Augusta, a historic city on the South Carolina border, has five daily flights to Atlanta on a Delta regional partner and six to Charlotte on US Airways Express.

US Airways plans a 10 percent capacity cut and $1.6 billion in annual savings if it gets creditor and regulatory approval to merge the airlines, but it hasn't identified which routes, if any, will be cut. Industry officials say there would be little reason for the combined airline to operate two Southeastern hubs, however, and Charlotte flights could shrink dramatically.

Even if Augusta routes were maintained, business leaders there say the absence of competition would allow the airline to raise fares with impunity — a move they say would push Augusta residents to drive to airports in Columbia or Atlanta.

"People like having a choice," said Cedric Johnson, chairman of the Augusta airport commission. "We want to give our citizens the broadest possible choice in air service. ... A single airline would be a step in the wrong direction."

Delta first flew to Augusta in 1934, and regional partner ASA currently flies there in 50-seat regional jets.

Continental Express began flying between Augusta and its hubs in Newark and Houston in 2003 but pulled out the next year when fares and passenger traffic fell below projections. Augusta officials have tried to recruit other airlines, but have consistently come up empty.

Charles F. "Rick" Rule, an anti-trust lawyer for US Airways, said Augusta and other cities that would be served by a combined Delta/US Airways have nothing to fear.

"These carriers intend to continue to serve all the cities they're currently serving," he said.

The number of flights and the size of the planes might change, Rule said, but passengers would still be able to conveniently reach the same destinations.

"[The airline] can rationalize networks, take out extra seats and provide the same level of service more efficiently," he said. "This transaction poses no threat to competition."

Augusta officials are in the midst of a $30 million airport terminal construction project that they say will continue regardless of an airline merger.

Columbus, Brunswick and Albany are the Georgia cities served by a single air carrier, and officials there say that, although they're glad to have airline service, the situation is hardly optimal.

"We've had as many as five airlines serving this area," said Mike Gaymon, president of the Greater Columbus Chamber of Commerce. "I don't think there's any question that competition helps."

Southern Airways flew nonstop from Columbus to Washington in the early 1970s, and Eastern and others made regular stops. But airline service was steadily pared through bankruptcies and mergers, leaving only ASA in the market.

Gaymon said having a single carrier can harm business recruitment. "When we're competing with cities that are served by multiple airlines, the frequency and reliability of air service can be crucial."

Scott McGregor, vice president of the Augusta Metro Chamber of Commerce, said local officials are considering a direct appeal to the Justice Department.

"Monopoly airline service doesn't sound like a positive to us," he said.

US Airways' Takeover Of Delta Still Up In The Air (AZDS)

By Donna Hogan

Arizona Daily Star, December 10, 2006

If Tempe-based US Airways is successful in executing its proposed $8.7 billion hostile takeover of bankrupt Delta Air Lines, it will become the largest U.S. airline and one of the biggest in the world.

It's a big "if."

Delta, first of all, doesn't want to be acquired — at least its chief executive officer and its pilots don't. Its creditors — at least the biggest ones — haven't weighed in yet.

And we haven't yet heard from U.S. regulators, US Airways shareholders and politicians, who together or separately can make or break the deal.

While US Airways Chairman Doug Parker stunned everyone from Wall Street analysts to Delta officials when he announced the proposed merger Nov. 15, the company had clearly been plotting it for some time.

Parker had already lined up financial backing and answers for all the concerns. And once the news was out, he quickly tried to line up supporters among those who have a stake, if not a say, in whether the merger happens.

There is no consensus about whether the merger could happen or should happen, but most agree on the big issues that need to be addressed: antitrust concerns; employees and jobs; financing; headquarters and air hubs; and any impact on passengers.

Easiest to tackle is the timing. Some dates already set in stone have forced US Airways to rush a process that might otherwise have taken much longer, said airline industry consultant Michael Boyd, president of The Boyd Group.

A Feb. 15 U.S. Bankruptcy Court deadline for Delta to come up with its own plan to emerge from Chapter 11 is a key factor. Delta's stated intention to do so even earlier compelled its would-be buyer to move even faster.

Parker has frequently said that the concessions a bankrupt airline gets are key to making such a merger profitable. A bankrupt carrier can dump unprofitable routes, vendor contracts and airplane orders. It can shed debts, get court-ordered employee wage and benefit concessions and trim any fat that led to unprofitablity.

Take two trimmed-down airlines and add cost efficiencies from combining administrative and overhead functions, and the whole is worth more than the sum of the parts.

It's a theory Parker proved works in his barely year-old merger of America West Airlines and US Airways, said industry expert Bob Mann, of R.W. Mann & Co.

But because Delta's bankrupt status is key, Mann said, Parker had to offer his alternative to Delta Chairman Gerald Grinstein's go-it-alone stance well before the court deadline so stakeholders could consider it. The ball is rolling.

"There will be six to eight weeks of public jousting, then everybody will go into (seclusion)," Mann said.

By mid-January, creditors should have decided on a preferred direction. Mann said that could include Delta teaming up with other suitors. They may pop up in the coming weeks, he said, but likely none would have Parker's clout.

If Parker's plan pleases creditors, the proposal goes to bankruptcy court as an option, then federal regulators get to mull it over, and US Airways shareholders vote.

They won't need convincing, Boyd said. "They'll approve this in a New York second, because of Doug Parker's track record." Regulators won't be as hasty. The U.S. Justice Department has a big say in potential mergers, aiming to make sure no single company dominates a market enough to limit competition. In the case of an airline combo, there are two concerns — the overall control of U.S. skies and dominance in specific markets. .

Dairy Industry Crushed Innovator Who Bested Price-Control System (WP)

By Dan Morgan, Sarah Cohen, Gilbert M. Gaul

In the summer of 2003, shoppers in Southern California began getting a break on the price of milk.

A maverick dairyman named Hein Hettinga started bottling his own milk and selling it for as much as 20 cents a gallon less than the competition, exercising his right to work outside the rigid system that has controlled U.S. milk production for almost 70 years. Soon the effects were rippling through the state, helping to hold down retail prices at supermarkets and warehouse stores.

That was when a coalition of giant milk companies and dairies, along with their congressional allies, decided to crush Hettinga's initiative. For three years, the milk lobby spent millions of dollars on lobbying and campaign contributions and made deals with lawmakers, including incoming Senate Majority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.).

Last March, Congress passed a law reshaping the Western milk market and essentially ending Hettinga's experiment -- all without a single congressional hearing.

DOJ_NMG_0104725

"They wanted to make sure there would be no more Heins," said Mary Keough Ledman, a dairy economist who observed the battle.

Hettinga, who ran a big business and was no political innocent, fought back with his own lobbyists and alliances with lawmakers. But he found he was no match for the dairy lobby.

"I had an awakening," the 64-year-old Dutch-born dairyman said. "It's not totally free enterprise in the United States."

Most U.S. dairy farmers work within a government system set up in the 1930s to give thousands of small dairies a guaranteed market for their milk and to even out prices for consumers. Farmers who participate in regional pools operated by the federal government or the states deliver raw milk to cooperatives or food processors. They get a guaranteed price, whether the milk ends up in a gallon jug, cheese, butter or ice cream. In Arizona and other federally regulated regions, the Agriculture Department uses a formula to set the price processors pay for raw milk, issuing "milk marketing orders."

Developed for a bygone era of small dairies and decentralized milk plants, the system lives on when 3,000-cow dairies are not uncommon and huge cooperatives and food companies dominate the business.

Business groups, fiscal conservatives and some dairy organizations have called for Congress to overhaul the complex system of protections and subsidies, which they say is costly to taxpayers and consumers. A recent USDA study acknowledged that "dairy programs raise the retail price" of milk. The watchdog group Citizens Against Government Waste estimates that the programs cost U.S. consumers at least $1.5 billion a year.

The 1937 law allowed "producer-handlers" -- dairy farmers who bottle milk from only their own cows -- to operate outside the pools. But it was risky for a farm to do this because it might end up with more milk than it could sell. Most of these outsiders were small.

Hettinga started out as a hired hand in the Dutch American dairies of Southern California, where his family emigrated after World War II. He soon figured out he could buy cows with injured hooves, then fix and sell them at a profit that exceeded his weekly paycheck.

By the early 1990s, Hettinga was working with partners and relatives and had half a dozen dairies in Arizona and California. Then he decided to build his own bottling plant in Yuma, Ariz.

His first customers were in Mexico. Later he made a deal with a chain of Arizona stores catering to the fast-growing Hispanic population. In 2002, he and his son began building a second Yuma plant to supply Costco stores in Southern California.

For Costco shoppers, it was a good deal, according to an e-mail sent last year to Reid's office by Joel Benoliel, Costco Wholesale Corp.'s senior vice president. The arrangement lowered the average price of milk "by 20 cents a gallon overnight and it stayed that way for three years," Benoliel wrote in the e-mail, made available to The Washington Post. "Milk suppliers in southern California were gouging the public on price (20 cents a gallon higher than N. California) for years and were unresponsive to our call for lower prices. It was a brazen case of price gouging and profiteering by the strongest, largest market suppliers simply because they could."

In Arizona, Hettinga was competing for retail sales against Arizona's biggest milk company, Shamrock Foods Co. of Phoenix. He "wasn't by any stretch a more cost-effective operator than we are. He just didn't have the same rules apply," said Shamrock's general manager, Michael A. Krueger.

United Dairymen of Arizona, a cooperative that handles 85 percent of the state's milk, complained that by keeping his milk outside the Arizona pool, Hettinga was affecting the USDA price-setting formula, lowering returns for other dairies.

In California, the Hettingas were taking on the two biggest players in the U.S. milk industry: Dean Foods Co., the largest processor of dairy products, with $10 billion in annual sales and five California plants, and Dairy Farmers of America, a co-op that controls nearly a third of the nation's liquid milk.

In Southern California, the co-op sells to Dean Foods, which in turn sells to retailers. As Hettinga's milk began reaching Costco stores, there was a snowball effect as other milk suppliers were forced to lower their prices, Costco's Benoliel said.

Dean Foods recently said that Hettinga was unfairly exploiting a "regulatory loophole" and that his actions led to lower milk prices for California dairies.

Hettinga's operation was "damaging to the marketplace," said Elvin Hollon, director of economic analysis for Dairy Farmers of America. "Nobody ever envisioned there would be such large handlers" outside the pool.

"So," Hollon said, "the regulations had to change."Political Education

The first challenge to Hettinga came in late 2001, when Sen. Jon Kyl (R-Ariz.) proposed a measure that would have forced Hettinga to pay in to the pool that Shamrock was governed by.

Shamrock's chairman, Norman P. McClelland, had contributed thousands of dollars to Kyl, beginning with Kyl's first House campaign, in 1986.

Hettinga fought back by printing labels saying that Kyl wanted to "limit competition and raise the cost of milk to the Arizona consumer" and putting them on 50,000 gallons of milk shipped around Arizona.

In the House, Devin Nunes, a new Republican member from California's Central Valley, introduced a bill to close what he called the "regulatory loophole" that let Hettinga ship unregulated milk into California. Nunes's district is No. 1 in milk production in the nation. Nunes and Sons dairy, located a few miles north of Tulare, was started by Nunes's grandfather and was still in the family.

In Nunes's first run for Congress, in 2002, he pulled in $130,000 from dairy interests, second only to President Bush among federal candidates, election records show.

Nunes's bill and Kyl's amendment initially went nowhere. So Kyl, a conservative Republican, found an unlikely ally in Reid, then the Senate's fiercely partisan Democratic whip.

Reid was no newcomer to dairy issues. Nevada's population was growing faster than its dairies could supply milk, so prices tended to be high. Milk plants that had to import milk from far away thought they could get it cheaper if they did not have to pay regulated prices. In 1999, Reid helped them out. He slipped an amendment into a spending bill exempting milk plants in the Las Vegas area from federal pricing rules.

David Coon, vice president of Anderson Dairy Inc., then the area's largest milk plant, hailed Reid's amendment as a "good example of the good we feel he has done fighting for our state." Reid later listed Anderson as one of 51 "soft money" donors to his Searchlight Leadership Fund, which funds Democratic candidates in Nevada.

The 1999 provision still left the Las Vegas area subject to some federal milk regulations. By 2003, fixing that had become a pressing concern as Dean Foods began construction on a $40 million, state-of-the-art milk plant outside town.

That year, Reid and Kyl saw they could make a deal. Kyl agreed to back removing all of Nevada from federal milk regulation, and Reid agreed to support legislation cracking down on Hettinga and protecting Arizona dairies from competition from low-priced Nevada milk. In 2003, the senators co-sponsored an amendment with both provisions. In effect, Nevada bottlers would get some of the same rights that were being taken away from Hettinga. Under this arrangement, the money the Yuma dairyman would save by operating outside the federal system would have to be paid in to the pool.Getting Around Lewis

In 2003, Hettinga still looked the part of a hard-working dairy farmer. He wore jeans, lunched on fried chicken and salad at the Hometown Buffet in Yuma, and seldom took a vacation. But he was no longer a little guy. He owned a private plane and kept a pilot on standby. His 16 dairies stretched from Texas to California, and his company, Sarah Farms, supplied nearly a fifth of Arizona's liquid milk.

As Kyl and Reid were putting together their deal, a milk-industry friend put Hettinga in touch with a Washington lobbyist, former representative Raymond J. McGrath (R-N.Y.). McGrath, who was president of the National Republican Club of Capitol Hill, had retained good connections in GOP circles.

During a swing through Capitol Hill with McGrath, Hettinga pitched his cause to House Appropriations Committee Chairman Jerry Lewis (R-Calif.).

Lewis's district was home to some large dairies, including a Hettinga dairy in San Jacinto. The two men had never before met or talked, according to Lewis's spokesman. But Lewis was sympathetic. "This is not right, taking a rifle shot at one individual," Hettinga recalls Lewis saying.

A few months later, Lewis used his power to kill the Kyl-Reid measure. "Congressman Lewis did it strictly on behalf of a constituent and because he thought Hein's deal was good for consumers," said Lewis's deputy chief of staff, Jim Specht.

Hettinga said that at Lewis's request he chipped in $2,000 to the Bush-Cheney campaign later that year. He also gave $4,000 to Lewis's campaign war chest between 2003 and 2006, records show.

But the big milk producers and dairy trade groups were already at work in Washington. Through its employees and political action committee, Dean Foods, with nearly 100 plants around the country, spent more than $600,000 on political contributions in 2005 and 2006, including $5,000 to Kyl and $3,000 to Nunes. Reid got $5,000 in 2004.

Eight groups with an interest in the legislation reported overall lobbying spending of more than $5 million in 2005 and the first half of 2006. Dean Foods reported spending almost $2.5 million, including $500,000 for outside lobbyists. One was Charles M. "Chip" English Jr. of Thelen Reid & Priest. English also represented Shamrock Foods, United Dairymen of Arizona and the Dairy Institute of California.

During 2005, English fine-tuned the language in the milk bill. "My hand can be seen throughout the bill," he said in an interview. Pick a paragraph in the legislation, he said, and "either I wrote it or I commented on it."

Among others in the lobbying effort were the International Dairy Foods Association, the National Milk Producers Federation and the Western United Dairymen. Dairy Farmers of America, with members in 47 states, mobilized a grass-roots campaign for the legislation.

At every turn, Lewis's office was "barraged by calls and faxes from dairy owners," recalled Specht, Lewis's aide. "It seemed clear that all the skids had been greased for this legislation."An Angry Meeting

On the evening of Nov. 2, 2005, lawmakers and several dozen lobbyists squeezed into the conference room of Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) to seek common ground in the milk dispute. Lewis brought Hettinga and McGrath. Reid came with Anderson's Coon. Shamrock Foods' McClelland was with Kyl.

"Jerry, if it wasn't for you, we'd have taken care of this a long time ago," Reid said, according to several participants.

Lewis bridled. It seemed as if Reid was calling him a "liar," he said. If that was so, he might as well leave, he added.

Hettinga told the group how he had built his plants, arguing that the other dairy farmers "didn't pay me when I started the business, why should I start paying them when the business is successful?"

At the end, participants said, Reid was plainly exasperated. "I'm not listening to any more of this," he said. "I'm out of here."

Reid made his move on Dec. 16, with the Senate chamber nearly empty. He brought up the milk bill, which passed a few minutes later by "unanimous consent," a procedure that requires no debate or roll call vote if both political parties agree. Reid and Kyl said in recent statements that their goal was to level the playing field for milk producers.

That set the stage for a bitter battle in the House, pitting Nunes, the new California-dairy-district congressman, against Lewis, then a 14-term veteran with friends on both sides of the aisle.

Lewis used the muscle of his 66-member Appropriations Committee, the dispenser of billions of dollars a year in spending. But he faced the nearly unified front of the dairy lobby and its friends. Virginia dairy farmers had helped win the key support of Robert W. Goodlatte (R-Va.), chairman of the Agriculture Committee, convincing him that if Hettinga were brought into line, the threat "would be less likely to show up back here," said lobbyist Charles Garrison. Nunes was a protege of House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Bill Thomas (R-Calif.). And he had recently backed John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) in his successful campaign for majority leader.

In late March, Boehner placed the bill on a special docket usually reserved for uncontroversial measures such as naming post offices. Under that docket, bills require a two-thirds majority for passage. But the parliamentary procedure also meant that no one could offer an amendment to slow the bill down.

McGrath, Hettinga's lobbyist, watched the vote from the Capitol Hill Club. After Lewis came up 13 votes short and the bill passed, McGrath recalled, a large contingent of dairy lobbyists arrived, some trading high-fives. Lewis was to have had dinner at the club with his wife, but when he showed up and saw the lobbyists celebrating, he turned and left.

In an interview later, Nunes called the milk legislation a victory for "every dairy farmer in America except those who were gaming the system." He added, "People out there were making millions of dollars a year off the backs of America's dairy farmers . . . that was a wrong that was finally righted."

The next morning, lawmakers in dairy districts who voted against the dairy groups got an e-mail from a lobbyist expressing "disappointment on behalf of the members of the International Dairy Foods Association for your vote." It added: "We will be letting our member companies and their employees know of the outcome."

Hettinga vowed to keep supplying his customers in Arizona and California even though the new law required him to pay the Arizona pool what he said was a "crippling" sum of up to $400,000 a month.

"The irony is that Hein is paying his competitors," said Alfred W. Ricciardi, Hettinga's Phoenix lawyer.

Hettinga and his relatives gave nearly $20,000 to Kyl's Democratic challenger this year. Kyl won handily and got his own dairy industry support: A few weeks before Senate action on the milk bill, 11 officials of Shamrock contributed $14,800.

Hettinga also turned to the courts. In October, he filed a lawsuit charging that the milk bill was unconstitutional because it was aimed at penalizing a single individual.

"I still think this is a great country," Hettinga said. "In Mexico, they would have just shot me."

Global Warming, Local Initiatives (LAT)

By Stephanie Simon

The Los Angeles Times, December 10, 2006

BOULDER, COLO. — Frustrated with the federal response to global warming, hundreds of cities, suburbs and rural communities across the nation have taken bold steps to slash their energy consumption and reduce emissions of the pollutants that cause climate change.

This outdoorsy college town recently adopted the nation's first "climate tax" — an extra fee for electricity use, with all proceeds going to fight global warming. Seattle has imposed a new parking tax, and the mayor hopes to charge tolls on major roads in an effort to discourage driving — a leading source of greenhouse gas pollution.

Cities not typically associated with liberal causes have also jumped on board. In Fargo, N.D., Mayor Dennis Walaker swapped out every traffic-light bulb for a light-emitting diode, or LED, which uses 80% less energy. In Carmel, Ind., a suburb of Indianapolis, Mayor James Brainard is switching the entire city fleet to hybrids and vehicles that run on biofuels (made from plant products rather than petroleum).

"It's quite incredible, the number of things cities are beginning to do. It's very heartening," said Tom Kelly, who directs a national environmental group called Kyoto USA.

Boulder Mayor Mark Ruzzin says skeptics often ask why global warming must be a local priority. He responds by acknowledging the obvious: "Even if Boulder could somehow wish away all of our greenhouse gas emissions, that wouldn't be a drop in the bucket. It would be a drop within a drop."

Then he argues that the city must try anyway — if only to prove to larger communities that they, too, can reduce pollutants without spending huge sums or slowing economic growth.

"Every one of us has the ability, small as it may be, to make change," Ruzzin tells his residents, asking them to substitute a push mower for a gas mower, or at least to turn out the lights when they leave a room. "No one's going to be able to escape the responsibility."

The movement began nearly two years ago, when Seattle Mayor Greg Nickels announced that his city would strive to meet the targets of the Kyoto Protocol, an international treaty that aims to control global warming. The treaty requires industrialized nations to cut emissions of carbon dioxide and other pollutants that hover in the lower atmosphere. In what is known as a greenhouse effect, these pollutants create an invisible shield that keeps the sun's rays from dissipating. Many of the trapped rays are reflected back to Earth, raising temperatures.

Greenhouse gases are directly tied to energy use, because the process of burning fossil fuels emits carbon dioxide. So any measures to conserve energy can indirectly cut greenhouse emissions.

Planting trees can also help, because they absorb carbon dioxide — and several cities have launched campaigns to take advantage of that fact. Denver, for instance, plans to plant an average of 140 trees a day for the next 20 years, while Los Angeles is replacing its famed fan palms with more leafy sycamores and oaks. Chicago encourages the planting of lush rooftop gardens, which have the added effect of cooling buildings, reducing the need for air conditioning.

Fargo acts on climate change more directly by trapping the methane that normally wafts out of its landfill as a byproduct of rotting garbage. The methane — a potent greenhouse gas — is then sold to a soybean processing plant, which uses it in its boilers.

"All these cities are like little laboratories, experimenting with what works. Then we learn from each other," Brainard said.

President Bush rejected the goals of the Kyoto treaty soon after he took office, calling it ineffective and unfair because developing countries such as China and India are exempt. He also argued that it would be enormously expensive for the U.S. to comply.

Determined to prove him wrong, Nickels challenged his fellow mayors to adopt Kyoto's targets at the local level. He has received more than 330 pledges from mayors representing 54 million people. All have vowed to reduce their cities' emissions below 1990 levels within the next several years.

The nation's biggest urban areas have made the pledge: Los Angeles, San Francisco, New York, Miami, Dallas, Denver. So have Turtle River, Minn. (population 79) and North Pole, Alaska (population 1,778).

Meridian, Miss., where nearly 30% of residents live in poverty, has signed on to the Kyoto goals. So have Sugar Land, Texas; Dubuque, Iowa; and Norman, Okla. Scores of blue-state coastal cities are on the list, including Berkeley and Cambridge, Mass. The industrial Rust Belt town of Gary, Ind., is also taking part.

Some of the cities that made the pledge have since lost interest. Topeka, Kan., is on the list, but that's because a former mayor signed up. The current mayor, Bill Bunten, has other priorities: "Our environmental problems in this city are just trying to make it clean and attractive."

But enough cities remain active in the program that the U.S. Conference of Mayors this fall hosted a climate summit. Also this fall, actor Robert Redford invited several dozen mayors to his ranch in Sundance, Utah, to talk global warming. There's even a new website — http://www.coolmayors.org — where city officials can exchange policy ideas.

The 70 cities that reported statistics last year reduced carbon dioxide emissions by an aggregate total of 23 million tons. That's not a huge sum considering that the U.S. would have to eliminate more than 1.6 billion tons to meet the Kyoto targets.

But those working on the issue expect the numbers to pick up dramatically in the coming years. More than 100 mayors have found the reforms so painless that they've set far more ambitious targets than those laid out in Kyoto, according to Michelle Wyman, executive director of ICLEI, a nonprofit working with local governments on climate change.

Governors, too, are joining the effort. At least 20 states, including California, have laws requiring a certain percentage of electrical power to come from solar, wind and other renewable sources. Just last week, former Vice President Al Gore announced a grass-roots campaign to encourage communities to hold emissions of greenhouse gases at their current levels rather than let them rise year after year as energy consumption increases.

Here in Boulder, even a skeptical Chamber of Commerce decided to back the climate tax, reasoning it would give the city's image a boost and attract progressive businesses. The tax, which will cost the average homeowner less than $2 a month, won approval in November from 59% of voters. City officials will use the money for conservation education, including subsidized energy audits.

On a recent morning, Kathie Joyner opened her modest bungalow to just such an audit. Inspector Michael Broussard prowled every cranny, looking for drafts, leaks and wasted energy.

Broussard, who runs a private company that contracts with a local nonprofit for the audits, urged Joyner to add weather stripping here and caulking there, to insulate her water pipes and consider a fiberglass front door instead of wood. He even suggested she trade in her desktop computer for a more energy-efficient laptop.

If Joyner implements every suggestion — which could cost her $4,000 — Broussard said her utility bills should drop by at least a third and she would reduce emissions of greenhouse gases by 9,000 pounds a year.

Taking careful notes, Joyner promised to get to work. "I used to think it would be a drop in the bucket; what could it possibly mean?" she said. "But there are lots of local governments taking steps to make a difference. It pushes the country along."

Mr. Inhofe's Last Hearing (WP)

THE LAST hearing on global climate change chaired by Sen. James M. Inhofe provided an excellent and public tutorial on why Americans should be grateful that it was, in fact, his last. The departing chairman of the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee has occupied a unique perch from which to take action on climate change. Instead, he has used his time at the committee's helm to cast spurious doubts on the problem even as the scientific consensus about its reality and severity has gelled. Last week, the Oklahoma Republican held a hearing to denounce the real villain in the debate: the media.

The press, it was claimed, has hyped climate change hysterically. It has ignored dissenting scientific voices. And it has sought to advocate for climate-change policy, instead of just reporting on the science. And this is the grave national problem -- not rising sea levels, melting ice caps, loss of habitats or shifts in oceanic currents -- that warrants the attention of the senator's committee.

Mr. Inhofe's complaints are meritless. If anything, media coverage of global warming has tended toward excessive caution. Scientific alarm at the concentration of greenhouse gases predates the current media attention to the subject. Many media organizations, in a quest for balance, have given climate-change skeptics far more ink and air time than justified by the support their position carries among reputable climatologists. But even debating the merits of Mr. Inhofe's charge acquiesces to changing the subject -- which all along should have been how to craft reasonable policy to reduce greenhouse emissions.

Democratic leadership on this issue should bring a welcome change. While some Republicans support strong action on climate change, they have been stymied by the White House and by congressional leadership that has insisted on debating basic science that is no longer the subject of serious dispute. It's a little like debating the future of the space program by holding hearings on whether the earth is actually round. It's long past time to move on to something useful.

IMMIGRATION:

Towns Struggling With Flow Of Illegals (NSL)

By Brian Donohue, Star-Ledger Staff

Newark Star-Ledger (NJ), December 10, 2006

Laws are often challenged, and defeated in the courts

With Congress deadlocked over how to handle illegal immigration, a growing number of towns and cities are taking matters into their own hands, using local laws to crack down on the problems associated with a massive underground population.

In New Jersey, some towns have toughened traffic laws to deter contractors from picking up day laborers on city streets. Others have tried to ban workers from gathering on street corners to wait for work. Several have launched housing code crackdowns to combat overcrowding. One has banned illegal immigrants from renting apartments altogether.

And few, if any, are having much success.

In a growing number of towns, local crackdowns are faltering amid court challenges, political opposition or other hurdles.

Consider:

The Borough of Bound Brook launched a series of housing raids to address rampant overcrowding in homes rented mostly by Latino immigrants in the late 1990s. But the U.S. Justice Department sued the town for illegally targeting Hispanics, resulting in a 2004 consent decree requiring the town to repay victims $425,000, hire a bilingual housing coordinator and make dramatic changes to its housing and zoning practices.

Freehold Borough's housing crackdown and an effort to shut down a day laborer gathering area were challenged in a lawsuit filed by immigrant rights groups. In a settlement last month, the borough agreed to pay $278,000, change its housing inspection procedures and allow laborers to gather on public property.

In July, the Township of Riverside in Burlington County passed a law fining employers and landlords who hire or rent apartments to illegal immigrants. In local elections last month, the Republican mayor and council member who pushed the measure were swept from office. With legal fees mounting from a pair of lawsuits challenging the law, Mayor Charles Hilton -- the man who proposed the law -- is calling for its repeal.

The trend has left local officials increasingly frustrated as they attempt to address complaints from residents about problems like "stacking" -- the housing of more people in a dwelling than is allowed by law.

"There's such a high level of frustration, and there's a reaction, if not an overreaction by officials based on that frustration," said Christopher Cotter, city administrator of the City of Summit, which toughened parking rules to keep contractors from blocking streets as they pick up day laborers.

"I think elected officials are being pressed by constituents just do something, do anything, and we're seeing the result of that in some cases," Cotter said.

The legal troubles encountered by some towns have convinced several municipalities that had been considering their own crackdowns to back off.

In both Newton and Keyport, for example, officials introduced ordinances similar to Riverside's housing and hiring ban to their governing bodies, but did not pass them.

The trend has emboldened immigrant advocates, who say towns must try a more cooperative approach, such as setting up designated hiring sites for day laborers, or programs to educate tenants on housing laws.

"When little towns try to take federal law in their hands, they fail," said Mahonrry Hidalgo, chairman of the NJ Hispanic Leadership Alliance Immigrant Committee. "So now everybody needs to try and change their approach to the solution and accept that we have to work together as one community."

Muzaffar Chishti, director of the Migration Policy Institute at the New York University School of Law, is tracking the efforts by a growing number of towns across the country to pass laws banning the hiring and housing of illegals, like the one passed by Riverside.

Of the 49 towns and cities where such ordinances were introduced, he said, 28 passed and 21 were defeated. Many of the 21 towns that passed the laws, including Riverside, are now facing lawsuits by civil rights groups.

In addition, efforts to combat immigration problems with traffic, housing or loitering laws have consistently failed when challenged in court, he said. Most efforts die for one of two reasons: They are either ruled unconstitutional, or judges rule that immigration enforcement is solely the job of the federal government.

"Populist as they are, they are highly suspect legally," Chishti said of such measures.

Steve Camarota, Director of Research at the Center for Immigration Studies, a Washington, D.C., think tank calling for lower immigration levels, says local communities have been "left holding the bag" by the government's failure to enforce immigration laws.

When they try to use local laws to combat immigration problems, he said, they square off against civil rights and immigrant advocate groups that are better prepared, and often better funded, than attorneys hired by small towns.

"There's a whole cottage industry of people, from the ACLU to MALDEF (the Mexican American Legal Defense and Education Fund (MALDEF) whose sole purpose, as part of their day job, is to intimidate anyone who wants to enforce immigration laws," Camarota said.

As Bound Brook learned, the U.S. Department of Justice can also present challenges.

While the town has strictly followed the rules laid out in its consent decree, Mayor Frank Ryan says the town still has problems with overcrowding. He remains frustrated that federal officials who sued the town gave little credence to the problems caused by an influx of immigrants, many of them illegal.

In one house, Ryan said, a couple were living in an attic on a mattress, using candles for light.

"The people from the Justice Department didn't see that," he said. "You get criticized for going after people this way, but what would happen if you had a fire and you had 12 people burned to death? You would get criticized for not inspecting these places."

There are an estimated 11 million to 12 million illegal immigrants living in the United States, with as many as 425,000 living in New Jersey, according to a recent study by the Pew Hispanic Center.

Competing immigration reform bills have stalled in both houses of Congress.

A bipartisan measure passed by the Senate would combine a new guest worker program with tougher enforcement of immigration laws. A Republican-sponsored bill passed by the House of Representatives includes only tougher enforcement provisions.

Both immigrant advocates and restrictionists agree the struggles of towns to tackle the problem on their own make it all the more urgent for Congress to deal with the issue.

"Good, bad or indifferent, local towns can't enforce federal immigration law," Chishti said. "The most they can do is put political pressure on Congress to make the change happen."

Long Hours, Low Pay In Mexico Heightens Lure Of Opportunity In U.S. (AR)

By Chris Hawley

The Arizona Republic, December 10, 2006

Reynaldo Patiño makes $18 a day.

It's a normal wage for Mexico. And that is exactly the problem.

Patiño gets up at 5 a.m. in a one-room shack in a poor suburb where he lives with his wife, daughter and niece. He works 11 hours a day cooking corn tortillas at a shop in central Mexico City. He gets home at 8 p.m.

The next morning, he does it all over again. Six days a week. No vacations. Ever.

Patiño has no health insurance and no car. After paying for rent, food, utilities and bus fare, he is lucky to have a few dollars left.

Welcome to a typical life in Mexico: a world of long hours, low pay and prices that are much higher than in the United States. It is those economic pressures that drive Mexicans to the United States and that lie at the heart of the illegal immigration problem.

Mexicans do not come to the United States because they can't find jobs at home. In fact, unemployment in Mexico is currently lower than in the United States, at about 3.6 percent. Some 95 percent of newly arrived Mexican migrants had jobs before they came to the United States, according to a 2005 survey by the Pew Hispanic Center.

But in Mexico, having a job does not necessarily mean being paid well or even being paid well enough to make ends meet.

The average Mexican household earns $7,297 a year in wages, according to the government.

But because 39 percent of Mexico's wealth is concentrated in 10 percent of the population, most people actually earn less than the national average. In fact, 82 percent of Mexicans earn less than $21 per workday. Just like Patiño.

The working poor

Until the sun comes up, the view from Patiño's neighborhood is magical. From his house, the lights of the valley sparkle between rugged hills left by ancient volcanoes. To the south, the world's second-biggest metropolis, Mexico City, radiates an orange light across the night sky.

Then dawn breaks, and the neighborhood is revealed for what it is: a gritty expanse of unpainted, cinder-block huts covering the countryside like a gray tide. Stray dogs wander the dirt streets, eating garbage. A high-tension electrical line above the neighborhood makes a loud, menacing buzz all day long.

Patiño's house is one room. He pays $59 a month in rent. He and his wife, María de los Angeles Piña, sleep in a twin bed. Their 8-year-old daughter, Ana Laura, shares a single bed with their 16-year-old niece, Abigail. There are two bare light bulbs.

The room's only luxuries are a television, a stereo, a collection of cheap animal figurines and a plastic Christmas tree. The floor and walls are bare concrete, and there is no heater to fight the 40-degree chill on December nights.

"I would like to live in a better house, maybe have a bit of luxury," Patiño said. "But we don't have the money."

Patiño is typical of Mexico's vast population of working poor. He lives in the Mexico City area, home to one of every five Mexicans. He has a wife and one daughter, a reflection of Mexico's trend toward smaller families.

He earns $5,672 a year, one-seventh the income of an average American household. At the same time, however, he and his family are paying close to U.S. prices for many necessities. Milk costs around $3.30 a gallon in most parts of Mexico, and regular unleaded gasoline is $2.32 a gallon.

Electricity is twice as expensive as in the United States. Electronics are 30 percent more expensive, one study found. Even mailing a letter is more, at 59 cents.

Keep costs down

Most Mexicans live much more simply than their American neighbors. They eat out less, rely on staple foods and live in small houses. But even with the cost-cutting, Mexicans spend a bigger percentage of their wages than Americans do to feed, clothe and house their families: about 66 percent.

Pressures like that are what drive Mexicans to the United States, where they can earn seven or eight times as much for performing similar work.

Patiño's older brother did just that a year ago, abandoning the tortilla shop for a new life in Los Angeles. Patiño has not followed him. But, he says, the idea is tempting.

"I've thought about it," he said. "I've thought about it a lot."

The daily, costly grind

At 5:30 a.m., Patiño and his niece catch the first of two buses for the 90-minute commute into the city. The second bus is a rolling sardine can, with commuters packed so tight it is hard to move.

By 7 a.m., Patiño is firing up the tortilla machine at the Lisboa Tortilla Shop in downtown Mexico City. He started working there at age 15. That was 12 years ago; he is now the manager. His sister-in-law, Patricia Piña, also works at the shop. She mixes cornmeal with water and a bit of lime powder and begins feeding the dough into the squeaking, rattling machine.

Corn tortillas are the staple food in central Mexico, as common as bread is to Americans. Soon customers are lining up at the door, and orders are streaming in from restaurants and taco stands. A steaming tortilla pops off the conveyor belt every second. It is hot, exhausting work.

No time for lunch

When Patiño isn't snatching tortillas from the machine, he is answering the phone, weighing out purchases or delivering orders by bicycle. There is no time for a lunch break. Instead, the three workers share two large meatballs heated up on the tortilla machine.

Patiño gets paid in cash every Saturday by the shop's owner. He does not pay income taxes.

For each 11-hour workday, he earns 200 pesos, or $18. That equates to $1.64 an hour. Patiño has to work an hour and a half just to cover his $2.45 bus fare.

The low wages and high cost of living in Mexico have fueled angry protests and become a rallying point for opposition lawmakers in the wake of the July 2 presidential election.

Last month, protesters demonstrated outside the Economy Department after officials raised the cost of government-subsidized milk by 29 percent and the cost of gasoline by 4 percent.

Mexico City was considering a 50 percent rise in subway fares but quickly abandoned the idea following a public outcry.

During a rally in downtown Mexico City, the opposition Democratic Revolutionary Party issued a study showing that Mexicans pay more than Americans for everything from credit cards to cable TV.

Consider electricity: The average Arizona family used 1,034 kilowatt-hours a month last year and paid a monthly bill of $91.94, according to the U.S. Department of Energy. The same usage in central Mexico would cost $187.01.

Fed up with the high rates, millions of Mexicans opt to steal electricity with clandestine lines known as diablitos, or "little devils." The theft drives rates even higher.

Inflation factor

Mexico's inflation rate is lower than it has been in years, at about 4 percent. But the yearly increases add up. Housing expenses increased more than 20 percent, health care expenses went up 19 percent and clothing costs rose 12 percent between 2000 and 2005, according to Mexico's census bureau.

Educational expenses, especially, are a major burden for many Mexicans.

Schools in Mexico provide free textbooks only through junior high. There is an annual enrollment fee and often another fee to cover janitorial costs. Uniforms are mandatory, there are no free school buses, and school supplies are about the same price as in the United States.

Zeroed out

It is Saturday morning, and María, Reynaldo Patiño's wife, is making her daily walk to the market. The air is filled with techno music and the smell of fresh produce as she and her daughter thread their way past vendors selling a variety of wares, from pirated CDs to cups of Jell-O.

María winces and holds her abdomen as she steps off a curb. A few days ago, she had some minor surgery. The operation cost 2,800 pesos, or about $250.

Like 40 percent of Mexicans, the family lacks health insurance. So Reynaldo had to ask his boss for a loan.

María stops at the butcher's counter and checks the prices. Ground beef is selling for $2.06 a pound, slightly more than Phoenix shoppers pay at Safeway. María orders 2 pounds of suadero, or breastbone meat, for $1.65 a pound.

Then she picks up a pound of green tomatoes, a half-pound of chiles and heads home.

María spends about $10 a day, half of Reynaldo's pay, on food for the family. She also buys at least one 2-liter bottle of Coca-Cola at $1.36. Like many Mexican families in poor areas, the Patiños drink soda instead of water because local water supplies are unsafe.

After paying for gas, electricity, school supplies, bus fare and other necessities, little money remains. The family has no bank account and no savings. "At the end of the day, there's usually nothing left," María said. "We're zeroed out."

How Green Was My Rally (NYT)

By Lawrence Downes

The New York Times, December 10, 2006

To roars and applause and whistles so loud and shrill they stabbed the ears even more than his double-bagpipe escort, Senator Charles Schumer swept into the packed church auditorium, levitating on a cloud of affection. For another entrance as grand, you'd probably have to go back to Groucho Marx in "Animal Crackers," borne in on a litter by bare-chested natives and multiple choruses of "Hooray for Captain Spaulding."

This happy moment was a rally by Irish immigrants the other night at St. Barnabas Church in the Woodlawn section of the Bronx. Mr. Schumer wore a green tie and that grin of his, so wide you could drive on it from Galway to Dublin. He was there to announce the miraculous rebirth of immigration reform, courtesy of the new Democratic Congress. But first he did what politicians always do before a throng of happy Hibernians. After a few courteous preliminaries and a line from St. Matthew's Gospel, he committed Irish identity theft.

"My sister's name," he let slip in a lusty roar, "is Fran ... Schumer ... McNULTY!"

Cheers and more cheers.

"Up Mayo!" the senator cried. "Up Leitrim!"

He was just getting started. He introduced an aide, the one who named his daughters Siobhan, Fiona, Maeve and Nora. The love spilled over, like foam on a Guinness.

"The more Irish there are in America, the better we all are!" Mr. Schumer declared, repeating a line he had caught some flak about a few months before. Some non-Irish immigrants had grumbled about how unlikely it would be to hear another group's name tucked into that equation. They had a point about ethnic favoritism, though Mr. Schumer, who sweet-talks everybody, was perhaps not the best example of it.

Mr. Schumer's final bit of stagecraft was in Gaelic. "Tiocfaidh ar la!" he bellowed. It means "our day will come" and is pronounced, to the senator's evident gratitude, "Chucky-AR-LA." With that he tied the ribbon on the gift wrap of his speech. The wave of cheers crested and fell, and Mr. Schumer departed into the windy night.

It's now a regular thing for big-ticket politicians to go to Woodlawn, where the Irish pubs and delis have been struggling as people go back home to ride the Celtic Tiger, as Ireland's resurgent economy is known. With Irish-American neighborhoods in decline, Irish illegal immigrants have rallied urgently to the cause of friendlier immigration laws. They are a drop of 50,000 in a bucket of 12 million illegal immigrants, but as Mr. Schumer's special blessing showed, they command attention.

He is far from the only politician to be drawn to the white, English-speaking sliver of the immigration problem. That fondness for Irish audiences helps reinforce the odd sense of solipsism surrounding the Irish immigrant lobby. When you hear the chairman of the Irish Lobby for Immigration Reform, Niall O'Dowd, vow to fight "to get what is rightfully ours" — more visas for the Irish — you can't help wondering how quickly such words would get a Latino banished to the militant fringe.

"We Are America" is the Latinos' and Asians' cry. The well-organized Irish don't feel the need to say that. Their slogan, on T-shirts and the Irish Lobby's Web site, is blunt: "Legalize the Irish."

The Irish have a just cause, but I only wish they and their many friends would preach the gospel of immigration reform in a bigger tent. It is, after all, every immigrant group's fate to start out in this country unloved, as the Irish are only too eager to remind us.

TAX:

Praise For The Tax Man (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, December 10, 2006

IT'S ALMOST A no-brainer. State number-crunchers are going to go over your tax return anyway, calculating whether you sent in too much or too little. What if they did their figuring beforehand and sent you a return already completed except for your signature? If you don't like what they came up with, or you don't trust them, you can throw it out and file the old-fashioned way, no questions asked.

But if you have relatively simple finances and the state's calculation looks right to you, you could take advantage of ReadyReturn, a service of the Franchise Tax Board. You still have to pay your taxes, but you can file in less time and with fewer headaches. You can even do the job by e-mail.

Imagine: the government using technology to lighten the burden on taxpayers. That's one program everyone can get behind.

OK, not everyone. The Legislature killed the pilot program this year after intense pressure from Intuit Inc., maker of TurboTax, and other companies selling tax-preparation software and services. Thanks to them, there will be no ReadyReturn for the 2006 tax year. The companies followed up their victory by spending $1 million trying to defeat John Chiang, who supported ReadyReturn as a member of the Board of Equalization, in his campaign for state controller.

Fortunately, they failed, and Chiang on Monday joined with other members of the Franchise Tax Board to revive ReadyReturn for the 2007 tax year. Now it's up to the Legislature to do, well, nothing. This is a case in which lawmakers should stay out of the way while bureaucrats make life a tiny bit easier for taxpayers.

The arguments for blocking the program are bizarre. According to opponents, the enhanced state service unfairly competes with private businesses, which apparently favor a more burdensome and complex government in order to fatten the market for services that will help residents cut through all that complexity. What's next: Stop the DMV from renewing car registration on the Internet so entrepreneurs can make a living standing in line for drivers? Add more red tape to the permitting process to keep the lawyers and professional facilitators happy?

Come on. Market solutions are always worth considering, but it's the government's job to bill taxpayers. Filing returns is a taxpayer's burden, although a necessary one, and government's all-too-rare efforts to minimize that burden are welcome. ReadyReturn is a step in the right direction.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Leahy Relishing Rise To Power (RUTHER)

By Darren M. Allen, Vermont Press Bureau

Rutland (VT) Herald, December 10, 2006

MONTPELIER – Sen. Patrick Leahy is about to begin his 33rd year as the only Democrat to represent Vermont in the U.S. Senate, but it might as well be his first.

Even after a long day in the halls of Congress, Leahy couldn't contain his excitement over returning to work in a chamber dominated, for the fourth time in his career, by his party.

"I see the Senate getting back to where it's supposed to be – the conscience of the nation," Leahy said in a phone interview. "The nation has not been helped by being a rubber stamp."

Leahy, other Democrats and some stalwarts of the GOP have accused the Republican-controlled 109th Congress of being a rubber stamp for the president's agenda, ultimately allowing Bush to run afoul of the Constitution with impunity.

But even under these circumstances, the Vermont senator has commanded power and attention. And that's due in part to his longevity in office. Leahy, a former Chittenden County prosecutor, won the 1974 election at age 34 and became the youngest Vermonter and the only mem-ber of his party ever elected to the U.S. Senate. Over the years, he has been a member of the minority periodically, from 1981 to 1987, again from 1995 to 2001, then from 2003 until last week.

Leahy is seventh on the Senate's seniority list, and he is considered to be among the top 10 most influential people on Capitol Hill.

And he's about to become more powerful. When Congress meets next month, Leahy will – for the second time – become chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, where he will control the flow and tenor of hearings over matters ranging from federal judicial appointments to oversight of the FBI and the Justice Department.

He also will become chairman of the foreign operations subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee, a post from which he will have significant oversight over a slew of controversial national security issues.

And, in a committee assignment of particular interest to Vermonters, he will be the No. 2 Democrat on the Agriculture Committee, where he will be able to look out for the state's farmers, as well as steer conservation measures.

Through the appropriations and agriculture assignments, Leahy will continue to direct millions of dollars of federal money and contracts back home, as he has now for more than a decade.

And while serving his state's financial interests is a key component of the work Leahy – or any senator for that matter – does, it is his self-described role as overseer of the nation's civil liberties that he's most excited about.

Leahy hasn't officially laid out his agenda for the next two years, but anyone paying attention to last week's Judiciary Committee hearing on FBI oversight would be hard pressed to have missed where the senator is going.

"The recent revelation that the Bush administration, since 9/11, has been compiling secret dossiers on millions of unwitting, law-abiding Americans who travel across our borders, highlights the importance of congressional oversight," he said. "It is simply incredible that the administration is willing to share this sensitive information with foreign governments and even private employers, while refusing to allow U.S. citizens to see or challenge the so-called terror score that the government has assigned them based on their travel habits and schedules.

"This administration has gone to unprecedented lengths to hide its own activities from the public, while at the same time collecting and compiling unprecedented amounts of information about every citizen."

In a phone interview a day after the hearing, Leahy also said he had serious concerns about domestic eavesdropping, the interrogation of detainees and other "national security" activities conducted by the Bush administration.

"How far is this going to go?" Leahy said. "How many more ways are we going to be cross-checked? J. Edgar Hoover would be salivating to have this kind of power," he added, referring to the longtime former FBI director who compiled vast stores of information on millions of Americans.

"But none of this – none of this – is making us safer."

Leahy does not take national security lightly, but he said to force Americans to choose security over the loss of civil liberties is a false and unnecessary choice.

His position is shared by the American Civil Liberties Union.

"Leahy has been probably about the strongest voice for civil liberties in the Senate for a number of years, although that voice was certainly muted during the time the Democrats were the minority party in Congress," said Allen Gilbert, the executive director of the ACLU's Vermont office. "I think that Senator Leahy is different from a lot of civil liberties activists in Congress because he understands that protecting civil liberties leads to better government and better security for citizens.

"It's not always comfortable and it's not always convenient and it's not always popular, but Leahy gets it. He knows that civil liberties are not just window dressing or something nice to talk about on national holidays."

Not everyone agrees that the nation's recently instituted security measures violate civil liberties – the rights of privacy, equality, due process and, fundamentally, to be left alone. The president has defended his record on terrorism, and many conservative commentators have suggested that the additional measures employed by the administration have lead to a greater degree of safety.

"Since the Sept. 11 attacks, America is safer, but we are not yet safe," the president's National Strategy for Combating Terrorism concluded. "We have done much to degrade Al Qaida and its affiliates. …We have transformed our governmental institutions and framework to wage a generational struggle."

It is that institutional transformation that concerns Leahy. In short, he said, allowing a president of any party to do whatever he or she pleases with the consent of Congress is dangerous.

"We are in serious danger of becoming a government of men and not of laws," Leahy said. "And that is always bad."

In addition to restoring regular oversight over the Justice Department, Leahy will use the chairmanship of the Judiciary Committee to scrutinize President Bush's judicial nominees.

Not that the outgoing chairman – Leahy's friend of many years, Pennsylvania Republican Sen. Arlen Specter – routinely gave the president his way. In fact, Leahy has regularly praised Specter's screening of judicial nominees, and he, far more often than not, was consulted on nominations.

"Ideologues will not get through," Leahy said. "I don't want the federal judiciary to be an arm of the Republican Party or the Democratic Party. An independent court system is one of the greatest safeguards we have."

And it's been the only check on executive-branch power in recent years, at least according to Cheryl Hanna, a Vermont Law School professor and constitutional law scholar.

"It is important that the Senate approve judges who are moderate and respect constitutional principles on civil liberties," Hanna said. "Since Sept. 11, Congress and the president independently and together have taken actions that have curtailed civil liberties, and it has taken the Supreme Court to step in.

"The attitude about civil liberties in recent years has been undermined by the false dichotomy that we have to trade some liberty for security."

Leahy isn't shy about stating his opinions or being in the limelight. And it's because of his outspokenness on key issues that the Bush administration sees Leahy as an antagonist.

Two years ago, Vice President Dick Cheney lashed out at the senator, telling him to "f— yourself."

Leahy never repeated the comment publicly, but many observers saw it as an illustration of just how frustrated the administration gets with the senior senator from Vermont.

The senator, for his part, seems to make a point of couching stinging remarks with a gentlemanly polity. Even when he savages the president's policy decisions, he does so with a smile and his trademark soft, gravely voice and piercing eyes.

As one political Web site put it recently, "Leahy's white hair and soft voice belie the tenaciousness with which he latches onto an issue or a witness, and doesn't let go. A former prosecutor, Leahy approaches issues with an organized and commanding knowledge of the facts."

And with a wry, Vermont sense of humor.

His first official act in the new Congress will be to escort the state's newly elected junior senator, Rep. Bernard Sanders, down the aisle to the well of the Senate, where he will be sworn in.

By Cheney.

"When it comes to the vice president," Leahy said, "it's always better to be sworn in than to be sworn at."

Dems Vow Change As Congress Ends Session (AP)

AP, December 9, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) — The 109th session of Congress, frustrated by partisanship and criticized for its meager record of accomplishment, ended with flurry of bill-passing and promises of change when Democrats take over the House and Senate in January.

Before the predawn finish Saturday, departing House Speaker Dennis Hastert acknowledged that after eight years, the longest stretch for a Republican in the job, he will welcome a return to the rank and file. "On Jan. 4, I will be privileged to rejoin you on these benches where my heart is," he said,

The Illinois Republican will be succeeded on that day by Rep. Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif. She becomes the first female speaker and the first Democrat in the post since Newt Gingrich of Georgia led the Republicans to power in 1995.

Pelosi is promising that the new Democratic era will get off to a quick start with votes to raise the federal minimum wage for the first time in a decade, enact lobbying and ethics reform and lower Medicare prescription drug costs.

As often is the case in the waning hours, the congressional session ended with a mad rush to deal with untended business.

In the long final day, ending around 4:40 a.m. ET in the Senate, the two chambers passed a massive tax and trade bill, prevented the government from shutting down and approved dozens of other bills. They included an important fisheries management measure; a bill allowing civilian nuclear technology transfers to India; and bills to fund programs to combat AIDS, pandemic diseases and premature births.

Lawmakers ready to return home also were reminded of the corruption and scandal problems that helped sweep Democrats to power in the November elections.

The House ethics committee, in a report Friday, admonished Republicans for turning a blind eye for years to the inappropriate conduct of former Rep. Mark Foley, R-Fla. He resigned in September after it was revealed he had sent salacious electronic messages to former teenage pages.

The tax measure revived some 20 tax breaks, at a cost of $38 billion over five years, and a dozen credits promoting alternative and efficient uses of energy.

It extended through the end of 2007 a deduction for research and development initiatives, and renewed a deductions of up to $4,000 for higher education costs. There were breaks for teachers who pay for supplies out of their own pocket and for taxpayers in nine states with no income taxes — allowing them to deduct state and local sales taxes.

"All Americans should be treated equally and given the opportunity to deduct their state taxes, regardless of how those levies are assessed," said GOP Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison of Texas. In her state, which lacks a state income tax, sales tax deductions are worth some $1 billion.

The popular tax breaks became a magnet for contentious and expensive bills. The package included legislation to open up 8.3 million acres in the Gulf of Mexico to oil and gas drilling and to prevent a 5% cut in Medicare payments to doctors from taking effect Jan. 1. The GOP-crafted solution to the problem was criticized as an accounting gimmick because it would double the cost of fixing the problem again next year.

The legislation also contained measures to permanently normalize trade with Vietnam and extend trade benefits for four Andean nations, sub-Saharan African countries and Haiti. The Haiti act was the toughest to swallow for some lawmakers from the South; they said it would further erode jobs in their states' textile industries.

The bill also renewed, with increased federal contributions, a program dealing with abandoned coal mines and the health issues of former miners.

Senate Budget Committee Chairman Judd Gregg, R-N.H., said the legislation would shift $4 billion in health care costs from the coal companies to the taxpayers, and criticized his own party for failing to check indiscriminate federal spending. "We're supposed to be the party of fiscal discipline and we haven't been," he said.

As one of its final acts, Congress approved a stopgap measure keeping federal programs running at or slightly below current levels through Feb. 15. President Bush quickly signed it on Saturday.

The action was necessary because lawmakers failed to pass the annual spending bills covering the budget year that began Oct. 1, except those dealing with defense and homeland security.

Rep. David Obey, D-Wis., who will become House Appropriations Committee chairman when the Democrats take over, said the bill was "a blatant admission of abject failure by the most useless Congress in modern times."

Democrats also pointed out that the House met only 102 days this session, fewer than the 110 days of the maligned "do-nothing" Congress of the Truman presidency.

The next House majority leader, Rep. Steny Hoyer, D-Md., says there will be a return to five-day workweeks. In the Senate, incoming Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., said he and new Republican leader, Sen. Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., have agreed that all 100 senators will hold a private session on Jan. 4 to kick off what they hope will be a new era of civility and less partisanship.

Republicans claim some major accomplishments this year: passing a pension overhaul; renewing the Patriot Act; enacting a port security bill; and endorsing Bush's plans to create military commissions to prosecute suspected terrorists.

But this Congress could not move ahead on promised lobbying and ethics changes; failed to reach a consensus on the administration's warrantless eavesdropping program; and did not develop a plan to deal with the 12 million illegal immigrants in the country.

GOP Laments Mixed Results As Control Of Congress Ends (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman

Demoralized Republicans adjourned the 109th Congress at 5 a.m. yesterday with a near-empty Capitol, closing the door on a dozen years of nearly unbroken GOP control by spending more time in the final days lamenting their failures -- to rein in government, tame the deficit and temper their own lust for power -- than reliving their successes.

Still reeling from their electoral defeat Nov. 7, Republicans capped an era of conservative ascendance with the passage of business tax break extensions, a package of trade measures, and legislation to stave off physician-payment cuts they once trumpeted in their budget-cutting drive.

While GOP leaders touted their handiwork, it was a far cry from 12 years ago when the Republicans swept to power with the zeal of self-described revolutionaries and a mission to shrink the size of government, limit its reach, strengthen the nation's security and end an era of a privileged, imperial Congress.

"Together, we reformed welfare. We cut taxes, and small businesses grew all over the nation," House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) said in a late-night farewell address. "We promised to protect this nation from further attack, and by grace of God and with the leadership of President Bush, we have been successful."

But beyond Hastert's speech, a conclusion punctuated by the release of a scathing House ethics committee report on the Mark Foley-House page scandal and last-minute budget squabbles yielded more recriminations than congratulations.

"You know, the American people took the reins of government away from the Republican Party . . . in this last election. They did so, I think, in large part because they were tired of our hypocrisy," fumed Sen. Judd Gregg (R-N.H.) from the Senate floor. "Our leadership and some of our members grew arrogant in their own power, and with arrogance comes corruption," said Rep. Zach Wamp (R-Tenn.), a member of the class of 1994.

"We came to change Washington, and Washington changed us," said Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.).

As they grapple with defeat, Republicans seem to have difficulty taking stock of their 12 years in power, but those years had enormous impact. Republican Congresses fundamentally changed the welfare system, cut taxes time and again, expanded the powers of the government to combat terrorism in the wake of the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, and added a prescription drug benefit to Medicare.

Combing through the fine print of the 1994 "Contract With America" campaign manifesto, one finds goals that Americans now largely take for granted. Congressional committee chairmen, who once built empires from inviolable perches, are now term limited. The contract anticipated a lucrative tax credit for each child, the end of a tax penalty on marriage, federal incentives for adoption, the easing of limits on the amount seniors could earn and still receive their Social Security benefits and some curbs on civil litigation. The overriding political fear of tax increases, still evident as Democrats move to resume control, can be seen as a conservative victory, as can a federal minimum wage that has grown increasingly irrelevant after nearly a decade without change.

Yet measured against the ambitions of 1994, not much has changed. The House Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee might be no more, but the departments of commerce, education and energy, once slated for the chopping block, are still very much alive, as are the National Endowment for the Arts and the Corporation for Public Broadcasting.

Compared with the size of the economy, government discretionary spending has grown. The vision of a term-limited Congress of everymen, rotating through Washington after short stints, has all but vanished. And government programs such as Medicare and federal education bureaucracies are larger and more pervasive.

"It's a mixed bag," said former House speaker Newt Gingrich (R-Ga.), the architect of the 1994 revolution. "In a three-year period, we changed things fairly dramatically. We, candidly, then failed."

Democrats were harsher -- but only by degrees. Former Senate majority leader Thomas A. Daschle (S.D.) pointed with disdain to former president Bill Clinton's impeachment, the Iraq war, the yawning federal debt, "a complete breakdown on oversight as well as civility," corruption and a "willingness to cede most of their authority as an equal branch of government" to the Bush administration.

"One would have to search long and hard through history to find a dozen years more disastrous than that," Daschle said.

Compared with the liberal ascendancy, which ran from Franklin D. Roosevelt's New Deal to Lyndon B. Johnson's Great Society and arguably Ronald Reagan's election, the conservative era has been brief and relatively inconsequential, said Julian Zelizer, a Boston University congressional historian. Nothing in the past 12 years compares with the creation of Social Security or Medicare, the voting rights and civil rights acts, the Marshall Plan or Dwight D. Eisenhower's interstate highway system. Nor were any of those big-government achievements fundamentally altered.

Far from ending an imperial Congress, Republicans centralized power in their leadership to an unprecedented level.

Even some successes -- such as a balanced budget and the diminution of farm subsidies -- proved short-lived, GOP lawmakers and former leaders conceded.

Republicans did take pride in a few achievements. In numerous interviews, virtually every lawmaker pointed to the 1996 welfare overhaul as the pinnacle of Republican achievement, followed closely by the 1997 balanced-budget agreement, which introduced private-sector competition to Medicare and helped yield a federal budget surplus the next year. In a memo to fellow Republicans, House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (Ohio) pointed to lower tax rates on income and investments, education laws that expanded parental school choice and targeted funding to schools that succeed, the expansion of free trade, the confirmation of conservative judges and Supreme Court justices, and laws to help pursue terrorists and strengthen the military.

"The common thread through all of these achievements is the Republican commitment to individual freedom, personal responsibility, and accountable government," Boehner wrote.

But in general, Republicans were in no mood to cheer. Instead, they took turns trying to pinpoint where things went wrong. Sen. Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.), who came to the House in the class of 1994, pointed to setting supposedly strict spending caps in the 1997 budget deal, only to break them in 1998. Former House majority leader Richard K. Armey (R-Tex.) took the same vein when he fingered the summer of 1997 and the first emergency spending bill that was not offset with equivalent spending cuts.

"That was the day we said: 'Discipline is too hard, too demanding. It makes people mad that have volatile tempers, and we're just not going to do it anymore,' " Armey said.

Wamp had his specific moment, June 27, 2003, when emissaries from the GOP leadership woke him in the middle of the night, pleading with him to change his vote against the Medicare prescription drug bill, the largest entitlement expansion since the creation of Medicare. House leaders kept the vote open more than an hour, setting a record as they twisted arms, threatened and even told one member that political support for his son was at stake.

"It looked like we were in the back pockets of the prescription drug companies, and some of us were," Wamp said, concluding that Republican leaders had forgotten about conservative principals and cared only for the preservation of power.

Referring to the former House majority leader, Wamp recalled: "If Tom DeLay said it one time, he said it 15 times: 'The most important thing we can do for the American people is keep our Republican majority.' That was just wrong, and it had to catch up to us in the end."

The leaders of the revolution agreed that the past 12 years hardly cemented the conservative visions of Barry Goldwater, Ronald Reagan and the class of 1994. But Armey said that it is far too early to close the books on a conservative era.

"I still expect to see a fourth golden moment in my lifetime," he said. "We've got a bit of a setback here, but we're going to be like Arnold Schwarzenegger. We'll be back."

Congress's Last Acts Include Tax Breaks (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman, Stephen Barr

The rancorous 109th Congress adjourned yesterday morning with final passage of measures to expand civilian nuclear trade with India, establish permanent trade relations with Vietnam and extend a bevy of expiring business tax breaks.

Legislation that would overhaul the U.S. Postal Service for the first time since 1970 and could hold down the cost of mailing letters also cleared the Congress and was sent to the president. A presidential commission and the Government Accountability Office had called for changes in how the Postal Service operates as Americans increasingly communicate and do business through e-mail and the Internet.

But last-minute Republican budget squabbles marred the final hours of a Congress already tainted by scandal, indictments and resignations, and ushered out Republican control on a discordant note. The 109th Congress ended having logged fewer days of legislative activity than even the infamous "Do-Nothing Congress" of 1948.

"You know, it's sort of that old Pogo line, 'We've met the enemy, and he is us,' " fumed Senate Budget Committee Chairman Judd Gregg (R-N.H.), as the Republican-controlled Congress moved toward final passage of tax cuts and spending measures that would expand the budget deficit.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) ended his own Senate career and called the Congress adjourned at 4:35 a.m., telling a near-empty Capitol, "I will truly miss each and every one of you."

The centerpiece of the closing hours' work was a tax-and-trade bill. The measure temporarily extended expiring tax breaks for business research and development and for hiring people off the welfare rolls, a partial college tuition deduction, and energy conservation incentives. It extended a generous deduction for state and local sales taxes that was slipped into a business tax law in 2004 as a temporary measure to win votes in states without income taxes but is taking on an air of permanence.

The huge package also contained measures to permanently normalize trade with Vietnam and extend trade benefits for four Andean nations, sub-Saharan African countries and Haiti. The Haiti provision was strongly challenged by some Southern lawmakers, who said it would further erode jobs in their states' textile industries.

The U.S.-India nuclear cooperation deal set aside years of U.S. nonproliferation policy that forbids the trade of nuclear-reactor technologies to nations that refused to sign the international nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty, such as India. A strong bipartisan majority argued that the policy was an impediment to improved relations between the world's largest democracies. President Bush hailed the action as a means of enabling India and the United States to work together to promote energy production without polluting the atmosphere or contributing to global warming.

Democrats secured a provision blocking an automatic pay raise for Congress until Feb. 16, when a stopgap spending measure to keep the government operating is set to expire. Democratic leaders had argued that Congress should not get a pay hike until lawmakers approve the first increase in the minimum wage since 1997, a measure they hope to pass well before mid-February.

But debate that stretched into the morning yesterday centered on the fiscal stewardship of a Republican Congress that saw record budget surpluses turn into record deficits. Gregg and a handful of other Republican budget hawks held up passage of the tax-and-trade bill because the measure's 10-year, $50 billion price tag would void deficit-control measures. Ultimately, the Senate overrode those objections.

The Postal Service measure has been in negotiation for the past three years. The Postal Service is a linchpin of the economy, touching more than 9 million jobs and about $900 billion in commerce.

Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine), a chief sponsor, called the bill "great news for the future of an institution that is critical to our economy and will ensure the continuation of universal postal service at an affordable rate."

The legislation would replace the lengthy and litigious process used to raise the price of stamps and some other postal rates with a price cap, limiting rate increases to the rate of inflation for a 10-year period. The change would inject more predictability into postal increases, especially for the magazine industry and other large mailers. It also would permit the Postal Service to more quickly offer discounts for its services, such as promotional rates to attract business in holiday seasons.

The Postal Service also gets billions of dollars in financial relief under the bill. Costs for military pensions earned by postal workers during their time in the armed forces would be shifted from the Postal Service to the Treasury, the practice for most federal agencies. The bill also would release money from an escrow fund to cover postal retiree health-care liabilities.

The legislation would replace a rate-review commission with a more powerful Postal Regulatory Commission, which could set some postal rates and examine postal financial management practices.

Postmaster General John E. Potter congratulated House and Senate negotiators "for making reform a reality" and said the agency looks forward to implementing the changes.

"Over the long run, the whole postal system will, I believe, experience higher-quality service and lower cost than it would have," said Michael J. Critelli, chairman of the Mailing Industry CEO Council.

After Flurry Of Votes Stretching Into Morning, Lawmakers Head Home (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

WASHINGTON, Dec. 9 — Republicans relinquished their political grip on Capitol Hill early Saturday as the 109th Congress adjourned after a final spurt of legislation and accusation.

In one of their last acts in the majority, Republican leaders forced through a broad tax and trade bill packed with provisions that drew substantial bipartisan support after harsh opposition that melted away when it became obvious the legislation was headed to the president and lawmakers were ready to head home after a difficult year.

“I recognize I am going to lose,” said Senator Judd Gregg, Republican of New Hampshire, in making a final, futile procedural attack against the measure, which was approved on a 79-to-9 vote just before 2 a.m. The House had passed the provisions in two separate packages.

With the conclusion of the Congress, four years of full Republican control over the apparatus of Washington came to an end because of election gains that will install Democrats in the House and Senate majorities when Congress reconvenes Jan. 4. The election also interrupted 12 straight years of Republican reign in the House, where Democrats were steamrolled for years.

Reactions to the looming transfer of power depended on whether a “D” or an “R” followed a lawmaker’s name.

Senator Charles E. Schumer, the New York Democrat who was instrumental in engineering the Democratic takeover of the Senate, beamed as he left the chamber. “Not a bad year,” Mr. Schumer said.

But Republicans were subdued, with some who were defeated in November saying goodbye to colleagues and staff members and lingering a few extra minutes on the floor after casting their last votes.

In the House, Representative J. Dennis Hastert of Illinois made his final speech as speaker and received a hug and a kiss on the cheek from the incoming speaker, Representative Nancy Pelosi, Democrat of California, a frequent target of Republican attacks.

“Those of us on this side of the aisle will become the loyal opposition, and the gentle lady from California, Mrs. Pelosi, will assume the duties as our speaker,” Mr. Hastert said. “I know she will do so with skill and grace and that she will bring honor to this institution.”

The trade measure, a compendium of last-minute priorities sent to President Bush, was the chief legislative accomplishment of the final hours. It restored $38 billion in popular tax breaks; established normal trade relations with Vietnam and granted trade benefits to Haiti and four South American countries; and blocked a cut in Medicare payments to doctors. The measure also fulfilled a long-sought objective of Gulf Coast lawmakers and the oil industry by expanding offshore drilling opportunities in the eastern Gulf of Mexico and directing hundreds of millions of dollars in new royalties to the region.

"Just when everyone bet against us, Republicans put together a broad package of energy, tax, trade and health care measures," said Senator Bill Frist of Tennessee, whose four-year tenure as majority leader concluded with the final gavel in the Senate at 4:40 a.m.

Hours earlier, just minutes before a midnight deadline, the Senate approved a stopgap measure to maintain financing for government agencies at current or lower levels through Feb. 15 — a temporary fix required because Congress had failed to pass 9 of the 11 routine spending bills that were due Oct. 1.

That collapse raised complaints from Democrats that Republicans were irresponsibly leaving them with major unfinished business to take care of next year. Some Republicans were pointing fingers as well.

"The breakdown of regular order this cycle — indeed the failure to get our bills done — should be squarely placed at the feet of the departing Senate majority leader who failed to schedule floor time for the consideration of appropriations bills," Representative Jerry Lewis, Republican of California and the departing chairman of the Appropriations Committee, said in an unusual public attack on a fellow Republican.

As they plowed through legislation in the early morning, Congress also whisked through a package of three major health care initiatives that continued a program for H.I.V. and AIDS that will provide more than $6 billion for care over three years, created an agency to centralize efforts against bioterrorism and restructured the National Institutes of Health.

"Tonight, Congress put partisanship aside to do the right thing for the health of millions of Americans," said Senator Edward M. Kennedy, Democrat of Massachusetts, who helped squeeze through the health legislation.

With approval by the House before it adjourned at 3:15 a.m., Congress also gave the first overhaul in years to fisheries laws, trying to limit overfishing of certain species. "By passing this bill, Congress has agreed that the threats facing our oceans are too great to wait another year," Matt Rand of the National Environmental Trust said.

Congress also adopted a measure intended to strengthen the ability to predict tsunamis. Lawmakers approved the first reorganization of the Postal Service in more than 30 years and sent Mr. Bush an agreement allowing the United States to share civilian nuclear technology with India. And Congress passed a bill to make obtaining personal telephone records without permission a federal crime.

Mr. Bush, who signed the stopgap spending legislation early Saturday, praised Congress for delivering the last batch of bills, singling out the oil drilling, AIDS assistance and fisheries legislation, as well as the nuclear agreement with India and the elevated trade status for Vietnam.

"The American people welcome the remarkable transformation and economic progress in Vietnam, and we will continue to work together to strengthen our ties," said Mr. Bush, who made his first visit to Vietnam last month.

But even as he complimented the old Congress, the president may have to brace for a different relationship with the new one.

In the Democratic radio address broadcast Saturday, Representative Silvestre Reyes of Texas, who will be the chairman of the Select Committee on Intelligence in January, promised intense scrutiny of the president's policies regarding Iraq.

"I intend to focus on oversight, holding administration officials accountable to the American people," Mr. Reyes said. "Oversight need not be partisan, and under my leadership, it won't be. It will be bipartisan, focused and serious."

Even though Republicans took all the Congressional losses in November, conservative Republicans helped block a proposal to pay a total of about $10 million in severance to hundreds of senior committee and leadership aides who will lose their jobs when the changeover shrinks the Republican payroll. Critics said the severance was too generous.

Lawmakers will return to a changed world in January, and they acknowledge it will take some getting used to.

"John McCain told me they don't know they've lost yet and we don't know we've won," Senator Kennedy said.

But as he left the Senate chamber in the early morning, Senator Mel Martinez, Republican of Florida, appeared to know who was up and who was down, acknowledging a greeting as "Mr. Chairman," reflecting his new position leading the Republican National Committee.

"I'm the only guy who is going to be called that next year in my caucus," Mr. Martinez said, because the top Congressional committee posts will soon be in the hands of Democrats.

House Approves Overhaul Of Rules For Fisheries (WP)

By Juliet Eilperin

Congress yesterday passed the broadest overhaul of the rules that govern the U.S. fishing industry in a decade, with provisions instructing fishery managers to adhere strictly to scientific advice so as not to deplete the ocean.

The final language of the Magnuson-Stevens Act, which passed the Senate on Thursday and the House early yesterday, was a compromise between environmentalists and fishing interests. The measure mandates an end to overfishing of depleted species within 2 1/2 years and allows the selling and trading of shares in a fishery to promote conservation.

"This clearly acknowledges the problems we face and reflects a realization by lawmakers that we can't continue to postpone dealing with overfishing and the destruction of marine habitat," said Josh Reichert, head of the Pew Charitable Trust's environmental program.

Commercial fishing interests, Bush administration officials and GOP lawmakers also praised the legislation.

"Fishermen and conservationists are all getting something they can be proud of in this bill, and they can rest assured that this bill maintains a critical balance in fisheries management," said House Resources Committee Chairman Richard W. Pombo (R-Calif.). "While it is important to protect our nation's fish stocks, it's equally important to protect our nation's vital and deep-rooted fishing communities. This bill does just that."

Jim Gilmore, spokesman for the At-Sea Processors Association, said the bill "has important conservation measures for promoting sustainable fisheries nationwide," adding: "For us it's a great thing to have catch limits in every fishery." The organization represents Alaska pollock and Pacific whiting fishermen who land 20 percent of the U.S. catch.

Lawmakers cut some deals to pass the measure, including language that will extend a 10-year rebuilding plan for summer flounder in the Northeast to 13 years, which will allow recreational and commercial fishermen to catch more flounder. Federal officials had set the 2007 summer flounder catch at 5 million pounds; under the new law, next year's catch will be 17.1 million pounds.

"This is a big help," said Rep. Jim Saxton (R-N.J.), whose state boasts a major summer flounder fishery. Saxton said lawmakers were able to make last-minute concessions because they were eager to reach agreement before Congress adjourned for the year. "We knew some economic hardships were unnecessarily going to take place if we didn't accomplish this."

But those compromises angered Michael Hirschfeld, chief scientist for the advocacy group Oceana.

"We're disappointed because we really do see this as an opportunity missed," Hirschfeld said, adding that he hopes federal officials will manage fish "in a way to make sure that there's enough resources for the whole ecosystem, not just us."

While much of the bill focuses on tightening the 30-year-old fisheries law, it also endorses for the first time creation of "limited access privilege programs" allowing groups or individuals to trade shares of a fishery's overall catch.

"It's a groundbreaking piece of legislation that gives an unambiguous green light for a cap-and-trade program for fish," said David Festa, who directs the oceans program for the advocacy group Environmental Defense.

Bush, who vowed earlier this year to end overfishing before leaving office, is prepared to sign the bill into law.

"We believe that this legislation is an important step for the United States to rebuild our nation's fisheries and will allow our fishers to utilize all of the tools that are available so their fishing businesses can operate safely and economically," said Bill Hogarth, director of the National Marine Fisheries Service.

Bush Lauds Bill To Overhaul Fisheries (AP)

By Matthew Daly

AP, December 9, 2006

WASHINGTON -- President Bush said Saturday the country is committed to ensuring strong commercial and recreational fishing, praising legislation that overhauls management of marine fisheries and strengthens protections against further depleting dwindling stocks.

The measure passed early Saturday requires the use of annual catch limits and enhances the authority of eight regional fishery management councils.

The bill reauthorizes the Magnuson-Stevens Fishery Conservation and Management Act through 2013. The 30-year-old law is the main law guiding fishery management in waters between three miles and 200 miles offshore.

"This bill embraces my priorities of ending overfishing and rebuilding our nation's fish stocks through more effective, market-based management and tougher enforcement," Bush said in a statement Saturday.

He said the measure offers stronger tools "to achieve progress internationally to ensure healthy fish stocks, promote better management, and halt destructive fishing practices based on sound science."

Supporters said the bill would strengthen current law by requiring an end to overfishing, science-based management of U.S. fisheries and penalties for illegal fishing in international waters.

"Our oceans are in serious trouble and this legislation will help to reverse their decline," said Sarah Chasis, director of the Oceans Initiative for the Natural Resources Defense Council.

She and other environmentalists hailed a provision that sets overall limits on the number of fish that can be caught, while allowing fishermen flexibility in how they divide up shares of the total catch.

"We are pleased that the bill includes provisions to strengthen the use of science in the fishery management process, end overfishing and rebuild overfished stocks," said David Hoskins, vice president of The Ocean Conservancy.

Sen. Olympia Snowe, R-Maine, who heads the subcommittee that oversees the nation's fisheries, said the bill would provide an economic lifeline to fishermen while ensuring a secure supply of fish.

"This legislation is not a perfect solution, but I believe we have struck an appropriate balance between preserving the marine resources of our coastal communities with these fisheries management tools," she said.

Bush said the U.S. "is committed to maintaining our thriving commercial and recreational fishing communities."

Sen. Ted Stevens, R-Alaska, who led efforts to update the law that bears his name, said lawmakers had heeded a call by Bush to end overfishing. Bush, in a speech this fall, urged Congress to reauthorize the fishing law and called overfishing harmful to the United States and the world.

"This legislation is important to sustaining and conserving our nation's fisheries for generations to come," Stevens said.

At the insistence of West Coast lawmakers, the bill includes language to speed recovery of Klamath River salmon stocks in California and Oregon. For fishermen adversely affected by recent closures aimed at protecting threatened fish, there would be disaster relief programs.

Congress Wraps Up With A Barrage Of Bills (LAT/AP)

The Los Angeles Times, December 10, 2006

WASHINGTON — The 109th session of Congress, frustrated by partisanship and criticized for its meager record of accomplishment, ended with a flurry of bill passings early Saturday.

In the long final day, ending about 4:40 a.m. in the Senate, the two chambers passed a massive tax and trade bill, prevented the government from shutting down and approved dozens of other bills.

They included an important fisheries management measure; a bill allowing civilian nuclear technology transfers to India; and bills to fund programs to combat AIDS, pandemic diseases and premature births.

The fisheries measure reauthorizes the Magnuson-Stevens Fishery Conservation and Management Act through 2013. The 30-year-old law is the main law guiding fishery management in waters between three miles and 200 miles offshore.

In a statement Saturday, President Bush said the legislation offered stronger tools "to achieve progress internationally to ensure healthy fish stocks, promote better management and halt destructive fishing practices based on sound science."

The tax measure revived some 20 tax breaks, at a cost of $38 billion over five years, and a dozen credits promoting alternative and efficient uses of energy.

It extended through 2007 a deduction for research and development initiatives, and renewed deductions of up to $4,000 for higher-education costs. There were breaks for teachers who pay for supplies out of pocket and for taxpayers in nine states with no income taxes — allowing them to deduct state and local sales taxes.

The popular tax breaks became a magnet for contentious and expensive bills. The package included legislation to open up 8.3 million acres in the Gulf of Mexico to oil and gas drilling and to prevent a 5% cut in Medicare payments to doctors from taking effect Jan. 1. The GOP-crafted solution to the problem was criticized as an accounting gimmick because it would double the cost of fixing the problem again next year.

The legislation also contained measures to permanently normalize trade with Vietnam and extend trade benefits for four Andean nations, sub-Saharan African countries and Haiti. The Haiti act was the toughest to swallow for some lawmakers from the South; they said it would further erode jobs in their states' textile industries.

As one of its final acts, Congress approved a stopgap measure keeping federal programs running at or slightly below current levels through Feb. 15. Bush signed it Saturday.

The action was necessary because lawmakers failed to pass the annual spending bills covering the budget year that began Oct. 1, except those dealing with defense and homeland security.

Democrats, who will be in the majority when the new session of Congress convenes in January, pointed out that the House met 102 days this session, fewer than the 110 days of the maligned "do-nothing" Congress of the Truman presidency.

Texans Win With Congress' Tax Bill (HC)

By David Ivanovich, Michelle Mittelstadt

Houston Chronicle, December 10, 2006

WASHINGTON — Lawmakers closed the curtain on the 109th Congress early today, but not before helping Texans avoid some pain on April 15 and granting oil and gas companies access to new areas of the Gulf of Mexico.

In a final, marathon session, the Republican-led Senate, by a vote of 79-9, signed off on a broad tax and trade package which extends a popular deduction for Texas taxpayers and opened some 8.3 million acres of the eastern Gulf for exploration.

"Just when everyone bet against us, Republicans put together a broad package of energy, tax, trade and health care measures," said outgoing Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn.

The $38 billion tax package will save Texans an estimated $1 billion this year, by allowing them to continue deducting local and state sales taxes on their federal returns.

Overcoming a flurry of last-minute objections from lawmakers over textiles and timber imports, the bill extends a tax break for school teachers and halts a scheduled cut in reimbursement rates for doctors who treat Medicare patients.

For residents in Texas and six other states without state income taxes, the bill ensures taxpayers who itemize will be able to deduct state and local sales taxes on their federal income tax forms, for tax years 2006 and 2007.

The tax break, which will cost the Treasury $5.5 billion, will allow Texans to keep $2 billion over the next two years.

This provision was an effort to approximate the benefit enjoyed by taxpayers in other states, who can deduct their state income taxes.

"All Americans should be treated equally and given the opportunity to deduct their state taxes, regardless of how those levies are assessed," Texas Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison said.

The bill also tries to address concerns about high fuel and home heating bills by opening up an area believed to hold upwards of 1.26 billion barrels of oil and 5.8 trillion cubic feet of natural gas.

That volume of crude is comparable to half the nation's annual domestic production, supporter say, while the natural gas being made available could heat and cool 6 million homes for 15 years.

The GOP-controlled House had favored a more expansive offshore drilling plan but Friday adopted this language for fear the measure would die in the Senate.

Just last year, lawmakers passed — and President Bush signed into law — a massive energy bill, but critics complained it did little to give oil and gas producers access to more domestic resources.

Industry groups have long complained high natural gas prices have not only been hurting consumers but also sending manufacturing jobs overseas, where gas prices are lower.

"For the first time, we've passed a production-oriented bill," said Sen. Pete Domenici, R-N.M., adding: "We've done something to produce natural gas and hold the price of natural gas where it is — or reduce it — because of the new supply.

"This one's a good one," Domenici said.

Bush, who is expected to sign the legislation, praised lawmakers for encouraging further drilling language.

"Developing these reliable domestic domestic resources in an environmentally sound manner will help address high energy prices, strengthen our energy security and protect manufacturing jobs," he said.

Chemical makers, who use vast quantities of natural gas to churn out plastics and petrochemicals, have been especially hard-hit.

"Today's historic action is an enormous victory in the fight against a six-year-old natural gas crisis that's been killing American jobs, making the United States less competitive with other nations and costing households across the nation more for home heating and electricity," Jack Gerard, president of the American Chemistry Council, said in a prepared statement.

Environmental groups, however, fear continued drilling will harm the nation's coastline and exacerbate the nation's dependence on fossil fuels.

"Unfortunately, passing a bill that benefits the oil and gas industry is a fitting way to close the door on this Congress," Sierra Club Executive Director Carl Pope said in a statement. "Let's hope this is Congress' one last fling with Big Oil and that we can make a fresh start to achieving true energy security with the new year and the new Congress. "

Democrats will take control of Capitol Hill next year and already have signaled little interest in promoting further oil and drilling.

The bill also will compensate Texas and other Gulf producing states for bearing the brunt of the nation's offshore drilling activity by providing new money for coastal restoration projects.

The legislation calls for turning over 37.5 percent of federal revenues generated by production in these new areas. Then, in 2017, the four Gulf producing states would collect 37.5 percent of the revenues from all new leases in the Gulf.

Texas is expected to collect somewhere between $25 million and $64 million over the next years from this revenue-sharing formula, according to staffers with Sen. Mary Landrieu, D-La., the champion of the provision.

Democrats Have Plans, But They'll Need To Pay (LAT)

By Joel Havemann

The Los Angeles Times, December 10, 2006

WASHINGTON — After being out of power for 12 years, Democrats will take control of Congress next month with a wish list of new programs, including more money for college student aid, the No Child Left Behind schools initiative and Medicare prescription drug benefits — plus tax relief for middle-income Americans.

But there's a hitch: The Democrats also have promised to restore fiscal responsibility and not increase the federal deficit.

"The debt is spiraling out of control," Sen. Kent Conrad (D-N.D.), incoming chairman of the Senate Budget Committee, said last month. "The needs and wants are limitless, but our power to meet them is highly limited."

Democrats' expansive vision of the government's role in American life is on a collision course with budget deficits that are already running about $250 billion a year. The Concord Coalition, a lobby for fiscal responsibility, warns that the deficit could reach $800 billion in 10 years if Congress enacts all the programs its members are talking about.

In the education budget, for example, some leading Democrats have discussed cutting the interest rate on federally subsidized student loans in half — boosting the federal interest subsidy by an estimated $18 billion over five years — plus increasing Pell Grants for college students by 25% and raising funding for the No Child Left Behind program by as much as $16 billion.

Among all the spending initiatives being discussed on Capitol Hill, perhaps none would cost so much so soon as closing the "doughnut hole" in the new Medicare prescription drug program. This refers to the fact that after beneficiaries buy $2,250 worth of drugs a year with federal help, they get no more subsidy until they have spent another $2,850 out of their own pockets. Having the federal government pick up those expenses would cost the Treasury an estimated $50 billion a year for the first 10 years.

Lawmakers of both parties want to provide relief to the growing number of middle-income taxpayers subject to the alternative minimum tax, designed in the 1960s to prevent the wealthiest taxpayers from paying next to no income taxes. Raising the income thresholds for the alternative tax would exempt more middle-income taxpayers, but could also cost the Treasury an estimated $40 billion to $80 billion a year over the next 10 years.

"The question is, which will win out — the people with political agendas or those with budget discipline," said Robert Bixby, the Concord Coalition's executive director. "In my experience, fiscal discipline usually comes out second.

"What is different this year," he added, "is that the Democrats made a big deal out of budget discipline. They'll look pretty silly if they abandon it."

Here are some of the options Congress has:

Pay-as-you-go

The foremost money-saver proposed by Rep. Nancy Pelosi of San Francisco, the next Speaker of the House, is a "pay-as-you-go" rule requiring that any legislation to cut taxes or increase spending include offsets that would keep the deficit from growing. "Offsets" is a neutral way of saying tax increases or spending cuts. A form of paygo, as pay-as-you-go is known, was the law from 1990 through 2002. Every year the White House toted up the impact of legislation on the deficit; if the effect had been to make the deficit larger, compensating across-the-board spending cuts would have been ordered.

The drawback: The problem with paygo is that it is easily circumvented, which is exactly what has happened in the past. In the last three years of the Clinton administration — an era of budget surpluses — appropriations bills that would have violated paygo carried provisions exempting them. In 2001, when the first round of President Bush's tax cuts would have required huge spending cuts, Congress again waived paygo's strictures.

Put a cap on spending

Congress could also impose caps on spending for programs over which it exercises year-to-year control. The Senate used spending caps in concert with paygo until it expired in 2002. The cap was usually a single dollar amount that limited all "discretionary" spending in annual appropriations bills for a host of programs, including abandoned mine reclamation and the Yucca Mountain nuclear waste repository.

Democratic leaders have not decided whether to support such caps, but the moderate-to-conservative Blue Dog Democrats, who hold the balance of power in the House, are in favor of them.

The drawback: Spending caps don't apply to giant benefit programs such as Social Security and Medicare, and so they cover only about one-third of all federal spending, limiting their impact on the overall budget. Under spending caps, Congress would have to focus its "discipline" on the non-defense, discretionary portion of the budget.

While non-defense discretionary spending has risen by only about 4% a year during the Bush presidency after adjustment for inflation, defense spending has increased by about 10% a year. Outlays for Social Security and Medicare have grown by more than 5% a year and are on course to grow much faster as the baby boom generation reaches retirement age.

Collect taxes owed

One revenue-raising scheme that enjoys bipartisan support is closing the "tax gap" — the taxes that Americans owe but don't pay on time, if at all. The IRS estimated this year that the tax gap in 2001 — even after late payments, many resulting from IRS audits — was a breathtaking $290 billion, more than the entire federal deficit.

"Closing the tax gap has got to be one of our top priorities," said Conrad, who plans to hold hearings on how to narrow the budget deficit.

The drawback: Collecting overdue taxes may be easier said than done. For one, some of that money is owed by people who have no resources to pay it.

And a large share — nearly half — represents taxes owed on business income, which is difficult for the IRS to identify, much less collect. That's because, unlike wage income, which is reported to the IRS by the taxpayer's employer, the government gets no independent confirmation of much business income.

Raise taxes

The more direct way to pay for new programs is simply to raise tax rates or end tax breaks.

Pelosi's agenda includes scaling back the federal subsidies and tax breaks enjoyed by the big oil companies at a time when the sector's profits quadrupled between 2002 and 2005. And she would correct an Interior Department oversight in the late 1990s that allows the oil companies to drill for oil offshore without paying royalties to the government no matter how high the price of oil rises.

At the top of Sen. Edward M. Kennedy's (D-Mass.) list are millionaires, who he says have benefited disproportionately from the Bush tax cuts. When asked by reporters how he would pay for his wish list of social programs, he said he would leave the middle class alone but could support a millionaires' tax.

The drawback: Any proposed tax increase is both an economic and political risk. Republicans — and some Democrats — can be expected to resist mightily; the Bush administration argues that any tax hike would jeopardize the economic growth that began when the 2001 recession ended. More than that, raising taxes could alienate voters.

Save on Medicare drugs

Democrats have called for changes in Medicare that would allow it to negotiate lower prices with the manufacturers of the prescription drugs subsidized by Medicare's new drug program. Kennedy said Medicare could save $140 billion over 10 years if it negotiated drug prices the way the Veterans Affairs Department does.

The drawback: Some question whether that much savings could be carved out of Medicare drug purchases. The Bush administration notes that the insurance companies that operate the drug program already negotiate low prices with the drug makers.

And the comparison with the VA may not apply because Medicare offers a much greater choice of drugs than the VA does, forcing its costs higher.

Democrats May Give Alternative Energy A New Push (NYT)

By Norm Alster

The New York Times, December 10, 2006

THE fortunes of alternative energy companies have been linked to two factors outside their control: oil prices and politics.

Rising oil prices have moved in the companies' favor over the last few years, making the price of producing energy from wind, solar, geothermal or organic sources more competitive.

Now some analysts and money managers are hoping the imminent Democratic takeover of Congress will also be bullish for alternative energy stocks by improving prospects for favorable legislation for the industry.

One likely initiative, known as a national renewable portfolio standard, would require utilities to derive 10 percent of their electricity output from renewable sources by 2020. Currently, less than 3 percent of electricity is generated from such sources. Senator Jeff Bingaman, Democrat of New Mexico, the presumptive chairman of the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee, says he hopes to pass "some version" of a renewable portfolio standard in the next Congress.

The details of such legislation — as well as whether it would be approved by Congress and signed by President Bush — are very much uncertain. But that hasn't stopped investors from placing their bets.

Democrats may be in the forefront, but they aren't the only ones to jump on the alternative energy bandwagon, said Randy Gwirtzman, a research analyst at Baron Capital, which is based in New York. "Both sides of the aisle have shown they're in favor of alternative energy sources," he said.

Senator Jeff Sessions, Republican of Alabama, for example, is concerned about the nation's reliance on imported oil. "With the surging prices of oil," he said, "there's a strong feeling among Republicans that our economy and national security can be damaged if we don't decrease our dependency."

Mr. Gwirtzman recommends shares of SunPower, which he said has a highly competitive solar-cell product line that is well positioned to benefit from a more sympathetic Congress. Stuart Bush, technology analyst at RBC Capital Markets based in Austin, Tex., also likes SunPower, which is a spin-off of Cypress Semiconductor. Mr. Bush says SunPower solar cells are more efficient than the industry average in converting solar energy into electricity. Unlike many other alternative energy companies, SunPower already generates a small profit, and its revenue could reach $600 million next year and $1 billion in 2008, Mr. Bush said.

A renewable portfolio standard should help alternative energy move closer to parity with traditional energy sources, Mr. Bush said. "Each technology individually is on a path to reducing costs and achieving parity with traditional energy sources, some very dramatically. The wind industry is probably closest to achieving economic viability without any support" from the federal government.

One company he favors is Zoltek, which makes lightweight carbon-fiber blades for wind turbines.

Zoltek could also be helped by a longer extension of federal renewable energy tax credits, a legislative goal of wind-energy lobbyists. The production tax credits, which reward electricity producers for each kilowatt of energy they generate from renewable sources, are scheduled to expire next year. In the past, the credits have typically been extended for two years at a time, which the wind-energy industry maintains is too short a period to stimulate long-term investment.

Democrats will support a longer extension, Senator Bingaman said. "Clearly, we do need to extend those tax credits that relate to renewable energy, and we need to do so for a longer period," he said.

A consensus on alternative energy is perhaps closest in biofuels, which have the support of many Republicans, particularly from farm belt and southern states. "I do think we need to increase the use of biofuels as much and as quickly as possible," Senator Sessions said.

He said he favors increased research support for cellulosic ethanol — ethanol produced from plant matter — along with government aid to test production of the fuel. The Bush administration is soon expected to outline a plan to aid cellulosic development.

Matthew W. Patsky, co-portfolio manager of the Winslow Green Growth fund in Boston, said that of all the alternative energy technologies, "cellulosic ethanol has the greatest upside." But he added that it was hard to identify worthwhile investments. "I don't know who's going to win," he said, because, at the moment, it is too costly to producing cellulosic ethanol.

In the meantime, most ethanol in the United States will be derived from corn, and Democrats in Congress plan several initiatives that would help the growing roster of publicly traded corn ethanol producers like Archer Daniels Midland, Aventine Renewable Energy, The Andersons, VeraSun Energy and Pacific Ethanol.

In a position paper on energy, the Democrats set a goal of having ethanol available at 10 percent of domestic gas stations by 2015, along with a mandate that would require automakers to increase production of vehicles that can run on either gasoline or an 85 percent ethanol mix. Such a mandate is necessary to push major oil companies that own many gas stations to install ethanol pumps, said Senator Charles E. Schumer, Democrat of New York. "We believe we have to push the country into alternative fuels whether the oil companies like it or not," he said.

But corn ethanol investments are risky because producers remain hostage to both rising corn prices and falling gas prices. A "sliding credit" that increases ethanol subsidies as gas prices fall "is the type of thing that has to be looked at," Senator Schumer said.

Still, oil and gas prices are likely to rise over the long term, with increased demand from China, India and other developing countries, he added. "Even if oil goes down $10, the price is still high enough for alternative energy to compete," he said. "Alternative fuels are viable with oil at $50 a barrel."

Senator Bingaman said he hopes to tighten standards on carbon emissions from coal-burning utilities by instituting a nationwide cap, along with "a market-based system for emitters to buy allowances to emit and trade allowances to emit."

Headwaters, a company based in South Jordan, Utah, that has technologies that treat coal to reduce sulfur, nitrous oxide and mercury emissions, stands to benefit from caps, Mr. Bush of RBC Capital said. He has a "high 30s" target for Headwaters shares, which now trade at around $24. The White House has opposed strict emission caps in the past, but opposition may be more muted this time around, the RBC Capital analyst said.

INVESTORS in alternative energy may also get help from the states. New Democratic governors in Massachusetts and Ohio are expected to join an alliance of Northeastern states that has pushed to tighten emission standards for coal-fired plants, Mr. Patsky said. One beneficiary might be Fuel Tech, which sells systems that reduce such emissions, he said. The stock is up more than 170 percent this year. It closed on Friday at $24.90, but Mr. Patsky said it could rise to $35 or $40 within a year.

Some states may also move to impose "green" building standards, Mr. Patsky said. Beneficiaries may include Interface, which makes synthetic carpets from recycled plastics, and Herman Miller, which makes extensive use of recycled materials in its office furniture.

The re-election of Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger of California on an enthusiastically pro-environment platform could encourage other states to pass green legislation, Mr. Patsky said. “That single state alone could have tremendous impact.”

Open Up (WP)

The Washington Post, December 10, 2006

MEMBERS OF the newly elected Prince George's County Board of Education should be commended for aiming to be agreeable and cooperative. It's similarly encouraging that incoming Senate Majority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) wants to minimize "partisanship and gridlock." But if the only way these officials know to make nice is to do it in secret, they're missing the point.

Consider the charade that constituted the school board's election of officers last week. As reported by The Post's Nelson Hernandez, the elevation to chairman and vice chairman of R. Owen Johnson Jr. (District 5) and Verjeana M. Jacobs (At Large) was worked out behind closed doors hours before the public vote. Instead of debate and discussion, the public was presented with a done deal.

Mr. Johnson and Ms. Jacobs are proven leaders, and it's encouraging that this board is mindful of the history of acrimony that made the last elected school board so ineffective, ultimately leading to its abolition. But good government rests on the public's ability to witness how public business is conducted. In this case, the people of Prince George's were entitled to hear why these two officials were deemed best suited to lead the board in the coming year and to hear any contrary arguments.

Mr. Reid says he plans to open the 110th Congress with a closed gathering of all 100 senators. We're all for senators getting to know each other. But when they meet as the Senate, it should be in public. Reducing gridlock depends on more senators putting the public good ahead of the two-year electoral cycle, not on cooking up more deals behind closed doors.

The excuses for secrecy aren't always the same. Mr. Reid seems to be worried that the inflamed bases of each party might not tolerate public displays of bipartisanship. Prince George's officials, like D.C. Council members who have bottled up a badly needed open-meetings law, worry that public discussion becomes disingenuous and policymaking is cramped. But openness is hardly a revolutionary concept. A lot of jurisdictions across this country have opened their processes to public review. Maybe officials choose their words with a little more care, but there is still debate and compromise, disagreement and agreement, and government goes on. Anything less is an admission that public officials really can't be believed when they are in the public eye.

Incoming D.C. Council Chair Vincent C. Gray (D) is now mulling his council priorities; bringing sunshine to the decisions and deliberations of D.C. government should be at the top of his list. The Prince George's school board shouldn't be embarrassed to thrash out its disagreements before its employers -- the public, that is. And Mr. Reid ought to set a better example. As Lucy Dalglish of the Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press said, "the only way to restore public trust in what the Congress is up to is have more transparency," not less.

Poor Bush Had A Week That Reeked (NYDN)

By Thomas M. DeFrank

New York Daily News, December 10, 2006

WASHINGTON - For a wounded President locked in a lethal downward spiral ever since his reelection, it was the cruelest week of all.

Not since Bill Clinton forlornly insisted that "the President is still relevant" after being trounced in the 1994 mid-term elections has a President struggled so hard to salvage his political traction.

In 72 hours last week, a bipartisan commission harshly repudiated Bush's Iraq policy. Incoming Secretary of Defense Robert Gates told senators the U.S. isn't winning the war. Then a British journalist snarkily asked at a White House press conference if Bush weren't "in denial" about Iraq.

For good measure, a new poll found only 27% of Americans back his Iraq policy, a new low. And a moderate GOP senator termed the policy "absurd" and possibly criminal.

"He'll be fine but he can't be doing very good," said a well-placed Bush source who talks with the President often. "It's been a terrible year, and it keeps getting worse."

Yet Bush is described by another recent visitor as still resolutely defiant, convinced history will ultimately vindicate him.

"I'll be dead when they get it right," he said during an Oval Office meeting last week.

Another Bush confidant, however, says the President reluctantly understands an Iraq course correction is mandatory:

"He is determined not to let Iraq go up in smoke and start a slaughter. But he knows something's got to give here. It just has to. We're going to start a pullout. The only question is when."

Despite the Democratic takeover of Capitol Hill and the steady cavalcade of grim news from Iraq, White House chief of staff Josh Bolten and political guru Karl Rove are busily overseeing Bush's State of the Union address, scheduled for Jan. 23.

Outside Republican sources report that except for isolated pockets of realism, the West Wing bunker hasn't yet absorbed Bush's diminished power.

"The White House is totally constipated," a former aide complained. "There's not enough adult leadership, and the 30-year-olds still think it's 2000 and they're riding high."

One White House assistant insisted to a friend last week that the election was merely a repudiation of Bush's execution, not his policies.

"They don't get it," a GOP mandarin snapped. "The Iraq report was their brass ring to pivot and salvage the last two years, and they didn't grab it."

Even if the chaos in Iraq subsides, prospects for other Bush accomplishments in the twilight of his term are difficult at best.

"Short of doing something on Iraq, there's not much good he can do anymore," a key Bush adviser conceded.

A senior Republican official who enjoys excellent relations with the White House was even more downbeat.

"We will get an immigration bill, and the President will make a valiant but doomed attempt at entitlement reform," he said. "But we are looking at two frustrating years of gridlock and several foreign policy failures."

Disputed Nominee Myers Has An Abramoff Problem (LAT)

By Henry Weinstein

The Los Angeles Times, December 10, 2006

Five years ago, high-powered Washington lobbyist Jack Abramoff went to a dinner with top officials of the Interior Department, representatives of the White House and leaders of the National Mining Assn.

That Georgetown dinner has now come back to haunt one of the guests — William G. Myers III, who was the Interior Department's top lawyer at the time and for the last three years one of President Bush's most controversial nominees for a federal judgeship.

Last week, Myers was asked to explain why he testified earlier to the Senate Judiciary Committee that he had never met Abramoff.

Virtually every major environmental group in the country as well as civil rights, women's, labor and American Indian organizations have vigorously opposed Myers' nomination to the U.S. 9th Circuit Court of Appeals. Senate Democrats have succeeded in blocking his appointment, saying they feared Myers, who has spent much of his career as a lawyer and lobbyist for mining and grazing interests, would be an anti-environmental activist on the bench.

Myers' backers counter that he would bring balance to the 9th Circuit, which they maintain is too liberal.

Immediately after the November midterm election, Bush announced his intention to renominate Myers — who now practices law in Boise, Idaho — to the San Francisco-based court.

In recent days though, questions have arisen about Myers' March 2005 response to a query by Sen. Patrick J. Leahy of Vermont, the ranking Democratic on the judiciary committee. Leahy asked Myers whether he had ever had any contact with Abramoff, then the subject of intense federal investigations who later pleaded guilty to conspiracy and wire fraud and is serving 70 months in prison.

"I have searched my memory and files," Myers responded. "To the best of my recollection, I have never had any contact with Mr. Abramoff. I do not recall ever meeting him, speaking to him by phone, corresponding with him at any time, or otherwise having any contact with Mr. Abramoff."

DOJ_NMG_0104753

A week ago, however, the Denver Post published a story based on information obtained under the Freedom of Information Act showing that Myers was among two dozen people attending the dinner on Sept. 24, 2001, with Abramoff. Sponsored by the Council of Republicans for Environmental Advocacy, the event was held at the home of Republican fundraiser Julie Finley.

On Tuesday, Leahy asked Myers in writing to explain the "discrepancy between your testimony to the Judiciary Committee and the documents obtained by the Denver Post."

Myers sent a written response to Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), outgoing chairman of the judiciary committee, saying, "I simply have no recollection of encountering Mr. Abramoff at the event. I did not know him or who he was. Nor do I have any recollection of meeting him after the event."

On Friday, Leahy said on the Senate floor that the Post story remained "unrefuted and unexplained." Leahy, who is set to become chairman of the judiciary committee in January, said Bush had "squandered an opportunity to fill Idaho's vacancy on the 9th Circuit" by renominating Myers.

Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.), who has opposed Myers' bid for a judgeship on the grounds that he lacks the necessary qualifications and independence, was more pointed. "The revelation that Mr. Myers gave seemingly misleading responses to the judiciary committee about his contact with Jack Abramoff raises yet another question about his nomination," Feinstein said.

"In light of the many concerns about Mr. Myers' fitness to serve on the second highest court in the nation and the bipartisan Senate opposition to Mr. Myers' nomination, I hope that the president will choose not to renominate Mr. Myers in the 110th Congress," Feinstein added.

But Blair Jones, a White House spokesman, said the president had no intention of withdrawing the nomination. "We believe that Mr. Myers is well-qualified, and we look forward to his confirmation," Jones said Friday afternoon

Representatives of environmental groups and Indian tribes said the latest revelations heightened their concerns about Myers.

Among their earlier concerns: Myers' role in promoting a proposed 1,600-acre open-pit gold mine that would be adjacent to federally designated wilderness in Imperial County. The area contains 55 recorded historic properties eligible for listing on the National Register of Historic Places, as well as religious sites, including prayer circles, ceremonial places, shrines and petroglyphs. While serving as the top lawyer at the Interior Department, Myers supported development of the mining operation by Glamis Gold Ltd. of Canada.

Attorney Courtney A. Coyle, who represents the Quechan tribe, said in a telephone interview last week that the new documents showed that Myers was at the Sept. 24, 2001, dinner — whose guests included Interior Secretary Gale A. Norton and top leaders of the National Mining Assn. who supported the Glamis project — and that he met the next day with Interior Department lawyers to discuss the project.

In October 2001, Myers reversed his predecessor's opinion to block the Glamis project and allowed it to move forward.

Two years later, a federal judge in Washington, D.C., ruled that Myers had "misconstrued the clear mandate" of the Federal Lands Policy Management Act, which "by its plain terms, vests the secretary of the Interior with the authority — and indeed the obligation — to disapprove" mines that "would unduly harm or degrade the public land."

Cardin Is Learning The Ropes, His Role (WP)

By Matthew Mosk

The Washington Post, December 10, 2006

Congressman Benjamin L. Cardin had only just stepped onto the U.S. Senate floor this month -- his first visit to the august chamber since this fall's election -- when he instinctively pulled out his cellphone.

Before it reached his ear, Cardin says he felt a sharp jab from Sen. Barbara A. Mikulski (D-Md.), who snapped, "Don't you dare!"

After 20 years in the nation's lower chamber, and 20 more as speaker of the Maryland House of Delegates, Cardin (D) is still adjusting to the peculiar customs of his new job. But in the unmarked basement warren of transition offices for new members, the soon-to-be junior senator from Maryland said he is brimming with plans.

"I'm not coming to the Senate to retire," said Cardin, 63, when asked about the charge that his Republican opponent, Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele, frequently leveled during a year of campaigning. "I'm going to be very busy. And I won't waste a minute."

The man who once advised freshman House members to zero in on one or two subject areas and develop a specialty, quickly discovered that he would have to abandon that approach after two decades as one of the House's experts on health-care and pension matters. He served on one panel: the powerful Ways and Means Committee.

When Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.), who will become Senate majority leader next month, called Cardin shortly before the election to ask what committees might interest him, Cardin said his answer was Finance, where such matters are often deliberated.

"He said, 'Not gonna happen,' " Cardin said, laughing.

Instead, Cardin will find himself in the thick of deliberations over the Iraq war as a member of the Foreign Relations Committee and will serve on panels that deal with the budget, the environment, minority business and judicial appointments. When he rattled off the list of committees during an interview last week, Cardin paused at the thought of it. "I'm wondering how I'm going to be on five committees," he mused.

James A. Thurber, director of the Center for Congressional and Presidential Studies at American University, said Cardin will see a "significant difference" as he switches chambers. Serving on all those committees means that he will be able to range across a wide area, which he is likely to find liberating.

What he is not likely to be, Thurber said, is a headline-grabber -- perhaps in contrast with his Democratic colleague across the Potomac in Virginia, Sen.-elect James Webb, who quickly made waves.

Cardin said he didn't see the exchange between Webb and President Bush at a White House reception for freshman members of Congress. Bush asked, "How's your boy?" referring to Webb's son, a Marine serving in Iraq. After a brief exchange, Webb replied, "That's between me and my boy, Mr. President."

Cardin's exchange with the president that evening was "very friendly," he said. Bush ribbed him about his tough campaign against Steele, the GOP's candidate.

In the end, Maryland political observers from both parties said last week, Cardin is likely to become a natural successor to the man whose seat he will take, retiring Sen. Paul S. Sarbanes (D), a workhorse who shapes policy and legislation without much attention.

"He's a legislative workman," Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.), who will soon be House majority leader, said of Cardin. "When Ben hears a problem and hears testimony, he knows how to turn that into a legislative solution. In the Senate, that legislative skill, that problem-solving skill, will really be valued."

Big Names, Big Dollars In Bush Library Bid (HC)

By Thomas Korosec

Houston Chronicle, December 10, 2006

DALLAS — For a president, it's a place where his legacy is polished and set on display for posterity.

For the host town, a presidential library can mean an instant tourist attraction and a shot of economic vitality.

Three Texas universities are hoping to land the George W. Bush presidential library, and each is calling in its own heavy hitters and Bush backers to try to make the case.

Baylor touts its location, Southern Methodist University its personal ties and the University of Dallas its spacious site.

The president's library site-selection committee, which has been working entirely in private, could choose a winner among the three finalists as early as next month.

SMU, Laura Bush's alma mater, has been widely considered the frontrunner since the first lady told the Houston Chronicle in a 2005 interview that the school is her sentimental favorite.

The president's wife, who sits on the SMU board, also indicated the Bushes are likely to re-establish a home in the Dallas area, where they lived before moving to Austin in 1995 when he became governor.

Giving the school another edge, White House counsel Harriet Miers, another SMU graduate, is among the close friends and advisers of the president who have been said to be participants in the decision.

Attempting perhaps to level the field, Baylor and the University of Dallas have enlisted their own prominent Bush supporters to make their pitches.

Houston Astros owner Drayton McLane, a Bush friend and Baylor alumnus, was recruited to head the school's presidential library steering committee.

The University of Dallas, meanwhile, brought along Bush supporter Nancy Cain Marcus when it presented the school's proposal to the selection committee in Washington last fall.

Big financial supportSMU has had some deep-pockets help as well. Dallas oilman Ray Hunt gave the school $35 million to buy a shopping center at a corner of the campus as a potential library site.

"You have all the key supporters lined up behind their pick of the three schools," said James "Skip" Rutherford, head of the William Jefferson Clinton Foundation and a key player in the building of the Clinton library in Little Rock, Ark.

"When one is picked, my sense is that they'll coalesce around whatever site President Bush decides on."

Presidential libraries are built by private donations but are run by the National Archives and Records Administration.

The bulk of private donations, which can be unlimited in size, typically comes from a president's loyal supporters, foundations and foreign governments, Rutherford said.

Bush's library, which could cost $200 million or more, is expected to include a library housing the president's papers and archives, a museum and a public policy think tank.

The institute, on the order of Stanford University's Hoover Institution, would perpetuate — some say burnish — Bush's legacy and promote his policies beyond his presidency.

Three strong proposalsRutherford, who has visited the three sites and consulted with the committee and schools, said all three proposals have strengths — and supporters who are ready to step in to make up for their possible weaknesses.

"It's truly a three-way contest," he said. "I told (Bush adviser) Karl Rove he has three good choices."

At Baylor in Waco, he said, the library would have the advantage of being "a big fish in a little pond" and the "top draw in the city."

The $165 million Clinton library drew 500,000 visitors in its first year and transformed a formerly rundown warehouse district in Little Rock by anchoring about $1 billion in new development, he said.

Waco, a city of 120,000, could be similarly transformed, Rutherford said.

Baylor and SMU didn't wait for the Bush committee's request for proposals before they began working to land the project. Both schools wrote letters of interest in hosting the library even before Bush won election in November 2000.

Tommy Lou Davis, Baylor's director of the library project, said the school is offering a 150-acre site "of naturally beautiful land on the banks of the Brazos River."

More than 30 million people a year pass by the location on Interstate 35, she said.

The school is pitching its proximity to the George H.W. Bush and Lyndon Johnson libraries in College Station and Austin, respectively, and the fact that the site is just 20 minutes from the president's ranch west of the city.

Davis said the city's civic and political establishment is lined up behind the school's bid. A local businessman, Clifton Robinson, has offered to finance the $6 million public share of a $35 million four-star hotel near the Bush complex if Baylor is selected.

New image wantedThe city's small size and its association with events such as the Branch Davidian siege and the 1953 tornado that devastated its downtown have tended to crop up in media accounts of the school's bid.

And in Waco, the unflattering portrayals rankle residents.

"I wish people would give us a break," Davis said. "I don't see anyone remembering that JFK was shot in Dallas, and that was after the tornado in Waco — if we're going to start drumming up all these old things."

SMU, whose staid Georgian-style campus takes up the southeast corner of wealthy University Park, has declined to make public any details of its library bid, including where on campus the library would be.

"We have presented options to the selection committee and not specified in public where those options are," said Brad Cheves, SMU's vice president for development and external affairs. "Of course, there is speculation."

Shopping center purchasedMost of the speculation centers on the southeastern portion of the campus, where the university has been buying property and where the Hunt gift was used to purchase the 4-acre Park Cities Plaza shopping center.

It is also adjacent to Central Expressway, which is the only access to the campus that does not involve Park Cities' already overburdened two-lane residential streets.

The university has been feverishly trying to remove obstacles to acquiring all the land in the densely developed area. It cleared one hurdle Friday when a federal judge ruled the university has proper title to a condominium it purchased last year.

Two condo owners who have refused to move out accused the university in civil lawsuits of using fraud and intimidation to take their property for what they said is clearly the library site.

"We think the lawsuit is without merit," Cheves said, adding that it has had no bearing on the university's proposal or a decision by the Bush site committee. "It is unrelated to the proposal process."

The university still must buy several other properties in the area. And acquisition of a strip of parkland behind the shopping center will require approval by University Park voters.

Some Dallas officials, including Mayor Laura Miller, have expressed concern that a heavily visited library at SMU will cause traffic nightmares in an already crowded area.

The university says those concerns are overstated.

"SMU has been in its location for more than 100 years, and we're accustomed to having special events and community activities," Cheves said. "This would be no different."

By contrast, the University of Dallas, which is west of the city in Irving, is offering the most spacious site.

Its hilly, wooded 300-acre site off Texas 114 has a view of downtown Dallas and easy access to the area's two commercial airports.

The city of Irving has proposed committing $50 million in hotel/motel taxes to construction of the library, which would be near Texas Stadium.

City officials expect the stadium to be torn down and the site redeveloped after the Dallas Cowboys move to Arlington in 2009.

With approximately 3,000 students, though, the Catholic liberal arts university has a much lower profile than its two bigger rivals.

Rutherford said vacationers traveling by car make up the bulk of visitors to the Clinton library and other presidential libraries across the country. The three finalists are all close to interstate highways, he pointed out.

Big crowds expectedGeneral attendance tends to spike in the opening year, and again upon the president's death, according to National Archives figures.

The Ronald Reagan hilltop library museum, which is in Simi Valley, Calif., west of Los Angeles, broke that mold when it added an Air Force One exhibit and attendance shot up to 440,000 in the 12 months ending in October, archives records show.

Regardless of which site is picked, Rutherford said he expects the Bush library will be a big draw.

"So much has happened during his presidency that people are going to want to know about," he said. "9/11, that was this generation's Pearl Harbor. There are so many major events: the Iraq war, Katrina, the tsunami. People will want to come to this library."

Discovery Takes Off On A Complex Mission (NYT)

By John Schwartz

CAPE CANAVERAL, Fla., Dec. 9 — Night became day on Saturday as the shuttle Discovery muscled its way off of the launching pad with a shuddering roar on a mission to rewire the International Space Station.

With a blinding streak of yellow flame that left a mark on the retina and a lump in the throat, the shuttle and its crew of seven astronauts lifted off at 8:47 p.m. in the program's first nighttime launching in more than four years.

It was the second launching attempt for the Discovery. Weather concerns forced mission managers to scrub on Thursday, and on Friday the forecast was even worse. Early Saturday, there were high crosswinds here at the John F. Kennedy Space Center landing strip.

But the winds died and the weather improved as the evening progressed, and the mission management team ultimately gave approval for launching.

Just before beginning the final countdown, the shuttle launching director, Michael D. Leinbach, polled his team and then called to the Discovery's commander, Mark L. Polansky, using his nickname.

"O.K., Roman, 48 hours makes a tremendous difference," Mr. Leinbach said. "The weather is outstanding, the vehicle is in great shape, so we wish you all good luck, Godspeed, and we'll see you back here in 12 days."

After liftoff, the firing room erupted in cheers and applause, and Mr. Leinbach said, "Calm down now, we've got eight minutes to orbit."

Those eight minutes passed with exceeding smoothness. The crew and the launching team calmly communicated the milestones of reaching orbit: the "go at throttle up" call about a minute into flight as the shuttle passed through the zone of maximum turbulence; the separation of the solid rocket boosters; the main engine cutoff; and the separation of the external tank. Discovery was well on its way to catching up with the space station on Monday.

Since the loss of the shuttle Columbia in 2003, liftoffs have taken place during the day so NASA analysts can look for the kind of liftoff debris that doomed that shuttle and its crew. This nighttime launching made it harder to make out any debris in the images from the camera on the shuttle's external fuel tank, but those images and data from radar and other sensors will be scrutinized for signs of damage to the craft. "We'll have lots of looks at it," said LeRoy Cain, the head of the launching mission management team.

The 12-day mission promises to be one of the most complex in the history of the shuttle program. The astronauts are to install a stubby extension to the station's structure and reconfigure its electrical system to receive power from new solar arrays.

The mission also includes a tricky effort to coax a solar array that has been standing atop the station for six years to fold itself into a more compact form, out of the way so that the new array can rotate to face the sun continuously.

The work will prepare the station to generate the power it will need for the next rounds of construction and expansion, and to meet the needs of a crew that will eventually double to six from three. Spacewalkers will unplug and reattach 112 power connectors in the process.

The rewiring is risky. Half of the space station's electrical system will be powered down as its wiring is reconfigured, and then brought up again. Then, in another spacewalk, the astronauts will shut down the other half of the station's electrical system. Crucial systems will remain online, since they can receive power from either power network. But some lights, communications systems and other components will be turned off during each of the two rewiring spacewalks, and mission managers have fretted about what might happen if those do not come back online.

Then, after the power procedure is complete, the astronauts must start cooling pumps that will control the temperature of the circuit control boxes. The pumps have not been used in four years, and that, too, has managers sweating.

Just two members of the Discovery's crew — Commander Polansky, a former Air Force test pilot, and Capt. Robert L. Curbeam Jr. of the Navy — have been to space before. The rest of the crew members will be taking their first trip, including the pilot, Cmdr. William A. Oefelein of the Navy; Cmdr. Sunita L. Williams of the Navy; Nicholas J. M. Patrick; Joan E. Higginbotham; and Christer Fuglesang, the first Swedish astronaut and a representative of the European Space Agency.

Commander Williams will remain on the space station for six-months, and Thomas Reiter of the European Space Agency, who has been living on the station, will climb aboard the shuttle for his ride back to earth.

In the post-liftoff briefing on Saturday night, the NASA administrator, Michael D. Griffin, said the shuttle and the station were now part of a larger effort to return to the work of sending humans to explore the Moon and the planets.

"We have to learn to live on other planetary surfaces," Mr. Griffin said, "and use what we find there and bend it to our will — just as the pilgrims did when they came to what is now New England."

It is part of what it takes "to become a space-faring nation," he said, adding that it is up to NASA to make that happen.

"Sometimes we stumble," Mr. Griffin said. "Today, we didn't stumble."

Shuttle Discovery Climbs Into Night Sky (LAT)

By John Johnson Jr., Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, December 10, 2006

The launch is the first after dark since the Columbia disaster.

The shuttle Discovery roared into space Saturday night on a 12-day mission to continue construction of the International Space Station and reconfigure the station's electrical system.

It was the third launch in the last five months and the first nighttime launch in more than four years as the American space agency continues its recovery from the 2003 Columbia disaster.

"We look forward to lighting up the night sky and rewiring the ISS," shuttle Commander Mark Polansky said just before the shuttle's engines ignited at 8:47 p.m. EST at Kennedy Space Center in Florida.

The three main engines and two solid rocket boosters, providing 7 million pounds of thrust, propelled the shuttle from a standing start to its orbiting speed of 17,400 mph as it made its eight-minute climb to space.

Early reports from ground safety officers indicated that the launch appeared clean.

Launch Director Mike Leinbach said the successful launch was the best sign yet that NASA had fully recovered from the Columbia disaster.

"We're getting back in the groove. We're getting back in business," Leinbach said.

NASA Administrator Michael D. Griffin said the launch marked another milestone in finishing the space station and going beyond.

"The space station is on the footpath toward becoming a space-faring nation," Griffin said, referring to plans to return to the moon and then head on to Mars.

Navigating space is one of the most technologically difficult tasks mankind has faced, he said.

"We do it as well as we can. Sometimes we stumble. Today, we didn't stumble," Griffin said.

Several days of analysis of radar images from the ground and an on-orbit inspection by the shuttle crew will be required to make sure there were no problems, such as the one that doomed Columbia. A piece of foam insulation flaked off the external fuel tank during Columbia's launch and hit the left wing, tearing a hole in it.

NASA ground managers and the crew were unaware of the problem until the shuttle attempted to land, and atmospheric forces widened the damage and finally destroyed the shuttle.

The seven-person crew of Discovery has three major tasks.

It will deliver a replacement crew member to the space station, Sunita Williams, to replace European astronaut Thomas Reiter, who has been at the station since July.

Discovery will also deliver a 2-ton truss as NASA continues assembling the backbone of the station. The final task is the most challenging: to take the station off the temporary power grid it has been using for the last six years and bring online the giant set of solar arrays that were delivered by the last shuttle mission.

Power will be routed through four Main Bus Switching Units on the central truss attached in April 2002. These units have never been activated and were last checked in December 2002.

Three spacewalks will be required to complete the work. To minimize the danger of something going wrong and leaving the station without power, the spacewalkers will shut down only half of the station at a time.

The new truss section will be attached on the fourth day of the flight. The power and thermal reconfiguration will take place on Day 6 of the 12-day mission. The second half will take place during the third spacewalk on the eighth day of the mission.

NASA had required daylight launches for the first three missions after Columbia so the space agency could obtain good daytime photos of the fuel tank. NASA now believes it understands the foam problem well enough to launch at night, relying on radar to spot any debris flaking off the fuel tank.

Nighttime launches are necessary for NASA to stick to its announced schedule of completing construction of the station and retiring the shuttle fleet by 2010.

Another reason to get the flight in before the end of the year is that shuttle computers are not designed to make the changeover from the 365th day of the year to the first day of a new year.

Discovery Lights Up Night (HC)

By Mark Carreau, Houston Chronicle

Houston Chronicle, December 10, 2006

Shuttle heads to space station for 12-day mission

CAPE CANAVERAL, FLA. — The shuttle Discovery thundered into the darkness with seven astronauts late Saturday, lighting up a wintry sky along the East Coast of the United States with a fiery fury.

Discovery soared toward a rendezvous with the international space station, where the shuttle crew plans to expand the electrical power-distribution grid.

The liftoff from NASA's Kennedy Space Center was the first in darkness for a shuttle in four years. Discovery's 12-day mission will mark the third shuttle flight this year, the most the space agency has attempted since the fatal 2003 Columbia accident.

All will have flown in the past six months, establishing a launch pace that should enable the space agency to finish the construction of the half-built orbital base before the shuttle is retired in 2010, said NASA Administrator Michael Griffin.

"We are trying to get back to a normal operating tempo in the program to finish the space station," Griffin said. "On average we want to fly every two months."

Overcast skies forced a scrub of the first launch attempt Thursday night.

Discovery blasted off at 7:47 p.m. CST, with rockets igniting in a burst of billowing orange exhaust. The spacecraft climbed steeply on a northerly course, trailing a dagger of fire.

"Forty-eight hours makes a tremendous difference," Griffin said. "The weather is outstanding. The vehicle is in great shape."

NASA launch director Mike Leinbach radioed Discovery commander Mark Polansky as the shuttle astronauts were cleared to lift off.

"We look forward to lighting up the night sky," Polansky responded.

Discovery's departure placed the shuttle crew on course to dock with the space station shortly after 4 p.m. CST on Monday.

On Polansky's crew are pilot Bill Oefelein, flight engineer Robert Curbeam and four mission specialists — Christer Fuglesang of the European Space Agency, the first Swedish astronaut, Joan Higginbotham, Nick Patrick and Sunita Williams.

Curbeam, a veteran of two previous missions, will lead the mission's three spacewalks, joined on the first two by Fuglesang and on the last by Williams.

Williams has trained to remain aboard the space station until mid-2007, joining the outpost's current commander, Mike Lopez-Alegria, and Russian cosmonaut Mikhail Tyurin. Williams will replace European Space Agency astronaut Thomas Reiter of Germany.

This is considered among the most difficult of the 19 assembly missions NASA has flown to the space station so far.

The astronauts will spend today inspecting the wings and nose of Discovery for damage to the heatshield from flying launch debris. Though tracked by cameras and radar, Discovery's nighttime departure was expected to limit detection of damage.

Columbia's disintegration was traced to undetected wing damage from falling foam fuel-tank insulation. After three daytime liftoffs in the accident's aftermath, shuttle managers were ready to resume the night launches.

Discovery carries an $11 million, 11-foot-long extension for the station's growing solar power-generation system.

"Many of us consider this the most challenging space station flight we've done since we began the assembly effort," Mike Suffredini, NASA space-station program manager, said this week. "When the shuttle leaves (the space station) will not look much different than when Discovery got there, but it will be a dramatically different vehicle inside."

The current power system is adequate for the station's U.S. laboratory. The changes will rewire the system to distribute power from the solar power module delivered by Atlantis in September and two more modules due next year and in 2008. The added power will accommodate European and Japanese research modules and the life-support gear for more resident astronauts.

The six-hour spacewalks, which get under way in the mid-afternoon, are scheduled for Tuesday, Thursday and Saturday.

The astronauts are due to return Dec. 21.

Shuttle Launches At Night To Rewire Station (WP)

By William Harwood, Special To The Washington Post

The Washington Post, December 10, 2006

CAPE CANAVERAL, Dec. 9 -- The space shuttle Discovery, briefly turning night into day, streaked into space Saturday evening and set off after the international space station to rewire the outpost and activate its main power system.

With Cmdr. Mark L. Polansky and Pilot William A. Oefelein at the controls, Discovery climbed away from the Kennedy Space Center at 8:47 p.m., two days late because of low clouds and high winds.

Discovery put on a spectacular show as it thundered aloft atop 5,000-degree plumes of flame from its solid-fuel boosters. It was NASA's first night launch since the 2003 Columbia disaster, the result of increased confidence in the shuttle's redesigned external fuel tank.

The brilliant light of the takeoff illuminated the shuttle's heat shield in the first two minutes of flight. But engineers will not be able to assess the health of the protective tiles until a detailed inspection Sunday by the astronauts and again during final approach to the space station Monday.

Discovery's mission is considered the most complex station assembly flight yet attempted and one of the most complicated in manned spaceflight history.

The astronauts will switch the space station from an interim power system, used during initial assembly, to an permanent setup, featuring new solar arrays installed in September and others set for launch next year. The station's two major power circuits must be powered down, one at a time, and then reconnected, leaving some critical systems without backups until the switchover is complete.

During two of three planned spacewalks, crew members Robert L. Curbeam, Sunita L. Williams and Swedish astronaut Christer Fuglesang will unplug and replug dozens of power lines and then stand by while ground controllers send hundreds of commands to reroute electrical power and activate the station's ammonia cooling system.

Without cooling, the main components in the electrical switching system will overheat. The cooling system is powered by the same switching units, so quick activation of two ammonia pumps is crucial.

Before any of that work can begin, however, the astronauts first must retract one of the solar arrays powering the interim system to provide the clearance needed to begin rotating the newly installed panels so they can track the sun.

The array that needs to be retracted has been fully extended for six years, and no one knows whether the huge panel will, in fact, fold up as required. In addition, the pumps needed to drive ammonia through the cooling system have never been powered up in space.

Williams will remain aboard the station, and German astronaut Thomas Reiter, launched to the space station in July, will return to Earth aboard Discovery in her place. Other crew members aboard the shuttle are Joan E. Higginbotham and Nicholas J.M. Patrick.

If all goes well, Discovery will return to Earth on Dec. 21.

Don't Colonize The Moon (LAT)

A manned moon mission doesn't make sense. Robots are better -- just look at their success on Mars.

WHEN IT COMES TO poetic vision, "Fly Me to the Moon" has it all over "Global Precipitation Mission." But the prosaic and twice-delayed NASA meteorology project would conduct a useful scientific study of Earth weather. A return to the moon is a romantic but expensive mission in search of a purpose.

NASA's announcement last week that it would erect a permanent moon station by 2020 as a sort of scientific way station to Mars was dramatic but not unexpected — especially not after President Bush gave a speech two years ago calling on the space agency to return astronauts to the moon and from there to Mars. NASA officials enthused about the international partners for the moon project and the savings they would achieve by using existing technologies. What they didn't say is how much it would cost — and more important, why do it in the first place except to recapture a wrinkled sense of glory.

Even NASA's "Why the Moon?" website doesn't really explain it. It's full of oddly cheerful videos ("We're going back to the moon … this time to stay!") suggesting that people might like to colonize the moon as a new home (not until the surf's up at the Sea of Tranquillity) and vowing that this will enable new scientific studies, encourage global cooperation and inspire children. These are laudable goals, all of which could be managed without a manned moon station and a 12-figure price tag. The U.S. and India already are working together on an unmanned space mission.

Manned moon flight may appeal to baby boomers, but it makes little scientific sense for most space missions these days. Robots can now perform, or be developed to perform, most of the tasks people would do at a moon station. And even if the world shares the goal of landing astronauts on Mars, this is a roundabout way to achieve it. Why re-create the old technologies for going to the moon when they are of no use to get to Mars?

For too long, NASA has been overspending on manned flight and under-funding scientific study. Vital missions to study the Earth's climate, for example, have been delayed for years or indefinitely. An unmanned scientific mission to scan for Earth-like planets in nearby solar systems, scheduled to launch in 2011, has been postponed until 2015.

Frank Sinatra recorded the song "Fly Me to the Moon" in 1964, five years before Neil Armstrong got there. These days, it makes more sense to have robots do the flying. Just last week, scientists announced they'd found evidence of water flowing on Mars — a possible harbinger of Martian life. The discoverer of this exciting news? The unmanned Mars Global Surveyor.

A Missile Defense System Is Taking Shape In Alaska (NYT)

By William Yardley

FORT GREELY, Alaska, Dec. 4 — Snow fences help keep drifts from piling up on the missile silos. Heat-sensing security devices that monitor the edges of this 800-acre installation are sometimes set off by wayward moose.

And the soldiers here, members of the 3-year-old 49th Missile Defense Battalion of the Alaska National Guard, were just selected to help field test for the Army the third generation of the Extended Cold Weather Clothing System, seven layers of synthetic meant to resist the brutal winds that rip past the snow-clad peaks of the Alaska Range.

Four years after President Bush ordered a limited missile defense system to be built and nearly a quarter century after Ronald Reagan first proposed the Strategic Defense Initiative, this sub-Arctic outpost, once a cold war training site and still a cold-weather training site, is where progress on the long-embattled missile system is perhaps most evident, military officials say.

Eleven interceptor missiles are installed in underground silos here, buried beneath the snow and a former forest of black spruce. This summer, when North Korea signaled that it planned to fire an intercontinental ballistic missile, Fort Greely, which has never fired a test missile, was put on alert status, ostensibly ready to respond if necessary.

After the test either failed or was aborted, “there was a little bit of a letdown” at the base, said Lt. Col Edward E. Hildreth III, commander of the 49th, “because we were prepared.”

That assertion, echoed by other commanders at Fort Greely during a limited tour of the base this week, comes a little more than three months after Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld visited Fort Greely and expressed caution about the program’s readiness. Critics have noted that tests on some parts of the system have failed and a recent successful missile test — in California, shortly after Mr. Rumsfeld’s visit to Fort Greely — lacked decoys and was unrealistic.

Even as questions persist about capability, the missile defense program is pushing forward at a cost of at least $9 billion a year. About a third of that goes to the kind of operation that is based at Fort Greely, called Ground-Based Midcourse Defense, which is intended to shoot down enemy missiles while they travel through space. Vandenberg Air Force Base in California also houses two interceptors, but military experts say Fort Greely is better situated to interrupt the likely flight path of a missile from Asia or the Middle East.

Just a few years after being shut down, Fort Greely, about 100 miles southeast of Fairbanks, is now the destination of about 1,700 people, including some 200 soldiers, and the rest defense contractors and family members. The base’s Brownie troop is at 16 girls and growing — Monday night they made root beer floats — just as the number of interceptors installed at the base is expected to expand to as many as 38.

Now, in a region with barely four hours of daylight in December, there is a new espresso shop on base and an expanded PX that sells flat-screen televisions.

Sgt. Jack W. Carlson III, an intelligence analyst, said he was assigned to Fort Greely before the Pentagon officials created the 49th Missile Defense Battalion. "We didn't have a name," Sergeant Carlson said. "We didn't have patches. We just called ourselves G.M.D.," for Ground-Based Midcourse Defense.

Sergeant Carlson married another soldier and has bought a house in nearby Delta Junction, population 840. He said he heated his house mostly with wood salvaged from the spruce left after a wildfire.

Before Fort Greely, he had been stationed in the Virgin Islands. He learned of openings in the missile defense program through an online posting, he said. "I'd been on the beach all my life, and it was time to see the snow."

Alaska has been crucial to American military interests since long before it became a state in 1959. Now, Adak, in the Aleutian Islands, is scheduled to become the home port of the Sea-Based X-band Radar, a long-delayed system built on a converted oil rig that is critical to the ground-based system's ability to track enemy missiles.

While the 49th is an Alaska National Guard unit, Colonel Hildreth reports to Col. Michael L. Yowell, commander of the 100th Missile Defense Brigade, based in Colorado.

Colonel Hildreth said he was well aware of criticism that missile defense was far from a perfected program. He said Fort Greely operated in a balance between operational mode and construction.

"We build a little, test a little," he said. "It's fluid."

A 12th interceptor will be installed this month. Last summer, however, when American intelligence learned that North Korea might be preparing to launch an intercontinental missile, much of the bustle of contractors on the site stopped. Fort Greely went on alert. The system that had struggled through tests faced the possibility of firing a live missile.

"It got quiet," said Col. Thomas M. Besch, director of Ground-Based Midcourse Defense for the Missile Defense Agency. "And all of a sudden no developmental activity occurred. You could feel in the atmosphere that people were on edge and ready. You were kind of waiting for something to happen, and it didn't."

Top Air Force Lawyer Had Been Disbarred (WP)

By Thomas E. Ricks

The Washington Post, December 10, 2006

A top Air Force lawyer who served at the White House and in a senior position in Iraq turns out to have been practicing law for 23 years without a license.

Col. Michael D. Murphy was most recently commander of the Air Force Legal Operations Agency at Bolling Air Force Base in the District.

He was the general counsel for the White House Military Office from December 2001 to January 2003, and from August 2003 to January 2005. In between those tours, he was the legal adviser to the reconstruction effort in Iraq, an Air Force spokesman said.

Murphy later served in 2005 as commandant of the Air Force Judge Advocate General's School at Maxwell Air Force Base in Montgomery, Ala.

He was relieved of his command at Bolling on Nov. 30 after the Air Force learned that he had been disbarred for professional misconduct in Texas in 1984 but hadn't informed his superiors, according to Air Force Times, an independent newspaper that first reported the action. It said that his status was discovered in the course of an unrelated review.

Murphy could not be reached for comment yesterday. Don Manuszewski, an Air Force spokesman, said that it would be inappropriate to comment because the matter is under investigation.

Murphy's exposure is the second major embarrassment to Air Force lawyers in recent years. In 2005, Maj. Gen. Thomas J. Fiscus, then the service's top lawyer, was demoted to colonel and subsequently retired after he was found to be having inappropriate relationships with subordinates.

Jefferson Overcomes Scandal, Wins Reelection (WP/AP)

By Cain Burdeau

The Washington Post, December 10, 2006

NEW ORLEANS, Dec. 9 -- Voters looked past a federal bribery investigation of Rep. William J. Jefferson (D-La.) and reelected the eight-term congressman in a runoff election Saturday.

Jefferson grabbed a commanding lead over state Rep. Karen Carter, a fellow Democrat, almost as soon as the polls closed in the New Orleans district. With 44 percent of the precincts reporting, Jefferson, had 61 percent of the vote.

Louisiana's 2nd District was one of the nation's last unresolved midterm races, and the runoff election put Jefferson in danger of becoming the only Democratic incumbent to lose this election year.

In her concession speech, Carter embraced family members and pledged to work with Jefferson, particularly on the area's recovery from Hurricane Katrina.

"I guess the people are happy with the status quo," she said.

Jefferson, Louisiana's first black congressman since Reconstruction, has been the target of a wide-ranging investigation into allegations that he took bribes -- including $90,000 allegedly found in his freezer during an FBI raid -- from a company seeking lucrative contracts in the Nigerian telecommunications market. He has not been charged with any crime and denies any wrongdoing.

He described his win as "a great moment and I thank almighty God for making it possible."

The scandal turned the campaign into a debate largely divided along racial lines, an age-old dynamic in this city that has intensified since Katrina displaced large numbers of blacks and upended their demographic and political dominance.

In the Nov. 7 election, whites overwhelmingly voted for Carter, 37, and were her most enthusiastic financial backers, while Jefferson, 59, drew widespread support among blacks.

Carter raised nearly five times as much money as Jefferson, but she was largely outflanked in endorsements as Jefferson picked up the backing of Mayor C. Ray Nagin and other prominent black politicians.

The endorsements spoke to Jefferson's solid footing in New Orleans politics. He arrived here in the 1970s as a Harvard-educated lawyer from rural north Louisiana, the sixth of 10 children brought up in a three-room country home. By 1980, he represented New Orleans in the state Senate.

Jefferson Swarms Back To Win Re-election (NOTP)

New Orleans Times-Picayune, December 10, 2006

Confounding political pundits and a slew of rivals who had become confident of his defeat, U.S. Rep. William Jefferson, D-New Orleans, neatly sidestepped a roiling federal corruption probe to win re-election on Saturday to his ninth term in Congress.

Guilty pleas by aides and associates who admitted to bribing the congressman and the revelation in court documents that FBI agents had found $90,000 in marked bills stuffed into Jefferson's freezer had put the scent of blood in political waters.

A field of a dozen candidates began circling Jefferson in the primary. He finished first, but with only 30 percent of the vote, inspiring conjecture that his performance amounted to repudiation of an incumbent and that he would surely lose the runoff against state Rep. Karen Carter, D-New Orleans.

Instead, Jefferson, 59, scored a dramatic upset by racking up huge pluralities in African African-dominated precincts in Orleans, and winning outright in Jefferson Parish, where Sheriff Harry Lee had spent his campaign.

The final margin for Jefferson in Jefferson Parish was 71% to 39% - a margin that can be attributed to Sheriff Lee's furious political assault in the closing days of the campaign. Lee not only endorsed to Jefferson, but in the final days, urged Jefferson Parish residents to stay home and not vote. The final tally shows that while 28% of registered voters cast ballots in the primary, only 15% voted Saturday.

Jefferson's victory was even more confounding because the Second Congressional District race was missing all the advantages that usually come with incumbency. Carter had the edge in funding raising, including from business interests that had backed Jefferson in the past. Most of the high-profile endorsements - including those by two former Louisiana senators - went to her, as well.

Jefferson seemed to have secured his upset victory not in public debates or increasingly vicious ad campaigns but in grassroots campaign efforts that carried him to dozens of African-American churches, and, although he isn't a drinker, to many a Second District bar.

Despite the surprise win, Jefferson's problems are far from over. The federal corruption probe, which began on March 15, 2005, continues, and the congressman has all but said he anticipates an indictment.

Rep. Jefferson Holds On To His Seat In Louisiana (LAT)

By Ann M. Simmons

The Los Angeles Times, December 10, 2006

NEW ORLEANS — U.S. Rep. William J. Jefferson, the beleaguered congressman at the center of a federal bribery investigation, pulled off what many had believed would be impossible: He won reelection Saturday to Louisiana's 2nd Congressional District seat.

Jefferson, plagued by more than a year of scandal, received 57% of the vote in complete but unofficial returns. His challenger in the runoff election, Democratic state Rep. Karen Carter, had 43%.

Voter turnout was only about 16% on what turned out to be a cold and windy election day.

At a victory celebration, Jefferson called for unity "on the East Bank, on the West Bank, [between] black and white, rich and poor, with one objective: to recover this wonderful city."

In conceding, Carter told supporters that she had called Jefferson and offered to work with him because "we certainly can't do this alone."

Political analysts said voters in the district, which spans most of New Orleans and the West Bank of neighboring Jefferson Parish, were more concerned with maintaining the status quo than with change.

"It's a vote for continuity," Brian Brox, a political scientist at Tulane University in New Orleans, said of the results.

Jefferson trounced Carter among African Americans and had a strong showing in Jefferson Parish, according to a preliminary analysis by Greg Rigamer of GCR & Associates Inc. More whites voted for Jefferson than blacks did for Carter, according to the analysis. Both Jefferson and Carter are black.

Analysts believe that Carter's fate might also have been sealed by her failure to garner enough votes in Jefferson Parish, where Sheriff Harry Lee mailed out fliers during the final week of the campaign urging parish residents not to vote for her.

Lee and other Jefferson officials were outraged over comments Carter made in a recent Spike Lee documentary, criticizing Jefferson law enforcement officials for blocking Katrina evacuees from crossing a bridge to safety in their parish in the aftermath of the storm.

Jefferson, 59, has held his congressional seat for 16 years and rarely faced a serious challenge for it. The climate changed this year as a federal bribery probe unfolded. He was ousted from the House Ways and Means Committee after agents in an FBI raid said they found $90,000 stashed in a freezer of his Washington home.

Jefferson has not been charged with any crime, and insisted he was innocent.

Many voters believed him.

"I think they lied on him," Curtis Mimms, 82, said as he arrived to cast his ballot at the New Orleans Baptist Theological Seminary in the city's Gentilly neighborhood. "I think he can do the job."

When the congressman dropped by the seminary Saturday he was greeted with hugs, handshakes and smiles.

Alfreda Baker, 55, said she voted for Jefferson because residents needed someone tough to ensure a break in the logjam in disbursing funds so homeowners could rebuild.

"It's ridiculous. It's been so long. We're taxpayers," said Baker, a retired educator. "Jefferson has proven that he knows who to go to. [Carter's] a new person. She's still just feeling her way."

Perrilyn White, 48, said Jefferson had "been consistent in his dedication to our city regardless of what he's done for himself." Since Katrina, Jefferson has introduced numerous pieces of legislation in Congress to help residents and businesses rebound.

The son of sharecroppers who went on to earn three university degrees and walk the halls of power, Jefferson's story has inspired many supporters.

Many voters said they respected Carter — a seven-year state legislator from a politically active family — but still considered her "a new kid on the block." Carter, 37, had run on a platform of restoring "credibility and respect to political service" and had argued that Jefferson's legal troubles prevented him from offering effective leadership.

"His election might not necessarily translate into an important position [within Congress]," said Brox, the political scientist. And, he said, Carter supporters might argue "what difference is your election going to make if you're not going to be on any important committees?"

Commentators said low temperatures and brisk winds, holiday shopping sales, and distraction over home rebuilding and other recovery activities usually tackled on weekends contributed to low voter turnout.

Many polling stations stood empty for large parts of the day.

"It's nothing particular against Jefferson or Carter," Brox said. "It is just a really bad time to hold an election."

Jefferson Appears Headed To Victory (RC)

By Josh Kurtz

Roll Call, December 10, 2006

Scandal-plagued Rep. William Jefferson (D-La.) appeared headed to an improbable re-election late Saturday night.

With 68 percent of the precincts reporting in the New Orleans-based 2nd district, Jefferson had 23,978 votes for 59 percent, while state Rep. Karen Carter (D) had 16,985 votes for 41 percent. Two New Orleans TV stations have projected that the nine-term Congressman will be the winner.

Jefferson won despite being the target of a yearlong FBI corruption probe. An ex-Jefferson aide and one of the Congressman's former business associates have already pleaded guilty in the case, and law enforcement authorities raided Jefferson's Capitol Hill office earlier this year.

Jefferson took just 30 percent of the vote in the crowded all-party primary that took place on Nov. 7, and Carter, fueled by the support of prominent Louisiana politicians such as former Sens. John Breaux and J. Bennett Johnston, placed second.

But New Orleans voters appear loyal to their embattled incumbents: Mayor Ray Nagin was elected earlier this year despite being criticized for the way he handled the Hurricane Katrina disaster in 2005. While Carter had significant white support, she evidently could not cut into Jefferson's advantage among the district's black voters.

Saturday's runoff marks the end of Louisiana's unusual election system of holding all-party primaries when the rest of the national holds its general election, and then holding runoffs a month later. Beginning with the 2007 gubernatorial race, party nominees will be chosen in closed primaries, and general election voters will go to the polls on November Election Day.

Candidates Woo Bush Donors For "Invisible Primary" (WP)

By Chris Cillizza, Michael A. Fletcher

The Washington Post, December 10, 2006

Last month, a group of Republican royalty gathered to be wined and dined by Gov. Mitt Romney in Boston. On Friday night, they ate at Copia, a pricey Mediterranean steakhouse. On Saturday, they had breakfast at the Four Seasons and then lunched at Fenway Park.

Key Romney advisers made presentations about the path to the presidential nomination they see for the Massachusetts governor. Others walked attendees through how a race would be financed.

Among the 160 or so wealthy Republicans the Romney campaign had invited for the weekend was a particularly important group of potential supporters -- the 40 or so men and women who were "Rangers" or "Pioneers" in the 2000 and 2004 campaigns of President Bush.

These Rangers, who raised $200,000 or more for Bush in 2004, and Pioneers, who each collected more than $100,000 as part of campaigns that redefined modern political fundraising, are being intensely courted by GOP presidential aspirants across the country, both in large gatherings such as the one in Boston and one-on-one.

Bush's 2000 campaign forever changed the fundraising dynamic for presidential races, showing that an enormous early financial advantage was the same as winning an "invisible primary." In that race, there are no voters, elections or overt campaigning -- just the wooing of fabulously rich people with the rewards of insider status, complete with fancy titles.

So far, Romney and Arizona Sen. John McCain are well ahead among the Republican contenders, though neither yet has come up with monikers like "Pioneer" or "Ranger" to flatter the biggest donors.

The competition for these donors is one of the most important contests within the larger presidential race, serving as an early measure of a candidate's viability on the national stage, particularly because neutral observers peg the price of winning the 2008 presidential nomination at as much as $100 million.

In this new world of presidential fundraising, finding a wealthy person and persuading him or her to write a check is not the gold standard. Instead, the goal is to identify individuals who not only can contribute the federal limit of $2,000 but also can persuade 100 or so of their friends and business associates to do the same.

"It's important, because in the invisible-primary phase, elected officials who have their own organizations and their own power to endorse pay attention to who the big fundraisers are coalescing around," said Wayne Berman, a Bush Ranger in 2004 and a backer of McCain in the 2008 race.

Bush developed the Pioneer program while he was governor of Texas and preparing for his 2000 White House run. His early fundraising helped ensure that he was viewed as the inevitable GOP nominee and helped reduce the competition for the nomination.

The genius of the program was twofold: It let the fundraising team showily quantify its efforts, and it got donors involved in the day-to-day operations and planning of the campaign, according to Alex Vogel, a senior adviser to outgoing Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.).

"The relationship did not start or end when they wrote a check," Vogel said. "They were not just donors but part of the organization."

The big donors received top-level strategy briefings and were feted at campaign events. Many received appointments to the transition team after Bush was elected, and many others received ambassadorships, including Ron Weiser to Slovakia and Howard Leach to France.

Both Romney and McCain now count more than two dozen Pioneers and Rangers as supporters and have sought commitments from many others.

Former New York mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani has on staff Anne Dickerson, who ran the high-dollar program for the Bush campaign in 2004, and he has the backing of a handful of Bush Pioneers and Rangers. Other potential 2008 GOP candidates, including former House speaker Newt Gingrich (Ga.), Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee, and Sens. Sam Brownback (Kan.) and Chuck Hagel (Neb.), are far behind in the pursuit of these fundraising big shots.

Although Democrats do not have an equivalent for the Rangers and Pioneers, their leading candidates have already begun making the rounds of wealthy donors.

Last week, Sen. Barack Obama (Ill.) ventured to New York to meet with a group of potential donors assembled by liberal philanthropist George Soros.

And Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.) has spent much of the past two years building a fundraising infrastructure that raised nearly $50 million for her lopsided reelection campaign. The donors who contributed to that campaign can give again, should she run for president in 2008.

Ed Rogers, a Republican lobbyist not affiliated with a potential presidential candidate, said that with just 14 months remaining before the first ballots are cast, any candidate not knee-deep in conversations with Rangers and Pioneers is already falling behind.

"We are going to have a nominee by February 6th," 2008, Rogers said. "You have to have all of your money at the opening gun."

McCain and Romney are mimicking the Bush model not only in terms of the individuals they are courting but also in the approach they are taking to their pitch: a heavy emphasis on personal attention, meeting one-on-one with prospective donors, inviting them on trips and even soliciting them in that old K Street favorite: at sporting events.

Sig Rogich, a Las Vegas image consultant who has worked for presidents Ronald Reagan and George H.W. Bush, said he first discussed becoming a major fundraiser for McCain nearly two years ago when the two men were ringside at a boxing match featuring former champion Oscar De La Hoya.

"I told him that if the time came that he became a candidate, I'd be there for him," Rogich said.

Ron Kaufman, who is supporting Romney, made up his mind on a flight with the Massachusetts governor over South Carolina not long ago.

Kaufman, political director in the George H.W. Bush White House, had picked up a copy of Thomas L. Friedman's "The World Is Flat" and planned to give it to Romney. "Before I could even mention the book, he waxed eloquently in a soliloquy that I call 'The World Is Flat: The Oral Edition,' " Kaufman recounted. That episode about Friedman's treatise on globalization "cinched" his support for Romney, he said.

Anne Dunsmore, a California fundraiser, got to know Romney during his work as chairman of the Republican Governors Association and was impressed by what she called his sense of optimism. Although he never asked, Dunsmore decided that she would plug Romney into her well-cultivated network of political contributors, should he decide to run for president.

"It was an easy choice being part of this family, no matter what he chooses to do," said Dunsmore, a Bush Ranger who has worked on five presidential campaigns.

Although most Rangers and Pioneers expect and demand personal contact with the candidates seeking their help, their decisions on whom to support are often shaped more by a desire to be on the winning team than by a sense of friendship.

"It's much more like a professional recruitment than it is a romance," Berman said. "A lot of it has to do with discussions about how the campaign's fundraising is going to work, the team, what the candidate's approach on fundraising is going to be."

Rogich put it more bluntly. "At the end of the season, there is a column with an 'L' and one with a 'W.' I want to be in the 'W' column," he said.

Romney Pledged In '94 To Seek Gay Rights (WP/AP)

BOSTON, Dec. 9 -- Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney (R) is facing new questions about his beliefs on gay issues after the emergence of a letter he wrote during his 1994 U.S. Senate run, in which he promised to be a stronger advocate for gays than Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D).

The Massachusetts governor has emphasized his opposition to same-sex marriage in recent months as he positions himself for an expected 2008 run for the Republican presidential nomination.

The 1994 letter was written to the Log Cabin Club of Massachusetts, a gay Republican group, when Romney was courting gay voters during his unsuccessful campaign against Kennedy.

Citing Kennedy's record of advocacy for gays and lesbians, Romney wrote: "For some voters, it might be enough to simply match my opponent's record in this area. But I believe we can and must do better. If we are to achieve the goals we share, we must make equality for gays and lesbians a mainstream concern. My opponent cannot do this. I can and will."

A gay-oriented Massachusetts newspaper, Bay Windows, has also released a transcript of a 1994 interview with Romney during the Senate race.

"I think the gay community needs more support from the Republican Party, and I would be a voice in the Republican Party to foster anti-discrimination efforts," Romney said, according to the transcript.

Tony Perkins, president of the conservative Family Research Council, said Romney's comments were "quite disturbing."

"This is going to create a lot of problems for Governor Romney," Perkins told the New York Times. "He is going to have a hard time overcoming this."

Conservative activist Paul M. Weyrich told the Times, "Unless he comes out with an abject repudiation of this, I think it makes him out to be a hypocrite."

Romney was wrapping up a week-long trip to Asia on Saturday and could not be reached for comment.

In an e-mailed statement, Romney spokesman Eric Fehrnstrom said that, as governor, Romney has supported "traditional marriage" and "the needs of children."

The Pattern May Change, If... (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney

AFTER a 217-year march of major presidential nominees who were, without exception, white and male, the 2008 campaign may offer voters a novel choice.

But as Barack Obama, the senator from Illinois whose father is from Kenya, spends this weekend exploring a presidential bid in New Hampshire, and Hillary Rodham Clinton, the first woman to represent New York in the Senate, calls potential supporters in Iowa, the question remains: are Americans prepared to elect an African-American or a woman as president?

Or, to look at it from the view of Democrats hungry for victory in 2008, is the nation more likely to vote for a woman or an African-American for president?

Without question, women and blacks have made significant progress in winning office. The new Congress will include 71 women — one of whom will be the first female speaker of the House — compared with 25 when Representative Geraldine Ferraro, a Queens Democrat, became the first woman to run as a major-party vice presidential candidate in 1984. There will be 43 blacks in the new Congress, compared with 13 when the Congressional Black Caucus was formed in 1969. A Gallup Poll in September showed a steady rise in the number of people who expect the nation to elect a woman or an African-American as president one day: Americans, it seems, are much more open to these choices than, say, someone who is an atheist or who is gay.

Times are indeed changing. But how much?

Over the past of the past eight years, in the view of analysts from both parties, the country has shifted markedly on the issue of gender, to the point where they say voters could very well be open to electing a woman in 2008. That is reflected, they say, in polling data and in the continued success of women running for office, in red and blue states alike. "The country is ready," said Senator Elizabeth Dole, the North Carolina Republican, who ran unsuccessfully for president in 2000. "I'm not saying it's going to happen in '08. But the country is ready."

By contrast, for all the excitement stirred by Mr. Obama, it is much less certain that an African-American could win a presidential election. Not as many blacks have been elected to prominent positions as women. Some high-profile black candidates — Harold Ford Jr., a Democrat running for the Senate in Tennessee, and Michael Steele, a Republican Senate candidate in Maryland — lost in November. And demographics might be an obstacle as well: black Americans are concentrated in about 25 states — typically blue ones, like New York and California. While black candidates cannot assume automatic support from black voters, they would at least provide a base. In states without big black populations, the candidate's crossover appeal must be huge.

"All evidence is that a white female has an advantage over a black male — for reasons of our cultural heritage," said the Rev. Jesse L. Jackson, the civil rights leader who ran for president in 1984 and 1988. Still, he said, for African-American and female candidates, "It's easier — emphatically so."

Ms. Ferraro offered a similar sentiment. "I think it's more realistic for a woman than it is for an African-American," said Ms. Ferraro. "There is a certain amount of racism that exists in the United States — whether it's conscious or not it's true."

"Women are 51 percent of the population," she added.

Many analysts suggested that changing voter attitudes can best be measured in choices for governors, since they, like presidents, are judged as chief executives, rather than legislators. There will be one black governor next year — Deval L. Patrick in Massachusetts, the second in the nation since Reconstruction.

By contrast, women will be governors of nine states, including Washington, Arizona and Michigan, all potential battleground states in 2008, a fact that is no doubt viewed favorably by advisers to Mrs. Clinton.

"Voters are getting more comfortable with seeing governors as C.E.O.'s of states," said Gov. Kathleen Sebelius, a Kansas Democrat. Gov. Jennifer M. Granholm, a Michigan Democrat who won a second term last month, said in an interview that when she first ran, she had to work harder. "Not this time," she said in an interview. "They are used to a woman being governor."

Of course, governors don't have to handle national security. And Mrs. Clinton has used her six years in the Senate to try to counter the stereotype that women would not be as strong on the issue, especially with the nation at war. Mrs. Clinton won a seat on the Armed Services Committee, and was an early supporter of the war in Iraq.

Mr. Obama is in many ways an unusual African-American politician, and that is why many Democrats, and Republicans, view him as so viable.

Mr. Obama is a member of a post-civil-rights generation of black politicians and is not identified with leaders like Mr. Jackson and the Rev. Al Sharpton of New York, who are polarizing to many white voters. He has a warm and commanding campaign presence that, as he showed in Illinois, cut across color lines.

Donna Brazile, a prominent Democratic strategist who is black, said that she had been deluged with e-mail messages from people looking to volunteer for Mr. Obama — and that most of the requests were from white voters.

Moreover, there is abundant evidence that attitudes toward black candidates are changing among white voters. In Tennessee, Mr. Ford lost his bid to become the state's first black senator since Reconstruction, but by only three percentage points.

Surveys of voters leaving the polls showed that 40 percent of white voters supported Mr. Ford, compared with 95 percent of black voters. More intriguing, the final result was the same as what the exit polls had suggested. Before this, in many races involving black candidates, the polls predicted that they would do better than they actually did — presumably because voters were reluctant to tell questioners they did not support the African-American.

That said, Mr. Ford lost his race after Republicans aired an advertisement that Democrats said was explicitly racist. Many Democrats said a lesson of the loss was that racial appeals still have force, particularly in the South.

Race and gender are big issues in American politics, but they are not the only ones, particularly in the coming race. Mr. Obama, should he run, may find his lack of experience will be far more troublesome to voters than his color. He is 45 and serving his first term as senator.

Mr. Obama said that many black voters he spoke with have serious questions about whether America is ready to elect an African-American president.

"I think there is a protectiveness and a skepticism within the African-American community that is grounded in their experiences," Mr. Obama said in an interview. "But the skepticism doesn't mean there's a lack of support."

David A. Bositis, senior political analyst with the Joint Center for Political and Economic Studies, a nonpartisan Washington group that studies black issues, said that it would certainly be hard, but not impossible for an African-American candidate to win.

"I certainly felt in the '90s that if Colin Powell had been nominated on a major party ticket, he would have had a very good chance to win," Mr. Bositis said. "If it's the right black candidate, I do think there is propensity to elect a black. But it has to be the right black candidate."

Road To The White House May Be Lined With Books (WP)

By Zachary A. Goldfarb

The Washington Post, December 10, 2006

Can you write your way into the White House?

A number of prospective 2008 presidential candidates are betting that the free publicity that comes with the release of a book can't hurt.

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) will re-release her book, "It Takes a Village," on Tuesday, 10 years after she published the book as first lady. She will do a limited amount of media promotion in the next week for the book, in which Clinton argues that collective effort is needed to protect and defend children. In a newly written introduction, Clinton "reflects on how our village has changed over the last decade -- from the impact of the Internet to new research in early child development and education," according to her publisher, Simon & Schuster. Clinton also discusses such issues as security, the environment and the national debt.

DOJ_NMG_0104770

Other prospective Democratic candidates have been on aggressive book-publishing schedules. Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) has been actively promoting his new book, "The Audacity of Hope." Former North Carolina senator and 2004 vice presidential candidate John Edwards has traveled to early primary states to sell his new tome, "Home."

Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and his chief of staff, Mark Salter, will release their fifth book in August, according to the National Journal Web log. The book, tentatively titled "Hard Call," will explore historic decisions in politics, history, science and other endeavors. According to the Web log, McCain and Salter have identified six key principles that separate success and failure: awareness, timing, confidence, foresight, humility and inspiration.

Al Gore, who has kept the door to a presidential run slightly ajar, next year will publish "The Assault on Reason" -- an examination of how "the public arena has grown more hostile to reason." Gore is well known for promoting his candidacy through his causes. In 1992, as a vice presidential candidate, he published a cautionary tale on the environment, "Earth in the Balance."

Tackling that subject area next will be Sen. John F. Kerry (Mass.), the 2004 Democratic presidential nominee, who is releasing a so-far-untitled book on the environment in March with his wife, Teresa. According to PublicAffairs, his publisher, the book describes the work of the senator and his wife on promoting the environment from the San Juan Basin to the South Bronx. In an author's note, Kerry writes that "we are sliding dangerously backwards in almost every sector of environmental concern. . . . We share a sense of urgency about the need to reinvigorate grassroots action which takes these concerns into the ballot box."

Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney (R), has no plans for a book in the next few years. Another possible GOP presidential hopeful, former New York mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani, also has no book plans, though his post-Sept. 11 tome, "Leadership," was a huge success.Sen. Clinton vs. Sen. McCain?

National Journal's well-regarded survey of Washington insiders shows that nearly 69 percent believe that Clinton will be the Democratic nominee, while 73 percent believe that McCain will be the Republican nominee.

Notably, Republicans believe that Clinton is a much stronger candidate than the Democrats give her credit for. More than half of Republicans say she is the strongest candidate. But only a quarter of Democrats believe the same of her. Both Republicans and Democrats agree that Obama is the second strongest.

More than half of Republicans, meanwhile, believe that McCain is the strongest candidate, while 70 percent of Democrats do. Republicans believe that Romney is the second strongest, but Democrats say that Giuliani is No. 2.

The 2008 election could yield the first female (Clinton), black (Obama) or Mormon (Romney) president. The insiders did not believe, generally, that religion or gender would hurt or help the candidates. But nearly half of Democrats and 40 percent of Republicans believed that Obama's race could hurt him in the campaign.The State of Finances

Campaign finance filings last week gave a picture of the financial state of the parties' six campaign committees.

The Republican National Committee had $6 million on hand and received a $12 million transfer in late October from Bush's 2004 reelection campaign committee. The National Republican Congressional Committee had $1.3 million on hand with more than $13 million in debt, while the Republican National Senatorial Committee had $500,000 with $200,000 in debt.

The Democratic National Committee had $4.7 million in cash and $4 million in debt, while the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee had $2.2 million in cash and $10 million in debt. The Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee had $2.3 million in cash and $5.4 million in debt.

Gov.-elect Charlie Crist has decided to cancel his inaugural ball, saying Saturday that he didn't feel right about an expensive party when many people are struggling with higher insurance and property tax bills.

Other free events, including a prayer breakfast, parade, the swearing-in ceremony and tours of the governor's mansion will still continue.

"It's a difficult time for a lot of Floridians and there's no need to have a big party," Crist said. "Many times it's your natural inclination to follow tradition, but then you start to reflect and you realize what the circumstances are for many Floridians."

The ball was to be a $100-a-ticket celebration and concert at the Tallahassee-Leon County Civic Center.

Crist said he had been thinking about canceling the event over the past week.

"It was a mistake to want to go forward to honor that tradition just for tradition's sake," Crist said.

Other inaugural events will precede the Jan. 2 swearing in, beginning Wednesday with an inaugural breakfast at Miami's Parrot Jungle Island and followed by a kickoff barbecue Dec. 17 at the New York Yankees' spring training site in Tampa.

Crist's inaugural committee is also returning all donations it's received, including $100,000 from Trigeant Air LLC; $50,000 each from GEO Group Inc. and U.S. Sugar Corp.; and $25,000 each from Colodny, Fass, Talenfeld, Kalinsky & Abate and A. Duda and Sons Inc.

The committee won't take any donations above what previous administrations have accepted. Once it determines that figure, it will set a limit on donations and begin accepting them again.

Gov. Jeb Bush raised more than $2 million for the governor's inaugural festivities in 2002, including $10,000 donations from several companies.

Any money left over after costs are covered will be given to Derrick Brooks Charities, the Jessica Marie Lunsford Foundation and the National Center for Missing & Exploited Children.

Bone-weary Haulers Raise Risks On Road (CHIT)

By Stephen Franklin, Darnell Little

Chicago Tribune, December 10, 2006

Hurtling down a darkened Indiana highway, Roger Kobernick pulls his 75-foot long rig into a truck stop just long enough to grab his one meal of the day, a thin bologna and cheese sandwich that he gulps down with a huge mug of black coffee.

He has several more hours of driving ahead this night to reach a warehouse in Walton, Ky., where he wants to be the first in line so he can get quickly unloaded and back on the road.

The next morning, after his truck is emptied, he sets off without breakfast or even washing up. Hours later, as he falls in with a truck caravan snaking along a stretch of North Carolina's Smoky Mountains, he relaxes and his worries spill out.

"I'm 42 years old," he says. "And what am I going to do? Give it up? No, you gotta go out and pay the bills. You gotta keep plugging at it. I don't foresee me ever retiring. My dad worked 'til the day he died and I foresee that being me."

Truckers like Kobernick are travelers adrift in a tumultuous sea.

Spurred by a global economy that demands that goods be delivered on time and at low prices, business has never been so brisk and so cutthroat. Paid by the delivery, not the hour, the country's 350,000 independent truckers like Kobernick are lashed to punishing schedules that practically force them to live in their rigs. Counting all their time on the job, some earn as little as $8 an hour.

Long hours, chaotic schedules and exhausting work conditions make for a potentially lethal formula--for truck drivers and everyone else on the road.

Nearly a decade ago, the government vowed to significantly reduce the number of fatalities from truck crashes, but the results have been mixed. Nationally the death toll fell until 2002 and then started climbing. In the three most heavily traveled states, California, Texas and Florida, deaths involving large truck crashes have steadily climbed.

Over 5,000 people die and 116,000 are injured yearly in truck-related accidents, according to the Federal Motor Carrier Safety Administration.

Most often the victims are in passenger cars.

Take the night last April when trucker Robert Spencer, 37, of Canton Township, Mich., was headed north on Interstate 69 in Indiana at close to 70 miles an hour, according to a sworn statement from an investigator.

His truck crossed the highway's divide and slammed into a southbound van carrying nine people from the Ft. Wayne campus of Taylor University. Five were killed, four of them students in their early 20s, and the rest were injured.

"Did I hit something? What happened? Who did this?" Spencer said at the scene. Besides five counts of reckless homicide, Spencer also was charged with filing a false logbook, concealing that he had driven 9½ hours beyond the 11-hour daily maximum allowed by law.

Truckers do not escape being victims; 930 were killed in the U.S. while working last year, up 33 percent from 1992. And while they made up only 2 percent of the workforce last year they accounted for more than 16 percent of fatal workplace injuries.

Last week the health of truck drivers was taken up by the U.S. Appeals Court in Washington, D.C. It heard the latest arguments in a long battle that has pitted trucking companies against groups concerned with driver safety. Companies are pushing to increase the time drivers can be behind the wheel; critics contend that extending truckers' workdays is aimed at increasing corporate profits at drivers' expense.

Ongoing regulation battle

The faceoff began more than a decade ago. It started when Congress, alarmed by the growing toll of highway crashes, asked for new rules to protect truckers' health.

After much political wrangling, the Federal Motor Carrier Safety Administration in 2003 responded by issuing a rule that among other steps, expanded truckers' daily driving time to 11 hours from 10. Safety groups challenged the rule, a federal appeals court upheld their complaint and ordered the agency to revise the rule.

The federal agency last year came back with its revision, but safety groups and others challenged it, too, saying it reflected trucking firms' interests in cutting costs.

The National Institute for Occupational Safety and Health, the federal government's workplace health research arm, backed the opponents, saying that expanding driving time would lead to even more driver fatigue.

In reply, federal officials said an 11th hour would allow some truckers the flexibility to finish work without laying over. Added to the new rule was a 14-hour cap on a trucker's workday and a 34-hour break after a week's work. Both changes, the officials said, were aimed at normalizing truckers' lives.

Critics contended, however, that a 14-hour cap would mean drivers will be able to work nearly 40 percent more than before.

"You have drivers who are already working almost twice the normal 40-hour week," says LaMont Byrd, the Teamsters' Health and Safety director.

Dave Osieke, head of safety for the American Trucking Association, said the fact that fatality rates had fallen until only recently is evidence "that safety has improved."

One reason fatality rates haven't fallen faster, adds Ian Grossman, a spokesman at the Federal Motor Carrier Safety Administration, is that highways are more congested and more truckers are on the road. Since 1996 trucking mileage has soared by 43 billion miles, up 24 percent. Considering such dramatic changes, the death toll increase is quite low, he says.

Taking the surge in trucking mileage into account, the number of fatalities has fallen in the last 30 years.

In 1975, there were 5.51 fatalities per 100 million vehicle miles traveled; that number had dropped to 2.81 by 1996, and was 2.29 in 2004, according to the Federal Motor Carrier Safety Administration.

Waiting, for nothing

Kobernick started working around trucks at age 16 at the same La Crosse, Wis., company that employed his late father, LaVern. Nine years ago Kobernick became an independent trucker. And every other week for the last few years he has made runs to and from Florida from points in Wisconsin and Minneapolis.

On this particular day he had a good-paying load: more than 20 tons of fish, nuts, cheese, mustards and horseradish.

But going home with a profitable load is usually more difficult. Competition going north is so stiff that Kobernick sometimes barely breaks even or waits for days for better-paying loads. Time spent waiting is money lost because independents are not paid for sitting idle.

"Hopefully I will catch up one day here down the road," he says wistfully, early on a southern run as he steers through a clogged stretch of I-90 near Chicago.

Photographs of his family are stuck above the door beside him in the cab, and he calls home morning and night, asking his wife about their two young girls, and what's going on back home in La Crosse.

Because he cannot afford health care, he relies on state-sponsored coverage for himself and his family. They are qualified to receive food stamps, but pride stops them from doing so. In his best year he earned $40,000, but last year he made only $9,000.

Much has gone wrong for him in the last few years, and he partly blames it on freight rates that have barely gone up while fuel and other costs have soared and eaten away at his profits.

He also has made some financial missteps, among them expecting tax write-offs for his rig to help his bottom line. Instead, he owes $15,000 in state and federal taxes.

And 25 years behind the wheel have taken its toll. Last summer, barely able to bend his back, he had surgery. One doctor had turned him away, saying surgery would be foolish since he would return to truck driving.

The surgery put him out of work for four months. Without savings, he took out a home equity loan to pay bills, then sold his truck's trailer and bought a less costly model.

He also has decided to sell his two-year-old $140,000 truck because the $2,000 monthly payments are killing him. To attract potential buyers Kobernick has had to steadily lower the asking price.

Once back to work, he initially drove his 18-wheel, 80,000-pound behemoth practically anywhere, as long as it brought in needed cash.

Now he focuses on the Florida run. Without looking at a map, Kobernick knows all the weigh stations, and the truck stops where there's room for the night--a growing problem for truckers.

"I haven't had a vacation in 12 years. I have no dental. No pension. No savings," he says as the sun's dying rays filter through pine trees in South Carolina. "Hopefully, I'll catch up one day here down the line. But right now that isn't going to happen any time soon."

Union dominance disappears

When did the dream of being a trucker turn sour?

It began after the government deregulated the industry in 1980, says Mike Belzer, a one-time Chicago trucker now a Wayne State University professor and trucking industry expert. Ever since, he says, it has been a "race to the bottom."

Before 1980, nearly 9 out of 10 over-the-road drivers were union members, he says. Today, 1 out of 10 carry a union card. That shift ushered in lower pay, fewer benefits and tougher working conditions.

It also made the highways far more dangerous as inexperienced and lower-paid drivers push themselves to earn more, Belzer adds.

"You get what you pay for," Belzer explains. It is a matter of choosing between a "skilled professional" and someone "from the soup line," he says.

New drivers' inexperience worries Kobernick too. Schmoozing at a warehouse in northern Kentucky, Kobernick swaps stories about new drivers with fellow trucker Jerry Knoy, 52, of Salem, Ind.

"I met a guy two weeks ago who said, `Hey, can you back my truck in for me,'

" Knoy says.

`Sweatshop on wheels'

By the late 1990s much of the industry was transformed into a "sweatshop on wheels," Belzer claims. Truckers' income, when adjusted for inflation, dropped steadily as the market was flooded with new companies, new drivers, and pressures from shippers and manufacturers to keep freight costs down.

Figures from the American Trucking Association show that between 1980 and 2005, the number of interstate trucking companies soared from 20,000 to 564,000. But nearly 90 percent operate six trucks or less, according to the industry group.

The result is a highly fragmented industry with "low profit margins," according to an association study.

Out of an estimated 3.3 million truckers, about 1.3 million haul freight. Of these, about 350,000 are independent drivers. Most own their trucks but lease them to companies. Or, in Kobernick's case, they work for whoever has goods for them to carry.

Some Teamsters members earn as much as $70,000 yearly, and industry experts say the salaries of drivers for large, non-union fleets are close. Overall, the average pay is about $35,000 a year.

The average independent driver earns about $40,000 a year, according to the Owner-Operator Independent Drivers Association, a Missouri-based group that represents about 140,000 drivers.

"But to make that $40,000, you've got to work about 120 hours" a week, says John Siebert, an official with the group.

Both mental and physical health can be impacted, he says.

Several years ago, when glancing through members' obituaries, Siebert discovered that their average age at death was 55. In his research, he also found a higher-than-average suicide rate for members and turned his findings over to NIOSH, which has been examining truckers' health for the last few years.

Siebert believes such problems are linked to difficult lives and financial stress. He ticks off organization surveys that show that nearly 9 out of 10 of its members are obese or overweight and nearly two-thirds expect to rely solely upon Social Security when they retire.

He especially worries about produce haulers like Kobernick who have highly unpredictable work schedules. If anything goes wrong, or their schedule is too tight, they lose out financially, and their health often is neglected as they push to work longer hours.

"These guys are working 100 to 120 hours a week, and their sleep patterns are all over the clock," he says.

Hard to stay positive

Kobernick is first in line in the morning outside the warehouse in Jacksonville, Fla. But he didn't have a definite time slot and workers say they can't unload him. That's it, a clerk coolly says and returns to her paperwork.

He phones the shipper, who tells him to leave the goods in a warehouse in Orlando.

That will mean two to three hours of lost time, and lost money spent on fuel and tolls--cash he didn't plan on spending.

Moreover, Kobernick is not sure he can make his next delivery on time in Pompano, and that unsettles him. He calls the warehouse and politely asks if they can stay open a little bit late. They say they can, but not much.

As he wheels his truck, the sunlight is blinding and Jacksonville's morning traffic seems glued to the road. He doesn't talk much this morning and unloads the truck himself in Orlando in order to get back on the road. There is no time for a break.

Luckily traffic is not bad, and he arrives with time to spare at a warehouse on a small side street in Pompano. Late in the afternoon he takes his day's first break at a farmer's market in Pompano, where truckers gather.

The banter is gloomy. Shipping rates are low, the truckers say. Some have been waiting days for a good load. Others are just tired of waiting and wondering about whether they can eke out a decent living.

The business, they say, is not what it used to be.

"There's no way a driver can go by the law," says a tired-looking, middle-age trucker. The group nods in agreement. They also complain about truckers who accept low rates that undercut others.

"There are guys sitting around here who'll take 75 cents a mile to get out of here. I need $1.50 just to make ends meet," grumbles Steve Hinton, 63, of Atlantic, Iowa.

Kobernick doesn't have time to kill. He rolls on to a warehouse west of Ft. Lauderdale, almost in the Everglades. He parks at the entrance to the warehouse, and just before 10 p.m. falls asleep in seconds.

By 5 a.m. he is already anxiously waiting for the warehouse to open. He has taken only one shower in four days and there's no place to wash up or go to the bathroom.

He has no idea whether he will have a good load going home. Time spent sitting is simply lost money because independent truckers are only paid by a share of the shipping costs or by mileage, not their time on the job.

"Every day something seems to come along to put us out of commission. But you just gotta keep that positive attitude," he says in the warm, lonely darkness.

Making The Highways Less Safe (NYT)

The New York Times, December 10, 2006

To describe the Bush administration's policy toward the trucking industry as deregulation is farcical. The word empowerment is so much more fitting for the array of trucking executives the White House appointed to be the ranking regulators of their own industry. While avowing professionalism, this cadre of political contributors and industry insiders has brazenly relaxed federal standards for truck safety over the last six years. Rather than tightening drivers' hours as safety specialists advised, the political powers at the truck safety agency have actually loosened them — increasing the maximum driving hours to 77 from 60 over seven days, and to 88 hours from 70 over eight consecutive days on the road.

The industry's deep-pocketed lobbyists made sure the Republican-controlled Congress remained as passive as any glassy-eyed driver involved in the annual toll of 5,000 truck-related fatalities. A detailed report in The Times by Stephen Labaton has laid bare the administration's shameful policy of industry pandering as the worst in a generation. Rather than fulfilling the standard set a decade ago to halve the death rate by now, the administration has let the industry continue as the nation's most treacherous. The accident fatality rate is nearly double that involving only cars.

The list of highway foxes embedded in the regulatory henhouse highlights the Bush era's anointment of big industry across the spectrum of public and worker safety, from mines to Interstates. The head of the government truck safety agency, Joseph Clapp, was a trucking executive who led a foundation that produced research ludicrously discounting driver fatigue as a factor in accidents. David Addington, a trucking industry force for loosened regulations, eventually became chief of staff to Vice President Dick Cheney — and a zealot for overweening executive power.

Reprimanded in court rulings for ignoring its own experts' findings about driver fatigue, the truck safety agency responded by reissuing the same faulty controls. These evade such obvious needs as stronger training and reliable electronic trip logs in place of "comic books," as grizzled long-haulers call their paper logs. Safety specialists point out there would be a national uproar if airline regulators dared to tolerate a fatality rate of 5,000 a year.

The Salamander Queen's Quest for Newt Markets

Never mind that Sheila Johnson's uber-luxe Salamander resort won't be opening in Middleburg until the summer of 2009 -- a few years behind schedule owing to zoning difficulties and environmental concerns.

She's keeping her signature lizard logo -- which already gave its name to her hunt-country farm, gourmet markets in Middleburg and Palm Beach and a line of pricey linens -- visible on a new jewelry collection launched Thursday night in Middleburg. About 100 friends and neighbors (and husband of 15 months, Judge William Newman) dropped by Mystique jewelry store, where basketball player Alana Beard of Johnson's Washington Mystics modeled a silver double-salamander necklace and earrings. (The Crowned Salamander Collection, which sells for $150 to $10,000, also includes cuff links, money clips, pendants and pearl necklaces.)

"Oh, man, I just have to cross market -- my team, my jewelry," Johnson told The Post's Annie Groer. "This is all part of the branding experience for the Salamander spirit."

The savvy billionaire is keeping busy while she navigates the tricky approval process for a 120-room hotel and spa on 340 acres located on the outskirts of Middleburg. On Wednesday, with Gov. Tim Kaine at her side (she was one of his largest donors in last year's campaign), Johnson announced a $5 million donation to the University of Virginia for preschool education. She's also dipping her toe into the District, exploring development of a hotel in a Northeast warehouse district.

The jewelry launch was accompanied with jazz and steak tartare, smoked salmon and crab cakes catered by (you have to ask?) Johnson's Market Salamander down the street. No, she doesn't miss a trick.

N.Korean Nuclear Talks To Resume Dec. 18 (AP)

By Anne Gearan

AP, December 10, 2006

A long-delayed round of international talks aimed at ending North Korea's nuclear weapons program is scheduled for later this month, a senior U.S. official said Saturday.

Talks are expected to reconvene Dec. 18 in Beijing and continue for three to five days, the official said. The official spoke on condition of anonymity because host China had not announced final plans.

North Korea has stayed away from the six-nation talks for more than a year, but agreed in principle this fall to resume negotiations. U.S. diplomats have been preparing for a new round, which would be aimed at implementing a moribund agreement by the North to renounce weapons and their development, but the date was uncertain.

The disarmament talks carry greater weight now that North Korea has exploded a nuclear device and tested a long-range missile earlier this year. Pyongyang ignored warnings against both actions from ally China and much of the rest of the world.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said last month North Korea must come to new talks ready to deal, or there is no point in holding them. It is not clear whether the North has made specific promises for the outcome of the new talks. But the U.S. official said China has promised the sessions will produce results.

The six nations — the United States, North and South Korea, China, Japan and Russia — signed a statement of principles in September 2005 outlining the assistance Pyongyang would receive in exchange for dismantling its nuclear weapons facilities. In addition to economic and energy benefits, the statement contains security guarantees for North Korea.

The United States announced Friday a series of sanctions against North Korea triggered by the official finding that it had triggered a nuclear device in the October test. Although the United States quickly decided Pyongyang had conducted a test, Bush signed an official presidential determination only Thursday.

With that determination, the United States was required to bar nuclear cooperation under the Atomic Energy Act and financial assistance under the Export-Import Bank. The United States provides neither to North Korea. The determination also requires a wide range of economic sanctions that already are in place.

The White House said the finding did not affect humanitarian aid.

Iran Expands Uranium Enrichment Program (AP)

By Ali Akbar Dareini, Associated Press Writer

Iran has begun installing 3,000 centrifuges in an expansion of its uranium enrichment program that brings the Islamic nation significantly closer to large-scale production of nuclear fuel, the president said Saturday.

President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad also claimed that the international community was caving in to Tehran's demands to continue its nuclear program.

"Resistance of the Iranian nation in the past year forced them to retreat tens of steps over the Iran's nuclear issue," the semi-official Fars agency quoted Ahmadinejad as saying. Fars is considered to be close to Iran's elite Revolutionary Guards.

Iran has been locked in a standoff with the West over its nuclear program. The U.S. alleges that Tehran is secretly trying to develop atomic weapons, but Iran contends its program is for peaceful purposes including generating electricity.

Iran said earlier this year that it intends to move toward large-scale uranium enrichment involving 3,000 centrifuges by late 2006, and then expand the program to 54,000 centrifuges, which spin uranium gas into enriched material to produce nuclear fuel.

Uranium enrichment at low levels can be used to produce fuel to generate electricity but at higher levels can be use to make atomic bombs.

"We have started installing 3,000 centrifuges" at a plant in central Iran, Ahmadinejad told a group of students in Tehran on Saturday, according to Fars. He said the move, at a plant in central Iran, marks the "first step toward industrial production.

"We will be able to produce our nuclear fuel once we install 60,000 centrifuges," he said.

Iranian nuclear officials say 54,000 centrifuges would produce enough enriched uranium to fuel a 1,000-megawatt reactor, such as the one Iran has built with Russian assistance at Bushehr, southern Iran. The reactor is due to come on stream next year.

The United States and its European allies have been seeking a U.N. Security Council resolution to impose sanctions on Tehran for refusing to suspend enrichment. But Russia and China have opposed tough action advocated by the U.S., Britain, Germany and France and the Security Council appears to have reached a standstill on the issue.

Iran announced for the first time in February that it had enriched uranium using 164 centrifuges, and it confirmed last month that it has stepped up uranium enrichment by injecting gas into a second network of centrifuges.

"When we built these centrifuges, they (the U.S. and its European allies) said Iran won't be able to assemble them. ... Now, a month has passed since we launched the second cascade," Ahmadinejad was quoted as saying.issue.

Ahmadinejad boasted last month that Iran would soon celebrate, probably in February, the completion of its nuclear fuel cycle program — from mining uranium ore to enriching it.

On Friday, key European nations circulated a revised U.N. resolution that narrowed the proposed sanctions on Iran in a bid to win Russian and Chinese support. The new draft would ban the supply of materials and technology that could contribute to Iran's program, but it gave much greater detail on what items would be prohibited.

Iran has said it will never give up its right under the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty to enrich uranium and produce nuclear fuel. Officials have said they plan to generate 20,000 megawatts of electricity through nuclear energy in the next two decade

Interests Drive U.S. To Back A Nuclear India (NYT)

By Somini Sengupta

The New York Times, December 10, 2006

NEW DELHI, Dec. 9 — Ask the champions of the landmark nuclear deal with India that President Bush is expected to sign into law next week why only that country will be allowed into the world's nuclear club while others are denied, and a common reason you will hear is this: unlike those others, India will be a responsible nuclear citizen.

But beyond simple good will, unique commercial and strategic imperatives have driven a bipartisan swell of support for the deal, even though New Delhi steadfastly rejects the global nonproliferation treaty and advances a nuclear weapons program.

The nuclear accord opens the door, for the first time in more than 30 years, for New Delhi to buy fuel, reactors and other technology to expand its civilian nuclear program.

R. Nicholas Burns, the United States under secretary of state for political affairs, called it the "symbolic center" of a sweeping new relationship with India. K. Subrahmanyam, a foreign policy analyst and one of the best-known Indian advocates of the nuclear partnership, called it a "litmus test for the future of India-U.S. relations."

The economic incentives for the United States are huge.

As India gradually opens its vast market, American companies stand to make a great many gains, from investments in Indian real estate to selling soybean oil and fighter planes. There is also New Delhi's growing strategic value in a rapidly changing Asia.

"We see India as important for both intrinsic and extrinsic reasons," said Ashley Tellis, senior associate at the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace and a former adviser to Mr. Burns. "Intrinsic because it's a large country growing very rapidly, it's a market for American goods, and a country with which we share common values. Extrinsically, India is a growing power in the context of where Asia is evolving."

That a contentious bill has enjoyed so much bipartisan support is revealing. Neither Democrats nor Republicans, it seems, think that the opportunity can be passed up.

"India can be an important partner on a range of issues, from combating the threat of terrorism and proliferation to promoting democracy and regional security," Senator John Kerry, Democrat of Massachusetts, said by e-mail late Friday from Washington. "Cooperation on the civilian nuclear front can move this essential partnership forward."

The Heritage Foundation, a conservative research group, described India as "a vibrant democracy with a rapidly growing economy," and predicted that good relations with New Delhi "will provide a stabilizing influence in Asia."

The two countries are poised to expand their range of counterterrorism operations. Just this year, in two major military deals unthinkable a few years ago, India bought a used American naval vessel and six military helicopters; together they are worth nearly $90 million.

India is also in the market to buy as many as 126 new fighter planes, and American manufacturers are eager to fill the order — a deal that could total as much as $6 billion. If they win the contract, the United States could well supplant Russia and Israel as India's biggest military supplier.

Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr., a Delaware Democrat set to take over the Senate Foreign Relations Committee next month, described the nuclear bill as implicit recognition of India's long-term value to the United States.

"We can talk about the various aspects of India's importance in the coming decades — as a counterweight to China, as a rising military power, as an energy consumer, as an economic force, as a bulwark against terrorism and extremism, as a cultural beacon throughout Asia and the world," he wrote by e-mail. "We can parse the various ways in which India will be vitally important — but we can't seriously question that India will be vitally important, and that's why I've been saying for years that there's no bilateral relationship more important than the one between the U.S. and India."

With the Indian economy growing at a steady clip of up to 8 percent in recent years, India last month hosted the largest American trade delegation to any single country, including vendors of nuclear equipment.

Wal-Mart recently announced its long-awaited entry into the Indian retail market. And Boeing has an $11 billion contract for 68 commercial airplanes for India's booming airline industry.

The Americans are nudging India to relax rules on foreign investment, notably in the banking sector. The U.S.-India Business Council, a lobby group, predicted in a news release that the nuclear law would "yield a bounty of opportunity for both our countries."

Many in India are already celebrating. On Saturday, the Hindustan Times, an English-language daily newspaper, boasted in a headline stretching across its front page: "India gets to have its nuclear cake and eat it, too."

Generally prickly about any perceived slights to its sovereignty, the Indian government had worried that Congress would attach conditions to the nuclear bill that would influence Indian foreign policy or emasculate its nuclear weapons program. One of those conditions, though not binding on New Delhi, calls for Indian cooperation to contain Iran's nuclear weapons buildup.

The Indian foreign ministry, in a statement Friday, welcomed the bill but made note of what it called "extraneous" requirements. "No legislation enacted in a foreign country can take away from us the sovereign right to conduct foreign policy determined solely by our national interests," it said.

India and the United States have yet to see eye-to-eye on a host of foreign policy issues, and they continue to have their own reasons to cozy up to each other's foes.

India, for instance, has cultivated closer ties to the military junta in Myanmar, or Burma, which Washington has consistently sought to isolate. Human Rights Watch earlier this week said that New Delhi had offered arms and counterinsurgency training to Myanmar.

The Indians say they reserve the right to cultivate the relationships they choose, and they naturally point to American affection for the government in Pakistan.

"There has to be a certain amount of understanding. If you have got some compulsions about Pakistan, we have got some compulsions about Myanmar," said Mr. Subrahmanyam, who is chairman of the Indian government's Task Force on Global Strategic Developments. "We are living in a very complex world, in which your interests and our interests are, at present, different. It will take time for it to be harmonized. All we can say is the door has opened."

Abbas Ponders Call For Early Elections (WP)

By Scott Wilson

The Washington Post, December 10, 2006

JERUSALEM, Dec. 9 -- Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas is inclined to call early elections, including for his own office, to end the political and economic crisis in the territories, Palestinian officials said Saturday.

The officials spoke after a meeting of the executive committee of the Palestine Liberation Organization that presented him with 17 options to end the months-long stalemate with the governing Hamas movement, whose leaders immediately rejected the proposed early elections. Abbas heads the influential panel, which is dominated by his Fatah party.

The proposals also included one to continue talks with Hamas over the formation of a power-sharing government acceptable to international donors, who cut aid to the Palestinian Authority following the radical Islamic movement's victory nearly 11 months ago in parliamentary elections.

Hamas, whose leaders reiterated as recently as this week their vow never to recognize Israel's right to exist, is classified as a terrorist organization by the United States, the European Union and Israel. Hamas is not a member of the PLO, which is recognized by Israel as the legitimate representative of the Palestinian people.

Abbas, a relative moderate, is expected to give a national address next week on how he intends to end the crisis that has battered the economy and increased partisan strife in the territories. He is under pressure from his own party to move decisively at a time when talks over a unity government have foundered again.

"After hearing all of the options, the president is leaning toward going back to the people with early elections for the presidency and parliament," said Saeb Erekat, the chief Palestinian negotiator and a member of the PLO's executive committee, who attended the meeting in the West Bank city of Ramallah.

Erekat said Abbas dismissed the option that he continue talks with Hamas, which ended Fatah's long monopoly on political power with its January election victory and has day-to-day control of the Palestinian government.

"He said, 'That's it, there will be no more talking,' " Erekat said.

Calling for early elections would mark an uncharacteristically bold gesture by Abbas, a cautious veteran of the Palestinian national movement who has long favored consensus over confrontation, even in his dealings with Israel.

For months, he has declined to exercise his authority to dissolve the Hamas-led cabinet, fearing that doing so would inflame partisan tensions. Both Hamas and his secular Fatah party have armed wings that have engaged in deadly clashes this year.

Elected to a four-year term in January 2005 after the death of Yasser Arafat, Abbas could sidestep legal questions over his ability to call early parliamentary elections if he also appears on the ballot. Palestinian election law is unclear on this point. But his aides say the president is allowed to dissolve parliament if he also submits to the vote, which polls show would not necessarily favor his party.

"The only exit from this crisis is a national unity government," said Ismail Radwan, a Hamas official in Gaza, adding that the movement would not submit to early elections. "Any other choice will not resolve it."

After the meeting, PLO officials said Abbas intended to call early elections while making clear in his address that he will continue talking with Hamas about a unity government up until the day of the election. His aides said he has not set a timeline for the election.

The negotiations over a unity government have stalled in recent weeks over disagreement about the government's platform and which party would control the important interior and finance ministries.

Demonstrations over unpaid wages, common during the international donors' boycott of the Hamas-led government, continued Saturday in Gaza and the West Bank. About 2,500 policemen stormed the parliament building in Gaza City, while several dozen parents protested with their children in West Bank health clinics against the Hamas government.

Abbas May Call Palestinian Vote, But Hamas Says He Lacks The Power (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger

The New York Times, December 10, 2006

JERUSALEM, Dec. 9 — The Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, was said Saturday to be leaning toward calling early parliamentary and presidential elections, according to officials of his Fatah faction who have been pressing him to break a governing stalemate with the militant faction Hamas.

Mr. Abbas has been trying for months to negotiate with Hamas to create a Palestinian unity government that can meet international requirements, including recognizing Israel's right to exist, and receive money to help pay employees.

But Hamas, which humiliated Fatah in January's elections, has been unwilling to meet Mr. Abbas's terms or to give Fatah crucial ministries like Interior and Finance.

So Mr. Abbas has been stuck, with top Fatah officials urging him to fire the prime minister, Ismail Haniya of Hamas, and to call new elections. Ten days ago, Mr. Abbas announced that negotiations with Hamas were over.

On Saturday, according to Fatah officials who met him, Mr. Abbas said he would address Palestinians soon. One official who refused to be quoted by name said that Mr. Abbas saw no alternative but to call early elections, and that he was not closing to the door to dialogue with Hamas, but would not take part.

Saeb Erekat, the senior Palestinian negotiator, who was also at the meeting, said, "My understanding from Abbas's words today is that he is leaning toward calling for early presidential and parliamentary elections."

Hamas spokesmen on Saturday called any new parliamentary elections an attempted coup, and said that Mr. Abbas did not have the power to call them. Mr. Abbas can call new presidential elections by resigning, and can fire the prime minister.

