross the border increased, and the U.S. responded with a series of border-control operations, including Operation Hold the Line in Texas.

The operation, which involved the addition of hundreds of Border Patrol agents, was credited with reducing crime as well as illegal immigration into the El Paso area.

It also contributed to a significant increase in the death toll, critics said, as immigrants tried to cross in less heavily patrolled areas where the terrain was more dangerous. Last year, an estimated 500 Mexicans died trying to cross the border.

DOJ_NMG_0014531

Now, the wall proposal has been drawing similar criticism.

"The bill is good business for the smuggling business," said Mexican Consul Juan Carlos Foncerrada Berumen in El Paso, who has heard reports of border crossers in the region. "Coyotes are good at exploiting and manipulating the news about a possible wall. This is good for business because they can justify raising the prices."

In Ahualulco, near a recently closed bar called Los Amigos del Norte (Friends of the North), shop owner Tomás Galabis, 66, said the talk on the street about border barriers has people stirred up.

"Even the bar owners left recently, afraid that the wall would keep them out," he said. "The risks have people nervous."

Playing pool at Ahualulco Billiards, Lázaro Rivas, 22, talked about the higher prices being charged by smugglers. "I'm planning to go to Dallas," he said, "but $1,500 is a lot of money. I'll still go, but I have to dig deeper to come up with the extra cash."

Rivera family members say they believe the time has come to make a move.

"If we don't leave now, it will be harder, and coyotes will take advantage of us," said 27-year-old Jesús, husband of Anita Rivera. "It's happened before."

Cross-Border Tunnel Found In San Diego (WP/AP)

By The Associated Press

The Washington Post, February 11, 2006

SAN DIEGO -- An incomplete tunnel was found in the same area where investigators recently found one of the longest passages discovered beneath the U.S.-Mexico border, officials said.

The 3-foot-wide tunnel extended from just south of the border fence in Mexico to a point about 23 feet into the United States, ending at a concrete levee, Border Patrol spokesman Richard Kite said.

A patrol agent noticed a distortion in the road running along the border fence, and agents digging in the area found the tunnel Thursday, Kite said.

"It was only about six inches below the asphalt," he said.

A 2,400-foot tunnel linking a warehouse near the airport in Tijuana, Mexico, to another warehouse in San Diego was discovered last month.

___

Information from: The San Diego Union-Tribune, http://www.uniontrib.com

More Medicines From Abroad Seized (LAT)

By Lisa Girion

The Los Angeles Times, February 11, 2006

The U.S. government apparently is stepping up seizures of cheap drugs ordered by Americans — mainly seniors — from abroad, Canadian pharmacies say.

The pharmacies, which sell drugs by mail and over the Internet, say their shipments are being intercepted by U.S. Customs officials around the country where foreign mail is handled.

"It's huge — we've had over 800 seizures in January," up from 15 in a typical month, said Barney Britton, president of Calgary-based MinitDrugs.

Other pharmacies reported four- to five-fold increases. An informal survey of 30 Canadian pharmacies that cater to American customers, conducted by a senior-citizen advocacy website, showed that the rise began in November, doubled in December and doubled again in January.

Health officials in Minnesota, the first of several states to make cheaper Canadian drugs more readily available to its residents, echoed the reports from north of the border. They said seizures increased in late December from less than 1% to about 4% of shipments, said Brian McClung, a spokesman for Minnesota Gov. Tim Pawlenty.

Ordering drugs from abroad is illegal. But U.S. Customs and Food and Drug Administration officials have generally allowed the practice, apart from occasional seizures designed to publicize potential risks.

Federal regulators say that policy hasn't changed — and there is no crackdown.

"It's not a special effort other than our normal enforcement," said Lynn Hollinger, a spokeswoman for U.S. Customs and Border Protection.

People whose drugs are seized are not cited and generally are able to get them replaced free of charge by the foreign pharmacy. But many customers are infuriated.

"It's despicable," said Samuel Robert Greenberg, a Laguna Niguel retiree who lost a package of anti-cholesterol pills and glaucoma eyedrops late last month. "They are playing with people's lives."

DOJ_NMG_0014532

Greenberg, 73, said he and his wife had bought drugs from Canadian pharmacies for years without incident.

But if replacements for his Lipitor pills don't arrive by next week, Greenberg said, he will have to buy from a local pharmacy at a cost of about $3 a pill — a third more than he pays through the mail.

Greenberg said such seizures were a waste of government resources. "Forget about the heroin," Greenberg said. "They are going to stop the Lipitor."

Although the FDA has never taken enforcement action against an individual for ordering prescription drugs from abroad, it has conducted a handful of what it calls "blitzes" over the last five years in cooperation with the Customs Service at international mail centers.

The FDA analyzed the drugs seized in those cases and publicized their findings in an effort to warn mail-order customers about the risks of getting the wrong medication, poor-quality substitutes or counterfeits.

Some Canadian pharmacy operators believe U.S. authorities timed the latest seizures to coincide with the Jan. 1 launch of Medicare's drug-discount program, which competes for the business of American seniors.

"I think, quite frankly, that [U.S. authorities] see an opportunity," said Britton of MinitDrugs. "They know that this would probably be the most vulnerable time for us."

Canadian pharmacies report declines of 10% to 30% in U.S. orders since the Medicare program began. But many seniors, particularly those whose drug needs are modest, find Canadian pharmacies are cheaper.

According to a Kaiser Family Foundation study published in 2004, 25% of eligible seniors — as many as 7.4 million people — could pay less buying drugs on their own. If too few seniors sign up for the Medicare drug plan, experts say, the program could run into financial trouble.

Most Canadian pharmacies accept the cost of replacing seized drugs to preserve an $800-million market that serves about 2 million U.S. customers. Over the last five years, less than 1% of all shipments have been seized, said Andy Troszok, president of the Canadian International Pharmacy Assn.

The association has not yet determined how much that rate has increased. But so far, he said, the seizures do not represent a serious threat.

"We are currently still chalking it up as the cost of doing business," said Troszok, who owns Extended Care Pharmacy in Calgary.

The pharmacies learn of the confiscations from customers who have received seizure notices. A customer also can use a tracking number to find out what happened.

A sudden, unannounced policy of increased enforcement — after years of looking the other way — would be irresponsible, Troszok said.

"It's an issue of patient safety," he said. "We're not talking about Viagra and narcotics abuse. We are talking about people with breast cancer, heart disease and diabetes and are established on medication. Who is going to be liable for these people going off medical regimens and suffering or even dying?"

Canadian pharmacies, which are able to purchase brand-name drugs at low wholesale prices negotiated with the purchasing power of the Canadian government, already had been adapting to increasing political and market pressure.

When major drug makers began curbing sales to Canadian pharmacies that shipped to the U.S., many began ordering in bulk from drug factories in Europe, India and Israel.

"The business just gets smarter and adapts," said Bill Pigden, business development manager for CanAmerica Global Health Services, a Winnipeg-based pharmacy.

Ex-FEMA Head Says White House Knew About Levees (LAT)

By Edwin Chen

The Los Angeles Times, February 11, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Bush administration's bungled response to Hurricane Katrina came under fresh scrutiny today amid revelations during a Senate hearing that senior White House officials had learned of the disastrous flooding in New Orleans a day earlier than they had previously indicated.

The testimony of Michael D. Brown, the ousted director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, raised questions about whether top White House aides had kept President Bush fully abreast of the fast-breaking catastrophe after a levee breached on Aug. 29, allowing the waters of the Gulf of Mexico to cover huge portions of New Orleans.

Bush, who was vacationing at his ranch when Katrina struck, has taken considerable criticism — and has accepted responsibility — for his administration's slow response to the hurricane. But the latest information suggests that he may not have known the full dimensions of the unfolding disaster.

DOJ_NMG_0014533

Top administration aides, and Bush himself, have said that they had been caught off guard on Tuesday, Aug. 30, by the news of the levee breach and the subsequent flooding. Bush has recalled publicly that earlier that morning he felt a sense of relief, thinking that the city had "dodged the bullet."

But Brown told the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee this morning that he had called a senior White House aide, most likely deputy chief of staff Joe Hagin, the previous evening, Monday, Aug. 29, to inform him of the levee break.

Brown, testifying under oath, was unable to say with total assurance that it was Hagin with whom he spoke that night, but said it "probably" was Hagin, a person with whom he had "a personal relationship." Brown added that he was fully confident that Hagin, who was with the president at his ranch, would inform Bush.

"I never worried about whether I talked directly to the president because I knew that in speaking to Joe I was talking directly to the president," Brown testified. "I told him we were realizing our worst nightmare," Brown added.

At the White House this morning, Press Secretary Scott McClellan defended the steps the president and his aides took, saying that ahead of the storm the administration had issued warnings and emergency declarations to speed assistance to the Gulf Coast. But, he acknowledged, "there were failures at all levels of government."

"The president was focused on saving lives," McClellan said.

As Brown recalled the sequence of events, a top FEMA staffer, Marty Bahamonde, first heard reports of the 17th Street levee breach on Monday morning. The aide took a helicopter tour and confirmed the situation around 5 p.m. Bahamonde then informed Brown.

Brown said he called the traveling White House in Crawford, Texas, almost immediately.

The apparent miscommunication over the levee breach was but one example of what committee Chairman Susan M. Collins (R-Me.) today called a glaring instance of an overall governmental response that was "riddled with missed opportunities, poor decision-making and failed leadership."

Collins' committee is winding down a five-month-long investigation of the government's response to Katrina, having held nearly 20 hearings, taking testimony from more than 200 witnesses and reviewing hundreds of thousands of government documents.

The Maine Republican said her committee hopes to fully understand the nature of "this enormous disconnect between what was happening on the ground — a city 80% flooded, uncontrolled levees, people dying, thousands of people waiting to be rescued — and the official reaction among many of the key leaders in Washington and in Northern Command that somehow New Orleans had dodged the bullet."

Collins said this morning that one lesson she already has learned is that there is "a strong correlation between effective leadership and effective response. Unfortunately, I have also found the converse to be true."

In his testimony, Brown also blamed FEMA's slow response on "a culture clash" between FEMA and its parent agency, the Department of Homeland Security, that he said was "doomed to failure."

Repeatedly, Brown said, top DHS officials rebuffed his pre-Katrina efforts to bolster FEMA's capacities in response to disasters.

Times staff writer James Gerstenzang contributed to this report.

Brown Blames Superiors For Response To Katrina (WP)

By Spencer S. Hsu

The Washington Post, February 11, 2006

Michael D. Brown, the former Federal Emergency Management Agency director, accused the Bush administration yesterday of setting the nation's disaster preparedness on a "path to failure" before Hurricane Katrina by overemphasizing the threat of terrorism, and of discounting warnings on the day the storm hit that a worst-case flood was enveloping New Orleans.

Brown called "a little disingenuous" and "just baloney" assertions by Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff and other top Bush administration officials that they were unaware of the severity of the catastrophe for a day after Katrina struck on Aug. 29. Investigators say their inaction delayed the launch of federal emergency measures, rescue efforts and aid to tens of thousands of stranded New Orleans residents.

Brown's highly charged testimony before a Senate investigative panel was a striking about-face from his comments to its House counterpart in September, when he was still on the administration payroll. At that time, Brown leveled his harshest criticism for what President Bush has called an "inadequate" response at Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco (D) and New Orleans Mayor C. Ray Nagin (D), who Brown said failed to fully evacuate the city and to forge a unified command.

DOJ_NMG_0014534

His sometimes combative exchanges with senators also offered a rare glimpse of a former Bush official publicly criticizing the administration. He sharpened his earlier criticism and named people whom he had previously described only in general terms.

After the White House declined to offer Brown a legal defense of executive privilege, which would have allowed him not to testify to lawmakers, Brown said yesterday that Chertoff and his predecessor, Tom Ridge, paved the way for FEMA's Katrina failures by fomenting a "cultural clash" between FEMA and the Department of Homeland Security. DHS absorbed FEMA in 2003, and the head of the emergency agency stopped reporting to the president.

Internal turf wars siphoned away FEMA's disaster response capability and funding, Brown said. If not repaired, he said, the Department of Homeland Security is "doomed to fail, and that will fail the country."

Brown also cited a "disconnect" with Bush officials in the hours before and after Katrina hit. He said they were distracted by the fight against terrorism from the general threat posed by recurring natural disasters and from specific warnings that a direct hit by a projected Category 5 hurricane would swamp New Orleans and strand as many as 100,000 people.

Brown said he called and spoke at least twice on Aug. 29 with White House Deputy Chief of Staff Joseph Hagin or Chief of Staff Andrew H. Card Jr., telling them: "New Orleans is flooding; it's the worst-case scenario." But the message apparently did not get through to Homeland Security officials.

"They should have had awareness of it, because they were receiving the same information that we were," Brown said.

"Had there been a report coming out . . . that said, 'Yes, we've confirmed that a terrorist has blown up the 17th Street Canal levee,' then everybody would have jumped all over that and been trying to do everything they could," Brown said. "But because this was a natural disaster, that has become the stepchild within the Department of Homeland Security."

The Category 3 storm eventually killed 1,321 people, including 1,072 in Louisiana; displaced about 2 million people; and caused more than $150 billion in damage.

Speaking to reporters yesterday, White House spokesman Scott McClellan cited "conflicting reports" immediately after the storm hit. "Some were saying" the levee system "was overtopped," he said. "Some were saying it was breached. And, again, we knew of the flooding that was going on -- that's why our top priority was focused on saving lives."

Testifying after Brown, Matthew Broderick, the department's director of operations coordination, and Robert B. Stephan, assistant secretary for infrastructure protection, faulted Brown for failing to communicate with the chain of command.

"Mr. Brown should have picked up the phone and called the secretary right away," Broderick said.

Brown, who first received reports that city levees were failing at 10 a.m. on Aug. 29, said that he relayed them to headquarters for confirmation and alerted Hagin, who was with Bush at the president's Texas ranch as well as in Arizona and California that day.

Brown said he could not recall whether Bush was on the line, but he added: "I knew that in speaking to Joe, I was talking directly to the president." Brown later said that he did not ask Hagin for any particular help, and that he regretted not calling for military assistance the weekend before Katrina made landfall.

Brown, a Bush political loyalist who became the face of the government's failed response, said under questioning that he repeatedly asked the White House and other federal agencies for help, but that his authority was limited by FEMA's position within the Department of Homeland Security and that the agency's resources were overwhelmed.

He has been criticized for his lack of leadership after the storm, for his own lack of awareness of the developing crisis and for misstatements about conditions at New Orleans's convention center, where thousands were stranded without food and water. Leaked e-mails have portrayed Brown as more concerned with his public appearance and planned departure from FEMA than with disaster operations.

Brown's deputy at FEMA, Patrick Rhode, testified yesterday that he participated in a conference call on the afternoon of Aug. 29 detailing catastrophic levee failures and alerted the department's Homeland Security Operations Center, which was feeding reports to the White House.

Senators released a timeline showing that authorities received 16 reports from federal, state and local agencies and the American Red Cross that New Orleans's levees had been breached between 8:30 a.m. and 6 p.m. on Aug. 29, though the Homeland Security Operations Center reported the opposite at 6 p.m.

A perplexed Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine), chairman of the Senate investigation, asked why the official reaction of Washington and the military was that New Orleans had "dodged the bullet" despite reports from the ground that the city was 80 percent flooded, its levee system had failed and thousands faced death.

"All they had to do," Brown said, was listen to the Homeland Security teleconferences "and pay attention."

Collins singled out Chertoff and other department officials for a "lack of awareness" of fundamental emergency operations and a "slow, hesitant response." She said that though "DHS's playbook appears designed to distance" top officials from FEMA, they "must answer for decisions that they made or failed to make."

Under questioning, Brown said he did not directly brief Chertoff -- who was "gone or going to Atlanta" for an Aug. 30 event on the possible flu pandemic -- because "it would have wasted my time." He said he preferred to call Card or Hagin directly.

Sen. Robert F. Bennett (R-Utah) called Brown's remarks "staggering." He said they demonstrated "a dysfunctional department to a degree far greater than any we've seen."

After Brown spoke to the Senate, he was subpoenaed to reappear before House investigators.

Next week, Chertoff and Frances Fragos Townsend, the White House's homeland security adviser, are scheduled to discuss internal changes. And the House investigative committee is scheduled to issue its Katrina report.

Ex-FEMA Leader Faults Response By White House (NYT)

By Eric Lipton

The New York Times, February 11, 2006

WASHINGTON, Feb. 10 — Michael D. Brown, the former federal emergency management chief who became a ridiculed symbol of the Bush administration's flawed response to Hurricane Katrina, returned in anger to Capitol Hill on Friday and lashed back at his former superiors.

Mr. Brown said that he told a senior White House official early on of the New Orleans flooding, and that the administration was too focused on terrorism to respond properly to natural disasters.

Testifying before a Senate committee, Mr. Brown said he notified a senior White House official — who he said was probably Joe Hagin, the deputy White House chief of staff, but might have been Andrew H. Card Jr., the chief of staff — on the day the hurricane hit to report that it had turned into his "worst nightmare" and that New Orleans was flooding.

It was the first public identification of any White House official who was said to have directly received reports of extensive flooding on Monday, Aug. 29, the day Hurricane Katrina hit.

In the aftermath of the storm, administration officials said they were caught by surprise when they were told of the levee breach on Tuesday, Aug. 30. Mr. Hagin was the senior staff member with President Bush on the day the hurricane hit, when Mr. Bush was traveling in California.

Mr. Brown's politically charged appearance before the Senate Committee on Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs quickly divided the panel's members by party.

Several Republican senators peppered him with hostile questions and suggested he was trying to deflect the blame from his own failures.

In contrast, Mr. Brown drew a gentle, even warm response from Democrats who said he had unfairly been made a scapegoat by the administration, though last year it was frequently Mr. Brown himself who drew the most fire from Democrats in Washington.

In contrast to low-key statements in the past, Mr. Brown, who resigned under pressure on Sept. 12 as director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, was aggressively on the defensive, saying he was "sick and tired" of his remarks or e-mail messages being taken out of context or hearing that he lacked the leadership skills for his job.

Mr. Brown said it was "baloney" for Department of Homeland Security officials to claim they did not know of the extent of the flooding until Tuesday, because he and other FEMA officials had notified them the day before.

In response to questioning, Mr. Brown also said he believed he told the White House on Monday that a breach had occurred in the 17th Street Canal levee, passing on observations made by one of his staff members on the ground in New Orleans that day.

"Everything that we had planned about, worried about, that FEMA, frankly, had worried about for 10 years was coming true," Mr. Brown said he told the White House aide.

Scott McClellan, the White House press secretary, said Friday morning while the hearing was under way that the administration already knew the city was being flooded. Regardless of the call from Mr. Brown, there were conflicting reports about whether a levee had been breached, Mr. McClellan said.

"The top priority at that time was on saving lives; it was on search and rescue operations," Mr. McClellan said.

Mr. Brown said that he could not recall if he personally called the homeland security secretary, Michael Chertoff, to relay the account of the levee breach. Even if he had, Mr. Brown said, it would have been a waste of time because FEMA's role within the Homeland Security Department had been subordinated to fighting terror. As a result of that, he said, he was unable to quickly get the kind of action he needed, unless he called the White House staff.

The Bush administration, as a whole, he said, did not seem to care enough about natural disasters and had relegated natural disasters to a "stepchild" of national security.

"It is my belief," Mr. Brown told the senators, that if "we've confirmed that a terrorist has blown up the 17th Street Canal levee, then everybody would have jumped all over that and been trying to do everything they could."

DOJ_NMG_0014536

Republicans, including Senator Susan Collins of Maine, the chairwoman, said Mr. Brown's disdain for the new domestic security structure left the department without crucial information it needed about what was happening in New Orleans. Senator Norm Coleman, Republican of Minnesota, said Mr. Brown was shifting attention away from his own lack of responsiveness to the disaster.

"You're not prepared to kind of put a mirror in front of your face and recognize your own inadequacies and say, 'You know something, I made some big mistakes. I wasn't focused. I didn't get things done,' " Mr. Coleman said.

The remark provoked Mr. Brown to raise his voice almost to a shout.

"What do you want me to say?" Mr. Brown said. "I have admitted to mistakes publicly. I've admitted to mistakes in hearings. What more, Senator Coleman, do you want from me?"

Mr. Coleman responded: "A little more candor would suffice."

Democrats, including Senator Frank R. Lautenberg of New Jersey and Daniel K. Akaka of Hawaii, said Mr. Brown was being made a scapegoat to deflect criticism from the White House.

"Keep your chin up and fight back," Mr. Lautenberg said.

Several senators, including Democrats, said they were surprised by Mr. Brown's inability to remember crucial details from the early days of the storm, including which White House aide he spoke with and whether Mr. Bush participated in the telephone call.

Mr. Brown also gave differing answers about whether he actually mentioned the levee breach to the White House. At first he said he could not recall whether he used those words but then later he said that he was sure Mr. Hagin or Mr. Card knew it and that he would have told one of them about the breach during the conversation.

He said he could not recall whether he told the White House aide that he needed any particular help — at a time when the city was flooding, thousands were packed into the Superdome without adequate supplies and others were beginning to climb to roofs or attics to avoid drowning.

Two senior Homeland Security Department officials, who testified after Mr. Brown, said that his unwillingness to honor the chain of command and give regular updates to Mr. Chertoff or others in the department severely hampered the department's response.

"We have a president, we have a secretary that are seeing things on television, we're getting reports, what is going on down there?" said Gen. Matthew E. Broderick, who served as the director of the Homeland Security Department's information center in Washington during the storm, recalling his request to FEMA for more information.

Brown Defends His Role In Response To Katrina (WT/AP)

By Lara Jakes Jordan, Associated Press

The Washington Times, February 11, 2006

Former federal disaster chief Michael D. Brown said yesterday he told top Bush officials of massive flooding in New Orleans the day Katrina howled ashore and warned "we were realizing our worst nightmare."

More defiant than defensive, Mr. Brown told senators he dealt directly with White House officials the day of the Aug. 29 storm, including Chief of Staff Andrew H. Card Jr. and Deputy Chief of Staff Joe Hagin.

He also said officials from the Department of Homeland Security were getting regular briefings that day. Administration officials have said they did not realize the severe damage Katrina had caused until after the storm had passed.

Under oath, Mr. Brown told the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee that he could not explain why his appeals failed to produce a faster response to the storm that killed 1,300, uprooted hundreds of thousands of Gulf Coast residents and caused tens of billions of dollars in damage.

"I expected them to cut every piece of red tape, do everything they could ... that I didn't want to hear anybody say that we couldn't do everything they humanly could to respond to this," Mr. Brown said about a video conference with administration officials -- in which President Bush briefly participated -- the day before Katrina hit. "Because I knew in my gut this was the bad one."

At an occasionally contentious White House briefing yesterday, Bush spokesman Scott McClellan said there were conflicting reports about the levees in the immediate aftermath of the storm.

"We knew of the flooding that was going on," Mr. McClellan said. "That's why our top priority was focused on saving lives. ... The cause of the flooding was secondary to that top priority and that's the way it should be."

Some senators suggested Mr. Brown, in his second Capitol Hill appearance since Katrina, look inward before pointing the finger elsewhere.

DOJ_NMG_0014537

"You're not prepared to put a mirror in front of your face and recognize your own inadequacies," said Sen. Norm Coleman, Minnesota Republican. "Perhaps you may get a more sympathetic hearing if you had a willingness to confess your own sins in this."

Mr. Brown responded: "That's very easy for you to say sitting behind that dais and not being there in the middle of that disaster watching that human suffering and watching those people dying and trying to deal with those structural dysfunctionalities, even within the federal government."

Mr. Brown, who quit under fire as chief of the FEMA, agreed with some senators who characterized him as a scapegoat for government failures.

"I feel somewhat abandoned," Mr. Brown said.

Department of Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff has said he did not know that New Orleans' levees were breached until Aug. 30. Mr. Bush at the time said, "I don't think anybody anticipated the breach of the levees."

Recounting conference calls that described initial damage reports the day Katrina struck, Mr. Brown scoffed at assertions that Homeland Security didn't know about the devastation's scope until the next day. He called those claims "just baloney."

The disjointed federal response, Mr. Brown said, was in part the result of FEMA being swallowed in 2003 by the newly created Homeland Security Department, which he said was focused on fighting terrorism.

Natural disasters "had become the stepchild of the Department of Homeland Security," he said. Had there been a report that "a terrorist had blown up the [New Orleans] 17th Street Canal levee, then everybody would have jumped all over that."

Some senators attempted to trace the failures back to the White House.

"You quite appropriately and admirably wanted to get the word to the president as quickly as you could," said Sen. Joe Lieberman, Connecticut Democrat, asking about Mr. Brown's conversation with Mr. Hagin on the evening of Aug. 29. "Did you tell Mr. Hagin in that phone call that New Orleans was flooding?"

Mr. Brown answered: "I think I told him that we were realizing our worst nightmare, that everything we had planned about, worried about, that FEMA, frankly, had worried about for 10 years was coming true."

Sen. Robert F. Bennett, Utah Republican, suggested Mr. Brown may have delayed the federal response by cutting Homeland Security out of the loop about the levee failures and going straight to the White House.

"I think I now understand why Secretary Chertoff says he didn't know," Mr. Bennett said. "The reason he didn't know is because you didn't think it important to tell him."

Mr. Brown said he communicated directly with the White House instead of Homeland Security because FEMA's parent agency "just bogged things down."

After three hours of testimony, Mr. Brown was handed a subpoena ordering him to reappear in front of a House panel investigating the storm response. Mr. Brown is expected to be questioned by House investigators this weekend -- days before the panel is expected to release its findings on the storm.

Brown Blames Federal Infighting (BRA)

By GERARD SHIELDS

Baton Rouge Advocate, February 11, 2006

WASHINGTON — The former director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency told a U.S. Senate investigating committee on Friday that differences with his superiors became so widespread that they hampered the federal government's response to Hurricane Katrina.

Michael Brown also told the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee that he alerted the White House and his bosses at the U.S. Department of Homeland Security of levee breaches in New Orleans a full day before they have acknowledged.

Brown said he called White House and Homeland Security officials the Monday afternoon after the hurricane hit. President Bush and Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff have said that they did not know about the levee breaches until Tuesday.

Brown acknowledged that he did not directly call Chertoff, who was technically his supervisor.

"It would've wasted my time," Brown said. "DHS was an additional bureaucracy that would have slowed me down."

One committee member, U.S. Sen. Robert Bennett, R-Utah, called the revelation "staggering" and an example of dysfunction in the Homeland Security department.

"Now I know why Secretary Chertoff didn't know," Bennett said. "The reason he didn't know is because you didn't think it important to tell him."

White House spokesman Scott McClellan said Friday that news of flooding was coming into the White House but that there were conflicting reports.

DOJ_NMG_0014538

U.S. Sen. Susan Collins, R-Maine, serves as chairwoman of the committee, and agreed that Brown's testimony signaled deficiencies in the agency designated to handle U.S. disasters.

"It also reflects the tensions between the two (agencies) that pre-dates the storm, tensions over resources, role and responsibilities within the department," she said.

FEMA, whose director in the past held a Cabinet position answerable to the president, was placed under the Department of Homeland Security in 2003. Brown, who was hired the same year, authorized two studies that found FEMA lacking in its ability to handle a natural disaster. The latest study and recommendations for improvement came out five months before Katrina hit on Aug. 29.

"We were never given the money and never given the resources to implement any of those recommendations," Brown said.

Brown called putting FEMA under the Homeland Security department a "fatal flaw." He painted his division as secondary in a department more focused on preventing terrorist attacks than handling natural disasters.

"The cultural differences are so wide that FEMA cannot function in DHS," said Brown, who was eventually dismissed and now runs his own consulting business. "Because this was a natural disaster, it became the stepchild to national security."

Had there been a report that "a terrorist had blown up the 17th Street Canal levee, then everybody would have jumped all over that," Brown added.

Brown was designated principal federal official under the national response plan by Chertoff after the storm hit. The designation hampered Brown's ability to manage the aftermath, he said.

"You can't run a disaster that way," Brown said. "I was literally restrained by Secretary Chertoff and told to stay in Baton Rouge."

U.S. Sen. Norm Coleman, R-Minn., criticized Brown for failing to properly manage the storm's aftermath. He called the hurricane a "perfect storm of inadequate response."

"You'd get more of a sympathetic hearing if you were willing to confess your own sins," Coleman said. "Leadership makes a difference. You didn't provide that leadership."

Brown shot back, defending his actions.

"Senator, that's easy for you to say sitting behind that dais and not standing in the catastrophe and watching all the suffering," he said.

Other senators, including Democrats, said they believed that Brown was being wrongly blamed for the storm recovery faults by the Bush administration.

"You have been selected as the designated scapegoat," said U.S. Sen. Frank Lautenberg, D-N.J. "Keep your chin up and fight back."

But other witnesses at Friday's hearing also blamed Brown for much of the slow response.

Robert Stephan, assistant DHS secretary for infrastructure protection, said Brown failed under his designation as principal federal officer to establish a unified command structure of agencies involved.

"He continued to act as FEMA director as opposed to rising up to a higher level of responsibility," Stephan said.

Matthew Broderick, director of DHS operations coordination, indicated that he didn't believe the initial reports of broken levees and was pushed back by FEMA officials when trying to confirm them.

"We trusted that they would do the proper thing and keep us informed," Broderick said. "Mr. Brown should've picked up the phone and called the secretary right away."

Brown's one regret, he said, was not calling in the military before the hurricane made landfall.

"It's just a judgment I made," he said. "In hindsight, I wish I would've rolled the dice."

Also Friday, U.S. Sen. Mary L. Landrieu, D-La., released the following statement in response to Brown's testimony:

"Today's testimony is additional evidence that FEMA was not prepared before Katrina hit, just as it is not prepared today. The allegations raised at today's hearings are very troubling. They demand clear, immediate explanations.

"For months, this administration pointed fingers at others for their bungling. Now, they're pointing fingers at one another. All the while, FEMA remains anemic and the rebuilding they are managing remains inefficient, ineffective and slow.

"I am impressed by the strides taken by the Homeland Security Committee to get to the bottom of these mistakes. In particular, Sens. Collins and Lieberman should be commended for their focused efforts. We must all work together to reform and repair FEMA so our nation will be prepared before the next disaster, be it manmade or natural, occurs."

'We Were Realizing Our Worst Nightmare' (NOTP)

By Bruce Alpert

New Orleans Times-Picayune, February 11, 2006

Brown says he told White House of calamity

WASHINGTON -- Two decisions by key federal officials not to share information led Washington to believe that New Orleans had "dodged the big one" in the hours after Hurricane Katrina made landfall, when in fact 80 percent of the city was flooding, Senate investigators believe.

Michael Brown, who was FEMA chief at the time, decided not to bring his appeals for Katrina relief directly to his superiors at the Department of Homeland Security after the storm, because he considered it a waste of time.

And the Homeland Security operations room coordinator decided not to notify department Secretary Michael Chertoff and President Bush on Aug. 29, the day the hurricane hit, of levee breaches that put much of New Orleans under water. The official said he considered the reports too sketchy.

Still, Brown, testifying Friday under oath, said officials should have known. On the night of Aug. 29, he said, he warned a top Bush administration official that "we were realizing our worst nightmare."

Brown told senators that he dealt directly with White House officials the day Katrina hit, including chief of staff Andrew Card and deputy chief of staff Joe Hagin. He also said that officials from the Homeland Security Department were getting regular briefings that day.

Sen. Susan Collins, chairwoman of the Senate Homeland Security and Government Affairs Committee, R-Maine, said the communications snafus could have contributed to the delays in bringing supplies to the city and federal troops to assist with search and rescue operations.

"What is so troubling is we have heard over and over again -- from top DHS officials, from top Department of Defense officials, from the leadership throughout the administration -- that they were simply unaware of how catastrophic the hurricane's impact had been because of the breaching of the levee," said Collins, R-Maine.

The 19th hearing by Collins' committee brought more attempts to deflect blame, with Brown saying his Homeland Security superiors devoted too much time to preparing for terrorist attacks instead of natural disasters, and the department saying that Brown failed to carry out his most important duty: to inform Chertoff and the president of the worsening situation in New Orleans.

Brown said it is "just baloney" and "a little disingenuous" for the Department of Homeland Security to say that it wasn't informed of the levee breaches Aug. 29, the day the hurricane struck.

Focused on terrorism

Brown, who served as director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency until his resignation two weeks after Katrina hit, suggested that the administration's emphasis on fighting terrorism may have been partly to blame for the slow response.

FEMA, he said, had become a stepchild at the newly created Department of Homeland Security. Had a terrorist "blown up the 17th Street Canal levee, then everybody would have jumped all over that," he said.

Brown was roundly criticized by some members of the Senate panel for what they considered a poor job of coordinating the government's response to the hurricane, but others said he made a convenient target for blame.

"You have been selected as the designated scapegoat," said Sen. Frank Lautenberg, D-N.J.

Lautenberg said he reached that conclusion because problems at FEMA persisted after Brown left, as exhibited by the delays in getting trailers to people in Louisiana and Mississippi who have requested them, and because the Bush administration had ignored Brown's request for more money to prepare for disasters such as Katrina.

"So Mr. Brown isn't on the payroll. . . . Who's responsible for not keeping up with our responsibilities? Somebody. And the fingers, no matter which way they try to point them, to me they point at the White House."

Shifting the blame

Sen. Joseph Lieberman, D-Conn., questioned Matthew Broderick, who was director of the Homeland Security Operations Center when Katrina hit and was responsible for keeping Chertoff and Bush updated on the hurricane.

Lieberman said he couldn't understand why Broderick, a retired brigadier general with the Marines, didn't report the levee breaches to Chertoff and the White House sooner than the morning of Aug. 30.

Broderick attributed the delay to conflicting reports from New Orleans, putting the blame largely on Brown and other FEMA officials, who he said were refusing to keep him updated. One FEMA official, he said, told him that the only information he would get would be the twice daily -- morning and evening -- official FEMA Hurricane Katrina update reports.

But Lieberman said he found the response inexplicable because there were reports from numerous federal agencies, including the National Weather Service and Transportation Security Administration, about levee breaks in New Orleans. A Senate investigator said Broderick should have "just turned on his TV."

No answer

Brown was asked to explain why it took two days to place an order for 500 buses that Gov. Kathleen Blanco had requested to rescue people from the Superdome and Ernest N. Morial Convention Center.

Brown said he could not give an explanation, except to say that the delays reflected a March 2005 report that found FEMA's system of controlling and tracking assets inadequate. Brown also mentioned a "brain drain" at FEMA caused by the retirement of many experienced officials, while Collins noted that a memo from senior officials in the agency complained that too many key jobs were filled with political appointees.

The former FEMA chief, who was subpoenaed Friday to give closed testimony this weekend to a House committee also investigating the slow response to Katrina, said he tried to take steps to improve the agency's preparedness but was rebuffed by Homeland Security superiors. For instance, he said, his request in the year before Katrina to get money to do a follow-up exercise, focused on a possible catastrophe in New Orleans, was ignored.

The disconnect between him and Chertoff couldn't be clearer. At one point after the hurricane struck, Brown testified, he was ordered to give Chertoff a briefing, and he assembled some of his top people.

"They spent the night getting their briefings together," Brown said. "And then they twiddled their thumbs for about and hour and a half, two hours that morning waiting for him to get off some phone calls or something. And I finally dismissed the briefers and just told them to go back to work. Because you can't have two people in control; either somebody's going to run the disaster or somebody's not going to run the disaster."

Brown under fire

Brown had some testy confrontations with senators.

"As I listen to your testimony, you're not prepared to, kind of, put a mirror in front of your face and recognize your own inadequacies and say, 'You know something? I made some big mistakes,' " said Sen. Norm Coleman, R-Minn.

Brown responded: "That's very easy for you to say sitting behind that dais and not being there in the middle of that disaster watching that human suffering and watching those people dying and trying to deal with those structural dysfunctionalities, even within the federal government."

Brown said he had admitted mistakes and told senators he spent some nights in his hotel room "crying and screaming" because he couldn't get the bureaucracy to respond to the tremendous suffering.

Sen. Robert Bennett, R-Utah, said that from Brown's testimony he has a sense why Chertoff reported not knowing immediately how bad things were in New Orleans. "The reason he didn't know is because you didn't think it important to tell him," Bennett said.

Brown said he preferred to deal directly with the White House, because he knew the Homeland Security bureaucracy was focused on terrorism, and asking it for help "just bogged things down."

White House spokesman Scott McClellan said there were conflicting reports about the levees in the immediate aftermath of the storm.

"We knew of the flooding that was going on," McClellan said. "That's why our top priority was focused on saving lives. . . . The cause of the flooding was secondary to that top priority, and that's the way it should be."

Sen. Mary Landrieu, D-La., said the testimony Friday showed that FEMA was not prepared before Katrina hit, "just as it is not prepared today."

"For months, this administration pointed fingers at others for their bungling," Landrieu said. "Now they're pointing fingers at one another. All the while, FEMA remains anemic and the rebuilding they are managing remains inefficient, ineffective and slow."

In all, according to a timeline released by the Senate Committee, 28 separate agencies had issued some kind of warning Aug. 29 about the flooding in metropolitan New Orleans resulting from levee breaches.

"It is clear that if the administration knew sooner that our levees had breached, they should have acted sooner," said Rep. William Jefferson, D-New Orleans.

"By providing major federal resources immediately, the administration could have avoided the major loss of life and property with which our city must now cope. Obviously, the delay in federal action made the situation much worse."

. . . . . .

Bruce Alpert can be reached at bruce.alpert@newhouse.com or (202) 383-7861.

The Associated Press contributed to this report.

Blame Over Response To Katrina Intensifies (HCHRON)

By SAMANTHA LEVINE

Houston Chronicle, February 11, 2006

Ex-FEMA chief, homeland security officials offer conflicting details at Senate hearing

WASHINGTON - A clash among top officials in the Bush administration led to heated rhetoric and a hard-to-pin-down story Friday about how the federal government bungled its response to Hurricane Katrina.

DOJ_NMG_0014541

Contradicting earlier statements by the White House, former Federal Emergency Management Agency chief Michael Brown said he told President Bush and other White House officials on the day before the storm how bad things were going to be in New Orleans. He said video teleconference calls and e-mail on Aug. 29, the day the storm hit, relayed information about the devastating flooding.

"They were aware of what was going on," Brown said in a hearing before the Senate's homeland security committee.

"For them to claim that we didn't have awareness of it [the levee collapsing] is just baloney," Brown said.

But as Sen. Susan Collins, R-Maine, the committee chairwoman pointed out, President Bush and other senior administration officials have said that for hours after water pouring through broken levees inundated New Orleans, they thought the city had "dodged the bullet."

Indeed, two senior officials with the Department of Homeland Security told the panel Friday that Brown failed to provide live information to Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff and did not set up the command centers required under the national emergency response plan.

Brown left us "virtually blind," said Robert Stephan, assistant secretary for infrastructure protection at the DHS.

But in another apparent contradiction, Bush spokesman Trent Duffy said Friday, "I completely reject any suggestion that the White House was not fully aware of the severity of the damage or the risk."

About 1,200 people died and thousands of homes were destroyed in the hurricane and the flooding it triggered.

Bush removed Brown from the Gulf Coast disaster zone about a week after the storm hit. Brown resigned three days later.

Senators stunnedBrown said the homeland security agency paid little attention to the storm because it is almost entirely focused on terrorist attacks.

He said DHS systematically denied funding to beef up FEMA's emergency preparations, and got little response when he discussed FEMA's shortcomings with White House officials, including Deputy Chief of Staff Joe Hagin and Chief of Staff Andy Card.

Duffy would not comment on conversations among administration officials.

Brown stunned the senators when he said he preferred to call Hagin rather than Chertoff about the storm because he found the DHS bureaucracy slow and frustrating.

Calling Chertoff, he said, "would have wasted my time" because the "culture was such that I didn't think that would have been effective and would have exacerbated the problem."

"That is a staggering statement," said Sen. Robert Bennett, R-Utah. "It demonstrates a dysfunctional department to a degree far greater than any we've seen."

When FEMA public affairs official Marty Bahamonde relayed desperate news of the flooding in New Orleans on the day of the storm, Brown said he called Hagin, who was with Bush at the president's ranch in Crawford.

"I think I told him that we were realizing our worst nightmare, that everything we had planned about, worried about, that FEMA, frankly, had worried about for 10 years was coming true," Brown said.

Testy exchangeSen. Norm Coleman, R-Minn., cast doubt on Brown's account.

Coleman mentioned a much-publicized e-mail exchange in which Brown was told about the horror unfolding in New Orleans and responded, "Thanks for the update. Anything specific I need to do or tweak?"

Brown lashed out at Coleman, saying he was getting sick and tired of e-mail being taken out of context and that at the time, he had been doing many other things to respond to the emergency.

Coleman also accused Brown of being unwilling to "put a mirror in front of your face and recognize your own inadequacies."

"Senator, with all due respect, what do you want me to say?" Brown asked. "I have admitted to mistakes publicly. I've admitted to mistakes in hearings. What more, Senator Coleman, do you want from me? What do you want from me? I'm asking you. What do you want from me?"

The hearing was one of the last before the House and Senate complete their parallel investigations of how federal, state and local governments reacted to a storm that caused destruction that will take years and tens of billions of dollars to repair.

The House Government Reform Committee will release its report, which is expected to be harsh, on Wednesday. The Senate will release its report in mid-March.

samantha.levine@chron.com

Brown Says He Gave Bush Aide Early Warning On La. Flooding (BOS)

By Charlie Savage

The Boston Globe, February 11, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Michael Brown, former director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, said yesterday that he told a top aide to President Bush that New Orleans was being flooded on the same day that Hurricane Katrina hit land last year, raising new questions about the government's delayed response to the catastrophe.

Testifying before a Senate committee, Brown also characterized as "just baloney" contentions by top Homeland Security officials that they did not know the levees protecting New Orleans had collapsed until the day after the storm roared ashore. And, Brown said, he was being made a scapegoat for the Bush administration's flawed handling of FEMA.

"I feel somewhat abandoned," said Brown, the public face of the government's slow response in the early stage of the catastrophe.

Brown's testimony marked his first comments on the Katrina disaster since leaving the federal payroll in November, freeing him to speak more directly about communications between FEMA and the White House than when he testified last Sept. 27 before Congress. Although Brown had resigned under pressure two weeks before his testimony, he remained on the payroll as a consultant until November.

His testimony also came a day after Democrats on the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee released a series of internal e-mails written during the crisis. The documents showed that FEMA e-mails warned Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff's chief of staff about extensive flooding as early as 9:27 p.m. on Aug. 29, the day of the storm.

In the days after the levee breach, the federal government came under harsh criticism for delays in sending troops and supplies into the city amid concurrent leadership breakdowns at the state and local levels of government. Meanwhile, the situation for people trapped in the flooded city grew perilous.

Bush later said that he and others relaxed immediately after the storm, mistakenly believing that the city had weathered the hurricane without major problems. He and Chertoff continued their regularly scheduled events on Aug. 30, rather than immediately moving into crisis mode.

But in his testimony yesterday, Brown said he sounded the alarm with aides to top administration officials on the evening of Aug. 29, as soon as he learned the levees protecting New Orleans from catastrophic flooding were failing. He said he called Joe Hagin, the deputy White House chief of staff, who was with Bush at his ranch at Crawford, Texas, at the time.

"I think I told him that we were realizing our worst nightmare, that everything we had planned about, worried about, that FEMA, frankly, had worried about for 10 years, was coming true," Brown said. ". . . New Orleans is flooding. It's the worst-case scenario."

But White House spokesman Scott McClellan rejected the contention that Bush understood the levee had breached earlier than the administration has acknowledged.

"There were conflicting reports coming in, in the initial aftermath of the storm, in regards to the levee system," he said.

"Some were saying it was overtopped, some were saying it was breached. And, again, we knew of the flooding that was going on; that's why our top priority was focused on saving lives. The cause of the flooding was secondary to that top priority, and that's the way it should be."

In later testimony yesterday, Robert Stephan, the Homeland Security assistant secretary for infrastructure protection, objected to criticism by senators that Brown's testimony and the FEMA e-mails showed that communications had broken down at the upper levels of the department. He said Brown erred by not conveying his message more urgently.

"If he's got a critical information piece, that's the whole nugget we're all waiting for confirming catastrophic flooding of the entire New Orleans downtown area, that to me is something that you don't just casually post to an e-mail and send to administrative headquarters somewhere light-years away," Stephan said. "You pick up the phone and say 'Boss, Secretary Chertoff, this is going down right here, this is serious, this is the one we were all waiting for.' Why did he not do that?"

Brown also said that structural changes to FEMA since it was folded into the new Department of Homeland Security after the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, crippled the agency's ability to respond to a natural disaster. The department, he said, was narrowly focused on responding to a terrorist attack but insufficiently attuned to a natural disaster.

Brown said that in the months leading up to the hurricane, he had begged Chertoff and, before him, former Homeland Security Secretary Tom Ridge, for more funds for disaster planning and training exercises for FEMA, even proposing a New Orleans flood scenario. But he was turned down, he said, because natural disasters were "the stepchild" at Homeland Security.

"It's my belief that had there been a report . . . that a terrorist has blown up the 17th Street canal levee, then everybody would have jumped all over that and been trying to do everything they could," he said.

Brown Details Katrina Alerts (BSUN)

By Johanna Neuman

The Baltimore Sun, February 11, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0014543

Ex-FEMA chief testifies he told White House, not Homeland Security, about scale of storm

WASHINGTON -- Former FEMA Director Michael D. Brown testified yesterday that, hours before Hurricane Katrina struck the Gulf Coast, he called President Bush directly and told him the storm was going to be "a catastrophe within a catastrophe." And the next day, with New Orleans levees collapsing, he called a senior White House aide to report "our worst nightmare" had occurred.

What Brown said he did not do was communicate with his superiors at the Department of Homeland Security, who had critical responsibilities for launching and overseeing the federal government's response to the rapidly unfolding tragedy. The Federal Emergency Management Agency is part of the Homeland Security Department, but Brown said he thought talking to his boss, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, "would have wasted my time."

Yet members of the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, before which Brown testified yesterday, suggested that his decision to ignore his department and its established procedures reflected the kind of high-level communications breakdown that hamstrung Washington's response to Katrina.

Lower-level Homeland Security officials who had had operational responsibilities for dealing with the crisis agreed. They told the committee that they had repeatedly been hampered by a lack of information from FEMA about events on the ground.

"There was a prevailing attitude from Mr. Brown that he did not want Homeland Security to interfere with any of his operations or what he was doing," Matthew Broderick, director of operations coordination for the department, told the committee. "Mr. Brown should have picked up the telephone and called the secretary right away."

At one level, testimony at the Senate hearing was another round in the blame game that has raged over the past months as a mountain of evidence has accumulated on the shortcomings of the government's response to a disaster that claimed more than 1,300 lives, left tens of thousands of people homeless and inflicted billions of dollars in damage on the Gulf Coast.

But the hearing also provided graphic evidence of how personal and bureaucratic rivalries among senior administration officials had taken precedence over effective response to the emergency. Brown, for example, devoted much of his testimony to denouncing the Homeland Security Department and complaining about the fact that his agency had been made a part of it.

The department was created after the Sept. 11 attacks as part of an effort to coordinate the far-flung government agencies responsible for dealing with catastrophic events -- natural disasters as well as terrorism.

Saying FEMA had become a "stepchild" in a department preoccupied with terrorism, Brown said, Homeland Security policies and decisions "put FEMA on a path to failure."

With Chertoff expected to testify Tuesday, his spokesman, William "Russ" Knocke, said that the secretary would not engage in a shouting match with Brown. "We're not interested in a point-by-point response," he said. "We're interested in lessons from [an] unprecedented storm season and applying those in a constructive way as [we] prepare for next storm season."

In his testimony, Brown asserted that he had been able to "cut through any interagency bureaucracy" by calling the White House instead of working with Homeland Security. Under questioning by members of the committee, however, Brown said that in his calls -- 30 calls to White House Chief of Staff Andrew H. Card Jr. or his deputy, Joe Hagin -- he had not asked the White House to take specific actions. Rather, he said, his goal was to keep the White House informed.

Asked about what he had told a senior White House official in an Aug. 29 call, Brown said: "Nothing specific, I just thought they needed to be aware."

In one key conversation with a senior White House official just after FEMA learned that the levees had failed, Brown said he reported that "our worst nightmare" had occurred but said he did not remember whether he had passed on that the levees had failed, dooming the city.

The White House, stung by suggestions that the president may have been slow to grasp the seriousness of the crisis, released a four-page briefing designed to show that he had responded quickly and appropriately. Among other things, the White House pointed out that on Aug. 28, the day before Katrina reached the coast, he had called Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco and urged her to issue a mandatory evacuation order for New Orleans and the area around it.

"He is concerned about the impact that this hurricane would have on our people. And he asked me to please ensure that there would be a mandatory evacuation," the White House quoted Blanco as saying in a CNN news report that day.

Evacuation efforts were bogged down because officials had failed to provide adequate transportation and other support for thousands of poor New Orleans residents who lacked means to move to safety on their own. The same was true for many hospital patients and nursing home residents, some of whom died when they were trapped by the floods that swept through the city.

Johanna Neuman writes for the Los Angeles Times.

Brown: I Warned White House As Katrina Hit (AP)

By Lara Jakes Jordan

AP, February 11, 2006

Former federal disaster chief Michael Brown, the face of the government's listless response to Hurricane Katrina, said Friday he told top Bush officials the day the storm howled ashore of massive flooding in New Orleans and warned "we were realizing our worst nightmare."

More defiant than defensive, Brown told senators he dealt directly with White House officials the day of the Aug. 29 storm, including chief of staff Andrew Card and deputy chief of staff Joe Hagin.

He also said the Homeland Security Department was among a half-dozen government agencies that received regular briefings that day from him and other officials by way of video conference calls. Administration officials have said they did not realize the severe damage Katrina had caused until after the storm had passed.

Under oath, Brown told the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee that he could not explain why his appeals failed to produce a faster response.

"I expected them to cut every piece of red tape, do everything they could ... that I didn't want to hear anybody say that we couldn't do everything they humanly could to respond to this," Brown said about a video conference with administration officials — in which President Bush briefly participated — the day before Katrina hit. "Because I knew in my gut this was the bad one."

In the end, the storm claimed more than 1,300 lives, uprooted hundreds of thousands more and caused tens of billions in damage. The devastation in New Orleans and other Gulf Coast communities left Americans with enduring images of their countrymen dying in flooded nursing homes and pleading for rescue from rooftops.

Brown, in his second Capitol Hill appearance since Katrina, told his side to the senators five months after he quit under fire as chief of the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

He agreed with some senators who characterized him as a scapegoat for government failures.

"I feel somewhat abandoned," said Brown,

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff has said he did not know that New Orleans' levees were breached until Aug. 30. Bush at the time said, "I don't think anybody anticipated the breach of the levees."

At an occasionally contentious White House briefing Friday, Bush spokesman Scott McClellan said there were conflicting reports about the levees in the immediate aftermath of the storm.

"We knew of the flooding that was going on," McClellan said. "That's why our top priority was focused on saving lives. ... The cause of the flooding was secondary to that top priority and that's the way it should be."

After three hours of testimony, Brown was handed a subpoena ordering him to reappear in front of a House panel investigating the storm response. Brown is expected to be questioned by House investigators this weekend — days before the panel is expected to release its findings on the storm.

Recounting conference calls that described initial damage reports the day Katrina hit, Brown scoffed at claims that Homeland Security didn't know about the devastation's scope until the next day. He called those claims "just baloney."

Some senators suggested Brown look inward before pointing the finger elsewhere.

"You're not prepared to put a mirror in front of your face and recognize your own inadequacies," said Norm Coleman, R-Minn. "Perhaps you may get a more sympathetic hearing if you had a willingness to confess your own sins in this."

Brown responded: "That's very easy for you to say sitting behind that dais and not being there in the middle of that disaster watching that human suffering and watching those people dying and trying to deal with those structural dysfunctionalities, even within the federal government."

The disjointed federal response, Brown said, was in part the result of FEMA being swallowed in 2003 by the newly created Homeland Security Department, which he said was focused on fighting terrorism.

Natural disasters "had become the stepchild of the Department of Homeland Security," he said. Had there been a report that "a terrorist had blown up the 17th Street Canal levee, then everybody would have jumped all over that," he added.

Some senators attempted to trace the failures back to the White House.

"You quite appropriately and admirably wanted to get the word to the president as quickly as you could," said Joe Lieberman, D-Conn., asking about Brown's conversation with Hagin on the evening of Aug. 29. "Did you tell Mr. Hagin in that phone call that New Orleans was flooding?"

Brown answered: "I think I told him that we were realizing our worst nightmare, that everything we had planned about, worried about, that FEMA, frankly, had worried about for 10 years was coming true."

Sen. Robert Bennett, R-Utah, suggested Brown may have delayed the federal response by cutting Homeland Security out of the loop about the levee failures and going straight to the White House.

"I think I now understand why Secretary Chertoff says he didn't know," Bennett said. "The reason he didn't know is because you didn't think it important to tell him."

DOJ_NMG_0014545

Brown said he communicated directly with the White House instead of Homeland Security because FEMA's parent agency "just bogged things down."

White House 'warned Of Levee Breach' (FT)

By Andrei Postelnicu

Financial Times, February 11, 2006

The White House was alerted of a breach in the New Orleans levee system on the night Hurricane Katrina struck the city, a former Bush administration official told US senators on Friday.

The testimony from Michael Brown, the former head of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, to a Senate committee clashes with White House statements that the administration had been taken by surprise by the levee failure.

Mr Brown, told the Senate's homeland security committee that he told Joseph Hagin, President Bush's deputy chief of staff, about the levee breach on the night of August 29th, as Katrina made landfall on New Orleans.

"I think I told him we were realising our worst nightmares," Mr Brown said. In response to inquiries about the president's awareness of the situation, Mr Brown said he thought "If I've told Joe Hagin or [chief of staff] Andy Card, I've told the president".

White House officials have said they did not know about the levee breach and subsequent flooding of New Orleans until the morning of Tuesday, August 30th. The Bush administration has come under sharp criticism for the delays in getting emergency supplies into New Orleans in Katrina's aftermath.

"For them [the White House] to claim that we didn't have awareness of it is just baloney," Mr Brown said.

The former official, who resigned less than two weeks after Katrina struck amid uproar about the US government response to the hurricane, also told lawmakers that he often bypassed Michael Chertoff, his boss at the Department of Homeland Security in favour of talking directly to the White House.

The revelations come as a five-month investigation into the hurricane response revealed in detail the chain of events that saw images of mosrly poor and black Americans in distress in a crippled city.

A Fema official who was in New Orleans emailed his supervisors in Washington to say conditions "are far more serious than media reports are currently reflecting", investigators found.

Mr Brown said that going through the chain of command at the homeland security department "would have been a waster of time". The department, which was created following the September 11th terrorist attacks, was "was an additional bureaucracy that was going to slow me down even more, and the way I got around that was dealing directly with the White House".

The remarks atracted retorts from senators describing the situation as "dysfunctional". While some admitted the "structural" deficiencies of the new department, they accused Mr Brown of a leadership failure which, combined with the structure, became a "perfect storm".

Mr Brown, whose appointment without obvious qualifications for the Fema job brought the White House under attack, sought to defend his record at the agency by mentioning previous responses to California wildfires and the crash of a space shuttle.

He told senators he was "sick and tired of emails taken out of context".

Brown Warned White House Before Katrina Struck (REU)

By Richard Cowan

Reuters, February 11, 2006

Former federal disaster chief Michael Brown told a U.S. Senate panel on Friday he warned President George W. Bush of impending catastrophe in New Orleans last summer and informed White House aides of dangerous flooding shortly after Hurricane Katrina struck.

Brown said on August 29, the day the hurricane hit, he relayed urgent reports that the city's levee pumps were failing, contradicting White House officials who have said they were unaware on August 29 the levees were no longer functioning.

With the pumps overwhelmed and the levees seriously breached, floodwaters overtook much of New Orleans in a natural disaster that killed about 1,200 people along the Gulf Coast.

On September 1, Bush said in a television interview, "I don't think anyone anticipated the breach of the levees."

Yet Connecticut Sen. Joseph Lieberman, the committee's ranking Democrat, cited a report from the National Weather Service at 9:14 a.m. on August 29 that at least one of the levees protecting the city was breached.

Brown, who headed the Federal Emergency Management Agency, said in his first detailed testimony about his contacts with Bush and top White House officials that he informed the White House that "we were realizing our worst nightmare."

The Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee is investigating failures by federal, state and local officials to deal with the hurricane and particularly why the Bush administration was so slow to react to the emergency.

DOJ_NMG_0014546

Brown blamed the poor federal response to Katrina in part on the absorption of FEMA into the Department of Homeland Security, which he said was focused on preventing terrorist attacks and neglected the threat of natural disasters. He urged it be set up as a separate agency once again.

In addition to one or two direct talks with Bush before the storm, Brown said he talked with White House officials about 30 times once Katrina hit land. Those conversations included White House Chief of Staff Andrew Card, Brown said, adding: "Sometimes the president would get on the phone."

Before agreeing to answer questions about his contacts with the White House, Brown sought assurances he would not be caught in a legal cross-fire over whether those conversations should be divulged.

Committee head Susan Collins, a Maine Republican, gave Brown a green light to testify, saying the White House was given the chance, but had not invoked executive privilege.

'UNMANAGEABLE SITUATION'

In his testimony, Brown said Homeland Security chief Michael Chertoff's sprawling agency was making Katrina response decisions contrary to his own. "It became an absolutely unmanageable situation," Brown said.

Brown emerged as the main scapegoat for the government's response. He was forced to resign shortly after the disaster.

Collins, who is leading the Senate probe of the government response, put some of the blame on Brown's shoulders. Following his testimony, Collins said Brown "let his poor relations" with Chertoff interfere with communications.

Some Democrats on the committee tried to lay blame squarely with the White House. "Keep your chin up. Fight back," Sen. Frank Lautenberg of New Jersey told Brown, adding that the Bush administration was handling hurricane reconstruction poorly.

Besides those killed, hundreds of thousands were made homeless in the storm, which devastated much of Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama. Nearly six months later, many of those displaced do not know whether their homes will be rebuilt.

Bush was nearing the end of his monthlong summer vacation when the hurricane struck. He was on a working trip to Arizona and California on the day it hit and the day after, August 29 and August 30, and returned to Washington from his Texas ranch on August 31.

Brown's appearance before the Senate panel was followed by a subpoena to appear before the House Select Bipartisan Committee to Investigate the Preparation for and Response to Hurricane Katrina. The panel is meeting this weekend.

"This will be a closed meeting. We want to get the information we need from Brown without causing a further media circus," said Tom Davis, a Republican from Virginia who chairs that committee.

(Additional reporting by Alan Elsner and Donna Smith)

Former FEMA Chief Blames Chertoff For Katrina Response (KRT)

By Seth Borenstein

Knight Ridder, February 11, 2006

WASHINGTON - As Hurricane Katrina's deadly floodwaters kept rising in New Orleans streets last August, the two top federal disaster chiefs feuded while other officials wouldn't talk to each other, according to testimony Friday at a Senate hearing.

In his first testimony since leaving the government payroll, former Federal Emergency Management Agency Director Michael Brown, who's been roundly criticized for his handling of Katrina, said he felt like a scapegoat for a government-wide failure and squarely blamed his boss, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff.

"I was literally constrained by Secretary Chertoff," Brown said. "My hands were tied."

Brown said he tried to bypass his boss and work directly with the White House, a tactic he said had worked in the past. But White House Chief of Staff Andrew Card told him he had to work with Chertoff, Brown said.

Chertoff, he said, wouldn't let him fly to the disaster scene from his Baton Rouge, La., base.

On Monday, Aug. 29, when the storm hit the Gulf Coast, Brown said Homeland Security officials continually downplayed alarming reports from a FEMA agent who said he saw massive levee breaches and flooding in New Orleans.

Brown blamed the Bush administration's absorption with terrorism for its slow response to Katrina. He said that if his FEMA agent on the scene had confirmed "that a terrorist has blown up the 17th Street Canal levee, then everybody would have jumped all over that ... but because this was a natural disaster, that has become the stepchild within the Department of Homeland Security." FEMA is a subdivision of the Department of Homeland Security, but prior to 2003 was an independent agency.

Homeland Security officials weren't listening to how bad it was, Brown said. They were tuned into FEMA's video teleconferences (VTCs) along with White House officials, but didn't seem to get the message, he said.

White House spokesman Scott McClellan said Friday that the White House "knew of the flooding that was going on."

But Homeland Security officials told the Senate Governmental Affairs Committee that they didn't know about major flooding in New Orleans until Tuesday, Aug. 30.

Retired Gen. Matthew E. Broderick, who was in charge of the department's operations center, said he went home Monday thinking that there was little flooding and that "they seemed to be having a party in the French Quarter that evening."

"When we came in Tuesday, we realized this was serious,'" Broderick said.

Brown called Homeland Security officials' claims "a little disingenuous."

"All they had to do was listen to those VTCs and pay attention to these VTCs and they would have known what was going on," Brown said. "And in fact I e-mailed a White House official that evening about how bad it was."

Brown said the department claimed to be unaware of what was happening because "you know, they're off doing other things."

Two top Homeland Security officials denied that they weren't listening. They said that Brown wasn't talking to them and that he kept other FEMA officials from telling them what was going on.

But the Senate committee released a timeline of 26 notices that warned of horrible flooding in New Orleans before Tuesday morning.

By noon on Monday, five notices of flooding had been sent to Broderick's Homeland Security operations center or to the White House. By 6 p.m., 17 flooding notices had been sent. Despite the notices, the Homeland Security Operations Center's situation report said as of 6 p.m. that "preliminary reports indicate the levees in New Orleans have not been breached."

Broderick said he knew there was flooding, but said "we didn't know the degree." He blamed Brown and FEMA for using e-mail instead of making phone calls.

On Sept. 9, Chertoff replaced Brown as on-scene commander with Coast Guard Vice Adm. Thad Allen.

"The situation was dramatically turned around following the arrival of Vice Admiral Allen," said Robert Stephan, assistant secretary for infrastructure protection and the author of the nation's disaster plan.

Friday's hearing showed that FEMA and its Homeland Security overseers had "two different game plans," said Joe Myers, Florida's former emergency management chief. Brown seemed to be working from an old disaster-management plan that was used through 2004, while Chertoff's people were using a plan that had been put into effect in April 2005, he said.

Brown also told senators that FEMA became ineffective because there was too much bureaucracy.

Broderick's and Stephan's testimonies were a treasury of bureaucratic acronyms; they used 107 of them in their opening remarks. Asked if that symbolized excessive bureaucracy, Broderick said Homeland Security had added only four acronyms to the lexicon of disaster planning.

Katrina Hearings Put New Pressure On White House (WSJ)

By Robert Block

The Wall Street Journal, February 11, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Congressional hearings on Hurricane Katrina are increasingly pointing to bureaucratic failings at the Department of Homeland Security and the White House, putting new pressure on the White House to open up its records to legislators despite objections that such a move would undercut executive privilege.

The probe is also giving momentum to efforts, inside the administration and on Capitol Hill, to overhaul the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

"While DHS's playbook appears designed to distance headquarters as much as possible from FEMA, the department's leaders must answer for decisions they made -- or failed to make -- that contributed to the problems," Susan Collins, the Republican senator from Maine who is chairing the Senate's Katrina investigation, said at hearings Friday.

So far, the Bush administration has invoked executive privilege and refused to share with the committee any of its documents about what actions the White House took during the disaster.

But the administration's wall of silence was breached yesterday by Michael Brown, the former FEMA director, who agreed to testify before the Senate Homeland Security and Government Affairs Committee. There, he said that his agency's mission was marginalized when it was swallowed by the newly created Homeland Security agency in 2003. He said he often complained to White House officials, including White House Chief of Staff Andrew Card, about the danger of undermining FEMA but they failed to act on his warnings.

Mr. Brown, who quit under fire just days after the storm slammed into the Gulf Coast, provided the first detailed look into communications between emergency-management officials and the White House after the hurricane, and pushed blame for the disaster closer to the president.

From the immediate disastrous aftermath of the storm until now, Bush administration officials have maintained that they had been caught completely by surprise when they were told on Tuesday, Aug. 30 -- a full day after the storm hit -- that the levees protecting New Orleans had broken, allowing floodwaters to swamp the city. At the time, President Bush said, "I don't think anybody anticipated the breach of the levees."

DOJ_NMG_0014548

Department of Homeland Security officials also have said that they were unaware of the failure of the levees until Tuesday morning.

"I find it a little disingenuous," Mr. Brown said. "For them to claim that we didn't have awareness of it is just baloney."

The White House hasn't responded to yesterday's testimony.

While DHS officials acknowledge that the response to the storm was unacceptable, they have heaped much of the blame for the slow response on Mr. Brown, saying he failed to provide Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff with up-to-date information.

"My obligation was to the White House and to make sure the president knows what's going on, and I did that," Mr. Brown said Friday. He said this was exactly the way he functioned during previous disasters, including the four hurricanes that hit Florida in 2004. Mr. Brown said that the DHS had robbed FEMA of resources and funds. "There was a cultural clash that didn't recognize the absolute inherent science of preparing for a disaster."

The White House has commissioned its own study into the Katrina fiasco that has been headed by Homeland Security Advisor Frances Fragos Townsend. Ms. Townsend is due to present some of her findings to state emergency managers meeting near Washington Saturday. Ms. Townsend is expected to be critical of DHS policies that stripped FEMA of many of its preparedness activities.

Sen. Collins has said that, when her investigation is over, she will propose legislation aimed at improving the country's emergency response and fixing problems inside the DHS.

Mr. Chertoff, meanwhile, is expected to try to pre-empt congressional action by announcing his own reorganization of FEMA in coming weeks.

Write to Robert Block at bobby.block@wsj.com6

Stormy Dean Slams Bush: Points Finger For Katrina Deaths (BOSH)

By Kimberly Atkins

Boston Herald, February 11, 2006

Howard Dean yesterday blamed President Bush for the deaths of thousands of Hurricane Katrina victims - prompting a swift rebuke from Republicans.

Appearing in Boston before members of the New England Press Association, the failed presidential candidate sharply criticized Bush for failing to respond to the disaster.

“Michael Brown is testifying that he had direct contact with the (president’s) chief of staff - as the levees were breaking,” Dean said, referring to the former FEMA head’s testimony before a congressional committee yesterday. “Thousands of people died in New Orleans because the president didn’t pay attention and denied that he knew about it. . . . it turns out that wasn’t true.”

Dean - whose controversial one-year tenure as party chairman saw some Democratic leaders calling on him to tone down his rhetoric - called the Bush administration more corrupt than Richard Nixon’s.

While Nixon obstructed justice to protect the presidency, “this administration has done more than that, they have leaked military secrets at a time of war to fulfill their political agenda,” Dean said.

Danny Diaz, spokesman for the Republican National Committee, dismissed Dean’s criticisms. “Howard Dean’s Democratic Party lacks leadership, direction or anything substantive to add to national dialogue,” Diaz said. “The reality is Democrats fail to have a political strategy that resonates with the American people and so they resort to political attacks.”

Dean also said the Democratic Party needs to right itself if it hopes to have a shot of winning back the Oval Office, and that starts with taking a move from the GOP playbook and organizing more effectively from the bottom up.

The road to the White House, he said, starts with grassroots organizing in local races. He praised the campaign that helped Boston City Councilor Sam Yoon make history as the first Asian-American elected to the office.

“If we ever want to win again, it is not enough to have operatives in all 50 states,” he said. “It is not enough to have a voting list as good as the Republicans. We have to stand up and say who we are.”

Auditors Find Huge Fraud In FEMA Aid (NYT)

By Eric Lipton

The New York Times, February 11, 2006

WASHINGTON, Feb. 10 — Thousands of applicants for federal emergency relief money after Hurricanes Katrina and Rita used duplicate or invalid Social Security numbers or bogus addresses, suggesting that the $2.3 billion program was a victim of extensive fraud, a Congressional auditor will report Monday.

DOJ_NMG_0014549

The examination of the so-called Expedited Assistance program determined that the Federal Emergency Management Agency failed to take even the most basic steps to confirm the identifies of about 1.4 million people who sought expedited cash assistance, leaving the program vulnerable to the "significant fraud and abuse," the Government Accountability Office intends to report.

The auditors did not try to estimate the total dollar amount of fraudulent claims. But the report says that FEMA itself had found that 900,000 of the 2.5 million applications for all forms of individual assistance were "potential duplicates."

Even when FEMA's automated computer system picked out what might be fraudulent applications, payments were at times still sent, says the advance testimony of Gregory D. Kutz, the managing director of the G.A.O.'s forensic audits unit.

The controls were so lax that auditors were able to secure their own $2,000 relief check by using "falsified identifies, bogus addresses and fabricated disaster stories," and then simply waiting for the money to arrive in the mail, says the report for the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, a copy of which was obtained by The New York Times.

Nicol Andrews, a FEMA spokeswoman, said the agency recognized there could be fraud. But Ms. Andrews said the priority was getting aid as fast as possible to hundreds of thousands of families in dire need.

"We took a calculated risk in a catastrophic situation," she said. "It was the right thing to do. Unfortunately, some may have cheated the system."

She added that some arrests have been made. The agency is also suspending payments to people suspected of trying to cheat the system.

Still, the auditors found signs of fraud nearly everywhere:

¶Nearly half of the 11,000 individuals who received special debit cards as payment — an approach used in the immediate aftermath of the storm in Texas — got a second $2,000 payment in emergency aid.

¶Inspections of 200 properties in Texas and Louisiana listed as home addresses turned up 80 that were vacant lots or nonexistent apartments.

¶More than half of a group of 248 other applicants had used Social Security numbers that were never issued, belonged to dead people or did not match the name provided.

In one case, auditors found 17 individuals, some with the same last name and addresses, who used 34 bogus Social Security numbers to collect more than $103,000 in payments.

Auditors found isolated instances where the electronic debit cards were used to pay for "adult entertainment," a .45-caliber handgun, jewelry or bail bond services.

FEMA Tries To Pause La. Role (BRA)

By MIKE DUNNE

Baton Rouge Advocate, February 11, 2006

Agency says state not engaged enough in long-term planning

The Federal Emergency Management Agency has told Gov. Kathleen Blanco that state and local officials need to take on more leadership in planning Louisiana's long-term recovery.

This week, FEMA put out a notice to workers that it would put on "pause" the long-term recovery planning process known as ESF-14. It is designed to spur not only recovery but to build in elements that would avert or mitigate damages from future disasters.

FEMA told workers the pause was for at least two weeks. However, officials at the Louisiana Recovery Authority, the advisory partner in the process, were stumped when they started getting calls about the "pause."

Late Friday, LRA spokeswoman Pam Laborde said the "pause is on pause." Apparently, when word reached Blanco on Friday, she called Acting FEMA Director R. David Paulison to find out what was happening.

James McIntyre, a spokesman for the FEMA Baton Rouge recovery field office, said Blanco and Paulison "came to an agreement" to continue the process but "with state and local governments taking more ownership of the process and the federal government taking more of a support role than a lead role."

Earlier in the day, FEMA spokeswoman Nicol Andrews in Washington, D.C., said the long-term recovery planning process was "paused" because of a lack of "engagement" in the state.

The process has worked well in Florida and elsewhere after disasters and is working in Mississippi, but is not working in Louisiana, Andrews said.

Later in the day, McIntyre said FEMA and state officials will meet next week to work out how the state will take more ownership. He was unsure when that might happen.

Meanwhile, Blanco and the Legislature are meeting in another special session on hurricane recovery related issues.

DOJ_NMG_0014550

Laborde said the LRA has “been an active partner” with FEMA, working in 26 parishes and using 50 state employees on the effort. The LRA Foundation generated extra private funds to hire a “dream team” of planners to advise the process. Planning meetings have been going on this week in Lake Charles and are planned for next week in Abbeville.

Local plans are due to the state by the end of March and will be put into a state plan that will address housing and community development, environmental and coastal issues, human services, transportation and infrastructure and economic development.

An environmental activist who has been following the process, Darryl Malek-Wiley of the Sierra Club, said midday Friday that, “I am very disappointed this process has been put on hold.”

The state helped host a series of meetings in four states on Jan. 21 to get public input on what the recovery priorities should be. Levee protection, affordable housing, jobs and better schools surfaced as the main topics.

Malek-Wiley attended one of those meetings in San Antonio where people “were very engaged. I did hear that no public attended a meeting in Shreveport.”

He questioned whether sufficient effort has been put into the process to reach out and engage residents.

The people attending in San Antonio, many of them evacuees bused to the meeting from shelters, “were pleased with the discussion” and the ability to take part in the process, he said.

The ESF-14 process is important because “any future federal dollars can be directed by this plan,” Malek-Wiley said.

“At one session, a FEMA representative talked about building a new 20,000-unit housing development at Lapalco Boulevard and U.S. Highway 90 (on the west bank of Jefferson Parish) and we were able to point out that area is very low,” Malek-Wiley said.

He and other activists want to ensure the plan is environmentally friendly.

U.S. Should Share Oil Royalties With States -Shell (REU)

By Tom Doggett

Reuters, February 11, 2006

The U.S. government should share more of the royalties it collects from energy companies for offshore oil and natural gas drilling with the states, particularly to help rebuild hurricane-ravaged Louisiana, a top Shell Oil executive said on Friday.

Gulf Coast states that have offshore drilling collect royalties for oil and gas production in the their waters which usually extend only a few miles from shore. Any exploration beyond that is in federal waters, where the government collects royalties that go to the general treasury to pay for various programs benefiting the whole country.

Marvin Odum, who is responsible for Shell's energy exploration and production businesses in the United States and the rest of the North and South America, said he supports efforts by the Gulf Coast states and local communities to get some of the federal oil and gas revenue.

"It's certainly something that we think the government can and should push through," Odum said in a interview with Reuters.

Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Blanco said this week she wants the government to give the state 50 percent of the federal offshore royalties to help repair coastal wetlands left vulnerable to hurricanes due to oil industry development.

While Odum supports revenue sharing, he would not comment on how much federal royalties Louisiana or any other state should get or what they should spend it on.

"That's between the states and the federal government, that's what they need to work out," he said. "Whether or not Louisiana would choose to use some of that money specifically for hurricane restoration and recovery, obviously that's a great need, that would be again a government decision."

Separately, Odum said "quite a bit" of the $15 billion that Shell's parent company, Royal Dutch Shell Plc, plans to spend worldwide this year for oil and gas exploration and production will be targeted for the United States.

While that amount reflects higher drilling and exploration costs, he said there will still be money for new investment. "It's a significant increase in activity worldwide," he said.

In the United States, he said Shell will focus on drilling for new oil in the deeper waters of the Gulf of Mexico and off the Alaskan coast, and developing natural gas resources from south Texas through the Rocky Mountain region.

The company will also invest in developing the vast oil shale resources in the Western United States, which the government estimates holds more than 1 trillion barrels of oil.

Oil shale is sedimentary rock containing organic material that can be crushed and heated to produce oil. The process is a costly one, and most U.S. oil shale projects were abandoned in the early 1980s when crude prices collapsed.

However, with oil prices expected to average above $60 a barrel in the next two years, oil shale development looks profitable again.

DOJ_NMG_0014551

Odum said the company will know in about five years whether developing oil shale is commercially viable.

He said the government should open more offshore and onshore areas to drilling to help reduce U.S. reliance on foreign oil imports.

Odum declined to say whether President Bush's goal of cutting U.S. Mideast oil imports by 75 percent in 2025 could be reached.

However, he said even if more areas are opened to drilling the United States will still be heavily dependent on foreign suppliers to meet its energy needs over the next two decades. "I think that's a reasonable case," he said.

Katrina's Unclaimed To Get Hometown Burial (WP)

By Peter Whoriskey

The Washington Post, February 11, 2006

City to Take Custody of Unclaimed Storm Victims

NEW ORLEANS -- Inside a fleet of refrigerated trucks parked an hour west of here lie the bodies of more than 200 unidentified or unclaimed victims of Hurricane Katrina.

"Some, we don't know who they are," said Chuck Smith, leader of the federal mortuary effort in Carville, La. "And with some, we can't locate the families, or the families are unable to make provisions."

The question now, five months after the storm, is what to do with the dead.

The makeshift morgue, a joint federal and state effort, is scheduled to close by the end of the month. And like virtually every other challenge facing this flooded metropolis, the funeral tasks have been complicated by the vast scale of the disaster and the difficulties of coordinating local, state and federal efforts.

Initially, state authorities had selected a four-acre cemetery site in Carville, and in preparation for the burials, had graded and planted the ground. A memorial was envisioned there.

But that did not sit well with many in New Orleans who argued that a proper burial includes the sense, spiritual and geographical, of "going home." Most of the dead come from the city.

"I told them we cannot be burying New Orleanians outside of New Orleans," Mayor C. Ray Nagin said of his protests to state officials.

The mayor said he also objected to the proposed use of wooden caskets, which "over time would have disintegrated into the earth," making it difficult to relocate remains if more identifications are made later.

So now the city will take custody of the dead. The trouble is that the city, already struggling with the burdens of hurricane recovery, must now scramble to build a mausoleum for the Katrina victims.

New Orleans officials met last week with FEMA officials to discuss the city's request for financial help to build the mausoleum, which is expected to cost about $400,000. A Federal Emergency Management Agency spokesman said FEMA is prepared to reimburse the city for at least some of the mausoleum expense.

It would be built at a publicly owned cemetery here, said the city's health director, Kevin Stephens, and made of some appropriate material, such as granite. The bodies will be held in metal caskets, and if one of the unidentified bodies within the mausoleum is later identified, it can easily be removed and placed elsewhere for burial.

The city is also working with a corporate donor who may contribute nearly $1 million to a memorial for the victims, Nagin said.

While the mausoleum is being planned and built, the bodies will be in the custody of a mortuary company that the city is choosing, Stephens said.

Katrina's dead have proved a large-scale logistical challenge. State officials, working with local coroners, have recovered 1,103 bodies.

Of those, 97 are still unidentified, and a large portion of those will be difficult to identify, state officials said, because investigators lack not only personal effects but also the locations where the bodies were recovered. Without those initial clues, it is difficult to know from whom to seek DNA samples to match the body with a family.

DNA has been used to make identifications in some cases, but the vast majority of bodies have been identified using more conventional techniques, with workers searching through flooded New Orleans dentists' offices and poring over soggy dental records.

"We're down to those we have no idea on," Smith said. "The ones that only DNA will get."

Once the bodies are identified, moreover, there is no guarantee that they can be released.

As of Friday, 106 bodies had been identified but remained on the trucks either because the families could not be located or because the families, who are scattered across the country, did not have the means to arrange a funeral.

DOJ_NMG_0014552

"So many people have been completely displaced," said Bob Johannessen, a state spokesman. "A family that winds up in Buffalo, New York, may not have the wherewithal to claim a body and conduct a burial."

An array of complications has slowed the process of releasing and burying the bodies.

In four or five cases, the next of kin is mentally impaired. In 20 or more cases, the families are working with FEMA to receive money for burials. In others, the grief-stricken families are simply letting the government handle arrangements.

"There are some who say just let the state take care of it," said Randy Lemoine, director of the call center where identifications are being coordinated. "We're talking about very poor families. Some are dragging their feet to see how the state will handle the process.

"Other families are still dealing with their own grief," he said. "They are struggling to get their personal affairs in order. It's heart-rending to hear their stories."

The mortuary team's task goes well beyond those killed by this year's hurricanes, too. An estimated 1,300 dead were displaced when caskets laid to rest long before the storm were swept away by floodwaters, officials said. One coffin in Cameron Parish was carried more than 33 miles by Hurricane Rita's storm surge. It was found beneath a highway overpass.

In this city, whose cemeteries and jazz funerals are a distinctive regional custom, the focus is on returning Katrina's victims.

"There is something about being buried in the place you lived and coming home," said Stephens, the city health director. "We need to bring closure. We really do need to bring closure."

WAR NEWS:

Iran "Making Mistake" With Iraq Meddling: Rumsfeld (REU-Y2)

By Will Dunham

Reuters, February 11, 2006

Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, days after calling Iran the world's top state sponsor of terrorism, ratcheted up the pressure on Tehran on Friday with fresh accusations of interference in Iraq.

Rumsfeld, in Taormina, Sicily, for a meeting of NATO defense ministers, used an appearance in Europe for the second time in a week to talk tough over Iran, which the United States and European Union fear is covertly developing nuclear weapons.

Asked during a news conference about U.S. assertions that Iran, as well as Syria, supports insurgents in Iraq, Rumsfeld said: "We have undertaken a series of initiatives to try to persuade them that their behavior is harmful to a new Iraqi government and indeed harmful to the region. Thus far we've not been successful."

"I think they're making a mistake," Rumsfeld said, "although I can certainly understand that from their standpoint having a free and sovereign and democratic Iraq on their borders probably is not terribly encouraging to their type of government. So I can understand their resistance to that."

Rumsfeld did not make specific allegations of misconduct by either Iran or Syria relating to Iraq. In the past, U.S. officials have accused heavily Shi'ite Muslim Iran of encouraging radicalism among Iraq's majority Shi'ites and of allowing dangerous weaponry to pass into Iraq.

Iran's President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad has said such accusations are unfounded.

U.S. officials have also accused Syria of allowing foreign fighters and financing to flow across its border into Iraq. Syria says it is doing what it can and says Iraq and the United States have failed to control their own side of the border.

The United States has about 139,000 troops in Iraq fighting a tenacious insurgency nearly three years into the war.

IRAN NUCLEAR AMBITIONS DISCUSSED

Rumsfeld said that during a private meeting with Russian Defense Minister Sergei Ivanov in Taormina, the subject of Iran's nuclear ambitions came up, but refused to elaborate.

"I'm not going to get into substance of my conversation. It was a private meeting," Rumsfeld said.

At an annual security conference in Munich last Saturday, Rumsfeld accused Iran of being the world's "leading state sponsor of terrorism," a charge Iran swiftly rejected.

Iran has announced it would resume enrichment of nuclear fuel after the governing board of the International Atomic Energy Agency voted last weekend to report Iran to the U.N. Security Council over its nuclear program.

Iran insists its nuclear program is aimed at generating electricity, but the United States and European countries have said it is seeking to build an atomic arsenal.

On the issue of Iran, British Defense Secretary John Reid said the resolve of Western powers should not be underestimated. "We must never, ever be in the position where ... we would never be prepared to stand up for what we believe in," Reid told a separate news conference.

DOJ_NMG_0014553

Bush - Annan Meet At White House (UPI)

By ROLAND FLAMINI

United Press International, February 11, 2006

WASHINGTON, Feb. 10 (UPI) -- Kofi Annan's meeting with President George Bush on Monday represents the U.N. Secretary-General's return to Washington's good graces after the squabbles of the Iraq war, which Annan once declared illegal. His last White House visit was exactly two years ago. Since then, however, the Bush administration has mellowed towards the Secretary-General and enlisted U.N. help in re-shaping post-war Iraq, up to and including the December parliamentary elections.

Iraq will be high on Annan's talks agenda, notably the planned National Accord Conference, which the Arab League and the United Nations are "helping" the Iraqis to plan and convene. The purpose of the conference, which a senior U.S. official said could be held as early as March and will strive to include all Iraqi political parties and major institutions, is aimed at finalizing the emergence of the democratization of Iraq. A recent statement by the Arab League said the conference will confirm, "the unity, independence, and sovereignty of Iraq."

The same Arab League statement said the conference is also expected to call for the withdrawal of coalition forces, once Iraq's armed forces and police are able to handle the country's security situation. The senior American official said the call for a pullout was acceptable to Washington as long as no deadline was specified because, "The United States is against setting a time-table."

The Bush administration hopes the conference will help with its exit strategy; but with the United States not officially a participant in the discussions, the White House will once again turn to the U.N. to help to push the proceedings in the desired direction.

The violence across the Islamic world over the cartoons lampooning Mohammed is another item that has thrust itself into the bi-lateral agenda. Annan wants to launch a reconciliation campaign through the newly formed U.N. Alliance of Civilizations, run jointly by Spain and Turkey and designed to find solutions to just such cultural conflicts between the West and Islam.

Iran's insistence on enriching its own uranium in defiance of international opposition will also come up, if for no other reason than that it is a rare occasion when the United States, the European Union and the United Nations are walking in step. The ball will shortly be in Annan's court when the International Atomic Energy Agency, the U.N.'s nuclear watchdog, reports Iran to the U.N. Security Council for action.

Africa is another talking point for Annan, according to a U.N. source, particularly the Secretary-General's effort to persuade NATO, including the United States, to join a planned U.N. peacekeeping force that may take over from the African Union's troops in western Sudan's conflict-torn Darfur region.

The issue of reforming the world organization has dominated the U.N. for the past year, with the United States in the person of its pugnacious representative John Bolton taking the lead in pushing for change in several key areas, and many suspicious Third World countries resisting it as a form of growing American influence (the Bush administration says, why not? the United States foots a third of the U.N. bill). For example, a Human Rights Council is expected to replace the Geneva-based Human Rights Commission, but many member countries are resisting Washington's insistence that only countries with a good human rights record should be eligible for membership of the new body.

In a sense, the meeting brings together two lame ducks, both working against a countdown to leave their mark. Annan's second (and last) term as Secretary-General ends in Jan 2007, and Bush has barely 33 months left in office, but more important can't be re-elected. Annan is rendered lamer by the fallout from the multi-million dollar Oil for Food scandal, in which his son Kojo was implicated by an independent inquiry. At the very least the Secretary-General himself is criticized for not keeping a tighter rein on the program, which involved selling Iraqi oil and using the money to buy food and medicine for the Iraqis while the country was under U.N. sanctions.

The Oil for Food program is not likely to come up directly, but it will be "in the room" when the president and Annan discuss U.S. proposals for management and oversight of the world body.

The issue of Annan's successor is not expected to come up either, according to the U.N. source. But a recent remark by Bolton that the United States does not regard as carved in stone the system of choosing the Secretary-General on the basis of a regional rotation has thrown an additional element of doubt into already complex and opaque selection process. Under the time-honored regional system, the new head of the U.N. should be from Asia. The Bush administration is said to favor an Eastern European candidate as a tribute to "New Europe's" support in the Iraq war. The White House favorite is former Polish president Aleksander Kwasniewski.

General Says Training Of Iraqi Troops Suffered From Poor Planning And Staffing (NYT)

By Thom Shanker

DOJ_NMG_0014554

The New York Times, February 11, 2006

WASHINGTON, Feb. 10 — The American general in charge of training the new Iraqi military after Baghdad fell says the Bush administration's strategy to use those forces to replace departing American troops was hobbled from its belated start by poor prewar planning and insufficient staffing and equipment.

The account by Maj. Gen. Paul D. Eaton, who retired on Jan. 1 after 33 years in the Army, suggests that commanders in Iraq might by now have been much closer to President Bush's goal of withdrawing American forces if they had not lost so much time in the first year to begin building a capable Iraqi force.

General Eaton's views, drawn from an essay he is preparing for publication and from interviews in which he broke a long silence on the topic, were broadly affirmed by Pentagon and other civilian officials involved at the time. They agreed that the mission had also been slowed by conflicting visions from senior Pentagon and administration officials, civilian administrators in Baghdad and the former top commander of the military's Central Command, which carried out the invasion.

While he criticized others for decisions that led to what he called a false start, General Eaton accepted responsibility for the most visible setback in the training, when a battalion of the new Iraqi Army dissolved in April 2004 as it was sent into its first major battle. The Pentagon sent Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus, who had commanded the 101st Airborne Division during the invasion and early occupation, to review the program and then to take over the training mission after General Eaton completed his yearlong tour.

"Paul Eaton and his team did an extraordinary amount for the Iraqi Security Force mission," said General Petraeus, now commander of the Army's Combined Arms Center at Fort Leavenworth, Kan. "They established a solid foundation on which we were able to build as the effort was expanded very substantially and resourced at a much higher level."

General Eaton was commander of all Army infantry training at Fort Benning, Ga., when he was told on May 9, 2003 — just over a week after President Bush's "mission accomplished" speech — to hurry to Baghdad, where he was to set up and then command an organization to rebuild Iraq's military.

"I was very surprised to receive a mission so vital to our exit strategy so late," the general said. "I would have expected this to have been done well before troops crossed the line of departure. That was my first reaction: 'We're a little late here.' "

Pentagon officials initially told him that rebuilding the army was their fifth priority for Iraqi security forces, falling behind the civil defense corps, the police, border forces and guards for government buildings, power plants and oil lines.

L. Paul Bremer III, chief of the occupation government, insisted that police training not fall under the military, but under his civil administration. Gen. Tommy R. Franks, who planned and carried out the invasion of Iraq, made sure that retraining and managing the Iraqi armed forces would not burden his war-fighting headquarters at Central Command, and insisted that the task be managed by a separate unit with its own staff and budget, General Eaton said.

Some major allies, alienated by American policies, also refused to contribute experienced military personnel, General Eaton said. In particular, Germany and France, which have taken part in rebuilding Afghanistan's military after the war in that country, declined to assist in Iraq to show their disagreement with the invasion.

"We set out to man, train and equip an army for a country of 25 million — with six men," General Eaton said. He worked into the autumn with "a revolving door of individual loaned talent that would spend between two weeks and two months," he said, and never received even half the 250 professional staff members he had been promised.

The general's broad assessment of the problems he confronted was seconded by Walter B. Slocombe, sent by the Bush administration to Baghdad for six months to serve as the senior civilian adviser on national security and defense.

Mr. Slocombe, an under secretary of defense in the Clinton administration, said: "I have to agree with General Eaton, that it was hard to get the resources we needed out there. There was not a broad enough sense of urgency in Washington."

General Eaton said his small staff "thought we were going to build an army in a benign environment, that we were going to be able to incubate this army." The rise of a tenacious insurgency ultimately killed that hope, but at the start of his tour, the main problem was not the insurgency, which had not yet emerged in full force; it was the chaos that followed the invasion.

He arrived as looting swept Iraq, causing a bitter debate in Washington that focused on whether more American troops should have been committed to the occupation. He had to rebuild bases and barracks that had been stripped bare by looters.

Although the Iraqi Army had dissolved during the American-led invasion, the decision by Mr. Bremer and the Pentagon not to preserve or recall any complete Iraqi units meant the training task was bigger than expected.

It also left General Eaton without any Iraqi noncommissioned officers. Training an army without noncommissioned officers to serve as drill sergeants is like pitching a tent without poles.

He also found that a civilian contractor hired to conduct training would be incapable of imparting military skills and discipline — what he called "soldierization."

DOJ_NMG_0014555

In a Sept. 5, 2003, briefing in Baghdad for Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, General Eaton proposed speeding up the program by sending former Iraqi Army officers for training at a base in Jordan, and setting up a separate academy in Iraq for training noncommissioned officers. Mr. Rumsfeld approved the plan.

Scrounging the most basic equipment for the new Iraqi military was another problem. "We were told to find anything we needed for the soldiers — boots, canteens, rucksacks, belts, beds, blankets," General Eaton said. "We were directed to pull it from Iraqi sources where possible."

He said the most important accomplishments that first year were organizing the command structure, beginning construction of military bases across Iraq, setting up officer training in Jordan and the noncommissioned officer academy, and attracting troop contributions from nine nations.

But problems with the nascent security force became painfully clear when the first battalion of the new Iraqi Army ordered to fight insurgents ran away in April 2004 as it was being sent to Falluja to fight alongside allied forces against an uprising in the restive Sunni triangle west of Baghdad.

"The only serious mistake I committed was that I did not stop the employment of the Second Battalion in Falluja," General Eaton said. "This battalion had been originally recruited to defend Iraq from external enemies. And as they attempted to move over land to Falluja, they ran into a Shiite mob that fired into the trucks and cajoled these young Iraqi men for fighting with the occupier against their own citizens."

He said the Iraqis the Americans had selected "failed their leadership; they failed in contact."

Iraqis Certify Election Results On A Day Of More Violence (NYT)

By Sabrina Tavernise

The New York Times, February 11, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq, Feb. 10 — Iraqi officials certified the results of parliamentary elections on Friday, setting the country on a timeline for forming a new, permanent government, while the kidnappers of an American journalist issued a new deadline for killing her if their demands were not met.

The certification of the election began a series of deadlines that requires political leaders to choose a president, a prime minister and a cabinet within two months. But the negotiations are likely to be contentious, and few here expect them to be completed according to the timetable. It took three months for Iraqis to form an interim government last spring.

The final election results, announced at a news conference in Baghdad, were unchanged from preliminary ones announced in January, in which an alliance of Shiite parties won the single largest portion in the 275-seat Parliament. Election officials said more than half of the total of 11.9 million voters on Dec. 15 were women, reflecting Iraq's demographic composition.

Al Rai, a satellite television station in Kuwait, reported that the captors of the American journalist Jill Carroll had set a Feb. 26 deadline to kill her. The station said Ms. Carroll was being held with a group of women in a house owned by one of the kidnappers in Baghdad. In a telephone interview from Kuwait, Jassem Boudai, the station's owner, said people who identified themselves as being close to the kidnappers had contacted the station and said they were now asking for the release of just one Iraqi woman from prison in exchange for Ms. Carroll. Before, they had demanded the release of all women in prison. Ms. Carroll has appeared in three videotapes since her Jan. 7 capture in western Baghdad.

The people who contacted the station claimed the kidnappers were part of the same group that took two Italian aid workers in September 2004, Mr. Boudai said. He said that a letter from Ms. Carroll had been received and that the station had delivered it to the authorities. The station also reported that the kidnappers claimed they had not killed Ms. Carroll's interpreter, Allan Enwiyah, who was shot dead at the scene of the kidnapping. It is not clear whether the group holding Ms. Carroll is the same one that abducted her.

Iraq was torn by fresh sectarian violence on Friday. A car bomb tore through a Sunni Arab mosque in southern Baghdad, killing at least 8 Sunni worshipers and wounding 22, an Interior Ministry official said. The blast spewed shrapnel into a crowd of worshipers around 1 p.m., said the official, who asked that his name not be used, as he was not authorized to speak publicly. The attack was unusual, in that it struck at a Sunni Arab target. Most large, lethal bombings have been aimed at Shiites.

Iraqi political leaders have 15 days to gather for the first session of Parliament, in which lawmakers will nominate a speaker and two deputies, and within another 15 days will choose a president. At the same session, the president will ask the largest holder of seats — the Shiites — for their choice for prime minister. The nominee will have 30 days to form a cabinet. The largest Shiite bloc is expected to announce its choice on Saturday.

Officials spent nearly two months counting the votes, even inviting an international team of experts to review allegations of fraud. But the extra time seemed to have paid off: Sunni Arabs, who staged protests after the election against what they said was evidence of fraud, gradually came to accept the results.

DOJ_NMG_0014556

Sunni Arabs, thought to make up about 20 percent of Iraq's population, often say they are far more. But the vote, which drew broad participation from Sunnis, won them 21 percent of the seats in Parliament. "Everybody has moved on now," said Ashraf Jehangir Qazi, the United Nations envoy to Iraq. "But people by and large have accepted the results."

In other sectarian violence, gunmen kidnapped a Sunni Arab cleric, Adel Khalil Dawood al-Azzawi, the former imam of the Nuiami mosque, from his house on Thursday night, the ministry official said. On Friday, the American military announced the death of two marines, whose vehicle hit a homemade bomb near the western city of Falluja on Thursday.

Iraq's Shiites Near Pick For Prime Minister (WP)

By Nelson Hernandez

The Washington Post, February 11, 2006

Main Alliance Divided Between Incumbent Jafari and Deputy President Mahdi

BAGHDAD, Feb. 10 -- The Shiite religious coalition that won the most seats in December's parliamentary elections could announce its choice for prime minister as soon as Saturday, politicians said Friday, as Iraq's electoral commission released certified results of the vote.

The results, which are final, did not change the expectation that the next prime minister will come from the ranks of the United Iraqi Alliance, a coalition of Shiite religious parties, which won 128 out of 275 seats in the Dec. 15 elections. Two candidates from the coalition have taken center stage: Ibrahim Jafari, the current prime minister, and Adel Abdul Mahdi, a secular economist who is one of Iraq's two deputy presidents.

The alliance is divided, however, among its member parties over which man to put forward, Shiite politicians said. Jafari's support comes from his Dawa party and followers of Moqtada Sadr, a popular cleric. Abdul Mahdi's primary backer is his own party, the powerful Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq. It is still unclear which way a number of smaller parties in the coalition will swing.

"We will try to decide who is the candidate by consensus," said Bahaa Araji, a member of Sadr's group. "If not, the alliance will appeal to voting tomorrow. It seems that Dr. Jafari is most likely getting the post."

Noting that each candidate thinks he is the best choice, Araji said, "This is what makes it difficult now to achieve the consensus."

Though Jafari might have a slight advantage within the alliance, his nomination would likely receive a cool reception among Iraq's other religious and ethnic groups. The Kurdish coalition, which won 53 seats, has often squabbled with Jafari over the issue of who will control the oil-rich northern city of Kirkuk. The leading Sunni Arab coalition, which won 44 seats, fears Jafari's religious bent and his party's ties to Iran, a Shiite theocracy.

"We don't have much influence over who they are going to choose for the post of prime minister," said Naseer Ani, a member of the Sunni coalition. "Mr. Jafari was and still is prime minister, but as we and others have seen, his government's performance was a failure in many respects: in security, services and so on. This we believe will affect his chances to be chosen again for the post if the matter reaches the stage of voting inside the alliance."