But any new prime minister and government must be approved by Parliament, which is controlled by Hamas. The law does not give Mr. Abbas the power to dissolve Parliament without its consent or to call early parliamentary elections.

Some aides have argued to him that his powers are implicit, or that he could call a referendum on new elections, circumventing the basic law. Mr. Abbas is said to be skeptical and worried about new clashes between the factions, but also believes that Hamas opposes a unity government.

Abbas May Call Early Palestinian Elections (LAT)

By Richard Boudreaux, Maher Abukhater

The Los Angeles Times, December 10, 2006

RAMALLAH, WEST BANK — Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas said Saturday that he planned to call early presidential and parliamentary elections, a risky move aimed at replacing the Hamas-led government and clearing the way for peace talks with Israel.

Hamas warned that any such step would be illegal and meet with resistance, raising the stakes in a months-long and often violent conflict over control of the Palestinian Authority.

"We will not allow any coup against this government," Hamas spokesman Ismail Radwan said.

Under pressure at home and abroad to take decisive action, Abbas revealed his intention to a closed session here of the Palestine Liberation Organization's executive committee, participants in the meeting said. But he withheld a formal announcement until later this week.

He left the door open to compromise with Hamas, saying there was still time for the Iranian-backed Islamic movement to hand power voluntarily to a multiparty "unity government" acceptable to Israel and the West. But he said he would no longer take part in negotiations with Hamas on the issue, which broke off early this month.

Hamas won control of the parliament and Cabinet by unseating the Fatah Party of the more moderate Abbas in January elections. That triggered economic sanctions by Israel and Western nations, including the United States, which demanded that Hamas renounce violence and recognize Israel's right to exist.

As economic hardship worsened in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, Abbas began pressing Hamas six months ago to give way to a unity government. The sanctions have left the Palestinian Authority unable to pay full salaries to its 165,000 employees, leading to frequent labor strikes and armed clashes between Fatah and Hamas.

On Saturday, at least 1,400 Palestinian policemen demanding their paychecks stormed the grounds of the parliament building in Gaza City and exchanged gunfire with a Hamas-led contingent of guards. Two guards were slightly wounded.

In the West Bank city of Hebron, dozens of parents carrying infants broke into a mother-and-child clinic that had been closed by a health workers strike.

The conflict has frustrated a recent push by the Bush administration to revive peace talks between Israel and the Palestinians after a six-year hiatus. Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert offered last month to hold talks with Abbas if the Palestinians installed a government that recognized the Jewish state and freed a captive Israeli soldier.

But Abbas told U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice last month that efforts to form a unity government had hit a dead end because Hamas insisted on keeping control of the police and the treasury.

Abbas summoned the PLO committee, an advisory group, to guide his next steps. Participants in the meeting Saturday said he accepted its recommendation to call parliamentary elections early next year, three years ahead of schedule, and decided after lengthy debate to put his own job on the line as well. Abbas was elected in 2005 to a four-year presidential term.

"I have done my part, and the status quo cannot be maintained," several aides quoted Abbas as saying. "I see no choice but to go back to the people."

Palestinian officials say it would take at least three months to organize elections once Abbas formally calls them.

The move would be a gamble for Abbas because it is far from certain that he and his party could win elections, or even conduct them if Hamas is violently opposed.

Hamas' popularity has slipped since it took office, but Fatah, which dominated Palestinian politics for four decades, remains divided and tarnished by corruption during the late Yasser Arafat's rule.

Two respected polls taken in September gave Fatah small leads over Hamas in voter preference.

In its initial reaction to Saturday's decision, Hamas indicated it would boycott any new elections. Hamas spokesmen contended that Abbas has no authority to call elections early; aides to the president said that because Palestinian law does not address the issue, he is free to do so.

Saeb Erekat, a veteran Palestinian negotiator who took part in the meeting, said Abbas believed it would be "difficult for Hamas to resist going back to the electorate."

An aide to Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh said Saturday that Hamas preferred to resume negotiations on a unity government. "The door is still open because this is the best and safe alternative for all of us," the aide, Ahmed Yousef, told the Arabic satellite television channel Al Jazeera.

On Friday, Haniyeh reiterated that Hamas would never recognize Israel or any Arab peace agreements with the Jewish state.

Early Election Talk Angers Hamas (BBC)

BBC.com, December 9, 2006

The Palestine Liberation Organisation's executive committee has backed early elections to end the deadlock over forming a national unity government.

The Hamas group, in power since winning January's parliamentary polls, reacted by condemning the suggestion.

PLO officials said after meeting President Mahmoud Abbas that he would have their support for early polls.

DOJ_NMG_0104782

The Palestinian Authority has been under a Western financial boycott since Hamas's victory.

Mr Abbas is expected to announce his decision in the coming week.

Speaking to the BBC, one of his top officials said he believed the president was minded to call parliamentary and presidential polls.

"The status quo cannot be continued - it is a disaster on the Palestinians," said Saeb Erekat.

Palestinians, he added, had to choose between the approach of Mr Abbas and his Fatah faction and that of Hamas.

The current Hamas-led administration has been denied direct Western aid because it refuses to renounce violence, recognise Israel or accept previous Israeli-Palestinian agreements.

'Coup'

Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniya condemned the idea of early elections, saying they would accentuate "crisis and tensions".

"I think that the invitation to carry out the elections in this way is disrespectful to the Palestinian people," he told Iranian television, in an interview dubbed into Persian.

A Hamas spokesman in Ramallah, Ismail Rudwan, described the PLO committee's statement as a threat to democracy.

Lebanon's Shiites Grapple With New Feeling Of Power (WP)

By Anthony Shadid

BEIRUT, Dec. 9 -- As morning clouds hovered overhead Saturday, Fadil Ayyash wiped eyes that were bleary from just two hours of sleep over two days in the city-within-a-city that Hezbollah's protests in downtown Beirut have become.

The mood in his tent, set alongside a site for luxury apartments, was playful. The first order of business was stoking a water pipe. Under two yellow Hezbollah flags, with a hint of mischief, he and his friends unveiled their makeshift fireplace, charred cinderblocks stacked on a sidewalk still warm from a campfire the night before. But they spoke bluntly -- of frustration and protest, of politics and power -- the vocabulary of a moment the young Shiite Muslim men feel they are defining.

"How is this democracy?" Ayyash asked, pointing to the colonnaded government headquarters known as the Serail, standing like a citadel atop a hill. "The majority is here," he said, waving his hand across rows of protesters' tents.

His friends nodded, sprawled in brown plastic chairs.

"These days," he said, "we have to seize our opportunity."

Once the country's most downtrodden, entrenched in feudal misery, Lebanon's Shiites stand today on the verge of their greatest political power in the history of a diverse country defined by its fractious religious communities: Sunni and Shiite Muslims, Druze and Christians. But their ascent is a story of contradictions: Now at the peak of that power, confident of victory, the community is still shaped by its own sense of vulnerability and weakness.

Its leaders rely on age-old notions of backroom, under-the-table Lebanese politics replete with patronage, a cult of leadership and the influence money buys. But they may be reshaped by leaving a legacy of turning to the street with populist demands. And in pursuit of power, through the protests that began Dec. 1, the Shiites, the country's single-largest community, may end up breaking a system that appears to be buckling under the stress of Lebanon's most acute crisis since the 15-year civil war ended in 1990.

The drama unfolding here draws on a long history of persecution, both real and perceived, but is propelled by the most recent events in Lebanon, as Shiites try to shape the country following the Syrian withdrawal last year and, as important, the war with Israel this summer.

"The battle has already begun," said Mona Fayad, a Shiite professor of psychology whose criticism of Hezbollah in an article published this summer in the Lebanese newspaper al-Nahar made her a cause celebre here. "They've opened the gates of hell. This is how I've felt the past few days."

"It's like a snowball, and it's now so hard to stop," she said. Her voice was slow and weary. "Even if they stop it now before anything else happens, we're still going to have a lot of trouble. And if they don't?"

She left the question unanswered.Forging an Identity

DOJ_NMG_0104783

In the southern village of Khiam, along hills green from winter rains, Zeinab al-Sheikh Ali sat in a house within sight of the Israeli border. Two pictures of Hasan Nasrallah, the leader of Hezbollah, were posted at the entrance. "Victory from God," one read in Arabic, Hezbollah's slogan for this summer's 33-day war with Israel. "Divine Victory," another said in French. But, shaking her head, Ali, the 70-year-old matriarch, remembered a more distant time.

"The days of our grandfathers," she called it.

There is a joke heard in Khiam and elsewhere in Lebanon, itself a bitter critique of the days when the community was rural, marginalized and illiterate, dominated by a traditional elite of reactionary clergy and landowners with feudal Ottoman-era titles. Shiite peasants went to the home of a prominent Shiite clan leader and asked him to build a school. He looked at them, confused and a little surprised. His reply: Wasn't it enough that his own son was going to school and getting an education?

The community's fortunes began to change in the 1960s after the arrival of Musa al-Sadr, a cleric born in Qom, Iran, as a religious leader. In time, he bridged gaps between Shiites in the south and the Bekaa Valley, undermined the influence of clans and inculcated the Shiite community's sense of itself. His charisma was so great that young Lebanese clerics began imitating his Iranian-accented Arabic. But in 1978, he disappeared while on an official visit to Libya, never to be heard from again. The Iranian revolution followed a year later, and after the 1982 Israeli invasion of Lebanon, Iran helped found Hezbollah.

Lebanon's civil war forced the Shiite community, like others, to defend itself as a group amid growing anarchy. By the end of the war, it was newly emboldened, its power was bolstered in the government and the community entered the civil service in force. The government sent billions of dollars to the south, tangled in staggering corruption, and money poured back into Lebanon from Shiite expatriates in Africa.

Within the community, Hezbollah grew stronger, as it fought the Israeli occupation that ended in 2000. In the guerrilla war, the group honed its military arm, with elaborate recruitment and the building of an arsenal supplied by Iran and conveyed through Syria. It weathered Israeli offensives in 1993 and 1996.

Today, in power and influence, Hezbollah has eclipsed its rival, the Amal movement of Parliament speaker Nabih Berri. Its social infrastructure of schools, hospitals and orphanages sprawls across the south; it prides itself on incorruptibility. And with its ascent are a culture and language steeped in the resistance to Israel it celebrates, along with an arsenal that, while many Shiites are reluctant to state it publicly, delivers the community confidence.

"Without the weapons, we'd get slapped across the shoulder," said Imad Abu Mehdi, a shop owner in Khiam.

To its followers, Hezbollah's appeal is reflected most powerfully in the personality of Nasrallah, sometimes simply called the sayyid, perhaps the most compelling figure the community has had since Sadr's disappearance nearly 30 years ago.

"Tell them that we are stronger than tiredness, stronger than hunger, stronger than cold, stronger than weariness, stronger than bombardment and, of course, stronger than attacking us with words," Nasrallah said in a fiery speech broadcast to the protest Thursday.

"He was talking golden, the words were precious," said Ali, the matriarch in Khiam.

Ali sat with her sister-in-law, Zeinab Ismail, whose son, Ahmed, was killed in this summer's war with Israel. Ismail fled the conflict for the relative safety of the Bekaa Valley in the north. When she returned, the doors of her home were blown out, its windows shattered. The homes of two sons were destroyed. Ahmed had spent nearly two years in the Israeli-run jail in Khiam in the late 1990s. Red worry beads he fashioned while there are now draped over his portrait, his stern visage glaring down from its perch above the door.

"No one has sacrificed more than the Shiites," Ismail said.

Ismail and Ali talked about past and present, the two often intersecting seamlessly in a narrative replete with suffering and martyrdom that stretches to the 7th century. Their conversation was punctuated, as it often is in southern Lebanon, with the rhetoric of class and disenfranchisement and the symbolism of martial sacrifice: the language of Nasrallah. For every ill, they blamed a government they said was rife with corruption and bent on preserving its power, neglecting the people in the south.

Without Hezbollah, Ali said, sipping a glass of lemon-flavored tea, "we'd only have God."Questioning Hezbollah

The words of Fayad's article, published before this summer's war ended, were blunt, even polemical. In language that was straightforward and at times simplistic, the psychologist questioned the very tenets of Hezbollah's ideology: notions of sacrifice, resistance and honor.

"What does it mean to be a Shiite?" she asked.

"To be a Shiite means that you do not question the meaning of victory," she wrote. "To be a Shiite means that you do not question the meaning of resistance and pride." She went on: "To be a Shiite is to accept that your country be destroyed before your very eyes -- unsurprised eyes, that is -- and that it comes tumbling down on your head, and that your family be displaced and dispersed and become refugees and that you accept standing up to the enemy without a word of complaint."

"You see," she wrote, "we are a nation of heroes that knows nothing but sacrifice."

By her estimate, the article prompted 30 more in response. She received hundreds of calls and 300 e-mails. She said many were supportive; others were indignant that someone would write in such a way while the country was under Israeli attack; "pathetic," one person scolded her.

Dressed in a sports jacket and wearing wire-rimmed glasses, Fayad, 55, sat at her home on an overcast day. She was bleak: She already sees the shadows of a civil war, as Hezbollah mobilizes its Shiite constituency and the government stages almost daily shows of solidarity among Sunni Muslims and others. She feels her life is in danger. And she wants to leave Lebanon.

"It is unacceptable I pass my life from war to war, for the sake of others," she said. "What kind of craziness is this?"

No one knows with certainty what percentage of the Shiite community Hezbollah represents. Critics such as Fayad and others suggest it is about a third. But she and other intellectuals who bristle at its dominance over Shiite politics illustrate, in a way, the group's power: Hezbollah and, to a far lesser extent, Amal represent the only organized Shiite voices in a system defined by communal politics. As a result, their ambitions become the community's ambitions, their tactics become its tactics.

"They can't speak in the name of the Shia," said Mohammad Mattar, a lawyer with a fondness for Cuban cigars. "It's very simple. They cannot." Mattar talks in the precise, logical language of a legal brief. At times, he opens the window to air his sleek downtown office of smoke.

"Lebanon will cease to exist if one party monopolizes power or becomes all too strong," he said, his voice matter-of-fact. "A lot of people like me are very worried that the delicate Lebanese policy might disintegrate if this goes on."

The Shiites "were poor, and they were left to fend for themselves for 40 years of Lebanon's independence," Mattar said, staring from underneath his thick, black-rimmed glasses. "But this is not an excuse to do what you are doing."

The critique of Mattar and Fayad and others runs from the question of representation (unaccountable, in Mattar's view) to Hezbollah's ties to Iran and Syria (an instrument of their foreign policy, he said) to the very culture of resistance to Israel.

At a deeper level, their critique illustrates the contradictions of Lebanese politics: In the grammar of sectarianism, where Sunni, Shiite and Druze communities have coalesced around leaders, each claiming an effective right of veto, national identity has become second. As the Shiite community reaches for its greatest power ever, there is little debate within the community -- beyond articles, statements by dissident clerics and vestigial influence of clans -- over how to use that power.

"We are stranded. We can neither go here nor there," Mattar said. "People like me are left on our own."'They Became Something'

In some ways, Hossam Yassine represents the changing fortunes of Lebanon's Shiites. Yassine is college-educated, back from a job in the Persian Gulf. And every day this week, he has gone to the festival-like protests, in part for the party, in part because Hezbollah wants him to and in part because he believes.

"Hezbollah came and made something for the Shia, that we are here," the 22-year-old said.

He pulled his black leather jacked around his shoulders. His cheerful face was lined with the trace of a goatee.

"They were nothing, and they became something."

He walked past rickety stands selling date-filled cookies, bread with melted cheese and popcorn. A banner-size cartoon of two men hung to the side: "Are you a Christian or Muslim?" one asked. "I'm hungry," the other replied. Flags, shirts and caps were for sale -- yellow for Hezbollah, orange for its Christian ally, former general Michel Aoun. A little ways down, another placard asked, "What's more beautiful than living with dignity?"

"In two weeks," Yassine said, smiling, "they're going to have to pay the people to get them to leave."

He walked through the sleek downtown, its upscale offices and pricey condominiums at the heart of the vision of a new Beirut downtown promoted by former prime minister Rafiq al-Hariri, a Sunni Muslim billionaire killed last year in a car-bomb assassination.

"There are a lot of places in Beirut where people are building homes no better than tents. They flood in the winter. Why don't they take care of these people?" Yassine asked. "Why only here, in this small spot of land?"

He shook his head, more resigned than angry. "This wasn't built for us."

Yassine walked past campsites. "No to the pourers of tea," slogans read on the sides of tents, a reference to Lebanese police who served tea to Israeli soldiers this summer as they occupied the southern town of Marjayoun.

He read them, then furrowed his brow. For the first time, his voice took on an edge.

"If I'm a man, 60 years old, I've fought 25 years, 30 years, until now for one aim, to expel the Israelis and to keep the Americans away. I've lost a lot of things -- my father, my brother, my good life, and I sit at my home watching the Israelis get in peace what they couldn't get in war? Watching, just watching. Put yourself in the same situation. You would feel angry."

In a way, the protests today are a microcosm of the currents swirling through the Shiite community, promoted by Hezbollah with its intuitive feel for the sentiments of its rank and file. They are the equivalent of a new kind of politics in Lebanon, drawing on the street, roiled by populist demands: a protest over government corruption, a denunciation of the United States and Israel, a celebration of the war this summer, tinted with a sense of betrayal at the hands of other Lebanese, and a call for change, however ill-defined it might be.

To Yassine, it is a world view that rarely, if ever, intersects with that offered by the government's supporters; it pits righteousness against wrong, and victory, however long it might take, is inevitable. He said he couldn't envision an alternative.

"From the beginning we weren't treated well. Not just now. From the previous government and the government before that," Yassine said. "The people aren't going here because what Sayyid Hasan said. Sure, they'll do what he says. They love him. But they're going here because they're unhappy. I'll go not one night, two nights or three nights. I'll go for a year or two years."

As the protests wound down, he got into his car, driving back to the Dahiya and its densely populated warrens, where electricity is cut for hours every day. Armored personnel carriers were parked every so often, and knots of soldiers hung around intersections along streets that divided Sunni and Shiite neighborhoods. "It's like a border," he said. Along one road, six armored personnel carriers drove by, followed by three jeeps. A little ways down, he was stopped briefly at a checkpoint.

"Where are you coming from?" the soldier asked. "Downtown," he said, and drove on.

His mood turned a little bleak, a little less optimistic than at the protests.

"They can't let any fight get big," Yassine said. "If a small fight gets big, Lebanon is gone."

Leading Lebanon From A Gilded Cage (LAT)

By Megan K. Stack

The Los Angeles Times, December 10, 2006

BEIRUT — In the palace on the hill, the chants and curses from the street below are easy to hear.

The voices float up through the clear wintry air, wisps of tension rising from the roiling anti-government demonstrations. Weary ministers listen to the heart-pounding bass beat of Hezbollah fighters' anthems, the political speeches screamed into microphones, the roar of the crowd. After sunset, the glare of floodlights arches like a gigantic halo over the tent city that's cropped up in the upscale shopping districts of downtown.

Inside the Grand Serail, what remains of Prime Minister Fouad Siniora's government toils away, trying to ignore the thousands upon thousands of people massed at its gate. The people outside describe the government leaders as unwanted and illegitimate, pawns of U.S. interests.

"We hear their voices, but we feel no compassion for them," said Fouad Saad, a lawmaker and former Cabinet minister who, in his neat suit, lingered between meetings under the glittering chandeliers of a cavernous reception room. "These people have received orders from Syria and Iran…. They are trying to drag us backward many years."

This is the kernel of a dangerous political standoff. The government stays put, refusing to regard the raucous calls from the protesters for its officials' resignations. Instead, they say, foreign powers are scheming to take over the country.

The Grand Serail is a hulking sprawl of an Ottoman-style palace that was ravaged by civil war and reconstructed as a proud icon of a nation's rebirth. It now stands isolated behind snarls of razor wire and layers of soldiers and security forces.

In the shabby maze of tents below, the mood is stoical and confident. The demonstrators seem convinced that the government will, inevitably, collapse, that Siniora and his allies cannot stay in place with so many people on the streets.

"When this stuff happens in other countries, the government falls," said Sami Harb, a 21-year-old computer communications student.

Tough talk on both sides

On a cold night, Harb paced the pavement near the line where demonstrators' tents were pitched next to the tanks and soldiers that seal off the main road to the palace. He turned up the hill, and waved an arm in disgust.

"Here somebody died," he said, referring to a young Shiite Muslim man shot and killed in sectarian-tinged street fighting, "and Siniora is still sitting right up there."

Organizers insist that the demonstration will remain peaceful. Still, some protesters speak of overrunning the palace if the government doesn't leave.

But in a tough-talking interview last week at his heavily fortified home in Beirut, Saad Hariri said that his allies would never be driven from office by the Hezbollah-led demonstrations. Hariri, the head of the Sunni Muslim community and leader of the parliament's majority bloc, said that to give up would be akin to handing Lebanon over to Iran and Syria.

Even if fighting erupts, even if stability is shaken, the government will stay, Hariri said.

"You're not preserving stability, you're killing your democracy," he said of resignation. "It's about putting Lebanon in the hands of Syria and Iran."

Pro-government parties are planning counter-demonstrations in coming days, he said, adding that he was having a hard time keeping his supporters off the streets. In Sunni neighborhoods, men speak openly of their thirst for revenge.

"You have no clue how many people call us: 'We want weapons, we want this,' " Hariri said. "We have to be the Gandhis of Lebanon. We have to stand in their faces and say no."

In the meantime, the army has swarmed and cut off every road that leads to the Grand Serail. The surrounding neighborhood has been swallowed in an expanded security zone. Visitors have to pass through an army checkpoint, then walk along a once-bustling street now rendered ghostly, footsteps echoing off closed shops.

Soldiers sprawl on the steps of a church. Perhaps out of desperation or optimism, a lone merchant has kept his interior decorating shop open for customers who can't get there.

Inside the Grand Serail, many of the Cabinet ministers have been living, almost on top of one another, in the guest quarters. They have been there since one of their number, Pierre Gemayel, a Christian, was gunned down in November. They are afraid that if they leave, the same will happen to them.

A recent visit found Youth and Sports Minister Ahmed Fatfat drying his socks on a radiator and chatting with his visiting wife.

What the ministers know about events in the tent city below they mostly get from television.

The other night, the ministers huddled together before a television set to hear Hezbollah chief Sheik Hassan Nasrallah insult them.

They heard Nasrallah, arguably the most popular political leader in Lebanon, refer to "what remains of this falling government in the Serail."

He called them a "government of one color and a despotism of one group," a "dead end," "the government of the American ambassador." They heard him say that he would keep his people at the gates until the government fell. And they heard the crowd scream with the throaty abandon of a rock concert, hoisting their toddlers on their shoulders, chanting, "God preserve Nasrallah!"

When the Hezbollah chief finished speaking, the sky thundered with fireworks and celebratory gunfire.

Support by the busload

The ministers woke up the next morning and pressed on with business. These days, "business" seems to involve accepting moral support and doing work that will be moot if the government falls.

Day after day, the buses rattle into town from the mountains in the north, the cities of the south, the Bekaa Valley. One day it's a delegation of Bedouin tribes, another day the Druze, or supporters from Sidon, the southern port that's home to the powerful Hariri family and Siniora.

A swarm of visitors from Sidon was ushered through the grand stone hallways and sleepy courtyards last week, and packed into a hall where they staged a tiny counter-demonstration. They stood on their chairs, waved pictures of Lebanon's Sunni leaders and sang the national anthem.

"Today it's the turn of the people of Sidon to come," said Omar Hariri, a 50-year-old engineer. "You have to chose a side, to be on one side or the other."

"What's happening outside is disgusting," added Maher Chamma, also 50.

When a pale, weary-looking Siniora swept to the front of the room, borne along on a swift current of bodyguards, the cheers rang off the high ceiling. "May God bless you," the people cried. "With our blood and our souls, we will redeem you, Siniora."

Siniora launched into a speech deriding Hezbollah. Then he told them, "Sitting with you gives me a lot of comfort."

But when it was over, the visitors were packed back into buses and driven off through the back entrance, out of sight of the demonstrators.

Passing through a courtyard where pigeons splashed lazily in a fountain, Social Affairs Minister Nayla Mouawad said she had just finished writing a request for international money to help Lebanon rebuild from the summer war between Israel and Hezbollah.

"We are working much better and more efficiently than before," she said, her tone defiant. "You can concentrate here. You don't have the house, you don't have the children."

But moods shift fast. A moment later, Mouawad said she felt physically threatened. She fretted about rumors that demonstrators might try to take the palace by force.

Both sides insist they are open to negotiation. But at the same time, Nasrallah said his party would be wary of wasting time. And Hariri, too, seemed pessimistic.

"My only concern is, do they have the authority to negotiate?" Hariri said. "Because their authority comes from outside, from Iran and Syria.

"We did not create the problem," he added. "They created the problem."

Poisoning Inquiry Extends To Germany, Where Radiation Is Found (WP)

By Peter Finn, Mary Jordan

MOSCOW, Dec. 9 -- German police said Saturday that they had found traces of radiation in two apartments in the Hamburg area connected to a Russian businessman who met with Alexander Litvinenko, a former Russian intelligence officer who died after being exposed to a deadly radioactive isotope.

German authorities said that the businessman, Dmitry Kovtun, had visited the two apartments, which belong to his ex-wife and former mother-in-law. Kovtun is reportedly seriously ill in a Moscow hospital.

Police said they had not found traces of radiation in Kovtun's own apartment in Hamburg.

The poisonous and politically charged trail of the radioactive polonium-210 that killed Litvinenko on Nov. 23 has now touched three countries in a case that brings fresh twists every day without yet revealing its source.

The budget airline carrier Germanwings said Saturday that it had taken out of service the plane that carried Kovtun from Hamburg to London on Nov. 1, but tests at the Cologne-Bonn airport later turned up no signs of radioactive contamination.

Traces left before Nov. 1, the day Litvinenko fell ill, could lead police to its source.

Critics of Russian President Vladimir Putin, including Litvinenko, have accused the Kremlin of being behind the killing in an effort to publicly squash a vocal detractor; the Kremlin rejects those accusations as absurd and says Putin enemies desperate to tarnish the president are more likely candidates for suspicion.

Kovtun, 43, a Russian business consultant who has spent years living in Germany, is emerging as a key figure in the investigation. While there are conflicting reports about his condition, the Russian news agency Interfax has reported that Kovtun is in serious condition and experiencing problems with major organ functions as a result of the poisoning.

Kovtun and another Russian businessman, Andrei Lugovoy, met with Litvinenko in the Pine Bar at the Millennium Hotel in London on Nov. 1, the day Litvinenko began feeling sick. A third Russian, Vyacheslav Sokolenko, said he also briefly met with Litvinenko at the hotel, which is located in central London on the same square as the U.S. Embassy.

Lugovoy has also tested positive for radiation poisoning but is reportedly still in good health, though meetings between him, Russian investigators and Scotland Yard detectives have been repeatedly postponed.

Lugovoy, a former KGB agent, and Kovtun attended the same military academy in Moscow in the 1980s. Both men have denied any involvement in the poisoning and say they are victims of a conspiracy.

Damien Wood, a manager of the luxury Millennium Hotel, said that despite the notoriety, the hotel remains "very busy. We are fully booked tonight." He said the Pine Bar, where Litvinenko met Lugovoy and Kovtun, remains shut indefinitely.

The British Health Protection Agency said this week that seven employees of the Pine Bar had tested positive for small traces of polonium-210. Wood said all of them continue to work at the hotel. On Saturday evening, a police van was parked outside the hotel, and a lone officer stood guard in front of the closed bar.

In a recent interview with Echo Moskvy radio, Kovtun said he was a business consultant who had lived in Germany for 12 years but had also set up a business in Moscow. He said he spoke with Litvinenko, whom he first met at another meeting in London on Oct. 16 to discuss possible business deals with British companies interested in investing in Russia and looking for expert advice.

Police in Hamburg stressed that Kovtun was not a suspect.

Russian prosecutors this week opened a criminal investigation into the attempted murder of Kovtun after he was found to be contaminated with radiation.

Russian authorities, who have said they will lead the interrogations and have essentially consigned British detectives to the role of observers in Moscow, told the Associated Press on Saturday that they intend to send their own investigators to London.

That has caused some consternation among emigres who were close to Litvinenko, many of whom are fierce critics of Putin. Two of Litvinenko's associates, exiled tycoon Boris Berezovsky and Chechen separatist Akhmed Zakayev, are wanted by the Russian authorities on various charges. British courts refused to extradite them, accepting their arguments that the charges against them were politically motivated.

The idea of Russian investigators coming to London "adds insult to injury," said Alex Goldfarb, who has been acting as a spokesman for the Litvinenko family. He said Putin had created an "authoritarian government" that controls the judiciary and prosecutors. "It cannot be taken seriously . . . the Russians are playing a game."

In an interview, however, Goldfarb added, "If British police believe this is the only way to get access to real suspects in Moscow, then we have no choice but to play in this unseemly game."

He said Berezovsky and Litvinenko's widow, Marina, reacted with the same "ironic comment: They would only talk to Russian investigators if they were tested first for carrying polonium-210."

German Police Detect Traces Of Radiation At Two Sites Linked To Litvinenko Contact (AP)

AP, December 9, 2006

HAMBURG, Germany (AP) — German police said Saturday that they had found traces of radiation at two sites in and near Hamburg linked to a contact of poisoned former Russian spy Alexander Litvinenko.

Police said they found traces of alpha radiation at the Hamburg apartment of the ex-wife of Dmitry Kovtun, who met Litvinenko in London on Nov. 1, the day the former spy is believed to have fallen ill.

They also said an initial scan had shown contamination at the home in Haselau, west of the port city, of his ex-wife's mother.

Meanwhile, tests have shown no trace of the radioactive substance polonium-210 on a plane used by a contact of Litvinenko to fly to London, German airline Germanwings said Saturday.

Authorities carried out tests at Cologne-Bonn airport after determining that Dmitry Kovtun flew to London from Hamburg on the Airbus A319 on Nov. 1. Kovtun met with Litvinenko later that day.

Airline spokesman Heinz-Joachim Schoettes said the plane was taken out of service at Cologne-Bonn airport after authorities informed the company that Kovtun flew to London from Hamburg aboard the aircraft on Nov. 1.

Reports that Kovtun flew to London from Hamburg prompted police in the northern port city to begin their checks.

Kovtun, one of two Russians who met Litvinenko at London's Millennium Hotel, is reportedly being treated in Moscow, also for radiation poisoning.

Specialists found no trace of polonium-210 at the apartment of Kovtun himself in the Hamburg district of Ottensen.

However, police said in a statement Saturday they found radioactive "contamination that makes a fine examination necessary" at two locations in an apartment in the same building used by Kovtun's ex-wife.

They said during the night they had found indications that there had been a source of radiation in the apartment, but added that they had not found the source.

Police later sealed off the ex-wife's mother's home in Haselau, outside Hamburg, for further tests after finding traces of contamination there.

The traces were found in the bathroom and living room of the Hamburg apartment, and on a bed and a chair at the Haselau property.

Further tests were to determine whether the contamination was linked to polonium-210. Police spokeswoman Ulrike Sweden said they could last as long as two days.

Kovtun's ex-wife and her mother were questioned by police. Authorities did not identify the 31-year-old ex-wife.

Sweden said early Saturday that it was unclear whether Kovtun had returned to Hamburg after meeting Litvinenko.

She said it was possible that either a person or an object could have been the source of radiation in the Hamburg apartment.

While German authorities were in contact with British police, the search was "purely protective" and not part of any investigation against Kovtun, Sweden said.

Police have said the traces found so far represent no health risk to local residents. However, they said that about 30 people who live in the Hamburg apartment building would have to vacate it while tests continue.

A German Twist In Poisoning Trail (LAT)

By Jeffrey Fleishman

The Los Angeles Times, December 10, 2006

BERLIN — The mystery surrounding the poisoning death of a former Russian spy has veered to Germany, where investigators Saturday found traces of radiation in an apartment connected with a businessman who met the ex-KGB agent on the day he fell ill.

Police said "hints" of radiation were detected in the Hamburg apartment of Dmitry Kovtun's former wife. Traces were also discovered in the nearby suburban home of the ex-wife's mother. Kovtun met with ex-KGB agent Alexander Litvinenko on Nov. 1 in London, where police suspect he was exposed to the radioactive polonium-210 that killed him three weeks later.

Kovtun, a Russian businessman, is reportedly ill in a Moscow hospital.

Authorities said although contamination was detected, they did not find a radiation source in either building.

Police discounted media reports suggesting that Kovtun, who reportedly lived in Germany for 12 years, planned Litvinenko's assassination in Hamburg. No traces of radiation were discovered in Kovtun's apartment, which is in the same building as his ex-wife's in the northern port city's Ottensen neighborhood.

"At the moment, this man has not been accused," police spokeswoman Ulrike Sweden told German radio.

The airline Germanwings said that one of its planes was being tested for polonium-210. A spokesman told reporters that Kovtun flew on the plane from Hamburg to Britain the day he met Litvinenko. Media reports said no contamination was found. Police are investigating whether Kovtun returned to Hamburg after the meeting at London's Millennium Hotel.

The murder investigation has skipped across the continent and led to allegations by Litvinenko's family that intelligence services connected with the Kremlin were behind the plot.

Moscow has begun its own investigation. Russian authorities are expected to question Andrei Lugovoy, a businessman and former KGB colonel who was with Kovtun at the meeting with Litvinenko. He also is ill.

About 30 people were evacuated from Kovtun's building. Police told tenants there was no contamination danger, but asked them to "move out during the time of investigation."

Spy Widow Points Finger At Russia (BBC)

BBC.com, December 10, 2006

The widow of former KGB agent Alexander Litvinenko has said she believes the Russian authorities could have been behind his murder.

Marina Litvinenko, 44, told the Mail on Sunday: "Obviously it was not Putin himself, of course not."

But she said what President Putin "does around him in Russia makes it possible to kill a British person" in Britain.

She said she had confidence UK police would find her husband's killer, but would not help Russia's planned probe.

Mrs Litvinenko told the paper Russian authorities had not yet been in touch with her.

"I do not think I will help them with their investigations," she said.

"I can't believe that they will tell the truth. I can't believe if they ask about evidence they will use it in the proper way."

Traces of a radioactive substance, polonium-210, were found in Mr Litvinenko's body.

Two of the 26 police officers closely involved in the Litvinenko inquiry have tested positive for traces of that radioactive substance.

The Metropolitan Police said the polonium traces were "relatively small" and were "below defined safety limits".

Both officers are being monitored by health specialists.

Mr Litvinenko's widow denied he had ever been a spy

Mrs Litvinenko also told the Mail on Sunday her husband's last words to her last month before he died of suspected polonium-210 poisoning were: "Marina, I love you so much."

She also said she would do everything she could for "Sasha", as her husband was known to family and friends.

"Even until the last day, and the day before when he became unconscious, I thought he would be okay. We were both completely sure he would recover, " she told the newspaper.

"We had been talking about bone-marrow transplants and looking to the future."

Mrs Litvinenko said the couple's 12-year-old son had found his father's death "very difficult", but he had been trying to comfort his mother.

Friends of Mr Litvinenko believe he was poisoned because of his criticisms of the Russian government, but the Kremlin has dismissed suggestions it was involved in any way as "sheer nonsense".

'Speaking out'

His widow told the Sunday Times she had decided to speak out after some "completely untrue" reports suggested her husband was a man of dubious character.

She told the paper he had been an honest man and a crime fighter rather than a spy.

Mrs Litvinenko also told the Sunday Times: "Everybody tries to write about Sasha like he was an ex-spy, but it's completely untrue. He never was a spy."

She said her husband's public claims about his former employers at the FSB, Russia's secret police, had alienated them, the paper reported.

She said Mr Litvinenko knew "you can never escape from the FSB and he was starting to speak openly about crime."

She added: "I can't say (it was) these people but I'm absolutely sure they didn't forgive him for what he did."

When An Ex-K.G.B. Man Says They're Out To Get Him... (NYT)

By Scott Shane

DOJ_NMG_0104791

I CALLED Alexander Litvinenko in London to ask him about poison and the K.G.B., and he was glad to oblige. Yes, he said in that interview two years ago, he believed that the Russian security agency was behind the dioxin poisoning of Viktor Yushchenko, who was running for president of Ukraine.

The view inside the K.G.B. and its successor, the F.S.B., where he had worked for a decade, "was that poison is just a weapon, like a pistol," Mr. Litvinenko said. He even gave the Moscow address of what he said was an F.S.B. poison laboratory. "I was told there were 11 poisons for different uses," he said, and added one more prescient detail. The same laboratory, he said, worked on "radioactive items."

Today, the British police are following the radioactive trail of Mr. Litvinenko's killer from London to Moscow, where two Russian associates of his are reported to be sick, possibly from radiation. Mr. Litvinenko's slow and agonizing death last month from ingestion of polonium 210 is an act of radiological terrorism that has not been solved. But its grisly exoticism — targeting a British citizen in his adopted country — seemed almost a throwback to the ruthlessness of the Stalin era, when it was part of the code of the K.G.B. to kill its apostates where it found them.

In the interview, which seemed hysteria-tinged at the time, Mr. Litvinenko said that Russian authorities had marked him for assassination. He e-mailed me a photograph of the charred wall of his London apartment, damaged by a Molotov cocktail. He sent the manuscript of his book, "Blowing Up Russia," which charged that apartment bombings in Russia, officially blamed on Chechen rebels, were in fact the work of the F.S.B.

Neither the book nor Mr. Litvinenko's writings at Chechenpress.org were subtle. In one posting last year, he imagined enraged Russians storming the Kremlin, to "crack this citadel of barbarity and violence" and "murder the main security officer Putin and his assistants in the Kremlin toilet."

If Mr. Litvinenko's killing was a response to such verbal attacks, it would mark the distance Russia has traveled from the late 1980s, when K.G.B. leaders were grilled by the first elected Parliament and a K.G.B.-led coup crumbled. In 1989, addressing that Parliament, Yuri P. Vlasov, who had earned celebrity as an Olympic weightlifting champion, denounced the K.G.B. on live television as "a real underground empire" responsible for "millions of people murdered."

The next year, a retired K.G.B. major general, Oleg D. Kalugin, joined the nascent reform alliance Democratic Russia and became the first insider to denounce the security service on its own turf. Mr. Kalugin ran for Parliament himself, and then participated in the East-West spy thaw that seemed to consign the cold war to history. In 1996, he even co-starred with a former Central Intelligence Agency director, William E. Colby, in a computer game called "Spycraft."

But meanwhile the K.G.B., divided into the domestic F.S.B. and the Foreign Intelligence Service, or S.V.R., bided its time. President Boris N. Yeltsin considered dismantling the K.G.B. but "decided it was too dangerous," said Michael McFaul, a Russia specialist at Stanford University.

In the seven-year rule of President Vladimir V. Putin, the security service has returned to prestige and power. "All the most important jobs in Russia today," Mr. McFaul said, "are held by K.G.B. or former K.G.B. officers, in every ministry, in every industry."

Mr. Kalugin, facing increasing hostility at home, settled for good in the United States. In 2002, the onetime rising star of Russian democracy was convicted of treason by a Moscow court and sentenced in absentia to 15 years in prison. For decades, he said, any K.G.B. officer who defected was automatically tried and sentenced to death, and officers overseas were expected to carry out the sentences. In the late 1960s, when Yuri Andropov became K.G.B. chief, the practice faded. "He never formally ended it, but he found reasons not to give the orders," said Mr. Kalugin, who knew Mr. Andropov well.

Now the practice may be back and playing out in a world where former K.G.B. officers, with murky continuing relations with the successor agency, are found in many countries. Mr. McFaul said that whoever killed Mr. Litvinenko chose the gruesome murder weapon to deter others who would openly break with the F.S.B. and the regime. "The message is: Be afraid. Be very afraid," he said.

Message received, said Alex Konanykhin, a former Russian banker who fled to the United States in 1992 after former K.G.B. officers muscled him out of his own business. After he discussed Mr. Litvinenko's death on CNN, anxious friends called both from Russia and the United States to urge him to keep quiet.

"They say, 'What are you thinking? It's too dangerous,' " said Mr. Konanykhin, who runs a computer company and recently published an autobiography, "Defiance." He has continued to speak out, but he acknowledges, "It's chilling."

Mr. Kalugin, now living near Washington, says he regularly receives threats. Russian press reports since Mr. Litvinenko's death have quoted hardliners as saying that Mr. Kalugin is now first on the list of turncoats targeted for death.

Does he fear assassination?

Mr. Kalugin replied with a humorless laugh that was neither a yes nor a no. "I've led a good and interesting and honest life," he said.

U.S. And Foreign Regulators Consider Tightening Controls On Deadly Polonium 210 (NYT)

By William J. Broad

The New York Times, December 10, 2006

Nuclear regulators in Washington and abroad are studying whether to tighten security on polonium 210 in case terrorists seek the deadly material for so-called dirty bombs that spew radioactivity, officials and diplomats said in recent interviews.

The evaluation is based on longstanding fears about the possible terrorist threat as well as the polonium 210 poisoning that on Nov. 23 killed a former Russian spy living in exile in Britain and stirred public unease. British authorities traced the risk of radioactive contamination to a dozen sites around London and commercial jets carrying more than 33,000 people. The poisoning was an apparent first that caught the authorities by surprise.

Groups considering tighter controls include the Nuclear Regulatory Commission in the United States and the International Atomic Energy Agency in Vienna, which sets global standards for radiation safety. "There are no sirens wailing," said a senior European diplomat familiar with the agency's polonium 210 reassessment. "But there's a sense that we need to rethink how it is categorized," and thus controlled.

Officials and diplomats, some of whom spoke on the condition of anonymity because of the delicacy of the deliberations, said the agencies were carefully monitoring developments in London and Moscow. Meanwhile, private experts called tighter controls a potentially important step for public safety.

"It's very wise to put fairly strict limits on the commercially available amounts of polonium," said Thomas S. Tenforde, president of the National Council on Radiation Protection and Measurements, a Congressionally chartered group in Bethesda, Md., that advises the federal government on radiation safety.

Dr. Tenforde called the amounts of polonium 210 now available on the commercial market "not trivial" and said the contemplation of tighter controls was prudent given the risk of terrorists using polonium 210, a radioactive material, in urban attacks meant to sow disease and death. "It's a very nasty isotope," he said, "to put it mildly."

Commercially, polonium 210 is used to make static eliminators that remove dust from film, lenses and laboratory balances, as well as from paper and textile plants. The radioactive material is sealed tightly to make it hard to remove.

A dirty bomb, unlike a true nuclear weapon, uses ordinary explosives in its core and radioactive materials on the outside. If detonated in a city, it would scatter radioactive dust and debris which, in the worst case, might kill hundreds and sicken thousands of people. Nuclear experts call polonium 210 one of the most toxic materials known to science. A tiny speck can kill.

Even so, experts initially saw the highly radioactive material as a poor candidate for dirty bombs because skin or paper can easily stop its distinctive rays. It must be inhaled, injected or ingested to do harm. Moreover, its short half-life, just 138 days, means it loses potency relatively fast. On the other hand, its rays are hard to detect compared with those of most other radioactive materials, making it difficult to track.

After the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, Washington looked anew at the deadliness of polonium 210 and decided that the material warranted more scrutiny as a potential weapon of terrorists.

In May 2003, a team from the Energy Department, which runs the nation's nuclear arms complex, and the Nuclear Regulatory Commission issued a lengthy dirty-bomb report that called polonium 210 one of 10 radioactive materials "of greatest concern." The 10, the report said, "should be given first priority for consideration of increased security measures."

In November 2003, the Nuclear Regulatory Commission began an interim effort to track the sources. But it took three more years, until Nov. 8, before the commission issued a final rule spelling out the workings of its program, officially called "National Source Tracking of Sealed Sources." The rule is to take effect early next year.

In theory, the system can track polonium 210 sources. But in interviews, commission officials said the reporting threshold was so high — 16 curies, which translates in standard risk estimates into more than 5,000 lethal doses — that it exceeded all known industry sources and products.

"We have not seen any polonium sources over 16 curies," said William R. Ward, a safety manager at the commission. "The rule will have no impact."

Other officials said the commission was monitoring the polonium drama overseas and evaluating the need for tighter controls. "Things are still unfolding," said Timothy E. Harris, a commission chief for radioactive source safety and security.

After he spoke, health authorities in London and Moscow raised the total number of people known to be contaminated by the polonium to at least 10 beyond the doomed spy, Alexander V. Litvinenko.

A senior commission official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity, said his agency was considering lowering the threshold for tracking polonium by a factor of 10, to 1.6 curies. But its first priority, he added, was to get better reporting and security for materials even more dangerous for dirty bombs than polonium.

Russia's Poisoned Democracy (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, December 10, 2006

THE RADIOACTIVE poisoning death of former KGB spy Alexander Litvinenko is mushrooming into a tale of intrigue that is mesmerizing and confusing in equal measures. But the cloak-and-dagger theatrics threaten to obscure an urgent danger at the story's heart — journalists in President Vladimir V. Putin's Russia are increasingly being attacked and killed.

The latest Litvinenko news is the stuff of a John Le Carre novel: Two Russian businessmen, one of them a former KGB colonel, and an Italian investigator — all of whom who met with Litvinenko just before he fell ill — have also suffered poisoning from polonium-210.

Traces of the material were also found in employees of the London bar where Litvinenko and the Russians met and on aircraft that flew between Moscow and London. Meanwhile, former Russian Prime Minister Yegor T. Gaidar fell severely ill in Dublin and also claims to have been poisoned, though not with polonium and, he insists, not by the Kremlin.

We may never find out whodunit or who ordered it done, but we know what Litvinenko was investigating at the time of his death: the killing of decorated Russian journalist Anna Politkovskaya, who had been exposing alleged Russian misdeeds in Chechnya.

Were the killings of Politkovskaya and Litvinenko isolated incidents, the Kremlin's protests that it suffers most from the bad international publicity would be more worthy of sympathy. But Politkovskaya was at least the 21st Russian journalist to be killed since Putin was elected in 2000, according to Reporters Without Borders. Two others have disappeared and are presumed dead, and there have been 320 assaults.

This would be alarming in any country, but it comes during a period in which the Russian government has nationalized private TV stations that had been critical of the regime, backed the takeover of independent media by political allies, arrested media executives or forced them into exile and repeatedly brought criminal charges against journalists. The human rights group Freedom House ranks Russia as simply "not free" when it comes to the media.

The result has been de facto impunity for those who would enforce public silence — be they corrupt government officials, sleazy businessmen, gangsters or any others who fear exposure or debate. That some news outlets have accepted payment to print or withhold sensitive information in the anarchic post-Soviet marketplace certainly complicates the picture.

But the pattern of censorship, intimidation and deadly violence against the Kremlin's fiercest critics makes it increasingly difficult to give Putin the benefit of the doubt.

Politkovskaya, one of the bravest reporters of her generation, was gunned down Oct. 7 in what many suspect was a contract killing. She is the third journalist from her newspaper, Novaya Gazeta — one of the last Russian publications that dares do investigative reporting — to die.

Last month, two other Novaya Gazeta reporters received death threats; one was investigating Politkovskaya's slaying. While the newspaper's staff risks their lives to shed light on the inner workings of Putin's Russia, the West has a moral obligation to insist that the Russian government protect them.

Taiwan Leader's Party Wins In Mayoral Vote, But Recount Is Sought (NYT)

By Keith Bradsher

KAOHSIUNG, Taiwan, Dec. 9 — President Chen Shui-bian's Democratic Progressive Party eked out the narrowest victory in Taiwanese political history in crucial mayoral elections here on Saturday, but the opposition Nationalist Party quickly said it would seek a recount.

The Central Election Commission in Taipei announced that with all ballots counted, the Democratic Progressive Party candidate in Kaohsiung had won by 1,120 votes out of more than 760,000 cast, a victory margin of about one seventh of a percent. On an island with already deep political divisions, the paper-thin margin and the possibility of a court fight are likely to cause further political friction in the weeks ahead.

Joanna Lei, a senior Nationalist lawmaker, said that party officials would ask the municipal election commission here to conduct a recount. Municipal election commissions have the discretion to order recounts when the outcome is decided by less than 1 percent of the vote.

Taiwan's legislature discussed whether to require recounts in close elections after President Chen narrowly won re-election in 2004, but never acted on the idea.

Both parties also threatened to sue each other in district court here on Monday, and began demanding that all ballot papers and other records be sealed at the courthouse.

Democratic Progressive Party officials accused the Nationalists on Friday and Saturday of paying people to attend a rally on Friday night; the Nationalists accused the Democratic Progressive Party of violating a law that bars parties from making any statements that may influence the election outcome after 10 p.m. the night before the polls open.

Even before the polls closed, the authorities here prepared for a close election by assembling a dozen busloads of riot police and heavy steel barriers fringed with barbed wire to defend the courthouse, where ballots are sent after an initial count in polling districts. Kaohsiung has a history of violent street protests.

But local Nationalists appeared more stunned than angry, and the streets around the courthouse were quiet on Saturday evening. Police officers at the courthouse sat on the pavement next to their riot shields or snoozed on the nearby buses.

The Nationalist Party had sought to turn mayoral elections here and in Taipei on Saturday into an informal referendum on President Chen, who has been dogged by allegations that he and his family have committed financial impropriety.

A Nationalist Party candidate, Hau Lung-bin, won the election in Taipei by a wide margin. That had been expected because northern Taiwan, including Taipei, tends to support Nationalist candidates while southern Taiwan, including Kaohsiung, more often votes for Democratic Progressive Party candidates.

While Saturday's vote represented a reprieve of sorts for President Chen, it may have also strengthened the Nationalist Party, which favors closer relations with mainland China. James Soong, a former Nationalist who split with the party and set up a rival party, the People First Party, ran as an independent in the Taipei mayoral race but attracted just 4 percent of the vote.

Mr. Soong announced after the count that he would leave politics, which could clear the way for the People First Party to combine with the Nationalists, a move the two parties have been negotiating off and on for at least three years.

The vote count here showed Chen Chu, the Democratic Progressive Party candidate, with 379,417 votes, compared to 378,297 for Huang Chun-ying, the Nationalist candidate.

Taiwan Rival Parties Split Mayoral Wins (AP)

By Stephan Grauwels, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 10, 2006

Taiwan's ruling party narrowly won a crucial mayoral election in one southern city Saturday, while the opposition candidate won comfortably in the capital of Taipei in a pair of votes seen by many as a referendum on President Chen Shui-bian.

Chen Chu of the Democratic Progressive Party bested Nationalist Party candidate Huang Jun-ying by slightly more than 1,100 votes in Kaohsiung — a result likely to boost the position of the corruption-tainted president.

Huang said Sunday he had requested a recount of the nearly 800,000 ballots cast in the southern industrial city. The Kaohsiung District Court decided to seal off ballot boxes from all the city's polling stations to prepare for a recount, Judge Chen Chia-hui said.

In Taipei, the Nationalists' Hau Lung-bin beat the DPP's Frank Hsieh by about 13 percentage points with all the votes counted.

Chen Chu's victory in Kaohsiung — albeit by the narrowest of margins — seems likely to take pressure off of the president, who has been on the defensive for more than six months over allegations his family and inner circle benefited financially from their proximity to him.

The two Chens are not related.

On Nov. 3, prosecutors indicted Chen's wife and three former aides on charges of embezzling $450,000 from a special fund under presidential control. They said Chen could face the same charges when his presidential immunity from prosecution lapses after his term ends in 2008.

Allegations of vote-buying marred the election in Kaohsiung, long a DPP stronghold. The DPP claimed Huang's campaign workers handed envelopes containing $31 to people on a bus returning from his final election rally late Friday.

Huang on Sunday accused the ruling DPP of violating election law by making a false accusation against him on the eve of the election.

Voting took place without major problems in Taipei, where polls had shown Hau as a strong favorite. Hsieh's relatively robust showing — he garnered almost 41 percent of the vote, far higher than the DPP's expectations — is likely to put him in a good position to contest the party's 2008 presidential nomination.

While the corruption allegations against Chen Shui-bian played a major part in both the Taipei and Kaohsiung campaigns, candidates from the opposing parties also emphasized their positions on Taiwan's relations with mainland China, from which the island split amid civil war in 1949.

Hau and Huang support expanded Taiwanese trade ties with Beijing, reflecting the Nationalists' platform in favor of eventual unification with China.

By contrast, Chen Chu and Hsieh support strengthening Taiwan's de facto independence and play down the importance of expanded trade with the mainland.

Taiwan's Ruling Party Dodges An Electoral Bullet (LAT)

By Mark Magnier, Tsai Ting-i

The Los Angeles Times, December 10, 2006

TAIPEI — Taiwan's ruling party defied expectations that it would be trounced in local elections Saturday, handing President Chen Shui-bian some breathing room after months of fighting off scandals. But the mixed results probably will result in continued political infighting at least through the 2008 presidential election, analysts said.

In the two most closely watched races, the ruling Democratic Progressive Party narrowly won the mayoral race in the city of Kaohsiung and the opposition Nationalists won handily in Taipei.

The elections were seen as a referendum on Chen, who has been battling corruption-related allegations for six months. Chen's wife and three former aides were indicted last month on charges of embezzling $450,000 from a national affairs fund under presidential control. The prosecutor said Chen could face the same charges when his term — and presidential immunity — ends.

The Kaohsiung victory boosted morale in the president's office: Pundits and opinion polls had predicted a humiliating loss for candidate Chen Chu. The results also bolstered the party's reputation for running excellent grass-roots campaigns.

"This has been the most difficult election for the DPP," party Chairman Yu Shyi-kun said. "Nobody believed we could win."

But the narrow victory margin could prompt a recount. Chen Chu (not related to the president) won the mayor's seat by just 1,120 of 800,000 votes cast.

The Kaohsiung race was marred by voting fraud allegations, which are not unusual in local Taiwan elections, though both parties have tried to clean up the process in recent years.

DOJ_NMG_0104796

The ruling party claimed that campaign workers for the Nationalists distributed envelopes containing the equivalent of $31 to bus passengers returning from an election rally late Friday. The Nationalists have denied wrongdoing.

In Taipei, Hau Lung-bin of the Nationalists defeated his ruling-party rival by about 13 percentage points.

"I voted for the Nationalists because the ruling party has been too corrupt," said cosmetologist Hsu Yen-ling, 44. "It's time to bring the opposition back into power."

But Nationalists' defeat in Kaohsiung denied their party the sort of mandate they had hoped for heading into legislative elections in 2007 and the presidential race. Party Chairman Ma Ying-jeou, Nationalists' expected presidential candidate, has pledged to shake 7,000 voters' hands a day, and reportedly had assistants count them, perhaps as practice for 2008.

"Ma campaigned very hard, but it is obvious his style is not appreciated by voters here in the south," said Liao Da-chi, a political science professor at Kaohsiung-based National Sun Yat-sen University.

Analysts said a lame-duck president and a divided electorate almost guaranteed that Taiwan would continue to muddle along politically for the foreseeable future.

"There isn't enough pressure on the president to step down, so the current situation will continue," said Philip Y.M. Yang, a political science professor at National Taiwan University. "We probably won't see much getting done in the next one or two years."

HK Voters Begin Choosing A Leader (BBC)

BBC.com, December 10, 2006

Voters in Hong Kong are electing the members of a committee that will choose the territory's next leader.

Pro-democracy groups are hoping to win enough representation on the 800-seat committee to enter a candidate in next March's chief executive contest.

There are 427 seats being contested, with the rest already allocated.

Candidates will need the backing of at least 100 members if they want to challenge the incumbent, Donald Tsang, who is backed by China.

Mr Tsang is expected to win re-election when he final vote is held.

Beijing 'worried'

The BBC's Vaudine England, in Hong Kong, says that the democrats already admit that their chosen potential candidate, lawyer Alan Leong, has no chance of beating Mr Tsang.

But for the first time since Hong Kong was handed back to China by the UK in 1997, the democrat groups now say they feel that it is worth taking part in the contest.

Atmosphere

Sunday's election is not expected to make a wide impact in Hong Kong, where just over 200,000 people from a population of 7.2 million are eligible to vote.

The electorate is drawn from a selection of political organisations and business and professional communities.

"The atmosphere so far is no good, ordinary citizens have no idea there is an important election," said James Sung, a political scientist at Hong Kong's City University.

Of the 373 seats already allocated, 96 are assigned to members of Hong Kong's assembly, or to Hong Kong members of the National People's Congress in Beijing.

Other members are appointed through their professions or through political appointment.

S. American Leaders Aim For EU-like Body (AP)

By Dan Keane, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 10, 2006

South American leaders agreed Saturday to create a high-level commission to study the idea of forming a continent-wide community similar to the European Union.

DOJ_NMG_0104797

The presidents and envoys of 12 nations wrapped up a two-day summit of the South American Community of Nations, hosted by Bolivian President Evo Morales in Cochabamba, a city tucked between the Andes and the Amazon in the heart of the continent.

"We seek that South America be forever a region of peace that works to solve the economic problems of its historically abandoned majority," Morales said.

The leaders agreed to form a study group in Rio de Janeiro to look at the possibility of creating a continent-wide union, and even a South American parliament.

Brazilian President Luiz Inacio Lula da Silva, a former metalworker who was re-elected in October, assured his fellow leaders that the group could rise above its historical divisions to unite the continent — though the process would not be easy.

"We must have patience, and try to solve these issues with delicacy," Silva said. "The solutions are difficult. We're not just simple workers talking about a strike at the factory."

The result left fiery Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez, long an agitator for the region taking a greater role on the world stage, pleased but impatient.

"We need a political Viagra," Chavez said. "Look, we make decisions and we don't have the power to execute them. They're stuck in these pyramids of paper."

The discussion over South American unity likely will continue later this month when the leaders of Brazil, Argentina, Venezuela, Paraguay and Uruguay gather in Brazil for the semiannual meeting of the Mercosur trading bloc.

Morales opened Saturday's round-table discussion calling for the leaders to close "the open veins of Latin America," referring to Eduardo Galeano's famous 1971 book decrying foreign capitalist exploitation. But how to staunch the economic bleeding was a matter of debate.

Chile's Socialist President Michelle Bachelet, whose country has a free trade agreement with the U.S., said globalization had "two faces" — one "potentially very destructive" but another that presented a "historic opportunity for societies like ours."

She urged South American leaders to take advantage of the world economy while minimizing the impact of open trade on the poor.

Chavez, however, expressed blunt opposition to Washington-backed free market prescriptions and boasted that leftists in the region have "buried" U.S. hopes of a hemispheric free trade agreement, an effort launched a decade ago.

He joked that nations signing a free trade pact with the U.S. are subsequently "flooded with chickens' hind quarters."

Though the two did not meet one-on-one, Chavez and Peruvian President Alan Garcia took advantage of the summit to bury the hatchet after exchanging personal insults during Garcia's presidential campaign earlier this year.

In Saturday's forum, Chavez enthusiastically seconded Garcia's call for a continentwide effort to improve education — despite the Peruvian leader's subtle dig at Chavez's ambitious proposal to build a natural gas pipeline across the length of the continent.

"If we don't teach a faith in this integration, all is lost," Garcia said, adding that education reforms would "cost much less building an aqueduct or a great big highway to integrate our countries."

Ecuadorean President-elect Rafael Correa has proposed a land-and-river trade route linking Brazil's Amazon rain forest to Ecuador's Pacific coast, saying it could be an alternative to the Panama Canal.

Chavez also said he was offering his oil-rich nation's refining capacity to Ecuador to help the country slash high energy costs. He said Venezuela would charge only the cost of refining as part of the deal, which is similar to those extended to other nations in the hemisphere.

Correa had no immediate comment on the offer.

Chavez also has extended a hand to close ally Morales. On Sunday, the two presidents will celebrate the groundbreaking of a gas separation plant in Bolivia's gas-rich Chaco region, a joint venture between Petroleos de Venezuela SA, or PDVSA, and Bolivia's state energy company.

Chavez, a fierce critic of President Bush, has used Venezuela's petrodollar wealth to counter U.S. influence in the region. Venezuela is the only Latin American member of OPEC and has the largest proven oil reserves outside the Middle East.

The Best Of Both Dictators (WP)

By Michael Shifter

The Washington Post, December 10, 2006

The parallels are striking: Two ruthless dictators who sacrificed human rights for political aims. Two men idolized by their followers and despised by the exiles they drove away. Two archetypes of the Latin American strongman, one in dark sunglasses, the other with that ever-present cigar. For the past half-century, no two leaders have so defined Latin America's political scene as Cuba's Fidel Castro and Chile's Gen. Augusto Pinochet.

They ruled from opposite ends of the spectrum -- Castro on the far left, Pinochet on the hard right -- their regimes similar only in their harshness and in the intense passions they evoked. Today, as the two ailing men take their final bows, their repressive political models are rightfully repudiated in most of Latin America, giving way to more democratic governments. Yet the legacies of Castro and Pinochet will loom large, and will long outlive them. They have been tyrants in life, but after their deaths, they will still shape the Latin America they leave behind.

For all their faults, both men tapped into the basic reality of the region and forged responses that will mold Latin America's political and social agenda for generations. Castro recognized the fundamental social inequities that mar the region, the most unequal in the world; Pinochet embraced the market and its power to lift an economy. And the new governments of the region are drawing on both those veins in their quest to better their citizens' political and economic futures.

The human rights records of both men are undeniably dismal. Since the Cuban revolution of 1959, Castro, now 80, has overseen extensive human rights violations, including thousands of executions, especially in the first years after he took power. Repression and tight government control continue to this day. Castro has long justified the tyranny on grounds that it was essential to creating a communist Cuba that emphasizes universal education and free health care, as well as to shielding the island from the constant threat of Washington-engineered regime change. Because of his self-styled image as a defender of the downtrodden and as an underdog standing up to the United States, he remains a hero to many not only throughout Latin America, but worldwide.

Pinochet, in contrast, has few fans outside Chile -- and even there the number of supporters has substantially dropped off. He upended Chile's democratic tradition with a military coup in 1973 and ruled for 17 years before leaving office in 1990. With the abduction, torture and killing of thousands of opponents -- in the name of ridding the country of Marxist influence and creating order out of chaos -- his regime helped turn the word "disappear" into a transitive verb. Only now, at 91, has Pinochet accepted responsibility for what happened during his rule. Small consolation for the families of all those victims.

Fortunately, no government in Latin America today practices the sort of politics that will be forever linked to Castro and Pinochet. The closest heir to either is newly re-elected Venezuelan President Hugo Ch?vez, who would like to assume the mantle of leader of Latin America's left when Castro dies. Some Venezuelans fear that, emboldened by his recent landslide victory, Ch?vez will now make a strong push to implant the Cuba model in their country. But circumstances have changed too dramatically since the 1960s for that to happen.

Castro put his finger on Latin America's fundamental grievance -- the social injustice and inequality that prevails there. Recent elections in Bolivia, Brazil, Costa Rica, Ecuador, Mexico, Nicaragua and Peru have highlighted the renewed importance and urgency of the social agenda. Over the next year, incoming governments of varying ideological hues are likely to put even more emphasis on social programs that respond to widespread frustration and mounting expectations. New leaders will thus sound many of the same egalitarian notes long sounded by Castro.

Yet in practice, many of these governments will carry out some of the same economic policies espoused by Pinochet, relying primarily on the market in pursuit of their social goals. Even Ch?vez relies on the oil market to finance his social programs. In the 1970s, the Pinochet regime, influenced by the late economist Milton Friedman, pioneered the embrace of market reforms in Latin America, including privatizing state enterprises and liberalizing trade. The country went through a tough period in the early 1980s, but Pinochet's economic prescriptions eventually set it on a path that has made it Latin America's best economic performer in recent decades.

Despite the meager fruits of market reform elsewhere, and the corruption wrought by privatization efforts (recent revelations that Pinochet stashed millions of dollars in secret accounts in the former Riggs Bank in Washington have further tarnished his reputation), polls show that most Latin Americans still favor such changes-- albeit carried out honestly, and accompanied by stronger social support programs. Today's ruling coalition government in Chile exemplifies this new current in Latin American politics. Economic performance in the 17 years of democratic rule has been superior to that under Pinochet. And poverty levels have declined from more than 40 percent in 1990 to below 18 percent in 2005.

In Latin America today, the public wants the market-driven growth that draws on the Pinochet experience and the focus on social equality inspired by Castro -- but in a democratic context, without the terror and autocratic rule that marked the two regimes.

It wants, in short, the best of both.

Fiji Coup Leader Runs Want Ads For Cabinet Posts (AP)

AP, December 9, 2006

SUVA, Fiji (AP) — Fiji's coup leader ran want ads in local newspapers Saturday to fill vacant Cabinet jobs, trying to piece together a new government for the south Pacific country.

Army chief Frank Bainimarama has removed a swath of senior civil servants, including top police officers, saying he is weeding out corruption entrenched in the administration of ousted Prime Minister Laisenia Qarase.

"Applicants must be of outstanding character and without any criminal records," the advertisements noted, asking aspirants to submit applications at military headquarters by Tuesday. "Each must not have been declared bankrupt."

"The deadline indicates the urgency in trying to get qualified people in to help in the running of the affairs of the state," Maj. Neumi Leweni, a military spokesman, told state-owned Fiji One News television. He added that the posts of finance and foreign affairs ministers would not be advertised.

Bainimarama's hand-picked interim leader, Maj. Jona Senilagakali, took over the prime minister's office for the first time Friday, arriving with an armed military guard. Some top government officials have been reappointed, the Fiji Times newspapers reported, including the chief executive officers for tourism and agriculture.

An aide for Qarase, meanwhile, said the ousted prime minister would return to the capital of Suva within days despite the risk of arrest.

"We know we will have a reception party at the other end," Sakeasi Ditoka told The Associated Press, referring to troops Qarase expects to meet him at Suva's airport.

"We know what's going to happen. But we need to come back for everybody's sake," Ditoka said. "The people want their leader among them."

Qarase fled the capital to his home island in the Pacific archipelago's north after Bainimarama seized power Tuesday and declared himself president.

Bainimarama has received signs of support from a key opposition leader and the country's powerful tribal chiefs, but has faced a wave of international repudiation.

The 53-nation British Commonwealth suspended Fiji on Friday, a decision Leweni said had been expected. It was the third time in 20 years that the Commonwealth suspended the country following a coup.

Qarase told Australia's Nine Network television the decision was "a very positive move." The U.N. Security Council and the European Union have also condemned the coup — Fiji's fourth in nearly two decades.

The coup was the culmination of a long impasse between Bainimarama and Qarase over legislation offering pardons to conspirators in a 2000 coup and handing lucrative coastal land ownership to indigenous Fijians. Bainimarama said the bills were racist.

Czech Leader Still Hunts For Government (NYT)

By Craig S. Smith

DOJ_NMG_0104800

PRAGUE, Dec. 8 — It was St. Nicholas Day, Dec. 6, and Mirek Topolanek, this country's prime minister, was on his way to see the president for his lump of coal.

For six long months, the Czech Republic has waited with increasing impatience for Mr. Topolanek to form a government that can win a vote of confidence from a Parliament perfectly split along partisan lines.

He had promised President Vaclav Klaus that he would present a winning cabinet by the holiday, when St. Nicholas and the Devil make their rounds to distribute candy to the good children and coal to the bad.

But he had no cabinet ready.

"Next week," Mr. Topolanek said with evident exasperation before leaving his office in the town's Parliament building.

This small Central European country, which nearly 17 years ago slid so softly from Communism to capitalism that its transition was called the Velvet Revolution, is suddenly finding democracy something of a puzzle. The combination of a backstabbing political culture and a parliamentary system that provides no tie-breaker in the case of an evenly divided legislature has left the country on autopilot since national elections in June.

The crisis shows how far the region's post-Communist political culture has to go before it is mature, but it also indicates that the area's political systems are remarkably secure.

"You would expect, after six months with no stable government, that the politicians would talk about the country, but they only talk about strategic moves and how to get more votes," said Jiri Pehe, a political analyst here.

But not even the Communist Party, he added, is antidemocratic. "The Constitutional framework and the underlying institutions are strong enough for the country to keep running without a government," he said.

The problem began as parliamentary campaigning for national elections came down to the wire in June. The left-wing Czech Social Democratic Party, which had led a governing coalition for the previous eight years, looked as if it could win again.

Then, four days before the voting, a police report packed with dark allegations about the party was leaked to the news media. None of the claims, from pedophilia to murder, have proved true, but the report dominated front pages. Mr. Topolanek's center-right Civic Democratic Party swept the election, winning 81 of Parliament's 200 seats and leaving the Social Democrats with 74.

The ruckus over the report left both sides bruised and angry. Mr. Topolanek's Civic Democrats huddled in his corner with two allied parties, vowing never to form a coalition with the Social Democrats. The Social Democrats, for their part, closed ranks with the Communists, and promised to block any government they weren't part of. Each camp had 100 seats on its side, setting up the stalemate that continues to this day.

The departing Social Democratic Party prime minister, Jiri Paroubek, and his ministers sat in their offices for months waiting for Mr. Topolanek to form a new government.

Mr. Topolanek finally did so in September, allowing him to take Mr. Paroubek's place and install ministers of his own. But his government could not win the necessary parliamentary vote of confidence required for it to stay.

President Klaus sent Mr. Topolanek back to the drawing board. In the meantime, the country waits.

Periodically, Adriena Mrazova, the mayor of Ricany, a small town near the Czech capital, calls the Ministry of Labor and Social Affairs to find out who will pay for the new workers she needs to hire as local governments take over social services previously administered by the state. But no one is home.

Even if she does reach someone, no one is willing to make any decisions, she said. "They tell us, 'We may not be here in two weeks.' "

The Czech Republic's mostly privatized economy is continuing to do well: the economy is growing, unemployment is falling, and inflation is under control. But many people worry that the long pause in government action, particularly on badly needed health care and pension reforms, will hurt the economy later on.

The delay could mean that the country will not be able to reduce its budget deficit to the required 3 percent in time to adopt the euro by 2010, as previously hoped.

Mr. Topolanek's progress has been slowed by a series of party congresses, each promising to alter the political map enough to color his options. While waiting, he has concentrated on trying to split one or two legislators from the opposing camp in order to break the deadlock — to no avail.

Though Mr. Topolanek missed his self-imposed deadline, the Social Democrats have given him another: he has until Dec. 15 to negotiate their participation in a government. After that, Mr. Paroubek said, Mr. Topolanek can form a government on his own and risk another parliamentary no-confidence vote.

If Mr. Topolanek's next attempt at forming a government fails, the speaker of the Czech Parliament's lower chamber — not the president — will appoint a new prime minister for a third try. The speaker is now a Social Democrat and while he has agreed to step down, electing a new speaker will itself be a challenge with a divided Parliament.

Were a third government to fail a vote of confidence, the president would call new elections and the process would start all over again.

Years After War In Kosovo, Land Mines Scar Albania (WP)

By Barbara Frye

The Washington Post, December 10, 2006

DOBRUNA, Albania -- Seven years after the Kosovo conflict ended, NATO bombs continued to explode this fall in the mountains of northern Albania.

This time, however, it was a reassuring sound. Up in the hills, men in protective gear were setting off bomblets that alliance warplanes scattered along the Kosovo border during the 78 days of hostilities.

Within earshot but miles away, men and women combed other hillsides, inch by inch, on hands and knees, searching for land mines planted by combatants in the ground war between Serb forces and Kosovo's ethnic Albanian separatists.

For isolated villages such as Dobruna, it's been seven years of death, amputations, shrapnel wounds and blown-up farm animals, seven years of blocked-off grazing lands, forests and water supplies. The explosives have choked off any hope of development here, denying more than 25,000 people access to parts of their land, according to government estimates.

"Before the war, we used to depend on growing crops and raising animals, but without being afraid of losing our lives," said Dan Mynxyra, the 54-year-old village leader, elected by Dobruna's 36 households. He was sitting on a grassy plot while several other residents looked on. Above, the ash- and oak-covered hillsides had turned a brilliant mix of pumpkin, canary and pale green.

According to Mynxyra, most residents fled the day that NATO began bombing Kosovo, March 24, 1999, in a campaign to halt attacks by Serb forces on ethnic Albanians in the breakaway province. They returned to a familiar landscape made lethal by land mines and booby traps. Dobruna had become one of the border's most explosives-contaminated villages.

The terrain here is more vertical than horizontal, and planting and grazing land is so precious that before organized de-mining began, some residents tried to clear fields and paths on their own, often with tragic results. Thirteen of the village's 290 residents have been injured by land mines, some planted within yards of their houses.

In addition, between 200 and 300 of Dobruna's cows have fallen prey to mines in the past five years, according to Jonuz Kola, who runs a private group that assists mine victims. Kola has tried to dissuade villagers from following stray animals into suspected minefields, with limited success -- loss of a cow is a catastrophe for a poor family.

Sitting on the ground next to Mynxyra, Kola laid out his warning once again. An onlooker yelled out: "If your cow goes into the minefield, you have to go and take it out." Kola smiled and sighed.

A few steps away, the women of the Mula family stood in their yard amid beehives and dried husks, preparing corn to be ground for the winter. Neighbors' chickens wandered in, bees buzzed around and a young cow relaxed on the floor of a small barn.

Jashar Mula emerged from the house with a photo of his 24-year-old son, Korob, sitting on what appeared to be a hospital bed, one leg and both arms reduced to bandaged stumps. His parents said he stepped on a mine and then fell on another while shepherding a flock six years ago.

While his wife, Jose, looked on in distress, Jashar Mula called the day of Korob's accident the worst of his life. "If someone can help me in America, if possible," he said, "send me and my son to the U.S. I will give my hand to Korob, keeping one only to eat."

Korob is one of 272 people wounded or killed by mines and bombs littering a 75-mile stretch of border between Kosovo and Albania. Since 2000, workers have cleared about four-fifths of the area, recovering almost 16,000 explosives.

The work has focused on ground that villagers deem to be high and medium priority: grazing and crop land, roads, areas near water sources. This fall, those and other useful areas along the length of the border were finally declared free of explosives, but it will probably be 2010 before nearly all the explosives along the border are gone.

NATO has acknowledged that some of its warplanes' bombs intended for Serb targets in Kosovo landed on Albanian soil. "NATO never intended to drop any bombs in Albania," said acting NATO spokesman Robert Pszczel. Those that did fall there tend to be within a few yards of the border.

As for mines, at least one account has them being laid by Kosovo Liberation Army rebels to prevent Serb soldiers from following them across the border into Albania, where, as ethnic Albanians, the guerrillas enjoyed widespread support from the population.

But some villagers photographed Serb soldiers laying them, according to Shefqet Bruka, a community liaison for the Albanian Mine Action Executive, a government agency.

A 2004 NATO report states: "In an attempt to deter NATO, Albanian and Kosovo Liberation Army forces from entering Kosovo, Serb forces had planted an extensive network of anti-personnel mines along the northern border of Albania. A significant number of mines have also been found well into Albanian territory."

"They can't admit that they laid mines on the Albanian side" because of the possible legal and financial consequences, said Veri Dogjani, mine awareness and victim assistance officer at the mine action executive. Albanians have been asking for maps of the minefields, "but they say, 'No, we are not aware of what you're talking about.' "

The Serbian Defense Ministry did not respond to repeated requests for comment. But according to the International Campaign to Ban Landmines, Col. Dusan Stanizan of the Yugoslav army's general staff wrote in a Serbian military magazine in January 2000 that "the Yugoslav Army's mining of some routes from Albania into Kosovo had prevented KLA soldiers from breaking through."

Unlike Kosovo, which has been under administration by the United Nations since the war ended in June 1999, northern Albania has received little international aid to repair damage it suffered in the conflict. The region remains desperately poor -- average per capita gross domestic product is $1,564. Many houses along the border lack indoor plumbing and electricity, unemployment hovers around 30 percent, and some villages have lost almost 40 percent of their population since Albanians got the right a decade and a half ago to move freely around the country.

The few roads here tend to be harsh, car-eating gullies, where even walking is difficult. Under communism, cars were banned in Albania, and many villagers still get by with horses and donkeys.

A January 2005 survey by aid organizations determined that road construction was a crying need, as were new irrigation systems, schools, health centers and better access to drinking water. Most projects, however, still await funding.

Jonuz Kola's group, the Victims of Mines and Weapons Association, has helped train local medical professionals and assisted the injured in getting care in the Albanian capital, Tirana, and abroad. It provides interest-free loans of roughly $1,550 to mine victims and their families. So far the program has helped 63 people buy 104 cows.

"They have more milk and they have something like $800 to $1,000 more per year just because of the cows," Kola says.

Kola estimates that it will take at least 10 years for northern Albania to develop what would appear to be a boundless potential for tourism -- its mix of rocky peaks and blue-green rivers make for a walker's paradise.

Before that happens, of course, the mines must go, but even their final removal will be a mixed blessing.

DanChurchAid, the last organization de-mining along the border, provides some of the few jobs to be had here, paying people about $520 a month to find and clear the explosives.

When asked what they would do when de-mining work ended with the arrival of cold weather, people replied with a vague smile or a shrug. "We don't have any jobs in Kosovo. It's impossible to find a job," said Fishik Mamusha, an economics student from Kosovo who was working as a de-miner.

Without the roads, clinics, schools and bridges that the villages seek -- and, in truth, without the mines -- this region could go back to being a forgotten island of poverty on a wealthy continent.

On The Run As War Crosses Another Line In Africa (NYT)

By Lydia Polgreen

The New York Times, December 10, 2006

KALANDAO, Central African Republic — The rumble of engines, any engines, is the signal for the villagers here to flee, leaving behind smoldering pots of wild roots and leaves, a meager afternoon meal.

Their haste was so great on a recent afternoon that they left something else behind — a little girl in a filthy white shirt. She wailed as she sat, utterly alone, struggling to stand, much less flee, on slender, uncertain legs.

The Central African Republic — so important as a potential bulwark against the chaos and misery of its neighbors in Chad and the Darfur region of Sudan — is being dragged right into the dangerous and ever-expanding conflict that has begun to engulf central Africa.

So porous are its borders and ungoverned are parts of its territory that foreign rebels are using the Central African Republic as a staging ground to mount attacks over the border, spreading what the United Nations has called the world's "gravest humanitarian crisis."

The situation is so bad in some places that 50,000 residents have fled the Central African Republic to find refuge in Chad, of all places, while starvation threatens hundreds of thousands who remain.

"This is the soft belly of Africa," said Jerome Chevallier, a World Bank official who is trying to help stabilize the Central African Republic. "It has little protection from whatever might strike it."

A visit to Kalandao underscores the point. The residents here had fled their country's own army, which has been burning villages to smoke out a homegrown rebel movement bent on overthrowing the government. Once the villagers, including the girl's family, realized the approaching vehicles were from the United Nations World Food Program, they trickled back to tell their story.

"We are living in the bush like animals," Leontine Makanzi said. "Our children are dying. We are eating nothing. We have no security." Central African Republic, one of the poorest places on earth, has suffered through a series of coups and countercoups in the last decade and sits almost at the bottom of the United Nations development index. In few places do people live so short a lifespan, bury so many of their young children or succumb to more treatable disease.

But its vulnerability has only grown in recent months. On its northeast border with Sudan, Chadian rebels supported by the Sudanese government have built a base, according to government officials and diplomats, to bolster their bid to overthrow Chad's president, Idriss Déby. Now the Central African Republic government says these foreign fighters have teamed up with local rebels to overthrow it as well, making it increasingly hard to separate one conflict in the region from another.

"The world must act now to prevent an even graver crisis here," said Jean-Charles Dei, country director for the United Nations World Food Program, which is feeding 250,000 people in the Central African Republic, one of just a handful of organizations offering any aid at all here. "The international community must act to protect these vulnerable people or risk that they will be consumed by the crisis in the region."

To stem the tide of destruction in this morass of cross-border enmity, the United Nations is examining the possibility of placing international troops to protect the borders of Chad, Sudan and the Central African Republic.

The hope is to avoid a broad, multicountry conflict like the one that swept Congo after the fall of Mobutu Sese Seko. That war, which followed the Rwandan genocide and pulled in fighters from Uganda, Angola and Rwanda, among others, killed four million people, mostly from hunger and disease, and its aftermath continues to kill 1,200 people a day.

"As long as the problem of Darfur is not solved, you will not have peace in Ndjamena or Bangui," said Lamine Cisse, the top United Nations official in Central African Republic, referring to the capitals of Chad and Central African Republic. "The conflicts are all linked, and solving one requires solving all."

The Central African Republic is a former French colony of four million people sprinkled in tiny villages across a tangle of jungle about the size of Texas. Across generous swaths of fertile soil, villagers scrape together a living using techniques as old as the Bible — hoes, water cans, human muscle and bone. The labor required for mere survival is so strenuous that the most common operation performed by doctors at a rural hospital in the northwest is for hernias.

On a continent where cellphone towers and fiber optic cables are finally snaking their way across the land, much of life here is lived as though the last few centuries never happened — as though the march of history halted at its wild frontiers.

"It is as though the whole world has simply forgotten these people," said Sister Desiree, a Burundian nun working at a Roman Catholic mission in Ndim, a small provincial town in northwest Central African Republic. "I always ask myself, why does no one besides us come to help these people? But I find no answer."

The four nuns at the mission, along with four nurses, some teachers and a handful of others, run a school, clinic and feeding program in Ndim, handing out food donated by the World Food Program.

Most of the people in Ndim are not actually displaced, but the isolation the conflict has caused, as well as the general poverty of the area, has left them perpetually malnourished and hungry.

"Outside of a famine situation I have never seen people in such terrible shape," said Jean-Pierre Cebron, the top official for the World Food Program for the central African region. "In terms of weight, in terms of height, in terms of health, the population is really in rough condition."

Hundreds of families lined up at the mission to receive biweekly rations — a few scoops of fortified flour, lentils, salt and sugar. Some were so poor they did not even have bowls — they used ragged pieces of cloth to carry their food home.

In neighboring countries, aid organizations feed, clothe and shelter the impoverished, but here there are comparatively few people to help. Here in the northwest, Doctors Without Borders; Coopi, an Italian aid organization; the International Committee of the Red Cross and the World Food Program are trying to help the estimated 150,000 displaced, but they are overstretched and hampered in their work by security problems and government constraints.

Aid organizations in Paoua, a provincial town at the epicenter of the crisis in the northwest, were instructed by the military in November to suspend activities for security reasons, so more than 50 tons of food for displaced people sat in a warehouse, undistributed.

Just outside of Paoua, the remains of village after village lie in charred heaps. In one such village, behind the destroyed mud huts, deep in the forest, villagers were living beneath plastic tarps a mile away from their homes.

"They came last month to give us these shelters, but they don't come again," said Pauline Koibe, who had been living in the open, sleeping under trees, since January. "It is like they have forgotten us."

People here refer only elliptically to the perpetual crises that have enveloped their nation. Its troubles are referred to as "les événements," or the events. It is a passive phrase that carries the inevitability and randomness of a tornado or an earthquake — an unpredictable, destructive happening that has no author and for which no one really can be blamed.

The problems began even before independence, when the man who should have been the country's first president, Barthélémy Boganda, died in a mysterious plane crash in 1958. They continued with the rise of Jean-Bédel Bokassa, a ruthless military dictator whose excesses were rumored to include cannibalism. He declared himself emperor of this tiny country in 1976, crowning himself in a lavish ceremony that cost $20 million.

Democracy arrived in the 1990s, with the election of Ange-Félix Patassé, but his rule was marked by corruption and mismanagement that only deepened the despair. He was overthrown in 2002 by Gen. François Bozizé, who eventually was elected president in 2005 in an election that was judged free and fair by international observers.

The rebellion in the northeast is led by allies of Mr. Patassé, the former president, along with Chadian rebels, who seek to overthrow Chad's president, a close ally of Mr. Bozizé.

Like so many countries in Africa, the Central African Republic has the potential of vast wealth in its natural resources — diamonds, timber, hydroelectric power and commercial farming. But over the years its economy has shriveled. A decade ago there were more than 200 private companies working here, according to the World Bank. Today, only about 20 remain. In the past decade, disease and hunger have slashed life expectancy by 10 years, to about 40.

"Since independence our country has never known stability," said Lea Koyassoum-Doumta, a top adviser to the government. "We have plenty of problems of our own. We don't need these problems from outside, in Sudan and Chad, making things worse for us. We need peace so we can finally have some development and progress."

Chadian Rebels Claim To Have Killed 100 Government Soldiers (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0104805

N'DJAMENA, Chad (AP) — Rebels fought back a Chadian army attack on Saturday outside an eastern Chad town, killing 100 soldiers and injuring an unknown number of others, a rebel spokesman said.

Soldiers attacked a rebel position just outside the eastern Chad town of Biltine at about 6:30 a.m. (0530GMT) and after three hours of fighting, rebels of the Union of Forces for Democracy and Development, known by the French acronym UFDD, repulsed them, said Ali Moussa Izzo, spokesman of the group.

He said that Gen. Mas-Oud Diresse led the government forces that consisted of three columns made up of 250 vehicles.

"Many of the combatants of (President Idriss) Deby have joined while others ran away," Izzo said in a statement posted on a Chadian opposition website.

This week, Biltine has become a major battleground with rebels seizing it and then being fought off by the army, only for the rebels to recapture it, according to Izzo's statement.

"Our mobile columns are in full control of the situation and putting in place checks around Biltine up to the airport where dead and injured soldiers are being collected," Izzo said.

It was not possible to independently confirm the rebels' claims and government officials were not immediately available for comment.

Chadian rebels aiming to topple Deby have clashed sporadically with government forces since 2005. The competition for power in the central African nation has become more intense since Chad began exporting oil in 2003.

There are also fears that Chad's conflict is being worsened by a spillover of the violence in Sudan's western region of Darfur.

Madagascar's President Wins Re-election (AP)

By Jonny Hogg, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 10, 2006

Madagascar's president has been re-elected in the Indian Ocean island country, officials said Saturday, as authorities raided a former president's home searching for the leader of a failed coup.

President Marc Ravalomanana, a charismatic dairy tycoon known as the "The Milkman," won 55 percent of the Dec. 3 vote to beat 13 challengers, election officials said. He needed to win at least 50 percent of the vote to avoid a run-off.

He has promised a five-year development plan to reduce poverty, the dominant issue in a country were 70 percent of the island's 17 million people live on less than $1 a day.

Earlier this week, representatives for Lahiniriko Jean, the former head of the National Assembly, who trailed with 11 percent of the vote, said they would not accept a first-round victory for Ravalomanana because of problems with voter registration and the electoral list.

Election observers said this year's ballot had gone well, but raised concerns about the country's system of requiring candidates to print their own ballots. The government, for the first time, took responsibility for the delivering ballots to polling stations.

Many hoped there would not be a repeat of the fighting that followed the December 2001 elections, when former President Didier Ratsiraka refused to accept defeat to Ravalomanana. Ratsiraka fled to France after months of rival governments in two capitals.

Meanwhile, police searched the property of former President Albert Zafy on Friday as part of an ongoing investigation into the whereabouts of Gen. Randrianafidisoa and opposition politician Pety Rakotoniaina.

Randrianafidisoa, who uses one name only and is known as Gen. Fidy, had called for a coup on Nov. 17, but the attempt failed to garner much support. The general has since been on the run, and authorities are offering $50,000 for information or assistance leading to his arrest.

Randrianafidisoa had been supported by Rakotoniaina, a staunch critic of the government who is wanted in connection with organized car theft and holding an illegal demonstration the day before the election.

Madagascar's L'Expresse newspaper reported that political documents had been seized from Zafy's home, and quoted the former leader as saying he had been informed the raid was in the interests of national security.

"I reject the gesture," Zafy was quoted as saying. "I do not recognize Ravalomanana as president and have not since 2001."

Zafy defeated Ratsiraka to become president in 1993, then was impeached three years later amid accusations of corruption. He ran again in November 1996, losing this time to Ratsiraka.

TO MOST Americans, Somalia is the place where "Black Hawk Down" happened, or the place with the pictures of the starving African children, or, for some, the biblical land of Punt. (Scholars quibble about locating Punt.) Americans tend to confuse African countries with one another except when our soldiers are dying there, and the violence in Sudan, Uganda, Congo or Zimbabwe can seem indistinguishable. But the anarchy in Somalia, which straddles the strategic Horn of Africa, is in a class by itself.

For more than 16 years, Somalia has existed without the pretense of a central government, surviving largely on foreign aid and remittances from its overseas diaspora, the best and brightest young Somalis. With the fading of the seasonal rains in December, the Somalis are preparing once again to inflict their intra-clan squabbling on their neighbors. Meanwhile, the neighbors are preparing a proxy war, and they plan to fight one another to the last Somali.

Experts call Somalia a failed state. This is a sophism. Somalia was a failed state in 1990 under the last central government of the mildly insane Mohamed Siad Barre. Nowadays, one could call Somalia a space between countries. Or simply a feral nation. This is the place that perfected the practice of extorting cash from international aid organizations in return for allowing the aid groups the privilege of feeding other starving Somalis. (Gangsters R Us, with Third World panache.) When the United Nations tried to intervene and establish a central government in 1993 (an admittedly naive effort), the Somalis united just long enough to drive off the foreigners and resume their embrace of warlords and clans.

I was there in 1993, running covert operations in Mogadishu for the CIA when the U.N. effort was wrecked. President George H.W. Bush had sent the Marines into Somalia to feed the starving children, and President Clinton was attempting to install a Jeffersonian democracy in a medieval culture. The Clinton theory was that the U.N. would use its peacemaking powers to force the Somali factions into a political accord, and then peace would break out.

Unfortunately, nobody told the Somalis. They viewed the U.N. and the U.S. as foreign invaders bent on Christianizing their Muslim culture while destroying the power of the clans and warlords. This dispute spawned a series of attacks that cumulated in the Battle of Mogadishu between the U.S. Task Force Ranger and Somali clan fighters, as portrayed in the film "Black Hawk Down." After losing 17 elite troops to an African mob in a single night, Clinton lost all stomach for further "nation building" involving U.S. casualties, and the U.N. effort collapsed. After that, the world largely went back to ignoring the Somalis.

Now the Somalis are poised to insist that the international community tune back in while they commit an auto-da-fe on CNN. Somali Islamists, modeling themselves on the Taliban, have taken control of most of the country, driving the warlords out of the cities and into the bush. The internationally recognized Somali interim government (an effort by neighboring countries to get the clans and factions to agree to some sort of consensus government with which the world can interact) is surrounded in the provincial city of Baidoa, about 160 miles northwest of the capital. When the roads are dry enough to allow military operations, the Islamists will swiftly overwhelm the interim government unless outside help arrives at the last minute.

Already, a team of Al Qaeda-style suicide bombers have blasted Baidoa. The Islamists make no bones about their plans to install a fundamentalist government and to begin "rescuing" their brethren in neighboring countries (read all of East Africa) from the oppressive rule of the Christian Crusaders. Somalia's neighbors are bracing for a regional war, and the U.S. State Department says 10 countries are taking sides in some fashion. Ethiopia, which has a restive Muslim south and a history of being a target for Somali brigandage whenever the Somalis pause in their intra-clan feuding, is sending troops to back up the interim government and oppose the Islamists.

The Eritreans, led by an increasingly paranoid, sociopathic president, are the sworn blood enemies of the Ethiopians. Seeing a chance to weaken their bigger neighbor, they are flying in arms and instructors to the Islamists.

Across the Red Sea in Saudi Arabia, the Wahhabi fundamentalists see the Christian Ethiopians embarking on a "crusade" to crush Islam. In response, they are providing cash through Wahhabi charities to their Islamic comrades, frightening and infuriating Washington.

Kenya's kleptocratic government, overwhelmed by an influx of refugees, is wringing its hands while endless talks take place in Nairobi hotels between irrelevant Somali politicians and clueless U.N. diplomats in search of a peace plan. The Islamists want no part of the talks; they are winning.

When the big, ugly regional war breaks out, the Islamists, with the help of Eritrean advisors, are likely to hold their own. Now add in your odd Somali warlord, drug-crazed clan gunmen and the Somali history of atrocities and you have a real mess in the Horn of Africa. Fighting will probably spill into Kenya, and destitute refugees will surge across East Africa. Bottom line: It is likely by this time next year that the Horn of Africa will host its own little Taliban wannabe, more or less in control of Somalia and at war with its neighbors. Along the way, there will be a lot of dead people and suffering refugees.

Although this is far away, and may not happen to anyone you know personally, it is going to become a concern of the U.S. soon. An Islamic fundamentalist haven on the Horn of Africa is more than a tragedy for the long-suffering Africans; it is a threat to the oil routes that fuel the West and pass just offshore. Recent domestic terrorist attacks have already shaken the House of Saud's iron grip on its population; a sanctuary where its fundamentalist enemies can regroup only a few hours across the Red Sea would be a dagger at its heart.

A terrorist Somalia would be difficult to contain. Most African governments have little ability to find, let alone effectively police, their own borders. If the Islamic fundamentalists establish a haven in Somalia, they could infiltrate or threaten the many weak secular governments in surrounding countries.

It simply is not prudent to ignore what is going on in Somalia, but everyone agrees the last thing the U.S. wants now is to embark on another adventure in East Africa. The only practical option is to interest the Islamists in talking. Right now, they do not need to talk; they are getting everything they want on the battlefield. If they suffer a military setback, talk may look more appealing.

To improve the odds of such an Islamist setback, the U.S. should provide training and equipment to Somalia's neighbors. Frankly, the track record is poor; in the past, most military aid has been used to suppress domestic critics rather than fight foreign enemies. And it's certainly true that the one thing Africa does not need is more guns. But it looks like it's getting them anyway, according to a November U.N. report on weapons smuggling.

Washington should also lean hard on the government of Saudi Arabia to crack down on the Wahhabi charity money that fuels the Somali Islamist war machine. If the Saudis don't want those petrodollars coming back at them in a few years as RPGs fired by antiroyalist fundamentalists based in Somalia, it behooves them to overcome the reservations they have shown about squeezing fellow Wahhabists.

However, even our best efforts will not stop a long, bloody conflict. Get ready for more pictures of starving African babies. Film at 11, death and suffering around the clock.

Nobel Peace Prize Winner Will Urge Banks To Lend To The Poor (NYT)

By Walter Gibbs

The New York Times, December 10, 2006

OSLO, Dec. 9 — Bangladesh's "banker to the poor," Muhammad Yunus, said he would use his newfound celebrity as the recipient of this year's Nobel Peace Prize to urge bankers everywhere to make small business loans to the poorest people they can find.

"This is a movement that is going around the world," he said at a news conference here on Saturday, a day before the ceremony to award the prize to him and the bank he founded, Grameen Bank.

Mr. Yunus, 66, is credited with inventing microfinance, the practice of lending small amounts of money to destitute people, 30 years ago. The idea is for borrowers — almost all of them women — to start or expand money-making enterprises like weaving, rope-making, vegetable farming and holding livestock.

He said Bangladesh, with its population of 145 million, was en route to halving the number of people classified as extremely poor by 2015, thanks in part to the availability of microloans as small as $12 and averaging $200. "If Bangladesh can do it, anyone can do it," he said.

The prize is to be awarded in equal parts to Dr. Yunus and the Dhaka-based bank, 90 percent of which is owned cooperatively by the 6.7 million people who owe it money. The bank's half of the prize will be given to board member Mosammat Taslima Begum, who said Saturday that she first borrowed money from Grameen to buy a goat, then borrowed more to buy three goats. Now she owns land with an income-producing mango patch.

Mr. Yunus urged the United States to recalibrate its strategy for fighting terrorism and to address what he said were its "root causes" — poverty and injustice. "Poverty is a threat to peace," said Mr. Yunus, a native Bangladeshi with a Ph.D. in economics from Vanderbilt University in Tennessee. "This has been talked about before but never in such a resounding manner."

In the 30 years since he started lending money to the poor, more than 3,000 other institutions have emerged to provide similar loans. Grameen Bank requires no collateral of its borrowers, but charges most of them interest of about 30 percent per year.

The Muslim Stereotype (NYT)

By Nicholas D. Kristof

The New York Times, December 10, 2006

Whatever happens in Iraq, we may be inching closer to a "clash of civilizations" between Islam and the West.

There's a fatigue in the West with an Arab world that sometimes seems to put its creative juices mostly into building better bombs. Even open-minded people in the West sometimes feel a sense of resignation that maybe the bigots are right: maybe Islam just is intrinsically backward, misogynistic and violent.

After I wrote recently about reform elements in Islam, I received a long note from a 24-year-old Chicagoan, Paul Williams, who ventured what many people feel: "I went to school in Macalester College and the whole time there I wrote paper after paper defending Islam," he told me. Now, he says, after reading the Koran cover to cover and living in Turkey, he has lapsed into political incorrectness: "The more I'm here the more I'm beginning to think that there's just something wrong with Islam."

That's a common view, shaped partly by the way we in the news business focus on violence in the Islamic world. So let me step up and say that I find the common American stereotypes of Islam profoundly warped.

Those stereotypes are largely derived from the less than 20 percent of Muslims who are Arabs, with Persians and Pashtuns thrown in as well. But the great majority of the world's Muslims live not in the Middle East but here in Asia, where religion has mostly been milder.

At the moment I'm in Brunei, a Muslim country nestled in Southeast Asia. At the University of Brunei, women outnumber men. Women here drive, fill senior offices in government and the private sector, serve as ambassadors and are pilots for the national airline. "Young women have equal opportunities now — it's up to your capability," said Lisa Ibrahim, president of the Young Entrepreneurs Association of Brunei.

Brunei has gold-domed mosques in its skyline, and the sultan has two wives. But Brunei is also home to churches and Hindu temples serving a multiethnic society. Young people flirt together in the cafes, and non-Muslims are allowed to drink alcohol.

Anwar Ibrahim, the former Malaysian deputy prime minister, says he reminds Americans that the most populous Muslim country (Indonesia) is a democracy whose elections run more smoothly than Florida's.

Yes, Islamists are a threat in Asia, and many imams are more scandalized by female flesh than by honor killings or illiteracy. Indonesia has tried the editor of the local edition of Playboy magazine, and a state in Malaysia has threatened to fine women who wear miniskirts. But Indonesia has had a woman as president, while Bangladesh has had two female prime ministers and has more girls in high school than boys.

"We tend to be more tolerant," Yusof Halim, a prominent lawyer in Brunei, said of Asian Muslims. He then confided: "My honest opinion is that Arabs are male chauvinists."

Meanwhile, many Muslims are as disenchanted with us as we are with them. They complain about hypocritical Americans who parrot slogans about human rights but brutalize Muslims at Guantánamo and supply the weaponry that kills Muslim children in Gaza and Lebanon.

The Koran and Bible alike have passages that make 21st-century readers flinch; most Christians just ignore sections on slavery or admonitions to kill a disobedient child. Likewise, some Muslims are reinterpreting Koranic passages on polygamy and amputations, saying they were restricted to particular circumstances that no longer apply.

Frankly, I don't see that any religion's influence is intrinsically peaceful or violent. Christianity inspired both Mother Teresa and pogroms. Hinduism nurtured Gandhi and also the pioneers of suicide bombings.

These days, ferocious anti-Semitism thrives in some Muslim countries, but in the Dreyfus affair a century ago Muslims sided with a Jew persecuted by anti-Semitic Christians. And the biggest sectarian slaughter in Europe in modern times involved Christians massacring Muslims at Srebrenica.

The plain fact is that some Muslim societies do have a real problem with violence, with the subjugation of women, with tolerance. But the mosaic of Islam is vast and contains many more hopeful glimpses of the future.

There is a historic dichotomy between desert Islam — the austere fundamentalism of countries like Saudi Arabia — and riverine or coastal Islam, more outward-looking, flexible and tolerant. Desert Muslims grab the headlines, but my bet is that in the struggle for the soul of Islam, maritime Muslims have the edge.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Book Ties Enemy Combatant To L.A. Plot (LAT)

By Richard A. Serrano

The Los Angeles Times, December 10, 2006

CHARLESTON, S.C. — Ali Saleh Kahlah al-Marri is the last enemy combatant imprisoned in this country. Yet four years after his arrest, government officials still cannot agree on what threat he posed.

In a new allegation, former Atty. Gen. John Ashcroft says Al-Marri was sent to the United States a day before the Sept. 11 attacks to plan strikes on West Coast targets, including the tallest building in Los Angeles.

Ashcroft's claim — made in a new book — is the first time any U.S. official has directly linked Al-Marri to the West Coast attacks that Al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden allegedly hoped would follow the deaths of nearly 3,000 people in New York, the Pentagon and Pennsylvania.

Citing Sept. 11 mastermind Khalid Shaikh Mohammed, who was captured and interrogated, Ashcroft wrote: "I believe KSM had planned to use Al-Marri to help facilitate this next wave of attacks focused on Los Angeles."

But three federal law enforcement officials asked about the allegation said they were mystified by Ashcroft's assertions. And a court document alleging that Al-Marri — a U.S.-educated citizen of Qatar and Saudi Arabia — has deep ties to Al Qaeda makes no mention of any role in an assault on the West Coast.

Plot broken up

Speaking confidentially because they did not want a public fight with the former attorney general, the Washington officials said the West Coast plot was broken up by arrests overseas that did not involve Al-Marri.

They said Al-Marri was sent to the United States as an Al Qaeda "sleeper agent" and was not assigned to prepare an attack on any specific target. With his wife and five children, they said Al Qaeda leaders hoped he could reside unnoticed in Peoria, Ill., where he had once lived and attended school.

"He was never given any assignment," said one of the officials familiar with government intelligence on the West Coast plot. "KSM may have considered him as an operative, but that's about it."

He acknowledged, however, that Ashcroft's contention "might still be a possibility."

The dispute is spilling onto the public stage as the Bush administration finds itself under mounting legal and public pressure to provide some form of justice for captives arrested in the U.S. and abroad. The disagreement also shows there are deep divisions within the government over what to make of enemy combatants.

Al-Marri's defense lawyers have repeatedly called on the government to either charge him with a crime or set him free, saying his endless solitary confinement at a Navy brig next to Charleston violates the founding principles of American jurisprudence.

But twice this year different federal judges in South Carolina have denied their request and ruled that the Bush administration can continue to legally — and indefinitely — hold Al-Marri as an enemy combatant.

Al-Marri's defense attorneys have appealed, and the government, seeking to cut them off again, recently signaled it may bring Al-Marri before a military tribunal similar to those planned for Mohammed and other detainees at the U.S. naval base at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

Why Ashcroft is raising this assertion now is unclear. He did not respond to repeated requests for an interview.

In his book, "Never Again: Securing America and Restoring Justice," Ashcroft said the second wave was "planned meticulously" by Mohammed with Al-Marri in mind. He wrote that Al-Marri was "part of an Al Qaeda advance team sent to the United States to facilitate the next round of terrorist attacks."

But of Al-Marri's arrest, Ashcroft wrote, "I believe it frustrated Al Qaeda's plans for new attacks. The Los Angeles plot unraveled due to international cooperation among America's allies."

David Ayres, Ashcroft's former chief of staff at the Department of Justice, said the department reviewed the book for accuracy and classified material. And others suggested the information must have been gleaned by Ashcroft from his four years as attorney general.

"Why would he make it up?" wondered Carl W. Tobias, a law professor at the University of Richmond in Virginia who has closely monitored the Al-Marri case.

Angry defense lawyers

DOJ_NMG_0104813

Defense lawyers, however, are angry Ashcroft is making assertions that government prosecutors have never alleged in federal court here in Charleston. The attorneys theorize that Ashcroft is trying to make Al-Marri appear evil to support his own Justice Department policy of endlessly incarcerating enemy combatants.

"He's all spit and no sidewalk," defense lawyer Andrew J. Savage III of Charleston said of Ashcroft.

Jonathan L. Hafetz, a litigation specialist at the Brennan Center for Justice at the New York University School of Law, who is assisting in the Al-Marri defense, was equally dismissive. "If they have that evidence, they should present it," Hafetz said. "Put up or shut up."

In an apparent reference to Mohammed, Ashcroft wrote that the information on Al-Marri came from a "detained senior Al Qaeda leader, whose credibility had been well established" and who identified Al-Marri as "an Al Qaeda sleeper operative, someone inside the country, lying low but working all the while for the enemy."

Mohammed, who was captured in March 2003, is known to have named Al-Marri as an Al Qaeda operative during his interrogations.

He also gave lengthy, written testimony in this year's trial of Sept. 11 collaborator Zacarias Moussaoui. He described the West Coast plot in detail, including the selection of the 73-story Library Tower (now the U.S Bank building), as one of the targets. But he did not name Al-Marri as a co-conspirator.

He added that Bin Laden personally "advised that a second wave attack should focus on the West, believing that security might be more lax there."

President Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney recently stated that Mohammed has provided reliable information.

But Hafetz said any statements from Mohammed should be discounted because Mohammed was allegedly tortured into talking by a controversial technique that simulates drowning. Al-Marri should be released now, he said, because "you can't hold somebody based on a statement from a guy who was water-boarded."

The three senior federal law enforcement officials in Washington sharply disagree with Ashcroft's premise that Al-Marri is a key figure in the West Coast plot. They said the scheme fell apart after a "handful" of other suspects were arrested overseas for involvement in the plot.

"This guy [Al-Marri] was never named by KSM [Mohammed] as being in the Library Tower plot," said one of the officials. "But he was put on the radar by KSM as a guy who was here stateside as a potential operator."

Al-Marri, now 40, was arrested in December 2001 in Peoria. He had earned a bachelor's degree in business administration there in 1991. He returned and enrolled to earn a graduate degree in computer science at Bradley University.

FBI agents found evidence that appeared to link him to Al Qaeda, but he was held on minor bank-card and credit-card fraud charges.

He was preparing for trial when Mohammed was arrested in March 2003 and began talking.

Three months later, in June 2003, the Bush administration abruptly designated Al-Marri an enemy combatant and moved him from a jail in Illinois to the Navy brig.

The two judges, federal Magistrate Judge Robert Carr F. and U.S. District Judge Henry F. Floyd, who upheld the enemy combatant designation, based their rulings on a partially declassified summary from Jeffrey N. Rapp, a senior defense intelligence officer.

The summary says "multiple intelligence sources" confirmed Al-Marri was sent to the United States to explore how to hack into computer systems and disrupt U.S. financial systems.

But it does describe Al-Marri as a man devoted to Al Qaeda, who had trained with the terrorist network, versed himself in poisons and chemical weapons, talked frequently with a terrorist financier, and kept Bin Laden speeches and lists of jihad websites on his computer.

"He met personally with Osama bin Laden and other known Al Qaeda members," Rapp concluded, "and volunteered for a martyr mission or to do anything else that Al Qaeda requested."

Plans To Construct Legal Compound At Guantánamo Halted (MH)

By Carol Rosenberg

The Miami Herald, December 10, 2006

In an abrupt about-face, the Pentagon has scrapped plans to invoke emergency authority to fast-track construction of a controversial $100 million legal compound at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba.

Instead, Defense Department officials will seek permission from Congress for any new major buildings in which to stage the first war-crimes trials since World War II.

DOJ_NMG_0104814

The Pentagon's retreat from a plan it had earlier described as urgent was a setback in Bush administration war-on-terrorism policy, just as the Republican-led Congress finished business Saturday -- to be replaced by a Democratic majority in early January.

California Sen. Dianne Feinstein, a key Democrat on the Senate's military construction and armed services committees, announced the Defense Department's change of course in a news release late Friday -- after members of Congress, both Republicans and Democrats, had protested the move.

"I thank the Department for postponing plans to build a permanent courthouse at Guantánamo Bay," Feinstein said. ``It's important this courthouse proceed through regular order, with public hearings, so that there is full knowledge of what is intended."

Feinstein was among critics of the project, which was first reported by The Miami Herald.

Last month, the Pentagon had quietly notified contractors that it was seeking design and construction bids for the elaborate legal compound -- complete with two courtrooms, housing for 1,200, dining facilities for 800, a 100-vehicle motor pool and conference and other meeting facilities.

MILITARY CITY

A virtual mini military city, the legal compound was projected to cost $75 million to $125 million and be the single-largest construction project at the remote U.S. Navy base in southeast Cuba. Today there are about 420 foreign men and teens held at the base as enemy combatants; about 80 could face war-crimes trials.

The decision to freeze its plan to invoke emergency authority capped a week in which Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld said goodbye to Pentagon employees; a blue-chip bipartisan panel said the war in Iraq was mismanaged; and key Republican and Democratic senators introduced legislation to restore captives' rights to challenge their detention -- a move that would give civilian courts a greater role in individual cases at Guantánamo.

The Bush administration has been in a tug of war with civilian attorneys over the rights of the captives at Guantánamo since soon after the prison camp opened in January 2002 with an airlift of 20 captives from Afghanistan. At the time, the Pentagon had provisional plans to house up to 2,000 captives there.

The Pentagon also made the about-face during the same week it put into service a new prison facility -- known as Camp 6. It had cost more than $37 million and was intended as a mediumsecurity prison with communal eating and praying until a riot last summer led to its redesign as a maximum-security compound.

The Miami Herald disclosed the Pentagon's pre-bid solicitation for the legal compound on MiamiHerald.com on Nov. 16.

`EXTREME URGENCY'

The next day, Nov. 17, Deputy Defense Secretary Gordon England wrote Republican and Democratic members of Congress that because of "national security implications and extreme urgency" the Pentagon was invoking "Section 2808 of title 10, United States Code" as authorization for its fast-track authority -- a move that did not require congressional approval.

On Friday, the Pentagon notified Feinstein, according to her office, that ``it has canceled the contract solicitation and will examine alternatives."

The Pentagon on Saturday gave no details but suggested it would no longer seek to fund the Guantánamo project without explicit congressional appropriation and authorization.

"We continue to work with Congress to proceed in an expeditious fashion to bring these unlawful combatants to justice," said Air Force Lt. Col. Todd Vician, th Pentagon's weekend spokesman.

But as of Saturday, the fast-track bid solicitation was still on a U.S. government contracting website, with a Dec. 20 deadline for solicitations and a July 2007 completion date. The Pentagon previously built a more modest, single-court complex at the Navy base for earlier Military Commissions, which the U.S. Supreme Court declared unconstitutional in June.

Feinstein's office credited the about-face to ``concerns she and others had raised about the proposed location and funding mechanism."

Pentagon officials are now preparing new rules for presumably constitutional trials, under the 2006 Military Commissions Act, although lawyers for detainees are already challenging portions of the law in the federal courts.

Disclosure of the solicitation last month unleashed a wave of criticism.

California Republican Rep. Duncan Hunter, outgoing chairman of the House Armed Service Committee, declared the project ill-advised.

New York Republican Rep. James Walsh, outgoing chairman of the military appropriations subcommittee, in comments in the Syracuse Post-Standard, expressed concern about its impact on military readiness.

"We're at war," he said. ``It sounds like their priorities are skewed."

`BACK-ROOM STUNT'

DOJ_NMG_0104815

And Democratic New York Sen. Charles Schumer, who has served on the Armed Services Committee, called the proposal a 'back-room stunt, of secretly taking money away from veterans' care and soldiers' facilities."

Outside of Congress, Amnesty International labeled it a "white elephant" and a St. Louis Post-Dispatch editorial scorned it as a ``kangaroo compound."

The American Civil Liberties Union wrote members in an e-mail alert that Vice President Dick Cheney's old firm, Halliburton, had attended Defense Department planning conferences on the project.

Halliburton spokeswoman Melissa Norcross last week would not say whether a subsidiary already working at Guantánamo, would bid to build the legal compound.

Pentagon spokesmen would not say how rarely, if ever, the Bush administration had used emergency authority to circumvent Congress' power to appropriate and authorize.

Although Congress had no power to halt construction under the Pentagon's emergency authority, the Pentagon's England had sought a commitment from key Congress members to restore the money it intended to divert from existing, authorized military construction projects.

Pentagon spokesmen would not identify which already appropriated projects it would set aside.

Redefining Torture (NYT)

By Dahlia Lithwick

The New York Times Magazine, December 10, 2006

There were always two narratives offered about the change in American torture policy after 9/11. The first story — told by the Bush administration — was that the Geneva Conventions mandating humane treatment of war prisoners could be unilaterally suspended by the president for the duration of the war on terror. But, this story continued, our prisoners were nevertheless well treated, as required by honor if not by law; only a few renegade bad apples abused detainees.

The alternate version of the story went this way: from the outset of the war, human rights groups said, Bush-administration attorneys devoted considerable energy to secretly redefining torture. Leaked memos revealed that widely agreed-upon definitions of torture had been changed; ambiguous new rules started filtering down through the C.I.A. and the military — with lethal consequences.

The two narratives collided this summer with the Supreme Court's decision in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld. After striking down the tribunals proposed to try detainees at Guantánamo Bay, the court went on to rule that the Bush administration was obligated to comply with the "laws of war," including Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions — the provision barring torture, cruel and humiliating treatment or "outrages upon personal dignity."

The Hamdan decision demolished the argument that the president's war powers were limitless and beyond review. It also meant that C.I.A. and other administration officials faced possible criminal liability for past and future acts of abuse. So the administration scrambled to both justify the torture and change the law.

The result was a "showdown" in Congress, wherein the president requested the power to redefine the legal standard for torture and the power to determine whether and how the Geneva Conventions apply. The administration also requested the authority to keep the specifics of its "alternative interrogation methods" secret. Even though the president acknowledged that he had sent prisoners to secret "black sites" for interrogation, Congress passed legislation decreasing Congressional and judicial oversight of detainees. When Bush admitted, in short, that the second narrative — America tortures people in secret — was true, Congress effectively made it legal.

The final detainee bill, as passed by Congress in September, immunizes some of those who abused detainees and relaxes restrictions on abuse. It strips the courts of jurisdiction to hear whole classes of cases and denies "alien unlawful combatants" (a classification left to Bush to define) the power to assert Geneva Conventions claims in courts. The bill purports to apply the Geneva Conventions, then defines them away. It purports to prohibit torture, then defines the prohibition away.

In October, Dick Cheney allowed that one of the most controversial torture methods — simulated drowning or "water boarding"— could be called a mere "dunking." The White House later contended that he'd not been referring to water boarding but to something else. Perhaps. But it's striking that in the span of 12 months, prisoner abuse had morphed from a secret to the law to a punch line.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Great Lakes Area Tries To Dodge A Bullet (WP)

By Peter Slevin

DOJ_NMG_0104816

The Washington Post, December 10, 2006

CHICAGO -- U.S. Coast Guard vessels staging machine-gun target practice in the peaceable Great Lakes? George Heartwell does not like the idea, not one little bit. He questions the need, the risk and the appearance.

"I think our Canadian friends see us as trigger-happy cowboys," said Heartwell, mayor of Grand Rapids, Mich. "There simply have to be other ways and better ways."

In the name of defending the United States against terrorists, the Coast Guard proposes live-fire zones in all five Great Lakes, where gunners could perfect their skills on M-240B machine guns to be mounted on lake vessels. The weapons can fire hundreds of 7.62mm rounds a minute and send lead 2.3 miles downrange.

The Coast Guard, at a series of public hearings this fall, defended the 34 proposed zones as essential to its mission. Each zone, located at least five miles offshore, would be used perhaps two or three times a year for a few hours. Civilian boaters would be warned to stay away.

Yet opposition to the proposal is formidable and growing, led by an alliance of 80 mayors from eight states and Canada who called on the Coast Guard last month to drop the plan. More than a dozen environmental groups have asked for changes in the project and a deeper study of the effect on the ecosystem of hundreds of thousands of lead bullets.

Toronto Mayor David Miller, speaking for the organization of mayors, called the live-fire proposal "totally contrary to the long history of peaceful relations and environmental cooperation between the United States and Canada on the Great Lakes."

The decision to install machine guns on Coast Guard vessels in the U.S. waters of the Great Lakes was sensitive enough that the Bush administration sought to assure the Canadians that the weapons would not violate the spirit of an 1817 agreement limiting armaments on the lakes, home to 21 percent of the fresh water on the Earth's surface.

Asserting the need for the guns, a State Department diplomatic note in April 2003 cited "the potential for a tragic outcome" if the border's integrity were breached.

The Coast Guard began live-fire training earlier this year, conducting 24 exercises before a public outcry forced a suspension. The Coast Guard held nine public hearings and extended the comment period by two months to explain the plans and overcome the suspicion that they had acted dismissively.

Chief Petty Officer Robert Lanier, a spokesman for the Coast Guard's regional headquarters in Cleveland, described the training: Gunners in the 34 zones would shoot at floating targets in exercises lasting four to six hours at a time.

"To be proficient on the weapon, we have to practice," Lanier said. "There's a tremendous difference between operating any type of weapon on land versus operating it on water, where you've got the motion of the Great Lakes, the wind current, the sun."

Opponents, however, suggest using a simulator or sending Coast Guard members to train on the ocean.

"To be honest with you, we don't feel we're ready for this militarization of the Great Lakes," said F. Ned Dikmen, Chicago-based chairman of the Great Lakes Boating Federation. "The waterways, the pristineness, the enjoyment, takes on a different picture."

Dikmen continued: "My biggest fear is a poor fisherman that is not very radio-friendly and might not even know exactly what hit him. Are you going to call them on the phone? How are they supposed to know they are 2.3 miles out from the firing range?"

Kevin Crawford, mayor of Manitowoc, Wis., is among the critics who believe the Coast Guard acted badly.

"That's our freshwater supply. We fish out of there. We recreate out of there," said Crawford, who is also skeptical of federal projections that the lead in the Coast Guard's bullets will do no harm. "The idea that continuous activity of the Coast Guard over time won't have an effect is untrue, or least we don't know it to be true."

One of Crawford's worries is the safety of passengers on the S.S. Badger, a steam-powered ferry that churns between Manitowoc and Ludington, Mich. Another concern is the potential for unease among tourists who gravitate to the lake.

"You never know what's going to set off a change in the visitor economy," said Crawford, who added that he was not concerned about the prospect of terrorists on the Great Lakes. "There just doesn't seem to be that kind of a threat out there."

Not everyone is speaking against the Coast Guard project. Among the supporters is Dexter Nelson, captain of the 34-foot, twin-engine Fishin' Luhrs, who figures he has spent more than 17,000 hours afloat in Lake Superior, catching lake trout, walleye and salmon. He is confident the Coast Guard will find ways to notify boaters and fishermen, and he believes the training is necessary.

"I just think leave them alone and let them do what they need to do," said Nelson, who is based in Duluth, Minn. "If something happens, it's good if they're well-trained."

The Great Lakes Sport Fishing Council proposes reducing the 14 proposed Lake Michigan zones by half and moving them farther offshore. In a vast lake that stretches about 120 miles at its widest point, the proposal would mean a zone perhaps 40 miles from the shoreline, compared with the current five-mile minimum.

"It's really nothing for the average angler to go 10 or 15 miles offshore to fish," said Dan Thomas, president of the Chicago-based council, which counts 300,000 members. He supports the Coast Guard and considers the live-fire zones a minor inconvenience worth tolerating.

"They're putting their lives on the line to protect your butt and my butt," Thomas said. "There need to be some adjustments, but at the same time, I'm telling my guys, 'Get a life.' "

The Coast Guard is reviewing its plans, with no announced date for a decision.

WAR NEWS:

Bush Aides Seek Alternatives To Iraq Study Group's Proposals, Calling Them Impractical (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg, David E. Sanger

The New York Times, December 10, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 9 — Administration officials say their preliminary review of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group's recommendations has concluded that many of its key proposals are impractical or unrealistic, and a small group inside the National Security Council is now racing to come up with alternatives to the panel's ideas.

In interviews over the last two days with officials from the White House, the State Department, the Pentagon and foreign diplomats, President Bush and his top aides were described as deeply reluctant to follow the core strategy advocated by the study group: to pressure Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki to rein in sectarian violence faced with reduced United States military and economic support.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has cautiously embraced that approach, several officials said, but others — including people in the National Security Council and the vice president's office — argue that the risks are too high. "The worry is that the more Maliki is seen as our puppet, because he is abiding by our timelines and deadlines, the internal political dynamics will become so fragile that the whole government would collapse," said one senior official participating in the internal review. "That would set us back a year." A senior official said the administration was not near a "decision point" on how to go about influencing Mr. Maliki to move faster, and he said it was taking seriously some of the report's suggestions.

But in interviews, senior administration officials, who would not be quoted by name because Mr. Bush has made no final decisions about how to deal with the Iraq panel's recommendations, questioned the study group's assertions that Iran had an interest in helping to stabilize the situation in Iraq, or that it made sense to start negotiations with Iran without conditions. And they took issue with the decision by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and the nine other members of the commission to make no mention of promoting democracy as an American goal in the Middle East, and to drop any suggestion that "victory" was still possible in Iraq when they presented their findings to Mr. Bush and to the public on Wednesday.

"You saw that the president used the word 'victory' again the next day," said one of Mr. Bush's aides. "Believe me, that was no accident."

The administration's inclination to dismiss so many of the major findings of the bipartisan group sets the stage for what could become a titanic struggle over Iraq policy. Just two months ago, administration officials were saying that they believed the findings by the panel headed by Mr. Baker and Lee H. Hamilton, a former congressman, would be all but written in stone — and that Mr. Bush would have little choice but to carry out most of them. But in recent weeks, the White House sought to describe the panel's role as that of one advisory group among many.

Andrew H. Card Jr., the president's chief of staff until last spring, said that whatever Mr. Bush did in Iraq would probably fall short of many of the commission's recommendations, and that he was likely to continue making decisions that he believed were right even if unpopular. Referring to Mr. Bush's secret intelligence briefings, Mr. Card said, "The president by definition knows more than any of those people who are serving on these panels."

"The president's obligations sometimes require him to be very lonely," he said.

Mr. Bush has empowered the "Crouch Group," a small group of advisers being coordinated by Jack D. Crouch II, the deputy national security adviser, to assemble alternative proposals from the Joint Chiefs of Staff, the State Department, the Treasury Department and staff of the National Security Council.

The administration's strategy appears to be: Adopt parts of the recommendations that are under way already, or that are considered minor modifications of those efforts, and pick away at those that the administration believes imply retreat or folly. For example, the administration is embracing a recommendation that it put energy into reviving Israeli-Palestinian peace talks. Ms. Rice is planning a trip to the region early next year, and the administration says it plans to build on a new initiative by Israel's prime minister, Ehud Olmert. Similarly, officials have described the report's call for the creation of an "Iraq International Support Group" as a natural expansion of two regional forums that Ms. Rice has already met with several times, an economic cooperation group called the “Compact for Iraq” and the “Gulf Plus Two” group, which includes the Gulf Cooperation Council, plus Egypt and Jordan.

But other recommendations are being cast as overly optimistic. For example, while White House and Pentagon officials note that they are already embedding additional trainers and advisers in Iraqi units, they expressed deep skepticism that the force of 4,000 advisers could be rapidly increased to the 10,000 to 20,000 envisioned in the report. As a result, they said, they doubted it would be possible to pull back all 15 American combat brigades from Iraq’s streets and towns by the first quarter of 2008, the goal in the panel’s report.

The primary author of the military section of the report, William J. Perry, who was defense secretary under President Clinton, said in an interview on Friday that the administration’s resistance was baffling to him. “There are many ways in which the training goals can be achieved in a timely way,” he said. “If there is a will to carry out the proposed embedding program, it can be done.”

That argument appears to foreshadow the debate that will develop as Mr. Bush seeks advice at the State Department, the Pentagon and elsewhere next week. Members of the study group say they expect to be defending both their individual proposals and the need for an integrated diplomatic and military package. “Given the track record these guys in the White House have, you would think they would show a little humility about taking aboard some outside ideas,” said one Republican member of the commission who spoke on condition of anonymity.

Dan Senor, a former administration spokesman for the Coalition Provisional Authority in Iraq, said that in conversations with administration officials, they had dismissed many of the report’s recommendations as “not terribly realistic from an operational standpoint.”

He said former colleagues had told him they felt comforted by the recognition that there were no good options, because despite all of the intellect brought to the endeavor, the members of the panel had failed to make the leap from strategy to implementation. “It’s easy to suggest these steps in theory, but we haven’t been able to figure out the how,” Mr. Senor said. “Now, neither have these 10 wise men and woman.”

One of the continuing debates within the White House and the Pentagon is whether to temporarily “surge” the number of American forces in Baghdad, in an effort to regain control over Baghdad. But the Pentagon has said that most of the additional 30,000 forces should be Iraqis.

One foreign diplomat, who requested anonymity because he was discussing American deliberations, said one strategy being considered would include dividing the labor between American and Iraqi forces — with Americans focusing on hunting down elements of Al Qaeda, and the Iraqi forces focusing more on sectarian clashes. The Iraq Study Group report leaves open the possibility of a temporary increase in forces, and envisions a similar role for the United States in seeking out Al Qaeda.

An administration official said that such a division of labor could not be so black and white. And Vice President Dick Cheney is said to be urging caution in dealing with the Shiite and Sunni factions, concerned that the administration avoid signaling that the Shiites would be abandoned as they were at the end of the Persian Gulf war.

The report’s authors say their strategy will work only if taken largely as a whole; Mr. Baker warned against treating it like a “fruit salad,” picking the juiciest pieces. The White House, however, appears to be groping for the right fork to do exactly that.

Tony Snow, the White House spokesman, said that in spite of Mr. Baker’s public suggestion that the administration should follow its recommendations fully, “Members of the Baker-Hamilton commission made it clear that they don’t expect everybody to agree with each and every jot and tittle.”

“And the president as commander in chief,” Mr. Snow said, “still has the obligation to take seriously every bit of analysis and advice he gets, and to make his own decisions.”

White House Debating New Iraq Strategies (AP)

By Jennifer Loven,

AP, December 10, 2006

In a rush to chart a new course for the Iraq war, President Bush's national security team is debating whether additional troops are needed to secure Baghdad — a short-term force increase that could be made up of all Americans, a combination of U.S. and Iraqi forces, or all Iraqis, a senior administration official said Saturday.

Other options being debated for inclusion in what the president has said will be his "new way forward" include a revamped approach to procuring the help of other nations in calming Iraq; scaling back the military mission to focus almost exclusively on hunting al-Qaida terrorists; and a new strategy of outreach to all of Iraq's factions, whose disputes are fueling some of the worst bloodshed since the war began, said the official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because the disclosure of internal discussions had not been authorized.

The official would not disclose how the administration was leaning in each of these areas, or provide details of the many other options said to remain on the table. The source cautioned that although Bush is planning to present his plan to the nation in a speech in the next two weeks, the discussions remain fluid and no final decisions have been made.

However, military leaders have portrayed a surge of additional forces as an unattractive option, and the Iraq Study Group did not recommend one.

In his weekly radio address Saturday, the president praised the report by the independent, bipartisan panel on Iraq, heralding its support for his goal of a country that can govern, sustain and defend itself. While ignoring the sections of the Iraq Study Group's report that criticize his administration's handling of the war and recommend a radically different strategy, Bush said he was pleased the panel did not suggest a hasty withdrawal of U.S. troops.

"The group declared that such a withdrawal would `almost certainly produce greater sectarian violence' and lead to `a significant power vacuum, greater human suffering, regional destabilization and a threat to the global economy,'" the president said, quoting from the report.

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld was in Iraq Saturday on a surprise visit, a Pentagon spokesman said. "He's there to express his appreciation to the troops and to thank both the troops and their families for the sacrifices they are making," said Air Force Lt. Col. Todd Vician, a Defense Department spokesman.

Since Wednesday's release of the group's 79-recommendation prescription for change, which it said was needed quickly to turn around a "grave and deteriorating" situation, Bush has appeared to set the stage for going in his own direction.

The president has said he will consider all of the panel's recommendations while awaiting the conclusion of parallel Iraq policy reviews by the Pentagon, State Department and White House National Security Council.

But Bush has already been publicly cool to the panel's key proposals — which called for direct engagement with Iran and Syria as part of a new diplomatic initiative and a pullback of all American combat brigades by early 2008, barring unexpected developments, to shift the U.S. mission to training and advising.

The president's own due diligence on Iraq continues all week.

On Monday, he goes to the State Department for a presentation on diplomatic and political options, and then meets in the Oval Office with independent Iraq experts. On Tuesday, the president confers in a video conference with senior military commanders and Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad, the top U.S. diplomat in Iraq. On Wednesday, he meets with senior defense officials at the Pentagon.

On the political front, some have argued for a tilt away from minority Sunni dissidents to Shiites, who dominate the government and the country's largest sect. But the administration's internal review may instead recommend a wholly revamped U.S. approach that focuses less on playing middleman between major Shiite and Sunni political factions in the government in Baghdad and more on identifying new moderate leaders from across Iraq's political spectrum.

Administration officials point to Bush's recent meetings as evidence he is getting involved in a different way in the political infighting among Shiites, Sunnis and Kurds. Earlier this week, Bush met with the leader of the largest Shiite bloc in Iraq's parliament, Abdul-Aziz al-Hakim. On Tuesday, he meets with a Sunni leader, Iraqi Vice President Tariq al-Hashemi.

Diplomatically, though Bush still objects to talks with Iran and Syria, a debate continues about which nations to try to engage and in what forum to approach them, the source said.

Democrats, meanwhile, continued to push for Bush to adopt the recommendations of the Iraq Study Group.

"Their report confirms what most of us have known for some time — President Bush's policy of stay the course is not working," Rep. Silvestre Reyes, D-Texas, the incoming chairman of the House Intelligence Committee, said in his party's weekly radio remarks. "We must launch a new diplomatic offensive to engage Iraq's neighbors and the international community in the process of stabilizing Iraq and that region. President Bush has not done this, but he must because our nation's security and the well-being of our 150,000 troops there depend on it."

Bush Says Report Shares His Primary Vision For Iraq (LAT)

By Paul Richter

The Los Angeles Times, December 10, 2006

WASHINGTON — Although the bipartisan commission on Iraq endorsed actions that the White House firmly opposed, President Bush said Saturday that the panel's report shared his chief goal for the country.

Bush, trying to shift his course on the war in a way that will win public backing, said in his weekly radio address that the Iraq Study Group "explicitly endorses the strategic goal we've set in Iraq: an Iraq that can 'govern itself, sustain itself and defend itself.' "

Some conservatives have attacked the report as defeatist. But Bush said the bipartisan panel also shared his concern that a quick U.S. departure could ignite more violence across the region. "The Iraq Study Group understands the urgency of getting it right in Iraq," he said.

The release of the report Wednesday has amplified criticism of the administration's policies and lent new momentum to calls for U.S. withdrawal from Iraq. Bush is now scrambling to develop an alternate course that aides say is likely to contain some features of the panel's report while maintaining many of the current U.S. commitments for the indefinite future.

The president said the two parties should seek a bipartisan consensus on Iraq policy, and sought to portray himself as in step with many of the fundamental messages produced by the commission's five Democrats and five Republicans.

Though the report described the situation in Iraq in far more dire terms than he or his chief aides have used, Bush said it "provides a straightforward picture of the grave situation we face in Iraq." He said he agreed with the panel's findings that the goal should be "an Iraq with a broadly representative government that maintains its territorial integrity, is at peace with its neighbors, denies terrorism a sanctuary and doesn't brutalize its own people."

He cited its language that, "given the current situation in Iraq, achieving this goal will require much time and will depend primarily on the actions of the Iraqi people." Bush also highlighted the report's warning that a precipitate withdrawal would "almost certainly produce greater sectarian violence" and lead to "a significant power vacuum, greater human suffering, regional destabilization and a threat to the global economy."

Bush noted that he would hold highly visible meetings this week as he formulates a new approach that may be announced as early as next week. On Monday, Bush is to meet with academic and policy experts on Iraq, and hold a videoconference with military commanders.

Bush said he was confident that "we can move beyond our political differences and come together to achieve that victory."

He did not mention any differences in view between himself and the panel, which recommended withdrawal of nearly all 15 U.S. combat brigades by early 2008 and called for diplomatic initiatives with Iran and Syria.

But in a response to the radio address, the Democratic incoming chairman of the House Intelligence Committee said the group's report required an immediate shift of direction in Iraq.

Rep. Silvestre Reyes (D-Texas) said the report "confirms what most of us have known for some time — that President Bush's policy of stay the course is not working. We need a new approach." He said the panel's report followed what some Democrats have been urging for months — shifting U.S. troops from combat to advisory roles.

Sen. Richard J. Durbin of Illinois, the incoming Senate Democratic whip, noted that at a meeting with lawmakers Friday, Bush didn't endorse the panel's findings. Durbin said that led him to question whether Bush would support the conclusions.

In Bahrain on Saturday, Iran's foreign minister addressed the report's recommendation for U.S.-Iranian talks by saying Tehran would take part only if the United States first announced a troop withdrawal.

"The first and most essential step … is the United States announce they have decided to withdraw from Iraq," Manouchehr Mottaki told reporters at a security conference.

He said that if the United States declared plans to do so, "Iran is ready to help the administration to withdraw its troops from Iraq." But he added that Iraq so far did not see such "political will" in the United States.

Report On Iraq Exposes Divide Within G.O.P. (NYT)

By John M. Broder, Robin Toner

The New York Times, December 10, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 9 — The release of the report by the bipartisan Iraq Study Group this week exposed deep fissures among Republicans over how to manage a war that many fear will haunt their party — and the nation — for years to come.

A document that many in Washington had hoped would pave the way for a bipartisan compromise on Iraq instead drew sharp condemnation from the right, with hawks saying it was a wasted effort that advocated a shameful American retreat.

The Wall Street Journal's editorial page described the report as a "strategic muddle," Richard Perle called it "absurd," Rush Limbaugh labeled it "stupid," and The New York Post portrayed the leaders of the group, former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and Lee H. Hamilton, a former Democratic member of Congress, as "surrender monkeys."

Republican moderates clung to the report, mindful of the drubbing the party received in last month's midterm elections largely because of Iraq. They said they hoped President Bush would adopt the group's principal recommendations and begin the process of disengagement from the long and costly war. But White House officials who conducted a preliminary review of the report said they had concluded that many of the proposals were impractical or unrealistic. [Page 18.]

The divisions could make it more difficult for Republicans to coalesce on national security policy and avoid a bitter intraparty fight going into the 2008 campaign.

Senator John McCain of Arizona, a leading candidate for the Republican presidential nomination, rejected the major recommendations of the group because they did not present a formula for victory. Mr. McCain, hoping to claim the Republican mantle on national security issues, has staked out a muscular position on Iraq, calling for an immediate increase in American forces to try to bring order to Baghdad and crush the insurgency.

It is too early to say how the war will figure in Republican primary battles, as other potential candidates are still developing their positions and conditions on the ground in Iraq may change. Mr. McCain's chief early rival, Gov. Mitt Romney of Massachusetts, has been in Asia all week and has not yet read the report, an aide said.

But the debate will go to the heart of the party's identity — and its image as the party of strength on national security — after Mr. Bush's aggressive post-Sept. 11 foreign policy brought electoral successes in 2002 and 2004 but was profoundly challenged by voters this year.

Mr. Bush has not yet tipped his hand on what course he intends to pursue, saying he will await parallel reviews of Iraq policy from the National Security Council, the State Department and the Pentagon before deciding on any major changes. But he has already signaled that he intends to make some adjustments, most notably by dismissing Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld immediately after the midterm elections.

Mr. Bush's choices will not only have profound effects on the conduct of the war, but will also resonate within his party and give shape to the foreign policy debate of the 2008 elections. Republicans are already engaged in soul-searching over the results of the recent election, trying to figure out how the party can regain the faith of the American people on questions of war and peace.

The ambivalence and introspection were summed up by Senator Gordon H. Smith of Oregon, who spoke at length in the Senate this week about the dangers of withdrawing from Iraq but said he could no longer support the status quo.

"I, for one, am at the end of my rope when it comes to supporting a policy that has our soldiers patrolling the same streets in the same way, being blown up by the same bombs day after day," Mr. Smith said. "That is absurd. It may even be criminal. I cannot support that anymore. I believe we need to figure out how to fight the war on terror and to do it right. So either we clear and hold and build, or let's go home."

The frustration was widespread among Congressional Republicans, some of whom were serving their final days in office this week after an election largely influenced by the public's unhappiness with the war.

"So what do we have?" asked Senator Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania, the third-ranking Republican in the Senate, who supported the war, defended it throughout his re-election campaign and was defeated last month. "We have the Baker-Hamilton report, which is a prescription for surrender. It is just a matter of time."

But Mr. Bush is also facing a rising chorus of demands from moderates in his party, as well as from Democrats, for a plan to begin a withdrawal from Iraq. They see in the report a politically palatable way to achieve disengagement from Iraq and an end to the partisan warfare in Washington.

"To ignore the message sent in the last election is to do so at our political peril, because the message was a resounding repudiation of the status quo with respect to Iraq," said Senator Olympia J. Snowe, the moderate Republican from Maine. "The American people are essentially unified in their intense dissatisfaction with the way things have progressed in Iraq."

Bill Kristol, the neoconservative editor of The Weekly Standard and a leading advocate of the decision to invade Iraq, said: "In the real world, the Baker report is now the vehicle for those Republicans who want to extricate themselves from Iraq, while McCain is articulating the strategy for victory in Iraq. Bush will have to choose, and the Republican Party will have to choose, in the very near future between Baker and McCain."

The choice Mr. Kristol is describing reflects a longstanding Republican schism over policy and culture between ideological neoconservatives and so-called realists. Through most of the Bush administration, the neoconservatives' idea of using American military power to advance democracy around the world prevailed, pushed along by Vice President Dick Cheney and Mr. Rumsfeld.

But as the Iraq war spiraled downward, the realists began to speak out more forcefully. They were also heavily represented on the Iraq Study Group, including Mr. Baker, former Secretary of State Lawrence S. Eagleburger and Robert M. Gates, who stepped down from the panel last month when Mr. Bush named him to succeed Mr. Rumsfeld. All three served in the administration of Mr. Bush's father.

The Wall Street Journal's editorial page, one barometer of conservative thought, called the study group's report "a bipartisan strategic muddle ginned up for domestic political purposes." It welcomed the panel's plan to increase the number of American trainers embedded with Iraqi military units, but it scoffed at the group's recommendation of involving Jordan and Syria in talks to address problems in Iraq.

Mr. Perle, a prominent neoconservative and early advocate of invading Iraq, dismissed the panel as a "misadventure" that should be ignored.

"You don't outsource the responsibilities of the commander in chief," Mr. Perle said. "The whole thing is absurd."

Mr. Limbaugh, who commands a large conservative audience on talk radio, said the commission was peopled with out-of-touch weaklings who placed a higher value on bipartisan comity than on winning the war.

"You know, bipartisanship simply means Republicans cave on their core principles and agree with Democrats," Mr. Limbaugh said on his program this week. "That's why everybody is praising the stupid report. Because there's nothing in this about winning, there's nothing in this about victory. There isn't anything in this about moving forward in a positive way. This is cut and run, surrender without the words."

Representative Duncan Hunter, a California Republican who is the departing chairman of the House Armed Services Committee and a 2008 presidential hopeful, said, "The policy-making decisions about Iraq should not be considered to be devolving to a nonelected group put together essentially for the purpose of advising the president."

Democrats, meanwhile, face divisions of their own, aware that they face high expectations from voters after running campaigns that promised change in Iraq.

Many leaders in the party indicated this week that they felt vindicated by the study group's findings, and they vowed to push ahead with their promise of aggressive oversight hearings on the management of the war when they take control of Congress in January.

But the party's liberal base is hungry for more forceful action, including voting against additional financing for the war. "It's difficult to talk about ending the war without showing you're willing to end the money," said Representative Maxine Waters, a California Democrat and leader of the antiwar caucus in the House.

Democratic leaders have opposed cutting off the money, although Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi said this week that Democrats would impose new standards and conditions in Iraq spending bills.

Representative Christopher Shays, the Connecticut Republican who survived a Democratic electoral sweep across New England last month, said, "I don't think there's a real consensus in Congress in general" on Iraq. But he added, "Having been to Iraq 15 times, staying the course would just be foolish."

No matter what positions they take today, all Republicans would prefer that the 2008 elections not be fought on the battleground of Iraq, said Douglas Foyle, professor of government at Wesleyan University.

"They don't want the 2008 presidential and Congressional campaign to be about staying the course," Professor Foyle said. "That's where the calculus of Bush and the Republicans diverge very quickly. Everyone is thinking about the next election, and Bush doesn't have one."

GOP Alienation Marks Turnabout For Bush (LAT)

By Noam N. Levey

The Los Angeles Times, December 10, 2006

President Bush, weakened by an unpopular war and the loss of Republican control in Congress, is now confronting disaffection within his own party that could complicate his attempt to set an agenda for his final two years in office.

As Republicans departed Capitol Hill this weekend, some who used to dismiss Democratic attempts to investigate the administration as political posturing are now lining up behind calls for greater oversight of the executive branch.

They are advertising attacks on Bush's foreign policy that they once kept largely private. Last week, Oregon Sen. Gordon H. Smith gave a speech calling the current war strategy "absurd" and sent out a news release with his remarks.

Some longtime Bush allies, such as Texas Sen. John Cornyn, are even adopting Democratic rhetoric to criticize the Iraq war.

And on other issues that will confront the new Congress in January — including trade and judicial appointments — Republican lawmakers have signaled an unwillingness to follow the White House.

"Frankly, I think there is a greater recognition and awareness of the necessity for us to exercise checks and balances," said Sen. Olympia J. Snowe (R-Maine), noting how much the Nov. 7 election changed the climate on Capitol Hill.

"If there was a reluctance to express that in the past, there isn't anymore," Snowe said.

To be sure, no one is expecting Republicans to abandon the president. And the ideological gap between Democrats and Republicans in Congress remains large.

But Republican disaffection marks a remarkable turnabout for a president whose command of his party was once so supreme he virtually appointed the Senate majority leader and GOP lawmakers openly acknowledged taking orders from the White House.

And it suggests that the Bush administration may have as much work to do to repair ties with Republicans as it does to build links with Democrats who will assume control of the House and Senate in January.

"They need to have a better relationship with members on both sides of the aisle," said Rep. Christopher Shays, a Connecticut Republican whose early support for Bush's war policy nearly cost him his seat last month.

Not so long ago, it was Republican members of Congress who labored to stay close to the president.

The Bush administration's ability to win approval from a compliant legislative branch for everything from tax cuts to foreign invasions and other initiatives was a source of awe. In 2002, the president was widely seen as responsible for making Tennessee Republican Bill Frist the Senate majority leader.

That influence was slipping even before the November midterm election swept Republicans from power on Capitol Hill.

House Republicans abandoned Bush over immigration. And in the Senate, some of the chamber's most respected GOP members stood up to the White House on Iraq and the prosecution of terrorism suspects.

In the run-up to Nov. 7, Bush weathered more defections as some Republican congressional candidates tried to distance themselves from the president's war policies, calling for troop withdrawals and the resignation of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld.

But since the pivotal election, dissent has mushroomed.

And as the House and Senate prepare for what many expect to be heated debates next year over the course of U.S. policy in the Middle East, Republican lawmakers have stepped up their critiques of the war, directly challenging the White House in ways that had been the province of Democrats.

Sen. Sam Brownback of Kansas, Sen.-elect Bob Corker of Tennessee and others have explicitly called for more engagement with Syria and Iran, two states the Bush administration has treated as pariahs for most of the last six years.

Even some of the president's most loyal allies, including Texas Sens. Cornyn and Kay Bailey Hutchison, are tacking away from the White House by calling for more troops in Iraq.

While the president tried to remain upbeat after the Iraq Study Group brought its grim assessment to the Capitol last week, Cornyn offered no more encouragement than Bush's toughest critics.

"What we're doing now is not working," Cornyn said, echoing a Democratic campaign slogan. "We need a change of course."

The change in climate on Capitol Hill has been remarkable, said Rep. Walter B. Jones, a North Carolina Republican who broke with his party to oppose the war last year.

"Many of my friends said to me [then], 'You know, Walter, you are beginning to be so independent that it may end up hurting you,' " Jones said. He added that a number of his colleagues told him that although they agreed with him, they feared being disloyal to the president.

"I haven't heard that recently," Jones said

The reason is simple, said Paul Begala, a Democratic consultant who worked in the White House when President Clinton was forced to confront congressional Democrats after the party lost its majorities in 1994.

"When you are in the White House, members of Congress respond to two things: what you can do for them and what you can do to them," Begala said. "Here's what [Bush] did to them: He cost them control.... Republicans are paying the political consequences for Bush's policy failures. They don't like that."

Beyond Iraq, that may spell trouble for the White House next year.

Already, GOP lawmakers are signaling their eagerness to join in the kind of congressional investigation that Democrats promised on the campaign trail this fall.

Last week, Republicans scrambled to express support for expanding the power of an independent agency to monitor spending on Iraq reconstruction, a move that House Republicans had quashed in an appropriations committee earlier this year.

On other issues too there were signs of dissent last week. Many GOP lawmakers bucked the White House over trade deals with Vietnam and Haiti, forcing a flurry of last-minute parliamentary maneuvering to get the agreements through Congress.

As the congressional session drew to a close, the president also couldn't get a hearing for a raft of conservative judges he renominated for positions on the federal bench.

Amid the growing signs of defiance, the president gave a nod to the other end of Pennsylvania Avenue last week, inviting Democratic and Republican congressional leaders to the White House.

And the administration communicated a new willingness to talk with Congress about overhauling Social Security without insisting on setting up private accounts.

"We can't have talks if everyone doesn't start with a clean sheet of paper," said a White House official who asked not to be named because the talks had not been announced.

But lawmakers, congressional aides and political scholars say the White House has its work cut out for it.

Other weakened presidents, including Ronald Reagan, have had to deal with a sour Congress in their final two years, said John J. Pitney Jr., a former Republican National Committee staffer who teaches government at Claremont McKenna College.

But though Reagan was saddled with the Iran-Contra affair, Americans weren't dying overseas every day.

"Bush has low approval ratings. He has an unpopular war. And every day is one day closer to his exit," Pitney said. "That is not a recipe for legislative success."

Hawks Bolster Skeptical President (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz, Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, December 10, 2006

Steady condemnation from conservatives for the Iraq Study Group report may be providing some cover to the Bush administration as it completes its own review of strategy in Iraq, apparently with little enthusiasm for the panel's prescription of U.S. troop withdrawal and dialogue with Syria and Iran.

The criticism of the panel, co-chaired by former secretary of state James A. Baker III and former representative Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.), has burst forth from the leading institutions of the right: the National Review, the Wall Street Journal editorial page and the Weekly Standard; conservative talk radio; and scholars at some of Washington's top think tanks.

President Bush has spoken favorably of the panel's work as an opportunity to bring the country together, but he has been noncommittal on its key recommendations. Comments from the hawkish right, meanwhile, have often been an accurate gauge of the beliefs of key figures inside the Bush administration, especially Vice President Cheney.

Many Republican and Democratic lawmakers have embraced the panel's report, but the almost uniformly negative reaction from some of Bush's strongest conservative supporters means the president may have some political flexibility to depart from the group's major recommendations, according to some GOP operatives.

Notably fueling the skepticism has been Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), who has raised pointed questions about the Baker-Hamilton panel's unwillingness to prescribe more troops, as McCain has urged, and its embrace of a regional conference with Syria and Iran.

"It's sort of hard to suddenly say everyone agrees Baker is the way to go when the leading Republican candidate for '08 is saying no," said William Kristol, editor of the Weekly Standard.

Although it is clear that many Republicans regard the Iraq Study Group's report as a possible exit strategy from a war that they worry could drag the party down in 2008, such plans are colliding with clear anger from neoconservatives, who have been the most ardent supporters of the Bush administration since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

"It's preposterous, period," said Kenneth R. Weinstein, chief executive of the conservative-leaning Hudson Institute, about the proposal for a new dialogue with Iran and Syria. "Talking to them is not going to bring anything but a perception of American weakness."

"The report is a monumental disappointment, for all the hype," said Richard Perle, a former Reagan-administration defense official who strongly supported the Iraq invasion. "The recommendations are either wrong or of no consequence. There is no magic bullet, but in their desire to find something, they found the wrong things."

Many of the conservatives have long distrusted Baker, viewing him as a figure of amoral, dealmaking diplomacy who unduly pressured Israel and coddled Syria when he was secretary of state.

And the Baker-Hamilton group, neoconservatives came to believe, was stacked against them from the beginning, both in the composition of the panel and in the panel's choices of experts to hear from. Neoconservatives also complained that the group sought out the views of Iran and Syria but did not speak to senior officials of such allies as Israel and Turkey.

Frank J. Gaffney Jr., a former Reagan administration hawk who heads the Center for Security Policy, said he believes the panel's output was "certainly driven" by Baker.

"It seems so transparently in keeping with his modus operandi: the quest for the deal without regard for the content or the repercussions," he said.

The full report was endorsed by each of the 10 panelists, including former attorney general Edwin Meese III, a hero of the conservative movement. Yet Baker has clearly been mindful of the criticism. He showed up Thursday for a group interview with print reporters laughingly brandishing a copy of the conservative New York Post from that morning, its headline blaring "Surrender Monkeys," in reference to him and Hamilton.

He proceeded with a robust defense of the panel's proposal for a broad-based U.S. diplomatic initiative in the Middle East and renewed engagement with Syria and Iran -- the clear focus of the conservative anger. Baker made plain his disdain for some of the neoconservative ideas, including the argument heard before the 2003 Iraq invasion that the road to Arab-Israeli peace lay in overthrowing Saddam Hussein's government in Baghdad.

"What we really are saying, the road to peace in Iraq lies through Baghdad. The road to Arab-Israeli peace runs through Jerusalem," he said. "We are not linking the two, but we are proposing a comprehensive strategy to improve our prospects in Iraq and improve our prospects in the Middle East."

He offered an impassioned plea for engaging Syria at a high level, something the Bush administration has refused to do, and said the administration does not know what can be achieved if it does not even try. Baker dismissed the whispers from the White House that he is out of touch with the new realities of the Middle East.

"Talking to Syria gives us an excellent opportunity to revitalize the Arab-Israeli peace process," Baker said. "The Syrians are the transit point for arms shipments to Hezbollah, and if you can flip the Syrians, you will cure Israel's Hezbollah problem. "

Baker went on: "The Syrians will tell you, as they told us, that they do have the ability to convince Hamas to acknowledge Israel's right to exist. . . . If we accomplished that, that would give [Israeli Prime Minister] Ehud Olmert a negotiating partner on the Palestinian track."

Michael Rubin, a former Pentagon aide who resigned in protest from an Iraq Study Group expert panel, said he believes Baker's assessment is unrealistic. He said that Syrian President Bashar al-Assad gains strength from positioning himself as a rejectionist and foe of the United States, so it is wrong to believe that Syria would think it would gain from an alliance with Washington.

"Sometimes realists have to deal with reality," said Rubin, now a scholar at the American Enterprise Institute. "Iran and Syria will press to exploit every advantage they have."

He said the report, as a strategy document, was a "Cliff Notes high school paper."

Eliot A. Cohen, a Johns Hopkins University professor of military strategy, said the Baker-Hamilton recommendations reflect "preoccupations that go back to when [Baker] was secretary of state and are completely detached from today's reality. The idea that Sunni are putting power drills in the heads of Shia and vice versa because of the Arab-Israeli conflict is bizarre."

Iraq Study Group member Leon E. Panetta, a Democratic former congressman and White House chief of staff under Bill Clinton, said the criticism from hawks and conservatives is "the price of statesmanship" for Baker. "He's been through it," he added. "He understands it.

"I think the feeling was, how do you rescue this administration from the grip of ideology and force it to face the real world?" Panetta said. "That's where he was coming from: 'How can I help the president in a way protect his legacy and do the right thing?' "

Bush Seen Rejecting Iraq Lifeline (SFC)

By Carolyn Lochhead

San Francisco Chronicle, December 10, 2006

Washington -- Much of Washington is looking at President Bush as a man standing on quicksand in Iraq, refusing the branch offered by his father's friend to save his presidency and the country from a historic blunder.

Bush looks at history, too. A day after the release of a grim assessment of the war by the Iraq Study Group, headed by James Baker, a close friend of Bush's father who served as secretary of state for President George H.W. Bush, and former Democratic Rep. Lee Hamilton, Bush conceded the need for tactical shifts, but he left it to those who follow him into the Oval Office to decide whether to leave Iraq.

"Will we have the resolve and confidence in liberty to prevail?" he asked. That question is "not going to face this government ... because we made up our mind. We've made that part clear. It'll face future governments. There will be future opportunities for people to say, 'Well, it's not worth it. Let's just retreat.' "

Standing at a point in history as fraught with consequence as his decision to invade Iraq nearly four years ago, Bush is in full flower of what he calls resolve and others call obduracy. The Baker-Hamilton report has left Bush isolated even within his own party.

"This is a president who really sees it as a weakness to admit error," said Julian Zelizer, a congressional historian at Boston University. "But with Iraq it has reached such a point, it's like he's standing in the desert without anyone around him and refusing help."

It remains to be seen whether Bush is clinging to Cold War metaphors that he hopes history will vindicate or saving face before delivering a speech expected by Christmas. During it he would call for a gradual withdrawal of U.S. forces from Iraq based on reviews he has ordered from his State Department, Pentagon and National Security Council.

He has scheduled an intense round of meetings this week with military commanders and Pentagon officials, the State Department, the vice president of Iraq and outside experts.

Bush claimed Saturday that the bipartisan report of the Baker-Hamilton group endorsed his strategic goal of a stable Iraq and the danger of a precipitous withdrawal. The report did that, but it also called current policy a failure and talked of preventing catastrophe -- not spreading democracy as Bush declared again this past week -- in the Middle East.

DOJ_NMG_0104826

Those who know Baker do not believe he was sent as an envoy from father to son. Although Baker is known as a master bail-out artist who helped Bush wrest the contested Florida recount away from Democrat Al Gore in the 2000 election, they say he is no longer playing family messenger.

Nor, they say, are any of the other Republican elders in the Iraq Study Group -- retired Supreme Court Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, former Wyoming Sen. Alan Simpson and Ed Meese, the hard-charging attorney general for Ronald Reagan -- playing that role.

Baker "is someone who has devoted his life to policy and to the Bushes, and he has worked hard in the diplomatic world to try to advance America's interests," said Leon Panetta, a member of the Iraq Study Group who served as chief of staff to Democratic President Bill Clinton and a longtime House member from Monterey.

"I think there has been a tremendous amount of frustration, particularly among those who served in the first Bush administration -- and for that matter served with Ronald Reagan -- who felt that even though these presidents were Republicans and conservatives, that they were also pragmatists. ...

"There really has been an interest to try to say (to the president), 'Look, there is a way out of this. There is a way to deal with this in the real world that cannot only help save Iraq but protect your legacy as president.' "

Jim Pinkerton, a White House adviser to the first President Bush, said the former president kept Baker's group at arm's length.

"I think it's fair to say Baker is making his own bid for establishmentarian wise man," Pinkerton said. "I suspect that George H.W. Bush probably agrees with him, but it's almost as if he doesn't need to say much, because let's face it, Baker and (former national security adviser Brent) Scowcroft and the whole crowd think the same way on this."

The Baker-Hamilton report finished what voters began in November when they handed control of the House and Senate to Democrats, knocking out what little political support remained for Bush's Iraq policy. Calls for withdrawal now have a bipartisan imprimatur and set a standard against which Bush will be measured.

"Whatever he chooses will be graded against this report," said Rand Beers, a longtime Republican national security official who resigned from Bush's administration over its war policy.

Late Thursday, Oregon Sen. Gordon Smith, a Republican who voted for the war, became the latest member of the president's party to leave his side when he slammed the entire Iraq enterprise in a scathing Senate floor speech.

"I, for one, am at the end of my rope when it comes to supporting a policy that has our soldiers patrolling the same streets in the same way, being blown up by the same bombs day after day," Smith said. "That is absurd. It may even be criminal. I cannot support that anymore."

But the president continues to use the language he adopted after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, and lays the Iraq war squarely in the context of prior struggles against fascism and totalitarianism.

Should extremists succeed in "using terror to stop the spread of freedom," Bush said Thursday, "history will look back on our time with unforgiving clarity and demand to know, 'What happened? How come free nations did not act to preserve the peace?' "

Embattled British Prime Minister Tony Blair stood beside him, thanking Bush for "the clarity of your vision about ... the struggle between freedom and democracy," adding, "it's a noble mission, and it's the right mission."

Leaders find it easier to sustain a difficult policy if they believe their cause is noble, said George Edwards, chair of presidential studies at Texas A&M University. "Clearly, that's true for almost everyone -- 'I am here accepting the slings and arrows of my fellow man on behalf of advancing democracy in a region that has never known it,' " Edwards said. "That makes it a lot easier to persist."

Bush supporters draw parallels with Democratic President Harry Truman, who left office in shame over public disapproval of the Korean War but whose reputation was resurrected. Presidential historians are more tempted to look to Democratic President Lyndon Johnson, who escalated the war in Vietnam to halt the spread of communism but faced a nationalist guerrilla insurgency that cost more than 57,000 American lives.

"It took Johnson a long time to change his mind and it isn't clear that there was ever a radical change," Edwards said. The public turned against the war and Johnson did not run for re-election in 1968.

Presidents may persist in such times "because they just become rigid and defensive," Edwards said. "But there's also the case that they believe in the policy. After all, they paid a heavy price to establish and maintain that policy, so it's easy to understand that it's difficult to then just reject it one day."

Panetta, who was brought to the White House by Clinton after Democrats lost their House and Senate majorities in 1994, said presidents often dig in when times get rough.

"Anybody who gets elected to the presidency is somebody who has had to take on a lot of criticism, a lot of problems, a lot of attacks, a lot of turmoil," Panetta said. "Because they're willing to persist and move on, they managed to succeed, only because they're so determined. ... And that normally works when the crisis passes by and you can then come out and do what you're supposed to do. Unfortunately here, this crisis is not going to just simply pass by."

Many in Washington, even those who supported the invasion, see the Iraq Study Group as a lifeline to Bush. "They did him a great favor politically," said Stephen Hess, a political scientist at George Washington University who worked in the Nixon administration. "My feeling is he's having a very hard time moving off his set positions, which were particularly fixed by the campaign, when he was out every day saying the same things about victory and democracy."

"This is the president's big chance, and I hope he takes it," said Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif.

Many wonder why Bush doesn't look like he's falling apart under the stress.

The president may be in denial, or simply be a positive person, "whoever since he was a cheerleader at prep school and frat president at college, has been full of resilience and bounces back and just doesn't let these things in public life get him down," said Fred Greenstein, a presidential scholar at Princeton University.

Greenstein pointed to Bush as a 7-year-old child "jollying up his mother after she was in a deep depression when his sister died of leukemia. He's got this style of banter and outgoingness."

An Unlikely Offensive (WP)

THE IRAQ Study Group's recommendations for shifting U.S. military tactics in the war are specific, focused and aimed at incremental improvement over the next few months; they are also close to what the Pentagon and Iraqi government already were hoping to achieve. By contrast, the group's diplomatic strategy is sweeping -- and untethered to reality. The Bush administration could and should adopt some version of the military plan, though it would be right to ignore the unrealistic timetable attached to it. But to embrace the group's proposed "New Diplomatic Offensive" would be to suppose a Middle East very different from what's on the ground.

Start with the supposition that resolving the Israeli-Palestinian conflict is somehow central to ending the chaos in Iraq. In fact, even if the two-state solution sought by the Bush administration were achieved, it's difficult to imagine how or why that would cause Sunnis and Shiites to cease their sectarian war in Baghdad or the Baathist-al Qaeda insurgency to stand down. It's no doubt true, as study group chairmen James A. Baker III and Lee H. Hamilton have said, that every Arab leader they met told them that an Israeli-Arab settlement must be the first priority. But the princes and dictators of Riyadh, Cairo and Amman have been delivering that tired line to American envoys for decades: It is their favorite excuse for failing to support U.S. initiatives and for refusing to reform their own moribund autocracies. In fact, Saudi Arabia, Jordan and other Iraqi neighbors have vital interests in the ongoing Iraqi power struggle. They can and should be moved to help stop the slide toward anarchy on their borders whether or not peace breaks out in Jerusalem.

Mr. Baker, who pursued a Mideast diplomatic strategy 15 years ago focused in large part on Syria, also conjectures that its regime can be "flipped," so that it abandons its current alliance with Iran and support for extremist movements in Lebanon and the Palestinian territories. The problem with his theory is that since 1991 Syria has acquired a new leader: Bashar al-Assad is very different from his father, Hafez, with whom Mr. Baker negotiated. Bashar al-Assad, along with several senior members of his retinue, has been personally implicated in a United Nations investigation into the assassination of former Lebanese prime minister Rafiq Hariri. Judging from its recent actions, Syria's top diplomatic priority is not recovering the Golan Heights from Israel -- as Mr. Baker supposes -- but stopping the U.N. investigation and undermining Lebanon's pro-Western democratic government. European envoys who have met Mr. Assad in recent weeks dismiss the possibility of a dramatic reversal of his policies.

Parts of the Baker-Hamilton diplomatic agenda make good sense, including its suggestion for a contact group of Iraq's neighbors, including Iran and Syria. The Iraqi government already has embraced the notion, by proposing a regional conference in Baghdad, and President Bush would be wise to get on board. Syria and Iran could remain adversaries of the United States across the region yet still play a role in a group where the pressing common interest is avoiding a regional sectarian war.

By the same token, the administration ought to continue its efforts to promote the creation of a Palestinian government capable of undertaking the peace negotiations that Israeli Prime Minster Ehud Olmert offered last month. It should also continue to press hard for U.N. sanctions against Iran's nuclear program and seek sanctions against Syria if it continues to flout U.N. resolutions calling for it to cease its meddling in Lebanon. All these steps could strengthen Arab moderates and U.S. allies around the region. But they won't solve the problems in Iraq.

About Those Other Problems (NYT)

No one could ever suggest that James Baker lacks ambition or self-confidence. So it is not surprising that along with its effort to salvage Iraq, the report from Mr. Baker's Iraq Study Group offers some strong advice on how to fix George W. Bush's dysfunctional Washington — and the president's dysfunctional relations with the rest of the world.

We were particularly drawn to Recommendations 46, 72 and 78. Under separate headings dealing with the military, the federal budget and the nation's intelligence agencies, they share one basic idea: Government officials should not lie to the public or each other, especially in matters of war.

One should not need a blue ribbon commission to know that. But the fact that it had to be said, and so often, in the report goes a long way toward explaining how Mr. Bush got the country into the Iraq mess and why it is proving so hard to dig out of it.

Consider Recommendation 46, which calls on the new secretary of defense to create "an environment in which the senior military feel free to offer independent advice" to civilian leaders, including the president. That is their sworn duty. But the back story is the Pentagon's prewar refusal to listen to the former Army chief of staff (and who knows how many other generals) who warned that it would take several hundred thousand troops to stabilize a post-invasion Iraq. The good news is that the new secretary of defense, Robert Gates, acknowledged as much in his confirmation hearings. The bad news is that Mr. Bush has not.

Recommendation 72 says that "costs for the war in Iraq should be included in the president's annual budget request." The report warns that the White House's habit of using emergency funding for the war has eroded both "budget discipline" and Congressional oversight. And just in case you were worrying that you hadn't been paying sufficient attention to the war's price tag, the report says the White House presents its requests in such a "confusing manner" that only detailed analyses by budget experts can answer "what should be a simple question: How much money is the president requesting for the war in Iraq?"

And finally, Recommendation 78 calls on the Pentagon and the intelligence community to "institute immediate changes" in how they collect data on violence in Iraq "to provide a more accurate picture of events on the ground." The report says that officials have used a standard for recording attacks (it notes that "a murder of an Iraqi is not necessarily counted") that systematically underreports Iraq's mayhem. It cites one day this past July when the government recorded 93 "attacks or significant acts of violence," while the Iraq Study Group's own analysis "brought to light 1,100 acts of violence."

Sprinkled among the recommendations, the report also has some homespun advice on how Mr. Bush might fix America's foreign relations. It suggests that the nature of diplomacy is to engage with adversaries as well as friends. And it warns that the United States does Israel "no favors" by refusing to try to broker peace in the Middle East, adding that it is "an axiom that when the political process breaks down there will be violence on the ground."

It is mind-boggling that this commission felt compelled to deliver Governing 101 lessons to the president of the United States. But that fits with the implicit message of the entire exercise — a rebuke of the ideologically blinkered way Mr. Bush operates. The report shows that there have always been plenty of alternatives to Mr. Bush's stubborn insistence on staying the course, and that if he were just willing to make an effort, it would be possible to forge a bipartisan consensus on the toughest issues.

It's tragic that Mr. Bush could not figure that out for himself. It is far past time for him to heed this new advice.

Rumsfeld Says Farewell To Troops In Iraq (AP)

By Pete Yost,

AP, December 10, 2006

Outgoing Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld made a surprise trip to Iraq on Saturday, just days after a bipartisan commission called the situation there "grave and deteriorating" and said the administration's policy wasn't working.

"He's there to express his appreciation to the troops and to thank both the troops and their families for the sacrifices they are making," said Air Force Lt. Col. Todd Vician, a Defense Department spokesman.

It was Rumsfeld's 15th trip to Iraq since the war began; he was last there in July.

Rumsfeld's trip follows an emotional farewell Friday at the Pentagon, where the defense secretary defended his record on Iraq and Afghanistan.

He said Friday that the worst day of his nearly six years as secretary of defense occurred when he learned of the Abu Ghraib prisoner abuse.

Rumsfeld's Pentagon appearance Friday and his trip to Iraq, where he was Saturday, were among the few public appearances he has made since President Bush announced on Nov. 8 that he was replacing the defense secretary. His last full day will be Dec. 17.

Rumsfeld's farewell tour follows a grim picture of the Iraq war that was presented this week by a bipartisan commission headed by former Secretary of State James Baker and former Democratic Rep. Lee Hamilton.

The Iraq Study Group said its prescription for change is needed quickly to turn around a "grave and deteriorating" situation.

The commission called for direct engagement with Iran and Syria as part of a new diplomatic initiative and a pullback of all American combat brigades by early 2008, barring unexpected developments, to shift the U.S. mission to training and advising.

The report took direct aim at Rumsfeld. Saying there has been a long tradition of partnership between the military and civilian leaders, the group said the "tradition has frayed" and must be repaired. It urged the new defense secretary, former CIA director Robert Gates, to "make every effort" to encourage military officers to offer independent advice.

President Bush's national security team is debating whether additional troops are needed to secure Baghdad — a short-term force increase that could be made up of all Americans, a combination of U.S. and Iraqi forces, or all Iraqis, a senior administration official said Saturday.

Other options being debated for inclusion in what the president has said will be his "new way forward" include a revamped approach to procuring the help of other nations in calming Iraq; scaling back the military mission to focus almost exclusively on hunting al-Qaida terrorists; and a new strategy of outreach to all of Iraq's factions, whose disputes are fueling some of the worst bloodshed since the war began, said the official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because the disclosure of internal discussions had not been authorized.

Rumsfeld Makes Surprise Farewell Trip To Iraq (AFP)

AFP, December 10, 2006

US Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld has made a surprise visit to Iraq to thank US troops for their service just days before he steps down from his post, a Defense Department spokesman has said.

"The secretary is in Iraq to express appreciation to the troops for what they're doing as well as thanking the families for the sacrifices they make every day for all Americans," spokesman Todd Vician told AFP.

He said Rumsfeld had departed Friday for Iraq and offered no more details of the defense secretary's schedule.

Rumsfeld resigned in November, the day after President George W. Bush's Republicans lost control of the US Congress with voter frustration over the Iraq war dominating the election.

News of Rumsfeld's trip comes nine days before he is replaced by Robert Gates, former head of the Central Intelligence Agency.

Rumsfeld has come under intense criticism at home and abroad over his handling of Iraq and US treatment of detained terror suspects. But he defended the American presence in Iraq on Friday in farewell remarks to Pentagon staff.

He said an early US withdrawal from Iraq would be a "terrible mistake," which would threaten the stability not only of Iraq but the region.

Rumsfeld urged Americans to show patience with the war in Iraq, saying there would be "dire consequences were we to fail here."

Iraq and Afghanistan have made considerable strides, he said, but "those countries are not there yet."

"To pull out precipitously and inject that instability into the situation there in that country, and in that region, I think would be a terrible mistake," he said.

The outspoken defense secretary's visit coincided with more sectarian bloodshed in Iraq. A suspected Sunni suicide bomber on Saturday detonated his car near a revered Shiite shrine in the central city of Karbala, killing six civilians and wounding 47 more, medics said.

Another 10 Iraqis were killed in insurgent and sectarian attacks around the country and the bodies of 35 murder victims were found in Baghdad.

The US military also announced the deaths of two more marines, bringing its dead since the March 2003 invasion to 2,927.

The sectarian violence underlined the urgency of a planned National Reconciliation Conference on December 16, though some political groups were threatening to boycott the event.

Rumsfeld's farewell trip followed the release of a critical report by a high-level US panel, the Iraq Study Group, that described the situation in Iraq as "grave and deteriorating" and urged the US administration to shift course.

Headed by former secretary of state James Baker and former representative Lee Hamilton, the panel said most US combat forces could be withdrawn from Iraq by early 2008 while shifting the US military's mission to one of training and advising Iraqis.

Rumsfeld did not comment on the report directly at his Friday appearance, but he spoke about Iraq as a largely political -- not military -- challenge.

Iraq, he said, "is in fact a microcosm of what is taking place in that region: power struggle -- partly religious, partly economic, certainly political, ... but in a very real sense not terribly military in its nature."

He said the US military was doing all it could, but the conflict in Iraq could only be "won" by Iraqis through political reconciliation.

Rumsfeld, a lightning rod for opponents of the war, also expressed concern about "impatience in the United States and in the Congress."

"We have every chance of the world of succeeding in both of those countries, but only if we have the patience, only if we have the staying power," he said.

Shiites Rout Sunni Families In Mixed Area Of Baghdad (NYT)

By John F. Burns

The New York Times, December 10, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 9 — Bands of armed Shiite militiamen stormed through a neighborhood in north-central Baghdad on Saturday, driving hundreds of Sunni Arabs from their homes in what a Sunni colonel in the Iraqi Army described as one of the most flagrant episodes of sectarian warfare yet unleashed in the capital.

The officer, Lt. Col. Abdullah Ramadan al-Jabouri, said that more than 100 Sunni families, many with very young children, had left the Hurriya neighborhood aboard a convoy of trucks and cars under cover of the nightly curfew. Government officials tried to urge the families to return by promising army protection, but could not persuade them.

As the fighting in Hurriya broke out, the outgoing secretary of defense, Donald H. Rumsfeld, arrived in Baghdad on Saturday for what American military officials said was a farewell visit to the troops. Mr. Rumsfeld, who made a farewell speech at the Pentagon on Friday, went straight to the American military headquarters at Camp Victory, on the edge of Baghdad's international airport, and met there with United States commanders, an American military spokesman said. The spokesman said Mr. Rumsfeld was scheduled to travel to other bases outside Baghdad on Sunday before returning to Washington.

The fighting began around noon, when militiamen began rampaging through the only mixed district in Hurriya, a mostly Shiite neighborhood, and killed at least three Sunni Arabs. One family was shot as they left their home, with a 20-year-old man killed and his mother and younger brother wounded, according to an account given by the man's father, who was at work as a security guard elsewhere at the time. The man said the three were hit by automatic rifle fire as they finished loading possessions into their car and prepared to drive to a safer area.

Colonel Jabouri said that skirmishes set off by the militia attacks continued for about five hours, until sunset. Meanwhile, a large convoy of Sunni Arabs waited in their vehicles outside the fortified Muhaimin mosque, waiting to drive to neighboring Sunni districts while local leaders negotiated with militiamen for safe passage.

A Sunni cleric, Sayed Ahmed Muhammad, said the negotiations also involved appeals from top government officials, including Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, a Shiite, for the Sunni families to return to their homes in Hurriya under promise of Iraqi Army protection. But the cleric said the assurances failed to persuade the Sunnis, whom he described as the last of more than 4,000 Sunnis to flee the area under Shiite militia threats in recent months. The convoy set out after dark.

Colonel Jabouri, the Iraqi military commander in the area, said his troops had tried to help groups of Sunnis protect themselves and their homes. But the large number of Shiite militiamen involved — whom he identified as belonging to the Mahdi Army, the most powerful Shiite militia — made that impossible. He described the fighting as the worst eruption of sectarian skirmishing so far experienced by the Iraqi Sixth Division, which shares responsibility for security in Baghdad with American troops.

"As an Iraqi, I'm against sectarianism of any kind," he said. "I'm against any group that that seeks to build barriers between people on the basis of their religion."

The role of American troops in the turmoil was unclear. The Sunni cleric, Sayed Muhammad, said appeals for assistance from the First Cavalry Division, its headquarters about three miles southwest of Hurriya, had gone unanswered. But Colonel Jabouri said Iraqi commanders had told the Americans there was no need for their help. A First Cavalry Division spokesman said American advisers with Iraqi troops in Hurriya had reported only one instance of sectarian trouble, when Iraqi troops assisted a Shiite family under threat from Sunnis.

That account appeared to reflect the cyclical nature of the sectarian violence that has soared in Baghdad in recent months, and has led to thousands of families fleeing mixed Sunni-Shiite areas for the safety of neighborhoods in which their own sect dominates. Hurriya lies in an area of western Baghdad where there has been a surge of attacks on Sunnis living in Shiite-majority areas, and vice versa. Just south of Hurriya lies Amariya, a Sunni Arab stronghold where scores of Shiite families have been driven out by attacks or threats from armed Sunnis.

Sayed Muhammad described the aim of the Shiite attacks on Saturday as creating a Sunni-free corridor across northern Baghdad that would run from the Shula district on the city's northwestern edge to Kadhimiya, a Shiite stronghold on the west bank of the Tigris river. The main area of Shiite strength in the capital lies on the east bank of the Tigris, principally in Sadr City, home to about 2.5 million Shiites, about 40 per cent of Baghdad's population.

"It's part of a much wider plan," the cleric said. "What we're experiencing here is the Shiite groundwork for a civil war."

One of the striking features of the violence Saturday was that it occurred in an area that lies less than three miles northwest of the heavily guarded Green Zone compound that doubles as the seat of the Iraqi government and as an American command post. American diplomats and military commanders have been pressing the Maliki government to take urgent action to begin to curb all militias, and particularly the Mahdi Army, which is under the nominal control of a radical Shiite cleric, Moktada al-Sadr, who is an important political ally of Mr. Maliki.

In other violence on Saturday, a car bomb killed four civilians and wounded 42 others on a street leading to the Imam al-Abbas shrine in the Shiite holy city of Karbala, about 70 miles southwest of Baghdad. The shrine is the resting place of the son of the founder of Shiite Islam, and has been the scene of numerous other attacks since the American-led invasion in 2003. Another car bomb, in the northern city of Mosul, killed at least three civilians.

A United States military statement said that two marines had died Thursday of "wounds sustained due to enemy action," one on Thursday and another on Saturday, in Anbar Province.

Angry residents of a village north of Baghdad fired weapons into the air as they buried victims of an American airstrike, [a news agency] reported. The American military said that the airstrike, on Friday in the village of Jalameda, about 50 miles north of Baghdad, was against militants of Al Qaeda who had fought with troops. The military said 18 men and 2 women were killed. Local officials in the village said there were 17 killed, but that they included 6 women and 5 children.

Hundreds of chanting residents of Jalameda, a predominantly Sunni village, marched through nearby Ishaqi on Saturday firing shots and carrying banners that condemned "mass killing by the occupation forces," [a news agency] said.

Sunni Arabs Flee Homes In Baghdad (WP)

By Sudarsan Raghavan, Nancy Trejos

The Washington Post, December 10, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 9 -- Gangs of roving Shiite Muslim gunmen stormed a west Baghdad neighborhood Saturday, burning houses and killing at least two people in broad daylight, authorities said. By evening, dozens of Sunni Arab families had fled their homes, carrying their belongings and furniture in trucks in one of the worst known incidents of sectarian cleansing to grip the capital in recent weeks.

According to a senior Iraqi commander and residents, Mahdi Army militiamen loyal to radical cleric Moqtada al-Sadr launched the attack on a section of the mixed neighborhood of Hurriyah, which means freedom. The rampaging began at 2:30 p.m. and lasted an hour before Iraqi soldiers entered the neighborhood.

"They attacked the people, shooting at them," a senior Iraqi commander who was involved in the operation said of the militiamen. "They were threatening people. They were telling them to leave 'or else we will burn your house down and kill you.' "

Baghdad has been on edge since a series of car bombs, mortar shells and missiles killed more than 200 on Nov. 23 in the Shiite slum of Sadr City, the stronghold of Sadr and where many of his loyal followers reside. Since then, a spate of small-scale revenge attacks has erupted in various mixed neighborhoods. The attack on Hurriyah marks one of the more serious in this cycle of sectarian killings plaguing the capital.

The attack was apparently in retaliation for an attack on Shiite residents by Sunni gunmen, said the Iraqi commander, who spoke on condition that his name not be used because he was not authorized to speak to reporters. Saturday's attacks unfolded in Hurriyah Three, a section of the neighborhood filled mostly with Sunni families from the Mishahda tribe, witnesses and authorities said. Witnesses gave different accounts of what had occurred.

Hameed al-Dahabi, a construction worker, said that about a month ago the Mahdi Army threatened Sunnis to leave their homes in Hurriyah Three. Some of the Sunni families complied. In the past two or three days, other Sunnis had reclaimed the homes, he said.

They attacked the Mahdi Army members and occasionally shot randomly into the street, he said. The Mahdi Army fought back with AK-47 assault rifles and grenades, he said.

Dahabi, his wife and their four children stayed in their home as the fighting intensified. On Saturday morning, three more families fled their street in anticipation of more fighting, he said, taking clothing and beds. He decided to stay because he has lived there since 1959.

Dahabi said seven or eight Sunnis began shooting from one house Saturday morning. Some Mahdi Army fighters tried to climb to the roofs of neighboring houses to shoot back at them, but the occupants would not let them in, he said. Instead, the militiamen surrounded the house containing the Sunnis and shot into it. This continued until about 3 p.m., when the Sunnis fled the house. The Mahdi Army fighters then burned down the house.

In the aftermath of the fighting, Dahabi said he saw about 20 people lying on the street, some injured and some dead. He said he did not know how many people had been killed.

"It's a mess," he said. "I feel sad for what's going on. A lot of families are being hurt. They're terrified."

DOJ_NMG_0104832

Abdul Ali, a Shiite who lives in Hurriyah Two, said the trouble started Friday night, when snipers began shooting from the roofs of houses.

On Saturday morning, the Sunnis attacked Shiites in Hurriyah Three, he said his sister told him. He said there were many of them and they shot at people randomly. The Shiites fought back, he said, using AK-47s and other weapons. They burned two houses, he said.

"The people defended their families," he said. "Anyone who was able to carry a gun was on the street."

He said his sister left her home in Hurriyah Three at noon Saturday and is staying with him until the neighborhood calms down.

Sunni families phoned friends and relatives in other nearby neighborhoods seeking places to stay. "They told me there is no way to live again in Hurriyah," said Omar Mashadani, a Sunni who lives in the Ghazaliya neighborhood. "They told me neither the government nor the U.S. Army will help them."

Mashadani said he received several phone calls from friends in Hurriyah seeking to rent houses in his neighborhood. Dozens of families, he was told, planned to flee their homes Sunday morning, he said.

Mohammed Dulaimi said that on Friday night, threatening leaflets were distributed in Hurriyah Three, which is near the Muheaman mosque, a Sunni shrine. The notes ordered all Sunni families to leave. By the evening, he said he saw snipers on rooftops. On Saturday morning, he decided to leave.

"We had a sense of fear," he said. "We felt some of our Shiite neighbors were giving us evil looks."

With the help of a Shiite neighbor, he loaded his wife, four children and other relatives into a minibus already crammed with their best furniture and belongings. By 11:30 a.m., they had left and were headed toward nearby Ghazaliya. He had lived in Hurriyah since 1978, he said.

The Iraqi commander said he saw at least 30 families preparing to leave when his forces arrived in Hurriyah. There were at least 25 trucks filled with furniture, he said.

"We asked them, 'Why are you leaving? We are controlling the situation,' " he recalled. "The people said, 'We are very scared. We should leave now or they are going to kill us.' "

"I feel like a broken person. I don't have any power," Dulaimi said. "Only God can help us and tell us what to do."

In violence elsewhere, a suicide car bomb exploded outside the Shrine of Imam Abbas in the holy Shiite city of Karbala, 60 miles southwest of Baghdad.

Officials provided different death tolls for blast. Provincial Gov. Aqeel Khazaly said four people were killed, while Saleem Kadhim, spokesman for the Imam Hussein General Hospital, said the hospital had received 16 corpses.

Khazaly said late Saturday that security forces had detained about 20 suspects in the attack.

In the northern city of Mosul, a car bomb killed five people and injured three, police said.

The U.S. military announced the deaths of two Marines in the western province of Anbar. Both were assigned to Regimental Combat Team 5. One died Thursday, and the other, on Saturday. No further details were disclosed.

Officials also announced that one of former president Saddam Hussein's nephews had escaped from a prison northwest of Mosul. Brig Gen. Wathiq al-Hamdani, the chief of police of Nineveh, said investigators believe insiders helped Aimen al-Sabbawi escape from the Badoush prison.

Meanwhile, two influential Sunni groups, the Iraqi Islamic Party and the Association of Muslim Scholars, condemned a U.S.-led raid at a village in Salahuddin province, northwest of Baghdad, on Friday.

The U.S. military said coalition forces were targeting suspected fighters from the insurgent group al-Qaeda in Iraq and killed 20 suspected insurgents. Under machine-gun attack, the troops called for an airstrike. Amir Alwan, the mayor of nearby Ishaqi, said civilian women and children were killed in the strike.

News agencies released what they said were photos of dead children at the site. The military has denied that any civilians were killed in the airstrike.

Also Saturday, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld visited Iraq "to express his appreciation to the troops," said Air Force Lt. Col. Todd Vician, a Defense Department spokesman, according to the Associated Press.

President Bush announced Nov. 8 that he was replacing the defense secretary. Rumsfeld's last full day will be Dec. 17.

Saddam's Nephew Escapes Iraqi Prison (AP)

AP, December 10, 2006

A nephew of Saddam Hussein serving a life sentence for financing insurgents and possessing bombs escaped from prison Saturday in northern Iraq with the help of a police officer, authorities said.

Sectarian attacks killed at least 20 people, including five who died in a suicide car bombing outside a Shiite shrine in Karbala, police said. Officers also found 39 bullet-riddled bodies in Baghdad that apparently were victims of revenge killings by Sunni Arabs and Shiites.

The escape by Saddam's nephew underlined one of the problems facing the U.S. military as it tries to train enough Iraqi security personnel so U.S. troops can go home: the ability of Sunni Arab insurgents and Shiite militiamen to infiltrate Iraqi police forces.

Ayman Sabawi, son of Saddam's half brother Sabawi Ibrahim Hassan al-Tikriti, escaped from a prison 45 miles west of the northern city of Mosul in the afternoon with the help of a policeman, said a local police commander, Brig. Abdul Karim al-Jubouri.

Brig. Abdul-Karim Khalaf, an Interior Ministry spokesman, confirmed the escape but declined to discuss any details.

Sabawi, who was arrested in May 2005 by U.S. and Iraqi forces near Saddam's hometown of Tikrit, 80 miles north of Baghdad, was convicted of illegally crossing the border from Syria and sentenced to 15 years in prison late last year by an Iraqi court. He was sentenced to life in prison in an earlier case for possession of illegal weapons and manufacture of bombs.

He "played a particularly active role in sustaining the terrorism by providing financial support, weapons and explosives to terrorist groups," Iraq's government said.

In July 2005, the United States froze Sabawi's assets along with those of five other Saddam nephews, accusing them of providing funds to Iraq's Sunni Arab-dominated insurgency.

Sabawi's father was captured in February 2005. Formerly the head of Saddam's intelligence service, al-Tikriti was No. 36 on a U.S. list of the 55 most-wanted members of Saddam's ousted regime.

The suicide bomb attack occurred near the Al-Abbas shrine in Karbala, a Shiite holy city 50 miles south of Baghdad.

The shrine's golden dome and minarets didn't appear damaged in video shown on Iraqi state TV, but the blast set many parked cars on fire in a nearby street. Two men with bloody faces could be seen running through heavy black smoke past the body of another victim.

A main goal of Sunni Arab insurgent groups such as al-Qaida in Iraq has been to spark sectarian violence by attacking sites revered by the country's Shiite majority.

In Baghdad, some of the worst violence was in a Sunni pocket of Hurriyah, a mixed neighborhood. Witnesses said Shiite militiamen entered the area after Sunnis warned the few Shiites living there to leave or be killed. Heavy machine gun fire was heard and three columns of black smoke rose into the sky, the witnesses said on condition of anonymity out of concern for their own safety.

Mohamed al-Askeri, a Defense Ministry spokesman, said some people were chased from their homes, but Iraqi security forces drove off the attackers, handed out food to displaced people and persuaded most to return to their homes. But "others are still frightened," he said.

Adnan al-Dulaimi, who heads a large Sunni bloc in Parliament, went on a Sunni-run TV station to demand protection for the district's Sunnis. "We appeal to the government and U.S. forces to rescue Sunni families in Hurriyah who are facing killings and displacement by militias."

The U.S. military, meanwhile, announced that two Marines were killed in combat in Anbar province, raising to 42 the number of U.S. troops who have died in Iraq this month. At least 2,930 have died since the Iraq war started in March 2003.

Iraq's influential Association of Muslim Scholars and the country's largest Sunni Arab political party, the Iraqi Islamic Party, on Saturday condemned a deadly U.S. military attack the previous day in al-Ishaqi village in volatile Salahuddin province.

The U.S. command said a ground raid and airstrike killed 20 insurgents, but local officials claimed at least 19 civilians died, including seven women and eight children.

About 1,000 residents of the predominantly Sunni village of al-Ishaqi held a funeral for the 19 dead Saturday, shouting "Down with the occupiers," "Long live the resistance," and "There is no God but Allah."

The Association of Muslim Scholars, a group of hard-line Sunnis that opposes the coalition, issued a statement alleging U.S. soldiers entered two Iraqi houses, shot 32 civilians to death, including women and children, and then blew up the buildings to make it look as if the victims died in a U.S. airstrike targeting insurgents.

The Iraqi Islamic Party, part of a Sunni bloc that controls 44 of parliament's 275 seats, made a similar claim, calling the attack "a new massacre by the American occupiers."

Last spring, a U.S. investigation cleared American soldiers of misconduct during a March 15 raid in al-Ishaqi in which Air Force planes destroyed a building believed to be hiding al-Qaida in Iraq insurgents. Villagers claimed soldiers killed 11 civilians before ordering for the airstrike.

Hussein Nephew Escapes From Iraqi Prison (LAT)

By Molly Hennessy-Fiske

DOJ_NMG_0104834

The Los Angeles Times, December 10, 2006

BAGHDAD — A nephew of Saddam Hussein serving a life sentence in a northern Iraqi prison escaped Saturday in what authorities believe might have been an inside job.

Ayman Sabawi, the son of Hussein's half-brother, was captured last year during a raid near Tikrit, Hussein's hometown. He was convicted of possessing illegal weapons and manufacturing explosives for Sunni insurgents.

Police said Sabawi fled Saturday afternoon in a car that had been waiting outside the prison in Badush, about 45 miles west of the northern city of Mosul. Authorities are investigating whether night-shift guards helped him escape.

Sabawi's escape came as Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld made a trip to Iraq in his final days at the Pentagon. Air Force Lt. Col. Todd Vician, a Pentagon spokesman, confirmed that Rumsfeld left Washington on Friday for Iraq, saying, "He wanted to take this opportunity to express his thanks to the troops, and also let them know that he certainly appreciates the sacrifices they make every day."

Meanwhile, leaders from the western province of Al Anbar, the heartland of the Sunni insurgency, met with U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad in Baghdad to ask for help in rebuilding the local economy, arming police and securing the main highway from the Jordanian border to Baghdad, which runs through their province. They also asked him for a halt to U.S. bombings in the military's hunt for insurgents.

"Our goal is to bring Anbar to a safe shore, because any security failure or deterioration in Anbar would reflect poorly on all Iraq," Al Anbar Gov. Mamoun Sami Rasheed said.

Two U.S. soldiers were killed and three injured Saturday while patrolling Ramadi, Al Anbar's provincial capital, when a roadside bomb exploded near their Humvee, the military said in a statement. A Marine died Thursday in Al Anbar combat, the military said, raising the number of troops killed to 2,913. According to icasualties.org, more than a third of the U.S. and allied foreign troops killed in Iraq since the 2003 invasion have died in Al Anbar.

The delegation of provincial leaders asked Khalilzad for an Army brigade to patrol the highway and help recruit police officers, said Haqi Ferhan, who identified himself as a lawyer representing tribal leaders opposed to the insurgents.

Police in the province have already recruited 11,000 officers, Ferhan said, but are struggling to outfit them.

He said Khalilzad promised to review the matter with the Iraqi government and commanders of the U.S.-led foreign military force.

In a statement, Khalilzad welcomed Al Anbar officials' efforts to stabilize the province.

The Iraq Study Group report released Wednesday in Washington cited Al Anbar as one of four provinces that remain "highly insecure."

In a report last week to the U.N. Security Council, U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan cited fighting in Al Anbar as evidence that Iraq's violence is spiraling out of control.

U.S. forces are attempting to shift responsibility for local security to Iraqi troops. In a series of raids across Al Anbar on Friday and Saturday, U.S. troops followed the lead of Iraqi army divisions, exchanging fire with insurgents, taking into custody 19 suspects and recovering weapon caches in several towns, according to military statements.

The military said some of those detained are suspected in assaults on U.S. soldiers and on Iraqi police, soldiers and civilians, including planting roadside bombs and attacking an elementary school before national elections last year.

Across Iraq on Saturday, at least 16 people were killed.

The Ministry of Interior also reported that 40 bodies were found in Baghdad in a day, 10 of them handcuffed, blindfolded and showing signs of torture.

An Interior Ministry official said that among those killed Saturday was a young man who was shot along with his parents as they fled their burning house in the mostly Shiite Hurriya neighborhood of Baghdad. The official said the Shiite Al Mahdi militia had set the home on fire after distributing fliers to Sunni families in the neighborhood urging them to move out.

The parents survived, the official said.

Police said a car bomb killed four people and injured 40 Saturday morning on a market street in Karbala, home to the country's second-holiest Shiite shrine. Police blockaded the city center after the bombing, detained several suspects and dismantled remaining explosives, Karbala Gov. Akeel Mahmoud Qazali told state-run Al Iraqiya television.

Another car bomb killed three people in Mosul, local police said.

Late Saturday, a burst of automatic gunfire that could be heard across Baghdad was a rare sign of unity instead of strife: Soccer fans were celebrating Iraq's 2-1 victory over Uzbekistan in the semifinals of the Asian Games in Qatar.

Iran Ties Role In Iraq Talks To U.S. Exit (NYT)

By Hassan M. Fattah, Michael R. Gordon

MANAMA, Bahrain, Dec. 9 — Just days after the Iraq Study Group recommended opening a dialogue with Tehran, Iran's foreign minister said his country would enter discussions on stabilizing Iraq only if the United States commits to a troop withdrawal.

Speaking to a security conference in Manama, Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki said Iran was open to dialogue as long as the United States "changes its attitude," and he asserted that the Americans were "50 percent to blame" for Iraq's violence.

In a defiant presentation, he also insisted that the United States stop campaigning against Iran's nuclear program.

"The Islamic republic of Iran, in case the U.S. changes its attitude, is ready to help the administration to withdraw its troops from Iraq," Mr. Mottaki said. He then took a triumphant tone, saying, "The time of threats is over; the period of unilateralism is over."

The event, which drew diplomatic and security officials from throughout the Persian Gulf and the West was organized by the International Institute for Strategic Studies.

Iran's activities in Iraq have been of concern to Washington because American intelligence says Iran is providing explosives and triggering devices and possibly other military support to militant fighters in Iraq.

The bipartisan Iraq Study Group recommended in a report released Wednesday that the United States establish an Iraq International Support Group, which would involve Iraq's neighbors, including Iran, other Middle East states, the United States and other permanent members of the United Nations Security Council, among others.

At the same time, the panel expressed concerns that Iran might not be willing to join such a diplomatic effort.

"Our limited contacts with Iran's government lead us to believe that its leaders are likely to say they will not participate in diplomatic efforts to support stability in Iraq," the report said. "They attribute this reluctance to their belief that the United States seeks regime change in Iran."

The Bush administration has been very skeptical of the idea of opening a full-scale dialogue with Tehran. David M. Satterfield, the State Department's coordinator for Iraq, suggested to the Senate Armed Service Committee last month that the United States was prepared "in principle'' for limited discussions.

"We are prepared in principle to discuss Iranian activities in Iraq,'' Mr. Satterfield said at the time. "The timing of such a direct dialogue is one that we still have under review.''

When asked whether Iran would join such a diplomatic effort, Mr. Mottaki signaled that his nation would only do so as part of an arrangement in which the United States began to withdraw its forces.

"The United States should help itself before anyone else," he told reporters after his presentation. "The first step is they have to say that they will be ready to leave Iraq."

American officials at the meeting doubted that Iran could improve the situation in Iraq, dismissing Mr. Mottaki's speech as posturing to put Iran's Arab neighbors at ease about the chances of a confrontation between Iran and the United States.

They emphasized that they had made no contact with the Iranians during the meeting.

"They don't want to appear to be begging for a dialogue when we don't seem too eager in doing so ourselves," said one United States official, speaking on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to comment. "But they do seem pretty confident that things are going their way."

Senior American officials were invited to the meeting, and Stephen J. Hadley, President Bush's national security adviser, had been expected to attend. But he and other top-level officials did not participate. The administration is conducting a policy review on the issue, and analysts said it would have been awkward for the officials to defend a policy that had not been decided.

At the meeting, Hoshyar Zebari, Iraq's foreign minister, expressed concerns about the Iraqi Study Group report. He objected to the threat in the report to withhold American economic and military support if Iraq's government did not make steady process toward reconciliation, asserting that the study did not give Iraqis enough credit for holding elections and other steps to build a new state.

"This is most about U.S. policies, less about Iraqi concerns. In fact, we in Iraq have some serious concerns about this report."

Mr. Mottaki, the Iranian official, reiterated calls for a new regional cooperation effort that included Iran and cut out the United States. He suggested establishing a common understanding on what security is, identifying the obstacles to security, offering gulf states a guarantee of their security in addition to increasing cooperation on economic and security issues and holding a continuous dialogue to reduce foreign influence in the region.

Iran Offers To Help U.S. Exit From Iraq (AP)

Iran's foreign minister delivered a blunt challenge to the United States on Saturday, saying Tehran is willing to help U.S. troops withdraw from neighboring Iraq but only if Washington makes some tough policy changes.

Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki claimed U.S. troops were responsible for at least half the violence tearing apart Iraq and that their departure would pay security dividends for the entire region.

"If the United States changes its attitude, the Islamic Republic of Iran is ready to help with the withdrawal from Iraq," Mottaki told the International Institute of Strategic Studies conference here. "Fifty percent of the problem of insecurity in Iraq is the presence of foreign troops."

Mottaki echoed calls made last week by Iran's top national security official, Ali Larijani, for Gulf Arab countries to eject American bases in their countries and establish a regional security pact with Iran. Mottaki went further and offered deeper cooperation with the six Gulf Arab states on energy, tourism, business and counter-narcotics.

Iran's offers do not seem to have tempted Gulf neighbors who are apparently more worried about the dangers of living near Iran's nuclear facilities, especially amid threats by Washington and Israel to use military force to destroy them.

Mottaki's forceful speech was a challenge to U.S. interests in the Gulf and a strong display of the country's rising assertiveness in the face of U.S failures in the region.

At one point, Mottaki addressed an international audience that included U.S. Vice Adm. David Nichols, the deputy chief of U.S. Central Command, and said the regional chaos sparked by the Bush administration's twin wars demonstrated that U.S. military force was no longer a realistic policy option in the Middle East.

"Today the time of threats is over. The period of unilateralism is over," Mottaki said. "Look at Iraq. Look at Afghanistan. That gives us a very important lesson."

Iran's proposal for a Gulf security alliance shows no sign of gaining traction among the region's Arab leaders. Bahraini Foreign Minister Sheik Khalid bin Ahmed Al Khalifa said security of the energy-rich region depends on the United States, the European Union and other major oil-importing countries.

Much of the discussion at this security conference centered on the U.S. Iraq Study Group report, and its recommendation that Washington seek Iran's help in steering Iraq away from civil war.

William Cohen, defense secretary under President Clinton, urged Iran to push for talks with Washington.

"If you forgo aspirations for nuclear weapons and cut off funding for radical elements and support the Mideast peace process, then yes, you'd be welcomed into the international community. We'd have billions of dollars going into your economy," Cohen told the Iranians among 250 delegates from 22 countries.

"If Iran is simply interested in pursuing a nuclear energy program and not weapons, that's something the U.S. wouldn't object to and would support."

What Motivates Syria? (WP)

By Imad Moustapha

The Washington Post, December 10, 2006

U.S. engagement -- or rather reengagement -- with Syria has become a salient topic in almost every political debate on U.S. policy in the Middle East, particularly regarding Iraq.

But while commentators argue over whether the United States should engage Syria and whether Syria has the will to cooperate or even the capability to deliver intended outcomes, it appears that the Bush administration remains incapable of searching for a comprehensive approach to the strife in Iraq.

According to top officials in the Bush administration, engagement with Syria would yield no benefits. What is Syria's reaction to this viewpoint? Well, we believe that if U.S. officials continue to regard a dialogue with Syria as a matter of "dictating" -- that is, telling Syria what it ought and ought not to do -- then their predictions are correct.

Given such a "dialogue," Syria would have to agree with the Bush administration officials who say that nothing can be achieved by such engagement. It would be a waste of valuable time for both sides, and in the meantime the situation in Iraq would continue to spiral downward from disastrous to catastrophic.

But if the Bush administration comes to realize that truly engaging consists of an honest dialogue in which all parties are involved, then positive results will be possible -- for Iraq, the United States, Syria and the entire region.

Contrary to what many in Washington believe, past Syrian-American collaboration has yielded many beneficial outcomes, a fact that several former U.S. officials could confirm. These include, among other things, Syrian cooperation on the Middle East peace process, on al-Qaeda and, yes, on Iraq.

What motivates Syria to engage on Iraq? Let us be clear: Syria is not looking for a "deal" with the U.S. administration on any issue. The situation in Iraq is a matter of paramount concern to Syria, particularly the unprecedented levels of death and destruction and the possibility of Iraq's disintegrating, which would have terrible repercussions for the entire Middle East.

Thus Syria has the will and the capacity to assist in Iraq. This help is imperative to Syrian national interests. Syria can cooperate on security issues with the Iraqis and can give considerable support to their political process. The visit of our foreign minister to Baghdad, and the resumption of diplomatic ties between Damascus and Baghdad after a 25-year lapse, clearly illustrates our commitment to a free, peaceful and unified Iraq.

But Syria recognizes that no magical solution exists to instantaneously achieve the desired objectives. A rigorous and comprehensive approach is required. This approach should include a reconsideration of U.S. policy in Iraq, starting with the recognition of the necessity to include all parties involved: neighboring countries and all factions of the Iraqi political and social spectrum.

No party should feel defeated or excluded. All stakeholders in the future of Iraq should feel that it is in their own interest to help stabilize the situation.

A solution should also include U.S. acknowledgment that the majority of Iraqis regard the occupation as only exacerbating the situation and causing further violence and instability. A U.S. plan for withdrawal should be on the table. Only such a step will prove to the various parties involved that the United States genuinely plans to return Iraq to the Iraqis.

Syria believes that engagement of all parties will ultimately become inevitable and the only route forward. Until this happens, all parties will continue to lose. Above all, if it does not happen, Iraq will continue to pay the terrible price for such lack of vision.

Training Iraqis May Pose Risks For U.S. (WP)

By Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, December 10, 2006

The newest program for training Iraqi security forces, embedding 11- to 15-member U.S. transition teams in Iraqi battalions, represents a "high-risk assignment" for the American officers and men involved, according to top military training officials.

The concept is considered so dangerous that a group of potential replacements stand ready at Fort Riley, the U.S. Army base directing the program, for immediate shipment to Iraq if members of a deployed team are killed or wounded, Maj. Gen. Carter F. Ham, who runs the training program, told House members last week.

While the U.S. training of Iraqis is considered key in determining the future of the American presence in Iraq, it remains a work in progress three years after it began, according to present and former senior U.S. Army and Marine officers involved in the process.

The disbanding of Saddam Hussein's army in May 2003 and the disappearance of local police units compelled the United States and coalition allies to rebuild almost from scratch a variety of Iraqi security forces, including a national army, local national guard units, special commando teams, a national police force, border police, local police and a facilities protection service.

Complicating matters was a desire among coalition officials in 2003 and 2004 to keep the new Iraqi army lightly armed, in part so it could not threaten any democratic government established in Baghdad. As part of that approach, former senior officers from Hussein's army initially were excluded from service, and the first national police units developed were not trained or equipped to deal with either insurgency or serious security threats.

The result of the hesitant U.S. training effort, the Iraq Study Group reported Wednesday, is that Iraqi army units are of questionable loyalty to the Baghdad government, the police units cannot control crime, and some, according to the report, "routinely engage in sectarian violence." The facilities protection service is "incompetent, dysfunctional or subversive."

Lt. Gen. James J. Lovelace Jr., the Army's deputy chief of staff for personnel, told the House Armed Services Committee on Thursday that the current goal is to train 325,000 Iraqis, with 134,000 in the army and at least 180,000 as police officers.

The latest enhancement to the training task is the embedding of transition teams whose job is to "advise, coach, teach and mentor Iraqi security forces and provide direct access to coalition . . . air support, artillery, medical evacuation and intelligence-gathering," Lovelace said.

The teams, made up of highly qualified senior commissioned and noncommissioned officers, have specialties that include combat operations, intelligence, communications and logistics. Because they live with the Iraqi units, it is a "high-risk assignment," Marine Maj. Gen. George J. Flynn, commander of the Marine Corps training and education command, told the panel.

"In many ways, these individuals are out there alone and unafraid," and this speaks "to the quality of the men and women who are in uniform," Flynn added.

During a Senate Armed Services Committee hearing Thursday, Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) questioned the program and focused on the risk factor in opposing the idea of reducing U.S. combat troops in Iraq by early 2008.

To "withdraw the troops and then still have thousands of American soldiers embedded in Iraqi units that are of questionable value or loyalty, I think, puts at risk a large number of American military advisers," McCain said.

The training plan, however, contemplates the continued presence in Iraq of rapid-response U.S. combat units with helicopters and aircraft that could be quickly called in for support should embedded teams come under fire.

Army Lt. Gen. Peter W. Chiarelli, the top U.S. field commander in Iraq, told Pentagon reporters Friday that no decision had yet been made on how many of the new teams will be requested.

The Iraq Study Group described training of the Iraqi army as "a primary mission of U.S. military strategy," despite problems such as the sectarian nature of the Iraqi forces and the manner in which personnel were recruited. The latter has contributed, the group reported, to forces resisting deployment to other parts of the country and refusing to carry out missions.

Pulling Out Combat Troops Would Still Leave Most Forces In Iraq (NYT)

By Thom Shanker

The New York Times, December 10, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 9 — Frontline combat troops in the 15 brigades carrying out the American fight in Iraq — which the Iraq Study Group says could be largely withdrawn in just over a year — represent about 23 percent of the 140,000 military personnel committed to the overall war effort there.

On any given day, according to military officers in Baghdad, only about 11 percent of the Army and Marine Corps personnel in Iraq are carrying out purely offensive operations. Even counting others, whose main job is defensive or who perform security missions to stabilize the country for economic reconstruction and political development, only half of the American force might be considered combat troops.

Even if all of the group's proposals were carried out, it is not possible to predict exactly how many Americans will stay, or for how long. Decisions will hinge on military conditions on the ground and political conditions in Washington.

But an analysis of the current numbers and tasks of American forces suggests that it will prove difficult to drop far below 100,000 by early 2008, and that 70,000 or more troops might have to stay for a considerable time.

The bipartisan report, which acknowledged that a sustained and "considerable" troop presence would be necessary, called urgently for increasing the 4,000 American trainers now with Iraqis to as many as 20,000. That shift has been endorsed in general terms by President Bush. And commanders in Iraq, on their own accord, are already moving troops from their combat ranks to the training teams. So members of American brigade combat teams will stay for some time, in any case.

Americans assigned to join Iraqi units as advisers and trainers — fighting alongside the Iraqis when necessary, with other combat forces on call in case of emergency — must be backed up by the full array of drivers, cooks, guards, planners, intelligence analysts, communications teams, helicopter crews, mechanics and medical units without which no military operation can be mounted. And as long as the violence in Iraq persists, they must be protected from attack.

According to Pentagon statistics, about 23 percent of the troops currently assigned to the Iraq mission conduct primarily combat jobs. The 15 combat brigades — each with an official roster of about 3,500 and totaling about 52,500 soldiers and marines in Iraq — make up well over a third of the overall force. But each brigade includes units that provide support, logistics and security for those troops conducting direct combat operations.

Electricians and mechanics make up 20 percent of the overall American mission, with "functional support/administrative" personnel and "service and supply handlers" each contributing another 11 percent, according to Pentagon personnel statistics.

Other major categories include communications and intelligence troops — 8 percent — and health service providers, including such critical missions as medical evacuation teams, at 4 percent of the force. Craftsmen account for just under 4 percent. Those statistics do not includes their officers.

These statistics were drawn from an unclassified Pentagon report dated Sept. 30, 2006, which listed American deployments in the Middle East to carry out and support what the Pentagon classifies as "The Global War on Terror." Three senior officers who served yearlong deployments in Iraq at the headquarters level reviewed the Pentagon statistics on regional deployments and said they provide an accurate if somewhat rough picture of how American troops are assigned military tasks in Iraq today.

But that is just one set of statistics describing troop deployments. Those statistics listing official military occupations in the region do not tell the full story of how the force deployed on the ground carries out the mission each day, according to officers in Baghdad.

Lt. Col. Michelle L. Martin-Hing, spokeswoman for the Multinational Corps-Iraq, offered different statistics that show that during day-to-day operations, about 40 percent of the troops conduct combat missions while about 60 percent carry out support missions.

She provided statistics compiled by the military's operational headquarters in Iraq that list 11 percent of the force as assigned to offensive operations on any given day, and another 22 percent of the troops assigned to force protection and another 22 percent to security operations. About 35 percent carry out tasks that sustain the mission.

Iraqi security forces are not able to gather and analyze sufficient intelligence to carry out all of their missions, nor even to plan them. Likewise, the Iraqis do not have the infrastructure to buy, transport and distribute all of the ammunition, food and fuel that those indigenous forces require, nor to maintain all of their equipment.

Those logistical tasks fall to Americans, and, given the time it will take to build up Iraq's capabilities, are likely to continue to for years to come, even long after the Baghdad government has assumed full military command.

The Iraq mission is not especially top-heavy, according to Pentagon statistics. Generals and their executive staffs amount to one-tenth of one percent of the force.

Other categories in the Pentagon personnel statistics include tactical operations officers, at 6 percent; engineering and maintenance officers, at 2 percent; supply and procurement officers, at 1.7 percent; and health care officers, at 1.5 percent.

Despite increased agility and speed in how it carries out its combat operations, the American military's ratio of combat to support troops has remained in Iraq at levels seen throughout modern history, mostly because the insurgency eliminated the concept of safe and comfortable rear areas that existed in previous wars, making every supply and planning and convoy job more difficult and dangerous.

Andrew F. Krepinevich Jr., executive director of the Center for Strategic and Budgetary Assessments here, said militaries traditionally require three to five soldiers to support every fighter, and in the case of Iraq some of that support is elsewhere in the Persian Gulf region.

"In the time of Alexander the Great, everyone on the battlefield carried a spear," Mr. Krepinevich said. "But over the great sweep of history, the tail has increased faster than the tooth." In America's most recent sustained conflict, in Vietnam, "when we had roughly half a million soldiers on the ground, less than 100,000 were actually combat troops, carrying rifles around," he said.

Black-Market Weapon Prices Surge In Iraq Chaos (NYT)

By C. J. Chivers

The New York Times, December 10, 2006

SULAIMANIYA, Iraq, Dec. 8 — The Kurdish security contractor placed the black plastic box on the table. Inside was a new Glock 19, one of the 9-millimeter pistols that the United States issued by the tens of thousands to the Iraqi Army and police.

This pistol was no longer in the custody of the Iraqi Army or police. It had been stolen or sold, and it found its way to an open-air grocery stand that does a lively black-market business in police and infantry arms. The contractor bought it there.

He displayed other purchases, including a short-barreled Kalashnikov assault rifle with a collapsible stock that makes it easy to conceal under a coat or fire from a car. "I bought this for $450 last year," he said of the rifle. "Now it costs $650. The prices keep going up."

The market for this American-issued pistol and the ubiquitous assault rifle illustrated how fear, mismanagement and malfeasance are shaping the small-arms market in Iraq.

Weapon prices are soaring along with an expanding sectarian war, as more buyers push prices several times higher than those that existed at the time of the American-led invasion nearly four years ago. Rising prices, in turn, have encouraged an insidious form of Iraqi corruption — the migration of army and police weapons from Iraqi state armories to black-market sales.

All manner of infantry arms, from rocket-propelled grenade launchers to weathered and dented Kalashnikovs, have circulated within Iraq for decades.

But three types of American-issued weapons are now readily visible in shops and bazaars here as well: Glock and Walther 9-millimeter pistols, and pristine, unused Kalashnikovs from post-Soviet Eastern European countries. These are three of the principal types of the 370,000 weapons purchased by the United States for Iraq's security forces, a program that was criticized by a special inspector general this fall for, among other things, failing to properly account for the arms.

The weapons are easy to find, resting among others in the semihidden street markets here, where weapons are sold in tea houses, the back rooms of grocery kiosks, cosmetics stores and rug shops, or from the trunks of cars. Proprietors show samples for immediate purchase and offer to take orders — 10 guns can be had in two hours, they say, and 100 or more the next day.

"Every type of gun that the Americans give comes to the market," said Brig. Hassan Nouri, chief of the political investigations bureau for the Sulaimaniya district. "They go from the U.S. Army to the Iraqi Army to the smugglers. I have captured many of these guns that the terrorists bought."

The forces propelling the trade can be seen in the price fluctuations of the country's most abundant firearm, the Kalashnikov.

In early 2003, a Kalashnikov in northern Iraq typically cost from $75 to $150, depending on its condition, origin and style. Immediately after the invasion, as fleeing soldiers abandoned their rifles and armories were looted, prices fell, pushed down by a glut and a brief sense of optimism.

Today, the same weapons typically cost $210 to $650, according to interviews with seven arms dealers, two senior Kurdish security officials and several customers. In other areas of Iraq, prices have climbed as high as $800, according to Phillip Killicoat, a researcher who has been assembling data on Kalashnikov prices worldwide for the Small Arms Survey, a Geneva-based organization.

The price ranges reflect not only a weapon's condition but its model. A Kalashnikov made in a former Soviet-bloc factory costs more than a Kalashnikov made in China, North Korea or Iraq. Collapsible-stock models have become disproportionately expensive. The price ranges do not include the most compact Kalashnikovs, like those Osama bin Laden has been photographed with, which now have a collector's value in Iraq and can cost as much as $2,000.

In many ways, weapon prices provide a condensed history of Iraq's slide into chaos.

Prices began moving upward in the summer of 2003 as several classes of customers entered the market together, Iraqi security officials and the arms dealers said. Western security contractors, Sunni insurgent groups, Shiite paramilitary units and criminals who were released from prison by Saddam Hussein before the war all sought the same weapons at once.

Kalashnikov prices quickly reached $200, they said. Since late last year, prices have been moving up again, as sectarian war has spread. Militias have been growing at the same time that more civilians have been seeking weapons for self-defense — twin demand pressures that pushed prices to new heights this fall.

"Now the Sunni want the weapons because they fear the Shia, and the Shia want the weapons because they fear the Sunni," said Brig. Sarkawt Hassan Jalal, the chief of security in the Sulaimaniya district. "So prices go up."

Mr. Killicoat put it another way. "When households start entering the market, that's a free-for-all," he said.

The surge is evident across a spectrum of arms. Pistol prices have nearly tripled since 2003. Western 9-millimeter pistols now sell for $1,100 to $1,800 in the bazaars of this city. Sniper rifles cost $1,100 to $2,000, the dealers said. In the West, similar pistols sell for $400 to $600.

Arms dealers say that rising prices have led to more extensive pilfering from state armories, including the widespread theft of weapons the United States had issued to Iraq's police officers and soldiers.

"In the south, if the Americans give the Iraqis weapons, the next day you can buy them here," said one dealer, who sold groceries in the front of his kiosk and offered weapons in the back. "The Iraqi Army, the Iraqi police — they all sell them right away."

No weapons were displayed when two visitors arrived. But when asked, the owner and a friend swiftly retrieved six pistols, a rocket-propelled grenade launcher and three Kalashnikovs from a car and another room.

The rifles and the grenade launcher were wrapped in rice sacks. He slipped two of the rifles out of the cloth. They were spotless and unworn, inside and out, and appeared never to have been used. They had folding stocks and were priced at $560 each.

The dealer said they had recently been taken from an Iraqi armory. "Almost all of the weapons come from the Iraqi police and army," he said. "They are our best suppliers."

One pistol was a new Walther P99, a 9-millimeter pistol that the dealer said had been issued by the Americans to the Iraqi police. It was still in its box.

Glock pistols were also easy to find. One young Iraqi man, Rebwar Mustafa, showed a Glock 19 he had bought at the bazaar in Kirkuk last year for $900. Five of his friends have bought identical models, he said.

When asked if he was surprised that the Iraqi police and soldiers sold their own guns, he scoffed.

"Everything goes to the bazaar," he said.

He added: "It is not only pistols. A lot of police cars are being sold. The smugglers brought us three cars and asked if we wanted to buy them. Their doors were still blue, and police labels were on them. The lights were still on top."

Although the scale of weapons sales is unmistakably large, it is impossible to measure precisely. Sales are almost always hidden and unrecorded.

Tracing American-issued weapons back to Iraqi units that sell them is especially difficult because the United States did not register serial numbers for almost all of the 370,000 small arms purchased for Iraqi security forces, according to a report by the Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction.

The weapons were paid for with $133 million from the Iraq Relief and Reconstruction Fund. Among them were at least 138,000 new Glock pistols and at least 165,000 Kalashnikov assault rifles that had not previously been used, according to the report.

Lt. Gen. Martin E. Dempsey, commander of the Multi-National Security Transition Command-Iraq, agreed that weapons provided by the United States had slipped from custody.

"I certainly concede that there are weapons that have been lost, stolen and misappropriated," General Dempsey said. He noted that the inspector general had estimated that 4 percent, or about 14,000 weapons, were lost between arriving in Iraq and being transferred to Iraqi forces. Most of the weapons were pistols.

The general said that he thought the estimate was high and that accountability was improving. A weapons registry was being created, he said. "Serial numbers are being registered," he said.

But the estimate of a 4 percent loss did not include weapons that were lost or stolen after being issued to Iraqi units. The arms dealers said this was the main source of their goods.

The arms dealers described several factors that kept weapons flowing from state custody.

Some have been taken by insurgents in ambushes or raids. Defections and resignations have also been common in Iraqi police and army units, they said, and often departing soldiers and officers leave with their weapons, which are worth more than several months of pay.

Aaron Karp, a small-arms researcher at Old Dominion University, said Iraq resembled African countries that had had extraordinary difficulties with the police selling off their guns. "The gun becomes the most valuable thing in the household," he said.

"If anything happens to a police officer's family and he needs money, he walks into work the next day and says, 'Hey, my gun got stolen.' "

Another weapons dealer, who Kurdish officials said had been providing them with weapons since 1991, said the latest black-market sales followed an old pattern precisely.

Throughout Mr. Hussein's rule, Iraqi Army officers were in the arms trade, he said, selling weapons to smugglers. This was how the Kurdish guerrillas kept themselves supplied.

Now, he said, the smugglers remain in business, and their trade is made easier because the units often do not have inventories. "I am surprised sometimes by the numbers," he said. "Sometimes they come by the hundreds."

Like The Nation, Military Families Divided On Iraq (WP)

By Christian Davenport, Joshua Partlow

The Washington Post, December 10, 2006

Nancy Hecker hasn't read the Iraq Study Group's report. She doesn't need to. She knows her son, Army Maj. William F. Hecker III, died at 37 for a just cause, no matter what the antiwar crowd thinks.

If she "can stand firm in support of our country and the mission, is it too much to ask the rest of the country to do so as well?" she asked.

Beverly Fabri also doesn't need the report to help her make up her mind on Iraq. "We are not going to win this war," she said. "And we shouldn't have gotten involved with it in the first place."

Almost three years after her 19-year-old son, Army Pvt. Bryan Nicholas Spry, was killed, she said: "I'm beginning to feel like he just died in vain, I really am."

As the country debates what's next for Iraq, many family members who have lost loved ones in the war are torn about what should happen and how the legacy of those who have died there will be affected.

When the war began nearly four years ago, there was virtually unanimous support for it among military families. But as the country's belief in it has deteriorated, cracks have also begun to show among those who were its staunchest backers. And now, as the death toll mounts, many are struggling to reconcile bad news that seems to keep getting worse with the mission their loved ones believed in and died fighting for.

In Kathy Petty's opinion, the report "is not going to change much." But she's not clear about what should be done in the war that claimed her son, Army Capt. Christopher P. Petty, 33.

On the one hand: "I want the Iraqi people to be free. I want them to have their democracy. That's what Chris died fighting for."

On the other: "You've got almost a civil war. . . . And I'm not sure what we could do better. I'm not sure sending more troops would work."

Her son believed in what he was doing there. She remembers how he talked about building schools for Iraqis, and how the soldiers were treated like heroes by the townspeople.

That's why Petty, of Vienna, doesn't think her son died in vain. But that doesn't mean there are any easy answers to what's happening in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0104842

"I do want Chris's death to have been meaningful, but I don't know," she said. "It's very hard to see a light at the end of the tunnel, if you know what I mean. It just seems to keep getting worse."

On Wednesday, the day the Iraq Study Group report was released, at least 11 U.S. service members were killed. So far this month, more than 30 have died.

A poll conducted last week by the Associated Press found that 63 percent of respondents did not expect a stable, democratic government to take root in Iraq, up from 54 percent in June.

All the talk of changing course in Iraq by people who have never taken up arms there has worn on Malia Fry, whose husband, Marine Gunnery Sgt. John Fry, 28, was killed while disarming a bomb in March.

"I don't want him to have died for nothing," said Fry, who has three young children and lives near Waco, Tex. "I want us to finish the job."

Marine Lance Cpl. Eric W. Herzberg's faith in the war, like that of much of the country, waned as the conflict dragged on, said his mother, Gina Barnhurst. But when his unit was called, Herzberg, 20, of Severna Park, went without complaint, because "Marines are not political," Barnhurst said. "They do what they're asked to do. They do it for their country. They do it for us."

And that's why she believes political leaders should think about the death of her son -- and the deaths of others -- as they decide what to do next in Iraq.

It has been nearly a year since Hecker's son, a West Point graduate and father of four, was killed south of Baghdad when a roadside bomb exploded next to his Humvee. She still keeps a tissue handy to blot away the tears that so often rise when she thinks about him: how he was a soldier and a scholar, a student of warfare and literature who had developed a taste for fine wine and rich coffee. But her loss does not mean American forces should leave Iraq, she said. Her son wouldn't want that.

Hecker, of Vienna, worries that the good things happening in Iraq are being suppressed by the media or buried under the din of politicians seeking office.

"If we had all stood firm on this, it would have sent a message to the terrorists," she said. "The more divided that we were, the more opportunity they saw to be successful by destroying our national will."

What Hecker sees as harmful dissent, Yvonne Green of Baltimore believes is democracy at work. The Iraq Study Group recommendation to draw down combat troops was long overdue, to her mind. And she thinks it doesn't go far enough.

"They still aren't bringing the troops home immediately," she said. "If you're going to pull them out, do it immediately."

Still, the report boosted her belief that Iraq is a lost cause, and when she heard about it on the news, she thought: "What took you so long?"

Now she wonders how the debate at home affects the soldiers who served with her daughter -- Army Spec. Toccara R. Green, 23, who was killed last year -- and the other service members still in Iraq.

"I really feel bad for the troops, because it's like they are constantly getting told mixed messages," she said. "They are being told different things all the time. They don't know. Are we leaving? Are we staying?"

Command Sgt. Major Jeff Krausse, 51, of the Washington National Guard, said the country never should have invaded Iraq. He spent a year there, ending in 2005. About three weeks after he got home, his daughter, Army 1st Lt. Jaime Campbell, 25, died when the helicopter she was co-piloting crashed in northern Iraq.

Asked about the war, Krausse said: "First of all, I believe that we were lied to." He denounced the "propaganda" about weapons of mass destruction that justified the invasion and described the war now as a "no-win situation" that is "costing the taxpayers billions of dollars."

Still, he said, he'd go back if called.

"Unfortunately, now that we're there, we've got to finish what we've started," Krausse said from his home in Washington state. "This country is going to lose its credibility if we don't stay and do the right thing."

Jason Scott also has a big stake in how the war turns out. He lost an arm and an eye there and spent more than a year recovering at Walter Reed Army Medical Center. Now he can understand how Vietnam veterans felt coming home to a country that didn't support the war. And he worries about the effect it could have on the country's resolve.

"Public opinion has become so negative," he said. "So rather than make the hard decision to continue on to do the hard work to fix the situation, we're going to cut out and take the easy path."

If that happened, it would undercut the sacrifices so many soldiers made, he said. But it wouldn't diminish their service.

"That legacy of us being professional soldiers who answered the call can't be taken away from us no matter what happens," said Scott, 29, who now lives in Orlando. "I'll always be proud to be an American soldier. That's not going to change if we leave Iraq."

David Hartman's daughter, Army Sgt. Jennifer M. Hartman, 21, died in September. Since then her father, of New Ringgold, Pa., said he has stopped watching the news about Iraq.

The Sunshine Boys Can't Save Iraq (NYT)

By Frank Rich

The New York Times, December 10, 2006

IN America we like quick fixes, closure and an uplifting show. Such were the high hopes for the Iraq Study Group, and on one of the three it delivered.

The report of the 10 Washington elders was rolled out like a heartwarming Hollywood holiday release. There was a feel-good title, "The Way Forward," unfortunately chosen as well by Ford Motor to promote its last-ditch plan to stave off bankruptcy. There was a months-long buildup, with titillating sneak previews to whip up anticipation. There was the gala publicity tour on opening day, starting with a President Bush cameo timed for morning television and building to a "Sunshine Boys" curtain call by James Baker and Lee Hamilton on "Larry King Live."

The wizard behind it all was the public relations giant Edelman, which has lately been recruited by Wal-Mart to put down the populist insurgency threatening its bottom line. Edelman's vice chairman is Michael Deaver, the imagineer extraordinaire of the Reagan presidency, and "The Way Forward" had a nostalgic dash of that old Morning-in-America vibe. In The Washington Post, David Broder gushingly quoted one member of the group, Alan Simpson, musing that "immigration, Social Security and all those other things that have been hung up for so long" might benefit from similar ex-officio bipartisanship. Only in Washington could an unelected panel of retirees pass for public-policy Viagra.

Mr. Simpson notwithstanding, the former senator who most comes to mind is Daniel Patrick Moynihan of New York. In the early 1990's he famously coined the phrase "defining deviancy down" to describe the erosion of civic standards for what constitutes criminal behavior. In 2006, our governmental ailment is defining reality down. "The Way Forward" is its apotheosis.

This syndrome begins at the top, with the president, who has cut and run from reality in Iraq for nearly four years. His case is extreme but hardly unique. Take Robert Gates, the next defense secretary, who was hailed as a paragon of realism by Washington last week simply for agreeing with his Senate questioners that we're "not winning" in Iraq. While that may be a step closer to candor than Mr. Bush's "absolutely, we're winning" of late October, it's hardly the whole truth and nothing but. The actual reality is that we have lost in Iraq.

That's what Donald Rumsfeld at long last acknowledged, between the lines, as he fled the Pentagon to make way for Mr. Gates. The most revealing passage in his parting memo listing possible options for the war was his suggestion that public expectations for success be downsized so we would "therefore not 'lose.' " By putting the word lose in quotes, Mr. Rumsfeld revealed his hand: the administration must not utter that L word even though lose is exactly what we've done. The illusion of not losing must be preserved no matter what the price in blood.

The Iraq Study Group takes a similarly disingenuous tack. Its account of how the country Mr. Bush called a "grave and gathering danger" in September 2002 has devolved into a "grave and deteriorating" catastrophe today is unsparing and accurate. But everyone except the president knew this already, and that patina of realism evaporates once the report moves from diagnosis to prescription.

Its recommendations are bogus because the few that have any teeth are completely unattainable. Of course, it would be fantastic if additional Iraqi troops would stand up en masse after an infusion of new American military advisers. And if reconciliation among the country's warring ethnicities could be mandated on a tight schedule. And if the Bush White House could be persuaded to persuade Iran and Syria to "influence events" for America's benefit. It would also be nice if we could all break the bank in Vegas.

The group's coulda-woulda recommendations are either nonstarters, equivocations (it endorses withdrawal of combat troops by 2008 but is averse to timelines) or contradictions of its own findings of fact. To take just one example: Even if we could wave a magic wand and quickly create thousands more military advisers (and Arabic-speaking ones at that), there's no reason to believe they could build a crack Iraqi army and police force where all those who came before have failed. As the report points out, the loyalties and capabilities of the existing units are suspect as it is.

By prescribing such placebos, the Iraq Study Group isn't plotting a way forward but delaying the recognition of our defeat. Its real aim is to enact a charade of progress to pacify the public while Washington waits, no doubt in vain, for Mr. Bush to return to the real world. The tip-off to the cynical game can be found in a single sentence: "We agree with the goal of U.S. policy in Iraq, as stated by the president: 'an Iraq that can govern itself, sustain itself, and defend itself.' " This studious group knows that even that modest goal, a radical devaluation of the administration's ambition to spread democracy throughout the Middle East, has long been proven a mirage. The Iraqi government's ability to defend anything is so inoperative that the group's members visited the country but once, with just one (Chuck Robb) daring to leave the Green Zone. The Bush-Maliki rendezvous 10 days ago was at the Four Seasons hotel in Amman.

The only recommendations that might alter that reality, however evanescently, come not from "The Way Forward" but from its critics on the right who want significantly more troops and no withdrawal timetables whatsoever. But a Pentagon review leaked to The Washington Post three weeks ago estimates that a true counterinsurgency campaign would "require several hundred thousand additional U.S. and Iraqi soldiers as well as heavily armed Iraqi police," not the 20,000 or so envisioned as a short-term booster shot by John McCain.

Since these troops don't exist and there is no public support in either America or Iraq for mobilizing them, the president can't satisfy the hawks even if he chooses to do so. Since he's also dead set against a prompt withdrawal, we already know what his policy will be, no matter how many "reviews" he conducts. He will stay the course, with various fake-outs along the way to keep us from thinking we've "lost," until the whole mess is deposited in the lap of the next president.

But as Chuck Hagel said last week, "The impending disaster in Iraq is unwinding at a rate that we can't quite calibrate." It is yet another, even more reckless flight from reality to suppose that the world will stand still while we dally. The Iraq Study Group's insistence on dragging out its deliberations until after Election Day for the sake of domestic politics mocked and undermined the urgency of its own mission. Meanwhile the violence metastasized. Eleven more of our soldiers were killed on the day the group finally put on its show. The antagonists in Iraq are not about to take a recess while we celebrate Christmas. The mass exodus of Iraqis, some 100,000 per month, was labeled "the fastest-growing refugee crisis in the world" by Refugees International last week and might soon rival Darfur's.

THE Iraq-Vietnam parallels at this juncture are striking. In January 1968, L.B.J. replaced his arrogant failed defense secretary, Robert McNamara, with a practiced Washington hand, Clark Clifford. The war's violence boiled over soon after (Tet), prompting a downturn in American public opinion. Allies in our coalition of the willing — Thailand, the Philippines, Australia — had balked at tossing in new troops. Clifford commissioned a re-evaluation of American policy that churned up such ideas as a troop pullback, increased training of South Vietnamese forces and a warning to the South Vietnamese government that American assistance would depend on its performance. In March, a bipartisan group of wise men (from Dean Acheson to Omar Bradley) was summoned to the White House, where it seconded the notion of disengagement.

But there the stories of Vietnam and Iraq diverge. Those wise men, unlike the Iraq Study Group, were clear in their verdict. And that Texan president, unlike ours, paid more than lip service to changing course. He abruptly announced he would abjure re-election, restrict American bombing and entertain the idea of peace talks. But as Stanley Karnow recounts in "Vietnam: A History," it was already too late, after some 20,000 casualties and three years of all-out war, for an easy escape: "The frustrating talks were to drag on for another five years. More Americans would be killed in Vietnam than had died there previously. And the United States itself would be torn apart by the worst internal upheavals in a century."

The lesson in that is clear and sobering: As bad as things may seem now, they can yet become worse, and not just in Iraq. The longer we pretend that we have not lost there, the more we risk losing other wars we still may salvage, starting with Afghanistan.

The members of the Iraq Study Group are all good Americans of proven service to their country. But to the extent that their report forestalls reality and promotes pipe dreams of one last chance for success in this fiasco, it will be remembered as just one more delusional milestone in the tragedy of our age.

The Great Divide Over Iraq (WP)

By David S. Broder

The Washington Post, December 10, 2006

On the 65th anniversary of the attack on Pearl Harbor, the pieces moved into place for a foreign policy and national security debate as consequential as any this nation and its allies have faced since the start of World War II.

The Iraq Study Group -- 10 senior statesmen, equally divided between the political parties -- threw down the challenge in a unanimous report that showed no signs of being compromised or softened in the interests of bipartisan comity. This was not a happy-talk report.

The next day, President Bush and British Prime Minister Tony Blair, heirs to the roles of Roosevelt and Churchill, responded in equally forceful tones -- and the debate was on.

Bush and Blair described the government they are trying to save in Baghdad as a democratic reflection of the essentially moderate mainstream of Iraqi society, weak in military strength and beset by extremist Shiite and Sunni forces that are financed and armed by neighboring dictators in Syria and Iran.

Bush approvingly quoted Blair as saying, "The violence is not an accident or a result of faulty planning. It is a deliberate strategy. It is the direct result of outside extremists teaming up with internal extremists -- al-Qaeda with the Sunni insurgents and Iran with the Shia militia."

The Iraq Study Group -- a self-selected group of longtime pre-Bush officials -- came right back to insist that this view was a fundamental mischaracterization of the situation. The problem in Iraq, according to an interview Thursday with the panel's co-chairmen, James A. Baker III, the former Republican secretary of state, and Lee Hamilton, the former Democratic chairman of the House Foreign Relations Committee, is something almost entirely different. They contend that the Iraqi politicians, chosen from religious communities, have been unwilling to make the political trade-offs necessary to build support among the public and in the army and security services for the secular state promised by the Iraqi constitution. The Iraqi politicians procrastinate on dividing up the oil revenue to include the Sunni minority, and they drag their feet on setting up regional governments.

These widely different diagnoses of what ails Iraq, plagues the Iraqi people and vexes the American and British forces lead to very different conclusions. Bush wants to step up the training and assistance for the nascent Iraqi army. The Iraq Study Group would offer more help -- economic, military and diplomatic -- only if the government in Baghdad began soon to repair its factional fights. Otherwise, it would gradually reduce that aid and, in any case, redeploy most allied combat brigades by the first quarter of 2008.

The different strategies appear most vividly when it comes to Iran and Syria. In a passionate response to a question about the ISG suggestion that those two nations be invited to participate in seeking a settlement in Iraq and the broader Middle East, Bush said, "In Iraq, they support terrorists and death squads who are fomenting sectarian violence . . . . In Lebanon, they're supporting Hezbollah . . . . In Afghanistan, they're supporting remnants of the Taliban . . . . In the Palestinian territories, they are working to stop moderate leaders . . . . In each of these places, radicals and extremists are using terror to stop the spread of freedom. And they do so because they want to spread their ideologies -- their ideologies of hate -- and impose their rule on this vital part of the world . . . . And should they succeed, history will look back on our time with unforgiving clarity and demand to know, what happened?"

Agree with Bush's policy or not, there is a theory of history -- and of political science -- behind it. You may label it as neoconservative, but that does not denigrate it.

Baker, who was running diplomacy when this Bush was still part owner of the Texas Rangers baseball club, looks at Syria and sees a country that wanted to be helpful to the West and that aided us in Afghanistan. He looks at Iran and sees a complex society, with nothing to be lost by reaching out to any moderate elements in its government.

The Iraq Study Group report has been embraced by most congressional Democrats. It has been greeted warily by most congressional Republicans. The president has asked for -- and deserves -- time to take in all its recommendations and absorb its chilling picture of what faces us in Iraq.

But one thing is clear. As Baker and Hamilton say, there is no other bipartisan blueprint for the future. Bush will reject it at his peril.

The Bubble Boy In The Oval Office (LAT)

By Jonathan Chait

The Los Angeles Times, December 10, 2006

THERE IS a famous "Twilight Zone" episode about a little boy in a small town who has fantastical powers. Through the misuse of his powers, the little boy has ruined the lives of everybody in the town — for instance, teleporting them into a cornfield, or summoning a snowstorm that destroys their crops. Because anyone who thinks an unhappy thought will be banished, the adults around him can do nothing but cheerfully praise his decisions while they try to nudge him in a less destructive direction.

This episode kept popping into my head when I was reading about President Bush and the Baker-Hamilton commission. Bush is the president of the United States, which therefore gives him enormous power, but he is treated by everybody around him as if he were a child.

Consider a story in the latest Time magazine, recounting the efforts — before the commission was approved by Congress — of three supporters to enlist Condoleezza Rice to win the administration's approval for the panel. Here is how Time reports it:

"As the trio departed, a Rice aide asked one of her suitors not to inform anyone at the Pentagon that chairmen had been chosen and the study group was moving forward. If Rumsfeld was alerted to the study group's potential impact, the aide said, he would quickly tell Cheney, who could, with a few words, scuttle the whole thing. Rice got through to Bush the next day, arguing that the thing was going to happen anyway, so he might as well get on board. To his credit, the President agreed."

The article treats this exchange in a matter-of-fact way, but, what it suggests is completely horrifying. Rice apparently believed that Bush would simply follow the advice of whoever he spoke with. Therefore the one factor determining whether Bush would support the commission was whether Cheney or Rice managed to get to him first.

And now that the Baker-Hamilton report is out, the commissioners are carefully patronizing the commander in chief. As this newspaper reported, "Members of the commission said they were pleased that Bush gave them as much attention as he did, a full hour's worth. 'He could have scheduled us for 20 minutes plus 10 minutes for the cameras,' said former Atty. Gen. Edwin M. Meese III." Wow, a commission devoted hundreds or thousands of man-hours to addressing the central conundrum of U.S. foreign policy, and the president gave them a whole hour of his time!

In return for these considerations, the commission generously avoided revisiting the whole question of who got us into this fiasco and how. As the Washington Post put it, "The panel appeared to steer away from language that might inflame the Bush administration." Of course, "inflame" is a word typically associated with street mobs or other irrational actors. The fact that the president can be "inflamed" is no longer considered surprising enough to merit comment.

Indeed, everybody seems to understand that if you want to help amend the disaster in Iraq, the No. 1 rule is that you can't acknowledge it's a disaster in Bush's presence. Weekly Standard Executive Editor Fred Barnes, the court stenographer of the Bush administration, recently reported that this was a key factor in the hiring of Defense Secretary Robert Gates.

Now, I would bet every dollar I own that Gates thinks the war was a mistake. But you can't say that to Bush. "Before hiring him," Barnes wrote, "Bush had to make sure Gates didn't think America's intervention in Iraq was a mistake."

Yes, Mr. President, it's good that you turned Iraq into a Hobbesian inferno of Al Qaeda terrorists and Islamist death squads. It's really, really good!

After The Fall (NYT)

By David Brooks

The New York Times, December 10, 2006

In fall 2007, the United States began to withdraw troops from Iraq, and so began the Second Thirty Years' War. This war was a bewildering array of small and vast conflicts, which flared and receded and flared again across the entire Middle East, but which were joined by a common theme.

The essence of all this disorder was that the Arab nation-states lost control. Subnational groups — like Hezbollah and the Mahdi Army — and supranational groups — like loosely connected terror networks, the new Sunni and Shiite Leagues and the satellite television networks — went from strength to strength while central national governments toppled and fell. The collapse of national governments led to a power vacuum that the more authentic and deeply rooted social groups sought to fill.

This war had several stages. The first was the disintegration of Iraq. No national institutions could survive the onslaught: there was no impartial justice, no effective law enforcement, no political organization that put loyalty to nation above loyalty to sect or tribe. Absent a government of laws, government by death squads emerged. Militias — with their own hospitals, schools and indoctrination systems — sought to impose order through assassination and revenge.

The Muslim world watched the Sunni-Shiite bloodletting on satellite television and became enraged. Militias, seminaries and terror organizations developed transnational alliances. Shiite uprisings occurred in Saudi Arabia, Bahrain and Pakistan. Furious Sunnis rallied in places like Egypt, demanding that their leaders preserve Sunni supremacy.

The environment was ripe for new sorts of radical leaders, influenced by Moktada al-Sadr and Sheik Hassan Nasrallah. These leaders were hot, charismatic and divisive. They had no intellectual ties to the old 20th-century Arab nationalism, which was scorned as the model that failed.

Chaos spread as governments in Lebanon and Jordan collapsed. The Palestinian Authority fell into complete dysfunction as Hamas and Fatah waged a low-boiling civil war. Al Qaeda reveled in the bloodshed and spread it with rapturous fury. The spreading disorder vindicated an observation that the historian Michael Oren had once made: that there are really only three nations in the Muslim Middle East: Iran, Turkey and Egypt. The other nations are make-believe. The borders are arbitrary and the governments are artificial.

The surviving governments scrambled to stay in front of their radicalized populations and meddled ceaselessly in the wars around them. Turkey meddled in Kurdistan. Iran meddled everywhere through Hezbollah and a legion of mini-Hezbollahs. The Saudis tried to buy their enemies off, but only ended up financing them. Egyptians spread out everywhere as foot soldiers and assassins, especially after the end of the Mubarak era.

Westerners had a great deal of trouble understanding the ever-shifting conflicts among sects they didn't understand and tribes they'd never heard of. Early in the war, Americans engaged in a moronic debate about whether Iraq was in civil war, which illustrated that American vocabularies were trapped in the nation-state paradigm, and how unprepared Americans were to understand the non-nation-state world.

Parallels were made, some apt, some inapt, to the first Thirty Years' War, which decimated Europe in the 17th century. That, too, was a spasmodic constellation of conflicts not among nation-states, but among faiths, tribes and local groupings.

This second version of that war produced a Middle East that looked medieval and postmodern at the same time. The core weakness of Middle Eastern nations was that over centuries Arab society had developed intricate social organizations based on family, tribe and faith. Loyalty to these superseded national bonds. Notions of federalism, subsidiarity and impersonal administration — the underpinnings of the nation-state — had trouble flourishing in these sands.

The Middle East's weak national ties were ripped apart by the rising forces of the 21st century: religious fundamentalism, global terrorism, economic globalization and transnational communications networks. Efforts to do nation-building without security faced long odds. Efforts to exhort Iraqi and other leaders to behave "responsibly" — as defined by Western nationalist categories — were doomed to failure. The American defeat sealed the deal.

It was a terrible era for those brave patriots fighting for national unity. There was horrific turmoil, and the emergence of sociopolitical organizations whose likes the world had never seen.

Meanwhile, Reality In Iraq (WP)

By Jim Hoagland

The Washington Post, December 10, 2006

LONDON -- President Bush has finally heard some realistic, even brutal, ideas about finding a path out of Iraq. But few of them came from the politically interesting but strategically flawed Iraq Study Group's report.

The future of Iraq came calling at the White House three times during an extraordinary 72-hour period last week. History (or perhaps White House chief of staff and visit-scheduler Josh Bolten) was taking no chances: It was announcing clearly to Bush a last chance to salvage some advantage and honor out of this administration's error-riddled occupation of Iraq.

As often occurs when history-warping moments compete for attention, the most important event was the least conspicuous one. A visit to the White House on Monday by Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, the single most powerful Shiite political leader in Iraq, was quickly eclipsed by the manufactured drama of the release of the policy study headed by Jim Baker and Lee Hamilton on Wednesday.

Their 79 recommendations turned out to be a mixed bag of good intentions (Hamilton's strength) and profound, manipulative cynicism (a Baker talent) that Bush cannot find congenial. By blanketing a withering silence over the concept and term, the report even rejects Bush's contention that Iraq is the central front in the "global war on terrorism."

The value of the report lies not in what it says about Iraq and certainly not in the insincere scheme the group hatched -- without seriously consulting Israel -- to have Israel hand the Golan Heights back to Syria as part of an American-led "New Diplomatic Offensive." Instead, the report's value lies in what it says about, and to, America. It makes pertinent recommendations on reorganizing key activities and relationships of the Pentagon, the State Department and Congress that should be pursued.

But on Iraq, the study group repeats the fundamental error that this administration has made since overthrowing Saddam Hussein. That is to refuse to anticipate and then accept the logical -- in fact, inescapable -- consequences of U.S. actions.

Having empowered the formerly persecuted Shiite majority in Iraq through regime change and democratic elections, Bush repeatedly has found its exercise of power suspect or unacceptable, primarily because of Shiite links to Iran.

And both the commission and Bush shrink from directly acknowledging that the struggle in Iraq is now the center of a much broader civil war -- a civil war within Islam that pits Shiites against Sunnis and moderates against extremists in both sects. American actions are not designed to give one religious group advantage over another. But they inevitably do and inevitably are judged in that light by the Iraqis and their neighbors. Again, the United States seems oblivious to the consequences for others of American choices.

This broader context made Hakim's soft words on Iraq's harsh realities the most important suggestions the president heard last week. As offered by the black-turbaned cleric in a series of public appearances in Washington and as supplemented by his aides, his view goes like this:

U.S. forces and the feeble central government do too little to protect Shiites. We can do that job ourselves if your troops get out of the way. That will clear the way for U.S. withdrawals while leading to the informal division of Iraq into three distinct autonomous regions. That is the only acceptable alternative to a strong central government controlled by the Shiites, which may no longer be in reach.

The Baker-Hamilton study group ruled out partition in any form. But the report trails events on the ground, as Bush is likely to have heard in his third high-level meeting on Iraq when he hosted British Prime Minister Tony Blair on Thursday.

In recent weeks British commanders have reported to London that Hakim's Shiite political party, the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, or SCIRI, has completed a gradual takeover of Iraq's south. That leaves British forces with little ability to influence events -- or reason to stay on much longer in any large numbers -- the commanders add pointedly.

Nationally, Hakim has watched patiently as his Shiite rivals in Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's Dawa party and in Moqtada al-Sadr's organization have been chewed up in the meat grinder of Baghdad's barbaric sectarian conflicts, rampant corruption and U.S. inconsistency.

Hakim gave the impression in Washington of a man riding a wave carrying him inexorably toward where he wants to go. No one could say that about Bush during his crucible week.

Our "Messianic Impulse" (WP)

By Robert Kagan

The Washington Post, December 10, 2006

As Americans struggle to find an answer to the serious problems in Iraq, larger and broader questions beckon. How did we wind up in Iraq in the first place? Some argue that we were too aggressive and self-righteous in promoting our principles, too meddlesome, too arrogant in seeking to transform the world, too quick to intervene militarily in crises far from our shores and remote from our interests. If the United States would only change its approach to the world, if it understood the virtues of limits, modesty and humility, we could avoid foreign policy debacles and the world would be a safer place.

This is actually a very old debate, which Americans have thrashed out in every generation. The expansive, idealistic, interventionist approach to the world has deep roots in the American character, going back to the nation's founding and the universal principles of liberalism embedded in the Declaration of Independence. As George Will once put it, the "messianic impulse" has been "a constant of America's national character, and a component of American patriotism."

But no less constant has been opposition to this grand vision, which critics since the nation's founding era have regarded as a recipe for endless war abroad and the undoing of American democracy at home.

The fight began at the beginning, in the ratification debates over the Constitution. Supporters such as George Washington, Alexander Hamilton, Benjamin Franklin and James Madison insisted that a strong central government was vital if the United States was to become a world power capable of shouldering its international responsibilities. The young United States was the "embryo of a great empire," Hamilton proclaimed. Patrick Henry, in turn, accused supporters of the Constitution of trying to "convert this country into a powerful and mighty empire," thereby betraying the nation's purpose. "When the American spirit was in its youth, the language of America was different: liberty, sir, was then the primary object."

John Quincy Adams took both sides of the struggle, warning in 1821 against idealistic ventures abroad "in search of monsters to destroy" but a few years later insisting Americans had a duty "to take a conspicuous and leading" role in the world on behalf of their "principles and morals."

In the last decades of the 19th century, Lincoln's Republican Party widened this expansive and interventionist view, celebrating "the future greatness and destiny of the United States" and its pivotal role "in the improvement of the world." Democrat Grover Cleveland's secretary of state, Walter Q. Gresham, in response, warned against the nation's natural "impulse to rush into difficulties that do not concern it, except in a highly imaginary way." To restrain this "indulgence" was "a duty we owe to the world as an example of the strength, the moderation, and the beneficence of popular government."

Robert A. Taft continued the battle against the ambitious, world-transforming policies of FDR, Harry Truman and Dean Acheson. "We should not undertake to defend the ideals of democracy in foreign countries," the influential Republican senator cautioned, lest the United States become a "meddlesome Mattie" with "our fingers in every pie." He warned against the arrogance and temptations of dominant power, for such power "over other nations, however benevolent its purpose, leads inevitably to imperialism." Truman and Acheson rejected this advice and instead pursued a preponderance of global power, "situations of strength" around the globe, and an ideology-laden strategy of containment that theoretically could lead America to war anywhere on the planet, as it did in Vietnam.

Today Taft is in bad odor in polite society, but his arguments against American overseas adventurism have been picked up again by the latest critics of our expansive foreign policy tradition. The old argument continues.

The problem for those who have tried to steer the United States away from its long history of expansiveness, then and now, is that Americans' belief in the possibility of global transformation -- the "messianic" impulse -- is and always has been the more dominant strain in the nation's character. It is rooted in the nation's founding principles and is the hearty offspring of the marriage between Americans' driving ambitions and their overpowering sense of righteousness.

Critics have occasionally succeeded in checking these tendencies, temporarily. Failures of world-transforming efforts overseas have also had their effect, but only briefly. Five years after the end of the Vietnam War, which seemed to many to presage the rejection of Achesonian principles of power and ideological triumphalism, Americans elected Ronald Reagan, who took up those principles again with a vengeance.

Today many hope and believe that the difficulties in Iraq will turn Americans once and for all against ambition and messianism in the world. History is not on their side.

Iraq's Biggest Failing: There Is No Iraq (NYT)

By Roger Cohen

The New York Times, December 10, 2006

WAR spews words. They make up its fog. Washington was awash in them last week as the damage control exercise called the Iraq Study Group culminated with a proposal to extract all American combat brigades by early 2008, leaving a few tens of thousands of troops to train the Iraqi Army or protect the trainers. As befits a bipartisan report on what looks like a lose-lose situation, it was a fudge.

But beyond the words — from President Bush's chagrin at "the pace of success" to the report's "grave and deteriorating" situation — lie people, the millions of Iraqis who have to get their kids up in the morning, those dimly discernible objects of the myriad political contortions. One of them, a 32-year-old Iraqi engineer encountered earlier this year in Baghdad, had this to say in a desperate e-mail message:

"I am facing the most difficult times of my life here in Baghdad. Since I am a Sunni, I became a target to be killed. You know that our army and police are Shia, so every checkpoint represents a serious threat to Sunnis. During the last three weeks, two of my friends were killed at check points belonging to the police. They first asked to show IDs and when they saw the Sunni family name, they killed them."

There, in plain enough English, you have it. The Iraqi Army and police whose proposed reinforcement lies at the center of the Iraq Study Group's plan for American extraction are often less neutral institutions supporting the nation than a flimsy camouflage for Shia to settle accounts with Sunnis, while the Kurds bide their time and hope the child of chaos will be an independent Kurdistan.

The Iraqi Army and police are indeed overwhelmingly — but not exclusively — Shia. Most recruitment took place at a time when Sunnis had opted out of the new Iraq. Much has been made of the American error in disbanding Saddam Hussein's army. More might have been made of the errors committed in creating the new force.

Contacted in Baghdad, Lt. Gen. Peter W. Chiarelli, who commands American forces in Iraq, described the Iraqi Army as "fragile." He said Sunni officers and soldiers "have to believe the government is using force in a fair and evenhanded manner." As for the police, he said, "it is clear there are some sectarian elements," but "forceful action" by the Interior Ministry was now addressing the problem.

Are these the bulwarks of an Iraq that can "govern itself, sustain itself and defend itself" within 15 months, letting the bulk of American troops go home? Perhaps, the report seems to say, as it urges Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki to get with the program — through rapid provincial elections, fairer distribution of oil revenue, the reintegration of Baathists and constitutional reform.

But it's hard to escape the conclusion that the report treats Iraq as an existing country needing a quick fix in the name of resurgent American realism, rather than a still-to-be-born country that needs to be ushered into being in the name of American idealism.

Iraq, in short, needs Iraqis — citizens of a nation rather than of a tribe — and that, after decades of disorienting dictatorship, is a generational undertaking scarcely amenable to American electoral timetables.

Right now, Sunnis, Shiites and Kurds see "freedom" more as the opportunity to be free of one another than to forge a liberal democracy. That's how subjugated peoples, from the Soviet Union to Yugoslavia, tend to react to the lifting of tyranny. Iraqi behavior is not especially strange.

But it has been hugely destructive — an estimated 3,000 Iraqi civilians are dying every month — and it presents President Bush with a choice between the stick-with-it idealism that has been the mainstay of his narrative of Iraqi freedom catalyzing a Middle Eastern transformation, and the ease-out realism thrust in his face by his father's secretary of state, James A. Baker III.

"The report is a devastating critique and an official certification of a failed policy, but its recommendations are a weak compromise," said Richard Holbrooke, the former United States ambassador to the United Nations. "So the question remains: what will the president do? Most people want an exit timetable, a few want a troop increase and Bush appears unready for either. He seems likely to pass this mess on to his successor."

Certainly Mr. Bush's instincts, and his post-report language, suggest he will not embrace a 15-month timetable for large-scale withdrawal, even as a figure weakened by his party's midterm electoral defeat. The realists, and the angry left, would then be further incensed. There's no doubt that the administration's ideology and scant planning, sold as idealism, have done great damage in Iraq. But realism too has its limits.

It was realism, Mr. Baker would say, that made him urge Yugoslavia to stick together days before its disintegration, and realism that later led him to wave away the Balkans with the lapidary phrase: "We don't have a dog in that fight." That was before the avenging dog of Bosnian mass killing finally outraged American moral principles and drew the country in.

The fact is Iraq was unmade while Mr. Baker was back in Texas, unmade in pursuit of a new Middle Eastern beginning. A state that had known only despotic rule, inhabited by disoriented victims of terror, was asked to govern itself through some form of democracy.

Remaking the unmade, in this case the fragmenting state of Iraq, is time-consuming, and, as Miroslav Hroch, the Czech political theorist, has observed, ethnic or religious nationalism easily becomes the "substitute for factors of integration in a disintegrating society."

Adel is the name of the young engineer who has been writing to me; to give his full name would put his life and that of his family at risk. He knows all about the death of the old Iraq and the agony of the new.

In 2004 he got a job with Washington Group International, a building contractor.

"Now," he writes, "I am working at a WGI site and live there because it is safe inside but when I go to my home the danger surrounds me. The police sometimes search the houses, and now the Shia militia force the Sunnis to leave their houses. The majority of the area is Shia. They want it to be completely Shia."

He concedes that the same abuses "took place in the Sunni areas too." But, he says, "the Sunnis are 20 percent only while the Shia are 70 percent and the police and army are Shia, so they are able to carry weapons officially."

The study group lists all sorts of things the Iraqi Army lacks — leadership, equipment, personnel, logistical support. But it does not identify the most fundamental: absence of sufficient belief in the nation.

It seems highly improbable that this can be forged in 15 months. An American officer, Col. Mark Meadows, told me earlier this year in Baghdad that the Iraqi brigade he was training was overwhelmingly Shia, which was a problem.

"They're where we were in early World War II," Colonel Meadows said. "We went from the black-only units of that time to Truman's integrated Army of the 1950s. The Army led the way in the breakthrough from a divided society. That has to happen here, too."

But, the colonel added, "If we try to go too fast, if we take a short-sighted view, if we expect instant gratification, it won't work."

As for the police, it is, in the view of General Chiarelli, in far worse shape than the army. "The year of the police," as 2006 was billed, has turned into the year of police abuse. The report suggests transferring a large part of the police from the Interior Ministry control to the Defense Ministry to improve discipline.

Quite what that would achieve is unclear. Both ministries have been infested with sectarianism and corruption. The Interior Ministry is now led by a Shiite, Defense by a Sunni, but both forces, police and military are still overwhelmingly Shiite, which is where the fundamental difficulty lies.

Adel, as a Sunni, has suffered directly from that. Now, even as he seeks ways to leave, he believes "that we are not completely lost."

"If the invasion was the only solution to make Saddam quit," he writes, "so it was the right choice."

The problem, he adds, is "not with the invasion itself" but with "how to select the suitable men to take the responsibility of ruling Iraq, because most of those we have now are not devoted to this country."

Iraq has to survive, not because it's lovely, or within sight of peace, but because it's the least bad solution. Its breakup would entail unfathomable horror: one quarter of the population is in mixed Baghdad, and Sunni Anbar province is an oil-free desert suitable only for Al Qaeda central. To have a future, Iraq almost certainly needs a broad federalism of a kind not endorsed in the report, and it needs the likes of Adel.

He's scared, but not without a frail hope: the hope that Iraq can inspire love of itself in its citizens, beyond religious and ethnic lines. To that lingering aspiration, after the loss of almost 3,000 American lives and the spending of $400 billion in treasure, the United States appears to have an enduring responsibility.

Even If We Leave Now, We'll Be Back (WP)

By David Rothkopf

The Washington Post, December 10, 2006

Strategic redeployment. Phased drawdown. Exit strategy. However one phrases it, Washington seems to be turning a page in the story of Iraq. The midterm elections, the subsequent resignation of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and the release of the Iraq Study Group's report last week all suggest that the transformational objectives that led U.S. forces into Iraq are being supplanted by an unmistakable and bipartisan desire to bring troops home, end this mess and move on.

That impulse, while understandable, reflects the national narcissism that dogs much of U.S. foreign policy. We think Iraq is about us. We made it happen and we can undo it. But one-sided solutions for ending the Iraq war are as unrealistic as the one-sided impulses that started it. Even as we seek to remake history, it is remaking us.

The economic and political forces that drew the United States into Iraq -- quite different from the reasons the Bush administration gave for the invasion -- remain powerful, exerting a pull that will be hard to resist. Oil, of course, is foremost among them. But also important are the threats and tensions linked to oil: Washington's decades-old rivalry with Iran, the growing dangers posed by the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction, and the fear that the Middle East's simmering conflicts will erupt into a broader, bloodier and far more costly war.

To its credit, the Iraq Study Group recognized many of these dimensions. But, however we may try to extricate ourselves from Iraq today, the best we can hope for is an end to only this latest chapter of U.S. military involvement in the region. There is no getting out of the Middle East. Even if we leave now, we'll be back.

In future history books, this war may be known as the Second Gulf War, or perhaps this period will be remembered as the era of The Gulf Wars. Just as today we look back on extended and episodic conflicts such as the Thirty Years' War or the Hundred Years' War, historians may regard today's clash as only another battle in a much longer war. U.S. actions in this Gulf war have dramatically increased the likelihood of future conflicts. We have inflamed tensions in the Middle East, undercut our regional influence and eroded the nation's political will to remain actively engaged in this critical part of the world.

The forces pulling us back are so strong that it doesn't matter which party controls Congress or occupies the White House. In fact, given the political shifts that this increasingly unpopular conflict has triggered, it seems quite possible that a Democratic president may be the one compelled to wage the Third Gulf War.

The United States's interests in the Middle East date to the post-World War I years, around the time when the British redrew the Middle East map and created nation-states, such as Iraq, cobbled together from disparate Sunni, Shiite and Kurdish pieces. A rising industrial power, the United States could not ignore the promise of oil identified in the Persian Gulf in the 1920s. With the drilling contracts awarded to Standard Oil of California and Texaco in 1933 and 1936, respectively, the United States in effect committed itself to an ever growing involvement in (and dependence on) this region.

But it was after World War II, when an energy-hungry United States took on the task of forging a new global order, that the Middle East became a central priority for U.S. foreign policy. Not only did the demand for oil grow precipitously, but Washington was entering a Cold War against a Soviet adversary that also coveted the Middle East's energy resources. Immediately after the war, the Russians refused to leave Iran as they had promised at the Yalta Conference in 1945; it took action by the U.N. Security Council to force their withdrawal. This ultimately led the United States to seek a reliable ally in Tehran, in turn leading presidents from Dwight D. Eisenhower to Jimmy Carter to embrace the shah.

At the same time, the situation in the region was immeasurably complicated by the creation of the state of Israel in 1948 and President Harry S. Truman's support for the new entity. This new U.S.-Israeli bond created an instant tension with the countries upon which the United States depended for oil, thus defining a balancing act that to this day remains the trickiest in U.S. foreign policy.

Over time, this picture grew even more complex, as much the result of the United States' victories as its fumbles and defeats. The abuses of the shah's regime led to popular rebellion in Iran and the rise of Ayatollah Khomeini's theocracy -- a geopolitical defeat compounded by a humiliating hostage crisis. And after the Soviet Union pushed into Afghanistan in 1979, the United States responded on two fronts: It attempted to push back against Soviet forces in Afghanistan by supporting mujaheddin resistance fighters led by the likes of Osama bin Laden, and sought to offset Iran's influence by supporting the leadership bid of Iraqi military strongman Saddam Hussein. In both cases, the results would prove haunting.

The fall of the Soviet enemy eliminated a certain coherence and organizing principle to U.S. interests in the Middle East, one that had seemed above and beyond mere oil interests. But then that former U.S. ally, Hussein, apparently estimating that Washington needed him more than he needed Washington, invaded Kuwait in 1990, threatening U.S. allies in the Gulf region. With Saudi cooperation, the administration of President George H.W. Bush and its allies turned him back. But Bush resisted marching on Baghdad to depose him, perhaps fearing a new power vacuum in the Middle East, one that could have been filled by Iran, which had supplanted the Soviet Union as the United States's chief regional rival. As one prominent Arab political scientist observed to me, "The secret most Americans won't admit is that this most recent war is not about terrorism. It is part of a quarter-century-old geopolitical tug of war with Iran for regional hegemony."

Today, as King Abdullah of Jordan has observed, the region is verging on three civil wars -- in Iraq, in Lebanon and in the Palestinian territories -- all of which somehow involve Iran, the United States or their proxies. Embroiled in Gulf War II, the United States faces a growing roster of additional threats: Iran's acquisition of nuclear weapons technology; a resurgent Taliban in Afghanistan; increasing anti-American radicalism across the Muslim world and the threat that such passions pose to moderate leaders atop potentially fragile regimes in Egypt, Jordan, Pakistan and Saudi Arabia; and Washington's growing alienation from allies who would normally share U.S. interests. Sadly, the invasion of Iraq in this most recent Gulf war has only exacerbated these situations.

What plausible scenarios could draw even a war-weary United States back into the Middle East, into a Gulf War III?

Clearly, the confrontation with Iran -- over its regional policies, support of terrorists and desire to acquire nuclear weapons -- tops the list. One need only recall the prewar debate over Iraq to understand that the international community considers the proliferation of WMD an acceptable justification for war. The Iranian threat is magnified because it could trigger an arms race for a "Sunni bomb" to offset the "Shiite bomb." Meanwhile, Israel is unlikely to long tolerate a nuclear capability in a government that has called for its destruction, and in the Arab world, any action by Israel would be regarded as an action on behalf of the United States.

As the Iraq Study Group has recommended, this or a future administration might seek to stabilize Iraq by reaching out to regional players such as Iran and Syria -- two nations traditionally hostile to Israel. In so doing, Washington might also push for an accelerated transfer of the Golan Heights or the accelerated establishment of a sustainable Palestinian state, as the commission's report also suggests. While such diplomatic overtures may prove sensible, they could also be interpreted as a weakening of U.S. support for Israel. This could tempt more radical elements, such as the military wing of Hamas or Hezbollah, to push harder against Israel in an attempt to win further concessions or test the viability of an Israeli government operating with a less supportive U.S. ally. In all such scenarios, Washington must avoid the appearance of weakness or the perception that it has wavered from its core commitments in the region; any concessions by the United States or its allies must always be perceived as flowing from positions of strength.

Other developments in the Middle East could elicit a U.S. military response, even if a reluctant one. What if Jordan, Pakistan or Saudi Arabia fell into fundamentalist hands? The perception of the threat, the impact on world energy prices, the reaction of regional rivals -- these elements could quickly put the U.S. military on alert, especially if U.S. troops, citizens or bases in the region came under threat. Or what if Iranian troops entered Iraq? Or if another terrorist attack against the American homeland (or U.S. assets anywhere in the world) could be traced to forces in the region? The response probably would not be a Rumsfeldian "shock and awe" affair. Instead, given the scope and interconnectedness of these threats and the desire to avoid the mistakes made this time around, a Third Gulf War probably would be larger, in terms of troop commitments, than the second.

Now, as Gulf War II enters a new phase, the Vietnam War offers an important lesson, as well as an important distinction. The lesson is that leaving a country is often much more complicated than entering it. After the U.S. election of 1968 confirmed the public's desire to withdraw from Vietnam, the war dragged on for seven more years and claimed as many lives as it had during the period of escalation. The distinction, however, is that even leaving Vietnam probably will prove much simpler than leaving Iraq or the surrounding region.

The Middle East today is infinitely more dangerous than at the start of Gulf War II. Now, the Bush administration must do what it did not do before invading Iraq: Plan for the likely and possible futures, not just the one it hopes to face. While a long-term U.S. military presence in the region may further stoke anti-American passions, it may also make good and prudent strategic sense. The American people will need to assess such options based on the country's overarching interests -- which include reducing the likelihood of yet another war in the region -- rather than the short-term, feel-good option of bringing the troops home and retreating into a state of semi-isolationism.

Only the Iraqis can resolve their political troubles and sectarian violence. The United States can help by empowering Iraqi soldiers and police -- not with weapons that may one day be used against U.S. troops, but with body armor, transport vehicles, crowd-control tools, information technology, training and the other assets that can help them assume greater responsibility for their own security in the months ahead. The United States must also restore its own hollowed-out military and determine how a war such as the one in Iraq could ever have stretched U.S. forces so thin.

Over the long-term, one reasonable approach in the Middle East could be called "parallel containment:" The United States must contain the complex threats it faces in the region, and at the same time try to limit our vital interests there. On the first score, Hezbollah and Hamas must know that the United States is present and stands ready to take action. Iran must know that it will not be allowed to develop nuclear weapons, period. Moderates in the region must know that we will stand by them, with economic aid and political support, helping to restore U.S. moral authority in the Middle East. And everyone must know that an attack against Israel will always be considered an attack against America. On the second score, we must embark on the long-term but critical task of reducing our energy dependence on the Middle East. No strategy in any Gulf war could produce more lasting change in the region than a prolonged fall in oil prices. The only dependable formula for ultimate victory in the Gulf wars will come through innovation and conservation right here at home.

Iraq 2013 (NYT)

By James Traub

The New York Times Magazine, December 10, 2006

Scholars and diplomats who have closely studied civil wars describe them almost as forces of nature, grinding on until the parties exhaust themselves, shredding bonds that cannot be stitched back together even long years after the killing stops. In Bosnia and Herzegovina, the United Nations and other international actors have spent a decade trying to undo the psychic as well as the physical destruction of four years of intramural mayhem. There's not a great deal to show for it. David Harland, the head of a small policy team inside the U.N. peacekeeping department, points out that "on the eve of the war, Sarajevo was 40 percent Muslim and 60 percent everything else. Now it's 90 percent Muslim, and of the remaining 10 percent, most are mixed marriages or the elderly. You can't reverse ethnic cleansing."

And you generally can't stop it either, as we are now learning in Iraq. The question of whether Iraq has descended into civil war has, of course, become an obsessive issue, if basically a semantic one. President Bush insists that it has not, though American military officials concede that sectarian violence now poses a greater threat to Iraq than does the (largely Sunni) insurgency. In October, according to a U.N. report, Iraqi civilian deaths reached a record 3,709, though the real number is almost certainly higher. One hundred thousand Iraqis are now fleeing abroad every month, in addition to vast numbers internally displaced. Experts have no trouble describing what they're seeing. In Congressional testimony this past September, James D. Fearon, an expert on civil conflict at Stanford University, said that "by any reasonable definition, Iraq is in the midst of a civil war."

The White House's steadfast refusal to call this conflict a civil war feels more like denial than delusion; President Bush understands that using the term would force him to concede that the defining act of his presidency had ended in ruin. Americans will not continue to send their sons and daughters into the Iraqi maelstrom in order to defend Iraqi factions from one another. What's more, civil wars rarely have the kind of equitable conclusion that the Bush administration has envisioned in Iraq. Fearon testified that the 54 such conflicts he studied typically lasted more than 10 years and normally ended with decisive military victory rather than power-sharing agreements. History, he said, indicates that the current administration strategy "is highly unlikely to succeed, whether the U.S. stays in Iraq for six more months or six more years (or more)."

In many respects, Iraq feels less like Bosnia than like Lebanon, where militias representing Christians, Shiites, Sunnis and secular leftists fought one another from 1975 to 1990, killing or wounding 5 percent of the country's population and uprooting half. Paul Salem, an authority on Lebanon at the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, points out that in the early part of the war, the various parties kept fighting so long as they believed they could tip the existing balance of power. By 1984 or so, he says, "the domestic players got tired and realized that none of them would win" and only then prepared to negotiate. In Iraq, Salem laments, the "pent-up rage" from decades of repression seems to have scarcely spent itself.

Lebanon typifies the fundamentally sectarian or ethnic character of modern civil wars. In his recently published "War of the World," the historian Niall Ferguson argues that the collapse of multiethnic empires in the late 19th and early 20th centuries gave free rein to rivalries that had been constrained by imperial power. Ferguson observes that many nation-states that emerged out of the wreckage of the Ottoman Empire, from Yugoslavia to Iraq, were able to contain those conflicts by ruthless repression. Centripetal energies often exploded once the dictator died or was toppled. Lacking, in most cases, any tradition of power sharing, such states prove "far too multiethnic to function as democracies," Ferguson maintains. Minority groups are bound to conclude that they have more to gain by fighting than by submitting to the will of an unleashed majority. Ferguson, a onetime supporter of the Iraq war, has argued that "trying to get democracy in a rush in conditions of economic and political instability" is a formula for disaster.

For this administration, so ready to deploy the tools of American power, the conclusion that it is helpless to stem the avalanche it has set off may be even harder to accept than the fact that it has made a terrible mistake. If only for that reason, President Bush may grudgingly accept at least some of the advice he receives from the panel headed by James Baker, the family consigliere, and the former representative Lee Hamilton. But it may already be too late for some of the measures that Baker and others propose to do much good.

When the sectarian combatants finally do exhaust themselves, Iraq will need a great deal of outside help, though not the kind it has received so far. Civil wars liquidate the trust among parties that makes settlements possible; outsiders must act as guarantors and, usually, peacekeepers. And they have to be prepared to make a major commitment: NATO put 60,000 troops in Bosnia, with a population less than one-sixth that of Iraq, to police the Dayton Accords that ended the war. Today 1,900 soldiers from the European Union are sufficient to do the job. Croats, Serbs and Muslims have reached a wary standoff, which leads David Harland to posit a second world-weary hypothesis: "If you apply enough force, you can get people to live adjacent to one another." That's a long, long way from the trailblazing Middle Eastern democracy around which the Bush administration wove such glittering fantasies. Still, the Bosnians are not killing one another and don't seem likely to start. And in today's Iraq, that would be a consummation devoutly to be wished.

79 Steps To Victory In Iraq? (NYT)

The New York Times, December 10, 2006

President Bush says the Iraq Study Group report "did a good job of showing what is possible." Prime Minister Tony Blair of Britain said, "It offers a strong way forward." The New York Post called it the work of "surrender monkeys." There is no shortage of opinions. Here are a dozen worth considering.

Democracy Defeated (NYT)

By Richard Perle

The New York Times, December 10, 2006

THINGS that start badly seldom end well. And the Baker-Hamilton findings start badly, with the commission's wholly unproven assertion that Iran and Syria have an "interest in avoiding chaos in Iraq."

It is astonishing that not a shred of evidence is advanced to support this seminal statement. That may be because all the evidence is to the contrary: from the beginning, Iran and Syria have been undermining American and Iraqi efforts to bring order and stability to Iraq.

The matter is important, because an approach to the dictators in Iran and Syria would be seen throughout the region, and especially in Iraq itself, as a sign of American weakness and resignation. A hat-in-hand plea for help from our adversaries will only confirm their belief that a policy of fueling the insurgency with weapons, money, intelligence and foreign fighters is working.

Missing from the report is any serious reflection on the president's goal of encouraging the development of representative government in the despotic Arab world, an objective that would be scuttled by the report's proposed "diplomatic offensive."

President Bush has said to the world, "If you stand for freedom, we stand with you." In pushing for deals with the dictators in Iran and Syria, the study group has said to Mr. Bush, as James Baker once shamefully said to those pleading for intervention in Bosnia to stop the genocide of defenseless Muslims, "We don't have a dog in that fight."

The Last War (NYT)

By Fouad Ajami

The New York Times, December 10, 2006

A ND the mountain brought forth mice: We should have known that James Baker and Lee Hamilton would take us back to the past, for they are men of the past. Consider this, the oldest of Middle Eastern props: "The United States cannot achieve its goals in the Middle East unless it deals directly with the Arab-Israeli conflict and regional instability."

The ground burns in Iraq, the center of gravity in Arab life has shifted away from the Mediterranean and toward the Persian Gulf. But Mr. Baker knows his old brief, where he was steward of American diplomacy when he left office in 1992. A big war had been fought against Saddam Hussein in 1991, the Shiites and Kurds had been abandoned to the tender mercy of the despot. But Mr. Baker headed straight to the Madrid peace conference to use the prestige won in Iraq and the gulf to force concessions out of Israel.

Mr. Baker returns untutored in the ways of that region. A new, deadly struggle has erupted between American power and the forces of terrorism in the Islamic world. A "wise man" who proposes to fix Iraq by returning the Golan Heights to Syria has missed the meaning of Iraq. This report describes a long-vanished Arab world: Its poverty is given away in its banal language, in that familiar assertion that all of history yields to the fixer's touch. — FOUAD AJAMI, professor of Middle Eastern studies at Johns Hopkins and the author of "The Foreigner's Gift."

Why Play A Weak Hand? (NYT)

By Josef Joffe

The New York Times, December 10, 2006

JAMES BAKER is a consummate diplomatist; recall how he rounded up dozens of allies in the first war against Saddam Hussein. But his panel's suggestion to "engage" Iran and Syria to extricate the United States from the current Iraqi morass reflects a grievous misreading of those nations' ambitions and America's options.

Rule No. 1: Never negotiate from weakness, unless you intend to capitulate. Back in April 2003, Iran was quaking, and Syria's Bashar al-Assad was a living corpse. Now, both are on a roll while the Bush administration is looking at a triple rout: in Iraq, in Afghanistan and in Congress. So the mightiest nation on earth has no sticks — be it a doubling of the troops in Iraq or a strike against Iran's nuclear installations.

What about carrots? Washington can hold out only two deals that might elicit cooperation on Iraq. One is to accept precisely what America has fought for decades: Damascus's rule over that part of "Greater Syria" we call Lebanon. As for Tehran, the price would be higher still: a tacit "yes" to the bomb, and Iran's hegemony over much of the Middle East. If that is the price of engagement, Washington might just as well skip the tedium of talking and disengage from the world's most critical strategic arena here and now.

Invite The Neighbors (NYT)

By Jeremy Greenstock

The New York Times, December 10, 2006

THE Iraq Study Group's recommendations set a formidable but necessary agenda for the coalition in Iraq. Restoring internal stability will not be possible without outside help. The report points to Washington's failure to confront the neighbors of Iraq with the consequences of a complete breakdown of the rule of law there. The risk of regional destabilization is very real. With a continuing stalemate in the Middle East peace process and the potential for miscalculation by Iran over the nuclear question, the dangers for the whole region look greater than at any stage since the 1940's.

We cannot turn things around in Iraq without involving the entire region. Iran would be foolish to risk the emergence of a new autocracy in Iraq. Syria, only a secondary player in Iraq, has other priorities: the return of the Golan Heights within a decade.

America need not address either nation directly if the right conference format is designed. Saudi Arabia, Turkey, Jordan and Kuwait all need a unified Iraq as one of the foundations of their national security.

This set of compelling interests requires a table to talk around and where superpower diplomacy is properly brought to bear. What we need now is not a staged retreat, but a move into a higher gear. Under the guidance of the study group's commendable recommendations, the driving force must be diplomatic, not military. It's worth the inevitable cost.

— JEREMY GREENSTOCK, former British special representative to Iraq and the director of the Ditchley Foundation.

Don't Get Sectarian (NYT)

By Madeleine Albright

The New York Times, December 10, 2006

IN the spirit of the Iraq Study Group recommendations, the administration should make clear to Muslims throughout the Middle East that America will not take sides in the millennium-old Sunni-Shiite split. American forces are not in Iraq to engage in sectarian warfare; our policy in Lebanon is not based on a preference for the adherents of one faith over any other; our concerns about Iran are unrelated to that country's status as a leader of Shiite Islam.

The conventional wisdom is not to take sides in a civil war, but when you do, to pick the winner. In Iraq, there are some who say we should back the Shiites because they are the majority. But they are not the majority in the persian gulf. It would be an error to align ourselves with the Shiites (because Al Qaeda is Sunni) or the Sunnis (because Iraq's worst militias and Hezbollah are Shiite). We must be mindful of the interests of all factions and willing to talk to all sides, but our message should not vary.

We should promise help to all — Sunni, Shiite, Christian, Druze, Jew, Arab, Kurd, Persian — who observe territorial borders, honor human rights, obey the rule of law, respect holy places and seek to live in peace.

— MADELEINE ALBRIGHT, former secretary of state.

Find New Allies (NYT)

By Leslie H. Gelb

The New York Times, December 10, 2006

FOR all its deftness and honesty, the Iraq Study Group report flees the hardest choices and leaves us without a credible strategy. It calls for getting American troops out of Iraq, but says we'll be there for a long time. It calls for more training of Iraqi forces, but doesn't explain how to make it happen this time. It insists on reconciliation among warring sects, but offers no realistic political power-sharing plan to achieve it. Instead, the group's gloomy assessment of the situation should have led it to a clear strategy aimed at limiting damage:

First, try for a federal or decentralized Iraq with oil-revenue sharing, as its Constitution provides. Only federalism can prevent partition, though everything's a long shot now.

Second, provide means, protection and funds for Iraqis wanting to relocate for safety. It's the only way to stop ethnic cleansing.

Third, make common cause with Iraqi Sunni Baathists, Saudis and others to crush the terrorists in central Iraq. Once our troops start to leave, we can establish this clear common interest, and the Baathists will do a better job than we.

Fourth, ally diplomatically and economically with Iraqi Shiites, who are, after all, Iraqis and Arabs, not Iranians and Persians, and who don't want to be ruled from Teheran.

This damage-limiting approach fits the facts on the ground described by the group, and may be the only way to avoid a failed Bush policy becoming a strategic defeat.

Have Faith In Maliki (NYT)

By Rory Stewart

The New York Times, December 10, 2006

THE Baker report is refreshingly honest in its description of Iraq. But its recommendations are less reliable and in some cases dangerous. It states, "If the Iraqi government does not make substantial progress toward the achievement of milestones on national reconciliation, security and governance, the United States should reduce its political, military or economic support."

This is back to front. Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki will fail to meet those milestones, but we should support him nonetheless. He is the democratically elected head of a sovereign state, with a better understanding of his own country than the coalition. Our attempts to manipulate and control Iraqi politicians have historically undermined their authority, frustrated their political compromises and strengthened opposition. Empowering Mr. Maliki, though necessary, will be unpleasant: the militias and Iran will remain strong and the security forces weak.

But progress will come only if we provide almost unconditional economic and political support to the elected president and allow him to rebuild his state in his own way.

Police States (NYT)

By Bing West

The New York Times, December 10, 2006

THE Iraq report recommended the withdrawal of American troops by the spring of 2008, balanced in part by the infusion of 20,000 advisers. Without advisers, the Iraqi forces will pull out of the tough areas. With advisers, the army and police — a mix of Sunnis and Shiites — may hold the country together.

But the police are in wretched shape, intimidated and poorly led. More police advisers are essential, together with tough leaders from local tribes. The police, who can identify the killers hiding among the people, must be allowed to imprison extremists. The Abu Ghraib abuses led to such kid-glove handling of killers that our troops refer to "the catch and release program." If that continues, stability is doomed.

Sadly, Iraqi soldiers trust American advisers more than their own government. The advisers demand steady performance, and in exchange extract pay and logistics from recalcitrant ministries in Baghdad. Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki has demanded operational control of all Iraqi forces. To prevent the appointment of sectarian loyalists, President Bush must insist upon a joint American-Iraqi military board that will approve all key Iraqi military and police assignments. Without this board, we must not commit a single adviser.

Endangered Advisers (NYT)

By Andrew Exum

The New York Times, December 10, 2006

T HE fates of 26 million Iraqis and the 141,000 American troops in Iraq have long been intertwined. Wednesday, their shared fate was inexorably altered by the report put out by the Iraq Study Group, a panel made up of nine lawyers and a mathematician.

Some of the recommendations are sensible, but a few of the military suggestions could spell disaster.

The recommendation to increase the number of soldiers training the Iraqi military is, in general, a good one. Officers serving in Iraq have told me in recent days that the efforts to train and equip the Iraqi Army have not proceeded with the sense of urgency they deserve. The military understands this and last summer established a school in Fort Riley, Kan., where the Army's foremost counterinsurgency expert is training more advisers to be sent to Iraq.

But to increase the number of advisers while simultaneously decreasing the number of combat brigades is a recipe for disaster. The adviser teams embedded with Iraqi units will become increasingly vulnerable, and a smaller force left behind in Iraq will find itself called upon to fight the inevitable worsening of violence with far fewer troops.

Given that the panel consulted with five times as many politicians as military officers, such oversights shouldn't come as a surprise. But the mathematician on the panel, former Secretary of Defense William Perry, should have known better.

We Can Watch Iraq From The Sea (NYT)

By Robert Pape

The New York Times, December 10, 2006

GETTING American combat forces out of Iraq is imperative. From Lebanon to Sri Lanka to the West Bank to New York, more than 95 percent of all suicide terrorist attacks around the world since 1980 have been caused by the presence of foreign combat forces on territory the terrorists value. Since 9/11, American combat soldiers stationed on the Arabian Peninsula have increased from 12,000 to more than 150,000. And suicide terrorism both in Iraq and by Al Qaeda has escalated simultaneously.

But leaving is not enough. If Iraq explodes while Americans withdraw, the resulting chaos would be a strategic and humanitarian nightmare. To contain violence, the Iraq Study Group suggests expanding the role of American advisers embedded in the Iraqi security forces. The value of this idea, however, is contradicted by the group itself, which reports only "fitful progress" building the Iraqi Army with embedded advisers. More embeds only means more potential hostages.

Here's a better idea: Move a large fraction of all American forces into staging areas outside Baghdad so that, within hours, tremendous air and ground power could suppress any major escalation in attacks against civilians. Over the next year, American ground troops should gradually pull back and their mission should evolve into a longer term, off-shore balancing strategy using naval and air forces and allies.

This would not end violence in Iraq. But it would head off the worst and buy time for international economic and political assistance to help stabilize the Iraqi government.

Close The Bases (NYT)

By Larry Diamond

The New York Times, December 10, 2006

A MONG the 79 recommendations of the report is one addressed explicitly to President Bush: He "should state that the United States does not seek permanent military bases in Iraq." Why is this so important? Since May 2003, a growing number of Iraqis and most of the Sunni minority have felt their country was under American occupation. This has been one of two factors driving the vicious Sunni insurgency.

To arrest the slide to civil war, international mediators must negotiate directly with the elements of the Sunni insurgency (secular nationalists and more tactical Islamists) that have been seeking talks with the United States for three years. If we press all the components of the study group's approach to "national reconciliation" — like amnesty, a rollback of de-Baathification and a new bargain on oil and federalism — while renouncing permanent military bases and clearly signaling our intent to withdraw militarily from Iraq over the next few years, it is possible that a deal can be had with a critical mass of the insurgency. — LARRY DIAMOND, senior fellow at the Hoover Institution and the author of "Squandered Victory."

Give Amnesty, But Not To All (NYT)

By Nathaniel Fick

The New York Times, December 10, 2006

THE Iraq Study Group report points to a lack of national reconciliation as the "fundamental cause of violence in Iraq." It concludes that the Iraqi government must find "ways and means to reconcile with former bitter enemies" and that "Iraqi amnesty proposals must not be undercut in Washington."

Amnesty is a hard sell in Iraq, where the Shiite-dominated government is loath to forgive its Sunni opposition, and also in the United States, where many view it as condoning attacks on American troops. I fought against some of those who would be pardoned. They killed my comrades. But stubborn opposition to reconciliation will only harm more Americans, Iraqis and the cause we're fighting for. There's no sense in fighting to the finish against anyone who might otherwise be coerced into quitting. That said, three conditions must be enforced:

Amnesty must be offered only after United States forces have shifted their priority from conventional operations to an advisory role. It cannot occur with 141,000 potential targets in Iraq.

Amnesty must forgive only past attacks, and cannot appear to sanction or legitimize future ones.

Amnesty applies only to Iraqis. Foreign fighters, with no legal standing in Iraq, cannot be eligible.

New Taliban Rules Target Afghan Teachers (AP)

By Jason Straziuso, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 10, 2006

The Taliban gunmen who murdered two teachers in eastern Afghanistan early Saturday were only following their rules: Teachers receive a warning, then a beating, and if they continue to teach must be killed.

The new list of 30 rules, decided on during a high Taliban meeting in September or October and since circulated over the Internet, span from the organizational — no jihad equipment may be used for personal means — to the health conscious — militants are not supposed to smoke.

They also contain a grave warning for aid workers and educators.

Rule No. 24 forbids anyone to work as a teacher "under the current puppet regime, because this strengthens the system of the infidels." One rule later, No. 25, says teachers who ignore Taliban warnings will be killed.

Taliban militants early Saturday broke into a house in the eastern province of Kunar, killing a family of five, including two sisters who were teachers.

The women had been warned in a letter to quit teaching, said Gulam Ullah Wekar, the provincial education director. Their mother, grandmother and a male relative were also slain in the attack.

The two sisters brought to 20 the number of teachers killed in Taliban attacks this year, said Education Ministry spokesman Zuhur Afghan. He said 198 schools have been burned down this year, up from about 150 last year.

The 30 Taliban rules also spell out opposition to development projects from aid organizations, including clinics, roads and schools.

"If a school fails a warning to close, it must be burned. But all religious books must be secured beforehand," rule No. 26 says.

An addendum to the rules said they were distributed initially at a meeting of top Taliban leaders during Ramadan this year. The rules were signed by Mullah Omar, the fugitive Taliban leader and "the highest leader of the Islamic Emirates of Afghanistan," according to the document.

A purported Taliban spokesman, Qari Yousef Ahmadi, confirmed the authenticity of the rules. He said aid organizations were not working for the Afghan people but for the policies of occupying countries. "If they won't stop their work we will target them, like we've targeted them in the past," he said.

Mohammad Hashim Mayar, the deputy direct of ACBAR — the Agency Coordinating Body for Afghan Relief — an oversight body for almost 100 aid organizations in Afghanistan, said the rules are no surprise.

"They've been practicing this in the past," Mayar said. "We already knew when they were burning schools, when they were killing people, we said that they were against education, and they are well aware of the importance of education."

The rules confirm a Taliban policy of undermining all forms of development that benefit ordinary Afghans and seem to sanction the targeting of civilians, said Maj. Luke Knittig, a spokesman for NATO's International Security Assistance Force.

"The rules likely represent an attempt at indirect leadership by the Taliban in the face of increasingly hindered ability to lead directly and visibly," said Knittig, who said officials had no reason to doubt the authenticity of the rules, which are being circulated on various Web sites.

Other edicts focus inward on the Taliban command structure:

· No. 9: Taliban may not use jihad equipment or property for personal ends.

· No. 10: Every Talib is accountable to his superiors in matters of money spending and equipment usage.

· No. 12: A group of mujahedeen may not take in mujahedeen from another group to increase their own power.

Other rules appear focused on not having ordinary Afghans turn against the Taliban. Rule No. 16 says it is "strictly forbidden" to search houses or confiscate weapons without a commander's permission. No. 17 says militants have no right to confiscate money or possessions from civilians.

No. 18 says fighters "should refrain from smoking cigarettes."

Rule 19 says that mujahedeen may not take young boys without facial hair onto the battlefield — or into their private quarters, an attempt to stamp out the sexual abuse of young boys, a problem that is widely known in southern Afghanistan but seldom discussed.

DOJ_NMG_0104859

"The rule regarding behavior toward young boys shows this has been a problem," Knittig said.

Associated Press reporter Nimatullah Karyab in Ghwando, Afghanistan, contributed to this report.

Senate Confirms U.S. Attorney For Minnesota (AP)

AP, December 10, 2006

MINNEAPOLIS - The U.S. Senate unanimously confirmed Rachel Paulose as the U.S. Attorney for Minnesota early Saturday.

The 33-year-old Paulose, of Eagan, had been acting U.S. attorney for about nine months. President Bush nominated her for the permanent job about four months ago.

Sen. Norm Coleman, R-Minn., said in a news release that he urged the Senate Judiciary Committee to allow full a Senate vote on Paulose before the Senate adjourned early Saturday.

Paulose met Wednesday with outgoing Sen. Mark Dayton, D-Minn., and got his support. However, it appeared that the Senate session would end before it took up her confirmation.

"It would have been a shame to see such a capable, experienced nominee fail to get a chance for confirmation, and I am very excited we were able to get her nomination through the Senate before adjournment," Coleman said a news release.

The U.S. Attorney's office did not respond to messages left there Saturday.

Paulose was a federal prosecutor in Minnesota from 1999 to 2002 and then worked in private practice for the Dorsey & Whitney law firm in Minneapolis.

Before 1999, she worked in the Justice Department as an attorney general's honors program trial attorney for the Civil Rights Division.

Paulose succeeds Tom Heffelfinger. She is the youngest current U.S. attorney and Minnesota's first woman confirmed to the post.

She's also a graduate of Yale Law School and the University of Minnesota.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Poisoned By Scandal, Craving An Antidote (NYT)

By Charles Duhigg

The New York Times, December 10, 2006

NEAR midnight on a Friday in 2000, William E. Morgenstern, the chief executive of Rent-Way, one of the nation's largest rent-to-own retailers, was preparing for bed when a woman called to warn him that the company he had built from scratch was about to fall apart.

In the days before that call, Mr. Morgenstern had been scrambling to reconcile discrepancies he had discovered in Rent-Way's books. He had much at stake. Since its founding in 1981 in Erie, Pa., Rent-Way had grown into a national powerhouse by renting furniture and electronics to low-income consumers through more than 1,100 stores.

The stock price had tripled since its initial offering in 1993, making Mr. Morgenstern a Wall Street darling and propelling dozens of Erie families who had invested in the company to sudden wealth.

When he discovered the accounting problems, Mr. Morgenstern initially hoped for a quick explanation. But interviews with executives led to more questions. Then came the midnight phone call: a weeping employee told him that for three years Mr. Morgenstern's top deputies had forced her to cook Rent-Way's books.

Mr. Morgenstern then called the company's lawyer in a panic. What, he asked, should they do?

Over the following years, similar dilemmas would arise at Enron, WorldCom, Tyco and dozens of other companies. Today, hundreds of executives are anxiously discussing how hard they should look for evidence of options backdating or other accounting problems.

At companies where far lesser frauds or malfeasance emerge, executives face an even more ticklish quandary: Should they reveal everything, and then confront the hazards of bad publicity and outside investigations, or clean things up and hope that the problems will evaporate unnoticed? Rent-Way's own journey, which came to a head last month, offers a chilling lesson: Even the most virtuous decisions have unforeseen, often damaging, consequences, and full disclosure may create as many problems as it solves.

"It was the darkest moment of my life," said Mr. Morgenstern, who stepped down as Rent-Way's chief executive last year, retaining the chairman's post. "I started this company at 22 after three years of college. It represented all of my wealth. I tried to make the right decision at every juncture, but we had to pay a terrible price."

Rent-Way's board made a decision within days of detecting the fraud — Mr. Morgenstern called the Securities and Exchange Commission and revealed everything. The company would turn over documents typically protected by attorney-client privilege, he said. He then invited the S.E.C. to set up an office at Rent-Way's headquarters to conduct an on-site investigation.

"There was a stunned silence from the regulators," said one participant in the call. "Then the S.E.C. attorney said, 'Can you say that again?' "

The S.E.C. had good reason for surprise. Rent-Way's openness was unusual, especially in an era when other companies actively masked glaring frauds or covered up problems to avoid the legal and financial complications they might incur.

"There's a huge amount of pressure to fight," said Lanny J. Davis, a lawyer who has advised many besieged executives, including the HealthSouth founder Richard M. Scrushy, the former White House occupant Bill Clinton, and, for a period, Mr. Morgenstern. "If you let regulators in, you lose control of everything. Suddenly, they start exposing problems you didn't know existed. Some say the safest route is to fight and hope regulators won't be able to make their case."

Enron, WorldCom and Tyco, for instance, battled regulators and investors when accounting questions arose. More recently, during the options backdating scandals, companies such as UnitedHealth Group, Altera, CNet Networks and Affiliated Computer Services have tried to complete internal investigations before opening their books to outsiders. Such resistance is understandable, some say.

"People get scared, and that makes them crave control," said Roderick M. Hills, a former S.E.C. chairman who helped clean up fraud-damaged organizations as a director at Waste Management, Sunbeam-Oster and Drexel Burnham Lambert. "There's an instinct to hope your crimes will just slip through the cracks. When you hand everything over, it can feel like you're handing your enemies a gun."

But at Rent-Way, executives hoped that openness would contain the damage. The company had experience confronting criticism. For years, consumer advocates had attacked the rent-to-own industry as predatory, complaining that the business's rough-and-tumble practices focused on low-income, unsophisticated customers and included exorbitant fees to rent appliances.

The board fired three executives who had overseen the fraud, and hired an outside investigator. Everything was shared with regulators and investors as soon as it was compiled.

"We were committed to not letting this company be brought down by a small group of people engaged in criminal activity," said William Lerner, a Rent-Way director and former S.E.C. official. "We were determined to do everything as morally and ethically as we could."

Initially, Rent-Way's open-door strategy had little effect. When its stock began trading after the fraud was revealed, shares plummeted 75 percent within hours. Law firms began encouraging investors to file class-action suits. The company eventually issued a $127 million financial restatement — turning a cumulative $45 million profit from 1998 to 2000 into a $35 million loss.

Although the adjustment represented only 8 percent of Rent-Way's revenue and primarily involved arcana like depreciation rates, the news pushed Rent-Way's stock into a free fall. By December, just over a month after the fraud's detection, the stock price bottomed at $3.25 a share, down from more than $30 two months before.

Some board members raised the possibility of the company's declaring bankruptcy, a tack taken later by larger and more infamous companies such as WorldCom, Refco and Adelphia Communications. Others suggested selling the company to a private equity group, an option that had allowed other scandal-plagued companies to escape public scrutiny and quietly rebuild.

Those paths became more attractive as anger mounted in Erie toward Rent-Way. Walking through a local supermarket, a shopper confronted Mr. Morgenstern and shouted that he could not afford groceries because his portfolio had disappeared. Anonymous callers made threatening phone calls to Mr. Morgenstern's home. His children asked to stay home from school because teachers told them that their father was a crook, he said. Mr. Morgenstern and his wife, meanwhile, spent most of their time locked in their home, afraid to venture outside.

"Bill was a basket case," Mr. Davis said. "He ceased to have a life outside of his office. We sat down for dinner one night and he broke into tears just describing what each day was like."

EVEN so, Mr. Morgenstern fought suggestions to sell.

"Our employees had invested their entire life savings and would have been wiped out," he said in an interview. "If I ran away, I would have regretted it for the rest of my life."

And small glimmers of hope were beginning to emerge. At Rent-Way's annual convention in Las Vegas, four months after the fraud was revealed, Mr. Morgenstern appeared before thousands of employees and told them that he knew they were concerned. He knew that they read the newspapers and were worried that their paychecks would disappear. Alone on the stage, he promised that the company would survive and would emerge stronger than ever. The room erupted into cheers.

"Most of our managers aren't college graduates," said Mr. Lerner, who attended the speech. "We count on people who live paycheck to paycheck to make these stores work. So when Bill told them that everything was fine, it was like a wave of electricity moved through the room. Everybody believed in him."

Indeed, most of the company's stores were still profitable. From a revenue perspective, Rent-Way was stronger than ever. Unlike scandals at Enron and Tyco, where fraud disguised huge losses, Rent-Way's deceptions exaggerated growth. Real expansion continued after the Internet bubble popped and more consumers started renting rather than buying appliances. A year after the fraud emerged, revenue had rebounded, increasing by 10 percent.

Little of that showed up in the company's stock price, however. The taint of scandal had frightened away stockbrokers and individual investors, and institutional shareholders were leery of trusting its books.

More threatening were the company's debt woes. The fraud had caused Rent-Way to violate covenants with many lenders, requiring the company to refinance. But banks looked at the restated earnings and pending lawsuits and demanded interest rates up to six percentage points higher than the norm.

Even as revenue grew, Rent-Way had to use more and more income to pay interest. In the two years after the fraud's detection, the company paid down over $100 million in debt, leaving $215 million outstanding, but interest still consumed an amount roughly equal to 40 cents a share.

Executives hoped that the additional costs would be temporary: If the stock's price rebounded, it would allow them to erase debt more quickly by selling rising shares.

So Rent-Way executives issued glowing press releases announcing that investigations had ended and that auditors had given the company a clean bill. The board found Mr. Morgenstern innocent of any wrongdoing. The S.E.C., citing Rent-Way's cooperation, said the company would escape without sanction or fine.

The United States attorney's office in Erie, which successfully prosecuted three Rent-Way executives for criminal fraud, commended Mr. Morgenstern's openness as "a good example of how a company can alleviate" the consequences of misconduct "by fully and openly cooperating with the government."

Despite the good words from the law enforcement authorities, the financial markets continued to batter Rent-Way. Its interest payments consumed more and more cash, and the stock price refused to budge.

According to board members and advisers, some directors began wondering whether they should replace Mr. Morgenstern as chairman and chief executive. Some argued that he was responsible for allowing a culture of fraud to flourish, regardless of his lack of involvement.

They said Mr. Morgenstern — who had attended church alongside the corrupt executives — was too trusting of his deputies. Mr. Morgenstern himself often wondered aloud if his staff had mistakenly construed his relentless cheerleading about beating stock market expectations as encouragement to break the law.

A new chief executive — such as a high-profile business leader from outside — would give Rent-Way a new image, some board members said. Indeed, crisis experts say a leadership change is essential at any company where fraud is exposed.

"You have to get new people in place right away, and recruit outsiders who Wall Street respects to show that the company has changed," said Mr. Hills, the former S.E.C. chairman. "If the same faces represent the company before and after the fraud, you have to wonder how they've fixed the problem."

Many companies caught up in the current options backdating scandals have replaced senior executives, even when it has been unclear how much they knew. Leaders at Affiliated Computer Services, Altera, the Apollo Group, the Boston Communications Group, McAfee, CNet Networks, Cyberonics, Trident Microsystems and dozens of other companies have resigned in the last year, despite assertions that many were unaware backdating had occurred.

Nonetheless, Rent-Way's board, which had united to confront the crisis, ultimately could not bring itself to oust Mr. Morgenstern. "We should have recruited someone who could send a message to Wall Street," Mr. Lerner said. "We knew it at the time. But it would have hurt Bill so much, after he had put so much into saving the company. It just seemed impossibly cruel."

In 2003, when two of the Rent-Way executives responsible for the fraud were sentenced to prison, the company began selling stores to reduce its crippling debt. Almost 300 locations were sold to Rent-A-Center, its biggest rival. Rent-Way announced a $25 million settlement of lawsuits stemming from the fraud, but still the stock price did not improve.

SO, in 2004, four years after the fraud was detected, Rent-Way revealed a new strategy: the company would open one new store a week over two years. Although the plan would require more debt, executives hoped that investors would rediscover Rent-Way and treat it like a growth company deserving a higher stock price. As the stock's value increased, the company could refinance its debt at better rates.

The plan worked. Rent-Way opened 54 new stores in 2005, and income grew. The stock price began to inch higher; it would climb 18 percent in six months. Mr. Morgenstern appointed a new chief executive from within the company while retaining his position as chairman.

Then, outside forces intervened. Hurricane damage temporarily closed 25 percent of Rent-Way's stores in the Southeast. An increase in gas prices made it harder for low-income customers to spend on televisions and sofas. The overall economy began to slow, and Rent-Way's stock began to slide again.

"We were finally getting out of survival mode, and then it all came apart," said William Short, who replaced Mr. Morgenstern as the C.E.O. "If everything had held out for just one more year, the company would have survived. But because of a relatively small mistake five years earlier, we had no margin of error."

This year, despite increasing its operating revenue by more than 300 percent since the fraud was revealed, Rent-Way discreetly put out word that the company was for sale.

In November, Rent-A-Center acquired Rent-Way for $567 million, or $10.65 a share. Any investor who bought Rent-Way stock one day before the accounting fraud was announced received just 35 cents for every dollar of shares held six years later — despite the company's hauling in $2.5 billion in revenue during the same period. An investor who bought Rent-A-Center stock six years ago would have nearly doubled his money by today.

The sale, the stock losses, the damaged reputations and the shattered careers and lives, Rent-Way insiders say, can be traced to the accounting scandal despite everything that has happened since.

"We were never able to get over the taint of damaged goods," said Mr. Lerner, who said the board had a fiduciary duty to accept the 31 percent premium to its stock price that Rent-A-Center offered. "There's a real sadness over this sale."

Crisis consultants say the lessons from Rent-Way's experiences are troubling.

"This company did the right thing in letting the S.E.C. and the public know about the fraud as quickly as possible," said Ron Hartwig, a crisis communications expert now with the J. Paul Getty Trust. "But when you're besieged by lawyers and reporters and shareholders, it's easy to lose control. If executives don't appear to have a plan, if they don't seem to know all the answers, everything begins to slip away. Sometimes being honest and forthright isn't enough."

For Mr. Morgenstern, who now lives in North Carolina and is seeking new business opportunities, that has been the hardest lesson of all.

"I did everything that I thought was right, but in some ways it didn't matter," he said. "This wasn't a broken company. And when I found illegal activity, I exposed it. But that shouldn't have ended a great company. I don't know what else we should have done."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Study: Fewer Inmates On Death Row In '05 (AP)

AP, December 9, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) — Fewer prison inmates were moved to death row in 2005, according to a federal study that shows one more person was executed than in the year before.

Four states — California, Texas, Florida and Pennsylvania — held half of the 3,254 inmates awaiting execution at the end of 2005, the study by the Bureau of Justice Statistics showed. There were 37 death row inmates in federal prisons at that time.

Sixteen states executed 60 prisoners last year, one more inmate than in 2004

Overall, however, the number of inmates on death row on Dec. 31, 2005, or the number of inmates moved there during the year dipped.

Among the findings by the Justice Department agency:

·128 inmates were moved to death row in 2005, the third consecutive year with a decline in year-long totals. It was the lowest number of prisoners put on death row since 1973.

·Sixty-six fewer inmates were on death row at the end of 2005 than in 2004. That was a decrease for the fifth straight year and about a 10% drop since Dec. 31, 2000, when there were 3,601 death row prisoners nationwide.

The Justice Department data, the most recent available, confirmed similar trends over the past five years as identified by Amnesty International USA, which opposes the death penalty.

Sue Gunawardena-Vaughn, director of the group's Program to Abolish the Death Penalty, said the drop in part reflects the public's squeamishness in approving executions for people who ultimately may be found innocent.

Since 1973, when watchdog groups began keeping track, 123 death row inmates have been cleared of crimes that had earned them death sentences.

Juries "don't want to be culpable for possibly putting an innocent person to death," Gunawardena-Vaughn said.

DOJ_NMG_0104863

Moreover, because of lengthy trials and inevitable years of appeals in capital murder cases, the death penalty is expensive and "dilutes very, very crucial resources — many of which could be put toward more policing or mental health programs," she said.

As of the beginning of this month, 52 inmates have been executed so far in 2006, according to data provided by the Washington-based Death Penalty Information Center.

Thirty-eight states and the federal government allow juries to consider the death penalty in the most heinous criminal cases. All states except Nebraska allow lethal injection in executions. Inmates in Nebraska and eight other states can be electrocuted. Additionally, three states allow death by hanging, another three by firing squad and four by lethal gas.

At the end of last year, 56% of death row inmates were white and 42% were black, the Justice Department study reported. Women accounted for 2% of those people facing execution.

Witnessing Execution A Matter Of Duty, Choice (WP)

By Candace Rondeaux

The Washington Post, December 10, 2006

They couldn't take their eyes off the electric chair. They took it in piece by piece as they filed into the witness room: The leather restraints on the giant oak armrests. A long electrical cord coiling from the bottom across the slate gray death chamber floor.

The candle shop owner grabbed one of the white plastic lawn chairs in front of the plate glass window that would soon separate the living from the dead. Next to her, the social worker nervously smoothed her hair as she took a seat with a direct view of the chair. The investigator climbed the wood risers and took a seat behind them.

The clock's second hand swept over the 12. It was 9 p.m. -- time for the execution to begin.

Later, they would remember how the air in the room seemed to compress at that moment. How the electric chair seemed to dwarf everything else. How the condemned man, one of the rare few to choose electrocution, looked right through them before he died. But at that moment, all they could think was that they were about to watch a man die.

It's been 70 years since executions in the United States were open to the public. But in Virginia, there is always someone watching, turning what is for most people a distinctly private moment into a very public end. One of more than a dozen death penalty states that require ordinary citizens to witness executions, Virginia has enlisted hundreds of volunteers for the task.

They come from every corner and every quarter: A Richmond school bus driver, a South Hill bookkeeper, a Prince William County police officer, an Ashburn computer specialist, a Lynchburg brass works fabricator. All have visited the Greensville Correctional Center in Jarratt.

Candy Couch, the candle shop owner, had seen other men put to death, but they had been flat on their backs, feet facing her, arms splayed on a gurney, waiting for the needle. She rarely saw their eyes before the life drained out of them. But this man, her fourth, stared her down as he walked to the electric chair.

"He's staring at me," Couch said. "Oh my God, he's looking right at me."

For nearly 100 years, broad public support for capital punishment has helped the Virginia Department of Corrections maintain a rotating list of about 20 to 30 volunteers, although only six are required to witness each execution. Some come only once. Others repeatedly return. One man, a paint store salesman from Emporia, has seen 15 men executed.

Witnesses aren't paid. No special skills are needed. The death house doesn't require much from volunteers beyond state residency, a basic criminal background check and an ability to sum up in three lines or less on a written application why they want to watch convicted killers die. Some say it's their civic duty to watch; that it's no different than sitting on a jury or voting. Others say they're just curious to see whether death equals justice.

Couch, 36, doesn't remember what reason she gave on her application. When she first signed up, she told friends she wanted to see whether watching someone be executed is anything like in the movies. A retired sheriff's deputy, she never knew any of the men she saw executed. But when she volunteered for her first death-by-lethal-injection three years ago, she vowed she would keep going back until she saw an electrocution.

Couch snorts when she reads about defense lawyers who claim lethal injection is cruel and unusual punishment. She is not religious, but she believes in God and Old Testament eye-for-an-eye justice.

"I think they need to feel some kind of pain. I know it's horrible to say, but they did horrible things to people," Couch said.The Decision to Watch

Emily Rosson was jittery all day. A few hours before she arrived at the death chamber for Brandon Hedrick's electrocution, she had scoured her closet looking for the right outfit. She had dressed casually that day for her job as a social worker at a jail in Stafford County. At the last minute, she decided to go home and change. She thought she should wear something respectful, the kind of thing you'd wear to church or a big day at work.

"I was like, 'What the hell do you wear to someone's execution?' " said Rosson, 27.

She settled on a conservative button-down linen shirt, khaki capri pants and a pair of dressy sandals. After an hour-long road trip from her home in Glen Allen, her brief fashion crisis was long forgotten. As she pulled up to the meeting point for witnesses in Emporia, she remembered instead her father's warning about the intensity of what she was about to see. Years ago, he had visited the death house to witness an electrocution, at the time the sole method of execution in Virginia. It was, her father said, a matter of civic duty and a chance to witness history.

"I was like, 'Eeew, gross. Why would you ever want to do that?' " Rosson said. "He said, now is a good time to go because the electric chair was on the way out. Afterward, he always told me it was something I would never forget seeing."

Before she volunteered, Rosson talked it over with her husband. She had mixed feelings about the death penalty; maybe this would help her decide, she said. He said he wouldn't have the stomach for it, but he could understand why she wanted to go.

Rosson has never been a crime victim, but she's learned a lot about criminals as a jailhouse social worker. Most of the inmates are often short on intelligence and long on bad deeds -- a lot, she said, like Hedrick.

It made her "a little uneasy" when she heard that Hedrick had an IQ of 76, Rosson said. That meant that he was right on the line of being mentally retarded (and ineligible for execution). He might not know what was coming next, she said.

She felt even more unsettled when she first caught sight of the death chamber. The huge oak chair looked as big as a throne and seemed to swallow the whole room.

"It takes a lot of courage to watch people die," she said. "It's not for the weak of heart. It takes a lot of courage to actually go and keep your eyes open the whole time. I think there were some people in that room who closed their eyes."Witness With a Purpose

Steve Corbally peered impatiently out of the van window as it pulled toward the prison entrance. He tried to tune out the chatter of the other witnesses on the ride to the prison. In no mood to talk, he kept silent. He wasn't eager to tell anyone why he was there.

When Corbally had looked Hedrick's case up earlier that day, he thought there might be a chance the execution would be halted. Hedrick, 27, was convicted of the abduction, rape and killing of a young single mother, who begged for her life before Hedrick shot her with a 12-gauge shotgun.

Corbally, 47, had encountered worse cases during his two years as an investigator for the Regional Capital Defender Office in Manassas. After spending day after day chasing down alibis and witnesses that might keep his clients off death row, Corbally figured he knew a good case for clemency when he saw one.

Corbally volunteered to be a witness despite his boss's objection. A few days earlier, a Harrisonburg jury had sent a 27-year-old client of Corbally's to death row for his role in a murder-for-hire scheme. But Corbally, now a first-year law student in New Orleans, reasoned that seeing someone put to death would enable him to give future clients a first-hand account of what they might face if they're sentenced to death.

"Now I can sit them down and say: 'Let me tell you something. It is not pretty, what happens in there. If you get a chance to plead guilty and save your life, you should do it,' " Corbally said.An Execution Expert

David Bass began looking for signs of fear the moment the witnesses arrived. He had seen it many times before. Bass, a regional manager with the Virginia Department of Corrections, had escorted scores of witnesses to more than 80 executions in his 15 years as the de facto death-house tour guide.

"I spend more time watching witnesses than I do the actual executions," Bass said.

The night Hedrick, the first death row inmate to be electrocuted in the United States in more than two years, was to be executed, Bass constantly sized up his witnesses for signs of distress. A former high school math teacher, he understood well the power of group psychology and the way one little thing could set off a chain reaction. His job was to make sure nothing disrupted the process.

The July breeze was cool and light as dusk fell over the sprawling prison grounds, but Bass could feel a sticky kind of tension in the air. Normally, witnesses keep to themselves, he said. But as they lined up for the ride, they seemed to be chattier than usual.

"There seems to be more nervousness, more questions," Bass said. "I can't say what they're thinking, but there is a difference, and there is definitely electricity in the air."

Bass greeted each witness with a warm handshake. He checked their names off on his clipboard, then handed each of them a square, orange I.D. badge.

"I try to make things as low-key as possible and as casual as possible," he said. "I try to keep them talking. If you let things get real quiet, then things tend to tense up."

DOJ_NMG_0104865

Bass rattled off facts and figures with the ease of a game show host: More than 330 executions in Virginia since 1908. Virginia, second only to Texas in the number of executions since the death penalty was reinstated in 1976, lets inmates choose between the chair and lethal injection. Only three, including Hedrick, have chosen electrocution in the past decade.

Bass warned the witnesses that they might hear some shouting from other inmates as they enter the death chamber. The condemned man might drool as about 2,000 volts of electricity arced across his body. There could be a little blood. They might notice an odor of burning flesh.

The inmate's body, he explained, forms a circuit. Small sponges dipped in briny water affixed to the inmate's shaved right leg and head help ensure that the electricity flows. After the condemned man's last words, the warden inserts a key to activate the system.

"It's like turning the ignition key in your car," Bass said.'The Worst Part'

The witness room looked like a black box theater. Inside, a dozen white plastic chairs were neatly arranged on battleship-gray risers. Couch grabbed a front-row seat next to Rosson with a perfect view of the electric chair. Corbally settled into the row behind them.

A microphone in the witness room crackled to life as prison officials approached Hedrick with a hand-held tape recorder. He clenched his fists tighter until his knuckles turned white. He fixed his look hard on the people who had come to watch him die. Then his muffled voice sputtered and echoed in the tiny witness room.

"I pray for the people who believe in Jesus Christ in heaven, and I pray for the unsaved, for they know not what they do," Hedrick said. "I'm ready to go now and be free."

The brown leather hood came down over his eyes and nose. There was a dull thud as the first wave of electricity passed through his body, then another. Then came the interminable five-minute wait before a doctor verified that Hedrick was dead.

"That was the worst part," Rosson said. "We all have to sit here waiting five minutes so the man can finish dying. You think of dying as something personal, and it was just a really horrible, public and invasive way to die. I would not want to see that again."

No one in the witness room said a word as they stood to exit. The guard at the door thanked them for coming and bid them goodnight. One by one, the witnesses climbed back into the van.

Rosson heard someone in the van sobbing as it pulled away. Someone in the front asked Bass if inmates are given sedatives before the execution. Yes, he said, but it's not something corrections officials like to publicize. A man in the back, one of the death house regulars, piped up. That's not fair, he said. After all, he said, Hedrick hadn't given his victim a sedative before he shot her in the face.

Everyone fell silent.

DNA Gatherers Hit Snag: Tribes Don't Trust Them (NYT)

By Amy Harmon

The New York Times, December 10, 2006

SOUTH NAKNEK, Alaska — The National Geographic Society's multimillion-dollar research project to collect DNA from indigenous groups around the world in the hopes of reconstructing humanity's ancient migrations has come to a standstill on its home turf in North America.

Billed as the "moon shot of anthropology," the Genographic Project intends to collect 100,000 indigenous DNA samples. But for four months, the project has been on hold here as it scrambles to address questions raised by a group that oversees research involving Alaska natives.

At issue is whether scientists who need DNA from aboriginal populations to fashion a window on the past are underselling the risks to present-day donors. Geographic origin stories told by DNA can clash with long-held beliefs, threatening a world view some indigenous leaders see as vital to preserving their culture.

They argue that genetic ancestry information could also jeopardize land rights and other benefits that are based on the notion that their people have lived in a place since the beginning of time.

"What if it turns out you're really Siberian and then, oops, your health care is gone?" said Dr. David Barrett, a co-chairman of the Alaska Area Institutional Review Board, which is sponsored by the Indian Health Service, a federal agency. "Did anyone explain that to them?"

Such situations have not come up, and officials with the Genographic Project discount them as unlikely. Spencer Wells, the population geneticist who directs the project, says it is paternalistic to imply that indigenous groups need to be kept from the knowledge that genetics might offer.

"I don't think humans at their core are ostriches," Dr. Wells said. "Everyone has an interest in where they came from, and indigenous people have more of an interest in their ancestry because it is so important to them."

But indigenous leaders point to centuries of broken promises to explain why they believe their fears are not far-fetched. Scientific evidence that American Indians or other aboriginal groups came from elsewhere, they say, could undermine their moral basis for sovereignty and chip away at their collective legal claims.

"It's a benefit to science, probably," said Dr. Mic LaRoque, the Alaska board's other co-chairman and a member of the Turtle Mountain Chippewa Tribe of North Dakota. "But I'm not convinced it's a benefit to the tribes."

The pursuit of indigenous DNA is driven by a desire to shed light on questions for which the archeological evidence is scant. How did descendants of the hunter-gatherers who first left humanity's birthplace in east Africa some 65,000 years ago come to inhabit every corner of the Earth? What routes did they take? Who got where, and when?

As early humans split off in different directions, distinct mutations accumulated in the DNA of each population. Like bread crumbs, these genetic markers, passed on intact for millennia, can reveal the trail of the original pioneers. All non-Africans share a mutation that arose in the ancestors of the first people to leave the continent, for instance. But the descendants of those who headed north and lingered in the Middle East carry a different marker from those who went southeast toward Asia.

Most of the world's six billion people, however, are too far removed from wherever their ancestors originally put down roots to be useful to population geneticists. The Genographic Project is focusing on DNA from people still living in their ancestral homelands because they provide the crucial geographic link between genetic markers found today and routes traveled long ago.

In its first 18 months, the project's scientists have had considerable success, persuading more than 18,000 people in off-the-grid places like the east African island of Pemba and the Tibesti Mountains of Chad to donate their DNA. When the North American team arrived in southwestern Alaska, they found volunteers offering cheek swabs and family histories for all sorts of reasons.

The council members of the Native Village of Georgetown, for instance, thought the project could bolster a sense of cultural pride.

Glenn Fredericks, president of the Georgetown tribe, was eager for proof of an ancient unity between his people and American Indians elsewhere that might create greater political power. "They practice the same stuff, the lower-48 natives, as we do," Mr. Fredericks said. "Did we exchange people? It would be good to know."

Others said the test would finally force an acknowledgment that they were here first, undermining those who see the government as having "given" them their land.

Still others were interested in the mechanics of migration: "Were the lands all combined? Did they get here by boat?" For many nonindigenous Americans who feel disconnected from their roots, the project has also struck a chord: nearly 150,000 have scraped cells from their cheek and sent them to the society with $100 to learn what scientists know so far about how and where their individual forebears lived beyond the mists of prehistory.

By giving the broader public a way to participate, though it is likely to generate little scientific payoff, the project has created an unusual set of stakeholders with a personal interest in its success. More details, the project explains in the ancestral sketches it gives individuals, will come only with more indigenous DNA.

"I think you have to be sensitive to these cultures," said Jesse R. Sweeney, 32, a bankruptcy lawyer in Detroit who hopes the millennia-size gaps in his own ancestors' story will eventually be filled in. "But hopefully they will change their mind and contribute to the research."

Mr. Sweeney's DNA places his maternal ancestors in the Middle East about 50,000 year ago. After that, they may have gone north. Or maybe south: "This is where the genetic clues get murky and your DNA trail goes cold," read the conclusion to his test results on the project's Web site. "By working together with indigenous peoples around the globe, we are learning more about these ancient migrations."

The first large effort to collect indigenous DNA since federal financing was withdrawn from a similar proposal amid indigenous opposition in the mid-1990s, the Genographic Project has drawn quiet applause from many geneticists for resurrecting scientific ambitions that have grown more pressing. As indigenous groups intermarry and disperse at an ever-accelerating pace, many scientists believe the chance to capture human history is fast disappearing.

"Everyone else had given up," said Mark Stoneking, a professor at the Max Planck Institute for Evolutionary Anthropology. "If they get even a fraction of what they are trying for, it will be very useful."

Unlike the earlier Human Genome Diversity Project, condemned by some groups as "biocolonialism" because scientists may have profited from genetic data that could have been used to develop drugs, the Genographic Project promises to patent nothing and to avoid collecting medical information. The project has designated half the proceeds from the sale of kits to the public for programs designed to preserve traditional cultures and language.

In May, project officials held a stormy meeting in New York with the indigenous rights group Cultural Survival while protestors carried signs reading "National Geographic Sucks Indigenous Blood." Shortly after, the United Nations Permanent Forum on Indigenous Issues recommended suspending the project.

On the ground, every region has its challenges. To make scientific progress, the project's geneticists are finding they must first navigate an unfamiliar tangle of political, religious and personal misgivings.

Pierre Zalloua, the project director in the Middle East, faces suspicion that he is an emissary of an opposing camp trying to prove their lineages are not important. Himla Soodyall, the project's South African director, finds herself trying to explain to people who worship their ancestors what more her research could add. In Australia, some aboriginal groups have refused to cooperate.

But among the 10 geneticists the society has given the task of collecting 10,000 samples each by the spring of 2010, Theodore G. Schurr, the project's North American director, is in last place. Fewer than 100 vials of DNA occupy a small plastic box in his laboratory's large freezer at the University of Pennsylvania, where he is an assistant professor of anthropology. And at the request of the Alaska review board, he has sent back the 50 or so samples that he collected in Alaska to be stored in a specimen bank under its care until he can satisfy their concerns.

American Indians, Dr. Schurr says, hold the answer to one of the more notable gaps in the prehistoric migration map. Although most scientists accept that the first Americans came across the Bering Strait land bridge that connected Siberia and Alaska some 20,000 years ago, there is no proof of precisely where those travelers came from, and the route they took south once they arrived.

Comparing the DNA of large numbers of American Indians might reveal whether their ancestors were from a single founding population, and when they reached the Americas. And knowing the routes and timing of migrations within the Americas would provide a foundation for studying how people came to be so different so quickly.

But almost every federally recognized tribe in North America has declined or ignored Dr. Schurr's invitation to take part. "What the scientists are trying to prove is that we're the same as the Pilgrims except we came over several thousand years before," said Maurice Foxx, chairman of the Massachusetts Commission on Indian Affairs and a member of the Mashpee Wampanoag. "Why should we give them that openly?"

Some American Indians trace their suspicions to the experience of the Havasupai Tribe, whose members gave DNA for a diabetes study that University of Arizona researchers later used to link the tribe's ancestors to Asia. To tribe members raised to believe the Grand Canyon is humanity's birthplace, the suggestion that their own DNA says otherwise was deeply disturbing.

When Dr. Schurr was finally invited to a handful of villages in Alaska, he eagerly accepted. But by the time he reached South Naknek, a tiny native village on the Alaska Peninsula, to report his analysis of the DNA he had taken on an earlier mission, the Alaska review board had complained to his university supervisors.

The consent form all volunteers must sign, the Alaska board said, should contain greater detail about the risks, including the fact that the DNA would be stored in a database linked to tribal information.

Dr. Schurr's latest attempt at a revised form is to be reviewed this month by the board in Alaska and the by University of Pennsylvania board supervising the project.

In the meantime, his early results have surprised some of the Alaskans who gave him their DNA. In South Naknek, Lorianne Rawson, 42, found out her DNA contradicted what she had always believed. She was not descended from the Aleuts, her test results suggested, but from their one-time enemies, the Yup'ik Eskimos.

The link to the Yup'iks, Ms. Rawson said, only made her more curious. "We want them to do more research," she added, offering Dr. Schurr more relatives to be tested.

But she will have to wait.

Subpoena May Signal A Wider Corruption (ANCHDN)

By Richard Mauer

Anchorage Daily News, December 10, 2006

GRAND JURY: Head of seine group says records touch Ben Stevens, marketing board.

The director of a Juneau-based salmon fishing group said last week he has been ordered by a federal grand jury investigating Alaska corruption to turn over lobbying and consulting records involving state Senate President Ben Stevens and former congressional aide Trevor McCabe, an Anchorage lawyer.

The grand jury subpoena, issued last month, also seeks records on the Alaska Fisheries Marketing Board, a nonprofit federal-grant distribution corporation set up by Ben Stevens' father, U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens.

The executive director of the Juneau salmon group responding to the subpoena, Robert Thorstenson Jr., serves on the marketing board. Thorstenson said he and a partner, Juneau and Seattle lawyer Rob Zuanich, rent space to the board for its Juneau office.

In a telephone interview Thursday from Seattle, Thorstenson said the subpoena to Southeast Alaska Seiners Association arrived last month after he was contacted by agents from the FBI and the National Marine Fisheries Service. The subpoena said the grand jury was investigating felony crimes, Thorstenson said.

The subpoena appears to document a widening of the federal corruption investigation in Alaska, which burst into public view in August with dramatic raids of the offices of six legislators, including Ben Stevens. Agents returned to search Stevens' offices Sept. 18.

On Wednesday, a federal grand jury indicted Rep. Tom Anderson, R-Anchorage, on seven counts charging extortion, bribery, conspiracy and money laundering. The charges describe a scheme in which money was allegedly funneled to Anderson through a shell company in 2004 in exchange for actions he took as a legislator to benefit a private prison company. He pleaded not guilty Friday.

In the August legislative office searches, subpoenas and search warrants indicated the government's focus was on the relationships between legislators, oil and gas legislation, and the politically active oil field service and construction company Veco and its chairman, Bill Allen.

The material seized from Stevens in September, including documents related to the seiners association and the marketing board, suggested a widening of the probe into his lucrative fishing consulting business, though the government has not cited any specific crimes it is investigating.

Both the marketing board's creation and the seiner organization lobbying directly involve earmarks inserted into federal legislation by Ted Stevens. There is no indication that agents are investigating Ted Stevens, the senior Republican in the U.S. Senate. Stevens himself has declined to comment on the investigation.

Ben Stevens was the board's initial chairman when it was created in 2003 until he resigned April 19, and McCabe, Ted Stevens' former legislative director, has served on its board of directors also since its creation. The board has distributed millions of dollars of federal funds to fishery companies, including several that paid consulting fees to Ben Stevens. Stevens was recently fined $300 by the Alaska Public Offices Commission for failing to disclose his membership on the commission for two years.

Ben Stevens has reported receiving $775,435 from nine fishing companies and associations since he was appointed to a vacant state Senate seat in 2001. Except to describe his services as those of a business consultant, he has never publicly said what he has done for the money.

That total doesn't include money from the Southeast Seiners. The Alaska Public Offices Commission is investigating a complaint brought by former state legislator Ray Metcalfe accusing Ben Stevens of breaking disclosure law by failing to report income from the group. The matter is on the commission's Jan. 11 agenda.

WORKING ON BUYBACK

Zuanich, Thorstenson's real estate partner and Southeast Seiners' attorney, said in an e-mail to the Sitka Borough Assembly last month that the fishing group paid $56,500 over 19 months for consulting and lobbying on a buyback of commercial fishing permits for Southeast Alaska. The money was paid to Advance North LLC, an Anchorage company owned 50-50 by Ben Stevens and McCabe.

Zuanich wrote that in June 2004, the association began paying Advance North "to provide consulting and lobbying services relating to this proposed legislation" for the buyback. He told the Sitka officials that he has provided documents and sworn testimony on the matter under subpoena from the Public Offices Commission.

The Sitka assembly was evaluating an unrelated application by Zuanich and other partners for a local $350,000 economic development grant.

The Southeast salmon fleet has been devastated by low prices. In 2002, Gov. Tony Knowles declared an economic emergency and directed state government to assist Southeast fishing families. The proposed buyback was part of the effort by the fishermen themselves to increase prices by reducing the number of fishing boats on the water.

In September 2004, three months after the seiners began paying Stevens and McCabe, a federal loan program to reduce the seine fleet passed as a $20 million earmark to a Senate appropriations bill while Ted Stevens was chairman of the Appropriations Committee. When the final version of the appropriations bill passed Congress in December of that year, the buyback measure had expanded to a $50 million program.

Thorstenson said the terms of the loan program, as passed by Congress, were too unfavorable for fishermen to afford. The organization is lobbying now for a smaller total loan package coupled with a grant of about $7 million.

According to state corporation records, McCabe took over Ben Stevens' half of Advance North Oct. 1, 2005. Neither he nor Stevens has disclosed the terms of the takeover. Thorstenson said the organization contracts solely with McCabe now.

Stevens has told the public offices commission he wasn't required to disclose the amount of money he received from the fishermen because he didn't have a controlling interest in Advance North. In a ruling on a related complaint from Metcalfe in September, the commission appeared to agree with Stevens, though it had not sought records from Advance North that might indicate how control was shared by the two owners, according to commission director Brooke Miles.

Thorstenson said duties under the Advance North contract were supposed to be split, with Stevens consulting on how to arrange, manage and promote the buyback among fishermen, and McCabe, a registered congressional lobbyist, talking to Ted Stevens' staff. Thorstenson said he had no idea how the pair divided the fees.

McCabe didn't respond to e-mails or phone calls seeking comment for this story. Ben Stevens' lawyer, John Wolf of Seattle, said, "In light of the investigation currently being conducted by the U.S. attorney's office for Alaska, we are not going to comment on any subject material that might be within the scope of the investigation."

Metcalfe's complaints cited affidavits by former Southeast salmon fisherman Victor Smith, an occasional contributor to fishing journals and blogs. In one sworn statement, Smith said the fishing association clearly planned to hire Ben Stevens, not McCabe, to get the buyback. He cited conversations he had, including some that were recorded, with members and directors of the seiners group. He also said he heard Zuanich talk publicly during a 2003 meeting in Lynnwood, Wash., of the Purse Seine Vessel Owners Association, a group with many of the same members as the seiners', about using "a little convoluted accounting" to get funds to Ben Stevens. Smith is a member of the owners association and Zuanich is its director.

Smith said he met with federal agents in a Seattle hotel Nov. 13.

A CALL FROM THE FEDS

Thorstenson got the call from the FBI and the fisheries agent two days later. When he received the subpoena, he said, "I'm like, 'Wow man, I guess this is like, real.' "

Thorstenson said he was initially directed to provide the material by Dec. 1, but he won a reprieve until Jan. 9 because of the amount of material. He said he has packed 16 boxes of documents in response to the subpoena.

The government sought e-mails, board minutes, contracts, and tax and other financial records related to the buyback, Stevens, McCabe, Advance North, the fisheries marketing board and Ben Stevens' personal consulting firm, Stevens and Associates, Thorstenson said.

Thorstenson said that he doesn't believe any wrongdoing occurred and that he would defend the actions of Stevens and McCabe.

Zuanich wouldn't answer a reporter's questions, saying the APOC was the proper forum for the issue. Thorstenson said Zuanich told him he never made the statement attributed to him by Victor Smith.

Thorstenson said he never portrayed Ben Stevens as the group's lobbyist to Congress, but he can understand why some of his board members might have thought that was the arrangement. Ben Stevens is much better known than McCabe, even though McCabe, as Ted Stevens' fisheries aide, was largely responsible for one of the most significant federal fisheries bills in the last decade, the American Fisheries Act of 1998, Thorstenson said.

Thorstenson, who is also president of United Fishermen of Alaska, a coalition of several dozen fishing groups, said many fishermen were aware of Ben Stevens' consulting work on the Bering Sea Crab Effort Reduction Fund, a heavily subsidized $100 million boat buyout pushed through Congress by Ted Stevens in 2000. The program, using grants and loans, was designed to eliminate about 25 percent of the vessels in the fleet, leaving more crab for the remaining ones. The crabbers paid Ben Stevens a consulting fee of $42,500 in 2000. A spokesman for the crabbers said at the time that Ben Stevens was hired to plan the strategy for the buyout, not to lobby his father.

"With Advance North, I figured more (board members) believed in Ben. 'Ben Stevens, he'll save the day,' " Thorstenson said.

Federal authorities have said little about the ongoing investigation into corruption involving Alaska lawmakers. But some aspects are clearly known. Other aspects, including how or whether different events or parts of the investigation are connected, aren't clear.

· Summer 2004: FBI records conversations between a lobbyist working for a private prison company and another man working for the same company as they talk about making payments to Rep. Tom Anderson in exchange for actions benefiting the company. The lobbyist and Anderson didn't know it, but the other man was working as a confidential source for the FBI, according to the indictment issued last week against Anderson.

· Aug. 31, 2006: Teams of federal agents execute some 20 search warrants in Anchorage, Juneau, Wasilla, Eagle River and Girdwood, including at legislative offices and the oil services company Veco. Offices of six Alaska legislators -- 10 percent of the Legislature -- are raided. One of the warrants, released to news media by a lawmaker, seeks materials showing contact with Veco executives and documents concerning the proposed natural gas pipeline and petroleum production tax. A warrant to another lawmaker seeks information on corrections issues and an Anchorage developer. Lawmakers searched were Sens. John Cowdery, Donny Olson and Ben Stevens, and Reps. Vic Kohring, Pete Kott and Bruce Weyhrauch. Officials say the investigation is being run by the FBI and prosecutors from the U.S. Justice Department's Public Integrity Section.

· Sept. 1, 2006: Agents conduct additional searches in Anchorage and Willow, and interview current and former state lawmakers and others.

· November: Federal grand jury issues subpoena to Robert Thorstenson Jr.

· December: State Rep. Tom Anderson, who represents East Anchorage, is indicted on seven counts of corruption, including an accusation he took $12,000 in bribes. Anderson pleaded not guilty. FBI corruption investigation: a timeline

Religion For A Captive Audience, Paid For By Taxes (NYT)

By Diana B. Henriques, Andrew Lehren

The New York Times, December 10, 2006

Life was different in Unit E at the state prison outside Newton, Iowa.

The toilets and sinks — white porcelain ones, like at home — were in a separate bathroom with partitions for privacy. In many Iowa prisons, metal toilet-and-sink combinations squat beside the bunks, to be used without privacy, a few feet from cellmates.

The cells in Unit E had real wooden doors and doorknobs, with locks. More books and computers were available, and inmates were kept busy with classes, chores, music practice and discussions. There were occasional movies and events with live bands and real-world food, like pizza or sandwiches from Subway. Best of all, there were opportunities to see loved ones in an environment quieter and more intimate than the typical visiting rooms.

But the only way an inmate could qualify for this kinder mutation of prison life was to enter an intensely religious rehabilitation program and satisfy the evangelical Christians running it that he was making acceptable spiritual progress. The program — which grew from a project started in 1997 at a Texas prison with the support of George W. Bush, who was governor at the time — says on its Web site that it seeks "to 'cure' prisoners by identifying sin as the root of their problems" and showing inmates "how God can heal them permanently, if they turn from their sinful past."

One Roman Catholic inmate, Michael A. Bauer, left the program after a year, mostly because he felt the program staff and volunteers were hostile toward his faith.

"My No. 1 reason for leaving the program was that I personally felt spiritually crushed," he testified at a court hearing last year. "I just didn't feel good about where I was and what was going on."

For Robert W. Pratt, chief judge of the federal courts in the Southern District of Iowa, this all added up to an unconstitutional use of taxpayer money for religious indoctrination, as he ruled in June in a lawsuit challenging the arrangement.

The Iowa prison program is not unique. Since 2000, courts have cited more than a dozen programs for having unconstitutionally used taxpayer money to pay for religious activities or evangelism aimed at prisoners, recovering addicts, job seekers, teenagers and children.

Nevertheless, the programs are proliferating. For example, the Corrections Corporation of America, the nation's largest prison management company, with 65 facilities and 71,000 inmates under its control, is substantially expanding its religion-based curriculum and now has 22 institutions offering residential programs similar to the one in Iowa. And the federal Bureau of Prisons, which runs at least five multifaith programs at its facilities, is preparing to seek bids for a single-faith prison program as well.

Government agencies have been repeatedly cited by judges and government auditors for not doing enough to guard against taxpayer-financed evangelism. But some constitutional lawyers say new federal rules may bar the government from imposing any special requirements for how faith-based programs are audited.

And, typically, the only penalty imposed when constitutional violations are detected is the cancellation of future financing — with no requirement that money improperly used for religious purposes be repaid.

But in a move that some constitutional lawyers found surprising, Judge Pratt ordered the prison ministry in the Iowa case to repay more than $1.5 million in government money, saying the constitutional violations were serious and clearly foreseeable.

His decision has been appealed by the prison ministry to a federal appeals court and fiercely protested by the attorneys general of nine states and lawyers for a number of groups advocating greater government accommodation of religious groups. The ministry's allies in court include the Bush administration, which argued that the repayment order could derail its efforts to draw more religious groups into taxpayer-financed programs.

Officials of the Iowa program said that any anti-Catholic comments made to inmates did not reflect the program's philosophy, and are not condoned by its leadership.

Jay Hein, director of the White House Office of Faith-Based and Community Initiatives, said the Iowa decision was unfair to the ministry and reflects an "overreaching" at odds with legal developments that increasingly "show favor to religion in the public square."

And while he acknowledged the need for vigilance, he said he did not think the constitutional risks outweighed the benefits of inviting "faith-infused" ministries, like the one in Iowa, to provide government-financed services to "people of faith who seek to be served in this 'full-person' concept."

Crossing a Bright Line

Over the last two decades, legislatures, government agencies and the courts have provided religious organizations with a widening range of regulatory and tax exemptions. And in the last decade religious institutions have also been granted access to public money once denied on constitutional grounds, including historic preservation grants and emergency reconstruction funds.

In 2002, the Supreme Court ruled that public money could be used for religious instruction or indoctrination, but only when the intended beneficiaries made the choice themselves between religious and secular programs — as when parents decide whether to use tuition vouchers at religious schools or secular ones. The court emphasized the difference between such "indirect" financing, in which the money flows through beneficiaries who choose that program, and "direct" funding, where the government chooses the programs that receive money.

But even in today's more accommodating environment, constitutional scholars agree that one line between church and state has remained fairly bright: The government cannot directly finance or support religious evangelism or indoctrination. That restriction typically has not loomed large when public money goes to religious charities providing essentially secular services, like job training, after-school tutoring, child care or food banks. In such cases, the beneficiaries need not accept the charity's religious beliefs to get the secular benefits the government is financing.

The courts have taken a different view, however, when public money goes directly to groups, like the Iowa ministry, whose method of helping others is to introduce them to a specific set of religious beliefs — and whose success depends on the beneficiary accepting those core beliefs. In those cases, most of the challenged grants have been struck down as unconstitutional.

Those who see faith-based groups as exceptionally effective allies in the battle against criminal recidivism, teen pregnancy, addiction and other social ills say these cases are rare, compared with the number of programs receiving funds, and should not tarnish the concept of bringing more religious groups into publicly financed programs, so long as any direct financing is used only for secular expenses.

That concept has been embodied most prominently since 2001 in the Bush administration's Faith-Based and Community Initiative, a high-profile effort to encourage religious and community groups to participate in government programs. More than 100 cities and 33 states have established similar initiatives, according to Mr. Hein.

The basic architecture of these initiatives has so far withstood constitutional challenge, although the Supreme Court agreed on Dec. 1 to consider a case on whether taxpayers have legal standing to bring such challenges against the Bush administration's program.

Defenders of these initiatives say they are necessary to eliminate longstanding government policies that discriminated against religious groups — to provide a level playing field, as one White House study put it.

But critics say the "level playing field" argument ignores the fact that giving public money directly to ministries that aim at religious conversion poses constitutional problems that simply do not arise when the money goes elsewhere.

Converting Young People

Those constitutional problems sharpen when young people are the intended beneficiaries of these transformational ministries. In recent years, several judges have concluded that children and teenagers, like prisoners, have too few options and too little power to make the voluntary choices the Supreme Court requires when public money flows to programs involving religious instruction or indoctrination.

That was the conclusion last year of a federal judge in Michigan, in a case filed by Teen Ranch, a nonprofit Christian facility that provides residential care for troubled or abused children ages 11 to 17.

In 2003, state officials imposed a moratorium on placements of children there, primarily because of its intensively religious programming. Lawyers for the ranch went to court to challenge that moratorium.

"Teen Ranch acknowledges that it is overtly and unapologetically a Christian facility with a Christian worldview that hopes to touch and improve the lives of the youth served by encouraging their conversion to faith in Christ, or assisting them in deepening their pre-existing Christian faith," observed a United States District judge, Robert Holmes Bell, in a decision released in September 2005.

Although youngsters in state custody could not choose where to be placed, they could refuse to go to the ranch if they objected to its religious character. As a result, the ranch's lawyers argued, the state money was constitutionally permissible.

The state contended that the children in its care were "too young, vulnerable and traumatized" to make genuine choices. The ranch disputed that and added that the children had case workers and other adults to guide them. Judge Bell rejected Teen Ranch's arguments. "Regardless of whether state wards are particularly vulnerable, they are children," he wrote.

The ranch in Michigan has discontinued operations pending the outcome of its appeal, said Mitchell E. Koster, who was its chief operating officer. "We are confident that our argument will win," Mr. Koster said. "It's just a question of at what level."

In another case early last year, a federal judge struck down a federal grant in 2003 to MentorKids USA, a ministry based in Phoenix, to provide mentors for the children of prisoners. In a case filed by the Freedom From Religion Foundation in Madison, Wis., the judge noted that the exclusively Christian mentors had to regularly assess whether the young people in their care seemed "to be progressing in relationship with God." In a program newsletter offered as evidence, its director said, "Our goal is to see every young adult choose Christ."

The federal government had been clearly informed in advance of the nature of the MentorKids ministry, said John Gibson, chairman of the group's board. "The court's decision meant that there were 50 kids we could have served that we were not able to serve."

In another case, more than $1 million in federal funds went to the Alaska Christian College in Soldotna, Alaska, which says it provides "a theologically based post-secondary education" to teenage Native Americans from isolated villages. But an investigator from the Education Department who visited the school last year found a first-year curriculum "that is almost entirely religious in nature."

The Freedom From Religion Foundation sued to block the financing. The school promised to use government money only for secular expenses, and federal financing resumed last May, according to Derek Gaubatz, of the Becket Fund for Religious Liberty, which represents the college.

A number of government grants to finance sexual abstinence education have been successfully challenged. For example, the Louisiana Governor's Program on Abstinence gave federal money to several religious groups that used it for clearly unconstitutional purposes, a federal judge ruled in 2002, in a case filed by the American Civil Liberties Union.

One grant went to a theater company that toured high schools performing a skit called "Just Say Whoa." The script contained many religious references including one in which a character called Bible Guy tells teenagers in the cast: "As Christians, our bodies belong to the Lord, not to us."

The federal judge said the grants were so poorly monitored that the state missed other clear signs of unconstitutional activity — as when one Catholic diocese sent monthly reports showing that it had used federal money "to support prayer at abortion clinics, pro-life marches and pro-life rallies." Gail Dignam, director of the abstinence program, said that state contracts now emphasize more clearly that no grant money may be used for religious activities.

The Programs in Prisons

Programs like the one at the Iowa prison are a rare ray of hope for American prisoners, and governments should encourage them, their supporters say.

"We have 2.3 million Americans in prison today; 700,000 of them will get out of prison this coming year," said Mark L. Earley, a former attorney general of Virginia. Many inmates come out of prison "much more antisocial than when they came in," he added. He said he saw faith-based groups as essential partners in any effective rehabilitation efforts.

Mr. Earley is the president and chief executive of Prison Fellowship Ministries, based in Lansdowne, Va. With almost $56 million a year in revenue, the ministry oversees the InnerChange Freedom Initiative, which operates the Iowa program.

Since its birth in 1976, Prison Fellowship has been most closely associated with one of its founders, Charles W. Colson, who said in a 2002 newsletter that the InnerChange program demonstrates "that Christ changes lives, and that changing prisoners from the inside out is the only crime-prevention program that really works."

In early 2003, Americans United for Separation of Church and State joined with a group of Iowa taxpayers and inmates to challenge the InnerChange program in federal court.

In ruling on that case, Judge Pratt noted that the born-again Christian staff was the sole judge of an inmate's spiritual transformation. If an inmate did not join in the religious activities that were part of his "treatment," the staff could write up disciplinary reports, generating demerits the inmate's parole board might see. Or they could expel the inmate.

And while the program was supposedly open to all, in practice its content was "a substantial disincentive" for inmates of other faiths to join, the judge noted. Although the ministry itself does not condone hostility toward Catholics, Roman Catholic inmates heard their faith criticized by staff members and volunteers from local evangelical churches, the judge found. And Jews and Muslims in the program would have been required to participate in Christian worship services even if that deeply offended their own religious beliefs.

Mr. Earley said Judge Pratt's decision was sharply inconsistent with current law and his standard for separating secular from religious expenses was so extreme that it would disqualify almost any faith-based program. He acknowledged that inmates, whatever their own faith, are required to participate in all program activities, including worship, but he insisted that a religious conversion is not required for success. InnerChange uses biblical references only to illustrate a set of universal values, such as integrity and responsibility, and not to exclude those of other faiths, he said, adding that it was "unfortunate" if any inmates felt the program denigrated Catholicism or any other Christian faith. Corrections officials in Iowa declined to comment on the case.

Not all programs in prisons are so narrowly focused. Florida now has three prisons that offer inmates, who must ask to be housed there, more than two dozen offerings ranging from various Christian denominations to Orthodox Judaism to Scientology. But at Newton, Judge Pratt found, there were few options — and no equivalent programs — without religious indoctrination.

"The state has literally established an Evangelical Christian congregation within the walls of one of its penal institutions, giving the leaders of that congregation, i.e., InnerChange employees, authority to control the spiritual, emotional and physical lives of hundreds of Iowa inmates," Judge Pratt wrote. "There are no adequate safeguards present, nor could there be, to ensure that state funds are not being directly spent to indoctrinate Iowa inmates."

InnerChange, which has been widely praised by corrections officials and politicians, operates similar programs at prisons in Texas, Minnesota, Kansas, Arkansas and, by next spring, Missouri. Officials in those states are monitoring the Iowa case, but several said they believed their programs were sufficiently different to survive a similar challenge.

A government-financed religious education program at a county jail in Fort Worth was struck down by the Texas Supreme Court more than five years ago, and more lawsuits are pending. Corrections Corporation was among those sued last year by the Freedom From Religion Foundation, which is challenging a Christian residential program at a women's prison in Grant, N.M. The foundation has also sued the federal Bureau of Prisons over its faith-based rehabilitation programs. And Americans United, the Iowa plaintiff, and the American Civil Liberties Union have sued a job-training program run by a religious group at the Bradford County Jail near Troy, Pa.

Prison Fellowship Ministries is one of about a half-dozen Christian groups that operate programs at jails and prisons run by the Corrections Corporation. The company's lawyers are studying the Iowa decision, said a spokeswoman, Louise Grant. "But we are not, at this time, changing or altering any of our programming based on that, or any other ruling."

Inadequate Monitoring

Government agencies have been criticized repeatedly for inadequately watching these programs. Besides the criticism in various court decisions, the Government Accountability Office has twice raised questions about cloudy guidelines and inadequate safeguards against government-financed evangelism.

In its most recent audit released in June, the G.A.O., which examined faith-based organizations in four states, found that some were violating federal rules against proselytizing and that government agencies did not have adequate safeguards against such violations.

The problem is not that none of these programs are audited. Every group that gets a federal grant worth more than $500,000 has to pay a private auditor to examine its books and report to the government. Many federal programs, like those that provide Medicaid services or help the government allocate arts grants, require additional audits.

But no supplemental audits are required under the faith-based initiative — indeed, it would probably violate the Bush administration's new regulations to do so, said Robert W. Tuttle, a professor of law and religion at George Washington University and co-director of legal research, along with Ira C. Lupu, for the Roundtable on Religion and Social Welfare Policy, a project of the Rockefeller Institute.

"The rules can be read to prohibit special audit requirements because that would be considered a stigma, which would be discriminatory," Professor Tuttle said. "But that flies in the face of constitutional logic, because religion is special, and that special quality has to be reflected in program guidelines and audit rules."

The G.A.O. also says the government cannot easily or accurately track either how much money is flowing to groups or whether they are using the funds in unconstitutional ways.

The Bush administration is already studying whether these constitutional problems can be resolved by reshaping many government grants into voucher programs under which the beneficiary decides where the money goes. But vouchers are a limited solution because most social service agencies need to know that a certain amount of money is assured before they can begin operations.

Mr. Hein, the White House official, agreed that vouchers could clarify the legal landscape. But even where they are not practical, he said, the Bush administration remains committed to keeping the doors to government financing open for as many religious groups as possible.

ANTITRUST:

American Steel's Hot (BSUN)

By Allison Connolly, Sun Reporter

The Baltimore Sun, December 10, 2006

Sparrows Point and Weirton, W.Va., mills might attract bids by foreign steelmakers eager to get a foothold in the U.S. market

Five years ago, there would have been few takers for the steel plants in Sparrows Point and Weirton, W.Va.

Bethlehem Steel Corp., which owned Sparrows Point at the time and was once the largest steelmaker in the world, was in its death throes, joining the list of Rust Belt companies that buckled under the weight of high costs and fierce competition.

But if either plant goes up for sale early next year, there could be multiple bids for each. And there's a good chance the buyer won't be American.

After years of bankruptcy and rampant consolidation, American steel is suddenly hot. Foreign companies have the cash, and are looking to get a foothold in the American market, where they can charge a premium for their product.

It started with Mittal Steel Co. NV chief executive Lakshmi N. Mittal's quest to build the largest steelmaker in the world. Two years ago, he bought International Steel Group, which itself had been built on the carcasses of defunct companies, including Bethlehem's Sparrows Point complex and Weirton. This year, Netherlands-based Mittal successfully waged a hostile takeover of the world's second-largest steel company, Luxembourg-based Arcelor SA.

The combined company, Arcelor Mittal, will control 10 percent of the world's steel production, with more than 110 million tons this year. The $33.5 billion deal, which is expected to be completed in the spring, is the largest to date.

Following Mittal's lead, steel companies from Europe, Russia, South America and Asia in recent weeks have been circling U.S. companies.

"Arcelor Mittal is not an aberration, it's just the beginning," said steel analyst John Anton, with Washington-based Global Insight.

In the past, foreigners stayed away from American companies because they had higher costs and unionized work forces.

But now, after an industry shakeout, American steel companies are more efficient than ever. For example, Sparrows Point's nearly 2,500 workers produce 3 million tons of steel a year. That's more output per worker than in 1969, when 26,500 workers produced 5 million tons a year.

And, many no longer carry "legacy costs," having shed their health care and pension obligations for retirees during bankruptcy, as was the case with Bethlehem Steel.

Companies in Russia, India and Brazil have access to iron ore at home, where labor is cheaper. They want entry to the American market, where they can charge customers in the auto, construction and appliance industries a premium for finished products.

"The United States is one of the most attractive markets in the world," said steel analyst Christopher Plummer. "[Foreigners] are looking to these companies to lock in this market."

Look elsewhere They can't go as easily to China, the world's biggest consumer of steel and largest exporter, because the country prevents foreigners from taking a controlling stake in its companies.

"They've all got ambitious growth plans in their region and have gone as far as they can," Plummer said. "They need to look elsewhere."

Late last month, Luxembourg-based Evraz Group SA, the largest domestic steelmaker in Russia, signed a deal to buy Oregon Steel Mills in Portland for $2.3 billion.

Russian-owned OAO Severstal made a play for Arcelor but ultimately was beaten out by Mittal. It owns Rouge Steel in the Detroit area and is building a plant in Mississippi.

A Moscow newspaper has reported that Severstal is interested in Weirton and in Pittsburgh-based U.S. Steel Corp.

Cash offer CSN Brazil wanted Wheeling-Pittsburgh Steel Corp., but appears to have been outgunned by Chicago-based Esmark Inc., which won a proxy battle to install a board of directors that favors a merger with the American company. Esmark has said it would make a cash offer for Weirton, if the Justice Department allows Mittal to sell it.

German steelmaker Thyssen Krupp AG is still pining for Dofasco, Mittal's Canadian subsidiary. Mittal promised to sell it to ThyssenKrupp to settle U.S. Justice Department antitrust concerns about tin production in North America, if its merger with Arcelor succeeded. But a Dutch trust that controls Dofasco has blocked a deal. If that holds, the Justice Department will force Mittal to sell Sparrows Point or Weirton, and it will decide which one will be sold and to whom.

One way or the other, the German steelmaker is determined to get into the market here. It has said it will spend $2.9 billion to build two plants in the South if it is unable to buy Dofasco, though steel analyst Charles Bradford of New York City-based Bradford Research Inc. believes Thyssen Krupp may consider buying an existing steel mill because to do so is cheaper.

The company is building a mill in Brazil capable of churning out 4.4 million tons of steel annually beginning in 2008, and intends to ship the slab to North America and Europe for finishing. Sparrows Point's location on the East Coast led some to speculate that the Germans might be interested, especially after ThyssenKrupp officials toured the Sparrows Point plant in May. But the company declined to comment on it.

While just a few hundred miles apart, Sparrows Point and Weirton are quite different. Sparrows Point produces steel slabs and galvanized sheet for appliance manufacturers and the construction industry. Weirton is a niche manufacturer of tin plate for the food industry. Each has its strengths, but they probably wouldn't attract the same type of buyer, said Plummer, who as managing director of Metal Strategies Inc. in West Chester, Pa., has evaluated both plants for clients.

Sparrows Point has the biggest, most efficient blast furnace in North America, Plummer said, while Weirton has the most expensive, which is why Mittal shut it down shortly after buying the company. Unlike landlocked Weirton, the Baltimore County plant is the only integrated steel plant with ocean access, which would make it attractive for foreign companies looking to ship cheap iron ore, coal or slab for finishing. Yet it is located far from quality customers, such as automakers and appliance manufacturers, which are predominantly in the Midwest, he said.

And, Plummer said it would be a difficult decision for someone to turn Sparrows Point into a finishing mill and idle its blast furnace when it performs so well -- which is what CSN Brazil determined five years ago, he said, when that company looked at it.

"You need to make the plant lower-cost and more efficient than it was before you bought it," he said.

Plummer said both plants have failed to attract serious interest in the past 20 years, but the dynamics of the steel industry have changed. Weirton would be an attractive purchase for an investor group or an American company looking to expand its offerings to include tin, he said. Sparrows Point could be a flagship for a foreign company looking for an American portal.

In a presentation this summer, Mittal said it had identified 10 potential buyers for Weirton if the government gives the nod. It's something the workers fully support, after Mittal shut down the company's steelmaking operations and let 1,000 workers go.

"Normally when companies consolidate, there are synergies between them," said Mark Glyptis, president of the Independent Steelworkers Union, which represents workers at Weirton. "But we haven't seen any benefit to it."

Glyptis hopes a buyer will invest in the plant and bring the workers back. A former International Steel Group executive has reportedly expressed interest in Weirton, but Glyptis said he does not know if the investor, Mitchell Hecht, has had serious talks with Mittal.

Sparrows Point has fared far better under Mittal, which pits its plants against each other to compete for work and, ultimately, jobs.

Weirton lost such a competition to Sparrows Point last year. Mittal idled Weirton's blast furnace and sent the hot work to the Baltimore County plant.

Sparrows Point has been profitable, and the union avoided mass layoffs by working with management to scale back production through market downturns using voluntary layoffs.

No big investments Bethlehem spent more than $600 million to build a cold mill there and relined the huge blast furnace two years before its bankruptcy filing in 2001. But Mittal isn't likely to put significant money into Sparrows Point. General Manager Thomas Russo said this year that Mittal had no plans to make investments in the plant, other than for a couple of environmental upgrades to comply with government regulations.

Anton, the Global Insight analyst, doubts that any American steelmaker would be a buyer for the Sparrows Point plant. "People like picking up these things on the cheap, and Sparrows Point will not be cheap," he said.

Last week, Lakshmi Mittal painted a rosy picture for 2007, with strong demand and increased profit. He said prices will recover and consolidation will continue.

Unlike during Bethlehem's waning days, there is no shortage of interested investors who see the empire Mittal has built and want their own.

Target mills Bradford said he has identified 13 American companies -- mostly smaller, privately owned mills -- that are acquisition targets. And he said potential buyers include private equity firms, which believe they can pick up American steel mills cheap and make money off them, similar to what Wilbur Ross did when he bought the assets of Bethlehem Steel and sold them a year later to Mittal for a $267 million profit.

Bradford points to Claymont, Del., where a Miami-based investment group bought CitiSteel USA Inc. last year for almost $75 million. Less than three months later, H.I.G. Capital LLC paid itself back -- plus a $109 million dividend to shareholders -- by refinancing the company's debt. In August, the investor group filed to go public with the intention of paying off most of the debt.

"When you see people making money, it's going to attract a lot of interest," Bradford said.

EU Begins Antitrust Probe Of Universal-BMG Deal (AP)

By Aoife White, Associated Press

AP, December 10, 2006

NEW YORK -- EU regulators have opened an antitrust probe of Universal Music Group's plans to buy BMG Music Publishing for about $2.1 billion, saying the deal could damage "the already concentrated music publishing market."

Officials in Brussels said Friday that they would issue a final decision about whether to block or allow the deal by April 27.

BMG - owned by German media company Bertelsmann AG - has the rights to more than a million songs by recording artists such as Nelly, Maroon 5 and Coldplay, as well as classic hits by the Beach Boys, Barry Manilow and other entertainers.

Paris-based Vivendi SA's Universal Music Group is the world's largest music company. Its publishing arm controls the rights to songs by artists such as 50 Cent, Mary J. Blige and Chamillionaire.

If approved, the deal would combine the No. 3 and No. 4 music publishing catalogs, giving them a 22 percent market share and scraping ahead of current market leader EMI.

European Union approval was the last hurdle for the deal, which the Federal Trade Commission and the Justice Department in the United States cleared last month.

The EU rarely blocks deals, but it can, and often does, demand that companies under investigation sell units or make binding promises to change the way they do business.

New York-based Universal said it believed the EU would eventually bless the deal.

"We understand why, in the current environment, the European Commission has sought more time for its review," it said.

The company was referring to a July court ruling that said EU regulators were not careful enough when they cleared a 2004 deal between the music units of Sony Corp. and Bertelsmann AG. The Sony-BMG deal must now be re-examined.

Bertelsmann spokeswoman Liz Younge refused to comment.

But independent record label group Impala said its 2,500 members believed that regulators will identify more problems and refuse to clear the deal.

"These mergers are bad news for artists and music," said Martin Mills, chairman of Impala and the British record company Beggars Group.

Augusta Frets Airline Future (AJC)

By Dave Hirschman, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, December 10, 2006

A marriage of Delta Air Lines and US Airways would be a setback for Augusta, say business and civic leaders who fear putting all local airline service in the hands of a single carrier.

"Limited competition is better than no competition," said Diane Johnson, marketing director at Augusta Regional Airport. "When you have no competition, fares rise and reliability goes down the tubes."

Augusta, along with Fayetteville, Wilmington and Jacksonville, N.C.; Lynchburg, Va.; Wilmington, Del., and Florence, S.C., could go from two airlines to one if US Airways succeeds in its $8.4 billion bid to acquire Delta.

Augusta, a historic city on the South Carolina border, has five daily flights to Atlanta on a Delta regional partner and six to Charlotte on US Airways Express.

US Airways plans a 10 percent capacity cut and $1.6 billion in annual savings if it gets creditor and regulatory approval to merge the airlines, but it hasn't identified which routes, if any, will be cut. Industry officials say there would be little reason for the combined airline to operate two Southeastern hubs, however, and Charlotte flights could shrink dramatically.

Even if Augusta routes were maintained, business leaders there say the absence of competition would allow the airline to raise fares with impunity —- a move they say would push Augusta residents to drive to airports in Columbia or Atlanta.

"People like having a choice," said Cedric Johnson, chairman of the Augusta airport commission. "We want to give our citizens the broadest possible choice in air service. ... A single airline would be a step in the wrong direction."

Delta first flew to Augusta in 1934, and regional partner ASA currently flies there in 50-seat regional jets.

Continental Express began flying between Augusta and its hubs in Newark and Houston in 2003 but pulled out the next year when fares and passenger traffic fell below projections. Augusta officials have tried to recruit other airlines, but have consistently come up empty.

Charles F. "Rick" Rule, an anti-trust lawyer for US Airways, said Augusta and other cities that would be served by a combined Delta/US Airways have nothing to fear.

"These carriers intend to continue to serve all the cities they're currently serving," he said.

The number of flights and the size of the planes might change, Rule said, but passengers would still be able to conveniently reach the same destinations.

"[The airline] can rationalize networks, take out extra seats and provide the same level of service more efficiently," he said. "This transaction poses no threat to competition."

Augusta officials are in the midst of a $30 million airport terminal construction project that they say will continue regardless of an airline merger.

Columbus, Brunswick and Albany are the Georgia cities served by a single air carrier, and officials there say that, although they're glad to have airline service, the situation is hardly optimal.

"We've had as many as five airlines serving this area," said Mike Gaymon, president of the Greater Columbus Chamber of Commerce. "I don't think there's any question that competition helps."

Southern Airways flew nonstop from Columbus to Washington in the early 1970s, and Eastern and others made regular stops. But airline service was steadily pared through bankruptcies and mergers, leaving only ASA in the market.

Gaymon said having a single carrier can harm business recruitment. "When we're competing with cities that are served by multiple airlines, the frequency and reliability of air service can be crucial."

Scott McGregor, vice president of the Augusta Metro Chamber of Commerce, said local officials are considering a direct appeal to the Justice Department.

"Monopoly airline service doesn't sound like a positive to us," he said.

US Airways' Takeover Of Delta Still Up In The Air (AZDS)

By Donna Hogan

Arizona Daily Star, December 10, 2006

If Tempe-based US Airways is successful in executing its proposed $8.7 billion hostile takeover of bankrupt Delta Air Lines, it will become the largest U.S. airline and one of the biggest in the world.

It's a big "if."

Delta, first of all, doesn't want to be acquired — at least its chief executive officer and its pilots don't. Its creditors — at least the biggest ones — haven't weighed in yet.

And we haven't yet heard from U.S. regulators, US Airways shareholders and politicians, who together or separately can make or break the deal.

While US Airways Chairman Doug Parker stunned everyone from Wall Street analysts to Delta officials when he announced the proposed merger Nov. 15, the company had clearly been plotting it for some time.

Parker had already lined up financial backing and answers for all the concerns. And once the news was out, he quickly tried to line up supporters among those who have a stake, if not a say, in whether the merger happens.

There is no consensus about whether the merger could happen or should happen, but most agree on the big issues that need to be addressed: antitrust concerns; employees and jobs; financing; headquarters and air hubs; and any impact on passengers.

Easiest to tackle is the timing. Some dates already set in stone have forced US Airways to rush a process that might otherwise have taken much longer, said airline industry consultant Michael Boyd, president of The Boyd Group.

A Feb. 15 U.S. Bankruptcy Court deadline for Delta to come up with its own plan to emerge from Chapter 11 is a key factor. Delta's stated intention to do so even earlier compelled its would-be buyer to move even faster.

Parker has frequently said that the concessions a bankrupt airline gets are key to making such a merger profitable. A bankrupt carrier can dump unprofitable routes, vendor contracts and airplane orders. It can shed debts, get court-ordered employee wage and benefit concessions and trim any fat that led to unprofitablity.

Take two trimmed-down airlines and add cost efficiencies from combining administrative and overhead functions, and the whole is worth more than the sum of the parts.

It's a theory Parker proved works in his barely year-old merger of America West Airlines and US Airways, said industry expert Bob Mann, of R.W. Mann & Co.

But because Delta's bankrupt status is key, Mann said, Parker had to offer his alternative to Delta Chairman Gerald Grinstein's go-it-alone stance well before the court deadline so stakeholders could consider it. The ball is rolling.

"There will be six to eight weeks of public jousting, then everybody will go into (seclusion)," Mann said.

By mid-January, creditors should have decided on a preferred direction. Mann said that could include Delta teaming up with other suitors. They may pop up in the coming weeks, he said, but likely none would have Parker's clout.

If Parker's plan pleases creditors, the proposal goes to bankruptcy court as an option, then federal regulators get to mull it over, and US Airways shareholders vote.

DOJ_NMG_0104878

They won't need convincing, Boyd said. "They'll approve this in a New York second, because of Doug Parker's track record." Regulators won't be as hasty. The U.S. Justice Department has a big say in potential mergers, aiming to make sure no single company dominates a market enough to limit competition. In the case of an airline combo, there are two concerns — the overall control of U.S. skies and dominance in specific markets. .

Dairy Industry Crushed Innovator Who Bested Price-Control System (WP)

By Dan Morgan, Sarah Cohen, Gilbert M. Gaul

In the summer of 2003, shoppers in Southern California began getting a break on the price of milk.

A maverick dairyman named Hein Hettinga started bottling his own milk and selling it for as much as 20 cents a gallon less than the competition, exercising his right to work outside the rigid system that has controlled U.S. milk production for almost 70 years. Soon the effects were rippling through the state, helping to hold down retail prices at supermarkets and warehouse stores.

That was when a coalition of giant milk companies and dairies, along with their congressional allies, decided to crush Hettinga's initiative. For three years, the milk lobby spent millions of dollars on lobbying and campaign contributions and made deals with lawmakers, including incoming Senate Majority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.).

Last March, Congress passed a law reshaping the Western milk market and essentially ending Hettinga's experiment -- all without a single congressional hearing.

"They wanted to make sure there would be no more Heins," said Mary Keough Ledman, a dairy economist who observed the battle.

Hettinga, who ran a big business and was no political innocent, fought back with his own lobbyists and alliances with lawmakers. But he found he was no match for the dairy lobby.

"I had an awakening," the 64-year-old Dutch-born dairyman said. "It's not totally free enterprise in the United States."

Most U.S. dairy farmers work within a government system set up in the 1930s to give thousands of small dairies a guaranteed market for their milk and to even out prices for consumers. Farmers who participate in regional pools operated by the federal government or the states deliver raw milk to cooperatives or food processors. They get a guaranteed price, whether the milk ends up in a gallon jug, cheese, butter or ice cream. In Arizona and other federally regulated regions, the Agriculture Department uses a formula to set the price processors pay for raw milk, issuing "milk marketing orders."

Developed for a bygone era of small dairies and decentralized milk plants, the system lives on when 3,000-cow dairies are not uncommon and huge cooperatives and food companies dominate the business.

Business groups, fiscal conservatives and some dairy organizations have called for Congress to overhaul the complex system of protections and subsidies, which they say is costly to taxpayers and consumers. A recent USDA study acknowledged that "dairy programs raise the retail price" of milk. The watchdog group Citizens Against Government Waste estimates that the programs cost U.S. consumers at least $1.5 billion a year.

The 1937 law allowed "producer-handlers" -- dairy farmers who bottle milk from only their own cows -- to operate outside the pools. But it was risky for a farm to do this because it might end up with more milk than it could sell. Most of these outsiders were small.

Hettinga started out as a hired hand in the Dutch American dairies of Southern California, where his family emigrated after World War II. He soon figured out he could buy cows with injured hooves, then fix and sell them at a profit that exceeded his weekly paycheck.

By the early 1990s, Hettinga was working with partners and relatives and had half a dozen dairies in Arizona and California. Then he decided to build his own bottling plant in Yuma, Ariz.

His first customers were in Mexico. Later he made a deal with a chain of Arizona stores catering to the fast-growing Hispanic population. In 2002, he and his son began building a second Yuma plant to supply Costco stores in Southern California.

For Costco shoppers, it was a good deal, according to an e-mail sent last year to Reid's office by Joel Benoliel, Costco Wholesale Corp.'s senior vice president. The arrangement lowered the average price of milk "by 20 cents a gallon overnight and it stayed that way for three years," Benoliel wrote in the e-mail, made available to The Washington Post. "Milk suppliers in southern California were gouging the public on price (20 cents a gallon higher than N. California) for years and were unresponsive to our call for lower prices. It was a brazen case of price gouging and profiteering by the strongest, largest market suppliers simply because they could."

In Arizona, Hettinga was competing for retail sales against Arizona's biggest milk company, Shamrock Foods Co. of Phoenix. He "wasn't by any stretch a more cost-effective operator than we are. He just didn't have the same rules apply," said Shamrock's general manager, Michael A. Krueger.

United Dairymen of Arizona, a cooperative that handles 85 percent of the state's milk, complained that by keeping his milk outside the Arizona pool, Hettinga was affecting the USDA price-setting formula, lowering returns for other dairies.

In California, the Hettingas were taking on the two biggest players in the U.S. milk industry: Dean Foods Co., the largest processor of dairy products, with $10 billion in annual sales and five California plants, and Dairy Farmers of America, a co-op that controls nearly a third of the nation's liquid milk.

In Southern California, the co-op sells to Dean Foods, which in turn sells to retailers. As Hettinga's milk began reaching Costco stores, there was a snowball effect as other milk suppliers were forced to lower their prices, Costco's Benoliel said.

Dean Foods recently said that Hettinga was unfairly exploiting a "regulatory loophole" and that his actions led to lower milk prices for California dairies.

Hettinga's operation was "damaging to the marketplace," said Elvin Hollon, director of economic analysis for Dairy Farmers of America. "Nobody ever envisioned there would be such large handlers" outside the pool.

"So," Hollon said, "the regulations had to change."Political Education

The first challenge to Hettinga came in late 2001, when Sen. Jon Kyl (R-Ariz.) proposed a measure that would have forced Hettinga to pay in to the pool that Shamrock was governed by.

Shamrock's chairman, Norman P. McClelland, had contributed thousands of dollars to Kyl, beginning with Kyl's first House campaign, in 1986.

Hettinga fought back by printing labels saying that Kyl wanted to "limit competition and raise the cost of milk to the Arizona consumer" and putting them on 50,000 gallons of milk shipped around Arizona.

In the House, Devin Nunes, a new Republican member from California's Central Valley, introduced a bill to close what he called the "regulatory loophole" that let Hettinga ship unregulated milk into California. Nunes's district is No. 1 in milk production in the nation. Nunes and Sons dairy, located a few miles north of Tulare, was started by Nunes's grandfather and was still in the family.

In Nunes's first run for Congress, in 2002, he pulled in $130,000 from dairy interests, second only to President Bush among federal candidates, election records show.

Nunes's bill and Kyl's amendment initially went nowhere. So Kyl, a conservative Republican, found an unlikely ally in Reid, then the Senate's fiercely partisan Democratic whip.

Reid was no newcomer to dairy issues. Nevada's population was growing faster than its dairies could supply milk, so prices tended to be high. Milk plants that had to import milk from far away thought they could get it cheaper if they did not have to pay regulated prices. In 1999, Reid helped them out. He slipped an amendment into a spending bill exempting milk plants in the Las Vegas area from federal pricing rules.

David Coon, vice president of Anderson Dairy Inc., then the area's largest milk plant, hailed Reid's amendment as a "good example of the good we feel he has done fighting for our state." Reid later listed Anderson as one of 51 "soft money" donors to his Searchlight Leadership Fund, which funds Democratic candidates in Nevada.

The 1999 provision still left the Las Vegas area subject to some federal milk regulations. By 2003, fixing that had become a pressing concern as Dean Foods began construction on a $40 million, state-of-the-art milk plant outside town.

That year, Reid and Kyl saw they could make a deal. Kyl agreed to back removing all of Nevada from federal milk regulation, and Reid agreed to support legislation cracking down on Hettinga and protecting Arizona dairies from competition from low-priced Nevada milk. In 2003, the senators co-sponsored an amendment with both provisions. In effect, Nevada bottlers would get some of the same rights that were being taken away from Hettinga. Under this arrangement, the money the Yuma dairyman would save by operating outside the federal system would have to be paid in to the pool.Getting Around Lewis

In 2003, Hettinga still looked the part of a hard-working dairy farmer. He wore jeans, lunched on fried chicken and salad at the Hometown Buffet in Yuma, and seldom took a vacation. But he was no longer a little guy. He owned a private plane and kept a pilot on standby. His 16 dairies stretched from Texas to California, and his company, Sarah Farms, supplied nearly a fifth of Arizona's liquid milk.

As Kyl and Reid were putting together their deal, a milk-industry friend put Hettinga in touch with a Washington lobbyist, former representative Raymond J. McGrath (R-N.Y.). McGrath, who was president of the National Republican Club of Capitol Hill, had retained good connections in GOP circles.

During a swing through Capitol Hill with McGrath, Hettinga pitched his cause to House Appropriations Committee Chairman Jerry Lewis (R-Calif.).

Lewis's district was home to some large dairies, including a Hettinga dairy in San Jacinto. The two men had never before met or talked, according to Lewis's spokesman. But Lewis was sympathetic. "This is not right, taking a rifle shot at one individual," Hettinga recalls Lewis saying.

DOJ_NMG_0104880

A few months later, Lewis used his power to kill the Kyl-Reid measure. "Congressman Lewis did it strictly on behalf of a constituent and because he thought Hein's deal was good for consumers," said Lewis's deputy chief of staff, Jim Specht.

Hettinga said that at Lewis's request he chipped in $2,000 to the Bush-Cheney campaign later that year. He also gave $4,000 to Lewis's campaign war chest between 2003 and 2006, records show.

But the big milk producers and dairy trade groups were already at work in Washington. Through its employees and political action committee, Dean Foods, with nearly 100 plants around the country, spent more than $600,000 on political contributions in 2005 and 2006, including $5,000 to Kyl and $3,000 to Nunes. Reid got $5,000 in 2004.

Eight groups with an interest in the legislation reported overall lobbying spending of more than $5 million in 2005 and the first half of 2006. Dean Foods reported spending almost $2.5 million, including $500,000 for outside lobbyists. One was Charles M. "Chip" English Jr. of Thelen Reid & Priest. English also represented Shamrock Foods, United Dairymen of Arizona and the Dairy Institute of California.

During 2005, English fine-tuned the language in the milk bill. "My hand can be seen throughout the bill," he said in an interview. Pick a paragraph in the legislation, he said, and "either I wrote it or I commented on it."

Among others in the lobbying effort were the International Dairy Foods Association, the National Milk Producers Federation and the Western United Dairymen. Dairy Farmers of America, with members in 47 states, mobilized a grass-roots campaign for the legislation.

At every turn, Lewis's office was "barraged by calls and faxes from dairy owners," recalled Specht, Lewis's aide. "It seemed clear that all the skids had been greased for this legislation."An Angry Meeting

On the evening of Nov. 2, 2005, lawmakers and several dozen lobbyists squeezed into the conference room of Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) to seek common ground in the milk dispute. Lewis brought Hettinga and McGrath. Reid came with Anderson's Coon. Shamrock Foods' McClelland was with Kyl.

"Jerry, if it wasn't for you, we'd have taken care of this a long time ago," Reid said, according to several participants.

Lewis bridled. It seemed as if Reid was calling him a "liar," he said. If that was so, he might as well leave, he added.

Hettinga told the group how he had built his plants, arguing that the other dairy farmers "didn't pay me when I started the business, why should I start paying them when the business is successful?"

At the end, participants said, Reid was plainly exasperated. "I'm not listening to any more of this," he said. "I'm out of here."

Reid made his move on Dec. 16, with the Senate chamber nearly empty. He brought up the milk bill, which passed a few minutes later by "unanimous consent," a procedure that requires no debate or roll call vote if both political parties agree. Reid and Kyl said in recent statements that their goal was to level the playing field for milk producers.

That set the stage for a bitter battle in the House, pitting Nunes, the new California-dairy-district congressman, against Lewis, then a 14-term veteran with friends on both sides of the aisle.

Lewis used the muscle of his 66-member Appropriations Committee, the dispenser of billions of dollars a year in spending. But he faced the nearly unified front of the dairy lobby and its friends. Virginia dairy farmers had helped win the key support of Robert W. Goodlatte (R-Va.), chairman of the Agriculture Committee, convincing him that if Hettinga were brought into line, the threat "would be less likely to show up back here," said lobbyist Charles Garrison. Nunes was a protege of House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Bill Thomas (R-Calif.). And he had recently backed John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) in his successful campaign for majority leader.

In late March, Boehner placed the bill on a special docket usually reserved for uncontroversial measures such as naming post offices. Under that docket, bills require a two-thirds majority for passage. But the parliamentary procedure also meant that no one could offer an amendment to slow the bill down.

McGrath, Hettinga's lobbyist, watched the vote from the Capitol Hill Club. After Lewis came up 13 votes short and the bill passed, McGrath recalled, a large contingent of dairy lobbyists arrived, some trading high-fives. Lewis was to have had dinner at the club with his wife, but when he showed up and saw the lobbyists celebrating, he turned and left.

In an interview later, Nunes called the milk legislation a victory for "every dairy farmer in America except those who were gaming the system." He added, "People out there were making millions of dollars a year off the backs of America's dairy farmers . . . that was a wrong that was finally righted."

The next morning, lawmakers in dairy districts who voted against the dairy groups got an e-mail from a lobbyist expressing "disappointment on behalf of the members of the International Dairy Foods Association for your vote." It added: "We will be letting our member companies and their employees know of the outcome."

Hettinga vowed to keep supplying his customers in Arizona and California even though the new law required him to pay the Arizona pool what he said was a "crippling" sum of up to $400,000 a month.

"The irony is that Hein is paying his competitors," said Alfred W. Ricciardi, Hettinga's Phoenix lawyer.

Hettinga and his relatives gave nearly $20,000 to Kyl's Democratic challenger this year. Kyl won handily and got his own dairy industry support: A few weeks before Senate action on the milk bill, 11 officials of Shamrock contributed $14,800.

Hettinga also turned to the courts. In October, he filed a lawsuit charging that the milk bill was unconstitutional because it was aimed at penalizing a single individual.

"I still think this is a great country," Hettinga said. "In Mexico, they would have just shot me."

Global Warming, Local Initiatives (LAT)

By Stephanie Simon

The Los Angeles Times, December 10, 2006

BOULDER, COLO. — Frustrated with the federal response to global warming, hundreds of cities, suburbs and rural communities across the nation have taken bold steps to slash their energy consumption and reduce emissions of the pollutants that cause climate change.

This outdoorsy college town recently adopted the nation's first "climate tax" — an extra fee for electricity use, with all proceeds going to fight global warming. Seattle has imposed a new parking tax, and the mayor hopes to charge tolls on major roads in an effort to discourage driving — a leading source of greenhouse gas pollution.

Cities not typically associated with liberal causes have also jumped on board. In Fargo, N.D., Mayor Dennis Walaker swapped out every traffic-light bulb for a light-emitting diode, or LED, which uses 80% less energy. In Carmel, Ind., a suburb of Indianapolis, Mayor James Brainard is switching the entire city fleet to hybrids and vehicles that run on biofuels (made from plant products rather than petroleum).

"It's quite incredible, the number of things cities are beginning to do. It's very heartening," said Tom Kelly, who directs a national environmental group called Kyoto USA.

Boulder Mayor Mark Ruzzin says skeptics often ask why global warming must be a local priority. He responds by acknowledging the obvious: "Even if Boulder could somehow wish away all of our greenhouse gas emissions, that wouldn't be a drop in the bucket. It would be a drop within a drop."

Then he argues that the city must try anyway — if only to prove to larger communities that they, too, can reduce pollutants without spending huge sums or slowing economic growth.

"Every one of us has the ability, small as it may be, to make change," Ruzzin tells his residents, asking them to substitute a push mower for a gas mower, or at least to turn out the lights when they leave a room. "No one's going to be able to escape the responsibility."

The movement began nearly two years ago, when Seattle Mayor Greg Nickels announced that his city would strive to meet the targets of the Kyoto Protocol, an international treaty that aims to control global warming. The treaty requires industrialized nations to cut emissions of carbon dioxide and other pollutants that hover in the lower atmosphere. In what is known as a greenhouse effect, these pollutants create an invisible shield that keeps the sun's rays from dissipating. Many of the trapped rays are reflected back to Earth, raising temperatures.

Greenhouse gases are directly tied to energy use, because the process of burning fossil fuels emits carbon dioxide. So any measures to conserve energy can indirectly cut greenhouse emissions.

Planting trees can also help, because they absorb carbon dioxide — and several cities have launched campaigns to take advantage of that fact. Denver, for instance, plans to plant an average of 140 trees a day for the next 20 years, while Los Angeles is replacing its famed fan palms with more leafy sycamores and oaks. Chicago encourages the planting of lush rooftop gardens, which have the added effect of cooling buildings, reducing the need for air conditioning.

Fargo acts on climate change more directly by trapping the methane that normally wafts out of its landfill as a byproduct of rotting garbage. The methane — a potent greenhouse gas — is then sold to a soybean processing plant, which uses it in its boilers.

"All these cities are like little laboratories, experimenting with what works. Then we learn from each other," Brainard said.

President Bush rejected the goals of the Kyoto treaty soon after he took office, calling it ineffective and unfair because developing countries such as China and India are exempt. He also argued that it would be enormously expensive for the U.S. to comply.

Determined to prove him wrong, Nickels challenged his fellow mayors to adopt Kyoto's targets at the local level. He has received more than 330 pledges from mayors representing 54 million people. All have vowed to reduce their cities' emissions below 1990 levels within the next several years.

The nation's biggest urban areas have made the pledge: Los Angeles, San Francisco, New York, Miami, Dallas, Denver. So have Turtle River, Minn. (population 79) and North Pole, Alaska (population 1,778).

Meridian, Miss., where nearly 30% of residents live in poverty, has signed on to the Kyoto goals. So have Sugar Land, Texas; Dubuque, Iowa; and Norman, Okla. Scores of blue-state coastal cities are on the list, including Berkeley and Cambridge, Mass. The industrial Rust Belt town of Gary, Ind., is also taking part.

Some of the cities that made the pledge have since lost interest. Topeka, Kan., is on the list, but that's because a former mayor signed up. The current mayor, Bill Bunten, has other priorities: "Our environmental problems in this city are just trying to make it clean and attractive."

But enough cities remain active in the program that the U.S. Conference of Mayors this fall hosted a climate summit. Also this fall, actor Robert Redford invited several dozen mayors to his ranch in Sundance, Utah, to talk global warming. There's even a new website — http://www.coolmayors.org — where city officials can exchange policy ideas.

The 70 cities that reported statistics last year reduced carbon dioxide emissions by an aggregate total of 23 million tons. That's not a huge sum considering that the U.S. would have to eliminate more than 1.6 billion tons to meet the Kyoto targets.

But those working on the issue expect the numbers to pick up dramatically in the coming years. More than 100 mayors have found the reforms so painless that they've set far more ambitious targets than those laid out in Kyoto, according to Michelle Wyman, executive director of ICLEI, a nonprofit working with local governments on climate change.

Governors, too, are joining the effort. At least 20 states, including California, have laws requiring a certain percentage of electrical power to come from solar, wind and other renewable sources. Just last week, former Vice President Al Gore announced a grass-roots campaign to encourage communities to hold emissions of greenhouse gases at their current levels rather than let them rise year after year as energy consumption increases.

Here in Boulder, even a skeptical Chamber of Commerce decided to back the climate tax, reasoning it would give the city's image a boost and attract progressive businesses. The tax, which will cost the average homeowner less than $2 a month, won approval in November from 59% of voters. City officials will use the money for conservation education, including subsidized energy audits.

On a recent morning, Kathie Joyner opened her modest bungalow to just such an audit. Inspector Michael Broussard prowled every cranny, looking for drafts, leaks and wasted energy.

Broussard, who runs a private company that contracts with a local nonprofit for the audits, urged Joyner to add weather stripping here and caulking there, to insulate her water pipes and consider a fiberglass front door instead of wood. He even suggested she trade in her desktop computer for a more energy-efficient laptop.

If Joyner implements every suggestion — which could cost her $4,000 — Broussard said her utility bills should drop by at least a third and she would reduce emissions of greenhouse gases by 9,000 pounds a year.

Taking careful notes, Joyner promised to get to work. "I used to think it would be a drop in the bucket; what could it possibly mean?" she said. "But there are lots of local governments taking steps to make a difference. It pushes the country along."

Mr. Inhofe's Last Hearing (WP)

THE LAST hearing on global climate change chaired by Sen. James M. Inhofe provided an excellent and public tutorial on why Americans should be grateful that it was, in fact, his last. The departing chairman of the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee has occupied a unique perch from which to take action on climate change. Instead, he has used his time at the committee's helm to cast spurious doubts on the problem even as the scientific consensus about its reality and severity has gelled. Last week, the Oklahoma Republican held a hearing to denounce the real villain in the debate: the media.

The press, it was claimed, has hyped climate change hysterically. It has ignored dissenting scientific voices. And it has sought to advocate for climate-change policy, instead of just reporting on the science. And this is the grave national problem -- not rising sea levels, melting ice caps, loss of habitats or shifts in oceanic currents -- that warrants the attention of the senator's committee.

Mr. Inhofe's complaints are meritless. If anything, media coverage of global warming has tended toward excessive caution. Scientific alarm at the concentration of greenhouse gases predates the current media attention to the subject. Many media organizations, in a quest for balance, have given climate-change skeptics far more ink and air time than justified by the support their position carries among reputable climatologists. But even debating the merits of Mr. Inhofe's charge acquiesces to changing the subject -- which all along should have been how to craft reasonable policy to reduce greenhouse emissions.

Democratic leadership on this issue should bring a welcome change. While some Republicans support strong action on climate change, they have been stymied by the White House and by congressional leadership that has insisted on debating basic science that is no longer the subject of serious dispute. It's a little like debating the future of the space program by holding hearings on whether the earth is actually round. It's long past time to move on to something useful.

IMMIGRATION:

Towns Struggling With Flow Of Illegals (NSL)

By Brian Donohue, Star-Ledger Staff

Newark Star-Ledger (NJ), December 10, 2006

Laws are often challenged, and defeated in the courts

With Congress deadlocked over how to handle illegal immigration, a growing number of towns and cities are taking matters into their own hands, using local laws to crack down on the problems associated with a massive underground population.

In New Jersey, some towns have toughened traffic laws to deter contractors from picking up day laborers on city streets. Others have tried to ban workers from gathering on street corners to wait for work. Several have launched housing code crackdowns to combat overcrowding. One has banned illegal immigrants from renting apartments altogether.

And few, if any, are having much success.

In a growing number of towns, local crackdowns are faltering amid court challenges, political opposition or other hurdles.

Consider:

The Borough of Bound Brook launched a series of housing raids to address rampant overcrowding in homes rented mostly by Latino immigrants in the late 1990s. But the U.S. Justice Department sued the town for illegally targeting Hispanics, resulting in a 2004 consent decree requiring the town to repay victims $425,000, hire a bilingual housing coordinator and make dramatic changes to its housing and zoning practices.

Freehold Borough's housing crackdown and an effort to shut down a day laborer gathering area were challenged in a lawsuit filed by immigrant rights groups. In a settlement last month, the borough agreed to pay $278,000, change its housing inspection procedures and allow laborers to gather on public property.

In July, the Township of Riverside in Burlington County passed a law fining employers and landlords who hire or rent apartments to illegal immigrants. In local elections last month, the Republican mayor and council member who pushed the measure were swept from office. With legal fees mounting from a pair of lawsuits challenging the law, Mayor Charles Hilton -- the man who proposed the law -- is calling for its repeal.

The trend has left local officials increasingly frustrated as they attempt to address complaints from residents about problems like "stacking" -- the housing of more people in a dwelling than is allowed by law.