The Shiite leadership is hoping to avoid an internal battle over the nominee. In a sermon Friday at the Imam Ali mosque in Najaf, Sheik Sadr Udeen Qabanchi told worshipers that Shiite factions "must shape up to run the political process effectively without causing embarrassment to the religious authorities."

Once the new parliament convenes, which is required within two weeks now that the election results have been certified, its first order of business will be to choose a three-member presidency council, which then will put forward nominees for prime minister and other leadership positions. But the strongest parties typically negotiate in advance who will fill each post, and the Shiites' announcement of their pick for prime minister will open the way for choosing nominees for posts such as president, defense minister, interior minister and oil minister.

On Friday, the U.S. ambassador to Iraq repeated his hope that the new government would include Shiite, Sunni Arab, Kurdish and secular representatives.

"We hope that this will be a government based on national unity, formed without regard to sectarianism, committed to peace and with capable ministers who place loyalty to Iraq above that of loyalty to faction," Zalmay Khalilzad, the U.S. ambassador to Iraq, said in a statement. "These ministers should be dedicated to the defense of Iraqi democracy, not to party militias."

The gravity of the situation here was driven home once more by violence. Two Marines died of their wounds after their patrol in Fallujah, about 35 miles west of Baghdad, was hit by a roadside bomb Thursday, U.S. military authorities said in a statement Friday.

DOJ_NMG_0014557

In Baghdad's Dora neighborhood, a car bomb exploded near a Sunni mosque Friday, killing at least eight people and wounding more than 20, police and witnesses at the scene said. Capt. Salam Ghadban, a spokesman for the Baghdad police, confirmed the number of casualties.

Witnesses said a parked car loaded with explosives was remotely detonated near the main gate of the Iskan al-Shaabi mosque in Dora, one of Baghdad's most violent districts.

"While I was about to leave the mosque, the explosion happened. We were panicked. I ran out immediately. I saw people shouting and crying. One man was crawling because he lost one leg," said Ihsan Ali, 28, as he stood near the wreckage of his car.

Another roadside bomb exploded in the Ghazaliya neighborhood, in western Baghdad, Ghadban said. Five Iraqi army soldiers were killed and two civilians were wounded, he said.

Correspondent Jonathan Finer and special correspondents Omar Fekeiki, Bassam Sebti and K.I. Ibrahim in Baghdad and Saad Sarhan in Najaf contributed to this report.

Shiite Coalition Struggles To Agree On A Prime Minister (KRT)

By Nancy A. Youssef

Knight Ridder, February 11, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq - Iraq's leading Shiite Muslim political group showed signs of fracturing this week as it debated whether to choose a secular Shiite or a more religious leader to be the country's prime minister.

The next prime minister will play a crucial role in deciding how the new government tackles the largely Sunni Muslim insurgency, sectarian strife and the economic woes that plague the country. U.S. officials are hoping that Iraq's first permanent government since the fall of Saddam Hussein's dictatorship can stabilize the country, avert a civil war and allow American and other foreign troops to leave.

Members of the Shiite-dominated United Iraqi Alliance slate, which won 128 of the 275 seats in parliament, have narrowed their choice to two candidates, interim Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari, who has the backing of the slate's more religious voters, and Vice President Adil Abdel Mahdi, who's more secular.

The slate plans to make its choice Saturday, and that person will seek approval from the full National Assembly. Because the United Iraqi Alliance holds so many seats, its choice is likely to become the prime minister.

The race between al-Jaafari and Mahdi is a tough one. The United Iraqi Alliance, which is made up of four parties, is evenly split and has spent the last week wrangling over how to choose a candidate. The margin of victory could be as little as one vote, said Nasir al-Saadi, a member of the slate.

Choosing al-Jaafari would satisfy much of the United Iraqi Alliance's base, which wants the government to pursue a more Islamist agenda. The supporters of rebel Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, who represent nearly half of Baghdad, support al-Jaafari.

But the slate has promised to form a consensus government that all the country's sects embrace, including Sunni Arabs and Kurds. During his one-year tenure, al-Jaafari has angered the country's minority Sunnis, who charge that Iraq's predominantly Shiite military and security forces have targeted them for imprisonment and execution under his leadership.

Some Kurds say they support Mahdi and have been frustrated by al-Jaafari's strained relationship with Iraqi President Jalal Talabani, a Kurd. They also say al-Jaafari didn't do enough to meet Kurdish demands on key issues such as continued autonomy in their northern region.

"The elite look at Mahdi as someone who will build a modern government because of his enlightened thoughts. But Jaafari is much closer to the Shiite Islamic religious leadership," said Hazim Abdel Hamid al-Nuaimi, a professor of politics at al-Mustansiriya University. "Mahdi represents reform. And Jaafari represents the conservative line."

The United Iraqi Alliance members who oppose Mahdi say they were elected to install a more Islamic government, not a more secular one. And many in the slate are happy with the advances that Shiites have made in al-Jaafari's government.

The United Iraqi Alliance members never wanted to vote on their candidate, hoping that they could agree on a leader. They fear that the next prime minister may win support from only half the slate's members, but they reluctantly agreed to the vote because they worry that their lengthy debate is eroding the public's confidence, said Abbas al-Bayati, a member of the slate.

Government leaders conceded that the public had expected a list of candidates for prime minister by now, eight weeks after the Dec. 15 election. With so many Iraqis pinning their hopes on the new governing body, it's important they see efficiency, leaders said.

"Of course this delay is not in the interest of Iraq," said Faraj al-Haidari, a National Assembly member who represents a Kurdish slate. "It will disappoint the street. And all ministries now are on hold. They cannot make decisions to improve the daily life of Iraqis."

DOJ_NMG_0014558

Without a candidate, the parties have had a difficult time choosing the rest of the government. Some candidates for key posts said they couldn't decide until they knew what kind of leader Iraq would have.

The prime minister "will define the platform," said Mithal Alusi, a candidate to lead the Ministry of Defense, who's said he won't consider the post until the slate spells out its agenda.

Knight Ridder Newspapers special correspondents Zaineb Obeid, Ahmed Mukhtar and Huda Ahmed contributed to this report from Baghdad.

Shi'ites To Choose Premier Nominee (WT)

By Sharon Behn

The Washington Times, February 11, 2006

Iraq's majority Shi'ite coalition is to announce its nominee for the powerful post of prime minister this weekend, as certified election results released yesterday confirmed the Shi'ites' overwhelming victory at the polls.

Iraqi officials and U.S. sources said yesterday the nomination was likely to go to either Vice President Adil Abdul Mahdi of the powerful pro-Iranian Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq (SCIRI) or Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari of the Islamic Dawa party.

"Tomorrow we will see who will be prime minister," Karim al-Musawi, SCIRI's Washington-based spokesman said yesterday. He deemed Mr. Mahdi's chances of getting the top post as very good.

The formation of a new government -- which promises to be a much-stormier process -- will take place within the next "six to eight weeks," Mr. al-Musawi said.

U.S. Ambassador to Iraq Zalmay Khalilzad welcomed the results and called for "a government based on national unity, formed without regard to sectarianism, committed to peace and with capable ministers who place loyalty to Iraq above that of loyalty to faction."

The announcements did nothing to stem the daily sectarian violence in Iraq, as a car bomb exploded outside a Sunni mosque in Baghdad's Dora district, killing nine persons and wounding dozens.

The U.S. military announced that two Marines were killed the previous day by a roadside bomb near Fallujah, 40 miles west of Baghdad.

The Independent Electoral Commission of Iraq announced the certified results of the Dec. 15 vote after a protracted appeals process amid accusations of fraud and ballot-box stuffing.

According to the final tally, the Shi'ite United Iraqi Alliance won 128 seats; the Kurdish alliance got 53 seats; the Sunni Iraqi Accord Front won 44 seats; the secular list headed by former Prime Minister Iyad Allawi won 25 seats; the Sunni Iraqi Front for National Dialogue won 11 seats; the Kurdistan Islamic Union got five seats; and a smattering of smaller parties won nine seats.

The nomination of a prime minister is partly the result of pressure by American and British officials to move forward on the election results. Unofficial final results were released on Jan. 20.

"What we will probably see is the announcement of a [Shi'ite] alliance candidate, Adil Abdul Mahdi of SCIRI or Mr. al-Jaafari," said Jonathan Morrow of the Washington-based U.S. Institute of Peace.

According to Iraq's constitution, President Jalal Talabani must convene the new 275-seat parliament within two weeks of election certification.

In the next 90 days, parliament will elect a three-person presidency council, which, in turn, will appoint a prime minister. The prime minister then names a Cabinet, which must be confirmed by parliament.

In reality, close observers of the process say, there will be a lot of closed-door negotiations, and only when the whole package is decided will any announcements be made.

"Nothing will be agreed until it is all agreed," said Mr. Morrow, who is often in Iraq as a legal consultant to the constitutional process. Major horse-trading is expected among Sunni, Kurd and Shi'ite factions concerning key ministries.

SCIRI officials say senior ministry posts -- such as interior -- will remain in Shi'ite hands, while junior ministries would be parceled out among the minority Kurds and Sunnis.

U.S. officials see a new government as a prerequisite to quelling the Sunni-backed insurgency.

But Mr. Morrow cautioned that the deep Sunni antagonism to the new government of Iraq will not be resolved simply by seeing the people they voted for holding ministerial posts.

"Their anxiety is more deep-seated," he said. "It is based on the construction of the Iraqi state and on Sunni Arabs not getting their share of the oil revenues."

A SCIRI official, speaking on the condition of anonymity, agreed that tough negotiations are ahead. "The ministerial position distribution will be OK, but federalism and oil -- these are the obstacles in the road," he said in a telephone interview.

DOJ_NMG_0014559

In Iraq, Carnage Amid Conciliation (LAT)

By Richard Boudreaux, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, February 11, 2006

Nine die in bombing and shooting at a Sunni mosque. The Dec. 15 vote is certified and sectarian leaders ease confrontational stances.

BAGHDAD — A bomb exploded in a car parked 10 yards from a Sunni Muslim mosque Friday, killing eight worshipers in Iraq's deadliest attack during a week otherwise marked by conciliatory words between leaders of feuding religious sects.

The midday blast hit people leaving Iskan Shaabi Mosque after the main weekly prayer service in Baghdad's Dora neighborhood. Witnesses said bodies flew through the air and nearby cars went up in flames, sending smoke through the mosque's shattered windows. At least 22 people were wounded.

No group claimed responsibility. A Sunni Arab political party blamed foreign elements of the Sunni-led insurgency, which reportedly has been divided over whether to continue targeting civilians in its campaign against U.S. forces and Iraq's Shiite Muslim-led government.

Two Marines died after their patrol hit a roadside bomb Thursday near the embattled city of Fallouja, 35 miles west of Baghdad, the U.S. military announced.

Iraq's electoral commission certified final results for the Dec. 15 elections, setting the stage for U.S.-backed talks aimed at bringing minority Sunnis into a broad-based government and undercutting the insurgency.

In the run-up to the talks, Shiite and Sunni leaders have tempered their words and insurgents have diminished the scale of violence.

Shiites marked their most important religious holiday Thursday without suffering an insurgent attack such as the bombings that had marred it the previous two years.

During Friday prayers at Baghdad's Umm Qura Mosque, normally a font of hard-line Sunni rhetoric, Sheik Ali Sanad offered rare words of affection for Imam Hussein, the Shiite figure commemorated in Thursday's Ashura festivities. Sanad called on Sunnis and Shiites to honor Hussein's legacy by "stopping the bloodshed in Iraq … through honest dialogue."

The gesture echoed a call Wednesday by the largest Shiite party's leader, Abdelaziz Hakim, for greater respect for human rights by Iraq's Shiite-led police forces, whose alleged violent raids, arbitrary detentions and summary executions have enraged Sunnis.

One such incident blamed on police occurred in Baghdad late Thursday. Adel Khalil Dawoud, a Sunni cleric, was dragged from his home by at least 15 men in the uniform of the Interior Ministry's special forces, the cleric's brother said.

Dawoud had fled to Jordan to avoid sectarian attacks and recently returned. The Interior Ministry called the incident a kidnapping and denied that its forces were involved.

Citing such alleged police abuse, Sunni political leaders have demanded the removal of Interior Minister Bayan Jabr as a condition for joining the government. Jabr has incorporated members of his Badr Brigade, the sectarian militia of Hakim's Shiite party, into the ministry's police.

U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad appeared to endorse the Sunni demand in a statement Friday, saying Cabinet ministers in the new government "should be dedicated to the defense of Iraqi democracy, not to party militias."

The mosque bombing did not fit the recent pattern of Shiite violence against Sunnis. Car bombs are a hallmark of Sunni guerrillas, aimed mainly at U.S. troops and Iraqi government targets and rarely used to kill civilians or blow up mosques.

But fighting has been reported in recent months between the foreign-led fighters of Al Qaeda in Iraq and their erstwhile home-grown allies. Gunmen have attacked Sunni tribal and religious leaders who broke with Al Qaeda to support the entry of the Iraqi Islamic Party and other Sunni groups in the December elections.

Ammar Wajuih, a spokesman for the Iraqi Islamic Party, said Friday's attack was "evidence that terrorists from outside the country … are trying to ignite sectarian violence among Iraqi people who want to live peacefully."

"We condemn this attack, just as we condemn attacks on Shiite mosques," he added.

Associated Press said one of its photographers saw several masked gunmen shouting "God is great!" drive up to the mosque an hour after the blast and fire into a crowd outside. A woman was killed, bringing the death toll to nine.

The election results announced Friday did not alter uncertified returns released three weeks ago that gave the main Shiite alliance and its Kurdish coalition partners 181 of parliament's 275 seats, just short of the two-thirds majority required to form a government.

Two Sunni blocs got 55 seats. Talks aimed at drawing them and smaller parties into the government are expected to start as soon as the Shiite alliance, which is entitled to nominate the prime minister, settles an internal fight.

DOJ_NMG_0014560

Vice President Adel Abdul Mehdi, whose secular outlook makes him more acceptable to Sunnis and other opposition groups, is challenging Ibrahim Jafari, the religious scholar now serving as prime minister.

Unless a decision is made by consensus, Shiite leaders say, their alliance's 128 members of parliament will vote as early as today.

"It's close," said Nasser Saadi, a member of the alliance. "If there's a difference, it's not more than one or two votes."

*

Times staff writers Suhail Ahmad, Caesar Ahmed, Shamil Aziz, Saif Rasheed and Raheem Salman contributed to this report.

Neighborhood Peace A Casualty Of War (WP)

By Jonathan Finer

The Washington Post, February 11, 2006

As Battle Breaches Baghdad Haven, Shiites and Sunnis Unite

BAGHDAD -- To generations of its residents, the tightknit neighborhood known as Tobji was among this city's rare oases. People argued amiably in sidewalk cafes kept open until nearly midnight. Shiite and Sunni Muslims married into each other's families and lived side-by-side. Until recently, Iraq's police and army, with more than enough trouble spots to worry about, rarely came around.

It was a neighborhood, residents said, that lived up to its formal name, Salam, which means peace. But in volatile Baghdad, home to more than 5 million people, even stable sections sit a few stray shots from chaos. It took scarcely two months for the sectarian conflict consuming other corners of the capital to gain a foothold in Tobji.

It began, residents say, one November day when gunmen killed Majid Abdul Hussein, a local preacher and member of a powerful Shiite militia. Days later, a former member of Saddam Hussein's Sunni-led Baath Party was gunned down in broad daylight. Before locals realized it, they said, theirs had become yet another fractured community, a place nearly silent after dark save for the crackle of gunfire.

Then, on Jan. 23, men in camouflage uniforms rounded up 53 Tobji residents, nearly all of them Sunnis, in pre-dawn raids. Two people were killed. Other than two old men who were released days later, none of those taken have been heard from since.

Locals said the uniforms the gunmen wore and the vehicles they drove identified them as Interior Ministry police commandos, whose ranks are dominated by former members of Shiite factional militias. Since Iraq's Shiite majority first gained political power in elections a year ago, raids like the one in Tobji have taken place in neighborhoods in Baghdad and other Iraqi cities. They always target Sunni men, and witnesses always implicate the police.

Iraqi officials have denied any government role in the raids, blaming groups intent on destabilizing the country.

"It happens too often that people impersonate government forces, impersonate police," said Baghdad's governor, Hussein Taha, who oversees his province's police force. "When the terrorists feel chased in one area, they transfer to another and carry out operations there randomly, even if it affects civilians. That is what happened to Tobji."

Asked how many Tobji residents have died violently in recent months, Mariam Nouri, 27, whose family came to the neighborhood more than 50 years ago, counted them by name.

"There's Hussein, Firas, Abbas, Osama, Uday," said Nouri, a Sunni, whose brother, father and uncle were dragged from her home during the recent raid. Hardly pausing for breath, she ticked off 11 of the dead from memory. "It might be more like 15," she said. "There are some I've forgotten."

Sunni leaders have responded to the raids in Tobji, northwest of downtown, and in other Baghdad neighborhoods by calling on residents to defend themselves. Adnan Dulaimi, a prominent Sunni Arab politician, called for further unrest unless the country's next government puts police beyond the control of Shiite militias. The Iraqi Accordance Front, the country's dominant Sunni political group, warned Wednesday of "nationwide civil disobedience" unless what it termed "haphazard raids" were halted.

Observers in the capital say the destructive cycle of raids, denunciations and retaliatory violence represents the first tentative steps toward a wider sectarian conflict spreading like a virus from community to community.

"It started in Iskan, then Sadiya and Ghazaliya," said Abbas Lafta, 35, a Shiite resident of Tobji, citing once-tranquil Baghdad enclaves that have fallen like dominoes toward his neighborhood in the past year. "People used to move here to get away from those places. Now we are one of them."Neighborhood Checkpoints

Bounded by a highway overpass and a park with a scraggly dirt soccer field, Tobji got its name from the cramped commercial street, lined with vendors' stalls, that bisects the neighborhood. Dozens of sheep graze along a grassy median, snarling traffic near an open-air market.

DOJ_NMG_0014561

On a recent weekday, side roads leading from a main thoroughfare were blocked with concrete barriers, and Iraqi soldiers operated a checkpoint at the top of one busy street. A second checkpoint on the neighborhood's southern edge was manned entirely by civilians, who watched cars intently as they departed. It was not always this way.

"It is like someone saw this was a safe place and wanted to provoke things," said Muthana Mahmoud, 43, who has lived in Tobji all his life.

Juliet Hadad, 41, a mother of six, said: "Before, when we lived normally, you would feel no tension here. Now we are scared, not just of Sunnis, but of our own people. I grounded my children. I don't let them go anywhere now."

As the conflict began to escalate late last year, eight people were killed in a two-week span following the country's Dec. 15 elections. But it was the Jan. 23 raid, Sunni and Shiite residents said, that did the most to inflame sectarian tension.

Residents said it began just after 4 a.m., as about 20 sport-utility vehicles and pickup trucks without license plates, resembling those driven by Iraq's police commandos, rumbled into the neighborhood bearing a force of nearly 200 armed men.

For the next three hours, the gunmen, many of them clad in yellow-and-gray camouflage uniforms, burst into Sunnis' homes, sometimes leaping from roof to roof, rounding up men and terrifying their families. They took their cell phones and cut landlines so residents could not call for help.

"They had beards, and their dialect sounded like they were from the south," said Mahmoud, who said three men leapt onto his roof from a neighbor's window. When his brother answered the door, one of the men asked him, "Are you Abu Abbas?"

"No," his brother said. "I don't know who that is."

"They blindfolded him and took him outside," Mahmoud said. "Then they came back for me. They took me up to the roof and held me over the edge by my feet. They only let me go when my mother came up, screaming."

Nouri thought her family would be safe, even though they are Sunnis, because her father and uncle work for Interior Ministry police units. But even after presenting their identification cards to the gunmen, they were detained.

"When my sister asked, 'Why, why are you taking them when they are like you?' they pointed their guns at her and hit her on the head," Nouri said. "I was cursing them and saying, 'God is my defender!' "

Down the street, two men who tried to defend their homes were killed. When the gunmen grabbed the wife of Bilal Ali Ghazal by the hair and pulled her toward their car, he grabbed a rifle and went to his roof, firing shots to try to draw help. An attacker in the street shot him in the stomach.

Ismael Egaidi killed one of the gunmen who entered his home before dying in a hail of bullets, residents said.

Desperate to find what became of the 51 men who were detained but never released, Tobji residents said they had made daily visits to Baghdad's Interior Ministry, only to be told there was no information. When word spread that seven bullet-riddled bodies had turned up in the Rustamiyah neighborhood, relatives of those detained in Tobji dashed to the morgue to look for familiar faces. They found none.

Residents say the government's denial of police involvement in the raid does not square with what they witnessed that night. The assailants were driving around Baghdad in a large convoy of sport-utility vehicles that locals recognized as those used by police since the late 1990s. They wore camouflage uniforms and carried Glock pistols, the same as those issued to police officers.

"Explain to me how this can be anyone other than the Iraqi security forces," said Muhammed Majid, a Tobji resident. But even Majid acknowledged that he could not be sure who was responsible.Armed Citizens

With nowhere else to turn, Tobji residents intent on stopping the escalating violence are relying on one another. In recent weeks, both Sunnis and Shiites have contributed manpower to an 80-member neighborhood citizens force that patrols the streets alongside the Iraqi army, manning checkpoints and alerting soldiers to suspicious outsiders.

Neighbors have started collecting money to pay a small salary to the volunteers, who call themselves "the guardians."

When they first took to the streets in December, they were arrested and their guns confiscated by Iraqi police because they had no licenses to carry weapons. But after the January raid, they demanded, and were issued, badges from the Interior Ministry authorizing them to carry rifles.

"Some of them were in the military once, but they all know how to use guns," said Lafta, the 35-year-old neighborhood resident, who helps supervise the program. "Things have been a bit quieter since they got out there."

But many residents insist the neighborhood will never be the same.

"The politicians say, 'Defend yourself,' but how do you defend yourself against an army with machine guns and vehicles?" Mahmoud said. "The ones who defended themselves are the ones who got killed."

Residents said the influx of people fleeing other neighborhoods since 2003 has steadily driven up apartment rents. But now a migration out of Tobji is underway.

DOJ_NMG_0014562

"I don't think we will ever get back what we had," Lafta said. "The number who were arrested was so large, and their relatives are so angry. They will not rest. They will always have hatred in their hearts. They will want to take more revenge. I know Shiites who have already gotten threatening letters. If I get one, I will leave."

Special correspondent Omar Fekeiki contributed to this report.

The Chiefs Of Baghdad (FT)

By Steve Negus

Financial Times, February 11, 2006

Eighteen months ago, the radical Iraqi Shia movement known as the Sadrists was at war with the country's interim government and its US backers in the streets of the holy city of Najaf while their young upstart leader Moqtada al-Sadr was a fugitive. Now the Sadrists are one of the partners in the United Iraqi Alliance, the Shia coalition that dominates government and is likely to be one of the most powerful forces shaping Iraqi politics in the next four years.

This may alarm many people outside Iraq, but the Sadrists are folk heroes in parts of Baghdad, perceived as tough but fair men who do the job that the government can't or won't do. Through an Iraqi colleague, whom I shall call Haydar, I came to learn about some of the things the Sadrists do through their "Mahdi Army", in particular a group that specialises in tracking down people kidnapped by Baghdad's criminal gangs.

Haydar is a proud father of 11, personally devout but well acquainted with the rougher and more roguish sides of life. In many ways he is an archetypal inhabitant of the east Baghdad slum of Sadr City. Laid out in the 1960s by populist dictator Abd al-Karim Qassem as a home for impoverished Shia migrants from the southern countryside, Sadr City was at first named "Revolution City" then changed to "Saddam City" after Saddam Hussein took power in 1979. Hussein had given the district his name, but little else. Its potholed roads are lined with open sewers choked with plastic bags. In the summer, smoke from burning trash combines with heat and dust to create an acrid haze that hangs over the city. In the winter, flooded drains overflow to form reeking pools of black muck. After the dictator was toppled by the US, the inhabitants of the slum lost little time in renaming it after Moqtada's father, the Ayatollah Mohammed Sadek al-Sadr, a venerated Shia cleric murdered by the old regime.

Sadr City is viewed by other Baghdadis as a den of gangsters. Haydar, however, is proud of his neighbourhood. It is, he admits, home to quite a few of Baghdad's criminal elements and is a good place to buy weapons or a forged passport. However, he points out, it is also one of the few places in Baghdad where I, a foreigner, can walk about without having to worry about being abducted either by ordinary criminals or by insurgents. Rory Carroll, a reporter for The Guardian newspaper might not attest to this too enthusiastically. In October a Sadrist faction abducted and held him for 36 hours in an attempt to exchange him for a prisoner held by the British, then released him. But the view that foreigners were not likely to be nabbed in Sadr City was widely shared among the Baghdad press corps at the time, and the reason was that the neighbourhood was to a large extent under the control of the Mahdi Army.

This is not what most of the rest of the world would think, associating as they do the Sadrists with the "militia" that fought the Americans in the summer of 2004. The Sadrists themselves are adamant that the Mahdi Army, despite its name, is not a militia, but a network of pious youth who, armed with their own private weapons, rose up when their leader was threatened. This doesn't explain why they still have commanders and units. Nonetheless, "militia" is a term of abuse these days and politicians say such things have no place in the new Iraq, so the fiction exists. As part of the deal under which the Mahdi Army stopped fighting in October 2004, Sadr said the movement would dissolve itself as a military institution and work as a political party and community movement, possibly "assisting the police" in keeping order in Sadr City.

It's not just the police who could do with assistance. Much of Iraq these days seems to be going the way of Sadr City. The state began to fail during the years of UN sanctions and the collapse of Saddam Hussein's regime completed the job. Iraqis usually have little faith in formal governmental institutions, and the institutions generally live down to their expectations. Local political or religious movements, with their armed back-up, are more legitimate and powerful than any minister cloistered in Baghdad.

Last year I went with Haydar to the site of an incident he had told me about - a kidnappers' safehouse, just off one of Sadr City's trash-strewn vacant lots. The owner, according to neighbours, was a decent guy, but had been enlisted or possibly coerced by his drinking buddies to watch over their captives. Ever since Hussein had released about 100,000 prison inmates on the eve of his regime's downfall, much of Iraq has been overrun by criminal gangs, and kidnapping for ransom - in addition to arms sales, drug dealing and subcontracting themselves out to insurgents - is one of the easiest ways to earn a living.

In this case the locals had informed on the kidnappers to the police, who raided the house and arrested them. Inexplicably the owner was released from policy custody soon thereafter, and the residents surmised that he had paid a bribe. They contacted the Mahdi Army, who raided the house and forced the police to keep the rest of the perpetrators in prison. "They are the real heroes, not the police," one of the residents told us. "They are the real champions of the people." True to its Robin Hood reputation, the Mahdi Army performed the "service" of ridding the area of kidnappers while asking for nothing in return. The Sadrists accept donations, but not quid pro quo.

DOJ_NMG_0014563

We asked which Mahdi Army "sheikh" had taken charge of this operation and were given the nomme de guerre of Abu Jaafar. Although technically a fugitive from the Americans, who were hunting him because of his role in the 2004 fighting, Haydar found him after making a few inquiries. So, a few hours later, we met him in the group's own safe house, a small but clean apartment with doves warbling on the floor. Jaafar spoke to us surrounded by his jamaa, his personal following of about two dozen young men in the black button-down shirt and black trousers that have become the Mahdi Army's ad hoc uniform. For more than a year, this group had been in charge of tracking down gangs. In that time, four of their members were killed and four others permanently maimed.

The Mahdi Army is a young man's movement - Sadr himself is only in his thirties - but Jaafar, at 27, was a young leader even by Sadrist standards. With his well-trimmed beard and self-assurance, he resembles many other earnest and charismatic young men who have risen to positions of authority in Islamist movements across the Arab world. He was a former seminary student before taking command of the anti-gang squad. He eschews much of the lofty religious rhetoric and generalities favoured by other Sadrist clerics, which make conversations with them sometimes difficult. Instead, he seemed to relish relating the details, names and places of Iraq's underground.

"It's all about geography," Jaafar explains, beginning a narrative of his group's current case. The jamaa had been contacted by a Kurdish lawyer, whose teenaged son had been kidnapped. The boy had been taken in the south Baghdad district of Kerrada. Based on this, Jaafar decided to stake out a coffee house just off the neighbourhood's main shopping street, frequented by a man we shall call Mustafa, a Kurdish gangster with a finger in every dodgy pie in the area.

After several days, the Mahdi Army noticed Qais, a gangster from Sadr City known to be involved in kidnapping, enter the coffee shop to speak with Mustafa. This, they decided, was a likely suspect. They placed a tail on Qais and told the father to inform the gang he was ready to pay the ransom. Qais set up one fake drop after another, sending the father into Baghdad's streets night after night to make sure that he had not brought along gunmen. Qais did not notice, however, that he himself was under observation. The Mahdi Army decided that they had their man. When Qais set up the final drop-off the Mahdi Army decided to grab him.

One member of the jamaa, Mohammed, however jumped the gun. He and a colleague, Maytham, showed up before the other Sadrists. They leapt out of their car with pistols, but Qais, Mustafa and his men had machineguns. When the shooting stopped, both Sadrists and Qais had been hit. The gang, realising that the Mahdi Army were after them, scattered to the winds. Qais and Mohammed survived; Maytham was killed. "Mohammed was over-eager," said Jaafar with a certain weary resignation.

Three weeks later, at least some of the gang had been rounded up. Mustafa appears to have escaped to Kurdistan - the old men playing dominos in front of his favourite Kerrada coffee house, at any rate, told us that he had not been seen for a month. Several others, however, were now in the custody of the police, cooling their heels in Sadr City's al-Rafidain police station.

We were taken there by a man called Ali, one of Jaafar's lieutenants. Ali was clearly a hard guy. He has two martyrs in his family. His father was killed by Hussein in the 1991 Shia intifada that followed the first Gulf war. His brother was killed in another uprising that broke out when gunmen thought to be linked to the Hussein regime killed Ayatollah Mohammed Sadek al-Sadr, father of Moqtada and the founder of the movement in 1999. Ali and several of his friends, Kalashnikovs in hand, had personally arrested one of the three imprisoned gang members and had a certain proprietorial interest in the case.

We arrived in Sadr City amid reports that a car bomb had just been discovered on the city's outskirts. Mahdi Army militants were stopping anyone who looked like they were from out of town (including one of our cars) and checking vehicles for explosives. When we arrived at the station, Ali was shocked to find out that the gang suspects had been transferred to the Major Crimes Unit in another part of town. He immediately got on the phone to Jaafar - the police at Major Crimes were notorious for freeing suspects. Without the Mahdi Army keeping tabs on the case, Ali said, the police would be sure to let Qais' gang go.

We then walked into the station with Ali and asked the senior officer, a grizzled lieutenant, for the police version of the case. Somewhat reluctantly, the officer described, using the stilted language of an interior ministry press release, a "shared operation" in which the police and Mahdi Army "co-operated" to round up a gang "implicated in criminal activities". Ali was incensed - "Co-operated? All you did was transfer them to the Major Crimes Unit," he said to the lieutenant. The Mahdi Army were the ones who suffered a martyrdom, he pointed out to another policeman. "The police do nothing," he said, walking out of the station in disgust. "We are the authority here."

On the way home, I asked Haydar in what sorts of situations he himself might turn to the Mahdi Army. Certainly a kidnapping case, he said, also if there is stealing or gang activity going on in the neighbourhood. What about murder? I asked. Well, you might ask the Mahdi Army to mediate in a murder case, but if a relative is killed first you turn to your tribe. Even in Hussein's day, while the police might arrest and jail a murderer, the matter isn't over until either blood vengeance or blood money is obtained. There are two parallel systems of law enforcement in modern Iraq: the authorities keep order; your family gets you justice.

DOJ_NMG_0014564

The Mahdi Army seems to fall somewhere between the two. Haydar described an incident he had seen at a wedding. One of the guests started firing his weapon into the air - a traditional way of celebrating, but one that is now considered a bit anti-social. The Mahdi Army showed up, and asked him to stop. The guest responded: "Who are you?" The Mahdi Army, having been insulted, switched from an ostensibly neutral order-keeper to an aggrieved party. Some 150 "brothers" pulled up, wanting to beat up the guest. Haydar and a tribal sheikh had to mediate to sort it out.

At various times, the Mahdi Army seems to have taken on the trappings of a state. It has run its own courts, for example - although these are more tribal-style arbiters of a dispute, rather than traditional criminal court magistrates. Perhaps more revealing is its attitude towards dealing out punishment. After the Mahdi Army withdrew from Najaf, the Iraqi military claimed to have discovered Sadrist-run prisons and torture chambers. However, if such places exist in Sadr City, they are a very well-kept secret. Haydar, for his part, does not believe they exist.

Nonetheless, the Mahdi Army has a reputation for vigilantism. Any messianic movement will attract both thugs and saints, and various combinations of the two. The Sadrists were known for attacks on gypsy encampments, which in Iraq often double as primitive semi-mobile brothels. Although they enjoyed some protection under Hussein, who had a weakness for gypsy dancing, they are now among the country's most vulnerable groups. The Sadrists also have a reputation in universities for intimidating their more secular-minded counterparts. I asked Haydar about a recent incident in Basra. The press had depicted it as a more or less unprovoked assault against a co-ed picnic, in which militiamen beat students - focusing particularly on the women - for daring to mingle the sexes in public. According to Haydar's version of events, culled from other Sadr City residents as well as relatives in Basra, the Mahdi Army had responded to locals' complaints about students behaving "inappropriately" in their neighbourhood. The Mahdi Army tried to get the students to disperse, were defied, and used force. According to Haydar, the Mahdi Army was upholding the social norm in a public place. "If you took a woman to a private place [and] someone intervenes, you're in the right - you could kill them right there," he explained. "If you do it in public and they intervene, then they're in the right."

Haydar is a devotee of Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, the most popular and influential Shia cleric in Iraq. He is the epitome of orthodox Shi'ism, which venerates scholarly knowledge. When the elder Ayatollah Sadr first emerged, many in Sistani's circle of clerics looked at him as having too little of the seminary about him, and too much of the street. And when the younger Sadr assumed control of the movement, he was years from becoming an ayatollah (in Shi'ism, the rough equivalent of a tenured full professor), and was more like a graduate student. The Grand Ayatollah never disrespected the younger Sadr in public, but many of his deputies showed no such compunction. One Sistani scholar suggested that the younger Sadr might be better off "finishing his studies" than meddling in politics. Others referred to his movement as a "phenomenon linked to unemployment".

Haydar has no doubt that the Mahdi Army contains a rough element, including, he believes, criminal gangs who appropriate the name as a cover for their activities. In his neighbourhood, however, he witnessed the other side of the Sadrist movement. Sadrist cadres took control of the area, fending off the chaos that engulfed much of Baghdad. They defended the suburb against Hussein's security thugs or the estimated 100,000 former inmates released from prison, thought to make up the bulk of the gangs that ravaged the rest of Baghdad. Sadrists brought in drinking water, paid the salaries to keep staff at work running the hospitals. "When no one was there to protect us, they protected us," Haydar says.

Several weeks later, Ali became his family's third martyr. He had been coming back to the safe house at midnight when he encountered a US checkpoint in the street. Having a pistol in his car, he panicked and ran. He was shot in the head, with the bullet reportedly taking much of his face away. He had been engaged to be married a week before. The funeral tent was packed with mourners, some in tribal dress, some in the black uniform of the Mahdi Army. Abu Jaafar kept order, restraining them at one point as a US patrol drove by. As the coffee was served, a religious chanter recited a poem over the sound system, addressed to the Hidden Imam, the Mahdi for whom the army is named, the one who will return to bring just rule to the world:

"Why do you wait, oh Imam?
These youths are killed for your religion and for your victory
A week after his engagement,
He sees how his companions gather in his honour.
The candle of youth is extinguished by the Americans."

As the day wore on, a stream of politicians arrived to pay their respects. Fatah al-Sheikh, a Sadrist who had run for and won a seat in parliament, gave an angry address calling for a full US withdrawal from Sadr City. The commander of the Mahdi Army also made an appearance, vowing to fight if the Americans returned in force. One particularly incongruous guest, sitting in the first rank of dignitaries among the black shirts, beards, robes and turbans, was a figure with a carefully trimmed moustache and a grey business suit. He was Mudhar Shawkat, a longtime associate of Ahmed Chalabi, onetime darling of the neo-conservatives in Washington and now Iraq's deputy prime minister. Chalabi, a staunch secularist but a stauncher opportunist, had currently thrown in his lot with the Sadrists and was said to be coaching Sadr on the finer points of statesmanship. Shawkat's address betrayed little of Chalabi's secular vision, nor his government's position that militias have no place in the new Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0014565

"All of those who know me," said Shawkat, "know that I am a Sadrist by thought, and Sadrist in my actions. The Sadrist trend is not an alliance or party, it is an Iraqi movement - the trend of those who have been dealt injustice, the trend of the black soil... If the Mahdi Army was allowed to defend Sadr City [by itself], it could be the safest city in Iraq."

As we drove away from the funeral, a police car loaded with armed officers came ploughing through traffic. In most of the rest of the city, the police force cars over by sticking their guns out the window, firing shots and shouting over a loudspeaker, "Out of the way!" However, these particular police were shouting, "Out of the way, brothers!" You could view this as a tribute to the neighbourhood's sense of shared struggle, but Haydar thought of it as an acknowledgment that this is one part of town where the state has to watch where it treads.

Steve Negus is the FT's Iraq correspondent.

Tighter Borders Take A Toll In Iraq (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson

The Washington Post, February 11, 2006

Success of Effort Against Smuggling Hits Villagers Hard

OM AL-KABARI, Iraq -- In this once-thriving smuggling village on Iraq's border with Syria, the last donkeys are dying.

Mothers complain they have no shoes for their children and only soup to feed them. Men sit idly playing checkers and bemoaning the night when American scout helicopters swooped overhead, spelling the end of their livelihoods.

"We could get around everything, but not the helicopters," sighed Mahmood Ahmed, 29, who, along with most of the men in this village of 400 people, admitted he was a smuggler. "We're having nightmares about them."

With their income shriveling, the smugglers could no longer afford food for the hundreds of donkeys they used to haul 30-gallon drums of benzene, cartons of cigarettes and other goods into Syria.

"There is no grass, no money to feed them. So they all died," said Yassin Ali, 39, pointing to a mangy, skeletal white donkey lying listless nearby.

The dramatic downturn in the fortunes of villages along the border is one sign that a surge of American and Iraqi troops into the region in recent months has sharply curtailed illegal traffic over the frontier, U.S. and Iraqi officials and local residents say.

U.S. commanders last year launched a plan to gain better control of Iraq's borders to try to stop the flow of outside fighters, weapons and cash to the Iraqi insurgency. Several thousand additional U.S. and Iraqi troops have been sent into regions near Syria since last summer to bolster a growing contingent of Iraqi border guards. Scores of border forts have been built or refurbished and manned, and there are plans to erect a double chain-link fence along the border during the coming year, according to U.S. and Iraqi officials.

"It's much more than just a line in the sand right now," said Lt. Col. Gregory Reilly of Sacramento, Calif., commander of a U.S. cavalry squadron that oversees about 115 miles of Iraq's northwestern border with Syria, from the Tigris River to the Euphrates. "It's not like a vast open border, not at all. It's a very difficult border to cross."

Syrian border police are also aggressively patrolling their side, Reilly said, in contrast with official statements in Washington accusing Damascus of lax control. "The Syrians are actually doing their job. They are more violent than we are. If they see someone, they will open up shooting," Reilly said as he walked along a dirt berm in view of Syrian guards several weeks ago. Iraqi officers said Syrian guards had recently shot at Iraqi border police, leading to skirmishes.

Controls have been tightened at official border-crossing points. At the town of Rabiyah, a 10-wheel cargo truck rumbled past a newly constructed Iraqi customs station toward a Syrian checkpoint marked by a huge portrait of Syria's late president Hafez Assad. A few months ago, the Iraqi entry point here was in disarray, U.S. and Iraqi officials said. Inbound and outbound traffic were mixed together. Iraqi guards had only five rifles, lacked ammunition and "had no idea what passport was fake and what was real," said Col. Fadel Shaaban Abas, commander of Iraqi customs police at Rabiyah.

"It was complete chaos. You had no idea who was coming and going," said Reilly, commander of 1st Squadron, 3rd Armored Cavalry Regiment, which finishes a year-long tour in Iraq this month. A suicide car bombing in late May closed the entry point for two weeks.

Today, up to 5,000 people, mostly on foot, and about 300 vehicles cross the border daily through divided lanes. Customs revenue has almost tripled. The 120 Iraqi customs police are armed with AK-47 assault rifles or pistols and are backed up by a new, 260-man police battalion, which arrived in December, Abas said. A U.S. customs team recently trained the police officers to spot false passports, and now they find three or four a day, said Staff Sgt. Robert Lowery of Naples, Fla.

DOJ_NMG_0014566

Fighters from abroad -- both Iraqis who had left the country and some foreigners -- still manage to get into Iraq, but not simply by sneaking over the border, U.S. officials assert.

"The myth is that foreign fighters are crossing a porous border," said Maj. Chris Kennedy, executive officer with the 3rd Armored Cavalry. Instead, many of the incoming fighters can simply fly into Baghdad, using valid Iraqi passports made from "boxes and boxes" of blank passports shipped out of Iraq during Saddam Hussein's rule, Kennedy and other U.S. officers said. Iraqis are now posted at the border to listen for foreign accents, although many insurgents entering are Iraqis themselves, he said.

But while U.S. officers are less worried about foreign fighters trying to sift through border villages, they express concern that the severe economic impact of shutting down smuggling routes could create a new breeding ground for insurgents in Iraq.

"The biggest fear is you have a financier who comes through and builds a cell" in an impoverished border village, said Reilly, who estimated that 100,000 people live in primarily Sunni Arab villages along the stretch of border he oversees.

In Om al-Kabari, Mahmood Ali, a father of six, said he considered smuggling to be one of the few legitimate alternatives for earning a living in the village, where drought has curtailed farming in recent years.

"It's a more honorable job than stealing or being an Ali Baba, or insurgent -- you're risking your life . . . to put food on the table," said Ali, squatting in a circle sharing tea with the other village men.

Smuggling, while always a local occupation, accelerated with the economic embargo imposed on Iraq in the 1990s and then skyrocketed when border controls collapsed after the overthrow of President Saddam Hussein in April 2003, villagers said. The smugglers would take out loans at the local sheep market or from goods distributors in the city of Mosul, 100 miles to the east. They would use the money to buy benzene or cartons of cigarettes, load up their donkeys and set out for the border at night in teams of three or four.

It was a risky trade, said Ahmed, who was once caught by Syrian forces, beaten and detained for nine months in a crowded Syrian jail. He said five men from the village had been killed by the Syrian army since 2003. "The Syrians, most of the time, don't detain you, they just shoot you," he said. "There are no warning shots at all."

Still, it was the most lucrative job around. If they successfully met up with buyers in Syria, the teams of smugglers could each make about $27 a month, an average income for Iraqis in the region.

But then last spring, the arrival of U.S. Kiowa scout helicopters, backed up by American and Iraqi ground forces, halted the smuggling spree.

"It was my black day," recalled Yassin Ali, the first of the villagers to be caught by U.S. forces. "All of a sudden we were moving one night and we didn't hear anything, and they turned on the lights." The smugglers froze, but after a minute, when the lights went off again, they tried to flee, thinking the helicopter had gone and the crew could no longer see them. "But it still saw us, even from afar, and they were right back on us," Ali said. "Then the Humvees came up."

Next to the village, an Iraqi border fort is now manned by 24 Iraqi police officers who live there and work in shifts. It is one of 56 forts with 2,700 border police now operating along the northwestern border in conjunction with U.S. and Iraqi troops. Equipped with new jeeps, pickup trucks mounted with machine guns, binoculars and night vision goggles, the police patrol the border around the clock.

"Before, there was no tracking . . . whatsoever, and they could go in day and night," said 1st Lt. Abrahim Assaf Khuder, a police company commander. Now Khuder estimates smuggling has dropped 95 percent, with fewer than three to five interdictions a week. "What really decreased the numbers is the choppers," he said.

The smugglers admit they still occasionally try to make it across the border, adding they are happy the U.S. helicopters don't shoot them. Unlike in the past, they say, they never carry weapons.

"What can we do? We have no jobs, no benzene, no clothes for our families, and the choppers are on our heads all the time. We can't even buy shoes for our kids," Mahmood Ali said, pointing to the bare feet of his 6-year-old son. Monthly rations of grain from the government -- about 20 pounds a person -- only come every four months, he said.

"These towns are in dire need," said Reilly, who has attempted to alleviate the damage from the smuggling crackdown by shipping pallets of food and water to the villages and planning two well-building projects. Reilly has also proposed creating a free-trade zone along the border. In a recent meeting with villagers, they pressed him for permission to cross one day a week. "Syria has to approve it," Reilly told them.

" Inshalla h ," they replied. God willing.

Carroll Kidnappers Reportedly Set Deadline (AP)

By Paul Garwood

Associated Press, February 11, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0014567

BAGHDAD, Iraq -- Kidnappers of American journalist Jill Carroll have threatened to kill her if their demands are not met by Feb. 26, the owner of a Kuwaiti TV station that has aired a new tape of the hostage said Friday.

Al Rai satellite station owner Jassem Boudai said the kidnappers set "more specific" demands than the release of all Iraqi women from prison, which the group laid down in the first videotape released last month. Boudai refused to elaborate.

He said that "sources close to the kidnappers" told the station Friday of the new deadline.

The small, privately owned station aired a tape Thursday showing Carroll, 28, appealing for her supporters to do whatever it takes to win her release "as quickly as possible."

The U.S. military has released five Iraqi women from detention but said the releases were routine and not part of any swap for Carroll. Five Iraqi women remain in U.S. military custody.

Friday's message was not conveyed in the latest videotape, but by "another method," Boudai said. He did not elaborate, and it was unclear whether he passed the latest demands along to authorities.

Boudai said the sources claimed Carroll, who was abducted in Baghdad on Jan. 7, "is in a safe house owned by one of the kidnappers in downtown Baghdad with a group of women."

He said the sources also claimed Carroll was in good psychological condition and was doing housework with the women in the place of her detention. The sources also said the kidnappers denied killing Carroll's translator when they abducted her at gunpoint, as has previously been reported.

Later Friday, Boudai told CNN that he believed Carroll's kidnappers were the same ones who seized two Italian aid workers in September 2004 and released them several weeks later. Italian media said a $1 million ransom was paid in that case.

"I think they are the same group who contacted us last year when the two Italian girls were kidnapped in Iraq," Boudai said.

The station on Friday also reported the latest threat by the kidnappers to kill Carroll, a freelance reporter for the Christian Science Monitor.

Monitor spokeswoman Ellen Tuttle declined comment on Friday.

Two previous tapes of Carroll were aired without audio by Qatar-based Al-Jazeera on Jan. 17 and Jan. 30. The first tape made by the kidnappers, who identified themselves as the "Revenge Brigades," included a threat to kill Carroll within 72 hours unless all Iraqi women were released from custody.

Security experts said kidnappers' choice of Al Rai for the latest tape indicated an effort to increase pressure on the U.S. government.

Al Rai broadcast the new 22-second video in its entirety and with Carroll's voice, unlike Al-Jazeera, which has a policy not to broadcast voices. She spoke of having sent two letters but did not say to whom.

"I am with the mujahedeen," she said. "I sent you a letter written by my hand, but you wanted more evidence, so we are sending you this letter now to prove I am with the mujahedeen."

An Al-Jazeera employee, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he is not authorized to make statements for the station, confirmed the first two videos referred to a letter. The station did not mention any letters when it aired the videotapes. It did report that the kidnappers were demanding the release of women held prisoner in Iraq.

When the new tape was delivered to Al Rai's Baghdad office, it was accompanied by a letter written by Carroll, the station said.

Boudai said his station gave U.S. authorities the letter, which he described only as "sensitive." The station did not reveal its contents, he said, out of concern for the reporter.

Before the latest threat was reported, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said the United States continued "to make every effort to secure her release, to see that she's back safe and sound with her family and her co-workers."

Some analysts said Carroll's kidnappers used the relatively unknown station to get more of its message across and to avoid being tainted by Al-Jazeera's reputation as being biased toward insurgents.

Al-Jazeera came under criticism for airing videos showing al-Qaida in Iraq with hostages they soon beheaded. The station cut the tape when masked gunmen drew knives and moved toward their doomed victims.

Since then, Al-Jazeera has sought to air just enough material for news value without appearing to be a conduit for gruesome propaganda.

"There are a lot of question marks for insurgents at Al-Jazeera because they don't air all their tapes in entirety, or not immediately or sometimes not at all," said Mustafa al-Ani, director of terrorism studies at Gulf Research Center in the United Arab Emirates.

"But these small stations will jump at such opportunities because they aren't famous," he said. "Very few people had heard of Al Rai before that tape, but now people all over the United States know it."

A top U.S. media analyst said being able to get the full message out could put public pressure U.S. officials to question the Bush administration's approach to Iraq.

"These videos will prompt us to feel fear, hope, heightened anger or frustration about a matter as viewers will have little control over, and this could lead us to putting more pressure on our public officials," said Bob Steele of the Florida-based Poynter Institute for Media Studies.

___

Associated Press writer Diana Elias contributed to this report from Kuwait City.

Ex-C.I.A. Official Says Iraq Data Was Distorted (NYT)

By Scott Shane

The New York Times, February 11, 2006

WASHINGTON, Feb. 10 — A C.I.A. veteran who oversaw intelligence assessments about the Middle East from 2000 to 2005 on Friday accused the Bush administration of ignoring or distorting the prewar evidence on a broad range of issues related to Iraq in its effort to justify the American invasion of 2003.

The views of Paul R. Pillar, who retired in October as national intelligence officer for the Near East and South Asia, echoed previous criticism from Democrats and from some administration officials, including Richard A. Clarke, the former White House counterterrorism adviser, and Paul H. O'Neill, the former treasury secretary.

But Mr. Pillar is the first high-level C.I.A. insider to speak out by name on the use of prewar intelligence. His article for the March-April issue of Foreign Affairs, which charges the administration with the selective use of intelligence about Iraq's unconventional weapons and the chances of postwar chaos in Iraq, was posted Friday on the journal's Web site after it was reported in The Washington Post.

"If the entire body of official intelligence on Iraq had a policy implication, it was to avoid war — or, if war was going to be launched, to prepare for a messy aftermath," Mr. Pillar wrote. "What is most remarkable about prewar U.S. intelligence on Iraq is not that it got things wrong and thereby misled policymakers; it is that it played so small a role in one of the most important U.S. policy decisions in decades."

In an interview on Friday, Mr. Pillar said he recognized that his views would become part of the highly partisan, three-year-old battle over the administration's reasons for going to war. But he said his goal in speaking publicly was to help repair what he called a "broken" relationship between the intelligence produced by the nation's spies and the way it is used by its leaders.

"There is ground to be replowed on Iraq," said Mr. Pillar, now a professor at Georgetown University. "But what is more important is to look at the whole intelligence-policy relationship and get a discussion and debate going to make sure what happened on Iraq doesn't happen again."

President Bush and his aides have denied that the Iraq intelligence was politicized. Stephen J. Hadley, the national security adviser, said in November, "Our statements about the threat posed by Saddam Hussein were based on the aggregation of intelligence from a number of sources, and represented the collective view of the intelligence community. Those judgments were shared by Republicans and Democrats alike."

Reports by the Senate Intelligence Committee and the presidential commission on weapons intelligence headed by Laurence H. Silberman, a senior federal judge, and Charles S. Robb, the former Virginia governor and senator, found that C.I.A. analysts had not been pressed to change their views. A second phase of the Senate committee review, on how administration officials used intelligence, has not been completed.

Mr. Pillar alleged that the earlier studies had considered only "the crudest attempts at politicization" and that the real pressures were far more subtle. "Intelligence was misused publicly to justify decisions that had already been made," chiefly to topple Mr. Hussein in order to "shake up the sclerotic power structures of the Middle East," he wrote.

According to Mr. Pillar's account, the administration shaped the answers it got in part by repeatedly asking the same questions, about the threat posed by Iraqi weapons and about ties between Mr. Hussein and Al Qaeda. When intelligence analysts resisted, he wrote, some of the administration's allies accused Mr. Pillar and others of "trying to sabotage the president's policies."

In light of such accusations, he wrote, analysts began to "sugarcoat" their conclusions.

Mr. Pillar called for a formal declaration by Congress and the White House that intelligence should be clearly separated from policy. He proposed the creation of an independent office, modeled on the Government Accountability Office and the Congressional Budget Office, to assess the use of intelligence at the request of members of Congress.

Mr. Pillar suggested that the root of the problem might be that top intelligence officials serve at the pleasure of the president.

A C.I.A. spokeswoman, Jennifer Millerwise Dyck, said the agency had no comment.

DOJ_NMG_0014569

Danielle Pletka, vice president for foreign and defense policy studies at the conservative American Enterprise Institute, said that the C.I.A. had long resisted intervention in Iraq, and that internal pressure on analysts to resist war was greater than any external pressure.

"If the C.I.A. had spent less time leaking its opinions, throughout the 1990's, opposed to any conflict with Iraq, and more time developing assets inside Iraq, the agency would have more credibility and better intelligence," said Ms. Pletka, who served for a decade, until 2002, as a Republican staff member on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

Misuse Of Prewar Data Is Alleged (BSUN)

By Cam Simpson

The Baltimore Sun, February 11, 2006

Ex-CIA official criticizes White House actions

WASHINGTON -- The former CIA official assigned to manage the U.S. government's secret intelligence assessments on Iraq says the Bush administration chose war first and then misleadingly used raw data to assemble a public case for its decision to invade.

Paul Pillar, the CIA's national intelligence officer for the Middle East and South Asia from 2000 to 2005, said the Bush administration also played on the nation's fears after the 2001 terrorist attacks, falsely linking al-Qaida to Saddam Hussein's government even though intelligence agencies had not produced any analysis supporting "the notion of an alliance" between the two.

Instead, Pillar writes in the next issue of the journal Foreign Affairs, connections were drawn between the terrorists and Iraq because "the administration wanted to hitch the Iraq expedition to the 'war on terror' and the threat the American public feared most, thereby capitalizing on the country's militant post-9/11 mood."

The specific critiques in Pillar's 4,500-word essay, "Intelligence, Policy and the War in Iraq," are not new. But it apparently is the first time such criticism has been publicly leveled by such a high-ranking intelligence official directly involved behind the scenes before, during or after the invasion of Iraq nearly three years ago.

Because of his position, Pillar would have had access to, and probably intimate knowledge of, nearly every piece of Iraq-related intelligence maintained by all federal agencies.

Pillar also writes in his essay that the administration went to war without considering any strategic-level intelligence assessments "on any aspect of Iraq" and that the intelligence community foreshadowed many post-Hussein woes, though the findings were largely ignored before the March 2003 invasion.

Excerpts from Pillar's article were first reported by The Washington Post yesterday. Foreign Affairs released a copy of the essay later in the day.

Pillar, a career intelligence official, retired from the CIA last year and is a visiting professor at Georgetown University in Washington.

The White House did not respond specifically to Pillar's charges yesterday, but Frederick Jones, a spokesman for the National Security Council, pointed to previous administration statements defending its use of intelligence.

The administration first went on the offensive in the fall in an effort to thwart what President Bush, in a Veterans Day speech, called a "deeply irresponsible" effort "to rewrite the history of how that war began."

Jones said yesterday that the administration's prewar statements "about the threat posed by Saddam Hussein were based on the aggregation of intelligence from a number of sources and represented the collective view of the intelligence community."

But in his essay, the man responsible for coordinating the intelligence community's collective view of Iraq challenged the notion that the prevailing wisdom within the nation's spy services supported the decision to invade.

"If the entire body of official intelligence analysis on Iraq had a policy implication, it was to avoid war," Pillar wrote.

He also wrote that the Bush administration "used intelligence not to inform decision-making but to justify a decision already made," the decision to oust Hussein's government.

In making its case, the administration aggressively promoted pieces of "intelligence to win public support for its decision to go to war," Pillar wrote.

He also wrote that "this meant selectively adducing data - 'cherry-picking' - rather than using the intelligence community's own analytic judgments."

Although he acknowledged that the intelligence community was wrong about Iraq's capabilities to produce weapons of mass destruction, Pillar wrote that intelligence "was not what led to the war."

He saved some of his sharpest criticisms for the administration's repeated public statements in 2002 and 2003 about "links" between Iraq and al-Qaida, statements that have been repeated even though an independent commission that investigated the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks found no collaborative relationship between the two.

Pillar's allegations about the public use of selective intelligence on Iraq follows news that I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby Jr., Vice President Dick Cheney's former chief of staff, told a grand jury that he was authorized by his bosses to leak classified information about Iraq in the summer of 2003 to defend the administration's case for war.

Cam Simpson writes for the Chicago Tribune.

Ex-CIA Official Criticizes Use Of Intel (AP)

By Elisabeth Goodridge

AP, February 11, 2006

The Bush administration deliberately misused or ignored intelligence analysis in the buildup of the 2003 invasion into Iraq, according to a former top intelligence official.

Paul R. Pillar, who served as the National Intelligence Officer for Near East and South Asia from 2000 to 2005, also accused the administration of ignoring reports that Iraq would likely endure a violent transition period.

The administration "went to war without requesting — and evidently without being influenced by — any strategic-level intelligence assessments on any aspect of Iraq," Pillar wrote in an upcoming article of Foreign Affairs.

The White House did not immediately return a call for comment Friday.

Pillar said the administration drove intelligence officials to discover information that would help them meet their policy objectives.

"The Bush administration deviated from the professional standard not only in using policy to drive intelligence, but also in aggressively using intelligence to win public support for its decision to go to war," Pillar wrote. "This meant selectively adducing data -- 'cherry-picking' -- rather than using the intelligence community's own analytic judgments."

He also wrote that the intelligence community assessed that in Iraq, "war and occupation would boost political Islam and increase sympathy for terrorists' objectives."

House Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., called for an investigation Friday.

"Evidence that the Bush White House manipulated and selectively declassified intelligence to wage a public relations campaign before, during and after the invasion of Iraq grows every day," he said.

Pillar served in the intelligence community for more than 20 years. He is now a professor at Georgetown University.

Book Casts Doubt On Case For War (LAT)

By John Daniszewski

The Los Angeles Times, February 11, 2006

Believing the evidence fell short, Bush discussed with Blair the possibility of inciting a conflict with Iraq, British author says.

LONDON — It was the end of January 2003. Secretary of State Colin L. Powell was five days away from giving a critical speech at the U.N. Security Council, laying out the case that Iraq was hiding weapons of mass destruction and posed a danger to world peace.

But huddled with aides at the White House, President Bush and British Prime Minister Tony Blair were not sure there was enough evidence to convince the Security Council. Without the council's explicit authorization, their plans for an invasion to depose Saddam Hussein could be difficult to defend under international law.

Bush proposed an alternative: paint a U.S. spy plane in United Nations colors and see if that didn't tempt Hussein's forces to shoot at it. In any case, he said, the war was "penciled in" for March 10 and the United States would go ahead with or without a second U.N. resolution.

Blair replied that he was "solidly with" the president.

That is the gist of an account of the Jan. 31, 2003, meeting contained in the new edition of "Lawless World," a book by British author Philippe Sands. He has not identified the writer of the memorandum on which the account is based, but British media reports say it was one of the aides in attendance: Sir David Manning, then security advisor to Blair and now the British ambassador in Washington.

A spokesman for Blair on Friday refused to address the allegations but repeated Downing Street's insistence that there was no decision to commit British forces to war in Iraq until after it was authorized by Parliament on March 18, two days before the invasion was launched.

A spokesman for Manning said the ambassador would not comment.

Sands, 45, is a professor of international law and a founding member of the Matrix law office in London, where Cherie Blair, the prime minister's wife, also works. His book, initially published last year, is not primarily about the decision to go to war in Iraq. Rather, it examines a range of issues in which, he argues, the Bush administration, with Britain's complicity, has undermined the "rules-based" international system built largely by the United States and Britain after World War II.

DOJ_NMG_0014571

Sands said there was no doubt about the authenticity of the documents he quotes.

"They have not been denied, and they cannot be denied," he told the Los Angeles Times this week. Britain's Channel 4 News said it had seen the document outside Britain. The channel's Jon Snow presented excerpts in a broadcast last weekend.

The text, in Sands' view, shows that U.S. and British leaders had determined six weeks before the invasion to launch a war to disarm Hussein, even without explicit U.N. approval.

According to the secret notes of the meeting, as paraphrased in Sands' book and then quoted directly by Channel 4, Bush told Blair that "the U.S. was thinking of flying U2 reconnaissance aircraft with fighter cover over Iraq, painted in U.N. colors. If Saddam fires on them, he would be in breach" of U.N. resolutions.

Bush also was quoted as saying an Iraqi defector might make a public presentation about weapons of mass destruction in Iraq and that there was a small possibility the Iraqi leader would be assassinated.

The accounts say Bush promised to put the full weight of the United States behind getting another U.N. resolution, but if that failed, military action would follow anyway. He is also quoted as saying he believed that internecine warfare in Iraq was unlikely.

Blair is quoted as saying that a second Security Council resolution was desirable to "provide an insurance policy against the unexpected, and international cover — including with the Arabs." But he is also quoted as saying he was behind Bush.

"The documents … indicate very clearly that neither man considered that the British or American governments had enough evidence," Sands said. "Why would the U.S. president and the British prime minister spend any time concocting ways of provoking a material breach if they knew they could prove Saddam had weapons of mass destruction?"

Sands contends that U.S. and British actions have eroded pillars of international relations such as the U.N. Charter, the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the Geneva Convention, and that has made international action in Iraq more difficult.

"By ripping up the rule book, they undermined their ability to forge a consensus," he said.

Sands saw a "setting aside of the classical rules of international law, which basically say you can only use force in two circumstances: in self-defense or where the Security Council has authorized the use of force…. They never argued self-defense," he said. "So they argued that the Security Council had agreed to the use of force. I don't think there are many people who accept that argument."

Ian Gleeson, a spokesman for the British government, said the country had waited until March 18 to commit its forces and earlier pursued "all other avenues" to compel Hussein to disarm.

"Obviously, all these matters have been thoroughly investigated during the various inquiries we've had here, so we've got nothing further to add, and I am certainly not commenting directly on the book," Gleeson said.

When asked about the allegations in Washington last week, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said: "Look, this is ground that has been plowed over and over and over again. The president and others couldn't have been more clear where we stood at that point in time with respect to seeking a diplomatic solution versus a military alternative."

Sands disagreed with the assertion that Blair's conduct had already been investigated, adding that the documents now coming out could form the basis of an impeachment motion against the British prime minister.

"He misled Parliament as to the state of his knowledge [about Hussein's weapons], and he misled Parliament as to the extent to which he had or had not committed to the U.S. president the United Kingdom's support, and that requires, at the very least, a full and thorough inquiry."

Ex-ambassador Says U.S. May Spend Decades In Iraq (COPLEY)

By PAUL E. KOSTYU, Copley Columbus bureau CHIEF

Copley News Service, February 11, 2006

COLUMBUS - Iraq is building into a civil war and the United States is at risk of being sucked into a battle lasting decades, said former U.S. Ambassador to Iraq Joseph Wilson.

Wilson, whose wife, Valerie Plame, was outed as a CIA operative allegedly by members of the Bush administration, said the United States has lost its political capital throughout the world.

“We’re in a period of instability,” he said. “9/11 was a terrible insult to us. It was an assault on everything we stand for, and it was an assault on what most of the world stands for.”

He said when the U.S. went into Afghanistan, “we had the world with us. We were still the city on the hill whether they agreed or disagreed with our policies.”

Now, the political dynamics of the Middle East have changed. “It was not a political change we anticipated when we got into this,” he said.

Consequently, the Iraq war has to be solved with the help of “a concert of nations” at the political table, not on the battlefield.

DOJ_NMG_0014572

He said the nations should include Saudi Arabia, Jordan, Iran, Egypt, Kurds, Israel and Syria and their patrons, otherwise the battlefield becomes the solution.

"You cannot do it from Baghdad," he told a gathering of newspaper executives Friday at the annual convention of the Ohio Newspaper Association. "You have to do it from outside."

In the meantime, Wilson said, the focus of the U.S. military in Iraq has to change. He said it has to move away from "unnecessarily killing Arabs" because the more the U.S. military sides with one faction in Iraq, the more it becomes viewed as a mercenary force.

Instead, he said, the military should focus on things other than direct combat, including, for example, training an Iraqi national army, logistical support, intelligence gathering, policing streets, infrastructure needs and defending itself.

Wilson said when President Bush says the war is not about oil, Israel or the manipulation of intelligence data, then "it must be one of those. We were sold on the threat to national security."

He said some people fear the world is seeing the beginning of a war that could last 30 to 100 years.

"War is so unpredictable and so long lasting," said Wilson, who was appointed ambassador by President George H.W. Bush.

He said the recent uproar in Muslim communities worldwide over the publishing in Europe of political cartoons about the Prophet Mohammed "is a symptom of an underlying emotion that we are involved in a modern-day crusade."

Wilson called columnist Bob Novak, who initially identified Plame as a CIA operative in a column, "a pawn in someone else's game. He's doing someone else's bidding." Novak spoke at last year's convention.

Wilson accused the Bush administration of using "lies, distortion and character assassination" to discredit him even after it understood Saddam Hussein did not have weapons of mass destruction.

"This is a debate about what sort of country we have," he said.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Executive Loses Case On Trading (NYT)

By Gretchen Morgenson

The New York Times, February 11, 2006

Another telecom titan has tumbled.

In one of the last of the major conflict-of-interest cases that rocked Wall Street nearly four years ago, a New York State judge has found that the former chief executive of McLeodUSA, a once highflying telecommunications company that has filed for bankruptcy twice since 2002, is liable for improper trading of hot new stock offerings during the technology stock boom.

Eliot Spitzer, the New York attorney general, sued the executive, Clark E. McLeod, and four other high-profile telecommunications executives in 2002, contending that they had steered investment banking business to Salomon Smith Barney in exchange for inflated ratings on their companies' stocks and hot new shares of other companies.

Mr. McLeod netted $9.96 million in profits on 34 stock allocations from 1997 to 2000, the court filings said. Salomon Smith Barney received more than $77 million in underwriting fees from McLeodUSA.

In a decision issued Thursday, Justice Richard B. Lowe III of New York State Supreme Court in Manhattan wrote that Mr. McLeod's acceptance of initial public offering shares from the same brokerage firm that his company used as an investment banker, a practice known as spinning, was "a sophisticated form of bribery."

He also found that because Mr. McLeod did not disclose his hot-stock grants and the profits generated by them, he misled both the investing public and his own company's board.

"We are gratified that New York courts have recognized that undisclosed stock spinning is illegal and deceives the public," Mr. Spitzer said in a statement. "This decision sends a message that executives who put their own interests ahead of their shareholders' will be held accountable."

Mr. McLeod, who lives in Cedar Rapids, Iowa, challenged Mr. Spitzer's assertions that his receipt of undisclosed hot stock offerings was illegal. His lawyer continued that challenge yesterday, calling the case against Mr. McLeod another example of overreaching by Mr. Spitzer.

"Clark McLeod is not Bernie Ebbers or anybody else of that ilk," said Harold K. Gordon, a partner at Jones Day in New York. "There is no evidence that there was any connection between Mr. McLeod's receipt of these I.P.O. shares and Salomon Smith Barney acting as the company's investment banker."

Stating that Justice Lowe erred in his decision, Mr. Gordon said Mr. McLeod would probably appeal.

DOJ_NMG_0014573

The civil case against Mr. McLeod recalls the heady days of 1999 and 2000, when telecommunications companies like WorldCom and Qwest were stock market darlings and the men who ran them rock stars. A central figure in the case was Jack B. Grubman, the powerful Salomon Smith Barney telecommunications analyst who recommended McLeod- USA stock repeatedly to the public, even as it plummeted.

Indeed, Mr. Spitzer contended that Mr. McLeod sold 2.2 million shares of his company's stock after Mr. Grubman began recommending it, realizing a profit of almost $100 million from the sales. Mr. Grubman was barred from the securities industry in 2002.

Mr. McLeod appears to have pursued the initial public offering shares aggressively. For example, Mr. McLeod testified that he personally asked for initial offering allocations from chief executives of several companies McLeodUSA did business with and that Salomon Smith Barney was going to offer to the public.

The court must schedule a hearing to set the amount of damages and restitution to be paid by Mr. McLeod.

The other executives sued by Mr. Spitzer for their initial public offering profits were Philip F. Anschutz, former chairman of Qwest Communications; Bernard J. Ebbers, former WorldCom chief executive; Joseph P. Nacchio, former chief executive of Qwest who will be tried this year on insider trading charges in Denver; and Stephen Garofalo, chief executive of Metromedia Fiber Networks.

All four have settled with the attorney general. Mr. Anschutz paid $4.4 million to settle; Mr. Nacchio paid $400,000; and Mr. Garofalo paid $1.5 million. The settlement with Mr. Ebbers, which has not yet been completed, will be a part of his global resolution involving the holders of stock and bonds who lost money when WorldCom collapsed.

Andrew J. Lorin, an assistant New York attorney general and enforcement section chief, argued the case before Justice Lowe. "McLeod reached out to Salomon Smith Barney to get these hot I.P.O. shares, which were like cash, while at the same time McLeod's company was sending tens of millions of dollars in banking business to S.S.B.," he said.

"It's simply wrong that an executive should receive these types of payments from a company vendor and that none of it was disclosed to the board or the shareholders."

Insurance Scandal (WSJ)

By Karen Richardson

The Wall Street Journal, February 11, 2006

Four Ex-Executives To Answer Charges

Three former top executives of Berkshire Hathaway Inc.'s General Re and one former American International Group Inc. executive are scheduled to be arraigned in federal district court in Alexandria, Va., Thursday on charges that they helped insurance giant AIG cook its books.

Absent from those proceedings -- and probably future court dates related to the matter -- will be former AIG Chief Executive Maurice R. "Hank" Greenberg, who was referred to as an "unindicted co-conspirator" by the grand jury that handed up the indictment.

Despite a year's worth of work digging through thousands of pages of documents and listening to hours of recorded conversations, prosecutors didn't find any hard evidence that Mr. Greenberg knew his company might have been committing a crime by entering into a questionable "finite reinsurance" transaction with General Re, according to people familiar with the government's case. Finite-reinsurance products allegedly can be used to burnish a company's financial results.

Some legal experts say it now looks unlikely that Mr. Greenberg will face criminal charges in the scandal that ultimately led to his ouster from the top job at AIG, unless some new evidence emerges against him. In April, Eliot Spitzer, the hard-charging New York attorney general who was also investigating AIG and Mr. Greenberg, told a television interviewer that his office had "powerful evidence" against the then-AIG CEO. But in November, Mr. Spitzer decided not to pursue criminal charges against Mr. Greenberg.

The federal grand jury in Virginia, however, delivered indictments two weeks ago against the three former General Re executives -- Ronald Ferguson, Elizabeth Monrad and Robert Graham -- as well as Christian Milton, AIG's former head of its U.S. reinsurance operations.

Justice Department prosecutors could still pursue Mr. Greenberg if one of those facing indictments were to offer up new evidence against him. But Mr. Milton's lawyer said in an interview two weeks ago that his client will plead not guilty and go to trial.

Last week, AIG's shares rallied after the insurance giant agreed to a $1.64 billion civil settlement with multiple regulators over fraud and other allegations related to the scandal.

Mr. Greenberg isn't expected to abandon his counterattack. The former AIG chief, who took part in the D-Day landing in Normandy, isn't known for backing down from a fight, and friends say he isn't about to back down from this one. An insurance agency owned by his C.V. Starr & Co. has been slapped with a restraining order aimed at preventing it from taking existing business away from AIG, pending arbitration. As a result, Mr. Greenberg may still get his day in court.

DOJ_NMG_0014574

Write to Karen Richardson at karen.richardson@awsj.com5

Ex-Hollinger Official: Give Me My Stuff Back (CHIST)

By ERIC HERMAN, Staff Reporter

Chicago Sun-Times, February 11, 2006

Media mogul Conrad Black, who once controlled the company that owns the Chicago Sun-Times, ripped prosecutors Friday for blocking his access to treasured personal belongings.

Black, 61, faces charges he helped steal $84 million from Hollinger International, the company that owns the Sun-Times. The charges include obstruction of justice for allegedly removing documents from his Toronto office last year. At a court hearing Friday, prosecutors said they wanted to make sure the evidence stayed out of Black's reach. But a lawyer for Black said the material includes items with no relevance to the case, including a picture of Black's father.

After the hearing, Black said the items also include a bust of Marshal Ferdinand Foch -- a French military commander from World War I -- and a sketch of Maurice Duplessis, who served as premier of Quebec from 1936 to 1959. Black is the author of a 1976 biography of Duplessis.

CONRAD'S HERO

Marshal Ferdinand Foch (1851-1929) led the Allied forces in the last months of World War I and is credited by many historians with masterminding the victory over Germany. A career military man, Foch wrote books on war and taught at France's war college. Once war began, he argued for a unified command structure among Britain, Belgium and France -- a view that would be proved right.

In 1918, the Allies' leaders put Foch in charge of the Allied armies. Citing his determination, King Albert I of Belgium said, "that man could make the dead fight."

Foch waged relentless attacks against the German army in the summer of 1918, halting their advances until American troops arrived.

--Eric Herman

"There's a lot of nonsense going on here. This has absolutely no relevance to this case," Black said. "It's irritating. Come on, it would be irritating to you, wouldn't it? If you had pictures of your family, a picture of the guy you wrote a book about that his secretary gave you, that had been a present from his own parliamentary caucus?"

Black's interest in historical figures like Foch dates back to his childhood, when he was fascinated with Napoleon. In 2003 he published a second work of history, the 1,360-page Franklin Delano Roosevelt: Champion of Freedom.

Black has pleaded not guilty, and said Friday he wished he had an earlier trial date. The trial is scheduled to start in March 2007.

"I want to get on with it. . . . I want to expose this case for the complete fraud that it is," Black said.

Prosecutors have not had access to items from Black's Toronto office, either. Under a court order in Canada, they are being held by the accounting firm Ernst & Young.

At Friday's hearing, Judge Amy St. Eve ordered both sides not to remove the material until prosecutors obtained the evidence under an international treaty.

In May 2005, Black and his chauffeur removed 13 boxes of documents from his Toronto office. At the time, Black knew he was under investigation by the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission as well as the Justice Department, prosecutors say. A Canadian court had issued an order barring the documents' destruction. A security camera captured the incident on video.

Black Eager To Proceed With Fraud Trial (FINDLAW/AP)

By Dave Carpenter, Ap Business Writer

AP, February 11, 2006

(AP) - CHICAGO-Former media tycoon Conrad Black said Friday he's eager to get on with his fraud and racketeering trial and reiterated his defiance of the case he has called a massive smear job against him.

Black isn't scheduled to go on trial until March 2007 on charges related to the alleged looting of more than $84 million from Hollinger International Inc. by high-level executives. But he said after making his third required appearance in U.S. District Court that he wishes it could start sooner.

"I want to get on with it," he told reporters after the status hearing. "I want to expose this case for the complete fraud that it is."

DOJ_NMG_0014575

Attorneys for the two sides jockeyed over whether prosecutors followed proper procedure in subpoenaing documents and personal effects of Black and co-defendant John Boultbee, Hollinger's former chief financial officer, from Toronto-based parent firm Hollinger Inc.

Black's attorneys asked to have the subpoena quashed, claiming the request didn't go through Canadian authorities as required under a U.S.-Canada treaty.

Prosecutors withdrew the subpoena, acknowledging they did not fully adhere to the treaty because they wanted to move swiftly out of concern the documents would go missing. Judge Amy St. Eve ordered that no one attempt to remove the documents until the treaty has been complied with.

At issue are 13 boxes of documents that Black is alleged to have taken from Hollinger Inc.'s offices last May in defiance of a Canadian court order that no documents be removed without permission. Black subsequently returned the documents.

Black, Boultbee and two other former Hollinger executives - Peter Atkinson and Mark Kipnis - are charged with using their positions to plunder millions from Chicago-based Hollinger International, which formerly owned newspapers in Canada, London and Jerusalem and now holds Chicago-area papers. All have pleaded not guilty to the criminal charges.

Prosecutors had wanted to go to trial as soon as this fall, but St. Eve set it for March 5, 2007, because of a conflict with a terrorism trial she is due to preside over this fall.

If convicted on all counts, Black faces a maximum sentence of 95 years in prison, $7 million in fines and forfeiture of money that allegedly was obtained fraudulently.

The judge scheduled the next status hearing in the case for April 21.

Mistrial Declared In Second Cendant Fraud Case (FINDLAW/AP)

By Stephen Singer, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 11, 2006

(AP) - HARTFORD, Connecticut-Federal prosecutors are weighing whether to take another shot at former Cendant Corp. Chairman Walter Forbes who again saw fraud charges leveled against him fall apart in another mistrial.

A federal judge declared the mistrial Thursday - the second to date - in the accounting-fraud trial against Forbes, whose company whose company was ensnared in one of the first corporate scandals of the 1990s.

Forbes was accused of participating in a scheme that cost the company and investors more than $3 billion (â‚¬2.5 billion).

The jury in the second trial deliberated in Hartford for 27 days.

Jurors sent a note to U.S. District Judge Alvin W. Thompson Thursday morning saying they were deadlocked, Thompson's clerk said. Thompson, who had encouraged the jury to work through a previous deadlock, discussed the note with the jurors and then discharged them.

Defense attorney Brendan Sullivan had no comment after court Thursday. Federal prosecutors must decide whether to ask for a third trial. They said Thursday they were reviewing their options.

James W. Bergenn, a Hartford attorney and legal analyst on local television, said he would not be surprised if prosecutors sought a third trial.

"They almost never change their view even if they lose to a jury," said Bergenn, who is not involved in the case. "It's very, very, very rare that a prosecutor in my experience says, 'We were wrong.'"

In the most recent trial, prosecutors reduced the number of charges from 16 to four - conspiracy to commit securities fraud, securities fraud and two counts of false reporting to the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission.

Forbes argued that he did not know about the fraud.

Jurors last year convicted Forbes' co-defendant, Cendant Vice Chairman E. Kirk Shelton, of conspiracy, mail fraud, wire fraud, securities fraud and making false statements to the SEC.

Shelton was sentenced to 10 years in prison and ordered to pay $3.27 billion (â‚¬2.73 billion) in restitution to Cendant, including a balloon payment of $15 million (â‚¬12.53 million) and monthly installments of $2,000 (â‚¬1,670) after he is released from prison.

Prosecutors said Shelton inflated revenue by $500 million (â‚¬417 million) at Cendant's predecessor, CUC International, to drive up the stock price. The fraud was reported in 1998, causing Cendant's market value to drop by $14 billion (â‚¬12 billion) in one day.

CUC, which ran a membership-marketing operation, merged with HFS Inc., a travel and real-estate services company, to form Cendant. Its brands include Ramada, Howard Johnson, Avis, Coldwell Banker and Century 21.

The Cendant allegations were among the first in a series of corporate accounting scandals in recent years that sparked outrage among investors. At the time, the $3 billion fraud was the largest case of accounting fraud in the country, prosecutors said.

Forbes was chief executive of CUC and Shelton was president before CUC merged with HFS Inc. to form New York-based Cendant in December 1997.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Cheney Role Risks Political Fallout (WSJ)

By Anne Marie Squeo And John D. McKinnon

The Wall Street Journal, February 11, 2006

CIA-Leak Case May Hand War Critics Momentum, But Legal Issues Are Slim

WASHINGTON -- The disclosure that Vice President Dick Cheney may have authorized his former chief of staff to release classified information to justify the war in Iraq has political consequences for the White House, but the legal fallout may be muted.

Mr. Cheney, in his role as second-in-command of the country, has significant leeway, albeit not as much as the president, to declassify information. The information I. Lewis Libby, the chief of staff, said he was authorized by his superiors to discuss with reporters was the October 2002 National Intelligence Estimate titled "Iraq's Continuing Programs for Weapons of Mass Destruction."

The 90-page report, prepared by the National Intelligence Council for the director of the Central Intelligence Agency, was prepared in advance of the March 2003 invasion of Iraq and became the subject of intense focus in mid-2003, after weapons inspectors failed to find evidence that Saddam Hussein had been building such weapons. Mr. Libby has been indicted on charges of lying and obstruction of justice related to a federal probe into whether administration officials intentionally blew the cover of a CIA official.

"The president can declassify anything," William Banks, a Syracuse University law professor and expert on national-security law, said. While the president would have to amend his own executive order governing secrets in order to declassify something on the fly, that can be accomplished very informally, even orally and in secret. "He could do it on a cocktail napkin," Mr. Banks said.

The vice president's authority to declassify is less clear. Some legal scholars believe that Mr. Cheney would share in the president's authority, as an elected official. Alternatively, the president could delegate his declassification authority to the vice president.

"The classification system is rooted for the most part not in statute but in executive order. ...In the case of the NIE, the White House was free to declassify it at a moment's notice," said Steven Aftergood, director of the project on government secrecy at the Federation of American Scientists, which favors increased public access to government information.

On July 18, 2003, the administration, facing criticism for the intelligence used to justify the war, declassified an eight-page part of the NIE dubbed "key judgments" and conducted a lengthy background briefing with reporters to discuss it.

As such, the trial of Mr. Libby, scheduled to start early next year, is likely to resurrect a sensitive issue for the Bush administration going into November's midterm congressional elections: the rationale for the Iraq war and tactics used to quell criticism.

The implication from the disclosure that Mr. Libby had authority to discuss sensitive intelligence matters with the press "is that the White House -- the vice president -- has been using his declassification authority as a way to advance the administration's political agenda," said Mr. Aftergood. "In other words, information that supports the administration's position on Iraq or whatever is selectively declassified and other information is not. That's not a criminal offense, but it's kind of sleazy."

The investigation into who leaked the identity of CIA agent Valerie Plame to the media continues, though Mr. Libby has been the only one charged. The five-count indictment against him doesn't actually allege he leaked Ms. Plame's name or that he disclosed classified information. Yet both factors are expected to factor into the government's case against him.

Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald disclosed Mr. Libby's authorization to release NIE information in a letter to Mr. Libby's defense team last month. That letter, which recapped discussions between the two sides in the case, was filed with the court as part of a motion to compel Mr. Fitzgerald to turn over information he had refused to provide. A judge is expected to rule on the matter in coming weeks.

Mr. Fitzgerald doesn't say in the court filings that Mr. Libby's superiors gave him permission to disclose Ms. Plame's identity. A 1982 federal law makes it illegal to intentionally blow the cover of a covert agent, potentially endangering the agent's life and those with whom the agent works. A spokesman for Mr. Fitzgerald declined comment.

Mr. Fitzgerald makes clear in his letter that his interest in mentioning the authorization isn't to show some motive or intent. Rather, he notes that Mr. Libby's discussions with reporters, where he is alleged to have discussed Ms. Plame's identity, are "inextricably linked" to the administration's efforts to shore up support for the war, in part by citing the intelligence report.

DOJ_NMG_0014577

Mr. Libby's attorneys have said they don't plan to raise a defense based on authorization by superiors. In recent court filings, they have indicated that they are likely to focus on the demands of Mr. Libby's job and suggest that any inconsistencies between his testimony and other facts are the result of a mistake, not an intent to lie.

Ms. Plame, who has since retired from the CIA, was first named in a newspaper column by Robert Novak on July 14, 2003, that cited two senior administration officials. That article and subsequent ones discussed White House reaction to public criticism of the war a week earlier by Ms. Plame's husband, former ambassador Joseph Wilson. Mr. Wilson had been sent by the CIA to check out claims that Iraq had sought uranium ore, critical to making nuclear weapons, from Niger, and found no evidence to support that.

Write to Anne Marie Squeo at annemarie.squeo@wsj.com1 and John D. McKinnon at john.mckinnon@wsj.com2

Abramoff E-Mail Plays Up Bush Contacts (AP)

By Pete Yost

AP, February 11, 2006

Jack Abramoff had brief conversations with President Bush almost a dozen times and the president knew him well enough to make joking references to Abramoff's family, according to an e-mail the fallen lobbyist sent a magazine editor.

Bush "joked with me about a bunch of things, including details of my kids," Abramoff recalled of his contacts with the president.

The recipient of the e-mail, Washingtonian magazine editor Kim Eisler, confirmed its contents.

Bush's contacts with Abramoff — who has pleaded guilty in a fraud and bribery case and is cooperating with a public corruption investigation — have become an issue because the president has said he doesn't recall ever meeting the lobbyist.

Time magazine and the Washingtonian have reported the existence of about a half-dozen photos showing Abramoff and Bush together.

The president acknowledged having his picture taken with Abramoff but suggested the photos were of no significance because he is photographed with so many people. Bush said there was no reason to publicly release the photographs.

"I frankly don't even remember having my picture taken with the guy," Bush told a news conference on Jan. 26. "I don't know him."

On Thursday, White House press secretary Scott McClellan said that "what the president said still stands."

Abramoff's e-mail states that Bush "has one of the best memories of any politician I have ever met." The e-mail said that Bush's ability to recall is one of his "trademarks, though of course he can't recall that he has a great memory!"

The e-mail adds, "Perhaps he has forgotten everything. Who knows."

On Friday, Eisler said that Abramoff made the comments more than two weeks ago in response to a question from the magazine editor, who wanted to double-check some information before appearing on a television show.

A liberal Web log, ThinkProgress, first disclosed the existence of the Abramoff-Eisler e-mails this week.

Three More Lawmakers Tied To Abramoff (AP)

By Toni Locy And Pete Yost

AP, February 11, 2006

Three members of Congress have been linked to efforts by lobbyist Jack Abramoff and a former General Services Administration official to secure leases of government property for Abramoff's clients, according to court filings by federal prosecutors on Friday.

The filings in U.S. District Court do not allege any wrongdoing by the elected officials but list them in documents portraying David Safavian, a former GSA chief of staff, as an active adviser to Abramoff, giving the lobbyists tips on how to use members of Congress to navigate the agency's bureaucracy.

Abramoff is cooperating with federal investigators in a wide-ranging probe of corruption on Capitol Hill that threatens several powerful members of Congress and their staff members. Last month, he pleaded guilty to federal charges of conspiracy, tax evasion and mail fraud.

Safavian is charged with lying to a GSA ethics officer when he said Abramoff was not seeking business with the agency at the time the lobbyist paid for Safavian and several others to go on a golf outing to Scotland in August 2002.

At the time of the trip, prosecutors said, Abramoff was trying to get GSA approval for leases of the Old Post Office Pavilion in Washington for an Indian tribe to develop and for federal property in Silver Spring, Md., for use by a Jewish school.

Two of the elected officials referred to in Friday's filings have been identified in published reports as Reps. Steven LaTourette, R-Ohio, and Don Young, R-Alaska. According to Roll Call, a Capitol Hill newspaper, the two representatives wrote to the GSA in September 2002, urging the agency to give preferential treatment to groups such as Indian tribes when evaluating development proposals for the Old Post Office.

DOJ_NMG_0014578

LaTourette maintains he did nothing improper by advocating special opportunities for certain small businesses in areas known as HUBzones, or Historically Underutilized Business zones. His spokeswoman, Deborah Setliff, said that the letter was reviewed by Young's chief of staff and counsel and that it did not advocate any particular business over another.

A spokesman for Young did not return telephone calls.

Friday's filings by prosecutors refer to a third member of Congress, Rep. Shelly Moore Capito, R-W.Va. Her name appears in e-mails that suggest she was trying to help Abramoff secure a GSA lease for land in Silver Spring for a religious school.

Capito claims to know nothing about the effort. "The action taken by her former chief of staff was done without her knowledge, approval or consent," said her spokesman, Joel Brubaker. "She was not aware of any contact with GSA of any type on this matter."

Mark Johnson, Capito's former chief of staff, said he did not bring the issue to Capito's attention. He said he was contacted by Neil Volz, a colleague of Abramoff's and a former chief of staff for Rep. Bob Ney, R-Ohio.

Johnson said Volz asked him to check on the status of a project involving the GSA. Johnson said he believes he called a friend at the GSA but doesn't recall the outcome.

Prosecutors included the e-mails in documents filed in response to a request by Safavian's lawyers to dismiss the indictment against him. Safavian's lawyers want a federal judge to throw out the charges on grounds there is no evidence of wrongdoing.

In their filing, prosecutors laid out a series of contacts between Abramoff and Safavian that show the former GSA official gave inside information and advice to the lobbyist.

Safavian used his personal e-mail during business hours to communicate with Abramoff several times, according to prosecutors. He also edited the draft of a letter that was probably sent under LaTourette and Young's names.

And Safavian advised Abramoff to tell his wife to use her maiden name during a meeting with GSA officials so she wouldn't draw attention to her politically connected husband's involvement in the project.

In a July 23, 2002, e-mail to a GSA official, Safavian discussed getting information about the Silver Spring site to Capito's office. But Volz discovered a complication the next day.

Volz told Abramoff that someone at the GSA wanted the congresswoman to put her request in writing. "We can't ask the most vulnerable Republican incumbent member of Congress in the House to put something in writing that can be made public," Volz wrote. "The congresswoman's office has already put the request in and you would think that would be enough!!!"

___

Associated Press writer Mark Sherman contributed to this report.

Lobbyist Confirms Talks With Reids Office (AP)

AP, February 11, 2006

One of Jack Abramoff's ex-colleagues confirmed Friday he contacted Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid's office on behalf of the influential lobbyist but said he doesn't believe Abramoff's billing records accurately reflect the extent of his work.

Ronald Platt, a lobbyist who worked with Abramoff at the Greenberg Traurig firm between 2001 and 2004, said he contacted Reid's office in 2001, as the billing records show, about the timing of minimum wage legislation affecting Abramoff's Northern Mariana Islands client.

"When Abramoff first arrived at Greenberg Traurig, I did a new colleague a favor by simply asking Reid staffers about when the minimum wage legislation affecting the Mariana Islands would be voted upon by the Senate. I communicated this to Abramoff," Platt said in a statement e-mailed to The Associated Press.

AP reported Thursday that lobbying firm billing records obtained under public records law from the Northern Mariana Islands showed Abramoff billed the islands for 21 contacts in 2001 with Reid's office.

The records listed the minimum wage as the issue and Platt as the point of contact for most of those contacts. Platt had formally registered with the Senate in 2001 to lobby for the Marianas as well as some Abramoff tribal clients.

Reid's office confirmed this week it had "routine contact" with Platt over the years on lobbying issues such as the Marianas, tribes and other issues but said it could not verify all the contacts listed in the billing records.

In his statement, Platt sought to minimize the extent of his lobbying of Reid's office on behalf of Abramoff, who has pleaded guilty in a fraud and bribery case.

"These contacts were incidental, insofar as I simply bumped into Reid staffers at Democratic Party functions or occurred incidental to discussions regarding my clients, not Abramoff's," Platt said. "Any contacts that I may have had in regards to Abramoff's tribal clients would have been similarly incidental."

DOJ_NMG_0014579

As for the 21 contacts listed in the billing records, Platt noted Abramoff has pleaded guilty to defrauding clients and said the references in the AP story were inaccurate. He was not more specific.

Audits of Abramoff's work for the Marianas during the 1990s, when he worked for the Preston Gates lobbying firm, concluded more than $1 million in expenses could not be substantiated.

However, the 2001 Marianas billing records cited by AP were similarly audited and the island's government raised no concerns. In fact, the island's auditor concluded Greenberg Traurig had provided "more lobbyist services ... in terms of time spent" for less money than had been seen in earlier years.

Platt also said the AP did not attempt to reach him for comment before its story moved Thursday.

AP contacted Platt's new lobbying firm in late December seeking to interview him about the billing records and was referred to Greenberg Traurig.

Platt also did not return two phone messages Friday renewing a request for an interview, sending an e-mail statement instead.

Greenberg Traurig declined to comment. "Consistent with our ethical obligations to clients, our firm continues to cooperate fully with ongoing government investigations," the firm said.

Dem Leader Faces Increasing Scrutiny In Lobbyist Scandal (HCHRON)

By MICHAEL HEDGES

Houston Chronicle, February 11, 2006

Sen. Harry Reid helped lead the effort to portray DeLay as corrupt

WASHINGTON - Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, who has helped lead the effort to paint Rep. Tom DeLay and the Republican Party as corrupt, faced increased criticism Friday about his extensive contacts with the lobbyist who set off the unfolding congressional ethics scandal.

Reid, D-Nev., who last month compared DeLay to a gangster for his connections with high-profile lobbyist Jack Abramoff, received $68,000 for his campaigns and political committees from Abramoff clients and associates.

Around the time of the contributions, Reid wrote letters to the U.S. Interior Department urging action that would benefit an Indian tribe client of Abramoff's. In addition, Reid's staff had extensive contacts with lobbyists working for Abramoff, according to documents and e-mails disclosed by the Associated Press.

The fresh revelations about Reid could undermine the Democrats' efforts to make what they call the GOP's "culture of corruption" a major issue in this year's congressional elections.

"The fact that he is a leader in the Senate and is going to have to be the spokesman for these things, it does make it a little harder and he may have to back off," said John Fortier, a political scholar at the conservative American Enterprise Institute.

Reid stuck to his stance Friday that he has no need to return or donate to charity the $68,000 in legal contributions from Abramoff's Indian gaming clients and lobbying associates of Abramoff.

"That would suggest the tribes themselves have done something wrong," said Jim Manley, a Reid spokesman.

Reid has a long and proud history as a member of the Indian affairs committee, Manley said.

Like DeLay, Reid has denied using his office to benefit Abramoff clients.

DeLay donated to charity $15,000 received directly from Abramoff and his wife, but has not returned money received from Indian clients associated with Abramoff.

On Jan. 13, Reid wrote in an opinion piece in the Houston Chronicle, "Our nation's capital has been overrun by organized crime — Tom DeLay style. The gangsters are the lobbyists, cronies and lawmakers who have banded together and abused their power to serve their own interests."

Michael Connelly, a spokesman for DeLay, said the Texas Republican now feels sorry for Reid: "Hypocrisy comes at a high price, and it looks like the senator's bill has come due."

Republican political groups were swift to label Reid a hypocrite.

"It's time for Senator Reid to stop the charade, cut a $68,000 check, and pronounce his ethics crusade dead in the water," said Brian Nick, spokesman for the National Republican Senate Committee.

Abramoff and associate Michael Scanlon, a former DeLay aide, have pleaded guilty to defrauding the tribes of roughly $66 million and are cooperating in a federal investigation of corruption in Congress.

At least 32 times before 2005, an Abramoff Indian gaming client or associate donated to Reid's campaign or political funds.

In March 2002, Reid urged Interior Secretary. Gale Norton to reject efforts by the Jena band of Choctaw Indians in Louisiana to get a casino license. He wrote a related letter to Norton in April 2003 as Abramoff lobbied for a rival tribe, the Louisiana Coushattas.

An Abramoff lobbying team that worked with Democrats met with top Reid staff members more than 20 times in 2001 on issues critical to Abramoff clients, according to invoices of Abramoff's lobbying firm obtained from government officials. Shortly before and after at least one meeting, Abramoff's law firm and an Abramoff deputy sent checks to Reid's re-election committee.

michael.hedges@chron.com

Abramoff Pressed GSA Contact On Getting Land (WP)

By James V. Grimaldi And Susan Schmidt

The Washington Post, February 11, 2006

Convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff had more extensive discussions than previously disclosed with a top General Services Administration official regarding federal property the lobbyist sought to acquire around the time the two men went on a $130,000 golf trip to Scotland in 2002, according to papers filed by prosecutors in federal court yesterday.

Former GSA chief of staff David H. Safavian is charged with obstructing justice in telling investigators that Abramoff was not seeking business with his agency at the time he went on the golf trip, which was paid for by Abramoff's Indian tribal clients.

In their filing, prosecutors produced e-mails showing that Abramoff engaged in an aggressive campaign to secure for himself and clients the use of GSA-controlled property, including the Old Post Office in downtown Washington. Among his efforts, Abramoff considered trying to get a provision backing the land acquisition added to a bill being managed by House Administration Committee Chairman Robert W. Ney (R-Ohio), who also went with Abramoff on the golf trip, which prosecutors have called "lavish."

In an e-mail sent to a colleague the day after Abramoff and Safavian returned to the United States on a private jet, Abramoff said: "Had good chats with David during the trip. He wants us to push hard on this project [Old Post Office] and he thinks we can get it."

Safavian's attorney, Barbara Van Gelder, said the case should be dismissed because Abramoff had no real business before the government at the time of the trip. Van Gelder said the new e-mails merely show that Abramoff was seeking information from Safavian, a longtime friend and former colleague.

E-mails filed in 85 pages of exhibits yesterday detail an extensive interaction between the two. "It will be up to the jury to decide the strength of the Government's evidence," prosecutors said in arguing against Van Gelder's request that the court throw out the case.

The e-mails show how Abramoff and members of his team were strategizing among themselves and with Safavian about how to acquire or lease part of 600 acres of the Naval Surface Warfare Center-White Oak in Montgomery County. Abramoff wanted the property for a Jewish school he operated. He also wanted to gain use of the Old Post Office for a tribal client. A key strategy involved getting members of Congress, at Safavian's suggestion, to press the GSA on the issue.

At one point, Abramoff asked a member of his lobbying team, Neil G. Volz, if he could get a provision inserted into an election-reform bill to advance the acquisition of the land. The bill was sponsored by Ney, Volz's former boss.

Former Christian Coalition leader Ralph Reed was also on the trip with Abramoff, Ney, and Ney's chief of staff, William Heaton. Ney, who reported to the House that the trip was paid for by a think tank, is under investigation for allegedly promising to add a provision to the same bill for an Indian tribe attempting to reopen a shuttered Texas casino.

"If we were to craft something oblique, any chance of slipping into the election reform bill?" Abramoff asked Volz. "I know we are loading that up, but I thought I'd ask." Volz replied by saying he wanted to call Safavian at home to discuss it.

Ney's spokesman said he would not comment on Abramoff's e-mail "regarding a hypothetical legislative provision" in the bill. "I fail to see how anything involving Jack Abramoff could be given any degree of credibility," Brian J. Walsh said.

An attorney for Volz did not return a call.

Safavian's lawyer said that she does not think Abramoff even met with Safavian on the day the e-mails were exchanged, as Abramoff asserted in his e-mails. Abramoff, she said, was not technically seeking to do business with GSA. "What Jack Abramoff was doing was getting information to seek to do business," she said.

The total cost of the Scotland trip, which was paid for by funds Abramoff obtained from his Indian tribe lobbying clients, was more than $130,000. Safavian, who had told ethics officers he would reimburse all costs but airfare, gave Abramoff a check for $3,100 to cover his share of expenses associated with the trip, prosecutors said.

Abramoff's Charity Began At Home (LAT)

By Chuck Neubauer And Richard B. Schmitt

The Los Angeles Times, February 11, 2006

The lobbyist admits he used nonprofits to evade taxes, pad his pockets and bribe officials.

DOJ_NMG_0014581

WASHINGTON — In his own way, disgraced super-lobbyist Jack Abramoff engaged in many charitable endeavors over the course of his decade-long career as a Washington insider.

There was the time he laundered money through a religious group's accounts to try to bribe a congressional aide. He diverted funds from a youth athletic foundation to bankroll a golf junket for a congressman and to bolster the bank account of his Washington restaurant. He used two other nonprofits to line his own pockets with millions of dollars defrauded from clients.

Charities are supposed to advance the public interest, which is why they aren't taxed. But Abramoff, by his own admission, used them to evade taxes, enrich himself and bribe public officials, according to a plea agreement he signed with federal prosecutors in January.

"One of the most disturbing elements of this whole sordid story is the blatant misuse of charities in a scheme to peddle political influence," said Mark Everson, the commissioner of the Internal Revenue Service.

Abramoff's use and misuse of nonprofits played a key role in each of the three counts of his indictment: conspiracy, mail fraud and tax evasion. He admitted evading $1.7 million in income taxes over three years, in part by using nonprofits to conceal personal income from the IRS.

The fast-growing ranks of tax-exempt, nonprofit organizations are tailor-made for operators like Abramoff.

The number of tax-exempt groups in the United States has tripled over the last three decades, but nonprofit groups usually pay no tax, so there is little incentive for the IRS to keep an eye on them.

The lack of oversight is especially meaningful in Washington, where trade associations, public-interest groups and grass-roots lobbying organizations all have tax-exempt status under generous IRS rules designed to foster public debate. Members of Congress are also getting into the act and forming their own charities.

Abramoff and a partner, Michael P.S. Scanlon, a onetime aide to former House Majority Leader Tom Delay (R-Texas), admitted bilking Indian tribes out of tens of millions of dollars and attempting to bribe public officials. They used a network of charities and other nonprofits — some existing, some they created — to forge a full-service influence-peddling operation.

They included:

The Capital Athletic Foundation, created by Abramoff as a sports-oriented youth charity. He funded it with millions improperly diverted from his lobbying clients and treated it as his "personal piggy bank," a lawmaker said, spending money on pet projects that had nothing to do with its stated purpose.

The American International Center, a bogus "international think tank" at a beach house near Rehoboth Beach, Del. Abramoff and Scanlon used the center to collect millions from their lobbying clients and then send it to their personal bank accounts.

Toward Tradition, a nonprofit in Mercer Island, Wash., that promotes "traditional Judeo Christian values" and was used to help Abramoff funnel an alleged $50,000 bribe of an aide to Delay.

The National Center for Public Policy Research in Washington, an obscure conservative organization that Abramoff used to defraud an Indian tribe and an offshore gaming alliance of more than $2 million for his and Scanlon's personal enrichment.

Abramoff's story is not just one of clever fraudsters, but of the seeming willingness of some donors and charities to look the other way. They say that they too are victims, although some experts question whether they were diligent enough.

Rabbi Daniel Lapin, the head of Toward Tradition, said he had no reason to be suspicious of a gift from an Abramoff client called eLottery, even though his organization is avowedly anti-gambling. Abramoff, a former board member of the group, was considered a trusted friend.

"Toward Tradition and I interact with thousands of individuals and hundreds of organizations every year," he said in a statement. "It is just unrealistic to suppose that none of these relationships are ever going to become problematic. There was no reason for Toward Tradition to spurn Jack Abramoff's support."

But some experts say that charities ask for trouble when they accept gifts with strings attached.

"The moment the donor appears to have a vested interest in who I hire and how I conduct my business ... I think I have an obligation to look into that," said Diana Aviv, the president and chief executive of Independent Sector, a Washington-based coalition that lobbies on behalf of nonprofit groups.

The story of Abramoff's misuse of charities and nonprofits was pieced together from his plea agreement, nonprofit tax returns, interviews, and emails and other documents released by the Senate Indian Affairs Committee, as well as testimony from the committee's hearings on Abramoff.

The Senate Finance Committee is investigating Abramoff's use of charities and other tax-exempt organizations, and has requested detailed information from the Capital Athletic Foundation and the National Center for Public Policy Research

Abramoff, a Republican activist since college, became a lobbyist when the GOP captured control of Congress in 1994. He was good at his job. Among his early handiwork was helping to preserve tax breaks for the $20-billion-a-year Indian gaming industry, which bankrolls schools, hospitals and tourist attractions for the tribes.

By the new millennium, he was viewed as one of the most powerful and effective lobbyists in Washington. In January 2001, he moved his lobbying business to the new Washington office of the Greenberg Traurig law firm of Miami, which would become the base for an even more aggressive operation.

Abramoff, by then secretly partnering with Scanlon, aggressively recruited new Indian tribes as clients. In addition to paying lobbying fees to Greenberg, Abramoff persuaded the tribes to send millions to Scanlon's consulting firm, Capitol Campaign Strategies, which performed "grass roots and public relations work" for inflated fees.

Through that arrangement, according to their guilty pleas, the men secretly split some $40 million they stole from the tribes between 2001 and 2004.

Less than a year into his new job, Abramoff engineered his first major fraud involving a charity, converting a $1-million check that one of his new tribal clients, the Coushatta Tribe of Louisiana, had written to Greenberg for lobbying services.

He convinced his new partners at Greenberg Traurig that the Coushatta intended the money as a contribution to a charitable organization, the Capital Athletic Foundation. Abramoff had organized the group a few years earlier. The law firm forwarded the money.

But he told Scanlon he wanted the money to first go through Greenberg to pump up its lobbying revenues so it did not drop out of the ranks of the top 10 lobbying firms. The tribe believed that the money was being used for lobbying or political activities on its behalf. Scanlon sent the tribe a fraudulent $1-million invoice on behalf of Greenberg -- misspelling it "Greenburg" — for "public affairs services." Greenberg had not authorized the invoice; the Coushatta had not authorized giving the money to the Capital Athletic Foundation.

Abramoff had thus achieved an unusual twofer: He defrauded the tribe out of its money using the false Greenberg invoice, and then shook the money loose from Greenberg by telling his partners that it was a charitable donation from the Coushatta.

"In my personal view, this payment reveals the extent of Mr. Abramoff's shamelessness," David Sickey, a Coushatta tribal council member, told a Senate panel investigating Abramoff last fall.

Getting money from the Coushatta was "an absolute cake walk," Scanlon emailed Abramoff.

Greenberg Traurig fired Abramoff nearly two years ago after learning of "conduct we found unacceptable," the firm said in a statement. The firm said it is cooperating with investigators.

Abramoff's spokesman had no comment for this story. Scanlon's attorney did not respond to written questions.

The Coushatta check was the first of several large payments that Abramoff and Scanlon diverted from clients, often by laundering the sums through friendly charities. Abramoff used the $1 million as seed money for the athletic foundation, which he had formed in 1999 and was apparently his favorite "charity." It was established with the stated mission of funding sports programs in the Washington area. But tax records show that little money went for that purpose.

Soon after the Coushatta check was received, for example, Abramoff and a business associate discussed in emails depositing the $1 million in a Maryland bank headed by a friendly banker to help "grease" the way for obtaining a favorable bank reference letter for an oil-drilling venture in Israel. They deposited the money in the athletic foundation's account at the bank in November 2001, but it is not clear whether he got his letter or what happened to the oil deal.

In early 2002, the bank account grew when another tribal client — the Mississippi Choctaws — made the first of two $500,000 payments to the athletic foundation. Tribal leaders testified that they had been led to believe it would be "passed through" to other organizations that would support grass-roots projects to educate voters about Indian gaming issues.

Around the time the first $500,000 was received in the foundation's bank account, $200,000 was transferred out of the account to Livsar Enterprises, the holding company that Abramoff had set up to establish Signatures, the high-end restaurant he was getting ready to open the following month in Washington, the Times learned.

An email exchange with his restaurant partner showed that Abramoff had been anxiously awaiting the Choctaw money as they scrambled to get the restaurant opened. The Choctaw money arrived on Jan. 3. His partner wrote that night that a banker "really saved us today" by transferring money from the athletic foundation to the restaurant account. Money was transferred back a few weeks later.

The restaurant became a centerpiece of Abramoff's lobbying operation, where he wined and dined congressmen and their staffs as part of his acknowledged bribery schemes.

The athletic foundation gave Abramoff an aura of respectability around town. He once persuaded Washington Redskins owner Dan Snyder to lend his name to a fundraiser for the foundation, although the benefit never took place.

The athletic foundation also gave Abramoff access to millions for his pet causes, many of which dovetailed with his orthodox Jewish beliefs. The biggest beneficiary was Eshkol Academy, an Orthodox Jewish boys school he founded in Columbia, Md., which at least one of his sons attended. The foundation also sent $100,000 to an Israeli settler who ran a sniper training workshop for militant Jews.

DOJ_NMG_0014583

Abramoff has admitted that he used the foundation to pay the $166,000 cost of a trip to play the storied St. Andrew's golf course in Scotland, which included Rep. Bob Ney (R-Ohio), two top aides and others.

Abramoff admitted in his plea agreement that the trip was part of a bribery scheme intended to offer "things of value" to Ney and his staff in exchange for a series of official acts. Ney, who has denied any wrongdoing, is under federal investigation.

Abramoff also acknowledged that in raising money toward the golf outing, he defrauded two clients that thought they were donating to an athletic foundation. He obtained $25,000 apiece from the Saginaw Chippewa Indian Tribe and SPI Spirits Group, the manufacturer of Stolichnaya vodka. Officials of the Chippewa tribe have said they made the donation because Abramoff told them it would impress DeLay.

There is no indication that DeLay knew his name was being used this way.

"The congressman would never allow his name to be used for nefarious purposes as is the case here," said Delay spokeswoman Shannon Flaherty.

Abramoff told a fellow lobbyist at Greenberg Traurig Tony Rudy, in an email that the athletic foundation was "a foundation doing some issues education." But another lobbyist at the firm, Todd Boulanger, suspected something was awry.

Asked by Rudy to help raise funds from the Chippewa, Boulanger responded in an email, "I'm sensing shadiness."

Rudy, a top aide to DeLay before going to work for Abramoff, figured in an earlier chapter of the lobbyist's saga.

It involved another node in Abramoff's network of nonprofits: Toward Tradition, the Judeo Christian group that supports "a moral public culture," according to its Web site.

In 2000, Abramoff got lobbying clients to give Toward Tradition $50,000 and he set the condition that it be used to hire Rudy's wife, when Rudy was on DeLay's staff. She was hired to organize a Washington political conference the nonprofit was planning.

Abramoff admitted in his plea bargain that the payment was intended to bribe the DeLay aide to help block legislative restrictions on internet gambling and increases in postal rates. The money came from eLottery, an internet lottery firm, and the Magazine Publishers Assn. The proposed internet restrictions were voted down, and the rate increases were slowed.

Both organizations said they didn't know what the money would ultimately be used for. They said the contributions were made at the direction of Abramoff and his lieutenants in the hope of burnishing the clients' images among conservatives in power in Washington.

Rudy did not respond to several requests for comment.

For all the money that was coursing through his operation, Abramoff seemed under constant financial stress because of the drain from his school and restaurant.

Moreover, some of his tribal clients were starting to balk at his stiff fees. But he managed to tide himself over, and nonprofits were once again the vehicle.

One was the National Center for Public Policy Research, a small conservative Washington think tank on whose board Abramoff had sat for years. It was run by his old friend Amy Ridenour.

"I completely trusted Jack," Ridenour told the Senate Indian Affairs Committee investigating Abramoff in June. She told them she now believes he lied to her and defrauded her organization and the tribe.

Abramoff used the group as a money laundromat.

In 2002, he had the Choctaws write a $1-million check to the center, purportedly to educate the public on the benefits of Indian gaming. He convinced Ridenour that the tribe wanted to donate $450,000 to the athletic foundation and pay $500,000 to Capitol Campaign Strategies, Scanlon's consulting firm, for the educational work. The final $50,000 would go to a businessman to run the program.

She later learned the $50,000 paid a personal debt of Abramoff's. She also said she hadn't realized Scanlon was sharing his fees with Abramoff, or that the tribe had not authorized the payment to the foundation.

At a hearing in June, Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) accused Abramoff and Scanlon of profiting by $1 million in this deal and committing what "appears to be a $1-million fraud."

In 2003, Abramoff used the center again to convert $1.25 million from an offshore gambling client to a company called Kaygold, which turned out to be his personal holding company. It operated from his home and had no other employees.

Meanwhile, Scanlon turned to the "global think tank" he had set up in 2001, the American International Center, a nonprofit based near a vacation home he owned on the Delaware shore and which had no discernible assets or expertise. McCain called it a "gigantic scam."

Scanlon and Abramoff had convinced the Coushatta that their profitable central Louisiana casino was endangered by competition from another tribe and the possibility that Texas would legalize casino gambling.

DOJ_NMG_0014584

On April 9, 2003, the Coushattas paid the American International Center $2.3 million for political and grass-roots work. Four days later, Scanlon transferred $1.3 million to his consulting firm and $991,000 to Kaygold. Scanlon spent all but $15,000 of his share for work on his home and other personal expenses.

"Where it went after that, the committee cannot yet say," McCain said at the Indian Affairs Committee hearing in November. "What it can say, however, is that the Coushatta apparently received little of the intended benefits for the vast sums it paid."

Later in 2003, a tiny Alexandria, La., newspaper, the Town Talk, revealed that the Coushattas had paid Scanlon's company $13.7 million for public relations work, a grossly inflated sum. Members of the tribe began to suspect they had been duped.

In early 2004, the Washington Post revealed more details of the fraud, including the fact that four tribal clients had paid a staggering $31 million to Scanlon's company at Abramoff's recommendation, triggering the Senate investigation.

Last month, Abramoff pleaded guilty and agreed to cooperate in a wide-ranging corruption probe of members of Congress and their staffs. He faces nine to 11 years in prison and penalties totaling $26.7 million.

Scanlon, who pleaded guilty in November to conspiring to defraud the Indian tribes and to bribe public officials, also is cooperating with investigators.

Abramoff's charities are dormant. His restaurant business is closed. His Jewish academy has shut down and is being sued by its former teachers for back pay.

Reform Trend May Curb Casino Plans (MJS)

By STEVE SCHULTZE

Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, February 11, 2006

New gaming venues unlikely to open soon, experts say

A reform movement taking hold in Congress on the heels of a lobbying scandal and concern over tribal casino proliferation could hurt the odds for off-reservation casino plans for Kenosha, Beloit and Shullsburg.

Backers of those deals remain committed to pushing for casino approval decisions by the U.S. Bureau of Indian Affairs and say their deals should be exempt from any potential changes in the federal law governing off-reservation casinos.

But congressional concern over disgraced Washington, D.C., lobbyist Jack Abramoff, who has pleaded guilty to bilking millions of dollars from his tribal clients, and efforts to curb new off-reservation casinos create more uncertainty about the Wisconsin deals.

"I don't think the climate is going to support any expanded gaming efforts by tribes," said Bruce Greene, a Boulder, Colo.-based Indian law expert.

Eric Eberhard, a Seattle lawyer with an extensive tribal gaming practice, said approval of any off-reservation casinos is unlikely for the next three years. Such plans have languished under President Bush, he said.

The lobbying scandal only makes things worse for such deals, Eberhard said.

At stake here are three longstanding off-reservation casino proposals by four tribes: the Menominee tribe's $808 million casino development for Kenosha; a joint proposal by the Bad River and St. Croix Chippewa bands for a $200 million casino in Beloit; and the Lac du Flambeau Chippewa tribe's application for a $110 million casino in Shullsburg, in southwestern Wisconsin.

Greene said the Abramoff scandal has heightened concern over tribal casinos, now a $19 billion-a-year industry. The Abramoff case was a lobbying scandal, however, not a casino scandal, said Greene, who doesn't represent any Wisconsin tribes. Abramoff was charged with diverting millions of dollars in fees from tribes in Louisiana and Michigan intent on preserving local casino monopolies.

Greene disagrees with critics who say rules are too loose on new off-reservation casinos. Greene also opposes efforts by U.S. Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) to clamp a moratorium on siting additional gambling parlors away from traditional reservations and impose tougher federal oversight.

McCain, chairman of the Senate Indian Affairs Committee, introduced a measure late last year that would amend the 1988 Indian Gaming Regulatory Act, a groundbreaking measure that spelled out authority for tribal casinos. Rep. Mike Rogers (R-Mich.) introduced a bill last month to impose a two-year moratorium on any new tribal casinos. Another casino reform measure is expected from Rep. Richard Pombo (R-Calif.).

McCain's proposal will likely inhibit federal action on pending casino plans, Greene said, "and it's already a god-awful ridiculously slow process."

In addition to the federal approval, the off-reservation deals also need concurrence by Gov. Jim Doyle, who has not said how he would act.

The Wisconsin off-reservation casino proposals are literally years in the making. The Menominee plan, by far the most ambitious, envisions a destination casino and conference center at the site of the Dairyland Greyhound Park racetrack.

It would be unfair to change the rules for the Menominee casino plan and others that have already been developed, said Evan Zeppos, a spokesman for the Menominee tribe.

The existing rules have worked well, requiring extensive public review and local support, he said. Only three off-reservation casinos nationally have gone through all required approvals since 1988, demonstrating the current law has not permitted a proliferation of off-reservation casinos, he said.

One of those three was the Forest County Potawatomi's Milwaukee casino, the state's most lucrative venue. Tribes in Washington state and Michigan also have won federal and state approvals for off-reservation casinos.

About 10 proposed off-reservation deals utilizing the same federal-state approval process are pending, including the three from Wisconsin, said George Skibine, the Bureau of Indian Affairs official in charge of reviewing the plans. A similar number of casino plans for tribes seeking federal recognition or restoration of tribal status also have been proposed.

Skibine said he didn't think the current political atmosphere changed how his agency looked at formally submitted off-reservation plans. "We just implement the law that's on the books now," Skibine said.

The Menominee tribe opposes the McCain bill unless it's amended to permit plans already submitted to the Bureau of Indian Affairs to proceed.

"Maybe it should be called the 'Jack Abramoff Act,' " Zeppos said of the McCain legislation, because it would accomplish what Abramoff sought for his tribal clients. "It eliminates all the competition for those big, rich tribes."

The Menominee and Potawatomi tribes have clashed over the Kenosha proposal, with the Potawatomi arguing that it would unfairly cut into its business.

The tribes also part company on the need for casino reforms, with the Potawatomi tribe backing at least the stated intent of some of McCain's efforts.

"We like the direction Sen. McCain is heading," said Potawatomi tribal attorney Jeff Crawford. The Potawatomi would like to add requirements to the law of firm historic tribal ties to a proposed casino site, as well as greater scrutiny of casino developers.

Without such safeguards, casino location decisions are purely market-driven, Crawford said. The Potawatomi have criticized the Menominee plan, saying too much money from a Kenosha casino would be diverted to two key backers - non-Indian Kenosha businessman Dennis Troha and the Connecticut-based Mohegan tribe.

Troha and his family members have donated some $240,000 to Doyle or to Democratic soft money accounts that could be used for Doyle. Doyle's campaign also received $20,000 last year from people with ties to the Mohegans.

Joe Hunt, a spokesman for the Beloit casino project, also said it would be unfair for new laws to block that casino plan. The McCain bill "basically takes six years of work and tosses it out the window," he said.

The Bad River and St. Croix bands, both located in northwestern Wisconsin, aren't "reservation shopping" by seeking a casino site in Beloit because that community invited them, Hunt said.

"Neither Bad River nor St. Croix tribe is connected in any way to any Abramoff contribution anywhere - just so you know," Hunt said.

Lac du Flambeau tribal President Vicki Doud said in a statement that McCain's legislation would add additional unneeded obstacles to its Shullsburg plan.

"This continuous onslaught of our rights under Indian Gaming Regulatory Act is turning tribes into victims as opposed to the intended beneficiaries," Doud said.

A longstanding lawsuit by the owners of Dairyland Greyhound Park seeking to roll back casino gambling in Wisconsin also could impinge on the off-reservation casino plans. The suit says that a 1993 state constitutional amendment limiting gambling expansions should have prevented state-tribal agreements allowing casino games.

A decision in the case by the state Supreme Court is expected this year.

Executive Severance Is A Focus At Getty (NYT)

By Randy Kennedy And Carol Vogel

The New York Times, February 11, 2006

Amid a broad state inquiry into the finances of the J. Paul Getty Trust in Los Angeles, the nation's third-largest private foundation, questions are being raised about whether excessive severance packages were paid to two senior executives who resigned recently, former Getty officials with knowledge of the trust's finances said yesterday.

One of the executives, Deborah Gribbon — who left in the fall of 2004 as director of the Getty Museum after disputes with the trust's president, Barry Munitz — was paid $3 million on her resignation, almost nine times her base salary of $350,000, two former Getty officials said. The other executive, Jill Murphy, who served as Mr. Munitz's chief of staff, was paid $250,000 in severance when she agreed to leave late last year.

DOJ_NMG_0014586

Information about the payments came to light a day after Mr. Munitz resigned as the trust's president and chief executive amid questions about his leadership and possible abuse of expenses and perks. The California attorney general's office is conducting a wide-ranging investigation into the trust's finances and into Mr. Munitz's actions.

The severance packages could prove troubling to the Getty because such payments might violate federal tax laws governing spending by nonprofit foundations, which specify that they must use their resources for the public good.

In December, the Council on Foundations, which represents more than 2,000 grant-making foundations and corporations, placed the Getty on probation as questions about its spending became public and the trust did not cooperate fully with an inquiry begun by the council. The council, which can censure or eject members, said it was looking into whether trust officials had used the trust's money for personal benefit; into a land deal between the trust and Eli Broad, a billionaire financier who is a friend of Mr. Munitz's; and into whether there was "inappropriate compensation for the foundation's C.E.O. and potential self-dealing."

The council has the power to look not only into Mr. Munitz's actions as the head of the trust but also into those of its other officials and of its entire board, which now has 14 members.

"Foundations are clearly in an era of public scrutiny because we are growing in size and service, and in public awareness," said Steve Gunderson, the council's president, who would not comment on the inquiry. Of Mr. Munitz's resignation, he said yesterday, "It sends a signal to this sector to take steps to police itself."

The Getty Trust announced on Thursday that Mr. Munitz, who had led the trust, one of the world's richest art organizations, for eight years, agreed to resign without a severance package and had also agreed to pay $250,000 to resolve "any continuing disputes" that the trust's board might have with him.

The board did not explain the nature of any disputes, but trust officials said that some of his expenses, perks and other costs should not have been charged to the trust. Mr. Munitz, one of the most highly paid nonprofit foundation presidents in the country, received an annual salary, benefits and perks worth more than $1 million.

According to former Getty employees, Ms. Murphy was given tremendous power by Mr. Munitz, who traveled frequently and was said to be disengaged from the trust's day-to-day activities for long periods. The former employees complained that she was difficult to deal with and impeded important decisions involving the museum and the trust's other arms: research, grant-making and conservation. Ms. Murphy did not return phone calls yesterday seeking comment.

For the last several months, the Getty has been under siege on several fronts. Its former antiquities curator, Marion True, is on trial in Italy on charges of trafficking in looted antiquities. She resigned last October amid questions about possible improprieties involving a real estate deal.

On Thursday, another former Getty employee with knowledge of the attorney general's inquiry said that investigators were looking into several instances in which Mr. Munitz had authorized grants or uses of the trust's money without obtaining proper approval. In some cases, the former employee said, the money was spent on pet projects of Mr. Munitz's, at least one involving chess, that had very little to do with the Getty's mission.

In interviews, Mr. Munitz has defended his actions and his spending, saying that his job required him to court powerful collectors and donors around the world. He has also stressed that the trust's board had approved all his expenses, including first-class air travel, stays at five-star hotels and a leased Porsche Cayenne.

Ms. Gribbon, who declined to comment when reached by phone yesterday, repeatedly clashed with Mr. Munitz after being named director of the museum in 2000, current and past employees have said. They said she became deeply frustrated that she was unable to make decisions about the museum's direction without Mr. Munitz's approval.

She became so unhappy, some former employees said, that she tried to persuade board members not to renew Mr. Munitz's contract when it was up for renewal in December 2003. But the board stood by Mr. Munitz. Three years remained on his contract when he resigned Thursday.

Getty Foundation Chief Resigns Amid Investigations (WP)

By Sonya Geis

The Washington Post, February 11, 2006

LOS ANGELES, Feb. 10 -- The head of the J. Paul Getty Trust, one of the nation's richest foundations, has abruptly resigned amid news of investigations into his spending of foundation money on international travel and luxury items.

The California attorney general's office, an internal committee organized by the Getty, and the Council on Foundations in Washington have all been investigating Barry Munitz, trust president and chief executive, who resigned on Thursday.

The Getty board of trustees said in a statement that Munitz will not receive a severance package and will pay $250,000 to the foundation "in order to resolve any continuing disputes with him."

Munitz's resignation is the latest in a series of high-profile blows to the $7 billion foundation, the third-largest in the nation, which oversees the gleaming white marble J. Paul Getty Museum in the Brentwood area of Los Angeles. Last year, Getty

DOJ_NMG_0014587

Museum antiquities curator Marion True was indicted in Italy on charges of trafficking in stolen art. She resigned in October after reports surfaced of an improper real estate deal. A number of high-level administrators have also left the Getty Museum in the past three years citing differences with Munitz.

In June, Munitz's spending came under scrutiny when the Los Angeles Times reported that he used Getty money to buy a $72,000 Porsche, fly first-class overseas with his wife, and stay in hotels charging $1,000 a night. He was also accused of seeking an increase in his pay, which was $1.2 million, while instituting budget cuts in the flagship Getty Museum. At the time, he acknowledged spending freely on travel and said the board of trustees had authorized all of his activities. In a letter to the board announcing his resignation, Munitz said: "I'm taking this action, after lengthy consideration, so both the institution and I can move forward."

The state attorney general's office opened an investigation of the trust in August. The Getty hired a prominent Los Angeles lawyer to investigate both Munitz's spending and charges that some of the Italian artworks owned by the Getty Museum are stolen pieces. Both investigations will look at a 2002 real estate deal that Munitz made with billionaire philanthropist Eli Broad.

The Council on Foundations is also conducting an investigation related to the sale of Getty property, Munitz's spending and compensation, and potential self-dealing. In December, the Council placed the Getty on probation over its failure to provide documents in a timely manner.

Edward Goldman, art critic for Los Angeles public radio station KCRW, blamed the accumulation of the Getty's troubles on an institutional culture that lacks transparency. "They are trying to build up a reputation as a scholarly museum," he said. "At same time, when something goes wrong, they act like a corporation. They hide behind barriers."

Munitz has overseen the trust since 1997, when he was hired days before the opening of a hilltop campus for the museum, library and art conservation offices. The museum's old home, the Getty Villa in Malibu, reopened last month, after $275 million in renovations, as a site for Greek and Roman art.

Munitz Steps Down As Head Of Getty Trust (LAT)

By Jason Felch, Ralph Frammolino And Robin Fields, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, February 11, 2006

After criticism for lavish spending, the chief agrees to pay $250,000 and forfeit severance pay and benefits. He admits no wrongdoing.

Barry Munitz abruptly ended his controversial eight-year tenure as head of the J. Paul Getty Trust on Thursday, agreeing to resolve "any continuing disputes" by paying the Getty $250,000 and giving up severance pay and benefits that would have exceeded $1.2 million.

Munitz admitted no wrongdoing, and the trust did not specify the issues underlying his resignation. But the decision came after more than a year of relentless controversy at the Getty, much of which has centered on Munitz's leadership.

The Times reported in June that he had lavishly spent Getty funds on first-class international travel with his wife, approved grants to friends and associates, and lobbied for a raise while he ordered budget cuts and layoffs. The report triggered a continuing investigation by the state attorney general into whether Munitz's actions compromised the Getty's nonprofit status.

The resignation marked a stunning downfall for a man who brought extensive business and academic experience to the world's richest art institution, not to mention a bevy of friendships with Los Angeles' power elite. An advisor to Govs. Pete Wilson and Gray Davis and former head of the California State University system, Munitz counted billionaire Eli Broad and former Paramount Studios chief Sherry Lansing as close friends.

Late in 1997, he moved from Cal State to the trust, which includes the nation's third-richest private foundation, days before the opening of the Getty Center.

His departure came after more than three months of steadily increasing pressure. In late October, the Getty board announced that it had hired Los Angeles attorney Ronald L. Olson to conduct an independent review of the trust's operations. Olson's investigation would examine Munitz's spending as well as charges by Italian authorities that many of the Getty's prized antiquities had been looted from that country.

At the time, the Getty board chairman, John Biggs, issued a statement saying Olson's investigation was intended to ensure that "the board and each of its members and employees meets all legal requirements as well as the highest ethical standards."

The board discussed Olson's findings at a meeting this past weekend. Biggs said Thursday that Munitz had suggested resigning a couple of weeks ago but "made a firm decision during the early part of this week."

Since then, Munitz had been negotiating with the board over "a severance arrangement that was satisfactory," Biggs said.

Under the terms of his contract, Munitz would have been entitled to a lump-sum payment equal to two years' worth of salary and benefits if he had resigned because he had been forced to take a pay cut, accept a lesser title or have his job definition changed without his consent.

DOJ_NMG_0014588

But he would have received nothing if he left without reason. In the end, Biggs said, Munitz "voluntarily terminated without cause" and didn't ask for a buyout, "although I'm sure he would have liked to have had it if we offered."

Munitz, 64, did not return calls asking for comment. In the Getty's statement, he is quoted as saying, "I'm taking this action, after lengthy consideration, so both the institution and I can move forward."

Biggs would not comment on whether the departure related to the committee's findings but said the $250,000 payment by Munitz was a "ballpark" figure to cover "disputed items" that are part of the attorney general's review.

In return, Biggs said, the board agreed not to seek any other restitution for expenditures it believed were inappropriate. Munitz admitted no wrongdoing in connection with the payment.

"We're not going to go back and say there was any travel expense that he has to reimburse us for," Biggs said. "He's given us $250,000 and that, as far as we're concerned, takes care of it."

Munitz's departure was welcomed by many former Getty officials, some of whom left the trust over differences with his administration.

"Barry did the right thing. So did the trustees, who have obviously learned a lot," said John Walsh, who directed the Getty Museum from 1983 to 2000. "Now they need a president who cares about what the Getty does and understands its potential."

Walsh's successor, Deborah Gribbon, who in 2004 quit one of the most sought-after museum jobs in the country because of differences with Munitz, declined to comment.

"I'm sad for Barry," said Stephen Rountree, who worked as a high-ranking administrator at the Getty for more than 20 years before leaving in January 2003 to become president and chief executive of the Music Center of Los Angeles County.

Munitz "had many skills in terms of relationships with the board and a lot of creative ideas about wider partnerships between the Getty and institutions in Europe and in this country," Rountree said. But he added, "I think he's wise to have moved on…. We really need the Getty to be functioning without all these distractions."

Vocal Munitz critic Barbara Whitney said, "I cannot begin to imagine how happy and relieved the thousand people who work there are." In August 2004 she left her post as the Getty's associate director for administration and public affairs.

"There has been a lot of damage done, and I have a lot of confidence in people who work in that organization and hope that they'll not be so worn down," she said.

Munitz was controversial from the start. He arrived days before the opening of the Getty Center in 1997 and almost immediately announced major changes, eliminating two of the trust's seven programs and folding a third into the museum.

The shake-up embittered many longtime Getty employees. But many observers said it also focused the Getty on its strengths: the Getty Museum, with its antiquities and collection of pre-modern art; the Getty Research Institute; and the Getty Conservation Institute, widely respected for restoring art worldwide. Munitz also ramped up grant-giving by the Getty Foundation.

The overall thrust, Munitz said, was to "bring the Getty down the hill" by making it more accessible to the average citizen while instilling "a sense of economic reality" in the wealthy art institution.

Yet Munitz's own travel and executive expenses became more extravagant. He used Getty money to buy a $72,000 Porsche Cayenne, repeatedly flew first-class, stayed in $1,000-a-night hotels and had his assistants express-mail umbrellas when he traveled.

Under the tax code, nonprofits must use their resources for the public good. The Internal Revenue Service considers excessive pay, travel and perks to be "self-dealing": the illegal use of tax-exempt resources for private benefit.

While the line blurred between professional and personal expenses, Munitz also spent long stretches away from the Getty. In his absence, he delegated much of the day-to-day management to his chief of staff, Jill Murphy, a former waitress whom Munitz met at a Sacramento restaurant.

She became the focus of bitterness and frustration among Getty veterans, who resented her no-nonsense style, youth and lack of an arts background.

Staff discontent boiled over in October 2004, when Gribbon quit over her differences with Munitz.

After The Times wrote about Munitz's free-spending ways, Sen. Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa), chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, denounced the Getty board for "spending more time watching old episodes of 'Lifestyles of the Rich and Famous' than doing its job of protecting Getty's assets for charitable purposes."

The board has appointed Deborah Marrow, director of the Getty Foundation, to serve as interim president while it searches for a replacement for Munitz.

Times staff writers Christopher Reynolds and Mike Boehm contributed to this report.

Another Getty Milestone (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 11, 2006

WHEN BARRY MUNITZ abruptly resigned on Thursday as head of the J. Paul Getty Trust, he said he hoped the breakup would let him and the nation's richest art institution "move forward." He got that half right. The change is critical to the Getty's progress, but Munitz himself was already moving freely and comfortably (if not forward) during his eight years as president and CEO of the Getty — jetting to and fro in the first-class cabin, on the deck of a rented yacht or behind the wheel of his company car, a Porsche SUV. The Getty board vigorously defended Munitz last year, but his lavish pay, perks and expenses drew an investigation by the California attorney general and rebukes from the chairman of the U.S. Senate Finance Committee.

The terms of Munitz's resignation — the third in a series of notable departures, following embattled antiquities head Marion True and board member Barbara Fleischman — suggest that the trustees may be getting serious about rebuilding the institute's reputation. Munitz not only won't collect at least $1.2 million in severance benefits that his contract promised, he'll pay the Getty about $250,000 to cover any lingering disputes. That's not a golden parachute, it's a kick out the door.

But ridding the Getty of Munitz is really just the start for the board. The trustees still must resolve accusations from foreign authorities about looted antiquities. They have to find a president who can restore the institution's integrity and morale while cultivating innovative leadership throughout the Getty, rather than accreting power and weeding out perceived enemies. And they must bring executive pay and perks back into line with the amounts paid by most nonprofit institutions.

The cloud of scandal hasn't dimmed the Getty's popularity. Reservations for the Getty Villa in Malibu, which reopened last month after a nine-year, $275-million renovation, are booked through July.

Instead, its effect has been on the Getty's image and, to some degree, on that of other museums and foundations across the country. Disclosures about Munitz's extravagant perks could have led the public to believe that charitable donations and subsidies are routinely used to pamper executives. That's one of the reasons the board's initial defense of Munitz last year was so troubling; in many ways, more than just the Getty's reputation was at stake. The Washington-based Council on Foundations, an association for philanthropies, placed the Getty on probation late last year in part to show that the institute's practices were atypical.

The trustees' support for Munitz ultimately evaporated in the face of a review by a law firm the board hired in October to address the attorney general's probe, the antiquities disputes and other controversies. The lawyers can help the institution get past those issues, allowing new museum director Michael Brand to focus on collecting and displaying art. It's the board's responsibility, however, to restore the public's faith that the Getty is using its vast resources for the public good.

U.S. Ambassador Hands Over Looted Art (MH)

By Stephen Graham

The Miami Herald, February 11, 2006

BERLIN - The United States returned three paintings stolen at the end of World War II to the mayor of the western German town that owned them.

U.S. Ambassador William Timken handed over the 19th-century works by Heinrich Buerkel to the mayor of Pirmasens at a ceremony Friday in Berlin.

Officials say the three paintings, now valued at $125,000, were among works believed stolen on March 22, 1945, as U.S. forces pushed into Germany. They were recovered after they turned up in an auction in the United States last year.

"I am a strong believer that rightful owners of property should have their property," Timken said at a ceremony at the Amerika Haus U.S. cultural center. "They're your possessions."

Pirmasens Mayor Bernhard Matheis invited Timken to his town for next year's opening of a new building housing Buerkel's work. "It's an extraordinarily big day for Pirmasens," said Matheis. "These are very important paintings for our collection."

He said the works "symbolize and reflect a big part of our history" as well as good contemporary U.S.-German relations.

The museum moved the paintings to a school in 1942 to protect them from Allied bombing. On Sept. 19, 1945, the museum reported that about 50 paintings stored in the school's air-raid shelter had been lost "during the arrival of the American troops" six months earlier.

Timken said the town had been occupied at the end of the war by troops from the U.S. 66th Infantry Reserves and the 71st Infantry Division. However, Robert Wittman, an FBI agent who helped return the works, said it was impossible to say whether U.S. soldiers took the pictures.

According to the FBI, the three paintings were acquired by a New Jersey resident about 20 years after the war, and handed down to his daughter in the late 1980s. In October, the paintings were offered for sale by auctioneer William H. Bunch Auctions & Appraisals of Chadds Ford, Pa. German officials alerted the FBI after museum staff noticed that the paintings were up for sale.

The paintings are "Amalfi Cave," from about 1845; "After the Hunt," about 1830; and "The Horse Roundup," about 1861-63. They all depict outdoor scenes of rural life.

"Once the family found out they were stolen, they felt they had a moral obligation to return them," Wittman said after Friday's ceremony.He said the family, who have asked to remain anonymous, had received no payment for parting with the works.

German authorities gave the family a high-quality reproduction of their favorite, "Amalfi Cave," to replace the original that had hung in the family kitchen, Wittman said.

The issue of looted German art was last in the spotlight in the early 1990s, when two Texan residents were exposed trying to sell medieval treasures apparently looted by their brother, Army Lt. Joe T. Meador.

The works, including the "Samuhel Gospels," a ninth-century manuscript written in gold and a 16th-century prayer book, were returned to the town of Quedlinburg after the Meadors accepted a settlement worth about $2.75 million.

Inmate Charged In Slayings Of 2 Who Identified Him In '81 Robbery (COLDISP)

By Kevin Mayhood, THE COLUMBUS DISPATCH

Columbus Dispatch, February 10, 2006

A Columbus man used a gun to take revenge on two witnesses who helped send him to federal prison, authorities say.

Thomas A. Henderson, 55, now faces two charges and the possibility of the death penalty.

Henderson was indicted in federal court yesterday for the 1996 killing of Robert Earl Bass outside his Pickerington apartment and the 1998 death of Ecolia Washington outside her North Side home.

Both were shot early in the morning in their cars.

"This was just strictly retaliation on his part for the long sentence he served," said Columbus Police Sgt. Jeff Sacksteder, head of the coldcase squad.

Sacksteder said that Columbus police investigator Dennis Graul and FBI Special Agent Tim Creedon had worked on the case since 2003 and had put together the evidence for yesterday's indictment. He wouldn't offer other details.

Henderson is serving 20 years in the Elkton federal prison in Columbiana County. That incarceration is in connection with his guilty plea to 15 drug, money-laundering and firearms charges in 2002.

Authorities say the deaths in the 1990s occurred after Washington and Bass fingered Henderson in a 1981 bank robbery.

That year, Washington drove with Henderson from Columbus to visit Bass, who was in jail in Dade County, Fla. Along the way, they robbed a bank in Macon, Ga.

Henderson returned to Columbus with more than $100,000, according to news reports of the robbery.

Police interviewed both Washington and Bass. Bass tied Henderson to the robbery; Washington, who was charged with helping with the robbery, ended up testifying against him.

Henderson was sentenced to 15 years in prison for it.

While in federal prison in Terre Haute, Ind., he was brought to Columbus on three counts of aggravated murder.

A former cellmate had told authorities that Henderson admitted fatally shooting three Columbus men: Anthony Hawkins, 24, during a dispute at Agler Road and Joyce Avenue in 1978; and Robert Catchings, 49, and Donald Beauford, 40, in Catchings' Richmond Avenue apartment in 1981.

In September 1982, Henderson pleaded guilty to voluntary manslaughter in the death of Hawkins. But Assistant Franklin County Prosecutor Patrick Sheeran dropped the other charges because he had no physical evidence or eyewitnesses.

Henderson was sentenced to seven to 25 years for the death, with the sentence running concurrently to the bank robbery term.

Sheeran, now a Common Pleas judge, wrote the parole authorities in 1982, asking that they keep Henderson in prison for at least 20 years.

"We all consider him extremely dangerous," he said at the time.

Henderson was released in 1995. Authorities say he then targeted the two people who had helped put him in prison.

Bass was 47 when he was found dead in his car outside 1665 Whitney Circle at about 1 a.m. Nov. 4, 1996. He had been shot in the back of the head.

Police had a number of suspects. Bass had provided information to prosecutors in the Lucasville prison riot trials, as well as against Henderson.

An East Side man briefly was charged with Bass's death in 1997 but released after police found evidence that contradicted a witness.

On Nov. 4, 1998, firefighters were called to a burning van across the street from 2148 Avalon Place. Washington's badly burned body was found inside. She'd been shot repeatedly from close range.

Sacksteder said police long suspected that Henderson had killed the pair, but "we just couldn't get the dots connected."

Henderson is charged with two counts of killing a witness and two counts of using a firearm in a crime.

DOJ_NMG_0014591

If convicted, he could be sentenced to life in prison without parole or the death penalty. U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales will decide whether prosecutors will pursue death.

Ex-Chinese Bank Managers, Wives Plead Not Guilty In Las Vegas (FINDLAW/AP)

By Ken Ritter, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 11, 2006

(AP) - LAS VEGAS-Two former Bank of China managers and their wives pleaded not guilty Friday to charges they embezzled $485 million (â,¬405 million) in China and tried to launder the money in Hong Kong, Canada and the United States.

Through interpreters and their lawyers, former bankers Xu Guojun, 47, and Xu Chaofan, 40, and their wives, Yu Ying Yi, 43, and, Kuang Wan Fang, 39, each pleaded not guilty to racketeering conspiracy, money laundering and transporting stolen money, plus visa and passport fraud. If convicted of all charges, each faces a maximum of 70 years in prison and a $1.5 million (â,¬1.25 million) fine.

Citing "new, far more wide-ranging charges" contained in a Jan. 31 superseding indictment, U.S. District Magistrate Judge Lawrence Leavitt canceled a trial scheduled later this month and set a March 27 trial date. But he said that likely will be changed due to the case's complexity.

Defense lawyer Lawrence Litman of Las Vegas, representing Fang, said outside court that the RICO and money laundering conspiracy allegations set the scene for federal prosecutors to have to prove the Chinese defendants committed crimes abroad.

"We're actually going to have a trial here about whether money was stolen in China, because that's the basis for all the charges," Litman said. "If they were convicted in China and then came here with the money, that would be different."

Fang's brother, Kwong Wa Po, 42, who also is named in the 15-count indictment remained a fugitive Friday. If convicted of all charges, he would face 40 years in prison and a $750,000 (â,¬626,566) fine.

The four defendants, in shackles and jail uniforms, said they understood the charges against them, and each pleaded not guilty. They remain jailed following their arrests more than a year ago on a Sept. 21, 2004, indictment alleging they entered the United States using false identities and staged fake marriages with naturalized U.S. citizens.

Defense lawyers Mitchell Posin, representing Xu Chaofan, and Bret Whipple, representing Xu Guojun, have characterized their clients as pawns in a new era of U.S.-Chinese legal cooperation. They say they'll challenge efforts to hold the two men to U.S. banking standards and laws.

"We're also going to be challenging the reliability of any of the information coming out of China," Posin said. "We have rules and regulations. In China, there's always the danger that anything coming out is coming from the government."

Lawyer Travis Shetler, representing Yi, declined immediate comment.

The indictment alleges that Xu Guojun and his wife, Yi, and Xu Chaofan and his wife, Fang, were part of a racketeering and money laundering conspiracy dating to 1998.

They are accused of trying to launder more than $3 million (â,¬2.5 million) in Las Vegas by making deposits at four casinos, which can operate somewhat like banks. The casinos are not accused of wrongdoing.

The case stems from an investigation that led to the conviction of another former bank manager, Yu Zhendong, and his return to China from the United States in 2004 under a promise he wouldn't be executed. China frequently sentences defendants to death for nonviolent offenses.

The Bank of China is one of China's four biggest state-owned commercial banks.

CIVIL LAW:

Investors Win $371.7 Million Over Seizure Of Meritor Savings Bank (AP)

AP, February 11, 2006

PHILADELPHIA - A federal claims court judge on Friday awarded $371.7 million to investors who sued over the 1992 seizure of Meritor Savings Bank, successor to the 176-year-old Philadelphia Saving Fund Society.

U.S. Claims Court Judge Loren A. Smith in Washington also indicated that Meritor investors may deserve an additional $402 million, but he left that question to be resolved upon appeal.

Justice Department spokesman Charles Miller said government officials are still reviewing the decision and had not yet decided on a response.

Gary Hindes, whose New York investment firm is a major Meritor shareholder, said the decision would amount to $6.75 a share.

DOJ_NMG_0014592

"It's not as good a victory as I'd want to have," Hindes said. "But at least we know we have a floor under us."

Investors sued in 1993 after the Federal Deposit Insurance Corp. seized Meritor although the government had promised to relax the bank's capital requirements in 1982 to induce it to rescue a failing bank, Western Savings Fund.

Smith ruled in 2003 that the FDIC had violated the 1982 agreement.

Investors' lawyer Thomas M. Buchanan contended that the bank could have become profitable again if the government, instead of forcing what he called an unwarranted takeover in December 1992, had let it "shrink gradually."

The case is one of a number accusing the government of bad faith in dealings with hard-pressed savings and loans in the 1980s and early 1990s.

The award, if it stands, would be the second-highest to date, but it is sure to be appealed, Buchanan said. A $909 million award in August 2002 to investors of a California bank was reduced on appeal to $381 million in 2004.

The judge indicated that he thought investors' claim to another $402 million had merit but precedents in the case were unclear and it would be "presumptuous" for him to award restitution. He said he would leave the parties to argue the matter in the federal circuit.

Shares of Meritor still trade and closed Friday at $4.45 in over-the-counter trading.

Trial Bar Cleanup (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 11, 2006

It's amazing what a little courage from the bench can do to clean up the justice system. Now that word is out that most silicosis lawsuits are shams, ever more judges are helping to expose the corruption.

The latest is Florida state Judge David Krathen, who in a recent hearing rebuked plaintiffs lawyers for inventing silicosis suits, and declared "mind-boggling" the effect that phony suits were having on the "economic well-being of this country." He vowed to ride herd on the claims in his court, separating the good cases from the fake.

This isn't the way trial lawyers are used to being treated, and credit for this tougher approach goes in part to Texas federal Judge Janis Graham Jack. Judge Krathen made specific reference to the litigation Judge Jack presided over last year, in which she exposed how lawyers, doctors and X-ray screening companies had "manufactured" some 10,000 bogus silicosis suits "for money."

Of the 10,000 suits that Judge Jack sent back to state courts, more than half have already been dismissed -- often at the request of the lawyers who first filed them. Even the wizards of the plaintiffs bar are wary of re-entering court sporting discredited doctors and screening companies, many of which are now the focus of federal and Congressional investigations. Separate silicosis suits have also been dismissed in Ohio.

Those plaintiffs attorneys who continue to roll the dice are having to resort to ever more desperate practices. In the Florida case, lawyers rushed to file most of their claims the day before a new state statute curbing asbestos and silicosis suits took effect. They also filed all 111 in Broward County, which is notoriously friendly to the trial bar -- or at least it was until they met Judge Krathen, a former trial attorney himself.

The judge allowed defense attorneys to present what they'd uncovered so far about those 111 claims. The stunner was that 72% of the plaintiffs had filed both asbestosis and silicosis suits -- despite the medical rarity of having both ailments. Defense lawyers also noted that one of the X-ray screening firms (N&M) singled out in Judge Jack's courtroom also had a role in the Florida suits.

When a trial lawyer defended the practice of driving mobile X-ray vans to do mass screening, Judge Krathen cut him off, noting that N&M "reeks from fraud." He went on to say: "I'm offended, and I've practiced law for 30 years and now on the bench for three years, that lawyers resort to drive-up buses or vans, unmarked, to sit there, and it looks like . . . are involved in bilking our society and our institutions out of money for no valid reason."

The judge has since ordered the trial lawyers to pony up fact sheets about their clients. These questionnaires are arguably the most detailed a judge has ever requested in such a suit, demanding not only exhaustive information about plaintiffs' diagnoses, but specifics about any prior asbestos lawsuits.

Judge Krathen also took aim at the plaintiffs lawyers' scattershot approach to naming defendant companies -- 80 in all -- and demanded that their clients start identifying specific products that supposedly caused them harm. This was after a lawyer representing a construction-related firm called Vulcan Materials told the judge that while his company had been named in 17,000 claims, its products had only been positively identified by plaintiffs in 23. The lawyer estimated it can cost Vulcan up to $17,000 to get dismissed from a case.

The judge summed things up this way: "In the years I've practiced law, the toughest time was getting a good legitimate case bought into by the jury because of all the horrible publicity that comes out from the negative kind of stuff that goes on in [the Jack suit]. . . I'm concerned about the good clients, the good cases, and I'm concerned about the economic well-being of our economy and our companies that support jobs here in the U.S. . . I want this information [about patients and products] up front."

DOJ_NMG_0014593

That's the sort of fair-minded approach that has unfortunately been missing from judges in the many years that the asbestos and silicosis blobs have been destroying honest companies and clogging courtrooms. It's good to see a few more judges standing up to the trial bar's transparent corruption.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Dad Slams Attack On Bush At King Rite (CBS)

CBS, February 11, 2006

(CBS) Former President George H.W. Bush has expressed dismay and anger at attacks on his son, President Bush, at the funeral for Coretta Scott King.

"In terms of the political shots at the president who was sitting there with his wife, I didn't like it and I thought it was kind of ugly frankly," the former president said in an exclusive radio interview with CBS News White House correspondent Peter Maer.

"Anybody that shoots at the president of the United States at a funeral, I just didn't appreciate that," Mr. Bush added. Listen to former President George H.W. BushFormer President Carter and the Rev. Joseph Lowery criticized the president during remarks they made at the King funeral in Atlanta.

The Rev. Lowery, who co-founded the Southern Christian Leadership Conference with Martin Luther King Jr., drew a roaring standing ovation when he said: "For war, billions more, but no more for the poor" - a takeoff on a line from a Stevie Wonder song. The comment drew head shakes from Mr. Bush and his father as theysat behind the pulpit.

Former President Carter brought up the government response to Katrina, saying, "We only have to recall the color of the faces of those in Louisiana, Alabama and Mississippi" to know that inequality exists. He also noted that the Kings once were "victims of secret government wiretapping" - echoing Mr. Bush's domestic spying program.

Former President Bush also had praise for his friend, Bill Clinton: "I thought President Clinton was maybe the best. It was his crowd. They talk about Bill Clinton being 'the first black president,' well when you walk into that church with 12,000 or whatever it was, I mean it was very clear who that crowd loved and respected."

The Associated Press contributed to this report.

Four Presidents And A Funeral (WSJ)

By PEGGY NOONAN

Wall Street Journal, February 11, 2006

A spirited tribute to Mrs. King--and to democracy

Listen, I watched the funeral of Coretta Scott King for six hours Tuesday, from the pre-service commentary to the very last speech, and it was wonderful--spirited and moving, rousing and respectful, pugnacious and loving. The old lions of the great American civil rights movement of the 20th century were there, and standing tall. The old lionesses, too. There was preaching and speechifying and at the end I thought: This is how democracy ought to be, ought to look every day--full of the joy of argument, and marked by the moral certainty that here you can say what you think.

There was nothing prissy, nothing sissy about it. A former president, a softly gray-haired and chronically dyspeptic gentleman who seems to have judged the world to be just barely deserving of his presence, pointedly insulted a sitting president who was, in fact, sitting right behind him. The Clintons unveiled their 2008 campaign. A rhyming preacher, one of the old lions, a man of warmth and stature, freely used the occasion to verbally bop the sitting president on the head.

So what? This was the authentic sound of a vibrant democracy doing its thing. It was the exact opposite of the frightened and prissy attitude that if you draw a picture I don't like, I'll have to kill you.

It was: We do free speech here.

That funeral honored us, and the world could learn a lot from watching it. The U.S. government should send all six hours of it throughout the World Wide Web and to every country on earth, because it said more about who we are than any number of decorous U.N. speeches and formal diplomatic declarations.

A moment for a distinction that must be made. Some have compared Mrs. King's funeral to the Paul Wellstone memorial. It was not like the Wellstone memorial, and you'd have to be as dim and false as Al Franken to say it was. The Wellstone memorial was marked not by joy but anger. It was at moments sour, even dark. There was famous booing.

The King funeral was nothing like this. It was gracious, full of applause and cheers and amens. It was loving even when it was political. It had spirit, not rage. That's part of why it was beautiful.

DOJ_NMG_0014594

It was also beautiful because, as the first speaker, Bishop Eddie L. Long, senior pastor of the New Birth Missionary Baptist Church in Lithonia, Ga., said in almost his first words, "This is a worship. This is a celebration. This is a moment that we give to honor God."

It was a religious service in which no one was afraid to talk about God. "Praise the Lord," and "Lord, we lift your name on high" and "How we love to sing your praises" rang through the room. Scripture was quoted, stories told. Blacks in America are not afraid to love Jesus the way they want to love him, to use the language and symbols they want to use. I want to kiss their hands for this. I also happen to honor the fact that, by and large, older blacks at least have not given way to 20th-century stoicism in their style of mourning. The Kennedys, who had too much experience with funerals, set the stoic style 40 years ago, and while it was elegant and moving in its own way, it left an entire nation thinking it was in rather poor taste to cry aloud and sob.

As for the speakers, no one has ever been or could be better than the Rev. Bernice King, who spoke of her mother's love, her mother's end, and the possible metaphorical meaning of the cancer that killed her.

The Rev. Joseph Lowery gave a beautiful poem about Martin being with Rosa in heaven and then finding out that Coretta was coming, and rushing to greet her at the pearly gates. Strike you as corny? Not me. It was beautiful because it was not only full of unselfconscious faith, it assumed unselfconscious faith on the part of the audience, and so was both an implicit compliment and a declaration of shared assumptions. The audience responded with amens and cheers. When he bopped the president over weapons of mass destruction, what seemed, on CNN, to be half the room stood and applauded.

When George Bush 41 followed him to the podium, he teased Mr. Lowery in a way that complimented his eloquence. People sometimes marvel at the grace of George H.W. Bush. He is a warm and gracious man, and he's old enough to appreciate the humor in everything. He's old enough to appreciate life. But it is also true that when you attack him or his son from the left he doesn't get mad because in his heart he kinda thinks you're right. Attack him from the right; you won't be overwhelmed by his bonhomie then.

President Bush was fine, his eloquence of the formal kind. He needs to find the place between High Rhetoric and off-the-cuff plainspeak. He always does one or the other. But there's a place in between, a place that's not fancy and not common, that would serve him well if he could find it.

Bill Clinton was, as always, the master. Say what you will, he is the only politician in America with the confidence to call Episcopalians "the frozen chosen" and know everyone will laugh and take no offense. Amid all the happy bombast he was the one who pointed at the casket and said, "There's a woman in there." He talked about Mrs. King in good strong plain terms. Yes, he caused a quarter-second of awkwardness when he said of the beautiful Coretta that even at age 75 she still had the goods, but in moments of exuberance we all forget our own history.

The real news was how the Clintons used the funeral to unveil how they will run in 2008: Together, side by side, with beautiful hairdos. I haven't seen them like this--both standing at the podium--since 1992, when they were new. In the years since, after the health-care failure and the Whitewater scandals, the West Wing attitude toward the president's wife was a quiet and respectful "Get that woman off the podium!" Not anymore. All is new again. Mrs. Clinton has clearly been working on her public speaking, and attempted to use her hands as her husband uses his, now in an emphasizing arc, now resting on her chest. But his are large, long and elegant, and hers are puffed and grasping.

Both Clintons spoke in the cadence and with the imagery of the Bible. Mrs. Clinton's first words, in which she referred to Mrs. King's brave decision to continue her husband's work after his murder, were steeped in religiosity. "As we are called, each of us must decide whether to answer that call by saying, 'Send me.'" She ended with, "The work of peace never ends. So we bid her earthly presence farewell. We wish her Godspeed on her homecoming. And we ask ourselves, 'Will we say, when the call comes, "Send me"?'"

Oh I think we will, Ms. Meanieface!

If you don't understand that Mrs. Clinton was rehearsing her 2008 announcement speech, then you are a child and must go home and have a nice cup of cocoa.

This is what is coming: I have had a blessed life. And like so many people I could choose, after all these years, a life of comfort. Watch it from the sidelines, tend to my own concerns, watch the garden grow. But our nation calls out. And if we are to be Americans we must meet the call. "Send me."

With Bill nodding beside her, his hands clasped prayerfully in front of him, nodding and working that jaw muscle he works when he wants you to notice, for just a second, how hard it is sometimes for him to contain his admiration.

God I love them.

Apart from its beauty, dignity and fight, Mrs. King's funeral got me thinking about this: Did she know how much she was loved? It's hard for a person to know that. If only she could have gone to her own funeral, she would have known. I wonder if it wouldn't be good if somewhere along the way, just once in your life, you got to call your own funeral. Pick the church, the speakers, the music, sit in the pew, clap when they talk about how wonderful you were. Then afterwards have a long lunch and toast your memory. Then the next day you go to work as usual, but maybe in a different mood. I don't see why we don't do this. Is this a stupid thing to say? It's allowed. I've got free speech.

DOJ_NMG_0014595

Ms. Noonan is a contributing editor of The Wall Street Journal and author of "John Paul the Great: Remembering a Spiritual Father," (Penguin, 2005), which you can order from the OpinionJournal bookstore. Her column appears Thursdays.

Racial Icons (NSWK)

By Eleanor Clift

Newsweek, February 11, 2006

President Bush deserves credit for sitting through the awkward moments at Coretta Scott King's funeral—and for his role in setting up an African-American history museum.

Southerners have a saying, "Bit dog always hollers." That's how Jody Powell, President Carter's former press secretary, responded when asked about criticism, coming mainly from Republicans, that Carter had overstepped the bounds of good taste in his eulogy of Coretta Scott King by mentioning that she and her husband had been illegally wiretapped. Carter did not imply that Republicans were responsible. Indeed it was President Kennedy and his brother Bobby who authorized the FBI's eavesdropping on Martin Luther King Jr.

Yet with Senate hearings going on in Washington on the legality of Bush's domestic-spying program, it was inescapable that people would make the connection to present-day abuses. The FISA law (Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act) was signed into law by Carter, and he is justifiably angry about the way Bush brushes it aside as a troublesome bureaucratic impediment. Whether the funeral of a civil-rights icon was the right place and time to jab Bush is debatable, but it's not surprising given Carter's strong feelings.

Coretta King spoke out against the Iraq war and no doubt would have appreciated the occasional discordant political note in the rosy tributes paid to her. Bush deserves credit for sitting through it all despite the awkward moments and remaining good-natured and even eloquent in his eulogy. That evening he welcomed the Harlem Dance Theater to the White House for a special performance, and among the guests was Lonnie Bunch, the director of the National Museum of African-American History and Culture. "Hey, Bunch!" Bush said, clapping him on the back, a familiarity Bush earned when he signed legislation creating the museum in December '03. It had been a long time coming. Georgia Rep. John Lewis first introduced the legislation in 1988, and every year after that, to no avail. Even President Clinton, who's been called the first black president because of his close ties to the African-American community, couldn't get enough support in Congress for the museum.

Bush's museum action pulled off the seemingly impossible. With his re-election campaign looming and needing help to win more of the black vote, he mustered the votes to build the museum on federal land, and to provide $250 million, half what the proposed structure is expected to cost. Sure, there was political self-interest, but Bush is also personally committed. One of the first checks the Smithsonian got for the new African-American museum came from the president and his wife, Laura. Then the newly re-elected Bush directed a portion of the funds that went unspent by his Inaugural committee to the museum. That amounted to a cool $5 million. The African-American museum is still seven years off, but it's been awarded space on the Mall in Washington off Constitution Avenue between 14th and 15th Streets, an apt location since the 14th and 15th amendments to the Constitution secured civil rights for black Americans after slavery. Bunch promises the museum's exhibits will be "a lens into what it means to be an American," the optimism and resilience that are core values of the black experience along with the Gordian knot of race relations.

Bunch is off to a good start, but raising money is never easy, and there's strong competition from across the river in Virginia. Former governor Doug Wilder, now mayor of Richmond, was in Washington this week unveiling his plans for a National Slavery museum, and he's a lot farther along than anybody dreamed possible. He's got the land (32½ acres on the banks of the Rappahannock River in Fredericksburg, Va.) and he's got an acclaimed architect, Chen Chung Pei, son of the legendary I. M. Pei, whose vision includes the full-scale replica of a slave ship. Wilder is the grandson of slaves but he couldn't get his father to talk about the subject. "He would bite on his pipe so hard it almost snapped in two," Wilder recalls. His own interest was piqued on a visit to Goree Island, a slave transit point in the African nation of Senegal, when he looked out the "door of no return" where slaves would board the ship, and realized he was governor of a state where many of them were taken. He determined then their story had to be told, and what better place than in Virginia, which had more slaves than any other place.

Wilder is gambling that an illuminated sign with a slave ship at the exit off I-95 in Fredericksburg will draw visitors, and he resists the notion that he is competing with Washington. "You can't have too many [museums], and there's enough money to go around," he says, smiling. "Just give us ours." He's counting on what he calls "enlightened self-interest" from corporations who acknowledge past participation in slavery, "not reparations," he adds, "but acknowledgment of doing what is right." Actor Ben Vereen, who played Chicken George in "Roots," accompanied Wilder and put it more bluntly: "Corporate America, we need you now. We bought your cars—we smoked your cigarettes—now it's time to tally up." The U.S. National Slavery Museum is scheduled to open in 2007.

DOJ_NMG_0014596

A Fitting Funeral For Mrs. King (WP)

By Colbert I. King

The Washington Post, February 11, 2006

Speech and expression are coming in for some hard knocks these days. Enraged Muslims are marching by the thousands over cartoons of the prophet Muhammad. The Post's editorial page is being pilloried for publishing an op-ed piece by a leader of the terrorist group Hamas and for publishing a cartoon that critics mistakenly describe as mocking military amputees. And now some conservative talking heads are out of sorts because of what was said from the pulpit of New Birth Missionary Baptist Church in Lithonia, Ga., during Coretta Scott King's funeral on Tuesday.

The fuss over the funeral is probably the silliest snit of all.

First, consider what took place. It wasn't a state funeral scripted by a 138-page detailed planning document, as in the case of Ronald Reagan's services. Neither was it a funeral for a cloistered, apolitical newcomer on the block.

Mrs. King and her late husband, the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr., were renowned proponents of nonviolence and racial and economic justice. They had close ties to peace and social action organizations. Mrs. King was a fixture at antiwar rallies. She was a dignified and reserved public figure, yes; a shrinking violet, no. To recall, she was arrested here in Washington at the South African Embassy in an anti-apartheid protest.

So it should have come as no surprise that during a six-hour funeral for a woman whose life was dedicated to the civil rights and peace movements -- and on a program with more than 35 participants -- a few would have something to say about racism, the futility of war, and military spending when it trumps the needs of the poor. That the outspoken critics happen to have been a preacher, an ex-president and a mayor, and that they did it in the presence of a sitting president, is hardly the outrageous act that conservative pundits have made it out to be.

They profess to be shocked , shocked, that a funeral service would touch on issues that were critical to the life's work of Mrs. King. Their ignorance also may be emblematic of the cultural gulf that separates many blacks and whites when it comes to the way in which we deal with death and its rituals.

There was no way on earth that four presidents, two planeloads of members of Congress and several high priests of black preacherdom could come together in a megachurch before an audience of 10,000, mostly black folks -- including celebrities, wannabes and pretenders to the civil rights throne -- all decked out in their Sunday finest, and not expect to have the event become, well, a tad extravagant rhetorically.

Besides, that's the way it often is at black Baptist home-going services.

At this stage in life, I attend far more funerals than weddings. Raised as a Baptist, I've been doing black funerals since childhood. Done my share of white funerals, too, especially since entering the white-collar world and becoming an Episcopalian or, as Bill Clinton playfully said Tuesday of President Bush the elder (also an Episcopalian), part of the "frozen chosen."

Now I must be careful here with generalizations, but Karla FC Holloway, a Duke University professor and author of African American mourning stories, has noted that white funerals, for the most part, tend to be short and restrained. Black Baptist services, on the other hand, historically have tended to be longer, elaborate, more spontaneous and a time to "get it said." That's what was going on in Atlanta.

How could a civil rights icon such as Coretta Scott King, a child of the Baptist Church, whose husband was shot dead, whose home was bombed, and whose own government attempted to smear her husband and break up her marriage, not have a home-going service that didn't bring out its share of freely and honestly expressed emotions?

These remarks were denounced as "political":

· The Rev. Joseph Lowery said, "We know now there were no weapons of mass destruction over there. . . . But Coretta knew and we knew that there are weapons of misdirection right here. . . . Millions without health insurance. Poverty abounds. For war billions more but no more for the poor. . . . Our marvelous presidents and governors come to mourn and praise . . . but in the morning will words become deeds that meet need?"

· Atlanta Mayor Shirley Franklin described Mrs. King as singing "for liberation, she sang for those who had no earthly reason to sing a song," using a voice heard "from the tin-top roofs of Soweto to the bomb shelters of Baghdad."

· Former president Jimmy Carter, aware of the current debate over domestic spying, said, "It was difficult for [the Kings] personally with the civil liberties of both husband and wife violated, and they became the targets of secret government wiretapping and other surveillance."

They drew strong applause and, in Lowery's case, a standing ovation.

DOJ_NMG_0014597

Barbs because George W. Bush was sitting in the pulpit? Those remarks would have been delivered had the president been down in Crawford, Tex., or up in the White House. And as harsh as they were to conservative ears, they also served a useful purpose. For 10,000 mourners bearing a special kind of pain, those words had a cathartic effect. They became the vehicle through which emotional tensions in the church could surface, the means by which the assembled could give expression to what they were feeling deep down inside. Hence, the laughter, the cheers and loud roars.

George W. Bush -- no passionate orator himself but no political slouch when it comes to reading an audience, black, white or brown -- apparently got it.

Too bad some conservatives on the outside looking in, and caught in their own cramped world, did not.

kingc@washpost.com

Affirmative Blackmail (WSJ)

By David E. Bernstein

The Wall Street Journal, February 11, 2006

According to its mission statement, a primary goal of the American Bar Association is to "promote respect for the law." In the interest of mandating racial preferences in admissions, however, the ABA is about to order law schools to do just the opposite -- in fact, to violate the law -- and is resorting to blackmail to achieve its end.

Meeting in Chicago today, the ABA's Council of the Section on Legal Education and Admissions to the Bar will vote on new "equal opportunity and diversity" standards. If they are approved, any law school that seeks to maintain or acquire ABA accreditation will be required to engage in racial preferences in hiring and admissions, regardless of any federal, state or local laws that prohibit of such policies. Since only graduates of ABA-accredited schools may take the bar exam in the vast majority of states, the association has, in effect, a legal monopoly on accreditation standards.

The new Standard 211, styled "Equal Opportunity and Diversity," would govern admissions and faculty hiring policies. It says nothing about treating people from different groups equally, and lots about "diversity" -- a code word for affirmative action preferences. "Consistent with sound legal education policy and the Standards," part (a) says that a law school must provide "full opportunities for the study of law and entry into the profession by members of underrepresented groups, particularly racial and ethnic minorities," and it must also commit "to having a student body that is diverse with respect to gender, race and ethnicity."

Part (b) says, "Consistent with sound educational policy and the Standards, a law school shall demonstrate by concrete action a commitment to having a faculty and staff that are diverse with respect to gender, race and ethnicity."

This sounds innocuous, since law schools can reasonably differ on what constitutes "sound legal education policy." Some might think that the educational benefits of a racially heterogeneous student body justify significant racial preferences; others might give more weight to data showing significant educational costs resulting from preferences.

An empirical study by Richard Sander of UCLA, for example, confirms anecdotal evidence that student beneficiaries of such preferences tend to struggle in law school and end up at the bottom of their classes. Statistics published in the year 2000 also reveal that under current affirmative action policies, 42% of all African-American matriculants to law school either never graduate or never pass the bar (compared with 14% of whites). Some schools might conclude dooming a huge percentage of African-American students to failure is contrary to sound educational policy, and limit their "diversity" efforts to recruitment and retention.

That will not be possible, according to the "interpretations" of Standard 211, which have "equal weight" to the rules themselves. Interpretation 211-1 states that "the requirements of a constitutional provision or statute that purports to prohibit consideration of gender, race, ethnicity or national origin in admissions or employment decisions is not a justification for a school's non-compliance with Standard 211."

Racial preferences will thus generally be necessary to comply with Standard 211 -- despite the fact that several states, including California and Florida, ban race as a factor in law school admissions or hiring or both. Equally outrageous is Interpretation 211-2, which states that, "consistent with the Supreme Court's decision in Grutter v. Bollinger, a law school may use race and ethnicity in its admissions process to promote equal opportunity and diversity." This is a complete misstatement of the law, and the attorneys who wrote this are either incompetent or, more likely, intentionally dissembling.

First, Grutter held only that racial preferences in higher education are legal when used to promote diversity, not when used to promote equal opportunity. The Supreme Court has consistently disapproved of the use of racial preferences other than for either educational diversity, or to remedy past discrimination, and nothing in Grutter is to the contrary.

Second, Grutter did not hold that any law school may use race in its admissions process to promote racial diversity. Rather, the court stated that it was deferring to the Michigan Law School's "educational judgment that such diversity is essential to its educational mission." Other law schools may not share that educational judgment, particularly if the only way to achieve such diversity is by admitting underqualified minority students. Nothing in Grutter would permit such a law school to engage in racial preferences.

DOJ_NMG_0014598

Ironically, left-wing lawyers and law professors used to scream that the Grutter litigation posed a threat to academic freedom by trying to prohibit law schools from tailoring the racial balance of their student bodies to enhance the students' educational experience. Now they want to use the heavy hand of ABA accreditation to deny academic freedom to law schools that would not choose racial preferences.

It's worth remembering that the fifth vote in Grutter was provided by Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who apparently thought that her opinion would permit, but not require, law schools to use racial preferences for diversity purposes. Now that the ABA is trying to turn "may" into "must," one wonders whether Justice Samuel Alito will be similarly sympathetic to the assertion that allowing racial preferences in admissions enhances academic freedom.

An even greater irony, however, is the ABA's role in all of this. One can be quite certain that despite the plain language of the "interpretations" quoted above, the ABA will claim that it is not really trying to force law school faculties and administrations to violate both the law and their consciences in pursuit of racial "diversity." But in the past, ABA accreditation officials have bullied law schools into precisely that position, even in the absence of written authority backing their demands.

If passed, the new written standards will only embolden the accreditation bureaucracy, composed mainly of far-left law professors, to demand explicit racial preferences and implicit racial quotas -- all in brazen defiance of the law.

Mr. Bernstein, a professor at George Mason University School of Law, is the author of "You Can't Say That!: The Growing Threat to Civil Liberties from Antidiscrimination Law" (Cato, 2003).

ANTITRUST:

Senate Confirms Barnett As Assistant Attorney General (DOWJONES)

Dow Jones, February 11, 2006

WASHINGTON -(Dow Jones)- The Senate on Friday confirmed Thomas O. Barnett as assistant attorney general for the Justice Department's antitrust division.

Barnett was confirmed by unanimous consent. He has held the job on an acting basis.

- By Siobhan Hughes, Dow Jones Newswires; 202-862-6654; Siobhan.Hughes@ dowjones.com

Microsoft Gets EU Scrutiny (BLOOM)

By MATTHEW NEWMAN, BLOOMBERG NEWS

Bloomberg, February 11, 2006

Complaints about upcoming Vista gathered by regulators

European regulators are reviewing complaints against Microsoft Corp. from computer makers concerned that the next version of the Windows operating system may prevent manufacturers from customizing the software.

The European Commission, the European Union's antitrust authority in Brussels, Belgium, is "monitoring" complaints about the software, called Vista, and hasn't started a formal inquiry, commission spokesman Jonathan Todd said in an e-mail.

"Approaches are being made about Vista by U.S. and non-U.S. companies," Philip Lowe, the top civil servant in the commission's competition department, said in an interview Friday in London, where he was attending a conference.

Microsoft, which is under regulatory scrutiny around the world, plans to start selling Vista later this year. The first new version of Windows for personal computers since 2001 also is attracting complaints in the United States, according to Justice Department court documents filed in Washington this week. The United States and the EU didn't identify the companies that complained.

Todd said the manufacturers have expressed "concerns" and haven't filed formal complaints. The commission can start new investigations on its own initiative and doesn't require competitors' complaints to do so.

Microsoft spokesman Tom Brookes declined to comment. Microsoft general counsel Brad Smith said Thursday that he's confident Vista doesn't infringe on a U.S. antitrust settlement agreement.

PC makers are looking to customize the first screen users see when turning on their computer, and may be concerned that Microsoft's Vista won't permit such changes, Nicholas Economides, an economics professor at New York University, said in an interview.

Regulators Approve Regis Acquisition (MINBIZ)

By John Vomhof Jr.

DOJ_NMG_0014599

Minneapolis Business Journal, February 11, 2006

Regis Corp.'s $2.6 billion purchase of Alberto-Culver Co.'s Sally Beauty Co. retail chain received federal antitrust approval on Friday.

The Federal Trade Commission said officials completed their investigation of the deal without taking any action to block it.

Last month, Edina-based Regis agreed to buy Denton-based Sally Beauty chain for $2.2 billion in stock and $400 million in debt. The combined company will retain the name Regis Corp., with Sally Beauty becoming a subsidiary of Regis.

The deal will greatly expand Regis' presence in the retail sector. Sally Beauty, founded in 1964, has more than 2,400 Sally Beauty retail stores and 800 Beauty Systems group outlets; the company generated revenue of $2.25 billion in the year ending in September 2005.

Regis (NYSE: RGS) owns or franchises more than 11,000 salons, 90 hair restoration centers and 35 beauty schools worldwide.

The Minneapolis/St. Paul Business Journal is an affiliated publication of the Dallas Business Journal.

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

EPA Budget Cuts Trouble Environment Groups (AP)

By John Heilprin

AP, February 11, 2006

Grants to state and local governments for land and water conservation would be cut 40 percent, and money for the Environmental Protection Agency's network of libraries for scientists would be slashed severely under President Bush's proposed budget.

By contrast, Bush next year would spend $322 million for "cooperative conservation" — up from $312 million the Congress approved last year — to encourage more private landowners to protect endangered species, conserve wildlife habitats and do other nature work traditionally done by government.

Other proposed increases are $50 million more for cleaner-burning diesel engines and $5 million more for drinking water improvements.

Cuts and proposals to sell some of the government's vast land holdings have upset environmentalists.

Early in his presidency, Bush called for restoring the federal Land and Water Conservation Fund to the full $900 million authorized by Congress. Last year, it was approved at $142 million. For 2007, he wants just $85 million in grants for creating and preserving non-federal parks, forest land and wildlife refuges, a 40 percent cut.

"This is the most troubling budget we've seen from this White House," said Heather Taylor, deputy legislative director for Natural Resources Defense Council.

The proposal sent to Congress this week would trim EPA's budget by nearly 5 percent, down to $7.2 billion, and the Interior Department's budget by 2.4 percent, to $9.1 billion.

Sen. James Jeffords, I-Vt., said it shows the environment isn't a Bush administration priority. "We cannot allow this dangerous trend to continue," said Jeffords, a senior member of the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee.

Interior Secretary Gale Norton and EPA Administrator Stephen Johnson said their budgets represent, within the context of reducing the federal deficit, a responsible allocation of resources that will still lead to environmental improvements.

One potential hole in the Interior budget is $312 million for an Office of Surface Mining program to reclaim abandoned mines. The money comes from coal mining fees set to expire in June. The Bush administration is asking Congress to reauthorize the fees.

"Nobody wants to see the program come to a halt," Norton said.

The budget also would cut $89 million from the National Park Service's nearly $2.6 billion budget.

Environmentalists contend a bigger danger is the administration's plan to raise $250 million over five years by selling 125,000 acres of the Bureau of Land Management's 261 million acres.

The lands are typically part of a "checkerboard" pattern of small parcels surrounded by suburban or urban areas, Interior officials say, and have been identified as holding little natural, historic, cultural or energy value.

The administration anticipates selling them for $2,000 an acre. The Forest Service plans to sell 170,000-200,000 acres in 41 states, according to The Wilderness Society.

Another proposal affects EPA's electronic catalog that keeps track of tens of thousands of agency documents and research studies, according to EPA internal memos. The agency would cut four-fifths of its library budget — from $2.5 million to $500,000. It pays for a network of dozens of libraries and reading rooms nationally.

DOJ_NMG_0014600

"How are EPA scientists supposed to engage in cutting edge research when they cannot find what the agency has already done?" said Jeff Ruch, executive director of Public Employees for Environmental Responsibility, which obtained the EPA memos.

EPA spokeswoman Eryn Witcher said materials will still be available.

"EPA is working to modernize our antiquated system by streamlining our physical collections and making them available online to provide more information to a wider group of people, including scientists," she said.

Low-interest loans to states for treating wastewater, cutting other water pollution and managing watersheds would be cut by 22 percent, to $688 million.

Bush has requested $184 million for EPA's homeland security programs — including monitoring water supplies against terrorists and decontaminating buildings after chemical or biological attacks — and more than $100 million for its energy-related programs.

Power Plant Would Reuse Carbon Dioxide (NYT)

By Matthew L. Wald

The New York Times, February 11, 2006

Subsidiaries of BP and Edison International said yesterday that they were planning to build a power plant that would run on oil residues, and that 90 percent of the carbon dioxide would be captured and pumped into an oil field, where it would help push more oil to the surface.

The $1 billion plant would be adjacent to a BP refinery in Carson, Calif., about 20 miles south of Los Angeles, and would be the first such plant in the country, the companies said. BP is already drawing up engineering plans for a plant in Scotland that would sequester its carbon dioxide in an underground oil-bearing formation; that plant is to run on natural gas.

The companies said they hoped to make a final decision on the plant in 2008 and have it running in 2011. It would qualify for a tax credit as a carbon-free energy source under the 2005 energy bill, company executives said.

The plant would run by mixing an oil residue, petroleum coke, in a chamber with steam and a controlled amount of oxygen. In this technique, called gasification, both the fuel and the water give up hydrogen atoms to form hydrogen gas. This process also produces carbon monoxide, which is converted to carbon dioxide, giving off heat to sustain the reaction.

The hydrogen is then burned in a turbine engine, the kind that electric companies normally run on natural gas, and the dominant combustion product is water. The carbon dioxide is compressed into a liquid and injected into an oil field.

Although the fuel is an oil residue, and not coal, the technology is the same as one mentioned by President Bush in his State of the Union speech on Jan. 31, in which he said, "We will invest more in zero-emission coal-fired plants."

When coal or other fuels are gasified, conventional pollutants like sulfur and carbon dioxide, which is believed to be responsible for climate change, can be removed before combustion, while the volume of gas is still relatively small.

Petroleum coke from the Carson refinery is usually trucked to the harbor and shipped to China, where it is burned for fuel.

As a nearly carbon-free source of electricity, the plant would compete with wind power. Its construction cost is about double the cost of a wind turbine, according to Theodore F. Craver Jr., the chairman and chief executive of Edison Mission Energy, an unregulated subsidiary of Edison International.

But the production of wind turbines cannot be scheduled, and they generally produce only about 30 percent as much electricity as they would by running around the clock; this plant will run 90 to 95 percent of the hours in a year, he said. And the Los Angeles Basin, where it is situated, is often short of power, he said.

Steve Westwell, chief executive of BP Alternative Energy, said that all of the technologies had already been demonstrated individually, including separating carbon dioxide from hydrogen, and pumping the carbon dioxide under pressure into the ground. One area in which the project would stretch existing technologies is in the turbine; hydrogen burns hotter than natural gas, and tends to make turbine blades brittle.

BP is seeking to put the carbon dioxide in oil fields owned by Occidental Petroleum.

Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger, who attended the project announcement, said, "This will be the first plant of its kind in the whole country, and I think it is a perfect fit for our state."

Plan Unveiled For Hydrogen Power Plant (LAT)

By Elizabeth Douglass

The Los Angeles Times, February 11, 2006

Oil giant BP and Edison say they will spend $1 billion to build a nonpolluting facility in Carson. It is expected to be completed in 2011.

DOJ_NMG_0014601

Oil giant BP and Edison International said Friday that they would spend $1 billion to build a one-of-a-kind hydrogen power plant in Carson to supply the region with badly needed electricity without polluting the air.

Slated for completion in 2011 next to BP's Carson oil refinery, the 500-megawatt facility would be the world's largest hydrogen-fired power plant, churning out enough electricity to serve more than 300,000 average homes, executives said at a news conference that drew Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger and other state officials.

But what sets the project apart is the unique way it would make electricity by using the refinery's leftovers while capturing the resulting carbon dioxide, the primary greenhouse gas linked to global warming, so the environment isn't harmed, the executives said.

BP America Inc. President Ross Pillari called the planned facility "the cleanest and greenest power plant in the United States." Alan Lloyd, secretary of the California Environmental Protection Agency, told the gathering that the plant would be so nonpolluting that "the only emissions are water vapor."

The state has been pushing to augment electricity supplies — considered particularly thin in Southern California — through the construction of power plants and the increased use of alternative, less-polluting energy sources.

The proposed plant would be "a very major step forward" in meeting the region's power needs, said John Bryson, chief executive of Rosemead-based Edison International, whose Southern California Edison utility provides electricity to more than 13 million customers. Another Edison unit, its unregulated Edison Mission Group, would own 49% of the project and London-based BP would own 51%.

Who would buy the power and what they would pay have yet to be determined, company executives said. One problem is price; the hydrogen plant will cost more to build than one using natural gas, and its electricity would be more expensive.

Most of the power plants built in the U.S. in recent years have been fueled by natural gas, a cleaner-burning fuel that remains relatively cheap despite price increases that have rivaled the run-up in the cost of crude oil. More than 40% of California's electricity is made with natural gas, and the state has launched ambitious efforts to reduce that dependence and to slash emissions of carbon dioxide and other greenhouse gases.

"It definitely costs more … and we're going to have to sell it in a competitive market," said Doug McFarlan, spokesman for Edison Mission Group. "Those are the questions that we need to sort through before we make a decision to apply for construction permits."

The companies acknowledged that the project relies to some extent on landing federal tax breaks and incentives for construction of gasification plants similar to theirs, such as those offered under the Federal Energy Policy Act of 2005.

"This is cutting-edge, but at a cost," said Michael Shames, executive director of San Diego-based Utility Consumers' Action Network. He said that building a natural gas-fired plant of the size contemplated by BP and Edison would cost about $400 million.

The proposed BP-Edison hydrogen plant would be fueled by petroleum coke, a coal-like refinery byproduct, and recycled water, which would be "gasified," or converted into two gases: hydrogen and carbon dioxide. The hydrogen would run turbines to produce the electricity.

About 90% of the carbon dioxide, a pollutant that typically is released into the air, would be collected and piped to local oil fields, where it would be injected into the ground to help retrieve hard-to-get oil. The carbon dioxide would be left underground.

"It is a perfect fit for our state," Schwarzenegger said. "I've always said you don't have to choose between a healthy environment and a healthy economy."

David Hawkins, climate center director at the Natural Resources Defense Council, called the project "the only way to make electricity from fossil fuels and protect the planet from global warming." But Hawkins, who attended Friday's news conference, added that "they need to make sure that this project is a good community neighbor."

In nearby Wilmington, Jesse Marquez, executive director of the Coalition for a Safe Environment, said his group "will definitely scrutinize the environmental report on it to assure the public that there will be no environmental impact to the community."

I'm For New Exploration And Production Of Oil (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 11, 2006

In regard to your Feb. 1 editorial "Oil Bashing, Round Two1" criticizing my proposal for a windfall profits rebate for consumers who are being price-gouged by the big oil companies:

The oil market is not a free market, and when price-gouging occurs, government has an obligation to stand up for consumers. The Journal disagrees. Fair enough. We can disagree about that.

But when you claim that I oppose "new energy production in places where companies want to explore," it is not accurate. I support opening up Lease 181 in the Gulf of Mexico, which is part of the Outer Continental Shelf. I support building a new Alaska natural gas pipeline. I've voted for a whole range of incentives to encourage more domestic oil and natural production over the years.

My legislation would exempt oil companies from paying the excise tax that would fund the windfall profits rebate if they invest profits from oil sold for more than $40 a barrel in the exploration, drilling and production of new domestic supplies or to develop alternative domestic energy supplies.

I strongly support new exploration and production, even in some places now off limits and specifically in one of the places you say I do not.

Sen. Byron L. Dorgan (D., N.D.)

Washington

Kicking The Habit, All Over The World (LAT)

By Michael T. Klare, Michael T. Klare, A Professor At Hampshire College, Is The Author Of "Blood And Oil: The Dangers And

The Los Angeles Times, February 11, 2006

PRESIDENT BUSH was right to say that the United States is "addicted to oil" in his State of the Union address. For too long we have been consuming ever-greater quantities of the stuff without paying heed to the political, economic and environmental hazards involved. Bush also made some useful, if timid, suggestions on how to curb our insatiable thirst for oil. But he failed to address a critical aspect of the problem: Other countries, including China and India, are just as addicted to oil, and unless we strive to suppress their appetites along with our own, the problems we face will continue to multiply.

For decades, the United States has been the world's leading consumer of petroleum, devouring about one-fourth of the global supply daily. Although higher gasoline prices have weakened demand slightly, we are still expected to consume 27% more oil in 2025 than we do today, according to the latest Department of Energy projections. But an even greater increase in demand is expected from Asia. China's oil consumption is expected to rise by 97% between 2004 and 2025, and India's by 78%. The resulting demand crunch could easily overwhelm the global supply of petroleum.

In the U.S., oil demand is largely spurred by Americans' collective love affair with the automobile. We also own far more vehicles, on a per-capita basis, than any other large nation. But all indications are that Chinese and Indian consumers are beginning to emulate us: In 2001, 16 million Chinese owned private cars; by 2020, the number is expected to hit 130 million; India's ownership rate is expected to grow just as fast.

The rising demand for oil in rapidly developing countries has enormous implications for the United States. To begin with, it is driving up energy prices for American consumers. With global petroleum supplies tighter than they have been in decades, and China and India competing with the U.S. for available supplies, the price is bound to rise. A year ago, the Energy Department was predicting that oil prices would hover in the $30 to $35 a barrel range over the next 20 years; now it is projecting $50 to $55 a barrel for that same period. Some energy analysts expect prices to climb even higher, especially if China's economy continues to grow at 10% a year and the global supply of oil fails to keep pace.

But this is the least of our problems. In their quest for foreign sources of petroleum, China and India are buying up fields around the world and, in some cases, forging close ties with such states as Iran, Sudan, Uzbekistan and Venezuela, which are considered unfriendly or even hostile to the U.S.

"A more troubling aspect of the recent surge in overseas energy deals by China and India is their willingness to invest in countries that are pursuing policies that are harmful to global stability," Assistant Secretary of State E. Anthony Wayne told the Senate Foreign Relations Committee in July. For example, "both Chinese and Indian firms have reportedly been involved in oil and gas-sector deals in Iran that raise concerns under U.S. law and policy." This is especially true when such investment is accompanied by arms and military technology, as has been the case with Chinese links to Iran and Sudan.

It is easy to condemn Beijing and New Delhi for such behavior, but it's hardly surprising that they're prepared to shop anywhere for oil. Under these circumstances, the world is likely to become increasingly well-armed and unstable, posing acute dangers for the U.S. whether or not we reduce our own consumption of petroleum.

And this is not the only danger we face. The U.S. is the leading emitter of carbon dioxide and other greenhouse gases into the atmosphere, thus heightening the risk of catastrophic climate change. If we implement Bush's proposed initiatives and consume less petroleum (which accounts for the largest share of our carbon emissions), we stand a chance of slowing climate change. But, according to the Energy Department, developing nations in Asia now account for about 19% of the world's oil-related carbon emissions (compared with 24% for the U.S.); by 2025, their share is projected to rise to 28%.

It follows from all this that it is not enough to curb the U.S. addiction to oil. We also need to work with China, India and other oil-addicted countries to curb their fast-growing demand. This means persuading the leaders of those countries to adopt the same sort of initiatives as those proposed by Bush. Even better, the president should invite them to join the U.S. in these efforts as equal partners. U.S. companies should also be encouraged to form partnerships with foreign firms to develop new energy alternatives and transportation systems that would spur economic growth in participating countries.

DOJ_NMG_0014603

Yes, Americans are addicted to petroleum, but so are others around the world. Unless we work together to curb its harmful effects, we will all suffer from the resulting damage.

The Grass Station (NYT)

By Constance Casey

The New York Times, February 11, 2006

THOSE of us who labor in the garden got an unexpected thrill listening to the State of the Union last week when President Bush touted a plant, switch grass to be exact, as a way to "make our dependence on Middle Eastern oil a thing of the past."

How pleasing to see official presidential recognition of the usefulness and worthiness of this common member (panicum virgatum) of the millet family. Previously insufficiently appreciated in our capital, switch grass is inexpensive food for cattle, horses, sheep and goats. This deep-rooted perennial controls erosion by slowing down water run off and keeping beneficial sediments in the field, and it is habitat for songbirds, game birds and waterfowl.

And yes, ethanol can be made from switch grass, which grows in abundance on the prairies of the Great Plains. If grass had ambition (besides wanting to propagate), the panicum virgatum might see itself as a cure for global warming and a savior of the family farm. If burning compressed switch grass really does work to reduce the use of fossil fuels, it would reduce the carbon we release into the air. Then farmers could find new profits in growing the stuff. And the more, the better. Switch grass, like every other plant, takes carbon dioxide out of the air and uses it to build plant tissue. Fold that, Republicans, into your Clear Skies legislation.

Switch grass cleans water as well as air; its wide-spreading roots filter out pesticides, herbicides and excess fertilizer before they reach the waterways. Up in Manitoba, Canada, where they care deeply about staying warm, they're experimenting with stoves that burn pellets of switch grass.

Senator Joseph Lieberman, Democrat of Connecticut, recently recommended switch grass as a balm for international tension. It's likely we'll find ourselves competing with China for oil, he told the Council on Foreign Relations, so we'll need to look at other fuels. He suggested that tons of agricultural materials, like corn, sugar cane and switch grass, could be used "to create billions of barrels of new fuels."

At this point I wouldn't be surprised to hear someone say that switch grass is a cure for lower-back pain and nearsightedness.

Family farmers know that switch grass is easy to grow. It doesn't complain about growing in sand; it doesn't mind clay either. It's tolerant of floods as well as of droughts. It would work as part of the effort to restore the Louisiana wetlands that can help protect New Orleans from hurricanes.

Switch grass is native to most of North America, from Canada to Texas. The day after the State of the Union, the president joked that he might bring in a few extra dollars at his Crawford ranch by growing switch grass for fuel. Whoa, Mr. President, take a look next time you're trimming the brush: odds are you have plenty.

Let's not forget that switch grass is beautiful and looks great in floral arrangements. On the very same day the president spoke, I got the latest Brooklyn Botanic Garden handbook, "Designing Borders for Sun and Shade," in the mail. The handbook strongly recommended switch grass as part of a perennial border. There's "Dallas Blues," "Alamo," and the prettiest, wine-red "Shenandoah." The handbook suggests combining switch grass with asters, sunflowers and black-eyed Susans for an all-native garden with a nice prairie feel.

To me, though this may seem at first unrelated, this is just one more reason that "America the Beautiful" should be our national anthem instead of that song with the bombs bursting in air. The clue to achieving clean fuel, clean air, clean water, world peace has been right there all the time in those "amber waves of grain."

Congress's Duty On Energy (NYT)

The New York Times, February 11, 2006

Senator Pete Domenici told a recent gathering of experts that if Congress is going to do anything useful this year about the two big energy-related questions of our time — oil dependency and global warming — it will have to focus on "four or five big things" instead of the usual laundry list of tax breaks, subsidies and modest research programs.

A New Mexico Republican who runs the Senate energy committee, Mr. Domenici has become something of a Senate visionary on energy policy. With Jeff Bingaman, a New Mexico Democrat, he co-sponsored a resolution that not only accepted the basic science of global warming but also endorsed mandatory controls on emissions of carbon dioxide. The realist in him knows that this Congress is unlikely to take either of the steps (much less both) that would be most likely to lower oil consumption as well as greenhouse gases: a big increase in fuel economy standards and a big gasoline tax.

DOJ_NMG_0014604

But he is willing to entertain other incentives to produce fuel-efficient cars, to develop fuels other than gasoline — most likely ethanol, not just from corn but from other crops — and to build a new generation of power plants capable of capturing carbon dioxide before it goes into the atmosphere. Mr. Domenici's vision of the future also includes safer, less expensive nuclear plants, which have the virtue of generating no greenhouse gases.

There are several legislative vehicles at hand for achieving some of these objectives. One is the Fuel Choices for American Security Act of 2005. There are identical versions in both houses, each with broadly bipartisan sponsorship, including conservatives who would normally resist federal mandates but who believe that reducing oil consumption is an urgent matter of national security.

The bill would establish a goal for fuel savings of 2.5 million barrels a day (about what we now import from the Persian Gulf), increasing to 7.5 million barrels by 2025. It would also provide some of the means to get there, including serious production incentives for a new generation of cars and fuels.

Although the bill does not address other imperatives, like cleaner power plants, it would have a positive spillover effect on global warming because fuel-efficient cars and trucks would produce lower greenhouse gases. The question is whether Congress can focus on the big issues without engaging in the diversionary food fights that every energy bill seems to inspire.

It will be hard for someone not to raise red flags like drilling in the Arctic, or for Congress in general not to indulge its appetite for pork. But with even President Bush signing on (at least in speeches) to the need for a new energy future, this is not the time for business as usual.

Gov't Seeks $16M Unpaid Mine Safety Fines (AP)

By NANCY ZUCKERBROD

Associated Press, February 11, 2006

By , Writer WASHINGTON (AP) - Kentucky mine operator Stanley Osborne has accumulated more than $200,000 in safety fines since the 1980s, but the federal government has not been able to collect the money.

In a new approach, the Mine Safety and Health Administration filed suit against Osborne this month. "We just can't be chasing people around for these collection cases when they should be paying their civil penalties," said Thomas Mascolino, deputy associate solicitor at the Labor Department.

MSHA, part of the Labor Department, was owed more than $16 million in delinquent fines at the end of last year, said agency spokesman Dirk Fillpot. More than $11 million was for violations at coal mines.

The problem isn't new, but it has gained attention following mining accidents that have left 21 miners dead so far this year.

West Virginia lawmakers have asked the Government Accountability Office, the investigative arm of Congress, to look into how the mine agency assesses and collects fines.

"It is critically important that penalties for serious violations be painful," the lawmakers said in a letter to the GAO.

But critics wonder how safety fines can be painful when they can go uncollected.

"The payment of fines assessed by MSHA is essentially voluntary," said Wes Addington, a lawyer at the Appalachian Citizens Law Center, which is based in Prestonsburg, Ky., and represents miners in discrimination cases.

Addington recently analyzed fines levied against companies in Kentucky - the nation's third-largest coal producer - and found there were one or more years during the past decade in which one-third of the state's underground mines paid little or none of their fines.

Fillpot said MSHA has collected 80 percent of the fines it has assessed in the past decade.