"There's such a high level of frustration, and there's a reaction, if not an overreaction by officials based on that frustration," said Christopher Cotter, city administrator of the City of Summit, which toughened parking rules to keep contractors from blocking streets as they pick up day laborers.

"I think elected officials are being pressed by constituents just do something, do anything, and we're seeing the result of that in some cases," Cotter said.

The legal troubles encountered by some towns have convinced several municipalities that had been considering their own crackdowns to back off.

In both Newton and Keyport, for example, officials introduced ordinances similar to Riverside's housing and hiring ban to their governing bodies, but did not pass them.

The trend has emboldened immigrant advocates, who say towns must try a more cooperative approach, such as setting up designated hiring sites for day laborers, or programs to educate tenants on housing laws.

"When little towns try to take federal law in their hands, they fail," said Mahonrry Hidalgo, chairman of the NJ Hispanic Leadership Alliance Immigrant Committee. "So now everybody needs to try and change their approach to the solution and accept that we have to work together as one community."

Muzaffar Chishti, director of the Migration Policy Institute at the New York University School of Law, is tracking the efforts by a growing number of towns across the country to pass laws banning the hiring and housing of illegals, like the one passed by Riverside.

Of the 49 towns and cities where such ordinances were introduced, he said, 28 passed and 21 were defeated. Many of the 21 towns that passed the laws, including Riverside, are now facing lawsuits by civil rights groups.

In addition, efforts to combat immigration problems with traffic, housing or loitering laws have consistently failed when challenged in court, he said. Most efforts die for one of two reasons: They are either ruled unconstitutional, or judges rule that immigration enforcement is solely the job of the federal government.

"Populist as they are, they are highly suspect legally," Chishti said of such measures.

Steve Camarota, Director of Research at the Center for Immigration Studies, a Washington, D.C., think tank calling for lower immigration levels, says local communities have been "left holding the bag" by the government's failure to enforce immigration laws.

When they try to use local laws to combat immigration problems, he said, they square off against civil rights and immigrant advocate groups that are better prepared, and often better funded, than attorneys hired by small towns.

"There's a whole cottage industry of people, from the ACLU to MALDEF (the Mexican American Legal Defense and Education Fund (MALDEF) whose sole purpose, as part of their day job, is to intimidate anyone who wants to enforce immigration laws," Camarota said.

As Bound Brook learned, the U.S. Department of Justice can also present challenges.

While the town has strictly followed the rules laid out in its consent decree, Mayor Frank Ryan says the town still has problems with overcrowding. He remains frustrated that federal officials who sued the town gave little credence to the problems caused by an influx of immigrants, many of them illegal.

In one house, Ryan said, a couple were living in an attic on a mattress, using candles for light.

"The people from the Justice Department didn't see that," he said. "You get criticized for going after people this way, but what would happen if you had a fire and you had 12 people burned to death? You would get criticized for not inspecting these places."

There are an estimated 11 million to 12 million illegal immigrants living in the United States, with as many as 425,000 living in New Jersey, according to a recent study by the Pew Hispanic Center.

Competing immigration reform bills have stalled in both houses of Congress.

A bipartisan measure passed by the Senate would combine a new guest worker program with tougher enforcement of immigration laws. A Republican-sponsored bill passed by the House of Representatives includes only tougher enforcement provisions.

Both immigrant advocates and restrictionists agree the struggles of towns to tackle the problem on their own make it all the more urgent for Congress to deal with the issue.

"Good, bad or indifferent, local towns can't enforce federal immigration law," Chishti said. "The most they can do is put political pressure on Congress to make the change happen."

Long Hours, Low Pay In Mexico Heightens Lure Of Opportunity In U.S. (AR)

By Chris Hawley

The Arizona Republic, December 10, 2006

Reynaldo Patiño makes $18 a day.

It's a normal wage for Mexico. And that is exactly the problem.

Patiño gets up at 5 a.m. in a one-room shack in a poor suburb where he lives with his wife, daughter and niece. He works 11 hours a day cooking corn tortillas at a shop in central Mexico City. He gets home at 8 p.m.

The next morning, he does it all over again. Six days a week. No vacations. Ever.

Patiño has no health insurance and no car. After paying for rent, food, utilities and bus fare, he is lucky to have a few dollars left.

Welcome to a typical life in Mexico: a world of long hours, low pay and prices that are much higher than in the United States. It is those economic pressures that drive Mexicans to the United States and that lie at the heart of the illegal immigration problem.

Mexicans do not come to the United States because they can't find jobs at home. In fact, unemployment in Mexico is currently lower than in the United States, at about 3.6 percent. Some 95 percent of newly arrived Mexican migrants had jobs before they came to the United States, according to a 2005 survey by the Pew Hispanic Center.

But in Mexico, having a job does not necessarily mean being paid well or even being paid well enough to make ends meet.

The average Mexican household earns $7,297 a year in wages, according to the government.

But because 39 percent of Mexico's wealth is concentrated in 10 percent of the population, most people actually earn less than the national average. In fact, 82 percent of Mexicans earn less than $21 per workday. Just like Patiño.

The working poor

Until the sun comes up, the view from Patiño's neighborhood is magical. From his house, the lights of the valley sparkle between rugged hills left by ancient volcanoes. To the south, the world's second-biggest metropolis, Mexico City, radiates an orange light across the night sky.

Then dawn breaks, and the neighborhood is revealed for what it is: a gritty expanse of unpainted, cinder-block huts covering the countryside like a gray tide. Stray dogs wander the dirt streets, eating garbage. A high-tension electrical line above the neighborhood makes a loud, menacing buzz all day long.

Patiño's house is one room. He pays $59 a month in rent. He and his wife, María de los Angeles Piña, sleep in a twin bed. Their 8-year-old daughter, Ana Laura, shares a single bed with their 16-year-old niece, Abigail. There are two bare light bulbs.

The room's only luxuries are a television, a stereo, a collection of cheap animal figurines and a plastic Christmas tree. The floor and walls are bare concrete, and there is no heater to fight the 40-degree chill on December nights.

"I would like to live in a better house, maybe have a bit of luxury," Patiño said. "But we don't have the money."

Patiño is typical of Mexico's vast population of working poor. He lives in the Mexico City area, home to one of every five Mexicans. He has a wife and one daughter, a reflection of Mexico's trend toward smaller families.

He earns $5,672 a year, one-seventh the income of an average American household. At the same time, however, he and his family are paying close to U.S. prices for many necessities. Milk costs around $3.30 a gallon in most parts of Mexico, and regular unleaded gasoline is $2.32 a gallon.

Electricity is twice as expensive as in the United States. Electronics are 30 percent more expensive, one study found. Even mailing a letter is more, at 59 cents.

Keep costs down

Most Mexicans live much more simply than their American neighbors. They eat out less, rely on staple foods and live in small houses. But even with the cost-cutting, Mexicans spend a bigger percentage of their wages than Americans do to feed, clothe and house their families: about 66 percent.

Pressures like that are what drive Mexicans to the United States, where they can earn seven or eight times as much for performing similar work.

Patiño's older brother did just that a year ago, abandoning the tortilla shop for a new life in Los Angeles. Patiño has not followed him. But, he says, the idea is tempting.

"I've thought about it," he said. "I've thought about it a lot."

The daily, costly grind

At 5:30 a.m., Patiño and his niece catch the first of two buses for the 90-minute commute into the city. The second bus is a rolling sardine can, with commuters packed so tight it is hard to move.

By 7 a.m., Patiño is firing up the tortilla machine at the Lisboa Tortilla Shop in downtown Mexico City. He started working there at age 15. That was 12 years ago; he is now the manager. His sister-in-law, Patricia Piña, also works at the shop. She mixes cornmeal with water and a bit of lime powder and begins feeding the dough into the squeaking, rattling machine.

Corn tortillas are the staple food in central Mexico, as common as bread is to Americans. Soon customers are lining up at the door, and orders are streaming in from restaurants and taco stands. A steaming tortilla pops off the conveyor belt every second. It is hot, exhausting work.

No time for lunch

When Patiño isn't snatching tortillas from the machine, he is answering the phone, weighing out purchases or delivering orders by bicycle. There is no time for a lunch break. Instead, the three workers share two large meatballs heated up on the tortilla machine.

Patiño gets paid in cash every Saturday by the shop's owner. He does not pay income taxes.

For each 11-hour workday, he earns 200 pesos, or $18. That equates to $1.64 an hour. Patiño has to work an hour and a half just to cover his $2.45 bus fare.

The low wages and high cost of living in Mexico have fueled angry protests and become a rallying point for opposition lawmakers in the wake of the July 2 presidential election.

Last month, protesters demonstrated outside the Economy Department after officials raised the cost of government-subsidized milk by 29 percent and the cost of gasoline by 4 percent.

Mexico City was considering a 50 percent rise in subway fares but quickly abandoned the idea following a public outcry.

During a rally in downtown Mexico City, the opposition Democratic Revolutionary Party issued a study showing that Mexicans pay more than Americans for everything from credit cards to cable TV.

Consider electricity: The average Arizona family used 1,034 kilowatt-hours a month last year and paid a monthly bill of $91.94, according to the U.S. Department of Energy. The same usage in central Mexico would cost $187.01.

Fed up with the high rates, millions of Mexicans opt to steal electricity with clandestine lines known as diablitos, or "little devils." The theft drives rates even higher.

Inflation factor

Mexico's inflation rate is lower than it has been in years, at about 4 percent. But the yearly increases add up. Housing expenses increased more than 20 percent, health care expenses went up 19 percent and clothing costs rose 12 percent between 2000 and 2005, according to Mexico's census bureau.

Educational expenses, especially, are a major burden for many Mexicans.

Schools in Mexico provide free textbooks only through junior high. There is an annual enrollment fee and often another fee to cover janitorial costs. Uniforms are mandatory, there are no free school buses, and school supplies are about the same price as in the United States.

Zeroed out

It is Saturday morning, and María, Reynaldo Patiño's wife, is making her daily walk to the market. The air is filled with techno music and the smell of fresh produce as she and her daughter thread their way past vendors selling a variety of wares, from pirated CDs to cups of Jell-O.

María winces and holds her abdomen as she steps off a curb. A few days ago, she had some minor surgery. The operation cost 2,800 pesos, or about $250.

Like 40 percent of Mexicans, the family lacks health insurance. So Reynaldo had to ask his boss for a loan.

María stops at the butcher's counter and checks the prices. Ground beef is selling for $2.06 a pound, slightly more than Phoenix shoppers pay at Safeway. María orders 2 pounds of suadero, or breastbone meat, for $1.65 a pound.

Then she picks up a pound of green tomatoes, a half-pound of chiles and heads home.

María spends about $10 a day, half of Reynaldo's pay, on food for the family. She also buys at least one 2-liter bottle of Coca-Cola at $1.36. Like many Mexican families in poor areas, the Patiños drink soda instead of water because local water supplies are unsafe.

After paying for gas, electricity, school supplies, bus fare and other necessities, little money remains. The family has no bank account and no savings. "At the end of the day, there's usually nothing left," María said. "We're zeroed out."

How Green Was My Rally (NYT)

By Lawrence Downes

The New York Times, December 10, 2006

To roars and applause and whistles so loud and shrill they stabbed the ears even more than his double-bagpipe escort, Senator Charles Schumer swept into the packed church auditorium, levitating on a cloud of affection. For another entrance as grand, you'd probably have to go back to Groucho Marx in "Animal Crackers," borne in on a litter by bare-chested natives and multiple choruses of "Hooray for Captain Spaulding."

This happy moment was a rally by Irish immigrants the other night at St. Barnabas Church in the Woodlawn section of the Bronx. Mr. Schumer wore a green tie and that grin of his, so wide you could drive on it from Galway to Dublin. He was there to announce the miraculous rebirth of immigration reform, courtesy of the new Democratic Congress. But first he did what politicians always do before a throng of happy Hibernians. After a few courteous preliminaries and a line from St. Matthew's Gospel, he committed Irish identity theft.

"My sister's name," he let slip in a lusty roar, "is Fran ... Schumer ... McNULTY!"

Cheers and more cheers.

"Up Mayo!" the senator cried. "Up Leitrim!"

He was just getting started. He introduced an aide, the one who named his daughters Siobhan, Fiona, Maeve and Nora. The love spilled over, like foam on a Guinness.

"The more Irish there are in America, the better we all are!" Mr. Schumer declared, repeating a line he had caught some flak about a few months before. Some non-Irish immigrants had grumbled about how unlikely it would be to hear another group's name tucked into that equation. They had a point about ethnic favoritism, though Mr. Schumer, who sweet-talks everybody, was perhaps not the best example of it.

Mr. Schumer's final bit of stagecraft was in Gaelic. "Tiocfaidh ar la!" he bellowed. It means "our day will come" and is pronounced, to the senator's evident gratitude, "Chucky-AR-LA." With that he tied the ribbon on the gift wrap of his speech. The wave of cheers crested and fell, and Mr. Schumer departed into the windy night.

It's now a regular thing for big-ticket politicians to go to Woodlawn, where the Irish pubs and delis have been struggling as people go back home to ride the Celtic Tiger, as Ireland's resurgent economy is known. With Irish-American neighborhoods in decline, Irish illegal immigrants have rallied urgently to the cause of friendlier immigration laws. They are a drop of 50,000 in a bucket of 12 million illegal immigrants, but as Mr. Schumer's special blessing showed, they command attention.

He is far from the only politician to be drawn to the white, English-speaking sliver of the immigration problem. That fondness for Irish audiences helps reinforce the odd sense of solipsism surrounding the Irish immigrant lobby. When you hear the chairman of the Irish Lobby for Immigration Reform, Niall O'Dowd, vow to fight "to get what is rightfully ours" — more visas for the Irish — you can't help wondering how quickly such words would get a Latino banished to the militant fringe.

"We Are America" is the Latinos' and Asians' cry. The well-organized Irish don't feel the need to say that. Their slogan, on T-shirts and the Irish Lobby's Web site, is blunt: "Legalize the Irish."

The Irish have a just cause, but I only wish they and their many friends would preach the gospel of immigration reform in a bigger tent. It is, after all, every immigrant group's fate to start out in this country unloved, as the Irish are only too eager to remind us.

TAX:

Praise For The Tax Man (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, December 10, 2006

IT'S ALMOST A no-brainer. State number-crunchers are going to go over your tax return anyway, calculating whether you sent in too much or too little. What if they did their figuring beforehand and sent you a return already completed except for your signature? If you don't like what they came up with, or you don't trust them, you can throw it out and file the old-fashioned way, no questions asked.

But if you have relatively simple finances and the state's calculation looks right to you, you could take advantage of ReadyReturn, a service of the Franchise Tax Board. You still have to pay your taxes, but you can file in less time and with fewer headaches. You can even do the job by e-mail.

Imagine: the government using technology to lighten the burden on taxpayers. That's one program everyone can get behind.

OK, not everyone. The Legislature killed the pilot program this year after intense pressure from Intuit Inc., maker of TurboTax, and other companies selling tax-preparation software and services. Thanks to them, there will be no ReadyReturn for the 2006 tax year. The companies followed up their victory by spending $1 million trying to defeat John Chiang, who supported ReadyReturn as a member of the Board of Equalization, in his campaign for state controller.

Fortunately, they failed, and Chiang on Monday joined with other members of the Franchise Tax Board to revive ReadyReturn for the 2007 tax year. Now it's up to the Legislature to do, well, nothing. This is a case in which lawmakers should stay out of the way while bureaucrats make life a tiny bit easier for taxpayers.

The arguments for blocking the program are bizarre. According to opponents, the enhanced state service unfairly competes with private businesses, which apparently favor a more burdensome and complex government in order to fatten the market for services that will help residents cut through all that complexity. What's next: Stop the DMV from renewing car registration on the Internet so entrepreneurs can make a living standing in line for drivers? Add more red tape to the permitting process to keep the lawyers and professional facilitators happy?

Come on. Market solutions are always worth considering, but it's the government's job to bill taxpayers. Filing returns is a taxpayer's burden, although a necessary one, and government's all-too-rare efforts to minimize that burden are welcome. ReadyReturn is a step in the right direction.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Leahy Relishing Rise To Power (RUTHER)

By Darren M. Allen, Vermont Press Bureau

Rutland (VT) Herald, December 10, 2006

MONTPELIER – Sen. Patrick Leahy is about to begin his 33rd year as the only Democrat to represent Vermont in the U.S. Senate, but it might as well be his first.

Even after a long day in the halls of Congress, Leahy couldn't contain his excitement over returning to work in a chamber dominated, for the fourth time in his career, by his party.

"I see the Senate getting back to where it's supposed to be – the conscience of the nation," Leahy said in a phone interview. "The nation has not been helped by being a rubber stamp."

Leahy, other Democrats and some stalwarts of the GOP have accused the Republican-controlled 109th Congress of being a rubber stamp for the president's agenda, ultimately allowing Bush to run afoul of the Constitution with impunity.

But even under these circumstances, the Vermont senator has commanded power and attention. And that's due in part to his longevity in office. Leahy, a former Chittenden County prosecutor, won the 1974 election at age 34 and became the youngest Vermonter and the only mem-ber of his party ever elected to the U.S. Senate. Over the years, he has been a member of the minority periodically, from 1981 to 1987, again from 1995 to 2001, then from 2003 until last week.

Leahy is seventh on the Senate's seniority list, and he is considered to be among the top 10 most influential people on Capitol Hill.

And he's about to become more powerful. When Congress meets next month, Leahy will – for the second time – become chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, where he will control the flow and tenor of hearings over matters ranging from federal judicial appointments to oversight of the FBI and the Justice Department.

He also will become chairman of the foreign operations subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee, a post from which he will have significant oversight over a slew of controversial national security issues.

And, in a committee assignment of particular interest to Vermonters, he will be the No. 2 Democrat on the Agriculture Committee, where he will be able to look out for the state's farmers, as well as steer conservation measures.

Through the appropriations and agriculture assignments, Leahy will continue to direct millions of dollars of federal money and contracts back home, as he has now for more than a decade.

And while serving his state's financial interests is a key component of the work Leahy – or any senator for that matter – does, it is his self-described role as overseer of the nation's civil liberties that he's most excited about.

Leahy hasn't officially laid out his agenda for the next two years, but anyone paying attention to last week's Judiciary Committee hearing on FBI oversight would be hard pressed to have missed where the senator is going.

"The recent revelation that the Bush administration, since 9/11, has been compiling secret dossiers on millions of unwitting, law-abiding Americans who travel across our borders, highlights the importance of congressional oversight," he said. "It is simply incredible that the administration is willing to share this sensitive information with foreign governments and even private employers, while refusing to allow U.S. citizens to see or challenge the so-called terror score that the government has assigned them based on their travel habits and schedules.

"This administration has gone to unprecedented lengths to hide its own activities from the public, while at the same time collecting and compiling unprecedented amounts of information about every citizen."

In a phone interview a day after the hearing, Leahy also said he had serious concerns about domestic eavesdropping, the interrogation of detainees and other "national security" activities conducted by the Bush administration.

"How far is this going to go?" Leahy said. "How many more ways are we going to be cross-checked? J. Edgar Hoover would be salivating to have this kind of power," he added, referring to the longtime former FBI director who compiled vast stores of information on millions of Americans.

"But none of this – none of this – is making us safer."

Leahy does not take national security lightly, but he said to force Americans to choose security over the loss of civil liberties is a false and unnecessary choice.

His position is shared by the American Civil Liberties Union.

"Leahy has been probably about the strongest voice for civil liberties in the Senate for a number of years, although that voice was certainly muted during the time the Democrats were the minority party in Congress," said Allen Gilbert, the executive director of the ACLU's Vermont office. "I think that Senator Leahy is different from a lot of civil liberties activists in Congress because he understands that protecting civil liberties leads to better government and better security for citizens.

"It's not always comfortable and it's not always convenient and it's not always popular, but Leahy gets it. He knows that civil liberties are not just window dressing or something nice to talk about on national holidays."

Not everyone agrees that the nation's recently instituted security measures violate civil liberties – the rights of privacy, equality, due process and, fundamentally, to be left alone. The president has defended his record on terrorism, and many conservative commentators have suggested that the additional measures employed by the administration have lead to a greater degree of safety.

"Since the Sept. 11 attacks, America is safer, but we are not yet safe," the president's National Strategy for Combating Terrorism concluded. "We have done much to degrade Al Qaida and its affiliates. …We have transformed our governmental institutions and framework to wage a generational struggle."

It is that institutional transformation that concerns Leahy. In short, he said, allowing a president of any party to do whatever he or she pleases with the consent of Congress is dangerous.

"We are in serious danger of becoming a government of men and not of laws," Leahy said. "And that is always bad."

In addition to restoring regular oversight over the Justice Department, Leahy will use the chairmanship of the Judiciary Committee to scrutinize President Bush's judicial nominees.

Not that the outgoing chairman – Leahy's friend of many years, Pennsylvania Republican Sen. Arlen Specter – routinely gave the president his way. In fact, Leahy has regularly praised Specter's screening of judicial nominees, and he, far more often than not, was consulted on nominations.

"Ideologues will not get through," Leahy said. "I don't want the federal judiciary to be an arm of the Republican Party or the Democratic Party. An independent court system is one of the greatest safeguards we have."

And it's been the only check on executive-branch power in recent years, at least according to Cheryl Hanna, a Vermont Law School professor and constitutional law scholar.

"It is important that the Senate approve judges who are moderate and respect constitutional principles on civil liberties," Hanna said. "Since Sept. 11, Congress and the president independently and together have taken actions that have curtailed civil liberties, and it has taken the Supreme Court to step in.

"The attitude about civil liberties in recent years has been undermined by the false dichotomy that we have to trade some liberty for security."

Leahy isn't shy about stating his opinions or being in the limelight. And it's because of his outspokenness on key issues that the Bush administration sees Leahy as an antagonist.

Two years ago, Vice President Dick Cheney lashed out at the senator, telling him to "f— yourself."

Leahy never repeated the comment publicly, but many observers saw it as an illustration of just how frustrated the administration gets with the senior senator from Vermont.

The senator, for his part, seems to make a point of couching stinging remarks with a gentlemanly polity. Even when he savages the president's policy decisions, he does so with a smile and his trademark soft, gravely voice and piercing eyes.

As one political Web site put it recently, "Leahy's white hair and soft voice belie the tenaciousness with which he latches onto an issue or a witness, and doesn't let go. A former prosecutor, Leahy approaches issues with an organized and commanding knowledge of the facts."

And with a wry, Vermont sense of humor.

His first official act in the new Congress will be to escort the state's newly elected junior senator, Rep. Bernard Sanders, down the aisle to the well of the Senate, where he will be sworn in.

By Cheney.

"When it comes to the vice president," Leahy said, "it's always better to be sworn in than to be sworn at."

Dems Vow Change As Congress Ends Session (AP)

WASHINGTON (AP) — The 109th session of Congress, frustrated by partisanship and criticized for its meager record of accomplishment, ended with flurry of bill-passing and promises of change when Democrats take over the House and Senate in January.

Before the predawn finish Saturday, departing House Speaker Dennis Hastert acknowledged that after eight years, the longest stretch for a Republican in the job, he will welcome a return to the rank and file. "On Jan. 4, I will be privileged to rejoin you on these benches where my heart is," he said,

The Illinois Republican will be succeeded on that day by Rep. Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif. She becomes the first female speaker and the first Democrat in the post since Newt Gingrich of Georgia led the Republicans to power in 1995.

Pelosi is promising that the new Democratic era will get off to a quick start with votes to raise the federal minimum wage for the first time in a decade, enact lobbying and ethics reform and lower Medicare prescription drug costs.

As often is the case in the waning hours, the congressional session ended with a mad rush to deal with untended business.

In the long final day, ending around 4:40 a.m. ET in the Senate, the two chambers passed a massive tax and trade bill, prevented the government from shutting down and approved dozens of other bills. They included an important fisheries management measure; a bill allowing civilian nuclear technology transfers to India; and bills to fund programs to combat AIDS, pandemic diseases and premature births.

Lawmakers ready to return home also were reminded of the corruption and scandal problems that helped sweep Democrats to power in the November elections.

The House ethics committee, in a report Friday, admonished Republicans for turning a blind eye for years to the inappropriate conduct of former Rep. Mark Foley, R-Fla. He resigned in September after it was revealed he had sent salacious electronic messages to former teenage pages.

The tax measure revived some 20 tax breaks, at a cost of $38 billion over five years, and a dozen credits promoting alternative and efficient uses of energy.

It extended through the end of 2007 a deduction for research and development initiatives, and renewed a deductions of up to $4,000 for higher education costs. There were breaks for teachers who pay for supplies out of their own pocket and for taxpayers in nine states with no income taxes — allowing them to deduct state and local sales taxes.

"All Americans should be treated equally and given the opportunity to deduct their state taxes, regardless of how those levies are assessed," said GOP Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison of Texas. In her state, which lacks a state income tax, sales tax deductions are worth some $1 billion.

The popular tax breaks became a magnet for contentious and expensive bills. The package included legislation to open up 8.3 million acres in the Gulf of Mexico to oil and gas drilling and to prevent a 5% cut in Medicare payments to doctors from taking effect Jan. 1. The GOP-crafted solution to the problem was criticized as an accounting gimmick because it would double the cost of fixing the problem again next year.

The legislation also contained measures to permanently normalize trade with Vietnam and extend trade benefits for four Andean nations, sub-Saharan African countries and Haiti. The Haiti act was the toughest to swallow for some lawmakers from the South; they said it would further erode jobs in their states' textile industries.

The bill also renewed, with increased federal contributions, a program dealing with abandoned coal mines and the health issues of former miners.

Senate Budget Committee Chairman Judd Gregg, R-N.H., said the legislation would shift $4 billion in health care costs from the coal companies to the taxpayers, and criticized his own party for failing to check indiscriminate federal spending. "We're supposed to be the party of fiscal discipline and we haven't been," he said.

As one of its final acts, Congress approved a stopgap measure keeping federal programs running at or slightly below current levels through Feb. 15. President Bush quickly signed it on Saturday.

The action was necessary because lawmakers failed to pass the annual spending bills covering the budget year that began Oct. 1, except those dealing with defense and homeland security.

Rep. David Obey, D-Wis., who will become House Appropriations Committee chairman when the Democrats take over, said the bill was "a blatant admission of abject failure by the most useless Congress in modern times."

Democrats also pointed out that the House met only 102 days this session, fewer than the 110 days of the maligned "do-nothing" Congress of the Truman presidency.

The next House majority leader, Rep. Steny Hoyer, D-Md., says there will be a return to five-day workweeks. In the Senate, incoming Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., said he and new Republican leader, Sen. Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., have agreed that all 100 senators will hold a private session on Jan. 4 to kick off what they hope will be a new era of civility and less partisanship.

Republicans claim some major accomplishments this year: passing a pension overhaul; renewing the Patriot Act; enacting a port security bill; and endorsing Bush's plans to create military commissions to prosecute suspected terrorists.

But this Congress could not move ahead on promised lobbying and ethics changes; failed to reach a consensus on the administration's warrantless eavesdropping program; and did not develop a plan to deal with the 12 million illegal immigrants in the country.

GOP Laments Mixed Results As Control Of Congress Ends (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, December 10, 2006

Demoralized Republicans adjourned the 109th Congress at 5 a.m. yesterday with a near-empty Capitol, closing the door on a dozen years of nearly unbroken GOP control by spending more time in the final days lamenting their failures -- to rein in government, tame the deficit and temper their own lust for power -- than reliving their successes.

Still reeling from their electoral defeat Nov. 7, Republicans capped an era of conservative ascendance with the passage of business tax break extensions, a package of trade measures, and legislation to stave off physician-payment cuts they once trumpeted in their budget-cutting drive.

While GOP leaders touted their handiwork, it was a far cry from 12 years ago when the Republicans swept to power with the zeal of self-described revolutionaries and a mission to shrink the size of government, limit its reach, strengthen the nation's security and end an era of a privileged, imperial Congress.

"Together, we reformed welfare. We cut taxes, and small businesses grew all over the nation," House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) said in a late-night farewell address. "We promised to protect this nation from further attack, and by grace of God and with the leadership of President Bush, we have been successful."

But beyond Hastert's speech, a conclusion punctuated by the release of a scathing House ethics committee report on the Mark Foley-House page scandal and last-minute budget squabbles yielded more recriminations than congratulations.

DOJ_NMG_0104891

"You know, the American people took the reins of government away from the Republican Party . . . in this last election. They did so, I think, in large part because they were tired of our hypocrisy," fumed Sen. Judd Gregg (R-N.H.) from the Senate floor. "Our leadership and some of our members grew arrogant in their own power, and with arrogance comes corruption," said Rep. Zach Wamp (R-Tenn.), a member of the class of 1994.

"We came to change Washington, and Washington changed us," said Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.).

As they grapple with defeat, Republicans seem to have difficulty taking stock of their 12 years in power, but those years had enormous impact. Republican Congresses fundamentally changed the welfare system, cut taxes time and again, expanded the powers of the government to combat terrorism in the wake of the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, and added a prescription drug benefit to Medicare.

Combing through the fine print of the 1994 "Contract With America" campaign manifesto, one finds goals that Americans now largely take for granted. Congressional committee chairmen, who once built empires from inviolable perches, are now term limited. The contract anticipated a lucrative tax credit for each child, the end of a tax penalty on marriage, federal incentives for adoption, the easing of limits on the amount seniors could earn and still receive their Social Security benefits and some curbs on civil litigation. The overriding political fear of tax increases, still evident as Democrats move to resume control, can be seen as a conservative victory, as can a federal minimum wage that has grown increasingly irrelevant after nearly a decade without change.

Yet measured against the ambitions of 1994, not much has changed. The House Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee might be no more, but the departments of commerce, education and energy, once slated for the chopping block, are still very much alive, as are the National Endowment for the Arts and the Corporation for Public Broadcasting.

Compared with the size of the economy, government discretionary spending has grown. The vision of a term-limited Congress of everymen, rotating through Washington after short stints, has all but vanished. And government programs such as Medicare and federal education bureaucracies are larger and more pervasive.

"It's a mixed bag," said former House speaker Newt Gingrich (R-Ga.), the architect of the 1994 revolution. "In a three-year period, we changed things fairly dramatically. We, candidly, then failed."

Democrats were harsher -- but only by degrees. Former Senate majority leader Thomas A. Daschle (S.D.) pointed with disdain to former president Bill Clinton's impeachment, the Iraq war, the yawning federal debt, "a complete breakdown on oversight as well as civility," corruption and a "willingness to cede most of their authority as an equal branch of government" to the Bush administration.

"One would have to search long and hard through history to find a dozen years more disastrous than that," Daschle said.

Compared with the liberal ascendancy, which ran from Franklin D. Roosevelt's New Deal to Lyndon B. Johnson's Great Society and arguably Ronald Reagan's election, the conservative era has been brief and relatively inconsequential, said Julian Zelizer, a Boston University congressional historian. Nothing in the past 12 years compares with the creation of Social Security or Medicare, the voting rights and civil rights acts, the Marshall Plan or Dwight D. Eisenhower's interstate highway system. Nor were any of those big-government achievements fundamentally altered.

Far from ending an imperial Congress, Republicans centralized power in their leadership to an unprecedented level.

Even some successes -- such as a balanced budget and the diminution of farm subsidies -- proved short-lived, GOP lawmakers and former leaders conceded.

Republicans did take pride in a few achievements. In numerous interviews, virtually every lawmaker pointed to the 1996 welfare overhaul as the pinnacle of Republican achievement, followed closely by the 1997 balanced-budget agreement, which introduced private-sector competition to Medicare and helped yield a federal budget surplus the next year. In a memo to fellow Republicans, House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (Ohio) pointed to lower tax rates on income and investments, education laws that expanded parental school choice and targeted funding to schools that succeed, the expansion of free trade, the confirmation of conservative judges and Supreme Court justices, and laws to help pursue terrorists and strengthen the military.

"The common thread through all of these achievements is the Republican commitment to individual freedom, personal responsibility, and accountable government," Boehner wrote.

But in general, Republicans were in no mood to cheer. Instead, they took turns trying to pinpoint where things went wrong. Sen. Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.), who came to the House in the class of 1994, pointed to setting supposedly strict spending caps in the 1997 budget deal, only to break them in 1998. Former House majority leader Richard K. Armey (R-Tex.) took the same vein when he fingered the summer of 1997 and the first emergency spending bill that was not offset with equivalent spending cuts.

"That was the day we said: 'Discipline is too hard, too demanding. It makes people mad that have volatile tempers, and we're just not going to do it anymore,' " Armey said.

Wamp had his specific moment, June 27, 2003, when emissaries from the GOP leadership woke him in the middle of the night, pleading with him to change his vote against the Medicare prescription drug bill, the largest entitlement expansion since the creation of Medicare. House leaders kept the vote open more than an hour, setting a record as they twisted arms, threatened and even told one member that political support for his son was at stake.

"It looked like we were in the back pockets of the prescription drug companies, and some of us were," Wamp said, concluding that Republican leaders had forgotten about conservative principals and cared only for the preservation of power.

Referring to the former House majority leader, Wamp recalled: "If Tom DeLay said it one time, he said it 15 times: 'The most important thing we can do for the American people is keep our Republican majority.' That was just wrong, and it had to catch up to us in the end."

The leaders of the revolution agreed that the past 12 years hardly cemented the conservative visions of Barry Goldwater, Ronald Reagan and the class of 1994. But Armey said that it is far too early to close the books on a conservative era.

"I still expect to see a fourth golden moment in my lifetime," he said. "We've got a bit of a setback here, but we're going to be like Arnold Schwarzenegger. We'll be back."

Congress's Last Acts Include Tax Breaks (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman, Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, December 10, 2006

The rancorous 109th Congress adjourned yesterday morning with final passage of measures to expand civilian nuclear trade with India, establish permanent trade relations with Vietnam and extend a bevy of expiring business tax breaks.

Legislation that would overhaul the U.S. Postal Service for the first time since 1970 and could hold down the cost of mailing letters also cleared the Congress and was sent to the president. A presidential commission and the Government Accountability Office had called for changes in how the Postal Service operates as Americans increasingly communicate and do business through e-mail and the Internet.

But last-minute Republican budget squabbles marred the final hours of a Congress already tainted by scandal, indictments and resignations, and ushered out Republican control on a discordant note. The 109th Congress ended having logged fewer days of legislative activity than even the infamous "Do-Nothing Congress" of 1948.

"You know, it's sort of that old Pogo line, 'We've met the enemy, and he is us,' " fumed Senate Budget Committee Chairman Judd Gregg (R-N.H.), as the Republican-controlled Congress moved toward final passage of tax cuts and spending measures that would expand the budget deficit.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) ended his own Senate career and called the Congress adjourned at 4:35 a.m., telling a near-empty Capitol, "I will truly miss each and every one of you."

The centerpiece of the closing hours' work was a tax-and-trade bill. The measure temporarily extended expiring tax breaks for business research and development and for hiring people off the welfare rolls, a partial college tuition deduction, and energy conservation incentives. It extended a generous deduction for state and local sales taxes that was slipped into a business tax law in 2004 as a temporary measure to win votes in states without income taxes but is taking on an air of permanence.

The huge package also contained measures to permanently normalize trade with Vietnam and extend trade benefits for four Andean nations, sub-Saharan African countries and Haiti. The Haiti provision was strongly challenged by some Southern lawmakers, who said it would further erode jobs in their states' textile industries.

The U.S.-India nuclear cooperation deal set aside years of U.S. nonproliferation policy that forbids the trade of nuclear-reactor technologies to nations that refused to sign the international nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty, such as India. A strong bipartisan majority argued that the policy was an impediment to improved relations between the world's largest democracies. President Bush hailed the action as a means of enabling India and the United States to work together to promote energy production without polluting the atmosphere or contributing to global warming.

Democrats secured a provision blocking an automatic pay raise for Congress until Feb. 16, when a stopgap spending measure to keep the government operating is set to expire. Democratic leaders had argued that Congress should not get a pay hike until lawmakers approve the first increase in the minimum wage since 1997, a measure they hope to pass well before mid-February.

But debate that stretched into the morning yesterday centered on the fiscal stewardship of a Republican Congress that saw record budget surpluses turn into record deficits. Gregg and a handful of other Republican budget hawks held up passage of the tax-and-trade bill because the measure's 10-year, $50 billion price tag would void deficit-control measures. Ultimately, the Senate overrode those objections.

The Postal Service measure has been in negotiation for the past three years. The Postal Service is a linchpin of the economy, touching more than 9 million jobs and about $900 billion in commerce.

Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine), a chief sponsor, called the bill "great news for the future of an institution that is critical to our economy and will ensure the continuation of universal postal service at an affordable rate."

The legislation would replace the lengthy and litigious process used to raise the price of stamps and some other postal rates with a price cap, limiting rate increases to the rate of inflation for a 10-year period. The change would inject more predictability into postal increases, especially for the magazine industry and other large mailers. It also would permit the Postal Service to more quickly offer discounts for its services, such as promotional rates to attract business in holiday seasons.

The Postal Service also gets billions of dollars in financial relief under the bill. Costs for military pensions earned by postal workers during their time in the armed forces would be shifted from the Postal Service to the Treasury, the practice for most federal agencies. The bill also would release money from an escrow fund to cover postal retiree health-care liabilities.

The legislation would replace a rate-review commission with a more powerful Postal Regulatory Commission, which could set some postal rates and examine postal financial management practices.

Postmaster General John E. Potter congratulated House and Senate negotiators "for making reform a reality" and said the agency looks forward to implementing the changes.

"Over the long run, the whole postal system will, I believe, experience higher-quality service and lower cost than it would have," said Michael J. Critelli, chairman of the Mailing Industry CEO Council.

After Flurry Of Votes Stretching Into Morning, Lawmakers Head Home (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, December 10, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 9 — Republicans relinquished their political grip on Capitol Hill early Saturday as the 109th Congress adjourned after a final spurt of legislation and accusation.

In one of their last acts in the majority, Republican leaders forced through a broad tax and trade bill packed with provisions that drew substantial bipartisan support after harsh opposition that melted away when it became obvious the legislation was headed to the president and lawmakers were ready to head home after a difficult year.

“I recognize I am going to lose,” said Senator Judd Gregg, Republican of New Hampshire, in making a final, futile procedural attack against the measure, which was approved on a 79-to-9 vote just before 2 a.m. The House had passed the provisions in two separate packages.

With the conclusion of the Congress, four years of full Republican control over the apparatus of Washington came to an end because of election gains that will install Democrats in the House and Senate majorities when Congress reconvenes Jan. 4. The election also interrupted 12 straight years of Republican reign in the House, where Democrats were steamrolled for years.

Reactions to the looming transfer of power depended on whether a “D” or an “R” followed a lawmaker’s name.

Senator Charles E. Schumer, the New York Democrat who was instrumental in engineering the Democratic takeover of the Senate, beamed as he left the chamber. “Not a bad year,” Mr. Schumer said.

But Republicans were subdued, with some who were defeated in November saying goodbye to colleagues and staff members and lingering a few extra minutes on the floor after casting their last votes.

In the House, Representative J. Dennis Hastert of Illinois made his final speech as speaker and received a hug and a kiss on the cheek from the incoming speaker, Representative Nancy Pelosi, Democrat of California, a frequent target of Republican attacks.

“Those of us on this side of the aisle will become the loyal opposition, and the gentle lady from California, Mrs. Pelosi, will assume the duties as our speaker,” Mr. Hastert said. “I know she will do so with skill and grace and that she will bring honor to this institution.”

The trade measure, a compendium of last-minute priorities sent to President Bush, was the chief legislative accomplishment of the final hours. It restored $38 billion in popular tax breaks; established normal trade relations with Vietnam and granted trade benefits to Haiti and four South American countries; and blocked a cut in Medicare payments to doctors. The measure also fulfilled a long-sought objective of Gulf Coast lawmakers and the oil industry by expanding offshore drilling opportunities in the eastern Gulf of Mexico and directing hundreds of millions of dollars in new royalties to the region.

“Just when everyone bet against us, Republicans put together a broad package of energy, tax, trade and health care measures,” said Senator Bill Frist of Tennessee, whose four-year tenure as majority leader concluded with the final gavel in the Senate at 4:40 a.m.

Hours earlier, just minutes before a midnight deadline, the Senate approved a stopgap measure to maintain financing for government agencies at current or lower levels through Feb. 15 — a temporary fix required because Congress had failed to pass 9 of the 11 routine spending bills that were due Oct. 1.

That collapse raised complaints from Democrats that Republicans were irresponsibly leaving them with major unfinished business to take care of next year. Some Republicans were pointing fingers as well.

"The breakdown of regular order this cycle — indeed the failure to get our bills done — should be squarely placed at the feet of the departing Senate majority leader who failed to schedule floor time for the consideration of appropriations bills," Representative Jerry Lewis, Republican of California and the departing chairman of the Appropriations Committee, said in an unusual public attack on a fellow Republican.

As they plowed through legislation in the early morning, Congress also whisked through a package of three major health care initiatives that continued a program for H.I.V. and AIDS that will provide more than $6 billion for care over three years, created an agency to centralize efforts against bioterrorism and restructured the National Institutes of Health.

"Tonight, Congress put partisanship aside to do the right thing for the health of millions of Americans," said Senator Edward M. Kennedy, Democrat of Massachusetts, who helped squeeze through the health legislation.

With approval by the House before it adjourned at 3:15 a.m., Congress also gave the first overhaul in years to fisheries laws, trying to limit overfishing of certain species. "By passing this bill, Congress has agreed that the threats facing our oceans are too great to wait another year," Matt Rand of the National Environmental Trust said.

Congress also adopted a measure intended to strengthen the ability to predict tsunamis. Lawmakers approved the first reorganization of the Postal Service in more than 30 years and sent Mr. Bush an agreement allowing the United States to share civilian nuclear technology with India. And Congress passed a bill to make obtaining personal telephone records without permission a federal crime.

Mr. Bush, who signed the stopgap spending legislation early Saturday, praised Congress for delivering the last batch of bills, singling out the oil drilling, AIDS assistance and fisheries legislation, as well as the nuclear agreement with India and the elevated trade status for Vietnam.

"The American people welcome the remarkable transformation and economic progress in Vietnam, and we will continue to work together to strengthen our ties," said Mr. Bush, who made his first visit to Vietnam last month.

But even as he complimented the old Congress, the president may have to brace for a different relationship with the new one.

In the Democratic radio address broadcast Saturday, Representative Silvestre Reyes of Texas, who will be the chairman of the Select Committee on Intelligence in January, promised intense scrutiny of the president's policies regarding Iraq.

"I intend to focus on oversight, holding administration officials accountable to the American people," Mr. Reyes said. "Oversight need not be partisan, and under my leadership, it won't be. It will be bipartisan, focused and serious."

Even though Republicans took all the Congressional losses in November, conservative Republicans helped block a proposal to pay a total of about $10 million in severance to hundreds of senior committee and leadership aides who will lose their jobs when the changeover shrinks the Republican payroll. Critics said the severance was too generous.

Lawmakers will return to a changed world in January, and they acknowledge it will take some getting used to.

"John McCain told me they don't know they've lost yet and we don't know we've won," Senator Kennedy said.

But as he left the Senate chamber in the early morning, Senator Mel Martinez, Republican of Florida, appeared to know who was up and who was down, acknowledging a greeting as "Mr. Chairman," reflecting his new position leading the Republican National Committee.

"I'm the only guy who is going to be called that next year in my caucus," Mr. Martinez said, because the top Congressional committee posts will soon be in the hands of Democrats.

House Approves Overhaul Of Rules For Fisheries (WP)

By Juliet Eilperin

The Washington Post, December 10, 2006

Congress yesterday passed the broadest overhaul of the rules that govern the U.S. fishing industry in a decade, with provisions instructing fishery managers to adhere strictly to scientific advice so as not to deplete the ocean.

The final language of the Magnuson-Stevens Act, which passed the Senate on Thursday and the House early yesterday, was a compromise between environmentalists and fishing interests. The measure mandates an end to overfishing of depleted species within 2 1/2 years and allows the selling and trading of shares in a fishery to promote conservation.

"This clearly acknowledges the problems we face and reflects a realization by lawmakers that we can't continue to postpone dealing with overfishing and the destruction of marine habitat," said Josh Reichert, head of the Pew Charitable Trust's environmental program.

Commercial fishing interests, Bush administration officials and GOP lawmakers also praised the legislation.

"Fishermen and conservationists are all getting something they can be proud of in this bill, and they can rest assured that this bill maintains a critical balance in fisheries management," said House Resources Committee Chairman Richard W. Pombo (R-Calif.). "While it is important to protect our nation's fish stocks, it's equally important to protect our nation's vital and deep-rooted fishing communities. This bill does just that."

Jim Gilmore, spokesman for the At-Sea Processors Association, said the bill "has important conservation measures for promoting sustainable fisheries nationwide," adding: "For us it's a great thing to have catch limits in every fishery." The organization represents Alaska pollock and Pacific whiting fishermen who land 20 percent of the U.S. catch.

Lawmakers cut some deals to pass the measure, including language that will extend a 10-year rebuilding plan for summer flounder in the Northeast to 13 years, which will allow recreational and commercial fishermen to catch more flounder. Federal officials had set the 2007 summer flounder catch at 5 million pounds; under the new law, next year's catch will be 17.1 million pounds.

"This is a big help," said Rep. Jim Saxton (R-N.J.), whose state boasts a major summer flounder fishery. Saxton said lawmakers were able to make last-minute concessions because they were eager to reach agreement before Congress adjourned for the year. "We knew some economic hardships were unnecessarily going to take place if we didn't accomplish this."

But those compromises angered Michael Hirschfeld, chief scientist for the advocacy group Oceana.

"We're disappointed because we really do see this as an opportunity missed," Hirschfeld said, adding that he hopes federal officials will manage fish "in a way to make sure that there's enough resources for the whole ecosystem, not just us."

While much of the bill focuses on tightening the 30-year-old fisheries law, it also endorses for the first time creation of "limited access privilege programs" allowing groups or individuals to trade shares of a fishery's overall catch.

"It's a groundbreaking piece of legislation that gives an unambiguous green light for a cap-and-trade program for fish," said David Festa, who directs the oceans program for the advocacy group Environmental Defense.

Bush, who vowed earlier this year to end overfishing before leaving office, is prepared to sign the bill into law.

"We believe that this legislation is an important step for the United States to rebuild our nation's fisheries and will allow our fishers to utilize all of the tools that are available so their fishing businesses can operate safely and economically," said Bill Hogarth, director of the National Marine Fisheries Service.

Bush Lauds Bill To Overhaul Fisheries (AP)

By Matthew Daly

AP, December 9, 2006

WASHINGTON -- President Bush said Saturday the country is committed to ensuring strong commercial and recreational fishing, praising legislation that overhauls management of marine fisheries and strengthens protections against further depleting dwindling stocks.

The measure passed early Saturday requires the use of annual catch limits and enhances the authority of eight regional fishery management councils.

The bill reauthorizes the Magnuson-Stevens Fishery Conservation and Management Act through 2013. The 30-year-old law is the main law guiding fishery management in waters between three miles and 200 miles offshore.

"This bill embraces my priorities of ending overfishing and rebuilding our nation's fish stocks through more effective, market-based management and tougher enforcement," Bush said in a statement Saturday.

He said the measure offers stronger tools "to achieve progress internationally to ensure healthy fish stocks, promote better management, and halt destructive fishing practices based on sound science."

Supporters said the bill would strengthen current law by requiring an end to overfishing, science-based management of U.S. fisheries and penalties for illegal fishing in international waters.

"Our oceans are in serious trouble and this legislation will help to reverse their decline," said Sarah Chasis, director of the Oceans Initiative for the Natural Resources Defense Council.

She and other environmentalists hailed a provision that sets overall limits on the number of fish that can be caught, while allowing fishermen flexibility in how they divide up shares of the total catch.

"We are pleased that the bill includes provisions to strengthen the use of science in the fishery management process, end overfishing and rebuild overfished stocks," said David Hoskins, vice president of The Ocean Conservancy.

Sen. Olympia Snowe, R-Maine, who heads the subcommittee that oversees the nation's fisheries, said the bill would provide an economic lifeline to fishermen while ensuring a secure supply of fish.

"This legislation is not a perfect solution, but I believe we have struck an appropriate balance between preserving the marine resources of our coastal communities with these fisheries management tools," she said.

Bush said the U.S. "is committed to maintaining our thriving commercial and recreational fishing communities."

DOJ_NMG_0104896

Sen. Ted Stevens, R-Alaska, who led efforts to update the law that bears his name, said lawmakers had heeded a call by Bush to end overfishing. Bush, in a speech this fall, urged Congress to reauthorize the fishing law and called overfishing harmful to the United States and the world.

"This legislation is important to sustaining and conserving our nation's fisheries for generations to come," Stevens said.

At the insistence of West Coast lawmakers, the bill includes language to speed recovery of Klamath River salmon stocks in California and Oregon. For fishermen adversely affected by recent closures aimed at protecting threatened fish, there would be disaster relief programs.

Congress Wraps Up With A Barrage Of Bills (LAT/AP)

The Los Angeles Times, December 10, 2006

WASHINGTON — The 109th session of Congress, frustrated by partisanship and criticized for its meager record of accomplishment, ended with a flurry of bill passings early Saturday.

In the long final day, ending about 4:40 a.m. in the Senate, the two chambers passed a massive tax and trade bill, prevented the government from shutting down and approved dozens of other bills.

They included an important fisheries management measure; a bill allowing civilian nuclear technology transfers to India; and bills to fund programs to combat AIDS, pandemic diseases and premature births.

The fisheries measure reauthorizes the Magnuson-Stevens Fishery Conservation and Management Act through 2013. The 30-year-old law is the main law guiding fishery management in waters between three miles and 200 miles offshore.

In a statement Saturday, President Bush said the legislation offered stronger tools "to achieve progress internationally to ensure healthy fish stocks, promote better management and halt destructive fishing practices based on sound science."

The tax measure revived some 20 tax breaks, at a cost of $38 billion over five years, and a dozen credits promoting alternative and efficient uses of energy.

It extended through 2007 a deduction for research and development initiatives, and renewed deductions of up to $4,000 for higher-education costs. There were breaks for teachers who pay for supplies out of pocket and for taxpayers in nine states with no income taxes — allowing them to deduct state and local sales taxes.

The popular tax breaks became a magnet for contentious and expensive bills. The package included legislation to open up 8.3 million acres in the Gulf of Mexico to oil and gas drilling and to prevent a 5% cut in Medicare payments to doctors from taking effect Jan. 1. The GOP-crafted solution to the problem was criticized as an accounting gimmick because it would double the cost of fixing the problem again next year.

The legislation also contained measures to permanently normalize trade with Vietnam and extend trade benefits for four Andean nations, sub-Saharan African countries and Haiti. The Haiti act was the toughest to swallow for some lawmakers from the South; they said it would further erode jobs in their states' textile industries.

As one of its final acts, Congress approved a stopgap measure keeping federal programs running at or slightly below current levels through Feb. 15. Bush signed it Saturday.

The action was necessary because lawmakers failed to pass the annual spending bills covering the budget year that began Oct. 1, except those dealing with defense and homeland security.

Democrats, who will be in the majority when the new session of Congress convenes in January, pointed out that the House met 102 days this session, fewer than the 110 days of the maligned "do-nothing" Congress of the Truman presidency.

Texans Win With Congress' Tax Bill (HC)

By David Ivanovich, Michelle Mittelstadt

Houston Chronicle, December 10, 2006

WASHINGTON — Lawmakers closed the curtain on the 109th Congress early today, but not before helping Texans avoid some pain on April 15 and granting oil and gas companies access to new areas of the Gulf of Mexico.

In a final, marathon session, the Republican-led Senate, by a vote of 79-9, signed off on a broad tax and trade package which extends a popular deduction for Texas taxpayers and opened some 8.3 million acres of the eastern Gulf for exploration.

"Just when everyone bet against us, Republicans put together a broad package of energy, tax, trade and health care measures," said outgoing Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn.

The $38 billion tax package will save Texans an estimated $1 billion this year, by allowing them to continue deducting local and state sales taxes on their federal returns.

Overcoming a flurry of last-minute objections from lawmakers over textiles and timber imports, the bill extends a tax break for school teachers and halts a scheduled cut in reimbursement rates for doctors who treat Medicare patients.

DOJ_NMG_0104897

For residents in Texas and six other states without state income taxes, the bill ensures taxpayers who itemize will be able to deduct state and local sales taxes on their federal income tax forms, for tax years 2006 and 2007.

The tax break, which will cost the Treasury $5.5 billion, will allow Texans to keep $2 billion over the next two years.

This provision was an effort to approximate the benefit enjoyed by taxpayers in other states, who can deduct their state income taxes.

"All Americans should be treated equally and given the opportunity to deduct their state taxes, regardless of how those levies are assessed," Texas Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison said.

The bill also tries to address concerns about high fuel and home heating bills by opening up an area believed to hold upwards of 1.26 billion barrels of oil and 5.8 trillion cubic feet of natural gas.

That volume of crude is comparable to half the nation's annual domestic production, supporter say, while the natural gas being made available could heat and cool 6 million homes for 15 years.

The GOP-controlled House had favored a more expansive offshore drilling plan but Friday adopted this language for fear the measure would die in the Senate.

Just last year, lawmakers passed — and President Bush signed into law — a massive energy bill, but critics complained it did little to give oil and gas producers access to more domestic resources.

Industry groups have long complained high natural gas prices have not only been hurting consumers but also sending manufacturing jobs overseas, where gas prices are lower.

"For the first time, we've passed a production-oriented bill," said Sen. Pete Domenici, R-N.M., adding: "We've done something to produce natural gas and hold the price of natural gas where it is — or reduce it — because of the new supply.

"This one's a good one," Domenici said.

Bush, who is expected to sign the legislation, praised lawmakers for encouraging further drilling language.

"Developing these reliable domestic domestic resources in an environmentally sound manner will help address high energy prices, strengthen our energy security and protect manufacturing jobs," he said.

Chemical makers, who use vast quantities of natural gas to churn out plastics and petrochemicals, have been especially hard-hit.

"Today's historic action is an enormous victory in the fight against a six-year-old natural gas crisis that's been killing American jobs, making the United States less competitive with other nations and costing households across the nation more for home heating and electricity," Jack Gerard, president of the American Chemistry Council, said in a prepared statement.

Environmental groups, however, fear continued drilling will harm the nation's coastline and exacerbate the nation's dependence on fossil fuels.

"Unfortunately, passing a bill that benefits the oil and gas industry is a fitting way to close the door on this Congress," Sierra Club Executive Director Carl Pope said in a statement. "Let's hope this is Congress' one last fling with Big Oil and that we can make a fresh start to achieving true energy security with the new year and the new Congress. "

Democrats will take control of Capitol Hill next year and already have signaled little interest in promoting further oil and drilling.

The bill also will compensate Texas and other Gulf producing states for bearing the brunt of the nation's offshore drilling activity by providing new money for coastal restoration projects.

The legislation calls for turning over 37.5 percent of federal revenues generated by production in these new areas. Then, in 2017, the four Gulf producing states would collect 37.5 percent of the revenues from all new leases in the Gulf.

Texas is expected to collect somewhere between $25 million and $64 million over the next years from this revenue-sharing formula, according to staffers with Sen. Mary Landrieu, D-La., the champion of the provision.

Democrats Have Plans, But They'll Need To Pay (LAT)

By Joel Havemann

The Los Angeles Times, December 10, 2006

WASHINGTON — After being out of power for 12 years, Democrats will take control of Congress next month with a wish list of new programs, including more money for college student aid, the No Child Left Behind schools initiative and Medicare prescription drug benefits — plus tax relief for middle-income Americans.

But there's a hitch: The Democrats also have promised to restore fiscal responsibility and not increase the federal deficit.

"The debt is spiraling out of control," Sen. Kent Conrad (D-N.D.), incoming chairman of the Senate Budget Committee, said last month. "The needs and wants are limitless, but our power to meet them is highly limited."

Democrats' expansive vision of the government's role in American life is on a collision course with budget deficits that are already running about $250 billion a year. The Concord Coalition, a lobby for fiscal responsibility, warns that the deficit could reach $800 billion in 10 years if Congress enacts all the programs its members are talking about.

In the education budget, for example, some leading Democrats have discussed cutting the interest rate on federally subsidized student loans in half — boosting the federal interest subsidy by an estimated $18 billion over five years — plus increasing Pell Grants for college students by 25% and raising funding for the No Child Left Behind program by as much as $16 billion.

Among all the spending initiatives being discussed on Capitol Hill, perhaps none would cost so much so soon as closing the "doughnut hole" in the new Medicare prescription drug program. This refers to the fact that after beneficiaries buy $2,250 worth of drugs a year with federal help, they get no more subsidy until they have spent another $2,850 out of their own pockets. Having the federal government pick up those expenses would cost the Treasury an estimated $50 billion a year for the first 10 years.

Lawmakers of both parties want to provide relief to the growing number of middle-income taxpayers subject to the alternative minimum tax, designed in the 1960s to prevent the wealthiest taxpayers from paying next to no income taxes. Raising the income thresholds for the alternative tax would exempt more middle-income taxpayers, but could also cost the Treasury an estimated $40 billion to $80 billion a year over the next 10 years.

"The question is, which will win out — the people with political agendas or those with budget discipline," said Robert Bixby, the Concord Coalition's executive director. "In my experience, fiscal discipline usually comes out second.

"What is different this year," he added, "is that the Democrats made a big deal out of budget discipline. They'll look pretty silly if they abandon it."

Here are some of the options Congress has:

Pay-as-you-go

The foremost money-saver proposed by Rep. Nancy Pelosi of San Francisco, the next Speaker of the House, is a "pay-as-you-go" rule requiring that any legislation to cut taxes or increase spending include offsets that would keep the deficit from growing. "Offsets" is a neutral way of saying tax increases or spending cuts. A form of paygo, as pay-as-you-go is known, was the law from 1990 through 2002. Every year the White House toted up the impact of legislation on the deficit; if the effect had been to make the deficit larger, compensating across-the-board spending cuts would have been ordered.

The drawback: The problem with paygo is that it is easily circumvented, which is exactly what has happened in the past. In the last three years of the Clinton administration — an era of budget surpluses — appropriations bills that would have violated paygo carried provisions exempting them. In 2001, when the first round of President Bush's tax cuts would have required huge spending cuts, Congress again waived paygo's strictures.

Put a cap on spending

Congress could also impose caps on spending for programs over which it exercises year-to-year control. The Senate used spending caps in concert with paygo until it expired in 2002. The cap was usually a single dollar amount that limited all "discretionary" spending in annual appropriations bills for a host of programs, including abandoned mine reclamation and the Yucca Mountain nuclear waste repository.

Democratic leaders have not decided whether to support such caps, but the moderate-to-conservative Blue Dog Democrats, who hold the balance of power in the House, are in favor of them.

The drawback: Spending caps don't apply to giant benefit programs such as Social Security and Medicare, and so they cover only about one-third of all federal spending, limiting their impact on the overall budget. Under spending caps, Congress would have to focus its "discipline" on the non-defense, discretionary portion of the budget.

While non-defense discretionary spending has risen by only about 4% a year during the Bush presidency after adjustment for inflation, defense spending has increased by about 10% a year. Outlays for Social Security and Medicare have grown by more than 5% a year and are on course to grow much faster as the baby boom generation reaches retirement age.

Collect taxes owed

One revenue-raising scheme that enjoys bipartisan support is closing the "tax gap" — the taxes that Americans owe but don't pay on time, if at all. The IRS estimated this year that the tax gap in 2001 — even after late payments, many resulting from IRS audits — was a breathtaking $290 billion, more than the entire federal deficit.

"Closing the tax gap has got to be one of our top priorities," said Conrad, who plans to hold hearings on how to narrow the budget deficit.

The drawback: Collecting overdue taxes may be easier said than done. For one, some of that money is owed by people who have no resources to pay it.

DOJ_NMG_0104899

And a large share — nearly half — represents taxes owed on business income, which is difficult for the IRS to identify, much less collect. That's because, unlike wage income, which is reported to the IRS by the taxpayer's employer, the government gets no independent confirmation of much business income.

Raise taxes

The more direct way to pay for new programs is simply to raise tax rates or end tax breaks.

Pelosi's agenda includes scaling back the federal subsidies and tax breaks enjoyed by the big oil companies at a time when the sector's profits quadrupled between 2002 and 2005. And she would correct an Interior Department oversight in the late 1990s that allows the oil companies to drill for oil offshore without paying royalties to the government no matter how high the price of oil rises.

At the top of Sen. Edward M. Kennedy's (D-Mass.) list are millionaires, who he says have benefited disproportionately from the Bush tax cuts. When asked by reporters how he would pay for his wish list of social programs, he said he would leave the middle class alone but could support a millionaires' tax.

The drawback: Any proposed tax increase is both an economic and political risk. Republicans — and some Democrats — can be expected to resist mightily; the Bush administration argues that any tax hike would jeopardize the economic growth that began when the 2001 recession ended. More than that, raising taxes could alienate voters.

Save on Medicare drugs

Democrats have called for changes in Medicare that would allow it to negotiate lower prices with the manufacturers of the prescription drugs subsidized by Medicare's new drug program. Kennedy said Medicare could save $140 billion over 10 years if it negotiated drug prices the way the Veterans Affairs Department does.

The drawback: Some question whether that much savings could be carved out of Medicare drug purchases. The Bush administration notes that the insurance companies that operate the drug program already negotiate low prices with the drug makers.

And the comparison with the VA may not apply because Medicare offers a much greater choice of drugs than the VA does, forcing its costs higher.

Democrats May Give Alternative Energy A New Push (NYT)

By Norm Alster

The New York Times, December 10, 2006

THE fortunes of alternative energy companies have been linked to two factors outside their control: oil prices and politics.

Rising oil prices have moved in the companies' favor over the last few years, making the price of producing energy from wind, solar, geothermal or organic sources more competitive.

Now some analysts and money managers are hoping the imminent Democratic takeover of Congress will also be bullish for alternative energy stocks by improving prospects for favorable legislation for the industry.

One likely initiative, known as a national renewable portfolio standard, would require utilities to derive 10 percent of their electricity output from renewable sources by 2020. Currently, less than 3 percent of electricity is generated from such sources. Senator Jeff Bingaman, Democrat of New Mexico, the presumptive chairman of the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee, says he hopes to pass "some version" of a renewable portfolio standard in the next Congress.

The details of such legislation — as well as whether it would be approved by Congress and signed by President Bush — are very much uncertain. But that hasn't stopped investors from placing their bets.

Democrats may be in the forefront, but they aren't the only ones to jump on the alternative energy bandwagon, said Randy Gwirtzman, a research analyst at Baron Capital, which is based in New York. "Both sides of the aisle have shown they're in favor of alternative energy sources," he said.

Senator Jeff Sessions, Republican of Alabama, for example, is concerned about the nation's reliance on imported oil. "With the surging prices of oil," he said, "there's a strong feeling among Republicans that our economy and national security can be damaged if we don't decrease our dependency."

Mr. Gwirtzman recommends shares of SunPower, which he said has a highly competitive solar-cell product line that is well positioned to benefit from a more sympathetic Congress. Stuart Bush, technology analyst at RBC Capital Markets based in Austin, Tex., also likes SunPower, which is a spin-off of Cypress Semiconductor. Mr. Bush says SunPower solar cells are more efficient than the industry average in converting solar energy into electricity. Unlike many other alternative energy companies, SunPower already generates a small profit, and its revenue could reach $600 million next year and $1 billion in 2008, Mr. Bush said.

A renewable portfolio standard should help alternative energy move closer to parity with traditional energy sources, Mr. Bush said. "Each technology individually is on a path to reducing costs and achieving parity with traditional energy sources, some very dramatically. The wind industry is probably closest to achieving economic viability without any support" from the federal government.

One company he favors is Zoltek, which makes lightweight carbon-fiber blades for wind turbines.

Zoltek could also be helped by a longer extension of federal renewable energy tax credits, a legislative goal of wind-energy lobbyists. The production tax credits, which reward electricity producers for each kilowatt of energy they generate from renewable sources, are scheduled to expire next year. In the past, the credits have typically been extended for two years at a time, which the wind-energy industry maintains is too short a period to stimulate long-term investment.

Democrats will support a longer extension, Senator Bingaman said. "Clearly, we do need to extend those tax credits that relate to renewable energy, and we need to do so for a longer period," he said.

A consensus on alternative energy is perhaps closest in biofuels, which have the support of many Republicans, particularly from farm belt and southern states. "I do think we need to increase the use of biofuels as much and as quickly as possible," Senator Sessions said.

He said he favors increased research support for cellulosic ethanol — ethanol produced from plant matter — along with government aid to test production of the fuel. The Bush administration is soon expected to outline a plan to aid cellulosic development.

Matthew W. Patsky, co-portfolio manager of the Winslow Green Growth fund in Boston, said that of all the alternative energy technologies, "cellulosic ethanol has the greatest upside." But he added that it was hard to identify worthwhile investments. "I don't know who's going to win," he said, because, at the moment, it is too costly to producing cellulosic ethanol.

In the meantime, most ethanol in the United States will be derived from corn, and Democrats in Congress plan several initiatives that would help the growing roster of publicly traded corn ethanol producers like Archer Daniels Midland, Aventine Renewable Energy, The Andersons, VeraSun Energy and Pacific Ethanol.

In a position paper on energy, the Democrats set a goal of having ethanol available at 10 percent of domestic gas stations by 2015, along with a mandate that would require automakers to increase production of vehicles that can run on either gasoline or an 85 percent ethanol mix. Such a mandate is necessary to push major oil companies that own many gas stations to install ethanol pumps, said Senator Charles E. Schumer, Democrat of New York. "We believe we have to push the country into alternative fuels whether the oil companies like it or not," he said.

But corn ethanol investments are risky because producers remain hostage to both rising corn prices and falling gas prices. A "sliding credit" that increases ethanol subsidies as gas prices fall "is the type of thing that has to be looked at," Senator Schumer said.

Still, oil and gas prices are likely to rise over the long term, with increased demand from China, India and other developing countries, he added. "Even if oil goes down $10, the price is still high enough for alternative energy to compete," he said. "Alternative fuels are viable with oil at $50 a barrel."

Senator Bingaman said he hopes to tighten standards on carbon emissions from coal-burning utilities by instituting a nationwide cap, along with "a market-based system for emitters to buy allowances to emit and trade allowances to emit."

Headwaters, a company based in South Jordan, Utah, that has technologies that treat coal to reduce sulfur, nitrous oxide and mercury emissions, stands to benefit from caps, Mr. Bush of RBC Capital said. He has a "high 30s" target for Headwaters shares, which now trade at around $24. The White House has opposed strict emission caps in the past, but opposition may be more muted this time around, the RBC Capital analyst said.

INVESTORS in alternative energy may also get help from the states. New Democratic governors in Massachusetts and Ohio are expected to join an alliance of Northeastern states that has pushed to tighten emission standards for coal-fired plants, Mr. Patsky said. One beneficiary might be Fuel Tech, which sells systems that reduce such emissions, he said. The stock is up more than 170 percent this year. It closed on Friday at $24.90, but Mr. Patsky said it could rise to $35 or $40 within a year.

Some states may also move to impose "green" building standards, Mr. Patsky said. Beneficiaries may include Interface, which makes synthetic carpets from recycled plastics, and Herman Miller, which makes extensive use of recycled materials in its office furniture.

The re-election of Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger of California on an enthusiastically pro-environment platform could encourage other states to pass green legislation, Mr. Patsky said. "That single state alone could have tremendous impact."

minimize "partisanship and gridlock." But if the only way these officials know to make nice is to do it in secret, they're missing the point.

Consider the charade that constituted the school board's election of officers last week. As reported by The Post's Nelson Hernandez, the elevation to chairman and vice chairman of R. Owen Johnson Jr. (District 5) and Verjeana M. Jacobs (At Large) was worked out behind closed doors hours before the public vote. Instead of debate and discussion, the public was presented with a done deal.

Mr. Johnson and Ms. Jacobs are proven leaders, and it's encouraging that this board is mindful of the history of acrimony that made the last elected school board so ineffective, ultimately leading to its abolition. But good government rests on the public's ability to witness how public business is conducted. In this case, the people of Prince George's were entitled to hear why these two officials were deemed best suited to lead the board in the coming year and to hear any contrary arguments.

Mr. Reid says he plans to open the 110th Congress with a closed gathering of all 100 senators. We're all for senators getting to know each other. But when they meet as the Senate, it should be in public. Reducing gridlock depends on more senators putting the public good ahead of the two-year electoral cycle, not on cooking up more deals behind closed doors.

The excuses for secrecy aren't always the same. Mr. Reid seems to be worried that the inflamed bases of each party might not tolerate public displays of bipartisanship. Prince George's officials, like D.C. Council members who have bottled up a badly needed open-meetings law, worry that public discussion becomes disingenuous and policymaking is cramped. But openness is hardly a revolutionary concept. A lot of jurisdictions across this country have opened their processes to public review. Maybe officials choose their words with a little more care, but there is still debate and compromise, disagreement and agreement, and government goes on. Anything less is an admission that public officials really can't be believed when they are in the public eye.

Incoming D.C. Council Chair Vincent C. Gray (D) is now mulling his council priorities; bringing sunshine to the decisions and deliberations of D.C. government should be at the top of his list. The Prince George's school board shouldn't be embarrassed to thrash out its disagreements before its employers -- the public, that is. And Mr. Reid ought to set a better example. As Lucy Dalglish of the Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press said, "the only way to restore public trust in what the Congress is up to is have more transparency," not less.

Poor Bush Had A Week That Reeked (NYDN)

By Thomas M. DeFrank

New York Daily News, December 10, 2006

WASHINGTON - For a wounded President locked in a lethal downward spiral ever since his reelection, it was the cruelest week of all.

Not since Bill Clinton forlornly insisted that "the President is still relevant" after being trounced in the 1994 mid-term elections has a President struggled so hard to salvage his political traction.

In 72 hours last week, a bipartisan commission harshly repudiated Bush's Iraq policy. Incoming Secretary of Defense Robert Gates told senators the U.S. isn't winning the war. Then a British journalist snarkily asked at a White House press conference if Bush weren't "in denial" about Iraq.

For good measure, a new poll found only 27% of Americans back his Iraq policy, a new low. And a moderate GOP senator termed the policy "absurd" and possibly criminal.

"He'll be fine but he can't be doing very good," said a well-placed Bush source who talks with the President often. "It's been a terrible year, and it keeps getting worse."

Yet Bush is described by another recent visitor as still resolutely defiant, convinced history will ultimately vindicate him.

"I'll be dead when they get it right," he said during an Oval Office meeting last week.

Another Bush confidant, however, says the President reluctantly understands an Iraq course correction is mandatory:

"He is determined not to let Iraq go up in smoke and start a slaughter. But he knows something's got to give here. It just has to. We're going to start a pullout. The only question is when."

Despite the Democratic takeover of Capitol Hill and the steady cavalcade of grim news from Iraq, White House chief of staff Josh Bolten and political guru Karl Rove are busily overseeing Bush's State of the Union address, scheduled for Jan. 23.

Outside Republican sources report that except for isolated pockets of realism, the West Wing bunker hasn't yet absorbed Bush's diminished power.

"The White House is totally constipated," a former aide complained. "There's not enough adult leadership, and the 30-year-olds still think it's 2000 and they're riding high."

One White House assistant insisted to a friend last week that the election was merely a repudiation of Bush's execution, not his policies.

DOJ_NMG_0104902

"They don't get it," a GOP mandarin snapped. "The Iraq report was their brass ring to pivot and salvage the last two years, and they didn't grab it."

Even if the chaos in Iraq subsides, prospects for other Bush accomplishments in the twilight of his term are difficult at best.

"Short of doing something on Iraq, there's not much good he can do anymore," a key Bush adviser conceded.

A senior Republican official who enjoys excellent relations with the White House was even more downbeat.

"We will get an immigration bill, and the President will make a valiant but doomed attempt at entitlement reform," he said. "But we are looking at two frustrating years of gridlock and several foreign policy failures."

Disputed Nominee Myers Has An Abramoff Problem (LAT)

By Henry Weinstein

The Los Angeles Times, December 10, 2006

Five years ago, high-powered Washington lobbyist Jack Abramoff went to a dinner with top officials of the Interior Department, representatives of the White House and leaders of the National Mining Assn.

That Georgetown dinner has now come back to haunt one of the guests — William G. Myers III, who was the Interior Department's top lawyer at the time and for the last three years one of President Bush's most controversial nominees for a federal judgeship.

Last week, Myers was asked to explain why he testified earlier to the Senate Judiciary Committee that he had never met Abramoff.

Virtually every major environmental group in the country as well as civil rights, women's, labor and American Indian organizations have vigorously opposed Myers' nomination to the U.S. 9th Circuit Court of Appeals. Senate Democrats have succeeded in blocking his appointment, saying they feared Myers, who has spent much of his career as a lawyer and lobbyist for mining and grazing interests, would be an anti-environmental activist on the bench.

Myers' backers counter that he would bring balance to the 9th Circuit, which they maintain is too liberal.

Immediately after the November midterm election, Bush announced his intention to renominate Myers — who now practices law in Boise, Idaho — to the San Francisco-based court.

In recent days though, questions have arisen about Myers' March 2005 response to a query by Sen. Patrick J. Leahy of Vermont, the ranking Democratic on the judiciary committee. Leahy asked Myers whether he had ever had any contact with Abramoff, then the subject of intense federal investigations who later pleaded guilty to conspiracy and wire fraud and is serving 70 months in prison.

"I have searched my memory and files," Myers responded. "To the best of my recollection, I have never had any contact with Mr. Abramoff. I do not recall ever meeting him, speaking to him by phone, corresponding with him at any time, or otherwise having any contact with Mr. Abramoff."

A week ago, however, the Denver Post published a story based on information obtained under the Freedom of Information Act showing that Myers was among two dozen people attending the dinner on Sept. 24, 2001, with Abramoff. Sponsored by the Council of Republicans for Environmental Advocacy, the event was held at the home of Republican fundraiser Julie Finley.

On Tuesday, Leahy asked Myers in writing to explain the "discrepancy between your testimony to the Judiciary Committee and the documents obtained by the Denver Post."

Myers sent a written response to Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), outgoing chairman of the judiciary committee, saying, "I simply have no recollection of encountering Mr. Abramoff at the event. I did not know him or who he was. Nor do I have any recollection of meeting him after the event."

On Friday, Leahy said on the Senate floor that the Post story remained "unrefuted and unexplained." Leahy, who is set to become chairman of the judiciary committee in January, said Bush had "squandered an opportunity to fill Idaho's vacancy on the 9th Circuit" by renominating Myers.

Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.), who has opposed Myers' bid for a judgeship on the grounds that he lacks the necessary qualifications and independence, was more pointed. "The revelation that Mr. Myers gave seemingly misleading responses to the judiciary committee about his contact with Jack Abramoff raises yet another question about his nomination," Feinstein said.

"In light of the many concerns about Mr. Myers' fitness to serve on the second highest court in the nation and the bipartisan Senate opposition to Mr. Myers' nomination, I hope that the president will choose not to renominate Mr. Myers in the 110th Congress," Feinstein added.

But Blair Jones, a White House spokesman, said the president had no intention of withdrawing the nomination. "We believe that Mr. Myers is well-qualified, and we look forward to his confirmation," Jones said Friday afternoon

Representatives of environmental groups and Indian tribes said the latest revelations heightened their concerns about Myers.

Among their earlier concerns: Myers' role in promoting a proposed 1,600-acre open-pit gold mine that would be adjacent to federally designated wilderness in Imperial County. The area contains 55 recorded historic properties eligible for listing on the National Register of Historic Places, as well as religious sites, including prayer circles, ceremonial places, shrines and petroglyphs. While serving as the top lawyer at the Interior Department, Myers supported development of the mining operation by Glamis Gold Ltd. of Canada.

Attorney Courtney A. Coyle, who represents the Quechan tribe, said in a telephone interview last week that the new documents showed that Myers was at the Sept. 24, 2001, dinner — whose guests included Interior Secretary Gale A. Norton and top leaders of the National Mining Assn. who supported the Glamis project — and that he met the next day with Interior Department lawyers to discuss the project.

In October 2001, Myers reversed his predecessor's opinion to block the Glamis project and allowed it to move forward.

Two years later, a federal judge in Washington, D.C., ruled that Myers had "misconstrued the clear mandate" of the Federal Lands Policy Management Act, which "by its plain terms, vests the secretary of the Interior with the authority — and indeed the obligation — to disapprove" mines that "would unduly harm or degrade the public land."

Cardin Is Learning The Ropes, His Role (WP)

By Matthew Mosk

The Washington Post, December 10, 2006

Congressman Benjamin L. Cardin had only just stepped onto the U.S. Senate floor this month -- his first visit to the august chamber since this fall's election -- when he instinctively pulled out his cellphone.

Before it reached his ear, Cardin says he felt a sharp jab from Sen. Barbara A. Mikulski (D-Md.), who snapped, "Don't you dare!"

After 20 years in the nation's lower chamber, and 20 more as speaker of the Maryland House of Delegates, Cardin (D) is still adjusting to the peculiar customs of his new job. But in the unmarked basement warren of transition offices for new members, the soon-to-be junior senator from Maryland said he is brimming with plans.

"I'm not coming to the Senate to retire," said Cardin, 63, when asked about the charge that his Republican opponent, Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele, frequently leveled during a year of campaigning. "I'm going to be very busy. And I won't waste a minute."

The man who once advised freshman House members to zero in on one or two subject areas and develop a specialty, quickly discovered that he would have to abandon that approach after two decades as one of the House's experts on health-care and pension matters. He served on one panel: the powerful Ways and Means Committee.

When Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.), who will become Senate majority leader next month, called Cardin shortly before the election to ask what committees might interest him, Cardin said his answer was Finance, where such matters are often deliberated.

"He said, 'Not gonna happen,' " Cardin said, laughing.

Instead, Cardin will find himself in the thick of deliberations over the Iraq war as a member of the Foreign Relations Committee and will serve on panels that deal with the budget, the environment, minority business and judicial appointments. When he rattled off the list of committees during an interview last week, Cardin paused at the thought of it. "I'm wondering how I'm going to be on five committees," he mused.

James A. Thurber, director of the Center for Congressional and Presidential Studies at American University, said Cardin will see a "significant difference" as he switches chambers. Serving on all those committees means that he will be able to range across a wide area, which he is likely to find liberating.

What he is not likely to be, Thurber said, is a headline-grabber -- perhaps in contrast with his Democratic colleague across the Potomac in Virginia, Sen.-elect James Webb, who quickly made waves.

Cardin said he didn't see the exchange between Webb and President Bush at a White House reception for freshman members of Congress. Bush asked, "How's your boy?" referring to Webb's son, a Marine serving in Iraq. After a brief exchange, Webb replied, "That's between me and my boy, Mr. President."

Cardin's exchange with the president that evening was "very friendly," he said. Bush ribbed him about his tough campaign against Steele, the GOP's candidate.

In the end, Maryland political observers from both parties said last week, Cardin is likely to become a natural successor to the man whose seat he will take, retiring Sen. Paul S. Sarbanes (D), a workhorse who shapes policy and legislation without much attention.

"He's a legislative workman," Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.), who will soon be House majority leader, said of Cardin. "When Ben hears a problem and hears testimony, he knows how to turn that into a legislative solution. In the Senate, that legislative skill, that problem-solving skill, will really be valued."

Big Names, Big Dollars In Bush Library Bid (HC)

By Thomas Korosec

Houston Chronicle, December 10, 2006

DALLAS — For a president, it's a place where his legacy is polished and set on display for posterity.

For the host town, a presidential library can mean an instant tourist attraction and a shot of economic vitality.

Three Texas universities are hoping to land the George W. Bush presidential library, and each is calling in its own heavy hitters and Bush backers to try to make the case.

Baylor touts its location, Southern Methodist University its personal ties and the University of Dallas its spacious site.

The president's library site-selection committee, which has been working entirely in private, could choose a winner among the three finalists as early as next month.

SMU, Laura Bush's alma mater, has been widely considered the frontrunner since the first lady told the Houston Chronicle in a 2005 interview that the school is her sentimental favorite.

The president's wife, who sits on the SMU board, also indicated the Bushes are likely to re-establish a home in the Dallas area, where they lived before moving to Austin in 1995 when he became governor.

Giving the school another edge, White House counsel Harriet Miers, another SMU graduate, is among the close friends and advisers of the president who have been said to be participants in the decision.

Attempting perhaps to level the field, Baylor and the University of Dallas have enlisted their own prominent Bush supporters to make their pitches.

Houston Astros owner Drayton McLane, a Bush friend and Baylor alumnus, was recruited to head the school's presidential library steering committee.

The University of Dallas, meanwhile, brought along Bush supporter Nancy Cain Marcus when it presented the school's proposal to the selection committee in Washington last fall.

Big financial supportSMU has had some deep-pockets help as well. Dallas oilman Ray Hunt gave the school $35 million to buy a shopping center at a corner of the campus as a potential library site.

"You have all the key supporters lined up behind their pick of the three schools," said James "Skip" Rutherford, head of the William Jefferson Clinton Foundation and a key player in the building of the Clinton library in Little Rock, Ark.

"When one is picked, my sense is that they'll coalesce around whatever site President Bush decides on."

Presidential libraries are built by private donations but are run by the National Archives and Records Administration.

The bulk of private donations, which can be unlimited in size, typically comes from a president's loyal supporters, foundations and foreign governments, Rutherford said.

Bush's library, which could cost $200 million or more, is expected to include a library housing the president's papers and archives, a museum and a public policy think tank.

The institute, on the order of Stanford University's Hoover Institution, would perpetuate — some say burnish — Bush's legacy and promote his policies beyond his presidency.

Three strong proposalsRutherford, who has visited the three sites and consulted with the committee and schools, said all three proposals have strengths — and supporters who are ready to step in to make up for their possible weaknesses.

"It's truly a three-way contest," he said. "I told (Bush adviser) Karl Rove he has three good choices."

At Baylor in Waco, he said, the library would have the advantage of being "a big fish in a little pond" and the "top draw in the city."

The $165 million Clinton library drew 500,000 visitors in its first year and transformed a formerly rundown warehouse district in Little Rock by anchoring about $1 billion in new development, he said.

Waco, a city of 120,000, could be similarly transformed, Rutherford said.

Baylor and SMU didn't wait for the Bush committee's request for proposals before they began working to land the project. Both schools wrote letters of interest in hosting the library even before Bush won election in November 2000.

Tommy Lou Davis, Baylor's director of the library project, said the school is offering a 150-acre site "of naturally beautiful land on the banks of the Brazos River."

More than 30 million people a year pass by the location on Interstate 35, she said.

The school is pitching its proximity to the George H.W. Bush and Lyndon Johnson libraries in College Station and Austin, respectively, and the fact that the site is just 20 minutes from the president's ranch west of the city.

Davis said the city's civic and political establishment is lined up behind the school's bid. A local businessman, Clifton Robinson, has offered to finance the $6 million public share of a $35 million four-star hotel near the Bush complex if Baylor is selected.

New image wantedThe city's small size and its association with events such as the Branch Davidian siege and the 1953 tornado that devastated its downtown have tended to crop up in media accounts of the school's bid.

And in Waco, the unflattering portrayals rankle residents.

"I wish people would give us a break," Davis said. "I don't see anyone remembering that JFK was shot in Dallas, and that was after the tornado in Waco — if we're going to start drumming up all these old things."

SMU, whose staid Georgian-style campus takes up the southeast corner of wealthy University Park, has declined to make public any details of its library bid, including where on campus the library would be.

"We have presented options to the selection committee and not specified in public where those options are," said Brad Cheves, SMU's vice president for development and external affairs. "Of course, there is speculation."

Shopping center purchasedMost of the speculation centers on the southeastern portion of the campus, where the university has been buying property and where the Hunt gift was used to purchase the 4-acre Park Cities Plaza shopping center.

It is also adjacent to Central Expressway, which is the only access to the campus that does not involve Park Cities' already overburdened two-lane residential streets.

The university has been feverishly trying to remove obstacles to acquiring all the land in the densely developed area. It cleared one hurdle Friday when a federal judge ruled the university has proper title to a condominium it purchased last year.

Two condo owners who have refused to move out accused the university in civil lawsuits of using fraud and intimidation to take their property for what they said is clearly the library site.

"We think the lawsuit is without merit," Cheves said, adding that it has had no bearing on the university's proposal or a decision by the Bush site committee. "It is unrelated to the proposal process."

The university still must buy several other properties in the area. And acquisition of a strip of parkland behind the shopping center will require approval by University Park voters.

Some Dallas officials, including Mayor Laura Miller, have expressed concern that a heavily visited library at SMU will cause traffic nightmares in an already crowded area.

The university says those concerns are overstated.

"SMU has been in its location for more than 100 years, and we're accustomed to having special events and community activities," Cheves said. "This would be no different."

By contrast, the University of Dallas, which is west of the city in Irving, is offering the most spacious site.

Its hilly, wooded 300-acre site off Texas 114 has a view of downtown Dallas and easy access to the area's two commercial airports.

The city of Irving has proposed committing $50 million in hotel/motel taxes to construction of the library, which would be near Texas Stadium.

City officials expect the stadium to be torn down and the site redeveloped after the Dallas Cowboys move to Arlington in 2009.

With approximately 3,000 students, though, the Catholic liberal arts university has a much lower profile than its two bigger rivals.

Rutherford said vacationers traveling by car make up the bulk of visitors to the Clinton library and other presidential libraries across the country. The three finalists are all close to interstate highways, he pointed out.

Big crowds expectedGeneral attendance tends to spike in the opening year, and again upon the president's death, according to National Archives figures.

The Ronald Reagan hilltop library museum, which is in Simi Valley, Calif., west of Los Angeles, broke that mold when it added an Air Force One exhibit and attendance shot up to 440,000 in the 12 months ending in October, archives records show.

Regardless of which site is picked, Rutherford said he expects the Bush library will be a big draw.

"So much has happened during his presidency that people are going to want to know about," he said. "9/11, that was this generation's Pearl Harbor. There are so many major events: the Iraq war, Katrina, the tsunami. People will want to come to this library."

Discovery Takes Off On A Complex Mission (NYT)

By John Schwartz

The New York Times, December 10, 2006

CAPE CANAVERAL, Fla., Dec. 9 — Night became day on Saturday as the shuttle Discovery muscled its way off of the launching pad with a shuddering roar on a mission to rewire the International Space Station.

With a blinding streak of yellow flame that left a mark on the retina and a lump in the throat, the shuttle and its crew of seven astronauts lifted off at 8:47 p.m. in the program's first nighttime launching in more than four years.

DOJ_NMG_0104906

It was the second launching attempt for the Discovery. Weather concerns forced mission managers to scrub on Thursday, and on Friday the forecast was even worse. Early Saturday, there were high crosswinds here at the John F. Kennedy Space Center landing strip.

But the winds died and the weather improved as the evening progressed, and the mission management team ultimately gave approval for launching.

Just before beginning the final countdown, the shuttle launching director, Michael D. Leinbach, polled his team and then called to the Discovery's commander, Mark L. Polansky, using his nickname.

"O.K., Roman, 48 hours makes a tremendous difference," Mr. Leinbach said. "The weather is outstanding, the vehicle is in great shape, so we wish you all good luck, Godspeed, and we'll see you back here in 12 days."

After liftoff, the firing room erupted in cheers and applause, and Mr. Leinbach said, "Calm down now, we've got eight minutes to orbit."

Those eight minutes passed with exceeding smoothness. The crew and the launching team calmly communicated the milestones of reaching orbit: the "go at throttle up" call about a minute into flight as the shuttle passed through the zone of maximum turbulence; the separation of the solid rocket boosters; the main engine cutoff; and the separation of the external tank. Discovery was well on its way to catching up with the space station on Monday.

Since the loss of the shuttle Columbia in 2003, liftoffs have taken place during the day so NASA analysts can look for the kind of liftoff debris that doomed that shuttle and its crew. This nighttime launching made it harder to make out any debris in the images from the camera on the shuttle's external fuel tank, but those images and data from radar and other sensors will be scrutinized for signs of damage to the craft. "We'll have lots of looks at it," said LeRoy Cain, the head of the launching mission management team.

The 12-day mission promises to be one of the most complex in the history of the shuttle program. The astronauts are to install a stubby extension to the station's structure and reconfigure its electrical system to receive power from new solar arrays.

The mission also includes a tricky effort to coax a solar array that has been standing atop the station for six years to fold itself into a more compact form, out of the way so that the new array can rotate to face the sun continuously.

The work will prepare the station to generate the power it will need for the next rounds of construction and expansion, and to meet the needs of a crew that will eventually double to six from three. Spacewalkers will unplug and reattach 112 power connectors in the process.

The rewiring is risky. Half of the space station's electrical system will be powered down as its wiring is reconfigured, and then brought up again. Then, in another spacewalk, the astronauts will shut down the other half of the station's electrical system. Crucial systems will remain online, since they can receive power from either power network. But some lights, communications systems and other components will be turned off during each of the two rewiring spacewalks, and mission managers have fretted about what might happen if those do not come back online.

Then, after the power procedure is complete, the astronauts must start cooling pumps that will control the temperature of the circuit control boxes. The pumps have not been used in four years, and that, too, has managers sweating.

Just two members of the Discovery's crew — Commander Polansky, a former Air Force test pilot, and Capt. Robert L. Curbeam Jr. of the Navy — have been to space before. The rest of the crew members will be taking their first trip, including the pilot, Cmdr. William A. Oefelein of the Navy; Cmdr. Sunita L. Williams of the Navy; Nicholas J. M. Patrick; Joan E. Higginbotham; and Christer Fuglesang, the first Swedish astronaut and a representative of the European Space Agency.

Commander Williams will remain on the space station for six-months, and Thomas Reiter of the European Space Agency, who has been living on the station, will climb aboard the shuttle for his ride back to earth.

In the post-liftoff briefing on Saturday night, the NASA administrator, Michael D. Griffin, said the shuttle and the station were now part of a larger effort to return to the work of sending humans to explore the Moon and the planets.

"We have to learn to live on other planetary surfaces," Mr. Griffin said, "and use what we find there and bend it to our will — just as the pilgrims did when they came to what is now New England."

It is part of what it takes "to become a space-faring nation," he said, adding that it is up to NASA to make that happen.

"Sometimes we stumble," Mr. Griffin said. "Today, we didn't stumble."

Shuttle Discovery Climbs Into Night Sky (LAT)

By John Johnson Jr., Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, December 10, 2006

The launch is the first after dark since the Columbia disaster.

The shuttle Discovery roared into space Saturday night on a 12-day mission to continue construction of the International Space Station and reconfigure the station's electrical system.

DOJ_NMG_0104907

It was the third launch in the last five months and the first nighttime launch in more than four years as the American space agency continues its recovery from the 2003 Columbia disaster.

"We look forward to lighting up the night sky and rewiring the ISS," shuttle Commander Mark Polansky said just before the shuttle's engines ignited at 8:47 p.m. EST at Kennedy Space Center in Florida.

The three main engines and two solid rocket boosters, providing 7 million pounds of thrust, propelled the shuttle from a standing start to its orbiting speed of 17,400 mph as it made its eight-minute climb to space.

Early reports from ground safety officers indicated that the launch appeared clean.

Launch Director Mike Leinbach said the successful launch was the best sign yet that NASA had fully recovered from the Columbia disaster.

"We're getting back in the groove. We're getting back in business," Leinbach said.

NASA Administrator Michael D. Griffin said the launch marked another milestone in finishing the space station and going beyond.

"The space station is on the footpath toward becoming a space-faring nation," Griffin said, referring to plans to return to the moon and then head on to Mars.

Navigating space is one of the most technologically difficult tasks mankind has faced, he said.

"We do it as well as we can. Sometimes we stumble. Today, we didn't stumble," Griffin said.

Several days of analysis of radar images from the ground and an on-orbit inspection by the shuttle crew will be required to make sure there were no problems, such as the one that doomed Columbia. A piece of foam insulation flaked off the external fuel tank during Columbia's launch and hit the left wing, tearing a hole in it.

NASA ground managers and the crew were unaware of the problem until the shuttle attempted to land, and atmospheric forces widened the damage and finally destroyed the shuttle.

The seven-person crew of Discovery has three major tasks.

It will deliver a replacement crew member to the space station, Sunita Williams, to replace European astronaut Thomas Reiter, who has been at the station since July.

Discovery will also deliver a 2-ton truss as NASA continues assembling the backbone of the station. The final task is the most challenging: to take the station off the temporary power grid it has been using for the last six years and bring online the giant set of solar arrays that were delivered by the last shuttle mission.

Power will be routed through four Main Bus Switching Units on the central truss attached in April 2002. These units have never been activated and were last checked in December 2002.

Three spacewalks will be required to complete the work. To minimize the danger of something going wrong and leaving the station without power, the spacewalkers will shut down only half of the station at a time.

The new truss section will be attached on the fourth day of the flight. The power and thermal reconfiguration will take place on Day 6 of the 12-day mission. The second half will take place during the third spacewalk on the eighth day of the mission.

NASA had required daylight launches for the first three missions after Columbia so the space agency could obtain good daytime photos of the fuel tank. NASA now believes it understands the foam problem well enough to launch at night, relying on radar to spot any debris flaking off the fuel tank.

Nighttime launches are necessary for NASA to stick to its announced schedule of completing construction of the station and retiring the shuttle fleet by 2010.

Another reason to get the flight in before the end of the year is that shuttle computers are not designed to make the changeover from the 365th day of the year to the first day of a new year.

NASA managers think they have a solution but are reluctant to try it if they don't have to.

Discovery Lights Up Night (HC)

By Mark Carreau, Houston Chronicle

Houston Chronicle, December 10, 2006

Shuttle heads to space station for 12-day mission

CAPE CANAVERAL, FLA. — The shuttle Discovery thundered into the darkness with seven astronauts late Saturday, lighting up a wintry sky along the East Coast of the United States with a fiery fury.

Discovery soared toward a rendezvous with the international space station, where the shuttle crew plans to expand the electrical power-distribution grid.

DOJ_NMG_0104908

The liftoff from NASA's Kennedy Space Center was the first in darkness for a shuttle in four years. Discovery's 12-day mission will mark the third shuttle flight this year, the most the space agency has attempted since the fatal 2003 Columbia accident.

All will have flown in the past six months, establishing a launch pace that should enable the space agency to finish the construction of the half-built orbital base before the shuttle is retired in 2010, said NASA Administrator Michael Griffin.

"We are trying to get back to a normal operating tempo in the program to finish the space station," Griffin said. "On average we want to fly every two months."

Overcast skies forced a scrub of the first launch attempt Thursday night.

Discovery blasted off at 7:47 p.m. CST, with rockets igniting in a burst of billowing orange exhaust. The spacecraft climbed steeply on a northerly course, trailing a dagger of fire.

"Forty-eight hours makes a tremendous difference," Griffin said. "The weather is outstanding. The vehicle is in great shape."

NASA launch director Mike Leinbach radioed Discovery commander Mark Polansky as the shuttle astronauts were cleared to lift off.

"We look forward to lighting up the night sky," Polansky responded.

Discovery's departure placed the shuttle crew on course to dock with the space station shortly after 4 p.m. CST on Monday.

On Polansky's crew are pilot Bill Oefelein, flight engineer Robert Curbeam and four mission specialists — Christer Fuglesang of the European Space Agency, the first Swedish astronaut, Joan Higginbotham, Nick Patrick and Sunita Williams.

Curbeam, a veteran of two previous missions, will lead the mission's three spacewalks, joined on the first two by Fuglesang and on the last by Williams.

Williams has trained to remain aboard the space station until mid-2007, joining the outpost's current commander, Mike Lopez-Alegria, and Russian cosmonaut Mikhail Tyurin. Williams will replace European Space Agency astronaut Thomas Reiter of Germany.

This is considered among the most difficult of the 19 assembly missions NASA has flown to the space station so far.

The astronauts will spend today inspecting the wings and nose of Discovery for damage to the heatshield from flying launch debris. Though tracked by cameras and radar, Discovery's nighttime departure was expected to limit detection of damage.

Columbia's disintegration was traced to undetected wing damage from falling foam fuel-tank insulation. After three daytime liftoffs in the accident's aftermath, shuttle managers were ready to resume the night launches.

Discovery carries an $11 million, 11-foot-long extension for the station's growing solar power-generation system.

"Many of us consider this the most challenging space station flight we've done since we began the assembly effort," Mike Suffredini, NASA space-station program manager, said this week. "When the shuttle leaves (the space station) will not look much different than when Discovery got there, but it will be a dramatically different vehicle inside."

The current power system is adequate for the station's U.S. laboratory. The changes will rewire the system to distribute power from the solar power module delivered by Atlantis in September and two more modules due next year and in 2008. The added power will accommodate European and Japanese research modules and the life-support gear for more resident astronauts.

The six-hour spacewalks, which get under way in the mid-afternoon, are scheduled for Tuesday, Thursday and Saturday.

The astronauts are due to return Dec. 21.

Shuttle Launches At Night To Rewire Station (WP)

By William Harwood, Special To The Washington Post

The Washington Post, December 10, 2006

CAPE CANAVERAL, Dec. 9 -- The space shuttle Discovery, briefly turning night into day, streaked into space Saturday evening and set off after the international space station to rewire the outpost and activate its main power system.

With Cmdr. Mark L. Polansky and Pilot William A. Oefelein at the controls, Discovery climbed away from the Kennedy Space Center at 8:47 p.m., two days late because of low clouds and high winds.

Discovery put on a spectacular show as it thundered aloft atop 5,000-degree plumes of flame from its solid-fuel boosters. It was NASA's first night launch since the 2003 Columbia disaster, the result of increased confidence in the shuttle's redesigned external fuel tank.

DOJ_NMG_0104909

The brilliant light of the takeoff illuminated the shuttle's heat shield in the first two minutes of flight. But engineers will not be able to assess the health of the protective tiles until a detailed inspection Sunday by the astronauts and again during final approach to the space station Monday.

Discovery's mission is considered the most complex station assembly flight yet attempted and one of the most complicated in manned spaceflight history.

The astronauts will switch the space station from an interim power system, used during initial assembly, to an permanent setup, featuring new solar arrays installed in September and others set for launch next year. The station's two major power circuits must be powered down, one at a time, and then reconnected, leaving some critical systems without backups until the switchover is complete.

During two of three planned spacewalks, crew members Robert L. Curbeam, Sunita L. Williams and Swedish astronaut Christer Fuglesang will unplug and replug dozens of power lines and then stand by while ground controllers send hundreds of commands to reroute electrical power and activate the station's ammonia cooling system.

Without cooling, the main components in the electrical switching system will overheat. The cooling system is powered by the same switching units, so quick activation of two ammonia pumps is crucial.

Before any of that work can begin, however, the astronauts first must retract one of the solar arrays powering the interim system to provide the clearance needed to begin rotating the newly installed panels so they can track the sun.

The array that needs to be retracted has been fully extended for six years, and no one knows whether the huge panel will, in fact, fold up as required. In addition, the pumps needed to drive ammonia through the cooling system have never been powered up in space.

Williams will remain aboard the station, and German astronaut Thomas Reiter, launched to the space station in July, will return to Earth aboard Discovery in her place. Other crew members aboard the shuttle are Joan E. Higginbotham and Nicholas J.M. Patrick.

If all goes well, Discovery will return to Earth on Dec. 21.

Don't Colonize The Moon (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, December 10, 2006

A manned moon mission doesn't make sense. Robots are better -- just look at their success on Mars.

WHEN IT COMES TO poetic vision, "Fly Me to the Moon" has it all over "Global Precipitation Mission." But the prosaic and twice-delayed NASA meteorology project would conduct a useful scientific study of Earth weather. A return to the moon is a romantic but expensive mission in search of a purpose.

NASA's announcement last week that it would erect a permanent moon station by 2020 as a sort of scientific way station to Mars was dramatic but not unexpected — especially not after President Bush gave a speech two years ago calling on the space agency to return astronauts to the moon and from there to Mars. NASA officials enthused about the international partners for the moon project and the savings they would achieve by using existing technologies. What they didn't say is how much it would cost — and more important, why do it in the first place except to recapture a wrinkled sense of glory.

Even NASA's "Why the Moon?" website doesn't really explain it. It's full of oddly cheerful videos ("We're going back to the moon … this time to stay!") suggesting that people might like to colonize the moon as a new home (not until the surf's up at the Sea of Tranquillity) and vowing that this will enable new scientific studies, encourage global cooperation and inspire children. These are laudable goals, all of which could be managed without a manned moon station and a 12-figure price tag. The U.S. and India already are working together on an unmanned space mission.

Manned moon flight may appeal to baby boomers, but it makes little scientific sense for most space missions these days. Robots can now perform, or be developed to perform, most of the tasks people would do at a moon station. And even if the world shares the goal of landing astronauts on Mars, this is a roundabout way to achieve it. Why re-create the old technologies for going to the moon when they are of no use to get to Mars?

For too long, NASA has been overspending on manned flight and under-funding scientific study. Vital missions to study the Earth's climate, for example, have been delayed for years or indefinitely. An unmanned scientific mission to scan for Earth-like planets in nearby solar systems, scheduled to launch in 2011, has been postponed until 2015.

Frank Sinatra recorded the song "Fly Me to the Moon" in 1964, five years before Neil Armstrong got there. These days, it makes more sense to have robots do the flying. Just last week, scientists announced they'd found evidence of water flowing on Mars — a possible harbinger of Martian life. The discoverer of this exciting news? The unmanned Mars Global Surveyor.

A Missile Defense System Is Taking Shape In Alaska (NYT)

By William Yardley

DOJ_NMG_0104910

The New York Times, December 10, 2006

FORT GREELY, Alaska, Dec. 4 — Snow fences help keep drifts from piling up on the missile silos. Heat-sensing security devices that monitor the edges of this 800-acre installation are sometimes set off by wayward moose.

And the soldiers here, members of the 3-year-old 49th Missile Defense Battalion of the Alaska National Guard, were just selected to help field test for the Army the third generation of the Extended Cold Weather Clothing System, seven layers of synthetic meant to resist the brutal winds that rip past the snow-clad peaks of the Alaska Range.

Four years after President Bush ordered a limited missile defense system to be built and nearly a quarter century after Ronald Reagan first proposed the Strategic Defense Initiative, this sub-Arctic outpost, once a cold war training site and still a cold-weather training site, is where progress on the long-embattled missile system is perhaps most evident, military officials say.

Eleven interceptor missiles are installed in underground silos here, buried beneath the snow and a former forest of black spruce. This summer, when North Korea signaled that it planned to fire an intercontinental ballistic missile, Fort Greely, which has never fired a test missile, was put on alert status, ostensibly ready to respond if necessary.

After the test either failed or was aborted, "there was a little bit of a letdown" at the base, said Lt. Col Edward E. Hildreth III, commander of the 49th, "because we were prepared."

That assertion, echoed by other commanders at Fort Greely during a limited tour of the base this week, comes a little more than three months after Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld visited Fort Greely and expressed caution about the program's readiness. Critics have noted that tests on some parts of the system have failed and a recent successful missile test — in California, shortly after Mr. Rumsfeld's visit to Fort Greely — lacked decoys and was unrealistic.

Even as questions persist about capability, the missile defense program is pushing forward at a cost of at least $9 billion a year. About a third of that goes to the kind of operation that is based at Fort Greely, called Ground-Based Midcourse Defense, which is intended to shoot down enemy missiles while they travel through space. Vandenberg Air Force Base in California also houses two interceptors, but military experts say Fort Greely is better situated to interrupt the likely flight path of a missile from Asia or the Middle East.

Just a few years after being shut down, Fort Greely, about 100 miles southeast of Fairbanks, is now the destination of about 1,700 people, including some 200 soldiers, and the rest defense contractors and family members. The base's Brownie troop is at 16 girls and growing — Monday night they made root beer floats — just as the number of interceptors installed at the base is expected to expand to as many as 38.

Now, in a region with barely four hours of daylight in December, there is a new espresso shop on base and an expanded PX that sells flat-screen televisions.

Sgt. Jack W. Carlson III, an intelligence analyst, said he was assigned to Fort Greely before the Pentagon officials created the 49th Missile Defense Battalion. "We didn't have a name," Sergeant Carlson said. "We didn't have patches. We just called ourselves G.M.D.," for Ground-Based Midcourse Defense.

Sergeant Carlson married another soldier and has bought a house in nearby Delta Junction, population 840. He said he heated his house mostly with wood salvaged from the spruce left after a wildfire.

Before Fort Greely, he had been stationed in the Virgin Islands. He learned of openings in the missile defense program through an online posting, he said. "I'd been on the beach all my life, and it was time to see the snow."

Alaska has been crucial to American military interests since long before it became a state in 1959. Now, Adak, in the Aleutian Islands, is scheduled to become the home port of the Sea-Based X-band Radar, a long-delayed system built on a converted oil rig that is critical to the ground-based system's ability to track enemy missiles.

While the 49th is an Alaska National Guard unit, Colonel Hildreth reports to Col. Michael L. Yowell, commander of the 100th Missile Defense Brigade, based in Colorado.

Colonel Hildreth said he was well aware of criticism that missile defense was far from a perfected program. He said Fort Greely operated in a balance between operational mode and construction.

"We build a little, test a little," he said. "It's fluid."

A 12th interceptor will be installed this month. Last summer, however, when American intelligence learned that North Korea might be preparing to launch an intercontinental missile, much of the bustle of contractors on the site stopped. Fort Greely went on alert. The system that had struggled through tests faced the possibility of firing a live missile.

"It got quiet," said Col. Thomas M. Besch, director of Ground-Based Midcourse Defense for the Missile Defense Agency. "And all of a sudden no developmental activity occurred. You could feel in the atmosphere that people were on edge and ready. You were kind of waiting for something to happen, and it didn't."

Top Air Force Lawyer Had Been Disbarred (WP)

By Thomas E. Ricks

The Washington Post, December 10, 2006

A top Air Force lawyer who served at the White House and in a senior position in Iraq turns out to have been practicing law for 23 years without a license.

Col. Michael D. Murphy was most recently commander of the Air Force Legal Operations Agency at Bolling Air Force Base in the District.

He was the general counsel for the White House Military Office from December 2001 to January 2003, and from August 2003 to January 2005. In between those tours, he was the legal adviser to the reconstruction effort in Iraq, an Air Force spokesman said.

Murphy later served in 2005 as commandant of the Air Force Judge Advocate General's School at Maxwell Air Force Base in Montgomery, Ala.

He was relieved of his command at Bolling on Nov. 30 after the Air Force learned that he had been disbarred for professional misconduct in Texas in 1984 but hadn't informed his superiors, according to Air Force Times, an independent newspaper that first reported the action. It said that his status was discovered in the course of an unrelated review.

Murphy could not be reached for comment yesterday. Don Manuszewski, an Air Force spokesman, said that it would be inappropriate to comment because the matter is under investigation.

Murphy's exposure is the second major embarrassment to Air Force lawyers in recent years. In 2005, Maj. Gen. Thomas J. Fiscus, then the service's top lawyer, was demoted to colonel and subsequently retired after he was found to be having inappropriate relationships with subordinates.

Jefferson Overcomes Scandal, Wins Reelection (WP/AP)

By Cain Burdeau

The Washington Post, December 10, 2006

NEW ORLEANS, Dec. 9 -- Voters looked past a federal bribery investigation of Rep. William J. Jefferson (D-La.) and reelected the eight-term congressman in a runoff election Saturday.

Jefferson grabbed a commanding lead over state Rep. Karen Carter, a fellow Democrat, almost as soon as the polls closed in the New Orleans district. With 44 percent of the precincts reporting, Jefferson, had 61 percent of the vote.

Louisiana's 2nd District was one of the nation's last unresolved midterm races, and the runoff election put Jefferson in danger of becoming the only Democratic incumbent to lose this election year.

In her concession speech, Carter embraced family members and pledged to work with Jefferson, particularly on the area's recovery from Hurricane Katrina.

"I guess the people are happy with the status quo," she said.

Jefferson, Louisiana's first black congressman since Reconstruction, has been the target of a wide-ranging investigation into allegations that he took bribes -- including $90,000 allegedly found in his freezer during an FBI raid -- from a company seeking lucrative contracts in the Nigerian telecommunications market. He has not been charged with any crime and denies any wrongdoing.

He described his win as "a great moment and I thank almighty God for making it possible."

The scandal turned the campaign into a debate largely divided along racial lines, an age-old dynamic in this city that has intensified since Katrina displaced large numbers of blacks and upended their demographic and political dominance.

In the Nov. 7 election, whites overwhelmingly voted for Carter, 37, and were her most enthusiastic financial backers, while Jefferson, 59, drew widespread support among blacks.

Carter raised nearly five times as much money as Jefferson, but she was largely outflanked in endorsements as Jefferson picked up the backing of Mayor C. Ray Nagin and other prominent black politicians.

The endorsements spoke to Jefferson's solid footing in New Orleans politics. He arrived here in the 1970s as a Harvard-educated lawyer from rural north Louisiana, the sixth of 10 children brought up in a three-room country home. By 1980, he represented New Orleans in the state Senate.

Jefferson Swarms Back To Win Re-election (NOTP)

New Orleans Times-Picayune, December 10, 2006

Confounding political pundits and a slew of rivals who had become confident of his defeat, U.S. Rep. William Jefferson, D-New Orleans, neatly sidestepped a roiling federal corruption probe to win re-election on Saturday to his ninth term in Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0104912

Guilty pleas by aides and associates who admitted to bribing the congressman and the revelation in court documents that FBI agents had found $90,000 in marked bills stuffed into Jefferson's freezer had put the scent of blood in political waters.

A field of a dozen candidates began circling Jefferson in the primary. He finished first, but with only 30 percent of the vote, inspiring conjecture that his performance amounted to repudiation of an incumbent and that he would surely lose the runoff against state Rep. Karen Carter, D-New Orleans.

Instead, Jefferson, 59, scored a dramatic upset by racking up huge pluralities in African African-dominated precincts in Orleans, and winning outright in Jefferson Parish, where Sheriff Harry Lee had spent his campaign.

The final margin for Jefferson in Jefferson Parish was 71% to 39% - a margin that can be attributed to Sheriff Lee's furious political assault in the closing days of the campaign. Lee not only endorsed to Jefferson, but in the final days, urged Jefferson Parish residents to stay home and not vote. The final tally shows that while 28% of registered voters cast ballots in the primary, only 15% voted Saturday.

Jefferson's victory was even more confounding because the Second Congressional District race was missing all the advantages that usually come with incumbency. Carter had the edge in funding raising, including from business interests that had backed Jefferson in the past. Most of the high-profile endorsements - including those by two former Louisiana senators - went to her, as well.

Jefferson seemed to have secured his upset victory not in public debates or increasingly vicious ad campaigns but in grassroots campaign efforts that carried him to dozens of African-American churches, and, although he isn't a drinker, to many a Second District bar.

Despite the surprise win, Jefferson's problems are far from over. The federal corruption probe, which began on March 15, 2005, continues, and the congressman has all but said he anticipates an indictment.

Rep. Jefferson Holds On To His Seat In Louisiana (LAT)

By Ann M. Simmons

The Los Angeles Times, December 10, 2006

NEW ORLEANS — U.S. Rep. William J. Jefferson, the beleaguered congressman at the center of a federal bribery investigation, pulled off what many had believed would be impossible: He won reelection Saturday to Louisiana's 2nd Congressional District seat.

Jefferson, plagued by more than a year of scandal, received 57% of the vote in complete but unofficial returns. His challenger in the runoff election, Democratic state Rep. Karen Carter, had 43%.

Voter turnout was only about 16% on what turned out to be a cold and windy election day.

At a victory celebration, Jefferson called for unity "on the East Bank, on the West Bank, [between] black and white, rich and poor, with one objective: to recover this wonderful city."

In conceding, Carter told supporters that she had called Jefferson and offered to work with him because "we certainly can't do this alone."

Political analysts said voters in the district, which spans most of New Orleans and the West Bank of neighboring Jefferson Parish, were more concerned with maintaining the status quo than with change.

"It's a vote for continuity," Brian Brox, a political scientist at Tulane University in New Orleans, said of the results.

Jefferson trounced Carter among African Americans and had a strong showing in Jefferson Parish, according to a preliminary analysis by Greg Rigamer of GCR & Associates Inc. More whites voted for Jefferson than blacks did for Carter, according to the analysis. Both Jefferson and Carter are black.

Analysts believe that Carter's fate might also have been sealed by her failure to garner enough votes in Jefferson Parish, where Sheriff Harry Lee mailed out fliers during the final week of the campaign urging parish residents not to vote for her.

Lee and other Jefferson officials were outraged over comments Carter made in a recent Spike Lee documentary, criticizing Jefferson law enforcement officials for blocking Katrina evacuees from crossing a bridge to safety in their parish in the aftermath of the storm.

Jefferson, 59, has held his congressional seat for 16 years and rarely faced a serious challenge for it. The climate changed this year as a federal bribery probe unfolded. He was ousted from the House Ways and Means Committee after agents in an FBI raid said they found $90,000 stashed in a freezer of his Washington home.

Jefferson has not been charged with any crime, and insisted he was innocent.

Many voters believed him.

"I think they lied on him," Curtis Mimms, 82, said as he arrived to cast his ballot at the New Orleans Baptist Theological Seminary in the city's Gentilly neighborhood. "I think he can do the job."

When the congressman dropped by the seminary Saturday he was greeted with hugs, handshakes and smiles.

DOJ_NMG_0104913

Alfreda Baker, 55, said she voted for Jefferson because residents needed someone tough to ensure a break in the logjam in disbursing funds so homeowners could rebuild.

"It's ridiculous. It's been so long. We're taxpayers," said Baker, a retired educator. "Jefferson has proven that he knows who to go to. [Carter's] a new person. She's still just feeling her way."

Perrilyn White, 48, said Jefferson had "been consistent in his dedication to our city regardless of what he's done for himself." Since Katrina, Jefferson has introduced numerous pieces of legislation in Congress to help residents and businesses rebound.

The son of sharecroppers who went on to earn three university degrees and walk the halls of power, Jefferson's story has inspired many supporters.

Many voters said they respected Carter — a seven-year state legislator from a politically active family — but still considered her "a new kid on the block." Carter, 37, had run on a platform of restoring "credibility and respect to political service" and had argued that Jefferson's legal troubles prevented him from offering effective leadership.

"His election might not necessarily translate into an important position [within Congress]," said Brox, the political scientist. And, he said, Carter supporters might argue "what difference is your election going to make if you're not going to be on any important committees?"

Commentators said low temperatures and brisk winds, holiday shopping sales, and distraction over home rebuilding and other recovery activities usually tackled on weekends contributed to low voter turnout.

Many polling stations stood empty for large parts of the day.

"It's nothing particular against Jefferson or Carter," Brox said. "It is just a really bad time to hold an election."

Jefferson Appears Headed To Victory (RC)

By Josh Kurtz

Roll Call, December 10, 2006

Scandal-plagued Rep. William Jefferson (D-La.) appeared headed to an improbable re-election late Saturday night.

With 68 percent of the precincts reporting in the New Orleans-based 2nd district, Jefferson had 23,978 votes for 59 percent, while state Rep. Karen Carter (D) had 16,985 votes for 41 percent. Two New Orleans TV stations have projected that the nine-term Congressman will be the winner.

Jefferson won despite being the target of a yearlong FBI corruption probe. An ex-Jefferson aide and one of the Congressman's former business associates have already pleaded guilty in the case, and law enforcement authorities raided Jefferson's Capitol Hill office earlier this year.

Jefferson took just 30 percent of the vote in the crowded all-party primary that took place on Nov. 7, and Carter, fueled by the support of prominent Louisiana politicians such as former Sens. John Breaux and J. Bennett Johnston, placed second.

But New Orleans voters appear loyal to their embattled incumbents: Mayor Ray Nagin was elected earlier this year despite being criticized for the way he handled the Hurricane Katrina disaster in 2005. While Carter had significant white support, she evidently could not cut into Jefferson's advantage among the district's black voters.

Saturday's runoff marks the end of Louisiana's unusual election system of holding all-party primaries when the rest of the national holds its general election, and then holding runoffs a month later. Beginning with the 2007 gubernatorial race, party nominees will be chosen in closed primaries, and general election voters will go to the polls on November Election Day.

Candidates Woo Bush Donors For "Invisible Primary" (WP)

By Chris Cillizza, Michael A. Fletcher

The Washington Post, December 10, 2006

Last month, a group of Republican royalty gathered to be wined and dined by Gov. Mitt Romney in Boston. On Friday night, they ate at Copia, a pricey Mediterranean steakhouse. On Saturday, they had breakfast at the Four Seasons and then lunched at Fenway Park.

Key Romney advisers made presentations about the path to the presidential nomination they see for the Massachusetts governor. Others walked attendees through how a race would be financed.

Among the 160 or so wealthy Republicans the Romney campaign had invited for the weekend was a particularly important group of potential supporters -- the 40 or so men and women who were "Rangers" or "Pioneers" in the 2000 and 2004 campaigns of President Bush.

These Rangers, who raised $200,000 or more for Bush in 2004, and Pioneers, who each collected more than $100,000 as part of campaigns that redefined modern political fundraising, are being intensely courted by GOP presidential aspirants across the country, both in large gatherings such as the one in Boston and one-on-one.

Bush's 2000 campaign forever changed the fundraising dynamic for presidential races, showing that an enormous early financial advantage was the same as winning an "invisible primary." In that race, there are no voters, elections or overt campaigning -- just the wooing of fabulously rich people with the rewards of insider status, complete with fancy titles.

So far, Romney and Arizona Sen. John McCain are well ahead among the Republican contenders, though neither yet has come up with monikers like "Pioneer" or "Ranger" to flatter the biggest donors.

The competition for these donors is one of the most important contests within the larger presidential race, serving as an early measure of a candidate's viability on the national stage, particularly because neutral observers peg the price of winning the 2008 presidential nomination at as much as $100 million.

In this new world of presidential fundraising, finding a wealthy person and persuading him or her to write a check is not the gold standard. Instead, the goal is to identify individuals who not only can contribute the federal limit of $2,000 but also can persuade 100 or so of their friends and business associates to do the same.

"It's important, because in the invisible-primary phase, elected officials who have their own organizations and their own power to endorse pay attention to who the big fundraisers are coalescing around," said Wayne Berman, a Bush Ranger in 2004 and a backer of McCain in the 2008 race.

Bush developed the Pioneer program while he was governor of Texas and preparing for his 2000 White House run. His early fundraising helped ensure that he was viewed as the inevitable GOP nominee and helped reduce the competition for the nomination.

The genius of the program was twofold: It let the fundraising team showily quantify its efforts, and it got donors involved in the day-to-day operations and planning of the campaign, according to Alex Vogel, a senior adviser to outgoing Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.).

"The relationship did not start or end when they wrote a check," Vogel said. "They were not just donors but part of the organization."

The big donors received top-level strategy briefings and were feted at campaign events. Many received appointments to the transition team after Bush was elected, and many others received ambassadorships, including Ron Weiser to Slovakia and Howard Leach to France.

Both Romney and McCain now count more than two dozen Pioneers and Rangers as supporters and have sought commitments from many others.

Former New York mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani has on staff Anne Dickerson, who ran the high-dollar program for the Bush campaign in 2004, and he has the backing of a handful of Bush Pioneers and Rangers. Other potential 2008 GOP candidates, including former House speaker Newt Gingrich (Ga.), Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee, and Sens. Sam Brownback (Kan.) and Chuck Hagel (Neb.), are far behind in the pursuit of these fundraising big shots.

Although Democrats do not have an equivalent for the Rangers and Pioneers, their leading candidates have already begun making the rounds of wealthy donors.

Last week, Sen. Barack Obama (Ill.) ventured to New York to meet with a group of potential donors assembled by liberal philanthropist George Soros.

And Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.) has spent much of the past two years building a fundraising infrastructure that raised nearly $50 million for her lopsided reelection campaign. The donors who contributed to that campaign can give again, should she run for president in 2008.

Ed Rogers, a Republican lobbyist not affiliated with a potential presidential candidate, said that with just 14 months remaining before the first ballots are cast, any candidate not knee-deep in conversations with Rangers and Pioneers is already falling behind.

"We are going to have a nominee by February 6th," 2008, Rogers said. "You have to have all of your money at the opening gun."

McCain and Romney are mimicking the Bush model not only in terms of the individuals they are courting but also in the approach they are taking to their pitch: a heavy emphasis on personal attention, meeting one-on-one with prospective donors, inviting them on trips and even soliciting them in that old K Street favorite: at sporting events.

Sig Rogich, a Las Vegas image consultant who has worked for presidents Ronald Reagan and George H.W. Bush, said he first discussed becoming a major fundraiser for McCain nearly two years ago when the two men were ringside at a boxing match featuring former champion Oscar De La Hoya.

"I told him that if the time came that he became a candidate, I'd be there for him," Rogich said.

Ron Kaufman, who is supporting Romney, made up his mind on a flight with the Massachusetts governor over South Carolina not long ago.

DOJ_NMG_0104915

Kaufman, political director in the George H.W. Bush White House, had picked up a copy of Thomas L. Friedman's "The World Is Flat" and planned to give it to Romney. "Before I could even mention the book, he waxed eloquently in a soliloquy that I call 'The World Is Flat: The Oral Edition,' " Kaufman recounted. That episode about Friedman's treatise on globalization "cinched" his support for Romney, he said.

Anne Dunsmore, a California fundraiser, got to know Romney during his work as chairman of the Republican Governors Association and was impressed by what she called his sense of optimism. Although he never asked, Dunsmore decided that she would plug Romney into her well-cultivated network of political contributors, should he decide to run for president.

"It was an easy choice being part of this family, no matter what he chooses to do," said Dunsmore, a Bush Ranger who has worked on five presidential campaigns.

Although most Rangers and Pioneers expect and demand personal contact with the candidates seeking their help, their decisions on whom to support are often shaped more by a desire to be on the winning team than by a sense of friendship.

"It's much more like a professional recruitment than it is a romance," Berman said. "A lot of it has to do with discussions about how the campaign's fundraising is going to work, the team, what the candidate's approach on fundraising is going to be."

Rogich put it more bluntly. "At the end of the season, there is a column with an 'L' and one with a 'W.' I want to be in the 'W' column," he said.

Romney Pledged In '94 To Seek Gay Rights (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, December 10, 2006

BOSTON, Dec. 9 -- Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney (R) is facing new questions about his beliefs on gay issues after the emergence of a letter he wrote during his 1994 U.S. Senate run, in which he promised to be a stronger advocate for gays than Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D).

The Massachusetts governor has emphasized his opposition to same-sex marriage in recent months as he positions himself for an expected 2008 run for the Republican presidential nomination.

The 1994 letter was written to the Log Cabin Club of Massachusetts, a gay Republican group, when Romney was courting gay voters during his unsuccessful campaign against Kennedy.

Citing Kennedy's record of advocacy for gays and lesbians, Romney wrote: "For some voters, it might be enough to simply match my opponent's record in this area. But I believe we can and must do better. If we are to achieve the goals we share, we must make equality for gays and lesbians a mainstream concern. My opponent cannot do this. I can and will."

A gay-oriented Massachusetts newspaper, Bay Windows, has also released a transcript of a 1994 interview with Romney during the Senate race.

"I think the gay community needs more support from the Republican Party, and I would be a voice in the Republican Party to foster anti-discrimination efforts," Romney said, according to the transcript.

Tony Perkins, president of the conservative Family Research Council, said Romney's comments were "quite disturbing."

"This is going to create a lot of problems for Governor Romney," Perkins told the New York Times. "He is going to have a hard time overcoming this."

Conservative activist Paul M. Weyrich told the Times, "Unless he comes out with an abject repudiation of this, I think it makes him out to be a hypocrite."

Romney was wrapping up a week-long trip to Asia on Saturday and could not be reached for comment.

In an e-mailed statement, Romney spokesman Eric Fehrnstrom said that, as governor, Romney has supported "traditional marriage" and "the needs of children."

The Pattern May Change, If... (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney

The New York Times, December 10, 2006

AFTER a 217-year march of major presidential nominees who were, without exception, white and male, the 2008 campaign may offer voters a novel choice.

But as Barack Obama, the senator from Illinois whose father is from Kenya, spends this weekend exploring a presidential bid in New Hampshire, and Hillary Rodham Clinton, the first woman to represent New York in the Senate, calls potential supporters in Iowa, the question remains: are Americans prepared to elect an African-American or a woman as president?

Or, to look at it from the view of Democrats hungry for victory in 2008, is the nation more likely to vote for a woman or an African-American for president?

Without question, women and blacks have made significant progress in winning office. The new Congress will include 71 women — one of whom will be the first female speaker of the House — compared with 25 when Representative Geraldine

Ferraro, a Queens Democrat, became the first woman to run as a major-party vice presidential candidate in 1984. There will be 43 blacks in the new Congress, compared with 13 when the Congressional Black Caucus was formed in 1969. A Gallup Poll in September showed a steady rise in the number of people who expect the nation to elect a woman or an African-American as president one day: Americans, it seems, are much more open to these choices than, say, someone who is an atheist or who is gay.

Times are indeed changing. But how much?

Over the past of the past eight years, in the view of analysts from both parties, the country has shifted markedly on the issue of gender, to the point where they say voters could very well be open to electing a woman in 2008. That is reflected, they say, in polling data and in the continued success of women running for office, in red and blue states alike. "The country is ready," said Senator Elizabeth Dole, the North Carolina Republican, who ran unsuccessfully for president in 2000. "I'm not saying it's going to happen in '08. But the country is ready."

By contrast, for all the excitement stirred by Mr. Obama, it is much less certain that an African-American could win a presidential election. Not as many blacks have been elected to prominent positions as women. Some high-profile black candidates — Harold Ford Jr., a Democrat running for the Senate in Tennessee, and Michael Steele, a Republican Senate candidate in Maryland — lost in November. And demographics might be an obstacle as well: black Americans are concentrated in about 25 states — typically blue ones, like New York and California. While black candidates cannot assume automatic support from black voters, they would at least provide a base. In states without big black populations, the candidate's crossover appeal must be huge.

"All evidence is that a white female has an advantage over a black male — for reasons of our cultural heritage," said the Rev. Jesse L. Jackson, the civil rights leader who ran for president in 1984 and 1988. Still, he said, for African-American and female candidates, "It's easier — emphatically so."

Ms. Ferraro offered a similar sentiment. "I think it's more realistic for a woman than it is for an African-American," said Ms. Ferraro. "There is a certain amount of racism that exists in the United States — whether it's conscious or not it's true."

"Women are 51 percent of the population," she added.

Many analysts suggested that changing voter attitudes can best be measured in choices for governors, since they, like presidents, are judged as chief executives, rather than legislators. There will be one black governor next year — Deval L. Patrick in Massachusetts, the second in the nation since Reconstruction.

By contrast, women will be governors of nine states, including Washington, Arizona and Michigan, all potential battleground states in 2008, a fact that is no doubt viewed favorably by advisers to Mrs. Clinton.

"Voters are getting more comfortable with seeing governors as C.E.O.'s of states," said Gov. Kathleen Sebelius, a Kansas Democrat. Gov. Jennifer M. Granholm, a Michigan Democrat who won a second term last month, said in an interview that when she first ran, she had to work harder. "Not this time," she said in an interview. "They are used to a woman being governor."

Of course, governors don't have to handle national security. And Mrs. Clinton has used her six years in the Senate to try to counter the stereotype that women would not be as strong on the issue, especially with the nation at war. Mrs. Clinton won a seat on the Armed Services Committee, and was an early supporter of the war in Iraq.

Mr. Obama is in many ways an unusual African-American politician, and that is why many Democrats, and Republicans, view him as so viable.

Mr. Obama is a member of a post-civil-rights generation of black politicians and is not identified with leaders like Mr. Jackson and the Rev. Al Sharpton of New York, who are polarizing to many white voters. He has a warm and commanding campaign presence that, as he showed in Illinois, cut across color lines.

Donna Brazile, a prominent Democratic strategist who is black, said that she had been deluged with e-mail messages from people looking to volunteer for Mr. Obama — and that most of the requests were from white voters.

Moreover, there is abundant evidence that attitudes toward black candidates are changing among white voters. In Tennessee, Mr. Ford lost his bid to become the state's first black senator since Reconstruction, but by only three percentage points.

Surveys of voters leaving the polls showed that 40 percent of white voters supported Mr. Ford, compared with 95 percent of black voters. More intriguing, the final result was the same as what the exit polls had suggested. Before this, in many races involving black candidates, the polls predicted that they would do better than they actually did — presumably because voters were reluctant to tell questioners they did not support the African-American.

That said, Mr. Ford lost his race after Republicans aired an advertisement that Democrats said was explicitly racist. Many Democrats said a lesson of the loss was that racial appeals still have force, particularly in the South.

Race and gender are big issues in American politics, but they are not the only ones, particularly in the coming race. Mr. Obama, should he run, may find his lack of experience will be far more troublesome to voters than his color. He is 45 and serving his first term as senator.

Mr. Obama said that many black voters he spoke with have serious questions about whether America is ready to elect an African-American president.

"I think there is a protectiveness and a skepticism within the African-American community that is grounded in their experiences," Mr. Obama said in an interview. "But the skepticism doesn't mean there's a lack of support."

David A. Bositis, senior political analyst with the Joint Center for Political and Economic Studies, a nonpartisan Washington group that studies black issues, said that it would certainly be hard, but not impossible for an African-American candidate to win.

"I certainly felt in the '90s that if Colin Powell had been nominated on a major party ticket, he would have had a very good chance to win," Mr. Bositis said. "If it's the right black candidate, I do think there is propensity to elect a black. But it has to be the right black candidate."

Road To The White House May Be Lined With Books (WP)

By Zachary A. Goldfarb

The Washington Post, December 10, 2006

Can you write your way into the White House?

A number of prospective 2008 presidential candidates are betting that the free publicity that comes with the release of a book can't hurt.

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) will re-release her book, "It Takes a Village," on Tuesday, 10 years after she published the book as first lady. She will do a limited amount of media promotion in the next week for the book, in which Clinton argues that collective effort is needed to protect and defend children. In a newly written introduction, Clinton "reflects on how our village has changed over the last decade -- from the impact of the Internet to new research in early child development and education," according to her publisher, Simon & Schuster. Clinton also discusses such issues as security, the environment and the national debt.

Other prospective Democratic candidates have been on aggressive book-publishing schedules. Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) has been actively promoting his new book, "The Audacity of Hope." Former North Carolina senator and 2004 vice presidential candidate John Edwards has traveled to early primary states to sell his new tome, "Home."

Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and his chief of staff, Mark Salter, will release their fifth book in August, according to the National Journal Web log. The book, tentatively titled "Hard Call," will explore historic decisions in politics, history, science and other endeavors. According to the Web log, McCain and Salter have identified six key principles that separate success and failure: awareness, timing, confidence, foresight, humility and inspiration.

Al Gore, who has kept the door to a presidential run slightly ajar, next year will publish "The Assault on Reason" -- an examination of how "the public arena has grown more hostile to reason." Gore is well known for promoting his candidacy through his causes. In 1992, as a vice presidential candidate, he published a cautionary tale on the environment, "Earth in the Balance."

Tackling that subject area next will be Sen. John F. Kerry (Mass.), the 2004 Democratic presidential nominee, who is releasing a so-far-untitled book on the environment in March with his wife, Teresa. According to PublicAffairs, his publisher, the book describes the work of the senator and his wife on promoting the environment from the San Juan Basin to the South Bronx. In an author's note, Kerry writes that "we are sliding dangerously backwards in almost every sector of environmental concern. . . . We share a sense of urgency about the need to reinvigorate grassroots action which takes these concerns into the ballot box."

Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney (R), has no plans for a book in the next few years. Another possible GOP presidential hopeful, former New York mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani, also has no book plans, though his post-Sept. 11 tome, "Leadership," was a huge success.Sen. Clinton vs. Sen. McCain?

National Journal's well-regarded survey of Washington insiders shows that nearly 69 percent believe that Clinton will be the Democratic nominee, while 73 percent believe that McCain will be the Republican nominee.

Notably, Republicans believe that Clinton is a much stronger candidate than the Democrats give her credit for. More than half of Republicans say she is the strongest candidate. But only a quarter of Democrats believe the same of her. Both Republicans and Democrats agree that Obama is the second strongest.

More than half of Republicans, meanwhile, believe that McCain is the strongest candidate, while 70 percent of Democrats do. Republicans believe that Romney is the second strongest, but Democrats say that Giuliani is No. 2.

The 2008 election could yield the first female (Clinton), black (Obama) or Mormon (Romney) president. The insiders did not believe, generally, that religion or gender would hurt or help the candidates. But nearly half of Democrats and 40 percent of Republicans believed that Obama's race could hurt him in the campaign.The State of Finances

Campaign finance filings last week gave a picture of the financial state of the parties' six campaign committees.

The Republican National Committee had $6 million on hand and received a $12 million transfer in late October from Bush's 2004 reelection campaign committee. The National Republican Congressional Committee had $1.3 million on hand with more than $13 million in debt, while the Republican National Senatorial Committee had $500,000 with $200,000 in debt.

The Democratic National Committee had $4.7 million in cash and $4 million in debt, while the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee had $2.2 million in cash and $10 million in debt. The Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee had $2.3 million in cash and $5.4 million in debt.

Crist Cancels Inaugural Ball, Saying Big Party Didn't Feel Right (AP)

Gov.-elect Charlie Crist has decided to cancel his inaugural ball, saying Saturday that he didn't feel right about an expensive party when many people are struggling with higher insurance and property tax bills.

Other free events, including a prayer breakfast, parade, the swearing-in ceremony and tours of the governor's mansion will still continue.

"It's a difficult time for a lot of Floridians and there's no need to have a big party," Crist said. "Many times it's your natural inclination to follow tradition, but then you start to reflect and you realize what the circumstances are for many Floridians."

The ball was to be a $100-a-ticket celebration and concert at the Tallahassee-Leon County Civic Center.

Crist said he had been thinking about canceling the event over the past week.

"It was a mistake to want to go forward to honor that tradition just for tradition's sake," Crist said.

Other inaugural events will precede the Jan. 2 swearing in, beginning Wednesday with an inaugural breakfast at Miami's Parrot Jungle Island and followed by a kickoff barbecue Dec. 17 at the New York Yankees' spring training site in Tampa.

Crist's inaugural committee is also returning all donations it's received, including $100,000 from Trigeant Air LLC; $50,000 each from GEO Group Inc. and U.S. Sugar Corp.; and $25,000 each from Colodny, Fass, Talenfeld, Kalinsky & Abate and A. Duda and Sons Inc.

The committee won't take any donations above what previous administrations have accepted. Once it determines that figure, it will set a limit on donations and begin accepting them again.

Gov. Jeb Bush raised more than $2 million for the governor's inaugural festivities in 2002, including $10,000 donations from several companies.

Any money left over after costs are covered will be given to Derrick Brooks Charities, the Jessica Marie Lunsford Foundation and the National Center for Missing & Exploited Children.

Bone-weary Haulers Raise Risks On Road (CHIT)

By Stephen Franklin, Darnell Little

Chicago Tribune, December 10, 2006

Hurtling down a darkened Indiana highway, Roger Kobernick pulls his 75-foot long rig into a truck stop just long enough to grab his one meal of the day, a thin bologna and cheese sandwich that he gulps down with a huge mug of black coffee.

He has several more hours of driving ahead this night to reach a warehouse in Walton, Ky., where he wants to be the first in line so he can get quickly unloaded and back on the road.

The next morning, after his truck is emptied, he sets off without breakfast or even washing up. Hours later, as he falls in with a truck caravan snaking along a stretch of North Carolina's Smoky Mountains, he relaxes and his worries spill out.

"I'm 42 years old," he says. "And what am I going to do? Give it up? No, you gotta go out and pay the bills. You gotta keep plugging at it. I don't foresee me ever retiring. My dad worked 'til the day he died and I foresee that being me."

Truckers like Kobernick are travelers adrift in a tumultuous sea.

Spurred by a global economy that demands that goods be delivered on time and at low prices, business has never been so brisk and so cutthroat. Paid by the delivery, not the hour, the country's 350,000 independent truckers like Kobernick are lashed to punishing schedules that practically force them to live in their rigs. Counting all their time on the job, some earn as little as $8 an hour.

Long hours, chaotic schedules and exhausting work conditions make for a potentially lethal formula--for truck drivers and everyone else on the road.

Nearly a decade ago, the government vowed to significantly reduce the number of fatalities from truck crashes, but the results have been mixed. Nationally the death toll fell until 2002 and then started climbing. In the three most heavily traveled states, California, Texas and Florida, deaths involving large truck crashes have steadily climbed.

DOJ_NMG_0104919

Over 5,000 people die and 116,000 are injured yearly in truck-related accidents, according to the Federal Motor Carrier Safety Administration.

Most often the victims are in passenger cars.

Take the night last April when trucker Robert Spencer, 37, of Canton Township, Mich., was headed north on Interstate 69 in Indiana at close to 70 miles an hour, according to a sworn statement from an investigator.

His truck crossed the highway's divide and slammed into a southbound van carrying nine people from the Ft. Wayne campus of Taylor University. Five were killed, four of them students in their early 20s, and the rest were injured.

"Did I hit something? What happened? Who did this?" Spencer said at the scene. Besides five counts of reckless homicide, Spencer also was charged with filing a false logbook, concealing that he had driven 9½ hours beyond the 11-hour daily maximum allowed by law.

Truckers do not escape being victims; 930 were killed in the U.S. while working last year, up 33 percent from 1992. And while they made up only 2 percent of the workforce last year they accounted for more than 16 percent of fatal workplace injuries.

Last week the health of truck drivers was taken up by the U.S. Appeals Court in Washington, D.C. It heard the latest arguments in a long battle that has pitted trucking companies against groups concerned with driver safety. Companies are pushing to increase the time drivers can be behind the wheel; critics contend that extending truckers' workdays is aimed at increasing corporate profits at drivers' expense.

Ongoing regulation battle

The faceoff began more than a decade ago. It started when Congress, alarmed by the growing toll of highway crashes, asked for new rules to protect truckers' health.

After much political wrangling, the Federal Motor Carrier Safety Administration in 2003 responded by issuing a rule that among other steps, expanded truckers' daily driving time to 11 hours from 10. Safety groups challenged the rule, a federal appeals court upheld their complaint and ordered the agency to revise the rule.

The federal agency last year came back with its revision, but safety groups and others challenged it, too, saying it reflected trucking firms' interests in cutting costs.

The National Institute for Occupational Safety and Health, the federal government's workplace health research arm, backed the opponents, saying that expanding driving time would lead to even more driver fatigue.

In reply, federal officials said an 11th hour would allow some truckers the flexibility to finish work without laying over. Added to the new rule was a 14-hour cap on a trucker's workday and a 34-hour break after a week's work. Both changes, the officials said, were aimed at normalizing truckers' lives.

Critics contended, however, that a 14-hour cap would mean drivers will be able to work nearly 40 percent more than before.

"You have drivers who are already working almost twice the normal 40-hour week," says LaMont Byrd, the Teamsters' Health and Safety director.

Dave Osieke, head of safety for the American Trucking Association, said the fact that fatality rates had fallen until only recently is evidence "that safety has improved."

One reason fatality rates haven't fallen faster, adds Ian Grossman, a spokesman at the Federal Motor Carrier Safety Administration, is that highways are more congested and more truckers are on the road. Since 1996 trucking mileage has soared by 43 billion miles, up 24 percent. Considering such dramatic changes, the death toll increase is quite low, he says.

Taking the surge in trucking mileage into account, the number of fatalities has fallen in the last 30 years.

In 1975, there were 5.51 fatalities per 100 million vehicle miles traveled; that number had dropped to 2.81 by 1996, and was 2.29 in 2004, according to the Federal Motor Carrier Safety Administration.

Waiting, for nothing

Kobernick started working around trucks at age 16 at the same La Crosse, Wis., company that employed his late father, LaVern. Nine years ago Kobernick became an independent trucker. And every other week for the last few years he has made runs to and from Florida from points in Wisconsin and Minneapolis.

On this particular day he had a good-paying load: more than 20 tons of fish, nuts, cheese, mustards and horseradish.

But going home with a profitable load is usually more difficult. Competition going north is so stiff that Kobernick sometimes barely breaks even or waits for days for better-paying loads. Time spent waiting is money lost because independents are not paid for sitting idle.

"Hopefully I will catch up one day here down the road," he says wistfully, early on a southern run as he steers through a clogged stretch of I-90 near Chicago.

Photographs of his family are stuck above the door beside him in the cab, and he calls home morning and night, asking his wife about their two young girls, and what's going on back home in La Crosse.

DOJ_NMG_0104920

Because he cannot afford health care, he relies on state-sponsored coverage for himself and his family. They are qualified to receive food stamps, but pride stops them from doing so. In his best year he earned $40,000, but last year he made only $9,000.

Much has gone wrong for him in the last few years, and he partly blames it on freight rates that have barely gone up while fuel and other costs have soared and eaten away at his profits.

He also has made some financial missteps, among them expecting tax write-offs for his rig to help his bottom line. Instead, he owes $15,000 in state and federal taxes.

And 25 years behind the wheel have taken its toll. Last summer, barely able to bend his back, he had surgery. One doctor had turned him away, saying surgery would be foolish since he would return to truck driving.

The surgery put him out of work for four months. Without savings, he took out a home equity loan to pay bills, then sold his truck's trailer and bought a less costly model.

He also has decided to sell his two-year-old $140,000 truck because the $2,000 monthly payments are killing him. To attract potential buyers Kobernick has had to steadily lower the asking price.

Once back to work, he initially drove his 18-wheel, 80,000-pound behemoth practically anywhere, as long as it brought in needed cash.

Now he focuses on the Florida run. Without looking at a map, Kobernick knows all the weigh stations, and the truck stops where there's room for the night--a growing problem for truckers.

"I haven't had a vacation in 12 years. I have no dental. No pension. No savings," he says as the sun's dying rays filter through pine trees in South Carolina. "Hopefully, I'll catch up one day here down the line. But right now that isn't going to happen any time soon."

Union dominance disappears

When did the dream of being a trucker turn sour?

It began after the government deregulated the industry in 1980, says Mike Belzer, a one-time Chicago trucker now a Wayne State University professor and trucking industry expert. Ever since, he says, it has been a "race to the bottom."

Before 1980, nearly 9 out of 10 over-the-road drivers were union members, he says. Today, 1 out of 10 carry a union card. That shift ushered in lower pay, fewer benefits and tougher working conditions.

It also made the highways far more dangerous as inexperienced and lower-paid drivers push themselves to earn more, Belzer adds.

"You get what you pay for," Belzer explains. It is a matter of choosing between a "skilled professional" and someone "from the soup line," he says.

New drivers' inexperience worries Kobernick too. Schmoozing at a warehouse in northern Kentucky, Kobernick swaps stories about new drivers with fellow trucker Jerry Knoy, 52, of Salem, Ind.

"I met a guy two weeks ago who said, `Hey, can you back my truck in for me,'

" Knoy says.

`Sweatshop on wheels'

By the late 1990s much of the industry was transformed into a "sweatshop on wheels," Belzer claims. Truckers' income, when adjusted for inflation, dropped steadily as the market was flooded with new companies, new drivers, and pressures from shippers and manufacturers to keep freight costs down.

Figures from the American Trucking Association show that between 1980 and 2005, the number of interstate trucking companies soared from 20,000 to 564,000. But nearly 90 percent operate six trucks or less, according to the industry group.

The result is a highly fragmented industry with "low profit margins," according to an association study.

Out of an estimated 3.3 million truckers, about 1.3 million haul freight. Of these, about 350,000 are independent drivers. Most own their trucks but lease them to companies. Or, in Kobernick's case, they work for whoever has goods for them to carry.

Some Teamsters members earn as much as $70,000 yearly, and industry experts say the salaries of drivers for large, non-union fleets are close. Overall, the average pay is about $35,000 a year.

The average independent driver earns about $40,000 a year, according to the Owner-Operator Independent Drivers Association, a Missouri-based group that represents about 140,000 drivers.

"But to make that $40,000, you've got to work about 120 hours" a week, says John Siebert, an official with the group.

Both mental and physical health can be impacted, he says.

Several years ago, when glancing through members' obituaries, Siebert discovered that their average age at death was 55. In his research, he also found a higher-than-average suicide rate for members and turned his findings over to NIOSH, which has been examining truckers' health for the last few years.

DOJ_NMG_0104921

Siebert believes such problems are linked to difficult lives and financial stress. He ticks off organization surveys that show that nearly 9 out of 10 of its members are obese or overweight and nearly two-thirds expect to rely solely upon Social Security when they retire.

He especially worries about produce haulers like Kobernick who have highly unpredictable work schedules. If anything goes wrong, or their schedule is too tight, they lose out financially, and their health often is neglected as they push to work longer hours.

"These guys are working 100 to 120 hours a week, and their sleep patterns are all over the clock," he says.

Hard to stay positive

Kobernick is first in line in the morning outside the warehouse in Jacksonville, Fla. But he didn't have a definite time slot and workers say they can't unload him. That's it, a clerk coolly says and returns to her paperwork.

He phones the shipper, who tells him to leave the goods in a warehouse in Orlando.

That will mean two to three hours of lost time, and lost money spent on fuel and tolls--cash he didn't plan on spending.

Moreover, Kobernick is not sure he can make his next delivery on time in Pompano, and that unsettles him. He calls the warehouse and politely asks if they can stay open a little bit late. They say they can, but not much.

As he wheels his truck, the sunlight is blinding and Jacksonville's morning traffic seems glued to the road. He doesn't talk much this morning and unloads the truck himself in Orlando in order to get back on the road. There is no time for a break.

Luckily traffic is not bad, and he arrives with time to spare at a warehouse on a small side street in Pompano. Late in the afternoon he takes his day's first break at a farmer's market in Pompano, where truckers gather.

The banter is gloomy. Shipping rates are low, the truckers say. Some have been waiting days for a good load. Others are just tired of waiting and wondering about whether they can eke out a decent living.

The business, they say, is not what it used to be.

"There's no way a driver can go by the law," says a tired-looking, middle-age trucker. The group nods in agreement. They also complain about truckers who accept low rates that undercut others.

"There are guys sitting around here who'll take 75 cents a mile to get out of here. I need $1.50 just to make ends meet," grumbles Steve Hinton, 63, of Atlantic, Iowa.

Kobernick doesn't have time to kill. He rolls on to a warehouse west of Ft. Lauderdale, almost in the Everglades. He parks at the entrance to the warehouse, and just before 10 p.m. falls asleep in seconds.

By 5 a.m. he is already anxiously waiting for the warehouse to open. He has taken only one shower in four days and there's no place to wash up or go to the bathroom.

He has no idea whether he will have a good load going home. Time spent sitting is simply lost money because independent truckers are only paid by a share of the shipping costs or by mileage, not their time on the job.

"Every day something seems to come along to put us out of commission. But you just gotta keep that positive attitude," he says in the warm, lonely darkness.

Making The Highways Less Safe (NYT)

The New York Times, December 10, 2006

To describe the Bush administration's policy toward the trucking industry as deregulation is farcical. The word empowerment is so much more fitting for the array of trucking executives the White House appointed to be the ranking regulators of their own industry. While avowing professionalism, this cadre of political contributors and industry insiders has brazenly relaxed federal standards for truck safety over the last six years. Rather than tightening drivers' hours as safety specialists advised, the political powers at the truck safety agency have actually loosened them — increasing the maximum driving hours to 77 from 60 over seven days, and to 88 hours from 70 over eight consecutive days on the road.

The industry's deep-pocketed lobbyists made sure the Republican-controlled Congress remained as passive as any glassy-eyed driver involved in the annual toll of 5,000 truck-related fatalities. A detailed report in The Times by Stephen Labaton has laid bare the administration's shameful policy of industry pandering as the worst in a generation. Rather than fulfilling the standard set a decade ago to halve the death rate by now, the administration has let the industry continue as the nation's most treacherous. The accident fatality rate is nearly double that involving only cars.

The list of highway foxes embedded in the regulatory henhouse highlights the Bush era's anointment of big industry across the spectrum of public and worker safety, from mines to Interstates. The head of the government truck safety agency, Joseph Clapp, was a trucking executive who led a foundation that produced research ludicrously discounting driver fatigue as a factor in accidents. David Addington, a trucking industry force for loosened regulations, eventually became chief of staff to Vice President Dick Cheney — and a zealot for overweening executive power.

Reprimanded in court rulings for ignoring its own experts' findings about driver fatigue, the truck safety agency responded by reissuing the same faulty controls. These evade such obvious needs as stronger training and reliable electronic trip logs in place of "comic books," as grizzled long-haulers call their paper logs. Safety specialists point out there would be a national uproar if airline regulators dared to tolerate a fatality rate of 5,000 a year.

The Salamander Queen's Quest for Newt Markets

Never mind that Sheila Johnson's uber-luxe Salamander resort won't be opening in Middleburg until the summer of 2009 -- a few years behind schedule owing to zoning difficulties and environmental concerns.

She's keeping her signature lizard logo -- which already gave its name to her hunt-country farm, gourmet markets in Middleburg and Palm Beach and a line of pricey linens -- visible on a new jewelry collection launched Thursday night in Middleburg. About 100 friends and neighbors (and husband of 15 months, Judge William Newman) dropped by Mystique jewelry store, where basketball player Alana Beard of Johnson's Washington Mystics modeled a silver double-salamander necklace and earrings. (The Crowned Salamander Collection, which sells for $150 to $10,000, also includes cuff links, money clips, pendants and pearl necklaces.)

"Oh, man, I just have to cross market -- my team, my jewelry," Johnson told The Post's Annie Groer. "This is all part of the branding experience for the Salamander spirit."

The savvy billionaire is keeping busy while she navigates the tricky approval process for a 120-room hotel and spa on 340 acres located on the outskirts of Middleburg. On Wednesday, with Gov. Tim Kaine at her side (she was one of his largest donors in last year's campaign), Johnson announced a $5 million donation to the University of Virginia for preschool education. She's also dipping her toe into the District, exploring development of a hotel in a Northeast warehouse district.

The jewelry launch was accompanied with jazz and steak tartare, smoked salmon and crab cakes catered by (you have to ask?) Johnson's Market Salamander down the street. No, she doesn't miss a trick.

N.Korean Nuclear Talks To Resume Dec. 18 (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0104923

By Anne Gearan
AP, December 10, 2006

A long-delayed round of international talks aimed at ending North Korea's nuclear weapons program is scheduled for later this month, a senior U.S. official said Saturday.

Talks are expected to reconvene Dec. 18 in Beijing and continue for three to five days, the official said. The official spoke on condition of anonymity because host China had not announced final plans.

North Korea has stayed away from the six-nation talks for more than a year, but agreed in principle this fall to resume negotiations. U.S. diplomats have been preparing for a new round, which would be aimed at implementing a moribund agreement by the North to renounce weapons and their development, but the date was uncertain.

The disarmament talks carry greater weight now that North Korea has exploded a nuclear device and tested a long-range missile earlier this year. Pyongyang ignored warnings against both actions from ally China and much of the rest of the world.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said last month North Korea must come to new talks ready to deal, or there is no point in holding them. It is not clear whether the North has made specific promises for the outcome of the new talks. But the U.S. official said China has promised the sessions will produce results.

The six nations — the United States, North and South Korea, China, Japan and Russia — signed a statement of principles in September 2005 outlining the assistance Pyongyang would receive in exchange for dismantling its nuclear weapons facilities. In addition to economic and energy benefits, the statement contains security guarantees for North Korea.

The United States announced Friday a series of sanctions against North Korea triggered by the official finding that it had triggered a nuclear device in the October test. Although the United States quickly decided Pyongyang had conducted a test, Bush signed an official presidential determination only Thursday.

With that determination, the United States was required to bar nuclear cooperation under the Atomic Energy Act and financial assistance under the Export-Import Bank. The United States provides neither to North Korea. The determination also requires a wide range of economic sanctions that already are in place.

The White House said the finding did not affect humanitarian aid.

Iran Expands Uranium Enrichment Program (AP)

By Ali Akbar Dareini, Associated Press Writer
AP, December 10, 2006

Iran has begun installing 3,000 centrifuges in an expansion of its uranium enrichment program that brings the Islamic nation significantly closer to large-scale production of nuclear fuel, the president said Saturday.

President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad also claimed that the international community was caving in to Tehran's demands to continue its nuclear program.

"Resistance of the Iranian nation in the past year forced them to retreat tens of steps over the Iran's nuclear issue," the semi-official Fars agency quoted Ahmadinejad as saying. Fars is considered to be close to Iran's elite Revolutionary Guards.

Iran has been locked in a standoff with the West over its nuclear program. The U.S. alleges that Tehran is secretly trying to develop atomic weapons, but Iran contends its program is for peaceful purposes including generating electricity.

Iran said earlier this year that it intends to move toward large-scale uranium enrichment involving 3,000 centrifuges by late 2006, and then expand the program to 54,000 centrifuges, which spin uranium gas into enriched material to produce nuclear fuel.

Uranium enrichment at low levels can be used to produce fuel to generate electricity but at higher levels can be use to make atomic bombs.

"We have started installing 3,000 centrifuges" at a plant in central Iran, Ahmadinejad told a group of students in Tehran on Saturday, according to Fars. He said the move, at a plant in central Iran, marks the "first step toward industrial production.

"We will be able to produce our nuclear fuel once we install 60,000 centrifuges," he said.

Iranian nuclear officials say 54,000 centrifuges would produce enough enriched uranium to fuel a 1,000-megawatt reactor, such as the one Iran has built with Russian assistance at Bushehr, southern Iran. The reactor is due to come on stream next year.

The United States and its European allies have been seeking a U.N. Security Council resolution to impose sanctions on Tehran for refusing to suspend enrichment. But Russia and China have opposed tough action advocated by the U.S., Britain, Germany and France and the Security Council appears to have reached a standstill on the issue.

Iran announced for the first time in February that it had enriched uranium using 164 centrifuges, and it confirmed last month that it has stepped up uranium enrichment by injecting gas into a second network of centrifuges.

"When we built these centrifuges, they (the U.S. and its European allies) said Iran won't be able to assemble them. ... Now, a month has passed since we launched the second cascade," Ahmadinejad was quoted as saying.issue.

Ahmadinejad boasted last month that Iran would soon celebrate, probably in February, the completion of its nuclear fuel cycle program — from mining uranium ore to enriching it.

On Friday, key European nations circulated a revised U.N. resolution that narrowed the proposed sanctions on Iran in a bid to win Russian and Chinese support. The new draft would ban the supply of materials and technology that could contribute to Iran's program, but it gave much greater detail on what items would be prohibited.

Iran has said it will never give up its right under the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty to enrich uranium and produce nuclear fuel. Officials have said they plan to generate 20,000 megawatts of electricity through nuclear energy in the next two decade

Interests Drive U.S. To Back A Nuclear India (NYT)

By Somini Sengupta

The New York Times, December 10, 2006

NEW DELHI, Dec. 9 — Ask the champions of the landmark nuclear deal with India that President Bush is expected to sign into law next week why only that country will be allowed into the world's nuclear club while others are denied, and a common reason you will hear is this: unlike those others, India will be a responsible nuclear citizen.

But beyond simple good will, unique commercial and strategic imperatives have driven a bipartisan swell of support for the deal, even though New Delhi steadfastly rejects the global nonproliferation treaty and advances a nuclear weapons program.

The nuclear accord opens the door, for the first time in more than 30 years, for New Delhi to buy fuel, reactors and other technology to expand its civilian nuclear program.

R. Nicholas Burns, the United States under secretary of state for political affairs, called it the "symbolic center" of a sweeping new relationship with India. K. Subrahmanyam, a foreign policy analyst and one of the best-known Indian advocates of the nuclear partnership, called it a "litmus test for the future of India-U.S. relations."

The economic incentives for the United States are huge.

As India gradually opens its vast market, American companies stand to make a great many gains, from investments in Indian real estate to selling soybean oil and fighter planes. There is also New Delhi's growing strategic value in a rapidly changing Asia.

"We see India as important for both intrinsic and extrinsic reasons," said Ashley Tellis, senior associate at the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace and a former adviser to Mr. Burns. "Intrinsic because it's a large country growing very rapidly, it's a market for American goods, and a country with which we share common values. Extrinsically, India is a growing power in the context of where Asia is evolving."

That a contentious bill has enjoyed so much bipartisan support is revealing. Neither Democrats nor Republicans, it seems, think that the opportunity can be passed up.

"India can be an important partner on a range of issues, from combating the threat of terrorism and proliferation to promoting democracy and regional security," Senator John Kerry, Democrat of Massachusetts, said by e-mail late Friday from Washington. "Cooperation on the civilian nuclear front can move this essential partnership forward."

The Heritage Foundation, a conservative research group, described India as "a vibrant democracy with a rapidly growing economy," and predicted that good relations with New Delhi "will provide a stabilizing influence in Asia."

The two countries are poised to expand their range of counterterrorism operations. Just this year, in two major military deals unthinkable a few years ago, India bought a used American naval vessel and six military helicopters; together they are worth nearly $90 million.

India is also in the market to buy as many as 126 new fighter planes, and American manufacturers are eager to fill the order — a deal that could total as much as $6 billion. If they win the contract, the United States could well supplant Russia and Israel as India's biggest military supplier.

Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr., a Delaware Democrat set to take over the Senate Foreign Relations Committee next month, described the nuclear bill as implicit recognition of India's long-term value to the United States.

"We can talk about the various aspects of India's importance in the coming decades — as a counterweight to China, as a rising military power, as an energy consumer, as an economic force, as a bulwark against terrorism and extremism, as a cultural beacon throughout Asia and the world," he wrote by e-mail. "We can parse the various ways in which India will be vitally important — but we can't seriously question that India will be vitally important, and that's why I've been saying for years that there's no bilateral relationship more important than the one between the U.S. and India."

With the Indian economy growing at a steady clip of up to 8 percent in recent years, India last month hosted the largest American trade delegation to any single country, including vendors of nuclear equipment.

DOJ_NMG_0104925

Wal-Mart recently announced its long-awaited entry into the Indian retail market. And Boeing has an $11 billion contract for 68 commercial airplanes for India's booming airline industry.

The Americans are nudging India to relax rules on foreign investment, notably in the banking sector. The U.S.-India Business Council, a lobby group, predicted in a news release that the nuclear law would "yield a bounty of opportunity for both our countries."

Many in India are already celebrating. On Saturday, the Hindustan Times, an English-language daily newspaper, boasted in a headline stretching across its front page: "India gets to have its nuclear cake and eat it, too."

Generally prickly about any perceived slights to its sovereignty, the Indian government had worried that Congress would attach conditions to the nuclear bill that would influence Indian foreign policy or emasculate its nuclear weapons program. One of those conditions, though not binding on New Delhi, calls for Indian cooperation to contain Iran's nuclear weapons buildup.

The Indian foreign ministry, in a statement Friday, welcomed the bill but made note of what it called "extraneous" requirements. "No legislation enacted in a foreign country can take away from us the sovereign right to conduct foreign policy determined solely by our national interests," it said.

India and the United States have yet to see eye-to-eye on a host of foreign policy issues, and they continue to have their own reasons to cozy up to each other's foes.

India, for instance, has cultivated closer ties to the military junta in Myanmar, or Burma, which Washington has consistently sought to isolate. Human Rights Watch earlier this week said that New Delhi had offered arms and counterinsurgency training to Myanmar.

The Indians say they reserve the right to cultivate the relationships they choose, and they naturally point to American affection for the government in Pakistan.

"There has to be a certain amount of understanding. If you have got some compulsions about Pakistan, we have got some compulsions about Myanmar," said Mr. Subrahmanyam, who is chairman of the Indian government's Task Force on Global Strategic Developments. "We are living in a very complex world, in which your interests and our interests are, at present, different. It will take time for it to be harmonized. All we can say is the door has opened."

Abbas Ponders Call For Early Elections (WP)

By Scott Wilson

The Washington Post, December 10, 2006

JERUSALEM, Dec. 9 -- Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas is inclined to call early elections, including for his own office, to end the political and economic crisis in the territories, Palestinian officials said Saturday.

The officials spoke after a meeting of the executive committee of the Palestine Liberation Organization that presented him with 17 options to end the months-long stalemate with the governing Hamas movement, whose leaders immediately rejected the proposed early elections. Abbas heads the influential panel, which is dominated by his Fatah party.

The proposals also included one to continue talks with Hamas over the formation of a power-sharing government acceptable to international donors, who cut aid to the Palestinian Authority following the radical Islamic movement's victory nearly 11 months ago in parliamentary elections.

Hamas, whose leaders reiterated as recently as this week their vow never to recognize Israel's right to exist, is classified as a terrorist organization by the United States, the European Union and Israel. Hamas is not a member of the PLO, which is recognized by Israel as the legitimate representative of the Palestinian people.

Abbas, a relative moderate, is expected to give a national address next week on how he intends to end the crisis that has battered the economy and increased partisan strife in the territories. He is under pressure from his own party to move decisively at a time when talks over a unity government have foundered again.

"After hearing all of the options, the president is leaning toward going back to the people with early elections for the presidency and parliament," said Saeb Erekat, the chief Palestinian negotiator and a member of the PLO's executive committee, who attended the meeting in the West Bank city of Ramallah.

Erekat said Abbas dismissed the option that he continue talks with Hamas, which ended Fatah's long monopoly on political power with its January election victory and has day-to-day control of the Palestinian government.

"He said, 'That's it, there will be no more talking,' " Erekat said.

Calling for early elections would mark an uncharacteristically bold gesture by Abbas, a cautious veteran of the Palestinian national movement who has long favored consensus over confrontation, even in his dealings with Israel.

For months, he has declined to exercise his authority to dissolve the Hamas-led cabinet, fearing that doing so would inflame partisan tensions. Both Hamas and his secular Fatah party have armed wings that have engaged in deadly clashes this year.

DOJ_NMG_0104926

Elected to a four-year term in January 2005 after the death of Yasser Arafat, Abbas could sidestep legal questions over his ability to call early parliamentary elections if he also appears on the ballot. Palestinian election law is unclear on this point. But his aides say the president is allowed to dissolve parliament if he also submits to the vote, which polls show would not necessarily favor his party.

"The only exit from this crisis is a national unity government," said Ismail Radwan, a Hamas official in Gaza, adding that the movement would not submit to early elections. "Any other choice will not resolve it."

After the meeting, PLO officials said Abbas intended to call early elections while making clear in his address that he will continue talking with Hamas about a unity government up until the day of the election. His aides said he has not set a timeline for the election.

The negotiations over a unity government have stalled in recent weeks over disagreement about the government's platform and which party would control the important interior and finance ministries.

Demonstrations over unpaid wages, common during the international donors' boycott of the Hamas-led government, continued Saturday in Gaza and the West Bank. About 2,500 policemen stormed the parliament building in Gaza City, while several dozen parents protested with their children in West Bank health clinics against the Hamas government.

Abbas May Call Palestinian Vote, But Hamas Says He Lacks The Power (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger

The New York Times, December 10, 2006

JERUSALEM, Dec. 9 — The Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, was said Saturday to be leaning toward calling early parliamentary and presidential elections, according to officials of his Fatah faction who have been pressing him to break a governing stalemate with the militant faction Hamas.

Mr. Abbas has been trying for months to negotiate with Hamas to create a Palestinian unity government that can meet international requirements, including recognizing Israel's right to exist, and receive money to help pay employees.

But Hamas, which humiliated Fatah in January's elections, has been unwilling to meet Mr. Abbas's terms or to give Fatah crucial ministries like Interior and Finance.

So Mr. Abbas has been stuck, with top Fatah officials urging him to fire the prime minister, Ismail Haniya of Hamas, and to call new elections. Ten days ago, Mr. Abbas announced that negotiations with Hamas were over.

On Saturday, according to Fatah officials who met him, Mr. Abbas said he would address Palestinians soon. One official who refused to be quoted by name said that Mr. Abbas saw no alternative but to call early elections, and that he was not closing to the door to dialogue with Hamas, but would not take part.

Saeb Erekat, the senior Palestinian negotiator, who was also at the meeting, said, "My understanding from Abbas's words today is that he is leaning toward calling for early presidential and parliamentary elections."

Hamas spokesmen on Saturday called any new parliamentary elections an attempted coup, and said that Mr. Abbas did not have the power to call them. Mr. Abbas can call new presidential elections by resigning, and can fire the prime minister.

But any new prime minister and government must be approved by Parliament, which is controlled by Hamas. The law does not give Mr. Abbas the power to dissolve Parliament without its consent or to call early parliamentary elections.

Some aides have argued to him that his powers are implicit, or that he could call a referendum on new elections, circumventing the basic law. Mr. Abbas is said to be skeptical and worried about new clashes between the factions, but also believes that Hamas opposes a unity government.

Abbas May Call Early Palestinian Elections (LAT)

By Richard Boudreaux, Maher Abukhater

The Los Angeles Times, December 10, 2006

RAMALLAH, WEST BANK — Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas said Saturday that he planned to call early presidential and parliamentary elections, a risky move aimed at replacing the Hamas-led government and clearing the way for peace talks with Israel.

Hamas warned that any such step would be illegal and meet with resistance, raising the stakes in a months-long and often violent conflict over control of the Palestinian Authority.

"We will not allow any coup against this government," Hamas spokesman Ismail Radwan said.

Under pressure at home and abroad to take decisive action, Abbas revealed his intention to a closed session here of the Palestine Liberation Organization's executive committee, participants in the meeting said. But he withheld a formal announcement until later this week.

DOJ_NMG_0104927

He left the door open to compromise with Hamas, saying there was still time for the Iranian-backed Islamic movement to hand power voluntarily to a multiparty "unity government" acceptable to Israel and the West. But he said he would no longer take part in negotiations with Hamas on the issue, which broke off early this month.

Hamas won control of the parliament and Cabinet by unseating the Fatah Party of the more moderate Abbas in January elections. That triggered economic sanctions by Israel and Western nations, including the United States, which demanded that Hamas renounce violence and recognize Israel's right to exist.

As economic hardship worsened in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, Abbas began pressing Hamas six months ago to give way to a unity government. The sanctions have left the Palestinian Authority unable to pay full salaries to its 165,000 employees, leading to frequent labor strikes and armed clashes between Fatah and Hamas.

On Saturday, at least 1,400 Palestinian policemen demanding their paychecks stormed the grounds of the parliament building in Gaza City and exchanged gunfire with a Hamas-led contingent of guards. Two guards were slightly wounded.

In the West Bank city of Hebron, dozens of parents carrying infants broke into a mother-and-child clinic that had been closed by a health workers strike.

The conflict has frustrated a recent push by the Bush administration to revive peace talks between Israel and the Palestinians after a six-year hiatus. Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert offered last month to hold talks with Abbas if the Palestinians installed a government that recognized the Jewish state and freed a captive Israeli soldier.

But Abbas told U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice last month that efforts to form a unity government had hit a dead end because Hamas insisted on keeping control of the police and the treasury.

Abbas summoned the PLO committee, an advisory group, to guide his next steps. Participants in the meeting Saturday said he accepted its recommendation to call parliamentary elections early next year, three years ahead of schedule, and decided after lengthy debate to put his own job on the line as well. Abbas was elected in 2005 to a four-year presidential term.

"I have done my part, and the status quo cannot be maintained," several aides quoted Abbas as saying. "I see no choice but to go back to the people."

Palestinian officials say it would take at least three months to organize elections once Abbas formally calls them.

The move would be a gamble for Abbas because it is far from certain that he and his party could win elections, or even conduct them if Hamas is violently opposed.

Hamas' popularity has slipped since it took office, but Fatah, which dominated Palestinian politics for four decades, remains divided and tarnished by corruption during the late Yasser Arafat's rule.

Two respected polls taken in September gave Fatah small leads over Hamas in voter preference.

In its initial reaction to Saturday's decision, Hamas indicated it would boycott any new elections. Hamas spokesmen contended that Abbas has no authority to call elections early; aides to the president said that because Palestinian law does not address the issue, he is free to do so.

Saeb Erekat, a veteran Palestinian negotiator who took part in the meeting, said Abbas believed it would be "difficult for Hamas to resist going back to the electorate."

An aide to Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh said Saturday that Hamas preferred to resume negotiations on a unity government. "The door is still open because this is the best and safe alternative for all of us," the aide, Ahmed Yousef, told the Arabic satellite television channel Al Jazeera.

On Friday, Haniyeh reiterated that Hamas would never recognize Israel or any Arab peace agreements with the Jewish state.

Early Election Talk Angers Hamas (BBC)

BBC.com, December 9, 2006

The Palestine Liberation Organisation's executive committee has backed early elections to end the deadlock over forming a national unity government.

The Hamas group, in power since winning January's parliamentary polls, reacted by condemning the suggestion.

PLO officials said after meeting President Mahmoud Abbas that he would have their support for early polls.

The Palestinian Authority has been under a Western financial boycott since Hamas's victory.

Mr Abbas is expected to announce his decision in the coming week.

Speaking to the BBC, one of his top officials said he believed the president was minded to call parliamentary and presidential polls.

"The status quo cannot be continued - it is a disaster on the Palestinians," said Saeb Erekat.

Palestinians, he added, had to choose between the approach of Mr Abbas and his Fatah faction and that of Hamas.

DOJ_NMG_0104928

The current Hamas-led administration has been denied direct Western aid because it refuses to renounce violence, recognise Israel or accept previous Israeli-Palestinian agreements.

'Coup'

Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniya condemned the idea of early elections, saying they would accentuate "crisis and tensions".

"I think that the invitation to carry out the elections in this way is disrespectful to the Palestinian people," he told Iranian television, in an interview dubbed into Persian.

A Hamas spokesman in Ramallah, Ismail Rudwan, described the PLO committee's statement as a threat to democracy.

Lebanon's Shiites Grapple With New Feeling Of Power (WP)

By Anthony Shadid

The Washington Post, December 10, 2006

BEIRUT, Dec. 9 -- As morning clouds hovered overhead Saturday, Fadil Ayyash wiped eyes that were bleary from just two hours of sleep over two days in the city-within-a-city that Hezbollah's protests in downtown Beirut have become.

The mood in his tent, set alongside a site for luxury apartments, was playful. The first order of business was stoking a water pipe. Under two yellow Hezbollah flags, with a hint of mischief, he and his friends unveiled their makeshift fireplace, charred cinderblocks stacked on a sidewalk still warm from a campfire the night before. But they spoke bluntly -- of frustration and protest, of politics and power -- the vocabulary of a moment the young Shiite Muslim men feel they are defining.

"How is this democracy?" Ayyash asked, pointing to the colonnaded government headquarters known as the Serail, standing like a citadel atop a hill. "The majority is here," he said, waving his hand across rows of protesters' tents.

His friends nodded, sprawled in brown plastic chairs.

"These days," he said, "we have to seize our opportunity."

Once the country's most downtrodden, entrenched in feudal misery, Lebanon's Shiites stand today on the verge of their greatest political power in the history of a diverse country defined by its fractious religious communities: Sunni and Shiite Muslims, Druze and Christians. But their ascent is a story of contradictions: Now at the peak of that power, confident of victory, the community is still shaped by its own sense of vulnerability and weakness.

Its leaders rely on age-old notions of backroom, under-the-table Lebanese politics replete with patronage, a cult of leadership and the influence money buys. But they may be reshaped by leaving a legacy of turning to the street with populist demands. And in pursuit of power, through the protests that began Dec. 1, the Shiites, the country's single-largest community, may end up breaking a system that appears to be buckling under the stress of Lebanon's most acute crisis since the 15-year civil war ended in 1990.

The drama unfolding here draws on a long history of persecution, both real and perceived, but is propelled by the most recent events in Lebanon, as Shiites try to shape the country following the Syrian withdrawal last year and, as important, the war with Israel this summer.

"The battle has already begun," said Mona Fayad, a Shiite professor of psychology whose criticism of Hezbollah in an article published this summer in the Lebanese newspaper al-Nahar made her a cause celebre here. "They've opened the gates of hell. This is how I've felt the past few days."

"It's like a snowball, and it's now so hard to stop," she said. Her voice was slow and weary. "Even if they stop it now before anything else happens, we're still going to have a lot of trouble. And if they don't?"

She left the question unanswered.Forging an Identity

In the southern village of Khiam, along hills green from winter rains, Zeinab al-Sheikh Ali sat in a house within sight of the Israeli border. Two pictures of Hasan Nasrallah, the leader of Hezbollah, were posted at the entrance. "Victory from God," one read in Arabic, Hezbollah's slogan for this summer's 33-day war with Israel. "Divine Victory," another said in French. But, shaking her head, Ali, the 70-year-old matriarch, remembered a more distant time.

"The days of our grandfathers," she called it.

There is a joke heard in Khiam and elsewhere in Lebanon, itself a bitter critique of the days when the community was rural, marginalized and illiterate, dominated by a traditional elite of reactionary clergy and landowners with feudal Ottoman-era titles. Shiite peasants went to the home of a prominent Shiite clan leader and asked him to build a school. He looked at them, confused and a little surprised. His reply: Wasn't it enough that his own son was going to school and getting an education?

The community's fortunes began to change in the 1960s after the arrival of Musa al-Sadr, a cleric born in Qom, Iran, as a religious leader. In time, he bridged gaps between Shiites in the south and the Bekaa Valley, undermined the influence of clans and inculcated the Shiite community's sense of itself. His charisma was so great that young Lebanese clerics began imitating his

Iranian-accented Arabic. But in 1978, he disappeared while on an official visit to Libya, never to be heard from again. The Iranian revolution followed a year later, and after the 1982 Israeli invasion of Lebanon, Iran helped found Hezbollah.

Lebanon's civil war forced the Shiite community, like others, to defend itself as a group amid growing anarchy. By the end of the war, it was newly emboldened, its power was bolstered in the government and the community entered the civil service in force. The government sent billions of dollars to the south, tangled in staggering corruption, and money poured back into Lebanon from Shiite expatriates in Africa.

Within the community, Hezbollah grew stronger, as it fought the Israeli occupation that ended in 2000. In the guerrilla war, the group honed its military arm, with elaborate recruitment and the building of an arsenal supplied by Iran and conveyed through Syria. It weathered Israeli offensives in 1993 and 1996.

Today, in power and influence, Hezbollah has eclipsed its rival, the Amal movement of Parliament speaker Nabih Berri. Its social infrastructure of schools, hospitals and orphanages sprawls across the south; it prides itself on incorruptibility. And with its ascent are a culture and language steeped in the resistance to Israel it celebrates, along with an arsenal that, while many Shiites are reluctant to state it publicly, delivers the community confidence.

"Without the weapons, we'd get slapped across the shoulder," said Imad Abu Mehdi, a shop owner in Khiam.

To its followers, Hezbollah's appeal is reflected most powerfully in the personality of Nasrallah, sometimes simply called the sayyid, perhaps the most compelling figure the community has had since Sadr's disappearance nearly 30 years ago.

"Tell them that we are stronger than tiredness, stronger than hunger, stronger than cold, stronger than weariness, stronger than bombardment and, of course, stronger than attacking us with words," Nasrallah said in a fiery speech broadcast to the protest Thursday.

"He was talking golden, the words were precious," said Ali, the matriarch in Khiam.

Ali sat with her sister-in-law, Zeinab Ismail, whose son, Ahmed, was killed in this summer's war with Israel. Ismail fled the conflict for the relative safety of the Bekaa Valley in the north. When she returned, the doors of her home were blown out, its windows shattered. The homes of two sons were destroyed. Ahmed had spent nearly two years in the Israeli-run jail in Khiam in the late 1990s. Red worry beads he fashioned while there are now draped over his portrait, his stern visage glaring down from its perch above the door.

"No one has sacrificed more than the Shiites," Ismail said.

Ismail and Ali talked about past and present, the two often intersecting seamlessly in a narrative replete with suffering and martyrdom that stretches to the 7th century. Their conversation was punctuated, as it often is in southern Lebanon, with the rhetoric of class and disenfranchisement and the symbolism of martial sacrifice: the language of Nasrallah. For every ill, they blamed a government they said was rife with corruption and bent on preserving its power, neglecting the people in the south.

Without Hezbollah, Ali said, sipping a glass of lemon-flavored tea, "we'd only have God."Questioning Hezbollah

The words of Fayad's article, published before this summer's war ended, were blunt, even polemical. In language that was straightforward and at times simplistic, the psychologist questioned the very tenets of Hezbollah's ideology: notions of sacrifice, resistance and honor.

"What does it mean to be a Shiite?" she asked.

"To be a Shiite means that you do not question the meaning of victory," she wrote. "To be a Shiite means that you do not question the meaning of resistance and pride." She went on: "To be a Shiite is to accept that your country be destroyed before your very eyes -- unsurprised eyes, that is -- and that it comes tumbling down on your head, and that your family be displaced and dispersed and become refugees and that you accept standing up to the enemy without a word of complaint."

"You see," she wrote, "we are a nation of heroes that knows nothing but sacrifice."

By her estimate, the article prompted 30 more in response. She received hundreds of calls and 300 e-mails. She said many were supportive; others were indignant that someone would write in such a way while the country was under Israeli attack; "pathetic," one person scolded her.

Dressed in a sports jacket and wearing wire-rimmed glasses, Fayad, 55, sat at her home on an overcast day. She was bleak: She already sees the shadows of a civil war, as Hezbollah mobilizes its Shiite constituency and the government stages almost daily shows of solidarity among Sunni Muslims and others. She feels her life is in danger. And she wants to leave Lebanon.

"It is unacceptable I pass my life from war to war, for the sake of others," she said. "What kind of craziness is this?"

No one knows with certainty what percentage of the Shiite community Hezbollah represents. Critics such as Fayad and others suggest it is about a third. But she and other intellectuals who bristle at its dominance over Shiite politics illustrate, in a way, the group's power: Hezbollah and, to a far lesser extent, Amal represent the only organized Shiite voices in a system defined by communal politics. As a result, their ambitions become the community's ambitions, their tactics become its tactics.

"They can't speak in the name of the Shia," said Mohammad Mattar, a lawyer with a fondness for Cuban cigars. "It's very simple. They cannot." Mattar talks in the precise, logical language of a legal brief. At times, he opens the window to air his sleek downtown office of smoke.

"Lebanon will cease to exist if one party monopolizes power or becomes all too strong," he said, his voice matter-of-fact. "A lot of people like me are very worried that the delicate Lebanese policy might disintegrate if this goes on."

The Shiites "were poor, and they were left to fend for themselves for 40 years of Lebanon's independence," Mattar said, staring from underneath his thick, black-rimmed glasses. "But this is not an excuse to do what you are doing."

The critique of Mattar and Fayad and others runs from the question of representation (unaccountable, in Mattar's view) to Hezbollah's ties to Iran and Syria (an instrument of their foreign policy, he said) to the very culture of resistance to Israel.

At a deeper level, their critique illustrates the contradictions of Lebanese politics: In the grammar of sectarianism, where Sunni, Shiite and Druze communities have coalesced around leaders, each claiming an effective right of veto, national identity has become second. As the Shiite community reaches for its greatest power ever, there is little debate within the community -- beyond articles, statements by dissident clerics and vestigial influence of clans -- over how to use that power.

"We are stranded. We can neither go here nor there," Mattar said. "People like me are left on our own."'They Became Something'

In some ways, Hossam Yassine represents the changing fortunes of Lebanon's Shiites. Yassine is college-educated, back from a job in the Persian Gulf. And every day this week, he has gone to the festival-like protests, in part for the party, in part because Hezbollah wants him to and in part because he believes.

"Hezbollah came and made something for the Shia, that we are here," the 22-year-old said.

He pulled his black leather jacked around his shoulders. His cheerful face was lined with the trace of a goatee.

"They were nothing, and they became something."

He walked past rickety stands selling date-filled cookies, bread with melted cheese and popcorn. A banner-size cartoon of two men hung to the side: "Are you a Christian or Muslim?" one asked. "I'm hungry," the other replied. Flags, shirts and caps were for sale -- yellow for Hezbollah, orange for its Christian ally, former general Michel Aoun. A little ways down, another placard asked, "What's more beautiful than living with dignity?"

"In two weeks," Yassine said, smiling, "they're going to have to pay the people to get them to leave."

He walked through the sleek downtown, its upscale offices and pricey condominiums at the heart of the vision of a new Beirut downtown promoted by former prime minister Rafiq al-Hariri, a Sunni Muslim billionaire killed last year in a car-bomb assassination.

"There are a lot of places in Beirut where people are building homes no better than tents. They flood in the winter. Why don't they take care of these people?" Yassine asked. "Why only here, in this small spot of land?"

He shook his head, more resigned than angry. "This wasn't built for us."

Yassine walked past campsites. "No to the pourers of tea," slogans read on the sides of tents, a reference to Lebanese police who served tea to Israeli soldiers this summer as they occupied the southern town of Marjayoun.

He read them, then furrowed his brow. For the first time, his voice took on an edge.

"If I'm a man, 60 years old, I've fought 25 years, 30 years, until now for one aim, to expel the Israelis and to keep the Americans away. I've lost a lot of things -- my father, my brother, my good life, and I sit at my home watching the Israelis get in peace what they couldn't get in war? Watching, just watching. Put yourself in the same situation. You would feel angry."

In a way, the protests today are a microcosm of the currents swirling through the Shiite community, promoted by Hezbollah with its intuitive feel for the sentiments of its rank and file. They are the equivalent of a new kind of politics in Lebanon, drawing on the street, roiled by populist demands: a protest over government corruption, a denunciation of the United States and Israel, a celebration of the war this summer, tinted with a sense of betrayal at the hands of other Lebanese, and a call for change, however ill-defined it might be.

To Yassine, it is a world view that rarely, if ever, intersects with that offered by the government's supporters; it pits righteousness against wrong, and victory, however long it might take, is inevitable. He said he couldn't envision an alternative.

"From the beginning we weren't treated well. Not just now. From the previous government and the government before that," Yassine said. "The people aren't going here because what Sayyid Hasan said. Sure, they'll do what he says. They love him. But they're going here because they're unhappy. I'll go not one night, two nights or three nights. I'll go for a year or two years."

As the protests wound down, he got into his car, driving back to the Dahiya and its densely populated warrens, where electricity is cut for hours every day. Armored personnel carriers were parked every so often, and knots of soldiers hung around intersections along streets that divided Sunni and Shiite neighborhoods. "It's like a border," he said. Along one road, six armored personnel carriers drove by, followed by three jeeps. A little ways down, he was stopped briefly at a checkpoint.

DOJ_NMG_0104931

"Where are you coming from?" the soldier asked. "Downtown," he said, and drove on.

His mood turned a little bleak, a little less optimistic than at the protests.

"They can't let any fight get big," Yassine said. "If a small fight gets big, Lebanon is gone."

Leading Lebanon From A Gilded Cage (LAT)

By Megan K. Stack

The Los Angeles Times, December 10, 2006

BEIRUT — In the palace on the hill, the chants and curses from the street below are easy to hear.

The voices float up through the clear wintry air, wisps of tension rising from the roiling anti-government demonstrations. Weary ministers listen to the heart-pounding bass beat of Hezbollah fighters' anthems, the political speeches screamed into microphones, the roar of the crowd. After sunset, the glare of floodlights arches like a gigantic halo over the tent city that's cropped up in the upscale shopping districts of downtown.

Inside the Grand Serail, what remains of Prime Minister Fouad Siniora's government toils away, trying to ignore the thousands upon thousands of people massed at its gate. The people outside describe the government leaders as unwanted and illegitimate, pawns of U.S. interests.

"We hear their voices, but we feel no compassion for them," said Fouad Saad, a lawmaker and former Cabinet minister who, in his neat suit, lingered between meetings under the glittering chandeliers of a cavernous reception room. "These people have received orders from Syria and Iran…. They are trying to drag us backward many years."

This is the kernel of a dangerous political standoff. The government stays put, refusing to regard the raucous calls from the protesters for its officials' resignations. Instead, they say, foreign powers are scheming to take over the country.

The Grand Serail is a hulking sprawl of an Ottoman-style palace that was ravaged by civil war and reconstructed as a proud icon of a nation's rebirth. It now stands isolated behind snarls of razor wire and layers of soldiers and security forces.

In the shabby maze of tents below, the mood is stoical and confident. The demonstrators seem convinced that the government will, inevitably, collapse, that Siniora and his allies cannot stay in place with so many people on the streets.

"When this stuff happens in other countries, the government falls," said Sami Harb, a 21-year-old computer communications student.

Tough talk on both sides

On a cold night, Harb paced the pavement near the line where demonstrators' tents were pitched next to the tanks and soldiers that seal off the main road to the palace. He turned up the hill, and waved an arm in disgust.

"Here somebody died," he said, referring to a young Shiite Muslim man shot and killed in sectarian-tinged street fighting, "and Siniora is still sitting right up there."

Organizers insist that the demonstration will remain peaceful. Still, some protesters speak of overrunning the palace if the government doesn't leave.

But in a tough-talking interview last week at his heavily fortified home in Beirut, Saad Hariri said that his allies would never be driven from office by the Hezbollah-led demonstrations. Hariri, the head of the Sunni Muslim community and leader of the parliament's majority bloc, said that to give up would be akin to handing Lebanon over to Iran and Syria.

Even if fighting erupts, even if stability is shaken, the government will stay, Hariri said.

"You're not preserving stability, you're killing your democracy," he said of resignation. "It's about putting Lebanon in the hands of Syria and Iran."

Pro-government parties are planning counter-demonstrations in coming days, he said, adding that he was having a hard time keeping his supporters off the streets. In Sunni neighborhoods, men speak openly of their thirst for revenge.

"You have no clue how many people call us: 'We want weapons, we want this,' " Hariri said. "We have to be the Gandhis of Lebanon. We have to stand in their faces and say no."

In the meantime, the army has swarmed and cut off every road that leads to the Grand Serail. The surrounding neighborhood has been swallowed in an expanded security zone. Visitors have to pass through an army checkpoint, then walk along a once-bustling street now rendered ghostly, footsteps echoing off closed shops.

Soldiers sprawl on the steps of a church. Perhaps out of desperation or optimism, a lone merchant has kept his interior decorating shop open for customers who can't get there.

Inside the Grand Serail, many of the Cabinet ministers have been living, almost on top of one another, in the guest quarters. They have been there since one of their number, Pierre Gemayel, a Christian, was gunned down in November. They are afraid that if they leave, the same will happen to them.

A recent visit found Youth and Sports Minister Ahmed Fatfat drying his socks on a radiator and chatting with his visiting wife.

What the ministers know about events in the tent city below they mostly get from television.

The other night, the ministers huddled together before a television set to hear Hezbollah chief Sheik Hassan Nasrallah insult them.

They heard Nasrallah, arguably the most popular political leader in Lebanon, refer to "what remains of this falling government in the Serail."

He called them a "government of one color and a despotism of one group," a "dead end," "the government of the American ambassador." They heard him say that he would keep his people at the gates until the government fell. And they heard the crowd scream with the throaty abandon of a rock concert, hoisting their toddlers on their shoulders, chanting, "God preserve Nasrallah!"

When the Hezbollah chief finished speaking, the sky thundered with fireworks and celebratory gunfire.

Support by the busload

The ministers woke up the next morning and pressed on with business. These days, "business" seems to involve accepting moral support and doing work that will be moot if the government falls.

Day after day, the buses rattle into town from the mountains in the north, the cities of the south, the Bekaa Valley. One day it's a delegation of Bedouin tribes, another day the Druze, or supporters from Sidon, the southern port that's home to the powerful Hariri family and Siniora.

A swarm of visitors from Sidon was ushered through the grand stone hallways and sleepy courtyards last week, and packed into a hall where they staged a tiny counter-demonstration. They stood on their chairs, waved pictures of Lebanon's Sunni leaders and sang the national anthem.

"Today it's the turn of the people of Sidon to come," said Omar Hariri, a 50-year-old engineer. "You have to chose a side, to be on one side or the other."

"What's happening outside is disgusting," added Maher Chamma, also 50.

When a pale, weary-looking Siniora swept to the front of the room, borne along on a swift current of bodyguards, the cheers rang off the high ceiling. "May God bless you," the people cried. "With our blood and our souls, we will redeem you, Siniora."

Siniora launched into a speech deriding Hezbollah. Then he told them, "Sitting with you gives me a lot of comfort."

But when it was over, the visitors were packed back into buses and driven off through the back entrance, out of sight of the demonstrators.

Passing through a courtyard where pigeons splashed lazily in a fountain, Social Affairs Minister Nayla Mouawad said she had just finished writing a request for international money to help Lebanon rebuild from the summer war between Israel and Hezbollah.

"We are working much better and more efficiently than before," she said, her tone defiant. "You can concentrate here. You don't have the house, you don't have the children."

But moods shift fast. A moment later, Mouawad said she felt physically threatened. She fretted about rumors that demonstrators might try to take the palace by force.

Both sides insist they are open to negotiation. But at the same time, Nasrallah said his party would be wary of wasting time. And Hariri, too, seemed pessimistic.

"My only concern is, do they have the authority to negotiate?" Hariri said. "Because their authority comes from outside, from Iran and Syria.

"We did not create the problem," he added. "They created the problem."

Poisoning Inquiry Extends To Germany, Where Radiation Is Found (WP)

By Peter Finn, Mary Jordan

The Washington Post, December 10, 2006

MOSCOW, Dec. 9 -- German police said Saturday that they had found traces of radiation in two apartments in the Hamburg area connected to a Russian businessman who met with Alexander Litvinenko, a former Russian intelligence officer who died after being exposed to a deadly radioactive isotope.

German authorities said that the businessman, Dmitry Kovtun, had visited the two apartments, which belong to his ex-wife and former mother-in-law. Kovtun is reportedly seriously ill in a Moscow hospital.

Police said they had not found traces of radiation in Kovtun's own apartment in Hamburg.

The poisonous and politically charged trail of the radioactive polonium-210 that killed Litvinenko on Nov. 23 has now touched three countries in a case that brings fresh twists every day without yet revealing its source.

DOJ_NMG_0104933

The budget airline carrier Germanwings said Saturday that it had taken out of service the plane that carried Kovtun from Hamburg to London on Nov. 1, but tests at the Cologne-Bonn airport later turned up no signs of radioactive contamination.

If Kovtun left the radioactive trail in Germany after meeting Litvinenko, he could have picked it up from Litvinenko, a scenario strengthened by the fact that no traces were found on his inbound flight to London.

Traces left before Nov. 1, the day Litvinenko fell ill, could lead police to its source.

Critics of Russian President Vladimir Putin, including Litvinenko, have accused the Kremlin of being behind the killing in an effort to publicly squash a vocal detractor; the Kremlin rejects those accusations as absurd and says Putin enemies desperate to tarnish the president are more likely candidates for suspicion.

Kovtun, 43, a Russian business consultant who has spent years living in Germany, is emerging as a key figure in the investigation. While there are conflicting reports about his condition, the Russian news agency Interfax has reported that Kovtun is in serious condition and experiencing problems with major organ functions as a result of the poisoning.

Kovtun and another Russian businessman, Andrei Lugovoy, met with Litvinenko in the Pine Bar at the Millennium Hotel in London on Nov. 1, the day Litvinenko began feeling sick. A third Russian, Vyacheslav Sokolenko, said he also briefly met with Litvinenko at the hotel, which is located in central London on the same square as the U.S. Embassy.

Lugovoy has also tested positive for radiation poisoning but is reportedly still in good health, though meetings between him, Russian investigators and Scotland Yard detectives have been repeatedly postponed.

Lugovoy, a former KGB agent, and Kovtun attended the same military academy in Moscow in the 1980s. Both men have denied any involvement in the poisoning and say they are victims of a conspiracy.

Damien Wood, a manager of the luxury Millennium Hotel, said that despite the notoriety, the hotel remains "very busy. We are fully booked tonight." He said the Pine Bar, where Litvinenko met Lugovoy and Kovtun, remains shut indefinitely.