He said the agency first tries to collect the fines and after 180 days asks the Treasury Department to get involved. Treasury can ask collection agencies to go after the fines.

If an operator cannot be found, goes out of business or doesn't have the money, MSHA can write the debt off. The Internal Revenue Service can consider the money part of the operator's earned income, meaning it is taxable.

"The process needs to change," said Stephen Webber, who headed the mine agency's assessments office at the end of the Clinton administration and for a few years under the Bush administration.

"If mine operators are not paying their civil penalty assessments, they're not going to have the right attitude toward health and safety," Webber said. "They'll just get another assessment and not pay it."

Webber said he suggested to Labor Department lawyers that they shut down mines that had delinquent fines: "That would have an effect." But the idea was rejected, he said.

If a coal operator isn't fixing the problem for which he is cited, MSHA can shut down the part of the mine in question, said Mascolino. But he said the agency can't take that action just because fines haven't been paid.

DOJ_NMG_0014605

"Our power to shut a portion of a mine is always directed to the finding of a current existing health and safety violation," he said.

Another option Webber supports is creation of a system by which mine operators would have to pay outstanding fines to renew permits. West Virginia has such a law, ensuring the state is paid, he said.

There is no similar federal permit system, Mascolino said.

"They don't have it, but they need it," said Webber, who thinks Congress ought to mandate the change.

In the case of Osborne, who has operated several mines in eastern Kentucky, the agency didn't go after old fines but asked the court to make Osborne post a bond for payment of future fines.

Mascolino said the goal is to make other operators think twice about ignoring fines.

"That's what this case is about," he said, adding that the legal strategy has been developing since last year, before the recent spate of mine accidents.

Osborne couldn't be reached for comment on the new suit. But he offered an explanation on the unpaid fines during a worker discrimination case last year, saying, "I don't have the money."

Miner representatives are skeptical, noting coal prices are up.

"Those operators that do not pay their fines in a timely manner, they should not be able to operate," said Dennis O'Dell, top safety expert at United Mine Workers of America. "They're making all kinds of money."

Hydra-Headed Hybrids (WP)

The Washington Post, February 11, 2006

IN NORTHERN VIRGINIA, the hybrid has become hydra-headed. As plenty of the region's commuters know, hybrid vehicles are the main culprit in the ever-worsening traffic in the region's carpool lanes. Thanks to a regulatory perk, hybrid drivers are allowed to use carpool lanes -- chiefly those on Interstate 95 -- without carrying a single passenger; that's a major reason Northern Virginia ranks just behind California as the nation's hottest market for hybrid sales.

Obviously, it defeats the purpose of carpool lanes to flood them with passengerless hybrids. Realizing that, officials have long planned to end the sweet deal for hybrids this summer. But, incredibly, Virginia lawmakers have voted to prolong it. This is a supremely bad idea.

There is no mystery about hybrids' impact on the carpool lanes, known as HOV, or high-occupancy-vehicle, lanes. Introduced only five years ago, hybrids now account for at least 22 percent of rush-hour traffic on I-95's HOV lanes. That's even more than the 15 percent believed to be cheaters -- those in conventional cars who use the HOV lanes despite carrying no passengers. With hybrid sales soaring, the problem is getting worse in a hurry. There are already more than 11,700 hybrids on Virginia's roads -- triple the number three years ago -- and the vast majority of them are in Northern Virginia. At current trends another 5,000 will be added to the region's roads this year.

State incentives to drive hybrids once made some sense. Powered by battery as well as gasoline, hybrids are somewhat cleaner and more fuel-efficient than their exclusively gasoline-powered cousins. When the state granted HOV access to hybrids starting in 2000, the idea was to strike a blow for the environment and against profligate gas consumption.

But that deal has outlived its usefulness. Hybrids' environmental advantages have diminished as stricter federal rules have required gas-powered cars to have cleaner engines, starting with 2004 models. The region's air quality, though still in need of improvement, has made major gains for more than a decade. Whatever marginal environmental benefits are realized by encouraging hybrid sales on the promise of HOV access, at this point the policy may be doing more harm than good. By slowing carpoolers and long-haul bus trips at rush hour, hybrids may well push frustrated commuters back into their own cars, increasing net emissions. By slowing traffic, hybrids threaten to kill the HOV system.

The hybrid invasion of carpool lanes must end. If that doesn't happen on schedule this summer, it will only become more difficult to do as pressure builds from the growing numbers of hybrid owners and dealers. Nonetheless, both houses of the General Assembly have passed legislation that would extend the deal by a year, until July 2007. The sponsor of one of the bills, Sen. Jeannemarie Devolites Davis (R-Fairfax), says it will maintain the status quo while Virginia and federal officials negotiate regulations governing how much HOV traffic is too much and how many passengerless hybrids are too many. But that is beside the point, which is that high-occupancy lanes are already being clogged by low-occupancy cars. Gov. Timothy M. Kaine (D) should veto the legislation. It's time to restore some rationality to the roads.

Tribal Land Issue Heating Up In Scott County (MINNST)

Minneapolis Star Tribune, February 11, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0014606

As the tribe buys property, it shouldn't be allowed to put the holdings into a tax-exempt trust that takes land off property tax rolls and frees land from local land-use restrictions, some local officials say.

Anthony Lonetree, Star Tribune Outside the hotel-and-casino complex that has enriched the Shakopee Mdewakanton Sioux Community is a statue of an Indian chief with the quote: "Over these hills I once rode free upon my horse."

This is a people who love the land. Twenty-four years after bringing high-stakes gaming to Minnesota, the Mdewakanton Sioux tribe now is the biggest landowner in Scott County -- excluding agencies like the state Department of Natural Resources.

The tribe, determined to develop its property as it sees fit, is asking the federal government to move 760 acres off the property-tax rolls and into trust. Until then, the land is subject to local land-use controls, and that's unacceptable to Tribal Chairman Stanley Crooks.

"When you are sovereign, you determine what's best for you," he said. He described as "demeaning" a recent suggestion by Gov. Tim Pawlenty that tribal and local officials engage in talks to let some -- but not all -- of the land be put into trust.

Yet Scott County and other officials say local governments should continue to manage growth within one of the nation's fastest-growing counties -- and to share in the property-tax revenues that development would bring.

The dispute dates to the mid-1990s, and while it is to be decided at the federal level, perhaps within the next few months, it continues to roil emotions locally.

In December, without advance public notice, the Prior Lake City Council voted to withdraw opposition to having 106 acres within that city put into trust for the tribe, spurring a battle between the county and the tribe in the commentary sections of local and daily newspapers.

The tribe also created and paid for a flier to be inserted in thousands of local papers accusing a Scott County commissioner of having stated in a commentary piece that the tribe was "unacceptable."

Stakes are high, County Administrator David Unmacht said. The federal government's decision could determine the fate of not just 760 acres, he said, but that of other recently acquired tribal parcels, as well -- taxable property now totaling an additional 750 acres. Considering that 640 acres equals one square mile, that's a lot of land.

If not in trust, tribal officials say, the fields will go undeveloped.

By its rules

The Shakopee Mdewakanton Sioux Community is sovereign in that it manages its affairs independent of most state and federal laws. But tribes also can be subject to limits set by Congress. For the Sioux, that means having a civil court but letting Scott County handle criminal matters.

For decades, poor tribes relied upon the federal government to put lands into trust to protect them from forfeiture.

Today, however, said David Wilkins, an American Indian Studies professor at the University of Minnesota, many tribes use gaming profits to buy back lands lost a century ago. In his view, the Bureau of Indian Affairs (BIA) should approve every application to put land in trust: "If we [as tribes] say, 'This will benefit us, trustee,' then do it," he said, referring to the basic nature of a trust relationship.

Whether a tribe is wealthy, he added, is irrelevant.

As a semi-sovereign nation, the Shakopee Mdewakanton Sioux Community does not disclose its financial records. But according to its website, Mystic Lake Casino Hotel now boasts of more than 4,000 slot machines and 100 blackjack tables, plus three hotel towers and a resort-styled golf course.

The tribe, too, is proud of its stewardship of the land. Prairies have been restored; its building codes are stringent, officials say.

Land is needed for housing tribal families, however. Two parcels in the trust application -- one in Shakopee and the other in Prior Lake -- would take the bulk of new residential development. The tribe also wants to move its powwow grounds and to develop a cultural center and new government center in Shakopee, as well.

In 1998, the tribe applied to have 593 acres put into trust, and the BIA rejected the application. It said then that the tribe's business acumen made it one of the nation's most successful Indian enterprises and it failed to show the need for the benefits that having land in trust could bring.

The decision will figure into current deliberations, said Terry Virden, director of the BIA's midwest regional office. But, so, too, he added, will other factors. Now, he said, there is more development near the reservation than in 1998, easing concerns about land-use pressures. Opposition seems less heated, too, he added.

Virden said a decision is expected within two months. If the agency had to its issue its decision today, he added, he doesn't know what it would be.

The county has said that if the tribe developed the parcels as proposed, local jurisdictions could lose $2.9 million a year in tax revenues. In 2005, the undeveloped parcels produced $65,642 in property taxes.

Local change

In Prior Lake, the decision to support the trust application prompted outrage among some citizens, who've begun a petition drive (at www.offthecouch.org) urging a new city policy opposing it.

During his State of the City address Monday, Mayor Jack Haugen apologized for the suddenness of the decision but not for the action itself.

Just four months ago, he had joined local officials in appearing before Virden to argue against the trust, and, in fact, helped lead the presentation. But, he said in a recent interview, he realized later "my heart wasn't in the position."

During the presentation, officials noted the tribe was entrenched in an "all or nothing" position. Talk to Crooks, and that seems clear: "There is no 'win-win' situation," he said of any talks. "Not for the tribe."

Interior Ordered To Pay Cobell Lawyers (ICT)

By David Melmer, Indian Country Today

Indian Country Today, February 10, 2006

WASINGTON - The Department of the Interior was ordered by the U.S. District Court to pay attorneys' fees and expenses that have accumulated in the ongoing Cobell v. Norton case.

The total amount ordered paid by U.S. District Judge Royce Lamberth is more than $7 million. That money will come out of BIA and Interior accounts, and will affect tribal programs.

On Jan. 26, Interior Associate Deputy Secretary James Cason sent a letter to tribes notifying them that the court-mandated legal fee payment sent to Cobell attorneys on Jan. 18 would adversely affect tribal programs. He detailed where the $7 million would come from to forewarn them that some of their expectations may not be met this year.

The largest impact will be in the area of historical accounting, with a contribution of $2 million. That department, which focuses on identifying the rightful owners of special deposit accounts, was chosen because it would not be as difficult to move the work to a later and more protracted timeline.

"It's a matter of do we get them done this year or next year," Cason said.

Tribal attorneys who expect payment for work they have done for the Interior or BIA on water rights, boundary disputes or other issues may not be paid this year, Cason said. Most of that work is performed by the Justice Department, but from time to time tribal attorneys are asked to step in.

In numerous cases such as this, lawyers would do a lot of background work to make sure attorneys' fees would not be reimbursed out of tribal funds, John Dossett, general counsel for the National Congress of American Indians, said.

"In this case, none of that was done. I don't see [where] that happened. Tribes are concerned that money will come out of tribal programs, and it's clearly not what that fund is for," Dossett said.

Sen. Tim Johnson, D-S.D. and member of the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs, wrote in a response to Cason's letter: "I understand the Court's Order disturbed funding expectations; however, the inflammatory letter sent was an entirely unnecessary and inappropriate attempt to undermine the relationship between tribes and tribal members involved in the Cobell v. Norton case. It is my sincere hope that the Department revisits this decision and finds an adequate solution that fulfills its obligations to the first Americans."

NCAI President Joe Garcia called for a fair settlement to be negotiated soon and in good faith. During the annual State of the Indian Nations address on Jan. 30, Garcia said the decision to take funds from the BIA budget to comply with court orders to pay attorneys' fees "impedes our progress as tribal governments on nearly all other issues."

"Every year, the BIA budget gets cut. Every year we see somewhere from $100 million to $150 million taken out and moved over to Office of Special Trustee; that's a bigger concern. This issue of reimbursement of attorneys' fees is much smaller."

The majority of funds that will be paid to the Cobell attorneys will not come out of tribal programs. Cason said education and law enforcement are exempted.

"One of the problems the critics have not embraced is where you take the money from," Cason said, noting that there wasn't any money lying around that wasn't in use and that the department had to abide by the court order.

A 0.1 percent levy, which will generate $1 million, was imposed on most programs, including central office operations and tribal operations. In each case, the levy was small and broad-based, Cason said.

"We tried to spread the millions out so no one particular program took a big hit," Cason said.

"My advice to tribal leaders is, be careful. The financial environment has changed."

Some tribes will have an allocation reduced by $100. Cason said if that tribe works on a very slim margin, it would have a greater impact.

The BIA contributed $3 million to the attorneys' fee account, with $2 million of that coming from an account that would reimburse tribal attorneys and the other $1 million from the 0.1 percent levy.

DOJ_NMG_0014608

The Cobell plaintiffs referred to the levy and fund distribution as a "cruel effort to inflict more pain on the victims of the government's long-acknowledged misbehavior." They claim the funds used to pay attorneys' fees come from areas that are designed to "punish Native Americans."

"Now that we have secured the rights to this accounting, and now that the government must pay the costs of that accounting, the Interior Department is planning to loot Indian accounts once again to cover up its misdeeds," said Eloise Cobell, lead plaintiff in the class action lawsuit.

The suit was filed nearly 10 years ago in an attempt to hold the government accountable and reconcile Individual Indian Money trust accounts for lease, royalties and other payments due tribal land owners. Cobell has stated that some $300 billion is at stake.

The Office of Special Trustee contributed $300,000 of funds that were planned for trust improvement activities; the Department of Treasury, another $2 million.

Cobell said the government could have found funds elsewhere to pay these legal fees. "They don't have to make Indians pay because they lost in court," she said.

The government, by its own admission, has spent some $100 million defending this lawsuit. Cobell said the fees and expenses were planned and the plaintiffs made it clear two years ago they would be seeking the legal fees.

"It's an interesting irony; when we pay, they claim we are divisive and terrible," Cason said of Cobell's criticism.

"If they are so concerned about the money they should say, 'We don't want programs to be hurt, so don't pay this.' If there was some magical pot of money somewhere - I don't know where it is," Cason said.

The Cobell plaintiffs continue to claim the government cannot win this drawn-out litigation. A settlement compromise has been placed on the table for reimbursement to the IIM account-holders for $27.5 billion. That figure is disputed by the government. The Senate Indian Affairs Committee has held hearings on proposed legislation that will settle the lawsuit, but failed to include monetary funds in the legislation.

"There are side effects of the litigation. I think the tribes have been supportive, but as time goes by there are side effects to the budget," Dossett said.

A group of tribal leaders, in a recent meeting in Bismarck, N.D., offered another possible settlement figure that ranges from $13 to $27.5 billion.

"I have never seen a more blatant and transparent attempt to politicize this case in order to divide and conquer Indian country," Cobell said.

"The funds that were cut serve the nation's poorest peoples and we should do everything that we can to maintain and increase program funding for Indian Country, not cut funding," Johnson said. "There are clearly better alternatives than cutting program funding, and I am willing to pursue solutions at the legislative level that do not involve politicizing the Cobell litigation."

The amount to be taken from tribal programs will not have as much impact as the most recent budget submitted by President Bush, which cuts the BIA by $65 million.

Distribution of attorneys' fees:

* Dennis Gingold, lead plaintiff attorney: $2 million

Expenses related to the lawsuit:

* Price Waterhouse Coopers: $2.5 million
* Thaddeus Holt: $350

Total fees and expenses:

$7,066,471

Source: Interior Department Associate Deputy Secretary James Cason's Jan. 26 letter to tribal leaders.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Drug Smuggling Air Marshals? (TIME)

By SALLY B. DONNELLY

Time, February 11, 2006

The arrest of a pair of agents on possible cocaine charges raises new concerns about the aviation security program

For a law enforcement agency that works hard to be invisible, the Federal Air Marshals have been generating a lot of attention lately. On Thursday, two of the agency's several thousand highly trained traveling armed guards were taken into custody in Houston. Although the US Attorney's office would not comment beyond acknowledging that the Air Marshals were arrested by agents from the Federal Bureau of Investigation and the Department of Homeland Security's Inspector General's office, Government sources tell TIME that the two Air Marshals, are allegedly involved with the possession or transportation of cocaine, and may have been paid several thousand dollars to move the drugs.

DOJ_NMG_0014609

The marshals, one of whom is a former agent of the Drug Enforcement Administration, will likely appear in court to face criminal charges next week, and will almost certainly be suspended.

The incident comes only two months after two marshals shot and killed a man who claimed—falsely, as it turned out—to have a bomb while boarding an airplane in Miami. Although the official results of an investigation will not be complete until late spring, it is expected to conclude that the agents acted appropriately in their dealings with the passenger.

The arrest in Houston is a shock to an agency that plays an important role in aviation security. Although there have been air marshals flying for decades, on Sept. 11, 2001, the numbers had dwindled to only three dozen agents. After the attacks, the agency was drastically increased in size and many agents were drafted from other law enforcement agencies and local police departments.

New agents were-and are—subject to security screening and background checks similar to other federal law enforcement agencies, which are required to be updated only every five years.

Critics said the rush to expand allowed too many inexperienced men and women into the service, and there were reports of marshals clashing with airline personnel or other law enforcement agents. Aviation sources say the agency has spent the last few years weeding out poor performers, but the arrest of the two agents in Houston is sure to further stoke those concerns.

F.B.I. Raids In Puerto Rico (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, February 11, 2006

SAN JUAN, P.R., Feb. 10 (AP) — F.B.I. agents searched five homes and a business on Friday but made no arrests in an effort to thwart what the bureau said was a "domestic terrorist attack" planned by militants favoring independence for Puerto Rico.

The bureau said the investigation was focused on the Boricua Popular Army. The group, also known as the Macheteros or "cane cutters," was accused of bombings and attacks in the 1970's and 1980's. In September, F.B.I. agents killed Filiberto Ojeda Ríos, one of the group's leaders.

Everett Men Arrested In Connection To Fire (SEATIMES)

By Brian Alexander, Times Snohomish County Bureau

The Seattle Times, February 11, 2006

Two Everett men were jailed and two more suspects could be arrested soon in connection with a December fire that gutted a large condominium building under construction in downtown Edmonds.

The 21-year-old and 18-year-old men were arrested Thursday after they turned themselves in to police in Everett. They are being held in Snohomish County Jail on $75,000 bail each and might face federal charges, according to information released at a news conference Friday.

It was unclear what the motive was for the fire that burned down the 90,000-square-foot structure, at 505 Fifth Ave. S., on Dec. 17, but investigators said Friday it was unrelated to a local controversy about the building's size and height and it was not connected to ecoterrorism.

Neither of the men appeared to have significant local criminal records.

According to a probable-cause statement by an Edmonds police detective, a tip on the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives hotline identified the four suspects. The two men turned themselves in when they learned ATF investigators and police were on to them, said Kelvin Crenshaw, ATF special agent in charge.

During the investigation, an employee of the construction company was identified as an "associate" of the suspects, but the employee did not appear to be a suspect himself, according to the statement.

The employee then helped identify the men who were arrested Thursday, as well as two others, according to the detective's statement.

Authorities expect to arrest at least one of the two remaining suspects in the near future, said ATF spokeswoman Julianne Marshall.

Bruce Miyake, an assistant U.S. attorney, says he is considering whether to pursue federal charges against the people arrested in connection with the arson.

The minimum sentence for a federal arson conviction is five years, compared with less than two years for the state minimum, Miyake said.

A decision on the charges will be made by Monday, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0014610

The break in the case was the result of tips and help from the public, Crenshaw said.

Bob Gregg, the building's owner, said he plans to rebuild "The Gregory" with nearly the same design and hopes it will be completed before the end of the year.

Gregg said he was "greatly relieved" to learn about the arrests, and it "brings some closure."

The estimated damage to the building was $4.5 million, Gregg said. Most of the building has already been torn down, but portions of the foundation that weren't damaged in the fire will be reused in the reconstruction.

The cause of the fire was previously undetermined because of part of a string of lights that couldn't be found in the wreckage of the fire, Crenshaw said. Without being able to find remains of the lights, investigators couldn't rule them out as a possible cause, he said.

Brian Alexander: 425-745-7845 or balexander@seattletimes.com

TAX:

Cheney Says New Unit Will Prove Tax Cuts Boost Revenue (WP)

By Nell Henderson

The Washington Post, February 11, 2006

Vice President Cheney said Thursday night that the verdict is in before the Bush administration's new tax analysis shop has even opened for business: Tax cuts boost federal government revenue.

That assertion won applause from his audience at the Conservative Political Action Conference, but it is a long-standing source of debate among many economists and tax experts at a time of rising federal budget deficits.

Cheney touted President Bush's recently announced proposal to create a tax analysis division as a move toward providing more evidence for the administration's side of the argument.

"The president's tax policies have strengthened the economy, as we knew they would," Cheney told the conference, according to a text posted on the White House's Web site. "And despite forecasts to the contrary, the tax cuts have translated into higher federal revenues."

Cheney said some forecasters have underestimated the degree to which tax cuts would stimulate economic growth and tax revenue.

"It's time to reexamine our assumptions and to consider using more dynamic analysis to measure the true impact of tax cuts on the American economy," Cheney said, explaining why Bush has proposed the new Treasury Department division. "The evidence is in, it's time for everyone to admit that sensible tax cuts increase economic growth and add to the federal treasury."

Bush's proposal, unveiled in his budget plan last week, comes as he is pushing Congress to make permanent the recent tax cuts that are scheduled to expire in coming years. The nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office predicted last month that the budget deficit would swell to $337 billion this year and that the red ink would end in 2012 only if the tax cuts were allowed to expire.

Treasury officials said yesterday that the president's proposed Division on Dynamic Analysis -- with a handful of employees and a $513,000 budget -- would go beyond the government's old "static" methods of analyzing proposed changes in tax policy only in terms of their direct effects on certain affected taxpayers. Instead, "dynamic" analysis looks at how tax changes cause consumers and businesses to behave differently in ways that affect the overall economy's growth.

For example, a tax break to encourage business investment might lower some individual companies' tax bills -- looking like a hit to Treasury revenue under a static analysis. But if that tax cut caused businesses to buy more equipment, hire more workers and increase profits, that might contribute to stronger overall economic growth -- causing the employees and companies to pay more in income, sales and other taxes over time.

Treasury officials said yesterday that they would not initially use their dynamic analysis for "scoring," or estimating the effects of tax changes on the government's tax receipts. But the department said in a statement: "It is envisioned that dynamic analysis eventually would evolve into dynamic scoring . . . (maybe within a year or two)."

Some tax-cut proponents contend that tax cuts can essentially pay for themselves by spurring such strong economic growth that the additional tax revenue more than offsets the money lost to the cuts.

Many economists dispute that, arguing that the effects of tax cuts depend on how they are structured, on economic circumstances and on many other variables.

"All economists agree tax policy has an effect on the economy. The hard thing is to figure out how to measure these effects in the real world," said Leonard E. Burman, co-director of the Urban Institute-Brookings Institution Tax Policy Center.

DOJ_NMG_0014611

Both Congress's Joint Committee on Taxation and the CBO provide dynamic analyses of how tax changes are likely to affect the larger economy, but they do not use dynamic scoring in the budget process.

"I am a proponent of doing this," said Douglas Holtz-Eakin, a fellow at the Council on Foreign Relations who introduced dynamic analysis while he was CBO director.

But, he added, because of the challenges of developing good models and the difficulty of the findings, "there are limits to how useful it is as a policy tool."

White House Calls For New Tax-Cut Analysis Unit (WSJ)

By Robert Guy Matthews

The Wall Street Journal, February 11, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Bush administration, in a maneuver in the long-running battle between proponents and critics of supply-side economics, said it wants to create a "dynamic analysis" unit within the Treasury's tax-policy office to determine how tax proposals would affect economic growth.

President Bush's 2007 budget, released earlier this week, proposed $513,000 to set up the office. If approved by Congress, the office's main task would be to determine the macroeconomic effects of proposed tax cuts.

For decades, adherents of supply-side economics have argued that cutting tax rates can pay for itself -- or come close -- by stimulating economic activity that generates more tax revenue. They have been frustrated that estimates by Treasury and congressional score-keepers don't reflect this approach.

Many mainstream economists, while acknowledging that tax cuts can have revenue-generating effects, challenge the magnitude of the effects that supply-siders predict.

The analyses produced by the new Treasury unit probably would bolster White House arguments that certain tax cuts generate hardier long-term economic growth. "They have been making the argument that tax cuts are essential for economic growth," said Eric Toder, a former Clinton administration Treasury tax economist now at Urban Institute, a think tank here. "I take it as some kind of indication that they are concerned that people are getting worried about budget deficits and the administration wants to provide more ammunition in support of their tax cuts."

Dynamic analysis means assessing the economic effects of tax or other legislative proposals on the macroeconomy and the federal budget, often with alternative sets of assumptions. It is a step toward the more controversial practice of dynamic scoring, using such analyses to estimate the effect that a proposed tax change will have on federal revenues. Dynamic scoring makes it easier to enact tax cuts because it reduces, and might even eliminate, the negative effect on federal revenues.

The Bush administration isn't proposing that the office engage in dynamic scoring. But some analysts said that creating a Treasury office for dynamic analysis would be a first step toward dynamic scoring. "I think this is a signal that if they do this dynamic analysis now, that in time they will do dynamic scoring," said Michael Graetz, a Yale Law School tax professor who was a Treasury official in the George H.W. Bush administration.

Robert Carroll, deputy assistant Treasury secretary for tax analysis said that there were no immediate plans to start dynamic scoring, but added that the administration hadn't ruled it out either. "We here at Treasury have to become more comfortable," he said. "The models are complicated and sensitivity is an issue." He added, "This seems to me, a very reasonable first step," he said.

The Congressional Budget Office and Joint Committee on Taxation, the official scorekeepers in Congress, conduct dynamic analyses, but don't use dynamic scoring to price tax proposals. Mr. Carroll said the assumptions that they use would be different than the assumptions used at Treasury and therefore another dynamic-analysis division is needed.

Mr. Carroll said he expects to offer a dynamic analysis of Mr. Bush's proposed $1.7 trillion in tax cuts in time for the midsession budget review later in the year. Mr. Carroll also said he expects the new office to work on the current tax-overhaul proposal put forth late last year by a panel commissioned by President Bush.

Write to Robert Guy Matthews at robertguy.matthews@wsj.com1

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Tells Nervous GOP To Focus On Economy (AP)

By David Espo

AP, February 11, 2006

President Bush told nervous lawmakers in his own party on Friday that Republicans should stress the economy and the war on terror as they move deeper into the election year.

DOJ_NMG_0014612

Bush also defended his administration's program of warrantless wiretapping, and vowed to stay the course in the global campaign to wipe out terrorism, according to participants in a closed-door session. "Don't lose your nerve. I'm not going to lose mine," one member of his audience quoted him as saying.

Bush spent more than 90 minutes with House Republicans, gathered for a retreat at a resort on Maryland's Eastern Shore. He spoke near the midpoint of their three-day meeting, a blend of policy and politics that included the premiere of a tongue-in-cheek video modeled on Star Wars.

Shown to lawmakers on Thursday night, the video lampooned GOP political opponents as "The evil Democrat empire." California Rep. Nancy Pelosi (news, bio, voting record), the Democratic leader, was depicted as "Darth Nancy."

The "empire" soon struck back, as Pelosi and other Democrats announced that Star Wars director George Lucas would be appearing with them at a town hall-style meeting at the Capitol next week.

GOP leaders described the session with Bush as unusually wide-ranging. "He answered nearly every question under the sun," said Rep. Deborah Pryce (news, bio, voting record) of Ohio, and Speaker Dennis Hastert called it "an hour and a half of give and take."

Other officials said Bush was asked about the controversy surrounding the National Security Agency wiretapping program, about education, health care and immigration, and the polls that show a majority of people believe the country is on the wrong track.

Social Security, the issue that dominated Bush's agenda a year ago, did not come up, they said.

These officials spoke on condition of anonymity, saying they were not authorized to speak publicly about the event.

The president's own support in the polls is in the neighborhood of only 40 percent, and some Republicans are concerned about the drag that might have on their ability to retain control of the House in the November elections.

When asked about polls, Bush responded that if he worried about them, "I would be in the fetal position right now, which wouldn't be a pretty sight," one participant said. Participants in the meeting said he then described his own role as that of "educator in chief" who travels the country discussing the war on terror and the economy, and he recommended GOP lawmakers do likewise.

According to those in the audience, he said policies he had advocated and Congress had approved had begun modernizing health care, and he cited laser eye surgery as an example of how competition can help lower costs.

White House aides had arranged for only the first few minutes of the session to be open to reporters. But an apparent mistake left a microphone on for longer than anticipated.

In the interim, he said, "I support the free press, let's just get them out of the room. ..."

"I want to share some thoughts with you before I answer your questions," he went on to the Republican House members. "First of all, I expect this conversation we're about to have to stay in the room. I know that's impossible in Washington."

He then moved to a defense of the NSA program that allows wiretaps without court warrants as part of certain terrorist investigations.

"I wake up every morning thinking about a future attack, and therefore, a lot of my thinking, and a lot of the decisions I make are based upon the attack that hurt us," Bush said.

Referring to the controversy surrounding whether the program is legal, he said, "We put constant checks on the program."

"I take my oath of office seriously. I swear to uphold the Constitution and laws of the United States," Bush said.

The Star Wars-style video was aired Thursday night, when Rep. Tom Reynolds of New York, chairman of the GOP campaign committee, briefed lawmakers on the party's midterm election prospects.

In comments to reporters on Friday, he conceded that historical trends and the polls portend difficulties. But he said Democrats must win 82 percent of the competitive seats on the ballot to gain a majority in November.

Ethics Scandals Cast Shadow On GOP Retreat (LAT)

By Richard Simon

The Los Angeles Times, February 11, 2006

CAMBRIDGE, Md. — "We are in trouble."

Rep. Paul D. Ryan (R-Wis.) made that comment a week ago, discussing his party's political fortunes. And his remark aptly summarized the attitude here Friday at a gathering of House Republicans.

In years past — especially since President Bush took office — these annual retreats have been celebratory affairs, with Republicans reveling in their success and plotting an aggressive legislative agenda.

This meeting, however, was marked by anxiety and uncertainty. The GOP House members, fresh from a leadership battle within their ranks, are divided over how the party should respond to ethics scandals roiling Capitol Hill.

DOJ_NMG_0014613

And with Bush having backed off his prime legislative goal of a year ago — restructuring Social Security — and promoting no programs of similar scope, some Republican lawmakers wonder whether they need an improved strategy for this fall's congressional elections.

For Bush, who spoke to the assemblage at a riverside resort on Maryland's Eastern Shore, the campaign message was clear. He urged his fellow Republicans to run on a record that included more tax reductions, more cuts to the federal budget and a tough stance in the war on terrorism.

"We've got a record, and it's a record of accomplishment," Bush said before a closed-door question-and-answer session.

But, as indicated by Ryan's comment, new poll results have raised questions among many Republicans about whether the public will embrace the president's message.

A survey conducted Feb. 1-5 showed that by 50% to 41%, the public favored a Democratic House. And 31% of those interviewed said they viewed November's vote as a chance to cast a ballot against Bush.

The poll, conducted by the Pew Research Center for the People and the Press, has an error margin of plus or minus 3 to 4 percentage points.

"House Republicans are at some risk of losing their majority," said John J. Pitney, a professor at Claremont McKenna College. "The Democrats don't need a huge tide. A few good ripples could do the trick."

Rep. Jack Kingston of Georgia, a midlevel House GOP leader, said that to stem Democratic advances, Republicans intended to spotlight issues that connected "with the American dinner table." These include extending tax cuts enacted during Bush's first term that are due to expire this decade, and addressing energy prices.

Another issue discussed at the retreat — but unlikely to be emphasized nationally — was immigration policy. Although most Republicans support tougher border controls, the party is riven over Bush's call for a guest-worker program.

The GOP meeting, which wraps up today, convened a week after House Republicans elected Rep. John A. Boehner of Ohio to succeed Rep. Tom DeLay of Texas as majority leader. DeLay left the post after he was indicted in his home state on money-laundering charges. In winning the race, Boehner upset a DeLay ally, Rep. Roy Blunt of Missouri.

Also shadowing the retreat were scandals involving former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Rancho Santa Fe), who resigned late last year after pleading guilty to bribery, and lobbyist Jack Abramoff, a once-close associate of several GOP congressional leaders who pleaded guilty in January to corruption charges stemming from his business activities.

In a sign of a new wariness toward influence-peddling, lobbyists — welcomed at previous retreats — were barred from the grounds this year.

Several measures have been proposed in Congress that would tighten the guidelines governing lawmakers' dealings with lobbyists. House Republicans, however, are split over how far to go, and no consensus was expected to emerge from the retreat.

Some back a ban on lawmaker trips paid for by interest groups. There also is a push to end the long-standing practice of allowing House and Senate members to insert pet projects into spending bills — items often included at the behest of lobbyists.

Both proposals have sparked dissent. The privately funded trips are popular among lawmakers, and some say that a ban could deprive lawmakers of valuable fact-finding opportunities or shift the costs for such travel to the taxpayers.

Boehner, in a break with House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), is among those who have questioned the proposed travel ban.

And Rep. Thomas M. Reynolds (R-N.Y.), typifying a view held by many of his colleagues, said Friday that projects added to spending bills could be among a lawmaker's strongest assets at reelection time.

A newspaper in his area, he said, "believes that I ought to be bringing home the bacon."

Pitney, of Claremont McKenna, expressed skepticism that approval of new ethics rules would significantly affect the outcome of November's election.

"No matter what passes, the Democrats will say that it's not enough," he said.

Pointing to complaints about the new Medicare prescription drug program, Pitney said Republicans instead should be "working like crazy" to fix those problems.

Reynolds, chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee, which helps House GOP candidates, dismissed the possible consequences of the cases involving Cunningham, DeLay and Abramoff (the latter's cooperation with federal investigators could cause legal woes for Republican lawmakers).

"I have never seen the actions of one member of Congress affect another member's outcome" in an election, Reynolds said.

Still, Reynolds said he was attempting to recruit Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), a champion of reform, to stump for House Republican candidates this fall.

DOJ_NMG_0014614

Bush, in his speech, urged unified GOP support for initiatives he outlined in his State of the Union address last week: big boosts in funding for science and math education, increased research aimed at making the U.S. more competitive in the global economy, and faster development of alternative energy sources to reduce U.S. dependence on Middle Eastern oil.

At the start of his question-and-answer period, in remarks heard by reporters when microphones were left on, Bush defended the secret spying program he authorized after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks. Some GOP senators have joined Democrats in questioning the legality of monitoring international phone calls and e-mails of people in the U.S. without obtaining court warrants.

Sept. 11 "changed the way I think," Bush said, echoing his previous comments on the issue. "I wake up every morning thinking about a future attack, and therefore, a lot of my thinking and a lot of the decisions I make are based upon the attack that hurt us."

Ryan, the Wisconsin congressman, on Friday sounded a more positive note about the party's direction than he had last week.

"With a new [House] leadership team and a clear recognition that reform is essential to upholding our principles, I see real renewal occurring that is healthy and positive," he said.

Bush Rallies Scandal-rocked Republicans (REU)

By Thomas Ferraro

Reuters, February 11, 2006

President Bush was closely questioned by fellow Republicans on his policy on Iran, health care, immigration and other hot-button issues on Friday at a closed meeting meant to rally party members for this year's congressional elections.

Sources at a retreat of the scandal-rocked Republicans in the House of Representatives said Bush drew an ovation when he defended his program to eavesdrop without court warrants on Americans with suspected terrorist ties, a program that has been questioned by both Democrats and some Republicans.

But the sources, who asked not to be named as the meeting was formally closed, said lawmakers, anxious over polls showing waning faith in them and the president, pressed him on issues that could be critical in the November elections.

Many members of the president's party have voiced concerns about the $2.77 trillion federal budget that Bush proposed this week, which would boost defense spending but bring cuts in 141 domestic programs, from veterans health care to housing.

In brief opening remarks, which were public, Bush cited what he said had been major House accomplishments in 2006, including passage of bills on energy, bankruptcy, immigration and the anti-terrorism USA Patriot Act.

"And we're ready to lead again," Bush told the second day of a three-day meeting of House Republicans in Cambridge, Md., a two-hour bus ride from Washington. "We don't fear the future because we're going to shape the future."

Many senior lawmakers have been drawn into an investigation of powerful Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff, who last month pleaded guilty to fraud and agreed to cooperate with investigators.

"GLITCHES" IN DRUGS PROGRAM

One Republican said Bush defended the new Medicare prescription drug program, whose introduction has drawn enormous criticism, saying, "When you enroll 26 million people into program in 30 days, there are going to be some glitches."

Many political analysts say public dissatisfaction over the ethics scandal, the Iraq war and other issues including health care, threatens the party's control of the House, which it has held since 1995.

Bush shrugged off the importance of opinion polls. One attendee at the meeting said he drew laughter by joking: "If I watched the poll numbers every day, I'd be lying in the fetal position. It wouldn't be a pretty sight." Bush said he acted on the basis of what he believes is right, not polls.

Bush again asserted that the domestic surveillance program was legal, and he drew support from House Speaker Dennis Hastert, who told reporters, "There are adequate protections."

"If somebody in this country, whether he is a foreign national or a citizen, is talking to al Qaeda somebody ought to know about it and know why it is happening," Hastert said.

House Republicans described their retreat as a chance to regroup and discuss their emerging legislative agenda, which they say will include lobbying and ethics reform.

The retreat was to end on Saturday after members and staff attend a seminar on the House's ethics rules. "I think it'll help ensure that members and staff live up to those rules," said House Majority Leader John Boehner of Ohio.

Boehner was elected House majority leader last week, replacing Rep. Tom DeLay, who was forced to step down from the leadership post last year after being indicted in his home state of Texas on campaign-related felony charges.

Bush Reveals Rationale Behind Surveillance (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0014615

By Jennifer Loven
AP, February 11, 2006

President Bush defended his warrantless eavesdropping program Friday, saying during what he thought were private remarks that he concluded that spying on Americans was necessary to fill a gap in the United States' security.

"I wake up every morning thinking about a future attack, and therefore, a lot of my thinking, and a lot of the decisions I make are based upon the attack that hurt us," Bush told the House Republican Caucus, which was in retreat at a luxury resort along the Choptank River on Maryland's Eastern Shore.

The president said he asked the National Security Agency to devise a way to gather intelligence on terrorists' potential activities, and the result was the super-secret spy outfit's program to monitor the international e-mails and phone calls of people inside the United States with suspected ties to terrorists overseas. Bush said lawyers in the White House and at the Justice Department signed off on the program's legality, and "we put constant checks on the program."

"I take my oath of office seriously. I swear to uphold the Constitution and laws of the United States," Bush said.

The president's comments on the NSA eavesdropping came after six minutes of remarks intended for public consumption. In them, Bush stroked lawmakers with thanks and gave a gentle push for his 2006 priorities in a scaled-back version of last month's State of the Union address.

"I'm looking forward to working with you. And I'm confident we'll continue the success we have had together," he said. "So I've come to say thanks for your hard work in the past and thanks for what we're going to do to make this country continue to be the greatest country on the face of the Earth."

He indirectly pressed his call — difficult in an election year — for Congress to approve $70 billion in savings from benefit programs such as Medicare, Medicaid, food stamps and payments to farmers over the next five years, and to cut dozens of other programs that the White House has determined don't produce results.

"It's hard work, to cut out and cut back on programs that don't work," Bush said. "Every program sounds beautiful in Washington, D.C. until you start analyzing the results."

Reporters then were ushered out — "I support the free press, let's just get them out of the room," Bush said — so the president could speak privately to his fellow Republicans.

"I want to share some thoughts with you before I answer your questions," said Bush, unaware that microphones were still on and were allowing those back in the White House press room to eavesdrop on his eavesdropping defense. "First of all, I expect this conversation we're about to have to stay in the room. I know that's impossible in Washington."

That was not to be — and it was telling that the president chose the controversial NSA program as the first topic to raise out of reporters' earshot. Even so, there was no substantive difference between those statements and the series of public speeches he has given recently on the program.

The eavesdropping program has come under fire from Republicans as well as Democrats. They argue that Bush already has the authority to monitor such communications through existing law that requires a warrant from a secret court set up to act quickly, or even after the fact. Bush has argued that the system isn't nimble enough.

The titular head of the Republican Party faced a House GOP Caucus in turmoil.

With most of Congress up for re-election in November, the House GOP is just off a bruising fight to replace former Majority Leader Tom DeLay, R-Texas, is grappling with reforming the time-honored congressional tradition of funding individual pet projects known as earmarks, and faces potentially damaging revelations in an ongoing public corruption investigation centered on a high-flying lobbyist with extensive ties to Republicans.

Though the lawmakers gave Bush a standing ovation and interrupted his remarks several times with applause, questions in the private setting typically are sharper than in public get-togethers.

White House press secretary Scott McClellan said that Bush kept his prepared remarks brief so that he would have extra time for the more freewheeling portion of the discussion, which went on for one hour and 40 minutes. Only the first few minutes of that — before any lawmakers' questions — were heard by reporters.

Bush Defends Spy Program In Speech At GOP Meeting (BSUN)

By Julie Hirschfeld Davis And Gwyneth K. Shaw
The Baltimore Sun, February 11, 2006

Budget, energy, education, health care also discussed at Md. retreat

CAMBRIDGE -- President Bush defended his warrantless eavesdropping program to House Republicans yesterday amid criticism by some in his own party, telling lawmakers the activities were legal and under constant review.

Bush described the National Security Agency wiretapping program as an outgrowth of his belief that "we must do everything in our power to protect the country," adding that he often thinks about the possibility of another terrorist attack.

His remarks came during what Bush intended to be a private session with about 180 Republicans gathered at a posh waterfront resort here for an annual agenda-setting retreat. But a technical glitch enabled reporters to hear the comments, which Bush opened by exhorting lawmakers to keep the discussion to themselves.

"I expect this conversation we're about to have to stay in the room. I know that's impossible in Washington," Bush said after reporters were escorted out of the ballroom where he spoke.

His off-camera defense of the eavesdropping program, which Democrats and some Republicans say should be subjected to court review, echoed Bush's public drive to rally support for it.

"September the 11th changed the way I think," Bush said. "I wake up every morning thinking about a future attack."

Bush argued that the eavesdropping, which tracks some communications inside the United States, passes legal muster.

"See, like you, I take my oath of office seriously. I swear to uphold the Constitution and laws of the United States," Bush said.

Bush spent more than 90 minutes in the closed-door session fielding questions from the members of Congress on such topics as energy policy and health care, as well as others that have divided the party, such as the NSA program and his immigration plan, a White House aide said.

Lawmakers, some in jeans or chinos as they relaxed with their families at the resort on the banks of the Choptank River, asked between 10 and 15 questions, one senior Republican aide estimated.

Bush was upbeat in his remarks to a Republican team struggling to regain its footing and protect its majority status amid ethics scandals and intraparty bickering.

The House Republicans swarmed around him for about a half-hour before he spoke, lining up with their children and spouses for handshakes and photographs.

In brief remarks before the news media representatives were ushered out, Bush urged the Republican House to enact an agenda of deep spending cuts, permanent tax cuts, tax breaks for private health care spending, alternative energy development, and improved math and science education.

Bush, whose sagging popularity could signal a problem for Republicans up for re-election this year, also acknowledged the difficulties they share.

"It's hard work to cut out and cut back on programs that don't work," he said during a six-minute speech packed with praise for the House members.

White House press secretary, Scott McClellan, said the president wanted to spend the bulk of his time answering Republicans' questions behind closed doors. McClellan added that Republicans "were very appreciative" that Bush spent "most of his time answering questions and talking about priorities that are most on the minds of the American people."

The president waited until he thought reporters were safely out of hearing range, however, before raising the NSA program, in a nod to its sensitivity and the party divisions it has exposed.

After Bush departed, Republican leaders told reporters he had left the House members optimistic about the year ahead.

"The president and the Congress share a very aggressive agenda," said House Speaker Dennis Hastert of Illinois.

Rep. John T. Doolittle of California said he was impressed with the detail and sophistication of Bush's remarks during a rare opportunity to see the president in a closed-door setting. He called it "the equivalent of a post-graduate seminar on world diplomacy."

One Republican aide who was present for the question-and-answer session described it as cordial, with some members offering glowing compliments before asking Bush a question.

Maryland's two Republican House members, Reps. Wayne T. Gilchrest and Roscoe G. Bartlett, did not attend the meeting. Gilchrest, whose district includes Cambridge, said he hoped to catch the closing session of the conference today at the Hyatt resort.

Hastert and other party leaders said Bush's appearance would help crystallize discussions held during the conference, which included a session with White House budget chief Joshua B. Bolten after Bush returned to Washington.

Fiscal conservatives are pressing the party to take major steps to curtail government spending, and Bush's $2.77 trillion budget for the fiscal year beginning in October has not been enthusiastically embraced on Capitol Hill.

The retreat will continue until this afternoon, weather permitting, with a scheduled discussion of proposed changes to the rules governing lawmakers' interactions with lobbyists. The scandal enveloping Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff has roiled Washington and prompted calls for reforms.

julie.davis@baltsun.com gwyneth.shaw@baltsun.com

Bush's Job Approval Stuck Near Bottom (AP)

By Will Lester

AP, February 11, 2006

President Bush's marks on overall job approval and for handling the economy are mired near their lowest levels despite a spike in consumer confidence over the past month, an AP-Ipsos poll found.

Bush's job approval is now at 40 percent and his approval on handling the economy at 39 percent. Those numbers haven't budged over the last month even with the public's confidence in the economy growing and the president delivering an upbeat State of the Union address.

Consumer confidence was measured at its highest level in 16 months in the RBC CASH index released Friday.

The AP-Ipsos poll found that the president has slightly improved his standing on handling foreign policy and terrorism to 47 percent. This comes as the public has grown more accepting of the administration's policy on domestic eavesdropping, with almost half now supporting it — up from 42 percent last month.

The president has been campaigning aggressively for that program over the last month, repeatedly telling people that eavesdropping on some international calls is legal and necessary in his war against terrorism.

The poll found low approval of Congress with 47 percent wanting Democrats to take control. Republican control was favored by 37 percent.

The telephone poll of 1,000 adults was conducted Monday through Wednesday and has a margin of error of plus or minus 3 percentage points.

Republican Speaks Up, Leading Others To Challenge Wiretaps (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, February 11, 2006

WASHINGTON, Feb. 10 — When Representative Heather A. Wilson broke ranks with President Bush on Tuesday to declare her "serious concerns" about domestic eavesdropping, she gave voice to what some fellow Republicans were thinking, if not saying.

Now they are speaking up — and growing louder.

In interviews over several days, Congressional Republicans have expressed growing doubts about the National Security Agency program to intercept international communications inside the United States without court warrants. A growing number of Republicans say the program appears to violate the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, the 1978 law that created a court to oversee such surveillance, and are calling for revamping the FISA law.

Ms. Wilson and at least six other Republican lawmakers are openly skeptical about Mr. Bush's assertion that he has the inherent authority to order the wiretaps and that Congress gave him the power to do so when it authorized him to use military force after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

The White House, in a turnabout, briefed the full House and Senate Intelligence Committee on the program this week, after Ms. Wilson, chairwoman of the subcommittee that oversees the N.S.A., had called for a full-scale Congressional investigation. But some Republicans say that is not enough.

"I don't think that's sufficient," Senator Susan Collins, Republican of Maine, said. "There is considerable concern about the administration's just citing the president's inherent authority or the authorization to go to war with Iraq as grounds for conducting this program. It's a stretch."

The criticism became apparent on Monday, when Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales was the sole witness before the Senate Judiciary Committee in a hearing on the legality of the eavesdropping. Mr. Gonzales faced tough questioning from 4 of the 10 Republicans on the panel, including its chairman, Senator Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania.

By week's end, after Ms. Wilson became the first Republican on either the House or the Senate Intelligence Committees to call for a Congressional inquiry, the critics had become a chorus. Senator Lisa Murkowski, Republican of Alaska, said the more she learned about the program, the more its "gray areas" concerned her.

Mr. Specter said he would draft legislation to put the issue in the hands of the intelligence surveillance court by having its judges rule on the constitutionality of the program.

Even Senator Orrin G. Hatch, the Utah Republican and Judiciary Committee member who has been a staunch supporter of the eavesdropping, said that although he did not think the law needed revising, Congress had to have more oversight.

"The administration has gone a long way in the last couple of days to assure people that this highly classified program is critical to the protection of the nation," Mr. Hatch said. "I think they've more than made a persuasive case. The real question is how do we have oversight?"

In part, the backlash is a symptom of Congressional muscle flexing; a sort of mutiny on Capitol Hill, where lawmakers have been frustrated by the way Mr. Bush boldly exercises his executive authority.

DOJ_NMG_0014618

Senator Lindsey Graham, Republican of South Carolina, who has also criticized the program, said Ms. Wilson's comments were "a sign of a growing movement" by lawmakers to reassert the power of the legislature.

"This is sort of a Marbury v. Madison moment between the executive and the legislative branch," Mr. Graham said in a reference to the 1803 Supreme Court decision in which the court granted itself the power to declare laws unconstitutional.

"I think there's two things going on," said Mr. Graham, a Judiciary Committee member. "There's an abandonment of you-broke-the-law rhetoric by the Democrats and a more questioning attitude about what the law should be by the Republicans. And that merges for a very healthy debate."

Senator Chuck Hagel, Republican of Nebraska, said: "I don't think anyone wants any kind of constitutional showdown over this. We want the president to succeed, but the fact is we are a coequal branch of government and we have serious oversight responsibilities."

The White House insists that there is no need to amend the law, a position that a spokeswoman, Dana Perino, restated on Friday. But Mr. Bush also made clear on Friday that he was tuned in to the growing Republican angst. At a retreat with House Republicans in Cambridge, Md., he began private remarks by defending the legality of the eavesdropping, a White House pool report said.

Apparently thinking that his microphone had been turned off so reporters could not hear, the president told lawmakers that he wanted to "share some thoughts with you" before answering questions.

"I expect this conversation we're about to have to stay in the room," Mr. Bush began. "I know that's impossible in Washington."

He restated what he had said publicly, that the program was legal and necessary for the nation's safety.

"You've got to understand something about me," Mr. Bush said. "Sept. 11 changed the way I think. I told the people exactly what I felt at the time, and I still feel it, and that is we must do everything in our power to protect the country."

Ms. Wilson later stood up to pose a question, and many in the room braced for a confrontation, said an attendee who insisted on anonymity because the session was private.

But there was no showdown. Ms. Wilson simply thanked Mr. Bush and told him that everyone wanted to catch the terrorists.

At the age of 45, Ms. Wilson has considerable credentials in national security. She is a graduate of the Air Force Academy and a former Air Force officer. A Rhodes Scholar, Ms. Wilson obtained a master's degree and doctorate in international relations. She also worked as an arms control negotiator for the National Security Council under the first President Bush.

"I think that had an impact on the administration," she said. "They knew that people in Congress would listen to me on this."

But Ms. Wilson, who represents a swing district in Albuquerque, also faces a tough re-election challenge from the attorney general of New Mexico, Patricia Madrid.

Representative Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, said Ms. Wilson was most likely distancing herself from the White House to curry favor back home.

Yet Representative Jane Harman of California, the senior Democrat on the Intelligence Committee, said Ms. Wilson expressed private concerns to her about the eavesdropping last year, shortly after it became public.

"She was very concerned," said Ms. Harman, who has supported the program in the past but said she now believed that its legal underpinnings were weak. "She came to me, asking me what I thought."

Ms. Wilson said she decided to speak out this week because she had become increasingly "frustrated that the administration was not giving us the information we needed to do our job." With Mr. Gonzales unable or unwilling to answer questions at the Senate hearing, she said, there was no way to determine whether the surveillance law needed to be updated.

"I think the argument that somehow, in passing the use-of-force resolution, that that was authorizing the president and the administration free rein to do whatever they wanted to do, so long as they tied it to the war on terror, was a bit of a stretch," she said. "And I don't think that's what most members of Congress felt they were doing."

White House Effort To Defuse GOP Qualms On Security May Isolate Democrats (KRT)

By James Kuhnhenn

Knight Ridder, February 11, 2006

WASHINGTON - Twice this week the White House gave ground on issues of national security to appease dissident Republican lawmakers, an uncharacteristic retreat for a president who believes that the best defense is a good offense.

First, the Bush administration agreed to brief the full House and Senate Intelligence Committees on its domestic surveillance program, after refusing to do so for years. Then White House officials compromised on civil-liberties concerns that had blocked renewal of the Patriot Act.

DOJ_NMG_0014619

The concessions yielded mixed results. The Patriot Act is now virtually assured of passage. But some Republicans still resist the secret domestic-surveillance program and insist on new legislation to resolve questions about whether it's constitutional.

The developments show that the White House can be forced to compromise even on national security when Republicans and Democrats demand it together. But they also demonstrate that if the White House can appease GOP dissidents, Democrats run the risk of being labeled soft on national security and may have to back down.

As both parties head into the 2006 congressional elections, the White House is trying to minimize divisions within the Republican Party. Democrats, meanwhile, are walking a fine line, supporting an aggressive stance against terrorism while calling for civil liberties protections.

For example, when Republicans announced Thursday that they'd brokered a Patriot Act deal with the White House, two of the Democratic Party's leaders, Sens. Harry Reid of Nevada and Richard Durbin of Illinois, welcomed the agreement as a positive step, even though many Democrats harbored reservations about it.

But Democrats continue to insist on an investigation into the domestic-spying program - with some calling the president's actions criminal - not least because they enjoy political cover from continued resistance to the program by some Republicans.

The White House welcomes the political fight.

"With an important election coming up, people need to know just how we view the most critical questions of national security," Vice President Dick Cheney told conservative activists this week.

In an interview with Knight Ridder on Friday, Reid took up the challenge.

"No matter what the president says about the American people supporting his absolute power to do whatever he wants in the fight against terrorism, that is not how the American people feel," the Senate Democratic leader said.

Polls indicate that the country is closely divided on the issue. The Pew Research Center for the People and the Press found this week that 54 percent believe it was proper for the government's secret National Security Agency to monitor calls and e-mails between U.S. residents and suspected terrorists without court warrants. Forty-three percent opposed it.

As a result, some Democrats aren't eager to fight President Bush on national security.

"The White House is defusing these issues among Republicans, but on the other hand they will use it as a wedge against Democrats," said Marshall Wittmann, an analyst at the centrist Democratic Leadership Council. "This issue will not be played with great subtlety come the fall. It will be, who do you want? The ACLU or the NSA to defend you?"

This week's congressional hearings kept Washington's focus on the spying program even as some Democrats tried to play up Republican lobbying scandals and cuts in Bush's budget.

Still, Reid said that Democrats wouldn't turn away from the debate over spying.

"People want the war on terrorism to be fought every way that they can. I agree with them," he said. "But there is no reason to do things that appear to be illegal and unconstitutional, as even Republicans say. We have significant support from the Republicans. ... These are real conservative Republicans saying slow down there."

Among the Republicans still raising questions about the program are Sens. Lindsey Graham of South Carolina, Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania and Mike DeWine of Ohio. In the House, Rep. Heather Wilson, R-N.M., a member of the House Intelligence Committee, pressed the White House to give her panel more details about the NSA program.

Even after the briefings, Republican critics didn't back down.

Specter said he'd propose legislation to require the program to be reviewed by the secret federal court that reviews government requests for warrants authorizing domestic spying.

DeWine said the intelligence committees need to continue oversight of the program, but he favors amending the law to let Bush continue.

"In an emergency, I believe the president of the United States has the authority to protect the American people," said DeWine. "After a certain period of time, it is right and prudent for the president to go to Congress to get specific statutory authorization to continue such a program. I think we, in all likelihood, have reached such a time."

RNC Chief Defends Domestic Wiretaps (WP)

By Dan Balz

The Washington Post, February 11, 2006

Mehlman Assails Democrats on Security Issues

Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman yesterday accused Democratic leaders of wanting to deny law enforcement officials the tools they need to defend against terrorism and criticized them for challenging President Bush's program of warrantless surveillance of potential terrorists.

DOJ_NMG_0014620

In a sharply worded speech to the Conservative Political Action Conference, Mehlman said Republicans do not question the patriotism of the opposition party leaders, but he added, "These are people we know love their country. The question is: Can they protect it?"

Citing national security, the federal judiciary and the economy, Mehlman said Americans will have clear choices in the 2006 election. He urged his audience of conservative activists to take the GOP message directly to friends and neighbors, rather than trusting major news organizations that he said have failed to understand the appeal of conservative ideas and leaders.

"We can't depend on the . . . mainstream media to do it for us," he said. "They got Ronald Reagan wrong, just like Democrats did, and they're still getting conservatives wrong."

Democrats have accused GOP leaders of trying to play politics with national security issues and have pointed out that the administration's covert surveillance program has even drawn challenges from some Republicans.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) spoke after Mehlman, and he promised that on June 5 he will bring to the floor a constitutional amendment to bar same-sex marriage, and pledged a May vote on eliminating the estate tax, items high on the conservative agenda.

Frist said the amendment is needed to protect the majority of Americans, whom he said oppose same-sex marriage, from "the whims of a few activist judges" who seek to "override the commonsense of the American people." He added, "When America's values are under attack, we need to act."

A similar amendment failed to win the necessary votes in 2004.

Frist charged the Democrats with being leaderless and in the back pocket of liberal constituency groups such as MoveOn.org, NARAL Pro-Choice America and People for the American Way.

Claiming credit for the confirmation of Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr., Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. and several conservative judges filibustered by Democrats in the previous Congress, Frist said Democrats were not speaking for their constituents when they opposed Alito. "It looked to me like they were speaking for those far-left, liberal interest groups," he said.

RNC Chief Slams Democrats (WT)

By Bill Sammon

The Washington Times, February 11, 2006

Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman yesterday ridiculed Democrats and the "mainstream media," but said Republicans must embrace reform in order to win the 2006 elections.

"One of the oldest lessons in history is that power corrupts," Mr. Mehlman warned in a speech to the Conservative Political Action Conference in Washington.

"And if we are to learn from that particular lesson of history, then we must take a stand, right here, right now, against corruption," he added. "We must remember that public service is a sacred trust, and we cannot allow it to be sullied by anyone -- Democrat or Republican."

The acknowledgement was an attempt to counter the Democratic charge that Republicans are immersed in a "culture of corruption." In recent months, Rep. Tom DeLay, Texas Republican, has been indicted and Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff, in a separate case, has pleaded guilty to corruption charges.

But Mr. Mehlman spent most of his speech excoriating Democrats and journalists. Less than a week after saying he detected "a lot of anger" in Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, Mr. Mehlman yesterday slammed the New York Democrat for advocating a rollback of President Bush's tax cuts.

"To support our troops in Iraq, guess how Hillary Clinton would pay for it?" he said. "Higher taxes."

Mr. Mehlman also went after House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat, and Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean for attacking the National Security Agency's (NSA) terrorist surveillance program.

"Do Nancy Pelosi and Howard Dean really think that when the NSA is listening in on terrorists planning attacks on America, they should hang up when those terrorists call their sleeper cells in the United States?" he said.

Mr. Mehlman also expressed incredulity that Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat, was "proud when he announced last year, and I quote, 'We killed the Patriot Act.' "

"We do not and we never should question these Democrat leaders' patriotism," he added. "But we do question their judgment and we do question their ability to keep the American people safe."

Mr. Mehlman took an even tougher line against the press, which has been highly critical of the surveillance program.

"The media calls this program 'domestic spying,' " he said. "This is the same mainstream media that called a story based on forged documents 'fake but accurate.' "

It was a slap at CBS News, which in September 2004 used forged documents to question President Bush's military record. The scandal forced Dan Rather from his anchor chair and resulted in the firing of CBS producer Mary Mapes, among others.

DOJ_NMG_0014621

"Between the time Ronald Reagan was elected and today, evening viewership of network news dropped from 52 million people to 29 million people," Mr. Mehlman said, drawing applause from his audience of mostly young conservatives. "During the same time daily newspaper readership has fallen from 67 percent to 52 percent.

"And our grass-roots efforts can fill the vacuum," he said. "The mainstream media just doesn't get it."

Republican Chief Outlines 2006 Strategy (AP)

By Barry Schweid

AP, February 11, 2006

Republican national chairman Ken Mehlman on Friday outlined a political strategy for 2006 to portray Democrats as too weak to protect the country and to bypass the mainstream media to spread the GOP message.

Speaking at the Conservative Political Action Conference, Mehlman roused the crowd at a Washington hotel to cheers as he told them President Bush had finally responded to decades of terrorist attacks.

"For a generation, terrorists learned they could make war on free nations without fear of war in return," Mehlman said, adding that Bush understood how to respond. "On Sept. 12, the terrorists got war in return."

Bush's stance on fighting terror is popular with participants in this annual meeting of hard-line conservatives from around the country and so are his federal court appointments.

But many at this national conference question the Bush administration's spending, deficits, immigration policies, prescription drug plan and increased use of federal power.

The GOP chief said such questioning is healthy for the Republican Party and the conservative movement.

John R. Bolton, the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, keynoted the conference dinner, sketching out the Bush administration's efforts to reform the U.N.

Bolton's targets included waste and abuse of peacekeeping operations reported by the U.N. itself that he said virtually matches in losses the amount the United States contributes to the operation.

He also condemned a "culture of anti-Semitism and anti-Israel" that he said was pervasive at the United Nations and includes offices that exist only as part of an anti-Israel network.

Turning to Iran, whose nuclear programs have been referred to the Security Council, for possible punitive action, Bolton said Iran should follow Libya's lead, which abandoned its pursuit of unconventional weapons and shipped the technology to a U.S. facility at Oak Ridge, Tenn. Bolton drew a laugh by saying the United States could find room at Oak Ridge for Iranian nuclear equipment, as well.

"Like Libya, they can come to the conclusion that their pursuit of nuclear weapons is more harmful than the elimination of the program," Bolton said.

The fight against terrorism is centered in Iraq, Mehlman said, and the only way to prevent terrorists from taking charge there is to stick it out and win.

He quoted Democratic chairman Howard Dean saying that the idea the United States can win in Iraq is wrong and reminded that Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass., accused American soldiers of "terrorizing women and children."

"Democratic leaders always seem to blame America first," Mehlman said, "especially when a Republican is in the White House."

Mehlman said the loss in popularity of the mainstream media — both the evening network news and daily newspapers — is an opportunity for conservatives. He pointed to the growing popularity of talk radio and blogging.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist told the group he plans to push for a Senate vote in May on the inheritance tax, called the "death tax" by conservatives. And he said he would push for a vote June 5 on "the marriage protection amendment" that seeks to amend the Constitution to define marriage as a union between a man and a woman.

___

Associated Press writer Will Lester contributed to this report.

House Republicans Search For Legislative Plan (WSJ)

By Brody Mullins

The Wall Street Journal, February 11, 2006

CAMBRIDGE, Md. -- House Republicans, after internal consultations and a pep talk from President Bush, say they haven't yet settled on their election-year legislative agenda.

Newly installed Republican Majority Leader John Boehner of Ohio said the House caucus must first "bring our team together" after recent setbacks before developing a plan for the year. Only then can Republicans figure out "where we are going," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0014622

During the party's three-day retreat here, private discussions focused on issues such as lowering taxes, reducing health-care costs, weaning the country off oil imports and bolstering homeland security. With the Justice Department investigation into lobbying and corruption, Republicans added ethics reform to their list.

Mr. Bush, citing 2005 accomplishments such as bankruptcy legislation and a new Central American trade pact, told members, "We're ready to lead again." But the modest tenor of his remarks, which included no ambitious calls to action like last year's Social Security initiative, underscored reduced expectations as the party strives to hold its majority in November elections.

"We know that this is going to be a short legislative year," said Rep. Deborah Pryce (R., Ohio), who organized the retreat.

Party leaders said they wouldn't have a detailed legislative plan for a few more weeks. The retreat "is not about coming out of here with a 10-point plan," Mr. Boehner said.

In fact, Republicans are still wrapping up work they expected to finish last year, including a two-year extension of President Bush's 15% tax rates on capital gains and dividends, and a renewal of the Patriot Act, which was passed after Sept. 11 to strengthen the government's antiterror powers. Last week, Republicans reached a breakthrough on the Patriot Act and inched closer to enacting a budget-reduction bill. Party leaders hope to clear the capital-gains bill by month's end, but obstacles remain.

Beyond those leftovers, Republicans may find it difficult to make progress on other issues. Not long after House Speaker Dennis Hastert of Illinois unveiled a lobbying-overhaul package, it received criticism from other party leaders. Mr. Boehner, now the No. 2 House Republican under Mr. Hastert, called some of the provisions, such as a ban on privately funded travel, "childish." When Republican leaders proposed banning former-lawmakers-turned-lobbyists from the House floor and gym, they came under fire from senior Republicans, including Financial Services Committee Chairman Michael Oxley of Ohio.

Further complicating the lobbying-overhaul issue, Republicans hope to add provisions to the bill that would ban so-called 527 organizations from spending money on political campaigns. That issue could draw fire from Democrats. Such organizations are typically funded by unions and wealthy liberals and often support Democratic candidates.

Other issues on the agenda for this year could be just as complicated. President Bush called for Republicans to approve legislation to permanently extend his 2001 tax cuts on individuals. But New York Republican Rep. Tom Reynolds, the chairman of the House Republicans' campaign arm and a member of the House tax-writing committee, said there is little chance that the bill could clear the Senate.

Write to Brody Mullins at brody.mullins@wsj.com1

Results Of Poll On Public Attitude On Bush (AP)

By The Associated Press

AP, February 11, 2006

The Associated Press-Ipsos poll on public attitudes about President Bush and Congress, conducted Feb. 6-8, is based on telephone interviews with 1,000 adults from all states except Alaska and Hawaii.

Results were weighted to represent the population by demographic factors such as age, sex, region, race and income.

No more than one time in 20 should chance variations in the sample cause the results to vary by more than plus or minus 3 percentage points from the answers that would be obtained if all Americans were polled.

There are other sources of potential error in polls, including the wording and order of questions. Results may not total 100 percent because of rounding. An X signifies less than 1 percent.

___

(Early January results are in parentheses)

1. Generally speaking, would you say things in this country are heading in the right direction, or are they off on the wrong track?

_Right direction, 35 percent (32)

_Wrong track, 61 percent (65)

_Not sure, 4 percent (3)

2. Overall, do you approve, disapprove or have mixed feelings about the way George W. Bush is handling his job as president?

_Approve, 40 percent (40)

_Disapprove, 57 percent (59)

_Mixed feelings, 2 percent (1)

_Not sure, X percent (X)

3. And when it comes to handling the economy, do you approve or disapprove or have mixed feelings about the way George W. Bush is handling that issue?

_Approve, 40 percent (39)

DOJ_NMG_0014623

_Disapprove, 58 percent (59)
_Mixed feelings, 2 percent (2)
4. And when it comes to domestic issues like health care, education and the environment, do you approve or disapprove or have mixed feelings about the way George W. Bush is handling that issue?
_Approve, 39 percent (35)
_Disapprove, 58 percent (62)
_Mixed feelings, 2 (2)
_Not sure, X percent (X)
5. When it comes to handling foreign policy issues and the war on terrorism, do you approve or disapprove or have mixed feelings about the way George W. Bush is handling that issue?
_Approve, 47 percent (44)
_Disapprove, 50 percent (54)
_Mixed feelings, 2 percent (1)
_Not sure, 1 percent (X)
6. When it comes to handling the situation in Iraq, do you approve or disapprove or have mixed feelings about the way George W. Bush is handling that issue?
_Approve, 38 percent (39)
_Disapprove, 60 percent (58)
_Mixed feelings, 1 percent (1)
_Not sure, 1 percent (X)
7. When it comes to Social Security, do you approve, disapprove or have mixed feelings about the way George W. Bush is handling that issue?
_Approve, 36 percent (35)
_Disapprove, 60 percent (60)
_Mixed feelings, 3 percent (2)
_Not sure, 1 percent (3)
8. Overall, do you approve, disapprove or have mixed feelings about the way Congress is handling its job?
_Approve, 35 percent (34)
_Disapprove, 61 percent (63)
_Mixed feelings, 2 percent (2)
_Not sure, 1 percent (1)
9. And if the election for Congress were held today, would you want to see the Republicans or Democrats win control of Congress?
_Republicans, 37 percent (36)
_Democrats, 47 percent (49)
_Neither (VOLUNTEERED), 13 percent (12)
_Not sure, 3 percent (3)
10. Should the Bush administration be required to get a warrant from a judge before monitoring phone and Internet communications between American citizens in the United States and suspected terrorists, or should the government be allowed to monitor such communications without getting a warrant?
_Should be required to get a warrant, 50 percent (56)
_Should be allowed to monitor without a warrant, 48 percent (42)
_Not sure, 2 percent (2)

Bob Barr, Bane Of The Right? (WP)

By Dana Milbank
The Washington Post, February 11, 2006
You could find just about everything at the annual Conservative Political Action Conference this week: the bumper sticker that says "Happiness is Hillary's face on a milk carton," the "Straight Pride" T-shirt, a ride on an F-22 Raptor simulator at the Lockheed exhibit, and beans from the Contra Cafe coffee company (slogan: "Wake up with freedom fighters").
As of midday yesterday, a silent auction netted $300 for lunch with activist Grover Norquist, $275 for a meal with the Heritage Foundation president and $1,000 for a hunting trip with the American Conservative Union chairman. But lunch with former congressman Bob Barr (R-Ga.), with an "estimated value" of $500, had a top bid of only $75 -- even with a signed copy of Barr's book, "The Meaning of Is," thrown in.

No surprise there. The former Clinton impeachment manager is the skunk at CPAC's party this year. He says President Bush is breaking the law by eavesdropping on U.S. citizens without warrants. And fellow conservatives, for the most part, don't want to hear it.

"You've heard of bear baiting? We're going to have, today, Barr baiting," R. Emmet Tyrell, a conservative publisher, announced as he introduced a debate Thursday between Barr and Viet Dinh, one of the authors of the USA Patriot Act.

"Are we losing our lodestar, which is the Bill of Rights?" Barr beseeched the several hundred conservatives at the Omni Shoreham in Woodley Park. "Are we in danger of putting allegiance to party ahead of allegiance to principle?"

Barr answered in the affirmative. "Do we truly remain a society that believes that . . . every president must abide by the law of this country?" he posed. "I, as a conservative, say yes. I hope you as conservatives say yes."

But nobody said anything in the deathly quiet audience. Barr merited only polite applause when he finished, and one man, Richard Sorcinelli, booed him loudly. "I can't believe I'm in a conservative hall listening to him say [Bush] is off course trying to defend the United States," Sorcinelli fumed.

Far more to this crowd's liking was Vice President Cheney, who stopped by CPAC late Thursday and suggested the surveillance program as a 2006 campaign issue. "With an important election coming up, people need to know just how we view the most critical questions of national security," he told the cheering crowd.

Dinh, now a Georgetown law professor, urged the CPAC faithful to carve out a Bush exception to their ideological principle of limited government. "The conservative movement has a healthy skepticism of governmental power, but at times, unfortunately, that healthy skepticism needs to yield," Dinh explained, invoking Osama bin Laden.

Dinh brought the crowd to a raucous ovation when he judged: "The threat to Americans' liberty today comes from al Qaeda and its associates and the people who would destroy America and her people, not the brave men and women who work to defend this country!"

It was the sort of tactic that has intimidated Democrats and the last few libertarian Republicans who question the program's legality. But Barr is not easily suppressed. During a 2002 Senate primary, he accidentally fired a pistol at a campaign event; at a charity event a decade earlier, he licked whipped cream from the chests of two women.

Barr wasn't going to get a lesson on patriotism from this young product of the Bush Justice Department. "That, folks, was a red herring," he announced. "This debate is very simple: It is a debate about whether or not we will remain a nation subject to and governed by the rule of law or the whim of men."

He invoked Goldwater and Reagan and even said he would support Bush's program if it had congressional support. But Barr was a prophet without honor in his own land. "Why does the FISA law trump the Constitution?" one woman demanded of him. "Why should a non-elected, non-briefed judge be able to veto our national security?"

Conservatives were sore that Barr put his disagreements with Bush in the pages of Time magazine. Another questioner scolded Barr for agreeing to introduce an Al Gore speech that was also sponsored by MoveOn.org. "I have nothing whatsoever to do with them," Barr pleaded.

Still, the old prosecutor managed to elicit a crucial concession from Dinh: that the administration's case for its program comes down to saying "Trust me."

"None of us can make a conclusive assessment as to the wisdom of that program and its legality," Dinh acknowledged, "without knowing the full operational details. I do trust the president when he asserts that he has reviewed it carefully and therefore is convinced that there is full legal authority."

The crowd was against him, but Barr, leaving the event, claimed the clear conscience of a conservative. "I just told them what they need to know," he said.

Barr elaborated on his conundrum. "It's difficult," he acknowledged. "It's not about sex, which was very easy to explain."

Love him or hate him, you have to give Barr high marks for consistency. "Whether it's a sitting president when I was an impeachment manager, or a Republican president who has taken liberties with adherence to the law, to me the standard is the same," he said.

And, besides, who cares about a little criticism?

"No more than normal," Barr reported.

Political researcher Zachary A. Goldfarb contributed to this report.

Oops! - Bush Unaware Mikes Were Still On (AP)

AP, February 11, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0014625

The eavesdropping tables were turned on President Bush on Friday. The president apparently believed he was speaking privately when he talked about listening in without a warrant on domestic communications with suspected al-Qaida terrorists overseas. But reporters were the ones doing the listening in this time.

The incident happened at a House Republican retreat. After six minutes of public remarks by the president, reporters were ushered out. "I support the free press, let's just get them out of the room," Bush said, intending to speak behind closed doors with fellow Republicans and take lawmakers' questions.

When reporters left, Bush spoke about the National Security Agency program that he authorized four years ago and which has drawn criticism from Democrats and Republicans alike.

However, the microphones stayed on for a few minutes. That allowed journalists back at the White House to eavesdrop on Bush's defense of the eavesdropping. His private statements were basically no different from what he's said in public.

"I want to share some thoughts with you before I answer your questions," Bush began. "First of all, I expect this conversation we're about to have to stay in the room. I know that's impossible in Washington."

He was right.

Smoking Dutch Cleanser (NYT)

By Maureen Dowd

The New York Times, February 11, 2006

Vice President Dick Cheney bitterly complains that national security leaks are endangering America. Unless, of course, he's doing the leaking, tapping Scooter Libby to reveal national security information to punish a political critic.

President Bush says he will not talk about specific security threats to America. Unless, of course, he needs to talk about a specific threat to Los Angeles to confuse the public and gain some cheap political advantage.

The White House says it has done everything possible to protect the homeland. Unless, of course, it hasn't. Then it can lie to hide the callous portrait of Incurious George in Crawford as New Orleans drowned.

The attorney general can claim that torture and warrantless wiretapping are legal, and can mislead Congress. Unless, of course, enough Republicans stand up and say, as Arlen Specter told The Washington Post, that if that lickspittle lawyer thinks all this is legal, "he's smoking Dutch Cleanser."

The president doesn't know the Indian Taker Jack Abramoff. Unless, of course, W. has met with him a dozen times, invited him to Crawford and joked with him about his kids.

The Bushies can continue to claim that the invasion of Iraq was justified because Saddam was a threat to our security. Unless, of course, he wasn't, and the Cheney cabal was simply abusing the trust of Americans to push a wild-eyed political scheme.

At the Bush White House, the mere evocation of the word "terror" justifies breaking any law, contravening any convention, despoiling any ideal, electing any Republican and brushing off any failure to govern.

Asked yesterday by Senator Susan Collins why the administration had reacted in slo-mo on Katrina, with "people dying, people waiting to be rescued," Michael Brown replied that if FEMA had declared that a terrorist had blown up the 17th Street Canal levee, "then everybody would have jumped all over that and been trying to do everything they could."

Instead of just going after the 9/11 fiends, as W. promised with his bullhorn, the president and Vice President Strangelove have cynically played the terror card to accrue power and sidestep blame. They have twisted our values, mismanaged crises, fueled fundamentalist successes and violence around the world, and magnified a clash of civilizations.

It used to take an Israeli incursion to inflame the Arab world. Now all it takes is a cartoon in Denmark.

W. and Vice have wasted hundreds of billions of dollars, turning Iraq into a terrorist training ground, leaving the 9/11 villains at large, and letting cronies and losers botch the job of homeland security.

Brownie, one of the biggest boneheads in U.S. history, considered the homeland security chief, Michael Chertoff, so useless that he deliberately didn't call him right away about the suffering in New Orleans.

"The culture was such that I didn't think that would have been effective and would have exacerbated the problem, quite frankly," Brownie told the Republican senator Bob Bennett, who called the statement "staggering." A telephone call to his boss, Brownie said, "would have wasted my time."

The doofus who frittered away lives e-mailing colleagues about being a "fashion god" and wondering how he looked on television may have just been engaged in self-protective spin. Or has the Homeland Security Department simply created another set of paralyzing turf battles?

The most dysfunctional man in government is calling the government dysfunctional.

W.'s sophomoric "Brownie, you're doing a heck of a job" line makes even Brownie cringe. "Unfortunately," the former FEMA chief complained, "he called me 'Brownie' at the wrong time. Thanks a lot, sir."

DOJ_NMG_0014626

In the new Foreign Affairs, Paul Pillar, who was a senior C.I.A. official overseeing Middle East intelligence assessments until October, says the obvious conclusion that should have been drawn from the intelligence on Iraq was that war was unnecessary. He says the White House "went to war without requesting — and evidently without being influenced by — any strategic-level intelligence assessments on any aspect of Iraq."

He calls the relationship between the intelligence community and the policy makers — you guessed it — politicized, damaged by bureaucratic rivalries and dysfunctional.

A final absurd junction of dysfunction was reached on Wednesday, when Republican Party leaders awarded Tom DeLay with a seat on the Appropriations subcommittee overseeing the Justice Department, which is investigating Jack Abramoff, including his connections to Tom DeLay.

Perfect.

Irresponsible Rhetoric, Again (WP)

The Washington Post, February 11, 2006

AMERICANS, OFTEN cynical about their political institutions and often for good reason, had cause last week to feel pretty good about their national legislature. On some tough policy challenges, Congress debated with seriousness, patriotism and some measure of bipartisanship. Senators came up with a compromise on the USA Patriot Act that, while not entirely satisfying to most, preserved the police powers the government says it needs while extending a bit more protection to civil liberties. They turned back an early effort to quash an asbestos relief bill that would replace a dysfunctional court process with a system designed to give sufferers of asbestos-related disease a real chance at relief. And senators and House members alike began exploring ways to evaluate President Bush's extralegal program of domestic surveillance and preserve the useful parts of it in a defensible legal framework.

So you might think this was what Vice President Cheney had in mind when he told a Republican crowd on Thursday night, in reference to the surveillance program, that "a debate is now underway. At the very least, this debate has clarified where all of us stand on the issue."

Unfortunately, though, Mr. Cheney wasn't celebrating the reasoned process that Congress belatedly has embarked on. Instead he was engaging in the administration's tired practice of trying to choke off debate by suggesting that anyone who disagrees with President Bush basically doesn't want to fight the war on terrorism. Some Democrats have their own brand of irresponsible rhetoric when it comes to criticizing the president's policies. But the administration has patented the practice of taking a complicated policy issue and turning it into a club for the coming campaign: "And with an important election coming up, people need to know just how we view the most critical questions of national security, and how we propose to defend the nation that all of us, Republicans and Democrats, love and are privileged to serve," Mr. Cheney told a cheering crowd at the Conservative Political Action Conference. "As always, the president has made his thinking absolutely clear to the citizens of this land: If there are people inside our country talking with al Qaeda, we want to know about it, because we will not sit back and wait to be hit again."

This might be a fair gibe if Mr. Cheney's political opponents were against knowing who's talking with al Qaeda. But they're not. Both the Democrats whom the vice president caricatures, and the Republicans who he does not acknowledge also have doubts about the program, support responsible surveillance policies. They are looking for ways to allow surveillance to take place within the boundaries of the Constitution -- which ultimately would strengthen the defense and law enforcement value of any overheard conversations. They may not succeed, and the bipartisan good sense in evidence this week may not last. But we hope they won't be deterred by the vice president's mischaracterization of what's happening.

Gov't Budget Surplus Hits $21B For Jan. (AP)

By Martin Crutsinger

AP, February 11, 2006

The federal government ran a $21 billion budget surplus last month, the best January showing in four years, as both spending and tax receipts set records for the month.

The Treasury Department said the government spent $209 billion last month, a record amount for January and up 7.9 percent from January 2005. Government tax receipts, however, also set a record for the month of $230 billion, up 13.7 percent from January 2005.

The faster growth in receipts than in spending pushed the suplus for the month to $21 billion, more than double the $8.6 billion surplus the government recorded in January 2005. It was the biggest January surplus since $43.7 billion in 2002.

For the first four months of the budget year that began on Oct. 1, the deficit totals $98.3 billion, an improvement of 10.2 percent from last year's pace when the deficit totaled $319 billion.

DOJ_NMG_0014627

The Bush administration on Monday estimated that the deficit for this year will hit a record in dollar terms of $423 billion, surpassing the old mark of $413 billion set in 2004. The administration blamed increased spending for hurricane relief and the costs of wars in Iraq and Afghanistan for the increase.

However, private economists believe the deficit, while up from last year, will be smaller than the administration's forecasts. Many forecasters are pegging this year's deficit at around $360 billion.

They note that the administration for the past two years has estimated a deficit for the current budget year that is significantly higher than other forecasts, allowing them to claim improvement at the end of the budget year.

President Bush has promised to cut the deficit in half by 2009, the year he will leave office. But that pledge is linked to a projected deficit of $521 billion for 2004 that never materialized.

Democrats Cry Foul Over Clerical Error In Bill (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, February 11, 2006

CAMBRIDGE, Md. -- The budget cut bill President Bush signed on Wednesday did not pass both the House and Senate in identical form, and House Democrats now say that means it is not legitimately a law.

Because of a clerical error, the version the House voted on had a different reimbursement time period in one section than the time period in the version that passed the Senate.

Rep. Charles B. Rangel of New York, the top Democrat on the Ways and Means Committee, called the law into question and sent a letter to House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, Illinois Republican, demanding a new vote on the bill.

"I don't yet know exactly what happened and who is at fault, but it is clear that the legislation signed by the president on Wednesday is not what actually passed the House of Representatives on February 1," Mr. Rangel wrote in his letter.

The bill was the $39 billion budget reductions measure that Republican leaders have touted as a start toward fiscal discipline, but which Democrats said damaged health care programs and student loans.

It passed the Senate 50-50 on Dec. 21, with Vice President Dick Cheney breaking the tie, and passed the House 216-214 on Feb. 1.

After the Senate voted on the bill, aides said, a Senate clerk inadvertently changed the length of time Medicare would reimburse for certain medical equipment to be rented from 13 months to 36 months.

Congressional Quarterly reported that staffers discovered the error before the House passed the bill, but did not disclose the mistake until this week.

After the House vote, a Senate clerk changed the length of time back to 13 months and sent the bill to Mr. Bush under the signatures of Mr. Hastert and Senate President Pro Tem Ted Stevens, Alaska Republican, the presiding officers of each chamber. The Senate passed a resolution stating they meant to say 13 months in the bill.

Democratic senators said they would not stand in the way of the measure becoming law, Senate aides said.

However, House Democrats want to force another vote on the bill, which would be the third time in three months House Republicans will have voted to cut Medicare -- even though each vote was on the same basic measure.

Liberal activists said they want the process to be as difficult as possible for Republicans.

Cara Morris Stern, spokeswoman for the Emergency Campaign for America's Priorities, said lawyers in the group are looking at a legal challenge to the measure.

She said Republicans face a dilemma of having to vote again or "open up their actions to a very public scrutiny of a House mired in conflict and abuse of power."

Asked about the issue before Democrats made their challenge yesterday, Mr. Hastert seemed uncertain about whether there will have to be another vote.

"They're trying to work it out, and we'll see what happens," he said.

The Constitution requires in Article I that bills must pass the House and Senate, and that means "in precisely the same form," according to several research papers done for the Congressional Research Service.

William Eskridge Jr., the John A. Garver Professor of Jurisprudence at Yale Law School, said there is no precedent in case law that governs the situation.

He said there is a good argument that the process violated constitutional mandates for how a bill becomes a law, and said judges could go either way on whether the bill was properly signed into law.

But Mr. Eskridge said judges probably would dismiss a challenge by arguing the dispute is a political question best left to the elected branches to sort out.

"Judges would differ on that if they ever got their teeth into it, but the real answer is it would not be what judges call justiciable," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0014628

Just-Passed Budget Bill May Be Challenged (AP)

By Andrew Taylor

AP, February 11, 2006

Opponents of a major budget bill just signed by President Bush are weighing a court challenge on the grounds that the measure is unconstitutional because it was amended after the House voted on it.

At issue is a provision involving the period of time the government pays to rent some types of durable medical equipment before medical suppliers transfer it to Medicare patients. The Senate voted for 13 months, as intended by Senate and House negotiators, but a Senate clerk erroneously put down 36 months in sending the bill back to the House for a final vote, and that's what the House approved Feb. 1.

By the time the bill was shipped to Bush, the number was back to 13 months as passed by the Senate but not the House.

The issue is arcane and technical, but the broader constitutional question is very simple. As anyone who passed high school civics knows, a bill can only become a law if the House and Senate pass it in identical form. That didn't happen in this case.

"That bill ... is actually not a properly enacted law," said Michael Gerhardt, a professor of constitutional law at the University of North Carolina School of Law. "It wouldn't surprise me if a court struck it down. That bill was not approved by the House."

"I don't yet know exactly what happened and who is at fault, but it is clear that the legislation signed by the president on Wednesday is not what actually passed the House of Representatives on February 1," said Rep. Charles Rangel, D-N.Y., the top Democrat on the House Ways and Means Committee.

Bush and his GOP allies on Capitol Hill consider the matter over.

But opponents of the bill are actively considering trying to get it struck down by the courts.

"There is a high probability that some legal action will be pursued," said Brad Woodhouse, spokesman for the Emergency Campaign for America's Priorities, a group of organizations opposing the budget bill, which contains $39 billion in cuts to Medicaid, Medicare, student loan subsidies and other programs. "Perhaps a temporary restraining order to stop the implementation and then broader legal action after that."

Legal experts say any court challenge would be on firm legal ground.

"Each house has to pass the whole law and the same law," said Alan Morrison, senior lecturer in law at Stanford University Law School. "This is a case where the Constitution is very clear."

Morrison was the lead attorney in the case to overturn the 1996 line item veto law, which was decided on the same elementary constitutional concept: that a law must pass the House and Senate in the same form and once signed by the president can only be changed by another law approved by all three parties.

The budget bill was one of the main accomplishments of Congress last year, as Republicans managed for the first time in eight years to take on the growth of federal benefit programs.

The measure blends modest cuts to Medicaid, Medicare and student loan subsidies with a renewal of the 1996 welfare reform bill and $10 billion in new revenues from auctioning television airwaves to wireless companies. There's also $1 billion in new spending to extend an income subsidy program for dairy farmers and a reprieve for physicians who had faced a 4 percent cut in Medicare fees.

Morrison said courts would take a dim view of the idea that it is OK for the Speaker of the House — who along with the Senate's President Pro Tempore signed the official copies of bills sent to the president — to endorse a bill that's different from what the House voted on. That could set a precedent that could be abused.

"It's not the mischief in this case that would cause the (Supreme) Court to be worried," Morrison said. "It's the next case or the case after that where there isn't a clerical mistake but there's an effort to deceive or change the result."

Recognizing the problem, the Senate on Wednesday passed a resolution just hours after Bush signed the bill confirming that the measure transmitted to the president was "deemed the true enrollment reflecting the intention of the Congress."

Legal experts, however, say the resolution doesn't solve the problem.

Even though Congress routinely passes so-called technical corrections bills fixing glitches in laws that it's already passed and even correcting bills before sending them to the White House, sending the president a bill that's passed House and Senate in different form just isn't done.

"I don't know that we've had a circumstance where the president may be signing a bill that one of the chambers didn't actually approve," said Gerhardt. "That's the unique wrinkle here."

If the law is struck down, Congress could go ahead and try to pass it again. But that would prove difficult since the spending cut plan advanced under fast-track budget rules that block Democrats from filibustering bills to death in the Senate.

DOJ_NMG_0014629

Bush's Budget Cuts Elderly Nutrition Plan (AP)

By Frederic J. Frommer

AP, February 11, 2006

The boxes arrive every month at churches, senior citizen centers and other sites for distribution to nearly a half-million poor elderly people. Each is stocked with a mix of nutritious foods such as cereal, peanut butter, fruit, vegetables and pasta. Sometimes volunteers deliver them right to people's homes.

Now President Bush wants to eliminate the program, one of 141 federal initiatives that his proposed new budget would scrap or cut dramatically. He is proposing to shift people in the Commodity Supplemental Food Program over to food stamps.

Defenders of the nutrition-in-a-box program say many elderly people are reluctant to sign up for food stamps, and, in any event, the commodity program often provides a more generous package.

"It really does come under the category, in the most extreme way, of balancing the budget on the backs of those who are most needy. And in this case we're not even balancing the budget," said Wisconsin Sen. Herb Kohl, the ranking Democrat on the Senate Appropriations agriculture subcommittee.

"I call it misplaced priorities. How do you justify doing something like this, while at the same time giving people like Herb Kohl huge tax cuts?" said Kohl, a multimillionaire.

The commodity program, run by the Agriculture Department, benefits mainly elderly people, although some new mothers and children also participate. The department wants to move recipients to food stamps in the fiscal year that begins Oct. 1. The program cost about $111 million this fiscal year, including a $4 million supplement for victims of Hurricane Katrina.

The program, which dates back to 1968, operates in 32 states and the District of Columbia.

Its lack of national reach is one reason the administration wants to eliminate it, according to USDA officials.

Kate Coler, the USDA's deputy undersecretary for Food, Nutrition and Consumer Services, said the department believes it can serve people more efficiently through food stamps and the Women, Infants and Children program, which are both nationwide.

"It's really a duplicative program," she said of CSFP.

But Tim Robertson, president of the National CSFP Association, which represents state and local organizations that administer the program, challenged the USDA's premise that people will switch over to food stamps.

"Seniors have repeatedly said they don't want to be on that program," Robertson said, because of the perceived stigma of using food stamps and the paperwork hassles.

The USDA's own statistics show that just 28 percent of seniors eligible for food stamps participate in the program.

Sherrie Tussler, executive director of the Hunger Task Force, which administers the program in Milwaukee, said the commodity program helps elderly people stretch their food-buying budget.

"Sometimes seniors are choosing between utility bills and prescription drugs and whether they get to eat," she said.

The Bush administration is proposing to provide CSFP beneficiaries with transitional food stamp benefits of $20 a month for six months, or until they are deemed eligible for food stamps, whichever comes first.

Sarah Mayek, 75, of Milwaukee, receives both the CSFP box and $10 a month for food stamps.

"You try to stretch your budget a little bit," Mayek said. Without CSFP, she said, "I would have to adjust. But I raised 11 children. I know how to cut corners."

Jean Daniel, a spokeswoman for the USDA's Food and Nutrition Service, said her agency is working to remove the perceived stigma. For example, she said, the agency is getting the word out that food stamp payments are now made by an electronic transfer card, not actual stamps.

"We try to make the point that this is not a welfare program, this is a nutritional assistance program," she said.

____

Associated Press Food and Farm Writer Libby Quaid contributed to this story.

New House Leader Seeks To Rebuild Unity (AP)

By David Espo

AP, February 11, 2006

House Republicans are on retreat on Maryland's peaceful Eastern Shore, seeking what newly elected Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, describes as "renewal and rebuilding" after a tough stretch in the Capitol.

Yet like a lot of vacationers, they've brought their problems with them.

Some are the product of the calendar, others more of their own making.

DOJ_NMG_0014630

A controversy over earmarks — the congressional name for funding pet projects — is particularly intense. Especially since one GOP-led committee compiled a secret tally sheet showing earmark requests made by Republicans calling for reform.

"Earmarks have become the currency of corruption," Rep. Jeff Flake, R-Ariz., recently wrote Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill. "We can't allow this to continue."

High on the list of challenges for the GOP is the annual drafting of a budget. President Bush's appearance on Friday's program was a reminder that he's calling for $70 billion in savings over five years from benefit programs such as Medicare, Medicaid, food stamps and payments to farmers.

Then there's the shadow of scandal, which in recent months has pushed Texas Rep. Tom DeLay from the leadership, Ohio Rep. Bob Ney from his committee chairmanship and California Rep. Randy Cunningham from Congress after a confession of bribe-taking. All are Republicans.

New York Rep. Tom Reynolds, the chairman of the GOP campaign committee, noted at a news conference that "2006 is also an election year."

A few hours later he provided a political briefing for the rank and file, a presentation that participants said later had lampooned Democratic leaders as Darth Vader and other "Star Wars" characters.

Internal divisions also have surfaced at a time Republicans — their poll numbers sagging — try to reclaim the mantle of reform that helped them win the majority more than a decade ago.

Fiscal conservatives are particularly determined to cut back on earmarks.

The practice, an old one, has mushroomed in recent years under Republican sponsorship, and the legislation backed by Flake and numerous other lawmakers is designed to trim it.

The measure would preserve the existence of earmarks, but for the first time allow critics to challenge them one by one on the House floor.

Flake, who issues a stream of news releases accusing his fellow lawmakers of wasteful spending, says the purpose is transparency in government. The theory is that forcing lawmakers to defend projects will expose them to ridicule and, eventually, the practice will ebb.

So far, the legislation has sparked an intense internal struggle pitting Republican against Republican.

The committee that controls the pursestrings compiled a list of earmarks requested last year by GOP lawmakers who favor Flake's bill.

The total was 717 requested earmarks, although none for Flake, for more than $4.5 billion.

The response was sharp.

"I am shocked that the Republican staff of a Republican-led committee in a Republican-majority Congress would do opposition research on a fellow Republican," first-term Rep. Lynn Westmoreland of Georgia wrote in a letter to fellow GOP lawmakers. "I do not see any other purpose behind the preparation of this report other than for it to be leaked to the press."

The Associated Press obtained copies of both the Appropriations Committee tally and the letter.

By committee count, Westmoreland requested 59 earmarks last year, for a total of $536 million. His office declined to release the entire list of projects he requested.

Spokesman Brian Robinson said that until the current system is changed, "we have to play by the rules that are in place — that's only fair to our constituents. Members don't release their request lists. We've released more than most would simply by saying that we sent the committee only 43 percent of the requests that came to our office."

Flake, in an interview, likened the tally sheet to a type of blackmail on the part of members of the House Appropriations Committee. Rank and file lawmakers are required to submit their requests in writing, thus creating a paper trail, he said. No such requirement is imposed on senior lawmakers, he added, including subcommittee chairmen with the power to insert or omit individual projects from the bills they draft.

"It is no coincidence that the growth of earmarks has paralleled the monstrous increase in overall federal spending," he wrote recently in The New York Times.

Or that the subject is on the agenda for the Republican retreat.

___

EDITOR'S NOTE — David Espo is chief congressional correspondent for The Associated Press.

Ethics Scandal Looms Over Republicans' Meeting (REU)

By Thomas Ferraro

Reuters, February 11, 2006

Republicans in the House of Representatives, rocked by ethics scandals, met in a secluded Maryland town on Thursday, hoping to regroup under new leadership and position themselves to retain power in November's elections.

DOJ_NMG_0014631

A week after electing Rep. John Boehner of Ohio as majority leader to succeed indicted Texan Tom DeLay, Republicans opened a three-day retreat at a time when public opinion polls show broad discontent with Congress and the White House.

"I'm going to tell them they face challenges and opportunities," Republican Party Chairman Ken Mehlman said shortly before addressing the gathering at a waterfront hotel in Cambridge, a two-hour drive from Washington.

"I'm going to tell them that the public clearly wants reform -- that the public believes that the country needs to continue reforming things if we are going to be on the right track," Mehlman told reporters, referring to lobbying practices on Capitol Hill and such basics as health care, education and national security.

Lobbying scandals and Justice Department investigations involving Republican lawmakers and former aides threaten the party's control of the House, which it has held since 1995.

Boehner said the retreat would allow for a "period of renewal" and bonding. He said it would take time to unite his 231-member caucus on a lobbying reform package, one that party leaders said would seek input from Democrats.

"We're going to have, frankly, an ethics seminar for all our members and staff so that they know what the rules are, and I think it'll help ensure that members and staff live up to those rules," Boehner said.

REFORM OR OVERHAUL?

In the wake of a scandal involving Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff, Boehner has called for more public disclosure of the relationships between lawmakers and lobbyists rather than a fundamental overhaul of the way Congress does business.

Unlike some of his colleagues, he is opposed to abolishing "earmark" spending for pet projects, urging instead more transparency.

A number of Republicans have been drawn into the investigation of Abramoff, who pleaded guilty last month to fraud charges and agreed to help prosecutors in their corruption probe.

Separately, Republican Randy Cunningham of California resigned from the House in November after pleading guilty to taking $2.4 million in bribes in exchange for help in securing Defense Department contracts.