The British Health Protection Agency said this week that seven employees of the Pine Bar had tested positive for small traces of polonium-210. Wood said all of them continue to work at the hotel. On Saturday evening, a police van was parked outside the hotel, and a lone officer stood guard in front of the closed bar.

In a recent interview with Echo Moskvy radio, Kovtun said he was a business consultant who had lived in Germany for 12 years but had also set up a business in Moscow. He said he spoke with Litvinenko, whom he first met at another meeting in London on Oct. 16 to discuss possible business deals with British companies interested in investing in Russia and looking for expert advice.

Police in Hamburg stressed that Kovtun was not a suspect.

Russian prosecutors this week opened a criminal investigation into the attempted murder of Kovtun after he was found to be contaminated with radiation.

Russian authorities, who have said they will lead the interrogations and have essentially consigned British detectives to the role of observers in Moscow, told the Associated Press on Saturday that they intend to send their own investigators to London.

That has caused some consternation among emigres who were close to Litvinenko, many of whom are fierce critics of Putin. Two of Litvinenko's associates, exiled tycoon Boris Berezovsky and Chechen separatist Akhmed Zakayev, are wanted by the Russian authorities on various charges. British courts refused to extradite them, accepting their arguments that the charges against them were politically motivated.

The idea of Russian investigators coming to London "adds insult to injury," said Alex Goldfarb, who has been acting as a spokesman for the Litvinenko family. He said Putin had created an "authoritarian government" that controls the judiciary and prosecutors. "It cannot be taken seriously . . . the Russians are playing a game."

In an interview, however, Goldfarb added, "If British police believe this is the only way to get access to real suspects in Moscow, then we have no choice but to play in this unseemly game."

He said Berezovsky and Litvinenko's widow, Marina, reacted with the same "ironic comment: They would only talk to Russian investigators if they were tested first for carrying polonium-210."

German Police Detect Traces Of Radiation At Two Sites Linked To Litvinenko Contact (AP)

AP, December 9, 2006

HAMBURG, Germany (AP) — German police said Saturday that they had found traces of radiation at two sites in and near Hamburg linked to a contact of poisoned former Russian spy Alexander Litvinenko.

Police said they found traces of alpha radiation at the Hamburg apartment of the ex-wife of Dmitry Kovtun, who met Litvinenko in London on Nov. 1, the day the former spy is believed to have fallen ill.

They also said an initial scan had shown contamination at the home in Haselau, west of the port city, of his ex-wife's mother.

DOJ_NMG_0104934

Meanwhile, tests have shown no trace of the radioactive substance polonium-210 on a plane used by a contact of Litvinenko to fly to London, German airline Germanwings said Saturday.

Authorities carried out tests at Cologne-Bonn airport after determining that Dmitry Kovtun flew to London from Hamburg on the Airbus A319 on Nov. 1. Kovtun met with Litvinenko later that day.

Airline spokesman Heinz-Joachim Schoettes said the plane was taken out of service at Cologne-Bonn airport after authorities informed the company that Kovtun flew to London from Hamburg aboard the aircraft on Nov. 1.

Reports that Kovtun flew to London from Hamburg prompted police in the northern port city to begin their checks.

Kovtun, one of two Russians who met Litvinenko at London's Millennium Hotel, is reportedly being treated in Moscow, also for radiation poisoning.

Specialists found no trace of polonium-210 at the apartment of Kovtun himself in the Hamburg district of Ottensen.

However, police said in a statement Saturday they found radioactive "contamination that makes a fine examination necessary" at two locations in an apartment in the same building used by Kovtun's ex-wife.

They said during the night they had found indications that there had been a source of radiation in the apartment, but added that they had not found the source.

Police later sealed off the ex-wife's mother's home in Haselau, outside Hamburg, for further tests after finding traces of contamination there.

The traces were found in the bathroom and living room of the Hamburg apartment, and on a bed and a chair at the Haselau property.

Further tests were to determine whether the contamination was linked to polonium-210. Police spokeswoman Ulrike Sweden said they could last as long as two days.

Kovtun's ex-wife and her mother were questioned by police. Authorities did not identify the 31-year-old ex-wife.

Sweden said early Saturday that it was unclear whether Kovtun had returned to Hamburg after meeting Litvinenko.

She said it was possible that either a person or an object could have been the source of radiation in the Hamburg apartment.

While German authorities were in contact with British police, the search was "purely protective" and not part of any investigation against Kovtun, Sweden said.

Police have said the traces found so far represent no health risk to local residents. However, they said that about 30 people who live in the Hamburg apartment building would have to vacate it while tests continue.

A German Twist In Poisoning Trail (LAT)

By Jeffrey Fleishman

The Los Angeles Times, December 10, 2006

BERLIN — The mystery surrounding the poisoning death of a former Russian spy has veered to Germany, where investigators Saturday found traces of radiation in an apartment connected with a businessman who met the ex-KGB agent on the day he fell ill.

Police said "hints" of radiation were detected in the Hamburg apartment of Dmitry Kovtun's former wife. Traces were also discovered in the nearby suburban home of the ex-wife's mother. Kovtun met with ex-KGB agent Alexander Litvinenko on Nov. 1 in London, where police suspect he was exposed to the radioactive polonium-210 that killed him three weeks later.

Kovtun, a Russian businessman, is reportedly ill in a Moscow hospital.

Authorities said although contamination was detected, they did not find a radiation source in either building.

Police discounted media reports suggesting that Kovtun, who reportedly lived in Germany for 12 years, planned Litvinenko's assassination in Hamburg. No traces of radiation were discovered in Kovtun's apartment, which is in the same building as his ex-wife's in the northern port city's Ottensen neighborhood.

"At the moment, this man has not been accused," police spokeswoman Ulrike Sweden told German radio.

The airline Germanwings said that one of its planes was being tested for polonium-210. A spokesman told reporters that Kovtun flew on the plane from Hamburg to Britain the day he met Litvinenko. Media reports said no contamination was found. Police are investigating whether Kovtun returned to Hamburg after the meeting at London's Millennium Hotel.

The murder investigation has skipped across the continent and led to allegations by Litvinenko's family that intelligence services connected with the Kremlin were behind the plot.

Moscow has begun its own investigation. Russian authorities are expected to question Andrei Lugovoy, a businessman and former KGB colonel who was with Kovtun at the meeting with Litvinenko. He also is ill.

About 30 people were evacuated from Kovtun's building. Police told tenants there was no contamination danger, but asked them to "move out during the time of investigation."

Spy Widow Points Finger At Russia (BBC)

BBC.com, December 10, 2006

The widow of former KGB agent Alexander Litvinenko has said she believes the Russian authorities could have been behind his murder.

Marina Litvinenko, 44, told the Mail on Sunday: "Obviously it was not Putin himself, of course not."

But she said what President Putin "does around him in Russia makes it possible to kill a British person" in Britain.

She said she had confidence UK police would find her husband's killer, but would not help Russia's planned probe.

Mrs Litvinenko told the paper Russian authorities had not yet been in touch with her.

"I do not think I will help them with their investigations," she said.

"I can't believe that they will tell the truth. I can't believe if they ask about evidence they will use it in the proper way."

Traces of a radioactive substance, polonium-210, were found in Mr Litvinenko's body.

Two of the 26 police officers closely involved in the Litvinenko inquiry have tested positive for traces of that radioactive substance.

The Metropolitan Police said the polonium traces were "relatively small" and were "below defined safety limits".

Both officers are being monitored by health specialists.

Mr Litvinenko's widow denied he had ever been a spy

Mrs Litvinenko also told the Mail on Sunday her husband's last words to her last month before he died of suspected polonium-210 poisoning were: "Marina, I love you so much."

She also said she would do everything she could for "Sasha", as her husband was known to family and friends.

"Even until the last day, and the day before when he became unconscious, I thought he would be okay. We were both completely sure he would recover, " she told the newspaper.

"We had been talking about bone-marrow transplants and looking to the future."

Mrs Litvinenko said the couple's 12-year-old son had found his father's death "very difficult", but he had been trying to comfort his mother.

Friends of Mr Litvinenko believe he was poisoned because of his criticisms of the Russian government, but the Kremlin has dismissed suggestions it was involved in any way as "sheer nonsense".

'Speaking out'

His widow told the Sunday Times she had decided to speak out after some "completely untrue" reports suggested her husband was a man of dubious character.

She told the paper he had been an honest man and a crime fighter rather than a spy.

Mrs Litvinenko also told the Sunday Times: "Everybody tries to write about Sasha like he was an ex-spy, but it's completely untrue. He never was a spy."

She said her husband's public claims about his former employers at the FSB, Russia's secret police, had alienated them, the paper reported.

She said Mr Litvinenko knew "you can never escape from the FSB and he was starting to speak openly about crime."

She added: "I can't say (it was) these people but I'm absolutely sure they didn't forgive him for what he did."

When An Ex-K.G.B. Man Says They're Out To Get Him... (NYT)

By Scott Shane

The New York Times, December 10, 2006

I CALLED Alexander Litvinenko in London to ask him about poison and the K.G.B., and he was glad to oblige. Yes, he said in that interview two years ago, he believed that the Russian security agency was behind the dioxin poisoning of Viktor Yushchenko, who was running for president of Ukraine.

The view inside the K.G.B. and its successor, the F.S.B., where he had worked for a decade, "was that poison is just a weapon, like a pistol," Mr. Litvinenko said. He even gave the Moscow address of what he said was an F.S.B. poison laboratory. "I was told there were 11 poisons for different uses," he said, and added one more prescient detail. The same laboratory, he said, worked on "radioactive items."

Today, the British police are following the radioactive trail of Mr. Litvinenko's killer from London to Moscow, where two Russian associates of his are reported to be sick, possibly from radiation. Mr. Litvinenko's slow and agonizing death last month from ingestion of polonium 210 is an act of radiological terrorism that has not been solved. But its grisly exoticism — targeting a British citizen in his adopted country — seemed almost a throwback to the ruthlessness of the Stalin era, when it was part of the code of the K.G.B. to kill its apostates where it found them.

In the interview, which seemed hysteria-tinged at the time, Mr. Litvinenko said that Russian authorities had marked him for assassination. He e-mailed me a photograph of the charred wall of his London apartment, damaged by a Molotov cocktail. He sent the manuscript of his book, "Blowing Up Russia," which charged that apartment bombings in Russia, officially blamed on Chechen rebels, were in fact the work of the F.S.B.

Neither the book nor Mr. Litvinenko's writings at Chechenpress.org were subtle. In one posting last year, he imagined enraged Russians storming the Kremlin, to "crack this citadel of barbarity and violence" and "murder the main security officer Putin and his assistants in the Kremlin toilet."

If Mr. Litvinenko's killing was a response to such verbal attacks, it would mark the distance Russia has traveled from the late 1980s, when K.G.B. leaders were grilled by the first elected Parliament and a K.G.B.-led coup crumbled. In 1989, addressing that Parliament, Yuri P. Vlasov, who had earned celebrity as an Olympic weightlifting champion, denounced the K.G.B. on live television as "a real underground empire" responsible for "millions of people murdered."

The next year, a retired K.G.B. major general, Oleg D. Kalugin, joined the nascent reform alliance Democratic Russia and became the first insider to denounce the security service on its own turf. Mr. Kalugin ran for Parliament himself, and then participated in the East-West spy thaw that seemed to consign the cold war to history. In 1996, he even co-starred with a former Central Intelligence Agency director, William E. Colby, in a computer game called "Spycraft."

But meanwhile the K.G.B., divided into the domestic F.S.B. and the Foreign Intelligence Service, or S.V.R., bided its time. President Boris N. Yeltsin considered dismantling the K.G.B. but "decided it was too dangerous," said Michael McFaul, a Russia specialist at Stanford University.

In the seven-year rule of President Vladimir V. Putin, the security service has returned to prestige and power. "All the most important jobs in Russia today," Mr. McFaul said, "are held by K.G.B. or former K.G.B. officers, in every ministry, in every industry."

Mr. Kalugin, facing increasing hostility at home, settled for good in the United States. In 2002, the onetime rising star of Russian democracy was convicted of treason by a Moscow court and sentenced in absentia to 15 years in prison. For decades, he said, any K.G.B. officer who defected was automatically tried and sentenced to death, and officers overseas were expected to carry out the sentences. In the late 1960s, when Yuri Andropov became K.G.B. chief, the practice faded. "He never formally ended it, but he found reasons not to give the orders," said Mr. Kalugin, who knew Mr. Andropov well.

Now the practice may be back and playing out in a world where former K.G.B. officers, with murky continuing relations with the successor agency, are found in many countries. Mr. McFaul said that whoever killed Mr. Litvinenko chose the gruesome murder weapon to deter others who would openly break with the F.S.B. and the regime. "The message is: Be afraid. Be very afraid," he said.

Message received, said Alex Konanykhin, a former Russian banker who fled to the United States in 1992 after former K.G.B. officers muscled him out of his own business. After he discussed Mr. Litvinenko's death on CNN, anxious friends called both from Russia and the United States to urge him to keep quiet.

"They say, 'What are you thinking? It's too dangerous," ' said Mr. Konanykhin, who runs a computer company and recently published an autobiography, "Defiance." He has continued to speak out, but he acknowledges, "It's chilling."

Mr. Kalugin, now living near Washington, says he regularly receives threats. Russian press reports since Mr. Litvinenko's death have quoted hardliners as saying that Mr. Kalugin is now first on the list of turncoats targeted for death.

Does he fear assassination?

Mr. Kalugin replied with a humorless laugh that was neither a yes nor a no. "I've led a good and interesting and honest life," he said.

U.S. And Foreign Regulators Consider Tightening Controls On Deadly Polonium 210 (NYT)

By William J. Broad

The New York Times, December 10, 2006

Nuclear regulators in Washington and abroad are studying whether to tighten security on polonium 210 in case terrorists seek the deadly material for so-called dirty bombs that spew radioactivity, officials and diplomats said in recent interviews.

The evaluation is based on longstanding fears about the possible terrorist threat as well as the polonium 210 poisoning that on Nov. 23 killed a former Russian spy living in exile in Britain and stirred public unease. British authorities traced the risk of radioactive contamination to a dozen sites around London and commercial jets carrying more than 33,000 people. The poisoning was an apparent first that caught the authorities by surprise.

Groups considering tighter controls include the Nuclear Regulatory Commission in the United States and the International Atomic Energy Agency in Vienna, which sets global standards for radiation safety. "There are no sirens wailing," said a senior

European diplomat familiar with the agency's polonium 210 reassessment. "But there's a sense that we need to rethink how it is categorized," and thus controlled.

Officials and diplomats, some of whom spoke on the condition of anonymity because of the delicacy of the deliberations, said the agencies were carefully monitoring developments in London and Moscow. Meanwhile, private experts called tighter controls a potentially important step for public safety.

"It's very wise to put fairly strict limits on the commercially available amounts of polonium," said Thomas S. Tenforde, president of the National Council on Radiation Protection and Measurements, a Congressionally chartered group in Bethesda, Md., that advises the federal government on radiation safety.

Dr. Tenforde called the amounts of polonium 210 now available on the commercial market "not trivial" and said the contemplation of tighter controls was prudent given the risk of terrorists using polonium 210, a radioactive material, in urban attacks meant to sow disease and death. "It's a very nasty isotope," he said, "to put it mildly."

Commercially, polonium 210 is used to make static eliminators that remove dust from film, lenses and laboratory balances, as well as from paper and textile plants. The radioactive material is sealed tightly to make it hard to remove.

A dirty bomb, unlike a true nuclear weapon, uses ordinary explosives in its core and radioactive materials on the outside. If detonated in a city, it would scatter radioactive dust and debris which, in the worst case, might kill hundreds and sicken thousands of people. Nuclear experts call polonium 210 one of the most toxic materials known to science. A tiny speck can kill.

Even so, experts initially saw the highly radioactive material as a poor candidate for dirty bombs because skin or paper can easily stop its distinctive rays. It must be inhaled, injected or ingested to do harm. Moreover, its short half-life, just 138 days, means it loses potency relatively fast. On the other hand, its rays are hard to detect compared with those of most other radioactive materials, making it difficult to track.

After the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, Washington looked anew at the deadliness of polonium 210 and decided that the material warranted more scrutiny as a potential weapon of terrorists.

In May 2003, a team from the Energy Department, which runs the nation's nuclear arms complex, and the Nuclear Regulatory Commission issued a lengthy dirty-bomb report that called polonium 210 one of 10 radioactive materials "of greatest concern." The 10, the report said, "should be given first priority for consideration of increased security measures."

In November 2003, the Nuclear Regulatory Commission began an interim effort to track the sources. But it took three more years, until Nov. 8, before the commission issued a final rule spelling out the workings of its program, officially called "National Source Tracking of Sealed Sources." The rule is to take effect early next year.

In theory, the system can track polonium 210 sources. But in interviews, commission officials said the reporting threshold was so high — 16 curies, which translates in standard risk estimates into more than 5,000 lethal doses — that it exceeded all known industry sources and products.

"We have not seen any polonium sources over 16 curies," said William R. Ward, a safety manager at the commission. "The rule will have no impact."

Other officials said the commission was monitoring the polonium drama overseas and evaluating the need for tighter controls. "Things are still unfolding," said Timothy E. Harris, a commission chief for radioactive source safety and security.

After he spoke, health authorities in London and Moscow raised the total number of people known to be contaminated by the polonium to at least 10 beyond the doomed spy, Alexander V. Litvinenko.

A senior commission official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity, said his agency was considering lowering the threshold for tracking polonium by a factor of 10, to 1.6 curies. But its first priority, he added, was to get better reporting and security for materials even more dangerous for dirty bombs than polonium.

Russia's Poisoned Democracy (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, December 10, 2006

THE RADIOACTIVE poisoning death of former KGB spy Alexander Litvinenko is mushrooming into a tale of intrigue that is mesmerizing and confusing in equal measures. But the cloak-and-dagger theatrics threaten to obscure an urgent danger at the story's heart — journalists in President Vladimir V. Putin's Russia are increasingly being attacked and killed.

The latest Litvinenko news is the stuff of a John Le Carre novel: Two Russian businessmen, one of them a former KGB colonel, and an Italian investigator — all of whom who met with Litvinenko just before he fell ill — have also suffered poisoning from polonium-210.

Traces of the material were also found in employees of the London bar where Litvinenko and the Russians met and on aircraft that flew between Moscow and London. Meanwhile, former Russian Prime Minister Yegor T. Gaidar fell severely ill in Dublin and also claims to have been poisoned, though not with polonium and, he insists, not by the Kremlin.

We may never find out whodunit or who ordered it done, but we know what Litvinenko was investigating at the time of his death: the killing of decorated Russian journalist Anna Politkovskaya, who had been exposing alleged Russian misdeeds in Chechnya.

Were the killings of Politkovskaya and Litvinenko isolated incidents, the Kremlin's protests that it suffers most from the bad international publicity would be more worthy of sympathy. But Politkovskaya was at least the 21st Russian journalist to be killed since Putin was elected in 2000, according to Reporters Without Borders. Two others have disappeared and are presumed dead, and there have been 320 assaults.

This would be alarming in any country, but it comes during a period in which the Russian government has nationalized private TV stations that had been critical of the regime, backed the takeover of independent media by political allies, arrested media executives or forced them into exile and repeatedly brought criminal charges against journalists. The human rights group Freedom House ranks Russia as simply "not free" when it comes to the media.

The result has been de facto impunity for those who would enforce public silence — be they corrupt government officials, sleazy businessmen, gangsters or any others who fear exposure or debate. That some news outlets have accepted payment to print or withhold sensitive information in the anarchic post-Soviet marketplace certainly complicates the picture.

But the pattern of censorship, intimidation and deadly violence against the Kremlin's fiercest critics makes it increasingly difficult to give Putin the benefit of the doubt.

Politkovskaya, one of the bravest reporters of her generation, was gunned down Oct. 7 in what many suspect was a contract killing. She is the third journalist from her newspaper, Novaya Gazeta — one of the last Russian publications that dares do investigative reporting — to die.

Last month, two other Novaya Gazeta reporters received death threats; one was investigating Politkovskaya's slaying. While the newspaper's staff risks their lives to shed light on the inner workings of Putin's Russia, the West has a moral obligation to insist that the Russian government protect them.

Taiwan Leader's Party Wins In Mayoral Vote, But Recount Is Sought (NYT)

By Keith Bradsher

The New York Times, December 10, 2006

KAOHSIUNG, Taiwan, Dec. 9 — President Chen Shui-bian's Democratic Progressive Party eked out the narrowest victory in Taiwanese political history in crucial mayoral elections here on Saturday, but the opposition Nationalist Party quickly said it would seek a recount.

The Central Election Commission in Taipei announced that with all ballots counted, the Democratic Progressive Party candidate in Kaohsiung had won by 1,120 votes out of more than 760,000 cast, a victory margin of about one seventh of a percent. On an island with already deep political divisions, the paper-thin margin and the possibility of a court fight are likely to cause further political friction in the weeks ahead.

Joanna Lei, a senior Nationalist lawmaker, said that party officials would ask the municipal election commission here to conduct a recount. Municipal election commissions have the discretion to order recounts when the outcome is decided by less than 1 percent of the vote.

Taiwan's legislature discussed whether to require recounts in close elections after President Chen narrowly won re-election in 2004, but never acted on the idea.

Both parties also threatened to sue each other in district court here on Monday, and began demanding that all ballot papers and other records be sealed at the courthouse.

Democratic Progressive Party officials accused the Nationalists on Friday and Saturday of paying people to attend a rally on Friday night; the Nationalists accused the Democratic Progressive Party of violating a law that bars parties from making any statements that may influence the election outcome after 10 p.m. the night before the polls open.

Even before the polls closed, the authorities here prepared for a close election by assembling a dozen busloads of riot police and heavy steel barriers fringed with barbed wire to defend the courthouse, where ballots are sent after an initial count in polling districts. Kaohsiung has a history of violent street protests.

But local Nationalists appeared more stunned than angry, and the streets around the courthouse were quiet on Saturday evening. Police officers at the courthouse sat on the pavement next to their riot shields or snoozed on the nearby buses.

The Nationalist Party had sought to turn mayoral elections here and in Taipei on Saturday into an informal referendum on President Chen, who has been dogged by allegations that he and his family have committed financial impropriety.

A Nationalist Party candidate, Hau Lung-bin, won the election in Taipei by a wide margin. That had been expected because northern Taiwan, including Taipei, tends to support Nationalist candidates while southern Taiwan, including Kaohsiung, more often votes for Democratic Progressive Party candidates.

While Saturday's vote represented a reprieve of sorts for President Chen, it may have also strengthened the Nationalist Party, which favors closer relations with mainland China. James Soong, a former Nationalist who split with the party and set up a rival party, the People First Party, ran as an independent in the Taipei mayoral race but attracted just 4 percent of the vote.

Mr. Soong announced after the count that he would leave politics, which could clear the way for the People First Party to combine with the Nationalists, a move the two parties have been negotiating off and on for at least three years.

The vote count here showed Chen Chu, the Democratic Progressive Party candidate, with 379,417 votes, compared to 378,297 for Huang Chun-ying, the Nationalist candidate.

Taiwan Rival Parties Split Mayoral Wins (AP)

AP, December 10, 2006

Taiwan's ruling party narrowly won a crucial mayoral election in one southern city Saturday, while the opposition candidate won comfortably in the capital of Taipei in a pair of votes seen by many as a referendum on President Chen Shui-bian.

Chen Chu of the Democratic Progressive Party bested Nationalist Party candidate Huang Jun-ying by slightly more than 1,100 votes in Kaohsiung — a result likely to boost the position of the corruption-tainted president.

Huang said Sunday he had requested a recount of the nearly 800,000 ballots cast in the southern industrial city. The Kaohsiung District Court decided to seal off ballot boxes from all the city's polling stations to prepare for a recount, Judge Chen Chia-hui said.

In Taipei, the Nationalists' Hau Lung-bin beat the DPP's Frank Hsieh by about 13 percentage points with all the votes counted.

Chen Chu's victory in Kaohsiung — albeit by the narrowest of margins — seems likely to take pressure off of the president, who has been on the defensive for more than six months over allegations his family and inner circle benefited financially from their proximity to him.

The two Chens are not related.

On Nov. 3, prosecutors indicted Chen's wife and three former aides on charges of embezzling $450,000 from a special fund under presidential control. They said Chen could face the same charges when his presidential immunity from prosecution lapses after his term ends in 2008.

Allegations of vote-buying marred the election in Kaohsiung, long a DPP stronghold. The DPP claimed Huang's campaign workers handed envelopes containing $31 to people on a bus returning from his final election rally late Friday.

Huang on Sunday accused the ruling DPP of violating election law by making a false accusation against him on the eve of the election.

Voting took place without major problems in Taipei, where polls had shown Hau as a strong favorite. Hsieh's relatively robust showing — he garnered almost 41 percent of the vote, far higher than the DPP's expectations — is likely to put him in a good position to contest the party's 2008 presidential nomination.

While the corruption allegations against Chen Shui-bian played a major part in both the Taipei and Kaohsiung campaigns, candidates from the opposing parties also emphasized their positions on Taiwan's relations with mainland China, from which the island split amid civil war in 1949.

Hau and Huang support expanded Taiwanese trade ties with Beijing, reflecting the Nationalists' platform in favor of eventual unification with China.

By contrast, Chen Chu and Hsieh support strengthening Taiwan's de facto independence and play down the importance of expanded trade with the mainland.

Taiwan's Ruling Party Dodges An Electoral Bullet (LAT)

By Mark Magnier, Tsai Ting-i

The Los Angeles Times, December 10, 2006

TAIPEI — Taiwan's ruling party defied expectations that it would be trounced in local elections Saturday, handing President Chen Shui-bian some breathing room after months of fighting off scandals. But the mixed results probably will result in continued political infighting at least through the 2008 presidential election, analysts said.

In the two most closely watched races, the ruling Democratic Progressive Party narrowly won the mayoral race in the city of Kaohsiung and the opposition Nationalists won handily in Taipei.

The elections were seen as a referendum on Chen, who has been battling corruption-related allegations for six months. Chen's wife and three former aides were indicted last month on charges of embezzling $450,000 from a national affairs fund under presidential control. The prosecutor said Chen could face the same charges when his term — and presidential immunity — ends.

The Kaohsiung victory boosted morale in the president's office: Pundits and opinion polls had predicted a humiliating loss for candidate Chen Chu. The results also bolstered the party's reputation for running excellent grass-roots campaigns.

"This has been the most difficult election for the DPP," party Chairman Yu Shyi-kun said. "Nobody believed we could win."

But the narrow victory margin could prompt a recount. Chen Chu (not related to the president) won the mayor's seat by just 1,120 of 800,000 votes cast.

The Kaohsiung race was marred by voting fraud allegations, which are not unusual in local Taiwan elections, though both parties have tried to clean up the process in recent years.

The ruling party claimed that campaign workers for the Nationalists distributed envelopes containing the equivalent of $31 to bus passengers returning from an election rally late Friday. The Nationalists have denied wrongdoing.

In Taipei, Hau Lung-bin of the Nationalists defeated his ruling-party rival by about 13 percentage points.

"I voted for the Nationalists because the ruling party has been too corrupt," said cosmetologist Hsu Yen-ling, 44. "It's time to bring the opposition back into power."

But Nationalists' defeat in Kaohsiung denied their party the sort of mandate they had hoped for heading into legislative elections in 2007 and the presidential race. Party Chairman Ma Ying-jeou, Nationalists' expected presidential candidate, has pledged to shake 7,000 voters' hands a day, and reportedly had assistants count them, perhaps as practice for 2008.

"Ma campaigned very hard, but it is obvious his style is not appreciated by voters here in the south," said Liao Da-chi, a political science professor at Kaohsiung-based National Sun Yat-sen University.

Analysts said a lame-duck president and a divided electorate almost guaranteed that Taiwan would continue to muddle along politically for the foreseeable future.

"There isn't enough pressure on the president to step down, so the current situation will continue," said Philip Y.M. Yang, a political science professor at National Taiwan University. "We probably won't see much getting done in the next one or two years."

HK Voters Begin Choosing A Leader (BBC)

BBC.com, December 10, 2006

Voters in Hong Kong are electing the members of a committee that will choose the territory's next leader.

Pro-democracy groups are hoping to win enough representation on the 800-seat committee to enter a candidate in next March's chief executive contest.

There are 427 seats being contested, with the rest already allocated.

Candidates will need the backing of at least 100 members if they want to challenge the incumbent, Donald Tsang, who is backed by China.

Mr Tsang is expected to win re-election when he final vote is held.

Beijing 'worried'

The BBC's Vaudine England, in Hong Kong, says that the democrats already admit that their chosen potential candidate, lawyer Alan Leong, has no chance of beating Mr Tsang.

But for the first time since Hong Kong was handed back to China by the UK in 1997, the democrat groups now say they feel that it is worth taking part in the contest.

Atmosphere

Sunday's election is not expected to make a wide impact in Hong Kong, where just over 200,000 people from a population of 7.2 million are eligible to vote.

The electorate is drawn from a selection of political organisations and business and professional communities.

"The atmosphere so far is no good, ordinary citizens have no idea there is an important election," said James Sung, a political scientist at Hong Kong's City University.

Of the 373 seats already allocated, 96 are assigned to members of Hong Kong's assembly, or to Hong Kong members of the National People's Congress in Beijing.

Other members are appointed through their professions or through political appointment.

S. American Leaders Aim For EU-like Body (AP)

By Dan Keane, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 10, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0104941

South American leaders agreed Saturday to create a high-level commission to study the idea of forming a continent-wide community similar to the European Union.

The presidents and envoys of 12 nations wrapped up a two-day summit of the South American Community of Nations, hosted by Bolivian President Evo Morales in Cochabamba, a city tucked between the Andes and the Amazon in the heart of the continent.

"We seek that South America be forever a region of peace that works to solve the economic problems of its historically abandoned majority," Morales said.

The leaders agreed to form a study group in Rio de Janeiro to look at the possibility of creating a continent-wide union, and even a South American parliament.

Brazilian President Luiz Inacio Lula da Silva, a former metalworker who was re-elected in October, assured his fellow leaders that the group could rise above its historical divisions to unite the continent — though the process would not be easy.

"We must have patience, and try to solve these issues with delicacy," Silva said. "The solutions are difficult. We're not just simple workers talking about a strike at the factory."

The result left fiery Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez, long an agitator for the region taking a greater role on the world stage, pleased but impatient.

"We need a political Viagra," Chavez said. "Look, we make decisions and we don't have the power to execute them. They're stuck in these pyramids of paper."

The discussion over South American unity likely will continue later this month when the leaders of Brazil, Argentina, Venezuela, Paraguay and Uruguay gather in Brazil for the semiannual meeting of the Mercosur trading bloc.

Morales opened Saturday's round-table discussion calling for the leaders to close "the open veins of Latin America," referring to Eduardo Galeano's famous 1971 book decrying foreign capitalist exploitation. But how to staunch the economic bleeding was a matter of debate.

Chile's Socialist President Michelle Bachelet, whose country has a free trade agreement with the U.S., said globalization had "two faces" — one "potentially very destructive" but another that presented a "historic opportunity for societies like ours."

She urged South American leaders to take advantage of the world economy while minimizing the impact of open trade on the poor.

Chavez, however, expressed blunt opposition to Washington-backed free market prescriptions and boasted that leftists in the region have "buried" U.S. hopes of a hemispheric free trade agreement, an effort launched a decade ago.

He joked that nations signing a free trade pact with the U.S. are subsequently "flooded with chickens' hind quarters."

Though the two did not meet one-on-one, Chavez and Peruvian President Alan Garcia took advantage of the summit to bury the hatchet after exchanging personal insults during Garcia's presidential campaign earlier this year.

In Saturday's forum, Chavez enthusiastically seconded Garcia's call for a continentwide effort to improve education — despite the Peruvian leader's subtle dig at Chavez's ambitious proposal to build a natural gas pipeline across the length of the continent.

"If we don't teach a faith in this integration, all is lost," Garcia said, adding that education reforms would "cost much less building an aqueduct or a great big highway to integrate our countries."

Ecuadorean President-elect Rafael Correa has proposed a land-and-river trade route linking Brazil's Amazon rain forest to Ecuador's Pacific coast, saying it could be an alternative to the Panama Canal.

Chavez also said he was offering his oil-rich nation's refining capacity to Ecuador to help the country slash high energy costs. He said Venezuela would charge only the cost of refining as part of the deal, which is similar to those extended to other nations in the hemisphere.

Correa had no immediate comment on the offer.

Chavez also has extended a hand to close ally Morales. On Sunday, the two presidents will celebrate the groundbreaking of a gas separation plant in Bolivia's gas-rich Chaco region, a joint venture between Petroleos de Venezuela SA, or PDVSA, and Bolivia's state energy company.

Chavez, a fierce critic of President Bush, has used Venezuela's petrodollar wealth to counter U.S. influence in the region. Venezuela is the only Latin American member of OPEC and has the largest proven oil reserves outside the Middle East.

The Best Of Both Dictators (WP)

By Michael Shifter

The Washington Post, December 10, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0104942

The parallels are striking: Two ruthless dictators who sacrificed human rights for political aims. Two men idolized by their followers and despised by the exiles they drove away. Two archetypes of the Latin American strongman, one in dark sunglasses, the other with that ever-present cigar. For the past half-century, no two leaders have so defined Latin America's political scene as Cuba's Fidel Castro and Chile's Gen. Augusto Pinochet.

They ruled from opposite ends of the spectrum -- Castro on the far left, Pinochet on the hard right -- their regimes similar only in their harshness and in the intense passions they evoked. Today, as the two ailing men take their final bows, their repressive political models are rightfully repudiated in most of Latin America, giving way to more democratic governments. Yet the legacies of Castro and Pinochet will loom large, and will long outlive them. They have been tyrants in life, but after their deaths, they will still shape the Latin America they leave behind.

For all their faults, both men tapped into the basic reality of the region and forged responses that will mold Latin America's political and social agenda for generations. Castro recognized the fundamental social inequities that mar the region, the most unequal in the world; Pinochet embraced the market and its power to lift an economy. And the new governments of the region are drawing on both those veins in their quest to better their citizens' political and economic futures.

The human rights records of both men are undeniably dismal. Since the Cuban revolution of 1959, Castro, now 80, has overseen extensive human rights violations, including thousands of executions, especially in the first years after he took power. Repression and tight government control continue to this day. Castro has long justified the tyranny on grounds that it was essential to creating a communist Cuba that emphasizes universal education and free health care, as well as to shielding the island from the constant threat of Washington-engineered regime change. Because of his self-styled image as a defender of the downtrodden and as an underdog standing up to the United States, he remains a hero to many not only throughout Latin America, but worldwide.

Pinochet, in contrast, has few fans outside Chile -- and even there the number of supporters has substantially dropped off. He upended Chile's democratic tradition with a military coup in 1973 and ruled for 17 years before leaving office in 1990. With the abduction, torture and killing of thousands of opponents -- in the name of ridding the country of Marxist influence and creating order out of chaos -- his regime helped turn the word "disappear" into a transitive verb. Only now, at 91, has Pinochet accepted responsibility for what happened during his rule. Small consolation for the families of all those victims.

Fortunately, no government in Latin America today practices the sort of politics that will be forever linked to Castro and Pinochet. The closest heir to either is newly re-elected Venezuelan President Hugo Ch?vez, who would like to assume the mantle of leader of Latin America's left when Castro dies. Some Venezuelans fear that, emboldened by his recent landslide victory, Ch?vez will now make a strong push to implant the Cuba model in their country. But circumstances have changed too dramatically since the 1960s for that to happen.

Castro put his finger on Latin America's fundamental grievance -- the social injustice and inequality that prevails there. Recent elections in Bolivia, Brazil, Costa Rica, Ecuador, Mexico, Nicaragua and Peru have highlighted the renewed importance and urgency of the social agenda. Over the next year, incoming governments of varying ideological hues are likely to put even more emphasis on social programs that respond to widespread frustration and mounting expectations. New leaders will thus sound many of the same egalitarian notes long sounded by Castro.

Yet in practice, many of these governments will carry out some of the same economic policies espoused by Pinochet, relying primarily on the market in pursuit of their social goals. Even Ch?vez relies on the oil market to finance his social programs. In the 1970s, the Pinochet regime, influenced by the late economist Milton Friedman, pioneered the embrace of market reforms in Latin America, including privatizing state enterprises and liberalizing trade. The country went through a tough period in the early 1980s, but Pinochet's economic prescriptions eventually set it on a path that has made it Latin America's best economic performer in recent decades.

Despite the meager fruits of market reform elsewhere, and the corruption wrought by privatization efforts (recent revelations that Pinochet stashed millions of dollars in secret accounts in the former Riggs Bank in Washington have further tarnished his reputation), polls show that most Latin Americans still favor such changes-- albeit carried out honestly, and accompanied by stronger social support programs. Today's ruling coalition government in Chile exemplifies this new current in Latin American politics. Economic performance in the 17 years of democratic rule has been superior to that under Pinochet. And poverty levels have declined from more than 40 percent in 1990 to below 18 percent in 2005.

In Latin America today, the public wants the market-driven growth that draws on the Pinochet experience and the focus on social equality inspired by Castro -- but in a democratic context, without the terror and autocratic rule that marked the two regimes.

It wants, in short, the best of both.

Fiji Coup Leader Runs Want Ads For Cabinet Posts (AP)

AP, December 9, 2006

SUVA, Fiji (AP) — Fiji's coup leader ran want ads in local newspapers Saturday to fill vacant Cabinet jobs, trying to piece together a new government for the south Pacific country.

Army chief Frank Bainimarama has removed a swath of senior civil servants, including top police officers, saying he is weeding out corruption entrenched in the administration of ousted Prime Minister Laisenia Qarase.

"Applicants must be of outstanding character and without any criminal records," the advertisements noted, asking aspirants to submit applications at military headquarters by Tuesday. "Each must not have been declared bankrupt."

"The deadline indicates the urgency in trying to get qualified people in to help in the running of the affairs of the state," Maj. Neumi Leweni, a military spokesman, told state-owned Fiji One News television. He added that the posts of finance and foreign affairs ministers would not be advertised.

Bainimarama's hand-picked interim leader, Maj. Jona Senilagakali, took over the prime minister's office for the first time Friday, arriving with an armed military guard. Some top government officials have been reappointed, the Fiji Times newspapers reported, including the chief executive officers for tourism and agriculture.

An aide for Qarase, meanwhile, said the ousted prime minister would return to the capital of Suva within days despite the risk of arrest.

"We know we will have a reception party at the other end," Sakeasi Ditoka told The Associated Press, referring to troops Qarase expects to meet him at Suva's airport.

"We know what's going to happen. But we need to come back for everybody's sake," Ditoka said. "The people want their leader among them."

Qarase fled the capital to his home island in the Pacific archipelago's north after Bainimarama seized power Tuesday and declared himself president.

Bainimarama has received signs of support from a key opposition leader and the country's powerful tribal chiefs, but has faced a wave of international repudiation.

The 53-nation British Commonwealth suspended Fiji on Friday, a decision Leweni said had been expected. It was the third time in 20 years that the Commonwealth suspended the country following a coup.

Qarase told Australia's Nine Network television the decision was "a very positive move." The U.N. Security Council and the European Union have also condemned the coup — Fiji's fourth in nearly two decades.

The coup was the culmination of a long impasse between Bainimarama and Qarase over legislation offering pardons to conspirators in a 2000 coup and handing lucrative coastal land ownership to indigenous Fijians. Bainimarama said the bills were racist.

Czech Leader Still Hunts For Government (NYT)

By Craig S. Smith

The New York Times, December 10, 2006

PRAGUE, Dec. 8 — It was St. Nicholas Day, Dec. 6, and Mirek Topolanek, this country's prime minister, was on his way to see the president for his lump of coal.

For six long months, the Czech Republic has waited with increasing impatience for Mr. Topolanek to form a government that can win a vote of confidence from a Parliament perfectly split along partisan lines.

He had promised President Vaclav Klaus that he would present a winning cabinet by the holiday, when St. Nicholas and the Devil make their rounds to distribute candy to the good children and coal to the bad.

But he had no cabinet ready.

"Next week," Mr. Topolanek said with evident exasperation before leaving his office in the town's Parliament building.

This small Central European country, which nearly 17 years ago slid so softly from Communism to capitalism that its transition was called the Velvet Revolution, is suddenly finding democracy something of a puzzle. The combination of a backstabbing political culture and a parliamentary system that provides no tie-breaker in the case of an evenly divided legislature has left the country on autopilot since national elections in June.

The crisis shows how far the region's post-Communist political culture has to go before it is mature, but it also indicates that the area's political systems are remarkably secure.

"You would expect, after six months with no stable government, that the politicians would talk about the country, but they only talk about strategic moves and how to get more votes," said Jiri Pehe, a political analyst here.

But not even the Communist Party, he added, is antidemocratic. "The Constitutional framework and the underlying institutions are strong enough for the country to keep running without a government," he said.

The problem began as parliamentary campaigning for national elections came down to the wire in June. The left-wing Czech Social Democratic Party, which had led a governing coalition for the previous eight years, looked as if it could win again.

Then, four days before the voting, a police report packed with dark allegations about the party was leaked to the news media. None of the claims, from pedophilia to murder, have proved true, but the report dominated front pages. Mr. Topolanek's center-right Civic Democratic Party swept the election, winning 81 of Parliament's 200 seats and leaving the Social Democrats with 74.

The ruckus over the report left both sides bruised and angry. Mr. Topolanek's Civic Democrats huddled in his corner with two allied parties, vowing never to form a coalition with the Social Democrats. The Social Democrats, for their part, closed ranks with the Communists, and promised to block any government they weren't part of. Each camp had 100 seats on its side, setting up the stalemate that continues to this day.

The departing Social Democratic Party prime minister, Jiri Paroubek, and his ministers sat in their offices for months waiting for Mr. Topolanek to form a new government.

Mr. Topolanek finally did so in September, allowing him to take Mr. Paroubek's place and install ministers of his own. But his government could not win the necessary parliamentary vote of confidence required for it to stay.

President Klaus sent Mr. Topolanek back to the drawing board. In the meantime, the country waits.

Periodically, Adriena Mrazova, the mayor of Ricany, a small town near the Czech capital, calls the Ministry of Labor and Social Affairs to find out who will pay for the new workers she needs to hire as local governments take over social services previously administered by the state. But no one is home.

Even if she does reach someone, no one is willing to make any decisions, she said. "They tell us, 'We may not be here in two weeks.' "

The Czech Republic's mostly privatized economy is continuing to do well: the economy is growing, unemployment is falling, and inflation is under control. But many people worry that the long pause in government action, particularly on badly needed health care and pension reforms, will hurt the economy later on.

The delay could mean that the country will not be able to reduce its budget deficit to the required 3 percent in time to adopt the euro by 2010, as previously hoped.

Mr. Topolanek's progress has been slowed by a series of party congresses, each promising to alter the political map enough to color his options. While waiting, he has concentrated on trying to split one or two legislators from the opposing camp in order to break the deadlock — to no avail.

Though Mr. Topolanek missed his self-imposed deadline, the Social Democrats have given him another: he has until Dec. 15 to negotiate their participation in a government. After that, Mr. Paroubek said, Mr. Topolanek can form a government on his own and risk another parliamentary no-confidence vote.

If Mr. Topolanek's next attempt at forming a government fails, the speaker of the Czech Parliament's lower chamber — not the president — will appoint a new prime minister for a third try. The speaker is now a Social Democrat and while he has agreed to step down, electing a new speaker will itself be a challenge with a divided Parliament.

Were a third government to fail a vote of confidence, the president would call new elections and the process would start all over again.

Years After War In Kosovo, Land Mines Scar Albania (WP)

By Barbara Frye

The Washington Post, December 10, 2006

DOBRUNA, Albania -- Seven years after the Kosovo conflict ended, NATO bombs continued to explode this fall in the mountains of northern Albania.

This time, however, it was a reassuring sound. Up in the hills, men in protective gear were setting off bomblets that alliance warplanes scattered along the Kosovo border during the 78 days of hostilities.

Within earshot but miles away, men and women combed other hillsides, inch by inch, on hands and knees, searching for land mines planted by combatants in the ground war between Serb forces and Kosovo's ethnic Albanian separatists.

For isolated villages such as Dobruna, it's been seven years of death, amputations, shrapnel wounds and blown-up farm animals, seven years of blocked-off grazing lands, forests and water supplies. The explosives have choked off any hope of development here, denying more than 25,000 people access to parts of their land, according to government estimates.

"Before the war, we used to depend on growing crops and raising animals, but without being afraid of losing our lives," said Dan Mynxyra, the 54-year-old village leader, elected by Dobruna's 36 households. He was sitting on a grassy plot while several other residents looked on. Above, the ash- and oak-covered hillsides had turned a brilliant mix of pumpkin, canary and pale green.

According to Mynxyra, most residents fled the day that NATO began bombing Kosovo, March 24, 1999, in a campaign to halt attacks by Serb forces on ethnic Albanians in the breakaway province. They returned to a familiar landscape made lethal by land mines and booby traps. Dobruna had become one of the border's most explosives-contaminated villages.

The terrain here is more vertical than horizontal, and planting and grazing land is so precious that before organized de-mining began, some residents tried to clear fields and paths on their own, often with tragic results. Thirteen of the village's 290 residents have been injured by land mines, some planted within yards of their houses.

In addition, between 200 and 300 of Dobruna's cows have fallen prey to mines in the past five years, according to Jonuz Kola, who runs a private group that assists mine victims. Kola has tried to dissuade villagers from following stray animals into suspected minefields, with limited success -- loss of a cow is a catastrophe for a poor family.

Sitting on the ground next to Mynxyra, Kola laid out his warning once again. An onlooker yelled out: "If your cow goes into the minefield, you have to go and take it out." Kola smiled and sighed.

A few steps away, the women of the Mula family stood in their yard amid beehives and dried husks, preparing corn to be ground for the winter. Neighbors' chickens wandered in, bees buzzed around and a young cow relaxed on the floor of a small barn.

Jashar Mula emerged from the house with a photo of his 24-year-old son, Korob, sitting on what appeared to be a hospital bed, one leg and both arms reduced to bandaged stumps. His parents said he stepped on a mine and then fell on another while shepherding a flock six years ago.

While his wife, Jose, looked on in distress, Jashar Mula called the day of Korob's accident the worst of his life. "If someone can help me in America, if possible," he said, "send me and my son to the U.S. I will give my hand to Korob, keeping one only to eat."

Korob is one of 272 people wounded or killed by mines and bombs littering a 75-mile stretch of border between Kosovo and Albania. Since 2000, workers have cleared about four-fifths of the area, recovering almost 16,000 explosives.

The work has focused on ground that villagers deem to be high and medium priority: grazing and crop land, roads, areas near water sources. This fall, those and other useful areas along the length of the border were finally declared free of explosives, but it will probably be 2010 before nearly all the explosives along the border are gone.

NATO has acknowledged that some of its warplanes' bombs intended for Serb targets in Kosovo landed on Albanian soil. "NATO never intended to drop any bombs in Albania," said acting NATO spokesman Robert Pszczel. Those that did fall there tend to be within a few yards of the border.

As for mines, at least one account has them being laid by Kosovo Liberation Army rebels to prevent Serb soldiers from following them across the border into Albania, where, as ethnic Albanians, the guerrillas enjoyed widespread support from the population.

But some villagers photographed Serb soldiers laying them, according to Shefqet Bruka, a community liaison for the Albanian Mine Action Executive, a government agency.

A 2004 NATO report states: "In an attempt to deter NATO, Albanian and Kosovo Liberation Army forces from entering Kosovo, Serb forces had planted an extensive network of anti-personnel mines along the northern border of Albania. A significant number of mines have also been found well into Albanian territory."

"They can't admit that they laid mines on the Albanian side" because of the possible legal and financial consequences, said Veri Dogjani, mine awareness and victim assistance officer at the mine action executive. Albanians have been asking for maps of the minefields, "but they say, 'No, we are not aware of what you're talking about.' "

The Serbian Defense Ministry did not respond to repeated requests for comment. But according to the International Campaign to Ban Landmines, Col. Dusan Stanizan of the Yugoslav army's general staff wrote in a Serbian military magazine in January 2000 that "the Yugoslav Army's mining of some routes from Albania into Kosovo had prevented KLA soldiers from breaking through."

Unlike Kosovo, which has been under administration by the United Nations since the war ended in June 1999, northern Albania has received little international aid to repair damage it suffered in the conflict. The region remains desperately poor -- average per capita gross domestic product is $1,564. Many houses along the border lack indoor plumbing and electricity, unemployment hovers around 30 percent, and some villages have lost almost 40 percent of their population since Albanians got the right a decade and a half ago to move freely around the country.

The few roads here tend to be harsh, car-eating gullies, where even walking is difficult. Under communism, cars were banned in Albania, and many villagers still get by with horses and donkeys.

A January 2005 survey by aid organizations determined that road construction was a crying need, as were new irrigation systems, schools, health centers and better access to drinking water. Most projects, however, still await funding.

Jonuz Kola's group, the Victims of Mines and Weapons Association, has helped train local medical professionals and assisted the injured in getting care in the Albanian capital, Tirana, and abroad. It provides interest-free loans of roughly $1,550 to mine victims and their families. So far the program has helped 63 people buy 104 cows.

"They have more milk and they have something like $800 to $1,000 more per year just because of the cows," Kola says.

Kola estimates that it will take at least 10 years for northern Albania to develop what would appear to be a boundless potential for tourism -- its mix of rocky peaks and blue-green rivers make for a walker's paradise.

Before that happens, of course, the mines must go, but even their final removal will be a mixed blessing.

DanChurchAid, the last organization de-mining along the border, provides some of the few jobs to be had here, paying people about $520 a month to find and clear the explosives.

When asked what they would do when de-mining work ended with the arrival of cold weather, people replied with a vague smile or a shrug. "We don't have any jobs in Kosovo. It's impossible to find a job," said Fishik Mamusha, an economics student from Kosovo who was working as a de-miner.

Without the roads, clinics, schools and bridges that the villages seek -- and, in truth, without the mines -- this region could go back to being a forgotten island of poverty on a wealthy continent.

On The Run As War Crosses Another Line In Africa (NYT)

By Lydia Polgreen

The New York Times, December 10, 2006

KALANDAO, Central African Republic — The rumble of engines, any engines, is the signal for the villagers here to flee, leaving behind smoldering pots of wild roots and leaves, a meager afternoon meal.

Their haste was so great on a recent afternoon that they left something else behind — a little girl in a filthy white shirt. She wailed as she sat, utterly alone, struggling to stand, much less flee, on slender, uncertain legs.

The Central African Republic — so important as a potential bulwark against the chaos and misery of its neighbors in Chad and the Darfur region of Sudan — is being dragged right into the dangerous and ever-expanding conflict that has begun to engulf central Africa.

So porous are its borders and ungoverned are parts of its territory that foreign rebels are using the Central African Republic as a staging ground to mount attacks over the border, spreading what the United Nations has called the world's "gravest humanitarian crisis."

The situation is so bad in some places that 50,000 residents have fled the Central African Republic to find refuge in Chad, of all places, while starvation threatens hundreds of thousands who remain.

"This is the soft belly of Africa," said Jerome Chevallier, a World Bank official who is trying to help stabilize the Central African Republic. "It has little protection from whatever might strike it."

A visit to Kalandao underscores the point. The residents here had fled their country's own army, which has been burning villages to smoke out a homegrown rebel movement bent on overthrowing the government. Once the villagers, including the girl's family, realized the approaching vehicles were from the United Nations World Food Program, they trickled back to tell their story.

"We are living in the bush like animals," Leontine Makanzi said. "Our children are dying. We are eating nothing. We have no security." Central African Republic, one of the poorest places on earth, has suffered through a series of coups and countercoups in the last decade and sits almost at the bottom of the United Nations development index. In few places do people live so short a lifespan, bury so many of their young children or succumb to more treatable disease.

But its vulnerability has only grown in recent months. On its northeast border with Sudan, Chadian rebels supported by the Sudanese government have built a base, according to government officials and diplomats, to bolster their bid to overthrow Chad's president, Idriss Déby. Now the Central African Republic government says these foreign fighters have teamed up with local rebels to overthrow it as well, making it increasingly hard to separate one conflict in the region from another.

"The world must act now to prevent an even graver crisis here," said Jean-Charles Dei, country director for the United Nations World Food Program, which is feeding 250,000 people in the Central African Republic, one of just a handful of organizations offering any aid at all here. "The international community must act to protect these vulnerable people or risk that they will be consumed by the crisis in the region."

To stem the tide of destruction in this morass of cross-border enmity, the United Nations is examining the possibility of placing international troops to protect the borders of Chad, Sudan and the Central African Republic.

DOJ_NMG_0104947

The hope is to avoid a broad, multicountry conflict like the one that swept Congo after the fall of Mobutu Sese Seko. That war, which followed the Rwandan genocide and pulled in fighters from Uganda, Angola and Rwanda, among others, killed four million people, mostly from hunger and disease, and its aftermath continues to kill 1,200 people a day.

"As long as the problem of Darfur is not solved, you will not have peace in Ndjamena or Bangui," said Lamine Cisse, the top United Nations official in Central African Republic, referring to the capitals of Chad and Central African Republic. "The conflicts are all linked, and solving one requires solving all."

The Central African Republic is a former French colony of four million people sprinkled in tiny villages across a tangle of jungle about the size of Texas. Across generous swaths of fertile soil, villagers scrape together a living using techniques as old as the Bible — hoes, water cans, human muscle and bone. The labor required for mere survival is so strenuous that the most common operation performed by doctors at a rural hospital in the northwest is for hernias.

On a continent where cellphone towers and fiber optic cables are finally snaking their way across the land, much of life here is lived as though the last few centuries never happened — as though the march of history halted at its wild frontiers.

"It is as though the whole world has simply forgotten these people," said Sister Desiree, a Burundian nun working at a Roman Catholic mission in Ndim, a small provincial town in northwest Central African Republic. "I always ask myself, why does no one besides us come to help these people? But I find no answer."

The four nuns at the mission, along with four nurses, some teachers and a handful of others, run a school, clinic and feeding program in Ndim, handing out food donated by the World Food Program.

Most of the people in Ndim are not actually displaced, but the isolation the conflict has caused, as well as the general poverty of the area, has left them perpetually malnourished and hungry.

"Outside of a famine situation I have never seen people in such terrible shape," said Jean-Pierre Cebron, the top official for the World Food Program for the central African region. "In terms of weight, in terms of height, in terms of health, the population is really in rough condition."

Hundreds of families lined up at the mission to receive biweekly rations — a few scoops of fortified flour, lentils, salt and sugar. Some were so poor they did not even have bowls — they used ragged pieces of cloth to carry their food home.

In neighboring countries, aid organizations feed, clothe and shelter the impoverished, but here there are comparatively few people to help. Here in the northwest, Doctors Without Borders; Coopi, an Italian aid organization; the International Committee of the Red Cross and the World Food Program are trying to help the estimated 150,000 displaced, but they are overstretched and hampered in their work by security problems and government constraints.

Aid organizations in Paoua, a provincial town at the epicenter of the crisis in the northwest, were instructed by the military in November to suspend activities for security reasons, so more than 50 tons of food for displaced people sat in a warehouse, undistributed.

Just outside of Paoua, the remains of village after village lie in charred heaps. In one such village, behind the destroyed mud huts, deep in the forest, villagers were living beneath plastic tarps a mile away from their homes.

"They came last month to give us these shelters, but they don't come again," said Pauline Koibe, who had been living in the open, sleeping under trees, since January. "It is like they have forgotten us."

People here refer only elliptically to the perpetual crises that have enveloped their nation. Its troubles are referred to as "les événements," or the events. It is a passive phrase that carries the inevitability and randomness of a tornado or an earthquake — an unpredictable, destructive happening that has no author and for which no one really can be blamed.

The problems began even before independence, when the man who should have been the country's first president, Barthélémy Boganda, died in a mysterious plane crash in 1958. They continued with the rise of Jean-Bédel Bokassa, a ruthless military dictator whose excesses were rumored to include cannibalism. He declared himself emperor of this tiny country in 1976, crowning himself in a lavish ceremony that cost $20 million.

Democracy arrived in the 1990s, with the election of Ange-Félix Patassé, but his rule was marked by corruption and mismanagement that only deepened the despair. He was overthrown in 2002 by Gen. François Bozizé, who eventually was elected president in 2005 in an election that was judged free and fair by international observers.

The rebellion in the northeast is led by allies of Mr. Patassé, the former president, along with Chadian rebels, who seek to overthrow Chad's president, a close ally of Mr. Bozizé.

Like so many countries in Africa, the Central African Republic has the potential of vast wealth in its natural resources — diamonds, timber, hydroelectric power and commercial farming. But over the years its economy has shriveled. A decade ago there were more than 200 private companies working here, according to the World Bank. Today, only about 20 remain. In the past decade, disease and hunger have slashed life expectancy by 10 years, to about 40.

DOJ_NMG_0104948

"Since independence our country has never known stability," said Lea Koyassoum-Doumta, a top adviser to the government. "We have plenty of problems of our own. We don't need these problems from outside, in Sudan and Chad, making things worse for us. We need peace so we can finally have some development and progress."

Chadian Rebels Claim To Have Killed 100 Government Soldiers (AP)

AP, December 9, 2006

N'DJAMENA, Chad (AP) — Rebels fought back a Chadian army attack on Saturday outside an eastern Chad town, killing 100 soldiers and injuring an unknown number of others, a rebel spokesman said.

Soldiers attacked a rebel position just outside the eastern Chad town of Biltine at about 6:30 a.m. (0530GMT) and after three hours of fighting, rebels of the Union of Forces for Democracy and Development, known by the French acronym UFDD, repulsed them, said Ali Moussa Izzo, spokesman of the group.

He said that Gen. Mas-Oud Diresse led the government forces that consisted of three columns made up of 250 vehicles.

"Many of the combatants of (President Idriss) Deby have joined while others ran away," Izzo said in a statement posted on a Chadian opposition website.

This week, Biltine has become a major battleground with rebels seizing it and then being fought off by the army, only for the rebels to recapture it, according to Izzo's statement.

"Our mobile columns are in full control of the situation and putting in place checks around Biltine up to the airport where dead and injured soldiers are being collected," Izzo said.

It was not possible to independently confirm the rebels' claims and government officials were not immediately available for comment.

Chadian rebels aiming to topple Deby have clashed sporadically with government forces since 2005. The competition for power in the central African nation has become more intense since Chad began exporting oil in 2003.

There are also fears that Chad's conflict is being worsened by a spillover of the violence in Sudan's western region of Darfur.

Madagascar's President Wins Re-election (AP)

By Jonny Hogg, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 10, 2006

Madagascar's president has been re-elected in the Indian Ocean island country, officials said Saturday, as authorities raided a former president's home searching for the leader of a failed coup.

President Marc Ravalomanana, a charismatic dairy tycoon known as the "The Milkman," won 55 percent of the Dec. 3 vote to beat 13 challengers, election officials said. He needed to win at least 50 percent of the vote to avoid a run-off.

He has promised a five-year development plan to reduce poverty, the dominant issue in a country were 70 percent of the island's 17 million people live on less than $1 a day.

Earlier this week, representatives for Lahiniriko Jean, the former head of the National Assembly, who trailed with 11 percent of the vote, said they would not accept a first-round victory for Ravalomanana because of problems with voter registration and the electoral list.

Election observers said this year's ballot had gone well, but raised concerns about the country's system of requiring candidates to print their own ballots. The government, for the first time, took responsibility for the delivering ballots to polling stations.

Many hoped there would not be a repeat of the fighting that followed the December 2001 elections, when former President Didier Ratsiraka refused to accept defeat to Ravalomanana. Ratsiraka fled to France after months of rival governments in two capitals.

Meanwhile, police searched the property of former President Albert Zafy on Friday as part of an ongoing investigation into the whereabouts of Gen. Randrianafidisoa and opposition politician Pety Rakotoniaina.

Randrianafidisoa, who uses one name only and is known as Gen. Fidy, had called for a coup on Nov. 17, but the attempt failed to garner much support. The general has since been on the run, and authorities are offering $50,000 for information or assistance leading to his arrest.

Randrianafidisoa had been supported by Rakotoniaina, a staunch critic of the government who is wanted in connection with organized car theft and holding an illegal demonstration the day before the election.

Madagascar's L'Expresse newspaper reported that political documents had been seized from Zafy's home, and quoted the former leader as saying he had been informed the raid was in the interests of national security.

DOJ_NMG_0104949

"I reject the gesture," Zafy was quoted as saying. "I do not recognize Ravalomanana as president and have not since 2001."

Zafy defeated Ratsiraka to become president in 1993, then was impeached three years later amid accusations of corruption. He ran again in November 1996, losing this time to Ratsiraka.

The Next Horror In Somalia (LAT)

By Garrett Jones

The Los Angeles Times, December 10, 2006

TO MOST Americans, Somalia is the place where "Black Hawk Down" happened, or the place with the pictures of the starving African children, or, for some, the biblical land of Punt. (Scholars quibble about locating Punt.) Americans tend to confuse African countries with one another except when our soldiers are dying there, and the violence in Sudan, Uganda, Congo or Zimbabwe can seem indistinguishable. But the anarchy in Somalia, which straddles the strategic Horn of Africa, is in a class by itself.

For more than 16 years, Somalia has existed without the pretense of a central government, surviving largely on foreign aid and remittances from its overseas diaspora, the best and brightest young Somalis. With the fading of the seasonal rains in December, the Somalis are preparing once again to inflict their intra-clan squabbling on their neighbors. Meanwhile, the neighbors are preparing a proxy war, and they plan to fight one another to the last Somali.

Experts call Somalia a failed state. This is a sophism. Somalia was a failed state in 1990 under the last central government of the mildly insane Mohamed Siad Barre. Nowadays, one could call Somalia a space between countries. Or simply a feral nation. This is the place that perfected the practice of extorting cash from international aid organizations in return for allowing the aid groups the privilege of feeding other starving Somalis. (Gangsters R Us, with Third World panache.) When the United Nations tried to intervene and establish a central government in 1993 (an admittedly naive effort), the Somalis united just long enough to drive off the foreigners and resume their embrace of warlords and clans.

I was there in 1993, running covert operations in Mogadishu for the CIA when the U.N. effort was wrecked. President George H.W. Bush had sent the Marines into Somalia to feed the starving children, and President Clinton was attempting to install a Jeffersonian democracy in a medieval culture. The Clinton theory was that the U.N. would use its peacemaking powers to force the Somali factions into a political accord, and then peace would break out.

Unfortunately, nobody told the Somalis. They viewed the U.N. and the U.S. as foreign invaders bent on Christianizing their Muslim culture while destroying the power of the clans and warlords. This dispute spawned a series of attacks that cumulated in the Battle of Mogadishu between the U.S. Task Force Ranger and Somali clan fighters, as portrayed in the film "Black Hawk Down." After losing 17 elite troops to an African mob in a single night, Clinton lost all stomach for further "nation building" involving U.S. casualties, and the U.N. effort collapsed. After that, the world largely went back to ignoring the Somalis.

Now the Somalis are poised to insist that the international community tune back in while they commit an auto-da-fe on CNN. Somali Islamists, modeling themselves on the Taliban, have taken control of most of the country, driving the warlords out of the cities and into the bush. The internationally recognized Somali interim government (an effort by neighboring countries to get the clans and factions to agree to some sort of consensus government with which the world can interact) is surrounded in the provincial city of Baidoa, about 160 miles northwest of the capital. When the roads are dry enough to allow military operations, the Islamists will swiftly overwhelm the interim government unless outside help arrives at the last minute.

Already, a team of Al Qaeda-style suicide bombers have blasted Baidoa. The Islamists make no bones about their plans to install a fundamentalist government and to begin "rescuing" their brethren in neighboring countries (read all of East Africa) from the oppressive rule of the Christian Crusaders. Somalia's neighbors are bracing for a regional war, and the U.S. State Department says 10 countries are taking sides in some fashion. Ethiopia, which has a restive Muslim south and a history of being a target for Somali brigandage whenever the Somalis pause in their intra-clan feuding, is sending troops to back up the interim government and oppose the Islamists.

The Eritreans, led by an increasingly paranoid, sociopathic president, are the sworn blood enemies of the Ethiopians. Seeing a chance to weaken their bigger neighbor, they are flying in arms and instructors to the Islamists.

Across the Red Sea in Saudi Arabia, the Wahhabi fundamentalists see the Christian Ethiopians embarking on a "crusade" to crush Islam. In response, they are providing cash through Wahhabi charities to their Islamic comrades, frightening and infuriating Washington.

Kenya's kleptocratic government, overwhelmed by an influx of refugees, is wringing its hands while endless talks take place in Nairobi hotels between irrelevant Somali politicians and clueless U.N. diplomats in search of a peace plan. The Islamists want no part of the talks; they are winning.

When the big, ugly regional war breaks out, the Islamists, with the help of Eritrean advisors, are likely to hold their own. Now add in your odd Somali warlord, drug-crazed clan gunmen and the Somali history of atrocities and you have a real mess in the Horn of Africa. Fighting will probably spill into Kenya, and destitute refugees will surge across East Africa. Bottom line: It is likely by this time next year that the Horn of Africa will host its own little Taliban wannabe, more or less in control of Somalia and at war with its neighbors. Along the way, there will be a lot of dead people and suffering refugees.

Although this is far away, and may not happen to anyone you know personally, it is going to become a concern of the U.S. soon. An Islamic fundamentalist haven on the Horn of Africa is more than a tragedy for the long-suffering Africans; it is a threat to the oil routes that fuel the West and pass just offshore. Recent domestic terrorist attacks have already shaken the House of Saud's iron grip on its population; a sanctuary where its fundamentalist enemies can regroup only a few hours across the Red Sea would be a dagger at its heart.

A terrorist Somalia would be difficult to contain. Most African governments have little ability to find, let alone effectively police, their own borders. If the Islamic fundamentalists establish a haven in Somalia, they could infiltrate or threaten the many weak secular governments in surrounding countries.

It simply is not prudent to ignore what is going on in Somalia, but everyone agrees the last thing the U.S. wants now is to embark on another adventure in East Africa. The only practical option is to interest the Islamists in talking. Right now, they do not need to talk; they are getting everything they want on the battlefield. If they suffer a military setback, talk may look more appealing.

To improve the odds of such an Islamist setback, the U.S. should provide training and equipment to Somalia's neighbors. Frankly, the track record is poor; in the past, most military aid has been used to suppress domestic critics rather than fight foreign enemies. And it's certainly true that the one thing Africa does not need is more guns. But it looks like it's getting them anyway, according to a November U.N. report on weapons smuggling.

Washington should also lean hard on the government of Saudi Arabia to crack down on the Wahhabi charity money that fuels the Somali Islamist war machine. If the Saudis don't want those petrodollars coming back at them in a few years as RPGs fired by antiroyalist fundamentalists based in Somalia, it behooves them to overcome the reservations they have shown about squeezing fellow Wahhabists.

However, even our best efforts will not stop a long, bloody conflict. Get ready for more pictures of starving African babies. Film at 11, death and suffering around the clock.

Nobel Peace Prize Winner Will Urge Banks To Lend To The Poor (NYT)

By Walter Gibbs

The New York Times, December 10, 2006

OSLO, Dec. 9 — Bangladesh's "banker to the poor," Muhammad Yunus, said he would use his newfound celebrity as the recipient of this year's Nobel Peace Prize to urge bankers everywhere to make small business loans to the poorest people they can find.

"This is a movement that is going around the world," he said at a news conference here on Saturday, a day before the ceremony to award the prize to him and the bank he founded, Grameen Bank.

Mr. Yunus, 66, is credited with inventing microfinance, the practice of lending small amounts of money to destitute people, 30 years ago. The idea is for borrowers — almost all of them women — to start or expand money-making enterprises like weaving, rope-making, vegetable farming and holding livestock.

He said Bangladesh, with its population of 145 million, was en route to halving the number of people classified as extremely poor by 2015, thanks in part to the availability of microloans as small as $12 and averaging $200. "If Bangladesh can do it, anyone can do it," he said.

The prize is to be awarded in equal parts to Dr. Yunus and the Dhaka-based bank, 90 percent of which is owned cooperatively by the 6.7 million people who owe it money. The bank's half of the prize will be given to board member Mosammat Taslima Begum, who said Saturday that she first borrowed money from Grameen to buy a goat, then borrowed more to buy three goats. Now she owns land with an income-producing mango patch.

Mr. Yunus urged the United States to recalibrate its strategy for fighting terrorism and to address what he said were its "root causes" — poverty and injustice. "Poverty is a threat to peace," said Mr. Yunus, a native Bangladeshi with a Ph.D. in economics from Vanderbilt University in Tennessee. "This has been talked about before but never in such a resounding manner."

In the 30 years since he started lending money to the poor, more than 3,000 other institutions have emerged to provide similar loans. Grameen Bank requires no collateral of its borrowers, but charges most of them interest of about 30 percent per year.

The Muslim Stereotype (NYT)

By Nicholas D. Kristof

The New York Times, December 10, 2006

Whatever happens in Iraq, we may be inching closer to a "clash of civilizations" between Islam and the West.

There's a fatigue in the West with an Arab world that sometimes seems to put its creative juices mostly into building better bombs. Even open-minded people in the West sometimes feel a sense of resignation that maybe the bigots are right: maybe Islam just is intrinsically backward, misogynistic and violent.

After I wrote recently about reform elements in Islam, I received a long note from a 24-year-old Chicagoan, Paul Williams, who ventured what many people feel: "I went to school in Macalester College and the whole time there I wrote paper after paper defending Islam," he told me. Now, he says, after reading the Koran cover to cover and living in Turkey, he has lapsed into political incorrectness: "The more I'm here the more I'm beginning to think that there's just something wrong with Islam."

That's a common view, shaped partly by the way we in the news business focus on violence in the Islamic world. So let me step up and say that I find the common American stereotypes of Islam profoundly warped.

Those stereotypes are largely derived from the less than 20 percent of Muslims who are Arabs, with Persians and Pashtuns thrown in as well. But the great majority of the world's Muslims live not in the Middle East but here in Asia, where religion has mostly been milder.

At the moment I'm in Brunei, a Muslim country nestled in Southeast Asia. At the University of Brunei, women outnumber men. Women here drive, fill senior offices in government and the private sector, serve as ambassadors and are pilots for the national airline. "Young women have equal opportunities now — it's up to your capability," said Lisa Ibrahim, president of the Young Entrepreneurs Association of Brunei.

Brunei has gold-domed mosques in its skyline, and the sultan has two wives. But Brunei is also home to churches and Hindu temples serving a multiethnic society. Young people flirt together in the cafes, and non-Muslims are allowed to drink alcohol.

Anwar Ibrahim, the former Malaysian deputy prime minister, says he reminds Americans that the most populous Muslim country (Indonesia) is a democracy whose elections run more smoothly than Florida's.

Yes, Islamists are a threat in Asia, and many imams are more scandalized by female flesh than by honor killings or illiteracy. Indonesia has tried the editor of the local edition of Playboy magazine, and a state in Malaysia has threatened to fine women who wear miniskirts. But Indonesia has had a woman as president, while Bangladesh has had two female prime ministers and has more girls in high school than boys.

"We tend to be more tolerant," Yusof Halim, a prominent lawyer in Brunei, said of Asian Muslims. He then confided: "My honest opinion is that Arabs are male chauvinists."

Meanwhile, many Muslims are as disenchanted with us as we are with them. They complain about hypocritical Americans who parrot slogans about human rights but brutalize Muslims at Guantánamo and supply the weaponry that kills Muslim children in Gaza and Lebanon.

The Koran and Bible alike have passages that make 21st-century readers flinch; most Christians just ignore sections on slavery or admonitions to kill a disobedient child. Likewise, some Muslims are reinterpreting Koranic passages on polygamy and amputations, saying they were restricted to particular circumstances that no longer apply.

Frankly, I don't see that any religion's influence is intrinsically peaceful or violent. Christianity inspired both Mother Teresa and pogroms. Hinduism nurtured Gandhi and also the pioneers of suicide bombings.

These days, ferocious anti-Semitism thrives in some Muslim countries, but in the Dreyfus affair a century ago Muslims sided with a Jew persecuted by anti-Semitic Christians. And the biggest sectarian slaughter in Europe in modern times involved Christians massacring Muslims at Srebrenica.

The plain fact is that some Muslim societies do have a real problem with violence, with the subjugation of women, with tolerance. But the mosaic of Islam is vast and contains many more hopeful glimpses of the future.

There is a historic dichotomy between desert Islam — the austere fundamentalism of countries like Saudi Arabia — and riverine or coastal Islam, more outward-looking, flexible and tolerant. Desert Muslims grab the headlines, but my bet is that in the struggle for the soul of Islam, maritime Muslims have the edge.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Former Detainees Seek Right To Sue US. The New York Times (12/9, A9, Von Zielbauer, 1.16M) reports, "Lawyers for former detainees in Iraq and Afghanistan argued in federal court on Friday that Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld was personally responsible, and thus legally liable, for acts of torture inflicted on their clients by American military interrogators." The nine plaintiffs endured "beatings, mock executions and painful physical restraints, their lawyers said in court papers. All were eventually released without being charged with crimes." However, "the hearing concerned only questions of jurisdiction and did not delve into whether Mr. Rumsfeld, because he personally approved certain interrogation techniques in 2002 like the use of 'stress positions,' was legally responsible for specific acts of torture committed in overseas military prisons."

US Denies Liability In Torture Case. The Washington Post/AP (12/9, Smith) reports, "The Bush administration asserted in federal court [Friday] that Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and three former military officials cannot be held liable for the alleged torture of nine Afghans and Iraqis in U.S. military detention camps because the detainees have no standing to sue in U.S. courts. Deputy Assistant Attorney General C. Frederick Beckner III also argued that a decision by the court to let a trial proceed would amount to an infringement by the judiciary on the president's power to wage war and would open the door to new litigation in U.S. courts by foreign nationals who feel aggrieved by U.S. government policies."

Judge Weighs Torture Claim Against Rumsfeld. The AP (12/8, Apuzzo) reports about Judge Hogan, "A federal judge on Friday appeared reluctant to give Donald H. Rumsfeld immunity from torture allegations, yet said it would be unprecedented to let the departing defense secretary face a civil trial." The AP states, "Foreigners outside the United States are not normally afforded the same protections as U.S. citizens, and Hogan said he was wary about extending the Constitution across the globe." However, he also "questioned the scope of [government] immunity. He said freedom from torture is a basic right accepted by the United States and all civilized nations."

The Los Angeles Times (12/9, Schmitt, 850K) reports, "The suit is believed to be the first to try to hold U.S. officials accountable for the abuse at prisons." Judge Hogan "himself cited the case of Johnson vs. Eisentrager, decided by the Supreme Court in 1950, which held that enemy aliens being held by military authorities outside the U.S. had no rights under the U.S. Constitution to challenge their detention in civilian court."

Newsday (12/9, Brune) also reports the hearing, saying that the biggest "hurdle" for the plaintiffs is to show that the defendants "knowingly violated laws against torture."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Muslim Convert Allegedly Planned To Attack Illinois Mall. ABC World News (12/8, story 5, 0:10, Gibson) reported, "The FBI charged a young Illinois man, today, with plotting a terrorist-style attack. Allegedly, he planned to attack a shopping mall, with hand grenades exploding trash cans and shooting people as they fled." NBC Nightly News (12/8, story 4, 1:20, Pete Williams) reported, "His target was this shopping center in Rockford in northern Illinois. Today prosecutors charged Derrick Sharieef of planning on setting off hand grenades in garbage cans." Robert Grant, FBI: "He fixed on the date of December 22, on a Friday which he picked because it was the Friday before Christmas and thought that would be the highest concentration of shoppers that he could kill and injure." Pete Williams: "Investigators said he say he met with an undercover agent hoping to trade stereo speakers for grenades and guns. Late last week he twice visited the mall to plan the attack and made a martyrdom video. Offenses say he was not connected to any terror group but they are looking at whether he might have been talking with others in Illinois about other possible attacks, Brian."

The Washington Post (12/9, A20, Eggen) reports Shareef "was arrested Wednesday in Rockford, Ill…after meeting with an undercover federal agent in a store parking lot and trading a set of stereo speakers for four hand grenades, a handgun and bullets, according to an FBI affidavit." The Chicago Tribune (12/9, Bush, Coen) reports, "federal agents and an undercover informant followed him from the plot's outset, U.S. Atty. Patrick Fitzgerald said Friday. Authorities didn't specify how they originally learned of

Shareef. … Throughout the plot, he never had any weapons or the money to obtain them, Fitzgerald said."

The AP (12/8) reports, "Authorities said Shareef had been under investigation since September, when he told an acquaintance that 'he wanted to commit acts of violent jihad against targets in the United States as well as commit other crimes.' The acquaintance immediately informed the FBI, officials said."

CNN, MSNBC and Fox News all aired Grant's statement at the Friday press conference live, and all three stations reported the story of Shareef's arrest throughout the day on Saturday. Those reports also included clips of Grant describing Shareef's alleged plot, as well as Grant emphasizing that Shareef was acting alone and had no connections to any known terrorists.

The Chicago Tribune (12/9, Bush, Coen) reported that "federal agents and an undercover informant followed him from the plot's outset, U.S. Atty. Patrick Fitzgerald said Friday. Authorities didn't specify how they originally learned of Shareef. … Throughout the plot, Shareef was recorded spewing hatred for Jewish people and the American justice system, authorities allege." The Chicago Sun-Times (12/9, Korecki) noted, "Should he die before the attack, Shareef made a videotape statement to explain his actions. 'I am from America, and this tape is to let you guys know, who disbelieve in Allah, to let the enemies of Islam know, and to let the Muslims alike know that the time for jihad is now...be strong, oh Mujahideen...May Allah protect me on this mission we conduct...so do not cry, do not mourn for me,' he said, according to the FBI affidavit."

In a widely-distributed story, the AP (12/9) reported, "The FBI says it was tipped by an acquaintance of Derrick Shareef, then recorded the 22-year-old planning to use hand grenades to blow garbage cans into clouds of flying shrapnel in a crowded mall the Friday before Christmas. 'This is a warning to those who disbelieve,' he said, according to an FBI affidavit." The AP added that Grant said in his statement Friday, "He fixed on a day of December 22nd on Friday...because it was the Friday before Christmas and thought that would be the highest concentration of shoppers that he could kill and injure."

Local Officials Miffed At Lack Of Information. The Rockford (IL) Register-Star (12/9, Wiser) reports, "Everyone was glad — unnerved a little, maybe, but glad — that a man with an apparent jihad complex and a fixation on the Rockford area was discovered and in custody before he could do any damage." The Register-Star continues, "Local officials praised the Justice Department for stopping what federal prosecutors say was a 22-year-old's plan to use hand grenades to bomb CherryVale Mall or local government buildings. … But not everyone was happy with how the notoriously tight-lipped U.S. attorney's office in northern Illinois, led by Patrick Fitzgerald, let everyone else in on the news. … 'This morning I'm getting a call from a reporter and on the other line I have the chief of police saying he just had a briefing with the FBI,' Mayor Larry Morrissey said. … 'If we're all supposed to combat terrorism in cities like New York, Chicago and Rockford ... they need to share information with local law enforcement that this was going on.'" The Register-Star adds, "Morrissey said he was 'extremely disappointed' that local law enforcement was kept out of the loop even though the feds were monitoring Derrick Shareef for months. He added that he is going to try and get some answers from Fitzgerald's office on how things could work differently in the future. … Police Chief Chet Epperson said he got a call Wednesday that the FBI was involved in something in the Rockford area, but he said he didn't know any of the specifics until Friday, just as the news was breaking across the country."

DHS Accused Of Violating Congressional Ban On Traveler Risk Analysis. The Washington Post (12/9, A2, Hsu, Nakashima) reports the Department of Homeland Security "violated a congressional funding ban when it continued to develop a computerized program that creates risk assessments of travelers entering and leaving the United States, according to lawmakers and privacy advocates. Although congressional testimony shows that department officials apparently disclosed some important elements of the controversial Automated Targeting System program to lawmakers in recent months, several key members of Congress said that they were in the dark about the program and that it violated their intentions. … Privacy advocates and members of Congress expressed growing skepticism this week about the legality, scope and effectiveness of the massive data-mining program -- particularly the creation of risk assessments on Americans that would be retained for up to 40 years -- whose existence was first disclosed in detail in a Nov. 2 notice in the Federal Register."

Planned Demolition Of New Orleans Public Housing Complexes Sparks Outrage. NBC Nightly News (12/8, story 8, 2:00, Williams) reported, "Now we turn to New Orleans where thousands of people who live in public housing there are facing the prospect of being forced from their homes again. The city's housing authority is planning to demolish that city's four largest public housing complexes, saying Hurricane Katrina made them so damaged and unsafe they're not worth repairing." NBC (Savidge): "New Orleans' four largest public housing complex were built over half a century ago and have never been renovated. Unless you count Hurricane Katrina. Officials say it will cost $130 million to repair them. Instead the government wants to spend $681 million to replace them. With something like this. River Gardens. A mixed income housing development built in the city a few years ago. So why is that triggering this? At recent hearings the issue has sparked outrage. … Many low-income residents see the move as an obvious attempt to limit the number of poor African Americans who can return to the city."

Judge Again Orders FEMA To Restart Katrina Payments. The AP (12/8) reports, "For the second time in eight days, a judge ordered the Bush administration to immediately resume making housing payments to thousands of families whose homes were damaged by Hurricane Katrina." The AP continues, "U.S. District Judge Richard J. Leon said last week that the confusing, often contradictory letters to hurricane victims from the Federal Emergency Management Agency didn't explain why rental payments were cut off. He said that violated the Constitution and he ordered the agency to restart the program immediately." The AP adds, "FEMA appealed that ruling and asked Leon not to force the agency to restart the program while that case plays out. Leon refused Friday to do so. .. .He ordered FEMA to come to court Wednesday to discuss how many evacuees are due housing payments and how the funding will be restored."

Chertoff Says "FEMA Has To Be In DHS." DHS Secretary Michael Chertoff said during a CNN (12/8, Phillips) interview that "FEMA has to be in DHS, because we have to be able to integrate the full spectrum of prevention, protection and response so that we can provide seamless activity in an emergency. What I suggested, which is what the White House raised, is the possibility that when you move from emergency to long-term recovery, years of social services, whether those particular functions ought to perhaps be in hands of a department like HUD or HHS where they basically do social services work. So that wouldn't be removing FEMA, it would be focusing FEMA on its core mission, which is emergency, rather than the long-term recovery issue."

WAR NEWS:

Bush Weighs Options For Iraq After Meeting With Congressional Leaders. Coverage of President Bush's meeting with congressional leaders Friday focuses on the Iraq Study Group report, the options the White House is weighing, and the pressure being put on the President by Democrats and others to make a decisive shift in Iraq policy in line with the ISG recommendations. None of the three broadcast networks led with the story; CBS and NBC opted to open with the Mark Foley scandal, while ABC led with the E. coli outbreak.

NBC Nightly News (12/8, story 5, 2:45, Williams, 9.87M) reported that "the topic, no surprise," of the meeting "was Iraq, and it will dominate the President's schedule again next week as it did this one. The White House now says the President will address the nation on his new plans for Iraq sometime before Christmas. They say most likely the week of December 18."

ABC World News (12/8, story 3, 3:00, Gibson, 8.78M) reported that Bush "met today with congressional leaders, as part of his deliberations about what to do now in Iraq." He "has received the Baker-Hamilton Report; still to come are recommendations from the nation's top military commanders." ABC (Karl) added, "The Pentagon has not completed its review of Iraq strategy yet. But sources familiar with the review tell ABC News that the military is likely to recommend that the President change the primary mission of US forces in Iraq from combating insurgents to training and supporting Iraqi troops. The plan for the US forces seems to mirror the one suggested by the Iraqi Study Group. But there's a big difference. Under the Iraqi Study Group plan, combat troops now in Iraq would start coming home. Under the Pentagon plan, those combat troops would remain in Iraq but with a new mission. Entire companies of US combat forces, units of about 150 troops, would be embedded in Iraqi army and police battalions."

DOJ_NMG_0104958

The Administration's focus on options coming from the various reports gets front-page coverage from the Washington Post (12/9, Wright, Baker, 690K). The Post says the White House "is groping for a viable new strategy for the president to unveil by Christmas, with deliberations now focused on three main options to redefine the U.S. military and political engagement, according to officials familiar with the debate. The major alternatives include a short-term surge of 15,000 to 30,000 additional U.S. troops to secure Baghdad and accelerate the training of Iraqi forces. Another strategy would redirect the U.S. military away from the internal strife to focus mainly on hunting terrorists affiliated with al-Qaeda. And the third would concentrate political attention on supporting the majority Shiites and abandon U.S. efforts to reach out to Sunni insurgents."

The New York Times (12/9, A9, Rutenberg, Hulse, 1.16M) also reports that President Bush is pursuing "a flurry of conspicuous consultation" next week, but puts the story inside the A section, not on the front page. The White House "continued to face questions about how it planned to address 79 recommendations for Iraq proposed by the Iraq Study Group, whose bipartisan report included a grim analysis of the president's approach to the war."

The Los Angeles Times (12/9, McManus, Barnes, 850K) says the President "said Friday that he's willing to change U.S. 'tactics' in Iraq once he hears recommendations from his military and diplomatic advisors, but he doesn't intend to scale back his basic goals." Both the Los Angeles Times and the New York Times quote incoming Senate Majority Whip Richard Durbin as being "disappointed" that Bush was contemplating "changing some tactics."

AFP (12/8, Collinson) also says "pressure is building on Bush," and the President "will likely "announce the strategy before Christmas."

ISG Report Urges US To Engage Unfriendly Shiite Clerics. The AP (12/8, Hendawi) reports in a skeptical article, "The Iraq Study Group is urging Washington to push for direct contacts with two key Shiite clerics who have made clear they want nothing to do with the United States. Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani and Muqtada al-Sadr, who have vast influence among Iraq's majority Shiites, would lose credibility if they talk to the Americans." The report's recommendation of US discussion with the clerics "appeared to pay little heed to the fine line the clerics must tread to avoid falling victim to the political treachery of today's Iraq, where something as inconsequential as a casual greeting to a U.S. soldier can sometimes mean death at the hands of insurgents."

Kurds Call ISG Report "Unrealistic." BBC.com (12/9) reports, "The leader of Iraq's Kurdish region says the US Iraq Study Group report is 'unrealistic and inappropriate'. Massoud Barzani expressed skepticism about "plans to involve Iraq's neighbours in peace efforts, and for any weakening down of the Kurds' effective autonomy." Jalal Talabani, "Iraq's Kurdish president," then "said he agreed with Mr Barzani."

Brownback Praises Work Of ISG. Sen. Sam Brownback said on MSNBC's Hardball (12/8, Barnicle), "I think the Baker-Hamilton commission gives us a starting point to put together a bipartisan approach that hopefully both political parties in this country -- and that can gather global support, particularly important regional support. … I also think you're going to have to look somewhere down the road to get to a political equilibrium in Iraq. You're going to have to have dominant probably Shiite, Sunni, and Kurdish areas. … It's not cut and run. It's not stay the course. It is that before we face the electorate again in 2008 there is a substantially different situation and it's conveyed to the Iraqis, look, we're not in this forever."

FT Calls Baker "Candid Friend" Of Bush Family. The Financial Times (12/8, Luce) reports in a positively nuanced article on James Baker, "Mr Baker was the obvious choice to advise George W. Bush on ways out of the Iraqi morass. Among Democrats, Mr Baker's reputation as a skilled diplomat in an era where diplomacy has been sidelined gave him credibility." The "core message" of the report "was uncomplimentary to [Bush's] most cherished principles, even if it was rendered with bipartisan civility." The Financial Times says that Bush's "complex motivations for invading Iraq reportedly comprised a burning desire to complete his father's – and Mr Baker's – unfinished business from the first Gulf war in 1991. It was also driven by the goal of democratising the broader region." Baker's report has been criticized, but "praise for Mr Baker's report still outweighs criticism."

Dowd Imagines Bush Family "Intervention." In her New York Times (12/9, A19, 1.16M) column, Maureen Dowd imagines an argument among George H. W. Bush, President Bush, James Baker, and others: "Junior is trying to wriggle away completely, offering a decidedly cool response to the attempt to yank him into the reality-based community. He is loath to give up his gunslinger pose to go all diplo. He cleaves to the neocon complaint that it is the realists who are now being unrealistic.

Noonan Sees Anguish Over War In Tears Of Elder Bush. In her column for the Wall Street Journal (12/9, 2.04M), Peggy Noonan writes of former President Bush's tears during a speech honoring Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, "Think of what a loaded moment in history it was for Bush the elder. ... To know his son George had (with the best of intentions!) been wrong in the great decision of his presidency -- stop at Afghanistan or move on to Iraq? -- and was now suffering a defeat made clear by the report; to love that son, and love your country, to hold these thoughts, to have them collide and come together -- this would bring not only tears, but more than tears."

Iraqis, US Differ On Identity Of Those Killed In Raids. The New York Times (12/9, A8, Tavernise, 1.16M) gives equal weight in its lead to the US and Iraqi version of casualties, saying, "The only thing that was clear from the accounts of Friday's airstrike by American forces north of Baghdad was that at least 20 Iraqis had been killed. But typical of the fog of war here, American and Iraqi officials disagreed on just about every other point." The US identified the dead as "all ... Al Qaeda," while Iraqi officials "said that the deceased were two extended families that included as many as 10 children." Instead of the US total of 20, the Iraqis gave numbers ranging from 22 to 32. The Times adds, "As the situation in Iraq deteriorates, counting deaths and the numbers of attacks here has become a difficult — and politically charged — business."

The Washington Post (12/9, Trejos, 690K) puts the US military's account in the lead sentence, saying, "U.S.-led coalition forces killed 20 suspected insurgents during a raid targeting al-Qaeda in Iraq fighters northwest of Baghdad on Friday morning, the U.S. military said. Two women were among the suspects killed, the military said. ... Amir Alwan, mayor of Ishaqi, disputed the military's account, saying that 10 men, 4 women and 10 children in his village were killed. News agencies published what they said were photos of dead children at the site. The military denied that civilians and children were killed." The Post adds, "This is not the first time residents of Ishaqi have accused American troops of misconduct. This spring, a U.S. military investigation cleared U.S. soldiers of killing 11 civilians before calling for an airstrike in a March 15 raid on a suspected insurgent hideout."

The AP (12/8, Gamel) places the US and Iraqi version in successive sentences, saying, "U.S.-led coalition forces killed 20 insurgents, including two women, Friday in fighting and airstrikes that targeted al-Qaeda in Iraq militants northwest of Baghdad, the military said. The mayor of the village, which was the site of a U.S. raid earlier this year, said 19 civilians were killed, including seven women and eight children." The AP adds, like the Washington Post, that "a U.S. military investigation cleared American soldiers of misconduct in a March 15 raid" in the same village.

Troops In Iraq Caught Between Sects. ABC World News (12/8, story 4, 2:45, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "The debate in Washington about future strategy for Iraq has overshadowed for the President, the operations going on day-to-day in Iraq. For US troops in the country, the mission doesn't change, for now." ABC (Harris): "The 11-hour sweep started at 3:00 a.m. With targeted raids on the homes of suspected insurgents. These soldiers have no idea what they're going to find on the other side of the door. ... This man, crying, told me the Shiite Mahdi militia had killed his wife and son just days earlier. ... They say Iraq is grave and deteriorating. Does that jibe with what you're seeing?" Michael Robinson, Sgt 1st Class, US Army: "It is bad. But personally, I don't believe now it's not unrecoverable. I still see people with lights in their eyes, the hope."

Zarqawi Allegedly Believed Shiites Were More Dangerous Than US Forces. The AP (12/8, Sinan) reports, "The slain terror leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi purportedly believed that Iraq's Shiite Muslims were more dangerous than U.S. forces and more evil than dictator Saddam Hussein, according to a posthumous interview published Friday on the Internet." The 33-page statement "could not be immediately authenticated. It was posted on a Web site known to be a clearing-house for al-Qaida material." The site "did not explain why the terror group had decided to release it six months after his death." Zarqawi "is quoted as saying the leader of Iraq's Shiites, Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, is a 'satan' who publicly tells Shiites to stay above the violence but secretly tells them to attack."

Sunni Clerics' Group Will Boycott Reconciliation Talks. AFP (12/9) reports, "Iraq's leading Sunni clerics' organization will boycott a national reconciliation conference called by Shiite Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki to end sectarian bloodletting, it has said. The Muslim Scholars' Association said it had not received an invitation to the meeting, which is to be held on December 16," but a spokesman added, "We have seen in the past more than once that the government signs some agreements and later goes back on it." AFP adds, "The head of the association, Sheikh Hareth al-Dhari, is currently outside Iraq. The government has opened a criminal investigation against him for allegedly inciting sectarian violence against Iraq's Shiite majority."

Coalition Forces Arrest Al Sadr Aide. AFP (12/9) reports, "US and Iraqi forces arrested Shiite radical leader Moqtada al-Sadr's representative in the central city of Kut and seven of his guards, a security official and a Sadr spokesman has said." The arrestee was "Sheikh Yahya Ahmed al-Khafaji, the head of Sadr's movement in Kut, 175 kilometres (110 miles) southeast of Baghdad." AFP reports that the US "has often targeted supporters of Sadr, whose Mahdi Army militia is accused of killing Sunni Arab civilians amid the sectarian bloodshed gripping Iraq."

Smith Turns Against Bush Policy On Iraq. CNN's The Situation Room (12/8, Blitzer) reported, "President Bush has been getting attacked by Iraq critics on numerous fronts, from anti-war Democrats to the bipartisan Study Group that issued its stinging report this week. And now a Republican senator has done an about-face and has unleashed a powerful rebuke of Mr. Bush's Iraq policy." CNN (Crowley) added, "Since the beginning of the Iraq War up to now, President Bush has been able to rely on a fairly big base of Republican lawmakers to support him. He no longer can. The Republican senator from Oregon described himself as a quiet supporter of the Iraq War. He is neither any longer." Sen. Gordon Smith: "I, for one, am at the end of my rope when it comes to supporting a policy that has our soldiers patrolling the same streets in the same way, being blown up by the same bombs, day after day. That is absurd. It may even be criminal." Crowley: "Et tu, Gordon Smith. It happened quietly, in the early evening, just before the year end recess. Smith, who has a reputation for bringing passion to the Senate floor, brought that in an unblinking brutal assessment about the situation on the ground, prewar intelligence and the President. … It is the first defection from what has been a reliable roster of Republicans supporting the Iraq War. … Aides say that a dozen of the Senate's Republican colleagues have approached him with positive responses, including, they say, one extremely conservative senator who told Smith: 'That's how I feel.'"

The Washington Post (12/9, A12, Ricks) reports that Smith, "who has shown some maverick tendencies in the past, such as when he blocked the 2005 budget resolution until his GOP colleagues agreed to add billions of dollars to Medicaid, said that he had 'tried to be a good soldier. … I have tried to support our president.' He said that Bush 'is not guilty of perfidy, but I do believe he is guilty of believing bad intelligence and giving us the same.' He said he would not have voted in favor of invading Iraq had he known what he knows now."

Durbin Says Smith Speech "Came From The Heart." Sen. Richard Durbin said on CNN's The Situation Room (12/8, Blitzer) that Smith "is widely respected. He's a thoughtful man. He's an independent thinker. I know that what he read on the Senate floor is something he personally wrote. I actually went up to him ahead of time, I didn't know the topic of the speech, and I saw that he'd written it out in his own hand. It came from the heart. And when he says that he believes this must come to an end, I know it's heartfelt. And when he says that it's gone beyond limit of making a bad policy decision, I think he's right."

Car Bomb Kills Five In Karbala. AFP (12/9) reports, "A powerful car bomb has killed at least five people and wounded dozens more close to one of Iraq's holiest Shiite shrines in the central city of Karbala. .... The attack will probably be blamed on Sunni extremists and came hot on the heels of a call by Shiite Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki for a reconciliation conference to stem raging sectarian violence." In addition to a Sunni group's planned boycott of the December 16 reconciliation conference, "Shiite leaders have also warned that they will not attend if figures linked to the Baath party of ousted president Saddam Hussein -- some of whom have roles in the insurgency -- are invited."

UK, Danish Troops Stage Largest Raid In Basra "Since War Began." The Los Angeles Times (12/9, Fiske, 850K) reports, "About 1,000 British and Danish troops staged a major raid Friday in Basra, Iraq's second-largest city, detaining five tribal leaders with ties to Shiite militias, British officials said." The raid "was the largest in Basra since the 2003 U.S.-led invasion that toppled Saddam Hussein's government," according to a UK spokesman. It was "was part of an effort by the British ... to suppress fighting among Shiite groups and tribes in the area." The Times states, "British troops in the region, who number about 7,300, usually conduct raids in smaller, more nimble groups of about 250 ... This time, the 1,000 soldiers split up into groups to seize the five men simultaneously at their homes, preventing them from alerting one another and going into hiding for weeks."

Engaging Damascus Could Aid US In Iraq, But Hurt Ties To Israel. Continuing reporting on the Iraq Study Group's recommendations, the Wall Street Journal (12/9, A4, Dreazen, King, 2.04M) says that "Iraq's civil war is sparking calls for the U.S. to reach out to Syria, raising the possibility of a U.S. policy shift that could put Washington on a collision course with Israel." The Baker-Hamilton Commission said "it is critical for the U.S. to find a way of persuading Syria to abandon its close ties with Iran and drop its support for Hezbollah and other militants," suggesting Washington should "offer Damascus a series of economic and political incentives, including America's help in pressuring Israel to relinquish the disputed Golan Heights. The approach would be a high-stakes turnaround for the Bush administration that would be certain to anger Washington's closest ally in the Middle East," however, some experts "argue that there may be no other choice. They say a decision by Syria to use its influence over Iraq's Sunni population to help calm the situation there -- paired with Syrian moves to end support to Islamic-militant groups like Hamas -- could significantly improve conditions in Iraq and across the region."

An AP (12/9, Gearan) piece reports Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "voiced skepticism on Friday over [the] recommendation that the United States seek Iran and Syria's help to stabilize Iraq, saying they should want to take such steps on their own." She is quoted saying, "Let's remember that the issue here is behavior. Can you change the behavior of these states?" The AP continues, "Of the Baker-Hamilton report, Rice said it was 'a very good report by people that I admire. I think they have done a great service in pointing out, through analysis and recommendations, how they see the situation in Iraq.'"

Iraq Watchdog Agency Survives. The New York Times (12/9, A10, Glanz, 1.16M) reports, "After weeks of legislative maneuvering, the House passed a bill on Friday extending the life of a federal oversight agency that will now have the authority to examine $32 billion in American taxpayer expenditures on reconstruction in Iraq through approximately 2008." A White House spokeswoman "said President Bush intended to sign the bill." The Times reports, "In a provision backed by Representative Duncan Hunter, Republican of California, the office would have been forced to begin shutting down soon and handing its duties over to offices at the Pentagon and the State Department. Opponents of that move doubted that Bush administration agencies would be sufficiently motivated to investigate themselves, a contention that Pentagon and State officials dismissed. But after the bipartisan Iraq Study Group recommended Wednesday that the special inspector general be maintained for as long as American financial assistance was flowing to Iraq, there was swift action on the new House and Senate bills."

Iraqi Violence Targets Schools. CBS Evening News (12/8, story 3, 2:45, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "In Iraq today, coalition forces staged a deadly raid northwest of Baghdad. They traded gunfire with alleged Al Qaeda members in a residential neighborhood then called in airstrikes. More than 20 people were killed. But these days, much of the violence involves Iraqis killing other Iraqis. And ... terrorists have new targets: schools." CBS (Palmer): "These are just some of the death threat notices distributed by Sunni insurgents to school and universities across Baghdad. They warn that students and professors will be assassinated. But they go further. They say that taxi drivers and bus drivers who even carry student passengers will be killed, too. The threats have dramatically cut down on class sizes at Baghdad University. But they haven't scared all the students. 'Most of our professors still show up' says this woman. 'So I'm determined to finish my year.'"

Iraqis Near Deal On Oil Revenue Split. The New York Times (12/9, A1, Wong, 1.16M) reports, "Iraqi officials are near agreement on a national oil law that would give the central government the power to distribute current and future oil revenues to the provinces or regions, based on their population, Iraqi and American officials say." The measure "could help resolve a highly divisive issue that has consistently blocked efforts to reconcile the country's feuding ethnic and sectarian factions. Sunni Arabs, who lead the insurgency, have opposed the idea of regional autonomy for fear that they would be deprived of a fair share of the country's oil wealth, which is concentrated in the Shiite south and Kurdish north." However, "Officials cautioned that this was only a draft agreement, and that it could still be undermined by the ethnic and sectarian squabbling that has jeopardized other political talks," saying that the key obstacle was "the issuing of contracts for developing future oil fields."

Prosecutors Of Oil For Food Violators Are Called "Lazy." The Financial Times (12/9, Williamson, Jones) reports, "State prosecutors are dragging their feet investigating corruption in the Iraq oil-for-food programme, according to one of the authors of last year's United Nations report on one of the world's largest bribery scandals." Mark Pieth "told the Financial Times that prosecutors in many countries were too career-minded, too unwilling to enter new legal terrain "and sometimes simply lazy'." The FT adds, "Prosecutors in various countries have complained of the unclear legal basis for prosecuting the 2,200 companies named as law-breakers in the Volcker report. But Mr Pieth said the investigations were 'straightforward legal work'."

Iraqis Line Up To Execute Saddam. The New York Times (12/9, Semple, 1.16M) reports in a front page article, "The death sentence against Mr. Hussein is still under review by an appeals court, but hundreds of people have already started lobbying the prime minister's office for the position" of Saddam's executioner. They "have sent messages through cabinet officials and their assistants, and by way of government guards and clerical workers."

Medic Killed In Iraq Profiled. ABC World News (12/8, story 9, 3:30, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Finally tonight, our 'Person of the Week,' a US medic in Iraq, doing what medics do. Only in this case, he turned his military mission into a humanitarian one, using his skills to save a young girl who had no other hope." Maureen Walsh, Chris Walsh's mother: "He was always looking for life's journey, his life work, and he said, "I think I found what I want to do." he said, "when I come home, I'm going to turn around and go right back." Gibson: "Navy Corpsman Chris Walsh was a medic assigned to a Marine weapons company. ... The baby, just 2 months old, called Mariam, had been born with a rare intestinal abnormality, vital organs exposed outside of her tiny body. ... Walsh asked the platoon to make Mariam's cause their mission -- to find her medical help in the United States. ... Then on September 4th, on another routine patrol of Fallujah, another hidden bomb exploded. Chris Walsh and two of the Marines with him were killed instantly. ... Doctors at Mass General in Boston volunteered their services. And Mariam's surgery was a success. Chris' mother knew she had to be there, for Chris."

Afghan War Nears "Tipping Point." The Los Angeles Times (12/9, King, Holley, 850K) reports in a pessimistic article, "The conflict in Afghanistan has entered a dangerous phase, and the next three to six months could prove crucial in determining whether the United States and its NATO partners can suppress a revitalized enemy — or will be dragged into another drawn-out and costly fight with an Islamic insurgency, according to senior military and security officials and diplomats." An anonymous diplomat said that a "tipping point" was approaching. The Times says bleakly, "Popular support for the central government is faltering, and Western military allies are deeply divided over how best to combat the insurgency. On the other side of the fight, the Taliban has regained the strength to dominate large swaths of Afghanistan; government control is tenuous at best in at least 20% of the country, according to several Western diplomats and Afghan officials."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Senate Approves Criminal Penalties For "Pretexting." The New York Times (12/9, Stone, Richtel) reported, "The Senate passed legislation last night that would make it a federal crime to obtain a person's telephone records without permission, an act known as pretexting. The measure, which was approved by unanimous consent last night and is similar to a bill passed earlier in the House, imposes a fine of up to $250,000 and imprisonment of up to 10 years for duping telephone companies into divulging the calling records of private individuals. The penalties can go up under special circumstances, like cases involving domestic abuse." It "includes penalties and a prison sentence of up to 10 years for individuals who sell or buy phone records knowing the lists were obtained through deceptive means. Passage, which came just days before the conclusion of the Republican-led Congress, is a victory for privacy advocates and regular phone users concerned about the confidentiality of their records."

HP Agreed To Fund Future Pretexting Investigations In Settlement. In his "Morning Brief" on the Web site of the Wall Street Journal (12/8) Joseph Schuman wrote, "Hewlett-Packard may have admitted no wrongdoing, but the technology giant's settlement with the state of

California is all about recognizing the unscrupulous nature of pretexting. To settle the state's civil suit over its use of investigators to improperly obtain the phone records of board members, some employees and journalists, H-P agreed to pay $14.5 million -- and $13.5 million of that goes to fund state and local investigations of similar fraudulent practices, as the San Jose Mercury News reports

Investors "Shrugged Off" HP Spying Scandal. The AP (12/8, Robertson) reported, "Investors have largely shrugged off Hewlett-Packard Co.'s boardroom spying scandal, dismissing the brouhaha surrounding the company as immaterial to its day-to-day operations and stellar earnings growth in recent months. That was true again on Thursday, when HP's stock price remained largely unmoved after the company and the state Attorney General Bill Lockyer announced that HP would pay $14.5 million to settle a civil claim centered on the dicey tactics used in the investigation. … Analysts said the penalty was relatively minor and would go a long way toward assuaging fears among skittish investors."

Microsoft, HP, Other Companies To Press For Data-Privacy Laws. The AP (12/8) reported, "Microsoft Corp. (MSFT), Hewlett-Packard Co. (HPQ) and other high-tech companies are preparing to push for data-privacy legislation next year to replace what they consider an outdated patchwork of state and federal laws that are inconsistent and burdensome. … Several recent high-profile breaches of consumers' personal information have made consideration of privacy proposals more likely, [Microsoft lawyer Ira] Rubinstein said. The Social Security numbers and medical data of approximately 930,000 people were compromised this June, for example, when computer equipment belonging to insurance provider American International Group Inc. was stolen."

Plaintiffs Dealt Setbacks In Two Securities Cases. The Wall Street Journal (12/9, B3, Hudson) reports, "The plaintiffs' securities bar was dealt several blows in the past few days. … Tuesday, plaintiff's attorneys were thwarted in their efforts to win class-action status in a suit alleging fraud among investment banks in underwriting new stock offerings. … Then on Thursday the Supreme Court agreed to consider overturning a plaintiff-friendly ruling out of the New York appeals court that Wall Street underwriters could be subject to private antitrust lawsuits." The Journal continues, "The court cases are related: Both involve allegations of bad behavior in IPOs during the dot-com bubble. The Tuesday case accuses 55 Wall Street firms of requiring investors who got shares of hot IPOs to buy more shares once trading began. The practice allegedly inflated stock prices of more than 300 companies, mainly tech outfits." The Journal adds, "The Thursday antitrust case takes issue with some of the same public offerings and alleges investment banks and institutional investors conspired to inflate stock prices in secondary-market trading. … Neither of these decisions was good news for Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman LLP. Melvyn Weiss leads the six-firm plaintiffs executive committee in the IPO securities litigation and serves as vice-chair of the executive committee in the IPO antitrust litigation. Early in the week, Mr. Weiss said he would appeal the ruling in the securities case. As for the antitrust issue, he voiced disappointment that the Supreme Court decided to review it."

SEC's Sarbanes-Oxley Amendment To Refocus Section 404 On "Big Issues." The Wall Street Journal (12/9, Scannell) reported on two upcoming changes that the Securities and Exchange Commission is expected to unveil Wednesday. One of the proposals "will tweak the rules that firms must follow to obey a provision in Sarbanes-Oxley, the 2002 law passed in response to corporate-accounting scandals. SEC Chairman Christopher Cox, a former Republican congressman from California, has fought attempts by lawmakers to alter the law itself. But he has promised ;significant changes' to Section 404, which sets standards for internal corporate controls, with the goal of reducing compliance costs while enhancing the benefit of review. … Mr. Cox says the commission's guidance and a new accounting standard (due Dec. 19 from the Public Company Accounting Oversight Board, the accounting industry's overseer) will make 404 more focused on big issues than tiny ones."

Specter Bill Would Ban DOJ Waivers Of Attorney-Client Privilege. The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (12/9, Sherman) reports, "U.S. Sen. Arlen Specter yesterday introduced legislation that would prohibit the Justice Department from pressuring companies and their employees to waive their attorney-client privileges during government investigations." The Post-Gazette continues, "His bill has support from a wide range of groups, including the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, the American Civil Liberties Union, and the American Bar Association. They fear that the federal government has become too aggressive in its prosecutions of corporate wrongdoing following scandals at Enron and WorldCom." The Post-Gazette adds, "In 2003, then-Deputy Attorney General Larry Thompson issued a memorandum that gave federal prosecutors the option of taking a softer approach with companies that reveal information on internal discussions between attorneys and executives. But the memo prompted outcries among companies and legal groups who feared a dilution of a basic constitutional right. … 'It's a very, very chilling effect,' Mr. Specter said yesterday. 'If you can't talk freely to your lawyer, you're in deep trouble.'" The Post-Gazette notes, "He was joined by Dick Thornburgh, a former U.S. attorney general and Pennsylvania governor, who was representing the American Bar Association. … 'The attorney-client privilege is one of the oldest privileges in the law. It dates back to Elizabethan times,' he said. He argued that the Justice Department's policy may unintentionally weaken federal prosecutions of corporate crime by dissuading employees from seeking confidential legal advice. … Brian Roehrkasse, a spokesman for the Justice Department, said the department's strategies had netted more than 1,100 corporate fraud convictions in the last four years. He emphasized that federal prosecutors take the preservation of the attorney-client privilege seriously. … 'We have met with a number of individuals and organizations who have raised concerns or suggestions about our current guidance for investigating corporate fraud,' he said in an e-mail message. 'We are also reviewing the newly introduced legislation. Currently, we have not made any final decisions to amend our guidance.'"

SEC To Offer Initiatives Designed To Increase US Competitiveness. The Wall Street Journal (12/9, A2, Scannell) says that "amid cries from Wall Street, the Treasury and business executives that onerous regulations are blunting the U.S.'s competitive edge," the SEC "is poised to unveil Wednesday two initiatives aimed at easing those fears. The moves aren't likely to be the last." One change "will tweak the rules that firms must follow to obey a provision in Sarbanes-Oxley," Section 404, which "sets standards for internal corporate controls, with the goal of reducing compliance costs while enhancing the benefit of review." A second change "will make it easier for foreign companies whose stocks and bonds trade here to 'deregister' from U.S. reporting requirements."

SEC Has Investigated Possible Leak To Lobbyists On Frist Speech. The Washington Post (12/9, D1, Birnbaum, Johnson) reports the SEC "has looked into whether lobbyists provided hedge funds with potentially market-moving information about a pending congressional speech." Earlier this year, the SEC questioned the office of Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist "about a possible insider leak to lobbyists about a speech Frist was to give on asbestos legislation." The SEC also "looked informally into whether hedge funds, in turn, bought shares in companies that would be affected if Congress approved the bill, which would have settled asbestos civil suits. But the SEC officials said that no charges were imminent and that it was unclear whether providing congressional information could be considered improper or illegal under insider trading laws."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Police Chief's Letter To Jeffs Leads To Misconduct Allegation. The AP (12/9) reports, "The chief law enforcer in two Utah-Arizona border towns is accused of misconduct for pledging allegiance to the leader of a polygamous sect who was on the FBI's most wanted list. … 'I love you and ... know that you have the right to rule in all aspects of my life,' Fred Barlow wrote in an October 2005 letter to Warren Jeffs. 'Without priesthood I am nothing.'" The AP continues, "Barlow warmly addressed Jeffs as 'Uncle Warren' and closed the letter by referring to himself as Jeffs' 'servant.' … Barlow is the police chief of a joint department serving Colorado City, Arizona, and Hildale, Utah. Jeffs is the leader of the Fundamentalist Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, which has 10,000 followers in those two towns." The AP adds, "The FLDS church practices polygamy and congregants revere Jeffs as a prophet and are taught to be obedient, including marrying at his behest. .. .Jeffs was arrested near Las Vegas on August 28. A judge will decide next Thursday whether he will stand trial in Utah on charges of rape as an accomplice for forcing a teenage girl to marry an older cousin. He also faces similar charges in Arizona. … The Arizona Peace Officer Standards and Training Board is using the letter as evidence in one of three misconduct charges against Barlow, who could lose his certification. The Salt Lake Tribune obtained the letter and published it Friday."

Alaska Lawmaker Charged With Seven Counts Of Corruption. The Anchorage Daily News (12/9, Mauer, Demer, Kizzia) reports, "State Rep. Tom Anderson pleaded not guilty Friday to a series of federal charges accusing him of selling his legislative office for $12,828 in bribes from a lobbyist representing private prison interests." The News continues, "Anderson, a 39-year-old Republican who has represented Muldoon's District 19 since he was elected in 2002, was ordered freed Friday by U.S. Magistrate Judge John Roberts on an unsecured $10,000 bond after his arrest Thursday by FBI agents. Roberts said Anderson could travel to Mexico on a previously scheduled vacation next week with his wife, Republican state Rep. Lesil McGuire, who was elected to the state Senate in November, and their infant son." The News adds, "The 18-page indictment against Anderson said the lobbyist was secretly recorded July 21, 2004, boasting that for a price, Anderson would be 'our boy in Juneau.' … A week later, the same lobbyist was recorded telling a confidential informant, 'If I was a Soviet spy and I was looking for a legislator to recruit, (Anderson) would be the one I'd get.' Anderson 'needs the money,' the lobbyist said. … The government didn't charge the lobbyist. He is identified only by the letter 'A,' but the facts in the case point to Bill Bobrick of Anchorage, who represented Cornell Companies, a private prison firm Outside. … Anderson, who did not seek re-election this year and formally leaves office next month, is the first legislator charged with corruption in office since two state senators faced charges in the early 1980s. One, George Hohman, was convicted of bribery in 1981, while the other, Ed Dankworth, successfully appealed his 1982 conflict-of-interest charges and never faced trial."

The Washington Times (12/9, Seper) reports, "Assistant Attorney General Alice S. Fisher, who heads the Justice Department's Criminal Division, said the seven-count indictment returned Wednesday charges Mr. Anderson with two counts of extortion, one count of bribery, one count of conspiracy, and three counts of money laundering in connection with the use of a sham corporation to hide the source of the bribery payments." The Times adds, "The indictment also said that from July 2004 to March 2005, Mr. Anderson, along with another person identified as 'Lobbyist A,' solicited and received $26,000 in payments from an FBI confidential source, in exchange for Mr. Anderson's agreement to take official acts as a member of the Alaska Legislature. … According to the indictment, Mr. Anderson and Lobbyist A participated in the creation of a sham corporation to conceal the existence and true origin of the payments, and used the sham corporation to funnel a portion of the $26,000 to Mr. Anderson. … The indictment said the FBI confidential source was a consultant for a private corrections company located outside the state of Alaska, and Mr. Anderson and Lobbyist A initiated contact with the FBI confidential source in order to solicit bribery payments."

Anderson's Wife, Newly-Elected To Senate, Maintains His Innocence. The Anchorage Daily News (12/9) reported, "Anchorage Sen.-elect Lesil McGuire said Friday that her husband is innocent of bribery and other charges, while noting the things he's accused of happened before they married. 'I am not and have not been a target of any investigation,' she said in a statement issued to the media." The Daily News added, "In her written statement to the media, she asked that the public withhold judgment of her indicted husband 'until the judicial process has run its course.'"

Jury Convicts Former Teamsters Leader Of Rigging Election, Kickback. The Houston Chronicle (12/9, Rice) reports, "A federal jury convicted on Friday a former president of Houston's largest Teamsters local on all counts alleging that he rigged a union election and accepted a kickback from a vendor." The Chronicle continues, "Charles 'Chuck' Crawley was taken from the downtown courtroom immediately after the verdict was announced. … U.S. District Judge Melinda Harmon scheduled a March 23 hearing, when Crawley could be sentenced up to 30 years in prison." The Chronicle adds, "Jurors had heard four days of testimony in Crawley's trial on one count of mail fraud, two counts of embezzlement and one count of falsifying records. He is the fourth Teamsters president in Houston to be convicted on federal charges since 1992, Assistant U.S. Attorney Edward Gallagher said. … Crawley was elected as a reformer in 1997 after his predecessor, Richard Hammond, was removed by a trustee from the international union in 1995. Hammond was sentenced to four years in federal prison in 1998 after his conviction for embezzling union funds. … Assistant U.S. Attorney Michael Wright said Friday that Crawley betrayed union members' trust for his own gain. … The verdict came after a prosecutor told jurors in closing arguments that Crawley had assured a union vendor that he would have the winning bid in return for a $20,000 kickback."

Tennessee Man Pleads Guilty To Child Porn Charges. The Clarksville (TN) Leaf-Chronicle (12/9, Hogan) reports, "A Clarksville man who hosted an Internet chat room called 'Kiddiepics & Kiddievids' that was at the center of an international child pornography investigation pleaded guilty in federal court Thursday." The Leaf-Chronicle continues, "Royal Raymond Weller, 49, who lived in Hunter Chase Apartments on Madison Street at the time of his arrest, admitted to eight counts of conspiracy to distribute child pornography, distribution of child pornography, receipt of child pornography and possession of child pornography." The Leaf-Chronicle adds, "After making his plea in U.S. District Court in Nashville Thursday, Weller now faces between 5 and 150 years in federal prison and will be sentenced in March. … According to a news release from the Justice Department, Weller, under the user name 'G.O.D.,' hosted chats shaped around users' preferences and included promoting the trade of child pornography and evading detection by law enforcement."

The AP (12/9) reports, "He was arrested in March after an investigation involving the Immigration and Customs Enforcement Agency and law enforcement officers in other countries. … He was one of 27 people charged in the ring operating in 10 states and Canada, Australia and Great Britain. … The U.S. Justice Department said Weller had about 10,000 child pornography files on his computer and hard drives."

McCain Bill Would Require Reporting Of Illegal Images. The CNET News (12/9, McCullagh) reports, "Millions of commercial Web sites and personal blogs would be required to report illegal images or videos posted by their users or pay fines of up to $300,000, if a new proposal in the U.S. Senate came into law." CNET continues, "The legislation, drafted by Sen. John McCain and obtained by CNET News.com, would also require Web sites that offer user profiles to delete pages posted by sex offenders." CNET adds, "In a speech on the Senate floor this week, the Arizona Republican and former presidential candidate warned that 'technology has contributed to the greater distribution and availability, and, some believe, desire for child pornography.' … After child pornography or some forms of 'obscenity' are found and reported, the Web site must retain any 'information relating to the facts or circumstances' of the incident for at least six months. Webmasters would be immune from civil and criminal liability if they followed the specified procedures exactly." CNET notes, "McCain's proposal, called the 'Stop the Online Exploitation of Our Children Act', requires that reports be submitted to the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children, which in turn will forward to the relevant police agency. (The organization received $32.6 million in tax dollars in 2005, according to its financial disclosure documents.) … Internet service providers already must follow those reporting requirements. But McCain's proposal is liable to be controversial because it levies the same regulatory scheme--and even stiffer penalties--on even individual bloggers who offer discussion areas on their Web sites. … McCain's proposal comes as concern about protecting children online has reached nearly a fever pitch in Washington. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales gave two speeches this week on the topic, including one on Friday in which he said 'we must do all that we can to protect our children from these cowardly villains who hide in the shadows of the Internet.' … But the reporting rules could prove problematic for individuals and smaller Web sites because the definitions of child pornography have become relatively broad."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Osceola, FL, Ready To Accept Order On Voting Districts. The Orlando Sentinel (12/9, Pino) reports, "After spending nearly a year and a half and about $2 million fighting a federal voting-rights suit, Osceola County commissioners appear ready to abide by a federal judge's order Friday that will implement single-member voting in pending elections." The Sentinel continues, "If commissioners vote to accept the ruling, a special election for two commission seats could be held this spring. A private strategy meeting is expected early next week, commissioners said." The Sentinel adds, "Two commissioners questioned the wisdom of continuing the fight Friday, and two others expressed doubts about an appeal but wanted to wait to hear from the county's attorneys. A fifth commissioner did not return phone calls. … 'I don't see much effort in doing that,' Commissioner Tom Franklin said of an appeal. 'At one point or another, you have to decide if it is worth the battle. It is something we have no control over. You don't keep fighting against windmills.' .. U.S. District Judge Gregory A. Presnell tossed out an Osceola proposal that would have created a hybrid system with five single-member and two at-large commission seats. … The judge accepted district boundaries drawn by the U.S. Department of Justice and approved by the county earlier this week. He also accepted a proposal for which seats would be on the ballot and how elections would proceed."

Former DEA Agent Wins Bias Ruling Against US. The Miami Herald (12/9, Weaver) reports, "A former high-ranking federal drug agent in Miami said a 'great feeling' swelled up inside him on Friday when he won a 4-year-old discrimination lawsuit against the U.S. government." The Herald continues, "A federal jury in Miami found the Drug Enforcement Administration discriminated against Sandalio Gonzalez, the former second-in-command of the DEA's South Florida field office, by retaliating against him with a transfer to another management job in Texas in 2001. … The racially mixed, nine-person jury awarded $85,000 in damages to Gonzalez, 55, of Doral, who had been the DEA's top-ranking Cuban-American administrator. The victory under U.S. law allows his attorneys to obtain legal fees, which could total hundreds of thousands of dollars." The Herald adds, "For Gonzalez -- who stirred controversy in 2000 when he blew the whistle on a Miami drug bust in which 10 kilos of cocaine went missing -- the court triumph was sweet vindication. He had stood up for not only himself, but also other Hispanic and black DEA agents in the Miami field office over issues of discrimination, his lawyers said. … The Department of Justice, named as a defendant in the suit, could appeal the verdict. " The Herald notes, "Gonzalez was among 16 top-level agency executives sent transfer orders on Jan. 18, 2001 -- just before a four-month freeze on such moves was instituted by President George W. Bush's incoming administration. Gonzalez, who supervised about 300 agents in Miami, was ordered to move to El Paso, Texas, where he was the top DEA administrator in charge of 150 agents. Gonzalez, who made $142,000 annually, retired last year and returned to Miami. … Top DEA officials, who testified at the week-long trial before U.S. District Judge Federico Moreno, described the transfer as a 'promotion.' .. But Gonzalez and several others on the transfer list had complained that DEA Administrator Donnie R. Marshall's actions were meant to punish perceived troublemakers and reward his friends before his successor was appointed by the Bush administration."

ANTITRUST:

FCC Commissioner Cleared To Vote On Telecom Deal. The AP (12/9, Dunbar) reports, "The Federal Communications Commission's top lawyer on Friday authorized one of its members to vote on the proposed buyout of BellSouth by AT&T, despite an apparent conflict of interest. The move could break a deadlock on the deal." The AP continues, "The decision came a week after FCC Chairman Kevin Martin declared an impasse in the proceeding and asked General Counsel Sam Feder to determine whether Commissioner Robert McDowell, a former lobbyist, should be allowed to vote on the $84 billion acquisition. … The deal would be the biggest in U.S. telecommunications history." The AP adds, "Feder's action increases the likelihood that AT&T, the biggest U.S. telephone company, will win conditional approval from the FCC within the next two months and overcome the acquisition's final regulatory hurdle, said Paul Glenchur, an analyst at Stanford Washington Research Group. … McDowell, one of three Republicans on the five-member commission, has sat out of negotiations because of his past work as a lobbyist." The AP notes, "The next open meeting for the agency is Dec. 20, but Martin said Friday night that he does not anticipate putting the issue up for a vote then. It would not give McDowell enough time to get 'up to speed' on the issues, Martin said. … In Feder's eight-page opinion, he argued that McDowell should be allowed to vote because he had not participated in the merger proceeding as a lobbyist, did not stand to gain financially from his vote, and that it would be impossible for someone else to take his place in the proceeding. … But Feder was also clearly torn, noting that Robert Cusick, director of the Office of Government Ethics, had said the decision was a close call on which reasonable people could differ and that Cusick said he would decide against authorization but that 'the FCC could reasonably come out the other way.' … Martin and AT&T are betting that McDowell, despite his history, will vote to approve the merger."

WSJournal Blames "Protectionism" For Inaction On Airline Ownership Proposal. The Wall Street Journal (12/9, A8), in an editorial, writes that the Transportation Department "announced this week that it's giving up its effort to liberalize the antiquated laws governing ownership of U.S. airlines. Congressional protectionism, 1; common sense 0. For more than 60 years, U.S. law has barred foreign entities from owning more than 49% of an American carrier, and has restricted foreign 'control' to 25%. In theory this keeps a national-security asset in American hands. In practice it stifles investment and competition at a time when American carriers are experiencing heavy turbulence. Enter former Transportation Secretary Norm Mineta, who proposed allowing foreign investors more latitude to guide fleet composition, route structure and marketing even while safety and security would still rest with American citizens. Alas, 'twas not to be, thanks to a little labor activism and a lot of Congressional territory-marking. Mr. Mineta's successor, Mary Peters, has thrown in the towel."

ENVIRONMENT:

House Passes Offshore Drilling Expansion. The San Francisco Chronicle (12/9, A1, Coile) reports the House "approved a bill Friday to open 8.3 million acres of federal waters west of the Florida coast to oil and gas drilling, a victory for business interests who lobbied for the bill and four Gulf Coast states that would receive billions in new oil and gas royalties. But even drilling supporters admitted it was just a tiny fraction of the publicly owned area they had hoped to open during 12 years of Republican rule of Congress. Efforts to drill in Alaska's Arctic National Wildlife Refuge and off the Pacific and Atlantic coasts were defeated and are likely to be mothballed in the new Democratic Congress." The bill "narrowly survived. The House, on a 207-205 vote, rejected an amendment by Rep. Ed Markey, D-Mass., to require oil companies to repay royalties owed on leases from the 1990s before they could bid on any new leases. The Senate has no time to change it, so the change would have killed the drilling provision."

E. Coli Outbreak Spreading. ABC World News (12/8, lead story, 2:55, Gibson) reported, "Good evening. The most recent outbreak of E. coli food poisoning is spreading. Originally confined in the northeast, it has now spread to other states across the country. So far, there are 293 confirmed or suspected cases in 6 states. All thought to be people who ate at taco bell restaurants. It is a reminder that the nation's food supply knows no boundaries. For the raw scallions suspected to be at fault, were grown in California, but shipped across the country." The CBS Evening News (12/8, story 4, 2:00, Blackstone) and NBC Nightly News (12/8, story 2, 2:00, Williams) ran similar reports.

NYTimes Calls For Stricter Regulation Of Fresh Produce. The New York Times (12/9, A18) editorializes, "The expanding outbreak of E. coli poisonings in New York, New Jersey and several other states underscores the need for more rigorous regulation of the whole supply chain for fresh produce, from the growing fields to the customer."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Mueller Awards Meritorious Achievement Medal To Italian Police Chief. The AP (12/9, Jordan) reported, "The FBI gave one of its highest honors Friday to Italy's national police chief for working a quarter-century with the U.S. to bring down an estimated 1,000 Mafia and other organized crime leaders in both countries." Italian National Police Chief Giovanni De Gennaro, "who at times put sandbags on his windows to shield his family from snipers and whose organized crime officers slept at police stations to remain safe, was awarded the FBI Medal for Meritorious Achievement. The ceremony at FBI headquarters marked the first time the honor was given to an official outside of the FBI's ranks." De Gennaro "said he worked so closely with the FBI and federal prosecutors that 'sometimes I even woke up wondering if I was in Rome or in New York,'" and "he said such international cooperation was valuable to help law enforcement face down threats 'whether it appeared as a mobster or as a terrorist.'"

The New York Post (12/9, Cornell) reported, "FBI Director Robert Mueller credited Giovanni De Gennaro…with forging a bond with the United States that grew into a worldwide intelligence network now used to combat terrorism. De Gennaro first teamed up with the FBI in the 1980s to crack a massive mob-run heroin-trafficking operation involving Sicilian gangsters and their American Bonanno counterparts, who used pizza parlors as fronts. … More than 20 years later the mob has been devastated by thousands of arrests that De Gennaro said came out of 'a deep feeling of friendship [with the FBI] and commitment to fight a common enemy, whether he appeared as a mobster or a terrorist.'"

WPost Urges Bush To Commute Drug Sentence. The Washington Post (12/9, A18) editorializes, "The Supreme Court this week declined to review the case of Weldon Angelos, leaving in place his obscene sentence of 55 years in prison for small-time marijuana and gun charges. The high court's move is no surprise; the justices have tended to uphold draconian sentences against constitutional challenge. But it confronts President Bush with a question he will have to address: Is there any sentence so unfair that he would exert himself to correct it? So far, Mr. Bush hasn't found one. He has commuted only two sentences, both of inmates who were about to be released anyway." US District Judge Paul Cassell, a Bush appointee, "explicitly called on Mr. Bush to use his clemency powers to offer what he as a judge could not: justice."

TAX:

Snipes Pleads Not Guilty To Tax Fraud Charges. The New York Times (12/9, Times) reports, "The actor Wesley Snipes, a fugitive for the last two months while shooting a movie in Namibia, surrendered to federal officials in Florida yesterday and pleaded not guilty to charges of tax fraud and conspiracy." The Times continues, "According to his indictment, by a federal grand jury in Tampa, Fla., Mr. Snipes, 44, failed to file tax returns from 1999 to 2004, and falsely claimed almost $12 million in refunds for 1996 and 1997." The Times adds, "He arrived in Orlando, Fla., yesterday and was arraigned in Ocala, according to the office of the United States attorney for Central Florida. … Mr. Snipes was freed on $1 million in bail. Magistrate Judge Gary R. Jones ordered him released pending trial, and gave him permission to return to Africa to finish his new movie, 'Gallowwalker.' A trial is set for March, and Mr. Snipes is required to return to the United States and surrender his passport by Jan. 10."

The AP (12/9) reports, "Snipes, 44, was charged in October with fraudulently claiming refunds totaling nearly $12 million in 1996 and 1997 on income taxes already paid. He was also charged with failure to file returns from 1999 through 2004." The AP adds, "He will be allowed to return to Namibia to finish his film, but he must return to his home in California on or before Jan. 10, U.S. Magistrate Gary Jones ruled. .. .After that, Snipes will be required to surrender his U.S. passport." The AP notes, "According to the indictment, Snipes had his taxes prepared by accountants with a history of filing false returns to reap payments for their clients. The firm American Rights Litigators would receive 20 percent of refunds from clients, according to the indictment. … Snipes has said he is a scapegoat and was unfairly targeted by prosecutors, and has suggested he was taken advantage of."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Job Approval At "All-Time Low" Of 30% In Zogby Poll. A Zogby International poll of 982 likely voters nationwide conducted December 5-8 (+/- 3.2%) shows that the "national job approval rating of President Bush has plummeted to 30%, an all-time low" in the poll. Bush's job approval is down from 36% in late October. Among Republicans, "just 60% gave him a positive job rating, while 39% gave him negative marks. Just 9% of Democrats and 22% of political independents gave him good marks for his work." The survey "showed that Bush's troubles clearly stem from trouble with the war in Iraq. Just 24% give him positive marks for his handling of the war, down from 39% who gave him a positive rating six months ago for his handling the way. Even among Republicans, a minority -- 47% -- think he has handled the war well (52% of Republicans gave him negative marks for his leadership on the war in Iraq)."

AP-Ipsos Poll Shows 71% Disapproval Of Bush Handling Of Iraq. The New York Daily News (12/9, Bazinet) reports that an AP-Ipsos poll shows that "more Americans than ever say President Bush is doing a pitiful job with the war, and an almost equally overwhelming number of people think Iraq won't turn out to be a stable democracy. … A whopping 71% of Americans disapprove of Bush's handling of the war, while only 27% say he's done a good job. … Just 9% of Americans believe the U.S. will end up with a clear-cut victory in Iraq, the poll indicated, while 63% said they don't think the country will become a stable democracy."

Cheney Called "Forgotten Man" Of Bush Administration. On the US News and World Report (12/8), John Mashek writes in a "Capital View" piece that Vice President Cheney is the "forgotten man" in the Bush Administration, and "he brought most of it on himself. His standing is plunging with members of Congress as a whole, Democrats, some Republicans, and even zealots on the Christian right. For the next two years, it appears he will be struggling to play any kind of significant role in Bush's lame-duck term. He has burned too many bridges to be really effective as a voice in Washington." Cheney is not seeking the presidency in 2008, his "influence in the public domain has hit rock bottom in the past few months," and "his voice on the war in Iraq lacks credibility." Mashek writes that for "reporters who covered the Ford administration, as I did, we are puzzled and even dismayed at the change in Cheney. As the top presidential aide to President Ford, he was a hardworking, helpful, and even cheerful individual. He was a big asset to a struggling, accidental president. With Cheney's help, Ford almost pulled an upset in his race with Jimmy Carter. That man no longer exists."

Rumsfeld Gets Emotional Sendoff At Pentagon. The last Pentagon town hall appearance of Secretary Rumsfeld received extensive coverage. Emphasis was given to its emotional nature, the ovations he received, and his selection of the best and worst days of his tenure. For ABC World News (12/8, story 3, 3:00, Gibson, 8.78M), Jonathan Karl reported, "Today, in an emotional farewell to Pentagon employees, outgoing defense secretary, Donald Rumsfeld, said it will take patience to win in Iraq and Afghanistan." His departure was the second story for CBS. CBS Evening News (12/8, story 2, 2:10, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Meanwhile, at the Pentagon, one of the architects of the war said good-bye. Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld may be leaving, but he hasn't changed his views on Iraq or the press." CBS (Martin): "Ever since 9/11 when he helped pull the wounded from the rubble, Donald Rumsfeld has been Secretary of the war against terror. But for him, the worst day of that war had nothing to do with anything the enemy did." Rumsfeld: "The worst day was Abu Ghraib and seeing that... What went on there and feeling so deeply sorry that that happened." Martin: "The self-inflicted wound of prisoner abuse at Abu Ghraib became a disaster for America's image and a symbol of a mismanaged war."

Fox Special Report (12/8, story 7, Angle) reported, "The only person to have served as US Defense Secretary twice bid a sometimes emotional farewell to workers at the Pentagon. He said that today's town hall meeting will be one of his last public appearances before leaving the post in 10 days. And he wasn't shy about offering last-minute opinions."

CNN's The Situation Room (12/8, Blitzer) reported, "It was candid and emotional. The outgoing Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld saying good-bye to Pentagon employees in a town hall meeting today. He spoke of both his highs and lows and the troubled war that led to his resignation." CNN (McIntyre) added, "Rumsfeld's formal farewell will be a week from today, complete with all the military honors one would expect. But today was his chance to say goodbye to Pentagon employees and for them to say goodbye to him. … Rumsfeld was greeted with a standing ovation as he entered the Pentagon auditorium for his swan song, and he exits the stage unbowed and unapologetic for what critics say were serious missteps and misjudgments, particularly about Iraq. … When he leaves office, Rumsfeld will be about two weeks shy of being the longest serving defense secretary ever, a distinction that will remain with Robert McNamara, who, like Rumsfeld, also left office after presiding over an increasingly unpopular war.

The Washington Post (12/9, Tyson, 690K) reports, "In his final town hall meeting with Pentagon employees, Rumsfeld ranged from serious and emotional to humorous and sarcastic as he mused about his legacy as one of the nation's longest-serving defense secretaries." His ranking of Abu Ghraib as his worst moment is reported, as is his joke that his best day will come "later this month when he leaves office." The Washington Post (12/9, 690K) also carries the CQ transcript of Rumsfeld's remarks.

The Washington Post (12/9, Branigin, 690K) reports that his farewell speech "became emotional at times" and quotes him listing accomplishments during his tenure, such as the creation of Northcom. Like the other Post article, it notes his stated dismay over Abu Ghraib, quoting a paragraph from his remarks about discovering the situation. The town hall meeting "reflected none of the criticism that has been directed at Rumsfeld during his term, notably over his handling of the war in Iraq." Ret. Maj. Gen. John Batiste had "described Rumsfeld as 'arrogant' and 'abusive' and said he disregarded 10 years of war planning on Iraq by the U.S. Central Command before the March 2003 invasion."

The New York Times (12/9, Stout, 1.16M) reports that he "bade farewell ... in his familiar style." He "has a unique place in Pentagon history. He is the only person to have been defense secretary twice. ... The questions from department employees at today's 'town hall' session were gentle ones, in contrast to the news conferences at which Mr. Rumsfeld never bothered to hide his disdain for interrogators he considered ill-informed, cynical, or naïve."

The Los Angeles Times (12/9, Barnes, 850K) reports in a nostalgic vein, "For much of the last six years, a question-and-answer session with Donald H. Rumsfeld was the best show in town." His last town hall is called a "greatest hits collection." On Friday Rumsfeld "used the stage to plead for more time in Iraq," a "regular theme" of his for "much of this year." The LA Times theorizes that his popularity began to decline when he said, on December 8, 2004, "As you know, you go to war with the Army you have. They're not the Army you might want or wish to have at a later time."

The AP (12/8, Burns) reports on his "emotional" farewell, at which he "choked up briefly" recalling a woman who gave him a bracelet "as a reminder of the sacrifices by soldiers of the Army's 172nd Stryker Brigade." He "strode into the room to a cascade of applause and a few approving yelps." More than 140 sites carried the story.

AFP (12/8, Mannion) reports, "An overflow crowd of several hundred people packed a Pentagon auditorium and gave him a standing ovation." He received 'friendly questions" about his tenure. The AFP leads with his urge to listeners to avoid a "precipitous" withdrawal from Iraq.

Rumsfeld Still Serving; Extent Of Clout Unclear. The New York Times (12/9, Cloud, 1.16M) reports in a "Pentagon Memo" that, despite the confirmation of Robert Gates, "when President Bush comes to the Pentagon on Wednesday, Mr. Rumsfeld will preside in the secure conference room known as 'the Tank.'" Gates's swearing is "scheduled" for December 18; "How much influence Mr. Rumsfeld is exerting in the interim is somewhat unclear. Two of his top aides, Peter W. Rodman and Stephen A. Cambone, have already announced their resignations."

House Passes Spending Bill, Tax Cuts, Trade Package. The Wall Street Journal (12/9, A3, Rogers) reports, "Major tax and trade bills neared final passage as Republicans began turning out the lights on the 109th Congress and 12 years of their party's dominance in the Capitol. Working past midnight, departing lawmakers sent President Bush a third, stopgap spending bill required to keep the government operating through Feb. 15. … The $45.1 billion tax cut measure, which includes provisions benefiting oil, coal and health-care interests, passed the House 367-45 late Friday after Democrats narrowly failed 207-205 in a last attempt to disrupt passage with an amendment to the oil provisions. The intricate trade package, which most impacts Vietnam, Haiti and developing nations in Africa and South America, cleared the House hours later 212-184 with prominent Democrats joining in support. The Senate next took up both measures as a single package, and eager to go home, senators agreed to expedite debate in hopes of sending the tax and trade provisions Mr. Bush for his signature."

The AP (12/8) reports, "Rejected by voters and limping off stage, the Republican-led House on Friday passed a sweeping bill reviving expired tax breaks and protecting doctors from a big cut in Medicare payments. But they dumped an unfinished budget on the Democrats about to take power, passing by a 320-70 vote a stopgap spending bill putting the government on autopilot until Feb. 15. … The failure to pass budget bills for domestic agencies, said Rep. David Obey, D-Wis., amounted to 'a blatant admission of abject failure by the most useless Congress in modern times.'"

The Washington Post (12/9, A4, Montgomery) reports, "Throughout the day yesterday, negotiations over the tax-and-trade package consumed lawmakers, particularly in the Senate. With the trade measures under assault, House leaders delayed a vote on that portion of the package and focused first on the more popular tax provisions. … They include a credit for research and development critical to many businesses, a reward for employers that hire former welfare recipients and a deduction for state and local sales taxes paid by people in states without income taxes. If Congress had left town without extending the breaks, more than 19 million taxpayers would have faced higher taxes when they filed in April, said Senate Finance Committee Chairman Charles E. Grassley."

The Los Angeles Times (12/9, Simon) reports, "Lawmakers worked several healthcare measures into the tax bill, including legislation to cancel a scheduled 5% cut in payments to doctors who treat elderly Medicare recipients, and changes that would allow individuals to put more money into tax-sheltered health savings accounts, a new type of medical insurance favored by many Republicans. Separately, the tax bill also addressed some unintended consequences of legislation that Congress passed last year to keep illegal immigrants from getting healthcare benefits through the Medicaid program for the poor. Hundreds of thousands of people who were legally entitled to benefits were inadvertently subjected to new requirements that they provide documents proving their citizenship. Some were frail seniors who had never been issued a birth certificate. The changes will exempt several groups from the documentation rule, including federally assisted foster children, certain disabled people waiting for the starting date of their Medicare coverage and individuals receiving low-income Social Security assistance."

The New York Times (12/9, A14, Hulse) reports, "The failure to dispose of the most basic Congressional work sparked recriminations over who was to blame as leaders of the House Appropriations Committee lashed out at the Senate. … As a result of the spending impasse, Democrats will be forced to deal with the leftover money issues as soon as the new Congress convenes in January." The Times adds, "Some frustrated lawmakers said the chaotic ending of the session was fitting, with major legislation assembled behind closed doors by senior lawmakers and then rushed to the floor. That was typical, they said, of how business had been done in a highly partisan atmosphere."

Gregg Claims GOP Is Responsible For "Biggest Budget Buster In The History Of Congress." The Wall Street Journal (12/9, A3, Rogers) reports Sen. Judd Gregg "took the floor and warned his party it was ignoring the lesson of Republican losses in the midterm elections last month." Gregg is quoted as saying, "You just have to ask yourself how we as a party got to this point, where we have a leadership that is going to ram down the throats of our party the under Republican leadership." The AP (12/8) reports Gregg "gave an extraordinary floor speech lambasting his party for losing its way on fiscal discipline and his leadership for jamming it past rank-and-file Republicans opposing the massive measure." Roll Call (12/8, Stanton) reports on its web site that Gregg "tore into his GOP colleagues Friday, accusing the party of being hypocritical when it claims the mantle of fiscal responsibility. Gregg's angry floor speech came after a decision by House and Senate leaders to move a $39 billion tax package using procedural tactics that will shield it from a filibuster. In the speech, Gregg accused Senate GOP leaders of using procedural rules 'against the Republican membership' to block criticism of the bill and efforts by conservatives to change it. … Because of the procedural move, the Senate will likely now remain in session until at least Sunday, though Gregg could force the Senate to remain in town until late Monday or Tuesday if he does not agree to allowing the bill to move forward." The Washington Post also notes Gregg's criticism.

Democrats Block Congressional Pay Raise. The Dallas Morning News (12/9, Gillman) reports Democrats "stalled a congressional pay raise Friday, demanding a minimum wage hike first – a move derided even by Texas Republicans willing to freeze lawmakers' salaries. 'I have voted for some, and I've voted against some. I would be inclined to vote against it this year,' said Sen. John Cornyn, R-Texas, expressing annoyance that Democrats were trying to link the issues. 'I think they are politically posturing.' House and Senate Democratic leaders threatened to block a last-minute flurry of legislation unless both chambers agreed to avert a 2 percent raise that would take effect Jan. 1.

GOP Accused Of Leaving Spending "Time Bomb" For Democrats. The Boston Globe (12/9, Klein) reports, "The outgoing Republican Congress has placed a political time bomb for incoming Democrats: Nearly all domestic programs paid for by the federal government are level funded through mid-February with no adjustments for inflation, a situation that probably will trigger cuts or reductions in such popular areas as veterans' affairs, children's healthcare, housing vouchers, and low-income fuel assistance." Democrats "will therefore have to immediately choose between restoring any lost services and their campaign pledge to control government spending. The clash could expose tensions within the party in the crucial first weeks of Democrats' leadership -- and the party's agenda could get sidetracked in a pitched battle over spending priorities."

Congress's Final Days Seen As Evidence Of GOP's Disorder. The New York Times (12/9, A14, Kornblut, Zeleny) reports, "In bursts of giddiness and remorse, members of Congress went through not just the end of the 109th Congress this week, but also 12 years of Republican control. It was the end of an era, and Republicans left Capitol Hill with spasms of amusement, anger and humiliation, at times visibly stunned that power and its trappings had vanished so fast. … They tried — rather unsuccessfully — to wrap up business, displaying a lack of legislative discipline that was a sharp contrast to the machinelike efficiency of their early years in charge." House Republicans "failed to pass an antiabortion measure, struggled to approve a package extending popular tax breaks and decided not even to bother trying to find a solution for the spending bills."

Ethics Committee Wraps Up Foley Probe.

The Washington Post (12/9, A1, Weisman) reports the House ethics committee "concluded yesterday that House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert and his top staff probably knew for months, if not years, of then-Rep. Mark Foley's inappropriate contact with former House pages but did nothing to protect the teenagers. Top GOP House leaders also 'failed to exercise appropriate diligence' in the matter, the committee's report found, and tried 'to remain willfully ignorant of the potential consequences of Foley's conduct.' … The report speculated that some officials were reluctant to act too aggressively for fear of exposing Foley's homosexuality or for political reasons. But the ethics panel, officially known as the Committee on Standards of Official Conduct, decided against taking any action against the leaders, aides or House officials involved in the saga, declining even to describe their actions as bringing ill repute on the House."

ABC World News (12/8, story 2, 2:00, Tapper) reported, "After nine weeks of investigating the Mark Foley page scandal, the House Ethics Committee concluded that no staffers violated the House code of conduct." Rep. Judy Biggert, Standards of Official Conduct Committee: "I think we found the truth. We answered the questions that we had to answer." Tapper: "The committee, which conducted more than 50 interviews and depositions, did find a pattern of conduct was exhibited among many individuals to remain willfully ignorant of Congressman Mark Foley's behavior with pages."

The CBS Evening News (12/8, lead story, 2:30, Couric) led with the story, saying "the page scandal may not have cost Republicans control of Congress, but it sure didn't help. And in any case, the House Ethics Committee says they have only themselves to blame. An investigation concluded today that the Republicans had plenty of warning about then-Florida Congressman Mark Foley's inappropriate behavior with male pages. But the panel says they did little about it for political reasons."

NBC Nightly News (12/8, lead story, 2:55, Reid) reported. "The report also says the Chairman of the Page Board, John Shimkus, was told by a staffer last year that Foley was a 'ticking time bomb.' … The Ethics Committee says no House rules were broken and no disciplinary actions are warranted … Foley himself is still under criminal investigation but much to the chagrin of Congressional watchdogs here on Capitol Hill, it appears to be over."

CNN's The Situation Room (12/8, Blitzer) reported, "This report does go into detail in trying to make the case that just because they're not reprimanding anyone, it should not be seen as an idea that staffers acted properly, or even members of Congress."

The Los Angeles Times (12/9, Levey) reports, "In a coda to a year of political disasters for Republicans, the House Ethics Committee said Friday that GOP lawmakers and staff members for years remained 'willfully ignorant' that…Foley was making sexual advances toward male congressional pages. Driven by political considerations and fear of exposing Foley's homosexuality, they failed in their duty to protect the teenagers, the committee concluded in its report on the scandal. And, the panel said, congressional officials ignored evidence of predatory behavior by the Florida Republican that began emerging more than 10 years ago."

The New York Times (12/9, A14, Zeleny) reports, "The members of the investigating subcommittee, two Republicans and two Democrats, declined to take questions on Friday or respond to critics who said the case of Mr. Foley…underscored a need to reform how Congress policed itself. The findings were presented in a two-inch-thick document, including volumes of sexually graphic instant messages Mr. Foley sent to former pages. Mr. Foley refused to testify, the report said, citing pending criminal investigations against him in Florida as well as his right not to incriminate himself. … The committee said it could not conclusively say why Republicans failed to address Mr. Foley's conduct. But the investigation found that Republicans 'may have been concerned that raising the issue too aggressively might have risked exposing Representative Foley's homosexuality, which could have adversely affected him both personally and politically.'"

Committee Suggests Hastert And His Staff Mislead Investigators. Roll Call (12/8, Bresnahan, Davis) reports Speaker Hastert "emphasized that the panel concluded that no House Member or staffer was aware of the more sexually explicit messages that surfaced after the Foley scandal became public." Hastert "told the investigative subcommittee that he could not recall being told by House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) and Rep. Tom Reynolds (R-N.Y.) about inappropriate e-mails. … The investigative subcommittee 'finds that the weight of evidence supports the conclusion that Speaker Hastert was told, at least in passing, about the e-mails' by both Boehner and Reynolds, the report stated. 'Neither the Majority Leader nor Rep. Reynolds asked the Speaker to take any action in response to the information each provided to him, and there is no evidence that the Speaker took any action.'" The ethics committee "apparently did not believe" Hastert chief of staff Scott Palmer's "denial of any knowledge of the Foley e-mails, and it disputed Palmer's claim that he did not meet privately with Foley or his former chief of staff, Kirk Fordham, to discuss the matter. 'The weight of evidence supports a conclusion that Kirk Fordham talked to Scott Palmer about Fordham's concerns about Rep. Foley's conduct, and that Palmer later talked to Rep. Foley,' the report stated."

The Chicago Tribune (12/9, Dorning, Parsons) reports the panel "cast doubt on Hastert's public insistence that he was unaware of a complaint about inappropriate e-mail messages Foley sent to a former page last year. … The panel blasted another senior Hastert aide, counsel Ted Van Der Meid, for 'an inexplicable lack of interest' when he received a complaint about the Foley e-mails. Van Der Meid had been repeatedly warned previously of inappropriate contacts with pages, including at least one of Foley's visits to the page dorm, the panel found."

Kolbe Said To Have Lied About His Knowledge Of Foley's Behavior. The Washington Post (12/9, A1, Weisman) reports that "perhaps the biggest revelations involved" Rep. Jim Kolbe. The Washington Post "reported in October that one of his former pages had received a sexually explicit instant message from Foley, which the former page had shown to Kolbe as long ago as 2000. After the story appeared, Kolbe said that the contact was with his staff, not him, that he did not see it and that he was unaware it was explicit. Kolbe's assistant, Patrick Baugh, told the committee that the former page had contacted Kolbe directly and that the former page revealed the explicit nature of the message. Moreover, after the Foley matter exploded in the media, the former page contacted Kolbe again to ask whether he should divulge the instant message. He testified that Kolbe responded: 'It is best that you don't even bring this up with anybody. … There is no good that can come from it if you actually talk about this.'"

WPost, NYTimes Assail Committee Over Its Inaction. The Washington Post (12/9, A18), in an editorial, writes, "What, one has to wonder, would it take for the House ethics committee to hold a lawmaker or a staff member accountable? … In a report released yesterday, the panel did a good job laying out the disturbing facts of the case…then, all too characteristically, the committee declined to hold even a single individual responsible for any misstep."

The New York Times (12/9) editorializes, "Watching our elected leaders in action, it's not surprising that Americans wonder if there is any limit to the crass misbehavior that members of Congress are willing to tolerate from their colleagues to protect their privileges and hold on to their own jobs. The House ethics committee answered that question yesterday with a resounding 'No.'"

Reid, McConnell Schedule Closed-Door Meeting Of All 100 Senators. The Washington Post (12/9, A3, Babington) reports Senate Democrats, "who campaigned on a pledge of more openness in government, will kick off the 110th Congress with a closed meeting of all 100 senators in the Capitol." Sen. Harry Reid "announced yesterday 'a joint caucus meeting' for senators only, to be held that morning in the old Senate chamber, a cozy, seldom-used room. The gathering 'will allow senators an opportunity to meet before the Senate is in session and before any official legislative business is considered,' Reid's office said." Sen. Mitch McConnell "endorsed the plan." Roll Call.com (12/8, Stanton, Billings) reports, "Although Reid and McConnell came up with the idea of a bipartisan caucus meeting as a way to bring about a greater sense of bipartisanship in the Senate, it has raised questions about the appropriateness of barring the press from a meeting of the entire Senate during which lawmakers could essentially map out the year's legislative activities for the year in advance.

The AP (12/8, Kellman) reports, "Spokesmen for the lawmakers said the meeting would not amount to a closed session of the Senate under the chamber's rules. However, any meeting of 100 senators with rules of any kind is by definition a meeting of the Senate, said Brian Darling, director of Senate relations for The Heritage Foundation. 'It would be a de facto meeting of the Senate and although they want to call it something else, it is,' Darling said. 'To set up something and to plan something between the leaders is very unusual and should be subject to open government rules,' he added. 'Their intentions are good, but the results of what they're doing will be not good for the American people.'"

Filner To Chair House Veterans' Committee. On its web site, Roll Call (12/8, Yachnin) reports, "After successfully beating back a challenge from Rep. Mike Michaud (D-Maine) on Friday, Rep. Bob Filner (D-Calif.) will become chairman of the Veterans' Affairs Committee in the 110th Congress. The full Democratic Caucus confirmed Filner to the post in a 112-69 vote following a brief meeting in the House Rayburn Office Building. The Democratic Steering and Policy Committee heard from both lawmakers Thursday and voted 24-20 in favor of Filner. But the close split allowed for the full Caucus, which must ratify Steering's recommendations, to nominate candidates from the floor."

VA Health Care Records Success Stories. CBS Evening News (12/8, story 6, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "For decades, politicians have been calling for a comprehensive government plan to make quality health care available and affordable. Well, it turns out that the government already has a system in place that delivers great care at low cost. It's not for everyone, just for those who have served our country." Unidentified doctor: "Good to see you! How are you?" CBS (Andrews): "Eighty-eight-year-old George Sack can go anywhere he wants for health care, but he chooses to go to the VA. ... If his choice surprises you, it does not surprise the experts. In studies, including one by Harvard and in six straight years of patient satisfaction surveys, the VA earned the highest health care quality rating in the country. It is also the least expensive. It's a remarkable turnaround from the old VA."

McKinney Bill Calls For Bush's Impeachment. The AP (12/8) reports, "In what was likely her final legislative act in Congress, outgoing Georgia Rep. Cynthia McKinney announced a bill Friday to impeach President Bush. The legislation has no chance of passing and serves as a symbolic parting shot not only at Bush but also at Democratic leaders. Incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi has made clear that she will not entertain proposals to sanction Bush and has warned the liberal wing of her party against making political hay of impeachment."

Coast Guard Stumbles In Remaking Itself. The New York Times (12/9, A1, Lipton, 1.16M) reports, "Four years after the Coast Guard began an effort to replace nearly its entire fleet of ships, planes and helicopters, the modernization program heralded as a model of government innovation is foundering. ... The problems have helped swell the costs of the fleet-building program to a projected $24 billion, from $17 billion, and delayed the arrival of any new ships or aircraft. That has compromised the Coast Guard's ability to fulfill its mission, which greatly expanded after the 2001 attacks to include guarding the nation's shores against terrorists. The service has been forced to cut back on patrols and, at times, ignore tips from other federal agencies about drug smugglers."

Treasury Report Expected To Show Little Progress In Deficit Reduction. The Wall Street Journal (12/9, A2, Solomon) reports, "Bush administration officials have begun grappling with one of the toughest tasks they face over the next two years: How to both protect the president's tax cuts and put the federal budget deficit on a sustainable path." On Tuesday, the Treasury Department "releases its latest budget tally. The numbers likely will show little progress in shrinking the deficit despite a growing economy. For the first two months of the fiscal year that began Oct. 1, the government is expected to show a deficit of about $122 billion -- $9 billion less than the same period last year." Showing progress on the deficit "is crucial as the White House heads toward early February," when the fiscal year 2008 budget plan will be released.

Strong Hiring, Low Unemployment Give Fuel To Optimism On Economy. NBC Nightly News (12/8, story 6, 2:30, Williams) reported, "The Labor Department reported today that employers added 132,000 jobs to their payrolls last month. At the same time the unemployment rate ticked up a notch to 4.5% as more people got into the labor market to look for work. The economy is creating jobs in some unlikely places."

The Wall Street Journal (12/9, A3, Conkey) reports that "solid hiring and an unemployment rate still near a five-year low reinforced the upbeat view of optimists, including the Federal Reserve, that the economy is weathering the downturn in the housing and automotive sectors. … The unemployment rate edged up slightly to 4.5% in November from 4.4%. Unrounded, the increase was even smaller: from 4.42% to 4.47%." But as the Washington Post (12/9, D1, Henderson) writes, "Sometimes, an uptick in unemployment can be good news." The slight increase was "not primarily because of layoffs. The rate rose as hundreds of thousands of Americans who had previously dropped out of the labor force poured back in, drawn by brightening employment prospects. Most of them found work." The Financial Times (12/9, Guha, Callan, Tassell) says Fed chief Ben Bernanke's "optimism that the US economy is heading for a soft landing received a lift" with the reports.

Crude Oil Down Slightly After Early Jump. The Wall Street Journal (12/9, B1, McKay) reports crude oil futures "jumped $1.16 in morning trading" Friday in New York, "but finished the day off 46 cents, or 0.7%, at $62.03 a barrel, up 1.6% on the year."

Automotive Writer Says US Gasoline Prices Comparatively Low. The "Free Speech" feature on the CBS Evening News (12/8, story 7, Couric) focused on US gasoline prices, with automotive writer Mike Rutherford arguing that "if you believe you're paying too much for the fuel you're paying for your automobiles, you're not living in the real world. In the States you're enjoying pump prices that are among the lowest on the planet."

Lindsey Group's Sumerlin Gives Bernanke "A" For First Year. In a Wall Street Journal (12/9, A8) op-ed, Lindsey

DOJ_NMG_0104976

Group Managing Director Mark Sumerlin writes, "Ben Bernanke deserves an A for his first year as chairman of the Federal Reserve. The Bernanke Fed hasn't always been graceful or elegant, but it has been mostly right."

FDA Panel Concludes Stents May Be Unsafe. ABC World News (12/8, story 7, 2:20, Gibson) reported, "Leading heart doctors concluded two-day assessment of drug-coated stents. More than 1 million Americans had them implanted just last year. But there are concerns that drug-coated stents may increase the occurrence of blood clots that cause heart attacks." NBC Nightly News (12/8, story 3, 1:30, Bazell) said a special FDA panel said "doctors and patients need to know that when the devices are used that way they can cause blood clots, lead to heart attacks or deaths and said patients need to be on blood-thinning medication for at least a year."

On its front page, the Washington Post (12/9, Stein) reports the panel has concluded that "new drug-oozing stents widely used to prop open clogged arteries are associated with an increased risk of blood clots, heart attacks and death for the majority of patients receiving the devices." The Wall Street Journal (12/9, Winslow, Mathews), also on its front page, says that "the vast majority of patients who have a coated stent won't experience a problem. But in recent months, long-term studies and real-world experience have yielded evidence that in rare instances the newer devices may trigger potentially fatal blood clots, years after they are implanted." The New York Times (12/9, A11, Feder) says the FDA's Daniel Schult "said it was too soon to discuss what specific actions the F.D.A. might take."

NIH Scientist Admits Violating Conflict-Of-Interest Rules. The Washington Post (12/9, B2, Rich) reports, "A senior government scientist who was a focus of a congressional probe into conflicts of interest in medical research admitted in federal court yesterday that he improperly failed to disclose payments of $285,000 he received as a consultant for the pharmaceutical manufacturer Pfizer Inc. Pearson 'Trey' Sunderland III, who was chief of the Geriatric Psychiatry Branch of the National Institute of Mental Health, pleaded guilty in Baltimore to a misdemeanor charge of violating conflict-of-interest rules." Sunderland "was paid as a consultant on two projects in which his department was collaborating with Pfizer on research to identify chemical warning signs of Alzheimer's disease."

NASA Administrator Calls Decision To Build Shuttle "A Policy Mistake." The New York Times (12/9, A16, Schwartz, 1.16M) reports NASA Administrator Michael Griffin "says the current period of space exploration will come to be seen as a mistake. 'Viewed from the point of history several decades out,' he said in an interview, 'the period where the United States retreated from the Moon and quite deliberately focused only on low Earth orbit will be seen, to me, a mistake.' The Times notes that Griffin has made similar comments before and that "this time, his remarks came as he waited for Thursday's down-to-the-wire effort to launch the shuttle on a 12-day mission to rewire the International Space Station. The liftoff was scrubbed at the last minute because of weather concerns."

NYTimes Cautions Against Lunar Base Costs. The New York Times (12/9, 1.16M) editorializes that NASA this week "announced plans to establish a permanent base on the Moon by 2024, explained why we should want to send astronauts back to a world they visited repeatedly more than three decades ago, and described what they might do when they get there." But "what's worrisome about the new plans is their lack of focus. The agency cites six major reasons for returning to the Moon. The most persuasive is to use the Moon as a base to test technologies and operating techniques to be used on future missions to Mars, a more compelling target." The Times concludes, "Our main concern is that the political proponents of the Moon-Mars adventure will not provide money commensurate with the task. NASA's crowning scientific achievements have come from its unmanned probes to distant worlds and its orbiting observatories. It would be a shame if an underfinanced program to return to the Moon on a permanent basis and then venture on to Mars forced reductions in research programs of higher scientific value."

Man Stabs Himself Outside Longworth House Office Building. On its web site, Roll Call (12/8, McArdle, Bresnahan) reports, "At 12:55 p.m. today, a 19-year-old man walked up to the main entrance of the Longworth House Office Building and proceeded to stab himself at least once in the chest in front of Capitol Police officers. After arresting the man, officers found something in a backpack he was carrying that led them to shut down streets near Union Station to search for a suspicious package that he had mailed earlier in the day. By 5:30 p.m., the package had been found and was deemed safe by Capitol Police and Metropolitan Police, and investigators and the man remained at George Washington Hospital under police arrest."

SMU Wins Property Dispute Involving Bush Library Bid. The AP (12/8) reports Southern Methodist University "has won a court ruling that could boost its bid to host the George W. Bush Presidential Library. Federal District Judge Jerry Buchmeyer ruled Thursday that SMU has clear title to a condominium complex that university officials have considered for the library. SMU and two other colleges are bidding for the library. Leon Bennett, SMU's vice president for legal affairs, said the university plans to evict the remaining residents this month and begin tearing down the condominiums."

White House Releases New Barney Christmas Video. The AP (12/8) reports, "Just in time for the holidays, America's best-known Scottish terrier is back with a new video on the White House Web site. It's 'Barney's Holiday Extravaganza,' a production that follows Barney around the White House as he plans a holiday show, runs into trouble developing a plot and then wrangles over his budget with Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson and Budget Director Rob Portman."

LATimes Urges Bush To Avoid Recess Appointments. The Los Angeles Times (12/9) editorializes that President Bush "and his would-be successors — Democratic and Republican — should resolve that [John] Bolton is the last major official to serve under this disability" – a recess appiointment. Recess appointments "are allowed by the letter of the Constitution, but they violate its spirit. … With a new Democratic majority in the Senate capable of sustaining a filibuster, Bush may be tempted to resort to recess appointments — perhaps even to the Supreme Court — as payback for what he would see as obstructionism. He should resist the temptation."

OTHER NEWS:

Jefferson Goes On Offensive In Runoff Campaign. The Washington Post (12/9, A2, Murray, Lengel) reports Rep. William J. Jefferson "was given up for dead politically after the FBI found $90,000 in alleged bribe money in his freezer, and he barely survived a Nov. 7 primary election, garnering 30 percent of the vote in a crowded field of 12 challengers. Now he is locked in a tough runoff with a well-funded Democratic challenger who is using poetry and schoolchildren to highlight Jefferson's ethical woes. Many of Jefferson's House colleagues are privately rooting for him to lose today so his troubles do not tarnish the new Democratic-controlled Congress." Jefferson "has scooped up high-profile endorsements from New Orleans Mayor C. Ray Nagin and state Sen. Derrick Shepherd, who finished third in the primary, while attacking opponent Karen Carter, who finished second with 22 percent of the vote, as too liberal. In one ad, Jefferson declares 'I have never taken a bribe' and dismisses Carter, a 37-year-old lawyer and state representative, as 'an ambitious young woman.'" Jefferson "has attempted to portray Carter as a left-wing fringe figure who supports late-term abortions, same-sex marriage and human cloning."

Romney Draws Fire From Conservatives Over 1994 Letter On Gay Rights. The New York Times (12/9, A11, Nagourney, Kirkpatrick) reports Gov. Mitt Romney, who has "built a presidential campaign on a broad appeal for conservative support, is drawing sharply increased criticism from conservative activists for his advocacy of gay rights in a 1994 letter." Romney's "standing among conservatives is being hurt by a letter he sent to the Log Cabin Club of Massachusetts saying that he would be a stronger advocate for gay rights" than Sen. Edward Kennedy, whom he challenged that year. The "circulation of the letter by gay rights groups in recent weeks has set off a storm of outrage among social conservatives, and by Friday was looming as a serious complication to Mr. Romney's hopes." The "breadth of the letter's language and the specificity of many of the pledges stunned conservative leaders. Many of them had turned to Mr. Romney as a conservative alternative" to Sen. John McCain, "whose position on issues like abortion had been considered suspect."

Edsall Says Romney "Trying To Forcibly Reinvent Himself." In his New York Times (12/9, A19) column, Thomas B. Edsall writes that the "most significant development at this stage" of the GOP presidential nomination race "is the failure of any G.O.P. candidate to emerge as the consensus conservative, uniting white evangelicals, family-values traditionalists, defense hawks, and opponents of the tax and regulatory state. … The two Republican candidates leading in polls, John McCain and Rudy Giuliani, both fail the consensus test. Each stands to the left of the party -- well to the left in Giuliani's case -- on the 'traditional values' issues: sexual mores, family structure, reproductive choice, gay rights, embryonic stem cell research, and so forth." Romney "is trying to forcibly reinvent himself from his incarnation as a Massachusetts governor who favored abortion rights and gay rights — almost as hard a history to surmount in the G.O.P. as the multiple marriages and divorces of McCain, Giuliani, and Newt Gingrich."

Brownback Discusses McCain, Giuliani, And His Own Chances. Asked on MSNBC's Hardball (12/8, Barnicle) if either Sen. John McCain or Rudy Giuliani can win the GOP presidential nomination, Sen. Sam Brownback said, "That's the beauty about the process. It's a lengthy campaign and people examine the positions and then they decide. And don't think you can judge that question at this point in time. They are both great Americans, they're great heroes in this country, but elections are about ideas and the future and that's what I hope to present." On his own bid, he said, "We're in the exploratory phase. We haven't moved this on forward past that yet, but I'm going to be traveling and presenting a lot of ideas and I love the battle and the competition of ideas."

Pataki Suggests He Can Overcome "Obstacles" To GOP Nomination. Gov. George Pataki was asked about his presidential ambitions during an interview with Fox News (12/8, Skinner). Pataki said, "I still have a little over three weeks left as governor. That's what I'm focusing on right now. … Once this year is over, once I am a private citizen, I'll take a look and make a decision." Asked about polls showing him at "two percent or so" among Republican primary voters, Pataki said, "If you did the same type of poll in New York state in 1993 asking about the possible candidates for governor, I doubt if I would have gotten two percent. … But when you have a vision, when you have the ability to articulate and implement that vision, and you work hard, I think I've shown in New York that you can overcome those obstacles."

Some Republicans Second-Guessing Final NRSC Moves. The New York Times (12/9, A13, Kirkpatrick) reports campaign finance reports submitted this week "have led to second-guessing about whether the National Republican Senatorial Committee borrowed too little for its final all-out push for its candidates. At least two Republican Senate candidates lost by just a few thousand votes." The final figures and low debts "left some Republicans grumbling privately" that NRSC leader Elizabeth Dole "had failed to give it her all."

Allen Faults "Distractions" For Turning Virginia Race Against Him. The Washington Post (12/9, B1, Shear) interviews outgoing Sen. George Allen, who says "distractions" helped turn his Virginia reelection race against him. Allen "declined to talk specifically about the controversies that turned what was supposed to be his warm-up for a presidential campaign into a losing bid to hold on to his Senate seat. 'You can't brood and dwell' on the loss, he said. But it's clear -- especially from the football analogies he uses frequently to describe the sudden turn in his political life -- that Allen regrets the mistakes he and his campaign staff made during the past several months." Allen said, "In the event that you lost a game by three or four touchdowns, people say, 'Gosh, it's a blowout.' If you lose by one point in a game, you can look back on every single play of the game." Allen "politely declines to discuss any political future he might have in Virginia," though "friends and political observers" say Allen is "likely to bide his time before attempting a possible comeback, perhaps as governor in 2009."

Kilroy Still Refusing To Concede In OH15. CNN's The Situation Room (12/8, Blitzer) reported that in OH15, "a hand recount is over, and Republican Congresswoman Deborah Pryce still has a 1,055-vote lead over Democrat Mary Jo Kilroy. But Kilroy still is refusing to concede. The rest of the recount will be conducted by electronic machines. Election officials say the final results…should be known next week."

Sekula-Gibbs Leaves "Legacy Mainly Of C-SPAN Video." The Houston Chronicle (12/9, Kim) profiles Rep. Shelley Sekula-Gibbs of TX22, who took office on November 13 and who spent "her last official day on the Hill" Friday. Sekula-Gibbs "spent the past week…delivering one speech after another on the House floor. Her soliloquies, aimed at the House television camera as the chamber was virtually deserted, could have been judged plentiful even in a place where performance art often passes for good politics." She "leaves a legacy mainly of C-SPAN video."

Large Majority Supports Letting Government Negotiate Drug Prices. The Washington Post (12/9, A3, Lee) reports a Kaiser Family Foundation survey finds that the "overwhelming majority of Americans favor allowing the government to negotiate prescription drug prices for the Medicare program, suggesting there will be considerable political pressure on the next Congress to do so." Of the 1,867 adults polled, 85% "said they favored such negotiations, including majorities of Republicans, Democrats and independents."

Jeane Kirkpatrick Dies At 80. CNN's The Situation Room (12/8, Blitzer) reported, "A pioneer for women with political influence has died. Jeane Kirkpatrick was the first female US ambassador to the UN, and she was an unabashed advocate of Reagan-era conservatism, after beginning her public life as a Democrat. Her assistant says Kirkpatrick died in her sleep at her Bethesda, Maryland, home last night. She was 80 years old."

ABC World News (12/8, story 8, 0:45, Gibson), the CBS Evening News (12/8, story 5, 0:10, Couric), and NBC Nightly News (12/8, story 9, 0:45, Williams) all briefly reported on Kirkpatrick's death.

The New York Times (12/9, A1, Weiner) reports that in March 2003, President Bush "recalled Ambassador Kirkpatrick to active duty and sent her to Geneva, said Alan Gerson, who had served as her general counsel at the United Nations. The secret mission, previously undisclosed, was to head off a diplomatic uprising against the imminent war against Iraq."

The Washington Post (12/9, A1, Holley) reports, "For many years a Cold War liberal…Kirkpatrick became a neoconservative in the 1970s and then a Republican Party stalwart. An academic and a public intellectual who never held elective office, she briefly considered seeking the Republican presidential nomination in 1988." The AP (12/8) reports, "She stopped that process short, however, retreating to the position that she would accept the No. 2 slot if asked. She had played a leading role at the party's convention four years earlier — at a time when she was still a Democrat."

WSJournal Remembers Kirkpatrick. The Wall Street Journal (12/9, A8), in an editorial, writes, "The mind's eye recalls the televised image in the early 1980s of Ambassador Kirkpatrick, a Democrat then, seated at the U.N. Security Council table and publicly defending U.S. interests against the Soviet Union with an articulate, no-nonsense bluntness that makes Mr. Bolton sound like Little Bo-Peep by comparison. That style -- American interests made perfectly clear -- will be missed."

WPost Blames Conservatives For Virginia GOP's Woes. The Washington Post (12/9, A18) editorializes, "Virginia Republicans gathered at a handsome resort the other day to lick their wounds and plot their future. Or rather, some Virginia Republicans did -- namely, the party's right-wing, anti-tax ideologues, who have contributed mightily to devastating back-to-back losses in races for the governorship last year and the U.S. Senate this year. Virginia's more pragmatic Republicans, who are more interested in addressing the state's problems than in upholding the true faith of anti-tax doctrine, did not bother to show up."

WSJournal Sees New York Transfat Ban As Boon For Plaintiff's Bar. The Wall Street Journal (12/9, A8) editorializes that New York City's "concern for the health of residents is understandable, but trans fats are not E. coli (or even secondhand smoke), and the federal Food and Drug Administration still considers these chemically modified food ingredients perfectly safe for consumption. Could it be that Mayor Mike has been taken in by activist Gotham health czars and national Naderite 'watchdog' outfits like Michael Jacobson's Center for Science in the Public Interest, among others pushing a larger agenda? … The ultimate goal of these so-called consumer advocates is to persuade the FDA to turn on trans fats, a move that would serve the food industry up as the next entree on the plaintiff bar's menu. Don't be surprised if the new Democrat Congress helps them pursue this goal, just like Mayor Bloomberg, on the dubious assumption that people can't decide for themselves what and what not to eat."

Internet Technologies Said To Have Benefited Democratic Candidates. The Washington Post (12/9, A19) Raul Fernandez, chief executive of the software firm ObjectVideo, writes, "Technology won the 2006 elections for the Democrats. … The Internet…changed the balance of power in the House and Senate." Fernandez notes, "Search 'Conrad Burns' on YouTube.com and you get more than 130 videos, most of them unflattering. The most popular is 'Conrad Burns' Naptime,' set to 'Happy Trails.' No fancy production values here -- just a straight-on camera shot of the senator falling asleep during a congressional hearing important to Montana. That video alone received more than 100,000 views. Dozens of other anti-Burns videos, detailing such things as 'pay-to-play' allegations and key gaffes, were seen by many thousands of viewers. In a race that was lost by about 3,000 votes, those YouTube creations had an impact."

US Opponents Said To Coalesce Into "Resistance" Movement. In a 3,200-word piece on its front page, the Wall Street Journal (12/9, Higgins, 2.04M) describes in detail "the unlikely coalition of the U.S.' sworn enemies," including communists, radical Islamists and Latin American populists. The Journal says post-Cold War assumptions of America's "triumph" are "now under strain as secular rebels, antiglobalization militants and other strains of revolt rally to the banner of 'resistance' offered by Islamist groups such as Hezbollah." Religion "has become a great mobilizing force -- even for zealous atheists. The phenomenon extends beyond the Middle East to Europe, Latin America and Africa, too. Causes that a few years ago seemed moribund or at least passé -- socialism, Third World solidarity, strident anti-Americanism -- have been injected with the fervor, though rarely the actual faith, of Islamic radicalism."

Rice Cites "Freedom Deficit" As "Core Problem" In Middle East. The AP (12/9, Schweid) notes Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said yesterday that "a lack of democracy -- a 'freedom deficit' -- is the core problem in the Middle East. But Rice also said despite a divide between moderates and extremists in the area, she thinks the Bush Administration can begin to deliver on its promise of a Palestinian state living in peace alongside Israel." Appearing with German Foreign Minister Franz-Walter Steinmeier, Rice "made it clear the administration would continue to focus on spreading democracy and steering clear of extremists while pursuing an Arab-Israeli settlement." The AP notes that Assistant Secretary McCormack earlier this week "said Rice intends to devote a lot of time on the Middle East and would make a trip to the region early next year to try to promote Mideast peacemaking." Rice plans to meet today with Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni, and AFP (12/9) reports Livni "has rejected suggestions by influential US policymakers that the Israeli-Palestinian conflict lies at the heart of a broader Middle East crisis."

UN Security Council Will Consider Revised Iran Resolution Monday. The New York Times (12/9, Hoge, 1.16M) reports London, Paris and Berlin "produced a revised draft of [an UNSCR] on Iran on Friday, and said they would formally introduce it on Monday in the hope of obtaining a speedy vote on much-delayed action to curb Tehran's nuclear program." The revised draft "is aimed at meeting persistent objections from China and Russia. The revised language narrows the scope of prohibition and punishment to activities that are clearly associated with making a nuclear weapon," and "also removes restrictions in earlier drafts on the construction, supplying and operation of an $800 million light-water reactor that Russia is building at Bushehr in southern Iran." Travel bans, asset freezes and proliferation curbs remain in the draft. Assistant Secretary McCormack "said that he sensed that the differences over the resolution 'were starting to narrow.'"

The Financial Times (12/9, Turner) says the three European powers "launched a new United Nations drive to impose sanctions on Iran, calling all countries to prevent the supply of goods that could help its nuclear enrichment and reprocessing programmes, or the development of nuclear weapon delivery systems." Experts said the latest draft "represented a conceptual reversal from earlier proposals that had called for a blanket ban on nuclear-related goods unless specifically exempted."

The AP (12/9, Gearan) notes Washington "suggested Friday that a deal on imposing United Nations sanctions on Iran is near despite a disappointing round of talks among world powers earlier this week." McCormack "indicated the United States does not have unlimited patience for what have already been drawn-out negotiations among the [UNSC's] permanent members and Germany over Tehran's nuclear program." The AP says Iran "was on the agenda for a meeting between" Rice and Russian National Security Advisor Igor Ivanov yesterday. A separate AP (12/9, Lederer) piece says the latest draft is "narrowing sanctions on Iran," but notes the UNSCR "still would ban the supply of materials and technology that could contribute to Iran's nuclear and missile programs" and that "it spells out in much greater detail exactly what items are prohibited."

BBC.com (12/8) adds the "draft details which materials Iran would be banned from acquiring under possible Security Council sanctions. It also threatens Iran with unspecified actions if it does not suspend its enrichment of uranium, but is narrower in scope than previous drafts."

Lebanese PM Directly Blasts Hezbollah Chief In Public Address. The New York Times (12/9, Bakri, Slackman, 1.16M) notes Lebanese Prime Minister Fouad Siniora "lashed out Friday at Hezbollah's leader, Sheik Hassan Nasrallah, in a deeply personal attack in which he dismissed the sheik's political ultimatums for more power, saying, 'You are not our Lord and your party is not our Lord.'" The Times says Siniora's "decision to go head to head with Sheik Nasrallah in a televised address was a risky strategy [because his] local and regional standing is nowhere near the outsized image that the Hezbollah leader enjoys. But it also reflected how Lebanon's political crisis had spread beyond the bounds of political differences and entered the highly combustible realm of personal animosities between leaders." The Times adds, "In striking back, the prime minister challenged the credibility of Sheik Nasrallah and Hezbollah — or the Party of God — a strategy that would have been unheard of in the early days after the war with Israel… But Lebanon is now divided and angry, and its leaders talk about promoting dialogue — while ratcheting up a heated confrontation."

The AP (12/9, Karam) says Siniora "accused Hezbollah's leader of threatening a coup in an unusually harsh exchange between the two rivals that stoked tensions as the Shiite guerrilla group escalated its attempts to oust the government." He is quoted saying Nasrallah "is threatening a coup and his statements carry all the seeds of dissension and threat." Siniora also reiterated that ongoing Hezbollah rallies "would not force his resignation."

Six-Party North Korea Talks To Resume Next Weekend. The Washington Post (12/9, A16, Kessler, 690K) reports the six-party talks on North Korea "will begin next Saturday morning in Beijing, two months after Pyongyang defied international pressure and conducted its first nuclear test. Such talks have been stalled for more than a year." Assistant Secretary of State Chris Hill "said China, the host of the talks, will make a formal announcement this weekend. The first session is expected to last a few days, then take a break before Christmas." Administration "officials said all sides have agreed that the talks will seek to implement the joint 'statement of principles' issued on Sept. 19, 2005, which was designed to lay out a negotiating road map." The Post says that Hill "has indicated a clear sense of urgency in implementing the agreement. Some Asian diplomats reported that he sought a timeline as short as 18 months, before President Bush completes his term. A U.S. official said Hill and the North Koreans have discussed in general terms how long it would take to implement the 2005 statement."

House, Senate Pass India Nuclear Deal. The AP (12/9, Rosenberg) reports "officials hailed" the House of Representatives' approval of the US-India nuclear cooperation agreement "as the symbol of a broad shift in relations between the two countries. But the deal also highlights some of the limits of the emerging strategic partnership." Undersecretary Burns called the agreement "a major, historic step forward for both our countries," and said it "is the symbolic center of this new strategic partnership between India and the United States." The AP adds, "While the new partnership could further open up a huge market for American companies and give India the energy it needs, it is far more fraught politically." The Senate was to vote on the deal late Friday.

The Wall Street Journal (12/9, A4, Solomon) says Congressional approval of the deal "could open a torrent of U.S. high-tech trade with the subcontinent." The Administration sees the deal "as underpinning an evolving Washington-New Delhi alliance that could help counter China's emergence as a global economic and military power. American companies are set to benefit from potential nuclear-energy deals, worth billions of dollars, and other trade opportunities that are likely to open in the wake of the initiative." The Journal notes that, "if the bill passes, it's likely to be at least another six months before American companies can begin selling nuclear technologies." Both nations "still need to agree to parameters for the types of technologies to be included," and India must negotiation a safeguards deal with the IAEA.

The New York Times (12/9, A6, Mazzetti) says the House "voted overwhelmingly on Friday to cement closer ties between the United States and India, endorsing President Bush's plan to allow American shipments of civilian nuclear reactors and fuel to India over criticisms that the plan could spark a regional arms race." The "landslide vote handed the White House a major victory at a time when the Bush administration's foreign policy is under fire on multiple fronts, and it was another signal that American lawmakers are looking for concrete steps to counter China's growing influence in Asia."

The Los Angeles Times (12/9, Gerstenzang) notes, "Reversing three decades of U.S. policies intended to halt the spread of nuclear weapons, Congress early today approved a long-stalled agreement giving India access to American nuclear technology with limited safeguards to discourage possible proliferation." The Senate "voted unanimously in favor of the deal shortly before 3 a.m. President Bush, who finalized the terms of the agreement during a visit to India in March, is expected to sign it quickly."

The Financial Times (12/9, Johnson) notes the Congressional votes mark "an important milestone in" the two nations' "journey towards a new strategic partnership." A final deal "will end a technology-denial regime imposed on India in the wake of its 1974 nuclear test; mark an abrupt shift in US counter-proliferation policy; and open the door to a wide range of commercial opportunities." The Times adds, "After investing political capital to secure the vexatious agreement, bitterly criticised by non-proliferation campaigners as a reward to a nuclear pariah state outside the Non-Proliferation Treaty, the Bush administration is expected to drive to secure some commercial objectives in India." While the Administration "has not disguised its desire to ramp up military and defence collaboration," the "painful history of US sanctions, which saw supplies of spares abruptly terminated, has left a legacy of mistrust in the Indian defence establishment that is only slowly dissolving."

Indian Finance Minister Eyes Double-Digit Annual Growth. The Wall Street Journal (12/9, A4, Bellman) notes remarks by Indian Finance Minister P. Chidambaram that "India's economic expansion could accelerate to more than 10% annually in the next five years," a "trajectory that puts India on a similar growth path as Asia's other star performer: China." Chidambaram told the Journal that his nation "could see growth climb into the double digits during the period covered by the government's next five-year economic plan, which starts April 1." His "comments echo those of other Indian leaders, who say double-digit growth is within reach, as long as the economy continues to open to private and foreign investment." Chidambaram "welcomed a recent slowdown in inflation. He said that while he would like to see inflation lower, it is in part a result of India's robust growth and still much lower than it used to be." He also pledged that "India will continue along the path of revamping its economy."

House Passes Vietnam, Haiti Trade Measures. BBC.com (12/9) reports the House of Representatives "has passed landmark legislation normalising trade relations with Vietnam." The last-minute "deal also expanded trade relations with Haiti, and tweaked Washington's trade preferences with several states in Latin America and beyond." BBC says the "Congress' failure to pass the bill normalising trade relations with Hanoi" before President Bush's November trip to Vietnam "was seen as an embarrassment" for him.

At Home And Abroad, Chinese Leaders Embrace New Role. A lengthy piece on the New York Times (12/9, A1, Kahn)'s front page today reports, "China's Communist Party has a new agenda: it is encouraging people to discuss what it means to be a major world power and has largely stopped denying that China intends to become one soon." China "has long followed a dictum laid down by Deng Xiaoping" that the nation should "hide its ambitions and disguise its claws," that "China needed to devote its energy to developing economically and should not seek to play a leadership role abroad." China's "tradition of modesty has begun to fade, replaced by a growing confidence that China's rise is not fleeting and that the country needs to do more to define its objectives." The Journal says Chinese "leaders are acting as if they intend to start exercising more power abroad rather than just protecting their political power at home." Internally, "officials and leading scholars are becoming a bit less hesitant to discuss what this all might mean."

Taiwan Mayoral Elections Could Showcase Chen's Unpopularity. The New York Times (12/9, A6, Bradsher) previews today's municipal elections in Taiwan. Noting that President Chen Shui-bian has longed enjoyed popular support in the southern metropolis of Kaohsiung, the Times reports, "So it is a measure of the troubles of President Chen and his party that [the] mayoral race" there "is at least a tossup." Some polls are forecasting "a crushing victory for the Nationalist candidate in the Taipei mayoral election," and, taken with "the hard-fought Kaohsiung race," the results may imply "a significant shift in Taiwan's politics."

Chavez Victory May Bolster Raul Castro's Hand In Cuban Transition. The Financial Times (12/9, Frank) reports Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez's "sweeping victory in" his nation's presidential election "could help to ensure political cover and economic support for the emerging leadership in Cuba as Fidel Castro fights for his life somewhere in Havana." The Times says Venezuela and Cuba "have found a strong synergy, playing off each country's strength since Mr. Chávez won his first election in 1998." Essentially, "Venezuela is using its vast oil wealth and Cuba its human capital to push their anti-US vision of a united, more socially-oriented Latin America at a time of growing restlessness among the region's poor." In Cuba, "the steady oil supply [from Chavez] and billions in revenues from the export of professional services are fuelling an economic boom after more than a decade of crisis." The Times adds that Castro's regime is "now able to point to a way out of the ideological and political debacle that followed European communism's collapse. The lights are back on, decrepit waterworks and transport are being gradually upgraded, new housing built, consumer goods replaced and there is more food on the table."

Mexican Federal Authorities Raid Oaxaca Prosecutor's Office. The New York Times (12/9, A5, McKinley) reports Mexican "federal agents raided the prosecutor's office and state police headquarters on Friday in" Oaxaca state, "where state law-enforcement authorities have failed to arrest anyone in the killings of at least 11 antigovernment protesters and a New York City journalist." Those agents seized "police weapons to determine whether they had been used against protesters in recent months."

Litvinenko Poisoning Continues To Stir Controversy. Continuing its coverage of the radioactive poisoning of former KGB spy Alexander Litvinenko, the Washington Post (12/9, A1, Jordan, Finn) reports Boris Berezovsky, a wealthy opponent of Russian President Vladimir Putin, "is now a central figure in the" case, "the most sensational case of international intrigue since the Cold War." While "detectives pursue the murder case in Moscow and London, Berezovsky is saying he believes Putin is behind it, while Kremlin supporters see dark emigre conspiracies to smear Russia's reputation by engineering a spectacular murder." Berezovsky was a friend and supporter of Litvinenko, and police have uncovered in Berezoksky's office trace amounts of the radioactive substance that killed Litvinenko. The Post adds, "As the investigation widens, the feud between the president and the billionaire remains a prominent story line in the mystery."

The Financial Times (12/9) notes UK authorities investigating Litvinenko's death "postponed interviewing a key witness in Moscow on Friday amid signs that they are struggling to unravel the mystery of who may have been responsible for his murder." That individual is former KGB agent Andrei Lugovoi, who at one time worked for Berezovsky and who this week was hospitalized in Moscow for radiation sickness. Scotland Yard "played down suggestions of an imminent breakthrough last night," and the Times says "the investigation is focused on the meetings Mr. Litvinenko held in a London hotel the day he fell ill."

The New York Times (12/9, A3, Fisher) focuses its reporting on Mario Scaramella, who had lunch with Livinenko on the day he was poisoned and who was released this week from a London hospital after overcoming radiation poisoning. "A slew of news reports about him and his career [in Italy] — which included trying to prove that top Italian politicians in the center-left, including Prime Minister Romano Prodi, are Russian spies — have invariably included unflattering adjectives. They include: 'incurable liar,' 'wannabe 007,' 'braggart,' 'bumbler' and 'swindler,' not to mention 'fool' and 'mental case.'"

The Los Angeles Times (12/9, Murphy) keys on a health department statement that it believes Litvinenko "was poisoned at the bar of a [London hotel] where he met with two other Russians, both of whom now are in hospitals showing symptoms of radiation sickness." The initial focus on the Piccadilly Circus sushi restaurant "has been shaken by medical evidence that seven people who worked at the bar of the Millennium Hotel in London's upscale Mayfair district also have been exposed. The bar has been placed under quarantine."

Incoming UN Secretary-General Profiled As "Courtly And Deliberate." This week's "Saturday Interview" in the New York Times (12/9, A14, Hoge) is incoming U.N. Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon. Ban explains that a professional "misstep" in 2001 led indirectly to him becoming the chief of staff to the President of the U.N. General Assembly. "Courtly and deliberate, with an easy smile, Mr. Ban, 62, is an unknown at the United Nations, particularly compared with the high-profile, globetrotting diplomat he is succeeding. With the exception of his misstep in 2001, Mr. Ban has been almost surpassingly unassuming and inoffensive — noticed, when he is, for his steady record of incremental achievement at the South Korean Foreign Ministry, where he has spent his entire 37-year career." Saying Ban's "elusiveness may be intended," the Times calls him "a loyal and dependable company man" and adds that his "penchant for not stepping on toes and his repeated public expressions of humility during the months that he was campaigning for secretary general have raised doubts about his suitability for the job."

Annan Blasts UN For "Failing" In Darfur. The Washington Post (12/9, A14, Lynch) reports U.N. Secretary-General "Kofi Annan scolded governments Friday for failing to halt mass murder in Darfur, saying that the world has not learned the lessons of Rwanda and Srebrenica, where genocidal killings in the early 1990s defied the global ability to stop it." In his final human rights address, Annan "said the failure to protect civilians in the Sudanese region marked a low point in recent U.N. history. In a speech organized by Human Rights Watch in honor of International Human Rights Day, he faulted the 'shameful passivity of most governments' in the face of a government-backed military campaign that has driven more than 2 million people from their homes and killed hundreds of thousands." He "provided a gloomy assessment of the organization's performance in confronting abusers of human rights during his 10-year tenure. He charged that the U.S.-led fight against terrorism has helped erode human rights standards. He said the United Nations needs to pursue an 'an anti-terrorism strategy that does not merely pay lip service to the defense of human rights but is built on it.'" Annan "reserved some of his harshest criticism for Third World governments that, he said, have mischaracterized the U.N. human rights agenda as 'a conspiracy by imperialist powers to take back the hard-won national sovereignty of formerly colonized people.' He also took an indirect swipe at China and Islamic governments that have defended Sudan." The Post adds that while Annan is credited "with advocating human rights more aggressively than any of his predecessors," his own "legacy has been clouded by his own failure, as the head of the U.N. peacekeeping department, to promote a tougher response to the mass killings in Rwanda and Srebrenica."

The Los Angeles Times (12/9, Farley) says Annan offered "a sober assessment Friday of his own shortcomings as he prepared to leave office at the end of the year, and accused the United States of violating human rights in its war on terror. He also warned Sudan's leaders that they would be held accountable if they didn't halt the violence in Darfur, and urged countries with commercial interests in Sudan to pressure the government in Khartoum."

NYTimes Implores African Leaders To Confront Mugabe. In an editorial, the New York Times (12/9, A18) details the "agonies" facing Zimbabwe. The nation "is under economic sanctions by the United States and the European Union and few tourists go there, so the suffering of its people is largely out of sight and out of mind. Yet things are truly terrible." The "culprit" for these problems is President Robert Mugabe, "a master at the blame game, accusing the West of colonialism and racism when it criticizes his scheme to redistribute white-owned commercial farms among blacks, or the cruel expulsion of 750,000 slum dwellers from cities, or whatever else he does." While the West may be out of options in dealing with him, "Africans could make a difference, if they joined in condemning Mr. Mugabe. For understandable reasons, African leaders have been reluctant to publicly criticize fellow Africans." However, the Times concludes, "The suffering Zimbabwean people are in desperate need of protection, the sooner the better."

Columnist Notes Connections Between Foreign Aid, Remittances To El Salvador. In her Washington Post (12/9, A19) column, Marcela Sanchez highlights the interplay between the Millennium Challenge Corporation's grant to El Salvador and the remittances sent there by Salvadorans working in the U.S. "Salvadoran immigrants are frustrated that their cash isn't reaping more development rewards back home. Although remittances have proved to be a lifeline for thousands of families in extreme poverty, immigrant Salvadorans fear that the money is creating a culture of dependency in the home country." Sanchez agrees with the World Bank that remittances "are 'neither manna from heaven nor a substitute for sound development policies.'" She laments the lack of a "direct connection between the new development plan and the current flow of help," and notes the efforts of Salvadorans in the U.S. to have the MCC dovetail its aid with remittances.

Authors Laud Harper For Seeking Answer To Quebec Question. In the New York Times (12/9, A19), Jean-Benoit Nadeau and Julie Barlow say Quebec separatism has "monopolized Canadian politics for the last 50 years," and note the unanswered question, "What does Quebec want?" With his "nation" resolution, Prime Minister Stephen Harper "has created new ambiguity in the question — all the more interesting since he probably thought he was clarifying things." They add that "French Canadians tend to see Canada as a country made up of two nations, while the English tend to think that 'country' and 'nation' are one and the same." The authors believe "that Mr. Harper has come up with a promising formulation. Most people in Quebec, apart from hard-line separatists, will probably be satisfied by the word nation." Harper "Harper has created either a new basis for talks about Quebec's status or contributed a new weapon to a nastier debate. No one has quite figured out which it will be."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Former Detainees Seek Right To Sue US. The New York Times (12/9, A9, Von Zielbauer, 1.16M) reports, "Lawyers for former detainees in Iraq and Afghanistan argued in federal court on Friday that Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld was personally responsible, and thus legally liable, for acts of torture inflicted on their clients by American military interrogators." The nine plaintiffs endured "beatings, mock executions and painful physical restraints, their lawyers said in court papers. All were eventually released without being charged with crimes." However, "the hearing concerned only questions of jurisdiction and did not delve into whether Mr. Rumsfeld, because he personally approved certain interrogation techniques in 2002 like the use of 'stress positions,' was legally responsible for specific acts of torture committed in overseas military prisons."

US Denies Liability In Torture Case. The Washington Post/AP (12/9, Smith) reports, "The Bush administration asserted in federal court [Friday] that Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and three former military officials cannot be held liable for the alleged torture of nine Afghans and Iraqis in U.S. military detention camps because the detainees have no standing to sue in U.S. courts. Deputy Assistant Attorney General C. Frederick Beckner III also argued that a decision by the court to let a trial proceed would amount to an infringement by the judiciary on the president's power to wage war and would open the door to new litigation in U.S. courts by foreign nationals who feel aggrieved by U.S. government policies."

Judge Weighs Torture Claim Against Rumsfeld. The AP (12/8, Apuzzo) reports about Judge Hogan, "A federal judge on Friday appeared reluctant to give Donald H. Rumsfeld immunity from torture allegations, yet said it would be unprecedented to let the departing defense secretary face a civil trial." The AP states, "Foreigners outside the United States are not normally afforded the same protections as U.S. citizens, and Hogan said he was wary about extending the Constitution across the globe." However, he also "questioned the scope of [government] immunity. He said freedom from torture is a basic right accepted by the United States and all civilized nations."

The Los Angeles Times (12/9, Schmitt, 850K) reports, "The suit is believed to be the first to try to hold U.S. officials accountable for the abuse at prisons." Judge Hogan "himself cited the case of Johnson vs. Eisentrager, decided by the Supreme Court in 1950, which held that enemy aliens being held by military authorities outside the U.S. had no rights under the U.S. Constitution to challenge their detention in civilian court."

Newsday (12/9, Brune) also reports the hearing, saying that the biggest "hurdle" for the plaintiffs is to show that the defendants "knowingly violated laws against torture."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Muslim Convert Allegedly Planned To Attack Illinois Mall. ABC World News (12/8, story 5, 0:10, Gibson) reported, "The FBI charged a young Illinois man, today, with plotting a terrorist-style attack. Allegedly, he planned to attack a shopping mall, with hand grenades exploding trash cans and shooting people as they fled." NBC Nightly News (12/8, story 4, 1:20, Pete Williams) reported, "His target was this shopping center in Rockford in northern Illinois. Today prosecutors charged Derrick Sharieef of planning on setting off hand grenades in garbage cans." Robert Grant, FBI: "He fixed on the date of December 22, on a Friday which he picked because it was the Friday before Christmas and thought that would be the highest concentration of shoppers that he could kill and injure." Pete Williams: "Investigators said he say he met with an undercover agent hoping to trade stereo speakers for grenades and guns. Late last week he twice visited the mall to plan the attack and made a martyrdom video. Offenses say he was not connected to any terror group but they are looking at whether he might have been talking with others in Illinois about other possible attacks, Brian."

The Washington Post (12/9, A20, Eggen) reports Shareef "was arrested Wednesday in Rockford, Ill…after meeting with an undercover federal agent in a store parking lot and trading a set of stereo speakers for four hand grenades, a handgun and bullets, according to an FBI affidavit." The Chicago Tribune (12/9, Bush, Coen) reports, "federal agents and an undercover informant followed him from the plot's outset, U.S. Atty. Patrick Fitzgerald said Friday. Authorities didn't specify how they originally learned of Shareef. … Throughout the plot, he never had any weapons or the money to obtain them, Fitzgerald said."

The AP (12/8) reports, "Authorities said Shareef had been under investigation since September, when he told an acquaintance that 'he wanted to commit acts of violent jihad against targets in the United States as well as commit other crimes.' The acquaintance immediately informed the FBI, officials said."

CNN, MSNBC and Fox News all aired Grant's statement at the Friday press conference live, and all three stations reported the story of Shareef's arrest throughout the day on Saturday. Those reports also included clips of Grant describing Shareef's alleged plot, as well as Grant emphasizing that Shareef was acting alone and had no connections to any known terrorists.

The Chicago Tribune (12/9, Bush, Coen) reported that "federal agents and an undercover informant followed him from the plot's outset, U.S. Atty. Patrick Fitzgerald said Friday. Authorities didn't specify how they originally learned of Shareef. … Throughout the plot, Shareef was recorded spewing hatred for Jewish people and the American justice system, authorities allege." The Chicago Sun-Times (12/9, Korecki) noted, "Should he die before the attack, Shareef made a videotape statement to explain his actions. 'I am from America, and this tape is to let you guys know, who disbelieve in Allah, to let the enemies of Islam know, and to let the Muslims alike know that the time for jihad is now...be strong, oh Mujahideen...May Allah protect me on this mission we conduct...so do not cry, do not mourn for me,' he said, according to the FBI affidavit."

In a widely-distributed story, the AP (12/9) reported, "The FBI says it was tipped by an acquaintance of Derrick Shareef, then recorded the 22-year-old planning to use hand grenades to blow garbage cans into clouds of flying shrapnel in a crowded mall the Friday before Christmas. 'This is a warning to those who disbelieve,' he said, according to an FBI affidavit." The AP added that Grant said in his statement Friday, "He fixed on a day of December 22nd on Friday...because it was the Friday before Christmas and thought that would be the highest concentration of shoppers that he could kill and injure."

Local Officials Miffed At Lack Of Information. The Rockford (IL) Register-Star (12/9, Wiser) reports, "Everyone was glad — unnerved a little, maybe, but glad — that a man with an apparent jihad complex and a fixation on the Rockford area was discovered and in custody before he could do any damage." The Register-Star continues, "Local officials praised the Justice Department for stopping what federal prosecutors say was a 22-year-old's plan to use hand grenades to bomb CherryVale Mall or local government buildings. … But not everyone was happy with how the notoriously tight-lipped U.S. attorney's office in northern Illinois, led by Patrick Fitzgerald, let everyone else in on the news. … 'This morning I'm getting a call from a reporter and on the other line I have the chief of police saying he just had a briefing with the FBI,' Mayor Larry Morrissey said. … 'If we're all supposed to combat terrorism in cities like New York, Chicago and Rockford ... they need to share information with local law enforcement that this was going on.'" The Register-Star adds, "Morrissey said he was 'extremely disappointed' that local law enforcement was kept out of the loop even though the feds were monitoring Derrick Shareef for months. He added that he is going to try and get some answers from Fitzgerald's office on how things could work differently in the future. … Police Chief Chet Epperson said he got a call Wednesday that the FBI was involved in something in the Rockford area, but he said he didn't know any of the specifics until Friday, just as the news was breaking across the country."

DHS Accused Of Violating Congressional Ban On Traveler Risk Analysis. The Washington Post (12/9, A2, Hsu, Nakashima) reports the Department of Homeland Security "violated a congressional funding ban when it continued to develop a computerized program that creates risk assessments of travelers entering and leaving the United States, according to lawmakers and privacy advocates. Although congressional testimony shows that department officials apparently disclosed some important elements of the controversial Automated Targeting System program to lawmakers in recent months, several key members of Congress said that they were in the dark about the program and that it violated their intentions. … Privacy advocates and members of Congress expressed growing skepticism this week about the legality, scope and effectiveness of the massive data-mining program -- particularly the creation of risk assessments on Americans that would be retained for up to 40 years -- whose existence was first disclosed in detail in a Nov. 2 notice in the Federal Register."

Planned Demolition Of New Orleans Public Housing Complexes Sparks Outrage. NBC Nightly News (12/8, story 8, 2:00, Williams) reported, "Now we turn to New Orleans where thousands of people who live in public housing there are facing the prospect of being forced from their homes again. The city's housing authority is planning to demolish that city's four largest public housing complexes, saying Hurricane Katrina made them so damaged and unsafe they're not worth repairing." NBC (Savidge): "New Orleans' four largest public housing complex were built over half a century ago and have never been renovated. Unless you count Hurricane Katrina. Officials say it will cost $130 million to repair them. Instead the government wants to spend $681 million to replace them. With something like this. River Gardens. A mixed income housing development built in the city a few years ago. So why is that triggering this? At recent hearings the issue has sparked outrage. … Many low-income residents see the move as an obvious attempt to limit the number of poor African Americans who can return to the city."

Judge Again Orders FEMA To Restart Katrina Payments. The AP (12/8) reports, "For the second time in eight days, a judge ordered the Bush administration to immediately resume making housing payments to thousands of families whose homes were damaged by Hurricane Katrina." The AP continues, "U.S. District Judge Richard J. Leon said last week that the confusing, often contradictory letters to hurricane victims from the Federal Emergency Management Agency didn't explain why rental payments were cut off. He said that violated the Constitution and he ordered the agency to restart the program immediately." The AP adds, "FEMA appealed that ruling and asked Leon not to force the agency to restart the program while that case plays out. Leon refused Friday to do so. .. .He ordered FEMA to come to court Wednesday to discuss how many evacuees are due housing payments and how the funding will be restored."

Chertoff Says "FEMA Has To Be In DHS." DHS Secretary Michael Chertoff said during a CNN (12/8, Phillips) interview that "FEMA has to be in DHS, because we have to be able to integrate the full spectrum of prevention, protection and response so that we can provide seamless activity in an emergency. What I suggested, which is what the White House raised, is the possibility that when you move from emergency to long-term recovery, years of social services, whether those particular functions ought to perhaps be in hands of a department like HUD or HHS where they basically do social services work. So that wouldn't be removing FEMA, it would be focusing FEMA on its core mission, which is emergency, rather than the long-term recovery issue."

WAR NEWS:

Bush Weighs Options For Iraq After Meeting With Congressional Leaders. Coverage of President Bush's meeting with congressional leaders Friday focuses on the Iraq Study Group report, the options the White House is weighing, and the pressure being put on the President by Democrats and others to make a decisive shift in Iraq policy in line with the ISG recommendations. None of the three broadcast networks led with the story; CBS and NBC opted to open with the Mark Foley scandal, while ABC led with the E. coli outbreak.

NBC Nightly News (12/8, story 5, 2:45, Williams, 9.87M) reported that "the topic, no surprise," of the meeting "was Iraq, and it will dominate the President's schedule again next week as it did this one. The White House now says the President will address the nation on his new plans for Iraq sometime before Christmas. They say most likely the week of December 18."

ABC World News (12/8, story 3, 3:00, Gibson, 8.78M) reported that Bush "met today with congressional leaders, as part of his deliberations about what to do now in Iraq." He "has received the Baker-Hamilton Report; still to come are recommendations from the nation's top military commanders." ABC (Karl) added, "The Pentagon has not completed its review of Iraq strategy yet. But sources familiar with the review tell ABC News that the military is likely to recommend that the President change the primary mission of US forces in Iraq from combating insurgents to training and supporting Iraqi troops. The plan for the US forces seems to mirror the one suggested by the Iraqi Study Group. But there's a big difference. Under the Iraqi Study Group plan, combat troops now in Iraq would start coming home. Under the Pentagon plan, those combat troops would remain in Iraq but with a new mission. Entire companies of US combat forces, units of about 150 troops, would be embedded in Iraqi army and police battalions."

The Administration's focus on options coming from the various reports gets front-page coverage from the Washington Post (12/9, Wright, Baker, 690K). The Post says the White House "is groping for a viable new strategy for the president to unveil by Christmas, with deliberations now focused on three main options to redefine the U.S. military and political engagement, according to officials familiar with the debate. The major alternatives include a short-term surge of 15,000 to 30,000 additional U.S. troops to secure Baghdad and accelerate the training of Iraqi forces. Another strategy would redirect the U.S. military away from the internal strife to focus mainly on hunting terrorists affiliated with al-Qaeda. And the third would concentrate political attention on supporting the majority Shiites and abandon U.S. efforts to reach out to Sunni insurgents."

The New York Times (12/9, A9, Rutenberg, Hulse, 1.16M) also reports that President Bush is pursuing "a flurry of conspicuous consultation" next week, but puts the story inside the A section, not on the front page. The White House "continued to face questions about how it planned to address 79 recommendations for Iraq proposed by the Iraq Study Group, whose bipartisan report included a grim analysis of the president's approach to the war."

The Los Angeles Times (12/9, McManus, Barnes, 850K) says the President "said Friday that he's willing to change U.S. 'tactics' in Iraq once he hears recommendations from his military and diplomatic advisors, but he doesn't intend to scale back his basic goals." Both the Los Angeles Times and the New York Times quote incoming Senate Majority Whip Richard Durbin as being "disappointed" that Bush was contemplating "changing some tactics."

AFP (12/8, Collinson) also says "pressure is building on Bush," and the President "will likely "announce the strategy before Christmas."

ISG Report Urges US To Engage Unfriendly Shiite Clerics. The AP (12/8, Hendawi) reports in a skeptical article, "The Iraq Study Group is urging Washington to push for direct contacts with two key Shiite clerics who have made clear they want nothing to do with the United States. Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani and Muqtada al-Sadr, who have vast influence among Iraq's majority Shiites, would lose credibility if they talk to the Americans." The report's recommendation of US discussion with the clerics "appeared to pay little heed to the fine line the clerics must tread to avoid falling victim to the political treachery of today's Iraq, where something as inconsequential as a casual greeting to a U.S. soldier can sometimes mean death at the hands of insurgents."

Kurds Call ISG Report "Unrealistic." BBC.com (12/9) reports, "The leader of Iraq's Kurdish region says the US Iraq Study Group report is 'unrealistic and inappropriate'. Massoud Barzani expressed skepticism about "plans to involve Iraq's neighbours in peace efforts, and for any weakening down of the Kurds' effective autonomy." Jalal Talabani, "Iraq's Kurdish president," then "said he agreed with Mr Barzani."

Brownback Praises Work Of ISG. Sen. Sam Brownback said on MSNBC's Hardball (12/8, Barnicle), "I think the Baker-Hamilton commission gives us a starting point to put together a bipartisan approach that hopefully both political parties in this country -- and that can gather global support, particularly important regional support. … I also think you're going to have to look somewhere down the road to get to a political equilibrium in Iraq. You're going to have to have dominant probably Shiite, Sunni, and Kurdish areas. … It's not cut and run. It's not stay the course. It is that before we face the electorate again in 2008 there is a substantially different situation and it's conveyed to the Iraqis, look, we're not in this forever."

FT Calls Baker "Candid Friend" Of Bush Family. The Financial Times (12/8, Luce) reports in a positively nuanced article on James Baker, "Mr Baker was the obvious choice to advise George W. Bush on ways out of the Iraqi morass. Among Democrats, Mr Baker's reputation as a skilled diplomat in an era where diplomacy has been sidelined gave him credibility." The "core message" of the report "was uncomplimentary to [Bush's] most cherished principles, even if it was rendered with bipartisan civility." The Financial Times says that Bush's "complex motivations for invading Iraq reportedly comprised a burning desire to complete his father's – and Mr Baker's – unfinished business from the first Gulf war in 1991. It was also driven by the goal of democratising the broader region." Baker's report has been criticized, but "praise for Mr Baker's report still outweighs criticism."

Dowd Imagines Bush Family "Intervention." In her New York Times (12/9, A19, 1.16M) column, Maureen Dowd imagines an argument among George H. W. Bush, President Bush, James Baker, and others: "Junior is trying to wriggle away completely, offering a decidedly cool response to the attempt to yank him into the reality-based community. He is loath to give up his gunslinger pose to go all diplo. He cleaves to the neocon complaint that it is the realists who are now being unrealistic.

Noonan Sees Anguish Over War In Tears Of Elder Bush. In her column for the Wall Street Journal (12/9, 2.04M), Peggy Noonan writes of former President Bush's tears during a speech honoring Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, "Think of what a loaded moment in history it was for Bush the elder. ... To know his son George had (with the best of intentions!) been wrong in the great decision of his presidency -- stop at Afghanistan or move on to Iraq? -- and was now suffering a defeat made clear by the report; to love that son, and love your country, to hold these thoughts, to have them collide and come together -- this would bring not only tears, but more than tears."

Iraqis, US Differ On Identity Of Those Killed In Raids. The New York Times (12/9, A8, Tavernise, 1.16M) gives equal weight in its lead to the US and Iraqi version of casualties, saying, "The only thing that was clear from the accounts of Friday's airstrike by American forces north of Baghdad was that at least 20 Iraqis had been killed. But typical of the fog of war here, American and Iraqi officials disagreed on just about every other point." The US identified the dead as "all ... Al Qaeda," while Iraqi officials "said that the deceased were two extended families that included as many as 10 children." Instead of the US total of 20, the Iraqis gave numbers ranging from 22 to 32. The Times adds, "As the situation in Iraq deteriorates, counting deaths and the numbers of attacks here has become a difficult — and politically charged — business."

The Washington Post (12/9, Trejos, 690K) puts the US military's account in the lead sentence, saying, "U.S.-led coalition forces killed 20 suspected insurgents during a raid targeting al-Qaeda in Iraq fighters northwest of Baghdad on Friday morning, the U.S. military said. Two women were among the suspects killed, the military said. ... Amir Alwan, mayor of Ishaqi, disputed the military's account, saying that 10 men, 4 women and 10 children in his village were killed. News agencies published what they said were photos of dead children at the site. The military denied that civilians and children were killed." The Post adds, "This is not the first time residents of Ishaqi have accused American troops of misconduct. This spring, a U.S. military investigation cleared U.S. soldiers of killing 11 civilians before calling for an airstrike in a March 15 raid on a suspected insurgent hideout."

The AP (12/8, Gamel) places the US and Iraqi version in successive sentences, saying, "U.S.-led coalition forces killed 20 insurgents, including two women, Friday in fighting and airstrikes that targeted al-Qaeda in Iraq militants northwest of Baghdad, the military said. The mayor of the village, which was the site of a U.S. raid earlier this year, said 19 civilians were killed, including seven women and eight children." The AP adds, like the Washington Post, that "a

U.S. military investigation cleared American soldiers of misconduct in a March 15 raid" in the same village.

Troops In Iraq Caught Between Sects. ABC World News (12/8, story 4, 2:45, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "The debate in Washington about future strategy for Iraq has overshadowed for the President, the operations going on day-to-day in Iraq. For US troops in the country, the mission doesn't change, for now." ABC (Harris): "The 11-hour sweep started at 3:00 a.m. With targeted raids on the homes of suspected insurgents. These soldiers have no idea what they're going to find on the other side of the door. ... This man, crying, told me the Shiite Mahdi militia had killed his wife and son just days earlier. ... They say Iraq is grave and deteriorating. Does that jibe with what you're seeing?" Michael Robinson, Sgt 1st Class, US Army: "It is bad. But personally, I don't believe now it's not unrecoverable. I still see people with lights in their eyes, the hope."

Zarqawi Allegedly Believed Shiites Were More Dangerous Than US Forces. The AP (12/8, Sinan) reports, "The slain terror leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi purportedly believed that Iraq's Shiite Muslims were more dangerous than U.S. forces and more evil than dictator Saddam Hussein, according to a posthumous interview published Friday on the Internet." The 33-page statement "could not be immediately authenticated. It was posted on a Web site known to be a clearing-house for al-Qaida material." The site "did not explain why the terror group had decided to release it six months after his death." Zarqawi "is quoted as saying the leader of Iraq's Shiites, Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, is a 'satan' who publicly tells Shiites to stay above the violence but secretly tells them to attack."

Sunni Clerics' Group Will Boycott Reconciliation Talks. AFP (12/9) reports, "Iraq's leading Sunni clerics' organization will boycott a national reconciliation conference called by Shiite Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki to end sectarian bloodletting, it has said. The Muslim Scholars' Association said it had not received an invitation to the meeting, which is to be held on December 16," but a spokesman added, "We have seen in the past more than once that the government signs some agreements and later goes back on it." AFP adds, "The head of the association, Sheikh Hareth al-Dhari, is currently outside Iraq. The government has opened a criminal investigation against him for allegedly inciting sectarian violence against Iraq's Shiite majority."

Coalition Forces Arrest Al Sadr Aide. AFP (12/9) reports, "US and Iraqi forces arrested Shiite radical leader Moqtada al-Sadr's representative in the central city of Kut and seven of his guards, a security official and a Sadr spokesman has said." The arrestee was "Sheikh Yahya Ahmed al-Khafaji, the head of Sadr's movement in Kut, 175 kilometres (110 miles) southeast of Baghdad." AFP reports that the US "has often targeted supporters of Sadr, whose Mahdi Army militia is accused of killing Sunni Arab civilians amid the sectarian bloodshed gripping Iraq."

Smith Turns Against Bush Policy On Iraq. CNN's The Situation Room (12/8, Blitzer) reported, "President Bush has been getting attacked by Iraq critics on numerous fronts, from anti-war Democrats to the bipartisan Study Group that issued its stinging report this week. And now a Republican senator has done an about-face and has unleashed a powerful rebuke of Mr. Bush's Iraq policy." CNN (Crowley) added, "Since the beginning of the Iraq War up to now, President Bush has been able to rely on a fairly big base of Republican lawmakers to support him. He no longer can. The Republican senator from Oregon described himself as a quiet supporter of the Iraq War. He is neither any longer." Sen. Gordon Smith: "I, for one, am at the end of my rope when it comes to supporting a policy that has our soldiers patrolling the same streets in the same way, being blown up by the same bombs, day after day. That is absurd. It may even be criminal." Crowley: "Et tu, Gordon Smith. It happened quietly, in the early evening, just before the year end recess. Smith, who has a reputation for bringing passion to the Senate floor, brought that in an unblinking brutal assessment about the situation on the ground, prewar intelligence and the President. … It is the first defection from what has been a reliable roster of Republicans supporting the Iraq War. … Aides say that a dozen of the Senate's Republican colleagues have approached him with positive responses, including, they say, one extremely conservative senator who told Smith: 'That's how I feel.'"

The Washington Post (12/9, A12, Ricks) reports that Smith, "who has shown some maverick tendencies in the past, such as when he blocked the 2005 budget resolution until his GOP colleagues agreed to add billions of dollars to Medicaid, said that he had 'tried to be a good soldier. … I have tried to support our president.' He said that Bush 'is not guilty of perfidy, but I do believe he is guilty of believing bad intelligence and giving us the same.' He said he would not have voted in favor of invading Iraq had he known what he knows now."

Durbin Says Smith Speech "Came From The Heart." Sen. Richard Durbin said on CNN's The Situation Room (12/8, Blitzer) that Smith "is widely respected. He's a thoughtful man. He's an independent thinker. I know that what he read on the Senate floor is something he personally wrote. I actually went up to him ahead of time, I didn't know the topic of the speech, and I saw that he'd written it out in his own hand. It came from the heart. And when he says that he believes this must come to an end, I know it's heartfelt. And when he says that it's gone beyond limit of making a bad policy decision, I think he's right."

Car Bomb Kills Five In Karbala. AFP (12/9) reports, "A powerful car bomb has killed at least five people and wounded dozens more close to one of Iraq's holiest Shiite shrines in the central city of Karbala. .... The attack will probably be blamed on Sunni extremists and came hot on the heels of a call by Shiite Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki for a reconciliation conference to stem raging sectarian violence." In addition to a Sunni group's planned boycott of the December 16 reconciliation conference, "Shiite leaders have also warned that they will not attend if figures linked to the Baath party of ousted president Saddam Hussein -- some of whom have roles in the insurgency -- are invited."

UK, Danish Troops Stage Largest Raid In Basra "Since War Began." The Los Angeles Times (12/9, Fiske, 850K) reports, "About 1,000 British and Danish troops staged a major raid Friday in Basra, Iraq's second-largest city, detaining five tribal leaders with ties to Shiite militias, British officials said." The raid "was the largest in Basra since the 2003 U.S.-led invasion that toppled Saddam Hussein's government," according to a UK spokesman. It was "was part of an effort by the British ... to suppress fighting among Shiite groups and tribes in the area." The Times states, "British troops in the region, who number about 7,300, usually conduct raids in smaller, more nimble groups of about 250 ... This time, the 1,000 soldiers split up into groups to seize the five men simultaneously at their homes, preventing them from alerting one another and going into hiding for weeks."

Engaging Damascus Could Aid US In Iraq, But Hurt Ties To Israel. Continuing reporting on the Iraq Study Group's recommendations, the Wall Street Journal (12/9, A4, Dreazen, King, 2.04M) says that "Iraq's civil war is sparking calls for the U.S. to reach out to Syria, raising the possibility of a U.S. policy shift that could put Washington on a collision course with Israel." The Baker-Hamilton Commission said "it is critical for the U.S. to find a way of persuading Syria to abandon its close ties with Iran and drop its support for Hezbollah and other militants," suggesting Washington should "offer Damascus a series of economic and political incentives, including America's help in pressuring Israel to relinquish the disputed Golan Heights. The approach would be a high-stakes turnaround for the Bush administration that would be certain to anger Washington's closest ally in the Middle East," however, some experts "argue that there may be no other choice. They say a decision by Syria to use its influence over Iraq's Sunni population to help calm the situation there -- paired with Syrian moves to end support to Islamic-militant groups like Hamas -- could significantly improve conditions in Iraq and across the region."

An AP (12/9, Gearan) piece reports Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "voiced skepticism on Friday over [the] recommendation that the United States seek Iran and Syria's help to stabilize Iraq, saying they should want to take such steps on their own." She is quoted saying, "Let's remember that the issue here is behavior. Can you change the behavior of these states?" The AP continues, "Of the Baker-Hamilton report, Rice said it was 'a very good report by people that I admire. I think they have done a great service in pointing out, through analysis and recommendations, how they see the situation in Iraq.'"

Iraq Watchdog Agency Survives. The New York Times (12/9, A10, Glanz, 1.16M) reports, "After weeks of legislative maneuvering, the House passed a bill on Friday extending the life of a federal oversight agency that will now have the authority to examine $32 billion in American taxpayer expenditures on reconstruction in Iraq through approximately 2008." A White House spokeswoman "said President Bush intended to sign the bill." The Times reports, "In a provision backed by Representative Duncan Hunter, Republican of California, the office would have been forced to begin shutting down soon and handing its duties over to offices at the Pentagon and the State Department. Opponents of that move doubted that Bush administration agencies would be sufficiently motivated to investigate themselves, a contention that Pentagon and State officials dismissed. But after the bipartisan Iraq Study Group recommended Wednesday that the special inspector general be maintained for as long as American financial assistance was flowing to Iraq, there was swift action on the new House and Senate bills."

Iraqi Violence Targets Schools. CBS Evening News (12/8, story 3, 2:45, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "In Iraq today, coalition forces staged a deadly raid northwest of Baghdad. They traded gunfire with alleged Al Qaeda members in a residential neighborhood then called in airstrikes. More than 20 people were killed. But these days, much of the violence involves Iraqis killing other Iraqis. And ... terrorists have new targets: schools." CBS (Palmer): "These are just some of the death threat notices distributed by Sunni insurgents to school and universities across Baghdad. They warn that students and professors will be assassinated. But they go further. They say that taxi drivers and bus drivers who even carry student passengers will be killed, too. The threats have dramatically cut down on class sizes at Baghdad University. But they haven't scared all the students. 'Most of our professors still show up' says this woman. 'So I'm determined to finish my year.'"

Iraqis Near Deal On Oil Revenue Split. The New York Times (12/9, A1, Wong, 1.16M) reports, "Iraqi officials are near agreement on a national oil law that would give the central government the power to distribute current and future oil revenues to the provinces or regions, based on their population, Iraqi and American officials say." The measure "could help resolve a highly divisive issue that has consistently blocked efforts to reconcile the country's feuding ethnic and sectarian factions. Sunni Arabs, who lead the insurgency, have opposed the idea of regional autonomy for fear that they would be deprived of a fair share of the country's oil wealth, which is concentrated in the Shiite south and Kurdish north." However, "Officials cautioned that this was only a draft agreement, and that it could still be undermined by the ethnic and sectarian squabbling that has jeopardized other political talks," saying that the key obstacle was "the issuing of contracts for developing future oil fields."

Prosecutors Of Oil For Food Violators Are Called "Lazy." The Financial Times (12/9, Williamson, Jones) reports, "State prosecutors are dragging their feet investigating corruption in the Iraq oil-for-food programme, according to one of the authors of last year's United Nations report on one of the world's largest bribery scandals." Mark Pieth "told the Financial Times that prosecutors in many countries were too career-minded, too unwilling to enter new legal terrain "and sometimes simply lazy'." The FT adds, "Prosecutors in various countries have complained of the unclear legal basis for prosecuting the 2,200 companies named as law-breakers in the Volcker report. But Mr Pieth said the investigations were 'straightforward legal work'."

Iraqis Line Up To Execute Saddam. The New York Times (12/9, Semple, 1.16M) reports in a front page article, "The death sentence against Mr. Hussein is still under review by an appeals court, but hundreds of people have already started lobbying the prime minister's office for the position" of Saddam's executioner. They "have sent messages through cabinet officials and their assistants, and by way of government guards and clerical workers."

Medic Killed In Iraq Profiled. ABC World News (12/8, story 9, 3:30, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Finally tonight, our 'Person of the Week,' a US medic in Iraq, doing what medics do. Only in this case, he turned his military mission into a humanitarian one, using his skills to save a young girl who had no other hope." Maureen Walsh, Chris Walsh's mother: "He was always looking for life's journey, his life work, and he said, "I think I found what I want to do." he said, "when I come home, I'm going to turn around and go right back." Gibson: "Navy Corpsman Chris Walsh was a medic assigned to a Marine weapons company. ... The baby, just 2 months old, called Mariam, had been born with a rare intestinal abnormality, vital organs exposed outside of her tiny body. ... Walsh asked the platoon to make Mariam's cause their mission -- to find her medical help in the United States. ... Then on September 4th, on another routine patrol of Fallujah, another hidden bomb exploded. Chris Walsh and two of the Marines with him were killed instantly. ... Doctors at Mass General in Boston volunteered their services. And Mariam's surgery was a success. Chris' mother knew she had to be there, for Chris."

Afghan War Nears "Tipping Point." The Los Angeles Times (12/9, King, Holley, 850K) reports in a pessimistic article, "The conflict in Afghanistan has entered a dangerous phase, and the next three to six months could prove crucial in determining whether the United States and its NATO partners can suppress a revitalized enemy — or will be dragged into another drawn-out and costly fight with an Islamic insurgency, according to senior military and security officials and diplomats." An anonymous diplomat said that a "tipping point" was approaching. The Times says bleakly, "Popular support for the central government is faltering, and Western military allies are deeply divided over how best to combat the insurgency. On the other side of the fight, the Taliban has regained the strength to dominate large swaths of Afghanistan; government control is tenuous at best in at least 20% of the country, according to several Western diplomats and Afghan officials."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Senate Approves Criminal Penalties For "Pretexting." The New York Times (12/9, Stone, Richtel) reported, "The Senate passed legislation last night that would make it a federal crime to obtain a person's telephone records without permission, an act known as pretexting. The measure, which was approved by unanimous consent last night and is similar to a bill passed earlier in the House, imposes a fine of up to $250,000 and imprisonment of up to 10 years for duping telephone companies into divulging the calling records of private individuals. The penalties can go up under special circumstances, like cases involving domestic abuse." It "includes penalties and a prison sentence of up to 10 years for individuals who sell or buy phone records knowing the lists were obtained through deceptive means. Passage, which came just days before the conclusion of the Republican-led Congress, is a victory for privacy advocates and regular phone users concerned about the confidentiality of their records."

HP Agreed To Fund Future Pretexting Investigations In Settlement. In his "Morning Brief" on the Web site of the Wall Street Journal (12/8) Joseph Schuman wrote, "Hewlett-Packard may have admitted no wrongdoing, but the technology giant's settlement with the state of California is all about recognizing the unscrupulous nature of pretexting. To settle the state's civil suit over its use of investigators to improperly obtain the phone records of board members, some employees and journalists, H-P agreed to pay $14.5 million -- and $13.5 million of that goes to fund state and local investigations of similar fraudulent practices, as the San Jose Mercury News reports

Investors "Shrugged Off" HP Spying Scandal. The AP (12/8, Robertson) reported, "Investors have largely shrugged off Hewlett-Packard Co.'s boardroom spying scandal, dismissing the brouhaha surrounding the company as immaterial to its day-to-day operations and stellar earnings growth in recent months. That was true again on Thursday, when HP's stock price remained largely unmoved after the company and the state Attorney General Bill Lockyer announced that HP would pay $14.5 million to settle a civil claim centered on the dicey tactics used in the investigation. … Analysts said the penalty was relatively minor and would go a long way toward assuaging fears among skittish investors."

Microsoft, HP, Other Companies To Press For Data-Privacy Laws. The AP (12/8) reported, "Microsoft Corp. (MSFT), Hewlett-Packard Co. (HPQ) and other high-tech companies are preparing to push for data-privacy legislation next year to replace what they consider an outdated patchwork of state and federal laws that are inconsistent and burdensome. … Several recent high-profile breaches of consumers' personal information have made consideration of privacy proposals more likely, [Microsoft lawyer Ira] Rubinstein said. The Social Security numbers and medical data of approximately 930,000 people were compromised this June, for example, when computer equipment belonging to insurance provider American International Group Inc. was stolen."

Plaintiffs Dealt Setbacks In Two Securities Cases. The Wall Street Journal (12/9, B3, Hudson) reports, "The plaintiffs' securities bar was dealt several blows in the past few days. … Tuesday, plaintiff's attorneys were thwarted in their efforts to win class-action status in a suit alleging fraud among investment banks in underwriting new stock offerings. … Then on Thursday the Supreme Court agreed to consider overturning a plaintiff-friendly ruling out of the New York appeals court that Wall Street underwriters could be subject to private antitrust lawsuits." The Journal continues, "The court cases are related: Both involve allegations of bad behavior in IPOs during the dot-com bubble. The Tuesday case accuses 55 Wall Street firms of requiring investors who got shares of hot IPOs to buy more shares once trading began. The practice allegedly inflated stock prices of more than 300 companies, mainly tech outfits." The Journal adds, "The Thursday antitrust case takes issue with some of the same public offerings and alleges investment banks and institutional investors conspired to inflate stock prices in secondary-market trading. … Neither of these decisions was good news for Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman LLP. Melvyn Weiss leads the six-firm plaintiffs executive committee in the IPO securities litigation and serves as vice-chair of the executive committee in the IPO antitrust litigation. Early in the week, Mr. Weiss said he would appeal the ruling in the securities case. As for the antitrust issue, he voiced disappointment that the Supreme Court decided to review it."

SEC's Sarbanes-Oxley Amendment To Refocus Section 404 On "Big Issues." The Wall Street Journal (12/9, Scannell) reported on two upcoming changes that the Securities and Exchange Commission is expected to unveil Wednesday. One of the proposals "will tweak the rules that firms must follow to obey a provision in Sarbanes-Oxley, the 2002 law passed in response to corporate-accounting scandals. SEC Chairman Christopher Cox, a former Republican congressman from California, has fought attempts by lawmakers to alter the law itself. But he has promised ;significant changes' to Section 404, which sets standards for internal corporate controls, with the goal of reducing compliance costs while enhancing the benefit of review. … Mr. Cox says the commission's guidance and a new accounting standard (due Dec. 19 from the Public Company Accounting Oversight Board, the accounting industry's overseer) will make 404 more focused on big issues than tiny ones."

Specter Bill Would Ban DOJ Waivers Of Attorney-Client Privilege. The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (12/9, Sherman) reports, "U.S. Sen. Arlen Specter yesterday introduced legislation that would prohibit the Justice Department from pressuring companies and their employees to waive their attorney-client privileges during government investigations." The Post-Gazette continues, "His bill has support from a wide range of groups, including the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, the American Civil Liberties Union, and the American Bar Association. They fear that the federal government has become too aggressive in its prosecutions of corporate wrongdoing following scandals at Enron and WorldCom." The Post-Gazette adds, "In 2003, then-Deputy Attorney General Larry Thompson issued a memorandum that gave federal prosecutors the option of taking a softer approach with companies that reveal information on internal discussions between attorneys and executives. But the memo prompted outcries among companies and legal groups who feared a dilution of a basic constitutional right. … 'It's a very, very chilling effect,' Mr. Specter said yesterday. 'If you can't talk freely to your lawyer, you're in deep trouble.'" The Post-Gazette notes, "He was joined by Dick Thornburgh, a former U.S. attorney general and Pennsylvania governor, who was representing the American Bar Association. … 'The attorney-client privilege is one of the oldest privileges in the law. It dates back to Elizabethan times,' he said. He argued that the Justice Department's policy may unintentionally weaken federal prosecutions of corporate crime by dissuading employees from seeking confidential legal advice. … Brian Roehrkasse, a spokesman for the Justice Department, said the department's strategies had netted more than 1,100 corporate fraud convictions in the last four years. He emphasized that federal prosecutors take the preservation of the attorney-client privilege seriously. … 'We have met with a number of individuals and organizations who have raised concerns or suggestions about our current guidance for investigating corporate fraud,' he said in an e-mail message. 'We are also reviewing the newly introduced legislation. Currently, we have not made any final decisions to amend our guidance.'"

SEC To Offer Initiatives Designed To Increase US Competitiveness. The Wall Street Journal (12/9, A2, Scannell) says that "amid cries from Wall Street, the Treasury and business executives that onerous regulations are blunting the U.S.'s competitive edge," the SEC "is poised to unveil Wednesday two initiatives aimed at easing those fears. The moves aren't likely to be the last." One change "will tweak the rules that firms must follow to obey a provision in Sarbanes-Oxley," Section 404, which "sets standards for internal corporate controls, with the goal of reducing compliance costs while enhancing the benefit of review." A second change "will make it easier for foreign companies whose stocks and bonds trade here to 'deregister' from U.S. reporting requirements."

SEC Has Investigated Possible Leak To Lobbyists On Frist Speech. The Washington Post (12/9, D1, Birnbaum, Johnson) reports the SEC "has looked into whether lobbyists provided hedge funds with potentially market-moving information about a pending congressional speech." Earlier this year, the SEC questioned the office of Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist "about a possible insider leak to lobbyists about a speech Frist was to give on asbestos legislation." The SEC also "looked informally into whether hedge funds, in turn, bought shares in companies that would be affected if Congress approved the bill, which would have settled asbestos civil suits. But the SEC officials said that no charges were imminent and that it was unclear whether providing congressional information could be considered improper or illegal under insider trading laws."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Police Chief's Letter To Jeffs Leads To Misconduct Allegation. The AP (12/9) reports, "The chief law enforcer in two Utah-Arizona border towns is accused of misconduct for pledging allegiance to the leader of a polygamous sect who was on the FBI's most wanted list. … 'I love you and ... know that you have the right to rule in all aspects of my life,' Fred Barlow wrote in an October 2005 letter to Warren Jeffs. 'Without priesthood I am nothing.'" The AP continues, "Barlow warmly addressed Jeffs as 'Uncle Warren' and closed the letter by referring to himself as Jeffs' 'servant.' … Barlow is the police chief of a joint department serving Colorado City, Arizona, and Hildale, Utah. Jeffs is the leader of the Fundamentalist Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, which has 10,000 followers in those two towns." The AP adds, "The FLDS church practices polygamy and congregants revere Jeffs as a prophet and are taught to be obedient, including marrying at his behest. .. .Jeffs was arrested near Las Vegas on August 28. A judge will decide next Thursday whether he will stand trial in Utah on charges of rape as an accomplice for forcing a teenage girl to marry an older cousin. He also faces similar charges in Arizona. … The Arizona Peace Officer Standards and Training Board is using the letter as evidence in one of three misconduct charges against Barlow, who could lose his certification. The Salt Lake Tribune obtained the letter and published it Friday."

Alaska Lawmaker Charged With Seven Counts Of Corruption. The Anchorage Daily News (12/9, Mauer, Demer, Kizzia) reports, "State Rep. Tom Anderson pleaded not guilty Friday to a series of federal charges accusing him of selling his legislative office for $12,828 in bribes from a lobbyist representing private prison interests." The News continues, "Anderson, a 39-year-old Republican who has represented Muldoon's District 19 since he was elected in 2002, was ordered freed Friday by U.S. Magistrate Judge John Roberts on an unsecured $10,000 bond after his arrest Thursday by FBI agents. Roberts said Anderson could travel to Mexico on a previously scheduled vacation next week with his wife, Republican state Rep. Lesil McGuire, who was elected to the state Senate in November, and their infant son." The News adds, "The 18-page indictment against Anderson said the lobbyist was secretly recorded July 21, 2004, boasting that for a price, Anderson would be 'our boy in Juneau.' … A week later, the same lobbyist was recorded telling a confidential informant, 'If I was a Soviet spy and I was looking for a legislator to recruit, (Anderson) would be the one I'd get.' Anderson 'needs the money,' the lobbyist said. … The government didn't charge the lobbyist. He is identified only by the letter 'A,' but the facts in the case point to Bill Bobrick of Anchorage, who represented Cornell Companies, a private prison firm Outside. … Anderson, who did not seek re-election this year and formally leaves office next month, is the first legislator charged with corruption in office since two state senators faced charges in the early 1980s. One, George Hohman, was convicted of bribery in 1981, while the other, Ed Dankworth, successfully appealed his 1982 conflict-of-interest charges and never faced trial."

The Washington Times (12/9, Seper) reports, "Assistant Attorney General Alice S. Fisher, who heads the Justice Department's Criminal Division, said the seven-count indictment returned Wednesday charges Mr. Anderson with two counts of extortion, one count of bribery, one count of conspiracy, and three counts of money laundering in connection with the use of a sham corporation to hide the source of the bribery payments." The Times adds, "The indictment also said that from July 2004 to March 2005, Mr. Anderson, along with another person identified as 'Lobbyist A,' solicited and received $26,000 in payments from an FBI confidential source, in exchange for Mr. Anderson's agreement to take official acts as a member of the Alaska Legislature. … According to the indictment, Mr. Anderson and Lobbyist A participated in the creation of a sham corporation to conceal the existence and true origin of the payments, and used the sham corporation to funnel a portion of the $26,000 to Mr. Anderson. … The indictment said the FBI confidential source was a consultant for a private corrections company located outside the state of Alaska, and Mr. Anderson and Lobbyist A initiated contact with the FBI confidential source in order to solicit bribery payments."

Anderson's Wife, Newly-Elected To Senate, Maintains His Innocence. The Anchorage Daily News (12/9) reported, "Anchorage Sen.-elect Lesil McGuire said Friday that her husband is innocent of bribery and other charges, while noting the things he's accused of happened before they married. 'I am not and have not been a target of any investigation,' she said in a statement issued to the media." The Daily News added, "In her written statement to the media, she asked that the public withhold judgment of her indicted husband 'until the judicial process has run its course.'"

Jury Convicts Former Teamsters Leader Of Rigging Election, Kickback. The Houston Chronicle (12/9, Rice) reports, "A federal jury convicted on Friday a former president of Houston's largest Teamsters local on all counts alleging that he rigged a union election and accepted a kickback from a vendor." The Chronicle continues, "Charles 'Chuck' Crawley was taken from the downtown courtroom immediately after the verdict was announced. … U.S. District Judge Melinda Harmon scheduled a March 23 hearing, when Crawley could be sentenced up to 30 years in prison." The Chronicle adds, "Jurors had heard four days of testimony in Crawley's trial on one count of mail fraud, two counts of embezzlement and one count of falsifying records. He is the fourth Teamsters president in Houston to be convicted on federal charges since 1992, Assistant U.S. Attorney Edward Gallagher said. … Crawley was elected as a reformer in 1997 after his predecessor, Richard Hammond, was removed by a trustee from the international union in 1995. Hammond was sentenced to four years in federal prison in 1998 after his conviction for embezzling union funds. … Assistant U.S. Attorney Michael Wright said Friday that Crawley betrayed union members' trust for his own gain. … The verdict came after a prosecutor told jurors in closing arguments that Crawley had assured a union vendor that he would have the winning bid in return for a $20,000 kickback."

Tennessee Man Pleads Guilty To Child Porn Charges. The Clarksville (TN) Leaf-Chronicle (12/9, Hogan) reports, "A Clarksville man who hosted an Internet chat room called 'Kiddiepics & Kiddievids' that was at the center of an international child pornography investigation pleaded guilty in federal court Thursday." The Leaf-Chronicle continues, "Royal Raymond Weller, 49, who lived in Hunter Chase Apartments on Madison Street at the time of his arrest, admitted to eight counts of conspiracy to distribute child pornography, distribution of child pornography, receipt of child pornography and possession of child pornography." The Leaf-Chronicle adds, "After making his plea in U.S. District Court in Nashville Thursday, Weller now faces between 5 and 150 years in federal prison and will be sentenced in March. … According to a news release from the Justice Department, Weller, under the user name 'G.O.D.,' hosted chats shaped around users' preferences and included promoting the trade of child pornography and evading detection by law enforcement."

The AP (12/9) reports, "He was arrested in March after an investigation involving the Immigration and Customs Enforcement Agency and law enforcement officers in other countries. … He was one of 27 people charged in the ring operating in 10 states and Canada, Australia and Great Britain. … The U.S. Justice Department said Weller had about 10,000 child pornography files on his computer and hard drives."

McCain Bill Would Require Reporting Of Illegal Images. The CNET News (12/9, McCullagh) reports, "Millions of commercial Web sites and personal blogs would be required to report illegal images or videos posted by their users or pay fines of up to $300,000, if a new proposal in the U.S. Senate came into law." CNET continues, "The legislation, drafted by Sen. John McCain and obtained by CNET News.com, would also require Web sites that offer user profiles to delete pages posted by sex offenders." CNET adds, "In a speech on the Senate floor this week, the Arizona Republican and former presidential candidate warned that 'technology has contributed to the greater distribution and availability, and, some believe, desire for child pornography.' … After child pornography or some forms of 'obscenity' are found and reported, the Web site must retain any 'information relating to the facts or circumstances' of the incident for at least six months. Webmasters would be immune from civil and criminal liability if they followed the specified procedures exactly." CNET notes, "McCain's proposal, called the 'Stop the Online Exploitation of Our Children Act', requires that reports be submitted to the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children, which in turn will forward to the relevant police agency. (The organization received $32.6 million in tax dollars in 2005, according to its financial disclosure documents.) … Internet service providers already must follow those reporting requirements. But McCain's proposal is liable to be controversial because it levies the same regulatory scheme--and even stiffer penalties--on even individual bloggers who offer discussion areas on their Web sites. … McCain's proposal comes as concern about protecting children online has reached nearly a fever pitch in Washington. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales gave two speeches this week on the topic, including one on Friday in which he said 'we must do all that we can to protect our children from these cowardly villains who hide in the shadows of the Internet.' … But the reporting rules could prove problematic for individuals and smaller Web sites because the definitions of child pornography have become relatively broad."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Osceola, FL, Ready To Accept Order On Voting Districts. The Orlando Sentinel (12/9, Pino) reports, "After spending nearly a year and a half and about $2 million fighting a federal voting-rights suit, Osceola County commissioners appear ready to abide by a federal judge's order Friday that will implement single-member voting in pending elections." The Sentinel continues, "If commissioners vote to accept the ruling, a special election for two commission seats could be held this spring. A private strategy meeting is expected early next week, commissioners said." The Sentinel adds, "Two commissioners questioned the wisdom of continuing the fight Friday, and two others expressed doubts about an appeal but wanted to wait to hear from the county's attorneys. A fifth commissioner did not return phone calls. … 'I don't see much effort in doing that,' Commissioner Tom Franklin said of an appeal. 'At one point or another, you have to decide if it is worth the battle. It is something we have no control over. You don't keep fighting against windmills.' .. U.S. District Judge Gregory A. Presnell tossed out an Osceola proposal that would have created a hybrid system with five single-member and two at-large commission seats. … The judge accepted district boundaries drawn by the U.S. Department of Justice and approved by the county earlier this week. He also accepted a proposal for which seats would be on the ballot and how elections would proceed."

Former DEA Agent Wins Bias Ruling Against US. The Miami Herald (12/9, Weaver) reports, "A former high-ranking federal drug agent in Miami said a 'great feeling' swelled up inside him on Friday when he won a 4-year-old discrimination lawsuit against the U.S. government." The Herald continues, "A federal jury in Miami found the Drug Enforcement Administration discriminated against Sandalio Gonzalez, the former second-in-command of the DEA's South Florida field office, by retaliating against him with a transfer to another management job in Texas in 2001. … The racially mixed, nine-person jury awarded $85,000 in damages to Gonzalez, 55, of Doral, who had been the DEA's top-ranking Cuban-American administrator. The victory under U.S. law allows his attorneys to obtain legal fees, which could total hundreds of thousands of dollars." The Herald adds, "For Gonzalez -- who stirred controversy in 2000 when he blew the whistle on a Miami drug bust in which 10 kilos of cocaine went missing -- the court triumph was sweet vindication. He had stood up for not only himself, but also other Hispanic and black DEA agents in the Miami field office over issues of discrimination, his lawyers said. … The Department of Justice, named as a defendant in the suit, could appeal the verdict. " The Herald notes, "Gonzalez was among 16 top-level agency executives sent transfer orders on Jan. 18, 2001 -- just before a four-month freeze on such moves was instituted by President George W. Bush's incoming administration. Gonzalez, who supervised about 300 agents in Miami, was ordered to move to El Paso, Texas, where he was the top DEA administrator in charge of 150 agents. Gonzalez, who made $142,000 annually, retired last year and returned to Miami. … Top DEA officials, who testified at the week-long trial before U.S. District Judge Federico Moreno, described the transfer as a 'promotion.' .. But Gonzalez and several others on the transfer list had complained that DEA Administrator Donnie R. Marshall's actions were meant to punish perceived troublemakers and reward his friends before his successor was appointed by the Bush administration."

FCC Commissioner Cleared To Vote On Telecom Deal. The AP (12/9, Dunbar) reports, "The Federal Communications Commission's top lawyer on Friday authorized one of its members to vote on the proposed buyout of BellSouth by AT&T, despite an apparent conflict of interest. The move could break a deadlock on the deal." The AP continues, "The decision came a week after FCC Chairman Kevin Martin declared an impasse in the proceeding and asked General Counsel Sam Feder to determine whether Commissioner Robert McDowell, a former lobbyist, should be allowed to vote on the $84 billion acquisition. … The deal would be the biggest in U.S. telecommunications history." The AP adds, "Feder's action increases the likelihood that AT&T, the biggest U.S. telephone company, will win conditional approval from the FCC within the next two months and overcome the acquisition's final regulatory hurdle, said Paul Glenchur, an analyst at Stanford Washington Research Group. … McDowell, one of three Republicans on the five-member commission, has sat out of negotiations because of his past work as a lobbyist." The AP notes, "The next open meeting for the agency is Dec. 20, but Martin said Friday night that he does not anticipate putting the issue up for a vote then. It would not give McDowell enough time to get 'up to speed' on the issues, Martin said. … In Feder's eight-page opinion, he argued that McDowell should be allowed to vote because he had not participated in the merger proceeding as a lobbyist, did not stand to gain financially from his vote, and that it would be impossible for someone else to take his place in the proceeding. … But Feder was also clearly torn, noting that Robert Cusick, director of the Office of Government Ethics, had said the decision was a close call on which reasonable people could differ and that Cusick said he would decide against authorization but that 'the FCC could reasonably come out the other way.' … Martin and AT&T are betting that McDowell, despite his history, will vote to approve the merger."

WSJournal Blames "Protectionism" For Inaction On Airline Ownership Proposal. The Wall Street Journal (12/9, A8), in an editorial, writes that the Transportation Department "announced this week that it's giving up its effort to liberalize the antiquated laws governing ownership of U.S. airlines. Congressional protectionism, 1; common sense 0. For more than 60 years, U.S. law has barred foreign entities from owning more than 49% of an American carrier, and has restricted foreign 'control' to 25%. In theory this keeps a national-security asset in American hands. In practice it stifles investment and competition at a time when American carriers are experiencing heavy turbulence. Enter former Transportation Secretary Norm Mineta, who proposed allowing foreign investors more latitude to guide fleet composition, route structure and marketing even while safety and security would still rest with American citizens. Alas, 'twas not to be, thanks to a little labor activism and a lot of Congressional territory-marking. Mr. Mineta's successor, Mary Peters, has thrown in the towel."

ENVIRONMENT:

House Passes Offshore Drilling Expansion. The San Francisco Chronicle (12/9, A1, Coile) reports the House "approved a bill Friday to open 8.3 million acres of federal waters west of the Florida coast to oil and gas drilling, a victory for business interests who lobbied for the bill and four Gulf Coast states that would receive billions in new oil and gas royalties. But even drilling supporters admitted it was just a tiny fraction of the publicly owned area they had hoped to open during 12 years of Republican rule of Congress. Efforts to drill in Alaska's Arctic National Wildlife Refuge and off the Pacific and Atlantic coasts were defeated and are likely to be mothballed in the new Democratic Congress." The bill "narrowly survived. The House, on a 207-205 vote, rejected an amendment by Rep. Ed Markey, D-Mass., to require oil companies to repay royalties owed on leases from the 1990s before they could bid on any new leases. The Senate has no time to change it, so the change would have killed the drilling provision."

E. Coli Outbreak Spreading. ABC World News (12/8, lead story, 2:55, Gibson) reported, "Good evening. The most recent outbreak of E. coli food poisoning is spreading. Originally confined in the northeast, it has now spread to other states across the country. So far, there are 293 confirmed or suspected cases in 6 states. All thought to be people who ate at taco bell restaurants. It is a reminder that the nation's food supply knows no boundaries. For the raw scallions suspected to be at fault, were grown in California, but shipped across the country." The CBS Evening News (12/8, story 4, 2:00, Blackstone) and NBC Nightly News (12/8, story 2, 2:00, Williams) ran similar reports.

NYTimes Calls For Stricter Regulation Of Fresh Produce. The New York Times (12/9, A18) editorializes, "The expanding outbreak of E. coli poisonings in New York, New Jersey and several other states underscores the need for more rigorous regulation of the whole supply chain for fresh produce, from the growing fields to the customer."

Mueller Awards Meritorious Achievement Medal To Italian Police Chief. The AP (12/9, Jordan) reported, "The FBI gave one of its highest honors Friday to Italy's national police chief for working a quarter-century with the U.S. to bring down an estimated 1,000 Mafia and other organized crime leaders in both countries." Italian National Police Chief Giovanni De Gennaro, "who at times put sandbags on his windows to shield his family from snipers and whose organized crime officers slept at police stations to remain safe, was awarded the FBI Medal for Meritorious Achievement. The ceremony at FBI headquarters marked the first time the honor was given to an official outside of the FBI's ranks." De Gennaro "said he worked so closely with the FBI and federal prosecutors that 'sometimes I even woke up wondering if I was in Rome or in New York,'" and "he said such international cooperation was valuable to help law enforcement face down threats 'whether it appeared as a mobster or as a terrorist.'"

The New York Post (12/9, Cornell) reported, "FBI Director Robert Mueller credited Giovanni De Gennaro…with forging a bond with the United States that grew into a worldwide intelligence network now used to combat terrorism. De Gennaro first teamed up with the FBI in the 1980s to crack a massive mob-run heroin-trafficking operation involving Sicilian gangsters and their American Bonanno counterparts, who used pizza parlors as fronts. … More than 20 years later the mob has been devastated by thousands of arrests that De Gennaro said came out of 'a deep feeling of friendship [with the FBI] and commitment to fight a common enemy, whether he appeared as a mobster or a terrorist.'"

WPost Urges Bush To Commute Drug Sentence. The Washington Post (12/9, A18) editorializes, "The Supreme Court this week declined to review the case of Weldon Angelos, leaving in place his obscene sentence of 55 years in prison for small-time marijuana and gun charges. The high court's move is no surprise; the justices have tended to uphold draconian sentences against constitutional challenge. But it confronts President Bush with a question he will have to address: Is there any sentence so unfair that he would exert himself to correct it? So far, Mr. Bush hasn't found one. He has commuted only two sentences, both of inmates who were about to be released anyway." US District Judge Paul Cassell, a Bush appointee, "explicitly called on Mr. Bush to use his clemency powers to offer what he as a judge could not: justice."

TAX:

Snipes Pleads Not Guilty To Tax Fraud Charges. The New York Times (12/9, Times) reports, "The actor Wesley Snipes, a fugitive for the last two months while shooting a movie in Namibia, surrendered to federal officials in Florida yesterday and pleaded not guilty to charges of tax fraud and conspiracy." The Times continues, "According to his indictment, by a federal grand jury in Tampa, Fla., Mr. Snipes, 44, failed to file tax returns from 1999 to 2004, and falsely claimed almost $12 million in refunds for 1996 and 1997." The Times adds, "He arrived in Orlando, Fla., yesterday and was arraigned in Ocala, according to the office of the United States attorney for Central Florida. … Mr. Snipes was freed on $1 million in bail. Magistrate Judge Gary R. Jones ordered him released pending trial, and gave him permission to return to Africa to finish his new movie, 'Gallowwalker.' A trial is set for March, and Mr. Snipes is required to return to the United States and surrender his passport by Jan. 10."

The AP (12/9) reports, "Snipes, 44, was charged in October with fraudulently claiming refunds totaling nearly $12 million in 1996 and 1997 on income taxes already paid. He was also charged with failure to file returns from 1999 through 2004." The AP adds, "He will be allowed to return to Namibia to finish his film, but he must return to his home in California on or before Jan. 10, U.S. Magistrate Gary Jones ruled. .. .After that, Snipes will be required to surrender his U.S. passport." The AP notes, "According to the indictment, Snipes had his taxes prepared by accountants with a history of filing false returns to reap payments for their clients. The firm American Rights Litigators would receive 20 percent of refunds from clients, according to the indictment. … Snipes has said he is a scapegoat and was unfairly targeted by prosecutors, and has suggested he was taken advantage of."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Job Approval At "All-Time Low" Of 30% In Zogby Poll. A Zogby International poll of 982 likely voters nationwide conducted December 5-8 (+/- 3.2%) shows that the "national job approval rating of President Bush has plummeted to 30%, an all-time low" in the poll. Bush's job approval is down from 36% in late October. Among Republicans, "just 60% gave him a positive job rating, while 39% gave him negative marks. Just 9% of Democrats and 22% of political independents gave him good marks for his work." The survey "showed that Bush's troubles clearly stem from trouble with the war in Iraq. Just 24% give him positive marks for his handling of the war, down from 39% who gave him a positive rating six months ago for his handling the way. Even among Republicans, a minority -- 47% -- think he has handled the war well (52% of Republicans gave him negative marks for his leadership on the war in Iraq)."

AP-Ipsos Poll Shows 71% Disapproval Of Bush Handling Of Iraq. The New York Daily News (12/9, Bazinet) reports that an AP-Ipsos poll shows that "more Americans than ever say President Bush is doing a pitiful job with the war, and an almost equally overwhelming number of people think Iraq won't turn out to be a stable democracy. … A whopping 71% of Americans disapprove of Bush's handling of the war, while only 27% say he's done a good job. … Just 9% of Americans believe the U.S. will end up with a clear-cut victory in Iraq, the poll indicated, while 63% said they don't think the country will become a stable democracy."

Cheney Called "Forgotten Man" Of Bush Administration. On the US News and World Report (12/8), John Mashek writes in a "Capital View" piece that Vice President Cheney is the "forgotten man" in the Bush Administration, and "he brought most of it on himself. His standing is plunging with members of Congress as a whole, Democrats, some Republicans, and even zealots on the Christian right. For the next two years, it appears he will be struggling to play any kind of significant role in Bush's lame-duck term. He has burned too many bridges to be really effective as a voice in Washington." Cheney is not seeking the presidency in 2008, his "influence in the public domain has hit rock bottom in the past few months," and "his voice on the war in Iraq lacks credibility." Mashek writes that for "reporters who covered the Ford administration, as I did, we are puzzled and even dismayed at the change in Cheney. As the top presidential aide to President Ford, he was a hardworking, helpful, and even cheerful individual. He was a big asset to a struggling, accidental president. With Cheney's help, Ford almost pulled an upset in his race with Jimmy Carter. That man no longer exists."

Rumsfeld Gets Emotional Sendoff At Pentagon. The last Pentagon town hall appearance of Secretary Rumsfeld received extensive coverage. Emphasis was given to its emotional nature, the ovations he received, and his selection of the best and worst days of his tenure. For ABC World News (12/8, story 3, 3:00, Gibson, 8.78M), Jonathan Karl reported, "Today, in an emotional farewell to Pentagon employees, outgoing defense secretary, Donald Rumsfeld, said it will take patience to win in Iraq and Afghanistan." His departure was the second story for CBS. CBS Evening News (12/8, story 2, 2:10, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Meanwhile, at the Pentagon, one of the architects of the war said good-bye. Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld may be leaving, but he hasn't changed his views on Iraq or the press." CBS (Martin): "Ever since 9/11 when he helped pull the wounded from the rubble, Donald Rumsfeld has been Secretary of the war against terror. But for him, the worst day of that war had nothing to do with anything the enemy did." Rumsfeld: "The worst day was Abu Ghraib and seeing that... What went on there and feeling so deeply sorry that that happened." Martin: "The self-inflicted wound of prisoner abuse at Abu Ghraib became a disaster for America's image and a symbol of a mismanaged war."

Fox Special Report (12/8, story 7, Angle) reported, "The only person to have served as US Defense Secretary twice bid a sometimes emotional farewell to workers at the Pentagon. He said that today's town hall meeting will be one of his last public appearances before leaving the post in 10 days. And he wasn't shy about offering last-minute opinions."

CNN's The Situation Room (12/8, Blitzer) reported, "It was candid and emotional. The outgoing Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld saying good-bye to Pentagon employees in a town hall meeting today. He spoke of both his highs and lows and the troubled war that led to his resignation." CNN (McIntyre) added, "Rumsfeld's formal farewell will be a week from today, complete with all the military honors one would expect. But today was his chance to say goodbye to Pentagon employees and for them to say goodbye to him. … Rumsfeld was greeted with a standing ovation as he entered the Pentagon auditorium for his swan song, and he exits the stage unbowed and unapologetic for what critics say were serious missteps and misjudgments, particularly about Iraq. … When he leaves office, Rumsfeld will be about two weeks shy of being the longest serving defense secretary ever, a distinction that will remain with Robert McNamara, who, like Rumsfeld, also left office after presiding over an increasingly unpopular war.

The Washington Post (12/9, Tyson, 690K) reports, "In his final town hall meeting with Pentagon employees, Rumsfeld ranged from serious and emotional to humorous and sarcastic as he mused about his legacy as one of the nation's longest-serving defense secretaries." His ranking of Abu Ghraib as his worst moment is reported, as is his joke that his best day will come "later this month when he leaves office." The Washington Post (12/9, 690K) also carries the CQ transcript of Rumsfeld's remarks.

The Washington Post (12/9, Branigin, 690K) reports that his farewell speech "became emotional at times" and quotes him listing accomplishments during his tenure, such as the creation of Northcom. Like the other Post article, it notes his stated dismay over Abu Ghraib, quoting a paragraph from his remarks about discovering the situation. The town hall meeting "reflected none of the criticism that has been directed at Rumsfeld during his term, notably over his handling of the war in Iraq." Ret. Maj. Gen. John Batiste had "described Rumsfeld as 'arrogant' and 'abusive' and said he disregarded 10 years of war planning on Iraq by the U.S. Central Command before the March 2003 invasion."

The New York Times (12/9, Stout, 1.16M) reports that he "bade farewell ... in his familiar style." He "has a unique place in Pentagon history. He is the only person to have been defense secretary twice. ... The questions from department employees at today's 'town hall' session were gentle ones, in contrast to the news conferences at which Mr. Rumsfeld never bothered to hide his disdain for interrogators he considered ill-informed, cynical, or naïve."

The Los Angeles Times (12/9, Barnes, 850K) reports in a nostalgic vein, "For much of the last six years, a question-and-answer session with Donald H. Rumsfeld was the best show in town." His last town hall is called a "greatest hits collection." On Friday Rumsfeld "used the stage to plead for more time in Iraq," a "regular theme" of his for "much of this year." The LA Times theorizes that his popularity began to decline when he said, on December 8, 2004, "As you know, you go to war with the Army you have. They're not the Army you might want or wish to have at a later time."

The AP (12/8, Burns) reports on his "emotional" farewell, at which he "choked up briefly" recalling a woman who gave him a bracelet "as a reminder of the sacrifices by soldiers of the Army's 172nd Stryker Brigade." He "strode into the room to a cascade of applause and a few approving yelps." More than 140 sites carried the story.

AFP (12/8, Mannion) reports, "An overflow crowd of several hundred people packed a Pentagon auditorium and gave him a standing ovation." He received 'friendly questions" about his tenure. The AFP leads with his urge to listeners to avoid a "precipitous" withdrawal from Iraq.

Rumsfeld Still Serving; Extent Of Clout Unclear. The New York Times (12/9, Cloud, 1.16M) reports in a "Pentagon Memo" that, despite the confirmation of Robert Gates, "when President Bush comes to the Pentagon on Wednesday, Mr. Rumsfeld will preside in the secure conference room known as 'the Tank.'" Gates's swearing is "scheduled" for December 18; "How much influence Mr. Rumsfeld is exerting in the interim is somewhat unclear. Two of his top aides, Peter W. Rodman and Stephen A. Cambone, have already announced their resignations."

House Passes Spending Bill, Tax Cuts, Trade Package. The Wall Street Journal (12/9, A3, Rogers) reports, "Major tax and trade bills neared final passage as Republicans began turning out the lights on the 109th Congress and 12 years of their party's dominance in the Capitol. Working past midnight, departing lawmakers sent President Bush a third, stopgap spending bill required to keep the government operating through Feb. 15. … The $45.1 billion tax cut measure, which includes provisions benefiting oil, coal and health-care interests, passed the House 367-45 late Friday after Democrats narrowly failed 207-205 in a last attempt to disrupt passage with an amendment to the oil provisions. The intricate trade package, which most impacts Vietnam, Haiti and developing nations in Africa and South America, cleared the House hours later 212-184 with prominent Democrats joining in support. The Senate next took up both measures as a single package, and eager to go home, senators agreed to expedite debate in hopes of sending the tax and trade provisions Mr. Bush for his signature."

The AP (12/8) reports, "Rejected by voters and limping off stage, the Republican-led House on Friday passed a sweeping bill reviving expired tax breaks and protecting doctors from a big cut in Medicare payments. But they dumped an unfinished budget on the Democrats about to take power, passing by a 320-70 vote a stopgap spending bill putting the government on autopilot until Feb. 15. … The failure to pass budget bills for domestic agencies, said Rep. David Obey, D-Wis., amounted to 'a blatant admission of abject failure by the most useless Congress in modern times.'"

The Washington Post (12/9, A4, Montgomery) reports, "Throughout the day yesterday, negotiations over the tax-and-trade package consumed lawmakers, particularly in the Senate. With the trade measures under assault, House leaders delayed a vote on that portion of the package and focused first on the more popular tax provisions. … They include a credit for research and development critical to many businesses, a reward for employers that hire former welfare recipients and a deduction for state and local sales taxes paid by people in states without income taxes. If Congress had left town without extending the breaks, more than 19 million taxpayers would have faced higher taxes when they filed in April, said Senate Finance Committee Chairman Charles E. Grassley."

The Los Angeles Times (12/9, Simon) reports, "Lawmakers worked several healthcare measures into the tax bill, including legislation to cancel a scheduled 5% cut in payments to doctors who treat elderly Medicare recipients, and changes that would allow individuals to put more money into tax-sheltered health savings accounts, a new type of medical insurance favored by many Republicans. Separately, the tax bill also addressed some unintended consequences of legislation that Congress passed last year to keep illegal immigrants from getting healthcare benefits through the Medicaid program for the poor. Hundreds of thousands of people who were legally entitled to benefits were inadvertently subjected to new requirements that they provide documents proving their citizenship. Some were frail seniors who had never been issued a birth certificate. The changes will exempt several groups from the documentation rule, including federally assisted foster children, certain disabled people waiting for the starting date of their Medicare coverage and individuals receiving low-income Social Security assistance."

The New York Times (12/9, A14, Hulse) reports, "The failure to dispose of the most basic Congressional work sparked recriminations over who was to blame as leaders of the House Appropriations Committee lashed out at the Senate. … As a result of the spending impasse, Democrats will be forced to deal with the leftover money issues as soon as the new Congress convenes in January." The Times adds, "Some frustrated lawmakers said the chaotic ending of the session was fitting, with major legislation assembled behind closed doors by senior lawmakers and then rushed to the floor. That was typical, they said, of how business had been done in a highly partisan atmosphere."

Gregg Claims GOP Is Responsible For "Biggest Budget Buster In The History Of Congress." The Wall Street Journal (12/9, A3, Rogers) reports Sen. Judd Gregg "took the floor and warned his party it was ignoring the lesson of Republican losses in the midterm elections last month." Gregg is quoted as saying, "You just have to ask yourself how we as a party got to this point, where we have a leadership that is going to ram down the throats of our party the under Republican leadership." The AP (12/8) reports Gregg "gave an extraordinary floor speech lambasting his party for losing its way on fiscal discipline and his leadership for jamming it past rank-and-file Republicans opposing the massive measure." Roll Call (12/8, Stanton) reports on its web site that Gregg "tore into his GOP colleagues Friday, accusing the party of being hypocritical when it claims the mantle of fiscal responsibility. Gregg's angry floor speech came after a decision by House and Senate leaders to move a $39 billion tax package using procedural tactics that will shield it from a filibuster. In the speech, Gregg accused Senate GOP leaders of using procedural rules 'against the Republican membership' to block criticism of the bill and efforts by conservatives to change it. … Because of the procedural move, the Senate will likely now remain in session until at least Sunday, though Gregg could force the Senate to remain in town until late Monday or Tuesday if he does not agree to allowing the bill to move forward." The Washington Post also notes Gregg's criticism.

Democrats Block Congressional Pay Raise. The Dallas Morning News (12/9, Gillman) reports Democrats "stalled a congressional pay raise Friday, demanding a minimum wage hike first – a move derided even by Texas Republicans willing to freeze lawmakers' salaries. 'I have voted for some, and I've voted against some. I would be inclined to vote against it this year,' said Sen. John Cornyn, R-Texas, expressing annoyance that Democrats were trying to link the issues. 'I think they are politically posturing.' House and Senate Democratic leaders threatened to block a last-minute flurry of legislation unless both chambers agreed to avert a 2 percent raise that would take effect Jan. 1.

GOP Accused Of Leaving Spending "Time Bomb" For Democrats. The Boston Globe (12/9, Klein) reports, "The outgoing Republican Congress has placed a political time bomb for incoming Democrats: Nearly all domestic programs paid for by the federal government are level funded through mid-February with no adjustments for inflation, a situation that probably will trigger cuts or reductions in such popular areas as veterans' affairs, children's healthcare, housing vouchers, and low-income fuel assistance." Democrats "will therefore have to immediately choose between restoring any lost services and their campaign pledge to control government spending. The clash could expose tensions within the party in the crucial first weeks of Democrats' leadership -- and the party's agenda could get sidetracked in a pitched battle over spending priorities."

Congress's Final Days Seen As Evidence Of GOP's Disorder. The New York Times (12/9, A14, Kornblut, Zeleny) reports, "In bursts of giddiness and remorse, members of Congress went through not just the end of the 109th Congress this week, but also 12 years of Republican control. It was the end of an era, and Republicans left Capitol Hill with spasms of amusement, anger and humiliation, at times visibly stunned that power and its trappings had vanished so fast. … They tried — rather unsuccessfully — to wrap up business, displaying a lack of legislative discipline that was a sharp contrast to the machinelike efficiency of their early years in charge." House Republicans "failed to pass an antiabortion measure, struggled to approve a package extending popular tax breaks and decided not even to bother trying to find a solution for the spending bills."

Ethics Committee Wraps Up Foley Probe. The Washington Post (12/9, A1, Weisman) reports the House ethics committee "concluded yesterday that House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert and his top staff probably knew for months, if not years, of then-Rep. Mark Foley's inappropriate contact with former House pages but did nothing to protect the teenagers. Top GOP House leaders also 'failed to exercise appropriate diligence' in the matter, the committee's report found, and tried 'to remain willfully ignorant of the potential consequences of Foley's conduct.' … The report speculated that some officials were reluctant to act too aggressively for fear of exposing Foley's homosexuality or for political reasons. But the ethics panel, officially known as the Committee on Standards of Official Conduct, decided against taking any action against the leaders, aides or House officials involved in the saga, declining even to describe their actions as bringing ill repute on the House."

ABC World News (12/8, story 2, 2:00, Tapper) reported, "After nine weeks of investigating the Mark Foley page scandal, the House Ethics Committee concluded that no staffers violated the House code of conduct." Rep. Judy Biggert, Standards of Official Conduct Committee: "I think we found the truth. We answered the questions that we had to answer." Tapper: "The committee, which conducted more than 50 interviews and depositions, did find a pattern of conduct was exhibited among many individuals to remain willfully ignorant of Congressman Mark Foley's behavior with pages."

The CBS Evening News (12/8, lead story, 2:30, Couric) led with the story, saying "the page scandal may not have cost Republicans control of Congress, but it sure didn't help. And in any case, the House Ethics Committee says they have only themselves to blame. An investigation concluded today that the Republicans had plenty of warning about then-Florida

Congressman Mark Foley's inappropriate behavior with male pages. But the panel says they did little about it for political reasons."

NBC Nightly News (12/8, lead story, 2:55, Reid) reported. "The report also says the Chairman of the Page Board, John Shimkus, was told by a staffer last year that Foley was a 'ticking time bomb.' … The Ethics Committee says no House rules were broken and no disciplinary actions are warranted … Foley himself is still under criminal investigation but much to the chagrin of Congressional watchdogs here on Capitol Hill, it appears to be over."

CNN's The Situation Room (12/8, Blitzer) reported, "This report does go into detail in trying to make the case that just because they're not reprimanding anyone, it should not be seen as an idea that staffers acted properly, or even members of Congress."

The Los Angeles Times (12/9, Levey) reports, "In a coda to a year of political disasters for Republicans, the House Ethics Committee said Friday that GOP lawmakers and staff members for years remained 'willfully ignorant' that…Foley was making sexual advances toward male congressional pages. Driven by political considerations and fear of exposing Foley's homosexuality, they failed in their duty to protect the teenagers, the committee concluded in its report on the scandal. And, the panel said, congressional officials ignored evidence of predatory behavior by the Florida Republican that began emerging more than 10 years ago."

The New York Times (12/9, A14, Zeleny) reports, "The members of the investigating subcommittee, two Republicans and two Democrats, declined to take questions on Friday or respond to critics who said the case of Mr. Foley…underscored a need to reform how Congress policed itself. The findings were presented in a two-inch-thick document, including volumes of sexually graphic instant messages Mr. Foley sent to former pages. Mr. Foley refused to testify, the report said, citing pending criminal investigations against him in Florida as well as his right not to incriminate himself. … The committee said it could not conclusively say why Republicans failed to address Mr. Foley's conduct. But the investigation found that Republicans 'may have been concerned that raising the issue too aggressively might have risked exposing Representative Foley's homosexuality, which could have adversely affected him both personally and politically.'"

Committee Suggests Hastert And His Staff Mislead Investigators. Roll Call (12/8, Bresnahan, Davis) reports Speaker Hastert "emphasized that the panel concluded that no House Member or staffer was aware of the more sexually explicit messages that surfaced after the Foley scandal became public." Hastert "told the investigative subcommittee that he could not recall being told by House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) and Rep. Tom Reynolds (R-N.Y.) about inappropriate e-mails. … The investigative subcommittee 'finds that the weight of evidence supports the conclusion that Speaker Hastert was told, at least in passing, about the e-mails' by both Boehner and Reynolds, the report stated. 'Neither the Majority Leader nor Rep. Reynolds asked the Speaker to take any action in response to the information each provided to him, and there is no evidence that the Speaker took any action.'" The ethics committee "apparently did not believe" Hastert chief of staff Scott Palmer's "denial of any knowledge of the Foley e-mails, and it disputed Palmer's claim that he did not meet privately with Foley or his former chief of staff, Kirk Fordham, to discuss the matter. 'The weight of evidence supports a conclusion that Kirk Fordham talked to Scott Palmer about Fordham's concerns about Rep. Foley's conduct, and that Palmer later talked to Rep. Foley,' the report stated."

The Chicago Tribune (12/9, Dorning, Parsons) reports the panel "cast doubt on Hastert's public insistence that he was unaware of a complaint about inappropriate e-mail messages Foley sent to a former page last year. … The panel blasted another senior Hastert aide, counsel Ted Van Der Meid, for 'an inexplicable lack of interest' when he received a complaint about the Foley e-mails. Van Der Meid had been repeatedly warned previously of inappropriate contacts with pages, including at least one of Foley's visits to the page dorm, the panel found."

Kolbe Said To Have Lied About His Knowledge Of Foley's Behavior. The Washington Post (12/9, A1, Weisman) reports that "perhaps the biggest revelations involved" Rep. Jim Kolbe. The Washington Post "reported in October that one of his former pages had received a sexually explicit instant message from Foley, which the former page had shown to Kolbe as long ago as 2000. After the story appeared, Kolbe said that the contact was with his staff, not him, that he did not see it and that he was unaware it was explicit. Kolbe's assistant, Patrick Baugh, told the committee that the former page had contacted Kolbe directly and that the former page revealed the explicit nature of the message. Moreover, after the Foley matter exploded in the media, the former page contacted Kolbe again to ask whether he should divulge the instant message. He testified that Kolbe responded: 'It is best that you don't even bring this up with anybody. … There is no good that can come from it if you actually talk about this.'"

WPost, NYTimes Assail Committee Over Its Inaction. The Washington Post (12/9, A18), in an editorial, writes, "What, one has to wonder, would it take for the House ethics committee to hold a lawmaker or a staff member accountable? … In a report released yesterday, the panel did a good job laying out the disturbing facts of the case…then, all too characteristically, the committee declined to hold even a single individual responsible for any misstep."

The New York Times (12/9) editorializes, "Watching our elected leaders in action, it's not surprising that Americans wonder if there is any limit to the crass misbehavior that members of Congress are willing to tolerate from their colleagues to protect their privileges and hold on to their own jobs. The House ethics committee answered that question yesterday with a resounding 'No.'"

Reid, McConnell Schedule Closed-Door Meeting Of All 100 Senators. The Washington Post (12/9, A3, Babington) reports Senate Democrats, "who campaigned on a pledge of more openness in government, will kick off the 110th Congress with a closed meeting of all 100 senators in the Capitol." Sen. Harry Reid "announced yesterday 'a joint caucus meeting' for senators only, to be held that morning in the old Senate chamber, a cozy, seldom-used room. The gathering 'will allow senators an opportunity to meet before the Senate is in session and before any official legislative business is considered,' Reid's office said." Sen. Mitch McConnell "endorsed the plan." Roll Call.com (12/8, Stanton, Billings) reports, "Although Reid and McConnell came up with the idea of a bipartisan caucus meeting as a way to bring about a greater sense of bipartisanship in the Senate, it has raised questions about the appropriateness of barring the press from a meeting of the entire Senate during which lawmakers could essentially map out the year's legislative activities for the year in advance.

The AP (12/8, Kellman) reports, "Spokesmen for the lawmakers said the meeting would not amount to a closed session of the Senate under the chamber's rules. However, any meeting of 100 senators with rules of any kind is by definition a meeting of the Senate, said Brian Darling, director of Senate relations for The Heritage Foundation. 'It would be a de facto meeting of the Senate and although they want to call it something else, it is,' Darling said. 'To set up something and to plan something between the leaders is very unusual and should be subject to open government rules,' he added. 'Their intentions are good, but the results of what they're doing will be not good for the American people.'"

Filner To Chair House Veterans' Committee. On its web site, Roll Call (12/8, Yachnin) reports, "After successfully beating back a challenge from Rep. Mike Michaud (D-Maine) on Friday, Rep. Bob Filner (D-Calif.) will become chairman of the Veterans' Affairs Committee in the 110th Congress. The full Democratic Caucus confirmed Filner to the post in a 112-69 vote following a brief meeting in the House Rayburn Office Building. The Democratic Steering and Policy Committee heard from both lawmakers Thursday and voted 24-20 in favor of Filner. But the close split allowed for the full Caucus, which must ratify Steering's recommendations, to nominate candidates from the floor."

VA Health Care Records Success Stories. CBS Evening News (12/8, story 6, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "For decades, politicians have been calling for a comprehensive government plan to make quality health care available and affordable. Well, it turns out that the government already has a system in place that delivers great care at low cost. It's not for everyone, just for those who have served our country." Unidentified doctor: "Good to see you! How are you?" CBS (Andrews): "Eighty-eight-year-old George Sack can go anywhere he wants for health care, but he chooses to go to the VA. ... If his choice surprises you, it does not surprise the experts. In studies, including one by Harvard and in six straight years of patient satisfaction surveys, the VA earned the highest health care quality rating in the country. It is also the least expensive. It's a remarkable turnaround from the old VA."

McKinney Bill Calls For Bush's Impeachment. The AP (12/8) reports, "In what was likely her final legislative act in Congress, outgoing Georgia Rep. Cynthia McKinney announced a bill Friday to impeach President Bush. The legislation has no chance of passing and serves as a symbolic parting shot not only at Bush but also at Democratic leaders. Incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi has made clear that she will not entertain proposals to sanction Bush and has warned the liberal wing of her party against making political hay of impeachment."

Coast Guard Stumbles In Remaking Itself. The New York Times (12/9, A1, Lipton, 1.16M) reports, "Four years after the Coast Guard began an effort to replace nearly its entire fleet of ships, planes and helicopters, the modernization program heralded as a model of government innovation is foundering. ... The problems have helped swell the costs of the fleet-building program to a projected $24 billion, from $17 billion, and delayed the arrival of any new ships or aircraft. That has compromised the Coast Guard's ability to fulfill its mission, which greatly expanded after the 2001 attacks to include guarding the nation's shores against terrorists. The service has been forced to cut back on patrols and, at times, ignore tips from other federal agencies about drug smugglers."

Treasury Report Expected To Show Little Progress In Deficit Reduction. The Wall Street Journal (12/9, A2, Solomon) reports, "Bush administration officials have begun grappling with one of the toughest tasks they face over the next two years: How to both protect the president's tax cuts and put the federal budget deficit on a sustainable path." On Tuesday, the Treasury Department "releases its latest budget tally. The numbers likely will show little progress in shrinking the deficit despite a growing economy. For the first two months of the fiscal year that began Oct. 1, the government is expected to show a deficit of about $122 billion -- $9 billion less than the same period last year." Showing progress on the deficit "is crucial as the White House heads toward early February," when the fiscal year 2008 budget plan will be released.

Strong Hiring, Low Unemployment Give Fuel To Optimism On Economy. NBC Nightly News (12/8, story 6, 2:30, Williams) reported, "The Labor Department reported today that employers added 132,000 jobs to their payrolls last month. At the same time the unemployment rate ticked up a notch to 4.5% as more people got into the labor market to look for work. The economy is creating jobs in some unlikely places."

The Wall Street Journal (12/9, A3, Conkey) reports that "solid hiring and an unemployment rate still near a five-year low reinforced the upbeat view of optimists, including the Federal Reserve, that the economy is weathering the downturn in the housing and automotive sectors. … The unemployment rate edged up slightly to 4.5% in November from 4.4%. Unrounded, the increase was even smaller: from 4.42% to 4.47%." But as the Washington Post (12/9, D1, Henderson) writes, "Sometimes, an uptick in unemployment can be good news." The slight increase was "not primarily because of layoffs. The rate rose as hundreds of thousands of Americans who had previously dropped out of the labor force poured back in, drawn by brightening employment prospects. Most of them found work." The Financial Times (12/9, Guha, Callan, Tassell) says Fed chief Ben Bernanke's "optimism that the US economy is heading for a soft landing received a lift" with the reports.

Crude Oil Down Slightly After Early Jump. The Wall Street Journal (12/9, B1, McKay) reports crude oil futures "jumped $1.16 in morning trading" Friday in New York, "but finished the day off 46 cents, or 0.7%, at $62.03 a barrel, up 1.6% on the year."

Automotive Writer Says US Gasoline Prices Comparatively Low. The "Free Speech" feature on the CBS Evening News (12/8, story 7, Couric) focused on US gasoline prices, with automotive writer Mike Rutherford arguing that "if you believe you're paying too much for the fuel you're paying for your automobiles, you're not living in the real world. In the States you're enjoying pump prices that are among the lowest on the planet."

Lindsey Group's Sumerlin Gives Bernanke "A" For First Year. In a Wall Street Journal (12/9, A8) op-ed, Lindsey Group Managing Director Mark Sumerlin writes, "Ben Bernanke deserves an A for his first year as chairman of the Federal Reserve. The Bernanke Fed hasn't always been graceful or elegant, but it has been mostly right."

FDA Panel Concludes Stents May Be Unsafe. ABC World News (12/8, story 7, 2:20, Gibson) reported, "Leading heart doctors concluded two-day assessment of drug-coated stents. More than 1 million Americans had them implanted just last year. But there are concerns that drug-coated stents may increase the occurrence of blood clots that cause heart attacks." NBC Nightly News (12/8, story 3, 1:30, Bazell) said a special FDA panel said "doctors and patients need to know that when the devices are used that way they can cause blood clots, lead to heart attacks or deaths and said patients need to be on blood-thinning medication for at least a year."

On its front page, the Washington Post (12/9, Stein) reports the panel has concluded that "new drug-oozing stents widely used to prop open clogged arteries are associated with an increased risk of blood clots, heart attacks and death for the majority of patients receiving the devices." The Wall Street Journal (12/9, Winslow, Mathews), also on its front page, says that "the vast majority of patients who have a coated stent won't experience a problem. But in recent months, long-term studies and real-world experience have yielded evidence that in rare instances the newer devices may trigger potentially fatal blood clots, years after they are implanted." The New York Times (12/9, A11, Feder) says the FDA's Daniel Schult "said it was too soon to discuss what specific actions the F.D.A. might take."

NIH Scientist Admits Violating Conflict-Of-Interest Rules. The Washington Post (12/9, B2, Rich) reports, "A senior government scientist who was a focus of a congressional probe into conflicts of interest in medical research admitted in federal court yesterday that he improperly failed to disclose payments of $285,000 he received as a consultant for the pharmaceutical manufacturer Pfizer Inc. Pearson 'Trey' Sunderland III, who was chief of the Geriatric Psychiatry Branch of the National Institute of Mental Health, pleaded guilty in Baltimore to a misdemeanor charge of violating conflict-of-interest rules." Sunderland "was paid as a consultant on two projects in which his department was collaborating with Pfizer on research to identify chemical warning signs of Alzheimer's disease."

NASA Administrator Calls Decision To Build Shuttle "A Policy Mistake." The New York Times (12/9, A16, Schwartz, 1.16M) reports NASA Administrator Michael Griffin "says the current period of space exploration will come to be seen as a mistake. 'Viewed from the point of history several decades out,' he said in an interview, 'the period where the United States retreated from the Moon and quite deliberately focused only on low Earth orbit will be seen, to me, a mistake.' The Times notes that Griffin has made similar comments before and that "this time, his remarks came as he waited for Thursday's down-to-the-wire effort to launch the shuttle on a 12-day mission to rewire the International Space Station. The liftoff was scrubbed at the last minute because of weather concerns."

NYTimes Cautions Against Lunar Base Costs. The New York Times (12/9, 1.16M) editorializes that NASA this week "announced plans to establish a permanent base on the Moon by 2024, explained why we should want to send astronauts back to a world they visited repeatedly more than three decades ago, and described what they might do when they get there." But "what's worrisome about the new plans is their lack of focus. The agency cites six major reasons for returning to the Moon. The most persuasive is to use the Moon as a base to test technologies and operating techniques to be used on future missions to Mars, a more compelling target." The Times concludes, "Our main concern is that the political proponents of the Moon-Mars adventure will not provide money commensurate with the task. NASA's crowning scientific achievements have come from its unmanned probes to distant worlds and its orbiting observatories. It would be a shame if an underfinanced program to return to the Moon on a permanent basis and then venture on to Mars forced reductions in research programs of higher scientific value."

Man Stabs Himself Outside Longworth House Office Building. On its web site, Roll Call (12/8, McArdle, Bresnahan) reports, "At 12:55 p.m. today, a 19-year-old man walked up to the main entrance of the Longworth House Office Building and proceeded to stab himself at least once in the chest in front of Capitol Police officers. After arresting the man, officers found something in a backpack he was carrying that led them to shut down streets near Union Station to search for a suspicious package that he had mailed earlier in the day. By 5:30 p.m., the package had been found and was deemed safe by Capitol Police and Metropolitan Police, and investigators and the man remained at George Washington Hospital under police arrest."

SMU Wins Property Dispute Involving Bush Library Bid. The AP (12/8) reports Southern Methodist University "has won a court ruling that could boost its bid to host the George W. Bush Presidential Library. Federal District Judge Jerry Buchmeyer ruled Thursday that SMU has clear title to a condominium complex that university officials have considered for the library. SMU and two other colleges are bidding for the library. Leon Bennett, SMU's vice president for legal affairs, said the university plans to evict the remaining residents this month and begin tearing down the condominiums."

White House Releases New Barney Christmas Video. The AP (12/8) reports, "Just in time for the holidays, America's best-known Scottish terrier is back with a new video on the White House Web site. It's 'Barney's Holiday Extravaganza,' a production that follows Barney around the White House as he plans a holiday show, runs into trouble developing a plot and then wrangles over his budget with Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson and Budget Director Rob Portman."

LATimes Urges Bush To Avoid Recess Appointments. The Los Angeles Times (12/9) editorializes that President Bush "and his would-be successors — Democratic and Republican — should resolve that [John] Bolton is the last major official to serve under this disability" – a recess appiointment. Recess appointments "are allowed by the letter of the Constitution, but they violate its spirit. … With a new Democratic majority in the Senate capable of sustaining a filibuster, Bush may be tempted to resort to recess appointments — perhaps even to the Supreme Court — as payback for what he would see as obstructionism. He should resist the temptation."

OTHER NEWS:

Jefferson Goes On Offensive In Runoff Campaign. The Washington Post (12/9, A2, Murray, Lengel) reports Rep. William J. Jefferson "was given up for dead politically after the FBI found $90,000 in alleged bribe money in his freezer, and he barely survived a Nov. 7 primary election, garnering 30 percent of the vote in a crowded field of 12 challengers. Now he is locked in a tough runoff with a well-funded Democratic challenger who is using poetry and schoolchildren to highlight Jefferson's ethical woes. Many of Jefferson's House colleagues are privately rooting for him to lose today so his troubles do not tarnish the new Democratic-controlled Congress." Jefferson "has scooped up high-profile endorsements from New Orleans Mayor C. Ray Nagin and state Sen. Derrick Shepherd, who finished third in the primary, while attacking opponent Karen Carter, who finished second with 22 percent of the vote, as too liberal. In one ad, Jefferson declares 'I have never taken a bribe' and dismisses Carter, a 37-year-old lawyer and state representative, as 'an ambitious young woman.'" Jefferson "has attempted to portray Carter as a left-wing fringe figure who supports late-term abortions, same-sex marriage and human cloning."

Romney Draws Fire From Conservatives Over 1994 Letter On Gay Rights. The New York Times (12/9, A11, Nagourney, Kirkpatrick) reports Gov. Mitt Romney, who has "built a presidential campaign on a broad appeal for conservative support, is drawing sharply increased criticism from conservative activists for his advocacy of gay rights in a 1994 letter." Romney's "standing among conservatives is being hurt by a letter he sent to the Log Cabin Club of Massachusetts saying that he would be a stronger advocate for gay rights" than Sen. Edward Kennedy, whom he challenged that year. The "circulation of the letter by gay rights groups in recent weeks has set off a storm of outrage among social conservatives, and by Friday was looming as a serious complication to Mr. Romney's hopes." The "breadth of the letter's language and the specificity of many of the pledges stunned conservative leaders. Many of them had turned to Mr. Romney as a conservative alternative" to Sen. John McCain, "whose position on issues like abortion had been considered suspect."

Edsall Says Romney "Trying To Forcibly Reinvent Himself." In his New York Times (12/9, A19) column, Thomas B. Edsall writes that the "most significant development at this stage" of the GOP presidential nomination race "is the failure of any G.O.P. candidate to emerge as the consensus conservative, uniting white evangelicals, family-values traditionalists, defense hawks, and opponents of the tax and regulatory state. … The two Republican candidates leading in polls, John McCain and Rudy Giuliani, both fail the consensus test. Each stands to the left of the party -- well to the left in Giuliani's case -- on the 'traditional values' issues: sexual mores, family structure, reproductive choice, gay rights, embryonic stem cell research, and so forth." Romney "is trying to forcibly reinvent himself from his incarnation as a Massachusetts governor who favored abortion rights and gay rights — almost as hard a history to surmount in the G.O.P. as the multiple marriages and divorces of McCain, Giuliani, and Newt Gingrich."

Brownback Discusses McCain, Giuliani, And His Own Chances. Asked on MSNBC's Hardball (12/8, Barnicle) if either Sen. John McCain or Rudy Giuliani can win the GOP presidential nomination, Sen. Sam Brownback said, "That's the beauty about the process. It's a lengthy campaign and people examine the positions and then they decide. And don't think you can judge that question at this point in time. They are both great Americans, they're great heroes in this country, but elections are about ideas and the future and that's what I hope to present." On his own bid, he said, "We're in the exploratory phase. We haven't moved this on forward past that yet, but I'm going to be traveling and presenting a lot of ideas and I love the battle and the competition of ideas."

Pataki Suggests He Can Overcome "Obstacles" To GOP Nomination. Gov. George Pataki was asked about his presidential ambitions during an interview with Fox News (12/8, Skinner). Pataki said, "I still have a little over three weeks left as governor. That's what I'm focusing on right now. … Once this year is over, once I am a private citizen, I'll take a look and make a decision." Asked about polls showing him at "two percent or so" among Republican primary voters, Pataki said, "If you did the same type of poll in New York state in 1993 asking about the possible candidates for governor, I doubt if I would have gotten two percent. … But when you have a vision, when you have the ability to articulate and implement that vision, and you work hard, I think I've shown in New York that you can overcome those obstacles."

Some Republicans Second-Guessing Final NRSC Moves. The New York Times (12/9, A13, Kirkpatrick) reports campaign finance reports submitted this week "have led to second-guessing about whether the National Republican Senatorial Committee borrowed too little for its final all-out push for its candidates. At least two Republican Senate candidates lost by just a few thousand votes." The final figures and low debts "left some Republicans grumbling privately" that NRSC leader Elizabeth Dole "had failed to give it her all."

Allen Faults "Distractions" For Turning Virginia Race Against Him. The Washington Post (12/9, B1, Shear) interviews outgoing Sen. George Allen, who says "distractions" helped turn his Virginia reelection race against him. Allen "declined to talk specifically about the controversies that turned what was supposed to be his warm-up for a presidential campaign into a losing bid to hold on to his Senate seat. 'You can't brood and dwell' on the loss, he said. But it's clear -- especially from the football analogies he uses frequently to describe the sudden turn in his political life -- that Allen regrets the mistakes he and his campaign staff made during the past several months." Allen said, "In the event that you lost a game by three or four touchdowns, people say, 'Gosh, it's a blowout.' If you lose by one point in a game, you can look back on every single play of the game." Allen "politely declines to discuss any political future he might have in Virginia," though "friends and political observers" say Allen is "likely to bide his time before attempting a possible comeback, perhaps as governor in 2009."

Kilroy Still Refusing To Concede In OH15. CNN's The Situation Room (12/8, Blitzer) reported that in OH15, "a hand recount is over, and Republican Congresswoman Deborah Pryce still has a 1,055-vote lead over Democrat Mary Jo Kilroy. But Kilroy still is refusing to concede. The rest of the recount will be conducted by electronic machines. Election officials say the final results…should be known next week."

Sekula-Gibbs Leaves "Legacy Mainly Of C-SPAN Video." The Houston Chronicle (12/9, Kim) profiles Rep. Shelley Sekula-Gibbs of TX22, who took office on November 13 and who spent "her last official day on the Hill" Friday. Sekula-Gibbs "spent the past week…delivering one speech after another on the House floor. Her soliloquies, aimed at the House television camera as the chamber was virtually deserted, could have been judged plentiful even in a place where performance art often passes for good politics." She "leaves a legacy mainly of C-SPAN video."

Large Majority Supports Letting Government Negotiate Drug Prices. The Washington Post (12/9, A3, Lee) reports a Kaiser Family Foundation survey finds that the "overwhelming majority of Americans favor allowing the government to negotiate prescription drug prices for the Medicare program, suggesting there will be considerable political pressure on the next Congress to do so." Of the 1,867 adults polled, 85% "said they favored such negotiations, including majorities of Republicans, Democrats and independents."

Jeane Kirkpatrick Dies At 80. CNN's The Situation Room (12/8, Blitzer) reported, "A pioneer for women with political influence has died. Jeane Kirkpatrick was the first female US ambassador to the UN, and she was an unabashed advocate of Reagan-era conservatism, after beginning her public life as a Democrat. Her assistant says Kirkpatrick died in her sleep at her Bethesda, Maryland, home last night. She was 80 years old."

ABC World News (12/8, story 8, 0:45, Gibson), the CBS Evening News (12/8, story 5, 0:10, Couric), and NBC Nightly News (12/8, story 9, 0:45, Williams) all briefly reported on Kirkpatrick's death.

The New York Times (12/9, A1, Weiner) reports that in March 2003, President Bush "recalled Ambassador Kirkpatrick to active duty and sent her to Geneva, said Alan Gerson, who had served as her general counsel at the United Nations. The secret mission, previously undisclosed, was to head off a diplomatic uprising against the imminent war against Iraq."

The Washington Post (12/9, A1, Holley) reports, "For many years a Cold War liberal…Kirkpatrick became a neoconservative in the 1970s and then a Republican Party stalwart. An academic and a public intellectual who never held elective office, she briefly considered seeking the Republican presidential nomination in 1988." The AP (12/8) reports, "She stopped that process short, however, retreating to the position that she would accept the No. 2 slot if asked. She had played a leading role at the party's convention four years earlier — at a time when she was still a Democrat."

WSJournal Remembers Kirkpatrick. The Wall Street Journal (12/9, A8), in an editorial, writes, "The mind's eye recalls the televised image in the early 1980s of Ambassador Kirkpatrick, a Democrat then, seated at the U.N. Security Council table and publicly defending U.S. interests against the Soviet Union with an articulate, no-nonsense bluntness that makes Mr. Bolton sound like Little Bo-Peep by comparison. That style -- American interests made perfectly clear -- will be missed."

WPost Blames Conservatives For Virginia GOP's Woes. The Washington Post (12/9, A18) editorializes, "Virginia Republicans gathered at a handsome resort the other day to lick their wounds and plot their future. Or rather, some Virginia Republicans did -- namely, the party's right-wing, anti-tax ideologues, who have contributed mightily to devastating back-to-back losses in races for the governorship last year and the U.S. Senate this year. Virginia's more pragmatic Republicans, who are more interested in addressing the state's problems than in upholding the true faith of anti-tax doctrine, did not bother to show up."

WSJournal Sees New York Transfat Ban As Boon For Plaintiff's Bar. The Wall Street Journal (12/9, A8) editorializes that New York City's "concern for the health of residents is understandable, but trans fats are not E. coli (or even secondhand smoke), and the federal Food and Drug Administration still considers these chemically modified food ingredients perfectly safe for consumption. Could it be that Mayor Mike has been taken in by activist Gotham health czars and national Naderite 'watchdog' outfits like Michael Jacobson's Center for Science in the Public Interest, among others pushing a larger agenda? … The ultimate goal of these so-called consumer advocates is to persuade the FDA to turn on trans fats, a move that would serve the food industry up as the next entree on the plaintiff bar's menu. Don't be surprised if the new Democrat Congress helps them pursue this goal, just like Mayor Bloomberg, on the dubious assumption that people can't decide for themselves what and what not to eat."

Internet Technologies Said To Have Benefited Democratic Candidates. The Washington Post (12/9, A19) Raul Fernandez, chief executive of the software firm ObjectVideo, writes, "Technology won the 2006 elections for the Democrats. … The Internet…changed the balance of power in the House and Senate." Fernandez notes, "Search 'Conrad Burns' on YouTube.com and you get more than 130 videos, most of them unflattering. The most popular is 'Conrad Burns' Naptime,' set to 'Happy Trails.' No fancy production values here -- just a straight-on camera shot of the senator falling asleep during a congressional hearing important to Montana. That video alone received more than 100,000 views. Dozens of other anti-Burns videos, detailing such things as 'pay-to-play' allegations and key gaffes, were seen by many thousands of viewers. In a race that was lost by about 3,000 votes, those YouTube creations had an impact."

US Opponents Said To Coalesce Into "Resistance" Movement. In a 3,200-word piece on its front page, the Wall Street Journal (12/9, Higgins, 2.04M) describes in detail "the unlikely coalition of the U.S.' sworn enemies," including communists, radical Islamists and Latin American populists. The Journal says post-Cold War assumptions of America's "triumph" are "now under strain as secular rebels, antiglobalization militants and other strains of revolt rally to the banner of 'resistance' offered by Islamist groups such as Hezbollah." Religion "has become a great mobilizing force -- even for zealous atheists. The phenomenon extends beyond the Middle East to Europe, Latin America and Africa, too. Causes that a few years ago seemed moribund or at least passé -- socialism, Third World solidarity, strident anti-Americanism -- have been injected with the fervor, though rarely the actual faith, of Islamic radicalism."

Rice Cites "Freedom Deficit" As "Core Problem" In Middle East. The AP (12/9, Schweid) notes Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said yesterday that "a lack of democracy -- a 'freedom deficit' -- is the core problem in the Middle East. But Rice also said despite a divide between moderates and extremists in the area, she thinks the Bush Administration can begin to deliver on its promise of a Palestinian state living in peace alongside Israel." Appearing with German Foreign Minister Franz-Walter Steinmeier, Rice "made it clear the administration would continue to focus on spreading democracy and steering clear of extremists while pursuing an Arab-Israeli settlement." The AP notes that Assistant Secretary McCormack earlier this week "said Rice intends to devote a lot of time on the Middle East and would make a trip to the region early next year to try to promote Mideast peacemaking." Rice plans to meet today with Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni, and AFP (12/9) reports Livni "has rejected suggestions by influential US policymakers that the Israeli-Palestinian conflict lies at the heart of a broader Middle East crisis."

UN Security Council Will Consider Revised Iran Resolution Monday. The New York Times (12/9, Hoge, 1.16M) reports London, Paris and Berlin "produced a revised draft of [an UNSCR] on Iran on Friday, and said they would formally introduce it on Monday in the hope of obtaining a speedy vote on much-delayed action to curb Tehran's nuclear program." The revised draft "is aimed at meeting persistent objections from China and Russia. The revised language narrows the scope of prohibition and punishment to activities that are clearly associated with making a nuclear weapon," and "also removes restrictions in earlier drafts on the construction, supplying and operation of an $800 million light-water reactor that Russia is building at Bushehr in southern Iran." Travel bans, asset freezes and proliferation curbs remain in the draft. Assistant Secretary McCormack "said that he sensed that the differences over the resolution 'were starting to narrow.'"

The Financial Times (12/9, Turner) says the three European powers "launched a new United Nations drive to impose sanctions on Iran, calling all countries to prevent the supply of goods that could help its nuclear enrichment and reprocessing programmes, or the development of nuclear weapon delivery systems." Experts said the latest draft "represented a conceptual reversal from earlier proposals that had called for a blanket ban on nuclear-related goods unless specifically exempted."

The AP (12/9, Gearan) notes Washington "suggested Friday that a deal on imposing United Nations sanctions on Iran is near despite a disappointing round of talks among world powers earlier this week." McCormack "indicated the United States does not have unlimited patience for what have already been drawn-out negotiations among the [UNSC's] permanent members and Germany over Tehran's nuclear program." The AP says Iran "was on the agenda for a meeting between" Rice and Russian National Security Advisor Igor Ivanov yesterday. A separate AP (12/9, Lederer) piece says the latest draft is "narrowing sanctions on Iran," but notes the UNSCR "still would ban the supply of materials and technology that could contribute to Iran's nuclear and missile programs" and that "it spells out in much greater detail exactly what items are prohibited."

BBC.com (12/8) adds the "draft details which materials Iran would be banned from acquiring under possible Security Council sanctions. It also threatens Iran with unspecified actions if it does not suspend its enrichment of uranium, but is narrower in scope than previous drafts."

Lebanese PM Directly Blasts Hezbollah Chief In Public Address. The New York Times (12/9, Bakri, Slackman, 1.16M) notes Lebanese Prime Minister Fouad Siniora "lashed out Friday at Hezbollah's leader, Sheik Hassan Nasrallah, in a deeply personal attack in which he dismissed the sheik's political ultimatums for more power, saying, 'You are not our Lord and your party is not our Lord.'" The Times says Siniora's "decision to go head to head with Sheik Nasrallah in a televised address was a risky strategy [because his] local and regional standing is nowhere near the outsized image that the Hezbollah leader enjoys. But it also reflected how Lebanon's political crisis had spread beyond the bounds of political differences and entered the highly combustible realm of personal animosities between leaders." The Times adds, "In striking back, the prime minister challenged the credibility of Sheik Nasrallah and Hezbollah — or the Party of God — a strategy that would have been unheard of in the early days after the war with Israel… But Lebanon is now divided and angry, and its leaders talk about promoting dialogue — while ratcheting up a heated confrontation."

The AP (12/9, Karam) says Siniora "accused Hezbollah's leader of threatening a coup in an unusually harsh exchange between the two rivals that stoked tensions as the Shiite guerrilla group escalated its attempts to oust the government." He is quoted saying Nasrallah "is threatening a coup and his statements carry all the seeds of dissension and threat." Siniora also reiterated that ongoing Hezbollah rallies "would not force his resignation."

Six-Party North Korea Talks To Resume Next Weekend. The Washington Post (12/9, A16, Kessler, 690K) reports the six-party talks on North Korea "will begin next Saturday morning in Beijing, two months after Pyongyang defied international pressure and conducted its first nuclear test. Such talks have been stalled for more than a year." Assistant Secretary of State Chris Hill "said China, the host of the talks, will make a formal announcement this weekend. The first session is expected to last a few days, then take a break before Christmas." Administration "officials said all sides have agreed that the talks will seek to implement the joint 'statement of principles' issued on Sept. 19, 2005, which was designed to lay out a negotiating road map." The Post says that Hill "has indicated a clear sense of urgency in implementing the agreement. Some Asian diplomats reported that he sought a timeline as short as 18 months, before President Bush completes his term. A U.S. official said Hill and the North Koreans have discussed in general terms how long it would take to implement the 2005 statement."

House, Senate Pass India Nuclear Deal. The AP (12/9, Rosenberg) reports "officials hailed" the House of Representatives' approval of the US-India nuclear cooperation agreement "as the symbol of a broad shift in relations between the two countries. But the deal also highlights some of the limits of the emerging strategic partnership." Undersecretary Burns called the agreement "a major, historic step forward for both our countries," and said it "is the symbolic center of this new strategic partnership between India and the United States." The AP adds, "While the new partnership could further open up a huge market for American companies and give India the energy it needs, it is far more fraught politically." The Senate was to vote on the deal late Friday.

The Wall Street Journal (12/9, A4, Solomon) says Congressional approval of the deal "could open a torrent of U.S. high-tech trade with the subcontinent." The Administration sees the deal "as underpinning an evolving Washington-New Delhi alliance that could help counter China's emergence as a global economic and military power. American companies are set to benefit from potential nuclear-energy deals, worth billions of dollars, and other trade opportunities that are likely to open in the wake of the initiative." The Journal notes that, "if the bill passes, it's likely to be at least another six months before American companies can begin selling nuclear technologies." Both nations "still need to agree to parameters for the types of technologies to be included," and India must negotiation a safeguards deal with the IAEA.

The New York Times (12/9, A6, Mazzetti) says the House "voted overwhelmingly on Friday to cement closer ties between the United States and India, endorsing President Bush's plan to allow American shipments of civilian nuclear reactors and fuel to India over criticisms that the plan could spark a regional arms race." The "landslide vote handed the White House a major victory at a time when the Bush administration's foreign policy is under fire on multiple fronts, and it was another signal that American lawmakers are looking for concrete steps to counter China's growing influence in Asia."

The Los Angeles Times (12/9, Gerstenzang) notes, "Reversing three decades of U.S. policies intended to halt the spread of nuclear weapons, Congress early today approved a long-stalled agreement giving India access to American nuclear technology with limited safeguards to discourage possible proliferation." The Senate "voted unanimously in favor of the deal shortly before 3 a.m. President Bush, who finalized the terms of the agreement during a visit to India in March, is expected to sign it quickly."

The Financial Times (12/9, Johnson) notes the Congressional votes mark "an important milestone in" the two nations' "journey towards a new strategic partnership." A final deal "will end a technology-denial regime imposed on India in the wake of its 1974 nuclear test; mark an abrupt shift in US counter-proliferation policy; and open the door to a wide range of commercial opportunities." The Times adds, "After investing political capital to secure the vexatious agreement, bitterly criticised by non-proliferation campaigners as a reward to a nuclear pariah state outside the Non-Proliferation Treaty, the Bush administration is expected to drive to secure some commercial objectives in India." While the Administration "has not disguised its desire to ramp up military and defence collaboration," the "painful history of US sanctions, which saw supplies of spares abruptly terminated, has left a legacy of mistrust in the Indian defence establishment that is only slowly dissolving."

Indian Finance Minister Eyes Double-Digit Annual Growth. The Wall Street Journal (12/9, A4, Bellman) notes remarks by Indian Finance Minister P. Chidambaram that "India's economic expansion could accelerate to more than 10% annually in the next five years," a "trajectory that puts India on a similar growth path as Asia's other star performer: China." Chidambaram told the Journal that his nation "could see growth climb into the double digits during the period covered by the government's next five-year economic plan, which starts April 1." His "comments echo those of other Indian leaders, who say double-digit growth is within reach, as long as the economy continues to open to private and foreign investment." Chidambaram "welcomed a recent slowdown in inflation. He said that while he would like to see inflation lower, it is in part a result of India's robust growth and still much lower than it used to be." He also pledged that "India will continue along the path of revamping its economy."

House Passes Vietnam, Haiti Trade Measures. BBC.com (12/9) reports the House of Representatives "has passed landmark legislation normalising trade relations with Vietnam." The last-minute "deal also expanded trade relations with Haiti, and tweaked Washington's trade preferences with several states in Latin America and beyond." BBC says the "Congress' failure to pass the bill normalising trade relations with Hanoi" before President Bush's November trip to Vietnam "was seen as an embarrassment" for him.

At Home And Abroad, Chinese Leaders Embrace New Role. A lengthy piece on the New York Times (12/9, A1, Kahn)'s front page today reports, "China's Communist Party has a new agenda: it is encouraging people to discuss what it means to be a major world power and has largely stopped denying that China intends to become one soon." China "has long followed a dictum laid down by Deng Xiaoping" that the nation should "hide its ambitions and disguise its claws," that "China needed to devote its energy to developing economically and should not seek to play a leadership role abroad." China's "tradition of modesty has begun to fade, replaced by a growing confidence that China's rise is not fleeting and that the country needs to do more to define its objectives." The Journal says Chinese "leaders are acting as if they intend to start exercising more power abroad rather than just protecting their political power at home." Internally, "officials and leading scholars are becoming a bit less hesitant to discuss what this all might mean."

Taiwan Mayoral Elections Could Showcase Chen's Unpopularity. The New York Times (12/9, A6, Bradsher) previews today's municipal elections in Taiwan. Noting that President Chen Shui-bian has longed enjoyed popular support in the southern metropolis of Kaohsiung, the Times reports, "So it is a measure of the troubles of President Chen and his party that [the] mayoral race" there "is at least a tossup." Some polls are forecasting "a crushing victory for the Nationalist candidate in the Taipei mayoral election," and, taken with "the hard-fought Kaohsiung race," the results may imply "a significant shift in Taiwan's politics."

Chavez Victory May Bolster Raul Castro's Hand In Cuban Transition. The Financial Times (12/9, Frank) reports Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez's "sweeping victory in" his nation's presidential election "could help to ensure political cover and economic support for the emerging leadership in Cuba as Fidel Castro fights for his life somewhere in Havana." The Times says Venezuela and Cuba "have found a strong synergy, playing off each country's strength since Mr. Chávez won his first election in 1998." Essentially, "Venezuela is using its vast oil wealth and Cuba its human capital to push their anti-US vision of a united, more socially-oriented Latin America at a time of growing restlessness among the region's poor." In Cuba, "the steady oil supply [from Chavez] and billions in revenues from the export of professional services are fuelling an economic boom after more than a decade of crisis." The Times adds that Castro's regime is "now able to point to a way out of the ideological and political debacle that followed European communism's collapse. The lights are back on, decrepit waterworks and transport are being gradually upgraded, new housing built, consumer goods replaced and there is more food on the table."

Mexican Federal Authorities Raid Oaxaca Prosecutor's Office. The New York Times (12/9, A5, McKinley) reports Mexican "federal agents raided the prosecutor's office and state police headquarters on Friday in" Oaxaca state, "where state law-enforcement authorities have failed to arrest anyone in the killings of at least 11 antigovernment protesters and a New York City journalist." Those agents seized "police weapons to determine whether they had been used against protesters in recent months."

Litvinenko Poisoning Continues To Stir Controversy. Continuing its coverage of the radioactive poisoning of former KGB spy Alexander Litvinenko, the Washington Post (12/9, A1, Jordan, Finn) reports Boris Berezovsky, a wealthy opponent of Russian President Vladimir Putin, "is now a central figure in the" case, "the most sensational case of international intrigue since the Cold War." While "detectives pursue the murder case in Moscow and London, Berezovsky is saying he believes Putin is behind it, while Kremlin supporters see dark emigre conspiracies to smear Russia's reputation by engineering a spectacular murder." Berezovsky was a friend and supporter of Litvinenko, and police have uncovered in Berezoksky's office trace amounts of the radioactive substance that killed Litvinenko. The Post adds, "As the investigation widens, the feud between the president and the billionaire remains a prominent story line in the mystery."

The Financial Times (12/9) notes UK authorities investigating Litvinenko's death "postponed interviewing a key witness in Moscow on Friday amid signs that they are struggling to unravel the mystery of who may have been responsible for his murder." That individual is former KGB agent Andrei Lugovoi, who at one time worked for Berezovsky and who this week was hospitalized in Moscow for radiation sickness. Scotland Yard "played down suggestions of an imminent breakthrough last night," and the Times says "the investigation is focused on the meetings Mr. Litvinenko held in a London hotel the day he fell ill."

The New York Times (12/9, A3, Fisher) focuses its reporting on Mario Scaramella, who had lunch with Livinenko on the day he was poisoned and who was released this week from a London hospital after overcoming radiation poisoning. "A slew of news reports about him and his career [in Italy] — which included trying to prove that top Italian politicians in the center-left, including Prime Minister Romano Prodi, are Russian spies — have invariably included unflattering adjectives. They include: 'incurable liar,' 'wannabe 007,' 'braggart,' 'bumbler' and 'swindler,' not to mention 'fool' and 'mental case.'"

The Los Angeles Times (12/9, Murphy) keys on a health department statement that it believes Litvinenko "was poisoned at the bar of a [London hotel] where he met with two other Russians, both of whom now are in hospitals showing symptoms of radiation sickness." The initial focus on the Piccadilly Circus sushi restaurant "has been shaken by medical evidence that seven people who worked at the bar of the Millennium Hotel in London's upscale Mayfair district also have been exposed. The bar has been placed under quarantine."

Incoming UN Secretary-General Profiled As "Courtly And Deliberate." This week's "Saturday Interview" in the New York Times (12/9, A14, Hoge) is incoming U.N. Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon. Ban explains that a professional "misstep" in 2001 led indirectly to him becoming the chief of staff to the President of the U.N. General Assembly. "Courtly and deliberate, with an easy smile, Mr. Ban, 62, is an unknown at the United Nations, particularly compared with the high-profile, globetrotting diplomat he is succeeding. With the exception of his misstep in 2001, Mr. Ban has been almost surpassingly unassuming and inoffensive — noticed, when he is, for his steady record of incremental achievement at the South Korean Foreign Ministry, where he has spent his entire 37-year career." Saying Ban's "elusiveness may be intended," the Times calls him "a loyal and dependable company man" and adds that his "penchant for not stepping on toes and his repeated public expressions of humility during the months that he was campaigning for secretary general have raised doubts about his suitability for the job."

Annan Blasts UN For "Failing" In Darfur. The Washington Post (12/9, A14, Lynch) reports U.N. Secretary-General "Kofi Annan scolded governments Friday for failing to halt mass murder in Darfur, saying that the world has not learned the lessons of Rwanda and Srebrenica, where genocidal killings in the early 1990s defied the global ability to stop it." In his final human rights address, Annan "said the failure to protect civilians in the Sudanese region marked a low point in recent U.N. history. In a speech organized by Human Rights Watch in honor of International Human Rights Day, he faulted the 'shameful passivity of most governments' in the face of a government-backed military campaign that has driven more than 2 million people from their homes and killed hundreds of thousands." He "provided a gloomy assessment of the organization's performance in confronting abusers of human rights during his 10-year tenure. He charged that the U.S.-led fight against terrorism has helped erode human rights standards. He said the United Nations needs to pursue an 'an anti-terrorism strategy that does not merely pay lip service to the defense of human rights but is built on it.'" Annan "reserved some of his harshest criticism for Third World governments that, he said, have mischaracterized the U.N. human rights agenda as 'a conspiracy by imperialist powers to take back the hard-won national sovereignty of formerly colonized people.' He also took an indirect swipe at China and Islamic governments that have defended Sudan." The Post adds that while Annan is credited "with advocating human rights more aggressively than any of his predecessors," his own "legacy has been clouded by his own failure, as the head of the U.N. peacekeeping department, to promote a tougher response to the mass killings in Rwanda and Srebrenica."

The Los Angeles Times (12/9, Farley) says Annan offered "a sober assessment Friday of his own shortcomings as he prepared to leave office at the end of the year, and accused the United States of violating human rights in its war on terror. He also warned Sudan's leaders that they would be held accountable if they didn't halt the violence in Darfur, and urged countries with commercial interests in Sudan to pressure the government in Khartoum."

NYTimes Implores African Leaders To Confront Mugabe. In an editorial, the New York Times (12/9, A18) details the "agonies" facing Zimbabwe. The nation "is under economic sanctions by the United States and the European Union and few tourists go there, so the suffering of its people is largely out of sight and out of mind. Yet things are truly terrible." The "culprit" for these problems is President Robert Mugabe, "a master at the blame game, accusing the West of colonialism and racism when it criticizes his scheme to redistribute white-owned commercial farms among blacks, or the cruel expulsion of 750,000 slum dwellers from cities, or whatever else he does." While the West may be out of options in dealing with him, "Africans could make a difference, if they joined in condemning Mr. Mugabe. For understandable reasons, African leaders have been reluctant to publicly criticize fellow Africans." However, the Times concludes, "The suffering Zimbabwean people are in desperate need of protection, the sooner the better."

Columnist Notes Connections Between Foreign Aid, Remittances To El Salvador. In her Washington Post (12/9, A19) column, Marcela Sanchez highlights the interplay between the Millennium Challenge Corporation's grant to El Salvador and the remittances sent there by Salvadorans working in the U.S. "Salvadoran immigrants are frustrated that their cash isn't reaping more development rewards back home. Although remittances have proved to be a lifeline for thousands of families in extreme poverty, immigrant Salvadorans fear that the money is creating a culture of dependency in the home country." Sanchez agrees with the World Bank that remittances "are 'neither manna from heaven nor a substitute for sound development policies.'" She laments the lack of a "direct connection between the new development plan and the current flow of help," and notes the efforts of Salvadorans in the U.S. to have the MCC dovetail its aid with remittances.

Authors Laud Harper For Seeking Answer To Quebec Question. In the New York Times (12/9, A19), Jean-Benoit Nadeau and Julie Barlow say Quebec separatism has "monopolized Canadian politics for the last 50 years," and note the unanswered question, "What does Quebec want?" With his "nation" resolution, Prime Minister Stephen Harper "has created new ambiguity in the question — all the more interesting since he probably thought he was clarifying things." They add that "French Canadians tend to see Canada as a country made up of two nations, while the English tend to think that 'country' and 'nation' are one and the same." The authors believe "that Mr. Harper has come up with a promising formulation. Most people in Quebec, apart from hard-line separatists, will probably be satisfied by the word nation." Harper "Harper has created either a new basis for talks about Quebec's status or contributed a new weapon to a nastier debate. No one has quite figured out which it will be."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Former Detainees Argue For Right To Sue Rumsfeld Over Torture (NYT)

By Paul Von Zielbauer

The New York Times, December 9, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 8 — Lawyers for former detainees in Iraq and Afghanistan argued in federal court on Friday that Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld was personally responsible, and thus legally liable, for acts of torture inflicted on their clients by American military interrogators.

The nine plaintiffs, Iraqi and Afghan men held at American-run prisons, endured an array of physical and psychological abuse during their confinements in 2003 and 2004, including beatings, mock executions and painful physical restraints, their lawyers said in court papers. All were eventually released without being charged with crimes.

The hearing Friday, before Chief Judge Thomas F. Hogan in Federal District Court in Washington, was the first time a federal court had considered whether top administration officials could be liable for the torture of detainees in Iraq and Afghanistan.

But the hearing concerned only questions of jurisdiction and did not delve into whether Mr. Rumsfeld, because he personally approved certain interrogation techniques in 2002 like the use of “stress positions,” was legally responsible for specific acts of torture committed in overseas military prisons.

Instead, lawyers from each side argued over whether noncitizens confined in prisons outside the United States had legal standing to sue Mr. Rumsfeld and other American military officials for constitutional violations.

The suit, filed on behalf of the nine plaintiffs last year by the American Civil Liberties Union and Human Rights First, also names as defendants three officials responsible for running military prisons in Iraq and Afghanistan: Lt. Gen. Ricardo S. Sanchez, the former top commander in Iraq; Col. Thomas M. Pappas, who was the top military intelligence officer at Abu Ghraib, the American-run prison in Iraq; and a former brigadier general, Col. Janis L. Karpinski, who before her demotion to colonel was the military police commander at Abu Ghraib. She was relieved of her command and demoted after abuses at Abu Ghraib came to light.

DOJ_NMG_0105021

During the two-and-a-half-hour hearing, Judge Hogan took turns questioning the lawyers. He repeatedly asked lawyers for the former detainees to cite precedents in law that would allow foreigners to sue American officials for what in the United States would be violations of their civil rights.

"How can this work, this theory that nonresident aliens have a right to sue to prevent being tortured?" Judge Hogan asked Lucas Guttentag, the plaintiffs' lead lawyer in the case. What would prevent Osama bin Laden, the judge asked Mr. Guttentag, from taking President Bush to court for authorizing the military to kill him?

Mr. Guttentag, citing several Supreme Court decisions, said that American laws prohibiting torture should apply to foreign civilians under exclusively American control and jurisdiction overseas. He also noted that in Iraq, American military personnel were immune from prosecution under Iraqi laws. "Iraqi law cannot govern, and unless the United States does, nothing else applies."

Rick Beckner, a deputy assistant attorney general representing Mr. Rumsfeld, argued that foreigners held in an American-run prison in foreign territory had no legal standing to sue. "There's never been any finding that the Constitution applies to these plaintiffs," he told Judge Hogan.

Judge Hogan, clearly skeptical of the plaintiffs' attempt to open federal officials to legal liability for actions by troops overseas, said he hoped to make a decision quickly to dismiss the case or allow some or all claims to proceed.

But in his closing remarks, the judge also acknowledged being disturbed by the allegations of detainee abuse and torture. "It is unfortunate, to say the least, that there has to be an argument" about whether the American military tortures foreign citizens.

The Oval Intervention (NYT)

By Maureen Dowd

The New York Times, December 9, 2006

It is not a happy mood in the Oval Office.

Poppy is sobbing, his face in his hands, slumped in one of the yellow-and-blue striped chairs. Laura is screaming the words "Oscar de la Renta" and "rendition" into her cellphone, still seeing red after showing up at a White House gala in the same $8,400 red gown as three other women who did not happen to be first lady.

Bob Gates is grim-faced, but not as grim-faced as Barbara, whose look could freeze not only the Potomac but the Tigris and the Euphrates. Scowcroft is over on the couch, trying to nap while Kissinger drones softly in his ear.

And, of course, there is the Deprogrammer for the Decider, James Baker, perfectly suited in bright green tie and suited perfectly for his spot behind the president's desk.

The Council of Elders had hoped this Apocalypto moment wouldn't be necessary. They had assumed that the scorching Iraq Study Group report would have the same effect on Junior as the bucket of cold water that Mr. Baker's strict father, a lawyer known as "the Warden," used to throw on his face to wake him up as a boy.

But Junior is trying to wriggle away completely, offering a decidedly cool response to the attempt to yank him into the reality-based community. He rallied his last two allies — his English poodle and his Scottish terrier, Blair and Barney.

He is loath to give up his gunslinger pose to go all diplo. He cleaves to the neocon complaint that it is the realists who are now being unrealistic, thinking the administration can bargain with Syria and Iran, or that the Army can train Iraqi security forces (or, as they are known there, death squads) in a matter of months when they haven't been able to do it in years.

The Velvet Hammer is undeterred. He's doing an all-out intervention, locking Junior and Barney in the little study next to the Oval. To stress the seriousness of the situation, they don't give the president his feather pillow.

The group gathers at the door of the study. "My boy," his dad tells him between sobs. "We love you. We're here for you. We're worried about you. You're not just hurting yourself, you're hurting others. This is a safe place. No one's judging you ..."

DOJ_NMG_0105022

"What are you talking about, Dad?" Junior snaps. "I just actually read 96 pages of your friends' judging me in that cowpie report." Barney woofs in support.

Barbara can be heard muttering from across the room. "We were right about Jebbie."

Henry the K lumbers up to the door and in a low Teutonic rumble says: "It's time we stopped taking care of you and started caring about you. Would you like a peanut butter and jelly sandwich?"

Junior is getting even more furious. "You all think you're so realist. But you're unrealist. I'm realist. Are you sitting at my desk, Baker? Get out of there! Everyone says you're so Mr. Ride to the Rescue, but none of your surrender monkey ideas would work. Talk about Pretend Land — Israel giving up the Golan Heights? Yeah, right. And they call me delusional."

Baker glides up to the door and says, in his most satiny drawl, "Son, I just threw a few D.O.A. ones in there for you to reject so you could preserve your manhood."

There are sounds of feet stomping. "You say I can't stay the course but I can too stay the course!" Junior yells. "I can! I can! You say I have to put the two trillion dollar war cost in the budget, but I don't! You say we have to cuddle up to evildoers in Iran and Syria. Why do you hate the troops? Where's Condi? I want my Condi!"

Realizing the president is getting hysterical, the group looks at Laura, hoping she can calm him down.

She approaches the door and coos in a soft voice: "Bushie? Listen, now, this is important. How do you get someone audited? Can't we send Oscar de la Loser to Gitmo?"

Baker gently nudges Laura aside. "Now son, hear me out. We've disabled your enablers. Rummy has written his last self-serving memo. Dick's got his hands full explaining his darlin' new grandchild's Two Mommies. Don't bother calling for Condi. She's at the bottom of Foggy Bottom. You've got to know when to hold 'em, know when to fold 'em."

It's not sinking in. "We must achieve our objective," Junior sputters. "Our objective is success. To succeed we must have success. If we don't win, we lose. We are the winners. We can't let the ... we're in an ideological struggle and that's why we have a strategy ... AL QAEDA! We must help democracy in Iraq succeed because ... ISLAMOFASCISTS! ... that is the objective of a successful ..."

Barney scratches at the door, trying to cut and run.

Judge Weighs Torture Claim Vs. Rumsfeld (AP)

By Matt Apuzzo,

AP, December 9, 2006

A federal judge on Friday appeared reluctant to give Donald H. Rumsfeld immunity from torture allegations, yet said it would be unprecedented to let the departing defense secretary face a civil trial.

"What you're asking for has never been done before," U.S. District Judge Thomas F. Hogan told lawyers for the American Civil Liberties Union.

The group is suing on behalf of nine former prisoners in Iraq and Afghanistan. The lawsuit contends the men were beaten, suspended upside down from the ceiling by chains, urinated on, shocked, sexually humiliated, burned, locked inside boxes and subjected to mock executions.

If the suit were to go forward, it could force Rumsfeld and the Pentagon to disclose what officials knew about abuses at prisons such as Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq and what was done to stop it.

Rumsfeld, who leaves the Defense Department on Dec. 18, told Pentagon employees and reporters Friday that the day he learned about abuses at Abu Ghraib was his worst day in office.

"I remember being stunned by the news of the abuse at Abu Ghraib," Rumsfeld said. "And then watching so many determined people spend so many months trying to figure out exactly how in the world something like that could have happened, and how to make it right."

Lawyers for the ACLU and Human Rights First, however, argue that Rumsfeld and top military officials disregarded warnings about the abuse and authorized the use of illegal interrogation tactics that violated the constitutional rights of prisoners.

Foreigners outside the United States are not normally afforded the same protections as U.S. citizens, and Hogan said he was wary about extending the Constitution across the globe.

DOJ_NMG_0105023

Doing so, he said, might subject government officials to all sorts of political suits. Osama bin Laden could sue, Hogan said, claiming two American presidents threatened to have him murdered.

"How do you control that?" Hogan asked. "Where does it stop? Does it stop at the secretary of defense? Does it stop at the president? How does this work?"

The Justice Department argues that is exactly why government officials generally are immune from suits related to their jobs. By allowing the case to proceed, Hogan would make all future military operations subject to second-guessing by the courts, the government contends.

"We cannot have courts interfering with core military functions," Deputy Assistant Attorney General C. Frederick Beckner III said.

Hogan questioned the scope of that immunity. He said freedom from torture is a basic right accepted by the United States and all civilized nations.

"Would you take the same policy if the argument was one of genocide?" Hogan asked. "Are you saying there could be no inquiry done?"

Beckner said abuse claims should be handled by the military, which has prosecuted more than 100 such cases. In his farewell speech Friday, Rumsfeld said such prosecutions demonstrated "how our democracy deals openly and decisively with such egregious wrongdoing."

Lawyers for the civil rights groups, which have criticized the military's prosecution record, said the government is trying to operate a "rights-free" zone overseas.

"The defendants had a duty to deter and punish acts of torture and they did 180 degrees opposite of that: They encouraged and directed that torture," lawyer Paul Hoffman said.

Hogan said torture is a crime against mankind, but he did not see how the Constitution applied to foreigners held in overseas military prisons.

Hogan said he would rule quickly on whether to dismiss the case; he did not make a decision Friday.

The other officials named in the suit are: retired Lt. Gen. Ricardo S. Sanchez, former Brig. Gen. Janis L. Karpinski and Col. Thomas M. Pappas.

Karpinski, whose Army Reserve unit was in charge of the Abu Ghraib prison, was demoted last year and is the highest-ranking officer punished in the scandal. Sanchez, who commanded U.S. forces in Iraq, retired from the Army last month, calling his career a casualty of the prison scandal.

Pappas, the former top-ranking intelligence officer at Abu Ghraib, was granted immunity from prosecution in exchange for testimony about the abuse.

Ex-detainees Seek Right To Sue Rumsfeld In Abuse Case (LAT)

By Richard B. Schmitt

The Los Angeles Times, December 9, 2006

WASHINGTON — The debate over abuses in U.S. military prisons in Iraq and Afghanistan flared again Friday, with nine former detainees seeking the right to sue outgoing Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and three senior Army leaders for alleged torture.

In U.S. District Court, lawyers for Iraqi and Afghan civilians said that Rumsfeld and the officers, two of whom have retired, violated U.S. and international law and should be held personally responsible for the abuse they say their clients suffered.

The suit is believed to be the first to try to hold U.S. officials accountable for the abuse at prisons. The scandal triggered worldwide outcry and forced an overhaul of U.S. interrogation rules.

U.S. District Judge Thomas F. Hogan indicated he was sympathetic to the former detainees' plight, but he questioned whether they had the right under the U.S. Constitution to sue.

"It's unfortunate, to say the least, that there has to be an argument that U.S. military officials tortured citizens of another country," Hogan said. "That being said, there is substantial difficulty in recognizing claims of noncitizens held in other countries."

The ex-prisoners said in the suit that they were beaten to the point of unconsciousness, mutilated, stabbed and urinated on, and endured mock executions, among other abuses.

They were among the thousands of prisoners held by the U.S. military at Abu Ghraib and other locations in Iraq and Afghanistan, including detention facilities in Kandahar and Bagram.

They asked the court to award unspecified monetary damages and to declare their treatment illegal.

Government lawyers argued that the suit should be dismissed because Rumsfeld was immune from being sued for acting within the course of his official duties. (Rumsfeld has resigned; he gave his farewell speech to Pentagon employees Friday.) The lawyers also said the suit would expand foreign citizens' rights to file lawsuits in U.S. courts far beyond what the Supreme Court has allowed.

The judge himself cited the case of Johnson vs. Eisentrager, decided by the Supreme Court in 1950, which held that enemy aliens being held by military authorities outside the U.S. had no rights under the U.S. Constitution to challenge their detention in civilian court.

"Given Eisentrager, I don't see how the 5th Amendment extends to these individuals," Hogan told an ACLU lawyer, referring to the constitutional right to due process.

Hogan said he was concerned that this suit would open the door to foreigners to file all kinds of lawsuits. "Where does it stop?" he asked.

Lucas Guttentag of the American Civil Liberties Union, lead counsel for the ex-detainees, responded that the case was special because of the United States' unequivocal prohibition on torture and because of an extensive paper trail showing that Rumsfeld and the senior Army officials knew or should have known their policies were leading to torture.

He also said U.S. officials should be held responsible because Iraqi law had been suspended after the U.S. invasion. If officials cannot be held responsible under U.S. law for their actions, he said, the detainees have no legal recourse.

"You have a rights-free zone," Guttentag said. "There is nothing that applies."

"You agree what you're asking for has never been decided by a court before?" Hogan said. Guttentag responded that there had never been allegations of such abuse before either.

The suit alleges not only constitutional violations but also violations of the Geneva Convention's ban on torture.

Hogan questioned whether individuals had the right to sue for violations of their rights under the treaty. He expressed concern that such an interpretation would allow "individuals around the world to sue here in the U.S." for a range of injuries not limited to torture.

Hogan asked the lawyers for Rumsfeld and the other officials whether the immunity they sought was absolute. "Would you take the same position if the claim was one of genocide?" he asked C. Frederick Beckner III, a deputy assistant attorney general.

Beckner acknowledged the seriousness of torture and genocide but said that allowing suits by victims of either one would have the effect of disrupting and "potentially chilling" the military's ability to conduct wartime operations.

He said the military took abuse claims seriously and had prosecuted more than 100 misconduct cases.

Besides Rumsfeld, the suit names as defendants retired Lt. Gen. Ricardo S. Sanchez, the one-time commander of U.S. forces in Iraq; former Army Reserve Brig. Gen. Janis Karpinski, the commander of military police at Abu Ghraib, who was demoted to colonel before retiring; and Col. Thomas M. Pappas, the officer in charge of military intelligence at Abu Ghraib.

Court Mulls Torture Lawsuit As Rumsfeld Bids Farewell (NSDY)

By Tom Brune, Newsday Washington Bureau

Long Island Newsday, December 9, 2006

WASHINGTON -- As Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld bid farewell at a Pentagon town hall meeting Friday, human rights attorneys argued in a D.C. federal court that he and three senior Army officers should be held personally responsible for the alleged torture of Afghani and Iraqi detainees.

In a hearing before D.C. District Court Chief Judge Thomas Hogan, attorneys from the American Civil Liberties Union and Human Rights First argued their suit should go forward because records show Rumsfeld tacitly approved of the abuse and didn't try to stop it when he learned it was going on.

DOJ_NMG_0105025

Justice Department attorneys argued for dismissal, saying public officials are immune from such lawsuits, the case would extend U.S. constitutional rights to foreigners, and courts usually defer to the executive on wartime issues.

Hogan questioned both sides about the limits of their positions and arguments.

He told the human rights lawyers their request had never been made before, and asked where it would lead -- to a lawsuit by Osama bin Laden?

And he questioned the scope of the immunity for Rumsfeld. "Would you take the same policy if the argument was one of genocide?" the judge asked. He said he would rule quickly.

For Rumsfeld, a week before he officially leaves, the well-documented abuse was on his mind. "Clearly the worst day was Abu Ghraib," he said in response to a question.

Yet after photos of the abuse were disclosed, he said the department "demonstrated to the world how our democracy deals openly and decisively with such egregious wrongdoing."

Lawyers filed a brief that said reported abuse resulted in more than 10 courts-martial, seven of them for Abu Ghraib.

But the ACLU's Lucas Guttentag said, "There must be legal accountability in a court of law for high-ranking government officials who order or allow torture."

The lawsuit, filed in March 2005, seeks damages for five Iraqis and four Afghanis detained and released without charges from 2002 to 2004. The suit says they suffered beatings, sexual humiliation, sleep and sensory deprivation, mock executions and death threats.

In addition to Rumsfeld, the lawsuit names retired Lt. Gen. Ricardo S. Sanchez, former Brig. Gen. Janis L. Karpinski and Col. Thomas M. Pappas.

The lawsuit's biggest hurdle is to show that they knowingly violated laws against torture.

"The question is whether he was pushing the envelope or breaking it," said Hofstra law professor Eric Freedman.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Illinois Man Charged With Plot To Wage "Jihad" In Mall (WP)

By Dan Eggen

The Washington Post, December 9, 2006

An Illinois man was charged yesterday with planning to set off hand grenades in a shopping mall during the holiday rush, part of a professed desire to wage "violent jihad" on U.S. targets, according to a federal criminal complaint filed in Chicago.

Derrick Shareef, 22, was arrested Wednesday in Rockford, Ill., about 90 miles west of Chicago, after meeting with an undercover federal agent in a store parking lot and trading a set of stereo speakers for four hand grenades, a handgun and bullets, according to an FBI affidavit.

Shareef -- a U.S. citizen who converted to Islam several years ago -- allegedly prepared for an attack on Rockford's CherryVale Mall by making a "martyrdom" videotape in which he declared that "the time for jihad is now" and that he was "ready to give my life" in the mission.

Authorities said Shareef has no apparent ties to any terrorist group and is believed to have been acting alone. He was charged with attempting to damage or destroy a building by fire or explosion and attempting to use a weapon of mass destruction.

The case is the latest terrorism-related sting involving undercover FBI informants and agents to become public. Some of those involved have played active roles in guiding the direction of the cases.

In Shareef's case, for example, the investigation began after an informant told the FBI in September that Shareef had talked about his desire to wage "violent jihad" on U.S. targets. It was the FBI informant who suggested that it might be better to "hit the mall" as a target, after a conversation in which Shareef focused on attacking government buildings instead, according to the affidavit.

DOJ_NMG_0105026

Civil liberties advocates and some lawmakers have raised questions about FBI tactics in such cases, including the prosecution of an alleged terror cell in Miami whose members said they wanted to blow up the Sears Tower in Chicago but had no apparent means to do so.

But Daniel L. Byman, director of the Security Studies Program at Georgetown University, said a case like Shareef's "can actually be seen as effective counterterrorism."

"This is a good-news, good-news story: It shows the low capabilities of domestic jihadists and that the FBI appears to be on top of it," he said.

The FBI's affidavit alleges that Shareef decided to carry out the attack during the holiday shopping period because crowds would be larger and to place grenades in garbage cans to maximize injuries from shrapnel. Shareef had also considered attacks on synagogues, a city hall and courthouses, saying at one point that he wanted to "smoke a judge," according to tape-recorded conversations recounted by the FBI.

The FBI recorded Shareef's conversations and trailed him as he accompanied the informant on scouting trips through the CherryVale mall. Shareef was arrested Wednesday after he took possession of a lockbox containing the grenades and a 9mm pistol, the affidavit says.

The grenades and ammunition were not operative, and the public was never in any serious danger, officials said. "While these are very serious charges, at no time was the public in any imminent peril as a result of the defendant's activities," U.S. Attorney Patrick J. Fitzgerald said in a news release.

Rockford Man Charged In Alleged Terror Plot (CHIT)

Video: Terror plot arrest

A 22-year-old man's alleged plot to stage a deadly terrorist attack in Rockford days before Christmas was marked by violent intentions but no chance of success, according to federal charges released Friday.

A Muslim convert intent on "jihad," Derrick Shareef plotted to use hand grenades and a pistol to kill shoppers at the CherryVale Shopping Center outside of Rockford, authorities charged.

But federal agents and an undercover informant followed him from the plot's outset, U.S. Atty. Patrick Fitzgerald said Friday. Authorities didn't specify how they originally learned of Shareef.

Many elements of Shareef's alleged plot, including the idea to attack the mall, came from the informant, according to the charges.

Shareef acted alone, and the public was never in any danger, authorities said.

Throughout the plot, he never had any weapons or the money to obtain them, Fitzgerald said.

But he did have violent intent, authorities said.

In a recorded conversation with the informant on Nov. 29, Shareef discussed attacking a courthouse in DeKalb County, according to the complaint.

"I just want to smoke a judge," he allegedly said.

The next day, the informant suggested the mall become the target.

"I mean, all right, we gotta look at it this way, we want to disrupt Christmas," the informant is quoted as saying in the criminal complaint.

Shareef allegedly responded: "Oh hell yeah, the mall is where it's at."

Throughout the plot, Shareef was recorded spewing hatred for Jewish people and the American justice system, authorities allege.

His plan reached its apex when he tried to trade an undercover federal agent a set of stereo speakers for grenades to attack the mall, authorities said.

The exchange, which included dud grenades, took place Wednesday in a store parking lot on Walton Road in Rockford, authorities said.

DOJ_NMG_0105027

Shareef was arrested without incident after the exchange and appeared in federal court in Chicago on Friday. His attorney did not issue a statement but said Shareef was aware of his rights and understood the proceedings.

He was held without bail on charges of attempting to use a weapon of mass destruction and damage or destroy a building. Under the law, grenades are considered weapons of mass destruction.

If convicted, he faces up to life in prison.

Muslim leaders in Rockford urged the public not to associate the alleged incident with the Islam faith.

"We know of no one who pursues this type of violence," said Imam Shpendim Nadzaku. "This is not what we believe."

Feds: Man Planned To Blow Up Chicago Mall (AP)

AP, December 8, 2006

CHICAGO (AP) — A Muslim convert who talked about his desire to wage jihad against civilians was charged Friday in a plot to set off hand grenades at a shopping mall at the height of the Christmas rush, authorities said.

Investigators said Derrick Shareef, 22, an American citizen from Rockford, was acting alone and never actually obtained any grenades. He was arrested Wednesday when he met with an undercover agent in a parking lot to trade a set of stereo speakers for four hand grenades and a gun, authorities said.

"He fixed on a day of December 22nd on Friday ... because it was the Friday before Christmas and thought that would be the highest concentration of shoppers that he could kill and injure," said Robert Grant, the agent in charge of the Chicago FBI office.

Authorities said Shareef had been under investigation since September, when he told an acquaintance that "he wanted to commit acts of violent jihad against targets in the United States as well as commit other crimes."

The acquaintance immediately informed the FBI, officials said.

Federal officials said Shareef planned to set off four hand grenades in garbage cans at the CherryVale shopping mall in Rockford, about 90 miles northwest of Chicago.

Other potential targets that Shareef allegedly discussed included government facilities such as courthouses and city hall, authorities said.

An affidavit quoted him as saying: "I just want to smoke a judge."

Shareef was born in the United States and converted to Islam, officials said. They believe he might have learned about jihad through videos and websites.

"While these are very serious charges, at no time was the public in any imminent peril," U.S. Attorney Patrick Fitzgerald said in a statement.

A spiritual leader of Rockford-area Muslims commended authorities for intercepting the alleged plot and reiterated "the Muslim community's condemnation of terrorism in the name of Islam," said Shpendim Nadzaku, imam of the Muslim Association of Greater Rockford.

Asked if he had ever met Shareef, Nadzaku said: "No one in the community has any clue as to who this person is — he's completely anonymous."

The door of a Genoa town home that is the last known address for Shareef went unanswered Friday although a female inside was seen turning off a light as a reporter stood outside.

Shareef appeared briefly before a judge Friday and was ordered held without bond. He was charged with one count of attempting to damage or destroy a building by fire or explosion and one count of attempting to use a weapon of mass destruction.

Defense attorney Michael Mann declined to comment on the charges.

Shareef and his acquaintance cased the mall on Nov. 30, discussing the layout and spots where they might set off several grenades simultaneously to create more pandemonium, according to an FBI affidavit.

DOJ_NMG_0105028

A spokeswoman for the mall said officials were cooperating with the investigation but referred all other questions to the U.S. attorney's office.

Mall customers expressed a mixture of anger and indifference Friday evening.

"I don't think anything is going to stop people from coming to this mall now. It's Christmas," said 27-year-old shopper Jaclyn Gonzalez of Rockford. "You're not going to keep from doing what you have to do just because someone is making ignorant comments."

Feds Arrest Man On Terrorism-related Charges (CHIST)

By Natasha Korecki

Chicago Sun-Times, December 9, 2006

A Rockford man allegedly planned to set off hand grenades in garbage cans at a shopping mall near Rockford as part of his plot to let the world know "the time for jihad is now."

Derrick Shareef, 22, targeted the Cherry Vale shopping mall, which has about 130 retail stores. But in recorded conversations he said the mall was "just one potential place," and that he hoped to one day "smoke a judge," according to the federal charges.

Should he die before the attack, Shareef made a videotape statement to explain his actions.

"I am from America, and this tape is to let you guys know, who disbelieve in Allah, to let the enemies of Islam know, and to let the Muslims alike know that the time for jihad is now...be strong, oh Mujahideen...May Allah protect me on this mission we conduct...so do not cry, do not mourn for me," he said, according to the FBI affidavit.

Shareef was arrested Wednesday by the Chicago Joint Terrorism Task Force after he met an undercover agent in the mall parking lot and traded a set of stereo speakers for four hand grenades and a hand gun, according to charges. He's also known as Talib Abu Salam Ibn Shareef, court papers say.

Shareef allegedly discussed targeting other local government facilities. He was charged with one count of attempting to damage or destroy a building by fire or explosion and one count of attempting to use a weapon of mass destruction.

Shareef's alleged plot was foiled after he shared his plans with a friend, who cooperated with the FBI. Shareef told the person he wanted to commit "acts of violent jihad" against people and other crimes to obtain funds to further his goals.

He at one point told the informant he wanted to target government facilities.

"I want some type of city hall-type stuff now, federal court houses," Shareef was caught on tape saying, according to an FBI affidavit. "I just want to smoke a judge."

"Once the threat Shareef posed was detected by the Joint Terrorism Task Force, his activities and movements were under constant surveillance and there was no imminent risk to the public," Chicago FBI chief Robert Grant said in a prepared statement.

Shareef is expected to have his initial appearance later today in federal court.

Mall Bomb Suspect Wanted To Warn 'Disbelievers,' FBI Says (AP)

AP, December 9, 2006

CHICAGO - A Muslim convert is in custody accused of trying to trade two stereo speakers for a 9 mm pistol and the grenades authorities say he wanted to carry out an attack on holiday shoppers.

The FBI says it was tipped by an acquaintance of Derrick Shareef, then recorded the 22-year-old planning to use hand grenades to blow garbage cans into clouds of flying shrapnel in a crowded mall the Friday before Christmas.

"This is a warning to those who disbelieve," he said, according to an FBI affidavit.

Authorities said he was arrested Wednesday when he tried to make the trade with an undercover agent in a Rockford parking lot. Shareef was charged Friday with crimes that could send him to prison for the rest of his life, and was ordered held without bail.

"He fixed on a day of December 22nd on Friday ... because it was the Friday before Christmas and thought that would be the highest concentration of shoppers that he could kill and injure," said Robert Grant, the agent in charge of the Chicago FBI office.

DOJ_NMG_0105029

However, authorities said no one was in danger.

"While these are very serious charges, at no time was the public in any imminent peril," U.S. Attorney Patrick J. Fitzgerald said in a news release.

Defense attorney Michael B. Mann declined to comment.

According to the affidavit, Shareef had been under investigation since September, when he told an acquaintance "he wanted to commit acts of violent jihad against targets in the United States as well as commit other crimes."

The acquaintance immediately informed the FBI, officials said.

Officials said Shareef planned to set off four hand grenades in garbage cans at the CherryVale shopping mall in Rockford, about 90 miles northwest of Chicago, and discussed other potential targets including government facilities such as courthouses and Rockford City Hall.

Rockford Mayor Lawrence Morrissey said Friday that officials would discuss whether security needed to be increased.

The affidavit quoted Shareef as saying: "I just want to smoke a judge."

Shareef and his acquaintance cased the mall Nov. 30, discussing the layout and spots where they might set off several grenades simultaneously to create pandemonium, according to the affidavit.

Shareef was born in the United States and converted to Islam, officials said.

The imam of the Muslim Association of Greater Rockford, Shpendim Nadzaku, commended authorities for intercepting the alleged plot and reiterated "the Muslim community's condemnation of terrorism in the name of Islam."

"No one in the community has any clue as to who this person is -- he's completely anonymous," Nadzaku said.

No one answered a knock at the door Friday at a town house in Genoa, between Chicago and Rockford, that is the last known address for Shareef. A female inside was seen turning off a light as a reporter stood outside.

Shareef was charged with one count of attempting to damage or destroy a building by fire or explosion and one count of attempting to use a weapon of mass destruction. The latter charge carries a maximum sentence of life in prison.

Local Officials Feel Left Out Of Information Loop (ROCKRS)

By Mike Wiser, ROCKFORD REGISTER STAR

Rockford (IL) Register-Star, December 9, 2006

Mayor and others say they learned of Shareef's alleged plans at the same time everyone else did.

ROCKFORD — Everyone was glad — unnerved a little, maybe, but glad — that a man with an apparent jihad complex and a fixation on the Rockford area was discovered and in custody before he could do any damage.

Local officials praised the Justice Department for stopping what federal prosecutors say was a 22-year-old's plan to use hand grenades to bomb CherryVale Mall or local government buildings.

But not everyone was happy with how the notoriously tight-lipped U.S. attorney's office in northern Illinois, led by Patrick Fitzgerald, let everyone else in on the news.

"This morning I'm getting a call from a reporter and on the other line I have the chief of police saying he just had a briefing with the FBI," Mayor Larry Morrissey said.

"If we're all supposed to combat terrorism in cities like New York, Chicago and Rockford ... they need to share information with local law enforcement that this was going on."

Morrissey said he was "extremely disappointed" that local law enforcement was kept out of the loop even though the feds were monitoring Derrick Shareef for months. He added that he is going to try and get some answers from Fitzgerald's office on how things could work differently in the future.

"I'm going to decline comments on his comment," Assistant U.S. Attorney Randall Samborn said.

Police Chief Chet Epperson said he got a call Wednesday that the FBI was involved in something in the Rockford area, but he said he didn't know any of the specifics until Friday, just as the news was breaking across the country.

"I would be disappointed if they had some information about this building and didn't tell me," said Charlie Jackson, head of security for the Winnebago County Courthouse.

Although Shareef's plans specifically identified the CherryVale Mall and the DeKalb County Courthouse, it does not appear they mentioned the Winnebago County Courthouse.

He did, however, want to attack "stuff like courthouses, city hall, government places, government facilities," according to an affidavit attached to the federal complaint.

"At least tell the command staff so they can pass it down to us with a description of someone or what to look out for," Jackson said.

Chief Deputy Kevin Hickey of the DeKalb County Sheriff's Department said his office had no problems with the information it got from the FBI and specifically identified the head of the Rockford office, G.B. Jones, as one who helped keep the lines of communication going.

"He kept us aware and updated as developments arose," Hickey said, although he was not sure when the department and the FBI started talking. "They assured us that there was never an imminent threat."

Cherry Valley Police Chief Gary Maitland said he was first contacted by federal authorities when Shareef was arrested Wednesday, and he didn't get the details until everyone else did Friday.

"I can understand why things like this have to be kept quiet," he said.

Traveler Data Program Defied Ban, Critics Say (WP)

By Spencer S. Hsu, Ellen Nakashima

The Washington Post, December 9, 2006

The Department of Homeland Security violated a congressional funding ban when it continued to develop a computerized program that creates risk assessments of travelers entering and leaving the United States, according to lawmakers and privacy advocates.

Although congressional testimony shows that department officials apparently disclosed some important elements of the controversial Automated Targeting System program to lawmakers in recent months, several key members of Congress said that they were in the dark about the program and that it violated their intentions.

"Clearly the law prohibits testing or development" of such computer programs, said Rep. Martin O. Sabo (D-Minn.), who wrote the three-year-old prohibition into homeland security funding legislation. "And if they are saying that they just took some system, used it and therefore did not test or develop it, they clearly were not upfront about saying it."

Privacy advocates and members of Congress expressed growing skepticism this week about the legality, scope and effectiveness of the massive data-mining program -- particularly the creation of risk assessments on Americans that would be retained for up to 40 years -- whose existence was first disclosed in detail in a Nov. 2 notice in the Federal Register.

The department announced yesterday that after receiving more than 50 objections to the program, it has extended a public comment period for ATS from Dec. 4 to Dec. 29. Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (D-Conn.) and Rep. Bennie Thompson (D-Miss.), incoming chairmen of the Senate and House homeland security committees, and others have questioned the effort and called for hearings or additional administration briefings.

Developed to help customs inspectors target narcotics and other contraband, ATS began scrutinizing air travelers entering and leaving the United States in the mid-1990s, said Jayson P. Ahern, assistant commissioner of U.S. Customs and Border Protection. After the 2001 terrorist attacks, it was used to assign risk assessments to cargo and passengers, officials' testimony and a February 2005 DHS report to Congress show.

Two years ago, it was expanded again to a limited but growing number of land border crossers, according to the report and Ahern. About 309 million land crossings and 87 million air crossings of U.S. borders are made each year.

Travelers are not allowed to see their risk assessments and must file Freedom of Information Act requests to view the original records on which the assessment is based.

The Center for Democracy and Technology said the program violated the 1974 Privacy Act because customs officials targeted U.S. travelers and shared their data with other agencies without notifying the public. Homeland Security officials say that notice was implicit in an announcement in 2001 about an older program.

DOJ_NMG_0105031

"The lack of a notice at all was clearly illegal for however many years they claim this was in operation," said David Sobel, Electronic Frontier Foundation senior counsel.

"This is everybody's worst nightmare," said Kevin Mitchell, chairman of the Business Travel Coalition, who was angered by the revelation that profiles were being kept without travelers' knowledge.

Homeland Security officials said the funding ban applied only to successor programs to its aborted attempt in 2004 to use commercial databases to assign risk to domestic air passengers -- then known as CAPPS II and renamed Secure Flight -- not to preexisting programs.

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff acknowledged that the November notice was an attempt "to be even more transparent and write, in even clearer English, about what we were going to do." But in an interview with the National Journal, he expressed frustration with critics' surprise.

"Otherwise, why are we collecting the data?" he asked. "Just to have it to sit around?"

DHS leaders have described in speeches and congressional hearings their efforts over the years to process data from manifests and airline passenger records on U.S.-bound international flights to "detect anomalies and 'red flags' " for high-risk individuals.

DHS has been more explicit recently about ATS data mining and risk profiling, saying computer algorithms were used to "produce potential matches" of inbound and outbound travelers with "potential . . . connections to terrorist risk factors."

But senior Homeland Security officials made only a few short references in 2004 and 2005 to using the program to assess land travelers. At the time, they cited it only as a future possibility.

"Funding will allow us to develop and implement a version of ATS that, for the first time, will be able to identify potentially high-risk travelers in passenger vehicles," then-Customs and Border Protection Commissioner Robert C. Bonner told Congress.

FEMA Ordered To Restart Katrina Payments (AP)

AP, December 8, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) — For the second time in eight days, a judge ordered the Bush administration to immediately resume making housing payments to thousands of families whose homes were damaged by Hurricane Katrina.

U.S. District Judge Richard J. Leon said last week that the confusing, often contradictory letters to hurricane victims from the Federal Emergency Management Agency didn't explain why rental payments were cut off. He said that violated the Constitution and he ordered the agency to restart the program immediately.

FEMA appealed that ruling and asked Leon not to force the agency to restart the program while that case plays out. Leon refused Friday to do so.

He ordered FEMA to come to court Wednesday to discuss how many evacuees are due housing payments and how the funding will be restored.

The Association of Community Organizations for Reform Now, which won last week's ruling, said more than 11,000 families are affected by the case.

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, in an interview with CNN, said Friday that FEMA wanted to ensure only eligible people received aid.

"Obviously, we are going to pursue the legal questions where they have to be pursued, but we also want to make sure we're doing the right thing," Chertoff said. "We don't want to have deserving people kicked out, but we also don't want to have people ripping off the program."

FEMA did not immediately respond to a request for comment. The Justice Department had no immediate response to the order.

Iraq Strategy Talks Focusing On Three Main Options (WP)

By Robin Wright, Peter Baker

DOJ_NMG_0105032

The Washington Post, December 9, 2006

As pressure mounts for a change of course in Iraq, the Bush administration is groping for a viable new strategy for the president to unveil by Christmas, with deliberations now focused on three main options to redefine the U.S. military and political engagement, according to officials familiar with the debate.

The major alternatives include a short-term surge of 15,000 to 30,000 additional U.S. troops to secure Baghdad and accelerate the training of Iraqi forces. Another strategy would redirect the U.S. military away from the internal strife to focus mainly on hunting terrorists affiliated with al-Qaeda. And the third would concentrate political attention on supporting the majority Shiites and abandon U.S. efforts to reach out to Sunni insurgents.

As President Bush and his advisers rush to complete their crash review and craft a new formula in the next two weeks, some close to the process said the major goal seems to be to stake out alternatives to the plan presented this week by the bipartisan Iraq Study Group. The White House denied trying to brush off the study group's report and said those recommendations are being considered alongside internal reviews.

But the growing undercurrent of discussions within the administration is shifting responsibility for Iraq's problems to Iraqis. Sources familiar with the deliberations describe fatigue, frustration and a growing desire to disengage from Iraq. The sources spoke on the condition of anonymity because of the sensitive nature of the deliberations.

"None of us see the situation in Iraq as favorable. We all see it as extremely difficult," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said yesterday.

Bush will devote most of next week to his Iraq review. He plans to visit the State Department on Monday to consult with his foreign policy team, then he will host independent Iraq experts in the Oval Office. The next day, he will hold a videoconference with U.S. military commanders and U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad in Iraq. He will travel to the Pentagon for more consultations on Wednesday.

The crash White House review -- which involves the State Department, the National Security Council, the CIA and the Pentagon -- is tentatively expected to lead to a speech to the nation the week of Dec. 18, officials say.

While one of the options involves a surge of U.S. troops, there is no agreement on what the mission of those forces would be, sources say. Discussions center on accelerating the training of Iraqi forces and helping secure Baghdad before turning it over to the Iraqis. The goal generally could be to improve Iraq's defense capabilities so U.S. combat troops could begin to withdraw faster.

The second idea is the "al-Qaeda option," which would transform the U.S. mission to focus on fighting terrorism and would disengage forces from domestic aspects of the multisided conflict. U.S. troops would take a backseat on the Shiite-Sunni conflict and instead hunt down al-Qaeda operatives, the sources say.

On the ground, for example, that could mean a shift away from operations in Baghdad's volatile Sadr City slum, or from efforts to stop car bombs and sectarian attacks. The administration is increasingly resigned to the fact that it can neither prevent nor intervene in Iraq's sectarian war, which has begun to supersede both the Sunni insurgency and al-Qaeda's operations, the sources say.

The two military options are not necessarily linked. Some in the interagency discussions favor both, while others support the al-Qaeda option but not a military surge, the sources say.

On the political front, the administration is focusing increasingly on variations of a "Shiite tilt," sometimes called an "80 percent solution," that would bolster the political center of Iraq and effectively leave in charge the Shiite and Kurdish parties that account for 80 percent of Iraq's 26 million people and that won elections a year ago.

Vice President Cheney's office has most vigorously argued for the "80 percent solution," in terms of both realities on the ground and the history of U.S. engagement with the Shiites, sources say. A source familiar with the discussions said Cheney argued this week that the United States could not again be seen to abandon the Shiites, Iraq's largest population group, after calling in 1991 for them to rise up against then-President Saddam Hussein and then failing to support them when they did. Thousands were killed in a huge crackdown.

Of the major proposals under discussion, only the "al-Qaeda option" is reflected in the Iraq Study Group's report. Recommendation 43 calls for the United States to shift priority to "the training, equipping, advising, and support mission and to counterterrorism operations."

The study group says it could support a short-term troop surge but notes that "past experience indicates that the violence would simply rekindle as soon as U.S. forces are moved to another area." The report does not, in the end, recommend more troops.

Senior administration officials caution that the review process is still fluid. "I don't think we're at the stage where we're coalescing around an option," said a top official who declined to speak on the record about internal deliberations. "These are everything's-on-the-table kinds of discussions."

Yet as it changes course, the administration is still struggling to resolve central issues, including how much it trusts Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki to tackle the two issues basic to stability: reconciliation and the militias that are fueling the sectarian violence. Despite Bush's public endorsement of Maliki after their meeting in Amman last week, U.S. officials have not yet decided whether he has the will or the capability to take on his brethren Shiites in the name of national reconciliation -- either by dismantling their militias or getting them to embrace the Sunni minority.

Bush aides said the president has been misinterpreted by those who believe he is giving the back of his hand to the Iraq Study Group, led by former congressman Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.) and former secretary of state James A. Baker III, and they insist that the report's ideas are now part of the administration's review. "There's not a purpose to distinguish or make a distinction from the Baker-Hamilton commission," the senior official said. "In fact, many of their proposals are being seriously considered."

If anything, the official argued, the commission gave Bush some running room by rejecting a rapid troop withdrawal, something some Democrats have advocated. "Nobody's going to go below what they said," the official said, meaning that because the study group set a goal of pulling out combat units by early 2008, that is now the earliest that troops could be withdrawn.

But the stature of commission members means that the White House will have to justify any deviations from their plan. "The onus will be on us to explain why we are doing something they recommended or why not," the official said. "They can't just be jettisoned. They have to be dealt with."

The president, who met yesterday with congressional leaders, vowed to work with Democrats to forge a common strategy. "We talked about the need for a new way forward in Iraq," Bush told reporters. "And we talked about the need to work together on this important subject."

With 3 Iraq Reports To Come, Bush Plans Week Of Scrutiny (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg, Carl Hulse

The New York Times, December 9, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 8 — President Bush will take part in high-visibility deliberations on Iraq next week, making visits to the Pentagon and State Department as they take part in an administrationwide effort to chart a new course in the war.

Mr. Bush will also meet with a group of academic and policy experts about Iraq on Monday, officials said, and will hold a video teleconference with senior military commanders.

The flurry of conspicuous consultation, officials said, is part of Mr. Bush's effort to come up with a new approach in Iraq under intense pressure to bring the violence there under control or begin reducing the United States' military commitment.

Officials said it was uncertain when the president would present to the nation what he has repeatedly called "a new way forward" in Iraq, though, they said, he still hoped to do so by Christmas.

The White House announced the series of meetings as it continued to face questions about how it planned to address 79 recommendations for Iraq proposed by the Iraq Study Group, whose bipartisan report included a grim analysis of the president's approach to the war.

Tony Snow, the White House press secretary, said Mr. Bush was still awaiting results of three major reviews on Iraq policy from within the administration before announcing his plans — one at the State Department, one at the Department of Defense and one at the National Security Council.

DOJ_NMG_0105034

Addressing growing anticipation in Washington for the president's new Iraq policy, Mr. Snow warned reporters on Friday, "What you look for may not be splashiness or boldness, as you may call it, but what you look for is a serious proposal that addresses the real concerns of many Americans about, are we pursuing victory, and if so, how?"

After a meeting with Mr. Bush on Friday, several Democratic leaders said they remained skeptical that he was ready to embrace a substantially different approach.

"Someone has to get the message to this man that there has to be significant changes," said Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the incoming Democratic majority leader. He said Mr. Bush, through his comments and demeanor at the session, indicated that he was not receptive to the report, which Mr. Reid said was not the work of "do-gooders" but was written by "Democrats and Republicans with wide-ranging experience."

Mr. Reid's top deputy in the Senate starting next year, Senator Richard J. Durbin of Illinois, said Mr. Bush had compared himself in the meeting to President Truman at the start of the cold war. But Mr. Durbin noted that Truman was working with a broad range of NATO allies at the time while keeping negotiations open with the Soviet Union and others — a jab at the administration's decision so far against including Syria and Iran in talks on Iraq.

Mr. Snow said Mr. Bush did indeed refer to Truman in his meeting with the Democrat, but, Mr. Snow said, "The president was really not trying to compare himself to Harry Truman so much as to talk about the duration and nature of the struggle."

The administration has so far preferred to work with allies in the region like Saudi Arabia, Jordan and Turkey, as Mr. Bush showed again Friday by speaking by telephone with the Turkish prime minister, Recep Tayyip Erdogan.

After the meeting, attended by leaders of both parties, Mr. Bush pledged to continue to consult with Congress as "we fashion a new — a new way forward in Iraq."

But Mr. Snow indicated later that in pledging bipartisanship Mr. Bush was only willing to go so far.

"What the president said clearly was that he intends to consult with Congress, and that he — the door is open," Mr. Snow said.

"There's a flip side to that question," Mr. Snow added, "Which is whether those who say, 'Mr. President, as commander in chief, we listen to you,' bend to support him."

Flexing their own muscles, Democratic leaders promised heightened scrutiny of a forthcoming request from the administration for as much as $150 billion in new emergency spending for the war. The Republican majorities in the House and Senate have generally approved the administration's previous requests, though they enforced some changes.

Given the increasing number of employees working for private contractors in Iraq and the federal money flowing to Halliburton, a company Mr. Reid described as the "poster child for what is bad about this war," Mr. Reid said the new Congress would not simply sign off on the request.

Bush Plans "Policy Adjustments" In Iraq (LAT)

By Doyle McManus, Julian E. Barnes

The Los Angeles Times, December 9, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush said Friday that he's willing to change U.S. "tactics" in Iraq once he hears recommendations from his military and diplomatic advisors, but he doesn't intend to scale back his basic goals, his spokesman said.

Bush met Friday morning with Republican and Democratic congressional leaders and said the nation needs "a new way forward in Iraq." Aides said the president will receive proposals from the Defense and State departments next week and plans to propose a set of "policy adjustments" in a speech the week before Christmas.

One of the Democrats who met with Bush, Sen. Richard J. Durbin (D-Ill.), said he was disappointed.

"When he talked about his approach to Iraq, there was no indication of a change in basic strategy," Durbin said. "He talked about changing some tactics."

White House spokesman Tony Snow acknowledged that the changes Bush was considering would be limited.

DOJ_NMG_0105035

"What the president has said is: 'We need new tactics,' " Snow told reporters. "Now what he will not change is … the goal, stated by the president: an Iraq that can govern itself, sustain itself and defend itself. What is important and is open for wide-ranging reviews is: What's the best way to do it?"

Snow and other senior officials refused to discuss the proposals that would be presented to Bush next week.

"I've been doing some deep thinking on Iraq — which, if you don't mind, I'll share first with the president," said Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, who is scheduled to discuss the issues with Bush on Monday.

Still, in responding to the recommendations of a bipartisan commission on Iraq this week, officials have suggested the rough outlines of at least some of the measures they are considering.

In some respects, the administration's thinking comes close to the recommendations of the commission led by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Rep. Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.); in others, it conflicts.

For example, Pentagon planners have long agreed with the Baker-Hamilton panel that American troops should increasingly focus on training and advising Iraqi units, and gradually withdraw from direct combat in Baghdad and other Iraqi cities.

"As we transition to Iraqi control and as I hope that we'll see us moving out of some of the major metropolitan areas … I think we could [increase training] a lot faster than many people would believe," Lt. Gen. Peter W. Chiarelli, commander of U.S. and allied ground forces in Iraq, said in a briefing.

U.S. officials have also sought for months to pressure Prime Minister Nouri Maliki to work on reconciliation among Iraq's Sunni Arab, Shiite Arab and Kurdish communities, including long-stalled measures to strengthen the Iraqi constitution's protection of minority rights and to work out a formula for sharing the country's oil revenue.

The Baker-Hamilton commission proposed that if the Iraqis do not make faster progress, "the United States should reduce its political, military or economic support for the Iraqi government." In public, the Bush administration has refused to deliver a warning that stark, fearing that it could backfire by convincing the Iraqis that U.S. troops are on their way out. But U.S. officials increasingly have talked openly about subjecting the Iraqi government to clear deadlines and benchmarks for achieving political reforms.

"I think that if we set up a series of goals, goals that are tied to dates, of certain critical things that have to be done to make all the Iraqi people believe that this is a government of national unity, that we could regain their confidence," Chiarelli said.

As for the Baker-Hamilton panel's proposal that the United States bring Iran and Syria into discussions of the future of Iraq, administration officials said they still doubt such contacts would do much good. But they said they were open to the idea of Iran and Syria participating in international conferences if the Baghdad government wanted to invite them.

"The Iraqis are very engaged with their neighbors; we will support their diplomacy in ways that they find useful and that we find useful," Rice said, but added: "In both Syria and Iran, you have states that have chosen to be on the side of the divide that is fueling extremism, not moderation. And that is the essential problem."

Putting an unusual spotlight on a normally closed-door process, the White House announced Bush's schedule of policy briefings next week and said he would make public remarks after at least one of the sessions.

National Security Council spokesman Gordon D. Johndroe said Bush would go to the State Department to be briefed by Rice and her aides Monday, would consult with U.S. military commanders in Iraq by videoconference on Tuesday, and would go to the Pentagon to hear the results of a review commissioned by the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Marine Gen. Peter Pace, on Wednesday.

The public show of deliberation appeared aimed at making the point that Bush is actively leading the search for new ideas on Iraq, not merely reacting to recommendations from outsiders — or "outsourcing" presidential decisions, as Snow put it.

A major debate in the Pentagon, apparently unresolved, is whether to propose a short-term increase or "surge" in troop strength in Iraq to make one last try at stabilizing Baghdad, as Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and some others have urged.

Gen. John P. Abizaid, commander of U.S. forces in the Middle East, and some other military officers have argued that while such a surge is possible, it would be costly — and, in any case, that political reforms in Iraq would be more important to achieve.

"I definitely think that this is winnable, but we've got to … convince the Iraqis that it's not just the military alone that will solve the problems that face them," Chiarelli said.

DOJ_NMG_0105036

Many military officers say they believe U.S. forces can still quell Iraq's insurgency and ease the sectarian violence, but only if the United States is willing to contribute more troops, more time, more money or all three.

"I think there will be some [troop increases]," said William Nash, a retired major general and analyst at the Council on Foreign Relations. "You can increase the troops by altering the way you rotate troops. You can do it for a little while, but you cannot do it for long."

The easiest way to boost the number of troops, officers said, is to alter their rotation schedule. Although the military has been looking for ways to increase the brigades' time at home to improve their training, it could speed up their deployments.

One of the most likely candidates is the 3rd Infantry Division, which served in Iraq in 2003 and 2005. The division is set to return in 2007, and its deployment conceivably could be moved up.

The military also could draw troops from Asia — Marines in Okinawa or soldiers in South Korea. However, recent threats from North Korea, which has conducted missile tests and nuclear weapons in the past five months, could dissuade generals from considering the move as their first choice.

Still, such temporary increases have caused problems. For substantial, long-term troop increases, the military would need to remobilize the National Guard, experts said — a politically unpopular move for any president. However, Chiarelli signaled commanders are willing to offer tough advice.

"I know I am leaving Iraq in a more uncertain and somewhat more tumultuous state than the last time I left," said Chiarelli, who is reaching the end of his second tour in Iraq. "We should not give in to the defeatist mood that I sometimes see displayed. This mission is the most critical and significant that we've undertaken in perhaps 50 years, and failure, in my opinion, is not an option."

Bush Targets Iraq Policy Change By Christmas (AFP)

By Stephen Collinson

AFP, December 9, 2006

President George W. Bush will work on a new approach to Iraq in meetings with top advisors next week, and could announce the strategy before Christmas, the White House said.

Pressure is building on Bush after he distanced himself from several key recommendations put forward by a top bipartisan commission this week, which called for a complete overhaul of US policy to avert Iraq's slide into chaos.

He will frame his decision in talks with his secretaries of state and defense, military commanders and US ambassador to Iraq Zalmay Khalilzad, as well as outside experts.

The White House says Bush carefully studied the Iraq Study Group report, and is awaiting results of several key internal reviews of Iraq policy.

"He's going to take all that information ... and boil that down," for the "new way forward that he wants to have in Iraq, because he knows that that's necessary," said White House deputy spokeswoman Dana Perino.

The goal is for Bush "to be able to give a speech before Christmas (December 25), but it's not set in stone," Perino said.

The Iraq Study Group report, which warns that the situation in Iraq is "grave and deteriorating," called for most US combat troops to be withdrawn by early 2008, talks with Iran and Syria, and for a new Middle East peace effort.

Bush, who admitted on Thursday that "we need a new approach" in Iraq, also discussed the situation there with top congressional leaders Friday.

"We talked about the need for a new way forward in Iraq, and we talked about the need to work together on this important subject," Bush said.

But incoming Democratic speaker of the House of Representatives Nancy Pelosi, was more combative, saying: "the time for change is now and it is apparent to the American people ... hopefully the president has got the message."

The president will visit the State Department on Monday then convene top outside experts on Iraq in the Oval Office. On Tuesday, he will have a video-conference with military commanders and Khalilzad.

Wednesday will see Bush at the Pentagon, Perino said.

DOJ_NMG_0105037

Bush has already said that even the commission did not expect him to agree with every recommendation, amid signs that the White House may pick-and-choose ideas which suit it from each review of the conflict.

But James Baker, the former US secretary of state who co-chaired the study group, said Thursday that the report should not be cherry-picked.

"I hope we don't treat this like a fruit salad and say 'I like this, but I don't like that, I like this, but I don't like that,'" Baker said.

"This is a comprehensive strategy designed to deal with this problem we're facing in Iraq."

But White House spokesman Tony Snow said: "Members of the Baker-Hamilton commission made it clear that they don't expect everybody to agree with each and every jot and tittle."

"But also that we do respect the fact that a lot of these issues are interconnected, and ought to be taken seriously as such."

Bush was cool on two key commission proposals -- talks with Iran and Syria, and withdrawing most US combat troops by early 2008.

"I've always said we'd like our troops out as fast as possible," he said, while insisting on the need to be "flexible and realistic" and tying any change in troop level to advice from US military commanders, as he has in the past.

Outgoing US Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld warned Friday that a precipitous withdrawal from Iraq would be a "terrible mistake" which would threaten the stability not only of Iraq but the region.

US military commander Lieutenant General Peter Chiarelli, meanwhile said an exit for most combat troops by early 2008 could be possible, if the Iraqi government embraces reconciliation.

"I think that's possible if in fact you have interim steps that are agreed upon and with timelines that are basically going to move us toward reconciliation," he told reporters here via video link from Baghdad.

Bush said Thursday that Damascus and Tehran might be welcome for talks if they renounced support for extremists and pledged support for Baghdad's fledgling government, otherwise "they shouldn't bother to show up."

Bush also reiterated his longstanding condition that Iran freeze sensitive nuclear work before any direct talks.

U.S. Urged To Engage Shiite Clerics (AP)

By Hamza Hendawi,

AP, December 9, 2006

The Iraq Study Group is urging Washington to push for direct contacts with two key Shiite clerics who have made clear they want nothing to do with the United States.

Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani and Muqtada al-Sadr, who have vast influence among Iraq's majority Shiites, would lose credibility if they talk to the Americans.

Al-Sistani has steadfastly refused to meet with American officials, but has been a major source of moderation in a country engulfed by violence since 2003. While suspicious of U.S. intentions, he is credited with keeping most Shiites from taking up arms against the Americans.

In contrast, al-Sadr is a tireless advocate of the withdrawal of U.S. troops from Iraq and runs a militia that fought American forces in Baghdad and across central and southern Iraq in 2004. His Mahdi Army militia also is blamed for much of the sectarian violence in Iraq.

The bipartisan U.S. report said the Bush administration "must try to talk directly" to al-Sistani and al-Sadr, as well as militia and insurgent leaders.

But the recommendation appeared to pay little heed to the fine line the clerics must tread to avoid falling victim to the political treachery of today's Iraq, where something as inconsequential as a casual greeting to a U.S. soldier can sometimes mean death at the hands of insurgents.

Iraqis close to both clerics rejected the idea.

"It is impossible, not even in dreams," said Bahaa al-Araji, one of 30 lawmakers loyal to al-Sadr. "We see the Americans as an occupation force."

DOJ_NMG_0105038

While the Iranian-born al-Sistani represents the ancient Shiite clerical establishment in the holy city of Najaf, al-Sadr is a revolutionary leader and a master of street politics. Al-Sadr is at odds with al-Sistani and other top clerics over what he sees as their acquiescence to the United States.

The elder cleric, maligned by some Sunni Arabs for his Iranian origins, must strike a delicate balance between his opposition to violence and the deep anti-U.S. sentiments widespread among Shiites and Sunnis alike. Talking directly to Washington would go a long way to disrupt that.

Al-Sistani has been powerless to prevent Shiite death squads targeting Sunni Arabs since a revered Shiite shrine was destroyed by suspected Sunni militants in February. He has appealed for an end to the violence, but that did not stop Sunnis and moderate Shiites from accusing him of not doing enough to stop the bloodshed.

The stakes are even higher for al-Sadr, whose relatively young age and lack of academic pedigree leave his family name and uncompromising anti-U.S. stand among his main assets.

The teachings of his late father, Ayatollah Mohammed Sadiq al-Sadr, remain the ideological mainstay of the Sadrist movement and the basis of the son's following.

The late al-Sadr, assassinated in 1999 by suspected Saddam agents, routinely began his Friday sermons with the chant "No, no to America" — a cry repeated by worshippers today.

Vali Nasr, an expert on Shiite affairs with the New York-based Council on Foreign Relations, said the proposal for a U.S. dialogue with al-Sistani would be beneficial to the Americans.

"Direct contact with him ... would benefit the U.S. by giving the impression to Shiites that their most senior spiritual leader is shoring up American authority in Iraq," Nasr said. "But openly meeting Americans will hurt al-Sistani's stature by giving the impression that he is legitimating U.S. policies, and more generally, that he is openly meddling in politics."

An Iraqi in regular contact with al-Sistani in Najaf said the spiritual leader, who played a key role in charting Iraq's post-Saddam Hussein political course, remained opposed to any dialogue with the United States, adding that he held Washington responsible for much of Iraq's present problems.

"Perhaps when the Americans change their Iraq strategy. Until then, there will be no contact with them, directly or indirectly," said the official, who spoke to The Associated Press on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak to the media.

While al-Araji, the Sadrist lawmaker, was categorical in his dismissal of the suggestion of direct contact between al-Sadr and the U.S. government, a top al-Sadr aide in Baghdad would not rule it out in the future.

Sheik Abdul-Zahra al-Suwaidaie, a leader of the Sadrist movement in the capital's Shiite stronghold of Sadr City, suggested that any future contacts would only take place if the United States announced a timetable for the withdrawal of its troops.

Al-Sadr "will not abandon the principle of no dialogue with the Americans," he said. "But if the Americans place a timetable for the withdrawal of their troops on the table, then our representatives could be ready to talk."

Kurds Brand Report "Unrealistic" (BBC)

BBC.com, December 9, 2006

The leader of Iraq's Kurdish region says the US Iraq Study Group report is "unrealistic and inappropriate".

Massoud Barzani was sceptical of plans to involve Iraq's neighbours in peace efforts, and for any weakening down of the Kurds' effective autonomy.

His comments were then echoed by Iraq's Kurdish president, Jalal Talabani, who said he agreed with Mr Barzani.

Earlier, the head of US forces in Iraq said most troops could be withdrawn by early 2008, as recommended.

But the commander, Lt Gen Peter Chiarelli, said such a pullout would only be realistic if Iraq first took significant steps towards political reconciliation.

US President George W Bush has publicly admitted the need for a "new approach" to the conflict in Iraq in the two days since the report was published.

DOJ_NMG_0105039

But the president has hinted that he may not accept all of the report's key recommendations.

In the first Kurdish reaction to the Iraq Study Group (ISG) report, Mr Barzani said the Iraq's Kurds were not committed to the report "in any way".

Members of the ISG did not visit Kurdish regions of northern Iraq while compiling their report, Mr Barzani said, calling that a "huge shortcoming".

He was critical of the report's emphasis on strengthening Iraq's central government, apparently "in contrast to the principles of federalism and the constitution, on which the new Iraq is built".

Calling the recommendations "inappropriate", Mr Barzani said: "We do not accept anything that opposes the constitution and the interests of the Iraqi and Kurdistan people."

His stance was backed up shortly afterwards by Iraq's President, Jalal Talabani.

"President Jalal Talabani supports the stand of the president of the Kurdistan region Massoud Barzani on the report," his office said, suggesting some of the reports recommendations ran contrary to Iraqi government policy.

A Family's Candid Friend (FT)

By Edward Luce

Financial Times, December 9, 2006

The day after publication of the Iraq Study Group's report this week, James Baker was asked whether the positive coverage would last. The septuagenarian Texan held up a tabloid front page that screamed "Surrender Monkeys" against a picture of Mr Baker and Lee Hamilton, his co-chairman.

Almost four years into the war, Mr Baker's response struck a rare chord of self-deprecation in a debate that has been dominated by unbending certitudes. On Wednesday, Americans had -reason to hope those bitter divisions might start to narrow with the release of the ISG report.

Whether that transpires, few would dispute Mr Baker was its chief architect. As secretary of state under George H.W. Bush, and as the Bush family's most loyal friend – often described as its consigliere – Mr Baker was the obvious choice to advise George W. Bush on ways out of the Iraqi morass.

Among Democrats, Mr Baker's reputation as a skilled diplomat in an era where diplomacy has been sidelined gave him credibility as someone who could bridge the gap between those who wanted to "stay the course" and those who preferred to "cut and run".

The outcome was unflattering to Mr Baker's best friend's son. Although Mr Bush said the report's 79 recommendations merited "serious consideration", its core message was uncomplimentary to his most cherished principles, even if it was rendered with bipartisan civility.

As Mr Baker, who descends from a line of Houston country club lawyers, wrote in his recent memoirs: "Rank partisanship is undignified. The best way to persuade someone to see things your way is to start by trying to see things his way." The question now is whether he can persuade the US president to see things his way.

Perhaps the toughest advice for Mr Bush would be to talk to America's adversaries, particularly Iran and Syria, which he insists would reward bad behaviour – a view Mr Baker, who talked frequently to Soviet officials, dismisses. "If it doesn't work, you don't lose a darned thing," he said.

Nobody knows better than Mr Baker the frustrations of engaging with the Middle East's authoritarian regimes. Prior to the launch of the Arab-Israeli peace process in late 1991, Mr Baker travelled to Syria 15 times. He showed equal tenacity in helping pave the way for German reunification. Mr Baker was lauded for his ability to make deals.

"While the rest of us would be going into meetings with talking points setting out what would be desirable, Baker would go in thinking: 'What is doable?' " said James Dobbins a former US diplomat. "He is always on the look out for the deal."

Although Mr Baker's latest role has been portrayed as the return of Bush senior's people to the scene, he has been providing advice to Bush junior since before he became president. In 2000, Mr Baker played a ruthlessly successful role as Mr Bush's lawyer in the controversial Florida recount following the close presidential election.

DOJ_NMG_0105040

In 2004, Mr Baker was Mr Bush's negotiator with John Kerry's Democratic campaign over the terms of the presidential debate and he also negotiated on behalf of Dick Cheney – himself a leading figure in Bush senior's administration. George W. Bush also sent Jim Baker as an envoy to the former Soviet state of Georgia.

"The idea that Jim's Iraq role is a proxy for the sudden return of Bush elder is misleading," said an old associate. "Jim was never far away." Congress set up the ISG. But Mr Baker only agreed to lead it after he was asked to do so by the president. Likewise, Mr Baker resisted pressure to publish before last month's mid-term congressional elections, which the Republicans subsequently lost.

Yet there is no disguising that much of the report will be deeply unpalatable to the US president, whose complex motivations for invading Iraq reportedly comprised a burning desire to complete his father's – and Mr Baker's – unfinished business from the first Gulf war in 1991.

It was also driven by the goal of democratising the broader region: "The road to Jerusalem goes through Baghdad," as the saying went. On Wednesday, Mr Baker suggested the opposite when he urged Mr Bush to launch an Arab-Israeli peace effort to help garner support for a stable Iraq.

Nor has Mr Baker made it easy for Mr Bush to ignore his advice, insisting it is not a "fruit salad" from which you can choose the bits you like. Yet changing events on the ground have given Mr Bush greater leeway to cherry-pick – a habit he allegedly got into with intelligence reports.

"The water is now so muddied no one knows where they are," said an associate of Mr Baker. But Mr Baker's report has not received the unmixed acclaim some had expected. The weakest element is perhaps its insistence that Mr Bush should apply strict conditions on future assis- tance to the Iraq government.

Critics say this confuses Baghdad's lack of capacity with lack of will. "It is illogical to shackle a man, throw him into turbulent waters and then tell him to save himself from drowning," says Mohsin Al-Hakim, son of Abdul Al-Hakim, one of Iraq's Shia leaders. Anthony Cordesman, a leading Iraq analyst, says it is like blaming the shop owner for the china the [American] bull has smashed.

Mr Baker has also come under fire for recommending a sharp rise in the number of US trainers "embedded" with Iraqi forces while simultaneously withdrawing combat troops.

This could expose US trainers and risk boosting the sectarian militias that control much of the Iraqi army. "It is easy to teach a soldier how to shoot," says a former official. "But shouldn't you be sure he will shoot the right people?"

Nevertheless, praise for Mr Baker's report still outweighs criticism; and whether Mr Bush agrees with the advice, it suits his purposes to appear to.

As for Mr Baker, his role might not be over. "I don't answer hypothetical questions," he said when asked whether he would become Mr Bush's envoy to lead a Middle East diplomatic offensive.

Were Mr Bush to embrace his advice on the Middle East, Mr Baker would be the obvious person to execute it. "It is impossible to think of anybody better qualified," said Brent Scowcroft, a senior official in Bush elder's administration. The odds must still be against it. Yet as Mr Baker, who has been called upon time and again to pull the Bush family's chestnuts out of the fire, has often observed: "You lose nothing by trying."

A Father's Tears (WSJ)

By Peggy Noonan

The Wall Street Journal, December 9, 2006

He stood there at the podium, the kind of podium he'd stood at 5,000 times in a long political life, and talked to the kind of audience he knew well: supporters and loyalists, old friends and new. He knew how to play them, how to use the old jokes and have fun. And suddenly he was sobbing.

He had referred to his son Jeb's first campaign for governor. He had seen some "unfair stuff," but Jeb "didn't whine about it, he didn't complain." The old president began to weep. "The true measure of a man," he then said, "is how you handle victory, and also defeat." And here a sob tore out of him and he could not continue.

It is not fully right, or fully fair, to guess about another's emotions. But no one who knows George H.W. Bush thinks that moment was only about Jeb. It wasn't only about some small defeat a dozen years ago. It would more likely have been about a number of things, and another son, and more than him.

Age exposes us, if we're lucky enough to be given it. Some say it makes you softer, some tougher, some a mix of both. Some say it just leaves you more so -- whatever you were, you are, only more. I thought of that the other day after I saw the news reports of 41's speech. I went to a private dinner at the old Bush White House once, and the president, as he sprinkled pepper on his food, began to speak of his son Neil and "the pounding" he was taking in congressional investigations on the savings-and-loan scandal. He felt Neil was being abused for political reasons. Tears came to the president's eyes, sudden and unbidden.

Afterwards I thought about the two presidents I had known. Ronald Reagan was emotionally moved by American history and the Founders, by the long sweep of history. Personal issues and relations left him more dry-eyed. His successor was enormously moved by personal relations, by his love for his children and parents and friends. But to him the sweep of history was more abstract; it didn't capture his imagination in the same way. It left him dry-eyed.

Different strokes, different folks.

From what I have seen, growing older can leave you more exposed to the force of whatever it is you're feeling. Defenses erode like a fence worn by time. But what you feel can surprise you.

You're thinking about what was, and suddenly apprehending for the first time how important it was. You think of your son, age 3, on the lawn when you drove up that time. Once that memory touched you in some way you don't fully understand, but now it makes your throat constrict because you realize that of all the things that ever happened to you, none was as important as how he looked on the lawn when you drove up that time.

Age reorders. The order is expressed by the mysterious force of a fragment of a moment. And there you are at the podium, mugged by a memory.

Maybe there was some of those things in what happened the other day at the podium. But think of what a loaded moment in history it was for Bush the elder. Barely more than a day after he spoke, the Iraq Study Group's report would be issued. It was chaired by his old friend, the one with whom he'd discussed serious things years ago only after the kids, George and Jeb and the others, left the room.

Surely Mr. Bush knew -- surely he was first on James Baker's call list -- that the report would not, could not, offer a way out of a national calamity, but only suggestions, hopes, on ways through it. To know his son George had (with the best of intentions!) been wrong in the great decision of his presidency -- stop at Afghanistan or move on to Iraq? -- and was now suffering a defeat made clear by the report; to love that son, and love your country, to hold these thoughts, to have them collide and come together -- this would bring not only tears, but more than tears.