Boehner was the surprise winner of a House Republican leadership election last week, defeating Roy Blunt of Missouri. DeLay was forced to step down as majority leader last year after he was indicted in Texas on campaign-related felony charges.

President George W. Bush was scheduled to address House Republicans on Friday. Bush was expected to focus on his $2.77 trillion proposed federal budget that would boost defense spending, slow Medicare's growth and cut domestic programs in an effort to soothe Republican frustrations over high deficits.

(Additional reporting by Richard Cowan)

A Wink And A Nod For Lobbying Reform (NYT)

The New York Times, February 11, 2006

A long string of scandals has raised questions about whether Capitol Hill is really run by the lawmakers or the lobbyists. The public has a right to expect reform, but so far the only sign of change is a new House majority leader — John Boehner of Ohio, a polished veteran of the big-money nexus who even pays his D.C. rent to a lobbyist-landlord.

Mr. Boehner has been shockingly blasé about the need for Housecleaning. He's been signaling anxious colleagues that the whole issue should be directed toward the ultimate dead-letter office: the House ethics committee. This is the watchdog that was effectively put to sleep in the Tom DeLay era.

Other lawmakers are more properly alarmed and are proposing to graft some ethical spine onto Congress. In the Senate, Barack Obama of Illinois has proposed an ethics enforcement commission of former lawmakers and judges. That sparked a fit of pique from Senator John McCain, who seems to regard reform as private territory on which no freshman Democrat may trespass. Mr. McCain wants to zero in on "earmarking," the lawmakers' addiction to passing billions in hidden pork projects at the behest of lobbyists. There should be plenty of room for both ideas, and the two senators' developing rivalry for reform — already dubbed the "McBama" dynamic — is exactly the energy level Congress needs.

A worthwhile bipartisan proposal is expected next week from Representative Christopher Shays, Republican of Connecticut, and Martin Meehan, Democrat of Massachusetts. They want to create an office of public integrity to enforce stronger ethics and lobbying regulations in both houses. It would be staffed by nonpartisan professionals empowered to investigate and pursue complaints of impropriety from outside Congress and within it.

Easy money from special pleaders is at the heart of Congress's dilemma. A major bipartisan push from below is the only possibility of dragging leaders like Mr. Boehner to credible reform.

Censorship Is Alleged At NOAA (WP)

By Juliet Eilperin

The Washington Post, February 11, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0014632

Scientists Afraid to Speak Out, NASA Climate Expert Reports

NEW YORK, Feb. 10 -- James E. Hansen, the NASA climate scientist who sparked an uproar last month by accusing the Bush administration of keeping scientific information from reaching the public, said Friday that officials at the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration are also muzzling researchers who study global warming.

Hansen, speaking in a panel discussion about science and the environment before a packed audience at the New School university, said that while he hopes his own agency will soon adopt a more open policy, NOAA insists on having "a minder" monitor its scientists when they discuss their findings with journalists.

"It seems more like Nazi Germany or the Soviet Union than the United States," said Hansen, prompting a round of applause from the audience. He added that while NOAA officials said they maintain the policy for their scientists' protection, "if you buy that one please see me at the break, because there's a bridge down the street I'd like to sell you."

NOAA Administrator Conrad C. Lautenbacher denied Hansen's charges, saying his agency requires its scientists to tell its press office about contacts with journalists but does not monitor their communications.

"My policy since I've been here is to have a free and open organization," Lautenbacher said. I encourage scientists to conduct peer-reviewed research and provide the honest results of those findings. I stand up for their right to say what they want."

Hansen prefaced his speech, which focused largely on how quickly humans must act in order to prevent irreversible climate change, by saying he was speaking as an individual. "I'm not speaking for the agency or the government," he said.

Most scientists who study climate change have concluded that Earth's current warming is being driven by the burning of fossil fuels. The administration does not question the link between human activity and climate change, but it has called for more research and supports solutions other than mandatory limits on carbon emissions.

After the panel discussion -- which also featured Princeton University professor Michael Oppenheimer, American Enterprise Institute fellow Steven Hayward and Stanford University professor Paul Ehrlich -- Hansen said he knows of NOAA scientists who are chafing at the administration's restrictions but are afraid to speak out.

New School President Bob Kerrey, a former Democratic senator from Nebraska, said he invited Hansen to speak because he was "very concerned" about what he called the administration's efforts to steer the debate over global warming: "It's not only inappropriate; it stifles the very debate we're trying to have today, and that we need to have on this issue."

Kerrey said of Hansen, "He's not a radical; he's a scientist who's studied the issue. Let the disagreement occur without stifling one side of the argument."

After Hansen told the New York Times and The Washington Post in late January that political appointees at NASA had made it hard for him and other researchers to convey their findings on climate change to the public, NASA Administrator Michael D. Griffin e-mailed agency employees last week and vowed to support "scientific openness."

Griffin, who had been chastised by House Science Committee Chairman Sherwood L. Boehlert (R-N.Y.) over the issue earlier in the week, said he would draft a new policy that would respect scientists' right to speak out.

In an interview Friday, Boehlert -- who has met personally with Griffin and spoken on the phone with him several times since the controversy erupted last month -- said he was satisfied Griffin was taking the necessary steps.

"The administration should make it abundantly clear, as Michael Griffin did in his letter to NASA employees, that there will be no effort, in any way, shape or form, deliberate or hinted at, that would stifle a respected scientist working for the government, doing research paid for by the American taxpayers, from talking about their work," Boehlert said.

He added that he had not received "outpourings from the scientific community" alleging government censorship and that, to his knowledge, "there are no plans in place to intimidate or stifle science."

Also Friday, George C. Deutsch, 24, a NASA spokesman who resigned this week after allegations that he had edited scientists' writings to conform to administration views and tried to limit reporters' access to Hansen, e-mailed reporters to say there is a "culture war" in the government over climate change. Deutsch's resignation came after it was learned he had not graduated from Texas A&M University, as he claimed on his résumé.

"There is no pressure or mandate, from the Bush administration or elsewhere, to alter or water down scientific data at NASA, period," Deutsch said, adding that after being tasked to work with Hansen, "I quickly learned one thing: Dr. Hansen and his supporters have a very partisan agenda and ties reaching to the top of the Democratic Party.

"Anyone perceived to be a Republican, a Bush supporter or a Christian is singled out and labeled a threat to their views. I encourage anyone interested in this story to consider the other side, to consider Dr. Hansen' s true motivations and to consider the dangerous implications of only hearing out one side of the global warming debate," Deutsch said.

And On The Eighth Day, God Went Green (NYT)

By John Tierney

The New York Times, February 11, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0014633

And on the eighth day, God said, Let there be a thermostat for the heavens and the earth, and God saw that it was good. And God said, Let no man adjust it more than 2 degrees Fahrenheit, or 1 degree Celsius, until the end of time.

Now that evangelical Christians have joined the battle against global warming, we may as well acknowledge that America has one truly national religion: environmentalism.

Its tenets, already taken for granted in the blue states, were embraced this week by the Christian leaders who formed the Evangelical Climate Initiative. They haven't yet rewritten Genesis, but their advertising campaign warns of "millions of deaths" from biblical scourges — floods, droughts, pestilence — unless humans make a "sacred commitment" to stop global warming.

It may look odd for evangelicals to be taking up Hollywood's most fashionable cause, but the alliance makes perfect sense. Environmentalism has always fundamentally been a religion — "Calvinism minus God," in the words of Robert Nelson, a professor of environmental policy at the University of Maryland. He calls the global warming debate the latest example of environmentalist creationism.

The Puritans and other Calvinists believed that God was revealed not just in Scripture but also in the "Book of Nature." To them, the wilderness was an unchanged record of God's handiwork at "the Creation," offering a glimpse of the world before man's pride and sinfulness alienated him from nature and caused him to be expelled from Eden.

Environmentalists have had similar notions, starting with John Muir, who considered nature "a mirror reflecting the Creator." Al Gore urged the "moral courage" to secure "our place within creation." When Bruce Babbitt was secretary of the interior, he called plants and animals "a direct reflector of divinity," and he warned Americans not to "recklessly destroy the patterns of creation."

There is one large problem with this version of creationism. The world we see was not created in a week, and it has looked a lot different in the past.

The forests that seemed divine to the Puritans and to Muir and Babbitt were not present at the Creation. They were merely the latest adaptation to changing climatic conditions and competition with other species, including humans — Indians had been managing the forests by cutting trees and setting fires. There is no such thing as a "natural" forest in America, Nelson writes, unless you reject creationism and define nature as "the Darwinian vision of unremitting struggle for survival."

Darwin's Book of Nature isn't as morally satisfying as Calvin's, at least not for those who enjoy berating Americans for their sinful desires to cut down trees and burn fossil fuels. But it does make for a clearer way to think about global warming. Instead of assuming that humans will be punished for tinkering with God's handiwork, you can consider the best strategy for our species' survival.

That means rejecting the assumption that we must immediately start atoning for our excesses. Solutions like the Kyoto treaty amount to expensive hair shirts that appeal to penitents but not necessarily to economists. Even economists who support the Kyoto treaty acknowledge that it will make only a small difference far in the future while imposing serious costs today.

And those costs seem too high to other economists, like the four Nobel laureates and their colleagues who met in Copenhagen in 2004 to study proposals to help the world's poor. The Copenhagen Consensus, as they called it, was that programs to slow global warming are one of the worst investments — far less worthwhile than programs to immediately combat disease and improve drinking water and sanitation.

Saving lives now makes more sense than spending large sums to avert biblical punishments that may never come. Scientists agree that the planet seems to be warming, but their models are so crude that they're unsure about how much it will heat up or how much damage will be done. There's a chance the warming could be mild enough to produce net benefits.

For now, the best strategy is to refine the forecasts and look for the cheapest and least painful ways to counteract global warming, including heretical ideas like geo-engineering schemes to cool the planet by blocking sunlight. It's hard today to imagine how that would be done — or how environmentalists would ever allow something so "unnatural." But maybe they could be convinced that we're just resetting God's thermostat back to the eighth day of Creation.

No Regrets For Miers (DMN)

By G. Robert Hillman

The Dallas Morning News, February 11, 2006

WASHINGTON – For Harriet Miers, her ill-fated nomination to the U.S. Supreme Court seems so long ago.

Even now, four months after President Bush turned to her, she isn't sure exactly how it came to be. Nor does she have any regrets about accepting the offer that faltered in a storm of opposition by conservatives within the Republican Party.

"There was a lot of noise," Ms. Miers acknowledged Thursday in her first interview since the nomination. "But there were also a lot of great moments."

Would she accept again?

DOJ_NMG_0014634

"I not only would say 'yes' when called to this nature of service," said Ms. Miers, the top White House lawyer. "But I would recommend it to others, and I have."

By nearly any measure, though, it was tough sledding for the Dallas lawyer who followed Mr. Bush to the White House in 2001.

Previously, she had been the first woman to head the Texas and Dallas bar associations and had served one term on the Dallas City Council. But she had backed a few Democrats and had never been a judge, leaving some leading conservatives complaining about a lack of a legal paper trail that could use to rally support for her.

Also, many conservatives were unconvinced that she staunchly opposed abortion rights. She was quickly branded a crony because of her longtime legal work for Mr. Bush and his campaigns. And she was pilloried on late-night television and in newspaper editorial pages.

"I didn't see a lot of it," Ms. Miers said, sitting at the head of the conference table in her wood-paneled West Wing White House office.

"We tell nominees not to pay attention," she explained, referring to the instructions she routinely gives others, "and I did my best to do the same."

She regrets, however, that "things that were being said about me made my brothers upset, or friends upset or whatever."

"But we understood it was a battle worth fighting," she said, "and that's what we were doing."

Ms. Miers allowed that "you always feel bad if you're the reason other people are having to spend time ... time that you know they have very important work to do."

"The process is very time consuming, both for the nominee and for those working with the nominee," she said.

As White House counsel, Ms. Miers manages the search and vetting of judicial nominees, including those for the Supreme Court. She was very much involved with the confirmation of John Roberts as chief justice and, later, her successor nominee, Samuel Alito.

He was confirmed by the Senate just last week, and there's already a picture of his ceremonial swearing in at the White House waiting to be hung in her outer office.

Even now, Ms. Miers continues updating the lists of potential nominees, among the pressing duties and issues that pass over her desk. They also include dealing with recent swirling controversy over the president's authorization of warrantless electronic surveillance of some Americans believed linked to terrorists.

Obviously, she acknowledged, it's become a "matter of great attention."

With Bush from start

Ms. Miers came to the White House with Mr. Bush at the start of his first term as staff secretary, a senior aide who manages the never-ending flow of paper to the president and other matters. Later, she moved up to deputy chief of staff for policy, then a year ago to White House counsel.

On Oct. 3, the president tapped her to replace retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. Ms. Miers withdrew her nomination on Oct. 27 and, as she put it, "went right back to work" as the president's top lawyer.

Asked if she planned on staying through the president's second term, Ms. Miers replied in her well-honed, soft-spoken legal way: "We serve at the pleasure of the president."

Texas in her future?

Right now, she said, she envisions returning to Texas after leaving the White House, perhaps heading back into private legal practice. And she would not flatly rule out running again for public office.

"As a lawyer, I've learned never to say never," Ms. Miers said, making it clear, though, that she was not now contemplating any such run.

Asked if she might someday succeed Chief of Staff Andrew Card, who is in his sixth year at the White House, she simply praised him and said she looked forward to working with him.

Looking back on her nomination, which she said now seems "a very long time ago," Ms. Miers said she didn't learn until very late in the search that she was under consideration for the high court.

"I'm not even sure that I could recall," she said. "It sort of became apparent to me that I was being asked questions, or that it was a possibility."

"I am not aware of what happened, exactly how it happened, or who was involved," she said.

In any case, in short order, Mr. Card, who had asked one of her deputies to quietly check into Ms. Miers' background, clued her in, and the president discussed the job with her.

She said she had "some time," but "not a whole lot" to ponder the possibility and from the start took it quite seriously.

"I think that if you're called to serve your nation in a role like the Supreme Court," Ms. Miers said, "the answer should be yes, unless there are very good reasons why not."

DOJ_NMG_0014635

Asked if she had particularly weighed the possibility because she would be replacing one of two women on the high court, Ms. Miers said, "I'm a lawyer, and I looked at this as a lawyer being asked to serve on the court."

She also dismissed the scathing criticism that she was unqualified.

"I said 'yes,' to the request to be considered," Ms. Miers said. "I recognize that my background was somewhat different than lots of members of the court presently serving – however, not so different from others who have served.

"I came from a background as a practicing lawyer, from public service and community service and growing up in an American experience of the sort I lived," she said. "And that type of background brings a dimension to the court that is important."

Others, she noted, made the "judgment of the kind of person they were looking for, the kinds of qualities that they were looking for, the kind of experience that they were looking for."

"The decision to nominate me was not mine," she said, adding later: "It's the president's choice."

She had stepped aside, she said, "at the right time for the right reasons," citing senators' inquiries about her work for the president, which she said was protected by executive privilege.

"It had been made very clear to me that there were going to be requests that I knew no executive officer would have any business producing," she said. "It was too great an issue."

In defense of SMU

She also defended her Dallas alma mater, Southern Methodist University, against criticism during the confirmation process that its law school was no Ivy League institution.

"I'm grateful to the school for the education that they gave me," she said, noting that SMU had helped her financially when she faced dropping out to help support her family after her father was disabled by a stroke.

"I'm proud of the contribution the school makes through its undergraduate and graduate school," Ms. Miers said.

And, she said, she was heartened by the all the friends and acquaintances, some of them out of touch for years, who had rallied around her in what she called the "great moments" of her grueling ordeal.

"I had an opportunity to become reacquainted with people that, at different points in my life, meant a lot to me," Ms. Miers said. "It helped me underscore what it's like to be a lawyer and why you're a lawyer and the role lawyers play, both in the profession and in the community."

Roberts Off To Quiet Start At Court (AP)

By Gina Holland

AP, February 11, 2006

So far, Chief Justice John Roberts has led a harmonious Supreme Court, rallying colleagues to settle cases in the most limited, least controversial way. The question is whether that will last or has been just a short-term necessity for a changing court.

The first few months of Roberts' tenure have not been short on divisive issues: assisted suicide, abortion, capital punishment.

But cases decided so far have broken little new ground, and there have been no bitter dissents.

Of the court's 18 authored opinions so far, only two came from 5-4 votes. And three cases that were expected to split the court — on abortion, campaign finance and the rights of disabled inmates — were resolved unanimously without setting important precedent.

"One almost wonders why the court took the cases in the first place," Richard Pildes, a constitutional law professor at New York University, wrote online as he and other court watchers struggled over what to make of the early days of the Roberts era.

One explanation is the retirement of Sandra Day O'Connor, who was replaced Jan. 31 by Samuel Alito. The timing of the transition is awkward, because justices are nearly midway through a term and have heard arguments in more than half the cases they will rule on this year.

Alito may have to break ties in some pending cases, because whatever positions O'Connor took do not count anymore. It's not clear if any appeals have been deliberately held up to give Alito a chance to change the outcome.

"No court is going to reach out with huge decisions when it is quite clearly in transition," said Dennis Hutchinson, an expert on the Supreme Court at the University of Chicago.

Jay Sekulow, chief counsel for the conservative American Center for Law and Justice, predicted that the cautious decisions will continue even with Alito on the bench.

"This is a court that's going to move incrementally. That seems to be John Roberts' style," Sekulow said.

Roberts, who just turned 51, succeeded William H. Rehnquist, who died last fall at age 80.

As the court's leader, he oversees private meetings, presides during the argument sessions, and assigns the writing of opinions when he is in the majority.

DOJ_NMG_0014636

So far Roberts has disagreed with just two opinions, and he did not file his own dissent either time. One of the rulings upheld Oregon's one-of-a-kind assisted-suicide law from a challenge by the Bush administration. Another said states can be sued in bankruptcy proceedings.

In both, Roberts was on the same side as Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas, the court's most conservative justices.

Roberts said during his Senate confirmation hearing in September that the chief justice should "act as a force to help bring about some cohesiveness and collegiality."

"I have told people, when pressed, that I prefer to be known as a modest judge," he also said.

The Roberts court, at this point, has been modest. Some examples, under his leadership the court:

_Dodged a decision on a parental abortion law from New Hampshire. On a 9-0 vote the justices said a lower court should reconsider whether the entire law was unconstitutional, or just part of it.

_Backed out of deciding whether a campaign finance law, in practice, violated free-speech rights of an anti-abortion group.

_Dismissed without explanation a police interrogation case.

_Passed up a chance to decide when inmates can use a federal disabilities law to sue states for not accommodating their disabilities.

Roberts, whose previous job was judge on the federal appeals court based in Washington, sometimes suggested ways that cases could be decided on limited grounds during the oral argument sessions.

"This is an even more extreme form of the kind of modest style of decision-making that Roberts had when he was on the D.C. Circuit," Pildes said in an interview. "One of the interesting issues to watch for now is whether this pattern will continue, or whether (now that) the court has a stable complement of justices it will shift back into issuing more sweeping opinions."

The first sign of the new court may come when justices meet for the first time with Alito instead of the moderate O'Connor. At the Feb. 21 session, justices could say whether they will hear arguments in several significant cases. Among them are the Bush administration's attempt to reinstate a ban on a type of late-term abortion and an appeal from an American terror suspect held without traditional legal rights.

The court also will have more rulings to announce. So far, Roberts has had just one opinion, although he likely has been working on several more during the court's monthlong recess.

"I imagine Roberts would like to be a consensus builder," said Stephen Wermiel, an American University law professor.

Political Skeletons, Cut And Pasted (NYT)

The New York Times, February 11, 2006

Staff members for a Republican congressman, carefully perusing his biography on Wikipedia — the free-form, online encyclopedia — recently happened upon the insertion that "he likes to beat his wife and children." The Web's collective form of fact-gathering tends to invite such sliming. But now, a more tricky problem is emerging: the editing of legislative biographies by staff members and loyalists devoted to gilding the incumbent.

The deletion of unattractive facts by apple-polishers became so obvious that Wikipedia's detectives temporarily blocked some Senate addresses from making entries. The electronic addresses of Senate offices turn out to be more easily traced than those of House members, so there is no comparable record of protective edits by lower house scriveners.

Senator Dianne Feinstein's net worth was mysteriously deleted from her biography, along with the $190,000 fine she had to pay for not disclosing that her husband had guaranteed her 1990 campaign loans. Wikinews, the encyclopedia's arm of corrective reporters, found Senator Joseph Biden's past problems with campaign plagiarism charges had evaporated, thanks to someone at one of his office computers. Members of Senator Norm Coleman's staff massaged a description of him as a liberal college Democrat; he morphed into an "activist," then merely an "active college student." A reference to Senator Tom Harkin's discredited claims to have flown combat missions in Vietnam disappeared.

An entry on Wikipedia is still almost guaranteed to be closer to reality than a compilation of campaign commercials. But when everybody is invited to contribute to lawmakers' biographies, the most interested participants are almost always going to be the people on their payrolls.

OTHER NEWS:

In D.C. Visit, Perry Is Of Two Minds On Spending (HCHRON)

By BENNETT ROTH

Houston Chronicle, February 11, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0014637

WASHINGTON - Texas Gov. Rick Perry showed Friday that he could be both a new-style conservative and an old-style politician.

He chided runaway Republican spending in a speech to fiscal hawks and then made the rounds of government agencies in search of federal aid for the state.

Perry spent much of a one-day visit to the nation's capital stating his case that Texas needed $2 billion for hurricane relief, as well as expedited funding for border-enforcement programs.

He began his day with an address crafted to appeal to the Conservative Political Action Conference, an influential group that has grown increasingly disenchanted with the spending policies of President Bush and the GOP-controlled Congress.

He accused the Republican lawmakers of allowing the federal deficit to explode as spending on entitlements such as Medicare and Social Security grow.

"The public expects Democrats to spend every dime in the Treasury and then ask for more because that's what Democrats do," said Perry, a former Democrat turned Republican.

"On the other hand, they elect Republicans to stop that from happening," he said, "and if Republicans keep spending like Democrats, the public will elect the real thing."

Perry denied that his appearance before the group — he was the only governor to address the conference — was an indication that he harbors national ambitions. The governor said he is focused on his re-election.

Donald Ely, a Republican state committeeman from Pennsylvania, said he would like to see Perry as a vice presidential candidate on ticket headed by Virginia Sen. George Allen in 2008.

"He's more conservative than George Bush," Ely said. "I'm not a Bush Republican. I'm a Reagan conservative."

In his speech, Perry only referred once to Bush, although not by name, praising his leadership in the war on terror. By contrast, he made five mentions of Reagan. Perry also suggested the federal government's priorities had been misplaced, with insufficient money allocated for border control.

The governor later met with a host of federal officials, including Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, to discuss speeding up federal border-enforcement grants to pay for overtime for local law enforcement officials and other pressing needs.

Kathy Walt, Perry's press secretary, said Homeland Security officials agreed to share information and intelligence so the state can better coordinate the deployment of state resources and security personnel to the border.

Although Walt said Perry did not raise the issue at the meeting with Chertoff, Texas stands to lose money if Congress approves a recommendation included in Bush's 2007 budget proposal to eliminate the State Criminal Alien Assistance Program. The program reimburses states and localities for some costs of jailing illegal immigrants.

Last year, Walt said, Texas received about $26 million from a $305 million appropriation. She said the state is expecting about $31 million from the $405 million approved for this year.

Perry discussed hurricane relief with Chertoff and with Sen. Thad Cochran, R-Miss., the chairman of the Senate Appropriation Committee.

Saying that that federal funding for Rita had fallen "substantially short" of what was needed, Perry urged lawmakers to include $2 billion in a supplemental spending bill to deal with the storm's aftermath.

bennett.roth@chron.com

Talent Changes Stem-cell Stance (KCS)

By Matt Stearns And Steve Kraske

The Kansas City Star, February 11, 2006

WASHINGTON — Sen. Jim Talent attempted an election-year pirouette Friday on stem-cell research, an issue that has split the Missouri Republican Party.

Talent withdrew his four-year support of federal legislation that would ban human cloning, including what opponents call embryonic therapeutic cloning that most researchers see as key to early stem-cell study. Talent's pro-life supporters adamantly oppose the technique.

In making his position change, the Missouri Republican sought to satisfy the pro-life camp by promoting a type of stem-cell research that "signals the end of ethical dilemmas in this type of research."

"If we can get the stem cells without the cloning, we render the current controversy scientifically obsolete," Talent said Friday in a half-hour Senate floor speech that was equal parts science lesson and politics.

Still, the Missouri Catholic Conference issued a scathing news release accusing Talent of abandoning his pro-life principles. And Missouri scientific leaders remained unhappy that Talent seemed to favor a type of research that is only in preliminary stages and is not being performed in Missouri.

DOJ_NMG_0014638

Stem-cell research is a hot political issue in Missouri because supporters of embryonic stem-cell research — including many Republican business leaders in Kansas City and St. Louis — are trying to get an initiative on the November ballot that would prevent Missouri from enacting stricter laws on the research than the federal government would.

Talent's Democratic opponent, Claire McCaskill, supports the initiative. She had lambasted Talent for co-sponsoring the restrictive legislation, which was originally introduced by Sen. Sam Brownback, a Kansas Republican. The pro-life movement also opposes the initiative because they see all types of human cloning as violating their view of the sanctity of human life.

Talent would not say Friday whether he would support the ballot initiative, although he reiterated his basic support for the goals of the legislation he abandoned — specifically, the banning of cloning of human embryos, including those created solely for research purposes through a process called somatic cell nuclear transfer.

Instead, he sought to present what he called "a common ground solution" that would entail a more flexible regulatory ban on somatic cell nuclear transfer while increasing federal funding for a type of research known as altered nuclear transfer.

Altered nuclear transfer in theory creates "nonembryos" that contain embryonic stem cells. It gives the benefits of early stem-cell research without the cloning that is anathema to so many in the pro-life movement, Talent said.

"Science would have the stem cells it needs in a morally acceptable way that would allow for full federal funding of stem-cell research," Talent said. "The pro-life community would have an effective ban on human cloning. We would turn a zero-sum game into a win-win proposition for everyone."

Talent said he was trying to find "an island of unity in a sea of controversy."

William Hurlbut, a leading proponent of altered nuclear transfer research, said Friday: "You never create an embryo by this method. You never create a living human organism."

Even so, many in the pro-life movement view altered nuclear transfer as no more acceptable than the research they condemn as cloning. That is because the research still involves creating a blastocyst — a ball of cells — and crippling it in the petri dish to prevent it from growing into a human embryo.

"We have concerns about the intentional creation of what may be developmentally disabled human 'embryos' for the sole purpose of destroying them to harvest their stem cells," wrote Carrie Gordon Earll of Focus on the Family, a leading conservative group.

The pro-life movement also is confused by Talent's rationale for pulling his support for Brownback's bill.

Talent said he was concerned that the bill's wording would inadvertently ban altered nuclear transfer research that did not involve the cloning of human embryos.

Nonsense, said Richard Doerflinger, deputy director of pro-life activities for the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops, whose group helped Brownback write the bill.

"This doesn't make any sense to us," Doerflinger said. "The Brownback bill … clearly allows research other than cloning human embryos. … I think this man is very confused."

Talent did not tell Brownback that he was pulling support for the bill, an aide to the senator from Kansas said.

Brownback would not comment Friday, but he has never said he considers altered nuclear transfer research to be ethically sound.

"There's been a lot of support for Jim Talent from the pro-life community," said Larry Weber, executive director of the Missouri Catholic Conference. "Today he stepped off that platform. At this point, it's essentially vacant with respect to the U.S. Senate election. His candidacy gave pro-life voters something they could gravitate towards. Unfortunately, it's just not there any more."

Missouri's scientific community wasn't thrilled either.

No researchers at Kansas City's Stowers Institute or St. Louis' Washington University currently do altered nuclear transfer research, said scientists at the state's two leading bioresearch centers.

"All federally allowed research with stem cells should proceed," said William Neaves, president of the Stowers Institute. "At this time, it's not possible to know which type of research would hold the most promise."

And it doesn't make sense at this time to tilt the playing field in favor of one type of research, especially for altered nuclear transfer, for which "there is no evidence this will work in people," said Steven Teitelbaum, a researcher at Washington University who uses stem cells in his research.

Talent pointed out in his speech that somatic cell nuclear transfer remains equally unproven in its medical efficacy.

McCaskill wasted no time in trying to exploit Talent's new position.

"Strong leaders need to have clarity," McCaskill said. "He appears to be in a fog."

The dual risks of being viewed as a flip-flopper on a high-profile issue and of antagonizing part of his base could prove politically fatal, said George Connor, a political scientist at Missouri State University.

DOJ_NMG_0014639

"Instead of saying, 'This is what I believe,' and going out on the campaign trail and defending it, he's trying to have the best of both worlds."

"This is a very dangerous thing for Senator Talent," Connor added. "It could cost him the race. I just think it's an astounding mistake."

But Missouri Rep. Brian Yates, a Lee's Summit Republican, called it a smart move.

"I see where the senator is going," Yates said. "A lot of life sciences are still evolving. It may be premature to enact legislation to criminalize life sciences research without more information or without better definitions of what should be allowed. … I think it's probably a good thing to take a step back and review this issue."

Talent said in an interview following his speech that politics had nothing to do with his decision to abandon the Brownback bill and push for more altered nuclear transfer research. He said the decision was the result of a yearlong examination of the issues.

"It really is an attempt to get everybody to understand there are at least some areas where you can have what you want without denying the other side what they want," Talent said.

Still, he acknowledged he had waded into politically perilous waters.

"My wife says to me last night, 'Jim … two things are going to happen: Nobody's going to like it and they're all going to say you're doing it just for political reasons,' " Talent said. "And I said to her, 'Well, if nobody likes it, why in the world would I be doing it for political reasons?' "

Steele Apologizes For Holocaust Remarks (WP)

By Robert Barnes And Matthew Mosk

The Washington Post, February 11, 2006

Compared Stem Cell Research to Nazi Medical Experiments

Maryland Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele profusely apologized yesterday for comments linking stem cell research to Nazi experimentation, but the offhand analogy could undermine what had been a concerted effort by the Republican to run for the U.S. Senate as a moderate "bridge" between Democrats and Republicans in his left-leaning state.

Steele issued apologies in a radio interview and in phone conversations with Jewish leaders in Baltimore and Washington, and then continued to express regret throughout a series of stops in Prince George's County.

"I offended members of the Jewish community and members of the Maryland community," Steele said outside a Prince George's nursing home. "It was a remark that was an improper inference, because I never specifically said Holocaust. . . . And it did not reflect my attitude and my belief, and I am really sorry about the whole thing."

Besides offending those Steele was trying to befriend, some politicians and political observers said his remarks appeared to hurt him in several ways: putting him on the wrong side of a popular issue, reinforcing a worry among even some Republicans that he can be an accident-prone candidate in a high-profile race, and signaling to swing voters that he is more conservative than the almost-nonpartisan image he has cultivated.

"Some people could think he's not moderate . . . but a hard-right Republican," said University of Maryland Prof. Ronald Walters, who has been closely following Steele's campaign.

Keith Haller, who conducts polls for Maryland media and others, said his recent surveys show that Steele has "risen above the cacophony of partisan battles" in the state. "His popularity has been steadily soaring, so he certainly didn't need to engage on this issue, in such an awkward way."

In an appearance Thursday before the Baltimore Jewish Council, Steele responded to a question about stem cell research by saying he was "cautious" about the idea of "tinkering around with life," and added:

"Look, you of all folks know what happens when people decide they want to experiment on human beings, when they want to take your life and use it as a tool," Steele said, according to a recording of the event. "I know that as well from my community and our experience with slavery."

Jewish leaders, for the most part, accepted Steele's apology. Ron Halber, executive director of the Jewish Community Relations Council of Greater Washington, said he considered it an exercise of bad judgment by a good man.

"He understands his remarks were offensive," Halber said. "People in the Jewish community are upset about them. What was behind the words were not the feelings of a hatemonger, though."

His Democratic opponents were glad Steele apologized but sharp in their criticism.

"Michael Steele does not have the right to compare the lifesaving potential of stem cell research to the barbarity of the Holocaust," said Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin, one of several Democrats running to replace retiring Sen. Paul S. Sarbanes (D). "His remarks were offensive to the millions of Americans who stand to benefit [from] this research, as well as to Holocaust survivors and their families."

DOJ_NMG_0014640

State Sen. Sharon M. Grosfeld (D-Montgomery), the daughter of a Holocaust survivor, said she was "shocked by the ignorance of the statement." Another Senate candidate, former congressman and former NAACP president Kweisi Mfume, said he also was offended by Steele's comments about slavery. "Any further comparison to equate slavery to stem cell research is a reach that I and others who are the descendants of slaves don't understand," he said.

Republican Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr., who has recommended $20 million in state money for stem cell research but wants to let an outside panel decide which kind of cell research should be funded, tried to deflect criticism from his former running mate.

"I think after an adult, straight-up person makes a comment and then apologizes for the comment, unless you want to make a political deal out of it, or you want to cause some sort of political damage because you dislike his candidacy, what else can the guy do?" Ehrlich told the Associated Press.

Steele's Senate candidacy has been greatly aided by national Republican leaders, who recruited him to run believing he is the party's best hope. But Steele has studiously avoided following a GOP script in a state where President Bush is a help only in fundraising.

The stem cell issue is one in which Marylanders differ greatly from Bush and other prominent Republicans. Haller said that in his latest poll for the Baltimore Sun, 60 percent of the voters supported embryonic stem cell research; the state's increasingly important independent voters favored it 3 to 1, and even a plurality of Republicans are in favor.

Steele has cited his strong Catholic faith -- he spent several years as a seminarian -- in explaining his opposition to abortion and the death penalty, even though he said yesterday he does not let his religion enter into "policy discussions."

"It is a force in my life. I tried to share a little bit of that because most politicians get up and give you the pat, 30-second sound bite," Steele said. "I will continue to do that, but unfortunately in that process, there was an inference that was not right."

Steele was elected Maryland's first statewide African American officeholder as Ehrlich's running mate and has not campaigned on his own for such a high-profile job. He has regretted off-the-cuff remarks before.

Last summer, when news reports broke that Ehrlich had held a fundraiser at an all-white country club, Steele said he didn't care because "I don't play golf. It's not an issue with me." A couple of weeks later, he changed his mind and said, "The core issue there is, the perception of discrimination is just as insidious as the reality of discrimination." He said his first answer was "flippant."

Staff writer Hamil R. Harris contributed to this report.

Steele Apologizes For Stem Cell Remarks (BSUN)

By Jennifer Skalka

The Baltimore Sun, February 11, 2006

Lt. governor calls Holocaust reference 'irresponsible'

In a quick move to stanch criticism of his remarks likening embryonic stem cell research to Nazi medical testing, Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele apologized yesterday, saying his comments to Baltimore Jewish leaders do not reflect what is in his heart.

Steele, a Republican candidate for the U.S. Senate, said during a morning interview on WBAL Radio that he "made an unfortunate, irresponsible inference."

"I humbly apologize to everyone, certainly in that room and anyone who is now following this, because that is not where my heart or where my head is," Steele said.

"It was just unfortunate, and I am very sorry for anyone taking offense by the remarks."

Steele told the board of the Baltimore Jewish Council during a Thursday luncheon that "you of all folks know what happens when people decide they want to experiment on human beings, when they want to take your life and use it as a tool."

Democrats who are vying to oppose Steele in the fall weren't letting the gaffe go by yesterday -- a sign that the incident could become a factor in the campaign.

U.S. Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin, a Senate candidate, held a news conference in Annapolis to denounce Steele's remarks.

"Michael Steele opposes this life-saving research," Cardin said. "This is an appropriate issue for us to debate. ... Michael Steele is wrong on stem cell research, and he's wrong on other issues."

Three other Democratic Senate candidates -- Kweisi Mfume, former congressman and former head of the NAACP; Lise Van Susteren, a forensic psychiatrist; and American University professor Allan Lichtman -- issued statements critical of Steele.

So did a Democratic National Committee spokesman, who lambasted the head of the Republican National Committee for not repudiating Steele's remarks, calling his inaction "political hypocrisy at its worst."

Mfume originally condemned Steele's remarks, saying that there can be no comparison between stem cell research and "the reprehensible horrors committed by the Nazis against innocent men, women and children."

DOJ_NMG_0014641

But he later added to his comments. "I'm glad to know that Mr. Steele has apologized for his remarks, and if the larger Jewish community is prepared to accept that, then we should move on," he said in a statement provided by a campaign spokesman.

Van Susteren was less forgiving. "Mr. Steele, do you know what it's like to tell the parent of a child with diabetes that we aren't doing everything we can to find a cure?" she said in statement emphasizing her medical background.

"Do you know what it's like to tell the child of an Alzheimer's patient that instead of helping, the government is putting up roadblocks? I do. ... It is a tragedy that those in power who could do something to alleviate suffering ... do not."

James Gimpel, a political science professor at the University of Maryland, College Park, said Steele's views about stem cell research are anchored in his Catholic religious beliefs, but that he can't be pleased with the attention they have attracted.

"His views on stem cell research are probably not that well known, and this was not exactly the best way to make them known," Gimpel said.

Still, he questioned whether Steele lost many votes this week because Jews tend to vote Democratic.

David A. Harris, deputy executive director of the National Jewish Democratic Council in Washington, disagreed.

"I think the conscience of many Marylanders will be deeply offended by what he said, and it's not limited to American Jews," Harris said.

In addition to his radio apology, Steele phoned Art Abramson, executive director of the council, to apologize directly. Abramson said Steele offered to visit with the council again to make amends. Instead, Abramson suggested he send a letter, which he did.

In it, Steele calls the Holocaust "one of the world's darkest chapters."

"By remembering the uniqueness of this tragedy we hope we can prevent it from occurring ever again," Steele wrote. "I feel terrible for any pain I have caused by my inappropriate comments."

Abramson said he felt Steele's apology was "appropriately handled."

"I believe his apology was humble and sincere, and I accept it," Abramson said.

Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. said some people will try to use Steele's remarks to damage his Senate candidacy, but the governor praised Steele for apologizing and called him "a straight-up guy."

"Mike is very strong, and he is running strong in the polls, and there is a great deal of fear associated with this campaign because of his polling numbers and his excellent fundraising and his life story," the governor said.

"He is a real threat to this monopoly establishment."

For his part, Steele advised against using his statements for political purposes.

"I just hope that there is no grandstanding on this because this is a very sensitive issue, both with respect to the Holocaust and the memory of those affected there, but also the issue of stem cell [research]," Steele said during the radio interview.

In Annapolis, Cardin, flanked by Democratic lawmakers and his wife, Myrna Cardin, who attended the Jewish Council lunch, chided Steele for comparing stem cell research to what he called "the barbarity of the Holocaust."

Myrna Cardin said Steele's remarks were "quite horrifying." "Those were not the words that any of us ever wanted to hear," she told reporters.

The congressman was joined by Baltimore County Sen. Paula C. Hollinger and Baltimore Del. Samuel I. Rosenberg, the Democratic sponsors of bills to commit $25 million a year for five years to stem cell research, which scientists believe could hold the key to treatments or cures for many illnesses.

Their bills emphasize the importance of embryonic stem cell research. The governor's competing plan would dedicate $20 million to stem cell research, but it does not specify whether the funding would go to embryonic or adult stem cell proposals.

Ehrlich, who has said science should guide decisions about how the money will be distributed, has given the Maryland Technology Development Corporation, a quasi-public agency that falls within the Department of Business and Economic Development, the responsibility for determining who will get the money.

At the council luncheon, Steele suggested that he and Ehrlich were in agreement on stem cell research. "The governor and I have pretty squarely laid out where we are on that," Steele said.

Rosenberg said yesterday that given Steele's remarks to the council, the governor owes the public a firm explanation of his position on embryonic research.

Henry Fawell, an Ehrlich spokesman, responded that the governor "has supported government funding of stem cell research since he was a member of Congress. His plan allows for embryonic stem cell research funding."

jennifer.skalka@baltsun.com

Sun reporters David Nitkin, Kelly Brewington and Lynn Anderson contributed to this article.

Seeing A Jungle In Congress, A Lion Of The Nixon Era Runs Again (NYT)

By John M. Broder

The New York Times, February 11, 2006

RUMSEY, Calif., Feb. 6 — As he shambles through his organic orange and olive groves here, Pete McCloskey hardly resembles the liberal lion he once was in Congress, the scourge of the Nixon White House and a father of the environmental movement. He wears beat-up denim clothes and high rubber boots as he imagines mucking out Congress as he does the stables of his prized Arabian horses.

Yes, this is the same Pete McCloskey, now 78, the left-wing Republican from the San Francisco Bay Area who in the early 1970's thundered on the House floor for the impeachment of President Richard M. Nixon and demanded an immediate end to the Vietnam War, who helped create Earth Day and wrote the Endangered Species Act.

Now Mr. McCloskey, marching to a drummer perhaps only he hears, is taking on a powerful incumbent member of Congress of his own party, Richard W. Pombo, in a long-shot quest to return to Washington for one last hurrah. He accuses Mr. Pombo of being one of the most corrupt members of Congress, a tool of the deposed majority leader Tom DeLay and one of the biggest recipients of the largess of the lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

Mr. McCloskey said that he was challenging Mr. Pombo because he could not find anyone else to run against the seven-term incumbent from California's 11th Congressional District, which stretches from the East Bay suburbs of San Francisco into the agricultural San Joaquin Valley. Mr. McCloskey has rented a room in a house in Lodi to establish residency in the district, which does not include his farm outside Rumsey, about 90 miles northwest of Lodi.

This is the same Pete McCloskey who as a congressman criticized Israeli military operations, discussed the influence of Jewish money in American politics, spoke to a group of Holocaust deniers and urged negotiations with Yasir Arafat and creation of a Palestinian state long before American presidents and Israeli prime ministers were ready to do so.

The same Republican who ran for Senate in 1982 by disagreeing with President Ronald Reagan on nearly every major issue and who campaigned for John Kerry in 2004 against President Bush, the son of a man he considers a good friend.

Mr. McCloskey said he was motivated to run this time by Mr. Pombo's ties to Mr. DeLay and Mr. Abramoff and his acceptance of large campaign contributions from Indian tribes, land developers, sweatshop owners and oil companies. He strongly disapproves of Mr. Pombo's record as chairman of the House Resources Committee, where he has tried to revise the Endangered Species Act and open public lands to oil and mineral extraction.

"This man is an embarrassment," Mr. McCloskey said of Mr. Pombo. "He is Tom DeLay's handmaiden, he wants to privatize millions of acres of federal lands, and he believes the Supreme Court is a threat to our democracy. Those are fundamental enough reasons to make you want to defeat a guy."

Mr. Pombo and his advisers dismiss Mr. McCloskey as a carpetbagger, a crank and an egotist. They say he represents no threat to the incumbent, and they have, so far, swatted away his demand for public debates.

"He's not only out of the mainstream of the Republican Party, he's outside the mainstream of American society," said Wayne Johnson, Mr. Pombo's principal political consultant. "He's like Austin Powers, trapped in the 1970's."

Mr. Pombo declined to comment on the race.

Mr. McCloskey's old friends and allies said they were not surprised to see him enter the fray again. They said he had shown courage on the battlefield as a young Marine officer in Korea and in his political career, taking on the leadership of his own party, even challenging Nixon in the 1972 presidential primary.

Mr. McCloskey won one delegate in that race, the son of a friend.

"He's a guy that led six bayonet charges and was the highest-decorated second lieutenant in the Korean War," said Jim Johnson, a retired Republican member of Congress from Colorado who served with Mr. McCloskey. "He's fearless. And when he gets angry and gets onto something, he will do what he can to change it."

Kenneth L. Khachigian had a slightly different perspective. He was a young speechwriter in the Nixon White House who watched Mr. McCloskey's hopeless 1972 challenge with disdain and some amusement.

"He wasn't taken seriously at all," said Mr. Khachigian, now a political consultant in California. "He was more of a nuisance."

He said Mr. McCloskey's campaign for Congress this year was just as quixotic, adding: "He's looking for attention. And one way to get it is to go back to doing what he does best — ticking off fellow Republicans."

Mr. Pombo has a considerable advantage in money, with about $1.25 million in his campaign account and his political action committee, known as RichPAC.

Mr. McCloskey's campaign balance is $0. He said he was considering lending his campaign $50,000 of his own money — half his savings, he said — to get it off the ground. He admitted that he knew virtually nobody in the 11th Congressional District, but he said was planning to make up for that with shoe leather and a bus tour modeled on Senator John McCain's "Straight Talk Express."

DOJ_NMG_0014643

Mr. McCloskey knows that his odds of winning the June 6 primary are long, but he is driven by the same fire that moved him during his 15 years in Congress that began in 1967 when he defeated Shirley Temple Black in a special election for a House seat representing a prosperous and liberal district in the area around Palo Alto now known as Silicon Valley.

He said he no longer recognized the Republican Party in which he served alongside such moderate and liberal luminaries as Mark O. Hatfield, Charles H. Percy and John V. Lindsay. He remembers with a nostalgic sigh being befriended by the moderate Republican rookie congressman from Houston, George Bush, when he arrived to take his seat in 1967. He and Mr. Bush still carry on a lively correspondence, although they differ strongly on the current president.

"What this campaign is about is which way does this Republican Party go," Mr. McCloskey said in an interview in the cluttered living room of his retirement farm.

He said neoconservatives — including his old friend and colleague Dick Cheney — had taken over the government and driven the nation into an ocean of red ink and a ruinous war in Iraq. He said he agreed with a fellow marine and former House colleague, Representative John P. Murtha, Democrat of Pennsylvania, that the nation should withdraw most of its troops from Iraq by year's end.

While his antiwar position and his views on the environment, abortion and gay rights (he is for them) could be popular in a Democratic primary in many Congressional districts, it is not likely to endear him to the voters of California's 11th, which has a preponderance of Republican voters and has easily returned Mr. Pombo to Washington since he was first elected in 1992.

Even so, Helen Hooper McCloskey, Mr. McCloskey's former press secretary and wife of 23 years, supports her husband's campaign, calling it a brave if somewhat foolhardy last act to restore his reputation and rescue the things he holds dear.

"He is an endangered species himself — the liberal Republican," she said.

Photo With Bush Helps Congressman's Rival (AP)

By T.a. Badger

AP, February 11, 2006

A photo of President Bush cupping the cheeks of Rep. Henry Cuellar at last week's State of the Union address has been the gift that keeps on giving for Cuellar's chief rival for the Democratic nomination.

The Washington Post picture of Cuellar beaming as the president holds his face is a boffo hit on the Internet, inspiring humorous-caption contests and accusations that Cuellar is a stealth Republican.

Cuellar's Democratic rival, Ciro Rodriguez, has produced a leaflet centered around the photo. It reads: "George Bush thinks Henry Cuellar is `chulo'" — Spanish slang for "pretty boy."

Before the picture came out, Rodriguez, a former congressman trying to regain the House seat he lost in 2004 to Cuellar, had been low on money, momentum and a memorable message.

But the Rodriguez campaign said the picture has generated more than $80,000 in contributions in little more than a week and given a major boost to his supporters a month before the Democratic primary.

"The saying goes, `A picture tells you a thousand words,'" Rodriguez said. "Well, in this case, it's gone beyond a thousand, especially on the dollars."

The photo flap became even richer when it was revealed that Cuellar listened to the State of the Union address while standing on the Republican side of the aisle. Cuellar also served briefly as Texas secretary of state under GOP Gov. Rick Perry

Colin Strother, a Cuellar spokesman, said that Cuellar is a true Democrat regardless of where he chose to listen to the speech, and that the photo is being blown out of proportion.

"Henry was far from the only Democrat to share a moment with the president that evening — he was just the one immortalized on camera," Strother said. "We're moving forward, and whatever Ciro chooses to do with the photo is up to his campaign."

Democrats Look For Gains In Governors' Races (REU)

By John Whitesides

Reuters, February 11, 2006

Democrats are positioned for gains in governors' races in November and could capture governorships in many big battleground states, giving the party an early edge in the 2008 fight for the White House.

Republicans must defend 22 of the 36 governors' offices on the ballot in November, including eight states where the incumbent retired or is barred from running again. Democrats defend 14 governorships but only one in which the incumbent is not running.

The lopsided political map, along with a tough national election climate for Republicans, put Democrats in a strong position to pick up at least the four governorships needed for a national majority. Republicans hold 28 governorships to 22 for Democrats.

DOJ_NMG_0014644

"The math is not in our favor this year," said Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, chairman of the Republican Governors' Association, who is stepping down this year ahead of a potential 2008 presidential bid.

"Just looking at the math," he told Reuters. "We should lose four to six spots. But we expect to do better than the math would indicate."

New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson, chairman of the Democratic Governors' Association and a candidate for re-election this year, said he anticipated a net gain of five or six governorships for his party.

"We think the states are the most fertile territory for Democrats and winning a majority of governorships in 2006 enhances our chances for winning the presidential election in 2008," Richardson, another potential White House candidate, told Reuters.

Among the biggest prizes in November's mid-term election, when control of Congress also will be at stake, are open governors' offices in Ohio, Florida, Massachusetts and New York, where incumbent Republicans are retiring.

Governorships held by Republicans in the key swing states of Nevada, Colorado and Arkansas, and the Democratic office in Iowa, also are open and up for grabs.

'CHALLENGING RACES'

"We have eight open seats and some of them are in places where Democrats have a solid voter lead," Romney said. "New York, Massachusetts, Ohio and even Arkansas, are places where we have to overcome a blue tide. Those are more challenging races for us."

Both parties crave the advantages offered by a sitting governor, particularly in years with a presidential race. Governors typically raise big money, muster a ready pool of volunteers and generate heavy local media coverage for national candidates.

A popular governor can be worth two percentage points or more to a viable White House candidate, analysts say, giving Democrats a sterling opportunity to lay the groundwork for 2008.

"It's not just the numbers that matter, it's the places," said Larry Sabato, a political analyst at the University of Virginia, pointing to the big swing states up for grabs in November. "The Democrats can set themselves up nicely for the 2008 presidential contest, assuming they nominate an electable candidate."

While national Republicans have suffered a series of recent setbacks, including the loss of two governors' races last year, scandals involving prominent party leaders and Bush's low approval ratings, Romney said they should not effect governors' races.

"People choose their governor based on state issues, not national issues," Romney said. "While the national attitude may color things at the margin, overwhelmingly governor's races are decided by the campaigns of the candidates themselves."

Incumbent Republican Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger faces a tough re-election race in Democratic-leaning California, as do Republicans Bob Ehrlich in Maryland and Tim Pawlenty in Minnesota.

Democratic incumbents Ed Rendell in Pennsylvania, Jennifer Granholm in Michigan and Jim Doyle in Wisconsin also have potentially close elections, although their home states are Democratic-leaning.

Richardson pointed to six popular Democratic governors favored to win easy re-election in Republican-leaning states -- Kansas, Oklahoma, Arizona, Tennessee, Wyoming and himself in New Mexico -- as evidence of Democratic growth in red states.

"The Congress and the White House appear to be in gridlock," Richardson said. "The Democratic Party has to rebuild itself not from Washington down but from the states up. We have to be competitive in red states."

Motivation Behind Crime Study Questioned (WP)

By Matthew Mosk

The Washington Post, February 11, 2006

Ehrlich Administration Defends Project as Public Safety Officials Wonder if Goals Are Political

Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr.'s administration has commissioned a criminologist to conduct an expedited audit of Maryland crime statistics, just as Ehrlich gears up for a reelection campaign that could put a spotlight on violence in Baltimore and Prince George's County.

Police in the five largest Maryland jurisdictions were notified last month that they would be asked to contribute data for a study that would be completed by Aug. 14, less than three months before Election Day.

"A full and accurate measure of these statistics is central to our mission of assisting victims and controlling and preventing crime," said Alex Ray, a spokesman for the Governor's Office of Crime Control and Prevention, which commissioned the study.

But public safety officials in several Maryland jurisdictions questioned whether the real goals of the project are political, given the expectation that if Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley is the Democratic Party nominee, Ehrlich will attempt to blame him for Baltimore's persistent crime woes.

DOJ_NMG_0014645

"Nothing about this study adds up," said Kristen Mahoney, a high-ranking police official who advises O'Malley, one of two Democrats vying to challenge the Republican governor in November.

The University of Maryland professor who will conduct the study said yesterday that officials in the governor's crime control office approached him with the idea, recommended the timetable and said they will pay him $340,000.

That branch of the governor's office was the target of a federal investigation during the 2002 election season in which top officials there were accused of using grant money to help bolster Democratic Lt. Gov. Kathleen Kennedy Townsend's ties to constituent groups. An indictment of the agency's director was eventually dismissed.

The latest study has brought similar questions from officials in several jurisdictions under review. Officials questioned whether Ehrlich sanctioned the project and whether it was politically motivated.

A spokesman for Ehrlich said the governor was told of the proposal as part of a routine briefing from public safety agencies. "The governor does not make any decisions on grant proposals," added Henry Fawell, Ehrlich's deputy press secretary.

Baltimore police, for one, will not be helping, said the department's spokesman, Matt Jablow.

Prince George's County State's Attorney Glenn F. Ivey (D) called the steep price and quick turnaround time highly unusual, based on his past dealings with the crime prevention office.

"We've worked with them on grants for crime issues for the previous three years pretty closely, and I would have expected, for a grant of that magnitude, they would have touched base with us to see if we thought it would even be useful," Ivey said. "Reviewing all the statistics on crime would be extremely difficult to do, and do a good job, in six months."

The professor hired to conduct the study, Charles F. Wellford, said that if there is a political motive behind the project, he is not aware of it.

"It's certainly not my motive, and certainly not the intent," Wellford said. "It's not unusual for us to get called in to try to be an objective voice on what crime data are saying."

Wellford said it was not until he conducted a Jan. 24 meeting with police from several of the jurisdictions that he heard suspicions about the role politics might have played in getting the study going.

"I don't know if they were trying to pay me a compliment, but one of them said, 'If it weren't for your involvement, we would think politics was behind this,' " Wellford said.

Wellford's grant application says the project will review "how accurately [crime] is reported to the public." To do this, he said, he has hired a private survey firm to conduct thousands of telephone interviews with crime victims, and he will pore over data from the five jurisdictions.

Wellford said meeting the target date will require cooperation from the five police agencies.

Montgomery County Executive Douglas M. Duncan (D), another O'Malley rival who aims to campaign for governor in part by highlighting the crime problem in Baltimore, has asked his police department to cooperate fully.

"This is absolutely something that needs to be done," said David Weaver, Duncan's communications director. "We look forward to seeing the results."

Trade Gap Hits Record For 4th Year In A Row (WP)

By Paul Blustein

The Washington Post, February 11, 2006

The U.S. trade deficit soared to a record in 2005 for the fourth year in a row, according to a government report released yesterday that provided a reminder of the dangers hovering over a generally robust economy.

The United States imported $725.8 billion more in goods and services than it exported last year, the Commerce Department said. That is up 17.5 percent from last year, and it is an all-time high not only in dollar terms but as a proportion of the economy; the figure is equal to 5.8 percent of gross domestic product.

For December alone, the trade gap increased to $65.7 billion from a revised $64.7 billion in November. That is the third-highest monthly deficit ever.

In some respects, the trade deficit reflects the strength of the U.S. economy, at least relative to other major trading partners.

Because U.S. economic growth has been rapid in recent years, American consumers are snapping up foreign goods of all kinds -- autos, electronics and clothing being some of the biggest categories. At the same time, relatively sluggish growth in economies such as the European Union and Japan has dampened demand for goods made in the United States. Thus even though U.S. exports rose 10.4 percent last year to $1.27 trillion, imports surged 12.9 percent to nearly $2 trillion.

But the gap worries many economists because it means the United States must borrow heavily from overseas. The dollars that Americans spend on imports are often invested by foreigners in the bonds of the U.S. Treasury and mortgage agencies such as Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac, so the more the trade deficit widens and the longer it persists, the greater U.S. indebtedness becomes. That is why some analysts fret about a scenario in which foreigners would sell off U.S. securities en masse, causing interest rates to soar and the global economy to fall into recession.

Nothing of the sort has materialized so far. On the contrary, overseas demand for U.S. investments last year was powerful enough to drive up the dollar against most major currencies.

"It's true that many of us have been concerned that foreigners will grow tired of financing these ever larger trade deficits, and so far there hasn't been much sign of that," said Jeffrey A. Frankel, a Harvard University economist who served on President Bill Clinton's Council of Economic Advisers.

"But there are plenty of reasons to be concerned," Frankel said. "We know [the trade deficit] means we're borrowing against the future, and that our children will have lower standards of living than they would otherwise. And just because a 'hard landing' hasn't happened yet doesn't mean it won't."

Furthermore, Frankel added, a big trade deficit generates pressure for protectionism. The report yesterday prompted many members of Congress and labor groups to step up their calls for a tougher U.S. trade policy and rollbacks in the free-trade deals negotiated in recent years.

"This trade deficit is unsustainable -- we cannot sit back as other nations produce the world's goods and we continue to lose family-supporting, middle class jobs," said Richard L. Trumka, the secretary-treasurer of the AFL-CIO, in a statement calling for Congress to "reject the flawed trade agreements" such as NAFTA and CAFTA.

Critics of the Bush administration's trade policies drew special attention to the mounting U.S. deficit with China, which rose 24.5 percent to $201.6 billion last year, the biggest gap the United States has ever posted with a single country. Lawmakers have been accusing China for some time of playing unfairly in global markets, especially by keeping the value of the Chinese currency, the yuan, at an artificially cheap level.

"Particularly disturbing is the news that our trade deficit with China is two and a half times bigger than it was when we signed a trade agreement with them in 2000," said Sen. Byron Dorgan (D-N.D.) in a statement, referring to the accord allowing Beijing to join the World Trade Organization. "That's pretty compelling evidence something has to change."

Although the gap with China accounts for more than a quarter of the total deficit, the imbalance is spread across a wide variety of trading partners.

The U.S. trade deficit with the European Union was $122.4 billion last year; with Japan, it was $82.7 billion; with Canada, $76.5 billion; with Mexico, $50.1 billion; and with nations belonging to the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries, it was $92.7 billion.

The imbalances reinforce the view held by many economists that the widening trade deficit stems primarily from a reduction in U.S. national savings in recent years, including the deterioration in the federal budget deficit.

Because the budget deficit requires the government to borrow, it counts as a decline in national savings.

One important factor fueling the rise in last year's deficit was the rise in the price of imported oil. Imports of petroleum products rose 39 percent, to $251.6 billion.

That was by no means the whole story. Christian E. Weller, senior economist at the Center for American Progress, a Washington think tank, calculated that even if the deficit in petroleum had not increased, the overall gap still would have totaled a record $660 billion.

U.S. Trade Deficit Sets Record, With China And Oil The Causes (NYT)

By Vikas Bajaj

The New York Times, February 11, 2006

The United States trade deficit widened to a record $726 billion in 2005, the government reported yesterday, adding more fuel to the increasingly partisan debate between advocates of further globalization and those who contend that free trade is causing the loss of too many American manufacturing jobs.

Hitting its fourth consecutive annual record, the gap between exports and imports reached almost twice the level of 2001. It was driven by strong consumer demand for foreign goods and soaring energy prices that added tens of billions of dollars to the nation's bill for imported oil. The nation last had a trade surplus, of $12.4 billion, in 1975.

The continued growth in the trade deficit, particularly with China, is likely to renew a fight in Congress as early as this spring over President Bush's trade policies. Lawmakers have seized on the growing imbalance with China to call on the White House to take a harder line with Beijing over its currency practices.

But as long as the American economy is growing faster than most of its trading partners and energy prices stay at elevated levels, economists expect little improvement, and perhaps even a slight widening, in the trade imbalance this year.

DOJ_NMG_0014647

"You would need a dramatic slowdown in domestic U.S. demand to bring down the U.S. trade deficit, and we think that is unlikely," said Dean Maki, chief United States economist at Barclays Capital in New York.

That means the nation will go deeper into debt with the rest of the world as Americans continue to rely on the strong flow of foreign money, particularly from central banks in Asia, to finance the trade gap. China, Japan and other foreign governments are some of the biggest holders of government securities, lending money to cover the substantial federal budget deficit and helping to keep interest rates and home mortgage costs here relatively low.

As a result, American consumers are able to spend more and save less.

Many economists say this situation is unsustainable over the long run, arguing that the United States could eventually face a harsh correction that would depress spending, increase the cost of borrowing and sharply lower the value of the dollar.

"There are certainly going to be inflows, the question is at what price?" said James O'Sullivan, an economist at UBS, an investment house. "As time goes on, it will become a little more difficult to attract foreign funds. That's another way of saying the dollar will fall."

But other economists argue that the huge trade gap mostly reflects stronger American growth and that money is flowing into the country at relatively low rates because of the attractiveness of the United States as a place to invest. They see little reason to fear a dollar crisis.

"As long as foreigners are willing to put their capital in the United States, we can sustain a trade deficit of 6 percent or more" of overall economic activity, said Phillip L. Swagel, a resident scholar at the American Enterprise Institute in Washington who served as a staff economist for President Bush's Council of Economic Advisers.

"It would be better that we saved more on our own," Mr. Swagel added, "but given that we aren't, I would rather have investment go on by foreign capital."

For its part, the Bush administration urged caution on the deficit.

Commerce Secretary Carlos M. Gutierrez, touring an I.B.M. operation in North Carolina, told The Associated Press, "We can't overreact and make tactical choices that will hurt our economy."

As a share of the gross domestic product, the trade gap increased to 5.8 percent, from 5.3 percent in 2004 and 4.5 percent in 2003.

While most economists dismiss the importance of bilateral trade imbalances, it is the deficit with China that has set off the most political fireworks. That nation had the largest gap with the United States of any country, at $201.6 billion for the year, up 24.5 percent from 2004. In December, the deficit with China narrowed nearly 12 percent, to $16.3 billion.

Following increased pressure from the White House, the Chinese government allowed the yuan to rise by about 2 percent in July and allowed its currency to float in a narrow band. Since then the yuan, also known as the renminbi, has risen by an additional 0.7 percent. One dollar buys about 8.0505 yuan.

A stronger Chinese currency would make imports to the United States more expensive and American exports to that country cheaper. Most analysts agree the yuan would rise significantly if it were set free, but many experts also worry that many financial institutions in China are not strong enough to survive the shocks that might accompany a fully convertible currency.

In the Senate, Charles E. Schumer, Democrat of New York, and Lindsey Graham, Republican of South Carolina, have proposed imposing a 27.5 percent tariff on Chinese imports if the country does not allow its currency to appreciate further against the dollar. Late last year, the senators agreed to hold off on the measure after the Senate voted against stopping a floor vote on it.

Mr. Schumer said "there is a very strong likelihood that we will move our bill in March should the Chinese not show further movements."

"If you believe in free trade, you play by the rules," he said when asked if a protectionist tariff would hurt the American economy. "The long-term damage of the Chinese pegging their currency far exceeds any immediate benefits and almost every economist would agree with that. They might not agree with our methodology."

Experts note that a large portion of the deficit with China reflects its growing role as a hub for the assembly of goods as Asian manufacturers have shifted production there to save money. The overall deficit with Asia has changed little in recent years.

Bush administration officials have said they, too, would like to see the yuan appreciate further, but have contended that sanctions like a tariff would be counterproductive and would hurt consumers. This month, the Treasury Department urged the International Monetary Fund to improve its policing of currency manipulations by governments, without directly referring to China.

Treasury Secretary John W. Snow is expected to bring up the issue of exchange rates at a meeting of the Group of 8 finance ministers in Moscow this weekend.

But even some longstanding advocates of free trade are growing increasingly frustrated with China's intransigence on the currency front, warning that it may be inviting protectionist legislation by repeatedly deflecting Washington's requests.

DOJ_NMG_0014648

"The administration," said C. Fred Bergsten of the Institute for International Economics in Washington, "has to let the Chinese know that it may not be able to stop it even though it doesn't want it."

While China draws most of the attention, perhaps the most important factor behind the swelling deficit last year was the rising cost of importing oil and other energy supplies. Trade in petroleum products accounted for 29 percent of the total deficit, up from 25 percent in 2004. Imports of petroleum goods climbed 39 percent, to $251.6 billion, after rising by 39 percent in 2004.

Over all, the deficit jumped nearly 18 percent in 2005 compared with the previous year. Excluding oil and other petroleum products, the trade gap grew by 10 percent.

After China, the United States' second-biggest deficit was with Japan, at $82.7 billion, up 9.4 percent, followed by Canada, a big supplier of oil and natural gas, at $76.5 billion, up 15.1 percent.

The deficit with members of the Organization of the Petroleum Exporting Countries increased by 29 percent, to $92.7 billion. For December, the trade deficit grew by 1.5 percent over the previous month, to $65.7 billion, as imports of computers, cars and airplanes rose and exports of planes, which had risen sharply in November, dropped. It was the third-largest monthly trade gap on record.

And with oil prices rising again, said Ashraf Laidi, chief currency analyst for the MG Financial Group in New York, "we can expect to see worse numbers to come."

US Trade Deficit Balloons To Record $726bn (FT)

By Christopher Swann

Financial Times, February 11, 2006

The US trade deficit ballooned to a record $726bn in 2005, inflated by surging imports from China and soaring energy prices.

In December the US imported $65.7bn more than it exported, up from $64.7bn in November. The widening came in spite of a strong 2.1 per cent rise in exports. The increase was all the more impressive because volatile aircraft sales were down on the month. Imports grew by 1.9 per cent.

But with imports now almost 60 per cent larger than exports, American companies would have had to sell 3 per cent more abroad just to prevent the deficit from rising.

Over 2005, the deficit totalled 5.8 per cent of American national income. The current account deficit - a more inclusive measure that includes other income flows - was 6.5 per cent of national income.

Economists have long fretted that global investors will eventually become unwilling to finance the US deficit, without a fall in the dollar and a rise in US interest rates. So far, however, there has been no sign of demand for US assets weakening. Last year the dollar rose by 3.5 per cent on a trade weighted basis.

But Nigel Gault, the head of US analysis at Global Insight, a consultancy, said the risks were increasing to the US economy as the deficit continued to widen. “An accident has been a possibility for some time and the further we go down this road the greater the chances that it will come to an unhappy end,” he said.

The consultancy is expecting the trade deficit to rise further to $810bn this year. The politically sensitive bilateral deficit with China was $202bn in 2005 - a quarter of the total shortfall. The deficit was slightly lower on the month - falling from $18.5bn to $16.3bn.

US lawmakers have become increasingly restive over the rising deficit, threatening action unless China moves towards floating its undervalued currency and clamps down on theft of US intellectual property. Charles Schumer, a Senator from New York, has been proposing an increase in tariffs on Chinese goods to offset this alleged currency manipulation.

Imports of oil were less of a problem in December, falling to 311.5m barrels a day from 314. But during the course of the year, surging oil imports have blighted the trade figures.

Paul Ashworth, an analyst at Capital Economics, said the rising deficit with China was responsible for a third of the overall deterioration in 2005. “This will no doubt give protectionists in Congress some ammunition as the mid term elections approach,” he said.

Overall, the rising deficit detracted 1.2 per centage points from economic growth.

U.S. Trade Deficit Ballooned To A Record In 2005 (WSJ)

By Greg Hitt And Murray Hiebert

The Wall Street Journal, February 11, 2006

Widening Gap With China Likely to Revive Demands That Beijing Take Action

The nation's record $725.75 billion trade deficit last year, fed by a massive inflow of imports from China, is likely to aggravate protectionist sentiment in Congress and renew calls for Beijing to take steps to ease the imbalance.

DOJ_NMG_0014649

The 2005 deficit -- 17.5% wider than the 2004 gap, according to a Commerce Department report released Friday -- comes at a time of high economic tensions between Beijing and Washington, and it produced an immediate reaction.

Sen. Charles Schumer, a New York Democrat and one of China's most vocal critics on Capitol Hill, said that "the numbers show the need for China to play fair." Indeed, the yawning trade gap, which came despite an improved performance by U.S. exporters, is expected to reignite a battle over policies that critics say keep China's currency artificially weak, giving its goods an unfair advantage in global markets and threatening U.S. jobs.

That battle seemed to subside last year after China allowed the value of its currency, which had been pegged to the dollar, to fluctuate in a narrow range against a basket of other currencies. Though the increase has been modest, the yuan closed Friday at its highest level against the dollar since the July revaluation.

Even so, Mr. Schumer said that he and Sen. Lindsey Graham, a South Carolina Republican, may push next month for a Senate vote on their proposal to impose a 27.5% across-the-board tariff on Chinese goods if Beijing fails to do more to strengthen its currency. The senators have twice postponed votes on the measure, which enjoys wide support, to give the Bush administration more time to work with China on the issue. But Mr. Schumer said he is running out of patience. Sen. Graham plans to visit China in the spring to stress the depth of congressional concerns.

Oil also contributed to the gap. U.S. imports of petroleum products jumped 39.4% in 2005, as oil prices surged world-wide and refineries along the Gulf of Mexico were damaged by Hurricane Katrina.

But China commanded the bulk of the political attention. For the year, the U.S. deficit with China -- by far its largest gap with any single country -- rose to a record $201.62 billion, up more than 20% from $161.97 billion in 2004.

Despite the political heat generated by such numbers, the economic relationship between the U.S. and China is more complex than the figures indicate. For one thing, Commerce Department's data on trade between two countries includes only goods, not services, where American companies have a greater competitive edge. The U.S. ran a small overall surplus in services in 2005.

The U.S. and China also calculate the trade imbalance differently. Last month Beijing released figures suggesting its trade surplus with the U.S. was only $114.2 billion. Behind the discrepancy is the intermediary role Hong Kong plays in the shipment of goods, argued U.S. Federal Reserve Board analysts in a recent report. Washington counts in its trade figures with China goods shipped through Hong Kong, while Beijing doesn't count those transitory shipments.

Some analysts say all official statistics inflate the value of Chinese exports, because a growing number of U.S. and Asian companies now ship components to China for final assembly. However, China's export figures reflect the full value of those products, rather than the value added in China. More than 58% of China's total exports -- and 64% of its exports to the U.S. -- last year came from foreign companies or foreign joint ventures, according to China's General Administration of Customs.

Businesses in the U.S. and elsewhere also typically share in the profits reaped from marketing Chinese-made goods. For example, a bra produced in China by Ace Style for such labels as Vanity Fair or Calvin Klein retails at Wal-Mart for about $23. Chief Operating Officer Stephen Lo estimates that the Hong Kong-based manufacturer earns about 50 cents for each bra, while the retailer and brand owner earn $1.15 to $2.30 each. The remainder goes to covering production costs, as well as transport and other costs incurred by Wal-Mart Stores Inc.

While some smaller U.S. manufacturers complain about Chinese trade, major American multinationals -- which have benefited from the lower costs of producing and outsourcing there -- have been muted in their criticism. Meanwhile, a January study by the U.S.-China Business Council, which represents U.S. companies doing business in China, says that increased trade with China will lower prices, boosting real disposable income for American families by $1,000 a year between 2001 and 2010.

At the same time, the big U.S. trade deficit with China allows China to lend more money to the U.S. In the first 11 months of 2005, Chinese investors purchased a net $81 billion of U.S. bonds, which may have helped keep U.S. long-term interest rates down. Those kinds of benefits, however, do little to allay the widespread fears sparked by the painful changes wracking the U.S. economy as manufacturing and other high-wage jobs are shipped abroad.

Despite its free-trade leanings, the White House has started tapping into this angst. In his State of the Union speech, President Bush cited the challenge posed by China to justify a new initiative aimed at improving the competitiveness of American industry. Mr. Bush is proposing to boost spending on math and science education and to extend tax breaks supporting business research. Moreover, Mr. Bush's top trade negotiator, Rob Portman, is expected to embrace more aggressive use of trade remedies in his long-awaited "top to bottom" review of U.S. policy toward China. The review could be released as soon as next week.

On Capitol Hill, where lawmakers face election-year pressures, the climate is ripe for legislation that would toughen U.S. policy toward China. Just this week, leading House Democrats unveiled legislation to create a new prosecutor for trade disputes. And a bipartisan group of senators called for repeal of normal trade relations with Beijing, a move that would raise tariffs on goods shipped from mainland China.

DOJ_NMG_0014650

The heightened tensions will add drama to Chinese President Hu Jintao's planned visit to Washington in April. China isn't likely to move aggressively to address currency concerns before then. But as pressure grows on Beijing, one "solution for the Chinese government...to narrow the trade deficit" would be to sign a series of business deals with U.S. companies, perhaps to buy additional civilian aircraft or for U.S. nuclear-energy equipment, said Yuan Gangming, a researcher at Tsinghua University's China and World Economy Center.

Beyond China, total U.S. imports of goods and services last year reached nearly $2 trillion, up $227.8 billion amid strong U.S. demand for foreign-made autos, consumer goods and industrial supplies, among other things. Exports totaled $1.271 trillion, up $119.7 billion, helped by sales of civilian aircraft, medical equipment and heavy machinery.

December's trade deficit was $65.67 billion, up slightly from November's revised $64.69 billion. Exports were $111.51 billion, up $2.3 billion from November. Imports rose $3.3 billion to $177.2 billion. Analysts said that, because the December gap was smaller than prior official estimates, the government might raise its estimate of fourth-quarter economic growth to a 1.3% annualized pace, up from the previously reported 1.1%.

---- Mei Fong, Kersten Zhang, Zhou Yang and Cui Rong contributed to this article.

Write to Greg Hitt at greg.hitt@wsj.com2 and Murray Hiebert at murray.hiebert@wsj.com3

TODAY'S MARKETS (WSJ)

By SCOTT PATTERSON

The Wall Street Journal, February 11, 2006

Oil, Stocks Conclude Volatile Week

Despite Stock Gains,

Market Remains Wary

February 10, 2006 10:44 p.m.

Early Friday, stocks declined as oil prices moved higher. By the end of the day, stocks and oil had switched places, helping to cap a turbulent week on Wall Street with a moderate gain.

Analysts said the decline by oil prices helped ease investors' fears of another factor dragging on stocks: the Federal Reserve.

"Oil has been down all week," said Jay Suskind, director of trading at Ryan Beck. "There's been this fear of inflation, and with [oil prices falling], that takes some pressure out of inflation," leading to hopes that the Fed may not have to raise short-term rates higher than most investors feel comfortable with.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average rose 35.70 points to 10919.05, and is up 1.9% year to date. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index gained 3.21 to 1266.99, up 1.5% for the year, and the Nasdaq Composite Index added 6.01 to 2261.88, up 2.6% this year.

Oil fell 78 cents to $61.84 a barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange Friday, having declined four out of five days this week. For 2006, though, oil is still up 1.3%.

Gold futures, which have whipped around this week, sank $14.50 to $553.50 a troy ounce on the Comex division of the Nymex. For the week, gold is down $17.20 an ounce, or 3%. Gold, which is up 6.4% in 2006, has had six days of move of more than $10 so far this year, and half of those big swings came just this week.

Fed jitters could come back next week, though, when new chairman Ben Bernanke appears before Congress. If Mr. Bernanke sounds a hawkish tone about rates, investors will let the stock market have it.

Despite a strong showing this week, analysts are wary of stocks. The Dow industrials are on a Sisyphusian trek toward 11000 after cracking and losing that elusive level in January. Until blue-chip stocks make another move past 11000, strategists don't think the market can have a strong, sustained rally.

"This kind of churning action is fairly typical of late stage bull markets, and that's where I still think we are," said Kenneth Tower, chief market strategist at CyberTrader. "This bull market started in October 2002, and it's getting old."

Friday, the decline by oil helped investors look past a largely unsurprising government report that the U.S. trade deficit widened9 1.5% in December, hitting a record $725.76 billion for 2005, up 18% from $617.58 billion in 2004. December's $65.68 billion deficit was wider than the $64.70 billion gap expected. A brief rise in oil prices at the open added to the negative tone, though prices have since turned lower.

Investors also kept their eye on the bond market a day after the first auction of 30-year Treasurys in five years. Strong demand for the "long" bond has dropped yields for more seasoned maturities lower than short-term bond yields, leaving the yield curve fully inverted. The two-year Treasury note fell 2/32 point to yield 4.69%, while the 30-year bond slid 21/32 point to yield 4.55%.

DOJ_NMG_0014651

Economists are concerned about the inverted yield curve -- so called because the normally upward slope of yields plotted on a graph is reversed -- which in the past has been correlated with recessions. Weak appetite for short-term securities indicates concerns about the near-term strength of the economy. The curve inverted briefly in late 2005, triggering a stock selloff on Wall Street. In recent weeks, the inversion seems to be worsening.

In major market action:

Stocks rose10. On the New York Stock Exchange, where 1.71 billion shares traded, 1,721 stocks rose and 1,610 fell. On the Nasdaq Stock Market, where 2.04 billion shares traded, 1,358 rose and 1,613 declined.

Bonds declined11. The benchmark 10-year Treasury note fell 12/32, or $3.75 per $1,000 invested, to yield 4.588%. The 30-year bond slid 21/32 to yield 4.553%. Yields move inversely to prices.

The dollar was mixed.12 It traded at 117.80 yen, down from 118.76 yen late Thursday, while the euro fell to $1.1905 from $1.1981.

Stocks Close Higher On Rebound (LAT)

Times Wire Services

The Los Angeles Times, February 11, 2006

Concerns about Pfizer's profit warning and the U.S. trade deficit drag the Dow down most of the day. Major indexes end the week mixed.

Stocks rebounded from an earlier decline to post moderate gains Friday as investors looked past a mediocre outlook from Pfizer and a new record U.S. trade deficit. The major indexes finished the week mixed.

Pfizer's profit warning dragged the Dow Jones industrial average into negative territory for most of the day and added to traders' concerns about weak overall corporate earnings in 2006 amid a slowing economy. A fourth straight record trade deficit of $725.8 billion last year also left Wall Street wondering whether rising energy and import prices could spark domestic inflation.

But the market managed to recoup its losses and pressed higher late in the day, giving the Dow a sturdy advance this week. Analysts have been expecting volatility among stocks following January's rally and with no major events on the horizon to clarify investors' uncertainty about the economy.

Steven Goldman, chief market strategist for Weeden & Co., said traders were assessing the latest round of earnings reports and whether stocks are fairly priced — or even overpriced. He added that the widening gap between short- and long-term bond yields also stoked worries about a downturn.

"To me, valuation on the average stock has reached fully valued territories," Goldman said. "If you look at price-to-earnings-ratios, they're within 7% of the all-time high."

The Dow rose 35.70 points, or 0.3%, to 10,919.05, after losing as much as 63 points early in the session.

Broader stock indicators also reversed course to close higher. The Standard & Poor's 500 index gained 3.21 points, or 0.3%, to 1,266.99 and the Nasdaq composite index advanced 6.01 points, or 0.3%, to 2,261.88.

For the week, the Dow was up 1.2%, the S&P 500 added 0.2% and the Nasdaq slipped 0.03%.

U.S. Treasury yields rose as dealers braced for potentially troublesome comments from new Federal Reserve Chairman Ben S. Bernanke in testimony to Congress next week. Bond yields move in the opposite direction as prices.

In recent days the market has become more convinced that Bernanke's comments will be upbeat on the economy and thus bearish for bond prices, setting the stage for perhaps two more additional rate increases by the Fed.

The 10-year Treasury note rose to 4.59% from 4.54% on Thursday. Gold futures plunged $14.30 an ounce to $550.20.

Crude oil futures slipped following a report suggesting that high prices were starting to stifle demand. The drop came even as concerns about political unrest in oil-producing countries persisted, with a barrel of light crude losing 78 cents to $61.84 in New York trading.

In other market highlights:

· Investors were unhappy with a lowered sales outlook for Pfizer's top-selling Lipitor cholesterol drug. The company's 2006 earnings forecast of $2 a share was 3 cents short of analysts' estimates. Pfizer dropped 66 cents to $25.68.

· Insurer Aon rallied $3.23, or 9.3%, to $38.11 for the best performance in the S&P 500. Its fourth-quarter net income surged to $224 million from $81 million on growth in its North American brokerage business, lower litigation expenses and a gain from the sale of a unit.

An index of insurers gained 1% for the fourth-best performance among 24 industry groups in the S&P 500. American International Group added 78 cents to $67.90, a day after agreeing to pay $1.6 billion to settle fraud and bid-rigging allegations.

· A gauge of energy shares retreated 0.5% for the worst performance among 10 industry groups in the S&P 500 as oil prices declined. Valero Energy, the biggest U.S. refiner, slid $2.33 to $50.65. Exxon Mobil fell 49 cents to $59.43.

DOJ_NMG_0014652

· Oracle confirmed late Thursday that it would cut as many as 2,000 jobs as part of its effort to absorb its recent acquisition of Siebel Systems and issued earnings guidance in line with Wall Street forecasts. Oracle finished flat at $12.69.

Among other technology issues, Google added $3.84 to $362.61 and Apple Computer rose $2.36 to $67.31.

Proxmire Remembered For Humble Handshakes (MJS)

By STEVEN WALTERS

Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, February 11, 2006

State's leaders recall how longtime senator shaped politics

Madison - Former U.S. Sen. William Proxmire was remembered Friday as a Democratic Party pioneer, an everyman who tirelessly shook hands at sporting events and plant gates and who spent only $145 on his last re-election campaign in 1982.

In his 32 years in the Senate, Proxmire was a champion of taxpayers, a man of unquestioned integrity and someone who was not afraid to take on his own party's leaders, said speakers at the Capitol memorial service attended by more than 300.

Proxmire died Dec. 15 at the age of 90.

After Republican U.S. Sen. Joseph McCarthy died while in office in 1957, Proxmire won in an upset in a special election against the sitting Republican governor. That "made it safe for people to vote Democratic in this state," said U.S. Rep. Dave Obey (D-Wis.), the longest-serving member of the state's congressional delegation.

"He was the first to get to the promised land," Obey said.

Proxmire's refusal to take campaign contributions made him independent of all special-interest groups, Obey said. That's especially noteworthy, given the current influence-peddling scandals that have led to the conviction of Washington, D.C., lobbyist Jack Abramoff and investigations of other members of Congress, he said.

"Absolutely no one ever questioned Proxmire's integrity," Obey said.

Proxmire's 1957 win was a "breakthrough" for Democrats, said Gov. Jim Doyle. It ushered in 18 years of two of the nation's leading Democrats - Proxmire and Gaylord Nelson, who died July 3 - representing Wisconsin in the U.S. Senate, the governor added.

Proxmire won that U.S. Senate seat after three straight losing Democratic campaigns for governor.

Two Democratic members of Congress from Wisconsin, U.S. Sen. Russ Feingold and U.S. Rep. Ron Kind, remembered when Proxmire shook their hands as children outside sporting events. Kind said he was 11; Feingold, who was 9 when he first met Proxmire, said the senator shook so many hands that his own right hand sometimes bled.

When Proxmire told Kind, "I'm Bill Proxmire - your U.S. senator," Kind said, it triggered a "lifetime of fascination" with politics.

Kind later worked as an intern in Proxmire's Washington office and helped write some of the senator's speeches - including some of the 3,000 speeches he gave every day the Senate was in session calling for Congress to ratify an international anti-genocide treaty.

That treaty was finally ratified in 1986.

U.S. Sen. Herb Kohl (D-Wis.), who won Proxmire's seat in the Senate after his 1989 retirement, said Proxmire always returned one-third of his office expenses to taxpayers and cast 10,252 straight roll-call votes.

Proxmire "was the last of the true populist politicians," Kohl said.

John Finerty, who served as Proxmire's campaign treasurer, said the senator spent $177 on his 1976 campaign and only $145 on his final campaign in 1982. All campaign donations were sent back, Finerty said.

Finerty said Proxmire's favorite factory gate was at the Allis-Chalmers plant on S. 70th St. in West Allis. Proxmire would shake the of hands of hundreds of factory workers entering and leaving the plant, then sprint to another parking lot to greet shift supervisors and managers, Finerty recalled.

Other speakers recalled Proxmire's legendary fitness - the staples of his diet were fruit, vegetables and freshly squeezed grapefruit juice, Finerty noted - and how he jogged 5 miles each day, including to and from work when he was in Washington.

His widow, Ellen Proxmire, said her husband waged a long, courageous battle with Alzheimer's disease.

As the disease progressed, she said in a taped tribute, "his world became smaller and smaller."

Of Mouse And Women (WP)

By Bob Thompson

The Washington Post, February 11, 2006

Karenna Gore Schiff Writes About Heroines Who Saved the Day

NEW YORK Let's begin with a brief case study in how the cynical, superficial American media (that's us) can distort the lives of political figures and their families.

DOJ_NMG_0014653

We are talking with Karenna Gore Schiff about her new book, "Lighting the Way: Nine Women Who Changed Modern America." The smart, personable 32-year-old daughter of the Man Who Was Almost President tells us she wrote it as a kind of therapy, an antidote to the "punched-in-the-gut" feeling she got whenever she looked at the newspaper after the 2000 election.

We nod. Seems perfectly understandable.

She also wrote the book, she says, because ever since she was a little girl, she has wished there were "more female faces in the historical pantheon." She remembers sitting at her desk at Arlington's Oakridge Elementary School, looking at the chart of the presidents on the wall and wondering why they were all male.

We'll buy that. We've got daughters ourselves, don't we?

In fact, there isn't the slightest reason to doubt the sincerity of the motives that Schiff cites for launching her literary venture. But we have a problem with them anyway.

Her reasons are just a little too . . . reasonable . We start picturing that glazed look in our readers' eyes, the one that shows up just before they abandon us for the Boondocks and Zippy the Pinhead.

Ah, but then Schiff lets her guard down for an instant -- despite a lifetime of watching journalists turn Al and Tipper Gore into unrecognizable caricatures of the parents she knows and loves -- and lets slip something we can twist into a sexier lead.

Why did she really write this book? Hey, isn't it obvious?

It's because her mom wouldn't let her watch "Mighty Mouse" as a kid.

Hold that thought for a while. It may not be quite as ridiculous as it sounds.

* * *

As Schiff explains the origins of "Lighting the Way," she sips water in the living room of the Upper East Side apartment she shares with her husband, Drew, a physician, and their two children, 6-year-old Wyatt and 4-year-old Anna. Built-in bookcases line one wall. There's a ladder in case anyone needs to reach the upper shelves.

In November 2000, she says, she was exhausted from campaigning and looking to focus on her family. Still, she headed down to Washington now and then to be with her parents -- "sitting on the train or the shuttle and trying not to listen to all the conversations around me, because they were so painful" -- as her father contested the Florida election result.

Just losing would have been bad enough. But losing the way Al Gore lost . . . well, it was "a very dark time."

It got worse with 9/11 (Schiff and her family were in Manhattan that day) and the run-up to the invasion of Iraq. She was stunned by the way people who disagreed with the administration's decision to go to war or even questioned the way the war was to be conducted were "shut up and shouted down and pushed aside and more or less called traitors."

Cynicism seemed a logical option, but she didn't want to go there; she had seen too much of it among her generational peers. Instead, she sought refuge in the American past. She would tell the stories of women -- maybe not presidents or even politicians, but public servants just the same -- who had changed the world for the better despite the scorn the "mainstream" heaps on dissenters.

Take anti-lynching crusader Ida B. Wells-Barnett. Born into slavery in 1862, she became the nation's leading agitator against the barbaric practice of stringing up black men for the merest hint of an offense -- never mind if it was false -- toward a white woman. Nothing seems easier today than to say that lynching is wrong, but that was a less-than-mainstream notion in the 1890s. Schiff cites editorials in this newspaper and the New York Times condemning Wells-Barnett for her "exaggerations," as The Post put it, and for her shameful failure to highlight black crimes against whites .

Take Alice Hamilton, a pioneer in occupational medicine. Hamilton "saw men and women poisoned and crippled by their work," as Schiff writes, and became "at the height of the Industrial Revolution, one of the only physicians who made workplace safety her mission." In 1919, she became the first woman appointed to the Harvard faculty, though Schiff notes that the university barred its new hire from ever taking part in commencement or -- God forbid -- receiving "the treasured faculty football tickets."

Or take labor organizer Mary Harris "Mother" Jones, better known these days for lending her name to a left-wing magazine than for her efforts to confront the early 20th-century horrors of child labor. Mother Jones's personal story (she lost her husband and all four children to a yellow fever epidemic) fascinated Schiff, but she was equally concerned to sketch the forgotten context of Jones's activism.

"It was totally accepted by the leaders of the business and the political worlds that 8-, 10-, 11-year-olds were going into factories, working 12-hour days, getting maimed by machinery and poisoned by new chemical processes," she says. "There was no recourse and there was no accountability. They just blatantly defended that, saying, 'That's the free market.' "

Schiff writes about Septima Clark, whose "citizenship schools" were crucial to the success of the civil rights movement, and about Virginia Durr, who fought segregation from the other side of the color line. In addition to Durr's own accomplishments, she witnessed what Schiff calls "one of the most striking moments in United States history."

DOJ_NMG_0014654

At a conference in Birmingham, first lady Eleanor Roosevelt was evicted by police when she sat down in the section reserved for blacks. Refusing to abandon the principle of integration, Roosevelt found a folding chair and plunked herself in the middle of the aisle separating black and white. The New York Times, which covered the Birmingham event, failed to mention this.

Four other formidable women round out Schiff's list. None is a household name. Schiff wanted to add faces to the pantheon, not just praise those already enshrined.

We ask what she found most surprising about the lives of these nine women who fought racism, child labor, industrial poisoning and the indifference of society toward the needs of the poor? The answer comes with a short laugh.

"I was surprised -- and sort of oddly exhilarated -- by the venom in the established media toward them," Schiff says.

* * *

So far, so good. There's one thing that has been nagging at us, however, and we need to politely bring it up.

"Mainstream" is clearly one of Schiff's favorite words -- and it mostly carries a negative connotation. The women featured in "Lighting the Way" struggle constantly against mainstream politicians, the mainstream press and mainstream thinking in general.

But isn't there something slightly odd about this choice, coming as it does from the daughter of a man sufficiently mainstream to win the popular vote in a national election?

We're not criticizing dad , we assure her. Yet we're talking about the son of a U.S. senator, a Harvard-educated family scion seemingly born to high office. We're talking about a congressman, senator and then a vice presidential candidate who balanced a centrist presidential ticket by carefully tipping it neither left nor right. We're talking . . .

Schiff politely interrupts to say she sees her family legacy -- differently.

When she first became politically aware, she explains, it was the middle of the Reagan era. "He was immensely popular," she reminds us, yet her father was saying that "he's taking the country in the wrong direction, he's ignoring things that are truly important." This had a big impact, even on a teen soon to enter a rebellious phase. Another relevant bit of family history -- impressed on her "from early childhood" -- was her grandfather's U.S. Senate defeat in 1970 for being out of the Southern mainstream on Vietnam and civil rights. And by the way, have we checked out her dad's speech last month on wiretapping?

We promise to Google the speech later; we then shift gears slightly.

It's not only that Schiff's women seemed to operate further from the political mainstream than Al Gore has, we suggest. It's that they were mostly neck deep in humanity, fighting for people -- be they 8-year-old children sent to work in mills and mines, African Americans terrorized into second-class citizenship, or factory workers poisoned by lead dust. Gore's major concerns, from the arms race to the environment, gravitate more toward systems and abstractions.

"That is definitely accurate," Schiff says, and laughs. She won't cop to Gore-as-wooden-wonk stereotypes, though. He may not be "the schmoozy type," but that's something she happens to love about him.

Speaking of media distortions: Schiff recalls how her mother got typecast as a pro-censorship prude. This was back in the '80s, when she was pressuring the music industry to put parental advisories on its increasingly raunchy and violent products.

The media version "was just so unrecognizable," she says.

Maybe so, we're tempted to say, but what about that disturbing episode with the cartoon mouse?

* * *

Some of you out there might not remember Mighty Mouse, the non-Disney animated flying rodent whose motto was "Here I come to save the day!" Schiff doesn't even know if he shows up in reruns anymore. But the Mouse of Steel, as he was also known, was quite popular when she was 6 or 7 -- and she wasn't at all pleased when her mother told her she couldn't watch.

"I'm still a little bit upset about it," she says.

"It was a huge fight," the villain confirms when we call later to check out the story. "It was one of those things. I said no."

Sex and violence weren't the issue. It was a gender role thing.

"The theme of every episode was that the girl mouse would get into trouble somehow and be kidnapped," Schiff explains, "and then it would be 'Mighty Mouse to the rescue!' and he would come and rescue her and he would be kissing her at the end and she would be fawning all over him."

Tipper Gore says, "It was giving a message to my daughter. I wanted to change that."

Schiff's immediate response was to watch the forbidden cartoon at a friend's house whenever she could, scarfing "Wonder Bread and butter-and-sugar sandwiches" in defiance of the Healthy Food Police as well. But in the long run, her mother's point got through: "I still internalized that there was something to question there."

"She became a feminist at 11," Gore says. "When I say feminist, I'm talking about equality and awareness of perceptions of roles."

So there we have it. Obviously it was just a short step from confronting the gender implications of "Here I come to save the day!" to writing a book about women with the confidence and drive to, well, save the day themselves.

Ridiculous? Of course.

DOJ_NMG_0014655

But maybe containing a hint of truth just the same.

For the mother-daughter conversation didn't stop with Mighty Mouse. "She was always reminding us to question how women were portrayed in movies or ads or whatever," Schiff says, "and encouraging us to think that we could do whatever we wanted." The three Gore girls got that message from their father, too.

Schiff went from somewhat shy kid in elementary school to confident high schooler who excelled in lacrosse, field hockey and competitive water skiing. She studied history and literature at Harvard and law at Columbia and did a bit of journalism in between.

Along the way, she went through what she calls a "bratty" phase with her mother. She couldn't help but notice that dad was the one with the big career.

"Why don't you work," she would ask, "you know, like my friend's mom?"

With children of her own, Schiff says she understands the conflicts better now. It's one of the things she tried to highlight in the lives of her nine women.

And her own life? When she looks into the future, what does she see?

Maybe she'll do another book, she says, and maybe it, too, will be history related. (She has given some thought to her Tennessee homeboy, Davy Crockett.) She knows she needs time for her kids; she has already left one legal job in which even a part-time schedule was too demanding. But it's a measure of the way the world has changed since her mother and grandmother's day that she gets the do-you-think-about-running-for-office question all the time.

Schiff doesn't know, she tells us. She hasn't ruled it out. But her book, in part, is an exploration of other ways to be a public servant.

We offer no opinion, of course, but we do know this:

If she runs, she's in for a lot of tough questions about that flying mouse.

Rice: Russia Should Send Message To Hamas (AP)

By BARRY SCHWEID

AP, February 11, 2006

WASHINGTON - Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice urged Russian Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov on Friday to send a clear, strong message in any meetings with Hamas officials that the militant group must stop terror attacks on Israel.

In response, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said, Russian officials offered assurances that "they will send this very clear, strong signal" adopted by Russia along with the United States, the United Nations and the European Union in a joint statement approved in response to Hamas' strong showing in Palestinian parliamentary elections.

Russian President Vladimir Putin has invited Hamas officials to Moscow and, while no date has been set, McCormack said the assumption was the talks would be held. Israel has responded to the invitation with fury.

In Jerusalem, Israeli officials said Putin's invitation betrayed Israel and could strain relations between the two countries.

The statement adopted by the Quartet overseeing Mideast peace efforts does not address whether nations should meet with Hamas leaders, and governments are to decide for themselves, McCormack said. Egypt has been holding such meetings.

"The Russians made this decision," McCormack said.

For its part, the Bush administration has pledged to have no contact with Hamas until it renounces its call for Israel's overthrow and accepts the existence of the Jewish state.

Besides Rice's conversation with Lavrov, U.S. Ambassador to Russia William J. Burns has been in touch with the Russians to underscore the view that Hamas is a terrorist organization, McCormack said.

He said the U.S. message to Russia, and Egypt as well, is that "they be consistent in sending the same message to Hamas."

Putin made his overture to Hamas on Thursday during a visit to Spain.

"We have never considered Hamas a terrorist organization," he said. "Having maintained our contacts with the organization Hamas, we intend to invite their leaders to Moscow in the near future to search for solutions."

On Thursday night, Egypt's ambassador to Washington, a veteran observer of ups and downs in Middle East peacemaking, said that dismay over the election of Hamas to form a Palestinian government is symptomatic of memory loss.

Israelis and Palestinians in the past refused to recognize each other, Nabil Fahmy recalled, but a lot of people seem to have forgotten that.

Fahmy suggested there is a lesson to be learned from the fact that the two sides got past their hard-line positions and made headway toward a settlement.

In the current impasse, the rise to political power of the Palestinian group Hamas in recent elections has derailed any serious attempts at peacemaking.

DOJ_NMG_0014656

But Fahmy said, "I would caution against those who say we cannot find a solution."

Reaching into the past to make his point, the ambassador recalled that the Palestine Liberation Organization for years refused to accept the existence of Israel, while late Israeli Prime Minister Golda Meir questioned whether there was an identifiable Palestinian people.

Ultimately, Palestinians came around to acknowledging Israel and Israel has accepted the principle of a Palestinian state.

Fahmy said during a policy discussion at the Woodrow Wilson Center for International Scholars that Egypt was trying to counsel Hamas.

"You need to build on what has been achieved for the Palestinian people," he said.

Egypt is a classic example of an Arab country that turned itself around.

After several wars with Israel, Egypt in 1979 signed a peace treaty with the Jewish state. It exchanged its acceptance of Israel for return of all the land it had lost to Israel in those wars.

The peace treaty has held to this day.

Rice Talks To Russian Foreign Minister Over Hamas (REU)

By Sue Pleming

Reuters, February 11, 2006

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice won assurances from Russia on Friday that Moscow would send a firm message to Hamas that the militant group must change if it wants world support, the State Department said.

Rice telephoned Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov on Friday to discuss Moscow's surprise plans to invite Palestinian election winner Hamas for talks, a move that irked Washington and was not discussed when Rice met Lavrov in London last week.

"We have been assured that should the Russian government meet with Hamas, that they would send that -- that the meeting would be with the intent of sending that clear, strong message," said State Department spokesman Sean McCormack.

The United States classifies Hamas as a terrorist body and has ruled out any direct contact until the militant group renounces violence, disarms militants and recognizes Israel.

The so-called Quartet of peace brokers between the Israelis and the Palestinians -- the United States, the United Nations, Russia and the European Union -- met in London last week and issued a statement threatening to cut aid if Hamas did not meet these conditions. Contacts with the group were not mentioned.

Hamas, which had a convincing win in the January 25 Palestinian election, has masterminded more than 60 suicide bombings against Israelis since 2000. It has rejected conditions laid down for getting aid and says they amount to blackmail.

France, in an apparent break with the United States, has signaled support for the Russian meeting and said such talks might advance the position of the Quartet.

Asked whether he thought Russia's planned meeting with Hamas and France's support highlighted a split in the Quartet in how to deal with Hamas, McCormack said individual nations had the right to choose whether they had any contact with the militant group.

But he stressed the Russians had not yet set a date for a meeting and a decision had not yet been taken over who might attend the discussions.

"What we have stated very clearly is that individual countries will make sovereign decisions about issues related to aid, issues related to contact," said McCormack.

The United States, which has given more than $1.5 billion in aid to the Palestinians since 1993, was working closely with the European Union to discuss legal and other issues connected to giving aid to the Palestinians.

Last year, the EU gave the Palestinian Authority 500 million euros ($615 million).

While the United States and other Quartet members have threatened cutting off aid to a Hamas-led government, they are looking at ways of channeling humanitarian help to the Palestinians without going through Hamas.

France Backs Putin On Speaking To Hamas (NYT)

By Joel Brinkley

The New York Times, February 11, 2006

WASHINGTON, Feb. 10 — France on Friday endorsed Russia's decision to hold talks on the Middle East conflict with Hamas, the radical Islamist Palestinian group, saying the discussion "can contribute to advancing our positions."

Other European countries distanced themselves from the French statement, which appeared to be in defiance of the American and European view that Hamas is a terrorist organization and therefore should not be officially recognized. Israel condemned it. But the United States took a more cautious approach.

DOJ_NMG_0014657

"Our position is not to tell the whole world that they can't talk to Hamas," said a senior State Department official, speaking on condition of anonymity. "That would be hard to enforce. The issue is less who's talking than what they are saying."

On Thursday, President Vladimir V. Putin of Russia said he was considering inviting Hamas, the winner of the Palestinian parliamentary elections on Jan. 25, to Moscow for talks, and on Friday the Kremlin confirmed that it would do so. Mr. Putin's remarks took the Bush administration and European leaders by surprise.

Israel reacted to the Russian decision with fury on Friday. Transportation Minister Meir Sheetrit called the Putin invitation "a real knife in the back."

But in Washington, a State Department spokesman, Sean McCormack, said Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice telephoned the Russian foreign minister, Sergey V. Lavrov, on Friday and was reassured to hear that the Russians would deliver a "clear, strong message" to Hamas.

The United States considers Hamas a terrorist group, and American officials are forbidden to talk to the organization. The European Union's policy on talks is not as clear, several officials and diplomats said in interviews. But none said their countries would talk with Hamas.

Foreign minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier of Germany is to go to Israel and the Palestinian territories on Sunday, but a German official insisted, "He is definitely not going to talk to Hamas."

A French diplomat said France "won't have contacts with Hamas," despite its statement of support for the Russian talks.

Speaking to reporters in Paris on Friday, Denis Simonneau, a French Foreign Ministry spokesman, said Russia had not informed European leaders of its intent to talk with Hamas. Still, he added, "we share with Russia the goal to bring Hamas to the positions which allow us to reach the goal of two states living in peace and security."

"As long as we remain within the framework of the goals and principles that we have set for ourselves, we consider that this initiative can contribute to advancing our positions" — specifically that Hamas disarm, renounce violence, recognize Israel and respect previous agreements with Israel.

Sabbath had begun in Israel by the time the French position became known in Jerusalem on Friday. But Daniel Ayalon, the Israeli ambassador to Washington, said in an interview, "I wish they would not have said anything about having a dialogue with terrorists."

Israeli officials in Jerusalem were less restrained when speaking on Friday about the Russian decision.

Housing Minister Zeev Boim said, "Putin is dancing with wolves."

Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni, returning from New York on Friday, said, "Every sign of weakness and of recognition will be interpreted by Hamas as legitimizing terror."

Egyptian Diplomat Is Released

GAZA, Saturday, Feb. 11 (Reuters) — An Egyptian military attaché kidnapped Thursday by gunmen in Gaza was released unharmed on Saturday, an Egyptian official in Gaza said.

A previously unknown militant group, calling itself the Free Men Brigades, had claimed responsibility for the kidnapping of the diplomat, Hussam al-Musli, demanding the release of all Palestinians held in Egyptian prisons.

The Egyptian official who had announced Mr. Musli's release would not discuss the circumstances.

Israel And US On Back Foot Over Hamas (FT)

By Guy Dinmore And Peter Spiegel

Financial Times, February 11, 2006

US and Israeli efforts to isolate Hamas diplomatically appeared to be further undermined on Friday as France cautiously endorsed a Russian offer of talks with the militant Palestinian group.

The Bush administration and Israel have refused to deal with Hamas – listed as a terrorist organisation by Washington and the European Union – which is forming a government following its victory in last month's Palestinian elections.

US officials admit they were blindsided and dismayed by Vladimir Putin, the Russian president, when he proposed on Thursday inviting Hamas to Moscow for talks. The White House was left urging Russia to use the occasion to underscore the principles it had signed up to as a member of the international Quartet – made up of the US, Russia, the EU and the United Nations – that Hamas recognise Israel, renounce violence and endorse existing agreements.

US officials said they thought they had an understanding that no party would unilaterally talk to Hamas.

Meir Sheetrit, an Israeli cabinet minister, on Friday accused Mr Putin of "stabbing Israel in the back". But France said Russia's initiative could be positive as long as Moscow stuck to the Quartet's agreed principles.

Sergei Ivanov, the Russian defence minister, said all Quartet members would eventually have to deal with Hamas. "Hamas came to power as a result of a free, democratic election," he said at a Nato meeting in Sicily.

DOJ_NMG_0014658

He added, however, that Russia remained troubled by Hamas's refusal to recognise Israel and to commit to resolve its disputes with the Jewish state peacefully.

Sergei Lavrov, Russian foreign minister, on Friday assured Condoleezza Rice, US secretary of state, that Moscow would send Hamas a "very clear, strong signal" that it must meet the conditions of the Quartet, the US State Department said.

Putin's Flexible Definition Of Terrorism (TIME)

By YURI ZARAKHOVICH

Time, February 11, 2006

The Russian leader welcomes Hamas, but jails a Chechnya human rights advocate

Who, exactly, counts as a terrorist? If you're Russian President Vladimir Putin, the definition might just depend on how close or far the "terror" is from Moscow. A court in the Nizhniy Novgorod regional center last week gave a suspended two year sentence to Stanislav Dmitriyevsky, Chair of the local Russian-Chechen Friendship Society, and editor of Rights Defense bulletin. Dmitriyevsky was found guilty of fomenting ethnic hatred, simply because in March 2004, he published an appeal by Chechen rebel leader Aslan Maskhadov — later killed by Russian security services — and Maskhadov's envoy in Europe, Akhmet Zakayev.

Maskhadov, you see, is officially a terrorist in the eyes of the Kremlin. Hamas, however, isn't. Putin said so at his Kremlin press-conference on Thursday, where he extended an invitation — eagerly accepted — to Hamas's leaders to Moscow for an official visit.

Putin's hospitality is understandable; after all, Russia does not have many friends. Those still left, like Belarus, or those now coming back after a long estrangement, like Uzbekistan, are ones who share Putin's views on how to deal with terror closer to home. Yesterday, the Uzbek authorities officially confirmed that a month ago they clamped a seven-year jail sentence on the lawyer and human rights activist Saidjahon Zainabitdinov. His official crimes were conspiring with terrorists and defaming the state. But Human Rights Watch and others believe that his real offense was telling the world — including in an interview with Time — the truth about the mass slaughter of hundreds of civilians in the Uzbek city of Andijan last May.

And so perhaps Hamas, if it wants to stay in Russia's good graces, should learn from this pattern. Terrorism is in the eye of the beholder — so if you can view the world through the cross-hairs of Putin's myopic lens, you'll do just fine.

The Face Of Hamas Rule May Not Include Its Own (LAT)

By Laura King, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, February 11, 2006

Palestinian militants consider forming a government Israel and the U.S. could live with.

GAZA CITY — The militant group Hamas, facing the threat of diplomatic isolation and a precipitous drop in foreign aid when it assumes power, is exploring the possibility of taking a less visible role in the new Palestinian government than might be expected after its sweeping parliamentary election victory.

Though the shape of the new government is not yet clear, options being weighed by the Islamist organization include appointing a nonmember as prime minister and creating a Cabinet made up mostly of people from outside parliament rather than from the ranks of the group's newly elected lawmakers.

Israel, the United States and many Western countries have made it clear they will have no dealings with a Hamas government unless the group renounces its aim of Israel's destruction and disarms its military wing.

However, quirks in the Palestinian parliamentary system, together with all sides' desire to advance their own pragmatic interests, could combine to offer a face-saving path forward, according to an array of analysts, Western diplomats and Israeli and Palestinian officials.

The coming weeks, in their view, could yield a nuanced new Israeli-Palestinian reality under which all parties can claim they are holding fast to their principles while managing to avoid a political confrontation that could trigger the collapse of the Palestinians' fragile economy and governing structure, an outcome almost no one desires.

"It will all depend, if it's finessed the right way, whether the Israeli government can perceive and extend to the public the perception that it is not actually dealing with Hamas," said Joseph Alpher, a former senior Israeli government advisor and editor of the Mideast affairs website http://www.bitterlemons.org .

In the Jan. 25 elections, Hamas won 74 seats in the 132-member Palestinian legislature that is to be sworn in Feb. 18. Under common parliamentary practice, the holder of such a substantial majority would be expected to pick one of its own as prime minister and to allocate itself most of the senior Cabinet positions.

DOJ_NMG_0014659

However, the Hamas leadership, which held internal talks this week in Cairo, has signaled that it may opt for a behind-the-scenes role. Sources at the talks said the group might put forth Gaza businessman Jamal Khudairi — who ran as an independent, though with Hamas' endorsement — as its candidate for prime minister.

Shunning the limelight would give the group, whose formal name is the Islamic Resistance Movement, the advantage of deferring uncomfortable choices about its core beliefs and its self-described mission, which for many years was to kill as many Israelis as possible. Hamas dramatically scaled back its attacks more than a year ago, when it first began running in, and winning, Palestinian local elections.

The formation of a new Palestinian national government could be weeks away, and could even come after Israel's elections March 28. The centrist Kadima party, assembled by Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon before he was felled by a massive stroke last month, holds a commanding lead in the polls, and its platform calls for steps leading to the creation of a Palestinian state.

U.S. law prohibits granting assistance to an organization such as Hamas, which is deemed a terrorist group by Washington. A Hamas-run government stands to lose hundreds of millions of dollars from the U.S. and other countries.

A major stumbling block to setting up a Palestinian government with which Israel and the United States would deal is that the defeated Fatah movement has so far refused to enter into a Cabinet alliance with Hamas. That seemingly rules out the participation of many West-friendly Palestinian officials whose political home has traditionally been Fatah.

But there are other potential scenarios.

One calls for the creation of a "technocrat" government, in which those in charge of day-to-day affairs would be professionals in their chosen fields rather than career politicians. Under Palestinian law, neither the prime minister nor members of the Cabinet are required to be lawmakers.

"This kind of outcome could give everyone a bit of breathing room," said Mahdi Abdul Hadi, who heads a prominent Palestinian think tank. In addition, he said, the idea of a professionally run government could have considerable appeal to Palestinian voters who cast their lot with Hamas primarily because they were fed up with Fatah's corruption and inefficiency.

Another possibility is tapping lawmakers aligned with neither Hamas nor Fatah to serve in the Cabinet. These include a number of internationally respected figures who could make a Hamas-appointed Cabinet far more palatable to the West and Israel.

Salam Fayyad, the highly regarded U.S.-educated former finance minister who ran on a small-party ticket in the recent elections, has reportedly been approached by Hamas intermediaries about the possibility of serving in a senior post. Ziad abu Amr, a prominent political scientist and onetime Fatah strategist who won a seat as an independent, has been mentioned as a potential foreign minister. Other lawmakers from smaller parties include Hanan Ashrawi, who is considered a moderate and is well known as a spokeswoman for the Palestinian cause.

None of these figures has spoken publicly of any potential role for themselves in government. Most have enormous ideological differences with Hamas and say they would refuse to work with the group unless it renounced its violent founding principles. Fayyad, for example, is reported by Israeli media to have told Hamas he could not serve unless the movement abandoned its goal of Israel's destruction.

In the wake of the election, Hamas leaders have explicitly rejected the idea of direct negotiations with the Jewish state. But almost every day, some Hamas policymaker also issues an ambiguous pronouncement regarding Israel's status in the group's eyes.

Ismail Haniya, who was the movement's top candidate in the parliamentary vote, was quoted this week as saying Israel's existence was an undeniable reality, if only because of its military might. "We really can't ignore the fact of a state that is equipped with F-16s," he said.

Israel, however, may harden its stance if it sees cracks in the consensus that Hamas must be shunned unless it recognizes the Jewish state's right to exist and disarms its military wing. On Friday, Israeli officials denounced Russian President Vladimir V. Putin's offer to meet with Hamas officials, with Cabinet minister Meir Sheetrit saying the invitation amounted to "stabbing Israel in the back."

While Hamas weighs its next moves, an important parallel development has been unfolding: an effort to strengthen the Palestinians' executive branch, led by Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas.

Since the elections, Abbas has been seeking to expand his powers in the most sensitive areas: diplomatic contacts with Israel and the rest of the world, the formulation of any peace overtures, and control of the Palestinian security forces.

In coming weeks, Abbas could also create new policy posts to keep key senior associates in positions of influence. And Abbas' aides point out that the Fatah-dominated Palestine Liberation Organization — not the Palestinian government — is the agreed-upon point of contact in any negotiations relating to eventual statehood. Until now, the two had been virtually the same entity.

DOJ_NMG_0014660

Hamas has already warned Abbas against trying to usurp too much power at its expense.

Still, the group is aware of its vulnerabilities. Hamas knows its election performance was propelled largely by anger over Fatah corruption rather than a repudiation of peace hopes on Palestinians' part. The group also understands that its lopsided win was due in large part to the hybrid allocation of seats — half the elected lawmakers were from a national slate and half were from individual district races, where Hamas dominated the field.

In the overall popular vote, Hamas beat Fatah by only about 44% to 41%, with the remaining share going to smaller parties.

Whichever approach Hamas chooses will have pitfalls. Israeli officials and Western diplomats have made it clear they will not accept a "shadow government" in which Hamas too obviously plays the main policymaking role even if it abstains from accepting any senior official positions.

"I don't see a dead end here yet," said Uri Dromi, a former Israeli government spokesman who is now an analyst with the private Israel Democracy Institute. "I see a lot of maneuvering and rhetoric, and Hamas going out of their way to convince everyone they're not lunatics."

Hamas will still have to answer to its street followers, who helped bring it to power. But in determining what kind of government it will seek, the group has suddenly gone from playing to a relatively small audience to a worldwide one.

"It's a very delicate time," said Ghassan Khatib, the outgoing Palestinian planning minister. "But in the end, I think the right people for the job will be found."

*

Special correspondent Fayed abu Shammalah in Cairo contributed to this report.

Cleaning Up Corruption Tops Palestinian Agenda (WT)

By Joshua Mitnick

The Washington Times, February 11, 2006

RAMALLAH, West Bank -- A series of corruption investigations has moved to the top of the Palestinian agenda after Hamas' campaign for clean government produced a rout of the ruling Fatah party in parliamentary elections last month.

Attorney General Ahmed al-Moghani announced this week that he's pursuing 50 cases that could account for $700 million in lost funds. Palestinians say it's a significant first step, but it only scratches the surface of corruption that could implicate top security officials, private sector businessmen, nongovernmental organizations as well as Israelis.

Observers say pursuing such high-profile cases will require the joint political intervention of Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas and the newly victorious Hamas party. With a legal system that has been understaffed and subservient to the executive branch, the cases could take years to prosecute.

"The corruption is huge. It requires political will. I believe there is an understanding between [Mr. Abbas] and Hamas on the direction," said Samir Barghouti, an economist who has consulted for the European Union and the World Bank.

"The election indicated that the top issue that people want to deal with is corruption," he said.

Pursuing the corruption scandals is critical if Palestinians want to restore public trust in their self-rule government. It is also considered essential to restoring confidence of the community of international donors.

The Palestinians received about $5 billion in foreign aid over the past five years, and yet the Palestinian government is on the verge of bankruptcy, Nigel Roberts, World Bank country director for the West Bank and Gaza Strip, said in a recent interview with the Ha'aretz newspaper.

One of the cases being investigated focuses on an imaginary plan to build a pipe factory using $2 million from Italian donors and $4 million from the Palestinian Authority. The cases have pointed to workers in the Finance Ministry, and many expect them to implicate monopolies for withholding tax revenue.

"It's an accumulation of bad governance," said Sam Bahour, a Palestinian technology entrepreneur.

The announcement by the attorney general is seen as an attempt by Mr. Abbas to pre-empt a probe by Hamas, allowing him to save face of discredited Fatah.

Mr. Abbas promised to pursue corruption when he was elected a year ago, but ironically it was Hamas' landslide that stripped his ability to resist the inquiries.

Hamas officials have said that one out of every five government jobs in the government is fictitious -- a figure which would mean an annual loss of almost $200 million to the government. Observers say Hamas will need the cooperation of Mr. Abbas and other Fatah officials so the corruption inquires won't be perceived as an all-out purge.

"It would have been better to open the files before the elections," said Abed Fokaha, a newly elected parliament member from Hamas. "Abbas will [have to] treat this in the most serious manner possible. There is no way back."

DOJ_NMG_0014661

Palestinians say the culture of corruption was brought to the West Bank and Gaza along with Palestinian Liberation Organization leader Yasser Arafat and his contemporaries in the wake of the peace accords that established self-rule a decade ago. A comptroller's report in 1997 suggested there was $300 million missing from Palestinian coffers, but Mr. Arafat's regime intimidated those who warned of graft.

Since then, parliamentary committees of inquiry, public petitions, and even Mr. Abbas' campaign platform have focused on corruption, but not one indictment has been served.

"Some people said, 'Let's not focus on internal issues. We need to focus on the occupation,' " said Omar Assaf, who ran for parliament with the Democratic Front for the Liberation of Palestine on an anti-corruption platform.

Mr. Assaf said he was summarily jailed in 1997 for two months because he accused Palestinian cigarette and petrol monopolies of withholding public money.

"Elsewhere in the world, if a government is labeled corrupt, they will be made accountable," he said. "But here no one has ever been made accountable."

Islamic University Is The Intellectual Center For Hamas (KRT)

By Dion Nissenbaum

Knight Ridder, February 11, 2006

GAZA CITY, Gaza Strip - The basement bookstore at Gaza City's Islamic University has everything a Palestinian student needs to get through the day, from pens and pencils to notebooks and munchies to power up for class.

But the one-stop shop also features a few items that set the campus apart: Stacked at the entrance, alongside bootlegged video games and Harry Potter movies, are DVD tributes to Hamas "martyrs" killed in clandestine attacks on Israelis and recordings of fiery speeches by the Islamist militant group's spiritual leaders.

If Hamas' dramatic ascent to power in last month's Palestinian legislative elections was a political earthquake, Islamic University served as its intellectual epicenter. Virtually every major Hamas figure - living and dead - has taught or studied at the tranquil 25-acre campus in the heart of Gaza City, which some call Hamas U.

Sixteen members of the faculty, staff and university board of trustees will be part of the Hamas bloc in the new Palestinian Legislative Council, making up about one-fifth of the group's dominant majority. Many other incoming lawmakers, including some from the rival Fatah party, polished their political skills in these classrooms.

"Islamic University has been very rich soil for many leaders," said Dr. Jehad Hamad, a professor of political sociology at the rival Al Azhar University across the street.

Over the last 27 years, Islamic University has evolved from a rudimentary campus of tents for classrooms into a widely respected school with 17,000 students.

Here, politics and religion fuse to create a vibrant Hamas incubator that's succeeded in producing the new generation of Palestinian lawmakers.

The group's top political figure, Ismail Haniyeh, studied here. Gaza leader Mahmoud Zahar taught medicine. Jamila Shanty, the founder of the Hamas women's section, worked in the English department. Jamal Naji Khudari, the chairman of the university's board of trustees and an independent candidate backed by Hamas, is being talked about as perhaps the next prime minister.

Abdel Aziz Rantisi, one of the group's best-known leaders, served on the university faculty and denounced President Bush as an "enemy of Islam" at a campus rally a few weeks before Israel assassinated him in 2004. Ismail Abu Shanab, a Hamas political official whom Israel assassinated in 2003, served as the dean of one of the colleges. Mohammed Deif, who's considered the group's top bomb-maker, was a student here alongside Fatah leader Mohammed Dahlan, a newly elected lawmaker who's emerged as one of Hamas' most ardent adversaries.

Traces of Hamas are everywhere on campus. The modest university museum features framed congratulatory letters from "martyrs" Rantisi and Sheik Ahmed Yassin, the Hamas spiritual leader whom Israel also assassinated in 2004. A poster of Yassin hangs on the bookstore wall where the Hamas CDs and DVDs are sold. And the student council long has been dominated by Hamas.

Sitting in his expansive office in a new administration building paid for by Bahrain, Islamic University President Kamalain Shaath took in the Hamas political victory with a mix of optimism, joy and anxiety.

"I am proud to be part of this change," said Shaath, a quiet, Western-trained civil engineering professor. "But I have cautious pride, because this could give more trouble than fruit."

Like so many other institutions across the Gaza Strip and West Bank, Shaath said, his campus has been transformed into a Hamas stronghold, especially in the 15 years since Fatah leaders broke away to create the rival Al Azhar University, a fissure that's led to student clashes over the years.

DOJ_NMG_0014662

"Islamic University was established as any other university, but gradually it became Hamas," Shaath said. "Hamas is affecting the whole community - and we are affected as well."

The university has flourished with aid from around the world, primarily from Arab nations but also from Europe, the World Bank and United States. Intel is launching a $1 million computer-training project this year. The U.S. Agency for International Development has paid for several projects, including a small clean-water program in 2004.

Anna-Maija Litvak, a spokeswoman for U.S. AID, said Islamic University had been "fully vetted" and had signed America's required anti-terrorism certificate before receiving any money.

"Financing higher education and training opportunities is part of our program, and Islamic University is one among many institutions that we fund," she said.

Islamic University essentially operates as two parallel schools: one for the 10,000 women and one for the 7,000 men. Professors hold separate office hours so the halls will be filled with men one hour and women the next. The sexes have segregated cafeterias, classes and even entrances on opposite sides of the campus.

At the women's gate, security guards watch to make sure that students' head scarves don't reveal any hair and they are wearing the appropriate long, loose Islamic dresses. Sometimes the gate watchers hand out tissues to ensure that women don't come onto campus wearing makeup.

Becky Lewis, a University of South Carolina English professor who had a rare opportunity to teach at Islamic University for a semester in 1998 with her husband, said she was surprised when her female students took offense at a description of women wearing bathing suits in a John Updike short story.

After much debate about the story's message, the students decided to write to Updike, praising his writing but criticizing his description of women's bodies.

"They loved it in the end," Lewis said.

No one is quite sure where the new Hamas political era will lead. Some are in favor of a Cabinet dominated not by Hamas but by technocrats acceptable to the outside world. Others, such as 21-year-old Islamic University student Samia Hamaad, want to see the party they voted into power stick to their principles.

Wearing a white head scarf and veil that barely revealed her eyes, Hamaad said Israel should be worried about the incoming government because voters had chosen a strong voice for the Palestinian people.

"Where Islam is found, success is found," the young English major said. "We will help Hamas and trust Hamas to return all our lands - all the lands of Palestine."

Muslims' Fury Rages Unabated Over Cartoons (WP)

By Kevin Sullivan

The Washington Post, February 11, 2006

Demonstrators in 13 Countries Ignore Leaders' Appeals, Newspaper's Apology

COPENHAGEN, Feb. 10 -- Tens of thousands of Muslims took to the streets across Asia, Africa and the Middle East after weekly prayers on Friday, burning Danish flags and shouting anti-Danish and anti-American slogans in a continuing convulsion of anger over cartoons of the prophet Muhammad.

Demonstrators marched in at least 13 countries -- Kenya, Iran, India, Pakistan, Afghanistan, Malaysia, Sri Lanka, Bangladesh, Indonesia, the Philippines, Egypt, Israel and Jordan -- as the global wave of protests, spurred by a Danish newspaper's publication of cartoons depicting Islam's holiest figure and the reprinting of those cartoons in newspapers in other countries, headed toward a second consecutive weekend.

The protesters defied calls for calm from several prominent Muslim leaders and organizations as well as a statement of regret from Danish Prime Minister Anders Fogh Rasmussen and an apology by editors of the newspaper that originally published the cartoons. "The government has done what can be done," Rasmussen said in an interview Thursday. "Neither the government nor the Danish people can be held responsible for what is published in an independent newspaper. And neither the government nor the Danish people have any intention whatsoever to insult Muslims or any other religious community."

In Kenya, police shot and wounded at least one protester Friday as they tried to protect the Danish ambassador's residence. Thousands of demonstrators shouting "Kill Danes! Down with Denmark!" marched from Nairobi's largest mosque following Friday prayers. Riot police fired on a group of at least 200 people who had tried to reach the home of the Danish envoy, Bo Jensen.

"We've certainly heard their message and hope they will go home," Jensen told the Reuters news agency.

In Pakistan, more than 5,000 people demonstrated peacefully in Islamabad in the largest rally in the country since the controversy began. Another 2,000 protesters fought with police in the northwestern city of Peshawar.

DOJ_NMG_0014663

In Kuala Lumpur, Malaysia, several thousand protesters marched from a mosque to the Danish Embassy, shouting, "Destroy Denmark! Destroy Israel! Destroy George Bush! Destroy America!" Others carried placards supporting an economic boycott that has almost halted Danish exports to the Middle East and North Africa.

Addressing a large crowd, Malaysian Prime Minister Abdullah Ahmad Badawi described a "huge chasm that has emerged between the West and Islam," not simply because of the cartoons, he said, but because of Western policies regarding oil, Iraq, Afghanistan and the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

In India, thousands of angry Muslims kicked, spat on and tore Danish flags and burned effigies in the capital, New Delhi, and in the Indian-controlled portion of Kashmir, the Associated Press reported. In Bangladesh, more than 5,000 Muslims marched on Denmark's embassy in the capital, Dhaka, shouting, "Death to those who degrade our beloved prophet!"

In the Middle East, about 2,000 women, young boys and older men marched around the Dome of the Rock shrine in Jerusalem chanting "Bin Laden, strike again!" Large crowds of protesters in Gaza fired gunshots into the air and burned Danish flags. Thousands clashed with police in Egypt.

About 2,000 Muslims marched in Jordan. Demonstrators in Tehran threw gasoline bombs at the French Embassy and shouted, "Death to France!" and, "Death to America!" Several French newspapers have reprinted some of the Danish cartoons.

The violence came despite calls for calm from Ayatollah Ahmad Khatami, a senior cleric.

"I am calling on all religious men not to attack the embassies of the foreigners," Khatami told worshipers in Tehran in comments broadcast live on state radio. "Chanting slogans, staging protests and condemning such measures are holy . . . but I feel that they want their embassies to be set on fire so they can say that they are innocent. Take this excuse away from them."

In Sweden, the government shut down the Web site of a far-right political party's newspaper after it briefly posted a cartoon of Muhammad. It was the first time a Western government has intervened to block a publication in the controversy over the cartoons, the BBC reported.

Richard Jomshof, editor of the newspaper, SD-Kuriren, which is published by the anti-immigration Swedish Democrats, said the action was illegal. Jomshof's paper had posted a cartoon showing Muhammad from the rear, looking into a mirror with his eyes blacked out. He said the cartoon was about self-censorship, but Swedish Foreign Minister Laila Freivalds called it "a provocation" by "a small group of extremists."

In Copenhagen, Flemming Rose, the culture editor of the Jyllands-Posten newspaper, which originally published the cartoons on Sept. 30, was told to take a two-week vacation. "There is no disagreement whatsoever between me and the company," Rose said in an interview. "I'm tired, I have been under huge pressure, and I am grateful to the paper for this time off."

Rose said this week that he intended to print cartoons of Jesus Christ and the Israel-Palestinian conflict. He said the idea was to show that his newspaper would direct satire against all religions. Rose also said he was considering printing cartoons about the Holocaust that an Iranian newspaper intended to publish.

The newspaper's editor in chief, Carsten Juste, later publicly contradicted those statements, and Rose agreed that they represented "an error in judgment."

In Norway on Friday, the editor of Magazinet, a Christian newspaper, apologized to Muslims for reprinting the cartoons, which had made Norway a target of Muslim attacks, including the burning of its embassy in Damascus, Syria. Vebjoern Selbekk, who had initially defended the Jan. 10 publication as an expression of press freedom, said at a news conference: "I address myself personally to the Muslim community to say that I am sorry that your religious feelings have been hurt. It was never our intent to hurt anyone." Selbekk, who said he had received more than 20 e-mailed death threats, then shook hands with Mohammed Hamdan, leader of the Islamic Council in Norway, who urged forgiveness and Selbekk's safety.

"Anyone who touches him touches us," Hamdan said. "Our prophet, Muhammad, has said that everyone can make mistakes, but the best is the one who expresses regret and asks for forgiveness."

Muslims Clash With Police Over Prophet Cartoons (WT/AP)

By Lee Keath, Associated Press

The Washington Times, February 11, 2006

CAIRO -- Thousands of worshippers emerging from Friday prayers demonstrated against drawings of the prophet Muhammad in the Mideast, Asia and Africa, clashing with police in some cities despite religious leaders' attempts to keep marches peaceful.

In Kenya, police shot and wounded one person among about 200 demonstrators trying to march to the residence of Denmark's ambassador.

About 60 protesters in the Iranian capital, Tehran, threw firebombs at the French Embassy, shattering nearly every window on its street facade, even after a cleric at a prominent Iranian mosque urged people not to attack diplomatic missions.

DOJ_NMG_0014664

"Down. Down with France. Down. Down with Israel," the crowd chanted. One firebomb exploded in the embassy and started a small blaze that was quickly extinguished.

The caricatures, one of which showed Muhammad with a bomb-shaped turban, were published first in a Danish paper in September, then reprinted in European papers in recent weeks in the name of press freedom.

Arab governments, Muslim clerics and newspaper columnists have been urging calm, fearing that recent weeks of violence have only increased anti-Islamic sentiment in the West.

Eleven persons have been killed in the protests, all of them during three days of riots this week in Afghanistan. A 12th person died yesterday in Nairobi, the Kenyan capital, when he was hit by an ambulance rushing away the wounded protester.

Denmark's ambassador to Syria announced yesterday he was leaving with his colleagues because the government was offering an "unacceptably low level" of protection following recent violent demonstrations.

In France, an umbrella group of Muslim organizations announced it was suing a French weekly which recently reprinted the cartoons and ran one of its own. The group, representing the country's 5 million Muslims, said it had unanimously voted to take the magazine Charlie Hebdo to court.

Protests appeared to ease in the Mideast in recent days, though the caricatures were brought up in Iran, Lebanon and Iraq as Shi'ite Muslims marked their holy day of Ashura.

But Friday prayers -- a frequent launching ground for political demonstrations -- brought a new wave of protests in Egypt, Jordan, the Palestinian territories and Morocco.

Egypt saw its most widespread protests yet, with thousands protesting in 21 of its 26 provinces, including in Cairo and the second-largest city, Alexandria.

Protests by Palestinians were smaller than in recent days, but vehement. Gunmen fired in the air as thousands marched in Gaza, while about 2,000 women, young boys and older men marched around the Dome of the Rock shrine in Jerusalem, chanting "Bin Laden, strike again" and burning a Danish flag.

In Pakistan, rallies erupted around the country after prayers with some protesters burning foreign-made cheese and breaking windows while others clashed with police.

Thousands also demonstrated in Malaysia, Bangladesh, India and Sri Lanka, although Syria and Lebanon, the scenes of earlier violence, were calm yesterday.

U.S. Seeks Right Tone In Cartoon Uproar (AP)

By Anne Gearan

AP, February 11, 2006

WASHINGTON -- For once, the United States is partly on the sidelines of a clash of ideas between the Muslim world and the West. But the Bush administration is being less than surefooted in responding to the uproar and deadly protests over cartoon images of the Prophet Muhammad that were deeply offensive to Muslims, analysts say.

In the second week of violent protests, tens of thousands of Muslims demonstrated around the world Friday. Iranian youths rioted outside the French Embassy in Tehran despite calls for calm by government and religious leaders.

In its first reaction more than a week ago, the State Department appeared to blame the European media for publishing the cartoons, instead of condemning the violence that resulted, although U.S. officials said their message was misconstrued and taken out of context.

Then, after days of careful statements supporting press freedoms while denouncing violence, President Bush suggested anew that the press had been irresponsible.

"America's initial response was a bit lacking and regrettable, in that it actually sided with those who were offended as opposed to the Europeans, and particularly the Danes, who should have gotten unqualified support," said Reuel Marc Gerecht, a conservative foreign policy scholar at the American Enterprise Institute and the Project for a New American Century.

Both organizations have close ties to the Bush administration.

Gerecht blames Middle East specialists in the State Department for tending to placate antidemocratic Arab regimes and mute criticism that might inflame Muslim anger.

Other analysts gave Washington better marks for its response to what, at first, was an issue primarily affecting Denmark, then other European nations where media republished the Danish cartoons.

"The administration quite rightly struck a balanced tone, balancing freedom of expression with responsibility in the media," said Ibrahim Hooper, spokesman for the Council on American-Islamic Relations, a Muslim civil rights and advocacy group.

As protests turned deadly and European embassies were attacked in Damascus, the administration went on the offensive to accuse Syria and Iran of fomenting and profiting from violence.

"The world ought to call them on it," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Wednesday.

DOJ_NMG_0014665

Bush had earlier implicated Syria. Neither cited specific evidence, but spokesmen later pointed to numerous circumstantial factors, saying massive street protests could not occur in a near-totalitarian state like Syria without official participation.

The U.S. accusations are almost certainly on the mark, analysts said. But the finger-pointing also inserted the administration squarely into the controversy and may have fed the perception among Muslims that the United States was turning the protests to its own ends.

Hezbollah leader Sheik Hassan Nasrallah said Rice and Bush should "shut up," and Muslims should continue their protests.

"Where they started having difficulty, and helping to direct and bring anger toward the United States, was taking the position that this was exploitation by politicians," said Shibley Telhami, a Mideast scholar at the University of Maryland. "While it's true at some level, it comes across as if it's missing the force of it for the vast majority of Muslims."

Gerecht said the administration was right to speak out as the protests turned increasingly ugly, and as Arab government involvement seemed clear.

"What was slightly regrettable was that it took the administration a little bit of time to state the obvious," he said.

Analysts also said they do not detect much satisfaction within the administration that Europeans, not Americans, have caught the brunt of the anger. Many European governments parted company with Bush over the Iraq war, and polls show Europeans are often scornful of U.S. influence and motives overseas.

Europe and the United States both recognize that Muslim immigrants are often more assimilated in American society than they are in Europe, and that the U.S. has been the better for it, said Jon Alterman, Middle East program director at the Center for Strategic and International Studies.

"They all recognize that, so I don't think there's been much schadenfreude (taking pleasure in others' misfortune) that, 'Hey, the Europeans are taking it on the chin for a change,'" he said.

___

EDITOR'S NOTE _ Anne Gearan covers diplomacy and foreign affairs for The Associated Press.

NATO Seeks Closer Ties With Middle East (AP)

By Paul Ames

AP, February 11, 2006

NATO defense ministers sought to calm Islamic anger over cartoons of the Prophet Muhammad at a counterterrorism meeting Friday with Arab countries and Israel.

The United States and other NATO nations have been seeking partners in fighting terrorism by building ties with friendly nations in North Africa and the Middle East.

The meeting on counterterrorism cooperation with NATO's "Mediterranean partners" — Israel, Egypt, Algeria, Morocco, Tunisia, Jordan and Mauritania — was called before the cartoons sparked protests across the Muslim world. But the controversy drew attention Friday.

"What is important here is the word respect, respect for each others' values," NATO Secretary General Jaap de Hoop Scheffer said. "Violence cannot be the answer."

German Defense Minister Franz Josef Jung said: "De-escalation is the message we have today ... We need to make clear how important it is to have a dialogue between cultures."

Despite the conciliatory tone, de Hoop Scheffer made clear that tentative efforts to build ties with the Palestinians had been ended by Hamas' victory in parliamentary elections.

"Contacts with Hamas are out of the question," he told a news conference.

The NATO chief said Algeria, Morocco and Israel "had shown a keen interest" in joining NATO naval patrols to deter potential terrorist smuggling of explosives and other materials through the Mediterranean into Europe.

The NATO ministers stressed the need to modernize their alliance so it can confront new threats such as civil unrest — highlighted this week by attacks on its peacekeepers in Afghanistan by Muslim protesters enraged by the publication of the Muhammad caricatures.

Allies agreed to find the troops needed for the NATO Response Force — an elite unit of between 20,000 and 25,000 troops able to deploy anywhere in the world within five days — to meet an October deadline.

Russia also plans to join that mission. Defense Minister Sergei Ivanov came to Sicily accompanied by a cruiser so Russian sailors could train for the patrols with their NATO counterparts.

Ivanov sought to reassure NATO that Moscow's recent decision to deploy missiles to Belarus was not directed against the western alliance.

DOJ_NMG_0014666

Russia said Thursday that it will deploy four air defense units capable of shooting down targets some 90 miles away, a military official said Thursday.

Russia has close ties with Belarus' authoritarian President Alexander Lukashenko, who has become a pariah in the West for his crackdown on opposition and independent media.

Ministers could not agree over the formation of a pooled fund to pay for costs associated with NATO missions. Under the current system, member countries foot the bills for their operations under NATO.

On the sidelines of the meeting, Dutch Defense Minister Henk Kamp told The Associated Press that the Netherlands may send as many as 1,500 troops to Afghanistan on its two-year mission to expand NATO's peacekeeping operation into one of the most dangerous parts of the country.

"This will be a risky task for the Dutch armed forces and we will send a strong task force," Kamp said. "In total 1,300 to 1500 Dutch soldiers including our air force personnel."

Previous estimates have suggested the Dutch commitment would be between 1,200-1,400 strong, but more may be needed when the Netherlands take on southern area headquarters tasks in Kandahar for six months.

Evangelical Christians Express Little Sympathy For Muslims' Outrage (KRT)

By Matt Stearns

Knight Ridder, February 11, 2006

WASHINGTON - Many conservative Christians have long regarded the media as enemy territory, where traditional values are at best misunderstood and often mocked.

So you might think they would relate sympathetically to Muslim outrage over the Danish cartoons depicting the prophet Muhammad with a bomb in his turban. That outrage has sparked violent protests throughout the Islamic world.

But concerns about the goals of radical Islamic leaders, a sense that a double standard pervades the Muslim media and a general distaste for organized violence have overridden any empathy most Christian conservatives might feel for angry Muslims.

"Unfortunately, the protesters are hinting that the cartoonist might have been right," said the Rev. Ted Haggard, president of the National Association of Evangelicals. "They're killing fellow Muslims and destroying property. Maybe the radical protests are validating the cartoon instead of proving that cartoon wrong."

No Christian leader ever espoused violence to retaliate against "Piss Christ," the controversial 1989 artwork - a photograph of a crucifix submerged in urine - by Andres Serrano, even though that riled many Christians, noted Gary Bauer, president of American Values and a longtime leader among religious conservatives.

"I understand why any religious person would get upset if they think their faith is disparaged in a drawing or a cartoon," Bauer said. "But ... how can (the cartoons) engender a greater emotional reaction than the daily bombings and attacks by groups claiming to do them in the name of Allah?

"It doesn't look like a call for respect," Bauer concluded of the Muslims' protests. "It looks like a call for submission."

Indeed, many evangelical Christians see militant Islam replacing communism as the greatest global threat, said Allen Hertzke, professor of political science and director of religious studies at the University of Oklahoma.

"They see this phenomenon as part of an orchestrated effort by what they call Islamo-fascists to take over the Islamic world," Hertzke said.

Then there's the apparent double standard for acceptable religious satire in Muslim media, especially regarding Jews.

Jews are routinely lambasted and stereotyped in the Muslim media. Hertzke recalled a Syrian TV program shown in Jordan that depicted Jews using the blood of children to make matzo. A recent cartoon on a Muslim group's Web site showed Adolf Hitler in bed with Anne Frank, a teenage Jewish martyr during World War II, saying "Write this one in your diary, Anne."

"Many evangelicals have very positive views toward Jews, and evangelicals support Israel," said John Green, a professor at the University of Akron who specializes in religion and politics. "And it's interesting that in the protests of these cartoons, the language quickly turned anti-Semitic and anti-Israel. That sends up a red flag for evangelical Christians."

Christian conservatives also generally echo the views of the Bush administration, which condemned the Muslim violence but backed off early criticisms of the cartoons themselves. President Bush pointed out that such are the vagaries of life with a free press.

"The appreciation of pluralism is something that every religious group has to grow in," Haggard of the evangelicals' group said. "We evangelicals struggle with this issue every time we send one of our kids off to college. But we think pluralism is a high value. ... Radical Muslim extremists have to grasp that pluralism is a fact of life for all cultures. We're into a new world."

Danish Producers Feel Heat Of Cartoon Boycott (FT)

By Roula Khalaf And William Wallis

DOJ_NMG_0014667

Financial Times, February 11, 2006

You have to squint at the fine print on a box of Lego to know that it comes from Denmark. But in the Middle East these days, Lego's international style branding is not enough to escape the fast-spreading consumer boycott of Danish goods.

Much of the world's attention over the past week has been on the violent protests - including those in Kenya, Malaysia and Turkey on Friday - against the publication of caricatures of the Prophet Mohammed that first appeared in Denmark's Jyllands-Posten newspaper. But in large parts of the Arab world, the consumer boycott of Danish goods is by far the most widespread popular reaction to the cartoons. Previous consumer boycotts in the Middle East (including the long-standing rejection of companies that do business in Israel) have been only briefly successful.

The recent boycott of American goods, after the launch of the "war on terror" and in the aftermath of the Iraq war, petered out, perhaps because of the ubiquitous nature of US products. In contrast Danish goods, limited in the Middle East to a few items including dairy products, butter, cream cheese, pharmaceuticals and Lego, have proved far easier to target.

The mobilisation has been impressive. Starting with calls from influential clerics in Saudi Arabia - as well as Sheikh Youssel al-Qardawi, the Qatar-based Egyptian preacher with a large following across the region - the boycott call was quickly taken up by newspapers and businesses across the Middle East and supported by chambers of commerce and other professional and religious groups.

Peter Mandelson, the European Union's trade commissioner, has warned Saudi Arabia - the birthplace of the prophet and home to Islam's holiest shrines where the boycott has been most faithfully followed - that it would be taken before the World Trade Organisation if it encouraged the boycott. Riyadh says it is not encouraging the embargo.

Only a few governments, including Iran and Libya, have openly supported the action, with others distancing themselves from it but allowing protsets.

According to Khaled al-Maena, editor of the Jeddah-based Arab News, the boycott spread with postings on the internet and chain letters sent through telephone text messages, often by young people. "People also wrote letters to the editors demanding that we support the boycott and businessmen decided to stop buying and selling Danish products," he says.

Employees at one of Dubai's sprawling Carrefour hypermarkets say that blue cheese and Lego were removed from the shelves after customers flocked to return Danish goods they'd already purchased.

At the Alpha supermarket in the upmarket neighbourhood of Zamalek in Cairo, the boycott has been successful - all the Lego has been swept off the shelves. The manager of the supermarket says a decision was made by members of the general union of Egyptian chambers of commerce to adhere to the boycott.

The owner of another Egyptian toyshop that was still stocking Lego says she had not sold a single item in a week. But several people had come in with leaflets with listed Danish products including Lego, urging her to join the boycott. "They asked why am I stocking Lego. Am I not a Muslim," she says.

The boycott appears aimed at soliciting apologies from Europe, particularly the Danish government, for what many Muslims view as a deliberate western attempt to denigrate the image of the prophet.

"We'll wait and see what happens on the political front. The Danish newspaper has apologised. Now lets see if the [Danish] government will too and if these apologies will be accepted or not," says Mahmoud Amr, the general manager of Mansh, the Egyptian distributor of Lego. Raising awareness about the greatness of the prophet seems to be another objective of the commercial protest.

Religious edicts on websites dedicated to promoting Islam to back the boycott but also recommend that Muslim organisations arrange lectures, buy television time and send preachers abroad to teach the world about the virtues of Mohammed. A new organisation dedicated to defending the prophet was set up in Saudi Arabia this week and, in addition to keeping the boycott going, it is reportedly bringing legal action against Jyllands-Posten.

The impact on the Danish companies has yet to become fully apparent. Charlotte Simonsen, head of corporate communications at Lego, says the region represents only 1 per cent of its global sales. Some shops in Kuwait, Qatar and the UAE have removed products from their shelves but she insists there is "no evidence that this represents a wider phenomenon."

But Mr Amr says a week after the boycott began to take hold he halted import orders of Lego because of a collapse in demand. "The extent to which we have been affected is still not apparent yet. But many of our clients are calling and are bringing back the products. This is not the case with all shops but still this means we are badly affected."

Meanwhile Arla, Danish-Swedish dairy products supplier, says it has been losing about £1m a day because of the boycott with total losses close to £10m so far. But the boycott is also hurting local businesses that produce Danish products. Arla, for example, has now halted a £40m project for a dairy plant in Saudi Arabia endangering 800 jobs.

So far, the boycott has been largely confined to Danish goods but, with no apparent let up in the cartoon crisis, there have been some calls for extending it to Norway.

DOJ_NMG_0014668

An opinion piece published this week in Arab News, suggested escalating the boycott to all western products to give the west time “to back down and apologise for the insults they have heaped upon our beloved prophet and to make sure it never, ever happens again.” If Muslims around the world failed to take this proposal seriously, the writer concludes, they should be prepared to eat not only Danish cheese “but their own pride as well.”

Additional reporting by Steve Negus in Dubai and Paivi Munter in Stockholm

For Danish Firms, Boycott In Mideast A 'Nightmare' (WP)

By Kevin Sullivan

The Washington Post, February 11, 2006

Millions of Dollars in Sales Are Lost as Markets That Were Built Over Decades Disappear in Days

COPENHAGEN, Feb. 10 -- The Arla Foods plant in Riyadh, Saudi Arabia, which produces cheese and flavored yogurt drinks, sits idle and the company's 800 employees in the country have been sent home because of a Middle East boycott of Danish goods, following a Danish newspaper's publication of cartoons of the prophet Muhammad.

"It took us 40 years to build up our business in the Middle East, and five days to bring it to a total stop," said Astrid Nielsen, spokeswoman for the Danish company here. She said suspending operations at the Riyadh plant, the company's regional base, and a near-total boycott of the company's products have cost Arla about $1.7 million a day since Jan. 28.

The boycott of Danish goods, propelled by Muslim leaders and imams preaching in mosques, has brought exports of Danish products to the Middle East and North Africa to a virtual standstill. It has scuttled a flow of goods to the region that was worth about $1 billion in the first 10 months of 2005, according to government statistics.

The boycott has been less visible than the angry mobs around the world burning Danish flags, torching embassies and carrying placards calling for "Danish blood." But it has been just as unnerving for Danish business leaders, who have spent decades expanding their sales of food, pharmaceuticals, industrial equipment and other products into the Middle Eastern market.

"As Danes, we are still sort of in a situation where we are thinking this is just a nightmare," Nielsen said, "and we are going to wake up in a little while and find that this didn't happen. We can never hope to regain what we had, but we hope we can reestablish some of it. We have a huge task ahead of us."

Prime Minister Anders Fogh Rasmussen, in an interview Thursday, said the boycott was not a major threat to Denmark's economy.

"According to the latest figures, 3 percent of Danish exports go to the Muslim world," Rasmussen said. "So seen from an overall perspective, it is of minor importance on the Danish trade balance."

Rasmussen, a former economic affairs minister, said it was "too early to make a final assessment" about the long-term impact of the boycott and whether Middle Eastern consumers would eventually start buying Danish products again.

"From experience we know that trade may be resumed in a longer-term perspective," he said. "Danish industries are famous for their ability to adapt to new situations. And our competitiveness is very strong. Danish companies are in very good shape for the time being."

Still, Rasmussen noted that companies such as Arla that do extensive business in the Middle East and North Africa "may be affected very significantly."

"And I strongly regret that, of course, because Arla is not responsible for what is published in a Danish newspaper," said Rasmussen, who has repeatedly expressed regrets that Muslims have been offended by the cartoons of Muhammad, while saying he cannot apologize for what was printed in a private newspaper.

"You can't hold a whole nation responsible for what is published in a free and independent newspaper," Rasmussen said. "I do know that it is very difficult to understand for many people in the Arab streets, because they can hardly understand how free and independent media work. But that's our system. It is unfair to take Danish companies and employees hostage in this case, in an economic sense."

Those arguments carry little weight in places such as the al-Qiswani Supermarket in the West Bank town of Beit Hanina, where prominently displayed posters urge shoppers, "If you love the Prophet, join us in boycotting Danish products." The posters are surrounded by photos of Danish cheeses, powdered milk, chocolates and other products to be avoided.

The store's owner, Abed Qiswani, 42, said his revenue has dropped 5 percent because of the boycott, which he said has been uniformly followed. He used to sell a carton of Danish cheese a week, but now those products are being left untouched, along with products from some other European countries, including French cheeses and Scandinavian cereals.

Qiswani said that when he tried to return his back stock of Danish products, his supplier told him he had lost nearly $200,000 in canceled orders as a result of the boycott in the West Bank and Jerusalem.

DOJ_NMG_0014669

"What has struck me most, though, is that little children come to the store and ask if this is a Danish product," Qiswani said. "Boycotting is a very good thing. Politics is always connected to the economy. The problem these European countries have now is with the Islamic giant, and they should think about who they mess with."

Tariq Maslanani, 11, said he no longer buys French-made Laughing Cow cheese, his favorite, because a French newspaper also ran the cartoons.

"We cannot bear anybody cursing our prophet," said the sixth-grader.

Svend Roed Nielsen, head of trade policy at the Danish Foreign Ministry, said that in addition to daily consumer goods such as cheese and butter, there has been a noticeable drop in exports of pharmaceuticals and medicines to Muslim countries. He said that he was unsure of the exact loss but that those goods accounted for about $104 million in the first 10 months of last year. He said officials had heard that the expected signings of several contracts for Danish machinery and electronic goods had been postponed.

"Things are looking quite bad at the moment," said Keld Winther Rasmussen of the Danish Dairy Board. "We have products in the country we can't sell, in ships that we can't deliver, and products in dairy plants that we will have to find other markets for."

Rasmussen said dairy industry officials had hoped that Prime Minister Rasmussen's televised comments offering regrets for the offense caused to Muslims would improve the situation. "But so far that has had no impact," he said, adding that he hoped that Danish dairy exports to the Middle East would eventually restart. "We hope this is not the end. But we can see that it is going to take a very long time to regain our hold in the market. It could take years."

Bjarne Kristiansen, manager of a dairy in Aalborg, said exports to the Middle East account for 70 percent of his company's sales -- and that market has completely dried up since the boycott took hold. He said his company is losing sales of about 100 tons of feta cheese a week.

"If this continues, after two or three weeks we might have to stop production of feta cheese, which is our main production," he said. "Hopefully we won't have to close completely, but I don't know. It is a terrible situation."

Keld Pedersen, managing director of Nordex Food, said his company has lost 20 percent of its total sales, which normally go to the Middle East. He said the company has had to cut 15 jobs out of its workforce of 200.

"Maybe the government acted too late -- we all did," Pedersen said. "We were all very surprised about how quickly this situation developed. I can't fault the government's efforts now. But Denmark cannot do this alone, and it will not only be Denmark that suffers."

Pedersen said the Jyllands-Posten newspaper, which first published the Muhammad cartoons, "should have been more careful."

"Everyone has the right to freedom of speech, but you can't cry 'Fire! Fire!' in a cinema," he said. "But it's always easier to see these things after they have happened."

Pedersen said he is pessimistic that his company's Middle Eastern market, which it has been building for 25 years, will fully recover.

"I don't think it will ever be the same again," he said. "The consumers won't forget."

Special correspondents Alexandra Topping in London and Sufian Taha in Beit Hanina contributed to this report.

A Most Un-Danish Dane (FT)

By Päivi Munter

Financial Times, February 11, 2006

Denmark, the small north European nation traditionally known as a haven of liberalism, is struggling to find a 21st century strategy to deal with substantial immigration from Muslim countries. The response of the Scandinavian people has been to elect an “un-Danish” leader to protect their Danishness.

In sharp contrast to the laid-back and sociable image the Scandinavians have of themselves, Anders Fogh Rasmussen is a loner and a tough prime minister. Despite this – or perhaps for this reason – he is thought by most of his compatriots to be the right man to defend the cohesiveness of a small and homogeneous nation faced with a large minority that defies the culture of its adopted homeland.

At the end of the toughest week in the 53-year-old Mr Rasmussen’s political career – in which he pleaded to the entire Muslim world for an end to violence over Danish cartoons of the Prophet Mohammed – few cracks have appeared in the prime minister’s support at home. Faced with the most serious international crisis to hit Denmark since the German occupation – in which the Danes successfully protected the country’s Jewish minority – they stand behind the leader they respect, if not love.

DOJ_NMG_0014670

Approval ratings for Mr Rasmussen, who was elected in 2001, have remained above 50 per cent, well ahead of any opposition politician. They have barely fallen since January, when the conflict over the cartoons, first published in the Danish paper Jyllands-Posten, erupted into a global stand-off between the west and the Muslim world.

Mr Rasmussen came to power on a platform that defied the traditional left-right boundaries in a country largely ruled according to social democratic principles. His centre-right coalition built its programme on two cornerstones: a tax freeze and strict restrictions on immigration. These, combined with a pledge to maintain Denmark's cradle-to-grave welfare state, constituted a radical new approach in Danish politics that secured the centre ground for Mr Rasmussen's party.

While the tax freeze has proved popular in high-tax Denmark, it is Mr Rasmussen's tough immigration policy he is best known for. Soon after his election, Mr Rasmussen set about severely curtailing the number of foreign migrants. The government passed laws making it difficult for residents to bring in spouses from outside the European Union – until then a commonly used avenue of immigration among ethnic minorities, the biggest of which are Turks, Iraqis and Lebanese.

Now a resident seeking to bring in a foreign spouse must be over 24 years of age, financially secure and have a lease on an apartment, while the couple must have a demonstrable "connection" to Denmark. These requirements make Danish immigration laws among the strictest in the European Union, a sharp departure from the country's liberal tradition.

While achieving the government's goal of dramatically reducing immigration, the law has caused considerable ill-feeling among Danish immigrants, who argue that the restrictions reflect a growing intolerance towards ethnic minorities and their culture and religion.

The immigration law has damaged Denmark's international standing, as residents married to foreigners – some of them ethnic Danes who find the rigid permit system humiliating – have been forced to emigrate or remain abroad. But the majority of Danes are staunch supporters of the policy, reflected in Mr Rasmussen's high approval ratings a year into his second term.

Danes began to see immigration as a threat to social harmony in the 1990s. A rapidly growing Muslim population that was nearing 200,000 stood out in a traditionally homogeneous country that lived off agriculture until the 1960s. Danes worried that a large part of the new minority was slow in adopting the Danish language and was living living on state benefits on the margins of society.

The growing fears about alien influences on Danish society found resonance in Mr Rasmussen, the son of a struggling farmer from Jutland, Denmark's agricultural heartland, which remains socially much more conformist than liberal Copenhagen.

Nostalgia for the era before mass immigration appears to drive one of the government's latest initiatives, too. A cultural canon, aimed at improving Danes' knowledge of their heritage, will determine the artistic works all school children must study.

Critics of Mr Rasmussen say the parochialism of his humble beginnings in the countryside has never quite left him. He may have earned plaudits for an efficient handling of Denmark's presidency of the EU four years ago, but Danish intellectuals like to joke about Mr Rasmussen's lack of sophistication and exposure to the wider world.

Peter Mose, author of the Handbook for Prime Ministers, says Mr Rasmussen's limitations in foreign policy may have contributed to the cartoon crisis, which has been brewing since September. While the publication of the drawings initially drew little attention, they spawned a controversy after Mr Rasmussen declined to meet a group of ambassadors from Muslim countries who were seeking to raise their concerns over the pictures, regarded as blasphemous by Muslims.

Many observers say Mr Rasmussen should have responded to the concerns early in order to pre-empt a crisis at a time when Denmark's participation in the Iraq war had already strained relations with its Muslim community. Instead, he resolutely defended Danes' right to freedom of expression.

"He is really good in the European context, but outside the EU he is more restricted. This is a problem when Denmark is pursuing an activist foreign policy, of which the war in Iraq is the best indication," Mr Mose says.

So far, however, this criticism is muted. Danes think the man they consider a straight shooter is the safest pair of hands to steer their small nation in a globalised world – even if he is seen by some as an oddball.

Anne Sofie Kragh, author of a biography of Mr Rasmussen, says the prime minister is "one of the most peculiar people I have met". According to the book, he had few friends as a child, but held a single-minded ambition to be a politician before the age of 10. He did not kiss a woman, it is claimed, until he was in his 20s.

"In Denmark, we like things to be relaxed, cosy and nice, whereas he seeks order and perfection. He's far too ambitious to be a typical Dane, which is why he is seen as a strong leader," Ms Kragh says.

Danish Cartoon Editor On Indefinite Leave (NYT)

By Dan Bilefsky

The New York Times, February 11, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0014671

COPENHAGEN, Feb. 10 — Flemming Rose, the Danish editor whose decision to publish cartoons of the Prophet Muhammad helped provoke weeks of fury in the Muslim world, said in an interview on Friday that he was leaving his newspaper on indefinite vacation.

Mr. Rose, 47, stood by the decision of the newspaper, Jyllands-Posten, to publish the caricatures, citing freedom of the press. And he refused to apologize for the drawings, which were seen by many Muslims as sacrilegious and have prompted widespread protests, boycotts of Danish goods and the burning of Danish diplomatic missions in the Middle East.

He said in an interview, however, that the stress of recent events had given him sleepless nights.

"I am thankful that the newspaper has given me the chance to recover," said Mr. Rose, who is the newspaper's culture editor. "I am tired. In the middle of a crisis, you do not always recognize the tensions placed on you. I'm glad someone on the paper had the guts to make the decision to give me a break, because sometimes you want to keep on fighting."

The vacation announcement comes after weeks of violent clashes in Europe, Asia and the Middle East over the cartoons. At least 11 people have died.

After a brief lull on Thursday, demonstrations resumed as thousands of Muslims emerged from Friday Prayer and took to the streets in the Middle East, Asia and Africa, The Associated Press reported. The protests were mostly peaceful, but in Nairobi, Kenya, the police shot and wounded one person as officers tried to keep about 200 demonstrators from marching to the residence of Denmark's ambassador, The A.P. reported.

In Tehran about 60 protesters threw stones, firecrackers and firebombs at the French Embassy, shattering nearly every window on its street front, even after a prominent cleric urged people not to attack diplomatic missions.

Egypt had its largest protests yet, with demonstrations in most major cities. In El Mahalla el Kubra, security forces used tear gas and water cannons to break up a march of about 15,000 people after protesters threw rocks and attacked shops and cars.

Muslim leaders in Denmark said Mr. Rose's leave was unlikely to be enough to lessen tensions in the Muslim world.

"I am not his boss, but I would fire him," said Imam Abdul Wahid Pedersen, a prominent Muslim leader in Copenhagen. "What he did is disgraceful, and I can't even begin to understand what has gone on in his head."

In France, where the editor of France Soir — the first newspaper there to reprint all 12 cartoons — was fired last week, some Muslim leaders considered the fact that Mr. Rose had taken a leave a small victory.

"That's very good news," said Mohamed Henniche, president of the Union of Muslim Associations in a department northeast of Paris. "It shows that there is an evolution and that people recognize that offense has been caused."

After the publication of the cartoons in Denmark and Norway in September, and the republication last week by France Soir, the satirical French weekly Charlie Hebdo followed suit. Several Muslim organizations in France said they were planning legal action against Charlie Hebdo for incitement of hatred.

Mr. Rose acknowledged it had been a mistake to say in an interview with CNN on Wednesday that the paper intended to reprint Holocaust cartoons as part of a contest being sponsored by an Iranian newspaper. He said he had no intention to offend Jews, but had suggested publishing the Holocaust cartoons in order to document cultural satire in the Middle East for a Danish audience.

Mr. Rose also said he had erred in suggesting on Danish television that Jyllands-Posten should reprint previous cartoons satirizing Christians and Jews, including a drawing of the Star of David in the shape of a bomb by a cartoonist who drew one of the Muhammad cartoons.

"I wanted to show that in Denmark we do not have an anti-Muslim bias and that we had published these cartoons before without having riots or boycotts of Danish goods in Israel or Christian countries," he said. Last Saturday, Jyllands-Posten did publish cartoons from the Arab world; one showed Auschwitz with a tower draped in the Israeli flag.

The paper apologized last week for offending Muslims, but has steadfastly stood by its decision to print the Muhammad cartoons.

"I feel sorry if Muslims feel offended and that was not the intention," Mr. Rose said. "But the cartoons were within the acceptable boundaries of free speech in Denmark."

The crisis began in early September when Mr. Rose commissioned the cartoons. He said he came up with the idea after the Danish writer Kare Bluitgen, the author of a children's book about religion, complained that she was having difficulty finding artists to illustrate a book about Muhammad because of fears of violent attacks by extremist Muslims.

Mr. Rose, a former war correspondent in Afghanistan and Iran, known for his fearlessness and trenchant views about immigration, was incensed, colleagues say.

He invited 25 newspaper cartoonists to draw a picture of Muhammad "how they saw him." Twelve cartoonists responded and their pictures were printed on Sept. 30. Mr. Rose said he knew that Islam barred depictions of the prophet because of concern that such images could lead to idolatry.

But he said nothing had prepared him for the reaction that followed.

An Update From France . . . (Remember Those Riots?) (WSJ)

By Theodore Dalrymple

The Wall Street Journal, February 11, 2006

LE VANS, France -- How has France changed since the two weeks of riots last November that should have shaken the country to the core?

The answer is not much. For the vast majority of the French, the riots were little more than a televisual event, to sit at home and watch on the small screen while relaxing after work. It was possible, after all, to travel the length and breadth of the country at the very height of the riots and not know that anything untoward was happening anywhere -- provided, of course, that one did not look at the television, listen to the radio, or read a newspaper or magazine.

The fact is that, for the time being, the banlieues -- the troubled suburbs -- are another country; they do things differently there.

Out of sight, out of mind: Insofar as the rioters had any coherent purpose or intention, it was to protest this peculiar, cold relationship with the rest of French society, but also -- paradoxically -- to defend it. On the one hand they wanted to catch the attention of their wicked stepmother, France; on the other, they wanted to warn her to keep her nose out of their affairs -- petty criminality and the abuse of women. (Remember that the riots were triggered by the deaths of two youths, interrupted by the police while they exercised their fundamental human right to break into warehouses.)

If they cannot be fully integrated into French society, les jeunes want to continue to be what they have hitherto been, which is, de facto, extraterritorial (except, of course, in the matter of social security payments). After all, their only other contact with the rest of French society is with the police, whom they see as an alien force that raids their territory from time to time and despises them. They want their own laws and their own hierarchy: brutal and stupid, no doubt, but at least their own.

The paralysis of the French state in the face of the challenge is almost total. This obese organism is all-powerful in the prevention of change, but utterly impotent in the initiation of change. True, there is a proposal that the curriculum vitae of applicants for posts should henceforth be evaluated by prospective employers without the name or photograph of the applicants attached so that the prospective employers cannot discriminate against applicants of sub-Saharan or North African origin. But whatever slight good this proposal might do, it assumes that the fundamental problem of French society is discrimination, which is not the case.

That is not to say that there is no discrimination. It has been estimated that, for any given level of qualification, there are twice as many unemployed French of African or North African origin as French whose ancestors really were les gaulois. This disregards the fact that in an open economy without formal legal barriers to advancement, discrimination never prevented any minority from advancing, and might even have strengthened determination to do so. The trouble is that the French economy is not a very open one, nor is it likely soon to become one. In an economy as centrally administered and directed as the French, piston -- influence -- is all-important. You have to know someone who knows someone: And it is this that allows discrimination to flourish and for elites constantly to renew themselves while shutting out new recruits.

The French still regard the open economy with horror. A recent poll suggests that, while two-thirds of the population accepted that reform was necessary, they also wanted to keep the advantages of the present system -- a short working week, early retirement for many, and almost invincible job protection. After years of assiduous propaganda, they believe that anything else will lead directly to the horrors of the United States: uninsured people dying of untreated diseases in the streets and, above all, riots.

The case of the state monopoly, EDF (Electricité de France) is instructive, and explains why any reform is so politically difficult. Employees of this vast organization work 32 hours per week; their meals are subsidized to the tune of 50%, their electricity and gas bills by 90%; they can retire at 55; they have the right to holidays at a fifth of their market value, and on average work the equivalent of eight months per year; and when their mother-in-law dies, they can take three days' paid leave to celebrate. These are not all their privileges, only some; so it is hardly surprising that when the government proposed the privatization of EDF, they went on strike. (The government caved in.) They did so in the name of "the defense of public service" -- and the French call the Anglo-Saxons hypocrites!

When a certain critical mass of such subsidy and special privilege for important sectors of the economy is reached, reform becomes impossible without explosion. The government has created an economic monster that it cannot tame, and that is now its master. In any case, periodic explosion has long been the means by which French society has undertaken major political and economic change. In the meantime, repression will become more necessary. For the moment, the banlieues are quiet: That is to say, only 100 cars a night are burned, and life elsewhere continues in its very pleasant way. But there is an underlying anxiety (the French take more tranquillizers than any other nation). No one believes that we have heard the last of les jeunes and of profound economic troubles. The last episode was but a very minor eruption of the social volcano. Every Frenchman believes that the question of a major eruption is not if, but when.

DOJ_NMG_0014673

The mutual odium of the majority population and the children of immigrants in the banlieues has only worsened. Les jeunes are still humiliatingly dependent on a state and country that they have learned to hate, without there being any in which they might feel at home. This is a miserable existential condition, and renders their egos tenderly sensitive to the slightest insult. * * *

The only hopeful sign is the number of intelligent and hardworking young women from the banlieues who, despite everything, are able to find a place in the economy. They know that the only way they will ever escape from the control of the angry, inflamed, humiliated, violent and useless young men around them, primed by Islam to maltreat women, is by struggling for economic independence from them. They are very highly motivated.

The French do not go to the banlieues, but what they fear is that the banlieues will come to them. Perhaps it is starting to happen. My nephew and a friend of his were walking through the Bois de Vincennes, overlooked by elegant Parisian bourgeois apartment blocks, when they were set upon by two Africans and three Arabs. They were not badly injured, but at the hospital their mothers were told by the staff that such attacks, carried out not for gain but for the sheer pleasure of revenge upon the hated comfortable French, were now commonplace.

How strange it is to go to the bakery every day, and be charmed by the politeness of ordinary people and the suavity of everyday life in France, and yet be thinking concurrently that the time for some serious repression may not be far off!

Mr. Dalrymple, a contributing editor at City Journal, is the author, most recently, of "Our Culture, What's Left of It: The Mandarins and the Masses" (Ivan R. Dee, 2005).

Europe Can Take Pride In Defending Cartoons (NYT)

By Roger Cohen International Herald Tribune

The New York Times, February 11, 2006

What should we call it? Anti-Denmarkism? Or anti-Danism? The fact is Denmark, with its bike-riding commuters and sensible social democracy, its dairy farms and Lego factory, never figured much in the hatred stakes. The right expression is elusive.

But I suppose one will have to be found now that four months of global gestation have birthed a cartoon conflagration offering proof, if any were needed, that something is rotten in the state of the world.

Of course, problems arising from perceived insults to the Prophet Muhammad are nothing new since political Islam entered its current effervescence. It was precisely on this charge, in 1989, that the author Salman Rushdie earned Ayatollah Khomeini's fatwa calling on "zealous Muslims" to kill him.

Still the fact that a dozen cartoons - drawings, really - of the Prophet Muhammad that appeared in the Danish daily Jyllands-Posten on Sept. 30, 2005, have led in these early weeks of 2006 to a dozen deaths in Afghanistan, the burning of the Danish Embassy in Beirut, riots in Gaza, and appeals for calm from the White House, suggests the rising anger between the West and the Islamic world.

Yes, anger. Western societies are increasingly exasperated at seeing the Muslim perpetrators of suicide bombings, beheadings and other violence against "infidels" or "apostates" justified or sanctified through references to Islamic texts, be they the Koran itself or the traditions of the Prophet.

These societies are ever more dismayed when they see Islamic radicals, be they from Al Qaeda or agents of Iran's permanent theocratic revolution, claiming to represent a more authentic or pure Islam than the great mass of moderate Muslims. And they wonder why that great mass seems so passive before this affront.

The West, particularly Europe, is also angry that some of the essential liberties and principles of its way of life - not least the equality of men and women, the rights of homosexuals, and freedom of speech - appear unacceptable to some of the growing but estranged Islamic communities in their midst.

The compatibility of a Western liberal, democratic society and Islam as a source of law is widely questioned, especially when the thuggery of a male street mob is a frequent expression of the political exploitation of that law.

As for the Islamic world, particularly in the Middle East, its accumulated frustrations of a post-colonial period marked generally by the imposition of the sorts of brutal one-party states defeated in Europe either in 1945 or 1989 have been sharpened by the West's occupations of Afghanistan and Iraq.

At some level, these Western invasions have revived the age-old confrontation between the Caliphate and Christendom, first experienced in Islam's initial period of expansion into Spain and other parts of Europe, later in defense against the Crusades.

The defense of a notion of pure Islam and Shariah law against what are portrayed as the modernizing and corrupting force of a valueless West identified with the United States, Israel and now Europe has become a powerful jihadist rallying cry.

DOJ_NMG_0014674

Of course, it did not take the West's arrival in Afghanistan and Iraq to ignite these sentiments: the attack of Sept. 11, 2001, is proof of that. But the challenge of these inchoate democratic models to the repressive societies bordering them has provoked growing ferment.

Spontaneous demonstrations are an oxymoron in Syria: The holy outrage over the cartoons in the streets of Damascus reveals the lengths to which a regime that once massacred members of the Muslim Brotherhood will go. In Iran, and in the Gaza and West Bank of Hamas, the public fury is also one measure of political unease.

All this restiveness is naturally projected into the Muslim communities of Europe, whose sense of exclusion, justified perception of prejudice and under-representation in politics have produced strong resentments.

It is against this backdrop that the decision of Jyllands-Posten, and later other European papers, to publish the depictions of Muhammad must be seen. If the initial publication was a provocation, it was also a willed one, an act of defiance, a statement that Europe will not be cowed by fear into putting such sacrilegious images off limits.

As Denmark's principled prime minister, Anders Fogh Rasmussen, has put it: "I will never accept that respect for a religious stance leads to the curtailment of criticism, humor and satire in the press."

Rasmussen is right; Europe has to make clear where it stands on its freedoms. And what, say critics, of anti-Semitic cartoons, or insulting depictions of Roma? Why are they not published, too? Are images offensive to Muslims not just a reflection of Europe's disdain for Islam?

These arguments might carry more weight if radical Islam were not one of the most potent global forces today, its fanatical followers invoking precisely the words or traditions of the Prophet to justify heinous acts.

By what right can such acts, and their supposed holy inspiration, be ruled unfit material for the political caricaturist or satirist? If moderate Muslims will not rise in unison against this abuse of their religion, it is inevitable that Western observers will seek to express their unease.

And what is to be made of all this outrage emanating from Arab societies where the caricaturing of the Jew is commonplace, the anti-Semitic tract "The Protocols of the Elders of Zion" finds wide credence, and certain media regularly express the view that the Holocaust never happened, or was exaggerated, or was a deserved fate for the Jews?

Repressive Middle East regimes have endured in part through such manipulation of their people's ire. In many respects, this outcry is just another example. It is precisely because the difficult Afghan and Iraqi experiments are also attempts to show respect for different religious and ethnic groups that they are creating such disquiet.

Part of that anger has now been channeled into Danish-inspired Muslim anti-Europeanism. But the burning of EU flags, rather than the Stars and Stripes, should be a source of pride to Europeans. It suggests that Europe stands for something after all.

Clash Of Civilization (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 11, 2006

As a way of addressing the Islamist threat to civil liberties in Europe, the Danish cartoons of the prophet Muhammad were hardly ideal. The right to mock a religion may be absolute, but so is the right to publish most forms of pornography: Neither is appropriate in a serious publication. That applies whether the religion is Islam, Christianity or any other, and whether the cartoons are being published for the first time or reprinted elsewhere as acts of solidarity in the face of an implied threat.

But after the attacks on Western embassies in Beirut, Damascus and Tehran, the murder of a Catholic priest in Turkey, the death of at least a dozen people throughout the Middle East in anti-Danish rioting and protests in Europe in which Muslim demonstrators urged a "real Holocaust" on the West, questions about press freedom seem almost quaint. What we are dealing with here is something else entirely.

That something else might be called the premodernism of much of modern-day Islam, meaning the apparent unwillingness of too many Muslims to place reason above "honor" and deal proportionately with intellectual provocations. The Western philosophical tradition is founded on the belief that the execution of Socrates for blaspheming the gods of Athens was an injustice. When British Muslims carry placards reading "Butcher those who mock Islam," they are making their differences with that tradition depressingly plain.

Such premodernism is also on display among those Muslims who have forgotten the reciprocal obligations that the principle of "respect for religion" requires. We'll take the Islamic clerical establishment at its word that Islam forbids pictorial depictions of Muhammad -- and look forward to their fatwas against the anti-Semitic caricatures routinely featured in the Arab and Persian press.

Yet mass demonstrations almost never represent mainstream public sentiment in the West. Why then should we take it as given that they do among Muslims? Every society has its silent majorities, but it's only in democracies that those majorities exercise a decisive influence. If Islamic societies seem premodern and violent, this surely has something to do with the fact that most Muslim countries today are places where there is no democracy; where silent majorities stay silent; where, to adapt W.H. Auden, "only the man behind the rifle has free speech."

DOJ_NMG_0014675

So it has been in the case of the cartoons, which were first published in September, to the fairly muted protests of Danish Muslims. Ambassadors of 10 Muslim countries demanded that the Danish government "take all those responsible to task," apparently forgetting that, unlike in their own countries, Danish authorities do not serve as press censors. Around the same time, an Egyptian newspaper reprinted the cartoons without drawing any noticeable wrath from Muslim clerics.

It was only after a December meeting of the 56 member states of the Organization of Islamic Conferences -- all but a handful of which are dictatorships or absolute monarchies -- that the "outrage" really took wing. No surprise here: as Sari Hanafi of the American University in Beirut told the New York Times, these autocracies made use of the cartoons (the most offensive of which were fabrications) as a way of showing that the expansion of freedom and democracy in their countries would lead inevitably to the denigration of Islam. From there it was but a short hop to the airwaves of al-Jazeera (owned by the Emir of Qatar), whose in-house cleric, Yussuf Qaradawi, a member of the fundamentalist Muslim Brotherhood, issued a fatwa calling for a "day of anger."

Put simply, what we have witnessed isn't the proverbial rage of the Arab street. It's an orchestrated effort by illiberal regimes, colluding with fundamentalist clerics, to conjure the illusion of Muslim rage for their own political purposes. The Iranian mullahs seek to discredit Denmark as it assumes the rotating presidency of the U.N. Security Council, where Iran's nuclear program is being discussed. The secular Allawite regime in Syria wants to shore up its ties with the Sunni religious establishment, especially now that Bashar Assad's former vice president has declared a government in exile. The Saudis want to put behind them the latest stampede at the annual Hajj, where some 350 pilgrims were killed.

And in Europe, clerics and self-styled "community leaders" with close links to the Saudi government or the Brotherhood want to assert their dominance over populations that have yet to find their social or economic place in the mainstream of European life, as November's riots in France showed. The fact that European governments seem easily cowed by threats of violence has only made the problem worse.

In all the uproar, we find it telling that the two places where Muslim communities have shown restraint and moderation is in the United States and Iraq. American Muslims are overwhelmingly middle class, upwardly mobile and not very susceptible to the atavistic urgings of distant dictatorships. In Iraq, an unsilent majority has repeatedly made its views plain about the religious fanatics who demand to speak in their name. Just imagine the kind of anti-Western protests that would be taking place there now if Saddam were still in power.

There's a lesson in this for those who would have us believe that what this cartoon conflagration represents is a conflict of civilizations. There is a conflict all right, not between civilizations, but within one, and it pits those who would make Islam barbaric and those who would keep it civilized. In that struggle, the heirs of Socrates and the heirs of al-Farabi must make common cause.

US Worries Syria Still Blocking UN Hariri Inquiry (REU)

By Irwin Arieff

Reuters, February 11, 2006

Washington remains concerned about Syrian obstruction of a U.N. inquiry into the killing of a former Lebanese prime minister and is watching the matter closely, U.S. Ambassador John Bolton said on Friday.

Bolton spoke with reporters after meeting with Serge Brammertz, the Belgian prosecutor now leading the U.N. investigation of Rafik al-Hariri's assassination in a Beirut truck bombing last February 14.

Brammertz, the former deputy prosecutor of the Hague-based International Criminal Court, took over the investigation last month from German Detlev Mehlis, who had led the probe since June.

With the first anniversary of the murder rapidly nearing, no one has yet been formally accused of killing Hariri.

Several individuals identified as suspects have been detained by Lebanon, and Mehlis, in interim reports to the U.N. Security Council, has implicated senior Syrian intelligence officials and their Lebanese allies in his death.

Syria has repeatedly denied any role in the killing but promised full cooperation after a U.N. Security Council resolution adopted in October demanded it cooperate with the investigation or face unspecified further action.

Damascus has since allowed U.N. investigators to question several Syrian officials but has rejected a request to question Syrian President Bashar al-Assad, raising the possibility of a future showdown with the council.

Bolton said he did not want to discuss the specifics of his talks with Brammertz but told reporters:

"Our concern is that the Syrian obstruction of the Commission's investigation remains. And that is going to be an issue we watch very closely."

DOJ_NMG_0014676

Asked when Brammertz would next report to the Security Council, Bolton said the investigator was "aware of the urgency of the situation ... that is in large measure occasioned by the deliberate obstruction of the crime scene of the Hariri assassination, and obstruction of justice that's going on."

"I think any prosecutor would tell you that each day that goes by in the effort to reach a conclusion on the crime, makes it more difficult," he said.

Still, the U.N. investigative team has the resources and cooperation it needs from the government of Lebanon and was "continuing to make progress," he said.

Turin's Muslims Try To Keep A Low Profile (LAT)

By Tracy Wilkinson, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, February 11, 2006

Some would protest the prophet cartoons but dare not, citing a fear of deportation. But others are using the Olympic Games to make a point.

TURIN, Italy — Like Muslims in many parts of the world, members of the Islamic community here in the host city of the Winter Olympics would gladly hit the streets to protest cartoons satirizing the prophet Muhammad.

But Muslims here say they have been under such fierce surveillance lately by Italian police that they don't dare.

"Either you shut up or you are sent away," said Abramo Haj, a Moroccan restaurateur who has lived in Italy for 26 years. He was standing on the sidewalk here outside a makeshift mosque whose vocal imam was expelled by Italian authorities in September.

Instead of protests by Muslims, Turin, in the run-up to the Olympics, has seen daily demonstrations by a diverse assortment of activists, environmentalists and leftists.

The largest demonstration yet came Friday, hours before the opening ceremonies of the Games. Hundreds of people gathered outside the University of Turin humanities building and along streets where runners bearing the Olympic flame were expected to pass. Repeatedly in recent days, protesters have managed to force the torchbearers to take detours en route to Turin.

Demonstrators sang protest songs, played drums that have come to symbolize the worldwide anti-globalization movement, waved Palestinian and Iraqi flags and burned a paper American flag. A huge red banner hung from the facade of the six-story university building proclaiming "Conflict lives here" — a play on the Olympics 2006 motto, "Passion lives here." Another banner declared: "Laura Bush, go home!" The first lady, who is heading the U.S. delegation to Turin, is scheduled to visit another part of the university today.

Still, the protests have remained relatively low-key. There have been no clashes with the police, who on Friday stood single file in riot gear with shields to block streets and prevent access to the flame's route.

And when Alberto Re, a famed Italian mountaineer, rappelled from the dome of Turin's landmark 500-foot-tall Mole Antonelliana carrying the flame in one hand, even some of the protesters paused and craned their necks to watch.

The demonstrators have a host of complaints: unemployment, a high-speed train that they say will ruin the environment, expensive Olympic venues that they say will become white elephants, corruption, the war in Iraq. Not every cause has an obvious Olympic link, but no matter.

"We are not against the concept of the Olympics; this is not a refusal of sports," said Mateo De Marchi, 19, who was handing out leaflets for the No-Olympics Committee. "It's against the structure of these Olympics … and the corruption," he said, referring to the way the Games have become dominated by big-spending multinational sponsors.

As he spoke, his comrades were lighting their own torch, made of aluminum foil, and using it to burn a Samsung banner.

"The Olympics will be a nice party," said Pino Larobina, 46, a worker at a Fiat-owned truck factory who was carrying an enormous red flag representing his labor union.

"But the fact is Turin is becoming a ghost town because of all the factories closing. When the Games are over, what will they have given the people of Turin, who each month cannot make ends meet?"

Protesters and other critics are especially incensed that Turin has spent $1.4 billion on the Games, which have a price tag of more than $4 billion. They believe that such extravagance will not translate into new jobs in an industrial city that relied so heavily on the now declining Fiat automaker.

"We want to show the contradictions of the city," said university researcher Gippo Mukendi, 33, a communist who is helping organize the demonstrations. "On the one hand they have the Olympics, which makes the city look rich, but only a few people will earn money with the Olympics and nothing will really be left for the city."

Italian law enforcement, gearing up for the Games, spent many months focused on the possibility of terrorist attacks by Islamic radicals. Northern Italy has a large Muslim population, and a small number have been linked to international terrorist groups. Italian authorities say they have hundreds of potential troublemakers under surveillance. About 200 people suspected of belonging to terrorist cells have been deported in the last two years, officials say.

DOJ_NMG_0014677

But more recently, the authorities have focused more closely on leftist groups and anti-globalization activists who seemed more determined to disrupt the Olympics.

On Friday, Interior Minister Giuseppe Pisanu again said the recent violence in the Middle East and South Asia over the cartoons could trigger an improvised attack by an individual. But, he said, neither Italy nor the foreign agencies assisting it had received indications of a planned action by terrorist groups.

The domestic "anarchists," as the government calls them, are a different matter, Pisanu told reporters in Rome. They seek "to take advantage, with spectacular acts, of the Olympics' world stage," he said. "We must take into account a general climate that is rather tense."

Italian Prime Minister Silvio Berlusconi, a right-wing politician running for reelection, said the anti-globalization demonstrators were "subversives" who should be stopped.

"The government could strike in a decisive way anyone who carries out subversive actions at the Olympics in Turin," he was quoted as telling a television talk show Thursday night.

More than 15,000 police officers and army troops, backed by NATO surveillance aircraft and an undisclosed number of Italian and foreign undercover agents, are patrolling Turin and the surrounding Alpine hills and valleys where the Olympics will unfold over the next two weeks.

US Mulling More Nuclear Talks Before Bush India Trip (BOS/REU)

The Boston Globe, February 11, 2006

WASHINGTON (Reuters) - The top U.S. negotiator on a landmark nuclear deal with India may soon visit New Delhi for talks on the troubled accord before President Bush visits South Asia next month, U.S. officials said on Friday.

The deal, agreed in principle last July, would give India access to long-denied civilian nuclear technology, including fuel and reactors, and the failure to resolve serious differences would mar Bush's trip, officials and experts say.

In exchange for access to the technology, India promised to separate its military and civilian nuclear facilities and open the civilian facilities to international inspection.

India's powerful nuclear establishment has raised objections to a "separation plan" the Americans insist must put more facilities under international supervision.

Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns, the chief negotiator who was in New Delhi last month, has discussed with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice making another trip over the next week or so, but they have not made a decision, a State Department official said.

"I think that's just the judgment that he and she have to make -- is this the right time for him to go," said the official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the discussions.

Central to the debate is India's fast breeder reactor program, which would process plutonium from spent fuel from India's existing heavy water reactors.

The chief of India's Department of Atomic Energy Anil Kakodar has complained that putting this program under international monitors would "shackle" his scientists and leave the country dependent on imported uranium.

The landmark accord was agreed in principle last July 18 but negotiating the details has proven tougher than many officials and experts expected. Bush and India Prime Minister Manmohan Singh are both under domestic pressure to protect their respective interests.

"It's doubtful" there will be a resolution of the issue before Bush visits New Delhi in March, a second U.S. official working on the issue told Reuters.

N.Korea Wants Talks With US On Crackdown: Envoy (REU)

Reuters, February 11, 2006

North Korea wants bilateral discussions with the United States over a crackdown on its finances and cannot return to nuclear talks until Washington ends sanctions, an Indonesian envoy said on Friday.

The last round of talks on ending Pyongyang's nuclear programs, which involve the two Koreas, China, Japan, Russia and the United States, was held in November.

Washington, Seoul and others have stressed the financial issue is a separate issue from the six-party talks.

"They indicated to me they are willing to resume the six-party talks provided the United States lift its financial sanctions that have been applied recently to North Korea," said Nana Sutresna, an Indonesian presidential envoy who visited North Korea earlier this week.

DOJ_NMG_0014678

"North Korea has said they want to meet bilaterally on this issue," he told reporters.

Sutresna met top North Korean officials including Pyongyang's number two official Kim Yong-nam.

Washington has offered to brief North Korean officials on the legal basis of its crackdown on companies it suspects of helping North Korea in activities such as counterfeiting.

North Korea has indicated that a briefing was not a high-enough level for the discussions and has sought a meeting between U.S. and North Korean envoys to the six-party talks.

A spokesman for North Korea's Foreign Ministry said in December the briefing offer amounted to "backtracking from the agreement on holding talks to find a solution to the issue."

Indonesia has long ties with North Korea and has been trying to work as a mediator between the two Koreas.

Brazil Poised To Join The World's Nuclear Elite (KRT)

By Jack Chang

Knight Ridder, February 11, 2006

RIO DE JANEIRO, Brazil - While the world community scrutinizes Iran's nuclear plans, Latin America's biggest country is weeks away from taking a controversial step and firing up the region's first major uranium enrichment plant.

That move will make Brazil the ninth country to produce large amounts of enriched uranium, which can be used to generate nuclear energy and, when highly enriched, to make nuclear weapons.

Brazilians, who have long nurtured hopes of becoming a world superpower, are reacting with pride to the new facility in Resende, about 70 miles from Rio de Janeiro.

Other countries enriching uranium on an industrial scale are the United States, the United Kingdom, France, Germany, the Netherlands, Russia, China and Japan.

The plant initially will produce 60 percent of the nuclear fuel used by the country's two nuclear reactors. A third reactor is in the planning stages. The government hopes to increase production eventually to meet all of the reactors' needs and still have enough to export, Brazilian officials said.

"We want to build new power plants and grow our enrichment program to be self-sufficient," said Odair Dias Goncalves, the president of Brazil's National Nuclear Energy Commission. "In the whole world, there's a big reinvestment in this area. Countries are turning back to nuclear energy."

The Resende plant's inauguration had been set for Jan. 20, but was delayed because construction wasn't completed, Dias Goncalves said. The plant may begin uranium enrichment without the hoopla later this month, officials said.

Unlike Iran, Brazil is considered a good global citizen that isn't seeking nuclear weapons, although its military ran a secret program to develop a nuclear weapon as recently as the early 1990s.

Still, some U.S. observers fear Brazil's program will encourage more countries to make nuclear fuel, raising the danger of nuclear weapons proliferation.

The United Nations nuclear watchdog, the International Atomic Energy Agency, earlier this month reported Iran to the U.N. Security Council for failing for three years to disclose all aspects of its nuclear program to agency inspectors. Iran responded by restricting IAEA inspections, a move that stymies efforts to determine whether it's producing fuel for power plants or developing nuclear weapons.

Brazil's nuclear fuel needs, more than 120 tons of enriched uranium a year, don't warrant the country launching an industrial facility like Resende, especially with global supplies of the material running high, said Lawrence Scheinman, a former U.S. arms control official.

"There really isn't much justification for new enrichment facilities unless countries have a very substantial number of reactors to be serviced and don't want to depend on outside suppliers," he said. "Neither Brazil nor Iran are in those positions."

Despite the criticisms, Brazil's program hasn't drawn the outcry that Iran's nuclear plans have. Disagreements between the IAEA and Brazilian officials in 2004 over access to the Resende facility were resolved within months.

Like Iran, Brazil has signed the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty, the global agreement to prevent the spread of nuclear weapons. All of Brazil's 20 facilities using nuclear material are under IAEA safeguards.

Brazilian officials have worked closely with the IAEA throughout Resende's planning and construction, Dias Goncalves said. IAEA inspectors have visited the facility 32 times.

Iranian officials, on the other hand, hid their uranium enrichment work for 18 years and obtained much of their technology from a Pakistani-led smuggling ring. Iran's leaders also have called for the destruction of Israel and are known sponsors of terrorism.

"There is no way to doubt the intent of our plans because they are completely open," Dias Goncalves said. "We have to take account of every gram of uranium used."

DOJ_NMG_0014679

The road to Resende did hit a few bumps in 2004 when Brazil refused to let inspectors view centrifuges used in the enrichment process, saying they had to protect Brazilian-designed innovations vulnerable to industrial espionage.

After months of negotiations, the two sides agreed to a confidential inspection regime, which is still in place, an IAEA official said.

That agreement allows IAEA inspectors to examine material coming in and out of the centrifuges but not the equipment itself, which is covered by opaque panels, said Edson Kuramoto, president of the non-governmental Brazilian Nuclear Energy Association.

Brazilian energy adviser Rogerio Cezar Cerqueira Leite said the Resende plant will allow Brazil to sell to growing markets for enriched uranium and fuel a domestic nuclear program that's bound to expand.

"Without enriched uranium, you don't have nuclear technology," Cerqueira Leite said. "It's not just national prestige. If you don't make it yourself, you will always be behind in the nuclear race."

Many Brazilians see the eventual opening of Resende as the first step in the country becoming a world leader in nuclear research, said Cerqueira Leite. Brazil has the world's sixth largest deposit of uranium.

Teamwork By State And Defense (WP)

The Washington Post, February 11, 2006

The Jan. 21 editorial "A Transformation at State?" inaccurately suggested a lack of cooperation between the Defense Department and the State Department's Office of Reconstruction and Stabilization. The collaboration has been superb.

As The Post reported late last year, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice worked to secure funding in this year's defense authorization measure to support the deployment of State Department personnel in the event of crises. State now has $100 million this fiscal year and next to support such deployments.

In addition to its congressional efforts, the Pentagon has lent the State Department service members to provide military expertise. Combatant commands also have opened their exercises to State participation. Further, State and Defense officials jointly have developed concepts to deal with foreign contingencies.

These efforts hardly add up to a lack of cooperation. Instead, they illustrate a partnership worthy of the mutual respect our agencies have for one another.

R. NICHOLAS BURNS
Undersecretary of State for Political Affairs
Department of State
ERIC S. EDELMAN
Undersecretary of Defense for Policy
Department of Defense
Washington

Rumsfeld Anxious Over Russian Arms Sales (FT)

By Demetri Sevastopulo And Peter Spiegel

Financial Times, February 11, 2006

Donald Rumsfeld, US defence secretary, on Friday expressed concerns about Russian arms sales but dismissed concerns that the US-Russian defence relationship was deteriorating.

“The US prefers that countries not sell weapons to countries on the terrorist list,” Mr Rumsfeld said following a two-day meeting of Nato defence ministers in response to a question about Russian arms sales. Mr Rumsfeld said he was particularly concerned about arms sales to countries such as Iran and Syrian that the US says are supporting the insurgency in Iraq.

The Pentagon last week released a report which said the US “views with increasing concern [Russian] sales of disruptive weapons technologies abroad and actions that compromise the political and economic independence and territorial integrity”.

US-Russia relations have recently deteriorated further following the decision by Moscow last month to cut off gas supplies to Ukraine. Last year, Russia angered the US when the Shanghai Co-operative Organisation – a group that comprises China, Russia, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Tajikistan and Uzbekistan – called on US forces to withdraw from Central Asia.

In July, Uzbekistan ordered the US to withdraw from its Karshi-Khanabad (K2) base. The US is currently negotiating with Kyrgyzstan to continue using Manas air base outside Bishkek.

Mr Rumsfeld refused to discuss his private meeting on Friday with Sergei Ivanov, the Russian defence minister. But one US official said a separate meeting between Mr Ivanov and other Nato defence ministers was “the most candid discussion in a long time”.

DOJ_NMG_0014680

While Mr Rumsfeld raised concerns about the arms sales issue, he dismissed concerns that the relationship was deteriorating. Russia also recently announced it would sell air-defence missile systems to Belarus, an autocratic neighbour whose increasing closeness to Moscow has raised concerns. Mr Ivanov yesterday defended the sales, saying such anti-missile systems were sold by Russia to "dozens of countries throughout the world".

"It is in all its functions a defensive weapon and Belarus is an ally," Mr Ivanov said. "We have to recognise Belarus' right to defend itself. This has nothing to do with our relationship with Nato."

Several of Nato's defence ministers also pushed Mr Ivanov on Friday on Russia's cut-off of gas supplies to Ukraine, raising concerns that Moscow was using its energy assets as geo-strategic bargaining chips. Mr Ivanov defended Russia's position, saying it was only fair to force Kiev to pay market prices for Russian gas, arguing the dispute was "not only the suppliers responsibility".

On gas supplies, Mr Ivanov said Russia would continue to meet its contractual responsibilities. "We continue to sell gas at a loss to ourselves, but we certainly do not have any intention to rip up any contracts that run through 2006."

Mr Ivanov also acknowledged that he had discussed the idea of withdrawing from the Intermediate Nuclear Forces treaty with Mr Rumsfeld, but said neither Moscow nor Washington were currently considering the move.

"When we signed the treaty, nobody besides the US and USSR possessed these missiles," Mr Ivanov said. "I don't think anyone even in their worst dreams could imagine missile technology could spread so quickly. It's just a fact of life. I think you may see all countries have them except Russia and the US."

18 Killed As Militants Fight Russian Force In Town (NYT)

By Alexander Nurnberg

The New York Times, February 11, 2006

MOSCOW, Feb. 10 — A clash between armed militants and security officers in a village in the Stavropol region of southwestern Russia ended Friday evening after more than 24 hours of sporadic fighting, with 12 militants and at least 6 security officers dead.

On Friday night, the local bureau of the Interior Ministry reported that the security operation, which officials said involved "routine preventive passport checking," was continuing. Officers searched other homes in the area, afraid that some militants might still be at large.

The clash ultimately involved about 300 law enforcement officers, including special forces with armored vehicles and other heavy weaponry. One civilian and five security officers were wounded and were hospitalized Friday evening.

According to official reports, the battle began in the village of Tukui-Mekteb as militants opened fire from inside a house, initially killing two police officers. They moved between buildings during the fighting.

Ramazan Khaldayev, a local resident, said the police had first appeared in the village as part of an investigative "mop up" operation. Mr. Khaldayev's home and a neighbor's were searched before gunfire broke out unexpectedly at another house, he said.

As the fight drew to a close on Friday, some security officials denied that they had been unprepared for a battle. The local branch of the Federal Security Service informed Interfax and other news agencies that security forces "had been following this group" as suspected terrorists for some time.

After the clash, security officials argued that they had successfully thwarted an impending terrorist attack. Viktor Barnash, director of the Stavropol region's Anti-Organized Crime Directorate, said the operation had "managed to prevent events of a terrorist nature that would have been similar to Beslan," the southern Russian city where 331 people, more than half of them children, died after a three-day siege by Chechen militants in 2004.