And the younger President Bush, what of his inner world? He has been shorn of much -- his place in the winner's circle, old advisers. A man who worked for Richard Nixon reminded me the other night that when Nixon fired Haldeman and Ehrlichman, "he lost his asbestos suit." He lost his primary protectors and loyalists. President Bush is now without a similar layer. Old staffers gone, Rumsfeld gone, Cheney marginalized, Condi and Karen off representing. And the ISG. And the loss of Congress.

And yet the president presents himself each day in his chesty way, with what seems a jarring peppiness. A person who saw him in the White House a few days ago described him as "perky, seemed happy." At the modest dinner for outgoing U.N. head Kofi Annan -- one participant called it "stinting" -- the president joshingly approached a guest. "I don't see many friendly faces here!" he said, leaving the guest deadpanning later, "He mistook me for a friendly face."

Unlike anguished wartime presidents of old, he seems resolutely un-anguished. Think of the shattered Lincoln of the last Mathew Brady photographs, taken just weeks before he was assassinated. He'd gone from a bounding man of young middle age who awed his secretaries by his ability to hold a heavy ax from his fully outstretched arm, to, four years later, "the old tycoon." Or anguished Lyndon B. Johnson sitting in the cabinet room by himself, literally with his head in his hands. History takes a toll.

But George W. Bush seems, in the day to day, the same as he was. It is part of the Bush conundrum -- a supernal serenity or a confidence born of cluelessness? You decide. Where you stand on the war will likely determine your answer. But I'll tell you, I wonder about it and do not understand it, either what it is or what it means. I'd ask someone in the White House, but they're still stuck in Rote Talking Point Land: The president of course has moments of weariness but is sustained by his knowledge of the ultimate rightness of his course...

If he suffers, they might tell us; it would make him seem more normal, which is always a heartening thing to see in a president.

But maybe there is no suffering.

Maybe he outsources suffering. Maybe he leaves it to his father.

U.S. And Iraqi Accounts Vary Concerning Airstrike That Kills At Least 20 (NYT)

By Sabrina Tavernise

The New York Times, December 9, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 8 — The only thing that was clear from the accounts of Friday's airstrike by American forces north of Baghdad was that at least 20 Iraqis had been killed.

But typical of the fog of war here, American and Iraqi officials disagreed on just about every other point.

The United States military said that 20 people had been killed, including 2 women, and that they were all insurgents tied to Al Qaeda. Iraqi officials gave death tolls that ranged from 22 to 32, and said that the deceased were two extended families that included as many as 10 children.

As the situation in Iraq deteriorates, counting deaths and the numbers of attacks here has become a difficult — and politically charged — business. The Iraqi government temporarily banned the release of casualty figures this fall, and the Iraq Study Group, which issued a report on the war this week in Washington, criticized the American military for what it said was a chronic undercounting of attacks.

But an average day of violence shows just how difficult counting can be here, particularly in rural areas that are hard to reach like the site of Friday's strike, which occurred in Salahuddin, a predominantly Sunni province north of Baghdad.

In a Defense Department teleconference from Iraq, Lt. Gen. Peter W. Chiarelli, the second highest-ranking military commander in Iraq, said that 2007 would be "absolutely critical" for Iraqis and that an improvement in the situation could be achieved only by giving more Iraqis jobs and getting political leaders to reconcile.

"I happen to believe that we have done everything militarily we possibly can," he said. "I really believe the key to this conflict is to understand that it's going to take more than military action to solve the problems that face Iraq and to pull people together."

When asked about the proposal by the bipartisan Iraq Study Group that American troops be drawn down by early 2008, General Chiarelli said he thought it would be possible as long as Iraqis and their political leaders were able to follow a set schedule for reconciliation.

In a nod to American urgings, Iraq's Ministry of National Dialogue said on Friday that a national reconciliation conference, one in a series that began earlier this year, would take place in Baghdad on Dec. 16, Ali Mufeed, a spokesman for the ministry said.

The American military described Friday's attack this way: The strike occurred before dawn, shortly after American soldiers came under fire as they searched buildings. Soldiers fired back, killing two gunmen, but the shooting did not stop, and the Americans called in "close air support," which fired down on the area, killing 18 people. Two of those killed were women.

"Al Qaeda in Iraq has both men and women supporting and facilitating their operations, unfortunately," the military said in a statement. American soldiers found a weapons cache that included machines guns, suicide vests and rocket-propelled grenades, the military said.

A military spokesman, Sgt. Sky Laron, declined to give the name of the village where the battle occurred but said it was 15 miles south of Samarra and 30 miles west of Balad.

That description matches the location of the town of Ishaqi, where local police officials earlier this year accused American soldiers of killing civilians then covering it up with an airstrike. The military investigated and later cleared the soldiers.

Two Iraqi officials — the governor of the province and an official from the administration of the town of Ishaqi — said that the strike had taken place in a village near Ishaqi, and that it had killed members of the extended families of two brothers, Muhammad Hussein al-Jalmood and Mahmood Hussein al-Jalmood.

DOJ_NMG_0105043

A senior official in the Salahuddin governor's office said that six children had been killed. Amer Alwan, the official from Ishaqi, put the number at 10.

Lt. Col. Christopher Garver, a military spokesman, said that American forces had entered the site after the strike and that they counted 20 bodies. None of them were children, he said.

An Iraqi satellite channel, Sharqiya, broadcast images from what it said was the scene of the strike, showing the twisted body of one child, who looked to be about 10. It also showed people digging in the rubble of a destroyed building and women crying next to corpses wrapped in colored blankets.

The official in the Salahuddin governor's office acknowledged that a fight appeared to have taken place, as investigators found empty bullet casings sprinkled near the site of the strike. Mr. Alwan said nothing of a battle and contended that all those who were killed were civilians.

"I call on the Americans to protect the lives of the civilians," Hamid al-Qaisi, the governor of the province, said by telephone. He put the death toll at 22.

The American command has tightened the rules by which forces operate in the past year.

General Chiarelli, who championed the changes, said of the strike, "I can promise you that in every one of these incidents that occurs, that it will be fully investigated."

In southern Iraq, the British military said that more than 1,000 British and Danish troops raided villages north of Basra and arrested four Iraqis whom a spokesman identified as members of the Mahdi Army, a Shiite militia.

Three American soldiers were killed on Thursday, and two marines were wounded, the United States military said. Iraqi authorities said that 18 bodies were found across Baghdad on Friday.

U.S.-Led Forces Kill 20 Insurgents In Iraq (WP)

By Nancy Trejos

The Washington Post, December 9, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 8 -- U.S.-led coalition forces killed 20 suspected insurgents during a raid targeting al-Qaeda in Iraq fighters northwest of Baghdad on Friday morning, the U.S. military said. Two women were among the suspects killed, the military said.

Acting on intelligence reports, ground forces were searching buildings in a village near Tharthar Lake in Salahuddin province when insurgents fired machine guns at them. The troops fired back, killing two suspects, the military said in a statement. Under attack, the troops called for an airstrike, which killed 18 more suspects, the military said.

Amir Alwan, mayor of Ishaqi, disputed the military's account, saying that 10 men, 4 women and 10 children in his village were killed. News agencies published what they said were photos of dead children at the site. The military denied that civilians and children were killed.

In another raid Friday morning, coalition forces captured seven suspected insurgents near the city of Fallujah in Anbar province and destroyed a building containing a weapons cache, according to the military. Most of the cache, which included materials for making improvised explosive devices, was buried in the floors of the house.

The raids were part of stepped-up U.S. efforts to capture insurgents and their weapons. Much of the focus has been on Baghdad, but fighting continues in Anbar province, another deadly place for American troops.

"We see al-Qaeda conducting operations to kill civilians, and it starts the cycle of sectarian violence all over again," said Lt. Christopher C. Garver, a U.S. military spokesman.

The military announced Friday that two U.S. soldiers were killed the day before by a roadside bomb as they patrolled an area south of Baghdad. Two soldiers were wounded in the attack.

A roadside bomb killed another U.S. soldier in western Baghdad on Thursday, the military said.

A mortar attack Friday evening in the Nahrawan neighborhood of southeast Baghdad killed 12 people and wounded 11, according to an Interior Ministry spokesman, Abdul Karim al-Kinani.

A suicide bomber detonated explosives in his car at an Iraqi army checkpoint in the northern town of Tall Afar, killing 3 civilians and injuring 15, including some Iraqi soldiers, said the city's mayor, Brig. Najim Abdullah.

DOJ_NMG_0105044

Controversy erupted over the Tharthar raid.

Ishaqi police Capt. Mohammed Faisal said that two houses belonging to two brothers were destroyed in the bombing. Khalaf Muhammad, 41, a farmer in the Tharthar area, also said that two houses were bombed and that 18 people lived in them. He said neighbors found the bodies of women and children in the rubble.

The Associated Press released a photo of a man holding a dead child at the bombing site. Another news agency, Agence-France Presse, also showed photographs of dead children.

Asked about the photos, Garver said coalition forces who conducted the raid reported that they had found no children.

"We didn't see anything in those photos that specifically link the children to the airstrike," he said. "We weren't sure from these photos what was what."

Garver said that the two women whom troops reported killing were suspected insurgents. "There's nothing to indicate they were non-combatants," he said.

The troops also found AK-47 assault rifles, machine guns, rocket-propelled grenades, anti-personnel mines, explosives, blasting caps and suicide vests at the site, the military said.

This is not the first time residents of Ishaqi have accused American troops of misconduct. This spring, a U.S. military investigation cleared U.S. soldiers of killing 11 civilians before calling for an airstrike in a March 15 raid on a suspected insurgent hideout.

The military would not disclose the nationalities of the coalition forces involved in Friday's raid, but U.S. troops make up the largest contingent of forces in the country.

Raids also occurred in southern Iraq on Friday, with 1,000 British and Danish troops conducting a pre-dawn sweep of houses to arrest suspects in murders, kidnappings and attacks on coalition forces, according to a statement from the British military. Several suspects were arrested, the military said.

Iraqis Allege Civilians Killed In Raids (AP)

AP, December 9, 2006

The U.S. military said 20 insurgents, including two women, were killed in a raid and subsequent airstrike Friday on a predominantly Sunni village northwest of Baghdad, but local officials alleged the dead were civilians — including eight children.

In southern Iraq, British and Danish forces hunted rogue Shiite militiamen blamed for recent attacks, conducting a pre-dawn raid that was described by coalition officials as the largest offensive in the area since the war began.

In the northern battle, U.S.-led coalition forces said they were searching several buildings near Lake Tharthar in Salahuddin province when al-Qaida-linked militants launched an attack. Coalition troops returned fire, killing two insurgents, the U.S. military said.

As the firefight continued, the troops called in airstrikes that killed 18 more fighters, the military said, including two women. "Al-Qaida in Iraq has both men and women supporting and facilitating their operations unfortunately," the U.S. command's statement said.

Amir Fayadh, mayor of the village of Ishaqi east of the lake, and local police disputed the claim that the strike only killed insurgents. The mayor said that 19 civilians were among the dead, including seven women and eight children.

An Associated Press photo showed an Iraqi man in blue garb holding up the dusty head of a boy of about 10, identified by villagers as killed in the attack. The boy lay on a floral print quilt, and his right hand poked out from under a piece of fabric, his fingers curled.

The twin raids capped another bloody week of sectarian violence in Iraq, and came as Washington debated a report urging the gradual shift of coalition forces out of combat and into training roles. The report said this would prepare Iraqi forces to take over security and allow American troops to go home.

Underscoring the deadly nature of the conflict, the military said two soldiers were killed and two were wounded in an explosion south of Baghdad after they left their vehicles to examine a suspected roadside bomb.

DOJ_NMG_0105045

In a separate incident, a third U.S. soldier was killed by a roadside bomb Thursday as his patrol conducted joint operations with the Iraqi army in western Baghdad.

At least 2,928 members of the U.S. military have died since the beginning of the Iraq war in March 2003, according to an AP count. The figure includes seven military civilians. At least 2,356 died as a result of hostile action, according to the military's numbers.

At least 47 Iraqis, meanwhile, were killed or found dead Friday, including 25 who died when mortar shells landed in a poor Shiite neighborhood on the outskirts of the capital.

In the clashes near Lake Tharthar, coalition forces say they found and destroyed several weapons caches. The arsenals included AK-47s, machine guns, rocket-propelled grenades, anti-personnel mines, explosives, blasting caps and suicide vests, the command said.

In Ishaqi in the north, AP Television News gathered horrific video of the scene. The images show more than a dozen charred and bloody bodies, some of which appeared almost mummified. In the video, villagers pulled back colorful wool blankets to reveal several bodies. In some cases, it seemed impossible to guess the sex or age of the dead.

The mayor of Ishaqi initially reported that more than 19 civilians had died, before he lowered the figure. He said he was initially mistaken because a group of visitors had left the area just before the air strike.

This spring, a U.S. military investigation cleared American soldiers of misconduct in a March 15 raid in Ishaqi in which Air Force planes destroyed a building where al-Qaida in Iraq insurgents were thought to be hiding. Villagers claimed the soldiers killed 11 Iraqi civilians before calling for the airstrike.

In southern Iraq on Friday, more than 800 British forces and 200 Danish troops clashed with militia fighters during the large-scale raid in the Hartha area on the outskirts of Basra, coalition officials said.

British Maj. Charlie Burbridge, a spokesman for the coalition in southern Iraq, said five Iraqis were detained. He described them as members of a "rogue, breakaway element" of one of the area's many Shiite militias, and said the suspects were directly involved in several local attacks.

Burbridge called it the largest search and detention operation that coalition forces have conducted in southern Iraq since the war began in March 2003. The coalition said the raid consisted of multiple missions that occurred at the same time.

The Danish soldiers arrived from the north, while British armored vehicles drove in from the south, Burbridge said. Other British forces rode boats to the confluence of the Garmat Ali River and the Shatt al-Arab waterway. The operation was also supported by helicopters and jets, he said.

One of the houses searched is near two large mosques, but the raid ended long before the main Friday services, said Capt. Tane Dunlop, another spokesman for multinational forces in Basra.

In one house, he said, raiders found Katyusha rockets, roadside bombs, rifles and rocket-propelled grenades.

Hans Vedholm, spokesman for Army Operational Command Denmark, said coalition troops were tracking militants believed to be behind attacks on coalition forces. He called the operation a "huge success because no one was harmed."

British troops made the arrests while the Danes served as guides, he said, because the Danes were not allowed to detain people under their mandate in Iraq.

"They found some weapons and small arms, and also heavy weapons and roadside bombs," Vedholm said. Some British reserve forces were attacked by small arms fire, he added, but no casualties were reported.

"It was very calm. They went into the houses, they arrested five people," he said. "We have some evidence against them. It will now be used and they will put on trial in Iraq."

Elsewhere in Iraq on Friday:

• Several mortar rounds struck about seven houses in the Nahrawan area in southeastern Baghdad, killing 25 people and wounding 22, including men, women and children.

• A suicide car bomber hit an Iraqi army checkpoint, killing three people and wounding 15, including five children, in Tal Afar. In March, President Bush called the city near the Syrian border an example of progress in securing Iraq.

• A sniper shot to death an Iraqi translator who worked with U.S. troops in Karmah, 50 miles west of Baghdad.

DOJ_NMG_0105046

• Police found 18 bullet-riddled bodies in Baghdad neighborhoods. Some were bound, blindfolded and bore evidence of torture.

Al-Zarqawi Said Shiites Most Dangerous (AP)

By Omar Sinan,

AP, December 9, 2006

The slain terror leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi purportedly believed that Iraq's Shiite Muslims were more dangerous than U.S. forces and more evil than dictator Saddam Hussein, according to a posthumous interview published Friday on the Internet.

The 33-page interview, conducted sometime before a U.S. fighter bomber killed the former al-Qaida in Iraq leader in June, could not be immediately authenticated. It was posted on a Web site known to be a clearing-house for al-Qaida material.

The posting, which comes amid ongoing sectarian violence in Iraq, said the interview had been kept in al-Qaida's archive but did not explain why the terror group had decided to release it six months after his death.

In the interview, al-Zarqawi is quoted as saying the leader of Iraq's Shiites, Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, is a "satan" who publicly tells Shiites to stay above the violence but secretly tells them to attack.

"Al-Sistani has ordered his followers not to fight the Americans ... and yet they hit Sunnis with assassinations, forcing them to flee their homes and attacking their mosques," said al-Zarqawi, a Sunni from Jordan. "For us, the Shiites are far more dangerous than the Americans."

"The mass graves that Saddam perpetrated, and all his other crimes over the past decades, do not amount to one-tenth of what the Shiites have done in the last three years," al-Zarqawi is quoted as saying.

Earlier this week, a bipartisan commission in the United States warned "the situation in Iraq is grave and deteriorating" and recommended fundamentally different U.S. policies to combat the sectarian violence roiling the country.

The Iraq Study Group report also concluded that al-Qaida in Iraq is now largely made up of Sunni Arabs. Some 1,300 foreign fighters are believed to support the group or be available to carry out suicide bombings, the study found.

In the interview, Al-Zarqawi condemns the attacks of Iraq's Shiite Muslim militiamen on the country's Sunni Muslim community. Yet it was al-Zarqawi who had fomented Shiite-Sunni strife as the best way to scuttle the U.S. plans to rebuild Iraq as a democratic state after Saddam's overthrow.

Al-Zarqawi, whose real name was Ahmad Fadhil Nazzal al-Khalayleh, was responsible for the most vicious of the wave of attacks that occurred in the first years of the Iraqi insurgency. He is believed to have personally beheaded at least two American hostages. The U.S. had put a $25 million bounty on his head, the same amount as for al-Qaida leader Osama bin Laden.

In the interview, al-Zarqawi also rails against the leader of the Lebanese Shiite militant group Hezbollah, implicitly accusing Sheik Hassan Nasrallah of being in league with Israel.

Al-Zarqawi accuses Nasrallah of being two-faced in his opposition to Israel and suggests it is not an accident that Israeli aircraft have not killed him as they have killed several leaders of the Palestinian militant group Hamas.

"Hassan Nasrallah sits for hours at a military parade and Israeli aircraft don't bomb him. Who is he kidding?" al-Zarqawi is quoted as saying.

Iraq Sunni Clerics To Boycott Reconciliation Talks (AFP)

AFP, December 9, 2006

Iraq's leading Sunni clerics' organization will boycott a national reconciliation conference called by Shiite Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki to end sectarian bloodletting, it has said.

The Muslim Scholars' Association said it had not received an invitation to the meeting, which is to be held on December 16.

"The association will not participate in the reconciliation conference as proposed by the government," said Sheikh Mohammed Bashar al-Faidhi, spokesman of the association, arguing that previous talks had failed.

DOJ_NMG_0105047

"We have seen in the past more than once that the government signs some agreements and later goes back on it," he told AFP Saturday, referring to a peace conference in Cairo last year.

"In any case, we have not been invited to the conference," he added.

The head of the association, Sheikh Hareth al-Dhari, is currently outside Iraq. The government has opened a criminal investigation against him for allegedly inciting sectarian violence against Iraq's Shiite majority.

The conference was first due to take place in early 2006 but had been postponed due to an upsurge in the violence plaguing Iraq. On Friday, officials announced it would take place next week.

Iraq's warring Shiite and Sunni communities are locked in brutal tit-for-tat sectarian violence that has left thousands dead since February when a revered Shiite shrine was bombed by Sunni militants.

US, Iraqi Forces Detain Aide Of Shiite Radical Leader (AFP)

AFP, December 9, 2006

US and Iraqi forces arrested Shiite radical leader Moqtada al-Sadr's representative in the central city of Kut and seven of his guards, a security official and a Sadr spokesman has said.

Sheikh Yahya Ahmed al-Khafaji, the head of Sadr's movement in Kut, 175 kilometres (110 miles) southeast of Baghdad, was seized in an early morning swoop on his office, an Iraqi security official said on condition of anonymity.

A Sadr spokesman in Baghdad confirmed the raid.

"We have information that US and Iraqi forces arrested the chief of our office in Kut and his seven guards early today. They also took away office equipment such as computers and other papers," said Sheikh Saleh Hassan Saturday.

He said the Sadr group was planning a protest in front of the provincial governor's office in Kut to demand their release.

"If occupation forces are so active and capable, they should target terrorist hideouts and not escalate violence in peaceful regions like Kut," said Hassan, who is also a member of the Iraqi parliament.

The raid was also confirmed by another Sadr aide from the cleric's main office in the Shiite holy city of Najaf.

The US military has often targeted supporters of Sadr, whose Mahdi Army militia is accused of killing Sunni Arab civilians amid the sectarian bloodshed gripping Iraq.

GOP Senator Calls Iraq Policy "Absurd," Urges Pullout (WP)

By Thomas E. Ricks

The Washington Post, December 9, 2006

Sen. Gordon Smith, a moderate Oregon Republican, broke sharply with the Bush administration over the war in Iraq in an emotional speech on the Senate floor Thursday night in which he called for a U.S. pullout.

"I, for one, am at the end of my rope when it comes to supporting a policy that has our soldiers patrolling the same streets in the same way, being blown up by the same bombs day after day," he said. "That is absurd. It may even be criminal. I cannot support that anymore."

Smith, who has shown some maverick tendencies in the past, such as when he blocked the 2005 budget resolution until his GOP colleagues agreed to add billions of dollars to Medicaid, said that he had "tried to be a good soldier. . . . I have tried to support our president."

He said that Bush "is not guilty of perfidy, but I do believe he is guilty of believing bad intelligence and giving us the same." He said he would not have voted in favor of invading Iraq had he known what he knows now.

The positive events in Iraq, such as its elections and the toppling of the statue of Saddam Hussein, "now . . . seem much like ashes to me."

Speaking to a largely empty Senate chamber, Smith rejected the Iraq Study Group's key recommendation that the U.S. military reshape its approach to Iraq and focus less on combat operations and more on training and advising Iraqi forces. He said it seemed to him to be a "recipe for retreat," not an immediate withdrawal but rather "cut and walk."

He said he doubts that the bipartisan commission's approach is wise if it would simply delay the inevitable. The U.S. government, he said, should find a way to either "win or bring our troops home."

Car Bomb Kills Five Near Iraq Shiite Shrine (AFP)

AFP, December 9, 2006

A powerful car bomb has killed at least five people and wounded dozens more close to one of Iraq's holiest Shiite shrines in the central city of Karbala.

Salim Khadum, spokesman for Karbala's health department, said that five people had been killed and 44 wounded in the attack, according to an initial toll. A security official confirmed these figures Saturday.

The blast erupted at 11:00 am (0800 GMT) in Al-Abbas street, a few hundred metres (yards) from the Imam al-Abbas mausoleum, the final resting place of the son of the founder of Shiite Islam and one of the sect's early leaders.

Several civilian cars and a row of shops caught fire.

Despite thick smoke and flames, crowds of bystanders converged on the scene but were driven back by police, fearful of a follow-up blasts, a hallmark of attacks by Iraq's insurgent car bomb cells.

Karbala city authorities ordered roads into the city closed to traffic from other towns, allowing only residents to circulate in the popular Shiite pilgrimage destination until the sitaution stabilises.

The attack will probably be blamed on Sunni extremists and came hot on the heels of a call by Shiite Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki for a reconciliation conference to stem raging sectarian violence.

Bomb attacks on Shiite shrines and civilians have been one of the major motors driving the cycle of sectarian revenge attacks which have brought the country to the brink of civil war.

More than 100 Iraqis are killed every day in insurgent and sectarian violence and this week a major report into US strategy described the situation as "grave and deteriorating" and warned it could trigger a regional war.

Maliki has summoned the leaders of Iraq's factions to a national peace conference on December 16 but already on Saturday at least one major Sunni group vowed to stay away.

Shiite leaders have also warned that they will not attend if figures linked to the Baath party of ousted president Saddam Hussein -- some of whom have roles in the insurgency -- are invited.

Tribal Leaders Detained In Southern Iraqi City (LAT)

By Molly Hennessy-Fiske

The Los Angeles Times, December 9, 2006

BAGHDAD — About 1,000 British and Danish troops staged a major raid Friday in Basra, Iraq's second-largest city, detaining five tribal leaders with ties to Shiite militias, British officials said.

The operation was the largest in Basra since the 2003 U.S.-led invasion that toppled Saddam Hussein's government, said Maj. Charlie Burbridge, a spokesman for British forces in Basra.

The move was part of an effort by the British, who are in charge of security in Basra, to suppress fighting among Shiite groups and tribes in the area.

Tribes in the Hartha district of Basra, where the Tigris and Euphrates rivers meet, have been clashing for decades, ever since Hussein's draining of the marshy area created disputed territory and simmering "blood feuds," Burbridge said.

Shiite groups, meanwhile, are vying for control of the local government. Basra's political leadership is almost evenly split between the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq, or SCIRI, which has affiliates in Iran, and Al Fadila al Islamiya, a homegrown party.

The area is also home to a large group of Shiites loyal to Muqtada Sadr, a radical anti-U.S. cleric, and his Al Mahdi army.

'Part of a network'

Burbridge said the five men arrested Friday belong to "a rogue breakaway element of a Shiite militia … part of a network that's operating in Basra." A Sadr official in Basra said at least one of the men was allied with the cleric's army.

The raid began at 3 a.m., with Royal Marine amphibious assault teams creeping up from the river, 800 British troops closing in from the south, 200 Danish troops arriving from the north, and helicopters and jets hovering overhead, Burbridge said.

British troops in the region, who number about 7,300, usually conduct raids in smaller, more nimble groups of about 250, Burbridge said. This time, the 1,000 soldiers split up into groups to seize the five men simultaneously at their homes, preventing them from alerting one another and going into hiding for weeks, said Capt. Tane Dunlop, also a spokesman for the south's multinational forces.

"These are people who are involved in planning and carrying out terrorist acts in the area," Dunlop said.

British and U.S. authorities would not disclose the detainees' names, but Khalil Maliki, who heads Sadr's Basra office, said they include Kadhum Abid Ali, the mayor of Hartha, who is allied with Sadr's followers.

A witness to the raid, retiree Sami Halfi, 58, said he saw the mayor arrested at his home at dawn. Four months ago, he said, the mayor's son was also detained by British forces.

No civilians or troops were injured in the raid, Burbridge said, and Iraqi army and police forces were not involved, although soldiers from the Iraqi army's 10th Division patrolled the streets afterward.

Friday morning, gunmen from the Garamsha and Shaghanba tribes protested the operation, blocking the main road to Baghdad, said Maliki, the Sadr official. By afternoon, they had sent a letter to British regional commanders demanding the release of the five leaders and threatening to overthrow the local government.

The gunmen withdrew at 3 p.m. at the urging of tribal leaders, who are negotiating with city officials to exert pressure on the British to win the detainees' release, Iraqi police Lt. Basim Abdul Nabi said.

At local mosques, clerics used their Friday sermons to appeal for the leaders' release.

"If the British forces don't release the five detainees, then the tribes will break into the governorate [building], since the local government is not being able to protect its own people," said Shiite cleric Abdul Kareem Enzi, who is associated with Sadr.

Ali Khanani, who leads the SCIRI political bureau in Basra, said British troops should let the Iraqi army and police secure the city, rather than "use violence and violation in their raids."

"The best thing the multinational troops could do at this point is hand over security to the Iraqis," he said.

On Friday, at least 29 people died in violence nationwide. During the preceding 24 hours, 18 bodies were found in Baghdad, some shot execution-style.

The U.S. military announced that a roadside bomb killed an American soldier Thursday during a joint patrol with the Iraqi army in west Baghdad, bringing the number of U.S. troops killed this month to 37.

North of Baghdad

Elsewhere in Iraq, U.S. forces conducted a raid north of Baghdad, killing 20 people. Military officials said the dead, including two women, were all armed insurgents with ties to the group Al Qaeda in Iraq. Residents said civilians had been targeted and killed.

The raid began at 12:30 a.m. Friday in the village of Jazeera in the Ishaqi farming region, about 50 miles north of Baghdad. Troops searched homes and traded fire with residents before calling in planes to bomb the area, the military said in a statement.

Eighteen men and two women were killed, two of them during the initial fighting, the military said. Soldiers also destroyed several weapons caches, containing AK-47s, machine guns, rocket-propelled grenades, antipersonnel mines, explosives, blasting caps and suicide vests, it said.

The Interior Ministry said the raid killed 19 — 10 children, five women and four men — and that no weapons were found in the area. Mayor Amer Alwan said troops killed four women, six children and 15 men, all execution-style. Witnesses identified the owners of the two homes targeted as brothers Mohammed and Mahmood Jalmood.

"The American sources say that they were terrorists, but they were a family of two brothers and among them were children and women," said Hamad Kaisi, governor of surrounding Salahuddin province.

Residents later displayed the bodies of five children, wrapped in blankets.

Photographs taken at the bombing site Friday afternoon show a man wrapping a child's bloodied body in a blanket, rows of wrapped bodies, and a gray, rubble-filled crater the size of a small house.

It was the second major raid by U.S. forces on Ishaqi this year. In March, soldiers looking for insurgents fired into the home of a schoolteacher, killing 11 people, including five children.

Military investigators later cleared the soldiers of wrongdoing but acknowledged nine civilian casualties, six more than originally reported.

How Syria May Hold Key To Iraq (WSJ)

By Yochi J. Dreazen, Neil King

The Wall Street Journal, December 9, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Bush administration has spent the past six years shaking its fist at Syria because of Damascus's ties to Islamic extremists across the Middle East. But now Iraq's civil war is sparking calls for the U.S. to reach out to Syria, raising the possibility of a U.S. policy shift that could put Washington on a collision course with Israel.

Members of the Baker-Hamilton commission, backed quietly by a number of senior Bush administration officials, say it is critical for the U.S. to find a way of persuading Syria to abandon its close ties with Iran and drop its support for Hezbollah and other militants. They want the White House to offer Damascus a series of economic and political incentives, including America's help in pressuring Israel to relinquish the disputed Golan Heights.

The approach would be a high-stakes turnaround for the Bush administration that would be certain to anger Washington's closest ally in the Middle East; senior Israeli officials are already publicly objecting to the possibility of new U.S. overtures to Syria. But advocates of greater engagement with Syria argue that there may be no other choice. They say a decision by Syria to use its influence over Iraq's Sunni population to help calm the situation there -- paired with Syrian moves to end support to Islamic-militant groups like Hamas -- could significantly improve conditions in Iraq and across the region.

Securing Syrian assistance would come at a high cost, and so far the Bush administration has reacted coolly to the idea. Senior administration officials question both the intentions and the capabilities of Syrian President Bashar al-Assad, whom they deride as weak and untrustworthy.

These officials argue that Mr. Assad -- who took power in 2000 after the death of his father, strongman leader Hafez -- is unable to control his government or military firmly enough to ensure that a formal Syrian commitment to cut ties to Hezbollah or Hamas would be honored. "He's not his father," one senior official said.

The calls to engage Syria are alarming many Israeli officials, who fear Washington's need to extricate itself from the morass in Iraq may result in new American pressure for Israeli territorial concessions.

Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert this past week said that his government disagrees with the "attempt to create linkage between the Iraqi issue and the Mideast issue" and that it would be premature to resume peace talks with Syria. Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni was scheduled to meet with U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice Saturday to relay her government's concerns, Israeli officials said.

Edward Djerejian, a former U.S. ambassador to Syria who drafted a good portion of the Baker-Hamilton commission's report, said that Syria is the key to the regional puzzle and that the U.S. can ill afford to ignore it. The panel, a congressionally funded group of five prominent Democrats and five leading Republicans, said in the report issued this past week that the administration's Iraq policy is failing and called for most U.S. combat troops to leave the country by early 2008.

In an interview, Mr. Djerejian said the aim of any future U.S. negotiations with Syria should be to persuade Damascus to cut off its aid and trans-shipment of Iranian arms to Hezbollah in Lebanon and Hamas in the Palestinian territories. In addition, Syria should be pressured to cajole Hamas into recognizing Israel's right to exist, a move -- however unlikely -- that could rejuvenate the stalled peace talks between Israel and the Palestinians.

Mr. Djerejian said talks with Syria would have a second, important goal: driving a wedge between Damascus and Tehran, whose growing political and military alliance is sparking fears of an Iranian-dominated "Shiite crescent" stretching from Iran to Lebanon. The U.S. is already making a broad push to enlist traditional Sunni Arab powers like Egypt in a coalition to offset Shiite Iran's growing regional power, but Mr. Djerejian said the effort is doomed to fail without Syrian involvement. Syria is controlled by members of its Allawite minority, a form of Shiism that is rejected as heretical by some Sunnis.

The heated debate over Syria reflects growing concern in Washington over the dire situation in Iraq, where a civil war has left tens of thousands of Iraqis dead, along with nearly 3,000 American military personnel. The chaos there has sparked fears of a wider, regional conflagration.

When the U.S. invaded Iraq in March 2003, President Bush argued that getting rid of Saddam Hussein was the best way to boost the chances for a settlement of the Arab-Israeli conflict. Now, the Iraq Study Group is arguing the reverse: that ending the Arab-Israeli conflict, particularly the long-running dispute between Israel and Syria, would do much to improve the odds for success in Iraq.

Critics in the U.S., in Israel and among some Arab allies have questioned that assertion. They say the approach recommended by the commission co-chairmen, former Secretary of State James Baker III and former Democratic Rep. Lee Hamilton, risks further empowering Damascus and Tehran, with slim chance of getting anything in return.

Dennis Ross, a former Mideast envoy in the Clinton and first Bush administrations, said he favors greater engagement with Syria provided that Washington first tells the Assad government that it would pay a price for choosing not to cooperate. He said the administration could threaten to fully enforce the Syria Accountability Act, legislation enacted in 2003 that imposes travel and economic sanctions on the country, or impose other punitive measures. The U.S. could also make clear that it could make a new push for a Syrian-Israeli peace accord if Damascus drops its support for Hamas and Hezbollah.

"It's important to not convince Syria that we need them more than they need us," Mr. Ross said. "You have to concentrate their minds with what they will lose by not cooperating before you can get them to change their behavior."

Israeli officials and their congressional supporters question the Iran Study Group's recommendation that the U.S. convene a new round of Mideast peace talks with an eye toward cajoling Israel to return the Golan Heights to Syria. The group said in its report that the strategically important plateau, which Israel seized in the 1967 Six Day War, is the biggest incentive that could be offered to Syria. The Clinton administration during its last year in office tried to broker an Israeli withdrawal from the Golan Heights in exchange for security guarantees and a full peace accord with Syria, but the talks broke down in 2000 and haven't resumed.

Dore Gold, a former Israeli ambassador to the United Nations, said in a critique of the Baker report that "it is particularly disturbing" that the panel "does not call for the complete dismantling of international terrorist organizations in Syria as a precondition for the Israeli-Syrian agreement it foresees."

Messrs. Baker and Hamilton have said they are hopeful that Syria might be open to cooperating over Iraq, a confidence they don't share vis-à-vis Iran.

Mr. Baker said he isn't making Israel a pawn in a plan to rescue the U.S. in Iraq. "The road to peace in Iraq lies through Baghdad," he said this past week. "The road to Arab-Israeli peace lies through Jerusalem. We are not linking the two, but there is a relationship."

Rice Wary Of Seeking Iran, Syria's Help (AP)

By Anne Gearan

AP, December 9, 2006

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice voiced skepticism on Friday over a bipartisan panel's recommendation that the United States seek Iran and Syria's help to stabilize Iraq, saying they should want to take such steps on their own.

If those two nations truly want to help, "they will act on that because it's in their interest," Rice said.

"Let's remember that the issue here is behavior. Can you change the behavior of these states?" she asked at a news conference at the State Department with the German foreign minister.

Rice also said the United States is making progress toward a deal on imposing United Nations sanctions on Iran over its nuclear program although "we're not there yet" after a disappointing round of talks among world powers this week.

Rice was asked about recommendations issued on Wednesday by a panel headed by Republican James A. Baker III and Democrat Lee Hamilton calling for withdrawal of most U.S. combat troops from Iraq by early 2008. The panel also called for overtures to Iran and Syria, a course the Bush administration has thus far rejected.

The report cited a grave and deteriorating situation in Iraq.

"None of us see the situation in Iraq as favorable. We all see it as extremely difficult," Rice said.

She said the situation in Iraq and the broader Middle East was high on the agenda of her talks with German Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier.

As to the effort to impose sanctions on Iran for refusing to abandon the enrichment of uranium, Rice said, "I think we're making some progress on the resolution in the Security Council. We're not there yet, but I do think we're making some progress."

DOJ_NMG_0105052

Of the Baker-Hamilton report, Rice said it was "a very good report by people that I admire. I think they have done a great service in pointing out, through analysis and recommendations, how they see the situation in Iraq."

She said the U.S. needs to give Iraq "better tools, particularly on the security side," as the report suggests.

"I've been doing some deep thinking on Iraq, which if you don't mind I'll share first with the president as he begins to think about what new course we need," Rice said.

President Bush is expected to deliver a speech outlining his latest strategy proposal for Iraq before Christmas. He has said he will draw not only from the Baker-Hamilton report, but from ongoing studies by the Pentagon, the National Security Agency and the State Department.

Rice said that if Iran and Syria, which the United States accuses of fomenting terrorism in the Middle East, really wanted to help bring peace to Iraq, they would do so.

She noted that the Iraqi government has contacts with both countries and is capable of engaging in its own diplomacy.

She added that if Iran and Syria are "looking for compensation to stop helping destabilize Iraq, that's another matter altogether."

The Bush administration is leery of contacts with Iran that would allow the Shiite clerical leaders to try to avoid or lessen U.N. punishment in return for help in Iraq. Iran has influence among Iraqi Shiites, and the two countries share both a complicated history and a porous border.

The U.S. and Europeans are pushing for a U.N. sanctions resolution by the end of the year. The West accuses Iran of hiding plans to build a bomb while developing what it claims is a peaceful program to produce nuclear power.

Iran was on the agenda for a meeting Rice held earlier Friday with Russian national security adviser Igor Ivanov, whose nation has resisted strong sanctions for months.

Germany, France and Britain led failed talks with Iran last year that European powers had hoped would avert U.N. sanctions. Europe joined the United States in seeking sanctions early this year, but the process has bogged down repeatedly over objections from Russia and China. Both nations are permanent, veto-holding members of the U.N. Security Council that have trade and other ties to Iran.

Watchdog Agency For Iraq Projects Survives (NYT)

By James Glanz

The New York Times, December 9, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 8 — After weeks of legislative maneuvering, the House passed a bill on Friday extending the life of a federal oversight agency that will now have the authority to examine $32 billion in American taxpayer expenditures on reconstruction in Iraq through approximately 2008.

A spokeswoman at the White House, Emily A. Lawrimore, said President Bush intended to sign the bill, which had been introduced in the House by Representative Ike Skelton, Democrat of Missouri. On Wednesday, the Senate passed an identical bill, sponsored by Senator Susan Collins, a Maine Republican, and by a bipartisan group of legislative allies.

Mr. Skelton suggested that after Congress reconvened in January, he might seek to expand the authority still further, possibly going beyond physical and institutional reconstruction projects to money being used to train and equip Iraqi security forces.

“More work must be done to ensure the oversight of all taxpayer dollars invested in Iraq,” Mr. Skelton said in a statement.

The financial authority of the oversight agency, called the Office of the Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction, had already been expanded in October. But in a provision backed by Representative Duncan Hunter, Republican of California, the office would have been forced to begin shutting down soon and handing its duties over to offices at the Pentagon and the State Department.

Opponents of that move doubted that Bush administration agencies would be sufficiently motivated to investigate themselves, a contention that Pentagon and State officials dismissed. But after the bipartisan Iraq Study Group recommended Wednesday that the special inspector general be maintained for as long as American financial assistance was flowing to Iraq, there was swift action on the new House and Senate bills.

DOJ_NMG_0105053

The special inspector general's office, run by Stuart W. Bowen Jr., also has the authority to look at about $20 billion in reconstruction directed by American officials but paid for with Iraqi oil proceeds and assets seized from Saddam Hussein's government. That authority is unchanged by the new legislation.

Iraqis Near Deal On Distribution Of Oil Revenues (NYT)

By Edward Wong

The New York Times, December 9, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 8 — Iraqi officials are near agreement on a national oil law that would give the central government the power to distribute current and future oil revenues to the provinces or regions, based on their population, Iraqi and American officials say.

If enacted, the measure, drafted by a committee of politicians and ministers, could help resolve a highly divisive issue that has consistently blocked efforts to reconcile the country's feuding ethnic and sectarian factions. Sunni Arabs, who lead the insurgency, have opposed the idea of regional autonomy for fear that they would be deprived of a fair share of the country's oil wealth, which is concentrated in the Shiite south and Kurdish north.

The Iraq Study Group report stressed that an oil law guaranteeing an equitable distribution of revenues was crucial to the process of national reconciliation, and thus to ending the war.

Without such a law, it would also be impossible for Iraq to attract the foreign investment it desperately needs to bolster its oil industry.

Officials cautioned that this was only a draft agreement, and that it could still be undermined by the ethnic and sectarian squabbling that has jeopardized other political talks. The Iraqi Constitution, for example, was stalled for weeks over small wording conflicts, and its measures are often meaningless in the chaos and violence in Iraq today.

But a deal on the oil law could be reached within days, according to officials involved in the drafting. It would then go to the cabinet and Parliament for approval.

The major remaining stumbling block, officials said, concerns the issuing of contracts for developing future oil fields. The Kurds are insisting that the regions reserve final approval over such contracts, fearing that if that power were given to a Shiite-dominated central government, it could ignore proposed contracts in the Kurdish north while permitting them in the Shiite south, American and Iraqi officials said.

The national oil law lies at the heart of debates about the future of Iraq, particularly the issue of a strong central government versus robust regional governments. The oil question has also inflamed ethnic and sectarian tensions. Sunni Arabs, who preside over areas of the country that apparently have little or no oil, are adamant about the equitable distribution of oil revenues by the central government.

On the drafting committee, Sunni Arabs have allied with the Shiites against the Kurds, who have sought to maintain as much regional control as possible over the oil industry in their autonomous northern enclave. Iraqi Kurdistan has enjoyed de facto independence since 1991, when the American military established a no-flight zone above the mountainous region to prevent raids by Saddam Hussein.

Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the senior American commander here, and Zalmay Khalilzad, the American ambassador, have urged Iraqi politicians to put the oil law at the top of their agendas, saying it must be passed before the year's end.

The drafting committee is made up of ministers and politicians from the main Shiite, Sunni Arab and Kurdish blocs in government. They began talks months ago, but the pace picked up recently, said an American official tracking the negotiations, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he did not want to give the appearance of Western interference in sovereign Iraqi matters.

At the start of the talks, the Kurds fought to ensure that regional governments have the power to collect and distribute revenues from future fields, Iraqi and American officials said. They also proposed that revenues be shared among the regions based on both population and crimes committed against the people under Mr. Hussein's rule. That would have given the Kurds and Shiites a share of the oil wealth larger than the proportions of their populations.

DOJ_NMG_0105054

But the Kurds dropped those demands, said Barham Salih, a deputy prime minister who is a Kurd and the chairman of the committee.

"Revenue sharing is an accepted principle by all the constituent elements of the Iraqi government, including the Kurds, and that is the unifying element that we're all hoping for in the oil law," Mr. Salih said in an interview.

The American official said the Kurds were willing to make concessions because a national oil law could attract more foreign oil companies to exploration and development in Kurdistan. A large foreign oil company would have more confidence in signing a contract with the Kurds if it were to operate under the law of a sovereign country rather than just the law of an autonomous region.

Some Kurdish leaders also believe that the concessions are a worthwhile price to pay for having a stake in the much larger revenue pool of the country's oil industry, the American official said. The southern fields accounted for 85 percent of total Iraqi crude production last year, partly because northern production was hampered by insurgent sabotage. The south has an estimated 65 percent of the country's 115 billion barrels of proven reserves.

But the Kurds are still holding out on the issue of oil contracts, arguing that the Constitution guarantees the regions absolute rights in those matters. The Kurds recently discovered two new oil fields after signing exploration contracts with a Turkish company and a Norwegian company.

"There are those among us who say we cannot go back to the former days of centralization, which were not conducive to good business practice and to the idea of federalism that is enshrined in the Constitution," Mr. Salih said.

In its recommendations released Wednesday, the Iraq Study Group took the opposite tack, to the anger of the Kurds. The report said that "no formula that gives control over revenues from future fields to the regions or gives control of oil fields to the regions is compatible with national reconciliation." Though the Kurds have ceded their position on the issue of future revenues, they are fighting for control over the development of future fields.

The drafting committee met Thursday night to try to resolve the contract issue, but could not reach an agreement.

Distributing revenues by population could be a difficult matter without a reliable census, which Iraq lacks. Sunni Arabs often claim they are at least 60 percent of the population, not the 20 percent that is commonly cited. The Shiites are generally estimated to be 60 percent of the population, and the Kurds 20 percent. The American official said a national census expected to be taken next year should determine the share of revenue that goes to each province or region.

If doing a census next year is too politically fraught, or if security conditions prevent it, then revenues could be distributed to provincial or regional governments according to the household counts used by Mr. Hussein's government to distribute rations in the 1990s.

The Kurds have insisted that revenues collected by the central government should be put into an account that automatically redistributes the money into sub-accounts dedicated to the provinces or regions. This approach could be written into the national oil law or into a separate law, the American official said.

The working draft of the oil law re-establishes the state-run Iraq National Oil Company, which was founded in 1964 to oversee oil production but was shut down by Mr. Hussein in 1987. The company would operate using a business model and not through a government budget process. Iraqi and American officials say that would make management of oil production more efficient and separate it from the Oil Ministry, which has been rife with corruption.

The North and South Oil Companies, which currently manage production in their regions, would fall under the umbrella of the Iraq National Oil Company. Any exports would still be sold through a state marketing company.

The law also sets production thresholds for creating new regional companies. A province or region, for example, might have to show it can produce 100,000 barrels a day before a company can be created there. Officials in Maysan Province in the south have already said they want to start a company.

Iraq Bribe Prosecutors Criticised As "lazy" (FT)

By Hugh Williamson, Adam Jones

Financial Times, December 9, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0105055

State prosecutors are dragging their feet investigating corruption in the Iraq oil-for-food programme, according to one of the authors of last year's United Nations report on one of the world's largest bribery scandals.

Mark Pieth, a Switzerland-based lawyer who wrote the report with Paul Volcker, former chairman of the US Federal Reserve, told the Financial Times that prosecutors in many countries were too career-minded, too unwilling to enter new legal terrain "and sometimes simply lazy".

In spite of high-profile investigations in Australia, France and elsewhere, few cases have led to charges being laid in the 13 months since the report was published. Mr Pieth said he was "astonished" the report's conclusions had not led to organisational changes in the UN, which was accused of mishandling the oil-for-food programme.

He welcomed the October decision by a Paris judge working on the oil-for-food scandal to charge with corruption Christophe de Margerie, head of exploration and production at Total, the French oil and gas group.

Mr Pieth said the "spectacular" case meant there were "many doubts" that Mr de Margerie, would, as planned, become chief executive next year. He added that this relatively rare breakthrough was because of France's handful of "very stubborn" anti-graft prosecutors. Total said yesterday Mr de Margerie would take up the post as planned in February. It has previously denied violating the UN embargo in place against Iraq until 2002.

Prosecutors in various countries have complained of the unclear legal basis for prosecuting the 2,200 companies named as law-breakers in the Volcker report. But Mr Pieth said the investigations were "straightforward legal work".

"As a prosecutor you rarely get promoted for such work, so many are not interested in it," said Mr Pieth, chair of the Basel Institute on Governance and adviser to the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development.

He accused governments of failing to provide enough support to identify companies that allegedly paid kickbacks to Saddam Hussein's regime to gain contracts.

Mr Pieth said an Australian inquiry that last month confirmed evidence of corruption in the Australian Wheat Board's involvement in the UN programme was important because it showed "the AWB knew even more [about corruption in Iraq] than it was willing to admit" to the Volcker inquiry.

Iraqis Line Up To Put Hussein In The Noose (NYT)

By Kirk Semple

The New York Times, December 9, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 8 — One of the most coveted jobs in Iraq does not yet exist: the executioner for Saddam Hussein. The death sentence against Mr. Hussein is still under review by an appeals court, but hundreds of people have already started lobbying the prime minister's office for the position.

They have sent messages through cabinet officials and their assistants, and by way of government guards and clerical workers. One candidate, an Iraqi Shiite living in London whose brother was killed by Mr. Hussein, telephoned an aide to the prime minister to say he was prepared to drop everything and fly to Baghdad to execute the former ruler.

"One of the hardest tasks will be to determine who gets to be the hangman because so many people want revenge for the loss of their loved ones," said Basam Ridha, an adviser to Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki.

Mr. Hussein and two of his top associates, Barzan Ibrahim al-Tikriti and Awad al-Bandar, were sentenced to "death by hanging" on Nov. 5 for their involvement in the arrest and killings of 148 men and boys after an assassination attempt against him in the town of Dujail in 1982. The nine-judge appeals bench has no time limit to issue its ruling, but if it upholds the death sentence, Mr. Hussein's execution must be carried out within 30 days.

Iraqi judicial officials said they expected that the appeals process would be completed in a matter of weeks and, if the sentence is upheld, that Mr. Hussein's hanging would take place between mid-January and mid-March.

The Shiite-led government has argued for a swift execution, saying that as long as Mr. Hussein is alive, he remains a powerful source of motivation for elements of the Sunni Arab insurgency fighting to restore him to power.

There are other critical issues the government will need to decide should the appeals court uphold the death sentence against Mr. Hussein, including where he will be executed.

DOJ_NMG_0105056

Officials have considered staging a public hanging in Baghdad's largest sports arena, Shaab Stadium, and filling the place with tens of thousands of spectators, according to a high-ranking government official involved in the executions process, who agreed to discuss the subject on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak about it on the record.

But while such a spectacle might satisfy a communal need for closure, the authorities have rejected the idea for security reasons. A target that big, they say, would be highly vulnerable to attack by Sunni insurgents who might try to lob a few mortar shells into the crowd or ambush spectators on their way to and from the event.

Government hangings are now conducted in a prison complex in eastern Baghdad. Mr. Hussein, who is being held at Camp Cropper, an American military prison near Baghdad International Airport, could be transported to those gallows by helicopter. But officials worry that the trip would present an unnecessary opportunity for a rescue attempt by his sympathizers.

Most likely, officials say, Mr. Hussein will be hanged at gallows specially built for him at Camp Cropper.

The death penalty in Iraq, which applies to a range of crimes including terrorism and certain categories of murder, was suspended in 2003 by the American occupation authorities but reinstated in August 2004. Since then, 51 people — men and several women — have been hanged and about 170 are currently on death row awaiting execution or the outcome of their appeal, according to Hashim al-Shibli, Iraq's justice minister.

Those are the official numbers. The high-ranking government official involved in the executions process said the actual number of hangings was far higher, though fewer than 100, because of three sets of hangings that took place between December 2005 and March 2006 and were never publicized.

Human rights groups have questioned the transparency of the criminal justice system in Iraq and the ability of defendants to get a fair trial. And the United Nations has requested that the Iraqi government commute the sentences of all the prisoners on Iraq's death row. But Iraqi leaders have rebuffed calls for the abolishment of the death penalty, arguing that it serves as a deterrent to crimes.

"Maliki wants to show decisiveness that people should be punished," said Mr. Ridha, Mr. Maliki's adviser. "He is very anxious that these executions take place in a timely manner." He added, "The number of executions that have taken place is not a great number compared to the number of insurgents in the country."

The gallows are in a concrete building within a heavily guarded prison complex in eastern Baghdad, near the headquarters of the Interior Ministry. Two scaffolds made of steel sit side by side in an otherwise unadorned room, according to the high-ranking government official, who has attended hangings there. (The Justice Ministry and the Maliki administration denied requests to visit the prison and, citing security concerns, refused to give the precise location of the site.)

The government prefers to conduct several hangings in a day for the sake of efficiency. Men condemned to death are held on Iraq's death row — a wing of rudimentary cells, separated from other inmates in the prison compound. Condemned women are held at a women's prison in Khadamiya, a neighborhood in northern Baghdad.

The prisoners are told they will be hanged on the morning of their executions, officials said. They are led out of their cells in single file, dressed in orange jumpsuits, their ankles and wrists manacled, and taken to a room off the gallows chambers, where they are allowed to sit on floor cushions. There, they are permitted to pray. They can eat a last meal if they request it, or smoke a cigarette. They are given an opportunity to compose a last will and testament. Then, two by two and hooded, they are taken to the gallows.

The victims are led up a set of steel stairs to a platform, about 15 feet above the ground, and nooses fashioned from one-and-a-quarter-inch-thick hemp ropes are slipped over their necks. The executioners are different each time, drawn from among employees of the Justice Ministry who volunteer for the job. Many have lost relatives or friends in insurgent attacks, officials said.

With a tug of two large levers, the steel trapdoors drop open and the victims fall through. The doors make a loud clanging sound as they slam against the apparatus, according to people who have witnessed hangings. The jarring noise echoes off the cold, unadorned concrete walls.

Death is supposed to come instantly — a doctor is on hand to certify it — and the bodies are removed to a cooler where they are held before being handed over to the victims' families. The entire process is recorded by a photographer and a video cameraman and the images are stored in a government archive.

But the hangings have not always gone smoothly.

DOJ_NMG_0105057

Until the new gallows were built, the Iraqi government used an apparatus and an old rope left over from Mr. Hussein's government, said the high-ranking government official. The rope had become so elastic that it would sometimes take as much as eight minutes to kill the convicted person.

On Sept. 6, the Iraqi authorities planned to hang 27 people. On the 13th hanging, according to an official who was there, the rope snapped and the convicted man plummeted 15 feet through the trap door onto the concrete floor. "God saved me!" the man cried. "God is great! I did not deserve this!" For an hour, he lay on the ground praying and shouting while prison guards and the executioner debated whether this constituted divine intervention and, if so, whether the man's life should be spared. Once a new rope was rigged, however, the man was forced up the stairs once again and successfully hanged. The incident was first reported in Time magazine of Nov. 20.

The executions are conducted in secrecy to avert insurgent attacks. On March 9, a government convoy carrying a representative from the administration of Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari was ambushed on its way to the gallows. It was an unsuccessful effort to stop the representative from observing the day's hangings, including the execution of Shukair Farid, a murderous former police officer whom the government had nicknamed "the butcher of Mosul."

On another execution day, word leaked out and insurgents pelted the prison facility with mortar shells. The Iraqi subcontractors who built the new gallows, under the auspices of an American contractor, were forced to interrupt work several times because of threats by insurgents, officials said.

The current hanging procedures are an improvement over the methods used by Mr. Hussein, who conducted mass executions in a hangarlike building at Abu Ghraib prison. According to human rights groups, hundreds of prisoners were executed in a span of a few weeks in the 1990s to address prison overcrowding.

Mr. Hussein himself asked the court to execute him by firing squad, the method used for soldiers sentenced to death. He said it was his right because he was commander in chief of Iraq's armed forces at the time of the events in Dujail. His request was denied.

The protocols for his hanging have not yet been determined, including who will get to attend, Maliki administration officials said. In a standard Iraqi hanging, the attendance is limited to representatives from the Justice Ministry, the Interior Ministry and the prime minister's office, and a doctor. Mr. Shibli, the justice minister, said the convict's lawyer was allowed to attend, as well as a member of the clergy of the victim's choice, though in practice they rarely do.

The usual videographer and photographer will probably be on hand, as well, to record the hanging, officials said, and excerpts of the event may be shown later on national television. Mr. Ridha says the Iraqi people will want to see it.

Afghanistan War Nears "Tipping Point" (LAT)

By Laura King, David Holley

The Los Angeles Times, December 9, 2006

KABUL, AFGHANISTAN — The conflict in Afghanistan has entered a dangerous phase, and the next three to six months could prove crucial in determining whether the United States and its NATO partners can suppress a revitalized enemy — or will be dragged into another drawn-out and costly fight with an Islamic insurgency, according to senior military and security officials and diplomats.

"I think we are approaching a tipping point, perhaps early in the new year," said a Western diplomat in the region, speaking on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to discuss the situation publicly.

Popular support for the central government is faltering, and Western military allies are deeply divided over how best to combat the insurgency.

On the other side of the fight, the Taliban has regained the strength to dominate large swaths of Afghanistan; government control is tenuous at best in at least 20% of the country, according to several Western diplomats and Afghan officials.

Militants have built a network of bases in the tribal hinterlands that straddle the frontier with Pakistan. Over the last year, a growing number of mobile encampments on the Afghan side of the border have given the insurgents greater self-sufficiency, military officials say, although the guerrillas still draw heavily on logistical support and weaponry funneled from the Pakistani side.

DOJ_NMG_0105058

"They can come and go pretty much undetected," acknowledged U.S. Army Brig. Gen. Michael T. Harrison Sr., who is overseeing the training and equipping of the struggling Afghan national army.

Observers point to an inexorable upward trend in violence that includes suicide attacks, roadside bombs and border clashes. "We have a bona fide war going on," Harrison said.

A widely cited recent report by the Joint Coordination and Monitoring Board, a panel of Afghan and foreign officials, said such attacks had increased fourfold from last year, killing at least 3,700 people so far in 2006.

A military spokesman in Kabul, the capital, for NATO's International Security Assistance Force, U.S. Army Maj. Luke Knittig, said he did not believe the report accurately reflected long-term trends. But a number of outside experts tracking the trajectory of the conflict supported the panel's assessment of a growing threat.

At stake for the U.S. and its allies with the North Atlantic Treaty Organization is not an outright battlefield defeat by the Taliban and other insurgent groups.

"We should be careful that we don't overstate this militarily unconventional challenge," U.S. Marine Gen. James L. Jones, NATO's supreme allied commander, told reporters last week in Riga, Latvia, where the alliance's leaders were meeting. "We will not be defeated militarily by the Taliban." NATO has 32,000 troops in the country, backed by formidable airpower.

But the patchwork of militant groups battling the Western allies has its own arsenal of strengths.

Insurgent attacks, whose low-tech tactics echo those used against U.S. forces in Iraq, are often ineffectual. But inevitably, some hit home. On Wednesday, for example, two American civilian contractors were killed in a suicide bombing in Kandahar, the sixth such attack in 10 days. Nearly 180 NATO and allied troops have been killed in fighting this year in Afghanistan.

The number of casualties has been enough to ignite public debate over the Afghan mission in several NATO countries, including Canada, which has more than 2,000 troops deployed, mostly in the violent south, the traditional seat of Taliban power.

Within Afghanistan, civilians increasingly bear the brunt not only of insurgent attacks, but NATO's offensive against the militants. In October, a NATO airstrike in the south killed more than 30 civilians, most thought to be nomadic herders. Civilian deaths account for about one-quarter of the fatalities this year and heighten Afghans' resentment of the foreign military forces while feeding a gnawing sense of insecurity.

In terms of casualties, the conflict is a lopsided one. The number of insurgent fatalities over the last year could be as high as 7,000, according to some independent estimates. But the Taliban and its allies draw on what appears to be an almost inexhaustible supply of potential foot soldiers.

"Recruitment is not a problem for them — not a problem at all," said Ayesha Siddiqa, an independent security analyst in Pakistan.

The allies are well aware that simply killing large numbers of insurgents will not constitute a victory. Western officials say they need to prevent the militants from seizing and holding more territory, establish reasonably secure conditions in the capital and the hinterlands, choke off infiltration across the porous Pakistani border and mend fences with restive tribal leaders.

All those tasks are proving difficult.

The insurgents include remnants of the Taliban, the austere Islamist movement that ruled Afghanistan for five years and gave shelter to Osama bin Laden and other members of his Al Qaeda terrorist network. The volatile brew also includes competing warlords, part-time fighters, recruits from the growing ranks of the poor and unemployed, and disaffected youth, often graduates of Talibaninspired religious seminaries.

Viktor Korgun, an analyst with the Russian Academy of Sciences who has had long experience in Afghan affairs, describes the insurgents as "a fresh new generation … copying the skills and ways of the armed resistance groups in Iraq."

"Their support network has improved, and in some areas they've been able to operate and control roads and villages and the like," said Seth Jones, a counterinsurgency expert at the Rand Corp. who was recently in Afghanistan for field research. "The Taliban have created a shadow government in a number of provinces — people going to Taliban governors rather than centrally appointed governors on rule-of-law issues."

The Taliban holds sway in much of the border province of Zabol, several Afghan and Western officials say. And in other provinces, including Kandahar and Helmand, the insurgents operate freely outside major cities and towns.

A number of interlocking factors have contributed to the insurgent comeback:

DOJ_NMG_0105059

The U.S.-backed government of President Hamid Karzai has been slow in asserting itself throughout the country.

Afghanistan's drug trade has also revived at an explosive rate. Opium cultivation rose this year by nearly 60%, according to the United Nations drug agency and the World Bank, and officials say drug money has become a driving force behind the insurgency.

In much of the country, the lack of security has severely stunted development projects, which in turn has fostered widespread disillusionment. Particularly in dirt-poor rural areas, many Afghans believe their daily lot has improved little since Taliban times, and tend to cast the blame on the same Americans they once hailed as liberators.

"People previously were repelled by the fanaticism of the Taliban, but anger at Americans is growing," said Talat Masood, a retired Pakistani general who is now an independent analyst. "And ultimately, they would prefer that their lives be secure. It's a survival instinct."

A European security official, speaking on condition of anonymity, said that for insurgents, fomenting even low-level instability carries big payoffs.

"People have lived through 20-odd years of war at varying levels of intensity. Frankly, they're not going to get fazed … by a few IEDs," or improvised explosive devices, he said. "But they are concerned that the base level of their lives is not improved, and that's the challenge that the insurgency provides — delaying the ability of the government to be able to deliver, by keeping certain areas unstable."

Senior NATO generals have publicly aired disagreements over battle tactics, troop strength and rules that largely exempt some member countries' troops from the most dangerous duty. But the alliance's political leadership appears in agreement that the Afghanistan fight is one the West cannot afford to lose. British Prime Minister Tony Blair declared in advance of the Riga meeting that "NATO's credibility is at stake," and President Bush called Afghanistan "NATO's most important military operation."

In recent weeks, senior U.S. officials have spoken more frankly about the alliance's attempts to come to terms with an unexpectedly resilient foe.

"There's certainly concern … about the fact that they've been able to come out this year with more intensity, more organization than we might have expected," U.S. Assistant Secretary of State Richard Boucher recently told reporters in New Delhi.

"You do have to understand, there are people that are bound and determined to kill us," he said.

"For those people, we're going to have to shoot back."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Senate Passes Bill To Criminalize Pretexting (NYT)

By Brad Stone And Matt Richtel

The New York Times, December 11, 2006

The Senate passed legislation last night that would make it a federal crime to obtain a person's telephone records without permission, an act known as pretexting.

The measure, which was approved by unanimous consent last night and is similar to a bill passed earlier in the House, imposes a fine of up to $250,000 and imprisonment of up to 10 years for duping telephone companies into divulging the calling records of private individuals. The penalties can go up under special circumstances, like cases involving domestic abuse.

The support for the legislation comes in the aftermath of the spying scandal at Hewlett-Packard, the computer giant. The company, eager to ferret out purported leaks to journalists from within its board, used private detective firms to retrieve phone records of directors, managers and journalists.

Companies convicted under the Senate legislation face fines of up to $500,000.

The legislation includes penalties and a prison sentence of up to 10 years for individuals who sell or buy phone records knowing the lists were obtained through deceptive means. Passage, which came just days before the conclusion of the Republican-led Congress, is a victory for privacy advocates and regular phone users concerned about the confidentiality of their records.

DOJ_NMG_0105060

"The fraudulent acquisition of phone records is now clearly and unequivocally illegal," said Jon Leibowitz, a commissioner at the Federal Trade Commission, an agency charged with combating unfair and deceptive business practices, including pretexting.

"Just having the statute on the books will help reduce the number of bad actors out there," Mr. Leibowitz said.

But some privacy advocates say the legislation does not go far enough.

"Given the amount of attention Congress has given to this issue, we should have a better bill," said Marc Rotenberg, the executive director of the Electronic Privacy Information Center.

Mr. Rotenberg said he would like to see Congress force companies to protect their customers' personal information. Mr. Rotenberg also expressed concern over an exemption in the legislation for law enforcement agencies that could allow them to hire private detectives or others to obtain individuals' calling records.

The bill passed the House on a unanimous 409-0 vote in April. But it remained stalled in the Senate Judiciary Committee for months, largely because of competition with a more complex pretexting bill in the Senate Commerce Committee, which would have required phone companies to ensure that personal records were being given only to the appropriate person.

After the Hewlett-Packard pretexting scandal made national headlines, House Republicans sent a letter to the Senate majority leader, Bill Frist, invoking the saga and urging prompt action on the stronger bill pending in the judiciary committee.

Consumer advocates plan to propose broader legislation in a session of Congress next year that would also make it illegal to try to fraudulently obtain other kinds of personal information, like utility, TV and Internet service provider records.

At Hewlett-Packard, regulatory filings this summer revealed that the company chairwoman, Patricia C. Dunn, had authorized a broad investigation into the source of embarrassing boardroom leaks to the news media. On Thursday, the company said it would pay $14.5 million to settle a civil lawsuit brought by the California attorney general, Bill Lockyer.

Detectives hired by the company employed pretexting techniques to obtain the phone records of company board members, employees and at least nine journalists who covered the company.

Ms. Dunn resigned from the company in September and in October was charged by Mr. Lockyer with identity theft and conspiracy. Privacy advocates say that even before the new law was passed, the attention the case was getting was pushing pretexters further underground.

Rob Douglas, who testified about pretexting on Capitol Hill and runs the Web site PrivacyToday.com, says the major test will be whether federal prosecutors back up the bill with aggressive enforcement. "If the Department of Justice doesn't take the issue seriously and prosecute individuals," he said, "it will be taken by the underground information community that they have carte blanche to continue the practice."

H-P Agrees To Fund Future Pretexting Probes (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, December 9, 2006

The Morning Brief, a look at the day's biggest news, is emailed to subscribers by 7 a.m. every business day. Sign up for the e-mail here1.

Hewlett-Packard may have admitted no wrongdoing, but the technology giant's settlement with the state of California is all about recognizing the unscrupulous nature of pretexting.

To settle the state's civil suit over its use of investigators to improperly obtain the phone records of board members, some employees and journalists, H-P agreed to pay $14.5 million -- and $13.5 million of that goes to fund state and local investigations2 of similar fraudulent practices, as the San Jose Mercury News reports. The attorney general's office will get $350,000 as reimbursement for its investigative costs in the case, and actual civil penalties from the suit come to just $650 ,000. By comparison, H-P has reported $91.7 billion in revenue for the 2006 fiscal year, as the New York Times points out, meaning the settlement is the equivalent of what H-P brings in about every 83 minutes3. California Attorney General Bill Lockyer, whose aggressive pursuit of the company brought him national prominence and may have helped get him elected as state treasurer last month, said the company deserves credit for not stonewalling. "Fortunately, H-P is not Enron," he said.

H-P now looks set to avoid criminal prosecution for the pretexting -- the practice of calling a phone company to get a customer's information under the pretext of representing that customer. What the settlement doesn't do is help the five H-P executives and alleged outside abettors charged with identity theft and various forms of fraud for the pretexting, including ousted Chairman Patricia Dunn. And H-P could still face civil claims from people whose privacy was violated4, the Los Angeles Times notes. Still, the accord goes a long way toward helping H-P put the scandal behind it. H-P has already taken steps to comply with the ethical strictures placed on the company by the settlement, including the designation of an independent director "responsible for reviewing and reporting to the board H-P's legal and ethical requirements5 as it relates to future investigations," as The Wall Street Journal notes.

BofA's Possible Courtship of Barclays

Merrill Lynch has issued a research report saying Bank of America is "very interested" in buying the U.K. bank Barclays, provoking a 1.2% increase in Barclays stock6 during midmorning trading in London. Barclays would bring the huge American lender a large international presence in bond investment and trading operations, derivatives activities and the leading U.K. credit-card business, as well as other assets, Merrill points out. And "Bank of America has previously indicated that the next phase of its expansion is to become a leading global commercial and investment bank," Merrill says, according to MarketWatch. "In order to achieve that goal, we believe Bank of America is very interested in acquiring Barclays."

Mystery Deepens Over Russian Spy Death

Former Kremlin spy Alexander Litvinenko was buried yesterday, and news emerged that Dmitry Kovtun, one of the Russian businessmen he met in London on the day he is believed to have been poisoned, may have fallen into a coma. The increasingly mysterious events surrounding Mr. Litvinenko's death now center on the Pine Bar in the Millennium Hotel, where Mr. Litvinenko met Mr. Kovtun, and Andrei Lugovoy, a former KGB colonel, on Nov. 1. All seven bar staff have tested positive7 for polonium-210, the rare radioactive poison that killed Mr. Litvinenko, and an official at the U.K. Health Protection Agency said there was no short-term danger to the bar staff, but acknowledged there was a "very small" long-term risk of cancer, the Times of London reports. Officials are now trying to contact 250 customers who visited the bar on the same day. Results by the HPA also suggest that the polonium-210 may have been smuggled into the U.K. as early as two weeks before the poisoning, and it could have been dissolved in liquid before being slipped to Mr. Litvinenko8. "If it was some sort of liquid, it could have been -- as in James Bond -- a little magic capsule," Dr. Michael Clark of the HPA tells the Guardian. As technicians follow the "radioactive trail" left by the poison across London and Moscow, as the Washington Post calls it, attention is focusing on Mr. Lugovoy. He was scheduled to speak with U.K. and Russian investigators yesterday, but the meeting was postponed9 for what Russian investigators tell state media were "technical reasons," the Post adds.

Mr. Litvinenko was a Kremlin critic investigating the death of journalist Anna Politkovskaya, who herself was a fierce Putin critic. Ms. Politkovskaya, who was shot dead two months ago, was the third journalist at Russian newspaper Novaya Gazeta to die mysteriously in the past six years. And The Wall Street Journal notes that if Russia is one of the most dangerous places in the world to be a journalist, Novaya -- one of the last outposts of free speech left in the country -- may be the most dangerous media outlet to work for10.

Quotes of the Day

"Some reports are issued and just gather dust. And truth of the matter is, a lot of reports in Washington are never read by anybody. To show you how important this one is, I read it, and our guest read it. The prime minister read -- read a report prepared by a commission. And this is important. And there are some -- I don't think Jim Baker and Lee Hamilton expect us to accept every recommendation20. I expect them -- I think -- I know they expect us to consider every recommendation, Jim. We ought to pay close attention to what they advise. And I told them yesterday at our meeting that we would pay close attention, and would seriously consider every recommendation. We've discussed some of their recommendations here at this press conference. And we are -- we will spend a lot of time on it," President Bush said yesterday during an appearance with British Prime Minister Tony Blair, when asked how much consideration he would give to the Iraq Study Group's report. Asked if in light of the report he would admit to making failed decisions in the past, Mr. Bush acknowledged that "I thought we would succeed quicker than we did, and I am disappointed by the pace of success."

"I hope we don't treat this like a fruit salad and say, 'I like this, but I don't like that. I like this, but I don't like that.' This is a comprehensive strategy designed to deal with this problem we're facing in Iraq, but also designed to deal with other problems that we face in the region, and to restore America's standing and credibility in that part of the world," Mr. Baker told the Senate Armed Services Committee when asked how the ISG recommendations should be treated.

"They start from completely different places. … Baker approaches everything with a negotiator's mindset. That doesn't mean every negotiation leads to a deal, but you engage your adversaries and use your leverage to change their behavior. This administration has never had a negotiator's mind-set. It divides the world into friends and foes21, and the foes are incorrigible and not redeemable. There has been more of an instinct toward regime change than to changing regime behavior," Dennis Ross, a State Department point man for the Middle East during the Clinton and first Bush presidency who left the government early in the current Bush administration, tells the New York Times in seeking to explain the divergent points of view.

"Of course, the report had been written from the U.S. view, and we respect that. But it does not represent our own point of view22," Abdul-Aziz al-Hakim, one of the leading Shiite politicians in Iraq and a major power broker, tells the NewsHour with Jim Lehrer.

HP Investors Unmoved By Spying Suit Deal (WP/AP)

By Jordan Robertson, The Associated Press

The Washington Post, December 9, 2006

SAN JOSE, Calif. -- Investors have largely shrugged off Hewlett-Packard Co.'s boardroom spying scandal, dismissing the brouhaha surrounding the company as immaterial to its day-to-day operations and stellar earnings growth in recent months.

That was true again on Thursday, when HP's stock price remained largely unmoved after the company and the state Attorney General Bill Lockyer announced that HP would pay $14.5 million to settle a civil claim centered on the dicey tactics used in the investigation.

HP's stock, which has actually gained around 9 percent since the probe was disclosed in a regulatory filing, fell just 24 cents to $39.62 in morning trading on the New York Stock Exchange on Friday. Details of the agreement were announced after the market closed.

Analysts said the penalty was relatively minor and would go a long way toward assuaging fears among skittish investors.

"It looks like they got off pretty easy, and that this is actually going to be a good thing for HP," said Roger Kay, who follows the company as president of market research firm Endpoint Technologies Associates. "It looks like they're in control of their destiny and have put at least some of this behind them."

The lawsuit accused the company of unfair business practices in its crusade to unmask the source of boardroom leaks to the news media.

The vast majority of the settlement _ $13.5 million _ will fund state and local investigations into privacy rights and intellectual property violations, according to the lawsuit and settlement filed simultaneously in Santa Clara County Superior Court.

The lawsuit marks the first civil case brought by authorities against Palo Alto-based HP for the scandal that erupted in September and led to criminal charges against former chairwoman Patricia Dunn and four others.

"Fortunately, Hewlett-Packard is not Enron," Lockyer said. "I commend the firm for cooperating instead of stonewalling, for taking instead of shirking responsibility, and for working with my office to expeditiously craft a creative resolution."

The state likely would have recovered far less if the case were taken to court, based on the limited penalties it could claim for each phone number that was illegally accessed during the leak probe, Lockyer said in an interview with The Associated Press.

"It's a good example of the HP that we all grew up with, the old HP of Hewlett and Packard, the ethics and principles of corporate responsibility and good management practices," he said. "We see those re-emerging in the way they dealt with this matter."

The remainder of the settlement amount consists of $650,000 in civil penalties and $350,000 to cover the state's investigation and other costs.

HP has also agreed to various governance reforms to be in place for five years, which Lockyer said will help protect privacy rights during any future HP investigations. Some of those reforms include the appointment of an independent director to monitor HP's compliance with privacy guidelines, and additional training for investigative staff.

HP CEO Mark Hurd said in a statement that the company is "committed to ensuring that HP regains its standing as a global leader in corporate ethics and responsibility." The agreement did not include a finding of liability against HP.

Prosecutors said the company hired outside detectives who tricked phone companies into disclosing the private phone records of directors, journalists and others so the company could track the source of news leaks.

Those spied on included Hurd, various directors including former board member George Keyworth II, who was identified as the anonymous source in a CNet story, along with HP staffers and journalists.

Revelations of the probe, disclosed in a regulatory filing, led to an exodus from the board, criminal charges, a congressional investigation, and ongoing federal probes by the FBI, the Securities and Exchange Commission, federal prosecutors and other agencies.

DOJ_NMG_0105064

Dunn, who was ousted over the incident, former ethics chief Kevin Hunsaker and three outside investigators, Ronald DeLia, Matthew DePante and Bryan Wagner, have pleaded not guilty in Santa Clara County Superior Court to charges of identity theft and fraud for their roles.

The company's stock price has been relatively unaffected by the scandal, buoyed by strong earnings growth under CEO Mark Hurd and the belief that the turmoil had little affect on operations.

Cos Seek Federal Privacy Law;Privacy Groups See It As Weak (WSJ/DJ)

Wall Street Journal/Dow Jones, December 9, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP)--Microsoft Corp. (MSFT), Hewlett-Packard Co. (HPQ) and other high-tech companies are preparing to push for data-privacy legislation next year to replace what they consider an outdated patchwork of state and federal laws that are inconsistent and burdensome.

"We think the time has come for a comprehensive privacy bill that would protect consumers' personal information while still allowing the flow of information needed for commerce online," Ira Rubinstein, a Microsoft lawyer, said this week.

Several recent high-profile breaches of consumers' personal information have made consideration of privacy proposals more likely, Rubinstein said. The Social Security numbers and medical data of approximately 930,000 people were compromised this June, for example, when computer equipment belonging to insurance provider American International Group Inc. was stolen.

Microsoft, H-P and eBay Inc. (EBAY) earlier this year formed the Consumer Privacy Legislative Forum to lobby for privacy legislation. Google Inc. (GOOG), Intel Corp. (INTC), Oracle Corp. (ORCL) and other companies later joined.

The forum supports legislation that would set standards for what notice must be given to consumers about personal information collected on them and how it will be used, Rubinstein said. The companies are aiming for a law that would override any existing state laws and standardize privacy rules across industries.

The group's efforts will likely face some opposition, however.

Marc Rotenberg, executive director of the Electronic Privacy Information Center, a consumer advocacy group, said the proposals, if adopted, would amount to an industry drafting its own regulations.

Rotenberg also argued that the notices to consumers preferred by Microsoft and other companies are insufficient to protect online privacy. Instead, consumers should have access to the data that companies have on them and have more control over how they are used, he said, similar to the way consumers can currently access their credit reports.

Rotenberg also opposes the pre-emption of state laws, which he said in many cases have better protections than federal rules. Many anti-spam experts complained when Congress in 2003 approved a measure that did not let individuals sue spammers and that pre-empted most state laws that did.

Meanwhile, Stuart Ingis, a partner at the law firm Venable LLP, said that a broad privacy measure is unnecessary.

"Comprehensive privacy legislation already exists in this country," he said, citing existing laws and regulations governing financial and health-care privacy.

Those rules took decades to develop and provide strong protections for consumers, said Ingis, whose firm represents several companies and trade groups that track privacy issues.

Although high-tech companies have been seeking comprehensive federal privacy legislation, Congress has focused on the steps companies should take to protect data and when companies should notify consumers of data security breaches.

But several data security bills failed to pass during the soon-to-end congressional session, largely because of jurisdictional struggles between different congressional committees, said Steve Adamske, spokesman for Rep. Barney Frank, D-Mass.

Frank, incoming chairman of the House Financial Services Committee, said Wednesday that he plans to consider the issue of data security next year. To avoid a repeat of the jurisdictional struggle, Frank says he plans to propose to incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi that she appoint a task force of members from committees with oversight on privacy matters to work on the issue.

Setbacks Hit Plaintiffs In Two Securities Cases (WSJ)

Fiji Yields Bargain Bonds After Political Discord

The plaintiffs' securities bar was dealt several blows in the past few days.

Tuesday, plaintiff's attorneys were thwarted in their efforts to win class-action status in a suit alleging fraud among investment banks in underwriting new stock offerings.

Then on Thursday the Supreme Court agreed to consider overturning a plaintiff-friendly ruling out of the New York appeals court that Wall Street underwriters could be subject to private antitrust lawsuits.

The court cases are related: Both involve allegations of bad behavior in IPOs during the dot-com bubble. The Tuesday case accuses 55 Wall Street firms of requiring investors who got shares of hot IPOs to buy more shares once trading began. The practice allegedly inflated stock prices of more than 300 companies, mainly tech outfits.

The Thursday antitrust case takes issue with some of the same public offerings and alleges investment banks and institutional investors conspired to inflate stock prices in secondary-market trading.

Neither of these decisions was good news for Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman LLP. Melvyn Weiss leads the six-firm plaintiffs executive committee in the IPO securities litigation and serves as vice-chair of the executive committee in the IPO antitrust litigation. Early in the week, Mr. Weiss said he would appeal the ruling in the securities case. As for the antitrust issue, he voiced disappointment that the Supreme Court decided to review it.

"We think that the [lower] court got it right," says Mr. Weiss.

Milberg Weiss had a rough week on other fronts.

Steven Schulman on Friday announced his resignation from Milberg Weiss. Mr. Schulman, along with Milberg partner David Bershad and the Milberg Weiss law firm, were indicted earlier this year on fraud charges based on allegations of improperly sharing legal fees with clients. The firm and the lawyers have pleaded not guilty and are fighting the charges. Mr. Bershad has been on a leave of absence from the firm. Starting Jan. 1, it will be called Milberg Weiss & Bershad LLP.

Going Tropical

Investors looking to escape wintry weather may want to visit Fiji: The islands feature tropical breezes, untouched beaches...and bargain bonds. At a recent conference held in New York for investors who focus on emerging-market debt, J.P. Morgan named Fiji as an "out of the box" pick for the asset class.

Careful newspaper readers may have noted that on Dec. 5, soldiers ousted the elected prime minister of the South Pacific nation (population: 900,000) in the country's fourth military coup of the past 20 years, which sent Fiji bonds plunging and their yields higher.

Earlier this year, the democratically elected government issued $150 million worth of bonds, due in 2011, with a coupon of 6.875% of the face value of the bonds. The issue was 10 times oversubscribed, according to the Reserve Bank of Fiji.

It's unclear if democracy may return to Fiji, or when. Joyce Chang, global head of emerging-markets research at J.P. Morgan, said her first reaction to the suggestion to "buy Fiji on the coup" was disbelief. Not anymore. "We actually have a pretty benign interpretation of the recent political events," she said. "We believe the bonds have been oversold and present a decent buying opportunity."

The bonds, which don't trade very often, yielded roughly 9% at last check.

Tasty Secrets

Judging from the way share prices and debt instruments have been moving before big deals have been announced, Wall Street doesn't seem to be doing a very good job of keeping secrets this year. But that hasn't stopped some investment bankers from cooking up surreptitious code names for their deals.

Consider the planned tie-up of Bank of New York Co. with Mellon Financial Corp., a $16.5 billion merger announced last month.

Investment bankers at Goldman Sachs working on the deal developed the code name "Project Cider" to keep the proposed deal secret.

DOJ_NMG_0105066

The logic behind the name? To make cider you need apples and some kind of liquid. Behind the scenes, Bank of New York was known as "Apple" since it is headquartered in the Big Apple...New York. The Pittsburgh-based Mellon was referred to as "Water-Mellon." Apple and water makes cider.

Regulation Loosening The Ties That Bind Wall Street (WSJ)

By Kara Scannell

The Wall Street Journal, December 9, 2006

Amid cries from Wall Street, the Treasury and business executives that onerous regulations are blunting the U.S.'s competitive edge in the face of threats from European and Asian financial markets, the Securities and Exchange Commission is poised to unveil Wednesday two initiatives aimed at easing those fears. The moves aren't likely to be the last.

The first change will tweak the rules that firms must follow to obey a provision in Sarbanes-Oxley, the 2002 law passed in response to corporate-accounting scandals. SEC Chairman Christopher Cox, a former Republican congressman from California, has fought attempts by lawmakers to alter the law itself. But he has promised "significant changes" to Section 404, which sets standards for internal corporate controls, with the goal of reducing compliance costs while enhancing the benefit of review.

Under Section 404, management must review internal controls, and outside auditors are required to test them, a step business complains is too expensive. Mr. Cox says the commission's guidance and a new accounting standard (due Dec. 19 from the Public Company Accounting Oversight Board, the accounting industry's overseer) will make 404 more focused on big issues than tiny ones.

The second initiative will make it easier for foreign companies whose stocks and bonds trade here to "deregister" from U.S. reporting requirements. Mr. Cox's idea is that, if there is an easier exit, foreign companies will be less wary of listing here -- an important consideration as U.S. exchanges have lost large foreign initial public offerings to other markets in recent years.

A year ago, the SEC said large non-U.S. companies could cease filing annual and quarterly reports if fewer than 10% of their shares were held by U.S. residents and trading volume in the U.S. was less than 5% of that in their home market. The SEC is now scrapping that standard in favor of an easier one that relies strictly on a yet-to-be-released percentage of trading volume.

Both steps are likely to be cheered by those worried about the competitiveness of U.S. capital markets, but the pressure won't abate. With a thick set of recommendations from a private commission already on the table, a McKinsey study commissioned by Sen. Charles Schumer of New York, a Democrat, and Republican New York City Mayor Michael Bloomberg coming soon, and Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson pushing the issue, the campaign to further ease regulation and make life better for Wall Street is sure to continue.

Specter Bill Would Ban Waiver On Attorney-client Privileges (PPG)

By Jerome L. Sherman, Pittsburgh Post-gazette

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, December 9, 2006

WASHINGTON -- U.S. Sen. Arlen Specter yesterday introduced legislation that would prohibit the Justice Department from pressuring companies and their employees to waive their attorney-client privileges during government investigations.

His bill has support from a wide range of groups, including the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, the American Civil Liberties Union, and the American Bar Association. They fear that the federal government has become too aggressive in its prosecutions of corporate wrongdoing following scandals at Enron and WorldCom.

In 2003, then-Deputy Attorney General Larry Thompson issued a memorandum that gave federal prosecutors the option of taking a softer approach with companies that reveal information on internal discussions between attorneys and executives. But the memo prompted outcries among companies and legal groups who feared a dilution of a basic constitutional right.

"It's a very, very chilling effect," Mr. Specter said yesterday. "If you can't talk freely to your lawyer, you're in deep trouble."

He was joined by Dick Thornburgh, a former U.S. attorney general and Pennsylvania governor, who was representing the American Bar Association.

DOJ_NMG_0105067

"The attorney-client privilege is one of the oldest privileges in the law. It dates back to Elizabethan times," he said. He argued that the Justice Department's policy may unintentionally weaken federal prosecutions of corporate crime by dissuading employees from seeking confidential legal advice.

Brian Roehrkasse, a spokesman for the Justice Department, said the department's strategies had netted more than 1,100 corporate fraud convictions in the last four years. He emphasized that federal prosecutors take the preservation of the attorney-client privilege seriously.

"We have met with a number of individuals and organizations who have raised concerns or suggestions about our current guidance for investigating corporate fraud," he said in an e-mail message. "We are also reviewing the newly introduced legislation. Currently, we have not made any final decisions to amend our guidance"

Mr. Specter said his legislation wouldn't prohibit companies from voluntarily coming forward with information .

He acknowledged that the provisions, if passed by Congress, could create some more work for prosecutors.

"The Department of Justice can handle it," he said. "That's a small price to pay for preserving a constitutional right."

Possible Leak To Lobbyists Gets Attention Of The SEC (WP)

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum, Carrie Johnson

The Washington Post, December 9, 2006

The Securities and Exchange Commission has looked into whether lobbyists provided hedge funds with potentially market-moving information about a pending congressional speech.

The SEC earlier this year questioned the office of Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) about a possible insider leak to lobbyists about a speech Frist was to give on asbestos legislation, a Frist spokeswoman said.

DOJ_NMG_0105068

SEC officials also said they had looked informally into whether hedge funds, in turn, bought shares in companies that would be affected if Congress approved the bill, which would have settled asbestos civil suits.

But the SEC officials said that no charges were imminent and that it was unclear whether providing congressional information could be considered improper or illegal under insider trading laws.

Employees of public companies are barred from disclosing material information about their companies' plans. But lawmakers and their staff in Congress do not face similar restrictions on the information they can provide about legislative actions. Congressional ethics rules prohibit such disclosures only when aides or lawmakers profit from the information.

Few lobbyists reached yesterday expressed worry that their information-sharing might be restricted anytime soon. But Paul A. Miller, president of the American League of Lobbyists, said he would think twice about taking on a hedge fund client until the SEC gave more guidance about the propriety of selling rarified information to hedge funds.

The Frist incident, which was first reported by the Wall Street Journal, points up a growing business among lobbyists: the selling of information and analysis to hedge funds. As hedge funds have proliferated, lobbyists have increasingly supplemented their incomes by advising these big-money investors about Washington trends as an adjunct to their basic task of trying to influence legislation and regulation.

"The advisory business to hedge funds has been growing," said Paul A. Equale, a prominent lobbyist. "But in my experience it is almost a benign exchange of ideas and perspectives. It's more explaining how Washington works."

Intelligence collecting and legislative prognostication has long been a staple of lobbyists. "Information gathering is part of the daily lifeblood of what lobbyists do for their clients," said Frederick D. McClure, a lobbyist with Sonnenschein Nath & Rosenthal.

In addition, various types of companies -- including lobbying/law firms and capital-based research organizations -- have long sold their best guesses about the Washington outlook to investment houses and their clients. Many investment houses have for years had their own Washington offices to churn out the same kinds of reports.

But the SEC was concerned enough about the upward movement of a few stocks prior to Frist's November 2005 speech, which pledged a Senate vote on the asbestos bill, that it posed some questions to the lawmaker's office. Those questions were referred to the Senate's legal counsel, a Frist spokeswoman said.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Police Chief's Letter To Polygamist Leader: I Love You (AP)

AP, December 9, 2006

SALT LAKE CITY, Utah (AP) -- The chief law enforcer in two Utah-Arizona border towns is accused of misconduct for pledging allegiance to the leader of a polygamous sect who was on the FBI's most wanted list.

"I love you and ... know that you have the right to rule in all aspects of my life," Fred Barlow wrote in an October 2005 letter to Warren Jeffs. "Without priesthood I am nothing."

Barlow warmly addressed Jeffs as "Uncle Warren" and closed the letter by referring to himself as Jeffs' "servant."

Barlow is the police chief of a joint department serving Colorado City, Arizona, and Hildale, Utah. Jeffs is the leader of the Fundamentalist Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, which has 10,000 followers in those two towns.

The FLDS church practices polygamy and congregants revere Jeffs as a prophet and are taught to be obedient, including marrying at his behest.

Jeffs was arrested near Las Vegas on August 28. A judge will decide next Thursday whether he will stand trial in Utah on charges of rape as an accomplice for forcing a teenage girl to marry an older cousin. He also faces similar charges in Arizona.

"I am praying for you to be protected and yearn to be with you again," Barlow wrote. "I and all of the other officers have expressed our desire to stand with you and the priesthood."

The Arizona Peace Officer Standards and Training Board is using the letter as evidence in one of three misconduct charges against Barlow, who could lose his certification. The Salt Lake Tribune obtained the letter and published it Friday.

DOJ_NMG_0105069

Separately, the Utah Peace Officer Standards and Training Council this week voted to conduct its own probe of the police force, whose officers are accused of being too loyal to Jeffs.

Barlow even consulted Jeffs on a personnel matter in the letter. He named a police academy graduate he planned to hire -- "unless you would like us to do something different."

Federal authorities obtained the missive on October 28, 2005, when Jeffs' brother, Seth Jeffs, was arrested in Colorado with correspondence, money and other supplies believed to be intended for Warren Jeffs.

Barlow did not immediately return a phone call seeking comment Friday. In an interview with Arizona regulators on August 10, Barlow said he does not get daily advice from Jeffs, but "we may ask for some advice on some things if we can get it."

Anderson Indicted On Seven Counts (ANCHDN)

By RICHARD MAUER, LISA DEMER And TOM KIZZIA, Anchorage Daily News

Anchorage Daily News, December 9, 2006

Federal bribery case centers on link to prison firm lobbyist

State Rep. Tom Anderson pleaded not guilty Friday to a series of federal charges accusing him of selling his legislative office for $12,828 in bribes from a lobbyist representing private prison interests.

Anderson, a 39-year-old Republican who has represented Muldoon's District 19 since he was elected in 2002, was ordered freed Friday by U.S. Magistrate Judge John Roberts on an unsecured $10,000 bond after his arrest Thursday by FBI agents. Roberts said Anderson could travel to Mexico on a previously scheduled vacation next week with his wife, Republican state Rep. Lesil McGuire, who was elected to the state Senate in November, and their infant son.

TWO YEARS IN THE MAKING

The 18-page indictment against Anderson said the lobbyist was secretly recorded July 21, 2004, boasting that for a price, Anderson would be "our boy in Juneau."

A week later, the same lobbyist was recorded telling a confidential informant, "If I was a Soviet spy and I was looking for a legislator to recruit, (Anderson) would be the one I'd get." Anderson "needs the money," the lobbyist said.

The government didn't charge the lobbyist. He is identified only by the letter "A," but the facts in the case point to Bill Bobrick of Anchorage, who represented Cornell Companies, a private prison firm Outside. Bobrick didn't return messages left on his home and cell phones Friday, and his business number wasn't working.

On Thursday, before Anderson's arrest, Bobrick said in an interview that he was getting out of the lobbying business and was in the process of handing off his clients. He cited "health issues" as the reason.

Anderson, who did not seek re-election this year and formally leaves office next month, is the first legislator charged with corruption in office since two state senators faced charges in the early 1980s. One, George Hohman, was convicted of bribery in 1981, while the other, Ed Dankworth, successfully appealed his 1982 conflict-of-interest charges and never faced trial.

Anderson's seven-count indictment accuses him of going into league with Lobbyist A to promote a private prison somewhere in Alaska and a private juvenile treatment facility in Anchorage.

In return for the money, it said Anderson got himself appointed to legislative committees with jurisdiction over prisons and treatment, lobbied other elected officials, agreed to align his votes with the correction company's interests, wrote letters and publicly spoke on behalf of company projects.

Anderson disguised the source of the money in his reports to the Alaska Public Offices Commission, the indictment charged.

A GOVERNMENT SOURCE

A second private prison advocate secretly worked with the government to record conversations of the lobbyist and Anderson. The informant, identified only as "CS-1," used money provided by the FBI in the payoffs.

The private prison company was identified only as "Corrections Company" in the charges, but the facts squarely match Cornell Companies Inc. of Houston, Texas, a publicly traded corporation with facilities in 17 states. Cornell operates six halfway houses in Alaska from its buyout of Anchorage-based Allvest Corp. With partners Veco and Allvest founder Bill Weimer, Cornell failed to win public support for private prison proposals in Anchorage, Delta Junction, Kenai and Whittier.

DOJ_NMG_0105070

The proposals were all highly controversial in the communities, though they often sailed through legislative committees. During a House Finance Committee hearing May 9, 2004, Rep. Eric Croft, D-Anchorage, said the effort was corrupting the state.

"What I see, over and over, is repeated sole-source, pre-arranged, heavy-money deals that go to specific contractors. ... It's never been a clean, competitive proposal," Croft said at the time, the only member of the committee to object. "We are going to see somebody indicted and probably imprisoned over this series of proposals."

A prepared statement from the Justice Department released Friday said the corrections company was never told about the payments to Anderson "due to the undercover nature of the operation." It said the company "was not implicated in the corrupt activities that are alleged in the indictment."

Christine Parker, a spokeswoman for Cornell in Houston, said, "There's nothing that we knew of, or were aware of, until this indictment was issued."

Anderson arrived for his arraignment in federal court Friday wearing a bright yellow jumpsuit with the word "PRISONER" across his back. His legs were shackled as he rose for the judge alongside his defense attorney, Jeffrey Feldman of Anchorage. The hearing lasted 19 minutes. His trial was set for Feb. 12.

If the government was making a point to other potential defendants in its ongoing investigation into corruption, the message was tough. Nicholas Marsh, a trial attorney from the Justice Department's Public Integrity Section in Washington, D.C., told the court the charges carried penalties ranging from a maximum of five years and a $250,000 fine for conspiracy to a maximum of 20 years and $500,000 for each of three money laundering charges. Anderson was also accused of two counts of extortion (20 years and $250,000) and one count of bribery (10 years and $250,000).

The activities alleged in the indictment took place long before the coordinated raids of Aug. 31, when the FBI searched the offices of 10 percent of the 60-member Legislature. Anderson's office wasn't among them, and it's unclear how his case is related. Marsh, assistant U.S. attorney Joseph Bottini and FBI agent Mary Beth Kepner, a leader of the corruption probe, left quickly after the arraignment and declined to answer questions.

CALLS WERE RECORDED

The conspiracy alleged in the indictment began in July 2004 and continued through the following March. It said that Lobbyist A set up a shell company called Pacific Publishing that existed solely to launder money to Anderson. The company would pay Anderson to write articles about politics that would be published on its Web site, but Anderson was paid without ever scribbling a line.

CS-1 paid Lobbyist A $24,000 in three payments. The cover story was that the money was for advertising on the Web site, but they agreed the money was really for Anderson's pocket, with "A" taking a sizable cut.

The indictment said CS-1 had worked for the corrections company as a lobbyist "at various times." The identity closely matches Frank Prewitt, a former Alaska corrections commissioner appointed by Gov. Wally Hickel and who later went to work for Cornell.

In an e-mail exchange with the Daily News on Friday, Prewitt suggested he was the source, though he stopped short of confirming it.

"At this time it is inappropriate for me to talk about the voluntary role that I and others may have played in the Anderson investigation," Prewitt wrote. "Over the next year I believe you will find that this was only the beginning of the end of a sad, but healthy chapter in Alaska history. My prayers are with Representative Anderson and his family during this difficult time for all."

The first recorded conversation cited in the indictment occurred July 16, 2004, when the lobbyist suggested to the confidential source that they "try with (Cornell) to help out Tom Anderson." Five days later, the lobbyist told the source that Cornell should hire Anderson through him.

Rather than report Cornell, with its interest in legislation and other government action, as the source of the money, Anderson said he was paid for writing for the Pacific Publishing Web site.

Anderson himself was recorded Aug. 17, 2004, telling the confidential source: "APOC only needs to know (Bobrick) pays me and then we're all safe."

The source paid the lobbyist the first $8,000 Aug. 19, 2004, the indictment charged. Out of that, Anderson received $3,328, which he deposited Aug. 23 into the account of his personal consulting firm, Alaska Strategic Consultants.

DOJ_NMG_0105071

In a recorded call Oct. 20, 2004, the source told Anderson he had prepared the next $8,000 payment and planned to pass it on to the lobbyist.

"Awesome. Awesome. I appreciate it," Anderson is quoted as saying.

Anderson received a $3,500 advance from that payment, the indictment charged.

The source made his last $8,000 payment on Dec. 21, 2004. Anderson got $4,000.

But late in the scheme, the indictment alleged, Anderson was showing signs of unhappiness over splitting the money with the lobbyist. According to excerpts of recordings, the confidential source appeared at first to encourage the disaffection, saying it wasn't the lobbyist who was speaking out and voting for Cornell, but rather Anderson.

"I know," Anderson said.

But then the source suggested the lobbyist might become "estranged" if he were cut out of the deal. The source thought that he could make a separate payment direct to Anderson.

"If there's a way you can think of that, that would be nice," Anderson replied.

The source obliged, handing Anderson a $2,000 check Dec. 21, 2004. The indictment said the check was made payable to Tom Anderson.

U.S. Indicts Alaska Lawmaker In Bribery (WT)

By Jerry Seper, THE WASHINGTON TIMES

The Washington Times, December 9, 2006

A federal grand jury in Alaska yesterday indicted Thomas T. Anderson, a member of the Alaska State House of Representatives, on charges of extortion, conspiracy, bribery and money laundering.

The indictment, handed up in U.S. District Court in Anchorage, accuses Mr. Anderson of soliciting and receiving money from an FBI confidential source in exchange for his agreement to perform official acts to further the source's business interest.

Assistant Attorney General Alice S. Fisher, who heads the Justice Department's Criminal Division, said the seven-count indictment returned Wednesday charges Mr. Anderson with two counts of extortion, one count of bribery, one count of conspiracy, and three counts of money laundering in connection with the use of a sham corporation to hide the source of the bribery payments.

The indictment also said that from July 2004 to March 2005, Mr. Anderson, along with another person identified as "Lobbyist A," solicited and received $26,000 in payments from an FBI confidential source, in exchange for Mr. Anderson's agreement to take official acts as a member of the Alaska Legislature.

According to the indictment, Mr. Anderson and Lobbyist A participated in the creation of a sham corporation to conceal the existence and true origin of the payments, and used the sham corporation to funnel a portion of the $26,000 to Mr. Anderson.

The indictment said the FBI confidential source was a consultant for a private corrections company located outside the state of Alaska, and Mr. Anderson and Lobbyist A initiated contact with the FBI confidential source in order to solicit bribery payments.

The FBI confidential source, however, never communicated those solicitations or any other information to the corrections company because of the undercover nature of the operation, the indictment said. The corrections company was not implicated in the corrupt activities that are charged in the indictment.

If convicted, Mr. Anderson faces a maximum penalty of 20 years and a $250,000 fine on the extortion counts; a maximum penalty of 20 years and a $500,000 fine on each of the money-laundering counts; a maximum penalty of 10 years and a $250,000 fine on the bribery count; and a maximum penalty of five years and a $250,000 fine on the conspiracy count.

The case is being prosecuted by trial attorneys Nicholas A. Marsh and Edward P. Sullivan of the Justice Department's Public Integrity Section, which is headed by Acting Chief Edward C. Nucci, as well as Assistant U.S. Attorneys Joseph W. Bottini and James A. Goeke in Alaska.

McGuire Defends Her Husband (ANCHDN)

Anchorage Daily News, December 9, 2006

Anchorage Sen.-elect Lesil McGuire said Friday that her husband is innocent of bribery and other charges, while noting the things he's accused of happened before they married.

"I am not and have not been a target of any investigation," she said in a statement issued to the media.

McGuire, a state representative from South Anchorage who was recently elected to the Senate, married Rep. Tom Anderson more than a year ago.

"He is a good man," McGuire told The Associated Press. "I've been beside him through many battles in the Legislature and have watched him. I'm devastated."

McGuire told The AP that the accusations against her husband don't involve her at all and that Anderson has stopped working as a lobbyist before the city. Anderson did not run for re-election and his term is about to run out.

McGuire did not return repeated calls from the Daily News on Friday.

In her written statement to the media, she asked that the public withhold judgment of her indicted husband "until the judicial process has run its course."

"As you can imagine, my family and I are devastated by the events that occurred yesterday," she wrote.

Federal Jury Convicts Ex-Teamsters Leader (HC)

By Harvey Rice, Houston Chronicle

Houston Chronicle, December 9, 2006

Crawley is found guilty of rigging union election and accepting kickback

A federal jury convicted on Friday a former president of Houston's largest Teamsters local on all counts alleging that he rigged a union election and accepted a kickback from a vendor.

Charles "Chuck" Crawley was taken from the downtown courtroom immediately after the verdict was announced.

U.S. District Judge Melinda Harmon scheduled a March 23 hearing, when Crawley could be sentenced up to 30 years in prison.

"I think he's in shock," defense attorney Ned Barnett said.

He added that his client "was convicted on testimony of witnesses who have told a lot of lies in the past," referring to union officials who were given immunity in return for testimony.

Jurors had heard four days of testimony in Crawley's trial on one count of mail fraud, two counts of embezzlement and one count of falsifying records. He is the fourth Teamsters president in Houston to be convicted on federal charges since 1992, Assistant U.S. Attorney Edward Gallagher said.

Crawley was elected as a reformer in 1997 after his predecessor, Richard Hammond, was removed by a trustee from the international union in 1995. Hammond was sentenced to four years in federal prison in 1998 after his conviction for embezzling union funds.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Michael Wright said Friday that Crawley betrayed union members' trust for his own gain.

The verdict came after a prosecutor told jurors in closing arguments that Crawley had assured a union vendor that he would have the winning bid in return for a $20,000 kickback.

Justice Department trial attorney Vincent Falvo said Crawley told the vendor who installed the telephone system in a new union hall, "There will be no other bids. This is my union hall."

By convicting Crawley of accepting the kickback and rigging a 2002 union election, "You will tell Mr. Crawley, 'No, it is the members' union,' " Falvo told jurors.

Barnett countered that prosecutors unfairly targeted his client and that prosecution witnesses lied to save themselves or because they feared the government.

"They wanted Mr. Crawley. They had their minds made up" before evidence was gathered, Barnett said. "He's the prize. He's the trophy."

Wright called that allegation absurd.

Crawley, 56, was indicted in June after a three-year probe into allegations that he rigged the 2002 election to stay in office.

DOJ_NMG_0105073

An investigation by the International Brotherhood of Teamsters led to his ouster in 2003 as head of Local 988.

That same year, he gained national attention by using non-union labor to build the local's $1.7 million union hall, causing international President James P. Hoffa to cancel his appearance at the opening.

Crawley was accused of mailing 362 phony absentee ballots in the names of union members he thought would not vote.

But 36 did vote, raising suspicions that led to an investigation, prosecutors said.

Falvo said an FBI lab found Crawley's fingerprints on one of the phony ballots, and another union official testified that he helped Crawley stuff the phony ballots into envelopes.

A vendor testified that he offered to sell the union a phone system for $32,000, but Crawley asked him to add $20,000.

Child Porn Site Host Guilty (CLARKSLC)

By Thomya Hogan, The Leaf-Chronicle

Clarksville (TN) Leaf-Chronicle, December 9, 2006

Clarksville man makes plea, faces 5- to 150-year sentence

A Clarksville man who hosted an Internet chat room called "Kiddiepics & Kiddievids" that was at the center of an international child pornography investigation pleaded guilty in federal court Thursday.

Royal Raymond Weller, 49, who lived in Hunter Chase Apartments on Madison Street at the time of his arrest, admitted to eight counts of conspiracy to distribute child pornography, distribution of child pornography, receipt of child pornography and possession of child pornography.

After making his plea in U.S. District Court in Nashville Thursday, Weller now faces between 5 and 150 years in federal prison and will be sentenced in March.

According to a news release from the Justice Department, Weller, under the user name "G.O.D.," hosted chats shaped around users' preferences and included promoting the trade of child pornography and evading detection by law enforcement.

Many of the users and administrators of the site had conversations about their involvement in sexual molestation, and the chat included discussion of sexually explicit conduct involving prepubescent children, bondage and bestiality. Some of the children depicted were infants.

When sharing child pornography, Weller used a different identity, "Devil666" and often had more than 1,000 images and videos available for trade. The Justice Department said Weller also had about 10,000 child pornography files on his computer and hard drives.

Weller ran his chat rooms and traded child porn for at least 2 1/2 years. He admitted to being attracted to young girls going through puberty and told investigators he had secretly taken photographs of children in public locations.

"There are few if any crimes more revolting than those involving the sexual exploitation of vulnerable young children," said U.S. attorney Craig Morford in the release. "These crimes rob our children of their innocence and leave a wake of victims scarred, both physically and emotionally, for life. It is no accident that this defendant called himself 'Devil666' and it will take nothing short of a dedicated effort on the part of all segments of society — our communities, our schools, our families, our law enforcement agencies and our courts — to stop the spread of this cancer."

Weller's March 6 arrest and subsequent conviction were the result of an investigation that involved the Immigration and Customs Enforcement Agency and law enforcement officers in other countries. He was one of 27 people charged in a ring that spanned 10 states and Canada, Australia and Great Britain.

Weller pleaded guilty in U.S. District Court in Nashville to eight counts of conspiracy to distribute child pornography, distribution of child pornography, receipt of child pornography and possession of child pornography, The Leaf-Chronicle reported.

Weller will be sentenced in March and could face between five and 150 years in federal prison.

He was arrested in March after an investigation involving the Immigration and Customs Enforcement Agency and law enforcement officers in other countries.

Senator: Illegal Images Must Be Reported (CNET)

By Declan McCullagh, Staff Writer, CNET News.com

CNET News, December 9, 2006

John McCain proposes law to force Web sites to report unlawful activity and delete posts by sex offenders.

Millions of commercial Web sites and personal blogs would be required to report illegal images or videos posted by their users or pay fines of up to $300,000, if a new proposal in the U.S. Senate came into law.

The legislation, drafted by Sen. John McCain and obtained by CNET News.com, would also require Web sites that offer user profiles to delete pages posted by sex offenders.

In a speech on the Senate floor this week, the Arizona Republican and former presidential candidate warned that "technology has contributed to the greater distribution and availability, and, some believe, desire for child pornography." McCain scored 31 of 100 points on a 2006 election guide scoring technology-related votes.

After child pornography or some forms of "obscenity" are found and reported, the Web site must retain any "information relating to the facts or circumstances" of the incident for at least six months. Webmasters would be immune from civil and criminal liability if they followed the specified procedures exactly.

McCain's proposal, called the "Stop the Online Exploitation of Our Children Act" (click for PDF), requires that reports be submitted to the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children, which in turn will forward to the relevant police agency. (The organization received $32.6 million in tax dollars in 2005, according to its financial disclosure documents.)

Internet service providers already must follow those reporting requirements. But McCain's proposal is liable to be controversial because it levies the same regulatory scheme--and even stiffer penalties--on even individual bloggers who offer discussion areas on their Web sites.

"This constitutionally dubious proposal is being made apparently mostly based on fear or political considerations rather than on the facts," said Kevin Bankston, an attorney with the Electronic Frontier Foundation in San Francisco.

According to the proposed legislation, these types of individuals or businesses would be required to file reports: any Web site with a message board; any chat room; any social-networking site; any e-mail service; any instant-messaging service; any Internet content hosting service; any domain name registration service; any Internet search service; any electronic communication service; and any image or video-sharing service.

Kate Dean of the U.S. Internet Service Provider Association said her members appreciated McCain's efforts to rewrite the current procedures for reporting illegal images, which currently are less than clear.

McCain's proposal comes as concern about protecting children online has reached nearly a fever pitch in Washington. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales gave two speeches this week on the topic, including one on Friday in which he said "we must do all that we can to protect our children from these cowardly villains who hide in the shadows of the Internet."

But the reporting rules could prove problematic for individuals and smaller Web sites because the definitions of child pornography have become relatively broad.

The U.S. Justice Department, for instance, indicted an Alabama man named Jeff Pierson last week on child pornography charges because he took modeling photographs of clothed minors with their parents' consent. The images were overly "provocative," a prosecutor claimed.

Deleting sex offenders' posts

DOJ_NMG_0105075

The other section of McCain's legislation targets convicted sex offenders. It would create a federal registry of "any e-mail address, instant-message address, or other similar Internet identifier" they use, and punish sex offenders with up to 10 years in prison if they don't supply it.

Then, any social-networking site must take "effective measures" to remove any Web page that's "associated" with a sex offender.

Because "social-networking site" isn't defined, it could encompass far more than just MySpace.com, Friendster and similar sites. The list could include Slashdot, which permits public profiles; Amazon.com, which permits author profiles and personal lists; blogs like RedState.com that show public profiles. In addition, media companies like News.com publisher CNET Networks permit users to create profiles of favorite games, gadgets and music.

"I think there is an irrational hysteria surrounding these social-networking sites and the threat to youngsters on these sites, so I don't see these measures being justified," said EFF's Bankston.

A McCain aide, who did not want to be identified by name, said on Friday that the measure was targeted at any Web site that "you'd have to join up or become a member of to use." No payment would be necessary to qualify, the aide added.

In this political climate, members of Congress may not worry much about precise definitions. Another bill also vaguely targeting social-networking sites was approved by the U.S. House of Representatives in a 410-15 vote.

And in July, for instance, Congress overwhelmingly approved a bill that made it a federal felony for Webmasters to use innocent words like "Barbie" or "Furby" to trick minors into visiting their sites and viewing sexually explicit material.

Next year, Gonzales and the FBI are expected to resume their push for mandatory data retention, which will force Internet service providers to keep records on what their customers are doing online. An aide to Rep. Diana DeGette, a Colorado Democrat, said Friday that she's planning to introduce such legislation when the new Congress convenes.

Cathy Milhoan, an FBI spokeswoman, said on Friday that the FBI "continues to support data retention. We see it as crucial in advancing our cyber investigations to include online sexual exploitation of children."

In addition, Sen. Chuck Schumer, a New York Democrat, and McCain said this week that they'll introduce similar legislation dealing with sex offenders and social-networking sites in January.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Osceola Poised To Accept Order On Voting Districts (ORS)

By Mark Pino, Sentinel Staff Writer

The Orlando Sentinel, December 9, 2006

After spending nearly a year and a half and about $2 million fighting a federal voting-rights suit, Osceola County commissioners appear ready to abide by a federal judge's order Friday that will implement single-member voting in pending elections.

If commissioners vote to accept the ruling, a special election for two commission seats could be held this spring. A private strategy meeting is expected early next week, commissioners said.

Two commissioners questioned the wisdom of continuing the fight Friday, and two others expressed doubts about an appeal but wanted to wait to hear from the county's attorneys. A fifth commissioner did not return phone calls.

"I don't see much effort in doing that," Commissioner Tom Franklin said of an appeal. "At one point or another, you have to decide if it is worth the battle. It is something we have no control over. You don't keep fighting against windmills."

U.S. District Judge Gregory A. Presnell tossed out an Osceola proposal that would have created a hybrid system with five single-member and two at-large commission seats.

"As this court has already found, Hispanics in Osceola County have no reasonable opportunity to elect members in an at-large election. Therefore, given the high degree of historically polarized voting, the extra two at-large seats are completely out of the reach of the Hispanic community," Presnell wrote in a ruling released less than 24 hours after a hearing Thursday.

DOJ_NMG_0105076

The judge accepted district boundaries drawn by the U.S. Department of Justice and approved by the county earlier this week. He also accepted a proposal for which seats would be on the ballot and how elections would proceed.

Under the plan, an open seat for a new Hispanic-majority district that includes Buenaventura Lakes will be up for election as well as a district seat for which Commissioner Ken Smith is the incumbent.

Commission Chairman Ken Shipley said an executive session was likely for Tuesday to discuss options. Like all commissioners contacted, he was disappointed with the ruling. But he said he thought the chances of a reversal on appeal were slim.

"I don't think it is winnable right now. It is only going to delay the inevitable," Shipley said. "I would have loved for it to be different. I think the board has done everything it could in protecting the charter and what voters voted on years ago," he added in reference to a 1996 referendum in which voters opted to switch back to countywide election of commissioners from a single-member-district format.

Presnell ruled in October that the "racially polarized" county's at-large voting system penalizes Hispanics in violation of the U.S. Voting Rights Act.

"Moving forward with elections next spring under a lawful plan is an important victory for all the residents of Osceola County," said Wan J. Kim, assistant attorney general for the Justice Department's Civil Rights Division, "and particularly for its Hispanic citizens who have been denied the right guaranteed by the Voting Rights Act to full and equal participation in the democratic process in county government."

About 38 percent of the county's population is Hispanic. Only one Hispanic has been elected to countywide office, but that was in 1996 during the county's brief experiment with single-member voting.

Commissioner Paul Owen thought expanding the board with two at-large seats was a fair compromise.

He said he was waiting for the meeting next week to decide whether an appeal was appropriate.

"I will definitely give weight to what our attorneys have to say on our chances of winning an appeal," Owen said.

Smith reiterated his firm belief in at-large voting, saying: "You should have a right to vote for anyone who has a say-so on taxing your property. I think having a county perspective as opposed to a district perspective is something that is needed."

Jury Ruling Favors Ex-DEA Agent In Bias Suit (MH)

By Jay Weaver

The Miami Herald, December 9, 2006

A former high-ranking federal drug agent in Miami said a "great feeling" swelled up inside him on Friday when he won a 4-year-old discrimination lawsuit against the U.S. government.

A federal jury in Miami found the Drug Enforcement Administration discriminated against Sandalio Gonzalez, the former second-in-command of the DEA's South Florida field office, by retaliating against him with a transfer to another management job in Texas in 2001.

The racially mixed, nine-person jury awarded $85,000 in damages to Gonzalez, 55, of Doral, who had been the DEA's top-ranking Cuban-American administrator. The victory under U.S. law allows his attorneys to obtain legal fees, which could total hundreds of thousands of dollars.

For Gonzalez -- who stirred controversy in 2000 when he blew the whistle on a Miami drug bust in which 10 kilos of cocaine went missing -- the court triumph was sweet vindication. He had stood up for not only himself, but also other Hispanic and black DEA agents in the Miami field office over issues of discrimination, his lawyers said.

"I don't think it's sunk in yet," said the 27-year DEA veteran, now retired. ``It's just a great feeling to see the system work."

The Department of Justice, named as a defendant in the suit, could appeal the verdict. The Drug Enforcement Administration, which is part of the Justice Department, declined to comment Friday.

Gonzalez was among 16 top-level agency executives sent transfer orders on Jan. 18, 2001 -- just before a four-month freeze on such moves was instituted by President George W. Bush's incoming administration. Gonzalez, who supervised about 300 agents in Miami, was ordered to move to El Paso, Texas, where he was the top DEA administrator in charge of 150 agents. Gonzalez, who made $142,000 annually, retired last year and returned to Miami.

Top DEA officials, who testified at the week-long trial before U.S. District Judge Federico Moreno, described the transfer as a ``promotion."

But Gonzalez and several others on the transfer list had complained that DEA Administrator Donnie R. Marshall's actions were meant to punish perceived troublemakers and reward his friends before his successor was appointed by the Bush administration.

"Believe me, this was the last thing I wanted to do," Gonzalez told The Miami Herald after filing a complaint to stop the transfer in March 2001. ``Of course I'm sad about it, but they have left me no choice."

Gonzalez accused Miami DEA agents, supervisors and high-level federal prosecutors of covering up the disappearance of 10 kilos of cocaine from a 1998 search of a drug suspect's stash house in Miami. Internal investigators found no wrongdoing.

Gonzalez alleged unfair treatment of Hispanic agents in the DEA's Miami field office -- a claim central to his discrimination suit.

His attorneys, Richard Diaz and Donald Appignani, rejoiced over the victory, saying their client showed courage in standing up to the government on such an important principle.

"While the amount of money awarded to Sandy does not match the harm the government did to him," Diaz said, ``what is more important is he has been vindicated after four years in the court system."

ANTITRUST:

Commissioner Cleared To Vote On AT&T-BellSouth Deal (AP)

By John Dunbar

AP, December 9, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Federal Communications Commission's (FCC) top lawyer on Friday authorized one of its members to vote on the proposed buyout of BellSouth by AT&T, despite an apparent conflict of interest. The move could break a deadlock on the deal.

The decision came a week after FCC Chairman Kevin Martin declared an impasse in the proceeding and asked General Counsel Sam Feder to determine whether Commissioner Robert McDowell, a former lobbyist, should be allowed to vote on the $84 billion acquisition.

The deal would be the biggest in U.S. telecommunications history.

Feder's action increases the likelihood that AT&T, the biggest U.S. telephone company, will win conditional approval from the FCC within the next two months and overcome the acquisition's final regulatory hurdle, said Paul Glenchur, an analyst at Stanford Washington Research Group.

McDowell, one of three Republicans on the five-member commission, has sat out of negotiations because of his past work as a lobbyist.

"There's still a decent chance it will be wrapped up this year," Glenchur said.

The next open meeting for the agency is Dec. 20, but Martin said Friday night that he does not anticipate putting the issue up for a vote then. It would not give McDowell enough time to get "up to speed" on the issues, Martin said.

In Feder's eight-page opinion, he argued that McDowell should be allowed to vote because he had not participated in the merger proceeding as a lobbyist, did not stand to gain financially from his vote, and that it would be impossible for someone else to take his place in the proceeding.

But Feder was also clearly torn, noting that Robert Cusick, director of the Office of Government Ethics, had said the decision was a close call on which reasonable people could differ and that Cusick said he would decide against authorization but that "the FCC could reasonably come out the other way."

Martin and AT&T are betting that McDowell, despite his history, will vote to approve the merger.

DOJ_NMG_0105078

In a statement, McDowell did not indicate whether he had made up his mind, saying only that he was reviewing Feder's opinion.

McDowell also noted that the incoming chairman of the House Energy and Commerce Committee, Rep. John Dingell, D-Mich., had written the commission posing questions about its precedents for recusals and other issues.

"I look forward to receiving a copy of Mr. Feder's response," McDowell said, adding that in the meantime he hoped the other four commissioners would resolve their differences and reach an agreement.

Dingell questioned the circumstances surrounding the decision, including the comments of the director of Office of Government Ethics, saying they raised "serious questions of both ethics and propriety."

McDowell is one of three Republicans on the five-member commission. He has not participated in the merger because he thinks a vote would violate conflict of interest rules.

Without McDowell, Martin has declined to schedule a vote because it has appeared the result would be a 2-2 deadlock, with Martin and another Republican appointee favoring the deal and the two Democrats opposing it.

Commissioners Michael Copps and Jonathan Adelstein have asked AT&T to agree to further concessions, including assurances the giant company would not discriminate against Internet traffic, an issue known as network neutrality.

Martin confirmed that the key sticking point revolved around the "network neutrality" issue.

The Antitrust Division of the Justice Department cleared the deal Oct. 11, declaring there were no competitive concerns and opting not to require the combined company to divest assets or make any other concessions.

The proposed takeover has been approved by regulators in 18 states, leaving the FCC as the final hurdle.

Last week, Martin wrote a letter to several members of Congress who oversee the FCC, saying in part: "Despite working for months to reach consensus with my colleagues, three attempts over the past six weeks to have this item considered at an open meeting, and countless hours of internal deliberations, the commission has reached an impasse."

Both Democrats criticized the move then.

Copps said allowing McDowell to vote would create more problems than it resolves. It also would "short-circuit discussions, and very likely shortchange consumers," he said. Adelstein echoed those comments.

McDowell once worked for the trade association Comptel, which represents companies that compete with AT&T and the other regional Bell phone companies.

Another Flight Delay (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, December 9, 2006

Well, that's the end of that. The Transportation Department announced this week that it's giving up its effort to liberalize the antiquated laws governing ownership of U.S. airlines. Congressional protectionism, 1; common sense 0.

For more than 60 years, U.S. law has barred foreign entities from owning more than 49% of an American carrier, and has restricted foreign "control" to 25%. In theory this keeps a national-security asset in American hands. In practice it stifles investment and competition at a time when American carriers are experiencing heavy turbulence.

Enter former Transportation Secretary Norm Mineta, who proposed allowing foreign investors more latitude to guide fleet composition, route structure and marketing even while safety and security would still rest with American citizens. Alas, 'twas not to be, thanks to a little labor activism and a lot of Congressional territory-marking. Mr. Mineta's successor, Mary Peters, has thrown in the towel, saying the Department "needs to do more to inform the public, labor groups and Congress about the benefits" of the proposal.

Unions already know the benefits, but they fear that a little opening today might pave the way to more competition -- and less generous contracts for American workers -- tomorrow. Imagine Big Labor's delight, then, when feathers started to ruffle on Capitol Hill as Mr. Mineta opted to go the rule-making route instead of seeking legislation. Then the panic hit over a Dubai company investing in U.S. ports. Republicans were only too happy to seize the airline ownership rule as an opportunity to show their independence from the Bush Administration.

It didn't help that some legacy airlines both at home and abroad viewed the proposal as a front in the broader battle of a U.S.-European Union open skies agreement. The EU had made easing the U.S. ownership rules a prerequisite for such an agreement. Carriers split in reaction to the ownership rule depending on whether they thought they'd win or lose from open skies. Continental Airlines, for example, opposed the ownership rule for fear that it would lose out in a new battle for access to London's Heathrow airport under the EU deal. Continental and other domestic carriers, incidentally, have also been trying to use the ownership rules to block an attempt by Richard Branson's Virgin brand to enter the U.S. market as a low-cost carrier.

The foreign ownership limits are a protectionist vestige from an age when airlines were treated like national totems. That day has long passed, and the rules now serve mainly to protect industry and labor special interests. With AFL-CIO favorite James Oberstar of Minnesota about to take over the House Transportation and Infrastructure Committee, change is even less likely. Air travelers out for better service and lower prices face yet another delay.

ENVIRONMENT:

House OKs Bill To Drill Off Florida (SFC)

By Zachary Coile

San Francisco Chronicle, December 9, 2006

Washington -- The House approved a bill Friday to open 8.3 million acres of federal waters west of the Florida coast to oil and gas drilling, a victory for business interests who lobbied for the bill and four Gulf Coast states that would receive billions in new oil and gas royalties.

But even drilling supporters admitted it was just a tiny fraction of the publicly owned area they had hoped to open during 12 years of Republican rule of Congress. Efforts to drill in Alaska's Arctic National Wildlife Refuge and off the Pacific and Atlantic coasts were defeated and are likely to be mothballed in the new Democratic Congress.

"When it comes to passing important legislation around here, you learn to shoot for the stars in the hope that you might land on the moon," Rep. John Peterson, R-Pa., a key drilling supporter, said after Friday's House vote. The measure still faced Senate consideration in a probable weekend session.

The oil and gas industry already is worried about Democrats' plans, shortly after they take control in the new Congress, to revoke billions of dollars in subsidies approved in recent years. Environmentalists will push for a permanent moratorium on offshore drilling for California and other coastal states that oppose development.

Another sign the winds are changing: The soon-to-be chairman of the House Resources Committee, Rep. Nick Rahall, D-W.Va., announced Friday he will change the name of his panel to the Natural Resources Committee -- the title it had before Republicans took power in 1994.

Rahall told reporters Friday that his agenda next year is "not to engage in the wholesale destruction of pristine federal lands, sacrificing them on the altar of energy development," but to "protect those resources which Americans cherish as places to recreate, hunt and fish."

The vote on offshore drilling was the end of a contentious debate sparked last year when the current House Resources Committee chairman, Rep. Richard Pombo, R-Tracy, introduced a bill to end the 25-year-old ban on drilling and offer states a share of oil and gas royalties if they agreed to allow oil and gas exploration off their shores. The bill also would have opened areas beyond 100 miles offshore to drilling regardless of whether states wanted it.

Pombo's drilling bill passed the House easily last June, but the Senate approved a much narrower measure to allow drilling only in an 8.3 million-acre swath of the Gulf of Mexico known as Lease Area 181, which Democratic President Bill Clinton had first proposed for oil and gas development. The Senate bill also created a "buffer zone" off the Florida coast where no drilling could occur, but only through the year 2022.

The election losses suffered by Republicans on Nov. 7 -- including Pombo's defeat -- reinforced the notion that the House drilling bill was dead.

DOJ_NMG_0105080

So industry groups, led by the National Association of Manufacturers, the American Chemistry Council and the American Gas Association, began pressuring the White House and Republican House leaders to accept the Senate bill to secure some new energy supplies before Democrats took power.

Gulf Coast lawmakers, especially Louisiana Democratic Sen. Mary Landrieu, who's been on a crusade to get more oil and gas revenue for her hurricane-stricken state, also aggressively pushed for the bill. She enlisted Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid to back her cause. Reid helped persuade House Speaker-to-be Nancy Pelosi of San Francisco not to whip up Democratic opposition to the drilling measure.

In the end, the measure narrowly survived. The House, on a 207-205 vote, rejected an amendment by Rep. Ed Markey, D-Mass., to require oil companies to repay royalties owed on leases from the 1990s before they could bid on any new leases. The Senate has no time to change it, so the change would have killed the drilling provision.

The offshore measure was ultimately passed as part of a 367-45 vote on a massive bill to extend $45 billion in popular tax breaks.

The clear winners in the bill -- should the Senate approve it as part of the overall tax measure -- are the states of Louisiana, Texas, Mississippi and Alabama, which soon would start collecting 37.5 percent of all federal royalties on oil and gas leases. Louisiana would get almost half of the new revenues. Together, the states would get several hundred million dollars a year as the pumping begins and tens of billions of dollars more once they start sharing in royalties from all Gulf of Mexico leases beginning in 2017.

Opponents said the measure would be a boondoggle for the Gulf Coast states, robbing as much as $170 billion over the next 60 years from the federal treasury, which could have paid for education, health care or cutting down the national debt.

"It's a great deal for these four states, and I can certainly understand why they would support it. But what I can't understand is why my colleagues from the other 46 states would agree to it," said Rep. Lois Capps, D-Santa Barbara. "This country has record deficits as far as the eye can see, and it's simply irresponsible to add billions more in new debt."

Environmentalists were disappointed by Friday's vote but still pleased they had prevented Pombo's bill from becoming law. They plan to go on the offense next year, pressuring their Democratic allies in key committee positions to permanently ban drilling off much or all of the West and East coasts.

"California's coastline remains at extreme risk until we are able to secure permanent protection," said Richard Charter, chairman of the National Outer Continental Shelf Coalition, a group opposing drilling. "The lesson we saw today was that even in the last 12 hours in the waning days of a lame-duck session, a state can lose its coastline in a heartbeat. That's what happened to much of the Florida coast today."

Sickened By Fresh Produce (NYT)

The New York Times, December 9, 2006

The expanding outbreak of E. coli poisonings in New York, New Jersey and several other states underscores the need for more rigorous regulation of the whole supply chain for fresh produce, from the growing fields to the customer. It is outrageous that fresh vegetables, typically deemed a vital component of a healthy diet, have become a menace because of contamination in their handling.

Although most of the victims had eaten at Taco Bell restaurants, where green onions, or scallions, were found to be contaminated, the real culprit probably lies farther up the supply chain, either at the growing farm or packaging plant or distribution warehouse. Investigators have yet to pinpoint the source, but suspicion seems to be pointing to a farm in California, whose green onions were also involved in a hepatitis outbreak in 2003. Only when the source of bacterial contamination is identified, if indeed it is ever identified, will we know better how this outbreak might have been prevented.

What's troubling is the recurrence of such outbreaks in recent years. Contaminated meat used to be deemed the big threat, but strict regulation and strong industrial efforts have reduced that risk considerably. Now produce has become a bigger problem than meat or poultry. There have been three multistate outbreaks from produce in the past three months, including an E. coli outbreak linked to spinach and a salmonella outbreak linked to tomatoes. Surely it is time to give government regulators the power and resources they need to ensure the safety of fresh fruits and vegetables.

Mafia Takedowns Win Italian Chief FBI Honors (AP)

By Lara Jakes Jordan, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 9, 2006

WASHINGTON- The FBI gave one of its highest honors Friday to Italy's national police chief for working a quarter-century with the U.S. to bring down an estimated 1,000 Mafia and other organized crime leaders in both countries.

Prefetto Giovanni "Gianni" De Gennaro, who at times put sandbags on his windows to shield his family from snipers and whose organized crime officers slept at police stations to remain safe, was awarded the FBI Medal for Meritorious Achievement. The ceremony at FBI headquarters marked the first time the honor was given to an official outside of the FBI's ranks.

De Gennaro, chief of the Italian National Police, said he worked so closely with the FBI and federal prosecutors that "sometimes I even woke up wondering if i was in Rome or in New York," he told an auditorium packed with current and former top FBI and Justice Department officials.

He said such international cooperation was valuable to help law enforcement face down threats "whether it appeared as a mobster or as a terrorist."

Former FBI Director Louis Freeh, who as a federal prosecutor in New York worked closely with De Gennaro on a number of Mafia cases in the 1980s, said that the U.S-Italy investigative bond "has really changed the face of organized crime.

"It has allowed the law enforcement infrastructure in both counties to really dismantle the command and control of the Mafia," Freeh said.

GRAZIE TO ITALIAN 'PIZZA' COP (NYPOST)

By Kati Cornell

The New York Post, December 9, 2006

December 9, 2006 -- Italy's mob-busting chief of police was honored by the FBI yesterday for his "visionary" approach to international crime fighting that began with New York's famous "Pizza Connection" case.

FBI Director Robert Mueller credited Giovanni De Gennaro - the first foreign official to receive the Medal of Meritorious Achievement - with forging a bond with the United States that grew into a worldwide intelligence network now used to combat terrorism.

De Gennaro first teamed up with the FBI in the 1980s to crack a massive mob-run heroin-trafficking operation involving Sicilian gangsters and their American Bonanno counterparts, who used pizza parlors as fronts.

The probe led to a 17-month trial in Manhattan federal court beginning in 1987, during which one defendant was murdered and another shot before the jury could return its verdict.

More than 20 years later the mob has been devastated by thousands of arrests that De Gennaro said came out of "a deep feeling of friendship [with the FBI] and commitment to fight a common enemy, whether he appeared as a mobster or a terrorist."

Commute This Sentence (WP)

The Washington Post, December 9, 2006

THE SUPREME Court this week declined to review the case of Weldon Angelos, leaving in place his obscene sentence of 55 years in prison for small-time marijuana and gun charges. The high court's move is no surprise; the justices have tended to uphold draconian sentences against constitutional challenge. But it confronts President Bush with a question he will have to address: Is there any sentence so unfair that he would exert himself to correct it?

So far, Mr. Bush hasn't found one. He has commuted only two sentences, both of inmates who were about to be released anyway. Mr. Angelos, by contrast, is a young man and a first-time offender who is now likely to spend the rest of his life in prison. His crime? He sold $350 in marijuana to a government informant three times -- and carried, but did not display, a gun on two of those occasions. Police found other guns and pot at his house. The U.S. district judge who sentenced him in Utah, Paul G.

Cassell, declared the mandatory sentence in this case "unjust, cruel, and even irrational." He noted that it is "far in excess of the sentence imposed for such serious crimes as aircraft hijacking, second degree murder, espionage, kidnapping, aggravated assault, and rape." And in an extraordinary act, he explicitly called on Mr. Bush to use his clemency powers to offer what he as a judge could not: justice. Judge Cassell recommended that Mr. Bush commute the sentence to 18 years, which he described as "the average sentence recommended by the jury that heard this case."

Mr. Bush put Judge Cassell on the bench. As a law professor before that, he was a staunch advocate of tough justice; his chief claim to fame, in fact, was having pressed the Supreme Court to overturn its landmark Miranda decision requiring police to read criminal suspects their constitutional rights. His exceptional discomfort with this case -- and his passionate plea for presidential mercy -- ought to carry weight even with a president so disinclined to use the powers the Constitution gives him to remedy injustices.

Actor Pleads Not Guilty In Tax Fraud Case (NYT)

By The New York Times

The New York Times, December 9, 2006

The actor Wesley Snipes, a fugitive for the last two months while shooting a movie in Namibia, surrendered to federal officials in Florida yesterday and pleaded not guilty to charges of tax fraud and conspiracy.

According to his indictment, by a federal grand jury in Tampa, Fla., Mr. Snipes, 44, failed to file tax returns from 1999 to 2004, and falsely claimed almost $12 million in refunds for 1996 and 1997.

He arrived in Orlando, Fla., yesterday and was arraigned in Ocala, according to the office of the United States attorney for Central Florida.

Mr. Snipes was freed on $1 million in bail. Magistrate Judge Gary R. Jones ordered him released pending trial, and gave him permission to return to Africa to finish his new movie, “Gallowwalker.” A trial is set for March, and Mr. Snipes is required to return to the United States and surrender his passport by Jan. 10.

“I look forward to clearing my name and resolving this issue posthaste,” he said after the hearing, The Associated Press reported.

A federal warrant was issued for Mr. Snipes’s arrest in October. Two Florida men, Eddie R. Kahn and Douglas P. Rosile, were indicted along with Mr. Snipes, on charges of conspiracy and of preparing fraudulent tax returns.

Wesley Snipes In Florida Court In Tax Fraud Case (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, December 9, 2006

(AP) - ORLANDO, Florida-Actor Wesley Snipes surrendered to authorities to face federal tax fraud charges and was released on $1 million (â‚¬750,000) bond Friday, two months after he was indicted in central Florida.

The actor in the "Blade" trilogy, "Major League" and "Jungle Fever" did not speak at a court appearance. He went there after arriving on a private jet Friday from the African nation of Namibia, where he was filming a cowboy movie called "Gallow Walker," his publicist said.

"I look forward to clearing my name and resolving this issue post haste," Snipes said after the hearing. He did not comment further on the case.

Snipes, 44, was charged in October with fraudulently claiming refunds totaling nearly $12 million in 1996 and 1997 on income taxes already paid. He was also charged with failure to file returns from 1999 through 2004.

He will be allowed to return to Namibia to finish his film, but he must return to his home in California on or before Jan. 10, U.S. Magistrate Gary Jones ruled.

After that, Snipes will be required to surrender his U.S. passport.

DOJ_NMG_0105083

According to the indictment, Snipes had his taxes prepared by accountants with a history of filing false returns to reap payments for their clients. The firm American Rights Litigators would receive 20 percent of refunds from clients, according to the indictment.

Snipes has said he is a scapegoat and was unfairly targeted by prosecutors, and has suggested he was taken advantage of.

"We believe the evidence in the case will show he has been the victim of unscrupulous tax advice. And this trial will help vindicate him," said Billy Martin, Snipes' lawyer.

If convicted, he faces up to 16 years in prison.

Martin said Snipes left the United States to film the movie long before the indictment.

"We want to make it clear that he did not avoid returning to the United States. He's always been ready to return," Martin said.

Bush Tanks On War (NYDN)

By Kenneth R. Bazinet

New York Daily News, December 9, 2006

WASHINGTON - More Americans than ever say President Bush is doing a pitiful job with the war, and an almost equally overwhelming number of people think Iraq won't turn out to be a stable democracy, a new poll showed yesterday.

A whopping 71% of Americans disapprove of Bush's handling of the war, while only 27% say he's done a good job, according to the AP-Ipsos poll.

Just 9% of Americans believe the U.S. will end up with a clear-cut victory in Iraq, the poll indicated, while 63% said they don't think the country will become a stable democracy.

The public opinion was so lousy that even Bush's go-to issue - the economy - took a hit in the latest poll. His oversight of the economy sank to a 38% approval rating from last month's 43%.

The cratering of support for Bush's conduct of the war was evident on the floor of the Senate, where an emotional Sen. Gordon Smith (R-Ore.) ripped the strategy and tactics in Iraq.

"I, for one, am at the end of my rope when it comes to supporting a policy that has our soldiers patrolling the same streets in the same way, being blown up by the same bombs day after day," Smith said.

"That is absurd. It may even be criminal," added Smith, who voted for the resolution to go to war but said he had changed course after some soul-searching.

Some lawmakers who spent time in meetings yesterday with Bush described him as being in denial and clueless about the American people's desire to see U.S. forces return home from Iraq.

"He has yet to get the message the American people sent him on Nov. 7," said Rep. Joe Crowley (D-Queens), referring to the watershed midterm elections that ended GOP control of Congress.

Crowley, one of eight centrist Democrats who met with Bush in the Oval Office, said the President is going to "cherry-pick" certain recommendations from the Iraq Study Group's report and ignore others.

Incoming Senate Democratic Whip Richard Durbin of Illinois said it was much of the same at an earlier meeting between Bush and the bipartisan leaders of Congress.

"The President did not endorse the Iraq Study Group at this meeting, and his statements leave me questioning whether or not he is ever going to support their conclusions," Durbin said.

Bush will have a series of briefings next week with Pentagon, State Department, National Security Council and outside experts. He is then expected to decide what steps he can take to try to reverse the deadly course that the Iraq war has taken for U.S. forces.

When Bush makes up his mind, he plans to deliver a speech to the nation before Christmas.

The forgotten man in the Bush administration is Vice President Cheney. He brought most of it on himself.

His standing is plunging with members of Congress as a whole, Democrats, some Republicans, and even zealots on the Christian right.

For the next two years, it appears he will be struggling to play any kind of significant role in Bush's lame-duck term. He has burned too many bridges to be really effective as a voice in Washington.

Consider these problems:

—Cheney is the first vice president in recent history who is not gearing up to succeed his president and run on his own. Think of Gore, Bush 41, Mondale, Humphrey–the list goes on. If Cheney reversed course, his candidacy would be laughable.

—Cheney's influence in the public domain has hit rock bottom in the past few months. He was unable to save buddy Don Rumsfeld's job as secretary of defense. He raised money for GOP candidates in the fall, but many of them lost.

—Cheney's lesbian daughter, Mary, is pregnant. That development is news only because Cheney's party is so outspoken against same-sex marriage or same-sex parents. In the 2000 campaign, the Bush-Cheney backers railed against same-sex marriage. No one doubts Cheney's sincere love for his daughter, but the Republican Party's hypocrisy here is unmistakable.

—Cheney's voice on the war in Iraq lacks credibility. He has been wrong on virtually all his predictions when he rarely ventures out for interviews. His penchant for being secretive has been evident for six years as aides shield him except for favored folks in the media.

For reporters who covered the Ford administration, as I did, we are puzzled and even dismayed at the change in Cheney. As the top presidential aide to President Ford, he was a hardworking, helpful, and even cheerful individual. He was a big asset to a struggling, accidental president. With Cheney's help, Ford almost pulled an upset in his race with Jimmy Carter.

That man no longer exists.

Cheney was picked as Bush's running mate in 2000 only after Cheney, who directed the selection process, didn't produce a name to the Texas governor's liking. The suspicion was that Bush's father was instrumental in finally going to Cheney.

A number of fellow GOP governors had come in fawning tribute to Bush in Austin, probably figuring they might land on the ticket. But Cheney got the nod, and most were delighted with the choice.

Cheney's downward slide has continued steadily since then.

Rumsfeld Discusses Successes, Failures (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson

The Washington Post, December 9, 2006

Departing Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld said yesterday that his most difficult moment on the job was when he learned of the abuses at the Abu Ghraib prison. His best moment, he said, may come the day later this month when he leaves office.

In his final town hall meeting with Pentagon employees, Rumsfeld ranged from serious and emotional to humorous and sarcastic as he mused about his legacy as one of the nation's longest-serving defense secretaries.

On Iraq, Rumsfeld warned of "the dire consequences, were we to fail there," saying the divide between Sunni and Shiite Muslims could spill over into the entire Middle East. He said it would be "a terrible mistake" for the United States "to pull out precipitously and inject that instability into . . . that region."

"We have every chance in the world of succeeding" in Iraq and Afghanistan, "but only if we have the patience and only if we have the staying power," Rumsfeld said.

When asked about his best and worst days in office, Rumsfeld chose not to cite any missteps in Iraq or U.S. troop casualties. Instead, he pointed to his shock and disappointment over the events at Abu Ghraib.

"Clearly the worst day was Abu Ghraib and seeing what went on there and feeling so deeply sorry that that happened," Rumsfeld said of the abuse of Iraqi detainees by U.S. troops uncovered in early 2004. He said the news "stunned him," calling the mistreatment of Iraqi detainees "egregious wrongdoing."

DOJ_NMG_0105085

The incident prompted Rumsfeld twice to offer his resignation to President Bush -- the only times he has acknowledged doing so until Nov. 8, when Rumsfeld announced he was stepping down in the aftermath of Democrats winning Congress in the midterm elections.

"I guess my best day, I don't know, maybe a week from Monday," Rumsfeld quipped. Dec. 18 is when his successor, former CIA chief Robert M. Gates, will be sworn into office in a formal ceremony at the Pentagon.

Rumsfeld, 74, said he has met twice with Gates in preparation for the transition and has "every confidence that he will do a terrific job." Asked what advice he would offer his successor, Rumsfeld received some prodding from the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Marine Gen. Peter Pace, who stood beside him on the Pentagon stage.

Pace whispered something to Rumsfeld, who then told the crowd, "The advice should be: He should listen to the chairman."

Both men defended the defense secretary against an accusation lodged by several generals, both active-duty and retired, that Rumsfeld tended to brush aside their advice. Pace called Rumsfeld "demanding" but said he also took the blame for subordinates and was careful to present their dissenting viewpoints.

Rumsfeld pointed to his decision to set up a senior leadership group, including the Joint Chiefs of Staff and combatant commanders, to "engage them at the beginning of the process" of making decisions.

As for his legacy, Rumsfeld deflected some questions with humor, saying he hopes that history will judge him "better than the local press."

Over time, he said, he hopes that most of his decisions will turn out to have been "the right ones."

Rumsfeld gave the Pentagon moderately good marks on one of his top priorities, the transformation of the military from a Cold War organization to a more agile and adaptive force. While people's attitudes have changed markedly, he suggested, concrete progress has been harder to achieve.

But he gave the military and the government overall a "D-plus" in their efforts to counter extremist ideologies overseas. He defended the controversial decision of U.S. commanders in Iraq to pay a contractor to place positive news articles in Iraqi newspapers but acknowledged that "there's always that line where you begin to propagandize. And you have to be careful."

As he prepares to leave office, Rumsfeld sounded two of his deepest and most long-held beliefs, saying he feels much the same as he did upon leaving the Pentagon the last time, in 1977, after serving as the country's youngest defense secretary.

"America's leadership in the world is not just useful, but . . . urgently needed," he said, repeating a worldview he first embraced as a Princeton University student in the late 1950s. "Ours is a troubled and very dangerous world, and we must not forget it," he cautioned, citing another core belief. The Pentagon today, he said, is in the midst of the most challenging period of its 59-year history.

Rumsfeld did not divulge his future plans, but some people in the audience urged him to write a book. "I always thought I was too young to write a book. I can't use that anymore," he said, drawing laughter. "I might. I might."

Rumsfeld's Farewell Speech (WP)

Cq Transcripts Wire

The Washington Post, December 9, 2006

DECEMBER 8, 2006

SPEAKERS: DONALD H. RUMSFELD, U.S. SECRETARY OF DEFENSE

GENERAL PETER PACE (USMC), CHAIRMAN, JOINT CHIEFS OF STAFF

[*]

PACE: Mr. Secretary, and everyone in this audience, this is our last opportunity to get together (inaudible), so let me just take minute to thank you all for all you do and to wish you and your families a very blessed and peaceful holiday season. And thanks for all you do to bring peace around the world.

And second, as you know, this is our last town hall meeting with our secretary. And although I'll get a chance to say a few more words next Friday at the departure ceremony, I'd be remiss if I didn't take this opportunity, amongst our family, to say just a few things about Secretary Rumsfeld.

DOJ_NMG_0105086

PACE: This man's work ethic is incredible. Is he demanding? You bet.

RUMSFELD: No.

(LAUGHTER)

I've been on my best behavior.

PACE: If you don't have -- if you haven't done your homework when you walk into the secretary's office, you're not going to have a good day.

(LAUGHTER)

But he's most demanding on himself. And we have benefited enormously from the drive and energy that he has instilled in this organization from top to bottom, starting with his own daily work ethic and how he does his job.

Second, I have come, over almost 40 years now, to appreciate two kinds of courage. Courage number one is the kind we are most familiar with in the military, which is courage in combat. But in my five years, now, in Washington, I've also come to appreciate the courage it takes to speak your mind.

And in the meetings that our secretary attends, there are no shrinking violets. And everyone is -- correctly so -- a very special, unique, capable person. And I've watched many times when the conversations amongst groups have been going in a direction and the secretary has had the temerity to say, "I see it differently. Here is why," and to change the course of the conversation and quite literally the course that our country has taken.

That kind of courage is rare. And we who serve in the military and in this department have benefited enormously through the courage that our secretary has shown in those meetings.

PACE: Third, this is a man of very strong loyalty.

It's easy and correct and proper to be loyal up the chain. I am talking about a secretary of defense who is loyal down the chain to his family.

There are 2.4 million American service men and women, active, Guard and Reserve. At any given moment, some one of them is doing something stupid.

(LAUGHTER)

The rest are doing great things.

(LAUGHTER)

But somebody's out there doing something they shouldn't be doing, on occasion, that has had strategic negative impact. And it has been the result of things that the chain of command should have known and taken care of.

Not once -- not once -- when folks have laid at the feet of our secretary the blame for something that has gone wrong, not once has he done anything other than accept the responsibility. He has never tried to deflect that to any subordinate, even though it was a subordinate's responsibility.

Lastly, I admire his integrity. Not only does he speak his mind, but he has been particularly careful to ensure that, when he knew that what he was saying was different from what I or any of the chiefs or any of his subordinate commanders thought about the problem, he always made sure that he said, to whoever he was talking, "General So-and-So sees it differently; this is what he or she thinks," in a way that always had all the facets of the issue on the table.

It takes enormous integrity to have the kind of strength of conviction that the secretary has to drive to the conclusion that he believes is correct and, at the same time, ensure that the decision-maker has in front of him or her all of the information and all of the various ideas.

PACE: For those reasons and so many more, it is my distinct privilege to introduce once again to you our secretary of defense, Secretary Rumsfeld.

(APPLAUSE)

RUMSFELD: Thank you very much.

Pete, thank you.

It has really been a privilege to be able to work with this outstanding human being, the first Marine ever to serve as chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

I have valued your counsel. I have valued your candor. And I've enjoyed your sense of humor.

DOJ_NMG_0105087

And the American people are well-served by having this enormously talented individual willing to make a career in the military.

So thank you very much, Pete.

(APPLAUSE)

I'm told that we not only have the folks in this room, but we have a bunch of folks out in different locations with monitors, plus we have the Pentagon Channel that is carrying this town hall, I suppose, most way around the world.

Is that not right, Allison (ph)?

STAFF: That's correct.

RUMSFELD: Yes.

I'm also told that this is my 42nd town hall since I began this second tour as secretary of defense about six years ago. Thirteen of them have been here in the Pentagon and some 28 have been with troops stationed in countries all across the world.

RUMSFELD: These sessions, I suspect, are among the very few occasions when everybody -- civilian, military, contractor, folks from all branches of the services from all levels -- can gather with the senior leadership of the department with a microphone in your hand, ask a question and speak your mind.

It is a chance for everyone to be heard, to ask questions. And goodness knows there've been a great many questions asked over these 42 town halls.

I certainly remember the fellow who used to sit in the back over here somewhere and ask about whether we're going to move the Metro entrance.

(LAUGHTER)

Are you here today?

(LAUGHTER)

Stand up and be recognized.

(LAUGHTER)

Well, merry Christmas, wherever you are.

As we've seen, when you're willing to have an open exchange like this, every once in a while, a question gets asked or an answer is given that generates a bit of a fuss, depending on how it's reported.

That's happened. So be it.

I think each of you, and, indeed, all of the uniformed and civilian folks in the Department of Defense, deserve this opportunity.

So, I've done it an unprecedented 42 times. And I can tell you I have benefited from hearing your questions and hearing your views and I thank you for engaging as you have.

I suspect this will be among my last public remarks as secretary of defense, so I'd like to take a few minutes to talk a bit about our time together these past years.

Every day, in one way or another, I've seen the strength of men and women in uniform and the dedication of the many thousands who serve here, military and civilian, who do their jobs, knowing that theirs is the essential business of protecting a nation, protecting a people.

RUMSFELD: You do so knowing that you contribute directly to the safety of millions of Americans, people you'll never meet, whose names you'll never know.

And I leave office very proud to have served with you, inspired by your dedication, by your patriotism and by your sacrifice. And we recognize that sacrifice.

I also leave office proud to have served with you, and of the accomplishments that this institution's been able to achieve. I can't think of a more challenging period -- I'm sure there must have been -- but in the 59-year history of this department than these past years.

I have a few words to say about the Pentagon press corps.

(LAUGHTER)

No, it's not what you think.

DOJ_NMG_0105088

(LAUGHTER)

As a group, they may well be, year to year, the most professional press corps in the Washington, D.C., area. Now, considering the competition...

(LAUGHTER)

... I'll leave it to you to determine exactly what kind of a compliment that is.

(LAUGHTER)

But the Defense Department press corps is an important part of the fabric of this institution. Some braved the smoke and fire of September 11th. Some came back to work later that night and the next morning in a still-burning building. And a number have risked their lives to report from war zones. And to them, I say thank you for that.

As hard as it may be to believe, I even miss our press conferences. I think I will. The stakeouts, the briefings. I'm told it was something like 613 over six years, all across the globe.

Now, you know we've not always seen eye to eye, I haven't, with the press, but I still hold out hope that over time they'll get it close to right.

(LAUGHTER)

RUMSFELD: When I think about these past years, there are a number of moments that stand out.

I think of those proud Afghan girls that were sitting in the front row at President Karzai's inauguration in Kabul, when he became president -- the first president elected by the people in the 5,000-year history of that country.

They were standing there, and then they sang. And, of course, under the Taliban rule, it was against the law to sing.

And the reports of the Afghan children flying kites that day. And, of course, it had been against the law to fly kites.

I think of the Iraqis who, through it all, believe that their future is bright and who are working to forge something that they've never had before: a free country, a representative country.

And I do -- as Pete Pace suggested, I remember being stunned by the news of the abuse at Abu Ghraib. And then watching so many determined people spend so many months trying to figure out exactly how in the world something like that could have happened, and how to make it right. And then seeing how the department eventually demonstrated to the world how our democracy deals openly and decisively with such egregious wrongdoing.

And, yes, I remember the irresponsible comments by some who tried to sully the image of the courageous and dedicated men and women in uniform who keep the American people safe.

I remember the literally hundreds of military families I met in Alaska, and a gracious woman who at the end of the meeting came over and asked me to take a bracelet -- it's this green woven thing. And I told her I'd wear it until the 172nd Stryker Brigade came home. That was the group that we had to extend I think up to 120 days. After they had done a great job up north, they were heading to Kuwait and they were diverted into Baghdad, when General Casey determined that he needed additional assistance there.

And I of course remember the American heroes, the Medal of Honor recipients, Paul Ray Smith and, soon, Jason Dunham, and countless others whose names are now part of history.

RUMSFELD: If there's one thing I wish that could be more widely known, it's the miracles that the men and women of this department really perform every day.

Supporting the campaigns in Iraq and Afghanistan while putting pressure on terrorists all across the globe is an enormous challenge.

But at the same time, quite beyond that challenge -- and it is an enormous challenge -- the folks in this department have stepped forward to deliver aid to millions affected by the greatest national (sic) disasters in recent memory: the tsunami in the Indian Ocean, tragic earthquakes in Pakistan, here at home Hurricane Katrina.

They evacuated thousands of Americans from Lebanon -- literally the size of a city -- and doing it while a war was going on.

Training counterterrorism forces in the Philippines and in the Horn of Africa.

Put in place an initial missile defense system to protect the American people from rogue states.

Established the new Northern Command to better protect the homeland.

DOJ_NMG_0105089

Established a camp and stood guard in Guantanamo over some of the world's most dangerous terrorists, while suffering grossly uninformed and irresponsible charges in the media from almost every quarter.

GONZALES: Oversee the largest domestic base realignment and base closure in the history of this department.

Implement the most significant changes since World War II in our nation's global posture -- force posture across the globe, away from the static defensive orientation that was left over from the Cold War and toward arrangements that are much more appropriate to this 21st century.

Put in place a new civilian national security personnel system to provide the urgently needed flexibility in hiring and in assignments and with a linking of pay to performance.

Expand our very talented special operations forces to meet the new demands in this global struggle against violent extremists.

Transition from a division-based Army, the approach that dated back to World War I, to a considerably more agile, vastly more capable combat brigade force.

And so much more.

Each of you here in this room and listening through the Pentagon Channel have played a part in one or more of these accomplishments, these endeavors. And you can look at what you've done here this past period with great pride.

I wish I could say that everything we've done here has gone perfectly, but that's not how life works, regrettably. When thousands of people make dozens of difficult decisions on hundreds of pressing issues, for the most part matters that are new and unfamiliar, where there's no road map, no guidebook that says, "Here's exactly how you should do something," the hope has to be not perfection but that most decisions, with the perspective of time, will turn out to be the right ones and that the perspective of history will judge the overwhelming majority of those decisions favorably.

When we reflect back on these past years, each of you will likely have some different memories. Some memories will no doubt be of hard work and grueling times, working long days, months, even years on critical tasks that really are never noted in headline or in a news story -- at least never favorably noted.

(LAUGHTER)

But let there be no doubt, each of you and the future generations of Americans, as well as future generations of Iraqis and Afghans, will be able to look back on these past years as a time of enormous challenge, of historic consequence and of solid accomplishment.

Today's a time to look forward. The institution is important, well beyond those who temporarily serve here. We come and go. Some of us come and go more than once.

(LAUGHTER)

But what remains is this great institution's mission and its cause: the challenge of defending this nation and the ideals that this nation represents.

RUMSFELD: It's been three decades since I left the Pentagon at the end of my first tour.

Our country was then engaged in a long struggle, the Cold War, a conflict that seemed costly, and it was; that seemed unlimited in duration, and it was; and seemed unclear in its course and its outcome, which was the case.

In fact, many then believed and indeed acted as though it was the United States that was the cause of the world's troubles. We even see a little bit of that today.

And yet, despite the tumult of the times, I left this post in 1977 believing strongly that America was a force for good in the world, that the vast majority of the American people were wise and decent people, and that America would continue to be the principled leader in the free world.

That has been proven right. And I can say that as I leave at the end of my second and, the good Lord willing, my last...

(LAUGHTER)

... I do leave believing, as I did 30 years ago, that America is a truly great nation, that the American people are wise and decent, and that America's leadership in the world is not just useful, but that it is urgently needed.

And let there be no doubt: Despite the fact that we have been successful in preventing attacks since September 11th, years without an attack in this country, ours is a troubled and very dangerous world, and we must not forget it.

DOJ_NMG_0105090

I've been asked recently what I've taken away from public life over these, I guess, 50-plus years. I suppose what I feel most is gratitude.

Gratitude to the folks here in this department, the men and women in uniform, the civilians, the contractors.

Gratitude to the American people, who continue to serve as a guide for the dreams and the hopes and the aspirations of so many millions of people who live all across the globe, but who seek opportunity and a better life for themselves and see in what we've done in this country a model that they hope for and wish for.

RUMSFELD: Now, I'd be happy to respond to some questions. And as always, if they're too tough, Pete Pace is going to come up and join me.

(LAUGHTER)

Come on up here, Pete.

(LAUGHTER)

All right. There's some microphones around, I'm told. And there's a hand, though I still always worry about the first hand.

(LAUGHTER)

QUESTION: Mr. Secretary, I'm wondering what books you read while you were secretary that you found most useful and edifying.

RUMSFELD: Well, I've read a great many books. They're all history books; a number about the Revolutionary War and about George Washington and John Adams and others, Jefferson.

I started reading a number of books about the Civil War. And one particularly good one was a book on Ulysses S. Grant. But I stopped. I found the struggle going on -- gosh, those years, there were so many people killed and wounded, and they were all Americans, except for the foreign fighters who came over from Germany and Poland and elsewhere.

So I turned away from that and read a great deal about World War II. And that has been basically what I've been reading.

So that's where I ran across that quote by Winston Churchill that I mentioned in the Oval Office when we were announcing my departure.

RUMSFELD: I think Churchill said something to the effect that, "I have benefited greatly from the criticism I've received, and I've never suffered from a lack thereof."

(LAUGHTER)

QUESTION: Mr. Secretary, this is not a question. It's simply a chance to say thank you.

Three years ago, my daughter brought her performing troupe here on September 11th, 2003. You took the time to come over, not just to say howdy, but to actually talk to a group of young people.

These 30 young people -- of those 30, five of them are now members of the military. You have had a profound effect on the young members of that troupe and on our country.

And for that I thank you.

(APPLAUSE)

RUMSFELD: Thanks very much. And do thank that young lady and give her a merry Christmas.

QUESTION: Hello, Mr. Secretary. I certainly don't want to put you on the spot, but I'm going to...

RUMSFELD: Then why?

(LAUGHTER)

(CROSSTALK)

RUMSFELD: I mean, just suck it up and go home.

(LAUGHTER)

(APPLAUSE)

I'm just kidding. I want to hear what you have to say.

QUESTION: I'm still going to take advantage of this time...

(CROSSTALK)

RUMSFELD: ... accurate, though.

(LAUGHTER)

DOJ_NMG_0105091

QUESTION: ... and that is that I really am hoping that you plan on writing about your second tour in the Pentagon. Is there any chance that will happen?

RUMSFELD: Oh my gosh, my wife's after me to do that.

(LAUGHTER)

I suppose there is a chance. I've never written a book. I always thought I was too young to write a book.

(LAUGHTER)

I can't use that anymore.

I might. I might. I'll have to think about it.

But I've decided I'm not going to make any decisions about what I'll do next for a couple of months, and just let a little time go over it.

QUESTION: Mr. Secretary, how do you want history to remember you?

RUMSFELD: My goodness.

(LAUGHTER)

Better than the local press.

(LAUGHTER)

(APPLAUSE)

QUESTION: Hello, Mr. Secretary. Thank you for your leadership during this really difficult time in our country's history.

My question is, as the U.S. supports democracies throughout the world, one of the great things about democracy is that it brings freedom of intellectual exchange and technological developments.

QUESTION: While those two things bring about great things for humanity, it also brings about conflict within people. And you have a lot of dissent and people becoming enemies.

How do you think we can stop our world from becoming chaotic and just becoming a bunch of individuals and small groups who think of everyone else as being their enemy?

RUMSFELD: That's a tough, tough thing to answer. Except if one goes back through history and thinks of the deep divisions that can exist, the reality is that people, over time, observe and they see what works and what doesn't work.

And if we were able to be on Mars and look down on Earth, for example, we would find that those societies where conflict is continuous lose.

I have this wonderful picture of the Korean Peninsula on my desk. It shows the same people, North and South; the same resources North and South; but it shows the satellite shot at night and it shows all the electricity and the energy and the opportunity and the success south of the Demilitarized Zone.

They have a free political system and a free economic system. And now they are the 10th or 12th economy on the face of the Earth.

And in the North, there's no light except the pinprick of light in Pyongyang. The country in the North has a command economy that doesn't work and it has a repressive political system where people don't have free choice.

And if you look down from Mars on the world, you'd see that the countries that are succeeding and doing well, where the people have opportunity and are able to make free choice, indicates that free choice on the part of people in the economic realm and in the political realm works vastly better than the decisions by a few.

RUMSFELD: As Winston Churchill said, "Democracy is the worst form of government accept for every other that's ever been tried." And it is. It's untidy. And there's debate and partisanship and people make mistakes, but it works and it works very well, and it works better than any other form.

And I think that we have to have confidence in people that the -- that things that work will be seen by intelligent people and they'll gravitate to that. I mean, it's not an accident that people line up to come to this country every year to work, to visit and to live, because they see that here is a land of opportunity.

QUESTION: Mr. Secretary, with respect to your second tour of duty here in the Puzzle Palace, what are some of the things that you wish you could have accomplished -- like transformation items -- that you didn't get a chance to get to this time?

RUMSFELD: One day we were sitting in the Oval Office with the president and the president turned to Pete and to me and said, "Give me a report on how transformation's going." And before I could even think, out of General Pace's mouth he said something like, "With respect to attitude and culture, an 8 on a scale of 10. And with respect to progress, a 4."

Is that what you said?

(LAUGHTER)

PACE: Yes, sir.

RUMSFELD: Yes. And I think that was probably about right. That was about a year ago. I think I'd give it a 5 today.

But I think the important thing is that there have been -- there's been a change in people's approach, a recognition that in this 21st century the way we did things in the 20th century isn't good enough and we're simply going to have to be wiser and more agile and more skillful, and we're going to have to be able to do different things.

RUMSFELD: We're not engaged in major land battles or air battles or sea battles at the present time. We're being challenged asymmetrically by irregular warfare, by people who operate totally differently than the way people operated in World War II.

And that is a challenge. It's a task. And it's still not well understood in our country. It's unfamiliar.

But I think the major sign of progress is the fact that the senior people in this department today are overwhelmingly people who understand that and who are attracting people in their activities who also understand it, and that that energy and that impetus will give the prospects of continuing a transforming process -- is a better word than "transformation," I suppose; "transformation" leads you to believe you started untransformed and suddenly you're transformed, which isn't the case, because the world's not static, it's dynamic, it's changing. And we need to continue to transform as we go along.

And I think that Pete's 8 for that is important and indeed is the driver.

You know, when you think about words, I have felt just an enormous sense of urgency these years. Some of you may have noticed it.

(LAUGHTER)

I do.

Anyone who lives through September 11th, and then sees in their mind's eye the prospects of a September 11th times two or three or four, six months out, has to ask themselves, "What ought we be doing today to prevent that coming September 11th six months from now? What can we do to prevent it from happening? What can we do to mitigate its effects were it to happen?"

RUMSFELD: And so, I have felt a tremendous sense of urgency.

Conversely, if there's anything that the Cold War required, it was patience; just seemingly the opposite of urgency.

And this is a long struggle. This is not -- what we're engaged in today, this struggle against violent extremism, is going to take a long time. And that's going to require patience. And it's going to require perspective.

And I do hope people will read more history and understand and be able to help our fellow citizens have a perspective on what's taking place.

I read the other day somebody was comparing the length of time we've been in Iraq to the length of World War II, totally ignoring the period after World War II where the German government didn't even have a government, I don't think, until 1949.

And trying to compare what we're in today -- just take Iraq or Afghanistan. The military can't lose. They can't lose a battle, let alone a war over there.

But they also can't win, because it is not a conventional conflict. There isn't an army or a navy or an air force to go defeat.

It takes political and economic activity, and you need that three-legged stool for success to be achieved. And that takes patience. And we have to understand that as a society, as a people, and not be impatient.

I mean, I -- and I'll tell you that people over there in uniform get it. They really do.

I was in Walter Reed the other day, and a fellow had just come in with multiple wounds. And he was on his back. And he had a tube in his nose. And he looked up, and he said, "If only the American people will give us the time, we can do this. We're getting it done."

And it's a fact. It will take patience. And it will take understanding.

And yet it takes that sense of urgency on the part of the people here, as we know, because we have such an important responsibility.

QUESTION: The needs are urgent. Leaders make decisions. Yet our national security apparatus, consisting of several departments and agencies, are very slow and unresponsive. And I'm just wondering, in a world war of significant duration, if we can continue to have the significant staffing levels we have. I think the numbers of people that we have, which are greater than several years ago, are part of the problem.

(LAUGHTER)

(APPLAUSE)

(CROSSTALK)

(LAUGHTER)

QUESTION: No pink slip.

PACE: No. This is great.

I think our government does a really good job of teeing up decisions for the national leadership.

But once the decisions are made, we tend to go back into our stovepipes: DOD takes our piece, State takes theirs, Treasury takes theirs, et cetera. And we go on about our business and try to do the best we can inside of our own stovepipes.

And we cannot continue to function that way and be successful against an enemy that is going to be moving much more quickly than that.

PACE: So we do need and we are looking at the -- our government's looking at as a government, the administration, the Congress is looking at and outsiders are looking at ways that we can take the national security apparatus and bring it into the 21st century and empower those below the president with the capacity and responsibility to make decisions inside of a chain that's responsive to the president's lead.

So we do need to do that much better and much more efficiently.

RUMSFELD: Pete's exactly right. That is a question that comes up every time we meet with the combatant commanders and the chiefs and the senior leadership of the department is a level of concern that the institutions that exist are basically 20th century institutions.

And that's true within our government. It's true in terms of the international institutions. Most of them were formed in the aftermath of World War II for a very different world and a very different set of circumstances.

This first conflict of the 21st century is so different, just enormously different from the World War II conflict. And yet the institutions, the committees of Congress, the subcommittee system in Congress, the turf fights over jurisdiction that exist and the micromanagement of the bureaucracy in so many instances leads to a situation where the bureaucracy can't respond.

We're well behind in Afghanistan and Iraq in terms of the development of the police in those two countries. Why? Well, because there was no line item for the Department of Defense to do anything about police. It was over in the State Department. And they didn't have the people to do it.

And the Congress didn't authorize the money to do it. And they're at least, what, two years behind -- the police from the military? And that's harmful. That's costly. And yet it's because the federal government has not had a Goldwater-Nichols, in a sense.

RUMSFELD: They haven't decided that, in this different era, we have to have different arrangements among the various departments and agencies, and greater flexibility to move rapidly to try to avoid problems rather than to wrestle with them well after the case.

We're still having trouble getting the kinds of funds and the kinds of support to build partner capacity on the part of other countries. And if you're trying to fight a war against people who are in countries that you're not at war with, your solution is to build their capacity, the capacity of those other countries, so that they can better govern their own space, so that they can better deal with their terrorist problems, and that terrorist aren't allowed safe havens to plan attacks against the United States and other nations.

DOJ_NMG_0105094

And the cost-benefit of investing money to build the military and anti/counterterrorism capability of other countries is so much cheaper than our doing it and our having to deploy people to do those things. And their language facility is vastly better. And their respect for their own sovereignty is not infringed on.

I mean, there's just every reason in the world for us to have that as a very high priority. And yet, as I say, even today it's difficult to get the Congress responsive to that. And it just takes time.

Question?

QUESTION: Mr. Secretary, thank you for your service, sir.

As you depart and Dr. Gates prepares to take on the next phase of his public service, what advice or guidance have you given him or would you like to give him as he takes over your responsibilities?

RUMSFELD: Pardon me?

PACE: Listen to the chairman, sir.

(LAUGHTER)

RUMSFELD: I said I liked his humor. Pete just whispered in my ear, "The advice should be: 'He should listen to the chairman'."

(LAUGHTER)

(APPLAUSE)

I've had two meetings with him, and we've had a good discussion on a variety of things. The senior folks in the department have been briefing him.

And, you know, each person is different. Each person comes in with various strengths or weaknesses. And he'll do a good job. He'll come in and he'll find a way to begin the process of serving as secretary of defense in a way that fits his background and the needs of the current time. And I've got every confidence that he'll do a terrific job.

But the short answer is, any advice I give him I'll give him in private.

(LAUGHTER)

(APPLAUSE)

QUESTION: Mr. Secretary, first of all I'd like to thank you for your leadership over the last six years. It's meant a lot to us to have a steady hand on the helm here.

But I'd like to ask you your thoughts on strategic communications, or what I might call that. We're fighting an enemy that is using the media as a weapon, and doing it very well. We don't to that. In a free society, we shouldn't. But we're losing the war on that front in my opinion, sir.

Can you give us your thoughts on how we might better attack that problem?

RUMSFELD: Well, thank you. It is a central question. If they don't have an army to go out and destroy or a navy or an air force, and they do exactly what you say, they're very skillful. They have media committees. They plan their attacks for their maximum of drama and impact, designed to weaken the will of their enemies.

We have to do better.

I was asked one day what kind of a grade I'd give us, and I guess I said D+, as to how well we are combating and engaging in that struggle for ideas.

And we have to do a better job to make everything for them more difficult. Harder for them to raise money. Harder for them to recruit people. Harder for them to talk people into becoming suicide bombers. Harder for them to get across borders. Everything has to be harder for them.

And a good deal of pressure has been put on around the globe with a 90-nation coalition. The dilemma, obviously is -- I mean, take General Casey. General Casey's getting people killed over there, every day.

And we all know that if people are positive and leaning forward to be helpful, that things are easier, and that's true in Iraq.

And to the extent people are friendly and feel positive about the coalition forces and the Iraqi security forces, they're more likely to give tips as to where the IEDs are being placed or where the caches are and call up the local police or the Iraqi army or the coalition forces and say: Look, there's some bad guys in this house, and you ought to do it, take care of them.

To the extent people are hostile, they don't do that. And Casey knows exactly all the things that are being done.

DOJ_NMG_0105095

RUMSFELD: My goodness, the stock market's open, their free press is there, they've got television, they've got radio, they've got schools that are open, the businesses are open, hospitals are open, there are new textbooks.

I mean, if you just watched what's happening every time there's a bomb going off in Baghdad, you'd think the whole country's aflame. But you fly over it, and that's just simply not the case. There are people out in the fields working, and there's cars in the gas lines waiting to get fuel.

Casey decided he wanted people to know that -- the truth, mind you. So he said, "Let's get that in the local papers." I don't know, there's over 100 papers in the new free press there. They didn't even have a free press before. Even the American folks who were over there were restricted in what they could do.

The first thing that happened is they did that. They gave some people some money and said, "Get this -- these true facts about hospitals and schools and goodness knows what else -- get them in the local papers. And, by golly, there'll be a more positive feeling if people are aware of that, because the lies from the enemy go on day after day after day."

He did it. And, of course, there was just a big outcry here in the United States, in the Congress, in the press. "Oh my goodness, isn't that terrible? He's trying to reduce the number of people getting killed over there by asking people to print the truth and paying them to do that."

Well, it goes right to the point you make. We've got to be careful. There are multiple audiences. And every time we invest our time and effort trying to do a better job communicating -- strategic communications, what's going on truthfully -- not only do the Iraqi people hear it, but so, too, do our people hear it.

And there's always that line where you begin to propagandize. And you have to be careful.

So it is a dilemma. We've not solved it.

RUMSFELD: We have to do better. And we've not made much progress.

QUESTION: I have two questions for you.

The first: For purposes of this question, if terrorism is the greatest threat against America today, what, in your opinion, is the second and the third greatest threats?

And, also, what was your greatest day or most satisfying day while in office and, opposite, your worst?

(LAUGHTER)

RUMSFELD: You plan to go in the media?

(LAUGHTER)

She'd fit right in.

(LAUGHTER)

I would not agree with the premise of your question in this sense: I don't think terrorism is the greatest threat.

I think that terrorism is a weapon of choice for violent extremists. And violent extremism is, in my view, the threat.

It is that conviction that they want to destabilize moderate, mainstream Muslim regimes and establish a caliphate and have a handful of clerics determine what everyone in that country can do, and then spread that across the globe, from Indonesia to the Middle East, through North Africa and southern Europe. This is what they say on the Internet. You can read it. That's their goal.

That's the threat.

And it can be manifested in a variety of ways. At present time, we've used the phrase "global war against terror," which I find not perfect.

I think that it is really a long struggle, as opposed to a war, which implies armies, navies, air forces and marines contesting each other.

It is irregular. It's asymmetric. And it is not against terrorism, per se, it is against these violent extremists who use terrorism, but they also could use other things.

RUMSFELD: And a second thing that I worry about is the kinds of damage that can be done to a society through weapons of mass destruction, even through cyberattacks, can be -- but I mean, a biological attack is something that could be -- it could be used to terrorize.

Of course, the purpose of terrorism is to terrorize. It's not to kill people, it's to alter people's behavior. And you can do that using a variety of different techniques.

DOJ_NMG_0105096

You know, clearly the worst day was Abu Ghraib and seeing what went on there and feeling so deeply sorry that that happened.

And I guess my best day, I don't know, maybe a week from Monday.

(LAUGHTER)

(APPLAUSE)

QUESTION: Sir, first off, again, let me say thank you.

And then, second, looking back over your time as secretary of defense, and if you can't be convinced to write the book, if there was one anecdote you could share that would, sort of, capture your time in office, what would it be?

RUMSFELD: Wouldn't you think that's what would sell my book?

(LAUGHTER)

My goodness gracious.

You know, the days are so full, and you feel so fortunate to be engaged in the challenges -- the enormously difficult challenges that our country faces, that I've been just really fortunate to feel each day that there was an opportunity to contribute, to serve and to learn, particularly from the folks here in this department who've invested much of their lives in these important subjects.

RUMSFELD: But I do; I think I'll save it for my book.

(LAUGHTER)

QUESTION: Good morning, Mr. Secretary. I guess I'm a little nervous.

(LAUGHTER)

I wanted to know, if you could walk away with one memory or one accomplishment during your second tour, what would that be and why?

RUMSFELD: Well, I suppose it'll sound strange and somewhat pedestrian, and I'd be interested in Pete's view, because there's practically nothing that I've done that I haven't -- unless you're a Mozart or an Einstein, who goes off in a room and does something brilliant and then comes out and reveals it, all the rest of us, at least this guy, anything we accomplish we do it with other people.

We do it through a process of talking and discussing and thinking and probing and trying and failing and trying and succeeding.

And this institution is so big and so complex that there isn't any way in the world anyone can lead it by command. It's led by persuasion, and it's led through a process of discussion and interaction.

And I think probably the thing that has been the most important, at least for me, not being an Einstein or a Mozart, is the fact that when I came in, we made a conscience decision that we would engage the military not at the end of a process, asking for their advice, but we would engage them at the beginning of the process.

And General Myers and General Shelton and General Pace have been involved in -- there is not a single important decision of any magnitude at all that the chairman and the Joint Staff and the combatant commanders, where appropriate, and the services, where appropriate, have not been involved. And they have not been involved, as I say, at the end; they've been involved at the beginning, and at every step along the way.

We created something called the Senior Level Review Group. It's call the SLRG.

(LAUGHTER)

Not very nice.

(LAUGHTER)

But it has the secretary and the deputy, the chairman and the vice, the undersecretaries and the service secretaries and the service chiefs.

We then expanded it and created a second group that included the combatant commanders for those things that were appropriate in that case.

There's almost nothing of any major importance that hasn't been thoroughly discussed, digested, masticated by the SLRG, and in many cases with the combatant commanders as well. They've chewed it, they've discussed it.

DOJ_NMG_0105097

We've gotten them to the point where they talk about not just their own service, which was the case when I arrived -- you go down in the tank and the service secretary, they wouldn't want -- service chief -- they'd want to talk about their service. They did not want to talk about the department and the joint efforts that are required here.

Today they do. Today they participate fully in everybody else's business.

Why? Because there isn't anyone smart enough to figure these things out. We simply have to do it that way.

And I would say, if there's anything that's been accomplished here, it is a monumental effort to try to knit together the services, to knit together the organize, train and equip group with the combatant commanders and the senior civilians in a way that they developed ownership, investment, they have an investment in the decision, because they all know of certain knowledge that they were involved in it, they had a chance to affect it.

RUMSFELD: And, by golly, this department isn't worth anything if all the services are going off in every different direction, working their own little projects and harming the other services.

And I've been around when that's happened in this department, where it wasn't joint, where people were working their own agendas and, "We're going to the contractors and getting the contractors to do such and so," and "We're going up to Capitol Hill and trying to get Capitol Hill to sabotage what was decided in the department," because they didn't agree with them, they didn't like it, they didn't feel they had a stake in it, they didn't feel they had a voice in it.

Well, by golly, (inaudible) there's no one at a senior level of this department who can say they haven't been involved in the decisions in this department, because they have.

And, as a result, we have had a period of a substantial degree of unity, where people are all pulling their oars in the same direction instead of popping around and going off in 18 directions and damaging themselves, damaging the department, damaging the men and women in uniform and damaging the country.

And that's not happened. And that's an enormous accomplishment.

Pete, you want to...

PACE: The only thing I would add to that, Mr. Secretary, is that the secretary and his team have spent an enormous amount of time in picking leaders, civilian and military, to be on this team, and with a special focus on 10, 15, 20 years from now, if you want to have a certain type of individual be a general or an admiral, how many of those kind of individuals do you have in your population right now?

So, if you want to have more women be admirals and generals, where's the population from which they're going to come? More minorities?

A lot of focus on, not only picking the right leaders for today, but for putting your seed corn where you need it to be able to grow and have available to the nation a diverse leadership population in the future.

STAFF: We have time for one last question, sir.

RUMSFELD: I'll decide if it's last.

(LAUGHTER)

(APPLAUSE)

It depends on how good it is.

(LAUGHTER)

QUESTION: Sir, (inaudible) on your book a bit. I think, for great Americans like yourself, sir, it is a duty, and you will cheat future generations if you don't provide...

(LAUGHTER)

(APPLAUSE)

... the experience, the background and the knowledge you've gained over the past years.

And to continue in that line a little bit, 10 other great Americans just recently wrote a book. I would like to know if you've read any excerpts from that or if you'd like to provide any of your impressions from that book, sir.

RUMSFELD: This is the commission...

QUESTION: Yes, sir.

RUMSFELD: ... the Iraq Study Group?

DOJ_NMG_0105098

I know all those folks pretty well. And you have to be appreciative of the fact that they invested their time and thought and experiences in undertaking that project.

I have not read the entire book. I do think that it would be helpful if I, kind of, explained where the president is on all of this, because I know there's been a lot in the press and so forth.

The president asked General Pace to work with the chiefs and put forward some views that they feel would be appropriate.

He asked me and General Pace to work with the combatant commander, John Abizaid and General Casey and the folks in CENTCOM, to put forward some views.

He asked the Baker-Hamilton commission to offer their ideas.

He's been meeting with outside academics and people, so-called experts, from time to time, I think as recently as earlier this week.

RUMSFELD: He just had a session with Tony Blair.

We have offered up our department's views that have been well scrubbed.

And what he plans to do is to take into account all of those things, including the Baker report, and then probably make some decisions with respect to it during this period between now and the end of the year.

I look at the problem this way. And I'd rather say what I think about the situation.

There is an impatience in the United States and in the Congress, and there's nobody who sees people being killed and wounded and doesn't feel a sense of urgency about getting it right and doing the right thing and seeing that their loss of life is as minimal as it possibly can be.

The other thing we have to think about, though, is the dire consequences were we to fail there.

And it is not just an Iraq problem, it is a regional problem. There is a major divide between the Shia and the Sunni community and that part of the world, and the risks to instability are significant. And that what's taking place in Iraq is, in effect, a microcosm of what's taking place in that region.

This power struggle, partly religious, partly economic, certainly political, for power, but in a very real sense, not terribly military in its nature.

Violence is not military necessarily. I mean, it doesn't seem -- I mean, I don't describe someone strapping on a suicide vest and going in and blowing up 20, 30, 40 civilians in Baghdad as a military operation myself. But that's the kind of thing that's taking place.

I think that our country has to be able to, obviously, constantly recognize that the situation's not static; it's dynamic. The enemies have a brain, they watch what we do, they make adjustments. We have to keep changing our tactics, our techniques, our procedures.

We have invested at whale of a lot in the Afghan situation and in the Iraqi situation. And those countries have made considerable strides toward governing themselves. They are not there yet.

And to pull out precipitously and inject that instability into the situation there in that country, in that region, I believe would be a terrible mistake.

And we simply, as a society, have to recognize that it's not the -- the military people are doing everything that can be done from a military standpoint.

But they can't "win" this, quote, unquote, militarily.

RUMSFELD: It has to be won by the Iraqi people. It has to be run through a reconciliation process and through a political process. And it is those diplomatic and economic and political things that have to move forward in that country.

And our goal is to keep training and equipping and preparing the Iraqi security forces so that they can create an environment within which that can happen.

And it makes a big difference to us, to our safety here in this country.

And I think that while everyone feels it's not going fast enough, everyone feels it's not going well enough, everyone's looking for the kinds of things that might be done to improve that process -- political process, economic process, diplomatic process.

DOJ_NMG_0105099

And there are some people who say, "Well, you should do this or that or the other thing." And I can tell you, I can't think of a thing that anyone's thought of that General Pace and General Abizaid and those folks have not been working on and analyzing and studying and adjusting to over time.

And we have every chance in the world of succeeding in both those countries, but only if we have the patience and only if we have the staying power.

There have been -- in every conflict in our country's history, there have been those who said, "Toss in the towel; it isn't working."

The Revolutionary War, by golly, George Washington almost got fired. He didn't win a battle that I can recall for a whale of a long time.

You think of the beginning of World War II and all the battles that were lost.

You think of the Cold War, when Euro-communism was in fashion and millions of people -- hundreds of thousands of people were demonstrating not against the Soviet Union, against the United States, saying we were the ones in the wrong.

But, by golly, something important isn't easy. And this isn't easy. And, by golly, it's important and we better do it right.

That is the last question. God bless you all.

Rumsfeld Bids Farewell To Pentagon (WP)

By William Branigin,

The Washington Post, December 9, 2006

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, addressing Pentagon employees as he nears the end of his nearly six years in office, said today that the war in Iraq cannot be won "militarily," but he asserted that U.S. policy there can succeed "if we have the patience."

Speaking in a town hall-style meeting at the Pentagon, Rumsfeld warned that U.S. failure in Iraq would have "dire consequences" in that country and the broader Middle East, and he said pulling out U.S. troops "precipitously" would be "a terrible mistake."

In a farewell speech that became emotional at times, Rumsfeld, 74, listed a series of Defense Department accomplishments during his tenure, ranging from fighting "terrorists all across the globe" to aiding millions of victims of natural disasters. He said the Pentagon has established a new Northern Command and "an initial missile defense system," overseen the largest domestic base closure and realignment plan in U.S. history, implemented a transformation of U.S. forces away from a "static defensive" posture left over from the Cold War and moved the longstanding "division-based Army" toward a "more agile, vastly more capable combat brigade force."

Answering employees' questions after the speech, Rumsfeld said his worst day in office was when he learned in early 2004 of the prisoner abuse perpetrated by U.S. guards at the Abu Ghraib prison outside Baghdad. He said early last year that he had twice offered President Bush his resignation over the scandal but that Bush wanted him to stay on.

"You know, clearly the worst day was Abu Ghraib and seeing what went on there and feeling so deeply sorry that that happened," Rumsfeld said today.

As for his best day in office, he said, "I don't know, maybe a week from Monday." He referred to the day -- Dec. 18 -- when his successor, Robert M. Gates, is scheduled to take office. Bush announced Rumsfeld's resignation on Nov. 8, a day after midterm elections gave control of Congress to Democrats. Gates, a former CIA director, was confirmed by the Senate yesterday as the new defense secretary.

Asked in the question-and-answer session about a bipartisan panel's report outlining a "new approach" in Iraq, Rumsfeld said Bush has also asked him and Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, to work with military commanders and other top officers to "put forward some views that they feel would be appropriate." Among those involved have been Gen. John P. Abizaid, the commander of U.S. forces in the Middle East; Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the top U.S. commander in Iraq; other officers at the Central Command and the chiefs of the military services, Rumsfeld said.

Bush plans to take into account the Pentagon's report, as well as studies by the bipartisan Iraq Study Group and other panels, "and then probably make some decisions with respect to it during this period between now and the end of the year," Rumsfeld said.

In his own view, he said, "There is an impatience in the United States and in the Congress, and there's nobody who sees people being killed and wounded and doesn't feel a sense of urgency about getting it right" and minimizing the loss of life.

"We have to keep changing our tactics, our techniques, our procedures," he said.

He added: "We have invested a whale of a lot in the Afghan situation and in the Iraqi situation, and those countries have made considerable strides towards governing themselves. They are not there yet, and to pull out precipitously and inject that instability into the situation there, in that country and in that region, I believe would be a terrible mistake."

Americans must recognize that "the military people are doing everything that can be done from a military standpoint. But they can't win this . . . 'militarily.' It has to be won by the Iraqi people. It has to be won through a reconciliation process and through a political process. . . ."

Although the process is "not going fast enough" or "well enough," Rumsfeld said, "we have every chance in the world of succeeding in both those countries, but only if we have the patience, and only if we have the staying power."

In Iraq and Afghanistan, he said, "The military can't lose. They can't lose a battle, let alone a war over there. But they also can't win, because it is not a conventional conflict. There isn't an army or a navy or an air force to go defeat. It takes political and economic activity. . . . And that takes patience. And we have to understand that as a society, as a people, and not be impatient."

Rumsfeld praised the Pentagon press corps as "an important part of the fabric of this institution," but he also took a few shots at the news media.

Among the Defense Department's accomplishments, he said, is that it "established a camp and stood guard in Guantanamo over some of the world's most dangerous terrorists, while suffering grossly uninformed and irresponsible charges in the media from almost every quarter."

He said later, "I remember being stunned by the news of the abuse at Abu Ghraib. And then watching so many determined people spend so many months trying to figure out exactly how in the world something like that could have happened, and how to make it right. And then seeing how the department eventually demonstrated to the world how our democracy deals openly and decisively with such egregious wrongdoing. And, yes, I remember the irresponsible comments by some who tried to sully the image of the courageous and dedicated men and women in uniform who keep the American people safe."

Rumsfeld said in response to a service member's question that he may write a book about his experiences at the Pentagon. "My wife's after me to do that," he said. "I suppose there is a chance. I've never written a book. I always thought I was too young to write a book. I can't use that anymore. . . . I'll have to think about it. But I've decided I'm not going to make any decisions about what I'll do next for a couple of months."

Asked how he wanted history to remember him, he said, "Better than the local press."

The meeting with Pentagon employees reflected none of the criticism that has been directed at Rumsfeld during his term, notably over his handling of the war in Iraq. Critics have charged that he ignored advice to send in a force large enough to pacify the country and assure security once the regime of Saddam Hussein was toppled, and that he failed to plan adequately for the occupation period. The result was rampant looting of government buildings and arms depots, followed soon afterward by the start of an insurgency.

Earlier this year, several retired generals called for Rumsfeld's resignation, charging that he was incompetent and intolerant of opposing views. One leading critic, retired Maj. Gen. John Batiste, who formerly commanded the Army's 1st Infantry Division in Iraq, described Rumsfeld as "arrogant" and "abusive" and said he disregarded 10 years of war planning on Iraq by the U.S. Central Command before the March 2003 invasion.

Rumsfeld promptly dismissed his critics as "two or three or four retired people" out of "thousands and thousands of admirals and generals." He said that "if every time two or three people disagreed we changed the secretary of defense of the United States, it would be like a merry-go-round."

Pace strongly defended Rumsfeld at today's farewell gathering. "There are 2.4 million American service men and women, active, Guard and Reserve," the Marine general said. "At any given moment, some one of them is doing something stupid." Yet, whenever something has gone wrong and Rumsfeld has been blamed, "not once has he done anything other than accept the responsibility," Pace said. "He has never tried to deflect that to any subordinate, even though it was a subordinate's responsibility."

Said Rumsfeld, "I wish I could say that everything we've done here has gone perfectly, but that's not how life works, regrettably. When thousands of people make dozens of difficult decisions on hundreds of pressing issues, for the most part matters that are new and unfamiliar, where there's no road map, no guidebook . . . the hope has to be not perfection but that most decisions, with the perspective of time, will turn out to be the right ones. . . ."

Rumsfeld Bids Farewell To Pentagon (NYT)

By David Stout

The New York Times, December 9, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 8 -- Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld bade farewell to Pentagon employees today in his familiar style, fencing with his questioners and voicing deep faith in the American people.

"Every day, in one way or another, I've seen the strength of men and women in uniform, and the dedication of the many thousands who serve here, military and civilian, who do their jobs knowing that theirs is the essential business of protecting a nation and protecting a people," Mr. Rumsfeld said at what was probably his last meeting with Defense Department employees.

"You do so knowing that you contribute directly to the safety of millions of Americans — people you'll never meet, whose names you'll never know," Mr. Rumsfeld said. "I leave office very proud to have served with you, inspired by your dedication, by your patriotism, and by your sacrifice."

Mr. Rumsfeld, who will be succeeded by Robert M. Gates on Dec. 18, has a unique place in Pentagon history. He is the only person to have been defense secretary twice, having held the post for a little over a year under President Gerald R. Ford. He was the youngest defense secretary then, and now, at 74, he is the oldest.

"It's been three decades since I left the Pentagon at the end of my first tour," Mr. Rumsfeld said. "Our country was then engaged in a long struggle — the Cold War, a conflict that seemed costly, and it was. It seemed unlimited in duration, and it was, and seemed unclear in its course and its outcome, which was the case. In fact, many then believed and indeed acted as though it was the United States that was the cause of the world's troubles. We even see a little bit of that today.

"And yet despite the tumult of the times, I left this post in 1977 believing strongly that America was a force for good in the world, that the vast majority of the American people were wise and decent people, and that America would continue to be the principal leader in the free world. That has been proven right."

As he prepares to leave office again, Mr. Rumsfeld said he believes as he did three decades ago "that America is a truly great nation, that the American people are wise and decent, that America's leadership in the world is not just useful, but that it is urgently needed.

"And let there be no doubt, despite the fact that we have been successful in preventing attacks since Sept. 11, years without an attack in this country, ours is a troubled and very dangerous world, and we must not forget it."

Famous for his marathon work days and his demanding style, Mr. Rumsfeld came to the Pentagon in 2001 determined to streamline the military bureaucracy, and he said today he thought he and his aides had succeeded, up to a point.

"There's been a change in people's approach, a recognition that in this 21st century, the way we did things in the 20th century isn't good enough, and we're simply going to have to be wiser and more agile and more skillful, and we're going to have to be able to do different things," Mr. Rumsfeld said.

The questions from department employees at today's "town hall" session were gentle ones, in contrast to the news conferences at which Mr. Rumsfeld never bothered to hide his disdain for interrogators he considered ill-informed, cynical, or naïve. But even in today's friendly setting, Mr. Rumsfeld was in form. When asked what advice he had for Mr. Gates, he replied, "Any advice I give him, I'll give him in private."

Mr. Rumsfeld said he would miss his jousting with reporters. "I think I will," he said. "The stakeouts, the briefings. I'm told it was something like 613 over six years, all across the globe. Now, you know, we've not always seen eye to eye, I haven't, with the press, but I still hold out hope that over time, they'll get it close to right."

That line was one of several that drew laughter. But he closed on a serious note, offering his belief that the struggles in Iraq and Afghanistan will, in time, be worth it, and that the United States is on the right side of history in both theaters.

"God bless you all," he said, exiting to applause.

The Rumsfeld Show's Finale A Classic, By Golly (LAT)

By Julian E. Barnes

The Los Angeles Times, December 9, 2006

WASHINGTON — For much of the last six years, a question-and-answer session with Donald H. Rumsfeld was the best show in town. The combative Defense secretary's bristling self-assurance made the Pentagon Briefing Room one of the hottest seats in Washington.