Stavropol has been largely unscathed by the conflict in neighboring Chechnya, but Tukui-Mekteb, which is near Neftekumsk, is not far from the war-torn republic and has been the site of counterterrorist operations in recent years. In February 2002 a militant blew himself up with a hand grenade when discovered by the police, and in September of that year an arms cache was discovered about nine miles from the village.

Trade Showdown Looms As S.Korea Tells US: "No Rice" (REU)

By Kang Shinhye

Reuters, February 11, 2006

South Korea said on Friday that rice should be excluded from a free trade pact with the United States, drawing a line in the debate on one of the most sensitive areas of upcoming talks between the economic powerhouses.

Washington and Seoul appear to be heading for a showdown on the issue even before the opening of formal negotiations on a free trade agreement, which is expected in May.

DOJ_NMG_0014681

The chief U.S. agricultural negotiator said on Wednesday that Seoul must open its long-protected rice market under any deal.

But a top South Korean agriculture official said on Friday that the country was not going to back down on its demand for rice to be exempted.

"We will keep our principle of not giving up the rice market in the free trade talks with U.S.. The idea of being self-sufficient in rice has long been part of the national sentiment," Kim Duck-ho, director of Agriculture Ministry's free trade talks bureau told Reuters by telephone.

"The United States knows quite well that rice is a very sensitive issue in South Korea. If Washington keeps demanding the opening of the country's rice market, a free trade agreement between two countries would be very difficult to reach," another official of the ministry said.

Analysts said agriculture will be one of the toughest sectors for negotiation in the trade deal, especially because of intense opposition from South Korean farmers to liberalization.

South Korean farmers and activists have staged many violent protests against measures to open up the local farm market. They were also at the forefront of often-violent protests at a World Trade Organization meeting in Hong Kong two months ago.

Two-way goods trade between the United States, the world's largest economy, and South Korea, ranked 11th in the world in 2004 by the World Bank, totaled more than $72.5 billion in 2004, with Seoul enjoying a $19.8 billion surplus, according to government figures.

The United States currently sells around $2.4 billion a year in agricultural products to South Korea, which has an average duty on farm products of 50 percent to 60 percent, according to a senior U.S. trade official.

A recent Korea Rural Economic Institute report said that U.S. agricultural exports to South Korea could more than double under a free trade pact, resulting in the loss of up to 130,000 jobs.

South Korea has agreed with nine rice-exporting countries to increase its quota of imported rice incrementally to 8 percent of its total consumption by 2014 from 4 percent in 2004.

In return for that deal, reached in 2004 under the auspices of the World Trade Organization, South Korea won an additional 10-year delay on implementing more extensive liberalization measures for its rice market.

Internet Censorship (WSJ)

By Amy Schatz

The Wall Street Journal, February 11, 2006

Web Firms Face Grilling on China

Executives from Google Inc. and other Internet companies head to Capitol Hill next week, where they will become feature players in an awkward debate: Are U.S. companies giving in to China too easily?

Last month, Google announced an agreement with the Chinese government to censor search results from its Chinese site. It was the latest Internet company to accede to the Chinese government's censorship restrictions, following Cisco Systems Inc., Microsoft Corp. and Yahoo Inc.

The hearing will likely produce more embarrassing publicity for the companies, and it may drive legislative momentum among lawmakers concerned about China's influence on the U.S. economy. Congressional aides are expecting a standing-room-only crowd, and the reception from politicians may be chilly.

"I was asked the question the other day, do U.S. corporations have the obligation to promote democracy? That's the wrong question," says Rep. Chris Smith, the New Jersey Republican and chairman of the House human-rights subcommittee that is holding the hearing. "It would be great if they would promote democracy. But they do have a moral imperative and a duty not to promote dictatorship."

Mr. Smith plans to introduce legislation next week that would impose restrictions on Internet companies seeking to expand into China but also provide some legal protection from Chinese demands.

The bill would require U.S. Internet companies to keep email servers used for Chinese traffic offshore. That would help prevent the Chinese government from compelling the release of Internet user data. The bill also calls for creation of an office inside the State Department that would make an annual determination about which countries are restricting Internet use. It would provide a framework for users to pursue legal action against U.S. Internet companies over privacy violations.

The disclosures about Internet companies cooperating with the Chinese government are having a wider political impact. Last week, Sens. Lindsey Graham, (R., S.C.) and Byron Dorgan (D., N.D.) cited Internet companies' efforts to help the Chinese government monitor citizens' online activity as a reason to permanently revoke China's most-favored-nation trading status.

Ironically, the controversy comes as Google, Yahoo and others are fighting for "Internet freedom" in the U.S. Google is resisting a Justice Department request for information on user searches to help prosecute violations of a federal child-pornography law. Meanwhile, the company has joined competitors to resist plans by telephone and cable companies keen on exerting more control over Internet lines, which has led to concerns about discrimination and content blocking.

DOJ_NMG_0014682

Inside China's Angry Villages (LAT)

By Anthony Kuhn, Anthony Kuhn, The China Correspondent For National Public Radio, Recently Visited Panlong And Taishi

The Los Angeles Times, February 11, 2006

AT A ROADSIDE store across the street from a kindergarten in Panlong village, a local man sat beside his motorcycle having a soft drink and chatting with a visiting reporter on the recent violence the village had experienced.

"Does political power really come from the barrel of a gun?" he asked, questioning Chairman Mao's famous dictum. "Is the gun pointed at the enemy or at the people?"

Such talk seems out of place in Panlong, in the heart of the Pearl River Delta. The delta is in southern Guangdong province, one of China's wealthiest, most industrialized regions. The Cantonese focus on making money instead of talking politics, and their resistance to central government control, is aptly summed up in the popular saying, "The sky is high and the emperor far away."

But Panlong is just the latest village in Guangdong to be racked by violent protests. Peasants blocked a highway to protest what they saw as inadequate compensation for land seized from them by the government. Riot police broke up the demonstration. Similar clashes erupted in December in Dongzhou village and last summer in Taishi village.

Is Guangdong's turbulent present a preview of the rest of the country's future? One recent academic study found that as industrialization and urbanization increase the demand for rural land, developed coastal provinces like Guangdong are increasingly becoming the site of violent clashes over land-use rights.

And unrest is clearly on the rise in China as a whole. There were 87,000 civil disturbances last year — 238 a day — compared with just 8,700 in 1993, according to police statistics. Many involve peasants protesting the confiscation of their land for development purposes, but they are often equally angry about environmental degradation and official corruption. Protests by the urban poor against large-scale layoffs and predatory developers are common.

The rural clashes are evidence of the government's failure to allow farmers the means to resolve their grievances through the press or the courts. They also bespeak a failure of the government's standard tactic for quelling mass dissent: punishing protest organizers while buying off rank-and-file demonstrators with concessions.

In the villages, it's not hard to see the tension below the calm surface. Police and security agents sit in booths at the entrances to Panlong and Taishi, although most people can enter during the day. Dongzhou reportedly remains surrounded by checkpoints where police search vehicles for fugitives.

But villagers are obviously fearful about telling their story to outsiders. Panlong locals speak of being hauled off to lengthy government-run "meetings" or "classes" aimed at forcing them to maintain silence about the clashes. Some village residents say police tap their phones. Chinese media have largely been barred from reporting on the clashes, and the local government has declined requests by foreign journalists to travel to these villages. I entered Panlong and Taishi freely but was picked up by police on my way out of both villages. Authorities deleted my digital pictures of Taishi. Reporting without official permission remains illegal in China.

Over the Chinese New Year, state-run television showed pictures of President Hu Jintao frying rice cakes in the impoverished old revolutionary base of Yan'an. His message was that China will build a prosperous "new socialist countryside" by investing in rural infrastructure and basic public services.

About time, say Chinese economists and rural experts, who have suggested such measures for years. Peasants account for two-thirds of China's population yet receive just 20% of all medical services and similarly low percentages of education and social security spending. Correcting this imbalance without offending urbanites will be a delicate task, to say the least.

Even if spending in rural regions is increased, much of it is unlikely to filter down to the peasants, given the endemic state of official corruption. Chinese experts are pessimistic about the central government's willingness to break the entrenched alliance of local business interests and corrupt officials. Until that happens, local officials will continue to pocket bribes in exchange for giving state-owned land to developers at cut-rate prices, leaving farmers landless, destitute and angry.

The government could do a lot to alleviate rural tensions by increasing farmers' rights: the right to move to the cities without being denied the same benefits as urban dwellers; the right to form farmers' associations to protect their interests; and the right to recall elected village officials who fail to represent those interests. Last year, residents of Taishi tried to exercise that very right, which is already enshrined in national law. The government responded with riot police.

Travel Restrictions Could Upset Trade, European Commission President Warns (PPG)

DOJ_NMG_0014683

By Dan Fitzpatrick, Pittsburgh Post-Gazette

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, February 11, 2006

European Commission President Jose Manuel Barroso defended the relevancy of the 25-nation European Union and called for the United States to ease travel limitations on 10 new member countries in a speech at the University of Pittsburgh yesterday.

The restrictions -- which deny visa waivers to certain European citizens -- could upset transatlantic trade, he said.

Both the United States and Europe have "much to lose if protectionism rises and globalization's wings are clipped," said the commission president, speaking to a packed ballroom at Pitt's Alumni Hall in Oakland. "We need to ensure that the transatlantic economy remains competitive."

Business groups want the United States to open its visa-waiver program to Greece and nine other countries that joined the European Union in 2004, allowing applicants to stay here for three months without a visa.

Europe represents 7 percent of the world population but its exports and imports collectively represent more than 20 percent of all world trade. As many as 14 million jobs depend on the transatlantic relationship between Europe and the United States, Mr. Barroso said.

"I appreciate the efforts already made by the U.S. here but we must ... end this situation of discrimination against the new member states," added the former Portuguese premier.

As president of the European Commission, Mr. Barroso represents 457 million citizens and 25 countries. But following French and Dutch rejection last year of the European Union's first constitution, there are open questions about the future and effectiveness of the continental alliance. To be ratified, the charter needs approval of all 25 member states.

He admitted the French and Dutch votes prompted "much soul-searching" and that "scare stories" warned of paralysis or "even the end of the Union."

Beyond that, critics are concerned about Europe's sluggish economy, high unemployment rate and low productivity rates. There are divisions among the member countries as to solutions -- some want to keep social protections in place; others want more free-market reforms.

Responding to the questions of relevancy and addressing the ivory-tower image of the EU, Mr. Barroso said the Union needs to focus less on bureaucracy and be more responsive to the everyday problems of its citizens, emphasizing jobs, economic growth and the fight against terrorism and global pandemics.

He also wants European governments to put more money into education and research and adopt a common energy policy that emphasizes alternative fuels and reduces Europe's dependence on oil and natural gas.

"Europe needs to embrace change, and not forego the benefits of globalization," he said.

In response to a question from a student, Mr. Barroso said the Union also should do more to foster cultural and religious tolerance, oppose violence categorically and remain faithful to the principle of freedom of expression.

In closing remarks, Mr. Barroso encouraged the audience to think long-term about the Union and its sometimes slow integration efforts. It was only 60 years ago, he noted, that the Nazis' Polish concentration camps were liberated. And as recently as 15 years ago, several countries in Europe still were under totalitarian control.

Even 10 years ago, there was mass carnage in the Balkans.

"Now, we are 25 free democratic counties living together in peace."

G8 'fails To Meet Gleneagles Pledges On Debt' (FT)

By Fiona Symon

Financial Times, February 11, 2006

Group of Eight countries have so far failed to fulfil their high profile commitment to cancel all eligible heavily indebted poor countries' debts to the Industrial Development Agency, the International Monetary Fund and the African Development Fund, according to a report by Toronto University.

G8 countries have completed under half the policy goals they set themselves at the Gleneagles summit last year, according to the interim report published ahead of this weekend's meeting of finance ministers in Moscow.

The university, which has been monitoring the group's compliance with its pledges since 1996, reported that overall compliance was nevertheless at the highest level in four years.

In the six months since Tony Blair, George Bush and their G8 counterparts convened in Scotland, their governments have satisfied the 21 priority commitments they made at the meeting 47.3 per cent of the time, the university's G8 Research Group calculated.

But on the issue of debt cancellation, which was the headline issue at the summit, all eight countries were awarded the lowest score of zero.

DOJ_NMG_0014684

The report notes that some pledges take longer to fulfil than others and that the debt cancellation issue must be regarded as a work in progress. In previous surveys, however, pledges on debt relief have been awarded the highest compliance rates, so this interim score of zero marks a “significant shift”, the report points out.

The G8 scored a perfect 100 per cent on implementing pledges on the Middle East, renewable energy and climate change, but less well, at 67 per cent, on commitments to help build Africa's capacity on trade and inward investment (67 per cent compliance).

On the Middle East, main commitment was the stimulation of a global financial contribution of up to $3bn a year over the next three years.

On renewable energy, the group's “perfect” compliance reflected leaders' commitments to develop markets for clean energy technologies, increase their availability in the developing world and help vulnerable communities adapt to climate change.

Compliance on supporting the Education for All initiative, as well as those geared towards the development of cleaner, more efficient and lower-emitting vehicles were tied at 56 per cent. But the pledge to reduce Iraq's debt by implementing the terms of the November 2004 Paris Club agreement was only 25 per cent achieved.

The US scored the highest rate of compliance overall, at 71 per cent, followed by the UK, with a score of 67 per cent. Russia was the only G8 country to score in the negative range with an interim score of -14 per cent.

University of Toronto: G8 Research Group: Interim Compliance Report, February 9 2006

NATO Commander Fears Rapid-reaction Force Delay (REU)

By Will Dunham And Mark John

Reuters, February 11, 2006

NATO's top commander of operations said on Friday he doubted whether the alliance would have enough troops to declare a long-heralded rapid reaction force fully operational in October as planned.

A delay to the 25,000-strong NATO Response Force (NRF) would be a setback to U.S.-backed efforts to turn the alliance that was Europe's Cold War protector into an outfit able to launch itself into crisis spots around the world at days' notice.

NATO Supreme Allied Commander Europe, Gen. James Jones, in an interview with Reuters at a meeting of NATO defense ministers in Sicily, said NATO allies still had not come up with the final 25 percent of the troops due to serve in the force.

"The reason I'm not confident is it isn't resourced now," Jones said, when asked if he was confident it would be fully operational by October.

"As things stand now, I can't say that, missing 25 percent of a force, that I have a great deal of confidence that we're going to generate 25 percent as if by magic. I'm hoping to get there," he added.

One observer at the talks said U.S. Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld had offered U.S. troops to help plug the gap. Rumsfeld did not allude to any promise at a final news conference but said he was confident the NRF would start on time at full strength.

Washington previously held back from offering many troops because it wants European allies to provide the bulk of the NRF. Major contributors currently include Italy, France, Spain, Germany, Britain, the Netherlands and Norway.

AFRICAN EXERCISE SCALED BACK

Jones also said the alliance would scale back the first major maneuvers for the force, first proposed by Rumsfeld in 2002, in the Atlantic island group of Cape Verde this June.

"We've downscaled the operation in terms of some of the manpower, which is really what costs a lot of money," Jones said. He said some 6,000 troops would take part instead of a planned 8,000, insisting it would still be a valid test.

A trial run of the NRF this winter in delivering aid to victims of Pakistan's earthquake highlighted divisions in the 26-nation alliance over funding and deployment, something the ministers were due to discuss in Sicily.

"NATO must not fritter away its resources on tasks for which other organizations are better suited. Although we would not rule out future humanitarian missions, NATO's core role is military," said a French official who requested anonymity.

That view is shared by other European countries, notably Spain. But others such as United States and Britain insist that in setting up an airbridge to deliver thousands of tonnes of aid in Pakistan, the alliance showed its mettle in such situations.

Aside from differences on when the NRF should be deployed, some nations are also unhappy about the way it is funded.

Spain in particular is aggrieved that the Pakistan operation cost it some 16 million euros ($19 million) because it happened to be one of the countries whose turn it was to provide military resources to the NRF when the relief mission was launched.

It has called for more of the NRF's costs to be financed out of shared NATO funds. But Britain, Germany and France are wary of the principle of more common funding within NATO, arguing it could deter nations from investing in their own national forces.

"We have not yet found an answer to that question," de Hoop Scheffer told a news conference.

DOJ_NMG_0014685

U.N. Staff To Speak With U.S. Attorney (MINNST)

By NICK WADHAMS, Associated Press Writer

Minneapolis Star Tribune, February 11, 2006

UNITED NATIONS (AP) - The United Nations has notified several employees that the U.S. Attorney's Office wants to interview them as part of an investigation into alleged corruption of its procurement division, according to a letter obtained Friday.

The letter from Maria Vicien Milburn, the director of the U.N. General Legal Division, does not outright ask the staffers to meet with the U.S. Attorney for the Southern District of New York, but says the U.N. "has a duty to cooperate" with investigations.

The Associated Press obtained the letter late Friday. The names of the recipients were not disclosed.

The criminal investigation into the U.N. procurement system has already led to a guilty plea from one U.N. employee, Alexander Yakovlev, who admitted in August to wire fraud and money laundering.

An audit by the U.N.'s Office of Internal Oversight Services in January found "substantial evidence of abuse in procurement for peacekeeping operations" that led to financial losses. In 2005, the U.N.'s Procurement Department handled almost $2 billion in purchasing for the peacekeeping department.

The letter, dated Wednesday, says that Secretary-General Kofi Annan has allowed the staffers in question to be interviewed "on a voluntary basis," with diplomatic immunity intact.

In mid-January, the United Nations ordered eight staff members to take paid leave as part of the investigation, including two senior procurement officials.

Press Freedom Boosted In Indonesia (WP)

By Ellen Nakashima

The Washington Post, February 11, 2006

Supreme Court Overturns Ruling Against Magazine Editor

JAKARTA, Indonesia, Feb. 10 -- In a ruling hailed by press freedom advocates, Indonesia's Supreme Court ruled Thursday that the editor of a prominent weekly magazine did not defame a powerful businessman. The court overturned a lower court ruling and threw out the editor's one-year prison sentence.

"This is good for press freedom in Indonesia," said Eddy Suprapto, president of the Alliance of Independent Journalists. "It's not just good for us, but for the people."

The central Jakarta district court had sentenced the editor, Bambang Harymurti, 48, to one year in prison in September 2004 for defamation and "inciting unrest" after the magazine, Tempo, published an article suggesting that Tomy Winata, a banking and real estate tycoon, could stand to gain from a suspicious fire that gutted a large market in Jakarta. An appeals court upheld the decision.

In overturning the lower court decision, the Supreme Court set a precedent by using a 1999 press law rather than the criminal code to review the case. The press law is based on the public's right to be informed and on principles of fairness in reporting.

"The press is the fourth estate," and its function must be protected, said Justice Djoko Sarwoko.

Indonesian courts are not bound by precedent, but Harymurti and his defense team say they hope to use the decision to educate journalists, judges and prosecutors.

"I hope this will become like New York Times v. Sullivan ," said Harymurti, referring to a 1964 ruling that became a cornerstone of press freedom in the United States.

Indonesia's news media, lively if somewhat undisciplined, are trying to strengthen the institution of journalism in a society molded by decades of authoritarianism. Harymurti's appeal was a bright note in a period in which press freedom has been under fresh attack. Plaintiffs continue to sue reporters for up to $1 million in civil libel suits. A new regulation bans local broadcasters from directly relaying news from foreign television and radio stations. For the moment, though, Harymurti's supporters just want to enjoy the victory.

Tempo is often likened to Time magazine, and Harymurti's case drew international attention, with observers flying in from Australia, Asia and Europe to attend his trial.

The case's high profile was beneficial, said Janet Steele, a media professor at George Washington University who is in Jakarta on a Fulbright fellowship. "It made a lot of people think: Should a journalist ever go to prison for doing his job?"

Thursday "was just a really happy day," said Steele, author of "Wars Within," a book about Tempo during part of the 32-year rule of the former dictator Suharto.

Experts Fear Spread Of Avian Flu In Africa (KRT)

By Shashank Bengali

DOJ_NMG_0014686

Knight Ridder, February 11, 2006

NAIROBI, Kenya - Nigerian authorities on Friday battled Africa's first known outbreak of deadly bird flu as experts warned that the virus already could have spread through farms in the country's rural north.

Health officials said they had quarantined large commercial poultry farms and had begun slaughtering poultry in three northern states where birds had been infected with the H5N1 virus, which can be lethal to humans.

They also bulldozed the ashes of 45,000 cremated chickens from a farm in Kaduna state, where the first outbreak was announced Wednesday.

No human cases have been reported in Nigeria. On Friday, two deaths were reported in China and Indonesia, adding to the 88 worldwide deaths previously confirmed by the World Health Organization since 2003.

With the virus having moved south from Europe and the Middle East in recent weeks, experts were closely watching developments in Nigeria, Africa's most populous country and a test for the continent's weak, underfunded public-health systems.

As it is in many African countries, poultry farming is a major industry in Nigeria and millions of people raise chickens in their backyards.

The virus can jump from birds to humans though close contact. If it mutates into a form that passes easily among humans, scientists fear that it could spark a global pandemic.

While Nigeria's response has won praise so far, experts were worried by news reports that tens of thousands of chickens had died mysteriously on large and small farms across northern Nigeria over the past month.

Boubar Seck, the West Africa bird-flu coordinator for the U.N. Food and Agriculture Organization, said that suggested that containment efforts might be too late.

The announcement Wednesday by the World Organization for Animal Health that the virus had landed in Nigeria came as the result of tests on birds that fell sick beginning Jan. 10.

It took that long for the samples to arrive at a laboratory in Italy and be analyzed. Meanwhile, Seck said, the virus probably was spreading.

"We lost about three weeks," Seck said. "That's one of Africa's problems: We don't have the facilities. So while we were waiting, we don't know what was happening with the virus."

The Food and Agriculture Organization said Nigeria's neighboring countries should increase surveillance at their borders to keep out imported poultry. It called on Nigerian authorities to stop the movement of poultry and to close poultry markets in the affected states.

That's a major challenge in a country with a poultry population of 140 million, mostly free-ranging, according to Food and Agriculture Organization estimates.

The Nigerian government has launched a campaign to educate citizens about the virus and has offered farmers compensation for livestock losses. But some experts said that wouldn't persuade small-scale farmers - for whom chickens often are the only sources of income - to report sick birds immediately.

"On commercial farms the government compensation makes it easier to sacrifice birds," said E.B. Sonaiya, the president of the Nigerian branch of the World Poultry Science Association. "But the real problem is with free-ranging birds. They are all over."

Teams of experts from the World Health Organization and other international agencies have begun arriving to assist with the response. The United States has pledged $20 million in emergency aid, and the Food and Agriculture Organization and the U.S. Department of Agriculture have promised to send more than 1,000 sets of protective gear.

Europe 'still Not Ready For Flu Pandemic' (FT)

By Andrew Jack And Raphael Minder

Financial Times, February 11, 2006

If a flu pandemic were to hit Europe in the next few months, officials would struggle to cope with information overload and the absence of clear co-ordination and decision-making authority.

These were among the key lessons drawn from a secretive European Union-wide flu pandemic simulation held last November, the findings of which are being finalised ahead of a briefing to senior politicians in the weeks ahead.

"Common Ground", co-ordinated by the UK Health Protection Agency (HPA) on behalf of the European Commission, was designed to test the extent to which the EU could cope with a public health emergency.

Its findings will be particularly important as on Friday identified fresh outbreaks of the lethal H5N1 bird flu strain in Greece and Nigeria. China also reported its eighth human death from the virus.

Officials have stressed that the exercise was a considerable success, highlighting areas for improvement, and showing progress in areas identified as problems by a previous exercise.

But a number of participants have expressed concern with the shortcomings the simulation brought to light.

DOJ_NMG_0014687

During the two-day simulation, participants drawn from government, international agencies and pharmaceutical companies across the EU struggled to discern what information was of value when a centralised computer network was inundated with reports of local outbreaks.

There was also confusion as to which agencies or governments would take critical decisions, such as the point at which vaccine manufacturers should switch from producing current seasonal flu doses to a pandemic strain.

A preliminary briefing obtained by the Financial Times stressed the need for "a simplification of the interaction between different co-ordinating institutions and agencies".

It also calls for efforts to improve "the functionality of the existing communications systems", the development of "visual information tools" and greater co-ordination between member states to share messages.

In a recent interview with the FT, Markos Kyprianou, the EU's health commissioner, lamented delays on the part of member states in informing Brussels about their preparations for seasonal vaccination. Orders had to be placed this month if vaccines were to be ready in time for next winter's flu, he said.

Mr Kyprianou said he fully recognised that responsibility for building up stocks was not a Brussels competence, but warned that Brussels could then not be asked to play a co-ordinating role – either for seasonal flu or for a possible emergency anti-viral stock for bird flu – if it was kept in the dark about national measures. "I need numbers,'' he said.

¦ Following the discovery of infected swans in Greece, Brussels said on Friday that it had asked Greece to create a safety cordon, disinfect poultry farms and increase overall precautionary steps, pending the outcome of testing expected this weekend.

Bird Flu Spreads To Azerbaijan (NYT/REU)

By Reuters

The New York Times, February 11, 2006

BAKU (Reuters) - Avian flu was discovered in a new country on Friday with Azerbaijan finding the lethal H5N1 strain in wild birds floating dead on the Caspian Sea, and two more deaths from the virus were reported in China and Indonesia.

The virus was discovered in birds in the west African country of Nigeria earlier this week, extending what a senior United Nations official called a devastating spread from southern Asia over the past seven months.

Health experts are trying to warn people of the danger of a virus that is contracted through direct contact with infected birds. But episodes in countries as far apart as Nigeria and Iraq showed the struggle they face.

Nigerian poultry farm workers used their bare hands to throw dead chickens onto fires as village children stood by to watch in an area where H5N1 flu virus has been found.

In the southern Iraqi city of Amara, which is investigating a death that may have been caused by bird flu, children played among the dead fowl.

The World Health Organization (WHO) has already confirmed 88 human deaths since the virus re-emerged in late 2003 and the figure is steadily climbing.

Indonesia said a woman being treated for bird flu at a specialist Jakarta hospital had died and another patient was in critical condition.

The virus has also killed a 20-year-old woman farmer in the central Chinese province of Hunan, the Ministry of Health said.

There are fears the virus could mutate to a form where it can spread from human to human, sparking a pandemic in which millions could die.

David Nabarro, who heads the U.N. drive to contain the virus, said there was no evidence it had mutated to that point, but added: ``It's not far away."

SPREADING WESTWARDS

A senior scientist at the World Health Organizationoffered a glimmer of hope, saying a limited number of migratory birds appear to be spreading a single sub-strain of the H5N1 virus.

In theory, this could lower opportunities for the H5N1 to mutate into an easily transmissible form, according to Michael Perdue, an epidemiologist in WHO's global influenza programme.

``It could reduce the mutation level... You are less likely to have widespread mutation than if you had 20 strains hop-skotching across Asia."

Genetic sequencing of the virus found in chickens in northern Nigeria, completed late on Friday, showed it also closely matched that in poultry outbreaks in Turkey and China.

AZERBIAJAN HIT

Azerbaijan, a state that lies on a crossroads between Asia and Europe, reported its first outbreak of H5N1 on Friday.

Azerbaijan said the virus had been found in wild birds floating dead off its coast.

DOJ_NMG_0014688

The birds were found in the Caspian Sea near the Absheron peninsula, which includes the capital Baku, and off the southern Massaly region, near the border with Iran, Emin Shakhbazov, deputy head of the country's veterinary service, told reporters.

Four children died in neighbouring Turkey last month from an outbreak of the virus.

NIGERIA CAMPAIGN

Villagers in Nigeria said their domestic poultry were dying too, reinforcing suspicions that bird flu may be present not only in large commercial farms but also in people's backyards in Africa's most populous country.

``We are working on this farm without taking care of our health, but what else can we do? We are calling on the government to come and help us," said Alhaj Danliti, the manager of the farm, which is a stone's throw away from the village.

He said the farm had lost 10,000 chickens, almost its entire stock, and he did not know the nature of their disease. Several chickens collapsed and died with a yellow liquid leaking from their beaks.

Nigeria was urged to step up measures to control bird flu, clamp down on poultry trade and use culling, vaccination and movement controls where outbreaks occur.

``Control measures need to be intensified," the World Organization for Animal Health (OIE) and the U.N. Food and Agriculture Organization (FAO) said.

Preval's Lead Narrows In Haiti Election (REU)

By Jim Loney

Reuters, February 11, 2006

Former President Rene Preval could be headed for a runoff in Haiti's first election since Jean-Bertrand Aristide was ousted two years ago, according to the latest election results issued on Friday.

With about half the votes counted, Preval held 50.3 percent, just barely above the majority he would need to avoid a runoff on March 19. In results released on Thursday, Preval held 61 percent, when only 15 percent had been counted, and appeared on his way to an outright victory.

Another former president, Leslie Manigat, was in second place with 11.4 percent and industrialist Charles Baker held third with 8.3 percent, according to the results published on the Provisional Electoral Council's Web site.

Preval, a protege of Aristide and the favored candidate of Haiti's poor masses, was heavily favored to win Tuesday's election, in which Baker, the candidate of the impoverished Caribbean nation's wealthy elite, has asked for an investigation into possible fraud.

Baker said on Friday he had asked election officials to investigate whether people were allowed to vote more than once because voter lists were not followed. "We had a lot of (polling station) volunteers who said they saw people voting five times, seven times, eight times," he said.

International observers have said they saw some irregularities at polling stations but have not suggested the results were tainted by fraud.

A victory for Preval could prove unsettling to the United States, which worked to push Aristide from power two years ago. On Friday, Washington urged Preval, who maintained a low profile in his mountain hometown of Marmelade in the north, to oppose Aristide's return from exile in South Africa.

Preval inherited Aristide's strong support in the slums of Port-au-Prince and his possible victory concerned the wealthy elite who helped push Aristide from office.

Preval, who led the poorest nation in the Americas from 1996 to 2001, has not claimed victory. But he said earlier on Friday he was not surprised by the results known so far.

"During the campaign I felt the enthusiasm which would translate into a favorable vote for me," he told the Miami Herald and Reuters television in an interview.

Preval, 63, was president between the two terms of Aristide, a firebrand former Roman Catholic priest accused of despotism and corruption before he was driven out.

Although he has put some distance between himself and his mentor, Preval has said there is nothing to stop Aristide from returning to Haiti from his South African exile.

(Additional reporting by Oliver Ellrodt in Marmelade)

Awkward Start For Canada's New Leader (NYT)

By Clifford Krauss

The New York Times, February 11, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0014689

TORONTO, Feb. 10 — Prime Minister Stephen Harper has gotten off to a shaky start in his first week in office, facing a rash of criticism for three cabinet appointments that appeared to compromise his past positions on making government more democratic and ethical.

Mr. Harper, a Conservative, won a narrow victory and tenuous control of the House of Commons last month by promising that he would make Ottawa more accountable and that he would clean up after several Liberal Party scandals.

During the campaign Mr. Harper promised to halt the revolving door between the cabinet and lobbying firms, and work to transform the Senate, the upper house of Parliament, from an appointed body to an elected one.

While he was the leader of the opposition, he objected furiously last year when the Liberals lured one of his party's senior members into the cabinet days before a vote in Parliament that would probably have otherwise brought down the government of Paul Martin, who was the prime minister.

But this week Mr. Harper appointed an international trade minister who was elected only two weeks before as a Liberal, a defense minister who was once a lobbyist for military contractors and an unelected public works minister who must be appointed to the Senate to serve.

(Members of the cabinet must be members of Parliament; they are not subjected to ratification votes.)

Now conservative columnists are taking Mr. Harper to task for perceived hypocrisy, and members of the Conservative caucus who were passed over for cabinet posts are expressing bitterness.

"If you're going to break a promise, you might as well rub everyone's noses in it," wrote Andrew Coyne, an influential conservative columnist in The National Post. "He has demoralized his party's supporters. He has ruined whatever honeymoon he might have had with the press."

Mr. Harper defended his appointments as an attempt to bring the most qualified people into his cabinet.

He also said he wanted to include officials from Montreal and Vancouver, cities where the Conservatives won no seats in the House of Commons and that would have otherwise gone unrepresented.

"I expected some of the superficial criticism I've seen," he told The Vancouver Sun.

The most controversial of the appointments was of David L. Emerson of Vancouver, who was industry minister under Prime Minister Martin and was elected to the Commons last month on the Liberal Party ticket.

The local Liberal Party association has demanded that he return nearly $100,000 it spent on his campaign, resign and run as a Conservative in a special election. An online petition demanding his resignation has attracted thousands of signatures.

Mr. Emerson said he would not resign or return the money, arguing Wednesday in a conference call with reporters that he could best serve his constituents by giving them a voice in the cabinet as international trade minister. He said that he might run in the next election as a Conservative, but he also suggested that he was shaken by the sharp reaction to his party switch.

"If I knew politics would be as it has been, I wouldn't have run to begin with," he was quoted as saying. He said that his two children were being taunted in school over the issue.

Mr. Harper has promised that his first order of business will be enacting what he calls the Accountability Act, which would prohibit cabinet ministers and senior staff members from becoming lobbyists for five years after leaving office.

But his choice for defense minister is Gordon O'Connor, a retired brigadier general from Ontario, who from 1996 to early 2004 was a lobbyist for companies including Airbus, which hopes to sell tactical airlift aircraft to the Defense Ministry.

Conservatives note that the Accountability Act would not prohibit a former lobbyist from serving in government, and Mr. O'Connor said that he saw no conflict of interest.

Michael Fortier, a Conservative organizer in Montreal, did not run for the Commons in the last election. But Mr. Harper appointed him to the Senate so he could serve as public works minister.

The opposition parties are complaining that they will not be able to question Mr. Fortier on the floor of the House of Commons, as is customary with cabinet ministers, because he is not a member.

Countering criticism that he was backtracking from his promise to reform the Senate, Mr. Harper said that the appointment was only temporary and that Mr. Fortier would run for a Commons seat in the next general election.

Several members of the Conservative caucus in Parliament have criticized the cabinet choices, but most spoke behind closed doors or in comments to reporters that were strictly off the record.

One who spoke openly, Garth Turner of Ontario, reported to constituents in his blog that he had had an "unhappy" meeting with Mr. Harper afterward.

"Speaking of offices," he continued, "I'm expecting the whip will be assigning me a renovated washroom."

Blair Seeks To Secure Political Legacy (AP)

By Danica Kirka

AP, February 11, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0014690

BLACKPOOL, England -- Prime Minister Tony Blair on Friday urged his divided party to return to the core issues that unite it, appealing to delegates at Labour's centenary conference to back controversial reforms seen as a key test of his leadership.

Blair is struggling to rally his supporters behind reform proposals that have outraged some of the party faithful and spawned rebellion in his ranks.

He tried to overcome the divisions with a rhetorical appeal to the party's tradition of advocacy for working-class Britons, women and minorities, saying the best way to achieve long-held goals was to stay in power by enacting necessary and effective reforms.

"This is a moment to stand firm, to have faith that the changes we are making will, in time, work to our country's advantage and therefore to ours," he told cheering delegates. "Our party's history tells us that Labour is strongest when it is on the side of the people."

The prime minister worked to raise spirits flagging after a special election loss in a Scottish district that Labour easily won less than a year ago, although he didn't mention the election directly.

"We have to be the ones taking the hard decisions, meeting the challenges," Blair said. "That is how we won three elections. It is how we will, whatever the travails in government in the meantime, win a fourth term."

A Liberal Democrat defeated the Labour candidate in the Scottish vote Thursday night less than a year after a Labour candidate, who later died, won the seat by a 2-to-1 margin.

The defeat soured the mood of the conference in this aging coastal city, which will not decide key issues but offered Blair a chance to rally his party ahead of local government elections in May 2006.

His toughest domestic challenge lies in persuading the Labour faithful to accept reforms including a series of measures meant to improve Britain's state-funded schools.

Critics complain that state-backed schools are so inadequate that they thwart British competitiveness in the global economy.

Blair wants a return to a system granting schools more independence, and letting them be more selective about students they admit.

The mere notion has touched off a revolt in the Labour ranks, particularly among those who fear that spinning off more successful schools would set up a two-tiered system and bolster Britain's social divide.

Observers believe a defeat for the prime minister on the measures could set the stage for an early departure by Blair, who has said he will not stand for re-election.

"He could be defeated and go if he cannot get the education measures through," said Bill Jones, the author of the Dictionary of British Politics. "It would be such a huge political failure, he couldn't continue."

Blair also outlined his case for passing sensitive security laws facing Parliament next week, including a hotly debated measure on issuing national identification cards. Delegates packed into the conference hall often interrupted his remarks with applause _ particularly when he invoked the party's ethos of working for the common man.

"Everywhere our opponents seek to portray the government as out of steam," Blair said. "Yet, in reality, there is only one policy agenda in town: ours."

Even as Blair tries to shore up his position, he must consider his successor. Jones said that while treasury chief Gordon Brown is seen as the heir apparent, the transition may be far from smooth.

Other party stalwarts, such as Defense Secretary John Reid and Home Secretary Charles Clarke, may not be willing to step away quietly.

Labour's younger generation, such as David Miliband, Blair's former head of policy and now minister for communities and local government, may also stand, after long being touted as a future party leader.

Making Change From Revolution To Powerful Elite (WT)

By David R. Sands, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, February 11, 2006

Just over a year ago, Yuri Lutsenko was manning the barricades and firing up the crowds in Kiev as a key tactician of Ukraine's "Orange Revolution."

This week, he was in Washington, meeting top U.S. officials and think tank scholars as the new government's minister of internal affairs, the most powerful law-enforcement post in the country.

"I was always sure that our democratic revolution would someday succeed, but I have to say never in my dreams did I consider that I would be one day sitting in this chair," Mr. Lutsenko said, speaking through an interpreter in an interview at the Ukrainian Embassy in Georgetown.

DOJ_NMG_0014691

"I also think that a lot of the police officers who dealt with me when I was in the opposition never expected this either," the 42-year-old former electrical engineer added with a smile.

Mr. Lutsenko, a longtime activist against former President Leonid Kuchma, emerged as one of the most charismatic figures of the 2004-2005 Orange Revolution, which overturned a fraudulent presidential vote and vaulted pro-Western reformer Viktor Yushchenko to power.

With a street-rebel reputation and little administrative experience, Mr. Lutsenko was not the obvious choice to head one of the country's most powerful ministries, charged with everything from fighting corruption, terrorism and illegal immigration to overseeing Ukraine's widely resented traffic police.

"Frankly, it was absolutely unexpected for me when the president asked to take this post," he said.

He said the ministry has made good progress since he took over last February. Among his first acts were to dismiss the ministry's second in command, who heads the internal security forces, and the administrator of the traffic police.

About 2,500 police officers have been dismissed for failing to meet ministry standards and more than 600 criminal cases against officers have been referred to prosecutors, Mr. Lutsenko said. The ministry is also aggressively targeting official corruption.

Last month, three former Ukrainian police officers went on trial in the 2000 slaying of investigative journalist Georgy Gongadze. The long-stalled case proved critical in tarnishing Mr. Kuchma's rule both at home and abroad.

Mr. Lutsenko's Washington trip, which included meetings with top State Department, FBI and Department of Homeland Security officials, focused on joint cooperation on issues such as terrorism, immigration and narcotics trafficking. Kiev is also pressing for a bilateral extradition treaty, which the U.S. side has been reluctant to sign.

His trip came at a difficult moment for Mr. Yushchenko. In a nasty public break, his Orange Revolution ally, Prime Minister Yulia Tymoshenko, resigned as prime minister in August and is leading an independent bloc in hotly contested parliamentary elections next month.

Mr. Lutsenko acknowledged the uncertain political climate, but said he had no fears that the democratic, pro-Western ideals of the Orange Revolution were in danger.

"Politicians of every stripe in Ukraine now say they support those ideals," he said. "We have crossed the Rubicon and there is no going back."

DOJ_NMG_0014692

[redacted]@judiciary-rep.senate.gov

From: [redacted]@judiciary-rep.senate.gov
Sent: Monday, February 13, 2006 10:06 AM
To: Gorsuch, Neil M[redacted]
Subject: Kyl Feb 9 Record statement
Attachments: tmp.htm; Kyl EC p.1.pdf; Kyl EC p.2.pdf; Kyl EC p.3.pdf; Kyl EC p.4.pdf

Here are the four separate pages of Sen. Kyl's recent statement regarding the Graham amendment, as those pages appear in the Congressional Record. Note that as of the beginning of this year, citations to the Record begin with volume number 152. (As opposed to last December's 151 Cong. Rec. ___.)

But I will also continue to strongly oppose any reauthorization of the PATRIOT Act that does not protect the rights and freedoms of law-abiding Americans with no connection to terrorism. This deal does not meet that standard; it doesn't even come close.

The PATRIOT Act conference report, combined with the few changes announced today, does not address the core issues that our bipartisan group of Senators have been concerned about for the last several years. The modest but critical changes we have been pushing are not included. I am not talking about new issues. We are talking about the same issues that concerned us when we first introduced the SAFE Act more than 2 years ago to fix the PATRIOT Act. And we have laid them out in detail in several different letters over the past few months.

First, and most importantly, the deal does not ensure that the government can only obtain the library, medical and other sensitive business records of people who have some link to suspected terrorists. This is the section 215 issue, which has been at the center of this debate over the PATRIOT Act. Section 215 of the PATRIOT Act allows the government to obtain secret court orders in domestic intelligence investigations to get all kinds of business records about people, including not just library records but also medical records and various other types of business records. The Senate bill that this body passed by unanimous consent back in July would have ensured that the government cannot use this power to go after someone who has no connection whatsoever to a terrorist or spy or their activities. The conference report replaces the Senate test with a simple relevance standard, which is not adequate protection against a fishing expedition. And the deal struck today leaves that provision of the conference report unchanged.

Second, the deal does not provide meaningful judicial review of the gag orders placed on recipients of section 215 business records orders and National Security Letters. Under the deal, such review can only take place after a year has passed and can only be successful if the recipient proves that that government has acted in bad faith. The deal ignores the serious first amendment problem with the gag rule under current law. In fact, it arguably makes the law worse in this area.

And third, the deal does not ensure that when government agents secretly break into the homes of Americans to do a so-called sneak and peek search, they tell the owners of those homes in most circumstances within 7 days, as courts have said they should, and as the Senate bill did.

As I understand it, this deal only makes a few small changes. It would permit judicial review of a section 215 gag order, but under conditions that would make it very difficult for anyone to obtain meaningful judicial review. It would state specifically that the government can serve National Security Letters on libraries if the library comes within the current requirements of the NSL statute, a provision that as I read it, just restates current law. And it would clarify that people who receive a National Security Letter would not have to tell the FBI if they consult with an attorney. This last change is a positive step, but it is only one relatively minor change.

So this deal comes nowhere near the significant, but very reasonable, changes in the law that I believe are a necessary part of any reauthorization package. We weren't asking for much. We weren't even asking for changes that would get us close to the bill that this body passed without objection last July. But the White House would not be reasonable and has forced a deal that is not satisfactory in an effort to serve their partisan purposes. I will oppose it, and I will fight it.

ENEMY COMBATANTS

Mr. KYL. Mr. President, I rise today to put into the RECORD a letter that Senator GRAHAM and I recently sent to the Attorney General, and to respond to misrepresentations that have been made in the press and by others regarding the circumstances of the enactment of the Graham amendment to last year's Defense Authorization bill. The letter responds to similar misleading attacks that were made against the Justice Department at the beginning of this year. My office has received several inquiries about this letter, which was sent to the Attorney General on January 18. So that anyone interested in this matter might review the letter, I will ask to have it printed in the RECORD.

I ordinarily would not comment on the meaning of legislation that already has been enacted into law. In this case, however, there has been a considerable amount of post-enactment commentary by others on the meaning of the Graham amendment. Much of this commentary insinuates that the Administration and the backers of the amendment are violating an agreement with members of the minority by characterizing the amendment as governing pending litigation. Since the enactment of the Graham amendment last December, some critics have begun to paint a revisionist history of this legislation. In this new account, the Graham amendment supposedly was intentionally modified by the Senate so as not to affect pending litigation. Also in this version of events, Senators relied on representations that the amendment was modified to carve out pending litigation when they voted in favor of its final passage. This conspiracy theory is without foundation.

For those unfamiliar with the Graham amendment, the disputed provision in the legislation changes the Federal habeas code by adding a subsection providing as follows: ''Except as provided in section 1005 of the Detainee Treatment Act of 2005, no court, justice, or judge shall have jurisdiction to hear or consider an application for a writ of habeas corpus filed by or on behalf of an alien detained by the Department of Defense at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.'' The amendment also provides that ''[t]his section shall take effect on the date of the enactment of this Act.'' In addition, the amendment establishes substantive standards for limited judicial review of CSRT determinations and military-commission decisions, and provides that the paragraphs creating those review standards ''shall apply with respect to any claim whose review is governed by one of such paragraphs and that is pending on or after the date of the enactment of this Act.''

Some critics now assert that nothing in the amendment prevents pre-enactment habeas actions from going forward in their previous form. For reasons explained in the letter to the Attorney General, I believe that such an interpretation is untenable. In addition to the points made in the letter, I would also add the following: the amendment states that the changes that it makes to the habeas code ''shall take effect on the date of the enactment of this Act.'' If the current pack habeas cases are allowed to go forward in their current form, the law's provision that ''no court, justice, or judge shall have jurisdiction'' to hear those cases in that form will not be effective on the date of the law's enactment. Rather, the courts still would have jurisdiction over these cases after the date of enactment, and the law's all-encompassing jurisdictional bar would become effective only when the current litigation would exhaust itself—a date that likely would come only years in the future. Such a result would not be consistent with the requirement that the law's total jurisdictional prohibition ''take effect of the date of the enactment of this Act.''

Of those critics who argue that the amendment carves out pre-enactment habeas cases, I would simply ask, what part of ''no court, justice or judge'' do you not understand? How could this language possibly be more comprehensive? And how could any Senator possibly have been misled as to its effect?

Some of the recent criticism of the amendment in the press has taken a new tack. A few critics have begun to suggest that even if the legislative text of the Graham amendment does wipe out the pending habeas cases, Senators were affirmatively misled about this aspect of the final amendment. The allegation is that Senators were led to understand that the amendment that they were voting on would not affect pending cases. I have reviewed the legislative record from the days leading up to the vote on final passage of the Graham amendment, and find this suggestion wanting. Allow me to describe what was actually said about the original version of the amendment—the Graham/Kyl amendment—as well as the final version, the Graham/Levin/Kyl amendment, prior to their passage.

On November 10, Senator LEVIN stated with regard to the original Graham/Kyl amendment, ''I read the language as to how broad it is. It eliminates explicitly any appeal: No court, justice, or judge shall have jurisdiction to hear or consider an application for a writ of habeas corpus, and that is the way an appeal goes to a court from one of these people. It is eliminated.'' (151 Cong. Rec. S12665.) Similarly, later that day, Senator BINGAMAN characterized the original Graham amendment as follows: ''It essentially denies all courts anywhere the right to consider any petition from any prisoner being held at Guantanamo Bay.'' (151 Cong. Rec. S12667.) And later, on November 15, Senator DURBIN said the following about the original Graham/Kyl amendment: ''the amendment would eliminate habeas for detainees at Guantanamo Bay. . . . It would strip Federal courts, including the U.S. Supreme Court, of the right to hear any challenge to any practice at Guantanamo Bay, other than a one-time appeal to the D.C. Circuit. . . . It applies retroactively, and therefore also likely would prevent the Supreme Court from ruling on the merits of the Hamdan case, a pending challenge to the legality of the administration's military commissions.'' (151 Cong. Rec. S12799.)

Thus from the beginning, Senators recognized and emphasized to their colleagues that the original Graham amendment language was comprehensive. They also recognized and emphasized that the amendment barred pending cases from going forward, including the Hamdan case in the Supreme Court. These aspects of the original amendment not only were generally acknowledged, but were a point of controversy during the Senate debate.

Had the subsequent Graham/Levin/Kyl amendment departed from the original amendment by carving out pending cases, this would have been a momentous change. Aside from the fact that such a change would have gutted the amendment, it also would addressed one of the issues about which opposing Senators had expressed sharp concern. Surely, had such a change been made or even intended to be made, the fact would have been noted. Instead, it is the dog that did not bark.

First, neither Senator GRAHAM nor I ever said anything in the days leading up to the final vote on the amendment that could possibly suggest to anyone that the modified amendment exempted pending cases. Senator GRAHAM is the lead sponsor and I am an original cosponsor of the amendment that passed the Senate on November 10. We controlled the amendment. No one was in a better position than we were to describe what the amendment does and does not do. Had such a major change to the amendment been made, it is inconceivable that one of us would not at least have commented on it. No such comment or even the suggestion of such a change was made by either one of us.

Indeed, the few statements that Senator GRAHAM did make prior to passage of Graham/Levin/Kyl that describe the amendment's reach tend to confirm that the amendment does not treat detainees differently based on when they filed their claims. For example, on the evening of November 14, when the final amendment was introduced, Senator GRAHAM noted that ''[i]nstead of having unlimited habeas corpus opportunities under the Constitution, we give every enemy combatant, all 500, a chance to go to Federal court, the Circuit Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia.'' (151 Cong. Rec. S12754.) ''What we have done, working with Senators LEVIN, KYL, and others, we have created that same type of appeals process for all military commission decisions.'' Ibid.

During that same evening, Senator LEVIN also commented on the new amendment. Although he said that the amendment did not ''strip jurisdiction'' from the courts, he made clear that he meant that jurisdiction remained in place because the pending cases—including challenges to military-commission decisions—could go forward as claims invoking the substantive review standards of the new amendment. Senator LEVIN stated: ''What we have done in this amendment, we have said that the standards in the amendment will be applied in pending cases, but the amendment will not trip the courts of jurisdiction over those cases. For instance, the Supreme Court jurisdiction in Hamdan is not affected.'' (151 Cong. Rec. S12755.) Again, later: ''what our amendment does, as soon as it is enacted and the enactment is effective, it provides that the standards we set forth in our amendment will be the substantive standards which we would expect would be applied in all cases, including cases which are pending as of the effective date of this amendment.'' Ibid. And again: ''because it would not strip courts of jurisdiction over these matters where they have taken jurisdiction, it does, again, apply the substantive law and assume that the courts would apply the substantive law if this amendment is agreed to.'' Ibid.

Whether the amendment, by barring one type of claim and authorizing another type to take its place, strips the courts of jurisdiction, is, to some extent, a matter of perspective. It is a question of whether the glass is half empty or half full. On the operative issue, however, Senator LEVIN's remarks on November 14 are consistent not only with my own and Senator GRAHAM's characterization of the amendment (see, e.g. 151 Cong. Rec. S14263), but also with the interpretation now advanced by the Justice Department: that the current claims can go forward, but only as claims for review under the substantive standards created by the new act.

It bears mention that the revised amendment's authorization of judicial review of military-commission decisions, though narrow and venue-restricted, was a substantial departure from the original amendment. As Senator LEVIN had emphasized on November 10, the original amendment ''eliminates court review of the sentences of enemy combatants before these commissions.'' (151 Cong. Rec. S12664.) He stated that the amendment even ''eliminates the appeal of a conviction that led to a capital offense.'' (151 Cong. Rec. S12665.) Under the original Graham amendment, no appeal of any kind would have been permitted from the military-commission verdict in the Hamdan case.

The revised amendment does allow limited appeals of final military-commission decisions. In fact, this change was described to Senators as the principal difference between the original and revised Graham amendments. Senator LEVIN noted on the morning of November 15, before the vote on Graham/Levin/Kyl:

> The amendment which was approved last Thursday, which is the one now awaiting this amendment, would have provided for review only for status determinations and not of convictions by military commissions. . . . One of the reasons I voted against the amendment last Thursday is that it did not provide for that direct judicial review of convictions by military commissions. That is the major change in the amendment before the Senate, the so-called Graham-Levin-Kyl amendment which is before the Senate. There are a number of other changes as well, but of all the changes, what this amendment does is add . . . a direct appeal for convictions by military commissions. (151 Cong. Rec. S12754.)

Other Senators speaking about the amendment prior to the final vote did not even view the detainee's glass as half full. On the morning of November 15, Senator SPECTER exhorted his colleagues to oppose the amendment, stating: ''On the face of the Graham amendment, it . . . even takes away jurisdiction from the Supreme Court of the United States.'' (151 Cong. Rec. S12799.) He later stated that the amendment would ''strip Federal courts of the authority to consider a habeas petition from detainees being held in U.S. custody as enemy combatants,'' (151 Cong. Rec. 12801), and reiterated that the Graham/Levin/Kyl amendment was an amendment ''which on the face takes away jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the United States.'' Ibid. Senator SPECTER's remarks should at least have placed any Senator on inquiry notice that the final amendment might affect pending cases.

Finally, Senator DURBIN also spoke about the final Graham amendment prior to the vote. As I mentioned earlier, on the morning of November 15, Senator DURBIN expressed concern that the original Graham/Kyl amendment's jurisdictional bar would apply ''retroactively,'' and that it ''likely would prevent the Supreme Court from ruling on the merits of the Hamdan case.'' (151 Cong. Rec. S12799.) Almost immediately after these words, Senator DURBIN also commented on the revised Graham amendment. He stated:

The Graham-Levin substitute amendment would somewhat improve the underlying amendment by expanding the scope of review in the D.C. Circuit Court to include whether CSRT's are legal, but not whether a particular detainee's detention is legal. It would also allow for post-conviction review of military commission convictions. However, the amendment would still eliminate habeas review and overrule Rasul.

(151 Cong. Rec. S12799.) Again, no suggestion was made that the new amendment might carve out pending cases, despite the Senator's expressed concern about retroactivity. The Senator gave no hint that he expected the new amendment to treat pending cases any differently than did the old amendment. Senator DURBIN does not appear to have been misled about the effect of the final Graham amendment, nor did he mislead anyone else.

To be sure, two statements that do appear in the RECORD prior to the final vote on the Graham amendment both assert that the amendment would not ''strip jurisdiction''—and both of these statements are unleavened by Senator LEVIN's accompanying clarification that pending cases would proceed under the substantive review standards of the new law. Both of these statements, however, appear to have been introduced into the record following the final vote—both refer to that vote in the past tense. Neither Senator thus could have misled other Members about the effect of the amendment prior to the vote. Senator KERRY made clear in his statement that his remarks were made only after the November 15 vote: ''Today, I voted in favor of Senator BINGAMAN's amendment No. 2523, because it would have preserved judicial review . . . When the Bingaman amendment failed, I voted for a second-degree amendment.'' (151 Cong. Rec. S12799.) Similarly, Senator REID also emphasized that his statement did not precede the actual vote: ''the Senate has voted to deny the availability of habeas corpus to individuals held by the United States at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. I rise to explain . . . my votes in favor of the Bingaman amendment and the Graham-Levin amendment earlier today.'' (151 Cong. Rec. S12802.) Neither of these statements was part of the information that was presented to Senators prior to the final vote on the Graham amendment.

To summarize, the legislative record is utterly devoid of any evidence that Senators were led to believe that the Graham/Levin/Kyl amendment would carve out pending cases. Prior to the vote, several Senators spoke of the original amendment's breadth and the fact that it would terminate pending cases. Senator GRAHAM, drawing no distinction between pre- and post-enactment filers, stated that the revised amendment would apply a uniform standard to all 500 Guantanamo detainees. Senator LEVIN made clear that ''the standards we set forth in our amendment will be the substantive standards which we would expect would be applied in all cases, including cases which are pending as of the effective date of this amendment.'' Senator SPECTER pointedly warned that the final amendment would ''strip Federal courts of the authority to consider a habeas petition from detainees'' and ''even take[] away jurisdiction from the Supreme Court of the United States.'' Other Members who condemned the original amendment for terminating pending cases gave no hint that they viewed the new amendment any differently. Quite simply, there is no evidence that anyone misled anyone else about the fact that the Graham amendment would only allow pending cases to go forward under the limited review standards of the new law.

On November 15, the Graham/Levin/Kyl amendment passed the Senate by a vote of 84–14. That same day, the entire Defense Authorization bill passed the Senate by unanimous consent and the Senate appointed conferees. One month later, on December 16, the House and Senate conferees agreed to file a conference report. In the days that followed, a new slew of statements were made in the Senate and even in the House commenting on the meaning of the Graham amendment. Many of these statements are simply the usual effort by the losers of legislative battles to rewrite legislative history. The majority of the Senators, for example, who announced in these statements that the Graham amendment was not intended to affect pending cases also were among the 14 Senators who voted against the final Graham/Levin/Kyl compromise. No one can seriously suggest that these members relied on any representations made by the backers of the amendment. And more importantly, given the marked disagreement between the statements that were made at this late stage about the effect of the amendment on pending cases, no one could justifiably have relied upon one view rather than another to learn what the amendment does. Rather, it is up to members to examine the actual language of the amendment.

I hope that this review of the circumstances of the enactment of the Graham amendment will put to rest any accusation that members of Congress were misled about the amendment's impact on pending cases. Whether the amendment does in fact govern pending cases is another matter. For the reasons expressed here and in the January 18 letter to the Attorney General, I believe that it does so, but that, of course, is a matter for the courts to decide. In the event that the courts concur with my and Senator GRAHAM's interpretation of the amendment, however, no Member should be heard to complain that they were led to believe that the amendment would operate differently.

I ask unanimous consent that the letter be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. SENATE,
Washington, DC, January 18, 2006.

Hon. ALBERTO GONZALES,
Attorney General, U.S. Department of Justice, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. ATTORNEY GENERAL: We understand that the Justice Department has been criticized recently in the press and by members of Congress for asserting in court proceedings that a provision in the Fiscal Year 2006 Defense appropriations bill that regulates legal actions brought by Guantanamo detainees—the so-called ''Graham Amendment''—affects pending litigation. Critics contend that the Administration's actions violate an agreement with Members of Congress by arguing that the Graham Amendment makes no exception for pending cases.

We are the lead sponsor and an original cosponsor of the Graham Amendment. We write to assure you that the attorneys under your supervision have correctly interpreted the disputed provision.

The Graham Amendment states in relevant part that ''effect[ive] on the date of enactment of this Act,'' except pursuant to special review procedures specified in the Act, ''no court, justice, or judge shall have jurisdiction to hear or consider'' a habeas application or any other action relating to the detention of a Guantanamo detainee. All Members of the Senate had access to this language before the Senate voted on the final Graham Amendment and the final Defense appropriations bill. The language cannot reasonably be construed to leave intact any power in the courts to entertain the current barrage of habeas petitions and other actions brought by Guantanamo detainees. The Defense appropriations bill was signed into law on December 30, 2005. As of that date, literally ''no court, justice, or judge'' has jurisdiction to entertain these lawsuits. That is what we intended.

Had we intended to preserve some power in the courts to continue to hear the current flurry of legal actions, we would have done so. We did not. Moreover, as we made clear when the final defense bill passed the Senate, we are well aware that for over a century, American courts consistently have interpreted legislation removing a court's jurisdiction over a type of case to also remove its ability to hear pending cases. Surely, this long line of precedent negates any ambiguity as to the effect of the Graham Amendment on pending cases.

We also note that a contrary interpretation of the Amendment's effect would be inconsistent with the structure of the Amendment. As mentioned above, other sections of the Graham Amendment create special standards and procedures for judicial review of the detention and trial of Guantanamo detainees. The Amendment also states that these special standards and procedures shall apply not only to relevant claims filed after enactment, but also those ''pending on . . . the date of the enactment of this Act.'' (Emphasis added.) Obviously, no claim pending at the time of enactment sought to invoke the review standards created by the same Act. This provision calls on the courts and parties to construe pending actions that challenge either the fact of detention or a military trial as requests for review pursuant to the special standards in the new law. And just as obviously, if all pending lawsuits were exempted from the new law, no pending case would be governed by the new review standards. To adopt the construction advocated by the critics—that courts retain jurisdiction to continue to hear all current lawsuits in their current form—would render the statutory language applying the new standards to pending cases a dead letter.

The original Graham-Kyl Amendment stated that its jurisdiction-removing provisions

''apply to [actions] pending on or after the date of the enactment of this Act.'' This language later was replaced with language specifying that the Amendment ''shall take effect on the date of the enactment of this Act.'' There were two reasons for this substitution: first, the jurisdiction-removing provision technically does not apply any new standards to the pending cases. Rather, it eliminates the forum in which those cases can be heard. Second, the original language ''applying'' jurisdiction removal to pending cases appeared to require that those cases be dismissed outright. Such a result would have conflicted with subparagraph (h)(2), which is designed to allow current cases to continue in the D.C. Circuit as requests for review pursuant to the new standards. Altering the effective-date language eliminated this internal inconsistency and clarified that, rather than requiring that pending cases be dismissed, the new law allows the courts to construe those cases as requests for review under the new standards and, where necessary, transfer them to the appropriate forum.

This is all that we intended by this modification of the Graham Amendment's effective-date language and, more importantly, this is all that the language does. Nothing in this modification preserves any jurisdiction in the courts to continue the current actions in their present form after the date of the enactment of the Act.

To the extent that anyone construing the Graham Amendment might be tempted to subordinate actual statutory text to expressions of Senators' private intent, two points are in order: first, we are two of the three cosponsors on the ''Graham-Levin-Kyl Amendment'' that was introduced in the Senate on November 14, and one of us is the lead sponsor. Both of us made clear in the Congressional Record at the time that the final law passed the Senate that we understood, in light of standard rules of statutory construction, that removal of jurisdiction would eliminate pending cases—the same interpretation now espoused by the Justice Department.

In addition, on November 14, the other cosponsor of the amendment, Senator Levin, stated that ''[w]hat our Amendment does, as soon as it is enacted and the enactment is effective, it provides that the substantive standards we set forth in our Amendment will be the substantive standards which we would expect would be applied in all cases, including cases which are pending as of the effective date of this Amendment.'' 151 Cong. Rec. 12755. He also stated that day: ''the standards in the Amendment will be applied in pending cases.'' Ibid. The effective-date and pending-claims language in the Amendment introduced on November 14 is identical to that in the enacted statute. Thus, on the day of introduction, all three original cosponsors of the Graham Amendment understood it to operate in the same way: the pending Guantanamo cases can go forward, but only under the special review standards and procedures established by the Amendment.

Finally, we should comment on the various other legislative statements purporting to explain the intent behind the Graham Amendment. By our count, at least nine Members of the minority have introduced statements in the Congressional Record announcing that the Graham Amendment was meant to have no effect on pending litigation. For the record, the only one of these Members who played any role in crafting the Amendment is Senator Levin. Negotiations with Senator Levin resulted in a substantial expansion of the scope of the judicial review permitted under the special review procedures established by the Amendment. None of the other Members commenting on the intent behind the Amendment's effective-date subsection played any significant drafting role of which we are aware. Indeed, some of these minority Members who purport to define the authorial intent also complain that the Amendment was ''negotiated largely behind closed doors by the White House and a select few majority Members of Congress'' (151 Cong. Rec. 12201), or that ''all negotiations on this provision have occurred in back rooms, without the involvement of the vast majority of Congress, and without even consulting most of the conferees.'' 151 Cong. Rec. 14170. Such complaints are not consistent with the ''insider'' perspective that these Members purport to share with the reader. Several of these Members also are among the 14 Senators who even voted against the final Graham-Levin-Kyl Amendment when it was offered in the Senate on November 15. Clearly, it would be inappropriate to allow those who opposed the amendment to define the intent of the authors of the amendment.

Of course, more important than any private intent harbored by any Member of Congress is the actual legislative text that was passed by both houses of Congress and signed into law by the President. As we noted previously, absent repudiation by the federal courts of over a century of precedent construing like statutes, the Graham Amendment unambiguously eliminates the federal courts' power to hear Guantanamo detainees' cases in their current form. Notwithstanding the accusations made by some critics, your litigators have, in our view, properly interpreted the Graham Amendment. And, at the end of the day, we anticipate that the courts will make these jurisdictional determinations in accord with their own rules, procedures, precedent, and the plain language of the statute.

Sincerely,

LINDSEY O. GRAHAM,
U.S. Senator.
JON KYL,
U.S. Senator.

GLOBAL NUCLEAR ENERGY PARTNERSHIP

Mr. CRAIG. Mr. President, I rise today to express my agreement with President Bush's belief that our country's security depends in large part on a diverse energy portfolio, one that is not overly reliant on any one energy source, especially sources of foreign origin. I agree with the President that this country is overly dependent on foreign oil. Consistent with that belief, the Bush administration has just announced a potentially far-reaching energy program known as the Global Nuclear Energy Partnership or GNEP. This program provides a wide-reaching, long-term plan for establishing a robust and sustainable future for nuclear energy in this country and abroad.

The Global Nuclear Energy Partnership promises to provide abundant energy, without emitting greenhouse gases; to recycle used nuclear fuel in order to minimize waste; to safely and securely allow developing nations to deploy nuclear power to meet their energy needs, while reducing proliferation risks; to assure maximum energy recovery from still-valuable used nuclear fuel; and to allow the U.S. to rely on a single geologic waste repository for the rest of this century.

Nuclear energy currently provides about 20 percent of this Nation's electricity, and does so without emitting any carbon, greenhouse gases, or other air pollutants. All the waste generated by commercial nuclear powerplants is securely managed and destined for safe, permanent disposal in a geologic repository.

However, according to current law, that repository can contain only slightly more than the amount of waste already stored at existing reactor sites. Even if the law is changed, the repository at Yucca Mountain can only accommodate about the amount of spent nuclear fuel that will be generated by the existing reactors in this country over their lifetimes. If nuclear power is to have a future in this country, even to maintain its current 20 percent share of electricity generation, either a second repository will need to be developed soon—with many more to follow—or an alternative means of managing this waste is needed.

After a single use, spent nuclear fuel retains more than 95 percent of its energy potential. That energy potential could be tapped by reprocessing the spent fuel, recycling the useable part and disposing of the rest as waste, which makes up only about 3–4 percent of the spent fuel. This could substantially reduce the amount of long-lived nuclear waste requiring burial in a geologic repository, and could extend the lifetime of the Yucca Mountain repository many fold.

But efforts to recycle spent fuel were abandoned in this country back in the 1970s, largely because of concerns about nuclear proliferation. Those concerns stemmed from the fact that, at that time, the method used to recycle spent fuel, the ''PUREX'' process, separated out pure plutonium, which might be used to construct a nuclear bomb.

During the 30-plus years since then, the U.S. has—through research at its National Laboratories—made considerable progress in developing new methods for reprocessing spent fuel that are much less prone to proliferation risks, because they do not separate out pure plutonium, but keep it mixed with other actinides. This mixture is not readily used for nuclear weapons.

Reintroducing recycling into this country's strategy for managing spent fuel is a major change in policy, and one that deserves serious discussion. That discussion should be based on fact and not emotion; should address current technologies, not those from more than a generation ago; and should consider reasonable alternatives to maintaining nuclear energy as a viable part of our Nation's energy supply.

And what reasonable alternatives are there? Total electricity consumption in the U.S. is projected to increase by about 40 percent by 2025. Wind and solar energy cannot provide large-scale, base-load electricity, because they are intermittent energy sources. Hydro provides about 10 percent of our electricity right now, but building new

Here are the four separate pages of Sen. Kyl's recent statement regarding the Graham amendment, as those pages appear in the Congressional Record. Note that as of the beginning of this year, citations to the Record begin with volume number 152. (As opposed to last December's 151 Cong. Rec. ___.)

Gorsuch, Neil M

From:	Gorsuch, Neil M
Sent:	Monday, February 13, 2006 11:49 AM
To:	Garre, Gregory G; Katsas, Gregory (CIV)
Subject:	FW: Kyl Feb 9 Record statement
Attachments:	tmp.htm; Kyl EC p.1.pdf; Kyl EC p.2.pdf; Kyl EC p.3.pdf; Kyl EC p.4.pdf

fyi

-----Original Message-----
From: [redacted]@judiciary-rep.senate.gov [mailto [redacted]@judiciary-rep.senate.gov]
Sent: Monday, February 13, 2006 10:06 AM
To: Gorsuch, Neil M [redacted]
Subject: Kyl Feb 9 Record statement

Here are the four separate pages of Sen. Kyl's recent statement regarding the Graham amendment, as those pages appear in the Congressional Record. Note that as of the beginning of this year, citations to the Record begin with volume number 152. (As opposed to last December's 151 Cong. Rec. ___.)

But I will also continue to strongly oppose any reauthorization of the PATRIOT Act that does not protect the rights and freedoms of law-abiding Americans with no connection to terrorism. This deal does not meet that standard; it doesn't even come close.

The PATRIOT Act conference report, combined with the few changes announced today, does not address the core issues that our bipartisan group of Senators have been concerned about for the last several years. The modest but critical changes we have been pushing are not included. I am not talking about new issues. We are talking about the same issues that concerned us when we first introduced the SAFE Act more than 2 years ago to fix the PATRIOT Act. And we have laid them out in detail in several different letters over the past few months.

First, and most importantly, the deal does not ensure that the government can only obtain the library, medical and other sensitive business records of people who have some link to suspected terrorists. This is the section 215 issue, which has been at the center of this debate over the PATRIOT Act. Section 215 of the PATRIOT Act allows the government to obtain secret court orders in domestic intelligence investigations to get all kinds of business records about people, including not just library records but also medical records and various other types of business records. The Senate bill that this body passed by unanimous consent back in July would have ensured that the government cannot use this power to go after someone who has no connection whatsoever to a terrorist or spy or their activities. The conference report replaces the Senate test with a simple relevance standard, which is not adequate protection against a fishing expedition. And the deal struck today leaves that provision of the conference report unchanged.

Second, the deal does not provide meaningful judicial review of the gag orders placed on recipients of section 215 business records orders and National Security Letters. Under the deal, such review can only take place after a year has passed and can only be successful if the recipient proves that that government has acted in bad faith. The deal ignores the serious first amendment problem with the gag rule under current law. In fact, it arguably makes the law worse in this area.

And third, the deal does not ensure that when government agents secretly break into the homes of Americans to do a so-called sneak and peek search, they tell the owners of those homes in most circumstances within 7 days, as courts have said they should, and as the Senate bill did.

As I understand it, this deal only makes a few small changes. It would permit judicial review of a section 215 gag order, but under conditions that would make it very difficult for anyone to obtain meaningful judicial review. It would state specifically that the government can serve National Security Letters on libraries if the library comes within the current requirements of the NSL statute, a provision that as I read it, just restates current law. And it would clarify that people who receive a National Security Letter would not have to tell the FBI if they consult with an attorney. This last change is a positive step, but it is only one relatively minor change.

So this deal comes nowhere near the significant, but very reasonable, changes in the law that I believe are a necessary part of any reauthorization package. We weren't asking for much. We weren't even asking for changes that would get us close to the bill that this body passed without objection last July. But the White House would not be reasonable and has forced a deal that is not satisfactory in an effort to serve their partisan purposes. I will oppose it, and I will fight it.

ENEMY COMBATANTS

Mr. KYL. Mr. President, I rise today to put into the RECORD a letter that Senator GRAHAM and I recently sent to the Attorney General, and to respond to misrepresentations that have been made in the press and by others regarding the circumstances of the enactment of the Graham amendment to last year's Defense Authorization bill. The letter responds to similar misleading attacks that were made against the Justice Department at the beginning of this year. My office has received several inquiries about this letter, which was sent to the Attorney General on January 18. So that anyone interested in this matter might review the letter, I will ask to have it printed in the RECORD.

I ordinarily would not comment on the meaning of legislation that already has been enacted into law. In this case, however, there has been a considerable amount of post-enactment commentary by others on the meaning of the Graham amendment. Much of this commentary insinuates that the Administration and the backers of the amendment are violating an agreement with members of the minority by characterizing the amendment as governing pending litigation. Since the enactment of the Graham amendment last December, some critics have begun to paint a revisionist history of this legislation. In this new account, the Graham amendment supposedly was intentionally modified by the Senate so as not to affect pending litigation. Also in this version of events, Senators relied on representations that the amendment was modified to carve out pending litigation when they voted in favor of its final passage. This conspiracy theory is without foundation.

For those unfamiliar with the Graham amendment, the disputed provision in the legislation changes the Federal habeas code by adding a subsection providing as follows: ''Except as provided in section 1005 of the Detainee Treatment Act of 2005, no court, justice, or judge shall have jurisdiction to hear or consider an application for a writ of habeas corpus filed by or on behalf of an alien detained by the Department of Defense at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.'' The amendment also provides that ''[t]his section shall take effect on the date of the enactment of this Act.'' In addition, the amendment establishes substantive standards for limited judicial review of CSRT determinations and military-commission decisions, and provides that the paragraphs creating those review standards ''shall apply with respect to any claim whose review is governed by one of such paragraphs and that is pending on or after the date of the enactment of this Act.''

Some critics now assert that nothing in the amendment prevents pre-enactment habeas actions from going forward in their previous form. For reasons explained in the letter to the Attorney General, I believe that such an interpretation is untenable. In addition to the points made in the letter, I would also add the following: the amendment states that the changes that it makes to the habeas code ''shall take effect on the date of the enactment of this Act.'' If the current pack habeas cases are allowed to go forward in their current form, the law's provision that ''no court, justice, or judge shall have jurisdiction'' to hear those cases in that form will not be effective on the date of the law's enactment. Rather, the courts still would have jurisdiction over these cases after the date of enactment, and the law's all-encompassing jurisdictional bar would become effective only when the current litigation would exhaust itself—a date that likely would come only years in the future. Such a result would not be consistent with the requirement that the law's total jurisdictional prohibition ''take effect of the date of the enactment of this Act.''

Of those critics who argue that the amendment carves out pre-enactment habeas cases, I would simply ask, what part of ''no court, justice or judge'' do you not understand? How could this language possibly be more comprehensive? And how could any Senator possibly have been misled as to its effect?

Some of the recent criticism of the amendment in the press has taken a new tack. A few critics have begun to suggest that even if the legislative text of the Graham amendment does wipe out the pending habeas cases, Senators were affirmatively misled about this aspect of the final amendment. The allegation is that Senators were led to understand that the amendment that they were voting on would not affect pending cases. I have reviewed the legislative record from the days leading up to the vote on final passage of the Graham amendment, and find this suggestion wanting. Allow me to describe what was actually said about the original version of the amendment—the Graham/Kyl amendment—as well as the final version, the Graham/Levin/Kyl amendment, prior to their passage.

On November 10, Senator LEVIN stated with regard to the original Graham/Kyl amendment, ''I read the language as to how broad it is. It eliminates explicitly any appeal: No court, justice, or judge shall have jurisdiction to hear or consider an application for a writ of habeas corpus, and that is the way an appeal goes to a court from one of these people. It is eliminated.'' (151 Cong. Rec. S12665.) Similarly, later that day, Senator BINGAMAN characterized the original Graham amendment as follows: ''It essentially denies all courts anywhere the right to consider any petition from any prisoner being held at Guantanamo Bay.'' (151 Cong. Rec. S12667.) And later, on November 15, Senator DURBIN said the following about the original Graham/Kyl amendment: ''the amendment would eliminate habeas for detainees at Guantanamo Bay. . . . It would strip Federal courts, including the U.S. Supreme Court, of the right to hear any challenge to any practice at Guantanamo Bay, other than a one-time appeal to the D.C. Circuit. . . . It applies retroactively, and therefore also likely would prevent the Supreme Court from ruling on the merits of the Hamdan case, a pending challenge to the legality of the administration's military commissions.'' (151 Cong. Rec. S12799.)

Thus from the beginning, Senators recognized and emphasized to their colleagues that the original Graham amendment language was comprehensive. They also recognized and emphasized that the amendment barred pending cases from going forward, including the Hamdan case in the Supreme Court. These aspects of the original amendment not only were generally acknowledged, but were a point of controversy during the Senate debate.

Had the subsequent Graham/Levin/Kyl amendment departed from the original amendment by carving out pending cases, this would have been a momentous change. Aside from the fact that such a change would have gutted the amendment, it also would addressed one of the issues about which opposing Senators had expressed sharp concern. Surely, had such a change been made or even intended to be made, the fact would have been noted. Instead, it is the dog that did not bark.

First, neither Senator GRAHAM nor I ever said anything in the days leading up to the final vote on the amendment that could possibly suggest to anyone that the modified amendment exempted pending cases. Senator GRAHAM is the lead sponsor and I am an original cosponsor of the amendment that passed the Senate on November 10. We controlled the amendment. No one was in a better position than we were to describe what the amendment does and does not do. Had such a major change to the amendment been made, it is inconceivable that one of us would not at least have commented on it. No such comment or even the suggestion of such a change was made by either one of us.

Indeed, the few statements that Senator GRAHAM did make prior to passage of Graham/Levin/Kyl that describe the amendment's reach tend to confirm that the amendment does not treat detainees differently based on when they filed their claims. For example, on the evening of November 14, when the final amendment was introduced, Senator GRAHAM noted that ''[i]nstead of having unlimited habeas corpus opportunities under the Constitution, we give every enemy combatant, all 500, a chance to go to Federal court, the Circuit Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia.'' (151 Cong. Rec. S12754.) ''What we have done, working with Senators LEVIN, KYL, and others, we have created that same type of appeals process for all military commission decisions.'' Ibid.

During that same evening, Senator LEVIN also commented on the new amendment. Although he said that the amendment did not ''strip jurisdiction'' from the courts, he made clear that he meant that jurisdiction remained in place because the pending cases—including challenges to military-commission decisions—could go forward as claims invoking the substantive review standards of the new amendment. Senator LEVIN stated: ''What we have done in this amendment, we have said that the standards in the amendment will be applied in pending cases, but the amendment will not trip the courts of jurisdiction over those cases. For instance, the Supreme Court jurisdiction in Hamdan is not affected.'' (151 Cong. Rec. S12755.) Again, later: ''what our amendment does, as soon as it is enacted and the enactment is effective, it provides that the standards we set forth in our amendment will be the substantive standards which we would expect would be applied in all cases, including cases which are pending as of the effective date of this amendment.'' Ibid. And again: ''because it would not strip courts of jurisdiction over these matters where they have taken jurisdiction, it does, again, apply the substantive law and assume that the courts would apply the substantive law if this amendment is agreed to.'' Ibid.

Whether the amendment, by barring one type of claim and authorizing another type to take its place, strips the courts of jurisdiction, is, to some extent, a matter of perspective. It is a question of whether the glass is half empty or half full. On the operative issue, however, Senator LEVIN's remarks on November 14 are consistent not only with my own and Senator GRAHAM's characterization of the amendment (see, e.g. 151 Cong. Rec. S14263), but also with the interpretation now advanced by the Justice Department: that the current claims can go forward, but only as claims for review under the substantive standards created by the new act.

It bears mention that the revised amendment's authorization of judicial review of military-commission decisions, though narrow and venue-restricted, was a substantial departure from the original amendment. As Senator LEVIN had emphasized on November 10, the original amendment ''eliminates court review of the sentences of enemy combatants before these commissions.'' (151 Cong. Rec. S12664.) He stated that the amendment even ''eliminates the appeal of a conviction that led to a capital offense.'' (151 Cong. Rec. S12665.) Under the original Graham amendment, no appeal of any kind would have been permitted from the military-commission verdict in the Hamdan case.

The revised amendment does allow limited appeals of final military-commission decisions. In fact, this change was described to Senators as the principal difference between the original and revised Graham amendments. Senator LEVIN noted on the morning of November 15, before the vote on Graham/Levin/Kyl:

> The amendment which was approved last Thursday, which is the one now awaiting this amendment, would have provided for review only for status determinations and not of convictions by military commissions. . . . One of the reasons I voted against the amendment last Thursday is that it did not provide for that direct judicial review of convictions by military commissions. That is the major change in the amendment before the Senate, the so-called Graham-Levin-Kyl amendment which is before the Senate. There are a number of other changes as well, but of all the changes, what this amendment does is add . . . a direct appeal for convictions by military commissions. (151 Cong. Rec. S12754.)

Other Senators speaking about the amendment prior to the final vote did not even view the detainee's glass as half full. On the morning of November 15, Senator SPECTER exhorted his colleagues to oppose the amendment, stating: ''On the face of the Graham amendment, it . . . even takes away jurisdiction from the Supreme Court of the United States.'' (151 Cong. Rec. S12799.) He later stated that the amendment would ''strip Federal courts of the authority to consider a habeas petition from detainees being held in U.S. custody as enemy combatants,'' (151 Cong. Rec. 12801), and reiterated that the Graham/Levin/Kyl amendment was an amendment ''which on the face takes away jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the United States.'' Ibid. Senator SPECTER's remarks should at least have placed any Senator on inquiry notice that the final amendment might affect pending cases.

Finally, Senator DURBIN also spoke about the final Graham amendment prior to the vote. As I mentioned earlier, on the morning of November 15, Senator DURBIN expressed concern that the original Graham/Kyl amendment's jurisdictional bar would apply ''retroactively,'' and that it ''likely would prevent the Supreme Court from ruling on the merits of the Hamdan case.'' (151 Cong. Rec. S12799.) Almost immediately after these words, Senator DURBIN also commented on the revised Graham amendment. He stated:

The Graham-Levin substitute amendment would somewhat improve the underlying amendment by expanding the scope of review in the D.C. Circuit Court to include whether CSRT's are legal, but not whether a particular detainee's detention is legal. It would also allow for post-conviction review of military commission convictions. However, the amendment would still eliminate habeas review and overrule Rasul.

(151 Cong. Rec. S12799.) Again, no suggestion was made that the new amendment might carve out pending cases, despite the Senator's expressed concern about retroactivity. The Senator gave no hint that he expected the new amendment to treat pending cases any differently than did the old amendment. Senator DURBIN does not appear to have been misled about the effect of the final Graham amendment, nor did he mislead anyone else.

To be sure, two statements that do appear in the RECORD prior to the final vote on the Graham amendment both assert that the amendment would not ''strip jurisdiction''—and both of these statements are unleavened by Senator LEVIN's accompanying clarification that pending cases would proceed under the substantive review standards of the new law. Both of these statements, however, appear to have been introduced into the record following the final vote—both refer to that vote in the past tense. Neither Senator thus could have misled other Members about the effect of the amendment prior to the vote. Senator KERRY made clear in his statement that his remarks were made only after the November 15 vote: ''Today, I voted in favor of Senator BINGAMAN's amendment No. 2523, because it would have preserved judicial review . . . When the Bingaman amendment failed, I voted for a second-degree amendment.'' (151 Cong. Rec. S12799.) Similarly, Senator REID also emphasized that his statement did not precede the actual vote: ''the Senate has voted to deny the availability of habeas corpus to individuals held by the United States at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. I rise to explain . . . my votes in favor of the Bingaman amendment and the Graham-Levin amendment earlier today.'' (151 Cong. Rec. S12802.) Neither of these statements was part of the information that was presented to Senators prior to the final vote on the Graham amendment.

To summarize, the legislative record is utterly devoid of any evidence that Senators were led to believe that the Graham/Levin/Kyl amendment would carve out pending cases. Prior to the vote, several Senators spoke of the original amendment's breadth and the fact that it would terminate pending cases. Senator GRAHAM, drawing no distinction between pre- and post-enactment filers, stated that the revised amendment would apply a uniform standard to all 500 Guantanamo detainees. Senator LEVIN made clear that ''the standards we set forth in our amendment will be the substantive standards which we would expect would be applied in all cases, including cases which are pending as of the effective date of this amendment.'' Senator SPECTER pointedly warned that the final amendment would ''strip Federal courts of the authority to consider a habeas petition from detainees'' and ''even take[] away jurisdiction from the Supreme Court of the United States.'' Other Members who condemned the original amendment for terminating pending cases gave no hint that they viewed the new amendment any differently. Quite simply, there is no evidence that anyone misled anyone else about the fact that the Graham amendment would only allow pending cases to go forward under the limited review standards of the new law.

On November 15, the Graham/Levin/Kyl amendment passed the Senate by a vote of 84–14. That same day, the entire Defense Authorization bill passed the Senate by unanimous consent and the Senate appointed conferees. One month later, on December 16, the House and Senate conferees agreed to file a conference report. In the days that followed, a new slew of statements were made in the Senate and even in the House commenting on the meaning of the Graham amendment. Many of these statements are simply the usual effort by the losers of legislative battles to rewrite legislative history. The majority of the Senators, for example, who announced in these statements that the Graham amendment was not intended to affect pending cases also were among the 14 Senators who voted against the final Graham/Levin/Kyl compromise. No one can seriously suggest that these members relied on any representations made by the backers of the amendment. And more importantly, given the marked disagreement between the statements that were made at this late stage about the effect of the amendment on pending cases, no one could justifiably have relied upon one view rather than another to learn what the amendment does. Rather, it is up to members to examine the actual language of the amendment.

I hope that this review of the circumstances of the enactment of the Graham amendment will put to rest any accusation that members of Congress were misled about the amendment's impact on pending cases. Whether the amendment does in fact govern pending cases is another matter. For the reasons expressed here and in the January 18 letter to the Attorney General, I believe that it does so, but that, of course, is a matter for the courts to decide. In the event that the courts concur with my and Senator GRAHAM's interpretation of the amendment, however, no Member should be heard to complain that they were led to believe that the amendment would operate differently.

I ask unanimous consent that the letter be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. SENATE,
Washington, DC, January 18, 2006.

Hon. ALBERTO GONZALES,
Attorney General, U.S. Department of Justice, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. ATTORNEY GENERAL: We understand that the Justice Department has been criticized recently in the press and by members of Congress for asserting in court proceedings that a provision in the Fiscal Year 2006 Defense appropriations bill that regulates legal actions brought by Guantanamo detainees—the so-called ''Graham Amendment''—affects pending litigation. Critics contend that the Administration's actions violate an agreement with Members of Congress by arguing that the Graham Amendment makes no exception for pending cases.

We are the lead sponsor and an original cosponsor of the Graham Amendment. We write to assure you that the attorneys under your supervision have correctly interpreted the disputed provision.

The Graham Amendment states in relevant part that ''effect[ive] on the date of enactment of this Act,'' except pursuant to special review procedures specified in the Act, ''no court, justice, or judge shall have jurisdiction to hear or consider'' a habeas application or any other action relating to the detention of a Guantanamo detainee. All Members of the Senate had access to this language before the Senate voted on the final Graham Amendment and the final Defense appropriations bill. The language cannot reasonably be construed to leave intact any power in the courts to entertain the current barrage of habeas petitions and other actions brought by Guantanamo detainees. The Defense appropriations bill was signed into law on December 30, 2005. As of that date, literally ''no court, justice, or judge'' has jurisdiction to entertain these lawsuits. That is what we intended.

Had we intended to preserve some power in the courts to continue to hear the current flurry of legal actions, we would have done so. We did not. Moreover, as we made clear when the final defense bill passed the Senate, we are well aware that for over a century, American courts consistently have interpreted legislation removing a court's jurisdiction over a type of case to also remove its ability to hear pending cases. Surely, this long line of precedent negates any ambiguity as to the effect of the Graham Amendment on pending cases.

We also note that a contrary interpretation of the Amendment's effect would be inconsistent with the structure of the Amendment. As mentioned above, other sections of the Graham Amendment create special standards and procedures for judicial review of the detention and trial of Guantanamo detainees. The Amendment also states that these special standards and procedures shall apply not only to relevant claims filed after enactment, but also those ''pending on . . . the date of the enactment of this Act.'' (Emphasis added.) Obviously, no claim pending at the time of enactment sought to invoke the review standards created by the same Act. This provision calls on the courts and parties to construe pending actions that challenge either the fact of detention or a military trial as requests for review pursuant to the special standards in the new law. And just as obviously, if all pending lawsuits were exempted from the new law, no pending case would be governed by the new review standards. To adopt the construction advocated by the critics—that courts retain jurisdiction to continue to hear all current lawsuits in their current form—would render the statutory language applying the new standards to pending cases a dead letter.

The original Graham-Kyl Amendment stated that its jurisdiction-removing provisions

''apply to [actions] pending on or after the date of the enactment of this Act.'' This language later was replaced with language specifying that the Amendment ''shall take effect on the date of the enactment of this Act.'' There were two reasons for this substitution: first, the jurisdiction-removing provision technically does not apply any new standards to the pending cases. Rather, it eliminates the forum in which those cases can be heard. Second, the original language ''applying'' jurisdiction removal to pending cases appeared to require that those cases be dismissed outright. Such a result would have conflicted with subparagraph (h)(2), which is designed to allow current cases to continue in the D.C. Circuit as requests for review pursuant to the new standards. Altering the effective-date language eliminated this internal inconsistency and clarified that, rather than requiring that pending cases be dismissed, the new law allows the courts to construe those cases as requests for review under the new standards and, where necessary, transfer them to the appropriate forum.

This is all that we intended by this modification of the Graham Amendment's effective-date language and, more importantly, this is all that the language does. Nothing in this modification preserves any jurisdiction in the courts to continue the current actions in their present form after the date of the enactment of the Act.

To the extent that anyone construing the Graham Amendment might be tempted to subordinate actual statutory text to expressions of Senators' private intent, two points are in order: first, we are two of the three cosponsors on the ''Graham-Levin-Kyl Amendment'' that was introduced in the Senate on November 14, and one of us is the lead sponsor. Both of us made clear in the Congressional Record at the time that the final law passed the Senate that we understood, in light of standard rules of statutory construction, that removal of jurisdiction would eliminate pending cases—the same interpretation now espoused by the Justice Department.

In addition, on November 14, the other cosponsor of the amendment, Senator Levin, stated that ''[w]hat our Amendment does, as soon as it is enacted and the enactment is effective, it provides that the substantive standards we set forth in our Amendment will be the substantive standards which we would expect would be applied in all cases, including cases which are pending as of the effective date of this Amendment.'' 151 Cong. Rec. 12755. He also stated that day: ''the standards in the Amendment will be applied in pending cases.'' Ibid. The effective-date and pending-claims language in the Amendment introduced on November 14 is identical to that in the enacted statute. Thus, on the day of introduction, all three original cosponsors of the Graham Amendment understood it to operate in the same way: the pending Guantanamo cases can go forward, but only under the special review standards and procedures established by the Amendment.

Finally, we should comment on the various other legislative statements purporting to explain the intent behind the Graham Amendment. By our count, at least nine Members of the minority have introduced statements in the Congressional Record announcing that the Graham Amendment was meant to have no effect on pending litigation. For the record, the only one of these Members who played any role in crafting the Amendment is Senator Levin. Negotiations with Senator Levin resulted in a substantial expansion of the scope of the judicial review permitted under the special review procedures established by the Amendment. None of the other Members commenting on the intent behind the Amendment's effective-date subsection played any significant drafting role of which we are aware. Indeed, some of these minority Members who purport to define the authorial intent also complain that the Amendment was ''negotiated largely behind closed doors by the White House and a select few majority Members of Congress'' (151 Cong. Rec. 12201), or that ''all negotiations on this provision have occurred in back rooms, without the involvement of the vast majority of Congress, and without even consulting most of the conferees.'' 151 Cong. Rec. 14170. Such complaints are not consistent with the ''insider'' perspective that these Members purport to share with the reader. Several of these Members also are among the 14 Senators who even voted against the final Graham-Levin-Kyl Amendment when it was offered in the Senate on November 15. Clearly, it would be inappropriate to allow those who opposed the amendment to define the intent of the authors of the amendment.

Of course, more important than any private intent harbored by any Member of Congress is the actual legislative text that was passed by both houses of Congress and signed into law by the President. As we noted previously, absent repudiation by the federal courts of over a century of precedent construing like statutes, the Graham Amendment unambiguously eliminates the federal courts' power to hear Guantanamo detainees' cases in their current form. Notwithstanding the accusations made by some critics, your litigators have, in our view, properly interpreted the Graham Amendment. And, at the end of the day, we anticipate that the courts will make these jurisdictional determinations in accord with their own rules, procedures, precedent, and the plain language of the statute.

Sincerely,

LINDSEY O. GRAHAM,
U.S. Senator.
JON KYL,
U.S. Senator.

GLOBAL NUCLEAR ENERGY PARTNERSHIP

Mr. CRAIG. Mr. President, I rise today to express my agreement with President Bush's belief that our country's security depends in large part on a diverse energy portfolio, one that is not overly reliant on any one energy source, especially sources of foreign origin. I agree with the President that this country is overly dependent on foreign oil. Consistent with that belief, the Bush administration has just announced a potentially far-reaching energy program known as the Global Nuclear Energy Partnership or GNEP. This program provides a wide-reaching, long-term plan for establishing a robust and sustainable future for nuclear energy in this country and abroad.

The Global Nuclear Energy Partnership promises to provide abundant energy, without emitting greenhouse gases; to recycle used nuclear fuel in order to minimize waste; to safely and securely allow developing nations to deploy nuclear power to meet their energy needs, while reducing proliferation risks; to assure maximum energy recovery from still-valuable used nuclear fuel; and to allow the U.S. to rely on a single geologic waste repository for the rest of this century.

Nuclear energy currently provides about 20 percent of this Nation's electricity, and does so without emitting any carbon, greenhouse gases, or other air pollutants. All the waste generated by commercial nuclear powerplants is securely managed and destined for safe, permanent disposal in a geologic repository.

However, according to current law, that repository can contain only slightly more than the amount of waste already stored at existing reactor sites. Even if the law is changed, the repository at Yucca Mountain can only accommodate about the amount of spent nuclear fuel that will be generated by the existing reactors in this country over their lifetimes. If nuclear power is to have a future in this country, even to maintain its current 20 percent share of electricity generation, either a second repository will need to be developed soon—with many more to follow—or an alternative means of managing this waste is needed.

After a single use, spent nuclear fuel retains more than 95 percent of its energy potential. That energy potential could be tapped by reprocessing the spent fuel, recycling the useable part and disposing of the rest as waste, which makes up only about 3–4 percent of the spent fuel. This could substantially reduce the amount of long-lived nuclear waste requiring burial in a geologic repository, and could extend the lifetime of the Yucca Mountain repository many fold.

But efforts to recycle spent fuel were abandoned in this country back in the 1970s, largely because of concerns about nuclear proliferation. Those concerns stemmed from the fact that, at that time, the method used to recycle spent fuel, the ''PUREX'' process, separated out pure plutonium, which might be used to construct a nuclear bomb.

During the 30-plus years since then, the U.S. has—through research at its National Laboratories—made considerable progress in developing new methods for reprocessing spent fuel that are much less prone to proliferation risks, because they do not separate out pure plutonium, but keep it mixed with other actinides. This mixture is not readily used for nuclear weapons.

Reintroducing recycling into this country's strategy for managing spent fuel is a major change in policy, and one that deserves serious discussion. That discussion should be based on fact and not emotion; should address current technologies, not those from more than a generation ago; and should consider reasonable alternatives to maintaining nuclear energy as a viable part of our Nation's energy supply.

And what reasonable alternatives are there? Total electricity consumption in the U.S. is projected to increase by about 40 percent by 2025. Wind and solar energy cannot provide large-scale, base-load electricity, because they are intermittent energy sources. Hydro provides about 10 percent of our electricity right now, but building new

Here are the four separate pages of Sen. Kyl's recent statement regarding the Graham amendment, as those pages appear in the Congressional Record. Note that as of the beginning of this year, citations to the Record begin with volume number 152. (As opposed to last December's 151 Cong. Rec. ___.)

Gorsuch, Neil M

From: Gorsuch, Neil M
Sent: Monday, February 13, 2006 11:49 AM
To: [redacted]@judiciary-rep.senate.gov'
Subject: RE: Kyl Feb 9 Record statement

Thanks!

-----Original Message-----
From: [redacted]@judiciary-rep.senate.gov [mailto [redacted]@judiciary-rep.senate.gov]
Sent: Monday, February 13, 2006 10:06 AM
To: Gorsuch, Neil M [redacted]
Subject: Kyl Feb 9 Record statement

Here are the four separate pages of Sen. Kyl's recent statement regarding the Graham amendment, as those pages appear in the Congressional Record. Note that as of the beginning of this year, citations to the Record begin with volume number 152. (As opposed to last December's 151 Cong. Rec. ___.)

[redacted]@dodgc.osd.mil

From: [redacted]@dodgc.osd.mil
Sent: Monday, February 13, 2006 12:52 PM
To: Gorsuch, Neil M
Subject: FW: CFR speech on Friday
Attachments: tmp.htm

See any issues?

> -----Original Message-----
> From: [redacted] DoD OGC
> Sent: Monday, February 13, 2006 11:13
> To: [redacted] CIV, OASD-PA; [redacted] DoD OGC
> Cc: [redacted] CIV, OSD
> Subject: RE: CFR speech on Friday
>
> [redacted] I see no objection, but we also need [redacted] review.
>
[redacted]
>
> -----Original Message-----
> From: [redacted] CIV, OASD-PA
> Sent: Monday, February 13, 2006 10:51 AM
> To: [redacted] DoD OGC
> Cc: [redacted], CIV, OSD
> Subject: CFR speech on Friday
>
> [redacted]
>
> Please see attached. I think they are okay if I sign it but wanted to > make sure.
>
> [redacted]
>
>
>
> COUNCIL ON FOREIGN RELATIONS
> ---------- > 58 EAST 68TH STREET * NEW YORK * NEW YORK 10021 > Tel 212 434 9600 Fax 212 434 9804 meetings@cfr.org > www.cfr.org <www.cfr.org>
>
>
>
> ON-THE-RECORD and MEDIA RELEASE
>
>
> I understand that my remarks at the Council on Foreign Relations event > scheduled for Friday, February 17, 2005 from 12:15 to 2:00 p.m. entitled > New Realities in the Media Age will be on-the-record.

>
> I further understand that the Council makes audio and/or video recordings > of its on-the-record meetings. Some meetings may also be > videoconferenced, teleconference, webcast live, transcribed, and/or posted > on the Council's website.
>
> I agree that the Council's recordings of my remarks may be edited and used > in whole or in part for broadcasting purposes and for any other purpose in > any manner or media now known or hereafter created, including, without > limitation, motion pictures, television, radio, DVD, videocassette, video > and/or laser disc, internet, print publication and computer-assisted media > (including CD-ROM and similar systems).
>
> I waive any financial remuneration or other consideration for subsequent > use of my remarks.
>
>
> _____
> Signature
> Donald Rumsfeld
>
> _____
> Date
>
>
>
>
>
[redacted]
>
> [redacted]office
> [redacted]cell
> [redacted]@osd.mil
>
>

See any issues?

-----Original Message-----

From: [redacted] DoD OGC

Sent: Monday, February 13, 2006 11:13

To: [redacted] CIV, OASD-PA [redacted] DoD OGC

Cc: [redacted] CIV, OSD

Subject: RE: CFR speech on Friday

[redacted] I see no objection, but we also need [redacted] review.

[redacted]

-----Original Message-----

From: [redacted] CIV, OASD-PA

Sent: Monday, February 13, 2006 10:51 AM

To: [redacted] DoD OGC

Cc: [redacted] CIV, OSD

Subject: CFR speech on Friday

[redacted]

Please see attached. I think they are okay if I sign it but wanted to make sure.

[redacted]

COUNCIL ON FOREIGN RELATIONS

---

58 EAST 68TH STREET • NEW YORK • NEW YORK 10021

Tel 212 434 9600 Fax 212 434 9804 meetings@cfr.org

www.cfr.org

ON-THE-RECORD and MEDIA RELEASE

I understand that my remarks at the Council on Foreign Relations event scheduled for Friday, February 17, 2005 from 12:15 to 2:00 p.m. entitled New Realities in the Media Age will be on the record will be on-the-record.

I further understand that the Council makes audio and/or video recordings of its on-the-record meetings. Some meetings may also be videoconferenced, teleconference, webcast live, transcribed, and/or posted on the Council's website.

I agree that the Council's recordings of my remarks may be edited and used in whole or in part for broadcasting purposes and for any other purpose in any manner or media now known or hereafter created, including, without limitation, motion pictures, television, radio, DVD, videocassette, video and/or laser disc, internet, print publication and computer-assisted media (including CD-ROM and similar systems).

I waive any financial remuneration or other consideration for subsequent use of my remarks.

_____

Signature
Donald Rumsfeld

_____

Date

[redacted]

[redacted] office
cell
[redacted] @osd.mil

Gorsuch, Neil M

From: Gorsuch, Neil M
Sent: Monday, February 13, 2006 1:28 PM
To: [redacted]@dodgc.osd.mil'
Cc: Elwood, Courtney
Subject: RE: CFR speech on Friday

I don't any issue with this but wonder whether or not the AG signed something like it. Am adding Courtney Elwood of OAG in the hope she can tell us what precedent says on this!

-----Original Message-----
From: [redacted]@dodgc.osd.mil [mailto[redacted]@dodgc.osd.mil]
Sent: Monday, February 13, 2006 12:52 PM
To: Gorsuch, Neil M
Subject: FW: CFR speech on Friday

See any issues?

> -----Original Message-----
> From: [redacted] DoD OGC
> Sent: Monday, February 13, 2006 11:13
> To: [redacted] OASD-PA; [redacted] DoD OGC
> Cc: [redacted] CIV, OSD
> Subject: RE: CFR speech on Friday
>
> [redacted] I see no objection, but we also need [redacted] review.
>
> [redacted]
>
> -----Original Message-----
> From: [redacted] CIV, OASD-PA
> Sent: Monday, February 13, 2006 10:51 AM
> To: [redacted] DoD OGC
> Cc: [redacted] CIV, OSD
> Subject: CFR speech on Friday
>
> [redacted]
>
> Please see attached. I think they are okay if I sign it but wanted to > make sure.
>
> [redacted]
>
>
>
> COUNCIL ON FOREIGN RELATIONS

> ---------- > 58 EAST 68TH STREET * NEW YORK * NEW YORK 10021 > Tel 212 434 9600 Fax 212 434 9804 meetings@cfr.org > www.cfr.org <www.cfr.org>
>
>
>
> ON-THE-RECORD and MEDIA RELEASE
>
>
> I understand that my remarks at the Council on Foreign Relations event > scheduled for Friday, February 17, 2005 from 12:15 to 2:00 p.m. entitled > New Realities in the Media Age will be on-the-record.
>
> I further understand that the Council makes audio and/or video recordings > of its on-the-record meetings. Some meetings may also be > videoconferenced, teleconference, webcast live, transcribed, and/or posted > on the Council's website.
>
> I agree that the Council's recordings of my remarks may be edited and used > in whole or in part for broadcasting purposes and for any other purpose in > any manner or media now known or hereafter created, including, without > limitation, motion pictures, television, radio, DVD, videocassette, video > and/or laser disc, internet, print publication and computer-assisted media > (including CD-ROM and similar systems).
>
> I waive any financial remuneration or other consideration for subsequent > use of my remarks.
>
>
> _____
> Signature
> Donald Rumsfeld
>
> _____
> Date
>
>
>
>
>
[redacted]
>
[redacted] office
> [redacted] cell
> [redacted] @osd.mil
>
>

Gorsuch, Neil M

From: Gorsuch, Neil M
Sent: Monday, February 13, 2006 1:35 PM
To: Elwood, Courtney; [redacted]@dodgc.osd.mil'
Subject: RE: CFR speech on Friday

Thanks!

-----Original Message-----
From: Elwood, Courtney
Sent: Monday, February 13, 2006 1:33 PM
To: Gorsuch, Neil M; [redacted]@dodgc.osd.mil'
Subject: Re: CFR speech on Friday

Yes, my recollection is that the AG did sign something like this on [redacted].

Sent from my BlackBerry Wireless Handheld

-----Original Message-----
From: Gorsuch, Neil M <Neil.Gorsuch@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
To: [redacted]@dodgc.osd.mil' <[redacted]@dodgc.osd.mil>
CC: Elwood, Courtney <Courtney.Elwood@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
Sent: Mon Feb 13 13:28:28 2006
Subject: RE: CFR speech on Friday

I don't any issue with this but wonder whether or not the AG signed something like it. Am adding Courtney Elwood of OAG in the hope she can tell us what precedent says on this!

-----Original Message-----
From: [redacted]@dodgc.osd.mil [mailto [redacted]@dodgc.osd.mil]
Sent: Monday, February 13, 2006 12:52 PM
To: Gorsuch, Neil M
Subject: FW: CFR speech on Friday

See any issues?

> -----Original Message-----
> From: [redacted] DoD OGC
> Sent: Monday, February 13, 2006 11:13
> To: [redacted] OASD-PA; [redacted] DoD OGC
> Cc: [redacted] CIV, OSD
> Subject: RE: CFR speech on Friday
>
> [redacted] I see no objection, but we also need [redacted] review.
>
> [redacted]

[redacted]
>
> -----Original Message-----
> From: [redacted] CIV, OASD-PA
> Sent: Monday, February 13, 2006 10:51 AM
> To: [redacted] DoD OGC
> Cc: [redacted] CIV, OSD
> Subject: CFR speech on Friday
>
> [redacted]
>
> Please see attached. I think they are okay if I sign it but wanted to > make sure.
>
> [redacted]
>
>
>
> COUNCIL ON FOREIGN RELATIONS
> ---------- > 58 EAST 68TH STREET * NEW YORK * NEW YORK 10021 > Tel 212 434 9600 Fax 212 434 9804 meetings@cfr.org > www.cfr.org <www.cfr.org>
>
>
>
> ON-THE-RECORD and MEDIA RELEASE
>
>
> I understand that my remarks at the Council on Foreign Relations event > scheduled for Friday, February 17, 2005 from 12:15 to 2:00 p.m. entitled > New Realities in the Media Age will be on-the-record.
>
> I further understand that the Council makes audio and/or video recordings > of its on-the-record meetings. Some meetings may also be > videoconferenced, teleconference, webcast live, transcribed, and/or posted > on the Council's website.
>
> I agree that the Council's recordings of my remarks may be edited and used > in whole or in part for broadcasting purposes and for any other purpose in > any manner or media now known or hereafter created, including, without > limitation, motion pictures, television, radio, DVD, videocassette, video > and/or laser disc, internet, print publication and computer-assisted media > (including CD-ROM and similar systems).
>
> I waive any financial remuneration or other consideration for subsequent > use of my remarks.
>
>
> _____
> Signature
> Donald Rumsfeld
>
> _____
> Date
>

>
>
>
>
>
>
>
office
cell
> @osd.mil
>
>

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Tuesday, February 14, 2006 8:04 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Attorney General's News Briefing for Tuesday, February 14, 2006
Attachments:	agnb060214.pdf; agnb060214.doc

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 14, 2006 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

ABA Says Bush Exceeded His Constitutional Powers In NSA Surveillance Program 3
Padilla Attorneys Challenge Validity Of Government Evidence 4
ABA Denounces NSA Surveillance Program 4
US Seeks Extradition Of Suspect From 1985 TWA Hijacking ..4
Jury Selection Begins Today For Hayat Trial 5
Elbaneh Family Surprised, Worried By Escape From Yemeni Prison 5
Judge Bars US From Handing Citizen Over To Iraq 5
Fitzgerald Seeks Phone Records Of Two NYTimes Reporters 5
Pentagon Analyst Says Atta Appeared In Able Danger Database 13 Times 6
Rumsfeld Says Terror Groups Unlikely To Gain Foothold In North Africa 6
Terror Victims' Conference Opens In Spain 6
UN Report Criticizes US Treatment Of Guantanamo Detainees 6
Blair Push For British ID Cards Advances 7
In Saudi Arabia, Gore Says US Abused Arabs After 9/11 Attacks 7

Homeland Response:

Two Air Marshals Charged With Attempting To Smuggle Cocaine 7
Chertoff Touts Risk Management Approach To Homeland Security Funding 8
Bush Budget Increases Funding For Domestic Nuclear Detection Office 8
New Mexico Town Serves As Terror Attack Training Ground For First Responders 8
House GOP Report Blasts Administration, Chertoff On Katrina Response 9
GAO, DOJ Find Rampant Waste, Fraud In FEMA Hurricane Relief Programs 12

War News:

Iran, Not US, Said To Be "Reshaping" Post-Saddam Iraq 14
Jaafari Win Said To Highlight Sadr's Growing Influence 15
US Expects To Finish Handoff Of Responsibility To Iraqi Army By 2007 15
Suicide Bomber Kills 10 Iraqis 16
Judge Forces Saddam, Accomplices To Attend Trial 16
Federal Judge Rules US Cannot Transfer Detainee To Iraqi Custody 16
British Military Officials Arrest Man In Connection To Abuse Tape 16
Report Says Iraq Deadliest Country For Journalists In Last 25 Years 16
Iraq Halts Purchases Of Australian Wheat 16
In 1999, Iraq Rejected UN Resolution On Weapons Inspectors 17
Four US Soldiers Killed In Roadside Bombing In Afghanistan 17
Musharraf Said To Be Facing Multiple Challenges 17
Marines Adapt Cold War Weapons For Warfare In Iraq 17

DOJ:

Analysts Have Mixed Reaction To Proposed DOJ, DHS Budgets 18

Corporate Scandals:

Enron Jury Hears Tapes Of Conference Calls 18
Judge Upbraids Counsel In AIG Suit On Request To Make Documents "Disappear." 19

Criminal Law:

Former DOJ Official Aids Israel Lobbyists' Defense 20
US Issues New Subpoena In Abramoff Probe 20
Judge Releases Search Warrants In Entiwistle Case 20

Five Government Agencies Reviewing Classified Material For Libby Trial 21
Former Janitor Testifies He Gave Ryan Contributions After Receiving Campaign Funds 21
Handwriting Expert Testifies Campbell Signature On Disputed Contract 21
Jury Selection Begins Today For First "Tennessee Waltz" Trial 21
Gotti Says Concern For Family Motivated Him To Turn Down Plea Deal 22
Bahamas Man Pleads Guilty In US To Operating Ponzi Scheme 22
Former Connecticut Governor Returns Home After 10 Months In Prison 22
Maryland High Court Overturns Death Sentence For Baltimore Man 23
Ohio GOP Fundraiser Charged On 53 Counts In Coin Scandal 23
Former Virginia Sheriff Pleads No Contest To Larceny, Embezzlement Charges 24
Computer Industry Leaders Gather For Security Conference Today 24

Civil Law:

Reid Willing To Consider Asbestos Lawsuit Curbs 24

Civil Rights:

FBI Arrests Florida Man On Human Trafficking Charges 25
Inmate Dies After Racial Fight In Los Angeles Jail 25
Frist Says Senate Will Vote On Gay Marriage Amendment In June 26
US Said To Be Underestimating Costs Of "Don't Ask, Don't Tell." 26
Pentagon Will Miss Deadline For Women-In-Combat Review 26
Army Chaplain Silenced After Criticizing Prayer Policy 26
Ohio Board Of Education Likely To Challenge Intelligent Design Curriculum 27
Dionne Says Local NY Official Finding New Ground On Abortion Question 27

Antitrust:

New DOJ Antitrust Chief Faces Tough Decisions 27
DOJ Will Extend Review Of Whirlpool-Maytag Merger 27
Spate Of Mergers Good News For Antitrust Firms 28
Merrill In Talks To Acquire Stake In BlackRock 28
Inco-Falconbridge Deal Raises Antitrust Concerns 29

Environment/Indian Affairs:

Bodman Says DOE No Longer Has Estimate For Yucca Mountain Opening 29
Conservative Groups Call For Curbs On Greenhouse Gas Emissions 29
Bald Eagle Gets Closer To Removal From Endangered List 30
WPost Pleased By Smoking Ban's Progress In Virginia Legislature 30
Abramoff Questions Ensnare Pombo 30
Tribes Feel Senate Indian Affairs Panel Neglecting Key Issues 30

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

ATF Cautious About SUV Sightings At Alabama Church Fires 30
Doctor Accused Of Writing Illegal Steroid Prescriptions To Plead Guilty 31
Mailed Marijuana Seized In Florida Following DEA Tip 31
Convicted Meth Makers In North Carolina To Pay Restitution To DEA 31
Man Gets Life Sentence In Georgia Cocaine, Meth Case 31
Six East African Gang Members Arrested In Seattle 32
Arab Family Claims US Targeted Them After 9/11 32

Tax:

IRS Offers Leniency For Firms That Marketed Abusive Tax Shelters 32

Congress-Administration:

Media Continue To Question Disclosure Of Accidental Cheney Shooting 33
Bush Budget Would Kill Popular Health Projects 36
Deficit Reduction Bill Eases Rules For Prepaid Tuition Plans 36
Budget Shows Government Will Forgo $7 Billion In Oil, Gas Royalties 36
Democrats Split On Strategy To Fix Deficit Reduction Bill Typo 36
GAO Report Shows Administration Spent $1.6 Billion On Public Relations 37
Commission To Evaluate No Child Left Behind Education Reforms 37
Conservatives Want Faster Action On Judicial Nominations 37
Doctors, Pharmacists Say Medicare Benefit Limits Drug Availability 37
Frist Faces Moderates' Opposition On Medicare Growth Curbs 38
House GOP Faces Tough Legislative Battles As Elections Approach 38

DOJ_NMG_0014717

Boehner's Rise May Mean End Of "Attack Dog" Style In GOP Leadership....38
McCain Earmark Bill Gathers Support Even As Obstacles Mount....38
Washington Lobbyists Spent $1.16 Billion In First Half Of 2005....38
Expert Offers Mixed Assessment Of Pentagon Quadrennial Defense Review....39
Weather Service To Offer Early Retirements To Some Employees....39
Mineta Criticizes Singer's Failure To Use Car Seat For Baby39
Bush Approval Rating Falls To 39% In Gallup Poll....39

Other News:

White House Predicts Continued Economic Growth....39
CSX To Pay $2 Million To Settle Claims From 2001 Baltimore Tunnel Fire....40
George Lucas To Appear With House Democrats Today....40
Lobbyist Launches Anti-Union Media Campaign....40
Professor Says Angry Political Rhetoric Infecting General Population....41
US, Israel Discuss Ways To Oust Hamas....41
Bush, Annan Say Larger Peacekeeping Force Is Needed In Sudan....41
Prime Minister Says Denmark Is Being Portrayed Unfairly....42
Dutch Openly Discuss Implications Of Muslim Immigration .42
Young Macedonian Muslims Embrace Conservative Interpretation Of Islam....43
Film Highlights Differing Perceptions Of US In Turkey....43
Mubarak Calls For Two-Year Postponement Of Egyptian Elections....43
EU Threatens Trade Sanctions Against US....43
Banks To Sever Ties With North Korea....44
Senior Tories Will Seek To Mend Fences With GOP On US Trip....44
VOA To Concentrate Resources On Middle East....44
Haitian Protests Over Vote Counting Process Turn Violent....44
House Panel Examines Web Companies' Role In Chinese Censorship....45
Growing Chinese Trade Deficit Could Increase Political Criticism....45
China Seeks To Increase Use Of Alternative Energy....45
Putin Said To Be Ruling According To KGB Instincts....45
OECD Report Says Europe In Economic Decline....46
Castro Blamed For Detention Of Cuban Dentists In Bahamas....46

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages....46

Washington's Schedule:

Today's Events In Washington....47

TERRORISM NEWS:

ABA Says Bush Exceeded His Constitutional Powers In NSA Surveillance Program. The American Bar Association yesterday denounced President Bush's domestic surveillance program, saying he exceeded his constitutional powers. The AP (2/14, Johnson) reports that the ABA "adopted a policy opposing any future government use of electronic surveillance in the United States for foreign intelligence purposes without first obtaining warrants from a special court set up under the 1978 Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act. The 400,000-member ABA said that if the president believes the FISA is inadequate to protect Americans, he should to ask Congress to amend the act. … The ABA has urged Congress to affirm that when it authorized Bush to go to war, it did not intend to endorse warrantless spying."

Reuters (2/14, Conlon) reports, "The association's resolution calls on Bush 'to abide by the limitations which the Constitution imposes on a President' to make sure national security is protected in a way that is consistent with constitutional guarantees. It opposes 'any future electronic surveillance inside the United States by any U.S. government agency for foreign intelligence purposes that does not comply with provisions of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act.'"

WLKY-TV Louisville (2/14, 5:41 a.m.) reported, "The nation's largest group of lawyers will not stand behind President Bush's domestic surveillance program. The American Bar Association accuses the President of exceeding his powers under the Constitution, this despite the fact that Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, a member of the bar, defends the…program. The spying program has been highly controversial since it was disclosed in December."

DOJ_NMG_0014718

GOP Pollster Says Democrats Reflexively Oppose Anything Bush Supports. David Winston president of the GOP polling firm The Winston Group, writes in Roll Call (2/14) that former Senate Minority Leader Tom Daschle and Rep. Jane Harman, the ranking member on the House Intelligence Committee claim Democrats "were briefed on many occasions about the National Security Agency foreign terrorist surveillance program, but they simply had no avenue open to them to express their deep concerns about its legality. … How about picking up the phone and calling the president, the vice president, House Intelligence Chairman Pete Hoekstra (R-Mich.), Senate Intelligence Chairman Pat Roberts (R-Kan.), Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, then-National Security Adviser Condoleezza Rice, House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) or the head of the NSA surveillance program?" Winston adds that Democrats "simply have been unable to come to terms with what they believe, deep down, as a party about national security. They have no ideas, no alternatives, so they try to pass off criticism as content." Democrats have also "become so irrationally angry about Bush that they reflexively oppose anything the President is for."

Padilla Attorneys Challenge Validity Of Government Evidence. The Miami Daily Business Review (2/14, Kay) reports, "The jihadist training form that accused terrorist operative Jose Padilla allegedly filled out before heading to an Afghanistan camp may be a fake and requires fingerprint analysis, his defense attorneys say." The Review continues, "In an appeal of a pretrial detention order denying bond, the defense tries to debunk several pieces of prosecution evidence against Padilla and lay out some of its case for the so-called 'dirty bomber.' ... The court papers were filed last week in preparation for the detention appeal to be argued Friday before U.S. District Judge Marcia Cooke. Padilla's defense attorneys are trying to get the accused terrorist released on bond." The Review adds, "Prosecutors were expected to reply in writing to the defense's renewed request for bond before the hearing. … The trial of Padilla and co-defendants charged with providing material support, money and fighters for Muslim terrorists around the world is scheduled to start in September before Cooke and may take six months. … Padilla is accused of going to Afghanistan to attend a terrorist training camp. The U.S. citizen was charged in November after spending more than three years in military custody as an 'enemy combatant' without any charges filed against him."

ABA Denounces NSA Surveillance Program. The AP (2/14, Johnson) reports, "The American Bar Association denounced President Bush's warrantless domestic surveillance program Monday, accusing him of exceeding his powers under the Constitution." The AP continues, "The nation's largest organization of lawyers adopted a policy opposing any future government use of electronic surveillance in the United States for foreign intelligence purposes without first obtaining warrants from a special court set up under the 1978 Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act." The AP adds, "The 400,000-member ABA said that if the president believes the FISA is inadequate to protect Americans, he should ask Congress to amend the act. … Bush and his administration have defended the warrantless eavesdropping, saying it is needed to fill a gap in U.S. security and is allowable under both the president's constitutional powers and the congressional measure authorizing him to go to war in September 2001."

US Seeks Extradition Of Suspect From 1985 TWA Hijacking. CNN.com (2/14, Labott, Rotatori) reports, "The United States has formally asked the Lebanese government to extradite a Lebanese man accused of killing a U.S. Navy diver during an infamous 1985 hijacking, State Department officials and the victim's family said Monday." CNN continues, "Mohammed Ali Hamadi was released from a German prison in December after serving 19 years for his role in the hijacking of TWA Flight 847. … During the 17-day ordeal, U.S. Navy diver Robert Stethem, 23, was beaten and shot dead and his body dumped on a tarmac in Beirut -- an image captured by television cameras and shown around the world." CNN adds, "Officials said Jeffrey Feltman, the U.S. ambassador to Lebanon, has asked Lebanese authorities on several occasions to arrest Hamadi and turn him over to the United States for trial even though the two countries do not have a formal extradition treaty. … Feltman submitted a formal written request for Hamadi's extradition to Lebanese Prime Minister Fouad Siniora last week. … Hamadi was captured in 1987 in Frankfurt, Germany, and convicted for his role in the hijacking. He was paroled in December, and a German court allowed him to return to Lebanon. … The United States wanted Germany to turn over Hamadi to face a series of charges related to the hijacking, including one charge that could potentially carry the death penalty. But Hamadi is not likely to face a death sentence if he is extradited, according to the Justice Department."

DOJ_NMG_0014719

Jury Selection Begins Today For Hayat Trial. The AP (2/14, Thompson) reports jury selection for the trial of Hamid and Umer Hayat on terror-related charges is scheduled to begin today in Sacramento, and "it is expected to provide answers to Lodi residents who have worried about whether their town…harbored a network of terrorists. 'Everyone was wondering, is there a terrorist cell?' Lodi Mayor Susan Hitchcock said. … 'I would imagine most people would like there to be more to the case than lying,' Hitchcock said. 'But that's not to minimize the fact that the younger man (allegedly) attended a terrorist training camp with an eye to harming American citizens.'" The AP notes, "Defense attorneys say their clients were pressured by investigators and should have had attorneys and interpreters present when they confessed. 'When Umer Hayat told the FBI on several occasions that he did not know of any terrorist training camps and his son did not attend any terrorist training camps, those were true statements,' Umer Hayat's attorney, Johnny Griffin III, said Monday. 'Concerning additional statements he made, we will demonstrate to the jury the circumstances under which those statements were made and why they were made.'"

The Lodi News-Sentinel (2/13, Bohm) reports, "Much of the evidence has yet to be revealed in public. Prosecutors contacted more than 30 national agencies to see if they had information, some of it classified because national security was involved. Hamid Hayat, who caught authorities' attention because his name was on a no-fly list, is charged with one count of providing material support — himself — to terrorists and three counts of lying to the FBI about knowledge and involvement with a terrorist training camp in Pakistan. His father, Umer Hayat, is charged with two counts of lying to the FBI."

Elbaneh Family Surprised, Worried By Escape From Yemeni Prison. The AP (2/14, Thompson) reports the escape of alleged Lackawanna al Qaeda cell member Jaber Elbaneh from a Yemeni prison "is puzzling to his U.S. relatives, leaving them wondering why someone who surrendered on his own would turn around and flee custody. … With Elbaneh again a fugitive, the hefty reward is again up for grabs, leaving the family fearing for his life." FBI Buffalo SAC Peter Ahearn "said he was not aware of any recent attempts by Elbaneh to contact relatives here. 'If any family members are contacted, for his safety they should contact us,' he said. 'He is running with a crowd of what we believe are extremely dangerous known terrorists,' Ahearn said." CNN notes, "FBI officials said they consider Elbaneh dangerous. 'Given the circumstances of what he's charged with and where it seems he's fled, we certainly would consider him armed and dangerous,' said Paul Moskal, an FBI spokesman."

Judge Bars US From Handing Citizen Over To Iraq. The AP (2/13, Sherman) reports, "A federal judge on Monday ordered the U.S. military not to hand over to the Iraqi government a U.S. citizen suspected of being a senior associate of insurgent leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi." The AP continues, "The case of Shawqi Omar is the latest legal fight that tests the limits on the Bush administration's power to keep Americans it has identified as terrorists out of U.S. courts." The AP adds, "U.S. District Judge Ricardo Urbina of Washington granted a request from Omar's family to keep him in military custody in Iraq while Urbina decides whether the 44-year-old Kuwaiti native should have his case heard in a U.S. court. A temporary order preventing Omar's transfer had been set to expire Monday. … The Justice Department was reviewing the ruling, said department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse. … Omar has not been charged with a crime nor given access to a lawyer since being arrested at his home in Baghdad in October 2004."

Fitzgerald Seeks Phone Records Of Two NYTimes Reporters. Federal appeals court judges questioned a prosecutor seeking the phone record of two New York Times reporters. The New York Times (2/14, Liptak, 1.19M) reports, "In the case under consideration yesterday, [prosecutor Patrick] Fitzgerald is seeking the phone records of the two Times reporters to determine who told them about impending searches of Islamic charities in Illinois and Texas in December 2001. The reporters, Philip Shenon and Judith Miller, contacted the charities before the searches for what the paper said was routine news gathering." The Times adds, "The questioning yesterday, at the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, was largely sympathetic to the reporters' positions."

The AP (2/14, Neumeister) reports, "Federal officials said the records were needed for a grand jury investigation of government leaks in Illinois. But the Times sued in 2004, asking the lower court to order the government to stop its pursuit of the records. … Judge Robert Sweet agreed, ruling last year that the Justice Department had failed to prove it could not conduct the probe without the phone calls." The AP notes, "During arguments before the appeals court Monday, government lawyer James P. Fleissner said Sweet's ruling was inappropriate, especially since it concerned a case in Illinois, not New York. … Times attorney Floyd Abrams said the challenge was properly brought in Manhattan, where the newspaper is based. He said the newspaper does not know if the government obtained the records."

DOJ_NMG_0014720

Pentagon Analyst Says Atta Appeared In Able Danger Database 13 Times. An exclusive report in the New York Post (2/14, Lathem, 624K) reports, "An active-duty military intelligence analyst has told congressional investigators that 9/11 pilot Mohamed Atta surfaced 13 times in a controversial Pentagon computer program before he executed the attacks, The Post has learned. Congressional sources said last night that an officer in the Pentagon's secretive Land Information Warfare Center told the staff of Rep. Curt Weldon (R-Pa.) about the computer hits. The revelation is significant because the 9/11 commission has asserted that Atta was not on the intelligence community's radar screen before the attacks. … The fact that the program flagged Atta should have provided a lead that apparently wasn't followed, observers say."

Rumsfeld Says Terror Groups Unlikely To Gain Foothold In North Africa. Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld finished three days of talks in Morocco, Algeria and Tunisia saying the possibility of al Qaeda or similar groups gaining a foothold in the countries is "extremely low." Reuters (2/14, Dunham) reports that Rumsfeld told reporters, I think each of these three countries certainly stands out as examples of countries where they've taken a lot of steps to show that they can live in peace and successfully deal with the problem of extremism," adding, "I think that each of those three countries are managing their affairs -- their internal affairs -- in a way that makes that an extremely low possibility."

The AP (2/14, Burns) reports that Rumsfeld said Algeria, Morocco and Tunisia had created "an environment that's inhospitable to terrorism."

Terror Victims' Conference Opens In Spain. The CBS Evening News (2/13, story 9, 0:10, Schieffer) reported, "An international conference for survivors of terror attacks and victims' families opened today in Spain. 600 people from the United States and a half dozen other countries will talk about their experiences and about ways to fight terrorism."

UN Report Criticizes US Treatment Of Guantanamo Detainees. A draft report from a group of UN human rights investigators says the Bush Administration's treatment of prisoners Guantanamo Bay violates international law and in some cases constitutes a from of torture. NBC Nightly News (2/13, story 8, 2:20, Williams) reported that US officials "say the report is based on hearsay." NBC (Myers) added, "The draft report by independent UN experts concludes that Guantanamo Bay should be closed immediately and detainees either put on trial or released. The report claims that US practices at Gitmo violate detainees' physical and mental health and in some cases constitute torture." The report is "most critical of excessive violence when detainees are force fed during hunger strikes and allegedly shackled and beaten while being moved. It says both practices amount to torture. A top State Department official was furious." Sean McCormack, State Department spokesman: "These are people who never went to Guantanamo Bay, so this is baseless assertion." The report "now must be considered by the UN Commission on Human Rights, which critics say has a questionable track record. They note that three years ago, the commission was chaired by Libya, long accused of abusing human rights."

The Washington Post (2/14, A9, Lynch, 744K) reports, "The findings emerged from an 18-month investigation that included interviews with former U.S. prisoners in France, Spain and Britain and lawyers and relatives of detainees. The report concluded that some practices -- including the force-feeding of hunger strikers – 'must be assessed as amounting to torture.'"

LATimes Says Guantanamo Prison Should Be Closed. The Los Angeles Times (2/14, 958K) editorializes, "It is time to close the U.S. military prison in Guantanamo Bay. The detainees there, numbering about 500, should be tried in court or released. It is inhumane to hold them indefinitely in a place where torture is not uncommon and due process is absent." The Times adds, "For detainees at Guantanamo, legal proceedings appear to resemble Salem witchcraft trials.

DOJ_NMG_0014721

Presumption of guilt and tarring by association abound, while the rules of evidence are perfunctory. These are not the American values our soldiers are fighting for."

Blair Push For British ID Cards Advances. The New York Times (2/14, Cowell, 1.19M) reports, "The government of Prime Minister Tony Blair faced down its opposition on Monday in a politically charged vote in the House of Commons on a plan to introduce mandatory national identification cards. The vote moved Britain closer to the use of such cards but did not make clear precisely when that would be." Blair's government "won the vote, 310 to 279. A defeat would have been Mr. Blair's fourth humiliation in Parliament since the general election last year -- and since taking power in 1997 -- raising doubts about his authority in his third term of office." The Times adds, "In the vote on Monday, the Commons rejected an amendment from the House of Lords that would have made optional, instead of mandatory, a plan to require Britons to be given national identity cards when they apply for passports. But in a compromise worked out among the legislators, Parliament will have to pass another law to make the new rules binding."

In Saudi Arabia, Gore Says US Abused Arabs After 9/11 Attacks. Fox News' Special Report (2/13, Hume) reported that former Vice President Al Gore "took his political attacks to foreign soil yesterday when he accused the United States of terrible abuses against Arabs after the September 11 attacks. Speaking in Saudi Arabia, he said the Bush Administration was playing into al Qaeda's hands by blocking Saudi visa applications and Saudis were rounded up and held under conditions that were unforgivable. He criticized current visa laws as well."

King Calls Gore Remarks "Disgraceful." The New York Post (2/14, Orin, 624K) reports, "House Homeland Security Chairman Peter King yesterday blasted Al Gore as 'disgraceful' for claiming that President Bush committed 'terrible abuses' against Arabs after 9/11 and is wrongly barring Saudi visitors. 'Since 15 of the 19 hijackers on 9/11 were Saudis, it would have been irresponsible for us not to impose strict conditions. It's just common sense. Al Gore seems to have gone off the deep end,' said Rep. King (R-L.I.). 'It certainly answers the question of what Al Gore would have done if he'd been president on 9/11. He would have apologized to Saudi Arabia. Either he's lost it or he's putting his hatred of Bush ahead of America's security.'"

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Two Air Marshals Charged With Attempting To Smuggle Cocaine. ABC World News Tonight (2/13, story 8, :20, Gibson) reported, "In Houston, two Federal Air Marshals are under arrest for smuggling cocaine. Homeland Security Department investigators say a confidential informant offered the Marshals $15,000. In return, they would move the drugs through security at Bush Intercontinental Airport and on to a flight bound for Las Vegas."

USA Today (2/14, Levin, 2.31M) reports US air marshals Shawn Ray Nguyen, 38, and Burlie L. Sholar III, 32, both of Houston, "were charged Monday with trying to smuggle cocaine by using their ability to skirt airport security." They "are accused of making a deal to smuggle 33 pounds of cocaine past airport security in Houston and fly it to Las Vegas, according to an affidavit unsealed in a hearing in federal court in Houston. … Nguyen, who worked for five years as a Drug Enforcement Administration agent before joining the marshals in 2002, allegedly demanded a fee of $5,000 to $7,000 per kilogram of cocaine he transported."

The AP (2/14) reports Nguyen and Sholar "were arrested Thursday after an informant delivered 33 pounds of cocaine and $15,000 in 'up front money' to Nguyen's Houston home, authorities said." They "face 10 years to life in prison and a $4 million fine if convicted."

Cable TV Coverage. CNN (2/13, 4:30 p.m.) reported, "] Two US air marshals appear in court today on federal drug charges. The US attorney's office in Houston says they were arrested Thursday after a government informant delivered 15 kilograms of cocaine and $15,000 to one of the marshals. They allegedly agreed to smuggle…cocaine through airport security."

Local TV Coverage. KABC-TV, Los Angeles (2/13, 5:00 p.m.) reported, "Two air marshals were arrested, charged with using their badges to help them transport drugs. … The two agreed to smuggle 15 kilos of cocaine."

WGN-TV, Chicago (2/13, 8:00 a.m.) reported, "Two federal air marshals have been arrested in Houston and may be charged with smuggling cocaine. 'Time' magazine is reporting the marshals may have been paid several thousand dollars to move the drugs. One of the marshals is a former agent with the Drug Enforcement Administration."

DOJ_NMG_0014722

KHOU-TV, Houston (2/13, 5:00 p.m.) reported, "Two federal air marshals face serious criminal charges tonight, accused of agreeing to use their badges to smuggle drugs past airport security. Thirty-eight-year-old Shawn Ray Nguyen was handcuffed entering the federal court this morning. Thirty-two-year-old Burlie Sholar is behind him with his back to us."

KHWB-TV, Houston (2/13, 9:00 p.m.) reported, "Two Houston-based air marshals have been busted for allegedly trying to transport cocaine on their flights. … Both men had been air marshals since 2001."

KRIV-TV, Houston (2/13, 9:00 p.m.) reported, "Two federal air marshals arrested on drug charges made their first court appearance today. … Prosecutors say they have an airtight case. Reporter: The two have long law enforcement careers, but somewhere they crossed the line from cop to alleged criminal. … If they are convicted, these two air marshals could spend anywhere from ten years to life behind bars. … The two were arrested together Thursday after investigators say 15 kilograms of cocaine and $15,000 were delivered to Nguyen's house."

Chertoff Touts Risk Management Approach To Homeland Security Funding. In an op-ed in the Wall Street Journal (2/14, Chertoff, 2.11M) titled "There Is No Perfect Security," Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff writes that the budget announced by President Bush last week, which requests a 6% increase for the Department of Homeland Security, "recognizes that in order to protect our country and defend our freedoms, we must continue to focus resources on the areas that pose the greatest risk. That is why, among the funding increases, we expect to devote an additional $80 million to the Urban Areas Security Initiative, a program that awards grants to our state and local partners based on a strict assessment of risk and need. This process of assessing risk and setting priorities should be familiar to those in the private sector." Chertoff continues, "We acknowledge, however, that while most people support risk management in theory, enthusiasm tends to diminish once it is applied in practice. … In a free and open society, we simply cannot protect every person against every risk at every moment in every place. There is no perfect security." Chertoff states, "The most effective and fair strategy for securing our homeland -- whether at our borders, our ports, our airports or our chemical facilities -- is tough-minded, common-sense distribution of resources through risk management."

Bush Budget Increases Funding For Domestic Nuclear Detection Office. USA Today (2/14, Hall, 2.31M) reports, "The Bush administration is ramping up efforts to prevent terrorists from smuggling radiological material into the country that could be used to set off a 'dirty bomb' or even a nuclear weapon, according to the Homeland Security Department. Plans call for a new radiation detection test site deep in the Nevada desert, more detectors at the nation's seaports and border crossings and a 70% budget increase for Homeland Security's Domestic Nuclear Detection Office (DNDO). The initiative comes amid chilling threats made last month by al-Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden." President Bush's budget seeks "$535.7 million for the DNDO, which is responsible for preventing radiological or nuclear weapons from getting into the country. That includes $178 million for new radiation detectors and $100 million for the development of equipment used by agents along the nation's borders and at events such as presidential inaugurations and Super Bowl games. To test that equipment, Homeland Security is working at the storied Nevada Test Site, where the US government tested nuclear weapons for more than four decades."

New Mexico Town Serves As Terror Attack Training Ground For First Responders. The CBS Evening News (2/13, story 10, 2:30, Schieffer) reported, "Well, fighting terrorism has become a way of life in one small town here in the United States. Playas, New Mexico has been turned into a real world school for dealing with an attack." CBS (Bowers) added that in Playas, New Mexico, "SWAT teams from across the country drop from the skies and storm quiet side streets in search of terrorists, where crowded buses are blown up by suicide bombers and residents don't even bat an eye. They play along." New Mexico Tech "runs of one of the nation's foremost anti-terror training programs and decided to turn this ghost town into the centerpiece of its operation." Two years ago, "the university shelled out $5 million to buy the town lock, stock and barrel. The school has been developing weapons and programs to counter suicide bombers since the Japanese kamikaze pilots of World War II." In "just the last eight years, 40,000 police, fire and emergency personnel have gone through the program, a thousand of them here at Playas. But this kind of training doesn't come cheap. The cost to Homeland Security runs upwards of $20 million a year."

DOJ_NMG_0014723

House GOP Report Blasts Administration, Chertoff On Katrina Response. A House panel investigating the Federal Government response to Hurricane Katrina blasted the Department of Homeland Security's handling of the disaster, and singled out Secretary Michael Chertoff for criticism. The criticism was seen by media sources as especially noteworthy because the report, due out on Wednesday, was written by House Republicans. ABC lead with the story, while CBS and NBC ran it just after their lead reports on the Vice President's hunting accident.

ABC World News Tonight (2/13, lead story, 2:55, Gibson) reported, "When Republicans issue a scathing report on the Administration, that's a bit of a surprise. Later this week, a Republican-led investigation will brand the Bush Administration response to Hurricane Katrina a national failure. The language of condemnation is some of the strongest heard in a long time." ABC (Raddatz) added, "The report is still in draft form. But it's hard to imagine the final version could be any worse." The committee "points a finger directly at the head of Homeland Security, Michael Chertoff. As the President's principal disaster adviser, they say, Chertoff executed his responsibilities late, ineffectively, or not at all."

The CBS Evening News (2/13, story 3, 2:15, Attkisson) reported Secretary Chertoff "came out swinging today. First he had a few choice words apparently aimed at his former FEMA director, Michael Brown, who criticized him in a Senate hearing on Friday." Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff: "There is no place for a lone ranger in emergency response." Attkisson: "Then, Chertoff went on the offense, announcing that FEMA will be revamped in an effort to avoid another Katrina-like performance. The plan includes hiring up to 1500 people and improving high-level communications. But if Chertoff was hoping to get out in front of an expected grilling at a Senate hearing tomorrow, he may be too late. He also takes it on the chin in a scathing new report on the House side. A draft of the report to be released Wednesday is particularly hard on Chertoff, saying he 'executed (critical) responsibilities late, ineffectively or not at all.'"

NBC Nightly News (2/13, story 3, 2:05, Reid) reported, "With a report from Republicans calling the response to Hurricane Katrina a national failure, the spotlight today focused on the Administration official increasingly facing the blame." Michael Chertoff, Secretary of Homeland Security: "I'm accountable and accept responsibility for the performance of the entire department." Reid: "Some Democrats say the report should recommend Chertoff be dismissed from the Department of Homeland Security."

Chertoff Said To Be "Looking Increasingly Imperiled." The Wall Street Journal (2/14, King, McKinnon, 2.11M) reports, "Mr. Chertoff's remarks come amid questions of whether DHS, with its 184,000 employees and 22 agencies, will ever supply the efficiencies its supporters promised when it was created after the 2001 attacks." Meanwhile, "Mr. Chertoff is looking increasingly imperiled as criticism of his performance swirls in Democratic and Republican quarters. The White House's assessment, still in draft form, is said to be scathing in critiquing DHS's management of FEMA and its poor leadership during Katrina. House Republicans prepared to release a 600-page report that calls the response to Katrina 'a national disgrace' across every level of government, but lays much of the blame at Mr. Chertoff's feet." The Journal adds, "A Democratic response to the report praised the critique of Mr. Chertoff's performance but said it should 'draw the logical conclusion' and call for Mr. Chertoff's dismissal. The White House rejected that idea."

CQ (2/13, Starks) reported, "Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff is scheduled to appear before the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee on Tuesday for what is certain to be a rough round of questioning by lawmakers who are preparing their own report on the government's bungled response to the storm." CQ added that both the Senate and House "committees have developed premises that point more to failures of leadership than failures of government structure. Joseph I. Lieberman of Connecticut, the ranking Democrat on the Senate panel, said 'some of this goes to the president, looking at the people he has around him.' Indeed, Chertoff is one Bush administration official who has found himself in the cross hairs. Charlie Melancon and William J. Jefferson of Louisiana, two Democrats who violated the House Democrats' boycott of the select panel, went as far as to call for Chertoff's removal, in 'additional views" on the committee's final report." However, "Calls for Chertoff's removal have not spread to Republicans, said House Homeland Security Chairman Peter T. King, R-N.Y., who added that he believed Chertoff is still the right man for the job."

DOJ_NMG_0014724

CNN's The Situation Room (2/13, Meserve) reported, "The minority report from Democrats on the House Select Committee says Michael Chertoff should be removed from office for his missteps during Hurricane Katrina. The draft majority report does not go to that extreme, but does say that Chertoff executed his responsibilities 'late, ineffectually, or not at all,' even though the effects of the storm had been predicted in a table top exercise called Hurricane Pam. … Speaking to emergency managers today, Mr. Chertoff acknowledged the response to the storm had been unacceptable." Chertoff: "I want to be clear. As the secretary of Homeland Security, I am accountable and accept responsibility for the performance of the entire department, good and bad. I also have the responsibility to fix what went wrong so we can meet the President's expectations and the public's expectations for helping disaster victims as quickly and effectively as possible."

CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (2/13, Dobbs), in its lead story, reported, "We begin tonight with scathing criticism Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff and other officials for their slow response to hurricane Katrina. A draft congressional report says there was a failure of leadership at all levels of government. The report says Chertoff was detached and former FEMA director Michael Brown was clueless. Chertoff today rejected suggestions his Department of Homeland Security was too focused on terrorism to respond effectively to the natural disaster." CNN added, "Though the report notes a failure of leadership at every level, it's most withering criticism is directed at Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff who it says executed his responsibilities late, ineffectively or not at all."

Chertoff, Townsend Acknowledge Mistakes. Meanwhile, responding yesterday to criticism from House investigators and former FEMA director Michael Brown, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff and White House homeland security adviser Frances Fragos Townsend acknowledged mistakes made during the response to hurricane Katrina, while promising improvements in disaster response. Under the headline "White House Strongly Defends Katrina Role," the AP (2/14, Jordan) reports, "The Bush administration on Monday pushed back hard against Katrina-response criticism leveled by ex-disaster agency chief Michael Brown and congressional investigators. 'I reject outright the suggestion that President Bush was anything less than fully involved,'" said Townsend." Meanwhile, "Both Townsend and Chertoff took swipes at Brown, who resigned under pressure in September as head of the Federal Emergency Management Agency. 'There is no place for a lone ranger in emergency management,' said Chertoff, whose Department of Homeland Security is FEMA's parent agency." The AP notes, "On Monday, Brown defended his performance. 'For Secretary Chertoff to claim that I failed to keep him informed belies the numerous telephone calls and e-mails between me and him prior to, during and after landfall' of the storm, Brown said in an e-mail to The Associated Press." A similar AP story appeared under the headline "Angry White House Lashes Out At Katrina Critics."

The Washington Post (2/14, A1, Hsu, 744K) reports, "The Bush administration acknowledged its mistakes yesterday and promised anew to re-engineer the nation's homeland security agencies in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina, scrambling to contain the damage from sharp criticism by House investigators and testimony by the former head of the Federal Emergency Management Agency. President Bush's homeland security adviser, Frances Fragos Townsend, addressing 50 state emergency managers at a meeting in Alexandria, previewed results of a government-wide review due later this month that she said would make more than 100 recommendations to improve disaster response." Meanwhile, "In his own speech to the National Emergency Management Association's mid-year meeting of state officials, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff responded to concerns from the group and other critics, repeating the administration's commitment to defend against natural and man-made hazards." However, Chertoff "largely accepted 90 findings of flaws at every level of government by a draft House report to be released tomorrow, including many directed at him."

Chertoff Announces FEMA Reforms. The Los Angeles Times (2/14, Chen, 958K) reports, "Under fire for his department's inept response to Hurricane Katrina, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff today announced broad changes in the way the Federal Emergency Management Agency and its parent agency will respond to future natural disasters. Chertoff's announcement came as government investigators laid out for lawmakers on Capitol Hill new details about how FEMA, through waste, mismanagement and accounting flaws, misspent millions of dollars in public funds." He "announced the hiring of 1,500 full-time disaster preparedness coordinators, the creation of 'reconnaissance teams' to report on disaster conditions from the location, and the establishment of a database of approved private firms that would quickly provide vital services, such as debris removal." Chertoff said, "I want to tell you I unequivocally and strongly reject this attempt to drive a wedge between our concerns about terrorism and our concerns about natural disasters."

DOJ_NMG_0014725

The New York Times (2/14, Lipton, 1.19M) reports, "the federal government's top three domestic security and disaster relief officials vowed to fix flaws in the nation's emergency response programs. 'I am accountable and accept responsibility for the performance of the entire department, good and bad,' the homeland security secretary, Michael Chertoff told local and state disaster officials at a conference in Alexandria, Va. 'I also have the responsibility to fix what went wrong.' The changes will include a cadre of new disaster response workers who will be available to respond quickly to any natural disaster or terrorist attack, Mr. Chertoff said, which could number as many as 1,500, a department official said."

The Financial Times (2/14, Alden) reports, "The changes outlined on Monday involve improving Fema's logistical capabilities, improving internal communications, and strengthening the ability to identify and aid disaster victims quickly. In separate congressional testimony on Monday, the independent General Accountability Office and the Department of Homeland Security's inspector-general, its internal watchdog, said hundreds of millions and even billions of dollars had been wasted in the aftermath of Katrina."

Townsend Says Federal Officials Must Re-Earn Public Confidence. CNN's The Situation Room (2/13, Malveaux) reported, "The White House is under no illusion about just the very bad perception that people have of the White House, of FEMA, of Homeland Security. This is coming from the President's own Homeland Security adviser, Fran Townsend, before a group of first responders. … She said that we must restore and re-earn your confidence and trust so that when someone says 'I am from the federal government and I am here to help,' you can believe it and not laugh."

Incompetence, Not System Flaws, Seen As Cause Of Katrina Failures. The Christian Science Monitor (2/14, Grier, 61K) reports Chertoff's reforms "are all well and good, say some experts. As the response to hurricane Katrina showed, the federal government's preparation for disasters has been so poor that there's much room for improvement. But refurbishment of the bureaucracy alone may not address what a new inquiry called the root causes of the Katrina-response disaster - inattentiveness, incompetence, and lack of common sense." The Monitor continues, "Given events such as the government's weak response to Katrina, 'reform' is often the first watchword, as if perfection of process is always the answer." However, "general lack of focus can't be ordered or, or legislated. Process problems probably weren't the cause of the government's slow recognition of the unfolding disaster of the New Orleans flooding. Evidence of that was on the TV screen, for all to see; it just took too long for its implications to sink in at the White House and Department of Homeland Security headquarters."

USA Today Says FEMA Needs Better Leadership. Under the headline "Changes At FEMA Can't Erase Hurricane Disgrace," USA Today (2/14, 2.31M) editorializes, "Congressional Democrats have suggested breaking FEMA out of Chertoff's department and having its chief report directly to the president. But that makes no sense because FEMA would also be on the front line of any response to terrorist attack. Avoiding a replay of what happened after Katrina is a lot more dependent on competent leadership, adequate funding and open lines of communication than on where FEMA is located in the bureaucracy. The report by the House task force says the federal response to Katrina was marked by 'fecklessness, flailing and organizational paralysis.' If that's what the White House's supposed allies on Capitol Hill are saying, it's going to take more than realigning FEMA's organization chart to fix what's wrong."

WPost Stresses Importance Of Learning From Katrina Mistakes. The Washington Post (2/14, A14, 744K) editorializes that the House investigation of the government's preparation for and response to Hurricane Katrina "paints a picture of federal incompetence that you'd think a chief executive would want to study and learn from. If the White House's first reaction is anything to go by, President Bush wasn't initially all that concerned. The report reveals how poorly federal officials -- including Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff -- understood their own National Response Plan, a set of bureaucratic responses that should have been second nature to officials in the Department of Homeland Security and the Federal Emergency Management Agency." However, "it was less than clear that the White House initially wanted to know what exactly went wrong. A White House spokesman told Post reporter Spencer S. Hsu that he wouldn't comment on an early version of the report, partly because the White House was working on its own investigation and partly because, 'The president is less interested in yesterday, and more interested with today and tomorrow . . . so that we can be better prepared for next time.'

DOJ_NMG_0014726

But it's going to be very difficult to be 'prepared for next time' if the president is not interested in the 'yesterday' described in the House's investigation."

GAO, DOJ Find Rampant Waste, Fraud In FEMA Hurricane Relief Programs. ABC World News Tonight (2/13, story 3, :10, Gibson) reported, "Today, the Justice Department said prosecutors have filed charges against more than 200 people accused of scams related to the Gulf Coast hurricanes."

The Washington Post (2/14, A9, Whoriskey, 744K) reports, "Tens of thousands of people received aid from the Federal Emergency Management Agency using possibly fraudulent identities because the relief effort did not perform routine checks that might have flagged such activity, government investigators said yesterday. The extent of the fraud in the $6 billion evacuee-assistance effort has not been calculated, but it could reach hundreds of millions of dollars, investigators told the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, and it appears that the losses were limited only by the thieves' ingenuity. 'It was a mess. It was a system that was wide open to fraud,' said Gregory D. Kutz, who led the investigation for the Government Accountability Office." The Post adds, "The report came amid a stream of revelations yesterday regarding questionable activity during the relief effort -- including $438-a-night lodging in New York, emergency meals being sold on eBay, and emergency checks being used to buy adult entertainment and weapons. But the main focus of yesterday's testimony was FEMA's lack of financial controls as it doled out $2,000 checks to people who said they were affected by the storm."

The AP (2/14, Yen) reports, "The government squandered millions of dollars in Katrina disaster aid, including handing $2,000 debit cards to people who gave phony Social Security numbers and used the money for such items as a $450 tattoo, auditors said Monday. .. Overcharges, poor accounting and abuses will take 'months or years' to rectify, the Government Accountability Office and the Homeland Security Department's inspector general concluded in preliminary reports on how billions of dollars in taxpayer money is being spent. The Federal Emergency Management Agency recognizes it 'made many, many mistakes,' and is working on improvement, said Homeland Security inspector general Richard Skinner. 'But they're not where they should be. In some cases, the government will have little legal recourse to recoup payments to contractors for payments.'"

Knight Ridder (2/14, O'Matz) reports, "As of mid-December," FEMA "had distributed almost $5.4 billion to Gulf Coast hurricane victims, including $2.3 billion in fast-track payments of $2,000 each for families displaced by the storms. Auditors for the Government Accountability Office found FEMA signed off on most emergency claims without ever verifying damage and failed to confirm the identities of applicants filing by phone. In at least 1,000 cases, people succeeded in collecting aid using the Social Security numbers of dead people, the GAO discovered. And although the $2,000 payments were limited to one per household, auditors found that FEMA gave duplicate payments to 5,000 individuals who had already collected $2,000 each in debit cards."

USA Today (2/14, Hall, 2.31M) reports, "The allegations that the Federal Emergency Management Agency has wasted hundreds of millions of dollars on a host of bungled efforts to help evacuees were in a pair of reports to senators investigating the government's response to the disaster." Sen. Susan Collins, chairwoman of the Senate Homeland Security committee, "called the reports a 'fresh indictment' of FEMA. She said investigators uncovered 'shocking examples of absent safeguards and wasted tax dollars.'"

Reuters (2/14, Smith) reports Monday's "revelations were the latest in a barrage of criticism directed at both the U.S. Federal Emergency Management Agency and Department of Homeland Security, whose leader, Michael Chertoff, on Monday outlined steps he would take to better prepare his agency." Reuters continues, "Richard Skinner, the inspector general of the Department of Homeland Security, told the committee that FEMA purchased 24,967 manufactured homes at a cost of $857.8 million to temporarily house Katrina victims. But most of those homes are unused and the government is paying to store them, he said."

DHS IG Details Problems With Trailers, Overpriced Hotel Rooms. The Washington Post (2/14, A9, Whoriskey, 744K) reports Richard L. Skinner, the inspector general of the Homeland Security Department, "noted that FEMA may have purchased too many manufactured houses, given the housing needs, and that FEMA is now paying to store and maintain them at various places nationwide. … He also said that in many cases, FEMA was paying relatively reasonable prices to house evacuees in hotels, but some rooms cost more than $150 a night, and as late as December, FEMA was paying $364 per night for a hotel in San Diego and $339 per night for a New Orleans hotel." The AP (2/14, Yen) reports, "Federal money…paid for $375-a-day beachfront condos and 10,777 trailers that were stuck in mud and unusable."

DOJ_NMG_0014727

Thousands Of FEMA Trailers Sit Unused As Louisianans Seek Homes. The New York Times (2/14, Lipton, 1.19M) reports, "Mobile homes worth hundreds of millions of dollars are deteriorating in a muddy field in Arkansas and may never be used to house victims of Hurricane Katrina because of a dispute over where to install them, federal officials acknowledged Monday. Only about 2,700 of the 25,000 mobile homes ordered at a cost of $850 million have been installed, and at least 10,000 are sitting in Hope, Ark., according to documents and statements from Federal Emergency Management Agency officials. Though about 55,000 Louisiana families are still waiting for a manufactured housing unit, the mobile homes may never be used because FEMA policy prohibits them from being installed in flood-prone coastal areas, federal officials said. … 'If sites for those mobile homes are not approved in Louisiana, it is possible they will never be used for hurricane relief,' said Nicol Andrews, a FEMA spokesman."

Fox News' Special Report (2/13, Hume) reported, "For a while are, after hurricane Katrina the chief complaint was there was not enough federal help. Now the question is what the money bought and didn't buy in the weeks and months after the storm." Fox continued, "On a day when a federal judge ruled the government is within its rights to remove 12,000 Katrina victims from their hotel rooms, senators heard testimony that thousands of badly needed FEMA trailers and modular homes are literally stuck in the mud, hundreds of miles from the scene of the disaster."

Hotels May Be Investigated For Alleged Price-Gouging. Meanwhile, USA Today (2/14, McCoy, 2.31M) reports, "Congressional committee testimony that luxury hotels billed the federal government up to $438 a night for Hurricane Katrina evacuees raised the prospect of a potential price-gouging investigation Monday." Skinner said in a statement that "FEMA eventually set a rate cap." However, "his staff found that FEMA in December still paid up to $364 a night for rooms in San Diego, and up to $339 a night for New Orleans rooms. … Sen. Joseph Lieberman, D-Conn., and other Democrats on the Senate panel asked whether the facilities could be investigated for potential price-gouging."

Thousands Of Katrina Victims Checking Out Of Hotel Rooms. ABC World News Tonight (2/13, story 2, 2:10, Gibson) reported, "Things have just gotten tougher for thousands of families displaced and left homeless by Katrina. 12,000 families had to move out of government-paid-for hotel rooms today, after FEMA stopped paying for them. And another 8,000 families will face the same fate by March 1st." ABC (Pinto) added, "FEMA says it spent $542 million on hotel rooms so far and provided rental assistance to 770,000 families, but the process has been fraught with trouble. $850 million worth of trailers remain unused in Arkansas, unfit for use in flood plains. And FEMA admits there were problems locating those in need."

The AP (2/14, Callimachi) reports, "About 12,000 families made homeless by last year's hurricanes began checking out of their federally funded hotel rooms around the country Monday after a federal judge let FEMA stop paying directly for their stays. The Federal Emergency Management Agency promised the evacuees from Hurricanes Katrina and Rita that they will still receive federal rent assistance that they can put toward hotel stays or other housing. But the agency will no longer pay for their hotel rooms directly." Also Monday, U.S. District Judge Stanwood Duval had denied a request from the evacuees' attorneys for "a last-minute reprieve" to continue hotel payments.

The New York Times (2/14, Dewan, 1.19M) reports, "Thousands of evacuees from Hurricane Katrina became transients again on Monday, wheeling their entire lives onto the street on luggage carts or dragging bulging garbage bags through hotel lobbies, when the federal government stopped paying their hotel bills." The Times adds, "none of the two dozen or so evacuees losing their hotel benefits who were interviewed in New Orleans in the past two days had a permanent place to go."

Attorneys Try To Stop Katrina Evictions. The AP (2/14, Foster) reports, "Lawyers asked for a temporary restraining order Sunday to stop the evictions of 12,000 families left homeless by hurricanes Katrina and Rita from hotels across the nation on Monday. … 'We have provided the court with statements from people showing they have not been treated fairly by FEMA,' said Bill Quigley, an assistant dean of the Loyola University Law School, who with civil rights attorney Tracie Washington filed the motion." The AP continues, "The attorneys delivered the papers to the home of federal judge Stanley Duvall. It was not immediately clear when he would act on the motion. … The 12,000 families made homeless by last year's storms are scheduled to be forced out of their federally funded hotel rooms Monday, the Federal Emergency Management Agency announced Saturday. … That amounts to about 40,000 people, Quigley said, many of whom have not received trailers as promised and some who did not find out about the eviction until the beginning of the month. … 'Under our reading of the judge's orders they should be allowed to stay until the beginning of March,' Quigley said. 'We think FEMA is just trying to clear the books and not taking a careful or compassionate look at these people.'" The AP notes, "Of those departing on Monday, FEMA officials said 10,500 families, or 88 percent, have received rent-assistance checks from the agency, said Libby Turner, FEMA's transitional housing director. The cash can be used to pay for an apartment or to continue their hotel stays. It can also be put toward fixing their ruined homes."

DOJ_NMG_0014728

WAR NEWS:

Iran, Not US, Said To Be "Reshaping" Post-Saddam Iraq. The Wall Street Journal (2/14, A1, Solomon, 2.11M) reports Administration "officials who promoted war with Iraq envisioned Americans reshaping the country in their own image after the war. Instead, the reshaping is increasingly being carried out by Iran -- the same nation that has provoked a diplomatic furor over its nuclear ambitions. Iran's influence is most apparent in Iraqi politics…but it also emerges in many areas of Iraqi life that get less notice," including investment, NGO work and media training. The Journal adds, "While Tehran has little motive now to throw Iraq into further turmoil, its ability to do so could undermine the Bush administration's attempt to stop Iran's nuclear program. … If Iran wished to make life difficult for the U.S. and its troops in Iraq, it might draw on the support of Iraqi Shiite leaders. … Iran's influence inside Iraq also is threatening to exacerbate Shiite-Sunni tensions across the Middle East." The Journal says "U.S. military planners did little to stop Iran from spreading its influence in Iraq after Saddam Hussein fell. … On the political front, teams of Iranian volunteers traveled to Iraq to instruct Shiite activists in mobilizing mosques and clerics for a big turnout. … Many of the Shiite politicians and Islamic scholars who quickly rose to lead post-Saddam Iraq -- such as Prime Minister Jaafari and Ayatollah Abdul Aziz al-Hakim -- are men who were persecuted under Mr. Hussein's rule and exiled to Tehran."

Iran Puts Off Russian Offer, Resumes Uranium Enrichment. Meanwhile, the New York Times (2/14, Fathi, Landler, 1.19M) reports, "Iran announced Monday that it had postponed talks on letting Russia enrich its uranium, a proposal that Russia had offered as a way to resolve the dispute over Iran's nuclear ambitions."

The Financial Times (2/14, Smyth) reports, "Tehran also resumed enriching uranium at its Natanz plant in defiance of the recent vote by the" IAEA. "The resumption came a day after Gholam-Ali Haddad-Adel, Iran's parliamentary speaker, said Tehran was about to restart 'nuclear research activities' at Natanz. The AP (2/14, Karimi) reports a senior diplomat in Vienna, Austria said, "Uranium gas has been fed into three machines." The diplomat "spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to comment on the matter."

In its coverage, the Washington Post (2/14, A10, Moore, 744K) quotes Assistant Secretary McCormack saying the "US government was waiting for confirmation. ... 'If true, certainly, it would be another indication that Iran is seeking confrontation rather than negotiation with the international community.' McCormack noted that the IAEA resolution said Iran 'had to return to a suspension moratorium of all their enrichment-related activities. And unfortunately, they seem to have now, apparently, gone off in the other direction.'" The Los Angeles Times (2/14, Rubin, 958K) runs a similar story.

Annan Urges Bush Not To "Escalate" Tensions. The Washington Times (2/14, A1, Sammon, 90K) reports, "UN Secretary-General Kofi Annan yesterday warned President Bush not to 'escalate' tensions over Iran's nuclear ambitions because the world wants to 'find a way out of this crisis.'"

Annan was asked on CNN's The Situation Room (2/13) if it is acceptable for Iran to develop nuclear weapons. Annan said, "I think the rules are very clear. Iran can develop peaceful nuclear -- peaceful -- other nuclear energy, peaceful uses of nuclear energy, but not nuclear bombs. And this is what the whole debate is about." Asked what the UN is going to do to stop Iran from becoming a nuclear weapons power, Annan said, "I think first of all, the Atomic Agency in Vienna is dealing with this. And between now and end of the month, they are preparing a report, working with Iranians, monitoring the situation, and will give a report to the agency at the end of the month. There will be a meeting in March, where, dependent on the nature of the report, if, indeed, Iran is not meeting its obligations on the NPT, its obligation on the IAEA, it will be referred to the Security Council for appropriate action." Asked what the next step beyond diplomatic or economic sanctions would be to pressure Iran, Annan said, "That would be for the council to decide. But, obviously, the -- the council doesn't -- these are some of the arsenal that the council has. But it will be up to the council to decide what the next step should be. And I think it will depend very much on the report. If the report is a negative one, then, the council has a -- a tough, an urgent decision to take. If it is a report that indicates that, despite the public pronouncements, the situation is either frozen or it's -- or they see prospects of full cooperation with the agency, the council will have to factor that in."

DOJ_NMG_0014729

USA Today (2/14, Page, 2.31M) reports, "Americans are deeply worried about the possibility that Iran will develop nuclear weapons and use them against the USA, a USA TODAY/CNN/Gallup Poll finds, but they also fear that the Bush administration will be 'too quick' to order military action against Iran. Nearly 7 of 10 of those surveyed over the weekend say they are concerned that the United States will move prematurely to use force, but they also seem to recognize the quandary that policymakers face." There is "almost as much concern that the Bush administration won't do enough to prevent Iran from gaining a nuclear arsenal."

Iran Reminds Some Of North Korea. In an analytical piece, the AP (2/14, Jahn) reports, "Veiled Iranian threats to quit the Nonproliferation Treaty conjure up the case of North Korea, which announced it had atomic weapons shortly after walking away from the treaty. But while the North escaped punishment by the UN Security Council, any move by Iran to break out of the pact will likely bring a tougher response."

Jaafari Win Said To Highlight Sadr's Growing Influence. The Washington Times (2/14, Behn, 90K) reports, "The selection of Ibrahim al-Jaafari to stay on as Iraq's prime minister exposes stresses within his Shi'ite coalition and the growing political importance of militant conservative cleric Muqtada al-Sadr. The backing of Sheik al-Sadr, whose followers captured about one-quarter of the Shi'ite alliance's 128 seats in the new parliament, proved critical in a weekend vote of caucus members to determine who would be prime minister." The Times adds, "The selection of Mr. al-Jaafari surprised many who saw him as a largely ineffectual leader in the current government, unable to control the brutal insurgency, armed party militias bent on sectarian killings and rampant corruption. In exchange for his support, Sheik al-Sadr is expected to request that his followers receive greater control over the social and economic future of Iraq through the ministries of Health, Education and Transportation."

NYTimes Criticizes Selection Of Al-Jaafari. The New York Times (2/14, 1.19M) editorializes, "In selecting Ibrahim al-Jaafari as its nominee for a second prime ministerial term, the dominant Shiite bloc has betrayed the hopes of all those who have wanted Iraq's first constitutionally elected government to make a fresh start at reunifying the country, rebuilding the economy and putting an end to the beating, torture and murder of civilians by Shiite militia members in and out of the official security forces. Mr. Jaafari has been a spectacular failure on all these fronts over the past 10 months. He is unlikely to do a better job if he gets the job a second time."

US Expects To Finish Handoff Of Responsibility To Iraqi Army By 2007. USA Today (2/14, Jervis, 2.31M) reports, "The US military says 40% of Iraq's combat battalions are effective enough to have taken the lead role in fighting the insurgency, a key measure for determining when US forces can withdraw." The US military "expects to complete the handover of responsibility to nearly all of Iraq's army by the end of the year, meaning Iraq's military will rely on US troops primarily for logistical support and for providing airstrikes and heavy artillery. The main fighting will be conducted by Iraqis." USA Today adds, "Currently, 40 of Iraq's 102 battalions have taken over security in the areas where they operate, Col. James Greer, chief of staff for the US military command responsible for training Iraqi troops, said in an interview."

Kristof Says US Should Set Timetable For Iraq Withdrawal. Nicholas Kristof writes in the New York Times (2/14, 1.19M), "Here's the single most depressing tidbit I've seen from Iraq lately: a new poll has found that among Sunni Arab Iraqis, 88 percent support violent attacks on U.S. troops. … So how should we handle this? First, we should announce unequivocally that we will not keep American military bases in Iraqi territory. Second, we should announce a target date for the withdrawal of all U.S. combat forces from Iraq -- say, the last day of 2007." Kristof adds that a "two-year timetable for withdrawal would give Iraqi security forces time to consolidate power, and would weaken the strongest card the insurgents have: the argument that they're protecting the motherland from imperialist Yankee crusaders. A timetable would also put pressure on Iraqi politicians to cooperate and govern, and it would make the U.S. more of a partner and less of a national scapegoat."

DOJ_NMG_0014730

Suicide Bomber Kills 10 Iraqis. The AP (2/14, Reid) reports, "A suicide bomber blew himself up Monday after joining a line of Iraqis waiting for government checks in a mostly Shiite district of Baghdad, killing 10 people and wounding about 40 -- including women and children." The attack "occurred as more than 70 people lined up at a bank to receive government checks to compensate for incomplete food rations."

Judge Forces Saddam, Accomplices To Attend Trial. The Los Angeles Times (2/14, Daragahi, 958K) reports, "Saddam Hussein and his co-defendants, one in his pajamas, were forced to appear in court today without their attorneys and face witnesses reluctant to testify against them in a messy trial session marked by frequent shouting matches between the judge and the defendants." The Times adds, "Amid the chaotic din of the three-hour session, the prosecution managed to present several documents suggesting the upper echelons of Hussein's government and security apparatus knew about and directed the persecution of villagers in Dujayl, where the former Iraqi president was the target of a 1982 assassination attempt."

The CBS Evening News (2/13, story 5, 2:05, Dozier) added, "It's not often you get to see a former dictator sporting a jacket over a robe and bedroom slippers, or one of his former henchman in an undershirt and pajama bottoms but this event was come as you are, like it or not. 'You forced us here today,' Saddam said. 'Why?' According to the chief judge, because he could; he cited a little-known Iraqi law that says defendants can be compelled to attend trial. The unhappy group shouted, sulked, slept; even prayed," but "they did proceed, with the defendants present to hear the evidence against them. That's bound to quiet critics who think the trial must be moved to an impartial venue like The Hague. And a second major complaint may soon be laid to rest. Some critics claimed it would be near impossible to prove Saddam himself ordered the killing of 140 men and boys after a failed assassination attempt against him in northern Iraq. But legal experts believe documents presented today do help link the accused with the crime. Little of that international legal debate though is going on here, where most Iraqis are more worried about their own fate than their old leaders." USA Today/AP (2/14), New York Times (2/14, Worth, 1.19M), Reuters (2/14) and Washington Post (2/14, A11, Hernandez, 744K) run similar reports.

Federal Judge Rules US Cannot Transfer Detainee To Iraqi Custody. The New York Times (2/14, Lewis, 1.19M) reports, "A federal judge ruled on Monday that the Bush administration could not transfer a United States citizen held by the military in Iraq to Iraqi civilian custody." In his ruling, Judge Ricardo M. Urbina of Federal District Court in Washington "rejected arguments made last week by Justice Department lawyers that the courts had no jurisdiction because the man, Shawqi Ahmad Omar, was not technically in United States custody." In his ruling, Judge Urbina "minimized as 'legalistic' the government's argument that Mr. Omar was actually in the custody of the 27-nation Multi-National Force in Iraq, of which the United States was only a part."

British Military Officials Arrest Man In Connection To Abuse Tape. The New York Times (2/14, 1.19M) reports, "British military officials arrested a man on Monday in connection with accusations that British soldiers savagely kicked, butted and beat Iraqi teenagers at a British military compound in 2004." A spokeswoman for the Ministry of Defense "would not identify the man, who has not been charged with a crime, or say whether he was a serving soldier." The accusations "stem from a home video, said to have been made by a British officer in Basra, in southern Iraq, which is said to show the attacks."

Report Says Iraq Deadliest Country For Journalists In Last 25 Years. A report to be released today by the Committee to Protect Journalists is expected to release a report today that says Iraq has become the deadliest country for journalists in the last 25 years. The New York Times (2/14, Seelye, 1.19M) reports, "Twenty-two journalists were killed in Iraq in 2005, bringing the total to 61 since the American invasion in March 2003. That number surpasses the 58 journalists killed in the Algerian conflict from 1993 to 1996."

Iraq Halts Purchases Of Australian Wheat. The New York Times (2/14, Bonner, 1.19M) reports, "Iraq has suspended the purchase of wheat from the Australian wheat export company AWB pending an Australian royal commission investigation into allegations that AWB paid more than $200 million in kickbacks to Saddam Hussein's government from 1999 through 2003, in violation of United Nations sanctions. Iraq's move is certain to please American wheat farmers. U.S. Wheat Associates, a trade association representing American wheat growers, had urged the American-led Coalition Provisional Authority in Iraq to take similar action after Mr. Hussein was toppled in 2003, and has led an effort to have AWB investigated."

DOJ_NMG_0014731

In 1999, Iraq Rejected UN Resolution On Weapons Inspectors. In its "History Lessons" column, the Washington Times (2/14, 90K) excerpts a December 18, 1999 Voice of America report, which reported, "Iraq has strongly condemned a United Nations resolution designed to send weapons inspectors back into Iraq in exchange for the suspension of U.N. sanctions. … The government in Baghdad has refused to admit arms inspectors since last December, when the United States and Britain launched air strikes against Iraq." Iraqi Deputy Prime Minister Tariq Aziz "said Iraq is ready to face the consequences of rejecting the new resolution."

Four US Soldiers Killed In Roadside Bombing In Afghanistan. ABC World News Tonight (2/13, story 6, :20, Vargas) reported, "A roadside bomb killed four American soldiers in Uruzgan province. The Taliban is claiming responsibility for the attack. Violence is on the rise in Afghanistan. Last week, 89 people were killed there, surpassing the 55 lives that were lost in Iraq."

The CBS Evening News (2/13, story 4, 0:40, Schieffer) reported, "It is the worst loss for US forces there since September. It happened in Afghanistan's central mountains north of Kandahar, a hotbed of Taliban rebels. The American patrol was hit first by a roadside bomb, then by small arms and rocket fire." The AP (2/14, Cooney) and New York Times (2/14, Gall, 1.19M), among other sources, run similar reports this morning.

Cartoon Protests Called Barometer Of Afghan Frustration. The Christian Science Monitor (2/14, Baldauf, 61K) reports that diplomats, government officials and aid workers in Kabul are describing Afghanistan with phrases like, "narco state, political disillusionment, military stalemate, donor fatigue, American military pullout. Tie it all together, and it's a picture that suggests Afghanistan could be reverting back to a failed state. None of these issues is new, with the exception of the US decision to start drawing down its forces in Afghanistan and the expected arrival of NATO forces this summer. Yet four years after the government of President Hamid Karzai came to power, these various factors seem to be converging, with explosive results." The Monitor adds, "The cartoon protests of the past week - which have been the deadliest in the Islamic world - are largely a barometer of domestic frustrations. In the streets of Kabul, Laghman, Maimana, and Bagram, protesters turned their anger on the US, the West, and 'the dog-washers' -- a derisive term for the expatriate Afghan technocrats who have returned to top posts in the government."

Musharraf Said To Be Facing Multiple Challenges. USA Today (2/14, Wiseman, 2.31M) reports that Pakistan's President Pervez Musharaf is at a crossroads. Everywhere he turns, "there's trouble. To the north, unmanned U.S. aircraft have allegedly violated Pakistan's skies in search of al-Qaeda fugitives, firing missiles at suspected terrorist sanctuaries, killing villagers and outraging the Pakistani public. To the south, rebellious tribal militias battle his soldiers, even firing a couple of rockets at Musharraf himself and wounding one of his top generals. To the west, pro-Taliban forces are resurgent along the border with Afghanistan. To the east, arch-rival India is ignoring Musharraf's peace proposals, apparently convinced that time is on its side in the dispute over divided Kashmir." USA adds, "Musharraf's problems are America's, too. … A weakened Musharraf could find it more difficult to ignore anti-American public opinion, crack down on Islamic extremists and pursue terrorist suspects along the Afghan border." Musharraf "denies he's in trouble. He told Indian television last month, 'I am the strongest at the moment, politically.'"

Marines Adapt Cold War Weapons For Warfare In Iraq. The Washington Times (2/14, Axe, 90K) reports that Marine Corps aviators in Iraq "are adapting Cold War airplanes and traditional tactics to a new kind of warfare -- snooping for insurgents and terrorists who hide among innocent Iraqis, and taking out pinpoint targets in hectic urban fighting. … To keep the traditional promise of Marines aviation to support the men on the ground, aviators have adapted. Jets designed to jam enemy radar now are jamming the radio signals that detonate IEDs. And bombers are trading some of their ordnance for new sensors that can spot insurgents in crowded cities."

DOJ_NMG_0014732

US Military Uses Video Game Technology To Train Soldiers For Combat. A front page story in the Washington Post (2/14, A1, Vargas, 744K) reports on the use of video game technology to train US soldiers for combat. The Post adds that "computer simulations -- as military officials prefer to call them -- have transformed the way the United States military fights wars, as well as soldiers' ways of killing."

DOJ:

Analysts Have Mixed Reaction To Proposed DOJ, DHS Budgets. Federal Computer Week (2/14, Arnone) reports, "The Bush administration's budget requests for the Homeland Security and Justice departments contain a mix of good and bad proposals for improving how the departments use information technology, analysts say." FCW continues, "The DHS budget request calls for $42.7 billion in fiscal 2007, a nearly 6 percent increase from fiscal 2006. The IT portion of the department's budget would increase 21.2 percent, from $3.6 billion this year to a proposed $4.4 billion in fiscal 2007. The budget reflects an emphasis on preparedness, information sharing, transportation security, border security and departmental organization. … The Justice budget request would fund improvements in the management, storage, sharing and security of information. The FBI would sharply increase IT spending to improve its intelligence and information-sharing capabilities." FCW adds, "The federal government would spend a lot of money to address fundamental problems that have lingered for years, said Warren Suss, president of Suss Consulting. … The Integrated Wireless Network will improve secure wireless communication, Suss said. The Homeland Security Information Network will enhance information sharing with state and local first responders. … The $1 million the FBI would spend on service-oriented architecture would be a 'harbinger of things to come,' Suss said. An important governmentwide tool, SOA would make department networks more powerful to ensure that users of large government IT systems have the responsiveness and performance they need." FCW notes, "Not all the analysts' observations were positive. The DHS budget request would cut the Emergency Management Performance Grant program by $13 million to $170 million for fiscal 2007. … Alan Webber, senior analyst for government at Forrester Research, said he expects to see other agencies cut back their IT budgets this summer for the money to go to DHS and DOJ. That would take money away from many programs that are not war-related but are critical for working Americans, he said. … The administration should pressure Justice and DHS to spend their IT money wisely and not hand them blank checks just because the departments are protecting the country, he said."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Enron Jury Hears Tapes Of Conference Calls. USA Today (2/14, Farrell) reports, "Jurors in the government's trial of former Enron CEOs Ken Lay and Jeff Skilling listened Monday to almost two hours of conference calls from October of 2001, a period when the energy giant's facade of invincibility began to crumble." USA continues, "In one recording, Lay says $1 billion in losses for the third quarter of 2001 are 'non-recurring,' and assures analysts that Enron's underlying businesses are strong. But in the same call, he announces that Enron had to reduce its shareholder equity by $1.2 billion in order to close down a 'financing vehicle' that had come to alarm investors because of its lack of transparency. … 'We've cleaned up some items that clouded our performance,' Lay declared to a largely supportive group of Wall Street analysts in the Oct. 16 call, adding that he hoped the company's 'expanded disclosure' would halt the slide in the company's stock price. … But the issue of the 'financing vehicles' would not go away. In the days following the conference call, The Wall Street Journal reported that Enron's CFO, Andrew Fastow, made millions in profits from a private partnership he formed purely to buy and sell Enron assets."

Reuters (2/13, Daily, Babington) reports, "Speculation about Enron's troubles were swirling on Wall Street long before the company reported a massive loss triggering its downfall, hardly the sign of an elaborate scheme to deceive investors, a defense lawyer argued on Monday." Reuters continues, "The assertion struck at the heart of the government's argument that top Enron executives for months hid the company's myriad problems plaguing the once high-flying energy company that spiraled into bankruptcy in late 2001." Reuters adds, "As the trial entered its third week, former Enron CEO Kenneth Lay's lawyer Michael Ramsey pointed to analyst reports that suggested Wall Street knew of troubles brewing at Enron well before it announced its weak third quarter performance in 2001. … Sparring with prosecution witness Mark Koenig, Enron's former investor relations chief, Ramsey also replayed a tape of the earnings conference call in which Lay described the company's quarterly loss of more than $600 million, a $1.01 billion write-down in asset values and reduction in investors equity of $1.2 billion. … Ramsey said one analyst had speculated the company would take an even larger asset write-down on its struggling water and broadband Internet business, and that the company's stock rose after the news."

DOJ_NMG_0014733

Rice Could Be Key Witness For Government. The Wall Street Journal (2/14, Emshwiller, Mcwilliams) reports, "Though he hasn't taken the stand in the criminal trial of former Enron Corp. top executives Kenneth Lay and Jeffrey Skilling, Kenneth Rice has already sworn under oath that Mr. Skilling took part in misleading the public about a key company business operation." The Journal continues, "Today's anticipated appearance of Mr. Rice, a former top Enron official and close Skilling associate, comes as the trial's first witness, former Enron investor-relations chief Mark Koenig, completed his seventh day of testimony. Mr. Lay's lead attorney, Michael Ramsey, continued to challenge Mr. Koenig's claims that Enron had improperly manipulated its reported financial results. Mr. Ramsey also continued to present the defense case that Enron had been a healthy company whose December 2001 collapse resulted from a market 'panic.' … Mr. Koenig is expected to complete his testimony this morning, and anticipation has begun to turn toward Mr. Rice, the former head of Enron's once highly promoted telecommunications unit, known as Enron Broadband Services. In July 2004, Mr. Rice pleaded guilty to one count of securities fraud in connection with his public statements about EBS and agreed to cooperate with the government in hopes of obtaining leniency at sentencing."

Koenig Said To Have Helped Defense. The New York Times (2/14, Barrionuevo) reports, "At first glance, Mark E. Koenig appeared to be the perfect lead-off witness for the government in the criminal trial of Jeffrey K. Skilling and Kenneth L. Lay, Enron's former chief executives. … Clean-cut and articulate, Mr. Koenig, 50, ran investor relations for Enron and was a polished performer on Wall Street who was present at many of the crucial discussions, prosecutors say, where Mr. Skilling and Mr. Lay lied to the public about Enron's true financial condition in the days leading up to its spectacular collapse in late 2001." The Times continues, "But after seven days on the stand, including four days of withering cross-examination, Mr. Koenig may have served to advance the defense's argument as much, if not more, than the government's. Indeed, by using Mr. Koenig broadly to cover many aspects of the far-ranging case, some outside lawyers argued, the government opened the door to the defense to lay out its own contention that Mr. Skilling and Mr. Lay did nothing wrong. And they allowed the defense lawyers to showcase Enron's former top executives favorably to the jurors through hours of audio and video tapes."

Judge Upbraids Counsel In AIG Suit On Request To Make Documents "Disappear."

The New York Law Journal (2/14, Lin) reports, "A federal judge in Manhattan has blasted a pair of private equity executives, both of whom are also lawyers, for asking him to make allegations against them 'disappear' after the settlement of a suit that accused them of 'fundamentally dishonest behavior.'" The Journal continues, "American International Group Inc. filed suit Feb 1. against two former top executives of its AIG Capital Partners private equity arm, Chief Executive Peter Yu and General Counsel William Jarosz. The insurance giant accused them of stealing confidential client information from AIG computers to help them launch a new private equity fund. … The parties settled under confidential terms last week, a day after a forensic computer specialist submitted a declaration that Yu appeared to have accessed thousands of documents on AIG computers in the weeks following his termination last April." The Journal adds, "As part of the settlement, David S. Golub, the lawyer for the two executives, asked Southern District of New York Judge Lewis A. Kaplan at a hearing last Wednesday to vacate and then seal an earlier temporary restraining order (TRO) issued against the defendants. … 'I'm quite uncertain, literally uncertain as to whether I want to be a party to that,' the judge responded. … According to a transcript of the hearing, Kaplan expressed concern about the swiftness of the settlement following the introduction of forensic evidence showing Yu 'plugged his laptop into the AIG system and took the crown jewels, loosely speaking.' … 'The minute that assertion was made and the evidence placed before me,' the judge continued, 'Mr. Golub, like the good lawyer that I know him to be, picked up the phone, called his client and faced with what, if there were any truth to the allegations, could be a disaster for the defendants, suddenly the case was settled, and now the defendants are saying "make it disappear".'"

DOJ_NMG_0014734

CRIMINAL LAW:

Former DOJ Official Aids Israel Lobbyists' Defense. The Washington Post (2/14, A4, Pincus, 744K) reports Viet D. Dinh, the "former head of the Justice Department's Office of Legal Policy helped write a memorandum of law calling for dismissal of Espionage Act charges against two pro-Israel lobbyists, arguing that, in receiving leaked classified information and relaying it to others, they were doing what reporters, think-tank experts and congressional staffers 'do perhaps hundreds of times every day.'" Dinh, who "helped draft the USA Patriot Act after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, has joined with lawyers defending Steven J. Rosen and Keith Weissman, former employees of the American Israel Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC), who last year became the first non-U.S. government employees to be indicted for allegedly violating provisions of the Espionage Act." The Defense memo says, "Never has a lobbyist, reporter, or any other non-government employee been charged . . . for receiving oral information the government alleges to be national defense material as part of that person's normal First Amendment protected activities."

US Issues New Subpoena In Abramoff Probe. The National Journal (2/13, Stone) reports, "Federal investigators have issued a subpoena for documents relating to the U.S. Family Network, a sign that the influence-peddling probe into the activities of convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff continues to expand. The U.S. Family Network, a now-defunct grassroots advocacy group that had ties to Rep. Tom DeLay R-Texas, reportedly obtained most of its funding in the late 1990s from key Abramoff clients." The Journal continues, "The U.S. Family Network, a group that promoted itself as 'pro-family' and advocating 'moral fitness,' was closely affiliated with Tom DeLay and his aides, particularly Ed Buckham. … Sources familiar with the Justice Department-led probe say that one area of interest to investigators is $15,600 that the U.S. Family Network paid in 1999 to Liberty Consulting, a firm run by Lisa Rudy, the wife of Tony Rudy, who was a deputy chief of staff to DeLay before becoming a lobbying colleague of Abramoff's." The Journal adds, "Tony Rudy was one of two former Hill staffers identified in Abramoff's January plea-bargain agreement with the Justice Department as having provided Abramoff with legislative help in exchange for gifts and other financial favors. … The U.S. Family Network, which existed for five years and raised about $2.5 million, was set up in 1996 by Ed Buckham, who was DeLay's chief of staff at the time. … The total of $15,600 was delivered in three payments in 1999 to Liberty Consulting before Rudy left DeLay's office and joined Abramoff in early 2001 as a lobbyist at the firm Greenberg Traurig, according to a source familiar with the group's operations. The timing of the payments is significant, sources say, because investigators have been focusing on what favors Abramoff may have provided to public officials in exchange for their help on client matters."

Judge Releases Search Warrants In Entiwistle Case. The AP (2/14, Lavoie) reports, "A British man charged with killing his wife and infant daughter trolled the Internet just before the slayings, looking for escort services and other Web sites offering help finding sexual partners, according to search warrant documents released Monday." The AP continues, "Authorities said Neil Entwistle, 27, also did research online about ways to kill people and how to commit suicide in the four days before his wife, Rachel, and 9-month-old daughter, Lillian, were shot to death in their suburban home on Jan. 20. … Entwistle was arrested in England last week and charged with first-degree murder in a case that has drawn widespread media attention in both the United States and United Kingdom." The AP adds, "He did not fight extradition, and British authorities signed an order Friday authorizing his return to Massachusetts. U.S. Marshals will bring him back to Massachusetts this week, but his travel arrangements were unknown. … Investigators said a search of Entwistle's computer revealed he did Internet searches seeking information about suicide, euthanasia and 'killing people with a knife,' on Jan. 16 and 17. … The same week, he obtained the names and addresses of various escort services in the Boston and Worcester areas, including 'Eye Candy Entertainment,' 'Sweet Temptations' and 'Exotic Express.' He visited a Web site called 'Adult Friend Finder,' which investigators said helps subscribers find sexual partners through Internet chat rooms, personal ads and other services, investigators said. … Prosecutors said last week in an arrest warrant affidavit that they believe Entwistle killed his wife and daughter because he was despondent after accumulating tens of thousands of dollars in debt, and that he had expressed 'a dissatisfaction with his sex life.'"

DOJ_NMG_0014735

Five Government Agencies Reviewing Classified Material For Libby Trial. The AP (2/14, Locy) reports, "Five government agencies are reviewing classified evidence that…Libby may want to use at his trial to fight perjury and obstruction-of-justice charges, according to a court transcript made public Monday. During a Feb. 3 hearing, Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald told a federal judge that the review of classified materials is being done by the CIA, National Security Council, National Security Agency, State Department and several components within the White House, including the offices of the president and vice president." The AP adds, "The outcome of those reviews will determine whether the case against Libby, Vice President Dick Cheney's former chief of staff, gets bogged down in a legal battle pitting the government's desire to protect national security secrets against a defendant's right to a fair trial."

Dean Reiterates Call For Cheney's Ouster. CNN's The Situation Room (2/13, Blitzer) reported that DNC Chairman Howard Dean "is pressing his contention that Dick Cheney should resign if, it turns out, he ordered a top aide to leak classified information. Former Cheney chief of staff Lewis 'Scooter' Libby reportedly told the grand jury in the CIA leak case he leaked the classified memo in defense of the invasion of Iraq." Dean: "Vice President Cheney has, in fact, ordered the leaking of political information -- of intelligence information. That means that he has to step aside. We don't know if it's true. But he's been accused of it. If it's true, he has to step aside."

Former Janitor Testifies He Gave Ryan Contributions After Receiving Campaign Funds. The Chicago Tribune (2/14, O'Connor, 643K) reports former secretary of state's office janitor Donald Skoda "testified Monday he voluntarily gave…cash to Ryan at Christmas for years but acknowledged on cross-examination that the gifts usually came after Ryan's campaign sent him $50." After a prosecutor "showed him records indicating he had been given $50 apiece in December of 1996, 1998, 1999, 2000 and 2001," Skoda "admitted he cashed or deposited the $50 check and then gave Ryan $15 to $25. Skoda said he didn't work on any of Ryan's campaigns." Later yesterday, The Tribune adds, Assistant U.S. Atty. Zachary Fardon "contended outside the jury's presence that a former Ryan lawyer — now interim U.S. attorney for southern Illinois — made inaccurate and untrue claims about an FBI interview of Ryan in 2001. U.S. Atty. Edward McNally is scheduled to testify Wednesday for the defense. … Fardon recounted how the prosecution had McNally's former law firm…disqualified from representing Citizens for Ryan after its indictment in 2002 because of conflicts of interest from representing dozens of other witnesses in the federal investigation. … Fardon said McNally's alleged bias against the prosecution team 'should be fair game' in the cross-examination." The AP (2/14, Robinson) also reports on Skoda's testimony and the prosecutors' reservations about Fardon.

Handwriting Expert Testifies Campbell Signature On Disputed Contract. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (Scott, Warren, 430K) reports handwriting expert David Moore "testified Monday that it was former Atlanta Mayor Bill Campbell's signature on contracts worth about $80 million that went to a company prosecutors say had paid off the mayor." The defense "denied that Campbell signed documents in 2001 extending the United Water contract and suggested that the signatures may have been forged." The Journal-Constitution notes, "Prosecutors say that United Water paid for a $12,000 getaway to Paris that Campbell took with his then girlfriend Marion Brooks." The Journal-Constitution adds that also on Monday, "Atlanta municipal clerk Rhonda Dauphin Johnson testified that Campbell didn't initially disclose thousands of dollars from city contractors for speaking engagements. After the FBI initiated a probe, Campbell amended his campaign disclosure forms to include a $5,000 speaking fee from Sable Communications in 1996 and $10,000 from Oracle Corp. in 1998, Johnson said."

WXIA-TV Atlanta (2/13, Carnes, King) reports on its Web site from a story broadcast Monday, "For years, Campbell has insisted that the signatures on the documents are not his," but Moore "compared the signatures in question with others on official city documents" and "testified that while he found variations from signature to signature, he also found similarities. … Campbell's lawyers pointed to the wide variations on city documents between one Bill Campbell and another. Attorney Jerry Froelich asked the handwriting expert, 'Did they tell you other people were writing Bill Campbell's signature.' Moore replied, 'I don't recall.'"

Jury Selection Begins Today For First "Tennessee Waltz" Trial. WTVF-TV Nashville (2/13) reports on its Web site, "Jury selection is expected to get underway Tuesday in Chattanooga for the first trial from the Operation Tennessee Waltz sting. Hamilton County Commissioner William Cotton is charged with taking bribes of more than $4,000 in return for promising to help a fake company created by the FBI." The Chattanoogan (2/14) adds, "Former County School Board member Charles Love will not testify against…Cotton in his bribery trial that starts Tuesday morning, officials said. Prosecutor John MacCoon also said that Love…was not working with the FBI at a time when tapes were made of conversations between him and Cotton." The Chattanoogan notes, "Judge Edgar said he expects to have a jury seated by late Tuesday morning or early in the afternoon. Then opening statements will be given and the testimony will start." MacCoon "said he plans to call former FBI agent Bill Curtis in regards to the conviction of a prior commissioner on similar charges."

DOJ_NMG_0014736

House Panel Declines To Pursue Probe Against DeBerry. The AP (2/14, Tanner) reports, "An ethics complaint against Tennessee House Speaker Pro Tem Lois DeBerry for accepting cash from an undercover investigator died in the House Ethics Committee Monday. It was the second time the committee failed to move forward on the complaint alleging DeBerry broke House ethics rules by accepting $200 at a casino from an FBI agent working with the Tennessee Waltz public corruption investigation."

Newton Says Ethics Reform Bill Will Curb Corruption. The AP (2/14) reports, "Gov. Phil Bredesen and good government advocates praised Tennessee lawmakers for passing an ethics reform bill, but a former legislator who pleaded guilty in a federal bribery sting said 'they did nothing.'" Former state Rep. Chris Newton "admitted that he took bribes to sponsor legislation and got caught in the undercover Tennessee Waltz operation. The ethics reform bill fails to curtail the influence of big spending special interests in elections and it doesn't adequately extend the jurisdiction of the new state ethics commission, Newton said."

Gotti Says Concern For Family Motivated Him To Turn Down Plea Deal. The AP (2/14) reports, "Facing a retrial on racketeering charges, the son of late mob boss John Gotti says he is willing to go in front of a new jury for the sake of his family. … 'When I see my children, I know everything's at stake,' John A. 'Junior' Gotti told The New York Post in an interview published Monday. 'We can't lose. There's too many lives at stake here.'" The AP continues, "Gotti, 41, is charged with ordering a botched 1992 plot to abduct Curtis Sliwa, a radio show host and founder of the Guardian Angels crime-fighting group, in retaliation for his on-air rants against Gotti's father. Sliwa was shot but recovered. … The younger Gotti was acquitted in September on a securities fraud charge, and a judge declared a mistrial on the more serious racketeering counts, including kidnapping. But three months later, U.S. District Judge Shira Scheindlin rejected Gotti's request to be acquitted of the racketeering charge. Jury selection for the retrial was set to begin Tuesday." The AP adds, "Gotti told the Post that family considerations prompted him to turn down a plea deal that would have sent him to prison for less time. … 'My wife was a major obstacle. She said, "If you do it, we're through. We need you in this house,:"' he said. … Gotti, whose mob boss father was sentenced to life in prison in 1992 and died there 10 years later, expressed confidence that he would be truly vindicated at the end of the retrial. … At Gotti's first trial, defense attorneys managed to win a hung jury by arguing that the younger Gotti had left organized crime in the late 1990s. Prosecutors dismissed the claim, saying Gotti used his name to rise in the crime organization and gave orders and collected kickbacks beyond 1999."

Bahamas Man Pleads Guilty In US To Operating Ponzi Scheme. The Bahama Journal (2/11) reports Eric E. Resteiner of Lyford Cay on was convicted Friday "in a U.S. federal court of defrauding more than 50 investors out of $47 million through an elaborate Ponzi scheme that was, in part, principally operated in The Bahamas." Resteiner "pleaded guilty to seven counts of wire and mail fraud. … In operating the scheme, Resteiner told prospective investors various lies to encourage their investment in the alleged high rate of return investment that was alleged to have presented no risk to investors, according to the prosecution's case. These representations, and others made by Resteiner to lure other to invest, said prosecutors, were false and fraudulent." The Journal notes, "Many of his victims were reportedly members of the Church of Christ Scientist, who were lured in by virtue of his position within in the church."

Former Connecticut Governor Returns Home After 10 Months In Prison. The New York Times (2/14, Stowe) reports, "A thinner, more subdued John G. Rowland, Connecticut's former governor, returned to his home here on Monday afternoon after being released on Friday from a federal prison camp where he served more than 10 months after pleading guilty to corruption charges." The Times continues, "Shortly after Mr. Rowland and his wife, Patricia, arrived at their ranch home in a gray sport utility vehicle at 3:45, they emerged to speak to a knot of reporters and photographers at the edge of their driveway. 'It's good to be back, but I still have a long way to go,' he said, holding his wife's hand. … 'It's been a long year for everybody, not just for us, but for everybody in the state,' he said, dressed in jeans and a green sweater, and having lost weight but gained some gray hair. He was cordial, shaking hands with one of the television reporters, but he refrained from making any of his trademark quips." The Times notes, "He expressed gratitude for the support he and his family received from people in the state, and said he hoped to spend as much time as possible with his family. … Mr. Rowland, 48, a Republican elected to three terms, entered the Loretto Federal Correctional Institution in southwestern Pennsylvania in April after he admitted that he had accepted $107,000 in gifts and vacations from people doing business with the state. While in prison, he taught job skills to about 50 inmates."

DOJ_NMG_0014737

The AP (2/14, Haigh) reports, "A subdued and introspective citizen John G. Rowland, who admits the past 10 months in a federal prison camp have humbled him, said Monday he was prepared to begin the next phase of his life with 'blind faith.' … The former governor and congressman, once considered a star in the national Republican Party, said he has no plans for his future other than reconnecting with family and friends, and completing his four months of home confinement."