The Bush administration's erstwhile rock star delivered his last major performance Friday, as feisty and quotable as when he began. At a Pentagon town hall, Rumsfeld delivered with style, gamely teasing questioners, popping off trademark "by gollys," and quoting Churchill, invoking George Washington and expounding on "eurocommunism" of the 1970s.

Although the Senate has confirmed Robert M. Gates — a decidedly more measured and reserved public speaker — to serve as the next secretary of Defense, he will not be sworn in for nine more days. For a little while yet, Rumsfeld remains in the building and in charge.

But he is not due to appear before Congress again, and his public affairs staff says there will be no goodbye news conferences. Rumsfeld said Friday's town hall, his 42nd such appearance answering questions from military personnel during his second Pentagon stint, would be one of his last public appearances.

In some respects his last town hall was a greatest-hits collection. Rumsfeld managed to riff on many of his favorite topics: the electricity supply in North Korea, the fashionableness of "eurocommunism," the near-sacking of George Washington, the media strategy of insurgents and the failure of the American press to chronicle the good news from Iraq.

As unrelated as those topics may seem, Rumsfeld routinely evokes them to defend the war in Iraq or his own leadership.

North Korea's lack of electric light, his favorite set piece, is his example of what happens to those who reject democracy. People who thought eurocommunism offered a good economic system during the Cold War, Rumsfeld suggests, were as misguided as opponents of Iraq policy.

Critics may question America's war leaders, but Rumsfeld wants people to remember they also questioned the father of the country at the beginning of the revolution. And when the news media report on insurgent attacks against civilians, it is — in the Pentagon's view — helping the enemy try to weaken the will of the American people.

The public's doubts about Iraq and the need for America to maintain its support for the war have been a regular theme of Rumsfeld's public appearances for much of this year. And Friday, he used the stage to plead for more time in Iraq. He said there was "an impatience in the United States and Congress." But, he said, the larger fight against violent extremism, in Iraq and elsewhere, was going to take patience and perspective.

"We have invested a whale of a lot in the Afghan situation and the Iraqi situation," he said. "And to pull out precipitously and inject that instability into the situation there, in that country and that region, I believe would be a terrible mistake."

By his own count, Rumsfeld has held 613 news conferences. And although on Friday he criticized coverage of Iraq, as usual, he also singled out the Pentagon reporters for praise.

"As hard as it may be to believe," Rumsfeld said Friday, "I even miss our press conferences."

Actually, it's not hard to believe at all. From the start, Rumsfeld seemed to relish his time in front of reporters. The news conferences during the beginning of the Afghanistan war, where Rumsfeld jumped all over any perceived skepticism in a question, made him a household name.

DOJ_NMG_0105103

But as the Iraq conflict evolved from a decisive march to Baghdad into a grinding civil war, more of the public began to view Rumsfeld's act as stale. To them, the unchecked confidence seemed ill-suited for an honest discussion of what was happening in Iraq — less a sign of strength than a signal that he did not want to listen to critics.

By the end, his piques at the press were often viewed as attacks on all war skeptics. On Oct. 26, his last formal Pentagon news briefing, Rumsfeld told a reporter asking about benchmarks for the Iraq government "to just back off, take a look at it, relax, understand that it's complicated, it's difficult."

A comment he made at one of the military town halls may have been the beginning of his decline in the public's eye. On Dec. 8, 2004, while addressing a group of soldiers in Kuwait preparing to deploy into Iraq, he was asked about the Pentagon's failure to provide armored vehicles. Rumsfeld said armor was being manufactured as quickly as possible. Then he added, "As you know, you go to war with the Army you have. They're not the Army you might want or wish to have at a later time."

It was a typical Rumsfeld construction: sharp, insightful and perhaps a touch callous.

For his part, Rumsfeld was not fessing up to many mistakes on Friday. He did say the abuses by American soldiers at Abu Ghraib had led to his worst day on the job. He avoided directly commenting on the Iraq Study Group and its dire assessment of the situation in Iraq, using one of his favorite tactics of claiming he had not read "the entire book."

As is his usual practice, Rumsfeld dodged an explicit question about how history would judge him. But he did, in his opening remarks, express hope that "the perspective of history" would view his choices of the last six years favorably.

"I wish I could say that everything we've done here has gone perfectly, but that is not how life works, regrettably," he said. "The hope has to be not perfection, but that most decisions, with the perspective of time, will turn out to be the right ones."

Rumsfeld Bids Farewell To Pentagon (AP)

By Robert Burns,

AP, December 9, 2006

In an emotional farewell at the Pentagon, Donald H. Rumsfeld said Friday the worst day of his nearly six years as secretary of defense occurred when he learned of the Abu Ghraib prisoner abuse.

Speaking to a gathering of employees 10 days before he is to leave office, Rumsfeld defended his record on Iraq and Afghanistan and warned of "dire consequences were we to fail" in the war.

He also said he might write a book about his tenure at the Pentagon, and he predicted that his successor, Robert Gates, would do a good job. He declined to say what advice he had offered Gates, who was confirmed by the Senate this week.

Rumsfeld choked up briefly while recalling a woman in Alaska giving him a bracelet last August as a reminder of the sacrifices by soldiers of the Army's 172nd Stryker Brigade, whose year-long tour in Iraq was extended by four months to help try to quell sectarian violence in Baghdad. Showing it on his wrist, Rumsfeld recalled that he told the woman he would wear the green bracelet until the 172nd came home.

In a question-and-answer session billed as a "town hall meeting," he was asked what were his best day and his worst day.

"Clearly, the worst day was Abu Ghraib, seeing what went on there and feeling so deeply sorry that that happened," he said without hesitation. The scandal in the spring of 2004 involving an Iraq prison triggered worldwide condemnation and prompted Rumsfeld to twice offer his resignation to President Bush. Bush rejected those offers.

"I guess my best day, I don't know, may be a week from Monday," he said with a grin, referring to the day Gates takes over.

Asked how he wants history to remember him, he said simply, "Better than the local press."

He spoke at length about his hopes that the United States not let Iraq and Afghanistan collapse.

"We have every chance in the world of succeeding in both those countries, but only if we have the patience and only if we have the staying power," he said. Asked about the bipartisan Iraq Study Group's recommendations for a change in approach to the Iraq war, Rumsfeld said none of the suggestions were new.

He said the Pentagon had sent its advice to the White House on possible new approaches in Iraq.

With troops from each military service and a few civilian Pentagon employees seated behind him on stage in the Pentagon's main auditorium, Rumsfeld spoke to an audience of several hundred people. With a big smile, he strode into the room to a cascade of applause and a few approving yelps.

DOJ_NMG_0105104

"I suspect this will be among my last public remarks as secretary of defense," he said. His last full day will be Dec. 17.

It was one of the few public appearances he has made since Bush announced on Nov. 8 at the White House that he was replacing Rumsfeld with Gates to get a "fresh perspective" on the Iraq war. Rumsfeld applauded the work and dedication of Pentagon employees and said he was proud to have been associated with them.

"Each of you and future generations of Americans, as well as future generations of Iraqis and Afghans, will be able to look on these past years as a time of enormous challenge and historic consequence," he said.

He was introduced by Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, who lauded Rumsfeld as a man of courage, integrity and vision.

"This man's work ethic is incredible," Pace said. "Is he demanding? You bet." Rumsfeld then interrupted, saying with a laugh, "No! I've been on my best behavior."

Rumsfeld, 74, is one of the longest-serving defense secretaries in U.S. history and is the only person to have held the position twice. His first stint was from November 1975 to January 1977, when he held the distinction of being the youngest defense secretary in history.

Rep. Ike Skelton, D-Mo., who will become chairman of the House Armed Services Committee when Congress returns in January, said Friday that the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan will define Rumsfeld's legacy.

"The early efforts in Afghanistan were very successful, and he should be given credit for that," Skelton said in an interview taped for C-SPAN's "Newsmakers" program. "He should also be remembered as one who attempted to transform or modernize the military. Of course, it's pretty hard to do that in the middle of two wars. But he did begin that effort."

Rumsfeld Warns Against Precipitous US Withdrawal From Iraq (AFP)

By Jim Mannion

AFP, December 9, 2006

US Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld warned that a precipitous US withdrawal from Iraq would be a "terrible mistake" which would threaten the stability not only of Iraq but the region.

Rumsfeld, in a farewell "town hall" meeting with Pentagon employees, urged Americans to show patience with the war in Iraq, saying there would be "dire consequences were we to fail here."

Iraq and Afghanistan have made considerable strides, he said, but "those countries are not there yet."

"To pull out precipitously and inject that instability into the situation there in that country, and in that region, I think would be a terrible mistake," he said.

His comments come in the midst of an intense debate over a new course in Iraq and recommendations by a bipartisan panel that the onus of security and political reconciliation be shifted to Iraqis.

The panel headed by former secretary of state James Baker and former representative Lee Hamilton said most US combat forces could be withdrawn from Iraq by early 2008 while shifting the US military's mission to one of training and advising Iraqis.

Rumsfeld was asked about the report but did not specifically address its recommendations.

Instead he emphasized the stakes involved for a region with a Sunni-Shia divide that mirrors the sides to the sectarian conflict in Iraq.

"And the risks to its stability are significant," he said.

Iraq, he said, "is in fact a microcosm of what is taking place in that region: power struggle -- partly religious, partly economic, certainly political, ... but in a very real sense not terribly military in its nature."

He said the US military was doing all it could, but the conflict in Iraq could only be "won" by Iraqis through political reconciliation.

Rumsfeld, who resigned last month after a Republic defeat in mid-term elections, also expressed concern about "impatience in the United States and in the Congress."

"We have every chance of the world of succeeding in both of those countries, but only if we have the patience, only if we have the staying power," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0105105

Rumsfeld's appearance was his last at an assembly of Pentagon employees before turning over the Defense Department to Robert Gates, the former CIA chief who replaces him December 18.

An overflow crowd of several hundred people packed a Pentagon auditorium and gave him a standing ovation as he entered the room with General Peter Pace, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

Peppered with friendly questions about his six year tenure, Rumsfeld defended his accomplishments, said he was thinking of writing a book, and hoped history would remember him "better than the local press."

"You know, clearly the worst day was Abu Ghraib and seeing what went on there and feeling so deeply sorry that that happened," he said.

Photographs of US soldiers abusing and sexually humiliating Iraqi prisoners touched off a devastating scandal that blackened the US image in the world and nearly cost Rumsfeld his job in 2004. He is still the target of lawsuits in the case accusing him of war crimes.

Asked his best day in office, Rumsfeld said, "I don't know, maybe a week from Monday" when he leaves office.

A Still-Serving Rumsfeld Is Set For Mustering Out (NYT)

By David S. Cloud

The New York Times, December 9, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 8 — As Donald H. Rumsfeld might say, you change strategy in Iraq with the defense secretary you have, not the one you might like.

It was a month ago that Mr. Rumsfeld announced his resignation, cast out by the White House to signal a course correction in Iraq. His successor, Robert M. Gates, has already been overwhelmingly confirmed by the Senate.

Yet when President Bush comes to the Pentagon on Wednesday, Mr. Rumsfeld will preside in the secure conference room known as “the Tank” when he and the Joint Chiefs brief Mr. Bush on the department’s recommendations for a new way forward.

Mr. Gates is not scheduled to be sworn in until Dec. 18, though he has a temporary office on the Pentagon’s third floor, and administration officials said that he will be involved in meetings and consult on the strategy shift.

How much influence Mr. Rumsfeld is exerting in the interim is somewhat unclear. Two of his top aides, Peter W. Rodman and Stephen A. Cambone, have already announced their resignations. He has told other senior officials at the department that they should hold off any major decisions to give Mr. Gates a chance to review them after he takes office.

Aides say that Mr. Rumsfeld has remained on the job not from any desire to cling to power, but because President Bush specifically asked him to stay until his successor was in place. He has spoken with Mr. Gates twice, he said Friday.

It is the second time in his career that Mr. Rumsfeld, who also served as defense secretary during the Ford administration, has stepped down from the job, and he leaves 11 days shy of breaking Robert S. McNamara’s record as the longest serving defense secretary.

Taking questions Friday at an hourlong farewell to Pentagon employees, Mr. Rumsfeld became emotional and wiped his nose as he reviewed his tenure and accomplishments.

“I wish I could say that everything we have done here had gone perfectly, but that’s not how life works, regrettably,” he said.

In private, too, Mr. Rumsfeld has also seemed at times wistful about giving up the vast resources of his office. Shortly after announcing his resignation, the 73-year-old Mr. Rumsfeld, who dictated his memos into a recorder to be transcribed and disdained e-mail correspondence, told his aides: “I guess I’m going to have to get a computer.”

He was not surprised by President Bush’s decision to replace him the day after the midterm elections, several current and former aides said. He and Mr. Bush had talked several times about whether Mr. Rumsfeld could still operate effectively, especially if the Democrats took control of both the House and Senate, they said.

But the way the White House handled the departure remains a source of bitterness to some in Mr. Rumsfeld’s inner circle. The choice of Mr. Gates after Mr. Bush had said in the week before Election Day that he wanted Mr. Rumsfeld to stay until the end of his term made it seem as if the change had been made abruptly, one Rumsfeld adviser said.

And it led some Republicans, bitter over their losses in the election, to wonder why Mr. Bush had not replaced him before the election when it might have helped their fortunes, the Rumsfeld adviser said.

DOJ_NMG_0105106

"The way it was handled turned out to be unsatisfactory to all, except the Democrats," the adviser said.

As the disclosure this month of a memo Mr. Rumsfeld wrote outlining options for switching course in Iraq makes clear, the secretary has his own ideas about what should be done in Iraq.

Lawrence Di Rita, who served as a top Pentagon aide until resigning last year, said that the memo, which listed 21 options — many of them calling for reducing the American presence in Iraq — revealed Mr. Rumsfeld's willingness to offer up completely different ways of thinking. "Nothing was sacred to him," Mr. Di Rita said.

But when he met on Friday with employees at the Pentagon, Mr. Rumsfeld counseled patience in Iraq, warning that "to pull out precipitously and inject that instability into the situation there" would be "a terrible mistake."

The session also featured moments of vintage Rumsfeld, when he was not the battered figure who has become a symbol of a strategy gone wrong in Iraq, but the jaunty defense secretary whose verbal sparring once made his news conferences Washington's most entertaining show.

When a young military aide interrupted the proceedings to say there was time for one more question, Mr. Rumsfeld was having none of it. "I'll decide if it's the last question," he said.

In his final days, Mr. Rumsfeld still appears engaged, department officials say. He is still issuing "snowflakes," the memos that waft down to the bureaucracy from Mr. Rumsfeld himself and that are used to ask questions, stimulate debate and shape policy.

Nor has Mr. Rumsfeld given up on some of his favorite projects. Last week, his aides were still hoping to win White House approval to create a new regional command covering Africa, which is now under the purview of the United States European Command, based in Stuttgart, Germany.

Mr. Rumsfeld is still convening morning "roundtables," when a rotating cast of officials is called to his conference room to hash out issues. In the last week, he told a senior military officer that he was not satisfied with a briefing and told the officer to come back in January for another try.

Left unstated was that Mr. Rumsfeld would not be around to hear it.

His sometimes brusque treatment of high-ranking military officers accounts for the private glee with which some Pentagon officers view his departure.

Even the Iraq Study Group, the independent panel that issued recommendations for changing strategy in Iraq this week, felt compelled to call on Mr. Gates to create "an environment in which the senior military feel free to offer independent advice."

In a more jocular way, Gen. Peter Pace, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, seemed to say much the same thing while standing next to Mr. Rumsfeld at the Pentagon forum on Friday.

When a questioner asked what advice Mr. Rumsfeld would have for his successor, General Pace immediately jumped in with his own answer. "Listen to the chairman," he said.

House Winds Down Session By Approving Tax-Cut And Trade Bills (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, December 9, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Major tax and trade bills neared final passage as Republicans began turning out the lights on the 109th Congress and 12 years of their party's dominance in the Capitol.

Working past midnight, departing lawmakers sent President Bush a third, stopgap spending bill required to keep the government operating through Feb. 15. And spurred by the Hewlett-Packard Co. scandal, the Senate called up and quickly approved a House-passed bill that would make it a federal crime to obtain someone's telephone records without his or her approval.

"Stealing someone's private phone records is a criminal act that can now be prosecuted," said Sen. Charles Schumer (D., N.Y.) one of the leading proponents. "Phone information and call logs should be protected with the same safeguards as financial data or medical records." (See related story1.)

The $45.1 billion tax cut measure, which includes provisions benefiting oil, coal and health-care interests, passed the House 367-45 late Friday after Democrats narrowly failed 207-205 in a last attempt to disrupt passage with an amendment to the oil provisions.

The intricate trade package, which most impacts Vietnam, Haiti and developing nations in Africa and South America, cleared the House hours later 212-184 with prominent Democrats joining in support.

The Senate next took up both measures as a single package, and eager to go home, senators agreed to expedite debate in hopes of sending the tax and trade provisions Mr. Bush for his signature.

"God should be so good to the people of Haiti that their exports could be a threat to the United States of America. That's not going to happen," said Rep. Charles Rangel (D., N.Y.), the incoming chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee. And even among Southern Republicans allied with the textile industry, resistance appeared to be crumbling in the Senate.

The tax package itself renews scores of popular, non-controversial expired tax breaks, most notably a deduction for college tuition, a deduction for state and local sales taxes in states without income taxes, and the corporate tax credit for research. But fiscal conservatives complained bitterly of costly add-ons and the backroom horse-trading in which some departing leaders won concessions for their home-state interests. And the stopgap spending bill -- covering more than $463 billion in annual appropriation -- dramatizes a major collapse in the budget process for the current fiscal year.

"It is a blatant admission of abject failure by the most useless Congress in modern times," said Rep. David Obey (D., Wis.), the incoming chairman of the House Appropriations Committee. And the current chairman, Rep. Jerry Lewis (R., Cal.) was equally scathing in his personal criticism of Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R., Tenn.) for contributing to the failure.

Sen. Judd Gregg (R., N.H.), the departing chairman of the Senate Budget Committee, took the floor and warned his party it was ignoring the lesson of Republican losses in the midterm elections last month.

"The American people took the reins of government away from the Republican Congress," Mr. Gregg said, in large part because "they were tired of our hypocrisy as a party on the issue of fiscal responsibility."

"It would appear that their concerns are justified…You just have to ask yourself how we as a party got to this point, where we have a leadership that is going to ram down the throats of our party the biggest budget buster in the history of Congress under Republican leadership…The American people figured it out and I'm sorry we haven't figured it out yet."

Together with the tax-cut extensions, the $45.1 billion package opens millions of acres in the Gulf of Mexico to offshore oil and gas exploration, and includes a provision to prevent a 5% cut in payment rates to physicians under Medicare, the federal health-care program for the elderly and disabled.

Over Mr. Gregg's objections, coal-state senators won a $4.9 billion provision to lift federal spending for retired miners' health benefits and abandoned mine reclamation. At the same time, New York was a big loser when tax credits to help financing for a proposed rail connection between lower Manhattan and John F. Kennedy International Airport were killed, together with a $477 million tax break for the timber industry, important to companies like Weyerhaeuser Co.

New tax language was added to promote the use of health savings accounts, a priority for the departing Republican leadership seeking to give individuals more control over their health care.

And both Mr. Frist, who is retiring at the end of this Congress, and Speaker Dennis Hastert (R., Ill.), who will be giving up his speakership, used their position to win concessions for home-state interests in federal health programs.

Tennessee, for example, will benefit from an estimated $30 million payment under Medicaid to help support hospitals in the state that handle a large number of low-income patients. And Mr. Hastert added language expanding the enrollment period for private health plans, providing coverage within Medicare.

Chicago-based Aon Corp., which provides private fee-for-service coverage through its subsidiary Sterling Life Insurance Co., pushed for the change that would allow qualified plans to enroll beneficiaries all year if they aren't participating in the prescription drug benefit.

Mr. Hastert's office said the language mirrors past enrollment provisions that expired last summer and Aon declined to comment. But critics argued that the landscape has changed with the advent of the prescription drug benefit, and to create different enrollment rules for plans, based on whether they participate or not, introduces inequities.

Before adopting the stopgap spending bill, Republicans made two modifications in a concession to critics. Lawmakers agreed to dock their own pay by delaying a planned cost-of-living increase -- due to take effect with the new year -- until Feb. 16, after the stopgap bill expires. And they gave the Veterans Administration expanded authority to move almost $684 million from other accounts in its budget to avoid a threatened shortfall in medical-care funds.

Opposition to the trade provisions has focused chiefly on those benefiting Haiti by allowing companies on the island to use fabric from third countries, such as China, in duty-free apparel destined for the American market.

A key force is Sen. Elizabeth Dole, the North Carolina Republican. Antitrade sentiments ran especially strong in her state in the 2006 congressional election, contributing to the defeat of one House Republican, Rep. Charles Taylor, and nearly knocking off another, Rep. Robin Hayes.

Republicans Push Tax Bill Through House (AP)

AP, December 8, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) — Rejected by voters and limping off stage, the Republican-led House on Friday passed a sweeping bill reviving expired tax breaks and protecting doctors from a big cut in Medicare payments.

But they dumped an unfinished budget on the Democrats about to take power, passing by a 320-70 vote a stopgap spending bill putting the government on autopilot until Feb. 15. The Senate planned a pre-midnight vote to avoid a government shutdown.

The failure to pass budget bills for domestic agencies, said Rep. David Obey, D-Wis., amounted to "a blatant admission of abject failure by the most useless Congress in modern times."

Working into the night, the House also passed a package of trade bills and debated a measure to keep the government running into next February. Under a complicated procedural pirouette, the tax and trade legislation — along with a plan to open 8.3 million acres in the Gulf of Mexico to oil and gas drilling — was to be bundled together and sent to the Senate, where a handful of Republicans threatened delay.

A weekend Senate session loomed as Republican budget hawks bridled at the measure's cost and textile state senators objected to trade provisions benefiting Haiti. The House passed the trade bill by a 212-184 vote.

The 367-45 vote on the tax bill reflected widespread bipartisan support for extending expired tax breaks, including the research and development tax credit for businesses, sales tax deductions for people in states without income taxes, the tax deduction on college tuition, a tax credit for hiring welfare recipients and others facing difficulties finding jobs and tax credits for alternative energy producers and purchases of solar energy equipment by homeowners and businesses.

All told, the tax cuts would cost $38 billion over five years.

Also driving the massive bill forward was an effort to prevent a 5% cut in Medicare payments to doctors scheduled to take effect Jan. 1 under a complicated government funding formula. But the GOP-crafted solution to the problem was criticized as an accounting gimmick since it would double the cost of fixing the problem again next year.

Lawmakers faced a midnight deadline to send President Bush a bill to keep domestic federal agencies from shutting down. With work unfinished of nine of 11 spending bills, a stopgap funding bill would put 13 Cabinet departments on autopilot through Feb. 15 frozen at or slightly below current levels.

Democrats face difficult choices and weeks of work on the leftover budget mess, which totals $463 billion and must be passed at Bush's strict budget limits.

"They are leaving us with a tremendous mess," Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., told reporters. "We have alternatives, none of which are very good."

Democrats made good on a promise to block an automatic congressional pay raise until the minimum wage is increased. Under pressure from future House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., and Reid, GOP leaders added language to the stopgap funding bill language stopping the pay raise slated for Jan. 1 until Feb. 16.

Now, if the pay raise goes into effect Feb. 16, members would lose some $320 of their anticipated $2,800 annual increase. That raise would be $3,300 if Congress acts to boost the cost-of-living allowances for all federal employees in 2007. Currently, rank-and-file members get $165,200.

The House also approved, 330-59, an agreement to allow U.S. shipments of civilian nuclear fuel to India, an administration priority that is opposed by some because India, which has nuclear weapons, has not submitted to full international inspections.

The House approved by a voice vote a bill to keep open a special investigative office that has unearthed millions of dollars in waste and fraud in the rebuilding of Iraq. The office, which was set to end operations by October 2007, would stay open for an extra year under the bill, passed earlier by the Senate.

As is often the case at the end of the session, congressional leaders tried to lump popular items — extending the expired or expiring tax breaks — with other more contentious measures. Conservatives griped that the popular bills attracted costly add-ons benefiting retiring Republicans such as Majority Leader Bill Frist of Tennessee, who obtained $30 million in concessions for hospitals in his state that treat large numbers of low-income patients.

The trade portion establishes permanent normal trade relations with Vietnam, which is generally supported, with the extension of trade benefits for sub-Saharan Africa, Haiti and Andean nations. The Haiti provisions in particular raised red flags with lawmakers trying to protect home state textile industries.

Eight GOP senators from North and South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama and Kentucky on Thursday wrote congressional leaders saying 100,000 textile jobs in their region had already been lost due to trade agreements and they would oppose "as forcefully as possible" the Haiti measure.

Then there was Senate Budget Committee Chairman Judd Gregg, R-N.H., who gave an extraordinary floor speech lambasting his party for losing its way on fiscal discipline and his leadership for jamming it past rank-and-file Republicans opposing the massive measure.

Gregg particularly objected to a provision tucked into the tax bill to expand federal funding for the health benefits of retired coal miners at a cost of some $5 billion over 10 years.

"You just have to ask yourself how we, as a party, got to this point, where we have a leadership which is going to ram down the throats of our party the biggest budget buster in the history of the Congress under Republican leadership," Gregg said.

Congress Close To Approving Tax Package (WP)

By Lori Montgomery

The Washington Post, December 9, 2006

The House voted overwhelmingly to expand offshore oil drilling and preserve a variety of popular tax breaks for families and businesses, and the Senate was poised early this morning to approve the package after lawmakers angry about trade provisions and the bill's $50 billion cost agreed to let the measure move forward.

Eight senators from textile-manufacturing states had sent a letter to Senate leaders yesterday threatening to block the bill unless they removed a proposal to lift tariffs on clothing manufactured in Haiti. And Senate Budget Committee Chairman Judd Gregg (R-N.H) delivered a blistering condemnation of the decision by Republican leaders to push the unwieldy collection of tax, trade, health and energy measures through Congress as a single package at the last minute, with few opportunities for debate or objection.

In a speech on the Senate floor, Gregg blasted the package as "arguably the largest budget-buster ever brought forward by the Republican Congress."

But the objecting senators could only delay the bill; they did not have the votes to kill it. As midnight approached and the futility of their efforts became clear, they signaled their intention to give up and let their colleagues go home.

In both chambers, lawmakers rushed to finish critical business before calling the 109th Congress to a close. Among the most important pieces of legislation: a resolution that will keep the government running through Feb. 15, which won final approval just before midnight. Because the Republican Congress failed to pass nine of 11 spending bills needed to fund government operations, the unfinished budget will be dumped onto incoming Democratic leaders, who take control when the 110th Congress convenes in January.

At the request of incoming House speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), the resolution contains a provision to end the long-standing tradition of granting lawmakers automatic pay raises.

DOJ_NMG_0105110

Throughout the day yesterday, negotiations over the tax-and-trade package consumed lawmakers, particularly in the Senate. With the trade measures under assault, House leaders delayed a vote on that portion of the package and focused first on the more popular tax provisions. By 367 to 45, the House voted to extend for two years nearly two dozen tax breaks, most of which expired in December 2005. They include a credit for research and development critical to many businesses, a reward for employers that hire former welfare recipients and a deduction for state and local sales taxes paid by people in states without income taxes.

If Congress had left town without extending the breaks, more than 19 million taxpayers would have faced higher taxes when they filed in April, said Senate Finance Committee Chairman Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa).

The package also would repeal a $5,450 limit on contributions to health savings accounts, allowing taxpayers to shelter an unlimited amount of money as long as they choose certain insurance plans with high deductibles. It would stave off a scheduled 5.1 percent cut in payments to doctors who treat Medicare payments, and it would open 8.3 million acres in the Gulf of Mexico to oil and gas exploration.

The House approved the trade portion of the package by 212 to 184. That measure would grant permanent normal trading status to Vietnam and extend trade relations with some African and Andean countries, as well as some other developing nations. The measure also would allow some types of clothing made in Haiti to be imported duty-free. Supporters call the proposal a form of aid to one of the world's poorest countries, while opponents say it would destroy U.S. textile jobs by opening a tax-free door to Haitian goods manufactured with yarn and fabric from China.

Debate in the House was peppered with references to the imminent power shift in Congress. At one point, House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Bill Thomas (R-Calif.) complained that Rep. Charles B. Rangel (D-N.Y.) had not delivered a copy of a Democratic amendment on oil leases.

"You may not have received the amendment, but you received our best wishes on your birthday," Rangel said.

"That was two days ago. What have you done for me lately?" Thomas replied.

Rangel grinned. "We're saying goodbye."

Once through the House, the package was sent to the Senate, where an alarm briefly went up when Sen. Ted Stevens (R-Alaska) discovered that negotiators had failed to make good on a promise to include a provision that would save hundreds of Alaskan timber jobs. A separate bill was quickly drafted, approved by the Senate and shipped to the House.

Gregg made one last stand against the tax package, arguing that it does "grievous harm to the deficit." But he acknowledged that he did not have enough support to block the measure. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn) said the package was headed for a vote to halt debate and "ultimately, passage."

House And Senate Pass Tax And Trade Bill (LAT)

By Richard Simon

The Los Angeles Times, December 9, 2006

WASHINGTON — Nearing the end of an era of Republican rule, Congress early today sent to President Bush energy, tax and trade legislation as it prepared to hand over the reins of power to Democrats.

In a final burst of activity, lawmakers approved $38 billion in tax breaks and a Vietnam trade measure and voted to open a large section of the Gulf of Mexico to oil and gas drilling.

The House approved the measures Thursday night, and the Senate followed suit after midnight as the lame-duck session wound down.

But the GOP leadership was almost denied its last legislative victories, not by Democrats but by Republicans.

Some Senate Republicans objected to costly provisions of the tax bill, from a tax break for songwriters to funding for health benefits for former coal miners, saying they showed the party had yet to learn the lessons of the election that ousted it from power.

"The American people took the reins of government away from the Republican Party … because they were tired of our hypocrisy as a party on the issue of fiscal discipline," Senate Budget Committee Chairman Judd Gregg (R-N.H.) protested.

Sen. Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa) warned colleagues that if they left town without renewing expired or expiring tax breaks, millions of taxpayers would face tax increases.

DOJ_NMG_0105111

"I never thought I'd hear a Republican advocating that we ought to have a tax increase," said Grassley, who is chairman of the tax-writing Senate Finance Committee.

The final hours of the lame-duck session were overshadowed by the release of an investigative report on the congressional page scandal — perhaps fitting, given that the 109th Congress may well be remembered for its political scandals.

The day was marked by partisan bickering. Democrats complained that Republicans were rushing through big and complex bills without giving lawmakers time to read them.

Later, however, the retiring speaker, J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), received a hug on the House floor from the incoming speaker, Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco).

In a speech on the House floor, Hastert looked back on the GOP legacy and wished his Democratic successor well. Pelosi saluted the longest-serving Republican speaker and then joked "long may that record stand."

The tax bill that passed the House, 367-45, included a provision that would open to exploration about 8.3 million acres in the Gulf of Mexico, an area thought to contain more than 1.2 billion barrels of oil and 5.8 trillion cubic feet of natural gas.

Rep. Lois Capps (D-Santa Barbara), who opposed the drilling provision, warned that it would "bring the 25-year-old bipartisan moratorium against new drilling off America's coasts one step closer to an end."

But Rep. K. Michael Conaway (R-Texas), who supported the provision, argued that it would lead to "greater economic and national security."

The bill includes renewal of a number of popular tax breaks, including the research-and-development credit important to California's high-tech industry.

Lawmakers worked several healthcare measures into the tax bill, including legislation to cancel a scheduled 5% cut in payments to doctors who treat elderly Medicare recipients, and changes that would allow individuals to put more money into tax-sheltered health savings accounts, a new type of medical insurance favored by many Republicans.

Separately, the tax bill also addressed some unintended consequences of legislation that Congress passed last year to keep illegal immigrants from getting healthcare benefits through the Medicaid program for the poor. Hundreds of thousands of people who were legally entitled to benefits were inadvertently subjected to new requirements that they provide documents proving their citizenship. Some were frail seniors who had never been issued a birth certificate.

The changes will exempt several groups from the documentation rule, including federally assisted foster children, certain disabled people waiting for the starting date of their Medicare coverage and individuals receiving low-income Social Security assistance.

Rolling back the scheduled cut in doctors' fees had widespread bipartisan support. The cut had been called for under a budget formula that Congress had waived in past years. With time running out on the 109th Congress, the American Medical Assn. mounted an all-out lobbying campaign to head off the cuts.

Lawmakers instead agreed to freeze payments at this year's levels, while providing a modest increase for doctors who agree to participate in a new Medicare effort to improve the quality of clinical care.

However, Democrats bitterly criticized the provisions that would expand health-savings accounts. Many individuals use the tax-sheltered accounts to pay for routine bills while carrying low-cost "catastrophic" insurance for major medical problems.

Under the legislation, individuals would be able to contribute more money to the accounts, known as HSAs, and roll over limited amounts from Individual Retirement Accounts and other sources.

Some Democrats say the accounts provide a way for upper-income individuals to shelter more of their wealth from taxes and could undermine traditional insurance.

The trade bill, which included a Bush-backed provision establishing normal trade relations with Vietnam, passed the House, 212-184.

But the bill drew objections from Republican senators from Southern textile states because of a provision that would allow Haiti to export more apparel to the U.S.

Rep. Zoe Lofgren (D-San Jose) opposed the bill, saying it "does not do anything" to improve human rights conditions in Vietnam.

DOJ_NMG_0105112

But Ways and Means Committee Chairman Bill Thomas (R-Bakersfield), who helped draft the bill, said it represented a "significant milestone in our efforts to mend the wounds of one of the most divisive conflicts in our nation's history."

The tax and trade bills were combined into a single package after they left the House and won Senate approval on a vote of 79 to 9.

In a sign of the Democrats' new clout, the House and Senate voted to put off until at least Feb. 16 a congressional pay raise scheduled to take effect Jan. 1. Currently, rank-and-file lawmakers receive $165,200 a year.

Pelosi had said that lawmakers should not receive a pay raise until Congress votes to raise the federal minimum wage, set at $5.15 an hour since 1997.

The provision was contained in a stopgap measure funding the government through Feb. 15. That measure is necessary because Congress has yet to enact most of the spending bills for the fiscal year that began Oct. 1.

A number of Republicans described the mood among their members as somber.

Complaining about the raft of unfinished business, Rep. Jack Kingston (R-Ga.) said, "We're quietly going out of town on a bunt rather than a grand slam."

But Democrats were just as eager for the session to wrap up.

"Enough of this Congress," said Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Los Angeles). "I've had it."

As 109th Congress Expires, Jockeying Starts For 110th (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, December 9, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 9 — The 109th Congress stumbled toward an angry close early Saturday as the Republican majority used its last hours of power to try to enact broad tax and trade legislation while Democrats accused Republicans of saddling them with a fiscal mess to clean up when they take control next month.

With minutes to spare before a midnight deadline on Friday, Congress approved a stop-gap measure to keep money flowing to federal agencies at current or reduced levels through Feb. 15, because this Congress has not passed regular annual spending bills.

The failure to dispose of the most basic Congressional work sparked recriminations over who was to blame as leaders of the House Appropriations Committee lashed out at the Senate. Representative David R. Obey of Wisconsin, the senior Democrat on the spending panel, called the temporary financing “a blatant admission of abject failure by the most useless Congress in modern times.”

As a result of the spending impasse, Democrats will be forced to deal with the leftover money issues as soon as the new Congress convenes in January.

“It is not just that they turned out the lights — they took the light bulb,” said Senator Patty Murray of Washington, who will join the Democratic leadership in the next Congress.

Even as the 109th Congress was expiring, the parties were maneuvering for the 110th. During the midterm election campaign, Democrats pounded Republicans for taking pay increases while not increasing the federal minimum wage, and they had planned to take action Friday to block the next Congressional raise. But Republicans added to the stop-gap measure a provision to block any Congressional raise until Feb. 15.

Throughout the day, House and Senate leaders put most of their energy behind legislation to normalize trade with Vietnam, grant trade benefits to Haiti and Andean countries, restore about $38 billion in popular tax breaks, block a cut in Medicare payments to doctors and open a stretch of the eastern Gulf of Mexico to oil and gas exploration.

While the House approved the tax and trade legislation, Senate opposition threatened speedy acceptance. A few critics raised objections to the Vietnam trade proposal, the prospect of cheaper textile imports from Haiti and the overall costs. The leadership was trying to ease those complaints and send lawmakers home.

Senator Judd Gregg, Republican of New Hampshire and the chairman of the Budget Committee, said the trade and tax measures represented the sort of fiscal management that caused voters to turn out Republicans in the House and the Senate in last month’s elections.

"They did so, I think in large part, because they were tired of our hypocrisy as a party on the issue of fiscal responsibility," Mr. Gregg said, citing the inclusion of such special-interest provisions as more than $4 billion to clean up abandoned coal mines. "It would appear that their concerns are justified."

Some frustrated lawmakers said the chaotic ending of the session was fitting, with major legislation assembled behind closed doors by senior lawmakers and then rushed to the floor. That was typical, they said, of how business had been done in a highly partisan atmosphere. "This is another example of how not to legislate," said Representative Sander M. Levin, Democrat of Michigan.

The incoming Senate Democratic and Republican leaders said Friday that they would try to set a new tone, beginning the new session on Jan. 4 with a joint closed caucus to explore ways to work together.

"Senate Republicans intend to be as cooperative as possible to help the Senate get off to a good start next year," said Senator Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, the incoming Republican leader, who agreed to the meeting proposed by Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the Democratic leader.

The legislation approved Friday was full of incentives to attract enough support to get it over the finish line. The tax measure, for instance, passed the House on a 367-45 vote. It extends a research and development tax credit sought by the business community, renews an income tax deduction for college tuition costs, allows taxpayers in states without income taxes to deduct sales taxes on their returns and allows teachers to deduct up to $250 for supplies bought with their own money.

The trade portion of the legislation drew more opposition in both the House and the Senate, particularly the push to establish normal trade relations with Vietnam and grant trade benefits for Haiti and the South American nations of Peru, Bolivia, Colombia and Ecuador. It passed the House on a 212-to-184 vote and was shipped to the Senate.

The Bush administration sought the normal trade status with Vietnam, saying it would allow American companies to take advantage of that nation's entry into the World Trade Organization and its booming economy. But some lawmakers questioned Vietnam's record on human rights and raised issues dating back to the Vietnam War.

Representative Nathan Deal, Republican of Georgia, said the trade recognition would reward the communist government of Vietnam, which he said continued to resist efforts by Americans to seek the remains of family members lost in the conflict. But Representative Rob Simmons, a Connecticut Republican and Vietnam veteran, said the trade pact could help improve relations.

Democrats and some Republicans said the stop-gap spending bill could potentially reduce government services by holding spending in many agencies at or below current levels. In response to criticism that veterans might have to wait for care, the legislation allows the Department of Veterans Affairs to shift up to $684 million within its budget to cover health care.

As the House moved toward adjournment, Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, the Illinois Republican who will lose his post when the Democrats take over, gave his farewell speech.

"On January 4, I will be privileged to rejoin you on these benches where my heart is, here on the floor of the House," Mr. Hastert said.

Gregg Rips GOP For "Hypocrisy" Over Tax Bill Maneuver (RC)

By John Stanton

Roll Call, December 8, 2006

Senate Budget Chairman Judd Gregg (R-N.H.) tore into his GOP colleagues Friday, accusing the party of being hypocritical when it claims the mantle of fiscal responsibility.

Gregg's angry floor speech came after a decision by House and Senate leaders to move a $39 billion tax package using procedural tactics that will shield it from a filibuster.

In the speech, Gregg accused Senate GOP leaders of using procedural rules "against the Republican membership" to block criticism of the bill and efforts by conservatives to change it.

Under a deal struck between House and Senate leaders on both sides of the aisle, the Senate this week included trade language and provisions to extend tax credits, among other things, as a "technical correction" to a House-passed tax bill that had not been moved. The House passed that package, then transmitted the new bill to the Senate as a "message." Doing so makes the measure "privileged" under the chamber's rules, essentially blocking Gregg and other conservatives from using budgetary points of order to filibuster the bill.

A senior GOP Senate aide said today that leaders decided to use the procedure last weekend when it became clear that there would not be enough time to move the bill under regular rules. The aide also explained that Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) worked with Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.), who agreed to the move.

Because of the procedural move, the Senate will likely now remain in session until at least Sunday, though Gregg could force the Senate to remain in town until late Monday or Tuesday if he does not agree to allowing the bill to move forward.

Reciting a litany of tax cuts and extensions benefiting special interests or specific states, such as a cut for the music industry and other language that could benefit Frist's home state of Tennessee, Gregg launched a blistering attack on his party's leadership, accusing them of hypocrisy and of failing to learn the lessons of last month's election.

"The American people took the reins of government away from the Republican Party. ... They did so, I think, in large part because they were tired of our hypocrisy as a party on the issue of fiscal responsibility. And it would appear that their concerns are justified," Gregg said.

Gregg said this is the first time that Congress has used a "Message from the House" to move tax legislation. Although House and Senate leaders have said the tax measure would be narrow, it includes billions in additional provisions. Beyond the state-specific tax cuts and music industry provisions criticized by Gregg, the bill also includes ethanol tax provisions, as well as an extension on an ethanol tariff that is favored by corn-state lawmakers to protect farmers.

Gregg placed the blame squarely on the shoulders of his party's leaders in his floor speech.

"We have a leadership which is going to ram down the throats of our party the biggest budget-buster in the history of the Congress under Republican leadership. Well, anyway, the American people figured it out, and I'm sorry we haven't," Gregg said.

Democrats Thwart Congressional Raise (DMN)

By Todd J. Gillman

The Dallas Morning News, December 9, 2006

WASHINGTON – Democrats stalled a congressional pay raise Friday, demanding a minimum wage hike first – a move derided even by Texas Republicans willing to freeze lawmakers' salaries.

"I have voted for some, and I've voted against some. I would be inclined to vote against it this year," said Sen. John Cornyn, R-Texas, expressing annoyance that Democrats were trying to link the issues. "I think they are politically posturing."

House and Senate Democratic leaders threatened to block a last-minute flurry of legislation unless both chambers agreed to avert a 2 percent raise that would take effect Jan. 1. Republican leaders agreed to insert the provision in a stopgap budget that keeps the government running through Feb. 15.

Since 1989, Congress has gotten automatic raises pegged to inflation. A special vote is needed to block an annual raise. The next hike would have boosted pay $3,300, from $165,200 to $168,500.

Friday's move was largely symbolic. The freeze will expire with the stopgap budget – a six-week delay that will cost each lawmaker just $380, though the new Congress could vote to freeze pay for all of 2007.

"It is kind of a gimmick on their part," said Marc Short, spokesman for Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison, R-Texas, adding that despite that, she also supported a pay freeze.

The temporary budget and pay freeze passed the House on Friday night. Senate action was expected by today.

Democrats argued that Congress doesn't deserve a raise because it hasn't been working hard enough, and because it's unfair until Congress boosts the minimum wage, which has been $5.15 per hour since 1997.

Democrats have vowed to raise that to $7.25 as soon as they take control in January.

Rep. Chet Edwards, D-Waco, dismissed Republican complaints, noting that inflation has left purchasing power at a 50-year low for minimum wage earners.

"I don't think it's just politics," he said. "I don't think Congress should be giving itself a $3,000-a-year pay raise when people working hard, moms and dads, for 10 years on minimum wage have not seen a single pay raise."

DOJ_NMG_0105115

But Rep. Jeb Hensarling, R-Dallas, the new chairman of a conservative bloc called the Republican Study Committee, noted that he's voted against every congressional pay raise in his four-year tenure, unlike incoming Democratic Speaker Nancy Pelosi. "She's a little late to the cause," he said.

That said, he added, "It's probably the hardest vote anybody has to make. ... Some of my colleagues contribute so little they are vastly overpaid and some on both sides of the aisle contribute so much to America they're vastly underpaid."

He conceded that lawmakers are well-paid but added that "Congress gets a bad rap on how many days you spend in Washington. Voting in Washington is no more important than me going to the Palestine Rotary Club and listening to how people would like me to vote."

Democrats have accused Republicans of running a "do-nothing Congress," deriding the GOP leadership for keeping them in session just 103 days. They underscored the point Friday by releasing the 2007 schedule, which will boost the typical House workweek from three days to five, and drastically cut vacation time. Assuming a 10-hour day, the 103-day year yields an hourly rate of about $160, though that hardly accounts for all the time lawmakers spend on the job.

"We work every day. We have plenty of committee meetings. We have to go to our districts. I don't know anybody that stays elected that isn't giving it all they can give," said Rep. Eddie Bernice Johnson, D-Dallas, who said she would happily defer a raise for a higher minimum wage.

Incoming Democrats Face Fiscal Minefield (BOS)

By Rick Klein

The Boston Globe, December 9, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The outgoing Republican Congress has placed a political time bomb for incoming Democrats: Nearly all domestic programs paid for by the federal government are level funded through mid-February with no adjustments for inflation, a situation that probably will trigger cuts or reductions in such popular areas as veterans' affairs, children's healthcare, housing vouchers, and low-income fuel assistance.

Democrats, who take control of Congress in January, will therefore have to immediately choose between restoring any lost services and their campaign pledge to control government spending. The clash could expose tensions within the party in the crucial first weeks of Democrats' leadership -- and the party's agenda could get sidetracked in a pitched battle over spending priorities.

"As the Republicans leave their control of Congress, they've decided to blow up the room," said Senator Richard J. Durbin of Illinois, the assistant Democratic leader. "They're leaving behind a disaster for us to deal with."

Republicans will adjourn the 2006 congressional term today without passing nine of the 11 annual appropriations bills, which cover thousands of government programs and nearly half a trillion dollars in domestic spending. Instead, Congress passed a stopgap measure that will keep government operating at a bare-bones level through mid-February -- more than a quarter of the way into fiscal 2007.

The minimum level is determined by picking the lowest of three budget figures for each agency: the amount the Senate or the House appropriated in separate votes or the amount the agency received last year. In most cases, that will be last year's budget for the program or agency.

The typical effects of level funding include delays in an agency's hiring or expansion plans, or inflation-related cuts in services. Democrats and social service groups predict a range of dire consequences: shuttered Social Security offices, a hiring freeze for FBI agents, thousands of children losing access to federally sponsored healthcare.

The Department of Veterans' Affairs budget will be particularly hard hit. The House and Senate budgeted $36.5 billion for the department in fiscal 2007, but Congress' failure to act on the spending bills will leave it funded at last year's level of $34.26 billion -- even as costs and the number of people it treats continues to rise.

That means thousands of battle-wounded soldiers returning from Iraq and Afghanistan may have to wait longer for VA medical treatment.

Advocates for social service programs are already sounding alarms and promise to lobby Democrats to fix what the Republicans left behind.

DOJ_NMG_0105116

"This is just intolerable, where things are right now," said Charles Loveless, legislative director for the American Federation of State, County, and Municipal Employees.

Republicans initially said they would complete work on the appropriations bills during the post election congressional session. But fiscal conservatives, opposed to the thousands of earmarked pet projects stuffed into the measures, stalled the bills, and efforts to dislodge the projects failed amid squabbling between GOP House and Senate leaders.

Conservative Republicans in the House and Senate cheered that result. On its way out the door, the GOP finally succeeded in restraining federal spending -- and did so in a way that will force Democrats to make politically tough budget choices or break their campaign promises, said Representative Jeff Flake, an Arizona Republican.

"We will know very quickly next year whether they were serious about their promises," Flake said. "This is hardly a starvation diet. Most agencies will be fine."

Yet some Democrats say they would not be shy about pushing for more funding. Representative James P. McGovern, a Worcester Democrat, said the public expects his party to recognize their constituents need such federal programs as Head Start and healthcare for veterans.

"We're going to try to fix the damage they're doing," McGovern said. "People expect government to provide for certain needs. . . . I'm not worried about being labeled as a big spender."

But other Democrats are. On the campaign trail before last month's elections, Democrats promised to reduce the budget deficit and institute "pay-as-you-go" budget rules -- that is, increase spending for a program only if lawmakers can find a way to pay for it. Those goals would have to be sidelined if Democrats seek to boost spending early next year.

Representative Mike Ross, an Arkansas Democrat, said voters placed Democrats in control of Congress in large part because of runaway spending and the proliferation of pet projects under Republican rule. Democrats must try to balance the budget, Ross said.

"We have to put the country on a path toward fiscal responsibility," said Ross, co chairman of the conservative Blue Dog Coalition. "It's about priorities. These are decisions we have to be prepared to make."

Republicans' failure to finish their work has Democrats seething as they anticipate difficult budget votes in January and February. Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the incoming majority leader, called it a "tremendous mess" that leaves his party with few palatable options.

"We have alternatives -- none of which are very good," said Reid. "One could get mad, but I'm going to try not to."

Representative David R. Obey, who is set to become chairman of the House Appropriations Committee, declined to say how Democrats would handle the situation.

But he said that Republicans' foot dragging would hurt President Bush since Congress will have to spend time solving the problem, leaving legislators less time to review the president's upcoming budget proposal.

In the meantime, he said, Republicans cannot blame Democrats for anything they do with the fiscal 2007 budget, since the GOP failed to act.

"If the Republicans are not willing to exercise their responsibility while they are in control, they lose all right to criticize in any way, shape, or form the matter in which we go about trying to clean up their mess," said Obey, a Wisconsin Democrat.

But some Republicans said they have granted Democrats a golden opportunity to show voters their fiscal discipline and bipartisanship. If Democrats are serious about curbing earmarks and balancing the budget, they will find plenty of Republicans who want to help, said Senator Jim DeMint, a South Carolina Republican.

"I have a bunch of senators who would like to work with them on that," DeMint said. "I don't care if they get the credit for doing it or not, it just needs to get done."

Sentiment And Jokes At Farewells In The House (NYT)

By Anne E. Kornblut, Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, December 9, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0105117

WASHINGTON, Dec. 8 — Representative Charles B. Rangel tried to do something graceful on Friday. He wished a very public happy birthday to his longtime nemesis, Representative Bill Thomas, the departing chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee.

In an exchange on the House floor, Mr. Thomas, Republican of California, informed Mr. Rangel, Democrat of New York, that his birthday was a few days ago and asked what Mr. Rangel had done for him lately.

"We're saying goodbye," Mr. Rangel said with a smile, drawing out his words and waving farewell.

In bursts of giddiness and remorse, members of Congress went through not just the end of the 109th Congress this week, but also 12 years of Republican control. It was the end of an era, and Republicans left Capitol Hill with spasms of amusement, anger and humiliation, at times visibly stunned that power and its trappings had vanished so fast.

They cleared out their belongings, leaving the hallways full of broken furniture and overflowing trash bins. They gave emotional farewell speeches on the floor.

They tried — rather unsuccessfully — to wrap up business, displaying a lack of legislative discipline that was a sharp contrast to the machinelike efficiency of their early years in charge.

Some lawmakers, like Senator Conrad Burns, Republican of Montana, walked off in a huff.

Representative Charles Bass, Republican of New Hampshire, paused to ruminate about his party's descent as he descended to the temporary quarters allocated to incumbents who lost on Nov. 7, a cluster of cubicles in the basement of a House office building.

"When I was elected in 1994, there were seven of us," Mr. Bass said, referring to the cadre of New England Republicans who long made up the moderate wing of his party. "It's been downhill ever since. And now we're down to one."

Indeed, the end of the current Congress means the departure of all House Republicans from New England except for Representative Christopher Shays of Connecticut. For the first time since 1976, there will be no one named Chafee representing Rhode Island in the Senate.

Nearly 12 Republican retirements and almost 24 defeats of incumbent means the loss of some of the best known, and most colorful, characters of recent decades.

Representative Henry J. Hyde of Illinois, the longtime House Judiciary Committee chairman, will be gone. So will Representative Katherine Harris, famous or infamous for her role as secretary of state in Florida in the 2000 presidential election. As will Representative J. D. Hayworth of Arizona, a formerly brazen member of the new Republican breed elected in 1994.

Representative Jim Leach of Iowa, a 30-year veteran of the House and a moderate Republican who lost his seat, lamented that "the great center of American politics" was no longer represented in Congress.

"If you think of American history, the best and the brightest gravitated to politics," Mr. Leach said recently after addressing the House. "Today, that is less the case."

He said he believed that he was leaving a Congress far more dysfunctional than when he arrived, adding, "The public swings from being slightly left of center to slightly right of center, but the politics are well to the right of center to well to the left of center."

The final moments of the week should have presented a last-dash opportunity for Republicans to consider core items of the conservative agenda, the chance to put in a parting word, however symbolic, on issues like abortion.

Instead, the 12 years of Republican discipline began to wither. House Republicans failed to pass an antiabortion measure, struggled to approve a package extending popular tax breaks and decided not even to bother trying to find a solution for the spending bills. Atmospherically, the place began to look like a sprawling rummage sale, as members departed and others swapped spaces.

A few dozen gold-embossed books, commemorating the Congressional tributes on Ronald Reagan's death in 2004, were tossed into the heap next to the office of E. Clay Shaw Jr., a Florida Republican who was defeated. When word spread about the books, young Republican aides began scooping them from the garbage.

Other scavengers, some with backpacks and some in business suits, traipsed up and down the hallways of the House office buildings. Cleaning crews moved from empty suite to empty suite, confronting years' worth of debris.

In the basement of the Rayburn building, the more than 20 Republicans who involuntarily lost their seats crammed into a single office, for some of them the closest they would come to having space in the most vaunted House office building.

"I finally got a Rayburn office, but it's in the basement," said Representative Chris Chocola, Republican of Indiana. On the other side of the Capitol, Senator Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania met with his successor, Bob Casey, for nearly an hour on Thursday, their longest encounter apart from their televised debates.

But Mr. Santorum, a Republican whose once-steady rise in politics ended with a resounding defeat, refused to be photographed with Mr. Casey, and brushed past reporters in his closing days in the Capitol.

In a departing act as House majority leader, John A. Boehner of Ohio sent a memorandum to Republican members of Congress. He waxed nostalgic over the close of the session, saying the Contract With America had ended.

"Chastened and humbled by our defeat at the ballot box, Republicans have taken a critical look inward," Mr. Boehner wrote. "We've looked back at our greatest success, in search of lessons to guide us as we move ahead."

He warned members that life would change considerably.

"I'm not looking forward to serving in the minority during the next two years," Mr. Boehner said.

But he added that it would be a good lesson and motivation to regain control of the House in two years and end any feeling of complacency from their 12-year run.

"If such an entitlement mentality did creep in, it should now be dead and gone," Mr. Boehner wrote. "And the humbling conditions Republicans face during the first few months of 2007 will stamp out any trace that remains.

"The end of our Republican majority was not inevitable. Nor is the return of our majority two years from now. Our fate is in our own hands, and that of the American people we were elected to serve."

Committee Says GOP Left Foley Unchecked (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, December 9, 2006

The House ethics committee concluded yesterday that House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) and his top staff probably knew for months, if not years, of then-Rep. Mark Foley's inappropriate contact with former House pages but did nothing to protect the teenagers.

Top GOP House leaders also "failed to exercise appropriate diligence" in the matter, the committee's report found, and tried "to remain willfully ignorant of the potential consequences of Foley's conduct." The ensuing scandal contributed to the Republicans' losses in the midterm elections. The report speculated that some officials were reluctant to act too aggressively for fear of exposing Foley's homosexuality or for political reasons.

But the ethics panel, officially known as the Committee on Standards of Official Conduct, decided against taking any action against the leaders, aides or House officials involved in the saga, declining even to describe their actions as bringing ill repute on the House.

"The requirement that Members and staff act at all times in a manner that reflects creditably on the House does not mean that every error in judgment or failure to exercise appropriate oversight and sufficient diligence establishes a violation" of House rules, the long-awaited report concluded.

The committee's bipartisan probe was launched two months ago after reports by ABC News that Foley, a Florida Republican, had sent sexually explicit online messages to male former House pages. The 89-page report is sharply critical of Hastert and his chief of staff, Scott Palmer, and chief counsel, Ted Van Der Meid.

The report also chides House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) for not showing sufficient curiosity in the matter, and retiring Rep. Jim Kolbe (R-Ariz.) is criticized for failing to divulge Foley's actions, both years before they were exposed and after they came to light.

Democratic aides are also criticized, for shopping around inappropriate Foley e-mails to media outlets as far back as November 2005, apparently for political gain.

DOJ_NMG_0105119

To critics of Congress, the report's release in the final hours of the session is a fitting end to a Congress tainted by scandal, indictments and resignations. Next month, Hastert will take a seat in a new, Democratic-controlled House as a back-bench member of the minority.

"It is unfathomable that the ethics committee has held no member or staff member individually accountable for the manner in which the Foley scandal was handled in the House," said Fred Wertheimer, president of Democracy 21, a watchdog group.

Two former pages whose revelations added to the scandal expressed disappointment with the committee's decision not to discipline those who knew about Foley's behavior. One of the pages, involved in providing the first questionable e-mails to the media, said, "I'm surprised they aren't doing anything, but it's not shocking, given the lack of real accountability we've seen in Congress in general."

The other former page, whom Foley propositioned after the boy had left the page program, said, "My fear is that by not holding anyone accountable it sets a precedent that political fallout is more important than young people's safety."

Committee members of both parties defended their conclusions. "This is not the jerry-rigged result of a series of compromises," said Rep. Howard L. Berman (Calif.), the committee's ranking Democrat.

Hastert issued a statement late yesterday stressing that the investigation had uncovered no evidence that any House member, officer or employee, or any member of the media, knew of the overtly sexual instant messages that led to Foley's sudden resignation.

Much about Foley's courting of male pages has been made public, but the committee's report breaks new ground. As far back as 1995, the year Foley took office as part of the Republican takeover, Jeff Trandahl, then assistant clerk of the House, saw Foley as a nuisance for lavishing inordinate attention on pages. Trandahl, who would be elected clerk in 1999, testified that he thought of Kolbe, an openly gay House Republican who is retiring this year, the same way.

Peggy Sampson, the Republicans' chief page supervisor, said Foley's behavior gave her a "creepy feeling" for years. Evidence emerged that on two separate occasions, Foley went to the page dormitory late at night. In the first incident, before 2000, he was suspected of being intoxicated and was turned away by Capitol Police. In another incident, in June 2000, he reportedly appeared in his convertible during the pages' end-of-semester "all-night party" and sped off with at least two pages before supervising staff could react.

Perhaps the biggest revelations involved Kolbe. The Washington Post reported in October that one of his former pages had received a sexually explicit instant message from Foley, which the former page had shown to Kolbe as long ago as 2000. After the story appeared, Kolbe said that the contact was with his staff, not him, that he did not see it and that he was unaware it was explicit.

Kolbe's assistant, Patrick Baugh, told the committee that the former page had contacted Kolbe directly and that the former page revealed the explicit nature of the message.

Moreover, after the Foley matter exploded in the media, the former page contacted Kolbe again to ask whether he should divulge the instant message. He testified that Kolbe responded: "It is best that you don't even bring this up with anybody. . . . There is no good that can come from it if you actually talk about this."

In a statement, Kolbe said, "The report demonstrates that members of my office and I took prompt action in 2001 to address the complaint," by a college student from his district who had previously served as a House page. "I did not review a copy of the communication Congressman Foley sent . . . and I never knew whether or not it was sexually explicit," Kolbe said. "The simple fact that Foley had made the student feel uncomfortable was enough for me to take action by, among other things, notifying the Clerk of the House."

Another incident was also brought to light in the report. After the Foley matter became public on Sept. 29, The Post quoted Boehner saying that he had told Hastert that spring of concerns about Foley and that Hastert had said the matter was being taken care of. When the story appeared on The Post's Web site that night, Palmer, Hastert's chief of staff, contacted Boehner's chief of staff to discuss what the report called "the perceived inconsistency" between Boehner's story and Hastert's statement denying all knowledge of the concerns.

That led to a late-night strategy session of House GOP leaders in Boehner's office, which some members at the time feared was inappropriate because the case had been referred to the ethics committee.

Democrats receive their share of scrutiny in the report. In August 2005, a former page of Rep. Rodney Alexander (R-La.) sent Alexander aide Danielle Savoy e-mails he had received from Foley asking him for a picture and asking what he wanted for his birthday. Savoy passed them on to a friend, who showed them to her boyfriend, Justin Field, who worked for the House Democratic Caucus.

Democratic Caucus communications director Matt Miller saw the e-mails as inappropriate, but rather than taking them to authorities, he shopped them to the press, first to the Miami Herald and the St. Petersburg Times that November, then to the Capitol Hill newspaper Roll Call. He also gave the e-mails to the communications director of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, a point apparently validating Republican charges that senior Democrats were behind the revelation of Foley's conduct.

On the central question of Hastert's involvement, the committee firmly sided with Trandahl and former Foley chief of staff Kirk Fordham, who testified that they brought Foley's behavior to the attention of Palmer and of Hastert counsel Van Der Meid years ago. Fordham also testified that Palmer assured him he had brought the issue directly to the speaker in late 2002 or early 2003.

Trandahl said Palmer had told him: "I've talked to Kirk Fordham. I understand the problem. I'm on it." He said he remembered it "vividly."

Palmer testified repeatedly that he remembered no such meeting, and Hastert said he did not remember learning anything of the Foley matter.

But the committee found "the weight of the evidence supports" Fordham and Trandahl. Moreover, "the weight of the evidence supports the conclusion that Speaker Hastert was told, at least in passing, about the e-mails" by Boehner and Reynolds in spring 2006.

Ethics Panel Faults GOP Leaders In Foley Case (LAT)

By Noam N. Levey

The Los Angeles Times, December 9, 2006

WASHINGTON — In a coda to a year of political disasters for Republicans, the House Ethics Committee said Friday that GOP lawmakers and staff members for years remained "willfully ignorant" that former Rep. Mark Foley was making sexual advances toward male congressional pages.

Driven by political considerations and fear of exposing Foley's homosexuality, they failed in their duty to protect the teenagers, the committee concluded in its report on the scandal. And, the panel said, congressional officials ignored evidence of predatory behavior by the Florida Republican that began emerging more than 10 years ago.

Despite these criticisms, the bipartisan ethics panel found that no House rules were broken in the handling of the Foley case. And though it noted that senior advisors to outgoing House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) were among those who were warned years ago of Foley's improprieties, the committee did not determine there had been a systematic cover-up of the matter.

The report's lack of sanctions drew quick condemnation from government reform groups, which characterized the committee's nine-week investigation as a sham.

"It's just unfathomable how you can reach the conclusion that wrongdoing occurred … but no one did it," said Fred Wertheimer, president of the independent watchdog group Democracy 21. "This is a classic demonstration of one of the fundamental ethics problems [in Congress]. They don't have a real system for enforcement."

Hastert issued a brief statement in which he praised the panel's work and said he was "glad the committee made clear that there was no violation of any House rules by any member or staff."

Nonetheless, the report's harsh critique was another black mark on the GOP, whose losses in last month's midterm election cost it control of the House and Senate and capped a period of scandals and failed legislative initiatives. Along with Foley, four GOP lawmakers — including onetime House Majority Leader Tom DeLay of Texas — have resigned amid scandal since 2005. On the legislative front, the party stalemated this year on a number of key issues, including immigration overhaul and controlling federal spending.

DOJ_NMG_0105121

Growing public discontent with the war in Iraq created an especially tough political environment for Republicans in this year's campaign. And in the eyes of many political experts and strategists in both parties, the Foley scandal was the final blow that crushed GOP hopes of retaining its congressional majorities.

The Ethics Committee probe began after news reports in late September of sexually explicit messages between Foley, 52, and a former House page, revelations that caused the 12-year House member to immediately resign his seat.

Although the committee did not call for any penalties against any of those linked to the controversy, it also did not find much honor in the way a succession of congressional officials responded as questions arose about Foley's actions.

As far back as the mid-1990s, the investigation found, House officials learned of warning signs that Foley had an inappropriate interest in pages.

Foley tried to visit the pages' residence hall after curfew on at least two occasions, once while he may have been intoxicated, according to the report.

In 2001, a former page who had been sponsored by Rep. Jim Kolbe (R-Ariz.) complained to Kolbe that Foley had sent him a sexually explicit message. And in 2002, Foley used frequent-flier miles to bring a former page to Washington to visit him.

But each time, officials who knew of Foley's behavior seemed to do little more than suggest to him that he be more careful.

The committee's report is particularly critical of Kolbe, who, according to the former page, later told the page not to share information about Foley's message. Kolbe denied to the committee that he tried to silence the former page.

Also pointedly criticized for their inaction were two of Hastert's chief lieutenants: his longtime chief of staff, Scott Palmer, and his chief counsel, Ted Van Der Meid.

Former House Clerk Jeff Trandahl — who told the committee that he confronted Foley about 10 times over the years about his behavior — said he repeatedly raised his concerns with Van Der Meid.

Trandahl and former Foley Chief of Staff Kirk Fordham said they brought their concerns to Palmer in 2002 or 2003. Yet no official action was taken. Palmer said he did not recall meeting with Fordham.

Even in 2005, when a series of suggestive e-mails from Foley to a former page in Louisiana prompted more complaints, House leaders did little but ask Foley to stop the communications, the committee found.

The committee reported that it could not "determine conclusively" why officials had not acted more aggressively.

"Some may have been concerned that raising the issue too aggressively might have risked exposing Rep. Foley's homosexuality, which could have adversely affected him both personally and politically," the panel concluded.

It also noted that "there is some evidence that political considerations played a role."

Although the committee did not detail what those may have been, the GOP's majority during its 12 years of controlling the House always has been relatively slim, and party leaders were focused on retaining seats.

Addressing conflicting reports about when Hastert was alerted to Foley's communications with the former Louisiana page, the committee wrote: "The weight of the evidence supports the conclusion that Speaker Hastert was told, at least in passing, about the e-mails" months before Foley resigned.

House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) and Rep. Thomas M. Reynolds (R-N.Y.), head of the party's congressional campaign committee, contradicted Hastert's account. Boehner and Reynolds said they alerted Hastert early this year.

Rep. Howard L. Berman of Valley Village, the committee's ranking Democrat, said the investigation's "most important contribution" would be "to tell the story of what happened."

But the panel's decision not to recommend any punishment for any official threatens to weaken its effect at a time when Democrats are promising to treat ethics more seriously than did the departing GOP majority.

The committee could have officially rebuked those involved in the case. It also has the power to recommend expulsion of lawmakers. The full House would vote on such a recommendation.

The Justice Department is conducting a criminal probe into the handling of the Foley case.

The committee report was released just a few hours before Hastert took to the House floor to reflect fondly upon his service as speaker since 1999. His remarks were greeted with a standing ovation from Republicans and Democrats.

Report Finds Negligence In Foley Case (NYT)

By Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, December 9, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 8 — The House ethics committee said Friday that a nine-week investigation into former Representative Mark Foley's conduct had found that Speaker J. Dennis Hastert and other Republican leaders were negligent in not shielding teenagers from inappropriate advances by Mr. Foley.

But the panel also concluded that neither Mr. Hastert nor other officers of the House had violated any House rules, and recommended no sanctions for their failure to stop Mr. Foley's conduct.

The bipartisan report, released in the waning hours of the Congressional session, concluded that "political considerations played a role" in some of the decisions made by lawmakers or their aides after learning about Mr. Foley's contacts with former Congressional pages.

"A pattern of conduct was exhibited among many individuals to remain willfully ignorant of the potential consequences" of Mr. Foley's untoward behavior, the report said. "The failure to exhaust all reasonable efforts to call attention to potential misconduct involving a member and House page is not merely the exercise of poor judgment, it is a present danger to House pages and to the integrity of the institution of the House."

The members of the investigating subcommittee, two Republicans and two Democrats, declined to take questions on Friday or respond to critics who said the case of Mr. Foley, a Florida Republican, underscored a need to reform how Congress policed itself. The findings were presented in a two-inch-thick document, including volumes of sexually graphic instant messages Mr. Foley sent to former pages.

Mr. Foley refused to testify, the report said, citing pending criminal investigations against him in Florida as well as his right not to incriminate himself. He has been beyond the jurisdiction of the House since resigning on Sept. 29. Had he remained in Congress, the report said, he "almost certainly" would have been disciplined.

The revelations about Mr. Foley shook the midterm election campaign, played a role in Republicans losing control of the House and damaged the political leadership of Mr. Hastert. The committee said "the weight of the evidence" showed that Mr. Hastert knew about e-mail messages Mr. Foley had sent a former page from Louisiana and that his circle of senior advisers for years had been aware of other concerns.

The committee found that there was "a disconcerting unwillingness to take responsibility for resolving issues regarding Representative Foley's conduct." Those in the chain of command, the report said, "did far too little, while attempting to pass the responsibility for acting to others."

The committee said it could not conclusively say why Republicans failed to address Mr. Foley's conduct. But the investigation found that Republicans "may have been concerned that raising the issue too aggressively might have risked exposing Representative Foley's homosexuality, which could have adversely affected him both personally and politically."

After his resignation, Mr. Foley checked himself into an alcohol treatment program and announced, through his lawyer, that he is gay. He has since been released from the program, but has not spoken publicly about his behavior.

After hearing testimony from more than 50 witnesses, the committee concluded that Mr. Foley employed a familiar pattern to become acquainted with pages. The report said the congressman would get page e-mail addresses at the end of their time in Washington, and begin contacting them with "messages that could be read as sexual solicitation."

"Such conduct is an abuse of power and an abuse of trust of the pages, their parents or guardians and the Congress itself," the report said. "Behavior of this kind cannot be excused or tolerated, as it undermines the integrity of the House."

In a written statement on Friday, Mr. Hastert noted that the investigation found no evidence that anyone knew about the sexually charged instant messages that led to Mr. Foley's resignation. "I am glad the committee made clear that there was no violation of any House rules by any member or staff," he added.

Still, the investigation concluded that the speaker's chief of staff, Scott Palmer, first learned of Mr. Foley's conduct with pages in 2002 or 2003. And the speaker's chief counsel, Ted Van Der Meid, had been aware of concerns about Mr. Foley's behavior for nearly a decade.

DOJ_NMG_0105123

The committee's findings validated the accounts of Kirk Fordham, Mr. Foley's former chief of staff, and Jeff Trandahl, then the House clerk, both of whom testified that they repeatedly warned the speaker's office about Mr. Foley, described in the report as a "ticking time bomb." The concerns heightened in November, 2005, when a former page sent e-mail messages he had received from Mr. Foley to the office of Representative Rodney Alexander, a Louisiana Republican. It was this exchange, in which Mr. Foley asked for the teenager's photograph, that prompted Republican leaders to confront Mr. Foley.

While there was much discussion about the initial e-mail messages, few people had seen transcripts. Republicans said the family of the Louisiana page was adamant about privacy and had objected to messages being disclosed, but the report released Friday said the page's father had testified that he had made no such request.

The demand for privacy became a "convenient justification for failing to pursue the matter," the report said. "The family's desire for privacy could have been accommodated while still investigating more aggressively."

The inquiry was led by Representative Doc Hastings, Republican of Washington, and Howard L. Berman, Democrat of California.

Foley Report Harshly Criticizes Hastert, Staff (RC)

By John Bresnahan, Susan Davis

Roll Call, December 8, 2006

After a nine-week investigation, the House ethics committee has concluded that Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) and his top aides knew that former Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) had inappropriate e-mail contacts with former House pages but failed to take adequate steps to stop those contacts, according to a report released by the panel on Friday.

The committee's findings — which did not include any formal violations of House ethics rules — are in direct contrast with public statements made by Hastert and Scott Palmer, his chief of staff. Both men denied being told by Members or staff of any concerns about Foley's behavior or speaking to the ex-lawmaker or Foley's staff about the matter. Ted Van Der Meid, Hastert's counsel, was slammed by the ethics panel for "an inexplicable lack of interest" in the Foley e-mails or attempts to resolve the matter.

Retiring Rep. Jim Kolbe (R-Ariz,), who is under investigation by federal authorities over his own interactions with House pages, also drew harsh criticism from the Committee on Standards of Official Conduct for failing to follow up concerns raised by an ex-page regarding a sexually explicit Foley e-mail. The committee said Kolbe should have done more in October 2001 to determine exactly what Foley had said to the former page.

But the ethics committee did not find that any current Member or aide had violated House rules or standards, and the panel will take no further action on the scandal, despite the failure by House GOP leaders and senior aides to address the Foley matter before it was revealed by ABC News in late September. Foley resigned from the House on Sept. 29, and he is under investigation by both federal and Florida officials over his dealings with the former pages, including sexually explicit electronic exchanges he had with several male teens.

An investigative subcommittee led by Reps. Doc Hastings (R-Wash.) and Howard Berman (D-Calif.), chairman and ranking member of the full ethics committee, found "a significant number of instances where Members, officers or employees failed to exercise appropriate diligence and oversight, or should have exercised greater diligence and oversight, regarding issues arising from the interaction between former Rep. Mark Foley and current or former House pages."

In the panel's report, which was publicly released this afternoon, the committee also noted "a disconcerting unwillingness to take responsibility" for Foley's actions among lawmakers and staff or for stopping it once they were aware of the behavior.

"Rather than addressing the issues fully, some witnesses did far too little, while attempting to pass the responsibility for acting to others," the report stated. "Some relied on unreasonably fine distinctions regarding their defined responsibilities. Almost no one followed up adequately on the limited actions they did take."

The ethics panel blamed several factors for the GOP leadership's failure to rein in Foley, including the fact that Foley was gay but closeted, as well as the potential political fallout if that fact were publicly revealed.

"Some may have been concerned that raising the issue too aggressively might have risked exposing Rep. Foley's homosexuality, ... which could have adversely affected him both personally and politically," the subcommittee found. "There is some evidence that political considerations played a role in decisions that were made by people in both political parties."

In a statement, Hastert emphasized that the panel concluded that no House Member or staffer was aware of the more sexually explicit messages that surfaced after the Foley scandal became public.

"I asked the Committee to do this tough job promptly, and they have," Hastert said. "I want to thank them for their diligent and hard work in preparing a thorough and final report. My staff and I voluntarily and fully cooperated with this investigation. I am glad the committee made clear that there was no violation of any House rules by any Member or staff."

Hastert told the investigative subcommittee that he could not recall being told by House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) and Rep. Tom Reynolds (R-N.Y.) about inappropriate e-mails that Foley was sending to a former page. Both lawmakers testified that they had warned Hastert about the e-mails earlier this year.

The investigative subcommittee "finds that the weight of evidence supports the conclusion that Speaker Hastert was told, at least in passing, about the e-mails" by both Boehner and Reynolds, the report stated. "Neither the Majority Leader nor Rep. Reynolds asked the Speaker to to take any action in response to the information each provided to him, and there is no evidence that the Speaker took any action."

The ethics committee apparently did not believe Palmer's denial of any knowledge of the Foley e-mails, and it disputed Palmer's claim that he did not meet privately with Foley or his former chief of staff, Kirk Fordham, to discuss the matter.

"The weight of evidence supports a conclusion that Kirk Fordham talked to Scott Palmer about Fordham's concerns about Rep. Foley's conduct, and that Palmer later talked to Rep. Foley," the report stated.

Former House Clerk Jeff Trandahl, a key figure in the investigation, testified that he had been aware of Foley's behavior as early as the mid-1990s and had "repeatedly confronted" Foley personally about his behavior.

Trandahl said he raised the matter "a lot more than 10 times" with Fordham, who was Foley's chief of staff at the time. The report indicates that Trandahl and Fordham worked in conjunction over the years to curb Foley's interaction with pages and to warn him about the appearance of impropriety.

According to the report, Trandahl said he raised the issue with Van Der Meid on "a number of occasions." Van Der Meid testified that he never informed anyone else in the Speaker's office because he believed Trandahl and Fordham were in control of the matter. Trandahl "had never asked me to take any other action," Van Der Meid testified.

Trandahl offered key testimony contradicting Palmer's insistence that he has no recollection of a conversation that took place in late 2002 or early 2003 in which Trandahl and Fordham agreed to go to Palmer directly, and Fordham spoke with him directly. Palmer flatly denied any recollection or knowledge that such a meeting took place.

Trandahl said that over the years, he also raised the matter with Kolbe, and staff associated with the Page Board.

The committee concluded that Trandahl was not guilty of any misconduct and that his actions were "reasonable" in the Foley matter. "In fact, the evidence shows that both Fordham and Trandahl took steps to bring their concerns about Rep. Foley's conduct to the attention of others who they thoughts might be able to help address their concerns."

At a press conference Friday, Hastings and Berman declined to take questions regarding the investigation in order to "let the report speak for itself."

According to Hastings, the panel did more than 100 hours of interviews producing more than 3000 pages of written testimony. He said that while the panel originally authorized over four-dozen subpoenas, most individuals co-operated willingly and "only a handful" of subpoenas had to be served.

"We were pleased by the cooperation received by the overwhelming majority of those we interviewed both inside and outside the House," Hastings said.

Hastings and Berman maintained that the committee fulfilled its Oct. 5 commitment to a quick and thorough investigation. "Promise made, promise kept," Berman told reporters.

"I've never seen the process work better than it has on this particular occasion," Berman said, lauding the staff of the investigative panel but noting that the investigation saw rare and intense Member participation by the chairman and ranking member, as well as Reps. Judy Biggert (R-Ill.) and Rep. Stephanie Tubbs Jones (D-Ohio.), who also sat on the investigative subcommittee.

Speaking broadly to the Foley matter, Hastings took the opportunity to reiterate that "Members, officers and staff alike" have an obligation to "speak up and to seek appropriate action and then to follow up to ensure that the concern has been properly addressed."

Hastings added, "If there is a positive to take away from all of this, I hope there will be a renewed determination on the part of everyone here in the House to spare no Member when it comes to ensuring the safety of our young men and women who come from all over the country to serve us as our pages."

Panel: Republicans Negligent But Broke No Rules In Foley Case (CHIT)

By Mike Dorning, Christi Parsons

Chicago Tribune, December 9, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Republican congressional leaders and their staffs were "willfully ignorant" in responding to early warnings of improper advances toward underage male pages by then-Rep. Mark Foley of Florida but did not violate any House rules, the House ethics committee concluded Friday.

The committee's 89-page investigative report described numerous warning signs of inappropriate behavior stretching back more than a decade, including two nighttime visits by Foley to the dormitory where the high school-age House pages lived. On one occasion, the Republican congressman was turned away because it was after curfew and he appeared intoxicated. Another time, Foley sped off in his convertible with two male pages, the committee was told.

Though the panel did not reprimand or otherwise sanction House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) or any other member of Congress, it cast doubt on Hastert's public insistence that he was unaware of a complaint about inappropriate e-mail messages Foley sent to a former page last year.

The speaker declined to discuss the committee's findings on the scandal, which undermined public confidence in his leadership of the House and stoked criticism that Republican leaders were, at best, indifferent to abuses of power. Political analysts say the Foley scandal contributed to the Democrats winning control of Congress in last month's midterm elections.

"The committee did their work," Hastert said Friday. "We went through a process and stuck with the process. We have a report that addresses all of that."

Overall, the ethics panel found "a pattern of conduct ... among many individuals to remain willfully ignorant of the potential consequences" of Foley's conduct toward pages.

The committee's report also concluded that "the weight of the evidence does not support" denials from Hastert Chief of Staff Scott Palmer that Palmer was warned years earlier of alarming behavior by Foley. Efforts to reach Palmer were unsuccessful.

The panel blasted another senior Hastert aide, counsel Ted Van Der Meid, for "an inexplicable lack of interest" when he received a complaint about the Foley e-mails. Van Der Meid had been repeatedly warned previously of inappropriate contacts with pages, including at least one of Foley's visits to the page dorm, the panel found.

In the e-mail exchange with a 16-year-old former page from Louisiana, Foley requested a photo of the Louisiana boy, asked what he would like as a birthday gift and commented on the handsome physique of another former male page. Once that e-mail exchange was disclosed in September by ABC News, other former pages came forward with numerous sexually graphic electronic messages that Foley had sent to teenagers over the years. The congressman then resigned.

The ethics committee criticized the House Page Board chairman, Rep. John Shimkus (R-Ill.), who handled the complaint about the e-mails with a private warning to Foley to cease contact with pages; the panel said Shimkus failed to consult other members of the page board or investigate further. The House employee responsible for supervising the page program testified that he warned Shimkus at the time that Foley was "a ticking time bomb" who had been confronted a number of times about inappropriate behavior with pages.

DOJ_NMG_0105126

The other Republican member of the page board, Rep. Shelley Moore Capito of West Virginia, testified that Shimkus later told her he did not take the matter to the page board in part to avoid informing its Democratic member, Rep. Dale Kildee of Michigan. Capito said Shimkus told her he feared the matter "would be blown out of proportion" by Kildee.

Shimkus said Friday he takes the committee's rebuke seriously but maintained that he had acted in good faith. "I think I walk away from this maybe having made a bad decision," he said, "but with my integrity and my honor intact."

Rep. Judy Biggert (R-Ill.), a member of the ethics panel, defended the decision not to take disciplinary action.

Nonetheless, Biggert said it was "disappointing that people along the way didn't take it as seriously as they might have…. I think that has to do with the subject matter. People are uncomfortable talking about this kind of thing."

After a nine-week investigation, the ethics committee released its report on the closing day of the congressional session and the end of 12 years of Republican control of the House—controlwon and now lost in large part because of voter anger over abuses of congressional power.

The 1994 Republican Revolution led by former House Speaker Newt Gingrich wrested control of Congress from Democrats on promises to clean up the institution following scandals, including exposure of a cozy arrangement at the House Bank that allowed members to repeatedly bounce checks without penalty.

But the disclosure of Foley's electronic communications and the House leadership's slow-footed response to early warnings about the congressman culminated a series of recent Republican scandals that also included charges of bribery and influence-peddling against several members of Congress.

The ethics committee also showed that a Democratic political operative was instrumental in bringing to light the Louisiana boy's 2005 complaint about Foley's e-mails. Still, the report found no evidence that operatives for either party or anyone in Congress other than Foley were aware in advance of the sexually explicit communications.

The former page from Louisiana initially complained about the e-mails in August 2005 to a junior aide to the page's congressional sponsor, Rep. Rodney Alexander (R-La.). The aide was rebuffed when she raised the matter with a superior. She then forwarded the e-mail to a friend and the e-mail eventually reached a Democratic operative who passed it on to Florida newspapers. Alexander's office alerted Hastert's staff when reporters began to call in November 2005.

The ethics committee found numerous others ignored warnings about Foley's behavior that dated "from the beginning of his tenure" in the House in January 1995.

Former House Clerk Jeff Trandahl, who supervised the page program, became concerned by the mid-1990s. He said he confronted Foley "approximately 10 times" about his frequent fraternizing with pages and confronted Foley's chief of staff "a lot more than 10 times."

Trandahl also testified he raised the concerns "pretty often" with Hastert's counsel, Van Der Meid, who was his contact in the speaker's office.

The Buck Just Stops (WP)

The Washington Post, December 9, 2006

WHAT, ONE HAS to wonder, would it take for the House ethics committee to hold a lawmaker or a staff member accountable?

A special investigative subcommittee convened to examine responses to Mark Foley's inappropriate contacts with congressional pages found "a significant number of instances where Members, officers or employees failed to exercise appropriate diligence and oversight." It found "a disconcerting unwillingness to take responsibility for resolving issues regarding Rep. Foley's conduct." And it found "a pattern of conduct . . . among many individuals to remain willfully ignorant of the potential consequences of former Representative Foley's conduct with respect to House pages."

The sum total of disciplinary actions the panel is recommending as a result? Zero.

In a report released yesterday, the panel did a good job laying out the disturbing facts of the case: how the Florida Republican's inappropriate interest in pages manifested itself from his first days on the job and how lawmakers and staff failed to do nearly enough to find out about or fix the problem. It ably described the stakes involved: "The failure to exhaust all reasonable efforts to call attention to potential misconduct involving a Member and House page is not merely the exercise of poor judgment; it is a present danger to House pages and to the integrity of the institution of the House." Then, all too characteristically, the committee declined to hold even a single individual responsible for any misstep.

It's true, as the report said, that not "every error in judgment" is a violation of House rules. It's also true that those who failed to stop Mr. Foley weren't aware at the time of his most egregious conduct, the sexually explicit instant messages he sent to a former page. But if not every error in judgment is a violation, the ethics committee's approach seems to be that no error, however egregious, is.

The report chronicled errors of omission and commission -- and episodes of inexplicable forgetfulness -- that are widespread and bipartisan. It concluded that "the weight of the evidence" is that House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) was warned about Mr. Foley's "overly friendly" e-mails and that Mr. Hastert's chief of staff, Scott Palmer, his denials notwithstanding, had confronted Mr. Foley about his behavior years earlier. It described how Rep. Jim Kolbe (R-Ariz.) didn't respond forcefully enough when told by a former page in 2000 that Mr. Foley had sent the page a sexually graphic instant message; once the scandal broke and the page asked Mr. Kolbe what he should do if questioned by authorities, Mr. Kolbe told him that "it is best that you don't even bring this up."

The committee found that the e-mails were treated -- by operatives on both sides -- as a potential political issue, not as one of moral responsibility. Assessing the conduct of Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) and House campaign committee chairman Thomas M. Reynolds (R-N.Y.), the panel found, "Like too many others, neither the Majority Leader nor Rep. Reynolds showed any curiosity regarding why a young former page would have been made uncomfortable by e-mails from Rep. Foley." And Democrats who obtained the e-mails, notably Democratic Caucus communications director Matt Miller, saw them as a political weapon, trying to sell the story to wary reporters.

The ethics committee concluded that none of this rose to the level of conduct that, in the words of the relevant rule, failed to reflect creditably on the House. This conclusion fails to reflect creditably on the ethics committee.

Desperately Seeking Ethics (NYT)

The New York Times, December 9, 2006

Watching our elected leaders in action, it's not surprising that Americans wonder if there is any limit to the crass misbehavior that members of Congress are willing to tolerate from their colleagues to protect their privileges and hold on to their own jobs. The House ethics committee answered that question yesterday with a resounding "No."

Sixty-four days after it promised to find out who knew about Representative Mark Foley's wildly inappropriate, sexually predatory behavior with teenage House pages, and why they failed to stop it, the bipartisan committee produced a report yesterday that was a 91-page exercise in cowardice.

The report's authors were clearly more concerned about protecting the members of the House than the young men and women under their charge in the page program. And they made absolutely no effort to define the high standard of behavior that should be required of all members of Congress and their staffs.

The report concludes that evidence of Mr. Foley's "creepy" interest in young male pages dated back to 1999. One woman who worked with the pages took to shadowing Mr. Foley when he was around them. The report makes clear that Mr. Foley's misconduct became known to an ever-widening circle of his colleagues and their aides, including Speaker Dennis Hastert. But no one made any serious attempt to stop Mr. Foley or reveal his misdeeds. A few urged him to cut it out, for political reasons, but did not follow up.

The committee concluded that other people preferred to remain willfully ignorant — to protect Mr. Foley's secret homosexuality, to avoid partisan embarrassment or for other political reasons.

But even after all that, the report said that none of this amounted to the sort of behavior that might discredit the House of Representatives and thus violate ethics rules. The committee, which never heard from Mr. Foley, did not call for disciplinary action against current members of the House or their staffs. The committee said those who have already left, like Mr. Foley, were no longer its problem.

DOJ_NMG_0105128

The panel's justification for inaction is a breathtaking exercise in sophistry: "the requirement that House members and staff act at all times in a manner that reflects creditably on the House does not mean that every error in judgment or failure to exercise greater oversight or diligence" is a violation.

No, not every error or failure should be a violation, but certainly the ones that lead to an elected official's sexually stalking teenage boys while his colleagues turn a blind eye or cover it up should be. We'd set the bar at least there. Apparently, it's too high for the House.

Senators To Gather In Closed Meeting (WP)

By Charles Babington

The Washington Post, December 9, 2006

Senate Democrats, who campaigned on a pledge of more openness in government, will kick off the 110th Congress with a closed meeting of all 100 senators in the Capitol.

Sen. Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.), who will be the majority leader when the new Congress convenes Jan. 4, announced yesterday "a joint caucus meeting" for senators only, to be held that morning in the old Senate chamber, a cozy, seldom-used room.

The gathering "will allow senators an opportunity to meet before the Senate is in session and before any official legislative business is considered," Reid's office said. "The American people made clear they are tired of partisanship and gridlock in Washington."

Sen. Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.), who will be the minority leader, endorsed the plan.

The Senate's Democratic and Republican caucuses often meet separately and in private for lunches and meetings throughout the congressional session. But meetings of the full Senate that exclude the news media and the public are relatively rare, and most often involve matters of national security or impeachments.

Last year, Senate Democrats used a parliamentary tactic to force a brief closed session to protest delays in the intelligence committee's report on the use of classified information leading to the Iraq war.

Reid's staff said that the planned joint caucus will not amount to a legislative session because no business will be conducted and that it will probably occur before the new Congress officially opens. But Lucy Dalglish, executive director of the Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press, called it a bad precedent.

"When you get all 100 members of the Senate in a room, that's no longer a caucus. That's the Senate," she said. "I think the American people will see through that. I think the only way to restore public trust in what the Congress is up to is to have more transparency than less."

In their fall campaigns, which resulted in the takeover of the House and the Senate, Democrats said Republicans were insufficiently transparent in their legislative activities, and they vowed to do better. "I think it's very important we have openness," Reid said on CBS News's "Face the Nation" on Nov. 12. He called for greater congressional oversight, which "means finding out what government is doing."

Reid spokesman Jim Manley said yesterday: "All we're trying to do is establish a dialogue as we start the next Congress. . . . It's obvious from recent years that the current system is not working. We need to foster some different ways to make this place work."

Dalglish said: "If they set a precedent, it becomes easier and easier. Then they say, 'If you want us to get along and be efficient, we have to meet in secret.' "

Bipartisan Caucus Proposal Raises Questions About Barring Press (RC)

By John Stanton, Erin P. Billings

Roll Call, December 8, 2006

Incoming Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) and Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) have proposed opening the next session of Congress with an unprecedented "caucus" meeting of the entire Senate in order to discuss areas of common agreement and a renewed bipartisan spirit, but without the eye of the public or the press.

DOJ_NMG_0105129

Although Reid and McConnell came up with the idea of a bipartisan caucus meeting as a way to bring about a greater sense of bipartisanship in the Senate, it has raised questions about the appropriateness of barring the press from a meeting of the entire Senate during which lawmakers could essentially map out the year's legislative activities for the year in advance.

In recent years, Congressional leaders have come under scrutiny for putting pressure on their colleagues to vote a certain way or to drop their objections in informal meetings away from public watch — mostly notably the House Medicare vote during which GOP leaders arm-twisted conservatives on the House floor to back the bill during and the hours-long vote.

The proposed meeting appears to differ significantly from formal closed sessions of the Senate, according to two September Congressional Research Service reports. For instance, while closed-door meetings of the Senate generally occur in order to discuss either impeachment proceedings or national security issues, the bipartisan caucus meeting would involve a wide range of issues and could touch on virtually any aspect of next year's legislative work.

Additionally, closed-door sessions require that members and staff be sworn to secrecy — a requirement that spokesmen for McConnell and Reid both said would not be made during the Caucus meeting.

Reid spokesman Jim Manley rejected any possibility of impropriety and said that lawmakers would not engage in legislative negotiations. "All it is, is a chance for Members to discuss the hopes and desires to work on a bipartisan basis. Nothing more, nothing less," Manley said. He also rejected the notion that any effort to coordinate a pre-determined outcome to debates could occur during the meetings, saying, "Given the way Washington has worked in recent years, to it highly unlikely would be charitable. The fact is, it ain't going to happen."

A McConnell spokesman agreed, arguing that, "it's not an opportunity to craft legislation. It's an opportunity to get together and realize they don't all hate each other." The spokesman also pointed out that if Members were to attend a Senators-only dinner it is unlikely the same questions would be raised. "I don't think anybody would be concerned about them having a giant Senators-only dinner."

New Senate Schedules Closed Meeting (AP)

By Laurie Kellman

AP, December 8, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) -- The first thing the new, Democratic-led Senate will do next year is meet in a closed "bipartisan caucus" to help set a more pleasant tone than the relentless backbiting of the Congress now heading home, party leaders said Friday.

Far from lawmakers conducting business in secret -- as open-government advocates warn -- the meeting would serve only to sweep away grudges and smooth the way for more action, the leaders said.

"We won't always agree but can sit down, side by side, and forge consensus on the issues important to the American people," incoming Majority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada said in a joint statement with his Republican counterpart, Mitch McConnell of Kentucky.

McConnell said, "Republicans intend to be as cooperative as possible to help the Senate get off to a good start next year."

Spokesmen for the lawmakers said the meeting would not amount to a closed session of the Senate under the chamber's rules.

However, any meeting of 100 senators with rules of any kind is by definition a meeting of the Senate, said Brian Darling, director of Senate relations for The Heritage Foundation.

"It would be a de facto meeting of the Senate and although they want to call it something else, it is," Darling said.

"To set up something and to plan something between the leaders is very unusual and should be subject to open government rules," he added. "Their intentions are good, but the results of what they're doing will be not good for the American people."

The Jan. 4 meeting, to be held in the hours before the new Democratic majority formally opens the 110th Congress, will take place in the Old Senate Chamber. It would be the first meeting of the full Senate in the historic room since President Clinton's 1999 impeachment trial.

DOJ_NMG_0105130

The plans were disclosed Friday, as a Congress still under Republican control was being accused by Democrats of being a "do-nothing" institution.

The gathering could establish a precedent expanding the kinds of "executive sessions" that up to now have been relatively rare.

Still, McConnell spokesman Don Stewart likened the proposal to closed weekly policy lunches that the Republican and Democratic caucuses hold separately.

"We won't be transacting legislative business," Stewart said.

The Senate met in private until 1794 in the belief that its role providing counsel to the executive branch compelled closed proceedings.

Since 1929, the Senate has held 54 closed sessions, generally for reasons of national security, according to a Sept. 27 report of the Congressional Research Service. Democrats last year forced a closed session of the Senate to discuss Iraq war intelligence.

Closed sessions of the Senate are held periodically to discuss specific, sensitive business, such as impeachment deliberations, matters of national security and sensitive communications from the president, according to the report by the Congressional Research Service.

Members and staff who attend the meetings have been prohibited from divulging details, and transcripts have not been published unless the chamber votes to release them.

Filner Captures Veterans' Affairs Gavel (RC)

By Jennifer Yachnin

Roll Call, December 8, 2006

After successfully beating back a challenge from Rep. Mike Michaud (D-Maine) on Friday, Rep. Bob Filner (D-Calif.) will become chairman of the Veterans' Affairs Committee in the 110th Congress.

The full Democratic Caucus confirmed Filner to the post in a 112-69 vote following a brief meeting in the House Rayburn Office Building.

The Democratic Steering and Policy Committee heard from both lawmakers Thursday and voted 24-20 in favor of Filner. But the close split allowed for the full Caucus, which must ratify Steering's recommendations, to nominate candidates from the floor.

Rep. Barbara Lee (D-Calif.), who seconded Filner's nomination, cited his long service on the Veterans' Affairs panel, where he has served since his election in 1992.

"He has a passion and a sense of justice for our veterans," Lee said.

As the second-most senior member of the committee, Filner had been widely considered the obvious choice to succeed retiring Rep. Lane Evans (D-Ill). Although the Steering panel considers a variety of factors when selecting chairmen, seniority is seen widely as playing a significant role in those decisions.

Democrats have elevated the majority of their current ranking members to chairmanships in the next Congress — only the Veterans' Affairs challenge prompted a formal competition — and incoming Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) is expected to name chairmen to the House Administration Committee, Committee on Standards of Official Conduct and the Joint Committee on Taxation next week.

McKinney's Parting Shot: Bill To Impeach Bush (AP)

AP, December 8, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) -- In what was likely her final legislative act in Congress, outgoing Georgia Rep. Cynthia McKinney announced a bill Friday to impeach President Bush.

The legislation has no chance of passing and serves as a symbolic parting shot not only at Bush but also at Democratic leaders. Incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-California, has made clear that she will not entertain proposals to sanction Bush and has warned the liberal wing of her party against making political hay of impeachment.

DOJ_NMG_0105131

McKinney, a Democrat who drew national headlines in March when she struck a Capitol police officer, has long said that Bush was never legitimately elected. In introducing her legislation in the final hours of the current Congress, she said Bush had violated his oath of office to defend the Constitution and the nation's laws.

In the bill, she accused Bush of misleading Congress on the war in Iraq and violating privacy laws with his domestic spying program.

McKinney has made no secret of her frustration with Democratic leaders since voters ousted her from office in the Democratic primary this summer. In a speech Monday at George Washington University, she accused party leaders of kowtowing to Republicans on the war in Iraq and on military mistreatment of prisoners.

McKinney, who has not discussed her career plans, has increasingly embraced her image as a controversial figure.

She has served as host for numerous panels on September 11 conspiracy theories and suggested that Bush had prior knowledge of the terrorist attacks but kept quiet about it to allow friends to profit from the aftermath. She introduced legislation to establish a permanent collection of rapper Tupac Shakur's recordings at the National Archives and calling for a federal investigation into his killing.

But it was her scuffle with a Capitol police officer that drew the most attention. McKinney struck the officer when he tried to stop her from entering a congressional office building. The officer did not recognize McKinney, who was not wearing her member lapel pin.

A grand jury in Washington declined to indict McKinney over the clash, but she eventually apologized before the House.

Billions Later, Plan To Remake The Coast Guard Fleet Stumbles (NYT)

By Eric Lipton

The New York Times, December 9, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 8 — Four years after the Coast Guard began an effort to replace nearly its entire fleet of ships, planes and helicopters, the modernization program heralded as a model of government innovation is foundering.

The initial venture — converting rusting 110-foot patrol boats, the workhorses of the Coast Guard, into more versatile 123-foot cutters — has been canceled after hull cracks and engine failures made the first eight boats unseaworthy.

Plans to build a new class of 147-foot ships with an innovative hull have been halted after the design was found to be flawed.

And the first completed new ship — a $564 million behemoth christened last month — has structural weaknesses that some Coast Guard engineers believe may threaten its safety and limit its life span, unless costly repairs are made.

The problems have helped swell the costs of the fleet-building program to a projected $24 billion, from $17 billion, and delayed the arrival of any new ships or aircraft.

That has compromised the Coast Guard's ability to fulfill its mission, which greatly expanded after the 2001 attacks to include guarding the nation's shores against terrorists. The service has been forced to cut back on patrols and, at times, ignore tips from other federal agencies about drug smugglers. The difficulties will only grow more acute in the next few years as old boats fail and replacements are not ready.

Adm. Thad W. Allen, who took over as Coast Guard commandant in May, acknowledged that the program had been troubled and said that he had begun to address the problems. "You will see changes shortly in the Coast Guard in our acquisition organization," Admiral Allen said. "It will be significantly different than we have done in the past."

The modernization effort was a bold experiment, called Deepwater, to build the equivalent of a modest navy — 91 new ships, 124 small boats, 195 new or rebuilt helicopters and planes and 49 unmanned aerial vehicles.

Instead of doing it piecemeal, the Coast Guard decided to package everything, in hopes that the fleet would be better integrated and its multibillion price would command attention from a Congress and White House traditionally more focused on other military branches. And instead of managing the project itself, the Coast Guard hired Lockheed Martin and Northrop Grumman, two of the nation's largest military contractors, to plan, supervise and deliver the new vessels and helicopters.

Many retired Coast Guard officials, former company executives and government auditors fault that privatization model, saying it allowed the contractors at times to put their interests ahead of the Guard's.

"This is the fleecing of America," said Anthony D'Armiento, a systems engineer who has worked for Northrop and the Coast Guard on the project. "It is the worst contract arrangement I've seen in all my 20 plus years in naval engineering."

Insufficient oversight by the Coast Guard resulted in the service buying some equipment it did not want and ignoring repeated warnings from its own engineers that the boats and ships were poorly designed and perhaps unsafe, the agency acknowledged. The Deepwater program's few Congressional skeptics were outmatched by lawmakers who became enthusiastic supporters, mobilized by an aggressive lobbying campaign financed by Lockheed and Northrop.

And the contractors failed to fulfill their obligation to make sure the government got the best price, frequently steering work to their subsidiaries or business partners instead of competitors, according to government auditors and people affiliated with the program.

Even some of the smaller Deepwater projects raise questions about management. The radios placed in small, open boats were not waterproof and immediately shorted out, for example. Electronics equipment costing millions of dollars is still being installed in the new cutter, even though it will be ripped out because the Coast Guard does not want it. An order of eight small, inflatable boats cost an extra half-million dollars because the purchase passed through four layers of contractors.

For the Department of Homeland Security, which took over responsibility for the Coast Guard in 2003, Deepwater joins its already long list of troubled programs, including its airport checkpoint measures, its biodefense efforts and its widely condemned handling of the response to Hurricane Katrina.

The Homeland Security Department's inspector general has warned that the department cannot repeat this experience as it begins a $7 billion plan to tighten the border. The department is taking a similar management approach with that plan, relying on the Boeing Corporation to develop, supervise and execute the strategy.

Spokesmen for Northrop and Lockheed, and the partnership they formed to run Deepwater, declined repeated requests for interviews, saying they would leave it to the Coast Guard to discuss the project. The companies also declined to respond to written questions.

Admiral Allen said the Coast Guard engineers and procurement staff team would now play a much larger role in overseeing the project in an effort to rein in its private sector partners, adding that the mistakes made were unacceptable.

"Our people are demoralized by it, they don't deserve it, and it really impedes our ability to execute our mission," he said.

Early Warnings

On a clear, calm morning in Key West, Fla., one day last month — perfect weather for running drugs and migrants — six of the eight converted Coast Guard patrol boats were broken down or out of service. Their crews had little to do but shine the ships' already gleaming bells and clean its guns.

The Deepwater plan called for transforming the 110-foot boats into larger, more versatile cutters with rebuilt hulls, new communications and surveillance gear and a 13-foot extension to make room for a small boat launch ramp.

Even before the refurbishing began in 2003, though, Coast Guard engineers expressed doubts that the boats could bear the extra weight the changes would impose. "You could have buckling of the structure of the ship," Chris Cleary, of the Engineering Logistics Center at the Coast Guard, said he recalls pointing out. But Bollinger Shipyards, a business partner of Northrop and Lockheed, insisted the conversion would succeed.

As the work got under way, the Coast Guard provided only limited oversight. It did not fill dozens of its seats on joint management teams set up for the project. And the Coast Guard assigned seven inspectors to monitor the work, compared with 20 on a similar-size job.

"In theory, we were going drive a 110-foot cutter up to the pier, drop it off and come back in 34 weeks to pick up a 123-foot cutter," said Lt. Benjamin Fleming, the Coast Guard's representative at the shipyard in Lockport, La. "We were putting a lot of trust and faith in our partners."

Michael De Kort, a former Lockheed project manager, said the results quickly became apparent.

The VHF radio on the small launch would be exposed to the elements but was not waterproof, Mr. De Kort said. The classified communications equipment had not been properly shielded to protect messages from eavesdropping. Cameras intended to provide 360-degree surveillance had two large blind spots.

DOJ_NMG_0105133

Mr. De Kort said he had repeatedly warned his Lockheed supervisors of the problems, but was rebuffed. “We have an approved design and we aren’t going to change it,” Mr. De Kort said he was told. He was later laid off from the company. Lockheed officials declined to comment.

In September 2004, more serious flaws in the boat conversion program became obvious after the first one, the Matagorda, was launched. As it traveled in relatively heavy seas from Key West to Miami, large cracks appeared in the hull and deck.

Giant steel straps that looked like Band-Aids were affixed to the side of the boats, and the vessels were barred from venturing out in rough water. But cracks and bulges continued to scar the Matagorda and other converted ships, followed by a series of mechanical problems.

Bollinger, it turned out, had overestimated how much stress the modified boats could handle, a miscalculation it cannot fully explain. “The computer broke for some reason,” said T. R. Hamlin, a senior Bollinger manager. “Whether it was a power surge or something, who knows?” The cursory oversight by the Coast Guard meant the mistake was not caught in time.

After spending about $100 million on the first eight boats, the Coast Guard suspended the conversion plan. Last week, Admiral Allen ordered the boats taken out of service, citing concerns about crew safety.

Facing a shortage of patrol boats, the contractors and the Coast Guard decided to speed development of a larger ship, the Fast Response Cutter. The hull was to be built from glass-reinforced plastic, known as a composite, something never tried on a large American military ship.

While acknowledging that it might cost much more to build the 58 planned cutters with composite hulls instead of steel, Northrop and Lockheed claimed the boats would last longer and require less maintenance, saving money over the long run.

Coast Guard engineers again were doubtful that Northrop’s design would work, citing concerns about weight, hull shape and fuel consumption. The Coast Guard also found inconsistencies in the cost data Northrop used to justify the new hull.

One former Northrop executive said the company was pushing the plan not because it was in the best interest of the Coast Guard, but because Northrop had just spent $64 million to turn its shipyard in Gulfport, Miss., into the country’s first large-scale composite hull manufacturing plant for military ships.

“It was a pure business decision,” said the former executive, who disagreed with the plan and would speak only anonymously for fear of retribution. “And it was the wrong one.”

That became clear when a scale model of the Fast Response Cutter was placed in a tank of water — and flunked the test. After three years and $38 million, Northrop Grumman’s plan was suspended.

Financial Aid

The Coast Guard recognized from the start that it might need help financing a project as big as Deepwater, and that was part of the reason it turned to Lockheed and Northrop.

“They have armies of lobbyists, they can help get dollars to get the job done,” explained Jim McEntire, a retired captain who had served as a senior Coast Guard budget official. “The White House and Congress listen to big industrial concerns.”

That assistance would prove valuable. Just months after the contract was awarded in June 2002 through a competitive bidding process, the Coast Guard began to study whether the $17 billion Deepwater budget would be inadequate, given additional costs for antiterrorism equipment. In 2005, the service informed Congress that the program would cost $24 billion over 20 years and that the annual allocation would need to double, to $1 billion.

By then, though, the patrol boat conversion had been halted. Deepwater’s costs were ballooning, but the Coast Guard was having a hard time explaining exactly how it would spend more money. Government auditors were starting to churn out reports warning of serious management weaknesses.

That record disturbed some members of Congress. In May 2005, the House Appropriations Committee slashed the program’s annual budget request nearly in half to register its frustration.

At a hearing two months later, Representative Harold Rogers, a Kentucky Republican who oversees the Homeland Security budget, instructed the Coast Guard to fix its problems and restrain costs. “You simply took the most expensive, all-inclusive Cadillac Seville and we’re going to have to, with our limited funds, fit you into something a bit more appropriate,” Mr. Rogers said. “I hope it’s more than a Chevrolet.”

DOJ_NMG_0105134

To fight back, the Coast Guard and contractors relied on Congressional allies, led by Senator Olympia J. Snowe, Republican of Maine, Representative Frank A. LoBiondo, Republican of New Jersey, and Representative Gene Taylor, Democrat of Mississippi.

Mr. Taylor and Mr. LoBiondo had formed a group called the Congressional Coast Guard Caucus. It began in the late 1990s with 4 members and today has more than 75.

The enthusiasm of the three leaders for the Deepwater project was not simply about meeting the Coast Guard's needs. Maine is home to Bath Iron Works, a major ship builder that Ms. Snowe said might benefit from increased Deepwater spending. While that was a factor, she said it was not her primary motivation.

Ms. Snowe and Mr. LoBiondo, the leaders of the Senate and House panels that oversee the Coast Guard, said they pushed for more spending only after the service's leaders reassured them during hearings that they were addressing the program's problems. They both also said they were convinced that the Coast Guard desperately needed Deepwater because its helicopter engines were routinely breaking down and the hulls of old ships were failing.

"We don't want to waste money; we don't want ineffective programs," Ms. Snowe said in an interview. "At the same time, we can't allow the Coast Guard to languish."

Mr. Taylor's district is home to Northrop Grumman's shipyard in Pascagoula, Miss., which is building the Coast Guard's largest ship, and Northrop and its employees are one of his biggest sources of campaign contributions. He worked along with two key Republicans in Mississippi — Senator Trent Lott, whose father was once a pipe fitter at the Pascagoula shipyard, and Senator Thad Cochran, the chairman of the Senate appropriations committee — to win more money.

Mr. LoBiondo's district is home to the Coast Guard's national training center, and Lockheed Martin built its Deepwater equipment testing center just outside his district. He is also one of the top Congressional recipients of Lockheed contributions.

The contractors ran advertisements aimed at lawmakers in Washington publications, delivering ominous messages about the need to stop terrorists before they reach American shores. The Navy League, a nonprofit group partly financed by Lockheed and Northrop, orchestrated telephone calls, letters and visits to lawmakers, reminding them that hundreds of contractors across the country were already working as suppliers on the project.

And the Coast Guard got an important boost when it was widely praised for its helicopter rescues after Hurricane Katrina.

The lobbying effort paid off. In September 2005, Congress agreed to increase the annual financing for Deepwater to nearly $1 billion.

Late Scramble

If there was a single ship that could prove to skeptics that the Coast Guard and its contractors could get the job done right, it would be the National Security Cutter, a ship unlike anything the Coast Guard had ever built. Bigger than any existing cutter, it was more like a warship, designed to patrol with Navy vessels.

It would carry sophisticated weapons systems, surveillance equipment, a helicopter and two unmanned aerial vehicles, all vital in its effort to intercept boats suspected of carrying terrorists, drug dealers or illegal immigrants. It was designed to monitor 56,000 square miles a day, an area four times as large as that covered by any other Coast Guard ship.

Because the ship was so expensive — each was expected to cost about $300 million — the Coast Guard decided to build only 8 to replace its fleet of 12 large cutters.

There was just one catch. Even before the cutter began taking form at the Pascagoula shipyard on the Gulf of Mexico, familiar problems cropped up.

The Coast Guard's engineers believed the design proposed by Northrop and Lockheed had serious structural flaws that could result in the hull collapsing or premature cracking of the hull and deck, according to Mr. Cleary and his boss, Rubin Sheinberg, chief of the Coast Guard's naval architecture branch.

When they alerted the contractors and Coast Guard officials, they were largely brushed off, the men said. In March 2004, their supervisor protested, saying the Coast Guard should delay construction.

"Significant problems persist with the structural design," Rear Adm. Erroll M. Brown wrote to the Deepwater project director. "Several of these problems compromise the safety and the viability of the hull, possibly resulting in structural failure and unacceptable hull vibration."

DOJ_NMG_0105135

The Coast Guard decided to move ahead anyway, figuring it would be less disruptive to fix any problems later. As the shipbuilding progressed, other Coast Guard officials began to openly complain that some decisions by the contractors appeared to be motivated by a drive to increase profits, not to best serve the Coast Guard.

Lockheed, for example, ordered computerized consoles for the ship that it had developed for a Navy aircraft carrier. But they were too big for the cutter, said Jay A. Creech, a retired Coast Guard captain working as a contractor on Deepwater.

A consultant hired by the Coast Guard to review Northrop and Lockheed's purchasing decisions found that of $210 million worth of contracts awarded in 2004, just 30 percent involved a formal competitive process. Northrop in particular was faulted for failing to aggressively seek bids to ensure the best price.

Northrop and Lockheed "lack the independence needed to make objective decisions in the best interests of the Coast Guard," an August 2006 report by the Homeland Security inspector general said.

Others say that giving the contractors so much authority was a mistake from the start. "A contractor with a profit motive is never a trusted agent," said Joe Ryan, a Coast Guard consultant who has helped with the Deepwater project. "They are the vendor, and they are selling you something."

Problems began to accumulate elsewhere. In Texas, a prototype of the unmanned aerial vehicle that was to be placed on the ship's deck crashed this year. After the crash, the project, by Bell Helicopter, also faced a money crunch and was put on hold, pushing delivery back to at least 2013, six years after the first national security cutter is scheduled for active duty. Without the two aerial vehicles, the cutter's surveillance range is reduced by more than half.

By the time the ship was christened last month, its price had grown to $564 million, nearly twice its original cost. (The average price for the eight ships is expected to be $431 million.) And by then, Coast Guard officials had conceded that the ship had structural flaws. Navy experts had evaluated the ship and confirmed many of the earlier warnings.

Admiral Allen said he had been given assurances that the ship was not at risk of a catastrophic hull failure and would not pose a safety threat to its crew. But the Coast Guard has decided to make structural modifications to the vessel and require design changes for the third cutter. Work is too far along to change course on the second cutter.

Four years into the Deepwater project, the Coast Guard, according to its original plan, was supposed to have 26 new or rebuilt ships, 12 new planes and 8 unmanned vehicles, but none are available. Now, officials are scrambling to find an off-the-shelf design for a new cutter and make modest repairs to keep their aging patrol boats operable.

"We don't have the ships we need, and we don't have a way to get them anytime soon," said Representative David R. Obey, Democrat of Wisconsin, who will take over the House Appropriations Committee next month. "It's inexcusable."

The Coast Guard, which would not disclose the management fees it has paid Northrop and Lockheed, is renegotiating the contract to ensure that the companies honor a commitment to open the work to competition and deliver what they promise.

And Admiral Allen and other Coast Guard officials say the Coast Guard's engineers are being given more power to supervise the work. Admiral Allen is also creating a division to oversee the procurement and maintenance of its ships and airplanes. "That is the main gap that needs to be closed," he said.

The Deepwater experiment, one contracting expert said, underscores the need for the Coast Guard to be a smart buyer, even if it has hired high-priced advice.

"The government still needs to be in there so they know what decisions are being made and if the decisions are in their best interest," said Michele Mackin, an assistant director at the Government Accountability Office. "It is still their money. And they are going to be flying the planes and running the ships."

Federal Budget Tricky Checks And Balances (WSJ)

By Deborah Solomon

The Wall Street Journal, December 9, 2006

Bush administration officials have begun grappling with one of the toughest tasks they face over the next two years: How to both protect the president's tax cuts and put the federal budget deficit on a sustainable path.

They will get a new measure of just how hard that will be on Tuesday, when the Treasury Department releases its latest budget tally. The numbers likely will show little progress in shrinking the deficit despite a growing economy. For the first two months of the fiscal year that began Oct. 1, the government is expected to show a deficit of about $122 billion -- $9 billion less than the same period last year.

Showing progress on the deficit is crucial as the White House heads toward early February. That is when it is due to release the budget for fiscal-year 2008, which begins Oct. 1, 2007. Its big challenge will be to squeeze in spending for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, the rising costs of Medicare and the expanding, Bush-backed tax cuts -- without making the previously projected deficit of $188 billion for 2008 look worse.

With Democrats in control, President Bush is both on the defensive in making his tax cuts permanent and facing pressure from his fellow Republicans to show a path toward spending restraint. "This will be the tightest budget the president proposes, as well as the most difficult Congress he will face in passing a budget," says Brian Riedl of the conservative Heritage Foundation.

The White House has to decide which tax breaks to throw in the budget and which to leave out on the assumption that Congress will deal with them. The budget will assume that the tax cuts, which expire in 2009 and 2010, will become permanent, though nothing needs to happen during the crucial 2008 election year to ensure that. Extending tax breaks next year will be tougher than in the past if Democrats stick to their pledge to offset the cost with other tax increases or spending cuts.

Some moves have bipartisan support, such as preventing the alternative minimum tax -- a backstop designed to stop the rich from avoiding any taxes -- from taking ever-bigger bites out of the wallets of middle-class taxpayers. But the Bush budget likely will be silent, again, on how to resolve that permanently.

Spending on Iraq and Afghanistan is particularly thorny. So far, those costs haven't been part of the regular budget process, haven't been fully reflected in White House budgets or deficit projections and have been funded through special appropriations bills. But Democrats are expected to demand that Mr. Bush change that. They got a boost this past week from the report by the Baker-Hamilton commission, which said "the normal budget process should not be circumvented" and urged the White House to include Iraq funding in the 2008 budget.

"It's going to be tough for them," says Douglas Holtz-Eakin, a former Congressional Budget Office director who recently enlisted with Sen. John McCain's presidential campaign. But with Democrats in control, he notes, the White House also has the time-honored option of sending up a budget that would essentially be "dead on arrival."

Jobs Data Keep Economic Optimists Smiling (WSJ)

By Christopher Conkey

The Wall Street Journal, December 9, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Solid hiring and an unemployment rate still near a five-year low reinforced the upbeat view of optimists, including the Federal Reserve, that the economy is weathering the downturn in the housing and automotive sectors.

Payrolls outside agriculture rose by 132,000 jobs last month, and revisions added 42,000 jobs to previous payroll estimates for September and October, so monthly gains in the past three months have remained near this year's average of 149,000. The unemployment rate edged up slightly to 4.5% in November from 4.4%. Unrounded, the increase was even smaller: from 4.42% to 4.47%.

Layoffs in construction and manufacturing -- in particular, the auto industry -- were more than offset by gains in business services, health care and tourism, the Labor Department said.

"This just confirms what the Fed's been thinking," said Drew Matus, senior economist at Lehman Brothers in New York. "The economy is currently experiencing weakness in two specific sectors, and the weakness hasn't spread."

Mr. Matus expects the current slowdown, with economic growth of an annualized 2% to 3%, slightly below its normal range, to continue well into next year, as the housing and auto sectors slowly recover.

Futures markets have priced in a total of three-quarters of a percentage point in rate cuts in the next year on the view the Fed will have to come to the rescue of a weakening economy. But Joshua Shapiro, chief U.S. economist at MFR Inc., said Friday's "goldilocks" report would make the Fed "increasingly comfortable" with keeping the federal-funds rate at 5.25% -- charged on overnight loans between banks -- when it meets next week. Indeed, investors trimmed the odds of rate cuts a bit Friday.

DOJ_NMG_0105137

Until recently, economists widely assumed a normally expanding economy would need to create 150,000 jobs a month to keep up with the increase in the working-age population. Growth above that would push the unemployment rate lower, and growth below that would push it higher.

But with population growth slowing, the work force aging, and women entering the labor market at a slower pace, Fed economists now think monthly job growth of only about 110,000 is sufficient to keep unemployment stable.

Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke last month cited "tight" labor markets as a potential inflation threat. November's healthy job growth and an unemployment rate still below where Fed officials expected it to be at this point mean those concerns are unlikely to ease soon.

Indeed, a tight labor market is still pushing up wages. Average hourly earnings rose 0.2% in November, and were 4.1% higher than a year ago, giving a boost to "real," or inflation-adjusted, wages.

Roger Taylor, vice president of strategic staffing for insurer MetLife Inc., said wages of new hires in many auditing, actuarial and management positions are up between 8% and 10% from a year ago. "It's been a bit harder to find the quality of skills we're looking for in the available labor pool," Mr. Taylor said. "It's costing us more to get the talent we're looking for."

In recent years, Mr. Taylor said the company has typically hired around 4,000 people for nonsales positions. This year it is on track to bring on 5,000 new hires.

Business and professional services -- such as accountants, management consultants and architects -- added 43,000 jobs last month and more than 400,000 in the past year. The auditing firm Deloitte & Touche USA has added 10,000 workers in the past year, and plans to do the same in the year ahead. Among the positions it is filling are managers and senior managers for its consulting and tax practices.

By contrast, manufacturers cut 15,000 jobs last month, and construction companies pared 29,000 workers from their payrolls. Zoltan Pozsar, an economist with Moody's Economy.com, estimates that there have been roughly 126,000 housing-related jobs lost since June, but that the economy has added nearly one million nonhousing-related positions in that period.

Meanwhile, the University of Michigan's survey of consumer sentiment declined slightly to 90.2 in early December from 92.1 in November. Assessments of current conditions improved, but the outlook for the economy down the road worsened. Economists said they still expect consumers to keep spending enough to keep the economy expanding, particularly if the labor market continues to lift incomes.

Labor Pool Increases, Boosting Joblessness (WP)

By Nell Henderson

The Washington Post, December 9, 2006

Sometimes, an uptick in unemployment can be good news.

The jobless rate edged up to 4.5 percent in November from 4.4 percent in October -- but not primarily because of layoffs. The rate rose as hundreds of thousands of Americans who had previously dropped out of the labor force poured back in, drawn by brightening employment prospects. Most of them found work.

So the number of unemployed workers rose, but the number with jobs grew by more than twice as much, the Labor Department reported yesterday.

There was bad news last month for many workers. Home builders and manufacturers cut thousands of jobs, reflecting primarily the slumps in real estate and automobile production. But those losses were more than offset by the number of jobs gained in retailing, health care, education, finance and other service industries.

Employers added a net 132,000 workers to their payrolls last month, compared with a gain of 79,000 the month before. Wages for most workers rose modestly.

Yesterday's figures added to other recent signs that the economy is slowing because of the auto and housing industries, but their problems have not spilled over into other industries, analysts said. "The rest of the economy remains incredibly strong," said Eugenio J. AlemÃ¡n, senior economist at Wells Fargo.

DOJ_NMG_0105138

Other analysts were more skeptical, saying the labor market is bound to weaken as the economy slows. "The shake-out in housing-related employment is likely to get a lot worse in the coming months," said Paul Ashworth, senior economist with Capital Economics.

Stock prices rose yesterday on hopes that a solid job market will fuel steady increases in consumer spending and profits. The employment report also strengthened many investors' expectations that the Federal Reserve will leave short-term interest rates unchanged when policymakers meet Tuesday.

Fed Chairman Ben S. Bernanke said last month that the central bank remained concerned about rising labor costs and would consider raising interest rates again if necessary to tame inflation.

Bernanke's worries should ease somewhat. Workers' wages rose more slowly in November than in October, analysts said. Average hourly earnings rose 0.2 percent in November, to $16.94, and were 4.1 percent higher last month than a year earlier.

The combination of rising wages and plentiful jobs helped lure more people to the U.S. labor force last month. The labor force includes all those who hold jobs or who are actively looking for work.

That share of the adult population in the labor force -- called the participation rate -- rose in November to 66.3 percent, the highest since mid-2003. The record, 67.3 percent, was reached in early 2000, at the crest of the stock-market bubble.

The participation rate tends to rise in good times and fall in bad times, when workers get discouraged about their prospects and give up looking for work.

The unemployment rate -- the share of the labor force without jobs -- remains low by historical standards, but many analysts expect it to rise in coming months because of slowing economic growth.

US Jobs Data Support Bernanke's Optimism (FT)

By Krishna Guha, Eoin Callan, Tony Tassell

Financial Times, December 9, 2006

Ben Bernanke's optimism that the US economy is heading for a soft landing received a lift on Friday as data showing strong job creation last month forced more pessimistic bond investors into retreat.

The figures showed employers added more staff to payrolls than expected as 132,000 jobs were created, in spite of a slowdown in sectors such as construction.

The Fed thinks the market has over-reacted to recent negative data, and Friday's figures will encourage Mr Bernanke in his view that the economy overall remains reasonably robust, in spite of the drag from housing and some weakness in manufacturing.

Meanwhile, Hank Paulson hardened his rhetoric on China's currency ahead of leading a delegation of top US economic policymakers including Mr Bernanke to Beijing next week.

The Treasury secretary told CNBC "the rest of the world is not going to tolerate China taking too long to make the sort of adjustments in the currency that need to be made".

The dollar closed higher against the euro and the yen, with traders citing the strong jobs data and Mr Paulson's remarks on China.

The tougher talk from the Treasury secretary follows fresh pressure this week from Democrats in Congress and US manufacturers not to soft-pedal on the currency at next week's talks.

Mr Paulson advocates a long term strategic approach to dealing with China, but aides say he understands the need to show this approach is delivering results.

A Treasury official said on Friday that the currency would be a "key element" of next week's talks.

However, he said the dialogue would cover a wider range of long term issues relating to the rebalancing of China's economy and its integration with the world economy.

The official hinted that the summit could commission high-level bilateral working groups to look at issues such as energy security and the environment.

Intellectual property, financial sector liberalisation and cross-border investment flows will also be on the agenda, with China worried about opposition to its acquisition of US assets.

DOJ_NMG_0105139

Analysts said the US labour market data, which also gave some evidence of rising cost pressures, will prompt hawks on the Fed to argue that inflation remains a greater risk to the economy than a sharp slowdown.

The Fed is expected to keep interest rates on hold at its next policy meeting on Tuesday.

Bond markets have been pricing in a harder downturn than the Fed expects, betting it will be forced to cut rates in the first half of next year.

But more pessimistic investors scaled back their expectations of an imminent rate cut in the light of the new data. Futures markets were on Friday pricing in a 28 per cent chance of a quarter-point cut in the Fed funds rate by April, down from 45 per cent the day before.

Quincy Krosby, strategist for the Hartford financial services group, said the data shows "a gently slowing economy but not one that is falling off a cliff."

As Oil Stays High, Stocks Can't Get Going (WSJ)

By Peter A. McKay

The Wall Street Journal, December 9, 2006

As oil spigots flow freely, cash often pours into the stock market.

Both have dried up a bit lately. An October production cut by the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries has worked surprisingly well to prop up the commodity's price and stocks haven't moved ahead of recent highs.

The price of crude oil has jumped 5.2% since the Dow Jones Industrial Average hit a record on Nov. 17, as weekly reports from the federal Energy Information Administration have shown drawdowns in U.S. stockpiles of crude and fuels refined from it. On Friday, crude futures jumped $1.16 in morning trading, but finished the day off 46 cents, or 0.7%, at $62.03 a barrel, up 1.6% on the year at the New York Mercantile Exchange.

"A year ago, no one thought oil prices would be above $60 at this point," said energy analyst Fadel Gheit, of brokerage firm Oppenheimer & Co. "But what OPEC has done is demonstrate to the market that it is not bluffing, that it won't allow a repeat of 1998," when crude prices crashed.

Meanwhile, the Dow hasn't been able to push through its peak close, after setting a series of new records starting in early October. Although the blue-chip average rose 29.08 points, or 0.2% Friday, to 12307.49, it was hobbled in part by traders placing bets ahead of Thursday's meeting of the OPEC, which may announce another output cut. The Dow ended the week up 0.9%, but 35.07 points below its record.

With winter-energy demand likely to pick up in the U.S. and concerns lingering about war and political wrangling in major oil-producing countries, many commodity analysts don't see much room for prices to head significantly lower, as stock investors might hope. Higher energy prices tend to hurt stocks because higher costs for things like home heating oil and gasoline cut into consumers' purchasing power and, in turn, corporate profits.

Still, major market measures are up solidly for the year, with the Dow ahead nearly 15%, the S&P 500 up almost 13% and Nasdaq up nearly 11%. The broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index gained 2.55 points, or 0.2% Friday, to end at 1409.84, up 0.9% on the week. The technology-heavy Nasdaq Composite Index rose 0.4%, or 9.67 points, to 2437.36, up 1% on the week.

Energy prices are an important piece of an economic puzzle that will help determine the Federal Reserve's next move on interest rates, something else stock investors are watching closely because higher borrowing costs hit both consumers and businesses. As investors have tried to guess the central bank's likelihood of raising its benchmark rate target to keep inflation in check or cutting it to encourage growth, they have been confounded lately by mixed data on economic growth and manufacturing activity.

Jobs data released by the Labor Department on Friday were surprisingly strong. For November, nonfarm payrolls rose by 132,000 jobs, exceeding Wall Street's expectation for a rise of 110,000 jobs. The unemployment rate rose to 4.5% from 4.4%, in line with expectations.

The data confirmed many investors' belief that while economic growth is slowing, the decline in growth is gradual, which will minimize trauma to everyday workers and consumers and could encourage the Fed to keep rates stable. The rise in unemployment, obviously, is bad news for most people. But the total increase in jobs was good news.

DOJ_NMG_0105140

Some think the economic data mean good news for stocks going forward. "There's still a lot of uncertainty about the economy ahead," said strategist Douglas Peta of investment-management firm J&W Seligman.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks rose. Total trading volume for stocks listed on the New York Stock Exchange was 1.4 billion shares, as 711 million advanced and 622 million declined.

Bond prices fell. The 10-year note fell 18/32 point, or $5.63 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield up to 4.56%. The 30-year bond fell 29/32 to yield 4.67%.

The dollar strengthened. It rose to 116.35 yen, compared with 115.25 yen Thursday. The euro fell to $1.3204 from $1.3286.

The Accidental Inflation Hawk (WSJ)

By Marc Sumerlin

The Wall Street Journal, December 9, 2006

There are no Gentlemen C's in central banking. The costs of monetary policy mistakes are so large that you tend to be right or wrong. With this in mind, Ben Bernanke deserves an A for his first year as chairman of the Federal Reserve. The Bernanke Fed hasn't always been graceful or elegant, but it has been mostly right.

Mr. Bernanke started off with a stumble last April, testifying awkwardly that he might choose to stop raising rates even if inflation were at risk of accelerating. This statement, combined with his past fretting about deflation, led markets to question his fortitude on preventing inflation. Long-term inflation expectations promptly rose by 20 basis points. The chairman regained his footing with a hawkish speech two weeks later and two more rate hikes on the Federal Funds rate in May and June, bringing the rate to 5.25%. The hike in June wasn't an obvious one given the fragility in global financial markets, which had lost $5 trillion in value over the preceding seven weeks, due in part to diminished confidence in the new Fed chairman. But markets digested the last rate hike with only a bit of consternation and no more genuine turmoil.

At this point, it would have been tempting to go for another rate hike in August. A legitimate strategy for a new chairman is to build up inflation-fighting capital early in his term so that he can spend it when needed. In fact, a risk-weighted analysis of Mr. Bernanke's personal survival would have argued for hiking in August and cutting later if needed. But Mr. Bernanke appears to make fact-based decisions rather than strategy-based decisions. In this, the facts were slightly on the side of a pause. A seasoned chairman with ample credibility would surely have taken a break to see how the lagged impact of past rate increases was working.

By the August FOMC meeting, it was clear that the housing sector had rolled over. It was also clear from the size of the housing bubble, from an examination of historic corrections, and from collecting anecdotes, that the housing slide was going to be with us for years not months. In effect, the desired growth slowdown had been accomplished, likely with the move to a 5% federal-funds rate in May. Mr. Bernanke had gone one further, but a modest overshoot is almost always needed from a practical standpoint.

Still, the decision to pause was not obvious. While economic growth was decelerating, there were no signs at that point that inflation was coming under control. In fact, wages were accelerating according to the available data, which usually gives a central bank more room to tighten. What is most amazing in retrospect is that the first Fed chairman ever to advocate inflation targeting was pausing as inflation was high and possibly accelerating. A key critique of inflation targeting -- one to which I still subscribe -- is that the target could in practice lessen the Fed's ability to look far down the road. But in this case, Mr. Bernanke was not a slave to the latest figures and bet that inflation would subside. So while a belief in inflation targeting has not added value to the decision-making process, it hasn't done any harm so far.

At the time, many bond market participants were not impressed with the pause and started to question Mr. Bernanke's resilience again. The behind-the-back whispers were perceptible. Then a curious and unpredictable thing happened. Inflation stopped accelerating. After four months of hot data, prices started to behave better. Spot oil prices plunged after a gratefully mundane hurricane season, taking some pressure off headline inflation. I'm not sure if Mr. Bernanke is also a skilled weather forecaster, but he may be the first person to simultaneously predict the weather and the economy accurately. It's still not clear why prices outside of energy stopped accelerating -- the tightness of the labor markets and other facts in early August pointed to continued inflation trouble. But whether Mr. Bernanke was lucky or not is now beside the point for workers and investors who benefited from his call. Global equities started another long rally that more than made up for the springtime losses.

The upcoming December FOMC meeting will mark the fourth straight gathering without a change in monetary policy. That is proof in and of itself that Mr. Bernanke's decision to pause was reasonable. It is not, however, proof that Fed policy is correctly calibrated going forward.

Since the August pause, the housing and domestic auto industries have fallen into recession, and importantly, wage gains have been revised down. The bond market, the stock market and the currency markets are all betting that the Fed's next rate move will be down, even though the Fed tries to tell markets at every chance that a hike is more likely. The disconnect with the bond market is so large that Mr. Bernanke could wrap up his first full year with as much as a 100-basis-point inversion in the yield curve. Yet the tightening of policy relative to reality has created a stance sufficiently hawkish to rebuild inflation-fighting capital -- a welcome strategic development. In a sense, Mr. Bernanke has become an accidental hawk. This fortuitously earned capital is especially timely with the economy below its long-run sustainable growth rate. After all, a central banker never knows when he will need to cash in some chips.

FDA Panel Seeks Warning That Stents May Be Unsafe (WP)

By Rob Stein

The Washington Post, December 9, 2006

New drug-oozing stents widely used to prop open clogged arteries are associated with an increased risk of blood clots, heart attacks and death for the majority of patients receiving the devices, an expert panel concluded yesterday.

Based on the finding, the special 21-member Food and Drug Administration panel recommended that the agency issue new warnings to doctors and patients that the devices' safety has not been established except for relatively low-risk patients, for whom the stents were originally tested and approved.

"If you use the device outside that indication, you're going to have a higher incidence of complications," said William H. Maisel of the Beth Israel Deaconess Medical Center in Boston, who chaired the panel.

The panel stressed that the tiny metal-lattice struts, known as drug-eluting stents, offer advantages over older bare-metal versions for some patients, with the benefits outweighing the risks for the relatively healthy patients for whom the devices have been tested.

It remains unclear whether the devices are causing the complications in other patients; the side effects could be occurring because these patients tend to be sicker. But panel members concluded that until that question can be answered, doctors and patients should be alerted about the potential risks. Several members said they hoped that would make doctors more cautious about using the devices.

"Let's be more judicious about this. Let's be less indiscriminate," said Eric J. Topol of the Scripps Clinic in San Diego.

The panel also recommended that patients who have the stents take anti-clotting drugs for at least a year.

More than 6 million people worldwide have gotten the drug-coated devices, including perhaps 3 million in the United States. At least 800,000 new patients get them each year, making the stents the most common device used to treat heart disease and one of the most common medical procedures of any kind. The panel's recommendations apply to at least 60 percent of those patients.

The FDA is not bound to follow the recommendations, but an official said the agency would respond rapidly.

"There may be things that can be done relatively quickly," the FDA's Daniel G. Schultz said, noting that the warning could take the form of changes in the devices' labels and letters to doctors and patients.

The recommendations came on the second day of a sometimes contentious two-day meeting the FDA urgently convened to determine whether the risks of the devices outweigh the benefits.

The panel concluded that although the devices, compared with older bare-metal versions, may increase the risk of blood clots, drug-eluting stents do not appear to increase the overall risk of heart attacks and strokes when used in the kind of patients for whom they were originally intended. But a majority of patients get them "off-label," or not as intended, and tend to be sicker and have more-complicated conditions, such as diabetes, multiple blockages and blockages in narrower arteries.

In a packed hotel room in Gaithersburg yesterday, the panel listened to presentations from researchers from California, Illinois, North Carolina, Rhode Island, Washington and elsewhere who analyzed the latest data from large registries of patients who had received the stents since they were introduced three years ago. Although the results were mixed, several analyses found an increased risk of blood clots, deaths and heart attacks.

"Do we have evidence that the safety-efficacy balance might be different in the off-label? I think we've heard enough to suggest that that's the case," said Steven Nissen of the Cleveland Clinic.

More than 1 million U.S. heart patients undergo procedures every year to have blocked arteries opened with tiny balloons, after which stents are implanted to keep the vessels open. Scar tissue often grows around the stents, however, narrowing the arteries again and requiring patients to undergo the procedure repeatedly or to have bypass surgery.

The newer stents are coated with a polymer impregnated with drugs that are released slowly, inhibiting scar-tissue growth. Because the devices were shown to be highly effective, they were hailed as a major advance and quickly replaced bare-metal versions for most patients, though the newer stents were tested on and approved for only low-risk patients.

The FDA called for the meeting after studies looking at patients outside tightly controlled clinical trials indicated that a year or more after implantation, patients with drug-coated stents faced increased risks compared with those with bare-metal models. Some researchers have estimated the newer devices might be causing thousands of heart attacks and deaths a year.

Some researchers, along with Boston Scientific Corp. and Johnson & Johnson, which make the two drug-eluting stents sold domestically, say any risks from the devices are offset by the reduced need for repeated procedures and bypass surgery, which carry their own risks.

Patients who get the stents had been advised to take aspirin and the drug Plavix for three to six months to reduce the risk of blood clots. Recent studies have indicated that patients may need to take the drugs longer, perhaps indefinitely. But Plavix is expensive and increases the risk of serious bleeding.

How Doctors Are Rethinking Drug-Coated Stents (WSJ)

By Ron Winslow, Anna Wilde Mathews

The Wall Street Journal, December 9, 2006

Heart experts examining popular drug-coated stents in federal hearings this week concluded that safety concerns so far don't warrant restrictions in their use. But cardiologists already are changing the way they treat patients, rethinking when to use the devices and how to alter follow-up care.

Enthusiasm for the stents, small mesh tubes that prop open diseased arteries, was so immediate that within a year of their introduction in 2003, they had taken the place of their more-established bare-metal predecessors in 80% of an estimated one million stent patients. Unlike bare-metal stents, they prevent reclogging.

The vast majority of patients who have a coated stent won't experience a problem. But in recent months, long-term studies and real-world experience have yielded evidence that in rare instances the newer devices may trigger potentially fatal blood clots, years after they are implanted. That prompted the Food and Drug Administration to convene a panel of experts, which after two days of hearings stopped short of calling for major changes in how doctors use the devices.

It has become a common tension in medicine: New treatments -- especially those featuring advanced technology -- are rapidly adopted for their benefits before their risks are fully understood.

More doctors already say they are looking closer at heart patients, and in some cases going back to bare-metal stents, which are more likely to result in reclogged arteries that often require more stents or even bypass surgery. Doctors also are asking patients to take the blood-thinner Plavix for much longer than the three-to-six months currently recommended, in order to keep clots from forming in the weeks after the devices are implanted. But prolonged medication carries risks of its own.

"I wouldn't see necessarily a big shift away from using drug-eluting stents," said Christopher Cannon, a cardiologist at Brigham & Women's Hospital and Harvard Medical School in Boston. "But a more thoughtful and discriminate approach does seem useful."

The FDA panel seemed satisfied after this week's hearings that, based on data available, the risk of heart attack and death with the drug-coated stents isn't significantly higher than with the bare-metal devices -- at least when used in accordance with their FDA-approved instructions. Those cover only patients with relatively simple conditions, involving a single arterial blockage without complications such as a heart attack.

Friday, the committee signaled far more concern about patients who don't fit that profile -- at least 60% of those receiving drug-coated stents, by the FDA's estimate. For these "off label" patients, with more complicated problems such as multiple blockages, several committee members said they worried there isn't enough evidence to be sure when the benefits of the stents outweighed their potential risks.

"I don't think we have enough data at all to say that the other [off-label] reasons for putting in a drug-eluting stent are safe and effective," said Norman Kato, a committee member who is a doctor in the Cardiac Care Medical Group in Encino, Calif.

Other committee members disagreed. Some called for stronger warning language against the wider use, and others, arguing there is no concrete reason to stop using the stents in particular types of patients, suggested milder options.

In a news conference concluding the two days of meetings, William Maisel, the panel's chairman and a doctor at Beth Israel Deaconess Medical Center in Boston, suggested the FDA should put language into the stents' labels warning that their use in such "off label" situations may be associated with a higher risk of clotting, heart attacks and death compared with the simpler, on-label situations.

The agency's next step isn't completely clear in this case because the panel's views on regulatory actions were vague and somewhat divided. Daniel Schultz, head of the agency's device center, said the FDA understands it needs "to do a better job...communicating to patients and communicating to doctors the best and the latest information that we know," but it isn't clear what combination of label changes, letters or other means it would use. The agency also will consider panel members' call for more-complete data on the stents in examining the designs of approval studies, he said.

Bare-metal stents transformed treatment of heart patients when they were introduced in 1994, but their tendency to reclog with scar tissue left 15% to 30% of patients needing additional procedures or even bypass surgery to relieve chest pain and help avoid heart attacks.

The two drug-coated versions in the U.S., marketed by Johnson & Johnson and Boston Scientific Corp., significantly stanch the growth of scar tissue and reduce the need for repeat procedures to less than 3% -- a result that led to their rapid adoption by cardiologists.

"Overall, the drug-eluting stents are very effective," says William O'Neill, executive dean for clinical affairs at University of Miami School of Medicine and an interventional cardiologist. "But there's no free lunch."

After the FDA panel's meeting, Boston Scientific Chief Medical and Scientific Officer Donald Baim said that while the company's data show "more adverse events in more complex patients," it believes the drug-coated stent "still compares favorably to alternative treatment options such as bypass surgery." Johnson & Johnson's Cordis unit said it believes the evidence it presented "supports the efficacy and safety" of its stent, and the company will continue to support clinical trials.

The FDA advisory panel stopped short of recommending extended use of Plavix and aspirin to 12 months or longer to prevent clots for routine cases but generally endorsed recommendations for that strategy for off-label uses.

Cardiologists say that making sure patients withstand or afford such a regimen for a year or longer is a critical factor in determining whether to treat them with a drug-coated stent.

"If you can't take [Plavix and aspirin] or if you can't pay for it, the bare-metal stent should be the chief option," said Robert Califf, head of Duke University's Duke Translational Medicine Institute in Durham, N.C. "That's abundantly clear."

It isn't clear how long patients need to stay on the drug to maintain protection against a clot, and there are other important concerns -- including the cost of the drug -- associated with its long-term use.

Kevin Graham, director of preventive cardiology at Minneapolis Heart Institute in Minnesota, said a patient in his practice stopped taking Plavix three-and-a-half years after getting a drug-coated stent and within a month, she had suffered a heart attack from a clot in the device.

A large observational study of nearly 4,700 patients, published online by the Journal of the American Medical Association this week, showed patients who got a drug-coated stent and stayed on Plavix had the lowest risk of death, heart attack or procedures to clear obstructed arteries, while those with the drug-coated stent who stopped taking the drug had the highest risk. Patients with bare-metal stents came in the middle.

While the study has limitations and isn't definitive, it is enough to convince Dr. Califf, its principal author, that patients with drug-coated stents should stay on the Plavix indefinitely -- or until additional research offers better guidance.

Brigham & Women's Dr. Cannon says there are four categories of patients who should consider bare-metal rather than drug-coated stents: people who have a history or risk of bleeding, such as ulcers or hemorrhages; who aren't likely to be able to stay on Plavix indefinitely; who can't afford the medicine; and who already take other blood thinners to manage an irregular heart-beat condition called atrial fibrillation.

Last week, John Brush, a cardiologist in private practice in Norfolk, Va., used a bare-metal stent to treat a heart-attack patient. A couple of months ago, he says, he would have put in a drug-coated device, "but I got subtle signals the patient was noncompliant."

Another issue is cost. In Minneapolis, Dr. Graham said he recently saw an elderly woman who already had a drug-coated stent and was on Plavix, at $6 a day, and a host of other medicines typical of a regimen for heart patients. She told him her monthly prescription bill was $436, while her social-security check was just over $900. "She was literally crying," Dr. Graham says. She had hit the "donut hole," a gap in Medicare drug coverage when patients have to pay the full cost of their medications themselves.

He reluctantly took her off the drug, and so far, she is okay, he says. "In those scenarios, people have to decide whether to pay the rent, pay their lights bills, buy food or buy the drugs."

Another important issue is the need for other medical procedures. Dentists, surgeons and other doctors often ask patients to stop taking the blood thinner before undergoing dental surgery, colonoscopies or orthopedic procedures such as knee replacements. The University of Miami's Dr. O'Neill said he has had three patients end up in the emergency room with heart attacks because they temporarily stopped taking Plavix on the advice of other doctors.

"It's essential that patients not stop the Plavix unless they consult with the cardiologist that put the stent in," he said.

Many patients treated under the prevailing three-to-six-month guidelines for the blood thinner have been off the medicine for some time. At Duke, the recommendation is that patients discuss with their physicians whether they should resume taking the drug.

Elsewhere, doctors aren't convinced it is necessary. At the Ochsner Health System in New Orleans, J.P. Reilly, associate director of the cardiac catheterization laboratory, said he recently advised a patient not to go back on Plavix. "It's a difficult question to answer because of the costs associated with Plavix and the risks of bleeding," he says. But the patient's disease seemed well confined, a factor the doctor took into account in considering the question.

Then there is the surgery option. Drug-coated stents have prompted many cardiologists to take on patients who in previous years they would have referred to surgeons. At this week's hearing, some surgeons urged the FDA panel to prod patients and doctors to consider bypass surgery again.

These procedures are far more difficult than implanting a stent -- and they carry a higher risk of dying in the 30 days after treatment than procedures to implant stents. The surgeons argued they may be safer in the long term for certain patients with complicated problems such as blockages in multiple arteries.

Panel Urges Caution Concerning Coated Stents (NYT)

By Barnaby J. Feder

The New York Times, December 9, 2006

GAITHERSBURG, Md., Dec. 8 — A panel of experts recommended Friday that doctors and patients be given stronger warnings about the dangers associated with the use of drug-coated stents in high-risk patients.

The panelists also recommended that the Food and Drug Administration warn doctors that if possible, such patients should remain on aspirin and Plavix, an anticlotting drug, for at least a year after a drug-coated stent implant.

DOJ_NMG_0105145

The label on the Cypher stent, from Johnson & Johnson, approved for sale in the United States in 2003, calls for the anticlotting therapy for just three months. The label on the Taxus stent, from Boston Scientific, approved the next year, calls for six months on the drug.

At the end of the two-day hearing here, the panelists struggled to reach a consensus on most of the questions posed to it by the F.D.A. about whether it should restrict the use of the tiny devices, which are implanted to prop open heart arteries.

As the session ended, Daniel Schult, head of the drug agency's Center for Devices and Radiological Health, said it was too soon to discuss what specific actions the F.D.A. might take. "What I heard loud and clear is that we need to do a better job communicating to doctors and patients the best and latest information," Dr. Schult said.

The challenge the agency faces is that most of the stents — over 60 percent by the F.D.A.'s estimates — are being implanted in patients with more complex cardiovascular problems than those of the patients the devices were tested on.

The experts told F.D.A. officials that there was little reliable research comparing the risks associated with such "off label" use to the outcomes with drug treatment or surgery. And what research there is suggests that the risks of clotting, heart attack and death are higher for such high-risk patients than for those who were in clinical trial groups.

The stent market grew so explosively after the drug-coated devices were introduced in 2003 that regulators and consumers were caught with too little data. About one million Americans annually get stents — often more than one. Stents are implanted after tiny balloons have been inflated in clogged arteries to reopen blood flow, a procedure known as angioplasty.

The first stents were bare metal devices. The drug-coated products sharply reduced the frequency with which new blockages formed at the implant site, thus reducing the number of follow-up procedures. In the last year, though, it was discovered that the formation of potentially deadly clots long after implantation was slightly more common with the drug-coated stents than with bare-metal stents.

Doctors today commonly give the drug-coated stents without F.D.A. clearance to diabetics, people with weakened hearts or kidneys, and those with plaque blockages in three or more coronary arteries who hope the stenting will allow them to avoid bypass surgery.

Three medical societies, including the American Heart Association, have recommended that patients stay on anticlotting drugs for a year.

How the F.D.A. may address the issue is unclear. It cannot require the companies to recommend a drug program on their labels for an unapproved use of the device. And Bristol-Myers, which makes Plavix, is not allowed to market the drug for off-label stent use.

Many doctors are already recommending extended or even indefinite use of anticlotting drugs for stent patients. But the panelists pointed out Friday that no one knows the optimal length of time to take the drugs.

The anticlotting drugs can lead to excessive bleeding when a patient is in an accident and must be stopped if surgery or dental work is needed. Doctors also worry about whether patients will remember to take them every day and whether poorer patients can afford Plavix, which costs $1,400 annually for a daily dose.

"I haven't heard anything today that's going to change my practice when I go back to it Monday," said Dr. Christopher J. White, a cardiologist on the panel from the Ochsner Medical Center in New Orleans. After a moment's thought, though, he said he might cut back on the use of drug-coated stents where arteries branch since data showed clotting rates were higher where patients had overlapping stents.

Surgeons told the panel that a way to reduce risks was to cut back on the use of stents in most patients with blockages in three or more vessels or in the left main coronary artery — both cases in which data indicates survival rates are better for patients who undergo bypass surgery.

NIH Scientist Pleads Guilty In Accepting $285,000 From Pfizer (WP)

By Eric Rich

The Washington Post, December 9, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0105146

A senior government scientist who was a focus of a congressional probe into conflicts of interest in medical research admitted in federal court yesterday that he improperly failed to disclose payments of $285,000 he received as a consultant for the pharmaceutical manufacturer Pfizer Inc.

Pearson "Trey" Sunderland III, who was chief of the Geriatric Psychiatry Branch of the National Institute of Mental Health, pleaded guilty in Baltimore to a misdemeanor charge of violating conflict-of-interest rules.

Under the terms of the plea agreement, the Chevy Chase resident must forfeit $300,000 -- the payments plus expenses for which he was reimbursed. At the Dec. 22 sentencing, prosecutors have said that they will recommend that he be placed on probation for two years.

Sunderland, 55, admitted to entering consulting agreements with the drugmaker beginning in 1998 without receiving the required approval in advance or disclosing his income after the fact. Sunderland was paid as a consultant on two projects in which his department was collaborating with Pfizer on research to identify chemical warning signs of Alzheimer's disease.

The criminal prosecution of a researcher for violating conflict-of-interest rules is a rarity. But Sunderland's consulting arrangements, which first surfaced in 2004, were among the most egregious of the possible conflicts detailed during the probe by a congressional subcommittee.

U.S. Attorney Rod J. Rosenstein said the case should send a message to other government researchers. "Dr. Sunderland violated the fundamental rule that government employees cannot accept payment from interested private parties without the permission of their supervisors," Rosenstein said in a statement.

But members of Congress said yesterday that they found it disturbing that even after his guilty plea, Sunderland remains in his federal job, where he is a member of the Public Health Service Commissioned Corps.

"The question now becomes: Will the National Institutes of Health and the Commissioned Corps finally move to terminate Dr. Sunderland's assignment?" Rep. Bart Stupak (D-Mich.) asked in a statement. "Is a criminal guilty plea enough to, at long last, remove Dr. Sunderland from NIH?"

NIH spokesman Don Ralbovsky and Robert F. Muse, an attorney for Sunderland, declined to comment.

According to court documents, Sunderland initiated discussions with Pfizer in 1998 that led to his being paid as a consultant on a collaborative project involving Pfizer and NIMH. He was ultimately paid a $25,000 retainer each year for five years as well as $35,000 to attend 14 meetings at Pfizer locations. He negotiated similar terms later in 1998 as a consultant on a second effort.

In neither case did he disclose the income in annual reports, nor did he receive approval in advance from the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, as required.

Adil E. Shamoo, founder and editor-in-chief of the journal Accountability in Research, which deals extensively with medical ethics, said he considered probation and the forfeiture to be appropriate punishment for Sunderland's misconduct.

"Pleading guilty in a court of law, a man of his caliber as a researcher -- it's really disappointing, and hopefully it will be a deterrent," Shamoo said. "It should be very embarrassing to him."

As a result of concerns over possible conflicts of interest, NIH officials began administrative actions against 34 scientists and referred 10 others, including Sunderland, to the Office of the Inspector General for possible prosecution. In August 2005, the NIH imposed rules that bar employees from working for, or owning stock in, drug companies.

NASA Official Questions Agency's Focus On The Shuttle (NYT)

By John Schwartz

The New York Times, December 9, 2006

CAPE CANAVERAL, Fla., Dec. 8 — NASA's administrator, Michael D. Griffin, says the current period of space exploration will come to be seen as a mistake.

"Viewed from the point of history several decades out," he said in an interview, "the period where the United States retreated from the Moon and quite deliberately focused only on low Earth orbit will be seen, to me, a mistake."

DOJ_NMG_0105147

Mr. Griffin has made similar comments before, notably a year ago in an interview with USA Today. This time, his remarks came as he waited for Thursday's down-to-the-wire effort to launch the shuttle on a 12-day mission to rewire the International Space Station. The liftoff was scrubbed at the last minute because of weather concerns.

Mission managers decided not to try to launch on Friday, when weather conditions were predicted to be too cloudy and windy for a safe launching. They expect to try again at 8:47 p.m. on Saturday, though the decision about whether to proceed will not be made until weather officers give their prediction early that morning.

Launching opportunities extend to Dec. 26, though space agency officials hope to get the shuttle to orbit long before then.

Mr. Griffin was appointed to head the National Aeronautics and Space Administration in 2005, a year after President Bush announced his "vision for space exploration," which calls for returning astronauts to the Moon by 2020 and then moving on to send humans to Mars. Mr. Griffin has from the start been an enthusiastic proponent of that plan.

But it has put him in a delicate situation, as he has shifted NASA financing to the Moon initiative, while moving to complete the space station and shut down the shuttle program by 2010, and cutting back on its science activities. And in doing so, he has occasionally expressed doubts about the wisdom underlying the nation's decision to build the shuttle and the station.

After his remarks a year ago, he issued an apologetic memorandum to NASA employees.

But if there was any discomfort in expressing such opinions once again at the Kennedy Space Center in the midst of preparations for launching, Mr. Griffin showed none. He said in the interview that his comments had been broadly misconstrued as a slap against the people who build and maintain the shuttle and space station, and emphasized that he admired the people of NASA who took on enormous challenges to create the shuttle and station.

The fault is not NASA's, he said, adding: "The space shuttle is a response to a policy mistake — it isn't the mistake. The mistake was tearing up all the infrastructure that we built for Apollo and saying, 'let's just focus on low Earth orbit.' "

The plan to return to the Moon by 2020 has been met with some skepticism, especially among those who doubt that the space agency can take on such a daunting project within its $17 billion annual budget. Dr. Griffin said that NASA could do the job — and could reach the moon even more quickly, with more money.

"I'm tempted to say, 'Why the skepticism?' " he said, adding, "but in fairness, NASA's recent history has not had the on-time, on-budget performance characteristic of the Apollo era. And I'm trying to restore that."

The fact that Democrats won the majority of seats in Congress in the November election, and other political changes that will occur over time, should have little effect on the plan, he said.

"Unless you believe that a future U.S. president or a future U.S. Congress actually wants to cancel the U.S. spaceflight program, then I actually do not perceive a big threat from changing administrations and changing Congresses," he said. "I think the country wants to have a manned spaceflight program, and a substantial one."

Roger D. Launius, the chairman of the division of space history at the Smithsonian National Air and Space Museum, expressed surprise that Mr. Griffin would repeat his statement about the judgment of history after the controversy that erupted a year ago.

"Here we've got a guy who speaks his mind," Mr. Launius said. "That's not always the case, certainly in Washington, and it certainly hasn't been the case at NASA."

Still, while some of the criticism is justified, Mr. Launius said, the shuttle "turned out better than it had any right to," and stands today as something of an engineering marvel.

Representative Bart Gordon, Democrat of Tennessee and the incoming head of the House Committee on Science, declined to address Mr. Griffin's comments about the history of the space effort, saying through a spokeswoman: "I would rather focus on where we go from here. I support human exploration beyond low Earth orbit. However, it's got to be paid for."

Back To The Moon, Permanently (NYT)

The New York Times, December 9, 2006

Three years after President Bush announced an ambitious long-term goal to return astronauts to the Moon and then send them on to Mars, the National Aeronautics and Space Administration has finally put some flesh on his nebulous aspirations. This week, the agency announced plans to establish a permanent base on the Moon by 2024, explained why we should want to send astronauts back to a world they visited repeatedly more than three decades ago, and described what they might do when they get there. It was belated justification for a decision that the Bush administration and Congress have already made. But the payoff is distant and the likely future costs very high, leaving it unclear how realistic these aspirations will prove to be.

The agency has done a commendably thorough job by consulting some 1,000 experts and 13 other space agencies in fashioning its plans. Such a costly and difficult venture should ideally be pursued cooperatively with other nations, to share the costs and the risks. It would be especially desirable to have multiple ways of reaching the Moon in case the American program runs into problems like those that grounded the shuttles.

What's worrisome about the new plans is their lack of focus. The agency cites six major reasons for returning to the Moon. The most persuasive is to use the Moon as a base to test technologies and operating techniques to be used on future missions to Mars, a more compelling target. It makes sense to first try "living off the land" on the Moon, where astronauts are only days away from home should something go wrong, before taking the long leap to Mars. The venture is also justified on scientific, economic, educational and global partnership grounds, and as a step toward eventual settlements on the Moon.

The wide sweep of these rationales is reminiscent of the extravagant promises for the space station, which was sold to Congress as a steppingstone to the planets, a scientific and economic bonanza, and a stimulus for students but is still limping along, half finished and far over budget, with greatly diminished expectations for what it can accomplish.

An even more expansive document — listing some 180 objectives that the astronauts might pursue on the Moon — is essentially a wish list compiled after consulting virtually every expert in the world who might have an opinion. The list puts the lie to criticisms that there is almost nothing useful to do on the Moon. But some of the objectives have a pie-in-the-sky quality, like exporting power from the Moon for use on Earth, while others, like observatories on the Moon, might not prove feasible or affordable for decades. The objectives will need to be winnowed and focused if they are to serve as useful guides in pursuing the program.

If this nation is to continue a human space flight program it makes sense to pick a more exciting destination than a space station circling endlessly in low Earth orbit. Our main concern is that the political proponents of the Moon-Mars adventure will not provide money commensurate with the task. NASA's crowning scientific achievements have come from its unmanned probes to distant worlds and its orbiting observatories. It would be a shame if an underfinanced program to return to the Moon on a permanent basis and then venture on to Mars forced reductions in research programs of higher scientific value.

Mans Stabs Himself In Front Of Longworth, Forces Temporary Shutdown Of Union Station Area (RC)

By John McArdle, John Bresnahan

Roll Call, December 8, 2006

At 12:55 p.m. today, a 19-year-old man walked up to the main entrance of the Longworth House Office Building and proceeded to stab himself at least once in the chest in front of Capitol Police officers.

After arresting the man, officers found something in a backpack he was carrying that led them to shut down streets near Union Station to search for a suspicious package that he had mailed earlier in the day.

By 5:30 p.m., the package had been found and was deemed safe by Capitol Police and Metropolitan Police, and investigators and the man remained at George Washington Hospital under police arrest.

A Capitol Police spokeswoman, Sgt. Kimberly Schneider, said Friday night that detectives were still investigating a motive for the incident.

Schneider said the man is not a D.C. resident and that he is not believed to be an employee of Congress.

She also noted that after the man was subdued and transported to the hospital, his belongings were taken to a Capitol Police facility in the Fairchild Building. Once inside, officers discovered a suspicious substance in the man's backpack and briefly evacuated the building. That substance later was deemed safe, but evidence in the backpack eventually led police to believe the man had mailed a package earlier in the day.

After shutting down the Union Station area for an hour and a half, officers eventually found that package inside a nearby postal service truck and deemed it safe.

"It's to early to say what charges he will face or what his motive was, said Schneider. "We have a lot of investigating to do."

SMU Wins Court Decision Involving Land For Bush Library (AP)

AP, December 8, 2006

DALLAS — Southern Methodist University has won a court ruling that could boost its bid to host the George W. Bush Presidential Library.

Federal District Judge Jerry Buchmeyer ruled Thursday that SMU has clear title to a condominium complex that university officials have considered for the library. SMU and two other colleges are bidding for the library.

Leon Bennett, SMU's vice president for legal affairs, said the university plans to evict the remaining residents this month and begin tearing down the condominiums.

Two condo owners — a dentist who moved out and a lawyer who still lives there — claimed the university used unfair tactics to buy out owners at low prices.

The university denied the charges, and the judge wrote that the plaintiffs didn't prove SMU broke the University Gardens Condominiums bylaws.

The plaintiffs said they plan to appeal.

The two men filed the lawsuit last year in state court. The case was moved to federal court last month. It has been delayed many times, including when one of the plaintiffs filed for bankruptcy protection.

SMU officials have declined to discuss details of their bid for the presidential library, including its precise location.

SMU is considered a front-runner for the library. First lady Laura Bush graduated from the university and serves on its board of trustees, and the school's location near downtown Dallas is seen as a better draw for tourists.

The other bidders are Baylor University in Waco and the University of Dallas, which is in suburban Irving. Texas Tech University in Lubbock was eliminated. A decision is expected early next year.

Bush's Dog Barney Is Back With New Video (AP)

AP, December 8, 2006

WASHINGTON — Just in time for the holidays, America's best-known Scottish terrier is back with a new video on the White House Web site.

It's "Barney's Holiday Extravaganza," a production that follows Barney around the White House as he plans a holiday show, runs into trouble developing a plot and then wrangles over his budget with Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson and Budget Director Rob Portman.

The supporting cast includes President Bush, his wife, Laura, entertainer Dolly Parton, three-time Super Bowl champion and "Dancing with the Stars" winner Emmitt Smith, political strategist Karl Rove, Education Secretary Margaret Spellings, Press Secretary Tony Snow and others.

Miss Beazley, the Bushes' other Scottish terrier, and the first cat, Willie, also make appearances.

Ignore And Appoint (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, December 9, 2006

WHATEVER YOU thought of Ambassador John R. Bolton as U.S. representative at the United Nations — and we thought he was too confrontational — his tenure was clouded from the beginning by the fact that his appointment was never confirmed by the Senate. President Bush installed him at the U.N. with a "recess appointment" while the Senate was out of session.

Bush and his would-be successors — Democratic and Republican — should resolve that Bolton is the last major official to serve under this disability. Recess appointments are allowed by the letter of the Constitution, but they violate its spirit.

Bolton, who resigned this week when it became clear that he couldn't be confirmed even by the lame-duck Republican Senate, served for 16 months in what is arguably the most important diplomatic post after secretary of State. Yet his appointment never received the "advice and consent" the Senate is authorized by the Constitution to bestow on — or withhold from — proposed "ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court and all other officers of the United States."

Bush installed Bolton under another part of the Constitution that empowers the president to "fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate, by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of their next session."

Unlike the requirement for advice and consent, this provision is not central to the constitutional balance of powers between the executive and legislative branches. Rather, it's a quaint vestige of the 18th century — an era of stagecoaches, when it could take weeks for enough senators to travel to Washington to fill a quorum.

Since the 1950s, presidents have refrained from making recess appointments to the Supreme Court. But both Bill Clinton and George W. Bush have made such appointments to federal appeals courts, as well as to important executive branch positions, such as Bolton's, that should be subject to Senate confirmation.

With a new Democratic majority in the Senate capable of sustaining a filibuster, Bush may be tempted to resort to recess appointments — perhaps even to the Supreme Court — as payback for what he would see as obstructionism. He should resist the temptation.

We would gladly do away with filibusters of judicial nominations (and of legislation, for that matter). But neither filibusters nor other procedural obstacles that senators may erect to the confirmation process justify the greater evil of judges and ambassadors who have not been confirmed by the Senate. The "way forward" on this issue is for Bush and his successors to honor the spirit as well as the letter of the Constitution.

Despite Probe, A Close Race (WP)

By Shailagh Murray, Allan Lengel

The Washington Post, December 9, 2006

Rep. William J. Jefferson (D-La.) was given up for dead politically after the FBI found $90,000 in alleged bribe money in his freezer, and he barely survived a Nov. 7 primary election, garnering 30 percent of the vote in a crowded field of 12 challengers.

Now he is locked in a tough runoff with a well-funded Democratic challenger who is using poetry and schoolchildren to highlight Jefferson's ethical woes. Many of Jefferson's House colleagues are privately rooting for him to lose today so his troubles do not tarnish the new Democratic-controlled Congress. But while scandals cost the GOP 12 House seats last month, the eight-term Democrat is proving surprisingly resilient, and experts say the special election could go either way.

Jefferson has scooped up high-profile endorsements from New Orleans Mayor C. Ray Nagin and state Sen. Derrick Shepherd, who finished third in the primary, while attacking opponent Karen Carter, who finished second with 22 percent of the vote, as too liberal. In one ad, Jefferson declares "I have never taken a bribe" and dismisses Carter, a 37-year-old lawyer and state representative, as "an ambitious young woman." The national Democratic Party has steered clear of the race.

Brian J. Brox, a political scientist at Tulane University, described the race as heated and hard to predict. "It looks like a fairly negative and nasty affair," he said.

A low-key lawmaker with a scholarly demeanor, Jefferson had his world turned upside down in August 2005, when federal investigators raided his homes in Washington and New Orleans as part of a corruption investigation related to African business activities. Sources familiar with the probe said Jefferson is certain to be indicted, probably sometime in the first half of 2007.

Jefferson has strongly denied engaging in illegal activity, and to the surprise and alarm of some of his Democratic colleagues, he has forged ahead with his reelection campaign. He argues that his flood-ravaged city needs an experienced hand in the House to usher through recovery-related legislation. "Now is not the time for an unproven person to go to Washington and try to fight for our recovery," he warned in one campaign ad.

But in June, House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) and other leaders stripped Jefferson of his coveted seat on the Ways and Means Committee, a humiliating slap meant to send an election-year signal that Democrats do not tolerate ethical lapses. In October, the Louisiana Democratic Party voted to endorse Carter, who has matched Jefferson in fundraising. Both candidates have raised about $900,000, according to Federal Election Commission reports.

Pelosi has had little to say about Jefferson's reelection bid. "It is up to the people of New Orleans to decide who they want to represent them," she said this week. A Pelosi spokeswoman noted that there is no guarantee Jefferson would secure a committee assignment in the new Congress, should he win reelection.

Throughout the campaign, Jefferson has attempted to portray Carter as a left-wing fringe figure who supports late-term abortions, same-sex marriage and human cloning. Carter has hit back; one of her ads shows a children's spelling bee in which contestants spell "hypocrite" and "corruption." A radio ad contrasts Carter's Katrina response with reports that Jefferson used a National Guard detail to survey damage to his home. The congressman has insisted that he was not allowed to enter the area unescorted.

The radio message is delivered in the poetic style of " 'Twas the Night Before Christmas":

Karen Carter made headlines, pleading for buses and gas

To help desperate people in the Dome and on the Claiborne overpass.

In the meantime, Bill Jefferson couldn't be found.

Oh, that's right, two Humvees and a chopper had taken him Uptown.

The FBI is also investigating Jefferson's wife and other family members. The probe began in March 2005 with an undercover sting spurred by a Northern Virginia woman, Lori Mody. She had approached the FBI, concerned that Jefferson and some of his business associates were trying to swindle her.

Two of Jefferson's associates pleaded guilty this year to bribing the congressman. Investigators are examining about a dozen business schemes in the United States and in Africa in which Jefferson allegedly used his official position in exchange for financial gain, according to court documents and sources, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the case.

Given the volume of evidence that federal investigators are thought to possess, indictments in the case were expected months ago. But the probe has been slowed by legal wrangling over documents seized during a controversial FBI raid of Jefferson's House office in May.

Romney's Gay Rights Stance Draws Ire (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney, David D. Kirkpatrick

The New York Times, December 9, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 8 — Gov. Mitt Romney, the Massachusetts Republican who has built a presidential campaign on a broad appeal for conservative support, is drawing sharply increased criticism from conservative activists for his advocacy of gay rights in a 1994 letter.

Mr. Romney's standing among conservatives is being hurt by a letter he sent to the Log Cabin Club of Massachusetts saying that he would be a stronger advocate for gay rights than Senator Edward M. Kennedy, his opponent in a Senate race, in a position that stands in contrast to his current role as a champion of a state constitutional amendment banning same-sex marriage.

"We must make equality for gays and lesbians a mainstream concern," Mr. Romney wrote in a detailed plea for the support of the club, a gay Republican organization.

The circulation of the letter by gay rights groups in recent weeks has set off a storm of outrage among social conservatives, and by Friday was looming as a serious complication to Mr. Romney's hopes.

Aides to Mr. Romney, who did not dispute the letter's legitimacy, said that the governor's opinions on gay issues had not changed. They said Mr. Romney had always been an opponent of same-sex marriage, had always opposed discrimination against gay men and lesbians and had been consistent in his views about allowing them to serve in the military.

"Governor Romney believes Americans should be respectful of all people," said Eric Fehrnstrom, his spokesman. "However, over the past four years as governor, Mitt Romney has not advocated or supported any change in the military's policies and he has not implemented new or special rights in this area."

Mr. Fehrnstrom, echoing the language that Mr. Romney has frequently used on the campaign trail, said Mr. Romney had been "a champion of traditional marriage" and "fought the efforts of activist judges who seek to redefine marriage."

Nonetheless, the breadth of the letter's language and the specificity of many of the pledges stunned conservative leaders. Many of them had turned to Mr. Romney as a conservative alternative to Senator John McCain, Republican of Arizona, whose position on issues like abortion had been considered suspect.

"This is quite disturbing," said Tony Perkins, president of the Family Research Council, who had praised Mr. Romney as a champion of traditional values at the group's conference in late September. "This type of information is going to create a lot of problems for Governor Romney. He is going to have a hard time overcoming this."

Paul Weyrich, a founder of the modern conservative movement, said: "Unless he comes out with an abject repudiation of this, I think it makes him out to be a hypocrite. And if he totally repudiates this, you have to ask, on what grounds?"

The letter, and Mr. Romney's effort to reconcile it with the way he had presented himself on the campaign trail, reflects what has been one of the central challenges facing him in his campaign: how to move from winning an election in one of the most liberal states in the union to becoming the presidential candidate of a party whose nominating process is dominated by social conservatives.

As it is, he has shifted his position on abortion rights. Last year, Mr. Romney wrote an op-ed article for The Boston Globe saying that his views had "evolved and deepened," and that he opposed abortion and thought decisions on its legality should be left to states.

The 1994 letter followed a meeting with the Log Cabin Club. Mr. Romney wrote, "I am not unaware of my opponent's considerable record in the area of civil rights.

"For some voters, it might be enough to simply match my opponent's record in this area," he said. "But I believe we can and must do better. If we are to achieve the goals we share, we must make equality for gays and lesbians a mainstream concern. My opponent cannot do this. I can and will."

Mr. Romney, recounting in the letter the promises he made in the meeting with the club, said he had agreed to help sponsor a bill barring discrimination against gay men and lesbians if he was elected to the Senate and to broaden it to include protections for housing and credit.

He said he supported the "don't ask, don't tell" military policy created by former President Bill Clinton, and described it as "the first in a number of steps that will ultimately lead to gays' and lesbians' being able to serve openly and honestly in our nation's military."

Rich Tafel, who was the executive director of the club at the time, said he was stunned by what he described as the contrast between how Mr. Romney came across in their meeting and how he appeared on the campaign trail now.

"I've never seen anybody change like this," he said. "It really does concern me."

Viewed from some angles, Mr. Romney's positions on gay rights seem consistent. He still says he opposes discrimination against gay men and lesbians and he always said he opposed same-sex marriage.

But his emphasis has shifted in the last two years. As he moves into this new phase of his career, Mr. Romney rarely talks about the need to protect gay men and lesbians from bias, instead presenting himself as a conservative stalwart in the fight against same-sex marriage, arguing that legally recognizing same-sex unions endangers the cultural support for heterosexual families.

The doubts being raised could improve the prospects of two fellow Republicans who have been seeking conservative support in bids for the presidential election: Gov. Mike Huckabee of Arkansas and Senator Sam Brownback of Kansas.

The Rascals On The Right (NYT)

By Thomas B. Edsall

The New York Times, December 9, 2006

Washington

The early jockeying for the Republican presidential nomination reveals a split in the G.O.P. between sociocultural conservatives and the economy/ national defense wing, a split likely either to expand Democratic opportunities in 2008 or to produce an exceptionally viable Republican nominee.

DOJ_NMG_0105153

The most significant development at this stage of the race is the failure of any G.O.P. candidate to emerge as the consensus conservative, uniting white evangelicals, family-values traditionalists, defense hawks, and opponents of the tax and regulatory state. "There is a vacuum in the field," says the Republican pollster Tony Fabrizio, "a big, gaping hole."

The two Republican candidates leading in polls, John McCain and Rudy Giuliani, both fail the consensus test. Each stands to the left of the party — well to the left in Giuliani's case — on the "traditional values" issues: sexual mores, family structure, reproductive choice, gay rights, embryonic stem cell research, and so forth.

While religious leaders and social conservatives have claimed veto power over Republican presidential candidates, there are at least three reasons to doubt this will take place:

First, the G.O.P. has a long history of sticking with front-runners. Second, socially conservative political activists in key primary and caucus states are under intense pressure to choose now, accepting the field as it is. McCain has picked up the support of one of Iowa's top Christian power brokers, Marlys Popma, despite his denunciation six years ago of Pat Robertson and Jerry Falwell as "agents of intolerance" who "shame our faith, our party and our country." Third, states such as Michigan, Florida, New Jersey and California are considering advancing their primaries to an early date, Feb. 5. This would weaken the leverage of religious and cultural conservatives who are strongest in the South, and would strengthen the hand of Republicans who are enthusiastic about right-libertarians like McCain and Giuliani.

Where once party leaders and institutional forces screened candidates for moral rectitude — or the semblance of it — the top four candidates in this Republican crop head into the race with nine marriages, five divorces and unknown numbers of extramarital affairs. Among them, only Mitt Romney is viewed as squeaky clean.

Public Opinion Strategies, a highly respected Republican polling firm, noted in an election post-mortem that the impact of personal scandal "on the Republican Party has been understated." Bill McInturff, a senior partner in the firm, presented data showing that in the closing weeks of the last election, Mark Foley, the Florida Republican who resigned after disclosures that he sent sexually suggestive messages to teenage House pages, had become a better-recognized figure than either Dennis Hastert, the former House speaker, or Nancy Pelosi, his Democratic successor. In October 2006, Foley achieved the dubious distinction of a 69 percent negative rating among respondents, seven points higher than O. J. Simpson and nearly as high as Yasir Arafat.

Although Romney has evidently led an uneventful private life, he is trying to forcibly reinvent himself from his incarnation as a Massachusetts governor who favored abortion rights and gay rights — almost as hard a history to surmount in the G.O.P. as the multiple marriages and divorces of McCain, Giuliani, and Newt Gingrich. (Gingrich set a new standard in nerviness by conducting an affair with a House staffer while leading the drive to impeach President Bill Clinton.)

Social-moral conflicts of the sort surfacing in the Republican Party should help the Democrats, if they choose a candidate who can capitalize on Republican disarray. Sexual mores aside, Democrats have been hampered by a long line of candidates who, no matter how virtuous (or not), have been perceived by swing voters as moralizing, elitist, egg-headed, puritanical, do-good scolds — from Adlai Stevenson to Walter Mondale to Michael Dukakis to Al Gore.

Unless the Democratic Party can suppress its inclination to pick such nominees, or can find a way to focus public attention on the opportunistic and grandstanding nature of its opponents, the weakness of social conservatives could turn out to be a Republican strength. The nomination of a McCain, or a Giuliani, could result in the selection of a candidate whose macho posture and rascal charm make for a viable general election nominee.

G.O.P. Draws Fire On Senate Race Spending (NYT)

By David D. Kirkpatrick

The New York Times, December 9, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 8 — Campaign finance reports filed this week have led to second-guessing about whether the National Republican Senatorial Committee borrowed too little for its final all-out push for its candidates.

At least two Republican Senate candidates lost by just a few thousand votes, and reversing just one defeat would have enabled the Republicans to hold the Senate.

As of Nov. 27, the Republican senatorial committee had raised $87 million since the election cycle began in 2005 and ended up about $1.2 million in debt.

DOJ_NMG_0105154

By comparison, the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, which lacked the inherent fund-raising advantage of controlling the Senate, raised $119 million in this election cycle and ended up $5.4 million in debt.

Candidates and parties routinely borrow at the end of close races and then pay down the debt after the election. The final figures, and especially the low debts, left some Republicans grumbling privately that their Senate committee's leader, Senator Elizabeth Dole of North Carolina, had failed to give it her all.

"Obviously, Elizabeth Dole did not get great reviews for her performance at the committee," said Stuart Rothenberg, a nonpartisan political analyst. "Nobody is saying she did a great job. You would have to be in a coma not to realize that a $30 million fund-raising advantage for the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee is astounding."

But the staff of the Republican senatorial committee provided analysis to show that their candidates in close races had outspent Democrats but lost anyway. They were incumbents, who enjoyed a considerable fund-raising edge. What's more, the Republican Party raised and spent far more than the Democrats did.

Thanks in part to a $12 million transfer from President Bush's leftover campaign funds, the Republican Party raised more than $200 million since the beginning of 2005 and ended up $3 million "in deficit" because of spending commitments made during the campaign, said Tracey Schmitt, a spokeswoman for the party.

The party reported $6.2 million in cash on hand and no loans. Ms. Schmitt said it had $9.2 million in other obligations.

The Democratic Party raised about $129.3 million since the beginning of 2005, and ended November with about $4 million on hand and about $4.7 million in bank debt.

The National Republican Congressional Committee also outraised and outborrowed the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee.

According to the filings, the Republican committee raised $176 million since the beginning of 2005 and ended November with $1.4 million in cash and $13 million in debt. Its Democratic counterpart raised $137 million and ended November with $2.3 million in cash and $10 million in debt.

Although both Congressional committees have deep debts, the Democrats will have an easier time repaying theirs because the election gave them control of the House, ensuring more donations from influence-seekers.

"People are going to be clamoring to give to the Democrats," Mr. Rothenberg said. "For the Republicans, it is going to be pulling teeth, especially with a presidential race coming up" and its competition for contributions, he said.

Of the main presidential contenders who filed reports this week, Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York remains the best financed. Ms. Clinton's campaign reported $14.4 million in cash on hand and $1.2 million in debts.

Although she lacked a serious challenger, her campaign was one of the biggest fund-raisers and spenders. She raised about $50 million since the beginning of 2005 and spent more than $30 million on operating expenses.

Issues Overshadowed By "Distractions," Allen Says (WP)

By Michael D. Shear

The Washington Post, December 9, 2006

Sen. George Allen (R-Va.) calls them his "distractions."

They started when he called a Democratic aide "macaca" and continued throughout the fall, with allegations about his character and accusations that dated back to his days in high school, college and law school.

As Allen campaigned unsuccessfully for a second term in the U.S. Senate, the distractions formed a dark, unattractive narrative of his life that he said crowded out everything else he was trying to say.

"You have these cheap shots coming at you, but you still need to move forward," Allen said yesterday in one of his first interviews since losing to Democrat James Webb by 9,329 votes out of a total of 2.4 million cast last month. "Obviously, when people are spreading falsehoods and lying about your character and who you are, it's much more aggravating."

"It allowed the portrayal -- and this is what's frustrating -- portrayal of the campaign to be away from actual issues, real solutions that matter," Allen said.

He declined to talk specifically about the controversies that turned what was supposed to be his warm-up for a presidential campaign into a losing bid to hold on to his Senate seat. "You can't brood and dwell" on the loss, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0105155

But it's clear -- especially from the football analogies he uses frequently to describe the sudden turn in his political life -- that Allen regrets the mistakes he and his campaign staff made during the past several months.

"In the event that you lost a game by three or four touchdowns, people say, 'Gosh, it's a blowout,' " Allen said as movers packed up boxes and removed pictures from Room 204 in the Russell Senate Office Building. "If you lose by one point in a game, you can look back on every single play of the game."

Looking back, he continued, one "can say, 'gosh darn, if we only had made that block, if we only didn't jump off-sides, if we only had recovered that fumble, if we hadn't thrown that interception. If the referees didn't screw us on that play.' "

Who are the referees in that analogy? He doesn't say.

There's a lot that Allen won't talk about. He will not discuss his immediate plans, saying he is focused on "doing the people's business" until he leaves his Senate office Jan. 3. He will not say what job offers he is considering but says he has "some really exciting opportunities" to pursue.

And he politely declines to discuss any political future he might have in Virginia.

Advisers say he has abandoned any hope of running for president, a prospect that seemed all but certain this summer. Before the fall campaign, Allen was considered by Washington insiders to be a leading contender for the GOP presidential nomination.

Now, his friends and political observers say, Allen is likely to bide his time before attempting a possible comeback, perhaps as governor in 2009.

For his service as a state delegate, U.S. representative, governor and senator, Allen will receive about $35,000 a year in combined state and federal pensions once he reaches retirement age, aides and Virginia officials estimated.

As nearly two decades in elective office come to a close, Allen prefers to talk about what he predicts will be the legacies from his time in office.

He mentions the school standards and welfare reform he helped push through a Democratic General Assembly as governor in the mid-1990s. He talks with pride about abolishing the "lenient, dishonest sentencing system" of parole. "That's going to endure," he said.

Allen talks less about his six years in the Senate, reflecting the very public admission that he enjoyed being governor far more than being a senator.

"There's a great deal of worship of process," he says with disdain, echoing comments he made early this year that he was tired of the slow pace in the Senate. "It's too slow for me," he said then.

That comment, printed in the New York Times, was the first sign of danger for Allen. Democrats pounced, dubbing him "Bored George." But it wasn't until he was caught on tape calling a Democratic aide of Indian descent "macaca" in early August that his Senate seat was in any real jeopardy. Macaca is a genus of monkey and a racial slur in some cultures.

For Allen, the razor-thin margin of his loss to Webb calls up memories of nail-biter games between the Dallas Cowboys and his father's Washington Redskins.

But Allen is gracious when it comes to Webb, a former Navy secretary for President Ronald Reagan.

"I wish him well because I think it's good for the people of Virginia to have strong leadership for Virginia," he said.

Throughout the campaign, Allen and his pollsters saw data that suggested it would be a close race, in part because of the difficult environment for Republicans this year.

"I knew that, first and foremost, the national Democrats had no love for me. We needed to be prepared," he recalled.

Were they?

"You could throw that in," he said, with a shrug that seemed to acknowledge a certain complacency in his campaign. "Folks have brought that one up, too."

On election night, Allen said, Tampa Bay Buccaneers Coach Jon Gruden, a friend, called him as results were still coming in.

"He said, 'Did you do everything you could? Did you work as hard as you could?' I said, 'Oh, sure, gosh,' " Allen said.

He then added:

"Maybe not everything was perfect in it. That's for sure."

Sekula-Gibbs Has Much To Say (HC)

By Eun Kyung Kim

Houston Chronicle, December 9, 2006

WASHINGTON — She marched into Congress determined to help cut taxes and reform immigration despite the fact that she was only serving out a lame-duck term.

But after two weeks of legislative business on Capitol Hill, Rep. Shelley Sekula-Gibbs learned what being a lame duck really means: She could give speeches but not deliver all of the goods.

The Houston Republican spent the past week — Friday was her last official day on the Hill — delivering one speech after another on the House floor.

Her soliloquies, aimed at the House television camera as the chamber was virtually deserted, could have been judged plentiful even in a place where performance art often passes for good politics.

Beside casting one of the 367 votes in favor of a tax bill that would, among other things, extend the sales-tax deduction on itemized federal income tax returns for Texans and residents of six other states, Sekula-Gibbs leaves a legacy mainly of C-SPAN video.

"District 22 had been without a representative for many months and it was important to have a voice on the floor of the House of Representatives again," she said.

She indeed held forth on Medicare and immigration (a subject that eluded agreement by Congress) but didn't confine herself to the major issues of the day. Among her other topics:

• A welcome to the first lady of Azerbaijan during her visit to Washington.

• Giving nonprofit athletic organizations immunity from being sued.

• Declaring the first week in April "Plan Ahead with an Advance Directive Week."

• Requiring abortion providers to give women the option of receiving anesthesia for the fetus.

Sekula-Gibbs started her term last month as little more than a political footnote.

Democrat Nick Lampson defeated her in the Nov. 7 election to succeed Rep. Tom DeLay, who resigned. She was forced to run as a write-in candidate after courts ruled that DeLay's resignation deprived the Republican Party of the right to select a replacement candidate on the ballot. Lampson takes office in January.

But Sekula-Gibbs won the election that day to finish the last two months of DeLay's term. Lampson was not on the ballot in that contest.

Sekula-Gibbs, a dermatologist and former Houston councilwoman, wasted no time making headlines.

The seven employees she inherited from DeLay resigned the day after she was sworn in, charging that she mistreated them. She denied it and then accused them of deleting files from office computers.

The House chief administrative office investigated, at her request. She said she has not received any findings yet.

Praise from a fellow TexanAfter the Thanksgiving holiday, Congress reconvened only for this week and Sekula-Gibbs instantly became a regular speaker on the House floor.

Ruby Cubley, outgoing president of Bay Area Republican Women, said Sekula-Gibbs did a good job raising her profile and the profile of her district.

"The best she could do was getting her name out there, on the board, if you will," Cubley said.

Rep. Kevin Brady, R-The Woodlands, applauded the way Sekula-Gibbs handled herself.

"It's been difficult just because of the briefness of the term and our transition to the minority and just the circumstances of how she got in," he said.

He acknowledged that though "the staff brouhaha is damaging," he fully expects Sekula-Gibbs to run for office again.

"She's determined to return to Congress (after the) next term," he said.

Sekula-Gibbs remains mum on the topic, although she has made it clear in the past that she plans to run again for the seat in 2008.

"My whole focus has to be on working for the district until I hand over the reins," she said.

DOJ_NMG_0105157

Sekula-Gibbs pointed out that although her time in the legislative session ended, she still has weeks left in her term, which she will finish from her district office.

Cubley said Republicans are intent on coming up with a candidate who can win back the seat from Lampson in 2008.

"I don't know who that person will be, but we will be backing whoever that candidate is," she said. "This is a Republican district, and we will take it back."

For her part, Sekula-Gibbs said she was satisfied with her congressional run.

"Everything has been incredibly valuable, very valuable," she said. "The opportunity to participate in Congress is an experience I'll value my entire life."

Americans Back Price Negotiations On Medicare Drugs (WP)

By Christopher Lee

The Washington Post, December 9, 2006

A new poll shows that the overwhelming majority of Americans favor allowing the government to negotiate prescription drug prices for the Medicare program, suggesting there will be considerable political pressure on the next Congress to do so.

Eight-five percent of the 1,867 adults polled in the Kaiser Family Foundation survey released yesterday said they favored such negotiations, including majorities of Republicans, Democrats and independents.

For weeks, House Democrats have pledged to use their majority control of the next Congress to repeal a provision in the 2003 Medicare drug benefit law that prevents the government from engaging in drug price negotiations. Yesterday, a top aide to House Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) said Democrats would pass legislation in the first 100 hours directing the Bush administration to use its bargaining power. The White House opposes the move.

"Given the administration's opposition to doing anything, I think there was a feeling we had to go a little bit further," said Wendell Primus, Pelosi's adviser on health issues. "It will be very simple language. We do not think that Congress needs to hammer out all the details. There are a lot of smart people in the administration that can look at how we're buying drugs . . . and figure out the best way of negotiating better prices with drug companies."

Coming up with a more comprehensive plan for how negotiations would work will take more time, Primus said. Any plan would have to win approval by the Senate and President Bush.

Under the current program, which enrolled 22.5 million people this year, its first, dozens of private insurers offer Medicare drug plans in each state, competing on monthly premiums, choice of drugs and access to pharmacies. The financial pressure is on insurers, through their pharmacy benefit managers, to negotiate the best prices they can with drug companies and pharmacies, say proponents of the system.

Getting the government involved could be logistically difficult and would not necessarily lower drug prices, they argue. Because one way to win discounts is to favor some drugs over others, opponents add, beneficiaries could face a more limited choice of medications and lobbyists might influence which drugs are available. And if the government succeeds in holding down prices, the pharmaceutical industry has argued, that could discourage the development of new drugs.

Julie L. Goon, special assistant to Bush for economic policy, said that Medicare beneficiaries are saving an average of $1,200 a year on drugs and that the existing program is popular and efficient.

"The government doesn't do a particularly good job of negotiation," Goon said. "I think it would be a mistake to open up the political process to what particular prices are available for drugs."

Critics of the current system say the Department of Veterans Affairs, which by law receives a mandatory discount on drugs, also negotiates effectively to secure better prices for the 4.4 million veterans who use its drug benefit. They argue that, with a pool of as many as 43 million beneficiaries, Medicare would have considerable muscle to force price concessions.

Jeane Kirkpatrick, Reagan's Forceful Envoy, Dies (NYT)

By Tim Weiner

The New York Times, December 9, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0105158

Jeane J. Kirkpatrick, the Reagan administration's first United Nations ambassador and a beacon of neoconservative thought who helped guide American military, diplomatic and covert action from 1981 to 1985, died Thursday at her home in Bethesda, Md. She was 80.

Her death was announced yesterday by the American Enterprise Institute in Washington, where she was a senior fellow. The cause was congestive heart failure, said her personal assistant, Tammy Jagyur.

Ms. Kirkpatrick was the first American woman to serve as United Nations ambassador. She was the only woman, and the only Democrat, in President Ronald Reagan's National Security Council. No woman had ever been so close to the center of presidential power without actually residing in the White House.

"When she put her feet under the desk of the Oval Office, the president listened," said William P. Clark Jr., Mr. Reagan's national security adviser during 1982 and 1983. "And he usually agreed with her."

President Reagan brought her into his innermost foreign policy circle, the National Security Planning Group. There she weighed the risks and rewards of clandestine warfare in Central America, covert operations against Libya, the disastrous deployment of American marines in Lebanon, the invasion of Grenada and support for rebel forces in Afghanistan.

Her public diplomacy made her a national political figure. She was a star performer at the 1984 Republican national convention, deriding the Democrats as the "blame America first" party.

She changed her political affiliation after leaving the Reagan administration and thought hard about seeking the Republican nomination for president.

"So many people talked to me about it so much that they finally persuaded me to consider it," she said in October 1987. But she decided against it, fearing she would split the conservative vote and help elect Vice President George H. W. Bush. Though he won, she thought him too moderate to inherit the Reagan legacy.

Fifteen years later, in March 2003, President Bush recalled Ambassador Kirkpatrick to active duty and sent her to Geneva, said Alan Gerson, who had served as her general counsel at the United Nations. The secret mission, previously undisclosed, was to head off a diplomatic uprising against the imminent war against Iraq. Arab ministers wanted to condemn it as an act of aggression.

"The marching orders we received were to argue that pre-emptive war is legitimate," Mr. Gerson said. "She said: 'No one will buy it. If that's the position, count me out.' "

Instead, she argued that the attack was justified by Saddam Hussein's violations of United Nations resolutions dating from the 1991 war against Iraq. The foreign ministers found her position convincing and their resolve against the war faded, Mr. Gerson said.

Ms. Kirkpatrick was a political science professor with no diplomatic experience when she arrived at the United Nations in February 1981. Her mission was to wage rhetorical warfare against Moscow and its allies. She sought to restore the international standing of the United States after its defeat in Vietnam and the captivity of Americans in Iran.

Her high-profile performance at the United Nations made her President Reagan's favorite envoy. "You're taking off that big sign that we used to wear that said, 'Kick Me,' " the president told her. He admired her strong diplomatic stands and her undiplomatic language. In a letter to 40 third world ambassadors in October 1981, for example, she accused them of spreading "base lies" and making "malicious attacks upon the good name of the United States."

When nations opposed American foreign policy, she sent their voting records to Congress. The threat was tacit but clear: to stand against the United States meant to risk losing its foreign aid. Her deputy at the United Nations, Kenneth L. Adelman, said she enjoyed such close combat.

"We were like Davy Crockett at the Alamo," he said.

Said She Hated U.N. Job

She professed to detest the United Nations. She compared it to "death and taxes." But she endured it for four years.

At the United Nations, she defended Israel's invasion of Lebanon in 1982 and the American invasion of Grenada in 1983. She argued for El Salvador's right-wing junta and against Nicaragua's left-wing ruling council, the Sandinistas.

DOJ_NMG_0105159

In private, she supported American efforts to sustain the contras, the rebel group that tried to overthrow the Sandinistas with help from the Central Intelligence Agency She was a crucial participant in a March 1981 National Security Planning Group meeting that produced a $19 million covert action plan to make the contras a fighting force.
